« Der Türmer ungeheurer Klangmassen wird selbst Turmwart und Turm der deutschen Ostmark. Sein Weckruf wie sein Glaube heißt Deutschland. » .

Seine Eindeutschung folgte auf dem Fuße :

« Das Blut Anton Bruckners aber ist, wie seine Gestalt, die mit ihrem gewaltigen Langschädel und der für die nordische Rasse charakteristischen Einbuchtung am Hinterkopf als germanisch bezeichnet werden muß, urdeutsch. »

Hitler hatte seinen Auftritt in der Walhalla bestens inszenieren lassen. Vor dem Bau, jetzt « Ehrentempel des Dritten Reiches » , waren durch Albert Speer zwei 23 m hohe Fahnenmasten mit dem Reichsadler errichtet worden. Anwesend war auch ein Gesandter der österreichischen Regierung, als der Einzug nach Walhall mit Bruckners « Germanenzug » , dargeboten von « vereinigten deutschen und österreichischen Chören » , begann. Artig sprachen zunächst Gauleiter Wächtler und der bayerische Ministerpräsident Siebert vom deutschen Vermächtnis, das sich jetzt dank der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung erfülle. Es folgte Josef Goebbels mit einer längeren Rede, worin er den Bogen zu Richard Wagner spannte, unter dessen Eindruck der Österreicher Bruckner ja erst erwacht sei und sich zu eigener Meisterschaft entwickelt habe. Hitler, dem bei dieser Gelegenheit gleich die Bruckner Medaille überreicht wurde, ließ das Kopfbildnis durch Reichskammermusikpräsident Professor Raabe enthüllen. Als einzige, so der Völkische Beobachter, « ist die Statue Anton Bruckners mit der Hakenkreuzfahne umkleidet, zum Zeichen, daß diese Büste die erste ist, die im Dritten Reich auf Beschluss des Führers in dieser Ehrenhalle der großen Deutschen Aufstellung gefunden hat » .

Daß in der Bruckner Büste sich die Züge Hitlers verstecken, nehmen die heutigen Besucher natürlich nicht wahr, wengleich die Person des größten Feldherrn aller Zeiten die Gemüter auf dem Grunde immer noch heftig bewegt. Josefa Beutl, seit 1978 im Kartenverkauf der Walhalla beschäftigt, erzählt, daß seit der Vereinigung der beiden deutschen Staaten und einem stetig anschwellenden Strom von Besuchern aus den neuen Bundesländern immer wieder nach der Büste des Führers gefragt werde, der abschlägige Bescheid auf den Gesichtern dann Spuren großer Enttäuschung hinterlasse. Dafür dürfte sich ein anderer Büsten-Traum der Walhalla Pilger leichter realisieren lassen, sobald nur die nötige Mindestablagerungszeit von 20 Jahren verstrichen ist. Diese Bedingung muß Franz-Josef Strauß noch erfüllen, denn da die Walhalla 1962 endgültig in das Eigentum des Freistaates Bayern übergang und als Bundes Nationaldenkmal seit dem 9. November 1989 endgültig obsolet geworden ist, dürfte sich für Lokalmatador Strauß eine entsprechende Büsten Lobby wohl beschaffen lassen.

Wenige Monate vor dem so genannt « Anschluß » Österreichs konnte die Bevölkerung der Stadt Regensburg am 6. Juni 1937 im Rahmen eines Staatsaktes an der Walhalla eine der aus heutiger Sicht wohl merkwürdigsten Selbstinzenierungen des Nazi-Regimes miterleben. Doch war es nicht, wie sich vielleicht vermuten ließe, die Büste eines bedeutenden deutschen Staatsmannes, die mit großem Aufwand im « Ruhmestempel der Deutschen » enthüllt wurde, sondern die eines in Österreich geborenen Komponisten. Nach Johann Sebastian Bach, Georg Friedrich Händel, Christoph Willibald Gluck, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Ludwig van Beethoven, Richard Wagner (1913 anlässlich des 100. Geburtstages) und Franz Schubert (1928 anlässlich des 100. Todestages) war Anton Bruckner der achte in der Walhalla aufgenommene Komponist.

Mag man das Ereignis nun wie Albrecht Riethmüller als « öffentliche Probe » (1993, Seite 16.) oder wie Albrecht Dümling als « symbolische Vorwegnahme » (1999, Seite 204.) in Bezug auf den 1938 erfolgenden « Anschluß » Österreichs und der damit verbundenen Konsolidierung eines geeinten « Großdeutschland » interpretieren - Thesen, die durch den Charakter der Massenveranstaltung in Verbindung mit dem am Nachmittag des 6. Juni sich anschließenden Gauparteitag der Bayerischen Ostmark in Regensburg, bei dem 200.000 Menschen ihre Treue zum nationalsozialistischen Staat und seinem Führer schworen, durchaus gestützt werden - Tatsache ist, daß es Staatsakte in der Walhalla bisher nur zweimal im Zusammenhang mit der Aufstellung der Büsten Ludwigs I. und Kaiser Wilhelms I. in den 1890er Jahren gegeben hatte.

Warum nun wurde gerade ein Komponist, noch dazu ein gebürtiger Österreicher, eines solchen Aufwandes für würdig befunden ? Diese Frage erscheint auch heute noch nicht vollständig geklärt. Wie in der Sekundärliteratur immer wieder betont wird, spielte zwischen 1933 und 1945 Anton Bruckner beziehungsweise seine Musik vor allem deswegen eine so große Rolle, weil sich Hitler offenbar in mehrfacher Hinsicht mit der Person Bruckners identifizieren konnte : Beide waren Österreicher, hatten sich aus einfachen Verhältnissen emporgearbeitet, lebten zeitweise in Linz und wurden in Wien als Künstler zunächst abgelehnt. Nicht nur der einem Großteil der Kompositionen Bruckners, insbesondere den Sinfonien, anhaftende monumentale Charakter, sondern auch die in Werken wie Germanenzug oder Helgoland offen zu Tage tretende Deutschtümelei waren dazu geeignet, ein Massenpublikum, wie es die Nazis bevorzugten, unmittelbar anzusprechen. Die großdimensionierte formale Anlage der Sinfonien, die Prägung durch den Orgelklang, die Bevorzugung klarer Rhythmik und dreiklangsgebundener Harmonik, aber auch das Einbeziehen volksmusikalischer Elemente galten in (4/5) der Zeit als Merkmale einer « echten reinen deutschen » Musik, die anlässlich der jährlich stattfindenden Reichsparteitage oder anderer Feierlichkeiten den im nazistischen Sinne adäquaten musikalischen Rahmen für Propaganda-Reden und Machtdemonstrationen darstellte. Besonders beliebt waren in diesem Zusammenhang im übrigen die Sinfonien Nummer 3, Nummer 5 und Nummer 7. Daß Hitler die Musik Bruckners mindestens ebenso schätzte wie die Richard Wagners, bezeugt sein zu Beginn der 1940er Jahre angedachter Plan zum Aufbau einer « Weihestätte für das unsterbliche Werk Bruckners » im Stiftsgebäude von Sankt Florian in Linz, wo dann jährlich « Bruckner-Festspiele nach Art von Bayreuth » veranstaltet werden sollten. Wenn es nun unbedingt die Büste eines Komponisten sein mußte, die in die Walhalla aufgenommen werden sollte, lag es nahe, die Anton Bruckners auszuwählen, zumal bereits eine entsprechende Eingabe der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft (im folgenden : IBG) vorlag. Der Walhalla-Staatsakt des Jahres 1937 stellte nur den vorläufigen Höhepunkt nazistisch geprägter Bruckner-Verehrung dar. Er wurde letztlich ermöglicht durch eine Institution, die sich bereitwillig für politische Propagandaveranstaltungen instrumentalisieren ließ. Die Nazis « honorierten » diese Form des Opportunismus, indem sie die IBG nach dem « Anschluß » 1938 gleichschalteten und ihren Präsidenten Max Auer seines Amtes enthoben.

Erste Pläne zur Aufstellung einer Büste Anton Bruckners in der Walhalla existierten bereits zu Beginn der 1930er Jahre, doch wurde einer diesbezüglichen Eingabe seitens der IBG von der bayerischen Landesregierung zum damaligen Zeitpunkt nicht stattgegeben (Christa Brüstle, 1998, Seite 102.) . Auch der Künstler, dessen Werk letztendlich in der Walhalla enthüllt wurde, Adolf Rothenburger, hatte schon 1933 die Ausarbeitung einer Marmorbüste Bruckners in Erwägung gezogen, wie aus einem Schreiben des Komponisten Wolfgang von Bartels an Max Auer vom 10. Juni 1933 hervorgeht :

Auer stimmte dem Plan zu und Siegmund Hausegger, der damalige inoffizielle Präsident des deutschen Zweiges der Gesellschaft und Dirigent der Münchner Philharmoniker, nahm die Verhandlungen mit dem bayerischen Ministerpräsidenten Ludwig Siebert auf.

Es sollte allerdings noch 3 Jahre dauern, bis Hausegger im Februar 1936 den Erfolg seiner Mission vermelden konnte (Christa Brüstle, 1998, Seite 103.) . Etwa zur gleichen Zeit beauftragte der Regensburger Musikverleger Gustav Bosse in seiner Eigenschaft als Vorstandsmitglied der IBG den in Breslau lebenden Künstler Hans Wildermann mit der Anfertigung einer Bruckner-Ehrenmedaille, die offenbar im Zusammenhang mit der Enthüllung der Büste an verdiente Förderer der Musik Anton Bruckners überreicht werden sollte.

Zwei Monate später übergab die bayerische Landesregierung im Mai 1936 die Walhalla unter Berufung auf einen Zusatz zur ursprünglichen Verfügung (5/6) Ludwigs I. vom 14. Mai 1862, demzufolge die Verfügungsgewalt über die Walhalla bei einer Auflösung des Deutschen Bundes an Bayern übergehen, bei einer Neugründung des Bundes aber an Deutschland zurückfallen würde, an Adolf Hitler als dem Führer und Kanzler des deutschen Volkes und bat ihn ferner um die Aufstellung weiterer Büsten. Über die Begründung des Ministerpräsidenten Siebert und die Aufnahme der Bruckner-Büste informiert ein Artikel des Völkischen Beobachters vom 22. Mai 1936 unter der Überschrift Ministerpräsident Siebert vollstreckt das deutsche Vermächtnis Ludwig I. , der hier auszugsweise wiedergegeben wird :

Die Bedeutung des gesamten Vorgangs unterstrich der Völkische Beobachter mit der förmlich ins Auge springenden rot unterstrichenen Schlagzeile « Die Walhalla als Ehrentempel des deutschen Volkes unter der Obhut des Führers » .

Die feierliche Enthüllung der Büste war für den Herbst des Jahres vorgesehen und sollte im Rahmen des 8. Brucknerfestes der IBG in Regensburg stattfinden. (Zeitschrift für Musik, 103. Jahrgang, Heft 6, Juni 1936, Anton Bruckner in der Walhalla, Seite 724.) Für die Organisation dieser Veranstaltung zeichneten in erster Linie der in München ansässige Komponist und Dirigent Siegmund von Hausegger, der Präsident der Reichsmusikkammer Peter Raabe und Gustav Bosse verantwortlich. Im September des Jahres schienen die Vorbereitungen relativ weit vorangeschritten zu sein, denn die von Bosse herausgegebene Zeitschrift für Musik informierte ihre Leser bereits über die zur Auf- (6/7) führung vorgesehenen Kompositionen Bruckners und die teilnehmenden Dirigenten. (Heft 9, Seite 1154.) Als Aufführungsort war und andere die Minoritenkirche vorgesehen, die aus diesem Anlaß auf Kosten der Nazi-Regierung von Grund auf restauriert und zum Konzertraum umfunktioniert werden mußte. Darüber hinaus wurde beim Öttinger Orgelbauunternehmen Georg Friedrich Steinmeyer (1819-1901) ein Instrument in Auftrag gegeben, das den Anforderungen der Musik Bruckners zu genügen hatte. Gustav Bosse äußerte sich diesbezüglich gegenüber Max Auer in einem Brief vom 1. September 1936 :

Nur zwei Wochen später entschloß sich Hitler jedoch überraschend zu einer Verlegung der Regensburger Brucknerfeier auf Mai 1937. Gustav Bosse, den der Regensburger Oberbürgermeister Otto Schottenheim am 14. September 1936 hierüber in Kenntnis gesetzt hatte, vermutete, daß das Fest wohl « ganz groß, weit über den bisher geplanten Rahmen hinaus gestaltet werden » solle und « daß für diese besondere Ausgestaltung des Festes durch das Reich, die von uns ja so sehr gewünschte äußere Dokumentierung der Verbrüderung Deutschland - Österreich maßgebend » sei, eine Äußerung, die angesichts des angespannten politischen Verhältnisses zwischen Deutschland und Österreich wohl besser nicht an die Öffentlichkeit gelangen durfte. (Brief an Max Auer, 15. September 1936, ebenda, Seite 104.) In der Zeitschrift für Musik wurden ganz andere (weitaus weniger politisch brisante) Gründe für die Terminverschiebung geltend gemacht : « Maßgebend war, daß die Feier alsdann in eine günstigere Jahreszeit fällt und vor allem, daß sie Ende Oktober mit anderen großen Veranstaltungen zusammengefallen wäre, die zahlreiche hervorragende Persönlichkeiten verhindert hätten, an den vorgesehenen Veranstaltungen zu Ehren Anton Bruckners in Regensburg teilzunehmen. » . (103. Jahrgang, Heft 10, Oktober 1936, Seite 1258.) Das 8. Brucknerfest der IBG fand tatsächlich erst nach Ablauf des Gedenkjahres statt, und zwar vom 5. bis 7. Juni 1937. Der Großteil der anfallenden Kosten, die sich auf über 50.000 Reich Mark beliefen, wurde als « Führerspende » deklariert und vom Ministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda getragen.

Die Feierlichkeiten begannen am Abend des 5. Juni mit dem I. Festkonzert im Neuhaussaal. (Programm siehe, Seite 6.) Außerhalb des eigentlichen Festprogramms fand während des sonntäglichen Pontifikalamtes eine Aufführung der E-Moll Messe im Regensburger Dom statt. Die Enthüllung der Büste in der Walhalla im Rahmen eines Staatsaktes in Anwesenheit Hitlers und weiterer hochstehender Persönlichkeiten aus Politik und Kultur war für den Vormittag des 6. Juni (Sonntag) vorgesehen und als Propagandaveranstaltung « par excellence » angelegt, über die in Rundfunk, Wochenschau und Tagespresse berichtet wurde. Der Völkische Beobachter brachte beispielsweise in der Ausgabe vom 7. Juni 1937 die Schlagzeilen « Ein Großer der Musik im Ruhmestempel der Deutschen. Der Führer ehrte Anton Bruckner. » sowie unmittelbar daneben « Adolf Hitler vor 200.000 in Regensburg. Ein starkes Bekenntnis zum Frieden auf dem Gautag der Bayerischen Ostmark » und widmete dem Ereignis immerhin zwei Druckseiten. (Münchner Ausgabe.)

Die Nazi-Regierung war vertreten durch Propagandaminister Josef Gœbbels, Justizminister Franz Gürtner und Ernährungs- und Landwirtschaftsminister Richard Walther Darré ; Österreich schickte seinen Berliner Gesandten Stephan Tauschitz. Weiterhin versammelten sich vor der Walhalla der deutsche Botschafter in Wien Franz von Papen, Reichsführer SS Heinrich Himmler, Reichsstatthalter General Franz Ritter von Epp, der bayerische Ministerpräsident Ludwig Siebert, der Gauleiter der bayerischen Ostmark, Fritz Wächtler, der Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Regensburg, Otto Schottenheim, zahlreiche hohe Offiziere der Wehrmacht, Mitglieder der IBG, der Präsident der Reichsmusikkammer Peter Raabe und (nicht zu vergessen) als willkommene Staffage Banner- und Standartenträger der Parteigliederungen der Bayerischen Ostmark, die politischen Leiter der Jugendverbände und Mitglieder des Arbeitsdien- (7/8) stes. Beim Eintreffen der Ehrengäste erklangen Wagner-Fanfaren. Zur Eröffnung der Feier trug ein aus 800 deutschen und österreichischen Sängern bestehender Chor Bruckners Germanenzug vor. Es folgte eine kurze Begrüßungsrede Ludwig Sieberts, in der dieser (so der Redakteur der Allgemeinen Musikzeitung Walter Abendroth) « vor allem auf die Bedeutung der Walhalla als Symbol einer geistigen Einheit aller Deutschen hinwies » (64. Jahrgang, Nummer 25, 18. Juni 1937, Seite 393.) und die Walhalla offiziell der Obhut Hitlers unterstellte. Die Einheit des Deutschen Reiches beschwörend, unterstellte Ludwig Siebert, es sei « die Sehnsucht aller wahrhaft Deutschen der Vergangenheit, ihre Sehnsucht nach dem großen, stolzen, einigen deutschen Vaterlande » gewesen, die sich « in unsrer Zeit durch unsern Führer erfüllt » . habe (Paul Ehlers, 1937, Seite 747.) Die Verbalisierung großdeutscher Zukunftspläne fand ihren Höhepunkt in der etwa viertelstündigen Ansprache Josef Goebbels', in der er und andere « Anton Bruckner als Sohn der österreichischen Erde » als « ganz besonders dazu berufen » erklärte, « die unauslöschliche geistige und seelische Schicksalsgemeinschaft zu versinnbildlichen, die das gesamte deutsche Volk verbindet. Es ist daher für uns ein symbolisches Ereignis von mehr als nur künstlerischer Bedeutung, wenn Sie, mein Führer, sich entschlossen haben, in diesem deutschen Nationalheiligtum als erstes Denkmal unseres Reiches eine Büste Anton Bruckners aufstellen zu lassen » . Die « tiefe Gottgläubigkeit » Bruckners wurzele « in dem gleichen heldischen Weltgefühl des germanischen Menschentums, dem alle wahrhaft großen und ewigen Schöpfungen der deutschen Kunst entspringen » . (Goebbels-Reden, Seite 285.) Darüber hinaus stellte Goebbels in seiner Rede die Weichen für die zukünftige Bruckner-Forschung, indem er sämtliche seit 1935 in der Öffentlichkeit ausgetragenen Streitigkeiten um die « originale » Gestalt Brucknerscher Werke beendete und in seiner Eigenschaft als Präsident der Reichskulturkammer die staatliche Sanktionierung und vor allem auch Subventionierung der von der IBG herausgegebenen Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe verkündete. (Ebenda)

Nachdem Max Auer die neu angefertigte Bruckner-Medaille an Hitler übergeben hatte, begaben sich die Ehrengäste in die Walhalla, wo Peter Raabe die Büste zu den Klängen des vom Regensburger Domchor gesungenen Locus iste feierlich enthüllte. Die Enthüllung sowie die folgenden Kranzniederlegungen durch Adolf Hitler, Ludwig Siebert, Stephan Tauschitz und Max Auer wurden begleitet von Ausschnitten aus Bruckners 8. Sinfonie, die die Münchner Philharmoniker unter der Leitung Hauseggers spielten. Die Aufgabe des österreichischen Botschafters Stefan Tauschitz war es dann, sich im Namen der Österreichischen Regierung für die Bruckner-Ehrung zu bedanken. Hitler verließ die Walhalla unter den Klängen des Deutschland-Liedes, des Horst-Wessel-Liedes und der Österreichischen Nationalhymne. Erst nach dem Abzug aller Ehrengäste durften die übrigen Festteilnehmer die Walhalla betreten.

In seinem Tagebuch kommentierte Josef Goebbels am 7. Juni die Ereignisse in der Domstadt aus der Rückschau :

« Regensburg : Siebert stänkert etwas gegen mich herum. Aber ich sage ihm Bescheid. Der Führer lacht sich aus. Die Feier ist sehr gut und würdevoll. Siebert spricht und ich. Die Walhalla macht auch heute noch einen imposanten Eindruck. Ergreifend, all die großen deutschen Namen zu lesen. Dieser Ludwig war doch ein Kerl. Einmal wird auch der Führer hier aufgestellt. Wohl Bismarck gegenüber. Die Domspatzen singen wundervoll. Bruckner war einer unserer ganz Großen. Wir wollen ihn nun mehr pflegen. Rückfahrt durch Regensburg. Durch ein jubelndes Menschengespinn. In dieser schwarzen Stadt. Sie werden den kürzeren ziehen, diese Klerikalen. » (Die Tagebücher von Josef Goebbels. Sämtliche Fragmente, herausgeber von Elke Fröhlich, Teil I : Aufzeichnungen 1924-1941, Band 3 : 01.01.1937 - 31.12.1939, München und andere 1987, Seite 168.) (8/9)

Ein weiterer Höhepunkt des Regensburger Brucknerfestes war das vom Reichssender Berlin übertragene Konzert am Abend des 6. Juni in der restaurierten Minoritenkirche, bei dem in Anwesenheit Hitlers, Sieberts und weiterer hochrangiger Politiker auch die neue Konzertorgel erstmals erklang. In seinem Artikel über das Regensburger Bruckner-Erlebnis lieferte Paul Ehlers 1937 eine detaillierte Beschreibung des Innenraumes der Minoritenkirche, die er als idealen

Aufführungsort und als « architektonisches Gegenstück » zur Musik Bruckners bezeichnete :

An der Aufführung des Te Deum unter der Leitung von Theobald Schrems waren 475 Sänger aus sämtlichen kirchlichen und weltlichen Institutionen der Stadt Regensburg beteiligt. Die 5. Sinfonie mit den Münchner Philharmonikern unter der Leitung Hauseggers erklang (selbstverständlich) in der « Originalfassung ». Im Rahmen der Festsitzung der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft im Reichssaal des Alten Rathauses am Mittag des 7. Juni wurden schließlich weitere Ehrenmedaillen an ausgewählte Förderer der Musik Bruckners (unter ihnen Ludwig Siebert, Peter Raabe, Max Auer, Siegmund von Hausegger und Gustav Bosse) überreicht. Josef Gøebbels, der an diesem Tag schon nicht mehr in Regensburg weilte, erhielt seine Ehrenmedaille erst am 18. Juni aus den Händen Peter Raabes, des Präsidenten der Reichsmusikkammer, der auch die Festrede bei der Sitzung im Reichssaal hielt. Das Bruckner-Fest kam am Abend des 7. Juni 1937 zu einem krönenden Abschluß mit Aufführungen der Sinfonien Nummer 1 unter der Leitung von Peter Raabe und Nummer 9 unter Oswald Kabasta in der Minoritenkirche. Über den Künstler der Bruckner-Büste in der Walhalla, Adolf Rothenburger, ist bis heute wenig bekannt. Geboren am 24. Januar 1883 in Frankfurt am Main, lebte und arbeitete er wohl ab den 1920er Jahren als Bildhauer in München, wo er und andere einige Bildreliefs für das Deutsche Museum anfertigte. Der Bio-bibliographische Index des Allgemeinen Künstlerlexikons (München / Leipzig, 2000, Seite 545.) gibt eine letzte Erwähnung Rothenburgers « vor 1935 » an. Tatsächlich dürfte Rothenburger aber mindestens noch 1936-1937 an der Bruckner-Büste gearbeitet haben. Dies legt jedenfalls eine auf den Zeitraum zwischen September / Oktober 1936 und Mai 1937 zu datierende Geschichte und Beschreibung der Walhalla und des Marktes Donaustauf (Walhalla-Beschreibung. Amtlicher Führer, Herausgeber von der Walhalla-Kommission in Regensburg, ohne Jahr) nahe, in der sich der Hinweis findet, daß die Büste Bruckners « von Bildhauer Rothenburger in München ausgeführt » und « im Mai 1937 » enthüllt würde (Seite 22.) . Abbildungen der Bruckner-Büste erschienen und andere in einem « im Bruckner Jahr 1937 gelegentlich der Übernahme der Walhalla durch den Führer vom Verschönerungs- und Fremdenverkehrsverein Donaustauf » herausgegebenen Führer durch die Walhalla und durch Donaustauf und in der Allgemeinen Musikzeitung am 2. Juli 1937. (64. Jahrgang, Nummer 27, Titelblatt.) Die Ehrung des österreichischen Komponisten Anton Bruckner blieb (überraschenderweise) die einzige, die in der Zeit des Dritten Reiches im « Ruhmestempel der Deutschen » stattfand. Die Büste steht heute zwischen derjenigen Johann Josef von Görres' (Aufstellung 1931) und Max Regers (Aufstellung 1948) an der Ostseite.

Dimanche, le 6 juin à 18 à heures - 2e Concert Gala donné à l'église des Frères mineurs

Anton Bruckner : « Te Deum » pour solistes (SATB) , chœur (SATB) , orchestre et orgue ad libitum.

Direction : Professeur docteur Theodor Schrems, de Ratisbonne.

Ensemble : Chœur de la cathédrale de Ratisbonne.

Anton Bruckner : 5e Symphonie en si bémol majeur (version originale) .

Direction : Docteur honoraire Siegmund Hausegger, de Munich.

Ensemble : Orchestre philharmonique de Munich.

La « Minoritenkirche » (église des Frères mineurs ou des Minorites) est située au 5 de Regensburg, dans le diocèse de Ratisbonne.

L'ancien monastère franciscain consacré (« ordo fratrum minorum ») de « Sankt Salvator » fut fondée en 1221 par l'évêque de Ratisbonne, Conrad IV de Frontenhausen, avec la participation du Comte palatin Otto VIII de Bavière et du roi Henri VII. Cette basilique de style Gothique, avec ces 3 spectaculaires nefs, représente la plus grande église de l'Ordre des Franciscains, en Allemagne du Sud. Lors de la sécularisation de 1799, l'église sera profanée et le monastère dissout. L'église et de grandes parties du monastère, dont le cloître et sa fontaine du Gothique tardif, seront heureusement bien conservées. À travers les époques, l'église va être utilisé comme poste de douane et de péage, comme salle d'exercices, comme entrepôt et hôtel. Les bâtiments conventuels seront également utilisés comme résidence et comme caserne par l'armée bavaroise.

7 juin 1937 : Adolf Hitler décerne au « Duce » italien, le Premier ministre Benito Mussolini, la Grande-Croix de l'Ordre du Mérite de l'Aigle allemand (nouvellement créé) pour mousser « l'entente de cordialité entre l'Italie et le " Reich " allemand » .

Il y aura aussi une réunion du Parti nazi de Bavière. Le « Führer » s'adressera à un auditoire de 200,000 personnes sur le « Parteitag » du « Bayerische Ostmark » .

1937 : Adolf Hitler choisit de conclure le rassemblement annuel des Nazis à Nuremberg avec une exécution du gigantesque Finale de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner.

8 juin 1937 : Adolf Hitler édicte qu'on ne peut plus nommer que des hommes, si ce n'est dans le domaine « social » .

29 juin 1937 : Only 23 days after the « Walhalla » ceremony, Bruno Walter recorded for « HMV » Anton Bruckner's « Te Deum » with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and the Chorus of the Vienna « Staatsoper » during a live performance at « le Théâtre des Champs-Élysées » in Paris (« EMI » - Japan : TOCE 9099 ; BDC 24) .

Soloists : Elisabeth Schumann (soprano) , Kerstin Thorborg (mezzo) , Anton Dermota (tenor) , Alexander Kipnis (bass) .

During that same period, Bruno Walter also recorded for « EMI » Mozart's « Requiem » and Palestrina's « Stabat Mater » .

Discours de Josef Gœbbels au « Walhalla »

Quant à lui, le Ministre de la Propagande, Josef Gœbbels, fera un discours fort habile (et machiavélique) qui lie la vie et l'œuvre de Bruckner à l'agenda National-Socialiste dans le but de créer « l'Art allemand » . En voici une traduction anglaise :

« My " Führer ". Today, we have gathered together with you, my " Führer ", on a consecrated site to honour one of the greatest Masters of the German music. With us, the German people feels itself called upon in this hour to contemplate with gratitude this genius, who, like Beethoven before him, left us and the world an artistic legacy of 9 mighty Symphonies, and who belongs to the proudest treasures of our National musical culture. But it is not only in his musical works that this Master of the Symphonic art speaks to us ; along with them appears strong and unmistakably in Anton Bruckner the lineage of our best musical tradition, which experienced its most visible manifestation in his personality in the last Century.

Here, before us, stands the German church musician who, as a teacher and performer, faithfully prepared and nourishes the sacred music tradition without drawing undue attention to his own work, with which he contributed to that tradition in his during this time of humble employment ; but he also carefully paid attention to the indigenous music of his people, which is played such an important part of daily life outside of the church. It is very fortunate for the history of our music that in his time which in art as in all other areas of intellectual activity was characterized by an increasing use of specialization that certain aspects of German musical creativity could be combined by Bruckner in such decisive way. A Symphonic composer and a church music composer were combined in the genius of Anton Bruckner.

It was not easy for Bruckner's contemporaries to understand the complexities of this man and his personality. His physical appearance, and his music seemed peculiar and almost hard to comprehend. It would take time for Bruckner's musical language, with its originality and inner logic, to be generally understood in broader circles. It is completely misguided to hope to discover in Bruckner's music nothing more than a Symphonic distortion of Wagner's music, as is still often done in certain circles. Like any genius, Bruckner is unique and peculiar unto himself. In order to understand him, one must look to the roots of his existence, the elemental forces of blood and race that propelled his humanity.

Bruckner comes from a long line of peasants which we can trace back as far as the year 1400. Throughout his life, even after his professional advancement and his move to higher social circles, he never disavowed his peasant roots. His almost mystical connection with nature ; his long standing and genuine love for his native soil and for the great German fatherland ; his uncomplex and straightforward character, which was matched with true humility and bore a proud self-understanding of his own accomplishments ; his child-like purity of his love of life, which was anchored upon his faith in God uncomplicated by any intellectual uncertainty, demonstrates how strong and secure his peasant roots remained in him.

One must know of the hardships of his early life in order to understand that there could be no choice of profession for him to choose. He was the eldest of 11 children. He grew-up with the understanding that he was to become a school Master. None of our other great Masters has so willingly and unhesitatingly placed himself in the service of the schools as he did ; and even after, there was little more for him to study in his art, he continually enrolled in examinations to demonstrate in writing to the Masters of his day his extraordinary technical ability. One of these examiners was honest enough to admit that, " He should be testing us ! " .

Perhaps, this is now the time and the place to object to a misguided statement often directed against the life and works of Anton Bruckner. Saccharine catchwords such as " God's street-musician " or " Our Dear Lady's singer " must be evoked even today as excuses for promoting a religious martyrdom of Bruckner's difficult artistic struggle. The people who promote such clichés are particularly fond of pointing out that his Franciscan humility was his most pronounced characteristic. All such suggestions do not do justice to the image of this great musical genius. As with his personality, there have been and still are numerous misinterpretations of his life's work. A hostile, journalistic branch of criticism, with its incessant torments, embittered him to his rich life of work. During a conversation with Bruckner, Eduard Hanslick once even let slip these words which unmask this guild of " critical mosquitoes " : " I destroy whoever I wish to destroy ! " .

It is with reluctance and disdain that we turn our attention today to these intellectual carpet-baggers, who in Bruckner's day misused their high position as judges in order to set down sentences such as this about his music, whose creativity they simply could not understand : " We truly shudder before the scent of mold that assaults our noses from the discords of this putrefactive counterpoint. " or : " In the event a page here and there from one of his scores accords with our understanding of musical logic, then we can hardly hold him responsible for it ; Bruckner composes like a drunkard. " or : " It is not impossible that the future belongs to this dream-distorted, hung-over style ; a future which, for that reason, we do not envy. " .

Given samples of such utterly deplorable public criticism, one can understand the shocking document written by Bruckner's that is held today in the archives of the Vienna Philharmonic. In 1884, the Philharmonic was considering the premiere of his 7th Symphony. Bruckner wrote to them : " If my request be approved, the most honoured committee will wish to find a way around the undertaking that gives me so much honour and happiness, for reasons that have to do only with the sad situation arising from the prevailing criticisms. " . How much bitterness, how much emotional anguish must have consumed this genius to drive him to such a decision ! If the public practice of music criticism has been restricted by law to official channels in the new Germany, then we believe we have also resolved a debt of gratitude to the Master who struggled in solitude, and was tortured-up to his moment of death by his tormenters.

With regard to this hostile resistance, however, we also cannot fail to mention those misinterpretations of Bruckner's music, those of his true followers and disciples. Here, too, lurks the catchword of succession, a successor to Wagner. And this is by no means always meant disparagingly, but rather, often enough, positively. To the extent that this is meant to say that Bruckner's artistic development would be unthinkable without Wagner, no one can object. For Bruckner's Mastery 1st developed fully and as a person he was 1st able truly to break free from external barriers, only when he was approached the age of 40. This was when he got his 1st direct impression of the art of the great music-dramatist Richard Wagner. This experience had an almost revolutionary effect on the sonority of his musical language which only then assumed the character that we recognize today as the true Brucknerian style. From that moment onwards, the church musician quickly retreats almost entirely, and, then, emerges the distinctive Symphonist.

This transformation, incomprehensible as it is for such a faithful servant of the church, to an absolute Symphonic art, which, by nature, knows no liturgical obligations, was the fateful point in Bruckner's subsequent artistic development. Here his creative genius frees itself of all ties to the church, and now awakens in him the spring-like force of the great creative act. He is filled with the victorious intoxication of form-giving, and a boundless feeling of freedom roars through his soul. In the works of this mature period, the warrior-like will to act, without which we can imagine absolutely no true Symphony, sweeps us along with it.

A complete misunderstanding of Bruckner's style is revealed when attempts are made to lump his Symphonies together under the rubric of religious art, to characterize them as a kind of church music, to dub them simply " Masses without texts ". It is time to take a stand against these misguided attempts at interpretation. For Anton Bruckner, like every great genius, cannot be forced into the constraints of a artistic stencil. And those of us who, although not making a scholarly examination of his music, let his works affect us so simply and immediately as artistic revelations ; we all sense and know that his deep religious faith has long since been freed of all confessional confines, and that it has its roots in the same heroic feeling for the world from which all truly great and eternal creations of German art blossom. In this sense, Anton Bruckner's works represent a National legacy.

The " Führer " and his government regard it as a cultural debt of honour to do everything in their power to enable the entire German people to share in this sacred heritage, and, with a significant encouragement of interest in Bruckner, to see to it that this interest and its effects penetrate not only deeply but also widely. For these reasons, they have decided to make a considerable annual contribution to the " International Bruckner Society " for editions of the original versions of his Symphonies, until the Master's complete works are available in the form he envisioned.

Permit me, my " Führer ", also to state in this solemn hour that Anton Bruckner, as a son of Austrian soil, is especially called upon to make sense of the unrelenting intellectual and spiritual common fate that envelops the German people even today. It is, therefore, a symbolic event of more than just artistic significance for us that you, my " Führer ", have decided to have a bust of Anton Bruckner included in this sacred National place, once erected by a great Bavarian king, as the 1st monument of our Empire. As admirers of the art of this great Master, we all have been deeply moved by his overpowering genius, wish to offer you, my " Führer ", our deepest gratitude.

With veneration, we consider the immortality of Bruckner's music and recognize one fact with that acknowledgment submitted by a great learned Austrian as he presented at the awarding of an honorary Doctorate to the great Master, declared to him : " Where science must stop, where its insurmountable barriers are set, only there does the realm of art begin. But you have been able to express that which has remained closed to all knowledge. So it is that I, the rector of the University of Vienna, bow before the school Master from Windhaag. " . And thus, does a thankful Nation bow, in this solemn hour, in the meaning and spirit of this speech before the immortal genius of one of its greatest sons. »

Vinzenz Goller

Parmi les œuvres sans n° d'Opus du compositeur, musicien d'église et maire de la ville de Klosterneuburg, Vinzenz Goller (1873-1943) , citons la Messe en mi mineur de Bruckner (la 2e) avec un accompagnement à l'orgue en remplacement de l'ensemble original d'instruments à vent (2 hautbois, 2 clarinettes, 2 bassons, 4 cors, 2 trompettes et 3 trombones) . L'adaptation éditée chez Universal-Edition (UE 2915) sera donnée en première en 1917. Il la révisé en 1931.

Sa vénération ne s'arrête pas là :

Adaptation pour orgue de l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie.

2 Fanfares festives pour 11 instruments à vent sur des thèmes de Bruckner.

Vinzenz Goller sera également l'éditeur du beau Motet en fa mineur intitulé « Libera me, Domine » pour chœur mixte à 5 voix (SSATB) , 1 violoncelle, 1 contrebasse, 3 trombones et orgue (ou basse continue) d'Anton Bruckner (WAB 22) qui date du 24 mars 1854. Bien que n'ayant pas encore longuement étudié avec Simon Sechter, Bruckner n'était pas un débutant : âgé de 30 ans, il avait accumulé quantité d'expériences de musique d'église. Ce « Libera me » , simple et évident, ne contient pas de contrepoint élaboré, mais sa conduite des voix est excellente, à l'instar du calcul des sonorités. Il recèle la dignité solennelle requise pour une pièce funèbre, et sa section centrale exprime la crainte du jugement avec une puissance et une économie considérables.

Les compositions de Vinzenz Goller sont, pour la plupart, influencées le style et le langage harmonique d'Anton Bruckner et de Gustav Mahler (« Loreto-Messe » , « Ave Maria » , « Ecce sacerdos magnus » , « Lauda sion salvatorem » , « Sorsum Corda » , « Präludium und Fuge über das österliche Halleluja ») .

En 1922, il fonde la « Cäcilia, Österreichische Orgelbau-AG » : une institution pour la construction d'orgues artistiques.

Bereits 1921 trug sich Vinzenz Goller (Klosterneuburg) mit dem Gedanken, ein « Institut für künstlerischen Orgelbau » zu gründen. Im Jahre 1922 wurde diese Idee realisiert : Aus den Salzburger Firmen der Orgelbauer Matthäus Mauracher, Franz Mauracher sowie Mertel & Dreher entstand die Firma « Cäcilia » , Österreichische Orgelbau-AG, mit Filialen in Salzburg-Parsch (Geschäftsstelle) , Salzburg-Gnigl und Klosterneuburg. Künstlerische Leiter waren Goller sowie der Salzburger Domkapellmeister Franz Xaver Gruber ; als technischer Direktor fungierte zunächst Franz Mauracher (bis 1926) , dann Max Dreher. Bis 1928 war auch Orgelbaumeister Hans Mertel in der Firma tätig. Binnen kurzem wuchs die Mitarbeiterzahl auf 100 Mann (1924) ; es wurden auch Klaviere und Harmoniums gefertigt. Orgeln wurden bis nach Holland und Frankreich geliefert ; in Ljubljana und Warschau sowie in Altötting entstanden Filialen. Dem raschen Aufstieg folgte ein schneller Niedergang ; im Oktober 1928 pachteten Max Dreher und Leopold Flamm die Firma, die am 12. Januar 1929 in Dreher & Flamm umbenannt wurde.

Komponist, Kirchenmusiker und Bürgermeister der Stadt Klosterneuburg Vinzenz Goller wurde am 9. März 1873 als Sohn des Josef Goller und seiner Frau Rosina, geborene Plaikner, in Sankt Andrä bei Brixen in Südtirol geboren.

Sein Vater war in Sankt Andrä Volksschullehrer, Mesner und Organist. Goller entstammt also (wie viele andere Musiker) einer Familie, die einen guten natürlichen Nährboden für einen Beruf als Kirchenmusiker und Pädagogen bildete. Dazu kam eine überdurchschnittliche musikalische und pädagogische Begabung. Daß in seiner Familie katholischer Glaube und Liebe zur angestammten Heimat lebten, versteht sich beinahe von selbst.

Durch frühzeitige Aktivitäten im Kirchenchor von Sankt Andrä als Sänger und bald auch als Ersatzorganist sowie durch Notenschreiben und Transponieren wurde ihm die Musik natürlicher künstlerischer Lebensraum, seine zweite Natur, mit der er verbunden war wie mit seiner ihn umgebenden herrlichen Heimat der Täler und Berge des Brixner Beckens.

Von Neustift bei Brixen kam Goller 1888 an die Lehrerbildungsanstalt nach Innsbruck. Er wollte ja Lehrer werden. Die Welt der Musik öffnete sich ihm nun weiter durch die Musikschule des dortigen « Musikvereins » , die Professor Josef Pembaur (1848-1923) leitete, sowie durch aktive Mitarbeit in den Kirchenchören von Innsbruck.

1885, also als Bub mit 12 Jahren, kam er als Sängerknabe und Student in das im Tal gelegene Augustiner-Chorherrenstift Neustift. Dort entfaltete sich sein junges Talent organisch weiter und wurde vielseitig gebildet durch Chor- und Choralsingen, durch tägliches Üben im Violin- und Waldhornspiel, durch seine Bekanntschaft mit dem gleichaltrigen Josef Gasser (1873-1957) , sowie durch die erste Begegnung mit einem « großen » Musiker, nämlich Ignaz Mitterer (1850-1924) , dem damals soeben in Brixen angestellten Domkapellmeister.

Von Innsbruck zog er wieder heim als Lehrer. Er wurde Volksschullehrer in Niederolang (1892-1893) , Sexten (1893-1899) und in Sankt Lorenzen im Pustertal (1899-1903) .

An diesen Orten mußte er als Musiker andere bilden und führen, lernte dabei selbst musikalische Pädagogik « von Grund » auf und zwar als Singlehrer, Chorleiter, Organist und Komponist. Als solcher war er fast « gezwungen » zu komponieren, denn die Notenarchive der Pfarre waren ziemlich dürftig.

« So entstanden nach und nach in Anpassung an die Fortschritte meiner jungen Kirchenchöre die später im Druck erschienenen Werke bis Opus 25 ; in der ersten Wochenhälfte wurde komponiert und kopiert', in der zweiten Hälfte einstudiert. »

berühmten Josef Rheinberger und erwarb sich « durch Verkauf von Gamsbärten » einen selbstbezahlten Studienurlaub an der Kirchenmusikschule in Regensburg. Goller besuchte in Regensburg den « 24. Kurs » im Jahre 1898, wie die Festschrift « Gloria Deo-Pax hominibus » zum 100jährigen Bestehen der Kirchenmusikschule Regensburg mitteilt. Diese erste systematische kirchenmusikalische Schulbildung in Regensburg auf hoher Ebene formte Goller entscheidend : durch Franz Xaver Haberl, Michaël Haller und Josef Renner jun. kam er mit dem « Cäcilianismus » in Verbindung und Regensburg legte den Urgrund seiner liturgischen Lebensgesinnung durch Doktor Georg Jakob, der dort Liturgik, Ästhetik und Geschichte der Kirchenmusik lehrte.

Im Jahre 1899 verehelichte sich Goller mit Maria Josefa Pfeifhofer aus Sexten. (Der Ehe entsprossen sieben Kinder. Von 1903 an ist Gollers Beruf einzig und allein der Kirchenmusik gewidmet : als Komponist, Pädagoge, Dirigent, Organist und Organisator, beginnend in dem bayrischen Städtchen Deggendorf (an der Hauptkirche « Maria Himmelfahrt ») . Sein Ruf als Komponist (besonders durch seine « Loreto-Messe » , Opus 25) war inzwischen fast weltweit geworden, sodaß er mit dem Aufbau einer « Abteilung für Kirchenmusik » an der Wiener Musikakademie betraut wird. Damit erreicht Goller den « dienstmäßigen » Höhepunkt seines Lebens, er ist Leiter einer der ersten Hochschulen für Kirchenmusik. Er bleibt aber dabei bewußt verbunden mit der « Basis » , mit den kleinen Kirchenchören und dem Volk und komponiert auch weiterhin gemäß seiner Devise : « Aus der Praxis für die Praxis » .

Die « Abteilung für Kirchenmusik » hatte ihren ersten Sitz im Augustiner-Chorherren-Stift Klosterneuburg. Dies ist für Goller im doppelten Sinn bedeutungsvoll : Er kommt in lebendige Verbindung mit einem Zentrum abendländischer Musikkultur und auch mit Pius Parsch, dem Gründer der « Volksliturgischen Bewegung » . Außerdem fällt in diese Zeit die beginnende Erneuerung des christlichen Lebens aus dem Geist der Eucharistie und Liturgie durch Pius X. So wird Goller einer der ersten « volksliturgischen Kirchenmusiker » und ein Kirchenmusiker, der Papst Pius X. von Anfang an überzeugt Gefolgschaft leistet.

Seinen Dienst als Kirchenmusiker unterbricht er von sich aus im ersten Weltkrieg. Mit Italiens Übertritt zu den Alliierten im Mai 1915 meldete Goller sich als « Freiwilliger » der Tiroler Standschützen. Bis zum Kriegsende avancierte er vom einfachen Standschützen zum Bataillonskommandant der Truppen im Pustertal. Nach seiner Gefangennahme im September 1918 durch die Italiener flüchtete er bald aus dem Lager in der Nähe von Mantua über wenig begangene Bergpfade in die Schweiz und von dort nach Österreich. Im Februar 1919 war er glücklich in Klosterneuburg bei der Familie und übernahm wieder die Leitung der Abteilung « Kirchenmusik » , die er bis 1921 inne hatte. Als seine Eltern im August 1920 ihre Goldene Hochzeit feierten, konnte Goller nicht auf legalem Weg nach Brixen gelangen, da er als geflohener Kriegsgefangener noch immer auf den italienischen Fahndungslisten stand. In umgekehrter Richtung ging es diesmal von Österreich über die Schweiz nach Südtirol, auf ebenso geheimen Wegen. Er langte rechtzeitig zur Feier ein. Sie fand in der Nacht statt in der Wohnung seines Bruders Pius Goller, Domherr und Domkapellmeister in Brixen.

Nach seiner Rückkehr nimmt er seinen Beruf als Kirchenmusiker wieder auf, zugleich aber kämpft er mutig als Politiker. Er wird Gemeinderat (ab 1933) und dann Bürgermeister von Klosterneuburg (1936-1938) .

Im März 1938 wurde er durch die Nationalsozialisten seines Amtes enthoben. Zwei seiner Kinder gehörten einer der ersten Widerstandsgruppen an, der « Gruppe Scholz », die aus einigen Dutzend Leuten bestand. Einer aus den eigenen Reihen wurde zum Verräter und die Gruppe wurde am 22. Juli 1940 ausgehoben, inhaftiert und angeklagt. Gollers Tochter wurde infolge der Mißhandlungen während ihrer Haft fast blind, der jüngste Sohn Hubert wurde wegen « Volksverrat » zum Tod verurteilt. Ein enger Parteifreund Hitlers, dem Goller im I. Weltkrieg einmal das Leben gerettet hatte, bewahrte eingedenk dieser Tat den Sohn vor dem Fallbeil. Er wurde « nur » zum Dienst in einer Strafkompagnie verurteilt. Gollers Frau brach unter diesem Schlag zusammen und sollte sich nie mehr ganz erholen. Als 1941 Stift Klosterneuburg aufgehoben wurde, übersiedelte er mit der restlichen Familie nach Sankt Michael im Lungau, wo eine seiner Töchter mit einem Arzt verheiratet war. Nach dem Tod seiner Frau 1946 verbrachte er einige Zeit bei seinen Geschwistern in Südtirol, bis er 1950 wieder nach Klosterneuburg zurückkehrte.

1953 wurde Vinzenz Goller zum Ehrenmitglied der Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst ernannt, er starb jedoch noch, bevor der Festakt statt fand. Nach einem Jagdausflug erkrankte er an einer Lungenentzündung und starb am 11. September 1953 in Sankt Michael im Lungau. Er wurde am dortigen Friedhof an der Seite seiner Frau bestattet. Sein Grab liegt gewissermaßen im geographischen Mittelpunkt seines « Lebenskreises » : Sankt Andrä-Innsbruck-Regensburg-Deggendorf-Klosterneuburg. In das Grab wurden Erde und ein Stein aus Südtirol eingefügt.

Vinzenz Goller schuf überwiegend kirchenmusikalische Werke, für alle kirchlichen Feste im Jahreskreis gibt es Kompositionen von ihm. Die bis 1903 gedruckten Werke erschienen unter dem Pseudonym Hans von Berchthal. Es sind dies Opus 1 bis 3. Unter seinem wirklichen Namen erschienen zahlreiche Messen, Requiem und Offertorien. In seiner « Selbstbiographie » (erschienen unter dem Titel « Zeit lassen ! » im « Alpenländischen Kirchenchor », 1953, Nummer 3 und 4) meint er, er habe für alle Gelegenheiten des Kirchenjahres Texte vertont. Liest man das Werkverzeichnis, so ist klar zu erkennen, daß er tatsächlich für das jeweilige Können des Chores komponierte, den er während seiner « Wanderjahre » als Lehrer vorfand. Die 114 gezählten Werke sind überwiegend für den kirchlichen Gebrauch bestimmt. Die bekanntesten seiner Orgelmessen sind die « Loreto-Messe » und die « Clemens Hofbauer-Messe » .

Um das Jahr 1921 erfolgte die Begegnung mit dem Begründer der « volksliturgischen Bewegung », dem Klosterneuburger Chorherren Pius Parsch. Für die erste « Gemeinschaftsmesse » am Christi-Himmelfahrtstag 1922 in der kleinen Kirche Sankt Gertrud schrieb Vinzenz Goller einfache choralmäßige Melodien. Seine « Klosterneuburger Betsingmesse », die heute als « Leopolds-Messe » tituiert wird, zählt zu seinen bekanntesten und weitest verbreiteten Kirchenkompositionen.

Unter den gedruckten Werken ohne Opuszahl befindet sich unter anderen eine Ausgabe der « Messe in E-Moll » von Anton Bruckner mit Orgelauszug statt des originalen Blesorchesters. Erstmals erschien diese Messe 1917, in einer revidierten Fassung wurde sie 1931 nochmals herausgebracht. Unter den nichtveröffentlichten und nur für Einzelne geschriebenen Werken seien zwei genannt, die Gollers Verehrung für Bruckner deutlich machen :

« Festpräludium für Orgel in memoriam Anton Bruckner », 6. Juni 1937 ; komponiert zur Aufstellung der Brucknerbüste in der « Walhalla » zu Regensburg ; 2 Festfanfaren für 11 Bläser über Themen von Anton Bruckner.

« Non confundar in æternum »

Dans le mi-temps des années 1930, l'Europe persévère dans sa génuflexion devant le Nazisme, après le conférence de Stresa qui doit consolider la paix mais ne révélera qu'un profond désaccord entre les 3 puissances, Adolf Hitler s'emploie à réarmer la Rhénanie.

La vieille France n'écoute déjà plus l'Espoir de Malraux, oublie la Passante du Sans-souci de Kessel ! Dans les années 1880, Anton Bruckner, cet autrichien né près de Saint-Florian compose l'Adagio, « sehr feierlich und sehr langsam » de sa 7e Symphonie autour du dernier vers du « Te Deum » latin : « Non confundar in æternum » .

Lente, pesante, écrasante, solennelle d'orgueil possessif monstrueux est cette journée du dimanche 6 juin 1937. Ce jour-là, Anton Bruckner, homme de haute spiritualité, bon enfant, si peu certain de son talent, admiratif exalté de la musique de Wagner, va être confondu, assimilé, associé, amalgamé, identifié, fusionné, à l'immonde.

Ce lien noir, sacrilège, est tissé par Hitler, lui aussi autrichien, qui exècre l'État multi-ethnique Austro-hongrois, qu'il a fuit jeune pour Munich lesté de son antisémitisme viscéral appris à Vienne. Ce mélomane fou, l'être le plus effroyable que l'humanité nous ait donné, fait pénétrer le buste du compositeur dans le « Walhalla » auprès d'autres gloires à Donaustauf, à 10 kilomètres de Ratisbonne, le Panthéon Germanique.

Tout autre que la bête lui eut rendu cet hommage mérité, ne l'aurait jamais entaché ainsi par ce lien effroyable, d'une salissure profonde. Lui, le « conférencier et proche » de Gustav Mahler, devenait ce jour-là, sous le joug nazi l'un des vecteurs destructeurs de la culture germanique, à seule fin de servir un empire à la suprématie désirée millénaire !

Le « Führer » , dont on peut dire avec certitude, selon les mots de Ian Kershaw, que sans lui l'histoire de monde aurait connu un cours radicalement différent, voyait en Bruckner l'injustice que lui-même « artiste génial » pensait avoir subie ; narcissisme d'identification par le malheur, proche symptôme du paranoïaque.

Anton Bruckner venu tardivement au professorat et à la composition musicale commença sa carrière à un âge où Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart et Franz Schubert avaient depuis longtemps achevé la leur où, Ludwig van Beethoven, Franz-Joseph Haydn et les autres possédaient déjà une œuvre monumentale. Bruckner pense que l'on peut faire de la musique pure en se prévalant de la nouvelle fonction dramatique wagnérienne.

Il introduira dans la 7e Symphonie 4 tubas wagnériens et bâtira ses pans sonores tels des orgues, organiste de la cathédrale de Linz qu'il fut longtemps. Le dur combat que se livraient entre eux Brahmsiens tenant de la musique pure et Wagnériens partisans du drame musical le fait rejeté de Vienne, humilié dans sa propre patrie.

Le combat des amis de l'Un et de l'Autre lui valurent sans doute cette étiquette officielle de wagnérien, pour autant, la musique de Bruckner n'est-elle pas de la musique pure ?

Il lui fallut attendre cette 7e et l'âge de 60 ans pour qu'enfin viennent la reconnaissance et l'estime, la consécration internationale, malgré le succès de sa 4e Symphonie dite « Romantique » .

Ce combat mortel qui laissera longtemps des traces dans l'histoire de la musique, et n'apportera que désastres culturels, qui en son temps courrouçait Goethe s'insurgeant contre cette manie de l'opposer à Schiller alors que tous auraient dû se réjouir d'avoir deux aussi vigoureux gaillards de cet ordre, selon ses propres mots, servira le mélomane fou pour une répétition grandeur nature au « Walhalla » de ce que sera dans quelques mois l' « Anschluß » .

Il annexe d'abord, la culture, la musique par le biais de Bruckner pour mieux annexer demain le pays, l'Autriche. Sans doute est-ce là, la 1re conséquence du pan-germanisme que Stresa laissait entrevoir.

Ce dimanche 6 juin 1937, le mélomane fou viendra, dans ses pompes et fanfares nazies, déposer une gerbe au pied du buste d'Anton Bruckner sous le regard d'une vingtaine d'officiels un peu coincés par l'étroitesse du monument. La foi religieuse profonde de Bruckner ne sera en rien un frein à la célébration païenne du Symphoniste par cet état, tyrannique et athée.

Son « Te Deum » sera joué le soir même sous la présidence du mélomane fou et de son séide, Josef Gœbbels !

Le « Führer » se tait, il ne fera pas de discours, c'est en silence qu'il rendra hommage à cet homme dont il pense être à l'identique de sa souffrance artistique.

Sans doute dans ce silence prépare-t-il la « Bayerische Ostermark » , délicat euphémisme (la Marche de l'Est Bavaroise) dont il fera usage juste après le « Walhalla » , le jour même, dans un de ses discours fleuve, à Ratisbonne, au congrès provincial du « NSDAP » devant ses chemises brunes et noires et quelques 200,000 participants.

Pourtant, on rata le 40e anniversaire de la mort du compositeur autrichien, sans doute était-ce trop tôt trop en avance pour la réalisation des visées d'annexion du mélomane fou ! Il fallait de plus un événement montrant avec force que ces visées-là étaient attendues, désirées par le peuple allemand. Déjà, la communication de propagande devait être efficace !

Oui, derrière cette assimilation, cette association ténébreuse, se perpétue le simulacre d'une annexion prochaine de tout un peuple ; d'un pays, d'une nation ! Ce jour du dimanche 6 juin 1937, ce fut la culture qui fut pour longtemps kidnappée, otage d'un monde pervers de cruauté.

« Pour l'homme normal, le temps c'est ce qui vient après le début ; le temps de Bruckner, c'est ce qui vient après la fin. Je suis heureux de pouvoir encore aujourd'hui lire les lignes qu'il nous a laissées. » (Sergiu Celibidache)

On ne peut mieux exprimer la musique, l'œuvre Brucknérienne ! Beaucoup se sont complus à chercher des erreurs dans cette œuvre Symphonique monumentale, qu'un juste retour aux sources primitives des originaux rend à ces compositions toute leur force.

Il semble comme le disait Wilhelm Fürtwängler que pour beaucoup ces erreurs sont à l'origine de la puissance des liens organiques de toute l'œuvre Brucknérienne. Jusqu'à ce coup de cymbales avec triangle au sommet de l'Adagio de la 7e, qu'une annotation de la main d'Anton sur une bandelette de papier collée sur la page correspondante avec la mention « non valable » .

Il souhaitait qu'on la supprima, peu de chefs le firent, tant l'effet produit est logique et saisissant. Toute dédiée qu'elle est cette 7e Symphonie à Louis II de Bavière, elle est avant toute autre considération un vibrant hommage au très vénéré Richard Wagner :

« Je rentrais chez moi un jour, très triste ; je me disais il est impossible que le Maître vive longtemps encore. À ce moment précis, l'Adagio en ut dièse mineur me fut inspiré. »

Cet Adagio sublime forme à n'en pas douter un poignant « in Memoriam » . C'est le deuil qui inspire Bruckner, le deuil de son Maître, de Wagner dont le « Parsifal » mit Anton dans l'émotion la plus grande. Cordes graves et tubas wagnériens (2 ténors, 2 basses et, 1 tuba contrebasse) énoncent un 1er thème désolé, déployé par les violons dans l'intensité.

Un second motif en contraste sur la fluctuation des altos et violoncelles. Vient l'insertion de son « Te Deum » ; les violons semblent dire la consolation, puis en un dialogue des thèmes suit en long développement de forme contrapuntique.

Le crescendo mène à la Coda où tonne une dernière fois le thème principal au travers des 4 « tuben » et le tuba contrebasse.

L'affiche créée par Lothar Heinemann : le symbole de l'État allemand se confondant avec l'instrument roi. Cette affiche réalisée à des fins touristiques, revêt une prétention impérialiste. La domination artistique doublant le sentiment de supériorité raciale et politique. Pour Josef Gœbbels, le peuple allemand est « le 1er peuple musicien de la Terre » . Le Temple du « Walhalla » de Ratisbonne

Le « Walhalla » est un temple néo-Grec en marbre, de style Dorique, situé à Donaustauf au bord du Danube, à 10 kilomètres en aval de Ratisbonne, en Bavière.

Ce monument imposant fut édifié, entre 1830 et 1842, dans la vallée du Danube sur un site en hauteur imposant, par l'architecte Leo von Klenze pour le compte du roi Louis 1er de Bavière. Ce dernier voulait en faire le mémorial (le « Walhalla » constitue le séjour des héros dans la mythologie nordique) des grands hommes qui illustrèrent la civilisation allemande depuis 2,000 ans : artistes, militaires, rois, Empereurs, scientifiques, philosophes, penseurs, grandes personnalités.

Le mémorial se visite et on peut y voir aujourd'hui, à l'intérieur, 129 bustes de personnalités allemandes ou d'autres nationalités de langue germanique. Du péristyle, on a une belle vue sur la courbe du Danube, les ruines du château de Donaustauf et les flèches de la Cathédrale Saint-Pierre de Ratisbonne.

Le « Walhalla » honore peu de femmes, essentiellement des Princesses. Les femmes occupaient, sous la République de Weimar, 1 % des chaires universitaires supérieures, ce qui limitait d'avance les protestations quand les Nazis, qui avaient laissé en place les rares titulaires à condition qu'elles ne fussent ni juives, ni proches de la retraite, ni émigrées, entreprendraient d'empêcher de nouvelles nominations féminines.

The « Walhalla » is considered the most important of all works commissioned by King Ludwig I of Bavaria (1825-1848) . Architect Leo von Klenze constructed the « Walhalla » , between October 18th 1830 (when the foundation stone was laid) and October 18th 1842 (official opening ceremony) . Proximity to the former Free Imperial City of Regensburg with its magnificent Gothic cathedral is deliberate.

« Walhalla » , or German Temple of Fame and Honour is a neo-Classical hall of fame located on the Danube River 10 kilometers east of Regensburg, in Bavaria. The exterior is a close imitation of the Parthenon (a temple of the Greek goddess Athena) , and is constructed of gray marble. It was the idea of 20 year old Crown Prince Ludwig I of Bavaria in 1807, at a time when the German states were defeated and occupied by Napoleon. It was meant as a place for the commemoration of great figures and events in ethnic German history, at the time covering 1,800 years, beginning with the Battle of the Teutoburg Forest (in 9 AD) . Whereas the « Walhalla » of Norse mythology was home to those gloriously slain in battle, Ludwig's « Walhalla » was intended not only for warriors but also for scientists, writers, clerics and specifically also for women.

The « Walhalla » temple is a hall of fame that honours laudable and distinguished Germans, famous personalities in German history - politicians, sovereigns, scientists and artists of the German tongue. The hall is housed in a neo-Classical building above the Danube River, east of Regensburg, in Bavaria.

The « Walhalla » temple is named for « Walhalla » of Norse mythology. It was conceived in 1807 by Crown Prince Ludwig, who built it upon ascending the throne of Bavaria as King Ludwig I. Construction took place between 1830 and 1842, under the supervision of architect Leo von Klenze.

The temple displays some 65 plaques and 130 busts of persons, covering 2,000 years of history. The earliest person honoured is Arminius, victor at the Battle of the Teutoburg Forest (in 9 AD) .

The « Walhalla » temple is one of the most popular attractions in the area. The monumental building is located in Donaustauf, just 12 kilometres from Regensburg away.

Following the model of the Parthenon, on the Acropolis, the « Walhalla » of Germany was opened in 1842 as Hall of Fame, in honour of the German people which is located on a hill overlooking the Danube. The name goes back to the Teutonic mythology, where the bravest killed warriors found their last resting place in « Walhalla » .

The interior attracts its visitors with 128 marble busts and 65 plaques, reminiscent of prominent figures of the German-Teutonic language family. Among them are King Ludwig I. (the founder of « Walhalla ») , Barbarossa, Goethe, Schiller, Haydn, Luther, Gutenberg, Gauss and Empress Katarina the Great, just to name a few. The temple was conceived as an open monument, so that the series can be continued at any time. As the latest bust, Heinrich Heine was added in 2010.

Once you have climbed the plateau you have a wonderful view over the Danube to Regensburg and to the Bavarian Forest.

In der Gedenkstätte « Walhalla » (nach Walhall, Halle der Gefallenen) bei Donaustauf (Landkreis Regensburg, Bayern) werden auf Veranlassung des bayerischen Königs Ludwig I. seit 1842 bedeutende Persönlichkeiten « teutscher Zunge » mit Marmorbüsten und Gedenktafeln geehrt.

Zur Eröffnung im Jahre 1842 wurden 160 Personen mit 96 Büsten und, in den Fällen fehlender authentischer Abbildungen oder bei Handlungen wie dem Rüttschwur, 64 Gedenktafeln geehrt. Heute wird mit 130 Büsten und 65 Gedenktafeln an 195 Personen, Taten und Gruppen erinnert. Zwölf der Geehrten sind Frauen. Jedermann kann eine zu ehrende Persönlichkeit aus der germanischen Sprachfamilie frühestens 20 Jahre nach deren Tod vorschlagen und trägt dann gegebenenfalls die Kosten für die Anfertigung und Aufstellung der Büste. Über die Neuaufnahmen entscheidet der Bayerische Ministerrat.

Die Idee zur Errichtung der « Walhalla » ist vor dem Hintergrund der deutschen politischen Situation zu Beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts zu sehen. Nach Niederlagen gegen Napoleon zerbrach das Heilige Römische Reich deutscher Nation. Viele deutsche Fürsten arbeiteten, notgedrungen oder auf eigenen Vorteil bedacht, im Rheinbund mit den Franzosen zusammen. So kam es, daß das Kurfürstentum Bayern vergrößert und von Napoleon zum Königreich erhoben wurde, und daß im Vierten Koalitionskrieg auch Kronprinz Ludwig I. an der Seite der Franzosen gegen Preußen kämpfend in Berlin einmarschierte.

Durch die politische Zersplitterung und Schwächung Deutschlands und die darauffolgende französische Besetzung zogen die besiegten Deutschen gegen die noch unbesiegten Deutschen und nahmen später an Napoleons verheerendem Russlandfeldzug teil. Diese Lage wurde von vielen als tiefe Erniedrigung Deutschlands aufgefasst (siehe Johann Philipp Palm) . Man begann zunehmend, eine gemeinsame nationale Identität in der Vergangenheit zu suchen, bis zurück zur Germanenzeit. Die Jahrzehnte später erfolgte Errichtung nationaler Denkmäler, wie etwa des Hermannsdenkmals im Teutoburger Wald, die zwar meist klassizistischen Stiles waren, jedoch germanische Themen aufgriffen, ist ein Resultat dieser Identitätssuche.

Angesichts von « Teutschlands tiefster Schmach » im Jahr 1806, als das Heilige Römische Reich aufgelöst wurde, ein Großteil Deutschlands als Rheinbund unter dem direkten Einfluss Napoleons stand und die linke Rheinseite zu Frankreich gehörte, ließ der damalige Kronprinz Ludwig bereits 1807 eine Serie von Büsten « rühmlich ausgezeichnete Teutscher » erschaffen. « Kein Stand nicht, auch das weibliche Geschlecht nicht, ist ausgeschlossen. Gleichheit besteht in der “ Walhalla ” ; hebt doch der Tod jeden irdischen Unterschied auf. » Nur « teutscher Zunge zu seyn, wird erfordert, um “ Walhallas ” Genosse werden zu können » , so Ludwig, denn die Sprache « ist das große Band, das verbindet, wäre jedes andere gleich zernichtet ; in der Sprache währt geistiger Zusammenhang » . Zu den Teutschen zählte Ludwig auch historische Germanen wie zum Beispiel Goten und Wandalen.

Ludwig hatte, wie in der ersten der drei Bodeninschriften vermerkt, schon im Januar 1807 den Beschluss gefasst, so bald wie möglich für 50 große Deutsche einen Ehrentempel zu errichten. Zusammen mit dem Schweizer Geschichtsschreiber Johannes von Müller, der auch den Namen « Walhalla » vorschlug, wählte er Persönlichkeiten aus, von Kaisern längst vergangener Zeiten über jüngst Verstorbene, wie Friedrich Schiller, bis zu Zeitgenossen wie Goethe und Joseph Haydn, und gab auf eigene Kosten deren Büsten in Auftrag, bei Bildhauern wie und andere Johann Gottfried Schadow, dessen Sohn Rudolf Schadow, Joseph Maria Christen oder Christian Friedrich Tieck.

Während die ersten Büsten noch 1807 vollendet wurden, verzögerte sich die Planung und Fertigstellung eines angemessenen Gebäudes um Jahrzehnte. Erst nach der Niederlage Napoleons konnte 1814 ein Ideenwettbewerb ausgeschrieben werden. Die Ausschreibung trug die Überschrift : « Ein Gebäude, dem Andenken großer Deutschen bestimmt. » Ludwig dachte als Standort für den klassizistischen Prachtbau zunächst an den Englischen Garten in München, erst später verlegte er sich auf die Ausführung auf einem Berg und außerhalb der Residenzstadt. Der Entwurf im Stile des Parthenon geht auf Zeichnungen des Architekten und frühen Archäologen Carl Haller von Hallerstein zurück, der mit einem Stipendium des bayerischen königlichen Hofes 1810 Griechenland bereiste und Baustudien am Original durchführte. Eine enge Korrespondenz mit Kronprinz Ludwig ist seit 1811 bezeugt. Sein Entwurf bestand aus 26 Zeichnungen (heute Bayerische Staatsbibliothek München) , die er im November 1815 einreichte. Nach seinem frühen Tode im Jahre 1817 erwarb der Architekt Leo von Klenze im Jahre 1819 ein umfangreiches Konvolut von 175 Blättern Hallers mit Studien zur « Walhalla » und zur ebenfalls von ihm gebauten Glyptothek. Seine 1831-1842 ausgeführte Anlage der « Walhalla » bei Donaustauf enthält einige wesentliche Ideen Hallers.

Bei Ludwigs Regierungsantritt 1825 waren bereits 60 Büsten vollendet, aber noch kein Bauplatz gefunden. Zusammen mit Klenze wurde der Bräuberg oberhalb des Donautals bei Donaustauf ausgewählt. Die Grundsteinlegung für den « Ruhmestempel » erfolgte am 18. Oktober 1830, dem 17. Jahrestag der Völkerschlacht bei Leipzig.

Am 29. Jahrestag der Völkerschlacht, dem 18. Oktober 1842, eröffnete Ludwig I. den Bau mit Worten, die auf einem Stein vor der « Walhalla » zu lesen sind :

Ludwig veröffentlichte selbst eine Beschreibung von « Walhallas » Genossen, die von Heinrich Heine als « Walhall-Wisch » verspottet wurde, als er das Fehlen von Luther kritisierte, der bei der Einweihung noch nicht aufgenommen war. Erst 1847 wurde auch die schon 1831 fertiggestellte Büste des Reformators eingestellt, der mit seiner Bibelübersetzung die deutsche Schriftsprache geprägt hatte. Schließlich wurde 2010 auch die Büste von Spötter Heine selbst in die « marmorne Schädelstätte » aufgenommen.

Auch bedingt durch seine Affäre mit Lola Montez dankte Ludwig im Revolutionsjahr 1848 zugunsten seines Sohnes Maximilian II. ab. Wie auch die Eröffnungsfeier eher sparsam gehalten war, so erfolgten die weiteren Neuaufnahmen in Anwesenheit von Ludwig in einer schlichten Weise, wie auch zuletzt 1866 die von Beethoven. In diesem Jahr, inzwischen war sein Enkel Ludwig II. auf dem Thron, mußte der 80-jährige Ludwig noch miterleben, wie der Deutsche Bruderkrieg dem Deutschen Bund nach einem halben Jahrhundert ein Ende bereitete. Schon zuvor hatte er 1862 testamentarisch die « Walhalla » « Deutschland, seinem großen Vaterlande » vermacht, jedoch hinzugefügt, daß bei Auflösung des Deutschen Bundes Bayern den Besitz übernimmt, mit der Einschränkung : « Würde später wieder ein Bund Deutschland vereinigen, würde Walhalla aufs neue Eigentum Deutschlands. » Dies wurde nicht umgesetzt, « Walhalla » blieb Eigentum des Königreiches und späteren Freistaates Bayern.

Ludwig starb 1868, also zwischen der Gründung des Norddeutschen Bundes und seiner Erweiterung zum Deutschen Reich infolge des Deutsch-Französischen Krieges. Die bayerische Monarchie befand sich zu dieser Zeit in einer Krise. König Ludwig II. führte einen exzentrischen Lebensstil, zog sich immer mehr aus der Öffentlichkeit zurück und vernachlässigte zunehmend die Regierungsgeschäfte. Außerdem gab er Unsummen für den Bau seiner Schlösser aus. Nach dessen Tod 1886 konnte sein Bruder Otto I. nicht als König auftreten, da er als « geisteskrank » galt. Sein Onkel Luitpold vertrat ihn als Prinzregent.

Die erste Neuaufnahme von Skulpturen nach dem Tod des Gründers erfolgte erst 22 Jahre später und galt Ludwig I. selbst. « Das dankbare Volk » ehrte « Ludwig, König von Bayern » mit einem großen Standbild.

Der Architekt Leo von Klenze errichtete den als « Ruhmestempel » gedachten Bau aus Kelheimer Kalkstein im Auftrag König Ludwigs von 1830 bis 1842 hoch über der Donau bei Regensburg. Die « Walhalla » entstand im klassizistischen Stil und erhielt die Gestalt eines marmornen griechischen Tempels im Stil eines dorischen Peripteros nach dem Vorbild des Parthenon in Athen. Die Länge des Tempelbaus beträgt 66,7 meters, die Breite 31,6 meters, die Höhe 20 meters. Die Gesamtanlage mit Unterbau ist 125 meters lang und 55 meters hoch. Innen ist die « Walhalla » 48,5 meters lang, 14 meters breit und 15,5 meters hoch.

Benannt ist die Anlage nach Walhall, der Wohnstatt der tapfersten gefallenen Krieger in der germanischen Mythologie. Die « Walhalla » ist das älteste Beispiel einer Gruppe monumentaler Gedenkbauwerke Deutschlands, zusammen mit dem Niederwalddenkmal bei Rüdesheim am Rhein, dem Völkerschlachtdenkmal bei Leipzig, dem Kyffhäuserdenkmal, dem Deutschen Eck in Koblenz, dem Hermannsdenkmal bei Detmold und der Berliner Siegessäule. Die « Walhalla » war mit Baukosten von vier Millionen Gulden Ludwigs teuerstes Projekt. Das vollplastische Giebelfeld der Nordseite zeigt links die Germanen unter Arminius in der Schlacht im Teutoburger Wald gegen die von Westen (rechts) anstürmenden Römer. Das südliche Giebelfeld stellt Teutschlands Befreyung im Jahr 1814 dar : In der Mitte Germania, links / rechts nähern sich huldigend die deutschen Teilstaaten und Bundesfestungen, im Zwickel sind die Grenzflüsse Rhein und Mosel symbolisiert. Der umlaufende Innenfries von Martin von Wagner stellt die Frühgeschichte der Germanen, ihren Aufbruch vom Kaukasus und ihre Einwanderung in Mitteleuropa dar. Die letzte Etappe bildet die Bekehrung zum christlichen Glauben durch den heilig Bonifatius.

29 November 2015 - The « Montreal Gazette » reports on Bruckner Festivals (1937) :

Good day Mister Berky,

I found this small article from Saturday, 24 July 1937, in the Art-section (« NEWS OF STAGE, SCREEN AND MUSIC ») of the « MONTREAL GAZETTE » daily newspaper (which still exists) .

Best Regards,

Gilles Houle, « the chauvinist Montrealer » .

Festivals of Bruckner Music Are Staged in Middle-Europe

(The Gazette, Montreal, Saturday, July 24, 1937.)

« NEWS OF STAGE, SCREEN AND MUSIC »

In the train of the recent Bruckner Festival in Regensburg, Germany, held under the auspices of the International Bruckner Society, comes another Bruckner Festival which just opened in the Austrian cities of Linz, Saint-Florian and Steyr. These cities lie in the region so intimately bound-up with the composer's career that it has been dubbed « Brucknerland » by the natives.

The inaugural programme of the current Bruckner Festival, held in connection with the Danube Festival Weeks, was given in Linz with a Serenade, under the baton of Robert Keldorfer, who conducted the Vienna Symphony Orchestra in a list containing Bruckner's « Intermezzo » for String Quintet in D minor. Yesterday, Eugene Ormandy directed the same Orchestra in Bruckner's 5th Symphony and Beethoven's 8th Symphony. Today, Bruckner's « Missa solemnis » in B minor will be given, under Adolf Trittinger, in Saint-Florian, and, at a later hour, the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, which performs all the programmes, will play Bruckner's 2nd Symphony, with Hans Weisbach directing.

Tomorrow night, the same conductor will lead the Orchestra in Bruckner's 6th Symphony in the Festival Hall of Steyr, and the Festival will close Wednesday, at Linz, where Oswald Kabasta will conduct the composer's 3rd Symphony. All of the programmes, except that of the Mass, contain works by various other Austrian and German composers.

The 3 day Bruckner Festival held earlier in Regensburg, in connection with the unveiling of the bust of the composer in the « Walhalla » of that city, included concerts by the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra and several choral organizations. The conductors were Rudolf Kleiber, Theodore Schrems, Siegmund von Hausegger, Peter Raabe and Oswald Kabasta.

Among the chief orchestral works performed were 4 Bruckner Symphonies : the 1st, 3rd, 5th and 9th, the latter in the original version. The Choir of the Cathedral of Regensburg, under Doctor Schrems, was heard in the « Te Deum » , « Mass in E minor » , and 3 Motets by the composer. Peter Raabe was the chief-speaker at the Festival meeting of the International Bruckner Society held in the old City Hall.

Siegmund von Hausegger et le 3e « Reich »

Comme chef d'orchestre, Siegmund von Hausegger a été actif à Graz, Munich, Francfort, Berlin et Hambourg. À partir de 1920, il sera à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich et le président de l'Académie de Musique où il a également enseigné. Parmi ses élèves citons : Eugen Jochum, Karl Marx et Karl Höller.

Siegmund von Hausegger était reconnu comme un grand interprète des œuvres d'Anton Bruckner et de la « nouvelle École allemande » . Il sera l'un des Iers chefs importants de sa génération à toujours choisir les versions originales (« urfassung ») des Symphonies de Bruckner. Sous cette forme, il donnera en première mondiale, avec sa phalange munichoise, la 5e Symphonie en 1935 et la 9e Symphonie en 1932.

Durant le 3e « Reich » , Siegmund von Hausegger, fervent partisan de la musique de Richard Wagner, de Franz Liszt et d'Anton Bruckner, se conformera aux dictats officiels de la politique culturelle Nationale-Socialiste. Il sera co-signataire avec le chef Hans Knappertsbusch et le compositeur Hans Pfitzner de « protestation de Richard Wagner en provenance de la ville de Munich » , un écrit pamphlétaire qui sera violemment dénoncé par le critique et auteur Thomas Mann. Dans une lettre ouverte à saveur politique adressée à Hausegger, Mann s'en prend à l'homme qui sert l'Allemagne nazie, contribuant ainsi à promouvoir le départ des opposants culturels au régime. Plus tard, Hausegger avouera que ce geste de solidarité s'avérera être la plus grande erreur de sa vie.

Depuis 1934, Hausegger siège sur le Conseil des compositeurs allemands de la Chambre de la musique du « Reich » . En novembre 1934, il va diriger à Munich un concert de propagande devant un auditoire formé de SS avec, au programme, des œuvres de Richard Wagner et d'Anton Bruckner. En 1938, Hausegger, Autrichien d'origine, va appuyer le référendum sur l'annexion de l'Autriche au « Reich » allemand (« Anschluß ») . Il voit dans ce geste « l'action du vrai Siegfried, le héros qui sauve son peuple de l'esclavage » .

À l'occasion de son 70e anniversaire, en 1942, Adolf Hitler lui décerne la « Médaille Goethe pour l'art et la science » . Hausegger se perçoit avant tout comme un grand nationaliste et non un National-Socialiste. Il refusera d'adhérer au Parti nazi (le NSDAP) . Il sera alors victime d'accusations et de menaces permanentes.

Déjà, en 1933, le chef Siegmund von Hausegger quittera le podium après avoir refusé d'interpréter le « Horst-Wessel-Lied » lors d'un concert Symphonique commandité par les SA, à Munich. Il sera averti puis arrêté par la « Gestapo » . Cela entraînera sa démission de la présidence de l'Académie de musique. En 1938, il quittera toutes les institutions auxquelles il était rattaché. Siegmund von Hausegger va mourir à Munich en 1948, soit 3 ans après la fin du 2e conflit mondial.

Le monastère de Saint-Florian sous les Nazis

Le monastère de Saint-Florian, où la carrière du compositeur Anton Bruckner a débuté, deviendra l'hôte d'un projet de transformation en un lieu de pèlerinage, semblable à celui de Bayreuth.

Le directeur de la radiodiffusion du 3e « Reich » (« Reichsintendant des Großdeutschen Rundfunks ») , le docteur Heinrich Meier, avait l'intention de faire du monastère une sorte de « temple sacré » en hommage au compositeur Anton Bruckner ; un peu comme Adolf Hitler l'a fait pour son compositeur fétiche Richard Wagner, le « Festspielhaus » et la ville de Bayreuth. Suite à une levée de boucliers, l'idée d'en faire un instrument entièrement moderne sera abandonnée. Une restauration majeure sera entreprise tout en conservant le caractère d'origine. Il possède 7,343 tuyaux et 103 registres. Il est surnommé, depuis 1930, l'orgue de Bruckner (« Bruckner Orgel ») , son titulaire entre 1848 et 1855.

Gœbbels déclare à ce sujet : « Hitler veut établir un nouveau centre culturel ici pour faire contrepoids à Vienne qui doit être mis de côté progressivement. Il a l'intention de rénover Saint-Florian à ses frais. » .

Par conséquent, Hitler va financer un centre d'études (une chaire) sur Bruckner. Il va subventionner la publication de l'édition des partitions originales de Bruckner entreprise par le musicologue Robert Haas. Le célèbre orgue de l'église abbatiale sera également réparé et la bibliothèque du monastère sera augmentée.

On projette d'installer, après la fin de la guerre, une importante station de radio privée dans le monastère de Saint-

Florian afin de diffuser, partout dans le monde, de la musique dite « sérieuse ». L'endroit devait même subir des rénovations (selon les plans d'Hitler) pour devenir, à la fois, un Temple sacré à la mémoire d'Anton Bruckner et un lieu de conservation de nombreux chefs-d'œuvre de l'« Art véritable ». De plus, le monastère sera la résidence officielle du « Bruckner-Orchester » et du « Bruckner-Chor ».

La nouvelle vocation du monastère de Saint-Florian était incluse dans le projet mégalomane de faire de la ville de Linz la future capitale culturelle du « Reich ». Saint-Florian serait l'hôte annuel d'un grand « Brucknerfestspiele » basé sur le modèle de celui du Festival de Bayreuth pour la musique de Richard Wagner.

Unter all jenen KünstlerInnen, die in Oberösterreich von den Nationalsozialisten vereinnahmt wurden, sticht besonders Anton Bruckner hervor. Mit ihm identifizierte sich Hitler nicht nur biografisch. Für die Nationalsozialisten war Bruckner ein Sinnbild für die « geistige und seelische Schicksalsgemeinschaft, die das gesamte deutsche Volk verbindet ». Kein Wunder also, daß im Marmortempel der Walhalla in Regensburg schon vor dem Anschluß, im Juni 1937, eine Bruckner-Büste des Münchner Bildhauers Adolf Rothenburger in persönlicher Anwesenheit Hitlers enthüllt wurde - im Übrigen die einzige Büste, die man während der NS-Zeit in der Walhalla aufstellte. Nach dem Anschluß sollte insbesondere das Stift Sankt Florian bei Linz den angemessenen Rahmen für die Bruckner-Verehrung bieten. Hierhin sollte der Sitz der Deutschen Bruckner-Gesellschaft unter Wilhelm Furtwängler von Wien verlegt, eine Orchesterschule zur Ausbildung von Dirigenten eingerichtet und eine Musikhochschule und ein musikalisches Gymnasium gegründet werden. Regelmäßige Orgelwettbewerbe und Bruckner-Festspiele waren geplant. Vor allem aber sollte das Stift Sitz der Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft unter Heinrich Glasmeier werden und das Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester des Großdeutschen Rundfunks (auch Bruckner-Orchester genannt) sowie den Reichs-Bruckner-Chor beherbergen. Das alles sollte möglich werden, nachdem das bestehende Stiftsgymnasium, das Sängerknabenkonvikt und die Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Sankt Florian im Juli 1938 aufgelöst worden waren. « Wir wollen die Pfaffen hier vertreiben, eine Hochschule für Musik und die Brucknergesellschaft hinlegen », schrieb Josef Gæbbels in sein Tagebuch, als er im März 1941 das Stift besuchte.

Neben der Bruckner-Verehrung versuchte man, Bezüge zu Komponisten herzustellen, die im Sinne der NS-Kulturpolitik « akzeptabel » waren und Oberösterreich und Linz zumindest auf der Durchreise gestreift hatten : Christoph Willibald Gluck, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz Schubert, Josef Lanner, Carl Michael Ziehrer und Hugo Wolf.

Propagandawert der Populärmusik

Vor allem nach dem Beginn des Zweiten Weltkrieges erkannten die kulturpolitisch Verantwortlichen den hohen Propagandawert der Populärmusik. Die Operette wurde damit kriegswichtiger als die Oper. So fand etwa 1942 am Linzer Landestheater das « Land des Lächelns » von Franz Lehár in einer opulenten Führerausstattung großen Anklang. Nach dem Namen des Librettisten dieser Operette, Fritz Beda-Löhner, suchte man allerdings am Theaterzettel vergebens. Er war bereits im März 1938 ins KZ Dachau gebracht worden und wurde 1942 in Auschwitz ermordet.

Aufführungsverbot für jüdische Werke

Der Musikbolschewismus sollte durch die arische Moderne Oberdonaus ersetzt werden, so lauteten die Schlagworte. Aufführungen von Werken jüdischer Komponisten wurden verboten. Nach Beginn des Russlandfeldzuges im Juni 1941 kam das Verbot für russische Komponisten hinzu. Dies sollte Platz schaffen für zeitgenössische KomponistInnen des Gaues, unter ihnen Franz Schnopfhagen (kurzzeitig Landesleiter der Reichsmusikkammer), Franz Neuhofer, Ludwig Daxperger, Franz Xaver Müller, Karl Rausch, Isidor Stögbauer oder Frida Kern. Diese KomponistInnen versuchten über politische Mittler wie Franz Kinzl und Anton Fellner zu erreichen, daß Georg-Ludwig Jochum, der Leiter des Städtischen Symphonieorchesters und des Bruckner-Orchesters, mehr « gaueigene zeitgenössische Kompositionen » in seiner Programmgestaltung berücksichtigte.

Aufwertung der Musikerziehung

Die Musikerziehung erfuhr durch die Gründung der Städtischen Musikschule, der Musikschulen für Jugend und Volk und der Hitlerjugend-Musikschulen im Mai 1939 eine enorme Aufwertung. Daneben gab es als Ausbildungseinrichtung (von den Plänen für Sankt Florian abgesehen) auch noch das Bruckner-Konservatorium. Dieses war durch eine Umbenennung aus der Linzer Musikvereinschule hervorgegangen. Adolf Trittinger, der bisherige Stiftsorganist von Sankt Florian, wurde 1939 Direktor des Bruckner-Konservatoriums, nachdem sein Vorgänger, Robert Keldorfer, nach der Auflösung des Linzer Musikvereins als politisch untragbar beurlaubt wurde.

Zwischen den einzelnen Einrichtungen der Musikerziehung kam es zu einer Konkurrenzsituation, die neben der kriegsbedingten Raum- und Lehrernot 1942 zur Zusammenlegung der Musikschulen führte.

Neben dem Bruckner-Orchester des Großdeutschen Rundfunks, das als Reichsorchester galt, gab es in Linz auch das Städtische Symphonieorchester unter der Leitung von Georg-Ludwig Jochum.

DAS BRUCKNER-STIFT SANKT FLORIAN UND DAS LINZER REICHS-BRUCKNER-ORCHESTER (1942-1945)

Hanns Kreczi, for many years responsible for cultural administration in Linz, gives the 1st account of Adolf Hitler's plan to combine the Augustinian « Stift Sankt Florian », the « Bruckner-Orchester » and the « Bruckner-Chor » to form the « Musikwerk des Großdeutschen Rundfunks » (music project of Greater German Radio) , which was intended to occupy an important position in the National-Socialist re-ordering of post-War Europe.

From 1942 to 1945, the « Reich » Bruckner Orchestra (the « Führer » 's own Symphony Orchestra) broadcasted live through the « Großdeutschen Rundfunks » (Great German Radio) , directly from the Augustinian Monastery of Saint-Florian (near Linz) . It was especially indebted to the Symphonic work of Anton Bruckner. For the 1st time, we have here a comprehensive and objective analysis of Hitler's project by author Hanns Kreczi.

Doktor Hanns Kreczi, Archivar und Historiker : geboren 10. Februar 1912 in Wien ; gestorben 25. Juni 2003 in Linz. Kreczi entstammte einer Handwerkerfamilie, besuchte das humanistische Gymnasium im sechsten Wiener Gemeindebezirk und maturierte 1931. Er studierte Theologie, Geschichte und Pädagogik an den Universitäten Wien und Bern, promovierte 1937 und begann ein Studium der Rechte. 1939 trat er in den Dienst des Magistrats der Stadt Linz, wo er das Archiv und die Bibliothek betreute. Nach seinem mehrjährigen Wehrdienst im Zweiten Weltkrieg, entfaltete er ab 1945 als Leiter der Linzer Städtischen Sammlungen eine ausgedehnte wissenschaftliche Tätigkeit. Von 1948 bis 1952 war er Leiter des Kulturamtes der Stadt Linz und rief die Publikations-Reihe « Linzer Regesten » ins Leben, die es sich zum Ziel nahm, möglichst alle stadtgeschichtlichen Quellen zu erfassen. 1952-1977 Kulturverwaltungsdirektor. 1956 gab er den Auftrag für eine « Historische Personenstandskartei für die Stadt Linz » , die als Vorbereitungsarbeit für eine großangelegte Linzer Stadtgeschichte dienen sollte. Als leitender Beamter war Kreczi am Auf- und Ausbau der Linzer Kulturverwaltung beteiligt, trug und andere wesentlich zur Gründung der Neuen Galerie der Stadt Linz bei und wirkte maßgeblich bei der Wiedererrichtung der Linzer Musikschule mit.

Zu seinen Werken zählen und andere Linzer Häuserchronik (1941) ; Linz, Stadt an der Donau (1951) ; Städtische Kulturarbeit in Linz (1959) ; sowie das Linzer Kulturhandbuch (1965) . Zudem war Kreczi Redakteur der « Linzer Stadtmonographien » .

Das Reich-Bruckner-Orchester war von 1942 bis 1945 ein Reichsorchester des Großdeutschen Rundfunks in Linz. Besonders verpflichtet war es dem sinfonischen Werk von Anton Bruckner ; - Hitlers Plan, aus dem Augustiner-Chorherrenstift Sankt Florian und den Institutionen « Bruckner-Orchester » und « Bruckner-Chor » das « Musikwerk des Großdeutschen Rundfunks » zu bilden, wird hier erstmals umfassend und objektiv dargestellt (Mit 46 Bildtafeln.)

At the end of World War II, Allied troops occupied much of Austria including the Town of Saint-Florian. There are stories of the G.I.'s racing their motorcycles down the long corridors of the Augustinian monastery.

There is no way to know if Lieutenant Frank Egner, Junior, of Quakerstown, Pennsylvania, was one of those culprits. My guess is that he probably was not, because he thought enough of Saint-Florian that he sent a letter containing 24 postcards of the Abbey to his wife.

The letter, mailed on June 7 of 1945, weighed alot so while her husband placed 12 cents postage on the letter, she had to pay 36 cents more before she could open it.

1960 schrieb Eugen Kurt Fischer in einem Aufsatz mit dem Thema « Das Brucknerstift Sankt Florian » in der Zeitschrift « Publizistik » :

Eugen Kurt Fischer, der selbst in Sankt Florian gearbeitet hatte, stellte in diesem Artikel (Akten lagen ihm nicht zugrunde) seine Sichtweise über die Person des damaligen Reichsintendanten Heinrich Glasmeier und über den Sinn und Zweck des Bruckner-Stiftes dar. (2) Lange Zeit stand diese Erinnerung, die ein eher positives Licht auf die damaligen Ereignisse warf, weitgehend allein im Raum. Anfang der siebziger Jahre ergab sich in der Erforschung der Geschichte des Bruckner-Stiftes ein neuer Aspekt. Im wieder sogenannten Augustiner-Chorherrenstift Sankt Florian wurden Unterlagen des Reichsrundfunks aus der Zeit des Zweiten Weltkrieges aufgefunden. (3) Eine erste Auswertung dieses Materials erfolgte durch den Ordinarius für Kirchen-geschichte an der katholische-theologie. Hochschule Linz, Professor Karl Rehberger, gleichzeitig Stiftsarchivar in Sankt Florian. Sein Aufsatz beschäftigte sich allerdings nicht direkt mit der Rundfunkgeschichte, sondern in erster Linie mit dem Thema Stifte Oberösterreichs unter dem Hakenkreuz. (4) Trotz-dem sind in seinem Aufsatz eine Reihe neuer Informationen über die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft und das Projekt Sankt Florian enthalten. In jüngster Zeit widmete auch Ansgar Diller im Band 2 der Reihe « Rundfunk in Deutschland » , Rundfunkpolitik im Dritten Reich, dem Thema einige Aufmerksamkeit, allerdings ohne die Arbeit Rehbergers oder die Bestände des Stiftsarchivs heranzuziehen. (5) Auch die Arbeit Victor Ergerts vertieft das Thema kaum. (6) Im folgenden soll deshalb die Geschichte des Bruckner-Stiftes Sankt Florian insbesondere anhand der Akten des Reichsrundfunks, die im Stiftsarchiv Sankt Florian lagern, nachvollzogen werden. (7)

Die Beziehung zwischen dem Chorherrenstift Sankt Florian, in dem gleichnamigen kleinen Marktflecken in der Nähe von Linz gelegen, und dem Nationalsozialismus begann vor dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an das Reich.

Nationalsozialistisches Gedankengut hatte hier schon vor 1938 Sympathien gefunden. So erklärte zum Beispiel ein Pfarrer aus einem nahegelegenen Dorf, der gleichzeitig kommissarischer Beirat des Stiftsgymnasiums Sankt Florian war, etwa :

« Es ergeht an die Priester die Einladung, an der großen deutschen Bewegung aktiv mitzuarbeiten. Wenn wir die große Stunde nicht erkennen, werden wir einmal ohne Volk sein. » (8)

Die verständigungsbereiten Töne aus Sankt Florian, das nicht zu überhörende Angebot, sich mit den neuen nationalsozialistischen Machthabern nach dem Anschluß zu arrangieren, konnten die Autonomie des Stiftes nicht wahren. Trotz der Würdigung der oben geschilderten Haltung durch den zuständigen Gauleiter wurden in den nächsten Wochen von verschiedenen Seiten Forderungen an das Stift gestellt - zunächst allerdings nur nach Räumlichkeiten. So wollten zum Beispiel die « Reichswerke Hermann Göring » zwei Höfe aus dem Besitz des Stifts für Aussiedlungen, die « Hitlerjugend » wollte Räume, und schließlich mußte für 600 Bessarabier und 400 Deutsche aus der Bukowina Platz geschaffen werden. Hitlerjugend-Veranstaltungen störten darüber hinaus das Leben im Stift. Noch konnte allerdings die kirchliche Hoheit aufrechterhalten, konnte im Gymnasium (wenn auch mit großen Schwierigkeiten) unterrichtet werden. (9)

Hatte sich die Situation seit 1938 nur langsam verändert, so spitzte sie sich 1941 dramatisch zu. Am 21. Januar führten 50 Gestapobeamte eine Durchsuchung des Stifts durch, die Ordensbrüder wurden scharf verhört, das ganze Stift streng bewacht. Am nächsten Tag wurde dem Prälaten die Verfügung über die Beschlagnahme des gesamten Besitzes ausgehändigt, datiert vom 21. Januar 1941. Davon waren nicht nur die Gebäude im Marktflecken Sankt Florian betroffen, sondern auch die Pfarrkirchen, die zum Stift gehörten, die Pfarrhöfe und die Landwirtschaft. Ein kommissarischer Verwalter, eingesetzt vom zuständigen Gauleiter, übernahm nun - im übrigen bis Anfang September 1942 die Verwaltung des gesamten Besitzes. Steuertechnisch bestand das Stift mit der Gauselbstverwaltung als Treuhänderin allerdings weiter fort. Dies änderte sich erst etwa zehn Monate später, im November 1941. Zu diesem

Zeitpunkt ging es in den Besitz des Gaus über. (10)

Die Beschlagnahme war Anlaß für den Reichsintendanten des Rundfunks, sich nun um die Nutzungsrechte für das Stift zu bemühen. Glasmeier, der in der Rundfunkzentrale in Berlin seit Kriegsbeginn, verstärkt seit dem Herbst / Winter 1941-1942 beträchtliche Machteinbußen hinnehmen mußte, sah hier eine Möglichkeit, in den Mittelpunkt nationalsozialistischer Kultur- oder Rundfunkpolitik zurückzukehren. Bereits lange vor seiner Berufung zum Intendanten in Köln, noch in seiner damaligen Eigenschaft als Archivdirektor in Westfalen, hatte er einmal Sankt Florian besucht. Seit damals war in ihm die Idee gereift, hier eine « Kulturstätte von Weltgeltung » zu schaffen. 1941 kam er nun zu einem Zeitpunkt auf den Plan zurück, zu dem der gesamte nationalsozialistische Rundfunk (und in dessen Rahmen wollte Glasmeier das Projekt verwirklichen) mit zunehmender Personalknappheit und Geräteproblemen zu kämpfen hatte. Außerdem wurden jetzt Personalkürzungen diskutiert, und mit den Finanzmitteln sollte so sparsam wie irgend möglich umgegangen werden. (11)

Nach einigen Besuchen im Sommer 1942 beschloß Glasmeier, die Räume in den Stiftsgebäuden zunächst auf ihre Tauglichkeit für dieses Projekt überprüfen zu lassen. (12) Im Herbst des Jahres begannen Techniker des Reichssenders Wien daraufhin erste akustische Messungen in den Räumen des Stifts durchzuführen. Diese Meßarbeiten wurden in den nächsten Wochen fortgesetzt. Währenddessen liefen auch Gespräche zwischen der Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft und der zuständigen Gauleitung an. Nach langen und zähen Verhandlungen einigten sich beide Seiten schließlich. Der RRG wurde die Nutzung der Stiftsgebäude für 99 Jahre (zu einem symbolischen jährlichen Pachtzins von einer Reichsmark) überlassen. Dem Reichsintendanten gelang es darüberhinaus auch, die förmliche Zustimmung des Führers für das Projekt (und damit auch erhebliche finanzielle Mittel) (13) zu erlangen. Hitler berief Glasmeier zum Beauftragten des Führers für die Aufgabe, in den Stiftsgebäuden eine « Kulturstätte ersten Ranges » aufzubauen : das Bruckner-Stift Sankt Florian. (14)

Am 1. September 1942, knapp ein Jahr nach der Enteignung, übernahm die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft offiziell das Stift ; die bis Sommer des Jahres dort einquartierten Flüchtlinge mußten es wieder verlassen. Am selben Tag wurde das Stift Doktor Gustav A. Schwaiger, dem Beauftragten und Vertrauten Glasmeiers, vom Verwalter übergeben. Schwaiger, vom Reichssender Wien hierher abgeordnet, übernahm in Sankt Florian die Betriebsführung. (15) In den Septemberwochen und in den nächsten Monaten folgten weitere Mitarbeiter, teils aus Wien vom dortigen Reichssender, teils von der Rundfunkzentrale in Berlin. Am 8. Oktober 1942 fand schließlich der offizielle Einzug des Reichsintendanten statt. (16)

Glasmeier benutzte in den Zeiten seiner Anwesenheit im Stift die Räume der ehemaligen Prälatur. Neben der rein räumlichen.

Nähe zu den ehemaligen Äbten des Chorherrenstiftes demonstrierte er in der folgenden Zeit auch eine recht persönliche Nähe zu ihnen : oft zeigte sich Glasmeier in den Gewändern seiner Amtsvorgänger, (17) ließ die Festtage der großen Äbte prunkvoll feiern. (18) In Berlin im Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda spöttelte man über den neuen « Abt » in Sankt Florian. (19)

Im Stift faßte die neue Verwaltung in den Monaten nach der Übernahme langsam Tritt. (20) Erste organisatorische

Probleme wurden geregelt, die für die Rundfunkarbeit wichtige Leitungsfrage Sankt Florian (München beziehungsweise Berlin in Angriff genommen. (21) Währenddessen begannen im Reich Zuarbeiten. Das Notenmaterial für Sankt Florian zum Beispiel wurde in den Funkhäusern in Köln und Leipzig besorgt. (22) Umfangreiche Vorarbeiten begannen nun auch für das im Rahmen des Bruckner-Stifts neu aufzustellende Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester und für den ebenfalls neu zu bildenden gleichnamigen Reichs-Bruckner-Chor. (23)

Für die Aufstellung des Orchesters fanden zwischen November 1942 und März 1945 fünfzehn Vorspieltage statt. Insgesamt 156 Musiker bewarben sich - ihre jeweiligen Orchester wurden unter Druck gesetzt, sie bei Bedarf freizugeben. (24) Knapp über die Hälfte, nämlich 80 von ihnen, kamen schließlich in die engere Wahl. Dies war auch die Zahl, die bis zum 1. April 1945 erreicht werden sollte. Langfristig hoffte man im übrigen 110 Musiker im Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester zusammenzufassen. (25)

Die für die Anfangsphase angestrebte Orchestergröße wurde zunächst nicht ganz erreicht. Am 5. April 1945 konnten vorläufig nur 72 Musiker nach einem feierlichen Konzert in der Stiftskirche Sankt Florian am Sarge Bruckners von Glasmeier persönlich auf die Person des « großen Genius », so Schwaiger, vereidigt werden. Das Konzert war gleichzeitig das erste öffentliche Auftreten, wenn auch zunächst im regionalen Rahmen. In diesem Bereich arbeitete das Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester auch in den nächsten Monaten weiter. Seine große nationale und internationale Bewährungsprobe sollte es erst am 20. April 1944, dem 55. Geburtstag des « Führers », bestehen. (26)

Sechs Wochen nach dem feierlichen Konzert trafen neun weitere Musiker in Sankt Florian ein. Der größte Teil der jetzt hier Arbeitenden war von den Rundfunkorchestern oder den Sendeanstalten abkommandiert worden. Der Deutschlandsender in Berlin hatte allein 22 Künstler abgeben müssen, vom Reichssender Leipzig kamen elf, die Reichssender in Stuttgart und Berlin verloren je sieben und Hamburg sechs. Von den nun rund 80 Musikern hatten ganze acht vorher kein festes Engagement bei einer Rundfunkanstalt gehabt. (27)

Bei der Aufstellung des Reichs-Bruckner-Chores war die Anwerbung der Sänger und Sängerinnen kein Problem. Mit Wirkung vom 15. September 1942 waren alle Rundfunkchöre aufgelöst worden. Die Bildung eines neuen Chores war somit eine Chance für die Künstler, in ihrem alten Beruf wieder Arbeit zu finden. Für den aufzubauenden Chor, für dessen Zusammenstellung aus den Spitzenkräften der aufgelösten Chöre Doktor Karl A. Wirz zuständig war, erfolgten Proben und Vorsingen zwischen Mitte Dezember 1942 und Mitte Februar 1945 in Leipzig. Die endgültige Auswahl unter den zahlreichen Bewerbern (28) traf der als Chorleiter berufene Thomaskantor Professor Günther Ramín. (29) Diejenigen, die bei dieser Beurteilung überdurchschnittlich gut abschnitten, bekamen schließlich ein Schreiben des Reichsintendanten, datiert vom 22. Februar 1945 :

« Ich berufe Sie mit Wirkung vom 1. März 1945 in den Bruckner-Chor Sankt Florian des Großdeutschen Rundfunks. Der Chor tritt zunächst in Leipzig zusammen, um von Thomaskantor Professor Günther Ramín geschult zu werden. In der Aufbauzeit werden Konzerte in Leipzig, Linz und Sankt Florian dem Chor die notwendige Resonanz verschaffen. »

Wie von Glasmeier angeordnet, trafen alle Anfang März 1945 in Leipzig ein. Am 2. März erfolgte im Haus des Reichssenders Leipzig die erste Einweisung der Chormitglieder in ihre zukünftige Aufgabe. Wirz übernahm die Leitung der laufenden Geschäfte des neu gebildeten Reichs-Bruckner-Chores. Allerdings erst rund ein Jahr später, im April 1944, waren die Vorbereitungen in Sankt Florian / Linz und in Leipzig dann soweit gediehen, daß der Chor seinen Standort an seinen eigentlichen Bestimmungsort verlegen konnte. (31) Bis zu dieser Verlegung hatte er fast nur in Leipzig gearbeitet.

Nach der Ankunft des über vierzigköpfigen Chores (im Juli 1945 waren es genau 45 Sänger und Sängerinnen) wurden seine Mitglieder wie bereits vor ihnen die Musiker des Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters am Sarge Bruckners vereidigt. Wieder ließ es sich der Reichsintendant nicht nehmen, persönlich der Zeremonie zur Einführung des Chores in Sankt Florian beizuwohnen. (32) Einige Tage später, am 5. Mai 1944, folgte in Linz die Begrüßung der Chormitglieder durch den Gauleiter. Zehn Tage später wurde im übrigen der bisherige Chorleiter Ramín durch Professor Michaël Schneider ersetzt. (33)

Neben dem Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester und dem Reichs-Bruckner-Chor spielte und arbeitete in Sankt Florian auch die « Spielge-meinschaft Seiler » unter der Leitung des Bratschensolisten Emil Seiler. Die Künstler, 1944 waren es fünf, traten sowohl bei Veranstaltungen im Stift als auch außerhalb auf. Truppen-betreuungsauftritte wechselten ab mit Kammermusikaufnahmen bei verschiedenen Reichssendern, « Gemeinschaftsstunden » zum Beispiel zur « Ehrung gefallener junger Künstler » mit « Feierstunden im Stift » . (34)

Ein erster Höhepunkt in der Existenz des Bruckner-Stiftes war der 4. April 1945. Hitler besuchte, nach kurzfristiger Ankündigung, die zukünftige « Kulturstätte von Weltrang » . Er begutachtete die Räumlichkeiten und die bisher im Sinne seines Führerbefehls geleistete Arbeit. Der Reichsintendant fühlte sich in seiner Arbeit durch diesen Besuch bestärkt, meinte die Rückendeckung des « Führers » vor Ort erlebt zu haben. (35)

Die Verwaltung des Stiftes (es existierte eine eigene Verwaltungsstelle in Sankt Florian und ein Verbindungsbüro bei der RRG in Berlin sowie beim Reichssender München) hatte mittlerweile konkrete Formen angenommen. (36) Mitte 1945 waren die Verantwortlichkeiten wie folgt verteilt : Schwaiger Betriebs-führer im Sinne des « Gesetzes zum Schutz der nationalen Arbeit » ; gleichzeitig nahm er die Vertretung Glasmeiers wahr. Sein Stellvertreter war Eugen Kurt Fischer, (37) der seinerseits die Kunstsammlung im Stift betreute und für die Bibliothek und die RRG-Bücherei sowie für das Thema Sankt Florian allgemein zuständig war. Castelle beschäftigte sich mit Leben und Werk Anton Bruckners. (38)

Besonderen Wert legte Glasmeier auf die Abschottung Sankt Florians gegenüber den Berliner Reichsministerien, insbesondere dem Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda. Nur so glaubte er hier eine eigenständige und starke Position für sich selbst aufbauen zu können. So ist es nicht verwunderlich, daß der Reichsintendant mit äußerster Sorgfalt rund zehn Monate nach Arbeitsbeginn in Sankt Florian einen Bericht an Goebbels zusammenstellte, an denjenigen, der ihn schließlich in Berlin Zug um Zug entmachtete. (39) Erklärlich wird auch seine Anweisung an seinen Stellvertreter, bei wichtigen Gästen stets selber anwesend zu sein :

Gleichzeitig versuchte Glasmeier, durch eine Vielzahl von Einladungen wichtiger Personen des Dritten Reiches sich einen starken Rückhalt zu schaffen. Der persönliche Referent Martin Bormanns gehörte ebenso zu den Gästen des Reichsintendanten in Sankt Florian (41) wie Albert Speer. (42)

Die Verwaltung des Bruckner-Stiftes kümmerte sich aber nicht nur um den Fortgang der Arbeiten im Stift, sondern auch um Angelegenheiten, die das umliegende Land betrafen. Durch eine Übereinkunft zwischen Gauleiter und Reichsintendant wurde die Umgebung des Stifts unter « erweiterten Landschaftsschutz » gestellt, (43) um den Charakter des gesamten Raumes zu erhalten. Ein zukünftiger Bebauungsplan sollte, so die langfristigen Planungen, die Entwicklung des Marktes Sankt Florian festschreiben und den baulichen Bestand regeln. Und andere sollte auch eine Höchstbegrenzung von 5.000 Einwohnern für die Umgebung des Brucknerstifts festgeschrieben werden, « tunlichst nur Personen ... , deren Familien in Sankt Florian bodenständig sind » , wie es in dem Protokoll einer Besprechung über den Bebauungsplan heißt. Die gesamte Planung dieses Raumes sollte sich nach dem Bruckner-Stift richten. (44)

Das Jahr 1944 brachte schließlich den ersten nationalen und internationalen Auftritt des Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters, gleichzeitig aber auch fast das Ende der Tätigkeiten im Stift. Am 20. April 1944, nach « langer Probezeit » , wie es in einer Rundfunkzeitschrift hieß, (45) spielte das Orchester am « Führer » -Geburtstag erstmals im Rundfunk. Knapp sechs Monate später, am 4. Oktober 1944, gab es sein letztes öffentliches Konzert. Die Arbeit im gesamten Stift wurde auf ein Minimum reduziert. Die Orchester- und Chormitglieder wurden, wenn dies nicht bereits geschehen war, zu Wehrmachtseinheiten, zur Polizei oder zu Betrieben in der Region abkommandiert. Von den 24 Sängern (im September 1944 hatte der Chor darüber hinaus noch 42 Sängerinnen) waren zehn zur Wehrmacht abgerückt, fünf in verschiedenen Fabriken im nahegelegenen Linz tätig, zwei zur Waffen-SS abkommandiert und einer für wichtige politische Aufgaben der NSDAP, wie es hieß, freigestellt worden. (46) Erst Anfang 1945 wurde dann, wohl auch auf Wunsch Hitlers, die Arbeit im Stift wieder aktiviert. (47)

In den letzten Monaten des Krieges gewann Sankt Florian als Produktionsstätte von Aufnahmen für das Rundfunkprogramm nochmals einige Bedeutung. Geographisch betrachtet, lag das Stift um die Jahreswende 1945 äußerst günstig, relativ weit ab von den vorrückenden Alliierten und der Front im Zentrum des noch von deutschen Truppen gehaltenen Gebietes. (48) In Sankt Florian konnte deshalb noch relativ ungestört gearbeitet werden, wohl der entscheidende Grund, warum die Arbeit im Stift wieder intensiviert wurde. (49) Verwaltungsdirektor Schwaiger konnte denn auch Anfang Februar stolz seinem Vorgesetzten, dem in Berlin endgültig verdrängten Glasmeier, (50) berichten, daß man in Linz « von einer Ausbildung » der verbliebenen Mitglieder des Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters in « den normalen Volksturmeeinheiten abgesehen » habe. Die Musiker sollten « lediglich nur eine 5-tägige Ausbildung im Polizeidienst » mitmachen, um « im Ernstfall im Standort Linz selbst zum Einsatz (zu) gelangen » . (51) Das Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester (der Chor blieb aufgelöst) arbeitete bis Kriegsende weiter unter der Leitung Georg Ludwig Jochums ; es hatte in den letzten Monaten mit vielen berühmten Dirigenten zusammengearbeitet (52) und war in der Endphase des Krieges wohl eines der produktivsten Orchester für den Rundfunk. So übersandte Jochum am 5. Februar 1945 45 sendefertige Bänder per Kurier nach Berlin, (53) achtzehn Tage später folgten weitere 45, nach wahrscheinlich einer weiteren Lieferung schließlich am 4. März erneut drei. Ein Begleitbrief lautete :

« Heute schon kann ich Ihnen wieder 5 Werke senden. Der Kurier fährt erade nach Berlin und da gebe ich sie ihm

Dieses Verfahren war notwendig, da schon lange keine Leitungsverbindung zwischen Sankt Florian und München, geschweige denn Berlin mehr bestand. Die Aufnahmen des Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters wurden vor allem im sog. Doppelprogramm, dem gehobeneren Musikprogramm, (55) eingesetzt, wesentlich seltener im Reichsprogramm. Die Lieferungen aus Linz / Sankt Florian bildeten in der Rundfunkzentrale in Berlin eine hochwillkommene Ergänzung zu den in den Schall-archiven der Sendeanstalten lagernden Beständen. (56) Auch verschiedene Einquartierungen konnten in der Folgezeit an der emsigen Tätigkeit in Sankt Florian nichts ändern. (57) Erst das Heranrücken der Alliierten im April / Mai 1945 führte schließlich zur Beendigung der Geschichte des Bruckner-Stifts Sankt Florian. (58)

Das Bruckner-Stift Sankt Florian, so läßt sich zusammenfassend sagen, war weitgehend das Werk einer Person, des Reichsintendanten Heinrich Glasmeier. Er nutzte die Situation, die durch die Enteignung des Stiftes entstanden war, ebenso aus wie die Schwäche Hitlers für die Region Linz. Glasmeiers Ziel war es, in Sankt Florian eine Kulturstätte, wie er sich auszudrücken pflegte, zu schaffen, die in der zweiten Hälfte des Krieges bestenfalls als anachronistisch bezeichnet werden konnte. Während überall im Reich (auch beim Rundfunk) derxunseit Jahren dauernde Krieg seine Opfer forderte, wandte der Reichsintendant hier einen Prunk auf, ließ mit einem Aufwand arbeiten, wie er ernsthaft zu dieser Zeit kaum noch denkbar schien.

Ein Schwimmbad für das Wohlbefinden Glasmeiers und seiner Gäste scheiterte nur am energischen Widerspruch Goebbels, die Anschaffung eines silbernen Tafelservices, mit dem Wappen des Reichsintendanten versehen, das von Glasmeier wohl als Krönung des Inventars gedacht war, wurde nur durch das Kriegsende verhindert. In Sankt Florian schuf sich ein Einzelner, motiviert durch persönliche Niederlagen in Berlin, ein Refugium, das nach dem Krieg nach seiner Vorstellung und in Anlehnung an Hitlers Pläne für Linz nichts weniger sein sollte als das kulturelle Zentrum Europas, wenn nicht der ganzen Welt ...

Als musikalisches Zentrum, als Herzstück der Ausbaupläne war das nahegelegene Stift Sankt Florian auserkoren, der Standort von Bruckners Sarkophag sowie seiner Orgel. Im Januar 1941 beschlagnahmte die Gestapo das geistliche Stift mit der Begründung, Ordensangehörige hätten die verbotene österreichische Freiheitsbewegung unterstützt. Nach der bis zum 20. April 1941 (sie !) erfolgten Vertreibung der Chorherren konnte man ungehindert darangehen, hier eine Bruckner-Musikhochschule als « Konservatorium Europas » einzurichten. Neben einem großen Kunstmuseum, einem Opernhaus und einem Bruckner-Festspielhaus entwarf Hitler im November 1942 für das Linzer Stadtzentrum eigenhändig ein Bruckner-Denkmal mit auffallender Ähnlichkeit zur Berliner Siegessäule. (46)

Die Bedeutung des Sankt-Florian-Projekts unterstrich Hitler, indem er Heinrich Glasmeier, den Reichsintendanten des Großdeutschen Rundfunks, zu seinem Bevollmächtigten berief. Dieser erhielt den Auftrag, in dem Stiftsgebäude eine Kulturstätte ersten Ranges aufzubauen. In dieser, « Weihstätte für das unsterbliche Werk Bruckners » sollten jährliche « Bruckner-Festspiele nach Art von Bayreuth » durchgeführt werden. Gestützt auf allerhöchste Protektion sah Glasmeier auch Möglichkeiten, diese Wünsche mit eigenen Rundfunkprojekten zu verbinden. Das von ihm entworfene Hoheitszeichen, eine eigenwillige Verbindung von Kreuz, Hakenkreuz und Familienwappen, entsprach seiner persönlichen Eitelkeit wie auch der dem Sankt-Florian-Projekt eigenen Ungleichzeitigkeit von feudalem Ambiente und modernster

Rundfunk-Technologie. (48)

Als neues deutsches Spitzenorchester rief Glasmeier das « Bruckner-Orchester Sankt Florian des Großdeutschen Rundfunks » ins Leben. Es sollte Kern eines geplanten « Musikwerks Weltrundfunk » sowie nach Hitlers Wunsch auch das künftige « Orchester des Führers » werden. Die zunehmenden Bombardierungen deutscher Städte erleichterten Glasmeier die Anwerbung. Das neue Reichsorchester im bislang als provinziell geltenden Linz erreichte trotz Spitzengehältern für Musiker zwar keineswegs die Attraktivität der Wiener Philharmoniker. Hatte aber immerhin den Vorzug, von alliierten Bombenflugzeugen weitgehend verschont geblieben zu sein. Im Dezember 1942 veröffentlichte Glasmeier einen Aufruf an die besten deutschen Musiker, diesem Orchester beizutreten. Im April 1943 hatten sich immerhin 80 Orchestermusiker in Linz zusammengefunden. die daraufhin am Sarkophag des Komponisten auf Bruckner vereidigt wurden. Die Eidesformel hatte den Wortlaut :

Nach einjähriger Probenarbeit und mehreren Auftritten sollte es am 20. April 1944, dem Geburtstag des « Führers » , mit einem besonderen Festkonzert vor die Öffentlichkeit treten. Große Vorbereitungen wurden getroffen. Obwohl die Zusage Furtwänglers bereits vorlag und sogar die Speisen- und Getränkefolge zum Eröffnungsmahl genauestens abgesprochen war, mußte das Ereignis wegen der ungünstigen Kriegslage abgesagt werden. Auch Linz, die Stadt der Hermann Göring-Werke. blieb vom Bombenhagel nicht länger verschont. So blieb es in Sankt Florian an jenem « Führergeburtstag » 1944 bei einem schlichten Eintopfessen, serviert von sechs SS-Männern aus Mauthausen. Und an Stelle des vorgesehenen Festkonzerts wurde vom Großdeutschen Rundfunk eine Bandaufnahme der 7. Symphonie von Bruckner mit dem Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester unter Georg-Ludwig Jochum ausgestrahlt. Weisungen der Kulturpressekonferenz zufolge sollte diese Sendung ohne genaue Ortsangabe rezensiert werden - man wollte so offenbar Luftangriffe auf die Klosteranlage vermeiden. Der volkstümliche Spruch « Heiliger Sankt Florian, verschone unser Haus, zünd andere an, hatte zwar dem Bruckner-Stift, nicht aber der Stadt Linz geholfen. Anders als bei einer Bruckner-Symphonie blieb trotz großartiger Steigerungen der Endsieg als das geplante große Finale aus.

Der deutsche Rückzug verurteilte die große Final-Idee und damit auch die triumphalen Planungen zur Bruckner-Stadt Linz zum Scheitern. Bevor die Unter-gangsvisioncn der Götterdämmerng Wirklichkeit wurden und damit Wagnerische Vorstellungen doch wieder gegenüber Bruckner die Oberhand gewannen, gab es Momente des Innehaltens. Es sind die Wochen der Enttäuschung, der Ernüchterung, nachdem sich auch die Planungen für den 20. April 1944 als undurchführbar erwiesen hatten. Wie ratlos sogar die offiziellen Stellen damals in Linz waren, belegt ein Tondokument vom 3. Mai 1944.

Organisation, Programm und die Hörer, Mannheim 1984. Die Akten der Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft in Sankt Florian, etwa 80 Kartons und Aktenordner, beziehen sich überwiegend auf die Geschichte des Bruckner-Stiftes und die geleisteten Vorarbeiten, also auf den Zeitraum 1944 bis 1945. Das Material ist entweder chronologisch oder nach Sachgesichtspunkten geordnet, so daß ein Zugang relativ einfach ist. Der zuständige Stiftsarchivar, der bereits erwähnte Professor Rehberger, hat darüber hinaus in Eigenarbeit aus den Akten die wichtigsten Unterlagen nach thematischen Gebieten fotokopiert und zusammengefaßt. Neben Unterlagen zu Sankt Florian existieren im Stiftsarchiv, wenn auch nicht sehr umfangreich, Akten und Materialien über Reden und Betriebsappelle des Reichsintendanten zwischen 1937 und 1942, Aufstellungen über den Besitz in Sankt Florian zu Kriegsende sowie und andere Zeichnungen über das « Bauprojekt Adolf-Hitler-Platz » in Berlin, in dessen Rahmen auch die Errichtung eines ZentraleBetriebs- und Verwaltungsgebäudes für sämtliche Berliner Betriebe der RRG (Inland und Ausland) geplant war. Im folgenden Text werden falls möglich - die Kopierbände Professor Rehbergers als Fußnoten angegeben, da sie einen schnelleren Zugriff zum Material erlauben. Materialien, die nicht in diesen Fotokopien erfaßt sind, werden nach der Bezeichnung des jeweiligen Aktenordners oder des Kartons aufgeführt. Über das in Sankt Florian lagernde Material hinaus liegen diesem Aufsatz auch die Akten, die sich im Bundesarchiv Koblenz (BArch) und im Document Center Berlin (DC Berlin) befinden, zugrunde.

Heinrich Glasmeier

Heinrich Glasmeier est né le 5 mars 1892, à Dorsten, en Rhénanie-du-Nord-Westphalie ; et est mort probablement le 4 mai 1945 à Linz, en Autriche. Il était le fils du commerçant-apothicaire de Dorsten, Bernhard Glasmeier. Heinrich fréquente le lycée « Petrinum » (« Gymnasium Petrinum ») . En 1911, il étudie l'allemand, l'histoire, la philosophie et la science archivistique, à Münster et à Munich. Durant ses études, il fait partie de l'association étudiante catholique de « Cimbria » , à Münster ; et de « Saxonia » , à Munich ; en plus de l'Association des étudiants catholiques d'Allemagne. Sa thèse de doctorat soumise à l'Université de Münster, en 1926, est décrite par la Faculté comme « une polémique théologique catholique fustigeant l'immoralité de la société plutôt qu'une recherche scientifique rigoureuse » . Ce membre influent du milieu étudiant va obtenir le poste d'archiviste du conseil d'administration du CT parce qu'il était le seul membre du NSDAP (en compagnie d'un haut-fonctionnaire du Parti) à faire partie de l'élite culturelle du 3^e « Reich » .

Probably no period, with the possible exception of the Nazi era, has had as major an impact on German academic fraternities as the late- 1960's. All of the once powerful fraternity organizations lost membership, as well as political and social influence in the closing years of the decade. As a new reformist attitude gained ground, personal networks that had been built-up over decades collapsed. Several factors were decisive in this process. The most important may have been an increasing stress on individualism. The re-organization of the West German Party system must also be mentioned ; one result was that Catholic fraternities lost the support of the Christian Democratic Union. Another important, if less immediate, factor must not be forgotten : all fraternities, including the Catholic ones, bore the burden of having not yet come to terms with the Nazi past.

Any attempt to tell the fraternities' story must be provisional. Although there has been considerable research done on social, political, and cultural developments in the Federal Republic of Germany during the 1960's, fraternity students have not yet received much attention from historians. Aside from Marxist or neo-Marxist studies that deal with the fraternities in an extremely critical fashion and describe them as a monolithic bloc, we only find scattered articles in « Festschriften » and journals. Source material is also a problem. The records of individual fraternities, for example, have generally been dispersed and are also usually confidential. We must therefore rely on the official sources of the fraternity associations, such as their magazines and the minutes of their meetings. Neither the memory of internal conflicts nor the complexity of everyday life in the fraternities is captured in full in such records. The available sources generally address matters of great concern to those active in the fraternities (traditions, rules of conduct, and institutional history) but not the issues of interest to historians.

One further point must be mentioned. Not only were the fraternities much more multi-faceted and fragmented than an outsiders' « prima facie » view would tend to acknowledge, but their membership fluctuated to a degree that is often underestimated. Many members, students or « Alte Herren » (alumni) , were quite mobile, and especially the students tended to change Universities quite freely. This factor led to changing majorities within the fraternities. « Charismatic » students and alumni have been, at least, as important in forming the character of a fraternity as the official policy of the nation-wide associations. Their influence is not even necessarily identical with the social or political majority within a given fraternity. It has had more to do with traditional and personal concepts of « auctoritas » than with the modern notion of democratic rule. However, any historian has to be aware of these restrictions in order to avoid simplistic judgments.

We will concentrate on the Catholic fraternity associations, in particular the « Cartellverband katholischer deutscher Studentenverbindungen » (CV) and the « Kartellverband katholischer deutscher Studentenvereine » (KV) . This choice is not arbitrary. The so-called dueling fraternities (« Burschenschaften » ; « Corps » ; « Landsmannschaften » ; « Turnerschaften » ; and « Sängerschaften ») are certainly of interest to historians. But the Catholic associations offer us some advantages.

1st, up into the 1970's, they were closely connected with the West German Catholic « milieu » (i.e. , with the mainstream of believers and the diverse institutions and organizations at the center of Catholic life) . That connection sheds light on the Catholic « milieu » as a whole.

2ndly, the Catholic fraternities are of special interest because of their ambiguous relationship with National-Socialism.

3rdly, the experience of the fraternities offers fresh insights into the rapid decline of the Catholic « milieu » in West Germany that began in the 1960's.

It seems that the relative decline of the Catholic student fraternities, in the 1960's and 1970's, was caused by their inability to come to terms with their own past. This was compounded by the functional and legitimizing character of German Catholic « Vergangenheitspolitik » after World War II and, even more so, by the difficult circumstances of Catholic existence after the 2nd Vatican Council.

We will sketch the history of the German fraternities and their relations with National-Socialism.

The history of the German fraternity system is a history of constant change and self-reform. Nearly every era before 1933 had its own particular variety of fraternity adapted to the socio-political circumstances of the day. For over 150 years, the dueling fraternities had dominated the social scene. As time went by, they became more and more differentiated. The most important were the « Corps » and the « Burschenschaften » , which were joined in the 1880's by the « Verband der Vereine Deutscher Studenten » (VvdSt) , an explicitly anti-Semitic organization of young reserve officers. All these associations adhered to the principle of « Satirfaktion » , which combined elements of a feudal code of honour with militaristic rituals. There was also a certain homogeneity in the social backgrounds and political attitudes of their members ; by and large, they came from aristocratic and upper-middle-class families, considered themselves the representatives of the better part of German society, and, after 1871, were loyal supporters of the Prussian dominated German Empire. The fraternity movement was dominated by the « Corps » after 1871. The « Corps » gloried in its tradition of camaraderie and did not try to define itself in intellectual or political terms. This contributed to the fraternities' limited appeal among more intellectual German students. Thus, in the early 1890's, a new element arose within the German fraternity movement : anti-Semitism. The founding of the radically anti-Semitic « Verband der Vereine Deutscher Studenten » was followed by growing unrest. Many fraternities that had previously accepted assimilated Jewish students began, in the 1890's, to exclude Jews as student anti-Semitism spread. Around 1900, the « Burschenschaft » divided into an anti-Semitic, « völkisch » nationalist Right-wing and progressive-reformist Left-wing. Austria and Southern Germany became regional strongholds of student anti-Semitism, but anti-Semitism was strongest among Protestant and national-Liberal students. Smaller, predominantly Protestant Universities, elsewhere in Germany, also joined the anti-Semitic movement ; they would later become centers of National-Socialist activism.

It was thus not the shocking experience of defeat, in 1918, that gave rise to anti-Semitism and ultra-nationalism within the fraternities. Even before 1914, juvenile radicalism and discontent with the alleged vacuousness of bourgeois culture had resulted in immature protests. After 1918, the great majority of dueling fraternities did not accept the Weimar Republic as legitimate, but neither did they adapt entirely to National-Socialist ideas and values after 1933. Nazism's modernizing elements (its notion of the egalitarian « Volksgemeinschaft » , for instance, its euphoric view of technological progress, and its promotion of a Party led mass culture) never found enthusiastic support among traditionalist and reactionary fraternities. The Nazis realized, consequently, that the so-called « Waffenstudenten » were not reliable partners.

The Catholic fraternities were the product of ultra-montanism and the « Kulturkampf » . Because this struggle between Church and State served as the Catholic fraternities' founding myth, they found it difficult to take-up the pan-German nationalism that began to gain ground among German Catholics in the 1890's.

Loyalty to a fatherland dominated by Protestant rulers and aristocrats could never be fully reconciled with loyalty to church and pope. The Catholic fraternities were outcasts in German academic life-long after the « Kulturkampf » of the 1870's. This was intensified by the marked social differences between the Catholic and Protestant fraternities. The members of the Catholic fraternities came mainly from « petit bourgeois » or rural families ; there were few aristocrats and virtually no members of the urban middle-class. Another distinctive attribute of the Catholic fraternities was their proximity to the Center Party, which was widely regarded with suspicion within the allegedly apolitical academic community. Finally, the strict ecclesiastical ban on dueling contributed to a sense of separateness that stood in competition with a desperate desire to become an integral part of the German academic community. This profound tragedy was intensified by the fact that the Catholic fraternities' very otherness allowed them to survive their social heterogeneity. This dilemma between an unwilling but functional distinctiveness and the desire for integration was never overcome. The anomalous position of the Catholic fraternities culminated in the « Akademischer Kulturkampf » of 1906-1907 as the dueling associations attempted, in part through violence, to force the Catholic fraternities to abandon University life. This attack, mounted under the guise of a defense of « academic freedom » , was led by the « progressive » technical universities. Only when Kaiser Wilhelm II refused to order the disbanding of the « CV » and the « KV » did anti-Catholicism cease to be an important force in University life. Grateful Catholic students, thereafter, tried to compensate for their marginalization with hyper-nationalism, especially during World War I.

Political conflicts within the Catholic fraternities became more virulent in the wake of the War. The « KV » and the « Unitas-Verband wissenschaftlicher katholischer Studentenvereine » (UV) , in effect the leftist Republican-wing of the Catholic fraternity movement, were superficially involved in the social reformism associated with Berlin priest Carl Sonnenschein and social Catholicism. On the other hand, the « CV » firmly embraced a traditionalist position. The « CV »'s Right-wing and the « Ring katholischer deutscher Burschenschaften » (RKDB) sympathized with conservative, anti-Republican extremists, whereas Left-wing « CV » fraternities, the « KV » , and the « UV » accepted the Weimar Republic. Despite warnings from ecclesiastical authorities, anti-Semitism became a real problem. There had certainly been a pre-modern anti-Judaism among German Catholics before the 1920's, but there was a distinct change during the Weimar years. Within the fraternity associations, anti-Semitism generally went hand-in-hand with rejection of the Republic. While officially rejecting the anti-Semitic « Arierparagraph » adopted by the « Burschenschaft » , at the turn of the Century, elements within the « CV » and the « RKDB » turned openly anti-Semitic. The Bavarian « CV » , influenced by the Austrian « CV » and the Christian-Social Party, became a stronghold of Right-wing Catholic thought. Inside the « KV » , only the few aristocratic fraternities also accepted the anti-Semitic and corporatist framework of Othmar Spann and Martin Spahn. After 1925-1926, the « CV » even sometimes abandoned the traditional all-Catholic alliance in University politics and joined nationalist coalitions with dueling fraternities.

The situation was different on the Left. The « KV » and the « UV » never openly questioned the Republic and strictly rejected the idea of forming coalitions with the nationalists. This was not, however, normally a result of democratic impulses. The « KV » was afraid of losing political control in broad coalitions and, therefore, opposed them. Like the « CV » , the « KV » and the « UV » remained within the confines of a Catholic perspective. They were patriotic, anti-communist, and ultra-montane in outlook. They regarded Liberalism, Fascism, and Communism as atheistic, revolutionary, and anti-Catholic. The « KV » and the « UV » maintained coalitions with Jewish fraternities in student parliaments, up to 1933.

Very few Catholics joined the Nazi student organization, the « Nationalsozialistischer Deutscher Studentenbund » (NSDStB) before 1933. The majority of Nazi Catholic students came from the ranks of the « RKDB » and some from the « CV » ; hardly any « NSDStB » members were affiliated with the « KV » or the « UV » . Catholic students were comparatively under-represented among the membership of the « NSDStB » and were out-numbered by students affiliated with reformist and patriotic groups such as the « Großdeutsche Finkenschaften » and the « Akademische Gildenschaften » . January 1933 brought a fundamental change. Until the « Reichskonkordat » between the 3rd « Reich » and the Vatican and the self-destruction of the Center Party, the Catholic fraternities maintained a critical position toward National-Socialism. But when it became clear that the Church would not oppose the new regime, the fraternity associations began to vie for advantages. Their central objective was the institutional survival of the fraternities. They were even willing to give-up defining elements of their identity, including the uniformly Catholic background of their membership. Fraternities that held to a strict Catholic position had to leave the umbrella associations. However, at least internally, the fraternities tried to regain authority and to stay Catholic. But, in 1935-1936, most of them gave-up and were disbanded. Only the alumni organizations, the « Altherrenschaften » , survived intact.

Before their dissolution, the Catholic fraternities held disparate and complex attitudes toward the Empire, the Weimar Republic, and the 3rd « Reich ». They were inclined to Right-wing conservatism and were critical of the Weimar Republic. But they never collaborated with the Nazi regime in Germany, and their pre-modern or anti-modern traditionalism helped them maintain some distance from an ideology far too radical for them to accept. Although they had preferred monarchy to democracy, they did not favor National-Socialism over democracy. And while only a tiny minority of Catholic fraternity members was to participate in the anti-Nazi resistance, the activities of former fraternity members after World War II guided the renewal of the fraternity movement.

Katholischen Studentenverbindung (KStV) Cimbria Münster

Entstanden gemeinsam mit der Markomania durch Teilungsbeschluß der Germania vom 09.02.1901, im KV seit 1901, Mutterverbindung des Osning (08.06.1909) und der Westfalia-Mazenod (16.01.1958) , 1972 konnte das heutige Haus bezogen werden.

Der Name Cimbria leitet sich ab vom Namen des germanischen Volksstammes der Kimbern. Hervorgegangen ist er aus dem KStV Germania (gegründet 1864) im KV zu Münster im Jahre 1901. Noch im selben Jahr wurde Cimbria als 34. Kartellverein in den KV aufgenommen.

Cimbria stand zwei Mal dem KV als präsidierender Verein (Vorort) vor : 1907-1909 und 2002-2003. Als Tochtervereine gingen aus dem KStV Cimbria der KStV Tuiskonia zu Münster (gegründet 1902) , der K.St.V. Osning Münster (gegründet 1908) sowie KStV Westfalia-Mazenod zu Münster (gegründet 1959) hervor.

Der KStV Germania im KV zu Münster (gegründet 1864) , eine der fünf Gründungskorporationen des KV, wies zur Jahrhundertwende einen derart starken Mitgliederbestand aus, daß ein geordneter Aktivenbetrieb nicht mehr gewährleistet war. So mußten etwa Kneipen an unterschiedlichen Orten durchgeführt werden; auf Wahlconventen erstarkten die Anhänger unterschiedlicher Chargenkandidaten zu regelrechten Fraktionen. Daher beschloß der hohe Convent Germaniae die Gründung gleich zweier Tochtervereine mit Sitz in Münster, des KStV Markomania und des KStV Cimbria. Bereits im Jahr darauf erstarkte die Akademie in Münster wieder zur Volluniversität, die sie schon von 1780-1806 und von 1817-1818 gewesen war. Hierdurch konnten von da an wieder Juristen und Mediziner in immer größerer Zahl aktiv werden. Anders als andere Korporationen wuchs Cimbria selbst wieder so stark, daß schon 1902 die Gründung des ersten Tochtervereins, des KStV Tuiskonia, notwendig wurde. Trotz dieses Aderlasses stieg die Zahl der aktiven Cimbern bis 1907 weiter auf 167 BbBb. 1906 gründete sich der Philisterverein Cimbriae. Aufgrund des starken Auftretens konnte Cimbria bereits vom WS 1907-1908 bis zum SS 1909 den Vorort des Verbandes übernehmen. Als Vorort fiel Cimbria 1909 die ehrenvolle Aufgabe zu, und andere Papst Pius X. in Rom die Glückwünsche des KV zu seinem goldenen Priesterjubiläum zu überbringen. In diese erste Vorortszeit fiel 1908 die Gründung eines zweiten Tochtervereins, des KStV Osning. 1910 zählte der Philisterverein bereits 138 Mitglieder, die einen Hausbauverein gründeten. Dieser stellte der Aktivitas im Jahre 1913 bereits 2000 Mark zur Verfügung. Von diesem Geld wurde an der Wese in der Nähe der Kaffeewirtschaft « Hof zur Linde » das heute noch bestehende große Bootshaus erbaut. Die Konstante Cimbriae war nach wie vor das Restaurant « Dortmunder » in der Bogenstraße. Der I. Weltkrieges beendete auch in Münster das Korporationsleben. Ein Großteil der Aktiven zog ins Feld. Ein beachtlicher Teil kehrte nicht Heim. 25 aktive und inaktive Mitglieder fielen, dazu 20 Alte Herren.

Trotz der Schrecken des Krieges sammelten sich danach zahlreiche Cimbern zur Weiterführung des Aktivenbetriebes. 1919 hatte Cimbria wieder 65 Aktive und Fuchse. Das Jahr 1920 markiert einen glanzvollen Höhepunkt in der Geschichte der Verbindung. Der Hausbauverein erwarb das große Haus der Krumpfen Straße im Zentrum der Stadt in unmittelbarer Nähe der Aegidiikirche. Dieses Haus besaß unter anderem einen großen Festsaal mit Bühne und Galerie, Kegelbahnen, Gesellschafts-, Chargen- und Kneipzimmer. Es wurde damit zu einem lebendigen Mittelpunkt des Vereinslebens und darüber hinaus des gesellschaftlichen Lebens Münsters überhaupt, vor allem seines großen Festsaales wegen. Die Programme berichten von zum Teil außerordentlich anspruchsvollen Veranstaltungen theologischen und wissenschaftlichen Inhalts. Eines der gesellschaftlichen und korporativen Höhepunkte war der Besuch des Reichskanzlers Wilhelm Marx, selbst Mitglied im KV, am 4. November 1924 auf dem Haus, wo er vor einer glänzend besuchten Akademikerversammlung sprach. Bis zur Machtergreifung der Nationalsozialisten erstarkte Cimbria weiter zu einem blühenden Verein.

Im Jahre 1935 wurde der KV durch die Nationalsozialisten aufgelöst. Als Todesstoß für das Vereinsleben diente der berühmte Doppelerlaß von Rudolf Heß, der allen Studenten die Mitgliedschaft in einer deutschen Studentenverbindung verbot, verbunden mit der Bestimmung, daß alle deutschen Studenten der Partei oder einer ihrer Gliederungen angehören mußten. So sistierte der Cumulativconvent Cimbriae 1935 unter dem politischen Druck des Regimes den Aktivenbetrieb des Vereins.

Wenn in einem solchen Rahmen die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus nur kurz dargestellt werden kann, so wäre es doch unwahrhaftig zu verschweigen, daß auch Mitglieder der Cimbria in die Verbrechen des Nationalsozialismus verstrickt waren. Zu nennen ist hier Doktor der Philosophie Heinrich Glasmeier, Kavallerieoffizier im ersten Weltkrieg und Direktor des westfälischen Adelsarchivs. Seit 1932 wandte er sich der Partei Hitlers zu, wurde Gaukulturwart und Gaugeschäftsführer der Partei in Münster und später Reichsintendanten des Großdeutschen Rundfunks.

Dem gegenüber steht ein ganz anderes Mitglied : Josef Buchkremer aus Aachen. Als Theologiestudent 1919-1921 bei der Cimbria in Münster aktiv, 1923 in Köln zum Priester geweiht, danach in mehreren Pfarreien in und um Aachen tätig, wurde er als Stadtseelsorger schon 1935 von den Nationalsozialisten mit einem Unterrichtsverbot belegt, weil den neuen Machthabern seine starke Gegnerschaft gegenüber der NS-Ideologie bekanntgeworden war. Aufgrund seiner mutigen Aktivitäten verbrachte Josef Buchkremer die Jahre 1942-1945 im Konzentrationslager, wo er von alliierten Soldaten befreit wurde. Im Oktober 1961 wurde er zum Titularbischof von Agger und Weihbischof von Aachen ernannt. In seinem Wahlspruch « Deo et Hominibus » (Für Gott und für die Menschen) findet auch sein mutiges Eintreten gegen das Unrecht des NS-Staates seinen Ausdruck. Er verstarb 1986 im 87. Lebensjahr.

Das Wiedererstehen des KStV Cimbria ist vor allem das Verdienst von Josef Müntjes. Nach seinen intensiven Recherchen nach dem Verbleib zahlreicher Vereinsmitglieder gelang es ihm, am 20. Februar 1948 einen Wiederbegründungskommers zu schlagen. Es folgte die Herausforderung des Wiederaufbaus. Bereits Ende der 50er Jahre meldete Cimbria dem Kartellverband wieder über 80 Aktive, Inaktive und Fuchse. 1959 erfolgte die Gründung des dritten Tochtervereins, des KStV Westfalia-Mazenod. Das Bootshaus in Handorf hatte zwar den Krieg überstanden. Doch ging das große Vereinshaus in der Krümmen Straße in den Wirren des Nationalsozialismus und des zweiten Weltkrieges unwiederbringlich verloren. 1957 entstand daher der Hausbauverein « Cimbriener eingetragener Verein », der im Jahre 1963 ein zweites Haus erwarb und 1970 den Aktiven übergab.

Die studentischen Unruhen, denen nach 1968 so viele Verbindungen zum Opfer fielen und die Kontroversen um das Prinzip « religio » und um studentische Traditionen überstand Cimbria glimpflich, wenn auch mit einem Einbruch der Mitgliederzahlen verbunden. Doch erlebt Cimbria seit Beginn der 80er Jahre eine stetige Aufwärtsentwicklung, die sich nicht nur an der Zahl ihrer Mitglieder, sondern auch an den anspruchsvollen Programmen und den glanzvollen Gründungs- und Stiftungsfesten ablesen läßt.

Mit dem Jahr 1997 hielt auch das Informationszeitalter Einzug in die Cimbria. Mehr als 160 Mitglieder weltweit haben seitdem den Weg in einen eigenen E-Mail-Verteiler gefunden, ein digitaler Rundbrief befindet sich in der 90. Auflage. Von Oktober 2002 bis September 2003 hatte Cimbria zum zweiten Mal die Ehre, den Vorort des Kartellverbandes katholischer deutscher Studentenvereine (KV) zu bilden. Höhepunkt dieser Amtszeit waren die Feierlichkeiten zum 150jährigen Bestehen des KV-Studententums im Juni 2003, die der KV in Berlin gemeinsam mit dem 150. Jubiläum des Askania-Burgundia beging. Als Festredner sprach Altbundeskanzler Doktor Helmut Kohl. Inhaltliche Akzente konnte der Vorort Cimbria setzen, indem er und andere maßgeblich an der Stellungnahme der großen katholischen Studentenverbände KV, CV und UV zum Gottesbezug in der europäischen Verfassung mitwirkte. Auch ist Cimbria weiterhin in führenden Positionen auf verbandlicher und überverbandlicher Ebene aktiv. So stellt sie einen der beiden stellvertretenden Vorsitzenden des Europäischen Kartellverbandes (EKV) und den Referenten für Presse- und Öffentlichkeitsarbeit der Arbeitsgemeinschaft katholischer Studentenverbände (AGV) .

Officier de cavalerie durant la Première Guerre mondiale, Heinrich Glasmeier est un fervent patriote. Il va être témoin de la défaite de la Ruhr. En 1919, il joue un rôle de 1er plan dans la remise sur pied du chantier naval et dans l'acquisition de navires.

En 1920, Glasmeier travaille comme archiviste à Dülmen pour les Ducs de Croy. De 1922 à 1933, il est l'archiviste des Comtes de Landsberg Velen. En 1923, il travaille comme conférencier-archiviste pour la ville de Münster en plus d'être le directeur des archives privées de la noblesse de la Province de Westphalie (dont la famille du Comte de Merveldt) . En 1927, il devient directeur (à temps partiel) de l'Agence consultative des Archives de la Province de Westphalie.

Durant son passage à l'Université de Münster, l'opportuniste et naïf Glasmeier devient un Nazi aveuglé et convaincu. En 1932, il joint les rangs du Parti. Il est personnellement promu comme SS par Heinrich Himmler. Il accède au poste d'intendant régional du NSDAP en matière de culture pour la Westphalie du Nord.

En 1933, le réalisateur Ernst Hardt qui est à la tête de la Société de la radiodiffusion ouest-allemande à Cologne (aujourd'hui, la WDR ou « Westdeutscher Rundfunk ») est congédié et mis sous arrêt suite à une plainte du «

Katholischer Verband » (l'Association catholique) . Le ministre de la Propagande Josef Gœbbels nomme Heinrich Glasmeier pour lui succéder. Son ascension fulgurante lui permet de décrocher, en 1937, le poste de directeur-général de la Société de la radiodiffusion du « Reich » (« Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » ou RRG) . Cette dernière fera l'éloge du directeur Glasmeier puisque, comme éminent archiviste, il possédait cette vision nationale-socialiste fondamentale « du Sang et du Sol » (« Blut und Boden ») .

Janvier 1941 : L'abbaye de Saint-Florian est confisquée par les autorités nationales-socialistes via la « Gestapo » . Quelques mois plus tard, les moines augustiniens sont expulsés du site. Dès 1942, le directeur-général Heinrich Glasmeier décide d'en faire la maison-mère de la « Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft » (Société de radiodiffusion du 3e « Reich ») . Les moines qui avaient trouvé asile à Pulgarn ne purent revenir qu'après la fin de la guerre lorsque les Américains reprennent le contrôle du monastère. Aujourd'hui, les lieux abritent le Musée historique des pompiers de Haute-Autriche.

Été 1942 : Grâce au soutien moral et financier d'Adolf Hitler, Heinrich Glasmeier amorce le projet de rénovation de l'ancien monastère augustinien Baroque de Saint-Florian, près de Linz, en mémoire du compositeur Anton Bruckner. Il installe toute l'infrastructure technique nécessaire (dont une immense antenne) pour la diffusion nationale (à travers la « Grande Allemagne ») et pan-européenne de la musique Classique (autorisée par le régime) et surtout, celle d'Anton Bruckner. Toujours en honneur au Maître de Saint-Florian, Glasmeier va fonder le « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » de Linz, de même que son Chœur attitré. Les concerts symphoniques de cette nouvelle phalange seront dirigés par Wilhelm Furtwängler, Herbert von Karajan, Karl Böhm et Eugen Jochum.

Novembre 1943 : Glasmeier est nommé, par le ministre Josef Gœbbels, agent de propagande du « Reich » pour l'ensemble des territoires français occupés.

In Salzburg, in 1934, Herbert von Karajan led the Vienna Philharmonic for the 1st time and, from 1934 to 1941, he was engaged to conduct Operatic and Symphony Orchestra concerts at the « Theater Aachen » .

Karajan's career was given a significant boost, in 1935, when he was appointed Germany's youngest « Generalmusikdirektor » and performed as a guest-conductor in Bucharest, Brussels, Stockholm, Amsterdam and Paris. In 1938, Karajan made his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic and the Berlin State Opera, conducting Beethoven's « Fidelio » . He then enjoyed a major success at the State Opera with « Tristan und Isolde » . His performance was hailed by a Berlin critic as « Das Wunder Karajan » (the Karajan miracle) . The critic asserted that Karajan's « success with Wagner's demanding work “ Tristan und Isolde ” sets himself alongside Furtwängler and Victor de Sabata, the greatest Opera conductors in Germany, at the present time » . Receiving a contract with « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , that same year, Karajan made the 1st of numerous recordings, conducting the « Staatskapelle Berlin » in the Overture to « The Magic Flute » . On 26 July 1938, he married Operetta singer Elmy Holgerloef. They divorced

On 22 October 1942, at the height of the Second World War, Karajan married Anna Maria (Anita) Sauest, born Gütermann. She was the daughter of a well-known manufacturer of yarn for sewing machines. Having had a Jewish grandfather, she was considered a « Vierteljüdin » (1/4 Jewish woman) . By 1944, Karajan was, according to his own account, losing favour with the Nazi leadership, but he still conducted concerts in War-time Berlin, on 18 February 1945. A short time later, in the closing stages of the War, he and Anita fled Germany for Milan, re-locating with the assistance of Victor de Sabata. Karajan and Anita divorced in 1958.

Karajan was discharged by the Austrian denazification examining board, on 18 March 1946, and resumed his conducting career shortly thereafter.

En 1929, le jeune Herbert von Karajan fait ses débuts dans sa ville natale de Salzbourg où il dirige l'Opéra « Salomé » de Richard Strauß. En 1938, il obtient son 1er grand succès à Berlin en dirigeant « Tristan und Isolde » ; un critique berlinois titre ainsi son article : « Das Wunder Karajan » (le miracle Karajan) . Il devient alors un pion utilisé contre le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dans la guerre culturelle interne qui oppose Josef Gœbbels à Hermann Göring pour le contrôle du monde musical allemand : Gœbbels soutenant l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin ; et Göring, l'Opéra national (« Staatskapelle ») . Le 26 juillet 1938, Karajan épouse la chanteuse d'Opérette, Elmy Holgerloef. Ils divorcent en 1942.

En 1939, Karajan s'attire l'inimitié d'Adolf Hitler lors d'un concert de gala donné en l'honneur des monarques yougoslaves où, en raison de l'erreur d'un chanteur, il perd le fil des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » du compositeur Richard Wagner (qu'il dirigeait sans partition, comme à son habitude) , les chanteurs cessent alors de chanter et, dans la plus grande confusion, le rideau tombe ; furieux, Adolf Hitler donne cet ordre à Winifred Wagner :

Karajan poursuivait ses manigances ambiguës. D'ailleurs, personne n'avait véritablement envie d'apporter un concours trop marqué à une personnalité que le « Führer » avait véritablement prise en grippe. Prudence oblige ... Karajan le sentait bien.

Dans ce contexte, le nombre de ses apparitions à Berlin diminua singulièrement. Ainsi, l'Opéra lui fut-il interdit. Il avait brûlé, certes, mais même au « Kroll Oper » qui le remplaçait on ne lui proposait plus rien. Et quand, rebâti à la hâte, l'Opéra « Unter den Linden » ouvrit à nouveau ses portes, début 1943, il y dirigea bien l'Orchestre de la « Staatskapelle » , mais ce fut dans un concert d'orchestre. Il donna même une série de concerts d'orchestre organisés par le colonel SS Rudolf Vedder, pendant la saison 1942-1943 à Berlin, dans la vieille salle de la « Philharmonie » ou dans l'Opéra reconstruit - dont il critiqua d'ailleurs vertement l'acoustique. Heinz Tietjen trouva encore le moyen de réduire le nombre, par lui jugé excessif, des répétitions qu'exigeait chaque fois le jeune chef. Toujours aussi perfectionniste, celui-ci en voulait toujours plus ; il se vit infliger l'obligation de n'en avoir jamais plus de 5. Il est vrai que la situation du Berlin d'alors devenait de plus en plus critique. Les bombardements alliés se multipliaient et la vie qu'on y menait peut donner le sentiment que, dans une atmosphère de catastrophe de plus en plus prévisible, la société d'alors, les musiciens comme la clique d'Adolf Hitler, qui continuait à multiplier bals et cérémonies, dansait sur un volcan. Les soirées officielles et autres réceptions se succédaient avec un faste clinquant au « Berlin Staatsoper », mais Karajan n'était plus au pupitre quand on y donnait Richard Wagner ou Giuseppe Verdi.

Sur le front de l'Est, les Iers succès remportés par l'armée allemande après l'entrée de ses troupes en Union soviétique étaient bien loin. Après Stalingrad et Léningrad, après la bataille de Moscou, l'avenir paraissait de plus en plus sombre. Avec les mois, une grande partie de la capitale était devenue un champ de ruines. Et pourtant, Madame Göring, Ire dame du pays, continuait à recevoir avec le Chancelier Hitler. Elle donnait des soirées de thé auxquels on se battait pour assister. Pleins d'une infinie délicatesse, membres du Gotha et Maîtres de forges lui baisaient dévotement des mains dont mieux valait ne pas savoir d'où venaient les lourdes bagues dont elles étaient chargées. On portait les mêmes robes longues et les mêmes grands uniformes constellés de décorations. On paradait dans les mêmes salles de banquets.

Cette situation ambiguë perdurera pour Karajan pendant la saison 1943-1944. Ses concerts à la tête de la « Staatskapelle » se poursuivent, tantôt dans la salle de la « Philharmonie », tantôt dans la salle reconstruite de l'Opéra « Unter den Linden ». Toutefois, ses remarques peu amènes sur l'acoustique nouvelle de la salle ont été fort mal prises par le pouvoir, ce qui ne fait qu'accroître la réputation devenue détestable qu'il traîne désormais avec lui dans les allées les plus officielles du 3e « Reich ». Et si Tietjen tentera à nouveau d'entrer avec lui en négociation pour quelques soirées d'Opéras, au cours de la saison 1943-1944, il lui semblera bien évident que l'intendant du « Staatsoper » n'a en aucune manière l'intention de l'engager sur une base régulière. Tout au plus se propose-t-il de lui accorder, çà et là, la direction de quelques œuvres lyriques : Karajan a bien compris que l'ombre qu'il a pu faire à Wilhelm Furtwängler lui porte désormais tort de manière irrémédiable.

Les mêmes problèmes lui viendront lorsqu'il décidera de changer de maison de disques et de travailler aux côtés d'Ernst von Siemens, le nouveau patron de la firme « Siemens », pourtant proche du pouvoir (et c'est un euphémisme !), qui venait d'acquérir la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft ». Particulièrement lié avec Siemens, Karajan ne trouvera cependant pas d'Orchestre disponible à Berlin pour enregistrer avec lui les Symphonies de Mozart que Siemens lui proposa. Situation tout de même étrange que celle du chef à peu près régulier de la « Staatskapelle », dont les concerts continuent à attirer le Tout-Berlin avec des programmes souvent aventureux, qui poursuit son entreprise d'exploration des œuvres de Jean Sibelius, qui se lance dans l'immense aventure des grandes Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner, qui dirige la première d'un « Concerto pour orchestre » du compositeur contemporain Gottfried von Einem - quitte à recevoir de nouveaux reproches de la part de l'entourage de Josef Göbbels, à qui l'œuvre de von Einem paraît trop révolutionnaire - et qui ne trouve pas à Berlin d'Orchestre pour enregistrer la simple Symphonie « Haffner » de Mozart. C'est finalement à Turin, au début de l'automne 1942, qu'il pourra se lancer dans l'enregistrement, avec l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Turin (pas l'un des meilleurs Orchestres du monde), celui-là des Symphonies « Haffner » et de « Jupiter », ainsi que d'une Overture particulièrement remarquée de la « Sémiramis » de Rossini.

Pendant ce temps, Furtwängler avait retrouvé tous ses droits à l'Opéra « Unter den Linden ». C'est lui qui dirigeait « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » donnés pour la ré-ouverture du grand théâtre reconstruit. Continuant son double jeu, Tietjen poursuivait à l'endroit de Karajan sa politique attentiste, évoquant pour lui une nouvelle production de « Don Juan », mis-en-scène par Gustaf Gründgens dont la superbe « Flûte enchantée » était dans toutes les mémoires, voire un « Chevalier à la rose » que Karajan pourrait mettre-en-scène lui-même, sinon un « Tristan und Isolde » avec cette Germaine Lubin qui lui avait permis d'enchanter le Paris de la « collaboration ». Mais rien de tout cela ne se concrétisa. Au cours de ses 2 dernières saisons d'activité à Berlin, Karajan trouva tout de même le temps d'aller diriger l'Orchestre de la Scala à Milan, en novembre 1942 et en mars 1943 ; de donner des concerts en Roumanie, en janvier 1944 ; et de revenir à Paris, en avril et mai 1944, pour des concerts au Théâtre des Champs-Élysées. Le 19 avril, il dirige l'Orchestre de Radio-Paris à l'occasion de son 100e concert. Il y tient lui-même le piano du 12e Concerto de Händel, donne « la Mer » de Debussy et la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven. Jacques Lorcey, dans sa biographie de Karajan, cite le critique Alexis Michaguine, qui dira, parlant de son interprétation de « la Mer », qu'il « dirigea d'une façon vraiment personnelle, en faisant ressortir le leitmotiv : les plaintes, les gémissements de la mer ; à ce moment, il fallait voir les mains du jeune mais déjà illustre Maître : ses mains parlaient, vibraient, chantaient, galvanisaient, hypnotisaient non seulement l'Orchestre mais aussi toute l'assistance ». Le même critique regrettera toutefois, et l'on aurait pu s'en douter, la faiblesse de cet Orchestre de Radio-Paris, la station collaborationniste par excellence, à propos de laquelle on avait inventé à Londres la triste ritournelle :

Au cours du second concert, également très applaudi, et à 1 mois et 2 jours du débarquement allié en Normandie, Karajan dirige la 4e Symphonie de Brahms, le 2e Concerto brandebourgeois de Bach (et, cette fois, il tient la partie de clavecin !), mais aussi le « Don Juan » de Richard Strauß et un fulgurant « Boléro » de Ravel.

Dans ces derniers mois où la fin du « Reich » semble se précipiter, Karajan est installé au grand Hôtel Adlon, au centre névralgique de ce qu'il est resté de Berlin. Toujours dans son journal d'une jeune fille russe, la gentille « Missie » Vassiltchikov note, à la date du 2 août 1944 :

« Ce soir, il y a eu un nouveau raid. Nous nous sentions trop fatigués pour descendre. Mais, soudain, nous avons entendu 2 grosses explosions ; nous avons enfilé pantalons et chandails et couru jusqu'à l'abri. Tous les clients de l'Hôtel semblaient s'être habillés à la hâte ; Karajan, toujours tiré à 4 épingles, était pieds nus, en imperméable, les cheveux en bataille. »

Un Karajan pieds nus, en imperméable et les cheveux en bataille : c'est une étrange image qui s'impose à nous, comme en surimpression des 2 années à venir, où nous verrons le grand chef d'orchestre, adulé par une partie du public en même temps que haï par Hitler, redouter brusquement une issue de la guerre qu'il ne peut que souhaiter mais dont il se met à craindre, d'une manière malade, les conséquences qu'elle pourra avoir sur lui. Installé à l'Adlon, il vit alors très près d'Anita, qui l'a accompagné à Milan ou à Paris. Même dans l'ambiance du Paris des derniers mois, des dernières semaines avant la Libération, l'un et l'autre avaient le sentiment de respirer à nouveau plus librement, tant la pression qui pesait à Berlin sur le couple était intense.

On a parlé de la déroute allemande sur le front de l'Est. Le 6 juin à l'aube, c'est le 2e front, à l'Ouest, qui est enfin ouvert. Le 20 juillet, l'attentat manqué contre Hitler provoque des réactions d'une violence inouïe. Toute une partie de la haute-société allemande qui était parvenue à survivre pendant les années sombres est décimée ou se terre. On va fermer les Opéras, réduire de manière drastique les concerts. Pourtant, 2 jours après l'attentat manqué, Karajan est officiellement chargé de diriger un immense concert en hommage à Bruckner, dans la grande abbatale de Saint-Florian, en Autriche, où vécut le compositeur. Ainsi, à quelques mois de sa fuite éperdue hors d'Allemagne, c'est un Karajan qu'on peut croire encore au sommet de sa puissance qui, dans l'un des sites historiques de la vie musicale et artistique autrichienne, semble conclure cette 1re partie de sa vie avec un hommage à un Bruckner que Hitler (lui aussi !) se flattait d'aimer.

11 octobre 1944 : Concert du « Linzer Bruckner Orchester » à l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian. Au programme : la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dirigée par Wilhelm Furtwängler (la seule et unique fois qu'il aura l'occasion de diriger cet Orchestre) . Son chef principal était Georg-Ludwig Jochum, l'un des 3 frères Jochum. Avec cette phalange et le Chœur « Bruckner » de Linz (dirigé par Günther Ramin) , le Chancelier Adolf Hitler voulait produire les programmes musicaux de la « Radio de la Grande Allemagne » . L'Orchestre Bruckner de Linz fut aussi appelé « l'Orchestre du “ Führer ” »

De nombreux journaux évoquèrent ce magnifique concert. Citons le « Oberdonau-Zeitung » , le « Schlesische Zeitung » , le « Brüner Tageblatt » et le « Königsberger Allgemeine Zeitung » .

Herbert Caspers écrivit dans le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » :

Dans une lettre à Max Auer, datée du 22 novembre 1952, Furtwängler écrivit :

« Inoubliable m'est restée l'interprétation de cette œuvre incomparable que j'ai pu jouer dans l'église de Saint-Florian, au cours des dernières et pires années de cette maudite guerre. »

After Wilhelm Furtwängler performed the Bruckner 9th in Berlin on October 7, 1944, he then travelled to Saint-Florian and performed the work in the monastery church with the Linz Bruckner Orchestra (Georg-Ludwig Jochum, music-director) . The concert was recorded and deposited in what became the Ross/Weiß/Ross (later, « ORF ») archives, and that the transcription still existed, but in poor condition.

This information was reported by a former member of the « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » . However, Hanns Kreczi's book chronicling the Orchestra's activities, including recordings made by the Orchestra, does « not » list such a recording. The « ORF » archive actually holds relatively few War-time recordings, since most extant « RRG » tapes, in Vienna, were taken away by the Soviets. For instance, the Bruckner 2nd and 6th Symphonies under Georg-Ludwig Jochum were issued by « Urania » from tapes provided by the East-German Radio, where many of the original « RRG » tapes ended-up. Only a handful of tapes from the 93 documented recordings by the « Bruckner-Orchester » still exist. The post-War Vienna radio station was « BTW Rot-Weiß-Rot » .

1944 : On a parlé de la déroute allemande sur le front de l'Est. Le 6 juin à l'aube, c'est le 2e front, à l'Ouest, qui est enfin ouvert. Le 20 juillet, l'attentat manqué contre Hitler provoque des réactions d'une violence inouïe. Toute une partie de la haute-société allemande qui était parvenue à survivre pendant les années sombres est décimée ou se terre. On va fermer les Opéras, réduire de manière drastique les concerts. Pourtant, 2 jours après l'attentat manqué, le chef Herbert von Karajan est officiellement chargé de diriger un immense concert en hommage à Bruckner, dans la grande abbatale de Saint-Florian. Ainsi, à quelques mois de sa fuite éperdue hors d'Allemagne, c'est un Karajan qu'on peut croire encore au sommet de sa puissance qui, dans l'un des sites historiques de la vie musicale et artistique autrichienne, semble conclure cette Ire partie de sa vie avec un hommage à un Bruckner que Adolf Hitler (lui aussi !) se flattait d'aimer.

Les bombes continuaient à pleuvoir sur Berlin, on y exécutait à la hâte les conjurés du 20 juillet et leurs complices, vrais ou faux. Mais il se trouvait encore des courtisans pour organiser, pour le plaisir du « Führer » , une incroyable célébration de Bruckner dans le cadre grandiose du monastère de Saint-Florian. Hitler, raconte Karajan lui-même à Roger Vaughan, l'un de ses biographes, se lança sans hésiter dans l'entreprise. Le couvent avait déjà été largement restauré, le Chancelier du « Reich » procura, assure Karajan, tout l'argent qui était nécessaire. L'artisan de cet ultime festin musical était l'un des dirigeants de la radio d'alors, Heinrich Glasmeier.

« On achètera pour lui des meubles à Paris. On lui obtiendra également un carrosse avec 6 chevaux assortis, à l'intérieur bleu damassé. »

La description que donne Karajan de Glasmeier évoque les personnages ambigus qui hantent les romans de Curzio Malaparte, Kaputt ou la Peau. Glasmeier s'était installé dans une partie du couvent, au nombre incalculable de pièces et où il avait réuni un Orchestre personnel de 25 instrumentistes pour célébrer Bruckner.

« Il portait un manteau de moine doublé de couleur sable et ne se déplaçait qu'avec une canne d'argent. Chaque soir, il dînait en tête à tête avec le vieil abbé du couvent. »

Sentant venir la fin de la guerre, Glasmeier prenait déjà les devants et s'assurait un avenir en retraçant pour toute l'aristocratie qui voulait bien avoir recours à ses services des arbres généalogiques particulièrement flatteurs.

Si la vie de Karajan, comme celle de Hector Berlioz, est bien un roman, elle abonde en personnages de ce type. On a vu le colonel SS Rudolf Vedder dans la peau du traître d'Opérette tragique. Heinrich Glasmeier, lui, réussit le tour de force, alors que le front de l'Ouest était enfoncé, de convaincre l'Allemagne entière de participer à son projet et d'accroître encore les effectifs du petit Orchestre qu'il avait constitué, jusqu'à former un « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester », un Orchestre symphonique Bruckner du « Reich ». Vainquant toutes les difficultés, il parvint enfin à imposer Karajan pour diriger l'unique soirée du 23 juillet 1944.

Dernier grand moment de ces célébrations Bruckner, Karajan et la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin réaliseront, pendant l'été 1944, un disque historique. Il s'agira de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner, enregistrée en stéréophonie grâce au preneur de son de la radio du « Reich », un certain Helmut Krüger, qui installa des micros supplémentaires, sans même que Karajan le sût lui-même. Largement diffusée après la guerre, cette version de la 8e de Bruckner constitue l'une des Ires incursions de Karajan, pourtant à l'époque ignorant de ce prodige d'ingéniosité, dans le domaine des technologies modernes où, par la suite, il jouera un rôle de pointe parmi les chefs d'orchestre de son temps.

Mais c'étaient là les derniers feux d'un homme désormais privé de moyens dans un Berlin qui courait tout droit à la catastrophe. Déjà, dans la nuit du 29 au 30 janvier 1944, la vieille salle, historique entre toutes, de la « Philharmonie » de Berlin a été rasée à son tour par les bombes de la « Royal Air Force ». Et dans la seconde partie de 1944, la situation de l'Allemagne est désespérée. Pourtant, ce sont des centaines de milliers d'hommes qui vont se lancer dans la bataille. En Alsace, à Aix-la-Chapelle, à l'est de la Prusse et en Hongrie, la résistance allemande s'avère efficace. Mais, dès le 6 septembre, les troupes soviétiques s'avancent en Bulgarie. Quelques jours après, les fronts ouest et sud font leur jonction en France. Le 18 octobre, l'Allemagne décrète la levée en masse des hommes de 16 à 60 ans. Le 16 décembre, à la surprise totale du commandement allié, une contre-attaque allemande fulgurante a lieu dans les Ardennes. Ce sera un échec, mais lourd de conséquences, puisque c'est à cause d'elle que les troupes américaines ne pourront pas entreprendre la campagne d'Allemagne en même temps que les Soviétiques, qui prendront sur elles une avance considérable, dont l'Ouest paiera le résultat longtemps après la guerre. Le 17 janvier, les troupes du maréchal Joukov entrent ainsi dans Varsovie. Au début du mois de février, la déroute allemande est complète en Pologne. Le 4 février, les troupes soviétiques de Koniev franchissent l'Oder et le 8 février, les Soviétiques prennent Breslau. Au début du mois de février 1945, l'Opéra « Unter den Linden », reconstruit depuis moins de 2 ans, sera à nouveau rasé. Mais Karajan lui-même ne sera plus là pour assister à ce désastre.

C'est un monde qui achève de s'écrouler, et les derniers mois de la guerre verront un Herbert von Karajan littéralement aux abois. Évincé par les autorités nazies de tout véritable pouvoir musical, il ne s'estime pas, pour autant et loin de là, en sécurité devant les progrès de l'armée soviétique. Dès la fin de l'été, il n'a plus qu'une idée en tête : quitter l'Allemagne. Mais, même pour lui (surtout pour lui, peut-être), ce n'est pas chose aisée. Il est désormais nécessaire d'en recevoir l'autorisation expresse pour quitter le territoire allemand. En attendant, il donne encore quelques concerts à l'Opéra « Unter den Linden » - voire, au début du mois de novembre, un concert de musique de chambre dans lequel il tient lui-même la partie de piano. Pour l'essentiel, il passe une partie de l'automne en Autriche qui fait partie du territoire allemand.

Heinrich Glasmeier tombe en disgrâce. Josef Gœbbels le démet de ses fonctions puis l'expédie sur le Front de l'Est.

Introuvable, on le rapporte comme manquant.

Printemps 1945 : Heinrich Glasmeier fuit l'arrivée des troupes américaines. Mais les Nazis sont également cernés par l'Armée Rouge. Terré dans ses luxueux quartiers du monastère de Saint-Florian, le « SS-Oberführer » (major-général SS) Heinrich Glasmeier ressent le fracas de l'artillerie soviétique au-dessus de sa tête. Quelques jours avant la fin de la guerre, soit autour du 4 mai, il se suicide à Linz dans sa voiture, tenant une grenade à la main.

American troops in Salzburg and Upper-Austria under U.S. General Harry Collins, 42nd U.S. division stole various art treasures from Austria, including a Salzburg gold coin collection hidden in Hallein. 7 valuable paintings including a Rubens and a van Dyck, and 7 valuable prints, including 4 Dürers, were stolen from the salt mine of Alt-Aussee while under supervision of U.S. personnel with the full knowledge of the Allied authorities.

Particularly disturbing is the chapter entitled « The Austrian Monasteries » , whose sacred relics did not escape American attention. Stolen from the Saint-Florian Monastery and sent to the villa of Gen.

Members of the 83rd U.S. Infantry Division (named « Thunderbolt ») plundered the treasure depot of the Saint-Florian Monastery in 1945, freely taking paintings, antique furniture and Celtic gold treasure which they carried away on 5 trucks.

On 11 April 1945, the 83rd U.S. Infantry Division encountered Langenstein, a sub-camp of the Buchenwald concentration camp. At the camp, the troops found approximately 1,100 inmates. The inmates were malnourished and in extremely poor physical condition. The 83rd reported the death rate at the camp to be 500 per month. Also, that the prisoners had been forced to work 16 hour days in nearby mines, and were shot if they became too weak to work. After liberation, the death rate continued at approximately 25-50 people per day, due to the severe physical debilitation of the prisoners.

To slow the spread of sickness and death, the 83rd ordered the local German mayor to supply the camp with food and water. Also, medical supplies were requisitioned from the U.S. Army's 20th Field Hospital. In addition, the 83rd recovered documents for use by war crimes investigators.

In 1933 radio broadcasting, like the film world, underwent a process of coordination (« Gleichschaltung ») and centralization in both its staffing and its content. Already in that year, the regional broadcasting companies had had to make-over their shares to the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » and, in 1934, they were amalgamated in the « Reichssender » . At the same time, a radio department was formed in the propaganda ministry, and the « Reichsrundfunkkammer » (« Reich » Broadcasting Chamber) was set-up for « Aryan » and politically impeccable broadcasting personnel, and remained in existence until October 1939. It was designed to bring the whole of broadcasting under the control of the State : the radio industry, manufacturers of radio sets, broadcasting periodicals - anyone having anything to do with radio had to join the « Reichsrundfunkkammer » . As early as March 1933, in his 1st speech to the broadcasting managers, Josef Gœbbels had explained that he saw radio broadcasting as « the most modern and all-important instrument for influencing the masses ». With it, he wanted to « imbue people so profoundly with the spiritual content of our times that no one can break free of it ». He warned his subordinates :

« Only never become boring. Never be tedious. Never put ideas and beliefs on show. They have to be there, but that doesn't mean they need bore the listener. Radio should never be let down by the words : people see the intention behind them, and are irritated. »

Transmission using physics and technology was to become a transmission of ideas. The direct, shared experience on the radio would, the Nazi authorities hoped, make possible, as no other medium could, a persuasive closeness between the people and their leaders. As a consequence, « all forms of radio irrespective of their content (were) carriers of the National-Socialist ideology. The political aspect (was) not what the content of a programme happens to be, but the starting point for the whole business of radio broadcasting » .

As had been the case with the « Wochenschau » , the War led to an ever-increasing thirst for information and, with it, to an increase in the importance of radio broadcasting, which was then the only way, via live transmissions, or in only slightly deferred time, to enable the public to share directly in current events. While, in 1938, there had been 9 million radio listeners, early 1943 saw the highest count with 16.2 million. Almost 70 % of all households had a radio set. Compared to the density in other European countries, Germany, in 1938, was, with 134 listeners per 1,000 inhabitants, behind Denmark, Britain, and Sweden but ahead of France. The Nazis showed a great interest in radio, since it went right into the private sphere and opened it up to politicization. In the Second World War, this opportunity, again in contrast to the attempt at psychological warfare in the First that had failed because it bored people, was to be used to the full. Moreover, the development of multi-media techniques, which had already begun under the Weimar Republic, was pursued apace with various forms of « product placement » . Radio periodicals told people about the programmes, catchy tunes taken from films were played which were in turn pressed onto gramophone records to find a further audience, while programmes such as the « Wunschkonzert » request programme were made into films, knowledge of which was to be spread further through the « Buch zum Film » .

By the time of the Austrian « Anschluß » , in March 1938, at the latest the development of German radio broadcasting into an international instrument of propaganda had begun. Only a few weeks after the invasion of Poland, there were 113 transmissions in 15 foreign languages every day and, by 1943, 100 directional transmitters were beaming the programmes to foreign audiences. While, with cinema films, the possibility of their being shown abroad (and the foreign currency that would bring in) had been kept in mind, radio broadcasting, with its potential for stirring-up discontent and spreading disinformation as well as for building trust, was seized on and deployed as a strategic weapon of psychological warfare. The operations and finance plan for the « Interradio » foreign broadcasting company, set-up in May 1941, stated :

« In this War, as in no other before, the battle for public opinion in the countries on every continent plays a decisive role. Experience in the War has shown that broadcasting, as the modern instrument of propaganda that spans the globe, has created a virtually unlimited opportunity for influencing the people of the world. The morale of the enemy population and their will to do battle can be affected so deeply by this new and dangerous weapon that broadcasting contributes to defeating the foe and is, thereby, supporting the military operations. »

Many of the nations involved in the Second World War evidently thought the same, so that there came to be a real battle of the airwaves with transmitters broadcasting in the languages of the enemy nations. Of approximately 100 radio stations round the world putting-out programmes in German, however, only a handful could be received in Germany. They included the « BBC » German Service ; the « Voice of America » ; Radio Luxembourg ; Radio Moscow ; the « Deutsche Volkssender » ; and that of the National « Free Germany » Committee. But there were also transmitters putting-out black propaganda, i.e. , working under a false identity (« Sender 1212 » as the American-run mouthpiece of a fictitious separatist group in the Rhineland, « Deutscher Kurzwellensender Atlantik») as the British imitation of a station for the German troops) , and jamming transmitters including some targeted at those just mentioned. This was done mostly with whistling and screeching noises to distort the transmissions, but also sometimes by interjecting words ; the best-known of the latter is probably the phrase that during the broadcast of Goebbels's 1943 New Year address loudly intoned on sets tuned to the Breslau transmitter the words « Stalingrad Massengrab » (Stalingrad's Mass Grave) .

In Germany, from 9 July 1940, all the « Reichssender » stations could broadcast only a single programme, with inserted regional slots ; by the autumn of 1942, the sequence and contents of this programme heard all over the « Reich » had been entirely standardized. Of its initially 21 hours a day transmission time, 13 hours were devoted to music, and the remaining 8 to speech radio. Every day of the week had its set pattern : for the evening hours, when a great many Germans were sitting down round the radio set, there was indeed a standardization that made it easy to get used to the programming - every day, the main news came on from 20h00 to 20h20, preceded by 1 hour of mainly military and political information in the form of reports from the front and talks about the situation, interspersed with music. From 20h20 to 22h00, there followed a block with light music. Classical music, as well as non-political speech programmes such as talks, plays, or literary items, were pushed to a marginal place in the programming. « Unser Schatzkästlein - Worte und Weisen aus ewigem deutschen Besitz » (Our Jewel Box, Words and Melodies from the Eternal German Treasure-house) , a popular evening programme before the War, was broadcast in a still relatively prominent place on Sundays from 9h00 to 10h00, a slot previously occupied by the church service. It featured « snippets of chamber music » , interspersed with verses from the Classics, aimed at cultivated middle-class listeners.

Jewish and modern authors or composers were already ruled-out as « decadent » , and Goebbels issued the dictum that « new, difficult works should not be put on the air » . As in other fields, the criteria according to which things were censored became more and more numerous as the War progressed. In September 1940, a list of « undesirable musical works » included :

1. All works by Jewish composers.

2. All works by Polish composers other than those of Frédéric Chopin.

3. All works whose composers came from enemy countries.

March 1942 saw the addition of works from the United States that had been published there. In late 1944, when Italy was no longer among Germany's allies, the propaganda ministry's weekly meeting on the radio programme had to grapple with the following request :

« A railway battalion has donated 10,000 " Reichsmarks " and is asking for the song : " Und abends auf der Heide ". This song is unfortunately banned, as the woman is an Italian and the rights are held by an American firm. The battalion should be written to asking them to choose something else. »

From March 1942, for 1 hour or 2 in the evening, an alternative to the « Reichssender » was offered by the « Deutschlandsender » station, as a concession to giving listeners a choice. They had, at least according to SD reports describing the state of affairs, been showing themselves more and more « indifferent » to the radio programme, which scared Goebbels into introducing sweeping reforms. These were aimed at making the programme as « assorted, varied, and colourful as possible », so as to keep both the troops and the civilians glued to the (German) station. Both the political and the entertainment parts of the radio programme were divided into various topics or kinds of music, and given heads to deal with each. Hans Hinkel had charge of entertainment, in February 1942, while overall responsibility for the « political and propaganda » side was in the hands of the previous head of the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda »'s press department, Hans Fritzsche, who after Hinkel moved to managing film, in mid-1944, took-over responsibility for the whole of radio programming.

Where content was concerned, these restructurings meant most of all a strengthening of « light entertainment ». Of the roughly 190 hours of programming each week, between December 1942 and January 1943 (including the dual programme), around 84 % (i.e., 160 hours) were devoted to the entertainment and artistic side, with around 16 % (a total of 30 broadcasts) going to politics and propaganda items. Some 130 hours of the entertainment part were given-over to light or serious music. Those in charge at the propaganda ministry hoped besides that the « carry-over effect » would come into play, and the enjoyable entertainment on offer would make the medium so interesting that listeners would not switch-off during the less interesting political and propaganda broadcasts. Here, there is a parallel with the « threefold » cinema experience : politics and entertainment became so closely interwoven as to be almost inseparable. The political part, in the strict meaning of the word, which even in the evening accounted for only 30 % on average, consisted of news bulletins, the official « Wehrmacht » report, the week's talks on political and military topics, the « Zeitspiegel » (Mirror of the Times), the eyewitness style reports from the front supplied by the army propaganda companies, together with the central items from the head propagandist himself : the « political and military talks » were broadcast 3 times a week with, each time, high-ranking representatives of the army, « Luftwaffe », and navy commenting on military matters. These commentaries, valued by the public as being accurate and knowledgeable, were given more and more extra airtime. With the « reports from the front », it was rather a matter of a more expressive, emotional presentation of « detail within a few minutes, as a kind of cameo : raids by torpedo-boats on a British convoy, an infantryman tackling Soviet tanks, a " sortie " by a fighter pilot in North Africa ». Particular military successes were presented in « special reports », introduced with a trumpet fanfare. Up-to-date air situation reports from listeners were slotted in. The « Zeitspiegel », especially, as one of the main political and propaganda broadcast genres, combined information with education, designed to mould opinion in a way interesting to the listener. Transmitted over half an hour, it consisted of 5 or 6 items each about 5 minutes long. These were drawn from the following subject areas : « Ideas about the “ Reich ” History - the “ NSDAP ” » ; « The German Countryside » ; « The German People » ; « Social Life » ; « The Economy, Technology, and Transport » ; « Science and Research » ; « Cultural Life » ; « Sport » ; « Geography from the Military Viewpoint » ; « The Mood at the Front » ; « The Front and Home » ; « Our Allies » ; « Comments on the “ Wehrmacht ” Report » ; and « Other Topics » . The most frequent area covered by reports from the home front was cultural life, with items on cultural weeks, meetings with poets, art exhibitions, Opera and theatre performances, films, and literature.

In view of an ever-increasing preponderance of women on the home front, the « Frauenfunk » (Radio for Women) had a special role to play. Here, the political contribution made by the female « Volksgenossen » , their part in the life and survival of the nation, was more and more identified with their role as shoppers. The « Frauenfunk » had become a main tool in the campaigns to guide consumption in the 1930's, and was even more so during the War. Other speech items, too, were given a War-time make-over ; for instance, the « Deutschlandsender » , on 26 May 1941, broadcast on its own wavelength a 10 minute play by the Denneberg Puppet Theatre with the title : « Kasperle zieht in den Krieg » (Little Casper Goes to War) .

At the start of the War, in the days of quick victories, it was the news bulletins and political broadcasts that were given the lion's share of the airtime. Reports of political successes were celebrated with a skilful use of trumpet fanfares and a feeling for choosing the right moment. As with the shaping of the « Wochenschau » , it was a matter, in the reporting, of condensing apparent eyewitness accounts, in time and space, in such a way that the actual location of the fighting became secondary and the emphasis was placed on the marching of the soldiers symbolizing the German advance. Very soon, however, the proportion of light music was increased, in line with Goebbels's maxims and, as a result of protests from listeners ; already, in 1940, it was back at over 60 % . Literary programmes or talks took a back-seat. There was « Music in the Morning » ; « Musical Pastime » ; the « Harbour Concert » ; « Pleasure in the Afternoon » ; « The German People's Concert » ; « Something for Everyone » ; « Radio Cheer for Young and Old » ; and so on. The framework for the programme was similar to that for the print media : as few long speech items as possible, no difficult allusions, no hunting songs, no U-boat songs, no merry Rhineland songs, unless relevant to current events. « Because of a letter from a listener » , Hinkel instructed the station that :

« No lyrics should be used that are likely to unsettle “ simple ” soldiers, such as : “ Warum soll ich treu sein, wie ein Reh so scheu sein ”. »

« Why should I be faithful, like a roe-deer be so shy. » , a hit song from the 1940 film, « Kora Terry » .

In the winter of 1941-1942, Goebbels had a new Orchestra formed, the « “ Reich ” Light Music Orchestra » , subsequently named the « German Dance and Light Music Orchestra » , which provided the model for the Radio Orchestras of post-War years. From 1 August 1942, it had its regular place in the schedule on Saturday evenings, with the title : « Melody and Rhythm » . The Orchestra's main purpose was to keep members of the armed forces happy, especially those in the « Luftwaffe » , by providing music « with a swing to it » . These troops had in growing numbers been choosing to listen to British radio stations out of dissatisfaction with what was on offer from the German music programme. The « Dance and Light Music Orchestra » was also to provide the public with an example of « German » jazz music. Making its own output happy and care-free also meant giving the listeners as little cause as possible to tune in to foreign stations. This involved making concessions to preferences and ideological compromises - which were hotly contested within the Party and among listeners. People were listening to « jazz », but it was announced as « lively rhythms ». During the War, the Nazi leadership lightly sacrificed a number of cultural maxims of National-Socialist ideology to public taste. The high-importance attached to radio entertainment, at this time of extreme stress, is clear from a decision taken by Goebbels, in 1944. After his decree of 24 August that year, Radio Orchestras were the only ones still performing. As the War went on, the problems worsened, as they did in the other 2 cultural sectors. Conscription led to staff shortages, many transmitters had to be shut down at night because of the air raids while others ceased operation entirely because they had been destroyed and spare parts were very hard to come by in the occupied territories. A meeting on radio matters, on 29 November 1944, was told that :

« The Munich broadcasting station cannot be kept going. Landshut in Lower-Bavaria is proposed as an alternative. Matters are the same at Saarbrücken. The order for dismantling has been given. The « Reichsender » has also evacuated its female staff. The technical equipment has been moved to « Neustadt an der Haardt » .

In connection with the problem of light dance music versus music of greater artistic value, a question which has been widely discussed among radio listeners, the « Reich » Superintendent and general director of the German Broadcasting Company, Heinrich Glasmeier (before 1933, he was an archivist in Westphalia) , declared that the radio broadcasting system has held to a healthy middle course, which it would continue to follow in the future.

« Reich » Superintendent Glasmeier sharply opposed the re-infiltration, by way of the « humorous » sketch, of the destructive Jewish spirit into the radio broadcasting system. We cannot have a situation in which the leaders of the movement extol the sacredness of marriage and the ethos of the German soldier, who must risk his life and blood for the Fatherland while, in the evening, these very values are insulted and ridiculed in « colorful » entertainment sketches with the corroding sarcasm of so-called variety programs. (Loud applause.)

Superintendent Glasmeier addressed an urgent appeal to his musical colleagues not to fall asleep at their desks, filing cabinets, and music cabinets, but to set forth on journeys of discovery in the field of German musical literature, to find unknown precious pearls, which can be transmitted to the German people, works of the past as well as works of contemporary creative artists.

At the conclusion of his discussion, Superintendent Glasmeier distinguished between the tasks of the « Reich » broadcasting stations and the tasks of the « Deutschlandsender » .

In the framework of the new cultural programming, Symphony and Opera broadcasts for the edification of listeners increasingly replaced stirring ideological broadcasts. Instead of continuing to emphasize the revolutionary aspects of National-Socialism, the radio now offered, among other things, all 9 of Beethoven's Symphonies, as well as the entire « Ring des Nibelungen » by Richard Wagner. The quality of both the performances and the sound reproduction was so high that such broadcasts were also picked-up by a series of foreign radio stations. But this over-emphasis on high-culture seemed too challenging to many listeners from the lower-classes. Before, these groups had primarily spoken-out against the dominance of partisan political broadcasts ; now, they rebelled against the music programs that were too demanding for their taste. And Josef Gœbbels, always concerned about having a large impact, lent a willing ear to these voices. In response, he had the share of light-music in the radio programming increased first to 60 % and, then, finally to 70 % , allotting only 5 % to broadcasts of so-called serious music.

This did put some noses out of joint - those of middle-class listeners who were fanatically concerned about education and those of « völkisch » minded cultural traditionalists. But it gave the broad masses he was always invoking the desired feeling of living in a very normal society where the stressful work day was always followed by some well-earned entertainment. Gœbbels commented, in 1936 :

The radio program must be configured so that it continues to interest the fastidious taste, yet, appears pleasing and understandable to tastes that are more unassuming. It should offer instruction, stimulation, relaxation, and entertainment in a mixture that is clever and psychologically astute. Special consideration should be given to relaxation and entertainment, because the vast majority of all radio listeners are treated harshly and unsparingly by life, and they have a right to find relaxation, in the few hours of rest and leisure available to them. In comparison, those few who want to be nourished solely by Kant and Hegel carry almost no weight. »

1 year later, Gœbbels even supported the trend toward rejecting all types of intellectual arrogance in programming even more strongly than before :

« What does Furtwängler think he's achieving with his 2,000 listeners in the concert-hall ? , he explained.

« What we need are the millions and, with the radio, we have them. »

Even after the beginning of World War II, this basic approach to radio programming changed very little. True, the program now included Franz Liszt's Symphonic poem « les Préludes » introducing proud reports of victory, but the non-committal tootling of light-music did not decrease for all that. On the contrary, as the state of the War worsened progressively after the fall of Stalingrad, in January 1943, music broadcasts intended to spread a mood of optimism grew substantially on a percentage basis. The musical request programs, often lasting 3 hours, played an important role with their Opera choruses ; melodies from Operettas ; folk songs ; carnival hits ; waltzes ; and military marches. They became more and more popular with soldiers at the front, as well as with approximately 50 % of the listeners on the home front as entertainment on evenings or Sundays. In addition, there were the many hits sung by popular favourites such as Zarah Leander, Hans Albers, and many others. They had catchy 1st lines such as :

« That isn't the end of the world » ; « I know a miracle will happen » , « That can't bother a sailor » , « We'll rock the baby right » , or « At home, at home, we'll see each other again » - all intended to promote a stiff upper-lip ethic that was finally revealed as meaningless at the end of April 1945, as one military defeat followed another.

Almost the same trends can be observed in the development of Nazi film production ; only, at the beginning, were there some obvious differences. The radio was already in government hands before the transfer of power to Adolph Hitler, so the new government could put it in the service of their own ideology without too great an effort, but the entire film industry was still in the private sector, in 1933. There were, therefore, substantial differences in the beginning in terms of how the employees of these 2 industries fared. In radio, Leftists and Jews were a tiny minority of the employees. There were also very few Leftists in the various film companies, but there were a great many Jews, who suddenly saw themselves marginalized. Well aware that they would not have any other professional opportunities under Hitler's thumb, there were approximately 800 directors, cameramen, and actors and actresses who left after the 3rd « Reich » was proclaimed on 30 January 1933, among them : Fritz Kortner, Fritz Lang, Max Ophüls, Otto Preminger, Billy Wilder, and Fred Zinnemann. Most of them, after brief stays in France, England, and the Netherlands, went to the United States and, in most cases, to Hollywood, as Marlene Dietrich did. Later, in their periodical « Der deutsche Film » , the Nazis claimed that, in the years preceding 1933, 70 % of all screen writers, 50 % of all directors, and 20 % of all owners of film production companies had been Jews ; these shocking percentages were cited with the intention of sharply underlining this supposedly deplorable state of affairs. These losses were a serious blow to the German film industry which, a short time before, had been justified in claiming to be the 2nd most important in the world after Hollywood. The half-Jew Fritz Lang, for example, was admired by the German-minded for his « Nibelungen » film (1924) , and Goebbels would have liked very much to keep him in Germany to be utilized as a director of Nazi fascist propaganda films, but Lang refused.

Goebbels established a separate Chamber for film in the process of creating the « Reich » Chambers of Culture, in late fall of 1933. Film had long been considered a low-genre, artistically speaking, and Goebbels liked to portray himself as a friend of the high-arts, so this very fact shows how important he believed film to be. As minister for propaganda, he had to pay particular attention to the lower-art forms that could more easily reach the so-called broad masses. While the educated middle-class preferred to continue attending the Theatre and the Opera, the lower-classes were attracted by the movies ; therefore, Goebbels tried to win-over these groups for the new regime right away through film as well as radio. He was well-aware that the workers who, at the time, made-up almost 50 % of the German population, had largely voted for the Social-Democrats or the Communists, before 1933. So he tried everything he could to appear as a « friend of the worker » despite his own educational background, and to offer them the cultural products with which he could help them to a new consciousness with a maximum of speed and suggestivity. And, for this purpose, the medium of film (along with radio) seemed most suitable to him.

The leadership of the NSDAP also paid considerable attention to the press. Goebbels established a « Reich » Press Chamber, on 15 November 1933, as one of the « Reich » Chambers of Culture and named Max Amann, head of the official Nazi publishing house, as its President. But within the politically influential mass-media, they did not attach the same importance to the press as they did to radio or film. They viewed newspapers, still primarily text-oriented at that time, as similar to books in requiring a more demanding and tedious reception process than the other 2 mass-media, which functioned primarily visually and acoustically. The newspaper had a monopoly on opinion formation in the public sphere, at the beginning of the Weimar Republic, but its importance had already gradually diminished in the course of the 1920's, due to the impact of radio and film on ever larger segments of the population. Toward the end of the Republic, bankruptcy threatened even some of the newspapers that had previously flourished such as the « Berliner Tageblatt », and that ended their political influence. Even Nazi newspapers such as the « Völkischer Beobachter », the « Freiheitskampf », « Der Stürmer », and « Der Angriff » felt the impact of this problem so that, after 1933, the Party leadership no longer attached the same importance to them as they had at the beginning.

Göebbels considered « Der Angriff », which he had founded in 1927, as his personal newspaper, and he wrote innumerable lead articles for it. But, after his appointment as Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, his interest in the newspaper, which continued to appear, diminished. By May 1933, he agreed to its transformation into the « Tageszeitung der Deutschen Arbeitsfront » and continued to write occasional articles only for the « Völkischer Beobachter » and the weekly « Das Reich ». This lack of interest was not only the result of the increasing dominance of the audio-visual mass-media ; it was also linked to the NSDAP's striving for respectability after its official assumption of power, on 30 January 1933. In the late- 1920's, when the Nazi fascists were still considered revolutionary, their newspapers had been unabashed propaganda organs but, now, many of the leaders were struggling to give the new regime the appearance of having greater prestige. Nevertheless, they were not willing to give-up any media with propaganda potential, so they tried to bring newspaper publishing under their control. They were somewhat more broad-minded here, than in other areas. They even wanted to offer the status of honorary Aryan to the Jew Hans Lachmann Mosse, the owner of the internationally known « Berliner Tageblatt », and to his Jewish chief editor Theodor Wolff, as well if the 2 had been willing to continue managing the paper - of course omitting all comments critical of the regime. But both Lachmann Mosse and Wolff declined the offer, which had originated with Hermann Göring, and did not return to Berlin from exile. Because of the paper's international prestige, the Ministry for Propaganda simply allowed it to continue publishing, albeit under Aryan management, finally shutting it down on 31 January 1939.

Many other newspapers of the Weimar Republic were able to continue appearing after 1933, among them the « Frankfurter Zeitung » (characterized by Alfred Rosenberg as « boursianic ») , the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , the « Kölnische Zeitung » , the « Vossische Zeitung » , and the « BZ am Abend » . Only Leftist papers such as « Vorwärts » , the « Rote Fahne » , and the « Arbeiter-Illustrierte Zeitung aller Länder » were forbidden. Of course, all who worked for the newspapers that continued to appear, as well as their owners, had to become members of the « Reich » Press Chamber and produce an Aryan certificate. They also saw their editors forced to emphasize national ascendancy at all times. And in addition, the Party authorities insisted that they give-up 2 attitudes that had predominated until now in the bourgeois Jewish press : 1st, the sense of personal involvement that had its basis in the « rootlessness of subjective individual interests » and, 2nd, and in contradiction to the 1st, they were to ignore the commandment of « new objectivity » , as the director of the « Reich » Broadcasting Company Eugen Hadamovsky explained in 1933. From now on, every journalist should feel they were 1st and foremost member of a national community and give expression to that feeling in their reports. But beyond that, not too many serious demands were made of this profession during the mid 1930's.

When it became important to spread a mood of optimism during World War II, newspaper editors too were given the task of writing articles that would cheer people up. In the wake of this reversal, the Propaganda Ministry stipulated that words, such as « retreat » or « catastrophe », should be replaced by cleverly obfuscating euphemisms. But, as I said before, a certain limited pluralism was preserved until the end of the 3rd « Reich » in the press, as in the publishing industry and in magazines such as « Das Innere Reich ». Despite relentless attacks on the Semitic evil, published in Julius Streicher's « Der Stürmer », even the weekly newspaper of the Jews of Berlin was able to continue publishing until the middle of 1941. In its final issues, you can still find ads by people seeking a marriage partner, which shows how resigned members of this group had become to the prevailing conditions and how they were trying to get along for better or for worse. But just a short time later, they were forced to recognize, appalled, that they no longer had any options for continuing to live in the 3rd « Reich ». Many of their Aryan fellow citizens, on the other hand, had been relieved of most of the routine dirty work by hundreds of thousands of foreign workers and prisoners of War. As their hope for a victorious end to the hostilities gradually disappeared after 1943, these people declared cynically :

« Enjoy the War ; the peace will be terrible. »

Die Reichsrundfunkkammer war eine Institution im Deutschen Reich, die die Aufgabe hatte, mit den Mitteln des Rundfunks die Gleichschaltung der Gesellschaft während der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus voranzutreiben. Sie wurde 1933 als eine der sieben Abteilungen der Reichskulturkammer gegründet.

Die Reichsrundfunkkammer hatte den Zweck, « dem Willen des Führers » zu dienen und « das ganze Volk mit dem Rundfunk zu durchdringen, um Staatsführung und Volksgemeinschaft zu einer geschlossenen Einheit zu machen » .

Präsident der Reichsrundfunkkammer war Horst Dreßler-Andreß, als Vizepräsident wurde der Reichssendeleiter Eugen Hadamovsky ernannt.

1939 wurde die Reichsrundfunkkammer aufgelöst und ihre Aufgaben an die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft übertragen.

Eine der sieben Kammern der Reichskulturkammer ; gegründet als Körperschaft des öffentlichen Rechts am 1. November 1933 durch die « 1. Verordnung zur Durchführung des Reichskulturkammergesetzes » ; hervorgegangen aus der am 3. Juli 1933 von Reichssendeleiter Hadamovsky gegründeten « Nationalsozialistischen Rundfunkkammer eingetragener Verein » . Josef Goebbels' Ziel einer in der Reichsrundfunkkammer herzustellenden « Rundfunkeinheit » erwies sich allerdings bald als illusorisch : Industrie und Handel der Radiobranche beanspruchte das Wirtschaftsministerium, so daß sie am 19. März 1934 wieder aus der Reichsrundfunkkammer ausschieden ; die Hörerverbände lösten sich auf. Die Kammer war 1937 in fünf Abteilungen gegliedert : Verwaltung, Propaganda, Wirtschaft und Technik, Recht und Kultur. Die am 3. September 1935 errichtete Fachschaft Rundfunk erfasste alle Mitarbeiter vom Intendanten und Sendeleiter bis zum Tonmeister und Ansager. Eine Berufsausübung ohne Mitgliedschaft war nicht möglich. Präsident war 1933-1937 Horst Dreßler-Andreß, Mai 1937 - 1939 Hans Kriegler, beide zugleich in Personalunion Leiter der Abteilung III (Rundfunk) im Propagandaministerium und des Rundfunks der NSDAP ; Vizepräsident : Eugen Hadamovsky, Geschäftsführer : 1933-1935 Bernhard Knust, 1935-1939 Herbert Packebusch. Die Reichsrundfunkkammer war maßgeblich beteiligt an Entwicklung, Propagierung und Verkauf des Volksempfängers. Sie wurde am 28. Oktober 1939 von Gœbbels aufgelöst, ihre Einzelmitglieder wurden der Musik-, Theater- oder Schrifttumskammer zugeteilt.

Hans Kriegler, the President of the « Reichsrundfunkkammer » (the « Reich » Broadcasting Chamber) , from May 1937 to 1939, recommended an improved royalty system for radio-plays, whereby writers would receive fixed residuals for all rebroadcasts of their works. Plans for such a system were seconded, at the time, by « Reichsrundfunkintendant » Doctor Heinrich Glasmeier, who believed that the lack of uniformity in the amounts stations paid for radio-plays was keeping away many potential authors. Such fluctuations show-up in the few broadcasting contracts available for Günter Eich's texts. His honoraria ranged from a low of 150 « Reichsmarks » for a relatively short-piece (« Schritte zu Andreas ») to a high of 900 « Reichsmarks » (for the « Weizenkantate ») , which was quite extraordinary compared to the average radio-play honorarium of only 500 « Reichsmarks » , but very unimpressive when one considers that, at the time, a talented author could earn as much as 80,000 « Reichsmarks » for a successful play, up to 30,000 « Reichsmarks » for a film script, or 10,000 « Reichsmarks » for a novel.

The fact that Glasmeier was reviewing the honorarium problem, at this date, and that Kriegler, a member of the NSDAP elite who, in 1938, held the dual offices of « Reichsrundfunkkammer » President and head of the Propaganda Ministry's Section III for Radio, had taken the initiative to produce « Das Hörspielbuch » strongly suggests that the 1938 campaign to promote the radio-play was sanctioned by the broadcasting system's highest authority, Josef Gœbbels. So much can be gathered from an SD report on a conference in June 1938, in which Gœbbels, his adjunct Karl Hanke, and clumsy « Reichssendeleiter » Eugen Hadamovsky discussed the complete revision of the structure of cultural and political broadcasts. The main directive issuing from this meeting was that « Wortsendungen » (i.e. , radio-plays, narratives, etc.) , which had been « totally neglected » until then should be made more prominent in programming. The report's most interesting feature is the reason given for this directive, since it makes Gœbbels' inherent aversion to the genre clear. The report states that, already before Christmas of 1937, Gœbbels had ordered that the radio-play be eliminated from the program :

« Es sollten in Zukunft Hörspiele möglichst gar nicht oder nur in ganz beschränktem Maße zur Sendung gelangen. Der Hauptwert sei auf musikalische Darbietungen zu legen. »

This directive apparently resulted in a decrease in radio-play broadcasts during the 1st half of 1938. The report goes on to state, however, that Gœbbels was moved by complaints from listener circles to re-instate such programs. Thus, at least until developments following the outbreak of War, changed his attitude, Gœbbels granted the radio-play a reprieve.

The strength of the listener protest against the cut-back in radio-play programming can be gauged by the findings of a survey conducted in the summer of 1939, which indicated just how popular the genre was with the German audience. The radio-journal « Deutsche Radio-Illustrierte » asked listeners to choose their favourite program type(s) from a list of 17 choices. An 18th slot was left open for special wishes. To the surprise of many, the radio-play made a very strong showing in the overall ratings : it was among the top 33 % of favourite programs. And a breakdown of the listeners' programming tastes, according to their occupations, showed that radio-dramas appealed to 1 out of every 2 listeners. Among 14 professional categories ranging from manual laborer to merchant, the rating remained fairly constant. Popularity fluctuated from a high of 61.3 % with housewives to a low of 40.2 % with servicemen and members of the compulsory labor service (« Reichsarbeitsdienst ») . The average preference for the « Hörspiel » in all professions came within hundredths of 1 % of exactly 50 % . Such broad appeal was sure to impress propagandists, for among the 10 most frequently chosen program types, which were almost all musical, the radio-play lent itself particularly well to the manipulation of public opinion. Those categories presenting the Nazis' distorted views of news and current events, the « Aktuelle Kurzberichte » and « Gestaltete Hörberichte » , were chosen less than half as often as the radio-play.

Just prior to this survey, the radio-play had demonstrated its effectiveness in shaping public opinion in the series « Der Krieg im Dunkeln » , broadcast from Berlin during the regime's secret preparations for War.

Conductor Siegmund von Hausegger has been described as « a prominent supporter of the Nazi regime » who, in 1934, conducted the Munich Philharmonic in a special concert « intended as the 88's art manifesto » . Erik Levi depicts a musical culture in which increasing emphasis, after 1933, was placed on what was perceived as the solid German tradition Bruckner was believed to represent, as opposed to the « decadence » of the Weimar era. Broadcasting also helped to give his work a higher profile.

For details of the 1st broadcast cycle of 1932-1933, see : August Gollerich and Max Auer : Volume 4 / Chapter 4, page 117. Shortly afterwards, 2 of the conductors - Otto Klemperer, who conducted Bruckner's Symphony No. 5, and Bruno Walter, who conducted Bruckner's Symphony No. 9, in the Orel edition, would be refugees. Fritz Busch who conducted Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 would follow them voluntarily into exile.

Although Richard Strauß conducted Bruckner's 9th Symphony in Salzburg, in 1906, and the 7th in Buenos Aires, in 1923, he did not like the music. Bruckner's mystical religiosity was an anathema to a man of Strauß's non-beliefs (which makes it all the more surprising that he praised Edward Elgar's « The Dream of Gerontius ») . Writing in 1904, to an author who wished to write a book about Bruckner, in a series Strauß edited, Strauß said :

« I admit that every form of piety is so disagreeable to me that I cannot be fair even to its most naive expression. Since I sincerely admire the melodist Bruckner, I am willing to be quiet and retain an unbelieving smile when one crowns his primitive counterpoint stutterings with the title of Mastership. »

In a letter to Emil von Rezníček, written in March 1935, Strauß wrote :

« The boring farmer's music of the good old Anton seems to me to be completely superfluous : “ Te Deum, wenn aus ist, benamst ! ” » (« “ Te Deum ”, praise God when it's over ! »)

See : Günter Brosche. « Richard Strauß und Anton Bruckner » , in : « Richard-Strauß-Blätter » , No. 12, Vienna (December 1978) ; pages 27-29.

For some, a lingering unease attends the fact that Bruckner was singled-out for promotion by the new regime. But the Nazi misappropriation of Bruckner is due more to a series of historical accidents than because any aspect of his life or work connects him to the regime and its ideology. Bruckner had originated from the same « Gau » (Nazi-era administrative region) as Adolf Hitler, and he was also associated with a venue, Saint-Florian, which was both historic and photogenic inviting for a regime always seeking to legitimize itself by co-opting Germanic tradition - and had even contrived to monumentalize his own remains, unwittingly initiating a funerary sub-culture. His music seemed to embody a mythic dimension absent from the work of the sober North German Johannes Brahms, and while Brahms's appeal was universal, the then limited reception of Bruckner's music outside the German-speaking world made it easier to represent Bruckner as a composer who addressed himself specifically to ethnic Germans. He was also closely associated with Hitler's favourite composer, Richard Wagner, an accusation that could not be levelled against Brahms.

While the idea of a « Bruckner-Festspielhaus » in Saint-Florian was by no means new, Hitler's ideas went further, as Josef Gœbbels remarked :

« Drive to Saint-Florian. To the monastery where Bruckner used to compose. What a beautiful Baroque building. We intend to turn the priests out of here and found a Music College and a home for the Bruckner Society. A marvellous plan (Hitler) intends to establish a centre of culture here. As a counter-weight to Vienna, which will have to be gradually phased-out of the picture. He intends to make alterations to Saint-Florian at his own expense. »

The monastery was to become a « House of Culture » and the great « Bruckner Organ » was to be used « in the service of the people » , meaning that it was to assist in the ritualization of Nazi Party activities. In the words of Heinrich Kronsteiner :

« The Bruckner Organ in Saint-Florian was the prototype of all the organs in the Upper-Danube District and, indeed, in all Austria, and one saw it already becoming a secular rather than a religious instrument. »

The « Reich » 's best-known organists were called upon to display their prowess on this iconic instrument and, in the 1937 “ Bruckner-Blätter ”, Friedrich Hogner duly described « the 1st Upper-Danube Organ Competition in the form of displays of improvisation on given themes on the Bruckner Organ in Saint-Florian, near Linz, under the auspices of the “ Gauleiters ” and “ Reichsstathalters ” and in association with the National-Socialist “ Strength Through Joy ” Association » .

Despite War-time demands on resources, a new Orchestra was founded, the « Bruckner-Orchester Sankt Florian des Großdeutschen Rundfunks ». No effort or expense was spared. Georg-Ludwig Jochum (the brother of Eugen Jochum) was engaged as principal conductor, and guest conductors included Carl Schuricht, Joseph Keilberth and the young Herbert von Karajan. The repertoire ranged from Antonio Vivaldi to Zoltán Kodály but inevitably centred on a high-profile Bruckner cycle.

Much of the ritual attending the Bruckner cult practised in Saint-Florian, at this time, bears the stamp of the senior official on the scene, « Reichsintendant » Heinrich Glasmeier, a fanatical Hitlerite and a devout Catholic who, in a previous posting, had attended High-Mass at Cologne Cathedral in the uniform of an « SS Obersturmführer ». Glasmeier's style is evident in the dedication ceremony held to inaugurate the year-long training programme that began on 1 April 1943. 2 days later the players, escorted by torch-bearing uniformed SS men, assembled in the crypt for a special wreath-laying ceremony, at which Glasmeier addressed the sarcophagus, swearing allegiance to Adolf Hitler. On the following day, 4 April 1943, Hitler himself paid a surprise visit and, he too, descended into the crypt to commune with Anton Bruckner's remains.

A similar ceremony inaugurated the « Bruckner-Chor Sankt Florian », on 9 May 1944, as double bass player Fritz Westermann described in a letter to his wife. While the Bruckner Organ played overhead, choir members descended to the crypt, where Glasmeier gave the « German greeting » over Bruckner's coffin, members of the SS, carrying lighted torches, standing on either side. The flickering torchlight played over the thousands of skulls ; all too reminiscent of Heinrich Himmler's rites in the Wewelsburg. (Westermann's description of the scene as « very interesting » is somehow inadequate.) The Bruckner Orchestra, now renamed the « Linz Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester », was one of the few Orchestras allowed to remain active following Josef Gœbbels's declaration of « Total War », in August 1944.

The need to ritualize Bruckner's work coincided with a fashion for performances in cathedral acoustics, Saint-Florian presenting itself as the ideal Bruckner space. The connection between architecture, ambience, and interpretative approach was made explicit by Heinrich Hofer in the « Völkische Beobachter », reviewing Herbert von Karajan's July 1944 performance of the 8th Symphony given in Saint-Florian monastery by the Bruckner Orchestra :

« Here, in the solemn, devotional space of the church, between the starkly laid-out altar and the towering rows of organ pipes, the meaning of Bruckner's musical architecture became particularly evident. The boldly arching and clearly delineated structural elements of the space call for monumental music (directed by Karajan) filled the space by grandly letting the music breathe, making it exert great serenity of spiritual introversion. »

This culmination of the cycle, and of the Bruckner Orchestra's activity, was a performance of the 9th Symphony under Wilhelm Furtwängler (on 11 October 1944, the anniversary of Bruckner's death) . Furtwängler later recalled this performance as exceptional (the 1st violins included the young Reinhold Barchet, later a soloist with the Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra and founder of the prestigious Barchet Quartets) :

« Given in the last and worst phase of this unholy War. »

We need not, however, assume that it was exceptionally slow, certainly not if Furtwängler's live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, recorded only 4 days previously, is anything to go by. Even Karajan's 8th was praised for « not over-stretching the tempi » , and acetates of Hans Weisbach conducting the « Großes Orchester des Reichssenders Leipzig » in the sketches for the Finale of the 9th Symphony, edited by Fritz Öser and recorded for German Radio, in October 1940, reveal an approach that is dignified and stately rather than ponderous. Contemporary recordings vary hugely in terms of interpretative approach, with surprisingly rapid tempi from Wilhelm Furtwängler and Oswald Kabasta warning against assumptions concerning an approved « Nazizeit » interpretative approach to Bruckner. Nor does anyone seem to have been concerned when Hans Knappertsbusch, who remained loyal all his life to the 1st published editions, conducted the Bruckner-Orchester in the 4th Symphony (the edition is not identified in the favourable « Linzer Tagespost » review) . But there may be more substance to the argument that Haas's later editions, in their elevation of instinct over scholarship, show the influence of Nazi thinking.

Erik Levi has shown how Richard Wagner's writings had given credibility to a specifically Nazi ideology that expressed itself in simplistic polarities : German-Jewish, rural-urban, honest-sophisticated, intellectual-intuitive. One can see how the rustic, unsophisticated, inspired, non-intellectual Bruckner could have been slotted into these stereotypes, and one can also see how Robert Haas's editions of Symphonies Nos. 2, 7 and 8, in which scholarship yields to a mystical-spiritual identification with the composer's imaginative world, were very much products of their time. 6 weeks after the « Anschluß » of March 1938 (which coincided with the completion of Haas's version of the 2nd Symphony) , Haas presented a « Report on the Collected Edition of Anton Bruckner's Works » , which he « dedicated to the German people and to our " Führer " Adolf Hitler » . He added :

« There were always battles to be fought in public since every performance was accompanied by the same abuse, lies, and defamation by the Jewish press that, in his own time, Bruckner, the Master, also had to endure. »

Readers familiar with the post-War 1948 preface to Haas' edition of the 8th Symphony will be brought-up short by the concluding passage of his original 1939 preface :

« As for the significance of the content of the 8th, let the 'German Michaël' mythos be briefly thought of here, in which Bruckner became wondrously absorbed after 1885. Its transfiguration is the Finale with the mystico-technical contrapuntal device of combining the 4 themes of the Symphony at the end. The meaning of this mythos, as an attitude of mind, seems to me to be realized in the concept of the Greater Germany. It is a sign from Providence that the restored score could ring-out precisely in this year, as a greeting from the " Ostmark " . »

As the official term for Austria in the 3rd « Reich » , Ostmark has become associated with that era, but the name was long-established, and appears in the text of Bruckner's 1882 « Volkslied » . Haas' attempt to represent the transfiguration of the « German Michaël » motif, at the end of the Symphony, as an assertion of transcendent pan-Germanic identity now seems both bizarre and slightly pathetic, but it is consistent with the nebulous exaltation of any aspect of Bruckner's work that could be made to bear nationalist overtones then prevalent. A similar tendency was adumbrated, in equally nebulous terms, by Amalie Klose, to whom Bruckner had played the Scherzo of the 8th on his elderly « Bösendorfer » piano, around 1889, asking her :

« Can you hear Michel, can you hear his little horn ? (“ Hören's den Michel, hören's sein Hörndl ? ”) In answer to my question, he said that this Michel represented the essential German character (“ der Urtypus des Deutschen ”) . I saw and heard the Master in the full joy of creation ; at the same time, I also saw with enriched (“ gereifterem ”) understanding, that, in this so familiar “ Michel ” , lay the quintessence of the spirit of the People, directly experienced and brought to realization by the essentially German (“ kerndeutsche ”) Upper-Austrian, Anton Bruckner. »

But neither this statement, or Bruckner's comment to Theodor Helm that « the Austrian-German (character) is intended » (« Der Michl ist der österreich. Deutsche gemeint ») , amounts to being « wondrously absorbed » in a « Teutonic mythos » . The « Upper-Austrian Anton Bruckner » had no problems with identifying himself as « essentially German » , in strictly ethnic terms, but his sense of identity was a product of his own, very different, era.

The rise of nationalism in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which culminated in the 1870 « Ausgleich » , had led to a new awareness of German ethnicity among German Austrians. This pride in Germanic culture was part of the male-voice Choral Society ethos ; the 1883 « Sängerbund » was praised, for example, because « its powerful chords sealed the vow of everlasting faithfulness to German song in every phrase of the destiny of the German people » , and it is, therefore, not surprising to find assertions of Germanic identity in several of the texts set by Bruckner. But there is no evidence that Bruckner felt that these assertions need, in any way, be incompatible with fidelity to the Austrian crown he served in the Vienna « Hofkapelle » . In the words of the chorus « Laßt Jubeltb'ne laut erklingen » , from around 1854 :

« God protect Austria's double eagle, and hear our pious prayer : protect our noble ruling couple, Franz-Josef and Elisabeth. »

The text is a complacent expression of safe, traditional values (with music to match) .

Bruckner was also known for his tolerance and friendship with Jews. According to Oberleithner,⁷⁸ Bruckner appears to have found the word « Jew » uncomfortably direct, preferring the more respectful term « the Israelite gentlemen » (« Die Herren Israeliten ») ; he explicitly denied an accusation of anti-Semitism made by a contemporary newspaper, and made a point of telling Königstein that :

« I have nothing against the Israelite gentlemen. »

His aversion to Jews differed from the indiscriminate hatred of the anti-Semites, in that on account of his true and deep piety he changed this feeling into profound compassion.

But the comment reveals more about August Göllerich, a man who was barred from giving a speech at Bruckner's doctoral award ceremony because of his anti-Semitic views, than about Bruckner. There is no evidence for any « aversion to Jews' on Bruckner's part. There are no anti-Semitic references in his letters, and no anti-Semitic remarks are attributed to him. One can hardly equate his sorrowful approach to a Jewish student :

« Tell me, do you really think that the “ Messiah ” has not come ? »

Or his unguarded 1st reaction to his friend and benefactor Carl Almeroth's suggestion that he sit for one of the apostles in Fritz von Uhde's painting of « The Last Supper » (« Das Abendmahl » , 1886) :

« But I'm not Jewish ! » , with the outpourings of Richard Wagner, recorded by Cosima in her diary on an almost daily basis (entries began in January 1869, just as Wagner was revising « Das Judentum in der Musik ») .

It would be a grave injustice to blame Bruckner for the Nazi appropriation of his work ; but the appropriation would nevertheless continue to the very end, when the Adagio of the 7th Symphony was played on German radio following the announcement of Adolf Hitler's death.

Doktor der Philosophie Heinrich Glasmeier, Kavallerieoffizier des ersten Weltkrieges, glühender Patriot und begeisterter Cimber, treibende Kraft beim Bau des Bootshauses und beim Kauf des Cimbernhauses 1919, mitreißender Festredner, Direktor des westfälischen Adelsarchivs. Seit 1932 wandte er sich der Partei Hitlers zu, wurde Gaukulturwart und Gaugeschäftsführer der Partei zu Münster und machte, nachdem er 1933 von Himmler persönlich in die SS aufgenommen worden war, eine steile Karriere bis hin zum « Reichsintendanten des großdeutschen Rundfunks » . Seit Frühjahr 1945 ist er als SS-Oberführer (Generalmajor) im Kampf gegen die Rote Armee, in dem er vermutlich den Freitod suchte, in Österreich verschollen.

Heinrich Glasmeier (geboren 5. März 1892 in Dorsten ; gestorben vermutlich 4. Mai 1945 bei Linz / Österreich) wirkte als umtriebiger Archivar im Münsterland und hat sich vor allem um die Privatarchive des westfälischen Adels verdient gemacht. Der an der Universität Münster Glasmeier entwickelte sich zu einem überzeugten Nationalsozialisten, war Geschäftsführer des NSDAP-Gaues Westfalen-Nord und Gau-Kulturwart. Im Jahr 1933 wurde er von Reichspropagandaminister Josef Gœbbels zum Rundfunkintendanten des Westdeutschen Rundfunks in Köln (dem heutigen WDR) bestellt und war später der erste (und in der deutschen Mediengeschichte einzige) « Reichsrundfunkintendant » . Anfang der 1940er Jahren baute er nahe Linz im ehemaligen Chorherren-Stift Sankt Florian für die Nazis Produktionsstätten des « großdeutschen und europäischen Rundfunks » auf. Von Hitler mit mit großzügigen Mitteln ausgestattet, pflegte er dort das Andenken des Komponisten Anton Bruckner und gründete das Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester. Wenige Tage vor Kriegsende beging Heinrich Glasmeier wahrscheinlich Suizid mit einer Handgranate in seinem Auto.

Heinrich Glasmeier (geboren 5. März 1892 in Dorsten ; gestorben vermutlich 4. Mai 1945 bei Linz / Österreich) war ein deutscher Rundfunkintendant und Funktionär des NS-Rundfunkwesens.

Heinrich Glasmeier war der Sohn der Kaufmanns Bernhard Glasmeier. Er studierte ab 1911 in Münster und München Germanistik, Geschichte, Philosophie und Archivwissenschaft, trat dabei in die katholischen Studentenvereine Cimbria Münster und Saxonia München im Kartellverband katholischer deutscher Studentenvereine KV ein.

Ab 1913 arbeitete Glasmeier als Archivar in Münster bei der Familie der Grafen von Merveldt. Im Ersten Weltkrieg war er Offizier und war nach Kriegsende an der Niederwerfung des Ruhraufstandes beteiligt. 1920 betreute er in Dülmen das Archiv der Herzöge von Croÿ und von 1922 bis 1933 das Gesamtarchiv der Grafen von Landsberg in Velen. Ab 1923 war er außerdem Archivdirektor der Vereinigten Westfälischen Adelsarchive und ab 1927 nebenberuflich Leiter der Archivberatungsstelle der Provinz Westfalen. Seine 1926 in Münster eingereichte Promotionsschrift, « die eher einer katholisch-theologischen Streitschrift glich, die die Unmoral der Gesellschaft geißeln wollte, als einer ernsthaften wissenschaftlichen Untersuchung » , wurde von der Fakultät gutgeheißen.

Glasmeier war von Opportunismus und naiver Gläubigkeit gekennzeichnet und glaubte als überzeugter Nationalsozialist blind an Adolf Hitler. 1932 trat er in die NSDAP ein und wurde Geschäftsführer des NSDAP-Gaus Westfalen-Nord sowie « Gaukulturwart » . Glasmeier war Mitglied der SS. Bei der Gleichschaltung der Studentenverbände und somit auch des KV trat Glasmeier den Posten als Beisitzer des Führungsrats des KV an, denn er war das einzige Verbandsmitglied mit einem höheren Parteiamt in der NSDAP. Die Mitgliedschaft in der NSDAP sollte aufgrund eines Beschlusses des KV an sich nicht möglich sein.

Auf Veranlassung des Propagandaministers Josef Goebbels wurde Glasmeier 1933 als Nachfolger des entlassenen und verhafteten Ernst Hardt zum Intendanten des Westdeutschen Rundfunks in Köln ernannt. Die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft RRG lobte die Berufung Glasmeiers zum Intendanten, denn als Archivar habe er seine « nationalsozialistische Grundanschauung von Blut und Boden » gezeigt.

1937 wurde er Reichsintendant des gesamtdeutschen Rundfunks und Generaldirektor der Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft.

Im Sommer 1942 zog er nach Linz in das von den Nazis aufgelöste Stift Sankt Florian der Augustinerchorherren, um dort eine Produktionsstätte des « großdeutschen und europäischen Rundfunks » aufzubauen. Diese Idee fand die Unterstützung von Hitler. Glasmeier konnte aufgrund großzügiger Geldzuwendungen das Kloster renovieren und im Andenken an Anton Bruckner, der Organist an Sankt Florian gewesen war und dort auch begraben ist, ein Brucknerorchester mit Chor gründen, das mehr als 100 Mitglieder zählte. Die Konzerte dieses Orchesters wurden von Wilhelm Furtwängler, Herbert von Karajan, Karl Böhm und Eugen Jochum dirigiert. Im November 1943 war Glasmeier als Bevollmächtigter des Reichspropagandaministers Goebbels im besetzten Frankreich.

Seit dem 30. Januar 1943 war Glasmeier Inhaber des Goldenen Parteiabzeichens der NSDAP.

Am 4. Mai 1945 flüchtete Glasmeier vor den anrückenden US-Truppen und ist seitdem verschollen. Abweichend von dieser Darstellung gibt Ernst Klee den 31. Januar 1945 als Todesdatum an.

Zu einer der schillernden Persönlichkeiten der nationalsozialistischen Zeit entwickelte sich der Dorstener Apothekersohn Doktor der Philosophie Heinrich Glasmeier, ein gelernter Archivar, der sich vor 1933 in der westfälischen Adelsgeschichte und im Heimatbund betätigte. Nach 1933 wurde er Reichsrundfunkintendant und Leiter des Bruckner-Stifts Sankt Florian bei Linz. Dorthin zog er sich vor Kriegsende zurück und suchte beim Herannahen sowjetischer Truppen den Freitod an der Front, als diese schon unmittelbar vor seinem Chorherren-Stift verlief. Der Dorstener Heinrich Glasmeier gilt seither als verschollen. Zwischen seiner Pennälerzeit auf dem Gymnasium Petrinum und seinem ruhmlosen Verschwinden lagen Jahre steten und steilen Aufstiegs im braunen Führerstaat.

Kein Zugang zur demokratischen Gesellschaftsordnung

Heinrich Glasmeier war NSDAP-Wahlkämpfer, Hitler-Fahrer, Stadtverordneter von Münster, Mitglied des Provinziallandtags, Reichsintendant des Deutschen Rundfunks, Generaldirektor des Reichsinstituts des Deutschen Rundfunks (später Reichsrundfunk-Gesellschaft = RRG), « Beauftragter des Führers » und schließlich SS-Hauptsturmführer. Er wurde am 5. März 1892 in Dorsten geboren. Bis etwa 1919 besaßen seine Eltern an der Lippestraße eine Drogerie (später Bonato). 1911 machte er das Abitur, studierte in München und Münster und promovierte 1926. Bereits 1913 wurde er gräflich-merveldt'scher Archivar. Als Kriegsfreiwilliger diente er von 1914 bis 1918 bei den 8. Husaren und beteiligte sich danach in Freiwilligenverbänden an der Niederwerfung der Spartakisten und Roten Armee im Ruhrgebiet. Wieder friedlich geworden, nahm er 1923 eine Stelle im gräflich-landsberg'schen Archiv an, wurde ein Jahr später Archivdirektor der Vereinigten Westfälischen Adelsarchive und betätigte sich ab 1926 im Nebenamt als Leiter der Archivberatungsstelle der Provinz Westfalen.

Zur demokratischen Gesellschaftsordnung der Weimarer Republik fand Glasmeier keinen Zugang. Den fand er zu seinen Hobbys : Reiten und Rassenkunde. Als Archivar gab er mehrere heimatkundliche Schriften heraus und verfasste Aufsätze in der Fachliteratur.

NSDAP-Parteiredner und Fahrer des Führers

Als Mitglied des Deutschvölkischen Schutz- und Trutzbundes trat er im Februar 1932 der NSDAP bei (Mitglied Nummer 891.960) und avancierte bald zum Gaukulturwart und Gaugeschäftsführer beim NSDAP-Gau Westfalen-Nord. Zudem half er als SS-Führer mit, die SS-Organisation in Westfalen aufzubauen. Während der für die NSDAP so entscheidenden Lippischen Landtagswahlen hatte Heinrich Glasmeier als Hitlers Fahrer das ihn für die Zukunft prägende « Führererlebnis » . Glasmeier machte sich auch als Partei-Redner für die NSDAP sehr verdient, so daß die Partei ihn nach der Machtübernahme mit der Intendanz des Westdeutschen Senders Köln (heute WDR) belohnte. Seine landesgeschichtlichen Arbeiten, so lobte die Reichsrundfunk-Gesellschaft ihn in einem Artikel am 30. März 1933, entsprächen den « Forderungen der nationalsozialistischen Grundanschauung von Blut und Boden » . Glasmeier liebte paramilitärisches Gepränge und schlug bei seinem ersten Auftreten in Köln einen entsprechenden Ton an. Bewährte Rundfunk-Mitarbeiter, die dem Zentrum nahe standen, setzte er sofort und rigoros an die Luft. Doktor Wilhelm Tigges erinnerte sich. Zu ihm sagte er in soldatischer Kürze :

« Sie sind politisch unzuverlässig. Räumen Sie sofort den Arbeitsplatz, und verlassen Sie das Haus binnen 20 Minuten. »

Angesichts Glasmeiers totaler NS-Ideologie ist nachstehende « Geheime Meldung » der Staatspolizei vom 4. Juli 1935 an die Reichsführung SS ein Kuriosum :

« Betreff : Intendant Doktor Glasmeier - Köln Vorgebirgstraße : siehe auch hies. B. Nummer 98761351K vom 4.7.35
Siehe Nach Mitteilung eines V-Mannes soll seit kurzem eine neue SS-Wache für den Reichssender Köln vom Reichsführer-SS nach Köln gesandt worden sein, die unmittelbar der Reichsführung unterstehen und ebenfalls ihre Wachberichte nach Berlin geben soll. Führer der Wache ist ein SS-Untersführer Nehls von der 6. SS-Standarte. Nach dessen Aussage, die er aufrecht erhalten will, hat Glasmeier zu ihm sinngemäß etwa folgendes gesagt :

« Sie kommen aus Berlin, sind mit den Verhältnissen hier nicht vertraut. Hier ist alles streng katholisch. Wie Sie ja wissen, sind der Führer und Goebbels katholisch und ich auch. Mischen Sie sich nicht in irgendwelche katholischen Dinge ! “ Es wird um Mitteilung gebeten, ob die Angaben über die SS-Wache richtig sind. Soviel bekannt, soll Nehls bereits Meldung sofort nach Berlin gemacht haben. ” »

Nur kurze Zeit mußte er seinen Chefsessel räumen

Wenn Heinrich Glasmeier für kurze Zeit in Ungnade fiel, dann deshalb, weil er im Verdacht stand, größere Geldbeträge des Reichssenders unterschlagen zu haben. Während die Untersuchungen liefen, mußte der Intendant seinen Sessel räumen. Bald fand man in einem früheren Abteilungsleiter, der dem Zentrum angehörte, den « Schuldigen » . Im Mai 1935 konnte Glasmeier auf seinem Intendantensessel wieder Platz nehmen. Die rundfunkinterne Zeitschrift schrieb am 15. Mai 1935 im üblichen Nazi-Jargon :

« Damit ist ein Zustand beseitigt worden, der von böswilligen Gerüchtemachern weidlich ausgenutzt wurde, nicht nur um den Intendanten persönlich, sondern auch den Nationalsozialismus in übler Weise in den Schmutz zu ziehen. »

Am 19. März 1937 überraschte Propagandaminister Goebbels die Öffentlichkeit damit, daß er den Kölner Intendanten Glasmeier zum « Reichsintendanten des Deutschen Rundfunks » und zum « Generaldirektor der Reichsrundfunk-Gesellschaft » machte ; zwei politische und administrative Positionen, die extra für Glasmeier neu geschaffen wurden. Der Dorstener hatte in der obersten Führungsspitze des Reiches wohlgesonnene Gönner. Zu ihnen zählte auch Adolf Hitler, der dem Rundfunkmann bis zum Zusammenbruch durch « Führerauftrag » Narrenfreiheit gewährte.

Zum Leiter des Chorherren-Stifts Sankt Florian in Linz ernannt

Als deutsche Truppen Österreich besetzten, kassierte das Reich Aktien und Aktien des österreichischen Rundfunks, strich am 3. Mai 1938 sämtliche Aktionäre aus dem Handelsregister und setzte Glasmeier als kommissarischen Verwalter ein. Doch seine eigentliche « Spielwiese » fand er in der zweiten Kriegshälfte. Am 21. Januar 1941 beschlagnahmte die Gestapo das bei Linz gelegene Chorherren-Stift Sankt Florian, warf Studenten und Priester samt Abt hinaus, um die altherwürdigen Schlossgebäude des Stifts für die Partei zu nutzen. Glasmeier bekam Wind davon und bemühte sich um die Nutzungsrechte. Er wollte dort eine nationalsozialistische « Kulturstätte von Weltrang » schaffen. Dem Reichsintendanten gelang es im Jahre 1942, Adolf Hitler für das Projekt zu erwärmen. Hitler berief Glasmeier zum « Beauftragten des Führers » für die Aufgabe, in den Stiftsgebäuden eine « Kulturstätte ersten Ranges » aufzubauen : Das Bruckner-Stift Sankt Florian. Glasmeier suchte aus dem gesamten Reichsgebiet die besten Musiker zusammen, um das Bruckner-Orchester zu bilden, das zum Lobpreis des Führers spielen sollte.

Heinrich Glasmeier zog im Oktober 1942 (die Kriegswende zeichnete sich bereits ab) mit Pomp in die Räume der ehemaligen Prälatur ein. Neben der rein räumlichen Nähe zu den ehemaligen Äbten des Chorherren-Stiftes demonstrierte er in der folgenden Zeit auch eine recht persönliche Nähe zu ihnen : Oft zeigte sich Glasmeier in den Gewändern seiner « Amtsvorgänger » und ließ die Festtage der großen Äbte prunkvoll feiern. Im Berliner Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda spöttelte man über den neuen « Abt » von Sankt Florian. Am 3. April 1943 konnte Glasmeier nach einem feierlichen Konzert in der Stiftskirche am Sarge Bruckners statt der geplanten 150 nur 72 Musiker persönlich auf die Person des « großen Genius » (Hitler) vereidigen. Seine erste große nationale Bewährungsprobe bestand das Orchester über alle Sender des Reiches am 20. April 1944, dem 55. Geburtstag des Führers. Das war gleichzeitig der letzte Auftritt des so groß geplanten Weltrang-Orchesters. Im Oktober 1944 wurden die Musiker zur Wehrmacht beziehungsweise zur SS eingezogen. Anfang 1945 wurde auf « Führerbefehl » die Arbeit im Stift wieder aufgenommen. Nicht lange allerdings, denn die verbliebenen Musiker mußten bald als Volkssturm-Männer ihr Schloß und die Stadt Linz verteidigen.

Bruckner-Stift war Glasmeiers luxuriöse « Spielwiese »

Das Bruckner-Stift Sankt Florian, so lässt sich zusammenfassend sagen, war weitgehend das Werk des Dorsteners Doktor Heinrich Glasmeier. Er nutzte die Situation, die durch die Enteignung des Stifts entstanden war, ebenso aus wie die Schwäche Hitlers für die Region Linz. Glasmeiers Ziel war es, in Sankt Florian eine Kultstätte zu schaffen, die in der zweiten Hälfte des Krieges bestenfalls als anachronistisch bezeichnet werden konnte. Während überall im Reich der Krieg seine Opfer forderte, wandte der Reichsintendant hier einen Prunk auf und ließ mit einem Aufwand arbeiten, wie er zu dieser Zeit nicht mehr angebracht war.

Von Hörergeldern wurden aus Frankreich und anderen Ländern die kostbarsten Möbel und Kunstgegenstände beschafft. Für Glasmeiers Speisesaal mußten die Möbel eigens angefertigt werden (handgeschnittzte Arbeit), Bezüge und Teppiche nach Spezialmustern gewebt. Leider gefielen sie ihm nicht, so daß sie wieder entfernt wurden. Nach einem Teller aus dem Wiener Museum wurde ein ganzes Tafelservice für 50 Personen in Auftrag gegeben, jedes Stück trug das Wappen von Sankt Florian und das Hakenkreuzzeichen des Großdeutschen Rundfunks, dazu auf der Rückseite das Hauswappen der Dorstener Familie Glasmeier. Ein Tafelbesteck aus handgeschmiedetem Silber, massiv vergoldet, durfte nicht fehlen. Über Adolf Hitler erreichte Glasmeier, daß das knappe Edelmetall kurz vor Kriegsende freigegeben wurde.

Er wollte seinen Führer nicht überleben

Eine besondere Stiftskleidung (etwa nach dem Bilde des Erasmus von Rotterdam) war entworfen worden, der « Hausherr » trug bereits ein Probestück davon. Neben einem Schwimmbad sollte ein Gestüt (Glasmeier war Husarenoffizier gewesen) eingerichtet und ein Sportplatz gebaut werden. Vorsichtige Andeutungen, ob das denn angesichts der Kriegsnotlage notwendig sei, begegnete Glasmeier mit dem Hinweis, daß die Akropolis auch in schwerster Notzeit des Griechenvolkes gebaut worden sei. Glasmeier verschwand spurlos, als alles in Trümmer fiel. Er lief in den nahen Geschützdonner. Seine Tochter :

Wer sich mit der Geschichte des Archivwesens in Westfalen im 20. Jahrhundert befaßt, wird immer wieder auf einen Namen stoßen : Doktor Heinrich Glasmeier. Als Archivar des westfälischen Adels und als Gründer und Leiter der Archivberatungsstelle Westfalens hat er in vielen kommunalen, kirchlichen und vor allem privaten Archiven Westfalens Spuren hinterlassen und Weichen gestellt, die bis heute sichtbar sind und nachwirken, obgleich seine Tätigkeit in diesen Funktionen nur ein Jahrzehnt (1923 bis 1933) umfaßte. Nach der Machtergreifung der Nationalsozialisten wechselte er seine Bühne : Von Goebbels zunächst zum Intendanten des Westdeutschen Rundfunks nach Köln berufen, stieg er 1937 zum ersten und in der deutschen Mediengeschichte bislang einzigen « Reichsrundfunkintendanten » auf, um schließlich ab 1942 im persönlichen Auftrag Hitlers Herr über das von den Nationalsozialisten aufgehobene Augustinerchorherrenstift Sankt Florian bei Linz zu werden : Alles in allem eine vielschichtige, schillernde Persönlichkeit der Zeitgeschichte, die sich ihrer westfälischen Wurzeln stets bewußt war.

Heinrich Glasmeier wurde am 5. März 1892 in Dorsten als Sohn des Drogeriebesizers Bernhard Glasmeier und seiner Frau Christine Thering geboren. Über sein Elternhaus und seine Jugendzeit äußert er sich in späteren Quellen nie. Er läßt lediglich durchblicken, daß er in einer streng katholischen Umgebung aufgewachsen sei, und betont (beziehungsweise behauptet), daß seine Vorfahren allesamt münsterländische Bauern gewesen seien. Er besuchte das humanistische Gymnasium in Dorsten und machte 1911 das Abitur. Anschließend studierte er in Münster und (nach eigenen Angaben) auch in München. Als Studienfächer gibt er später meist Geschichte, Deutsch, Philosophie und, als Spezialfach, Archivwesen an, wobei bemerkt werden muß, daß « Archivwesen » als Studienfach in dieser Zeit weder in Münster noch in München angeboten wurde. In einer 1936 abgegebenen Erklärung über seinen Eintritt in die Bewegung Adolf Hitlers macht er einige kurze Bemerkungen über diese Zeit : Sozialist war ich seit 1911. Gründete damals als junger Student die « Sozialstudentische Zentrale » an der Universität Münster, organisierte « Soziale Arbeiterunterrichtskurse » während der Ferien. Stand unter dem Einfluß von Doktor Karl Sonnenschein. Hier wird seine starke Verankerung im katholischen Milieu deutlich, war Carl Sonnenschein (1876-1929) doch einer der führenden Vertreter der katholischen Soziallehre der Zeit. Zudem war er in der katholischen Studentenverbindung KStV Cimbria Münster aktiv. Obgleich er später der Partei gegenüber oft das Gegenteil beteuerte, hat er seine kirchliche Bindung innerlich nie ganz aufgegeben.

Bereits zwei Tage vor der allgemeinen Mobilmachung meldete er sich als Kriegsfreiwilliger beim Husarenregiment Nummer 8 in Paderborn, wurde im April 1916 zum Leutnant der Reserve befördert und war Schwadronsführer und Kommandant des Divisionsstabsquartiers. Als Kriegsauszeichnungen wurden ihm das EK II und das EK I verliehen. Auch während des Krieges befaßte er sich (nach eigenem Bekunden) immer wieder gedanklich mit seinen archivischen Arbeiten. Im letzten Kriegsjahr sei in ihm die Idee einer organisatorischen Zusammenfassung der westfälischen Adelsarchive herangereift. Anschaulich schildert er in einem 1930 erschienenen Aufsatz, wie seine Vorstellungen am 18. September 1918, als er nachts auf der Reduit de Chenay vor Reims Wache stand, konkrete Gestalt angenommen hätten. Er habe bereits im Felde mit Angehörigen des Adels diese Frage erörtert und während eines Urlaubs mit Professor Aloys Meister in Münster, seinem Doktorvater, sowie mit dem Direktor des Staatsarchivs Doktor Schmitz-Kallenberg darüber gesprochen. Ja, er hatte sich bereits Gedanken gemacht, welches Gebäude in Münster für die Aufnahme der Adelsarchive in Betracht kommen könnte.

Doch der unrühmliche Kriegsausgang führte ihn, dessen deutschnationalkonservative Einstellung schon damals ausgeprägt war, zunächst in eine schwere Krise, die sicherlich auch mit seiner ungesicherten beruflichen Zukunft in Zusammenhang stand. Auch hier sind wir im wesentlichen auf die Aussagen seiner Selbstzeugnisse angewiesen: Bis Anfang 1919 blieb er bei der Reichswehr, dann schloß er sich mehreren Freiwilligenverbänden an : Zunächst der »Akademischen Wehr« in Münster, dann dem « Freicorps Lichtschlag » , der « Organisation Escherich » (Orgesch) , und dem « Deutsch-Völkischen Schutz- und Trutzbund » . Gleichzeitig arbeitete er, wie er später behauptete, schwarz für das Wehrkreiskommando der Reichswehr.

Zweifellos verdeutlicht dieses Spektrum seines Engagements in besonderer Weise seine politische Einstellung und ist ein Beleg für seine persönliche Distanz zur Weimarer Republik. Dies galt aber für weite Teile der damaligen Gesellschaft und mußte keineswegs auf eine bedingungslose Hinwendung zum Nationalsozialismus hinauslaufen, wie es bei ihm schließlich der Fall war. Außerdem ist bei der Bewertung dieser Fakten zu berücksichtigen, daß die Informationen hierüber zum großen Teil seinen eigenen Angaben entstammen, und zwar aus der Zeit nach 1933. Sie sollten dazu dienen, seinen geradlinigen Weg zum Nationalsozialismus zu belegen und ihn als jemanden zu legitimieren, der die «

Bewegung » zumindest innerlich schon lange vor der Machtergreifung mitgetragen habe.

Bereits bei seiner ersten Tätigkeit im Merveldtschen Archiv konnte Glasmeier Kontakte zum westfälischen Adel knüpfen. Auch sein Reiterregiment Heinrich Glasmeier war stark vom Adel dominiert, so daß er während der Kriegszeit diese Kontakte weiter ausbauen konnte. Das Thema seiner Dissertation « Das Geschlecht von Merveldt zu Merfeld : Ein Beitrag zur Familien- und Standesgeschichte der Münsterschen Ritterschaft » ging weitgehend auf seine Tätigkeit im Merveldtschen Archiv zurück. Ergänzend mußte er dafür auf das Archiv der Herzöge von Croy in Dülmen zurückgreifen, an die das Haus Merfeld 1836 durch Kauf übergegangen war. Er reichte seine Dissertation Ende Mai 1920 bei der Philosophischen Fakultät in Münster ein. Aloys Meister beurteilte die Arbeit als sehr sorgfältig und mit gutem Urteil durchgeführt. Nur knapp zwei Wochen nach Abgabe der Dissertation fand das Rigorosum in den Fächern Philosophie, Deutsch und Geschichte statt. Die Gesamtnote lautete auf »cum laude«. Der Druck der Arbeit (84 Seiten) erfolgte allerdings erst 1931 in dem von ihm selbst herausgegebenen « Westfälischen Adelsblatt » .

Die Forschungen im Dülmener Archiv hatten für Glasmeier aber noch eine andere, höchst bedeutsame Folge : Nach Fertigstellung seiner Dissertation im Mai 1920 trat er beim Herzog von Croy eine Stelle als Herzoglich Croyscher Hausarchivar in Dülmen an. Somit war seine akademische Ausbildung erfolgreich abgeschlossen und seine berufliche Situation zumindest bis auf weiteres gesichert : Eine « normale » bürgerliche Existenz, angesiedelt im katholisch-konservativen Milieu des Westmünsterlandes, schien vorgezeichnet. Daher war es folgerichtig, auch einen eigenen Hausstand zu begründen : Er heiratete am 23. November Maria Hövener, die Tochter eines preußischen Oberregierungsrates.

Wie sehr er sich seiner münsterländischen Heimat verbunden fühlte, brachte er in der Hochzeitsanzeige zum Ausdruck: Ein handgefertigter Linolschnitt zeigt eine Hochzeitskutsche vor der Silhouette der Stadt Münster, zusammen mit dem plattdeutschen Text Wi trüöden de Fahrt düört Liäben an - un mellt us bi Ju nu äs Frau un Mann. Aus der Ehe gingen drei Töchter hervor (geboren 1922, 1923 und 1925) sowie 1938 noch ein Sohn, der allerdings im Alter von nur fünf Jahren verstarb.

Seine Tätigkeit in Dülmen hat nach außen wenig Spuren hinterlassen. Er bearbeitete dort den Bestand « Haus Merfeld » , den er bereits für seine Dissertation ausgewertet hatte, und stellte Urkunden zusammen, die dem Herzoglichen Haus in einem Prozeß gegen den belgischen Staat im Zusammenhang mit der erfolgten Enteignung der Besitzungen von Nutzen sein konnten. Weshalb das Arbeitsverhältnis bereits 1922 beendet wurde, ist unklar. Möglicherweise war aber von vornherein nur eine zeitlich befristete Tätigkeit vereinbart worden.

Im Mai des Jahres 1922 trat Glasmeier eine neue Stelle bei Max Graf von Landsberg-Velen als Hausarchivar auf Schloß Velen an. Graf Landsberg, der geschichtlich sehr interessiert war, hatte die Absicht, in seinem Hause ein « Landsbergsches Gesamtarchiv » einzurichten, in dem die Archive des gesamten Familienverbandes, also der gräflichen Linie Landsberg-Velen und Genien sowie der freiherrlichen Linien Drensteinfurt, Ahausen und Dankern Heinrich Glasmeier zusammengefaßt werden sollten. Daher führte Glasmeier dort den Titel « Gräflich Landsbergscher Gesamtarchivar » .

Zunächst waren auf Schloß Velen, wo Glasmeier auch seine Wohnung nahm, die räumlichen Verhältnisse für die

sachgerechte Lagerung dieser umfangreichen Archivbestände noch unzureichend. Glasmeier gelang es jedoch, Graf Landsberg dazu zu bringen, Pläne für einen Archivneubau zu entwickeln. Es war dies der erste und bis heute einzige Archivzweckbau, der für ein westfälisches Adelsarchiv (und vermutlich für Deutschland insgesamt) in Angriff genommen wurde. Am 17. Juni 1923 nahm Glasmeier selbst den ersten Spatenstich vor, vier Wochen später, am 15. Juli 1923, fand die feierliche Grundsteinlegung statt, bei der der Rektor der Universität, der Dekan der Philosophischen Fakultät, der Vorsitzende der Historischen Kommission für Westfalen, der Direktor des Staatsarchivs Münster sowie acht weitere Professoren der Universität Münster zugegen waren.

Der Bau war großzügig geplant und sollte neben Magazinräumen mit einer Kapazität von 1.000 laufenden Metern Regalfläche über alle für ein großes Archiv notwendigen Einrichtungen verfügen : ein Fest- und Vortragsraum, der auch das eigentliche Familienarchiv aufnehmen sollte, ein Arbeitszimmer für den Archivar, ein Benutzerraum mit Arbeitsplatz für die Archivsekretärin, eine Buchbinderei, eine Buchdruckerei sowie eine Fotowerkstatt. Auch eine Dienstwohnung für den Archivar sowie mehrere Gästezimmer für auswärtige Archivbenutzer waren vorgesehen. Der Bau dieses aufwendigen Gebäudes gestaltete sich jedoch aus finanziellen Gründen schwierig. Erst im Winter 1928-1929 konnte es provisorisch bezogen werden.

Sicherlich hing dieses großzügige Projekt mit seinen weitergehenden Plänen zur organisatorischen Zusammenfassung aller westfälischen Adelsarchive zusammen, die er seit dem Krieg verfolgte. Im August 1919 hatte er erste Überlegungen hierzu in einer Denkschrift niedergelegt, die er einigen ihm persönlich bekannten Adeligen sowie dem Vorsitzenden der Historischen Kommission, seinem Doktorvater Aloys Meister, vorlegte. Diese wurden im Vorstand des Vereins katholischer Edelleute noch im gleichen Monat und noch einmal im darauf folgenden Jahr beraten, stießen auf großes Interesse, erschienen aber so nicht realisierbar.

Dies hatte mehrere Gründe : Zum einen mußte der Plan, der vorsah, alle Adelsarchive an einem zentralen Ort in Münster zusammenzuführen, schon aus finanziellen Gründen scheitern : Hierfür hätte es eines Archivgebäudes sowie eines Personalbestandes bedurft, das dem des Staatsarchivs vergleichbar gewesen wäre, enthielten die Adelsarchive zusammen bereits mehr Urkunden als das Staatsarchiv in seinen Beständen vorweisen konnte. Zum anderen zeigten sich die Archiveigentümer wenig geneigt, die Archive ihren Häusern zu entfremden, um sie an einem neutralen Ort aufzubewahren. Schließlich barg ein solches Konzept einen inneren Widerspruch: Sollten die Archive, wie es Glasmeier vorschwebte, wieder in das Bewußtsein der Familien rücken und identitätsstiftend wirken, durften sie gerade nicht aus den Häusern, deren Geschichte sie dokumentierten, entfernt werden.

Daher entwickelte Glasmeier eine neue Konzeption. Diese sah vor, lediglich einen organisatorischen Zusammenschluß der Archiveigentümer auf Vereinsbasis zu schaffen und auf diese Weise eine fachgerechte Betreuung der Archive an ihrem jeweiligen Ort zu ermöglichen. Zentrale dieser Organisation sollte Schloß Velen beziehungsweise das neue Archivgebäude sein, dessen großzügige Anlage unter diesem Gesichtspunkt durchaus Sinn machte.

Ein solches Vorhaben konnte eher auf eine breite Zustimmung innerhalb des Adels rechnen, da es mehreren Anliegen gleichzeitig gerecht wurde : Das weit verbreitete Mißtrauen gegen die junge Republik, die alle Privilegien des Adels beseitigt hatte und sich vor Sozialisierungsmaßnahmen nicht zu scheuen schien, ließ befürchten, der Staat könne die privaten Archive unter dem Vorwand, daß deren Sicherheit und Zugänglichkeit nicht gewährleistet sei, beschlagnahmen. Tatsächlich war bereits seit 1921 die Generaldirektion der preußischen Staatsarchive in Berlin dabei, einen Gesetzentwurf auszuarbeiten, der dem Staat ein unmittelbares Zugriffsrecht auf alle privaten Archive einräumen sollte. Dem wollte man durch Eigeninitiative die Grundlage entziehen. Durch die Aufhebung des Fideikommißrechtes mußte zudem in vielen Fällen die Erbfolge neu geregelt werden. Hierfür war unter Umständen der Rückgriff auf ältere Unterlagen erforderlich, was wiederum nur bei einem Mindestmaß an Ordnung und Erschließung möglich war. Schließlich mußte sich der Adel als Stand völlig neu formieren und seine Aufgaben in der geänderten Gesellschaftsordnung neu definieren. Da die Sonderrolle des Adels ausschließlich historisch zu begründen war, erhielten auch unter diesem Aspekt die Archive eine neue Bedeutung.

Der von den Archiveigentümern zu gründende »Archivverein« sollte neben einem Direktor weitere Archivare einstellen. Diese « Wanderarchivare » sollten jeweils einige Monate lang ein Archiv ordnen und in dieser Zeit beim dortigen Eigentümer wohnen. Sobald ein gewisser Abschluß der Arbeiten erreicht war, sollten sie an ein anderes Archiv versetzt werden. Diese Lösung bot gegenüber einer Zentralisierung mancherlei Vorteile : Unter finanziellem Aspekt entfielen vor allem die Kosten für die Bereitstellung und den Unterhalt eines großen Archibgebäudes. Wichtiger noch waren aber die ideellen Faktoren : Die Archive würden an ihren historischen Standorten verbleiben, sie stünden auch in Zukunft unter der Verantwortung ihrer Eigentümer und könnten sich dadurch zu einem Identifikationsfaktor der Familien entwickeln. Auch ihr privater Charakter würde in keiner Weise angetastet.

Es gelang Glasmeier, Graf Max von Landsberg-Velen für diesen Plan zu gewinnen. Dieser übersandte eine neue von Glasmeier verfaßte Denkschrift sowie einen Satzungsentwurf an 106 Standesgenossen und lud gleichzeitig zu einer Gründungsversammlung ein. Diese Denkschrift mit dem Titel « Das Westfälische Adelsarchiv » enthält Glasmeiers grundsätzliche Überlegungen : Adel verpflichtet ! Diese Schatzkammern (das heißt die Adelsarchive) der wissenschaftlichen Forschung zu öffnen, heißt, die sonst toten Schätze zu warmem und nutzbringendem Leben zu erwecken und eine Tat zu tun, die eine vaterländische schlechthin zu nennen ist. Die Plunderkammern mit alten, vermoderten Pergament- und Papiermassen sollten zu liebevoll und sorgsam aufbewahrten Archiven werden, als Stolz des Hauses.

Am 14. Dezember 1923 wurde der Archivverein von 25 adeligen Archiveigentümern unter dem Namen « Vereinigte Westfälische Adelsarchive eingetragener Verein » gegründet. Zum Vorsitzenden wurde Max Graf von Landsberg-Velen, zum Stellvertreter Rudolf Freiherr von Twickel-Havixbeck gewählt. Zum hauptamtlichen Archividirektor und Geschäftsführer des Vereins wurde, wie nicht anders zu erwarten, Doktor Glasmeier bestellt. Graf Landsberg stellte auf Schloß Velen Räume für die Zentrale und Geschäftsstelle des Vereins zur Verfügung.

Bereits im Januar 1924 nahm der Verein seine praktische Arbeit auf. Von Velen aus organisierte Glasmeier seine Aktivitäten und realisierte zahlreiche Ideen, wohlwollend gefördert und unterstützt durch seinen Mäzen und Gönner Graf Landsberg. Die ersten Hilfsarchivare und Bibliothekssekretärinnen (Adelsbibliotheken wandte der Verein gleichfalls vom Beginn an sein Interesse zu) wurden eingestellt. Doch gerade hier zeigten sich schon bald Probleme : Es war schwer, auf Dauer fachlich geeignetes Personal zu bekommen, war doch die kümmerliche Bezahlung, die der Verein seinen « Beamten » bieten konnte, nicht gerade ein Anreiz für qualifizierte Mitarbeiter. Die Folge war eine überaus große Fluktuation. Selten blieben die Mitarbeiter länger als einige Monate im Dienste des Vereins.

Daß die Arbeit dennoch zunächst einen beachtenswerten Aufschwung nahm, lag zweifellos an dem hohen persönlichen Engagement Glasmeiers, seinem Einfallsreichtum, Improvisationstalent und sicherlich auch an seiner persönlich außerordentlich gewinnenden und charmanten Art, die ältere Vereinsmitglieder, die Glasmeier persönlich gekannt hatten, noch in der Gegenwart dem Verfasser gegenüber immer wieder hervorgehoben haben. Bezeichnend hierfür ist seine Vorgehensweise bei der Realisierung eines seiner Lieblingsprojekte, der Zeitschrift « Westfälisches Adelsblatt ». Da die Mittel des Vereins für eine reguläre Drucklegung nicht ausreichten, ging er einen ganz unkonventionellen Weg: Als er in der Zeitung auf ein Inserat stieß, in der das Inventar einer aufgelösten Akzidenzdruckerei zum Verkauf angeboten wurde, überlegte er nicht lange, kaufte die Maschinen (ohne das Geld dafür zur Verfügung zu haben) und ließ sie nach Velen bringen. Einen Landstreicher, der ihm zufällig über den Weg lief und der angab, Buchdrucker und Buchbinder gelernt zu haben, stellte er kurzerhand als « Archivdrucker » ein. Bereits am nächsten Tag begann er mit dem Druck der ersten Nummer des « Adelsblattes », wobei er selbst und seine Sekretärin als « Druckereihilfen » aktiv waren. Erst später berichtete er Graf Landsberg bei einer günstigen Gelegenheit nach einer Jagd von dieser eigenmächtigen Aktion, und es gelang ihm tatsächlich, von diesem nachträglich die Zustimmung hierfür und das entsprechende Geld zu bekommen.

In den einzelnen Schlössern fand Glasmeier die Archive oft in beklagenswertem Zustand vor. Unter der Rubrik « Archivfahrten kreuz und quer durch Westfalen » berichtete er regelmäßig im « Westfälischen Adelsblatt » über seine Erfahrungen und seine Ordnungsbemühungen, veröffentlichte aber gleichzeitig auch erste Archivübersichten als Ergebnis dieser Maßnahmen. Über etwa 40 Archive liegen derartige anschaulich und lebhaft geschriebene Berichte bis zum Ende der 1920er Jahre vor. Natürlich konnten angesichts der Tatsache, daß Glasmeier stets nur wenige Hilfskräfte, die dazu in der Regel keine archivfachliche Ausbildung oder berufliche Erfahrung aufzuweisen hatten, an tatsächlichen Ordnungs- und Erschließungsmaßnahmen nur bescheidene Ergebnisse erwartet werden. Viel wichtiger aber war ein anderer Erfolg : Es gelang ihm in relativ kurzer Zeit, das Interesse des Adels an seinen Archiven neu zu wecken und das Bewußtsein zu vermitteln, daß die Familientradition, auf die man gerade in dieser Zeit nicht ohne Stolz zurückdachte, sich am nachhaltigsten in den Archiven manifestierte.

Bis Ende 1929 waren dem Verein etwa Zweidrittel aller adeligen Archivbesitzer beigetreten, zweifellos eine beachtliche Leistung. Dabei war die von den Mitgliedern erwartete Beitragsleistung, die 1923 auf 200 Goldmark pro Jahr festgesetzt worden war, nicht unbeträchtlich. Außerdem mußte jeder Archiveigentümer für die Dauer der Tätigkeit der Vereinsarchivare in seinem Haus eine zusätzliche Kostenbeteiligung aufbringen und für kostenfreien Aufenthalt Sorge tragen. Weitere Einzelheiten der Vereinsarbeit können an dieser Stelle leider nicht dargestellt werden.

Glasmeiers Aufmerksamkeit beschränkte sich schon bald nicht mehr auf die Adelsarchive. Ihm blieb nämlich nicht verborgen, daß die Situation vieler Stadt- und Pfarrarchive noch trostloser war als die der Adelsarchive. Hier war Aufklärung bei Bürgermeistern, Gemeinderäten und Pfarrern notwendig, die durch den Archivverein nicht zu bewältigen war. Als Begründer und erster Vorsitzender des Hauptausschusses Geschichte im Westfälischen Heimatbund hatte er schon auf dem Westfalentag in Soest 1923 vorgeschlagen, « Archivpflegekurse » für heimatgeschichtlich interessierte Teilnehmer durchzuführen. Die Gründung des Adelsarchivvereins gab auch diesen Bestrebungen neuen Auftrieb. Ein erster, sich über zwei Tage erstreckender Kurs dieser Art wurde auf Einladung des Heimatbundes bereits 1924 im Staatsarchiv Münster unter seiner Leitung durchgeführt und stieß auf so lebhaftes Interesse in der ganzen Provinz, daß sich bald ähnliche Veranstaltungen in ganz Westfalen anschlossen. Ziel war es, den Teilnehmern, darunter auch Lehrer, Pfarrer und Bürgermeister, Grundkenntnisse über das Archivwesen zu vermitteln, damit diese künftig als ehrenamtliche « Archivpfleger » ein wachsames Auge auf die Archive in ihrem Bereich richten konnten.

Diese Aktivitäten erregten bald Aufmerksamkeit beim Provinzialverband Westfalen, namentlich bei dem für Kultur zuständigen Landesrat Doktor Karl Zuhorn. Dieser setzte durch, daß der Provinzialausschuß am 20. Mai 1927 3.000 Reichsmark bewilligte, um eine ehrenamtliche « Archivberatungsstelle » für Westfalen, die erste ihrer Art in Deutschland, einzurichten. Personell bestand diese nur aus Glasmeier, der die Aufgabe nebenamtlich übernahm. Im Hauptamt blieb er Direktor der Vereinigten Westfälischen Adelsarchive.

Solange ihm für die Arbeit der Archivberatungsstelle keinerlei Fachkräfte zur Verfügung standen, sah Glasmeier seine Aufgabe vor allem darin, das Interesse der Öffentlichkeit auf die im Verborgenen schlummernden Archive zu lenken und damit die Voraussetzungen für erste grundlegende Sicherungsmaßnahmen zu schaffen. Diesem Ziel diente in erster Linie eine konsequente Bereisung aller in Betracht kommenden Archive sowie die Ausweitung seiner in der Vergangenheit schon auf so große Resonanz gestoßenen Archivpflegerkurse.

Sie standen daher im Mittelpunkt der Arbeit, und auf diesem Felde hat er zweifellos Beachtliches geleistet. Von 1927 bis 1930 veranstaltete er etwa 22 solcher Kurse in allen Teilen der Provinz Westfalen, an denen insgesamt etwa 700 Personen teilnahmen. Dabei ruhte die Last der Durchführung ganz auf ihm allein. Ein solcher Kurstag begann gewöhnlich damit, daß er in aller Frühe in Velen seinen Wagen mit umfangreichem Anschauungs- und Lehrmaterial belud : Bücher, Prachturkunden, vermoderte Archivalien, Schreiben berühmter Männer, aber auch alle Arten von Aufbewahrungskörpern für Urkunden und Akten, Schalen für Vorführungen von Urkundenwaschen und Schriftreagenzien, Staubtuch, Fönapparat, Talkum, Plastilin, Gips für Siegelabgüsse. Am Zielort angekommen, baute er zunächst eine Ausstellung dieser Anschauungsmaterialien auf, bevor er dann mit seinen Vorträgen begann, die sich (von einer Mittagspause unterbrochen) über rund sechs Stunden erstreckten und erst gegen Abend endeten.

Daß er für diese Vorträge ein vorzügliches Talent besaß und es verstand, seine Zuhörer für die Sache der Archive wirklich zu begeistern, wird aus Rückäußerungen der Teilnehmer bestätigt. So berichtet im Dezember 1928 der Düsseldorfer Staatsarchivdirektor Doktor Redlich an den Landeshauptmann von Westfalen : Herr Doktor Glasmeier versteht es ausgezeichnet, die scheinbar trockene Materie lebensvoll zu behandeln und seine Zuhörer durch seine frische und humorvolle Art sechs Stunden lang zu fesseln. Dabei weiß er die fachlichen Belange mit großem Geschick zu behandeln und wirklich belehrend auf seine Zuhörer zu wirken. Man darf hoffen, daß auf diese Weise allmählich die Mängel beseitigt werden, die bei der Verwaltung der Pfarr- und Gemeindearchive sich zeigten und die Euer Hochwohlgeboren veranlaßt haben, eine Archivberatungsstelle ins Leben zu rufen.

Die große Resonanz seiner Tätigkeit ist sicherlich auch darauf zurückzuführen, daß er eine für die damalige Zeit außerordentlich moderne Archivarbeit propagierte. Diese wurde schon in Äußerlichkeiten deutlich : Bereits seit 1924 benutzte er für seine « Archivfahrten » grundsätzlich einen Pkw, was ihm nicht nur das Erreichen der meist in ländlichen Regionen gelegenen Ziele erleichterte, sondern für ihn zweifellos auch eine Prestigefrage war. Hatte ihm zunächst Graf Landsberg einen seiner eigenen Wagen zur Verfügung gestellt, gelang es ihm bald darauf, von einem Münsteraner Automobilhändler ein Jahr lang kostenlos einen Wagen der Marke « AGA » leihweise zu erhalten, da sich dieser davon gute Reklame bei den vermögenden Adelshäusern versprach. Bald darauf schaffte er sich einen eigenen Wagen an, für einen Archivar in der damaligen Zeit sicher sehr ungewöhnlich. Nach Ford und Hanomag war es schließlich sogar ein Mercedes-Benz, den er sich mit Hilfe eines vom Provinzialverband gewährten Kredits kaufen konnte.

Zudem war er ein entschiedener Verfechter moderner Archivtechniken : Für die Aufbewahrung der Urkunden, die bis dahin auch in großen Staatsarchiven noch vielfach klein zusammengefaltet in Schubkästen und Schachteln gelagert wurden, führte er das « System Landsberg » ein : große Mappen aus stabilem Karton, in denen die Urkunden, soweit wie möglich ausgefaltet, senkrecht wie Karteikarten in großen Schubladen aufgestellt wurden. Dieses System wird noch heute in vielen westfälischen Adelsarchiven angewandt.

Um Briefen und Akten, die damals auch in den meisten öffentlichen Archiven lediglich mit Bindfaden zu Bündeln geschnürt waren, nach einer Neuordnung nicht wieder in Unordnung geraten zu lassen, ließ er diese, wann immer möglich, zu Faszikeln binden und bibliotheksmäßig aufstellen, ein Verfahren, das unter Archivaren vielfach kritisiert wurde, aber in der konkreten Situation der kleineren Archive ohne ständige Fachaufsicht sicherlich manche Vorteile bot. Für den Erhalt der Ordnung war es ebenfalls wichtig, einfache Signierungssysteme anzuwenden, die lediglich aus einem Buchstaben und einer Zahl bestanden, um eine korrekte Reponierung der Archivalien auch durch Laienkräfte sicherzustellen. In staatlichen Archiven waren demgegenüber damals meist noch komplexe, an der Systematik des Bestandes orientierte vielgliedrige Signatursysteme üblich.

Auch den Archivräumen wandte er große Aufmerksamkeit zu, ließ sie entrümpeln und so ausgestalten, daß bereits der Raum dem ideellen Wert des Archivs gerecht werden konnte. Wenn eine neue Ausstattung nötig und möglich war, ließ er moderne Pohlschröder-Aktenregale aus Stahl anschaffen.

Doch nicht nur die äußeren Formen seiner Archivarbeit waren modern, auch die Zielrichtung: Neben der Bereitstellung der Archivalien für die wissenschaftliche Forschung hatte er stets auch die interessierten oder zu interessierenden Laien als Zielgruppe vor Augen: Eigentümer der Adelsarchive ebenso wie Pfarrer, Bürgermeister und Lehrer und Interessenten der Heimat- und Familiengeschichte. Er riet seinen Hilfskräften, diese bei ihren Archivarbeiten immer wieder mit besonders interessanten Funden zu überraschen, um deren Interesse zu wecken.

Glasmeyer setzte bei seiner Arbeit auch alle damals gegebenen technischen Möglichkeiten der Fotokopie und Reproduktion ein, um wertvolle Archivstücke zu sichern und Anschauungsmaterial für historische Bildungsarbeit zur Verfügung zu haben. Hierzu beschaffte er auf eigene Kosten einen « Kontophot-Apparat » . Am deutlichsten wird dieses Bemühen in der von ihm begründeten und herausgegebenen Reihe « Bildwiedergaben ausgewählter Urkunden und Akten zur Geschichte Westfalens » , die Faksimiles von Archivalien mit Transskriptionen und Erläuterungen zu wichtigen Themen der westfälischen Geschichte (und andere Hanse und Freiherr von Stein) enthielten und wohlfeil verkauft wurden. Dies waren damals völlig neue Wege, um die Arbeit der Archive in das Bewußtsein weiter Kreise der Bevölkerung zu bringen.

Dennoch war er aus der Sicht der professionellen Archivare ein Außenseiter, da er keine archivarische Fachausbildung genossen und zu keinem Zeitpunkt eine Tätigkeit in einem Staatsarchiv ausgeübt hatte. Seine Erfolge bei der Bewußtseinsbildung für den Wert der Archive und der Sicherung der kleineren Archive waren zwar unbestreitbar und wurden anerkannt, ein latentes Mißtrauen der Fachwelt ihm und seiner Arbeit gegenüber ist aber dennoch stets spürbar. Dies wird schon in einer Stellungnahme aus dem Jahre 1927 deutlich, in der sich das Staatsarchiv in Münster gegenüber dem Provinzialverband nachdrücklich gegen den Plan der Einrichtung einer Archivberatungsstelle aussprach.

Umso mehr bemühte sich Glasmeier von sich aus um archivfachliche Anerkennung. Bereits auf dem 16. Deutschen Archivtag 1924 in Münster stellte er die Arbeit der Vereinigten Westfälischen Adelsarchive vor und stieß, wie er selbst meinte, auf außerordentlich positive Resonanz. Auch an den folgenden Archivtagen nahm er stets teil. In einem Beitrag in der renommierten, von der Direktion der Bayerischen Staatsarchive herausgegebenen « Archivalischen Zeitschrift » stellte er die Arbeit des Adelsarchivvereins und der Archivberatungsstelle ausführlich dar.

Da er sich der Unzulänglichkeit seiner damaligen Möglichkeiten der Archivpflege bewußt war, war es sein Ziel, die ehrenamtliche Archivberatungsstelle zu einer professionellen Fachdienststelle für das Archivwesen auszubauen, der auch die Heranbildung von Fachkräften übertragen werden sollte. Dies belegt eine 1930 von ihm im Auftrag des Provinzialverbandes herausgegebene Denkschrift, in der er das Modell eines « Landesarchivamtes » entwarf. Neben einem qualifizierten Mitarbeiterstab sollte das Amt auch über eine Restaurierung- und Fotowerkstatt verfügen und mit Hilfe einer eigenen Archivschule die Ausbildung von Kommunal-, Kirchen- und Adelsarchivaren durchführen.

Zweifellos spielten bei diesen Überlegungen auch persönliche Motive eine Rolle. Es wurde gegen Ende der 1920er Jahre immer deutlicher, wie problematisch die finanzielle Basis des privatrechtlich organisierten Adelsarchivvereins gerade in der Zeit der Weltwirtschaftskrise war. Mit Ausnahme einer Sekretärin war das gesamte Personal bereits abgebaut worden. Auch sein großer Mäzen Graf Landsberg-Velen geriet in wirtschaftliche Schwierigkeiten, die 1931 zu einem finanziellen Zusammenbruch seines Hauses führten. Doch damit nicht genug: In den frühen Morgenstunden des 15. April 1931 brach ein Feuer im Nordflügel des Schlosses Velen aus und zerstörte das gesamte dreiflügelige Hauptgebäude. Es gelang Glasmeier, der selbst mit seiner Familie im Südflügel wohnte und das Feuer als erster bemerkte, die Mitbewohner zu wecken und seine persönlichen Dinge sowie Gemälde und Bibliothek zu retten. Das Landsbergische Gesamtarchiv und die Geschäftsunterlagen des Adelsarchivvereins und der Archivberatungsstelle waren zum Glück schon 1928 in das nahezu fertige neue Archivgebäude überführt worden und überstanden das Feuer somit unversehrt. Gleichwohl war es klar, daß eine Weiterarbeit von Velen aus auf längere Sicht nicht möglich sein würde.

Da die Landsbergische Verwaltung nach der Zerstörung des Schlosses in das erhalten gebliebene Archivgebäude übersiedeln sollte, mußte dieses vom Archivgut geräumt werden. Glasmeier erreichte, daß das Archiv im August 1932 in das Staatsarchiv nach Münster überführt werden konnte, eine Entscheidung, die ihm sicherlich sehr schwergefallen sein dürfte. Auch die Archivberatungsstelle selbst und die Geschäftsstelle des Adelsarchivvereins konnten im gleichen Monat in das Staatsarchiv übersiedeln. Insgesamt wurden eineinhalb Eisenbahnwaggons und drei große Möbelwagen von Velen nach Münster transportiert. Dort erhielt er einen Arbeitsplatz in einer Dachmansarde zugewiesen, die er mit seiner Sekretärin teilen mußte. Für ihn selbst stand nicht einmal ein eigener Schreibtisch zur Verfügung. Die Archivalien wurden auf dem nicht heizbaren und daher im Winter nicht benutzbaren Dachboden verstaut.

Es ist verständlich, daß er diese Situation nicht als befriedigend ansehen konnte. Nur für einen kurzen Augenblick schien sich noch einmal eine Chance auf Fortsetzung einer erfolgreichen Karriere im Archivbereich aufzutun : Im September 1932 stand ein Wechsel in der Leitung des Staatsarchivs Münster an, da Schmitz-Kallenberg in den Ruhestand ging. Offenbar hatte Glasmeier den Vorstand des Adelsarchivvereins darauf aufmerksam gemacht und sein Interesse an dieser Position bekundet. Der Zeitpunkt schien nicht ungünstig, stand mit Franz von Papen doch ein Standesgenosse aus dem westfälischen Adel als Reichskanzler an der Spitze der politischen Verantwortung, dem Glasmeier auch persönlich bekannt war. Zudem hatte Papen wenige Wochen zuvor die preußische Regierung ihres Amtes enthoben und durch einen Reichskommissar ersetzt. Damit hatte er zumindest indirekt Einfluß auf die Besetzung preußischer Beamtenstellen. Fürst Bentheim-Tecklenburg aus Rheda richtete ein Schreiben an Papen, in dem er diesen bat, sich für die Ernennung Glasmeiers zum neuen Direktor des Staatsarchivs zu verwenden. Papen leitete das Gesuch mit einer nachdrücklichen Befürwortung an den amtierenden Reichskommissar für Preußen Doktor Bracht weiter.

Diese Intervention blieb jedoch ohne Erfolg : Im Antwortschreiben des Reichskommissars an Papen heißt es : Die Verdienste des Herrn Doktor Glasmeier um die Organisation des Westfälischen Adelsarchivs und um die Einrichtung der Archivberatungsstelle bei der Provinzialverwaltung werden allseitig anerkannt, dagegen ist seine wissenschaftliche Bedeutung umstritten. Mit der Stelle des Staatsarchivdirektors in Münster ist aber traditionell eine Honorarprofessur für historische Hilfswissenschaften an der Universität verbunden ; eine vorsichtige Fühlungnahme mit maßgebenden Kreisen der Universität hat ergeben, daß Doktor Glasmeier nicht auf deren Zustimmung hätte rechnen können.

Diese Begründung war zwar nicht sachfremd, aber dennoch sicherlich vorgeschoben. Für einen Außenseiter wie Glasmeier war in einer Spitzen-Position des preußischen staatlichen Archivwesens, trotz aller Anerkennung, die man ihm nach außen hin zollte, kein Platz. Allerdings wurde zugesichert, daß sich der Generaldirektor der Staatsarchive Professor Albert Brackmann bei der Provinzialverwaltung für die Ernennung Glasmeiers zum (hauptamtlichen) Leiter der Archivberatungsstelle Westfalen einsetzen wolle : Ich möchte glauben, daß damit allen berechtigten Ansprüchen Rechnung getragen sein würde, schließt Doktor Bracht sein Schreiben.

Ob die Provinz auf eine entsprechende Empfehlung zur Einrichtung einer hauptamtlich geleiteten Archivberatungsstelle eingehen würde, war in der gegebenen Situation jedoch äußerst fraglich, wie sich im übrigen wenig später zeigte. Aber auch dann hätte es nichts daran geändert, daß der berufliche und gesellschaftliche Abstieg unverkennbar war. Geduldeter Untermieter auf dem Dachboden des Staatsarchivs zu sein, war auf Dauer zweifellos keine Situation, mit der sich Glasmeier zufriedengeben konnte. Daher kann es nicht überraschen, daß er sich nach anderen Perspektiven umsah. Seine national-konservative Gesinnung, seine Affinität zum Militär, seine persönlichen Kontakte zu reaktionären Kräften, sein Heimatbewußtsein, all dies trug sicherlich dazu bei, daß die immer stärker werdende nationalsozialistische Bewegung auf ihn eine besondere Anziehungskraft ausübte.

Über seinen Weg zum Nationalsozialismus gab er später (1936) zu Protokoll : Hörte von der Hitlerbewegung kaum.

Wurde auf diese aufmerksam durch meine Archivbesuche beim Freiherrn von Kanne im östlichen Teil Westfalens (jetzt SS-Oberführer RuS-Amt) . Trat aber wegen meiner schlechten Erfahrungen mit « vaterländischen Verbänden » nicht mit fliegenden Fahnen bei, sondern sah mir die Sache aus der Entfernung an. Wählte seit 1930-1931 Hitler. Stellte mich 1931 (Anfang Mai) dem Gauleiter zur Verfügung. Trat aber auf seinen Rat hin nicht offiziell in die Partei ein, um so besser (als Beamter der Provinz Westfalen) für die Bewegung arbeiten und bestimmte kulturelle Aufträge des Gauleiters ausführen zu können. Beim Gauparteitag Januar 1932 in Münster ließ ich mich dann auch offen aufnehmen. Inzwischen hatte ich die Bewegung theoretisch und praktisch gründlich studiert und für sie geopfert. Meine Sehnsucht wurde in ihr erfüllt.

Natürlich ist auch bei diesem Selbstzeugnis zu berücksichtigen, daß es nachträglich zu dem Zweck formulierte wurde, eine vermeintlich tief verwurzelte und weit zurückreichende innere Verbindung mit dem Nationalsozialismus glaubhaft zu machen. Seine Bekanntschaft mit Freiherr von Kanne, dem Besitzer des Rittergutes Breitenhaupt (heute Stadt Steinheim Kreis Höxter) und späteren « Reichskommissar für die Milchwirtschaft » (spöttisch Reichsmilchkanne genannt), reichte im übrigen bis in seine Militärzeit zurück, da von Kanne im Weltkrieg ebenfalls als Rittmeister dem Husarenregiment Nummer 8 angehört hatte. Bernd Freiherr von Kanne war historisch interessiert und hatte sich sehr um sein Archiv bemüht. Weitere Verbindungsleute Glasmeiers zur NSDAP waren Freiherr von Oeynhausen auf der Grevenburg, der wie Glasmeier in den zwanziger Jahren im « Westfalenbund » aktiv war, sowie Freiherr von Lüninck von Haus Ostwig im Sauerland, den Glasmeier ebenfalls sowohl über die Archivarbeit wie auch aus der Arbeit im « Westfalenbund » kannte und der nach der Machtergreifung das Amt des Oberpräsidenten der Provinz Westfalen übernehmen sollte. Auch Graf Wolff-Metternich auf Schloß Vinsebeck stand der NSDAP nahe.

Am 1. Februar 1932 während des Gauparteitags in Münster trat Glasmeier der Partei bei. Drei Monate später übertrug man ihm das Amt eines Gaukulturwarts, und am 1. Oktober wurde er zum Gaugeschäftsführer bestellt. Offensichtlich übte er diese Tätigkeit aber zumindest nach außen hin nebenamtlich aus, da er bis April 1933 noch als Direktor der Vereinigten Westfälischen Adelsarchive und Leiter der Archivberatungsstelle in Erscheinung tritt und regelmäßige Berichte über seine archivpflegerische Arbeit lieferte.

Seine « große Stunde » im Sinne der Parteikarriere schlug dann im Januar 1933. Die Partei hatte um den Jahreswechsel auf Reichsebene mit Rückschlägen und Ansehensverlust zu kämpfen. Als für den 15. Januar Wahlen in dem kleinen und politisch völlig unbedeutenden Land Lippe angesetzt wurden, beschloß die Parteiführung, hier unter Aufbietung aller verfügbaren Kräfte für einen Prestigeerfolg zu kämpfen, um einen Stimmungsumschwung herbeizuführen. Allein Hitler persönlich sollte in 16 Wahlveranstaltungen auftreten, neben ihm noch alle anderen Parteigrößen wie Gœbbels, Rosenberg und Himmler. Hitler geht auf die Dörfer, spotteten die anderen Parteien. Als Gaugeschäftsführer wurde Glasmeier in diese Planungen unmittelbar einbezogen. Ihm war offensichtlich weitgehend die Organisation und Logistik des Wahlkampfes übertragen.

In diesen Wochen lernte ihn nicht nur Hitler kennen und schätzen, sondern Glasmeier konnte auch enge persönliche Kontakte zu Gœbbels und Himmler knüpfen. Geradezu schwärmerisch erinnert Glasmeier letzteren in einem Weihnachtsgruß 1935 daran, daß er mit ihm am 6. Januar 1933 zum nebelumwallten Hermannsdenkmal gefahren sei und dieser ihn am gleichen Abend in die SS aufgenommen habe. Hitler persönlich hatte zusammen mit Himmler die Bürgschaft für Glasmeier übernommen.

Die Parteiführung richtete ihr Hauptquartier für den Wahlkampf auf Schloß Vinsebeck bei Graf Wolff-Metternich ein. Goebbels schwärmt in seinem Tagebucheintrag vom 11. Januar : Herrliche Wasserburg. Graf Metternich sehr angenehm. Wunderbare Schlafzimmer und notiert wenige Tage später : Abschied von Vinsebeck fällt schwer. Hitler dagegen fand Unterkunft auf der Grevenburg bei Freiherr von Oeynhausen. Ob dies auf Vermittlung Glasmeiers zurückging, ließ sich bislang nicht definitiv feststellen, ist aber anzunehmen, da Glasmeier mit Freiherr von Oeynhausen gut bekannt war und er die Grevenburg in früheren Jahren im Rahmen der Archivpflege oft besucht hatte.

Der deutlichste Beweis für die Wertschätzung, die Glasmeier in dieser Zeit bei Hitler persönlich gefunden hat, ist zweifellos eine Portrait-Postkarte, die Hitler ihm auf der Grevenburg schenkte. Er versah sein Bild mit der Widmung Doktor Glasmeier, dem besten Kenner der Kultur und Geschichte dieses Landes, herzlich Adolf Hitler. Grevenburg, den 14. Januar 1933. Dieses Bild ist zweifellos ein Schlüsseldokument, das die steile NS-Karriere Glasmeiers zu erklären vermag. Es verdeutlicht, wie sehr es Glasmeier in diesen Wochen gelungen war, sich in Hitlers Bewußtsein zu verankern. Glasmeier hat dieses Bild offenbar als eine Art « Ikone » gehütet und auf allen weiteren Stationen seines Lebens mit sich geführt. Sicherlich hat er es auch benutzt, um gegenüber anderen Parteigenossen, insbesondere den Kritikern in der Partei, sein besonderes Vertrauensverhältnis zum « Führer » herauszustellen. An seiner letzten Wirkungsstätte im Stift Sankt Florian blieb das Bild schließlich bei Kriegsende zurück und gelangte in das dortige Stiftsarchiv.

Die Bedeutung dieses Bildes wird durch das Datum der Widmung noch besonders unterstrichen : Es war der Vorabend jenes Tages, der unter dem Schlagwort « Entscheidungsschlacht in Lippe » als der wichtigste Etappensieg in der Geschichte der « Bewegung » angesehen wurde und im Bewußtsein wie auch der Propaganda der Partei stets eine besondere Rolle spielte. Hitler selbst kehrte zum Jahrestag der Wahl später noch auf die Grevenburg zurück.

Sicherlich hat Glasmeier Hitler bei dieser Gelegenheit auch seine eigentlichen Wirkungsstätten, die Archive dieser Häuser, gezeigt, so daß diesem von da her die besondere Situation privater Adelsarchive bekannt war. Dies sollte 1936 Bedeutung erlangen, als Hitler alle Bestrebungen der Reichsarchivverwaltung und der Partei, im Rahmen einer « Archivschutzgesetzgebung » private Archive einer staatlichen Aufsicht zu unterstellen, persönlich definitiv zurückwies.

Zum Zeitpunkt der « Machtergreifung » war Glasmeier somit bereits fest in das Partegefüge integriert. Daher konnte es nicht überraschen, daß er bei den ersten von den Nationalsozialisten angesetzten Neuwahlen für die Gemeinden und Gemeindeverbände am 12. März für die NSDAP sowohl in die Münsteraner Stadtverordnetenversammlung als auch in den Provinziallandtag von Westfalen einrückte. Von dort wurde er sogleich in das wichtigste Gremium des Provinzialverbandes, den Provinzialausschuß, berufen.

Doch war dies nur der Anfang. Die Nationalsozialisten, insbesondere deren Chefpropagandist Josef Goebbels, hatten längst die Bedeutung des Rundfunks als Propagandamittel erkannt. Goebbels Bestreben ging dahin, die entscheidenden Positionen im Rundfunk baldmöglichst mit ihm ergebenen Parteigenossen zu besetzen. Weshalb dabei seine Wahl ausgerechnet auf Glasmeier fiel, der über keinerlei Qualifikation und Erfahrung im Rundfunkwesen verfügte, ist nicht festzustellen. Allerdings war er einige Wochen zuvor auf Drängen der Nationalsozialisten bereits in den Kulturbeirat des Westdeutschen Rundfunks berufen worden.

Anfang April 1933 ernannte Goebbels Glasmeier völlig überraschend zum neuen Intendanten des Westdeutschen Rundfunks in Köln, nachdem der Vorgänger, der Dichter und Theaterintendant Ernst Hardt, am 20. März von seinem Amt suspendiert worden war. Glasmeiers absolute persönliche Ergebenheit, seine historisch-kulturelle Bildung, aber auch sein Interesse für alle neuen technischen Errungenschaften mögen bei dieser Berufung eine Rolle gespielt haben, wahrscheinlich hat aber Hitler damals bereits einen entsprechenden Wunsch an Goebbels gerichtet. Am Gründonnerstag, dem 13. April 1933, traf Glasmeier in Köln ein und nahm am folgenden Tag seine Tätigkeit auf. Als Goebbels wenig später seiner Heimatstadt Rheydt einen Besuch abstattete, um dort die Ehrenbürgerwürde entgegenzunehmen, ließ er es sich nicht nehmen, am 24. April Glasmeier persönlich in sein Amt einzuführen. Dieser Festakt im Funkhaus wurde live im Rundfunk übertragen, zweifellos ein Hinweis auf den Stellenwert, den Goebbels diesem Führungswechsel beimaß.

Es kann kaum überraschen, daß man beim Kölner Sender dem Außenseiter Glasmeier mißtrauisch gegenüberstand. Hierzu dürften die eindeutig politische Protektion wie auch sein äußerst selbstbewußtes, oft überheblich erscheinendes Auftreten gleichermaßen beigetragen haben. Bereits bei dem Festakt zur Amtseinführung bemühte sich Glasmeier, in Wortwahl und Gestik den neuen Führungsstil der nationalsozialistischen Machthaber überzeugend zu verkörpern.

Doch nicht nur beim Rundfunk, auch innerhalb der Partei, vor allem aber in der SS, stand man Glasmeier vielfach kritisch oder gar feindlich gegenüber. So bemerkte der zuständige SS-Sturmabführer in Aachen, dem Glasmeier seit seinem Wohnungswechsel nach Köln als SS-Sturmabführer zugeordnet war, in einer Personalbeurteilung vom November 1933, daß Glasmeier in seiner bisherigen Funktion als Reiterreferent im Stab der Standarte wenig Gelegenheit gehabt habe, sich zu betätigen. Daher habe er ihm nun das Fürsorgereferat übertragen, so daß er künftig ein dankbares Aufgabenfeld habe. Es ist schwer vorstellbar, daß Glasmeier die Übertragung dieses Amtes als seiner Person und Stellung angemessen empfunden haben dürfte. Ein halbes Jahr später lehnte die gleiche Stelle seine Beförderung zum Obersturmführer zunächst ab, da sich eine solche aus der bisherigen Tätigkeit nicht rechtfertigen ließe. Als diese kurz darauf doch erfolgte, geschah dies sicherlich auf höhere Weisung.

Das ihm entgegengebrachte Mißtrauen brachte ihn schon bald in ernsthafte Schwierigkeiten. Im Zusammenhang mit einer Unterschlagung, die ein Mitarbeiter des Senders namens Keiper begangen hatte, wurde er im Juli 1934 der Mitwisserschaft beschuldigt. Zudem wurde gegen ihn der Vorwurf erhoben, er habe ein Honorar in Höhe von 1000 Mark, das der freie Mitarbeiter Doktor Castelle für die Bibliothek der SS-Führerschule auf der Wewelsburg gespendet hatte, als seine eigene Spende ausgegeben und dafür den SS-Ehrendolch erhalten. Die Staatsanwaltschaft nahm die Ermittlungen auf, bis zu deren Abschluß Glasmeier sowohl von seiner Funktion als Intendant wie auch von seinem SS-Amt beurlaubt wurde, fast ein dreiviertel Jahr lang. Himmler selbst stellte schließlich eine schriftliche Bescheinigung aus, daß Glasmeier ihm gegenüber besagte Spende ausdrücklich als die eines Dritten bezeichnet habe.

Während der Staatsanwalt im Frühjahr 1935 das Verfahren gegen Keiper eröffnete, stellte er die Ermittlungen gegen Glasmeier ein, weil eine Beteiligung an den Taten Keipers nicht erwiesen sei. Auch andere Beschuldigungen gegen ihn wurden nicht weiter verfolgt. So wurden ihm unan gemessener Aufwand vorgeworfen, Trinkgelage, überhöhte Reisekosten und vieles mehr. Am kuriosesten war zweifellos ein Vorwurf im Zusammenhang mit den vom Rundfunk zu Gunsten der NSV im gesamten Sendebereich veranstalteten « Bunten Abenden » : Glasmeier bestehende darauf, so wurde behauptet, daß ihn die örtlichen Honoratioren in schwarzem Anzug und mit Zylinder sowie mit Böllerschüssen empfingen, wenn er an den Veranstaltungsort komme.

In heftigen Streit geriet Glasmeier mit dem Führer der im Funkhaus stationierten SS-Funkwache, einem gewissen Nehls. Es wurde ihm und andere verübelt, daß er sich nach kurzer Zeit nicht mehr bei seinen Dienstfahrten von SS-Leuten begleiten ließ, sondern sich eines zivilen Fahrers, der zudem gebürtiger Franzose sei, bediente. Überhaupt hatte die SS-Funkwache das Gefühl, von Glasmeier nicht ernstgenommen zu werden. Bereits im Frühjahr 1935 richtete Nehls eine geheime Meldung an den Chef des Sicherheitshauptamtes in Berlin. Darin wurde auch angedeutet, daß Glasmeier zur Kirche eine positive Haltung einnehme und sich abfällig über Rosenberg geäußert habe. Außerdem habe er sich mehrfach von einem SS-Fahrer in Staffelnuniform zur Kirche fahren lassen. Das Sicherheitshauptamt bat den Führer des Funkschutzes in Berlin, Glasmeier unauffällig beobachten zu lassen und über zweifelhaftes Verhalten des Intendanten General zu berichten. In einem internen Vermerk wird die Haltung der mittleren Parteiebenen zu Glasmeier besonders deutlich. Dort heißt es : Doktor Glasmeier versucht, am Sender eine äußerlich möglichst autoritäre Rolle zu spielen und gibt in kurz aufeinander folgenden Zeiten umstürzendste Anweisungen. Praktisch wird jedoch der gesamte Betrieb von ihm losgelöst, damit er weiter funktionieren kann. Doktor Glasmeier hat « einen nahezu krankhaften Ehrgeiz » , möglichst in der Öffentlichkeit gesehen zu werden und möglichst oft von seinem Schreibtisch aus durchs Mikrofon zu « seinem Volk » zu sprechen. Als Lebensvorbild scheint ihm der des öfteren auch von ihm zitierte tolle Bomberg zu dienen. In einem der bekanntesten Nachtlokale Kölns ist er des öfteren im Zecherkreis zu sehen, steigt (in Uniform !) auf den Tisch, hält Reden und führt Ulk auf. Es scheinen Erwägungen im Gange zu sein, Doktor Glasmeier seines Amtes als Intendant zu entheben. Doktor Glasmeier scheint bei der örtlichen SS wegen seines « nichtkameradschaftlichen und adelsfreundlichen Wesens » in keinem besonderen nationalsozialistischen Ruf zu stehen.

Die Schwierigkeiten, die Glasmeier mit den örtlichen SS-Stellen hatte, blieben auch Heinrich Himmler nicht verborgen, so daß sein Verhältnis zu Glasmeier zunehmend problematischer wurde. Nachdrücklich bemühte sich Glasmeier hingegen, sein Ansehen bei der SS mit seinem historischen Wissen zu heben. So verfaßte er am 24. August 1936 eine Meldung an den SS-Abschnitt V, in der er sich ausführlich mit Hexenverfolgung und Inquisition auseinandersetzte. Er schließt seine Stellungnahme mit der Bemerkung : Bedauerlich ist es auch, daß unsere großen Staatsarchive noch immer von Archivaren aus der alten liberalistischen Zeit verwaltet werden. Es wird höchste Zeit, daß hier Wandel geschaffen wird.

Zudem ließ er keine Gelegenheit aus, dem Reichsführer SS seine persönliche Treue und Ergebenheit zu versichern. So richtete er zum Jahreswechsel 1935-1936 ein unterwürfiges Schreiben an ihn mit der Anrede Sehr verehrter, lieber Reichsführer-SS, in dem er, nachdem er gute Wünsche zu den Weihnächten, dem Julfest und für das neue Jahr vorangestellt hatte, nachfragte, wie es um den Plan stünde, ihn, Glasmeier, als Archivar in seinen Stab zu berufen. Entsprechende Absichten hatte Himmler anscheinend Anfang des Jahres geäußert, und Glasmeier war offenbar bereit, dafür seinen Funkdienst aufzugeben (Ihr Wunsch ist mir Befehl !). Er versäumte es auch nicht, Himmler bei dieser Gelegenheit an den Beginn ihrer Beziehungen zu erinnern, der erwähnten Fahrt zum Hermannsdenkmal am 6. Januar 1933 : Dieser für mich wichtige Gedenktag läßt mich mein damals abgegebenes Treuegelöbnis erneuern.

Die Antwort wenige Tage später dürfte für Glasmeier eine Ernüchterung gewesen sein : Das SS-Hauptamt teilte ihm mit, daß tatsächlich in Berlin ein Archiv und ein Museum eingerichtet werden sollte, in dem alle Dinge gesammelt werden sollten, die für die Geschichte der SS von Wert seien. Doch statt ihn mit dieser Aufgabe, für die er zweifellos ganz besonders qualifiziert gewesen wäre, zu betrauen, wurde er lediglich aufgefordert, dem SS-Hauptamt geeignete SS-Angehörige für die Stellen der Leitung und der Mitarbeiter zu benennen. Bei seiner Eitelkeit dürfte es ihn besonders getroffen haben, daß diese Aufforderung auf dem normalen Amtsweg, unterzeichnet durch einen SS-Gruppenführer, an ihn erging.

In diesem Zusammenhang ist auch auf das Verhältnis Glasmeiers zur Kirche einzugehen. Seine Herkunft aus dem traditionell katholisch geprägten Westmünsterland wurde schon erwähnt. Diese wirkte sich auch auf seine archivpflegerische Arbeit aus, nahm sich doch die Archivberatungsstelle unter seiner Leitung in ganz besonderer Weise der kirchlichen Archive an. Noch im Jahr 1930 hatte er sogar einen Lehrauftrag an der Philosophisch-Theologischen Akademie in Paderborn übernommen. Vor diesem Hintergrund sind seine späteren Beteuerungen, daß er sich bereits lange vor dem Parteieintritt innerlich von der Kirche abgewendet habe, wenig glaubhaft, zumal er einräumt, bis 1931 sogar die Sakramente in Anspruch genommen zu haben.

Auch die Anschuldigungen über seine kirchenfreundlichen Äußerungen sowie seinen angeblichen Gottesdienstbesuch in Köln in SS-Uniform entbehren sicherlich nicht jeder Grundlage. Hierzu paßt eine Erinnerung von Karl Holzamer, dem späteren Intendanten des ZDF, der in dieser Zeit als Redakteur beim WDR tätig und als überzeugter Katholik bekannt war. Er berichtet, daß Glasmeier ihm im Sommer 1933 selbst das Kruzifix gezeigt habe, das er in seinem Intendantenzimmer hatte aufhängen lassen, welches später allerdings verschwunden gewesen sei. Weiter bemerkt er: Ich hatte persönlich den Eindruck, daß Glasmeier mich in der eigenen Überzeugung in keiner Weise drücken wollte, sondern bemüht war, eine gewisse schützende Hand darüber zu halten, vorausgesetzt, daß man ihm keinen Ärger machte.

Noch im Sommer 1936 versuchte Glasmeier in einer Meldung an den SS-Abschnitt zu erklären, weshalb er immer noch nicht aus der Kirche ausgetreten sei, nämlich angeblich nach Rücksprache mit Himmler, Rosenberg und verschiedenen Gauleitern wegen meiner politischen Stellung als Intendant des Reichssenders Köln. Wenig später gab er auf einem Fragebogen unter « Konfession » an offiziell noch katholisch, das heißt kirchensteuermäßig. Erst im darauffolgenden Jahr bezeichnete er sich als gottgläubig, so daß in der Zwischenzeit der Kirchenaustritt erfolgt sein dürfte. Schließlich gibt auch die letzte Phase seines Wirkens im Stift Sankt Florian, von der noch zu handeln sein wird, mancherlei Hinweise darauf, daß eine innere Bindung zum kirchlichen Bereich immer noch bestand oder vielleicht auch erneut für ihn Bedeutung erlangt hatte.

Wesentlich konstanter als seine Beziehung zu Himmler hingegen gestaltete sich in der Folgezeit die zu Goebbels, wenngleich Verärgerung und Verdruß auch hier an der Tagesordnung waren. Die wichtigste Quelle hierfür bilden ab 1937 die Tagebücher des Reichspropagandaministers, in denen Glasmeier bis April 1944 fast 150mal erwähnt wird. Allein diese Tatsache belegt, welche Rolle Glasmeier für Goebbels gespielt hat.

Die Aufzeichnungen setzen damit ein, daß Goebbels in Erwägung zog, Glasmeier die Leitung des Reichsrundfunks zu übertragen. Er notierte in seinem Tagebuch am 1. Februar 1937: Vielleicht eignet sich Glasmeier zum Generalintendanten. Wir werden es prüfen. Wie es zu diesen Überlegungen gekommen ist, ist aus den Quellen nicht ersichtlich. Zwei Wochen später heißt es dagegen : Auch Glasmeier kaum als Generalintendant für den Rundfunk geeignet. Der entscheidende Anstoß kam allem Anschein nach von Hitler selbst. Goebbels notierte unter dem 8. März: Führer auch dafür, daß ich Glasmeier zum GI [das heißt Generalintendanten] mache. Also los! Am 1. April 1937 wurde er dann tatsächlich zum Reichsintendanten und Generaldirektor der Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft ernannt.

Die Bedeutung dieser Ernennung wird auch dadurch unterstrichen, daß es eine solche Position im Reich bislang noch nicht gegeben hatte. Im deutschen Funk wurde noch nie eine Persönlichkeit mit derartigen Generalvollmachten ausgerüstet, kommentierte der « Völkische Beobachter » den Vorgang. Für Glasmeier selbst bedeutete dies zweifellos einen Höhepunkt seiner Karriere, den er sicherlich selbst kaum erwartet haben dürfte. Hatte er sich schon als Intendant in Köln weitgehend von dem gesellschaftlichen Absturz, der für ihn mit dem Zusammenbruch seiner Stellung als Adelsarchivar verbunden war, erholt, so rückte er nun in eine Spitzenstellung des Reiches auf. Seinem übersteigerten Bedürfnis nach Repräsentation und einem Leben « nach Gutsherrenart » kam diese Position in außerordentlicher Weise entgegen. Er hatte auch keine Scheu, einen solchen Stil in Berlin voll auszuleben, was ihm natürlich auch dort mancherlei Mißbilligung aus Partei- und Rundfunkkreisen eintrug. So behauptete man, er sei bisweilen hoch zu Roß (das Reiten war eine seiner größten Leidenschaften) im « Haus des Rundfunks » in der Masurenallee eingeritten. Glasmeier lebt auf zu großem Fuße, notierte Goebbels am 16. November 1939 in seinem Tagebuch.

Es ist also nicht überraschend, daß auch während seiner Berliner Zeit die Denunziationen und Beschwerden über ihn aus Parteikreisen nicht aufhörten. Im Frühjahr 1938 scheint eine solche auch bei Goebbels Aufmerksamkeit gefunden zu haben. In einem sehr persönlichen Brief an den Propagandaminister sah sich Glasmeier genötigt, alle Verdächtigungen hinsichtlich seiner Integrität zurückzuweisen: Irgend jemand hat mal wieder versucht, Ihr Vertrauen zu mir zu erschüttern, beginnt sein Schreiben vom 18. Mai. Er drückt sodann seine tiefe Enttäuschung darüber aus, daß Goebbels offensichtlich an seiner Ergebenheit gezweifelt habe und erklärt, daß er zu denjenigen seiner Mitarbeiter gehöre, die stets zu ihm gestanden hätten und stünden : Ich habe Ihnen einmal die Treue gelobt, und ich gehöre zu den vielleicht etwas unmodernen Menschen, denen Treue kein leerer Wahn ist ! Der Brief schließt mit der Bitte, ihm doch wenigstens einmal im Monat Gelegenheit zu einer ergiebigen Aussprache zu geben.

Es entwickelten sich permanente Querelen innerhalb der Führungsclique des Reichsrundfunks, die Goebbels sehr zu schaffen machten. Mal lag nach seiner Einschätzung die Schuld bei Glasmeier (Gebe Glasmeier auch privat noch eine kleine Lektion. Er muß scharf am Zügel gehalten werden.) , mal bei den anderen (Weber hetzt im Rundfunk unentwegt gegen Glasmeier. Wir müssen Weber wohl beseitigen. Eher gibt es da keine Ruhe.) . Aus Parteikreisen wurde das Mißtrauen gegen Glasmeier immer wieder geschürt. Ende 1939 kam es erneut zu einer Untersuchung gegen ihn, in deren Verlauf die Akten des Prozesses in der Sache Keiper aus der Kölner Zeit hervorgeholt wurden.

Zeitweilig scheint Goebbels entschlossen gewesen zu sein, Glasmeier fallenzulassen. Wahrscheinlich aber hat Hitler persönlich alle Maßnahmen gegen ihn unterbunden. Am 5. Dezember 1939 notierte Goebbels jedenfalls im Tagebuch, daß er dem Führer den Fall Glasmeier klar gelegt habe, ohne daß er allerdings mitteilt, zu welchen Ergebnissen dieses Gespräch geführt hatte.

Die Bedenken gegen Glasmeiers Amtsführung wurden jedoch immer gravierender. Am 16. Januar 1940, während Glasmeier an einem dreimonatigen Einsatz in der Wehrmacht teilnahm, erließ Goebbels ein neues Organisationsstatut für den Reichsrundfunk, durch das Glasmeiers Kompetenzen erheblich eingeschränkt wurden. Ihm verblieb nur die organisatorische Verantwortung, der Einfluß auf die Programmgestaltung wurde ihm dagegen weitgehend entzogen. Daß dies de facto eine Entmachtung war, hat Glasmeier offenbar gemerkt. Bald nach seiner Rückkehr nach Berlin machte er nämlich in einem Brief vom 24. April an Professor Stieren, den Direktor des Museums für Vor- und Frühgeschichte in Münster, die sarkastische Bemerkung : Sitze seit Ende Februar wieder in Berlin und bemühe mich, die Musikberieselungsanlage in Gang zu halten.

Auch der Beginn des Krieges führte nicht zu einer Beendigung der internen Machtkämpfe um den Einfluß im Reichsrundfunk. Mit Alfred-Ingemar Berndt, dem Leiter der Presseabteilung im Propagandaministerium, einem altgedienten Parteijournalisten, kam es zu scharfen Auseinandersetzungen, die Goebbels immer wieder schlichten mußte: Berndt hat Krach mit Glasmeier. Aber dabei hat er Recht. Glasmeier ist ein unwirtlicher Geselle, und das Ministerium führt den Rundfunk, nicht umgekehrt, notierte er am 25. Oktober 1939 in seinem Tagebuch, in dem es aber wenig später aber auch heißt : Berndt möchte ihn (das heißt Glasmeier) gern abservieren. Aber das lasse ich nicht zu. Aber auch nachdem ihm der Einfluß auf die Programmgestaltung des Rundfunks Anfang 1940 weitgehend entzogen worden war, blieb Glasmeier Goebbels' wichtigster Vertrauensmann in der Reichsrundfunkanstalt, auf den er besonders in heiklen Angelegenheiten zurückgriff. Dies belegt der Tagebucheintrag vom 22. Juni 1941, dem Tag des Angriffs auf Rußland : Mit Glasmeier und Diewerge (Leiter der Rundfunkabteilung im Propagandaministerium) Rundfunkeinsatz besprochen. Sie müssen nun ins Bild gesetzt werden. Vermutlich steht eine bereits zwei Monate zuvor gemachte Eintragung, nach der er mit Glasmeier besprochen hatte, wie die zu erwartenden großen neuen Nachrichten im Rundfunk dargestellt werden sollten, hiermit in Zusammenhang.

Vielleicht haben diese ständigen Querelen und die weithin verbreitete Kritik aus der Partei dazu beigetragen, daß Glasmeier nach anderen beziehungsweise zusätzlichen Herausforderungen Ausschau hielt. Hier bot sich bald eine Möglichkeit, die seinen Interessen in besonderer Weise entgegenkam : Am 21. Januar 1941 hatte die Gestapo das oberösterreichische Augustinerstift Sankt Florian beschlagnahmt und die Chorherren wenig später aus ihrem Kloster ausgewiesen. Sankt Florian war seit dem 19. Jahrhundert als Wirkungsstätte Anton Bruckners bekannt geworden, der nach seinem Tod 1898 dort seine letzte Ruhestätte gefunden hatte. Seine Musik wurde (neben der Richard Wagners) von der nationalsozialistischen Kulturpolitik besonders gefördert. Zunächst war daran gedacht, die weitläufige Klosteranlage dem Reichsgau Oberdonau zu übertragen, der sie als Stätte der Musikpflege und Repräsentation nutzen wollte.

Glasmeier hatte das Stift im Jahre 1930 kennengelernt, als der 22. Deutsche Archivtag, der gemeinsam mit den österreichischen Archivaren veranstaltet wurde, in Wien und Linz stattfand. Eine der Tagungsexkursionen führte auch nach Sankt Florian. Schon damals hatte die Klosteranlage einen tiefen Eindruck auf ihn gemacht. Hinzu kam seine besondere Verehrung für Anton Bruckner, die ihm bereits 1938 die Ehrenurkunde der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft eingetragen hatte. Die Nachricht von der Aufhebung des Stiftes erregte sofort sein Interesse und ließ in ihm den Plan entstehen, hier ein kulturelles Zentrum für den Reichsrundfunk zu errichten.

Ihm kam zugute, daß Hitler selbst in seinem Bestreben, seinen Heimatgau « Oberdonau » mit der Hauptstadt Linz zu einem kulturellen Zentrum als Konkurrenz zu dem von ihm wenig geliebten Wien zu machen, auf Sankt Florian ein besonderes Augenmerk richtete. Bereits im Juli 1941 war Glasmeier in Linz und führte Verhandlungen. Goebbels notierte hierzu : Glasmeier berichtet mir von seinen Besprechungen in Linz. Er ist dort an der Arbeit, das Stift Sankt Florian, in dem Bruckner lange gewirkt hat, für den Rundfunk zu erwerben und es für die Bruckner-Forschung wie auch für die Bruckner-Musik zur Verfügung zu stellen. Ich halte diesen Plan für ausgezeichnet und unterstütze diese Bestrebungen. Allerdings sind noch eine Reihe von anderen Instanzen am Werk, um dieses schöne Stift in Besitz zu nehmen. Wenige Tage später hatte Goebbels diese Pläne Hitler vorgetragen, der davon begeistert war und sofort dem Gau Oberdonau die nötigen Weisungen erteilte.

Glasmeier begab sich erneut nach Linz und konnte Goebbels bald darauf melden, daß es ihm gelungen sei zu erreichen, den größten Teil der Stiftsanlage für den Reichsrundfunk zu gewinnen. Dort sollte die Bruckner-Gesellschaft ihren Sitz erhalten und ein erstklassiges Orchester entstehen, das in Elite-Aufnahmen (Goebbels) Schallplatten für die Verbreitung im Rundfunk produzieren sollte. Für die notwendigen Investitionen forderte Glasmeier vorerst 10 Millionen Mark, eine für damalige Verhältnisse wahrlich gewaltige Summe. Goebbels stimmte dem Plan trotz der hohen Kosten zu und versprach, sofort die Einwilligung Hitlers einzuholen.

Dennoch zogen sich die Verhandlungen zunächst hin. Erst im Juli 1942 kamen sie zum Abschluß. Am 1. September 1942 trat der Vertrag in Kraft : Das Stift Sankt Florian wurde vom Reichsgau Oberdonau auf 99 Jahre an die Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft für eine symbolische Zahlung von einer Reichsmark jährlich verpachtet. Hiermit begann die letzte Phase in Glasmeiers Wirken, die, obgleich sie nur etwa zweieinhalb Jahre dauerte, sicherlich die in doppeltem Sinne des Wortes merkwürdigste werden sollte. Sie in all' ihren Facetten und Eigentümlichkeiten zu schildern, würde den Rahmen dieses Aufsatzes weit überschreiten.

Als seine wichtigste Aufgabe sah er es an, in Sankt Florian ein großes Reichsrundfunkorchester mit höchstem Qualitätsanspruch unter dem Namen « Bruckner-Orchester » und einen nicht minder großartigen Chor aufzubauen. Hierfür mußten jedoch erst die baulichen Voraussetzungen geschaffen werden. Bereits am 28. Juli 1942 beantragte Glasmeier daher bei Goebbels, aus der Baureserve des Reichsrundfunks fünf Millionen Reichsmark, das war ein Viertel des gesamten Ansatzes, für die Maßnahmen in Sankt Florian entnehmen zu dürfen. Außerdem bat er um Freigabe von Devisen im Wert von 500.000 Reichsmark, um damit Möbel, Gobelins und andere kostbare Ausstattungsstücke im Ausland, vor allem in Frankreich und Italien, zu kaufen. Während die fünf Millionen sofort bewilligt wurden, stieß die Devisenfreigabe auf Schwierigkeiten, die Glasmeier dadurch löste, daß er kurzerhand Fakten schaffte und entsprechende Käufe im Ausland auch ohne Genehmigung tätigte.

Für die Bauleitung holte er einen alten Bekannten aus seiner Zeit als westfälischer Adelsarchivdirektor nach Sankt Florian, und zwar den Düsseldorfer Architekten Franz Schneider, der bereits 1924 für ihn den Neubau des Landsbergschen Gesamtarchivs in Velen geplant und errichtet und in der Weimarer Zeit zudem für zahlreiche westfälische Schloßherren als Architekt gearbeitet hatte. Vielerlei, vornehmlich erhaltende Baumaßnahmen wurden umgehend in Angriff genommen, noch mehr Planungen für umfangreiche Um- und Ergänzungsbauten ausgearbeitet: ein Stiftstheater, eine Prälaten- und eine Stiftshalle, eine Wandelhalle vor dem Sommerrefektorium, eine Kristallgalerie und ein Vitrinenzimmer. Zu einer Verwirklichung dieser weitreichenden Pläne kam es jedoch nicht, obgleich es Glasmeier oftmals gelang, kriegsbedingte Restriktionen durch Tricks und Täuschung zu umgehen. So ließ er unmittelbar unterhalb der östlichen Stiftsmauer einen Swimmingpool anlegen, den er kurzerhand als Löschteich deklarierte. Die berühmte Orgel der Stiftskirche, als « Bruckner-Orgel » bekannt, wurde mit hohem Kostenaufwand unter der Verantwortung des Wiener Orgelexperten Professor Josef Mertin einer vollständigen Restaurierung unterzogen, die jedoch erst nach Kriegsende abgeschlossen werden konnte. Bis zum Januar 1944 hatte Glasmeier rund 4,5 Millionen Mark für Sankt Florian ausgegeben, davon allein 2,4 Millionen für Einrichtungsgegenstände, durchweg solche von hohem künstlerischen beziehungsweise antiquarischen Wert. Für die Unterhaltung der Gebäude waren bis dahin dagegen lediglich 130.000 Mark verwendet worden.

Im Prälatentrakt des Stiftes richtete er seine persönlichen Arbeits- und Wohnräume ein, die er, nachdem seine Dienstvilla in Berlin-Dahlem im Januar 1943 den Bomben zum Opfer gefallen war, mit seiner Familie bewohnte. Er behielt jedoch bis zum Schluß einen Wohnsitz in Berlin bei, da er ständig zwischen Berlin und Sankt Florian pendelte. Dies funktionierte vor allem deshalb einigermaßen reibungslos, weil er an beiden Standorten über außerordentlich kompetente und loyale enge Mitarbeiter verfügte. In Sankt Florian waren dies vor allem der ehemalige technische Direktor des Reichssenders Wien, Professor Doktor Gustav Schwaiger, sowie Doktor Eugen Kurt Fischer, der schon als Sendeleiter beim WDR für ihn gearbeitet hatte. In Berlin vertrat ihn als sein persönlicher Adjutant Oskar Haaf, ein altbewährter Rundfunkfachmann, der auch in der Rundfunkgeschichte der Nachkriegszeit noch eine Rolle spielte.

Außerordentliche Erfolge waren Glasmeier, der persönlich als unmusikalisch charakterisiert wurde, beim Aufbau des Bruckner-Orchesters und des Bruckner-Chores beschieden, die um so eindrucksvoller sind, wenn man die kurze Zeitspanne ihrer Verwirklichung in Betracht zieht: Es gelang ihm, die besten Kräfte aus allen deutschen Orchestern nach Sankt Florian abzuwerben, nicht zuletzt deshalb, weil er es mit seiner ihm eigenen Beharrlichkeit gegen den Widerstand vieler Parteistellen durchsetzte, diesen Spitzengehälter zahlen zu dürfen und er ihnen im bis dahin von Kriegshandlungen noch weitgehend verschonten Oberösterreich eine optimale Arbeitsatmosphäre bieten konnte.

Auf dem Höhepunkt seiner kurzen Geschichte hatte das Orchester mehr als 100 Mitglieder. Der Chor stand unter der Leitung des Thomaskantors Günther Ramín und umfaßte rund 60 Sänger. Zum Orchestererzieher wurde Georg-Ludwig Jochum, der jüngere Bruder Eugen Jochums, bestellt. Wilhelm Furtwängler, Karl Böhm und Herbert von Karajan wurden als Gastdirigenten verpflichtet. Zum Programmchef des Orchesters und seinem persönlichen Referenten für alle Musikangelegenheiten bestellte Glasmeier Rudolf Schulz-Dornburg, der und andere 1925 Generalmusikdirektor in Münster und 1941 Chefdirigent des Großen Berliner Rundfunkorchesters gewesen war. Das Streicherensemble des Orchesters war 1944 nach Einschätzung Furtwänglers eines der besten in Europa, der gesamte Klangkörper war ohne Zweifel auf dem Wege zur Weltpitzenklasse.

Es kam jedoch nur zu ganz wenigen großen Konzerten. Das erste dieser Art war für den »Führergeburtstag« (20. April) 1943 geplant. Es sollte in der Stiftskirche stattfinden. Da diese aber nicht beheizbar war und das Orchester in dem eiskalten Raum nicht hätte spielen können, plante Glasmeier, bereits eine Woche zuvor mit provisorischen Öfen die Kirche zu temperieren. Angesichts des Mangels an Heizmaterial und der unverhältnismäßig hohen Kosten wurde dieser Plan aber von der Gauleitung gestoppt. Das einzige wirklich große Konzert war die Aufführung der 8. Symphonie Bruckners in der Stiftskirche unter der Stabführung von Herbert von Karajan am 23. Juli 1944. Hierüber brachte der « Völkische Beobachter » einen ausführlichen Bericht, der von allen großen Zeitungen des Reiches, und andere auch von der « Tremonia » in Dortmund, übernommen wurde. Wenige Tage zuvor war zum ersten Male ein Konzert des « Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters » , wie es offiziell hieß, im Rundfunk gesendet worden, dem die Presse höchstes Lob zollte.

Zur Pflege der Musik alter Meister wurde die Spielgemeinschaft Emil Seiler verpflichtet, die dafür auf eine umfangreiche Sammlung wertvollster alter Instrumente, auf Glasmeiers Veranlassung im gesamten Reich und im Ausland erworben, zurückgreifen konnte und bei zahlreichen Veranstaltungen im kleineren Rahmen auftrat.

Ganz offensichtlich blieb die tausendjährige Geschichte des Stiftes, die Kunst und Kultur, die dem Ort seine Ausstrahlung gaben, nicht ohne Rückwirkung auf Glasmeier selbst. Das naßforsche Auftreten im Stile eines ranghohen SS-Manns, übrigens auch durch erhaltene Originaltonaufzeichnungen einiger Reden im Rundfunk nachvollziehbar, das er sich in den Jahren zuvor besonders in Berlin zu eigen gemacht hatte, wurde mehr und mehr vom Gehabe eines großzügigen Förderers der Künste, insbesondere der Musik, überlagert. Aufschlußreich ist dafür sein abschriftlich überliefertes persönliches Gästebuch : Es enthält die Namen von nicht weniger als 167 Künstlern und Literaten der Zeit, unter ihnen Interpreten wie Elly Ney, Walter Gieseking, Gerhard Husch, Paul Schöffler, Karl Erb und Ludwig Hölscher, Komponisten wie Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner und Wolfgang Fortner oder Literaten wie Hans Carossa, Ernst Wiechert, Werner Bergengruen, Manfred Hausmann, Alia Rachmanowa, Ruth Schaumann und Max Mell.

Aber auch das Stift als geistliche Einrichtung, obgleich das klösterliche Leben erloschen war, übte auf ihn eine große Faszination aus. Er fühlte sich offenbar mehr und mehr in die Tradition des Stiftes eingebunden, wie einige seiner engsten Mitarbeiter übereinstimmend in ihren Erinnerungen berichten. So ließ er in der Abtsgruft an den Todestagen seiner « Vorgänger » Kränze niederlegen. Mit dem letzten Propst Doktor Vinzenz Hartl, der dem Konvent auch in seinem Exil im Kloster Pulgarn vorstand, unterhielt er enge, manche meinen sogar freundschaftliche Kontakte. Als dieser am 6. Oktober 1944 starb, wurde es Glasmeier angeblich von Gœbbels selbst strikt untersagt, wie von ihm beabsichtigt, an der Beisetzung auf dem Priesterfriedhof des Stiftes teilzunehmen. Nach Zeugenaussagen verfolgte er daraufhin die Beerdigung von einem Fenster aus.

Doch dürfte es weniger das klösterliche Leben als solches gewesen sein, das auf ihn so anziehend wirkte, als vielmehr das prunkvolle Barock-Ambiente von Sankt Florian, das ihm nunmehr die Möglichkeit bot, einen Lebensstil zu pflegen, der die Maßstäbe, die er im Umgang mit dem westfälischen Adel kennen und schätzen gelernt hatte, weit in den Schatten stellte. Immerhin war er nun Herr eines barocken Schlosses mit mehr als 400 Zimmern, bedeutenden Kunstsammlungen und großartigsten Repräsentationsräumen. Dazu versetzten ihn die ihm zur Verfügung stehenden Mittel in die Lage, in repräsentativer Weise Gäste zu empfangen, fürstlich zu bewirten und ihnen darüber hinaus noch Kunst- und Kulturgenuß von höchstem Anspruch zu bieten.

In welcher exzessiver Weise er von diesen Möglichkeiten Gebrauch machte, ist nicht nur in vielen Details in seiner Korrespondenz, die sich in großem Umfang im Stiftsarchiv Sankt Florian erhalten hat, zu belegen, sondern wird auch von Augenzeugen aus seiner unmittelbaren Umgebung berichtet. Wichtige Gäste pflegte er am Stiftsportal mit einem Becher Wein willkommen zu heißen, manchmal auch unter Fanfarenklängen vom Turm. Dies war zum Beispiel der Fall, als Rüstungsminister Albert Speer in Begleitung hoher Militärs und Wirtschaftsvertreter zum Abschluß einer Rüstungstagung in Linz am 25. Juni 1944 Sankt Florian besuchte. Zu Ehren der Gäste gab es zum Empfang Turmmusik, in der Stiftskirche wurde Bruckners Vierte Symphonie aufgeführt und abends eine Serenade auf der Kaiserstiege. Bis spät in die Nacht saß man bei leichter Musik und gutem Essen im Marmorsaal des Stiftes zusammen.

Höhepunkt in Glasmeiers Sankt Florianer Zeit war jedoch der 4. April 1943. Am Tag zuvor hatte Glasmeier das Bruckner-Orchester in der Krypta der Kirche vor dem Sarge Bruckners feierlich auf den großen Genius vereidigt, wie Eugen Kurt Fischer berichtet. Offenbar hatte er einen vertraulichen Hinweis erhalten, daß am folgenden Tag Adolf Hitler, der sich zu einer Besichtigung von Rüstungsanlagen in Linz aufhielt, nach Sankt Florian kommen werde. Um 11 Uhr traf dieser in Begleitung Speers, mehrerer Gauleiter und Generäle ein. In den eineinhalb Stunden seines Aufenthaltes ließ er sich die wichtigsten Kunstwerke zeigen, hörte ein kurzes Orgelspiel in der Kirche, besuchte das Grab Bruckners und bekam im Musikzimmer ein kleines Konzert der Spielgemeinschaft Seiler geboten. Glasmeier hatte dabei Gelegenheit, Hitler, der ihm im übrigen wenige Wochen zuvor anläßlich des 10. Jahrestags der Machtergreifung das goldene Ehrenzeichen der NSDAP sowie das Kriegsverdienstkreuz I. Klasse verliehen hatte, seine weitreichenden Planungen für Sankt Florian anschaulich zu schildern.

Hitler war begeistert. Er erklärte, das Brucknerstift müße das bedeutendste Kulturinstitut und Konservatorium Europas werden und sei aufs Großartigste auszubauen. Kurt Eugen Fischer, auch selbst ganz begeistert von dem Ergebnis des Besuches, bemerkte dazu in einem Brief vom folgenden Tag : Der Reichsintendant hat durch diesen Besuch, der überaus positiv verlief, eine völlig unangreifbare Stellung gewonnen und kann sich mit Recht als Sieger fühlen. Der Begriff « Sieger » bezog sich offenbar auf Glasmeiers innerparteiliche Widersacher, einschließlich des Gauleiters Eigruber, denen sein barockes Gehabe sowie seine ungebremste Ausgabenflut längst ein Dorn im Auge waren. Auch Gøebbels kommentiert den Aufenthalt Hitlers in Sankt Florian in seinem Tagebuch : Er hat Sankt Florian besucht und dort den besten Eindruck empfangen. Auch Glasmeier hat ihm in seiner ruhigen Beständigkeit und seinem nüchternen Fanatismus Freude gemacht. Er wünscht, daß ich das Bruckner-Orchester in Linz zu einem der ersten Klasseorchester des Reiches mache.

In der Tat scheint Glasmeier in der Folgezeit jeden Maßstab verloren zu haben. Er kaufte alles zusammen, was gut und teuer war, beschäftigte die besten Kunsthandwerker, die er gegebenenfalls aus dem Felde holte und, immer mit dem Verweis auf die Wünsche des « Führers » , « u.k. » (« unabhömmlich ») stellen ließ. Nur ein Beispiel sei angeführt, die sog. « Sankt Florianer Tafel » : Um hohe Gäste standesgemäß bewirten zu können, gab Glasmeier 1944 die Ausstattung einer kompletten Festtafel für 60 Personen in Auftrag : ein Tafelservice aus edelstem Porzellan, das die Wiener Porzellanmanufaktur nach dem Vorbild des Hochzeits-Services von Maria Theresia herstellen sollte, ein vergoldetes Silberbesteck, dem Mundbesteck Kaiser Franz' I. nachgebildet, ein komplettes Gläserservice, dazu Leuchter, Terrinen, Vasen, Fruchtteller, feinste Tischwäsche, eben alles, was zu einer barocken höfischen Tafel gehörte. Es wurden großzügige Anzahlungen geleistet, allein für das Porzellan 80.000 Reichsmark. Ein Teil des Porzellans (56 Teile für 12 Personen) wurde tatsächlich fertiggestellt und hat den Krieg überdauert. Es wurde im Jahre 2001 mit einem Schätzwert von 25.000 Euro auf einer Wiener Auktion angeboten.

Befremden hervorrief und Grundlage für allerlei Legenden gab, kann nicht überraschen. Hiervon sind auch alle zeitgenössischen Berichte sowie die nach dem Krieg entstandenen rückblickenden Erinnerungen seiner Mitarbeiter durchdrungen, so daß der Wahrheitsgehalt vieler Glasmeier-Anekdoten nur schwer nachprüfbar ist. Die Frage, die sich dem heutigen Betrachter aufdrängt, nämlich die, wie dies eigentlich möglich war, haben sich auch die Zeitgenossen schon gestellt. Es gibt darauf nur eine Antwort : Glasmeier genoß das volle Vertrauen Hitlers und verstand es, diesem in der Trostlosigkeit der Kriegereignisse eine Illusion für die Zeit nach dem siegreichen Ende des Krieges, an den Glasmeier offensichtlich bis zum Schluß fest glaubte, zu vermitteln. Mit dem Hinweis auf den angeblichen Willen des « Führers » setzte Glasmeier seine Pläne immer wieder gegen alle Widersacher durch. Man scheute sich offenbar, sich ernsthaft dagegen zu stellen, weil man wußte, wie sehr der Ausbau Sankt Florians zu einem kulturellen Zentrum ersten Ranges dem Wunsche Hitlers entsprach. Hierzu paßt ein Gerücht, das der Dolmetscherin des Großmufti von Jerusalem, der Sankt Florian im Dezember 1944 einen Besuch abgestattet hatte, zu Ohren gekommen war : Hitler beabsichtige, so wurde ihr berichtet, Sankt Florian später einmal zu seinem Altersruhesitz zu machen. Auch wenn dieses Gerücht möglicherweise keinerlei realen Hintergrund hatte, gibt es einen Hinweis darauf, wie sich die Umgebung die unglaublichen Vorgänge in Sankt Florian in den letzten Monaten vor dem für jedermann absehbaren Zusammenbruch zu erklären versuchte.

In die Sankt Florianer Zeit fällt noch eine weitere merkwürdige Episode im Wirken Glasmeiers: Am 5. November 1943 sandte ihn Goebbels als Bevollmächtigten des Reichsministers für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda nach Frankreich und übertrug ihm dort die Erledigung aller Angelegenheiten seines Ressorts. Er informierte den Chef des OKW (Oberkommando der Wehrmacht) Generalfeldmarschall Keitel in einem Schreiben über seine Anordnung und forderte ihn auf, die Militärbefehlshaber in Frankreich hiervon in Kenntnis zu setzen. Hintergrund war offenbar ein Machtkampf zwischen Goebbels und der Wehrmacht, die die Propaganda im besetzten Frankreich an das Auswärtige Amt übertragen wollte, um sie de facto selbst in der Hand zu behalten : Dieser Absicht bin ich durch meine Entsendung Glasmeiers zuvorgekommen. Jetzt kommt Keitel auf den typischen Ausweg, die Frage einer Entscheidung des Führers zu unterbreiten. Um diese Entscheidung ist mir nicht bange, notierte Goebbels am 24. November 1943 in seinem Tagebuch, wobei diese Bemerkung ein weiterer Beleg für die Hochschätzung Glasmeiers sowohl durch Goebbels als auch durch Hitler ist. Glasmeier begab sich umgehend nach Paris. Sein dortiges Wirken hat, soweit bisher erkennbar, nur wenig Spuren in den Akten hinterlassen. Im zeitigen Frühjahr scheint er wieder nach Berlin beziehungsweise Sankt Florian zurückgekehrt zu sein, vielleicht auch aus privaten Gründen, da sein jüngstes Kind und einziger Sohn Elmar am 13. März im Alter von nur fünf Jahren plötzlich verstorben war. Hintergründe und nähere Umstände dieser Mission liegen bisher noch weitgehend im dunkeln.

Ganz anders hatte sich Glasmeiers Verhältnis zum Reichsführer SS Heinrich Himmler entwickelt : Hatte dieser ihm im Frühjahr 1943 noch ein Geburtstagsgeschenk zukommen lassen, so ließ er einen Antrag Goebbels', Glasmeier im Hinblick auf seine neue wichtige Aufgabe in Frankreich vom SS-Oberführer (das entsprach dem Range eines Oberst) zum SS-Brigadeführer (Generalmajor) zu befördern, brüsk zurückweisen: Der Reichsführer SS halte Glasmeier einer Beförderung nicht für würdig, wurde dem Minister von Himmlers Büro kurz und bündig mitgeteilt.

Im Laufe des Jahres 1944 wurde das Wirken Glasmeiers in Sankt Florian auch für seine engsten Mitarbeiter immer unheimlicher, weil es sich inzwischen als völlig wirklichkeitsfremd darstellte. Fischer bemerkt dazu rückblickend :

Schrecklich wurde es, als auch dem letzten die Binde von den Augen fallen mußte und der Mann im Prälatenzimmer des Stifts immer noch Porzellanmanufakturen, Restauratoren, Ebenisten, Teppichweber, Instrumentenbauer, Bildhauer und andere Künstler von Berlin, von Wien und (wenn mich die Erinnerung nicht täuscht) , sogar von Paris zu sich bat, um ein Projekt zu verwirklichen, dessen Zusammenhang mit dem Rundfunk immer fadenscheiniger wurde als « Schloßherr » von Hitlers Gnaden, dessen Träume in ihrer Extravaganz an die des Bayernkönig Ludwig erinnerten, obwohl bei ihm der Wille zur Einsamkeit und der Drang zur Geselligkeit in stetem Widerstreit miteinander standen.

Im Herbst des Jahres wurde auch Sankt Florian mehr und mehr von der schrecklichen Kriegswirklichkeit eingeholt. Am 11. Oktober gab das Bruckner-Orchester sein letztes Konzert, wenige Tage später belegte ein Sanitätspark der Heeresgruppe Südost das Stift. Obgleich Glasmeier immer noch große Pläne verfolgte (und andere hatte er einen prachtvollen Bildband und einen Film über Sankt Florian in Auftrag gegeben) fühlte er sich andererseits verpflichtet, in dieser Zeit einen persönlichen Beitrag zur Rettung des Reiches durch aktiven Kriegseinsatz leisten zu müssen. Oder war dies doch bereits Resignation ? Er beantragte jedenfalls, seine »u.k.-Stellung« als Reichsintendant aufzuheben, um in einer Einheit der Waffen-SS aktiven Kriegsdienst zu leisten. Am 8. November teilte er der Kanzlei des Reichsrundfunks in Berlin durch Fernschreiben mit, daß er auf dem Wege nach Ungarn zum Kriegseinsatz sei : Sieheil dem Führer ! endet das Schreiben.

Doch nun geschah etwas, was nur aus dem Gesamtzusammenhang dieses Geschehens erklärbar ist und dieses andererseits selbst erklärt: Als Hitler von dem Fronteinsatz Glasmeiers erfuhr, beorderte er ihn umgehend zurück mit dem ausdrücklichen Befehl, sich weiterhin ausschließlich um das Stift Sankt Florian zu kümmern. Bereits im Dezember war Glasmeier wieder dort, rechtzeitig genug, um den Großmufti von Jerusalem mit seinem Gefolge gebührend zu empfangen.

Damit war ihm die Gesamtverantwortung für das Stift ausdrücklich durch Hitler persönlich übertragen worden, auch gegenüber der Wehrmacht. Dies war in der Schlußphase des Krieges ganz besonders wichtig: Angeblich war Gauleiter Eigruber entschlossen, das Stift beim Einrücken des Feindes dem Erdboden gleichzumachen. Hierüber soll es zu einer heftigen Auseinandersetzung zwischen ihm und Glasmeier gekommen sein. Dieser begab sich daher Ende Februar 1945 ein letztes Mal nach Berlin, um einen direkten Befehl Hitlers zu erwirken, Sankt Florian vor jeder Zerstörung zu bewahren. Am 8. März teilte er Schwaiger von Berlin aus mit : Es steht alles gut in meinen Verhandlungen und ich hoffe, bald vollen Erfolg melden zu können. Hoffentlich halten Sie das Stift inzwischen in Ordnung ! Tatsächlich gelang es ihm nach hartnäckigen Bemühungen, von Bormann das gewünschte Schreiben auf Befehl des Führers zu erhalten. In diesem wurde seine alleinige Verantwortung für Sankt Florian bestätigt und angeordnet, daß das Stift mit allen Nebengebäuden vor Kriegseinwirkungen zu schützen und notfalls kampfflos und unversehrt dem Gegner zu übergeben sei. Anfang April kehrte Glasmeier nach Sankt Florian zurück. Von seinem Berliner Adjutanten Haaf hatte er sich mit der Bemerkung verabschiedet : Wir werden uns nicht wiedersehen. Einen Zusammenbruch, den von 1918, habe ich überlebt. Einen zweiten werde und will ich nicht überleben, zumal ich als Angehöriger der SS nichts Gutes zu erwarten habe.

Zum « Führergeburtstag » am 20. April 1945 plante er noch ein festliches Konzert, zu dem eine umfangreiche Gästeliste erstellt wurde, obgleich das Orchester durch Einberufungen inzwischen auf eine kleine Schar zusammengeschmolzen war. Am 5. Mai unterzeichnete er die letzte Zahlungsanweisung für seinen Architekten Franz

Schneider, die allerdings nicht mehr zu Ausführung kam, da der Einmarsch der Amerikaner unmittelbar bevorstand. Nach Augenzeugenberichten verließ er noch am gleichen Tag mit einem Wagen und einem Fahrer, angeblich mit Panzerfäusten und Maschinenpistolen bewaffnet, Sankt Florian, um sich an die Ostfront zur Leibstandarte Adolf Hitler zu begeben. In Kremsmünster und Graz soll er noch gesehen worden sein. Danach verliert sich die Spur. Alle in seiner unmittelbaren Umgebung gingen davon aus, daß er an der Front freiwillig den Tod gesucht habe. Seine Familie blieb zunächst in Sankt Florian zurück. Im Winter 1945-1946 wurde er amtlich für tot erklärt.

Bei der Vielfältigkeit seiner Wirkungsfelder und der Gegensätzlichkeit seiner Charakterzüge ist es kaum möglich, eine einheitliche Bewertung seiner Persönlichkeit vorzunehmen. Die letzten Lebensjahre, in denen er zwischen Berlin und Sankt Florian pendelte, sind zweifellos die bemerkenswertesten : Auf der einen Seite ein geradezu naives Vertrauen in den « Führer » und ein noch naiverer Glaube an den Sieg bis unmittelbar vor dem bitteren Ende und auf der anderen Seite der Aufbau eines kulturellen Zentrums, das in kurzer Zeit auf dem Wege war, sich zu einer der ersten Kulturadressen in Europa zu entwickeln, zweifellos eine konzeptionelle und organisatorische Meisterleistung. Ob ohne ihn das Stift Sankt Florian tatsächlich zerstört worden wäre, mag dahingestellt bleiben. An seinem unermüdlichen Einsatz für die Erhaltung dieses Kleinods abendländischer Klosterkultur besteht dagegen kein Zweifel.

Wesentlich zurückhaltender hingegen wird man sein Wirken als Rundfunkintendant bewerten. Hier fehlte ihm offenkundig das nötige Fachwissen, sicherlich auch weitgehend die Führungskompetenz für ein so großes Unternehmen.

Am nachhaltigsten waren aber zweifellos die zehn Jahre seines Wirkens als Adelsarchivar und Leiter der Archivberatungsstelle in Westfalen. Hier hat er durch unermüdlichen Einsatz, Ideenreichtum, Organisationstalent und Verbundenheit mit der Geschichte und Kultur Westfalens Initiativen entfaltet, die dauerhaft Bestand hatten: die Sensibilisierung der Öffentlichkeit für den Wert der privaten, kommunalen und kirchlichen Archive sowie die Entwicklung der Strukturen einer systematischen Archivpflege in privater und kommunaler Trägerschaft. Diese Ideen konnten in den nachfolgenden Jahrzehnten fortentwickelt werden und prägen die westfälische Archivlandschaft noch heute. Auch der von ihm ins Leben gerufene Adelsarchivverein besteht seit mehr als 80 Jahren fort. Ohne Heinrich Glasmeier (das darf wohl unterstellt werden) gäbe es die nichtstaatliche Archivpflege im Bundesland Nordrhein-Westfalen in ihrer heute als vorbildlich angesehenen Weise vermutlich nicht. Die Spuren, die er in zahlreichen westfälischen Archiven hinterlassen hat, sind so deutlich, daß sie noch lange, vielleicht sogar auf Dauer, sichtbar bleiben werden. Aber auch wenn nichts in den Quellen darauf hindeutet, daß er persönlich an Verbrechen des nationalsozialistischen Regimes beteiligt war, ist seine Verstrickung in dieses Regime dennoch so eng, daß sich eine positive Gesamtwürdigung seiner Persönlichkeit und seiner Arbeit verbietet.

La Radio du Peuple

Le « Volksempfänger » , littéralement : récepteur (« Empfänger ») du peuple (« Volk ») , était un poste de radio, conçu, à l'instigation de Josef Gœbbels, par Otto Griessing au sein de l'entreprise de Georg Seibt. L'appareil, sous le modèle VE301, fut présenté publiquement pour la Ire fois à l'occasion de l'Exposition internationale de radiodiffusion à Berlin qui s'est tenue le 18 août 1933. Le boîtier en « bakelite » du VE301 avait été mis au point par Walter Maria Kersting. Le prix de vente prévu était de 76 « Reichsmarks » pour la version de l'appareil fonctionnant sur le secteur, et de 65 « Reichsmarks » pour celle alimentée par piles.

Le « Volksempfänger » est le seul produit parmi la série de projets de propagande (comme la voiture « KdF » ; le téléviseur « Deutscher Einheits-Fernseh-Empfänger EI » ; le réfrigérateur « Volkskühlschrank » ; ou l'unité de logement « Volkswohnung ») , à avoir atteint la production en série et à avoir été fabriqué en quantité notable.

L'objectif du « Volksempfänger » était de permettre à l'ensemble des familles d'écouter la radio, afin que la propagande national-socialiste pût désormais atteindre chaque foyer.

Les fabricants, au départ, manifestaient quelque réticence, car ils craignaient de voir baisser fortement les chiffres de vente des appareils de marque qu'ils avaient vendus jusque-là, et qui étaient au moins 2 fois plus chers. Ces craintes s'avèrent infondées, et l'on assista au plus à une stagnation de la vente des appareils de marque. Étant donné que l'industrie travaillait, lors de la fabrication du « Volksempfänger » , avec une marge bénéficiaire très faible, tributaire dans une large mesure de l'évolution du prix des tubes utilisés, les conséquences économiques du « Volksempfänger » furent ambivalentes. D'une part, quelques petits fabricants de matériel radio furent incapables de respecter les prix plafonnés imposés par le pouvoir politique, de sorte que plusieurs de ces fabricants firent faillite ou furent absorbées par des concurrents plus grands ; mais, d'autre part, le nombre des auditeurs de radio s'accrut fortement, abstraction faite d'un léger fléchissement en 1935 et 1936. Cette évolution est sans conteste due à l'introduction du modèle bas de gamme VE 301, peu coûteux, puis, à partir de 1938, du modèle DKE38, le « Deutscher Kleinempfänger » (littéralement : petit récepteur allemand, au surnom populaire de « Gœbbelsschnauze » : museau de Gœbbels) . Pour le DKE38, il avait même été mis au point un tube multiple spécial (2 systèmes électriques réunis dans une enveloppe commune) , le VCL11, grâce auquel le prix put être réduit à 35 « Reichsmarks » .

Les 100,000 lers appareils furent déjà vendus pendant que se tenait encore l'Exposition internationale de radiophonie de Berlin, en 1933. Des différentes variétés du « Volksempfänger » , il fut vendu au total plusieurs millions d'exemplaires. Des augmentations notables du nombre d'auditeurs furent notées d'abord en 1937, consécutivement à une campagne publicitaire intensive menée par le ministère de la propagande, puis à partir de 1939. Ce qui, dans ce dernier cas, apparaît avoir surtout joué un rôle est l'existence au sein de la population allemande, à l'éclatement de la Guerre, d'un puissant besoin d'informations, que l'on voulait assouvir au moyen de la radio.

Cependant, un autre aspect important de la politique radiophonique nazie était que, parallèlement à la diffusion massive de ce moyen de communication que les appareils peu coûteux « Volksempfänger » et « Deutscher Kleinempfänger » rendaient possible, le nombre d'auditeurs soumis à la redevance radio dans le « Reich » s'était accru à proportion ; en 1943, lorsqu'il était à son faîte, ce nombre s'élevait à quelque 16 millions de personnes qui, chaque mois, s'acquittaient d'une redevance de 2 « Reichsmarks » . De ces recettes, une part moindre allait à la « Deutsche Reichspost » , tandis que le reste alimentait les caisses de la Société radiophonique du « Reich » (« Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » , ou RRG) et, surtout, celles du ministère de la propagande, qui prélevait dans l'argent de la redevance la plus grande part de son budget.

La désignation VE301 est formée de l'abréviation VE (pour « Volksempfänger ») , avec adjonction du nombre 301, évocation de la date du 30 janvier 1933, jour de la prise de pouvoir par Adolf Hitler.

Le « Volksempfänger » était un appareil de conception et d'exécution techniques fort simples, destiné à capter les ondes moyennes et longues (que l'on désignait initialement encore par ondes resp. , courtes et longues) . Il devait, au minimum, assurer la réception de la radio nationale et d'une station de radio supplémentaire, et ce, dans l'Allemagne entière. La légende selon laquelle le « Volksempfänger » ne permettait pas de capter de stations étrangères mène une vie tenace jusqu'à nos jours ; pourtant, il ressort des descriptions et écrits contemporains de cette époque que les principales stations de radio étrangères pouvaient bien être écoutées avec le « Volksempfänger » .

Aussi, à l'éruption de la Deuxième Guerre mondiale, la menace de sanctions draconiennes, pouvant aller jusqu'à la peine de mort, fut-elle brandie par le ministre de la propagande Josef Gœbbels, dans le cadre d'un décret portant mesures d'exception relatives à la radiodiffusion, en cas d'écoute d'émetteurs ennemis - au 1er rang desquels le service de langue allemande de la « BBC » de Londres.

Le « Volksempfänger » se mua bientôt en un des principaux outils de propagande des Nationaux-Socialistes au pouvoir : les discours de Hitler étaient retransmis à la radio, les annonceurs s'évertuaient à ré-interpréter en victoires les pertes et défaites subies par l'Allemagne après le tournant de la Guerre, et on se servait de la radio pour invoquer et attiser la volonté de sacrifice et l'abnégation du peuple allemand. Toutefois, à mesure que la réalité des bombardements et des importantes pertes militaires, dues en particulier à la Guerre à l'Est, ne se recoupaient plus avec le contenu des bulletins d'information, l'effet persuasif de l'instrument radiophonique devait s'amenuiser progressivement.

Le « Volksempfänger » du type VE301W était équipé de 3 tubes électroniques : 1 triode REN904 en détectrice à réaction ; 1 tube RES164 de puissance ; et 1 redresseur RGN354. Par l'effet de réaction du REN904, on obtenait la sensibilité nécessaire. Le haut-parleur était un transducteur de haute impédance, dont le fonctionnement était bon mais qui produisait un son de qualité médiocre.

D'autres appareils sont venus plus tard s'ajouter à la famille des « Volksempfänger » : le « Arbeitsfrontempfänger » DAF1011 (DAF est l'acronyme de « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » : Front allemand du Travail) ; 2 Olympiakoffer (DOK36 et DOK37) ; le « Deutsche Kleinempfänger » DKE38 ; puis également, en 1938, une version actualisée du « Volksempfänger » proprement dit : le VE301 Dyn. La question est discutée de savoir s'il est approprié d'appliquer l'appellation « Volksempfänger » aux appareils autres que les types VE301 ; « Gemeinschaftsempfänger » (traduit grossièrement par : récepteur radio collectif) serait sans doute une désignation plus adéquate.

Déjà, le VE301 Dyn renfermait, outre 1 tube haute fréquence plus sensible, 1 haut-parleur électro-dynamique. Mais un peu auparavant, en 1937, le modèle originel (le VE301) avait été légèrement mis à niveau, puis offert à la vente sous la désignation VE301 Wn (Wn étant le code de « Wechselstrom neu » : courant alternatif nouveau type) . À la différence du modèle d'origine, cet appareil était doté d'un syntonisateur à réglage variable et présentait, grâce à la pentode AF7, un seuil audion amélioré, propre à accroître la sensibilité. L'aspect extérieur de l'appareil avait, en revanche, à peine été modifié ; le seul changement était la localisation des prises d'antenne (3 pour l'antenne ; 1 pour la prise de terre) , lesquelles ne se trouvaient désormais plus sur le côté du boîtier, mais sur le panneau arrière.

The Volksempfänger (German for « people's receiver ») was a range of radio receivers developed by engineer Otto Griessing at the request of Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels.

The purpose of the « Volksempfänger » program was to make radio reception technology affordable to the general public. Josef Gœbbels realized the great propaganda potential of this relatively new medium and, thus, considered widespread availability of receivers highly-important.

The original « Volksempfänger » VE301 model was presented on August 18, 1933, at the « 10. Große Deutsche Funkausstellung » , in Berlin. The VE301 was available at a readily affordable price of 76 German « Reichsmarks »

(equivalent of 2 weeks' average salary) , and a cheaper 35 « Reichsmarks » model, the DKE38 (sometimes called by the general public « Gœbbels-Schnauze » - Gœbbels' Snout) fitted with a multi-section tube, was also later produced, along with a series of other models under the « Volksempfänger » ; « Gemeinschaftsempfänger » ; « KdF » (« Kraft durch Freude ») ; « DKE » (« Deutscher Kleinempfänger ») ; and other brands.

The « Volksempfänger » was designed to be produced as cheaply as possible, as a consequence they generally lacked short-wave bands and did not follow the practice, common at the time, of marking the approximate dial positions of major European stations on its tuning scale. Only German and Austrian stations were marked and cheaper models only listed arbitrary numbers. Sensitivity was limited to reduce production costs further, so long as the set could receive « Deutschlandsender » and the local « Reichssender » , it was considered sensitive enough, although foreign stations could be easily received after dark with an external antenna.

Listening to foreign stations became a criminal offence in Nazi Germany when the War began while, in some occupied territories, such as Poland, all radio listening by non-German citizens was outlawed (later, in the War, this prohibition was extended to a few other occupied countries coupled with mass seizures of radio sets) . Penalties ranged from fines and confiscation of radios to, particularly later in the War, sentencing to a concentration camp or capital punishment. Nevertheless, such clandestine listening was widespread in many Nazi-occupied countries and (particularly later, in the War) in Germany itself. The Germans also attempted radio jamming of some enemy stations with limited success.

Much has been said about the efficiency of the « Volksempfänger » as a propaganda tool. Most famously, Hitler's architect and Minister for Armaments and War Production, Albert Speer, said in his final speech at the Nuremberg trials :

« Hitler's dictatorship differed in one fundamental point from all its predecessors in history. His was the 1st dictatorship which made the complete use of all technical means for domination of its own country. Through technical devices like the radio and loudspeaker, 80 million people were deprived of independent thought. It was, thereby, possible to subject them to the will of one man. »

However, despite Speer's claim, both Mussolini's Italy and Stalin's Russia had used radio as a tool to influence the masses long before Hitler's rise to power.

The 1944-1945 British Utility Radio or Civilian Receiver was an equivalent of the « Volksempfänger » . It was produced to a standard government approved design by a consortium of manufacturers using standard components. Sensitivity was extremely limited and no provision for a long-wave band or external antenna was provided.

Der Volksempfänger (auch Gemeinschaftsempfänger genannt) war ein Radioapparat für den Empfang von Mittelwellenrundfunk und Langwellenrundfunk, der im Auftrag von Reichspropagandaleiter Josef Gœbbels entwickelt wurde und wenige Monate nach der Machtergreifung Adolf Hitlers 1933 vorgestellt wurde. Er gilt als eines der wichtigsten Propagandainstrumente der nationalsozialistischen Machthaber.

Das erste Modell VE301 wurde von Otto Griessing bei der Firma Doktor Georg Seibt entwickelt. Vorgestellt wurde es im August 1933 auf der 10. Großen Deutschen Funkausstellung in Berlin. Das Design des Gehäuses aus Bakelit stammte von Walter Maria Kersting. Der vorgeschriebene Preis der Version für den Betrieb am Stromnetz betrug 76 Reichsmark (entspricht nach heutiger Kaufkraft und inflationsbereinigt 316 Euro) ; eine batteriebetriebene Version kostete 65 Reichsmark. Es gab auch den VE301G für den Anschluß an die damals noch verbreiteten Gleichspannungsnetze und die sogenannten Allstromgeräte für Gleich-/Wechselspannung VE301GW, VE301dynGW (dynamischer Lautsprecher) und DKE38 (Deutscher Kleinempfänger) .

Der Volksempfänger war das einzige Produkt aus einer Reihe von Propagandaprojekten wie dem KdF-Wagen, dem Deutschen Einheits-Fernseh-Empfänger E 1, dem Volkskühlschrank oder der Volkswohnung, das in die Serienfertigung gelangte und auch in nennenswerter Stückzahl produziert wurde. Er sollte es jeder Familie ermöglichen, Rundfunk zu hören, um so für die NS-Propaganda erreichbar zu sein. Die Herstellerfirmen waren ursprünglich sehr skeptisch, da sie befürchteten, der Absatz der bisher verkauften und mindestens doppelt so teuren Markenempfangsgeräte würde stark zurückgehen.

Die Absatzzahlen für die teuren Markengeräte stiegen nicht, sie stagnierten. Da die Industrie bei der Herstellung des Volksempfängers mit sehr kleinen Gewinnspannen arbeitete, die in hohem Maße von der Preisentwicklung der verwendeten Röhren abhingen, blieben die ökonomischen Konsequenzen des Volksempfängers ambivalent. Einerseits waren einige kleine Rundfunkfirmen nicht in der Lage, die staatlich auferlegten Preisgrenzen zu halten, so daß mehrere dieser Firmen in Konkurs gingen oder von größeren Konkurrenten übernommen wurden. Andererseits stiegen die Teilnehmerzahlen des Rundfunks mit Ausnahme einer geringen Verlangsamung 1935-1936 steil an. Diese Entwicklung ist auf die Einführung der günstigen Einsteigermodelle VE 301 beziehungsweise ab 1938 des « Deutschen Kleinempfängers » DKE38 (im Volksmund auch « Gœbbelsschnauze » genannt) zurückzuführen. Für den DKE38 wurde sogar die spezielle Verbundröhre (zwei elektrische Systeme in einem gemeinsamen Kolben) VCL11 entwickelt, mit deren Hilfe der Preis auf 35 Reichsmark gesenkt werden konnte. Als Gleichrichterröhre fungierte im DKE38 eine VY2.

Schon auf der Großen Deutschen Funkausstellung 1933 wurde der Volksempfänger am 18. August vorgestellt und während der Ausstellung die ersten 100.000 Geräte verkauft. Insgesamt wurden in den verschiedenen Varianten mehrere Millionen Exemplare der Volksempfänger verkauft. Signifikante Zunahmen der Hörerzahlen waren 1937 als Ergebnis intensiver Hörerwerbung durch das Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda und ab 1939 wegen des Kriegsausbruchs zu verzeichnen.

Ein weiterer wichtiger Aspekt der NS-Rundfunkpolitik war, daß durch die massenhafte Verbreitung des Mediums « Rundfunk » mit Hilfe der kostengünstigen « Volks- » beziehungsweise « Deutschen Kleinempfänger » auch die Zahl der Gebühren zahlenden Rundfunkhörer im Reich sukzessive stieg. Ihre Zahl belief sich zum Höchststand 1943 auf rund 16 Millionen Personen, die pro Monat zwei Reichsmark Gebühren bezahlten. Von diesen Gebühreneinnahmen ging ein kleinerer Teil an die Deutsche Reichspost, der Rest floss an die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft (RRG) und vor allem das Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda, das mittels der Gebühreneinnahmen den Löwenanteil seines

1935 : Geschäfte schließen, damit eine Hitler-Rede gehört werden kann.

Die Bezeichnung VE301 entstand aus der Abkürzung VE für Volksempfänger sowie der 301 als Erinnerung an den 30. Januar 1933, den Tag der Machtergreifung Hitlers.

Der Volksempfänger war ein technisch sehr einfach ausgeführtes Gerät für Mittelwelle und Langwelle, zunächst noch mit Kurz- und Langwelle bezeichnet. Er sollte im ganzen Deutschen Reich mindestens den Empfang des Deutschlandsenders und eines weiteren Programms ermöglichen. Die Legende, daß mit dem Volksempfänger keine ausländischen Stationen empfangen werden konnten, hält sich bis heute hartnäckig. Berichte aus der zeitgenössischen Literatur zeigen, daß mit dem Volksempfänger je nach Standort und Tageszeit auch ausländische Sender mindestens zeitweise empfangen werden konnten. Besonders war dies zu den Nachtstunden möglich, in denen aufgrund der Raumwelle die Reichweite vergrößert ist.

Die Qualität des Empfanges der ausländischen Sender war bei den teureren Konkurrenzprodukten allerdings besser.

Aus diesem Grunde wurden von Reichspropagandaminister Josef Goebbels bei Ausbruch des Zweiten Weltkrieges in einer Verordnung über außerordentliche Rundfunkmaßnahmen drakonische Strafandrohungen bis hin zur Todesstrafe für das Empfangen von « Feindsendern » (in erster Linie das deutsche Programm der BBC London) durchgesetzt.

Der Volksempfänger wurde zu einem der wichtigsten Propagandainstrumente der nationalsozialistischen Machthaber, in dem die Reden Hitlers übertragen und nach der Wende im Zweiten Weltkrieg Verluste und Niederlagen in Siege umgedeutet und der Opferwille des deutschen Volkes beschworen wurde. Je mehr jedoch die Realität von Bombenkrieg und hohen militärischen Verlusten insbesondere an der Ostfront nicht mehr mit den Sendeinhalten konform ging, nahm auch die Beeinflussungswirkung des Mediums Rundfunk fortlaufend ab.

Der Volksempfänger des Modells VE301W war mit drei Röhren bestückt : Triode REN904 als Audion mit Rückkopplung, Endröhre RES164 und dem Netzgleichrichter RGN354. Durch die Rückkopplung in der Audion-Stufe wurde die notwendige Empfindlichkeit erreicht. Der Lautsprecher war ein hochohmiger Freischwinger mit gutem Wirkungsgrad, aber mäßigem Klang. Die Volksempfänger gelten als typische Vertreter der Einkreisempfänger aus der Familie der Geradeusempfänger.

Der VE 301 Dyn enthielt neben einer empfindlicheren HF-Röhre auch schon einen elektrodynamischen Lautsprecher. Schon etwas früher (nämlich 1937) wurde das ursprüngliche Modell (VE301) leicht überarbeitet und dann unter der Bezeichnung VE301 Wn (Wn für « Wechselstrom neu ») angeboten. Im Gegensatz zum Urmodell besaß dieses Gerät keine Käfigspule, sondern eine variabel einstellbare Abstimmspule. Darüber hinaus wurde eine bessere Audionstufe (mit der Pentode AF7) , die die Empfindlichkeit verbesserte, verbaut. Äußerlich veränderte sich das Gerät kaum. Lediglich die Antennenanschlüsse (3 x Antenne ; 1 x Erde) befanden sich nun nicht mehr seitlich am Gehäuse, sondern auf der Geräterückseite.

Die Volksempfänger lösten die damals noch sehr weitverbreiteten einfachen Detektorempfänger mit dem individuellen Kopfhörerempfang ab. Erst einige Jahre nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg wurden die meisten Volksempfänger zunächst durch die leistungsfähigeren Überlagerungsempfänger und den aufkommenden störungsärmeren UKW-Rundfunk und später durch neue Transistorgeräte abgelöst.

Später kamen zur Familie der Volksempfänger noch weitere Geräte, der deutsche Kleinempfänger DKE38, sowie 1938 auch eine aktualisierte Version des eigentlichen Volksempfängers - der VE301 Dyn hinzu. Ob die Geräte, außer den VE 301, zu Recht die Bezeichnung Volksempfänger tragen, ist umstritten ; Gemeinschaftsempfänger dürfte der korrekte Name sein.

Der Arbeitsfrontempfänger DAF1011 und die zwei Olympiakoffer (DOK36 und DOK37) sind ebenfalls sogenannte Volksempfänger. Diese Geräte sind auch als Geradeausempfänger, jedoch technisch aufwendiger als sogenannte Mehrkreisempfänger ausgeführt worden.

Für die Volksempfänger gab es als Zubehör verschiedene Sperrkreise und weitere Antennenanpassrichtungen und -umschalter. In der Regel wurden einfach nur ein langer Draht als sogenannte Langdrahtantenne oder T-Antennen für die Volksempfänger verwendet.

Mit einem Splitter, wie dem DWt 52 und dem Umschalter DDa 38, war es auch mit den Volksempfängern wie dem VE 301 G möglich, den Drahtfunk zu empfangen.

Nach dem sogenannten Anschluß Österreichs wurden in der Ostmark bei Eumig, Hornyphon, Ingelen, Kapsch, Minerva und Radione Volksempfänger gebaut, die auch im Rest des Reichs vertrieben wurden.

Im Generalgouvernement wurde der DKE, der Deutsche Kleinempfänger von Derufa in Warschau gebaut.

Les institutions musicales Linzoises après l' « Anschluß »

28 mai 1938 : Lors du « Reichsmusiktag » , le docteur Josef Goebbels proclame les « 10 principes de la création musicale germanique » :

« Ni le programme, la théorie et l'expérimentation, ni la structure déterminent l'essence de la musique. Son essence est la mélodie. La mélodie exalte le cœur et fortifie l'esprit. Comme avec n'importe quelle autre forme d'art, la musique est générée par des forces mystérieuses et profondes, prenant racines dans les caractères nationaux. La musique germanique et la musique juive sont opposées, à cause de leur nature, contradictoire l'une de l'autre. La bataille contre le judaïsme dans la musique germanique ne sera jamais abandonnée. La musique est le plus sensuel des arts.

Parce qu'elle parle plus au cœur et aux émotions qu'à la raison. Laissez-nous remercier Dieu de nous donner la capacité à écouter la musique, à l'expérimenter et à l'aimer passionnément. La musique est un art qui touche l'esprit plus profondément : il possède le pouvoir d'apaiser la peine et de bénir avec bonheur. Si la mélodie est l'origine de la musique, alors il s'ensuit que la musique pour le peuple ne peut pas s'épuiser elle-même dans les chorales ou les pastorales. Elle doit toujours retourner à la mélodie comme racine de son essence. Élever les trésors (de la musique) et les transmettre au peuple est notre devoir le plus important. Le langage des sons est quelque fois plus irrésistible que le langage des mots. Les grands Maîtres du passé sont par conséquent représentatifs de la majesté véritable de notre peuple. Pour maintenir et pour accroître la gloire et l'honneur de notre nation. »

11 juin 1938 : L'émission d'un décret du ministère de la Propagande du « Reich » , permet d'amorcer la restructuration de la vie musicale en Autriche.

Octobre 1938 : Les institutions musicales seront placées sous le parapluie de l'organisme du « Reich » , « NSG Kraft durch Freude » (KdF, La force par la joie) et, à partir du novembre 1939, de l'Office culturel municipal.

Les grandes Sociétés chorales traditionnelles, comme le chœur Bruckner (« Brucknerchor ») de Saint-Florian, vont craindre une dissolution forcée et la suspension de leurs concerts pour la saison en cours. Les autorités publiques seront fort inquiètes devant la suite des événements.

À partir de 1940-1941 : Augmentation la diffusion de récitals par des solistes et des ensembles de musique de chambre. Au Conservatoire Bruckner, on compte 3 quatuors à cordes et 1 « Collegium Musicum » .

Dès février 1941, la Chorale municipale, jusqu'en 1943, la Chorale académique allemande et, de 1943 à 1945, le chœur Bruckner (« Brucknerchor ») de Saint-Florian seront aussi employés comme outil de propagande par la grande société de radiodiffusion allemande.

La défaite symphonique

Whatever the ambitions of ideologues and accomplices, the 3rd « Reich » did not usher in a triumphant era in the history of the Symphony commensurate with the achievements of Dmitri Shostakovich and Sergey Prokofiev, in the Soviet Union. With a political history stretching back to 1800, the Symphony might have dominated public musical life in the 3rd « Reich » . Adolf Hitler's fascination with Opera and Richard Wagner is only part of the reason it did not. After the Nazi consolidation of power, around 1935, and especially after the 1936 summer Olympics, composers and critics, and eventually Hitler himself, turned away from the genre of the Symphony or minimized its utility. Ideologues and technocrats no longer had to win the approval of ordinary Germans. A 1937 press memorandum from the Propaganda Ministry announced that « the inner political “ Kampfzeit ” has ended. The “ Führer ” has been successful in bringing an end to the War of all against all. » (« Kampf aller gegen alle ») : a reference to Thomas Hobbes' « Bellum omnium contra omnes » . The combative (« kämpferischer ») journalist of the past, to paraphrase the memorandum, need no longer look for occasions to go on the attack. The dominant concept is that of the good guy (« des ganzen Kerls ») . Thus was banished the ideological fervor that had motivated such writings as Karl Grunsky's 1933 book on « the struggle for German music », which warned of the « danger that music cripple the will ». Historically, he explained, emotional responses to music had often been enervating. By contrast, the greatest Masters of the past Century, he continued, citing Beethoven, Wagner, and Bruckner, « confront and call forth the fount of the will, even though, as a result, they alienate or leave some “ petit-bourgeois ” unmoved » .

L'Orchestre symphonique national-socialiste

August Kubizek explained how his close friend Adolf Hitler dreamed-up the idea of a « Mobile “ Reich ” Orchestra » or « “ Reich ” Symphony Orchestra » which was to tour German provinces and perform without charge.

In 1928, an Orchestra dedicated to promoting National-Socialist ideals was organized and, in 1931, it became, with Hitler's approval, a travelling National-Socialist Symphony Orchestra (« Nationalsozialistisches Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester ») .

Was wir jeden Tag erleben : Fest-Schrift zum 5jähr. Bestehen die NS.-Reichs-Symphonie-Orchesters, Herausgeber vom NS.-Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester (Celebration Concert for the 5th Anniversary of the NS « Reich » Symphony Orchestra) , editor Max W. Morstadt, Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag, München (1937) ; 31 pages.

The publication entitled « National-Socialist State Symphony Orchestra and Their Travels Throughout the “ Reich ” » (« NS-Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester erzählt von seinem Reisen durch Reichs ») contains wonderful photos of the Orchestra at work during many performances all over Nazi Germany (in famous music-halls and « Zirkus Krone » , before students and in factories for « KdF » members - « Kraft durch Freude ») , receptions by many famous Nazi dignitaries in fancy uniforms, reviews from many important Nazi newspapers, troubles while traveling from engagement to engagement, telegrams from the « Führer » , etc.

There is a great emphasis on the importance of music and culture for German youth and workers « Generalmusikdirektor » Franz Adam is shown in many photographs with members of the « HJ » (« Hitlerjugend ») and « BdM » (« Bund Deutscher Mäde ») . This rare over-sized Nazi publication ends with a recap of the 1st 5 years of the « NS-Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester » by Rudolf Heß.

Printed by « Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag » of Munich and originally sold for 1 « RM » (« Reichsmark ») , this example of the very rare « NS-Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester erzählt von seinem Reisen durch Reichs » still has the original pink advertising title-slip attached to the front cover. A few of the photos have light spots where, at one time, dampness must have stuck some of the pages lightly together, but in all around nice used condition. No foul odor at all. Anything connected with the Nazi Symphony Orchestra is very difficult to find today.

In 1932, the NSDAP founded a Party Orchestra, the National-Socialist Symphony Orchestra. Its 1st concert, as covered in the paper, featured the prelude to Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » . On its opening tour of 5 Bavarian towns under musical director, Franz Adam, it performed a program that included the Overture to « Tannhäuser » . According to the « Völkischer Beobachter » , at these concerts, one could really perceive « how great the effect of noble music is on simple “ Volk ” » comrades who, otherwise, had little opportunity to enjoy art » . The « artistic and (not least) the propagandistic success of 1st concert tour was powerful because anyone could see here that the movement was, in great measure, a cultural movement - indeed, the main cultural movement of the German Volk » . It was, above all, National-Socialism that would « fill the hearts of Volk comrades with love of German art and German character? » Committed to promoting the Party Orchestra, the « Völkischer Beobachter » encouraged readers to attend a subsequent Richard Wagner « Morning Celebration » , which was considered an important part of the Nazi campaign strategy , in 1932. In the middle of the « gigantic electoral battle for Reichs presidency of the German Volk » , it invited readers to this event because the Party « included the Muses on its chariot » - because, for Nazis, German music was not merely a form of entertainment, but daily bread for the soul :

« Come and eat, Germans, that you might be strong in battle ! »

This was the « meaning behind all the performances » of the National-Socialist Symphony Orchestra : the « significance of their concert tours through all of Germany » . In the Nazi movement, Germans were to « find the harmonies of German spirit, the edification of the German Masters, the spiritual unity of Germanness ! » . That was why « German Volk comrades » needed to go to the « Morning Celebration » and listen to heroic themes from « Siegfried » , « Lohengrin » , and « Tristan » .

These works would resonate with what they were all « sensing at this time of the election - the joy of victory and a feeling of spring » . In this spirit, Nazis would « rise and shine at the Morgenfeier » ! After the event, naturally, the paper ran a rave review of the performance :

« Comrade Kapellmeister Franz Adam has achieved what seemed to be completely impossible : selling-out the Zirkus for a musical Morgenfeier in a time of vicious anger and hatred. » His « courage and strength has succeeded in creating a National-Socialist weapon that has achieved a great and noble victory over anti-cultural and anti-German tendencies in music » . In addition to touting such triumphs, the paper devoted significant coverage to events put on by the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » . Its programs, which often included music by Wagner, were described as being « as German as you can possibly imagine » . Such Nazi-Wagnerian events were « important steps on the path to a genuine German culture » , because they showed that Germans had the right to « construct their culture on a 1,000 year old foundation, right in between Bolshevism and reaction » .

Der in München wirkende Komponist Franz Adam, dessen Vertonung von « Singet leise, leise, leise » aus dem Jahr 1908 stammt, wurde später Leiter des 1928 gegründeten « Neuen Münchner Tonkünstler orchesters » das 1931 unter dem Namen « Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester » neukonstituiert wurde und seine Konzerttätigkeit den propagandistischen Zwecken der Nationalsozialisten zur Verfügung stellte. Daß sich besonders für München viele solcher « Lebensläufe » aufzeigen lassen, liegt an der Sonderstellung, die München zukam, die « heilige deutsche Kunst weithin zu kündem. München als die « ausersehene Stadt » verfügte über ausreichend finanzielle Mittel, bedeutende und weniger bedeutende Musiker anzuziehen, um durch ihre Arbeit den Propagandaauftrag zu erfüllen.

Auf dem Wittelsbacherplatz intonierte das NS Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Franz Adam noch einmal ein Werk des von Hitler besonders verehrten Anton Bruckner, nun die 4. Sinfonie. Die Münchner Philharmoniker spielten ebenfalls in der Residenz auf (Franz Schubert, Overtüre Rosamunde ; Johannes Brahms, I. Sinfonie) . Chöre aus ganz Deutschland sangen auf weiteren zentralen Plätzen der Stadt, darunter der Kölner Männergesangs-verein, die Liederhalle Karlsruhe, der Stuttgarter Liederkranz, der Städtische Chor Augsburg, der Klagenfurter Frauengesangsverein sowie die BürgenSänger-Zunft eingetragener Verein.

Ausbildung und Beruf

Franz Josef Johannes Maria Adam wurde am 28. Dezember 1885 als elftes Kind des Kunstmalers Emil Adam und der Schauspielerin Josefa Adam (geborene Wurmb) in der Schwanthalerstraße in München geboren. Nach einer mäßig erfolgreichen Schullaufbahn verließ Adam das Münchner Luitpold-Gymnasium 1903 in der siebten Klasse vorzeitig, um sich ebenda an der Königlichen Akademie der Tonkunst einzuschreiben. Adam studierte dort Klarinette bei Anton Walch (vor 1899-1959) und Klavier bei Anton Beer-Walbrunn (1864-1929) . 1905 beendete er sein Studium zunächst ohne einen Abschluß, nahm als Privatschüler jedoch weiterhin Klavier-, Kompositions- und Dirigierunterricht bei Beer-Walbrunn. 1908 trat er erneut in die Akademie ein und setzte seine Studien bis zum Abschluß 1910 bei Walch (Klarinette) und Beer-Walbrunn (Komposition) sowie bei Richard G'Schrey (Klavier) und Felix Mottl (Dirigieren) fort. Die Schülerschaft Adams bei Mottl wird in zahlreichen biographischen Darstellungen kolportiert. Daß Adam tatsächlich ein Schüler Mottls war ist zwar nicht unwahrscheinlich, lässt sich aber zumindest anhand der Akademiezeugnisse oder anderer persönlicher Dokumente im Nachlaß nicht nachweisen (Hanke 2004, Seite 14f) . 1914-1915 erhielt Adam überdies privaten Kompositionsunterricht bei Fritz Steinbach (1855-1916) in München. Nach einem Engagement als Klarinettist bei den Wagner-Festspielen in München (1910) sowie als Korrepetitor in Altenburg (1911-1912) verfolgte er in den kommenden Jahren am Stadttheater Gießen (1912-1913) sowie bei den Kurorchestern in Bad Ems (1912) und Ragaz bei Sankt Gallen (1913-1922, mit Unterbrechung durch den Kriegsdienst als Freiwilliger des bayerischen Heeres im Ersten Weltkrieg) nun vornehmlich seine Karriere als Kapellmeister.

Am 9. September 1912 heiratete er die Pianistin Magdalena Nikisch. Aus der Ehe gingen zwei Kinder, Annemarie und Luitpold, hervor. Das Paar ließ sich Anfang der 1930er Jahre wieder scheiden. Wenig später lernte Adam seine zweite Frau Lieselotte Schmidt (Künstlername Berker) kennen, mit der er sich am 5. Dezember 1941 vermählte.

Ab 1924 widmete sich Adam offiziell als erster Kapellmeister der Deutschen Stunde in Bayern (später Bayerischer Rundfunk) dem Aufbau und der Leitung eines Münchner Rundfunkorchesters, vermutlich war er für den Münchner Rundfunk jedoch bereits seit der Gründung 1922 tätig. Gleichzeitig oblag ihm dort als künstlerischer Leiter die Programmgestaltung, bei der er sich während seiner Dienstzeit vor allem Werken deutscher Komponisten zuwandte (Hanke 2004, Seite 27) . Mit großer Breitenwirkung führte er dort überdies (erstmalig in Deutschland) die Übertragung vollständiger Symphoniekonzerte im Rundfunk durch.

Nach seinem unfreiwilligen Ausscheiden aus dem Rundfunk 1928 konnte er bereits im folgenden Jahr die Stellung als Kapellmeister des soeben von (Wilhelm ?) Knödseder (Hanke 2004, Seite 44) neu begründeten Münchner Tonkünstlerorchesters eingetragener Verein antreten, das aus der ebenfalls durch diesen ins Leben gerufenen Interessengemeinschaft süddeutscher Musiker eingetragener Verein hervorging. Auf Adams Bestreben entstand daraus wenige Jahre später das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester (NSRSO) , dem er bis zur Auflösung bei Kriegsende 1945 als Chefdirigent und künstlerischer Leiter vorstand.

Im neubegründeten Kulturrat der Stadt München übernahm Adam 1934-1935 die Abteilung Musik und Film, in deren Zuständigkeitsbereich auch die Münchner Philharmoniker fielen. Offensichtliches Desinteresse an dieser Aufgabe, sein umfassendes Engagement für das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester und seine diversen parteipolitischen Ämter hatten jedoch zur Folge, daß Adam in dieser Funktion weder intern noch in der Öffentlichkeit nachdrücklich in Erscheinung (Hermann 2003, Seite 99) trat.

Im August 1945 wurde Adam von den Alliierten in Garmisch-Partenkirchen aufgegriffen und verbrachte die anschließende, fast drei Jahre andauernde Internierungshaft in verschiedenen Lagern, unter anderem in Altenstadt, Garmisch-Partenkirchen, Kaiserslautern und Regensburg. Es sollte ihm nicht gelingen, seine Karriere als Kapellmeister und Dirigent nach 1945 fortzusetzen. Die Internierung und sein äußerst schlechter Gesundheitszustand ließen in den folgenden Jahren alle Bemühungen um einen beruflichen Neustart scheitern, so daß Adam zusehends verarmte. 1949-1953 konnte er zwar noch eine Anstellung als Orchesterleiter und Musiktheorielehrer an einer Musikschule des amerikanischen Militärs in Dachau erlangen, blieb danach jedoch bis zu seinem Tod arbeitslos. Nach einem Schlaganfall starb er am 21. September 1954 in München.

Dirigent des Nationalsozialistischen Reichs-Symphonie-Orchesters

Auf der Suche nach finanzieller Unterstützung wandte sich Adam als Leiter des Münchner Tonkünstlerorchesters bereits 1930 erstmals an die NSDAP (Hanke 2004, Seite 45) . Der Kontakt intensivierte sich zunehmend, so daß das Orchester im Zuge der ideellen und bald auch finanziellen Unterstützung durch die Partei und weitere NS-Organisationen, wie die Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft oder die Deutsche Arbeitsfront, beziehungsweise die NS-Gemeinschaft Kraft durch Freude, von Adam 1931 neu konstituiert wurde. Das Gründungskonzert, das ursprünglich für den 16. Dezember 1931 geplant war, aufgrund eines Verbots durch die Münchner Behörden jedoch nicht durchgeführt werden konnte, fand am 10. Januar 1932 im Zirkus Krone statt. 1934 wurde das Orchester offiziell in Nationalsozialistisches Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester umbenannt, 1937 erfolgte eine weitere Umbenennung in Nationalsozialistisches Symphonieorchester. Geschäftsführer des Vereins war bis 1940 Rudolf Heß (1894-1987) . Im Orchester waren 120 fest engagierte Musiker beschäftigt. Bei Bedarf, so etwa für die Eröffnung des Parteitags in Nürnberg 1935, wurde auf bis zu 150 Musiker aufgestockt. Einer Anregung Hitlers folgend, trat das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester im braunen Smoking auf. Als wirkungsmächtiger Propagandaträger der NSDAP absolvierte das Orchester im Auftrag derselben und unter der Leitung Adams sowie seines späteren Stellvertreters Erich Kloß (1898-1967) über 1500 Konzerte in ganz Europa, dazu gehörten Jugendkonzerte, Werkskonzerte, Auftritte bei Parteitagen und anderen politischen Veranstaltungen, Konzerte im Rahmen der kulturellen Truppenbetreuung sowie Propagandareisen ins Ausland. Das gespielte Repertoire konzentrierte sich vornehmlich auf Werke der deutschen Klassik und Romantik. Neben Kompositionen von Joseph Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, Carl Maria von Weber, Franz Schubert, Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, Max Reger und Anton Bruckner wurde auch Werken zeitgenössischer Tonkünstler, wie etwa Josef Reiter (1862-1939) , Rudolph Stephan (1887-1915) , Max Trapp (1887-1971) , Hermann Blume (1891-1967) , Paul Höffer (1895-1949) , Max Seeboth (1904-1967) , Karl Höller (1907-1987) , Friedrich Jung (1897-1975) oder Paul Scheinpflug (1875-1937) Raum gegeben (Braun 1993, 286 sowie Hanke 2004, Seite 123f) .

Wenngleich Adam und sein Orchester sich von Beginn an für parteipolitische Zwecke (sic !) benutzen ließen (Hanke 2004, Seite 48) blieb das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester Hanke zufolge auf dem Papier. Zeit seines Lebens ein autonomer Verein, der zu keiner Zeit offiziell der Partei angehörte, sondern lediglich (zunächst auf Vereinbarungsebene, später durch Leistungsverträge) mit ihr verbunden war. (Hanke 2004, Seite 49) Braun hingegen berichtet, daß das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester als eigene Ortsgruppe der NSDAP im Kreis München geführt (Braun 1993, Seite 286) wurde. Dessen ungeachtet spielte die politische Gesinnung für Adam bei der Auswahl seiner Musiker wohl nur eine untergeordnete Rolle, eine Parteizugehörigkeit war scheinbar nicht zwingend erforderlich (Vergleiche Braun 1993, Seite 286 ; sowie Hanke 2004, Seiten 56, 67f ; und ebenda Anhang, xlvii) .

Funktionär im NS-Staat

In den Akten lässt sich eine Fülle von Ämtern, Titeln und Positionen nachweisen, die Adam innerhalb der NSDAP und anderer NS-Organisationen inne hatte. So war er seit 01.01.1930 Mitglied der NSDAP (Nummer 348.967) . Er nahm dort die Aufgaben eines Sachbearbeiters für Musik in der Reichsleitung der NSDAP wahr (Reichs-Hauptstellen- und Oberabschnittsleiter Musik) und erhielt die NSDAP-Dienstauszeichnung in Bronze. Er war Mitglied in der Deutschen

Arbeitsfront und im Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur. Bei den Planungen zur Bildung eines Hauptamtes für Ausbildung und Ausrichtung unter Fritz Mehnert wurde er als Leiter eines Amtes Musikwesen vorgesehen (Sieb 2007, Seite 35) . 1933 trat Adam der SA bei, in der er 1939 zum Sturmhauptführer und 1942 (Sieb 2007, Seite 35) zum Sturmbannführer ernannt wurde. Hanke zufolge wurde ihm dieser Titel erst 1943 und rein ehrenhalber (Hanke 2004, Seite 64) verliehen. Als Berater für alle Musikfragen war er ab 1934 Mitglied im Stab des Stellvertreters des Führers und gehörte überdies der Reichsmusikkammer sowie dem Präsidialrat des Reichskultursernats an. Nicht zuletzt wurde Adam 1933 zum Leiter der gesamten nationalsozialistischen Symphonieorchester sowie zum Generalmusikdirektor (1938) ernannt. Wenngleich die zahlreichen Posten Adams in erster Linie ehrenamtlich und vielfach nur repräsentativen Charakters gewesen sein mögen und er in diesen Funktionen keine nennenswerten Dienstpflichten zu erfüllen gehabt haben mag (Hanke 2004, Seite 64f ; sowie ebenda Anhang, xxxviii) - was anhand weiterer Forschungen durchaus noch eingehender zu überprüfen wäre - , ist seine tiefe persönliche Verstrickung in das NS-Regime nicht zu bestreiten. Adams Wirken für das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester erforderte eine intensive und einvernehmliche Zusammenarbeit mit zahlreichen hochrangigen Verantwortlichen des NS-Regimes. Für die Tatsache, daß das Orchester als maßgebliches Propagandainstrument instrumentalisiert wurde und so (wenngleich dies vor allem mit musikalischen Mitteln geschah) offiziell und unmissverständlich für die kruden Ideale und Ziele der Nationalsozialisten warb, hat an erster Stelle sein Leiter Adam in der Verantwortung zu stehen.

In einem Spruchkammerverfahren wurde Adam 1948 zunächst in die Gruppe III als Minderbelasteter eingereiht. Ohne weiteres Nachverfahren erfolgte sodann jedoch eine weitere Einstufung in die Gruppe IV der Mitläufer.

Komponist und Bearbeiter

Seit seiner frühen Studienzeit betätigte sich Adam stets auch als Komponist und Bearbeiter. Die ersten erhaltenen und datierbaren Werke (vor allem Lieder und Chorwerke, so etwa vier Pange Lingua für gemischten Chor) stammen aus dem Jahr 1905. In den Jahren bis zu seinem Abschluß an der Akademie entstanden ferner zahlreiche kammermusikalische Werke für Streicherbesetzung, ein Scherzo für kleines Orchester und einige Gedichtvertonungen. Auch in seiner frühen Zeit als Kurkapellmeister war Adam nicht untätig, so haben sich diverse Kompositionen zu Bühnenwerken, eine Sinfonie in F-Moll sowie diverse Bearbeitungen von Liedern und Klavierwerken Ludwig van Beethovens, Johannes Brahms, Franz Liszts oder Franz Schuberts für Orchesterbesetzung erhalten. Aus Adams Zeit beim Münchner Rundfunk existieren des weiteren zahlreiche Hörspielmusiken, darunter ein Osterspiel und zwei Weihnachtsspiele.

Diverse Werke für Klavier entstanden auch während seiner Internierungszeit 1945-1948. Nach seiner Entlassung schrieb Adam zudem eine Vielzahl Bläser-Kanons, hauptsächlich für Trompeten. Eine zweite Kanon-Serie, wie auch Orchesterwerke und Lieder mit Klavierbegleitung stammen aus seinen letzten Lebensjahren ab 1951. Bis auf seine Vier Lieder, Opus 3, die 1909 beim Musikverlag Lewy in München erscheinen konnten und das Marschlied Die bayerische Landwehr (Postkarte 1915) , blieb sein gesamtes verbleibendes Oeuvre unpubliziert. Zahlreiche Werke kamen jedoch zumindest im Kontext von Adams verschiedenen Kapellmeistertätigkeiten zur Aufführung. Die Manuskripte sind im Nachlaß weitgehend erhalten. Hanke weist jedoch auf Bestandslücken hin, so fehlten unter anderem eine Orchester-Ouvertüre oder Adams erste Sinfonie in G-Dur. Der tatsächliche Gesamtumfang seines kompositorischen Schaffens sei so nicht endgültig abschätzbar (Hanke 2004, Seite 17) .

Obgleich sich verschiedene Gutachten und Zeugnisse erhalten haben, die Adams Leistung als Komponist wohlwollend positiv beurteilen, muß es weiteren Forschungen vorbehalten bleiben, die schöpferische Qualität seiner Werke einzuschätzen und kritisch zu beurteilen.

Werke

Der musikalische Nachlaß Adams in der Bayerischen Staatsbibliothek wurde bis dato leider nur oberflächlich erschlossen. Es existiert dort zwar ein maschinenschriftliches Verzeichnis, dieses enthält jedoch nur sehr rudimentäre Angaben. Es wird daher im Folgenden lediglich eine nach Werkgruppen zusammengefasste, tabellarische Auflistung gegeben. So weit Datierungen vorhanden sind, wurde chronologisch geordnet, andernfalls alphabetisch. Eine Ordnung nach Opuszahlen ist nicht möglich, da Adam diese nur vereinzelt vermerkt hat (Vergleiche auch Hanke 2004, Seite 13) . Sämtliche Angaben wurden dem im Nachlaß befindlichen Verzeichnis entnommen. Eine zweifelsohne notwendige Überprüfung, Ergänzung und Korrektur des Verzeichnisses muß zukünftigen Forschungen vorbehalten bleiben.

Neun Jahre Kampf um deutsche Musik

Der Aufstieg des « Orchesters der Bewegung »

Franz Adam, der « Vater » des Orchesters - am 20. Jänner in Innsbruck

In : Innsbrucker Nachrichten vom 10. Jänner 1939, Seite 7.

Franz Adam und das nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester kommen am 20. Jänner nach Innsbruck.

Man kann durch einen Beschluß mehrerer gleichgesinnter Menschen einen « Verein » gründen. Der Tag dieser Gründung steht dann im Vereinsregister. Der Verein hat seine Satzungen, nach denen gehandelt wird. Wer glaubt, daß damit der Sinn einer Gründung erschöpft ist, der irrt, denn eine Gemeinschaft wird nicht gegründet. Sie wächst heran, wird in Not gehärtet und von der Leidenschaft des auf ein hohes Ziel gerichteten Kampfes durchglüht, bis aus dem juristischen Bund eine unlösliche Gemeinschaft von Menschen wird, die willens sind, ihr Leben auf Gedeih und Verderben miteinander zu verbinden. So entstand das Nationalsozialistische Reichs-Symphonie-Orchester nicht durch den bloßen Akt der Gründung, in dem alle sagten :

« Wir bilden jetzt ein Orchester und hoffen dabei gut zu leben ! » so war es in der Tat nicht.

Der kulturelle Kampf begann

Das Jahr, in dem der Gedanke, ein nationalsozialistisches Orchester zu gründen, zum ersten Male in Franz Adam, dem heutigen Leiter des Orchesters, erwachte, war eines der sorgenvollsten in der Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus : das Jahr 1930. Etwa 70 Musiker hatten sich unter der Leitung Franz Adams zusammengeschlossen, um in der allgemeinen Beschäftigungslosigkeit des damaligen Musikerstandes ihr Können auf einer Höhe zu halten, die jedem einzelnen die Möglichkeit gab, wieder mit frischer Kraft in seinem Beruf zu wirken, wenn der Glücksfall eines sogenannten « Engagements » auch mal wieder gegeben sein würde. Hunderte von Proben wurden abgehalten, ehe das Orchester zum erstenmal an die Öffentlichkeit trat. Mancher der Musiker hatte kaum das Geld, die Fahrt in die Probe zu bezahlen. Daß ein Durchhalten unter solchen Umständen nicht leicht war, daß der Wille zur Treue auf manche Probe gestellt wurde, das konnten sie Tag für Tag erleben.

Sie sollten sich von Adam trennen

Eine maßgebende Persönlichkeit hatte eines Tages an das Orchester das Ansinnen gestellt, sich von Franz Adam zu trennen. Man bot dem Orchester eine für die damalige Zeit hohe Summe, die man wohl notwendig gebraucht hätte. Pflichtgemäß unterbreitete der Vorstand des Orchesters das Verlangen den Musikern des Orchesters, die mit einem Hohngelächter sondergleichen die Antwort erteilten, die er verdiente: « Wir stehen zu unserem « Vater ! » » Dies war der Erfolg des Angebotes. Noch oft waren strenge, wenn auch selbstverständliche Entscheidungen zu treffen. Das Orchester wurde durch die Not und Verfolgung, die auch seine Mitglieder erdulden mußten, eine Kampfgemeinschaft, die in unverbrüchlicher Treue der Fahne ihres Kampfes folgte. « Die Nazis schaffen den Parteibuchmusiker » , zeternten die roten Parteiblätter in ausbrechender Wut, als sie alle ihre Versuche, das Orchester zu zerschlagen, vereitelt sahen.

Erstes Auftreten

So trat am 10. Jänner 1932, nach einer langen Zeit der inneren und äußeren Vorbereitung, das Orchester der nationalsozialistischen Revolution im « Zirkus Krone » , dem in der Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus geheiligten Raum in München, zum ersten Male an die Öffentlichkeit. Das auf den 16. Dezember 1931 festgesetzte Konzert im « Zirkus Krone » wurde von der damaligen bayrischen Regierung auf Grund des sogenannten « Weihnachtsfriedens » verboten. Diesem ersten erfolgreichen Konzert in München folgte das erste Konzert vor dem « Führer » in Berchtesgaden, der Rudolf Heß beauftragte, das Orchester für die Werbung auf dem flachen Lande einzusetzen. Seit diesem Tage trägt das Orchester voller Stolz den Namen « Orchester des Führers » . Es spielte in Bayern, Schwaben und Franken, von den Parteigenossen stürmisch begrüßt, von den Gegnern mit Bewunderung gehört. Es war eine stille, zähe Arbeit, die auf diesen Reisen des Jahres 1932 geleistet werden mußte.

Als der Tag der Machtübernahme kam, war das kleine Orchester bereits eine Schicksalsgemeinschaft geworden. « Wir werden uns nicht mehr trennen und auch im neuen Reiche unserer Bestimmung, die in den Tagen des Kampfes der Auftrag des Führers war, treu bleiben » , so sagte damals Franz Adam zu seinen Kameraden, die sich gelobten, alle ihre Kraft für das Werk des Führers einzusetzen.

220 Konzerte in elf Monaten

Nach erfolg- und ehrenreichen Fahrten durch Italien und Ungarn erfüllte das Orchester ausschließlich seine immer größer werdenden innerdeutschen Verpflichtungen. Es spielte zunächst im Rundfunk, trat dann in den Dienst der Bestrebungen für die NS.-Gemeinschaft « Kraft durch Freude » , die das Orchester im ganzen Reich einsetzte. In den zahllosen Reisen, deren Umfang das sonst übliche Maß des Orchesterdienstes weit übersteigt, teilte sich Franz Adam mit Erich Kloß. Seit zwei Jahren ist das Orchester verpflichtet, innerhalb von elf Monaten 220 Konzerte für die NS.-Gemeinschaft « Kraft durch Freude » zu geben. Ueber 150 Proben sind notwendig, um für jedes Konzert die vollkommene Leistung zu sichern. Eine Werbung für die deutsche « Musik und ihre großen Meister » kann nur dann erfolgreich sein, wenn dem Publikum künstlerisch vollendete Aufführungen geboten werden. Diesem gleichen Ziele dienen auch die « Konzerte vor der Jugend » und vor allem die « Werkkonzerte » , die Franz Adams als erster deutscher Musiker zu einer gültigen Form des Musikerlebens erhoben hat. Die Reichsmusiktage in Düsseldorf erkannten dies 1938 in aller Form an, indem sie allein vier Konzerte des NS.-Symphonieorchesters in Betrieben in ihr Programm aufnahmen.

Das Orchester des Führers in der Ostmark

Erstes Konzert in Innsbruck

In : Deutsche Volkszeitung vom 21. Jänner 1939, Seite 6

Von Doktor Thaler

Innsbruck kann es sich als Musikstadt zur besonderen Ehre anrechnen, daß es zum Ausgangspunkt der Konzerte des NS-Reichs-Symphonie-Orchesters in der Ostmark erwählt wurde. So war denn auch das Interesse für dieses Konzert in die weitesten Kreise gedungen, und geraume Zeit vor Beginn der Veranstaltung war der große Stadtsaal lückenlos besetzt von festlich gestimmten Zuhörern aus alle Schichten der Bevölkerung. Der Saal war geschmackvoll geziert, auf der Stirnseite prangte auf rotem Tuch ein mächtiges Hoheitszeichen. Sobald das Orchester, das einheitlich gekleidet in braunem Smoking auftrat, Platz genommen hatte, trat der stellvertretende Intendant Max Alexander Pflugmacher vor und brachte den Gruß und den Dank Innsbrucks an das Orchester des Führers zum Ausdruck. Gleich darauf erklangen die pochenden Schicksalsklänge von Beethovens unsterblicher 5. Symphonie. Mit tiefer Sinngebung hatte Generalmusikdirektor Franz Adam dieses Werk für den ersten Einsatz in der Ostmark gewählt : « Durch Kampf zum Sieg » ist der Gedanke, aus dem die vier Sätze entstanden sind, derselbe Satz, der bereits in Flammenlettern von der Nordkette leuchtete. Die Zuhörerschaft nahm die ausgezeichneten Darbietungen mit stürmischer Begeisterung auf : man konnte unter ihnen besonders Vertreter der Partei und ihrer Gliederungen, der Wehrmacht und des Arbeitsdienstes beobachten, als Vertreter des Gaues war Gauleiterstellvertreter Parteigenosse Christoph an Stelle des dienstlich verhinderten Gauleiters erschienen. Generalmusikdirektor Adam wurde durch einen prächtigen Kranz geehrt. Am Schluß erzwang sich die begeisterte Zuhörerschaft sogar noch eine Zugabe aus dem Gebiet der leichteren Muse. Der Abend war das größte Konzertereignis des laufenden Veranstaltungsjahres.

Beethovens « Fünfte » in Vollendung

« Orchester des Führers » stürmisch gefeiert

In : Innsbrucker Nachrichten vom 23. Jänner 1939, Seite 9

Von Doktor Hermann Gerhardinger

Im NS.-Reichssymphonieorchester, das unter der Leitung des Generalmusikdirektors Franz Adam steht, lernte man einen außerordentlich leitungsfähigen Klangkörper kennen, dessen Einzelgruppen vorzüglich besetzt sind. Insbesondere scheint das von den Bläsergruppen und innerhalb dieser im besonderen Maße von der Gruppe der Hörner zu gelten, die über eine selten feine Tongebung verfügt. Die Disziplin des Gesamtklangkörpers steht auf vorbildlicher Höhe ; dies in sämtlichen in Frage kommenden Richtungen, also sowohl im Klanglichen (hier äußert sie sich in prächtiger Ausgeglichenheit) , als auch in rhythmischer Hinsicht und in Bezug auf die Verteilung der Stärkegrade. Alle diese Vorzüge kamen unter der sorgsamsten Leitung des Dirigenten der Wiedergabe der drei aufgeführten Werke wesentlich zustatten, am meisten wohl jener des den Abend beschließenden Werkes von Reger (Böcklin-Suite) . Sie wären vielleicht in der Symphonie bei durchgängig lebhafterer, weniger schleppender Temponahme noch mehr zur Geltung gelangt.

Einen Sondererfolg holte sich Ilse von Tschurtschenthaler mit der Wiedergabe des pianistisch so dankbaren Klavierpartes im Chopinschen Klavierkonzert. Die Pianistin fasste bei aller Herausarbeitung des reichen technischen Details ihre Aufgabe weniger virtuos-brillant als mehr lyrisch-verhalten auf und brachte damit mehr die zart-versonnene Seite Chopins als die revolutionär-draufgängerische zum Erklingen. Sie, der dirigierende Generalmusikdirektor und das Orchester wurden von der den Saal bis auf den letzten Platz füllenden Zuhörerschaft stürmisch gefeiert.

L'orgue nazi

German church music of the 1930's can be viewed as practically useful church music originating from a re-orientation toward the roots of German culture, in which neo-Classical ideals like « generally comprehensible » and « uniting the congregation » played a role.

It also functioned within National-Socialism. Church music composers in Nazi Germany made themselves opportunistically useful to Nazi culture, and composed also secular works of which some are interwoven with National-Socialism.

Not even German organ culture could escape the control of Nazi culture. Monumental organs could symbolize better than any other instruments the ideals of the time : they symbolized society as a whole, that could be played by a single person (said the « Führer ») .

The static sound of the organ matched the desired objectivity, and the overwhelming sound of the organ referred to the innate power of society. The organ was, therefore, used with great frequency in (political) celebrations.

Among the many organists, over the years, who have championed the middle-section of Bach's fantasy, at the expense of the other 2, surely the most notorious was Herbert Haag, one of the leading musicians of the Nazi Confessionalist church as well as the chief ideologue of the « organ-work-shop » component of the Hitler Youth organization. Haag's activities as a Nazi organist need to be understood within the context of that Party's adoption of the organ as its symbolic instrument of choice, something that occurred with the construction of a gigantic 5 manual instrument, complete with loudspeakers, for the 1936 Nazi Rally in Nuremberg. As Haag's colleague Josef Müller-Blattau described this phenomenon, the organ was « the total instrument of the total State » , and Adolf Hitler was the State's « omnipotent organizer » . In other words, the most powerful musical instrument known to the world became linked to the most powerful politician in its history. Haag, for his part, opined that the organ was « the symbolic instrument of the Nazi community » and ideally equipped to « serve a total “ weltanschauung ” and the will expressed in its festivities » .

About these Festivals, which were basically celebrations of Nazi doctrine and which featured organ music exclusively by « Aryan » composers, Haag was both an active participant and an advisor. He wrote in 1939 that :

« Most of Bach's free organ works easily lend themselves to Festival planning. One thinks, say, of the middle-part of the G major Fantasy ; the introduction of the E-flat major Prelude ; the C minor Prelude ; the D major Prelude ; and many of the other large Preludes, Fugues, Toccatas, and Fantasies of the Master. All these pieces have their place as an introduction to a Festival or as an interlude, say, between 2 speakers or between 1 speaker and 1 choir, etc. , and at the end, ... »

Haag was, therefore, advocating those works, or just those sections of works, that are both inherently « powerful » and that would traditionally have been played with a full-registration, to glorify the totalitarianism of the Nazi regime. The relatively genteel-sounding Trio Sonatas would hardly have accomplished this purpose, nor would the flat section of the G major Fantasy or the lightly textured episodes of the E-flat Prelude (for Haag was recommending that only the opening « ritornello » of the latter work be played) .

When he played the organ himself at these gatherings, Haag practiced what he preached - and dressed in his « Storm Trooper » 's uniform, he looked every bit the part. Just consider the program for a Hitler Youth « Abendmusik » event, in 1937, that showcased the choir of Bach's own church (Saint-Thomas, in Leipzig) and Haag as the organ soloist : limiting himself to the music of Bach, Haag performed the G major Fantasy, the E-flat Prelude and Fugue, and the Toccata and Fugue in F major. Perhaps, his rendering of the Fantasy was met with the same adulation as when the piece was heard, in 1936, at another Nazi-sponsored concert, this one taking place at the « Haus der deutschen Erziehung » (House of German Education) , in Bayreuth.

To quote a local music-critic :

« Bach's Fantasy in G major, which Karl August von Kotzebue consummately played on the organ, constituted the end of the concert. In the powerful 2nd part, the organ sounded under his hands like a thundersorm rumbling in the distance. »

Predictably, that evening's entertainment ended with « Deutschland über alles » , played as an organ solo by Kotzebue with all the might the instrument could muster.

The Big Organ of the Nuremberg Congress Hall (« Luitpoldhalle »)

When opened on 26 October 1936, the Nuremberg Congress Hall (Luitpold Hall) Organ was the largest organ in the world outside the United States - it had 16,013 pipes. Had this gigantic instrument survived the Second World War, it would (even today) be 2nd in size in the world, outside the United States, beaten only by Passau Cathedral ; it would be nearly 50 % larger than London's Royal Albert Hall Organ !

The gigantic Walcker / Sauer organ built for the « Luitpoldhalle » in Nuremberg, in 1936. This organ, Opus 2550, was by far the biggest instrument Walcker built (5 manuals, 220 ranks and 16013 pipes) , and due to the highly-unrealistic timescale of the Party elite, Sauer were enlisted to help. The organ was destroyed along with the hall during allied bombing raids.

There were a few interesting stipulations included in the organ contract, one of these forbade the organ to impress its listeners with its beauty, rather to bring-out « the spirit of the Reichsparty » . Its main task was to accompany singing at the mass meetings through loudspeakers, despite the size and power of the instrument, they thought it necessary to amplify it ! It was on an epic scale, although there were plans to increase its size still further.

This recording (played presumably by his music director, Eduard Kissel) must be the only one in existence demonstrating the organ, probably recorded soon after its completion :

German field marshal Erwin Rommel (popularly known as the « Desert Fox ») has, at the time of writing, received a great deal of publicity and has been regarded by some as almost a hero. There was another Nazi servant, also a War casualty. This was the gigantic organ in the Congress Hall at Nuremberg. While the Atlantic City organ is undoubtedly the largest in the world, this German giant held the honour as the largest instrument, which was not segregated or divided in any way. The 16,013 pipes were all hidden away behind the rather effective pipe-rack.

It is interesting to look back on the building of this organ's predecessor. On August 2 ist, 1935, the notorious Martin Bormann asked the firm, of E. F. Walcker & Co. of Ludwigsburg, to send a representative to discuss the building of an organ for the Luitpold Hall for the Party Congress at Nuremberg, which was to be held later on in the year. The enormous size of the Hall required an organ with, at least, 50 to 60 speaking stops. The difficulty was that the instrument had to be ready for playing by September and, I don't know whether any dire threats in typical Nazi fashion were used, but Walcker undertook this almost impossible task and, by August 28th, were able to tell Bormann that an organ of 50 speaking stops would be ready on the appointed date. The specification included several chorus reeds and a 5 rank cornet and appears to have been designed principally for noise. The 12 following days were spent in transporting, erecting and tuning the organ. Though a little late, it was played for the 1st time by Eduard Kissel at the « Parteitag » (the Day of the National-Socialist Party) .

This organ, however, proved to be too small for the large new hall under construction and so it was decided to build a bigger instrument, which might eventually be re-erected. In the Spring of 1936, several organ builders were requested to tender for an organ of the desired size. The final choice lay between Steinmeyer and Walcker, who were the only 2 German builders in a position to cope with such a large contract. The American Organist, in giving the stoplist in their journal sometime ago, suggested that, as Steinmeyer's wife was an American, the contract went to Walckers. Perhaps so, but Walckers have been building organs since 1781, and I do not think that this contract necessarily displayed sympathy to the Nazi gang. The firm of Wilhelm Sauer of Frankfurt, who have Doctor Oscar Walcker as a director, collaborated over the tremendous task.

Senator Franz Adam, the conductor of the National-Socialist « Reich » Symphony Orchestra, specified the following points :

The organ must be designed in such a way that the quality does not suffer in any way when transmitted over an amplifier system.

The purpose of the organ will be to support the Orchestra and to accompany the singing of mass meetings. Because of the large size of the Hall, the organ will largely be heard through loudspeakers.

As practical experience over a number of years has shown that amplifying systems multiply the difference of the intervals of the tempered tuning (5th, 3rd, etc.) , mixtures and mutations will have to be modified. Instead, special attention must be paid to diapasons and reeds.

Allowance must be made for the possibility of enlargement, if the organ is to be used as a concert instrument in the new Congress Hall.

The immense range of the organ must not attract the attention of individual listeners because of artistic subtleties, but must bring-out the spirit of the « Reich » Party. Doctor Oscar Walcker and Doctor Eduard Kissel, together, worked out the specifications.

« Pedalwerk » : There was only 1 botrowed stop on the organ, the acoustic : 64 feet. The remainder was entirely straight. With so few flue stops of 16 feet pitch, there might have been some duplication of certain manual doubles with good effect. The abundance of upper-work must have put the pedal couplers to little use. The reed chorus of 32 feet to 1 foot pitch was ample for trumpet and tuba tones. Perhaps, Franz Adams's 5th clause forbade the inclusion of quietoo Basses for « cor anglais » and clarinet. Enclosure of certain ranks in the « schwell-werk » and « hornwerk » boxes was a useful provision.

« Kronwerk » : This department, of which the pipework crowned the remainder and thus got its name, was not exactly a positif but a miniature of the « hauptwerk » . The tutti was designed to produce a brilliant sparkling chorus and probably did. As with the other manual departments, a 2 feet reed was provided. No indication in the descriptive brochure is given as to how far-up the reed pipes go before the change to flue pipes. The viola served as the only string in this department, while there were 13 flutes not including mutations of this timbre. In Germany, the tremulant is not necessarily confined to enclosed divisions and one served in this department.

« Hauptwerk » : This great organ solicits no comments as it was typically German in specification. Though only 3 unison diapasons, there was a profusion of flutes of all pitches. Reeds were all rather small. Power was obtained by many medium-scaled ranks speaking in a very complete chorus.

« Oberwerk » : The normal swell department. 26 ranks had an extra-octave of pipes for use with the octave coupler. The « Bratsche » was a gentle string which had the « vox celestis » as its undulating partner.

« Schwellwerk » : According to the brochure, this department was the solo. All ranks were enclosed. Obviously, with so much mixture work, the whole must have been designed to produce some sort of ensemble.

« Hornwerk » : With reeds of 20 inch wind pressure lying horizontally and directed into the Hall, this department produced the climax and would be equivalent to our bombarde. Perhaps, it was the « hornwerk » which fulfilled Adams's 5th point !

Tone : Only 15 stops and many of these were of gentle dulciana and salicional quality. There was also no « septième » (7th) , which is an important harmonic in string tone. Unlike the French though, the Germans have never been too keen on string tone and this instrument had an abundance of every type of flute tone. Wind pressures varied from 6 to 20 inches, but, apart from the « feldtrompeten » , most of the pipework spoke on relatively low pressures for so large a building.

Quite a neat appearance was presented by the console, which was reversed and in a shallow pit. The ugly backrest to the bench appears from the photo to spoil this elegance. While in appearance, the stops resemble rocking tablets, they were pivoted like stopkeys. 2 of the tablets are in the « on » position on the right jamb. Both inter-manual and octave couplers were placed in a single row above the top manual. I don't think they followed the standard Willis order ! Above each stop were buttons for adjusting the 4 free combinations which had indicators above the couplers. Strip indicators for the 2 roller crescendi and tell-tales for other blind movements can also be seen under the music desk. The shutters were controlled by 3 normal balanced pedals and some 60 fixed pistons allowed for ample registration. An unusual feature for a German organ was the radiating and concave pedal-boan.

There was no case to this organ, but it had a most pleasing pipe-rack. The single wooden pipes, which formed the 2 towers, belonged to the 32 feet tibia major, while the flat between was composed of bombarde pipes of the same pitch. Such long boots must have caused considerable delay in speech and release. The flanking flats were formed from pipes of the « prinzipal » bass and « großnasat » .

On October 26th, 1936, Eduard Kissel opened this organ in 4 public recitals before an audience of between 4,000 and 5,000 people. The occasion also marked the 2,500th organ built by the Firm of Walcker after their establishment of 150 years. The life of this instrument was but a few years though, as both organ and the building, in which it was housed, were totally destroyed during the heavy raids on Germany. More was the pity, because, being Nazi property, it might well have been confiscated and eventually rebuilt over here in Earls Court or some similar hall where it would have begun life afresh under democratic fingers.

Of the 2 builders, the firm of Wilhelm Sauer are the less-known. They were established in 1857 and have since built some 1,600 organs. Sauer, who worked for Walcker for a while, studied organ building under Cavaillé-Coll, in Paris. He then tried to transfer his French experience to German organ building and thus his instruments have been more satisfactory for rendering French music. This influence does not appear to have predominated in the organ in question however. « Messieurs » E. F. Walcker & Co. built a tremendous number of organs before the War. The Works in Ludwigsburg escaped damage during the War, but many of their records were destroyed in a store elsewhere. Business was carried on as usual and some 110 new organs were built. One of these arrived safely in Finland, in 1941, while 5 others found their way through the South of France into Spanish churches. Since the War, Walckers have been chiefly engaged in building small unit organs for the many temporary churches which have been erected. There are 5 different models, of which the 4th has a distinct Baroque flavour. Although having only 3 units, one is a small 3 rank mixture which appears on each manual, but on the pedal as a 6 rank mixture !

For so many organists, the independence of the pedal, especially for Bach's music, was essential ; however, in his attempt to provide historical and intellectual support for integrating the organ into the ritual worship of Fascism, the the organ historian Gotthold Frotscher makes much in this frightening book (« Aufführungspraxis alter Musik ») of the importance of smaller organs in the meeting places of the Hitler Youth. The pre-Christian, Germanic faces on the cover also resonated with Frotscher's program for liberating the organ from its ecclesiastical legacy and placing it at the center of the Nazi cult. The largest pipe bellowing-out of its pagan mouth provides a disturbingly accurate representation of German organ triumphalism in which the pedal emerges out of myth and memory ; the organ has a glorious German past that will be renewed in the new Nazi present. Quoting the later 19th Century Hegelian aesthetician, Friedrich Vischer, Frotscher writes in his article on « The Organ in Political Celebration » that the instrument can become a vital element of Nazi ceremonies only by remaining at odds with all « fashion and virtuosity, all hypocrisy, sentimentality and mawkishness » . Virile and pure will be the organ and its music in the 1,000 Year « Reich » . In closing, Frotscher argues that the organ must be true to itself, to its power and independence, in order to further « the idea of the society in which we are rooted » . The German organ is planted in German soil ; it grows from the ground up.

Along with its praise of modest organs for the inculcation of young Nazis, « Die Orgel in der Gegenwart » also asserts that the monuments of the past must define and defend the higher purpose of the instrument against degenerate « Wurlitzers » and kindred abominations. If one wants to learn about real organs and organ music, writes the organist and early music pioneer Joachim Altemark in his contribution to the volume, then one needs to be taken to an instrument by Gottfried Silbermann or Arp Schnitger. To be convinced of this, claims Altemark, one had only « to have Bach's E-flat major Prelude and Triple-fugue or the great F major Toccata with Fugue played for him » on these German organs. The essence of what Altemark calls the « German organ art » can be truly heard only on large German instruments with massive, independent pedals capable of projecting the erudition and athleticism of Bach's polyphony, performed with well-trained precision of arms and legs.

The 3rd « Reich » usurped the ancient ethnic organ-related beliefs. When tourism poster artist Lothar Heinemann wanted, in 1935, to express in visual terms « Deutschland, Das Land der Musik » , he did so not by alluding to Richard Wagner's Operas or Johannes Brahms' Symphonies, but via the mother and father of all pipe-organs, where the pipes themselves metamorphose into the stylized wings of an eagle, although the pedals, the manuals, and the stops are alike unseen.

The German organ arts inspired not only Nazi musicologists, but Nazi designers as well. The notorious tourism poster of 1935 by Lothar Heinemann draws on a long tradition of organ design. Given its cultural status in Germany, the organ is an obvious choice to represent « Deutschland, Das Land der Musik » (Germany, the Land of Music) . Heinemann's glowering, steely blue Nazi Eagle has a cluster of organ pipes as its plumage. On either side, slightly canted from, and somewhat darker than, the bright vertical organ pipes at the center of the image, beams of light extend upward to form the wings. The design seeks the same impact as Nazi architect Albert Speer's infamous light displays, albeit on the minimal space of a poster rather than on the infinity of the night sky. Speer's searchlight beams trace their lineage back to pyrotechnic displays like that of Gabriel Bodenehr, the Elder (1664-1758 or 1673-1765) . Speer's « Cathedral of Light » was staged at the 1937 Party Congress, in Nuremberg, which might well have been partly inspired by the poster, Heinemann's image adopts the Classic framing towers of large northern organs, taken by so many German writers we have encountered as evidence of their preeminence in the development of the instrument and its crucial pedals. Accordingly, the gigantic organ of more than 200 stops built by the Walcker firm at the time of the 1936 Olympic games for Albert Speer's Nazi Congress-Hall (« Luitpoldhalle ») in Nuremberg ...

Nuremberg was praised by organist Eduard Kissel, Music Director in Munich, for its thunderous pedal : « the fundamental and enormous rolling basses » (« die grundgewaltige rollende Bässe ») . In Lothar Heinemann's poster, Germany is not only the Master of the organ, but the organ is the musical symbol of the Master race. The bird attains its menace from the sweep of the largest, framing vertical columns ; the eagle threatens flight with the wing feathers that are the visual equivalent of pedal pipes.

What these comparisons of Nazi eagles and Albert Speer's spotlight cathedrals with Silbermann organs and Saxon fireworks suggest is not only that luminous displays and organ imagery share a long visual tradition, but also that the largest metal pipes and columns of light conveyed a sense of transcendent power, frequently described by witnesses in the language of the divine, or its surrogate : the sublime. This capacity for terror is capitalized on by Heinemann, but also, in benign forms, by many composers, not least Johann Sebastian Bach himself, in pieces such as the « Pedal Exercitium » . It was the pedals that could summon thoughts of the « Last Judgment » ; the thunder of the bass could inspire devotion, but could also be criticized for degrading the organ and its higher purpose by disrupting pious thoughts of congregants through the inappropriate over-use of such effects. Bigger meant lower in sound, more imposing and awe-inspiring : the organ as edifice was framed and articulated by pedals, just as it was musically founded on what the feet could do with them.

Reflecting on the organ's exploitation as a Nazi image is not intended to poison the history of the instrument ; supreme manipulators of symbol, the Nazis distilled their own twisted message from historical antecedents with chilling potency. Heinemann's design exploits the privileged position of the organ in German culture across many Centuries ; it was a symbol of German music long before the Nazis. The instrument and its music did significant cultural work, not only in German musical life but also in contributing to a sense of national pride and cohesion. The triumph of the German model of organ-playing, throughout Europe and the world, not only offers a case study in cultural and technological exchange across borders and over time, but also in the uses and abuses of the symbolic power of the instrument that made the unprecedented expansion of that ideal possible. Nowhere is this connection clearer than in Forkel's seminal biography, where Bach's Mastery of the pedal is a vital aspect of his identity as a German hero, both musically and in uniting a people. The organ's power is both visual and sonic. The dual spectacle of dynamic organ performance and static organ architecture exposes the fraught history extending from Gottfried Silbermann and Gabriel Bodenehr to Lothar Heinemann and Albert Speer.

Le dictateur a la certitude d'une conscience musicale innée et supérieure chez l'être germanique. C'est pourquoi il n'hésite pas à présenter l'Allemagne, comme « pays de la musique » . L'affiche sur papier glacé de Lothar Heinemann (1911-1966) intitulée « L'Allemagne, pays de la musique » , réalisée en 6 langues, est adressée aux principaux pays européens comme message esthétique-politique : l'aigle figurant l'état allemand place l'orgue - instrument roi - sous son aile protectrice. En 1936, à Nuremberg, un orgue monumental destiné à accompagner les manifestations de Parti nazi révèle, par le gigantisme de sa facture, la puissance des principes du « Führer » . Ce grand-orgue possède 220 registres, 16,000 tuyaux dont le plus haut est de 12 mètres. Ainsi, l'art et la nation sont-ils désormais indissociables. Le docteur Josef Gœbbels affirme que le peuple allemand est « le 1er peuple musicien de la Terre » .

Weitere Orgelbauten sind die Orgel nach Barcelona Weltausstellung, soweit ich ermessen kann auch heute noch die größte Orgel Europas, die zur Restaurierung ansteht, in Kufstein die Heldenorgel, und im Jahre 1936 wird die Orgel für die Luitpoldhalle in Nürnberg für den Reichsparteitag gebaut mit rund 220 Registern. Die allerdings bereits 5 Jahre später durch Brandbomben restlos zerstört wurde.

Le « Luitpoldhalle » , construit en 1906 sur un plan de 180 mètres sur 50 mètres (590 pieds par 160 pieds) , pouvait recevoir jusqu'à 16,000 personnes. Les congrès du Parti Nazi s'y tenaient. La façade fut modifiée dans un style monumental.

...

The Luitpold Hall (« Luitpoldhalle ») , built in 1906, had an outline of 180 metres by 50 metres (590 feet by 160 feet) featured 76 loudspeakers, 42 spotlights, the largest pipe organ in Germany and could seat 16,000 people. Dating back to the Bavarian Exposition, the former machine hall was renovated and 1st used by the Nazis for the Party convention Party congress of 1934. Its monumental neo-Classic facade featured a shell limestone facing with 3 enormous entrance portals. It was in this building during the Party congress of 1935, that the Nuremberg laws were adapted which deprived German Jews and other minorities of their citizenship. The structure was severely damaged by allied bombs, in early 1945, and, a few years later, replaced by a parking lot. The granite staircase leading to the building remains intact today.

Ebenfalls auf dem Gelände befand sich die sogenannte Luitpoldhalle, welche ursprünglich als Maschinenhalle diente, dann aber durch Albert Speer der monumentalen NS-Architektur angepasst wurde, um so als vorläufige Kongreßhalle für 16.000 Personen genutzt zu werden. Aus diesem Grund wurde sie auch « Alte Kongreßhalle » genannt, ungeachtet der Tatsache, daß der Bau der neuen, um einiges größeren Kongreßhalle am Dutzendteich noch gar nicht fertiggestellt war. Das Innere der Luitpoldhalle erhielt durch eine Orgel sowie « Bänder, Schnüre und Symbole » nahezu kirchlichen Charakter. Dies sollte auch hier dazu führen, daß der « Führer » wie ein Prediger und Auserwählter seiner Religion, der Ideologie des Nationalsozialismus, erscheinen sollte.

Die Luitpoldhalle hatte eine Ausdehnung von 180 x 50 Metern und bot Platz für bis zu 16.000 Menschen. In ihr fand im Rahmen der Reichsparteitage der Parteikongress statt. Da die verspielte Jugendstilfassade der 1906 errichteten Halle nicht zur Optik der Luitpoldarena passte, verblendete man sie 1935 mit einer strengen Kulisse, die dem Eingang einen monumentalen Eindruck verlieh. Auch im Innenraum wurde durch Fahnen und Vorhänge die Aufmerksamkeit der Zuhörer von der Architektur weg auf die Redner, namentlich Adolf Hitler und weitere Parteigrößen, gelenkt. Während der Jahre 1933 bis 1936 wurde in die Halle die damals größte Orgel Europas eingebaut. Die durch einen Bombentreffer beschädigte Halle wurde 1950 gesprengt und abgetragen. Das Areal wird heute als Parkplatz genutzt.

Ein weiteres Bauwerk das längst aus dem Stadtbild verschwunden ist, war die Luitpoldhalle. Sie wurde zur Bayerischen Landes-Gewerbe, Industrie- und Kunstausstellung 1906 errichtet. Anlässlich der 100-jährigen Zugehörigkeit zu Bayern wurde dies Jubiläumsschau in Nürnberg ausgerichtet.

Im Gegensatz zu den anderen Ausstellungsbauten, die als « fliegende Bauten » nur für die Industrieschau von Mai bis Oktober errichtet wurden, wurde das später als Luitpoldhalle benannte Gebäude, für eine längerfristige Nutzung konzipiert.

Gebaut wurde die dreischiffige, verglaste Stahlskeletthalle 1905 von der Firma MAN. Wie auf Fotografien von Ferdinand Schmidt zu erkennen ist, war es eine mächtige Konstruktion, mit einer vom Jugendstil beeinflussten Architektur. Bei einer Länge von 180 Metern und einer Breite von 49 Metern passten später bei Veranstaltungen bis zu 16.000 Menschen in das Bauwerk.

Ursprünglich als Maschinenhalle errichtet wurde das im Luitpoldhain gelegene Bauwerk nach Beendigung der Präsentation vorwiegend als Fest- und Veranstaltungshalle genutzt. Nachdem die Stadt Nürnberg das Gebäude nach Ausstellungsende übernommen hatte, erhielt es auch den Namen Luitpoldhalle - in Anlehnung nach ihrer Lage im Luitpoldhain, der nach dem bayerischen Prinzregent Luitpold benannt wurde.

So fand dort 1910 das 8. Bayerische Arbeiter-Sängerbundesfest statt, gefolgt vom 8. Deutschen Sängerbundesfest mit 40.000 Teilnehmern im Jahr 1912. Auch die Abschlusskundgebung des Wiedervereinigungsparteitags von USPD und SPD fand am 24. September 1922 in der Luitpoldhalle statt. Dieses Gebäude diente anfangs auch dem 1912 eröffneten Tiergarten an der Bayernstraße als Restaurant.

Bevor die Nationalsozialisten das gesamte Areal um den Dutzendteich vereinnahmten, nutzen diese die Halle bei ihren Reichsparteitagen 1927 und 1929 als Unterkunftsmöglichkeit. Da der Grundstein für die geplante Kongreßhalle erst 1935 gelegt wurde, und die Parteitage ab 1933 immer in Nürnberg stattfinden sollten, mußte die Luitpoldhalle in dieser Zeit für die « Nazi-Kongresse » herhalten. Deshalb nannte man sie später auch « Alte Kongreßhalle » .

Wie bereits erwähnt, hatte das Bauwerk eine vom Jugendstil beeinflusste Architektur. Dies wiederum war den Nationalsozialisten zuwider. Die Halle mußte sich eine « Verschönerung » von « Reichsbaumeister » Albert Speer gefallen lassen. Dieser ließ 1935 den Charakter des Gebäudes völlig verschwinden. Die Fassade wurde mit Muschelkalkstein im neoklassizistischen NS-Monumentalstil verkleidet, auch das Glasdach mußte weichen. Im Inneren wurden die Eisenpfeiler rot bespannt und die Decke mit Tüchern und Bändern verkleidet. Bis 1938 hielt das Naziregime ihre Versammlungen, in dem Gebäude ab. Nach dieser Zeit soll die Halle als Lebensmittellager für die Nazi-Bonzen gedient haben, wie sie einem Augenzeugenbericht von Fritz Nadler entnehmen können (siehe weiter unten) .

Nach schweren Bombentreffern beim ersten Großangriff auf Nürnberg, in der Nacht vom 28./29. August 1942, brannte die Luitpoldhalle aus. Ihre eisernen Reste wurden nach Kriegsende beseitigt. Ende der 1950er Jahre begann die Stadt den Luitpoldhain als Freizeit- und Parkanlage wiederherzustellen.

Fritz Nadler beschreibt in seinem Buch « Ich sah wie Nürnberg unterging » , den traurigen Zustand der ehemaligen Festhalle, nach dem die « Royal Air Force » in 88 Minuten ihre Bombenlast aus 159 Flugzeugen abgeladen hatte :

Weiter heißt es in einer Bildunterschrift :

Herbert Haag

Herbert Haag (geboren 3. Dezember 1908 in Mannheim ; gestorben 13. Juni 1977 in Heidelberg) war ein deutscher Organist und Kirchenmusiker.

Haag studierte Kirchenmusik- und Orgel und andere bei Karl Straube in Leipzig. 1936 erfolgte die Promotion in Musikwissenschaft bei Heinrich Bessler an der Universität Heidelberg über das Orgelwerk des französischen Komponisten César Franck. Seit 1931 bis etwa 1942 war er Dozent für Orgel am Evangelischen Kirchenmusikalischen Institut Heidelberg. Sein Eintritt in die NSDAP erfolgte am 1. Mai 1933. 1943 gründete er die « Orgel-Arbeitsgemeinschaft Baden-Elsaß » und war Fachschaftsleiter der Reichsmusikkammer (Ortsumikerschaft Heidelberg) . Ab 1943 leitete er die Städtische Musikschule Freiburg im Breisgau, wo er mitten im Krieg die Erweiterung der Welte-Orgel des Augustiner museums durchsetzte, die der Musikschule als Übungsinstrument diente. Gegen Ende des Krieges wurde er schwer verwundet. Seine Entnazifizierung gestaltete sich langwierig und dauerte bis 1948. 1953 kehrte er nach Heidelberg zurück und übernahm die Leitung des Kirchenmusikalischen Instituts von 1956 bis 1973. Zugleich war er Landeskirchenmusikdirektor und mehrere Jahre Präsident der Direktorenkonferenz der landeskirchlichen Ausbildungsstätten. Haag setzte sich für einen Neubau des Heidelberger Instituts (1971) ein. Als Organist und Lehrer war er sehr geschätzt.

Haag trat im Dritten Reich nicht nur als Musiker, sondern auch als kirchenmusikalischer « Chef-Ideologe » im Dienst der nationalsozialistischen Staatsmacht hervor. Er instrumentalisierte die Orgel für die « neuen Aufgaben und Forderungen » der NS-Idee, spielte auch Gottesdienste in SA-Uniform und bereiste mit propagandistischen Vorträgen ganz Deutschland : Der Organist müße, so verkündete er, nicht nur als Kirchenmusiker « im besten Sinn Fanatiker der Orgel sein, weil die Orgel in der nationalsozialistischen Feier Künderin ist, nicht nur Instrument » . Im Januar 1943 erschien das von ihm herausgegebene Oberrheinische Orgelbuch. Im Vorwort erläuterte Haag und andere die Wichtigkeit der Orgel bei der Fei ergestaltung. Das Oberrheinische Orgelbuch enthält Werke von Komponisten, die in der Oberrheingegend (links und rechts des Stromes) entweder geboren oder zum Zeitpunkt der Herausgabe hauptsächlich tätig waren und stellt somit einen landschaftlichen und generationsmäßigen Querschnitt durch das Schaffen oberrheinischer Meister der Gegenwart (HH im Vorwort) dar. Nach Kriegsende wurde das Oberrheinische Orgelbuch mit zahlreichen geschwärzten und somit nicht mehr lesbaren Passagen einige Zeit weiter verkauft.

Le « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester »

On assistera à l'émergence de guerres intestines entre différentes institutions culturelles déjà en place. 3 orchestres professionnels se partageront la ville de Linz et la région de la Haute-Autriche : le « Städtische Symphonie Orchester » (l'Orchestre symphonique municipal) va offrir, de 1940 à 1945, des concerts en salle et des Opéras au théâtre ; l'Orchestre Bruckner de Saint-Florian sera rebaptisé (sous ordre expresse du « Führer ») le « Reichs-Bruckner-

Orchester » de Linz afin de produire, de 1943 jusqu'à mai 1944, des captations en studio et en concert réalisées par la Radio du « Reich ». Enfin, un Orchestre de théâtre du Haut-Danube fera la promotion, de 1941 à 1943, de la musique dite légère et de l'opérette (comme par exemple, « la Veuve joyeuse » de Franz Lehár, une des œuvres favorites d'Hitler) .

1940 : On trouve finalement un musicien de calibre à l'extérieur de la ville de Linz : il s'agit du chef d'orchestre Georg-Ludwig Jochum. Ce choix servira à renforcer l'engagement d'Adolf Hitler envers la musique et la vie culturelle Linzoise. Hitler va également se préoccuper des jeunes chanteurs qui sont rattachés à l'Opéra de Linz. Il optera, cette fois, pour le directeur musical de Munich, le chef Clemens Krauß, qui prendra charge de leur formation.

Clemens Krauß dit avoir été chargé aussi par Hitler de la formation d'un « très bon chef d'orchestre » pour la ville de Linz.

Les projets visés à Hitler demeureront des demi-victoires. Georg-Ludwig Jochum (le frère cadet d'Eugen Jochum) ne s'est pas avéré être le 1er choix mais, plutôt, le meilleur candidat disponible. Il sera difficile pour lui de répondre aux exigences culturelles du « Gauleiter » (représentant du district du « Reich ») . Jochum se voit assis entre 2 chaises : celle de l'Orchestre symphonique municipal et celle de l'Orchestre du Théâtre.

Par la suite, le « Führer » lui rajoutera le titre de chef du « Reich Bruckner Orchester » , ensemble basé au monastère de Saint-Florian.

Pour réduire les charges de Georg-Ludwig Jochum envers le Théâtre national, on lui assigne un chef assisant, Willy Wickenhäuser, qui dirigera entre autre les répétitions. Le « duo » sera aussi responsable des concerts spéciaux, des concerts en l'honneur de la « Wehrmacht » , des concerts de musique de chambre, des enregistrements en studio et pour la radio et des concerts tenus à Saint-Florian, à l'occasion de diverses cérémonies comme celui du « Jour du Souvenir » qui aura lieu le 9 novembre 1941.

On assistera à des tensions entre le maire de Linz, les élus municipaux et le « Gauleiter » August Eigruber au sujet de l'utilisation de l'Orchestre. En février 1944, ce dernier se sentira obligé de faire parvenir une lettre au magistrat afin de clarifier la situation :

« L'Orchestre Bruckner de la radiodiffusion allemande, c'est l'Orchestre du « Reich » . Il possède son siège permanent à Saint-Florian ou (provisoirement) à Linz. Il ne doit pas être considéré comme un simple Orchestre municipal ou encore de District. Seulement dans certaines circonstances, il pourra remplir cette fonction. Par conséquent, il est essentiel que le Synphonique puisse continuer d'exister et aspirer à devenir un ensemble de 1er plan. Nous sommes fort conscient des besoins de la ville ; nous prévoyons organiser des concerts durant les mois d'été dans les quartiers de Linz et dans les stations touristiques environnantes. » (Archives de l'État de Haute-Autriche. Dossier : Théâtre d'État.)

Ainsi, Linz sera privé de son Orchestre de Théâtre : cette institution dépend, au plan administratif, de la région. Et, quant à lui, l'Orchestre symphonique municipal devra se subordonner, dans une certaine mesure, au Conseil d'administration.

Près d'un mois après le début de la campagne de Russie (le 22 juin 1941) , grâce à un décret en provenance du Ministère du « Reich » pour l'Instruction publique et la Propagande, les écrivains et les compositeurs nationaux seront interdits d'existence « jusqu'à nouvel ordre » . Franz Kinzl voit dans cette mesure une opportunité pour le chef Georg-Ludwig Jochum de promouvoir les compositeurs de Haute-Autriche dont Anton Bruckner :

L'année suivante, les compositeurs autrichiens se sont cette fois tournés vers Anton Fellner, le Commissaire culturel du District, pour tenter à nouveau de contrecarrer les plans du chef Georg-Ludwig Jochum :

Georg-Ludwig Jochum dut donc se plier aux arguments de Fellner. Mais ce dernier était fort conscient que la politique de propagande et d'assimilation proposée par le « Gauleiter » Eigruber qui consiste à « apporter la Culture allemande au peuple » demeurera une utopie.

Suite au débat sur l'avenir de l'Orchestre municipal et de l'Orchestre du Théâtre, on assistera, en 1942, à la fondation à Saint-Florian (sur ordre d'Adolf Hitler) d'un 3e Orchestre Linzois avec le mandat de promouvoir la vie et les œuvres Symphoniques d'Anton Bruckner. Il doit entrer en fonction immédiatement après la fin de la guerre (?). Des musiciens provenant de l'Orchestre symphonique municipal de Linz et de divers autres Orchestres (en fonction depuis 1933) qui travaillent avec la Radio du « Reich » devront donc se sacrifier pour l'effort de guerre. La phalange sera composée de 120 musiciens et devrait, en termes de qualité, se comparer aux Philharmoniques de Berlin et de Vienne. La radiodiffusion se fera directement du monastère de Saint-Florian grâce à l'installation, par le « Reich », d'une nouvelle station de radio.

Dès 1941, l'Orchestre est placé sous la direction du chef Georg-Ludwig Jochum (soit le frère cadet d'Eugen Jochum) qui assume déjà les destinées de l'Orchestre symphonique de Linz depuis 1940. Il aura comme assistant le « Kapellmeister » Willy Wickenhäuser.

Après 1 an de préparation et de rodage, le « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » est fin prêt. Le 20 avril 1943, il offrira un concert exceptionnel à l'occasion du 54e anniversaire d'Adolf Hitler (1 an plus tard, le « Führer » souhaitera le rebaptisé « Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester des Deutschen Rundfunks » ; l'Orchestre Bruckner de Linz de la radiodiffusion allemande du « Reich »). Des concerts publics seront offerts à partir de mai 1944. Des captations en direct par la Radio du « Reich » seront effectuées à Saint-Florian, Salzbourg, Linz et Vienne.

Les salles de concert de même que les Théâtres lyriques autrichiens cesseront leurs activités en raison de la déclaration, le 1er septembre 1944, de la « Guerre totale ». Seul le « Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » poursuivra sa « divine » mission. Les diffusions cesseront le 14 mars 1945.

The 40th anniversary of the « Bruckner Orchester Linz » means that, in 1967, the then Orchestra of the Linz District Theatre (« Landestheater ») donned a new costume with a view to improving its artistic status and marketability on a wider-stage. To include the « genius loci » in its new name seemed perfectly natural. Behind this, however, there lies a long history, always connected to the destiny of the District Theatre.

The performing area built on the « Promenade », in 1803, served all types of theatrical and musical events, for which the Municipal Orchestra of the « Linz Stadtthurnermeister » (music-director), Franz Glöggel, was available. After a quarrel, the Theatre director Franz Graf Föger established a band of his own, in 1806, and this experienced the same ups and downs as the Theatre. For whole decades around the mid-19th Century, some 30 orchestral players were on hand for a season that could last 12 months, but sometimes for only 8 or 9. During the rest of the time, the musicians had to find employment elsewhere. Church music, teaching and playing in spa Orchestras during the summer were essential stand-bys. Some players also worked as music copyists, as the horn player Franz Schimatschek did for Anton Bruckner.

The early 20th Century saw a turn for the worse. From 1914, there was no Opera in Linz for over 5 years. In the period between the 2 World Wars, cultural life was over-shadowed by political and economic problems. The Opera ceased in 1925, Operetta continuing to thrive the longest. Although the Theatre was threatened with closure in 1932 because of serious economic difficulties, this was averted and a core ensemble of orchestral players was retained. Opera with an in-house ensemble was resumed in autumn 1937, beginning with Wilhelm Kienzl's « Der Evangelimann » .

The National-Socialist period was a somewhat confusing time for the Orchestra because of a division of interests between City and District. For a while, there were 3 Orchestras in Linz, including one in the Theatre devoted to « light entertainment » .

After 1945, the professional Orchestra witnessed a steady growth in personnel so as to take on more and more concert engagements under the joint auspices of City and District. It has borne the name « Bruckner Orchester » since 1 January 1967, has been an autonomous institution of the District of Upper-Austria since 1986, and achieved the status of a limited company together with the Linz Theatre, in 2005. The development of its artistic profile has been governed by successive principal conductors :

Professor Kurt WöB (1961-1975) ; Theodor Guschlbauer (1975-1983) ; Doctor Roman Zeilinger (1983-1985) ; Manfred Mayrhofer (1985-1992) ; Martin Sieghart (1992-2000) ; Ingo Ingensand (2000-2002) ; and Dennis Russell Davies (since 2002) .

With its 110 musicians, the Orchestra is now one of Central Europe's leading ensembles, while remaining at the Linz Theatre's disposal in all musical matters. Its artistic home is the « Linz Brucknerhaus » , where major concerts are given. In addition, there are regular concert engagements both at home and abroad, such as tours of Japan and China, and the United States. The Orchestra's CDs include the already legendary « Bruckner Box » with the entire Symphonic « œuvre » , new Bruckner recordings under the present chief-conductor, a series of rarities, and works by the American composer Philip Glass. The latter's 8th Symphony was commissioned by the District of Upper-Austria and premiered by the Orchestra in New York and at its Jubilee Concert in Linz.

To coincide with the 40th anniversary concert in the « Brucknerhaus » , the « Bruckner Orchester Linz » released a Jubilee box-set of CDs containing all the Master's Symphonies. The recordings date from 1981 onwards and feature performances under the direction of 4 principal conductors who have helped to shape the Orchestra. Theodor Guschlbauer conducts No. 0 (« die Nullte ») . Kurt Eichhorn is commemorated in recordings of the 6th, 7th and 9th Symphonies, the last of these with the completed Finale. Martin Sieghart is responsible for the 5th : a recording made in the Abbey Church of Saint-Florian in 1995, and since, deleted from the catalogue. Dennis Russell Davies conducts the 1st (1st version of 1866) , 2nd, 3rd (1889) , 4th (1st version of 1874) and 8th Symphony (1st version of 1884-1887) aus dem Deutschen Reich (zum Teil zwangsweise abkommandiert) 1942 in Sankt Florian gegründet, besonders zur Pflege von « A. Bruckners Lebenswerk » . Das rund 120 Mitglieder umfassende Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester sollte, qualitätsmäßig den Berliner und Wiener Philharmonikern vergleichbar, nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg den Grundstock eines eigenen großdeutschen Senders für « ernste Musik » bilden : für das Musikwerk Weltrundfunk mit Sitz in Sankt Florian. Das nach Hitlers Wünschen (und andere auch als Aufbewahrungsort von Kunstschätzen) umzubauende Augustiner-Chorherrenstift Sankt Florian, die neu zu gründenden Institutionen Bruckner-Orchester und Bruckner-Chor sollten das Musikwerk des Großdeutschen Rundfunks bilden. Der Reichsintendant des Großdeutschen Rundfunks, Heinrich Glasmeier, war die Zentralfigur für die Umsetzung der Pläne. Das Stift war bereits 1940 beschlagnahmt und zu Gunsten des Reichsgaus Oberdonau enteignet, jedoch wegen seiner kulturhistorischen Bedeutung nicht wie andere Klöster aufgehoben worden, die Chorherren hatten das Stift allerdings 1941 verlassen müßen. Unter dem Namen Bruckner-Stift Sankt Florian wurde es von Hitler in seinen umfangreichen Plan für Linz, die zukünftige Kulturhauptstadt des Großdeutschen Reiches, aufgenommen und sogar als Aufführungsort für jährlich abzuhaltende Brucknerfestspiele (nach Bayreuther Vorbild) vorgesehen.

Zunächst Bruckner-Orchester Sankt Florian des Großdeutschen Rundfunks genannt und unter diesem Namen nach einer Einspiel- und Probezeit erfolgreich ab April 1943 aufgetreten, setzte sich ab Mai 1944 die Bezeichnung Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester durch. Gespielt wurde vor allem in Sankt Florian, Linz und Wien bis zum 14.03.1945. Rundfunkaufnahmen des Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters fanden in Wien, Salzburg und Linz statt (zum Teil auf CD wieder veröffentlicht) , Sendungen gab es bis zum 01.04.1945. Künstlerischer Leiter war Georg Ludwig Jochum, als Gastdirigenten waren Wilhelm Furtwängler, der auch als Leiter im Gespräch gewesen war, Herbert von Karajan, Karl Böhm, Hans Knappertsbusch, Oswald Kabasta, Carl Schuricht und Joseph Keilberth verpflichtet. Die nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg geplante Zusammenführung der Musiker in ein neues Bruckner-Orchester in Bad Pyrmont / Deutschland scheiterte (Bruckner Orchester Linz) .

Mit einer Verordnung des Reichspropagandaministers vom 11.06.1938 begannen die Maßnahmen zur Gleichschaltung des Musiklebens mit dem Großdeutschen Reich. Die neuen Strukturen krankten allerdings am Kompetenzgerangel mehrerer Kulturbeauftragter von unterschiedlichen Organisationen. Aufgrund unterschiedlicher Interessen von Stadt und Land Oberösterreich / Oberdonau bestanden zeitweise drei Berufsorchester nebeneinander : das Städtische Symphonie Orchester (1940-1945, für Konzerte und Oper im Theater) und das Bruckner-Orchester Sankt Florian des Großdeutschen Rundfunks (seit 1943, ab Mai 1944 : Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester, für Rundfunkaufnahmen und Konzerte) , beide geleitet von Georg-Ludwig Jochum, zu dessen Entlastung 1941 Kapellmeister Willy Wickenhäuser von der StadtLinz. berufen worden war. Schließlich stellte der Gau Oberdonau für die « leichte Muse » ein eigenes Theaterorchester (1941-1943) auf.

Die traditionellen großen Chöre waren von zwangsweiser Auflösung (Brucknerchor) beziehungsweise Beeinträchtigung des Proben- und Konzertbetriebes (Frohsinn) betroffen. Gleichzeitig hatten aber die Behörden Scheu vor der Auflösung der Ensembles, da die Fortsetzung der Choraufführungen großen Stils geplant war. Weiters gab es eine Städtische Chorgemeinschaft (erweitert Februar 1941) , einen Gauchor der deutschen Erzieher (erweitert 1943) und den professionellen Bruckner-Chor Sankt Florian (1943-1945) als Ensemble des Großdeutschen Rundfunks.

Ab der Saison 1940-1941 ist eine steigende Zahl von Kammermusik- und Solistenkonzerten zu verzeichnen. An Linzer Kammerensembles existierten drei Streichquartette und ein « Collegium Musicum » am Bruckner Konservatorium. Konzertveranstalter waren neben privaten Konzertdirektionen und Vereinen die « NSG Kraft durch Freude » -Organisation (ab Oktober 1938) und das Kulturamt des Linzer Magistrats (ab November 1939) . Als mit der Verfügung des totalen Kriegseinsatzes (01.09.1944) jeder Konzert- und Theaterbetrieb eingestellt wurde, war das Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester ausgenommen.

Der 1945 einsetzende Wiederaufbau konnte auf dem Sektor Musik und Theater zum Teil an alte Strukturen anknüpfen, wenn sich auch viele Erschwernisse entgegenstellten. Das Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester spielte im Auflösungsprozess unter verschiedenen Namen. Das Städtische Symphonieorchester wurde auf Weisung der Amerikanischen Besatzungsmacht aus dem Dienst der Stadt entlassen, der Theaterpächter stellte den verbliebenen Rest an. Orchesterkonzerte kamen wegen unzureichender Kräfte nur zögernd in Schwung. Dabei war der Dirigent Ludwig Daxsperger der « Mann der ersten Stunde » . Infolge der Verfügbarkeit mehrerer kleinerer Räume konnten lokale und auswärtige Solisten und Kammerensembles zahlreiche Konzerte geben ; das Kulturamt des Magistrates wirkte dabei als Veranstalter. Nach Entlassung von Direktor Brantner wurde das Landestheater wieder Pachtbetrieb. Kirchenmusik konnte sich verstärkt entfalten, die Magistratsmusik bereits am 16.07.1945 wieder auftreten.

Le « Reichs-Bruckner-Chor »

Der Rundfunkchor des Mitteldeutschen Rundfunks

1924

Am 14. Dezember 1924 singt mit der Leipziger Oratorienvereinigung der erste Leipziger Rundfunkchor im Sender MIRAG.

Unter der Leitung von Alfred Szendrei, dem musikalischen Direktor des Senders, erklingt gemeinsam mit dem Leipziger Sinfonieorchester Franz-Josef Haydns « Schöpfung » .

Hierzu Szendrei in seinen Erinnerungen :

« Ich habe mir einen ständigen Chor von 32 Sängern zusammengestellt, alle Mitglieder des Gewandhauschores, mit ausgezeichneten Stimmen und alle perfekte Blattleser. Mit nur 1-2 Klavierproben und einer Generalprobe konnte ich mit diesem Chor einwandfreie künstlerische Leistungen erzielen. Ich habe den Chor zu “ funkischem ” Singen trainiert, das heißt den Sängern diejenigen Stärkegrade beigebracht, welche die damalige Mikrophontechnik erlaubt hat. Außerdem sind mehrere Mikrophone so aufgestellt worden, daß die vier verschiedenen Chorgruppen sich klar voneinander abhoben und keinen dicken Brei in der Sendung ergaben. »

Der Rundfunkchor Leipzig 1928-1930 mit Musikchef Alfred Szendrei vor der « Alten Handelsbörse », aus der die Übertragungen stattfanden.

Bis 1931 singt die Leipziger Oratorienvereinigung jährlich in 15 bis 20 Oratorien- und Opernübertragungen unter Szendreis Leitung.

1929

Am 6. Mai wirkt der Chor in der ersten Rundfunk-Übertragung von Arnold Schönbergs « Gurre-Liedern » mit.

Alfred Szendrei schreibt hierüber :

« Ich lud dazu Schönberg ein, und in Erwartung seiner Anwesenheit habe ich ausgezeichnete Solisten herangezogen ... Mein Orchester wurde auf 100 Mann verstärkt, die halsbrecherisch schwierigen Chöre wurden von der Leipziger Singakademie, dem Leipziger Männerchor und der Leipziger Oratorienvereinigung bestritten : es war ein imposanter Chorkörper von mehr als 450 Sängern. Das Podium war zu klein, um solche Massen unterzubringen, und es mußte eine Anzahl Logen im Zuschauerraum dafür herangezogen werden. Die Aufführung war ein großer Erfolg sowohl für Schönberg wie für mich. Wir beide wurden sehr gefeiert, sogar die Presse war einstimmig im Lob, ein Umstand, der sich in Leipzig nur selten ereignete. Obwohl die Funkübertragung einer solchen Massenaufführung ziemlich problematisch und riskant war, haben dennoch der Deutschland-Sender und die meisten anderen Sender die Aufführung übernommen. Wider Erwarten liefen in den nächsten Tagen eine Menge guter Urteile über den akustischen Teil der Übertragung bei uns ein. »

1931

Alfred Szendrei wird von nationalsozialistischen Kräften aus dem Amt des Musikalischen Direktors der MIRAG gedrängt. Die Leipziger Oratorienvereinigung wandelt sich in den deutlich kleineren Leipziger Solistenchor, der im Programm der MIRAG eher das « leichtere » Repertoire bedient.

Am Pult des Leipziger Solistenchores stehen neben Hans Weisbach, Theodor Blumer und Willy Steffen auch Friedbert Sammler und Heinrich Werlé.

Ab Juli nennt sich der Rundfunkchor « Kammerchor des Reichssenders Leipzig » , Ende des Jahres 1934 dann « Chor des Reichssenders Leipzig » .

1935

Der Reichssender Leipzig stellt Curt Kretzschmar als « Kapellmeister, Chorleiter und musikalischer Sachbearbeiter » ein.

Am 1. Oktober erhalten die Leipziger Rundfunk-Chorsänger erstmals feste Verträge.

Der Chor hat etwas 32 Mitglieder.

Die Aufnahme der Arie der Marie aus der Oper « Die Regimentstochter » von Gaetano Donizetti mit Irma Beilke und dem Leipziger Sinfonieorchester unter Curt Kretzschmar vom 1. März 1937 stellt die erste erhalten gebliebene Aufnahme mit dem Chor des Reichssenders Leipzig dar.

Am 12. Juni findet erstmals eine A-cappella-Produktion mit deutschen Volksliedern statt.

Zwischen November 1937 und April 1938 werden « Rienzi », « Der fliegende Holländer », « Tannhäuser », « Lohengrin », « Tristan und Isolde » sowie « Parsifal » unter Beteiligung des Chores des Reichssenders Leipzig aufgeführt.

1941

Der Chor des Reichssenders Leipzig wird kriegsbedingt zum Münchner Sender « abgeordnet » .

1942

Am 15. September löst Rundfunk-Reichsintendant Doktor Heinrich Glasmeier alle deutschen Rundfunkchöre auf.

Gleichzeitig wird verfügt, einen Reichs-Bruckner-Chor aufzubauen, der im Stift Sankt Florian bei Linz zusammen mit dem Reich-Bruckner-Orchester tätig sein soll. Etwa die Hälfte der ehemaligen Leipziger Rundfunk-Chorsänger wird in den Bruckner-Chor engagiert.

Thomaskantor Günther Ramin baut diesen Chor in Leipzig auf.

Der Bruckner-Chor wird nach Linz verlegt und arbeitet dort unter Leitung von Johannes Rietz und später unter

Professor Doktor Michael Schneider und dem Chormitglied Walter Kretschmar bis über das Kriegsende hinaus weiter.

Der in Linz verbliebene Teil von 34 Chormitgliedern siedelt im Herbst 1945 nach Korntal bei Stuttgart über und hofft, dort als Chor eines neu zu gründenden Stuttgarter Senders übernommen zu werden.

« Grandiose Pläne » im Kriegsalltag

Der Zweite Weltkrieg nahm seinen Lauf, und so war es nicht verwunderlich, daß im September des Jahres 1942 die deutschen Rundfunkchöre aufgelöst wurden.

Diese oder ähnliche lapidare Feststellungen sind in der Literatur zu diesem Thema des Öfteren zu finden. Wäre es nicht ebenso gut möglich gewesen, die Chöre weiter zusammenzulegen und auf diese Weise wenigstens zwei oder gar nur einen Rundfunkchor zu erhalten ?

Im Folgenden sollen die Gründe für die Auflösung der Rundfunkchöre näher beleuchtet werden. Die Behandlung dieser Thematik ist ohne einige Kenntnisse über die Struktur des Reichs-Rundfunks und über den Reichsintendanten (RI) Doktor Heinrich Glasmeier schwer möglich.

Glasmeier war nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg als Direktor der Vereinigten Westfälischen Adelsarchive tätig gewesen und über das Amt des Intendanten des Kölner Senders auf den Sessel des Reichsintendanten gelangt.

Weil der Rundfunk jedoch immer mehr als Propagandainstrument genutzt und zumindest hinsichtlich der programmatischen Seite dem Propagandaminister Josef Goebbels unterstellt wurde, schwanden die Befugnisse des Reichsintendanten immer mehr, bis er den Rundfunk schließlich nur noch verwalten durfte.

Diese Entmachtung hatte Glasmeier dadurch kompensiert, daß er sich eine Idee Adolf Hitlers zu Nutze machte und diese mit großer Zielstrebigkeit verfolgte : den Ausbau der Stadt Linz zu einem Europäischen Kunst- und Kulturzentrum und speziell den Aufbau einer Bruckner-Weihestätte im Stift Sankt Florian, Bayreuth vergleichbar.

Produktionsstätte des « großdeutschen und europäischen Rundfunks »

(Foto : Archiv des Augustiner Chorherrenstiftes Sankt Florian) Reichsrundfunk-Intendant Doktor Heinrich Glasmeier pflegte prominente Gäste am Stiftsportal mit einem Glasbecher Wein zu begrüßen. Der Vertreter Benito Mussolinis, Dino Alfieri besuchte das Stift am 3. Juli 1943.

Kernstück dieser Pläne war es, in Sankt Florian ein Bruckner-Orchester und einen Bruckner-Chor zu installieren, die zu Adolf Hitlers 55. Geburtstag am 20. April 1944 erstmals öffentlich auftreten sollten.

Da sich Hitler bis zuletzt, trotz oder gerade wegen des aussichtslos gewordenen Krieges immer wieder in dieses Projekt flüchtete, konnte sich Glasmeier der Rückendeckung von allerhöchster Stelle sicher sein.

Obwohl die Pläne, Linz in nationalsozialistischer Manier umzubauen, wegen der angespannten wirtschaftlichen Lage in der ersten Hälfte der vierziger Jahre nicht in Angriff genommen werden konnten, konnte der Aufbau von Bruckner-Orchester und Bruckner-Chor jedoch trotz einiger Abstriche an der Stärke des Chores vollendet werden.

(Foto : Archiv des Augustiner Chorherrenstiftes Sankt Florian) Heinrich Glasmeiers Entwurf zu seinem Wappen als Reichsrundfunk-Intendant.

Heinrich Glasmeier residierte in Sankt Florian wie ein Abt, was an seiner Kleidung und speziellen Ritualen zu erkennen war. So verpflichtete er beispielsweise die Mitglieder von Bruckner-Chor und -Orchester feierlich am Sarge Bruckners.

Im Hoheitszeichen des von den Nazis säkularisierten Bruckner Stiftes offenbart sich die frevelhafte NS-Selbstherrlichkeit, die zum Wappen des Stiftes Sankt Florian ebenbürtig das Hauswappen Glasmeiers stellt, noch dazu in eine Reihe mit dem Hakenkreuz unter dem Schirm des Reichsadlers.

Sich über das Gehabe des Reichsintendanten lustig machend, nannten ihn die Chormitglieder in Verballhornung seines Namens Scherbelheinrich.

Von den Rundfunkchören zum Bruckner-Chor

Eine Zusammenstellung der wichtigsten Ereignisse von der Auflösung der Rundfunkchöre bis zum ersten Zusammentreffen des Bruckner-Chores ist sehr interessant und aufschlussreich :

15. September 1942 : Auflösung aller deutschen Rundfunkchöre durch Glasmeier.

9. September 1942 : Brief Glasmeiers an den Linzer Oberbürgermeister :

« Ich habe mit Wirkung vom 15. September alle Chöre des Rundfunks aufgelöst und bilde zur Zeit aus den besten und frischesten Kräften den neuen Bruckner-Chor von etwa 48 Stimmen. Nach Möglichkeit möchte ich diesen Chor zum 1. April 1943 nach Linz verlegen, damit er dort sowohl selbständig als auch als Grundstock eines von Linzer Einwohnern zu bildenden Chores von rund 200 Stimmen wirken kann. »

25. November 1942 : Sendeleiter Wirz berichtet, daß Günther Ramín unter einigen Bedingungen die Leitung des Bruckner-Chores zugesagt hat.

17. und 21. Dezember 1942 : Vorsingen für den Bruckner-Chor in Ramíns Leipziger Privatwohnung.

31. Dezember 1942 : Vertragsende für die Sänger der Rundfunkchöre.

11.-14. Januar 1943 : Weitere Vorsingen bei Ramín in Leipzig.

27. Januar 1943 : Wirz vermeldet, daß die Aufstellung des Bruckner-Chores « soweit vollendet » sei.

22. Februar 1943 : Erste vom Reichsrundfunk genehmigte Personalliste des Bruckner-Chores.

22. Februar 1943 : Einstellungsschreiben an die ausgewählten Chormitglieder.

2. März 1943 : Erste Zusammenkunft des Bruckner-Chores in Leipzig.

Auffallend sind an dieser Aufstellung zum einen die eminent kurze Zeitspanne von zwei Monaten, die zwischen dem juristischen Ende der Rundfunkchöre und dem Arbeitsbeginn des Bruckner-Chores lag und zum anderen deren unmittelbare zeitliche Abfolge.

Glasmeier spricht in seinem oben zitierten Brief in einem Satz von beiden Vorgängen.

Für die Leitung des Bruckner-Chores konnte Thomaskantor Günther Ramín gewonnen werden, der wohl als der kompetenteste Chorfachmann seiner Generation galt.

Ramín wollte selbstverständlich (und dieses war seine Hauptbedingung für die Annahme der Chorleiterposition beim Bruckner-Chor gewesen) Thomaskantor bleiben.

Kanonen oder Singen ? - Aufbauphase in Leipzig

(Foto : Archiv des Augustiner Chorherrenstiftes Sankt Florian) Im Auftrag des Reichsrundfunk-Intendanten Glasmeier vom Notewart des in Auflösung befindlichen Reichssender Leipzig aufgestellte Inventarliste, die später dem Abtransport des gesamten Aufführungsmaterials nach Sankt Florian diente.

In dieser Situation gab es nur die eine Lösung, den Bruckner-Chor in Leipzig aufzubauen und ihn erst später nach Linz zu verlegen.

Die Rundfunkmitarbeiter-Zeitung « Das leere Haus » berichtete ausführlich und wohlwollend über den Probenstart des Chores in Leipzig. Das letzte Häuflein der in Leipzig verbliebenen Rundfunkmitarbeiter war froh darüber, daß wieder Leben im Funkhaus am Markt eingezogen war.

Die Leipziger Öffentlichkeit und die Presse beäugten den neuen Chor dagegen eher argwöhnisch. Was sollte in Zeiten des totalen Krieges eine Chorneugründung, zumal in Leipzig erst kurz zuvor der Riedel-Verein und der Lehrergesangverein eingegangen waren und Leipzig nicht gerade als eine Hochburg der Brucknerpflege bezeichnet werden konnte ! Es gab sogar Anzeigen von Leipziger Bürgern beim Arbeitsamt gegen die Aufstellung des Bruckner-Chores, in deren Folge der Leiter dieser Behörde erst nach Vorlegen schriftlicher Unterlagen von höchster Stelle den Chor weiterarbeiten ließ.

Der Linzer Brucknerforscher Hanns Kreczi zitiert nach Unterlagen des Stiftsarchivs Sankt Florian Arbeitsamtsleiter Handrik mit den Worten :

« Was ist heute wichtig : Kanonen oder Singen ? »

Infolge dieser Vorgänge und auf Grund von Anfragen aus der Bevölkerung wurde die Presse beauftragt, nur noch über die künstlerische Arbeit des Bruckner-Chores zu berichten.

Über das Woher und das Wohin des Ensembles wurde folgender Wortlaut für die Presse freigegeben :

« Der Rundfunk hat seine Chöre an den Reichssendern aufgelöst. Aus diesen Chören ist durch Auswahl ein Spitzenchor zusammengestellt und diesem der Name “ Bruckner-Chor ” gegeben worden.

Es handelt sich hier also um keine Neugründung, sondern nur um eine neue Zielsetzung der Chorarbeit des Rundfunks. Der Reichsintendant hat zur Schulung dieses Chores Professor Ramín berufen. Mit Rücksicht auf das Thomas-Kantorat und die anderen Aufgaben Ramíns ist der Chor in Leipzig zusammengetreten und wird der Öffentlichkeit Proben seiner Arbeit abgeben. »

Mit diesen Sätzen gibt Sendeleiter Wirz, der von Glasmeier mit der praktischen Durchführung der Chorbildung beauftragt worden war, indirekt den Zusammenhang zwischen der Auflösung der Rundfunkchöre und der Schaffung des Bruckner-Chores zu.

Ein Fernschreiben von Glasmeiers Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft an alle Reichssender, aus deren Chören Mitglieder in den Reichs-Bruckner-Chor engagiert worden waren, belegt eindeutig, daß die Sängerinnen und Sänger des auch verwaltungstechnisch als « abgeordnet » galten, daß ihr Arbeitsverhältnis also nicht als beendet angesehen worden war, daß somit der Reichs-Bruckner-Chor als unmittelbarer Nachfolger der Rundfunkchöre angesehen werden muß und daß die Chöre des Rundfunks nur zu dem Zweck aufgelöst worden waren, den Bruckner-Chor möglichst schnell mit möglichst geeigneten Kräften besetzen zu können.

Die Leipziger « Fraktion » im Bruckner-Chor

Von den Mitgliedern des Chores des Reichssenders Leipzig war etwa die Hälfte in den Reichs-Bruckner-Chor engagiert worden :

Sopran	Alt	Tenor	Bass
Eva Anschütz	Waltraute Groch-Männel	Walter Kretschmar	Erhard Neukirch
Käthe Jena	Leonore Eichhorn	Erich Purfürst
Ursula Thate	Emmy Daehne	Albert Schwarzburger

Inge Kahle Charlotte Hein
 Marie Kaete Herre
 Dorothea Schröder
 Mary Trautner

Später schieden zwar Mary Trautner und Waltraute Groch-Männel aus dem Bruckner-Chor wieder aus (Albert Schwarzburger war hinzugekommen) , doch sind die Leipziger Rundfunkchormitglieder mit 14 Sängerinnen und Sängern die bei weitem stärkste « Fraktion » darin gewesen, gefolgt von Stuttgart und Frankfurt (je 9) und München (8 Mitglieder) .

Die Ursache für den hohen Anteil von Leipziger Rundfunkchorsängerinnen und -sängern in diesem Ensemble ist nicht schwer zu erkennen. Zum einen war der Leipziger Chor mit seinen etwa 30 Mitgliedern kein kleiner Chor, und zum anderen mag es für die Leipziger natürlich besonders anziehend gewesen sein, zunächst in ihrer Heimatstadt und in ihrem Sender ihren gewohnten Beruf ausüben zu können. Weil es nicht gelungen war, alle Stimmen mit ehemaligen Rundfunkchor-Mitgliedern zu besetzen, hatte Ramín auch freie Sängerinnen, für deren Qualitäten er sich verbürgte, für den Bruckner-Chor empfohlen. Zu diesem Kreis gehörte auch Irmgard Røehling.

Irmgard Genzel-Røehling hatte im Programm von MIRAG und Reichssender Leipzig häufig solistisch gesungen, auch in der Reihe der Bach-Kantaten-Übertragungen aus der Thomaskirche. Daher mußte Ramín sie kennen. Nach der Neugründung des Rundfunkchores gehörte Irmgard Genzel-Røehling zum Aushilfskreis des Rundfunkchores Leipzig.

Konzerte in Leipzig - Ramín Reichs-Bruckner Chor

(Foto : Sammlung Lieberwirth) In der Leipziger Thomaskirche singt der Bruckner-Chor am 23. Februar 1944 sein letztes Konzert. Es ist auch das letzte unter der Leitung von Günter Ramín.

Der Bruckner-Chor bestritt in Leipzig vier Konzerte unter Leitung von Ramín.

Im ersten Konzert am 10. Juni 1943 erklangen unter Mitwirkung des Gewandhausorchesters der « Psalm 150 » (für gemischten Chor, Sopran-Solo und Orchester) und die Große Messe in F-Moll, beide Werke von Anton Bruckner.

Das Programm des zweiten Konzertes am 6. November 1943 verzeichnet vier Graduale und das « Ave Maria » von Anton Bruckner, vier italienische Madrigale von Carlo Gesualdo, fünf Gesänge aus dem Zyklus « Das Jahr » von Ernst Pepping sowie Volkslieder für gemischten Chor.

Das dritte Konzert (2. Dezember 1943) , wieder gemeinsam mit dem Gewandhausorchester, enthielt das « Requiem in bello » von Hermann Simon, den Hymnus « Fons salutaris » von Hans Pfitzner und den « 100. Psalm » von Max Reger.

Das letzte Konzert des Bruckner-Chores in Leipzig fand am 23. Februar 1944 in der Thomaskirche mit dem « Requiem » von Giuseppe Verdi statt.

Ursprünglich sollte das Konzert im Gewandhaus durchgeführt werden, was jedoch durch die Zerstörung des Hauses im Bombenangriff vom 20. Februar 1944 nicht mehr möglich war.

Das Thomaskirchen-Konzert war gleichzeitig Ramíns Abschiedskonzert vom Chor.

Weil der Thomanerchor aus Sicherheitsgründen Leipzig verlassen hatte und in Grimma weiterarbeitete, wurde dadurch die Leitung des Bruckner-Chores für Ramín immer schwieriger. Diese Situation hätte sich bei der unausweichlichen Übersiedlung des Chores nach Linz um ein Vielfaches verschärft. Deshalb verlängerte Ramín seinen am 31. März 1944 auslaufenden Vertrag nicht.

Weiterarbeit in Linz

Wegen zunehmender Bombenangriffe wurde es auch für den Bruckner-Chor in Leipzig zu gefährlich, und so drängte man auf eine baldige Verlegung des Chores nach Linz, wo er am 30. April 1944 eingeführt wurde.

Zunächst ging die Arbeit unter Leitung von Johannes Rietz, der schon erfolgreich Ramón assistiert hatte, weiter. Im Mai 1944 war es dann gelungen, den Kirchenmusiker Professor Doktor Michael Schneider, einen der besten Organisten Deutschlands, nach Linz zu holen. Dieses geschah auch im Hinblick auf die Bruckner-Orgel in der Stiftskirche Sankt Florian.

Schneider war gerade als Soldat bei der Flak in Berlin eingesetzt. Der Reichsintendant konnte erreichen, daß er nach Linz zur Flak versetzt wurde, wo er dann in seiner Freizeit (sic !) mit dem Bruckner-Chor arbeiten konnte.

Die Monate von Mai 1944 bis zum Ende des Krieges waren für Professor Schneider, die Chormitglieder und für Johannes Rietz, der auch Assistent des neuen Chorleiters blieb, eine sehr schwere Zeit.

Im September 1944 sollte der Chor auf Weisung des Propagandaministeriums « stillgelegt » werden, was so viel bedeutete wie die Einberufung der wehrfähigen Männer und den Einsatz in Rüstungsbetrieben für die anderen Sängerinnen und Sänger. Trotzdem probten sie in ihrer Freizeit unter Schneiders Leitung weiter.

Auch diejenigen Sänger, die in der Umgebung von Linz ihre Wehrmachtsstandorte hatten, nahmen, wenn sie es ermöglichen konnten, an den regelmäßigen Chorproben teil.

Hatte der Chor in den Wochen zwischen Schneiders Amtsantritt und der Stilllegung zahlreiche Konzerte in Linz und Sankt Florian bestritten, sang er im Herbst nur noch in Wehrmachts- und Lazarettkonzerten. Allerdings ist auch noch ein Adventskonzert im Dezember 1944 überliefert.

Mitte Januar fanden in Linz sogar noch Rundfunkaufnahmen mit Volksliedern statt, die im März und April vom Deutschlandsender ausgestrahlt wurden.

Schneider kam mit seiner Flakereinheit beim Einmarsch der Amerikaner für vier Wochen in Kriegsgefangenschaft.

Das Ende des Bruckner-Chores

Nach Professor Schneider übernahm dann der Chortenor Walter Kretschmar, aus dem Chor des Reichssenders Leipzig stammend, die Leitung des Bruckner-Chores.

Manche Chormitglieder hatten nach dem Kriegsende Linz verlassen, doch blieb ein Rest von 34 Sängerinnen und Sängern noch bis zum Herbst in Linz.

Der Bassist Fritz Westermann, der Linz am 5. September 1945 verlassen hatte, schrieb über das Ende des Bruckner-Chores in Linz rückschauend :

« Als die Deutschen aus Österreich heraus mußten, löste sich der Chor vollends auf, der Rest des Chores ging dann nach Kornthal bei Stuttgart. »

Dieser Rest des Bruckner-Chores hatte offenbar die Hoffnung, in Stuttgart als Chor eines neu zu gründenden Stuttgarter Senders als dessen Rundfunkchor übernommen zu werden. Trotz des Scheiterns dieser Pläne sang der Bruckner-Chor noch einige Jahre weiter.

Zu den neu zum Chor stoßenden Chormitgliedern gehörte 1946 auch Clytus Gottwald.

1947 übernahm Hans-Herbert Weigel, ein Sänger aus dem ehemaligen Chor des Reichssenders Leipzig, die Chorleitung. Weigel bewegte Johann Nepomuk David dazu, 1949 Leiter des Bruckner-Chores zu werden.

Zwar gehört der Bruckner-Chor nicht in die unmittelbare Ahnenreihe des MDR Rundfunkchores Leipzig, doch ist er durch das Aufbaujahr in Leipzig und die vielen Sängerinnen und Sänger, die sowohl ihm als vormals auch dem Chor des Reichssenders Leipzig und später zum Teil wieder dem Rundfunkchor Leipzig angehört hatten, eng mit der Leipziger Rundfunk-Chorgeschichte verbunden.

Michæl Schneider

L'organiste et chef de chœur allemand Michæl Schneider est né le 4 mars 1909 à Weimar et est mort le 26 novembre 1994 à Cologne.

Schneider fait des études musicales à la « Musikhochschule » de Weimar avec Bruno Hinze-Reinhold, Friedrich Martin et Richard Wetz (1927-1930) . Il travaille à Leipzig avec Karl Straube, Kurt Thomas. Il bénéficie également de l'enseignement de Marcel Dupré pendant 3 mois, en 1951.

Il est organiste d'abord à Weimar (1931-1934) , puis à l'église Saint-Matthieu à Munich (1934-1936) . Il enseigne à partir de 1936 à la « Musikhochschule » de Cologne. Il dirige le « Berliner Kantorei » (1942-1944) puis est nommé cantor à l'église Saint-Marc à Munich (1945-1951) . Il dirige le « Musikverein der Stadt Bielefeld » (1951-1959) , puis enseigne à la « Musikhochschule » de Berlin (1958-1965) et ensuite à la « Musikhochschule » de Cologne jusqu'à sa retraite en 1975, où il dirigeait le département de musique religieuse protestante et la classe d'orgue. Après 1975, on lui confia encore des activités pédagogiques.

Il a créé de nombreuses pièces de compositeurs contemporains, parmi lesquels Johann Nepomuk David, Karl Höller, Max Baumann, Hermann Schröder ou Frank Michael Beyer.

Parmi ses élèves, on compte Jürg Baur, Paul Damjakob, Egidius Doll, Hans Eugen Frischknecht, Johannes Geffert, Klaus Germann, Rudolf Innig, Wolfgang Karius, Klaus Dieter Kern, Jon Laukvik, Heinz Lohmann, Stefan Palm, Roland Pløeger, Andreas Rothkopf, Almut Rössler, Hartmut Schmidt et Gerd Zacher.

Michæl Schneider, deutscher Organist, Chorleiter, Musikpädagog und Musikwissenschaftler : geboren 4. März 1909 in Weimar ; gestorben 26. November 1994 in Köln.

Schneider studierte von 1927 bis 1930 an der Musikhochschule Weimar bei Bruno Hinze-Reinhold Klavier, bei Friedrich Martin Orgel und bei Richard Wetz Komposition. Anschließend ging er für ein Jahr an das kirchenmusikalische Institut in Leipzig, wo Karl Straube (Orgel) , Kurt Thomas (Chorleitung) und Robert Teichmüller (Klavier) seine Lehrer waren.

Nach Abschluß seines Studiums wurde er zum Organisten an der Stadtkirche St. Peter und Paul (Herderkirche) in seiner Heimatstadt berufen und unterrichtete zugleich an der dortigen Musikhochschule. 1934 wurde er Hauptorganist und Kantor an der Matthäuskirche in München sowie 1935 Lehrer an der Staatlichen Akademie der Tonkunst.

1936 bis 1941 war Schneider Professor für Orgel und Leiter der Abteilung für evangelische Kirchenmusik an der Musikhochschule Köln und übernahm gleichzeitig die künstlerische Leitung des Kölner Bach-Vereins. An der Universität Köln promovierte er 1940 über Die Orgelspieltechnik des frühen 19. Jahrhunderts in Deutschland, dargestellt an den Orgelschulen der Zeit (erschieden Regensburg 1941, 1964, 1973) und schloß damit sein musikwissenschaftliches Studium, das er in Jena (Werner Danckert) und München (Rudolf von Ficker) begonnen hatte, ab. Während des Krieges leitete er von 1942 bis 1944 die Berliner Kantorei (Singgemeinschaft Rudolf Lamy) , 1944-1945 den Bruckner-Chor in Linz. 1945 ging er zurück nach München und wurde Organist und Kantor an der Markuskirche (1949 Kirchenmusikdirektor) ; ab 1948 unterrichtete er wieder an der Münchener Musikhochschule.

1951 war er drei Monate bei Marcel Dupré in Paris und folgte im gleichen Jahr einem Ruf an die Musikhochschule Detmold, wo er wiederum Professor für Orgel und Leiter der Abteilung für evangelische Kirchenmusik wurde und dort 1953-1957 die Position des stellvertretenden Direktors bekleidete. Parallel dirigierte er von 1951 bis 1959 den Bielefelder Musikverein.

Ab 1958 lehrte er an der Berliner Musikhochschule und leitete von 1961 bis 1965 zugleich die Studentenkantorei der Technischen und der Freien Universität. Außerdem war er Organist an der Kirche zum Heilsbrunnen. 1965 wechselte er nochmals an die Musikhochschule Köln und wurde hier erneut Leiter der Abteilung für evangelische Kirchenmusik, Orgelprofessor und zugleich Organist des Gürzenich-Orchesters. Nach seiner Emeritierung 1975 nahm er in Köln weiterhin einen Lehrauftrag wahr. Darüber hinaus setzte er seine umfangreiche Konzert- und freie Lehrtätigkeit im In- und Ausland fort, unter anderem auch als Gastprofessor an mehreren amerikanischen Universitäten.

Durch Karl Straube direkt mit der Reger-Tradition verbunden, versuchte er in seiner Spiel- und Unterrichtspraxis die Prinzipien der Leipziger Schule Straubes mit denen der Pariser Schule Duprés zu vereinigen. Dabei stand er neuen musikwissenschaftlichen Erkenntnissen und daraus resultierenden Entwicklungen für das Orgelspiel stets offen gegenüber. Er gilt als einer der wichtigsten Vertreter der deutschen neoklassizistischen Orgelschule. Werke von Johann Nepomuk David, Karl Höller, Max Baumann, Hermann Schröder (Orgelkonzert, Opus 25) und Frank Michael Beyer verdanken ihm ihre Uraufführung. Seit den 1950er Jahren machte er auch zahlreiche Rundfunk- und Schallplattenaufnahmen, unter anderem mit Musik von Scheidt, Buxtehude, Pachelbel, Bach und Schröder.

Michael Schneider prägte als Lehrer an fünf bedeutenden Musikhochschulen über Jahrzehnte die Organistenausbildung. Zu seinen Schülern gehörten Jürg Baur, Paul Damjakob, Egidius Doll, Hans Eugen Frischknecht, Johannes Geffert, Klaus Germann, Rudolf Innig, Klaus Dieter Kern, Jon Laukvik, Heinz Lohmann, Stefan Palm, Roland Pløger, Andreas Rothkopf, Almut Rößler, Hartmut Schmidt, Ernst Triebel und Gerd Zacher.

Michael Schneider - Chorleiter des Reichs-Bruckner-Chores und Organist

Der Kirchenmusiker, Dirigent, Hochschullehrer und Musikwissenschaftler Professor Doktor Michael Schneider war 1944-1945 Leiter des Reichs-Bruckner-Chores in Linz. Dadurch ist er indirekt auch mit der Geschichte des Leipziger Rundfunkchores verbunden.

Schneider wurde am 4. März 1909 in Weimar geboren und studierte an der Musikhochschule seiner Heimatstadt die Fächer Klavier, Orgel und Komposition. Am kirchenmusikalischen Institut der Leipziger Musikhochschule vervollkommnete er seine Studien bei Karl Straube (Orgel), Kurt Thomas (Chorleitung) und Robert Teichmüller (Klavier). Danach war er als Organist und Kantor an verschiedenen evangelischen Kirchen in Weimar und München tätig und wirkte an den Hochschulen dieser Städte als Lehrer.

Von 1936 bis 1941 leitete Schneider die Abteilung für evangelische Kirchenmusik an der Kölner Musikhochschule, unterrichtete als Professor das Fach Orgel und leitete den Kölner Bach-Verein. In Köln promovierte er 1940 über « Die Orgelspieltechnik des frühen 19. Jahrhunderts in Deutschland, dargestellt an den Orgelschulen der Zeit ».

Weil Günther Ramín 1944 die Leitung des Reichs-Bruckner-Chores nach dessen Übersiedlung in das österreichische Linz nicht mehr mit dem Thomaskantorat vereinbaren konnte, war der Rundfunk bestrebt, Michael Schneider für diese Aufgabe zu gewinnen.

Schneider galt als einer der besten Organisten seiner Zeit, und so hoffte man, in ihm sowohl einen Leiter des Bruckner-Chores als auch einen Organisten für die Bruckner-Orgel in der Stiftskirche Sankt Florian bei Linz gewinnen zu können. Allerdings war Professor Schneider zu einer Flak-Einheit nach Berlin zum Kriegsdienst eingezogen worden. Rundfunk-Reichsintendant Glasmeier konnte jedoch erwirken, daß man Schneider zu einer entsprechenden Einheit nach Linz versetzte.

So war es Schneider möglich, in seiner Freizeit mit dem Bruckner-Chor arbeiten und an der Bruckner-Orgel wirken zu können.

Im Gegensatz zum 2. Chorleiter Johannes Rietz war der neue Chorchef Schneider also nicht fest, sondern auf Honorarbasis beim Rundfunk angestellt.

Als Leiter des Reichs-Bruckner-Chores wurde Professor Schneider am 13. Mai 1944 offiziell eingeführt.

Obwohl seine Stellung als Leiter des Chores kriegsbedingt nicht lange währte, hat Professor Schneider zahlreiche Konzerte mit dem Chor gegeben. Selbst nach der Stilllegung des Ensembles arbeiteten die in Linz und Umgebung verbliebenen Chormitglieder unter Schneiders Leitung weiter.

Insgesamt verzeichnet die Chronik des Reichs-Bruckner-Chores 13 Konzerte unter der Leitung von Professor Schneider. Verschiedentlich sangen Chormitglieder in Schneiders Orgelkonzerten oder von ihm geleiteten Kammerkonzerten als Solisten mit. Am 13. und 14. Januar 1945 fanden in Linz Aufnahmen von Volksliedern mit dem Bruckner-Chor unter Leitung von Prof. Schneider statt. Die Bänder sind nicht erhalten geblieben.

Nach dem Kriegsende siedelte Michael Schneider nach München über, wo er als Kantor tätig war und 1949 zum Kirchenmusikdirektor ernannt wurde.

Auch seine Lehrtätigkeit nahm er bald wieder auf und wirkte an den Musikhochschulen in München, Detmold, Berlin und wieder in Köln.

Michael Schneider starb am 26. November 1994 in Köln.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum

The German conductor Georg-Ludwig Jochum was born on 10 December 1909 in Babenhausen near Augsburg, Germany, and died on 1 November 1970 Mülheim an der Ruhr, North Rhine-Westphalia, Germany.

He was the son of a Catholic teacher, organist, choir Master and conductor of orchestral and theatre club, and the younger brother of the composer Otto Jochum and the better-known conductor Eugen Jochum. Like his brother Eugen, he is especially associated with the music of Anton Bruckner. Georg-Ludwig studied at the « Leopold-Mozart-Konservatorium » in Augsburg and in Munich at the « Staatlichen Akademie der Tonkunst » with Joseph Pembaur, Siegmund von Hausegger and Joseph Haas.

After his studies, already in 1932, Georg-Ludwig Jochum was appointed at the age of 23 General Music Director of the City of Münster where he performed at the « Städtischen-Lortzing-Theater » and directed the « Sinfonieorchester Münster ». This made him the youngest orchestral conductor in Germany. In 1934, he became assistant conductor in Frankfurt-am-Main, where he conducted the Opera and the Museum concerts. In 1937, he became Municipal Music Director of Plauen and Music Director of the « Stadttheaters Plauen ». On May 1, 1937, he became at his request a member of the NSDAP (« Mitgliedsnummer » : 5.794.680) , but removed again in January 1941 for failure to post-payments.

From 1940 to 1945, Georg-Ludwig Jochum was General Music Director in Linz and Opera conductor at the « Stadttheater ». He headed the « Städtischen Symphonieorchester », which he reshaped in 1943 on Adolf Hitler's order to « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » of the « Großdeutschen Rundfunks » and with whom he made his debut in April 1944 with a concert on Hitler's birthday. With this Orchestra, he created then the « Bruckner-Feste » in Saint-Florian.

After World War II, in the short term « black lists » of the occupying powers, Georg-Ludwig Jochum was, in 1946, General Music Director for lifetime of the « Duisburger Sinfoniker », with whom he performed and formed a brilliant and high-profile ensemble in the « Mercatorhalle » until his retirement, in 1968. At « Theater Duisburg », he performed with the « Deutsche Oper am Rhein » and was, until 1958, Director of the Duisburg Conservatory.

In 1948-1950, Georg-Ludwig Jochum also conducted the « Bamberger Symphoniker » ; and, in the early 1950's, he conducted the « RIAS-Symphonie-Orchester Berlin » ; guest appearances have taken him throughout Europe, Japan and South America.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum (10 December 1909 - 1 November 1970) was a German conductor and younger brother of better-known conductor Eugen Jochum. He was born in Babenhausen, near Augsburg, Germany. After studies in Munich, in 1932, he was appointed General Music Director of the city of Münster. This made him the youngest orchestral chief in Germany. Like his brother, he is especially associated with the music of Anton Bruckner. He died in Mülheim, Germany.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum was the younger brother of conductor Eugen Jochum. In 1932, upon completing his studies in Munich, Georg-Ludwig Jochum was appointed Music Director of the city of Münster, thus, becoming the youngest professional conductor in Germany.

In 1934, he became principal conductor in Frankfurt, leading the Orchestra in Opera performances. In 1937, he became music director of the Municipal Theatre, in Plauen. Also, in 1937, he joined the Nazi Party. It is said that, in 1941, his membership lapsed due to failure to post payments.

However, from 1940 to 1945, he was general music director in Linz, Austria, and Opera conductor at the Linz Municipal Theatre as well as conductor of the Municipal Symphony Orchestra, which was renamed and broadcast over German Radio, debuting in April 1944, on a concert for Hitler's birthday. With this Orchestra, he later created the Bruckner Festival, in Saint-Florian.

Due to his membership in the Nazi Party, he was blacklisted by the occupying Allied powers after the War but this was soon lifted and, by 1946, he became life time music director of the Duisburg Symphony Orchestra.

As with his brother Eugen Jochum, Georg-Ludwig Jochum was a noted interpreter of the Symphonic scores of Anton Bruckner but also conducted and recorded works by Mozart, Chopin, Schubert and others. Unlike his brother, who continued to conduct banned works in the 1930's and was apparently not a Party member, his earlier affiliation with the Nazis likely contributed to his post-War obscurity in recordings.

Conductor Georg-Ludwig Jochum was Eugen Jochum's younger brother who pre-deceased Eugen by several years and early enough to have most of his excellent Bruckner performances recorded in monaural, thus, relegating them to the historical dust bin. Fortunately, there are a few stereo recordings (a Bruckner 7th and the F major discarded Trio to the Bruckner Symphony No. 9) but those Hessian Radio recordings have never been released.

During World War II, Georg-Ludwig was in charge of one of Adolf Hitler's pet projects. As part of his grand scheme to make Linz and Saint-Florian a Brucknerian cultural center, Hitler formed the « Reichs Bruckner Orchester » and Georg-Ludwig Jochum became the « General Musik Direktor » . The Orchestra was a 1st class ensemble and, for a while, Herbert von Karajan attempted to become the « Direktor » . A scheme was planned that would have transferred Georg-Ludwig Jochum to the « Wehrmacht » and the War front, but Furtwängler uncovered the plan and intervened to prevent it.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum (geboren 10. Dezember 1909 in Babenhausen ; gestorben 1. November 1970 in Mülheim an der Ruhr ; manchmal auch Georg-Ludwig Jochum geschrieben) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Bruder von Otto und des bekannteren Eugen, mit dem er seine Verbundenheit zur Musik Anton Bruckners teilte.

Der Sohn eines katholischen Lehrers, Organisten, Chorregenten und Leiters des Orchester- und Theatervereins studierte am Augsburger Leopold-Mozart-Konservatorium und in München an der Staatlichen Akademie der Tonkunst bei Joseph Pembaur, Siegmund von Hausegger und Joseph Haas. Schon 1932, mit 23 Jahren, wurde er zum Musikdirektor der Stadt Münster ernannt und trat dort im Städtischen-Lortzing-Theater auf und leitete das Sinfonieorchester Münster. 1934 wechselte er als Erster Kapellmeister nach Frankfurt am Main, wo er in der Oper und die Museumkonzerte dirigierte. 1937 wurde er Städtischer Musikdirektor von Plauen und musikalischer Oberleiter des Stadttheaters Plauen. Am 1. Mai 1937 wurde er auf seinen Antrag in die NSDAP aufgenommen (Mitgliedsnummer : 5.794.680) , im Januar 1941 aber wegen unterlassener Beitragszahlungen wieder gestrichen.

Von 1940 bis 1945 war er Generalmusikdirektor in Linz und Operndirigent am Stadttheater. Er leitete das Städtischen Symphonieorchester, das er ab 1943 in Hitlers Auftrag zum « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » des Großdeutschen Rundfunks umformte und mit dem er im April 1944 anlässlich eines Konzertes zu Hitlers Geburtstag debütierte. Mit diesem Orchester gestaltete er dann auch die Bruckner-Feste in Sankt Florian.

Nach dem Krieg kurzfristig auf den « Schwarzen Listen » der Besatzungsmächte, wurde er 1946 auf Lebenszeit Generalmusikdirektor der Duisburger Sinfoniker, mit denen er in der Mercatorhalle bis zu seinem Übertritt in den Ruhestand 1968 konzertierte und die er zu einem brillanten und profilstarken Klangkörper formte. Am Theater Duisburg trat er mit der Deutschen Oper am Rhein auf und war bis 1958 Leiter des Duisburger Konservatoriums. 1948-1950 dirigierte er daneben die Bamberger Symphoniker, Anfang der 1950er Jahre leitete er auch das RIAS-Symphonie-Orchester in Berlin ; Gastauftritte führten ihn durch Europa, nach Japan und Südamerika.

Recordings

Sinfonie Nr. 1 in C-Moll (Linz Fassung) RIAS Orchester Berlin, live in Berlin 3. - 4. Februar 1956. CD : Tahra CD 162.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's recording of the Symphony No. 1 was produced in February of 1956 by the « RIAS » (Radio in the American Sector) Orchestra Berlin and it has been released on several labels. Some identify (and the Deutschland Radio Archiv « Concur ») that the conductor is Georg-Ludwig Jochum. Others have identified the conductor as Harold Byrns. (Either way, it is a great performance.)

So, by chance, who is Harold Byrns ? Harold Byrns (1903-1977) was a German-American conductor and arranger. He split his career between Germany and Los Angeles. Byrns was devoted to the music of Gustav Mahler and was friends with Mahler's widow Alma. It was he who brought Deryck Cooke's completion of the Mahler 10th to Alma and persuaded her to listen to the « BBC » recording that she had permitted to be made. After hearing the recording, she immediately lifted her ban on further performances. For his efforts, Byrns received the Mahler medal from the Bruckner Society of America.

All that being said, we are quite sure that the recording of the 1st Symphony is by G-L Jochum.

Sinfonie Nr. 2 in C-Moll (Haas Fassung) Reichs-Bruckner Orchester Linz, live in Wien 5. - 7. September 1944, LP : Urania 5243-2 ; CD : Tahra CD 163.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's recording of the Symphony No. 2 (in the Haas Edition) was produced by the Reichs Radio in Vienna on September 5-7, 1944. It was released after the war on a Urania LP (UR-402) . Later, the same recording was released by Urania in a pseudo-stereo pressing (US-5243) .

Sinfonie Nr. 3 in D-Moll (1890 Fassung) Orchester Radio Stuttgart, live 19. November 1964. CD : Tahra CD 164.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's recording of the Symphony No. 3 was produced by the South German Radio in Stuttgart on November 19, 1964. It employs the 1890 Cyrill Hynais Edition.

Sinfonie Nr. 5 in B-Dur (Haas Fassung) Bruckner Orchester Linz, live in Wien 25. Mai 1944. CD : Tahra CD 166.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's performance of the Symphony No. 5 was produced by the Reichs Bruckner Orchestra on May 25, 1944, just one month before his recording of the Symphony No. 6.

Sinfonie Nr. 6 in A-Dur (Haas Fassung) Bruckner Orchester Linz, live (?) 26. Juni 1944. LP : Urania LP URLP 7041 ; 2 CD : « Dante » , « LYS » 476/77 (France) .

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's recording of the Symphony No. 6 was produced by the Reichs Radio in Vienna on June 26, 1944. It was released after the war on a Urania LP (URLP-7041) .

Georg-Ludwig Jochum did make some stereo Bruckner recordings for the Hessian Radio but they have never been commercially released. These include a Symphony No. 7 and the discarded Trio in F major to the Symphony No. 9.

Sinfonie Nr. 9 in D-Moll (Nowak Fassung) RIAS Orchester Berlin, live in Berlin 9. Marz 1954. CD : Tahra CD 170.

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's recording of the Symphony No. 9 was produced on March 9, 1954 by the RIAS (Radio in the American Sector) Orchestra Berlin. It has been released commercially many years ago.

I hope that you have come to appreciate the artistry of this man who is forgotten today primarily because he died just prior to the full-fledged use of stereo recordings. (John F. Berky)

...

For someone who can't stop collecting recordings of Bruckner's Symphonies, a website like

<http://www.abruckner.com/downloads/downloadofthemonth/>

is a real treasure trove : mostly obscure, sometimes very rare recordings which are either public domain or failed to make the transition from LP to CD, available as free downloads/streams in good 320kbps.

The most recent additions are among the most interesting : recordings of Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5 and 6 by Georg-Ludwig Jochum (the lesser known Jochum brother) , which have a Fürtwängler-like intensity. The 2nd, 5th and 6th are played (in 1944) by the « Reichs-Bruckner Orchester Linz » , Adolf Hitler's elite ensemble, which was a 1st class ensemble, and the recordings (in acceptable monophonic sound) reflect that. His 2nd was the 1st recording ever of that Symphony. The 5th and 6th are absolutely wonderful, among the best I know. The 3rd is a much later recording (1964) in rather bad sound, which makes one regret Jochum post-War career wasn't documented in good stereo sound.

It's said that Georg-Ludwig Jochum made around 90 recordings with the « Reichs » Orchestra. Makes one wonder how much of that material is still collecting dust in some Russian archive - or how much has been used by the Soviets for target practice ?

Le « Gauleiter » (représentant du district du « Reich ») August Eigruber écrivit le 22 février 1944, à propos du mandat de l'Orchestre :

Parmi les chefs d'orchestre invités, citons : Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Clemens Krauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Karl Böhm, Oswald Kabasta, Carl Schuricht, Joseph Keilberth et ... Herbert von Karajan.

Juillet 1944 : Le jeune Herbert von Karajan interprétera à la tête du « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » de Linz la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner qu'il venait justement d'enregistrer avec la « Stadtkapelle » de Berlin pour la Radio berlinoise. Certes, déjà célèbre mais sans poste officiel, Karajan fera des démarches pour remplacer Georg-Ludwig Jochum. Le musicologue Robert Haas considérait Karajan comme le meilleur interprète du Maître de Saint-Florian mais Josef Gæbbels mettra un frein aux espoirs du « jeune loup » .

Le projet de former un autre « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » à Bad Pyrmont, en Allemagne, va échouer.

Dans l'Autriche d'après-guerre, le « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » sera dissout par le haut-commissariat des troupes d'occupation américaines.

L'année 1945 marque le début de la reconstruction des institutions culturelles rattachées à la musique et au théâtre lyrique. Résistance et opposition se manifesteront devant ce projet. Le « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » de Linz changera de nom. L'Orchestre symphonique municipal devra mettre fin à ces activités sur ordre de la puissance occupante américaine. Le bail du Théâtre lyrique sera résilié. Il y aura réduction du nombre de concerts Symphoniques à cause d'un manque d'effectifs. Dans les circonstances, le jeune chef d'orchestre Ludwig Daxspurger (1930-1982) prendra la relève. La disponibilité de salles plus petites va au moins permettre la mise sur pied, avec la participation de l'Office culturel de la ville, de plusieurs concerts mettant en vedette des solistes locaux et étrangers et des ensembles de musique de chambre. Suite au licenciement du directeur Gernot Brandtner, le Théâtre d'État sera mis en location. Dès le 16 juillet 1945, la musique d'église aura la chance de se développer et d'offrir plus de concerts en public.

Otto Jochum

Otto Jochum, deutscher Komponist, Chorleiter und Musikpädagoge : geboren 18. März 1898 in Babenhausen im Unterallgäu ; gestorben 24. Oktober 1969 in Bad Reichenhall. Er war der ältere Bruder von Eugen und Georg Ludwig Jochum.

Der Sohn eines katholischen Lehrers, Organisten, Chorregenten und Leiters des Orchester- und Theatervereins studierte nach einer Lehrerausbildung von 1922 bis 1928 wie seine Brüder am Augsburger Leopold-Mozart-Konservatorium und von 1928 bis 1931 an der Staatlichen Akademie der Tonkunst bei Joseph Haas. Daneben war er von 1921 bis 1932 Organist an der Sankt Georgskirche in Augsburg und Leiter des Singschulkollegium Augsburg (1922-1933) . 1932 wurde er Leiter der Städtischen Singschule in Augsburg, an der er 1935 das Singschullehrerseminar und den Städtischen Chor gründete. Jochum konnte die Schaffung des Augsburger Singschulseminars als der ersten und einzigen deutsche Ausbildungsstätte für Singschullehrer gegen den Widerstand des Reichsunterrichtsministeriums, aber unter Befürwortung durch die Reichsmusikkammer, durchsetzen. 1938 wurde ihm die Direktion des Augsburger Musikonservatoriums übertragen.

Am 1. Mai 1937 wurde Otto Jochum auf seinen Antrag in die NSDAP aufgenommen (Mitgliedsnummer : 5.346.623) . Bereits seit 1934 war er Leiter der Pflugschaft der Singschulen in der Reichsmusikkammer und 1937 Chorgaführer des Reichsverbandes gemischter Chöre für die Gaue München-Oberbayern, Franken, Saarpfalz und Bayerische Ostmark. Seine damals erschienenen Kompositionen sind vom Geist der Zeit geprägt :

Der jüngste Tag, Opus 28.

Vaterländische Hymne, Opus 54c.

Flamme empor, Opus 61.

Ich bin ein deutsches Mädchen, Opus 64.

4, oder Volkwerdung der Nation, Kantate zu einer deutschen Feier, das zum Heldengedenktage 1938 im Festsaal des Deutschen Museums auf Einladung der NSDAP-Gauleitung München-Oberbayern aufgeführt wurde ; Widmungsträger war der Gauleiter von Schwaben Karl Wahl.

1938 entstand Unser Lied : Deutschland ! , Opus 70, volksdeutsche Hymne nach Worten von Arthur Maximilian Miller.

Nach dem Krieg war er als Chorleiter des 1947 von ihm gegründeten « Jochum-Chores » und als städtischer Musikdirektor in Augsburg tätig und lebte seit 1951 als freischaffender Komponist in Weißbach bei Bad Reichenhall.

Er komponierte vor allem Chorwerke, darunter über 100 Motetten ; 16 Messen ; 4 Oratorien ; 2 Sinfonien (die er Gøthe und Bruckner widmete) ; ein Streichquartett sowie Liederzyklen und Kantaten, außerdem Kammermusikwerke und Symphonien ; er gab zahlreiche Volksliedbearbeitungen heraus.

Auszeichnungen

1932 : Deutscher Staatspreis für Komposition.

1958 : Goldener Ehrenring des Fuggermarktes Babenhausen.

1959 : Bundesverdienstkreuz.

1976 : Erstmalige Verleihung einer « Otto Jochum-Medaille » durch den Schwäbisch-Bayerischen Sångerbund an Persönlichkeiten, die sich um das schwäbische Chorwesen Verdienste erworben haben.

Der am 2. Juli 1895 in Mettmach als Sohn einer Lehrerfamilie geborene Kinzl war Lehrer und Volksschuldirektor, vor allem aber Musiker. Als Komponist gelang ihm das Kunststück moderne Wege zu gehen und trotzdem bereits zu Lebzeiten verstanden zu werden.

Nach dem Besuch der Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Linz begann er 1912 an der Schule des Musikvereins Linz (Vorläufer des Brucknerkonservatoriums Linz) Oboe zu studieren. Studien bei Franz Neuhofer in Gesang und dem Bruckner-Schüler Josef Gruber in Orgel vervollkommneten seine musikalische Ausbildung, die mit der Heereskapellmeisterprüfung an der Wiener Musikakademie abgeschlossen wurde. Nach dem ersten Weltkrieg und der Rückkehr aus der italienischen Gefangenschaft nahm er den Lehrerberuf wieder auf und leitete von 1925 bis 1928 eine Militärmusikkapelle.

Kinzl war Oberlehrer in Atzbach, Hirschbach und Linz, wo er jeweils auch die Orgel, den Kirchenchor und die Blasmusik betreute. Ebenso war er zeitweise als Kapellmeister, Musikreferent der Oberösterreichischen Lehrerbildungsanstalt, Musikbeauftragter der Stadt Linz, Musikalischer Programmberater des Senders Linz und später als Musikschriftsteller tätig.

Kinzl schuf Lieder, Werke für Chöre, Kammermusik und Orchester sowie Symphonien und auch eine Oper, später wandte er sich vorwiegend der Blasmusik zu. Bei Konzertbesuchern und in der Musikwelt, vor allem aber bei den Blasmusikkapellen für die er zahlreiche und originelle Kompositionen schrieb, fand Kinzl große Anerkennung und wurde für seine Verdienste auch zum Professor ernannt.

Der praktische Umgang mit Blasmusikkapellen befähigte ihn, zahlreiche Werke für Blasorchester, für die es bis dahin nur wenige Originalkompositionen gab, zu schreiben. Franz Kinzl wurde so zum Schöpfer und Anreger einer qualitativ hochwertigen und eigenständigen symphonischen Blasmusik.

Bekannt war Kinzl für seinen Humor in allen Lebenslagen, aber auch für sein politisches Engagement. Im Gegensatz zu so manchen « typischen » ÖsterreicherInnen machte er aus seiner Mitgliedschaft in der NSDAP, wegen welcher er nach der Befreiung vom Faschismus bis 1947 inhaftiert war, nie ein Geheimnis und zog Konsequenzen daraus.

Kinzl wurde 1945 Mitglied der KPÖ und gehörte von 1949 bis 1953 der Linksblock-Fraktion des Gemeinderates von Stadl-Paura an. Stets engagiert war Kinzl auch für eine fortschrittliche Kulturpolitik und mit seinen Beiträgen in der kommunistischen « Neuen Zeit ». Er erzielte zahlreiche Preise und Auszeichnungen (Anton-Bruckner-Preis des Landes Oberösterreich und andere) und erhielt 1965 den Ehrentitel « Professor ». Anfang 1970 zog sich Franz Kinzl nach Lambach (Oberösterreich) zurück, wo er am 23. April 1978 verstarb.

Aus Anlaß seines hundertsten Geburtstages wurde die von ihm geschaffene skurrile Ritteroper « Der Keuschheitsgürtel » bei den Kulturwochen im Schloß Wildberg vom 6. Juli bis 25. August 1995 aufgeführt.

Franz Kinzl war österreichischer Komponist und wurde am 2. Juli 1895 in Mettmach (Oberösterreich) geboren.

Nach dem Besuch der Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Linz begann er 1912 an der Schule des Musikvereins Linz (Vorläufer des Brucknerkonservatoriums Linz) Oboe zu studieren. Studien bei Franz Neuhofer in Gesang und dem Bruckner-Schüler Josef Gruber in Orgel vervollkommeten seine musikalische Ausbildung, die mit der Heereskapellmeisterprüfung an der Wiener Musikakademie abgeschlossen wurde. Kinzl war Oberlehrer in Atzbach, Hirschbach und Linz, wo er jeweils auch die Orgel, den Kirchenchor und die Blasmusik betreute. Ebenso war er zeitweise als Kapellmeister, Musikreferent der Oberösterreichischen Lehrerbildungsanstalt, Musikbeauftragter der Stadt Linz, Musikalischer Programmberater des Senders Linz und später als Musikschriftsteller und Musikkritiker der Zeitung « Neue Zeit » tätig.

Er erzielte zahlreiche Preise und Auszeichnungen (Anton-Bruckner-Preis des Landes Oberösterreich und andere) und erhielt 1965 den Ehrentitel « Professor » .

Anfang 1970 zog sich Franz Kinzl nach Lambach (Oberösterreich) zurück, wo er am 23. Oktober 1978 verstarb.

Josef Haas

Le compositeur et pédagogue allemand Josef Haas est né le 19 mars 1879 à Maihingen, près de Nördlingen ; et est mort le 30 mars 1960 à Munich. Il a été enterré au « Waldfriedhof » de Munich. Son œuvre traduit un Romantisme tardif.

Josef Haas était le fils du second mariage du professeur Alban Haas. Son demi-frère aîné qui portait le même nom que le père (Alban Haas) était un prêtre catholique et un historien, qui a vécu principalement à Neustadt an der Weinstraße, situé dans le diocèse de Spire. Par l'intermédiaire de ce frère, Josef Haas a ultérieurement eu des relations avec la cathédrale de Spire.

Josef Haas a d'abord été professeur, comme son père, et a travaillé de 1897 à 1904 au Collège à Lauingen sur le Danube.

Pour pouvoir approfondir son goût pour la musique, Josef Haas a fait la connaissance en 1904 de Max Reger et l'a suivi en 1907 pour étudier la musique à Leipzig. Haas a obtenu son diplôme en 1909 et, en 1911, est entré pour enseigner la composition au Conservatoire de Stuttgart, où il a été nommé professeur en 1916. De 1919 à 1921, il était directeur musical de la « Singakademie » à Glogau. Il a ensuite enseigné à l'Académie de Musique de Munich (aujourd'hui, l'Université de Musique et des Arts de Munich) entre 1924 et 1950 en tant que professeur titulaire. En 1921, il a fondé avec Paul Hindemith et Heinrich Burkard les « Donaueschinger internationalen Kammermusikfeste für Neue Musik » .

À l'époque du National-Socialisme, Haas a été exposé à certaines représailles parce qu'il tolérait publiquement la Nouvelle musique dite « dégénérée » et parce qu'il pratiquait aussi sa foi catholique. Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, il est devenu président de l'Université de Musique et des Arts de Munich (jusqu'à sa retraite en 1950) et a entamé sa reconstruction. Sa dernière œuvre a été l'hymne pour le Congrès eucharistique international de Munich, en 1960. Il est décédé alors qu'il était en train de la copier.

À Bad Aibling, on trouve depuis 1966, un « Chœur Joseph-Haas » , qui porte le nom du compositeur.

Le sens de sa musique et les intentions de son œuvre ont été formulés par le compositeur comme suit :

« La musique doit réjouir et non blesser ; elle doit émouvoir et non écraser ; elle doit faire progresser et non banaliser. »

Pour le 900e anniversaire de la consécration de la cathédrale de Spire, Josef Haas a écrit en 1930 la « Speyerer Domfest-Messe » , qu'il a dédiée à Ludwig Sebastian, l'évêque diocésain de son frère. Jusque dans les années 1950, cette Messe faisait partie du répertoire général des églises du diocèse, puis est tombée temporairement dans l'oubli. Des années plus tard, elle a retrouvé une place dans le nouveau diocèse de Spire. Elle est présente dans le livre de cantiques « Gotteslob » .

L'œuvre de Haas est entièrement basée sur la tonalité. Elle a d'abord été fortement influencée par son maître Max Reger, dont le langage musical, riche en polyphonie harmonique, caractérise aussi les œuvres de Haas. Leur style, cependant, s'attache à la compréhension plus facile de la part le public qui souvent reste étranger aux musiques contemporaines. Par conséquent, ce style possède un ton populaire, humoristique et s'attache à demeurer clair et concis. Les compositions de Haas sont des ouvrages de haute-qualité. L'essentiel de l'œuvre de Haas réside dans la musique vocale, sous forme de lieder, de musique chorale sacrée et profane. En outre, il a aussi laissé de la musique de chambre, de la musique orchestrale, de la musique pour piano et pour orgue. Comme points forts de sa production, on notera les 2 Opéras « Tobias Wunderlich » et « Die Hochzeit des Jobs » .

Durant sa vie, Haas a été un compositeur très apprécié et respecté. Pour son 75e anniversaire en 1954, de nombreuses festivités ont eu lieu dans les 2 anciens États allemands. Depuis la mort de Haas, la présence de ses compositions dans les concerts a été considérablement réduite. Pour perpétuer le souvenir du compositeur et faire vivre sa musique, l'association « Josef-Haas-Gesellschaft » a été créée en 1949 par son ami, le pédagogue Rupert Egenberger.

Haas a eu aussi une importante activité comme professeur de musique. Parmi ses nombreux étudiants, on trouve des compositeurs et des chefs d'orchestre tels que Otto Jochum (1898-1969) ; Karl Gustav Fellerer (1902-1984) ; Eugen Jochum (1902-1987) ; Heinrich Simbriger (1903-1976) ; Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1905-1963) ; Karl Höller (1907-1987) ; Philipp Mohler (1908-1982) ; Cesar Bresgen (1913-1988) ; Ernst Kutzer (1918-2008) ; Rudolf Mors (1920-1988) ; Wolfgang Sawallisch (1923-2013) ; Hans Walter Kämpfel (1924) .

The German late-Romantic composer and music teacher Josef Haas was born on 19 March 1879 in Maihingen, near Nördlingen ; and died on 30 March 1960 in Munich. He was buried in the Munich « Waldfriedhof » .

Born to teacher Alban Haas from his 2nd marriage, being half-brother to the theologian and historian Alban Haas. At an early age, he came into contact with music. He became a teacher himself and taught from 1897 to 1904 in Lauingen, near the Danube.

In his effort to pursue his musical inclination, he met Max Reger, with whom he took private lessons from 1904 in Munich. He later followed him to Leipzig in 1907 to study music at the Leipzig Conservatory. Among his teachers were Karl Straube and Adolf Ruthardt. In 1909, Haas finished his studies. In 1911, having had his 1st success as a composer and having won an Arthur Nikisch scholarship, he became teacher of composition at the Stuttgart Conservatory, where he was named professor in 1916. From 1921, he taught at the « Akademie für Tonkunst » in Munich (today, « Hochschule für Musik und Theater München ») ; he was professor there from 1924 to 1950.

In 1921, together with Paul Hindemith and Heinrich Burkard, he established the « Donaueschinger Kammermusikaufführungen zur Förderung zeitgenössischer Tonkunst » .

In 1930, he became a member of the Prussian Academy of Arts in Berlin.

During the rule of Nazism, Haas suffered some reprisals, as he openly supported the « entartete » new music and practised his Catholic beliefs. After the Second World War, he became president of the Munich « Hochschule für Musik und Theater » , a position which he held until he became « Emeritus » Professor in 1950 and led the school's reconstruction after 1945.

The work of Josef Haas was entirely based on tonality. At 1st, he was strongly influenced by his mentor Max Reger, whose language of polyphony and harmony also featured in Haas's music.

During his lifetime, Haas was a successful and well-known composer. In 1954, for his 75th birthday, numerous celebratory Festivals took place in both West and East Germany. After his death, the presence of his works in concerts has dramatically decreased.

In 1949, the composer's friend Rupert Egenberger established the « Josef-Haas-Gesellschaft », dedicated to Haas and his work.

Haas was an important music teacher. Among his numerous students are composers and conductors, such as Otto Jochum (1898-1969) ; Karl Gustav Fellerer (1902-1984) ; Eugen Jochum (1902-1987) ; Heinrich Simbriger (1903-1976) ; Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1905-1963) ; Karl Höller (1907-1987) ; Philipp Mohler (1908-1982) ; Cesar Bresgen (1913-1988) ; Ernst Kutzer (1918-2008) ; Rudolf Mors (1920-1988) ; Wolfgang Sawallisch (1923-2013) ; Hans Walter Kämpfel (1924) .

Josef Haas was born on 19 March 1879 in the Bavarian town of Maihingen, near Nördlingen. The 3d child of the local teacher, he came into contact with domestic and church music at an early age and eventually took-up a career as a primary school teacher himself. His encounter with Max Reger was crucial to his musical career. From 1904, Haas took private lessons with him in Munich and, in 1907, followed him to Leipzig where he also studied with Karl Straube and Adolf Ruthardt at the local Conservatory.

In 1911, his 1st successes as composer and the award of the Arthur Nikisch Scholarship (for the Violin Sonata, Opus 21) earned him an appointment as composition teacher at the Stuttgart Conservatory. In 1921, he took a position at the Munich « Akademie der Tonkunst » where he was appointed professor in 1924, taking-over the composition class and, in 1925, even the direction of the Catholic church music department. In 1924, Haas, with Eduard Erdmann and Heinrich Burkhard, founded the Donaueschingen Festival for New Music, thus, proving his open-mindedness about anything new, despite his always tonal compositions. In 1930, he became a member of the « Preußische Akademie der Künste » in Berlin. After 1945, he strove, as its president, to rebuild the Munich « Hochschule für Musik » .

Haas received numerous awards and honours, including honorary degrees from the University of Munich (1954) and the Papal Institute of Sacred Music in Rome (1953) . He died on 30 March 1960 in Munich. Taking part in many musical organisations, Haas supported not only artistic but also social and legal issues of the musicians. As teacher of a generation of composers and conductors such as Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Cesar Bresgen or Eugen Jochum and Wolfgang Sawallisch, he greatly influenced the recent musical development in Germany.

The comprehensive « œuvre » of Josef Haas comprises compositions from all compositional genres, such as for example the « folk » Operas « Tobias Wunderlich » (1937) and « Die Hochzeit des Jobs » (1944) (both based on texts by Ludwig Andersen) ; the Oratorios « Die heilige Elisabeth » (1931) ; « Das Lebensbuch Gottes » (1934) ; « Das Jahr im Lied » (1952) , which are also accessible to amateur musicians, liturgical works, including Masses in German such as the « Speyerer Domfestmesse » , Opus 80 (1930) , as well as orchestral works, lieder, chamber music, piano and organ pieces. Haas' close-to-the-people style of composition gained him the reputation of being the « “ Spitzweg ” of modern piano music » .

Joseph Haas wurde am 19. März 1879 in Maihingen im schwäbischen Ries als 3. Kind des dortigen Lehrers geboren. Schon früh zeigte sich seine musikalische Begabung. Zunächst wurde er aber Lehrer. Nach erfolgreicher Prüfung versuchte er seine musikalischen Studien zu vervollkommen. Entscheidend war dabei die Begegnung mit Max Reger, dem er bis Leipzig folgte. Schon bald zeigten sich die ersten Erfolge als Komponist, die ihm 1911 die Berufung als Lehrer für Komposition am Konservatorium in Stuttgart und 1921 die Berufung an die Akademie der Tonkunst in München brachten. Konsequenterweise ging er in seinem Schaffen von der Kammermusik über Lieder und Chorwerke zu den großen Orchesterwerken, Oratorien und Opern. Von den bedeutenden Werken seien die beiden Opern « Tobias Wunderlich » und « Die Hochzeit des Jobs » , die Oratorien « Die heilige Elisabeth » , « Das Lebensbuch Gottes » , « Das Jahr im Lied » und « Die Seligen » , von den Liederzyklen « Gesänge an Gott » nach Gedichten von Jakob Kneip und « Unterwegs » nach Gedichten von Hermann Heße, von den Messen die « Speyerer Domfestmesse » und die « Münchner Liebfrauenmesse » sowie von den Kammermusikwerken das Streichquartett in A-Dur Opus 50, die Violinsonate in H-Moll Opus 21, und die Klaviersonate in A-Moll Opus 46 genannt.

Im Jahre 1921 gründete Josef Haas mit Paul Hindemith und Heinrich Burkard die « Donaueschinger internationalen Kammermusikfeste für Neue Musik » und bewies damit seine Aufgeschlossenheit für alles Neue, obwohl er selbst stets tonal komponierte. Schon bald war er einer der gesuchtesten Kompositionslehrer in Deutschland. Aus seiner Meisterklasse gingen so unterschiedliche Künstler hervor wie Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Karl Höller, Philipp Mohler, Cesar Bresgen oder die Dirigenten Eugen Jochum und Wolfgang Sawallisch. Josef Haas war während der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus Angriffen als « Fortschrittsapostel » (wegen seines Eintretens für die Neue Musik in Donaueschingen) oder wegen « Romhörigkeit » (wegen seines praktizierten katholischen Glaubens) ausgesetzt. Die Übertragung des Wiederaufbaus der Musikhochschule in München nach dem Kriege als deren Präsident hinderte ihn selbst am Komponieren. Erst nach 1950, als er in den wohlverdienten Ruhestand als Ehrenpräsident versetzt wurde, entstanden noch mehrere teils abendfüllende Werke. Als er am 30. März 1960 über der Reinschrift zur Hymne für den Eucharistischen Weltkongreß in München starb, war er der geachtete Nestor der deutschen Komponisten. Er hatte viele Auszeichnungen erhalten, und andere Ehrendoktor der Münchner Universität und des päpstlichen Instituts für Kirchenmusik in Rom, Ehrensenator der Musikhochschulen in Stuttgart, Dresden und Leipzig, Ehrenmitglied der GEMA und des Deutschen Komponistenverbandes. Seit 1949 gibt es eine Josef-Haas-Gesellschaft, die sich um die Verbreitung seines Werkes bemüht. Dem Werk von Josef Haas wird man nur gerecht, wenn man es an dem mißt, was er selbst zur Sinnggebung in der Musik gesagt hat :

Adolf Trittinger

Professor Adolf Trittinger, Komponist, Chorleiter und Organist : geboren 23. März 1899 in Klosterneuburg, Niederösterreich ; gestorben 25. Dezember 1971 in Melk, Niederösterreich. Sängerknabe im Stift Lilienfeld, absolvierte die Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Krems und 1918-1921 die Wiener Musik Akademie (Abteilung für Kirchenmusik) . Er war kurz in Rumänien, dann als Chordirektor im Stift Schlägl tätig. 1934-1938 war Trittinger Organist und Musikdirektor im Stift Sankt Florian. 1937-1943 unterrichtete er am Bruckner-Konservatorium Linz (ab 1939 Direktor) . Sein Einsatz für Paul Hindemith führte zu seiner Entlassung (Nationalsozialismus) . Ab 1946 wirkte er als Musikdirektor im Stift Melk, wo er auch am Stiftsgymnasium Lehrer war und die Chorknaben ausbildete.

...

Seine erste Ausbildung erhielt er als Sängerknabe im Zisterzienserstift in Lilienfeld. Dann absolvierte er die Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Krems. Nach dem Kriegsdienst schloß er 1921 seine Studien an der Kirchenmusikabteilung der Wiener Musikakademie in Klosterneuburg ab. Kurze Zeit war er in Rumänien tätig und wirkte dann ein Jahrzehnt als Chordirektor im Prämonstratenserstift Schlägl. In der Zeit von 1934 bis 1938 übte er die Ämter eines Musikdirektors und Organisten im Augustiner-Chorherrnstift Sankt Florian aus.

Seit 1937 wirkte er am Bruckner-Konservatorium in Linz, dem er 1940-1943 als Direktor vorstand.

Am 18. Juni 1943 veranstaltete er einen Paul Hindemith-Abend, der von Adolf Hitler persönlich beanstandet wurde. Trittinger wurde seines Amtes enthoben und nur die Gunst der Umstände ersparte ihm die Einlieferung in das KZ Mauthausen.

Nach dem 2. Weltkrieg war er Musikdirektor des Benediktinerstiftes Melk, wo er auch am Stiftsgymnasium unterrichtete und die Ausbildung der Sängerknaben leitete.

Er starb am Christtag des Jahres 1971 in der Stiftskirche Melk. Wie gewöhnlich, so verweilte er auch an diesem Festtage noch vor dem Hochamte in der letzten Bankreihe der Stiftskirche in stillem Gebet. Als er an diesem Tage nicht rechtzeitig auf den Chor gekommen ist, wollte ihn ein Student von dort abholen, konnte aber nur mehr den Tod des Herrn Professors feststellen.

Adolf Trittinger (1899-1971) wurde seine erste musikalische Erziehung als Schüler und « Singknabe » im Stift Lilienfeld zuteil. Nach dem Kriegsdienst im Ersten Weltkrieg studierte Trittinger ab Herbst 1918 an der « Staatsakademie für Musik » , Abteilung für Schul- und Kirchenmusik in Wien beziehungsweise Klosterneuburg Musik. Nach Abschluß des Musikstudiums ging er als Chorleiter nach Lugoj (Rumänien) und erhielt vom « Deutsch-schwäbischen Kulturverband » den Auftrag, in Lugoj eine Musikschule zu gründen. Zwei Jahre später übernahm Trittinger « die Leitung des ungarischen Chores und die Stelle eines 2. Kapellmeisters am Stadttheater » in Arad :

« Schon in Lugoj, mehr noch in Arad hatte ich Gelegenheit, angeregt durch die aufrüttelnden Taten des Führers im Mutterlande, in Presse und aktiver Propaganda mitzuarbeiten an den politischen und kulturellen Einigungsbestrebungen des gefährdeten Banater Deutschtums. »

1923 nahm er als Schriftleiter der Arader Zeitung Verbindung mit dem Völkischen Beobachter auf. Er soll damit das Interesse der rumänischen Staatspolizei auf sich gezogen haben und in Folge « wegen “ pangermanischer Propaganda ” als lästiger Ausländer » im Juli 1924 aus Rumänien ausgewiesen worden sein. Nach seiner Funktion als Chordirektor im Stift Schlägl wurde Trittinger 1934 Musikdirektor im Stift Sankt Florian. In dieser Zeit wohnte er mit seiner Ehefrau Emilie Maria Trittinger, geborene Secklar, in Sankt Florian, Schlageterstraße 1.

Adolf Trittinger, der in den Jahren 1934 bis 1936 Mitglied der Vaterländischen Front war, trat der NSDAP am 1. Februar 1938 bei. In einer Vernehmung am 3. Februar 1947 gab er an, er sei « vor dem Jahre 1938 immer ein scharfer Gegner der NSDAP » gewesen und hätte 1938 um seine Stellung gefürchtet :

« Ich hatte schwer zu kämpfen um meine Anstellung zum Leiter des Konservatoriums, welche Stellung ich dann später nur auf Grund meines künstlerischen Könnens doch erhielt. Anlässlich einer Aussprache mit dem Gauleiter Eigruber wurde ich von diesen (sic) mit Schuschniggfreund bezeichnet. Auch wurde mir eine abfällige Bemerkung über Hitler angelastet. Unter diesen Umständen war ich gezwungen Annäherung an die mir immer verhasst gewesene Partei zu suchen. Um meinen politischen Leumund zu verbessern suchte ich um die Aufnahme in die Partei als Anwärter gläublich im April 1938 an. »

Mit 1. September 1940 wurden alle Lehrenden des Brucknerkonservatoriums in Angestelltenverhältnisse des Gaus überführt. Als neuer Direktor wurde Adolf Trittinger « auf unbestimmte Zeit, jedoch mindestens auf die Dauer von 5 Jahren » bestellt. Am 26. November 1940 meldete das Gaupersonalamt, daß gegen Trittinger « ein Parteigerichtsverfahren auf Ausschluß aus der NSDAP anhängig » sei. Dies dürfte zunächst abgewendet worden sein. Ein Parteiausschluß sei auch nicht « anzunehmen, da er später häufig die Uniform eines Hitlerjugend. Führers getragen hatte. Das Tragen dieser Uniform hängt mit seiner Eigenschaft als Direktor des genannten Konservatoriums zusammen und es war für die Hitlerjugend in dieser Anstalt eine eigene Abteilung eingerichtet. Seine Stellung innerhalb der Hitlerjugend konnte nicht einwandfrei festgestellt werden » .

Noch 1941 erhielten Trittinger und sein Stellvertreter Carl Steiner, der 1945 Direktor des Konservatoriums wurde, eine Lohnerhöhung.

Grund für die vor Ablauf des Vertrags erfolgte Kündigung Trittingers soll ein am 18. Juni 1943 im Bruckner Konservatorium veranstalteter Hindemith-Abend gewesen sein, der von Franz Kinzl angeregt worden war. Adolf Hitler hätte eine Rezension des Abends gelesen und wäre « empört (gewesen) über die freche Nichtachtung seiner Anordnung, entartete Musik eines Hindemith ausgerechnet in seiner Heimatstadt aufzuführen » . Allein die Abwesenheit Gauleiter Eigrubers zu diesem Zeitpunkt hätte verhindert, daß Trittinger in das Konzentrationslager Mauthausen eingeliefert worden sei. Während Prieberg von einer sofortigen Amtsenthebung berichtet (Fred K. Prieberg : Musik im NS-Staat, 1982) wurde Trittingers Dienstverhältnis tatsächlich erst am 19. August 1943 mit Wirkung 1. September 1943 gekündigt. Selbst der Dirigent Wilhelm Furtwängler soll sich für die Erhaltung der « Uk-Stellung » Trittingers eingesetzt haben.

Die Geschichte seiner Amtsenthebung ist in dieser brisanten Form nur von Trittinger selbst überliefert und dürfte von ihm zu einem Teil auch « inszeniert » worden sein. In einem Bericht der Linzer Polizeidirektion vom November 1946 heißt es dazu :

1947 wurde Trittinger nach § 8 des Verbotsgesetzes (Registrierungsbetrug) angeklagt - er hatte als Parteieintritt den Mai 1938 angegeben (siehe oben) und seine Tätigkeit als « HitlerJugend-Führer beim Brucknerkonservatorium » verschwiegen. Erst in seiner Nachregistrierung gab er an, bei der Linzer Hitlerjugend « Musikreferent im Range eines Hauptgefolgschaftsführers » und nach seiner Versetzung « Musik- und Kulturreferent bei Gemeinde und Kreispropag.-Leiter » in Vöcklabruck gewesen zu sein. Weiters hatte Trittinger vor seinem Amtsantritt, im Oktober 1939, angegeben, er sei « Mitglied der NSV (Nationalsozialistische Volkswohlfahrt) seit 1. Juli 1938 » und « Mitglied des RLB (Reichs-Landbund) seit 1. Februar 1939 » gewesen.

Trittingers Karriere verlief trotz des Strafverfahrens ohne Brüche. Ab 1946 war er Musikdirektor des Benediktinerstiftes Melk, wo er auch am Stiftsgymnasium unterrichtete und ihm die Ausbildung der Sängerknaben oblag.

Günther Ramón

L'organiste, claveciniste, chef de chœur, « Thomaskantor » , compositeur et pédagogue allemand Günther (Werner Hans) Ramón est né le 15 octobre 1898 à Karlsruhe (Baden-Württemberg) et est mort le 27 février 1956 à Leipzig (Saxe) .

Fils d'un pasteur, il intégra à 12 ans le Chœur de l'église Saint-Thomas (alors sous la direction du Cantor Gustav Schreck) à la « Thomasschule » de Leipzig où ses aptitudes à l'orgue furent repérées par Karl Straube, alors organiste et assistant du Cantor en titre. Ramón lui succéda comme organiste à Saint-Thomas, en 1918, lorsque Straube devint chef de chœur du « Thomanerchor » .

Josef Gøebbels avait assisté, dans les années '20, à des représentations de la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de Bach et s'était prononcé fort enthousiaste.

En 1935, Ramón devient chef de chœur de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin mais quitte son poste, en 1943, à cause de la guerre. Il va diriger le Chœur du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig, durant 2 périodes : 1933-1938 et 1945-1951.

En 1939, il succède à Karl Straube à la tête du « Thomanerchor » où il s'attache à travailler les œuvres chorales de Jean-Sébastien Bach, permettant au Chœur de revenir sur la scène internationale, à partir de 1945.

Organiste concertiste de renommée internationale, Ramón donne des récitals en Europe, aux États-Unis (en 1933 et 1934) et en Amérique du Sud (en 1954) . Son succès hors frontières suscite, très tôt, l'intérêt des Nationaux-Socialistes qui tentent d'en tirer politiquement profit.

En février 1935, Hermann Göring propose à « Emmy » de l'épouser. Les fiançailles ont lieu le 15 mars, en présence des ambassadeurs de France, du Japon et de Hongrie en Allemagne.

Puis, le 10 avril 1935, Günther Ramin tient l'orgue au mariage religieux de Hermann Göring avec Emmy Köstlin (née Emmy Sonnemann) à la Cathédrale de Berlin (« Berliner Dom ») . Le couple s'était d'abord uni civilement à la mairie de Berlin (« Rotes Rathaus ») .

Adolf Hitler est le témoin du marié. La réception qui suit a lieu à l'Hôtel « Kaiserhof » . Anna-Maria Sigmund raconte la cérémonie :

« 8 orchestres vinrent jouer devant le palais (de Göring) du ministre-président, à Berlin. Cette journée avait été déclarée jour férié et sans travail. La veille des noces, 1,000 invités avaient assisté en soirée à l'Opéra national à une représentation de gala d' « Hélène d'Égypte » de Richard Strauß et s'étaient ensuite délectés devant 4 fastueux buffets au champagne. Le jour du mariage, les maisons étaient pavoisées et 30,000 soldats formaient, le long des rues, une haie devant laquelle le couple passa jusqu'à la Chancellerie dans une voiture ornée de tulipes et de narcisses, au milieu d'une foule en liesse. Adolf Hitler accueillit la jeune mariée avec des orchidées blanches et lui assura qu'elle pouvait, à tout moment, s'adresser à lui si elle avait quelque souci personnel. Le mariage eut lieu à l'Hôtel-de-ville. On se rendit ensuite à la cathédrale, tandis qu'un escadron de chasse ciliés des aviateurs amis de Göring survolait l'assistance dans un bruit de tonnerre. »

Le journaliste Louis Lochner, correspondant de l' « Associated Press » en Allemagne écrit ainsi :

« On avait l'impression qu'un Empereur se mariait. »

Malgré le fait qu' « Emmy » fut une femme divorcée, l'archevêque évangélique Ludwig Müller ne s'opposa pas à marier religieusement le couple.

Anna-Maria Sigmund poursuit :

« Pour le repas de mariage dans le somptueux « Kaiserhof », face à la Chancellerie, on invita 320 parents et amis, parmi lesquels le prince Philipp von Hessen, Auguste-Guillaume de Prusse, Winifred Wagner, la comédienne Käthe Dorsch, le comte suédois Eric Rosen, beau-frère de la Ire femme de Göring, et des journalistes mondains du monde entier. La mariée portait des bijoux des plus précieux, comme elle l'avait fait pour la représentation à l'Opéra, la veille du mariage. »

Les cadeaux de mariage sont présentés le lendemain à la presse, même s'ils sont parfois issus de fond publics, comme le Sénat de Hambourg, qui envoie un « bateau en argent massif qu'Emma avait déjà admiré, enfant, dans sa ville natale » ; le roi Boris III de Bulgarie lui offre un bracelet de saphirs. L'écrivain juif émigré Klaus Mann réagit vigoureusement en faisant remarquer à sa « collègue artiste » que les dignitaires nazis présents ce jour-là, son mari même, participent à la mise en place d'un État policier inique qui promeut les camps de concentration ; il lui reproche de fermer les yeux. Sur la demande de Göring, la désormais Madame Göring met un terme à sa carrière, après 23 années d'activité : sa dernière pièce est « Minna von Barnhelm » de Lessing. Cela ne la désole pas, et elle se plaît dans sa nouvelle vie de famille, d'autant plus que Göring est un mari attentionné.

The wife of Hermann Göring, formerly Emmy Sonnemann, was a well-known actress of the time. The wedding took place on 10 April 1935, in Berlin. The event was celebrated like the marriage of an Emperor, bringing tens of thousands of German citizens into the streets near the Berlin Cathedral where the ceremony took place. His best-man was, of course, the Chancellor and « Führer » Adolf Hitler. The Pastor who married them was « Reich » 's Bishop Ludwig Müller who was famous, in his own right, as a theologian who helped to found the « German Christian » following « Deutsche Christian » . He supported a revisionist view of « Christ, the Aryan » or a heroic Jesus, as well as a plan of purifying Christianity of what he deemed Jewish corruption and this included purging large parts of the Old Testament.

« Emmy » Göring

Emma Johanna Henny Göring, Ire épouse Emmy Köstlin, née Emmy Sonnemann (et surnommée « Emmy ») le 24 mars 1893 et morte le 8 juin 1973 est une comédienne allemande des années 1920 et 1930.

Mariée en Ires noces, entre 1915 et 1920, elle divorce et poursuit une carrière de comédienne remarquée à Weimar. Elle rencontre Hermann Göring, en 1932, alors président du « Reichstag » . Leur union est d'abord secrète, jusqu'à ce qu'ils se marient lors d'une cérémonie fastueuse, le 10 avril 1935. Elle mène depuis le début des années 1930 une carrière d'actrice de cinéma : elle y met un terme, comme à sa carrière de comédienne, après son mariage. Elle devient alors la seconde épouse du ministre de l'Aviation du 3e « Reich » , veuf depuis 1931. Elle remplit le rôle d'hôtesse à diverses réceptions officielles données par Adolf Hitler, participe à des voyages diplomatiques et organise avec son époux fêtes et cérémonies. Le couple a une fille, Edda, née en 1938.

« Emmy » Göring est incarcérée à la fin de la guerre et mise en accusation en 1947. Son procès donne lieu à des avis divergents, celle-ci mettant en avant l'aide apportée à des collègues juifs, alors que ses détracteurs affirment, au contraire, une adhésion réelle au régime et le profit des ressources financières de son mari. Elle est finalement condamnée à 1 an de camp de travail, en 1948, puis revient vivre à Munich, avec sa fille, où elle finit ses jours en 1973, après avoir publié une autobiographie.

Comédienne, « Emmy » Sonnemann réside à Weimar, à partir de 1922. Elle est d'abord choisie pour le rôle de Thekla dans « Piccolomini » de Schiller puis obtient un contrat. Elle joue notamment dans les pièces « Don Carlos » , «

Emilia Galotti » , « Agnes Bernauer » et plusieurs grands rôles du répertoire théâtral Classique. À l'âge de 38 ans, dans une des villes allemandes où le théâtre excelle, elle est alors à l' « apogée de sa carrière » .

Elle aperçoit Hermann Göring, pour la 1re fois, à Weimar, au début de l'année 1932, alors qu'il est déjà l'un des chefs de file du NSDAP et député au « Reichstag » . Elle ne lui parle pas : venu avec Adolf Hitler au « Kaisercafé » , où elle a l'habitude de se rendre, les dirigeants nazis souhaitaient se faire des contacts dans le monde artistique. Elle confessa plus tard avoir confondu Göring avec Josef Gœbbels. Elle le revoit peu de temps après, toujours à Weimar, lors d'une promenade au parc Belvédère. Elle est touchée par le discours qu'il lui tient à propos de sa femme morte d'une crise cardiaque, en 1931 (Carin, dont il était éperdument amoureux) . « Emmy » l'avait alors déjà croisée dans le passé, sans lui adresser la parole. Ayant perdu sa mère récemment, le sort de cet homme veuf la charme, et elle confie bientôt à une amie qu'elle est « heureuse, après tant d'années, d'avoir rencontré en Hermann un homme qui correspond à mes idées » . Il lui offre un portrait de sa femme défunte et bientôt, alors qu'il est en Italie, lui envoie un courrier avouant ses sentiments.

Au départ, il la fait passer pour sa secrétaire ; « grande, blonde et d'aspect imposant » , elle représentait l'image mythifiée de la « femme germanico-nordique » , comme Carin avant son décès. Hermann Göring voue toujours un culte à sa 1re femme, ce qu' « Emmy » accepte sans trop d'opposition. Le couple habite à Berlin, dans un appartement au 34, « Kaiserdamm » ; une pièce-musée est alors consacrée à la mémoire de Carin, avec le mobilier et les affaires qu'elle aimait, notamment son harmonium : seul Göring peut y entrer. La résidence de « Carinhall » honore encore sa mémoire, avec de nombreuses photographies ainsi que 2 yachts utilisés sur le lac voisin, baptisés « Carin I » et « Carin II » . En 1936, Göring baptise un autre pavillon de chasse, plus petit, « Emmyhall » , le pavillon de chasse de Rominten (aujourd'hui, Krasnolesye) : le « Reichsjägerhof » .

À Berlin, lors de la veillée aux flambeaux qui suit la nomination d'Hitler comme chancelier, le 30 janvier 1933, « Emmy » assiste depuis l'Hôtel « Kaiserhof » au spectacle. Après l'incendie du « Reichstag » , fin février, elle défend son mari et prétend le disculper en assurant qu'ils étaient au téléphone pendant le sinistre. Ministre sans portefeuille dans le 1er cabinet Hitler, il est nommé ministre-président de Prusse, le 11 avril de la même année : ces nominations ont des répercussions sur la carrière d' « Emmy » , Göring intervenant en sa faveur pour qu'elle ait le rôle titre dans la pièce « Schlageter » de Hanns Johst, au « Schauspieltheater » . Comédienne douée sans être nécessairement talentueuse, elle bénéficie du prestige de son passage à Weimar, « mais, à l'âge de 40 ans, « Emmy » Sonnemann n'aurait pas pu se hisser de la province à Berlin sans l'aide de son puissant ami » . Elle prend contact avec Hinkel, un des responsables du cinéma allemand au sein de la Chambre de la culture du « Reich » et joue le rôle d'Hedwig dans le film « Guillaume Tell » . En mars, Göring est nommé ministre de l'Aviation.

Contrairement à d'autres épouses de dignitaires, « Emmy » Göring n'est pas spécialement proche du « Führer » . Le couple possède, certes, une Villa sur l'Obersalzberg, non loin de celle d'Hitler mais, par exemple, « Emmy » ne connut jamais Eva Braun, la Maîtresse du « Führer » . Gœbbels écrit ainsi dans son journal, à propos d'une représentation théâtrale officielle (« Egmont » de Gœthe, à Berlin, le 8 novembre 1935) , alors qu'Hitler était assis à côté d' « Emmy » Göring :

« Madame Göring comme une reine. Le “ Führer ” est assis très modestement à côté d'elle. Il raconte après, dans le train (le train pour Munich) , combien il en a souffert. »

Des rumeurs circulent, par la suite, sur ses origines prétendument non aryennes, ainsi que celles de son 1er mari : une circulaire du ministère du « Reich » à la Justice s'en fait écho, un « calomniateur » est même incarcéré 5 mois ; cependant, le « Gotha » de 1936, bottin mondain du comte von Dungern mentionnant également les généalogies des inscrits n'évoque finalement pas le 1er mari d' « Emmy » .

Le couple a une fille, Edda Harda, née le 2 juin 1938 ; « Emmy » était pourtant âgée de 44 ans. L'enfant est ainsi nommée en l'honneur de la comtesse Edda Ciano, fille aînée du Duce Benito Mussolini, bien qu' « Emmy » déclare en privé qu'il s'agit également du prénom d'une amie. Sa naissance est célébrée par le vol de 500 avions au-dessus de Berlin et la réception de 628,000 télégrammes de nombreux pays, la « Luftwaffe » assurant même la protection « ad corpore » de la petite fille ; Adolf Hitler est le parrain. Le 4 novembre, Edda est baptisée chrétiennement, ce qui vaut au couple Göring les reproches de nombreux dignitaires nazis anti-chrétiens. Des cartes postales mettant en scène Göring et sa fille, Klein-Edda (« petite Edda ») , sont distribuées par centaines de milliers. En retour, les Allemands envoient de nombreux cadeaux (par exemple, le maire de Cologne envoie le tableau de « la Madone à l'enfant » de Cranach ; même, des officiers et soldats de la « Luftwaffe » font don d'argent utilisé pour bâtir la « maison d'Edda » , « dans le verger de Carinhall. Un petit château qui disposait d'une salle de théâtre dans laquelle le ballet d'enfants de l'Opéra de Berlin dansait devant le nourrisson » . L'enfant est alors très choyée.

« Emmy » Göring participe régulièrement aux cérémonies officielles ou aux fêtes organisées et données par son mari ; ses finances personnelles, augmentées de diverses cotisations d'entreprises le lui permettent aisément. Elle profite du faste de la vie de son mari qui possède nombre de propriétés en Allemagne, en Autriche et en Pologne. Elle vit alors au gré des excentricités de son époux, par exemple : élever des lionceaux, qu' « Emmy » même considère finalement comme des animaux domestiques. À l'inverse d'autres dirigeants nationaux-socialistes, le couple Göring est vraiment populaire dans la population ; cela « reposait essentiellement sur le fait qu'ils n'apparaissaient jamais en public avec des prétentions politiques » .

Même, la journaliste juive et exilée Bella Fromm :

« Ce n'est pas une intrigante. C'est une femme compatissante, maternelle, du genre “ Walkyrie ”. Grande et forte mais d'un charme calme. Ses beaux cheveux blonds encadrent son front de larges tresses. Ses grands yeux bleus ont un regard doux et serein. “ Emmy ” est une charmante personne. »

Étrangère à la politique, elle fait néanmoins partie des visites d'État, comme le 7 avril 1939 en Cyrénaïque où le couple rencontre le gouverneur Italo Balbo (« Ils furent reçus avec une pompe tout orientale, montèrent sur des chameaux, visitèrent les fouilles romaines et assistèrent à des fêtes somptueuses dans le palais du gouverneur. ») ou plus tard, à Rome, où Mussolini accueille le couple à la gare Termini.

Alors que l'influence politique de Göring diminue après 1938, et surtout en 1941, le couple passe plus de temps ensemble à Carinhall et Veldenstein, alors que leurs fêtes se font moins fréquentes. À la fin de la guerre, le 31 janvier 1945, « Emmy » part avec sa fille en direction de la Bavière, précisément à l'Obbersalzberg, éloigné des champs de bataille ; au fur et à mesure, des amies la rejoignent. Pendant le mois d'avril, Göring fait évacuer ses œuvres d'art (« 1,000 tableaux, 80 sculptures et 60 gibelins, transportés par train spécial ») et les cache dans une galerie souterraine près des montagnes de Berchtesgaden. Il fait ensuite dynamiter « Carinhall », et est toujours à Berlin pour l'anniversaire du « Führer », le 20 avril, mais le 23 se propose comme successeur d'Hitler, ce à quoi la Chancellerie l'accuse de « haute trahison ».

Il est alors « arrêté avec sa famille par un commando SS et interné dans les abris antiaériens du “ Berghof ” ».

« Emmy » écrit ultérieurement sur ces quelques jours :

« Avant l'effondrement, mon mari, l'enfant et moi avons été arrêtés par Adolf Hitler, le 25 avril 1945, et condamnés à mort. »

Après le suicide d'Hitler, ils sont évacués vers le château de Mauterndorf, qui appartenait à Göring. Le 7 mai, Göring est arrêté par les Américains, alors qu'elle se réfugie au château de Veldenstein, aux alentours de Nuremberg, « avec sa fille, sa femme de chambre et l'infirmière de Göring » alors que la bâtisse est en train d'être dévalisée par des pillards. « Emmy » est arrêtée le 25 octobre de la même année ; sa fille est confiée, un temps, à des paysans, avant qu'elle ne rejoigne sa mère en son lieu d'incarcération, la prison de Straubing.

Lors du procès de Nuremberg, où son époux est jugé (entre novembre 1945 et octobre 1946), « Emmy » Göring et sa fille sont placées dans une maison de campagne de 2 pièces (situées à Sackdillung, non loin de Neuhaus / Oberpfalz, à 30 kilomètres de Nuremberg), sans eau courante ni électricité ; sa nombreuse garde-robe est, en outre, réduite à une peau-de-chagrin. Elle souhaite pouvoir rendre visite à son mari et contacte pour cela le tribunal militaire. Elle écrit alors :

« Je n'ai pas vu (Göring) depuis 15 mois et il me manque si terriblement que je ne sais pas comment m'en sortir ; si je pouvais seulement le voir quelques minutes et lui tenir la main. Mon mari se fait beaucoup de soucis pour mon enfant et moi, qui sommes sans protection et sans assistance. »

Elle n'obtient un droit de visite que le 12 septembre 1946, mais craint pour le verdict. Elle confie alors à Henriette von Schirach :

« Ils ne peuvent quand même pas le pendre. Imaginez, Hermann à une potence ! On nous trompe certainement ! »

Comme les femmes des différents accusés, « Emmy » peut visiter son mari 30 minutes par jour, 8 fois seulement pendant les 15 journées précédant le verdict du tribunal.

Anna-Maria Sigmund note :

« Conformément aux dispositions strictes de sécurité, Göring était enchaîné à son gardien et le couple restait séparé par une paroi vitrée ainsi qu'un grillage à mailles fines. Edda récitait de petits poèmes et ses parents s'entretenaient désespérément de choses sans importance. »

Göring condamné à mort, le couple se voit pour la dernière fois, le 7 octobre 1946 : pendant ce moment, « Emmy » lui déclare :

« Tu peux maintenant mourir avec la conscience tranquille et pure. Tu as fait ici, à Nuremberg, tout ce que tu pouvais pour tes camarades et pour l'Allemagne. Je penserai toujours que tu es mort pour l'Allemagne. » , alors que Göring lui assure qu'il ne sera pas pendu.

Effectivement, il se suicide avec une capsule de cyanure, le 15 octobre ; et s'il apparaîtra que celui qui lui a fourni semble être un jeune gradé américain, « Emmy » compta un temps parmi les suspects, ce qu'elle contestera toujours.

Le 29 mai 1947, elle reçoit un ordre d'arrestation, comme toutes les épouses des « condamnés à Nuremberg » . Toutes sont accusées d'avoir tiré profit de leur position pendant le régime nazi. Comme Henriette von Schirach, épouse du « Gauleiter » de Vienne, Baldur von Schirach, elle est internée à Göttingen, avec un millier de femmes dans 5 baraquements datant de l'époque nazie.

« L'un des 2 avocats d'« Emmy » Göring, le Docteur Strobl, compara l'incarcération de sa cliente aux procès des sorcières au Moyen-âge, tandis que le second, le Docteur Ebermayer, fit appel dès juin 1947. »

Elle écrit une lettre aux autorités compétentes, le 31 octobre, où elle dénonce ses conditions d'incarcération, affirmant souffrir de crises de sciatique depuis 35 ans ainsi que d'une phlébite au bras droit :

« On m'a mise sur un brancard et on m'a fait voyager jusqu'ici pendant 7 heures parce que, prétendument, j'aurais fait une tentative de fuite en zone anglaise. Je suis maintenant alitée ici depuis 5 mois, avec des douleurs immenses. J'ai 54 ans, et j'ai subi infiniment de choses ces dernières années. Monsieur le ministre, vous connaissez peut-être mon dossier, j'étais complètement apolitique, j'ai aidé des personnes persécutées pour des raisons racistes et politiques quand et où je le pouvais, il y a suffisamment de déclarations formelles là-dessus. Ma seule charge est d'être la femme de Hermann Göring. Il est inconcevable de punir une femme parce qu'elle a aimé son mari et a été heureuse avec lui. »

Elle presse ensuite le ministre d'être rapidement convoquée devant la chambre de dénazification et, le cas échéant, de bénéficier d'une mise en liberté temporaire afin de ne pas passer l'hiver dans ces baraquements, mais en vain. Le 20 juillet 1948, elle est mise en accusation par la chambre de dénazification du camp de travail et d'internement de Garmisch-Partenkirchen, par le procureur Julius Herf, qui dépose, en outre, une motion la classant parmi les suspects de Ire catégorie. Selon lui, son attachement à Göring lui faisait automatiquement embrasser l'idéologie nationale-socialiste, chose supplantée également par toutes les largesses et la vie luxueuse que celui-ci mettait à sa disposition.

On met également en avant que sa nomination au théâtre national de Berlin, en 1933, n'était que la conséquence de l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir.

Se justifiant sur son train de vie et ses tenues, « Emmy » Göring déclarait, le 28 juillet de la même année, que cela n'avait été fait que pour plaire à son mari, ce à quoi le procureur lui opposa le 20 octobre :

« À l'occasion d'une représentation, l'intéressée est entrée à l'Opéra national de Vienne vêtue d'un manteau d'hermine blanc, avec des bijoux précieux, et fit scandale dans le public. »

Elle insiste cependant sur le fait qu'elle n'était pas une « personne politique » . En effet, l'acte d'accusation relève :

« L'intéressée fut admise au Parti de la manière suivante : à Noël 1938, Hitler lui communiqua par téléphone que l'affiliation lui avait été octroyée. Elle avait reçu le numéro d'un membre (744606) , décédé en 1932. (Les numéros les plus bas étaient très convoités car il possédaient une haute valeur de prestige et témoignaient d'un attachement ancien au NSDAP.) L'intéressée fut membre de la Ligue des femmes nazies et de la Chambre de Théâtre du " Reich " . »

« Emmy » Göring déclare n'avoir jamais rien su des camps de concentration et d'extermination :

« À mes yeux, ces camps étaient toujours destinés à la ré-éducation politique, tels que Hermann les avait envisagés dès le début. Je ne peux imaginer qu'il ait été au courant de l'ampleur des événements effroyables dans un camp hors de l'Allemagne, à Auschwitz. »

À son crédit, elle comptait avant et après son mariage des amis juifs, comme le professeur Jessner et plusieurs de ceux-ci, pour lesquels elle avait intercédé, ont témoigné en sa faveur lors de son procès. Le tribunal déclare ainsi que « l'intéressée s'est engagée dans une série d'affaires pour d'anciens collègues (juifs) qui, en situation difficile, se tournaient vers elle. Mais il ne peut pourtant pas être question de mobiles anti-Nationaux-Socialistes » .

Parmi les personnalités venues témoigner en sa faveur (une quinzaine) , on note l'acteur Gustaf Gründgens ou le pasteur Jentsch, qui n'hésite pas à la qualifier de « combattante religieuse » . Condamnée en tant que membre du groupe II (« bénéficiaire du régime nazi ») , elle doit restituer 30 % de ses biens matériels et exécuter une peine de 1 an dans un camp de travail, que ses conditions préalables de détention annulent de fait. Elle n'a en outre pas le droit de se produire sur scène durant 5 ans, mais recouvre la liberté. Cette libération suscite des oppositions, comme le montre une manifestation de 300 femmes, à Stuttgart, le 28 juillet 1948. Elles exigent, en vain, qu'elle soit placée dans le groupe I, que tous ses biens, acquis depuis 1933, soient saisis et qu'une nouvelle sanction plus sévère soit prononcée.

Elle s'engage dans d'autres procès en 1949, afin de récupérer certains biens (notamment, artistiques, comme « la Madone » de Cranach ainsi qu'une autre toile du Maître, « Repos pendant la fuite en Égypte » , une « Madone » du XVe siècle de l'Allemagne du Sud, des couverts en or, des tapis japonais et infiniment plus) , au nom de sa fille, bien qu'on lui objecta que ces présents lui avaient été faits grâce à la position de son époux. Cette affaire judiciaire se poursuit jusque dans les années 1950, avec Edda elle-même, qui jouit un temps des tableaux, dans la mesure où le maire de Cologne avait voulu se faire bien voir du régime nazi et ne subissait pas de pression de Göring. La ville récupère le tableau en 1954, néanmoins l'État de Bavière dut remettre à la jeune fille des bijoux d'une valeur de 150 000 « Deutsche Marks » .

Elle vit ensuite avec sa fille à Sackdillung, puis à Munich dans un « petit appartement commun » , Edda étudiant le droit avant de devenir assistante médicale tout en restant célibataire et dévouée à sa mère.

En 1967, paraissent ses mémoires, « An der Seite meines Mannes » , dans lesquelles elle s'efforce de minimiser le rôle politique qu'elle a joué aux côtés de son mari tout en magnifiant son personnage et occultant les crimes dont il était responsable. Elle y déclare :

« Même si mon mari n'était pas un Saint, je l'aimais et me dis, qu'à travers ce personnage, se cachait quelqu'un de sensible, d'intelligent, de cultivé et simple. »

Elle a bénéficié pour sa rédaction de l'aide des écrivain et juriste Erich Ebermayer et Alfred Muhr, qui ne furent pourtant pas mentionnés dans les remerciements.

Elle décède à Munich, le 10 juin 1973, dans son appartement.

En 1936, avant l'inauguration officiel du Congrès du Parti nazi qui se tient à Nuremberg, Günther Ramín rencontre le « Führer » qui lui demande de tester le grand-orgue de la firme E. F. Walcker & Co. de Ludwigsburg, nouvellement installé au « Luitpoldhalle » . Il jouera lors du concert inaugural.

Suite à son second voyage à Florence, le « Führer » Adolf Hitler décide que la ville autrichienne de Linz va devenir LE nouveau carrefour mondial de l'Art : une sorte de Rome Impériale du 3e « Reich » .

Le régime décide alors d'installer au monastère de Saint-Florian un puissant poste de radio qui fera la promotion de la culture national-socialiste dans le monde.

Due to the Nazi occupation of Saint-Florian, the organ needed more renovation and expansion. Following the proposal of the Leipzig cantor of Saint-Thomas, Günther Ramín, who also was intended as organist there, the instrument should be fundamentally restructured. However, the concept enforced by Josef Merklin, who planned a stronger reference to the old Chrismann organ.

À l'automne de 1942, le « Reich » nomme à sa direction l'Intendant Heinrich Glasmeier qui prendra, dès lors, les allures d'un Empereur Romain pompeux et hyper-narcissique. Le directeur-général Rudolf Dornburg von Schulz se voit charger de la création de l'Orchestre Bruckner du « Reich » à partir des Iers pupitres nationaux mais aussi étrangers dans le but de concurrencer les phalanges de Vienne et de Berlin. Enfin, le « Kapellmeister » et « Cantor » de Leipzig, Günther Ramín, est désigné chef de chœur du « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » de Linz (Saint-Florian) . Ce dernier n'a eu aucune difficulté à choisir les meilleurs voix disponibles puisque, dès 1943, les autorités décident de dissoudre tous les Chœurs de la Radio existants. Les Iers concerts sous sa direction ont lieu à Leipzig.

Selon le fils, Dieter Ramín, le discours de nomination (enregistré sur bande magnétique) fut rédigé par les Nazis sans l'autorisation de son père. D'après son journal intime, Günther Ramín ne se trouvait pas à Linz, ce jour-là. Le ton de ce discours de propagande culturelle (à saveur militariste, apocalyptique et perverse) n'est pas une preuve tacite des intentions du « Cantor de la Thomaskirche » .

Le 4 avril 1943, Adolf Hitler visite la ville de Linz, « future capitale culturelle mondiale » . Tout comme les musiciens du « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » , les membres du Chœur doivent prêter serment devant le sarcophage d'Anton Bruckner qui se trouve dans la crypte de l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian.

1943-1944, Ramín dirige le Chœur Bruckner du « Reich » (« Reichs-Brucknerchor ») créée par la Radio de Leipzig. Il est composé de membres provenant des autres formations dissoutes de la radiodiffusion. Mais l'association avec ce nouvel ensemble sera de courte durée puisque le « Kapellmeister » n'est pas prêt à quitter son poste à Saint-Thomas (« Thomanerchor ») .

Grâce à sa longue expérience, Günther Ramín continue d'offrir une interprétation formelle, objective et rigoureuse de la musique de Jean-Sébastien Bach qui laisse transparaître son caractère, à la fois humain et divin. Mais dans le contexte socio-politique, cela s'avère être une erreur de jugement aux yeux des Nazis.

À Leipzig, Günther Ramín n'a pas trop souffert de la guerre. Il eu la chance de résider à l'appartement de Karl Straube (qui termina sa vie dans la résignation et l'isolement) qui, heureusement, n'a pas été détruit par les bombardements. Pour leur part, les membres du Chœur qui furent durement touchés ont été évacués vers la ville voisine de Grimma.

En avril 1944, Ramín démissionne de ses fonctions à la tête du Chœur de l'Orchestre Bruckner du « Reich » qui siège au monastère de Saint-Florian, mais demeure quand même l'un des 2 organistes à faire partie de la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste » (la liste des bénis de Dieu) rédigée par Josef Gœbbels (en cette même année) consistant à exempter d'importants artistes du service militaire obligatoire.

Le 3 mai 1944, le « Gauleiter » du Haut-Danube, Heinrich Glasmeier, prononce un grand discours en hommage au « Chœur Bruckner » de Saint-Florian.

Malgré les circonstances difficiles, Ramín est demeuré une personne d'action. Aujourd'hui, on peut lui reprocher, en tant qu'artiste et en tant qu'individu, d'avoir « fermer les yeux » comme tant d'autres ...

Ramín fut témoin de « l'Aryanisation » de l'éditeur Leipzigeois C. F. Peters de même que de l'expropriation de son fondateur, le docteur Henri Hinrichsen, qui va mourir au camp de concentration de « Theresienstadt » , le 17 septembre 1942.

Autre disparition mystérieuse remarquée : celle de Samuel Lampel, le 1er Cantor de la Synagogue de Leipzig, décédé au camp d'extermination d'Auschwitz.

Lors de leurs pauses dans les camps d'extermination, les hauts-gradés SS utilisaient régulièrement la musique de Bach, de Mozart et de Beethoven pour décompresser.

Ernst Kaltenbrunner fut l'un des principaux responsables du système policier nazi, avec le grade d' « Obergruppenführer » . Au procès de Nuremberg, il est condamné à mort pour crimes de guerre et crimes contre l'humanité et exécuté par pendaison. Il a souvent mentionné pouvoir jouer parfaitement Bach au piano.

En 1949, Günther Ramín fut nommé docteur « honoris causa » de l'Université de Leipzig et, l'année suivante, obtint le Prix national de la République démocratique allemande (2e classe) .

Également célèbre comme claveciniste et comme accompagnateur de lieder, il dirigea les Festivals Bach à Leipzig en 1950, 1953 et 1955.

Il fut un des plus grands et un des plus vigoureux interprètes de Bach, et a laissé de mémorables enregistrements de sa musique sacrée.

Günther Ramín conserva son poste avec le « Thomanerchor » jusqu'à sa mort survenue le 27 février 1956 à Leipzig, à la suite d'un accident vasculaire cérébral.

Günther (Werner Hans) Ramín was born on 15 October 1898 in Karlsruhe, Baden-Württemberg, Germany ; and died on 27 February 1956 in Leipzig, Saxony, Germany. He was an influential German organist, conductor, composer and pedagogue in the 1st half of the 20th Century.

Son of a pastor, he was accepted, at the age of 12, into the famed « Thomanerchor » of the « Thomaskirche » , in Leipzig, by the then-Cantor, Gustav Schreck. At the time, Karl Straube, the organist, conductor, publisher and advocate of the music of Max Reger, was Schreck's assistant, and he took note of Ramín's abilities as an organist and composer. Later, when Straube took-over the cantorate at the « Thomaskirche » , Ramín became his assistant, filling in for him as choir Master and director.

During World War I, Ramín was drafted into military service ; however, he managed to complete his examinations at the Leipzig « Konservatorium » with distinction in January 1917 and, on 30 May 1918, Straube was able to write to him on the front that he had been chosen as organist of the « Thomaskirche » . Ramín returned from the War and took-up this position, which he held for 22 years until World War II broke-out.

Ramín built a successful performing career as a concert organist ; however, in the 1930's, he increasingly devoted himself to conducting. He took-over the directorship of the « Lehrgesangsverein » in Leipzig, in 1923, and worked regularly with the Choir of the « Gewandhaus » . In 1935, he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Choir of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, increasing his fame. He was the organist at the 1936 Nuremberg rally, playing on a specially constructed organ, the largest in Germany at the time. On New Year's Day of 1940, Ramín was appointed the Cantor of the « Thomanerchor » at the « Thomaskirche » , succeeding Karl Straube, a post he held until his death. After this appointment, Ramín devoted himself to performing the choral works of Johann Sebastian Bach, earning for himself and the Choir international acclaim through 2 concert tours to Russia (1953) and South America (1955) . The year after this last tour, Ramín suffered a sudden brain hemorrhage and died on 27 February 1956.

Some of Ramín's recordings have been re-released on compact disc. Notable among them is his much admired (although severely abridged) 1941 version of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » , with such stellar soloists as Karl Erb, Tiana Lemnitz, and Gerhard Hüsck. He was also active as an organ teacher. Among his notable students were Christoph Albrecht, Karl Richter, Hanns-Martin Schneidt and Helmut Walcha.

Günther Ramín : Conductor, Organ, « Thomaskantor » .

Born : October 15, 1898 in Karlsruhe, Baden-Württemberg, Germany.

Died : February 27, 1956 in Leipzig, Saxony, Germany.

« In Johann Sebastian Bach, I see the ultimate personification of everything which lends meaning, purpose, vigour and gladness to human life. He is for me the supreme symbol of vital and ceaseless energy. » (Günther Ramín)

The remark might stand as a maxim encompassing the life's work of universal musician Günther Ramín, who devoted his entire life to Leipzig and to the « Thomaskirche » , where Bach spent so much of his own life.

The son of a parson, the distinguished German organist, conductor, composer and pedagogue Günther (Werner Hans) Ramín was accepted at 12 years of age as pupil and chorister by the then « Thomaskantor » , Gustav Schreck. While never at ease with the Classical grammar school approach there, he nonetheless composed songs and pieces for the piano and for the organ, which were amazingly well-appreciated by most of his teachers. Karl Straube, then organist at the « Thomaskirche » and Ramín's organ teacher, arranged for him to leave the school at Easter of 1914, at the age of 15 and a half, so that he might apply himself solely to the study of church music.

Very soon, Ramín was permitted to stand for his organ teacher at normal service and for motet performances. In addition, when Straube was absent for longer periods, he places the training of the choirs of the « Thomaskirche » and the Bach Society in Ramin's hands. Ramin was conscripted by the « militia » in the autumn of 1916. Notwithstanding this hindrance, he completed his final examinations at the Conservatory with distinction, in January 1917. The following autumn found him as a trainee camp in France. There, he soon managed to play the organ at the church in Guise for regimental services, and was even commissioned by the commanding general to organize a church concert there. Later, he took part in theatrical productions at the front.

Straube wrote to the 20 year old Ramin at the front, on 30 May 1918, to inform him that he had been chosen as organist at the « Thomaskirche » quite without his having applied or auditioned for the position. He was to hold for 22 years, until the outbreak of the World War II. During this time, he undertook extensive tours, playing the organ all over Europe, in Russia (1932) and in North America (1933) .

In 1923, Günther Ramin assumed the direction of the « Lehregesangverein » (Teachers' Choral Society) , in Leipzig, which included giving concert performances of works with large Orchestra. The experience soon awakened in him a passion for conducting, and he took great pleasure in conducting 4 Symphony concerts at Leipzig's Albert Hall, in 1929-1930. Because of this liking for working with large choirs and Orchestras, between the years 1933 and 1938, he performed the Bach « Passions » (BWV 244 and BWV 245) ; the B minor Mass (BWV 232) ; the Verdi « Requiem » ; and various modern works with the « Gewandhaus » Choir. In 1935, he assumed the direction of the Philharmonic Choir of Berlin, and Ramin's choral concerts together with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra brought him much acclaim.

Günther Ramin's long years of experience in the training of choirs stood him in good stead when, on 1 January 1940, the Leipzig City Council appointed him « Kantor » at the « Thomaskirche » . Now, Ramin's attention came to focus on Johann Sebastian Bach's Cantatas. Whereas Straube has formerly performed almost the entire cycle of surviving Cantatas, Ramin proceeded differently - at least, in his 1st year of office. About 2 weeks in advance of the church calendar, he would with great enthusiasm play through the appropriate Cantatas from the scores in the Main Bach Edition (which still used the original clefs) , and was always pleased to have his wife and his son there as an audience, and to hear their opinion. He selected the best of the Cantatas and let them help, in the early days, in making the orchestral parts and in removing most of the existing phrase markings.

The Cantatas that were recorded are all radio transcriptions. It was seldom possible for Ramin to rehearse the works together with the Orchestra. Whenever a Cantata was recorded at the « Gewandhaus » , its performance at the « Thomaskirche » , at the beginning of the Sunday service, had to serve as the final rehearsal. This procedure would not meet today's perfectionist standards, but had the great advantage of infectious spontaneity.

Composer Wilhelm Weismann wrote in 1956 of Ramin :

« He innately possessed a quality akin to eternal youth, a quality which was enthralling and radiant and which, time and time again, reached breathtaking proportions through his vehemence and “ élan ”, something quite un-academic, goaded on by his natural penchant for improvisations ! »

It is this quality which makes Ramin's interpretations exemplary even today, whether he is playing the organ or the harpsichord, or conducting the Cantatas or « Passions ». Ramin directed music at the « Thomaskirche » for 16 years, always swimming against the tide of contemporary tastes, fighting the Nazis to uphold Christian mission of the « Thomaskirche » 's musical tradition and fighting the « Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands » (SED : Socialistic post-War governing Party) which, in the end, had to concede that the Choir would only continue to be a source of foreign revenue if it were allowed to pursue the Bach tradition.

« Die Grossen der Welt », a dictionary of great personalities, makes this comment :

« The widespread acclaim accorded to Ramin, the “ Thomaskantor ” and world-famous organist, derives from the fact that, despite having received splendid alternative offers following the collapse of the 1946, Ramin remained loyal to Leipzig and invested tremendous amount of effort in restoring the Choir of the “ Thomaskirche ” to its former glory. »

Despite entry restrictions for West Germany citizens, during the last 10 years of Ramin's life, the Choir of the « Thomaskirche » achieved its greatest heights, especially during the Leipzig Trade Fair and during the « Neue Bachgesellschaft » Festivals, in Leipzig. Peter Schreier recalls the 200th Bach Centenary celebrations :

« The bi-Centenary, in 1950, saw the 1st performance given by the combined Choirs of Kreuzkirche and the “ Thomaskirche ” - the B minor Mass (BWV 232) . The event impressed itself indelibly on my memory ... Just a boy at the time, I was enormously taken with the way Ramin drove us on during the performance, sometimes even stamping his foot. He had such a powerful aura, such a compelling presence, that we had no choice but to comply with his wishes. »

Ramin took 2 concert tours with his choristers : to Russia, in 1953 ; and to South America, in 1955. In February 1956, at the very pinnacle of his career, he suffered a sudden brain haemorrhage and died only a few days later. Doctor Albert Schweitzer (himself an organist) wrote :

« His death means a great loss to Johann Sebastian Bach scholarship. I admired him for the way in which he persisted in promoting the heritage of Bach and the choral tradition of the “ Leipzig Thomaskirche ”, in the face of tremendous odds, and for the success of endeavours and the universal acknowledgement they assured. »

Günther Ramin remains both a musical and historical legend in Germany today. His tenure as Cantor of Bach's « old church », Saint-Thomas' Leipzig, in East Germany, from 1940 to 1956, spanned one of the most difficult periods in Germany's recent history, to which Ramin responded with musicianship, enthusiasm, conviction, loyalty and persistence. Founded in 1212, the Saint-Thomas' Choir (the « Thomanerchor ») has maintained an unbroken tradition despite the vagaries and vicissitudes of religious, city and national politics ; it has always been associated in Leipzigers' minds with their deepest cultural and religious traditions.

Probably uniquely in Germany, the boys live-in, studying, relaxing, playing and, of course, singing together. Some 10 to 12 boys, of mixed ages, board together in a « Stube » . A « Thomaner » from the 12th (the oldest) Class acts as « prefect » and is responsible for the good order and welfare of his group. It is a long « Thomaner » tradition, that the oldest are responsible for their younger colleagues. There is a measure of friendly rivalry between the « Stuben » , in their regular football matches ; a major yearly event is the match between Leipzig's « Thomanerchor » and the boys of Dresden's « Kreuzchor » .

With the advent of mass transportation in the early 1920's, Leipzig began to find itself sharing its Choir with an ever-widening circle of European musical centres, providing a new challenge for the then « Cantor » and Ramín's teacher, Karl Straube. Following extensive choral conducting experience, during the 1920's and 1930's, in addition to being Organist at Saint-Thomas', since 1918, Ramín was appointed « Cantor » , on January 1st 1940. The Choir managed to survive the War and, in 1945, began, like the rest of War-torn Europe, to rebuild. There was little food to be had, and Ramín started a fund to support the Choir. He would go on foraging expeditions, returning perhaps with salted herrings, or a supply of codliver oil, a spoonful of which was administered to each boy at breakfast.

In 1948, the Choir made its 1st trip abroad, being invited to an international youth Choir gathering, in Bern, and other engagements throughout Switzerland. At 1st, the concerts were not particularly well-attended. Then, the Choir gave a concert in Geneva, during which several of the boys became ill and were forced, ashen-faced, to leave the stage. Those remaining looked thin in their sailor suits and short trousers, with thick woolen stockings to keep them warm. The local newspaper gave a heart-rending review of these « poor, half-starved little Choir boys » ; thereafter, the good-natured Swiss rallied round and every concert was a sell-out. But, as one of their number recently recalled, they were not sick from hunger, but from a surfeit of rich Swiss cream the like of which they had never tasted in their lives !

A distinguishing feature of Ramín's interpretations is the sharpness and clarity of the boys' voices, and Ramín's practice of rehearsing each part separately ensures that the 4 parts (SATB) are all equally and clearly audible, each section of the Choir infused with an awareness of its own individual contribution and value, giving a depth of dimension to the sound.

Another outstanding feature is the Choir's diction - Ramín always insisted that every single word must be clearly audible and distinguishable.

In stressing the texts themselves and the clarity of enunciation, Ramín was reflecting Bach's own view. Bach was deeply religious. He knew his Bible thoroughly and his family Bible was well-annotated in the margins. One can always tell when Bach feels particularly strongly about a specific text or biblical injunction, for he gives it the special treatment of an outstanding choral introduction or, perhaps, a variation on each verse of the appropriate chorale running throughout the Cantata's movements. Ramín (like his pupil, Karl Richter) , brings a particularly strong spiritual insight to his interpretations, stressing the text and bringing-out significant phrases. Indeed, without such spiritual insight, Bach's music becomes empty and meaningless.

Unfortunately today, spiritual insight is frequently (and quite erroneously) confused with Romanticism and rejected accordingly. This may explain why so many of today's renditions are superficial, aiming not to recreate a musical-spiritual experience but, in the words of John Eliot Gardiner, « to excite modern audiences ». Here, too may lie the explanation for many of today's breakneck tempi, so far removed from the religious devotions of an 18th Century Leipzig congregation.

Ramin is remembered for his loyalty and persistence, his loyalty in remaining with his Leipzig Choir after the division of Germany, in 1946, despite numerous tempting offers from the West, and his persistence in keeping the Choir alive, visible and audible through 2 dictatorships, Nazi and Socialist, fundamentally different ideologically, yet, identically antagonistic towards religion.

In 1945, most of Germany was in total ruins. From the War's end until 1950, both Germanys were struggling to rebuild. Then, as the 1950's progressed, the weight of oppression and economic stagnation settled over East Germany in a cloud of depression ; music was the people's lifeline to sanity and they clung to it desperately. The few visiting foreign Choirs were received with tearful acclaim and, for all musical events, large and small, the line-ups would often form several hours in advance.

It was against this background that East Germans tuned in, at 11h30 on Sunday mornings, to the hear boys and men of Ramin's « Thomanerchor » who dared to sing Lutheran Cantatas and, somehow, managed to get away with it. These broadcasts were authorized and recorded by the « Staatliches Rundfunk Komitee » (SRK : State Broadcasting Committee of the DDR) , between 1947 and 1956. Ramin managed to convince his political « Masters » that the « Thomanerchor » was a major potential foreign currency earner, perhaps, the only way to win some small support from the political regime. But political support was provided only on strictly limited conditions.

The Choir was rehearsed during the week without Orchestra, to be joined by the « Stadt- und Gewandhaus-Orchester » and soloists for the Divine Service on Sundays. This served as the only full « rehearsal » for the recorded performance which followed immediately. The performances were taped at 30 inches per second (giving a significant improvement in quality over the normal professional speed of 15 inches per second) and the tapes were then taken directly to the studio for broadcasting. The « privilege » of re-takes and editing was not permitted by the « Staatliches Rundfunk Komitee » ; each Cantata was, as one old « Thomaner » remembers, « an all-or-nothing » performance and the world would be listening with high-expectations. This sense of pressure and importance may help to explain why many of the performances could only be called electrifying.

Despite the politically imposed limitations, with a few exceptions the general technical standard was excellent, and the broadcasts were regularly picked-up by Western stations. The « Staatliches Rundfunk Komitee » used several high-quality condenser microphones, the only problem being that over-crowding in the Organ Gallery of the « Thomaskirche » where the recordings were made often left little space for microphone stands. The 1st, and indeed the most important element in the recording « chain » is the microphone and, here too, hangs an interesting tale.

In 1927, Georg Neumann pioneered the high-quality condenser microphones used by all professionals, and his company has subsequently been responsible for the development and manufacture of some of the world's finest professional microphones. In 1943, Neumann's Berlin factory was bombed; Mister Neumann took his car and went South to find a place outside the allied bombers' flight-paths. The allied bombers dropped a material somewhat like Christmas tree « tinsel » to confuse the Germans' radar and deflect their anti-aircraft defenses. Mister Neumann was searching for a place without any traces of this « tinsel », and he found it in a little village called Gefell, just 3 miles on the « Eastern » side of the Bavarian border. Here, he set-up shop in a vacant textile mill. He was not to know at the time but, by establishing this sister-factory in what was to become the DDR while retaining a presence in (later West) Berlin, Mister Neumann was to ensure that both East and West would benefit from his pioneering technology.

The high-quality « Neumann / Gefell » studio and broadcast microphones, made in the DDR, were distributed throughout the Eastern Bloc. Most of the microphones went into the broadcast systems and recording enterprises, to be used for example by the DDR recording company « Eterna », and by the Russians for their « MK » and « Melodyia » recordings. Another Neumann / Gefell model went into the public address systems; virtually every town hall and auditorium in the former Soviet Union has one.

It was Günther Ramin's custom to review in advance the full-scores of the several Cantatas appropriate to a particular Sunday and to play them through on the piano, then making his personal selection. Were his choices influenced by the political conditions of the time? If they were, he would surely not have made any such admission. Yet, when one follows the texts with the political conditions and the recording date in mind, one cannot help wondering, for so many of the chosen Cantatas reflect despair or a cry of hope.

For example, BWV 131 « Aus der Tiefe » (From the Depths we call to Thee); and BWV 106 « Gottes Zeit » (God's Time is the Best Time), were both so magnificently and intensely sung, and these performances must surely have been motivated by the prevailing political and social conditions.

From a different point of view, another Cantata performed by the Choir was « Preise Jerusalem », BWV 119. Ostensibly, it is an outgoing, celebratory piece, composed for the 1723 City Council Election. The text is politically innocuous in its praise for the City of Leipzig and its fortunate inhabitants. Yet, at the heart of this work is a key aria in which the unknown librettist warns that « authority comes from God, and he who fails to give it due measure fails to fulfill the Will of God ». This Cantata was broadcast in January 1953, the year of the East German uprising.

Many who lived through and remember life in the DDR look back on Ramin's Sunday broadcasts as a life-saver which helped them to survive spiritually. Never before have words and music, politics, poverty and oppression been so closely inter-linked.

Günther Werner Hans Ramin (geboren 15. Oktober 1898 in Karlsruhe; gestorben 27. Februar 1956 in Leipzig) war Organist, Cembalist, Chorleiter und Komponist.

Ramín wurde als Sohn des Superintendenten in Karlsruhe geboren. 1900 zog die Familie Ramín nach Groß-Lichterfelde bei Berlin und 1903 nach Schkeuditz zwischen Halle und Leipzig. Ab 1910 besuchte er zunächst die Latina August Hermann Francke. Noch im selben Jahr wurde er in den Thomanerchor unter Thomaskantor Gustav Schreck aufgenommen und besuchte die Thomasschule zu Leipzig. Danach studierte er auf Anraten des damaligen Thomasorganisten Karl Straube von 1914 bis 1917 am Konservatorium der Musik in Leipzig, wobei er sich zunächst auf das Klavierspiel konzentrierte. Sein Lehrer war Robert Teichmüller. Später kamen Orgelunterricht bei Karl Straube und Kompositionsstudien bei Stephan Krehl dazu. Von 1917 bis 1918 nahm er als Einjährig-Freiwilliger am Ersten Weltkrieg in Frankreich teil.

Am 1. Dezember 1918 wurde Ramín als Nachfolger des zum Thomaskantor ernannten Straube Organist an der Leipziger Thomaskirche. Im Jahr 1920 wurde er auch Gewandhausorganist und unterrichtete als Orgellehrer am Kirchenmusikalischen Institut des Konservatoriums. 1932, kurz nach seiner Ernennung zum Professor, erhielt er einen Ruf an die Berliner Musikhochschule, gab diese Professur aber bald wieder auf. Von 1922 bis 1935 war er auch Chordirigent des Leipziger Lehrergesangsvereins. Von 1929 bis 1935 war er zudem Dirigent des Leipziger Sinfonieorchesters.

Ebenso wie sein Lehrer Straube engagierte er sich in der deutschen Orgelbewegung. Angeregt wurde er durch Hans Henny Jahnn und die Entdeckung der Arp-Schnitger-Orgel in Sankt Jacobi zu Hamburg. So veröffentlichte er 1929 seine Gedanken zur Klärung des Orgelproblems. Ab 1933 war er Mitherausgeber der Zeitschrift Musik und Kirche, die der Orgelbewegung nahesteht und seit 1929 im Bärenreiter-Verlag erscheint.

Ramín reiste als Orgelvirtuose durch Europa und gastierte auch in den USA (1933, 1934) und in Südamerika (1954). Seine internationalen Erfolge weckten Begehrlichkeiten bei den Nationalsozialisten, die ihn für ihre Zwecke zu instrumentalisieren versuchten. So spielte er 1935 auf der Hochzeit von Hermann Göring und weihte 1936 die große Walckerorgel auf dem Reichsparteitag in Nürnberg ein. 1942 wurde zum Leiter des Reichs-Bruckner-Chors in Linz bestellt. Die ersten Konzerte unter Ramíns Leitung fanden in Leipzig statt. Im April 1944 legte Ramín dieses Chorleiteramt nieder. Er stand als einer von zwei Organisten auf der sogenannten Gottbegnadeten-Liste von Goebbels aus dem Jahr 1944, die Künstler vor dem Kriegsdienst schützte.

Von 1933 bis 1938 und erneut von 1945 bis 1951 leitete Ramín auch den Gewandhauschor, 1935 wurde er Leiter des Berliner Philharmonischen Chors, dieses Amt mußte er kriegsbedingt 1943 aufgeben. Von 1943 bis 1944 leitete er den neu gegründeten Reichs-Brucknerchor der Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft Leipzig, der sich aus Mitgliedern der aufgelösten Rundfunkchöre zusammensetzte. Sein Vertrag war befristet, da Ramín nicht bereit war die Leitung des Thomanerchors aufzugeben und mit dem Reichs-Brucknerchor nach Linz ans Sankt Florians Stift überzusiedeln.

Ramín legte großen Wert darauf, einen gemischten Chor zu leiten, da dieser Chorklang seinem Klangideal näher kam als der eines Knabenchores allein. So gestaltete er häufig als Thomaskantor Aufführungen von Thomanerchor und Gewandhauschor zusammen. Die Zusammenarbeit mit dem Gewandhauschor gab er offiziell wegen Überlastung ab. Voraus gingen aber Auseinandersetzungen zwischen dem Gewandhauskapellmeister und ihm um die künstlerischen Belange des Chores.

Am 18. Oktober 1939 wurde Ramón (wieder als Nachfolger von Straube) zum Thomaskantor in Leipzig berufen, was er von 1940 an bis zu seinem Tode blieb. Mit dem Amtswechsel von Straube auf Ramón wurde die Tätigkeit des Thomanerchors in der Leipziger Nikolaikirche eingestellt. Dieser tritt seitdem hauptsächlich in der Thomaskirche auf. Ziel des Kantoratswechsels war es, den Thomanerchor unter anderem durch die Gründung des Musischen Gymnasiums Leipzig 1941 stärker weltlichen Aufgaben zuzuführen, zu dessen künstlerischem Leiter Ramón ernannt wurde. Da er hier mit Widersprüchen zu kämpfen hatte, gab er dieses Amt Ende 1942 ab. Das Ziel der Nationalsozialisten, das Thomaskantorat mit der künstlerischen Leitung des Musischen Gymnasiums Leipzig zu koppeln, war damit gescheitert.

Nach 1945 gelang es Ramón, dem Thomanerchor schnell wieder zu einem hohen internationalen Ansehen zu verhelfen. Er sah sich als Thomaskantor vor allem dem Werk seines großen Vorgängers Johann Sebastian Bach verpflichtet. Ramón war Präsident des Bach-Ausschusses der DDR, Geschäftsführender Vorstand der Neuen Bachgesellschaft, künstlerischer Leiter des Bachwettbewerbes 1950 sowie Leiter der Deutschen Bachfeste in Leipzig 1950, 1953 und 1955. Außerdem war er Vorstandsmitglied der Internationalen Bachgesellschaft. Im Jahr 1950 wurde Ramón zum Ehrendoktor der Universität Leipzig ernannt. Ein Jahr später erhielt er den Nationalpreis 2. Klasse der DDR wegen seiner Verdienste beim Deutschen Bachfest.

Günther Ramóns Schülerkreis war groß, ein Teil davon wurde später auch bekannt wie etwa Hugo Distler, Paul-Heinz Dittrich, Albrecht Haupt, Diethard Hellmann, Hanns-Martin Schneidt, Karl Richter, Helmut Walcha und Ruth Zechlin.

Am 27. Februar 1956 starb Ramón im Alter von 57 Jahren an den Folgen eines Schlaganfalls in Leipzig. Er wurde auf dem Leipziger Südfriedhof beigesetzt (II. Abteilung). Sein Amtsnachfolger wurde Kurt Thomas.

Briefe von Günther Ramón aus der Zeit von 1926 bis 1949 befinden sich im Bestand des Leipziger Musikverlages C. F. Peters im Staatsarchiv Leipzig.

Die Jehmlich-Orgel des Wurzner Doms wurde 1932 eingebaut - die Auswahl der 46 Register in ihrer besonderen Klangfarbe verantwortete Günther Ramón.

Schlag ins Kantor

Braune Musik Der Leipziger Thomanerchor wird in diesem Jahr 800 Jahre alt. Über die NS-Karriere des bedeutenden Kantors Günther Ramín wird bei den Feiern kaum ein Wort verloren.

In diesem Jahr begeht der Thomanerchor Leipzig sein 800-jähriges Bestehen. Der Freistaat Sachsen, zentrale Kultureinrichtungen, die Thomasschule, der Chor selbst und die lebenden Thomaskantoren feiern dieses Jubiläum. Zweifellos gehört die Thomanerchor-Tradition zum Schönsten, was die zentraleuropäische Musik anzubieten hat. Aber es gibt auch weiße Flecken, die die Leipziger gern verdrängen. Die gehen zurück bis in die Wilhelminische Ära, die Weimarer Republik, das Nazireich und die DDR. Der Thomaskantor Günther Ramín, einer der bedeutendsten Kantoren in der Geschichte des Chores, steht dabei in Rede - es geht um Splitter seiner Karriere, seiner politischen Herkunft und Gesittung, es geht um Versagen, aber auch um Verdienste eines international berühmten Mannes.

Günther Ramín teilt ausgerechnet mit Bertolt Brecht die Lebensdaten. Er wurde 1898 in Karlsruhe geboren und starb 1956 in Leipzig. Im Alter von elf Jahren kommt er zum Thomanerchor, der Thomasorganist Karl Straube gibt dem

Jungen Orgelunterricht, er erhält eine umfassende Schulung als Sänger einerseits, Dirigier- und Klavierstudien andererseits. In dieser Kombination kündigt sich Ramíns frühe Meisterschaft an. Nur wenige Jahre braucht er, um alle bedeutenden Orgelwerke von Johann Sebastian Bach zu beherrschen. Nach dem Studium wird er erst Organist an der Leipziger Thomaskirche, um dann später, auf Drängen von Straube das Thomaskantorat « als eine der wichtigsten deutschen Stellungen » zu übernehmen.

Antrittsdatum

1. Januar 1940. Bald trugen des Meisters Knaben zu besonderen Festen die Hitlerjugend-Uniform oder die der Pimpfe mit Hakenkreuzbinde und wurden zu Vertretern der deutschen Kultur im Ausland.

Will man Ramíns Wirken während der NS-Zeit gerecht beurteilen, gehört die folgende Geschichte mit ins Bild. Der Kirchenmusiker Jürgen Christian Mahrenholz, Sohn des Kirchenmusikers Christhard Mahrenholz, schrieb 1990 im Rahmen einer Debatte um Kirchenmusik in der NS-Zeit :

« Bei der Beerdigung Günther Ramíns war ich zugegen. Kein Zweifel : Alle waren um die “ deutsche ” Kirchenmusik hochverdiente Persönlichkeiten, dazu ohne Frage in sich integer, die aber nahezu ausnahmslos deutsch-national orientiert oder sogar gesteuert gewesen waren. »

Völkisch aufgeladen

Gedankentum, das bis lange nach 1945, recht besehen, bis heute fortlebt. Fast alle konservativen Bestrebungen (Ramín war darin verwickelt) während der Weimarer Demokratie, die keine war, schienen geeignet zu sein, problemlos in die NS-Periode überführt zu werden. Dazu zählte auch die Bach-Überlieferung und -Aufführungstradition, von wenigen Ausnahmen abgesehen die Kirchenmusik insgesamt. Vor allem jene dumpfen, mythisch, übergöttlich und völkisch aufgeladenen Bach-Bilder, die an dessen letzter Wirkungsstätte vorherrschend waren, wurden der neuen Zeit bereitwillig übergeben. Man dachte deutsch-national und handelte bald darauf NS-deutsch, sodaß die Mythen und gehobenen Religionen, gesponnen um die Bach-Tradition in Forschung und Praxis, nicht nur von Neuem auflebten, sondern obendrein als Innovation verkauft werden konnten.

Der kanadische Historiker Michaël H. Kater schreibt in seinem Buch Die missbrauchte Muse. Musiker im Dritten Reich :

Daß Ramín zu Emmy und Hermann Görings Hochzeit im Jahr 1935, abgehalten im Dom zu Berlin, die Orgel schlug, ist weder Beinbruch noch Fehltritt, auch kein Versehen oder Irrtum, sondern aus gegebenem Anlass die Engführung geistig Verwandter. Ist Günther Ramín deswegen menschlich mies ? Spricht aus dieser Art Instrumentalisierung schon die

Unrechtstat oder die Duldung eines Verbrechertums ?

Linz und Reich

Sein Erlebnis der Musik Johann Sebastian Bachs, deren Rationalität und Formenstrenge, deren Menschlichkeit und Gottverbundenheit, deren Ausgelassenheit und Ernsthaftigkeit mag Günther Ramin indirekt vor größeren Fehler bewahrt haben. Doch hier ist Vorsicht geboten. Einer wie Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Oberkontrolleur deutscher Reinrassigkeit und im Nürnberger Prozess später zu Tode verurteilt, soll seinen Bach auf dem Klavier ja auch vorzüglich gespielt haben. Josef Geßbels hatte schon in den zwanziger Jahren Aufführungen der Matthäus-Passion besucht und sich enthusiastisch geäußert. Führer der SS-Elitetruppe nutzten die Musik von Bach, Mozart und Beethoven als Medium der Entspannung von den Strapazen ihrer Völkermordpraxis.

Daß Ramin im Auftrag Adolf Hitlers vor dem Nürnberger Parteitag 1936 die Probe der neu erbauten Orgel vorgenommen hat (er soll Hitler aus diesem Anlass begegnet sein) gehört mit in dieses Problemfeld.

Das österreichische Linz, « Patenstadt des Führers », sollte, nach Hitlers Italienreise im Jahr 1938, das zweite Florenz werden. Oder auch eine Art deutsches Rom. Das brauchte selbstredend die Einrichtung einer Riesenrundfunkstation, mit deren Hilfe die nationalsozialistische Kulturidee in die Welt getragen werden konnte. Der Reichsintendant Heinrich Glasmeier bezog im Herbst 1942 wie ein römischer Kaiser Position in Sankt Florian. Des Weiteren Generalmusikdirektor Rudolf Schulz-Dornburg, zuständig für den Aufbau des Reichs-Bruckner-Orchesters, bestehend aus ersten Musikern des In- und Auslandes. Schließlich Günther Ramin, dazu ausersehen, den Reichs-Bruckner-Chor für Sankt Florian aufzubauen. Es war kein Problem für ihn, dort Chorleute anzuwerben, da im Jahr 1943 alle Rundfunkchöre aufgelöst worden waren.

Weitere markante Ereignisse : Hitler besuchte am 4. April 1943 die zukünftige « Kulturstätte von Weltrang ». Wie die Orchestermusiker legten die Choristen am Grabe Bruckners ihren Eid ab. Zur Begrüßung des Chores am 3. Mai 1944 sprach der Gauleiter von Oberdonau, hernach noch ein zweiter Herr. Bis heute ist unklar, wer das gewesen ist.

Nachweislich hätte Günther Ramin, so die Auskunft des Sohnes Dieter Ramin, diese Rede (sie liegt auf Tonband vor und wurde seinem Vater fälschlich zu geschrieben) nicht gehalten. Laut Tagebucheintrag wäre er an dem Tag nicht in Linz gewesen. Indes, eine nicht gehaltene Rede ist noch kein Beleg, daß man anders oder gar kritisch geredet hätte. Faktisch gibt der Redetonfall die fatale Gesittung derer wieder, die dieses perverse Großgeschäft kulturell mit geprägt haben.

Der Krieg hat dem unabhkömmlichen Thomaskantor persönlich Schlimmes nicht beschert. Die Wohnung von Karl Straube wurde zerstört, Ramins glücklicherweise nicht. Alle in die benachbarte Stadt Grimma evakuierten Thomaner, die er wahrlich umsorgt hat, konnten überleben. Während das Leben seines Mentors Straube in Resignation und Isolierung endete, blieb Ramin ein Handlungsmensch.

Vorzuhalten ist dem Künstler, daß er wie Millionen andere weggeschaut hat. Dem in Leipzig lebenden Ramin dürfte die « Arisierung » des berühmten C. F. Peters Verlags, einem Musikverlag, verbunden mit der Enteignung von Henri Hinrichsen, der im KZ Theresienstadt starb, nicht entgangen sein. Desgleichen die plötzliche Abwesenheit jenes für die Ausprägung des Leipziger Synagogalgesangs bedeutenden Oberkantors Samuel Lampel, der in Auschwitz umkam.

Buß und Reu

Schon bald nach dem Kriegsende versammelte Günther Ramín Kräfte frischen Tatendranges. Ob ihn die Schuldfrage innerlich geplagt hat, ob er an sich selbst Fragen gerichtet hat wegen seines allzu beflissenen Selbstvertrauens während der Nazizeit, diese Fragen kann man heute nicht mehr beantworten. Gleichwohl muß er die Verzweiflung des Karfreitag gespürt haben. Wenn einer in entbehrungsreichen Tagen Trost zu geben verstand, dann Dirigent Günther Ramín unter der Kuppel der Thomaskirche. Etwas, das in seine verpasste Bewältigungsgeschichte unbedingt gehört : Buß und Reu, diesen Gemeindechoral aus der Matthäus-Passion, hat er zwar mit seinen Knaben turnusgemäß intoniert, beides aber persönlich nicht mit ihnen eingeübt, jedenfalls nicht öffentlich. Sein Blick war nach vorn gerichtet, wodurch er den neuen Verhältnissen fast automatisch dienstbar wurde.

Daß das Gewandhausorchester dann nach dem Abzug der Amerikaner aus Leipzig zum Empfang der Roten Armee Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, den in der sächsischen Stadt wirkenden Komponisten jüdischer Herkunft, musiziert, ist dann schon eine große Buß- und Reuetat.

Günther Ramín geht nicht in den Westen. Er bleibt in Leipzig, bei Johann Sebastian Bach, bei seinem Knabenchor. Wieder wird der Handlungsmensch gebraucht. Und einzelne Knaben. Der Dichter Bertolt Brecht bittet per Brief den Thomaskantor um kollegiale Hilfe :

« Wäre es Ihnen möglich, daß Sie für unsere Aufführungen von Leben des Galilei drei Ihrer jungen Sänger (bis zu 12 Jahren) - I Sopran, I Mezzo, I Alt, zwölf Stanzas, die Hanns Eisler für die Kalifornische Uraufführung komponiert hat, einstudieren ließen ? »

Ramín lehnt die Bitte Brechts ab, läßt aber drei Knaben die Verse auf ein Band singen, das in den Aufführungen verwendet wird.

Die bruchlos fortgeführten Bach-Aufführungen Ramíns sind weiterhin grandios. Zum Dank heftet ihm Wilhelm Pieck, der Präsident der DDR, 1950 den Nationalpreis an. Der Thomanerchor und mit ihm sein Leiter erhält außerdem den Vaterländischen Verdienstorden in Gold. Und Thomaskantor Ramín darf mit seinem Klangkörper in die Welt, zu Aufführungsterminen in europäischen Städten und in fernerer Ländern - zum eigenen Ruhm und dem der jungen Republik. Es gab nichts im Nachkriegsleben von Günther Ramín, das auf seine NS-Vergangenheit verwies.

Hermann Göring

Hermann Göring was born on 12 January 1893 in Rosenheim, Bavaria. The son of a senior army officer, he was educated at a military school and became a member of the Prussian Cadet Corps.

Göring joined the German Army in June 1912. He served with the infantry during the first few months of the First World War but was hospitalized with rheumatoid arthritis of the knees. After recovering, he transferred to the German Army Air Service.

At 1st, Göring was an observer for his friend and War ace, Bruno Lærzer, but eventually became a fighter pilot and scored his 1st victory on 16 November 1915. After the death of Manfred von Richthofen, Göring became the leader of his JG I squadron. By the end of the War, Göring had achieved 22 victories and had been awarded the Iron Cross and the « Pour le Mérite » for bravery.

After the War, Göring earned his living as a pilot working for the Fokker company based in Holland. While there, he met and married Baroness Karen von Fock-Kantzow.

Göring returned in 1923 and, after hearing Adolf Hitler speak, joined the National-Socialist German Workers Party (NSDAP) .

He later admitted :

« It was political love at 1st sight. »

Hitler also admired Göring and appointed him as head of « Sturm Abteilung » (SA : Storm Section) . The SA (also known as storm-troopers or brown-shirts) were instructed to disrupt the meetings of political opponents and to protect Hitler from revenge attacks. Captain Ernst Röhm of the Bavarian Army played an important role in recruiting these men.

On 8 November 1923, the Bavarian government held a meeting of about 3,000 officials. While Gustav von Kahr, the prime minister of Bavaria was making a speech, Adolf Hitler and 600 armed SA men entered the building.

According to Ernst Hanfstängel :

« Hitler began to plough his way towards the platform and the rest of us surged forward behind him. Tables overturned with their jugs of beer. On the way, we passed a major named Muckel, one of the heads of the intelligence section at Army headquarters, who started to draw his pistol as soon as he saw Hitler approach, but the body-guard had covered him with theirs and there was no shooting. Hitler clambered on a chair and fired a round at the ceiling. »

Hitler then told the audience :

« The national revolution has broken out ! The hall is filled with 600 armed men. No one is allowed to leave. The Bavarian government and the government at Berlin are hereby deposed. A new government will be formed at once. The barracks of the « Reichswehr » and the police barracks are occupied. Both have rallied to the swastika ! »

Leaving Göring and the SA to guard the 3,000 officials, Hitler took Gustav von Kahr, Otto von Lossow, the commander of the Bavarian Army and Hans von Seißer, the commandant of the Bavarian State Police into an adjoining room. Hitler told the men that he was to be the new leader of Germany and offered them posts in his new government. Aware that this would be an act of high-treason, the 3 men were initially reluctant to agree to this offer.

Hitler was furious and threatened to shoot them and then commit suicide :

« I have 3 bullets for you, gentlemen, and one for me ! »

After this, the three men agreed to become ministers of the government. (36)

Soon afterwards, Eric Ludendorff arrived. Ludendorff had been leader of the German Army at the end of the First World War. He had, therefore, found Hitler's claim that the War had not been lost by the army but by Jews, Socialists, Communists and the German government, attractive, and was a strong supporter of the Nazi Party. Ludendorff agreed to become head of the the German Army in Hitler's government.

While Hitler had been appointing government ministers, Ernst Röhm, leading a group of storm-troopers, had seized the War Ministry and Rudolf Heß was arranging the arrest of Jews and Left-wing political leaders in Bavaria.

Hitler now planned to march on Berlin and remove the national government. Surprisingly, Hitler had not arranged for the storm-troopers to take control of the radio stations and the telegraph offices. This meant that the national government in Berlin soon heard about Hitler's « Putsch » and gave orders for it to be crushed.

The next day, Göring, Adolf Hitler, Eric Ludendorff, and 3,000 armed supporters of the Nazi Party marched through Munich in an attempt to join-up with Röhm's forces at the War Ministry. On the « Odensplatz » , they found the road blocked by the Munich police. As they refused to stop, the police fired into the ground in front of the marchers. The storm-troopers returned the fire and, during the next few minutes, 21 people were killed and another 100 were wounded, included Göring, who had 2 granite splinters (from a building) in his groin.

To avoid arrest, Göring fled to Sweden. Göring, who lived in Stockholm for the next 4 years, was in a poor physical state because of his morphine addiction. He also suffered from obesity and weighed 280 pounds.

In 1927, President Paul von Hindenburg granted Göring an amnesty and he returned to Berlin. The following year, he was one of the 12 members of the Nazi Party elected to the « Reichstag » and, on 30 August 1932, became its president.

When Adolf Hitler became chancellor, in January 1933, he made Göring a cabinet minister without portfolio. Later, he became minister of the interior and prime minister of Prussia. He immediately replaced 22 of Germany's 32 police chiefs with SA and SS officers. He also appointed Rudolf Diels as chief of the political police, the « Gestapo » .

After the « Reichstag » fire, on 27 February 1933, Göring launched a wave of violence against members of the German Communist Party and other Left-wing opponents of the regime. He also joined with Heinrich Himmler, head of the « Schutz Staffeinel » (SS) , in setting-up Germany's concentration camps.

Göring agreed that the « Sturm Abteilung » (SA) posed a threat to the German Army and, in June 1934, arranged the « Night of the Long Knives » . He also purged Werner von Blomberg and Werner von Fitsch from the high-command of the army.

In February 1938, Göring became head of Germany's armed forces. The following year, he officially became Hitler's deputy and legal heir. He obtained a vast income from his various official posts and converted an old Berlin palace into his official residence. Göring also made money from his own newspaper, Essener National Zeitung and from stock in the aircraft industry.

After the outbreak of the Second World War, Göring was placed in charge of the « Luftwaffe » and took credit for the quick defeat of France, Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg, in the summer of 1940. However, he failed to stop the British evacuation of Dunkirk.

Göring organized the German War effort during the Battle of Britain and made the crucial mistake of changing his tactics and launching the « Blitz » , in September 1940. He was criticized for the failings of the « Luftwaffe » during Operation « Barbarossa » .

When the Red Army made advances into Germany, Göring moved his headquarters to Berchtesgaden. After the suicide of Adolf Hitler, Göring surrendered to the US Army in Austria, on 8 May 1945.

Hermann Göring was found guilty at Nuremberg War Crimes Trial but avoided execution by swallowing potassium cyanide on 15 October 1946.

In Nazi eyes, nudism is a vice to be exterminated at all costs. Some 500,000 Germans, male and female, belong to nudist clubs. Suppressing them all by a single, nation-wide order, Nazi Minister-Without-Portfolio Hermann Göring denounced « the so-called cult of nudism » as « one of the greatest dangers to German culture and morals » .

« Herr » Göring said :

« In women, nudism deadens the sense of shame, and in men it destroys respect for womanhood. »

Communism being worse than nudism, the Hitler Government confiscated Karl Liebknecht House (the Communist headquarters in Berlin worth some $ 120,000) , transformed it into a Nazi bivouack, announced that the life-size bronze statue of Karl Marx in the central hallway will be recast into busts of Adolf Hitler.

(2) Hermann Göring explained about his role in Hitler's government in his book « Germany Reborn » (1934) :

« I became commissioner of the Interior in Prussia and, at the same time, Minister of the “ Reich ”. I had taken on a heavy responsibility and a vast field of work lay before me. It was clear that I should be able to make a little use of the administrative system as it then was. I should have to make great changes. To begin with, it seemed to me of the 1st importance to get the weapon of the criminal and political police firmly into my own hands. Here, it was that I made the 1st sweeping changes of personnel. Out of 32 police chiefs, I removed 22. New men were brought in, and in every case, these men came from the great reservoir of the Storm Troops.

I gave strict orders and demanded that the police should devote all their energies to the ruthless extermination of subversive elements. In one of my 1st big meetings in Dortmund, I declared that, for the future, there would be only one man who would bear the responsibility in Prussia, and that one man was myself. Every bullet fired from the barrel of a police pistol was my bullet. If you call that murder, then I am the murderer.

Finally, I alone created, on my own initiative, the State Secret Police Department. This is the instrument which is so much feared by the enemies of the State, and which is chiefly responsible for the fact that in Germany and Prussia today there is no question of a Marxist or Communist danger. »

(2) Henry (Chips) Channon, diary entry (13 August, 1936) :

« Göring, wreathed in smiles and orders and decorations received us gaily, his wife at his side. There is something un-Christian about Göring, a strong pagan streak, a touch of the arena, though perhaps, like many who are libidinous-minded like myself, he actually does very little. People say that he can be very hard and ruthless, as are all Nazis when occasion demands, but outwardly he seems all vanity and childish love of display. »

(3) Hermann Göring, statement at Nuremberg War Crimes Trial (October 1946) :

« When the civil war broke out in Spain Franco sent a call for help to Germany and asked for support, particularly in the air. Franco with his troops was stationed in Africa and he could not get his troops across, as the fleet was in the hands of the communists. The decisive factor was, first of all, to get his troops to Spain. The Führer thought the matter over. I urged him to give support under all circumstances: firstly, to prevent the further spread of communism; secondly, to test my young Luftwaffe in this or that technical respect. »

(4) Conference on the « Jewish Question » between Hermann Göring, Reinhard Heydrich and Josef Gœbbels (12 November 1938) .

Reinhard Heydrich : In almost all German cities, synagogues are burned. New, various possibilities exist to utilize the space where the synagogues stood. Some cities want to build parks in their place, others want to put-up new buildings.

Hermann Göring : How many synagogues were actually burned ?

Reinhard Heydrich : Altogether, there are 101 synagogues destroyed by fire ; 76 synagogues demolished ; and 7,500 stores ruined in the « Reich » .

Hermann Göring : What do you mean « destroyed by fire » ?

Reinhard Heydrich : Partly, they are razed, and partly gutted.

Josef Goebbels : I am of the opinion that this is our chance to dissolve the synagogues. All those not completely intact shall be razed by the Jews. The Jews shall pay for it. There, in Berlin, the Jews are ready to do that. The synagogues which burned in Berlin are being leveled by the Jews themselves. We shall build parking lots in their places or new buildings. That ought to be the criterion for the whole country, the Jews shall have to remove the damaged or burned synagogues, and shall have to provide us with ready free space. I deem it necessary to issue a decree forbidding the Jews to enter German theaters, movie houses and circuses. I have already issued such a decree under the authority of the law of the Chamber for Culture. Considering the present situation of the theaters, I believe we can afford that. Our theaters are over-crowded, we have hardly any room. I am of the opinion that it is not possible to have Jews sitting next to Germans in varieties, movies and theaters. One might consider, later on, to let the Jews have 1 or 2 movie houses here in Berlin, where they may see Jewish movies. But, in German theaters, they have no business anymore. Furthermore, I advocate that the Jews be eliminated from all positions in public life in which they may prove to be provocative. It is still possible today that a Jew shares a compartment in a sleeping car with a German. Therefore, we need a decree by the « Reich » Ministry for Communications stating that separate compartments for Jews shall be available ; in cases where compartments are filled-up, Jews cannot claim a seat. They shall be given a separate compartment only after all Germans have secured seats. They shall not mix with Germans, and if there is no more room, they shall have to stand in the corridor.

Hermann Göring : In that case, I think it would make more sense to give them separate compartments.

Josef Goebbels : Not if the train is over-crowded !

Hermann Göring : Just a moment. There will be only one Jewish coach. If that is filled-up, the other Jews will have to stay at home.

Josef Goebbels : Furthermore, there ought to be a decree barring Jews from German beaches and resorts, last summer.

Hermann Göring : Particularly here, in the « Admiralspalast » , very disgusting things have happened lately.

Josef Goebbels : Also, at the Wannsee beach. A law which definitely forbids the Jews to visit German resorts.

Hermann Göring : We could give them their own.

Josef Goebbels : It would have to be considered whether we would give them their own or whether we should turn a few German resorts over to them, but not the finest and the best, so we cannot say the Jews go there for recreation. It will also have to be considered if it might not become necessary to forbid the Jews to enter the German forest. In the Grunewald, whole herds of them are running around. It is a constant provocation and we are having incidents all the time. The behaviour of the Jews is so inciting and provocative that brawls are a daily routine.

Hermann Göring : We shall give the Jews a certain part of the forest, and the Alpers shall take care of it that various animals that look damned much like Jews (the elk has such a crooked nose) get there also and become acclimated.

(5) General Franz Halder, provided evidence on the « Reichstag » Fire at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trial, in 1946.

At a luncheon on the birthday of Adolf Hitler, in 1942, the conversation turned to the topic of the « Reichstag » building and its artistic value. I heard with my own ears when Hermann Göring interrupted the conversation and shouted :

« The only one who really knows about the “ Reichstag ” is I, because I set it on fire ! »

With that, he slapped his thigh with the flat of his hand.

(6) Hermann Göring provided evidence on the « Reichstag » Fire at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trial, in 1946.

I had nothing to do with it. I deny this absolutely. I can tell you in all honesty, that the « Reichstag » fire proved very inconvenient to us. After the fire, I had to use the « Kroll » Opera House as the new « Reichstag » and the Opera House seemed to me much more important than the « Reichstag » . I must repeat that no pretext was needed for taking measures against the Communists. I already had a number of perfectly good reasons in the forms of murders, etc.

(7) Albert Speer, « Inside the 3rd “ Reich ” » (1970) .

After 1933, there quickly formed various rival factions that held divergent views, spied on each other, and held each other in contempt. A mixture of scorn and dislike became the prevailing mood within the Party. Each new dignitary rapidly gathered a circle of intimates around him. Thus, Heinrich Himmler associated almost exclusively with his SS following, from whom he could count on unqualified respect. Hermann Göring also had his band of uncritical admirers, consisting partly of members of his family, partly of his closest associates and adjutants. Josef Goebbels felt at ease in the company of literary and movie people. Rudolf Heß occupied himself with problems of homeopathic medicine, loved chamber music, and had screwy but interesting acquaintances.

As an intellectual, Goebbels looked down on the crude philistines of the leading group in Munich, who for their part made fun of the conceited academic's literary ambitions. Göring considered neither the Munich philistines nor Gœbbels sufficiently aristocratic for him and, therefore, avoided all social relations with them ; whereas Himmler, filled with the elitist missionary zeal of the SS, felt far superior to all the others. Adolf Hitler, too, had his retinue, which went everywhere with him. Its membership, consisting of chauffeurs, the photographer, his pilot, and secretaries, remained always the same.

(8) Hermann Göring, order to Reinhard Heydrich (31 July 1941) .

Complementing the task that was assigned to you on January 24, 1939, which dealt with carrying-out by emigration and evacuation a solution of the « Jewish problem » as advantageous as possible, I hereby charge you with making all necessary preparations with regard to organizational and financial matters for bringing about a complete solution of the « Jewish question » in the German sphere of influence in Europe.

Whatever other governmental agencies are involved, they will cooperate with you. I request, furthermore, that you send me before long an overall plan concerning the organizational, factual and material measures necessary for the accomplishment of the desired final solution of the « Jewish question » .

(9) Josef Gœbbels, diary (13 March 1945) :

This evening's Mosquito raid was particularly disastrous for me because our Ministry was hit. The whole lovely building on the « Wilhelmstraße » was totally destroyed by a bomb. The throne-room, the Blue Gallery and my newly-rebuilt theatre hall are nothing but a heap of ruins. I drove straight to the Ministry to see the devastation for myself. One's heart aches to see so unique a product of the architect's art, such as this building was, totally flattened in a second. What trouble we have taken to reconstruct the theatre hall, the throne-room and the Blue Gallery in the old style ! With what care have we chosen every fresco on the walls and every piece of furniture ! And now, it has all been given over to destruction. In addition, fire has now broken-out in the ruins, bringing with it an even greater risk since 500 bazooka missiles are stored underneath the burning wreckage. I do my utmost to get the fire brigade to the scene as quickly and in as great strength as possible, so as at least to prevent the bazooka missiles exploding.

As I do all this, I am overcome with sadness. It is 12 years to the day (13 March) since I entered this Ministry as Minister. It is the worst conceivable omen for the next 12 years.

The « Führer » telephones me immediately after the raid on the Ministry. He too is very sad that it has now hit me. So far, we have been lucky even during the heaviest raids on Berlin. Now, however, we have lost not only a possession but an anxiety. In future, I need no longer tremble for the Ministry.

All those present at the fire voiced only scorn and hatred for Göring. All were asking repeatedly why the « Führer » does not at last do something definite about him and the « Luftwaffe » .

The « Führer » then asks me over for a short visit. During the interview, I have with him he is very impressed by my account of things. I give him a description of the devastation which is being wrought and tell him particularly of the increasing fury of the Mosquito raids which take place every evening. I cannot prevent myself voicing sharp criticism of Göring and the « Luftwaffe ». But it is always the same story when one talks to the « Führer » on this subject. He explains the reasons for the decay of the « Luftwaffe », but he cannot make-up his mind to draw the consequences there from. He tells me that, after the recent interviews he had with him, Göring was a broken man. But what is the good of that ! I can have no sympathy with him. If he did lose his nerve somewhat after his recent clash with the « Führer », that is but a small punishment for the frightful misery he has brought and is still bringing on the German people.

I beg the « Führer », yet again, to take action at last, since things cannot go on like this. We ought not, after all, to send our people to their doom because we do not possess the strength of decision to root-out the cause of our misfortune. The « Führer » tells me that new fighters and bombers are now under construction, of which he has certain hopes. But we have heard it so often before that we can no longer bring ourselves to place much hope in such statements. In any case, it is now plenty late (not to say too late) to anticipate any decisive effect from such measures.

(10) Albert Speer, « Inside the 3rd “ Reich ” » (1970) .

I witnessed a dramatic scene between Göring and General Galland, who commanded his fighter planes. Galland had reported to Hitler that day that several American fighter planes accompanying the bomber squadrons had been shot down over Aachen. He had added the warning that we were in grave peril if American fighters, thanks to improved fuel capacity, should soon be able to provide escort protection to the fleets of bombers on flights even deeper into Germany. Hitler had just relayed these points to Göring.

Göring was embarking for Rominten Heath on his special train when Galland came along to bid him good-by.

« What's the idea of telling the “ Führer ” that American fighters have penetrated into the territory of the “ Reich ” ? » , Göring snapped at him.

Galland replied with imperturbable calm :

« “ Herr Reichsmarschall ”, they will soon be flying even deeper. »

Göring spoke even more vehemently :

« That's nonsense, Galland, what gives you such fantasies ? That's pure bluff ! »

Galland shook his head :

« Those are the facts. “ Herr Reichsmarschall ” ! »

As he spoke, he deliberately remained in a casual posture, his cap somewhat askew, a long cigar clamped between his teeth.

« American fighters have been shot-down over Aachen. There is no doubt about it ! »

Göring obstinately held his ground :

« That is simply not true, Galland. It's impossible. »

Galland reacted with a touch of mockery :

« You might go and check it yourself, sir ; the downed planes are there at Aachen. »

Göring tried to smooth matters over :

« Come now. Galland, let me tell you something. I'm an experienced fighter pilot myself. I know what is possible. But I know what isn't, too. Admit you made a mistake. »

Galland only shook his head, until Göring finally declared :

« What must have happened is that they were shot-down much farther to the West. I mean, if they were very high when they were shot-down they could have glided quite a distance farther before they crashed. »

Not a muscle moved in Galland's face :

« Glided to the East, sir ? If my plane were shot-up ... »

Göring fulminated, trying to put an end to the debate :

« Now then, “ Herr ” Galland, I officially assert that the American fighter planes did not reach Aachen. »

The General ventured a last statement :

« But, sir, they were there ! »

At this point Göring's self-control gave way :

« I, herewith, give you an official order that they weren't there ! Do you understand ? The American fighters were not there ! Get that ! I intend to report that to the “ Führer ”. »

Göring simply let General Galland stand there. But, as he stalked-off, he turned once more and called-out threateningly :

« You have my official order ! »

With an unforgettable smile, the General replied :

« Orders are orders, sir ! »

(11) Gustave Gilbert, an intelligence officer, interviewed Hermann Göring at Nuremberg on 18 April 1946.

We got around to the subject of War again and I said that, contrary to his attitude, I did not think that the common people are very thankful for leaders who bring them war and destruction.

Göring shrugged :

« Why, of course, the people don't want War. Why would some poor slob on a farm want to risk his life in a War when the best that he can get-out of it is to come-back to his farm in one piece. Naturally, the common people don't want War ; neither in Russia nor in England nor in America, nor for that matter in Germany. That is understood. But, after all, it is the leaders of the country who determine the policy and it is always a simple matter to drag the people along, whether it is a democracy or a Fascist dictatorship or a Parliament or a Communist dictatorship. »

I pointed out :

« There is one difference. In a democracy, the people have some say in the matter through their elected representatives, and, in the United States, only Congress can declare wars. »

« Oh, that is all well and good, but, voice or no voice, the people can always be brought to the bidding of the leaders. That is easy. All you have to do is tell them they are being attacked and denounce the pacifists for lack of patriotism and exposing the country to danger. It works the same way in any country. »

(12) Edward Heath, The Course of My Life (1988) .

I looked towards the dock. In 2 rows, often they sat : Göring reduced to wearing a plain, ill-fitting grey uniform (no medals now) , alert and attentive, vigorously nodding his head in agreement or shaking it in denial ; Heß, with his pale pinched face ; von Ribbentrop, always busy writing notes ; Keitel and Jodi, the soldiers, staring silently and sullenly ahead ; Schacht, the businessman, whose relationship with the Nazis had been more turbulent, and who had distaste etched into his face at having to sit in public with such unpleasant people ; von Papen and von Neurath, politicians both but still the diplomats, polished and immaculate. These all stood-out. But how unimpressive were Seyß-Inquart, who had betrayed Austria and ruled occupied Holland ; Rosenberg and Fritsche, the propagandists ; and von Schirach, formerly a fanatical and dangerous young zealot, but now, a visibly broken man. For a time, the whole free world had quaked before these men. Ultimately, however, they had brought not glory, but ruin and misery, to their own land and its people. We had lived in their shadow for a decade, but now history was free to deliver a final verdict upon them.

When the Court adjourned for a quarter of an hour, I saw the Nazi leaders arguing heatedly among themselves about the evidence they had heard : evidence which had been gathered from every corner of Europe, from the Chancelleries and concentration camps, from the occupied countries and from Germany itself, of how the Nazis plunged the world into War, led Germany to its undoing and brought themselves, at last, into the dock in that Court House in Nuremberg.

Le « Berlin Staatsoper » d'Hermann Göring

La fin du XIXe et le début du XXe sont une période faste pour l'Opéra de Cour de l'État prussien, (« Hofoper ») . L'Orchestre de la « Staatskapelle » est notamment dirigé par Richard Strauß de 1899 à 1913. La tendance se poursuit après la Guerre de 1914, dans la salle qui prend enfin son nom actuel de « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » dans la décennie 1920, avec la venue de chefs aussi illustres que Wilhelm Furtwängler, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Otto Klemperer ou Erich Kleiber. Ce dernier est à la baguette lorsque la salle accueille la création mondiale de l'Opéra « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg en 1925.

Héritier de la tradition lyrique historique de Berlin, le « Staatsoper » , à 2 pas du Palais impérial, était l'Opéra de Cour de l'État prussien, (« Hofoper ») , avec l'Orchestre d'État, la « Staatskapelle » , il fut dirigé par les plus grands Richard Strauß, Leo Blech, Erich Kleiber, Clemens Krauß, Herbert von Karajan.

Quelques dates

Juin 1933 : Wilhelm Furtwängler est nommé par Hermann Göring chef-principal du « Staatsoper » de Berlin.

Octobre 1934 : Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la Tétralogie (« Ring ») de Wagner au « Staatsoper » de Berlin.

2 décembre 1934 : Lors d'une représentation de « Tristan und Isolde » de Wagner à la « Staatsoper » de Berlin, Wilhelm Furtwängler est applaudi pendant 25 minutes lors de son entrée dans la fosse d'orchestre, puis à chaque salut à la fin d'un Acte, en présence de Josef Gæbbels et de Hermann Göring.

4 décembre 1934 : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler se démet de toutes ses fonctions officielles (au « Berliner Philharmoniker », à la « Staatsoper » et à la « Reichsmusikkammer ») puis se retire dans les Alpes bavaroises.

21 octobre 1938 : Herbert von Karajan dirige l'Opéra « Tristan und Isolde » de Wagner, sans partition, au « Staatsoper » de Berlin.

22 octobre 1938 : Le critique musical Edwin van der Nüll publie dans le « Berliner Mittagszeitung » l'article « In der Staatsoper, das Wunder Karajan ». Wilhelm Furtwängler le perçoit comme une offense envers lui et s'en plaint à Josef Gebbels.

24 novembre 1938 : Le compositeur Werner Egk dirige la création de son Opéra « Peer Gynt » au « Staatsoper » de Berlin.

18 décembre 1938 : Herbert von Karajan dirige l'Opéra de « La Flûte enchantée » de Mozart au « Staatsoper » de Berlin.

21 octobre 1940 : Herbert von Karajan dirige la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin lors d'un concert symphonique à l'« Alte Philharmonie ».

24 mai 1941 : Tournée parisienne du « Staatsoper » de Berlin avec Herbert von Karajan.

12 décembre 1942 : Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige l'Opéra « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » de Wagner lors de la réouverture du Staatsoper de Berlin.

31 août 1944 : Johannes Schüller dirige « Le Nozze di Figaro » de Mozart au « Staatsoper » de Berlin. Il s'agit du dernier Opéra complet à être monté.

Par contre, l'Orchestre de la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin continuera à programmer des concerts symphoniques et des versions « concert » d'Opéras.

4-5 octobre 1944 : Herbert von Karajan dirige la 8e Symphonie de Anton Bruckner.

3 février 1945 : Le « Staatsoper » de Berlin est complètement détruit par les bombardements alliés.

Avec l'arrivée au pouvoir du 3e « Reich » en 1933, qui voit Hermann Göring prendre la tête de la salle du « Staatsoper » de Berlin, de nombreuses personnalités fuient la persécution nazie, y compris Otto Klemperer, Alexander von Zemlinsky, tous 2 d'origine juive, ainsi qu'Erich Kleiber, qui s'exile après que les Nazis se soulèvent contre la première mondiale de l'Opéra « Lulu » de Alban Berg en 1934, qu'ils qualifient d'« art dégénéré ». En revanche, Herbert von Karajan devient le directeur de l'Orchestre de 1941 à 1945. Pendant la Guerre, les bombardements détruiront la salle à 2 reprises : une 1re fois en 1941 ; une 2e fois en 1944. Les 2 fois, la salle reconstruite est inaugurée par une représentation des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » de Richard Wagner. Si la 1re fois, la salle est reconstruite dès l'année suivante, elle met beaucoup plus longtemps à se relever de sa 2e destruction, puisqu'il faut attendre 1955 pour que les travaux s'achèvent.

La « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » servait aux représentations officielles du 3e « Reich » . Désigné officiellement en tant que Théâtre national de Prusse (« preußisches Staatstheater ») , l'Opéra était sous l'autorité du Ministre Président de Prusse, en l'occurrence Hermann Göring. Les chanteurs, musiciens et dirigeants juifs furent démis de leur fonction et firent l'objet de persécutions.

La « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » fut touchée à 2 reprises lors de bombardements aériens durant la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Une 1re reconstruction eut même lieu alors que le conflit n'était pas encore achevé. L'architecte Richard Paulick fut chargé de restaurer fidèlement l'Opéra entre 1952 et 1955 et intégra dans la façade des éléments d'origine.

En 1925, le nom de l'Opéra changea en « Städtische Oper » (Opéra municipal) , avant que son nom ne redevienne « Deutsches Opernhaus » sous l'influence du ministre de la Propagande d'Hitler, Josef Gœbbels. L'Opéra fut finalement détruit le 23 novembre 1943.

The National-Socialists' « coordination » of culture may have allayed the Opera Houses' immediate financial concerns, but it gave new impetus to their artistic rivalry. In 1933, Prussian Minister President Hermann Göring assumed personal control of the former Court Opera (now, the Prussian « Staatsoper ») on « Unter den Linden » boulevard, while Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels adopted the « Deutsche Oper » and the Berlin Old « Philharmonie » as his pet national ensembles. Power struggles within the National-Socialist cultural bureaucracy breathed new life into old rivalries. Göring and administrators at the « Staatsoper » became ardent supporters of a young conductor named Herbert von Karajan, who first drew national attention in 1938 after being hailed as a musical « miracle » in the Berlin press. Karajan was built-up as a challenger to the mantle of Berlin Philharmonic's senior conductor, Wilhelm Furtwängler, as the city's outstanding musical talent. After 1945, both conductors came under public scrutiny for their close ties to the Nazi regime. If Karajan (who later succeeded Furtwängler on the podium of the Berlin Philharmonic) was long haunted by his Nazi Party membership, Furtwängler was more successful at styling himself as an apolitical, « good » German who had kept the humanist tradition of Mozart and Beethoven alive during the dark days of the 3rd « Reich » .

(Fred K. Prieberg. « Musik im NS-Staat » pages 238-266 ; Michæl H. Kater. « The Twisted Muse » , pages 56-61, 195-203.)

After 1945, Nazi cultural rivalries gave way to Berlin's division between East and West and the emerging tensions of the Cold War. Berlin's western Allies administered the Opera House in Charlottenburg - Ist revived as the « Staatsoper » (Municipal Opera) , then, renamed the « Deutsche Oper » (German Opera) in 1961 -, while the « Staatsoper » fell under Soviet jurisdiction. In the immediate post-War era, the Soviets attracted Berlin's best musical talent to their sector of occupation through the promise of extra food rations and other perks ; in 1947, they invited the renowned Austrian stage-director, Walter Felsenstein, to establish a 2nd Opera House, the Comic Opera (« Komische Oper Berlin ») , within their city sector as well. After the currency reform of 1948, Berlin's musical balance of power reversed, as the western Opera House, with the assistance of the new West German « Mark » , became the more lucrative site of employment for Berlin artists.

After the Nazis took power in early 1933, the Prussian State Theaters and Berlin's leading lyric theater (the « Staatsoper » : State Opera) fell under Hermann Göring's supervision. Furtwängler had signed a contract with the « Staatsoper » in the last days of the Weimar Republic and saw no reason why he should not honour it, since he felt Göring really had nothing to do with him. When Göring tried to void it because he wanted to give the Music Director's post to Fritz Busch, Furtwängler forced him to honour it and prevailed.

The Orchestras, including the Berlin Philharmonic, the « Städtische Oper » (Municipal Opera) , all the non-Prussian Theaters, and the media were taken-up by the Propaganda Minister, Josef Goebbels. For the rest of the 12 dark years that lay ahead, Germany's cultural life (especially Opera) would be a battle-ground on which these 2 men would fight bitterly for power, and the most important squabbling point was the Prussian State Theaters.

There always was a question as to which man really controlled them. Göring staked his claim by forming a Theater Committee within the Ministry of Culture, in March 1933. To head this Committee, he appointed Hans Hinkel who was State Commissar in the Ministry of Culture. This Committee nominally took charge of all the Theaters in the « Reich » except the Prussian State Theaters. This select group of Theaters included those in Berlin, and chief among them was the « Staatsoper » . These Theaters, Göring absorbed into his own domain at the Ministry of Interior where he was chief. All Göring really cared about, however, was the « Staatsoper » . Over at the Propaganda Ministry, Goebbels viewed these developments with dismay. Sharing was never one of Goebbels' virtues, and he was very disturbed at the thought that the most prestigious vessels of the performing arts in Germany belonged to his rival.

To redress this humiliating state of affairs, he formed the « Reichskulturkammer » (RKK) in November, which was intended to become an umbrella over the Ministry of Culture and the various departments within it that controlled the Prussian State Theaters. But Göring did not relinquish his control and shifted them from their former position as a sort of department within the Ministry of Interior into his own office, the Office of Minister President. Goebbels followed suit by serving notice to all other government ministries and their departments, in March 1934, that he, alone, was the highest-authority in the Prussian State Theaters. Göring retorted, NO ! He, alone, was the highest-authority in the Prussian State Theaters. What is more, the « Führer » backed him. Ultimately, Goebbels won, but it would be 1944 before he could claim a Pyrrhic and short-lived victory.

Furtwängler was now beholden to the 2 most powerful men in the 3rd « Reich » , but the idea never intimidated him, as both Goebbels and Göring were soon to learn. Whenever possible, he tried to exploit their enmity and use their common need for him to subvert their attempts to co-opt and destroy German musical culture.

The « Berliner Staatsoper Unter den Linden » has been known by that name or by simply « Lindenoper » or « Staatsoper » since 1918. The « Stadtische Oper » underwent several switches in names. It originally was called the « Deutsche Oper » (German Opera) . In 1925, it became the « Stadtische Oper » (Municipal Opera) . It went back to being called « Deutsche Oper » in 1933, the name it has at present.

Situated at the top of the boulevard « Unter den Linden » , the « Staatsoper » , or Prussian State Opera (also known as the « Linden-Oper ») , boasts a tradition dating back to 1742. In the early 1930's, the « Staatsoper » ranked among Berlin's most prestigious cultural showcases. Under the patronage of Prussian Prime Minister Hermann Göring, and fuelled by Göring's rivalry with Propaganda Minister Josef Goebbels, the « Staatsoper » served as a prominent back-drop for the Nazis' cultural and political agenda.

1933 marked a double anniversary year for one of Adolf Hitler's favourite composers, Richard Wagner (1813-1883) . Over 12 months, the « Staatsoper » , which enjoyed close artistic and organizational ties with the Wagner Festival in Bayreuth, achieved the near Olympian feat of producing all 13 of the composer's Operas. These performances featured many of the most celebrated Opera stars of the day, singers including Friedrich Schorr, Alexander Kipnis, Emanuel List, Marcel Noë, Charles Kullman, Delia Reinhardt and Tilly de Garmo, alongside conductors Erich Kleiber, Otto Klemperer, Leo Blech, and Fritz Zweig.

By the end of the 1933-1934 season, however, each of these singers, as well as Klemperer, Zweig and 22 other members of the « Staatsoper » community, from orchestra musicians to choristers to scene painters to the theatre's press-officer, had been dismissed. Exasperated by imposed repertoire restrictions, they were followed into exile by Erich Kleiber, and by Leo Blech, who, after over 30 years' service to the Opera House, was forced to flee Germany.

Most, but not all the « Staatsoper's » members escaped the horrors of the Holocaust and the War. Yet, the Nazis' racial persecution and the desecration of culture that took place both within the Opera House and on its very door-step, when students set fire to mountains of « degenerate » books on the « Opernplatz » (today's « Bebelplatz ») , shattered Berlin's once vibrant cultural « eco-system » . During the War, the « Staatsoper » itself was 1st damaged in 1941, then, destroyed by Allied bombing raids in 1945. Long before Hitler's demise, the once proud Opera House, and the culture for which it stood, had been reduced to rubble and ash.

In 1930, Erich Kleiber conducted the premiere of Darius Milhaud's Opera « Christophe Colomb » . However, in 1934, when the Symphonic Suite from Alban Berg's Opera « Lulu » was performed by Kleiber, the National-Socialists provoked a scandal and he was forced to go in exile.

During Nazi dictatorship, the building of the « Staatsoper » served for representation of State and National-Socialist Party. As Prussian State Theater, it was under authority of Prussian Ministry President Hermann Göring.

Jewish singers, musicians, directors and other staff were mobbed-out of the House, no more longer engaged and partly even murdered.

After Adolf Hitler's Nazi take-over, members of Jewish origin were dismissed from the Opera House. Many German musicians associated with the « Staatsoper » went into exile, including the conductors Kurt Adler, Otto Klemperer and Fritz Busch. During the 3rd « Reich » , Robert Heger, Herbert von Karajan and Johannes Schüller were chosen « Staatskapellmeisters » .

English mezzo-soprano Margery Booth made her professional debut at Queen's Hall, Wigan, on 4 October 1935. She then moved back to London, in 1936, to continue her career making irregular appearances at « Covent Garden » . Her professional career also blossomed with performances at the Bayreuth Festival and with the Berlin « Staatsoper » . She starred as Madalene in 1936 ; as Flosshilde in « Götterdämmerung » ; as the Shepherd boy in a recording of « Tosca » with Hildegard Ranczak, but was most famous for her portrayal as Carmen.

Her marriage to Doctor Egon Strohm, from a brewing family in the « Schwarzwald » (Black Forest) , took her back to Germany.

Her 1st meeting of with Adolf Hitler is thought to have been in 1933, when she was chosen to carry the Holy Grail in the spectacular Finale to the Wagner Opera « Parsifal » at Bayreuth. The « Führer » suddenly burst into her dressing-room and told her how elegant and lovely she was, and sent her the next day a basket of 200 red roses wrapped in a Swastika flag with a card signed : « Adolf » .

At the outbreak of World War II, she was singing at Hermann Göring's « Staatsoper » . The Nazis mistakenly trusted her, by allowing her to perform at the Stalag III-D Open Prison (« Freigegeben ») in Genshagen, near Berlin - a camp for potential recruits to the British Free Corps.

Booth mixed with the German top-brass while letting officers hide in her dress top-secret documents for MI9 (the British intelligence branch tasked with unmasking traitors) . She would announce to her audience « I'm Margery Booth from Wigan » . She was initially given personal assurances from Hitler and Josef Gœbbels that they would « deal with the matter personally » if she was insulted because of her British origin.

Ironically, the Opera singer's links to the Nazi regime were so well-known that she was accused of collaborating against Britain, and turning traitor against her country.

When her ties with Britain were discovered by the Nazis in early 1944, Miss Booth was arrested as a suspected spy, and tortured by the « Gestapo » . She kept silent, not revealing any information. She was eventually released, and she later escaped Berlin during an air-raid and making her way West by flying to Bavaria where she was picked-up by the advancing U.S. Army.

After the War, information she provided was used to convict both Lord Haw and John Amery, both of whom were hanged for treason. She, then, returned to London, but was professionally rejected as producers mistakenly concluded that she had been a Nazi, and was offered no work. She divorced her German husband and decided to emigrate in America. On her arrival in New York, she was referred to a doctor who diagnosed a terminal cancer. She died in obscurity in New York, in 1952, from complications due to cancer.

1942 : Bombing of the « Lindenoper » .

12 décembre 1942 : The Opera House re-opens with Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting a performance of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » by Richard Wagner.

18 February 1943 : Josef Goebbels pronounces his « Total War » speech at the « Berlin Sportpalast » . The « Staatsoper » is closed.

31 August 1944 : Johannes Schöler conducts « Le Nozze di Figaro » by Mozart. It is the last performance of a complete Opera at the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » . But the « Staatskapelle » continues to program Symphonic and Opera concerts.

4-5 October 1944 : Herbert von Karajan performs Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony at the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » with the « Staatskapelle » Orchestra.

3 February 1945 : The « Lindenoper » is, once again, destroyed by bombs ; damaging totally the ground-floor walls. The concerts are relocated to the « Admiralspalast » (today's « Metropoltheater ») and the « Schauspielhaus » .

18 February 1945 : Herbert von Karajan conducts at the « Beethoven-Saal » (near the destroyed « Alte Philharmonie ») his last Symphonic concert with the « Staatskapelle » Orchestra.

After the Second World War, the Opera House comes back to its original name : « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » , but the 2nd reconstruction (in freely adapted Baroque forms) will take a long time - only to be completed in 1955. It is inaugurated (again) with Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

From 1949, the company served as State Opera of the German Democratic Republic.

Towards the end of the 19th Century, the Berlin Court Opera House attained international fame through conductors such as Joseph Sucher, Felix von Weingartner and Karl Muck, and, in later years, Richard Strauß and Leo Blech. After the collapse of the German Empire in 1918, the Opera was renamed the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » and the « Königliche Kapelle » became the « Staatskapelle Berlin » . The 1920's saw Wilhelm Furtwängler, Erich Kleiber, Otto Klemperer, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Bruno Walter and many others at the conductor's stand.

In April 1928, having undergone a complete renovation with the introduction of a rotating stage, trap-room and wings, the « Linden-Oper » re-opened with a new production of « The Magic Flute » by Mozart. In the same year, Feodor Chaliapin and the Diaghilev Ballet gave guest-performances under conductor Ernest Ansermet.

After Adolf Hitler's seizure of power, all Jews were dismissed from the ensemble. Otto Klemperer, Fritz Busch and many top-soloists went into exile. During the 3rd « Reich » the chief-conductors were Robert Heger, Johannes Schüler and Herbert von Karajan. It was in 1944 under Karajan's « bâton » that the 1st stereo recording was made. The « Linden-Oper » had been increasingly devoted to contemporary composers since the end of the German Empire. In 1925, Alban Berg's Opera « Wozzek » was premiered by Erich Kleiber in the composer's presence. Kleiber also conducted the 1st performances of Darius Milhaud's « Christophe Colomb » , and the « Symphonic Suite » from Alban Berg's Opera « Lulu » , whereupon the Nazis provoked a scandal and Erich Kleiber was also forced into exile. 1938 saw the 1st performance of Werner Egk's Opera « Peer Gynt » , with the composer conducting.

During World War II, the Opera House was twice completely destroyed by allied bombing. Re-building was quick the 1st time, but the 2nd took much longer. Both times, 1942 and 1955, the « Deutsche Staatsoper Berlin » , as it was renamed in 1945, opened with Richard Wagner's Opera « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

During the 3rd « Reich » , members of Jewish origin were dismissed from the « Berlin Staatsoper » (Prussian State Opera) . Many German musicians associated with the Opera House went into exile, including conductors Otto Klemperer and Fritz Busch. During the 3rd « Reich » , Robert Heger, Herbert von Karajan (1939-1945) and Johannes Schüler were the « Staatskapellmeister » .

Adolf Hitler gave spoke in this building a number of times :

On 3 January 1935, he addressed the German Leadership beginning with a long version of the « Party narrative » , enumerated his own achievements, and then, ostensibly close to tears, confessed that he would not be able to continue the work of reconstructing Germany unless all of the leaders of the Party, the State and the « Wehrmacht » represented a single-unit devoted to no one else but him. As on the earlier occasion of the Otto Straßer crisis, Hitler had apparently publicly threatened to commit suicide. In any case, the speech accomplished its purpose, due in no small part to the fact that Hitler had placed the necessity for an « en bloc » (bold) effort within the context of the approaching Saar plebiscite. His performance was greeted with thunderous applause as Rudolf Heß, who chaired the rally, subsequently gave the floor to Hermann Göring, who (again, just as during the Straßer crisis) expressed the unanimity of all present in moving words. Particular emphasis was put on the fact that he was speaking as a « high-ranking National-Socialist leader and, at the same time, as a “ Reichswehr ” General and a Member of the “ Reich ” Cabinet » (thus, personifying the synthesis of all « German leaders » present) when he read his « Address of Gratitude and Devotion » :

« Adolf Hitler's birthday that year (1944) , his 55th, had the usual trappings and ceremonials. Josef Gœbbels had Berlin emblazoned with banners and a new slogan of resounding pathos :

“ Our walls broke, but our hearts didn't. ”

The State Opera House on “ Unter den Linden ” was festively decorated for the usual celebration, attended by dignitaries from State, Party, and “ Wehrmacht ”. Gœbbels portrayed Hitler's historic achievements. The Berlin Philharmonic, conducted by Hans Knappertsbusch, played Beethoven's “ Eroica ” Symphony. But the mood among the Nazi faithful at such events was contrived. Gœbbels was well-aware from reports from the regional Propaganda Offices that the popular mood was “ very critical and sceptical ”, and that “ the depression in the broad masses ” had reached “ worrying levels ”. »

« On the evening of 12 April 1945, the Berlin Philharmonic gave its last performance. Albert Speer, who organized it, had invited Grand Admiral Karl Dönitz and also Adolf Hitler's adjutant, Colonel Nicolaus von Below. The hall was properly lit for the occasion, despite the electricity cuts.

Below wrote :

“ The concert took us back to another world. ”

The programme included Beethoven's Violin Concerto, Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony (Albert Speer later claimed that this was his warning signal to the Orchestra to escape Berlin immediately after the performance to avoid being drafted into the “ Volkssturm ”) and the Finale to Richard Wagner's “ Götterdämmerung ”. Even if Wagner did not bring the audience back to present reality, the moment of escapism did not last long. It is said that, after the performance, the Nazi Party had organized Hitler Youth members to stand in uniform with baskets of cyanide capsules and offer them to members of the audience as they left. »

Musik im « Dritten Reich » - Der Dirigent von Hermann Görings Gnaden

Wie wird man ein Stardirigent ? « Dirigent lernen kann man nicht » , war die knappe Antwort, die der berühmte Berliner Kapellmeister Leo Blech einmal gab :

« Dirigent kann man nur werden. »

In diesem Satz steckt viel von der Bescheidenheit, die den Dirigenten von Weltformat auszeichnete - schließlich betonte Blech nicht seinen Fleiß, sondern die äußeren Umstände, die ihn in die höchsten Höhen einer einzigartigen Musikerkarriere getragen hatten.

Wie aber sah das Leben des Mannes aus, der einst zu den größten deutschen Dirigenten zählte, heute aber nahezu vollständig aus unserem kollektiven Gedächtnis verschwunden ist ? Wer waren die Menschen, die ihn förderten und feierten ? Wer die, die ihn schließlich behinderten und gar bedrohten ? Und wie schaffte er es als Jude, die Nazizeit in Deutschland zu überleben ?

Ein Musikgenie als Tuchhändler

Schon in seiner frühen Kindheit deutet einiges daraufhin, daß der 1871 in Aachen geborene Blech einmal ein großer Musiker werden könnte. Bereits als Siebenjähriger gab Blech Klavierkonzerte. Dem Vater, einem bodenständigen Pinsel- und Bürstenfabrikanten, kam das alles zunächst reichlich unheimlich vor. Er bestimmte, daß sein Sohn nach der Schule etwas Anständiges lernen solle - und so wird dem sensiblen Musikgenie eine kaufmännische Lehre als Tuchhändler aufgezwungen.

Noch als Achtzigjähriger erinnerte er sich mit Widerwillen an diese Zeit :

« Jeder Tag dem anderen scheußlich gleichend - das macht alt ! »

Vermutlich wäre seine Karriere an diesem Punkt bereits beendet gewesen, hätte er auf eine glückliche Fügung gewartet. Aber Blech nahm sein Leben in die Hand : Er rebellierte gegen seinen Vater, bis der sein Einverständnis für das Musikstudium an der Berliner Musikakademie gab. Von da an ging es in seinem Leben steil bergauf. Blech schrieb erfolgreich eigene Opern und bekam gut bezahlte Anstellungen : Kapellmeister am Deutschen Landestheater in Prag, dann an der Königlichen Hofoper Unter den Linden in Berlin. Kaiser Wilhelm II. war beeindruckt von dem jungen Aufsteiger, verlieh ihm sogar den Roten Adlerorden. 1913 wurde Blech zum Preußischen Generalmusikdirektor ernannt - vorläufiger Höhepunkt einer Bilderbuchkarriere.

Auch nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg (die Hofoper hieß inzwischen Staatsoper) blieb Blech mit einer kurzen Unterbrechung Unter den Linden. Das Publikum liebte ihn. Bei seinen Musikern war er zuweilen gefürchtet, denn sein Arbeitseifer verlangte jedem einzelnen viel Leistung ab. Wer nicht mitzog, wurde schon mal scharf kritisiert :

Als eine Hauptdarstellerin seiner Lieblingsoper Carmen einmal nicht ganz bei der Sache war, sagte Blech ihr ins Gesicht :

« Eine gute Carmen ist gut, eine schlechte Carmen ist schlecht. Aber gar keine Carmen ? »

Ihm selbst unterlief nur einmal ein Fehler :

In der Pause der Oper « Die Hugenotten » nahm Blech seinen Mantel und ging nach Hause - er hatte geglaubt, die Oper sei schon beendet.

Machtgerangel hinter den Kulissen

Als die Nationalsozialisten 1933 an die Macht gelangten, begann die schwerste Zeit in Blechs Leben. Mit der Verabschiedung des Berufsbeamtengesetzes und der Gründung der « Reichskulturkammer » wurden Juden systematisch aus deutschen Opernhäusern vertrieben. Die Nazis erklärten sie zu politischen Gegnern des Reichs und verfügten Berufsverbote.

Ein Eintrag aus seinem Tagebuch zeigt, wie es zu dieser Zeit in Blech aussah :

« Es ist das Schrecklichste von allem, sich vorwerfen zu müssen, geliebte Kinder erzeugt zu haben. Heute hatte ich zum ersten Mal den Gedanken, daß es für meine Kinder und meine Frau eine Erleichterung wäre, wenn ich, der Jude, nicht mehr lebte. »

Anders als die meisten seiner Kollegen hatte Blech vorerst großes Glück : Hermann Göring, der als preußischer Ministerpräsident auch über das Schicksal der jüdischen Musiker an der Berliner Staatsoper bestimmte, ließ Blech zunächst im Amt. Göring wollte die Oper zu einem Betrieb von internationalem Rang formen und damit seinem Konkurrenten Josef Goebbels, NS-Propagandaminister und Chef der « Reichskulturkammer » , Paroli bieten. Dafür allerdings brauchte Göring überragende Musiker ; seine Judenfeindschaft stellte er dafür hintan. So ist der Fall Blech ein Beleg dafür, daß in der Kulturpolitik der Nazis im Ausnahmefall auch nach Zweckmäßigkeit entschieden wurde.

In den nächsten vier Jahren wurde es um Leo Blech jedoch einsam. Seine Auftritte wurden rar, die Kinder emigrierten in die USA und nach Schweden. 1937 schließlich entließen die Nationalsozialisten den berühmten Dirigenten. Offiziell berichteten deutsche Zeitungen zunächst von einem Krankenurlaub, dann vom Ruhestand des inzwischen 66-jährigen Künstlers. Wer die unzensurierte Presse im Ausland lesen kann, erfuhr dagegen vom Mächtigegeangel hinter den Berliner Kulissen : Im April 1937 war Göring in den Urlaub nach Neapel gefahren. Die Abwesenheit des prominenten Fürsprechers von Blech nutzen Mitarbeiter der « Reichskulturkammer » , um die Vertreibung des unliebsamen Dirigenten durchzusetzen. Der Intendant der Oper und einstige Unterstützer Blechs, Heinz Tietjen, « verständigt » sich auf Druck von oben mit dem Unerwünschten - Blech mußte gehen.

Blech floh nach Riga. Auch hier feierte er Publikumserfolge, aber seit der Eroberung Lettlands 1941 waren die Nazis ihm wieder auf der Spur. Als er von den Deportationen in Ghettos erfährt, fragt er :

« Kann ich meinen Flügel mitnehmen ? »

Doch schnell begreift er das Ausmaß der Bedrohung und flieht mit seiner Frau - zurück in das Gebäude der Berliner

Staatsoper. Dort hilft Tietjen den Verzweifelten bei der Flucht nach Stockholm. Leo Blech, seine Frau und seine Kinder überleben die Jahre der Vernichtung.

Le « Deutsche Oper Berlin » de Josef Gœbbels

With the Nazi « Machtergreifung » in 1933, the « Berlin Städtische Oper » (Municipal Opera) was under control of the « Reich » Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda. Minister Josef Gœbbels had the name changed-back to « Deutsches Opernhaus », competing with the Prussian State Opera (« Berlin Staatsoper in Mitte ») controlled by his rival, the Prussian minister-president Hermann Göring. In 1935, the building was re-modeled by Paul Baumgarten and the seating reduced from 2,300 to 2,098 due to the construction of the « Führerloge ». Carl Ebert, the pre-World War II general-manager, chose to emigrate from Germany rather than endorse the Nazi view of music, and went on to co-found the Glyndebourne Opera Festival, in England. He was replaced by Max von Schillings, who acceded to enact works of « unalloyed German character ». Several artists, like the conductor Fritz Stiedry or the singer Alexander Kipnis followed Ebert into emigration. The Opera House was destroyed by a Royal Air Force air-raid on 23 November 1943. Performances continued at the « Admiralspalast in Mitte » until 1945. Ebert returned as general-manager after the War.

General Managers (« Intendanten ») during the Nazi period : Max von Schillings (1933) ; Wilhelm Rode (1934-1943) ; Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (1943-1944) .

...

Concerts at halls such as the Berlin Opera House became major Party events. Senior Nazi functionaries were all but required to attend and there was a very good chance that the music on offer was composed by Richard Wagner.

...

During the period of Nazi Germany, the Opera House was renamed « Deutsches Opernhaus » by Josef Gœbbels, the « Reich » Minister of Propaganda. This period saw the defection of the general-manager of the « Deutsches Opernhaus » and several artists who emigrated rather than endorse the Nazi view of « German only » music. The Opera House was destroyed during a British air-raid on 23 November 1943.

...

It seems that the Munich Opera House was pretty much left alone by the Nazis. Once Jewish staff and artists had been evicted early in 1933, the Theatre suffered less interference than most others. It was never obliged to fly a swastika flag on the roof, or to engage in other acts of propaganda.

But when the young Georg Solti was appointed music-director of the Bavarian Opera House in 1946, he reported that the Orchestra was :

« Full of Nazis, of the worst kind ! »

(Adolf Hitler did plan to replace the historic building of the Munich Opera House with a more grandiose model.)

...

In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus ging 1934 das in Deutsches Opernhaus rückbenannte Charlottenburger Haus in den Besitz des Reiches über und unterstand damit dem Propagandaministerium von Josef Gœbbels. Als Ministerpräsident des Freistaats Preußen lenkte dagegen Hermann Göring die Staatsoper Unter den Linden, wobei die Häuser manchmal in Stellvertretung ihrer Dienstherrn rivalisierten. Unter der Leitung von Paul Baumgarten wurde 1935 ein Umbau auf 2.098 Sitzplätze durchgeführt und entgegen dem ursprünglichen Entwurf mit einem standesunabhängigen Zuschauerraum eine « Führerloge » geschaffen. Nach der Zerstörung des Hauses am 23. November 1943 fanden die Vorstellungen bis Herbst 1944 im Admiralspalast in Berlin-Mitte statt.

Während der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus galt das Deutsche Opernhaus neben dem Bayreuther Festspielhaus als die Repräsentationsbühne des Nazi-Regimes schlechthin.

Schon im Frühjahr 1933 zum Geburtstag des Intendanten Max von Schillings, hieß es in den Opernheften :

« Wir könnten einpacken, wenn es nicht möglich sein sollte, an einer Stätte, wo es gelang, einem empfangsbereiten, beeinflussbaren bürgerlichen Publikum Erzeugnisse des artfremdesten Kunstbolschewismus schmackhaft zu machen, jetzt wieder Werte reinerer, deutscher Wesensart einzubürgern. »

In diesem Geiste waren schon der langjährige Intendant Carl Ebert, die Dirigenten Fritz Stiedry und Paul Breisach, und zum Beispiel der Sänger Alexander Kipnis vom Haus vertrieben worden. Nach dem Tod von Schillings im Juli 1933 wurde Wilhelm Rode, Heldenbariton des Hauses seit 1926, dessen Nachfolger. Man spielte « genehme Werke », also Richard Wagner, Albert Lortzing, Wilhelm Kienzl und so weiter. Zeitgenössische Komponisten wie Kurt Weill oder « artfremde » wie Jacques Offenbach und Giacomo Meyerbeer waren nicht mehr « gefragt » .

Inszenierungen waren schon an sich verdächtig - es gab Dramaturgie und Arrangements. Für die Ausstattung war vielfach Benno von Arent verantwortlich. Dabei ging es um Naturtreue bis ins kleinste Blatt aus Pappe. Hans Sachs sang unter Butzenscheiben und die Festwiese der Meistersinger kam direkt aus einem Film von Leni Riefenstahl. Siegfried ritt zu Pferd heran, auf seinem Schild die (S)S-Rune. Immerhin ging man mit einer Traviata 1935 auch auf dem Weg des Regietheaters zaghaft weiter.

Mitten im Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde der Intendant Rode im Sommer 1943 von dem erfolgreichen Hamburger Dirigenten

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt abgelöst. Mit Günther Rennert und Leopold Ludwig holte er sich zwei junge Künstler in sein Leitungsteam, die schon auf den künstlerischen Aufbruch des Nachkriegstheaters verweisen. Ihre Arbeit fand in den zunehmenden Wirren und Zerstörungen des Krieges allerdings kaum noch Resonanz. Così fan tutte war im Herbst 1943 die erste Rennert-Regie - sie wurde als « leicht, witzig, phantasievoll » bewertet. Zwei Wochen später, am 23. November 1943, wurde das Haus zerbombt, kurz danach wurden alle Theater vom Regime geschlossen.

...

« Der Minister war ungehalten. Theaterfragen. Wir verlieren zu viel Kräfte an Staatsoper », notierte Josef Goebbels am 9. Juni 1936 in sein Tagebuch :

« Müßen uns mehr heranhalten ! »

Adolf Hitlers Propagandist erschien das Problem so gravierend, daß er sich persönlich einschaltete :

« Fräulein Deinert wieder für Deutsches Opernhaus zurückgewonnen. Rode muß mehr aufpassen. »

Womit Goebbels die seinerzeit gefeierte Tänzerin Ursula Deinert zum Wechsel zurück an das Deutsche Opernhaus in Charlottenburg bewegte, verraten seine fast täglichen Notizen nicht. Wohl aber muß er mit dem Einsatz von Wilhelm Rode, dem Generalintendanten der gemessen an der Zuschauerzahl größten deutschen Opernbühne, unzufrieden gewesen sein.

Ausgerechnet Goebbels mußte sich also bemühen, eine Künstlerin von der Staatsoper Unter den Linden zurück zu gewinnen für das Deutsche Opernhaus, die heutige Deutsche Oper. Dabei war er doch über die seinem Ministerium angegliederte Reichskulturkammer sowie die ihr unterstellten Kammern für Musiker, Schriftsteller, Journalisten und Schauspieler gewissermaßen oberster Vorgesetzter aller deutschen Kulturschaffenden.

Machtkampf um Adolf Hitlers Gunst

Doch so sehr er auch im Film- und Pressewesen weitgehend frei schalten konnte, mit etwas Rücksicht auf den Reichskanzler Adolf Hitler auch bei den bildenden Künsten mit Ausnahme der Architektur : Auf dem Gebiet des Musiktheaters, der Oper also, hatte Goebbels bis zum Zweiten Weltkrieg einen zähen Widersacher. Jedenfalls in Berlin. Zur Festsitzung der Reichskulturkammer am 1. Mai 1938 hat Propagandaminister Josef Goebbels den « Führer und Reichskanzler » in das Deutsche Opernhaus eingeladen. Außerdem in der erst 1936 eingebauten Ehrenloge (von links) : Goebbels' Staatssekretär Karl Hanke, Reichswirtschaftsminister Walther Funk und NSDAP-Reichsorganisationsleiter Robert Ley

Denn die Staatsoper Unter den Linden, gegründet und groß geworden als Hofoper der Hohenzollern-Monarchie, unterstand nicht dem Propagandaministerium. Die Verantwortung für das traditionsreichste Berliner Musiktheater lag beim Land Preußen - und damit bei Hermann Göring. Der zweite Mann des Dritten Reiches, der 1933 bis 1945 neben vielen anderen Funktionen auch als Preußischer Ministerpräsident amtierte, nutzte diese mehr zufällige Zuständigkeit weidlich aus, seinem wichtigsten Konkurrenten um die Gunst Hitlers immer wieder eins auszuwischen.

Göebbels hatte sich noch 1933 über den Durchgriff des Reiches auf kommunale Institutionen die direkte Einflußnahme auf die erst 1912 gegründete, vormals Städtische Oper gesichert. Das war besonders wichtig, denn Hitlers einziges nennenswertes kulturelles Interesse neben der Architektur war die Oper. Zu Richard Wagner Schwiegertochter Winifred soll er sogar einmal gesagt haben, wie sehr ihn eine Aufführung von Wagners Frühwerk « Rienzi » in Linz geprägt habe :

« In jener Stunde begann es. »

Da die Gunst des « Führers » auch für seine engsten Gefolgsleute extrem wichtig war, setzten sowohl Göring wie Göebbels darauf, Hitlers Vorstellung von gelungenem Musiktheater möglichst gut umzusetzen. In den Tagebüchern des Propagandaministers, eher einer Materialsammlung für aktuelle Propagandabotschaften und künftige Memoiren als ehrlich reflektierten Aufzeichnungen, finden sich zahlreiche Spuren dieser Konkurrenz.

Göebbels' Häme über die Staatsoper

Auffallend oft notierte er selbst zu in den gleichgeschalteten Zeitungen gefeierten Aufführungen in Görings Haus Unter den Linden hämische Anmerkungen. Über Abende in « seinem » Opernhaus an der Bismarckstraße dagegen findet man eher ausnahmsweise und meistens nur sanfte Selbstkritik.

Zu einem « Tristan » in der Staatsoper kurz vor Weihnachten 1933 etwa hielt Göebbels fest :

« Furtwängler ist ganz groß und gewaltig in der Ausdeutung dieser so sinnlichen Partitur. Die Sänger : Leider und Melchior schon ziemlich ausgesungen. »

Die Inszenierung habe « zu stumpfe Farben » und sei « noch typisch jüdisch » . Fast hämisch heißt es über Richard Strauß' « Intermezzo » am 21. Mai 1934 :

« Banal, trivial und geschmacklos. Ein schwerer Schlag daneben. Wir sind sehr enttäuscht. »

Immer wieder kritisierte Göebbels angeblich schlechte Bühnenbilder im Haus Unter den Linden und mangelhafte Organisation. Es gehe « drunter und drüber » , die « Eifersüchteleien der Staatsoper » machten « große Schwierigkeiten » . Am 23. Mai 1939 hielt er fest, die Sopranistin Käthe Heidersbach beklage sich, « daß sie so wenig zum Singen kommt » .

Sogar etwas Bedauern schwang offenbar mit, als Göebbels hinzusetzte :

« Das ist das System der Staatsoper. Daran kann ich auch nicht viel ändern. »

Ähnlich negative Bemerkungen zum Deutschen Opernhaus finden sich in den rund 30 Bänden der Goebbels-Tagebücher nur selten. Meistens überschlug sich der Propagandaminister mit seiner Begeisterung. Etwa am 15. September 1934 :

« Abends Deutsches Opernhaus. “ Tannhäuser ”. Guter Start. Glänzende Stimmen, wunderbare Dekorationen, ein gutgeleitetes Orchester. Ganz großes Publikum, fast alle Minister und Diplomaten, der Führer in der Mitte. Er ist ganz angetan von der Aufführung. »

Am 31. Januar 1935 lobte er sich selbst :

« Abends mit Führer Tristan Deutsches Opernhaus. Meine Regieanweisungen sind durchgeführt. Es ist eine wunderbare Aufführung. Szenisch und musikalisch. Führer begeistert. »

Über « La Traviata » heißt es :

« Glänzende Inszenierung. Farbenprächtig ! Und diese wunderbaren Stimmen, diese herrliche Musik. Ich bin davon ganz berauscht. Ich schwelge. »

NS-typische Vetternwirtschaft

Als aber die für das Dritte Reich typische Vetternwirtschaft die Qualität an der Bismarckstraße zu beeinträchtigen begann, schritt Goebbels ein :

« Krach im Deutschen Opernhaus. Die alten Parteigenossen, die nicht singen können, beschwerten sich bei Bouhler, weil sie keine Hauptrollen bekommen » , notierte er am 7. April 1938. Auf den Chef von Hitlers Privatkanzlei Philip Bouhler mußte der Propagandaminister keine Rücksicht nehmen, anders als bei Göring :

« Nun fahre ich aber dazwischen ! »

Immer noch interessierte sich Goebbels besonders für « seine » Oper, nahm wichtige Fragen selbst in die Hand - etwa Ende August 1938 :

« Gegen Rode im Deutschen Opernhaus werden schwere Vorwürfe erhoben. Aber das sind alles die alten Sachen. Ich werde sie nochmals nachprüfen lassen, dann aber Rode auch unter meinen Schutz stellen. Sonst kann er sein Haus nicht mehr leiten. »

Der Heldenbariton Wilhelm Rode, seit 1933 Mitglied der NSDAP, leitete das Haus noch weitere fünf Jahre.

Auch Göring nutzte seine Stellung aus, um persönliche Gunstbeweise zu erteilen, manchmal sogar gegen die Parteilinie. Die Biografen des Nazi-Multifunktionärs sind sich nicht einig darüber, ob es ihm lediglich darum ging, so seine Machtfülle unter Beweis zu stellen - oder ob ihn manche Auswüchse des nationalsozialistischen Rassenwahns wenigstens zeitweise tatsächlich störten.

Jedenfalls erwirkte er für den Generalmusikdirektor der Staatsoper Leo Blech, nach Nazi- « Rassekriterien » ein « Volljude » und deshalb eigentlich laut dem « Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums » schon 1933 zu entlassen, eine Ausnahmegenehmigung. Erst 1937 wurde der Druck auf Blech zu stark, er emigrierte nach Riga, später nach Schweden. Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg kehrte er zurück nach Berlin, an die Deutsche Oper, die das Haus an der Bismarckstraße fortan hieß.

Der Ärger mit dem Generalintendanten

Ebenfalls unter Görings Schutz stand Heinz Tietjen, der Generalintendant der Staatsoper und aller preußischen Staatstheater. Obwohl Gœbbels offenkundig oft Schwierigkeiten mit dem Leiter auch der Bayreuther Festspiele hatte, konnte der Propagandaminister nichts gegen ihn unternehmen. Der Ärger darüber schlug sich im Tagebuch nieder. « Tietjen ist doch kein Dirigent, sondern nur ein Organisator und höchstens noch ein Schleicher » , notierte er etwa am 23. Oktober 1937, zehn Tage später sogar :

« Tietjen ist ein hinterlistiger Intrigant. »

Doch absetzen konnte Gœbbels ihn nicht - also fand er sich mit Görings Günstling ab.

Die Konkurrenz der beiden Berliner Opern nahm zu Beginn des Zweiten Weltkrieges ab : Sowohl Gœbbels wie Göring hatten nun anderes zu tun als ihre Konkurrenz auf dem Nebenschauplatz Musiktheater auszutragen. Zu Ende ging sie aber erst, als die Staatsoper als erstes kulturell bedeutendes Gebäude bei einem britischen Bombenangriff im April 1941 zerstört wurde. « Ich sehe mir den Schaden in der Staatsoper an. Sie ist verloren. Der ganze Innenraum restlos ausgebrannt. Da ist kaum noch etwas zu retten » , notierte er :

« Ich muntere die Leute von der Staatsoper etwas auf, obschon mir selbst angesichts dieser rauchenden Trümmer sehr schwer ums Herz ist. Wie viele schöne Stunden habe ich nicht schon in diesem Haus erlebt. Und jetzt diese Ruine. »

Vielleicht war das sogar eine ehrliche Empfindung - aber sicher kann man bei Josef Gœbbels nie sein. Als das Deutsche Opernhaus zweieinhalb Jahre später, während der « Luftschlacht um Berlin » Ende November 1943, ebenfalls zerstört wurde, war ihm das kaum mehr einen Satz in seinen nun diktierten Tagebüchern wert.

Les 2 maisons d'Opéra de Berlin (1933-1939)

Whatever the political struggles or administrative squabbles, both Opera Houses (the Berlin « Staatsoper » and the « Deutsche Oper ») continued without interruption to carry-out their primary function : the performance of Opera. To assess the role of the Houses as performing institutions, we must examine (1) political controls by the Reich bureaucracy ; (2) the repertory ; (3) the artists ; (4) propaganda.

The Nazi regime exercised its political controls through the « Theaterabteilung » of the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda ». Authority lay, above all, in the hands of Rainer Schlöber, the « Reichsdramaturg ». He had the power to decide whether given works could be performed or not, and he approved the repertoires for all German theatres. He did not have complete power over the State Opera because of Hermann Göring's special position ; nonetheless, Schlöber could forbid performances of certain works, and the State Opera complied with the requirement to submit performance schedules to him. He also participated in the detailed repertory planning of the « Deutsche Oper » under the supervision of Josef Gæbbels.

By contrast with the pseudo-legal nature of Schlöber's authority, arbitrary political interference was a constant factor. One of the conductors engaged by the « Deutsche Oper » in 1935 was Walter Lutze, a man trained in the provinces but without the qualifications for a position in Berlin. Lutze was the brother of Viktor Lutze, Chief of staff of the SA after the purge of 30 June 1934. Wilhelm Rode attempted without success to cancel his contract or have him transferred to another Opera House. It was only in 1944 that Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt, Rode's successor, finally managed to get rid of him. Similarly, Rode was unable to avoid the employment of Benno von Arent as stage-designer. In this case, von Arent's appointment as « Reichsbühnenbildner » came directly from Hitler. Rode compiled evidence of von Arent's late preparation of designs, arbitrariness, and other complaints, without results. The dominant characteristic of the repertoires of the 2 Houses under Nazi control was continuity with what had been played before 1933. What was lost, of course, was the stimulation and excitement of the innovations that had characterized the best work from the 1910's. Operas from those years had not often had the chance of entering the permanent repertory, and they had already begun to disappear with the impact of the depression. Still, they represented political targets for attacks on the decadence of the so-called « Systemzeit ». As a start, « undesirable works » by composers such as Kurt Weill, Arnold Schönberg and Alban Berg quickly disappeared as did, also, those of earlier composers including Giacomo Meyerbeer and Jacques Offenbach. In terms of number of performances, Offenbach was probably the loss most acutely felt by German audiences. Offenbach's gradual disappearance indicates that, in some cases, works by an undesirable composer might continue to be performed for 1 year after the Nazis took-over. Apart from cases such as these, Operatic performance practices represented a statement of continuity in the tradition which carried over from Republic to the Nazi dictatorship.

Above all, Schlöber and musical ideologists fostered the idea of a « Deutscher Spielplan ». In terms of musical ideology and also of the « Führer's » preferences, Richard Wagner provided a definitive statement in his works about what was desirable. Given this fact, it is instructive to trace the number of performances of his works on all German stages starting with 1932-1933, the season which commemorated the 50th anniversary of his death. For comparison, figures are provided for the other most-performed composers.

Richard Wagner : 1,837 ; 1,632 ; 1,641 ; 1,607 ; 1,409 ; 1,402 ; 1,327 ; 1,154.

Giuseppe Verdi : 1,265 ; 1,280 ; 1,468 ; 1,497 ; 1,351 ; 1,405 ; 1,309 ; 1,440.

Giacomo Puccini : 762 ; 817 ; 889 ; 1,082 ; 1,186 ; 919 ; 1,013 ; 971.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart : 719 ; 1,096 ; 1,067 ; 916 ; 960 ; 632 ; 734 ; 643.

Albert Lortzing : 691 ; 531 ; 707 ; 851 ; 995 ; 951 ; 1,027 ; 1,140.

The statistics of both houses reflect and reinforce this national decline of attention to Wagner. Performance figures for the 2 are as follows :

1934-1935 ; 1936-1937 ; 1938-1939 ; 1939-1940.

« Deutsche Oper » : 50 ; 49 ; 42 ; 35.

Apart from Wagner, the 2 Opera Houses differed from each other in some minor particulars. Both emphasized the main-works from the late 19th Century, Verdi and Puccini above all ; they included Mozart, some works by Richard Strauß, and Georges Bizet's one standard work, « Carmen » . Beyond this, a few differences emerge. Much more than the State Opera, the « Deutsche Oper » emphasized the pre-Wagner, 19th Century German tradition of « Spieloper » , especially works by Heinrich Marschner and Albert Lortzing. The « Deutsche Oper » also produced several Operettas by Johann Strauß II, Franz Lehár, and Paul Lincke. For its part, the State Opera produced more Mozart and Richard Strauß. If one pole of musicological ideology emphasized the great Masterpieces of the past appropriately performed, the other stressed the production of new works reflecting the creative vitality of the repertory. Of the older generation of composers, Richard Strauß was the most widely-known ; he continued to compose new Operas, and they were performed, with the notable exception of « Die Schweigsame Frau » (The Silent Woman) ; whose librettist, Stefan Zweig, was Jewish. The State Opera presented all of his works except this one, which was only allowed a few performances in Dřeň in 1935.

As a result of the « scandal » caused by Strauß indiscretion in his letter to his librettist (letter intercepted by the « Gestapo » and sent to Adolf Hitler) , he was forced to resign from the presidency of the « Reichsmusikkammer » .

« Do you believe I am ever, in any of my actions, guided by the thought that I am “ German ” ? Do you suppose Mozart was consciously “ Aryan ” when he composed ? I recognize only 2 types of people : those who have talent and those who have none. »

(Letter from Richard Strauß to Stefan Zweig, dated 17 June 1935.)

With « Die Schweigsame Frau » , the State Opera might have been taking some slight risk. The « Deutsche Oper » also presented a few Strauß Operas, but they were from an earlier era (« Salome » , « Der Rosenkavalier » , and « Ariadne auf Naxos ») . This smaller number was mainly due to the fact that the State Opera held exclusive performing rights to most works by Strauß. The other widely-known older composer was Hans Pfitzner. A musical and political conservative, Pfitzner was, nonetheless, not at ease with the Nazis. The State Opera presented his works in very limited numbers, but the « Deutsche Oper » played none of them up to 1939. The basis for this was apparently conductor Wilhelm Rode's personal distaste for Pfitzner.

The « Deutsche Oper » did perform some new works : the Operetta « Wenn die Zarin lächelt » by Clemens Schmalstich, and the Opera « Katarina » by Arthur Kusterer along with the 1st German performances of « Adriana Lecouvreur » by Francesco Cilea. But Rode managed to avoid works by Max von Schillings, his predecessor in office, with but one exception, « Der Moloch » , and that was a failure. Heinz Tietjen was much more adept politically ; he periodically included a few performances of a work by Pfitzner or von Schillings, with appropriate publicity, then, let them disappear again. He commissioned Paul von Klenau, a Danish composer living in Germany, to write a new work, « Rembrandt van Rijn » which was given 7 times during the 1936-1937 season, and once in each of the 2 following seasons before vanishing. More significantly, Tietjen brought the young Bavarian composer Werner Egk to the State Opera as a conductor, and commissioned a new work from him after the success of « Die Zaubergeige » . Egk then composed « Peer Gynt » , which aroused much controversy. Critics found it too reminiscent of the bad old Weimar days, with its syncopation and jazz elements. Hitler, however, found it acceptable, and the State Opera took it to the annual showcase for contemporary works in Düsseldorf.

« Peer Gynt » was, in all likelihood, as much a popular success as any other serious Opera composed during the Nazi period. Certainly, it left much to be desired in the minds of many orthodox musicologists. What is clear from the episode is that, during the years of peace, the regime was willing to tolerate some little leeway, although composers and performers were hard pressed to know just where the outer-limits of this freedom might lie. With the start of the War, the lines of demarcation became narrower. Solo performers, singers who survived the transition to Nazi rule and then continued their careers, found themselves operating under controls different from those they had known before. Time and again, leaders of the regime emphasized the pre-eminence of artistic ability.

« Art comes from ability not from aspiration. » (Josef Goebbels)

« Performance is and always remains decisive. » (Hermann Göring)

Although it must be in agreement with the political tendency of the Werner Egk and Paul von Klenau beliefs. Given the close connection between the « Reich » Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda and the « Deutsche Oper » , Rode had to accept singers under this programme. So far as existing records indicate, the State Opera was able to avoid it. Rode had difficulties with 2 sopranos : Margaret Sattler-Schreiber and Violetta Schadow. When he did not schedule them to sing in major roles, they complained to Goebbels, « Frau » Magda Goebbels, Deputy « Führer » Rudolf Heß, and Adolf Hitler, then, brought a law suit against him. Goebbels decided squarely in favour of musical ability over Party loyalty. The singers were dismissed.

The regime spoke with pride of the ensemble system, as opposed to the undesirable Weimar principle of the « Starkult » . Retired singers including Erna Berger and Irma Beilke recall the system with pride as a source of dramatic and musical excellence, since it allowed roles and productions to be refined through repeated performances with the same casts. Yet, the greatest rewards (salary and recognition) continued to go to solo singers whom the regime and the public favoured. Max Lorenz at the State Opera received 60,000 « Reichsmarks » annually by the end of the 1930's, despite his « Sondergenehmigung » (Special Permission) - Hitler protected him. Helge Roswaenge, the Danish tenor, also at the « Deutsche Oper » , negotiated a 10 year contract at 100,000 « Reichsmarks » per year, tax-free, in 1938. This escalation of salaries continued during the War, until Goebbels finally managed to implement a policy imposing limits in 1943.

Whatever the material advantages for some performers, clearly there were many restrictions. Theatre managers all over Germany agreed in 1937 to refuse to allow singers to move from one Opera House to another without agreement of both the old and new managers. The purpose was to prevent them from bidding-up their prices. When asked about the musical restrictions under which they worked, one former singer replied that, even if one could not perform the works of some composers, great variety and richness still remained. The ravages of the War placed the entire period in a different perspective for performers, yet, some recall with some honesty that the regime had allowed them to make good careers ; there were positive incentives for singers.

For all its interest in a German-dominated « Spielplan » , the regime also wanted to demonstrate the international calibre of its cultural activity. « Kulturpolitik » grew in importance as foreign relations came to the centre of government activity from about 1935 on. During the period of rapprochement with Poland, the « Staatsoper » offered a major production of « Halka » by Stanisław Moniuszko (Stanisława Moniuszki) , a 19th Century work that epitomizes the traditions of Polish national Opera. The work had been play at Ist in Hamburg, and was certainly planned before the Nazi take-over. The regime even made constructive propaganda out of this production, and the Polish ambassador tended with other foreign guests. On the occasion of an official visit to Berlin by Admiral Miklós Horthy de Nagybánya, head of the Hungarian government, in August 1938, the « Staatsoper » mounted a festival production of Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » in advance of the regular season. Costs were covered by Hitler's « Reich » Chancellery and the Foreign Ministry. The strongest link between Opera and diplomacy paralleled Germany's growing ties with Italy. During 1937, the entire La Scala company of Milan came to the « Deutsche Oper » « in the interest of the cultural exchange between German and Italy » ; while the Bavarian State Opera from Munich and conductor Clemens Krauß took their « Ring » Cycle production to La Scala. This linkage climaxed in March and April of 1941 when the « Staatsoper » went to Rome, followed by a visit of the « Teatro Reale » of Madrid to Berlin. The War years saw a heavy investment of funds by the « Reich » Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda in sending musicians along behind the « Wehrmacht » to demonstrate the cultural greatness of the 3rd « Reich » to allied and conquered peoples alike. For domestic reasons as well as international ones, Opera served propaganda purposes. These covered a wide-range of events ; a few singers might be on hand for Arias or Lieder ; an Orchestra might perform an Overture (often from « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg ») , or a movement from a Symphony by Beethoven or Anton Bruckner. Here, the function was to establish an appropriate atmosphere for a meeting of the « Reichskulturkammer » , for example, or on « Heldengedenktag » (Heroes' Memorial Day) . For the 1936 Olympic Games in Berlin, both Opera Houses presented special performances during their usual summer holiday periods. This list can be readily extended to include a visit to the « Staatsoper » by Adolf Hitler and his immediate entourage on the evening of 21 March 1933, after the ritual events of Potsdam during the day, or the wedding celebration of « Reich » Marshal Hermann Göring and Emmy Sonnemann at the State Opera, on 10 April 1935.

Given the importance of propaganda to the regime and the excellent uses of it which Josef Goebbels and his staff devised, one is tempted to conclude that Opera, like film or radio, represented no more than another of his tools. But such a conclusion would be an over-simplification, even if one concedes all the uses to which Opera was put. Certainly, it did serve propaganda goals ; that much is clear. It is also true, as Joseph Wulf says in his « Musik im Dritten Reich » , that the basis had earlier been laid, that music was easily adapted to Nazi purposes. The State had all the advantages in this confrontation between art and politics, since it held full-control of political power.

At least during peace time, the regime was willing to tolerate some slight degree of artistic deviation from strict principles of musical purity - the cases of von Klenau and Egk bear this out. It is also possible that the cultural watch-dogs did not always fully-comprehend the subversions which a composer or performer might introduce with great subtlety. A certain degree of « Narrenfreiheit » could be allowed to performers, since their authority and influence stopped at the footlights. And the regime was generous economically with performers, including even a few Jewish ones. Good opportunities for careers were available, if performers were willing to accept some limitations on their free-doing, many were willing. With time, such tactics might have won loyalty to the regime from composers and performers, as well as from audiences. Differences between the situations of the 2 Berlin Opera Houses illustrate the fact that a degree of leeway did exist (« leeway » seems a better choice than « freedom ») . The long-standing rivalry between Goebbels and Göring undoubtedly made this situation possible. The « Staatsoper » had some slight measure of security from the « Reich » Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda controls because of Göring's jealous shepherding of « his » State Theaters. For the « Deutsche Oper » , the benefit from this rivalry was financial in part : higher-salaries and more jobs. Heinz Tietjen had the luxury of financial support from the Prussian bureaucracy, rather than having to answer to « Reich » officials. On balance, it seems that Tietjen may also have taken a few more risks with his « Spielplan » than did Rode ; but he was also more politic in catering to official tastes than Rode. There remains the question of whether political power was adequate to the task of controlling cultural expression to the extent which the regime desired. It was only with the outbreak of the War that the State's assumptions about control of the arts were shown to be only partly accurate. However high the salaries, they had won during peace time, performers demanded even more with War, an indicator that the Nazis had not won their loyalty, even if it had their compliance. Although no useful studies of audience motivations from this time exist, the State itself began to suspect that the public wanted to derive subversive, anti-government messages from, for example, Verdi's « Simon Boccanegra » . Finally, Goebbels himself singled-out « Fidelio » by Beethoven as objectionable on the grounds that it was not a « Volksoper » , thereby, contradicting endless Nazi musicological teaching. Such evidence, admittedly coming from a very dark period for the Nazi leaders, demonstrates that their campaign for control of the internal components of cultural life had had only a limited success, however great the degree of external compliance had been. It does not suggest that performers and audiences had held their ultimate loyalties in reserve during the entire Nazi period. So far as the period 1933-1939 is concerned, Nazism seemed, in fact, to have proved that the arts, and specifically the Opera scene, can be turned to whatever purposes the State desires.

Plus encore que le théâtre ou le cinéma, c'est l'Opéra qui fut considéré par le 3^e « Reich » comme le meilleur vecteur pour exalter les « valeurs allemandes ». Aussi, le National-Socialisme, qui se mit lui-même en scène comme un Opéra, fit de cet art la base de sa politique culturelle. On peut se demander pourquoi tant d'artistes ont collaboré pendant plus de 10 ans avec un régime totalitaire. Si certains ont subi la fascination perverse du Nazisme, la majorité était sans travail suite à la crise de 1929 et Adolf Hitler leur commanda des œuvres. Il faut également prendre en compte l'habileté de Josef Goebbels, ministre de la Propagande et de l'Information, à cacher derrière l'exaltation esthétique de compositeurs comme Richard Wagner les objectifs politiques criminels du Nazisme : il s'agissait d'appeler aux pulsions pour empêcher l'intervention de la raison.

Le documentaire « Opéra et 3^e « Reich » » se propose de retracer l'histoire des rapports entre l'Opéra et le régime nazi, de 1933 à 1944, d'après des images d'archives, des documents de propagande et des films culturels ou de fiction, entrecoupés d'interventions de philosophes contemporains qui analysent ces images et brisent le discours nazi.

Le 12 mars 1945, un incendie ravage le bâtiment de l'Opéra de Vienne lors d'un bombardement américain ; la salle et la scène sont détruites, mais la façade, murée par précaution, reste intacte. Les représentations reprurent dès le 1^{er} mai au « Theater an der Wien », alors inoccupé depuis longtemps.

It has long been common place for historians and biographers to invoke the notion of « Götterdämmerung » (Twilight of the Gods) when writing about the final days of Adolf Hitler and his monstrous 3rd « Reich ». This trope is used, in both English and German, by leading authors such as Joachim Fest, William L. Shirer, Ian Kershaw, Anthony Read, and David Clay Large. Without exception, however, the idea of « Götterdämmerung » has been used uncritically, rhetorically - almost as jargon, in Theodor W. Adorno's sense. It was even used this way by Adorno himself, who once referred to « Götterdämmerung » as an « inflamed prophecy of the nation's own doom ». In what follows, I propose to measure the implications of this historiographical trope against the reality of the Nazis' appropriation of Wagner and his music.

Perhaps, somewhat surprisingly, the analogy was drawn by the Nazis themselves as the 1,000 Year « Reich » crumbled around them. In February 1945, Martin Bormann received a letter from his wife that stated :

« One day, the “ Reich ” of our dreams will emerge. In some ways, you know, this reminds me of the “ Götterdämmerung ” in the Edda. The monsters are storming the bridge of the Gods ; the citadel of the Gods crumbles, and all seems lost ; and then, suddenly, a new citadel arises, more beautiful than ever before. We are not the 1st to engage in mortal combat with the powers of the underworld, and that we feel impelled, and are also able, to do so should give us a conviction of ultimate victory. »

In a similar vein, an entry in the diary of Fritz Kempfler, the Nazi mayor of Bayreuth, from mid-April 1945 referred to

« This hour of “ Götterdämmerung ”. »

The trope was also employed by the Allies. A search for the terms Hitler and « Götterdämmerung » in the archives of « The New York Times » finds the 2 linked 11 times between November 1943 and May 1945, including a 1944 story in « The New York Times » Magazine entitled : « “ Götterdämmerung ” by Hitler », which purported to find a « pathological “ Götterdämmerung ” » streak in the Nazis. Following the Allied victory, a front-page article in the « Week in Review » section of « The Sunday Times » began as follows :

« Germany, last week, went down to defeat in the death and flame, the swirling violence, of a Wagnerian Finale. Adolf Hitler had his “ Götterdämmerung ”. »

And the connection continues today, albeit in a somewhat ironic sense, as in the title of Martin Geck's review of Pamela Potter's book on musicology under the Nazis :

« “ Così fan tutte ” or “ Götterdämmerung ” ? The National-Socialist Past of German Musicology »

The word « Götterdämmerung » is a German translation of the same term, « Ragnarok », which appears in the 13th Century Icelandic Prose Edda - one of Richard Wagner's sources for the « Ring ». His « Götterdämmerung » is quite different from the one that appears in the Edda, however. In the myth, once the « Valkyries » have borne enough slain warriors to « Walhalla » and the « Norns » have finished weaving their threads of fate, « Walhalla » is besieged by giants and monsters, led by « Loki ». The fiery fallout of the siege of « Walhalla » ignites the earth (which had been suffering from a monstrous winter) and destroys all living creatures on earth, as « Walhalla » itself, the Gods, and the Giants are consumed by fire. According to the myth, however, a few escape with « Baldur » to the roots of « Yggdrasil », the « World-Ash Tree », and are spared destruction ; they emerge, ultimately, beyond the myth's narrative parameters, to establish a new « world of harmony between man and nature, a world without walls or nations ; a world without Gods » .

Germanic and Norse myths were immensely popular in German-speaking lands in the latter half of the 19th Century, particularly among « völkisch » ideologues like those drawn to the « Bayreuth Circle » around Cosima Wagner and Hans von Wolzogen - not to mention Richard Wagner himself and his choice of subject matter. Articles on the myths themselves, as well as their connection with Wagner's works, appeared frequently in the « Bayreuther Blätter » and the official Festival program, the « Bayreuther Festspielführer » .

Towards the end of World War II, on 12 March 1945, the Vienna Opera House was set alight by an American bombardment. The front-section, which had been walled-off as a precaution, remained intact including the foyer, with frescoes by Moritz von Schwind, the main-stairways, the vestibule and the tea-room. The auditorium and stage were, however, destroyed by flames as well as almost the entire « décor » and props for more than 120 Operas with around 150,000 costumes. The State Opera was temporarily housed at the « Theater an der Wien » and at the Vienna « Volksoper » .

The years 1938 to 1945 were a dark chapter in the history of the Vienna Opera House. Under the Nazis, many members of the House were driven-out, pursued, and killed, and many works were not allowed to be played.

On 12 March 1945, the Opera House was devastated during a bombing, but, on 1 May 1945, the « State Opera in the Volksoper » opened with a performance of Mozart's « Le Nozze di Figaro » . On 6 October 1945, the hastily restored « Theaters an der Wien » re-opened with Beethoven's « Fidelio » . For the next 10 years, the Vienna State Opera operated in 2 venues while the true headquarters was being rebuilt at a great expense.

Opera and Fascism

Introduction

Ascribing a specific political significance to such a composite art-form or music-theatre can pose particular problems for the cultural historian. Whilst examination of the composer's choice of subject matter and libretto may reveal a more or less clearly stated political objective, analysis of the musical setting can produce a more ambiguous interpretation of such intentions. This may simply be a question of differing æsthetic positions occupied by drama and music - words and action appearing to present a more concrete reflection of political reality than the seeming abstractions of musical language. Yet, to make a distinction between the political functions of drama and music may also seem artificial. Certainly, when libretto and text are so well-integrated, as in Mozart's « Le Nozze di Figaro » , Beethoven's « Fidelio » , or Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » , the broad political message of each Opera appears to be unequivocal and was perfectly understood by 1st night audiences.

Whether such clear political messages can be discerned in the Operas composed during the era of Fascism in Germany or Italy is more debatable. For ideologues and critics, the stylistic pluralism of music of the 1920's and 1930's proved intractable. At issue was the degree to which composers should repudiate modernism, and whether such a move necessitated a return to an older tradition of Romanticism. Few theorists offered a cogently argued solution to this problem, preferring instead to talk in the broadest terms of what was commonly termed « a reclamation of national musical values » . How this was effected depended, of course, on the specific characteristics of each country's national traditions, and, in this instance, there were contrasting modes of development in Germany and Italy.

If the musical idioms employed by the most significant Operatic composers working in Germany and Italy expressed a variety of æsthetic stand-points, thus, compounding the difficulties of equating political ideology with artistic intent, a more useful line of enquiry may be to determine any general features which were common to the repertoire of this period. Of paramount importance is the extent to which Operas of the Fascist era represented a reaction against the immediate past, and whether performing traditions, reception and taste altered as a result of political influence.

Operatic Developments in Nazi Germany

Operatic developments in Nazi Germany

Between 1933 and 1944, over a 170 new Operas by German-speaking composers were premiered in the 3rd « Reich » , an impressive statistic which belies the notion that the period was bereft of creative energies in this area. To a certain extent, the composition of new Operas was encouraged. Under the auspices of the « Reichsdramaturg » , Rainer Schlöber, the Nazi regime evolved a co-ordinated plan in which the major Opera Houses were encouraged to commission and perform at least 1 novelty per season. At a local level, numerous State prizes were awarded to composers of Operas. Another important forum for performance of new Opera was the music festival circuit which enjoyed an increasingly hallowed status in German musical life during this period.

Yet, for all this degree of activity, Opera was never deemed the ideal medium for overt political propaganda. No Opera was staged in which characters wearing Nazi uniforms appeared on stage. Neither did Operatic composers attempt to weave well-known political songs into the musical fabric. One possible explanation for the avoidance of such overtly political elements lies in a belief that Opera represented a higher and more pure art-form than drama and the spoken theatre, and, as such, its subject and musical matter should be divorced from contemporary realities. This argument was expounded by the Dresden critic Eugen Schmitz in 1939. Writing in the « Zeitschrift für Musik » , Schmitz claimed that whilst a spoken drama based upon the life of Horst Wessel might have gained public acceptance, an Operatic setting of the same theme, depicting the protagonist as a heroic tenor in conflict against baritone Communist agitators, would easily degenerate into the kind of nationalist « kitsch » that was denounced by the regime.

In surveying the subject matter favoured by Operatic composers during the 3rd « Reich » , the general avoidance of contemporary themes is striking. Without doubt, this represents a conscious reaction against artistic trends that evolved during the Weimar Republic. Amongst the most significant features of that period were the promotion of experimental music-theatre which flourished in State-subsidized theatres, and the growth in popularity of the « Zeitoper » (topical Opera) which reached wide audiences through the enormous success of Ernst Křenek's « Jonny spielt auf ! » . Yet, during the 3rd « Reich » , composers not only avoided experimental music-theatre and the « Zeitoper » , but also largely refrained from setting contemporary dramas or collaborating with the playwrights that were most favoured by the regime. Censorship of chosen texts never became an important issue. Not once did the « Reichsdramaturg » withhold approval of an Opera that had already been accepted for performance by a provincial Opera House. Only changes in political circumstance, particularly during the Second World War, caused Opera Houses to withdraw certain established works after their subjects were deemed inappropriate by the Ministry of Propaganda.

Given the repressive cultural environment, it is hardly surprising that Operatic texts during the 3rd « Reich » manifested the conservative cultural attitudes of the regime. Having rejected experimentation and topicality, composers turned instead to safer themes - myths drawn from either Classical antiquity or Nordic legend, settings of the established Classics of German literature (Goethe, Heinrich von Kleist, E.T.A. Hoffmann and Friedrich Schiller) , dramas that chronicle glorious episodes of German history, portrayals of simple village life and, perhaps, most frequently of all, the fairy-tale. Within these areas, it was possible to glean messages of ideological relevance the heroism and strength of the Classical warrior, the self-sacrifice for a higher-ideal, intimations of racial superiority, and a strong identification with the upright values of a peasant community. It is significant, however, that the Operas that gained the most public esteem eschewed even such vague political issues, and simply offered escapist entertainment to their audiences.

The emphasis on escapism, or on depicting episodes from the very distant past, is indicative of a broader artistic development that of the resurgence of the « volksoper » , a genre much cultivated during the 19th Century, whose subject matter encompassed both light-hearted comedy and Romantic legend. During the 1st years of the Nazi regime, the « volksoper » revival was strongly demanded by the Nazi musical press as an antidote to what was termed the « negativism » and « cultural bolshevism » of the Operas of Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith and Ernst Křenek. In order to educate younger composers to appreciate the values of the « volksoper » , significant changes to the repertoire were proposed for the 1933-1934 season, including the resurrection of a number of Operas by minor Romantic composers that had fallen into oblivion over the past 20 years. Few of these works, however, survived more than a few performances, and later attempts to salvage minor Operas by Albert Lortzing, Heinrich Marschner and Otto Nicolai proved rather unsuccessful.

During the early years of the regime, the most prominent exponents of the « volksoper » were composers of an older generation, such as Paul Graener (1872-1944) , Max von Schillings (1868-1933) , and Georg Vollerthun (1876-1945) . Largely neglected throughout the Weimar Republic, they joined the ranks of Alfred Rosenberg's « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » and exerted considerable influence in 1933 in persuading Opera Houses to stage their neo-Wagnerian works. Yet, their success was short-lived. Audience reception and critical opinion remained lukewarm, with some even arguing that their creative outlooks were too redolent of a « petit-bourgeois » past.

The real turning-point for this group of composers came in March 1935 after the 1st performance of Graener's « Der Prinz van Hamburg » at the « Berlin Staatsoper » . Although Graener had striven to create a work of « national artistic significance » , the Opera failed to make a strong impression and survived for only 2 seasons. In the same year, however, 2 Operas by younger composers, « Der Günstling » by Rudolf Wagner-Régeny (Dresden) and « Die Zaubergeige » by Werner Egk (Frankfurt) , achieved real success and were hailed in some quarters as the 1st genuinely National-Socialist music-theatre works. Both Wagner-Régeny and Egk had spent their formative years under the cosmopolitan influence of the 1920's. Yet, they had modified their musical idioms sufficiently to make them palatable to the more traditionalist cultural climate after 1933. Besides, such a compromise between modernism and accessibility accorded perfectly with Goebbels' much-quoted demand that National-Socialist art should manifest « a Romanticism of steel » .

In the case of Rudolf Wagner-Régeny, the authorities' enthusiastic acceptance of « Der Günstling » seems paradoxical. The libretto, based on Victor Hugo's play, « Marie Tudor » , was written by Casper Neher, who had a name for himself as Bertolt Brecht's favourite designer and had 3 years earlier collaborated with Kurt Weill on « Die Bürgschaft » . Not surprisingly, such an association aroused considerable suspicion as to the political sympathies of both the composer and librettist. Yet, despite post-War attempts to view the scenario as presenting some kind of resistance to totalitarianism, in reality, the setting offers little opportunity either for irony or for oblique political criticism. More significantly, Wagner-Régeny's music, whilst rejecting the extravagant gestures of late-Romanticism, is couched in a deliberately simple neo-Baroque language modelled on Gluck and Händel.

Egk's Opera, « Die Zaubergeige » , whose libretto is drawn from Franz Graf von Pocci's 19th Century fairy-drama in which love and honesty triumph over the desire for material wealth, also presents a successful balance between traditionalism and modernism. With its judicious mixture of Romantic and comic elements, it appears to be typically escapist « volksoper » , although anti-Semitic overtones are all too apparent in the unsympathetic portrayal of the shady merchant Guldensack. In keeping with the seemingly un-problematic nature of the story, Egk's music manifests a deliberate naivety. The most pervasive elements are a strong adherence to tonality, symmetrical melodies and a frequent recourse to Bavarian folk-dances. This simplicity is however punctuated by insistent ostinati with a percussive edge and spiced with the occasional harsh dissonance, all of which give the music a veneer of modernity.

The degree to which composers were able to employ surface features of musical modernism, without encountering official disapproval, reflects the regime's uncertainty with regard to musical aesthetics. When the Danish-born composer Paul von Klenau (1883-1946) employed Arnold Schönberg's 12 tone technique in his Opera « Michæl Koblbaas » (Stuttgart, 1933) , critics eagerly condemned the composer for utilizing a culturally degenerate method of composition. Yet, Klenau denied any allegiance to Schönberg, arguing that his utilization of 12 tone procedures was entirely original and claiming that his technique reflected National-Socialist order and discipline. Such a defence of his compositional style, coupled with the evident acceptability of Keist's drama, ensured that Michæl Kohlhaas never fell victim to censorship. Later, the Schönberg pupil Winifried Zillig (1905-1963) managed to camouflage his utilization of the same technique in his 1 Act Opera, « Das Opfer » (Hamburg, 1937) , based on Reinhard Göring's novel about Captain Scott's expedition to the Antarctic. Here again, it was not so much the musical language that proved acceptable as the text which emphasizes the heroic ideals of a man who is prepared to die for a higher-cause.

Ambiguity in Intention and Reception

From examining the pragmatic reception accorded to the works of Klenau and Zillig, one might assume that composers of Opera were allowed greater freedom of expression than playwrights and stage-directors. Yet, this was not always the case. In fact, some of the most significant challenges to Nazi cultural authority occurred in the Opera House. In 1934, the conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler failed to secure Hermann Göring's approval for the planned 1st performance of Paul Hindemith's « Mathis der Maler » at the « Berlin Staatsoper » . Furtwängler's overt support for the composer and condemnation of artistic interference in matters of repertoire, expressed in an article published in the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , set him on a collision course with the regime. It was a conflict that Furtwängler was unable to win, and he was subsequently forced to resign his official positions in German musical life. 1 year later, Richard Strauß endured the same fate, relinquishing his post as President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » on account of collaboration with the Jewish writer Stefan Zweig on the Opera « Die schweigsame Frau » (Dresden, 1935) . The work was heard only 4 times before the authorities banned further performances.

Both Strauß and Furtwängler were far too influential as musical figures to be consigned to oblivion. To a certain extent, the regime needed their co-operation in order to maintain cultural credibility. Yet, it is still a matter of conjecture as to how far these artists actually appeased their political Masters. Strauß's next Opera, « Friedenstag » (Munich, 1938) , to a libretto by the Viennese theatre historian Joseph Gregor, is a case in point. The scenario is drawn from an episode that took place towards the end of the Thirty Years War, a departure from Strauß's normal areas of exploration, which, at this time, tended to encompass escapist comedy and Classical mythology. Initially, the Opera met with great success, securing approval from Adolf Hitler who attended a performance in Vienna. Critics of the period drew attention to the ideologically acceptable elements of the plot - the portrayals of the heroic Commandant, who refuses to surrender when his barracks are under siege, and his submissive wife. Yet, the Opera's pacifist conclusion (a choral hymn rejoicing in the laying down of arms) seemed at odds with the regime's belligerent foreign policy, suggesting that the work's ultimate message was somewhat ambiguous.

A similar equivocality may be gleaned from Werner Egk's « Peer Gynt » (Berlin, 1938) . The Opera, a free adaptation of Henrik Ibsen's drama, was commissioned by the « Berlin Staatsoper » , where the young composer had secured a position as « Kapellmeister » . It marked a departure from the light-heartedness of « Die Zauberflöte » , being conceived on a far more ambitious scale. 2 elements of the score disturbed critics at the premiere : 1st, Egk's tendency to lavish attention upon the grotesque elements of the drama at the expense of its Romantic and humanistic aspects ; 2nd, the recourse to a harsher musical style, reminiscent in places of Kurt Weill and other modernists. Egk attempted to justify his use of modernist elements in the scenes depicting the Trolls, on the grounds that the dissonance of such episodes was offset elsewhere by the use of unequivocally tonal passages that were representative of positive forces.

Further examination of the Troll Scene in Act I of « Peer Gynt » suggests however that Egk's claim of a clear division between good (in musical terms, tonal) and evil (atonal) was somewhat misleading. When, in the score, Egk described the Trolls as the « lowest form of humanity » and a « bunch of sadists and gangsters » , he appeared to be making a more oblique reference to Nazi Storm-Troopers (SA) , a point that was emphasized in the original Berlin staging. Moreover, the connection was reinforced through the parodying nature of the musical language, which, at one moment, recalls Weill, then lampoons a ritualistic Nazi hymn, and finally offers a grotesque distortion of the can-can from Jacques Offenbach's « Orphée aux Enfers » , an Operetta banned by the Nazis because of the racial origins of its composer. Egk's free-adaptation of Ibsen's drama abounds in passages of Brechtian irony such as the following lines sung at the outset of the Harbour Scene (Act 2, scene 1) :

So ist's im Leben, dern Schwachen nicht,
Dem Starken Wind's gegeben !
Und wer nicht selber tritt,
Der wird getreten,
Da hilft kein jammern,
Winseln, Bitten, Beten !

...

What we doubt no longer :
the weak will die
the strong be even stronger.
It's dog eat dog
Eat or be eaten !
Unless you beat your foe
You will be beaten.

Again, one can only speculate as to how far contemporary audiences perceived the subversive undercurrent in such passages. In any case, any initial misgivings about Egk's composition were silenced after Hitler attended a performance of the Opera and personally congratulated its author. As a result, « Peer Gynt » was nominated for performance at the 1939 « Reichsmusiktag » held in Düsseldorf, although the Opera was dropped from the repertory of many theatres after the outbreak of War.

The year 1940 marked something of a watershed in terms of German Operatic development. On the one hand, the Ministry of Propaganda appeared to exercise even greater control over the kind of Opera that was to be performed. The banning of works by composers from enemy countries was rigidly enforced, as was the requirement to alter libretti in the light of changing political circumstances. Yet, at the same time, the notion of Opera as entertainment that should divert the public from the realities of War was being actively promoted. This may well explain why relatively few contemporary Operas exploited avowedly patriotic themes. Instead, composers turned with increasing frequency to fairy-tale, romance and comedy. For instance, one of the most popular escapist Operas of the period was Heinrich Sutermeister's « Romeo und India » (Dresden, 1940) , a work which attempted to reclaim a Bel-Canto style reminiscent of 19th Century Italian Opera. Another typical example was Richard Strauß's « Capriccio » , 1st performed in Munich, in October 1942, with financial support from the Ministry of Propaganda. Set in 18th Century Paris, its initial scenario amounts to nothing more than a witty, though masterful, « divertissement » on the nature of Opera.

This vein of « apolitical » comedy had already been exploited with great success by Carl Orff in his Opera « Der Mond » (Munich, 1939) , based on a fairy-tale by the brothers Grimm. Orff's musical style, which reached maturity during the 1930's, offered a striking alternative to the more conventional Romanticism of many of his contemporaries. As some of its roots lay outside German music, like in the work of Claude Debussy and the neo-primitive Igor Stravinsky (in particular, the ballet « Les Noces ») , Nazi critics were initially suspicious of the composer's national credentials. At issue was Orff's fondness for percussive ostinati and his desire to strip his musical material to the barest essentials. Yet, with the gradual acceptance of his most popular work, « Carmina Burana » , 1st staged at the Frankfurt Opera House in 1937, but subsequently better-known in the concert-hall, such objections evaporated. Besides, « Carmina Burana » revealed another more palatable aspect of Orff's style (a strong absorption of Bavarian folk-music) and it was this element that profoundly influenced the idiom of « Der Mond » .

Orff returned to Grimm for his Opera « Die Kluge » (Frankfurt, 1943) . With its judicious mixture of closed forms and spoken dialogue, the work represents a further example of Orff's musical primitivism, although the instrumentation is much harsher here than in « Der Mond » . A number of post-War commentators have intimated that Orff was making a veiled attack against Fascism in the un-sympathetic portrayal of the despotic King. Yet, such an intention appears to be purely speculative, for despite the fact that « Die Kluge » aroused a more mixed-reception than « Der Mond » , the Opera was staged at 21 theatres until 1944.

Continuity or Change - the Historical Context

Analyzing the nature of contemporary Opera in a totalitarian society provides an obvious starting-point for the definition of a Fascist cultural aesthetic in the musical field. However, other considerations must also be discussed. One area which has already been mentioned is the question of performing traditions, and whether these changed as a result of political pressure. When the Nazis came to power, they were determined to sweep aside what they considered to be the cultural excesses of the Weimar Republic. To this end, they instigated a purge of German Opera Houses which resulted in the dismissal and emigration of numerous composers, conductors, directors, stage-designers, singers and orchestral musicians. However, whilst much attention has been drawn to the effects of this exodus, it must be emphasized that the vast majority of remaining artists stayed in Germany, and that high-standards of performance were maintained and even enhanced in the metropolitan Opera Houses. The most significant changes occurred in the composition of the repertoire which was subject to censorship by the Nazi authorities. It was no longer possible to perform works either by Jewish or « degenerate » composers, and, during the War, the staging of non-German works was subject to political expediency.

Yet, it would be misleading to suggest that the exercise of a tighter control by Rainer Schlöber's office, the « Reichsdramaturgie » , necessarily resulted in a monolithic approach throughout Germany. Despite severe curbs on individual artistic freedom, many theatres retained some of the musical traditions that were characteristic of the 1920's. Thus, whilst the Frankfurt Opera House no longer preserved its earlier reputation of promoting the « avant-garde » , it still proved to be one of the more adventurous of German theatres, both in the number of new Operas that were staged, and in the employment of such controversial figures as Walter Felsenstein and Caspar Neher. In Berlin, there were clear differences of approach and outlook with regard to the 2 major Opera Houses, since political control of the « Berlin Staatsoper » rested with Hermann Göring, whilst that of the « Deutsche Oper » (formerly, the « Städtische Oper ») was under the supervision of Josef Gœbbels. As a consequence, the artistic policy of the « Berlin Staatsoper » remained somewhat insulated from the structures of the Ministry of Propaganda and appeared to be more cosmopolitan.

It is difficult to estimate the degree to which the actual performances and staging of Operas were influenced by the unique political climate. In terms of singing and playing techniques, nothing really changed, since the craft of vocal and instrumental production was dependent upon solid training which had been readily available at Germany's Music Academies for many years. In any case, the major singers of the era, who included such figures as Maria Cebotari, Helge Rosvaenge, Peter Anders and Viorica Ursuleac, commanded reputations that transcended national considerations through commercial recordings and broadcasts. A more open-ended question is the nature of stage-productions and the re-interpretation of the Classical repertoire. Without doubt, producers and designers who were active during the Weimar Republic had to modify their approach. Thus the abstract and experimental interpretations of Richard Wagner, as manifested in the controversial Jürgen Fehling productions of « Der fliegende Holländer » (« Kroll-Oper » , 1929) and « Tannhäuser » (« Berlin Staatsoper » , 1933) were supplanted by stagings that were more overtly naturalistic and conformed to the conservative production style that had been preserved in Bayreuth. Similar tendencies can be perceived in productions of other standard 19th Century Operas, where conventionally Romantic elements were generally emphasized. Probably the most overtly politicized Operatic production of the era was Benno von Arent's « Die Meistersinger » , presented in Berlin during the late-1930's.

Whilst contemporary propaganda emphasized the historical significance of Richard Wagner for National-Socialism, it is interesting to note that the number of performances of the composer's music-dramas actually declined between 1933 and 1945. How far such a statistic was a genuine reflection of public taste is open to conjecture, since economic factors certainly precluded the regular presentation of Wagner at smaller Opera Houses. Perhaps more significant is the rapid increase in popularity of the works of Albert Lortzing (1801-1851) , whose light-hearted Romantic Operas both managed to fill a void left by the expurgation of the Operettas of Jacques Offenbach, and to satisfy the regime's ideological allegiance to the « volksoper » . However, apart from the Lortzing revival, German Opera audiences maintained a strong preference for the same handful of works, irrespective of the changed political climate.

The 3rd « Reich's » omnipresent system of artistic censorship has remained strangely elusive to the historian. Far from the stereotype of the coldly efficient, centralized, totalitarian model of control, it was a fluid and amorphous agglomeration of official proscriptions, un-official pressures, and self-imposed constraints. Improvised amid the early power struggles of the Nazi era rather than erected from a Master plan, its structures were asymmetrical, ambiguous, and often contradictory.

Few areas of artistic activity better illustrate the assertion that cultural policy in the 3rd « Reich » was beset with ambiguities and contradictions than the development of Opera between 1933 and 1945. Of particular concern to cultural ideologues, musicologists and critics was the establishment of an Operatic repertoire that fully-mirrored the political characteristics of the Nazi era. Although this issue occasioned much debate in various music journals, it was never fully-resolved and the notion of a so-called « Opera crisis » persisted throughout the period. In many respects, musicologists of the time had little idea as to what constituted the ideal Nazi Opera, and much of their writing on this subject clutches at vague definitions. All too often, one senses that critics were somewhat helpless, placing their trust upon the rather unpredictable reception of audiences in determining whether an Opera was, or was not, ideologically acceptable. In many cases, attempts to boost the claims of a composer with supposedly impeccable Nazi political credentials misfired, while arguments that justified the success of a particular Opera on purely ideological grounds appeared contrived and unconvincing.

Such evidence would surely lend credibility to the contention that not one palpably Nazi Opera was written during the 3rd « Reich » . At the same time, an analysis of the contemporary repertoire performed at this time evinces certain features which fully accord with the ideological climate of the period : for example, a resurgent nationalism, a conservative-traditional choice of subject matter and a preoccupation with « völkisch » (national ; of the people) themes. It is more questionable, however, as to whether these ingredients per se counter-act the claim stated above. The problem lies not so much in the relevance or otherwise of certain chosen subject matters as in their musical treatment. In this respect, composers presented a much greater variety of stylistic approaches than one might have expected. While a few effected a retrogressive imitation of 19th Century musical styles, many others embraced aspects of modernism. Indeed, contrary to some of the propaganda of the period, the distinctions between the musical styles of Opera composers during the Weimar Republic and those of the Nazi era were often blurred, many composers rejecting the structures of through-composed post-Wagnerian music-drama and preferring to retain the neo-Classical number Opera or neo-Baroque Oratorio conceptions that had been fashionable at the height of the 1920's « Neue Sachlichkeit » (New Objectivity) .

Although it is important to emphasize elements of continuity within 20th Century German Opera, certain aspects of Nazi Operatic policy still remain unique. In attempting to stamp their own identity on the cultural environment, the Nazis found it necessary to pursue a programme of censorship on an unprecedented scale. Hand in hand with this process, the regime also encouraged a re-appraisal and revival of repertoire of the past, frequently promoting composers of an unequivocal Aryan background, or libretti that could be interpreted in an anti-Semitic light.

Censorship and control of Operatic repertoire

To achieve their desired goal, Nazi censorship of Operatic repertoire took place in 2 phases. Broadly speaking, these moved from organized public demonstrations to the enactment of legal measures. During the early months of 1933, the Nazis relied on the support of the Storm-Troopers (« Sturmabteilung » , or SA) and Party agitators to disrupt performances of works considered to be tarnished by association with the Weimar Republic. Probably the most public demonstration of this process was manifested at performances of « Silverlake » (« Der Silbersee ») , a play by the Expressionist writer Georg Kaiser with music by Kurt Weill, whose 1st performance took place simultaneously in 3 theatres at Leipzig, Erfurt and Magdeburg, on 18 February - nearly 3 weeks after Adolf Hitler seized power. Although the premiere appears to have been an emphatic success, an ever-increasing crescendo of threats in the Nazi press, together with barracking from audiences who were sympathetic to the new regime, generated a campaign to withdraw the work.

It should be emphasized that the majority of Opera Houses managed to avoid conflict and controversy simply by pursuing a policy of self-censorship. The inevitable consequence of such action, however, was to produce a repertoire that lacked enterprise and studiously avoided the unfamiliar. Surveying the 1934-1935 season, one commentator remarked upon the fact that only 18 out of 46 theatres had managed to perform repertoire by a living German composer, and that, in 7 of these theatres, the composers represented were established old Masters such as Richard Strauß and Hans Pfitzner. To alleviate this situation, he proposed that each theatre should devote at least 10 % of its attention to premiering German Operas, and that in an annual season of 20 Operas, at least 2 should have been composed by living Germans.

Appraising the repertoire presented in individual Opera Houses, as documented in the 1937 edition of the « Deutsches Bühnen-Jahrbuch », it appears that many theatres heeded such advice. In Essen, for example, 4 out of the 19 Operas featured in their 1935-1936 season were composed by living Germans (Werner Egek, Paul Graener, Erich Sehlbach, Richard Strauß), while in Hamburg the number stood at 3 (Graener, Strauß, Egek) out of 20. Similar statistics apply to the 1937-1938 season in each Opera House although, in the following year, both companies reverted to less adventurous material - a factor which no doubt prompted Rainer Schlöber to issue a directive in 1939 compelling German Opera companies to devote more attention to contemporary German music, and insisting that every Opera company stage at least 1 new production of a German Opera composed after 1900.

Redrawing and expanding repertoire from the past

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Richard Wagner

Although trying to create the necessary conditions for the promotion and performance of contemporary Operas, the Nazis were equally concerned with imposing their influence on the established Classics of the repertoire. Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Richard Wagner, 2 of the greatest German-speaking Opera composers, were specifically appropriated for this purpose, though with rather different consequences. In the case of Mozart, the central preoccupation seems to have been the desire to « Aryanize » the libretti of the 3 Operas (« Don Giovanni », « Le nozze di Figaro », « Così fan tutte ») the composer wrote in collaboration with the baptized Jew Lorenzo da Ponte. Although no official directive was issued to this effect, the climate of anti-Semitism that percolated through all aspects of cultural life during this period encouraged numerous opportunists to present their « purified » arrangements of these texts before the public. As a further incentive and justification for their actions, many noted the need to ensure that Opera Houses throughout Germany no longer persisted in rehearsing these Operas in published editions made by the German-Jewish conductor Hermann Levi.

While Mozart remained a fringe concern in the question of Nazi cultural politics, Wagner was elevated to the very centre, as the spiritual godfather to the Party. The association was sealed during the 1920's when Adolf Hitler became a frequent visitor to Bayreuth and received strong political support from members of the Wagner family, most notably the racial historian Houston Stewart Chamberlain. A defining moment in this process was the re-opening of the Bayreuth Festival 10 years after the outbreak of the First World War, and, during the following years, Bayreuth became one of the major rallying points for organized conservative and nationalist opposition to the Weimar Republic. The degree to which Bayreuth had become appropriated by such forces can be exemplified by the increasingly xenophobic material which was published in conjunction with the Festival. 2 issues were predominant : the need to emphasize an irresistible link between Wagner and Hitler as joint redeemers of German society, and the attempt to interpret Wagner's Operas in the light of the current political climate. Commenting on the 1930 « Ring » Cycle at Bayreuth, the critic of the « Völkischer Beobachter », for example, suggested the work to be a parable of the age, with the giant Fafner as a symbol of the indolent upper-classes at the time of Wilhelm II that had failed to foresee the coming revolution ; and Hagen as representative of the politicians that had stabbed the German army in the back in 1918. Inevitably, Siegfried was depicted as the « symbol of young Germany which is now preparing to replace the remnants of a collapsing bourgeois-Marxist State and to erect a new Germany, the 3rd " Reich " » .

Apart from the growing Nazification of Wagner, Bayreuth also came to be regarded as one of the last bastions of Germanic values standing in opposition to such artistic preoccupations as modernism and Expressionism. It is not surprising, therefore, that Nazi sensibilities were especially riled when modernists dared to subject their beloved composer to such reinterpretation during the Weimar Republic. One Wagner production of the 1920's that particularly incensed the Nazis was that of « The Flying Dutchman » (« Der fliegende Holländer ») mounted at the « Kroll-Oper » in Berlin, in 1929, with Otto Klemperer as conductor, Jürgen Fehling as director, and Ewald Dülberg as designer. The production caused offence on a number of counts : the severe rectilinear sets, the Expressionist acting of the singers, the proletarian-style costumes of the major protagonists and the hard-driven musical interpretation of the score. But it was the Kroll's attempt to demythologize Wagner, stripping away many of the composer's most overt manifestations of national Romanticism, that aroused the greatest fury and hastened the demise of the Kroll Opera in 1930.

Although by the early 1930's, few Opera Houses dared to follow the Kroll's example by staging anti-traditional productions of Wagner, 2 further controversies surrounding the composer confronted the Nazis in the early months of the 3rd « Reich » . The 50th anniversary of Wagner's death happened to take place on 13 February 1933, and the regime lost no time in exploiting the event for its own purposes. But while Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring, Wilhelm Frick and the Wagner family attended a much-publicized commemorative celebration at the « Gewandhaus » in Leipzig, a new and innovative production of the composer's « Tannhäuser » opened at the Berlin « Staatsoper » under Otto Klemperer, with Jürgen Fehling as director and sets by Oskar Strnad. Once again, the provocative nature of the production, which challenged traditional conceptions of the work in both staging and musical interpretation, aroused a chorus of indignation in the Right-wing press, playing admirably into the hands of the Nazis, who now demanded that the new regime exert an even tighter control of cultural policy. Not surprisingly, one of the earliest victims of this charge was Otto Klemperer, who left Germany in April 1933.

Another artist forced into exile partly as a result of his anti-traditional interpretation of Wagner's outlook was the novelist Thomas Mann. Mann's lecture entitled « The Suffering and Greatness of Richard Wagner » , delivered at the University of Munich, on 10 February (and subsequently published in « Die Neue Rundschau » in April 1933) , warned of the inherent dangers of adopting a totally uncritical attitude towards Wagnerian ideology. Inevitably, by expressing such opinions at the very moment when the Nazis were attempting to silence opposition to their policies, Mann entered on a collision course with the new regime. The campaign of denunciation against Mann gathered pace, particularly after a group of Munich intellectuals, including the composers Richard Strauß and Hans Pfitzner, put their names to a published letter of protest against the lecture.

Once the Nazis had managed to silence any independent notions of Wagner's place in cultural history, they set about consolidating and perpetuating the traditional conception of Wagner as epitomized by Bayreuth in the 1920's. Moderately adventurous stagings of his Operas were discarded in favour of a homogenized style that favoured realism and promoted official ideology. Wagner propaganda was further supported by the publication of innumerable books and articles on the composer. For example, the July 1933 issue of the « NS-Monatshefte » was devoted exclusively to Wagner. Entitled « Richard Wagner and the New Germany » , the articles concentrated on subjects such as « Wagner and Hitler » , « Richard Wagner as the leader of the future » , « “ Parsifal ” and National-Socialism » and « Wagner and Nordic Philosophy » .

In a more overtly public arena, Wagner's work became unmistakably associated with the regime's most significant cultural celebrations. With its rousing final chorale « Germans awake ! Soon will dawn the day » , the Opera « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » was shamelessly exploited by Josef Goebbels as an anthem to the Nazi Party. Thus, on 13 March 1933, the day which formally inaugurated the 3rd « Reich » , festivities began with the convening of the new « Reichstag » and culminated in a gala-performance of the work at the Berlin « Staatsoper » . From then on, the Opera was performed at many important Party and State occasions. In particular, the transmogrification of « Die Meistersinger » into a quintessentially Nazi Opera was realized at the annual Nuremberg Party Rallies, where Benno von Arent's monumental staging of the final Act, with its massed crowds and celebratory flags and banners, consciously mirrored the events taking place outside the Opera House.

A further opportunity to exploit the link between Wagner and the 3rd « Reich » came with the 1933 Bayreuth Festival. Hitler and other Party officials attended the opening performances, and local crowds celebrated their appearance with frenzied enthusiasm. Almost every subsequent year, Hitler made the annual pilgrimage to Bayreuth and, after 1939, he reconstituted the event as a « Kriegsfestspiel » (War Festival) so as to enable regular attendance by German War veterans. The Festival managed to retain a modicum of artistic independence by avoiding subjugation to officials controlling the Chamber of Culture. Thus, although traditional stagings remained the order of the day at Bayreuth, the combined efforts of conductor Heinz Tietjen and director Emil Preterorius steadfastly avoided the blatant pandering to Nazi ideology as manifested by Benno von Arent in Berlin and Nuremberg.

Other composers

Setting aside specific attempts to Nazify Mozart and Wagner, a broader appraisal of traditional Opera repertoire suggests less apparent divergence in taste between the Weimar Republic and the 3rd « Reich » than one might have expected. According to the critic Wilhelm Altmann, the 15 most popular Operas during the 1930-1931 season were Georges Bizet's « Carmen » , Richard Wagner's « Tannhäuser » , Carl Maria von Weber's « Der Freischütz » , Wagner's « Lohengrin » , Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » , Pietro Mascagni's « Cavalleria rusticana » , Ruggero Leoncavallo's « I Pagliacci » , Giuseppe Verdi's « Il trovatore » , Giacomo Puccini's « Madama Butterfly » , Jacques Offenbach's « Tales of Hoffmann » , Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » , Eugène d'Albert's « Tiefland » (The Lowlands) , Puccini's « La Bohème » , Verdi's « La traviata » and Ludwig van Beethoven's « Fidelio » . The same Operas by Bizet, Leoncavallo, Puccini and Weber remained as popular 8 years later, together with others by Wagner and Verdi. Of course, the Jewish composer Offenbach could no longer be performed, so the only other striking difference between the 2 sets of statistics rests in the considerable rise in popularity of the Operas by the 19th Century composer Albert Lortzing.

Although the Nazis imposed a total ban on the performance of Jewish 19th Century Opera composers such as Offenbach, Jacques-François Halévy and Meyerbeer, policy decisions regarding Operas with libretti by those who were either Jewish or half-Jewish seem to have been far more capricious. The continued popularity of Bizet's « Carmen » should be noted, despite the composer's partly Jewish origins and a collaborative libretto in which one of the partners, Ludovic Halévy, was wholly Jewish. Yet, there was no active campaign to damage the work's reputation, and it was notably excluded from the wholesale ban on compositions from enemy countries issued during the Second World War. While Richard Strauß's « Die Frau ohne Schatten » (The Silent Woman) was removed after only a few performances because of Stefan Zweig's libretto, no objections were raised with regard to performances of « Der Rosenkavalier », « Elektra » and « Arabella », despite the fact that Hugo von Hofmannsthal was half-Jewish. Even Nazi Party loyalists such as Paul Graener and Georg Vollerthun were excused for having composed Operas with the Jewish playwright Rudolf Lothar, who was in exile during the 3rd « Reich » .

All these exceptions to the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, which effectively forbade any artistic partnership between Aryan and Jew, illustrate the contradictory and ambiguous nature of Nazi censorship. At the same time, there are other examples where the campaign to expunge Jewish influence from German cultural life produced notable changes. The 3 Operas Mozart composed in collaboration with the baptized Jew Lorenzo da Ponte, for example, have already been cited as a high-profile « cause célèbre » . Likewise, Nazi propaganda forced Opera companies to abandon Franz Werfel's highly-successful German translations of some of Verdi's Operas, such as « La forza del destino » (1925) , « Simon Boccanegra » (1929) and « Don Carlos » (1932) , and encourage the creation of alternative adaptations of these works.

Despite the much-publicized proscription of Werfel because of his Jewish origins, the so-called « Verdi renaissance » , which had been largely initiated by the Austrian novelist's efforts, continued apace throughout the Nazi era. Another area of continuity with the Weimar Republic was the « Händel revival » , which had begun in the small town of Göttingen in 1920. Although initially confined to small theatres whose modest orchestral pits were more suitable for the performance of Baroque music, Handel's Operas soon began to attract the attention of much larger companies. Thus, during the Second World War, one finds surprisingly frequent performances of his work ; for example, « Giulio Cesare in Egitto » at the Berlin « Staatsoper » (1939) , « Rodelinda » in both Berlin and Vienna (1940) , « Serse » in Hamburg, Danzig (Gdańsk) and Schwerin (1943) and « Radamisto » at Hagen and Wuppertal (1943) .

Nach dem « Anschluß Österreichs » besuchte Adolf Hitler die Staatsoper am 19. Juni und am 27. Oktober 1938. In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus kam es zum Abgang, zu Verfolgungen und Ermordungen von Künstlern und Angestellten. Für etliche Werke gab es ein Aufführungsverbot. Direktor Erwin Kerber setzte sich bis Ende 1940 vereinzelt für jüdische Künstler ein, kooperierte aber mit den neuen Machthabern.

Am 30. Juni 1944 fand die letzte Vorstellung vor der Sommerpause statt ; es sollte die allerletzte Aufführung im alten Gebäude der Wiener Staatsoper überhaupt werden. Hans Knappertsbusch, der schon die erste Vorstellung nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs im Jahr 1938 dirigiert hatte, stand auch diesmal am Pult. Auf dem Programm stand Wagners Götterdämmerung.

Die letzte Regieanweisung dieser Oper lautet :

« Helle Flammen scheinen in dem Saal der Götter aufzuschlagen. Als die Götter von den Flammen gänzlich verhüllt sind, fällt der Vorhang. »

Mit 1. September 1944 verfügte Josef Goebbels im Zuge des totalen Kriegseinsatzes der Kulturschaffenden die Schließung aller Theater des Deutschen Reiches. Gegen Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges geriet die Oper am 12. März 1945 nach amerikanischen Bombardements, die eigentlich der Raffinerie in Floridsdorf gegolten haben, in Brand. Die Vorderfront, die schon vorsorglich vermauert worden war, blieb erhalten. Zuschauerränge und Bühne wurden aber ein Raub der Flammen.

Nach Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges führte das Opernensemble, das vorerst in die Wiener Volksoper auswich, die Proben und Aufführungen in dem seit längerer Zeit geschlossenen Theater an der Wien durch, wo bereits am 1. Mai 1945 (als nach der Befreiung von der nationalsozialistischen Herrschaft auch die Republik Österreich wieder existierte) die ersten Vorstellungen gegeben wurden. 1947 führte das Ensemble schon eine Auslandstournee nach London durch.

Nach 1945 bildete sich das Wiener Mozart-Ensemble heraus, das weltweit Gastspiele absolvierte und für seine besondere Gesangs- und Spielkultur gerühmt wurde. Sein Gründer und Mentor war der österreichische Dirigent Josef Krips, der aufgrund seiner jüdischen Herkunft die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus nur durch glücklichen Zufall und Hilfe von Kollegen überlebt hatte. Sofort nach 1945 begann Krips die Wiederaufbauarbeit an der Staatsoper und konnte seine ästhetischen Prinzipien durchsetzen. Dazu zählte die Abkehr vom romantischen Mozart-Ideal mit voluminösem Orchesterklang. Stattdessen kamen wieder kammermusikalische Qualitäten zum Tragen sowie ein durchsichtiger, leichter Klang, der später für typisch wienerisch gehalten wurde. Wesentliche Sängerinnen und Sänger waren Anton Dermota, Erich Kunz, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Wilma Lipp und andere.

3rd « Reich » - Dresden exhibition sheds light on Nazi persecution in the Theater

The impact of Nazi « cleansing » policies on Germany's Opera Houses and Theaters has largely been left unstudied - until now. An in-depth look at persecution of artists, musicians and actors is on display in Dresden.

The « Semperoper » dismissed accomplished musicians for their opposition to the Nazis

Fritz Busch, a prominent conductor and musical-director of the Saxon State Opera during his life, once said :

« Decent behaviour is even more important than making good music. »

Busch was not a Jew, but he was opposed to Nazi ideology. This attitude resulted in his dismissal in 1933, 5 weeks after Adolf Hitler's rise to power. His story is one of the most well-known among 50 others that make-up the exhibition « Silenced Voices » , which deals with the expulsion of Jews from the Opera and Theater scene between 1933 and 1945.

Historian Hannes Heer and music scholar Jürgen Kesting have been dedicated to researching the project. Initially, on the request of the « Hamburger Abendblatt » newspaper and the Hamburg State Opera, they started investigating the stories of Jewish and « politically untouchable » artists that worked in German Theaters during the 3rd « Reich » . One of the sources of information they are using is biographies of prominent composers, conductors, directors and singers, as well as the stories of expulsion from various theaters.

Hannes Heer discovered that prisoners of War worked at the Opera House

One part of the exhibition documents the fate of 44 prominent composers, directors, singers, and actors - the victims of racist Nazi politics. Another section specifically deals with the expulsion of members of the « Semperoper » and the Dresden State Theater. A labyrinth of columns and billboards in the foyers of both houses helps to emphasize the dismal nature of these people's fates. Descriptions and photos present well-known and not-so-well-known artists, Choir and Orchestra members, artisans and stage-hands.

The « threat » of Contemporary Art

In a detailed catalog, Hannes Heer discusses the source of anti-Jewish sentiments in Germany after 1918. The German Empire had gone through a political change following World War I, when it became a Federal Republic. At this time, German culture (described by some as the best and the most beautiful of all) was seen as the only unifying aspect that could be used to forge a new national identity. This automatically excluded all modern artistic movements, which in turn forced theaters to give-up on artistic experiments and contemporary works. The new, compulsory focus was on the canons of culture.

One of the goals of this national stance was to convey the message that it was Jews who were to blame for the revolution, for the defeat in World War I and for economic troubles. A « security scale » was devised with regard to Theaters and Operas, indicating which institutions had the most subversive tendencies. Berlin was at the top of the list, as it was traditionally open to all modern influences, but « avant-garde » theaters such as those in Leipzig and Darmstadt were also being monitored.

Drastic methods

The propaganda was spread in a very direct manner, including methods like stink bombs and chanting to prevent certain performances from taking place. There were also press campaigns against specific individuals, as well as those that called for the resignation of certain directors and those that aimed to influence operatic and theatrical repertoires.

Hannes Heer and Jürgen Kesting have made an important step forward in their research work in Dresden. For the 1st time, documents have been uncovered that prove that prisoners of war had worked at the Opera House.

Heer said :

« We have made quite a sensational discovery in Dresden. It is personal journals that contain names and where people came from. From 1941 onwards, a large number of musicians and stage-hands were foreign workers. »

The « Semperoper » and Dresden State Theater invite visitors to discover the context of the historical events connected with the expulsion of Jews from the city's cultural scene. Lectures, films and cultural presentations complete the program on offer. A CD documentary gives the sound back to those « silenced voices » .

The voice of Fritz Busch was never fully-silenced, however. After his dismissal from the « Semperoper » , he went on to work in South America, Scandinavia, England and New York.

In 1935, he wrote in a letter to the mother of his deceased friend, Max Reger :

« What counts is that, today, I can make the most beautiful music and have remained a free person and can serve my fatherland better in this way than in others. »

« Theater der Totalität » ou le paradoxe des sens : l'abstraction au défi de la représentation

Le projet d'un « Théâtre Total » , qui fascine une partie des avant-gardes de l'entre-2 guerres, dans le sillage post-Wagnérien, trouve au « Bauhaus » un lieu d'expérimentation privilégié. L'effervescence théorique et artistique encourage toutes les hardiesses : Walter Gropius, Lux Feininger, Oskar Schlemmer ou encore László Moholy-Nagy, tous connaissent la tentation du système qui synthétisera, dans l'ordre représentatif, les composantes de l'humain. L'« homme nouveau » prend ainsi place dans un espace analytique, où chacun des sens doit trouver la représentation qui lui correspond et l'espace du théâtre, pensé comme la forme privilégiée de la représentation, devient l'occasion de ressaisir la figure humaine en l'inscrivant dans une idéologie de la modernité fondée sur l'abstraction. Cet article interroge plus particulièrement la confrontation des visées avant-gardistes de Moholy-Nagy avec l'univers du répertoire traditionnel de l'Opéra dans le cadre de ses réalisations scéniques pour « les Contes d'Hoffmann » et « Madama Butterfly » au « Krolloper » de Berlin, en 1929-1931.

« Théâtre de la totalité » , ou « théâtre total » : titre de l'article de Moholy-Nagy dans le programme d'accompagnement des « Contes d'Hoffmann » à la « Krolloper » de Berlin (12 février 1929) , rapporté par Adolf Weißmann, dans le « Berliner Zeitung am Mittag » (13 février 1929) .

« L'art moderne tend à exploiter presque exclusivement la sensibilité sensorielle. Il s'entend merveilleusement à exciter l'attention et use de tous moyens pour l'exciter : intensités, contrastes, énigmes, surprises. Il saisit parfois, par la subtilité de ses moyens ou l'audace de l'exécution, certaines proies très précieuses : des états complexes ou très éphémères, des valeurs irrationnelles, sensations à l'état naissant, résonances, correspondances, pressentiments d'une instable profondeur. Qu'il s'agisse de politique, d'économie, de manières de vivre, de divertissements, de mouvement, j'observe que l'allure de la modernité est toute celle d'une intoxication. Il nous faut augmenter la dose, ou changer de poison. Telle est la loi. » (1)

(Paul Valéry)

La vie culturelle de la courte République de Weimar passe pour un âge d'or des bâtisseurs de l'avant-garde, pour le temps de la rupture radicale avec la tradition, de la refonte du présent et de la confiance en un avenir offert par les moyens techniques de la modernité. Sans doute est-il bon de rappeler que l'époque est aussi l'une des heures les plus noires de la jeune Allemagne, tenaillée par la misère économique, divisée dans une société exsangue, menacée par un climat social violent et une vie politique instable. Il est difficile, en outre, de voir en la République de Weimar l'avènement d'une ère nouvelle sans rappeler que la plupart des mouvements auxquels on l'associe se mettent en place bien avant la Première Guerre mondiale, au tournant du XXe siècle. Mais, de façon indéniable, les créateurs de cette période ont eu le sentiment d'un tournant, qui appelait de grandes réformes - de la vie comme des arts. L'effervescence l'emporte sur le manque de moyens, la crise et les incertitudes, emmenée par une foi sans pareille en la modernité et une conviction quant au rôle et à la place de l'artiste dans la société moderne : il n'est désormais plus simple observateur, il en est le « transformateur » . (2) On est surpris, à la lecture des écrits d'artistes, designers, architectes, peintres ou musiciens de voir se répandre un idiome bien particulier dans lequel germe l'idée d'un messianisme moderne : l'artiste devient le pilier d'une société nouvelle qu'il faut préparer à la construction du monde de demain à partir d'une quête de principes fondamentaux.

Nous nous intéresserons plus particulièrement à la mise en œuvre des principes affirmés par le « Bauhaus » dans le cadre de l'expérimentation théâtrale. La scène fait l'objet d'une ambition bien particulière en ce qu'elle devient le lieu de réalisation par excellence des aspirations à l'expérience totalisante. Elle ouvre un nouveau rapport à l'espace, alors réinvesti par le vocabulaire et les matériaux de la modernité avec ce dessin caractéristique d'y redéfinir les contours de l'« homme nouveau », une figure centrale dans l'approche du « Bauhaus ». La pensée de l'espace, irriguée par la tentation de l'abstraction, devient le moyen de repenser le ferment communautaire dans la société moderne en perte de repères traditionnels. Les propositions de Lászlo Moholy-Nagy, appelé par Walter Gropius au « Bauhaus » dès 1923, sont à cet égard révélatrices du « nouveau regard » porté sur l'homme de son temps. Nous interrogerons la confrontation de ses visées avant-gardistes avec l'univers du répertoire traditionnel dans le cadre de ses réalisations scéniques pour « les Contes d'Hoffmann » et « Madama Butterfly », au « Krolloper » de Berlin.

À la recherche d'une communauté originelle : l'être ensemble par les sens

La vision unitaire du monde qui anime particulièrement le microcosme du « Bauhaus », et dont le jeune architecte berlinois Walter Gropius annonce la création dans une déclaration de 1919, (3) se caractérise par la volonté d'éliminer la dualité qui oppose artiste et artisan, par le désir de rapprocher la société et le monde de l'art, et, plus encore, par la nécessité éprouvée de faire fusionner l'art et la vie. L'ambition réformatrice des membres de la nouvelle école poursuit l'idéal d'un retour au primitif, à l'origine de la communauté sociale, qui ne peut qu'advenir par l'expérience sensorielle, gage d'universel et socle de l'originel. Le Romantisme de ce projet n'est évidemment pas sans évoquer l'idée wagnérienne du « Gesamtkunstwerk », médium d'une synthèse de la connaissance, censé abolir les divisions séculaires entre raison et sensation, entre arts et sciences pour en réaliser l'union dans une expérience sensorielle totale. Le progrès technique et théorique, développé respectivement dans chacun des arts devait ainsi concourir à une grande synthèse dans une forme artistique achevée qui unirait l'art à la vie. Avec le « Bauhaus », l'utopie initiée par Wagner se trouve ré-actualisée d'une tout autre manière, mais l'ambition d'une synthèse entre arts, science et technique demeure. Lászlo Moholy-Nagy, appelé à Weimar par Gropius en 1923, partage de près l'idée d'une nécessité de la « révolution culturelle » pour faire advenir « l'homme nouveau » :

« Le but principal de nos travaux est de hisser le plus tôt possible au niveau actuel de l'humanité celui qui ne l'a pas encore atteint. Comme la compréhension intuitive n'est pas uniforme, certains hommes étant davantage touchés par les choses exprimées par la couleur et d'autres par celles communiquées par les paroles, nous avons le devoir d'ouvrir toutes les sources intuitives pour élargir le plus possible notre champ d'action. Il faut s'approprier à nouveau les éléments les plus simples de l'expression, la couleur, la forme, la matière et l'espace. Tous les créateurs de ces derniers temps ont le pressentiment de ces besoins et se fixent pour but de clarifier les éléments et d'apprendre à les utiliser de façon autonome. » (4)

Le paradigme apparaît, entre ces lignes, d'une époque orientée vers la conquête d'un nouveau ferment communautaire à travers l'affirmation d'un retour aux sens. L'avènement de la modernité passe par la reconquête de la sensorialité et de l'intuition dans la perspective d'une synthèse totalisante.

Il faut pourtant souligner dans cette conception un dualisme surprenant : si les créateurs s'attachent à défendre l'humanité de l'homme et ne cessent d'affirmer le culte « d'une instable profondeur », d'une épaisseur qui résiste et interroge, et que l'art se doit d'éclairer, leurs productions n'en attestent pas moins une fascination pour l'au-delà de l'humain, tant l'exploration des nouveaux moyens techniques offerts par l'âge industriel impose un dictat de l'analyse, une systématique de la déconstruction, pour enfermer finalement la création dans une évaporation de la chair qui laisse place à l'épure (au résidu ?) de la structure, au fantasme d'une construction de la forme pure. Dans une publication commune, Oskar Schlemmer, Lászlo Moholy-Nagy et Fritz Molnar explicitent le concept de « Gestaltung », véritable catégorie élémentaire de leurs théories :

« Au-delà de l'idée de façonner, de donner forme, de concevoir, il faut y voir le goût de souligner la totalité d'un tel processus créateur, qu'il s'agisse d'un artefact ou d'une idée. Il empêche le nébuleux et le diffus. Dans son sens le plus strictement philosophique, il exprime l'« EIDOLON » platonique, le « URBILD », la forme pré-existante. » (5)

L'expérience moderne de la création, à travers ce concept de « Gestaltung », est ainsi à la recherche d'une origine essentielle, d'une unité commune à tous les arts. On peut relever à cet égard, au titre d'anecdote symptomatique, l'intérêt de Moholy-Nagy pour la radiographie :

les créateurs et tend vers cette « élimination de la subjectivité » (7) dans les productions des modernes dont Moholy-Nagy se fait le chantre. Le corps humain, depuis Eadweard Muybridge notamment, se mesure, s'observe et se quantifie. Avec le nouvel appareil d'enregistrement de la réalité (la photographie), la limite entre le regard de la science et l'observation de l'art s'estompe et l'on goûte alors le plaisir de la transparence rêvée autant que l'on jubile de la réduction au simple - annonce de la reproductibilité, de la duplication du même.

Dans le projet d'unité des différents paramètres de la création, l'activité de l'artiste passe par une démarche analytique, par l'affirmation de l'autonomie des composantes (forme, couleur, mouvement, espace). Le caractère aporétique de la tension entre désir de synthèse et approche analytique nous porte à interroger la croyance du « Bauhaus » en la possibilité d'une unité de la culture moderne à partir de la complexité des formes d'apparition du monde. Dans un essai théorique intitulé « Malerei, Fotografie, Film » (1927), Moholy-Nagy pose cette synthèse comme un absolu :

Le projet esthétique revendiqué est celui d'une abstraction supposée aboutir à une nouvelle forme d'unité. Le travail producteur de l'artiste se pense dès lors comme un processus de transformation à partir des éléments simples qu'il isole et met en rapport, à la recherche d'une harmonie expressive des tensions. La notion d'espace est sans doute le point central de la réflexion de Moholy-Nagy, au carrefour des divers arts qu'il explore et interroge, de la peinture au film en passant par la photographie, la sculpture et l'architecture. L'attrait qu'exerce sur lui l'apparition de nouveaux média détermine considérablement sa conception de l'espace. Pour lui, « l'imitation du jeu théâtral » a fait oublier que « la nouvelle expression cinématographique » est avant tout « destinée à faire sentir l'espace à l'aide de la lumière et du mouvement. » (9) Cette évolution de la pensée du mouvement et du rapport à l'espace vers un « jeu formel autonome » (10) devient une constante qui marque chacun des supports dont il fait usage - autant de traces du « nouveau regard » dont il s'efforce de rendre compte :

Pour le photographe constructiviste qu'est Moholy-Nagy, l'élargissement du regard fait partie de la vision de « l'homme nouveau ». Siegfried Kracauer, dans les pages qu'il lui consacre, relève dans son « adhésion chaleureuse » au nouveau médium photographique l'enthousiasme pour « des combinaisons de phénomènes jamais associés auparavant ; ou encore, pour les révélations fabuleuses de l'accélééré, de la mirco et de la macro-photographie et des émulsions infrarouges. » (12) La photographie non seulement a « élargi notre champ de vision » en rendant possible l'expérience du caractère changeant du monde sous une forme combinatoire sans précédent, mais, « ce faisant, elle l'a adapté à la situation de l'homme à l'âge de la technique. » C'est précisément ce qui intéresse Moholy-Nagy dans son travail sur les changements de perspective : lorsqu'il substitue au traditionnel angle de vue horizontal une prise verticale oblique, offrant un point de vue plongeant ou contre plongeant, il nous donne sur le monde du quotidien un point de vue qui rejoint ceux apportés par l'innovation technique - l'avion, l'ascenseur ...

Moholy-Nagy est ainsi à la recherche d'autres possibilités sensorielles, non figuratives, qui lui accordent la transformation de la réalité, la représentation optique d'une composition dans laquelle s'instille l'abstraction. Les éléments de la rue deviennent, dans l'enregistrement (la transcription) photographique qu'il en propose, des points, des formes, des lignes qui recomposent l'espace et suggèrent une lecture dans laquelle la présence humaine n'est plus narration, anecdote, mais bien figure, forme, matrice. Cette approche prendra dans son œuvre scénique une importance considérable :

« Qui peut croire à l'opacité des corps au moment où notre sensibilité exacerbée et démultipliée a déjà découvert les manifestations obscures de ce milieu ? Pourquoi oublierions-nous dans nos créations le pouvoir dédoublé de notre vision qui est capable de donner des résultats semblables à ceux du rayon X ? Boccioni, dans « Pouvoir de la rue », a démontré cette double capacité dans une représentation expressive : on y voit la fusion des éléments divers de la rue. La passion de la transparence est l'une des caractéristiques les plus évidentes de notre époque. » (13)

Ainsi, cette « passion de la transparence » organise-t-elle le nouveau regard jusqu'à contraindre tout art de la représentation pour le soumettre à une logique de concentration, de fusion des éléments dans un mouvement unique qui détermine (construit, littéralement) les rapports au sein de l'œuvre. Pour Moholy-Nagy, de l'espace plan de l'image photographique, picturale ou cinématographique à l'ouverture de l'espace tridimensionnel, il n'y a pas rupture (approfondissement soudain du champ) mais continuité d'une même pensée à la recherche de formes pures organisant tout.

Vers l'espace total : une approche analogique de la scène et des arts plastiques

La scène devient, dès lors, le lieu de l'expérimentation de l'espace par excellence. On observe, à cet égard, une évolution significative de la place accordée au théâtre dans l'organisation de l'enseignement au « Bauhaus ». Si le programme énoncé par Gropius, en 1919, prétend réunir « architectes, sculpteurs et peintres » sans faire mention de l'art scénique, (14) « le Carnet du Bauhaus n° 4 » (1925) (15) fait du théâtre la figure centrale de son investigation. La scène, en tant que véritable pôle de convergence de toutes les disciplines de la nouvelle école, s'y révèle un enjeu d'importance : lieu de l'expérience totale, elle devient le noyau qui permet de relier organiquement tous les secteurs, comme l'illustre d'ailleurs le plan de conception de la structure du « Bauhaus » par Paul Klee.

La réflexion menée par Schlemmer, Molnar et Moholy-Nagy dans « Die Bühne im Bauhaus » les conduit à interroger le théâtre à partir de sa tridimensionnalité, avec un désir commun : « résorber la dualité entre ce qui est individuel et universel ». (16) L'ouvrage signale avant tout l'idée totalisante du nouveau théâtre. Total, il doit l'être d'abord par la sollicitation de tous les sens de l'homme. Il s'agit d'atteindre par là son essence (sa « structure ») à travers l'expérience synesthésique, puisque « la structure de l'homme, c'est la synthèse de tous ses organes fonctionnels ». (17) Là encore, la tension dualiste fait surface et exprime toute l'ambiguïté de la condition moderne de cet « homme nouveau », pris entre les tenailles de la réduction à l'objet (il devient machine, fonctions) et du sauvetage de l'humain dans l'affirmation vitaliste d'un universel sensoriel. Ainsi Moholy-Nagy annonce-t-il :

« Dans le nouveau théâtre, les considérations logiques, traditionnelles, émotionnelles ne joueront plus le 1er rôle. Le jeu théâtral est une création artistique et doit s'inspirer de la méthode des arts plastiques. On ne peut pas demander ce que signifie ou représente tel ou tel homme (organe) , de même qu'on ne peut poser cette question au sujet d'un tableau abstrait qui est aussi une entité indépendante, un organisme parfait. » (18)

Le recours à la pensée analogique est particulièrement frappant : l'approche analytique de l'art dans la décomposition de ses matériaux à partir des sens individuels devient un modèle de pensée intégral, une grille de lecture du réel que l'ambition totalisante porte à appliquer jusqu'à l'homme, bientôt déconstruit en une somme de fonctions ou organes. L'homme devient un « élément » dans le tout de la composition théâtrale. On comprend aisément que disparaisse toute logique narrative et illustrative dans la conception théâtrale proposée, dès lors qu'il est réduit à l'autonomie (à l'isolement) dans une combinatoire dynamique.

Si l'expérience est « totale » , c'est aussi parce que le raisonnement analogique est lui-même intégral. À l'intérieur de l'expérience sensorielle, chaque élément est pensé en réseaux de substitution ou d'équivalence. La musique et la couleur sont ainsi mises à plat sur la même partition, comme valeurs équivalentes relevant de mêmes modalités d'utilisation. C'est ce dont témoigne la partition pour une « Sonate de couleurs en 3 parties » (19) de Ludwig Hirschfeld-Mack, publiée par Moholy-Nagy en accompagnement son essai « Malerei, Fotografie, Film » , ou encore le « Dessin-partition pour une Excentricité mécanique » (Synthèse pour forme, Mouvement, Son, Lumière (Couleur) et Odeur) (20) de Moholy-Nagy. Ces partitions pour une expérience totale tiennent lieu de parangon de l'ambition synesthésique, alors décomposée et « mise en scène » simultanément sur 3 plateaux différents.

Lorsqu'il réfléchit à la « nouvelle voie dans la création de phénomènes acoustiques » , Moholy-Nagy pousse la systématique de l'équivalence jusqu'à sa radicalité et en appelle à « un nouvel ordre des tons et des sons atonaux (certains bruits) » (21) ainsi qu'au développement d'une grammaire des « signes graphiques » sonores qui abolirait la distinction entre sons naturels et sons artificiels, élargissant ainsi la palette du son à une unité du vivant et du mécanique :

Enfin, la dimension totale du théâtre proposée ici tient à l'intégration de l'homme à titre d'« élément » dans la composition d'ensemble, il devient « ersatz » , ou plutôt forme universelle :

« La tâche de l'acteur de l'avenir sera de mettre en action le commun à tous les hommes. » (23)

La fabrique du théâtre de l'homme nouveau ne court-elle pas ici le risque de la réduction ? L'expérience totale ne pourrait-elle pas devenir réalité totalitaire, là où l'individuel est aboli dans l'universel ? Curieux paradigme qui mène la voie de l'abstraction vers, finalement, une évacuation de l'humain en l'homme. Des 3 contributeurs, Schlemmer est sans doute le plus attentif à ce développement. Il souligne dans son essai l'ambivalence de la destination possible ouverte par la logique moderne de l'abstraction :

Que reste-t-il de l'homme dans ce théâtre de la totalité ? Une « figure d'art », comme Schlemmer l'appelle de ses vœux dans ses multiples expériences, du « Ballet Triadique » (1923) aux « Danses du " Bauhaus " » (1925-1927) ? L'homme y prend figure de pantin surdéterminé : il porte masque, son costume se mêle au corps de façon intégrante, ou plutôt il devient costume, absorbé dans les formes et les matériaux de l'âge industriel (cerceaux de fer, cônes de mousse ...).

La réception de ces « figures » de l'homme nouveau par la critique renvoie de façon insistante à l'inquiétude d'une lecture politique. Comment rendre compte, en effet, de ces hybrides qui, n'étant déjà plus hommes, ne sont pas encore tout à fait machines, où l'organique a encore figure humaine mais s'efface devant l'assemblage de matériaux composites et dans le vocabulaire d'une gestuelle articulée ? « Le principe de la rupture formelle, selon les revendications des artistes eux-mêmes, est souvent associé à des politiques de résistance : le montage fragmentaire ostensible y est traité comme un marqueur du " réel " qui interroge la logique de représentation, agissant ainsi comme une force de déstabilisation des cadres politique, culturel et social. » (25) C'est du moins ce à quoi l'on peut songer lorsqu'il s'agit des photo-montages dadaïstes de John Heartfield, des collages de Hannah Höch ou encore des expériences théâtrales défamiliarisantes de Brecht et Piscator. Mais les « poupées humaines » du « Bauhaus » n'ont assurément pas la même portée socio-critique, ce qui soulève la question de leur positionnement idéologique, à tel point qu'on a voulu y voir parfois « le sombre présage de l'obsession nationale-socialiste de la culture physique et d'une subjectivité rationalisée », (26) tant elles paraissent muettes, aveugles et sourdes aux troubles croissants qui menacent la République de Weimar.

Pour former l'homme nouveau, Schlemmer propose un travail de « réhabilitation et de ré-éducation » du corps, ce qui n'est pas sans précédent dans cette époque où tant de nouvelles pratiques du corps émergent, depuis les danses extatiques d'Isadora Duncan jusqu'aux pratiques rythmiques de Jaques-Dalcroze, ou encore la biomécanique de Meyerhold - autant de propositions différentes qui, toutes, tendent à une dé-réalisation du corps. Ainsi, du pantin au clown en passant par l'athlète, le corps de l'homme nouveau oscille entre réhabilitation et détermination. On se souvient alors de Schlemmer : « Tout ce qui peut être mécanisé est mécanisé. Résultat : la prise de conscience de ce qui n'est pas mécanisable. » (27) Faut-il donc voir dans le phantasme moderne de l'homme total l'harmonie d'une dialectique nouvelle ? Le corps parvient à cet équilibre provisoire entre la station de l'humain et le devenir-machine qui lui ouvre pourtant la voie d'une transcendance : la mise en contact du corps avec ce qui le dépasse - la loi du nombre, de la formule géométrique, dans laquelle il entre en rapport avec un univers abstrait au milieu duquel il se tient.

L'époque est traversée par une ambivalence fondamentale à cet égard : pour Inge Baxmann, « les rêves de technocorps, de fusion du corps humain avec les nouveaux matériaux et les technologies nouvelles, oscillaient entre le fantasme d'un dépassement du corps et l'idée d'une incarnation de la technique dans la chair. » (28) L'expérience de la sensation (jusqu'à son prolongement dans la quête synesthésique) devient le socle d'une culture nouvelle qui révèle la part irréductible de l'humain en même temps qu'elle ouvre la possibilité d'une nouvelle forme de l'être ensemble. L'individu retrouve la communauté des hommes par l'universel de la sensation. Moholy-Nagy, s'interrogeant sur les possibilités du théâtre de son temps, entrevoit l'alternative, mais s'en tient à l'aporie :

« Selon une conception intéressante, le théâtre serait la somme des manifestations de la voix, de la lumière (de la couleur) , de la forme et du mouvement. Dans ce contexte, la participation de l'homme devient superflue. On peut imaginer des instruments perfectionnés qui rempliraient mieux que l'homme lui-même le rôle uniquement mécanique que joue ce dernier. Il y a une autre conception qui ne renonce pas à l'homme, considéré comme le moyen le plus efficace de la création scénique. Mais personne n'a encore réussi à bien utiliser l'homme sur la scène, à en faire un facteur créatif. » (29)

La systématique des sens pose donc d'elle-même la limite du jeu en même temps qu'elle renvoie à ce que l'homme a d'essentiel. Plongé au cœur de l'espace total, il est dissous dans le pur phénomène de la sensation, isolé en ses parties, saturé de chaque composante - à moins qu'il ne s'affranchisse par un travail dynamique, « créatif » , dans lequel il « maîtrise ses dons corporels et intellectuels » pour redevenir le « phénomène le plus actif de la vie » . Mais gare, alors, à ne pas « recommencer l'erreur de l'imitation de la nature. » (30)

« Krolloper » , 1929 : au défi de la représentation scénique

Hans Curjel et Otto Klemperer engagent Moholy-Nagy pour réaliser la scénographie des « Contes d'Hoffmann » , donnés en février 1929, au « Krolloper » de Berlin. Cette maison d'Opéra, dans sa brève existence (1927-1931) , aura profondément marqué la vie lyrique et intellectuelle de cette période. Elle est un véritable laboratoire d'expérimentation autant qu'un ferment d'inspiration pour l'avenir. Elle a su s'allier les collaborateurs les plus audacieux de l'époque pour proposer une révolution des principes de l'Opéra, tant avec des œuvres de répertoire qu'avec des créations contemporaines. On y voit notamment Arthur Maria Rabenalt s'assurer la collaboration d'Oskar Schlemmer dans la mise en scène de « La Main heureuse » et de Teo Otto dans « Erwartung » (Schœnberg) , Jürgen Fehling, celle d'Ewald Düllberg dans « le Vaisseau fantôme » (Wagner) , Otto Klemperer celle du même Düllberg dans « Œdipe Rex » (Stravinsky) , ou encore celle de Niedecken-Gebhard dans « Cardillac » (Hindemith) - autant de grands moments d'Opéra qui ont célébré le dialogue des artistes avec les leurs metteurs en scène du XXe siècle. Dans ce contexte, la collaboration de Moholy-Nagy avec Hans Curjel (par ailleurs, intendant de l'établissement) complète le panel expérimental et permet la mise en œuvre sur scène des théories constructivistes du « Bauhaus » . D'après ce qu'en rapportent les critiques Adolf Weißmann, Theodor W. Adorno, Heinrich Strobel et Oskar Bie dans leurs comptes rendus, mais aussi grâce à divers témoignages et mémoires (Hans Curjel, Sybil Mohly-Nagy) , nous pouvons reconstituer en partie le fonctionnement de la mise en scène et interpréter avec davantage de justesse les quelques documents iconographiques dont nous disposons aujourd'hui.

Le projet initial peut sembler paradoxal : vouloir confronter un univers par excellence figuratif à une esthétique tout entière orientée vers l'abstraction. Pourtant, dans cette collaboration de Moholy-Nagy (alors assisté du jeune Teo Otto) et de Hans Curjel, c'est la confrontation d'une rhétorique ancienne de la mimésis avec les moyens modernistes de sa mise en forme qui intéresse - et la façon dont le travail scénique entre en résonance avec l'univers mécaniste qui irrigue l'imaginaire créateur de Weimar. L'approche scénique de Moholy-Nagy fait table rase dans une certaine mesure, mais à l'intérieur d'un genre très établi, et compose avec les données d'une œuvre née d'une tout autre idéologie de la représentation. La réalisation de Moholy-Nagy est caractérisée par 3 aspects majeurs : le travail sur la perspective constructiviste, l'idée de la cinétique et l'intérêt pour les nouveaux média (film, photo) .

La perspective est un élément central de l'approche constructiviste. Les principes développés par l'artiste jusqu'alors, mis en œuvre dans le film ou la photo notamment, doivent se retrouver dans l'espace tridimensionnel. Son rapport à la scène porte ainsi la même marque du changement de regard : traitement oblique de la perspective, utilisation de l'espace comme une surface plane séquencée en plusieurs parties qui en rythment la composition, point de vue décalés (vue du ciel, plans de coupe sur intérieur) . Il recourt à l'échafaudage pour matérialiser la structuration de l'espace, là où il recourait à la combinatoire de la ligne oblique et verticale pour structurer l'espace bidimensionnel de l'image photographique.

Pour le prologue, la taverne de Luther à Nuremberg est matérialisée par un échafaudage sous lequel sont accumulées des chaises en acier (dessinées et produites avec son collègue du « Bauhaus » , Marcel Breuer) . La structure est flanquée d'un grand escalier en colimaçon qui dessert la galerie supérieure, permettant la circulation de Lindorf au-dessus des chaises.

L'espace scénique, ainsi découpé en plusieurs niveaux dans sa hauteur, est traité en surface plane, la profondeur n'intervient plus comme un élément de signification, contrairement au dispositif traditionnel dans lequel la lecture du champ de profondeur indique l'importance du rôle des personnages. (31) Hans Curjel, dans un article consacré à l'œuvre scénique de Moholy-Nagy, (32) évoque ces « Flächenbilder » (images planes) comme caractéristique de l'approche constructiviste où la profondeur est dissoute dans la composition géométrique de la surface. Moholy-Nagy accorde également une importance fondamentale à la lumière, qu'il utilise comme un élément à part entière au service de la communication visuelle, autant que pour parfaire chacune de ses compositions scéniques (la recherche de la forme abstraite, « Gestaltung » , est reconduite dans la décomposition des éléments de la scène : lignes, mouvements, couleurs) . Il utilise notamment un rayon lumineux comme ligne mobile, qui donne à la composition l'animation nécessaire. Curjel rapporte que « les effets de lumière et de couleur correspondaient aux séquences dramatiques et musicales de l'œuvre » . (33) L'appareillage lumineux évolue d'ailleurs rapidement vers davantage de complexité dans « Madama Butterfly » qu'il met en scène, toujours à la « Krolloper » (février 1931) , et dans laquelle il collabore à nouveau avec Curjel. Il parvient à réaliser ce qu'il esquissait en 1928 dans un article consacré au film sonore : (34) « projeter la lumière à travers une suite de plusieurs écrans, en partie transparents, tels que filets, grillages, etc. » afin « d'enrichir nos observations spatiales » . Il utilise un écran sur lequel est imprimée une vue d'avion de Nagasaki, en façon de carte postale en noir et blanc, et devant lequel pend une structure en bâtons de bambou, à la fois mur intérieur de la maison Butterfly et fenêtre sur l'extérieur.

Lorsque la nuit tombe à l'Acte 3 et que la scène se fait plus intime, l'écran, éclairé par derrière, ne laisse plus apparaître que la silhouette de la baie de Nagasaki en ombre chinoise et les bambous, éclairés par un rayon de face, ramènent la lumière (et l'attention) au 1er plan.

Theodor W. Adorno, qui suit de près les innovations de la « Krolloper », est particulièrement sensible à ce traitement de la lumière dans son compte rendu des « Contes d'Hoffmann » :

« L'éclairage de la scène n'est plus celui de l'illusion et du merveilleux à l'ancienne, mais ce n'est pas non plus l'ambiance humide de l'impressionnisme, pas plus que le faisceau symbolique privé d'espace de l'expressionnisme : l'affinité de la lumière elle-même tend bien plutôt à la construction de l'espace, l'espace, au sens le plus littéral, se compose d'un complexe de lumières. » (35)

L'importance du mouvement sur scène est étroitement liée à la compréhension de l'espace. Il est intéressant de relever, à cet égard, la référence de Moholy-Nagy au physicien et philosophe autrichien Ernst Mach, qu'il cite dans un article de sa période américaine consacré à la relation spatiale :

« L'espace consiste en le rapport entre la position de 2 corps. Ceci se comprend de la façon suivante : prenons 2 corps, disons la terre et la lune. L'espace se comprend à partir de la relation entre leurs positions respectives. Changeons à présent la terre et la lune en d'autres corps, par exemple 2 chaises. Cette expérience des rapports visibles entre les positions peut être constatée dans le mouvement (par l'altération de la position) ainsi que par le toucher, il peut être vérifié par les sens. » (36)

Dans sa tentative de réduire la compréhension du monde à des principes fondamentaux de la sensation (précédant de peu l'approche phénoménologique), Mach s'en tient à un relativisme de la sensation, qui devient l'étalon du rapport sujet-objet et joue un rôle constitutif dans la représentation du monde. L'espace ne se laisse saisir que relativement à la position des corps qui l'occupent et au mouvement que sous-tendent leurs rapports. D'où la nécessité, pour Nagy, de matérialiser ces rapports et de les représenter dans le jeu scénique au moyen de structures mobiles. Il s'agit de faire apparaître « le rapport entre l'homme, le matériau, la force et l'espace » (« Zusammenhang zwischen Mensch, Material, Kraft, Raum. ») . Il faut sans doute rapprocher ce projet de l'influence exercée par son collaborateur, El Lissizsky, avec lequel il fonde à Berlin, en 1922, le Groupe G. Lissizsky qui prônait déjà le recours à des structures scéniques d'échafaudages pour la diversité des combinaisons qu'elles offrent et faisait de leur déplacement sur scène un élément du jeu à part entière. L'idée du mouvement, du ballet mécanique de la structure en recomposition sur scène dans le temps du jeu, façonne l'esthétique constructiviste :

élément, à son tour, doit répondre aux exigences et aux intentions. Ils coulissent, roulent, flottent dans l'air, au-dessus et à l'intérieur des échafaudages. » (37)

De la même manière, Nagy conçoit pour « les Contes d'Hoffmann » un plateau mobile qui fait évoluer à vue la composition des structures scéniques, permettant, par exemple, le changement du prologue à l'Acte I (le cabinet de Spalanzani) . De même, dans « Madama Butterfly », la structure de maison pivotante, grâce à la variation de lumières colorées sur l'horizon de la scène, renouvelle constamment la composition de l'espace. Curjel décrit également le bal des modules sur scène, des mouvements et contre-mouvements des plate-formes de la maison et du jardin, et jusqu'à l'annonce de la disparition de Madame Butterfly dans un jeu d'ombres qui opère la métamorphose du personnage en une silhouette virtuelle, flottante, aux contours évanescents. (38) Ces « espaces imaginaires mobiles » se déplacent selon les besoins du jeu, et ouvrent un nouveau rapport à l'espace scénique, qui se développe en des formes nouvelles et connaît des extensions inédites : pendant la scène de la barcarolle, des filles « se balancent, figées en une posture rêveuse, suspendues en hauteur au-dessus des spectateurs. » (39)

L'iconographie le confirme : le jeu d'ombres et de lumières vient dédoubler l'espace réel des structures d'acier, amplifier le volume de la scène par une occupation de toute la hauteur et renvoie l'univers offenbachien à ses caractéristiques :

Le résultat n'est d'ailleurs pas sans évoquer le dispositif du « Raum-Licht Modulator » , conçu dès 1922, et réalisé pour l'exposition parisienne de la Société des artistes décorateurs de 1930, au Grand Palais.

Nagy, dans le livret qui accompagnait la représentation des « Contes » , présente son dispositif comme une tentative de « faire advenir l'espace à partir de la lumière et de l'ombre. Les décors se déplacent ici de façon à produire les ombrages. Tout est transparent et toutes les transparences sont soumises à la composition d'un espace tangible. » (41) Les techniques du corps, élément à part entière de la composition scénique, évoluent de même. Le chanteur doit se débarrasser de la grammaire gestuelle héritée d'un style opératique vieilli, chargé « d'une ostentation conventionnelle, de gestes aveugles, routiniers et ridicules. » (42) C'est désormais un corps différent que l'on montre, acquis à la mécanique. Le geste du chanteur devient un élément de la composition de mouvements qui animent la grande machine scénique, au même titre que les jeux de lumières. La logique de dissociation trouve également écho dans l'attrait pour les nouveaux médias : non seulement des jeux de miroirs accentuent certains gestes, défamiliarisent la présence des corps sur scène, mais encore l'usage du film fait son apparition. Une projection vient, l'espace d'une courte minute, dédoubler le temps de l'action et sa matérialisation physique dans l'Acte 3 - « Giulietta » , à Venise. (43) On peut y voir, avec Kracauer, la proposition d'une augmentation poétique de la réalité - ce qu'il thématise sous l'idée de « rédemption » : « isolées du reste du corps et très grossières, ces parties du corps que nous connaissons vont se transformer en des organes inconnus palpitant de leur propre vie. Ces images font exploser notre environnement en un double sens : elles l'agrandissent littéralement et, du même coup, elles font sauter la prison de la réalité convenue et y déploient des espaces que nous n'avons encore explorés, au mieux, qu'en rêve. » (44) La collaboration de Moholy-Nagy la même année avec Erwin Piscator dans la mise en scène de Der Kaufmann von Berlin à la Volksbühne (septembre 1929) est l'occasion pour lui de développer ce nouvel instrumentarium de la scène moderne, dans laquelle il recourt plus amplement à la projection de films et d'images. L'écho est flagrant au programme énoncé dans « Die Bühne im Bauhaus » , qui posait la question de l'analogie de la scène et des arts plastiques :

« Les arts plastiques ont découvert les moyens purs de leur conception : le rapport des couleurs primaires, des masses, des matériaux, etc. Mais comment des séries de pensées ou de mouvements peuvent-elle se laisser ordonner à forces égales dans leur rapport avec des éléments maîtrisés, « absolus » , de son, de lumière (couleur) , de forme et de mouvement ? Ainsi, la répétition d'une idée avec les mêmes mots, en respectant la même intonation ou en la variant, par le biais de nombreux acteurs, peut agir comme moyen d'une conception théâtrale synthétique. (Des chœurs - mais pas le chœur antique, qui accompagne, passif !) Ou bien, au moyen de dispositifs de miroirs, des visages, des gestes d'acteurs prodigieusement agrandis et leurs voix, corrélativement à cet agrandissement, amplifiées. C'est précisément le même effet que celui engendré par la reproduction simultanée, synoptique, synacoustique (optico- ou acoustico-mécanique) de pensées (cinéma, gramophone, haut-parleur) . » (45)

La technique vient donc opérer sur scène la séparation mise en œuvre dans les compositions picturales antérieures entre les éléments. Dans la matérialité des composantes de l'espace scénique apparaît l'homme nouveau : représentation dans la représentation. La figuration des sens (par amplification, déformation, isolement - autant de manifestations de leur autonomisation) accompagne cette vision de l'Opéra dans un mouvement qui montre et démonte, dans une synthèse qui déconstruit. Si l'humain reste au centre de la composition lyrique, son entrée dans l'abstraction produit une interprétation nouvelle : il s'agit désormais de « l'homme en tant que part de nature au fonctionnement mécanique. » (46)

La scénographie de Nagy avait, on s'en doute, de quoi choquer le public contemporain de l'univers petit bourgeois du décorum romantique, de la toile peinte, des rochers de carton-pâte et du mobilier naturaliste. Sybil Moholy-Nagy souligne ce contraste et rend compte de la réception de cette production qui fit scandale et sensation :

« Le spectateur qui venait pour s'abîmer dans la douceur de la Barcarole et se délecter d'une image du Grand Canal en papier mâché voyait ses plaisirs conservateurs persiflés par cette scène irrévocablement moderne. Au lieu de barges, les couples d'amoureux devaient s'allonger dans des nacelles pliantes en acier inoxydable, qui se détachaient d'un mur nu à l'annonce de la musique. Au lieu d'un ciel éclairé aux néons, constellé de bulbes d'étoiles, un plafond fuselé blanc dessinait la perspective vers le lointain profond, d'où les figures rococo de Hoffmann émergeaient, vêtus de costumes qui faisaient contraster le smoking clownesque du père d'Antonia avec l'allure mobile et futuriste de la robe de sa fille. » (47)

Le critique Adolf Weißmann, dans son compte rendu de la première des « Contes d'Hoffmann » , s'étonne pourtant du scandale suscité par ce « regard nouveau » : pourquoi ne pas rencontrer chez Offenbach, précisément lieu du rendez-vous de l'humain et de la machine, l'univers mécanique d'un constructivisme intégral ? « Pourquoi l'agencement et les mouvements ne seraient-ils pas expérimentaux, dans le cabinet d'expériences de Spalanzani ? Pourquoi ne pourrait-on nous mettre sous les yeux l'avènement de l'homme artificiel ? Et pourquoi le fantomatique ne pourrait-il habiter aussi dans la lumière sous les plafonds de toiles inclinées ? » (48) Les poupées et autres marionnettes mécaniques hantent, en effet, depuis longtemps l'imaginaire littéraire et théâtral. Déjà le « Coppélia » de Léo Delibes et « les Contes d'Hoffmann » de Jacques Offenbach se sont fait les relais de ces figures ambivalentes que rêvaient Hoffmann et Kleist, à la recherche de la grâce qui n'appartient « qu'à la matière sans conscience ou à la conscience infinie » . (49) Un tel fantasme ne pouvait manquer de trouver un écho retentissant dans une société où l'homme, en pleines noces avec la technique industrielle, est en quête de grâce auprès de dieux nouveaux. Parmi les créatures théâtrales de l' « homme nouveau » , l'humain côtoie ainsi la machine comme un devenir possible autant que comme un substitut vraisemblable, à la fois projet fascinant (révéléur de la « machine désirante » qui s'incarne en lui) et menace terrible (lieu de l'anéantissement, horizon borné, clos, privé de tout devenir) .

En somme, Moholy-Nagy propose d'abord un rapport renouvelé à la mimésis, une rénovation de la façon dont l'humain se parle, se dit, se représente au sein de l'institution qu'est l'Opéra. Si la perspective d'une fusion de l'abstraction et de la représentation relève sans doute du paradoxe (ou de l'utopie) , la réalisation scénique de Moholy-Nagy pose, néanmoins, la question de ses composantes essentielles (des techniques de la mimésis et de ses limites dans le cadre lyrique) et propose une réponse au désir moderne de reconfigurer la vision du monde à partir de l'homme nouveau. Alors s'impose, toujours renouvelé, l'espoir d'atteindre l'origine, l'essence :

« Lorsqu'on donne autant d'espace aux éléments optique, acoustique et cinétique qu'aux éléments littéraires, alors on approche de l'essence du théâtre. » (50)

Est-ce finalement l'homme qui disparaît derrière la machine ? La passion constructiviste pour la forme, son culte de l'abstraction, son désir de totalité par la convocation des sens ne renvoient-ils pas plutôt à l'affirmation ultime de l'humain dans un geste d'anthropomorphisation ? C'est, autrement dit, la rencontre de la marionnette et de l'humain dans le même corps : les marionnettes ont grandi à la taille humaine et les fils se sont résorbés à l'intérieur pour devenir ceux de la conscience.

These included anatomy, garden design, contract negotiation, book-keeping, and art history. The Statues of the “ Staatliche Bauhaus ”, in Weimar, published in January 1921, which includes a section on the curriculum, makes likewise no mention of theatre. »

Signalons que Moholy-Nagy s'était intéressé aux problèmes théoriques du film dès ses jeunes années avant de mettre en pratique ses propres idées vers la fin des années 1920. Il réalise dans cette période une dizaine de courts métrages, dont « Impressionnen vom alten marseiller Hafen » (9 minutes, 1929) ; « Ein Lichtspiel : schwarz, weiss, grau » (6 minutes, 1931) ; et « Berliner Stilleben » (9 minutes, 1931) sont des exemples achevés de sa pratique du montage au service d'une recherche, avant tout, formelle - dans l'esprit documentaire du 1er et du 3e, comme dans la fantaisie expérimentale du second.

So kann die Wiederholung eines Gedankens mit denselben Worten, in gleichem oder verschiedenem Tonfall durch viele Darsteller als Mittel synthetischer Theatergestaltung wirken. Instead of a neon-lit sky studded with bulb stars, a tapered white ceiling led into a deep perspective from which Hoffmann's rococo figures emerged in costumes which contrasted the clownish tuxedo of Antonia's father with the futuristic mobility of his daughter's gown. »

Le « Kroll Oper »

Le milieu de l'Allemagne - l'Histoire du « Kroll Oper »

Durée : 59 minutes - Date de production : 1990 - Producteur : © Brilliant Music Media MDCCCCLXXX , du cinéaste allemand, Jörg Moser-Metius.

Ce documentaire retrace l'histoire du « Kroll Oper » , un bâtiment célèbre situé sur la Place de la République à Berlin, au beau milieu de l'Allemagne. Il fut bâti en 1844 avant d'être complètement démoli en 1956.

À l'origine construit pour être un centre-de-danse, nommé « Kroll Établissement » , il est changé en maison d'Opéra au début du XIXe siècle. Le ténor italien Enrico Caruso y a chanté, des artistes de l'École du « Bauhaus » y ont travaillé, et lorsqu'Otto Klemperer fut désigné comme son directeur musical, le « Kroll Oper » devint le centre de l'avant-garde musicale européenne.

L'histoire artistique du bâtiment prend tragiquement fin lorsque les Nazis en prennent possession et en font leur siège politique après l'incendie criminel du « Reichstag » , en 1933. Le documentaire revient sur les différents rôles que le « Kroll Oper » a joué dans l'histoire de la ville de Berlin, sur le plan culturel, musical, et politique.

L'Opéra « Kroll » (ou « Kroll-Oper » de Berlin, aujourd'hui disparu) riverain à l'ouest de la Königsplatz (aujourd'hui « Platz der Republik ») faisait face au Palais du « Reichstag » . Il fut construit en 1844 pour le restaurateur Josef Kroll sur un terrain offert par le roi Frédéric-Guillaume IV de Prusse, afin de devenir un lieu de divertissement (un centre-de-danse, nommé « Kroll Établissement ») . Les architectes furent Ludwig Persius, Eduard Knoblauch (le 1er architecte privé de Berlin par son importance) et Carl Ferdinand Langhans. Le bâtiment, victime d'un incendie accidentel mais dévastateur, sera réaménagé en maison lyrique en 1851 et sera utilisé pour des représentations d'Opéras, d'Opérettes et de pièces de théâtre. Il sera à nouveau réaménagé en 1895 et renommé Nouvel Opéra Royal, la résidence des compagnies prussiennes d'Opéra et de ballet de l'État.

En 1924, le bâtiment (d'une capacité de 2,100 sièges) est rebaptisé Opéra d'État de la place de la République (« Staatsoper am Platz der Republik ») , mais est toujours appelé familièrement l'Opéra « Kroll » . La place de la République ou « Platz der Republik » est située près du « Großer Tiergarten », dans le quartier de Tiergarten - l'arrondissement de « Mitte ». Elle est actuellement bordée, sur son côté Est, par le palais du « Reichstag », en face duquel se trouvait l'Opéra. Elle est aujourd'hui recouverte d'une vaste pelouse de 36,900 mètres carrés.

À cette époque, la capitale allemande était un des plus grands centres internationaux de l'art. Le Berlin d'avant-guerre fut un moment unique. On y retrouvait les artistes Kurt Weill, Bertolt Brecht et Lotte Lenya. Berlin était le centre de la musique d'avant-garde. Durant cette période, Otto Klemperer dirigeait l'Opéra « Kroll ». Bruno Walter et Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirigeaient également à Berlin.

L'artiste Ernst Ludwig Kirchner s'engagera en 1915 dans l'armée mais il est réformé 2 mois plus tard en raison de problèmes de santé (maladie pulmonaire, état dépressif, aggravés par la consommation d'alcool et de stupéfiants) . Il fait alors plusieurs séjours au sanatorium du Docteur Oskar Kohnstamm, à « Königstein im Taunus » dans la Heße, dont il décorera certains murs, aujourd'hui détruits. Intéressé par le portrait, il amorcera sa série de gravures sur bois alors qu'il fait la rencontre d'Otto Klemperer (« Le Pianiste Otto Klemperer » de 1916, gravure sur bois, « Kirchner Museum », Davos) . Kirchner a produit dans un style très personnel des œuvres qui reflètent ses années d'étude auprès d'Arnold Schönberg et ses rencontres avec d'autres musiciens d'exception comme Ernst Toch, Ernest Bloch, Roger Sessions, Igor Stravinsky.

Nommé Directeur musical de l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin, de 1927 à 1931, le chef-d'orchestre Otto Klemperer en fit très rapidement une des Ires scènes lyriques d'Allemagne, en dirigeant tous les compositeurs modernes de son époque. La maison devint rapidement célèbre par son orientation très particulière : être un théâtre de créations et une scène d'avant-garde en ce qui concerne les décors et la mise-en-scène du répertoire. Elle accueillera les nouvelles œuvres de Franz Schreker, Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith (son Opéra « Neues vom Tage » *, en 1929) , Arnold Schönberg (son opéra « Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene » , en 1930) et Igor Stravinsky (avec la première d' « Œdipus Rex ») dans des mises-en-scène expressionnistes, une politique novatrice fortement encouragée par la République de Weimar, mais qui valut à son auteur l'opprobre des Nationaux-Socialistes (Nazis) , bientôt au pouvoir. Il dirigea également le Chœur philharmonique et, de 1931 à 1933, travailla au « Staatsoper » de Berlin.

* « Nouvelles du jour » est un Opéra-comique en 3 parties de Paul Hindemith sur un livret de Marcellus Schiffer. Composé en 1928, il est créé à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin sous la direction d'Otto Klemperer. Sa création parisienne se tiendra en novembre 1962 au TNP, sous la direction de Charles Bruck. Synopsis : Édouard et Laura sont mari et femme et veulent divorcer, mais le chemin de la séparation conjugale est long et semé d'embûches.

31 août 1928 - « Die Dreigroschenoper » (« L'Opéra de quat'sous ») , sur un livret de Bertolt Brecht est créé à Berlin, au « Theater am Schiffbauerdamm » , sous la direction de Theo Mackeben, avec Roma Bahn dans le rôle de Jenny, Lotte Lenya dans celui de Jenny, et Harald Paulsen en Mackeath. Le livret est inspiré par une traduction d'Elisabeth Hauptmann de « l'Opéra des gueux » (« The Beggar's Opera ») de Johann Christoph Pepusch et John Gay. L'œuvre fait scandale et devient très populaire dans le monde entier, les revenus de cette œuvre, lui permettent de se consacrer à la composition. Le succès, s'explifie après guerre, quand la complainte de Mackie-Messer devient un standard du jazz, après les interprétations de Sidney Bechet et de Louis Armstrong. Le 7 février 1929, la suite «

Kleine Dreigroschenmusik » , réalisée d'après « l'Opéra de quat'sous » , pour instruments à vent, est créée à Berlin sous la direction d'Otto Klemperer.

Le navire du Hollandais, avec ses mâts échelonnés sur 3 niveaux et ses voiles rouges avait une immédiateté laconique et une présence ténébreuse. Le 1er plan ne représente pas la grève rocheuse, mais plutôt la jetée d'un port.

7 février 1929 : Création à Berlin de la suite pour instruments à vent, « Kleine Dreigroschenmusik » de Kurt Weill réalisée d'après « l'Opéra de quat'sous » , sous la direction d'Otto Klemperer.

Après l'accueil houleux, en 1929, de « Neues vom Tage » , l'Opéra satirique de Paul Hindemith, le directeur musical du « Kroll Oper » de Berlin, Otto Klemperer, préféra ne pas renouveler l'expérience avec l'Opéra de Kurt Weill et de Bertolt Brecht. Le 9 mars 1930, le public lyrique de Leipzig connut ainsi, avec graves agitations, la création de « Mahagonny » de Kurt Weill, lre carrière éphémère qui s'acheva 2 ans plus tard par la destruction des partitions sur ordre des Nazis.

En 1929, Kurt Weill acheva la partition de son Opéra « Grandeur et Décadence de la ville de Mahagonny » , dont les révisions datent d'octobre de la même année et dont la première eut lieu au « Neues Theater » de Leipzig, le 9 mars 1930, sous la direction de Gustav Brecher. Des contacts avaient été pris au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin avec le chef Otto Klemperer, qui condamna « la grossièreté des situations et de la langue » .

Lászlo Moholy-Nagy (1895-1946)

Les pressions politiques de la fin des années '20 pousseront Lászlo Moholy-Nagy à démissionner de son poste à l'École du « Bauhaus » . (Hannes Meyer remplacera Walter Gropius au « Bauhaus » de Dessau, en 1928.) Il s'installera à Berlin, de 1928 à 1934. Ne s'associant plus à la peinture, il explorera d'autres avenues de création pour faire vivre sa famille. Il dirigera un atelier de graphisme et de design qui recouvre le domaine de la publicité, de la conception, de l'installation d'expositions et le domaine scénique. Il collaborera régulièrement avec le « Kroll Oper » de Berlin et avec le Théâtre (politisé) Erwin Piscator. Les militants extrémistes (Communistes et Nazis) attaqueront ses mises-en-scène sur-mécanisées du « Kroll Oper » de Berlin qui réduisaient l'importance des chanteurs au profit du message global.

Après un bref séjour à Amsterdam, l'artiste s'établit à Londres en 1935, où il réalise des films documentaires tel « The New Architecture at the London Zoo » (« La Nouvelle Architecture au Zoo de Londres », 1936, où il instaure un dialogue cinématographique avec les expériences architecturales de Berthold Lubetkin).

2 ans plus tard, il accepte de diriger le « New Bauhaus » de Chicago, institution nouvellement fondée par l'« Association of the Arts and Industries », mais l'école ne parvient pas au terme de sa 1re année d'existence, faute d'un commanditaire solide. La grande notoriété de Lászlo Moholy-Nagy aux États-Unis, obtenue grâce à la diffusion de son œuvre mais aussi et surtout par la traduction de ses écrits, lui permet d'ouvrir avec succès sa propre « School of Design » à Chicago, ville où il réside jusqu'à sa mort le 24 novembre 1946. Ses 3 ouvrages théoriques majeurs, « Malerei, Fotografie, Film » (Munich, 1925) ; « Von Material zu Architektur » (Munich, 1929, édité en anglais à New York, dès 1930, sous le titre « The New Vision ») ; et enfin, « Vision in Motion » (Chicago, 1947) ont éclairé la sensibilité visuelle du XXe siècle, autant que l'économie matérielle des nouveaux médias. Ils ont influencé, entre autres, les réflexions de Walter Benjamin sur la reproduction photographique, celles de John Cage et de Marshall McLuhan sur le développement de l'environnement audio-visuel.

Oskar Schlemmer (1888-1943)

Longtemps attiré par le théâtre et la danse, Oskar Schlemmer rejoint le corps professoral de l'École du « Bauhaus » en 1921 et dirige le Théâtre du « Bauhaus », de 1925 à 1929. Trait d'union réalisant l'accord de la musique et de la danse, le corps, au début du XXe siècle, abandonne ses référents originels pour entrer dans la modernité : au corps-pulsion incarné par « Lulu » (« Lulu », Opéra d'Alban Berg) succède un corps-idée, corps reconstruit, dont les mouvements captent et traduisent les énergies contemporaines. Schlemmer a développé au « Bauhaus » un style chorégraphique connu sous le nom de « danses architectoniques ». Il a présenté des pièces dépourvues de trame narrative, qui associaient le mouvement à des formes abstraites, géométriques. Il enfermait ses interprètes dans des costumes qui occultaient et « déshumanisaient » leurs corps, pour leur donner l'apparence de grandes sculptures abstraites. Ses chorégraphies comportaient des mouvements sans difficulté technique majeure, souvent répétitifs, qui imitaient l'action d'objets mécanisés.

Au cœur de cette « Gesamtkunstwerk » réalisant le triple accord entre danse, costume et musique, et symbolisant la « Triade » corps, âme, esprit, l'homme « sur scène devient événement », selon ce créateur polymorphe, peintre, sculpteur, chorégraphe, musicien, danseur, compositeur (entré au « Bauhaus », en 1921, comme « Maître de Forme ») et qui, par la fulgurance de sa pensée transversale, contribua au stimulant décloisonnement des champs artistiques.

L'œuvre la plus représentative de ce style d'Oskar Schlemmer est son « Ballet triadique » (« Triadisches Ballett ») . Une ballet chorégraphique conçue en collaboration avec Hannes Winkler, sur une musique de Paul Hindemith, qui se fonde sur une approche pluri-disciplinaire du mouvement et qui sera présenté en première mondiale au Festival de musique-de-chambre de Donaueschingen, le 30 septembre 1922. Les interprètes étaient Edith Demharter, Ralph Smolik et Hannes Winkler. Œuvre fondamentale du « Bauhaus » pour la danse moderne, ce ballet.

1927 - Festival de Donaueschingen : Les figures du « Ballet triadique » d'Oskar Schlemmer ouvrent cette parade sur des extraits de la musique pour percussion composée par Hermann Scherchen.

1930 - Oskar Schlemmer : Création des décors et de costumes de l'Opéra « la Main heureuse » (« Die glückliche Hand ») , drame musical d'Arnold Schönberg, mise-en-scène de Arthur Maria Rabenalt, au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin.

« Deutsche Zeitung » 10. Juni 1930 (Paul Zschorlich)

Schönberg-Heuchelei bei Kroll Oper

Auf Arnold Schönberg bezogen klingen die beiden Titel « Erwartung » und « Die glückliche Hand » wie ein Hohn. Wir « erwarten » gar nichts von ihm, schon seit Jahren nicht, und das er eine höchst unglückliche Hand hat, wissen wir längst.

Wir wissen noch mehr : daß Herr Schönberg seinen Ruf fast ausschließlich den zahlreichen Konzertsandalen zu verdanken hat, die seinen künstlerischen Lebensweg zieren, und das mau auf diese Art unfreiwilliger Berühmtheit seit Jahren ein Geschäft aufzubauen sucht. Er ist Autodidakt und, was wichtiger ist, der Schwager Alexander von Zemlinsky, des Kapellmeisters der Kroll-Oper. Dieser dirigierte auch die « Erwartung » .Vastehste !

Seit Opus 6 hat Schönberg eine Reihe schwerer künstlerischer Fehlgeburten gehabt, die uns vor das seltsame Problem stellten, daß auch sterile Individuen unter Umständen fruchtbar sein können. Das « Schaffen » Schönbergs stellt sich dar als eine Verneinung aller deutschen Musikkultur, als eine Vernichtung des Geschmacks, des Gefühls, der Überlieferung und aller ästhetischen Grundsätze.

Schönberg aufführen heißt so viel wie Kokainstuben fürs Volk eröffnen. Kokain ist Gift. Schönbergs Musik ist Kokain. In berechtigter Selbstwehr hat sich das deutsche Konzertpublikum jahrelang gegen diese Vergiftung gewehrt, zuletzt noch im Dezember 1929 bei Furtwängler. Jetzt aber ist es schlaff geworden, in der Kroll-Oper gab es keinen Skandal, sondern nur Langeweile. « Erwartung » ist ein Monodrama. Richtiger : ein Monotonodrama. Eine Frau begibt sich nachts in einen Wald. Was tut sie dort ? Was sucht sie in der Dunkelheit ? Wir erfahren es nicht. Sie stellt sich vor uns auf und redet und redet. Wir verstehen auch nicht, was sie redet, denn das Orchester deckt das Meiste zu und die Worte bleiben unverständlich. Aber wenn die Frau auch nichts weiter sucht, so findet, sie doch etwas. Sie stößt plötzlich mit dem Fuß an einen Körper, und das ist nicht einmal ein Fremdkörper, sondern - die Leiche ihres Geliebten ! Dieser Anstoß genügt, um sie länger als eine halbe Stunde wimmern, sich in hysterischen Anfällen und epileptischen Krämpfen ergehen zu lassen. Denn sonst ist niemand auf der Bühne. Die Szene wird von dieser Frau allein bestritten.

Herr Schönberg macht dazu eine Musik, die eine Gipfelleistung erfinderischer Impotenz wie rohester Klangscheußlichkeit ist. (Allein schon das Gequäke der hervorstechenden Oboen muß jedes feinere Ohr beleidigen.) Man wird auf eine Folter gespannt. Nirgends auch nur ein Ausblick auf einen schöpferischen Gedanken. Wenn man unter einem Dilettanten einen Mann versteht, der möchte und nicht kann, so haben wir es hier mit dem Musterbeispiel von Dilettantismus zu tun.

Aber ich meine : wenn es auch traurig ist, das dergleichen mehr als vierzig Jahre nach Wagner geschrieben und dem deutschen Volk angeboten wird, schlimmer noch ist es, das sich ein Operninstitut dazu hergibt, dergleichen aufzuführen. Das Allerschlimmste aber, daß die Hörer es mit Schafsgeduld hinnehmen und so tun, als ob sie etwas davon verstünden. Zwar handelt es sich dabei nur um einen ganz kleinen Kreis, denn obwohl man überreichlich Frei- und Steuerkarten ausgegeben hatte, war das Haus am Pfingstsonnabend nur mäßig besucht. Die Schönberg-Klemperer-Klique war ganz unter sich. Daher denn auch der « Erfolg » , dem nicht die mindeste Bedeutung zukommt und der sozusagen unter Ausschluß der Öffentlichkeit zustande kam. Die Musik Schönbergs ist für mich indiskutabel. Ich weiß, daß sie es auch für andere ist, selbst für solche, die sonst allem « Modernen » leicht zugänglich sind. Ich sprach in der Pause mit einigen Personen, die bekantten, sich entsetzlich gelangweilt zu haben. Aber keiner muckte auf, als der Vorhang fiel. Sie nahmen die Sache hin wie ein unentrinnbares Verhängnis. Man ist müde, in der Musik wie in der Politik. Man läßt die Dinge laufen. Es ist ein Jammer ! Ich habe mich nicht überwinden können, die « Glückliche Hand » noch anzuhören. Ich hatte die Empfindung, damit Schönberg zu viel Ehre anzutun. Daß sein Opus 18 genau so indiskutabel ist wie sein Opus 17, weiß ich im Voraus. Es kann nicht Aufgabe der Musikkritik sein, dem nackten Dilettantismus Vorschub zu leisten. Mögen es die besorgen, die sich Schönberg verwandter fühlen ! Auch über die künstlerischen Leistungen ist nichts zu sagen, denn es gab keine. Das Bühnenbild von Teo Otto - das Erzeugnis eines kaum durchschnittlichen handwerklichen Könnens. Man sah eine Wandeldekoration, deren Technik an eine Provinzschmiere erinnerte. Die Inszenierung eines Herrn so und so - ich möchte wissen, was es da zu « inszenieren » gab. Da sonst niemand auf der Bühne stand, kann der Mann nur die Sängerin Moje Forbach inszeniert haben, die zur Trägerin dieser albernen Szene verdammt war. Vielleicht hat sie die Töne richtig getroffen. Vielleicht nicht. Was liegt schon daran ? Wichtig zu wissen wäre nur, ob Herr Schönberg selber das mit Sicherheit zu beurteilen vermag. Woran ein Zweifel erlaubt ist. Auch diese « Erstaufführung » segelte unter dem Allerweltstitel « Berliner Kunstwochen » . Damit war ein Tiefpunkt erreicht, der ein Skandal an sich ist, gleichviel ob er ausbrach oder nicht.

Le peintre, décorateur de théâtre et scénographe de ballet allemand Oskar Schlemmer est né le 4 septembre 1888 à Stuttgart et est mort le 13 avril 1943 à Baden-Baden.

Après des études auprès de Willi Baumeister à l'Académie des Beaux-Arts de Stuttgart où il rencontre le peintre suisse Otto Meyer-Amden (1885-1933) , en 1907, il intègre le « Bauhaus » de Weimar, de 1920 à 1928, en tant que professeur de peinture puis de décorateur et scénographe, avant d'achever son parcours académique par une année d'enseignement à l'École de Beaux-Arts de Breslau (aujourd'hui, Wrocław) . Ses œuvres, peintes ou sculptées, témoignent de son souci d'allier l'immobilité hiératique de la rigueur géométrique et de la pureté des contours à la vivacité des formes et la mobilité de l'espace. Il en résulte une peinture qui rappelle à la fois le futurisme ou le constructivisme, par son aspect analytique, et le surréalisme, par son aspect onirique. Son œuvre est excellemment représentée à New York, à Francfort et, plus encore, à Stuttgart, où se trouvent les archives Schlemmer, qui contiennent notamment toutes ses esquisses en 2 ou 3 dimensions pour son « Ballet triadique » (« Triadisches Ballett ») de 1922. En 1937, Oskar Schlemmer est déclaré « artiste dégénéré » par les Nazis.

Plus encore que son confrère Rudolf von Laban, Oskar Schlemmer aura lancé le corps humain dans toutes les directions possibles. Et nul alors n'a mieux su le déployer dans l'espace sans écraser celui d'autrui, une chose que le Nazisme allait si effroyablement nier. Ce qui est fondamental dans les tableaux de Schlemmer, c'est l'immobilité de ses personnages, comme suspendus entre l'attente et l'arrêt ; cette indétermination du temps qui oscille entre le passé proche et le futur immédiat et donne toute sa justesse à la gestuelle. Elle semble ici précéder le verbe et on la retrouve telle que la discernait Oskar Schlemmer quand, dans le Salut Nazi, il devinait toute la terminologie du 3^e « Reich » avant même qu'elle ait été formulée.

L'une des plus fortes personnalités du « Bauhaus », où il enseigna de 1920 à 1929, tout d'abord chargé des ateliers de sculpture et de peinture murale, puis de l'atelier de théâtre (1923). Malgré une formation classique de peintre à Stuttgart chez Adolf Hoelzel, au côté de Meyer-Amden, Oskar Schlemmer a su élargir le champ de sa réflexion à partir de considérations purement plastiques dérivant de l'étude du corps humain et de ses rapports avec l'espace. Il préconise la réduction du corps à des éléments simples : cercle, sphère, cylindre, cône, et à des lignes géométriques dont l'emplacement est fixé par des règles de composition (« Homo », « figure T », 1919-1920). Ses peintures, ses dessins, ses aquarelles constituent, à eux seuls, un essai d'intégration de la surface peinte à la totalité de l'architecture que concrétisent mieux encore les peintures murales réalisées au « Bauhaus » ou à Essen : tonalités claires, volumes simples, trouées lumineuses, concertation et rapports de formes vivantes (« L'Entrée du stade », 1930 ; « L'Escalier du Bauhaus », 1932). Dans ces œuvres, l'homme est toujours présent, il est même le foyer de l'espace qui s'organise autour de lui. Ces conceptions, conjuguées à un refus de l'émotion, de l'expressivité, sont plus nettes encore dans les recherches théâtrales que Schlemmer a menées presque exclusivement au « Bauhaus ». Dans une mise-en-scène dépouillée à la manière de Gordon Craig et d'Adolphe Appia qui exclut toute action de type romantique, Schlemmer organise des ballets-mimodrames où seul compte le jeu plastique des corps dans l'espace : « partir des positions du corps, de sa simple présence, de la position debout, de la marche ». Les costumes pour lesquels l'imagination de l'artiste se plie à la géométrie en exploitant la richesse des matériaux (métal, y compris le fil-de-fer qu'il employait pour ses sculptures), les masques, les jeux de lumière et de couleurs (dus surtout à Hirschfeld-Mack) dramatisent le décor schématique (« Danse du métal », 1927) et les attitudes mécaniques issues de l'art de la marionnette (on retrouve ce thème chez Paul Klee, qui était au « Bauhaus » à cette époque). On retiendra, entre autres, le « Ballet triadique » (« Triadisches Ballett »), travaillé dès 1912 et présenté en 1922 (« Trilogie : danse, costume, musique »), « le Cabinet des figures » (1922), « la Danse des bâtons » (1927), où chacun des gestes du danseur est amplifié par les longs bâtons blancs fixés à ses membres, « les Danses d'expression » (1926). « Aborder le monde comme s'il venait tout juste d'être créé », conseillait Schlemmer, en 1929.

Ewald Felix Dülberg

Ewald Felix Dülberg (Emil Franz Konstantin Dülberg) naquit à Schwerin, le 12 décembre 1888, et est mort en 1933. Peintre, il sera reconnu comme le designer et le graveur en titre du mouvement expressionnisme. Dülberg étudia à l'Académie de Munich. En 1910, il entreprit sa carrière d'enseignant. Il travailla à l'école Odenwald Ober-Hambach puis rejoignit l'école « Bauhaus » de Weimar. Là, il développa une expertise en dessin, en théorie de la couleur, en tissage et en équipement scénique. Mais sa forme d'expression préférée restera la gravure sur bois avec laquelle il s'était déjà fait un nom avant l'arrivée de la Première Guerre mondiale. Le 8 juin 1919, il fut parmi les membres fondateurs de l'école d'Art nouveau (Sécession) de Darmstadt et en devint rapidement l'artiste le plus prolifique. Parmi ses élèves les plus célèbres, on retrouve : le concepteur Teo Otto, le peintre irlandais Cecil Salkeld et le peintre Arnold Bode, concepteur et fondateur de « La Documenta » (une manifestation d'art contemporain qui se tient tous les 5 ans, à Cassel) . En 1918, Hedwig Dülberg-Arnhem enseigna également à l'école Odenwald et suivit son (1er) mari à l'École du « Bauhaus » de Weimar. Ils eurent une fille, prénommée Marie-Esther. L'épouse démarrera avec succès une usine de textile et produira certaines des œuvres d'Ewald, soit des blanchets et des tapis. Après s'être divorcée en 1921, elle poursuivra ses études à l'atelier de tissage de Weimar. Ewald Dülberg sera nommé au poste de concepteur scénique du Théâtre municipal de Hambourg où il fera la connaissance, se liera d'amitié et collaborera avec le jeune et ambitieux chef d'orchestre allemand d'origine juive, Otto Klemperer. Ses décors d'Opéra austères, géométriques et épurés seront d'influence cubiste. Il suivra Klemperer lorsque ce dernier sera nommé directeur musical à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin, en 1927.

Sa célèbre « Crucifixion sur bois », datant de 1923, fera partie de l'exposition d' « Art dégénéré » (« Entartete Kunst ») , plus précisément exposée dans la salle ridiculisant les œuvres regroupées autour du thème de la chrétienté. La carrière d'enseignant d'Ewald Dülberg prendra abruptement fin en 1931, lors de sa révocation de la fonction publique prussienne. Il mourra en 1933. Ce brillant artiste de l'avant-garde restera connu pour son style ornemental et géométrique, sa période abstraite cubiste, de même que pour ses calligraphies. Ses dernières gravures sur bois ne seront publiées qu'à titre posthume.

Hedwig Arnheim-Dülberg

Hedwig était la fille-aînée de la famille Arnheim. Le père était docteur : Félix Arnheim. La mère : Élisabeth, née Samuel. Avec son frère Hans (né en 1895) et ses 2 sœurs, Eva Caroline Friederike (née le 24 mars 1902) et Ruth Anna Frieda (née le 16 avril 1912) , Hedwig fut éduquée dans le protestantisme. Hedwig était fort jolie, dotée d'une imagination fertile et d'un talent polyvalent. Sans oublier son côté ambitieux et sophistiqué. À 18 ans, elle quitta l'école pour vivre quelque temps en Grande-Bretagne. Artistiquement douée, elle était déjà inscrite à l'Académie des Arts d'Hambourg avant l'arrivée de la Première Guerre où elle fut l'élève de Friedrich Adler, un professeur d'art graphique et de design. La passion d'Hedwig se dirigea vers l'art de la broderie. Son professeur de dessin et de modèle vivant était le peintre et graveur sur bois, Ewald Dülberg. Elle en tomba rapidement amoureuse. Ils se marièrent en 1915. Mary Esther naquit de cette union, en 1918. Il divorcèrent 3 ans plus tard. La collaboration du couple Dülberg se transforma en une œuvre hybride commune, faite de la fusion fantastique et brillante de la peinture moderne avec l'art de la broderie et du tapis. Résultant en un équilibre parfait entre l'art pur et l'artisanat.

Hedwig Arnheim (accompagnée de la jeune Mary Esther) prit alors la direction de l'École « Bauhaus » de Weimar, où Hedwig put poursuivre sa spécialisation en textile auprès de Johannes Itten puis de Gunta Stölzl pour finalement compléter sa formation avec l'artiste-bijoutier et designer Naum Slutzky qu'elle épousera en 1923.

Dès le début du « Bauhaus », l'atelier de textile est l'atelier des nombreuses femmes qui suivent l'enseignement du « Bauhaus ». Différentes techniques sont initialement enseignées : tissage, crochet, nouage, macramé, broderie, couture ; mais l'atelier se transforme assez vite en atelier de tissage exclusivement, ce qui lui permet d'expérimenter le programme du « Bauhaus ». Les créations de l'atelier de tissage sont fortement influencées par les cours de Itten, Muche, Klee puis par ceux de Moholy-Nagy et de Kandinsky. Les créations sont dans l'esprit de l'art abstrait (rayures, formes simples, travail sur la couleur) . Après le déménagement à Dessau et sous l'impulsion de Stöltz, la production de l'atelier tend à devenir plus industrielle et de nouvelles matières sont utilisées - soie artificielle, cellophane. C'est aussi l'atelier de tissage qui développe les tissus pour les meubles en tubes d'acier de Breuer.

Le nouveau couple vécut à Berlin et travailla aux ateliers de Franz Singer. Pendant un court laps de temps, ils vécurent aussi à Vienne. Mais ils durent retourner à Hambourg pour des raisons économiques, dès octobre 1924. Le couple résidera sur la rue d'enfance d'Edwig, au n° 5 « Isequai » . (Une plaque commémorative s'y trouve.) Elle réussit à subsister comme designer d'intérieur et, plus tard, comme couturière. Elle divorça de Naum Slutzky, en 1930. Selon l'historien de l'art Hambourgeois, Bruhns Maïke :

« Elle a conçu et brodé des compositions avant-gardistes, des abstractions ton-sur-ton, de même que des nus féminins à la chevelure bleue, perlée de pierres sur un fond de laine jaune. »

Hedwig Arnheim emménagera au domicile de son père du n° 10 « Haynstraße » . Avec l'arrivée du régime nazi, elle émigra à Nice, dans le sud de la France, le 15 février 1936 pour poursuivre sa profession de couturière. Après la dénonciation française anti-sémite du 20 septembre 1943, elle fut interné 3 jours plus tard au camp-de-transition de Drancy. Elle faisait partie d'un groupe de 345 prisonniers juifs. Le 7 octobre, ils montèrent tous dans le convoi de déportation n° 60 qui prit le chemin du camp-de-concentration d'Auschwitz où Hedwig périt dans les chambres-à-gaz.

Hedwig Arnheim fit partie des 10 plus artistes-brodeurs de la 1re moitié du 20e siècle. Aux côtés de son 1er époux, Ewald Dülberg, ils firent la manchette de la presse en tant qu'innovateurs et avant-gardistes. On salua la force stylistique et la technique exceptionnelle d'Hedwig Arnheim. Un article de journal Berlinois datant de 1917 souligne :

« La grande beauté des couleurs de même que l'audace des thèmes. »

Quant à lui, le journaliste Maïke Bruhns dénote l'influence orientalisante de l'ornementation et des lignes courbes.

Parmi les œuvres découlant de commandes, citons : 2 riches compositions aux thèmes festifs en hommage à l'artiste expressionniste Bernhard Hoetger (ce dernier la remercia par l'exécution d'un portrait sculpté) ; une série de gravures sur bois ayant servi à illustrer 2 œuvres littéraires de la journaliste et écrivaine juive, Adolf Götz (1876-1944) .

En 1919, Hedwig Arnheim fut un des membres-fondateurs du mouvement Sécession de la ville de Darmstadt. Elle représenta son nouveau groupe à des expositions organisées en 1919, 1920 et 1921. Une artiste prolifique, ses œuvres figurent dans bon nombre de collections et de rétrospectives de plusieurs musées dont : le « Heydt Museum » de Wuppertal ; les Archives Berlinoises du « Bauhaus » ; la Fondation « Bauhaus » des villes de Dessau et Weimar ; le Musée des Arts Appliqués de Cologne ; le Musée d'Histoire d'Hambourg ; la Maison Macke ; et le Musée Giersch.

1924 : Exposition à sa résidence du 5 de la rue « Isequai » , à Hambourg.

Caspar Neher

Caspar Neher conçoit des décors qui se démarquent du style très réaliste en vogue dans son pays au début des années '20. La carrière de ce décorateur allemand est indissociable de celle de l'auteur et metteur-en-scène Bertolt Brecht, dont il signe les décors des Ires pièces. Il participe à la création historique de « l'Opéra de quat'sous » (1928) , considérée aujourd'hui comme la pièce Maître de l'auteur. Le contexte politique qui sévit en Allemagne, entre 1933 et 1945, force Neher à des réalisations moins suspectes aux yeux des Nazis. Il n'a d'autre choix que de cesser d'incarner, dans ses décors, les revendications dont le théâtre de Brecht est chargé. Pendant la guerre, ses scénographies deviennent moins actuelles, s'inspirant davantage de réalisations artistiques déjà existantes. Après la guerre, il reprend sa collaboration avec Brecht, qui s'était exilé pour fuir le Nazisme. Il sera de la grande aventure du « Berliner Ensemble » , compagnie fondée par Brecht et Helene Weigel, en 1949, dont le travail rayonnera dans toute l'Europe. Après la mort de Brecht, en 1956, il collabore quelque temps avec d'autres metteurs en scène de théâtre, puis reviendra à l'Opéra. Les scénographies de Caspar Neher seront à jamais liées à la révolution théâtrale créée par Brecht.

Teo Otto

Teo Otto fit des études de peinture et de scénographie à l'académie des Beaux-arts de Kassel chez Ewald Dülberg (1923-1926) . Assistant de Dülberg à la Haute-école d'architecture de Weimar, puis au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin (1927) . Décorateur et, dès 1932, chef-décorateur des théâtres d'État de Berlin, où Otto entama sa longue collaboration avec Bertolt Brecht et Leopold Lindtberg. Otto qualifia sa conception du décor de « réalisme fragmentaire » . Il fut, pour le théâtre de langue allemande, le plus important scénographe de sa génération avec Caspar Neher.

Ernst Bloch

Le philosophe allemand Ernst Bloch (1885-1977) s'inscrit dans la lignée des marxistes « non-orthodoxes » tels Georg Lukács, Antonio Gramsci, Karl Korsch ou encore les penseurs de l'École de Francfort.

Son Ier ouvrage, « L'esprit de l'utopie » , paru au début des années '20, fit de lui l'un des principaux théoriciens du concept d'utopie à la lumière de la tradition hégéliano-marxiste. Cette Ire publication eut une influence considérable sur plusieurs de ses contemporains, tels Walter Benjamin et Theodor W. Adorno.

Après la publication de son ouvrage anti-Nazi « Héritage de ce temps » (1935), Ernst Bloch fut contraint de quitter l'Allemagne pour New York. À la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, il refusa une chaire à l'Université Goethe de Francfort pour une chaire à l'Université Karl Marx de Leipzig (1949). C'est alors qu'il commence à faire paraître son ouvrage majeur en 3 volumes « Le principe espérance » (1954-1959) où il s'interroge à nouveau sur le concept d'utopie en adoptant une méthode « archéologique », retraçant dans l'histoire mondiale et dans la culture de masse américaine les ferments de l'utopie, en même temps que les sources de l'appauvrissement de l'« espérance ». Opposé au marxisme stalinien, Ernst Bloch défend la nécessité de l'utopie qui, à ses yeux, n'a rien d'une forme d'aliénation. Pour ce marxiste non-orthodoxe, l'utopie permet de repenser l'histoire. En effet, selon le philosophe, l'expérience utopique est l'occasion d'une prise de conscience renouant (comme plusieurs l'ont remarqué) avec une forme de messianisme moderne.

Isadora Duncan et le « Kroll Oper »

1903 - Dans l'esprit populaire, Isadora Duncan est synonyme de danse moderne pratiquée les pieds nus. Mais elle fit même une apparition complètement nue, sur la scène du « Kroll Oper » de Berlin.

(Un cabaret berlinois lui propose d'exécuter « la Danse des 7 voiles » de Salomé. Elle rejette l'offre.)

1904 - Ouverture le 1er décembre, à Grünewald, près de Berlin, de la Ire « école de danse libre » d'Isadora Duncan aux côtés de sa sœur, Elizabeth. Ce pensionnat gratuit dispense un enseignement général et des cours-de-danse. Un contrat engage les parents à y laisser leurs enfants jusqu'à l'âge de 17 ans et les autorise à se produire aux côtés d'Isadora. 20 élèves sont acceptés.

1905 - Isadora Duncan se produit à Dresde, Hambourg, Saint-Pétersbourg, Moscou, Kiev, Bruxelles, Leipzig, Stockholm ainsi qu'à Amsterdam. Le 20 juillet, Ire représentation de l'« école de danse libre » d'Isadora Duncan, au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin.

Jarmila Novotná

À partir de 1928, la soprano tchèque Jarmila Novotná entame une carrière internationale. En 1928, elle interprète à Vérone Gilda dans « Rigoletto » de Giuseppe Verdi avec Giacomo Lauri-Volpi puis, au « Teatro San Carlo » à Naples, le rôle d'Adina avec Tito Schipa dans « l'Elisir d'amore » de Gaetano Donizetti. Elle rejoint, en 1929, l'Opéra « Kroll » à Berlin, où elle interprète le rôle de Violetta et incarne les héroïnes de Giacomo Puccini, « Manon Lescaut » et « Madama Butterfly ». Elle poursuit sa carrière cinématographique et joue ainsi dans la version filmée de « la Fiancée vendue » par Max Ophüls, en 1932. En 1931, elle épouse le chevalier (baron) Jiří Daubek.

Alexander von Zemlinsky au « Kroll Oper »

Au cours de l'année 1927, le compositeur et chef d'orchestre Alexander von Zemlinsky, isolé, se sentant un peu oublié par Vienne, malgré l'hommage d'Alban Berg, et un peu perdu dans la multitude des courants musicaux des années 1920 (dodécaphonisme, néo-Classicisme, Nouvelle Objectivité, réalisme socialisant) change d'air. Il commet la grande erreur d'aller s'installer à l'Opéra « Kroll », sous la terrible férule d'Otto Klemperer qui était, à cette époque, plus jeune que lui. Lieu des plus intenses innovations que Zemlinsky ne peut comprendre. Il devient alors le 1er « Kappellmeister ». L'accueil que lui réserve Berlin est empreint de respect, sans comparaison toutefois avec la vénération qu'on lui vouait à Prague. Et puis Klemperer n'est pas un exemple de générosité mais plutôt d'ambition dévorante. Sa femme Ida meurt de maladie, en 1929, et, moins d'un an plus tard, il se remarie avec une chanteuse, Louise Sachsels, déjà aimée et rencontrée dès 1915, à Prague. Zemlinsky touche à Berlin un salaire bien plus confortable que dans la capitale tchèque et il a plus de temps libre n'ayant que 3 premières à diriger par saison.

Mais la grave crise économique qui sévit oblige l'Opéra « Kroll » à fermer ses portes, en 1931. Il voit la montée du Nazisme qui lui interdit toute profession. Rabaissé au rang de subalterne, il préfère devenir professeur à l'Académie de musique. Zemlinsky en profite alors pour s'adonner à la composition d'un nouvel Opéra et à quelques apparitions à Leningrad et à Prague. De retour à Berlin, Zemlinsky entame les répétitions de l'Opéra de Kurt Weill, « Grandeur et décadence de la ville de Mahagonny » (« Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny »), assez controversée pour certains politiciens, n'en est pas moins un succès commercial. Mais déjà, le régime nazi se met en place et Zemlinsky doit s'exiler à Vienne, au début de 1933.

Leo Borchard

Né à Moscou le 31 mars 1899, de parents allemands, Leo Borchard passe son enfance à Saint-Pétersbourg où il reçoit une solide formation musicale. En 1920, après la Révolution russe, il émigre définitivement en Allemagne. À Berlin, il devient l'assistant d'Otto Klemperer à l'Opéra « Kroll » et, en janvier 1933, il dirige, une première fois, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. En 1935, il est interdit d'activité par le régime nazi pour « manque de fiabilité politique ». En 1938, il entre dans la clandestinité et participe activement à la Résistance. Malgré les risques considérables, il ne quitte pas Berlin, même aux derniers jours de la guerre. Le 26 mai 1945, 3 semaines seulement après la signature de l'armistice, il dirige le 1er concert de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin de l'après-Nazisme, mais il disparaît tragiquement le 23 août, tué accidentellement à un poste de contrôle dans le secteur américain.

Dans le domaine de l'Opéra et, contrairement à des chefs tels Bruno Walter ou Hans Knappertsbusch, on ne trouve aucune trace d'activité de Wilhelm Furtwängler au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin.

En 1930, en conséquence des mesures d'austérité de la ville de Berlin, l'Opéra d'État « Kroll » et le « Schiller Theater » seront fermés suite à une demande reçue par le « Landtag » de Prusse.

Le 12 février 1933, alors qu'Adolf Hitler est arrivé à la Chancellerie, le 30 janvier, Otto Klemperer donne encore un concert auquel se rend le Ministre de la Propagande, Josef Goebbels. Ce dernier notera dans son journal personnel :

« D'origine juive, malgré une conversion au catholicisme. Le soir, une représentation de l'Opéra Tannhäuser. Klemperer le rate complètement. Les Juifs ne comprennent pas Richard Wagner. Ils le haïssent même. Un " Tannhäuser " avec Pilinsky et 7 moutards. L'ensemble de l'exécution est sans aucune piété. Très insatisfaisant. »

(Journal de Josef Gæbbels, 1933-1939.)

Otto Klemperer fuira, dès 1933, le régime nazi et son Allemagne natale pour les États-Unis.

Le film « Ariane » (1931) et le « Kroll Oper »

Certaines scènes d' « Ariane » (en version originale allemande) , un mélodrame de fiction du cinéaste Paul Czinner seront tournées au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin.

Acteurs : Rudolf Forster, Elisabeth Bergner, Hertha Guthmar, Anne-Marie Steinseick, Theodor Loos, Nikolas Wassiljeff, Alfred Gerasch, M. Lieven-Belorussoff, Helen van Vliet.

Réalisation et scénarisation : Paul Czinner.

Co-scénaristes : Claude Anet et Carl Mayer.

D'après l'adaptation d'un roman de Claude Anet.

Dialogues : André Lang.

Musique : Richard Strauß et André Roubaud.

Décors : Zander.

Directeurs de la photographie : Jules Krüger et René Ribault.

Chefs-opérateurs : Jules Kruger, Fritz Arno Wagner, Adolf Schlasy.

Producteurs : Bernard et Émile Natan, Seymour Nebenzahl, Ernst Wolff, Georg Horsetzky.

Studios : Pathé-Natan, Nero Film.

...

German version : Directed by Paul Czinner and released on 20 February 1931. Produced by Nero Film and shot in Paris, probably at Pathé-Natan, which co-produced a French version with the same title. Many very long takes in this film. The experiment yields some interesting results. Some moments seem to anticipate the art cinema of the 1960's. Shots continue past the point when actors have exited the frame. We see empty spaces. The image fades to black very slowly. At moments, the camera will frame an evidently irrelevant object while an important conversation is heard from off-screen.

Synopsis : Ariane, jeune étudiante russe à Paris, devient la Maîtresse d'un séducteur quadragénaire pour l'amour duquel elle joue la comédie de la femme libre et volage.

Synopsis : Courtisée par les amis de sa famille, d'abord, par ses camarades étudiants ensuite, Ariane Kustnetzowa est demeurée insensible à l'appel de l'amour. Jusqu'au soir où, pendant une représentation de « Don Juan », elle fait la connaissance de Constantin, qui ressemble au héros de Mozart qui chante sur la scène, cherche la femme et le plaisir, redoute la jeune fille et l'amour.

Synopsis : Ariane est une jeune femme espiègle qui décide d'aller à Paris poursuivre ses études. Elle rencontre un séducteur, lors d'une représentation de « Don Juan ». Ce dernier est fort surpris et plutôt attiré par son originalité et sa vivacité, mais, comme il fuit les jeunes filles, elle cache sa virginité et prétend être légère. Après un séjour idyllique en Italie, il la quitte. Il resurgit après un long moment pendant lequel Ariane s'est douloureusement languie de lui. Elle lui avoue la vérité. Vexé et humilié de s'être fait dupé, il la quitte immédiatement, puis lui pardonne.

Paul Czinner, réalisateur connu par ses œuvres apparentées au « kammerspiel » (naturalisme intimiste) , aborde ici le cinéma parlant avec la lenteur souvent constatée dans les Iers films sonores. Certainement dans un souci de réalisme, le cinéaste prend le parti pris curieux de s'attarder sur les moindres détails (ouvreurs fermant une à une les portes de l'Opéra, etc.) . Mais il en résulte une impression de langueur extrême que la caméra très statique ne fait qu'empirer. Le moins qu'on puisse dire est que le tout est filmé de façon très archaïque qui frôle l'amateurisme avec des « travellings » parfois complètement ratés, comme si le cameraman avait du mal à maîtriser son engin.

Malgré ces réserves certaines, il s'agit d'une fort plaisante étude d'un personnage féminin d'une étonnante modernité. À la fois femme-enfant, espiègle et décidée, Ariane se laisse séduire par un homme beaucoup plus âgé en lui jouant la comédie. Elle ne laisse rien paraître de ses émotions réelles et accepte comme un jeu les principes du séducteur, alors qu'elle est profondément affectée par son manque de tact et son indifférence.

Contrairement à ce que j'ai pu lire ailleurs, Elizabeth Bergner est parfaite dans le rôle d'Ariane. Mutine et spontanée, elle est absolument crédible en étudiante de 17 ans (alors que la comédienne avait plus de 30 ans) et franchement drôle dans certaines scènes (notamment quand elle se drape de bandages parce que son amant l'a légèrement heurtée en se disputant avec elle) . Le film possède en outre une certaine liberté de ton pour aborder des sujets comme la virginité. Paul Czinner tournera la même année une version française avec Gaby Morlay.

Le « Kroll » deviendra le siège du Parlement allemand durant la période nazie, après l'incendie (provoqué) du « Reichstag », situé juste en face, le 27 février 1933. L'Opéra « Kroll » abrite cette assemblée contrôlée par les Nazis. Le choix s'est porté sur la Maison d'Opéra qui était, à la fois, bien placé et suffisamment vaste pour abriter l'institution.

Judi, 23 mars 1933 : Le monde civilisé est sur le point de basculer. Suite à l'incendie du « Reichstag » dans la nuit du 27 au 28 février, incendie présenté par les Nazis comme le résultat d'un complot communiste, Adolf Hitler obtient l'accord des membres du gouvernement pour soumettre un décret d'urgence au président Hindenburg, qui signe le texte dans la journée du 28 février. Basé sur l'article 48, 2e alinéa de la Constitution, le « Reichstagsbrandverordnung » (décret de l'incendie du « Reichstag ») permet de restreindre, en dépassant les normes légales normalement applicables, la liberté individuelle, la liberté d'expression telle que la liberté de la presse, du droit de réunion et d'association.

L'Assemblée se réunit à Berlin, à l'Opéra « Kroll » . Devant les représentants du « Reichstag » , Adolf Hitler dépose sa loi visant au soulagement de la détresse du peuple et de l'État (un « décret d'habilitation ») . Aussi baptisé « loi des pleins pouvoirs » , le document est appuyé par les 430 voix nécessaires afin de donner au Chancelier les pouvoirs d'un dictateur pour une période de 4 ans, renouvelable sans l'accord des députés. Le « Reichstag » donnera ainsi les pleins pouvoirs à Adolf Hitler. L'Assemblée ne sert plus que pour des représentations à la gloire du « Führer » . Dehors, c'est le printemps, mais à l'intérieur de la chambre, les parlementaires viennent de voter pour qu'un hiver sombre, sordide, inhumain et odieux s'abatte sur l'Europe pour les 12 prochaines années.

C'est au cours de la nuit du 27 au 28 février 1933 que le « Reichstag » fut incendié. Dans l'immeuble du Parlement allemand, la Police se saisit d'un suspect, un jeune conseiller d'origine Hollandaise, de la mouvance communiste, et en apparence déséquilibré. Il se nomme Marinus van der Lubbe. Il sera considéré comme responsable de l'incendie et sera sommairement exécuté. Mais, dans les faits, le doute demeure. La culpabilité du sympathisant communiste néerlandais ne put jamais être prouvée.

Coïncidence provoquée par des agents nazis ? Certains historiens pensent que le soir du 27 février, un détachement de Sections d'Assaut (SA) nazies aurait emprunté un passage souterrain menant de la demeure d'Hermann Göring (Ministre de l'Intérieur du « Land » de Prusse) au « Reichstag » et y aurait répandu des produits hautement inflammables. La présence de Van der Lubbe sur place, au même moment, allumant de son côté de petits foyers d'incendie, n'aurait été qu'une coïncidence à moins que des agents nazis aient poussé le Hollandais à la faute. Les Nazis exploitèrent l'événement comme un complot communiste pour justifier l'interdiction des Partis d'opposition. Cet incendie sera considéré comme un modèle de l'utilisation d'opérations terroristes spectaculaires comme instrument favorisant la conquête ou la protection d'un pouvoir. Le drame a lieu 1 mois avant les élections législatives. Adolf Hitler va tirer habilement parti de la présence de ce petit pyromane « communiste » sur les lieux du drame. Dès le lendemain, le 28 février, Hitler fait arrêter 4,000 responsables du « KPD », le Parti communiste allemand. Le même jour, il fait signer par le « Reich » -Président von Hindenburg un « décret pour la protection du peuple et de l'État » qui suspend les libertés fondamentales, donne des pouvoirs de police exceptionnels aux Régions (« Länder ») et met fin à la démocratie ! Un communiste bulgare, Georgi Dimitrov, est présenté comme la tête du complot. Près de Munich, à Dachau, s'ouvre le 1er camp-de-concentration pour recevoir les opposants politiques. Les Nazis peuvent, dès lors, mener une campagne électorale qui mêle terreur et propagande sans qu'aucun opposant ne soit en mesure de se faire entendre.

Malgré cette pression, les élections du 5 mars ne donnent aux Partis nationalistes, regroupés autour des Nazis, qu'une simple majorité au Parlement. Les Nazis eux-mêmes obtiennent 17 millions de voix (soit 44 %) . C'est encore insuffisant à Hitler pour modifier la Constitution en sa faveur. Il lui manque la majorité des 2/3. Le 23 mars, l'Assemblée nouvellement élue se réunit à Berlin, à l'Opéra « Kroll » . Elle se voit soumettre par Adolf Hitler un « décret d'habilitation » qui donne au Chancelier un pouvoir législatif exclusif pendant 4 ans, autrement dit, le droit de gouverner et légiférer à sa guise sans l'accord des députés.

Victor Klemperer

Victor Klemperer (né le 9 octobre 1881 à Gorzów Wielkopolski et mort le 11 février 1960 à Dresde) était cousin avec le chef d'orchestre et compositeur Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) . Pendant le 3e « Reich » , Victor Klemperer se voit interdire le droit d'exercer un métier intellectuel en raison de ses ascendances juives. En avril 1935, il est mis à la retraite anticipée en tant que « non-Aryen » . Il écrit à propos de son éviction de l'Université : « J'ai l'impression de me retrouver comme Ulysse face à Polyphème (qui lança à sa victime désignée) : “ Toi, je te dévorerai en dernier. ” » Son journal personnel, qu'il avait commencé avant 1933, devient alors un moyen intellectuel de survie. Il y note, jour après jour, toutes les manipulations des Nazis sur la langue allemande. Cette langue du 3e « Reich » , Klemperer l'appelle « Lingua Tertii Imperii » , qu'il code pour plus de sûreté par les lettres « LTI » . Il travaille aussi à son « Histoire de la littérature française au XVIIIe siècle » , l'œuvre de sa vie, commencée bien avant la période nazie, et qui n'est publiée qu'en 1954 et 1960.

Pendant la période du National-Socialisme, Klemperer vit à Dresde. Après avoir vendu la maison qu'ils avaient fait construire et qu'ils avaient habitée au début des années 1930 à Dresde-Dölzsch, Victor Klemperer et son épouse, Eva, sont contraints d'habiter dans une « maison de Juifs » (« Judenhaus ») . Le fait que Eva soit « aryenne » permet à son mari d'échapper à la déportation en camp de concentration jusqu'au 13 février 1945. C'est en effet à cette date que les autorités décidèrent de déporter aussi les « couples mixtes » , alors que le camp d'Auschwitz-Birkenau était déjà aux mains des Alliés. Victor et Eva Klemperer ne durent leur survie qu'à l'attaque aérienne survenue le soir même, dans la nuit du 13 au 14 février 1945. Ils décidèrent alors de profiter du chaos pour s'enfuir, dans une Allemagne en proie au chaos de la déroute.

Congrès pénal et pénitentiaire international au « Kroll Oper »

19 au 24 août 1935 : Le Congrès pénal et pénitentiaire international se déroule à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin pour les séances plénières et au « Reichstag » pour les autres sessions. Il réunit environ 750 congressistes dont 443 allemands. Aucun délégué officiel français n'est présent. Lors de ce Congrès, de vifs échanges opposent délégués et rapporteurs allemands, notamment sur le rôle et la place du juge, ou bien encore sur la question de la réadaptation sociale des détenus libérés et du patronage.

D'entrée, le président du Congrès, président de la Cour suprême du « Reich », Erwin Bumke, tout comme le Ministre de la justice Gütner avant lui, avait, dans son discours d'ouverture, vanté les conceptions du nouveau droit pénal national-socialiste axées sur la seule répression, excluant ainsi tout amendement ou reclassement du détenu (à l'exception de certaines catégories d'inculpés amendables comme les adolescents) . Le juge, dans ce contexte, ne se borne pas à appliquer les mesures législatives, mais doit interpréter la volonté générale exprimée par son représentant, le « Führer » . Il préconise également, comme mesure de sûreté dans la législation pénale, la stérilisation pour éviter la pro-création d'enfants ayant des pré-dispositions criminelles.

Accueilli en Allemagne, 2 ans et demi après l'accession d'Adolphe Hitler au pouvoir, ce Congrès de 1935 est donc particulièrement intéressant, car il offre une vision des nouvelles théories du droit pénal allemand et présente les vives réactions qu'elles ont suscitées parmi les délégués étrangers. Plus largement, il fut également une tribune pour saluer le renouveau allemand et l'œuvre constructrice du National-Socialisme en Allemagne, 2 ans et demi après l'accession au pouvoir d'Hitler (1933) ; ce que le discours du Ministre de l'éducation politique et sociale du peuple et de la propagande, Josef Gœbbels, sur « L'Allemagne vue de l'intérieur » ne manque pas d'exprimer ici avec véhémence.

Actualités filmées du discours d'Adolf Hitler prononcé le 7 août 1940 à l'Opéra « Kroll » (3 minutes, 24 secondes) :

Le « Führer » se rend à l'Opéra pour y prononcer un important discours devant le « Reichstag » . Le journal « Berliner Nachtansgabe » titre, en grosse manchette - « La réunion du “ Reichstag ” » :

« Berlinois et Berlinoises semblent attendre dans une file d'attente. 3 limousines découvertes sortent d'une propriété avec grille et jardin devant des troupes alignées et des officiers saluant. »

Le Parlement allemand restera à l'Opéra « Kroll » jusqu'à la fin de la Seconde guerre mondiale et il sera le théâtre de certains discours majeurs d'Adolf Hitler, dont le discours « prophétique » du 30 janvier 1939 dans lequel il affirme « si la Juiverie capitaliste internationale d'Europe et hors d'Europe réussit à jeter les nations dans une nouvelle guerre mondiale, le résultat ne sera pas une bolchévisation du monde, ni la victoire des Juifs, mais l'élimination de la race juive du sol européen. »

La dernière séance du « Reichstag » aura lieu à l'Opéra « Kroll » , le 26 avril 1942, pour voter un décret autorisant Adolf Hitler à passer outre la justice et l'administration dans tous les domaines.

22 novembre 1943 : Le bâtiment du « Kroll Oper » est gravement endommagé à la suite d'un bombardement allié de la « Royal Air Force » (RAF) .

La bataille de Berlin et le « Kroll Oper » (1945)

La bataille de la « König Platz » , secteur Ouest : L'artillerie russe ajuste son tir. Les obus de 200 millimètres s'abattent toutefois un peu court, juste devant le « Reichstag » : les bâtiments adjacents s'effondrent les uns après les autres. Le bombardement permet également de nettoyer les champs de mines et les barbelés qui protègent l'accès à l'entrée principale au Parlement. Sur le terrain, les pièces de 152 millimètres et de 203 millimètres joignent leurs coups de départ espacés à ceux des ISUI-52. Objectif : museler les mitrailleuses lourdes allemandes qui battent le terrain depuis les étages du « Reichstag » . Les MG russes crachent rafale sur rafale en direction du Parlement. Un nid de mitrailleuses allemandes se tait dans l'aile nord-ouest, les servants cloués sur le sol poussiéreux du bâtiment.

Aux abords de l'Opéra « Kroll » , totalement fortifié, les mortiers russes font tomber des obus fumigènes sous les fenêtres du bâtiment : l'assaut peut débuter. Les « Frontoviki » s'élancent dans la rue, et se retrouvent cloués au sol par les tirs des mitrailleuses allemandes qui les surplombent ainsi que par les tirs bien ajustés des canons d'infanterie retranchés dans la partie sud du « Reichstag » . Les assaillants refluent en nombre vers le Ministère de l'Intérieur.

Plus à l'Ouest encore, sur la « Inden Zelten Straße » , les troupes d'assaut russes sont repoussées par les soldats du « Volksturm » . Une seconde vague parvient à ramper dans la rue et se faufile dans les ruines (025) .

Dans les ruines du quartier diplomatique, où résiste encore une poignée de « Waffen SS » , le claquement sec d'un calibre 50 se fait entendre. Les mitrailleuses allemandes, ne pouvant rivaliser, sont réduites au silence. Là encore, le combat final approche. Les fusiliers russes encerclent les défenseurs et les harcèlent de toutes leurs armes. Les allemands cèdent les uns après les autres, se réfugiant dans les étages pour se regrouper.

Face au « Reichstag » , les soviétiques sortent des immeubles en ruines du quartier diplomatique et progressent prudemment, sautant de trous d'obus en trous d'obus. L'avance est lente, mais l'assaillant ne subit que peu de pertes, protégé par un écran fumigène. Un T 34/85 est stoppé en pleine course au nord du Parlement par un tir du « Tigre II » , immobilisé à la sortie du pont Marschall. Les canons de la tour de « Flak du Zoo » tentent de ralentir les fantassins russes, sans succès. Par contre, ils cueillent un ISUI-52 à sa sortie du pont Moltke.

Ça ne passe définitivement pas devant l'Opéra ! Une nouvelle vague d'assaut russe se fait repousser. Plus de moyens humains sont rameutés du quartier diplomatique, où les derniers défenseurs se sont rendus, laissant aux mains des russes un butin conséquent en matériel. D'autres chars lourds soviétiques passent sur le pont Moltke sous les tirs décidément imprécis de la tour de « Flak » , et viennent renforcer l'attaque russe. Un T34 - OT se fait détruire par un coup au but du StuG III qui campe devant le « Reichstag » .

Une pièce d'artillerie allemande de 105 millimètres vient de se taire dans une tranchée devant le « Reichstag », certainement à court de munitions. La liaison-radio avec la tour de « Flak » est perturbée : les canons continuent toutefois de chercher quelques cibles en tir tendu.

Au nord du « Reichstag », les « Frontoviki » continuent leur lente progression, sous les tirs constants des défenseurs, à peine gênés par l'artillerie russe (un 9-2 SS tombe toutefois sous les tirs ennemis, succombant à ses multiples blessures) . Les déroutes se multiplient.

Les tirs de couverture russes produisent enfin leurs effets sur les défenseurs de l'Opéra « Kroll » qui se retrouvent cloués derrière leurs mitrailleuses et encaissent quelques pertes. Les soviétiques en profitent pour relancer l'assaut et s'approcher du bâtiment. 2 charges explosives sont placées contre le mur fortifié au coin-nord (N25) . L'une d'elles ouvrent une brèche dans le bâtiment alors que la déflagration de l'autre sème la panique et la désolation parmi les défenseurs du « Volkssturm » . Les survivants s'enfuient. D'autres soldats russes s'infiltrèrent dans les ruines à l'Est de l'Opéra, mettant hors-de-combat une équipe anti-char allemande. Les mitrailleuses allemandes au 2e étage reprennent leurs tirs, tandis qu'un groupe de « Waffen SS » est envoyée en renfort pour soutenir les soldats du « Volkssturm » qui tentent de circonscrire l'attaque russe au coin-nord de l'Opéra.

Un autre T 34/85 explose sous les coups de la « Flak » sur le pont Moltke et prend feu. Les chars déjà passés au sud de la « Spree » engagent plusieurs duels autour de la « König Platz » avec le StuG et un canon 88AA. Le StuG sera finalement détruit, pris pour cible par 3 chars ennemis. Le 88 s'acharne contre un ISII, sans succès.

Au nord du « Reichstag », une trentaine de soldats russes atteignent le pied du bâtiment. Parmi eux, une équipe lance-flammes qui entre vite en action contre les défenseurs retranchés dans les caves. La menace est sérieuse et quelques « Waffen SS » viennent renforcer la position face aux soldats russes. Au-dessus d'eux, un obus de 203 millimètres passe en fusant et s'engouffre dans une meurtrière du 2e étage (AA26) , pulvérisant tous les défenseurs.

Les soviétiques qui ont réussi à pénétrer dans le bâtiment de l'Opéra mitraillent les défenseurs qui cèdent à la panique. Seuls les « Waffen SS » , parvenus dans la partie sud (M26) , tiennent leurs positions. Mais les russes engagent toujours plus de fantassins dans le combat : les ruines à l'Est de l'Opéra grouillent de « Frontoviki » . Un groupe d'assaut surgit du Ministère de l'Intérieur, brave les tirs en provenance du « Reichstag » , parvient à contourner l'Opéra et s'empare d'une position de mortier (O28) . Dans le bâtiment principal de l'Opéra « Kroll » , les russes grimpent dans les étages et neutralisent les servants des mitrailleuses allemandes, presque toutes tombées à court de munitions ou enrayées. Au rez-de-chaussée, la violence de l'attaque russe bouscule également les « Waffen SS » . L'Opéra joue son dernier acte.

Dans le même temps, une section de fusiliers russes descend en courant les quais de la « Spree » vers l'Ouest (« Schlieffen Ufer ») et se répand dans les ruines adjacentes, sous la protection d'un calibre 50 placée en couverture à l'étage du Ministère de l'Intérieur, cette dernière ayant mis en déroute un groupe de mitrailleurs qui prenait le quai sous son feu.

Devant le « Reichstag », un SU-76 puis un ISU1-52 tombent sous les coups des canons allemands devant la « König Platz ». Au nord du bâtiment, un T 34/85 et un IS2 engagent un duel avec le « Tigre II » immobilisé devant le pont Marschall. Le char lourd russe est immobilisé par son adversaire, puis achevé par les tirs provenant de la « Flak du Zoo » .

Pendant ce temps, et malgré l'absence de soutien d'artillerie (radio HS) , les troupes d'assaut russes arrosent les caves du « Reichstag » au lance-flammes (AA26) , grillant leurs occupants. Un début d'incendie survient. Profitant du flottement dans la défense, un groupe du génie ouvre une brèche dans le mur du Parlement, au moyen d'une charge explosive. Les fantassins s'engouffrent dans les caves, créant une Ire pénétration dans le bâtiment fortifié. Les « Waffen SS » contre-attaquent, sans coup férir, faisant dérouter une partie des assaillants dans les étages encore inoccupés. Des flammes se propagent peu à peu au rez-de-chaussée.

Le second étage de l'Opéra « Kroll » est entièrement nettoyé. Au rez-de-chaussée, les soldats du « Volkssturm » s'enfuient ou se rendent. Seuls quelques SS poursuivent le combat au sud-ouest du bâtiment (M27) . Ils doivent toutefois gagner le bâtiment sud, rejoignant une vingtaine de soldats du « Volkssturm » se regroupant pour un dernier baroud d'honneur. Les russes poursuivent, en parallèle, leur poussée vers l'Ouest.

Dans les caves du « Reichstag » , c'est le feu qui sépare les combattants ! Quelques soldats russes tentent de se regrouper au 3e étage, puis sur le toit, poursuivis par une poignée de « Waffen SS » . À l'extérieur, les soviétiques avaient pourtant commencé à se rassembler pour investir le Parlement en force. Ils sont contraints de reporter leur attaque vers l'accès principal à l'Ouest : une tranchée est prise face aux escaliers (X27) , eux-mêmes protégés par un réseau de barbelés.

C'est l'assaut final sur le bâtiment sud de l'Opéra « Kroll » . Une vague de troupes d'assaut bouscule sans effort les derniers défenseurs qui sont annihilés : la puissance de feu des soviétiques est impressionnante.

Dans le « Reichstag » , les allemands procèdent à une chasse aux soldats russes qui ne parviennent pas à se regrouper. Sur le terre-plein que domine le Parlement, les russes hésitent à se lancer à l'assaut, faute d'explosifs pour percer le mur du bâtiment. Les chars et l'artillerie poursuivent leurs tirs, sans plus de succès.

Toute résistance a cessé dans les bâtiments de l'Opéra « Kroll » . Quelques prisonniers sont rassemblés, avant que les vainqueurs ne se tournent vers les quartiers à l'Ouest.

Dans les couloirs du « Reichstag » , le petit groupe de russes aux abois (2 demi-groupes armés d'un lance-flammes et accompagnés d'un leader 8-1) parvient à se rallier : il dévale les escaliers du Parlement (CC29) et prend à revers les défenseurs du rez-de-chaussée, les mettant en déroute. Ils doivent cependant refluer vers le 1er étage : des bruits de bottes se rapprochent de leur position. Il va falloir attendre les renforts et économiser l'essence du lance-flammes. À l'extérieur du « Reichstag » se trouvaient 4 canon de calibre 88 et 2 chars « Tigre II » . La défense du « Reichstag » était assurée par le « SS-Brigadführer » , Wilhelm Mohnke. L'assaut des Soviétiques sur le « Reichstag » début le 30 avril, au soir. Les combats, à l'extérieur et à l'intérieur, durent toute la nuit avant que le drapeau rouge ne soit hissé sur le toit du « Reichstag », le matin du 1er mai. Staline avait demandé au photographe ukrainien Yevgeny Khaldei d'immortaliser cet événement mais il n'était pas présent le jour de la prise du « Reichstag ». La propagande soviétique recrée la scène, le 2 mai 1945. Le soldat d'origine géorgienne Meliton Kantaria, sur ordre de Staline, hisse le drapeau à la manière des soldats américains à Iwo Jima, le 23 février 1945. La célèbre photographie fut retouchée pour effacer une des 2 montres, celle au poignet droit de l'officier soutenant le soldat portant le drapeau, montre surnuméraire laissant apparaître qu'elle avait été volée, acte pourtant courant au sein des armées d'invasion.

Peu de temps avant qu'Adolf Hitler ne se suicide et que le « Reichstag » ne soit pris, la radio berlinoise avait réussi à diffuser, pour la dernière fois, une œuvre de Richard Wagner, « la Marche funèbre » de « Siegfried », afin de donner du courage aux troupes restantes. Celle-ci annonçait la fin du 3e « Reich ».

Immédiatement après la fin de la guerre, à l'été 1945, le restaurant dans les jardins du « Kroll Établissement » réouvrit ses portes au public, même si la Maison d'Opéra fut complètement démolie, le 27 mars 1951. Le « Kroll-Garten Inn » ferma définitivement ses portes en 1956. L'année plus tard, on rasa ce qui restait du site pour permettre la mise-en-chantier, en 1957, du moderne et audacieux « Berlin Kongreßhalle » (Centre des congrès de Berlin), l'œuvre de l'architecte américain Hugh Stubbins, junior. Aujourd'hui, l'emplacement exact du « Kroll Oper » n'est plus qu'une vaste surface gazonnée, située au sud de la « Bundeskanzleramt » (et tout près de la tour au carillon, un don de la firme automobile Daimler-Benz). Une plaque commémorative rappelant l'histoire du « Kroll Oper » fut installée en 2007.

Mémorial soviétique du « Tiergarten »

Le Mémorial soviétique du « Tiergarten » est un monument qui fut érigé sur le bord septentrional de la « Charlottenburger Chaussee » peu après la chute de la ville de Berlin (le 7 novembre : soit 6 mois après la capitulation allemande), avec des matériaux prélevés sur les ruines de la « Neue Reichskanzlei ». La nouvelle Chancellerie fut, entre 1938 et 1945, la résidence officielle d'Adolf Hitler. Il en avait confié la conception et la réalisation à son architecte personnel, Albert Speer. Les lers clichés du monument, inauguré le 7 novembre 1945, le montrent entouré d'un désert de ruines. En effet, le « Tiergarten » sera sérieusement endommagé par les bombes incendiaires, avant que les arbres restants ne soient tous abattus par la population démunie, pour servir de bois de chauffage. Depuis, le parc a été reboisé. Le monument se situait en secteur britannique, donc à Berlin-Ouest. Mais les troupes de l'Est y eurent accès pendant toute la partition de la Ville. 300,000 soldats russes tombèrent en Allemagne en 1945 et 2,500 d'entre eux sont enterrés sous ce monument. Il a été construit avec le marbre récupéré de la Chancellerie d'Hitler. En 1987, les troupes soviétiques étaient autorisées à y effectuer des relèves de la garde dans ce secteur sous contrôle britannique, appartenant à l'Allemagne de l'Ouest.

La « Rue du 17 juin » est l'avenue principale qui traverse le « Tiergarten ». De nombreuses manifestations et défilés y ont lieu. Au fond, vers l'Est, on reconnaît la porte de Brandebourg et la « Fernsehturm ». Cette large avenue (ayant même servi de piste d'aviation de fortune pendant la guerre) était située en secteur Ouest et bordait le Mémorial Soviétique. Juste après la répression du 17 juin 1953, quand les chars soviétiques avaient envahi Berlin-Est pour mater les manifestations ouvrières et faisant plus de 100 morts, la municipalité de Berlin-Ouest a décidé de rebaptiser cette avenue. On était alors en pleine Guerre froide.

Station 3, projet de l'artiste Margret Holz intitulé : « Experiment “ Kroll Oper ” », 2005

L'« Expérience “ Kroll Oper ” » (ayant eu lieu du 6 août au 13 novembre 2005) fut un montage joignant les arts plastiques et la musique dans une perspective historique. L'Opéra « Kroll » était situé en face du « Reichstag » (l'actuel « Deutsche Bundestag ») entre la « Paul-Löbe-Allee », la « Scheidemannstraße » et la « Großer Querallee ». Entre 1927 et 1931, l'Opéra « Kroll » était le lieu de l'avant-garde de la musique et de l'Opéra allemands. Des artistes, comme par exemple, le chef-d'orchestre Otto Klemperer, les compositeurs Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith et Igor Stravinsky, la metteuse-en-scène Natalja Sz ou les scénographes Ewald Dülberg et Lászió Moholy-Nagy ont marqué cette période que le metteur-en-scène Hans Curjel avait appelée l'« Experiment “ Kroll Oper ” » (l'Expérience de l'Opéra « Kroll »), en 1928. Cela voulait dire rassembler, sous le même toit, des nouvelles compositions, des compositions Classiques ainsi que des compositions pour tous. Les signes avant-coureurs et les hommes-de-main du Parti national-socialiste ont largement contribué à ce que l'Opéra ferme ses portes en 1931. Pour le pouvoir nazi, les compositions et mises-en-scène des artistes rentraient dans la catégorie de la « Musique Dégénérée » (« Entartete Musik »). La plupart des artistes durent prendre la route de l'exil, dès 1933.

Le projet

Dans le projet, cette courte période de 4 ans, pendant laquelle l'avant-garde était localisée à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin, rencontre le présent de 2005. Avec des montages photographiques, une composition et une vidéo, les artistes posent la question : « Que reste-t-il de l'expérience de l'Opéra “ Kroll ” de 1928 ? » Dans cette recherche s'opère une synthèse des niveaux de temps visuels et acoustiques du « Maintenant, de l'Avant et du Pas Encore », à la fois à l'intérieur et autour de l'Opéra.

Montages photographiques

Il s'agit de superpositions de situations spatiales et de portraits d'artistes de l'Opéra avec des gros-plans des lieux entre 1988 et 2005. Les tirages numériques sont accrochées dans une installation à l'intérieur du musée.

La vidéo

Dans la vidéo 3 x 7 hivers = Winter, un cheval de manège parisien est à la fois acteur et objet pivot entre la situation de 2005 sur l'ancien site de l'Opéra « Kroll » et les événements qui s'y sont déroulés, entre 1927 et 1931. Le cheval passe par 3 x 7 = 21 positions différentes sur le plateau d'un manège et tourne ainsi autour du néant, du vide qui est resté après que les artistes aient été chassés de l'Opéra, emportant avec eux un morceau de culture.

Composition pour violon

Une composition se réfère à Arnold Schœnberg. Dans plusieurs positions du cheval de manège, la composition se lie à la vidéo, le manège s'immobilise pendant un moment, créant une photo sonore.

L'esthétique se trouve, comme dans les différentes épaisseurs de notre perception, dans les superpositions des niveaux de temps des montages-photo et de la composition, et dans le passage entre « le Maintenant, l'Avant et le Pas Encore » de la vidéo. Une scène temporelle ouverte apparaît. C'est une méthode de travail constructive-déconstructive et non une illustration de l'histoire. L'histoire de l'Opéra « Kroll » est présentée dans un ensemble de documents écrits et photographiques.

The Berlin « Kroll » Opera and the politics of cultural reform in the Weimar Republic

By Rachel Emily Nussbaum, Ph.D. , Cornell University (2005) .

This dissertation deals with changes in cultural policy during the Weimar Republic and how they affected the structure of the German Opera public. I pay special attention to the role of theatre-goers' organizations such as the Berlin « Volksbühne » , who formed a major part of the audience for Weimar Germany's best-known experimental Opera, the « Kroll Oper » (1927-1931) . The expansion of the Opera public to include social groups who had previously been excluded was here combined with an attempt to reform Opera aesthetically, to create an « everyday Opera » which would do away with kitsch and make Opera a viable art form capable of speaking to a modern audience. The ideas of the « Volksbühne » centered on community (« Gemeinschaft ») which involved using the theatre as a way of uniting German society. In this way, they lined-up with conductor Otto Klemperer's plans for an Opera representative of the new republican State form. Although the Opera was forced to close in 1931, I argue that it, nevertheless, managed to create its own public far beyond the elites who usually attended Opera. The « Kroll » is an example of the transformation of the idea of the « Bildungsbürgertum » (the educated bourgeoisie) , in the 1920's. It has often been argued that this was an outdated idea in the Weimar era. However, it had considerable power at the time. Avant-garde critics who supported Klemperer's idea of an Opera stripped of spectacle were actually part of the « Bildungsbürgertum » due to their continued belief in the power of culture to unite disparate groups within German society. However, as the Opera audience actually expanded to include the working-class and white-collar workers, conflict surrounding the idea of « Bildung » (self-formation) was inevitable. What would have to change about Operatic culture ? Its form, its content or simply its price structure ? The decline of the old bourgeois culture which had supported Opera, before 1914, meant that its heritage was placed in question. Would « an Opera for every day » still be Opera ? My sources include the files of the Prussian State theatre administration ; the files of the Ministry of State ; the records of « Volksbühne » annual meetings, as well as the organization's published journals ; and contemporary newspapers and music journals.

« Bei Kroll » - The « Kroll » Opera during Otto Klemperer's tenure (1927-1931) by Film Director, Joerg Moser-Metius. (January 1989, TV short documentary in colour : 28 minutes. Including Lotte Klemperer. Produced by Bernd Helthaler. Grip : Karel Charvat. Production : La Sept.)

The « Platz der Republik » , in Berlin, is the middle of Germany which was once the site of the « Kroll » Opera House. Tenor Enrico Caruso sang and Otto Klemperer conducted there. The film tells the story of the « Kroll Établissement » and the « Platz der Republik » . A social and architectural history of the « Kroll Oper » and its environs, featuring Otto Klemperer and his circle, by Joerg Moser-Metius, film director.

The « Kroll Oper » (formerly located opposite the « Reichstag » building, now the seat of the German « Bundestag » , the lower-house of the German parliament, between « Paul-Löbe-Allee » , « Scheidemannstraße » and « Großer Querallee » , was where the avant-garde of the German music and Opera world came together, between 1927 and 1931. Artists such as the German Jewish conductor Otto Klemperer, the composers Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith and Igor Stravinsky, the director Natalja Sz, the set-designers Ewald Dülberg and László Moholy-Nagy and others left their mark on this cultural phase, which the director Hans Curjel, in 1928, described as the « “ Kroll Oper ” Experiment » .

This experiment failed, Ist financially, then politically : significant factors were the economic crisis, shortages of space due to the Opera's temporary closure, and the lack of acceptance of the performances on the part of the working people who, through the « Volksbühnenverein » (People's Theatre Association) , were the intended audience. In the end, the financial failure offered those opposed to the project the opportunity to politically storm the « Kroll » Opera, which was closed in 1931 as the National-Socialists (Nazis) were ascending to power.

The « Kroll » Opera House

The « Potsdamer Platz » was Europe's busiest intersection before World War II reduced it to rubble, the « Times Square of Europe » , the hero of Walter Ruttmann's 1927 montage extravaganza « Berlin : The Symphony of a Great City » . In fact, the words « Potsdamer Platz » mean, as much as they mean anything, the Berlin of the 1920's, the Berlin of crowded restaurants, of businessmen wearing hats and carrying valises, of theatre-goers rushing to a premiere of a new Max Reinhardt production, or chatting about Moholy-Nagy's sets for « The Tales of Hoffman » at the « Kroll » Opera House, of Jewish theatre critics writing for all the important newspapers, of Orchestras in the afternoon filling-up hotel lobbies with hits from « The Threepenny Opera » . In those days, its leading tourist attraction was the cupola-topped complex of restaurants known as Kempinski's « Haus Vaterland » (Aryanized to « Haus Vaterland » after the Nazis came to power) and its culinary incarnations of Germany's various regions.

The « Kroll » Opera House (« Kroll Oper ») was located in the central « Tiergarten » District on the western edge of the « Königsplatz » square (today, the « Platz der Republik » between « Paul-Löbe-Allee » , « Scheidemannstraße » and « Großer Querallee ») , facing the « Reichstag » building (now, the seat of the « Bundestag » , the lower-house of the German parliament) . It was built in 1844 as an entertainment venue for the restaurant owner, Josef Kroll. During its eventful history, it was redeveloped as a lyric theatre, in 1851, after a severe but accidental fire, and was used by various owners and directors for Opera, Operetta and drama.

The official name was « Oper am Platz der Republik » , but people referred to it only as the « Kroll » Opera because, until the 1st World War, it had been the site of a pleasure establishment called « Krolls Établissement » .

The « Kroll » was later operated by the Prussian State Opera and drama companies. The « Kroll Oper » was where the avant-garde of the German music and Opera world came together, between 1927 and 1931. Artists such as the conductor Otto Klemperer, the composers Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith and Igor Stravinsky, the director Natalja Sz, the set designers Ewald Dülberg and László Moholy-Nagy, and others, left their mark on this cultural phase, which the director Hans Curjel described, in 1928, as the « Kroll Oper Experiment » .

This experiment failed, 1st financially, then politically : significant factors were the economic crisis, shortages of space due to the Opera's temporary closure, and the lack of acceptance of the performances on the part of the working people who, through the « Volksbühnenverein » (People's Theatre Association) , were the intended audience. In the end, the financial failure offered those opposed to the project the opportunity to politically storm the « Kroll » Opera, which was closed in 1931 as the National-Socialists were ascending to power. The « Kroll Oper » building served as the Assembly hall of the Nazi « Reichstag » parliament, from 1933 to 1945. Severely damaged by bombing during the Battle of Berlin, in World War II, it was finally completely demolished in 1956.

Some historical dates

1843-1844 : The « Kroll'scher Wintergarten » , also known as « Kroll Établissement » . Built as the entertainment venue by architects, Ludwig Persius and Carl Ferdinand Langhans, for the restaurant owner Josef Kroll, on a site donated by king Friedrich Wilhelm IV. During the 19th Century, the complex was used by various owners and directors for Opera, Operetta, drama, and variety performances, as well as for concerts.

15 February 1844 : The official opening. The complex included 3 large halls (« Königsaal angegebenen Ort ») , a large veranda, a basement hall, and 14 function rooms. Total capacity : 5,000 guests. Used as a restaurant, for balls, and for concerts by a resident Orchestra.

27 June 1850 : Addition of a garden theatre (« Sommertheater in Kroll's Garten ») by Eduard Titz.

1856 : Demolition of the « Sommertheater in Kroll's Garten » .

September 1850 : The « Königsaal » was also used as a theatre for Opera and drama performances.

1 February 1851 : Main building destroyed by an accidental fire. Subsequently rebuilt by Eduard Titz, to the original exterior plans and (altered) interior plans.

24 February 1852 : Re-opening of the « Kroll Établissement » .

1855 : Renovations and extensions of several green houses.

1856 : The garden theatre is demolished.

1895 : Extensions by Felix Genzmer and Gustav Hochgürtel. Re-opened as « Neues Königliches Operntheater » , operated by the Prussian State Opera and drama companies. The theatre seats 1,600 spectators.

1914-1918 : The « Kroll » is used as a warehouse during World War I.

1922-1923 : Major interior rebuilding by architect Oskar Kaufmann.

1 January 1924 : Re-opened as « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » (also known popularly as the « Kroll Oper ») by the « Volksbühne » Society. Used exclusively for performances of the « Staatsoper » Company. Capacity : 2,100 seats.

1927 : Used by a resident Opera ensemble under the direction of Jewish German conductor, Otto Klemperer. Extensions added to the building.

19 November 1927 : Re-opening of the « Kroll Oper » with Beethoven's « Fidelio » . Under Klemperer's direction, the theatre became famous for an avant-garde approach to Opera direction, stage sets by modern painters, and the staging of many avant-garde Operas by contemporary composers.

31 October 1928 : The « Kroll Oper » , headed by Otto Klemperer, stages George Bizet's « Carmen » , directed by Ernst Legal and designed by Casper Neher.

8 June 1929 : Premiere of Paul Hindemith's new Opera, « Neues vom Tage » (New from the day) .

6 November 1930 : Premiere of Arnold Schœnberg's « Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene » (Accompaniment to a Film Scene) , Opus 34.

3 July 1931 : Last performance at the « Kroll Oper » with presentation of Mozart's « Le nozze di Figaro » . Officially closed.

1932 : Banquet for Berlin Bibliophiles at the « Kroll » Opera House. The book lovers' and collectors' Societies that began to appear in Germany, at the end of the 19th Century, were based on groups that had been established earlier in England and France. The German Societies attracted book-lovers and collectors from the professions and academia, as well as from publishing houses and the antiquarian book trade. The group known as « Berlin Bibliophile Evening » was founded in 1905 by Fedor von Zopeltitz, one of the original members of the Weimar Bibliophiles group. German bibliophilic Societies had a substantial and active Jewish membership. Of the 300 members of the « Berliner Bibliophilen-Abend » , between 1905 and 1930, 75 were Jewish.

27-28 February 1933 : After the « Reichstag » fire, the « Kroll Oper » is renovated under the supervision of Hermann Göring to welcome the seat of the Nazi German parliament.

23 March 1933 : Site of the infamous « Ermächtigungsgesetz » decision of the « Reichstag » that ceded nearly all legal power to Adolf Hitler. Subsequently used for staged sittings of the « Reichstag » .

After 1938 : Called « Großdeutscher Reichstag » . A parliament without any real political power.

1 September 1939 : Site of Adolf Hitler's speech announcing the beginning of World War II.

22 November 1943 : The « Kroll » building is completely destroyed by allied bombs.

Summer of 1945 : A restaurant re-opened in the gardens of the « Kroll Établissement » . Will keep-up business even after the 1951 demolition of the Opera House.

27 March 1951 : The remains of the main building (Opera House) are demolished.

1956 : The « Kroll Garten Inn » is finally closed.

1957 : Last premises are cleared to make place for the erection of the audacious design of the new « Berlin Kongreßhalle » by the American architect, Hugh Stubbins Junior.

2007 : The exact site of the « Kroll Oper » is nothing but a large lawn on south of the « Bundeskanzleramt » and near the Carillon tower (donated by Daimler-Benz) . It is marked by a memorial plaque.

The early years, 1842-1848

The « Kroll » story began in the Silesian capital, Breslau, where the entrepreneur Josef Kroll (1797-1848) had opened the « Kroll Winter Garden » , in 1837. The Breslau authorities chose this reputable establishment to entertain the new Prussian king, Frederick William IV, when he visited the city, in 1841. The king was impressed by the splendid, flower-decorated rooms and suggested that something similar should be initiated in Berlin to become the social hub for the nobility in the Prussian residence.

After a consultation with his garden director, Peter Joseph Lenné and other members of the government, the king presented an order from the cabinet, dated 19 August 1842, which specified the building site on the west-side of the parade ground in the « Großer Tiergarten » park, and laid-out the conditions : Kroll was able to use the property without charge, but he would have to return the land and demolish any structures he had built if the project failed. The parade ground, which had stood since 1730, was outside of the city just to the north-west of the Brandenburg Gate. It had long degenerated into a sandy field, and the Berliners therefore derisively called it the Sahara. Every step on the sandy ground would kick-up a cloud of dust on the square. When it rained, the soil would turn into a mass of dirty mud. Yet, Kroll took solace in the fact that the greenery of the « Tiergarten » park lay just beyond the property.

The plans for the new building came from the Court architect Friedrich Ludwig Persius, which was a good indicator of the significance that the project had for Frederick William IV, co-working with Carl Ferdinand Langhans and Eduard Knoblauch. After a construction period of only 10 months, Kroll's enterprise opened on 15 February 1844. 40 waiters were to serve-up to 5,000 guests in the 3 halls (the main hall, also referred to as the King's Hall, and 2 smaller halls) , 13 boxes for at least 13 people each, and 14 large rooms (for smaller parties) . 60 musicians provided entertainment. The « Tunnel » was a special attraction and praised as a novelty for Berlin - a hall where one could smoke ! A technical innovation was the newly implemented gas lighting, which consisted of 400 flames.

During the 1st year, Kroll had satisfactory results. The main attractions were the large exhibitions, concerts and balls, which took place around lavishly constructed stage sets, attracting even the Waltz King, Johann Strauß Junior, and his Orchestra, who guested at Kroll's, in 1845. Yet, despite its uniqueness in Germany, as noted by the critics, the enterprise became increasingly difficult to sustain. On 15 April 1848, on his death-bed, Kroll regretted that his king had once had breakfast with him.

Between success and bankruptcy (1848-1894)

Josef Kroll's successor was his eldest daughter, Auguste. The National People's Garden was opened as soon as May 1848, as part of an expansion. Great attractions were offered, 1st in the garden and later in the great hall, such as performances with wild animals by their tamers and an extensive trade fair, in 1849. In 1850, Auguste Kroll established a permanent summer theatre with open-air performances of Operas and other events. Here, among others, Auguste's protégé, Albert Lortzing, directed his Operas « Undine » , « Der Waffenschmied » (The Armourer) and « Zar und Zimmermann » .

The operation of the new Theatre and Opera Company was suddenly disrupted on 1 February 1851, when the curtains were accidentally set on fire while lamps were being lit. But Auguste Kroll didn't let that stop her ; she encashed the fire insurance sum and, on 24 February 1852, the theatre already re-opened in a completely new building. About a year later, Auguste married her « Kapellmeister » , the Hungarian violinist, conductor and businessman Jakob Engel. They successfully expanded the « Kroll » Opera Pool and brought many new Comic Operas to the stage, but also enacted lengthy music-dramas by Richard Wagner. But the couple could not prevent the business from closing its doors on 1 April 1855. Despite all efforts, the earnings were far beneath the costs of operation.

One of the creditors, the entrepreneur Heinrich Bergmann, took-over the insolvent operation and brought in such luminaries as Jacques Offenbach for one of his 1st guest appearances in Berlin. In 1862 however, Kroll was again forced into auction, which enabled Jakob Engel to buy it back. Although the company was still weighed down by debt, Engel was beaming with optimism, and attempted to bring the Berliners back into his establishment in droves with a diverse program - albeit only with moderate success. The situation worsened in 1869, when the implementation of economic freedom in Prussia led to a boom of newly established amusement parks all over Berlin.

Engel's attempts to sell failed because of the Prussian tax authority and the heavy mortgage that weighed down the business. In addition, the former parade ground had been refurbished and named « Königsplatz » (King's Square) , by 18 December 1864, the gardens were redone, and later plans were made for a series of monuments to honour the Prussian victories from 1864-1871. After the Franco-Prussian War, the Victory Column was solemnly unveiled in the middle of the square on 2 September 1873 while, at the same time, a long discussion took place at the German « Reichstag » Diet about whether to tear down the « Kroll Établissement » and build a new parliamentary building in its place. Only in 1876, did these proposals, which were so detrimental to any future investments, get tossed-out, so that Jakob Engel was able to proceed with the modernization and improvement of his establishment. In 1885 (the 1st time in Berlin) , the old gas lighting was, therefore, replaced by the Edison system of electric lighting. 2 years later, Engel was also able to secure a contract extension for another 40 years, but he ran-out of time to implement his plans. He died unexpectedly from a stroke, on 28 June 1888. His son tried to continue his work, but the lack of interest from the Berlin public for the « Kroll » stage's artistic presentation forced him to sell in 1894.

The State Opera (1895-1931)

Following Germany's defeat in World War I, the Royal Theatre was renamed the Berlin State Opera (« Staatsoper Berlin ») , sometimes known as « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » . In 1927, the Prussian State Ministry of Culture founded a new branch of the « Staatsoper » , popularly called the « Kroll Oper » after the name of its theatre. The building was acquired by the Prussian « Königliche Schauspiele » Royal Theatre company and « Kroll's Establishment » was rebuilt as the « Neues Königliches Operntheater » , a 2nd theatre beside the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » . It played new Operas and old in non-traditional manners. Its brilliant existence under director Carl Ebert included the premiere of Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht's « Threepenny Opera » .

Works by young composers like Igor Stravinsky and Gustav Mahler were performed here, but also popular concerts given by the Italian tenor, Enrico Caruso, and Operettas like « Die Fledermaus » . As the decent Opera House, « Unter den Linden » did not match with Emperor Wilhelm's attitudes, plans for a new luxuriant Opera Hall at the site of the « Kroll Oper » were developed and demolition had already started in 1914, when the outbreak of World War I halted the construction works.

After the War, the authorities of the Free State of Prussia were unable to finance the reconstruction, which was finally carried-out by the « Volksbühne » theatre company according to the plans of a « Volksoper » (People's Opera) , designed by Oskar Kaufmann. Nevertheless, it appeared that the « Volksbühne » company also had over extended itself and the completion of the refurbishment had to be secured by public funds. On 1 January 1924, the building was re-opened again as the « Oper am Königsplatz » , the 2nd home of the Berlin State Opera, with conductor Erich Kleiber playing Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » . With the square, the house was renamed « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » , in 1926. To Berliners, it remained known as the « Kroll Oper » .

By 1923, Erich Kleiber was general music director at the « Berlin Staatsoper » - a more prestigious post than either those of Bruno Walter (Charlottenberg) and Otto Klemperer (« Kroll ») . There, he gave such important premieres as « Jenůfa » and « Wozzeck » . Kleiber also conducted regularly the Berlin Philharmonic and, as a native Viennese, the Vienna Philharmonic, up until the time of his death in 1956. Here, it could be argued that Erich Kleiber fulfils all rather arbitrary criteria, a conductor who wielded considerable artistic power, not just a jobbing conductor, more completely than say Wilhelm Furtwängler who was not a particularly natural Opera conductor, in the same sense that Kleiber was. One only has to compare Furtwängler's characterful but unrefined heavy conducting in « The Marriage of Figaro » , with Kleiber's wonderfully agile, elegant conducting of the work in his famous Vienna (1954) recording. Kleiber, although not Jewish, left Germany for South and North America, in 1935, in protest at the Nazi regime, only to return to Europe after Adolf Hitler's defeat. Similarly, conductor Fritz Busch regularly conducted the main German Orchestras and was music director for over 10 years at the Dresden Opera (giving important premieres of Operas by Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni, and Paul Hindemith) before also leaving Germany in disgust, at the crude racial violence of the Nazi regime.

By 1925, complaints about the management of the « Berlin Staatsoper Unter den Linden » , its standards and its deficit, amounting now to nearly 3 million Marks, were being made. Leo Kestenberg was brought-in to deal with the financial situation, while Heinz Tietjen, former Intendant in Breslau, was to be brought in as joint Intendant, helping in the management of the 2 Opera Houses that were now the responsibility of the « Staatsoper » , with the recent refurbishing of the « Kroll Oper » . Matters came to a head when the « Deutsches Opernhaus » was declared bankrupt and taken-over by the city authorities, who re-opened it under Tietjens as the « Städtische Oper » , with Bruno Walter as musical director. The new establishment was a clear rival to the government « Staatsoper », and when Max von Schillings refused to resign, he was dismissed by the « Kulturministerium ». The matter became a « cause célèbre ». Liberal opinion, which had, after all, been behind the dismissal of Max Schillings by the minister Becker, with his ideals of a socially relevant and widely accessible State Opera, now supported the apparent victim, Schillings. The political Right-wing took the opportunity to castigate the Jewish camarilla that had plotted against the Aryan Schillings and, in particular, the un-German socialist Leo Kestenberg. The affair, « der Fall Schillings », was eventually resolved when the dismissal of Schillings was withdrawn, and he was instead allowed to resign. The « Kroll Oper » was established as an independent house, in 1927, under Otto Klemperer.

Standards remained unsatisfactory, particularly at the « Kroll Oper ». On 22 April 1926, an article in the « Berliner Tageblatt », based on an interview with Franz-Ludwig Hörth and, thus, representative of opinion within the State Opera, argued that the « Linden » and « Kroll » theatres could not be run in tandem with a single company. In July, Hörth followed this up with a memorandum in which he gave reasons for the failure of the « Kroll » as a « Filialbetrieb » and urged that it should be established as a separate Opera House with its own musical staff and company. It was on the basis of Hörth's memorandum that the « Kulturministerium » finally determined to establish the « Kroll » as an artistically autonomous Opera House, and Leo Kestenberg was despatched to offer Otto Klemperer the post of director.

Klemperer was spending his summer vacation in Sils Baselgia, in the Engadine, where as usual a number of musicians were on holiday. News of what was afoot must have reached him, for on 21 August wrote to Hans Curjel :

« You know that I am a burnt child and am firmly determined not to concern myself with unlaied eggs. I have been played with all too often for me to give any sign from my side before an official approach is made. You certainly know, better than almost anyone, what I have in mind. Will it be possible to realise it ? Aspettiamo. How justified my reserve has been is also shown by the fact that no affirmative word has reached you from a responsible mouth. If Kestenberg wants to speak to me, he will certainly let me know and I shall be glad to see him. For the rest, just one request : silentium about all rumours. »

The following day, Klemperer left for Italy, planning to return to Wiesbaden, on 31 August. On 28 August, he was joined in Locarno by Leo Kestenberg, who formally offered him the directorship of an independent « Kroll Oper », while they were swimming in the lake.

Otto Klemperer's engagement was made public on 22 September 1926, 6 days after Heinz Tietjen's appointment as Intendant of the « Staatsoper » had been announced. His contract, which was to run for 10 years, specified that he was to be director of the « Kroll », as well as its music director « in vollem Umfang » (in the full meaning of the word), that the Theatre was to be run independently and that he was to be consulted before Heinz Tietjen took artistic decisions relating to it. His salary was to be 55,000 Marks. Klemperer also stipulated that he should give an annual series of concerts with the « Staatskapelle » (as the State Opera Orchestra was called when it emerged from the orchestral pit). At his behest, Ewald Dülberg was put in charge of stage design. Hans Curjel became « Dramaturg ». Klemperer seemed finally to have achieved his ambition : he was to be sole Master in his own House and free to put his ideas into practice.

The « Kulturministerium » had, however, omitted to secure the consent of 2 parties whose support was essential to the success of the undertaking. In spite of his close connections with the « Volksbühne », Leo Kestenberg seems to have made no attempt to prepare it for Klemperer's appointment, let alone for his policies. In view of its humdrum, cultural tastes that was to prove a serious omission. Even more grave was the failure of the « Kulturministerium » to secure the agreement of the Ministry of Finance to the establishment of an independent « Kroll » on the grounds that it was merely a matter of internal re-organisation.

It was not long before that bird came home to roost. On 29 November, Tietjen and Klemperer met officials to consider, in more detail, the requirements of an independent « Kroll Oper ». When the additional cost was estimated at 878,000 Marks, the representative of the Ministry of Finance bluntly declared that he could not sanction expenditure on such a scale. Tietjen adroitly averted a head-on collision. But for a while, the entire project was in such peril that, before Klemperer left for New York, a month later, it was agreed that Leo Kestenberg would telegraph if the difficulties had not been overcome. Kestenberg later told Klemperer the situation had grown so threatening that, at one point, the telegram had lain on his desk, ready for despatch. Disaster was eventually averted. But, henceforth, the Ministry of Finance, resentful at the « Kulturministerium »'s failure to consult it, was to be counted among the most formidable of the « Kroll »'s enemies. On July 1927, Klemperer wrote to his wife from Berlin :

« There have been some hot days here (in both meanings of the word) . In spite of all my efforts, the ceiling will not be altered. Fire regulations don't allow it to be covered with material and it can't be painted within 6 weeks. I don't believe it but have no means of enforcing my will. In the process, there was a really very disagreeable discussion with an (all-powerful) “ Ministerialdirektor ” of the Ministry of Finance, who adopted a Prussian tone that I, at least, am not used to. »

Thus, even before an independent « Kroll Oper » had opened his doors, the ineptitude of Becker's ministry had ensured that neither the « Volksbühne » nor the financial authorities felt committed to the project. That was to prove a crucial factor when the « Kroll » came under fire in the « Landtag » for its artistic policies.

Nor did its independence prove to be as unrestricted as had been suggested by the wording of Klemperer's contract. At the meeting in Berlin, on 29 November 1926, the policy was defined as « to establish the “ Kroll Oper ” with its own ensemble on as independent a basis as possible » . The most important limitation was financial. The « Kroll Oper » was to be financed out of the general budget for the State Opera and hence Otto Klemperer's much-prized artistic autonomy was, from the start, circumscribed by the fact that funds were not under his control, but Heinz Tietjen's. The « Kroll » was also obliged to share its Orchestra and chorus with the « Linden » Opera, and this was to prove a potent source of friction during its opening season. Nonetheless, Tietjen was committed to its artistic independence and Klemperer was left full freedom to build his own ensemble. Among his most crucial appointments were those of Alexander von Zemlinsky and Fritz Zweig, as conductors.

Hans Curjel considered Zemlinsky « not quite in the 1st class » as a conductor, but among his admirers were Igor

Stravinsky, who later described a « Nozze di Figaro » he had heard under him in Prague, in the 1920's, as « one of the most satisfying experiences of my life » , and Richard Strauß, who was enchanted by a performance of « Salome » that he subsequently heard him conduct at the « Kroll Oper » . That Zemlinsky, who was music director at the German Theatre, in Prague, was prepared to accept a subordinate position reflects his admiration for Otto Klemperer. Conductor Fritz Sweig was to specialise in the lighter works (but, later, he conducted the entire repertory) , to which he brought a deft hand. This well-balanced and harmonious team of conductors remained unchanged throughout the 4 years during which Klemperer remained at the helm of the « Kroll Oper » .

In 1914, during World War I, artist Ernst Ludwig Kirchner was a volunteer in the army, but he could not stand the discipline and constant subordination of military training. He suffered a nervous breakdown. Released from service, he was moved to Doctor Oskar Kohnstamm's sanatorium, in Königstein am Taunus, where he became dependent on Veronal (sleeping pills) , morphine and alcohol. The addictions did not hinder him from creating. He slowly recovered and portrait gained in importance. He worked on a series of woodcuts. He had the chance to meet the famous pianist, conductor and composer Otto Klemperer and produced a wood carving of him, in 1916 : « Otto Klemperer at the piano » , « Kirchner Museum » (Davos) . Catalogue Number : 34. Kirchner also created a series of murals in the sanatorium which are destroyed. The Germans banned his work, and Kirchner became increasingly depressed. On June 15, 1938, he took his own life.

The German neurologist and psychiatrist Doctor Oskar Felix Kohnstamm was born on 13 April 1871 in Pfungstadt and died on 6 November 1917 in Frankfurt am Main. Initially trained in internal medicine, in Giessen and Strassbourg, he received his doctors degree in Berlin, in 1894. Kohnstamm then began as a general practitioner in Königstein im Taunus, a small-town in Heße. There, he became more and more interested in neurology and psychiatry. His wife, Eva, daughter of Johannes Gad - one of Kohnstamm's Berlin professors, agreed to have occasionally depressive patients as guests in the house, who then got chores assigned in house-keeping, gardening or minding the children. Gradually, the idea ripened to build a small sanatorium for treating clinical depressions. The house, build in « Jugendstil » style, opened in 1905 and was expanded in 1912. Kohnstamm was no follower of Sigmund Freud but worked often with hypnosis.

Among his patients were 3 young men who would become world-famous : the painter Ernst Ludwig Kirchner (1880-1938) , the actor Alexander Moissi (1879-1935) and the conductor Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) . Even the playwright Carl Sternheim (1878-1942) has been in medical treatment in Kohnstamm's sanatorium, during the 1st World War. The poets Stefan George, Karl Wolfskehl, the archaeologist Botho Graef and the architect Henry van de Velde have been friends of his.

After 1918, Otto Klemperer rapidly emerged as one of the leading German conductors of his generation. In 1923, he declined an appointment as musical director of the « Berlin Staatsoper » , where he felt he would have had insufficient artistic independence. His sympathy for and authoritative performances of an unusually wide-range of contemporary music, as well as a less overtly emotional interpretation of the Classics than had been common among older conductors, made him appear an expression of the New age. He was, therefore, a natural choice as director when, in 1927, the Prussian Ministry of Culture set-up a branch of the « Berlin Staatsoper », whose special task was to perform new and recent works and repertory works in a non-traditional manner. This, the « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik », played in the « Kroll » Theatre, from which it drew the name by which it is usually known.

Klemperer's period there was of crucial significance in his career and the development of Opera in the 1st half of the 20th century. « Œdipus Rex » and « Mavra » (both produced by Klemperer) ; Schönberg's « Erwartung » and « Die glückliche Hand » ; Hindemith's « Cardillac » and « Neues vom Tage » ; Janáček's « The House of the Dead » and, Weill's « Der Jasager », as well as the impressive list of new and recent orchestral works given at the « Kroll » concerts, is evidence of both bold experiment and lasting musical values. Although the vocal standards of the « Kroll Oper » were inevitably more modest than those of its parent house on the « Unter den Linden Opernhaus », the presence of conductors such as Klemperer (who also produced « Fidelio » and « Don Giovanni »), Alexander von Zemlinsky and Fritz Zweig ensured high musical standards ; and designers such as Ewald Dülberg, Oskar Schlemmer and László Moholy-Nagy had a lasting influence on the development of Operatic production after 1945. In particular, the « Kroll Oper »'s drastically stylized production of « Der fliegende Holländer » (1929) was a decisive forerunner of Wieland Wagner's innovations at Bayreuth, after it re-opened in 1951.

After the closure of the « Kroll Oper », Klemperer remained with the « Staatsoper » where, on 13 February 1933, he conducted « Tannhäuser » on the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death. In April 1933, he emigrated, eventually going to the United States where he had made his début, in 1927.

In 1927, the « Kroll Oper » was again detached from the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » as a separate Opera company with German-Jewish Otto Klemperer as its resident conductor, re-opened on 19 November with Beethoven's Opera, « Fidelio ». During Klemperer's term, the House saw world premieres as Paul Hindemith's « Neues vom Tage », in 1929, and Arnold Schönberg's « Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene », in 1930. He worked with renowned conductors like Alexander von Zemlinsky and directors like Gustaf Gründgens, as well as Caspar Neher, László Moholy-Nagy, Teo Otto, Oskar Schlemmer and Giorgio de Chirico as stage designers. The entire singing cast was placed in the hands of the singing pedagogue, professor Frederick Husler.

There was a great deal of experimenting in Berlin. There were oddities, and occasionally even absurdities, but the common denominator, the characteristic sign of those days, was an unparalleled mental alertness. And the alertness of the giving corresponded to the alertness of the receiving. A passionate general concentration upon cultural life prevailed, eloquently expressed by the large space devoted to art by the daily newspapers, in spite of the political excitement of the times. Musical events naturally aroused public interest to no less an extent. The Philharmonic Concerts led by Wilhelm Furtwängler ; the Bruno Walter Concerts with the Philharmonic Orchestra ; a wealth of choral concerts, chamber-music recitals, and concerts by soloists ; the State Opera, deserving of high-praise because of premieres such as that of Alban Berg's « Wozzeck » and Leoš Janáček's « Jenůfa » under Erich Kleiber's baton ; the « Kroll Oper » under Otto Klemperer ; and a number of other institutes matched the achievements of the dramatic stage.

During the period of the Weimar Republic, Opera had served as a forum for extraordinary æsthetic and theatrical innovation. Much of the most adventurous work by many of Germany's most innovative directors, artists, and choreographers was to be viewed on the Opera stage. For example, between 1927 and 1931, at one of the most visible centers of Operatic experimentation, Berlin's « Kroll Oper » :

« Stage directors without pre-conceptions were brought in from spoken theatre, and artists like Ewald Dülberg, Oskar Kokoschka, Giorgio de Chirico, Oskar Schlemmer, and László Moholy-Nagy were given shows to design. »

As Ernst Bloch put it, at the « Kroll Oper » :

« Old works were presented as if they were new, and new works were presented as if in recognition that their contemporaneity was not of the sheep and easy sort. »

With the advent of National-Socialism, many of these innovators fled or were arrested. During the course of the Nazi regime, and for years after its demise, a great deal of German Opera production was re-tooled and re-dedicated to serve the national cause.

Otto Klemperer and Ewald Dülberg had planned a production of Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » , as early as 1924, and the project was revived, 3 years later, when Klemperer had intended to include the Opera in his opening season at the « Kroll Oper » . By 1929, however, when he again returned to the idea, relations with Dülberg had deteriorated badly. Angered by what he considered to be Jürgen Fehling's ineffectiveness as a producer of Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » and further annoyed by Hans Curjel's choice of Moholy-Nagy as designer of « The Tales of Hoffmann » , Dülberg had brusquely informed Klemperer that he would, in future, only provide sets if he were also responsible for the production. Klemperer would hardly have accepted such a condition from any other man. But Dülberg was one of his very few close friends, as well as a touchstone in all matters relating to the stage, and the entire staging of « Die Zauberflöte » was accordingly placed in his hands.

Although Otto Klemperer subsequently rated the production as one of Dülberg's most successful achievements, that was not the view of the Berlin critics, several of whom after the premiere, on 10 November, compared his stylised assembly of arches, pillars and steps to a cinema organ. As in his « Don Giovanni » , curtains were again used to ensure rapid changes of scene. But on this occasion, Dülberg's attempt to enliven the stage with brilliantly coloured and elaborate costumes did not find favour, and critics as open-minded as « Bie » condemned his approach as over-theoretical. To an increasing extent, he was seen as falling between 2 stools : his stiff, semi-abstract style offended conservative eyes without convincing those attuned to the advanced art of the period.

« To nail those silly blocks together, to stick romanesque arches on top of them and then to paint the whole thing like a gigantic bonbon - if " Herr " Dülberg wants to sell us that as modern decor, then, one also must say that - like his " Don Giovanni " - it reveals a timeless lack of talent. But our great Otto Klemperer seemingly cannot have enough of it. » (Hans von Wedderkop in the intellectual monthly, « Der Querschnitt » of December 1929.)

Leichtentritt, among others, praised the clarity, detail and sense of proportion that distinguished Klemperer's account of the score. Friedrich Schorr, who had been seconded from the « Linden » Opera, was an impressive Speaker and the cast, which included singers of the calibre of Jarmila Novotná, Käthe Heidersbach, Hans Fidesser and Fritz Krenn, was on a higher-level than the « Kroll » had fielded in earlier productions. Yet, the evening as a whole evoked little enthusiasm.

It is, however, not certain that Dülberg completed his production. He was taken ill during rehearsals and, on his return, discovered that many alterations had been made during his absence. « Shaking with rage », he told his son to return his production book to Ernst Legal. « That was the end. » Yet, to judge from the warm letter that Otto Klemperer wrote to his friend in Arosa, on 15 December, more than a month after the premiere, their personal relations were good enough for Klemperer to raise the question of a further collaboration. That never came to pass, although later in the season, Ewald Dülberg did produce and design a « Rigoletto » 1st performed on 17 May 1930.

Inspired in part by Arnold Schönberg's « Pierrot Lunaire » and his observations and experiences during the 1st World War, Oskar Schlemmer began to conceive of the human body as a new artistic medium. He saw ballet and pantomime as free from the historical baggage of theatre and Opera and, thus, able to present his ideas of choreographed geometry, man as dancer, transformed by costume, moving in space.

Anyone familiar with Otto Klemperer's career, or Peter Heyworth's version of it in his 2 Volume biography, will know that, in Berlin in the 1920's, Klemperer was one of the pioneers of the « Neue Sachlichkeit » (the New Objectivity) , in the performance of the Masterworks of the Baroque and Classical periods. Indeed, Johann Sebastian Bach's Suite No. 3 in D was the work with which he chose to open a pioneering series of subscription concerts at Berlin's « Kroll » Opera, in September 1927. By the end of a texturally severe, yet fervent, account of the Overture, it was clear to those present that a revolution was afoot. The distinguished musicologist, Alfred Einstein, was one of the 1st to declare Klemperer's Bach « un-academic but right » : the fugato firmly propelled, the gavotte fiery, the « bourrées » properly burlesque, the famous Air unemphatic to the point of unemphatic to the point of coolness.

Otto Klemperer's « Kroll Oper » Opens

Early in the morning of 1 September 1927, Hans Curjel, Dramaturg of the re-constituted « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik », burst into Heinz Tietjen's office in the « Oberwallstraße » and shouted excitedly : « Der Betrieb läuft. » (The show's on the road.) The claim was premature. Since May 1926, the « Kroll Oper » had been occupied by the « Linden » Opera, whose theatre had been shut for a reconstruction that was proving far more protracted than had been envisaged. It had originally been intended that it would have returned to its own quarters, by the spring of 1927. Owing to a series of accidents and delays, it was not to do so until April 1928. Thus, Otto Klemperer faced the dual task of forming newly engaged artists into an ensemble and of mounting a series of entirely new productions while sharing his theatre with another full-scale and long established company. As Hans Curjel later recalled, the joint rehearsal schedule was a minefield. Rehearsals, at 1st, took place in an ill-suited administrative building behind « Unter den Linden ». It was not until 10 October that an improvised stage became available in a disused exhibition shed in the grounds of « Schloß Bellevue », some 2 miles to the West. Even the « Kroll » 's small administrative offices were for a while housed in the « Generalintendanz » .

At half past 10, the assembled company was greeted by Otto Klemperer, who then launched into the preparations for Igor Stravinsky's Opera « Œdipus Rex » . At midday, 4 of the 5 men who were to run the « Kroll Oper » , during the 4 years of its existence, as an artistically independent Opera House assembled for lunch at Habel's wine restaurant on « Unter den Linden » . The only abstentee was Alexander von Zemlinsky. Already in his late- 50's, he was, by far, the most seasoned member of the « Kroll Oper » 's leadership. After 16 successful years as musical director of the German Theatre, in Prague, he had practical knowledge unrivaled by that of his colleagues, including Klemperer. Age and experience gave him special authority and made him the musical conscience of the « Kroll » . Otto Klemperer never failed to show him respect, frequently consulted him when problems arose, and later paid tribute to an extraordinarily sympathetic and considerate colleague.

Alexander von Zemlinsky undoubtedly reciprocated these feelings in full measure. Nonetheless, he may have come to feel himself overshadowed as a conductor by the huge stature of Otto Klemperer and grieved at his failure to cut more ice in Berlin.

However baffling his character, Otto Klemperer radiated an effortless sense of authority that commanded the loyalties of his collaborators. As Hans Curjel later put it :

« Otto Klemperer was revered by us all, although there was no kow-towing. His severe and unaffected (« unverwaschenes ») music-making, his freedom from any sort of « self-agrandissement » or other vanity, his eschewal of musical and personal gush were greatly esteemed. The authenticity of his music-making, the self-control with which he conducted, instead of, like others, behaving as though he were officiating at High-Mass, were a great example for us. »

31 October 1928 : The « Kroll Oper » (headed by Otto Klemperer) stages Georges Bizet's « Carmen » , directed by Ernst Legal and designed by Caspar Neher.

1929 : The Berlin Festival's programming : Arturo Toscanini conducts 6 productions with his « La Scala » company. Richard Strauß conducts 6 of his own Operas. Wilhelm Furtwängler conducts « Tristan » and « Figaro » . Leo Blech conducts the « Ring » and Ferruccio Busoni's « Doktor Faust » . Georg Szell conducts Andrea Chénier. Erich Kleiber conducts « La Clemenza di Tito » and « Don Pasquale » . At the « Kroll Oper » , Otto Klemperer presents Paul Hindemith's « Neues vom Tage » , « Don Giovanni » , the legendary Ewald Dülberg production of « The Flying Dutchman » , 3 Ernst Křenek I Acters, and an Igor Stravinsky concert with the composer at the piano. The Diaghilev ballet presents other Stravinsky scores. Bruno Walter conducts « Das Lied von der Erde » . Then, off to Baden-Baden for the premiere of Bertolt Brecht and Paul Hindemith's « Baden-Baden Learning Play about Acquiescence » , in which a clown is dismembered limb by limb.

7 February 1929 : « Kleine Dreigroschenmusik für Blasorchester » (December 1928 - January 1929) . « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » (« Kroll Oper ») , « Berlin Preußische Staatskapelle » ; Otto Klemperer, conductor.

June 1929 : Paul Hindemith's « Neues vom Tage » is played at the « Kroll Oper » . Throughout the summer and fall, Kurt Weill and Universal-Edition attempt to convince Otto Klemperer and the « Kroll » to produce « Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny » .

Otto Klemperer was to be one of Paul Hindemith's most powerful champions. He also came to like him as a man, even if the relationship never progressed beyond cordiality. It was agreed that Hindemith would himself be the soloist in the 1st performance of a new Viola Concerto during the coming season at the « Kroll Oper » . Thereafter, no living composer figured more prominently in its programmes or came to be regarded as more representative of its spirit. Hindemith was not the only young German composer whom Klemperer looked for new works to be performed at the « Kroll Oper » . As 3 years earlier, when it had seemed as though he was to become director of the « Große Volksoper » , he again turned 1st to the brilliant, versatile figure of Ernst Křenek. As early as September 1926, he expressed interest in 3 1 Act Operas that were still incomplete ; at about the same time, he even seems to have offered him a job at the « Kroll » , which he turned down because it was poorly paid.

September 1929 : Caspar Neher begins a contract with « Volksbühne » . He also designs a triple bill of Operas by Maurice Ravel, Darius Milhaud, and Jacques Ibert for the « Kroll Oper » . Alexander Zemlinsky conducts and Gustav Gründgens directs.

5 December 1929 : « Der Lindberghflug » (September - November 1929, 2nd version with music entirely by Kurt Weill) . « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » (« Kroll Oper ») ; Otto Klemperer, conductor.

24 June 1930 : « Der Jasager » (January - May 1930, Bertolt Brecht) . « Zentralinstitut für Erziehung und Unterricht, Berlin » ; Kurt Drabek, conductor, with singers taken from the « Staats-Akademie für Kirchen und Schulmusik » and other Berlin schools. After the Festival for New Music rejects Brecht and Eisler's « Die Massnahme » , Weill withdraws « Der Jasager » in protest. It is premiered independently of the Festival as a counter-event. The work is immensely successful and is subsequently performed in schools all over Germany. In November, Kurt Weill discourages a performance at the « Kroll Oper » with Klemperer, at least until the work is firmly established in the school setting.

1930 : The Austrian composer and director Arnold Schönberg invited Oskar Schlemmer to create the set for the play « Die glückliche Hand » . In addition to an almost black stage, Schönberg wished to express through this stage play the ultimate futility of life, and how man is doomed to repeat the same errors over and over again.

29 May 1931 : Leoš Janáček's Opera « From the House of the Dead » opens at the « Kroll Oper » .

1931 : After the « Kroll Oper » is shut down, Otto Klemperer (1885-1873) , Alexander von Zemlinsky (1871-1942) and Fritz Zweig (1893-1984) conduct at the « Linden Oper » .

An important stimulant to modern Opera was the conductor Otto Klemperer, appointed in 1927 by Leo Kestenberg to lead the « Kroll Oper » , which was conceived to serve a middle-class audience in Berlin and to encourage new forms of artistic expression fostered by the Weimar Republic. Over the 4 year span of Klemperer's reign at the « Kroll » (1927-1931) , these 2 concepts came into profound contradiction « Kroll » 's middle-class audience was ripe to embrace Nazi ideology and to reject all forms of modernism. Nevertheless, Klemperer brought new Operas to the « Kroll » and modernized the staging of established repertoire.

He had been propelled in his meteoric early career by Gustav Mahler's recommendations and, like Mahler, had converted from Judaism to Catholicism. Called by a leading music-critic « perhaps, the best theatre conductor in Germany » , Klemperer took as his model Mahler's practice of involving himself, in all aspects of Operatic production. Klemperer's experiments at the « Kroll » inspired Opera Houses in Dresden, Leipzig, and Frankfurt to adopt modernism.

Opera became an open concept embracing musical theatre. Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith, Leoš Janáček, Arnold Schönberg, Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill, and Ernst Toch were encouraged by performance opportunities to compose new works for the stage. Stimulated by the new dramatic possibilities in Opera, the Berlin-born actor and stage director Carl Ebert, trained by the renowned Austrian theatre director Max Reinhardt, decided to turn his talents to Opera and musical theatre when he accepted a post as general director of the Darmstadt State Theatre, in 1927. That year, when Klemperer took-over at the « Kroll » and Ebert at Darmstadt, 43 new Operas were premiered in Germany ; 1 year later, there were 60 premieres.

This time in his career, Klemperer rejected expressionist attitudes and adopted the New Objectivity. In 1928, Schönberg commented in his diary on Klemperer's new approach :

« He makes music in a way that is less laden with feeling than is usual here. We are indeed living in an anti-Romantic period. »

Stravinsky's jazz-influenced « Histoire du soldat » exemplified the new attitude. Klemperer's 1928 performance of this work at the « Kroll » , with Ebert cast as the Narrator, met with vehement whistling, hissing, and shouting from the audience which, by this time, was dominated by Nazi rowdies (Josef Gœbbels's street fighters, primed for battles and brawls) who objected to Klemperer's Jewish origin, were hostile to the ideals of the Weimar Republic, and resisted new works.

Yet, Klemperer regularly gave the 1st Berlin performance of each new work composed by Stravinsky, 3 times with the composer himself as soloist. In his dominant position at the « Kroll » , Klemperer was a powerful advocate for the Weimar theory that art and society were now sweeping to a new synthesis ; art would follow life, as well as inevitable social and economic change. The Austrian Jewish writer Stefan Zweig described this period, when :

« All values were changed, and not only material ones ; the laws of the State were flouted, no tradition, no moral code was respected, Berlin was transformed into the Babylon of the world. In the collapse of all values, a kind of madness gained hold particularly in the bourgeois circles which, until then, had been unshakable in their probity. »

The expression of wide-spread cynicism and licentiousness that characterized Berlin life, in the 1920's, allowed popular and Classical music to be mixed with new ease and energy. The younger generation of composers took-up these ideas ; in the hectic musical ferment of Berlin, they learned to become quick-change artists, readily adapting to new fashions in the arts.

The « Kroll Oper » : A compromised Triumph

By the mid-1920's, after the removal of the obstructionist Schillings, the time seemed right for the realization of Opera reform in its larger political and economic dimensions. Leo Kestenberg's dream of an independent « Kroll Oper » led by conductor Otto Klemperer and pledged to the perhaps irreconcilable goals of artistic innovation and Opera for the masses came into being in 1927 and lasted until 1931. Regardless of the « Kroll Oper » 's achievements, which are debated to this day, its demise remains a powerful symbol of what went wrong in the late- Weimar Republic.

Outside the drama surrounding the « Kroll » , Operatic life in Berlin stayed placidly on course. The period from 1925 to 1929 represented an island of stability in the turbulent waters of Weimar. Although many feared (or hoped) that Hindenburg's election would lead to an immediate resurgence of the Right, the new « Reichpräsident » seemed content to be a figure-head and let the « Reichstag » (German parliament) do its job. This was the golden moment for Opera reform, especially in relatively stable Prussia. The new « Städtische Oper » in Berlin lay outside the control of the Ministry of culture, although Leo Kestenberg had an advisory role. Launched in 1925, in a west Berlin theatre formerly occupied by a private company, it had Bruno Walter as music director and a fine ensemble of singers and conductors. It made no effort to break new ground in its manner of organization, as the « Kroll Oper » would. Nonetheless, it, along with Erich Kleibers's « Staatsoper » , offered Berliners more glamour, as well as traditional musical values and mainstream repertory, than the « Kroll Oper » would ever muster.

At the « Staatsoper » , the firing of Schilling's in 1925 did not have much impact on its programming or the quality of performances. Leo Kestenberg eventually chose the conductor, stage director, and career administrator Heinz Tietjen, whom he had already recommended to run the « Städtische Oper » , to oversee the « Staatsoper » as well. Tietjen would survive key posts in Bayreuth and Berlin through the Nazi era and in Hamburg after the War. Considered calculating but unquestionably intelligent (Leo Kestenberg remembered him warmly in his memoirs) Tietjen was not the man to lead an idealistic reform. Although he assumed his post at the « Staatsoper » , in 1928, he did not give-up the « Städtische Oper » until 1930 and, in 1933, he began conducting at the Bayreuth Festival (under Winifred Wagner's overall direction) . In addition, in 1928, he became an official co-Referent for theatre and Opera within the ministry.

Then, as now, there were controversies about the viability of having 3 independent Opera Houses in Berlin. Heinz Tietjen tried to coordinate the 3, juggling repertory and sharing facilities. He succeeded only during the 3rd « Reich » , when consent from the affected companies was no longer required. Between 1928 and 1933, there was an occasional important 1st night at the « Staatsoper » , most notably the world-premiere of Darius Milhaud's Opera « Christophe Colomb » , in 1930. Basically, however, it was business as usual on « Unter den Linden » . It was a good business, modestly progressive and well-run, but it was still a business. Success was evaluated in terms of ticket sales, not innovation or « soziale Kunstpflege » . The « Kroll Oper » , by contrast, became the symbol, for both the Left and the Right, of everything entailed in the idea of « Republican Opera » . Leo Kestenberg had contemplated a separate « Kroll » company, since 1924, and he had considered conductors Bruno Walter and Otto Klemperer to run it. Eventually, he recommended Walter, who was less of a firebrand than Klemperer, for the « Städtische Oper » . Otto Klemperer had won a reputation as a conductor with an interest in progressive repertory and a conducting style attuned to modernism ; his blunt directness was considered the aural equivalent of the « Neue Sachlichkeit » (New Objectivity) , a tag-line for Weimar's cool, clean-lined, high-modernist art. Klemperer was the dominant figure at the new « Kroll Oper » ; the rest of the small staff revolved around him. 6 feet 4 inches tall, with a high, reedy voice and wild mood swings of the manic-depressive, he inspired both fanatic loyalty and hostility.

Leo Kestenberg remained a presence at the « Kroll Oper » , at least at 1st ; Heinz Tietjen controlled the purse strings. The company budget was only half that of the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » , and Tietjen denied the use of the « Staatsoper » 's more famous stars. He also had the power to disallow the « Kroll » production of bread-and-butter Operas, reserved for the other 2 Theatres. Nonetheless, it was still Klemperer's company.

The 1st production of the independent « Kroll Oper » , on 19 November 1927, was a core German Masterpiece, Ludwig van Beethoven's « Fidelio » (1805) . The production, which featured a geometric stage design by resident designer Ewald Dülberg, was conducted and directed by Otto Klemperer. Reaction was sharply divided. Even some critics who had previously admired Klemperer found the conception and conducting tight and tyrannical, leaving little room for the collaborative synergy that ideally contributes to an Operatic performance. Reaction to « Kroll Oper » productions was usually divided along political lines, but musically and dramaturgically the company was often slighted even by admirers - particularly, in comparison with the riches evident elsewhere in Berlin under conductors Bruno Walter and Erich Kleiber.

In his published conversations with the music journalist Peter Heyworth and, in Heyworth's subsequent biography, Klemperer downplayed his innovations in repertory and production styles and stressed instead his devotion to sustaining day-to-day quality and doing simple « good theatre » . Even with his occasional forays into stage direction, Klemperer remained primarily a musician (as did Leo Kestenberg) . He seemed to have little sympathy for the « Kroll Oper » 's innovative stage directors, who included Ernst Legal, Jürgen Fehling, and Gustav Gründgens, or his set designers, who besides Ewald Dülberg included Giorgio de Chirico, Caspar Neher, Oskar Schlemmer, Walter Gropius, and, above all, László Moholy-Nagy. They were primarily the passion of the company's resident æsthetic radical, artistic director Hans Curjel.

Otto Klemperer's taste in repertory at the « Kroll Oper » was almost conservative, despite the hysterical attacks from the Right. He perversely rejected works that would surely have enhanced the company's impact on contemporary Opera and its historical lustre - including the world-premieres of Kurt Weill's « Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny » (Rise and Fall of the city of Mahagonny) , in 1927, and Arnold Schœnberg's « Von heute auf Morgen » (From today to tomorrow) , in 1930. Otto Klemperer programmed Igor Stravinsky repeatedly on the « Kroll » stage and on his « Kroll » concerts.

The Russian conductor Serge Koussevitsky bought the world-premiere of the « Symphonies d'instruments à vent » (Symphonies for wind instruments) of Igor Stravinsky, as part of the commission. But a delay of a few days to the Boston performance meant that the actual premiere took place in Brussels, on 13 December, under the baton of Ernest Ansermet. The Boston concert was finally performed on the 19th. Meanwhile, Otto Klemperer who had been keenly bidding for the European premiere, may have lost it in the end because of political difficulties which led, in early November 1930, to the announcement of the closure of the « Kroll Oper » . Igor Stravinsky, who was in Berlin at the time, heard Klemperer's world-premiere of Arnold Schœnberg « Begleitungsmusik » (6 November) . Then, a few days later, ostentatiously attended Klemperer's rendition of « L'Histoire du soldat » and took a bow with him amid tumultuous applause. He told Berlin reporters that he was astonished at the « Kroll » 's closure. He told « Tempo » , on 12 November :

« In no other city have I, and my works, met with such interest and understanding as in Berlin and, for that, I have above all thank Otto Klemperer and the “ Kroll ” Opera. »

But the only entirely new Opera presented at the « Kroll » , throughout Otto Klemperer's 4 year history, was Paul Hindemith's 1 Act « Neues vom Tage » (News of the day) , in 1929. As Klemperer pointed-out during the « Landtag » hearings that closed-out the « Kroll Oper » 's existence, contemporary Operas occupied an only modest number of evenings when compared to the seasons overall. Still, a company that, in 4 short years, offered works by Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schœnberg, Paul Hindemith, Kurt Weill, Ernst Křenek and Leoš Janáček, plus a Maurice Ravel - Darius Milhaud - Jacques Ibert triple bill, was not resting lazily on tradition.

Naturally, productions of standard-repertory German Operas as the « Kroll Oper » (largely denied the theatre by Heinz Tietjen) aroused the greatest scrutiny from the Right. The flash point was a new production of Richard Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » (The Flying Dutchman) , on 15 January 1929. On the positive side, the stripped-down staging, with the characters dressed like timeless working-class seamen, and the score, which was presented in Wagner's original version (unlike the later revision, it does not emphasize redemptive catharsis) , seemed to scrub Wagner clean of accrued mannerisms. Ernst Bloch credited it with « coolness, clarity, freshness, and the salvation of Wagner by means of that freshness » . But the production enraged the Right so much that, as late as 1938, when the Nazis presented an exhibition of « degenerate » music, in Düsseldorf, this premiere was adduced as a low-point of Weimar decadence. « With this production, the undermining of German art under State auspices has reached its climax ! » wrote « Der Tag » . « Throw the vermin out ! » Still, despite the Right's antagonism, the « Kroll Oper » became a positive symbol for the intellectual and artistic elite, and their loyalty grew as the clock began ticking down.

A fresh new and creative approach drew in many who had lost interest in Opera, or who were antagonistic to everything it had come to stand for - its moribund theatrical and its comfortable public. The « Kroll Oper » 's supporters included composers like Kurt Weill, Hanns Eisler, Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith, Darius Milhaud, Sergueï Prokofiev and Roger Sessions ; actors, dramatists, theatre directors and critics like Paul Wegener, Bertolt Brecht, Erwin Piscator and Alfred Kerr ; literati like Theodor W. Adorno, Walter Benjamin, Ernst Bloch and Thomas Mann ; scientists like Albert Einstein ; and many leading politicians and prelates. In the words of composer and critics Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt, who was engaged to report on the « Kroll Oper » for the New York journal « Modern Music » :

« People applauded wildly, or protested with whistling and shouting, but no one was silent. Everyone was caught-up. »

And this totally modern European theatre was impregnated with the spirit of Berlin, for only thus could such adventures have been possible or imaginable. It was epoch-making. As unforgettable and un-reproachable as the « Bauhaus » School or, to invoke a Berlin comparison, the theatre or Erwin Piscator.

Otto Klemperer's commitment was to vigorous « Werktreue » performances of the Classics which would « zeitgültig » (relevant for the times) , and to the performance of the best modern works. In the « Kroll Oper » 's 1st 12 months, its repertory included Bedřich Smetana's « The Kiss » ; Giuseppe Verdi's « Luisa Miller » ; Mozart's « Don Giovanni » ; Weber's « Der Freischütz » ; Domenico Cimarosa's « Il matrimonio segreto » ; Georges Bizet's « Carmen » ; Igor Stravinsky's « Œdipus Rex » , « Mavra » , « L'Histoire du soldat » and the ballet « Petrushka » ; Giacomo Puccini's « Trittico » ; Paul Hindemith's « Cardillac » ; and Richard Strauß's « Salome » . Such a cross-section of works old and new was unprecedented.

Otto Klemperer shared the conducting with Alexander von Zemlinsky and Fritz Zweig. As Berlin's 3rd Opera House, the « Kroll Oper » could not hope to compete vocally with the « Staatsoper » and the « Städtische Oper » , but it did not lack for good singers and Klemperer was more concerned with intelligence and musicality than with purely vocal attainments. On the production side, those he work with included Jürgen Fehling (from the « Berlin Schauspielhaus ») , Gustaf Gründgens (from Max Reinhardt's « Deutsches Theater ») and Ernst Legal, the unexciting, safe hand to whom Klemperer ceded administrative control, in July 1928. Legal also produced 5 of the 10 new productions in the « Kroll » 's 1928-1929 season.

The intention was that Ewald Dülberg, as head of design, should work on more productions than he did (these were, in addition of Beethoven's « Fidelio » , a Stravinsky triple bill of « Œdipus Rex » , « Mavra » and « Petrushka » , Weber's « Der Freischütz » , Paul Hindemith's « Cardillac » , Richard Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » , Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » and Giuseppe Verdi's « Rigoletto ») , but he was already suffering from the tuberculosis from which he was to die at the age of 45, in 1933. This opened the way for the « Kroll » 's dramaturg, Hans Curjel, to cultivate a far closer association with artists of the avant-garde than either Dülberg or Klemperer himself (always a musician rather than an « Augenmensch » - visual person) would have wished. Much of the post-Dülberg design work was undertaken by his young « protégé », Teo Otto, who for Ernst Křenek's « Leben des Orest » (1930) worked from sketches by the surrealist painter Giorgio de Chirico. Otto was to become one of the most intellectual scenic artists of the modern German stage. Other designers from the theatre world included Traugott Müller, a close associate of Erwin Piscator, who worked on Igor Stravinsky's « L'Histoire du soldat » and Paul Hindemith's « Neues vom Tage » , Caspar Neher (Georges Bizet's « Carmen » , Maurice Ravel's « L'Heure espagnole » , Leoš Janáček « From the House of the Dead ») , the Viennese architect Oskar Strnad (an Ernst Křenek triple bill) and Rochus Gliese (Heinrich Marschner's « Hans Heiling ») , these last 2 names both well-known in Berlin through their works for Max Reinhardt.

But Hans Curjel looked to the cutting edge of innovation and was particularly keen to involve Oskar Schlemmer and László Moholy-Nagy from the « Bauhaus » School. Schlemmer's designs for Arnold Schönberg's « Die glückliche Hand » were castigated by the composer for their failure to follow his own minutely detailed instructions (a rapprochement was achieved, but this remains a good example of a clash between a composer who knew what he wanted and an interpretative artist who knew better) . Otto Klemperer's own view, which was not wide of the mark, was that Arnold Schönberg had no idea of theatre, really none at all and that it was right not to follow his instructions exactly.

László Moholy-Nagy was responsible for the « Kroll Oper » 's most visually extreme production, Jacques Offenbach's « Les Contes d'Hoffmann » , conducted by Alexander von Zemlinsky. This opened on 12 February 1929, when the public was still reeling from the hurricane of Klemperer's interpretation of Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » . It was as though Doctor Spalanzani had invented not only « Olympia » but the entire production. The mechanistic, constructivist-inspired sets made use of powerful light effects and film-inserts, the scenery constantly on the move. Its props included the 1st functional steel furniture to be seen on an Opera stage. Hans Curjel's idea in commissioning Moholy-Nagy was that :

« A dream world would be evoked with modern materials. Machinery and human emotion would interact so as to reflect the ambivalence that gives the Opera its special flavour. »

The production was denounced by the Right-wing press as cultural bolshevism and Jewish depravity. This was precisely the language of the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (Action Group for German Culture) , which was founded at about this time, in Munich, by Alfred Rosenberg under Nazi auspices : its patrons included Richard Wagner's daughter Eva, wife of Houston Stewart Chamberlain, and Siegfried Wagner's wife Winifred.

Towards the beginning of the « Kroll Oper » 's 2nd season, the spectre of Wagner began to loom, not least because Otto Klemperer was looking for a work which would give the house the kind of palpable success that had so far proved elusive. While Klemperer, the ascetic, was resistant to the rich orchestration of Wagner's later works, particularly as it came across in the lush performances conducted by Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno Walter, he took-up Richard Strauß's suggestion that he should resurrect the composer's original version of « Der fliegende Holländer » . In the Prussian State Library, Otto Klemperer and Hans Curjel discovered the score used by Richard Wagner himself for his performances at the « Berlin Schauspielhaus » , in 1844, 1 year after the Dresden premiere. The raw vigour of the Opera in which the young composer had found his own unmistakable voice was, for Klemperer, a good way of settling his differences with Wagner. Otto Klemperer, Ewald Dülberg and their chosen producer Jürgen Fehling (working in Opera for the 1st time) were wholly antipathetic to Bayreuth's reverential embalming and came-up with a very different view of the work.

The « Allgemeine Musikzeitung » review of the Opera :

« The clean-shaven Dutchman seemed like a bolshevist agitator, Senta a fanatical and eccentric communist woman. Erik, with his wild, tufted hair and in woolen sweater, a pimp. »

The political charge in Wagner's œuvre as a whole surfaced powerfully at the « Kroll Oper » , polarizing attitudes between the nationalist reactionaries at one end of the spectrum and communist revolutionaries at the other.

The « Kroll » 's repertory and productions were, as we have seen, not at all to the taste of its « Volsbühne » constituency, which, as Klemperer later said, only wanted « big singers, big arias, big applause and so on » . The « Kroll Oper » excited the Republic's artists and intellectuals while increasingly incurring the wrath of those who saw in it only the betrayal of the highest values of German culture. Leo Kestenberg's great hope that education would close the gap between modernism and the public had, in no way, been fulfilled. The « Kroll Oper » became a stalking-horse for Rightist attacks on the Republic. Klemperer fought hard to save it but became engulfed by the political tide of nationalism, and the theatre was eventually closed down on July 1931. He joined Leo Blech and Erich Kleiber as one of the 3 principal conductors at the « Berlin Staatsoper » where, in 1933, as part of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, he conducted a « Tannhäuser » in the « Kroll » pure style, directed by Jürgen Fehling and designed by Oskar Strnad. Shortly thereafter, he was compelled to flee Germany, travelling 1st to Switzerland, then to America. As for the « Kroll Oper » , it suffered the ignominy of becoming the home of the « Reichstag » after the fire of 27 February 1933 and was later razed to the ground by the Allies.

Nothing Klemperer was subsequently to do in Opera was to generate the artistic and intellectual excitement of what he had achieved at the « Kroll Oper ». It was not so much a question of back-sliding as of retrogressive cultural circumstance and the catastrophic mental and physical health which all but destroyed him in America. While the « Kroll » was in its death throes, he had already pronounced its finest epitaph :

« Whenever this approach to Opera is revived, it will have to start where we have been obliged to leave-off. They may shut our theatre, but the idea underlying it cannot be killed. »

Heinz Tietjen

At age 23, Heinz Tietjen held the position of producer at the Opera House in Trier and was appointed its director, in 1907, holding the dual roles until 1922. Simultaneously, he was the director at Saarbrücken and Breslau (now, Wrocław, Poland) , from 1919 to 1922.

Tietjen was the director of the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » , between 1925 and 1927, then director of the Prussian State Theatre. From 1931 to 1944, he served as artistic director at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » for Winifred Wagner with whom he had a romantic liaison.

In 1948, he returned to direct the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » , serving until 1955, when he was appointed manager and artistic director of the new Hamburg State Opera, a job he held until 1959.

Heinz Tietjen died in 1967, in Baden-Baden. Heinz Tietjen was also a Nazi. His family is forbidding access to his archives in Berlin so that his total involvement with Adolf Hitler is kept as much as possible sealed.

Hans Curjel

Initially, the « Kroll Oper » was the 2nd home of the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » while its own house underwent renovation. Under the directorship of Heinz Tietjen, who, as General-Intendant, oversaw all 3 of Berlin's Opera Houses, it was decided that the « Kroll » should have its own company. Leo Kestenberg of the Berlin's Cultural Ministry oversaw the « Kroll's Établissement » and, consistent with the designs for music reform, intended that the new institution should serve Berlin's working-class and act as a home to experimental Operatic productions. Kestenberg selected conductor Otto Klemperer as the « Kroll » 's music director simply on the basis of reputation and ability, not out of a deeper consideration for any modernist leanings he may have had. Klemperer was not a revolutionary, as was, for example, the theatre's dramaturg, Hans Curjel. Rather, his intention was to cultivate « good theatre ; not avant-garde, but good theatre » . As a conductor, who had recently held posts in Wiesbaden and Cologne, Otto Klemperer was known to command respect from those around him, and while he was hardly prepared for the massive amounts of bureaucracy that lay ahead, his natural sense of authority resulted in great allegiance from his colleagues. In the words of Hans Curjel :

« His severe and unaffected (“ unverwachsenes ”) music making. »

Ewald Felix Dülberg

Ewald Felix Dülberg (actually, Emil Franz Konstantin Dülberg) was born on December 12, 1888, in Schwerin, and died in Berlin, on July 1933. A painter, he was also the lead designer and engraver of the Expressionist movement. Ewald Dülberg studied at the Art Academy of Munich. In 1910, he began to teach. During the years 1919 and 1920, he worked at the Odenwald School in Ober-Hambach. Then, he went at the « Bauhaus » School of Weimar. However, his love for wood carving and engraving already made him famous before the start of the 1st World War. On June 8, 1919, he became a founding member of the Darmstadt « Art Nouveau » (Secession) School and quickly became one of its most prolific artists. There, he became an expert in the fields of drawing, color theory, weaving and theatrical equipment. Among his most famous students, we can name : the designer Teo Otto, the Irish painter Cecil Salkeld, and the painter Arnold Bolde, founder of « La Documenta » . His wife (with whom he had a daughter named Mary Esther, born in 1918) also taught at the Odenwald School and followed her husband at the « Bauhaus » School of Weimar. She created a textile factory and worked on some of Ewald Dülberg's blankets and rugs. After her divorce, in 1921, Edwig will continue to study in Weimar at the weaving work-shop. Ewald Dülberg will be named as set designer director of the Hamburg municipal Theatre where he will meet, for the 1st time, and will become a close friend and collaborator of the young and ambitious German Jewish conductor, Otto Klemperer. His geometric, austere and simplified Opera sets will be influenced by the Cubism movement. He will follow Klemperer when the conductor will be named musical director of the Berlin « Kroll Oper » , in 1927.

(Image) Set project for Act II of Beethoven's « Fidelio » : The castle's esplanade, Berlin « Kroll Oper » , 1927, gouache, Cologne, « Universität zu Köln » , « Theaterwissenschaftliche Sammlung » , inventory number 7439B.

His woodcut « Crucifixion » , dating from 1923, will be shown at the Nazi exhibition of Degenerate Art (« Entartete Kunst ») , exposed with great mockery in the Christian art gallery. Dülberg's teaching career will abruptly end, in 1931, when he will be dismissed from the Prussian civil service. He will die in 1933. This brilliant avant-garde artist will be remembered for his personal ornamental et geometrical style, his cubist abstract period and for his calligraphies. His last woodcuts will be only published as posthumous works.

Of the « Bauhaus » students and teachers who did not emigrate in America, those who are best remembered (like the textile artist Otti Berger, the painter and book binder Friedl Dicker-Brandeis, the weaver Hedwig Dülberg-Arnheim and the metal worker Lotte Mentzel) perished at Auschwitz.

« Nazis passte dieses Gesicht nicht »

« Die Kunst von Ewald Dülberg war für die Nazis “ entartet ”. Rostock zeigt sie und die anderer Künstler als

Meisterwerke der Moderne. » (Thomas Sternberg)

Reutershagen Ein wenig kantig, zusammengesetzt aus geometrischen Mustern und doch gut zu erkennen, entfremdet zwar, aber durch das Stilmittel des hell-dunkel Kontrastes wiederum ganz lebendig. Einer der großen Dirigenten und Komponisten des 20. Jahrhunderts, Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) , blickt gedankenschwer und aus sehr markanten Augen auf den Betrachter des Holzschnittes von Ewald Dülberg. Und genau diese Portraitkunst gefiel den Nazis nicht - sie fanden sie « entartet » .

Diese Form der Holzschnitttechnik ist typisch für die Arbeiten von Ewald Dülberg. Das Porträt von Otto Klemperer gehört zu den mehr als 60 Arbeiten, die derzeit in der Rostocker Kunsthalle in der Ausstellung « Meisterwerke der Moderne » zu sehen sind. « Und Ewald Dülberg ist unter ihnen ein besonderer, weil besonders vielseitiger Künstler » findet Doktor Heidrun Lorenzen, Leiterin des Kulturhistorischen Museums.

Daß seine und die Arbeiten von 34 anderen Künstlern, deren Werke bei den Nazis als « entartet » eingestuft wurden, zurzeit in der Kunsthalle hängen, ist dem Erfolg der großen Ausstellung zum gleichen Thema im Sommer 2008 zu verdanken. « Wir wurden damals immer wieder gefragt, wann wir wohl die anderen Bilder zeigen » , erzählt Heidrun Lorenzen. Jetzt sind sie zu sehen.

« Nach mehreren beruflichen Stationen wechselte Dülberg zum Bauhaus in Weimar, wo er Zeichnen, Farblehre, Weben und Theatersausstattung unterrichtete » , nennt Heidrun Lorenzen einige Kunstfächer, in denen Dülberg als Experte galt.

Vor Weimar hatte er sich schon längst einen Namen mit seinen expressiven Holzschnitt-Serien gemacht. Sein Holzschnitt « Kreuzigung » von 1923 wurde in der Nazi-Ausstellung « Entartete Kunst » in der Abteilung « Verhöhnung der christlichen Religion » gezeigt. Gleichzeitig entwarf Dülberg kubische Bühnenbilder und ganze Ausstattungsprogramme für das Hamburger Stadttheater. An das Theater in Hamburg hatte ihn Otto Klemperer 1912 geholt. Klemperer, der ein Freund von Gustav Mahler war, war dort zwei Jahre lang Chefdirigent, bevor er nach Wiesbaden zog.

Und Heidrun Lorenzen erinnert daran, daß Ewald Dülberg ein Mecklenburger, ein Schweriner war :

« Dülberg wurde 1888 in Schwerin geboren und heißt eigentlich Emil Franz Konstantin Dülberg. »

Dülberg studierte an der Kunstakademie in München und begann ab 1910 zu unterrichten. Die Lehrtätigkeit hat ihn bis zu seiner Entlassung aus dem preußischen Staatsdienst 1931 immer begleitet.

Neben den Holzschnitten waren Stoffe seine große Leidenschaft. Gemeinsam mit seiner zweiten Frau Hedwig Dülberg-Arnheim, sie war eine Textilkünstlerin, setzte seine Entwürfe in verschiedenen Stickereien und Teppichen um. Hedwig Dülberg-Arnheim kam in Auschwitz ums Leben. Ewald Dülberg starb 1933 in Berlin.

Leo Kestenber

Leo Kestenbergs influence on the shaping of music education policy during the Weimar Republic represents, taken as a whole, a great moment in the often difficult relations between the State, society and art.

As a pianist who became a politician, Kestenbergs was visionary in his ability to formulate music education as a socio-political task and, moreover, to anchor that vision in concrete measures for actual political reform. In so doing, he always maintained a balance (both practical and theoretical) between elite and popular culture, between professional standards of proficiency and quality and a people's education approach whose goal, in the broadest sense, was to make cultural opportunities available to all social classes. With what became known as the « Kestenbergs Reform of the 1920's » , he created structures throughout the entire field of music school education and private music instruction in Germany that have continued to define the field until today.

In keeping with his central desire « to introduce the people as a whole to productive participation in the development of music » , Kestenbergs aimed from the start to establish a unified system of music education from « kindergarten » through Secondary school to the music Academy and University level. In fact, it was Kestenbergs who was the very 1st to found the modern type of music school.

Leo Kestenbergs influence on Berlin's musical life contributed greatly to the image often conjured-up of the « Golden 20's » . His courageous policy of appointments brought personalities such as Franz Schreker, Hans Pfitzner, Ferruccio Busoni, Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith, Erich Kleiber, Otto Klemperer and many others to Berlin. With the famous but also controversial « “ Kroll Oper ” Project » , he attempted to create an accord between Modern æsthetics and the idea of a people's Opera.

Kestenbergs personal fate, his intellectual biography and his pedagogic vision can generate impulses for our time that are especially necessary and highly-relevant today.

Born in 1882, as the son of a Jewish cantor in Rosenberg (Roszahegy, Ruzomberok) , then in Hungary, now Slovakia, Kestenbergs grew-up in Prague and Reichenberg (Bohemia) . In Berlin, he met Ferruccio Busoni, whose pupil he became, and came under Franz Liszt's sphere of influence. The turn of the Century found Kestenbergs earning his living as a pianist, teaching piano at various Conservatories, and working as a music organizer and editor, primarily in Berlin. In 1918, he advanced to the post of music advisor in the Prussian Ministry of Education and the Arts. He used this important office with single-minded determination to promote wide-ranging efforts of reform. Upon his dismissal by the authoritarian Right-wing regime, which succeeded in deposing the last free Prussian government, in 1932, Kestenbergs political engagement on behalf of music in Germany came to an abrupt end. Slandered by the National-Socialists and subjected to attacks, Kestenbergs went to Prague, in 1933, where he devoted himself primarily to organizing an international network for activities in the field of music education. In 1938, Kestenbergs moved to Palestine, where he was the general manager of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra and contributed to building the field of music in Israel. Kestenbergs died in 1962, in Tel Aviv.

Today, more than 60 years after the end of World War II, and soon after the entrance of the nations of Eastern Europe into the European Union, Kestenberg's contemporary relevance, as one who paved the way for a democratically based universal concept of musical education, is apparent.

Teo Otto

The Swiss stage-designer Teo Otto was born in 1904 in Remscheid and died in 1968 in Frankfurt. He trained in Kassel and Paris. In 1926, he taught at the « Bauhaus » School, in Weimar. He was the youngest of the stage designers who, after World War I, developed the anti-illusionary theatre. In 1927, he was engaged by Otto Klemperer, at the Berlin « Kroll Oper » . From 1927 to 1933, he was the leading stage-designer at the National Theatre (« Berlin Staatstheater ») . In 1928, he became an assistant at the « Berlin Staatsoper » . Following the Nazi's seizure of power in Germany, he returned to Switzerland where he was resident designer at the « Zürich Schauspielhaus » , for 25 years. Teo Otto was the most important and demanded stage-designer of the German-speaking theatre after World War II. He arranged more than 800 productions.

Leo Borchard

Borchard was born in Moscow to German parents, and grew-up in Saint-Petersburg where he received a solid musical education, as well being a regular visitor to the Stanislavsky Theatre. In 1920, after the Russian Revolution, he emigrated to Germany. Otto Klemperer engaged him as his assistant at the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin (Klemperer, lacking confidence in his own abilities, expected Borchard to critique his conducting technique) . He conducted the Berlin Philharmonic, for the 1st time, in January 1933. In 1935, he was banned by the Nazi regime as politically unreliable. He continued teaching at his apartment and received his friends, including Boris Blacher and Gottfried von Einem. During the War, he remained in Berlin as a Resistance activist under the name Andrik Kraßnow, during which time his duties included contact with Ludwig Lichtwitz, a specialist in false identity papers.

On 26 May 1945, 2 1/2 weeks after Germany's unconditional surrender, he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic at the « Titania Palast » cinema, in a concert featuring the Overture to Mendelssohn's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » ; Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major ; and Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 4, to great public acclaim. 1 week later, he was appointed musical director of the Orchestra by the Soviet official Nikolai Berzarin, replacing Wilhelm Furtwängler, who was in exile in Switzerland. His anti-Nazi credentials and command of the Russian language enabled him to enjoy a close relationship with the occupiers. He gave 22 concerts in total, as chief conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Borchard was killed while being driven home after a concert, on 23 August 1945. His British driver misinterpreted an American sentry's hand signal to stop and the sentry shot him dead. The British driver and Borchard's partner, Ruth Andreas-Friedrich, survived. As a result of this incident, it was decided to mark military check-points more prominently so that hand signals were not required.

Fritz Zweig

Doctor Fritz Zweig was the youngest graduate ever from the Conservatory of Vienna. He graduated with Bruno Walter, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hans Knappertsbuch. He was a student of Engelbert Humperdinck and a close colleague of Richard Strauß and Otto Klemperer.

Fritz Zweig's dedication to music and to the students with whom he shared it, has unwavering artistic integrity, and the personal courage his life has exemplified, have been the very embodiment of a life given to the highest artistic ideals.

Zweig was born in 1893, in Olmütz (Austria-Hungary, today part of Czechoslovakia), of a family rich in musical tradition. A cousin, Otto Zweig, was a « protégé » of Johannes Brahms; a 2nd cousin was Stefan Zweig. After an education that included 2 years of study with Arnold Schönberg in Vienna, he began a career in 1913, at the age of 19, with the Opera in Mannheim as assistant conductor under Artur Bodansky. His young career was interrupted by 4 years as an officer in the Austrian-Hungarian army. After the War, he returned to Mannheim where he was assistant conductor to Wilhelm Furtwängler. In 1921, he succeeded Erich Kleiber as Music Director and 1st Conductor at the Opera, in Barmen-Elberfeld. In 1923, he was invited to Berlin as 1st Conductor at the « Große Volksoper » and, after a very short period, became principal conductor along with Bruno Walter at the « Stadtische Oper », in Berlin (known today as the « Deutsche Oper », in West Berlin). During this period, Fritz Zweig shared the podium with such greats as Otto Klemperer and Alexander von Zemlinsky.

The early 1930's saw the formation of the « Kroll Oper », in Berlin, which was built to present newer works and composers, and was under the directorship of Otto Klemperer with Zweig and Zemlinsky as 1st conductors. During this innovative and productive period, Zweig conducted many world-premieres and Berlin premieres of works by such composers as Richard Strauß and Leoš Janáček. The « Kroll Oper » was considered the experimental, vital, innovative Opera of the time, too innovative for Adolf Hitler, who ordered its destruction. Zweig escaped to Prague where he became principal conductor, along with Georg Szell, at the Prague Opera. In Prague, he was assisted by a young man named Jan Popper. In the later 1930's, the advance of the Nazis became a serious problem of survival for Zweig and his family. They escaped to Paris where, for 3 years, he continued to conduct for the Paris Opera, the « Opéra-Comique », Covent Garden, Moscow, Leningrad and many other centers until the 2nd year of World War II. At the last moment, they fled to New York and, a few weeks later, to Los Angeles.

Alexander von Zemlinsky left Prague, in 1927, and took-up an appointment as « Kapellmeister » at the Berlin « Kroll Oper ». He could expect more exciting artistic stimuli than were possible in Prague, after 16 years. This was true of the performance schedule of the « Kroll Oper », which had a strong orientation to modern works and was open to unconventional productions, as well as the encounter with many renowned artists.

No longer responsible for shaping an institution's artistic profile, Alexander von Zemlinsky would now follow the directions of a man 14 years his junior and vie for critical acclaim among impressive names like Bruno Walter, Georg Szell and Otto Klemperer, younger men who already enjoyed celebrated status in prestigious European music capitals. At the peak of his career, a 56 year-old Zemlinsky would attempt to re-invent himself in one of the largest metropolitan cities in the world.

For instance, while Otto Klemperer was artistic and musical director, conductors such as Georg Szell, Erich Kleiber and Leo Blech performed at the « Kroll », as well as Zemlinsky. Great stage directors and designers also worked there, such as László Moholy-Nagy, Gustav Gründgens, Oskar Schlemmer, Ewald Dülberg, Arthur Maria Rabenalt and Ernst Legal. However, the « “ Kroll Oper ” Experiment » was only short-lived. It soon became obvious that the ambitious artistic concept did not always realise its aims, it did not reach the masses and, ultimately, it became increasingly caught-up in political cross-fire. As Zemlinsky was mainly responsible for the House's conventional repertoire, as a conductor, he had only a few artistic highlights, for instance « Les Contes d'Hoffmann » in the sets by László Moholy-Nagy and, in 1931, the performance of Kurt Weill's « Mahagonny », in the « Theater am Kurfürstendamm » with stage-director Caspar Neher. At this time, the « Kroll Oper » had already been closed for half a year, officially because of budget cuts but, in reality, it was because of pressure from Right-wing radical circles (the Communists and the Nazis) who took exception to the House's style.

After the Theatre had been closed, Zemlinsky taught at the Berlin Academy of Music, had many conducting engagements outside Berlin, made some recordings and, above all, had more time to compose. He concentrated on a new Opera that he completed in 1932 : « Der Kreidekreis » (« The Chalk Circle ») based on Klavd (Alfred Henschke) .

On 31 January 1929, after a serious illness, Alexander von Zemlinsky's wife, Ida, died ; only 1 year later, on 4 January 1930, he married the singer Louise Sachsel, whom he had already met in 1915, in Prague. He teaches until 1933, at Berlin's « Musikhochschule » (Music Academy) and is active as a guest-conductor throughout Europe. After Adolf Hitler came to power, it was impossible for Zemlinsky to continue his profession in Berlin and, in summer 1933, he left the city with Louise and returned to live in Vienna.

Alexander Zemlinsky and « Der Kreidekreis » in Berlin

(By Marc D. Moskovitz.)

In 1927, Alexander von Zemlinsky, the 57 year old conductor of Prague's New German Theatre, headed for Berlin, hoping for a fresh musical start. During the previous 17 years, he had given the Czech capital everything he had and had kept the city abreast of contemporary musical currents, but he had been longing all the while to be free of Prague's provincialism. Zemlinsky's preference was always to return to Vienna, the city of his birth, but Vienna seemed indifferent to what he had to offer, and offered him nothing in return. When Otto Klemperer invited the veteran conductor to join his staff at Berlin's newly formed « Kroll Oper », Zemlinsky jumped at the chance. He would spend the next 5 years in the Prussian capital. Yet, rather than providing true musical fulfillment and the recognition that was Zemlinsky's due, Berlin proved to be his undoing. His work, as a conductor, would be cut short when Otto Klemperer's experimental theatre was closed down after 4 years and, shortly thereafter, Zemlinsky and his 17th Opera, « Der Kreidekreis » , became early victims of Josef Gœbbels' yet-to-be defined (or refined) musical policies.

These misfortunes could not have been predicted. Indeed, upon his arrival in Berlin, early in September 1927, Zemlinsky encountered a revitalized metropolis. The crippling post-War inflation that had left Berliners demoralized, hungry and unemployed, as late as 1923, had been brought under control, and optimism and confidence had returned. The path was paved for Berlin's « goldenen Zwanzigerjahrigen » (the « Golden 20's ») . The city had supplanted Vienna as the musical capital of the German-speaking world and was now home to a number of Zemlinsky's friends and colleagues, among them the composers Arnold Schœnberg, Franz Schreker and Paul Hindemith and such world-class conductors as Bruno Walter, Erich Kleiber and Wilhelm Furtwängler. Berlin was likewise attracting many of Europe's premier architects, scientists, writers and artists and developing the progressive institutions with which they were associated.

By 1931, however, Berlin's promising political and cultural climate had disintegrated. The « Kroll Oper » , for example, under siege from the Right-wing press almost from the start for fostering what it perceived as a « Judeo-Negro » epoch in Prussian art, was finally shut down and, by the summer of 1932, Germany once again found itself knee-deep in recession. With thousands of small businesses failing and 6 million people out of work, new parliamentary elections were held. Victory went to the National-Socialists, now the most powerful Party in Germany, claiming 230 seats in the « Reichstag » . Then, in January of the New Year, Adolf Hitler was appointed Chancellor.

The closure of the « Kroll » brought to an end the last conducting post of any consequence that Zemlinsky would hold ; this was, in part, a personal choice and, in part, a result of diminishing professional options as the National-Socialists began to tighten the noose around non-Aryans. As a result, Zemlinsky turned increasingly to composition. In 1930, he had begun crafting a libretto based on a play, « Der Kreidekreis » (« The Chalk Circle ») , by Alfred Henschke (better-known as Klabund) .

« Der Kreidekreis » 's Berlin premiere was to have been led by Otto Klemperer, in April of 1933, but in mid-March, 6 weeks after Adolf Hitler's ascent to power, Zemlinsky got word that his Opera was being placed on hold. The « Reich » had yet to establish its « official » policy regulating what could and could not be performed, but already its intent was clear where Jews and their music were concerned. Until January, the attacks had come via the Nazi press and through the disruption of concerts but, in February and March, members of the « Sturm Abteilung » (SA) began invading Opera Houses and threatening conductors. Otto Klemperer and the « Staatsoper » drew attention to themselves, in February, with an unorthodox interpretation of Richard Wagner's « Tannhäuser » , which Josef Gœbbels considered a travesty and which was marred by cries of disgust from Nazis, in attendance. Before another Klemperer concert, a caller threatened to disrupt the performance, which was then cancelled outright « for reasons of public safety » . In view of these events, Heinz Tietjen, « General-Intendant » of Berlin's Opera Houses, refused to allow Klemperer or the « Staatsoper » to take unnecessary risks and wrote to Klemperer, in March, that the decision to postpone « Der Kreidekreis » was « primarily preventive » .

In Dresden, the music director Fritz Busch was man-handled in rehearsal and he subsequently resigned. Although he was not Jewish, Busch was openly and vehemently opposed to Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party. The Jewish conductor Bruno Walter, physically barred from conducting in Leipzig, requested police protection for a concert with the Berlin Philharmonic, but rather than honour his request, the authorities had him replaced.

As in Dresden, the firing had taken place in the theatre and under physical threat by SA mob (« Sturm Abteilung ») . Jews, foreigners, Social-Democrats, and others on the Left were at risk. The « Berlin Staatsoper » was thought to be the next, with Otto Klemperer and Leo Blech among its conductors and Alexander Kipnis, Frida Leider, Emmanuel List, and Lauritz Melchior among its leading singers. Its intendant, Heinz Tietjen, was rumored to have threatened his resignation in the event of the firings of those musicians.

Stettin's chief of police, who had heard about the Opera at 2nd hand, cancelled all further performances and the rest of Germany soon followed suit. « Der Kreidekreis » was branded « Entartete Musik » - degenerate music, unfit for German society.

The ban on « Der Kreidekreis » thrust Zemlinsky into the epicenter of the « Reich » 's ban, for reasons far beyond his Jewish origins. He was simultaneously composer, conductor, teacher, colleague and friend of many who were falling victim to the new decrees, and his association with other known « degenerates » (among them, Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith and Franz Schreker) not to mention his association with the « Kroll » , was enough to have condemned his work. And while his latest Opera may have played behind an Oriental scrim, its themes (prostitution, destitution, decadence and, above all, governmental oppression) were particularly abhorrent to the Nazis. At what was arguably the most heart-breaking moment of Zemlinsky's career, « Der Kreidekreis » was struck from the repertoire just when it appeared destined to triumph. Zemlinsky was never again presented with such an opportunity.

Reminiscences by « EMI » producer, Walter Legge, on Otto Klemperer's « Kroll Oper » years (Berlin, 1927)

In 1927, Otto Klemperer moved to Berlin to take-over a new Opera House, the « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » , the « Kroll Oper » , as it was usually called. At that time, Berlin had an incredibly rich musical life. 3 Opera Houses, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra with Wilhelm Furtwängler as its chief conductor, concerts by the Orchestras of the Opera Houses and innumerable recitals by the greatest instrumentalists and best concert-singers of the period. The most able singers of the time, who could sing in German, were engaged at one or the other of the Opera Houses and great conductors were in abundance : Wilhelm Furtwängler, Bruno Walter, Erich Kleiber, Leo Blech, Georg Szell, Otto Klemperer (and, occasionally, even Richard Strauß) - all conducting Opera - not for occasional visits but, except for Strauß, living and working in Berlin. It was paradise for young musicians avid to learn but torture for them to decide which Opera or concert to hear each day.

The theatre Klemperer took-over with a 10 year contract (the « Kroll Oper ») was a new venture. It was large, rather uncomfortable and acoustically harsh. The declared policy was to provide Opera for a large public, at low prices. Klemperer chose Operas which, with few exceptions, were not in the repertoires of the other theatres and he put into practice his ideas on modernization of production. I saw the much discussed « Der fliegende Holländer » in modern dress with Moje Forbach as Senta wearing a coarse woollen blue pull-over and a rough tweed skirt. Fritz Krenn (Ochs at Covent Garden, in 1938) sang Rocco. To my eyes, the revolutionary sets were anachronisms, ugly and contradictory to the music. The « Fidelio » scenery, probably influenced by Adolphe Appia or early « Bauhaus » ideas, was cold and rectilinear. Rosa Pauly, at that time, an untidy but intense singer, sang Leonore. The repertoire was not really suited to the public it was supposed to attract and, apart from the few standard favourites which were mostly produced against the music and subject, little of the novel repertoire Klemperer introduced has stood the test of time. The era of the producers who blight the world's Opera Houses today seems to have been Klemperer's innovation. At his concerts with his Opera House Orchestra, he did much Igor Stravinsky, less Paul Hindemith. After 3 years, the « Kroll Oper » venture closed and Klemperer, unwillingly, was transferred to the « Unter den Linden » Theatre, then Berlin's principal Opera House.

In 1927, Otto Klemperer accepted the Directorship of the « Kroll Oper », in Berlin. This was the most controversial period of his career. At that time, Berlin was the musical capital of the world. There were 3 Opera Houses : the « Staatsoper, Unter den Linden » ; the « Stadtische Oper » in Charlottenburg ; and the « Kroll Oper », each playing 7 times a week, 10 months a year. The musical directors were respectively : Erich Kleiber, Bruno Walter and Otto Klemperer. Wilhelm Furtwängler was director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and, when Siegfried Ochs died in 1928, Klemperer was invited to re-organize and direct the Philharmonic Chorus.

The older theatres concentrated mainly on the established repertoire. Klemperer, working on a much smaller subvention, built-up a repertoire of 44 works ranging from Gluck's « Orphée » through Wagner, Verdi and Offenbach to Janáček, Schœnberg, Stravinsky, Hindemith and Weill. Under his direction the « Kroll Oper » became the most vital experimental Opera House in the history of the art. Stimulated by his experience of the Russian theatres and, in particular, Stanislavsky's adventurous achievements Klemperer collected around him the most brilliant avant-gardists of the German theatre. The originality of his productions, his unconventional treatment of the standard repertoire and the high-percentage of contemporary music aroused violent antagonism not only from the critics but from various political parties. The theatre was closed in 1931. He continued to conduct at the « Staatsoper », until February 1933, but, in the following month on the seizure of power by the National-Socialist Party, his contract was summarily cancelled.

The most radical innovations on the Operatic stage were programmatically conceived in opposition to Richard Wagner's legacy : Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill's denunciation of the culinary in Opera was also, and more vociferously, a denunciation of the absorptive aspirations and mesmerizing practices of the « Gesamtkunstwerk ». And when the « Kroll Oper » in Berlin (following the lead of provincial theatres, in Darmstadt and Münster, for instance) famously challenge the entrenched Romantic idiom of Operatic stage æsthetics, inviting the likes of László Moholy-Nagy, Leopold Jessner, Giorgio de Chirico, and others, to remake Opera in a modernistic image, Richard Wagner's works formed an especially inviting (and intensely controversial) target. Thus, to cite a brief example : in February of 1929, the German National Party demanded that the Prussian State Parliament launch an investigation into « the transformation of the State Opera at the “ Platz der deutschen Republik ” (the “ Kroll Oper ”) into a laboratory for Bolshevik art experiments ». The crisis erupted in the wake of the « Kroll Oper » production of « Der fliegende Holländer », which, according to the Party, brazenly « mocked the spirit of Richard Wagner » .

(Light and transparency, in Opera : liberating the drama from the literal. Not only Adolphe Appia and Alfred Roller but also others. In 1929, Otto Klemperer conducted the Dresden version of « Der fliegende Holländer » at the « Kroll Oper » in Berlin, where a stylized ship appeared against a stark backdrop. The Nazis hated it so much that it became a star exhibit in the « Entartete Kunst » exhibition of 1938.)

« 2 months previously, President von Hindenburg had presented Klemperer with the Gœthe Medal for his services to German culture. In February, he conducted a new production of “ Tannhäuser ”. Adolf Hitler was in the audience : less than a month later Klemperer was a refugee in Switzerland. » (Walter Legge)

In an interview on German radio, the singing pedagogue, Professor Frederick Husler, talks about the special atmosphere which existed at the Opera House, during this period. He mentions some of the singers who were engaged at the time :

« Jarmilla Novotná, who later went to New York to the Metropolitan Opera. Or Kaethe Haidersbach. She became very famous as Evchen in “ Meistersinger ”, in Bayreuth. Or Maria Schult-Stormburg and Moie Vorbach, 2 very distinct personalities. They went to the other House, “ Unter den Linden ”, later. And a very impressive personality : Iso Golland, the Russian. He returned to Russia and has become a highly-respected pedagogue. »

He describes the generosity which existed among the singers :

« Their comradeship was extraordinary. No intrigues would arise. I remember that before rehearsals for a performance of “ Die verkaufte Braut ”, 3 Brides were sitting in my room. Novotná, Haidersbach and Zaezilie Reich. I remember them discussing, absolutely unselfishly, who of them should sing. Haidersbach said Novotná was the original Czech. Novotná said that Haidersbach had the more suitable lyric voice, whereas she herself was a coloratura soprano. And “ Reich ” then put forward an argument (and against herself) the benefit of the whole group. Where could you find such a thing ? »

Late Weimar and the Death of the « Kroll Oper »

Edward Gibbon's analysis of the lateness that preceded the collapse of the Roman Empire cannot, perhaps, be directly applied to Prussian Opera reform. Yet, a connection can be drawn between the lupine legions of the Weimar political Right and the barbarians circling Rome, and between Weimar's shady plotters, whose backroom deals led to the rise of Adolf Hitler, and the corruption of Rome's Emperors. A closer parallel can be found in a common, seemingly willful ignorance of surrounding dangers, a lazy voluptuousness, and at the very end, a feverish energy, like the burst of false hope that victims of tuberculosis were said to evince. At the « Kroll » , lateness was represented by an avoidance of reality, a stubborn insistence on normalcy, and even a secret rush of giddy excitement at a world spinning-out of control : the company enjoyed some of its greatness successes in its last season, after its fate had been sealed. The same blindness was an evidence in Isherwood's view of Berlin, where night pleasures were pursued even as rival gangs clashed outside the cabarets.

Even before the economic crash of 1929, the conjunction of increasing Right-wing hostility, the « Kroll Oper » 's status as a symbol of cultural bolshevism, the Right's waxing strength in the Republic at large, and perilous finances in Berlin had cast shadows on the company's continued existence. As early as 1927, Heinz Tietjen, contemplating budgetary projections, had hinted that Berlin could not afford 3 Opera Houses, that one would have to go, and that the « Kroll » would be the one to close. A key problem was the growing disenchantment of the « Volksbühne » 's management. By the middle of the decade, the progressive leaders of the early 1920's had been replaced by a more conservative team, and whether they followed or led the taste of their clientele, the signals from « Volksbühne » headquarters were unhappy. The organization had considered the « Kroll Oper » to be a 2nd rate spin-off of the « real » « Staatsoper » even before Otto Klemperer took sole control : if the « Kroll Oper » got half the subsidies of the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » , it must be only half as good (and, in terms of vocal quality, at least, that was probably right) . The modernist productions, even if proportionately few in number, often alienated the organization's increasingly « petit bourgeois » membership. These problems were exacerbated by Leo Kestenberg's lamentable failure to follow-up on his reformist ideals with practical attention to their realization, a failure presented in the feeble guise of allowing the « Kroll Oper » artistic freedom. Kestenberg withdrew from the responsibility of raising his Operatic child just when it was most needed.

In testimony before the « Landtag » , Heinz Tietjen reported that the « Volksbühne » was regularly consulted as to the « Kroll Oper » 's repertory. But, while both the « Kroll Oper » and the « Volksbühne » had offices in the « Kroll Theater » , their administrators rarely talked, at least outside an occasional formal meeting ; instead, they communicated by memos and letters sent to the ministry or to Tietjen. Leo Kestenberg (insofar as he was involved) , Otto Klemperer, and Heinz Tietjen ignored the « Volksbühne » in making their policy decisions. Klemperer's conception of an « Altags Oper » , an Opera company with consistent day-to-day quality, was inherently democratic, but he never bothered to reach-out of the « Volksbühne » or the « Kroll Oper » 's Republican public at any meaningful way, until it was too late.

Although, in retrospect, we can see signs of the Weimar Republic's final decline in late 1928, the period was still one of optimism. The economy seemed healthy, and the elections in May had seemed to favor the defenders of Republican democracy. That winter, however, chronic seasonal unemployment reached a new high, and it failed to recede as much as expected. By the beginning of 1929 (long before the American stock-market crashed in October) , the signs of decline were everywhere apparent, feeding political extremism even within the Center-Right Parties. The elections, in september 1930, signaled an astonishing re-ordering of national electoral strength, with the Nazis jumping from 12 seats in the « Reichstag » (out of 491) to 107 (out of 577) . The new Chancellor, Heinrich Brüning, began issuing presidential decrees that further subverted parliamentary democracy and encouraged the secretive plotting that led to Adolf Hitler's selection as Chancellor, in January 1933.

Prussia lived on in its bubble of protected innocence, as if untouched by the threats from the Right. Sometimes, it seemed as if the whole State government and the citizens of Berlin were as blissfully unaware, as Otto Klemperer and his artistic allies at the « Kroll Oper » . Braun did not have to call State elections to coincide with the national elections of 1930, and he and his Weimar Center-Left coalition clung to power, isolated and gloomy, like Wotan in « Walhalla ». But extremist rhetoric clouded all political debate, and the Right, holding-up the « Kroll Oper » as the quintessential manifestation of cultural bolshevism, voiced their anger ever more stridently despite their still small numbers in the « Landtag ». This calculated hysteria did not overtly influence behind-the-scenes ministerial decisions, which proceeded with bureaucratic implacability and all the secretiveness that led to Adolf Hitler's installation.

When Otto Klemperer learned of the death of Gustav Stresemann, the Weimar Republic's moderate, cosmopolitan foreign minister, on 3 October 1929, he remarked :

« This is also a fateful day for us. »

And, indeed, the 1st decisive overtures to close the « Kroll » Theatre came at just that time. Heinz Tietjen had already « quite casually » told Otto Klemperer, in spring of 1929, that the « Kroll » would be shut the following year. The theatre was less expensive to run than the other 2 Berlin theatres and, in 1929, the Prussian theatre budget (which included Opera) was less than twice that of Bavaria's, despite the fact that Prussia had a population that was 5 times greater. Nevertheless, the pressure to balance budgets and staunch deficits ran high in every State department. The 3 Opera Houses, in Berlin, provided fewer available seats « per capita » than did a single company in a smaller city, yet, as the depression deepened, all 3 had disturbing numbers of empty seats. The quasi-independent « Oberrechnungskammer », a budgetary oversight Commission, objected to the « Kroll Oper » as unnecessary « competition » for the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » and likewise objected to the « Volksbühne » pact, as an arrangement that was no longer advantageous for the State. By October 1929, the finance ministry had joined the recommendation to close the « Kroll ». To what extent both agencies were havens for embittered monarchists or aggrieved nationalists, and to what extent they were merely acting on dispassionate economic convictions, remains controversial.

In a larger sense, the demise of the « Kroll Oper » was clearly political. The non-political cultural ideals underpinning the « Kroll Oper » were ludicrously unsuited to the times and markedly feeble when compared to the vested interests of the City and State. The « Städtische Oper » had local pride behind it, and the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » had the weight of tradition and symbolism, as the bearer of German Operatic « Kultur ». All the « Kroll Oper » had was the idealistic goodwill of the Weimar intelligentsia, which paled before the implacable persistence of the Right. The climate of extremism intimidated the company's potential defenders.

Leo Kestenberg may have felt that his advocacy was a liability, given the constant attacks on him ; by the late-1920's, word had spread in government circles that he was a « dead man », which presumably referred to his career. Heinz Tietjen remained tactically passive ; no hard evidence has surfaced that he actively plotted against the « Kroll Oper ». And the centrist Becker, who had grudgingly agreed, in 1929, to the recommendation to close the « Kroll » Theatre, had seen his power eroded by the SPD's demand for a larger share of ministerial positions, specifically in the ministry of culture. Braun defended him but, ultimately, gave way and appointed a docile Socialist, Adolf Grimme, to Becker's post. Despite ostensible support for the « Kroll Oper » from Braun and Grimme, the will of the SPD was undermined by the Party's need to cultivate its coalition partner, the « Deutsche Zentrumspartei » (German Central Party) , which determined that its interests were better served by supporting Operatic culture in the far eastern and western regions of Prussia, where its electoral strength lay.

Throughout 1930, the ministry of culture proceeded largely unimpeded by « Landtag » scrutiny as it dealt primarily with the technical matters of closing the « Kroll » . The « Volksbühne » 's contract needed to be re-negotiated, which hardly proved difficult given the organization's disenchantment with the « Kroll Oper » and its own struggles to maintain its financial commitments, and artists' contracts had to be reconfigured to find them places at the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » . The final decision came on October 1930 : Braun called the ministers of finance and culture to a conference, and the Parties agreed that the « Kroll » Theatre would close at the end of the 1930-1931 season.

Even if the ministerial conferences proceeded with a tone of non-partisan objectivity, the « Landtag » debates on the « Kroll » 's closing were highly-politicized. Karl Koch, a pastor and a member of the « Deutschnationale Volkspartei » (German National People's Party) , predictably attacked the « Kroll Oper » productions of Beethoven's « Fidelio » and Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » for their « Neggerkultur » (Negro culture) , but he was not alone in his denouncement. On the Left, the Socialists remained timid defenders of the supposedly socialist Opera company, while the Communists, although voting consistently in favor of the « Kroll Oper » , haughtily disdained bourgeois Opera. (Their own Opera policy often seemed limited to boasting about Moscow and its purported 6 Opera companies.)

Otto Klemperer, galvanized into action in spring 1930 by a growing awareness that his company's situation was dire, undertook a series of private meetings and wrote a number of newspaper articles defending his company. His campaign to save the « Kroll Oper » , coming when it did, seemed too opportunistically concerned with preserving his own ensemble or, eventually, his own position in the State Opera hierarchy. Peter Heyworth seems to think he was making some headway, but his efforts were far too meager - and far too late. He certainly did not affect the decisive ministerial conference of 10 October 1930. During the « Kroll Oper » 's last years, Otto Klemperer carried-on in a charmed limbo, indifferent not only to political and social events but also to dissatisfaction within his own theatre complex. He claimed too late that it would have been easy to coordinate with the « Volksbühne » and engage in educational outreach activities. Leo Kestenberg, supposedly so concerned with musical education, apparently never thought to urge him to do so. It was only after the « Kroll Oper » 's fate was sealed that a press and political campaign began and public attestations of loyalty poured forth.

The sham public battle carried merrily on, with the Leftist press assuming that the « Kroll Oper » was being done in for political reasons. It all came to nothing. On 25 March 1931, with Otto Klemperer and other key « Kroll » figures in the visitor's gallery, the « Landtag » formally voted all subsidy for the theatre out of the budget. In the meantime, a « Landtag » Committee charged with investigating the « Kroll Oper » was summoned to life by the Right-wing Parties. Although some historically interesting testimony emerged, the investigation was essentially an effort to further humiliate Braun and his shaky Center-left coalition. The Committee, which met 9 times between March and June 1931, was obsessed with meaningless detail. The coalition members, who were sure to prevail since their numbers reflected the coalition's majority, sat mutely while the Right peppered the « Kroll Oper » leadership and its allies with insulting questions. The most telling testimony (telling for its brevity) was Leo Kestenberg's. Seelig was allowed to claim credit (or blame) for the State's initial take-over of the « Kroll » building. Kestenberg denied having anything to do with Opera policy, or with the independent « Kroll » company, or with the propagation of modern Opera and production styles. In short, he lied. Whether his motives were heroic self-abnegation, tactical retreat, appeasement, or cowardice, his testimony brought an ignominious end to Berlin Opera reform during the Weimar Republic.

Otto Klemperer kept fighting (he was even attacked by a Nazi gang in the « Tiergarten ») although he scurried away, on 25 April 1931, for an extended guest engagement in Buenos Aires, thus missing the closing night of his own company. By March 1933, struggling to maintain his position at the « Staatsoper » under the Nazis, he went so far as to try to ingratiate himself with Josef Gœbbels by denying any interest in modernist art.

For all the « Kroll Oper » 's limitations, its productions were good enough on their own to earn it a place in Operatic history, even beyond its symbolic value as a shining light of Weimar culture. Rarely before had there been such a combination of unusual repertory, excellence of ensemble signing and acting, and day-to-day consistency. The contractual obligation to provide performances for all « Volksbühne » members who wanted to attend assured more performances of each production that was normal. Following an Opera's opening performance, all subsequent performances used the same singers, and fresh rehearsals enabled the « Kroll Oper » to maintain the same level of quality (for better or for worse) for the run of the production. The final months of the « Kroll Oper » seemed especially luminous, winning the company its most consistent critical success and popular enthusiasm.

The great appeal of the « Kroll Oper » derived from its aspirations to both artistic and social betterment, as critic and musicologist Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt explained :

« This theatre was, in some magical way, more than a temple of art. One felt that its artistic efforts were part of some large task. It was a “ Volksbühne ” of a higher and more spiritual nature. One believed modern social ideas to be in the air, but also a kind of modern religiosity, an aura of cult and belief, which seemed to stream-out of the very person of Otto Klemperer. After the final curtain of the final performance, Mozart's 1786 “ Le nozze di Figaro ”, on 3 July 1931, the applause went on and on. Hans Curjel thanked the public, and the entire personnel appeared together on stage. Then, the lights went-out. One left the house both moved and embittered. An epoch of European Operatic culture lay behind us. »

From late Weimar to Adolf Hitler

After the summer of 1931, Leo Kestenberg and his allies, in the art department of the ministry of culture, floated in a political limbo, reduced to the execution of routine tasks. Professionally, they were already « dead men » . Otto Klemperer conducted intermittently at the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » , but his staff and ensemble had scattered and their reformist spirit had vanished. The national elections of April 1932 were this time paralleled by Prussian elections, and Braun's tenuous coalition was voted down decisively. In the « Landtag » , the Nazis jumped from 8 to 162 deputies. Braun clung to power, since the Right could not agree on a coalition to replace him. On 30 May, the Brüning national government fell, leading to the plots undertaken by Papen and Schleicher, all under the increasingly senile oversight of Hindenburg. One such manœuver was Papen's « coup » of 20 July 1932, in which the government of Prussia was taken-over by the national government. Papen then purged all Socialist officials, including Grimme, the minister of culture. The art department at the ministry was abolished, effectively firing Leo Kestenberg and Hans Seelig. Kestenberg was officially retired from the ministry, on 1 December. After Adolf Hitler's accession to power, on 30 January 1933, Kestenberg fled to Prague, where he stayed for 5 years, then to Palestine, where he managed the Palestine Symphony Orchestra (which became the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra) . Leo Kestenberg and Otto Klemperer were estranged for years, but they finally made-up after World War II.

As a sympathetic critic noted, as early as 1925, the ministry of culture's Opera reform efforts were « progressive in ideas but retrogressive in their execution » . The ideas were those of traditional « good German » idealism, but by the time the Weimar Republic came to an end, the Right had cynically reversed the polarity, nationally and locally, in the fight over Opera in Berlin. The Right trumpeted its allegiance to traditional German values. But it had, in fact, drifted far from those precepts. The Left, the true inheritor of Liberal idealism, had been stigmatized by the sharper polemical skills of its oponents. Ministry officials had to recognize their task as inherently political, but this they were incapable of doing. For all its internal contradictions, the failure of Berlin Opera reform was a failure of tactics, not policy - and the same might be said of the Weimar Republic. It was the height of folly to persist with non-political tactics. The wistful desire to play a Liberal, idealistic game was frustrated by the fact that the bourgeois Parties had long since given-up that game themselves.

The only hope for Opera reform would have been to forge a working alliance among the Parties of the core Weimar coalition. Becker recognized this in 1930 but, by then, it was too late. The arts had become virulently politicized by the late- 1920's, making the continued pursuit of a non-political cultural policy a contradiction in terms : the converse of the non-political artist is the non-artistic politician. There were plenty of those in the late Weimar Republic, even in the land of « Dichter und Denker » . But neither is as incongruous as the non-political politician.

The Nazis took tight control of the « Staatsoper » after they assumed power, in 1933. Several composers' works were banned, and the repertoire and staging otherwise was shaped to support the Nazi agenda.

Just weeks after Adolf Hitler came to power, on 13 February 1933, one of the leading conductors of Germany, the Jewish Otto Klemperer, gave a performance of Richard Wagner's Opera « Tannhäuser » . The performance was met with outrage, and decried as an insult to the memory of the composer. Years later, one official insisted that it is particularly significant that, as late as 13 February 1933, and after the National-Socialist seizure of power, the Jewish general music director Klemperer had the impudence, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death, to mount a production of « Tannhäuser » at the Berlin State Opera that ranked as a deliberate insult to the great German Master and an affront to all people with decent feelings.

The incident and its repercussions served to hasten Klemperer's departure from Germany, on in April 1933. Since the early days of his career, Klemperer had made a name for himself as a champion of the modernist cause of Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schönberg and Paul Hindemith. Under his direction in the late- 1920's, the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin, became a target of hatred for the increasingly reactionary voices of late Weimar, condemned as a centre of cultural bolshevism. Although himself avowedly apolitical, Klemperer had conducted frequently in the Soviet Union, and his early conversion to Catholicism had little meaning for a race-based ideology like that of Nazi anti-Semitism.

Otto Klemperer's performances and their modern « mise-en-scène » were ahead of their time and raised the opposition by conservative circles. In the highly-charged political atmosphere during the late days of the Weimar Republic, public pressure made the general administrator of the Prussian State theatres, Heinz Tietjen, realize that the administration could not afford the funding of 3 Opera Houses, in Berlin. Despite Klemperer's protests, the « Kroll Oper » was finally closed on 3 July 1931 with the last performance of Mozart's « The Marriage of Figaro » .

The paradigm shift in production practices reflected by the centennial Wagner « Ring » (1976) recalled innovations that had taken place on the stages of many German Opera Houses prior to the advent of National-Socialism. During the Weimar Republic, Opera had served as a forum for extraordinary æsthetic and theatrical innovation. Much of the most adventurous work by many of Germany's most innovative directors, artists, and choreographers was to be viewed on the Opera stage. For example, between 1927 and 1931, at one of the most visible centers of Operatic experimentation, the Berlin's « Kroll Oper » .

« Stage directors without pre-conceptions were brought in from the spoken theatre, and artists like Giorgio De Chirico, Oskar Schlemmer, and László Moholy-Nagy were given shows to design. »

As Ernst Bloch put it, at the « Kroll Oper » :

« Old works were presented as if they were new, and new works were presented as if their contemporaneity was not of the cheap and easy sort. »

With the advent of National-Socialism, many of these innovators fled or were arrested. During the course of the Nazi regime, and for years after its demise, a great deal of German Opera production, re-tooled and re-dedicated to serve the national cause, reverted to the backwater that had so frustrated Richard Wagner. The elected designers of the Berlin « Kroll Oper » period (including Ewald Dülberg, Oskar Schlemmer and László Moholy-Nagy) finally influenced the development of Opera production after 1945.

László Moholy-Nagy : Mentor to Modernism

By Lloyd C. Engelbrecht. (DVD)

Sound recordings of László Moholy-Nagy speaking in Hungarian and in English. Brief excerpt from the Opera « The Tales of Hoffmann » of Jacques Offenbach. Short film clips : 1) Conductor Otto Klemperer speaking of Moholy's work for the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin ; 2) Moving images of Moholy's friend, Ellen Frank ; 3) Moving images of Moholy-Nagy himself.

Clip 1

Jacques Offenbach, « Barcarolle » from « The Tales of Hoffmann » (1881) , sung in German as « Schöne Nacht, du Liebesnacht » . The singers are : baritone Willi Domgraf Fassbänder (1897-1978) as Niklaus, and soprano Felicie Hüni Mihacsek (1891-1976) as Giulietta. The Orchestra of the Berlin State Opera is conducted by Mæstro Julius Prüwer (1874-1943) .

1929 : 78 rpm recording by « Grammophon » (catalogue number : 66862 - matrix number : 1639 BM) .

This is the historical recording with the closest ties to the « Barcarolle » in László Moholy-Nagy's 1929 Berlin production of « The Tales of Hoffmann » at the « Kroll Oper » . Prüwer was associated with the Berlin State Opera, if only in the recording studio, and he conducts here the sister Orchestra to that of the « Kroll Oper » , the « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » . The « Kroll Oper » was officially known as the State Opera on the Plaza of the Republic. Both Domgraf Fassbänder and Hüni Mihacsek sang at the « Kroll » , but not in « The Tales of Hoffmann » . The role of Niklaus is usually sung by a woman in the theatre (but not always in the recording studio) although the character is male or, in other words, Niklaus is an example of what has come to be known as a « trouser role » for a female Opera singer.

The conception of Alexander Scriabin's 1910 Symphonic work, « Prometheus : The Poem of Fire » , Opus 60, for piano, orchestra, optional choir, and « clavier à lumière » (or « Chromola » : a color organ invented by Preston Millar) found an echo in Wassily Kandinsky's published stage-piece « The Yellow Sound » which, like Scriabin's « Prometheus » , began and ended with blue. This piece was influential on the staging of scene 3 of Arnold Schoenberg's « Die glückliche Hand » , which includes a crescendo of lights changing from a dull red to yellow, through dirty-green, violet, blue-grey and bloody red. Schoenberg's piece also had to wait some years for a production. One of the earliest was at the Berlin « Kroll Oper » , with sets by Oskar Schlemmer, who had long been working on ballets with elaborate light-cores under the influence of Scriabin and of Kandinsky's scenario for « The Yellow Sound » .

Isadora Duncan and the « Kroll Oper »

1903 : Isadora Duncan had made modern dance virtually synonymous, in popular consciousness, with barefoot performance. Isadora Duncan used Eastern gestures in her choreography. She even went so far as to appear nude in a performance at the « Kroll Oper » . Although, she refused to play the role of « Salome » in the Berlin music-hall.

1905 : 20 pupils, including Anna Denzler (1894-1980) , from Zürich ; Maria-Theresa Kruger (1895-1987) , from Dresden ; Irma Dorette Ehrich-Grimme (1897-1977) , from Schleswig-Holstein, near Hamburg ; Elizabeth (Lisa) Milker (1898-1976) , from Dresden ; Margot (Gretel) Jehle (1900-1925) , from Berlin ; and Erica Lohman (1901-1984) , from Hamburg, join Isadora Duncan's school. Those pupils are called « Duncaninchen » or « Little Duncans » and have their 1st public performance with Isadora at the Berlin « Kroll Oper » , on July 20.

Wilhelm Reinking and the « Kroll Oper »

Claire Eckstein (1904-1994) met in Munich the gifted scenic designer Wilhelm Reinking, whom she soon married. Reinking recommended her to Heinrich Strohm, director of the Opera theatre in Würzburg. Impressed with her extravagant sense of humor, Strohm hired her to choreograph Paul Hindemith's ballet « Der Dämon » (1926), then Jaap Kool's « Der Leierkasten » (1927) and Rimsky Korsakov's « Scheherazade » (1927), for which Reinking did the scenery. Along with stage director Arthur Maria Rabenalt, Claire Eckstein and Wilhelm Reinking moved to Darmstadt. It is there, from 1927 to 1931, that Eckstein, in addition to her usual duties for the Opera and Operetta, staged several comic ballets with a distinctive modernist ambience : Massarani's « Der arme Guerin » (1928) ; Darius Milhaud's « Le bœuf sur le toit » (1928) ; Erik Satie's « Parade » (1929) ; Florent Schmitt's « Ein höher Beamter » (1930) ; and 2 ballets for which she herself composed the music : « Soirée » (1930) and « Die Gestrandeten » (1930) . During these years, American dancer Edwin Denby (1903-1983) was her partner-collaborator. However, in 1930, the Berlin « Kroll Oper » invited Wilhelm Reinking to design Rossini's « The Barber of Seville », and this opportunity led to others for him in the city. Claire Eckstein brought several of her Darmstadt pieces to Berlin (1931), but these did not open up possibilities for her in a theatre culture suffering from severe austerity measures and political extremism.

Max Terpis and the « Kroll Oper » ballet choreographies

The Hannover choreographies brought choreographer and Opera producer Max Terpis (1889-1958) to the attention of Max von Schillings, director of the Berlin State Opera, who sought to reform the ballet corps, which numbered nearly a 100 dancers, yet, failed to achieve anything resembling the seriousness of purpose that « Kroll » had attempted to provide it, in 1919-1922. Terpis held the State Opera position for 6 years, but his life there was a nightmare of political intrigue and reactionary efforts to undermine his reforms and authority. He produced 19 ballets at the State Opera, nearly all of which used music by living modernist composers, including Kool, Kömme, Igor Stravinsky, Friedrich Wilckens, Manuel de Falla, Franz Schreker, Sergei Prokofiev, Paul von Klenau, Ralph Benatzky, and Darius Milhaud. Max Terpis wrote most of the scenarios himself. Scenic designers such as Emil Pirchan and Panos Aravantinos assisted him in creating expressionist-constructivist settings for ballets that largely inhabited the realm of symbolic fantasy ; « Die fünf Wünsche » (1929) contained a film sequence shot by Gina Fagg. Because of persistent resistance to his expressionist methods from doyens and classically trained dancers, he could not construct group dances as powerfully or radically as he wished, so he increasingly relied on the talents of a few extraordinarily gifted soloists : Rolf Arco, Rudolf Kölling, Daisy Spies, Walter Junk, Dorothea Albu. This strategy only aggravated tensions between himself and the majority of the corps, although Max von Schillings and his successor, Heinz Tietjens, continued to support him. But, in 1929, Terpis faced a full-scale insurrection, from the new music director Otto Klemperer, who accused him of lacking « musicality » and of failing to grasp the nature of theatrical art. Max Terpis, therefore, handed in his resignation, and Rudolf von Laban soon replaced him.

The early Klemperer recordings

Otto Klemperer had a strange recording career. In the 1st phase, from 1924 to 1931, he recorded in Berlin for «

Polydor » , « Parlophone-Odeon » and « Electrola » .When one considers the number of great German conductors who were active, at this time, it is surprising that Klemperer made so many recordings as he did, since his reputation then was not so high as it later became. But then, he left Germany and made no more recordings for a quarter of a Century, until he was used by the « Vox » label, after World War II.

The « Symposium » record label have made a wise choice of the most interesting items from the 1st phase, when Klemperer was at Berlin's « Kroll » Opera, and those who have not heard these recordings before will be very surprised at what they reveal. It is difficult, for example, to reconcile the swift, urgently expressed and exciting 1927 « Coriolan » Overture with the elderly Klemperer's monumental Beethoven style of the late- 1950's and 1960's.

Otto Klemperer and the « Staatsoper Orchester, Berlin » :

Beethoven : « Coriolan » Overture, Opus 62, State Opera Orchestra, Berlin (1926-1927) , « Polydor » : 66599 - 387-388.

Wagner : « Siegfried Idyll » , State Opera Orchestra, Berlin (1926-1927) , « Polydor » : 66604 / 66605 - 394-397.

Ravel : « Alborado del Gracioso » , State Opera Orchestra, Berlin (1926) , « Polydor » : 66463 - 296-297.

Debussy : 2 Nocturnes : « Fêtes » , « Nuages » , State Opera Orchestra, Berlin (1926) , « Polydor » : 66464 / 66465 - 319-320-331-332.

Auber : « Fra Diavolo » Overture, State Opera Orchestra, Berlin (22 May 1929) , « Parlophone » : P-9406 - 2-20862-2 / 2-21431-2.

Offenbach : « La Belle Hélène » Overture, State Opera Orchestra, Berlin , « Parlophone » : P-9469 - 2-21432-1 / 2-21433-1.

Weill : « Dreigroschen Suite » , State Opera Orchestra, Berlin (1930-1931) , « Polydor » : 24172 / 24173 - 2743-2744-2745-2746.

Otto Klemperer on « Naxos » Historical (Review by Rob Maynard.)

Discussion of the distinctive characteristics of Otto Klemperer's conducting tends to focus on the final phase of his long career, when many of his interpretations appeared to mirror his impassive (if not positively stern) facial expression and his physical immobility.

In fact, his best-known and most widely circulated recordings (made with the London « Philharmonia » and « New Philharmonia » Orchestras, in the 1950's and 1960's) almost invariably attract such adjectives as « forceful » , « unwavering » , « solid » and « craggy » (the word « granite » appears with almost monotonous regularity) . But that seriously distorts Otto Klemperer's overall achievement in the recording studios. Many of his early 1950's « Vox » label discs, for instance, exhibit a far less monolithic « style » . And the interpretations preserved on « Naxos » Historical issues offer surprising and conclusive proof of the individuality and subtlety of his interpretations of core repertoire at an even earlier stage of his career.

Klemperer's image in the late- 1920's was that of a progressive modernist. Appointed chief conductor of the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin, in the very year that most of these recordings were set-down and remaining in that post until 1931, Klemperer famously outraged the Nazi Party's cultural pan-jandrums by focusing on works by such culturally (and often racially) suspect composers as Paul Hindemith (« Neues vom Tage » , 1929) ; Arnold Schönberg (« Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene » , 1930) and Kurt Weill.

And yet, the Brahms and Wagner recordings, expertly restored to fine effect by Mark Obert-Thorn, show him to have been, at the same time, an entirely sympathetic and often quite surprisingly flexible interpreter of such late- 19th Century Romantic repertoire.

From the very opening of the Brahms Symphony, we are in for a surprise, for the timpanist's strokes (far from driving all before them in the usual relentless and dominating fashion) are, while remaining the music's key propulsive driver, far more integrated into the full orchestral mix than we generally expect.

Of course, it might be argued that a single such instance might well be due to the inadequacies of late- 1920's recording technology. (Even though, modern restoration techniques have shown conclusively that many surviving masters have far more detail embedded in them than used to be assumed.) But further listening reveals that the C minor Symphony's opening is of an exact pattern with Klemperer's conception of the whole work, with showy dramatics consistently eschewed in favour of lightness of touch, frequent fleetness of foot (especially, in the Finale) and orchestral transparency that allows the score's finer detail to shine through. And what lovingly-presented detail there is ! Just listen, for instance, to the sweetly seductive solo violin in the slow movement (from about 6 min 56 sec onwards) , « gemütlich » almost in the manner of a Viennese « café » player and making a noticeably more striking contribution than usual.

This is, in fact, an interpretation which might be said to draw-out the similarities to Brahms's 2nd Symphony, rather than following the usual practice of emphasising the contrasts : Klemperer revealed not as granite, but as chalk. The performance of the « Academic Festival Overture » exhibits many of the same qualities. This is a piece that can easily sound somewhat episodic, but Klemperer moulds its various elements together into a coherent and musically convincing whole in which, for once, « Gaudeamus Igitur » does not sound like it has simply been tacked onto the end for dramatic effect.

The « Tristan » Prelude is something of a disappointment - but only compared to the exceptional music-making found on this disc's other tracks. Though just as well-played, here, Klemperer's interpretation lacks individuality. The recording by the same Orchestra under the much-underrated Max von Schillings, also made in 1927 (and available on « Preiser », Mono 90267) , is, to my ears, a far more involving experience.

That leaves us with an exquisitely shaped, well-balanced and beautifully paced performance of the « Siegfried Idyll » that not only demonstrates, once again, Klemperer's fine musicianship but also showcases the Berlin Orchestra's qualities to perfection.

Today, we tend to remember the Weimar Republic's more avant-garde contributions to the arts. This disc performs an important function of reminding us that, even in an era marked by prolonged economic crisis and political instability, the German musical tradition was still being maintained at the highest levels. Indeed, having listened to this disc, many might argue that such superb and responsive musicianship puts to shame a good number of well-known Orchestras making recordings today.

Banquet for Berlin bibliophiles at the « Kroll Oper » (1932)

The book lovers' and collectors' Societies that began to appear in Germany, at the end of the 19th Century, were based on groups that had been established earlier, in England and France. The German Societies attracted book-lovers and collectors from the professions and academia, as well as from publishing houses and the antiquarian book trade. The group known as « Berlin Bibliophile Evening » was founded, in 1905, by Fedor von Zopeltitz, one of the original members of the Weimar Bibliophiles group. German bibliophilic Societies had a substantial and active Jewish membership. Of the 300 members of the « Berliner Bibliophilen-Abend » , between 1905 and 1930, 75 were Jewish.

Victor Klemperer

Victor Klemperer (1881-1960) , the cousin of Otto Klemperer, was Professor of French Literature at the Dresden University. As a Jew, he was removed from his University post, in 1935, only surviving thanks to his marriage to an Aryan. Ist published in 1957, « The Language of the 3rd " Reich " » arose from Klemperer's conviction that the language of the 3rd « Reich » helped to create its culture. As Klemperer writes :

« It isn't only Nazi actions that have to vanish, but also the Nazi cast of mind, the typical Nazi way of thinking, and its breeding ground : the language of Nazism. »

...

The building of the « Kroll Oper » stood empty for nearly 2 years, until the « Reichstag » fire, on 27 February 1933, severely damaged the « Reichstag » building « vis-à-vis » . After the German federal election, on 5 March 1933, the « Kroll Oper » became the seat of the « Reichstag » parliament, by then a puppet legislature under the control of the Nazi Party. It was chosen both because of its convenient location and for its seating capacity. On 23 March 1933, the majority of the « Reichstag » delegates in the « Kroll » Opera House disempowered themselves passing the « Enabling Act » that gave Adolf Hitler virtually unlimited authority. At this time, the elected MPs of the Communist Party and several Social-Democrats were already in hiding or arrested. After the election, on 12 November 1933, the Nazis occupied all the seats.

The main hall of the « Kroll Oper » was used for sittings of the « Reichstag » throughout the Nazi regime, nevertheless, the deputies did, in no way, act as a parliament and met intermittently only to serve as the audience of Hitler's set piece speeches. It was here that Hitler made a speech, on 30 January 1939, of his plans for the Holocaust :

« If the international Jewish financiers, in and outside Europe, should succeed in plunging the nations once more into a World War, then the result will not be the Bolshevizing of the earth, and thus the victory of Jewry, but the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe. »

The last session of the « Reichstag » was held in the « Kroll » Opera House, on 26 April 1942, passing a decree proclaiming Hitler Supreme Judge of the German People allowing him to override the judiciary and administration in all matters. In these last days, the building, once again, was the site of several performances of the Berlin State Opera, after the Opera House « Unter den Linden » had been damaged by air raids. However, the « Kroll Oper » itself was devastated by a RAF Bomber Command attack, on 22 November 1943. It was further damaged, in the last days of World War II, when forces of the Red Army stormed the « Reichstag » ruin. Bombing destroyed both the « Staatsoper » and the « Deutsches Oper », which both moved into the « Admiralpalast », in the Russian Sector, for the duration. After the War, the « Staatsoper » stayed there while the « Deutsches Oper » moved to the British Sector. Ernest Legal, formerly of the « Kroll Oper », took-over the « Staatsoper ». As a matter of prestige, the East German authorities rebuilt the « Theater Unter den Linden », opening it in 1955.

Already after the War, in the summer of 1945, a restaurant re-opened in the gardens of the « Kroll Établissement », keeping-up business even after the remains of the main building were demolished on March 27th, 1951. The « Kroll Garten Inn » finally closed in 1956 and, 1 year later, the last premises were cleared to make place for the erection of the audacious design of the new « Berlin Kongreßhalle » by the American architect, Hugh Stubbins Junior. The exact site of the « Kroll Oper » is nothing but a large lawn, south of the « Bundeskanzleramt » (and near the Carillon tower, donated by Daimler-Benz) , marked by a memorial plaque since 2007.

The « Berlin Kongreßhalle » (« Haus der Kulturen der Welt »)

The « Haus der Kulturen der Welt » (or House of the Cultures of the World) is Germany's national centre for contemporary non-European art. It presents art exhibitions, theatre and dance performances, concerts, author readings, films and academic conferences on non-European Visual Art and culture. It is one of the few institutions which, due to their national and international standing and the quality of their work, receive funding from the Federal government as so-called Lighthouses of culture. The building is located in the « Tiergarten » park and it is a direct neighbour of the Carillon and the new German Chancellery. It was formerly known as the « Berlin Kongreßhalle » conference hall, a gift from the United States, designed in 1957 by the American architect Hugh Stubbins, Junior, as a part of the « Interbau » exhibition. President John F. Kennedy spoke there during his June 1963 visit to West-Berlin. On May 21, 1980, the roof collapsed killing 1 and injuring numerous people. The hall has been rebuilt in its original style and re-opened in 1987, at the 750 years Jubilee of the City of Berlin. To Berliners, it is also known as the « Schwangere Auster » (the Pregnant Oyster) .

The « Tiergarten » Carillon Tower

The Carillon Tower is located in a free standing tower, next to the House of World Cultures (« Haus der Kulturen der Welt ») , near the « Reichstag » in the north-eastern part of Berlin's central « Tiergarten » park. The concrete structure of the tower of 42 meters high is coated with black granite stone. Its roof is trough shaped. Several architects contributed to the design. Among them, Axel Schultes. It was inaugurated on 27 October 1987, on the 750th anniversary of the City of Berlin, as a memorial to the carillons in the « Parochialkirche » and the « Garnisonkirche » in Potsdam, which were both destroyed in the Second World War. It was funded by Daimler-Benz AG, manufacturer of Mercedes' cars.

The carillon is a large, manually played concert instrument, comprising 68 bells weighing a total of 48 metric tonnes (almost 106,000 lbs.) connected to a keyboard spanning 5½ fully chromatic octaves ; the largest bell weighs 7.8 tons (almost 17,200 lbs.) . The carillon was cast by Royal Dutch foundry, Eijsbouts, according to the specifications of American « carillonneur » , Jeffrey Bossin who has since been giving concerts on the carillon. There are also special concerts with other well-known players. The world's leading composers and virtuosos of bell tower music are annually gathered for the international Festival marking the Pentecost. It is one of the largest instruments of its kind in Europe and, approximately, the 4th largest (by number of bells) in the world. The « carillonneur » sits in a playing cabin, in the middle of the bells, and plays with his fists and feet on a baton-and-pedal keyboard. The purely mechanical action makes it possible to play all dynamic gradations, from very soft to very loud. But the carillon also plays computer-controlled pieces, at 12 noon and 6 pm, daily.

The Dream of a National Theatre : German Civic Culture and The History of the « Kroll » Idea

The Public and the Private : Art and Urban Culture

This article will explore the idea of the national theatre and its roots in pre-1914 Berlin. The complex relationship between private and public deserves more attention, specifically, in the context of the city. Paul Nolte mentions the dearth of regional studies that would clarify the relationship between « elite » culture and « Volkskultur » , and relate both to civic identity. (1) More challenges are needed to counter the idea that, once the « Bürger » had established themselves as a clearly delineated class or socio-economic group, only the private and domestic realm nourished artistic culture. This line of argument reproduces the Habermasian line, in which, as the public sphere evolved, it paradoxically led to a new kind of privacy.

Court and private theatres in Berlin did not measure-up to ideals of the national theatre which gained currency as a result of the Revolution of 1848. At the same time, the proposed national theatre was envisioned as something which would combine the best aspects of both - it would present works of high-artistic quality, and it would be available and open to all. The « Kroll idea » championed by Otto Klemperer and Hans Curjel, in the 1920's, had roots in the 1840's, as calls for a more Liberal Germany became fused with demands for a different type of theatre. Within this framework, Operas became an increasingly important subject of cultural debate, especially after Richard Wagner's contribution to the national theatre conversation in « The Art Work of the Future » . (2)

Wagner was concerned with establishing Opera, or « music-drama » , as he termed it, within the framework of the national theatre debate. The central importance of music in the construction of a German national identity has recently received much attention from scholars. (3) Theatre has also been recognized as crucial for the development of national consciousness in Germany - and, more specifically, a democratic national consciousness. As Rainer Lepsius has described, the 19th Century concept of the « Bildungstheater » :

« The program of the “ Bildungstheater ” was developed not in a socially narrow sense or aimed affirmatively at a specific class, but for the entire people. » (4)

Even though theatre was usually not understood as political, the popular view that it represented an escape from political reality is mistaken. (5) This article will relate theatre, and especially Opera, to the notion of a civic culture bound-up with and indeed dependent on artistic expression.

This idea took the form of a « national theatre » . Calls for a national theatre accompanied every move toward Liberalism and democracy in Germany, starting with the period immediately following the French Revolution and Germany's attempt to establish its own culture. (6) We will examine the 19th Century roots of the national theatre, focusing on a key-text : Eduard Devrient's « The National Theatre of the New Germany » . We will trace the development of this idea, up to the beginning of the First World War. In the development of the civic culture of Berlin, « Kroll » 's Winter Garden, built in 1844, played a crucial role. Founded as a private theatre and « establishment » , it later became a Court Theatre, in 1896, under Kaiser Wilhelm II. It can, thus, serve as an illustration of both types of theatre and what they meant for Berlin culture at the turn of the 20th Century.

Finally, between 1908 and 1914, conservative politicians developed ambitious plans for the « Kroll » . It was to be the site of a vast new Opera House which would replace the traditional representative house located on « Unter den Linden » . The older building, designed by Georg Wenceslaus von Knobelsdorff, in 1742, was perceived to be no longer compatible with the needs of the regime. However, the outbreak of the First World War left the « Kroll » 's very existence in question. In 1918, the building was a partially demolished ruin. The intervention of Germany's 1st theatre-goers' organization, the Berlin « Volksbühne » , began the « Kroll » 's association with the practice known as « soziale Kunstpflege » , or providing high-culture to lower-income people at reduced prices. The history of the « Kroll » , as an institution of Berlin civic culture, is, however, much older.

Eduard Devrient and the German National Theatre

The most important inspiration for Weimar era attempts to expand civic culture was Eduard Devrient's « The National Theatre of the New Germany » . The author (1801-1877) was the nephew of the noted actor Ludwig Devrient. He was, himself, an actor, a singer and, eventually, the director of the Court Theatre in Karlsruhe (1844-1846). After a fire, in 1847, the theatre did not re-open until 1853. As a result of censorship imposed after the Revolution of 1848, the theatre was unable to regain its former reputation and could not serve as an example of Devrient's vision, which he first outlined in 1849.

Devrient called for a complete restructuring of the theatre. He was clearly inspired by Friedrich Schiller's « On the Aesthetic Education of Man », which he refers to explicitly, but some of his ideas concerning theatre and morality also show the influence of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing's writings on theatre in his « Hamburgische Dramaturgie ». Lessing had been instrumental in promoting Hamburg's National Theatre, founded in 1766, which was « the first serious attempt to provide a German theatrical company with a fixed abode and, at the same time, to introduce a new system of management ». (7) Lessing wrote a series of articles on its performances, which were apparently of very high-quality but could not appeal to the general public. The national theatre in Hamburg was, therefore, short-lived and closed its doors in November 1768.

Lessing's most important feature for Devrient's later argument is his position that theatre and actors are vitally important for national character.

In fact, he argues, theatre ought to be « the school of the moral world ». (8) The ability of actors to arouse empathy had important implications for the structure of society because theatre revealed human traits which were potentially universal :

« In the theatre, we should not learn what this or that person did, but rather what every person of a certain character would do under certain circumstances. » (9)

Even comedy had a moral purpose because it exposed the ridiculous nature of some social conventions. (10)

Lessing took the position that certain emotions, such as fear, were profoundly democratic. Any person might feel such emotions. In this, Lessing relied on Aristotle's theory of catharsis, but re-interpreted it as follows :

« If Aristotle had simply wanted to teach us which passions tragedy can and should excite, he could have spared himself the addition of fear. But he also wanted to teach us which passions could be cleansed in us through those excited by the tragedy ; and, in this context, he had to pay special attention to fear. » (11)

Through the persona of Shakespeare's Richard III, Lessing explores this theory. Why does the protagonist arouse interest, even identification ? Perhaps, because he appeals to the latent emotions of the audience. The audience is, according to Lessing, ambivalent concerning the results of Richard III's actions. This is because they identify with him emotionally, if not morally. Thus, the response to theatre is a mixture of the rational and the emotional. Drama was uniquely suited to unite a national audience because it had the potential to arouse empathy. (12) Thus, the example set by the ancient Greeks and Romans, who had profoundly identified with their theatre, should be emulated in Germany. While many people believed that the French had a true national theatre and that the Germans should imitate their example, Lessing disagreed. He found French theatre emotionally hollow. (13)

The only advantage France had was that it was already a unified nation. Was it possible to speak of a German theatre culture when there was no one German nation ? The problem did not consist merely in the fact that political unity was an elusive goal. Germans also lacked self-confidence in their culture and a sense of national character :

« One could almost say that this (the national character) consists in not wanting to have one. » (14)

Devrient clearly wanted to change this situation and create a broader basis for German theatre culture. Court theatres, he claimed, had originally set a good example, but « their present appearance does not express their original idea » . (15) After 1815, the monarch could no longer be said to represent the will of the nation. In the realm of theatre, he chose « Intendanten » who were merely Court personalities and did not necessarily have theatrical interests. In a Republic, however, State subsidies would not be counter-productive. They would, in fact, be absolutely necessary :

« Everything which educates and ennobles humanity must be supported by the State, made independent of mere commerce. » (16)

The reform of theatre had to be a national issue and could not be left to individual German States. In Devrient's day, theatre in Prussia, his own State, was under the control of the Ministry of the Interior and was subject to censorship. He demanded that it be placed under the control of the Ministry of Culture. Further, a « Direktion » (directing board) should be established, made-up of the artistic personnel. They would choose the most qualified person to direct the theatre, subject to the approval of the ministry.

In Devrient's view, there was a natural harmony between theatre and Republican institutions :

« The nature of the dramatic art is the most perfect socialization (" Vergesellschaftung ") of all, yet, it still preserves the unique nature of the individual. It demands that the individual find the satisfaction of his own desires in the satisfaction of the general good. The art of acting, therefore, requires Republican virtue in its full strength. » (17)

Further, he contended, theatre should also represent a future Republic :

« Every important date for the nation should be celebrated with an appropriate performance and, thus, gain the sympathy of the present-day. The most important events of the day should also find expression on the national stage. » (18)

In addition to the ideas of Schiller and Lessing, it is not difficult to see the influence of French revolutionary views of theatre and spectacle, particularly the notion of « Republican virtue » . (19) Devrient's vision was, however, primarily a reaction against what he perceived as excessive foreign influence on German culture. In Vienna and Berlin, he claimed, the theatres were already too specialized. This specialization would vanish in the age of the national theatre, which would be composed of 3 branches :

« Clearly, at least until these 3 theatres can consolidate themselves, all other theatres in Berlin must be closed, and Italian Opera and French plays must be forbidden. One must inspire the theatre and the public, both spiritually and ideally, to support a truly national theatre before one can expose them to tempting and distracting rivalry. » (20)

The national theatre, or at least this version of it, was never fully realized. Devrient's ideas, nevertheless, had a significant impact on thinking about theatre after 1848. Their influence remained strong after the First World War, when the German actors' Union republished his work with a preface explaining that this was what theatrical personnel expected from the new Weimar Republic. Devrient influenced primarily those on the political Left. This was due to his suspicion of capitalism and private theatres run for a profit. In Berlin, the latter was certainly dominant at the time he wrote the appeal for a national theatre. It was in the context of private entrepreneurship that « Kroll's Establishment » 1st emerged.

The Origins of the « Kroll » Opera

The history of the « Kroll » Opera has been related before, but seldom in the context of Berlin theatre as a whole. (21) Joseph Kroll, a Breslau « restaurateur », obtained permission from Friedrich Wilhelm IV to build a restaurant with a garden and a space for concerts and other musical performances. The « Establishment », as it was then called, opened on February 15, 1844. It was intended « to offer the educated public of Berlin a place to relax », via concerts, balls and other entertainment suited to « the good taste of the present-day. » (22) A masked ball followed 2 days after the official opening. (23) Lectures and patriotic Festivals were also featured. The building's location, in the « Tiergarten » district, or what was then called the « Exerzierplatz », unfortunately proved a problem. Kroll died and left the establishment to his daughter, Auguste, before a plan could be made concerning the rather remote location. (24)

In 1848-1849, the number of theatres in Berlin was growing and, therefore, the « Kroll » faced increased competition. Shortly after the Revolution of 1848, numerous summer theatres were established, but Auguste Kroll had more in mind for her own theatre than light entertainment. She planned to present Operas instead of the usual summer fare, and received permission from the police president to present Operas in 1850. (25) A fire, in 1851, was not a serious setback and the « Kroll » re-opened the following year.

Auguste Kroll's plan to have high-culture performed at the « Kroll » was unusual, as Opera was an art-form generally reserved for Court theatres. The « Kroll » had, in fact, developed into the archetypal popular theatre (« volkstümliches Theater ») which performed neither Opera nor the German Classics, but rather light entertainment such as vaudeville and Operetta. The relaxation of theatre censorship, after 1850, led to a situation in which « a drama developed which took political and social conditions as its subject ». (26) Not until 1865 did private theatres get permission to perform the Classics. By then, however, the privately owned « Kroll » had long been competing successfully with the Court theatres. Private theatres were originally supposed to ensure the financial survival of their attached restaurants or beer-gardens. In time, this situation reversed itself. The patrons of private theatres had a notably relaxed and participatory attitude towards the theatrical performances they saw. As Ruth Freydank has noted :

« The relationship of theatres to the public was marked, in those years, by direct contact, by enthusiastic activity and by the participation of the audience in the form of calls and interjections, unified singing, its own performances and open demonstrations of approval or disapproval. » (27)

Such activities were not regarded as contrary to decorum. The difference in atmosphere between private theatres and Court theatres may be grasped when one considers the fact that Court theatres did not perceive themselves as open to the wishes of the general public. In fact, only in 1904, was the audience at the « Linden » Opera officially allowed to cheer and boo despite the presence of the Court. (28) A popular theatre was a different matter :

« Here, the little-man had the chance and the right to be himself. » (29)

Such theatres were, however, primarily profit-making operations, which worried those who stuck to Eduard Devrient's vision of the theatre. Especially after the « Gewerbeordnung » of 1869, many new theatres were built. In the early days of a united Germany, after 1870, most politicians did not take theatre seriously as a political institution. Those on the Left, primarily the Social-Democratic Party (SPD) thought differently. They feared the corruption of the public through mass-entertainment. After the Party's legalization, in 1890, it was a major voice in the debate about what theatre should represent and what role it should play. The situation in Berlin was especially complicated. The problem of creating a democratic theatre culture was more acute because Berlin had no City - State tradition, but had always been the capital of the State of Prussia. In the new unified Germany, the city was under pressure to represent the entire nation.

« Kulturtheater » in the Wilhelmine Era and the Origins of the « Freie Volksbühne »

The concept of a cultural theatre (« Kulturtheater ») was wide-spread in the years after 1870. The SPD's understanding of this word was uncomplicated and nonetheless utopian. It meant theatre removed from the demands of the market. However, Wilhelm II also tended to pay lip service to this concept, because he viewed himself as a protector of the arts. He explained his position in the following terms :

« To declare a theatrical production as a commercial item to be sold to the public every evening means giving-up its function as an artistic institution. » (30)

The « Kaiser » 's views led him to interfere constantly in Court theatre, so that it became less and less representative of what the public actually wanted. Thus, both artistic reform and economic reform were pressing issues in the Wilhelmine era, but they were handled in very different ways.

Unification led to a clear change in the position of Berlin. The city's culture was now expected to be the showpiece of the nation, instead of merely the Court or of private citizens. Competing concepts of « Kulturtheater » illustrate the various ways in which Berlin faced the challenge of representing national culture. The expansion of the city, after 1870, and the emergence of a large urban working-class, brought social issues to the foreground. Was access to culture, in fact, one of these social issues and an additional sign of working-class deprivation ?

The underground cultural activities of the SPD had sustained its political mission. After 1890, this interest in cultural issues continued. The call for a popular theatre, in a new sense of the word, found support among working-class activists and those who sympathized with them. Because the working-class lacked access to most theatres, a popular theatre intended exclusively for them was an idea whose time had come. The « Freie Bühne » , a largely middle-class organization which supported modern drama, was the inspiration for a similar working-class movement. (31) The « Freie Bühne » had been especially successful in promoting the literary movement known as naturalism. Many Left-wing intellectuals, especially the journalist Bruno Wille, called for a working-class equivalent as the best way of making-up workers' deficit in « Bildung » .

Over 2,000 people appeared for the founding meeting, in July 1890. (32) From the beginning, the political goals of the « Freie Volksbühne » , as it was called, were a source of controversy. The organization was never formally subject to the SPD, but always maintained close ties to it. Some members believed that the « Freie Volksbühne » should, in fact, serve as the cultural arm of the Party. Conflict within the SPD over whether to use revolutionary or reformist tactics were mirrored in the development of the « Freie Volksbühne » . This conflict led the organization to split in 1892, as Wille and his followers left to form the « Neue Freie Volksbühne » . Despite their differences, both organizations were regarded as political and, therefore, dangerous to the State. (33)

The expulsion of Wille and his followers on political grounds meant that a vocal opposition favored the idea of explicitly political theatre. (34) Wille, the middle-class son of an insurance inspector, was more concerned with acquainting the workers with traditional « Bildung » . Naturalism was important to him not for its social criticism but because of its artistic quality. The break-up of the original « Freie Volksbühne » did not, however, produce a new age of political theatre. Indeed, it was unclear what sort of drama would be appropriate for this purpose. Naturalism never became the official art of the proletariat, doubtless due to the difficulties of conceiving a well-articulated concept of proletarian culture. (35)

Increasing police harassment led the original « Freie Volksbühne » to re-organize itself along different lines, in 1897. Instead of becoming the literary organization of the working-class, « it encouraged the public taste for dramatic art » . (36) The growth of membership was relatively slow. It reached 6,000 by 1892 ; and 7,600 by 1894. Workers were also joined by many former members of the « Freie Bühne » , which had never had its own theatre. Renting a theatre was a considerable problem for the « Freie Volksbühne » as well. Eventually, they persuaded the « Lessing-Theater » to open its doors for Sunday afternoon performances. These were an absolutely new phenomenon at the time, clearly geared to the needs of workers who, otherwise, had to contend with a 10 hour work-day. (37)

Concerning the behavior of the public in the theatre, it had to learn certain norms. Women frequently did not remove their hats, and men brought beer to the theatre. Once the public was more experienced, however, they showed little desire for theatrical productions that would remind them of their everyday lives. For some later figures on the Left, this represented a far more serious problem. Heinz Selow commented in 1930, that :

« The Social-Democratic worker forgot his political tendencies completely in the theatre - if he was not reminded of them. » (38)

An exclusively political conception of the « Freie Volksbühne » 's role is, however, too narrow. If art as a goal in itself was a major concern of the ordinary people who attended a performance, this did not negatively impact their class-consciousness. Some accounts of the « Volksbühne » 's history have blamed leaders and membership alike for having a « naïve » attitude towards the theatre. (39) Likewise, the fact that workers and the middle-class sat together in the theatre is, according to some commentators, evidence of the latter's undue influence rather than a positive attribute of civic culture. (40) Struggles over the political character of the « Volksbühne » became even more intense during the Weimar era. The fundamental issues at stake, however, remained essentially the same from the 1890's on.

Rather than relying on a dubious concept of proletarian art, which has never been well-articulated, historians ought to take seriously the mission of the « Volksbühne » , as it evolved during the 1890's :

« The “ Volksbühne ” chapters saw themselves as the legitimate heirs and guardians of a theatre culture which had originated with the “ Bürgertum ” and had flourished there ; but it had not been further developed or even preserved by this class, so that it needed a new social and organizational base. » (41)

The æsthetic and political priorities of the « Volksbühne » did, however, have to be re-adjusted when it came to the issue of Opera. The movement for æsthetic reform of Opera initially had nothing to do with the expansion of « Bildung » . Thus, access to Opera performances became a political issue later than was the case with spoken theatre. Naturalism, in the minds of many adherents, had a direct link to the socialist movement. Thus, the demand for a type of theatre which was not often performed elsewhere was tied to the demand for political emancipation. Opera, by contrast, was anything but avant-garde in the 1890's, especially not in Berlin.

Æsthetic Reform of Opera

Members of the « Volksbühne » actually had the opportunity to see Opera performances, as early as 1896. In order to do this, however, they had to rent-out various different venues around the city. This involved considerable effort and expense. The « Linden » Opera remained artistically stagnant well into the 20th Century. The tastes of « Kaiser » Wilhelm II essentially determined what would be performed, there. His « Intendant » , Georg von Hülsen-Hæseler, followed in the tradition of his predecessors and took no chances with anything which might possibly cause controversy. Berlin had shown great resistance to performing the works of Richard Wagner, long after the composer had been accepted elsewhere in Germany. (42) Notable examples of von Hülsen's attitude included his insistence, in 1911, that certain suggestive passages of Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » be toned-down. « Kaiserin » Auguste Viktoria apparently took offense at the fact that the Opera opens with a bedroom scene, and Strauß commented that an aristocrat, such as von Hülsen, could not stand to see aristocratic characters behaving the way they often did in real life, engaging in adultery and fathering illegitimate children. (43)

The æsthetic and cultural short-comings of the « Linden » Opera were noticeable to perceptive critics. In the journal « Die Schaubühne » , Walter Reiß mocked a 1905 production of Wagner's « Die Walküre » for its lack of realistic detail. For example, the character of Siegmund, who is supposed to be seeking shelter from a storm, appeared on stage with perfect hair and clean clothes. The audience only tolerated this, Reiß suggested, because the Orchestra and the singers maintained the highest-standards. (44) Nevertheless, he suggested, there was room for a 2nd opera in Berlin to make-up for the « Linden » Opera's deficits.

Hans Gregor and the « Komische Oper » , 1905-1911

Ironically, for someone who did not produce the works of Wagner, the conductor Hans Gregor considered Opera, « music-drama » . That is, he aimed to make theatrical standards as high as musical ones. Some contemporaries believed he went too far in the theatrical direction. A short « Schaubühne » piece which poked fun at prominent theatrical figures in Berlin featured a Gregor character dismissing the leading lights of the « Linden » Opera with these words :

« Oh, there you go again with your music. » (45)

Gregor arrived from Elberfeld at a time when the Court had Opera in a stranglehold. His concept for a new Opera was revolutionary in that he refused all subsidies. This meant that he could not offer affordable seats. His public was made-up of essentially the same people who would have patronized the « Linden » Opera were it not for the latter's tired and old-fashioned repertory. (46) The « Komische Oper » , which opened in 1905, presented itself as a supplement to the larger house, performing works which had previously been over-looked in Berlin. Some interpreted these works as « those which, perhaps, can best be appreciated by somewhat æsthetically jaded gourmets » . (47)

Gregor wanted to steer his audience away from the accepted German canon. Non-German works were far less popular before 1914 than they would later become. Nonetheless, it is astonishing that the « Linden » Opera passed-over so many Operas which have proven to be of lasting popularity. The works of Giacomo Puccini, now considered the bread and butter of most standard Opera Houses, were missing from its repertory. The « Komische Oper » made-up this deficit by productions of « La Bohème » and « Tosca » . The latter was performed in the 1906-1907 season for the 1st time in Berlin. Apparently, it had been considered too shocking and radical. (48)

French and Italian Opera played a significant role in the « Komische Oper » 's repertory. In addition to Puccini, Gregor premiered Claude Debussy's « Pelléas et Mélisande » in Berlin, as well as several 19th Century French Operas. Gregor was not only unwilling to take on Wagner ; he also lacked the space to do so. From the beginning, he was cursed with an « almost impossible » house. (49) The building on the « Weidendämmer Brücke » was cramped and the acoustics were unsatisfactory. The need for new costumes and singers and for sufficient rehearsal time raised costs enormously. Although critics praised him, Gregor could not fill the House. The gap between his artistic goals and his means led to the closing of the « Komische Oper » , in 1911. (50) The moral of the story appeared to be that, privately financed, Operas could not survive. The citizens of Charlottenburg, at the time a city independent of Berlin, had made their own attempt at privately financed Opera but, in 1912, they also closed. It was clear that they could not sustain the project. The integration of Opera into the project of a national theatre, nevertheless, had a long way to go.

« Kaiser » Wilhelm II did not lack interest in such a project. Notably, however, he expressed himself as follows on the question of theatre :

« I was convinced, and had adopted it as my task, that the Royal Theatre should be a tool of the monarch, just like schools and Universities, which have the task of educating and preparing the next generation to work for the preservation of the spiritual treasures of our splendid German fatherland. The theatre is also one of my weapons. » (51)

Between the ideology of the monarchy, which saw theatre as a means of propaganda for the status quo, and the alternative of a theatre purely for profit, stood the concept of « Kulturtheater » . In 1911, Max Epstein's « Das Theater als Geschäft » had claimed to show that most theatres could survive entirely without subsidies. (52) Proponents of « Kulturtheater » believed that this proposition might be true for theatre which appealed to the lowest -common denominator, but the artistic function of the theatre and that which made it a part of « Bildung » would, thereby, be lost.

The « Volksbühne » , according to future theatre referent Ludwig Seelig, was an example of « Kulturtheater » , but it was a model which ought to be more broadly instituted in German society. (53) It was inextricably bound-up with class struggle, not only because for-profit theatres exploited actors, but also because they offered the public the most undemanding and frivolous art. Seelig expressed himself on this issue as follows :

« The artistically worthless Operetta, farce and tear-jerker of the most sentimental kind command the field. Serious art does not appeal to the public ; at least, not in the way it is presented by commercial theatre. » (54)

Opera, while prestigious, was often under-rehearsed, and the Court theatres which presented it were not suitable models. They wasted money on luxuries and had to make-up for this through imitation of commercial theatres. (55)

Devrient and Wagner were Seelig's inspiration for his idea of theatre which, in his opinion, should be subject directly to cities and States. In 1913, the time of his manifesto, the only theatre directly controlled by a local government was Mannheim's, which had attained communal status as early as 1839. Mannheim also had a theatre constitution, like Vienna's « Burgtheater » and some French State theatres. (56) Importantly, Seelig anticipated many of Otto Klemperer's ideas in his concept for the « Kroll » Opera. He asserted that an ensemble and adequate rehearsal time would benefit both, actors and the public.

One thing Seelig did not anticipate, however, was Klemperer's attitude toward the public. In his view, the theatre should work to promote culture among the downtrodden :

« Today, when the machine threatens to make man himself into a work machine, the treadmill of everyday life which degrades him, the exaltation of the soul to eternal spiritual values is a more urgent problem than ever. » (57)

The « theatre of the people » was the wave of the future. Once theatre ceased to be the sole property of the rich, claimed Seelig, it would lead to social peace and to a reduction in class-conflict. (58)

In retrospect, of course, this seems a dangerous illusion. Class-conflict could certainly not be solved by cultural means alone. However, the attachment of the working-class to high-culture was a real phenomenon which challenged the notion that « Bildung » was only for the privileged few. Thus, the SPD was correct to promote the goal of universal « Bildung » .

The Party was, in fact, the most vocal defender of civic culture. As Liberals abandoned the idea, it became increasingly centered on the arts but artistic culture had always been a main focus in any case. At the turn of the 20th Century, « Bildung » was, indeed, on the defensive because it was so clearly unrepresentative. (59) As an ideal, the Wagnerian project remained powerful, but in the Wilhelmine era, as Wagner became respectable, his works and ideas were increasingly associated with elite culture.

Opportunities for workers were, however, not limited to the « Freie Volksbühne » and the « Neue Freie Volksbühne » . Beginning in the winter of 1907, the « Königliche Bühnen » offered « people's performances » for lower-prices. Both plays and Opera were presented, but the total amounted to 10 productions attended by 1,560 people each. (60) This was insufficient, as demand was much greater than this. The Court theatre system was not suited to the workers' demands, and Wilhelm II's plans for a new representative Operatic culture were intended primarily for his own glorification.

The Plan for a New Opera House, 1908-1914

The competition to build the projected new Opera House went through 3 different stages, that is to say 3 different architectural competitions. (61) Ultimately, nothing was decided. The new House was to have been built on the former site of the « Kroll » Opera, but the latter was rebuilt whereas the plans for a new representative Opera were shelved. The « Linden » Opera, due to historical circumstances, remained the main representative House.

The debates surrounding the plans and financing of a new Opera are, nonetheless, crucial for what they reveal about cultural attitudes in the years directly before the First World War. The issue of the new Opera was first debated in Prussia's House of Deputies, beginning in March 1908. The issues were twofold. The « Linden » Opera was widely acknowledged to be inadequate in terms of fire safety. (62) Several deputies, therefore, proposed addressing the safety situation by converting the House into a site for scholarly meetings and conferences. At the same time, a new House would be built on the former site of the « Kroll » which would comply with contemporary architectural standards. However, it was not only these practical details which occupied the deputies' time. A change in the notion of Opera culture itself was clearly in the air. The new Opera, the deputies insisted, could not be a mere elite institution.

The SPD and the National Theatre

A somewhat surprising source played a prominent role in the debates over the future of Berlin Opera. Social-Democratic deputy, Karl Liebknecht, said that he supported the idea of a new Opera, although he felt that the city of Berlin should not help to cover the costs. However, he stated that the architectural designs presented, thus far, fell short of what the city and the population of Berlin needed. The task of building what was specifically understood to be a Court opera was impractical, as Liebknecht proclaimed in a 1913 speech in the House of Deputies :

« Through this problem of the Court theatre which is, at the same time, supposed to be a theatre of the people (because the Court cannot fill the theatre, it cannot even maintain the theatre or, at least, does not want to maintain it) , the issue acquires a stark inner-contradiction. » (63)

The theatre designs presented were not satisfactory, because they did not take into account the technical complications involved in building a modern theatre.

Liebknecht also expressed his concern about the high-priority accorded to the Opera as a project. He conceded that the city did have æsthetic and cultural responsibilities to its population :

« But the Royal Opera House will unfortunately not be an institution for the great mass of the people. We will get a theatre exactly like the current Royal Opera House, for the top 10,000 with extremely expensive seats. » (64)

Under such circumstances, the city of Berlin did not even have the right to pay for such a project. (65) Liebknecht, nonetheless, supported the project, at least theoretically :

« By this, I do not mean that all of us have no interest in the building of the Opera House, in spite of its Court theatre character, in spite of its socially exclusive character. But this is not the task of the city of Berlin. » (66)

However, he did not suggest who should fund the new Opera, having already stated that the Court was unwilling to do so. Liebknecht went on to criticize other political Parties for their cavalier attitude to the future of the « Linden » Opera :

« Gentlemen, it would perhaps not offend your æsthetic sensibilities if we suggested that the Berlin police headquarters be moved into the Royal Opera House. » (67)

The SPD was certainly trying to have it both ways. It would support cultural endeavors, but insist that the city of Berlin not be forced to pay for them. After the Revolution of 1918 and the transition to a Republican Germany, the Party's position changed along with political circumstances. Yet, even before the War, Liebknecht foresaw a future for representative German culture which would transcend its connection with the monarchy. The building as such was not something his Party opposed. 4 years later, he stated that even if the submitted designs were all related to the traditional concept of a Court Opera, « We nevertheless feel that the kind of luxury building the Opera House will represent is not solely for this reason a disadvantage or something to be condemned » . (68) The costs did, however, stand-out in view of the fact that Prussia and the « Reich » were less and less willing to spend money for social welfare. (69) Liebknecht demanded change in the area of cultural policy :

« I have repeatedly explained that Social-Democracy can only approve this building under the condition and the expectation that the government and the management of the Opera House fulfill their obligations to the mass of the population and not simply to the Court or to the upper 10,000. » (70)

Ticket prices especially ought to be within the reach of the average Berliner. If this were to become a reality, representative culture could still have a future :

« If an Opera House like this one is built, it will not be built only for a few years, but for generations, and we have the hope and the firm conviction that this House will still be standing at a time when it has lost the character of a Court Opera House, when it will be a people's Opera House, and where the splendid space will serve the general public, the people. » (71)

At this point, the record shows that Liebknecht was cheered by his own Party and called to order by the president of the House of Deputies. Clearly, what the president perceived him to be saying, and what he probably intended to say, was that, sometime, in the foreseeable future, there would be no Court to deal with. Indeed, Liebknecht went on to quip that :

« A gentleman from the Right called to me that he had a better image of the revolution than I do. You seem to be an expert in this area ! » (72)

Conclusion

The last debates on the Opera House project took place in May 1914. As we know, nothing came of these plans, because the First World War intervened. The remains of the « Kroll » Opera served as a hospital during War-time. (73) The impetus for a more democratic high-culture had, however, not been lost. The SPD's call for a more inclusive Opera would attract much support in the years immediately following Germany's defeat.

Interestingly, the Conservative deputy Henning had already argued, in 1908, for preservation of the « Linden » Opera because it was so important to preserve Prussian tradition :

« I am not thinking of the present ; I won't say anything about that ; it will probably be handled within very patriotic limits. But no one knows what the future will bring. It could happen that very different flags from the black and white one will be planted there (at the Opera) . »

Krolloper befand sich in Tiergarten (Tiergarten-Süd) auf dem Exerzierplatz vor dem Kontext : Brandenburger Tor Brandenburger Tor, dem späteren Königsplatz und heutigen Platz der Republik.

Joseph Kontext : Kroll, Joseph Anton Jakob Norbert Kroll ließ Carl Ferdinand Langhans (1781-1869) , Ludwig Persius (1803-1845) und Eduard Kontext : Knoblauch, Karl Heinrich Eduard Knoblauch einen großen Gaststättenkomplex errichten. Er konnte am 15.02.1844 nach zehnmonatiger Bauzeit als Krollsches Etablissement eröffnet werden. Der schloßartige Bau bestand aus einem erhöhten zweistöckigen Mittelteil und zwei langgestreckten Flügelbauten, ergänzt durch diverse Außenanlagen. Er verfügte über zwei Wintergärten, 14 Festsäle, drei große Säle und den besonders prunkvollen Königssaal mit Logen und Balkonen für insgesamt 5.000 Gäste. Nach einem Großbrand am 01.02.1851 stellte der Baumeister Eduard Kontext : Titz, Eduard Titz das Haus innerhalb eines Jahres wieder her, wobei er die Ausstattung prunkvoller gestaltete. Zwischen 1895 und 1898 baute Gustav Hochgürtel aus der am 25.06.1850 eröffneten Sommerbühne das Neue Königliche Opernhaus. Wegen Unrentabilität begann nach der letzten Vorstellung vom 30.03.1914 der Abriß, der jedoch durch den Beginn des I. Weltkrieges gestoppt wurde. Der Gebäuderest diente dann als Lazarett und Textillager. 1922-1923 baute Oskar Kontext : Kaufmann, Oskar Kaufmann das Theater wieder auf, das am 01.01.1924 als Neue Oper mit den « Meistersingern » von Richard Wagner (1813-1883) seine erste Vorstellung erlebte. Nach Querelen und Problemen im Spielbetrieb zwischen der Lindenoper und der Kroll kam es zu organisatorischen Veränderungen. Am 19.11.1927 eröffnete die Staatsoper am Platz der Republik unter der Leitung von Otto Kontext : Klemperer, Otto Klemperer mit der Aufführung der Beethoven-Oper « Fidelio » eine neue Ära. Sie wurde abrupt mit dem Beschluß des Preußischen Landtages vom 25.03.1931 über die Schließung des Hauses beendet. Am 03.07.1931 fand mit Mozarts « Die Hochzeit des Figaro » die letzte Vorstellung statt. Nach dem Reichstagsbrand am 27.02.1933 wurde die Kroll als Tagungsstätte des Parlaments umgebaut. Erstmals tagte der Reichstag am 23.03.1933 in der Kroll und verabschiedete dort das Ermächtigungsgesetz. Am 01.09.1939 verkündete Adolf Kontext : Hitler, Adolf Hitler in der Kroll den Beginn des II. Weltkrieges, und am 26.04.1942 fand dort die letzte Reichstagsitzung statt. Das am 22.11.1943 von Fliegerbomben erheblich beschädigte Gebäude wurde 1951 gesprengt und bis 1957 abgetragen. Heute befinden sich an dieser Stelle eine Parkanlage und Baugelände für das neue Regierungsviertel.

Krolloper

Kroll'scher Wintergarten oder Krolls Etablissement

Architekten : Königlicher Baumeister Ludwig Persius sowie Carl Ferdinand Langhans und Eduard Knoblauch.

Standort : In der Nähe des Brandenburger Tores, am heutigen Platz der Republik, gegenüber dem später erbauten Reichstagsgebäude.

1844 : Erbaut.

15. Februar 1844 : Eröffnung des Kroll'schen Wintergartens.

23 März 1933 : « Ermächtigungsgesetz » : Otto-Wels-Rede im Reichstag (Sitzungsort Krolloper) , SPD-Abgeordnete stimmten als einzige gegen das Gesetz.

November 1943 : Teilerstört durch Luftangriffe.

30 April 1945 : Weitere Schäden bei der Erstürmung des Reichstagsgebäudes.

23. Mai 1945 : Beginn der Aufräumarbeiten, um das Gartenlokal wieder nutzbar zu machen. In den Sommermonaten fanden im Kroll-Garten Konzert- und Tanzveranstaltungen statt.

1. Mai 1950 : Veranstaltung zu Frieden und Freiheit.

1951 : Teile der Hauptgebäude werden gesprengt und abgetragen.

1956 : Nach einer ruinösen Saison gibt der letzte Pächter den Betrieb auf.

4. Mai 1957 : Beantragt das Grundstücksamt Berlin-Tiergarten die Abräumung der Gebäudereste.

Herbst 1957 : Die letzten Spuren der Krolloper sind beseitigt.

August 2007 : Am ehemaligen Standort, auf einer Rasenfläche in der Nähe des neuen Bundeskanzleramtes, erinnert eine ausführlich deutsch / englisch beschriftete Informations- und Gedenktafel an die Krolloper und ihre Geschichte.

So etwas Schönes wie die Breslauer wollte Friedrich Wilhelm IV. auch haben : einen Krollschen Wintergarten. Des Königs Wunsch war dem Untertan Befehl, und so zog der Unternehmer Joseph Kroll von Breslau in die Berliner « Sahara » , wie der Exerzierplatz am Brandenburger Tor genannt wurde. In dieser etwas trostlosen Gegend, wo nun das Deutsche Historische Museum entstehen soll, baute Kroll sein Denkmal deutscher Tüchtigkeit : In zehn Monaten stampfte er ein prachtvolles Schloß aus dem sandigen Boden, geschnörkelt und geschmückt, mit Kronleuchtern und Gaslichtern, die jeden Besucher blendeten, und Platz für 5.000 Personen, ein Vergnügungspalast zum Essen, Tanzen und Staunen. Kolossal :

« In diesem Feenpalast wird ein steter Frühling seyn. »

Das ist der Anfang einer krummen deutschen Geschichte vom Familienbetrieb zum Staatstheater - so krumm, so deutsch und so illuster, daß ihr das Berliner Landesarchiv in der Kalckreuthstraße I eine Ausstellung gewidmet hat : « bei Kroll 1844 bis 1957. Etablissement - Ausstellungen - Theater - Konzerte - Oper - Reichstag - Gartenlokal » , womit noch längst nicht alles erwähnt ist. Das ist es auch, was Kroll so spannend macht, diese geradezu unverfrorene Unbefangenheit, mit der das Krollsche Etablissement (schon der Name läßt alle Möglichkeiten - nach oben und unten, rechts und links - offen) genutzt wurde : Goethe und Kasperletheater, Stadtverordnetenessen und Affentheater, Mozart und Kanonendonner und « Große militärische Harmonie » : 6 Flöten, 6 Oboen, 6 Contra-Fagotts, 6 Kontrabässe, 36 Klarinetten, 12 Fagotts, 8 Waldhörner, 16 Trompeten, 12 Posaunen, 4 Sopran-Tuben, 4 Alt-Tuben, 4 Tenor-Tuben, 4 Bariton-Tuben, 12 Schlaginstrumente für türkische Musik und Glasglockenspiel.

Ort des Ermächtigungsgesetzes

Im Ersten Weltkrieg stopfte die Zentralsammelstelle der Reichswollwoche die inzwischen staatlichen Festsäle mit Lumpen und Wolle voll. Davor waren im Neuen Königlichen Operntheater Caruso, das Schlierseer Bauerntheater und Gustav Mahler aufgetreten ; in der nachrevolutionären Staatsoper am Platz der Republik (wie die Kroll-Oper nie genannt wurde) bauten Oskar Schlemmer, Traugott Müller und László Moholy-Nagy ihre strengen Bühnenbilder (von denen die Ausstellung einige sehr schöne Entwürfe enthält) zu Opern von Jean Cocteau und Igor Strawinskij unter der strengen Regie von Otto Klemperer.

Nachdem dessen « Experiment Kroll-Oper » endgültig gescheitert und der Reichstag abgebrannt war, wurde das Theater innerhalb von zehn Tagen (« erstaunlich wie hübsch und zweckentsprechend ») zur politischen Bühne umgebaut ; und « man merkte fast gar nicht » , daß die Plätze der Kommunisten, die als einzige gegen die Schließung der Kroll-Oper gestimmt hatten, in diesem Reichstag leer blieben. Auch jetzt wurden « Einlaßkarten » ausgegeben (« 13 Uhr pünktlich ») ; hier verkündete Hitler das Ermächtigungsgesetz, verteidigte er das gewaltsame Ende des « Röhms-Putsches » und erklärte am 1. September 1939 :

« Von jetzt ab wird Bombe mit Bombe vergolten ! »

Und als Albert Speer längst das gigantische Führer-Palais, Mittelpunkt der « Welthauptstadt Germania » , auf dem Krollschen Gebäude fertiggebaut haben sollte, hüpfen die Berliner hier zwischen Kriegstrümmern herum : Kabarett und Tanz bei Kroll. Endstation Gartenlokal.

So volkstümlich, wie « Kroll » klingt, war es nie. Des Königs Baumeister lieferten den Entwurf für Krolls Vergnügungspalast, der Königliche Theaterfeuerwerker entzündete bei der « Großen Festlichkeit zur Errettung und Genesung Senior Majestät des Königs » , der bei einem Attentat verwundet worden war, ein « imposantes Feuerwerk » , und die Königin kam zu Kroll um sich die Neger aus Afrika zeigen zu lassen. Das « gebildete Publikum Berlins » wollte Kroll, der schon 1848 starb, in seinen prachtvollen Königssaal locken. Die Speisekarte von 1853, in der Ausstellung zu bewundern, wendet sich mit ihren Trüffeln in Burgunder für fünfzehn Silbergroschen offensichtlich an den gehobenen Geschmack und den gefüllten Geldbeutel. Einen « Luxusbetrieb » nennt ein Gutachter Kroll noch nach dem Krieg.

Nach der Zerstörung des Plenarsaals durch den Reichstagsbrand am Abend des 27. Februar 1933 wurde die nur einige Hundert Meter vom Reichstagsgebäude entfernte und seit 1931 geschlossene Kroll-Oper von den Nationalsozialisten als neue provisorische Tagungsstätte für das Parlament ausgewählt. Namensgeber für das Gebäude war Joseph Kroll, der mit Förderung von Preußens König Friedrich Wilhelm IV. sein Krollsches Etablissement 1843-1844 als Vergnügungsstätte vor den Toren Berlins in der Nähe des Brandenburger Tores errichtet hatte. Das ursprüngliche Gebäude wurde von Ludwig Persius, Carl Ferdinand Langhans und Eduard Knoblauch im Stil der märkischen Biedermeier-Renaissance geschaffen. Das Gebäudeensemble wurde später auch als Opernhaus benutzt. Zuletzt war das Gebäude von Herbst 1927 bis Juli 1931 unter Leitung von Otto Klemperer Spielstätte für die « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » .

Der Umbau der Kroll-Oper zum provisorischen Parlament

Zu Beginn der zweiten Märzwoche 1933 begannen unter Leitung der Preußischen Bau- und Finanzdirektion die behelfsmäßigen Umbauarbeiten an der Kroll-Oper, deren Großer Theatersaal ursprünglich über rund 1.100 Sitze verfügte und nun zum Sitzungssaal umfunktioniert wurde. Die Decke wurde tiefer gezogen und mit Stoff überspannt, so daß die Deckengemälde verschwanden. Bühne und Orchestergraben erhielten Aufbauten für das Präsidium, die Schriftführer, die Regierungsbänke und die Stenographen. Dabei wurde auch die aus dem zerstörten Plenarsaal des Reichstagsgebäudes stammende, noch intakte Regierungsbank in die neuen Aufbauten der Kroll-Oper integriert. Den Abgeordneten stand als Wandelhalle der Theaterumgang in der Höhe des Parketts zur Verfügung. Die Sitzungssäle der Fraktionen, die Bibliothek wie auch Teile der Parlamentsverwaltungen verblieben im Reichstagsgebäude. Hinter dem Gestühl des Reichstagspräsidiums wurde an der Stirnwand der Oper eine große Hakenkreuzfahne aufgespannt. Rechts und links davon hing, als taktisches Zugeständnis der Nationalsozialisten an ihre Koalitionspartner von der DNVP, anfänglich noch eine schwarz-weiß-rote Fahne des Kaiserreiches. In den beiden Rängen der Kroll-Oper standen jeweils mehrere Hundert Sitzplätze für Presse und Besucher zur Verfügung.

Die erste Sitzung des Reichstages in der Kroll-Oper fand nach den nur noch bedingt als demokratisch zu charakterisierenden Reichstagswahlen vom 5. März 1933 am späten Nachmittag des 21. März 1933 statt. Einziger Tagesordnungspunkt der konstituierenden Sitzung des ersten nach der Machtübertragung an die Nationalsozialisten gewählten Reichstages war die Wahl des Präsidiums. Entgegen der bisherigen Geschäftsordnung wurde es nicht durch geheime Wahl, sondern durch Zuruf bestimmt. Am Ende der Sitzung sangen die uniformierten Mitglieder der Reichstagfraktion der NSDAP mit erhobenem Arm die erste Strophe des Horst-Wessel-Liedes.

Tag von Potsdam in der Garnisonskirche

Aus Anlaß der Konstituierung des Reichstages hatte Reichspropagandaminister Josef Goebbels am Morgen des 21. März 1933 einen « feierlichen Staatsakt » in der Garnisonskirche von Potsdam inszeniert. An der Veranstaltung nahmen neben Reichskanzler Adolf Hitler Reichspräsident Paul von Hindenburg in seiner Uniform eines kaiserlichen Generalfeldmarschalls, die Abgeordneten des Reichstages ohne Sozialdemokraten und Kommunisten, Vertreter von Reichswehr und SA, Persönlichkeiten aus Wirtschaft und Verwaltung sowie ehemalige Repräsentanten des kaiserlichen Deutschland teil. Mit dem « Tag von Potsdam », dessen öffentliches Erscheinungsbild durch die kaiserlichen schwarzweißroten Farben geprägt war, täuschten die Nationalsozialisten der Öffentlichkeit eine symbolische und politische Verbindung von kaiserlich-monarchischem Deutschland und nationalsozialistischer Bewegung vor.

Das Ende des Parlamentarismus

Schon zwei Tage später, am 23. März 1933, entmachtete sich das neue gewählte Parlament unter massivem Druck in seiner zweiten Sitzung in der Kroll-Oper mit der Verabschiedung des von den Nationalsozialisten und der DNVP initiierten « Gesetz zur Behebung der Not von Volk und Reich », dem so genannten Ermächtigungsgesetz, selbst. Es übertrug gegen die Stimmen der SPD die parlamentarische Legislativbefugnis auf die Reichsregierung und hob die Gewaltenteilung auf. Alle 81 Abgeordnete der KPD und 26 SPD-Abgeordnete konnten an der Abstimmung nicht teilnehmen : Sie befanden sich in « Schutzhaft » oder waren vor drohender Verfolgung geflohen. Die gesamte Szenerie der Sitzung wurde von den Farben und Symbolen der Nationalsozialisten dominiert. Die Absperrung vor der Kroll-Oper hatte die SS übernommen. Im Innern des provisorischen Parlamentsgebäudes sorgten bewaffnete Angehörige der SA für den « Saalschutz ». Im Zuge der Etablierung und Festigung der nationalsozialistischen Diktatur fand am 17. Mai 1933 die dritte und letzte Sitzung des Reichstages als Mehrparteiparlament statt. Kurze Zeit später wurde der Reichstag aufgelöst.

Nach dem Verbot und der Selbstauflösung der demokratischen Parteien im Frühsommer 1933, dem Gesetz gegen die Neubildung von Parteien, der Reichstagsauflösung vom 14. Oktober 1933 und den Reichstagswahlen im November 1933 war der Reichstag nur noch ein aus Nationalsozialisten bestehendes gleichgeschaltetes Scheinparlament. Formal blieb der Reichstag im nationalsozialistischen Einparteienstaat als Verfassungsorgan und Gesetzgeber bis zum Ende der Diktatur bestehen. Er kam allerdings bis 1942 in unregelmäßigen Abständen nur noch zu insgesamt 18 Sitzungen zusammen, die Hitler insbesondere als Forum für Regierungserklärungen benutzte. Die letzte Zusammenkunft des nationalsozialistischen Reichstages fand am 26. April 1942 statt.

Zerstörung und Abriss der Kroll-Oper

Von Herbst 1941 bis November 1943 wurde die Kroll-Oper auch als Ausweichspielstätte für die bei einem der ersten Luftangriffe alliierter Bomber auf Berlin am 10. April 1941 stark zerstörte Lindenoper benutzt. Allerdings wurde die Kroll-Oper selbst bei einem nächtlichen Luftangriff am 22. November 1943 schwer getroffen, so daß eine Weiterführung des Opernbetriebes auch hier nicht mehr möglich war. Weitere Beschädigungen erfolgten im Rahmen der Kampfhandlungen in der « Schlacht um Berlin » im April 1945.

Nach Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges entschied man sich hauptsächlich aus finanziellen Erwägungen gegen den Wiederaufbau des Gebäudes. Noch bis in die 1950er Jahre hinein wurde aber in den Sommermonaten in den wenigen noch vorhandenen Gebäudeteilen der Kroll-Oper ein Gartenrestaurant betrieben. Große Teile des Hauptgebäudes wurden im März 1951 gesprengt und abgetragen. Im Herbst 1957 waren sämtliche Ruinen- und Trümmerreste der Kroll-Oper endgültig beseitigt. Heute erinnert ein Gedenkstein an das Gebäude, in dem 1933 die parlamentarische Demokratie in Deutschland ihr Ende fand.

Die Krolloper (zeitweilig auch Kroll'scher Wintergarten oder Krolls Etablissement) war ein Gebäudekomplex in der Nähe des Brandenburger Tores, am heutigen Berliner Platz der Republik. Im Lauf einer wechselvollen Geschichte diente die Anlage zwischen 1844 und 1951 als Vergnügungsetablisement, Komödienbühne, Textillager, Opernhaus und während der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus als Ersatzherberge des Parlaments für das 1933 einem Brand zum Opfer gefallene Reichstagsgebäude.

Der preußische König Friedrich Wilhelm IV. gab den Anstoß dazu, in seiner Residenz einen neuen Ort vornehmer Geselligkeit zu errichten, nachdem er 1841 bei einem Besuch in Breslau den Kroll'schen Wintergarten kennengelernt hatte. Dem Unternehmer Joseph Kroll überließ man in Berlin kostenlos ein Baugrundstück am Rande des Exerzierplatzes, einer staubigen, bei Regen schlammbedeckten Fläche knapp außerhalb der alten Stadtgrenze. Gefordert wurde allerdings ein persönliches Startkapital von 30.000 Talern, das Kroll sich leihen mußte. Auch mußte er sich verpflichten, bei Misserfolg das Grundstück zurückzugeben und seine neu errichteten Gebäude wieder abzureißen.

Am Neubau war maßgeblich der königliche Baumeister Ludwig Persius beteiligt (ein deutlicher Hinweis darauf, daß das Projekt dem König am Herzen lag) , dazu die ebenfalls prominenten Architekten Carl Ferdinand Langhans und Eduard Knoblauch. Nach nur zehn Monaten Bauzeit konnte das Unternehmen am 15. Februar 1844 mit einem prachtvollen Ball eröffnet werden. Die schloßartige Anlage bestand aus einem zweigeschossigen Mittelteil zwischen niedrigen Gebäudeflügeln sowie einigen Nebengebäuden. Sie bot Platz für 5.000 Gäste, die in zwei Wintergärten, 14 größeren Gesellschaftsräumen und drei großen Sälen, darunter der besonders prunkvoll ausgestattete « Königssaal » , bewirtet und von 60 Musikern unterhalten wurden. Eine technische Besonderheit waren die 400 Flammen der gerade neu eingeführten Gasbeleuchtung.

Das erste Geschäftsjahr konnte durchaus erfolgreich gestaltet werden. In den Straßen Berlins warben großflächige Plakate für aufwändig dekorierte Maskenbälle, Italienische oder Chinesische Nächte, Verlosungen oder Weihnichtsausstellungen. Vorübergehend gastierte auch der Wiener Walzerkönig Johann Strauß bei Kroll - zog sich aber sehr bald wieder zurück, weil, wie er feststellte, seine Musik « dem berlinischen Naturell wenig anhaben konnte ». Trotz aller Anstrengungen stellten sich allmählich wirtschaftliche Schwierigkeiten ein. Joseph Kroll starb 1848 an einem Leberleiden - zuvor bedauerte er, einst dem König begegnet zu sein und sich in Berlin engagiert zu haben.

Lageplan von 1879 ; links außen die Krolloper, rechts die Markierung für den Neubau des Reichstagsgebäudes
Seine älteste Tochter Auguste übernahm den Betrieb, erweiterte ihn und zeigte Attraktionen wie Dompteurnummern mit wilden Tieren und eine große Gewerbeausstellung. Sie beantragte und erhielt eine Konzession für Theateraufführungen, ließ im « Königssaal » ein Podium bauen und dort zunächst Volkstümliches aufführen - Komödien, Lustspiele und Lokalposen. Aber auch einige Opern kamen ins Repertoire, etwa Martha von Friedrich von Flotow und Der Barbier von Sevilla von Rossini - mutige Unternehmungen angesichts der bescheidenen Mittel. Insbesondere protegierte Auguste Kroll einen Komponisten, der trotz mehrfach guter Publikumserfolge ständig am Rande des Existenzminimums lebte : Albert Lortzing. Seine Opern Der Waffenschmied, Undine und Zar und Zimmermann wurden bei Kroll gespielt, die angespannte finanzielle Lage des Unternehmens erlaubte es allerdings nicht, ihm Tantiemen oder Honorare zu zahlen. Im Februar 1851 brannte das Etablissement bis auf die Grundmauern nieder, nachdem Teile der Theaterkulissen beim Anzünden der Beleuchtung Feuer gefangen hatten. Nur der Garten und das Sommertheater blieben verschont. Die Feuerversicherung zahlte 80.000 Taler - und schon ein Jahr später war das Haus wieder aufgebaut, der Baumeister Eduard Titz gestaltete es noch eindrucksvoller als zuvor.

Im Jahr 1853 heiratete Auguste Kroll den ungarischen Musiker Jakob Engel, der bei ihr als Kapellmeister angestellt war. Das musikalische Programm wurde noch anspruchsvoller, neben die leichtgängigen Opern traten Werke wie Rossinis Otello oder Kompositionen von Richard Wagner. An dem seit langem bestehenden Missverhältnis zwischen hohen Betriebskosten und relativ niedrigen Einnahmen änderte sich nichts. Am 1. April 1855 mußte das hoch verschuldete Unternehmen schließen. Mehrere Jahre lang führte einer der Gläubiger den Betrieb, auch er ohne Erfolg. Bei einer Zwangsversteigerung erwarb Jakob Engel 1862 das immer noch verschuldete Unternehmen zurück. Unklar blieb, woher er die erforderlichen 109.000 Taler bekommen hatte. Bei der Programmgestaltung verzichtete er nun auf die kostspieligen Operndarbietungen. Dennoch entstand bald wieder eine kritische Situation. 1869, im Jahr des 25-jährigen Betriebsjubiläums, wurde in Preußen die Gewerbefreiheit eingeführt. Der Konzessionszwang fiel weg, zahlreiche Privatunternehmen entstanden, der Konkurrenzdruck wuchs. Engel wollte verkaufen, aber seine Bemühungen scheiterten an der hohen Hypothekenbelastung. Größere Investitionen verboten sich, weil die Rechtslage des ganzen Areals über viele Jahre hinweg unsicher war. Seit 1864 hieß der Exerzierplatz « Königsplatz » und wurde grundlegend zu einem repräsentativen Stadtplatz umgestaltet. In den 1870er Jahren gab es im Parlament wiederholt langwierige Diskussionen um den Standort des neuen Reichstagsgebäudes, mit der Option, das Kroll'sche Etablissement dafür abzureißen. Eine Entscheidung fiel erst 1876 (der Neubau des Reichstags entstand auf der gegenüberliegenden Seite des Platzes) und Jakob Engel konnte einige seiner Pläne realisieren, zum Beispiel 1885 die alte Gasbeleuchtung durch elektrisches Licht ersetzen - eine Premiere in Berlin. Der Unternehmer starb 1888, sein Sohn versuchte erfolglos, gegen das schwindende Interesse des Berliner Publikums anzugehen. 1894 mußte er aufgeben.

Julius Bötzw, der Besitzer der Bötzw-Brauerei, betrieb das Haus seit 1894 mit mäßigem Erfolg als reinen Gaststättenbetrieb mit einigen wenigen Konzerten. Ein Jahr später verpachtete er es zunächst, 1896 verkaufte er es an die « Königlichen Schauspiele », eine Institution des Preußischen Staates. Damit endete die Zeit als privat geführtes, multifunktionelles Vergnügungsetablisement und es begann die Geschichte der Krolloper als staatlichem Opernhaus. Das Gebäude bekam den Namen « Neues Königliches Operntheater » und wurde bis 1898 für den neuen Zweck umgebaut. Danach diente es als Ausweichbühne für andere staatliche Theater, wenn dort längere Bauarbeiten nötig wurden. Es gab aber auch bemerkenswerte eigene Produktionen mit großen Sängern wie Enrico Caruso und der Musik « moderner » Komponisten wie Igor Strawinski und Gustav Mahler - und Publikumserfolge wie die Serie von 98 Aufführungen der Operette Die Fledermaus von Johann Strauß.

Kaiser Wilhelm II. wünschte sich allerdings an gleicher Stelle ein noch prunkvolleres und größeres Opernhaus mit mindestens 2.500 Plätzen. Seit 1904 wurde das Projekt « Neues Königliches Opernhaus Berlin » erörtert. Zunächst war beabsichtigt, die historische Staatsoper Unter den Linden dafür abzureißen. 1909 wurden die Pläne konkreter, nun wurde der Standort der Krolloper für den Neubau in Aussicht genommen. Der Berliner Stadtbaurat und Architekt Ludwig Hoffmann legte Ende 1913 Entwürfe vor, das Preußische Abgeordnetenhaus bewilligte die notwendigen Geldmittel. Im Sommer 1914 begannen Abrissarbeiten an der Krolloper, sie wurden aber bei Kriegsbeginn am 1. August 1914 sofort wieder eingestellt. Während des Ersten Weltkriegs wurden die Räume, soweit sie noch brauchbar waren, mit Wolle und Lumpen gefüllt, dem Material der Zentralsammelstelle der Reichswollwoche. Den Sommergarten nutzte man in der warmen Jahreszeit als Nachmittagsheim für verwundete Krieger.

Unmittelbar nach Kriegsende wurde Ludwig Hoffmann vom Kultusministerium aufgefordert, das begonnene Großprojekt weiterzuführen, nun sollte ein « Volksopernhaus » entstehen. Dieser Plan scheiterte - es kam ein neuer Minister und es fehlte an Geld. 1920 pachtete der Verein der Berliner Volksbühne Grundstück und Opernhaus vom Preußischen Staat und verpflichtete sich zum Wiederaufbau des stark renovierungsbedürftigen Gebäudes. Die Fassadengestaltung folgte einem früheren Entwurf Hoffmanns. Der Große Saal für annähernd 2.500 Zuschauer wurde von dem Theaterarchitekten Oskar Kaufmann in einem Stil hergerichtet, den Zeitgenossen als « expressionistisches Rokoko » kritisierten. Gleichzeitig entstanden im Garten neue Terrassen und eine Freilichtbühne, dazu konzipierte Kaufmann auftragsgemäß einen Festsaal für 5.000 Personen. Das Projekt überstieg schließlich die finanziellen Möglichkeiten der Volksbühne. Der Staat mußte die Kosten der Fertigstellung und das Opernhaus selbst übernehmen. Die Volksbühne verpflichtete sich, die Hälfte der Karten für jede Vorstellung abzunehmen. Als zweite Spielstätte der Staatsoper Unter den Linden und unter dem Namen « Oper am Königsplatz » wurde das Haus am 1. Januar 1924 mit den Meistersingern von Richard Wagner wieder eröffnet, Erich Kleiber dirigierte. Nachdem 1926 der Königsplatz umbenannt worden war, hieß das Opernhaus offiziell « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik ». Die Berliner nannten es wie bisher « Krolloper » .

Die Zusammenarbeit der beiden Häuser erwies sich als nicht praktikabel, Sänger und Musiker waren überfordert. Die Zusammenlegung wurde rückgängig gemacht, zum Direktor und musikalischen Leiter der ehemaligen Krolloper berief man den Dirigenten Otto Klemperer. Mit dieser Entscheidung begann der künstlerisch bedeutendste Abschnitt in der Geschichte des Hauses. Eröffnet wurde am 19. November 1927 mit einer modernen Inszenierung der Oper Fidelio von Ludwig van Beethoven. Klemperers erklärtes Ziel war die Erneuerung der Oper als Kunstgattung. In knapp vier Jahren wurden 44 Werke präsentiert, darunter Uraufführungen mit Arbeiten von Arnold Schönberg (Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene, 1930) , Ernst Krěenek, Paul Hindemith (Neues vom Tage, 1929) , Igor Strawinsky und Leoš Janáček. Als Dirigenten wirkten am Haus Otto Klemperer, Alexander von Zemlinsky und Fritz Zweig ; als Regisseure Jürgen Fehling, Ernst Legal, Gustaf Gründgens und Hans Curjel (geboren 1896 in Karlsruhe ; gestorben 1974 in Zürich) ; als Bühnenbildner Ewald Dülberg (1888-1933) , Caspar Neher, Laszlo Moholy-Nagy, Teo Otto, Oskar Schlemmer und Giorgio de Chirico.

Das Opernensemble unter Klemperer lieferte aus heutiger Sicht bahnbrechende Aufführungen. Aus der Einheit von Werk und Inszenierung, von Musik und Theater erwuchs ein modernes Opernmodell, auf das man nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg zurückgreifen konnte - wie es beispielsweise Walter Felsenstein in der Komischen Oper Berlin tat. In der aktuellen Situation der Weimarer Republik um 1930 waren die Reaktionen äußerst uneinheitlich. Der aufgeschlossene Teil des Bildungsbürgertums applaudierte. Das Publikum der Volksbühne, die ja 50 Prozent der Karten zu verteilen hatte, war zumeist befremdet - man erwartete konventionell / kulinarische Aufführungen und sah sich mit modernster Opernästhetik konfrontiert. Rechte Parteien beantragten, den Kulturbolschewismus der Oper zu beenden. Für die Schließung, die auch Heinz Tietjen als Generalintendant aller preußischen Staatstheater befürwortete, führte der Preußische Landtag dann ökonomische Gründe an : In Zeiten wirtschaftlicher Krisen könne sich Berlin drei Opernhäuser nicht leisten. Die letzte Vorstellung in der Krolloper fand am 3. Juli 1931 statt - Die Hochzeit des Figaro von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Otto Klemperer kommentierte später :

« Ich tat alles nur menschenmöglichste, um die Schließung der Krolloper zu verhindern. Denn ich hing an dieser wie an einem Lebensplan. Ich ließ mich so weit hinreißen, daß ich einen Prozess anstrebte gegen die preußische Regierung. Es kam zu keiner Vereinbarung und ich verlor den Prozess. »

Das Parlament zur Zeit des Nationalsozialismus (1933-1942)

Adolf Hitler vor dem Reichstag in der Kroll-Oper zum Abschluß des Feldzugs gegen Polen, 6. Oktober 1939
Nahezu zwei Jahre lang blieb das Opernhaus ungenutzt. Am 30. Januar 1933 wurde Adolf Hitler zum Reichskanzler ernannt. Am 19. Februar 1933 fand hier die Kundgebung « Das Freie Wort » statt, mit der über 900 vernunftdemokratisch beziehungsweise antinationalsozialistisch eingestellte Geistesgrößen gegen die Nazis protestierten. In der Nacht zum 28. Februar 1933 brannte das Reichstagsgebäude - Anlaß für die Nationalsozialisten, die politische Opposition, zuerst vor allem die KPD, rigoros zu unterdrücken. In der Reichstagswahl vom 5. März konnten die NSDAP und die mit ihr koalierende DNVP gemeinsam die absolute Mehrheit der Sitze erringen. Nach Vorschrift der Weimarer Verfassung mußte das Parlament innerhalb von 30 Tagen nach dem Wahltermin zusammentreten. Weil der Plenarsaal des Reichstagsgebäudes nicht benutzbar war (er wurde während der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus demonstrativ nicht wieder instand gesetzt) wählte man die Krolloper als Tagungsstätte. Am 7. März 1933 begannen die notwendigen Umbauarbeiten. Die Decke des Zuschauerraumes wurde abgesenkt und mit Stoff verkleidet, um die als unpassend heiter empfundenen Deckengemälde verschwinden zu lassen. Im Parkett installierte man 647 Sitze, weit mehr, als zu diesem Zeitpunkt nötig gewesen wären ; denn elf SPD-Abgeordnete befanden sich in « Schutzhaft » , die 81 Mandate der KPD waren bereits annulliert worden. Reichsinnenminister Wilhelm Frick kommentierte dies so :

« Wenn der neue Reichstag zusammentritt, werden die Kommunisten durch dringendere und nützlichere Arbeiten verhindert sein, an der Sitzung teilzunehmen. Diese Herrschaften müssen wieder an nutzbringende Arbeit gewöhnt werden. Dazu werden wir ihnen in Konzentrationslagern Gelegenheit geben. »

In der Folge benutzten die Nationalsozialisten die Reichstagssitzungen in der Krolloper, um in einer Reihe von Beschlüssen den Weg in die Einparteien-Diktatur und in den Krieg formal legitimieren zu lassen. Am 23. März 1933 verabschiedete das Parlament gegen die Stimmen der SPD, aber mit Unterstützung der bürgerlichen Parteien das « Gesetz zur Behebung der Not von Volk und Reich », das sogenannte « Ermächtigungsgesetz », und beendete damit die Periode der Demokratie im Deutschen Reich. Danach konnte die Regierung Gesetze erlassen, ohne die Zustimmung des Parlaments und die Unterschrift des Reichspräsidenten einzuholen. Die Proteste der SPD beantwortete Hitler mit Hohn :

« Sie reden von Verfolgungen - Sie sind wehleidig, meine Herren und nicht für diese heutige Zeit bestimmt, wenn Sie jetzt schon von Verfolgungen sprechen. »

Schon bei der Sitzung am 12. Dezember 1933 bestand der Reichstag nur noch aus Abgeordneten der NSDAP.

Die wenigen Reichstagssitzungen der folgenden Jahre dienten Hitler als Bühne, um die Ermordung der parteiinternen Opposition nach dem « Röhm-Putsch » zu rechtfertigen, Ansprüche auf die ehemaligen deutschen Kolonien anzumelden, den « Anschluß » Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich zu feiern und den westlichen Demokratien mit Krieg zu drohen. Das Ermächtigungsgesetz ließ er mehrfach verlängern.

Die erste Fernsehübertragung in Deutschland wurde der Öffentlichkeit am 18. April 1934 in der Berliner Krolloper vorgestellt (Fernsehsender Paul Nipkow) .

Am 1. September 1939 verkündete er den Überfall auf Polen, der den Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs bedeutete. Bei der Kriegserklärung Deutschlands an die Vereinigten Staaten am 11. Dezember 1941 erklärte Hitler vor dem Reichstag in der Krolloper den amerikanischen Präsidenten Franklin D. Roosevelt für geisteskrank. Die letzte Sitzung des Reichstags am 26. April 1942 benutzte Hitler, um die militärische Niederlage vor Moskau zum Triumph umzudeuten und sich zum « Obersten Gerichtsherrn aller Deutschen » erklären zu lassen.

Das Ende (1942-1957)

In einem kurzen Intermezzo wurde das Gebäude nochmals als Opernhaus genutzt : Das Ensemble der Staatsoper Unter den Linden spielte hier parallel zu den letzten beiden Reichstagssitzungen, nachdem das eigene Haus bei Luftangriffen der Alliierten schwere Schäden erlitten hatte. Im November 1943 wurde auch die Krolloper bei Angriffen der Royal Air Force stark beschädigt. Die Schlacht um Berlin und die Erstürmung des Reichstagsgebäudes durch die Rote Armee am 30. April 1945 verursachten weitere Zerstörungen. Aber schon am 23. Mai 1945, nur 15 Tage nach Kriegsende, begannen Aufräumarbeiten, um das Gartenlokal wieder nutzbar zu machen. In den Sommermonaten fanden im Kroll-Garten Konzert- und Tanzveranstaltungen statt. Nach einer wirtschaftlich unbefriedigenden Saison 1956 gab der letzte Pächter den Betrieb auf. Schon 1951 waren Teile der Hauptgebäude gesprengt und abgetragen worden. Am 4. Mai 1957 beantragte das Grundstücksamt Berlin-Tiergarten die « öffentliche Abräumung » der Gebäudereste. Im Herbst 1957 waren die letzten Spuren beseitigt.

Am ehemaligen Standort, auf einer Rasenfläche in der Nähe des neuen Bundeskanzleramtes, erinnert seit August 2007 eine ausführlich deutsch-englisch beschriftete Informations- und Gedenktafel an die Krolloper und ihre Geschichte.

Höhen und Tiefen : Die Kroll-Oper

Die Geschichte der Berliner Opernhäuser (Teil 7) · Von Susanne Geißler

Der Weg vom Vergnügungsetablisement zur avantgardistischen Opernbühne war verschlungen, pleitentüchtig und skandalumwittert. Die Bezeichnungen der Spielstätte wechselten häufig : Krolls Wintergarten, Krolls Etablissement, Krolls Garten, Neues Königliches Operntheater, Neue Oper am Königsplatz, Staatsoper am Platz der Republik, Kroll-Oper, Kroll-Garten. Für die Berliner, die behördlichen Namensgebungen selten Respekt bezeugen, hieß das Unternehmen einfach Kroll.

Im September 1841 weilte Seine Majestät Friedrich Wilhelm IV. in Breslau und dinierte im « Wintergarten » . Dieser behagte ihm derart, daß er dem Eigner Joseph Kroll den Antrag machte, nach Berlin zu kommen und dort ein noch größeres Etablissement zu besten Konditionen zu errichten. Kroll erwies sich als risikofreudiger Geschäftsmann, der die Chance seines Lebens zu nutzen gedachte. Unter dem besonderen Schutz des Hohenzollern (Überlassung eines kostenlosen Baugeländes) pumpte sich Kroll die als Startkapital geforderten 30.000 Thaler zusammen und begab sich nach Berlin. Den zugewiesenen Bauplatz wird er mit gemischten Gefühlen betrachtet haben. Er befand sich an einem riesigen Exerzierplatz vor den Toren der Stadt am Rande des Tiergartens. Nichts war da als Unkraut und Sand, in dem man knöcheltief versank. Jenseits des stadtbegrenzenden « Brandenburger Tores » hatte sich am Ufer der Spree das Restaurations- und Vergnügungsgeschäft ausgebreitet, denn Natur kann der Berliner nur bei Musik und Bier genießen. Aus überdachten Erfrischungsständen, den « Zelten » , entwickelte sich ein Quartier von Ausflugslokalitäten, das, obwohl es bald aus immer größeren massiven Gebäuden bestand, beharrlich weiterhin « in den Zelten » genannt wurde.

Viele Attraktionen

Mit den Vorentwürfen für den gewünschten Vergnügungstempel betraute Friedrich Wilhelm IV. seine Hofbaumeister Friedrich Persius und Carl Ferdinand Langhans. Auf allerhöchste Anordnung machte sich 1845-1846 der große Landschafts- und Gartengestalter Peter Joseph Lenné daran, den Exerzierplatz zu einem Paradeplatz umzugestalten. Später, als sich Preußen zum Kaiserreich gekriegt und gesiegt hatte, erhielt der Platz eine Siegessäule und den Namen Königsplatz. Die konkrete Bauausführung für Krolls Etablissement lag in den Händen des begabten Architekten Eduard Knoblauch, dem Erbauer der Synagoge in der Oranienburger Straße. In der erstaunlich kurzen Bauzeit von zehn Monaten entstand ein monumentaler Bau in Form der märkischen Biedermeier-Renaissance. Mit einem prachtvollen Ball eröffnete Kroll das Haus am 15. Februar 1844. 5.000 Damen und Herren fanden in drei Sälen ausreichend Platz. Kroll verstand es, mit immer neuen Attraktionen das Interesse des Publikums wach zu halten. In vielen Straßen Berlins warben große Plakate für den Besuch der italienischen oder chinesischen Nächte, der Verlosungen, der phantastisch arrangierten Maskenbälle, Weihnachtsausstellungen oder dergleichen. Er holte sogar den Wiener Walzerkönig Johann Strauß nach Berlin. Strauß befand allerdings, daß die Verführungskünste seiner Tänze « dem berlinischen Naturell wenig anhaben konnten » und zog sich rasch und endgültig mit seiner Kapelle in die Heimatstadt zurück. Als Joseph Kroll kurz nach der März-Revolution 1848 an einem Leberleiden starb, übernahm die älteste seiner vier Töchter die Leitung des Hauses und erwirkte von dem berüchtigten Polizeipräsidenten Hinckeldey die Konzession für Theateraufführungen.

Albert Lortzing

Auguste Kroll ließ im Königssaal ein Podium errichten, spielte sich an einigen Volksstücken warm, um sich dann der Oper zuzuwenden. Zu groß war der Reiz, sich dieser Gattung zu widmen, die sich noch eine Generation zuvor der Hof vorbehalten hatte. Der aus Erfurt zugereiste Theaterdirektor Böttner übernahm das musikalische Regime und schreckte neben den unverzichtbaren Komödien, Lustspielen und Lokalpossen auch nicht vor der großen Oper zurück. In der ersten Saison 1850 wurden zum Beispiel « Martha » von Friedrich von Flotow, « Die Regimentstochter » von Donizetti, « Die weiße Dame » von Boieldieu und der « Barbier von Sevilla » von Rossini aufgeführt. In Anbetracht eines Orchesters von lediglich 36 Mann Stärke darf man das als ein ausgesprochen mutiges Unternehmen bezeichnen. Kurz vor dessen frühem Tod wurde Auguste Kroll zum Schutzengel für einen Komponisten, der zeitlebens als Prophet im eigenen Land nichts oder nur wenig galt : Albert Lortzing. Von Theater zu Theater wandernd, materiell immer am Rand des Existenzminimums, war er bei allen Erfolgen, die seine Opern hatten, ein armer Schlucker geblieben. Auguste verpflichtete ihn, und so studierte er hier vor den Toren der Stadt seinen « Waffenschmied » ein und dirigierte ihn selbst. Auch seine « Undine » erlebte hier ihre Berliner Premiere. Am 12. Oktober 1850 hatte Lortzing die Gelegenheit, die Böttner'sche Einstudierung seines « Zar und Zimmermann » zu sehen. Zu Königs Geburtstag wurde diese Oper angelegentlich eines Festaktes wiederholt.

Die Kroll'sche Unterstützungsaktion war eher ideeller als finanzieller Natur. Außer Ruhm erntete der Komponist von diesen Aufführungen so gut wie nichts. Tantiemen und Honorare wurden nicht gezahlt. Bei der angespannten wirtschaftlichen Lage der Kroll'schen Bühne wäre das auch schwer gefallen. Lortzing starb am 21. Januar 1851 in völliger Armut. Sein Lebensleid fasste der Komponist in einem Brief aus seinen letzten Berliner Jahren zusammen :

« So gestehe ich Dir, was ich noch keinem gestand, daß ich durch die letzten verhängnisvollen Jahre verarmt bin, daß Deutschland darob erröten könnte, wenn es anders Scham im Leibe hätte. Die Herren Intendanten, Direktoren, Oberregisseure und andere, wenn sie nicht gleich Erfolge, wie die des " Freischützen ", auch eines " Zar und Zimmermann " wittern, lassen den deutschen Komponisten im Stich. Wie wurde und wird gleich nach französischen Opern geangelt. Oh, entstünde doch nur einmal eine Revolution beim Theater. »

Brand und Wiederaufbau

Wenige Tage nach Lortzings Tod traf das Kroll'sche Etablissement ein schwerer Schlag : Es brannte bis auf die

Grundmauern ab. Nur der Garten und das Sommertheater überstanden den Brand. Mit 80.000 Thalern Entschädigung aus der Feuerversicherung machte sich die resolute Auguste unverzüglich an den Wiederaufbau. Ein junger ungarischer Violinist und Dirigent auf der Durchreise von Wien nach Petersburg, Jakob Engel, machte in Berlin einen Zwischenaufenthalt und wurde Krolls neuer Kapellmeister. Auguste verliebte sich und nach kurzer Verlobungszeit heirateten die beiden. Der Kroll-Engel, wie er bald genannt wurde, setzte an zum musikalischen Höhenflug. Neben den bewährten Opern von Lortzing, Auber und Donizetti versuchte er mit Rossinis « Othello » die Opera seria bei Kroll einzubürgern und wagte sich auch an die Kompositionen Richard Wagners heran. Bei den Sommerkonzerten brachten Engels Musiker Ouvertüren und Märsche aus « Tannhäuser » und « Lohengrin » zu Gehör.

Doch so sehr sich Engel auch ins Zeug legte, Früchte trugen seine Bemühungen nicht. Die geschäftliche Konstruktion des gesamten Unternehmens war nicht tragfähig genug für einen Opernbetrieb. 1855 wurde das Haus wegen wirtschaftlicher Schwierigkeiten erst geschlossen, dann an den Hauptgläubiger verkauft. Auch der neue Besitzer geriet in den finanziellen Ruin und mußte das Unternehmen 1862 zwangsversteigern lassen. Das auf runde 280.000 Thaler taxierte Objekt ging an den Meistbietenden. Und dieser Meistbietende (keiner wusste genau, wer hinter ihm stand und wie er das Geld zusammengebracht hatte) war zur allgemeinen Überraschung Jakob Engel, der für 109.000 Thaler den Zuschlag erhielt.

Ende der Dynastie

Nach sieben Jahren Interregnum war das Unternehmen wieder in der Hand der Dynastie Kroll / Engel. Von aufwändigen Operninszenierungen ließ Engel (aus Schaden klug geworden) fürderhin die Finger. Berühmt wurde das Haus durch seine Weihnachtsausstellungen, Promenadenkonzerte und Bälle. Dennoch plagten Jakob Engel wirtschaftliche Sorgen. Seit der Einführung der Gewerbefreiheit 1869 fiel der Konzessionszwang weg und die Privatunternehmen schossen wie Pilze aus dem Boden. Kroll verlor seine Exklusivität. So wurde das 25-jährige Jubiläum in einer bedrückenden ökonomischen Lage begangen, die für das Unternehmen seit seiner Gründung nun schon charakteristisch war. Als Engel 1888 starb, übernahm sein Sohn die Leitung, verlor aber bald die Lust. Die 50-Jahr-Feier stand bereits unter dem Stern laufender Verkaufsverhandlungen mit dem Brauereibesitzer Julius Bötzw. Kroll-Junior siedelte mit seiner Mutter nach New York über, wo Auguste Kroll 1907 das Zeitliche segnete. Nach 50 Jahren war die Dynastie Kroll in ihrem Stammhaus erloschen.

Renovierungsbedarf

Was macht man mit einem Haus, das eigentlich zu groß ist, das andererseits niemand missen will ? Brauer Bötzw nutzte es als Restaurationsbetrieb mit gelegentlichen Konzertveranstaltungen. Er hatte sich aber verschätzt, was die Einnahmen aus dieser Art der Bewirtschaftung betraf. 1895 schloß er mit den Königlichen Schauspielen einen Pachtvertrag ab, und so fanden denn ab August bei Kroll wieder Operaufführungen statt. Intendant Graf Bolko von Hochberg veranlasste schließlich, daß Bötzw im April des folgenden Jahres das gesamte Etablissement für zweieinhalb Millionen Mark dem preußischen Fiskus überließ. Hochberg hatte damit endlich eine zweite Spielstätte für die mit ihren 1.500 Plätzen allmählich eng werdende Lindenoper. Er benannte Kroll in « Neues Königliches Opernhaus » um und nutzte es während der dringend erforderlichen Umbauten im Schauspielhaus und an der Lindenoper 1904-1905 als Interimsbühne. Die auf Verschleiß spekulierende Übernutzung brachte das Kroll-Gebäude selbst in den Zustand dringlicher Renovierungsbedürftigkeit. Denn nicht nur die Theatervorstellungen nagten an der Substanz, sondern vor allem die legendären Bälle bei Kroll.

Mit einer Renovierung wollte man sich jedoch nicht lange aufhalten. Ab 1909 gab es eine Planung für ein neues Kaiserliches Opernhaus. Das Arbeitsministerium trat an den Berliner Stadtbaurat Ludwig Hoffmann heran, der Ende 1913 erste Pläne erstellte. Das Preußische Abgeordnetenhaus bewilligte die erste Rate der benötigten Gelder und unmittelbar darauf begannen die Abrissarbeiten, die der wenige Wochen später ausbrechende Erste Weltkrieg unterbrach. Seit 1915 lagerte die « Zentralsammelstelle der Reichswollwochen » im gesamten Kroll'schen Gebäudekomplex Wolle und Lumpen ein.

Die Volksbühne

Unmittelbar nach dem Krieg nahm der neue preußische Kultusminister Adolph Hoffmann Verbindungen zu Musikern, Theaterleuten und Architekten auf, um die Kroll-Ruine zu einem « Volksopernhaus » mit 3.000 Plätzen auszubauen. Ehe man sich über das Projekt einig werden konnte, gab es einen neuen Kultusminister in Preußen und vor allem kein Geld mehr für den Neubau. Bis zum Juli 1920 geschah nun gar nichts mehr. Etwa zur gleichen Zeit hatte sich die Volksbühne, die mit dem 1914-1915 fertig gestellten « Theater am Bülowplatz » (heute Rosa-Luxemburg-Platz) über ein großes Schauspielhaus verfügte, von dem Gedanken verabschiedet, zusätzlich noch eine Volksoper zu bauen. Stattdessen schloß sie mit dem Preußischen Staat einen Pachtvertrag über 25 Jahre für das Kroll-Grundstück ab. Als Gegenleistung für den sehr geringen Pachtzins verpflichtete sie sich zum beschleunigten Wiederaufbau der Ruine. Mit der Durchführung wurde der Architekt Oskar Kaufmann betraut, der ein erfahrener Theaterarchitekt war. Kaufmann vergrößerte nicht nur den Zuschauerraum und das Bühnenhaus zu Deutschlands größtem Operntheater, er legte auch im südlichen anschließenden Gartenteil zwei Terrassen und eine Freilichtbühne neu an und konzipierte einen ovalen Festsaal, der auftragsgemäß 5.000 Personen fassen sollte. Das Projekt war so groß dimensioniert, daß der Volksbühne bald die finanzielle Puste ausging. Die Inflation tat ihr Übriges. Wieder einmal war Kroll in eine finanzielle Kalamität hineinmanövriert.

Ort der Neuen Musik

Der sozialdemokratische Ministerpräsident Braun sprang seinen Volksbühnengenossen zur Seite. Der Preußische Staat übernahm die Kosten zur Fertigstellung und schließlich das gesamte Opernhaus, während die Volksbühne für 25 Jahre die Hälfte der Karten für jede Vorstellung abzunehmen hatte. Diese konnte sie an ihre Mitglieder zu stark verringerten Preisen weitergeben. Am 1. Januar 1924 wurde die « Oper am Königsplatz » mit den « Meistersingern von Nürnberg » unter Erich Kleiber eröffnet. Doch die Staatsoper wurde nicht glücklich mit ihrer zweiten Spielstätte. Kroll blieb zweite Wahl, solange sie von der Lindenoper aus regiert wurde. Das Solistenpersonal wie auch die Staatskapelle waren durch den doppelten Spielbetrieb überfordert. So trennte man denn, was nicht zusammenwachsen konnte und wollte. Otto Klemperer wurde zum Direktor und musikalischen Leiter der « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » berufen, die am 19. November 1927 mit Beethovens « Fidelio » eröffnet wurde. Unter Klemperers Leitung wurde das Haus Berlins Vorzeigeobjekt für fortschrittliches, in die Zukunft weisendes Kunst- und Musikverständnis. In ihrer nur vierjährigen Arbeitsphase erhielt die Stadt endlich ein alle Konventionen aufbrechendes progressives Musiktheater. Zeitgenössische Komponisten wie Igor Strawinsky, Paul Hindemith, Ernst Křenek, Maurice Ravel, Darius Milhaud, Jaques Ibert, Arnold Schönberg, Kurt Weill, Leos Janáček fanden hier ihre Plattform in kompetenter musikalischer Interpretation durch Otto Klemperer, Alexander von Zemlinsky und Fritz Zweig, um nur einige zu nennen. Adäquat waren die Inszenierungen von Jürgen Fehling und Gustav Gründgens und die Bühnenbilder von Teo Otto, Ewald Dülberg, Caspar Neher, den Bauhauskünstlern Oskar Schlemmer und László Moholy-Nagy oder dem italienischen Maler Giorgio de Chirico.

Schmachvolles Ende

Von Anfang an waren die Reaktionen auf diese revolutionären Operaufführungen zwiespältig. Begeisterung auf Seiten des modernen Bildungsbürgertums, eindeutige Ablehnung auf Seiten der Konservativen. Nach einer Spielzeit trat Klemperer als Operndirektor zurück, ihm folgte Ernst Legal (der nach 1945 noch sieben Spielzeiten der Staatsoper Unter den Linden vorstand). Auch ihm war ein Durchbruch zur einhelligen Publikumsgunst nicht beschieden. Die Volksbühnenmitglieder, die ja 50 Prozent der Karten besaßen, konnten die moderne Opernästhetik nicht verkraften. Suchten sie doch gerade den kulinarischen Genuss der konventionellen Operaufführungen. Dieses Bedürfnis wurde von der Leitung der Kroll-Oper schlicht ignoriert, was sich in schwindenden Besucherzahlen manifestierte.

Die Neubesetzung des Kultusministeriums durch den Sozialdemokraten Adolf Grimme, den der Klemperer-Biograph Peter Heyworth einen « anständigen, aber unprofilieren Schulmeister ohne besonderen Sinn für Musik und bildende Künste » nennt, bedeutete das Ende für die Kroll-Oper. Er schlug vor, durch die Schließung des Hauses andere finanziell schwach gestellte preußische Staatstheater zu unterstützen. Das Finanzministerium, von Anfang an voll Reserviertheit gegen das Kroll-Experiment, stimmte erwartungsgemäß zu. Zwar beteiligten sich führende Theaterleute und namhafte Intellektuelle an einer Kampagne « Rettet die Kroll-Oper », jedoch vergeblich. Am 25. März 1931 beschloß eine Regierungsmehrheit aus Zentrum und Rechtsparteien unter Stimmenthaltung der SPD und gegen die Stimmen der Kommunisten die Schließung des Hauses.

Das Ende war schmachvoll. Nach dem Reichstagsbrand vom 27. Februar 1933 wurde am 5. März in Deutschland ein neuer Reichstag gewählt. Noch hielt man sich an die Weimarer Verfassung, die besagte, daß die gewählten Parlamentarier innerhalb von 30 Tagen zur konstituierenden Sitzung zusammen zu treten hatten. Raum suchend verfiel man auf die seit dem Sommer 1931 ungenutzt herumstehende Kroll-Oper als Versammlungsort. Der Zuschauerraum wurde in kürzester Zeit so umgebaut, daß 647 Abgeordnete bequem Platz finden konnten. Eigentlich waren nur knapp 560 Sitze nötig, denn die 81 KPD-Mandate waren schon kassiert, ein Dutzend SPD-Abgeordnete in « Schutzhaft » genommen worden. Der Reichstagspräsident Hermann Göring wurde am 21. März per Zuruf « gewählt ». Nur zwei Tage später peitschte Hitler hier sein « Ermächtigungsgesetz » durch, das die Weimarer Verfassung in wesentlichen Punkten aufhob.

Schutt und Asche

Als die Lindenoper im April 1941 zerstört wurde, erwachte bei Kroll noch einmal das musikalische Leben. Die britische Luftoffensive gegen Berlin machte der erneuten Wiedergeburt am 22. November desselben Jahres ein Ende. Kroll versank in Schutt und Asche. Nach dem Krieg bewirtschaftete man für einige Jahre noch das Gartenrestaurant. 1957 wurde auch das geschlossen und der letzte Ruinenrest abgeräumt. Im Zusammenhang mit der Internationalen Bauausstellung INTERBAU diente der Platz als Parkgelände für die neu erbaute Kongresshalle.

Die Krolloper, Sitz des Reichstages 1933 bis 1945

1. September 1939 : Adolf Hitler verkündet in der Krolloper den Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs.

Viele Gäste der Stadt Berlin staunen über die großzügigen Grünflächen in der Mitte Berlins. Das viele Grün hat zumindest zwei Gründe. Zum einen liegen (historisch von Alt-Berlin aus betrachtete) die Grünflächen meistens am Stadtrand, zum anderen haben die Stadtverwalter nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg viel Geschichte unter den grünen Rasen gekehrt.

Letzteres trifft auf die Krolloper zu, die als wichtiger geschichtlicher Ort am 31. August 2007 in das Stadtbild zurückkehrte. Peer Steinbrück, Bundesfinanzminister für Finanzen, und Doktor Hans J. Reichardt, Historiker und Autor der Geschichte der Krolloper, enthüllten an diesem Tage eine neue Berliner Gedenktafel. Dietmar Arnold vom Verein Berliner Unterwelten eingetragener Verein beschreibt im Text die wechselvolle Geschichte des Hauses.

Im Tunnel durfte geraucht werden

Das Haus stand einst auf dem Königsplatz, an der dem Reichstag gegenüberliegenden Großen Querallee zwischen Paul-Löbe-Allee und John-Foster-Dulles-Allee am Rande des Tiergartens. Josef Kroll, 1797 in Breslau geboren, errichtete 1843 das größte Berliner Vergnügungslokal - vor dem Brandenburger Tor. Krolls Etablissement bot dem gebildeten Publikum in Sälen, Logen und Zimmern Konzerte, Bälle und Schaustellungen. Im Tunnel durfte geraucht werden (nicht aber etwa auf der Straße) .

Auguste Kroll, Tochter des Gründers, bewarb sich um eine Theaterkonzession, die sie auch erhielt. Feuer vernichtete das von Ludwig Persius, Carl Ferdinand Langhans und Eduard Knoblauch erbaute Gebäude. Das Haus erstand als Theater neu und ging als Krolloper in die Berliner Geschichte ein.

In den turbulenten Jahren zwischen dem Ersten und Zweiten Weltkrieg wirkten hier Otto Klemperer, Erich Kleiber, Gustav Gründgens. Im Zuge radikaler Einsparungen mußte die Krolloper 1931 schließen. Das Haus blieb leer.

Der Reichstagsbrand

Dann brannte der Reichstag. Es war am 27. Februar 1933. Die in einiger Entfernung davon gegenüberliegende Krolloper stieg zum « Reichstagsgebäude » auf - als provisorischer Sitz. Am 23. März 1933 stimmte die Mehrheit der anwesenden Reichstagsabgeordneten dem « Ermächtigungsgesetz » zu, mit die nationalsozialistische Diktatur das Ende der Demokratie im Deutschen Reich herbeiführte. Nur die SPD hatte gegen das Gesetz gestimmt. Die KPD mußte tatenlos zusehen. Ihre Mitglieder waren längst nicht mehr im Reichstag vertreten, sondern auf der Flucht, im Untergrund, verhaftet.

Die Informationstafel zitiert den Zeitzeugen Josef Felder, der vom 23. März 1933 berichtet. Den Vorschlag, dem Reichspräsidenten Hermann Göring eine scharfe Note zu übermitteln und dann abzureisen, lehnten die SPD-Abgeordneten empört ab.

Im Zweiten Weltkrieg beschädigten Bombentreffer die Krolloper. Die Ruine verschwand bis 1957 unter dem Grün des Tiergartens.

Gedenken an ein merkwürdiges Gebäude

Die SPD Bellevue (Berlin-Mitte) und die Gedenktafelkommission der Bezirksverordnetenversammlung Mitte initiierten die Tafel, unterstützt vom Bundesminister für Finanzen Peer Steinbrück, der die Gedenktafel finanzierte, und dem Verein Berliner Unterwelten eingetragener Verein, der sie gestaltete.

Am 1. September 1939 verkündete Adolf Hitler in der Krolloper den Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs. Am Tag vor dem 68. Jahrestag dieses Ereignisses ist ein weiterer verdrängter Ort deutscher Geschichte wieder sichtbar geworden.

L'interdit placé sur « Parsifal » par les Nazis

According to the controversial biography of Wagner by Robert W. Gutman, « “ Parsifal ” , more than the “ Ring ” , was the gospel of National-Socialism » . Gutman interpreted this work in terms of Wagner's later writings, the so-called regeneration essays. He writes :

« Surveying the world from the heights of Monsalvat, the Grail community in “ Parsifal ” was alarmed to observe natural selection working against its distinctive Aryanism. The knights were confronted with an enemy gaining upon them every day. Here was the decisive racial crisis that grew into an uncompromising struggle for power. “ Parsifal ” is an enactment of the Aryan's plight, struggle and hope for redemption. »

Gutman probably found the clue to this analysis in the writings of Theodor W. Adorno, who also saw in « Parsifal » a Master race agenda. As members of « The Bayreuth Circle » had done in the 1880's and 1890's, Adorno saw the work in the context set by Wagner's regeneration essays, as published in the « Bayreuther Blätter » . Gutman might also have been influenced by the claim that Adolf Hitler took a very narrow view of the work in terms of blood, regeneration and selective compassion (see Rauschning's « Conversations with Adolf Hitler » , or « Gespräche mit Hitler » , 1939, while keeping in mind that modern historians, such as Hitler's biographer Ian Kershaw, regard this book as unreliable) .

The 1st problem with Gutman's interpretation that has been pointed-out in the wake of his book, and in the venomous debate surrounding the subsequent articles by Hartmut Zelinsky and books by his followers such as Marc Weiner, is the lengthy gestation of the work. The story of « Parsifal » was worked-out in detail already in the « Prose Draft » of 1865. This was 13 years before the appearance of the 1st of the so-called « regeneration » articles (« Religion and Art ») . Although we can speculate that some of Wagner's ideas about regeneration and blood had begun to form before 1865, these speculations cannot be proven ; although there is a clear development in Wagner's thought from an emphasis on redemption, as evidenced in his earlier Operas and associated prose writings, to an emphasis on regeneration in the articles that he wrote during his last years, which « The Bayreuth Circle » related (in various ways) to his last Opera. It is hard to find any specific evidence of ideas about regeneration, rather than redemption, in the « Prose Draft » , and it is unlikely that anyone could have predicted the regeneration essays, or indeed anything that Wagner would be writing in the late- 1870's, on the basis of what he wrote in the 1860's. Consistency was not one of Wagner's characteristics and his views on many subjects changed, and some of his attitudes softened, during his last decades.

Unlike « The Bayreuth Circle » of the late- 19th Century, today, we are less likely to see the work in terms of the regeneration essays ; although it was often seen against this background during the 20th Century. With better knowledge of how the work actually developed, from its genesis in the late- 1850's to the completion of the poem (libretto) on 19 April 1877, it seems highly-unlikely that the influences that Wagner absorbed, digested and finally presented in the essays of his last years, were significant in determining the ideal content of the work, which had been almost entirely defined by August 1865. For example, Wagner 1st met Count Gobineau in 1876 (« Cosima's Diary » , entry for 30 November) and, only after meeting Gobineau again in 1880, did Wagner begin to study his writings. Therefore, it is not possible, as Gutman asserted, that Gobineau's racist ideas could have influenced Wagner before he wrote the detailed « Prose Draft » of 1865, or even the 2nd one of 1877. Nor is it likely that Wagner had independently developed ideas similar to those of Count Gobineau, since there is evidence both in « Cosima's Diaries » and in her correspondence with Gobineau, that Wagner had violently disagreed with his racial theories.

Therefore, it seems, to this writer at least, that much debate about « Parsifal » from Theodor W. Adorno (writing in the 1930's) through Gutman (writing in the 1960's) to some of the more hysterical commentators of recent decades has been mistakenly concerned with the ideas about regeneration that preoccupied Wagner while he was finishing an Opera that had been worked-out, in some detail, decades earlier. It can be argued that the theme of regeneration is incidental to « Parsifal » (arguably less central than it is to « Lohengrin » , which also ends with a restoration) and that Wagner's last Opera is actually about redemption and compassion. Most of the criticism and commentary concerning « Parsifal » , in recent decades, has taken for granted that the work was inspired by the ideas of Darwin and Gobineau (both unknown to Wagner when he wrote his original « Prose Draft ») and that (as also has been claimed for « Die Meistersinger ») , the Opera contains a hidden anti-Semitic subtext ; so well hidden, in fact, that it never occurred to the Nazi's that such a subtext might be present.

The 2nd problem is the ban on « Parsifal » that Robert R. Gibson has proposed was enforced during the War years, in the 3rd « Reich » . If as Gutman asserts, this work was « the gospel of National-Socialism » , why should it have been suppressed or discouraged by the Nazi's ? Was it because the ideologues of the Nazi Party did not share Hitler's enthusiasm for this work ? Or was it, perhaps, that they found messages in the work that they disliked, and this dislike outweighed the regeneration message (which might have been of interest to them) that recently (1937) had been abhorred by their opponent Adorno ?

Incidentally, it was another work entirely that the « Völkischer Beobachter » had hailed as « the gospel of the Nazi movement » : the « Foundations of the 19th Century » (1897-1898) by Houston Stewart Chamberlain, at that time a central figure in « The Bayreuth Circle » during its 2nd (« Wilhelmist ») stage, who married Eva Wagner, in 1907, thus becoming the posthumous son-in-law of Richard. (Houston Stewart Chamberlain never met Richard Wagner ; the nearest he came was to see Wagner across a Bayreuth restaurant) .

So, what are the messages carried by Wagner's Opera that might have led to a ban on performances of « Parsifal » in the period 1939-1945, and its absence in these years from Hitler's Bayreuth ? Which of these messages could have been the real problem and which secondary objections ? It is even possible that the arguments with which the Nazi ideologues persuaded Hitler (if, in fact, they were able to do so) were not the real reasons for them wanting to forbid Wartime performances of the work. In a paper delivered at the Wagner symposium, in Adelaide, Robert R. Gibson suggested the following :

1stly, although it portrays a warrior caste of Grail Knights, there is in « Parsifal » an underlying message of pacifism. At key moments in the work, the protagonist is disarmed. In the 1st Act, « Parsifal » is up-braided for killing a swan, and, as a sign of his growing awareness, breaks his bow and throws away his arrows. In the 3rd Act, he arrives as an armed knight, but allows his armour to be removed, to be replaced by the mantle of the Grail brotherhood, on which appears the emblem of the dove : a symbol of peace. Only then, can he return to the shrine of Monsalvat.

Even in the 2nd Act, which ends in a violent conflict between « Parsifal » and the domain of Klingsor, the only destructive act in that conflict, on the part of the hero, is to grasp the spear and to make the sign of the cross. (In fact, his passivity throughout the Opera does not commend him as an Aryan hero ; in contrast to « Siegfried ») . The spear itself, a holy relic, will not allow itself to be used as a weapon : when Klingsor throws it at « Parsifal » , the spear pauses above his head. « Parsifal » then shows himself more worthy than Amfortas to be guardian of the holy relic by not bearing it as a weapon (« denn nicht ihn selberdurft' ich führen im Streite ») . This pacifist message alone would be sufficient reason, the Nazi ideologues could have argued, to suppress the work at least until the end of the War.

2ndly, the primary message of the Opera is about compassion, scarcely an element of Nazi ideology. It has been regarded as a feminine attribute, not as belonging to the masculine ideal of the Aryan male. One of principal ideologues of the Nazi movement, Alfred Rosenberg, compared Wagner's works as follows :

« The essence of all Nordic Western art has been revealed in Richard Wagner. It shows that the Nordic soul is not contemplative, that it does not lose itself in an individualistic psychology. Rather, it experiences the willed, cosmic, spiritual laws, and shapes our art spiritually and architectonically. Richard Wagner is one of those artists in whom 3 factors coincide, each of which form a part of our entire artistic life : the Nordic ideal of beauty as it appears outwardly in “ Lohengrin ” and “ Siegfried ” , linked to deepest feeling for nature ; the inner will of man in “ Tristan und Isolde ” ; and the struggle for the highest value of Nordic Western man : heroic honour, linked with inner truthfulness. This inner ideal of beauty is realized in Wotan, in King Mark and in Hans Sachs. Conversely, “ Parsifal ” is a strongly emphasized weakening of the will in favour of an adoptive value. » (« Mythos des XX. Jahrhunderts » , 1930.)

3rdly, the women portrayed in the Opera are no better role models for the women of the 3rd « Reich » , than « Parsifal » is exemplary of the Aryan male ideal. His mother Herzeleide is a War widow who attempts to shield her son from weapons and fighting, and dies of a broken heart when he leaves her in pursuit of a band of Knights. Kundry is, obviously, a foreign element but (despite the subsequent analysis of Weiner, in which she becomes an anti-Semitic stereotype) , Wagner's sympathetic treatment of this degenerate, predatory female might not have appealed to the ideologues.

4thly, the ban occurred at a time when the National-Socialist Party was attempting to suppress homosexuality. The SS were forbidden to touch one another but, in the Opera, we see a community of male warriors who embrace during their ceremonies.

From 1934 to 1937, there was a series of cloister trials, in which the monks of German monasteries were tried for alleged homosexual activities. In a broadcast speech, in May 1937, Josef Goebbels denounced the unnatural life of unmarried priests and monks, and he described monasteries as « breeding places of vile homosexuality » . Given the Nazi campaign against the Church and, in particular, the attempts to discredit monasteries and other religious communities, it is not surprising that an Opera, in which an all male religious community triumphs over adversity through the recovery of a phallic symbol, would be unwanted.

Finally, although « Parsifal » is less complex than the « Ring » , it is still a multi-layered, multi-dimensional, opaque work that allows of many different interpretations. In that respect, it is the antithesis of totalitarian art. The latter is characterized by simple messages, unambiguous images and uncomplicated archetypes. Even if « Parsifal » can be interpreted as a homage to Aryan supremacy, this objective is obscured by other, more obvious messages that would have disturbed Nazi ideologues. We see a youth destroy his weapons, renounce sexual union with a woman and join an enclosed, all male, religious community. In short, doing everything that a good Aryan youth of the 1930's was not supposed to do.

Research into the records of Opera Houses within the 3rd « Reich » , carried-out by Katherine R. Syer, has shown that there were, in fact, both staged and concert performances of « Parsifal » during the War years. There is a recording (issued on CD by « Preiser Records » , 90261) of the 3rd Act of the Opera in a concert performance given in Berlin, on 31st March 1942.

« “ Parsifal ” was not performed in Munich during the War but it was in Von Schirach's Vienna. In Hamburg, “ Parsifal

” was performed annually from the 1929-1930 season until that of 1942-1943, on average 3 times per season ; in 1936, a new production directed by Oscar Fritz Schuh and designed by Emil Preetorius ran for 7 performances. In Frankfurt, which fell within Josef Gœbbels' sphere (as head of the “ Reich ” Chamber of Culture) , “ Parsifal ” had been performed annually in the period between the 2 World Wars, invariably around Easter time. “ Parsifal ” suddenly disappeared from the Frankfurt program, in 1940, only to resurface in 1941, 1942 and 1943. In Dresden, “ Parsifal ” was performed every season, from 1914 to 1944 inclusive, with the number of annual performances fixed at 4 from 1933 to 1944. »

Syer goes on to state that Wolfgang Wagner had a conversation with Adolf Hitler, in 1940, in which, reportedly, the « Führer » stated his wish for a more abstract and indeterminate approach in future stagings of « Parsifal » . However, in the passage that Syer quotes from Spotts' « Hitler and the Power of Æsthetics » , an entry from Josef Gœbbels' diary is inaccurately reported. This error has been corrected by John Deathridge :

« What Gœbbels actually dictated for his diary, on 22 November 1941, was this : " Contrary to what has been reported to me, the “ Führer ” does not want “ Parsifal ” to be performed solely in Bayreuth again ; he only means that one should modernize the set and costumes of “ Parsifal ” somewhat. Either we have to get away from this Christian mystical style, or “ Parsifal ” , in the long run, won't be able to retain its place in the modern repertory. The “ Führer ” gives me several suggestions, which I will immediately put into effect." » (« Wagner Beyond Good and Evil » , John Deathridge, University of California Press, 2008 ; pages 173-174.)

Therefore, we must conclude that, even though some Nazi ideologues had reservations about « Parsifal » and despite Hitler's dislike of the « Christian mystical style » in which it had until then always been presented on stage, both Hitler and Gœbbels were looking forward to new productions of the Opera after the War. Nike Wagner's suggestion (« The Wagners » , page 139) that Hitler wanted Alfred Rosenberg to rewrite the text should not be taken as hard fact, although we can assume that Rosenberg would have done so if asked. She reports her father, Wieland, as saying : « Hitler virtually prohibited “ Parsifal ” . » . Like much else, in Nike Wagner's book, this should be taken with a pinch of salt. Virtually or otherwise, there is no evidence that Hitler prohibited « Parsifal » , at any time. It is possible that certain of his subordinates, on the basis of some hint from Hitler, discouraged performances of « Parsifal » because its pacifistic message was considered unsuitable for the War years. But that would be speculation and in the absence of evidence for a ban, and in the presence of evidence of some performances during the War, we can only conclude that there was no ban on « Parsifal » .

To the extent that « The Bayreuth Circle » had any influence, it was exerted through a publication that Richard Wagner had established in his last years, the « Bayreuther Blätter » . Wagner appointed Hans von Wolzogen as editor, in which post he remained until his death, in 1938, at which the journal ceased to be published. The « Bayreuther Blätter » has been described as the publication forum for « The Bayreuth Circle » ; although it might be more accurate to regard the list of authors, whose articles were selected by von Wolzogen for publication in the « Blätter » , as defining the membership of the otherwise insubstantial group known as « The Bayreuth Circle » . Although the continuity of the editorship maintained a certain continuity also in the content of the journal, Schüler was able to distinguish 3 distinct stages or generations in the « Circle » .

Footnote 4 - Schüler pointed-out that Richard Wagner's ideas about redemption and regeneration culminated in « Parsifal » . It was therefore natural that, after the publication of Wagner's « Religion and Art » and a series of related articles in the « Blätter » , other authors should take-up Wagner's ideas about redemption and regeneration in later issues of the journal. Their articles almost invariably related those ideas to « Parsifal » . The subsequent history of articles relating to « Parsifal » and the theme of mankind's potential regeneration has been documented by Mary A. Cicora in : « “ Parsifal ” Reception in the “ Bayreuther Blätter ” » . In this study, based on Doctor Cicora's doctoral dissertation, the subtly different perspectives of « The Bayreuth Circle » (that is, the authors who published in the « Blätter ») are illustrated by selections from articles in each of the 3 stages of the « Circle » .

Rainer Schlöber

Rainer Schlöber was a German journalist and writer who held, from 1933 to 1945, the governmental post of « Reichsdramaturg » (« Reich » Drama Adviser) in the Ministry of Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda headed by Doctor Josef Gœbbels and also, from 1935 to 1938, President of the « Reichstheaterkammer » (« Reich » Theatre Chamber) , the State governing body for drama. This was an even more important and high-profile position. The equivalent body in the world of music, the « Reichsmusikkammer » , was headed by the world-famous composer Richard Strauß from 1933 to 1935.

According to Doctor Gerwin Strobl, an academic specialist on the 3rd « Reich » and its cultural extensions, in his book « The Swastika and the Stage : German Theatre and Society (1933-1945) » :

« Future leading figures of Nazi theatre, such as “ Reichsdramaturg ” Rainer Schlöber, or Leader of the Hitler Youth and head of the Vienna theatre, Baldur von Schirach, are characteristic of the able, refined and literate group of men attracted by National-Socialist promises of restoring German culture. »

Schlöber began officer cadet training in 1917, during the First World War, after having graduated from secondary education by having taken the « Abitur » (secondary school graduation certificate examination) . Posted to Flanders, he saw combat and was promoted to the rank of full-Lieutenant.

After the end of the First War, Schlöber studied at both Jena and the University of Freiburg, reading History, Philosophy, German Philology and Evangelical (Protestant) Theology. Forced to interrupt his studies during the economic collapse of the early 1920's and making a living as a bank clerk, he returned to study in 1927 at Jena, receiving the degree of Doctor of Literature in 1931.

Schlöber took an active part in « völkisch » (nationalist folk-oriented) politics from 1924. But his NSDAP membership number was only 772,091, indicating that his actual Party membership dated from much later. He was not one of the real « alte Kämpfer » (old Fighters) whose membership, at latest, could not be positioned after number 100,000, though it seems that he joined the Party prior to its election and take-over of government in 1933.

In October 1931 (more than 1 year before the NSDAP and Adolf Hitler achieved State power in Germany) , Schlöber became Culture-Political Editor of the « Völkischer Beobachter » (Folkish Observer) , the Party newspaper of the NSDAP.

The position of Dramaturg in the German « Reich » of the 1930's and 1940's was one which « combined the offices of censor and animator. In neither was Rainer Schlöber altogether successful. Critical plays were of course banned, as were plays by Jewish authors and music by Jewish composers. But the manner of performance was less easy to control and left room for political innuendo and a modicum of independence. »

Schlöber, like Hitler (and Joseph Stalin) , favoured the works of William Shakespeare and mused, in 1933, that Shakespeare was not just « Aryan » but more German than English.

The « Reich » Dramaturgical Bureau produced a « List of Undesirable and Abusive Literature for the Stage » , which included the works of Bertolt Brecht.

Schlöber frequently stressed the usefulness to the « Reich » of the works of George Bernard Shaw. In that, he followed the instruction given to Josef Gëbbels by Hitler himself (who enjoyed « Cæsar and Cleopatra ») , that Shaw's works should be « protected » .

The « Thingspiel » has been described as « multi-disciplinary outdoor theatre » . About 40 outdoor theatres, usually modelled on those of ancient Greece, were developed during the currency of the 3rd « Reich » , all between 1934 and 1937, though a further 360 planned were never built.

The 1st « Thingplatz » was dedicated in Halle, in 1934, though the best-known is the « Dietrich-Eckart-Bühne » in sub-urban Berlin, opened in 1936 for the nearby Berlin 1936 Summer Olympics and named after the dramatist and writer, Dietrich Eckart, an early comrade of Adolf Hitler. The « Dietrich-Eckart-Bühne », which can seat 22,000 spectators, was renamed the « Waldbühne » (Forest Theatre) after 1948 and is still much-used.

The minister responsible, Josef Goebbels, had in mind a concatenation of national, folk and traditional festivals :

« The festivals, too, which this government celebrates with the people, have a deeper meaning. These are not festivals organized by the government at the expense of the people. Quite the contrary, they are festivals in which the government no longer stand in opposition to each other but that government and people have become one. »

Schlöber was a proponent of the « Thingspiele » and, as « Reichsdramaturg », much involved with the idea and its realization, which he described, in a 1934 speech, as :

« A longing for a drama that intensifies historical events to create a mythical, universal, unambiguous reality beyond reality. »

He added that :

« Only someone who understands this longing will be able to create the cultic popular drama of the future. »

Any subject might be suitable for a « Thingspiel », so long as « placed in the context of the Nordic concept » and « moved into the light of our genuine and just myth of blood and honour » .

Schlöber wrote that the « Thingplätzen » would become :

« The heart of the whole festive national political and artistic life of the individual cities. »

(Rainer Schlöber, « Politik und Drama », published in 1935.)

The effect on an audience of a « Thingspiel » has been analyzed, thus :

« It was mainly the working of light and music, combined with the underlying ritual pattern, that triggered quasi-religious feelings and established an emotional bond among all those present. »

It may be that one inspiration was the « sacred art » noted by Richard Wagner in the formulation of his world-famous music-dramas.

The basis of Schlöber's view of art and of the 3rd « Reich » itself is encapsulated in his words about von Carl Maria von Weber's Opera, « Der Freischütz » (The Free-Shooter) in the 1937 edition of the German Music Year Book :

« The cultural-political goal of the 3rd “ Reich ” is not to focus upon bureaucratic power, but to create fervour in the service of Holy Art. “ Der Freischütz ” is a mirror of the soul. »

Schlöber's formulation of the « Thingspiel » structure was « an Oratorio or programme of recitative choruses ; a presentation of allegorical “ tableaux vivants ” followed by a presentation of colours and pledges of allegiance : a pageant parade, a ballet, expressionistic dances. »

In September 1939, with the coming of War against Poland, France and Great Britain, Schlöber was also appointed Chief of the Cultural Office of the Hitler Youth, a uniformed position carrying the rank of Regional Leader (« Obergerbietsführer ») . From 1944, Schlöber directed a programme at the Ministry of Propaganda in respect of culture in the context of « Total War » (an expression conceived by Josef Gœbbels) .

In 1945, Schlöber took an active part in the Battle for Berlin, fighting with the remnants of an « SS-Panzer » unit. Taken prisoner by Soviet forces, he was sentenced to death on 30 June 1945 and executed on 9 August 1945.

In 1946, the printed works of Rainer Schlöber were (arguably ironically) placed on a list of prohibited literature in the Soviet Occupation Zone of Germany. In 1953, the « Deutsche Demokratische Republik » (East Germany) formalized and continued the ban.

The fact that Schlöber's name is still being cited in books and academic articles would seem to indicate that his work was and is not without importance in the history of drama. The « sound and light » shows of the post-1945 era may not owe their existence entirely to the « Thingspiele » of the 1930's.

Rainer Schlöber (geboren 28. Juli 1899 in Jena ; gestorben 9. August 1945 in Berlin) , Schriftsteller und Journalist, war « Reichsdramaturg » im Ministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda und von 1935 bis 1938 Präsident der Reichstheaterkammer. Er war ein einflussreicher Kulturpolitiker des Nationalsozialismus.

Nach dem Abitur 1917 begann Schlöber seine Ausbildung zum Offizier. Kriegsbedingt kam er schon bald zum Fronteinsatz in Flandern. Im September 1917 erhielt er den Rang eines Leutnants. Nach Kriegsende studierte er Geschichte, Philosophie, Deutsche Philologie und evangelische Theologie an den Universitäten Jena und Freiburg. 1920 starb sein Vater Rudolf Schlöber, Universitätsprofessor in Jena und seit 1917 Direktor des Gœthe- und Schiller-Archivs in Weimar. Daraufhin mußte Schlöber sein Studium unterbrechen, arbeitete als Bankkaufmann und brachte es bis zum Prokuristen. Im November 1927 nahm er in Jena das Studium wieder auf und wurde im Mai 1931 bei Albert Leitzmann mit der Dissertation : Johann Friedrich Struensee in der deutschen Literatur zum Doktor der Philosophie Promoviert.

Ab 1924 begann seine publizistische Tätigkeit zunächst für die völkische, später für die nationalsozialistische Bewegung. Seit 1925 war Schlöber Mitarbeiter der durch den antisemitischen Schriftsteller Adolf Bartels herausgegebenen Zeitschrift Deutsches Schrifttum, in der er seine erste Literaturkritik über ein Buch des völkischen Dichter Kurt Geucke veröffentlichte. Im Oktober 1931 wurde er kulturpolitischer Redakteur beim Völkischen Beobachter. Schlöber war Mitglied der NSDAP (Mitgliedsnummer : 772.091) .

Nach der « Machtübernahme » durch die Nationalsozialisten wirkte er an der Umgestaltung des deutschen Kulturlebens im Sinne des Nationalsozialismus als einflußnehmender Parteifunktionär mit. Dafür durfte er Karriere machen. Im August 1933 erhielt Schlöber durch Josef Gœbbels das neu geschaffene Amt des Reichsdramaturgen im ebenfalls 1933 erstmals eingerichteten Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda. Zudem stieg er zum Ministerialrat auf. In der Folgezeit übernahm er außerdem eine Vielzahl von leitenden Funktionen in Vereinigungen des deutschen Theaterlebens. Bei der Union Nationaler Schriftsteller war er ab Januar 1934 erster Vizepräsident.

Die Durchführung nationalsozialistischer Kulturpolitik hieß zuerst vor allem die Ausmerzung alles Jüdischen in Theater und Oper. Dazu hatte er verschiedene Machtmittel zu Verfügung. So war er als Reichsdramaturg auch für die Zulassung oder Ablehnung von Opern- und Operettenaufführungen zuständig. Er untersagte am 9. März 1934 nach einer Anfrage des preußischen Theaterausschusses Aufführungen von Werken der « jüdischen Komponisten » Giacomo Meyerbeer und Jacques Offenbach. Schlöber war unter anderem auch für die Zensur der Theatervorhaben der Jüdischen Kulturbünde zuständig und achtete dabei unter anderem sehr darauf, daß kein « Jude ausgerechnet Kleist dramatisch ausschachtet » . Weitere Spielverbote wurden auch damit begründet, daß das Dritte Reich das Judentum in seiner eminenten Gefahr erkannt habe. Bei zeitgenössischen Operetten bemängelte er in einem Schreiben an Gœbbels vom 12. September 1934 den hohen Anteil jüdischer Komponisten und Librettisten, woraufhin ihn Gœbbels anwies, eine « Säuberung » vorzunehmen.

Nach dem Tod seines Vorgesetzten Otto Laubinger wurde Schlöber im Herbst 1935 zum Leiter der Theaterabteilung im Propagandaministerium und zum Präsidenten der Reichstheaterkammer ernannt. Im April 1938 folgte ihm in letzterer Funktion der Schauspieler Ludwig Körner nach.

« Die Theaterführung wird von Schlöber in meinem Auftrag vorzüglich verwaltet. »

(Josef Gœbbels : Tagebucheintrag vom 4. August 1942.)

Ebenfalls bis 1938 gehörte Schlöber dem 1935 von Gœbbels berufenen, in der Praxis wenig bedeutenden Reichskultursenat an. Im September 1939 wurde er mit dem Dienstgrad eines Obergebietsführers Leiter des Kulturamtes der Hitler-Jugend. Schlöber, der in seiner Funktion als Reichsdramaturg auch Operaufführungen zu beurteilen hatte, reihte sich ein in die NS-Kritik, die Werke des Komponisten und Kapellmeisters Hans Ebert (1889-1952) als dekadent, dissonant und « Negermusik » klassifizierte. Zwei Tage nach der Berliner Erstaufführung von Eberts Oper Hille Bobbe im Deutschen Opernhaus rügte Schlöber 1942 öffentlich die « nicht arische Versippung » des Komponisten und verlangte, daß der « durch die hier gerügten Lässigkeiten erschütterte Ruf der Reichsdramaturgie hinsichtlich ihrer nationalsozialistischen Zuverlässigkeit wieder hergestellt » werden müsse. Als amtierender Reichsdramaturg war Schlöber weiterhin verantwortlich für die während des Zweiten Weltkrieges von der Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen vorgenommenen Änderungen von Opernlibretti im Sinne des Nationalsozialismus.

Von 1944 an leitete Schlöber, der 1942 zum Ministerialdirigenten aufgestiegen war, die Abteilung Kultur im Propagandaministerium und lenkte Maßnahmen zur Umgestaltung des deutschen Kulturlebens im totalen Krieg. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkrieges soll er sich während der Schlacht um Berlin nach Adolf Hitlers Tod den Resten einer SS-Panzer-Einheit angeschlossen haben, die beschossen und zersprengt wurde. Schlöber wurde von sowjetischen Truppen gefangenengenommen, am 30. Juni 1945 zum Tode verurteilt und am 9. August hingerichtet.

In der Nachkriegszeit wurden 1946 in der SBZ sämtliche Werke Schlöbers als Bestandteil der nationalsozialistischen Propaganda in die Liste der auszusondernden Literatur aufgenommen.

Jours de fête officiels promulgués par le 3e « Reich »

The particular idealism surrounding soldierly death was made manifest almost immediately after the seizure of power when, in 1934, « Volkestrauer tag » was swiftly elevated to the status of a legal holiday and equally swiftly remade as « Heldengedenktag » (Heroes Memorial-Day) . In a single gesture, this act signaled the end of the political strife and taint of semi-legitimacy that had attended celebrations of the World War I dead in Weimar. Through the creation of « Heldengedenktag » , the Nazi regime symbolically put to rest a generation of discord over the meaning of the War and War deaths and emphatically proclaimed a new attitude toward them. Rather than being treated as the objects of grief, the World War I dead would be exalted, unambiguously, as heroic martyrs whose sacrifice comprised the founding act of the 3rd « Reich » and whose putative selflessness and spirit of communitarianism were held-up to the nation not merely as collective but also as racial values.

Militarism, long suppressed on past days of national mourning, was now ostentatiously celebrated on « Heldengedenktag » in the « Reich's » capital. Responsibility for the holiday's ceremonies was handed-over to the army. The Minister of War, not preachers, delivered memorial addresses. Swastikas and iron crosses replaced the Christian crosses that had frequently appeared at past World War I memorial celebrations. Flags were no longer flown at half-mast, as would befit a nation in mourning, but triumphally, at full-height. « Heldengedenletag » , proclaimed the « Volksbund » deliriously in 1934, was :

« A symbol of the rebirth of the German people's heroic attitude toward life. On this day, Germans all over the world will forever think of the soldiers who fell in the War and in the freedom movement and take renewed power from their spiritual corps. »

For partisans of the new order, it seems the Nazi regime held within it the power not only to redeem and make resplendent the deaths of the past but also to fill future sacrifices with moral purpose.

War death and its emancipating power were constant themes of regime-approved poetry as well, which became another conduit through which true believers communicated their message about death's meaning to a larger audience :

« The graves of the War / of eternal victory / are the fields and seeds of glory. » , wrote Herbert Böhme, editor of a weighty, mass-market anthology of verse, « Call to the “ Reich ” », published in 1934. Because soldiers could never die, one should ...

Grieve no more !
for they have left their graves
And returned
In freedom
To the ranks
They march though the streets and lanes
like life-giving suns !

Scholars have focused our attention very productively on these and other visions of heroic and soldierly death, as well as on attendant notions of sacrifice and martyrdom, which were clearly so central to the Nazi « œuvre », self-presentation, and ways that the Party staged and projected power. One thinks not only of the celebrations of « Heldengedenktag » in Berlin but also of the monumental drama that attended commemorations each November 9th of those who died in the 1923 « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » in Munich. At the same time, we should not allow the fact that the preponderance of Nazi thinking about death focused on heroics and the battle-field to obscure other visions of death that emerged in Nazi Germany, ones that sought to re-interpret mortality and its meaning in broad terms.

Wolfram Brockmeier's poem, « To the Fathers », is one example :

You fathers and mothers of my kin which you join to this earth, chase the quiet from your weary lips and dissolve the sleep that holds you.
Raise yourselves from your dark tombs, leave your era, come to mine.
My hair tosses in the winds, and for you, too, are air and light prepared.
And you draw near ! Already I can grasp you :
grapes are red from your blood,
I see you ripen a thousandfold in grain, and receive you in my wine and bread.

Holidays in Nazi Germany were primarily centred on important political events, serving as a form of political education and re-inforcing propaganda themes. Major national holidays were, therefore, controlled by « Reich » Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels and were often accompanied by mass-meetings, parades, speeches and radio broadcasts.

Many of the official national holidays in the 3rd « Reich » were anniversaries of political events, namely the seizure of power on 30 January 1933 ; the announcement of the Party program on 24 February 1920 ; Adolf Hitler's birthday on 20 April ; and the Munich « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » of 9 November 1924. Others were traditional German holidays. Heroes' Memorial-Day was celebrated on 16 March ; National Labour-Day on 1 May ; Mothering Sunday in May ; Summer Solstice in June ; Harvest Thanksgiving in Autumn ; and Winter Solstice in December.

From 1937, Jews were banned from the streets during German public holidays.

Sunday, 16 March * (« Heldengedenktag ») : Heroes' Memorial-Day.

August Eigruber

The Austrian Nazi politician August Eigruber was born on 16 April 1907 in Steyr and was hanged by the Allies on 28 May 1947 in Landsberg am Lech. He became the « Landeshauptmann » (Provincial Governor) of Upper-Austria and the « Gauleiter » (Imperial Governor) of Upper-Danube (Oberdonau) .

After finishing middle-school, Eigruber underwent training in geodesy and fine-mechanics at the Austrian Federal Teaching Institution for Iron- and Steel-working. Thereafter, he was active in his profession. In November 1922, he joined the National-Socialist Worker Youth of Austria, whose leader he became in 1925. In April 1928, he joined the Nazi Party, whose « Steyr-Land » district leadership he took-up in October 1930. For his activities in the NSDAP, which was banned in Austria, Eigruber was sentenced to several months in prison.

From May 1935, Eigruber was the « Gau » Director (« Gaugeschäftsführer ») for the banned Party in the Upper-Austria « Gau » , and he took-over complete leadership of the « Gau » as of 1936. After the « Anschluß » , he was appointed « Landeshauptmann » on 14 March 1938. From 10 April 1938, he furthermore functioned as a ministerial adviser. Shortly before this, in March 1938, Eigruber joined the SA, in which he bore the rank of « Brigadeführer » .

On 22 May 1938, he transferred to the SS as a « Standartenführer » .

In September 1938, « Gauleiter » Eigruber attended the « Reichsparteitag » in Nuremberg. When National-Socialists of Passau met at the « Deutschmeister Inn » , Eigruber joined his allies and reminisced about their venture during the « Kampffahre » .

Rising to the rank of « Brigadeführer » in January 1939, and « Gruppenführer » in 1940.

In July 1940, the « Donau-Zeitung » announced that August Eigruber would travel to Passau by ship. There, he would be ceremonially welcomed at City Hall, and attend the latest play by Hans Baumann.

On 1 April 1940, he was installed as « Reich » Governor (« Reichstatthalter ») of Oberdonau which, in November 1942, led to his appointment as « Reich » Defence Commissar (« Reichsverteidigungskommissar ») . In June 1943, Eigruber was promoted to the rank of « SS-Obergruppenführer » .

August Eigruber became one of the most powerful Austrian men in the Nazi Party hierarchy. Eigruber was an associate of several top Nazis including Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Adolf Eichmann and Adolf Hitler, all of whom were born in Austria. He was also a friend of Martin Bormann, Hitler's deputy.

In the 1920's, Eigruber was employed at the Steyr factory and the Reithoffer rubber-plant before turning his interest onto politics. In April 1928, he joined the Nazi Party, whose interests he advanced in the « Steyr-Land » District Council leadership post he took-up in October 1930. He promoted the Nazi Party agenda, even serving time in an Austrian prison for his activities. After the « Anschluß » , he was appointed « Landeshauptmann » , on 14 March 1938. On 22 May 1938, he transferred from the SA to the SS as an « SS-Standartenführer » , a para-military rank considered the equivalent of an « Oberst » (Colonel) . The next day, on 23 May 1938, he was appointed « Landeshauptmann » (Provincial Governor) of Upper-Austria. On 15 March 1940, Eigruber was appointed « Gauleiter » (Imperial Governor) , the top-most Nazi Party representative in that region then known as Upper-Danube (Oberdonau) , formerly and after the War known as Upper-Austria.

In 1938, he helped to establish the Mauthausen complex by conveying the land to the SS and, later, by supporting their other projects, and aiding those efforts of industry including Steyr-Daimler-Puch. On 12 April 1940, he was sworn in as « Reich » Governor (« Reichstatthalter ») of Oberdonau. When Heinrich Himmler visited KL Mauthausen-Gusen with Eigruber in April 1941, their photographs reveal Eigruber had been promoted to SS-Gruppenführer, the equivalent of Major General or a two-star General in the US Army. In November 1942 his successes led to his appointment as Reich Defence Commissar (Reichsverteidigungskommissar). On 21 June 1943, Eigruber was promoted to SS-Obergruppenführer, a rank equivalent to Lieutenant General as was Ernst Kaltenbrunner, and just below that of Himmler's special rank of Reichsführer SS. He also served on the Board of Directors of Steyr-Daimler-Puch AG.

Eigruber was captured on 10 August 1945 by American troops under Lieutenant Snowden near St. Pankraz, along the Austrian and Italian border. He was initially interviewed as a witness for the Nuremberg Trials, but then charged and tried by the American Military Tribunal at Dachau among sixty one other prisoners whose actions were related to Mauthausen camps and war crimes. He was convicted on 13 May 1946. Eigruber was particularly proud to represent the region of Austria where Adolf Hitler (born in Linz) was born, and he remained loyal to Hitler up to the moment of his hanging on 28 May 1947 at the Landsberg am Lech War Criminal Prison Nr. I.

Immediately after Germany's unconditional surrender in May 1945, Eigruber was arrested in the Salzkammergut by the United States Army, and he was questioned as a witness at the Nuremberg Trials.

The « big fish » among the accused in the Mauthausen case was August Eigruber, the former « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria. He was charged with participating in the common design to violate the Laws and Usages of War because, along with other alleged crimes, he had been involved in helping Heinrich Himmler to acquire the property where the Mauthausen camp was built. Hartheim Castle, near Linz, was also under Eigruber's jurisdiction and he had leased it to the « Reich ». Prisoners from Mauthausen had been taken to the castle to be gassed, according to confessions obtained by the American military interrogators from several of the accused men.

Eigruber was an associate of such top Nazis as Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Adolf Eichmann and Adolf Hitler, all of whom were from Austria. He was also a friend of Martin Bormann, who was Hitler's deputy. When he refused to talk after he was captured, Eigruber was sent to Washington, D.C. , for questioning. Eigruber's importance was such that he was originally slated to be among the men who were tried at the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal.

According to Joshua Greene, who wrote « Justice at Dachau », the chief-prosecutor at Dachau, Lieutenant Colonel William Denson, put in a call to Robert Jackson, the chief-prosecutor at the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal and told him :

« Send me Eigruber. I'll hang him high as Haman. »

Haman was the villain in the biblical story on which the Jewish holiday of Purim is based. Denson made good on his boast : Eigruber was hanged on May 28, 1947.

On February 18, 1946, August Eigruber was brought from Nuremberg to Dachau and turned-over to Lieutenant Paul Guth for interrogation. Lieutenant Guth testified on the witness stand that he had not coerced or threatened Eigruber in any way. Although he had previously refused to talk, Eigruber voluntarily signed a statement for Lieutenant Guth the next day, in which he admitted that he was responsible for leasing Hartheim Castle to the « Reich », in 1939, for the killing of mental patients who were incurably ill or unable to work. He also admitted to inspecting the Mauthausen gas chamber once and to participating in the execution of 10 prisoners of unknown nationality during the night in March or April 1945. Eigruber's statement ended with the following words :

« This statement was made by me on 3 pages on the 19th of February 1946, in Dachau, Germany, of my own free will and without compulsion. To save time, a clerk wrote it down on a typewriter. I have read through it, and I have made corrections that appeared necessary to me. The above declaration contains my statements, and I swear before God that it is the entire truth. Signed, August Eigruber. »

The attorney for the defense, Major Ernst Oeding, objected to the admission of Eigruber's statement into evidence because it had not been witnessed, but his motion was denied by British psychiatrist and psychoanalyst Herbert Alexander Rosenfeld, a Jew who was serving as the « law member » on the panel of 8 judges. Normally, a confession must be witnessed to be admissible in a trial, but according to an Allied directive dated 25 August 1945, a military tribunal was not bound by general rules of evidence.

Commandant of Mauthausen. Zierys was never brought to justice ; he left the camp on the night of May 2, 1945, but was captured on May 23, 1945 and then « shot while attempting to escape » .

(Photo) Lieutenant Colonel William Denson listens as an Army translator asks Eigruber a question in German. The proceedings were painfully slow since the testimony of the accused had to be translated into English for the prosecution team.

Lieutenant Colonel William Denson became famous for his 100 % conviction rate in the 1st 4 proceedings conducted by the American Military Tribunal at Dachau. He died in 1998 at the age of 85 and, in his obituary, he was quoted as saying that August Eigruber was « one of the most arrogant defendants I have ever encountered » . Eigruber was allegedly tortured to force him to confess, and there is even a rumor that he was « mutilated and castrated » after he was captured, but apparently even that didn't humble him.

August Eigruber was the « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria and according to Marie Vassiltchikov, a nurse who wrote a book entitled « Berlin Diaries 1940-1945 » , Eigruber was the « virtual king of this part of Austria » .

She wrote that, in the last days of the War :

« “ Gauleiter ” Eigruber has been thundering over the radio that Oberdonau (the Nazi name for the province of Upper-Austria) must stand to the last man ; there is no escape now ; women and children will not be evacuated, however tough things get, for there is nowhere for them to go. In his rhetoric, he copies Adolf ; but, at least, he is frank and does not try to hide the gravity of the situation. By way of compensation, he promised the population a special distribution of rice and sugar. »

Sadly, the rice and sugar that was promised by Eigruber to the « starving population » was destroyed when several Red Cross trains on a siding at Attnang-Puchheim were bombed by the Allies, killing « all those pretty sun-burnt young nurses » , according to Vassiltchikov's book.

She wrote that :

« Eigruber is a particularly obnoxious individual, who continues to make fiery speeches about “ resistance ”, “ honour ”, etc. »

In the Mauthausen-Gusen camp trials, Eigruber, a dedicated Nazi loyal to the end, was sentenced in March 1946 by the Dachau International Military Tribunal to death by hanging for his responsibility for crimes at Mauthausen concentration camp. The sentence was carried-out in the prison yard at Landsberg Prison, in Landsberg am Lech, on 28 May 1947.

Eigruber died with the words « Heil Hitler » on his lips.

August Eigruber, österreichischer Politiker (NSDAP) : geboren 16. April 1907 in Steyr ; gestorben 28. Mai 1947 in Landsberg am Lech. Er war Mitglied des Reichstags und Gauleiter von Oberdonau und Landeshauptmann von Oberösterreich.

August Eigruber war ein unehelich geborener Sohn der Gemischtwarenhändlerin Aloisia Eigruber. Nach dem Besuch der Volks- und Mittelschule absolvierte er eine Ausbildung zum Vermessungstechniker und Feinmechaniker an der österreichischen Bundeslehranstalt für Eisen- und Stahlbearbeitung. Danach war er in seinem Beruf tätig.

Im November 1922 trat er als Mitglied der Nationalsozialistischen Arbeiterjugend Österreichs bei, deren Führer er 1925 wurde. Im April 1928 trat er der NSDAP (Mitgliedsnummer 83.432) bei, deren Bezirksleitung für Steyr-Land er im Oktober 1930 übernahm. Zudem war er örtlicher Kreisleiter.

Wegen seiner Betätigung für die in Österreich verbotene NSDAP wurde Eigruber 1934 zu einigen Monaten Haft verurteilt, die er unter anderem im Anhaltelager in den Wöllersdorfer Werken verbrachte.

Ab Mai 1935 war Eigruber Gaugeschäftsführer der nun illegalen Partei im Gau Oberösterreich und übernahm ab 1936 die komplette Gauleitung. Beim « Anschluß Österreichs » wurde er am 14. März 1938 zum Landeshauptmann ernannt. Seit dem 10. April 1938 fungierte Eigruber zusätzlich als Ministerialrat. Von April 1938 bis zum Ende der NS-Herrschaft im Frühjahr 1945 saß er als Abgeordneter für das Land Österreich im nationalsozialistischen Reichstag.

Kurz zuvor, im März 1938, war Eigruber in die SA eingetreten, in der er den Rang eines Brigadeführers innehatte. Am 22. Mai 1938 wechselte er in die SS (SS-Nummer 292.778) als Standartenführer und wurde im Januar 1939 zum Brigadeführer, 1940 zum Gruppenführer und im Juni 1943 zum Obergruppenführer befördert.

Am 1. April 1940 wurde er als Reichsstatthalter von Oberdonau eingesetzt und im November 1942 zum Reichsverteidigungskommissar. Zudem war Eigruber bei der Steyr-Daimler-Puch AG im Aufsichtsrat.

Eigruber war in seinem Herrschaftsbereich für mehrere Endphaseverbrechen verantwortlich, so und andere für die sogenannte Mühlviertler Hasenjagd. Im April 1945 ordnete Eigruber die Ermordung aller inhaftierten Oberösterreicher im KZ Mauthausen an. Er wollte auch die im Salzbergwerk Altaussee gelagerten Kunstschatze vernichten lassen.

Anfang Mai 1945 ging er nach Kirchdorf an der Krens. Unmittelbar nach der bedingungslosen Gesamtkapitulation der Wehrmacht im Mai 1945 wurde er im Salzkammergut von der US-Armee verhaftet, und als Zeuge bei den Nürnberger Prozessen befragt.

Im Mauthausen-Hauptprozess wurde Eigruber mit 60 weiteren Beschuldigten vor einem US-Militärgericht ab Ende März 1946 im Internierungslager Dachau angeklagt. Eigruber bekleidete keine Funktion in dem KZ Mauthausen. Als zuständiger Gauleiter und Leiter des Ernährungsamtes in Oberösterreich war er jedoch für die katastrophale Ernährungslage der Häftlinge hauptverantwortlich. Zudem nahm er an Exekutionen von Häftlingen teil und stellte das Schloß Hartheim, in dem invalide Häftlinge im Rahmen der Aktion 14f13 vergast wurden, zur Verfügung. Eigruber wurde am 13. Mai 1946 wegen seiner Verantwortung für die Verbrechen im KZ Mauthausen zum Tode durch den Strang verurteilt und am 28. Mai 1947 im Kriegsverbrechergefängnis Landsberg hingerichtet.

Im Zuge des « Totalen Krieg(seinsatzes) » ordnete Gauleiter August Eigruber im November 1944 auch die Schließung der Musikschule an. Elli Hierzegger verwendete sich allerdings vehement für deren Weiterführung. Nach Kriegsende versuchte sie die städtischen Politiker von der Weiterführung der Städtischen Musikschule zu überzeugen, konnte dies aber nicht durchsetzen.

Mauthausen-Gusen Camp Trials

The Mauthausen-Gusen camp trials were a set of trials of SS concentration camp personnel following World War II, heard by an American military government court at Dachau. Between March 29 and May 13, 1946, and then from August 6 to August 21, 1947, a total of 69 former camp personnel were tried. Among them were some of the former guards at the Mauthausen-Gusen concentration camp system and August Eigruber, a former « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria.

The 1st trial of personnel from Mauthausen-Gusen took place in the Dachau concentration camp between March 29 and May 13, 1946. Among the accused were 60 former members of the camp's administration and August Eigruber, a former « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria. Among the defendants were also Viktor Zoller (former commander of the « SS-Totenkopf » guard battalion) , and doctors Friedrich Entress (an SS member and a medic who practiced medical experiments on hundreds of inmates ; killing most of them with injections of phenol) , Eduard Krebsbach and Erich Wasicky handed the Cyclon B to the person who was responsible for running camp's gas chambers who was Doctor Eduard Krebsbach based on the death-bed confession of Commander Ziereis. The Mauthausen-Gusen commander, Franz Ziereis, was shot several weeks after the liberation of the Mauthausen-Gusen camps and died in former Camp Gusen I on May 24, 1945.

The defendants were charged with « violations of the laws and usages of War » , a charge which encompassed among other things murder, torture, beating and starving the inmates. After 6 weeks, all 61 defendants were found guilty. 58 were sentenced to death by hanging (9 were later paroled and their sentences were changed to life imprisonment) , whilst 3 were sentenced to life imprisonment. All the death sentences were carried-out on May 27 and May 28 of 1947, in Landsberg Prison.

Le camp de Mauthausen

Le camp de Mauthausen (ou Mauthausen-Gusen, après l'été 1940) était un camp de concentration (KZ ou KL) instauré par le régime nazi du 3e « Reich » autour des villages de Mauthausen et de Sankt-Georgen an der Gusen, en Haute-Autriche, à environ 22 kilomètres de Linz.

L'emplacement du camp de concentration de Mauthausen a été sélectionné avec celui du 2e camp de concentration de Gusen, en mars 1938. On construisit d'abord le 1er camp de prisonniers à Mauthausen, mais il se développa avec le 2e camp de Gusen I pour devenir l'un des plus grands camps de travail en Europe occupée. En plus des 4 camps situés à Mauthausen et dans les environs de Gusen, plus de 50 camps annexes, situés en Autriche et dans le Sud de l'Allemagne dépendaient du complexe de Mauthausen-Gusen et utilisaient les prisonniers comme main-d'œuvre. Parmi les camps annexes du KZ Mauthausen-Gusen se trouvaient des carrières, des fabriques de munitions, des mines, des usines d'armement et d'assemblage d'avions.

En janvier 1945, l'ensemble des camps dirigés depuis le bureau central de Mauthausen rassemblaient plus de 85,000 prisonniers. Le nombre total des victimes est inconnu mais la plupart des sources parlent de 122,766 à 320,000 morts pour l'ensemble du complexe. Les camps formaient l'un des 1ers grands complexes concentrationnaires nazis et furent parmi les derniers à être libérés par les Alliés. Les 2 camps principaux, Mauthausen et Gusen I, étaient les seuls camps du système concentrationnaire nazi en Europe classés « camps de niveau III », ce qui signifiait qu'ils étaient destinés à être les camps les plus durs à l'intention des « ennemis politiques incorrigibles du “ Reich ” ». Mauthausen-Gusen était plus particulièrement destiné à l'élimination par le travail de l'intelligentsia des pays occupés par l'Allemagne lors de la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Le 7 août 1938, des prisonniers du camp de concentration de Dachau furent envoyés dans la ville de Mauthausen près de Linz, en Autriche, pour commencer la construction d'un nouveau camp. Le site fut choisi du fait de la proximité d'une carrière de granite. Bien que le camp soit, dès le départ, contrôlé par l'État allemand, il fut fondé comme une entreprise économique par une Société privée. Le propriétaire de la carrière Wienergraben située à Mauthausen était une Société DEST (sigle de « Deutsche Erd- und Steinwerke GmbH ») . La Société, une émanation de Office central SS pour l'économie et l'administration dirigé par Oswald Pohl, loua les terrains destinés à la construction du camp et acheta des terres près de Gusen, dès le 25 mai 1938. Un an plus tard, la Société ordonna la construction du 1er camp à Gusen. Le granite extrait de la carrière avait été utilisé pour paver les rues de Vienne mais les autorités nazies envisageaient la reconstruction des principales villes d'Allemagne en accord avec les idées d'Albert Speer et des autres architectes nazis, et de grandes quantités de granit étaient donc nécessaires. Les fonds pour la construction du camp de Mauthausen furent rassemblés de nombreuses sources dont des prêts de la « Dresdner Bank » , de l' « Escompte Bank » basée à Prague, du soi-disant fonds Reinhardt issu des biens pris aux prisonniers des camps de concentration et de la Croix-Rouge allemande.

Initialement, Mauthausen était uniquement un camp d'internement pour les criminels de droit commun, les prostituées et les autres catégories de « criminels incorrigibles » . Le 8 mai 1939, il fut converti en camp de travail principalement pour les prisonniers politiques.

La principale fonction du camp continua en parallèle de son rôle économique. Jusqu'en 1942, il fut utilisé pour l'emprisonnement et l'exécution des opposants politiques réels ou imaginaires. Le camp servait les besoins de la machine de guerre allemande et pratiquait également l'extermination par le travail. Si les détenus étaient trop malades ou faibles pour travailler, ils étaient transférés dans le revier (« Krankenrevier » : dispensaire) ou dans les autres lieux d'extermination. De 1938 à 1941, le camp ne disposait pas d'une chambre à gaz et, à partir du printemps 1940, les prisonniers malades étaient transférés et gazés au château de Hartheim qui se trouvait à 40 kilomètres du camp où étaient exécutés par injection létale et incinérés dans le crématoire du camp. On construisit en octobre 1941 dans une cave une chambre à gaz dotée d'un système d'aération. Le Zyklon B était livré par la firme Slupetzky à Linz. La dernière opération de gazage eut lieu le 28 avril 1945, et on estime à environ 4,000 le nombre de victimes ainsi exécutées. On utilisa, à partir de 1942, un « Gaswagen » : un camion à gaz dont le pot d'échappement était branché à l'intérieur du véhicule pour asphyxier les occupants, qui faisait la navette entre Mauthausen et Gusen.

Durant les derniers mois de la guerre, le commandant du camp Franz Ziereis se prépara à une possible offensive soviétique. Les prisonniers durent construire des obstacles anti-chars en granite à l'est de Mauthausen. Le camp accueillit également des prisonniers issus d'autres camps dont les sous-camps de Mauthausen, situés en Autriche orientale. Le manque de nourriture déjà flagrant devint dramatique vers la fin de la guerre avec l'arrêt de la distribution des colis alimentaires par la Croix-Rouge. Les prisonniers transférés à l' « hôpital » ne recevaient qu'un pain pour 20 personnes et environ un demi-litre de soupe d'herbe par jour. On ne sait pas pourquoi les prisonniers de Gusen I et II ne furent pas tous exterminés conformément aux ordres de Heinrich Himmler ; le plan de Ziereis prévoyait d'emmener tous les prisonniers dans les tunnels des usines souterraines de Kellerbau et de détruire les entrées.

Le 28 avril 1945, sous le prétexte d'une alerte aérienne, quelque 22,000 prisonniers de Gusen furent emmenés dans les tunnels. Cependant, après quelques heures, tous ressortirent. Selon Stanisław Dobosiewicz, auteur de plusieurs ouvrages sur l'histoire du camp, l'échec du plan allemand aurait pu être causé par la destruction des câbles de détonation par les prisonniers. Même si ce plan fut abandonné, les prisonniers craignaient que les SS veuillent éliminer les détenus par d'autres moyens. Par conséquent, les prisonniers préparèrent un plan visant à attaquer les baraquements des gardes SS pour s'emparer des armes s'y trouvant.

Le 3 mai 1945, les SS et les autres gardes commencèrent à se préparer pour l'évacuation du camp. Le jour suivant, les gardes de Mauthausen furent remplacés par des soldats du « Volkssturm » sans armes et par des unités improvisées formées d'anciens agents de police évacués de Vienne. L'officier de police responsable de l'unité accepta l'autorité de Martin Gerken, jusqu'alors le plus haut-gradé parmi les « kapos », comme de facto le nouveau commandant du camp. Le travail cessa dans tous les sous-camps de Mauthausen et les prisonniers se préparaient à leur libération ou à la défense des camps contre un possible assaut des unités SS positionnées dans la zone. Il y eut effectivement des attaques, mais elles furent repoussées par les prisonniers. Gusen III fut le seul camp principal à avoir été évacué. Le 1er mai, les prisonniers entamèrent une marche de la mort vers Sankt Georgen mais reçurent l'ordre de retourner au camp, quelques heures plus tard. L'opération fut répétée le lendemain mais elle fut à nouveau annulée. Le 3 mai, les gardes SS abandonnèrent le camp et laissèrent les prisonniers livrés à leur sort.

Le 5 mai 1945, le camp de Mauthausen fut libéré par la 11e division blindée de la 3e armée américaine. À ce moment, la plupart des gardes SS avaient quitté le camp de Mauthausen, mais 30 qui étaient restés furent lynchés par les prisonniers ; un nombre similaire fut tué à Gusen II. Le sous-camp du col de Loibl fut le dernier à être libéré le 6 mai.

Parmi les survivants du camp figurait le lieutenant Jack Taylor, officier de l'Office of Strategic Services⁶⁸ dont le témoignage fut déterminant lors du procès du camp de Mauthausen-Gusen au tribunal militaire de Dachau⁶⁹. Simon Wiesenthal faisait également partie des survivants du camp tout comme Tibor Rubin, un Juif hongrois, qui rejoignit l'armée américaine et s'illustra lors de la guerre de Corée.

Après la capitulation de l'Allemagne, le complexe de Mauthausen-Gusen fut intégré au sein de la zone d'occupation soviétique de l'Autriche. Initialement, les autorités soviétiques utilisèrent certaines infrastructures des camps de Mauthausen et de Gusen I comme casernements pour l'Armée rouge. Les industries souterraines furent démantelées et envoyées en Union Soviétique. Après cela, entre 1946 et 1947, les camps furent abandonnés et de nombreux équipements furent démantelés par l'Armée rouge et par la population locale. Les forces soviétiques détruisirent les tunnels et se retirèrent de la zone à l'été 1947 et le camp fut cédé aux autorités civiles autrichiennes.

Le site ne devint un mémorial national qu'en 1949. Le 3 mai 1975, le chancelier Bruno Kreisky inaugura le musée de Mauthausen. À la différence de Mauthausen, la zone occupée par les camps de Gusen I, II et III a été utilisée pour la construction d'habitations après la Guerre. En 1989, Gerhard Skiba, maire de la ville de Braunau am Inn, commanda un bloc de granite de la carrière de Mauthausen, où tant de détenus moururent d'épuisement en y travaillant ou abattus par les gardes, au comité de Mauthausen. Il le fit installer en face de la maison où Adolf Hitler est né. Sur la pierre figure cette inscription :

« Für Frieden Freiheit und Demokratie nie wieder Faschismus millionen Tote mahnen. »

(Pour la paix, la liberté et la démocratie. Plus jamais le fascisme. À la mémoire de millions de morts.)

...

Dans l'histoire des camps de concentration implantés sur le territoire du 3^e « Reich », Mauthausen se situe au sommet de l'horreur. Plus ou moins 200,000 prisonniers passèrent par ce camp et ses divers satellites. Plus de la moitié d'entre eux y perdirent la vie. Harassés de travail, décimés par l'inanition, brutalisés comme nulle par ailleurs, les concentrationnaires ont été contraints de subir la forme la plus ignoble d'exploitation de l'homme par l'homme. Dès l'annexion de l'Autriche de mars 1938 (« Anschluß »), des recherches sont entreprises pour, à l'image de ceux existant en Allemagne depuis 1933, construire un grand camp de travail. À une vingtaine de kilomètres à l'est de Linz, sur la rive-gauche du proche Danube, entre les communes de Mauthausen, Langenstein et Sankt-Georgen an der Gusen, existent de grandes carrières de granite. C'est sur les hauteurs de la première de ces communes que, sur un terrain surplombant la « Wiener Graben » (fosse viennoise), l'une de ces carrières, que le 8 août 1938 et par un groupe de prisonniers envoyé spécialement de Dachau, sont posées les Ires pierres du KZ Mauthausen.

16 mois plus tard, 4 kilomètres plus à l'ouest, dans les carrières de Kastenholz et Gusen, les SS décident de construire une extension du camp, laquelle est destinée à héberger les prisonniers en nombre sans cesse croissant. Ainsi naît Gusen I, mis en exploitation dès mai 1940. Les détenus travaillent principalement dans les carrières, d'autres sont employés dans les usines Steyr-Daimler-Puch et Messerschmitt, implantées sur place et produisant des armes, respectivement des fuselages de chasseurs Bf 109. 4 ans plus tard, au sud de Sankt-Georgen, des galeries souterraines sont construites (baptisées « Bergkristall »), destinées à la production des Messerschmitt 262, Iers avions à réaction opérationnels de l'histoire. Les prisonniers affectés à ces usines seront logés dans un petit camp, Gusen II, construit au printemps 1944, à quelques centaines de mètres à l'ouest de Gusen I. Et, à la fin de la même année, plus au nord, dans le village de Lungitz, Gusen III est implanté, petit camp de travail destiné à produire le pain de l'ensemble des camps, ainsi qu'à entreposer l'armement et les pièces d'avions produites par les prisonniers de Gusen I et II. Un peu partout en Autriche et durant toute la Guerre, 49 camps annexes et divers commandos de travail, dépendant de Mauthausen, le camp central, seront implantés. Certains pour quelques jours ou semaines seulement, d'autres pour beaucoup plus de temps.

Les prisonniers, au départ, étaient des droit commun et des politiques autrichiens et allemands. Ils seront vite rejoints par des Polonais, Républicains espagnols et, dès l'été 1941, par des prisonniers de guerre soviétiques. En 1945, environ 30 nationalités différentes, hommes et femmes, y sont représentées, parmi lesquelles des Italiens, Français, Hollandais, Hongrois, Yougoslaves, et même quelques Suisses ayant manifestement œuvré contre le Nazisme en dehors de leurs terres. Mauthausen-Gusen fut le camp de l'horreur absolue. Le travail extrêmement pénible dans les carrières, le sadisme sans égal des SS, l'insalubrité et, conséquence directe, les maladies déciment une population carcérale dans des proportions effarantes. Mais le pire fut sans doute le manque de nourriture. Un prisonnier manipulant des blocs de granite 12 heures par jour aurait eu besoin, au minimum, de 3,000 calories pour maintenir son poids. Rares seront ceux qui atteindront les 1,200 calories quotidiennes. Résultat, en quelques semaines ils mourront d'épuisement.

À la libération du camp par les Américains, le 5 mai 1945, environ 200,000 prisonniers seront passés par Mauthausen et ses satellites. Entre 105,000 et 120,000 d'entre eux (chiffres généralement retenus à ce jour) y auront perdu la vie ! Hors camps d'extermination de Pologne, ce bilan est le plus lourd de tous les camps de concentration du « Reich ». Aujourd'hui, le souvenir demeure, le « Monument public de Mauthausen » ayant été inauguré au printemps de 1949. Si presque tous les baraquements du camp principal ont été détruits, leur emplacement, ainsi que tous les endroits marquants sont préservés et clairement indiqués. Beaucoup de pays ont voulu, dès la fin de la Guerre, marquer leur présence passée dans le camp en y érigeant un monument commémoratif. La France fut la première à le faire (1949) et beaucoup d'autres nations ont suivi. De Gusen, hélas, il ne reste pas grand chose. Juste un petit mémorial et les fours crématoires du camp. Tout autour de ce lieu de mémoire, des villas ont été construites, sur les terres mêlées de sang qui ont vu tant de malheureux périr de la plus atroce des façons (36,000 morts sur 71,000 internés) . Incompréhensible et navrant ! Et plus encore de constater que la « Jourhaus », bâtiment servant de porte d'entrée du camp, de centre administratif et de commandement est, aujourd'hui encore, habitée par une famille de Gusen, comme si de rien n'était. De quoi se demander de quelle matière sont constitués le cœur et la conscience de certains.

...

Témoignage de Mariano Constante (Capdesaso, Spagna, 1920) , écrivain espagnol dont l'œuvre est centrée sur l'expérience des républicains espagnols dans les camps de concentration nazis.

Mariano Constante est arrivé à Mauthausen en avril 1941. C'était le n° 4584. Il survécut. 4 ans en enfer. Il sortit du camp à la libération en mai 1945.

Militant communiste, après la Guerre, il s'établit en France et ne retourna jamais en Espagne.

Le camp de Mauthausen fut littéralement construit par les prisonniers espagnols, avec leur sueur et leur sang. Quand en Espagne, on dit que chaque pierre de Mauthausen représente la vie d'un Espagnol, ce n'est pas une affirmation exagérée ou rhétorique ; les prisonniers étaient contraint de travailler dans une carrière de granit et à transporter les gros blocs destinés à la construction du camp par un escalier de pierre de presque 200 marches et ce tous les jours et plusieurs dizaines de fois par jour, jusqu'à la mort.

Dans les lers temps, il ne survécut presque personne ; puis, les prisonniers commencèrent à s'organiser et, dans les années suivantes, les Espagnols, les vétérans du camp, furent pour tous les Maîtres incontestés de l'art de survivre dans ces conditions extrêmes et capables d'aider tous les autres internés quelles que fussent leur provenance. Et l'apport fondamental des Espagnols ne se limita pas à la délivrance du camp : Francesc Boix, photographe et militant antifasciste catalan, profitant de son emploi à l'enregistrement des internés, prit tant de photos qu'elles archivèrent les horreurs du camp et les copies qu'il réussit secrètement à en faire servirent de preuves déterminantes au procès de Nuremberg.

Quand les soldats états-uniens entrèrent à Mauthausen, le comité de bienvenue avait été organisé par les Espagnols et les drapeaux avec la croix gammée avaient tous été remplacés par des drapeaux républicains. Malheureusement, parmi les rares qui survécurent à l'extermination nazie, les infortunés Espagnols ne purent rentrer chez eux où Franco devait encore régner pendant 3 décennies. Ceux d'entre eux, qui malgré tout ce qu'ils avaient vécu et passé, choisirent de rentrer en Espagne le firent clandestinement et pour continuer l'interminable lutte contre la bête fasciste.

La Première République d'Autriche

La Première République d'Autriche (« Erste Republik Österreich ») est le régime républicain qu'a connu l'Autriche pendant l'entre-deux-guerres.

La République est établie le 21 octobre 1919, lors de la ratification du Traité de Saint-Germain par l'Autriche. Elle succède à l'éphémère République d'Autriche allemande créée lors du démembrement de l'Empire austro-hongrois. La Constitution est signée en 1920 et amendée en 1929. Cette période de l'histoire autrichienne est marquée par de violents conflits entre la Gauche et la Droite, comme lors de la Révolte de Juillet (1927) ou lors de la guerre civile autrichienne (après le coup d'État d'Engelbert Dollfuss) de février 1934.

La Première République disparaît le 12 mars 1938 lorsque l'Autriche est annexée par le 3^e « Reich » (« Anschluß »). Cependant, certains considèrent qu'elle se termine dès la mise en place de la dictature austrofasciste en 1933-1934, la Constitution de l'État austrofasciste ne considérant pas l'Autriche comme une république mais comme un État fédéral (« Ständestaat » ou « Bundesstaat Österreich »).

Le 21 octobre 1919, l'Autriche ratifie le Traité de Saint-Germain, qui dissout la République d'Autriche allemande et cède des territoires peuplés majoritairement d'Allemands aux nouveaux États issus de la dissolution de l'Autriche-Hongrie : la région des Sudètes est ainsi cédée à la Tchécoslovaquie, le Tyrol du Sud à l'Italie et une partie du Sud du pays au royaume des Serbes, Croates et Slovènes. La population autrichienne est irritée par cette décision qu'elle considère comme une violation des « 14 points de Wilson » (Woodrow Wilson) et, plus particulièrement, de la possibilité d'auto-détermination de toute nation. Le nouvel État parvient tout de même à conserver certains territoires revendiqués par ces voisins tels que la partie Sud-Est de la Carinthie peuplée de Slovènes et le « Burgenland » qui fut une partie du royaume de Hongrie de 1647 à 1918. Ces territoires votent leur maintien au sein de l'Autriche lors de plébiscites organisés respectivement en 1920 et 1921.

Des élections ont lieu au printemps 1919 afin d'élire une assemblée constituante. Le Parti Social-Démocrate des travailleurs (SDAP) arrive en tête suivi du Parti des Chrétiens-Sociaux (CS) et de l'Association Nationale Allemande (DNV). Le débat fut tendu lors de la rédaction de la Constitution, notamment entre le SDAP et le CS pourtant alliés au sein d'une coalition. Le CS souhaitait une république fédérale avec un chef d'État puissant, le SDAP une république centralisée sans chef d'État (seulement le chancelier). La Constitution qui entre en vigueur en novembre 1920 est un compromis entre les idées des différents Partis. La République est fédérale mais les régions ont peu d'autonomie et le chef de l'État n'a que des pouvoirs limités.

Le Parti des Chrétiens-Sociaux, proche de l'Église catholique romaine, gouverne l'Autriche à partir de 1920. Le 1er chancelier, Ignaz Seipel, est issu de ce Parti et essaye de forger une alliance politique entre les riches industriels et l'Église catholique. Bien que le gouvernement autrichien soit stable durant ces années, la vie politique est agitée et violente. Des forces para-militaires de Gauche (« Republikanischer Schutzbund », ou SDAP) et de Droite (« Heimwehr », CS et DNV) s'opposent. Les élections d'avril 1927 réduisent l'écart entre CS et SDAP à un siège ce qui radicalise encore plus la vie politique. Des combats de rue ont lieu à Schattendorf, entraînant la mort de 2 personnes, un homme et un enfant. Les militants de Droite, accusés de ce crime, furent acquittés, ce qui eut pour conséquences une immense manifestation de la Gauche et l'incendie du palais de justice. La police tira sur les manifestants, causant la mort de 89 personnes. Cet événement est connu sous le nom de « Révolte de Juillet ». Les violences continuèrent à augmenter en Autriche jusqu'au début des années 1930, lorsque Engelbert Dollfuss devint chancelier.

Le chancelier Engelbert Dollfuss, du Parti des Chrétiens-Sociaux, prend le pouvoir en Autriche en 1932. Il conduit l'Autriche vers la dictature, la centralisation et le Fascisme. Le 4 mars 1933 le Parlement s'auto-dissout et Dollfuss déclare le 7 qu'il gouvernera sans lui. Le 15, quelques députés essayent d'organiser une session du Parlement mais elle est empêchée par le gouvernement.

Outre le SDAP, Dollfuss s'oppose également au Parti nazi autrichien qui souhaite un rattachement de l'Autriche à l'Allemagne. Dollfuss met en avant les racines catholiques de l'Autriche pour refuser l'union avec l'Allemagne, majoritairement protestante. Des violences s'intensifient, conduisant à la guerre civile entre les Nazis, les austrofascistes et les socialistes.

En 1934, Dollfuss impose à l'Autriche un système à Parti unique, dirigé par le Front patriotique (« Vaterländische Front », ou VF) . L'État interdit le SDAP et exécute certains de ses représentants. Il commence également à sévir contre les sympathisants pro-nazis. Ces derniers répondent en organisant un coup d'État et en assassinant le chancelier Dollfuss, le 25 juillet 1934. Cet assassinat irrita fortement l'Italie fasciste de Benito Mussolini, qui avait de bonnes relations avec l'Autriche de Dollfuss. Le « Duce » promet alors de défendre le régime austrofasciste en cas d'invasion allemande. Ce soutien italien évitera d'ailleurs à l'Autriche une annexion dès 1934. Le successeur de Dollfuss, Kurt von Schuschnigg, maintient l'interdiction des activités nazies.

Au début 1938, Adolf Hitler obtient l'accord de Mussolini au sujet d'une l'annexion de l'Autriche par le 3e « Reich » . Kurt von Schuschnigg essaye désespérément d'éviter une guerre avec l'Allemagne nazie. Il annonce le 9 mars son intention d'organiser un plébiscite le 13 du même mois pour décider si l'Autriche souhaite rester indépendante ou rejoindre l'Allemagne. Il lance la devise « rot-weiß-rot bis in dem Tod » (rouge-blanc-rouge jusqu'à la mort) . Hitler répond en exigeant la démission immédiate de von Schuschnigg, que ce dernier est contraint de présenter au Président de la République Wilhelm Miklas, le 11 mars. Von Schuschnigg est remplacé par le dirigeant du Parti nazi autrichien, Arthur Seyß-Inquart, et les troupes allemandes prennent le contrôle de l'Autriche le 12 mars.

The Federal State of Austria (« Bundesstaat Österreich » ; colloquially known as the « Ständestaat » or Corporate State) refers to Austria between 1934 and 1938 while it was a One Party State led by the clerico-fascist Fatherland's Front. The « Ständestaat » concept, derived from the notion of « Stände » (Estates or Corporations) , was propaganda advocated by leading politicians such as Engelbert Dollfuss and Kurt Schuschnigg. The result was an authoritarian government based on a mix of conservative Catholic and Italian Fascist influences.

In the 1890's, the founding members of the conservative-clerical Christian-Social Party (CS) like Karl von Vogelsang and the Vienna mayor Karl Lueger had already developed anti-Liberal views, though primarily from an economic perspective considering the pauperization of the proletariat and the lower middle-class. Strongly referring to the doctrine of Catholic social teaching, the CS agitated against the Austrian labour movement led by the Social-Democrats. The CS also spread anti-Semitic prejudices, albeit never as virulent as the Nazis eventually became.

During the Great Depression in the First Austrian Republic of the early 1930's, the CS on the basis of the « Quadragesimo anno » Encyclical issued by Pope Pius XI, in 1931, pursued the idea of overcoming the ongoing class-struggle by the implementation of a corporative form of government modelled on Italian Fascism. The CS politician Engelbert Dollfuss, appointed Chancellor of Austria in 1932, on 4 March 1933, saw an opportunity in the resignation of Social-Democrat Karl Renner as president of the Austrian « Nationalrat » , after irregularities occurred during a voting process. Dollfuss called the incident a « self-elimination » (« Selbstausschaltung ») of the parliament and had the following meeting on 15 March forcibly prorogued by the forces of the Vienna police department. His Party fellow, President Wilhelm Miklas, with regard to Adolf Hitler's victory in the German elections of 5 March 1933 did not take any action to restore democracy.

Chancellor Dollfuss then governed by emergency decree, including the ban of the Communist Party on 26 May 1933, the Social-Democratic « Republikanischer Schutzbund » para-military organization on 30 May, and the Austrian branch of the Nazi Party on 19 June. Instead, on 20 May 1933, he had established the Fatherland's Front as a unity Party of « an autonomous, Christian, German, corporative Federal State of Austria » . On 12 February 1934, the government's attempts to enforce the ban of the « Schutzbund » at the Hotel Schiff in Linz sparked the Austrian Civil War. The revolt was suppressed with support by the « Bundesheer » and Right-wing Heimwehr troops under Ernst Rüdiger Starhemberg, ending with the ban of the Social-Democratic Party and the trade-unions. The path to dictatorship completed on 1 May 1934, when the Constitution was recast into a severely authoritarian document by a rump National Council.

Dollfuss continued to rule by emergency measures until his assassination during the Nazi July Putsch, on 25 July 1934. Although the « coup » initially had the encouragement of Adolf Hitler, it was quickly suppressed and his education minister, Kurt Schuschnigg, succeeded him. Hitler officially denied any involvement in the « coup d'État » . Nevertheless, he continued to destabilize the Austrian government system by secretly supporting Nazi sympathizers like Arthur Seyß-

Inquart and Edmund Glaise-Horstenau. In turn, Austria under Schuschnigg sought the backing by its southern neighbour, the Fascist Italian dictator Benito Mussolini. Tables turned after the Second Italo-Abyssinian War, in 1935-1936, when Mussolini, internationally isolated, approached Hitler. Though Schuschnigg tried to improve relations with Nazi Germany by amnestying several Austrian Nazis and accepting them in the Fatherland's Front, he had no chance to prevail against the « axis » of Berlin and Rome proclaimed by Mussolini on 1 November 1936.

According to the Hossbach Memorandum, Adolf Hitler, in November 1937, declared his plans for an Austrian campaign in a meeting with « Wehrmacht » commanders. Under the mediation of the German ambassador Franz von Papen, Schuschnigg, on 12 February 1938, traveled to Hitler's « Berghof » residence in Berchtesgaden, only to be confronted with an ultimatum to re-admit the Nazi Party and to appoint Seyß-Inquart and Glaise-Horstenau ministers of the Austrian cabinet. Schuschnigg, impressed by the presence of OKW chief General Wilhelm Keitel, gave-in and, on 16 February, Seyß-Inquart became head of the strategically important Austrian interior ministry.

After the British ambassador to Berlin, Nevile Henderson, on 3 March 1938, had stated that the German claims to Austria were justified, Schuschnigg started a last attempt to retain Austrian autonomy by scheduling a nation-wide referendum on 13 March. As part of his effort to ensure victory, he released the Social-Democratic leaders from prison and gained their support in return for dismantling the One Party State and legalizing the Socialist trade-unions. Hitler reacted with the mobilization of « Wehrmacht » troops at the Austrian border and demanded the appointment of Seyß-Inquart as Austrian chancellor. On 11 March, Austrian Nazis stormed the Federal Chancellery and forced Schuschnigg to resign. Seyß-Inquart was sworn in as his successor by Wilhelm Miklas, and, the next day, « Wehrmacht » troops crossed the border meeting no resistance.

Hitler had originally intended to retain Austria as a puppet State headed by Seyß-Inquart. However, the enthusiastic support for Hitler led him to change his stance and support a full « Anschluß » between Austria and Nazi Germany. On 13 March Seyß-Inquart formally decreed the Anschluß, though President Miklas avoided signing the law by resigning immediately. Seyß-Inquart then took over most of Miklas' duties and signed the Anschluß bill into law. Two days later in his speech at the Vienna Heldenplatz, Hitler proclaimed the "accession of my homeland to the German Reich".

La guerre civile autrichienne

La guerre civile autrichienne (« Österreichischer Bürgerkrieg »), également connue sous le nom d'« Insurrection de février » (« Februarkämpfe »), désigne les quelques jours d'escarmouches qui opposent en Autriche les forces socialistes et conservatrices-fascistes du 12 au 16 février 1934.

Après la désintégration de l'Empire austro-hongrois à la fin de la Première Guerre mondiale, en 1918, et le traité de Saint-Germain-en-Laye, l'Autriche devient une République parlementaire indépendante. 2 principales factions dominent alors la vie politique de la nouvelle nation : les Socialistes (représentés politiquement par le Parti Social-Démocrate) et les conservateurs (représentés politiquement par le Parti Chrétien-Social, ou « Christlichsoziale Partei », qui deviendra plus tard le Front patriotique, ou « Vaterländische Front »). Les Socialistes trouvent leur bastions dans les quartiers populaires des villes, tandis que les conservateurs peuvent s'appuyer sur le soutien de la population rurale et de la plupart des classes supérieures. Les conservateurs ont aussi maintenu des alliances étroites avec l'Église catholique romaine et peuvent compter parmi leurs rangs des religieux influents.

Comme dans la plupart des démocraties européennes naissantes de l'entre-deux-guerres, la politique de l'Autriche a pris une saveur très idéologique. Les 2 camps ne sont ainsi pas simplement composés de Partis politiques mais comprennent également des structures d'encadrement plus vastes, y compris de propres forces para-militaires. Les conservateurs développent donc l'« Heimwehr », constituée en 1921-1923 ; les para-militaires Sociaux-Démocrates se sont, quant à eux, regroupés dans la ligue de défense républicaine (« Republikanischer Schutzbund »). Les altercations et les affrontements (notamment lors de rassemblements politiques) sont ainsi fréquents. La Révolte de Juillet 1927 est le point culminant de cette confrontation.

À cela s'ajoutent les affres de la Première République d'Autriche qui n'ont fait qu'empirer dans les années suivantes. La Grande Dépression a également montré ses effets en Autriche, entraînant un chômage élevé et une inflation massive. En janvier 1933, l'élection d'Adolf Hitler au poste de chancelier en Allemagne menace l'État autrichien. Le 4 mars 1933, le chancelier Engelbert Dollfuss (appartenant au Parti Chrétien-Social) dissout le Parlement autrichien. Dans un vote serré (concernant les salaires des travailleurs des chemins de fer) au Conseil national, chacun des 3 présidents du parlement ont démissionné de leur poste afin de voter, ne laissant personne pour présider la réunion. Même si les statuts aurait pu résoudre cette situation, Dollfuss saisit cette occasion pour déclarer que le parlement avait cessé de fonctionner, et bloque toutes les tentatives de le convoquer à nouveau. Le Parti Social-Démocrate perd ainsi sa plateforme d'action politique. Les conservateurs, face à la pression et la violence, non seulement de la Gauche mais aussi de Nazis infiltrés venus d'Allemagne, peuvent désormais gouverner par décret, sur la base d'une loi d'urgence de 1917. Les libertés civiles sont alors suspendues et le Parti Social-Démocrate interdit, plusieurs de ses membres étant par ailleurs arrêtés.

Le 12 février 1934, l'« Heimwehr » commandée par Emil Fey, entreprend une marche sur l'hôtel Schiff à Linz, une propriété du Parti Social-Démocrate (dirigé Richard Bernaschek), marche qui dégénère en affrontements. La police, la gendarmerie et l'armée fédérale (« Bundesheer ») viennent épauler cette dernière. Après de brefs combats, le bâtiment est envahi par les conservateurs.

De nombreuses escarmouches ont alors lieu dans toute l'Autriche entre Socialistes et conservateurs. Les Socialistes se barricadent dans les zones urbaines (« Gemeindebauten ») formant les bastions du mouvement socialiste en Autriche, comme Karl Marx Hof. La police et les para-militaires ont pris position en dehors de ces ensembles fortifiés avant d'échanger des tirs avec ces derniers à l'arme légère. Des combats ont également lieu dans les villes industrielles telles que Steyr, Sankt Pölten, Weiz, Eggenberg bei Graz, Kapfenberg, Bruck an der Mur, Graz, Ebensee et Wörgl.

L'intervention de l'armée autrichienne, jusqu'alors neutre, marque le tournant du conflit. Le chancelier Dollfuss ordonne le bombardement du Karl-Marx-Hof, mettant en danger la vie de milliers de civils et détruisant de nombreux appartements avant de forcer les combattants socialistes à se rendre. Les combats dans la capitale prennent fin le 13 février mais perdurent dans les villes de Styrie, en particulier dans Bruck an der Mur et dans Judenburg, jusqu'au 14 ou 15 février.

Après cette date, il ne reste alors que quelques groupes socialistes qui combattent encore contre l'armée, ou qui sont en pleine déroute. La guerre civile autrichienne prend fin le 16 février.

Plusieurs centaines de personnes (y compris les para-militaires, membres des forces de sécurité et des civils) sont morts durant le conflit, auxquelles s'ajoutent plus de 300 blessés.

Les autorités arrêtent et exécutent 9 dirigeants du Parti Social-Démocrate en vertu des dispositions de la loi martiale. On dénombre, en outre, plus de 1,500 arrestations et les principaux socialistes, comme Otto Bauer, sont contraints à l'exil.

Une fois éliminée la principale force d'opposition, le pays connaît l'instauration de l'austrofascisme. Le Front patriotique, résultat de la fusion de l'« Heimwehr » et du Parti Chrétien-Social, devient le seul Parti politique légal (Parti unique) sous le nouveau régime autoritaire, le « Ständestaat » .

En juillet 1934, les Nazis autrichiens tentent un coup d'État qui échoue et fait environ 270 morts. 13 personnes sont exécutées et 4 se suicident avant leur exécution. Le chancelier Dollfuss est assassiné, Kurt von Schuschnigg lui succède et reste à la chancellerie jusqu'en mars 1938 (date de l'« Anschluß ») .

Pendant ce coup d'État, l'Allemagne reste neutre car elle ne sent pas encore assez forte militairement pour intervenir. Benito Mussolini, alors encore hostile et méfiant vis-à-vis du 3e « Reich » , envoie des soldats à la frontière autrichienne pour protéger l'indépendance de l'Autriche si elle venait à être menacée, cette dernière étant liée à l'Italie par une alliance.

La guerre civile autrichienne s'est néanmoins révélée un moment décisif dans l'histoire de la République. Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, lorsque l'Autriche est réapparue dans le paysage politique en tant que nation souveraine en 1945, la politique retombe sous la domination des Sociaux-Démocrates et des conservateurs (désormais regroupés au sein du Parti populaire autrichien, l'ÖVP) . Toutefois, afin d'éviter un retour des divisions amères de la Première République, les dirigeants de la Deuxième République ont été déterminés à mettre l'idée d'un large consensus au cœur du nouveau système politique : la « Grande Coalition », regroupant des membres des 2 Partis.

The Austrian Civil War (« Österreichischer Bürgerkrieg »), also known as the « February Uprising » (« Februarkämpfe »), is a term sometimes used for a few days of skirmishes between socialist and conservative-fascist forces between 12 February and 16 February 1934, in Austria. The clashes started in Linz and took place principally in the cities of Vienna, Graz, Bruck an der Mur, Judenburg, Wiener Neustadt and Steyr, but also in some other industrial cities of eastern and central Austria.

After the disintegration of the Austro-Hungarian Empire (following the First World War), the State of Austria (largely comprising the German-speaking parts of the former Empire) became constituted as a parliamentary democracy. 2 major factions dominated politics in the new nation : Socialists (represented politically by the Social-Democratic Workers' Party) and conservatives (politically represented by the Christian-Social Party). The Socialists found their strongholds in the working-class districts of the cities, while the conservatives could build on the support of the rural population and of most of the upper-classes. The conservatives also maintained close alliances with the Roman Catholic Church, and could count among their ranks some leading clerics.

As in most of the nascent European democracies of the time, politics in Austria took on a highly-ideological flavour. Both the socialist and the conservative camp did not merely consist of political Parties, but possessed far-ranging power structures, including their own para-military forces. The conservatives began organizing the « Heimwehr » (Homeguard), in 1921-1923 ; in response, the Social-Democrats organized para-militaries called the « Republikanischer Schutzbund » (Republican Protection Association) after 1923. Altercations and clashes between these forces (at political rallies, etc.) occurred frequently.

A 1st major incident ensued early in 1927, when members of Hermann Hiltl's « Frontkämpfervereinigung » (Front Fighters Union : a para-military association likewise affiliated with the conservative camp) shot and killed an 8 year old boy and a War veteran marching with the « Schutzbund » in a counter-demonstration in Schattendorf (Burgenland). In July, 3 defendants in the case were acquitted, which led to outrage in the Leftist camp even though the acquittal had been issued by one of the 1st Austrian courts to operate under an independent jury system, the introduction of which had been a long-standing socialist demand. On 15 July 1927, a general strike occurred, and demonstrations took place in the capital. After the storming of a police station, security forces started shooting at demonstrators. An angry group of people then set fire to the Palace of Justice (« Justizpalast »), seen as a symbol of a flawed and partial judicial system. Altogether, 89 people (85 of them demonstrators) lost their lives in this « July Revolt », and many hundreds suffered injury. Surprisingly, the violence soon died down and the factions took their battle from the streets back into the political institutions.

However, the travails of the First Republic only got worse in the following years. The Great Depression also showed its effects in Austria, resulting in high-unemployment and massive inflation. In addition, from 1933 (the year Adolf Hitler became Chancellor of Germany) , National-Socialist sympathizers (who wanted a unification of Austria with Hitler's Germany) threatened the Austrian State from within.

On 4 March 1933, Christian-Social Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss suspended the Austrian Parliament. In a close vote (on railway workers' wages) in the National Council, each of the 3 presidents of parliament resigned their position in order to cast a ballot, leaving nobody to preside over the meeting. Even though the bylaws could have resolved this situation, Dollfuss used this opportunity to declare that parliament had ceased to function, and blocked all attempts to reconvene it. The Social-Democratic Party had, thus, lost its major platform for political action. The conservatives, facing pressure and violence not only from the Left but also from Nazis infiltrating from Germany, could now rule by decree on the basis of a 1917 emergency law, without checks on their power, and began to suspend civil liberties. They banned the « Schutzbund » and imprisoned many of its members.

On 12 February 1934, a force, led by « Heimwehr » commander in Vienna Emil Fey, searched Hotel Schiff in Linz, a property belonging to the Social-Democratic Party. Linz « Schutzbund » commander Richard Bernaschek was the 1st to actively resist, sparking-off armed conflict between a conglomeration of the « Heimwehr » , the police, the « gendarmerie » and the regular Federal Army against the outlawed, but still existent, Socialist « Schutzbund » . Skirmishes between the 2 camps spread to other cities and towns in Austria, with the heat of the action occurring in Vienna. There, members of the « Schutzbund » barricaded themselves in city council housing estates (« Gemeindebauten ») , the symbols and strongholds for the Socialist movement in Austria, such as Karl-Marx-Hof. Police and para-militaries took-up positions outside these fortified complexes and the parties exchanged fire, initially only with small arms. Fighting also occurred in industrial towns such as Steyr, Sankt Pölten, Weiz, Eggenberg (Graz) , Kapfenberg, Bruck an der Mur, Graz, Ebensee and Wörgl.

An apparently decisive moment in the events came with the entry of the Austrian armed forces into the conflict. Though the army remained still a comparatively independent institution, chancellor Dollfuss ordered Karl-Marx-Hof shelled with light-artillery, endangering the lives of thousands of civilians and destroying many flats before forcing the Socialist fighters to surrender. Viennese and Upper-Austrian fighting ended by 13 February, but continued heavily in Styrian cities, especially in Bruck an der Mur and Judenburg, until 14 or 15 February. After that, there were only small groups of Socialists fighting against the armed forces, or fleeing from it. By 16 February 1934, the Austrian Civil War had ended.

Several hundred people (including para-militaries, members of the security forces and civilians) died in the armed conflict ; more than 1,000 suffered wounds. The authorities tried and executed 9 « Schutzbund » leaders under the provisions of martial law. In addition, over 1,500 arrests were made. Leading Socialist politicians, such as Otto Bauer, were forced into exile.

The incidents of February 1934 were taken as a pretext by the government to prohibit the Social-Democratic Party and its affiliated trade-unions altogether. In May, the conservatives replaced the democratic constitution by a corporatist constitution modelled along the lines of Benito Mussolini's Fascist Italy ; therefore, the Socialists coined the term « Austrofascism » although the underlying ideology was essentially that of the most conservative elements in the Austrian Catholic clergy, a feature inconsistent with both Italian Fascism and Nazism. The Patriotic Front (« Vaterländische Front ») , into which the « Heimwehr » and the Christian-Social Party were merged, became the only legal political Party in the resulting authoritarian regime, the « Ständestaat » .

Though small in scale in an international comparison (and small in scale, indeed, in the light of the events of the Second World War which soon followed) , the Austrian Civil War nevertheless proved a decisive moment in the history of the Republic. After the Second World War, when Austria re-emerged on the political landscape as a sovereign nation, politics again fell under the domination of the Social-Democrats and the conservatives, who now formed a Party called the Austrian People's Party (ÖVP) . However, so as to avoid a repeat of the bitter divisions of the First Republic, the leaders of the Second Republic were determined to put the idea of broad consensus at the heart of the new political system. The concept of the « Grand Coalition » was introduced, in which the 2 major parties (Social-Democrats and People's Party) shared in the government and avoided open confrontation. This system brought with it stability and continuity, but ultimately led to other political repercussions. But the events of the Austrian Civil War had persuaded many in the political establishment (and, indeed, the population at large) that a slow pace of political reform was a small price to pay for social calm.

L'Austrofascisme

L'Austrofascisme est un terme utilisé pour décrire le régime politique instauré en Autriche, entre 1933 et 1938 (« Ständestaat » , littéralement : État fédéral d'Autriche) . La figure la plus marquante de ce régime fut le chancelier Engelbert Dollfuß, qui fut assassiné par les Nazis, en juillet 1934. Ce régime se caractérisa par son autoritarisme, son catholicisme d'État, son opposition au marxisme et au Nazisme, son désir d'autarcie économique, et ses alliances politiques avec le régime fasciste italien de Benito Mussolini (afin de protéger l'Autriche des ambitions annexionnistes du 3e « Reich ») .

Le Front patriotique fut un parti unique (celui du chancelier) , les partis communiste, socialiste et nazi ayant été interdits.

Le 20 mai 1932, le président autrichien Wilhelm Miklas appelle Dollfuß au poste de chancelier. Cette nomination survient à un moment critique pour la jeune république autrichienne, touchée de plein fouet par la crise de 1929. Elle doit aussi faire face aux querelles politiques qui opposent marxistes et chrétiens. Dollfuß est décidé à suivre la politique de son prédécesseur Ignaz Seipel et, bien que son parti ne dispose que d'une voix de majorité au parlement, il refuse toute coalition avec les Sociaux-Démocrates. Décidé à redresser la situation du pays, il se lance, non sans difficulté, dans le rétablissement de l'équilibre financier, à la stabilisation du schilling et à la réorganisation du « Creditanstalt » , une des principales banques autrichiennes.

Le 30 janvier 1933, Adolf Hitler est nommé chancelier d'Allemagne. Cet événement marque le début du combat que vont se mener le Parti nazi autrichien et Dollfuß ; l'un voulant l'« Anschluss » , l'autre le combattant fermement. Conscient de la puissance de son adversaire, Dollfuß essaie de trouver rapidement des alliés : à l'extérieur, Mussolini se révèle être un protecteur. Mais, à l'intérieur, le chancelier tente vainement de créer un gouvernement de coalition avec les Sociaux-Démocrates. Ces derniers refusent tout compromis et exigent de nouvelles élections, que Dollfuß refuse à son tour.

Le 4 mars 1933, le président et les 2 vice-présidents du Parlement démissionnent afin de pouvoir prendre part au vote particulièrement serré d'une loi. Engelbert Dollfuß déclare le Parlement dissous, puisque incapable de fonctionner. L'Autriche devient un État autoritaire, corporatif et catholique. Il ne gouverne désormais que par décrets ; ce pouvoir dictatorial lui permet de supprimer le droit de grève et de réunion, ainsi que les cours d'assises, et d'interdire la presse marxiste. Commence alors ce que les historiens ont par la suite appelé l'austrofascisme.

Le 30 mai 1933, le Parti communiste d'Autriche est dissous, de même que le Parti nazi, le 20 juin 1933. Ses nombreux membres actifs sont arrêtés et placés dans des camps de concentration. En réaction, la radio allemande le discrédite, utilisant le fait que son père soit inconnu pour l'accuser d'être un « demi-juif ». Il devient la cible à abattre pour les nazis autrichiens.

En juillet 1934, les Nazis autrichiens tentent un coup d'État qui échoue et fait environ 270 morts. 13 personnes sont exécutées et 4 se suicident avant leur exécution. Le chancelier Dollfuß est assassiné, von Schuschnigg lui succède et reste à la chancellerie jusqu'en 1938 (date de l'« Anschluss »). Pendant ce coup d'État, l'Allemagne reste neutre car elle ne sent pas encore assez forte militairement pour intervenir. Mussolini, alors encore hostile et méfiant vis-à-vis du 3e « Reich », envoie des soldats à la frontière autrichienne pour protéger l'indépendance de l'Autriche si elle venait à être menacée.

De 1934 à 1938, Schuschnigg mène une intense mais prudente activité diplomatique afin de faire garantir l'indépendance de son pays par l'Italie, la France et la Grande-Bretagne pendant que le chef d'état-major de l'armée autrichienne, Alfred Jansa, dresse des plans pour s'opposer militairement à une éventuelle agression allemande.

Si l'accord du 11 juillet 1936 réaffirme le maintien de l'indépendance de l'Autriche, celle-ci est désignée comme « le second État allemand » et elle s'engage à « mener une politique extérieure conforme aux intérêts pan-germaniques » et à autoriser l'activité politique du Parti nazi. Au cours de l'été 1937, Hitler fait part à Josef Goebbels de sa volonté de résoudre le problème autrichien par la force, non seulement pour des raisons idéologiques, stratégiques et militaires, mais aussi pour des motifs économiques, l'Autriche disposant d'importantes réserves d'or et de devises, de main-d'œuvre et de matières premières ; elle sera annexée en mars 1938 (« Anschluss »).

Après l'arrivée au pouvoir du gouvernement austrofasciste, l'Autriche s'éloigne de l'économie de marché. Les échanges internationaux sont progressivement interdits en réponse au « Krach » de 1929. Entre 1932 et 1933, le chômage avait augmenté de 22 %. En réponse, les austrofascistes suppriment les allocations chômage. En outre, le gouvernement crée des coopérations de travailleurs afin de satisfaire les mouvements ouvriers.

La politique culturelle officielle du gouvernement austrofasciste, entre 1933 et 1938, était l'affirmation des styles « pré-révolutionnaires » (Baroque et autres), visant à rappeler les images de la « menace de l'Est » (l'invasion de l'Europe par les Turcs ottomans) qui ont ensuite été projetées sur l'URSS. De cette façon, le gouvernement a mis en garde ses citoyens contre ce qu'il appelle le « bolchévisme culturel », considéré comme une menace majeure pour l'Autriche.

Bien que le terme d'autrofascisme ait été utilisé par les partisans du régime lui-même, il est encore contesté aujourd'hui. Il est principalement utilisé par les historiens de gauche, tandis que la plupart des historiens préfèrent le terme de « Ständestaat » (État fédéral), soulignant ses mérites dans la lutte pour l'indépendance de l'Autriche et contre le Nazisme.

Le Front patriotique (en allemand : « Vaterländ Front ») était un parti politique autrichien d'extrême-droite. Il prônait le nationalisme autrichien et l'indépendance autrichienne vis-à-vis de l'Allemagne sur la base de la protection de l'identité religieuse catholique de l'Autriche.

Le Front patriotique a été fondé en 1933 par Engelbert Dollfuß lors d'une fusion du Parti Social-Chrétien, de la « Heimwehr » ainsi que d'autres groupes conservateurs. Il était destiné à recueillir tous les « Autrichiens fidèles » sous la même bannière. Après l'interdiction de tous les autres partis politiques lors de la guerre civile autrichienne, le Front patriotique a tenu une position de monopole dans l'échiquier politique autrichien avec des sympathisants à la fois civils et militaires.

En dépit des efforts de Dollfuß, le Front patriotique n'est jamais devenu un mouvement de masse. À la fin de 1937, il comptait 3 millions de membres (sur une population totale de 6,5 millions d'habitants) et ne pouvait pas ainsi gagner l'appui de ses adversaires politiques (les cercles du Parti Social-Démocrate d'Autriche et du Parti nazi).

Le Parti a été interdit après l'« Anschluss » (annexion de l'Autriche par l'Allemagne), en mars 1938.

Austrofascism (German : « Austrofaschismus ») was the authoritarian rule installed in Austria with the May Constitution of 1934, which ceased with the annexation of the newly-founded Federal State of Austria into Nazi Germany, in 1938. It was based on a ruling Party, the Fatherland Front (« Vaterländische Front ») and the « Heimwehr » (Home Guard) para-military militia. Leaders were Engelbert Dollfuß and, after Dollfuß's assassination, Kurt Schuschnigg, who were previously politicians of the Christian-Social Party, which was quickly integrated into the new movement.

The Austrofascist movement's origin lies in the Korneuburg Oath, a declaration released by the Christian-Social para-military organization « Heimwehr », on 18 May 1930. The declaration condemned both « Marxist class struggle » and « Liberal-capitalistic economical structures » and also explicitly rejected « the Western democratic parliamentary system and the multi-Party State ».

The declaration was directed mainly at the Social-Democratic opposition, largely in response to the Linz Program of 1926, and was not only taken by the « Heimwehr » but also by many Christian-Social politicians, setting Austria on a course to an authoritarian system.

Ideologically, Austrofascism was partly based on a fusion of Italian Fascism, as expounded by Giovanni Gentile, and Austria's Political Catholicism.

The election in Vienna, in 1932, made it likely that the coalition of the Christian-Social Party, the « Landbund » , and the « Heimwehr » would lose their majority in the national parliament, depriving the Dollfuß government of its parliamentary basis. To prevent its loss of power, the government sought to replace Austrian democracy with an authoritarian system. These efforts were supported from abroad by Benito Mussolini.

The opportunity for such a transition arrived on 4 March 1933 when the national parliament was paralysed by procedural disputes. Dollfuß held a 1 vote majority in parliament. During a dispute over a voting recount, the speaker and vice-speakers of parliament resigned in order to be able to cast their votes and, in the absence of the 3 speakers, there existed no procedural means to reconvene Parliament. Dollfuß branded this as the « self-elimination of the Parliament » and proceeded to rule on the basis of the War-time Economy Authority Law. This law had been passed in 1917, during World War I, to enable the government to issue decrees ensuring the supply of necessities. The law had never been explicitly revoked and was now used by the Dollfuß government to inaugurate an authoritarian State.

On 7 March 1933, the Council of Ministers issued a ban on assembly and protests. Press regulations were also levied by the War-time Economy Authority Law and touted as economic safe-guards. The law allowed for the government to require approval of a newspaper which had already been printed-up to 2 hours before its distribution under certain circumstances, for instance if « through damage to patriotic, religious or moral sensibility, a danger to public peace, order and security » would arise. This allowed for censorship of the press, but the government was eager to avoid the appearance of open censorship, which was forbidden by the constitution. The opposition made a final attempt to reverse the changes in parliament, which was met by police power, on 15 March 1933. As « Großdeutsche » , who advocated a merger with Germany, and Social-Democrats arrived at the Parliament building, the government sent 200 detectives to the Parliament to prevent the representatives from taking their places in the assembly hall.

On 31 March, the government dissolved the Republican « Schutzbund » . On 10 April 1933, the « Glöckel-Erlass » , authored by former Social-Democratic Education Minister, Otto Glöckel, was abolished ; the new law made participation in Catholic lessons in schools mandatory. On 10 May, all federal, State and local elections were cancelled. The Communist Party of Austria was dissolved, on 26 May ; the National-Socialist Workers' Party (NSDAP) , on 19 June ; and the Free Thinkers Guild, on 20 June.

The Hotel Schiff, an asylum of the Social-Democrats in Linz, was raided by the police, in February 1934. The Social-Democrats resisted, leading to the Austrian Civil War, which was quelled with military and para-military force. Afterward, the Social-Democratic Party was banned in Austria.

On 30 April 1934, the national parliament, in its last session, passed a law that authorised the government with all the powers previously held by parliament.

On 1 May, Dollfuß' government proclaimed the May Constitution (« Maiverfassung ») , which diminished the term « Republic » and, instead, used as the official name of the State « Federal State of Austria » (« Bundesstaat Österreich ») , though the constitution actually reduced the individual States' autonomy. The Federal Council was retained, though only as a significantly limited check on the Federal government. Rather than establishing the composition of a 59 member National Council through direct suffrage, this was accomplished by 4 « Councils » representing the professionals from Austrian Culture, State affairs, the States of Austria (« Länder ») and Economic affairs (the latter elected by 7 corporations supposedly representing workers and employers) . The National Council lost its power to initiate legislation but was still expected to approve decrees from the government. All essential power lay with the Federal Chancellor (« Bundeskanzler ») , who appointed his government single-handedly, and the Federal President (« Bundespräsident ») , who named the Chancellor.

As with Antonio de Salazar's 1933 constitution (and the « Estado Novo » regime in whole) , the « Maiverfassung » promoted a Catholic corporatism which bore a strong resemblance to the principles outlined in « Quadragesimo anno » , rejecting capitalism and socialism.

Chancellor Dollfuß was killed in July 1934, during an attempt by Austria's National-Socialist Party to topple the regime and proclaim a Nazi government under Ambassador to Rome, Anton Rintelen. The assassination of Dollfuß was accompanied by Nazi uprisings in many regions in Austria, resulting in further deaths. In Carinthia, a large contingent of northern German Nazis tried to grab power but were subdued by the loyalist « Heimwehr » units. The Nazi assassins holding the Federal Chancellery Vienna surrendered after threats to dynamite the building and were executed before the end of July. While « Heimwehr » leader Starhemberg briefly assumed power as vice-Chancellor, Kurt Schuschnigg was appointed Dollfuß' successor by President Miklas, on 29 July, ousting Starhemberg from the government completely in 1936, before surrendering to Nazi pressure in March 1938.

One of the reasons for the failure of the « Putsch » was Italian intervention : Benito Mussolini assembled an army corps of 4 divisions on the Austrian border and threatened Hitler with a War with Italy in the event of a German invasion of Austria as originally planned, should the coup have been more successful. Support for the Nazi movement in Austria was surpassed only by that in Germany, allegedly amounting to 75 % in some areas.

After the parliament was dissolved, the government also dissolved the Constitutional Court (« Verfassungsgerichtshof ») . The 4 Christian-Social members of the Constitutional Court had resigned, and the government banned the nomination of new judges, effectively closing the court.

In September 1933, the government established internment camps for political opposition members. Social-Democrats, Socialists, Communists, and Anarchists were all considered dissidents condemned to internment. After the « July “ Putsch ” » of 1934, National-Socialists were also regularly interned. On 11 November 1933, the government re-instated the death penalty for the crimes of murder, arson, and « public violence through malicious damage to others' property » . In February 1934, rioting (« Aufruhr ») was added to the list of capital offenses. Judges were instructed that, if they did not pass down a death penalty verdict within 3 days, they would be removed from the case and it would be brought to a jury trial.

John Gunther wrote in 1936 that the State « assaulted the rights of citizens in a fantastic manner », noting that, in 1934, the police raided 106,000 homes in Vienna and made 38,141 arrests of Nazis, Social-Democrats, and Communists. He added, however :

« But (and it was an important “ but ”) the terror never reached anything like the repressive force of the Nazi terror. Most of those arrested promptly got-out of jail again. Even at its most extreme phase, it was difficult to take the Schuschnigg dictatorship completely seriously. This was because of Austrian gentleness, Austrian genius for compromise, Austrian love for cloudy legal abstractions, and Austrian “ Schlamperei ”. »

By 1933, a series of laws had already been passed to bring the educational system in Austria into line with Austrofascism. The Catholic Church was, under the new government, able to exert significant influence on educational policy, which had previously been secularised. In order to pass the « Matura » (the test required for graduation) , a student had to have taken religious education classes. Educational opportunities for women were significantly limited under the new regime.

Post-secondary education was also targeted by the new regime. The number of professors and assistants fell as the government produced legal grounds for deposing those who were critical of the new regime. Disciplinary actions, previously the responsibility of individual Universities, were relegated to the government. Only members of the Fatherland Front were allowed to become University officials.

By 1930, foreign trade to and from Austria moved away from a free-market system and became an extension of the autocratic government. Chief among the changes was the closing of the Austrian market to foreign trade in response to the New York stock exchange crisis, in 1929.

Unemployment grew drastically, by over 25 % between 1932 and 1933. In response, the government removed unemployment benefits from the national budget. Additionally, the government created the so-called « Cooperations » of workers and enterprisers charged with undermining workers' movements. International trade was restricted and eventually banned.

The official cultural policy of the Austrofascist government was the affirmation of the Baroque and other « pre-revolutionary » styles. The government encouraged a cultural mindset reminiscent of the times before the French Revolution. This recalled images of the « Threat from the East » (the invasion of Europe by the Ottoman Turks) which were then projected onto the Soviet Union. In this way, the government warned its people against what it called « cultural Bolshevism » , a force which it claimed posed a great threat to Austria.

The ideology of the « community of the people » (« Volksgemeinschaft ») was different from that of the National-Socialists. They were similar in that both served to attack the idea of a class struggle by accusing leftism of destroying individuality and, thus, help usher in a totalitarian State. Dolfuß claimed he wanted to « over-Hitler » (« überhitlern ») National-Socialism.

Austrofascism, however, focused on the history of Austria. The Catholic Church played a large role in the Austrofascist definition of Austrian history and identity, which served to alienate German culture. According to this philosophy, Austrians were « better Germans » (by this time, the majority of the German population was Protestant) and that Austria was a 2nd German State but the « better German State ». The monarchy was elevated to the ideal of a powerful and far-reaching State, a status which Austria lost after the Treaty of Saint-Germain.

There was no official policy of Antisemitism between 1933 and 1938. Public violence against Jews was rare. As the Austrofascist State saw itself under the growing pressure by Nazi Germany which penalized its citizens who travelled to Austria with a 1000 Mark fee, and even more so after the failed Nazi coup against the Austrian government in July 1934, many Jews supported the regime. Austrofascist officials supported the Salzburg Festival which employed famous Jewish artists like Herbert Graf, Alexander Moissi, Max Reinhardt, Richard Tauber, Margarete Wallmann, and Bruno Walter. Walter also was a leading-conductor for the Vienna State Opera until 1938, and conducted several concerts given by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Therefore, the Festival was harshly criticized by German officials and boycotted by German artists like Richard Strauß, Wilhelm Furtwängler, and Clemens Krauß. The Festival also came under attack by Austrian anti-Semites and exponents of Right-wing Parties.

Many Jews fled Germany and found a temporary refuge in Austria. Artists like film-maker Henry Koster and producer Joe Pasternak could not work in Germany any longer and continued to produce films in Austria. Vienna's « Theater in der Josefstadt » provided many Jewish actors, playwrights and directors with the opportunity to continue their work, among them Reinhardt, Albert Bassermann, Egon Friedell, Hans Jaray, Otto Preminger (the theatre's managing director until 1935) , Ernst Lothar (managing director until 1938) , and Franz Werfel. Jewish athletes made the « SC Hakoah Wien » one of the most successful athletic clubs in Austria before 1938. Its athletes excelled on many occasions throughout Europe.

Yet, there was a purge of public offices, and many Jews were fired from their posts on the accusations that they were Communist or Social-Democratic sympathizers. There were occasional outbursts of Antisemitism in Right-wing newspapers. However, Jews continued to be an integral part of Austrian society until March 1938. But some of them lost their hopes for a fruitful future and left Austria before 1938, especially following the « Juliabkommen 1936 » , between Austria and Germany, which provided an amnesty for illegal Nazis. Among the most prominent Jews who left Austria before 1938 were Stefan Zweig and Otto Preminger.

The regime lasted as long as the favour of Fascist Italy under Mussolini protected it against the expansionist aims of Nazi Germany. However, when Mussolini sought to end Italy's own increasing international isolation by forming an alliance with Hitler, in 1938, Austria was left alone to face increasing German pressure.

To protect Austria's independence, Schuschnigg reached an agreement with Hitler under which 17,000 Austrian Nazis received amnesty and were integrated into the fold of the Fatherland Front. Arthur Seyß-Inquart, the leader of the Austrian Nazis, was appointed Minister of the Interior and Security. As Nazi pressure continued, now supported from within the government, Schuschnigg tried to rally popular support for Austria's independence by a referendum. Hitler reacted by alleging an attempt at a fraudulent vote and demanded that Schuschnigg should hand-over the government to the Austrian Nazis or face invasion. Schuschnigg, unable to find support in France or Great Britain, resigned to avoid bloodshed. After an interlude, in which Nazis had gained control of Vienna, President Miklas, who had at first refused, appointed Seyß-Inquart Chancellor, who then requested military occupation by the German army. The next day, Hitler entered Austria and declared it a part of the German « Reich », which was subsequently formalized on March 15.

Although the term « Austrofascism » was used by the proponents of the regime itself, it is still disputed today. It is predominantly used by Left-wing historians, while most historians prefer the term « Ständestaat ». On a political level, criticism sometimes comes from representatives of the Austrian People's Party (ÖVP ; the post-World War II successors of the Christian-Social Party) , some of whom do not distance themselves from the authoritarian Austrian regime of the Patriotic Front. They usually stress the Austro-fascists' merits in fighting for Austria's independence and against Nazism.

While it is undisputed that the regime was an authoritarian dictatorship in character (it locked away members of the opposition, mostly Nazis, Communists and Social-Democrats, in concentration camps called « Anhaltelager » or imprisonment centers) , some historians argue that it lacked certain characteristics of true Fascism. Although the Fatherland Front used fascist-like symbols (such as the « Kruckenkreuz ») and was meant to be a Party of the masses, it lacked a solid basis in the population, especially among labourers who tended to support the Communists or the Nazis. The Austrian government also did not target minorities or engage in any sort of expansionism.

According to some historians, Austrofascism was a contrived and desperate attempt to « out-Hitler » (« überhitlern ») the Nazis, a term used by Dollfuß himself. They argue that Dollfuß was interested in a renaissance of Catholicism rather than in a totalitarian State, meaning that he wanted to return to the time before the ideas of the French Revolution of 1789 took hold. Ernst Hanisch, for example, speaks of semi-Fascism. Some parallels to Spain, under Francisco Franco, cannot be over-looked, however. Austrofascism is sometimes also called imitation Fascism.

The « Vaterländische Front » (VF : « Fatherland Front » , also translated as « Patriotic Front ») was the ruling political organisation of « Austrofascism » . It claimed to be a non-partisan movement, and aimed to unite all the people of Austria, overcoming political and social divisions. Established, on 20 May 1933, by Christian-Social Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuß as a single-Party along the lines of Italian Fascism, it advocated Austrian nationalism and independence from Nazi Germany on the basis of protecting Austria's Catholic religious identity from what they considered a Protestant-dominated German State.

Dollfuß accepted that Austrians were ethnic Germans but rejected the idea of Catholic Austrians submitting themselves to be taken-over by a Protestant-dominated Germany and, instead, claimed that Austria needed to revive itself and recognize the greatness of its history such as its Habsburg dynasty having been the leading part of the German Holy Roman Empire, and that when Austria restored itself, it would found a federal State of Germany that would recognize Germany as a « Kulturnation » , but would also recognize Austria as having a privileged place within such a federal State.

The Fatherland Front which was strongly linked with Austria's Catholic clergy, absorbed Dollfuß's Christian-Social Party, the agrarian « Landbund » and the Right-wing para-military « Heimwehren » , all of which were opposed to socialism, free-market capitalism and Liberal democracy. It established an authoritarian and corporatist regime, the Federal State of Austria, which is commonly known in German as the « Ständestaat » (Corporate State) . According to the Fatherland Front, this form of government and society implemented the social teaching of Pope Pius XI's 1931 Encyclical « Quadragesimo anno » . The Front banned and persecuted all its political opponents, including Communists, Social-Democrats (who fought against it in a brief Civil War, in February 1934) but also the Austrian Nazis who wanted Austria to join Hitler's Greater German Empire. Chancellor Dollfuß was assassinated by the Nazis, in July 1934. He was succeeded as leader of the « Vaterländische Front » and Chancellor of Austria by Kurt Schuschnigg, who ruled until the invigorated Nazis forced him to resign, on 11 March 1938. Austria was annexed by Nazi Germany, the next day.

The Fatherland Front maintained a cultural and recreational organisation, called « New Life » (« Neues Leben ») , similar to Germany's Strength Through Joy (« KdF ») .

The role of the Fatherland Front has been a contentious point in post-War Austrian historiography. While Left-wing historians consider it to be the exponent of an Austrian and Catholic-clerical variant of Fascism and make it responsible for the failure of democracy in Austria, conservative authors stress its credits in defending the country's independence and opposition to Nazism.

While the Front's aim was to unite all Austrians, superseding all political parties, social and economic interest groups (including trade-unions) , it only enjoyed the support of certain parts of the society. It was mainly backed by the Catholic church, the Austrian bureaucracy and military, most of the rural population (including both land-owners and peasants with its centre of gravity in western Austria) , some loyalists to the Habsburg dynasty, and a significant part of the large Jewish community of Vienna. The « Vaterländische Front » was strongly linked with the Catholic student fraternities of the « Cartell-Verband » that maintained networks similar to old boys in English-speaking countries - in which most « Vaterländische Front » leaders had been members.

In contrast, it was in a 2 fronts conflict with the Social-Democrats, supported by unionized workers and having its stronghold in the capital Vienna and other industrialised towns, and their para-military « Republikanischer Schutzbund » (Republican Protection League) - whose February 1934 uprising (or Austrian Civil War) was crushed in a few days - on the one, and Austrian Nazis on the other hand. The latter, having taken-over Austria's older pan-German nationalist current, were supported by a part of the secular, urban middle- and lower middle-class, including civil servants and public sector workers, professionals, teachers and students. However, they did not have a mass following as in Germany.

After World War I and the dissolution of Austria-Hungary sealed by the 1919 Treaty of Saint-Germain, 3 political camps controlled the fate of the Austrian 1st Republic : the Social-Democrats, the Christian-Social Party, and the German nationalists, organized in the Greater German People's Party and the « Landbund ». Since 1921, the Christian-Social Party had formed coalition governments along with the German nationalists ; Chancellor Ignaz Seipel, a proponent of Catholic social teaching, advocated the idea of a « corporated » State surmounting the parliamentary system, based on the encyclicals « Rerum novarum » (1891) by Pope Leo XIII and « Quadragesimo anno » (1931) by Pope Pius XI.

On 10 May 1932, the Christian-Social politician Engelbert Dollfuß was designated Chancellor of Austria by President Wilhelm Miklas. Dollfuß formed another Right-wing government together with the « Landbund » and the « Heimatblock », the political organisation of the para-military « Heimwehr » forces. He began to surpass the slim majority of his government in parliament ruling by emergency decrees and, on 15 March 1933, finally prevented the gathering of the National Council. 2 months later, the « Fatherland Front » was founded by Chancellor Dollfuß as a merger of his Christian-Social Party, the « Heimwehr » forces and other Right-wing groups, and was intended to collect all « loyal Austrians » under one banner.

On 30 May 1933, the government banned the « Republikanischer Schutzbund », the para-military troops of the Social-Democratic Party, the Communist Party and the Austrian Nazi Party were prohibited shortly afterwards. From 12 February 1934 onwards, the remaining « Schutzbund » forces revolted against their disbanding, sparking the Austrian Civil War against « Heimwehr » troops and the Austrian Armed Forces. After the suppression, the Social-Democratic Party too was declared illegal and dissolved. Social-Democratic officials like the Vienna mayor Karl Seitz were deposed and replaced by « Vaterländische Front » politicians.

On May 1, the Federal State of Austria was officially declared a single-Party State under the authoritarian leadership of the « Vaterländische Front ». Thereafter, the organisation held a monopolistic position in Austrian politics with both civilian and military divisions. Dollfuß remained its undisputed leader until his assassination during the Nazi « July “ Putsch ” », on 25 July 1934. He was succeeded by Ernst Rüdiger Starhemberg, while his « Vaterländische Front » fellow Justice Minister, Kurt Schuschnigg, became Chancellor.

In 1936, Schuschnigg also took-over the leadership of the « Vaterländische Front ». The Front was officially declared a corporation under public law and the only legal political organisation in Austria. Its symbol was the crutch cross (« Kruckenkreuz »), and its official greeting was « Front heil ! ». The Party flag was adopted as the 2nd State flag of Austria. Though membership was obligatory for officials, the « Vaterländische Front » never became a mass movement. By the end of 1937, it had 3 million members (with 6.5 million inhabitants of Austria) ; it could, however, never win the support of its political opponents, neither from the circles of the Social-Democrats nor from the Austrian Nazis.

Schuschnigg's government had to face the increasing pressure by its powerful neighbour Nazi Germany under Austrian-born, Adolf Hitler. The State's fate was sealed, when the Italian dictator Benito Mussolini approached towards the German Nazis. To ease tensions, Schuschnigg, on 11 July 1936, concluded an agreement, whereafter several conspirators of the 1934 « July “ Putsch ” » were released from prison. Nazi confidants like Edmund Glaise-Horstenau and Guido Schmidt joined Schuschnigg's cabinet, while Arthur Seyß-Inquart attained the office of a State Councillor, though the Austrian Nazi Party remained illegal.

On 12 February 1938, Hitler summoned Schuschnigg to his « Berghof » residence, constraining the re-admission of the Nazi Party and the replacement of the Austrian chief of staff, Alfred Jansa, by Franz Böhme to pave the way for a « Wehrmacht invasion ». Schuschnigg had to appoint Seyß-Inquart Minister of the Interior, encouraging the political activation of the Austrian Nazis. When the Chancellor announced a referendum on Austrian independence, he was finally forced to resign, on March 11, and succeeded by Seyß-Inquart. The Fatherland Front was immediately banned after the « Anschluß » annexation of Austria to Germany, 2 days later.

L'Autriche sous le national-socialisme

For a long period of the Middle-Ages, much of Upper-Austria belonged to the Duchy of Styria. In the mid- 13th Century, it became known as the Principality above the Enns River, this name being 1st recorded in 1264. (At the time, the term « Upper-Austria » also included Tyrol and various scattered Habsburg possessions in South Germany.)

In 1490, the area was given a measure of independence within the Holy Roman Empire, with the status of a principality. By 1550, there was a Protestant majority. In 1564, Upper-Austria, together with Lower-Austria and the Bohemian territories, fell under Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian II.

At the start of the 17th Century, the Counter-Reformation was instituted under Emperor Rudolf II and his successor Matthias. After a military campaign, the area was under the control of Bavaria for some years in the early 17th Century.

The Innviertel was ceded from the Duchy of Bavaria to Upper-Austria in the Treaty of Teschen, in 1779. During the Napoleonic Wars, Upper-Austria was occupied by the French army on more than one occasion.

In 1918, after the collapse of Austria-Hungary, the name « Oberösterreich » was used to describe the province of the new Austria. After Austria was annexed by Adolf Hitler, the Nazi dictator who had been born in the Upper-Austrian town of Braunau am Inn and raised in Upper-Austria, Upper-Austria became « Reichsgau Oberdonau », although this also included the southern part of the Sudetenland, annexed from Czechoslovakia, and a small part of Styria.

« What was actually illicit about a project that was designed to turn the city of his youth into a cultural metropolis. » (Albert Speer)

The region of Upper-Austria, also referred to as the « Reichsgau Oberdonau », anticipated that an era of National-Socialism, and its cultural political policies, would improve and develop the area's status and significance. As the « Führer's home-town », one would believe to have overcome an image of « provinciality » in Linz and Upper-Austria and expect significant development and expansion. Hence, the region began to boast itself as a « homeland », particularly in a culturally political context. The expectations of people living in the region hardly corresponded to the « Führer »'s actual plans and those of the National-Socialistic State.

The cultural political plans for Linz included numerous cultural institutions (such as Museums, an Opera House), however in reality, none of these plans were ever materialized. Moreover, Munich had already been designated as the cultural center of the 3rd « Reich ». Hitler's personal interest in Linz was mostly only in his mind's eye; an idea that revolved more around a sense of a « home-town myth » rather than in achievable terms. Although the National-Socialist art policies (which embodied the racist and ideological criteria of Nazi cultural politics) were implemented by the National-Socialists, they hardly led to fractures in artwork and biography among the resident artists in Linz and Upper-Austria and more importantly, this occurred to a lesser degree than elsewhere. Before 1938, the « modern era », as well as works by few Jewish artists, was rarely discernible in Upper-Austria. Aside from a few documented exceptions, there was no ban on writing, painting or performing arts. This allowed for an exceedingly high-degree of continuity that was practiced before 1938 as well as, in the period after 1945, not only in the area of arts, but also in the policies of cultural politics.

In 1945, Upper-Austria was partitioned between the American zone to the south and the Soviet zone to the north.

Although only a handful of planned National-Socialist projects were built, we continue to see a large legacy of relics from the period throughout Linz and Upper-Austria today - not only as a mind set among city inhabitants but also on a factual level. At select locations, remnants from the period of National-Socialism will be made more visible to the public.

The Linz Economy under National-Socialism

General survey of the economic development in Linz and Upper-Austria during the NS-regime. Far-reaching changes to eliminate mass unemployment; the short period of a peace economy already oriented towards War production (1938-1939), especially the founding of big industrial concerns (the Göring Iron and Steel works and the Nitrogen works); the basic problems created by the ensuing period of a War-time economy with significant peacetime features (1939-1941); and, finally, the period of « Total War » (1942-1945).

In Linz, as elsewhere in Austria, the world-wide economic crisis, coupled with the short-sighted political and economic forces of inertia led to a profound crisis of transformation, culminating in a semi-Fascist « Ständestaat ». An ever-larger growing segment of the Austrian population expected the solution of the crisis from National-Socialism since the unlucky and unloved « Ständestaat » was obviously unable to do the job. After the « Anschluß », Austria was immediately incorporated into the 4 Year Plan.

From the beginning, armament dominated the « Ostmark » economy. By 1940, disillusionment set in among small business owners, since the NS-regime did not give the expected priority to the long-standing protectionist demands of the « old Mittelstand » where they conflicted with the interests of big business. The defeats of the German army at Moscow and Stalingrad led to further measures inimical to small business, such as forced closing or « combing-out » of shops, increased drafting into the armed forces and conscription into War industries, and the flood of foreign workers.

The consequence of the predominance of armament and heavy industry for Linz and Upper-Austria was a structural change in the economy, whose « winners » were the capital-intensive industries at the cost of small and middle-sized businesses not essential for the War effort.

The author also deals with the denazification of the Linz and Upper-Austrian economy. The cleaning of the economy was hindered by the generally-held assumption that an all-too-rigorous denazification would rob the country of the larger part of its economic elites and, thereby, adversely affect economic reconstruction. Thus, the temporary partial reduction in status of National-Socialists was soon followed by a period of re-integration in which the stark pragmatism of the Austrian political Parties, interest groups and the Catholic Church, in a veritable outburst of « mercy lobbying », resulted in the return of the now « ex-National-Socialists » .

The public authorities of the provincial governor of Oberdonau

This contribution investigates the development of the organs of State administration in Upper-Austria during the time of the Nazi tyranny, in other words, the « Reichsgau Oberdonau » , the districts and local authorities.

The « Reichsgaue » (regions) of the Ostmark were instituted in 1940 by the Ostmark Bill. They formed the middle-level of the State administration of the « Reich » , were self-governing bodies, and are to be seen in the context of the reform of the « Reich » of 1933. These regions had no sovereign rights, however, although the responsibility of fulfilling certain sovereign duties was transferred to them. The governor at the head of a « Reichsgau » was the « Gauleiter » of the local Party of the NSDAP.

In December 1939, in an effort to reform the lowest-level of State governance, an order was sent-out regarding the administration of the districts, which was to define the duties and responsibilities of the District Councils and Regional District Leaders. This enjoyed only partial success, however. In the Nazi era, it was only with the Order for German Local Authorities that the local authorities were standardised across the « Reich » . This order regulated all the concerns of the local authorities and, above all, secured the influence of the NSDAP on local life.

A « Reichsgau » (plural « Reichsgaue ») was an administrative sub-division created in a number of the areas annexed to Nazi Germany, between 1938 and 1945.

The term was formed from the words « Reich » and « Gau » , the latter a deliberately medieval-sounding word with a meaning approximately equivalent to « shire » . The « Reichsgaue » were an attempt to resolve the administrative chaos resulting from the mutually overlapping jurisdictions and different boundaries of the NSDAP Party « Gau » , placed under a Party « Gauleiter » , and the Federal States, under a « Reichsstatthalter » responsible to the Ministry of the Interior (in the Prussian provinces, the equivalent post was that of « Oberpräsident ») . Interior Minister Wilhelm Frick had long desired to streamline the German administration, and the « Reichsgaue » were the result : Party « Gau » and State administrative borders were to be identical, and the Party « Gauleiter » also occupied the post of « Reichsstatthalter » . Rival interests and the influence the « Gauleiters » wielded with Adolf Hitler prevented any reform from being undertaken in the « Old Reich » itself, and the « Reichsgau » scheme was, therefore, implemented only in newly acquired territories.

There were several « Reichsgaue » :

« Ostmark » , formed from the formerly independent Austria.

« Sudetenland » , formed from the substantial part of the German-speaking areas of the former Czechoslovakia, occupied in 1938.

« Danzig-Westpreußen » and « Wartheland » , formed from the Free City of Danzig and areas annexed from Poland.

The « Ostmark » was subsequently sub-divided into 7 smaller « Reichsgaue » , generally coterminous with the former Austrian « Länder » (States) .

Austria in the time of National-Socialism describes the period of Austrian history from March 12, 1938 when Austria was annexed by the German 3rd « Reich » (an event commonly known as « Anschluß ») until the end of World War II in spring 1945.

In 1918, at the end of World War I, with the break-up of the multi-ethnic Austro-Hungarian Empire, and with the abolition of the Habsburg monarchy, there were 3 major political groups competing with one another in the young republic of Austria : the Social-Democratic Party of Austria (SDAP) ; Christian-Social Party (CS) ; and the nationalist Great German Union (« Großdeutsche Vereinigung ») , which became the Greater German People's Party (« Großdeutsche Volkspartei » , or GVP) , in 1920. At the time, smaller Parties such as the Communist Party of Austria (« Kommunistische Partei Österreichs » , or KPÖ) and the Austrian National-Socialists (« Deutsche Nationalsozialistische Arbeiterpartei » , or DNSAP) were neither present in the « Reichsrat » (Imperial Council) nor the « Nationalrat » (National Council) .

SDAP, GVP, and DNSAP were clearly, although for different reasons, in favour a union of German Austria with the German State, which was also a Republic by that time (Weimar Republic) . The Christian-Social Party also tended to favour the union, but differed at first on a different subject - they were split on the idea of continuing the monarchy instead of a Republic. Whereas only the Communist Party of Austria decidedly spoke against the annexation in the course of the 1920's and 1930's, the monarchists originally spoke-up against the annexation and, later, turned to favour it, after the Bavarian Soviet Republic had failed, and Germany had a Conservative government. The Treaty of Saint-Germain, signed on September 10, 1919 by Karl Renner (SDAP), 1st Chancellor of the Republic, clearly forbade any union with Germany, abolished the monarchy, and clearly stated the Republic of Austria as an independent country.

Life and politics in the early years of the 1st Republic were marked by serious economic problems (the loss of industrial areas and natural resources in the now independent Czechoslovakia, hyper-inflation) and a constantly increasing tension between the different political groups. From 1918 to 1920, the government was led by the Social-Democratic Party and, later, by the Christian-Social Party in coalition with the German nationalists.

On May 31, 1922, prelate Ignaz Seipel became Chancellor of the Christian-Social government. He succeeded in improving the economic situation with the financial help of the League of Nations (monetary reform). Ideologically, Seipel was clearly anti-Communist and did everything in his power to reduce, as far as possible, the influence of the Social-Democrats - both sides saw this as a conflict between 2 social classes.

The military of Austria was restricted to 30,000 men by the allies and the police force was poorly equipped. Already by 1918, the 1st homeguards were established like the « Kärntner Abwehrkampf ». In 1920, in Tirol, the 1st « Heimwehr » was put in duty under the command of Richard Steidle with the help of the Bavarian organisation « Escherich ». Soon, other States followed. In 1923, members of the Monarchist « Ostara » shot a worker dead and the Social-Democrats founded their own protective organization. Other para-military groups were formed from former active soldiers and members of the Roman Catholic Church. The « Vaterländische Schutzbund » (Protectors of the Fatherland) were National-Socialists though their swastikas were, at 1st, not taken seriously. Later, they started the Austrian « SA ».

The « German Workers Party » had already been founded in Bohemia, as early as 1903. It was, then, part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It supported German nationalism and anti-clericalism but, at 1st, was not particularly anti-Semitic. This Party stood mainly for making Austria and the Austrian Germans a part of Germany. In 1909, lawyer, Walter Riehl joined the Party and he became leader, in 1918. Soon after that, the name was changed to the German National-Socialist Workers Party. After the fall of the monarchy, the Party split into a Czechoslovakian Party and an Austrian Party under Riehl. From 1920 onwards, this Austrian Party cooperated closely with the German Workers Party or German National-Socialist Workers Party formed in Munich, which Adolf Hitler led after 1921. In 1923, Riehl's Party had about 23,000 members and was a marginal factor in Austrian politics. In 1924, there was another split and Karl Schulz led a splinter group. The 2 opposed each other. In 1926, Richard Suchenwirth founded the Austrian branch of Hitler's German National-Socialist Party, in Vienna. Around that time, Benito Mussolini formed his Fascist dictatorship in Italy and became an important ally of the Far-Right.

The Austrian National-Socialists linked to Hitler (Nazis) got only 779 votes in the 1927 General Election. The strongest grouping besides the Social-Democrats was the Unity Coalition led by the Christian-Social Party but including German Nationalists and the groups of Riehl and Schulz. In the course of these years, there were frequent serious acts of violence between the various armed factions and people were regularly killed. In the General Election of 1930, the Social-Democrats were the largest single Party. The Christian-Social Party came 2nd but stayed in office in a coalition with smaller Parties. The Austrian National-Socialists linked to Hitler (Nazis) got only 3.6 % of the votes and failed to enter Parliament. In the following years, the Nazis gained votes at the expense of the various German national groups which also wanted unity with Germany. After 1930, Hitler's Party doubled its membership every year because of the economic crisis. One of their slogans was, « 500,000 Unemployed - 400,000 Jews - Simple way out ; vote National-Socialist » .

The Christian-Social Party had ruled from 1932 and Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuß had led them from 1932. The Social-Democrats were no longer their only threat. The previous chancellor and priest, Ignaz Seipel, had worked towards an authoritarian State. Seipel based this on the Papal « Encyclicals » , « Rerum novarum » (1891) and « Quadragesimo anno » (1931) . Abolition of the parliamentary system was necessary for this. A crisis in the Austrian parliament on the May 4, 1933, gave Dollfuß the opportunity he wanted.

Later in May 1933, the Christian-Social Union was converted to the Patriotic Front. The Patriotic Front was a political organisation, supposedly above partisan considerations, Roman Catholic and vehemently anti-Marxist. It purported to represent all Austrians who were true to their native land. Within a week the Austrian Communist Party was banned, and, before the end of the month, the Republican para-military organisation and Freethinkers Organisations were banned along with numerous other groups. Nazis failed to get more than 25 % of the votes in local elections in most areas. In Zwettl and Innsbruck, however, they got more than 40 %, and they tried to lever this into a basis for agitation against the ruling Patriotic Front. Nazi supporters generated a wave of terrorism which crested in early June with 4 deaths and 48 people injured.

In Germany, Adolf Hitler became Chancellor early in 1933. The Social-Democrats deleted any intention to cooperate with Germany from its Party programme. Nazis had fled to Bavaria after their Party was banned in Austria and founded there the Austrian Legion. The Nazis, there, had military style camps and military training. Nazi terrorists in Austria received financial, logistic and material support from Germany. The German Government subjected Austria to systematic agitation. After the expulsion of the Bavarian Minister of Justice, in May 1933, German citizens were required to pay a thousand marks to the German Government before travelling to Austria. The Austrian Nazi Party was banned in June after a hand grenade attack in Krems. Nazi terrorism abated after that though 5 more people were killed and 52 injured by the end of the year.

On February 12, 1934, there was a violent confrontation in Linz with serious consequences. Members of a para-military group acting to assist the police wanted to enter a building belonging to the Social-Democrats or a Party member's home. They wanted to find any weapons belonging to the Social-Democrat para-military which had, by then, been banned. Violence spread to the whole country and developed into civil war. The police and their para-military supporters together with the army won the confrontation by the February 14. There were many arrests. Constitutional Courts were abolished, trade-unions and the Social-Democrat Party were banned, and the death penalty was re-introduced. After political opposition had been suppressed the Austrian Republic was transformed into the Austro-facist « Ständestaat » . The authoritarian « Maiverfassung » (May Constitution) was proclaimed on May 1st. (May 1st was traditionally an important day for Austrians, especially Viennese, Social-Democrats. Choosing this day must have been seen as a deliberate humiliation.)

From the start of 1934, there was a new wave of Nazi terrorist attacks in Austria. This time, government institutions were targeted far more than individuals. In the 1st half of 1934, 17 people were killed and 171 injured. On July 25, the Nazis attempted a coup under the leadership of the Austrian « SS ». About 150 « SS » personnel forced their way into the Chancellor's office in Vienna. Dollfuß was shot and died a few hours later from his wounds. Another group occupied the building of the Austrian National Radio and forced a statement that the Government of Dollfuß had fallen and Anton Rintelen was the new head of government. Anton Rintelen belonged to the Christian-Social Party but is suspected of Nazi sympathy. This false report was intended to start a Nazi uprising throughout the country but it was only partially successful.

There was considerable fighting in parts of Carinthia, Styria and Upper-Austria and limited resistance in Salzburg. In Carinthia and Styria, the fighting lasted from the 27th to the 30th of July. Some members of the Austrian Legion tried to push-out from Bavaria over the Mühlviertel, a part of Upper-Austria, and towards Linz. They were forced back to the frontier at Kollerschlag. On July 26, a German courier was arrested at the Kollerschlag pass in Upper-Austria. He had with him documented instructions for the revolt. This so-called Kollerschlag Document demonstrated the connection of the July revolt to Bavaria clearly.

The army, the gendarmery and the police put-down revolt with heavy casualties. On the government side, there were 107 deaths and 500 injuries. On the rebel side, there were 140 deaths and 600 injuries. 13 rebels were executed and 4,000 people were imprisoned without trial. Many thousand supporters of the Nazi Party were arrested. Up to 4,000 fled over the border to Germany and Yugoslavia. Kurt Schuschnigg became the new Chancellor.

In Bavaria, many sections of the Austrian legion were officially closed. In reality, they were only pushed further north and renamed, « North-West Assistance ». Fascist Italy was more closely tied to the regime in Vienna and sent troops to the Austrian border, at Brenner, to deter German troops from a possible invasion of Austria. The German government stated that it had nothing to do with the revolt. Germany only admitted that it was trying to subvert the Austrian political system through trusted people. They continued to support the illegal Nazi Party but sympathizers who did not belong to the Party were more significant. This included among others : Taras Borodajkewycz, Edmund Glaise-Horstenau, Franz Langoth, Walther Pembauer and Arthur Seyß-Inquart.

Italy began its conquest of Abyssinia (the 2nd Italo-Abyssinian War) , in October 1935. After that, Mussolini was internationally isolated and strengthened his relations with Hitler. The ruling Austrian Patriotic Front lost an important ally. Despite the murder of Engelbert Dollfuß, his successor Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg had to improve relations with the German government. Like his predecessor, he wanted to maintain the independence of Austria. He saw Austria as the 2nd German State and the better State as it was founded on Roman Catholicism.

In July 1936, Schuschnigg accepted the July Agreement with Germany. Imprisoned, Nazis were released and some Nazi newspapers, which had been banned, were allowed into Austria. The Nazi Party remained banned. Schuschnigg undertook further to allow 2 people whom the Nazis trusted into the Government. Edmund Glaise-Horstenau became Minister for National Affairs and Guido Schmidt became Secretary of State in the Foreign Ministry. Arthur Seyß-Inquart was taken into the legislative Council of State. Germany rescinded the requirement for a payment of 1,000 Marks for entry into Austria. The transformation of the Austro-fascist State through Nazis was furthered more in 1937 when it became possible for them to join the Patriotic Front. Throughout Austria, political units were set-up and some were led by Nazis. This was a legal disguise for the re-organization.

From 1937, it was clear to the Nazis that it would not be long before Austria was going to be part of the 3rd « Reich ». When the native Austrian-born Hitler wrote « Mein Kampf », he demanded from the 1st page in his book that : « German Austria must return to the great German motherland ». His strategy included the subjugation of Austria and Tschechien, now in the Czech Republic as stated in November 1937.

In February 1938, Franz von Papen, the German ambassador in Vienna arranged a meeting between Hitler and Schuschnigg at Obersalzberg, in Gaden (Bavaria) . Hitler threatened repeatedly to invade Austria and forced Schuschnigg to implement a range of measures favourable to Austrian Nazism. The Agreement of Gaden guaranteed the Austrian Nazi Party political freedom and assisted Arthur Seyß-Inquart in becoming Home Secretary (« Innenminister ») . Schuschnigg endeavoured to maintain Austrian national integrity despite steadily increasing German influence. On March 9, 1938, he announced that he wanted to hold a consultative referendum on the independence of Austria on the following Sunday. Hitler responded by mobilizing the 8th Army for the planned invasion. Edmund Glaise-Horstenau who was, at the time in Berlin, brought Hitler's ultimatum from there and Hermann Göring re-inforced it with a telephone message to Schuschnigg. The German government demanded the postponement or abandonment of the referendum. Schuschnigg conceded on the afternoon of March 11. Then, Hitler demanded his resignation which happened on the same evening.

After Schuschnigg left office, the Federal president Wilhelm Miklas asked Arthur Seyß-Inquart to form a new government as the Germans demanded. From 11 to 13 March, he led the Austrian Government and completed the « Anschluß » . On the morning of March 12, heavily armed German troops and police crossed the Austrian frontier, in total about 65,000. Large sections of the Austrian population were very pleased to see them. In Vienna, Aspern met Heinrich Himmler of the « SS » accompanied by many police and « SS » officials to take-over the Austrian police. Supporters of the Austrian Nazi Party, together with members of the « SS » and « SA » occupied public buildings and offices throughout Austria without a previously planned transition period. The formation of the Greater German « Reich » was announced from the balcony of the Council House, in Linz. On the following day, March 13, 1938, the 2nd session of the Government passed the « Reunification with Germany Law » . Federal President Miklas refused to endorse it and resigned. Seyß-Inquart was now functioning Head of State. He could make his own laws and publish them.

On March 15, Adolf Hitler, who had spent the previous 2 days in his birth-town of Braunau am Inn, made a triumphal entry into Vienna and gave a speech on « Heldenplatz », in front of tens of thousands of cheering people, in which he boasted of his « greatest accomplishment » :

« Als Führer und Kanzler der deutschen Nation und des Reiches melde ich vor der deutschen Geschichte nunmehr den

Eintritt meiner Heimat in das Deutsche Reich. »

(« As leader and chancellor of the German nation and « Reich » , I announce to German history now the entry of my homeland into the German “ Reich ”. »)

Ernst Kaltenbrunner from Upper-Austria, sentenced to death in 1946 at the Nuremberg trials, was promoted « SS-Brigadeführer » and the leader of the « SS » upper-section Austria. Beginning on March 12, and during the subsequent weeks, 72,000 people were arrested, primarily in Vienna, among them politicians of the 1st Republic, intellectuals and above all Jews. Jewish institutions were shuttered.

For April 10, a referendum was set for the already accomplished annexation. In those weeks leading to the referendum, a kind of propaganda took place all over Austria in a way that had been never seen before. Hitler himself, Josef Goebbels, Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß and many other leading figures of the Nazi regime had very squeamishly scheduled appearances in public to hold speeches. The controlled press and radio had no other topic than « YES » to the « Reunion of German and Austria » . Prominent Austrians like Cardinal Theodor Innitzer, who signed a declaration of the Bishops with « Heil Hitler » , and the Social-Democrat Karl Renner promoted the approval. According to official records, 99.73 % voted « YES » in Austria and in Germany ; 99.08 % voted for the annexation.

Excluded from the referendum were about 8 % of the Austrian voters : about 200,000 Jews and roughly 177,000 « Mischlinge » (people with both Jewish and « Aryan » parents) and all those who had already been arrested for « racial » or political reasons.

In many places, assaults took place against Austrian Jews during those weeks. Many were dispossessed of their shops and apartments, into which those who had robbed them moved, assisted by the « SA » and fanatics. Jews were forced to put on their best clothes and, on their hands and knees with brushes, to clean the side-walks of anti- « Anschluß » slogans.

Being 8 % of the population in the German Empire, 14 % of the « SS » members were of Austrian origin. 40 % of the staff in the Extermination camps and 70 % of Adolf Eichmann's staff came from Austria.

Josef Bürckel, previously « Reichskommissar » for the reunion of the « Saar » (protectorate) , was appointed « Reichskommissar » for the re-unification of Austria with the German Empire.

In the process of aryanisation, about 1,700 motor vehicles were seized from their Jewish owners between March 11 and August 10, 1938. Until May 1939, the government seized about 44,000 apartments in Jewish possession.

The largest concentration camp in Austria was the Mauthausen-Gusen complex, with more than 50 sub-camps, among them, the Ebensee concentration camp, « KZ - Nebenlager Bretstein » , Steyr-Münichholz sub-camp and « AFA-Werke » . Euthanasia was practised in Hartheim Castle, near Linz, where the killing program « Action T4 » took place, and in « Am Spiegelgrund » clinic in Vienna, where more than 700 handicapped children were murdered.

Besides Adolf Hitler, the following Austrians were among those playing an active part in the Nazi regime :

Ernst Kaltenbrunner replaced Reinhard Heydrich in 1943, as leader of « Reichssicherheitshauptamt » and « Gestapo » .

Arthur Seyß-Inquart organized or covered several Nazi crimes in the Netherlands.

Odilo Globocnik was « SS » and police leader from 1939 in Poland where he supervised the building of the 4 Nazi extermination camps in Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka and Majdanek. He was one of the main people responsible for murdering about 2 millions of Polish Jews (« Aktion Reinhardt ») .

August Eigruber, « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria.

Alexander Löhr, commander of « Luftflotte 4 » , carried-out the bombing of Belgrade in April 1941.

Wolfgang Abel, professor of racial biology at the University of Berlin, was involved in compulsory sterilization of so-called « Rhineland Bastards » . During the War, he carried-out racial analyses on 7,000 Soviet prisoners of War on behalf of the high-command of the Army.

Heinrich Groß wrote expertises about « unworthy lives » and carried-out deadly experiments at « Am Spiegelgrund » with handicapped children.

Karl Silberbauer arrested Anne Frank, in 1944.

The Austrian « Gauleiters » Hugo Jury, Franz Hofer and Friedrich Rainer also participated in Nazi crimes.

From March to November 1938, 130,000 people managed to escape legally or illegally from Austria. Among the most famous emigrating artists, there were the composers Arnold Schönberg and Robert Stolz, the film-maker Leon Askin, Fritz Lang, Josef von Sternberg, Billy Wilder, Max Reinhardt, the actors Karl Farkas and Gerhard Bronner and the writers Hermann Broch, Robert Musil, Anton Kuh and Franz Werfel. Friedrich Torberg, who witnessed the German invasion (« Anschluß ») in Prague, did not return to Vienna. Erich Fried flew with his mother to London after his father had been killed by the « Gestapo » , in May 1938, during an interrogation. Stefan Zweig escaped via London, New York, Argentina and Paraguay to Brazil where he committed suicide in February 1942, together with his wife Charlotte Altmann. 1936 Nobel laureate in medicine, Otto Loewi, had to pay his prize money back before emigrating. Additional scientists going into exile were Sigmund Freud, Erwin Schrödinger, Kurt Gödel, Martin Buber, Karl Popper and Lise Meitner. Bruno Kreisky, who had to leave the country for political reasons and because of his Jewish origin, emigrated to Sweden. After his come-back, he served as Austrian Chancellor from 1970 to 1983.

In 1984 in Lackenbach, almost 40 years after the end of War, a memorial for the « Zigeuner-Anhaltelager » Romani was unveiled. A memorial in Kemetten has not yet been started. Prior to the War, 200 Romani people lived in Kemetten. They were deported in 1941 ; only 5 of them came back in 1945.

In mid-2004, the question of how to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the death of Robert Bernardis, who was shot on August 8, 1944, after being involved in the July 20 plot against Adolf Hitler, led to a political conflict. Politicians of the opposition (SPÖ, Grüne) as well as some celebrities suggested renaming a barracks as « Robert-Bernardis-Kaserne », which was turned-down by the governing ÖVP and FPÖ. The defence minister Günther Platter (ÖVP) finally decided to build a memorial in the yard of the « Towarek-Barrack » in Enns. The Green Politician Terezija Stoisits pointed-out that a barracks was named after Austrian sergeant Anton Schmid in Germany, on 8 May 2004. Schmid was sentenced to death by a « Wehrmacht » Court-martial and was shot on 13 April 1942, after he saved the lives of 100 Jews in the Vilnius Ghetto.

In the 1st years after the War, many memorials were built in several places, commemorating the dead soldiers of World War II who allegedly fought for their country. For the victims of the Nazi regime, memorials have only been built at a much later time.

Since 1992, there is the possibility of doing « Zivildienst » (alternative National Service) in the Austrian Holocaust Memorial Service. Approximately 15 people are deployed in the archive of the concentration camp memorial Mauthausen and, alternatively, in the camp itself. On 1 September 1992, the 1st Austrian Holocaust memorial serviceman started working in the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum. Andreas Maislinger has taken-over the idea from the Action Reconciliation Service for Peace. Annually, approximately 30 civil servants are sent to Holocaust memorials and connected institutions in Europe, Israel, United States, South-America and China by the Holocaust Memorial Service.

The biggest Austrian Memorial for the remembrance of National-Socialist crimes is the Mauthausen-Gusen concentration camp. Part of the Contemporary History Museum Ebensee, it emerged through a private initiative, in 2001, and remembers victims of the Ebensee concentration camp.

L' « Anschluß »

L'annexion

Le 11 mars, à 5h30, le chancelier Schuschnigg est réveillé par un coup de téléphone lui annonçant que la frontière austro-allemande est fermée, le trafic ferroviaire entre les 2 pays interrompu et que des mouvements de troupes ont lieu le long de la frontière. Vers 10 heures, Arthur Seyß-Inquart informe Schuschnigg du contenu d'une lettre envoyée par Adolf Hitler qui exige que le plébiscite soit retardé et les modalités modifiées. Celle-ci précise que si le plébiscite n'est pas levé, le « Reich » considérera que le traité du 12 février 1938 n'a plus de raison d'être. À 13 heures, le chancelier se rend auprès du Président fédéral Wilhelm Miklas, ils s'accordent pour reporter le plébiscite. 2 heures après, les Nationaux-Socialistes autrichiens reçoivent l'ordre de manifester dans les rues et la directive n° 1 d'invasion signée de Hitler est transmise aux responsables militaires. Hermann Göring fait pression sur Seyß-Inquart pour que le gouvernement Schuschnigg démissionne. Ce dernier présente sa démission au Président Miklas qui, dans un 1er temps, la refuse, puis finit par l'accepter mais exclut de nommer Seyß-Inquart chancelier. Mis sous pression par Göring et Seyß-Inquart toute l'après-midi, le Président Miklas ordonne à Schuschnigg de faire un discours à la radio pour protester contre les demandes allemandes et informer le monde que l'Autriche cède à la force.

Dans les semaines qui suivent, après quelques démonstrations comme la pose de la Ire pierre par Hitler de l'autoroute Salzburg-Linz-Vienne, le 15 avril, ou celle de la fondation des « Usines du " Reich " Hermann Göring » à Linz, le 13 mai, une série de mesures fait disparaître l'Autriche de la carte d'Europe. Tout d'abord, la décision du 24 mai qui découpe le pays en 7 « Gauen » (territoires) : Tyrol-Vorarlberg, Salzbourg, Vienne, Styrie, Carinthie qui absorbe le Tyrol oriental, et les 2 régions portant le nom d'Autriche se voient dénommer Haut et Bas-Danube (« Oberdonau » et « Niederdonau »), quant au « Burgenland » qui avait choisi l'Autriche en 1920, il disparaît le 15 octobre, son territoire étant partagé entre le Bas-Danube et la Styrie. Quant à Vienne, en intégrant plusieurs communes environnantes, elle passe d'une superficie de 278 kilomètres carrés à 1,218 kilomètres carrés et devient ainsi la ville la plus étendue du « Reich ».

En 1939, le 15 octobre, une loi entérine les modifications territoriales qui ont suivi les accords de Munich et le démantèlement de la Tchécoslovaquie. Certaines parties de Bohême et de Moravie sont intégrées aux « Alpen- und Donau-Reichsgaue », le terme d'« Ostmark », à trop forte connotation historique, est proscrit. Cette même loi fait coïncider les structures administratives avec celles de l'organisation du Parti. Une fois la Yougoslavie dépecée en 1941, d'autres territoires comme la région de Maribor/Marburg seront directement régis par les lois du « Reich ».

Au printemps 1938, Ernst Kaltenbrunner devient le chef de la police pour l'ancienne Autriche où, dès lors, les lois de Nuremberg s'appliquent. Après avoir acquis quelques mois auparavant un terrain à Mauthausen, à une vingtaine de kilomètres à l'est de Linz, les Nationaux-Socialistes y transportent le 8 août 1938 les Iers déportés. L'histoire de ce camp est liée à celle d'une entreprise spécialisée dans les carrières créée à Berlin (« Deutsche Erd- und Steinwerke ») avec l'appui d'Heinrich Himmler, le chef de la SS. Cette entreprise acquiert des carrières dans l'immédiate proximité de camps de concentration où l'on fait travailler jusqu'à la mort les détenus dans des conditions épouvantables. Au camp de Mauthausen sont rattachées plusieurs dizaines d'annexes, dont celle du camp de Gusen. Environ 200,000 personnes ont été internées, représentant une trentaine de nationalités différentes, 118,000 ont trouvé la mort. Début janvier 1945, il y avait encore 85,000 prisonniers. Le camp a été libéré par les armées américaines le 15 mai. 16,000 Autrichiens « non juifs » sont morts dans les camps de concentration de l'Allemagne nationale-socialiste.

Les Ires mesures

L'histoire du National-Socialisme en Autriche renvoie une nouvelle fois à une histoire qui n'est pas spécifiquement autrichienne, seules les modalités et les spécificités autrichiennes pendant la période du National-Socialisme seront ici retenues. Pendant de longues années, la période nationale-socialiste est demeurée un sujet tabou en Autriche. Jusqu'en 1988, la thèse officielle consiste à dire que l'Autriche est la Ire victime du National-Socialisme, ce qui est vrai si on considère uniquement l'État. Le Ir ouvrage à aborder le National-Socialisme en Autriche a été celui de Karl Stadler, «

Österreich 1938-1945 im Spiegel der NS-Akten » , publié en 1966. Parmi la génération suivante, Gerhard Botz a été l'un des premiers à se consacrer à l'étude du Nazisme en Autriche et a longtemps été perçu comme une menace pour l'historiographie traditionnelle autrichienne. Le cinquantenaire de l' « Anschluß » voit paraître un ouvrage collectif « NS-Herrschaft in Österreich 1938-1945 » (La domination nationale-socialiste en Autriche) , qui est depuis sans cesse ré-édité et enrichi. Paradoxalement, il a fallu l'arrivée au gouvernement de la coalition conservatrice chrétienne et nationale-populiste de Wolfgang Schüssel, au début 2000, et la protestation internationale qu'elle a entraînée pour obliger le chancelier à mettre sur pied une Commission historique qui a mobilisé une centaine de chercheurs et de chercheuses. Ainsi, aujourd'hui disposons-nous de nombreuses et sérieuses études sur la politique d'aryanisation, sur les interdictions professionnelles, sur la politique vis-à-vis de l'Église catholique, sur les Tchèques et leurs organisations, sur les privations de patrimoine des personnes poursuivies politiquement, sur les homosexuels, les travailleurs forcés ou la politique d'expulsion. Un dernier volant des études est consacré à la politique de dédommagement menée en Autriche après 1945 et à ses carences.

La vague d'antisémitisme

Pendant les premiers jours de l' « Anschluß » , se déchaîne à Vienne et en Autriche une folie antisémite. La dictature corporatiste chrétienne avait déjà instrumentalisé l'antisémitisme et avait contribué à marginaliser encore un peu plus les Juifs dans la société autrichienne, néanmoins mis à part quelques écrivains qui avaient préféré quitter l'Autriche pour quelque temps, les journalistes, les médecins, les avocats tenus par leur activité professionnelle ne s'étaient alors guère posé la question. Dès le 12 mars, des scènes d'hystérie collective sont recensées dans tout le pays : humiliations et sévices publics, pillages, lynchages sont le lot des Juifs viennois. Les voisins obligent les Juifs à laver les trottoirs à genoux avec une simple brosse ou viennent chercher le poste de radio tant convoité. Qu'ils soient journalistes, publicistes ou écrivains, médecins, boutiquiers ou simples ouvriers, les Juifs autrichiens savent ce qui les attend. Hermann Göring le leur répète lors d'un meeting le 26 mars 1938 en déclarant que l' « Anschluß » sera suivi du « désenjuivement total » et que Vienne devra être « débarrassée des Juifs » .

Devant cette impasse, peu de choix s'offrent aux intellectuels juifs : se taire, endurer et attendre, s'exiler ou se donner la mort. Beaucoup d'intellectuels connaissent la situation dans l' « Reich » et quand ils ont combattu véhémentement les Nationaux-Socialistes, selon les mots de l'écrivain Friedrich Torberg :

« Ils ne voyaient rien d'autre, pas d'issue, rien. Ils n'avaient plus de forces, ils n'avaient plus d'envie. Ils éprouvaient du dégoût et de l'horreur. Ils réfléchissaient, se demandant si la vie valait encore la peine d'être vécue et concluaient : non, elle ne le valait plus. »

Nombreux choisissent alors d'en finir. Gerhard Botz étudiant les statistiques officielles concernant les suicides a constaté qu'entre le 1er et le 11 mars 1938, il y a 2 à 3 suicides par jour à Vienne ; à partir du 12 mars, ce chiffre augmente rapidement et atteint un maximum les 17 et 18 mars avec 22 suicides par jour, pour ensuite retomber à une moyenne de 5 à 6 par jour. Au total, 213 personnes se seraient suicidées en mars, dont 79 appartenant à la communauté juive ; en avril, on compterait encore 138 suicides, dont 64 juifs. Or, tous les chercheurs s'accordent à dire que ces chiffres sont indubitablement faux, largement sous-évalués. Se référant à des journaux français, l'agence de presse juive chiffre ces suicides à 1,700 personnes dans la semaine après l' « Anschluß » . Faire paraître l'annonce d'un suicide dans la presse après le 12 mars devient presque un acte de résistance. Ainsi, dans l'édition du 13 mars 1938, la « Neue Freie Presse » publie une brève intitulée « 4 Suicides » qui décline le suicide de 2 fonctionnaires, d'un écrivain, Karl Schlesinger, d'une ménagère avec la mention « on ignore le mobile de leur acte » . Rapidement, les Nationaux-Socialistes veilleront à ce que des termes plus neutres soient utilisés (« décès » , « disparition ») ; il en est ainsi pour Kurt Sonnenfeld, rédacteur à la « Neue Freie Presse » « décédé le 15 mars » . Les avis de faire-part sont eux aussi contrôlés. Selon l'écrivain Alfred Polgar, ces intellectuels qui avalent du cyanure ou qui se jettent par la fenêtre « se mettent en sûreté en échappant par un saut à leurs concitoyens et à cette époque » .

Les Juifs autrichiens devront encore affronter l'hostilité de leurs concitoyens lors de la « Nuit de cristal » , le 9 novembre. En Autriche, 42 synagogues et lieux de cultes sont alors détruits, 27 juifs tués et 88 grièvement blessés. Selon le recensement du 17 mai 1939, d'après les catégories définies par les lois nationales-socialistes de Nuremberg, les territoires ex-autrichiens comptent 94,042 Juifs, dont 92,982 à Vienne et seuls 3,8 % de la population recensée est encore en activité. On estime qu'environ les 2 tiers de la population juive d'avant l' « Anschluß » ont fui. 43,9 % ont trouvé refuge en Europe, principalement en Grande-Bretagne (24,4 %) ; en Italie et en Belgique (3,5 %) ; en Suisse et en Pologne (1,8 %) ; en France et en Yougoslavie (1,3 %) . 22,6 % ont réussi à gagner les États-Unis ; 14,3 % Shanghai ; 1,5 % l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande. Seuls 7,3 % optent pour la Palestine. 16,692 Juifs exilés ont été capturés dans leur nouveau pays d'exil après l'avancée de la « Wehrmacht » dans ces pays et exécutés, 48,767 ont été victimes de la Shoah, soit un total de 65,459 ou 1/3 de la population juive d'Autriche.

L'ordre national-socialiste en Autriche

Quant à l'ordre national-socialiste, il règne aussi dans les entreprises où est appliqué le « Führerprinzip » . Le 10 juillet 1938, un décret stipule que « les hommes de confiance en Autriche seront, jusqu'à nouvel ordre, nommés par le chef régional du NSDAP.

Mais à côté de l'aryanisation des biens juifs, il faut aussi percevoir que de nombreuses entreprises autrichiennes vont passer aux mains des Allemands. En 1938, le capital allemand possède à peu près 9 % de l'économie autrichienne, en 1945, il en détiendra 57 % , la pénétration du secteur bancaire atteindra 83 % et celui de l'industrie chimique 71 % . Ces biens allemands formeront l'immense secteur public autrichien au lendemain de la Guerre. Très rapidement, les résistants et résistantes tout d'abord, mais ensuite une large part de la population autrichienne prend conscience que leur pays est pillé : banques, mines, matières premières sont au service du plan de 4 ans, officiellement dès le 26 mars, et bientôt au service de la Guerre. L' « Anschluß » à peine réalisé, Hermann Göring commence à construire son Empire en Autriche les « Reichswerke Hermann Göring » à Linz, qui deviendront après la Guerre l'entreprise d'État VÖEST.

L' « Anschluß » à peine réalisé, le polycratisme bien connu du National-Socialisme sévit aussi en Autriche et conduit à des aberrations. Ainsi, le dirigeant autrichien des Nationaux-Socialistes, Hubert Klausner, nomme le 13 mars, Sepp Nemeč responsable du Front du Travail allemand et le dote de pouvoirs exorbitants. Il le charge de « liquider la SAG » et attribue les locaux syndicaux de la Confédération syndicale de la « Ebendorferstraße » au Front du Travail allemand.

Or, celui-ci n'est pas encore constitué officiellement en Autriche. Le 18 mai, les Cellules d'entreprise nationales-socialistes (NSBO) s'en inquiètent et revendiquent en conséquence le droit d'intervenir dans les affaires de l'ancienne Confédération syndicale et des Chambres des ouvriers et des employés.

Les militants du NSDAP autrichien prennent rapidement conscience des conséquences de l'« Anschluß » pour eux-mêmes. Ils sont immédiatement confrontés à la concurrence des « Prussiens ». Effectivement, des responsables venant de l'« Altreich » s'installent en Autriche et occupent des postes que les Nationaux-Socialistes autrichiens convoitaient. Cette hostilité envers les Allemands de l'« Altreich » contribuera, si ce n'est à la prise de conscience de la nation autrichienne, du moins à un fort sentiment anti-allemand qui se développera plus ou moins rapidement et plus ou moins intensément suivant les milieux. Le terme « Piefke » caractérisant en Autriche péjorativement les Allemands du nord et datant de la guerre austro-prussienne réapparaît dans la langue de tous les jours.

À côté du secteur bancaire déjà évoqué, on peut citer l'exemple des journalistes. Dès le 12 mars 1938, l'annonce de la démission de Schuschnigg étant connue, des journalistes allemands se mettent en route vers Vienne et l'Autriche. Si les Nationaux-Socialistes autrichiens s'emparent des rédactions des quotidiens, épurent les rédactions, rares sont ceux à détenir quelques semaines après l'« Anschluß » les positions clefs dans ce secteur.

Le rattachement au « Reich » allemand et l'application sur le territoire de l'Autriche du droit allemand a pour certains auteurs contribuer à la modernisation de ses territoires.

... histoire, leur trop grande proximité avec les peuples centre-européens, sous-entendu les Slaves.

La participation des femmes et des jeunes filles, toutes très jeunes, à peine plus de 20 ans, à l'activité anti-militariste a été particulièrement forte. Leurs activités consistent, d'une part, à établir les liaisons entre les groupes de résistance dans les entreprises d'armement et, d'autre part, à envoyer aux soldats des tracts et des lettres « sabrant le moral de l'armée ». À cet effet, elles collectent les numéros de poste militaire ainsi que les rapports de la « Wehrmacht ». De plus, lors de rendez-vous avec les soldats dans des cafés ou des parcs, elles discutent avec eux et entreprennent un travail de démoralisation de l'armée de l'intérieur. Des femmes mènent aussi ce combat en France, en se faisant passer pour des Alsaciennes. En 1942, la « Gestapo » réussit à arrêter le noyau du groupe. La plupart des procès prononcent des peines de mort.

Lors des derniers mois de la Guerre, les actions armées se développent dans certaines localités du Tyrol. En décembre 1944, des personnalités conservatrices créent un Comité National Autrichien Provisoire » (POeN) qui entre en contact avec les services Alliés. On voit aussi apparaître le « O5 », toujours mis en avant alors qu'il ne représente presque personne. Le sigle signifie « Autriche », le « O » pour Österreich et le « 5 » pour la 5e lettre de l'alphabet, le « e ». Fritz Molden, fils du rédacteur en chef de la « Neue Freie Presse », qui a des contacts avec Allan W. Dulles, devient agent de liaison entre ce groupe et les Alliés. Le social-démocrate Adolf Schärf rejoint aussi ce groupe qui édite un tract fin-mars 1945 qui exhorte la population autrichienne de participer à des sabotages et qui appelle début-avril la population viennoise à soutenir l'Armée rouge et à empêcher toute destruction.

Des Autrichiens et des Autrichiennes se sont aussi engagés dans d'autres résistances, tout d'abord avec les Brigades internationales en Espagne, puis au sein de la Résistance française ou belge. Félix Kreibler en est le symbole. Anti-fasciste exilé dès 1936 en France, il rejoint avec sa femme, Denise, la Résistance française, est arrêté et déporté en tant que résistant français, ce qui lui a sauvé la vie, à Buchenwald. D'autres, en Grande-Bretagne, en Suède, aux États-Unis ont contribué à soutenir la résistance de l'intérieur et à structurer les exilés.

En 1945, les résistants, les déportés, les exilés, quel que soit leur sexe, ont eu des difficultés à se faire reconnaître comme victime et à se faire indemniser. Rosa Jochmann, sociale-démocrate déportée à Ravensbrück, déclare « lorsque nous sommes rentrés en 1945, nous ne songions même pas à une loi d'indemnisation, ni à une pension, je voudrais bien connaître celui qui au monde pourrait nous dédommager pour les terribles souffrances que nous avons connues. Mais lorsque nous avons dû constater que même pour les coupables des lois étaient prévues, alors nous nous sommes mis au travail pour en élaborer pour les victimes du Fascisme et leurs familles.

La Déclaration de Moscou

Fin-octobre 1943, les ministres des Affaires extérieures de Grande-Bretagne, des États-Unis et de l'Union soviétique se réunissent à Moscou, l'avenir de l'Autriche figure à l'ordre du jour. Le 30 octobre 1943 est publiée la « Déclaration de Moscou dans laquelle les Alliés considèrent l'occupation de l'Autriche comme nulle et non avenue, disent vouloir rétablir une Autriche démocratique et indépendante mais rappellent l'Autriche à ses responsabilités dans la participation à la Guerre et appellent à ce qu'elle contribue à sa libération. De cette Déclaration de Moscou, les Autrichiens ne retiendront que la phrase sur le rétablissement de l'Autriche démocratique et indépendante. Cette Déclaration de Moscou contribuera à établir d'autant plus facilement le concept de la nation autrichienne et permettra aux Autrichiens et aux Autrichiennes de se dédouaner.

Mais c'est le cours de la Guerre lui-même qui a détaché lentement les populations du National-Socialisme : les bombardements alliés, les pertes de l'armée, l'insécurité grandissante devant l'avancée de l'armée soviétique. On attend encore des travaux d'ampleur sur les destructions des villes, Innsbruck a été détruite à 60 % ; Villach à 85 % ; la ville industrielle de « Wiener Neustadt » à 88 % , près de 50,000 immeubles ont été endommagés à Vienne. 24,000 civils sont morts soit en raison des bombardements, soit en raison d'opérations militaires. De toutes ces destructions, il ne reste dans la mémoire collective que la photo de la cathédrale Saint-Étienne à Vienne éventrée par les bombes.

Après 1945, les adversaires d'hier, Chrétiens-Sociaux et Sociaux-Démocrates, construisent un État sur leurs valeurs et il devient urgent de ne pas remuer le passé récent qui pourrait faire resurgir les désaccords et les rancœurs. Pendant presque 30 ans, les travaux sur l'État autoritaire corporatiste chrétien ou sur le National-Socialisme sont absents des recherches historiques et du discours public. Il a fallu attendre le 9 novembre 1988 pour que le chancelier social-démocrate Franz Vranitzky fasse la distinction, lors de la commémoration du 50e anniversaire de la « Nuit de Cristal » , entre l'Autriche en tant qu'État « victime d'une agression militaire et l'implication coupable de beaucoup d'Autrichiens qui, volontairement ou non, se sont laissés aller à servir d'instruments et de tortionnaires d'un régime inhumain et criminel » . Les débats autour de l'affaire Waldheim en 1986, puis des commémorations de l' « Anschluß » en 1988, ont contribué à faire évoluer les intellectuels autrichiens qui ont remis en question la théorie de l'Autriche uniquement victime. Néanmoins, jusqu'à aujourd'hui, la Guerre demeure un thème plus souvent abordé dans la sphère privée que dans la sphère publique et la société autrichienne n'a toujours pas assimilé ces débats comme l'a prouvé l'arrivée au pouvoir de la coalition gouvernementale de Wolfgang Schüssel entre conservateurs chrétiens et le FPÖ national-populiste de Jörg Haider, rejouant dans une version moderne l'alliance chrétienne-sociale avec les « Heimwehren » .

Les traces de la Seconde Guerre mondiale se lisent dans les films d'Axel Corti ou de Karin Brandauer, dans l'œuvre littéraire de plusieurs écrivains : dans celle d'Ingeborg Bachmann ou dans l'œuvre autobiographique de Thomas Bernhard, mais aussi chez de nombreux peintres, comme Maria Lassnig ou Amulf Rainer. Mais ce sont les cabarettistes qui ont le mieux mis en scène l'homme ordinaire autrichien qui, quel que soit le régime, quel que soit l'occupant, tire son épingle du jeu. « Herr Karl » , ce bon Monsieur Karl xénophobe et antisémite, déclare à propos de la Libération de Vienne par l'Année soviétique :

Puis, il poursuit :

« Quelques mois plus tard qui croyez-vous qui est arrivé ? Les Américains. La délivrance. J'ai tout de suite offert mes services. »

Le cynique « Herr Karl » laisse tomber :

« Moi, je me suis rebâti une existence au moins 20 fois tout au long de mon existence. »

À l'image de « Herr Karl » , la société autrichienne refuse sa part de responsabilités dans les 2 Guerres mondiales et continue à refouler un passé vécu comme pavé d'échecs et de défaites.

Le 13 mars 1938, avec l' « Anschluß » , l'Autriche, rebaptisée « Ostmark » , est placée sous l'autorité du « Gauleiter » Josef Bürckel, doté du titre de Commissaire au rattachement de l'Autriche au « Reich » . 190,000 Juifs résident alors en Autriche où les persécutions à leur égard, en particulier à Vienne, deviennent alors plus importantes qu'en Allemagne : humiliations publiques, expropriations mieux organisées, émigration forcée plus rapide. Avant même l'entrée de la « Wehrmacht » sur le territoire et, malgré les efforts des autorités pour la modérer, la violence se déchaîne : les rues sont le théâtre de scènes de violences et de brimades, des appartements et des commerces appartenant à des Juifs sont pillés. Les violences cessent le 29 avril, quand Bürckel menace de sanctionner les coupables.

L'accélération des persécutions

Après l'« Anschluss » en mars 1938, les mesures anti-juives sont promulguées à une cadence redoublée. Le 1er pas important dans ce processus est la loi du 28 mars abolissant le statut légal des communautés juives accordé au XIXe siècle. Parallèlement, les mesures d'« aryansisation » s'intensifient. La loi du 26 mars 1938 oblige tous les Juifs du « Reich » à déclarer la totalité de leur fortune aux autorités, sous peine de poursuites pénales. Au terme de l'article 7 de ce décret, Hermann Göring, responsable du Plan quadriennal, peut disposer des biens déclarés « conformément aux besoins de l'économie allemande ». D'avril à novembre 1938, les services du « Reich » prélèvent ainsi 2 des 7 milliards de Marks de « biens juifs » déclarés.

Les boutiquiers et les artisans reçoivent l'ordre de cesser toute activité commerciale avant le 1er janvier 1939. Enfin, les exemptions en faveur des avocats et des anciens combattants juifs sont supprimées. En juillet 1938, les médecins juifs doivent demander des autorisations d'exercer et limiter leur pratique à une clientèle exclusivement juive. L'idée du marquage progresse avec l'obligation de porter sur les passeports, les prénoms Sara et Israël (18 août 1938). Début octobre 1938, la lettre « J » est apposée sur les pièces d'identité à l'instigation de la Suisse. Une série de rafles a lieu à Berlin durant l'été alors que les contrôles policiers se font plus fréquents. 1,500 Juifs sont internés dans des camps de concentration. Des destructions de biens, des expulsions de certains villages et la profanation de lieux de cultes ont également lieu. Les synagogues de Munich (9 juin), Nuremberg (10 août) et Dortmund (septembre) sont dynamitées.

Le sort des Juifs autrichiens

Le 20 août 1938, le Bureau central d'émigration juive est mis en place sous la responsabilité de Franz Walter Stahlecker, contrôlé en réalité par Adolf Eichmann lui-même. Il entreprend d'abord de refouler les Juifs par-delà les frontières en particulier en Tchécoslovaquie, en Hongrie et en Suisse. Selon des sources allemandes, environ 5,000 Juifs autrichiens sont chassés entre mars et novembre 1938. En octobre 1938, Heinrich Himmler ordonne de regrouper à Vienne tous les Juifs des provinces autrichiennes. Durant l'été 1938, les Juifs autrichiens tentent de se réfugier illégalement dans les pays voisins et jusqu'au Royaume Uni. La « Gestapo » envoie plusieurs groupes de Juifs en Finlande, en Lituanie et aux Pays-Bas d'où ils sont refoulés. Les protestations des pays étrangers se multiplient et l'entrée illégale ou l'expulsion vers l'Ouest deviennent plus difficiles. Moins de 6 mois après l'« Anschluss », 45,000 Juifs autrichiens ont émigré. En mai 1939, plus de 100,000 Juifs, partent à leur tour, soit près de 50 % des Juifs autrichiens.

...

On 9th March 1938, the Austrian Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg announced a plebiscite on the independence of Austria. Adolf Hitler took this as an opportunity to take action against the Austrian State. Schuschnigg was pressed to resign. The National-Socialist Arthur Seyß-Inquart took-over the chancellorship and formed a new government. The Austrian National-Socialists took power in Austria.

On the morning of 12th March 1938, troops of the German « Wehrmacht » and the SS crossed the German-Austrian border. On 13th March 1938, Hitler announced in Linz the legislation on the « Anschluß » (Annexation) of Austria into the German « Reich » .

During the great celebrations in all of Austria, many potential opponents of the regime were arrested, as well as the Jews who were expropriated and deprived of civil rights. National-Socialist rule was established now in Austria through propaganda, terror and enticements.

The « Plebiscite »

After the « Anschluß » in March 1938, the Austrian army was incorporated into the German « Wehrmacht » . German laws came into force without delay. A Plebiscite was set for 10th April on the annexation of Austria to the German « Reich » , which was only a mockery.

Austrian citizens who were of Jewish descent were excluded from the election. People who were of other political opinions were arrested. Despite this, many Austrian intellectuals and known personalities from all areas publicly supported Adolf Hitler's annexation. The former Chancellor Karl Renner who had founded the 1st Republic and the Austrian Bishops did their best to convince the many who had remained sceptical.

A free democratic election was not possible on 10th April : Election publicity was present in front of and in the election booth, the votes were surveyed and the voting papers were manipulated.

Despite the complete lack of choice that the voters had, the former National-Socialist Mayor of the City of Linz, Franz Langoth, voiced his opinion in 1951 that the election on 10th April 1938 in Austria had been an example of a true, democratic plebiscite and would be recorded as a pure and clean vote in future history.

The « Patenstadt » - Hitler's building plans for Linz

Linz, the City of his youth, was singled-out for the special favour of Adolf Hitler after the « Anschluß » . He intended it to be developed as a Centre of Industry and Culture on the Danube and ultimately to provide room for between 320,000 to 420,000 inhabitants.

The monumental integration of both river banks of the Danube as an administrative forum.

An axial street system in the south as a culture centre by diverting the railway provision, together with the building of a new railway station for the transport of people.

The building of large industrial factories to the east of the City. (Hermann Göring Factory ; Upper-Danube Steel Works ; Ostmark Nitrogen Factory) .

The port facilities as a large warehouse location for goods.

Linz as an intersection for the German motorway network.

Traffic planning with an inner and outer peripheral ring linked by bridges over the Danube.

Out of these enormous building projects, only the Nibelungen Bridge and the 2 buildings to the left and right of the bridge on the side of Linz Town, the industrial facilities and the port facilities on the bend in the Danube were erected. The commencement of the Second World War, together with the lack of human and material resources, stopped further projects.

However, in the residential sector, within 5 years, 11,000 residences in 2,700 buildings were built. Through an enormous influx of work-force (the level of the population rose from 112,000 in 1938 - to 185,000 in 1943) locally, the unresolved requirement for residences rose from 507 residences in 1937 - to over 15,000 in 1943.

The concentration camp in Mauthausen and the sub-camps in Linz

As early as 8 August 1938, a few months after the « Anschluß » , the 1st prisoners were transferred into the new concentration camp in Mauthausen. The National-Socialist regime established the Mauthausen Concentration Camp to obtain more prison space for political-ideological opponents. It was intended that they should in the Mauthausen Quarry extract the materials for the magnificent building projects in Linz.

The Mauthausen/Gusen Double Camp became the only concentration camp classified as a « Level III Camp » . This meant that for the prisoners, there should be no return.

In total, more than 190,000 people of different nationality became imprisoned in the Mauthausen Concentration Camp, the Gusen Branch Camp and the sub-camps, which numbered over 40. Systematic terror, deliberate killings, exploitation of labour, deficient feeding, inadequate clothing and lack of medical care led to the deaths of about 100,000 prisoners.

Jews in Linz

Of the approximately 600 Jews who had lived in Linz, in March 1938, about 305 fled abroad. 23 died during the course of the years until 1942 (including suicides) . Most of the 205 Jews who fled to Vienna and Bohemia and Moravia were killed in National-Socialist concentration camps.

The Jews who had remained in Linz were nearly all taken to the Theresienstadt Concentration Camp. Hardly any Upper-Austrian Jews died in the Mauthausen Concentration Camp, where many Jews died who had been deported from other parts of Europe.

Only about 26 Jews survived the National-Socialist regime in Linz, Upper-Austria, and, up to 1947, there were only 13 who actually returned to Linz. Although this number was slightly increased later it, nevertheless, shows the end of the old Jewish community in Linz.

Linz, capital of Upper-Austria. Jewish money-lenders are recorded in Linz, in 1304 ; a Jewish settlement in the growing market town is probably a Century older. In 1335, a synagogue is mentioned ; 2 Jews were baptized 1 year earlier. Jews were accused of desecrating the « Host » in 1338. Although the community was not harmed during the « Black Death » persecutions of 1348, a local persecution occurred in 1371. In 1396, Duke Albert IV permitted Jews to conduct only fiscal transactions with the burghers ; the decree was renewed in 1412. The Jews were expelled from Linz in 1421, and, in 1426, the synagogue was turned into a church. Jews were permitted to attend the bi-annual markets in the town in 1494, and Jewish horse-dealers and feather and wool merchants, mainly from Moravia, continued to trade at the fairs until their entry was forbidden at the end of the 17th Century. Only in 1783 were the markets officially declared open and, in 1824, the Jews opened their own prayer-room. A cemetery was consecrated in 1863, when the modern community was established. In 1869, there were 391 Jews (1.3 % of the total population) and 533 in 1880. A new synagogue was opened in 1877 by Rabbi Adolf Kurrein (1876-1882) , publicist and author. His son, Rabbi Viktor Kurrein (1923-1938) , wrote the history of the community.

In 1923, there were 1,238 Jews in Linz, 671 in 1934 (0.6 %) , and, in 1938, before the « Anschluß » , 650. On 10 November 1938, the synagogue was burned down by the SS ; the 65 remaining Jews were arrested and ordered to leave within 3 days for Vienna. The Nazis claimed that the Jews must leave the town because it was the capital of the province of Adolf Hitler's birth. Jewish shops were not looted because they had already been « Aryanized » . Shortly after the end of the War, 2,400 Jewish refugees were housed in the nearby Bindermichen camp. A new community was re-organized, which numbered 238 in 1949, and 145 in 1961. In October 1957, an anti-Semitic demonstration was sparked-off by a performance of « The Diary of Anne Frank » . Protests against a ban on shehitah were lodged in 1958. A new synagogue was consecrated in 1968.

The killing of « life not worthy of living »

According to National-Socialist concepts of public health and racial purity, there was no room for human beings who could not be useful to the National-Socialist State in a visible or measurable way. In order to establish which patients were not worthy of living, questionnaires were despatched to all psychiatric institutions. They had to report on all people suffering from schizophrenia, epilepsy and other mental illnesses. Assessors decided on these questionnaires as to whether patients were to be killed. A decisive criterion was if the patient had the ability to work.

One of the few institutions, in which the killing of people took place who were considered as not worthy of living, was « Schloß Hartheim » in Upper-Austria. In 1939, Doctor Rudolf Lonauer was made head of this institute. Lonauer, who also was the director of the Niedernhart Mental Institute in Linz, commenced the systematic killing of people in Hartheim in 1940. About 1,000 people were taken secretly from Niedernhart to Hartheim and were killed there.

The National-Socialist social policy

The National-Socialists considered the German people to be threatened by an over-proportionate reproduction of inferior individuals - mentally or physically handicapped people, the mentally ill or people whose behaviour was deviant. Furthermore, it was thought one could prevent any damage from collective hereditary factors which resulted from the mingling with inferior races, above all, with Jews.

The priority aim for National-Socialist social policy was, therefore, to prevent such a threat at all cost and by all means. This meant in actual fact, expulsion, persecution and finally the murder of those people defined as not worthy of living. For the others, the Aryan comrades, State support was envisaged.

While selecting the inferior, often with the help of communal organisations, such as youth, health and social security offices, the comrades erected an effective propaganda-like social apparatus. National-Socialist Welfare (NSV) and the German Labour Front (DAF) used skilfully arranged mass activities to achieve high-acceptance of National-Socialist policies by the population.

Austria 1938-1945 : The National-Socialists seized power on the evening of March 3rd, 1938, and German troops marched into Austria on March 12th ; the Federal President Wilhelm Miklas resigned from office on March 13th, 1938, and the National-Socialist Federal Government passed a constitutional law stating that « Austria is a province of the German “ Reich ” », and a « Reich » Law (« Reichsgesetz ») in the same wording was published in Berlin. The implementation was put into the hands of the « Gauleiter » of the Saarland province, Josef Bürckel, who was temporary leader of the Nazi Party (NSDAP) and became « “ Reich ” Commissioner » (« Reichskommissar ») for the Reunification of Austria with the German “ Reich ” » following the plebiscite over the « Anschluss » on April 4th, 1938. The government was called « Österreichische Landesregierung » (Austrian Provincial Government) and was headed by Arthur Seyß-Inquart as « Reich » Governor (« Reichsstatthalter ») ; it remained in power until 1939, when it was forced to hand-over its powers and liquidate the hitherto existing Austrian State (1st Republic) .

Josef Bürckel was given far-reaching authorities after April 10th, 1938, e.g. : the authority to instruct the « Reich » Governor, but not including « Wehrmacht » (the German Armed Forces) and economy. The name « Österreich » (Austria) was for the time replaced by « Ostmark » .

The replacement of leaders in the public and private sectors led to drastic measures. On April 1st, 1938, the 1st

Austrian officials and patriots were deported to the concentration camp in Dachau, other persons were temporarily arrested. Along with Austrian National-Socialists, many German nationals took-over leading positions, which caused many problems, especially in the economy.

Integration of the Austrian economy into the German system started in March 1938. The Austrian economy was integrated into the 4 year plan and almost all large-scale industry passed into German ownership. On 31 May 1938, the Nazi Party divided the « Ostmark » into « Gau » districts, Upper-Austria and Lower-Austria were re-named « Oberdonau » (Upper-Danube) and « Niederdonau » (Lower-Danube) and the historical borders of the provinces were altered. On 1 October 1938, administrative structures were altered according to the « Gau » structure : The province of Burgenland was split between Lower-Danube and Styria ; the Tyrol and Vorarlberg were merged ; East Tyrol became part of Carinthia ; the Court district of Bad Aussee was integrated into Upper-Danube ; 97 sub-urban municipalities became part of Vienna ; the municipalities of Jungholz and Mittelberg became Bavarian territory. Uniformity, which meant the complete destruction of historic structures, came in the form of the « Ostmark » Act of 1 May 1939. 7 « Reichsgau » districts were created which were identical with the Nazi Party « Gau » districts. They were headed by « Reich » Governors who were at the same time Nazi Party « Gauleiter » and reported to the Minister of the Interior. The powers of the « Reich » Governor of Austria passed over to the « Reich » Commissioner, whose post expired on 31 March 1940, and with this date Austria finally lost its legal personality. From August 1942, even use of the terms « Ostmark » or « “ Ostmark Reichsgau ” districts » was no longer permitted ; the new comprehensive term being « Alps and Danube “ Reichsgau ” districts » .

The administrative districts were placed under the authority of a sub-prefect (« Landrat ») and were equipped with self-governing powers, the German Local Government Act took effect on 1 October 1938, and a number of towns were considerably enlarged through incorporation (Graz, Linz, Salzburg, Innsbruck, Klagenfurt, Krems, Sankt Pölten, etc.) . Major changes came with the creation of registrar's offices and the implementation of new social and tax laws. When assessing administrative and social measures, it has to be taken into consideration that Austria was forced to adopt German administrative practice and accept National-Socialist dictatorship. A strict police regime was introduced in order to consolidate the National-Socialist State, the Austrian armed forces were incorporated into the German « Wehrmacht » , 2 defence district headquarters were established and a 2 year military service was introduced, supplemented by the « Reich » Labour Service (« Reichsarbeitsdienst ») . Critics of the regime were persecuted, deported into concentration camps or sentenced to death. A concentration camp was built at Mauthausen, which later had a number of satellite camps as well.

The persecution and expulsion of Jews reached a 1st peak in the November Pogrom of 9-10 November 1938, followed by almost complete concentration of the remaining Jewish population in Vienna and by their systematic deportation into Concentration Camps and extermination camps. Subject to similar persecution were the Roma and Sinti people, especially in Burgenland. The Roman Catholic Church was subjected to intensive pressure, and this despite the Bishops' attempt in 1938 to remain on good terms with Adolf Hitler. Efforts to gain absolute control of youth education via the « Hitler-Jugend » organisation led to an assault of the Archbishop's palace in Vienna, in October 1938. Following this, numerous monasteries were closed, for example those in Admont, Altenburg, Klosterneuburg, Göttweig, Wilhering, Kremsmünster, Saint-Florian, Lambach and Stams. The abbey of Sankt Lambrecht had already been dissolved in May 1938 and was later turned into a satellite camp of the Mauthausen concentration camp. Church schools were also closed. « Volksschule » primary schools and « Hauptschule » secondary schools were reduced in number, advanced-level specialised schools (« Oberschulen ») underwent far-reaching alterations, a number of additional institutions were created. Federal institutes of education (« Bundeserziehungsanstalten ») were replaced by « Napola » Schools (National Political Institutes of Education) . In teacher training, the Austrian institute for teacher training continued to exist, as did the universities. All forms of social and cultural life were subjected to the requirements of the Nazi Party, whose organisation was closely linked with the organisation of the State.

As for the economy, the hitherto persisting high-levels of unemployment fell sharply due to War preparation by the National-Socialist regime. Road construction (« Autobahn ») took-off, as did the foundation of large-scale enterprises, particularly in Upper-Austria (Linz, Lenzing, Ranshofen) , and restructuring of existing enterprises and the exploitation of raw material resources (iron ore, mineral oil, magnesite and timber) for the armament industry. Numerous military structures (barracks, air-fields, camps) and large troop training fields (Döllersheim, Kaisersteinbruch) were built. Foreign currency reserves (ATS 471,490,000 at the end of 1937, plus clearing assets abroad) of the Austrian National Bank (« Nationalbank » , Österreichische, ÖNB) were claimed by the « Reich » Bank, and, in addition, the Austrian Schilling had to be exchanged at the unfavourable rate of 1.5 Schillings to 1 « Reichsmark » .

Foreign policy was particularly disappointing for Tyroleans, since Hitler did not reunify North and South Tyrol. Instead, German-speaking inhabitants of the Italian province of Alto Adige were given the right to move to Germany, and a large number of them were resettled in what used to be Austria. Hitler continued his aggressive expansion policy, bringing Germany to the brink of War in what came to be known as the « Sudeten crisis » of September 1938, the annexation of Southern Moravia and Southern Bohemia which were consequently incorporated into Upper-Danube and Lower-Danube, respectively. This was followed by the occupation of Czechoslovakia, making Bohemia and Moravia German protectorates, by the foundation of Slovakia and structural changes in the Balkans (Vienna Arbitration Award) . Finally, the attack on Poland led to the outbreak of the Second World War on 1 September 1939.

The immediate consequences were a deterioration of the supply situation and conscription. During the occupation of Norway, for example, Germany used almost only Austrian mountain troops. With the campaign against Yugoslavia, in April 1941, the War was carried to Austria's southern border region (headquarters in the tunnel of Tauchen, near Mönichkirchen) ; Upper-Carniola was annexed to Carinthia ; the eastern part of Slovenia integrated into Styria. The War intensified with the attack on Russia (22 June 1941) and, on 11 December 1941, Germany declared War on the United States of America. 1943 saw the beginnings of anti-aircraft defence organisation for industrial centres in Austria, in which school-children from the upper-grades had to participate as well. To make-up for the shortage of male-workers, women were trained and War prisoners and forced labourers from Poland and the Ukraine were employed in industry and agriculture.

The liquidation of the 6th German Army, including many Austrian soldiers, at Stalingrad in January 1943, marked the decisive turning-point in the War, and the implications of this were soon to be felt in all areas of daily life. « Wiener Neustadt » was the 1st Austrian town to be bombarded, on 13 August 1943, by American bomber fighters based in Tunisia. Later on, industrial sites, oil fields, transport facilities and housing estates were targeted (Bomb Warfare) . All major Austrian towns suffered heavy destruction. From 28 March 1945, Russian troops coming from Hungary entered Austria and conquered Burgenland, Vienna, the eastern half of Lower-Austria and eastern Styria. Western Austria was liberated by American, British and French troops, the south of Carinthia by the Yugoslav army.

The Nazi Party administration and other structures broke-down completely as the Second World War drew to a close. On 27 April 1945, in Vienna, Austria was proclaimed a Republic again (2nd Republic) .

Linz unter dem Hakenkreuz

Keine andere österreichische Stadt wurde vom Nationalsozialismus stärker geprägt als Linz. Noch heute sind die Spuren der NS-Zeit im Linzer Stadtbild deutlich zu sehen. Schon vor 1938 war Linz das Zentrum der illegalen Nationalsozialisten. Hitler selbst ernannte Linz, die Stadt, in der er einen Teil seiner Kindheit und Jugend verbracht hatte, zur Patenstadt des Führers. Der begeisterte Empfang den Tausenden Linzer den einmarschierenden deutschen Wehrmachtstruppen und Hitler persönlich bereiteten, war die Grundlage für den sofort vollzogenen « Anschluß » und den zweifelhaften Ehrentitel für Linz « Gründungsstaat des Großdeutschen Reiches » .

Wichtige NS-Leute waren in Linz geboren. Die Rüstungsindustrie, die hier unmittelbar nach dem Anschluß gegründet worden waren, machte Linz in den späteren Kriegsjahren zu einem bevorzugten Angriffsziel der alliierten Bomber.

Adolf Hitler und Linz

Adolf Hitler wurde am 20. April 1889 in Braunau geboren. Im Alter von 10 Jahren kam er mit seiner Familie nach Leonding. Dort besuchte er zunächst noch die Volksschule. Im Herbst 1900 begann er an der Realschule in der Steingasse in Linz. Weil er ein ziemlich schlechter Schüler war, mußte er 1904 die Realschule in Linz verlassen. Er wechselte an die Realschule in Steyr, wo er bei Kosteltern wohnte. Auch dort blieben seine Schulerfolge aus, deshalb kehrte er wieder nach Linz zurück. 1905 übersiedelte Frau Hitler - ihr Mann war bereits gestorben- mit ihrem Sohn in die Humboldtstraße, zwei Jahre später nach Urfahr, was damals noch nicht nach Linz eingemeindet war. 1908 verließ Hitler nach dem Tod seiner Mutter Linz, um in Wien an der Akademie der Bildenden Künste zu studieren. Hitlers Schulzeit in Linz war geprägt von deutschnationalem Gedankengut. Die Aufführungen der Wagner Opern im Linzer Landestheater hatten Hitlers Liebe zum Germanenkult geweckt. Gegenüber Wien, das Hitler stets als Wasserkopf, in dem zu viele Juden, Tschechen und Polen lebten, bezeichnete, hatte Linz in Hitlers Herz und Denken stets die Vorzugsstellung. Deshalb bestand der Führer auch darauf, daß die NSDAP während der Zeit der Illegalität ihren Sitz in Linz hatte.

Neben Berlin, München, Hamburg und Nürnberg war Linz die einzige österreichische Stadt, die als « Führerstadt » galt und deshalb eine bevorzugte bauliche Neugestaltung erfahren sollte. Seit dem « Anschluß » am 13. März 1938 galt Linz außerdem als « Gründungsstadt des Großdeutschen Reiches » . Linz sollte nach Hitlers Willen eine Weltstadt werden und als schönste Donaustadt Wien und Budapest in den Schatten stellen. Ab März 1938 sind neun Besuche Hitlers in Linz sicher nachzuweisen. Für Linz und seine Galerie ließ Hitler in ganz Europa Kunstwerke zusammenkaufen oder rauben, denn Linz sollte das europäische Kunstzentrum werden. Noch im April 1945 ließ sich Hitler im Führerbunker das Modell von Linz zeigen.

Der « Anschluß »

In Österreich war bereits im März 1933 das Parlament ausgeschaltet worden und nach dem Bürgerkrieg im Februar 1934 war Österreich endgültig zu einer Diktatur geworden. Nur ein Drittel der Bevölkerung stand hinter dem neuen Staat und die wirtschaftliche Lage war miserabel. Ungefähr ein Drittel der österreichischen Bevölkerung liebäugelte schon seit der Machtergreifung Hitlers in Deutschland im März 1933 mit einer Vereinigung der beiden Staaten.

Der österreichische Bundeskanzler Schuschnigg hatte auf Drängen Hitlers schon Nationalsozialisten in sein Kabinett nehmen müssen. Für den 13. März 1938 hatte er eine Volksabstimmung über die Unabhängigkeit Österreichs angesetzt. Am 10. März 1938 erhielt die achte Armee der deutschen Wehrmacht den Marschbefehl zum Einmarsch in Österreich. Nach einem deutschen Ultimatum setzte Schuschnigg am folgenden Tag die Volksabstimmung ab. Zur gleichen Zeit wurden auf der Linzer Landstraße die ersten Hakenkreuzfahnen gehisst. Gauleiter Eigruber begab sich ins Landhaus, um dort die Geschäfte des Landeshauptmannes zu übernehmen. Sepp Wolkerstorfer, der Kreisleiter der NSDAP, begann als Linzer Bürgermeister zu amtieren.

Am Abend des 11. März hielt Schuschnigg seine berühmt gewordenen Ansprache an das österreichische Volk, in der erklärte :

« Wir weichen der Gewalt. »

In Linz waren schon im Laufe des Tages alle wichtigen Gebäude von Nationalsozialisten besetzt worden. Am Abend fand auf dem Linzer Hauptplatz eine riesige Freudenkundgebung mit angeblich 50.000 Teilnehmern statt. Am 12. März passierte um acht Uhr Morgens die deutsche Wehrmacht die deutsch-österreichische Grenze. Gegen Mittag erreichte sie Linz, wo sie von einer jubelnden Menge mit Blumen begrüßt wurde.

Als Hitler am gleichen Tag um 19 Uhr in Linz eintraf, war der Jubel der Massen auf der Straße unbeschreiblich. Es waren nicht nur NS-Parteigenossen, die immer wieder « Ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Führer » schrien, sondern halb Linz wollte sich - erfasst von einer Massenhysterie » - kritiklos « dem Führer » anvertrauen. Vom Balkon des Linzer Rathauses hielt Hitler eine kurze Rede, in der er seine Ergriffenheit über den jubelnden Empfang und seine Verbundenheit mit seiner Heimatstadt betonte. Erst hier fasste er den Entschluß, den « Anschluß » sofort und zur Gänze zu vollziehen. Am 13. März teilte er diese Idee bei einem Mittagessen im Hotel Weinzinger an der Donaulände (heute Generali-Gebäude) den zehn « verdienstvollsten und treuesten » österreichischen Nationalsozialisten mit. Zu diesen gehörten Sepp Wolkerstorfer, Franz Langoth und August Eigruber.

Hitler verkündete :

« Österreich ist ein Teil des deutschen Reiches. »

Dieser Gesetzestext wurde prompt nach Wien geliefert, wo er von der Regierung rasch unterzeichnet wurde. Der « Anschluß » war vollzogen. Nach diesen Jubelbildern konnte der Rest der Welt nur schwer gegen eine Besetzung Österreichs durch die Deutschen protestieren.

Die « Volksabstimmung »

Sofort nach dem « Anschluß » wurde das österreichische Bundesheer in die deutsche Wehrmacht eingegliedert und auf den Oberbefehlshaber Adolf Hitler vereidigt. Für den 10. April hatte Hitler eine Volksabstimmung über die Wiedervereinigung Deutschlands und Österreichs angesetzt. Diese nachträgliche Zustimmung war natürlich eine reine Farce.

Von Anfang an lehnte Hitler eine internationale Überwachung des Abstimmungsvorganges ab.

Die Propaganda setzte sofort und umfassend ein, um den Österreichern noch rechtzeitig vor der Wahl die « positiven und sozialen » Seiten des Nationalsozialismus vor Augen zu führen : Österreichische Kinder durften zur Erholung nach Deutschland fahren, in Deutschland wurde für Not leidende Österreicher Geld und Gewand gesammelt. Linz erhielt 100 Zentner Fleisch- und Wurstkonserven, 61 Zentner Zucker und 264 Zentner andere Lebensmittel.

Leute, die sich kritisch zum neuen System äußerten, wurden sofort verhaftet. Viele Prominente, wie zum Beispiel der Gründungskanzler der Ersten Republik, Doktor Karl Renner, und die österreichischen Bischöfe machten Werbung für den « Anschluß » . Wahlberechtigt waren natürlich nur Menschen « deutschen Blutes » . Juden oder mit Juden verheiratete Personen waren von vornherein ausgeschlossen. Außerdem waren die Wahlzettel teilweise manipuliert und die Stimmabgabe wurde überwacht. Es blieben also nur die Ja-Sager übrig. In Linz waren 81.644 Personen stimmberechtigt. 99,5 % waren zur Abstimmung gegangen, davon hatten 99,92 % mit Ja gestimmt, nur 66 Leute hatten es gewagt, das Nein, welche viel kleiner geschrieben war, anzukreuzen. Bürgermeister Wolkerstorfer freute sich über das beste Ergebnis einer deutschen Großstadt.

Leute, die mit Nein gestimmt hatten, wurden genau untersucht und verfolgt.

Die Patenstadt : Hitlers Baupläne für Linz

Wie schon erwähnt fühlte sich Hitler Linz ganz besonders verbunden und hatte Großes mit dieser Stadt vor. 1938 hatte Linz ungefähr 120.000 Einwohner. In zwei Etappen sollte die Stadt auf 320.000 beziehungsweise 420.000 Einwohner anwachsen. Damit für die vielen Menschen Platz war, wurden deshalb zunächst umliegende Gemeinden eingemeindet. Sankt Magdalena und Ebelsberg wurden Teil von Linz, damit wuchs das Stadtgebiet von 56 auf 96 quadrakilometer an. Die Planungen für den Ausbau von Linz setzten unmittelbar nach dem « Anschluß » mit großer Vehemenz ein. Schon am 13. März 1938 versprach Hitler den Bau einer neuen Donaubrücke. Tatsächlich wurde die Nibelungenbrücke auch 1940 bereits fertiggestellt. Die Pläne für Linz können in folgende Gruppen zusammengefasst werden.

Die Monumentalverbauung der beiden Donauufer als Verwaltungsforum.

Eine Prachtstraße als Verlängerung der Landstraße mit einem Kulturzentrum und einem neuen Bahnhof.

Die Hermann-Göring-Werke.

Neue Hafenanlagen als Großumschlagplatz.

Linz als Knotenpunkt des Reichsautobahnnetzes.

Einen inneren und einen äußeren Ring um die Stadt für den Verkehr.

Zur Monumentalverbauung der Donauufer.

Das Konzentrationslager Mauthausen und seine Außenlager

Gauleiter Eigruber verkündete am 29. März 1938 begeistert, daß Oberösterreich das Konzentrationslager für alle österreichischen Volksverräter bekommen sollte. Tosender Applaus begleitete diese Ankündigung. Bereits am 8. August wurden die ersten Gefangenen aus dem KZ Dachau nach Mauthausen überstellt.

Mauthausen war wegen der Steinbrüche und des reichhaltigen Lehm Bodens, der sich hervorragend zur Ziegelherstellung eignete, als Standort ausgewählt worden.

Die Gefangenen sollten das Baumaterial für die Linzer Prachtbauten beschaffen. Außerdem rechnete die NS-Führung damit, bei Kriegsausbruch noch mehr Haftraum zu brauchen. Die Zahl der Inhaftierten stieg bis 1944 auf 73.000 Personen an.

In der Stadt Linz befanden sich drei Außenlager.

Das Lager I bestand schon seit 1942 auf dem Gebiet der Reichswerke Hermann Göring, hier lebten über 800 Gefangene, die vor allem die anfallende Hochofenschlacke verarbeiten mußten. Bei einem Luftangriff 1944 wurde es weitgehend zerstört und aufgelöst.

Das Lager II befand sich im Märzenkeller unter dem Bauernberg. Die Häftlinge mußten die Stollenanlagen ausbauen. In den Stollen waren sie auch untergebracht. Das Lager III wurde auch auf dem Gebiet der heutigen Vöest errichtet. Hier waren bis zu 5.600 männliche Gefangene untergebracht und beschäftigt. Sie waren bei der Panzerproduktion in den Eisenwerken Oberdonau eingesetzt, weil dieser Betrieb trotz eines 60 % -igen Ausländeranteils an den Beschäftigten unter ständigem Personalmangel litt. Lager III war das größte innerhalb von Linz.

In der Endphase des Krieges wurden Tausende Häftlinge aus Mauthausen und seinen Nebenlagern für Aufräumarbeiten nach Bombenangriffen, insbesondere zur Aufrechterhaltung des Eisenbahnverkehrs herangezogen. Insgesamt waren mehr als 190.000 Menschen aus allen möglichen Ländern und wegen aller möglichen Gründe nach Mauthausen eingewiesen worden. Systematischer Terror, gezielte Tötungsaktionen, Arbeitsausbeutung, mangelnde Ernährung, unzureichende Bekleidung und fehlende medizinische Versorgung führten zum Tod von circa 100.000 Gefangenen.

Juden in Linz

Mit der Industrialisierung in der Mitte des 19. Jahrhunderts waren vermehrt Juden nach Oberösterreich gezogen. Vor allem Urfahr hatte sich zu einem Zentrum der jüdischen Schnapsproduktion entwickelt. Den Katholiken war nämlich die Erzeugung dieses « teuflischen » Getränkes noch immer verboten.

Um 1900 lebten in Linz circa 700 Juden, in ganz Oberösterreich 1.100. Linz war der Sitz einer eigenen Kultusgemeinde, die Synagoge befand sich in der Bethlehemstraße.

Antisemitismus gab es auch schon vor den Nazis, sogar der Linzer Bischof Gföllner wetterte in einem Hirtenbrief 1933 heftig gegen den jüdischen Weltgeist. Die Nationalsozialisten verbreiteten auch schon während ihrer Illegalität ihre rassistische Propaganda. Jüdische Unternehmer wurden wiederholt als Ausbeuter und Blutsauger beschimpft. Die noch illegalen Nazis legten Listen jüdischer Unternehmer und ihres Vermögens an.

Sofort nach der Machtergreifung ging man gegen die Juden vor. Ihre Geschäfte und ihr Vermögen wurden beschlagnahmt. Sie selbst wurden verhaftet und nach Dachau gebracht. Drei Mitglieder der bekannten Unternehmerfamilie Spitz begingen Selbstmord. Gleich nach dem « Anschluß » erschien eine Anzeige in der Zeitung, daß die Firma Kraus und Schober arisiert sei. Jüdische Kinder durften die normalen Schulen nicht mehr besuchen, sie mußten in die Judenschule im Waaghaus in der Altstadt gehen. In der sogenannten « Reichskristallnacht » ging auch die Synagoge in Linz in Flammen auf.

Leopold Mostny, Urfahrner Ehrenbürger, der stets sehr sozial und um das Gemeinwohl besorgt gewesen war, -er hatte unter anderem den Grund für die Erbauung der Jahnschule hergeschenkt, - wurde 100jährig noch in das KZ-Theresienstadt gebracht, wo er bald darauf starb. Ungefähr 300 jüdischen Menschen gelang die Flucht. 145 wanderten nach Israel aus, knapp 100 in die USA, 45 nach Großbritannien. Insgesamt haben in Oberösterreich vor Ort nur 26 jüdische Personen überlebt, die meisten hatten in einer Mischehe gelebt und hatten daher gegenüber anderen doch gewisse Privilegien. Die Zahl der Rückkehrer war spärlich. Fünf wanderten zurück, acht hatten das KZ überlebt und zogen wieder nach Linz.

Nach Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges lebten kurze Zeit Tausende ostjüdische Vertriebene und Flüchtlinge als « Displaced Persons » in den großen Lagern am Bindermühl und in Ebelsberg in Linz. Die meisten wanderten aber nach der Staatsgründung Israels 1948 weiter. Simon Wiesenthal gründete in Linz das Zentrum für Jüdische Historische Dokumentation. Deshalb erlangte Linz für die historische Forschung besondere Bedeutung.

Erst vor sehr kurzer Zeit erinnerte sich die Stadt Linz ihrer ermordeten jüdischen Mitbewohner und benannte Straßen nach ihnen. In der Mostnystraße befinden sich das Altstoffsammelzentrum und das Tierheim. Nach der Familie Spitz und nach dem Präsidenten der jüdischen Kultusgemeinde Karl Schwager sind zwei kleine Wege in der Nähe des Volkshauses Dornach benannt.

Die Tötung « lebensunwerten Lebens »

Die Landes- und Pflegeanstalt Niedernhart hatte den dreißiger Jahren auf beachtliche Erfolge mit der « Arbeitstherapie », die der ärztliche Leiter Doktor Josef Böhm eingeführt hatte, erzielt und sich damit einen rundum sehr guten Ruf erworben. Der « Anschluß » brachte für die Psychiatrie große Veränderungen.

Menschen die keinen sichtbaren oder messbaren Nutzen für den Staat bringen konnten, hatten im NS-System keinen Platz. Schwachsinnige, Epileptiker, Schizophrene, körperlich Missgebildete, erblich Blinde, ... waren in Deutschland sofort nach der Machtergreifung Hitlers per Gesetz zwangssterilisiert worden. Diese Gesetze galten nun auch für Österreich.

Ende 1938 begann man mit der Kindereuthanasie, im Juli 1938 mit der Erwachseneneneuthanasie. Man rechnete aus, was diese Leute dem Staat kosteten, daß man ihre Plätze und Pfleger sinnvoller für Lazarette verwenden könnte und beschloß daher, diese Menschen umzubringen.

Neue Leiter von Niedernhart und Hartheim wurden Doktor Lonauer und Doktor Renno. Schloß Hartheim bei Alkoven, wo sich übrigens 2003 eine Landesausstellung mit dem Thema befassen wird, wurde für Österreich zum Ort des Grauens. Zu Ostern 1940 wurde mit der Tötung der Patienten begonnen.

Niedernhart war manchmal Durchgangsstation, beziehungsweise oft Tarnadresse für den eigentlichen Bestimmungsort.

Meist wurden die Behinderten in Hartheim vergast, die Angehörigen bekamen eine Sterbeurkunde mit falschen Angaben. Weil die Bevölkerung mit diesen Aktionen absolut nicht einverstanden war, sich immer mehr Unmut darüber regte, und auch die Kirchen heftig protestierten, wurde die Tötung Geisteskranker offiziell eingestellt. Heimlich und unter noch größeren Tarnaktionen ging die Ermordung aber weiter und zwar nun auch in Niedernhart selbst.

Die Leiter des Krankenhauses hatten den Ehrgeiz, alle Patienten loszuwerden, damit sie die Betten verwundeten Soldaten zur Verfügung stellen konnten.

Nach Kriegsende beging Doktor Lonauer mit seiner Familie Selbstmord. Doktor Renno tauchte unter und konnte deshalb nie zur Verantwortung seiner Verbrechen vor Gericht gestellt werden.

Der Ausländereinsatz

Bereits ab Mai 1939 spielten tschechische und slowakische Bauarbeiter eine wichtige Rolle beim Bau. 2.000 Männer waren im Lager Schlantendorf bei Sankt Magdalena untergebracht. Jeden Morgen zogen sie zu einer Großbaustelle und arbeiten dort bis zum späten Abend.

Mit Kriegsausbruch verschärfte sich die Situation am Arbeitsmarkt.

Die österreichischen Männer mußten in den Krieg ziehen, also brauchte man jede Menge Arbeiter, meist Zwangsarbeiter aus anderen Ländern.

Im September lebten 20.541 ausländische Arbeitskräfte in Linz. Die Hälfte waren Italiener, die mit Benito Mussolini nicht einverstanden waren und deshalb zur Zwangsarbeit geschickt worden waren. Es waren aber fast 25 Nationen unter den Zwangsarbeitern vertreten. Nur 740 Facharbeiter lebten in Privatquartieren, der Rest war in Baracken- oft unter katastrophalen Bedingungen- untergebracht.

1943 gab es in Linz 84 solcher Lager.

Kriegsgefangene Russen wurden vor allem im Lager Auhof untergebracht. Der Großteil der Zwangsarbeiter war männlich, aber es gab sogar eigene Frauenlager. Eingesetzt wurden diese Menschen in fast allen Bereichen, nach den Bombenangriffen vor allem auch zu Aufräumarbeiten und zur Entschärfung von Blindgehern.

Ab 1944 wurde die Wochenarbeitszeit für alle Beschäftigten auf 72 Stunden ausgedehnt.

In manchen Betrieben betrug der Anteil der ausländischen Arbeitskräfte 60 und sogar 70 % .

All diese Menschen bekamen fast nichts bezahlt und wurden außerdem oft äußerst schlecht behandelt und teilweise sogar verprügelt.

Die Firmen, die solche Menschen beschäftigten, sparten sich so viel Geld. In den fünfziger Jahren wurde zwischen Magistrat Linz und verschiedenen Firmen heftig über Zahlungen gestritten, dann ließ man die Sache einschlafen. Erst in den letzten Jahren wurde wieder über Entschädigungszahlen der noch Überlebenden diskutiert. Momentan befassen sich Historikerkommissionen und ein Auftragswerk des Landestheaters mit diesem Thema.

Das Ende

Lange Zeit waren viele Linzer besonders begeistert vom Nationalsozialismus. Das änderte sich aber je deutlicher Linz die Folgen des Krieges spürte, die Rationierung von allen Lebensmitteln und anderen Gebrauchsgütern des Alltages und die damit verbundenen Preissteigerungen waren schon unangenehm, die Auswirkungen der Fliegerangriffe aber noch viel schlimmer.

Zwischen Juli 1944 und April 1945 gab es auf Linz 22 Fliegerangriffe. Linz war vor allem wegen seiner Schwerindustrie zum bevorzugten Ziel der alliierten Bomber geworden.

Als trauriges Ergebnis von 22 Bombenangriffen blieben :

691 total beschädigte.

1.174 schwer beschädigte.

1.284 mittel und 8.935 leicht beschädigte Häuser zurück.

Das war ein Drittel des Linzer Häuserbestandes.

20.000 Menschen waren obdachlos geworden. Schwerer als die materiellen Schäden wogen die 1679 Toten und die annähernd gleich hohe Zahl an Schwer- und Leichtverletzten. Ein besonders trauriges Ereignis war der Bombenangriff vom 16. Oktober 1944 gewesen. In der Dürnbergerschule waren 40 Berufsschülerinnen ums Leben gekommen. Eine Gedenktafel in der Otto-Glöckl-Schule erinnert daran. Obwohl das Ende schon abzusehen war und in Wien bereits eine provisorische österreichische Regierung zusammengetreten war, wollten die oberösterreichischen Führer noch weiter kämpfen und auch noch die Nibelungenbrücke sprengen lassen. Nur mühsam gelang es besonnenen Personen, August Eigruber von diesem Wahnsinn abzuhalten.

Zwei Vertreter der Stadt - Kreisleiter Franz Danzer und Doktor Rosenauer als Dolmetscher- verhandelten am 4. Mai in Rottenegg mit den Amerikanern.

Am nächsten Tag rückten um 11 Uhr die ersten Panzer der 11. Amerikanischen Division auf dem Linzer Hauptplatz ein. Der Krieg für Linz war zu Ende, aber die Stadt lag weitgehend in Schutt und Asche.

Les Juifs en Autriche

L'histoire des juifs d'Autriche est inséparable de l'Empire d'Autriche jusqu'au XXe siècle puis des persécutions nazies à partir des années 1930.

Les Ires communautés juives se sont installées à la fin du XIIIe siècle. L'Autriche est devenu un centre culturel juif au cours du XIIIe siècle. Les Ires expulsions remontent au XIVe siècles. D'autres ont eu lieu par la suite, comme celle de 1669. En 1867, l'Empereur François-Joseph accorde aux Juifs l'égalité des droits. Dès lors, une bourgeoisie juive assimilée se développe contribuant fortement à la vie culturelle, économique et scientifique autrichienne. En 1900, Vienne, grâce à la présence de ses élites juives, peut apparaître selon les mots de Walter Benjamin comme « la capitale du XXe siècle » .

Pourtant, au même moment, se développent les nouvelles formes de l'antisémitisme nourries par la longue crise qui commence en 1870. 2 mouvements se distinguent : le « Christlichsoziale » influencé par l'anti-judaïsme religieux et l'« Alldeutschen » , un mouvement pan-germaniste. Adolf Hitler qui séjourne à Vienne, de 1907 à 1913, sera fortement influencé par ces 2 mouvements. Après la Première Guerre mondiale et la naissance de la république d'Autriche qui consacre la disparition de l'Empire austro-Hongrois, 201,513 juifs sont concentrés à Vienne.

Après 1918, les Sociaux-Démocrates dominent le vie politique. Malgré l'antisémitisme ambiant, aucune mesure anti-juive n'est prise. Dans les années 1930, on compte quelque 200,000 Juifs vivant en Autriche (recensement 1934 : 191,481) , principalement à Vienne (1934 : 176,034) . En 1934, un régime autoritaire est installé en Autriche. Le nombre de juifs dans les secteurs bancaire, judiciaire et médical diminue.

Suite à l' « Anschluß » avec l'Allemagne nazie, le 12 mars 1938, l'antisémitisme explose. De nombreux commerces juifs sont pillés. Les scènes d'humiliation publique sont fréquentes. Ruth Maier raconte dans son journal :

« Même si les Juifs ne jouissaient pas tout à fait des mêmes droits que le reste de la population, ils occupaient cependant une place décente. Désormais, ils sont ravalés au rang d'animaux, de porcs, de non humains. »

Les lois antisémites en vigueur dans le « Reich » s'appliquent désormais à l'Autriche. Elle raconte encore les violences subies par les Juifs :

« La rue est déserte. Un jeune Juif bien vêtu, arrive au coin. 2 SS surgissent. L'un, puis l'autre, donne une gifle au Juif qui vacille, se tient la tête et poursuit son chemin. »

« L'Autriche devient le laboratoire de la politique antisémite » du « Reich » . Les Nazis y développent la politique des aryansisations forcées mais aussi l'émigration forcée. En août 1938, Adolf Eichmann crée la centrale pour l'émigration juive, la « Zentralstelle für Jüdische Auswanderung in Wien » . Elle prévoit de dépouiller de leurs biens les Juifs avant leur départ, en mai 1939. La moitié des juifs d'Autriche a quitté le pays ; les 2/3, en septembre 1939. En tout, 130,000 personnes sont concernées. Le modèle est copié en Allemagne après la « nuit de cristal » puis en Bohême-Moravie. Avec la guerre, l'émigration devient difficile. Dans un 1er temps, Eichmann envoie 1,584 juifs autrichiens dans les environs de Lublin mais l'opération est interrompue par Heinrich Himmler. En février 1941, les déportations reprennent. Elles concernent 5,031 personnes. Mais les préparatifs de l'invasion de l'URSS interrompent le processus. Après les succès de l'opération « Barbarossa » , les Juifs autrichiens sont de nouveau déportés à Łódź, Riga, Minsk ou encore « Theresienstadt » (plus de 15,000 personnes) . En tout, près de 49,000 Juifs sont déportés. Seul 2,162 survivront.

65,500 des 191,481 Juifs autrichiens et à peu près 25,000 « mischlings » sont assassinés par les Nazis ; on connaît les noms de 62,000 d'entre-eux. Tous les autres (de 130,000 à 155,000) se réfugient à l'étranger où survivent en se cachant. Entre 2,000 et 5,000 survivent à la « Shoah » en Autriche ou dans les camps de concentration.

À la chute du « Rideau de fer » , un nouveau flux de Juifs arrive en provenance de l'ancienne Union soviétique. Au recensement de 2001, la population juive autrichienne était estimée autour de 8,140 personnes, essentiellement à Vienne (7,000) . Les estimations de 2007-2008 évoquent le chiffre de 15,000 à 20,000 juifs en Autriche.

C'est à Paris, où il suivait l'affaire Dreyfus pour le quotidien viennois « Neue Freie Presse » , que Theodor Herzl a inventé le sionisme. Si la patrie des droits de l'homme, pensait-il, se laisse gagner à son tour par les fureurs de l'antisémitisme, c'est la preuve que les juifs ne verront pas la fin de leurs tourments tant qu'ils n'auront pas une terre à eux sur laquelle ils ne seront plus minoritaires.

Juif hongrois devenu à Vienne un journaliste réputé, Herzl pouvait, à juste titre, comparer sa situation à celle des juifs français. Traités avec bienveillance par l'Empereur François-Joseph qui apprécie leur talent et leur loyauté à la couronne, les juifs occupent en Autriche, jusqu'aux années 1880, des positions importantes dans la banque, l'industrie et le monde politique, comme le montre Jacques Le Rider dans une enquête passionnante sur le malaise de la conscience juive dans la Vienne « fin de siècle » .

Tant que l'Autriche a eu un régime électoral censitaire, gauche Libérale et droite conservatrice alternaient au pouvoir. La bourgeoisie juive soutenait le camp Libéral. « Tout petit juif, bon élève, écrit Sigmund Freud, portait alors dans son sac d'écolier un portefeuille ministériel. » Mais le suffrage universel a radicalisé le partage.

La droite est devenue nationaliste et antisémite ; la gauche, socialiste. Les juifs ont été progressivement exclus du jeu politique. Ardents partisans de l'action républicaine des années 1880, les juifs français, aussi, se sont crus pleinement intégrés à la nation jusqu'à l'explosion d'antisémitisme de l'affaire Dreyfus, qui les a ramenés au principe de réalité. La comparaison s'arrête là. L'antisémitisme n'a pas été définitivement vaincu en France par la réhabilitation de Dreyfus. Il s'est réveillé dans les années 1930 et il renaît aujourd'hui chez les Français musulmans. Il a même été au pouvoir sous Vichy, grâce à un solide appui de l'occupant. Mais il est toujours resté un courant politique minoritaire et peu fréquentable.

Dans l'Empire austro-hongrois et les États nationaux qui en sont issus, l'antisémitisme est devenu un code politique dominant. Tous les écrivains et les artistes du milieu viennois, dont Jacques Le Rider dissèque subtilement les rapports à leur judéité, s'identifiaient à la culture allemande qu'ils illustraient avec éclat. Ils ont senti venir ce rejet comme une tragédie inéluctable qu'ils ont, chacun à sa manière, tenté d'exorciser.

Hugo von Hofmannsthal, le flamboyant librettiste de Richard Strauß, a choisi le déni en s'identifiant à la part non juive de ses origines familiales. Karl Kraus, polémiste redoutable, a carrément rallié l'antisémitisme. Mais ce qu'on a attribué à la « haine de soi » n'était peut-être chez lui qu'une manière de dénoncer le conformisme soumis de nombreux juifs viennois. Gustav Mahler s'est abandonné avec masochisme à sa fascination pour le génie wagnérien. La conversion d'Arnold Schönberg au protestantisme est, au contraire, un geste de rupture avec le catholicisme autrichien. Sigmund Freud, Arthur Schnitzler ou Stefan Zweig ne se sont pas ré-approprié leur judéité par un souci d'enracinement identitaire mais pour défendre leur honneur face aux insultes et à la haine.

Car pour ces juifs qui jouaient un rôle décisif dans l'extraordinaire floraison culturelle de l'Autriche-Hongrie, à Vienne mais aussi à Budapest, Prague, Zagreb, Trieste et nombre d'autres villes de la double monarchie, la Terre promise ne se situait pas dans une improbable Palestine. Elle se logeait dans la modernité du bel aujourd'hui que leur imagination créatrice ne cessait de redessiner. Ils ne réclamaient pas, comme les autres nations de l'Empire, une portion de l'Autriche-Hongrie. Cette mosaïque de peuples et de religions entraînée dans un grand mouvement de libéralisation, ils l'aimaient et la voulaient tout entière.

Comme les héros de Robert Musil dans « l'Homme sans qualités » , ils étaient tentés de voir dans cette utopie en marche un message d'espoir pour l'Europe et pour l'humanité. Mais ils étaient assez lucides pour pressentir qu'il n'en serait rien.

Rares ont été les périodes aussi fécondes politiquement, scientifiquement et culturellement que la Vienne de la fin du XIXe et du début du XXe siècle. Les Juifs, à qui l'Empire Libéral a accordé l'égalité des droits, affluent dans cette capitale de la « Mitteleuropa » et s'imposent rapidement à l'avant-garde dans tous les domaines.

Dans son ouvrage aussi passionnant que complet, Jacques Le Rider nous fait revivre l'effervescence du socialisme et du sionisme naissants dans une société où le raffinement s'accommode très bien d'un antisémitisme de plus en plus virulent et structuré idéologiquement. Il nous initie, à travers une saisissante galerie de portraits, à la naissance de notre modernité : la psychanalyse avec Freud, la littérature avec Schnitzler et Zweig, la musique avec Mahler et Schönberg, la critique du journalisme avec Karl Kraus.

Dans l'Empire austro-hongrois et les États nationaux qui en sont issus, l'antisémitisme est devenu un code politique dominant. Tous les écrivains et les artistes du milieu viennois, dont Jacques Le Rider dissèque subtilement les rapports à leur judéité, s'identifiaient à la culture allemande qu'ils illustraient avec éclat. Ils ont senti venir ce rejet comme une tragédie inéluctable qu'ils ont, chacun à sa manière, tenté d'exorciser.

Ils ne réclamaient pas, comme les autres nations de l'Empire, une portion de l'Autriche-Hongrie. Cette mosaïque de peuples et de religions entraînée dans un grand mouvement de libéralisation, ils l'aimaient et la voulaient tout entière.

Dans ce monde-là, celui que l'on retrouve sous la plume de Proust, les élites de la bourgeoisie, mêlées aux derniers représentants de l'ancienne aristocratie, préférèrent, au pouvoir politique, la quête de soi, l'espérance en la science et les valeurs de l'art et du Libéralisme. Moment unique de passion, de beauté et de frustration qui se transformera en cauchemar sanglant avec la montée des nationalismes.

...

Freud, Zweig, Roth et tant d'autres ont cru à cette Vienne, capitale moderne et Libérale d'un Empire austro-hongrois pluraliste, monarchie bicéphale tolérante pour ses minorités qui avait consacré l'émancipation des Juifs. Éducation, pleine égalité des droits (1867), accès à la Fonction publique et à toute profession ; la modernité éclairée avait mené à son terme l'assimilation des Juifs sous la houlette de l'Empereur François-Joseph.

Jacques Le Rider, germaniste et grand spécialiste de la « Mitteleuropa » (l'Europe centrale), scrute l'envers du décor de cette Vienne Impériale de la Belle Époque qui lance et relance cette étrange et inquiétante question de la judéité, cette sempiternelle dialectique du même et de l'autre. Narcissisme de la petite différence ? Les Juifs viennois, en tout point comparables à leurs compatriotes « de souche », ne seront jamais des Viennois invisibles, comme les autres. D'abord, les Juifs viennois intégrés se retournent contre les Juifs venus de l'Est (« Ostjuden ») qui, de Galicie polonaise et de Bucovine, affluent dans la capitale. Mais que signifie le mot « juif » ? Une confession, une nationalité parmi d'autres, des us et coutumes, l'impulsion décisive donnée à la vie culturelle ? Pour la majorité, ils se sentent « juifs des 3 jours de l'année » (Pâque juive, Nouvel-An juif et Grand Pardon) , viennois jusqu'au bout des doigts.

Mais, depuis les années 1890, l'antisémitisme feutré est devenu « code culturel » et il est de bon ton d'afficher, sans vergogne, cette attitude politiquement correcte dans la bonne société et dans la presse. C'est Karl Lueger (1844-1910) , dirigeant du Parti Chrétien-Social, devenu le maire inamovible de Vienne dont Adolf Hitler se réclamera, qui fédère toute la lie antisémite. Anti-capitalisme et catholicisme radical, anti-Libéralisme et pan-germanisme ; l'assimilation est remise en question jusqu'à la glissade mortelle vers le mot « race » . La sinistre « question juive » fait son entrée, pour n'en plus sortir, dans le débat public. Face à la montée d'un péril de plus en plus brutal, des personnalités montent au créneau, ceux qui savent ce que le mot « juif » veut dire. Le rabbin Joseph Samuel Bloch ferraille dans les journaux, les associations, et même comme député, contre cette haine.

Peine perdue car l'antisémitisme est une passion irréductible, irrationnelle. Nationalisme en miroir, le sionisme offre à Nathan Birnbaum ou à Theodor Herzl la possibilité de penser les Juifs comme peuple avec une langue et un État ou, à tout le moins, une autonomie dans l'Empire. Dans la Vienne littéraire, des écrivains se sentent mal à l'aise. Hugo von Hofmannsthal, élitiste et snob, officier de cavalerie autrichien, déteste de se voir mêler à « tous ces lémures menant une existence parasitaire » . Mais le mot « juif » lui colle à la peau. Même un Karl Kraus, dans la revue « La Torche » , pourfendeur infatigable du journalisme, « ersatz » de littérature et symptôme d'abaissement intellectuel, fustige, parfois dans des termes que ne récuserait pas un antisémite, la marchandisation totale du monde à venir.

L'Édit de Tolérance, promulgué par l'Empereur Joseph II, en 1781, ouvrit aux Juifs l'accès aux institutions scolaires et universitaires, ainsi qu'aux métiers dont ils étaient exclus ; en 1787, la carrière militaire leur fut également ouverte. Dans la période qui suivit jusqu'en 1848, les familles juives établies à Vienne s'assimilèrent bien dans la culture bourgeoise allemande, nourrie de l'idéal universaliste de Goethe, Schiller ou Humboldt.

Parallèlement, de nombreux audacieux firent florès dans l'industrie, la banque, le commerce, et furent anoblis par l'Empereur. Comme en Allemagne et dans toutes les sociétés européennes, les Juifs étaient les agents de la modernisation économique et culturelle :

« Ils le sont à Vienne sans doute plus encore que dans d'autres régions de culture allemande, dans la mesure où le type humain façonné par l'éthique protestante, que Max Weber considère comme indissociable de l'esprit du capitalisme, est marginal dans le système culturel autrichien, ce qui attise, à Vienne, le conflit entre le type du juif capitaliste et la tradition anti-capitaliste du catholicisme social. »

Après 1848, l'idéal politique Libéral triompha pendant une trentaine d'années, qui furent l'âge d'or de l'intégration des

Juifs dans la société et la culture viennoises. Mais à partir de 1880, le processus engagé dû faire face à 2 facteurs : le renforcement de l'antisémitisme, suite aux conséquences sociales du « krach » boursier de 1873, et l'afflux dans la ville de juifs pauvres et traditionnalistes des frontières orientales de l'Empire. Entre 1857 et 1910, la population globale de Vienne fut multipliée par 5 mais sa population juive par 28, formant 8,6 % de la population totale, contre 3,7 % à Berlin.

Telle est la toile de fond sur laquelle se déroula la vie des Juifs viennois à la « Belle Époque ». L'éminent germaniste Jacques Le Rider, un des meilleurs connaisseurs français de l'Europe centrale, l'analyse dans un ouvrage passionnant. Comment des Juifs qui n'étaient pratiquement plus juifs, ont-ils affronté un antisémitisme souvent virulent, alimenté tantôt par l'anti-capitalisme marxiste qui travaillait la classe ouvrière, tantôt par l'hostilité « bourgeoise » aux nouvelles formes d'art, ou encore par l'anti-judaïsme d'une certaine tradition catholique ?

Pour répondre à la question, Jacques Le Rider a questionné quelques grandes figures de la modernité viennoise. À commencer par Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), qui resta fidèle au judaïsme mais sous le signe de la rationalité scientifique athée. De son côté, Arthur Schnitzler (1862-1931), l'auteur doux-amer de « La Ronde » et d'un prémonitoire « Vienne au crépuscule », a souvent évoqué dans ses œuvres la difficulté pour un Juif d'oublier qu'il est un juif, « car les autres ne l'oubliaient pas, ni les chrétiens, ni encore moins les juifs ». De fait, un nombre croissant de Juifs, revendiquant leur « judaïté », reprochèrent aux « assimilés » de renier leurs origines : du journaliste Karl Kraus qui adressait aux Juifs toutes sortes de reproches dans des termes que les antisémites n'auraient pas reniés, à Theodor Herzl (1860-1904), qui, retrouvant des attaches ancestrales, lança le mouvement sioniste de retour en Palestine.

Brillante incarnation de la Jeune-Vienne littéraire et futur librettiste de Richard Strauß (« Le Chevalier à la Rose », « Elektra », « Ariane à Naxos »), Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874-1929), d'une famille anoblie par l'Empereur, constitue un cas troublant :

« Lui qui n'avait dans les veines qu'un quart de sang juif peut cependant être considéré, à maints égards, comme écrivain juif. », disait Martin Buber en 1939.

Le Rider enchaîne :

« Malgré son rejet du judaïsme et son allergie aux discours sociaux concernant la « question juive », malgré son identité culturelle, de toute évidence viennoise, autrichienne et catholique, malgré sa prédilection pour le style aristocratique et l'art Baroque, cet auteur est considéré bien souvent, aujourd'hui encore, comme un « Juif viennois » . »

Autre grand nom de la littérature, Stefan Zweig (1881-1942). Né dans la « bonne bourgeoisie », membre à ses débuts du mouvement « jeune-juif », inspiré par l'idéologie moderniste du « Jugendstil », il refusait que le judaïsme abandonne son universalité pour se figer dans un repli hébraïque ou sioniste. Il privilégia pour lui-même un cosmopolitisme européen de grand lettré, et voyait dans l'assimilation aux cultures nationales la solution la plus souhaitable pour les Juifs européens. Cet optimisme l'aveugla un temps, si bien qu'il tomba des nues en 1914 lorsqu'il découvrit que son cher Emile Verhaeren tenait des propos anti-allemands et antisémites. En 1934, il se résolut à quitter Vienne.

Pour finir, 2 grandes figures du monde musical. De culture allemande et passionné de Richard Wagner, Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) devint la cible des antisémites dès le moment où il occupa le poste de chef d'orchestre à l'Opéra de Vienne, en 1897. Il le supportait mal. Mais beaucoup voient en lui, comme Max Brod, l'ami de Kafka, un éminent exemple de symbiose judéo-allemande, comparable à Heinrich Heine. De son côté, Arnold Schönberg (1874-1951), converti au protestantisme luthérien, confronté à l'antisémitisme croissant, se convertit au judaïsme en 1934. Il est le compositeur de l'admirable « Moïse et Aaron » et de l'émouvant « Survivant de Varsovie ».

Au moment de l'« Anschluß », en 1938, Vienne comptait environ 182,000 Juifs. Quelque 120,000 purent émigrer avant la fin de 1939. Quelque 49,000 furent déportés, dont 2,142 survécurent. Un monde était anéanti, mais nous vivons encore de ce que des Juifs viennois ont découvert, inventé, créé.

L'« aryansisation », c'est-à-dire la dépossession des biens des Juifs s'est d'abord exercée d'une façon sauvage avant d'être ensuite relayée et organisée par l'État nazi. Si cette spoliation ne fut, ces dernières années, évoquée que dans le cadre des vols spectaculaires d'œuvres d'art, les razzias effectuées par la police secrète d'état ne concernaient pourtant pas seulement les œuvres d'art, l'argent et autres objets de valeur. À Vienne comme ailleurs, la « Gestapo » raflait également dans les maisons des Juifs les objets les plus ordinaires et les plus quotidiens. Les couverts rangés dans les tiroirs, le linge serré dans les armoires jusqu'aux souvenirs photographiques ne furent pas épargnés.

C'est ainsi que le mobilier de 8 familles juives viennoises « expropriées » fut entreposé en mars 1938, après l'« Anschluß », dans un garde-meuble de l'État autrichien à Vienne (« Kaiserliches Hofmobiliendepot »). Une grande part de ce mobilier fit l'objet d'un inventaire et devint alors propriété de l'État autrichien. Bien peu de ces objets après guerre fut restitué à leurs anciens propriétaires.

Pendant l'époque nazi et jusqu'en 1998, le mobilier provenant de ce fonds (conformément à la fonction même de ce dépôt) fut prêté avant tout aux services de l'administration. Jusqu'à l'époque la plus récente et sans même que les utilisateurs de ces objets n'en aient su la provenance, ce mobilier se retrouvait dans de simples bureaux ministériels, dans les ambassades autrichiennes à l'étranger, voire dans les théâtres. Depuis 1994, l'administration de ce dépôt mobilier a entrepris une recherche approfondie. Au terme de cette recherche, une partie de ces objets encore existants a pu, dès 1998, en vertu de la loi de restitution, être rendue aux familles des anciens propriétaires.

Ces données historiques constituent le point de départ de l'exposition. Elle a pour objet de thématiser l'« aryansisation » des biens de ces 8 familles juives et de rendre compte de la façon dont les institutions d'État ont, jusqu'à l'époque la plus récente, considéré ces objets. Le cas de ces 8 familles ne reflète qu'une partie infime de la dépossession totale des biens des Juifs. Mais ces illustrations rendent intelligibles, d'une façon exemplaire, les mécanismes de ce processus brutal. Par exemple : la transformation d'une razzia et d'une expropriation en un simple acte administratif. La « légalisation » et la « normalisation » ayant été rendues possibles par le fait même que les institutions ont été partie prenante de cet acte de barbarie.

From 1933 to 1938, transfers of Jewish owned enterprises to German ownership was « voluntary » . At the time of the Nazi take-over, in 1933, there were about 100,000 Jewish owned enterprises in Germany. It is estimated that the value of Jewish help assets, at this time, was in excess of 10 billion « Reichsmarks » . During this « voluntary » period, there was relentless pressure placed on Jews to sell their businesses. By the spring of 1938, 60 % to 70 % of Jewish businesses had been liquidated pursuant to the Decree on the Registration of the Property of Jews of April 26, 1938, all Jews were required to value all their assets (foreign and domestic) and register them if their value was in excess of 5,000 « Reichsmarks » . As a result of this decree, the value of Jewish assets in « greater Germany » (including Austria) was about 8 billion « Reichsmarks » . The compulsory stage of « Aryanization » began with legislation enacted in November, 1938, the goal of which was to « exclude the Jews from the economic life of Germany » . The regulations adopted pursuant to this legislation, prohibited all economic activity of Jews except for certain services that could be rendered to Jews only. In addition, all remaining Jewish businesses were put under government control with the goal of sale to Germans with a substantial portion of the sales price going to the government.

After « Kristallnacht » , the Nazis commenced open confiscation of Jewish property. 2 of the major forms of such confiscation were the imposition of the « Suhneleistung » (atonment payment) , also known as the Jewish Capital Levy (JUVA) and the « Reichsfluchtsteuer » (escape tax) . The former was enacted on November 12, 1938, and imposed a tax of 20 % (later raised to 25 %) of the registered assets of the Jews. 1.25 billion « Reichsmarks » were collected from this tax. The latter tax had to be paid by Jews on leaving Germany, including deportation to concentration camps outside Germany. The amount of the tax was 25 % of registered assets. As a result of these levies and others, those Jews fortunate enough to emigrate were able to save only a small portion of their assets. For Jews remaining in Germany after 1938, whatever assets they had left were kept in blocked accounts in specified financial institutions, from which only a modest amount could be withdrawn for their living expenses.

Since the end of the War, enormous amounts of money have been paid by Germany to the victims of Nazi oppression. The 1st official claim was presented by the Jewish Agency in September, 1945, to the Allied governments. Between 1945 and 1947, the occupying powers enacted various legislation dealing with reparations, particularly regarding real estate. With the founding of the State of Israel, in 1948, the Jewish State, together with the major world Jewish organizations (later organized as the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany) , assumed the major responsibility in representing the Jewish people with respect to their claims. Beginning in 1951, Israel submitted notes to the Allied powers regarding reparations. Although claiming to be sympathetic, the Allied powers made it clear that the issue of reparations would have to be negotiated directly with the West-German government. Over the next 2 years, extensive negotiations took place. Finally, on March 18, 1953, an agreement was approved by all parties. Payments under this agreement ended in 1965. East-Germany did recognize any such claims until 1990. In 2000, a multi-billion dollar fund was established by the German government, numerous German corporations and other institutions to compensate those individuals who were forced laborers under the Nazi regime.

The seizure, confiscation, and theft of Jewish property during the Holocaust took place throughout Europe on a massive scale. Historian Raul Hilberg included in his analysis the expropriation of Jewish property as one of the main stages that comprised the Holocaust. Nazi Germany introduced a wide variety of confiscation measures from 1933, which were implemented by both the financial bureaucracy and the police. The « Aryanisation » of Jewish businesses (their transfer to non-Jewish ownership) during the 1930's saw many companies and private individuals competing to grab the spoils, as the Jews were driven from most branches of the economy. Similar anti-Jewish economic policies were pursued in the territories annexed and occupied by Nazi Germany from the late-1930's. Most States aligned with Nazi Germany (including Vichy France, fascist Italy, and Hungary) also introduced their own extensive legal measures to confiscate Jewish property.

Soon after the Nazi seizure of power, in 1933, Jews were excluded from the civil service and other key-professions, such as the law. A highly-visible boycott of Jewish businesses, in April, aimed to demonstrate public pressure for action against the Jews. The 1st new laws specifically authorizing the confiscation of property were directed mainly against the Nazis' political opponents in July 1933. Some Jews were affected immediately by these laws. By the start of World War II, the law for the denaturalization of emigrants, passed in July 1933, was being applied to expropriate the remaining property of thousands of Jewish emigrants.

The « Aryanisation » of businesses gathered pace during the 1930's as successive measures limited the access of « Jewish-owned companies » to state contracts and government-controlled raw materials. Currency exchange and tax laws were applied in a discriminatory way to seize Jewish property and encourage Jewish emigration. Many Jews were dismissed from employment and forced to resign from company boards, even before specific laws made this compulsory. Business ownership was transferred into « Aryan » hands, sometimes directly through black-mail and coercion. In other cases, Jews sold cheaply, anticipating still harsher measures to come. The guiding Nazi principle was that the Jews must leave, but their property should remain behind. Onerous taxes on emigration and property transfer meant that even Jews who successfully fled Germany could export only a fraction of their former wealth.

The annexation of Austria, in 1938, accelerated the process of expropriation. Here, so-called « wild Aryanisations » took place on a massive scale, as Austrian Nazis simply seized hundreds of Jewish businesses. Both the registration of Jewish property and decrees regulating compulsory Aryanisation reflected efforts by the Nazi authorities to reassert State control over « Aryanisation ». The « Kristallnacht » (Night of Broken Glass) violence, on November 9-10, 1938, which included much looting as well as wanton destruction, was exploited by « Reich » Marshal Hermann Göring, in charge of the 4 Year Plan, to impose a 1 billion « Reichsmark » fine on the Jews. This was collected over the following year through the regular tax-offices. It took the form of a special wealth tax of 25 % . Meanwhile, the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in Vienna, supervised by Adolf Eichmann, also sought to tax wealthier Jews to help cover the emigration costs of those lacking sufficient means.

On the outbreak of War, in September 1939, the blocking of bank accounts was applied to all propertied Jews to secure what little wealth remained. Largely excluded from employment, Jews faced forced labor for little or no pay. Initial expulsions of Jews into the General gouvernement (a part of German-occupied Poland) and also France, in 1939-1940, were accompanied by efforts to seize their remaining property for the State. Mass deportations of Jews from Germany to the ghettos and extermination camps, then, commenced in October 1941. Shortly after this, the infamous 11th Decree to the « Reich » Citizenship Law removed the citizenship of Jews on crossing the « Reich » border, thereby confiscating all remaining property from that instant. The « Gestapo » sealed the apartments and collected detailed inventories from the deportees ; the financial administration used this documentation to clear-out the apartments, sell-off the contents, and wind-up remaining accounts « legally » .

In the occupied East, the Nazis and their collaborators seized Jewish property in each phase of persecution. During ghettoization, sudden relocation forced Jews to leave property behind to be looted. Then Jews in the ghettos had to barter away most of what remained to obtain food to survive. At the mass shooting sites, property was taken directly from Jewish victims, with the most valuable items being sent to Berlin. Considerable efforts were made also to recycle every last item transported by train with the Jews to the extermination centers, such as Auschwitz or Treblinka.

It is important to note that the Axis-aligned and occupied States, including Bulgaria, which did not deport its own Jews to be killed, all implemented extensive confiscation measures, except for occupied Denmark. Bulgaria created a Commissariat for the « Jewish Question » in imitation of the French model and also imposed a stiff property tax on Jewish wealth. Vichy, France, introduced its own confiscation legislation in response to German measures, in part to assert French sovereignty in these matters. In Hungary, full-scale confiscation began in May 1944 concurrent with the deportations to Auschwitz ; the Hungarian government declared that Jewish assets were now viewed as Hungarian national property. In practice, however, confiscation in Hungary became a competition between private looters, various State agencies, and also the Germans to secure what they could under the chaotic conditions of sudden ghettoization. Meanwhile, the Allied nations and governments-in-exile warned that Axis property seizures, including those implemented against Jews, were regarded as illegal, and would be reversed on the conclusion of the War.

Clearly, the mass confiscation of Jewish property was integral to the Holocaust. However, it would be an exaggeration to imply that the Holocaust was motivated primarily by greed. Nazi racial anti-Semitism contained various key-elements, of which economic opportunism was only one strand. Nevertheless, economic discrimination and plunder acted as a catalyst, facilitating the Nazi process of destruction in several ways. The incentive of Jewish property provided an additional motive for some perpetrators and bought more wide-spread complicity from large sections of the general population, while the effect on the victims was demoralizing, debilitating, and stigmatizing. Ever-diminishing means reduced the opportunities for Jews to emigrate or flee, and ultimately it also wore down their physical ability to resist.

Real property, tenancy rights, personal property - expropriation during the Nazi era

Real property was « aryanised » soon after the « Anschluß » . Jews were forced to sell their real property because they were no longer admitted to their professions and the basis for their livelihood was destroyed. At the same time, they had to generate the funds required to pay discriminatory taxes and finance their flight from the country. Jewish property was transferred to non-Jewish owners and the proceeds were transferred to blocked accounts.

The new tax on registered Jewish assets (« Judenvermögensabgabe ») was imposed after the November Pogrom and proved an additional pressure on Jewish real property owners. With the decree of 3 December 1938 on the use of Jewish assets, Jews were forced to sell their property. « De-Jewification » of real property was now compulsory and decreed from above. The 11th Amendment to the « Reich » Citizenship Act of 25 November 1941 reflects the unscrupulous anti-Semitic practices of the Nazi regime. Deportation and subsequent murder of the former real property owners went hand in hand with these practices. The properties of expelled and deported Jews were now owned by the German « Reich » .

Jewish tenants

Only a few days after the « Anschluß » , Jewish tenants were driven from their apartments. « Wild aryanisation » of apartments started on the spur of the moment. Armed Nazi Party members as well as neighbours forcefully entered and looted apartments owned by Jews. At that point, Jewish tenants were, however, still protected by the law.

A decree of 10 May 1939 allowed landlords to terminate tenancy agreements with Jewish tenants but did not force them to actually do so. Once their homes had been « aryanised » Jews often had to move from one lodging to another. Several families would have to share one apartment and live in very crowded conditions. They were later moved to collecting points from where they were deported to concentration camps.

Personal Jewish property

The looting and confiscation of personal property such as household items, jewellery, books, works of art and cultural objects began right after the « Anschluß » and lasted for several weeks without any orders or instructions to do so. Perpetrators included members of the NSDAP, the SS and SA, but also parts of the local population. On the night of 9 November 1938, known as « Kristallnacht » (Night of Broken Glass) , Jewish shops were looted, Jewish homes vandalized, and Jews were beaten and abused.

Heinrich Himmler's order of 30 July 1938 entitled the State police to auction personal property confiscated in Austria. The « Dorotheum » played a leading role in the expropriation and utilisation of confiscated property. The « Vugesta » , the « Gestapo Office for the Disposal of the Property of Jewish Emigrants » was established in September 1940 and pursued private interests while striving to bring about the « de-Jewification » of society in a manner the « Aryan » population would benefit from as well. Mass deportations began in February 1941 as did sales auctions in Vienna. Everything, even the victims' last belongings, was auctioned. With the 11th Amendment to the « Reich » Citizenship Act of 25 November 1941, Jewish property was automatically transferred to the German « Reich » . The « Dorotheum » and other auction houses as well as private antiques stores, public museums, scientific institutions such as the University of Vienna and the national library benefitted from these activities.

The following information on the « Arisierungsakten » (« aryanisation files ») relates, for the most part, to the comprehensive holdings of the former National-Socialist « Vermögensverkehrsstelle » (Property Transaction Office) at the Austrian State Archives. Although, for now only, the « Vermögensanmeldungen » have been able to be incorporated into the Findbuch database from the very diverse files series « aryanisation files », this focus on the holdings of the Austrian State Archives is necessary due to the fact that, in 1938, over 90 % of Austrian Jews lived in Vienna. Due to the vital part played by the Property Transaction Office in implementing the National-Socialist policies of persecution and seizure, its « aryanisation files » take on a central role, in both qualitative and quantitative terms.

Origins of the holdings

« Aryanzation » is the term used to describe the economic (businesses, companies) and asset-related (real estate, apartments, tenancy rights) seizures perpetrated against the Jews under the National-Socialist dictatorship. It is important to differentiate between the 2 forms of « aryanisation » : the so-called « wild aryanisations » and the pseudo-legal expropriations carried-out on the basis of anti-Semitic legal provisions. The former reached their climax in Austria, in March and April 1938, and often took place with brutal force and destruction during the course of the looting and plundering raids. In order to bring these massive legal violations and the subsequent damage to the economy under control, during the course of 1938, a series of legal provisions were enacted by the National-Socialist authorities which were based on the existing anti-Semitic legislation in the German « Reich » . On the basis of the Nuremberg Laws of 15 September 1935 (German « Reich » Law Gazette of 1935, No. 1, page 1146 ; Austrian Law Gazette of 1938 ; page 150) , Jews were ordered by the « Verordnung über die Anmeldung des Vermögens von Juden » (Ordinance on the Registration of Jewish Property) of 26 April 1938 (German « Reich » Law Gazette of 1938, No. 1, page 414 ; Austrian Law Gazette of 1938, page 102) to register their assets. On 18 May 1938, the Property Transaction Office was established in Vienna. It attempted to bring under control and monitor the (sometimes self-appointed) commissars, trustees and « liquidators » of Jewish companies. In bureaucratic procedures, the Property Transaction Office was in charge of deciding on all transfers of ownership involving Jews. That meant approving purchase contracts and prices or ordering liquidations. On the basis of the « Elfte Verordnung zum Reichsbürgergesetz » (11th Decree to the « Reich » Citizenship Law) of 25 November 1941, the « Oberfinanzpräsident » (Chief Finance President) Berlin was charged with seizing all Jewish assets which still remained. The Chief Finance President delegated this task to the competent regional Chief Finance Presidents of the « Reich » Financial Administration.

In a broader sense, the term « aryanisation » not only referred to the measures for the financial plundering of the Jewish population and their physical removal from society but also their exclusion from their jobs (dismissals, redundancies, bans on practicing a profession) , restrictions on vocational training and the appropriation of movables (e.g. , artworks, furnishings, objects made from valuable metals) .

Depending on the date on which the files were opened and their provenance (from May 1938, the Property Transaction Office in Vienna ; upon implementation of the « Ostmarkgesetz » [« Ostmark » Law, German « Reich » Law Gazette, No. 1, 1939, page 777ff. ; Austrian Law Gazette of 1939, page 500] the Property Transaction Office of the « Reich » regions ; from 1941, the regional Chief Finance Presidents of the « Reich » financial administration) , the significance of the information contained in them varies. Significant information on the « wild aryanisations » only exists in rare cases. The execution of the expropriations and company liquidations can be documented to varied extents. This circumstance is often related to the value or size of the company and the importance attributed to it by the National-Socialist authorities for the German War effort. Experience has shown that files on larger industrial companies and real estate are generally more complex than those on small and medium-sized companies.

In addition to the reconstruction of the individual economic circumstances in relation to the expropriation measures, biographical and professional information on the persecutee and the « aryanizer » can be found.

Alternative sources of information

Alternative sources of information are primarily to be found enclosed in the various « aryanisation files » of the Property Transaction Office at the Austrian State Archives, which are structured according to category or branch : as a result, reports and figures which are enclosed with the original « aryanisation files » may also be found enclosed with the files series « Commissars » , « Trustees » or « Administrators » . The files of the regional Chief Finance Presidents mainly contain self-contained « aryanisation » measures which can also provide supplementary information on the expropriated persons and the status of their assets.

In the case of « aryanised » companies, it is advisable to view the « Firmenbuchakten » (commercial register files) of the competent Commercial Court as these may contain indications of the « aryanisation measure » . For seized real estate, the historical land registers and related collections of documents at the relevant District Court (« Land » Register Court) can provide insight into the transfer of ownership between 1938 and 1945. In both cases, the possibility exists that the file material (« Handelsregisterakten » - trade register files - , historical land registers or collections of documents) have already been transferred to the provincial archives.

Austrian State Archives

In the Austrian State Archives, it is necessary to differentiate between the 2 holdings of « aryanisation files » . Firstly, those of the Property Transaction Office, established in Vienna in 1938 at the Federal Ministry for the Economy and Labour, whose file holdings are, on the one hand, ordered according to economic sector (industry, trade, commerce) or according to category (real estate) and, on the other hand, according to the internal organization which was relevant at the time. It must be noted that during the implementation of the so-called « Ostmark » Law (German « Reich » Law Gazette of 1939, No.1, page 777ff. ; Austrian Law Gazette of 1939, page 500) from 1939, the regional Property Transaction Offices were established in the « Reich » regions, to which the Vienna Property Transaction Office transferred not only its authorities but also the regional « aryanisation files » . After 1945, these files (sometimes supplemented by files pursuant to the « Erstes Rückstellungsgesetz » - 1st Restitution Act - and the « Zweites Rückstellungsgesetz » - 2nd Restitution Act) came into the possession of the local competent provincial archives.

Secondly, « aryanisation files » were opened by the regional Chief Finance Presidents (according to the National-Socialist authority titles :Vienna - Lower-Danube, Graz, Upper-Danube, Innsbruck) . These were taken on after May 1945 by the re-established « Finanzlandesdirektionen » (Financial Directorates) (for example, files of the Chief Finance President Vienna - Lower-Danube to the Financial Directorate for Vienna, Lower-Austria and « Burgenland ») and used for restitution proceedings pursuant to the 1st Restitution Act and the 2nd Restitution Act. As such, the files of the Chief Finance President Vienna - Lower-Danube form an integral part of the files of the Financial Directorate for Vienna, Lower-Austria and « Burgenland » pursuant to the 1st Restitution Act.

In exceptional cases, the entire « aryanisation files » of the Property Transaction Office Vienna can be found in the files of the Chief Finance President Vienna - Lower-Danube or the Financial Directorate Vienna.

The files on seizures are found in the « Burgenländisches Landesarchiv » under the title « Arisierungsakten » (« Nordburgenland und Südburgenland ») 1938-1945 (« Aryanization files » [North Burgenland and South Burgenland] 1938-1945) in the holdings of the « Forschungsarchiv / Behördliche Archivbestände » (Research Archive / Authorities' archive holdings) . These file holdings also originated at the Property Transaction Office, established by the National-Socialists in 1938.

After the « Anschluß » of Austria to the German « Reich » , the newly-drawn boundaries of the « Gaue » (« Reich » regions) saw « Burgenland » split between the 2 neighbouring « Reich » regions : Lower-Danube and Styria. During this process, as of 15 October 1938 (Austrian Law Gazette of 1938, page 443) , the northern districts Neusiedl-am-See, Eisenstadt, Mattersburg and Oberpullendorf were merged with the « Reich » region Lower-Danube, and the southern districts Oberwart, Güssing and Jennersdorf joined the « Reich » region Styria. For this reason, for the North « Burgenland » and South « Burgenland » districts, there are 2 separate holdings of each the Property Transaction Office and the Chief Finance President of the « Reich » regions Lower-Danube and Styria.

After the end of the War, in May 1945, « Burgenland » was re-established in the Soviet occupied zone. The Eisenstadt authorities took on all archive material from the Lower-Austrian and Styrian Provincial Governments which related to « Burgenland » and had accumulated between 1938 and 1945. The files contain the entire correspondence involved in recording and « aryanizing » Jewish assets (companies, land, insurance policies, stocks and bonds and personal valuables) , for example requests for approval to buy, the appointment of a provisional administrator, valuation reports on assets, purchase contracts, purchase contract approvals, written correspondence and expert opinions on liquidation and « aryanisation » . In several of these « aryanisation files » , property notices can be found which had been enclosed with the respective « aryanisation file » by the Property Transaction Office. In addition, these holdings also contain a box (No. 67) containing 140 un-attributed property notices which are sorted alphabetically.

The file holdings are subdivided into 5 inventories. The inventories consist of 83 boxes with 1,450 individual files and an unknown number of unattributable documents.

Archives of Upper-Austria

The so called « aryanisations » in the « Reich » region Upper-Danube occurred under the supervision of the Office of the « Reich » governor Upper-Danube, particularly its department IV and sub-department IVc (Economy and Labour) and IVc/W4 (later Ib/J) . Subject area IVc/W4 was in charge of the « de-jewifications » with the exception of agricultural and silvicultural land and it was also known as the « De-jewification Department » , « Aryanization Office » and « Property Transaction Office in Linz » .

The measures documented in the files of the « Reichstatthaltereie » 1940-1945/Arisierung (Office of the « Reich » Governor 1940-1945 / « Aryanizations ») are often confusing and often connected to the corresponding holdings of the Financial Directorate for Upper-Austria (« Finanzlandesdirektion - Beschlagnahmte Vermögen ; Finanzlandesdirektion - Vermögensrückstellungen : Financial Directorate - Confiscated assets ; Financial Directorate - Restitution of assets) , or with the file series « Finanzabteilung des Landes Oberösterreich » (Financial Department of the Province of Upper-Austria) , or FiRK, or the « aryanisation files » and property notices in the holdings « Israelitische Kultusgemeinde Linz » (Jewish Community Linz) . This was a result of the gradual resolution of the competencies between the German « Reich » , the transitional entity « Land Österreich » and the « Reich » region Upper-Danube, established in 1939 (German « Reich » Law Gazette of 1939, No. 1, page 777ff. ; Austrian Law Gazette of 1939, page 500) . The state of the files can be blamed on the conflicting political and economic interests under the National-Socialists and was also caused by semi-legal to illegal interventions and activities.

The Upper-Austrian « aryanisation files » trace the asset related occurrences and liquidation of assets as documents of bureaucratic procedures, the latter up to 1944. In the cases in which no liquidation took place, the contents of the files are occasionally supplemented by documentation of the restitution proceedings from 1946 onward. In this regard, there are cross-overs with the files of the judicial restitution files pursuant to the « Drittes Rückstellungsgesetz » (3rd Restitution Act) . The Upper-Austrian Provincial Archive took on the « aryanisation files » in 1972 in combination with the file holdings « Vermögensentziehungsanmeldungen » (notifications of seized property) as « Vermögensakten » (assets files) of the Office of the « Reich » Governor Upper-Danube. After the transfer of the related « Kanzleiindex » (search index) to the Archives of Upper-Austria, in 1996, both different groups of files were finally separated from one another.

The « Reich » independent regional administration was, as the successor of the « autonomous provincial administration » (1926 to 1938 ; with exceptions until 1940) responsible for both assets of the province and the « Reich » region until both administrative authorities were merged in 1940 and 1941. The file series contains the section of the « Reich » independent regional administration which was continued in the Finance Department of the Office of the Upper-Austrian Provincial Government after 1945. It is important to note that the « aryanisation measures » only form part of the files of the « Reich » independent regional administration, the focus of which is the confiscation of Church establishments (monasteries and abbeys) and the estates of the Schwarzenberg and Starhem families. The administration of properties by the Office of the Provincial Government is documented until the early-1950's in some cases.

This file series also clearly overlaps with other file series of the Archives of Upper-Austria : Financial Directorate - Confiscated assets, Financial Directorate - Restitution of assets, Financial Department of the Province of Upper-Austria (FiRK) or the « aryanisation files » and property notices in the sub-holdings « Jewish Community Linz » .

The sub-holdings of the « Jewish Community Linz » are composed of 2 sub-holdings : firstly, the « aryansisation files » and, secondly, the property notices. Due to their connection of both types of files, the sub-holdings « Jewish Community Linz » are dealt with separately. Further information regarding the « aryansisation » of companies in Upper-Austria can also be gathered from the file holdings of the Property Transaction Office at the Austrian State Archives.

Tyrolean Provincial Archives (1945-1946)

According to information provided by the Tyrolean Provincial Archives, due to the wide-scale destruction of « aryansisation » documents by the National-Socialist authorities at the end of the War, the « Lists regarding assets expropriated by the German “ Reich ” and declared forfeited to the German “ Reich ” with proof of the outcomes of the cash-flows relating to these assets » (this is the full-title) often constitute the sole source of documentary information on property seizures to which Jewish citizens were subjected during the National-Socialist dictatorship. The lists originated partly from the records of the Chief Finance President Innsbruck regarding property seizures under his jurisdiction for the « Reich » regions Tyrol-Vorarlberg and Salzburg. The list was also taken on for administration and edited by the Financial Directorate for Tyrol after the War. Files on property seizure which did not fall under the regional jurisdiction of the National-Socialist Chief Finance President Innsbruck due to the expropriated owner's place of residence were ceded from the Chief Finance President to the « Reich » financial administration (e.g. , Munich, Berlin-Brandenburg or Berlin-Charlottenburg, Upper-Danube and Vienna - Lower-Danube) . In turn, the Financial Directorate for Tyrol ceded the cases of seizure related to a place of residence lying outside the province to the competent Financial Directorates (e.g. , to Salzburg from 1945, and to Vorarlberg from 1946) . As a result of the memos noting the transfer and the fact that files on « aryansisation » and seizure only survived the end of the War in 1945, extremely fragmentarily, it cannot be ruled-out that files or parts of files might be found in Austrian provincial archives or German archives. 2 enclosures are noted on the title-page of the list (probably lists) , which covered, firstly, property and, secondly, bonds and interest coupons. According to information provided by the Tyrolean Provincial Archives, however, the list contains cash and monies deposited on bank accounts which were confiscated by the German « Reich » .

Das Judentum in Österreich ist erstmals in der Römerzeit nachweisbar. Zu Beginn des 10. Jahrhunderts gab es mit der Raffelstettener Zollordnung die erste Urkunde, in der Juden als Händler erwähnt werden. Auf dem Gebiet des heutigen Österreichs gibt oder gab es eine jahrhundertelange Geschichte jüdischer Gemeinden in Wien, Burgenland und im östlichen Niederösterreich.

In anderen Landesteilen gab es kaum oder nur in kürzeren Geschichtsabschnitten jüdische Gemeinden sowie ab Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts in einigen Landeshauptstädten. Einige Regionen der bis 1918 bestehenden Habsburgermonarchie wiesen jedoch eine wesentlich stärkere jüdische Besiedelung auf. So gab es in nahezu allen Kronländern Österreich-Ungarns größere jüdische Minderheiten, wobei besonders Galizien und Bukowina, die Teile des heutigen Polen, der Ukraine und Rumäniens ausmachten, große jüdische Bevölkerungsanteile aufwies. Nach der rechtlichen Gleichstellung der Juden in Österreich-Ungarn sowie bedingt durch die Industrialisierung wanderten viele Juden aus den ländlicheren Gebieten der Monarchie in die Städte Österreich-Ungarns. Viele zehntausende zog es nach Wien, das nach dem Zusammenbruch der Monarchie rund 200.000 Juden zählte, was etwa 90 % aller österreichischen Juden entsprach. Dort entfaltete sich die jüdische Kultur in Theater, Film und Musik, und das assimilierte Judentum brachte herausragende Persönlichkeiten in praktisch allen Gesellschaftsbereichen (Wirtschaft, Wissenschaft, Kunst, Kultur) hervor (siehe Geschichte der Juden in Wien) .

Nach dem sogenannten Anschluß an das nationalsozialistische Deutsche Reich flohen rund zwei Drittel der österreichischen Juden, etwa 65.000 wurden ermordet. Nur wenige überlebten in Österreich, und wenige kehrten zurück. Nach 1945 wurden in den größten Städten kleine jüdische Gemeinden wiedergegründet. Heute leben zwischen 8.000 und 15.000 Juden in Österreich - heute wie damals überwiegend in Wien.

Der älteste Nachweis für jüdisches Leben in Österreich stammt aus der Römerzeit. Es handelt sich um ein Amulett, das 2000 im Gräberfeld in Halbturn (Burgenland) in einem römischen Kindergrab aus dem 3. Jahrhundert gefunden wurde. Die langwierige Auswertung der Grabungsfunde brachte erst 2006 zu Tage, daß sich in dem Amulett ein 22 mm langes Goldblech befindet, auf dem in altgriechischen Buchstaben die wichtigste jüdische Gebetsformel Schma Jisrael eingegritzt ist. Es ist damit das älteste Zeugnis jüdischen Lebens auf heutigem österreichischen Boden.

Erste Hinweise auf die Anwesenheit von Juden im Gebiet des heutigen Österreich nach der Völkerwanderung reichen bis in die Karolingerzeit zurück. Die ersten spärlichen Quellen aus dem Frühmittelalter, in denen Juden erwähnt werden, sprechen nur von durchreisenden Personen und nicht von jüdischen Siedlungen. Konkreter ist ein Brief, vermutlich von Salzburgs Erzbischof Arn (798-821) , in dem dieser einen namentlich nicht genannten Grafen bittet, ihm « jenen jüdischen oder slawischen Arzt » zu schicken, den früher schon ein anderer Bischof in Anspruch genommen hatte.

Der erste unbestrittene Nachweis für die Anwesenheit von jüdischen Kaufleuten ist die Raffelstettener Zollordnung, die zwischen 903 und 906 entstand. Die letzte Bestimmung des in Raffelstätten erlassenen Weistums besagte, daß Kaufleute, nämlich Juden und die übrigen Kaufleute, ob sie nun aus diesem oder anderen Gebieten kamen, den rechtmäßigen Zoll sowohl von Sklaven als auch von anderen Gütern zahlen sollten, so wie es unter früheren Königen üblich war. Jüdische Kaufleute waren demnach im damaligen Fernhandel zwischen dem ostfränkischen Reich und den slawischen Gebieten eine bedeutende Gruppe.

Mit der Raffelstettener Zollordnung lässt sich aber nicht die Ansiedlung von Juden beweisen. Im Herzogtum Bayern sind Juden erstmals 981 in Regensburg nachweisbar, doch kann man nicht ausschließen, daß es auch schon früher ansässige Juden in dem Gebiet gab. Auf dem Gebiet des heutigen Österreich gibt es jedoch etliche Ortsnamen mit dem Namensbestandteil Juden die auf jüdische Handelsstützpunkte oder Siedlungen hinweisen. Diese Judendörfer lagen meist an wichtigen Nord-Süd-Handelswegen. Eine deren wichtigsten war das heutige Judenburg, das als mercatum Judinburch 1074 urkundlich ist. Die Beibehaltung des Namens bis zur Stadterhebung 1224 zeigt die Kontinuität der Niederlassung. (Judenburger Gulden als die erste und lange auch wichtigste Goldmünze Österreichs, Niederlassung bis zur Landesverweisung 1496.)

Der erste namentlich erwähnte Jude in Österreich war ein gewisser Schlom, der 1194 im Formbacher Traditionskodex erwähnt wird. Er wurde vom babenbergischen Herzog Leopold V. zum Münzmeister ernannt und zum Verwalter des herzoglichen Vermögens eingesetzt. Schlom wurde vermutlich speziell für diesen Zweck ins Land gerufen, denn zu dem Zeitpunkt bekam Leopold V. das englische Lösegeld für die Freilassung des Königs Richard Löwenherz. Nachdem ihm einer seiner Bediensteten 24 Mark gestohlen hatte, ließ Schlom ihn ins Gefängnis werfen. Dessen Frau rief einige Kreuzritter zur Hilfe, die Schlom und fünfzehn andere Juden 1196 in einem Pogrom ermordeten. Herzog Friedrich I. verurteilte daraufhin zwei Anführer der Kreuzritter zum Tode. Diese Maßnahme beweist die Bedeutung der Juden für den Herrscher, unter dem sich die Judengemeinde in Wien rasch entwickeln konnte. Davon zeugt auch eine 1204 urkundlich belegte Synagoge in Wien. 1230 entstand eine jüdische Gemeinde in Wiener Neustadt, 1237 in Tulln. Die Zuwanderer stammten vor allem aus den rheinländischen Städten Worms, Mainz und Trier, die sie während der Verfolgungen des Ersten Kreuzzuges 1096 verließen.

Das Städtewesen, das von den Babenbergern gefördert wurde und die städtische Bevölkerung anwachsen ließ, erforderte auch eine erhöhte Präsenz von Juden, die den ständig wachsenden Kapitalbedarf der Neubürger deckten. Auch am Herzogshof in Wien war es schon in den 30er Jahren des 13. Jahrhunderts üblich, daß Juden als Berater tätig waren. Der bekannteste wurde der ungarische Kammergraf Teka (lateinisch « Techanus »), der erstmals 1225 auftrat. Er wird 1232 als Bürge Herzog Leopolds VI. für eine Schuld von 2000 Mark Silber genannt und war damit unmittelbar an der Beilegung eines Streites zwischen Leopold VI. und König Andreas II. von Ungarn beteiligt.

Juden war Ende des 12. und Anfang des 13. Jahrhunderts der Aufstieg in hohe Stellungen nicht verwehrt, auch konnten sie christliches Dienstpersonal beschäftigen. In Wien, Krems und Wiener Neustadt konnten sie größere Gemeinden bilden. Verfolgungen gab es während der ersten beiden Kreuzzüge keine, so daß die Ermordung Schloms 1196 eine Ausnahme blieb. Ein Judenrecht bildete sich erst während des Streites zwischen Kaiser Friedrich II. und Herzog Friedrich II. . 1237 verhängte der Kaiser die Reichsacht über seinen Namensvetter und stellte Wien unter seine Herrschaft. Die Wiener Bürger überzeugten ihn, die Juden von allen öffentlichen Ämtern auszuschließen. 1238 war jedoch der Herzog wieder auf dem Vormarsch, und Kaiser Friedrich II. warb nach diesem Wandel um die Gunst der Juden. Im August 1238 erließ er ein Privileg für die Wiener Juden, um die Herrschaftsansprüche zu untermauern. Es beruht auf dem 1236 ausgestellten Privileg für die Juden im Reich. Doch 1240 fiel Wien wieder an den Herzog, und es kam zu einer Aussöhnung mit dem Kaiser. Am 1. Juli erklärte Herzog Friedrich II. das kaiserliche Stadtrecht von 1237 für ungültig und stellte 1244 ein herzogliches Privileg für die Juden in ganz Österreich aus, das Fridericianum. König Ottokar II. übernahm die Privilegien, 1262 kam noch das Verbot der Blutbeschuldigung dazu.

Mit der Zeit, als Folge von Berichten über Blutbeschuldigungen, Hostienfrel, des süddeutschen Rintfleisch-Pogroms und wahrscheinlich einer Wirtschaftskrise, wuchs der Hass auf die Juden. 1338 ging eine Judenverfolgung von Pulkau aus (Beschuldigung einer Hostienschändung) . Die Juden in Wien, der damals bedeutendsten Gemeinde in Österreich, sowie in Krems und Wiener Neustadt entgingen drohenden Pogromen, indem sie den Zinsfuß auf von ihnen vergebene Darlehen senkten.

Im Zuge der Hussitenkriege wurden die Juden aus dem Herzogtum Österreich vertrieben (1420-1421) , da Albrecht V. sie unter anderem verdächtigte, mit den Hussiten zusammenzuarbeiten. Die damalige Vernichtung der jüdischen Gemeinden ist als « Wiener Gesera » bekannt, woran am « Haus zum großen Jordan » auf dem Judenplatz in Wien ein antisemitisches Relief erinnert. 1496 wurden die Juden auf Drängen der Stände von Maximilian I. aus der Steiermark und aus Kärnten vertrieben, durften sich aber am Ostrand des Reichs (Zistersdorf, Eisenstadt) ansiedeln. Ab 1551 mußten sie beim Aufenthalt in Städten und Märkten den « gelben Fleck » tragen. In Wien stieg die Zahl der Juden am Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts wieder an, ein neuer Friedhof (Seegasse, Wien 9) wurde angelegt, und 1624 erhielten die Juden von Kaiser Ferdinand II. ein Privileg und durften sich im heutigen Gebiet der Leopoldstadt ansiedeln. 1669-1670 wurden die Juden neuerlich aus Österreich vertrieben. Doch schon rund zehn Jahre später kamen Samuel Oppenheimer und Samson Wertheimer nach Wien und wirkten als Hofjuden und erhielten Privilegien.

Mit den Toleranzpatenten Josephs II. begann die Emanzipation auch für die traditionell ghettoisierten, damals etwa 1,5 Millionen Juden der Habsburger Monarchie. 1781 war zunächst ein Toleranzpatent für die christlichen Minderheiten erlassen worden, vor allem für die Protestanten und Griechisch-Orthodoxen, die rund ein Drittel der Bevölkerung umfassten. Es folgte 1781 das Hofdekret für die Juden Böhmens, die bis zur ersten Teilung Polens, die 1772 die galizischen Juden unter österreichische Herrschaft brachte, die größte habsburgische Judenschaft dargestellt hatten und schon weitgehend akkulturiert war. Auch für den nach den Schlesischen Kriegen noch bei Österreich verbliebenen Rest Schlesiens wurde 1781 ein Toleranzpatent erlassen.

Mit dem Toleranzpatent für die Juden Wiens und Niederösterreichs 1782 wurden sie zu allen Schulen und Hochschulen zugelassen und erhielten weitgehende Gewerbefreiheit. Ausdrückliches politisches Ziel war, den Juden Zugang zu handwerklichen und landwirtschaftlichen Berufen zu gewähren und somit für den Staat ihre Nützlichkeit zu erhöhen. Einwanderung blieb ihnen aber ebenso verboten wie der Erwerb von Haus- und Grundbesitz und die Einfuhr jüdischer Schriften. 1788 wurde die Militärpflicht auf sie ausgedehnt.

Zahlreiche Sondergesetze schränkten diese Gleichstellungsansätze wieder ein. Einigen Wiener jüdischen Familien gelang jedoch ein aufsehenerregender sozialer Aufstieg (Arnstein, Eskeles, Königswarter, Hönigstein), der zur Zeit der Freiheitskriege gegen Napoleon beschleunigt wurde. Für monarchistische Beamte wie Friedrich von Gentz, den Berater Fürst Metternichs, waren Juden « geborene Repräsentanten des Atheismus, Jakobinismus, der Aufklärerei ». Das hinderte ihn nicht, beim Wiener Kongress im Salon von Fanny von Arnstein (geborene Itzig) zu verkehren. Die Salongesellschaft ermöglichte in Wien wie auch in Berlin im ausgehenden 18. Jahrhundert regelmäßige und intensive häusliche Kontakte zwischen Menschen unterschiedlicher Stände und unterschiedlicher religiöser Bekenntnisse. Vor allem bot sie Frauen die Möglichkeit, am gesellschaftlichen Leben teilzunehmen. Frau von Arnstein, die es zeitlebens ablehnte, sich taufen zu lassen, versammelte regelmäßig am Dienstagabend eine illustre Gesellschaft von Diplomaten und Aristokraten, darunter Wilhelm von Humboldt, den päpstlichen Nuntius in Wien, Kardinal Severoli, den Duke of Wellington oder Fürst Karl August von Hardenberg. Sie versuchte, auf die während des Kongresses behandelten Probleme ihrer Glaubensgenossen Einfluß zu nehmen.

Die politischen Versuche, die Juden stärker für die wirtschaftliche Entwicklung nutzbar zu machen, hatten jedoch zunächst nur wenig Erfolg. Die weiterhin in christlichen Gilden und Zünften organisierten Berufe wehrten die aufkommende jüdische Konkurrenz nach Kräften ab. Juden blieben weiterhin weitgehend auf den Handel angewiesen und gelangten nur langsam in andere Wirtschaftszweige. In den Städten gelang es den Juden besser als auf dem Land, Zugang zu handwerklichen Berufen zu finden. Der Fernhandel der Juden, die relativ krisensichere Belieferung der Armee mit Uniformen, auch die Pachtung der Tabakregie erwiesen sich als Ausgangspunkte für den Aufbau jüdischer Manufakturen. Mit der Hilfe von Handelskapital konnten Juden eigene Fabriken aufbauen. Nachdem die Einfuhr von Rohbaumwolle freigegeben worden war, gelang es den Juden in Böhmen zum Leidwesen der Leinen- und Wollgewerke, die seit Jahrhunderten die Stoffbranche dominiert hatten, die schnell anwachsende Baumwollindustrie zu ihrer Domäne zu machen. Die Schneiderzünfte in Mähren konnten trotz heftiger Proteste nicht verhindern, daß kapitalkräftige jüdische Großhändler aus dem traditionell von Juden betriebenen Ausbessern und Umarbeiten von Kleidern und Uniformen eine regelrechte Konfektionsindustrie entwickelten, die nun ihrerseits einer Vielzahl von jüdischen Subunternehmern, die den Vertrieb in Städten und Dörfern übernahmen, Brot gab. Auch jüdischen Bankhäusern gelang die Expansion in Wirtschaftsbereiche, die in dieser frühindustriellen Zeit expandierten. Die von Salomon Rothschild in Wien finanzierte Eisenbahn von Wien nach Galizien war 400 Kilometer lang und beschäftigte mit ihrem Bau 14.000 Arbeiter.

Da sich die Angleichung der jüdischen Rechte an die der anderen Bürger schneller in der Stadt auswirkte, zogen viele Juden in die Städte. Prag wies schon um 1800 mit 8500 Juden, was einem Bevölkerungsanteil von 10,6 % entsprach, den höchsten Anteil an jüdischer Bevölkerung unter allen Großstädten im deutschsprachigen Raum auf. 1848 waren es 11.700. Das waren etwa 40 % der Juden Böhmens, die übrigen hatten sich verstreut in ländlichen Gemeinden niedergelassen. In Mähren dagegen durften Juden sich bis 1848 nicht in Dörfern ansiedeln. Sie lebten hier vorwiegend in Städten, und Brünn entwickelte sich für sie zum Anziehungspunkt. Um 1800 gab es unter den Juden in Böhmen und Mähren zwar auch eine große Zahl von Armen, ihre wirtschaftliche Lage war jedoch besser als in vielen anderen Regionen. Das war Grund genug, um mit den jeweiligen Obrigkeiten zusammen zu versuchen, das « Einschleichen » von Juden aus dem unvorstellbar armen Galizien, die häufig Bettler, Diebe und Gauner waren, zu verhindern. Wien dagegen zählte um 1800 erst 500-600 Juden bei einer Gesamtbevölkerung von etwa 200.000. Nur einzelne privilegierte Familien wurden hier geduldet. 1848 war in Wien die jüdische Bevölkerung auf 4000 angestiegen, was einem Anteil von 0,8 % entsprach, und die erste jüdische Gemeinde in Wien konstituierte sich.

Vor den Freiheitskriegen gegen Napoleon traten katholische Romantiker wie Schlegel, Franz von Baader und Klemens Maria Hofbauer für die passiven Bürgerrechte der Juden ein, setzten aber auch antijudaistische Vorurteile fort. Die 1815 begründete Heilige Allianz der Herrscher Preußens, Russlands und Österreichs betrachtete die christliche Religion als erklärte Grundlage ihrer Politik, vertrat das Gottesgnadentum der Fürsten und stand am Anfang einer restaurativen Phase. Es entstand eine Fortschrittsfeindlichkeit und hinsichtlich der Juden eine Unwilligkeit, ihre Emanzipation fortzusetzen. Der Gesellschaftstheoretiker Adam Heinrich Müller, ein führender Vertreter der deutschen Romantik und Mitglied der Christlich-deutschen Tischgesellschaft, verlangte 1823 in einem Gutachten das Heiratsverbot zwischen Juden und Christen und die Rücknahme erreichter Gleichstellung. In reaktionärer, der vorindustriellen Welt zugewandter Grundhaltung wandte er sich gegen die Modernisierungen, die von der Wirtschaftstätigkeit der Juden herrührten, und setzte Judentum und Kapitalismus gleich.

Währenddessen begann bei den städtischen jüdischen Gemeinden die Assimilation in Form einer Reformbewegung. Ausgehend von Wien glich sich der vorher traditionelle aschkenasische Gottesdienst, der in weiten Teilen auch eine Gemeindeversammlung mit profanen Elementen wie der turbulenten Versteigerung der Sitzplätze in der Synagoge war, dem christlichen Gottesdienst an. Laienprediger verdrängten mit deutscher Sprache die jiddische Sprache und stellten damit auch den Primat der Rabbiner in Frage. Unter Isaak Noah Mannheimer und Salomon Sulzer entstand der « Wiener Ritus », den neben einer deutschen Predigt strenge Anstandsregeln und ein hohes musikalisches Niveau des Kantors kennzeichnete. Von Wien aus verbreitete sich der Wiener Ritus über Böhmen und Galizien in die ganze Welt und wird auch heute noch verwendet.

Manche Juden entschloßen sich, zum Christentum zu konvertieren. Erst mit zunehmender Akzeptanz der Juden um die Jahrhundertmitte ging die Häufigkeit der Konversionen zurück. Einer der prominentesten Konvertiten war Johann Emanuel Veith, der 1831 am Wiener Stephansdom Hofprediger wurde. Er blieb seiner jüdischen Gemeinde verbunden. Als die Blutbeschuldigungen gegen die Juden von Damaskus aufkamen, schwor er von der Kanzel herab auf den Gekreuzigten, daß diese Anschuldigungen offensichtlich falsch seien. Mit judenchristlichen Freunden rief Veith im Mai 1848 den Wiener Katholikenverein ins Leben, der nicht nur Freiheit für die Kirche gegenüber dem Staat, sondern auch größere Freiheit in der Kirche anstrebte. Auch Paulus Stephanus Cassel wurde evangelischer Prediger und schrieb wichtige Werke zur jüdischen Geschichte. Er nahm die Juden vor den Anschuldigungen Heinrich Treitschkes und Adolf Stöckers in Schutz.

In der Märzrevolution 1848 engagierten sich Akademiker, darunter viele gebildete Juden, meist für den Liberalismus. Adolf Fischhofs Rede über Pressefreiheit im Hof des Niederösterreichischen Landhauses in Wien gilt als Auftakt der Revolution, Ludwig August Frankls Gedicht Die Universität, am Beginn der Revolution von 1848 entstanden, wurde das wohl bekannteste Revolutionslied. Viele Juden kämpften mit den Christen auf den Barrikaden. Im Revolutionsjahr war es noch möglich, daß der jüdische Prediger Isaak Noah Mannheimer und der Kantor Salomon Sulzer zusammen mit katholischen und protestantischen Geistlichen an einem Gemeinschaftsgrab auf dem Schmelzer Friedhof standen, um die Gefallenen der Märztage zu ehren. Es war aber nur eine kurze Zeit, bald nahmen die Spannungen zu. In Wiens Armenvierteln wurde der Ruf laut : « Schlagt die Juden tot ! » , begleitet von einzelnen Gewalttaten. Trotzdem brachte die Pillersdorfsche Verfassung den Juden endlich die ersehnte volle Gleichstellung bei den Bürgerrechten und Religionsfreiheit in Österreich. Dies nahm die Restauration zum Teil wieder zurück : 1851 mußten jüdische Beamte ihre Staatstreue beidein, 1853 wurde Juden Grunderwerb erneut verboten, 1855 auch das Notariat und Lehrerberufe.

Eigene Zeitungen blieben ihnen erlaubt, so daß sie im Verlagswesen häufiger führende Positionen errangen. Daraufhin entstand eine antisemitische katholische Gegenpresse, die nun dauerhaft gegen das « demokratische Judengesindel » hetzte und es mit Liberalismus, Kapitalismus und Kommunismus gleichsetzte. Führend darin war der Artillerieoffizier Quirin Endlich, der « Judenfresser von Wien » . Auch Eduard von Müller-Telling, Journalist für die Neue Rheinische Zeitung von Karl Marx, griff Juden in seiner Schrift « Freiheit und Juden » als « Wucherer » (Vertreter des Kapitals) und « Freigeister » (Vertreter der Demokratie) an, griff aber auch auf die alte Ritualmordlegende zurück. 1848 gründete Sebastian Brunner die Wiener Kirchenzeitung und machte sie zu seinem Sprachrohr eines scharfen kirchlich-katholischen Antisemitismus.

1867 wurde im Österreichisch-Ungarischen Ausgleich die Emanzipation der Juden im Habsburgerreich vollendet. Durch die Dezemberverfassung wurde den Juden erstmals in ihrer Geschichte in ganz Österreich der ungehinderte Aufenthalt und die Religionsausübung gestattet. 40.000 Juden bildeten bereits 6,6 % der Einwohnerzahl Wiens und hatten damit die alten jüdischen Bevölkerungszentren der Habsburger wie Prag, Krakau und Lemberg überflügelt. 1854-1858 wurde der Leopoldstädter Tempel gebaut, der zu den imposantesten Synagogen in Europa gehörte. Die meisten Einwanderer Wiens waren aus der ungarischen Reichshälfte gekommen, gefolgt von Böhmen und Mähren. Auch galizische Juden waren gekommen, getrieben von Überbevölkerung, Hungersnöten und Choleraepidemien (siehe Geschichte Galiziens). Als die polnische Nationalisierungskampagne sie in den 1870er Jahren zunehmend aus dem Wirtschaftsleben verdrängte, emigrierten sie in Massen. Die Urbanisierung konzentrierte die vordem kleinstädtische und dörfliche Judenheit in den Großstädten. Auch in Städten wie Graz, Linz, Innsbruck und anderen entstanden eigene jüdische Gemeinden. Einigen wenigen Familien gelang es, durch ihre Geschäftstätigkeit im Bankwesen, beim Eisenbahnbau und in industriellen Bereichen sowie im Handel, hier insbesondere im Textilhandel, großen Wohlstand zu erreichen. Der überwiegende Teil der jüdischen Bevölkerung war aber dem Kleinbürgertum zuzurechnen.

Mit dem noch heute geltenden Israelitengesetz von 1890 (Gesetz vom 21. März 1890 betreffend die Regelung der äußeren Rechtsverhältnisse der israelitischen Religionsgesellschaft, zuletzt geändert mit BGBl. Nummer 505 (1994) wurde ein Gesetz geschaffen, welches das Verhältnis der verschiedenen Kultusgemeinden zum Staat auf eine einheitliche Rechtsgrundlage stellte.

Da die meisten erfolgreichen Juden eher deutsch-liberal gesinnt waren, verband sich die Liberalismuskritik mit einem starken Antisemitismus, der zuerst durch religiöse Argumente und später durch die wirtschaftlich-sozialen (zum Beispiel Karl Lueger, 1844-1910 ; 1897 bis 1910 Wiener Bürgermeister) bis hin zu den rassistischen (zum Beispiel Georg von Schönerer, 1844-1921) zunehmend an Bedeutung gewann. 1885 wurde (auch um dem entgegenzuwirken) die Union Österreichischer Juden gegründet. Um eine Assimilation zu verhindern, bildete sich auch eine jüdisch-nationale Partei und 1882 die jüdische nationale Studentenverbindung Kadima. Die Antiassimilations- und nationale Bestrebungen wirkten mit der Begründung des theoretischen Zionismus durch Theodor Herzl zusammen. Unter der geistigen Führung von Zwi Perez Chajes, der ab 1917 Oberrabbiner in Wien war, setzten sich auch die Zionisten in der Leitung der Kultusgemeinde durch.

Viele bedeutende Künstler und Wissenschaftler jüdischer Herkunft bereicherten das österreichische Geistesleben : Alfred Adler, Peter Altenberg, Leo Ascher, Róbert Bárány, Martin Buber, Edmund Eysler, Leo Fall, Sigmund Freud, Alfred Fried, Karl Goldmark, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Emmerich Kálmán, Karl Kraus, Karl Landsteiner, Robert von Lieben, Gustav Mahler, Adam Politzer, Arthur Schnitzler, Arnold Schönberg, Eduard Suess unter anderem mehr Zur Förderung des kulturellen, geistigen und auch sozialen Lebens spielte das Mäzenatentum der Juden eine bedeutende Rolle.

Zu Beginn des Ersten Weltkriegs, als die österreichisch-ungarische Armee zuerst weit zurückgedrängt wurde und auch Lemberg verlor, flüchteten rund 50.000 (laut damaligen Polizeiangaben) bis 70.000 (laut der Arbeiterzeitung) Juden aus Galizien vor Massakern der russischen Armee nach Wien. Etwa 25.000 davon blieben. Die jüdische Gemeinde in Österreich zählte damals etwas über 200.000 Mitglieder.

Die Geschichte des Staates in dieser Zeit wurde entscheidend von Juden bestimmt, einerseits von Finanziers wie Louis

Nathaniel von Rothschild (Hauptaktionär der Creditanstalt) , Wilhelm Berliner (Eigentümer der zweitgrößten Europäischen Lebensversicherung) und andererseits von jüdischen Sozialdemokraten und Austromarxisten wie Otto Bauer und Julius Deutsch.

Da mit dem Vertrag von Saint-Germain die volle (auch öffentliche) Religionsfreiheit in Österreich gesichert wurde, konnte 1919 eine jüdische höhere Schule, das Jüdische Privatrealgymnasium in der Drahtgasse (später Chajesrealgymnasium Castellezgasse) , eröffnet werden. Diese Schule war das erste nichtchristliche Gymnasium Österreichs.

Im kulturellen Leben spielten Juden ebenfalls eine wichtige Rolle, sei es in der Kleinkunst, in Film und Theater oder auch der Literatur. Eine der bedeutendsten Kleinkunsth Bühnen der Zwischenkriegszeit, das Budapester Orpheum in Leopoldstadt, das Zentrum des jüdischen Lebens in Wien, brachte einige große Kabarettisten und Coupletmusiker hervor, so etwa Heinrich Eisenbach, Fritz Grünbaum, Karl Farkas, Georg Kreisler oder auch Armin Berg. In der Literatur zählten die Juden Friedrich Torberg, Felix Salten und Joseph Roth zu den großen Namen. Ein weiterer bekannter österreichischer Schriftsteller dieser Jahre, Hugo Bettauer, wurde Opfer des ausgeprägten Antisemitismus dieser Zeit. Er wurde 1925 nach antisemitischer Hetze von einem Anhänger der NSDAP ermordet.

Bedeutende Film- und Theaterschaffende in Österreich waren unter anderem Jakob Fleck, Alfred Deutsch-German, Max Neufeld oder auch der Filmarchitekt Artur Berger. In führenden Funktionen des österreichischen Films fanden sich ebenfalls Juden, so etwa der letzte Direktor der Sascha-Film, Oskar Pilzer, der von 1933 bis 1938 die Geschicke dieser größten österreichischen Filmgesellschaft leitete, bis er einige Monate vor dem « Anschluß » zum Verkauf genötigt und wenig später zur Flucht gedrängt wurde. An der Sascha-Film war auch der Filmproduzent Arnold Pressburger, ebenfalls österreichischer Jude, viele Jahre beteiligt. In den 1920er Jahren verlagerte er seine Hauptaktivität jedoch nach Deutschland, wo er in den 1930er Jahren schließlich enteignet wurde und flüchtete.

Sowohl die klassische Musik als auch die leichte Muse, wie Operetten- und Schlager- sowie Filmmusik war ein weites Betätigungsfeld für viele schöpferische und ausübenden Künstler, wie etwa Alfred Grünwald, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Fritz Kreisler, Fritz Löhner-Beda, Rudolf Kolisch, Hermann Leopoldi, Arnold Rosé, Franz Schreker, Oscar Straus, Richard Tauber, Gisela Werbezirk oder Erich Zeisl.

Zwischen 1933 und 1938 wurde Österreich Zufluchtsort für viele jüdische Kulturschaffende aus Deutschland. 1934 zählte Österreich bei der Volkszählung 191.481 Juden. Davon lebten 176.034 in Wien ; 7.716 in Niederösterreich ; 3.632 im Burgenland ; 2.195 in der Steiermark ; 966 in Oberösterreich ; 239 in Salzburg ; 269 in Kärnten ; 365 in Tirol ; und 42 in Vorarlberg. Nicht berücksichtigt sind hierbei allerdings jene Personen jüdischer Abstammung, die von den Nationalsozialisten als « Viertel- » und « Achteljeden » ebenfalls verfolgt wurden. Diese Anzahl betrug 1938 etwa 25.000 Personen.

Bei den Sozialdemokraten war eine Reihe von Juden in führender Position tätig (Otto Bauer, Julius Deutsch, Hugo Breitner, Julius Tandler und viele andere) .

Antisemitische Hetze hatte es auch in Österreich bereits lange vor dem « Anschluß » gegeben. Hitler selbst, der 1909 als 20-jähriger nach Wien gezogen war und dort die Schriften des Rassenideologen und Antisemiten Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels und die antisemitische Polemik von Politikern wie Georg Ritter von Schönerer (Alldeutsche Bewegung) und dem Wiener Bürgermeister Karl Lueger kennen gelernt hatte, war von diesem Milieu mitgeprägt. In der Zwischenkriegszeit waren sowohl Vertreter politischer Parteien wie auch der katholischen Kirche gegen Juden und das Judentum aufgetreten. 1925 warnte etwa Bischof Sigismund Waitz vor der « Weltgefahr des habgierigen, wucherischen, ungläubigen Judentums, dessen Macht unheimlich gestiegen » sei, und auch die Christlichsoziale Partei bediente sich im Wahlkampf teils offen antisemitischer Klischees. Der Austrofaschismus ab 1934 drängte Juden in der Organisation des katholischen « Ständestaates » an den Rand der Gesellschaft (vergleiche Klerikalfaschismus) . « Kauft nicht bei Juden » war schon vor der Eingliederung des Landes in das nationalsozialistische Deutsche Reich eine bekannte Parole.

Mit dem « Anschluß » Österreichs 1938 ans Deutsche Reich begann die Ausgrenzung der Juden. 1938 lebten in Österreich, nachdem viele schon zuvor emigriert waren, zwischen 201.000 und 214.000 Menschen, die gemäß den Nürnberger Gesetzen als « Voll- , Halb- , Viertel- , Achteljuden » galten (davon rund 180.000 in Wien) , darunter 181.882 « Volljuden » in ganz Österreich beziehungsweise 167.249 in Wien. Die jüdische Bevölkerung setzte sich sehr heterogen zusammen. Es gab sowohl eine etablierte großbürgerliche und mittelständische Schicht als auch eine große Unterschicht. 1935 waren nur 47.782 Mitglieder der IKG wohlhabend genug, Kultussteuern zu bezahlen.

In den Monaten nach dem « Anschluß » mußten die im Land verbliebenen Juden nach Wien übersiedeln. Es kam zu Enteignungen und pogromartigen Übergriffen, die viele in den Selbstmord trieben. Auch Egon Friedell, der noch am 11. März 1938 an Ödön von Horvath geschrieben hatte : « Jedenfalls bin ich immer in jedem Sinne reisefertig » , nahm sich durch einen Sprung aus dem Fenster das Leben, als Gestapo-Beamte ihn abholen kamen.

Während der Novemberpogrome (« Reichskristallnacht ») wurden in Wien, Klagenfurt, Linz, Graz, Salzburg, Innsbruck und mehreren niederösterreichischen Städten Juden und jüdische Einrichtungen wie Synagogen zu Opfern gewalttätiger Übergriffe. Insgesamt wurden dabei 27 Menschen getötet, darunter auch Richard Berger, der Vorstand der Kultusgemeinde von Innsbruck. Etwa 6.500 Juden wurden verhaftet, von denen die Hälfte in Konzentrationslager, vor allem nach Dachau, deportiert wurden.

Ein Jahr nach dem « Anschluß » lebten in Wien noch circa 91.000 so genannte « Volljuden » und 22.000 « Mischlinge » . Ab 1940 wurden die in der « Ostmark » verbliebenen Juden in großer Zahl in das KZ Theresienstadt oder eines der Ghettos im besetzten Polen deportiert. Baldur von Schirach, als Gauleiter von Wien dafür verantwortlich, bezeichnete dies als seinen « Beitrag zur europäischen Kultur » . Am 1. November 1942 wurde die Wiener Kultusgemeinde aufgelöst. Über 59.000 Mietwohnungen wurden bis Kriegsende in Wien « arisiert » . Die Shoa kostete etwa 65.500 jüdische Österreicher das Leben (62.000 davon konnten namentlich erfasst werden) , über 120.000 konnten noch emigrieren.

Einzelne Österreicher hatten während des Nationalsozialismus versucht, ihren jüdischen Mitbürgern unter Einsatz ihres Lebens zu helfen. Die Gedenkstätte Yad Vashem zeichnete dafür bis heute 90 Österreicher / innen mit dem Titel Gerechte unter den Völkern aus.

Nach Kriegsende lebten in Österreich noch zwischen 2000 und 5000 Juden - etwa 1000 bis 2000 davon überlebten den Krieg in Wien als Mitglieder des Ältestenrates der Israelitischen Kultusgemeinde Wien, in « geschützten Ehen » oder als « U-Boote ». Die übrigen konnten in Konzentrationslagern überleben.

Besonders vom streng orthodoxen Judentum war fast nichts mehr übrig. Die IKG, die im April 1945 aus dem von den Nazis installierten Ältestenrat neu entstanden war, hatte vor allem das Ziel, Alte und Kranke zu betreuen und den wenigen Rückkehrern aus Exil und Lagern bei der Eingliederung zu helfen. Überzeugt davon, daß in Wien keine jüdische Gemeinde mehr entstehen würde, hatten alle Handlungen provisorischen Charakter : gebetet wurde in einem kleinen Raum oberhalb des geschlossenen Stadttempels, Grundstücke wurden an die Gemeinde Wien verkauft, das Archiv der IKG 1952 nach Jerusalem gebracht.

Gleichzeitig kamen Überlebende aus den befreiten KZs und Flüchtlinge aus den neuen kommunistischen Diktaturen in Polen, Ungarn und Rumänien nach Wien, die ihre Heimat durch den Nationalsozialismus verloren und wegen des Kommunismus nicht in ihre Herkunftsländer zurückkehren konnten, sogenannte Displaced Persons. Viele von ihnen betrachteten Wien als Tor zum Westen, als Zwischenstopp auf dem Weg nach Palästina oder die USA. Bis 1955 lebten zwischen 250.000 und 300.000 jüdische Displaced Persons in DP-Lagern in Österreich, die vor allem vom American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee versorgt wurden. Das größte DP-Lager in Österreich war im ehemaligen Rothschild-Spital am Gürtel untergebracht. Etwa 3.000 dieser Neuzuwanderer blieben in Wien und bauten sich eine neue Existenz auf, die meisten von ihnen als Textilhändler in den leerstehenden Lokalen der Vertriebenen. Neben Wien bildeten sich israelitische Kultusgemeinden auch in Graz, Linz, Salzburg und Innsbruck.

Auch die meisten dieser Flüchtlinge hatten während der Verfolgung den Kontakt zur Religion verloren. Bis in die 1980er-Jahre gab es in Wien nur wenige Juden (meist Zuwanderer aus Belgien und USA) , die mit Schläfenlocken und Kaftan als Orthodoxe auf der Straße deutlich erkennbar waren.

Nach dem ungarischen Volksaufstand 1956 flüchteten 17.000 Juden aus Ungarn nach Österreich. 1972 erhielt Österreich mit dem Österreichischen Jüdischen Museum in Eisenstadt das erste jüdische Museum nach 1945. 1975 begann sich in Wien die Bucharische Gemeinde zu konstituieren (Sefardisches Zentrum Wien) . Seit den 1980er Jahren blüht wieder ein vielfältiges, eigenständiges jüdisches Leben, das durch Schulgründungen, Gemeindezentren, Unterstützungsorganisationen, Sportvereine, zahlreiche kulturelle Aktivitäten gekennzeichnet ist. Eine der Hauptaufgaben des 1980 gegründeten Jewish Welcome Service ist die Aussöhnung zwischen den während der NS-Herrschaft in Österreich vertriebenen Juden und österreichischen Nichtjuden sowie die Herbeiführung eines besseren Verständnisses zwischen Juden und Nichtjuden.

1972 wurde das Maimonides-Zentrum, Wiens jüdisches Altersheim, am Standort des 1942 enteigneten Mädchenpensionats, ausgebaut. 1980 konnte eine Volksschule wiederbegründet werden, anfangs in der Seitenstettengasse, die 1988 wieder in die Castellezgasse zog und auch eine AHS-Oberstufe erhielt. Im Herbst 2008 übersiedelte diese Zwi Perez Chajes-Schule von der Castellezgasse in die Simon-Wiesenthal-Gasse neben dem Messezentrum am Prater. Diese Schule gehört dort einem Komplex aus jüdischem Kindergarten, Volksschule und Gymnasium für rund 600 Kinder an und befindet sich nahe dem im März 2008 wiedereröffneten Hakoah-Sportzentrum im Prater, einem Bildungszentrum und einem

Pensionistenheim (ZPC-Campus) . Seit 1990 existiert die liberale Gemeinde Or Chadash. Die ab 1991 beginnende Zuwanderung jüdischstämmiger aus dem Gebiet der ehemaligen Sowjetunion hat die zahlenmäßig schwache jüdische Gemeinde gestärkt. 1989 wurde das Jüdische Institut für Erwachsenenbildung an der Volkshochschule eingerichtet. 1992 eröffnete das Sefardische Zentrum Tempelgasse offiziell, und 1993, auf Initiative von Helmut Zilk, das Jüdische Museum Wien. 1994 wurden das von Alexander Friedmann geleitete Psychosoziale Zentrum Esra (Deutsche « Hilfe ») eröffnet. Die orthodoxe Lauder Chabad eröffnete 1997 die Jüdische Pädagogische Akademie für Lehrerbildung (PÄDAK) , 1999 ein Schulzentrum beim Augarten (Lauder Chabad Campus) , und 2003 (akkreditierung 2007) die Lauder Business School, die erste jüdische Hochschule der österreichischen Geschichte, in Döbling. 1998 wurde das Institut für Jüdische Geschichte Österreichs (INJOEST) in Sankt Pölten in Kooperation mit der Uni Wien und das Jüdische Berufliche Bildungszentrum (JBBZ) , eine europaweit einzigartige umfassende Berufsvorbereitungsakademie für Immigranten, eingerichtet, 2000 folgte das Museum Judenplatz. Heute gibt es auch die orthodoxe Lehrerbildungsanstalt Wiener Akademie für Höhere Rabbinische Studien, und eine ultra-orthodoxe Talmudschule Machsike Hadass (auch für Mädchen) .

Auch öffentliche Zeichen wurden gesetzt : 2000 wurden das Holocaust-Mahnmal von Rachel Whiteread auf dem Judenplatz enthüllt.

Bei der Volkszählung 2001 (der letzten, in der die Religionszugehörigkeit amtlich erfasst wurde) wurden 8.140 Juden in Österreich gezählt, 6.988 davon mit Wohnsitz in Wien. Die IKG Wien geht jedoch von rund 15.000 Juden in Österreich aus, manche Angaben sprechen auch von bis zu 20.000.

2008 gab es in Wien vier koschere Lebensmittelläden, zwei Bäckereien, vier Fleischhauer, vier Restaurants, zwei Imbissstuben, zwei Catering-Firmen und eine jüdische Buchhandlung, Zeichen eines kleinen aber funktionierenden jüdischen Alltagslebens.

Le Festival de Salzburg

Créé en 1917 sous la forme d'une association pour célébrer Mozart, le Festival de Salzburg tient sa 1re édition en 1920. La jeune Autriche républicaine souffre alors d'une grave crise économique et du traumatisme lié à la perte de l'Empire et l'effondrement des Habsbourg. Max Reinhardt et Hugo von Hofmannsthal, chargés de la programmation, veulent faire de ce Festival une manifestation pluri-disciplinaire et internationale. Malgré l'hostilité de la population et le désintérêt du « Bund » , les 2 hommes parviennent à attirer des visiteurs étrangers à Salzburg qui devient un événement culturel mondial majeur à partir de 1925. Le Festival connaît cependant des déficits financiers à répétition couverts par le « Land » , la ville et le « Bund » qui finissent par entrer dans le conseil d'administration. La manifestation a beau être critiquée pour sa programmation conservatrice, elle devient synonyme d'excellence musicale et contribue à renforcer l'image d'une Autriche mélomane. Harcelée par le « Reich » , en 1933 et 1934, le Festival fait figure de bastion anti-azi jusqu'à l'« Anschluss » en 1938. Salzburg est alors instrumentalisé au service de la propagande de Josef Goebbels qui l'utilise notamment pour soutenir le moral des troupes. En 1945, l'armée américaine victorieuse réussit l'exploit de restaurer le Festival 3 mois seulement après son entrée dans Salzburg. C'est l'un des premiers signes de la construction d'une Autriche libre, démocratique et indépendante de l'Allemagne.

L'histoire même du Festival fait l'objet d'un mythe rarement remis en question par les Autrichiens. La quasi-totalité des étudiants qui y consacrent un mémoire reprennent l'idée que le Festival se serait imposé naturellement et de lui-même à Salzbourg, du fait de la grande tradition musicale de la région depuis le Moyen-âge.

La création du Festival de Salzbourg en 1917 et la tenue de sa 1^{re} édition en 1920 sont précédées d'un long mouvement de mémoire autour de la figure de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Au début du XIX^e siècle, la ville de Salzbourg n'est appréciée que des peintres et des poètes romantiques à la recherche d'une symbiose entre beauté et nature. D'autres souhaitent simplement se recueillir sur les traces de l'organiste Johann Michael Haydn (1737-1806) qui vécut à Salzbourg, ou du médecin et alchimiste Philippus Aureolus Paracelsus (1493-1541) qui y mourut. Mais nul ne pense alors à célébrer Mozart.

Il faut rappeler que Salzbourg appartient depuis peu à l'Empire d'Autriche. État gouverné par des princes archevêques du XIV^e siècle à 1802, il passe au début du XIX^e siècle des mains des Autrichiens, à celles des Français, puis des Bavarois. À la suite du Congrès de Vienne, il est définitivement rattaché à l'Empire d'Autriche en 1816. Désormais intégré au sein d'un vaste ensemble, Salzbourg perd de son lustre et s'assoupit. C'est la raison pour laquelle, au cours du XIX^e siècle, la bourgeoisie et l'Église catholique locales voient en la figure de Mozart un moyen de faire de Salzbourg un centre musical aussi rayonnant que sous les princes archevêques.

Sur une idée de la société « Lesegesellschaft », le Salzbourgeois Sigmund von Koflern et l'écrivain Julius Schilling lancent un appel à contribution afin d'ériger un monument en l'honneur de Mozart en 1835. Grâce au soutien financier du roi de Bavière Louis 1^{er}, le sculpteur Ludwig von Schwanthaler et le fondeur Johann Stiglmair créent une statue en bronze de 7 mètres de hauteur avec un socle en marbre. Elle est inaugurée le 5 septembre 1842 en présence des 2 fils du musicien. Le retentissement de l'événement dépasse les frontières de l'Empire d'Autriche et les Salzbourgeois ne cessent plus, dès lors, de célébrer Mozart. Peu de temps avant, en 1841, a été créé le « Dommusikverein und Mozarteum ». C'est une association dépendant de la cathédrale et enseignant la musique religieuse. Elle organise régulièrement des concerts. En 1856, elle célèbre le centenaire de la naissance de Mozart par une série de festivités.

Par la suite, des notables de la ville créent en 1870 l'« Internationale Mozart-Stiftung », une fondation privée dont le but est de créer une académie de musique, une salle de concert, ainsi qu'un fonds d'archives consacrés au compositeur. Mais en 1880, le « Mozarteum » se sépare du « Dommusikverein » et fusionne avec l'« Internationale Mozart-Stiftung » dans l'« Internationale Stiftung Mozarteum ». Cette nouvelle structure organise 8 fêtes autour de Mozart, de 1877 à 1910. D'une durée de quelques jours, elles consistent en une série de concerts auxquels participent des musiciens prestigieux comme Gustav Mahler ou Richard Strauß. Enfin, la maison natale de Mozart est transformée en musée, le 15 juin 1880, sous l'impulsion de l'« Internationale Stiftung Mozarteum ».

Parallèlement à ce mouvement de mémoire, Mozart devient également un argument touristique local sujet à une intense exploitation commerciale. En témoigne l'invention dès 1890 des pralinés chocolatés « Mozartkugel », enrobés d'un papier à l'effigie de Mozart-enfant, et auxquels plus personne ne peut échapper encore aujourd'hui lorsqu'il se rend en Autriche.

C'est dans ce contexte que se forge peu à peu l'idée d'un Festival dédié au compositeur. Différents projets sont élaborés simultanément sans qu'aucun d'eux n'aboutisse. Parmi les personnalités qui y prennent part au début du XXe siècle, se trouve l'homme de lettres Hermann Bahr, associé au metteur en scène Max Reinhardt et à l'écrivain Hugo von Hofmannsthal.

Enfin, c'est un simple notable du nom de Friedrich Gehmacher qui concrétise cette idée. Il est juriste, directeur de l'« Arbeiter-Unfall-Versicherungsanstalt », une société d'assurance des accidents du travail, membre du « Mozarteum » et du comité des fêtes autour de Mozart. Son projet naît à l'été 1906, lors de la fête célébrant le 150e anniversaire de la naissance du compositeur. Il se lie notamment avec le critique musical Heinrich Damisch qui souhaite comme lui, créer un Festival autour de Mozart. Né en 1872, à Vienne, Heinrich Damisch est le fils d'un général de l'armée impériale. D'abord officier, il se reconvertit dans le journalisme en 1904 à la suite d'une maladie qui le laisse borgne. En 1913, Damisch crée la « Wiener Akademische Mozartgemeinde » à Vienne, une association pour développer la musique auprès des jeunes. Mais elle est surtout destinée à servir la cause de Salzbourg et à trouver des soutiens. Gehmacher et Damisch veulent suivre l'exemple de Richard Wagner à Bayreuth et faire d'abord construire un théâtre avant de créer un Festival. En outre, la salle du « Mozarteum » est trop petite pour les Opéras. Rivalité, hostilité à Vienne, lâcheté ou peur que ce Festival ne dénature leur idéal et leur échappe, les membres du « Mozarteum » se montrent réticents. La cantatrice Lilli Lehmann craint par-dessus tout une utilisation mercantile de Mozart et s'oppose formellement au projet de Damisch et Gehmacher en 1916. Elle y voit probablement une concurrence pour les fêtes musicales organisées depuis 1877 et dont l'édition de 1914 a été annulée à cause de la Guerre.

Les 2 hommes sont donc contraints d'agir sans le « Mozarteum » et hors de Salzbourg. Ils créent l'association « Festspielhaus-Gemeinde », le 14 juin 1917 à Vienne. Les statuts sont élaborés par l'avocat Arthur Schey. La 1re assemblée générale a lieu le 1er août de la même année à Vienne dans le bâtiment du « Musikverein », dans la salle Richard-Wagner. La résistance salzbourgeoise est ainsi vaincue et Gehmacher crée une 2e branche de l'association à Salzbourg, en décembre.

Il ne faut pas oublier de mentionner que la création de Salzbourg s'inscrit dans un phénomène commun à l'ensemble de l'Europe où se multiplient les Festivals de musique au début du XXe siècle. Si la 1re utilisation du mot « Festival » serait apparue en Angleterre en 1724, c'est en Allemagne à la fin du XVIIIe siècle que naît véritablement la forme artistique du Festival. Au départ, il s'agit principalement de grandes fêtes musicales données pendant plusieurs jours par des Sociétés chorales en l'honneur de compositeurs ou de souverains.

Tout change avec la création du Festival de Bayreuth. Wagner organise, en effet, une série de représentations du cycle complet de la tétralogie « l'Anneau du Niebelungen », du 13 au 30 août 1876 à Bayreuth, dans un théâtre bâti spécialement pour l'occasion. Des personnalités aussi prestigieuses que Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, Edvard Grieg, Augusta Holmès, Franz Servais, Vincent d'Indy, Camille Saint-Saëns, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski, Charles-Marie Widor, Friedrich Nietzsche, Léon Tolstoï, l'Empereur d'Allemagne Guillaume 1er, l'Empereur du Brésil Pedro II, le roi Karl de Wurtemberg et Louis II de Bavière s'y pressent. La cohérence et la qualité artistiques des représentations, ainsi que le caractère exceptionnel de la manifestation frappent les esprits. Même si les avis des spécialistes divergent sur la définition du mot Festival, tous s'accordent à dire que Bayreuth a donné à ce dernier son sens contemporain : une manifestation culturelle à caractère exceptionnel avec unité de lieu, de temps et périodicité renouvelée, généralement annuelle. Pour l'économiste Luc Bénito, auteur d'un livre sur le sujet, le Festival est en outre « une forme de fête unique, célébration publique d'un genre artistique dans un espace-temps réduit ». Certaines encyclopédies germaniques y ajoutent les notions de qualité artistique et de tradition. Werner Kohlschmidt va plus loin en avançant que le Festival reflèterait l'idéal de la société à qui il est adressé.

Signalons ici que la langue française n'emploie que le seul mot « Festival », contrairement à la langue allemande qui dispose à la fois de « Festival » et « Festspiele ». Nous sommes donc contraints de traduire « Salzburger Festspiele » par « Festival de Salzbourg » au singulier. Le mot « Festival », employé en allemand, est un anglicisme récent et équivaut aujourd'hui pour les germanophones à celui de « Festspiele ». Pourtant, selon Franz Willnauer, le Festival ne signifierait pas la même chose que les « Festspiele ». Les « Festspiele » procéderaient d'une vision idéaliste du XIXe siècle, tandis que le Festival serait une invention de la seconde moitié du XXe siècle correspondant à un produit culturel de masse. Pour notre part, nous ne pensons pas que cette distinction soit utile : il est évident qu'un Festival du XIXe siècle n'est pas semblable à un Festival du XXe siècle. Par ailleurs, cela idéalise les « Festspiele » alors que les préoccupations économiques et touristiques sont également présentes dès leur création, comme nous avons pu le voir pour Salzbourg.

Le Festival de Bayreuth inspire au début du XXe siècle la fondation de plusieurs Festivals de musique en Europe. À Munich, les « Opernfestspiele » (1875) se muent en Festival moderne consacré à Wagner, à partir de 1901. En Finlande, alors sous souveraineté russe, naît en 1912 le Festival d'opéra de Savonlinna sous l'impulsion de la soprano Aino Ackté. Il est étroitement associé à l'émergence de l'identité finlandaise. En Italie, le ténor Giovanni Zenatello et l'impresario de théâtre Ottone Rovato donnent naissance, en 1913, au Festival de Vérone qui célèbre le centenaire de la naissance de Giuseppe Verdi avec la représentation d'« Aïda » dans les arènes. Cette « vogue » de Festivals est cependant contrecarrée par la Première Guerre mondiale. Seul Salzbourg émerge durant le conflit, encore qu'il ne s'agisse en 1917 que du dépôt des statuts de l'association « Festspielhaus-Gemeinde ». La Ire édition du Festival de Salzbourg ne se tient qu'en 1920, grâce à Max Reinhardt et Hugo von Hofmannsthal qui réussissent à prendre le pouvoir artistique au détriment de Friedrich Gehmacher et Heinrich Damisch.

Entre la création du « Festspielhaus-Gemeinde », en 1917, et la première édition en 1920, des bouleversements majeurs ont eu lieu en Europe. La fin de la Première Guerre mondiale se solde par l'effondrement de l'Empire d'Autriche-Hongrie. C'est la raison pour laquelle Reinhardt et Hofmannsthal modifient profondément les objectifs de la manifestation et lui assignent une double mission. La première serait de faire œuvre de paix après la guerre fratricide de 1914-1918 en créant un Festival international de musique, de théâtre et de danse. La seconde serait de conforter la nouvelle Autriche en servant son image à l'étranger et en stimulant le développement économique de Salzbourg.

À ce moment crucial où la petite république alpine éclot face à l'Allemagne, il nous a semblé que le Festival de Salzbourg pouvait constituer un prisme à travers lequel étudier la construction de l'identité autrichienne. C'est pourquoi nous avons choisi d'intituler notre thèse : « Le Festival de Salzbourg et l'identité autrichienne : 1917-1950 ».

Comme l'a montré Gérard Noiriel, l'idée d'« identité nationale » est extrêmement délicate à utiliser car il n'existe pas de définition objective admise par tous les historiens. Pour notre part, nous entendons par « identité autrichienne », le sentiment commun d'appartenance à la nation autrichienne. Il ne s'agit donc pas ici de définir ce qu'est l'identité autrichienne mais de se concentrer sur l'émergence d'une conscience collective nationale.

À cet égard, la situation des Autrichiens est complexe. La cohésion de l'Empire d'Autriche-Hongrie reposait essentiellement sur son identification à la dynastie des Habsbourg. Or, au lendemain de la Première Guerre mondiale, l'Autriche est démembrée et la restauration des Habsbourg proscrite. Les Autrichiens émettent alors le souhait de vivre dans un espace élargi, comprenant l'Allemagne ou l'Empire perdu des Habsbourg. Le 21 octobre 1918, les députés allemands d'Autriche se constituent en assemblée nationale allemande provisoire dans le palais de la diète de Basse-Autriche à Vienne. Ils proclament le droit à l'auto-détermination d'un État allemand indépendant d'Autriche. Le 12 novembre, l'Assemblée nationale provisoire déclare la création de la République allemande d'Autriche. Mais le traité de Saint-Germain-en-Laye, signé en septembre 1919, interdit toute union avec l'Allemagne, les anciens pays de la monarchie ou les populations allemandes de Bohême et du Haut-Adige. Ces conditions imposées par les Alliés sont vécues comme une injustice et une violation du droit à l'auto-détermination. Dans plusieurs « Länder », des référendums sont organisés jusqu'en 1920 pour faire scission. La petite Autriche républicaine ne réussit alors pas à inspirer de sentiment national en compensation à la majorité de la population, tandis que subsiste une identité culturelle trans-frontalière germanophone et centre-européenne. Une identité centre-européenne étudiée notamment en France par l'historien Victor-Lucien Tapié, puis Bernard Michel.

Comment le Festival de Salzbourg est-il devenu un symbole de l'Autriche à l'étranger et dans quelle mesure a-t-il pu nourrir le sentiment d'identité nationale autrichien qui se développe à partir de la Première Guerre mondiale ?

Abondantes pour la période allant de 1917 à 1938, les sources se raréfient concernant les années nazies et, dans une moindre mesure, sous occupation américaine. Nous avons été dans l'impossibilité de consulter de nombreux documents pour la période allant de 1938 à 1945 aux « Staatsarchiv » de Vienne et aux « Bundesarchiv » de Berlin. Les pièces étaient souvent déclarées introuvables ou inutilisables pour cause de détérioration. C'est ce qui explique que cette partie de notre thèse soit plus courte que les autres, au-delà du fait qu'elle porte sur une durée plus brève.

La quasi-totalité des archives consultées se trouve en Autriche. Nous nous sommes rendue à Salzbourg où nous avons étudié, dans un 1er temps, les archives du Festival (« Archiv der Salzburger Festspiele »). Nous avons été assez déçue par leur contenu : il reste finalement assez peu de documents antérieurs à 1938. Le plus intéressant reste les comptes-rendus des assemblées générales du Festival mais, là encore, ils ont totalement disparu concernant la période nazie. Un très gros travail a été entrepris par les directeurs successifs pour tenter de reconstituer des fonds, notamment avec des revues et des photos de presse classées par année qui nous fait gagner un temps précieux.

Nous avons ensuite vu, avec beaucoup de difficultés, quelques documents de l'archevêché (« Konsistorialarchiv ») mais nous n'avons pas été autorisée à accéder à l'inventaire des archives.

Les archives de la ville (« Stadtarchiv ») présentaient quelques doublons avec celles du Festival et du « Land » (« Landesarchiv ») mais recelaient encore une bonne partie des comptes-rendus d'assemblées municipales. Nous avons enfin dépouillé les archives du « Land » (Province) de Salzbourg qui contiennent notamment la correspondance du « Landeshauptmann » Franz Rehrl au sujet du Festival durant l'entre-deux-guerres.

À Vienne, nous avons pris connaissance de quelques pièces des collections théâtrales et musicales de la bibliothèque nationale (« Musiksammlung » et « Theatersammlung, Nationalbibliothek »), avant de nous concentrer sur la bibliographie. Nous nous sommes également rendue aux « Staatsarchiv » afin de dépouiller des cartons des ministères de l'Intérieur, des Affaires étrangères et de la Culture. Enfin, nous avons glané quelques documents aux archives du « Musikverein » et du « Wiener Philharmoniker », des ensembles musicaux ayant participé activement aux différentes éditions de la manifestation.

Nous avons pu, grâce à l'amabilité des certains interlocuteurs, nous procurer un grand nombre de photocopies par courrier. Il s'agit du contenu de 2 cartons de la U.S. National Archives and Records Administration. À ce sujet, il nous manque la totalité des rapports des officiers dirigeant la Theatre and Music section. Heureusement, une thèse autrichienne sur les médias et les arts sous occupation américaine de 1945 à 1950 comble en partie cette lacune. Nous avons également reçu d'Allemagne de précieux documents du « Freies Deutsches Hochstift » de Francfort et du « Bundesarchiv » de Coblenz. Nous nous sommes rendus sur place à Berlin mais la moisson s'est avérée décevante pour les archives du 3^e « Reich », les quelques dossiers concernant le Festival restant introuvables. Par ailleurs, nous ne nous sommes pas intéressée aux archives personnelles de Max Reinhardt qui sont entreposées à l'Université de Binghamton aux États-Unis car elles contiennent essentiellement des documents de travail sur ses spectacles.

En France, nous avons eu accès à un fonds très riche de revue de presse internationale concernant le Festival de Salzbourg au département de la musique Louvois de la Bibliothèque nationale de France. Nous avons également étudié quelques documents au ministère des Affaires étrangères à Paris, Nantes et Colmar sur la participation d'artistes français à des concerts.

Au niveau bibliographique, nous avons consulté plus de 400 ouvrages, principalement en allemand et en anglais. Il s'agit en partie de publications universitaires avec un grand nombre de périodiques, d'actes de colloque, d'analyses historiques, littéraires ou sociologiques.

D'autre part, nous avons eu la chance de pouvoir disposer d'un grand nombre de livres publiés par des contemporains du Festival. Beaucoup ont laissé des témoignages par le biais de romans, de correspondances, de mémoires ou d'essais. Même subjectif et rétrospectif, ce matériau s'est avéré très riche et a pallié certaines lacunes de nos sources, tout en fournissant un contrepoint intéressant à la teneur des archives officielles. C'est le cas, par exemple, des correspondances privées d'Hugo von Hofmannsthal ou de Richard Strauß dont la liberté de ton contraste avec la retenue de leurs courriers administratifs.

Par ailleurs, il existe une bibliographie abondante sur la construction de l'identité autrichienne. Les historiens et germanistes spécialistes de l'Autriche sont presque unanimes pour dire que les Autrichiens se sentent majoritairement allemands jusqu'à la veille de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Rappelons que le 1er sondage sur la question n'est effectué qu'en 1956. A cette date, 49 % des Autrichiens interrogés déclarent que l'Autriche est une nation ; 46 % qu'elle n'en est pas une ; et 5 % ne se déclarent pas. Seule la moitié des Autrichiens exprime donc à cette époque un sentiment d'appartenance à la nation autrichienne.

Certains universitaires considèrent toutefois qu'il ne faut pas circonscrire l'identité autrichienne au sentiment d'appartenance nationale et se prononcent pour la thèse d'une identité culturelle autrichienne spécifique, pré-existante à l'identité nationale. C'est le cas par exemple de Friedrich Heer et de Felix Kreißler qui a développé le concept controversé de prise de conscience de la nation autrichienne. D'autres évoquent le passage progressif d'une identité allemande à une identité autrichienne, à l'image d'Ernst Brückmüller, ou de Paul Paster. Une position qui ne remet toutefois pas en cause l'ambivalence des Autrichiens vis-à-vis de l'Allemagne et leur sentiment de rejet développé depuis le milieu du XIXe siècle.

Nous n'avons pas l'intention de trancher dans le débat mais d'explorer la façon dont le Festival de Salzbourg a participé à la construction du sentiment d'appartenance à la nation autrichienne. Les fondateurs ont-ils essayé de définir et de véhiculer une identité autrichienne via le Festival ? Y a-t-il eu des tentatives de contrôle idéologique de la part des autorités locales et du « Bund » (État fédéral) ? Quels sont les stéréotypes renforcés ou créés par le Festival de Salzbourg sur l'Autriche et les Autrichiens ? La manifestation porte en effet en germe tout un éventail de lieux communs que l'on retrouve au cœur de la construction de l'identité nationale autrichienne dans la seconde moitié du XXe siècle comme la figure de Mozart enfant ou encore la beauté des paysages.

Notre thèse relève donc à la fois de l'histoire de l'Europe centrale et de l'histoire culturelle. Dans cette optique, 2 ouvrages nous ont été particulièrement utiles. Celui d'Anne-Marie Thiesse sur les identités nationales démontre comment le sentiment national ne devient spontané que lorsqu'il a été parfaitement intériorisé grâce à l'invention d'un héritage commun et à l'« adhésion collective à une fiction ». Celui de Benedict Anderson sur l'imaginaire national définit la nation comme une « communauté politique imaginaire, et imaginée comme intrinsèquement limitée et souveraine ». En étudiant l'histoire du Festival de Salzbourg, nous allons voir comment cette manifestation a contribué à fournir des éléments symboliques permettant de distinguer l'Allemagne de l'Autriche et de définir la spécificité de cette dernière aux yeux des étrangers comme des Autrichiens.

Concernant la méthodologie, nous avons veillé à ne jamais oublier d'observer des méthodes comparatives, contrairement à la majorité des auteurs ayant écrit sur le sujet. Même les universitaires anglais et américains restent prisonniers d'un point de vue strictement autrichien, voire salzbourgeois. Cette absence de méthode comparative aboutit de façon quasi systématique à une surévaluation de la singularité du Festival de Salzbourg. Ainsi, le fait que Hofmannsthal revendique un double héritage théâtral antique et médiéval n'est absolument pas original. C'est même une constante chez la plupart des intellectuels et artistes européens du XXe siècle. Il s'agissait, à l'inverse, de distinguer ce qui fonde la spécificité du Festival de Salzbourg, et ce en quoi il s'inscrit dans la norme. Quels sont les autres Festivals existant à cette époque ? Quelle est l'influence de Bayreuth sur Salzbourg ? Le Festival de Salzbourg a-t-il contribué durant la période étudiée à forger l'image des Festivals telle que nous la concevons aujourd'hui ? Suivant le credo de Pascal Ory pour qui « un objet culturel n'existe pas en lui-même mais en relation », nous avons toujours considéré les différentes éditions du Festival en relation avec leurs conditions de production, leur médiation et leur réception. On ne peut, par exemple, circonscrire l'audience du Festival aux seuls festivaliers : les spectacles faisaient aussi l'objet de nombreuses retransmissions radiophoniques dans le monde entier et d'enregistrements par l'industrie du disque. Une démarche qui se heurte toutefois aux limites de nos sources : difficile de déterminer précisément l'ampleur du succès du Festival de Salzbourg, à partir des seuls articles de presse et des maigres chiffres qui subsistent aujourd'hui sur la fréquentation.

Un petit mot sur les articles de presse étudiés en nombre pour cette thèse. Ils ont été sélectionnés à partir de différentes sources. Certaines revues de presse utilisées ont été reconstituées a posteriori par les Archives du Festival. D'autres, comme celles de la Bibliothèque nationale de France, ont été rassemblées à l'époque des faits. En dehors de cela, nous avons procédé à des sondages concernant certains journaux (« Neue Freie Presse », « The New York Times », « Comoedia », « Morning Post », etc.) , en privilégiant des dates charnières internes et externes au Festival (1920, 1925, 1933, 1938, 1945, etc.) .

Enfin, il fallait se garder de trop idéaliser les motivations des fondateurs du Festival de Salzbourg. Animés par de nobles intentions et par un idéal de paix après 1914-1918, ils poursuivent malgré tout également des intérêts personnels. Beaucoup de chercheurs s'extasient sur le fait que Hofmannsthal ait abandonné ses cachets lors des Ires éditions du Festival. Certes, mais il avait tout de même la satisfaction de réaliser ses ambitions artistiques, tout en flattant son ego et en prenant soin d'écarter d'autres dramaturges contemporains de la programmation. Les querelles et rivalités personnelles d'artistes sont d'ailleurs l'une des principales constantes de ce Festival. De même, l'importance des textes théoriques de Hofmannsthal et de Reinhardt sur le Festival est largement surévaluée. Non seulement l'idéologie du Festival est souvent réduite à ces seules publications, mais une analyse de leur audience réelle n'a jamais été entreprise.

Nous précisons également que notre thèse ne relève ni de la musicologie ni de l'histoire du théâtre. C'est la raison pour laquelle nous nous étendons peu sur le contenu artistique et esthétique des représentations lorsque celui-ci ne représente pas d'intérêt majeur à l'avancement de notre réflexion.

Au départ, nous avons envisagé un plan purement chronologique mais celui-ci ne nous permettait pas de dégager les grandes constantes du Festival. Nous avons donc opté pour un plan chronologico-thématique en 5 parties.

Nous avons choisi de commencer l'analyse de notre sujet en 1917, date de création de l'association « Festspielhaus-Gemeinde » , et non en 1920, date de la Ire édition du Festival. La période allant de 1917 à 1920 est particulièrement intéressante à prendre en compte car c'est durant ce laps de temps qu'Hofmannsthal va définir sa conception du Festival à travers un corpus de textes.

Nous mettons un terme à notre étude en 1950. Au départ, nous comptions mener cette thèse jusqu'en 1955, en référence au traité d'État du 15 mai 1955 qui permet à l'Autriche de redevenir une République souveraine et démocratique. Mais la date ne coïncidait pas avec une rupture de l'histoire du Festival. Finalement, nous avons choisi de ne pas dépasser l'année 1950, durant laquelle fut votée la loi nationale de financement du Festival. Cette date correspond également à la fin de la dénazification pour les artistes, à une prise de distance des américains vis-à-vis du Festival et aux Ires répercussions de la Guerre froide sur la manifestation.

Durant la période que nous étudions, nous avons distingué 4 grandes césures chronologiques. En 1925, le Festival devient un événement culturel international incontournable et médiatisé. 1933 marque l'arrivée au pouvoir de Adolf Hitler avec des mesures compromettant le Festival. En 1938, l'« Anschluss » fait passer le Festival sous la coupe des Nazis. 1945 clôt la période nazie et ouvre l'occupation militaire des Américains à Salzburg.

Après l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis en Allemagne et le début du 3e « Reich », l'Autriche devient le refuge d'artistes qui ne peuvent ou ne veulent plus apparaître en Allemagne, et qui trouvent à Salzburg l'occasion de se réunir dans le cadre d'un événement culturel de haut-niveau, à peu de distance des frontières allemandes. Ainsi Bruno Walter, juif, s'installe en Autriche, et l'Italien Arturo Toscanini, fermement antifasciste, annule toutes ses participations au Festival de Bayreuth et se replie sur Salzburg, dont il devient un habitué entre 1934 et 1937.

Le nombre de visiteurs allemands tombe de plus de 15,000 à moins de 900 en raison de la taxe de 1,000 « Reichsmarks » sur les visas pour l'Autriche. Des artistes allemands s'y produisent cependant ; Herbert von Karajan y débute en 1933 et Wilhelm Furtwängler en 1937.

En 1938, l'Autriche est annexée à l'Allemagne. Toscanini et d'autres artistes quittent le Festival et émigrent, notamment aux États-Unis. « Faust » de Max Reinhardt et « Jedermann » de Hugo von Hofmannsthal sont retirés du programme, et le Palais des Festivals est transformé dans le sens de l'esthétique du régime.

En 1943, le programme est réduit et le Festival est renommé « Salzburger Theater- und Musiksommer » (Été musical et théâtral de Salzburg) . Max Reinhardt meurt à New York, le 31 octobre. En 1944 ne seront donnés que 2 concerts symphoniques en remplacement du Festival, en raison de la proclamation de la « guerre totale » et de l'interdiction de tous les Festivals après l'attentat du 20 juillet contre Adolf Hitler.

Le public du Festival de Salzburg (1920-1950)

(Amélie Charnay, Université de Paris I Panthéon Sorbonne.)

1917 : En pleine Guerre, 2 inconnus déposent les statuts de l'association « Festspielhaus-Gemeinde » (Communauté du Palais des Festivals) à Vienne. Il s'agit du notable salzbourgeois Friedrich Gehmacher et du critique musical Heinrich Damisch. Ils rêvent de faire ériger un Palais des Festivals en l'honneur de Mozart à Salzburg, la ville natale du compositeur. Une idée inspirée par le Bayreuth de Wagner. Des noms prestigieux s'associent au projet comme le metteur en scène Max Reinhardt, l'écrivain Hugo von Hofmannsthal, ou encore les chefs d'orchestre Richard Strauß et Franz Schalk. Ces hommes prennent rapidement le contrôle artistique de l'association. Plus question de se restreindre à Mozart, le Festival doit être pluri-disciplinaire (musique, théâtre et danse) avec des auteurs Classiques de langue allemande et étrangère. La 1^{re} édition du Festival de Salzbourg se tient du 22 au 26 août 1920. Faut de moyens, seule la pièce « Jedermann » de Hofmannsthal est représentée en plein-air. (1) Mais, dès 1925, spectateurs et journalistes étrangers affluent. Un succès qui ne s'est pas démenti jusqu'à aujourd'hui.

Max Reinhardt et surtout Hugo von Hofmannsthal pensent l'idée du Festival de Salzbourg bien avant de passer aux travaux pratiques. Il est capital pour eux de redonner un sens au mot « festival » en faisant de Salzbourg une vraie fête réunissant toutes les classes sociales et non un Festival réservé aux élites fortunées. (2) La question est de savoir si cela n'est resté qu'un vœu pieux. Nous commençons notre étude en 1917, date de création de l'association « Festspielhausgemeinde », et nous y mettons un terme en 1950, année qui marque la reprise en main totale du Festival par les Autrichiens et le retour des touristes en masse après la Guerre.

Quel public le Festival de Salzbourg a-t-il attiré de 1917 à 1950 ?

De 1917 à 1925, le Festival s'impose progressivement comme un événement culturel majeur en Europe. À partir de 1933, Salzbourg est menacé par les Nazis au pouvoir en Allemagne. En 1938, la manifestation est réduite à un rôle de simple rouage de la propagande hitlérienne après l'« Anschluss ». Le Festival retrouve son prestige sous l'action de l'armée américaine qui libère le « Land » (province) en 1945.

À Salzbourg, les étrangers ne sont pas les bienvenus (1920-1925)

Initiative d'origine privée, le Festival de Salzbourg trouve peu de soutiens à ses débuts. Les élus locaux se montrent réticents, tandis que le « Land » (région) et le « Bund » (gouvernement fédéral) hésitent à accorder des subventions. Le Festival de Salzbourg est donc condamné à devenir international dès sa création, l'association trouvant sa principale source de financement dans les cotisations des adhérents et dans les recettes des spectacles. Malgré le niveau inégal des représentations et le manque de moyens, la manifestation bénéficie immédiatement de la bienveillance de quelques journalistes étrangers et de la curiosité de touristes européens et nord-américains. Ils sont attirés par la notoriété de Hofmannsthal, et Schalk, mais aussi par les mises en scène de Reinhardt et un festival de musique contemporaine parallèle lancé par Richard Strauß. Il faut souligner également que le Festival de Salzbourg est alors le 1^{er} en Europe à proposer une programmation aussi diverse et ambitieuse. Parmi les personnalités notables qui s'y rendent ces années-là, citons Romain Rolland (3), Paul Géraldy, ou encore Aldous Huxley qui vient en tant que critique musical (4).

La création du Festival a pour conséquence de développer le tourisme à Salzbourg. « Salzbourg est rempli d'étrangers » (5), peut-on lire dans la presse dès 1921. 3 ans plus tard, les journaux font état de 130,000 touristes passés à Salzbourg durant la saison estivale de 1922. (6) Un chiffre élevé au regard des 38,000 habitants de la ville. (7) Une réussite pour Hofmannsthal qui voulait faire de Salzbourg un Festival international. Mais sa volonté de réduire le fossé entre les élites et le peuple se heurte vite à des difficultés.

La population se montre, en effet, résolument hostile à ces visiteurs étrangers. Il faut dire que la situation économique de l'Autriche, à la fin de la Guerre, est désastreuse. (8) Le manque de matières premières et de produits alimentaires, ainsi que l'augmentation du chômage provoque une crise sociale et politique. (9) Salzburg n'échappe pas à ce climat d'agitation. Les habitants ne perçoivent donc pas d'un bon œil l'organisation de la Ire édition du Festival, en 1920. C'est ce que raconte Gottfried Reinhardt, le fils du metteur en scène, dans ses mémoires :

« Il y eut des manifestations. On avait peur que les étrangers viennent manger le pain de la population, et les journaux fulminaient contre la stimulation attendue du tourisme - un mot alors employé curieusement comme une insulte. » (10)

Par la suite, les étrangers deviennent les boucs émissaires idéaux de l'inflation. Le sentiment de xénophobie est tel qu'il remet un temps en cause la tenue du festival en 1921. (11)

Il est vrai que les billets sont chers et excluent d'emblée la population des festivités. Leur prix se situe entre 50 et 300 couronnes en 1920, sachant qu'un kilo de pommes de terre coûtait alors 6 couronnes. (12)

Dans ce contexte, le Festival de Salzburg devient la cible privilégiée des antisémites. Max Reinhardt qui est juif, est l'objet d'un véritable harcèlement de la part de plusieurs journaux liés au Parti national-socialiste et à l'Union antisémite. (13) Si les journaux antisémites se radicalisent encore les années suivantes, la fin de l'inflation et l'amélioration de la situation économique, dès 1923, apaisent les tensions au sein de la population. Les manifestations de xénophobie et d'antisémitisme vis-à-vis du Festival se font plus rares.

« Le centre de l'Europe » (1925-1933) (14)

De 1925 à 1933, le Festival de Salzburg connaît des difficultés financières telles que son existence est menacée. Il doit son salut au « Landeshauptmann » (président de la province) Franz Rehr. Ce dernier assainit les finances de l'association et pilote sa ré-organisation. En contre-partie, des représentants de la ville, du « Land », et du « Bund » entrent dans la direction. Rehr impose également la création du « Fremdenverkehrsförderungsfond » (fonds pour la promotion du tourisme dans le « Land » de Salzburg) . Une forme de taxe sur les entreprises qui profitent du tourisme dont le produit est reversé à des associations comme le « Festspielhaus-Gemeinde » . Enfin, la manifestation est officiellement reconnue par le « Bund » dont la participation financière reste cependant limitée.

Dans le même temps, le Festival connaît une profonde mutation artistique. Hofmannsthal meurt en 1929, et Reinhardt prend ses distances avec la direction. L'art dramatique n'occupe plus qu'une place restreinte de la programmation. La danse est réduite à portion congrue. Désormais, des chefs d'orchestre prestigieux (Bruno Walter, Clemens Krauß) se battent pour prendre le pouvoir. La notoriété des interprètes lyriques n'est pas en reste (Richard Mayr, Lotte Schöne, Elisabeth Schumann, Franz Völker) . La marque de fabrique du Festival devient donc un répertoire musical Classique, associé à la pièce-phare, « Jedermann », toujours jouée en plein-air. La manifestation a beau être critiquée pour sa programmation conservatrice, elle fait figure de modèle prestigieux pour les voisins européens de l'Autriche. Sa réussite repose sur la participation d'artistes renommés à un Festival centré sur la musique et rendant hommage à Mozart. Une sorte de lieu de pèlerinage dans une ville rassemblant de nombreux atouts : son architecture, ses paysages et la proximité immédiate des montagnes et de la campagne.

De 1925 à 1933, le nombre de festivaliers oscille chaque année entre 60,000 et 70,000. (15) La répartition par nationalité réserve quelques surprises d'après les quelques indices statistiques qui subsistent. (16) En 1926 et 1927, les Autrichiens représentent entre 35 et 40 % des visiteurs. Du côté des visiteurs étrangers, les Allemands sont les plus nombreux : entre 46 et 47 % des festivaliers. Le reste vient d'Europe, des États-Unis, de l'Union soviétique, d'Afrique et d'Asie. (17) Tous les continents sont ainsi représentés. À partir de 1928, le nombre d'Autrichiens est réduit à portion congrue : 80 % des visiteurs viennent de l'étranger. (18)

Mais c'est la douche froide en 1931. Les effets de la dépression commencent à se faire sentir, conjugués à la crise dite du « hundert Marksperr » . Le gouvernement allemand impose, en effet, à ses ressortissants de s'acquitter d'une taxe de 100 Marks pour se rendre en Autriche. Au final, la fréquentation baisse et les touristes allemands se raréfient. (19)

L'importance des touristes étrangers sur la fréquentation du Festival n'est pas sans conséquence sur la programmation. Les spectacles pouvant plaire potentiellement à ces visiteurs sont donc choisis prioritairement. (20)

Désormais, Salzbourg fait figure de capitale européenne culturelle, le temps d'un été. La ville devient, comme l'écrit Stefan Zweig dans ses mémoires, le « centre de l'Europe » . (21) Le retentissement de cet événement est international : on dénombre des centaines de journalistes accrédités et des dizaines de radios qui retransmettent les concerts en Occident. Salzbourg devient un lieu de villégiature pour la haute-société internationale. Un mélange de magnats américains (Edward Filene, William Averell Harriman) ; d'aristocrates européens (l'ex-« Kron-Prinz » , le prince de Bassiano Roffredo Caetani) ; d'hommes politiques (Gaston Doumergue, Winston Churchill) ; d'intellectuels et d'artistes renommés (Richard Beer-Hofmann, Tristan Bernard, Franz Molnar) . Photographes et badauds se pressent devant l'entrée du Palais des Festivals, les soirs de première, pour apercevoir le ballet des voitures luxueuses qui déposent les personnalités sur le tapis rouge. Salzbourg alimente ainsi les chroniques mondaines des journaux du monde entier.

Mais les prix des places restent élevés. Une situation qui provoque un débat récurrent dans la presse. Les courriers des lecteurs contiennent souvent des plaintes. (22) Devant ces protestations, la direction accorde presque chaque année des places à tarif réduit pour la population. (23) Malgré cela, l'animosité des habitants vis-à-vis du Festival reste un sujet de préoccupation pour le conseil d'administration. (24)

Salzbourg contre Bayreuth (1933-1938)

L'Autriche entre ouvertement en conflit avec l'Allemagne à partir du mois de juin 1933. Le Festival est aussitôt pris pour cible par les Nazis. (25) Une taxe est imposée aux Allemands qui souhaitent se rendre en Autriche (26) et des célébrités comme Richard Strauß ou Wilhelm Furtwängler reçoivent l'interdiction de se produire à Salzbourg, en 1934. Un point critique est atteint à l'été de la même année, lorsque les attentats à la bombe se multiplient dans la ville après l'assassinat du chancelier Engelbert Dollfuss. Privée de ses touristes allemands et de ses artistes les plus prestigieux, la manifestation s'ouvre encore davantage aux autres nationalités. Son attractivité est, par ailleurs, renforcée par sa nouvelle image de Festival anti-Bayreuth.

Une véritable communauté d'artistes réfugiés d'Allemagne se forme dans les environs de Salzbourg. Dans la ville même, résident toujours Max Reinhardt et Stefan Zweig. (27) Ils sont rejoints dans la région par Bruno Frank et Carl Zuckmayer. Chez eux, ils accueillent durant le Festival Theodore Dreiser, Jakob Waßermann, Thomas Mann (28) , Franz Werfel (29) et son épouse Alma Mahler, ou encore le comédien Max Pallenberg (30) et la famille de Thomas Mann (31) .

Dans les rangs des festivaliers, on compte également des intellectuels engagés. Salzbourg devient un lieu de rassemblement anti-nazi prisé par Marlene Dietrich, Erich Maria Remarque, Herbert George Wells, James Joyce, Ödön von Horvath, André Gide, l'écrivain américain Theodore Dreiser, Marguerite Yourcenar ou encore François Mauriac. (32)

Certains journaux affirment que des festivaliers habitués à se rendre à Bayreuth, auraient délaissé le Festival pour soutenir politiquement Salzbourg. Il y aurait là tout le gotha de Paris, Rome et Londres :

« Les élites européennes ne sont pas fâchées, en effet, de se réunir dans un centre de culture où l'on ne brûle pas les bibliothèques et où l'on n'oblige pas les partitions à faire de la politique. » (33)

Tout ce petit monde semble fasciné par le chef d'orchestre haut en couleurs Arturo Toscanini, qui s'impose comme l'homme fort du Festival, de 1934 à 1938. Ce farouche opposant à Benito Mussolini et à Adolf Hitler, fait le choix de Salzbourg contre Bayreuth où on le priait de se produire. Ultime pied de nez aux Nazis, il s'obstine à diriger du Wagner à 2 pas de la frontière et de la résidence du « Führer » à Berchtesgaden. Il contribue ainsi à faire de Salzbourg « le refuge de la culture allemande » (34) comme l'écrit François Mauriac dans un article.

L'Europe entière se presse aux représentations du Festival de Salzbourg. Cadre prestigieux et valorisant, il permet à l'Autriche de soigner et d'entretenir ses relations diplomatiques avec ses pays voisins. Horthy, Humbert de Piémont ou encore Edouard VIII se rendent sur les rives de la Salzach. Mais cela ne doit pas masquer les ambiguïtés de la direction et du « Bund » . D'ailleurs, la ville finit par accueillir de nouveau chaleureusement des personnalités du « Reich » après la conclusion du « Gentlemen's agreement » entre le chancelier Schuschnigg et Hitler, le 11 juillet 1936. Grâce au retour des touristes allemands et à l'aura de Toscanini, le nombre d'étrangers venant à Salzbourg augmente à partir de 1936. Un record est même atteint en 1937, avec 52 000 visiteurs ayant passé au moins 1 nuit dans la ville de Salzbourg au mois d'août. (35)

Au service des Nazis (1938-1945)

Suivant les volontés du ministre de la Propagande Josef Goebbels et avec la bénédiction de Hitler, Salzbourg devient le 2e Festival du « Reich » après Bayreuth. La manifestation doit servir à la fois à amadouer l'opinion internationale et illustrer le prestige du régime. (36)

Contrairement à ce que l'on pouvait attendre, Goebbels n'opère aucune révolution artistique. Il n'hésite d'ailleurs pas à choisir des artistes pour leur talent plutôt que leurs opinions politiques. Il sollicite, par exemple, des metteurs en scène restés fidèles à Max Reinhardt comme Heinz Hilpert. (37) La programmation reste ainsi presque inchangée, exception faite des Opéras de Richard Wagner qui sont écartés pour ne plus concurrencer Bayreuth. Les Nazis inscrivent ainsi Salzbourg dans la continuité de ses débuts, même s'ils rejettent officiellement l'héritage des fondateurs.

Le Festival se déroule comme prévu, du 23 juillet au 31 août 1938. La fréquentation est en forte baisse pour les festivaliers étrangers. (38) En outre, le public comprend pour la 1^{re} fois des travailleurs qui bénéficient de billets à tarif réduit grâce au « Kraft-durch-Freude » (KdF : La force par la joie) , l'organisation de loisirs du « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » (Le Front allemand du travail) . (39)

En 1939, le grand événement est la présence de Hitler qui fait l'honneur de sa visite à 2 reprises. Salzbourg fait alors figure de lieu culturel prestigieux du « Reich » . (40) C'est la raison pour laquelle de hauts-dignitaires s'y rendent encore cette année-là comme le commissaire à la réunification de l'Autriche, Josef Bürckel ; le « Gauleiter » de Vienne, Baldur von Schirach ; le « Gauleiter » de l'« Oberdonau » , August Eigruber ; ou le « Gauleiter » du Tyrol-Vorarlberg, Franz Hofer.

Tout change à la fin de l'année 1940. Goebbels veut se servir du Festival comme moyen de ressouder la population face à la Guerre et de remonter le moral des troupes. En récompense aux sacrifices et à l'effort de guerre, les spectacles sont ainsi ouverts principalement aux soldats en convalescence et en permission, ainsi qu'à la classe ouvrière qui travaille dans l'armement. Salzbourg a également pour mission d'exalter avec émotion les combats et d'exprimer la gratitude de la patrie pour le sang versé. (41)

En 1941, sur les 37 représentations étalées sur 23 jours, 20,000 places sont occupées par des gens portant l'uniforme. Goebbels se réjouit lorsqu'il contemple le public :

« La salle est cette fois occupé principalement par des soldats, des blessés et des travailleurs. Quelle autre image par rapport au dernier Festival de l'été 1939, peu de temps avant l'éclatement de la crise européenne ! » (42)

L'absence de touristes étrangers est compensée en partie par l'afflux de festivaliers japonais et italiens. (43) Parmi eux, des invités de marque et notamment des diplomates comme l'ambassadeur italien Dino Alfieri (44) ; l'ambassadeur du Japon, Oshima Hiroshi ; ou encore l'ambassadeur danois, Otto Carl Mohr. Le maire de Salzbourg reçoit les invités prestigieux à Hellbrunn. (45)

Malgré cela, le Festival traverse la Seconde Guerre mondiale en étant relativement épargné par les événements. Il faut attendre 1944 et la « guerre totale » pour que des représentations soient annulées.

1945, une seconde naissance (1945-1950)

Les Américains pénètrent dans Salzbourg, le 4 mai 1945. Dès le mois d'août suivant, la U.S. Army parvient à rétablir le Festival. Une opération qui relèverait presque du miracle avec tous les problèmes logistiques que pose une ville partiellement détruite par les bombardements et où affluent des milliers de réfugiés. (46)

C'est la raison pour laquelle les habitants redoutent le rétablissement du Festival. À la pénurie de logements, s'ajoutent les difficultés d'approvisionnement en nourriture. (47) Il est, par ailleurs, impossible de voyager entre les différentes zones d'occupation (48) ce qui empêche, de facto, toute reprise du tourisme. Le Festival se déroule du 12 août au 1er septembre. La programmation est réduite à seulement 5 représentations de l'Opéra « L'Enlèvement au sérail » de Mozart ; 3 de la pièce « Le Fou et la Mort » de Hugo von Hofmannsthal ; et 3 soirées de concert.

Le public est composé aux 2/3 du Second Corps de l'armée américaine cantonné à Salzbourg et de quelques officiers des autres puissances alliées. Le tiers restant est réservé à la population autrichienne. (49) Les billets coûtent de 2 à 25 « Reichsmarks ». Des prix raisonnables : à la même époque, une cigarette coûte 1 « Reichsmark ». Mais la population se soucie plus de son quotidien que du Festival. (50)

Les difficultés d'organisation sont sensiblement les mêmes en 1946. Le public des représentations reste majoritairement de couleur kaki.

La situation commence à s'améliorer à partir de 1947. Les visiteurs sont autorisés à séjourner dans les établissements de Bad Gastein et Bad Hofgastein dans le « Land ». (51) Les Américains refusent cependant d'assumer la charge des artistes et des touristes du Festival. (52) Enfin, les festivaliers doivent payer leurs dépenses en dollars américains ou en devises étrangères. Ils ne peuvent organiser seuls leur séjour et sont obligés de passer par l'intermédiaire d'agences de voyage spécifiquement habilitées comme l'« American Express Company » ou « Thomas Cook ». Les transports demeurent également très limités pour les civils. Le train ou la route sont les 2 seuls moyens pour parvenir jusqu'à Salzbourg. Encore faut-il surmonter toutes les difficultés administratives pour obtenir des visas. Il s'agit également de vérifier le passé de chaque visiteur. C'est ce que raconte avec agacement un critique musical français qui parvient à se rendre à Salzbourg en 1947 :

« Me voici à Salzbourg. Non sans peine. Pour y être admis, il a fallu un bon mois de démarches et d'enquêtes, non pas du tout sur ma compétence musicale, mais sur mon passé et mes opinions. Lecteurs candides, qui vous obstinez à demander “ comment il faut s'y prendre pour aller à Salzbourg ”, résignez-vous, cette année encore, à croire sur parole les récits des privilégiés. » (53)

Salzbourg est donc toujours dominé par la présence américaine, que ce soit dans les rues, dans les hôtels ou dans les salles de spectacle. Pas du tout préparées à entendre des concerts Classiques et à assister à des Opéras, les troupes font preuve d'un certain laisser-aller qui choque les rares observateurs autrichiens ou étrangers. (54)

Dimanche, 11 août 1946 (11:00 am) : Petite salle du « Festspielhaus ». 2e Concert symphonique. Carl Schuricht dirige l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne.

Anton Bruckner : Symphonie n° 5 en si bémol majeur, version originale de 1878 éditée par Robert Haas en 1935 (WAB 105) .

Le professeur de musique Adalbert Lorenz raconte de façon ironique une scène dont il est témoin en 1946 :

« J'ai vu des officiers lors d'un concert au Palais des Festivals qui étaient assis au 1er rang et qui mâchaient de la gomme, les pieds appuyés sur la rampe dorée. C'est de cette façon qu'ils appréciaient Bruckner. » (55)

Il faut rappeler que le Festival n'est pas gratuit pour les soldats américains qui utilisent leur solde pour s'acheter des billets. Il semblerait même, selon le témoignage d'Ernst Lothar, qu'ils aient été obligés d'assister aux représentations dans les 1ers temps. (56)

Le Festival change d'aspect à partir de l'été 1948, avec le retour des touristes. 11,978 touristes sont ainsi enregistrés à Salzbourg durant le mois d'août, et l'édition de 1948 compterait même 72,000 festivaliers. Ce chiffre est à relativiser puisqu'il comprend encore de nombreux soldats américains stationnant à Salzbourg et assistant aux représentations. Toutefois, l'augmentation du nombre de civils est bien réelle et s'expliquerait par la possibilité d'acheter des places de l'étranger et l'assouplissement de l'obtention des visas. (57)

Malgré le manque d'hôtels, le retour de la haute-société internationale est notable :

« Cet éclatant succès, le nombre et la qualité des visiteurs le confirment. Visiteurs venus des plus lointains horizons : Américains du Nord et du Sud, Anglais, Scandinaves, Suisses, Hollandais, Orientaux de toutes origines, Éthiopiens, Grecs, Chinois, se coudoient ici dans une même pensée pieuse. » (58)

L'activité touristique connaît encore une nouvelle impulsion en 1949. La direction de la police de Salzbourg comptabilise 100,000 spectateurs, soit 40 % d'augmentation par rapport à l'année précédente. 18,219 touristes auraient passé au moins 1 nuit dans la ville de Salzbourg durant le mois d'août. Le Festival aurait, par ailleurs, attiré 372 journalistes représentant 700 journaux autrichiens et étrangers. Les nationalités qui dominent seraient les Américains, les Italiens, les Suisses, les Britanniques et les Français. (59) Parmi les personnalités qui sont citées dans les chroniques mondaines, la comédienne britannique Jean Simmons (60) ; le Prince égyptien Mohamed Abdel Moneim ; et la comtesse Wenkheim (61) .

Le tourisme franchit encore un palier en 1950 avec 83,720 festivaliers (62) et 29,240 visiteurs étrangers dans la ville de Salzbourg au mois d'août (63) . La plupart viennent d'Autriche. On compte néanmoins 3,750 Italiens ; 3,020 Suisses ; 2,089 Américains ; 1,782 Anglais ; 1,608 Français. Il n'y a quasiment pas de ressortissants des pays d'Europe centrale (18 Tchécoslovaques ; 22 Hongrois ; et 4 Roumains) alors qu'ils étaient très présents avant 1938. Un seul Soviétique est à l'appel. (64) Le tourisme de masse commence même à pointer le bout de son nez avec des cars venant de toute l'Europe déversant ses clients dans les auberges de jeunesse. (65) Cette année-là, plusieurs centaines de radios retransmettent les concerts du Festival dans 13 états européens. Un potentiel de 60 millions d'auditeurs. (66) Du jamais vu pour le Festival qui a enfin retrouvé tout son lustre d'avant-guerre.

La critique la plus souvent développée à l'encontre du Festival de Salzbourg est de s'être coupé très vite de la population locale en privilégiant de riches spectateurs étrangers. (67) L'opposé de ce qu'auraient voulu Hugo von Hofmannsthal et Max Reinhardt.

Il faudrait pourtant se garder d'interpréter les textes de Hofmannsthal à la lumière d'un Théâtre National Populaire, façon Jean Vilar. L'écrivain a-t-il pensé que les paysans de Salzbourg assisteraient réellement aux représentations ? Il n'a en tous cas jamais confondu son public avec le peuple. Il espérait, certes, avoir une certaine influence sur l'ensemble des Autrichiens comme sur l'ensemble des Européens, mais en touchant d'abord les élites qui transmettraient ensuite ses idées au reste de la société. (68)

Or, le Festival de Salzbourg a véritablement conquis les élites européennes et américaines, provoquant ainsi l'intérêt des médias internationaux. Grâce à cette audience, il a contribué à véhiculer une image positive de l'Autriche, et il est devenu l'un des symboles de son indépendance face à l'Allemagne. Un regard étranger qui a pesé également dans le développement du sentiment d'identité nationale autrichien.

The Salzburg Festival was inaugurated on August 22, 1920, when Hugo von Hofmannsthal's morality play « Jedermann » was premiered on the « Domplatz » , directed by Max Reinhardt. Since that time, the Salzburg Festival has established itself as the most important Festival for Opera, drama and concerts.

The birth hour of the Salzburg Festival is generally stated as 22 August 1920 when Hugo von Hofmannsthal's morality play « Jedermann » was first performed on the « Domplatz » (Cathedral Square) in the staging by Max Reinhardt.

The origins, however, go back much further. The 1st Opera ever to be performed north of the Alps probably took place in Salzburg. Prestigious presentations of music and theatre were given with great extravagance at the princely and archiepiscopal Court in Salzburg ; the people were captivated by the many sacred and secular plays. Until Mozart's time, dramas and « singspiels » were performed at the venerable Salzburg University and enjoyed great public interest ; and Salzburg Cathedral had always been the scene of presentations of magnificent church music as well as church festivities which were celebrated with processions.

The dramatic spectrum in Salzburg extends from the mystery and Passion plays of the Middle-Ages, courtly Baroque festivities to the time when middle-class theatre traditions became established. Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was born on 27 January 1756 into this dense artistic atmosphere. From 1842, when in the presence of the sons of the composer, the Mozart Monument was ceremoniously unveiled, thus, also laying the foundation stone for revering the genius loci, the idea was repeatedly mooted of organising regular Mozart music festivals in Salzburg. In 1877, the « Wiener Philharmoniker » accepted an invitation from the International Mozart Foundation to come to Salzburg for a music festival and performed here, for the first time, outside Vienna. In 1887, the conductor Hans Richter spoke in the same context in favour of an annual Mozart festival based on the model of Bayreuth.

In 1917, following on from the idea formulated at the end of the 19th Century to hold a regular Mozart festival in Salzburg, the association calling itself « Salzburg Festspielhaus-Gemeinde » was founded thanks to the initiative of Friedrich Gehmacher and Heinrich Damisch, in Vienna, in order to raise funds for building a festival house. The idea of founding a festival in Salzburg had in the meantime already been taken-up by other circles. The poet Hermann Bahr was committed to the idea. Max Reinhardt, who had begun his career at the « Salzburg Stadttheater » (nowadays, the « Landestheater ») and, in 1918, acquired « Schloß Leopoldskron », submitted a relevant Memorandum for the Building of a Festival House in Hellbrunn, in 1917, in Vienna. In 1919, Hugo von Hofmannsthal published a draft programme for the Salzburg Festival. Thus, the festival idea, which had originated on the initiative of the Salzburg middle-class (probably, Salzburg's most successful and sustainable civic initiative) received its intellectual super-structure from its influential protagonists in Vienna.

After the performances of Hofmannsthal's « Jedermann », the Salzburg Festival quickly became established also internationally through the participation of the stage-designer Alfred Roller, the composer Richard Strauß and the conductor Franz Schalk, despite the insecure economic situation and initially without support from public subsidies. In particular from 1933, when the Thousand Mark Ban was imposed by Adolf Hitler, which meant that German guests stayed away, a counterpart to Bayreuth was proclaimed in Salzburg. The festival managed to attract wealthy Western Europeans and Americans to Salzburg, « with the anti-Fascist Arturo Toscanini as the world famous attraction » (Ernst Hanisch quoting from Heinz Dopsch. « Geschichte der Stadt Salzburg », 1996) . Nevertheless, this was only for a short time.

The chequered history of the festival can be described vividly showing the ambivalent features, the breaks and the continuities. Ambivalence is most obvious between the poles of tradition and modern because the Salzburg Festival positioned itself as « an anti-modern product of modernity » (Georg Kreis. « Das Festspiel », 1991) , in an antagonism of bourgeoisie and progressiveness, conservative Catholicism or rather national new definition and a newly-aroused cosmopolitanism, as well as a new orientation with regard to the future (see : Michael Steinberg. « Ursprung und Ideologie der Salzburger Festspiele 1890-1938 » , 2000) . The attempt to bridge this ambivalence between tradition and modern has repeatedly sparked-off efforts for the festival idea and also criticism of it.

Initially, the festival idea was based on the desire to establish outstanding artistic events of the highest-standard in a close relationship with the cultural tradition of Austria, to the genius loci and to the special scenery of a Baroque city. After the turmoil of the First World War and in the general lack of orientation, the founding of the festival was intended to support the creation of a new Austrian identity, whereby, by referring back to tradition, a cultural restoration took place. The statements made by the founders of the festival move between these poles :

« Organizing a musical and theatrical festival in Salzburg means reviving ancient living traditions in a new way ; it means : doing things in a new way in ancient, meaningful and exquisite places, what was always done there. »

(Hugo von Hofmannsthal. « Festspiele in Salzburg » , 1921.)

« The festive, holiday-like, unique features that all art has and that even theatre in the time of the Ancient Greeks had and also at the time when it was still in the cradle of the Catholic church, that has to be given back to theatre. »

(Max Reinhardt to Ferdinand Künzelmann, 21 July 1918.)

By reflecting on the magnificent cultural heritage a platitude of Austrian cultural history and cultural policy is referred to, which does, however, represent an extremely complex phenomenon. Both the inter-War years as well as the post-War years are characterized by this phenomenon. Even after the horrors of Nazi atrocities, art and culture served as a catalyst so as to compensate for a reduced national sense of self-esteem.

At the same time, the Salzburg Festival was intended as a project against « the crisis, the crisis of meaning, the loss of values, the crisis of identity of the individual human being as well as of entire nations » (Helga Rabl-Stadler) . In the middle of the First World War, the resolve matured to reconcile the nations who were warring against each other by means of a festival that would give them a unifying aim. That is why peace and the belief in Europe are at the centre of the 1st « Appeal for a Plan for a Salzburg Festival » (1919) , incomparably formulated by Hugo von Hofmannsthal : « Europeanism that fulfilled and enlightened the period from 1750 to 1850. » Which other festival can or must fulfil such a founding mission that is valid for all time ?

It is also not by chance that Reinhardt's and Hofmannsthal's festival idea was sparked-off by Salzburg. Far away from the big cities, away from the worries of day-to-day life, the intention was to establish the festival as a place of pilgrimage, theatre as a place of refuge :

« The restlessness of our time, the difficulties caused by daily events take on such dimensions in the big city, oppress us and burden us to such an extent that in the evenings we cannot free ourselves of the worries of the day as we would wish. The play as such can neither be presented nor received. In the big city we cannot celebrate true festivities with the heart. »

(Max Reinhardt. « Festliche Spiele » , 1935.)

« Besides being anti-modern, a feeling of anti-metropolis also characterized this special festival, which was also intended to bring people together as an overall European project. The big wide-world was to be brought into the small city, whereby, tangible economic and touristic considerations also played a role, resulting in Salzburg becoming stylised as “ the heart of the heart of Europe ”. »

(Max Reinhardt. « Memorandum » , 1917.)

The antithetical reality prompted Max Reinhardt to make the memorable statement that the festival should not only be a “ luxury good for the rich and saturated but also food for the needy ”. »

In the same way, that great history, world history is reflected in the small history of the festival, « grandeur » is manifested on a small scale, for instance, in Hans Pœlzig's design for a festival house in Hellbrunn :

« To a certain extent, the planned festival house in Salzburg is to be understood as the reflection of the solution and conception in Berlin (Pœlzig planned Reinhardt's “ Großes Schauspielhaus ” there) : here, the theatre of the big city in the metropolis of Berlin - there the festival house of “ consecration ” and of “ light ”, away from urban everyday goings on in the province. »

(Constanze Schuler. « Der Altar als Bühne » , 2007.)

The visionary project that aimed to combine landscape and architecture, had, however, to remain ou-tópos because of the absence of the hoped-for international financial help, and the massive depreciation of currency doomed the ambitious project to failure. Ultimately, the court stables built in 1607 were adapted and turned into a festival house and the architecture of the festival quarter was dominated by Clemens Holzmeister. The Utopia was realised within the city and its surrounding mountains and the myth revived of the « city as a stage » . In Salzburg, the recurring picture of the Baroque culture of prestigious events meant : the Great World Theatre - « that builds-up an auditorium for the world » , « the metaphor carrying the whole » (Hugo von Hofmannsthal, 1922) . To a certain extent, Salzburg's most important secular and religious locations were linked to each other, and the entire city, in accordance with the Baroque idea of « world theatre » was made into a stage (see : Schuler, 2007) . In his « Salzburger großes Welttheater » , premiered in 1922 in the « Kollegienkirche » , Hugo von Hofmannsthal stylized the metaphor as a mystery play. Thomas Bernhard, the writer with the most polarising impact in the 1970's and 1980's, who also caused uproar in Salzburg, paraphrased it 60 years later as follows :

« Everything in the world is a play, isn't it ? The Pope is also a great actor. Irrespective of whether he has learned a very low play, he is of course now one of the greatest actors. This is such a world play. I do not appear in the world theatre. - Somewhere up in the grid, perhaps. Somehow, I am pulled along. They are not even pulling at a piece of scenery but, perhaps, some millions or billions are pulling there ? And there, the background moves. But these few figures at the front, they perform their salon play. And the Pope creates the dignity - with his white robe. The one who is inscrutable usually comes from the East. In other words, the red one, the dark one, the feared one. Then, the comic figure. These things do happen. Then, there are the drinking companions, young journeymen who appear, fat cousins. That is a " Jedermann " play. And the stage is roundly flattened-out, like the globe. »

Thanks to the international charisma of the artists Max Reinhardt brought to Salzburg, and the visions of the founding fathers, as well as the excellent contacts abroad, especially of Max Reinhardt, the Salzburg Festival very quickly became established :

« All at once, the Salzburg Festival became a world attraction, as it were the Olympic Games of Art in the modern era, in which all nations competed to present their best achievements. Kings and princes, American millionaires and film stars, music enthusiasts, artists, writers and snobs all met in Salzburg. »

(Stefan Zweig. « Die Welt von Gestern » , 1944.)

The relationship of the Salzburger to the « foreigners » , who soon made the pilgrimage in large numbers to the city on the Salzach, was, however, not free of friction. It was not long before the boom in cultural tourism was criticized, and local residents often felt they had been degraded to the role of mere accessories :

« They grumbled because they felt threatened, and fought in advance the foreigners who would come, and proved that despite the revolution Austria had remained what it was, by reflecting on the old Austrian election slogan that one wanted to have peace and quiet. »

(Dopsch. « Geschichte » , 1996.)

Finally, from the beginning of the 1930's, the worst form of xenophobia, anti-Semitism, became unbearable under the influence of the Nazis. It became increasingly difficult for Max Reinhardt, who was Jewish, to work in Salzburg. From 1938, Jewish artists were prohibited from performing in Salzburg. Hugo von Hofmannsthal's « Jedermann » disappeared from the programme, as did many other works by Jewish artist colleagues. Salzburg was also no longer the stage for an international public. The festival degenerated into insignificance and became a wheel in the propaganda machine of the Nazis, a « place where politics could be staged » .

The Salzburg Festival's popularity suffered a major blow as a consequence of the « Anschluß » , the annexation of Austria by Nazi Germany in 1938. Arturo Toscanini resigned in protest, artists of Jewish descent like Max Reinhardt and Georg Solti had to emigrate, and « Jedermann » , last performed by Attila Hörbiger, had to be dropped. Nevertheless, the Festival remained in operation until it was cancelled in 1944 by the order of « Reich » Minister Josef Gœbbels in reaction to the 20th « July Plot » . At the end of World War II, the Salzburg Festival re-opened in summer 1945 immediately after the Allied victory in Europe.

On 12 March 1938, German troops marched into Salzburg. The « Anschluß » (annexation of Austria by Germany) was now complete, and Nazi ideology immediately began to affect the Festival. Many artists who had left a deep imprint in previous years (we need only think of Max Reinhardt, Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini) were no longer welcome. The works of the Festival's co-founder Hugo von Hofmannsthal, especially « Jedermann » (but not his librettos for Richard Strauß) , were struck from the repertoire. Also discarded was Max Reinhardt's spectacular « Faust » in the « « Felsenreitschule » » , which had to give way to a production of Gœthe's « Egmont » . Henceforth, the Ministry of Propaganda in Berlin proclaimed : the Festival programmes were to be dominated by « German art » . Nor was Salzburg allowed to be a meeting place for an international audience. The majority of foreign visitors stayed away and were replaced by thousands of Germans from the programme known as « Kraft durch Freude » (Strength through Joy) . Most of them were workers with modest incomes who were given heavily subsidized tickets to the Festival.

The city was misappropriated and transformed into a huge propaganda vehicle for those in power. It was festooned with Nazi flags and even received a visit from Adolf Hitler himself in 1939. At the onset of the War, the Festival's programmes were sharply reduced. The performances were meant to bolster morale on the home front, and they were attended mainly by soldiers on leave or recovering from wounds or by workers from the armaments industry. In 1943, the term « Festival » was banned by the Propaganda Ministry and replaced by « Salzburger Theater- und Musiksommer » (Salzburg Summer of Theatre and Music) . After the failed attempt to assassinate Hitler, on 20 July 1944, and the proclamation of « Total War » shortly thereafter, Minister of Propaganda Gœbbels cancelled every Festival in the « Reich » . All that finally remained in Salzburg were one orchestral concert and the dress rehearsal for Richard Strauß's most recent Opera, « Die Liebe der Danaë » , whose world-premiere had already been scheduled. Among the artists who kept the Festival going beneath the Swastika were Clemens Krauß, who was appointed General Artistic Director in 1942, his fellow-conductors Karl Böhm and Hans Knappertsbusch, and the pianist Edwin Fischer.

In the 1930's, 2 forces made their impact on the Salzburg Festival : the early movement of the Nazi Party, and the Italian conductor Arturo Toscanini. The Depression was the political backdrop that led to the rise of Adolf Hitler. Many Jewish musicians from Germany fled to Salzburg, where they could perform in freedom. When the Nazis tried to establish influence, the Party was banned both in Salzburg and in all of Austria. The German response was to levy a 1,000 Reichsmark tax on any German citizen travelling to Austria, resulting in decreased attendance in the 1933 Festival.

Toscanini's arrival at the Festival, in 1934, did much to counteract the negative impact of the Nazis. He was the spotlighted conductor just when the Germans convinced Richard Strauß and Wilhelm Furtwängler to cancel their appearances in Salzburg. The Maestro also took a political stand : he would not conduct in Bayreuth when Jewish musicians were being mistreated. Bayreuth's loss was Salzburg's gain. Over the next several years, the Festival was a financial as well as a critical success.

After the « Anshluß » , the Nazis tried to infuse Salzburg with Germanic history. Josef Goebbels' bust was installed where Franz Rehr's once was, street names were changed, and the Germans took-over the Festival as a propaganda tool. One of their goals was to remove the international flavour that had flourished during the Toscanini years. Still, except for no production of « Jedermann » , the 1938 Festival was little changed from what it would have been without the « Anshluß » . Adolf Hitler attended the 1939 Festival, and the War-time Festivals were smaller and less ambitious. The Ministry of Propaganda even renamed the event as « Salzburger Theater- und Musiksommer » (Salzburg Summer of Music and Theater » .

When the Salzburg Festival ended its 1st decade in the 1920's, it had grown to an established international tradition of music and theater arts for Austria. Co-founded by Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Max Reinhardt, with additional support from Alfred Roller, Richard Strauß, and Franz Schalk, it expanded from a few days to the entire month of August, and featured artists from Salzburg, Vienna and other European cities. However, throughout the 1930's, the Festival faced increased economic and political obstacles despite its cultural success. The decade ended with the beginning of World War II.

The Festival celebrated 2 anniversaries in the early 1930's. One was the event's 10th anniversary in 1930. That celebration included the naming of the Max Reinhardt Square in front of the « Festspeilhaus » . The other was in 1931 for the 175th anniversary of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's birth. The program included 5 Mozart Operas, a ballet premiere, and chamber and orchestral concerts. The children of Salzburg presented their version of the morality play, « Jedermann » , and the Budapest Philharmonic accepted the invitation to mark the 1st performance of a foreign orchestra. The length of the Festival extended to 5 weeks, from 25 July to 31 August, and the radio broadcasts of the performances reached the United States.

Economic problems forced the 1932 Festival to work around budgetary constraints. The Great Depression was in the United States but its effects were felt in Salzburg. A further economic blow implemented by Adolf Hitler, in 1933, was the 1,000 Mark Ban (« Tausendmarksperre ») . This meant that German citizens had to pay 1,000 « Reichsmarks » if they wanted to travel to Austria from 1933-1936. As a result, the number of Festival attendees from Germany dropped from almost 13,000 in 1932 to less than 800 in 1933.

With the drop in tourism, event organizers aimed their advertising to attract new audiences and to encourage wealthy Americans and Europeans to enjoy the Alpine scenery and architecture as well as the concerts. The Salzburg Festival was promoted as the Austrian counterpart of the Bayreuth Festival in Germany. During the mid-1930's, Salzburg native, Herbert von Karajan, made his conducting debut at the 1933 Festival. Arturo Toscanini and Bruno Walter conducted many of the new and revived Operatic productions until the « Anschluß » , in 1938, when Nazi Germany annexed Austria.

The Salzburg Festival saw many changes following the « Anschluß » . Nazi presence was visible with Hitler's troops and flags. Hofmannsthal's play, « Jedermann » , was pulled from the program even though it had been a part of the Festival since the beginning. Many of the artists who had been mainstays of the Festival left Austria because they were either Jewish or were unwilling to participate under the Nazi regime. Among those who left were co-founder Max Reinhardt, and conductors Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

World War II began on September 1st, 1939, the day following the close of that year's Festival. Each year during the War, the original, positive intent of the Festival eroded. Names of some of the venues were changed and the Festival was used for Nazi propaganda. Soldiers made-up the majority of the audience. The Salzburg Festival Society was disbanded in 1942 and replaced by a general artistic director, conductor Clemens Krauß.

In 1943, Adolf Hitler ordered that the word « Festival » was no longer allowed as part of the Salzburg Festival name. The new name was « Salzburg Summer of Theatre and Music » . The event was for wounded soldiers and workers in armament factories. The next year, 1944, all of the various music and theater Festivals were canceled throughout the « Reich » by order of the propaganda minister. Krauß, as artistic director, used his connections with Berlin to get permission to go ahead with a dress-rehearsal of a new Opera by Richard Strauß. Had the Festival taken place, the world-premiere of this Opera, « Die Liebe der Danaë » , was to honour the composer's 80th birthday.

The unconditional surrendered of Germany on May 7th, 1945, marked the end of World War II in Europe. American troops were in Salzburg and some artists who had been in exile during Nazi occupation returned. The Festival would revive its original purpose of serving as a place where people of various nations could celebrate the arts. Works that had been banned since 1938 were re-instated. Mozart's Opera, « The Abduction from the Seraglio » , was broadcast to the United States. The audience consisted of Austrians and members of the armed forces. It was a scaled-down Festival, only lasting 2 weeks, but an important step in bringing-back the atmosphere before 1938.

New artists were welcomed while those who had been Nazi sympathizers were black-listed pending investigation. Building names were restored to their originals. Bruno Walter returned to conduct in 1949. Theater productions honoured the 200th anniversary of Goethe's birth. The year and decade closed with the Salzburg Festival not only surviving but with innovative plans on the horizon.

The great names of the Salzburg music Festival (Richard Strauß, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Herbert von Karajan) sit uneasily alongside a great horror : Adolf Hitler, the Nazis, anti-Semitism. Now, a film by the director Tony Palmer tells the full story.

The Salzburg Festival : the name alone is pure magic. This annual cornucopia of artistic thrills, with its cocktail of world-class music, theatre and glorious Alpine landscapes, has inspired countless festivals the world over, but its legendary status remains unique. Its history, though, is anything but unchequered. Now, a powerful portrait by the film director Tony Palmer is revealing its full story, warts and all, for the 1st time.

Controversy has never been far from Palmer's films, but the ructions in Salzburg over this one may yet take the biscuit. Palmer, ever determined to confront difficult issues, has revealed sides of its history that many would rather forget, epitomized by rare archive footage of Hitler sweeping into Salzburg against the background of the city's famous castle, his henchmen arriving in state at Swastika-bedecked Festival performances, and cheering crowds welcoming the German invaders in 1938.

One could argue that Festivals are about art, not politics ; that the past has to be laid to rest. But for the Salzburg Festival, this is a fraught issue, 1st because of the titanic stature of so many musicians embroiled in those and subsequent years ; and also because of the resonances that have rebounded through the decades up to the present-day.

Palmer says :

« The Festival authorities are divided about the film. Nobody has spoken publicly against it, but some who were supportive at 1st have changed their tune, because one pressure lobby has been getting at them about the Nazi material, saying, “ We can't say all this again, cut it out, it's not relevant. ” Again ? It's never been said before ! And it's absolutely crucial to understanding what this Festival has achieved. And I do say virtually at the beginning and end of every sentence that what they have achieved is absolutely wonderful ; there's nothing like it on the planet. Even so ... »

Salzburg's reputation for anti-Semitism was probably set by the city's original status as an independent, ecclesiastical State run by its archbishop. Until the 17th Century, Jews were burnt at the stake at a site that is now one of Salzburg's biggest breweries. Protestants, too, were thrown-out in the mid-18th Century. The law was changed by Emperor Franz-Josef, in 1868, to allow a quota of Jews into Land Salzburg.

Palmer says :

« Until the First World War, there were never more than 600 Jews living in Salzburg at any time, and the reason is now clear : it was one of the most anti-Semitic towns in Europe. Was, and maybe still is ; we can't prove it, but Helga Rabl-Stadler, the president of the Salzburg Festival, says in an extensive interview in the film that “ there are people around today who wish that Hitler and the Nazis were still here now ”. »

Yet, ironically, the Festival was spearheaded by 2 Jews : Max Reinhardt, the visionary, idealistic theatre director ; and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, poet and librettist to Richard Strauß. Festivals had been held occasionally in Salzburg since 1856 ; but after the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Reinhardt and Hofmannsthal, together with a local businessman, Friedrich Gehmacher, and Strauß himself as father figure, saw the opportunity that an annual Festival there offered to revitalize the soul of a State ravaged by War, hardship and identity crisis.

In the 1st Festival, in 1920, Reinhardt initiated the annual performance of the English Protestant morality play « Everyman » (« Jedermann ») , a tradition that persists today.

Palmer recounts :

« The Archbishop, Ignaz Reider, had seen Reinhardt's production of “ Jedermann ” in Berlin, and he suggested that they perform it on the steps of the Cathedral. Huge protests. But the Archbishop declared that he owned the cathedral square and nobody could stop it ! So there's the irony of the Catholic archbishop protecting these 2 Jewish artists and this Protestant, traditional version of the “ Everyman ” story, and, what's more, translating it so that it clearly referred to the fall of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It's a work of genius, and it's no accident that it's still there. »

The Festival quickly became a magnet to the intellectual elite of Europe, besides the high-society that still frequents it. Musically, it attracted the finest performers of the day, notably the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and conductors such as Arturo Toscanini, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Richard Strauß himself conducting his own Operas. But calamity was not far away.

Palmer says :

« Even English history books talk of the Nazis “ invading' Austria ”. Actually, they were welcomed. Within a week of the “ Anschluß ”, there was a plebiscite and 97 % of the population voted in favour. I interviewed many eye-witnesses of the time, including Maria von Trapp of “ Sound of Music ” fame.”

The invaders had big plans for Salzburg. They intended to build a monstrous new Festival theatre on the hillside across the river (« the brief was that it must be higher than the castle » , says Palmer) and a parallel building on the opposite hill as the « Wehrmacht » headquarters for « Ostmark » , as the Nazis euphemistically called Austria. Fortunately, those plans came to nothing, although Palmer has unearthed for the 1st time the actual architectural drawings. Still, the effects of the power vice in which the Nazis soon held the Festival were far-reaching, for the musicians responded to them in ways that affected their reputations for the rest of their lives and have continued to dog them after death.

Arturo Toscanini, among others, refused to perform under the regime. But for some, that was not the case. Controversy was especially rife over why Wilhelm Furtwängler did not leave. Palmer interviewed Furtwängler's nonagenarian widow Elisabeth, who reveals how her husband was coerced into staying in Germany.

Palmer explains :

« By 1938, Wilhelm Furtwängler had had enough and he let the Berlin Philharmonic know that he intended to leave. This got back to the authorities. He was then told that, the Nazis having arrived in Austria, Josef Goebbels was threatening to disband the Vienna Philharmonic and send all its members into the army. Goebbels wanted to establish the supremacy of the Berlin Orchestra over Vienna ; but Berlin was in Prussia, the fiefdom of Hermann Göring, whom he hated. Furthermore, in Goebbels' view, Vienna was infested with Jews ; Gustav Mahler, the great inspiration to the Vienna Philharmonic, was Jewish, as was that other great conductor, Bruno Walter, who had fled. When Furtwängler heard that the Vienna Philharmonic was in effect to be abolished, according to Elisabeth, he went to the “ Führer ” and said : “ If you do that, I am definitely leaving. ” He'd been thinking about it, but hadn't said it until then. And the “ Führer ” said : “ No, you can't possibly do that. ” So, he stayed and, thus, he saved the Vienna Philharmonic. Mrs Furtwängler says that, after the War, he finally recognized everything that had happened, and said to her : “ Germans did this ! Happiness is no longer possible in our life. ” That's incredibly moving. »

Furtwängler was not the only conductor caught in the Nazi stranglehold. The young Karl Böhm was likewise manipulated : Böhm's son, the actor Karlheinz Böhm, recounts in another interview that his father was warned that if he left, every member of his family would be sent to a concentration camp.

Richard Strauß himself accepted the post of president of the « Reich » Music Chamber. Palmer interviews Strauß's great-granddaughter Madeleine Rohla-Strauß, who offers a near-apology for her forebear's action. It was a move made not out of conviction, she confesses, but extraordinary political naivety and egoism.

Palmer says :

« First, he thought he could be a force for good, which was too stupid for words. Next, he'd made a fortune before the First World War, especially from “ Salome ” and “ Der Rosenkavalier ”, but, thinking that the Austro-Hungarian Empire looked dodgy in the run-up to 1914, he'd put all his money into the Bank of England. The whole lot was seized as part of the reparations following the Treaty of Versailles, so in 1919, he was virtually bankrupt. This memory weighed heavily when the Nazis came along - he was determined that it wouldn't happen again.

So, to some extent, his accepting that post was understandable. Besides, it flattered his ego to be told he was Mr. Big. Last but not least, he'd had a personal mission to try to establish a system of musical education in the Weimar Republic ; it had failed, and now he thought he could achieve it under the Nazis. You can understand that kind of naivety, even if you can't approve of it. »

There was a further twist in Salzburg's political tale. In 1945, when the city had been heavily bombed and people were reduced to begging in the streets, the Festival nevertheless went ahead. Palmer discovered that it was financed by the Americans, who were using it as Cold War propaganda.

Palmer recounts :

« The Russians had got to Vienna in February. Mrs Furtwängler told us this : the Russians had already imported as many great Russian conductors and orchestras as they could to play in Vienna. So, the Americans thought, “ Anything they can do, we can do better. ” Therefore, they needed the Salzburg Festival. It was re-established after the Second World War as a direct result of American military policy, and the Americans paid for it for several years. »

Meanwhile, a young conductor had been rising through the ranks : Herbert von Karajan, a native of Salzburg. Later, as director, he built the Festival to such a peak that on his death, in 1989, fears abounded not only for what would happen to it, but even what would happen to the city itself, where the Festival had become the largest source of income.

Karajan had joined the Nazi Party not once but twice, the first time while it was still illegal in Austria.

Palmer :

« Without the Salzburg Festival, the careers of many musicians who had suffered by their association with the Nazi Party would not have revived as quickly as they did, Karajan being the obvious example, but Elisabeth Schwarzkopf too. Many managed to find a niche in a city which certainly had had a love-affair, and some would say continues to have a love-affair, with that time. »

Palmer points out that 2 eminent sopranos, Schwarzkopf and Kirsten Flagstad, had both been card-carrying Party members ; Flagstad's stellar Wagnerian career never fully-recovered.

« But Schwarzkopf, who stayed in Austria and performed often in Salzburg, somehow managed to survive. »

Nevertheless, the film presents a balanced portrait of Karajan, emphasizing his vital role as not only legendary conductor and Festival director but also as patron to other musicians.

Palmer :

« He was always willing to invite and recommend younger conductors. Very few conductors do that ! »

Among those Karajan helped to launch in Salzburg were Riccardo Muti, Seiji Ozawa and Mariss Jansons, plus the violinist Anne-Sophie Mutter, all of whom pay tribute to his influence in the film. Extracts from home movies show him as a devoted family man leading an unpretentious existence, while anecdotes abound about his quiet financial generosity. For Karajan, then, redemption did lie to a considerable extent in art.

But the legacy of the War years proved long-lasting - manifesting, according to Palmer, as an ingrained conservatism that he regards as closely linked to anti-Semitism.

Palmer :

« Gérard Mortier, under whose directorship the Festival achieved unprecedented audience levels, fell foul of this many times. »

The Belgian-born arts manager raised hackles by up-ending tired traditions that were ossifying the Festival's artistic outlook.

Palmer :

« He felt he was simply trying to re-establish the ideals on which Max Reinhardt had founded the Festival, to put it back on the intellectual map. »

Though some critics felt that certain productions went too far, including a drug-crazed « Don Giovanni » and a brothel-set production of « Die Fledermaus » that, even today, reduces Salzburg's citizens to a state of spluttering frenzy.

One of Mortier's collaborators, the provocative Opera director Peter Sellars, tellingly comments :

« We all have our moment where the door opens and you step in and you do anything you can do before they figure out what you're doing and throw you out again. »

Palmer :

« An earlier crunch point, ironically during Karajan's regime, had been the 1st production in Salzburg of “ Moses und Aron ”. One of many things I didn't include was some footage of the director Jean-Pierre Ponnelle and the conductor James Levine being booed off the stage. »

Levine talked to him at length about the problems surrounding the work :

« It's Schönberg ; it's the most in-your-face Jewish Opera there is ; and, at the time, Kurt Waldheim was president of Austria. Nothing was ever proved against Waldheim except that he had lied about his Nazi past, but when he came to the Salzburg Festival, there were riots. And everybody denied it. Riots ? Never ! They said it had never happened ! Quite extraordinary. There's film of it and I've included that. »

27 January 2006 marked the 250th anniversary of the birth of Mozart. The date is also the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. Mozart year in Salzburg opened that day with a gala at the « Mozarteum » .

Palmer was there :

« The President of Austria, Heinz Fischer, was the last to speak. Everyone else had been saying : “ Wonderful place, wonderful Mozart. ” Fischer spoke very quietly. His 1st line was : “ Today is Mozart's birthday. Never forget that this day is also the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.” The audience gave a sharp intake of breath. And in front of me 32 ladies in furs and jewellery got-up and walked-out. »

The film closes with President Fischer's words :

« How incredible it is, and how difficult to understand that the human being is able to write such wonderful, heavenly music, and that the very same human being is able to behave like those who are responsible for the murders and crimes in a concentration camp like Auschwitz. And I, personally, am touched because my father-in-law was in the concentration camp, and so, this 27 January is really indicating the wide, wide space between heaven and hell. »

Le Festival de Salzbourg (1933-1949)

1933

Adolf Hitler's accession to power in Germany harboured further dangers for the Festival. The so-called « Thousand Mark Tariff » forced every German entering Austria to pay 1,000 Marks, effectively sealing the borders. There were only 796 visitors from Germany in 1933 as compared to 12,983 in 1932, and many artists were forced to cancel their engagements. The Festival struck-out on new paths and presented its 1st Wagner Opera : « Tristan und Isolde » , in a new production marking the 50th anniversary of the composer's death. There was also a veritable Operatic world-premiere as Richard Strauß's « Die ägyptische Helena » was mounted for the 1st time in its new Vienna version. The spectacular « Faust City » in the Summer Riding School, designed by Clemens Holzmeister for Goethe's Masterpiece, caused a sensation. The production team contained a name that would bulk large in the city's history : Herbert von Karajan, in his debut appearance, conducted the incidental music.

1934

It was a year of assassinations. On 17 May, a bomb exploded in the Festival Theatre, severely damaging the valuable mosaics by Anton Kolig. Then, the Austrian chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss was murdered in July ; his official funeral caused the opening of the Festival to be postponed to the next day. An architectural improvement, the partial roofing of the Summer Riding School, was carried-out in the spring. Despite the raging nationalism threatening to spill-over from Germany, Bruno Walter managed to have Mozart's « Don Giovanni » performed for the 1st time in the original Italian, thereby, ushering in a new era in Opera performance. A Richard Strauß cycle was given in honour of the composer's 70th birthday, and Arturo Toscanini, the great Italian conductor, finally made his Salzburg debut with 3 orchestral concerts.

1935

Alfred Roller, whose stage-designs set the tone for the Festival's aesthetics from its inception, died on 21 June. His sets, however, remained in use as late as 1953. Along with Bruno Walter, the musical programme was now dominated by Arturo Toscanini. Josef Krips made his Festival debut with a performance of « Der Rosenkavalier » . Attila Hörbiger played « Jedermann » for the 1st time, lending the part an entirely new shape. His reading, with its characteristic tenor inflection, influenced later actors in the role for generations.

In March, at the suggestion of provincial governor Franz Rehr, the Salzburg Parliament passed the « Law for the Protection of the Salzburg Festival ». As a result, outside events scheduled at the same time as the Festival now required special permission from the provincial government. This regulation remained in effect until 1970. Joseph Meßner's « Fanfare » was heard for the 1st time at the opening of the Festival, on 25 July ; since then, it has served as a signature tune in radio broadcasts. The construction of the Festival Theatre continued to pile-up deficits, and Clemens Holzmeister was again commissioned to remodel the building. The artistic high-point of the Festival was a new production of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » conducted by Arturo Toscanini.

1937

Clemens Holzmeister began work on enlarging the Festival Theatre. The main novelty was the 180 degrees rotation of the stage and auditorium. The stage area was, thus, shifted to the side of Saint-Peter's Abbey while the auditorium points in the direction of the Faistauer Foyer. The stage itself now became identical in size to that of the Vienna « Staatsoper », which made it possible for the 2 theatres to exchange sets. Wilhelm Furtwängler, principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, visited the Festival for the 1st time and conducted an orchestral concert. The rear fore-court of the theatre was renamed Toscanini Court, in honour of the conductor's 70th birthday. Another commemoration deserves to be mentioned : memorial plaques for Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Anton Faistauer were unveiled in the antechamber to the Faistauer Foyer. They were destined to remain there for no more than 1 year, for another age was about to dawn ...

1938

The influx of Adolf Hitler's troops into Austria led to severe interference in the Festival's programmes. Hugo von Hofmannsthal's « Jedermann », the heart of the Festival since 1920, was struck from the repertoire, as was Max Reinhardt's legendary production of « Faust ». The Festival's supporting institution, the Salzburg Festival Association, was placed beneath the auspices of the local « Gauleiter », and its president, Baron Heinrich Puthon, was removed from office. The new potentates were still able to profit from the work of the former directors : the re-modelled Festival Theatre was inaugurated with a performance of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg », now conducted by Wilhelm Furtwängler. Many of the artists who helped to establish the Festival's fame were unwilling or forbidden to take part in it, above all Max Reinhardt, Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini. Their place was taken by new names on the Festival's playbills, most notably that of Karl Böhm, who made his debut with « Don Giovanni » .

The ideology and rabid racism of the Nazi regime were manifest in the exhibition of « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) that was displayed in the Festival Theatre, from 4 September to 2 October.

The new regime ordered Anton Faistauer's frescoes to be removed from the entrance foyer, arguing that they were gloomy and out of date. The re-decoration of the rooms was entrusted to « " Reich " Set Designer » Benno von Arent. Nazi celebrities arrived punctually for the opening ceremonies : Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels attended the performance of « Der Rosenkavalier » and, a few days later, Adolf Hitler himself, flanked by Martin Bormann and Albert Speer, made an appearance at 2 Mozart Operas : « Don Giovanni » , on 9 August ; and « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » , on 14 August. Shortly thereafter, the general management made a surprise announcement that the Festival would terminate on 31 August, a week ahead of the scheduled finale on 8 September. The reason was, supposedly, that the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra were required to perform « Die Meistersinger » at the Nuremberg Party Convention. The true reason became apparent on 1 September when the German army invaded Poland and unleashed the Second World War.

1940

The year 1940 was marked by War, and the Festival was pared down to a 14 day « Salzburg Summer of Culture » . The programme consisted entirely of a concert-series presented by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under the batons of Hans Knappertsbusch, Karl Böhm, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Franz Lehár. Culture had become a State monopoly manipulated from above. This became evident in the new name assigned to one of the major venues : Salzburg « Stadttheater » was elevated to the rank of « Landestheater » .

1941

Although hostilities continued to mount and the German army invaded the Soviet Union, the Festival returned to its regular programme. The 150th anniversary of Mozart's death was honoured with productions of 3 of his Operas. Admittedly, little remained of the Festival's former glory and international stature : the audiences consisted mainly of soldiers, whether on leave or recovering from wounds, and workers from German and Italian munitions factories. The Festival functioned as a sort of psychological weapon of domestic warfare and manipulation : as catastrophe loomed ever larger on the horizon, the people's morale had to be shored-up and their worries dispelled. One important administrative appointment was made on 13 September as Clemens Krauß was named the Festival's artistic director.

1942

The organizational structure envisaged for the Festival by its founders was thrown overboard with the dissolution of the Salzburg « Festspielhaus » Association on 1 April. In its place, came a General Artistic Director's position, which went to Clemens Krauß with a 10 year contract. Realizing that the gap left by the cancellation of « Jedermann » was still unclosed, the Festival commissioned Richard Billinger to write a Paracelsus Play as a successor to Hofmannsthal's Masterpiece.

1943

According to Hitler's decree of 8 March 1943, the scheduled events were no longer allowed to take place under the name of « Festival ». They were re-named the « Salzburg Summer of Theatre and Music » and set aside primarily for armaments workers and War invalids from the Salzburg region. The programme consisted of 3 productions of spoken theatre and 2 of Opera. Richard Strauß's 2nd Horn Concerto received its world-premiere at one of the orchestral concerts.

The Festival's co-founder, Max Reinhardt, died on 31 October in his American exile.

The « Salzburger Theater- und Musiksommer » is cancelled.

On 29 July, a week before the « Summer of Theatre and Music » was to begin, an order arrived from Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels cancelling every festival in the « Reich ». Clemens Krauß exploited his close ties to the Berlin regime in order to salvage at least the dress-rehearsal for the scheduled world-premiere of Richard Strauß's « Die Liebe der Danæ ». The rehearsal duly took place on 16 August, with Viorica Ursuleac and Hans Hotter in the leading roles. The premiere was meant to honour the composer on his 80th birthday.

Deeply moved after the performance, Strauß uttered his famous words to the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra :

« I hope we shall see each other again in a better world. »

Wilhelm Furtwängler also received special dispensation from Berlin to conduct Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, on 14 August.

1945

On 4 May, 2 days before the Second World War officially came to an end, American troops took control of Salzburg. Before the spring was over a decision was made to revive the Festival : Otto von Pasetti, an Austrian-born tenor who spent the Nazi years in exile and returned as a member of the occupying forces, was entrusted with the organizational work, and Baron Puthon returned to his office as president. On 12 August, the Festival opened with an official ceremony in the Town Room (« Stadtsaal ») at which speeches were held by Puthon and the American general Mark Clark. Hugo von Hofmannsthal, whose works had been banned 7 years before (except for his libretti for Richard Strauß), returned to the repertoire. Mozart's « Entführung aus dem Serail » was broadcast on radio, even to the United States, and there were many concerts, most of which were given by the « Mozarteum » Orchestra. 23 of the visitors were members of the armed forces ; the rest of the tickets were distributed among Austrians. It was a rebirth, but far removed from normalcy.

1946

Hugo von Hofmannsthal's « Jedermann » returned in Max Reinhardt's original conception, adapted by Heinz Hilpert. The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra returned as well, both as an Opera Orchestra and with its own cycle of concerts. To be sure, the conductors on the playbills of the Nazi years gave way to new names : Hans Swarowsky, Felix Prohaska, John Barbirolli, Charles Münch, Carl Schuricht and Ernest Ansermet were now placed in charge of the music while artists such as Wilhelm Furtwängler, Karl Böhm, Clemens Krauß and Herbert von Karajan were black-listed pending their denazification. Oscar Fritz Schuh created his 1st production at the Festival, a new staging of « Figaro » and, once again, the programme featured a Strauß Opera, « Der Rosenkavalier » . Hofmannsthal, Reinhardt, Strauß : the Festival's founding triumvirate had returned to Salzburg. Finally, the Festival's administration also had news to report, as Tassilo Nekola, formerly hired as a general secretary, took charge of the artistic management.

1947

The desire to give the Festival a new image led to a number of remarkable « débuts » . Gottfried von Einem, a 29 year old Austrian composer who had joined the Festival's board of directors the previous year, achieved a resounding success with the world-premiere of his Opera « Dantons Tod » . Equally responsible for its success were Oscar Fritz Schuh (director) , Caspar Neher (designer) and the young Hungarian conductor Ferenc Fricsay. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf gave her Salzburg « début » as Susanna in « Figaro » , Sena Jurinac did the same as Dorabella in « Così fan tutte » , and Lisa Della Casa made her 1st appearance in an Opera that would later establish her world fame : Strauß's « Arabella » , this time however as Zdenka. The production was the work of another Salzburg debutant, Günther Rennert. Jubilation greeted the return of Wilhelm Furtwängler, who conducted 2 concerts with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, including one with violinist Yehudi Menuhin.

1948

The 1948 Festival amounted to a summit meeting between 2 conductors. Wilhelm Furtwängler conducted a new « Fidelio » in the « Festspielhaus » , while Herbert von Karajan brought-out Gluck's « Orfeo ed Euridice » in the « Felsenreitschule » - the 1st Opera ever performed in this venue. The covert rivalry between these 2 Mæstros prevented them from jointly taking part in the Festival, a solution that would doubtless have been preferred by audiences and critics alike. Apart from 2 orchestral concerts, in 1949, it was not until after Furtwängler's death that Karajan would return to Salzburg. In contrast, Ferenc Fricsay's star remained in the ascendant. This year, he presented the 1st staged performance of Frank Martin's « Le vin herbé » , thereby, extending the Festival's series of contemporary music theatre. In the spoken theatre, the era of Ernst Lothar commenced with a staging of Grillparzer's « Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen » .

2 deaths cast their shadow upon the Festival : Maria Cebotari, the celebrated Countess, Constanze, Zerlina and Euridice of the Festival's recent years, died on 9 June at the age of 39 ; and, on 8 September, the world took leave of Richard Strauß, and with him the last of the Festival's 3 co-founders. Bruno Walter returned to the Festival after a 12 year absence to perform Mozart's « Great » G minor Symphony and Mahler's « Lied von der Erde » with Kathleen Ferrier and Julius Patzak. Another famous « émigré », George Szell, made his 1st appearance at the Festival to conduct « Der Rosenkavalier ». Carl Orff's « Antigone » received its world-premiere in the « Felsenreitschule », an event that, once again, brought together the successful team of Fricsay, Schuh and Neher. From now on, it will not only be Mozart's well-known Operas that enliven the programmes but also, thanks to the tireless commitment of Bernhard Paumgartner, rarities from the Mozart repertoire. Paumgartner founded the Mozart « matinées », in which many forgotten gems would later be unearthed.

Spoken theatre was dominated by the great Goethe bicentenary as new productions of « Clavigo » and « Iphigenie auf Tauris » were mounted to celebrate the 200th anniversary of the great poet's birth.

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, which regularly played in Salzburg, was told to dismiss all Jewish musicians after the « Anschluß ». Suitably, Aryan replacements were quickly engaged, and the Orchestra fulfilled all its commitments in Salzburg, in 1938 and 1939, and continued to play regularly at the behest of the Nazi authorities throughout the War in Salzburg, Vienna and in Germany.

Foreign music-critics who covered the 1938 Festival disliked its « aryianisation », but seemed more concerned by the lax dress-code and the extensive beer drinking among the spectators brought in by the Nazis from Bavaria. They missed the elegance of past Festivals.

Nazi functionaries now took control of the Festival, a bust of Josef Goebbels was put-up, and anyone suspected of being of Jewish extraction was dismissed. The Nazis used music for propaganda purposes. Mozart's Operas, a staple at the Salzburg Festival, were recruited to call Austria's youth to arms.

Austria's Nazi Governor, Baldur von Schirach declared :

« In Mozart's name, we call the young to arms. »

Adolf Hitler, accompanied by Martin Bormann and Albert Speer, came to the premiere of « Don Giovanni » to open the 1939 Festival. They were feted with endless salvos of « Bravo » and Nazi salutes. The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, which would normally have played throughout the Festival, was abruptly ordered to go instead to Nuremberg to perform Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

The Nazis were determined to maintain the annual Salzburg Festival during the War and « restore its German character », as Hermann Göring put it. Programmes were narrowed to concentrate on Beethoven, Richard Strauss, Mozart, Richard Wagner, Johannes Brahms. High-ranking Nazi visitors who came to Festival performances were accommodated at « Schloß Leopoldskron », which had been sanitized of all traces of Max Reinhardt. Many of the great names of the music-world who had been regulars in Salzburg or Vienna were missing as well as Arturo Toscanini and Bruno Walter, there was Vladimir Horowitz, all of whom had emigrated to the United States. Karl Böhm and Clemens Krauß, however, had no scruples about working in Salzburg under the Nazis, insisting that they were safeguarding the Festival's traditions. Krauß remained directorship until 1944. Böhm went to Vienna in 1942, to be head of the State Opera. Both men were able to attract the best singers available in Germany and the German occupied territories. They included Hans Hotter, Erich Kunz, Anton Dermota, Irmgard Seefried, Hilde Güden and several other young artists whose fame spread after the War. Their willingness to perform under the Nazis attracted little attention. But Böhm's and Krauß's collaboration with the Nazis was far more problematical. Like Austrian-born Herbert von Karajan, who had joined the Nazi Party as early as 1933, and Germany's Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, who justified Party membership as a passport to performance similar to trade-union membership, their records were closely examined before the 2 conductors were allowed to perform again after the War's end.

The 4 Occupation powers in Austria did not attempt to define a common cultural policy for the country. The gulf between the Soviet concept of culture as a propaganda tool and the Western belief in freedom of speech was unbridgeable, even during the euphoria of victory. But the absence of a common attitude to the restoration of Austria's cultural life also meant that there was little cooperation in handling the sensitive matter of denazification in the performing arts.

Salzburg was under U.S. occupation. The Americans were keen to revitalize the Festival as a way of demonstrating America's commitment to Austria's cultural regeneration. They tried but failed to persuade Toscanini, Walter or Yehudi Menuhin to participate in the 1st post-War Festival. Obligated to rely on the talent available to them inside Austria, the Americans gave no clear directives about the engagement of artists who had compromised themselves with the Nazis. Festival administrators were left guessing about American intentions, and there was much agonizing over the acceptability of several outstanding musicians whose record under the Nazis was considered controversial. The Festival succeeded in opening its doors in 1945, using many singers who had also been prepared to perform under the Nazis.

The Americans made an unsatisfactory attempt to operate the same points system for the performing arts, which the 3 other occupying powers were also haphazardly administering. Artists had to complete questionnaires about their War-time activities, and these were used to score penalty points to determine whether they should be put onto black, grey or white lists. 3 penalty points were sufficient for the black-list. But there were no clear criteria for defining pro-Nazi transgressions. Most of the artists in question were popular figures in Austria. Austrians, already convinced that the country, as a whole, had been victimized by the Nazis, wanted to see and hear their favourites on the stage. Whitewash was liberally applied : it sufficed to argue that those who had flirted with the Nazis had done so only in order to be able to perform and remain true to their art. Henry Alter, an Austrian « émigré », noted in November 1945 that 90 % of Austria's artists would have had to be disqualified from performing if the Allies insisted on the observation of strict denazification procedures. Tacitly, the Allies accepted the argument that European artists had always felt free to accept honours ...

« Aryanisation »

Le processus d'aryanisation a commencé en même temps que l'entrée des troupes allemandes en Autriche. Les exactions contre la population juive et les pillages ont débuté avec l'« Anschluß ». Selon des témoignages, la terreur règne dans les rues et on entend « Juda verrecke » (Grève sale juif) ou « Jaden heraus » (Les juifs dehors). On assiste alors à des aryanisations sauvages menées par des employés des sociétés, des concurrents, des membres du NSDAP, des Cellules d'entreprises nationales-socialistes, des SA ou d'autres personnages ne songeant qu'à s'enrichir qui s'auto-proclament « commissaires ». Les transferts de propriété se font de manière arbitraire sous la pression psychologique en recourant à la violence. Les « commissaires » obtiennent des propriétaires juifs que ceux-ci cèdent leur entreprise ou leur logement à vils prix. Sur les 33,000 entreprises juives, 7,000 auraient été victimes d'aryanisations sauvages.

La loi du 13 avril 1938 sur les aryanisations a pour but de faire passer les aryanisations sauvages sous le contrôle de l'État et de légaliser les commissaires. À partir de la fin avril, les aryanisations doivent être soumises à autorisation préalable. Pour empêcher tout détournement ou fraude, la population juive doit déclarer ses biens entre le 27 avril et le 31 juillet 1938. Le principal bénéficiaire de ce processus d'aryanisation est l'État national-socialiste qui profite non seulement des biens confisqués, mais de toutes les ressources fiscales résultant du transfert de propriété. Le 14 juin 1938, une loi définit exactement ce qu'est une « entreprise juive », son propriétaire est juif selon la définition de l'article 5 de la « Reichsbürgergesetz », en fait des fameux articles aryens. Certaines entreprises peuvent être considérées comme « juives » si l'influence juive est « trop évidente ». Le 18 mai, est créé un Département pour le transfert de fortune, qui intègre quelques semaines plus tard, le nouveau ministre du Travail et de l'Économie. Les candidats à l'achat de tout bien juif doivent être « contrôlés », quant aux commissaires, leur appartenance au Parti ou à ses organisations, leur origine sociale comptent bien plus que leurs compétences professionnelles, ceux-ci sont soit le plus souvent incompetents et étrangers à la branche dont relève l'entreprise qu'ils doivent « aryaniser » soit ils sont impliqués de très près dans cette branche. Les militants « illégaux » du Parti sont largement privilégiés dans ces transactions.

Hermann Göring se dit satisfait de la politique menée à Vienne en matière d'aryanisation, en raison de la rapidité et de la « radicalité » de l'entreprise. En l'espace de quelques mois, 50 % des magasins de commerce, 83 % de l'artisanat, 26 % de l'industrie, 82 % des services ont été aryanisés. Des 86 banques, il n'en reste plus que 8. Quant à l'aryanisation de quelque 70,000 logements, elle évite aux nouveaux maîtres d'entreprendre de nouveaux programmes de construction à Vienne.

Les travaux de la Commission historique ont mis en lumière à quel point la politique d'aryanisation a touché certaines branches comme l'industrie textile, l'industrie de la chaussure et du cuir, l'industrie du bois et du papier, l'agro-alimentaire et les entreprises sucrières. Parmi les grandes entreprises aryanisées, on peut citer le grand magasin Gemgroß, la chaîne de chaussures Del-Ka ou la brasserie d'Ottakring.

La question de l'aryanisation empoisonnera la vie politique et économique autrichienne jusqu'au milieu des années 1920. Que cela soit à propos des tableaux de Gustav Klimt ou Egon Schiele ou de Jörg Haider qui a hérité de son oncle le domaine de Bärental, en Carinthie, que celui-ci avait « acheté » à vil prix dans le cadre de l'aryanisation des biens juifs ou bien lorsque Thomas Klestil, président de la République, désire acheter une villa à Vienne et qu'il s'avère que celle-ci a été « aryanisée », ce passé resurgira sans cesse.

Les travaux de la Commission historique ont aussi mis en évidence tous les préjudices et toutes les discriminations que l'« Anschluß » a provoqués dans le monde professionnel. Tout d'abord, dès le 15 mars 1938, tous les fonctionnaires doivent prêter serment à Adolf Hitler. Les Juifs et les soi-disant « Mischling » (sang mêlés) sont exclus du service public sur la base des lois de Nuremberg. Celles et ceux qui refusent de prêter serment pour des raisons politiques ou idéologiques sont licenciés ou, pour les plus âgés, mis à la retraite avec une pension largement amputée. Dans les autres branches professionnelles, dans les entreprises privées, il faut attendre le mois de juin pour que la chasse aux Juifs et aux « Mischlinge » ou aux personnels mariés à des Juifs ou des Juives soit enclenchée. Un dédommagement relevant d'un contrat privé n'excédant pas 10,000 « Reichsmarks » et englobant les droits à la retraite peut alors être envisagé. Les sources ne permettent malheureusement pas de savoir combien de personnes ont été touchées par ces mesures.

Unser Wien : « Arisierung » auf Österreichisch, Aufbau-Verlag, Berlin (2001) .

Notre Vienne : Aryanisation de l'Autriche est un livre co-écrit par Stephan Templ et Tina Walzer qui précise comment des centaines d'entreprises juives de Vienne ont été saisies par les Nazis et jamais restituées.

Tina Walzer est une historienne d'art, qui s'est spécialisée dans l'étude de la spoliation à grande échelle et de la vente forcée à des prix dérisoires des œuvres d'art détenus par les Juifs.

Stephan Templ est un journaliste basé à Prague et travaillant pour le « Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung » .

Publié en 2001, le livre répertorie pour la 1re fois les centaines de biens importants appartenant à des Juifs, saisis par les Nazis et qui n'ont jamais été rendus à leurs propriétaires d'avant la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Le livre donne les noms de ces fameux bénéficiaires.

La 1re partie du livre, écrite par Walzer, décrit les différentes méthodes de pillage employé par les Nazis et le destin des victimes juives, avec des références pour des cas particuliers et des exemples qui fourniront un contexte historique et politique à la seconde partie du livre.

Le « New York Times » note que ce qui différencie ce livre, ce n'est pas tant l'histoire qui est déjà largement connue, mais les détails de la seconde partie du livre, appelée « La topographie du vol » , qui liste plus de 500 entreprises avec leur adresse, leur ancien propriétaire et leur propriétaire actuel.

La seconde moitié du livre, compilée par le co-auteur Templ, s'apparente à un parcours guidé présentant l'ampleur des confiscations de biens juifs à Vienne sous le Nazisme, et les histoires s'y attachant.

Un grand nombre de politiciens, avocats, juges, docteurs, artistes ou sportifs ont pu améliorer leurs standards de vie après 1938. Le livre cite entre autres, parmi ces profiteurs :

Adolf Schärff (1890-1965) : Avocat, membre du Parti social-démocrate d'Autriche et président d'Autriche de 1957 à 1965 : il s'installe avec sa famille à l'automne 1938, quelques mois après l' « Anschluß » , au n° 1 de la « Skodagasse » , dans la maison d'Arnold Eisler, un avocat et ancien collègue en fuite.

Franz Vranitzky : Membre du Parti social-démocrate d'Autriche, chancelier fédéral d'Autriche de 1986 à 1997 : le père de sa femme, Karl Clemens Kristen, a acquis en 1938, pour la somme de 3,220 « Reichsmarks » , la société orthopédique Normalia propriété d'Ernst et Fanny Fürth. Le paiement est fait sur un compte bloqué au nom d'Ernst Israel Fürth. Le prix est égal à 1 mois de bénéfice de Normalia. Madame Christine Vranitzky, femme du chancelier, hérite de l'entreprise à la mort de son père et possède toujours des parts dans l'entreprise. Aucune compensation financière n'a été offerte aux héritiers Fürth.

Franz (« Ferry ») Dusika (1908-1984) : Un des plus célèbres cyclistes autrichiens des années 1930 : déjà Nazi avant l' « Anschluß » , il « aryanise » en 1938 l'entreprise de bicyclettes d'Adolf Blum, sis au n° 45 de la « Brünnerstraße » ; ainsi que les entreprises de commercialisation de radios de Walter Liechtenstein, sis au n° 106 de la « Währingerstraße » , et de Risa Mohr, sis au n° 20 de la « Meidlinger-Hauptstraße » ; celle de Walter Mandl, sis au n° 22 de la « Klosterneuburgerstraße » ; et la cordonnerie de Naftali Pluznik, sis au n° 8 de la « Kleine-Sperlgasse » .

Malgré ce sombre passé, le plus grand hall multi-fonctionnel de sport intérieur d'Autriche porte le nom de « Ferry-Dusika-Hallenstadion » .

En 1942, le célèbre chef d'orchestre autrichien Karl Böhm achète (« aryanise ») à un prix dérisoire la Villa Geßner située au n° 70 de la « Sternwartestraße » , dans le 18e district de Vienne. La maison fut saisie par les Nazis, en 1938, au moment de l' « Anschluß » . Elle appartenait alors au Juif Paul Regenstreif. De style « Jugendstil » , elle fut construite en 1907 « par et pour » l'architecte Hubert Geßner rattaché à la firme d'Otto Wagner. Ce dernier fut le principal architecte de « Vienne, la rouge » (« das rote Wien » ou « rotes Wien ») : surnom de la capitale autrichienne de 1918 à 1934, alors qu'elle est dirigée par une coalition de Sociaux-Démocrates et de Chrétiens-Sociaux influencés par l'Austro-marxisme.

Böhm déclare au moment de l'annexion de son pays à l'Allemagne nazie :

« Solange noch ein Jude in der Ostmark lebt, werde ich nicht zum Taktstock greifen. »

(Aussi longtemps qu'un Juif vit dans l' « Ostmark » , je ne prendrai pas mon bâton de chef d'orchestre.)

...

Le Festival de Salzbourg a annoncé la pose d'une plaque dans la salle Karl Böhm pour expliquer le rôle du chef d'orchestre pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

C'est un « passé qui ne passe pas » , régulièrement ressuscité par les institutions concernées et par les autorités publiques : les liens entre le monde musical et le régime nazi sont une nouvelle fois questionnés alors que le Festival de Salzbourg a décidé de faire poser une plaque dans la salle Karl Böhm explicitant le rôle du chef d'orchestre pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Selon le quotidien autrichien « Kurier », la future plaque, acceptée à l'unanimité par le conseil d'administration du Festival de Salzbourg, reflétera l'opinion selon laquelle Karl Böhm a « profité » du régime nazi et son ascension s'est trouvée « favorisée » par l'expulsion de ses collègues juifs et opposants au régime, sans pour autant qu'il n'adhère au parti ni qu'il ne fasse publiquement de remarque antisémite. La salle ne sera néanmoins pas rebaptisée, en raison des « qualités artistiques exceptionnelles » du chef d'orchestre, mais ladite plaque le décrira « tel qu'il était », à savoir « un grand artiste, mais ayant commis une erreur politique fatale » .

La place de Karl Böhm dans le paysage musical autrichien s'est trouvée interrogée par le « Kurier » en mars 2015, alors que le « Land » de Styrie attribuait le prix Karl Böhm d'interprétation au chef de l'Opéra de Graz, Dirk Kaftan. Le journaliste Thomas Trenkler rappelait alors que Karl Böhm devait sa nomination au « Semperoper » de Dresde (1934) à la démission de Fritz Busch (opposé au régime) et à l'intercession d'Adolf Hitler. Le dictateur influence également sa nomination à l'Opéra d'État de Vienne (1943) et fait figurer son nom sur la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste », liste des artistes jugés les plus importants du régime, établie en 1944, et parmi lesquels figurent également Richard Strauß, Carl Orff, Herbert von Karajan, ou encore Wilhelm Furtwängler (dont le nom fut rayé de la liste en raison des soupçons sur sa participation à l'attentat raté contre Adolf Hitler) . Après la Guerre et son procès en dénazification, Karl Böhm fut interdit de représentation pendant 2 ans. Il reprit son poste à Vienne en 1954.

Ce n'est pas la 1^{re} initiative de ce type en Autriche. En mars 2013, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne avait demandé à des historiens d'explorer son passé nazi. Cette enquête avait alors débouché sur des conclusions accablantes : outre une surreprésentation de membres du Parti nazi NSDAP, la prestigieuse phalange a découvert qu'elle fut dirigée, de 1954 à 1968, par Helmut Wobisch, ancien membre de la « Waffen-SS » et collaborateur de la « Gestapo » .

Parmi les établissements célèbres arianisés, Templ cite entre autres :

La Grande Roue de Vienne et le café au « Prater » qui étaient détenus par le Juif Eduard Steiner. En 1938, il est forcé de céder la grande roue, une des attractions majeures de Vienne, à un consortium, avant d'être déporté et assassiné à Auschwitz, en 1944. Le consortium était la propriété d'Alfons Wilfert (à 40 %) , de Johann Michna (à 20 %) , de Franz Öhlwein (à 20 %) et de Josef Örtel (à 20 %) .

La Grande Roue panoramique de Vienne est située dans le parc du « Prater » , une ancienne réserve de chasse Impériale qui a été rendue accessible au grand public par l'Empereur Joseph II, en 1766. Quand l'Empereur annonça de vouloir ouvrir les portes du « Prater » au peuple, les nobles de Vienne protestaient en disant qu'ils « voulaient se promener entre leurs pairs » .

Joseph leur répondit alors :

« Si je voulais me balader exclusivement entre mes pairs, je devrais faire mes promenades à la crypte Impériale ! »

Le « Prater » devint en peu de temps une zone de récréation populaire pour les habitants de Vienne, et le parc d'amusement « Wurstelprater » se développa en ce lieu qui existe toujours et dont la Grande Roue est la plus célèbre attraction.

La Grande Roue du « Prater » a été construite en 1897 pour célébrer le 50^e anniversaire du gouvernement de l'Empereur François-Joseph I, ses architectes étaient les ingénieurs anglais Walter Basset et Harry Hitchins. Basset restait propriétaire de la Grand Roue du « Prater » jusqu'à ce qu'il fût exproprié en 1916 à cause de sa nationalité britannique, mal vue à Vienne pendant la Première Guerre mondiale. La Grande Roue aurait alors dû être démontée, mais il n'y eut pas suffisamment de fonds pour couvrir les frais des travaux nécessaires à ce but. Ce n'est que pour cela que la Grande Roue de Vienne existe toujours ! Après la fin de la Guerre, l'homme d'affaires juif Eduard Steiner acheta aux enchères la Grande Roue de Vienne et il la opérait jusqu'à l'« aryanisation » de ses biens en 1938. Eduard Steiner fut meurtri au KZ Auschwitz en 1944, dans la même année la Grande Roue prit feu et s'écrasa. Entre 1945 et 1947, la Grande Roue a été reconstruite et équipée de la moitié de ses 30 wagons originaux.

Aujourd'hui, la Grande Roue panoramique de Vienne offre à ses visiteurs l'occasion de se réjouir à une hauteur d'environ 65 mètres d'un panorama magnifique de Vienne lors d'un tour panoramique sur la Grande Roue de Vienne. En outre, l'on peut louer les wagons de la Grande Roue pour fêtes, mariages et autres événements particuliers à Vienne, éventuellement en combinaison avec un service de restauration événementielle à bord de la Grande Roue de Vienne.

Les 2 hôtels de luxe, le Bristol et l'Imperial Hotel, détenus partiellement avant-guerre par le Juif Samuel Schallinger, déporté et assassiné en 1942 au camp de concentration de Theresienstadt, ont été « aryanisés » et non restitués aux héritiers.

Il en est de même du Café « Bräunerhof » , connu avant-guerre sous le nom de « Sans Souci » , ainsi que de nombreux autres cafés et restaurants comme le fameux « Zu Den Drei Husaren » .

Le bâtiment de la maison de couture Goldman & Salatsch sur la « Michælerplatz » , construit dans la vieille ville par l'architecte Adolf Loos, a été saisi en 1938 par la société Opel. Une photo du livre montre le bâtiment avec le nom Opel et un immense drapeau nazi à croix gammée entre les 4 piliers centraux.

La fameuse Majolica Haus, conçue par l'architecte Otto Wagner en pur style « Jugendstil » , appartenait avant-guerre au Juif Wilhem Frankl. Elle est saisie par les Nazis après que les autorités ont certifié que son propriétaire était fou.

Le « Neue Kronen-Zeitung », journal qui a soutenu le politicien d'extrême-droite Jörg Haider, était avant-guerre détenu partiellement par l'éditeur juif Leopold Lipschütz. Ses héritiers n'ont reçu qu'une très faible indemnisation.

Un tiers des emplacements du marché à l'air libre Nasch de Vienne ont été « aryanisés », ainsi que la moitié des pharmacies de la ville, 74 cinémas, la chaîne de boulangerie Anker, le tailleur sur mesure Knize et les boutiques de lingerie Palmers. La liste inclut aussi 70,000 appartements et des milliers d'œuvres d'art.

Bien que plusieurs gouvernements autrichiens, y compris l'actuel, se soient penchés sur le problème de la restitution des biens spoliés, de nombreux cas restent non résolus, car les biens ont changé de mains de nombreuses fois. Les survivants qui essaient de réclamer les biens de parents décédés sont souvent bloqués car ils ne sont pas les anciens propriétaires ou leurs parents proches, ou parce qu'ils n'ont pas assez d'argent pour engager un bon avocat ou pour rembourser le nouveau propriétaire.

Walter Pollak, le fils d'Arthur Pollak, co-propriétaire d'une usine d'allumettes, a été obligé d'abandonner des bureaux dans le centre de Vienne. Il décrit la dérisoire compensation qu'il a reçue :

« En 1946, Papa a reçu une compensation pour sa part d'un tiers dans l'affaire. C'était juste assez pour acheter une Buick de seconde main, la seule voiture qu'il ait jamais possédée. »

Hans Peter Manz, conseiller diplomatique à la chancellerie, a accueilli favorablement le livre. Il souligne les efforts du gouvernement pour fournir une compensation financière. Le gouvernement a mis de côté une somme d'environ 130 millions d'euros pour la restitution des biens, avec jusqu'à présent environ 18,000 demandes reçues.

« Ce n'est que de l'argent, c'est tard et ce n'est pas assez, et cela doit être distribué aussi vite que possible, car le nombre de demandeurs diminue rapidement, mais notre but est de donner à autant de gens que possible, y compris les héritiers, une vraie chance d'obtenir ce qui est à eux. »

Notre Vienne : Aryanisation de l'Autriche donne des précisions sur les lieux où sont détenus les archives et autres documents pouvant aider ceux qui désirent rechercher leurs biens familiaux. Comme résultat, les archives d'État ont été inondées par des demandes de recherche.

« Du monde entier, ils viennent ici ou écrivent ou téléphonent. », dit Hubert Steiner, l'archiviste chargé des documents concernant les biens « aryanisés » .

Les auteurs sont en train de préparer un livre qui couvrira le reste de l'Autriche et, entre autres, les confiscations des stations thermales et des stations de sport d'hiver détenues avant-guerre par des Juifs. Ce livre mentionnera aussi la propriété du populiste d'extrême-droite Jörg Haider, qui vivait sur un domaine de 1,600 hectares, qui appartenait à un couple juif et que sa famille a acquis légalement pour une bouchée de pain.

Le livre expose des secrets de longue date concernant la période nazie en Autriche, et a permis d'initier de très nombreuses demandes légales de restitution.

« Les Autrichiens se sont, pendant de nombreuses années, considérés comme les Ires victimes d'Adolf Hitler, qui a occupé son Autriche natale en mars 1938. Mais 2 historiens ont, à présent, montré dans quelle mesure les Autrichiens étaient les Iers profiteurs de la Guerre, agissant rapidement pour exproprier les biens des Juifs de Vienne. »

« Dans le pillage de leurs voisins juifs, les Viennois ont joué un rôle prépondérant pour le Reich de 1,000 ans. » , écrivent Tina Walzer et Stephan Templ dans leur nouveau livre acerbe concernant la soi-disant « aryanisation » des biens juifs à Vienne, où 200,000 Juifs vivaient autrefois.

La communauté juive a bien sûr été satisfaite de voir le livre publié. Néanmoins, Erika Jakobowitz, directrice générale du bureau du président de la communauté juive autrichienne, Ariel Muzicant, doute que le livre ai une réelle signification pratique :

« Je pense qu'il sera difficile de restituer ces biens à leurs propriétaires, car tous les dossiers afférents devront être présentés. Les propriétaires devront prouver qu'il n'y a pas eu d'accords antérieurs concernant ces biens, et que s'il y en a eu, ils étaient extrêmement injustes. Le principe en question ici est extrêmement important, mais entre celui-ci et gagner un procès, il y a un long chemin. »

Peter Moser, l'ambassadeur autrichien aux États-Unis a traité le livre de tintamarre congelé et isolé d'un autre âge !

Le co-auteur Templ est lui-même impliqué, en 2005, dans une affaire de restitution qui va se poursuivre pendant une décennie en procédures judiciaires.

En 2015, Templ est condamné à 1 an de prison pour avoir omis de mentionner le nom d'une tante éloignée dans une demande au nom de sa mère pour la restitution de biens spoliés en 1938 à ses parents juifs. La « BBC News » notent que les journalistes sont persuadés que la peine de prison est liée aux critiques faites par l'auteur concernant l'action du gouvernement en matière de restitution des biens juifs.

Le 21 septembre 2015, 75 historiens spécialistes de la Shoah, adressent une lettre à l'ambassadeur d'Autriche à Washington, protestant contre l'imminente incarcération de Templ et lui demandant d'intervenir auprès du président autrichien :

« En tant que chercheurs qui avons écrit ou enseigné la Shoah ou d'autres génocides, nous sommes profondément troublés par l'emprisonnement imminent d'un historien et journaliste juif autrichien qui a dénoncé les défaillances de l'Autriche concernant le retour des biens juifs saisis pendant la période nazie.

Le crime pour lequel Templ a été accusé et condamné à 1 an de prison, concerne l'omission du nom d'une parente éloignée dans sa demande pour la retour des biens saisis de sa famille. Cette affaire aurait pu être résolue par la famille Templ devant une cour civile. La décision du gouvernement autrichien d'intervenir en poursuivant et en mettant en prison Templ est perçue comme une réaction excessive extrême à l'important livre de Templ, “ Our Vienna : Aryanization Austrian-Style ”, qui critique la politique autrichienne concernant la restitution des biens juifs.

S'il-vous-plaît, veuillez transmettre au président Heinz Fischer notre demande urgente afin qu'il reconsidère son rejet de l'appel de monsieur Templ contre sa sentence de prison. »

Our Vienna : « Aryanisation » the Austrian Way

Unser Wien : « Arisierung » auf Österreichisch, Aufbau-Verlag, Berlin (2001) .

Author : Tina Walzer and Stephan Templ.

« Aryanisation » is the term used to refer to the expropriation of Jewish property on racial grounds in the Nazi era. After the « Anschluß » (the annexation of Austria by Nazi Germany) , in March 1938, also Jews in Austria were victims of the persecution policy pursued by the Nazis. At present, these events are again the subject of public discussions, especially in connection with spectacular cases of looted works of art. However, the looting organized by the State did not stop at objects of daily use in Jewish households in Vienna : cutlery from kitchen drawers or photographs on walls - nothing was safe.

« Seized for the benefit of the Austrian State. » - This note appears in the files on the « Aryanisation » of 8 Jewish households in Vienna whose furnishings were confiscated and stored in the State-owned Depot of Movable. These cases are the historical starting-point of the exhibition. In 1938, about 5,000 objects were painstakingly listed, about 600 of them were entered in the inventory from 1939 onwards and, thus, the State took possession of these objects. Pieces of furniture from among these objects were lent (in conformity with the basic function of the Depot of Movable) to State offices and other borrowers. Until recently, such pieces of furniture were used in government offices or Austrian embassies abroad, without the new users being aware of where these objects came from.

Only few pieces were restored to their owners after 1945. A few years ago, the Depot of Movable started to do research work on these objects. Since 1998, on the basis of the Austrian Federal Law on the Restitution of Works of Art, objects that are still available have been returned to the families of their former owners.

Unser Wien : « Arisierung » auf Österreichisch is a book co-authored by Stephan Templ and Tina Walzer that details how hundreds of Jewish businesses in Vienna were seized by the Nazis and never given back.

Published in 2001, the book catalogued for the 1st time the hundreds of prominent Jewish-owned properties seized by the Nazis that were never returned, and details the names of famous beneficiaries.

The 1st section of the book, written by Walzer, describes the various methods of looting employed by the Nazis and the fate of the Jewish victims, with references to specific cases and examples which provides historical and political context for the 2nd section of the book.

« The New York Times » notes that what distinguishes the book is not the history, which was broadly known, but rather the details in the 2nd half of the book, called « The Topography of Robbery » which lists businesses, addresses and former and current owners.

The 2nd half of the book, compiled by co-author Templ, acts as a guided tour of the extent of Jewish property confiscations in Vienna under Nazism and the stories attached to them. The book details properties seized by Jewish owners such as Samuel Schallinger who co-owned the Imperial and the Bristol hotels, which today are still among the city of Vienna's grandest hotels.

The book exposed long-held secrets about the Nazi era in Austria, and helped initiate numerous restitution legal claims. Co-author Templ himself became involved in a restitution case, in 2005, which evolved in to a decade of legal entanglement.

In 2015, Templ received a 1 year sentence as punishment for having omitted the name of an estranged aunt in an application on behalf of his mother for the return of property seized from his Jewish relatives in 1938. It has since emerged that he had declared the existence of the aunt. The BBC News notes that critics have suggested that the jailing may be linked to the author's criticism of the government's restitution record.

The book has sparked debate in Austria and is a useful resource for looted property research. It is divided into 2 sections.

In the 1st section, Tina Walzer describes the processes of confiscation and persecution in Vienna. She details the various methods of looting employed by the Nazis and the fate of the victims, with frequent reference to specific cases and examples. Walzer also turns her gaze on the post-War situation and is strongly critical of post-War attitudes and the restitution process in Austria. In the final chapter of this section, she focuses on confiscated Egon Schiele paintings in Austrian museums and collections, describing the seizure of the Grünbaum, Steiner, Heinrich Rieger, and Lea Jaray collections which all included works by the artist, and their return (or not) in post-War Austria.

Walzer's text provides the historical and political context for the 2nd section of the book, a « Topography of Looting » compiled by her co-author, the architectural historian Stephan Templ. To illustrate the scope and impact of Nazi confiscations, Templ organizes his documentation by professional categories, which range from pharmacies to theatre and dance. Within each profession, the entries are organized by district, and alphabetically by address within each district. Templ typically provides the name and address of a business or organisation, the former owner(s) , and the « aryaniser » , as well as listing the sources. There is a brief introductory text to each section (profession) and many entries include a couple of sentences of background information. The documentation works like a guided tour, exposing the extent of property confiscations in Vienna under Nazism by dint of its buildings and the stories attached to them. The format chosen lays open a wealth of archival sources and makes them « speak » .

In the appendix, the authors provide a useful guide to Viennese archival resources on looted property. The volume also includes an index of primary sources, a bibliography and a register of all names mentioned in the book.

Part of the book's appeal lies in its direct and clear language, so different from the cautious tone employed by museums, restitution commissions and other official bodies. Its accusatory stance has provoked debate, while the information it provides on archival sources has inspired further research.

Vienna skewered as a Nazi-Era Pillager of its Jews

The Austrians had a good run, for many years, as the « 1st victim » of Adolf Hitler, who occupied his native Austria in March 1938. But 2 historians have now documented the extent to which the Austrians were among the 1st War-profiteers, moving quickly to expropriate the property of Vienna's Jews.

« In the pillaging of their Jewish neighbours, the Viennese played a leading role for the entire 1,000 Year “ Reich ” » , write Tina Walzer and Stephan Templ in their acerbic new book about the so-called « Aryanization of Jewish property in Vienna » , where some 200,000 Jews once lived.

What distinguishes the book is less its history, which was broadly known, than its details : a long section, called « The Topography of Robbery » , lists businesses, addresses and former and current owners.

The book provides a bizarre walking guide to one of Europe's great cities. The Bristol and Imperial Hotels, 2 of Vienna's proudest, were partly-owned before the War by a Jew, Samuel Schallinger, who died in 1942 at the Theresienstadt camp near Prague. The « Café Bräunerhof » , known before 1938 as the « Sans Souci » , was among the many « cafés » that were « Aryanized » , as was the famous restaurant « Zu Den Drei Husaren » .

The Ferris wheel and « café » on the « Prater » were owned by a Jew, Eduard Steiner, who was murdered at Auschwitz.

The authors write :

« But the fun went on, Vienna was again a bit more Aryan. »

One of the finest buildings of the architect Adolf Loos, the Goldman and Salatsch building on the « Michælerplatz », was taken-over by the Opel company in 1938. A photo in the book shows the building with the Opel name, its 4 front pillars covered with Nazi flags.

The famous Majolica House, designed by Otto Wagner and on many tour agendas, was seized from a Jew named Wilhelm Frankl after the Nazis declared him mad.

Most of the cinemas and half of the pharmacies were Aryanized, and 136 of the tobacco-shops in Vienna. All Jewish doctors stopped working, their offices taken-over quickly. The « Neue Kronen-Zeitung », which now regularly supports the far-Right Austrian politician Jörg Haider, was partly owned in 1938 by the Jewish chief-editor, Leopold Lipschütz, whose heirs received little.

Mr. Haider, the governor of the State of Carinthia, lives there on 4,000 acres that once belonged to a Jewish family, Giorgio and Mathilde Roifer, purchased by Mr. Haider's great uncle for a small sum. That has long been known in Vienna, but Mr. Templ notes how common this is :

« He's a typical case ; he lives on stolen Jewish property. »

Mr. Haider says the property was legally acquired.

A well-known writer, Heimito von Doderer, and the conductor Karl Böhm both « Aryanized » their houses, according to the book.

Mr. Templ, aged 41, said :

« Our goal was to show how broad it was, and to name people, which is taboo here. »

He added :

« The Austrians were the 1st to systematically loot Jewish property in Vienna, before the government had even set the rules. The Austrians did in 6 months, from March to September 1938, what the Germans didn't do in 6 years. »

Ms. Walzer broke in :

« You see why we wrote the book. Otherwise we'd explode. »

They named their book « Unser Wien » (Our Vienna) after the city of Vienna's official tourist-information newsletter.

Mr. Templ said :

« Vienna lives on tourism. But the truth about our Vienna is that all the biggest attractions in Vienna were looted from the Jews. »

The book, published in Berlin last November, has already changed things, said Ms. Walzer, aged 33 :

« We wanted to alter people's views of themselves and their identity - to create a discussion, so everyone should ask their parents and grandparents : “ What happened ? What did you know then ? ” »

Ms. Walzer trained as an art-historian and came to the topic from her interest in the wide-spread theft, or forced sale at derisory prices, of art owned by Jews. Mr. Templ, a Prague-based journalist for the « Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung », trained as an architect, fascinated by the work of the early modernists like Mr. Loos.

Some 65,000 Austrian Jews were killed in Adolf Hitler's camps. Most of the rest sold cheaply and fled. Some 16,000 survive, most of them abroad. Today, many of Vienna's 13,000 Jews (8,000 of whom are officially registered) are recent arrivals from the former Soviet Union.

Restitution of property is a kind of answer, Ms. Walzer says, but it is complex :

« If your house was seized and “ Aryanized ”, the new owner had to pay a small amount to a frozen account in your name. After the War, if the Jewish owner or heirs survived, often no one knew of the money or it was gone. To get the property back, the owner or heir had to repay the new owner. »

Various Austrian governments have made belated but serious efforts at restitution to a generation that is dying away. Pressed by morality and law suits, the current government, a coalition of the conservative People's Party and Mr. Haider's Freedom Party, agreed to a further $ 360 million in compensation for Austrian victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs.

According to Hannah Lessing, the director of the National Fund for Victims of National-Socialism, $ 130 million committed by the previous Socialist-led government has already been paid-out. The government has also agreed to try to compensate for non-property losses, like the rights to businesses and rented apartments.

Elisabeth Gehrler, minister for education and culture, apparently stung by the scandal over 2 Egon Schiele paintings seized in New York in 1998 because of their dubious provenance, ordered all federally sponsored museums to review their holdings. In 1999, some 250 artworks and objects were returned to the Rothschild family.

The government will also provide land for the re-establishment of a famous Jewish sporting-club, « Hakoah », and provide more cash to maintain Jewish cemeteries.

Hans Winkler, a senior official of the Foreign Ministry who negotiated compensation agreements, said :

« What's new is a consensus of moral responsibility. There is a consensus that we shouldn't look at the issue as purely a question of legal responsibility. »

Part of the shock over the book comes from Austria's weak teaching of its own Nazi history. Since Austria elected Kurt Waldheim president, in 1986, despite disclosures that he had concealed his service in the German Army near sites of Nazi atrocities in the Balkans, the country has edged away from its perception of itself as victim. In 1991, Chancellor Franz Vranitzky officially acknowledged that Austrians were perpetrators of Nazi crimes, as well as victims.

The Education Ministry is now working with Yad Vashem, the Holocaust museum in Israel, on a program to show what Austria's Jews (from Sigmund Freud to Gustav Mahler ; Arnold Schönberg to Stefan Zweig) gave their country, how Vienna became a birthplace of modern anti-Semitism and how badly Austria's Jews were treated during the Nazi period.

Sigmund Freud's flat

The Freuds lived at No. 19 « Berggasse » Apartment 5 for 47 years. They were able to escape the country, as did Sigmund Kornmehl, who ran a kosher butcher shop in the house, and Emil Humburger, an exporter. The neighbours Adolf and Stephanie Mathias and Victor and Antoinette John perished in the camps.

After the « Anschluß » , Sigmund Freud's apartment was soon occupied by Hertha Pfeifer. In 1986, she recalled :

« My God, the apartment was vacant. We saw that the apartment was vacant. The apartment was completely empty. Completely empty. No one at all was there. That's how it was then. It was so easy. There was no problem at all. »

In 1986, Herta Pfeifer received 1.5 million Shillings (roughly, $ 100, 000 USD) for the rented apartment when she handed it over the society that installed the Sigmund Freud Museum, there. Sigmund Freud never received any compensation. For her handsome country house in Hochrotherd, outside Vienna, Anna, Freud's daughter, received 2,000 Schillings (about $ 135 USD) in a post-War settlement with the « Aryanizer » .

Sigmund Freud's sisters (Rosa Graf, Paula Winternitz, Marie Freud, Freud Adolfine) were deported during the War. None survived.

The Ferris Wheel

Another Vienna landmark, the Ferris wheel of the « Prater » was owned by Eduard Steiner (born on 1884 in Blatna, Bohemia ; murdered on 1944 in Auschwitz) . It was taken as loot (« Aryanized ») in 1938 by Alfons Wilfert (40 %) ; Johann Michna (20 %) ; Franz Öhlwein (20 %) ; and Josef Örtel (20 %) .

Steiner's heirs lived in Prague. To their restitution claim, they attached a valid, notarized translation of their Czech certificate of inheritance. Nevertheless, the Provincial Revenue Office demanded that his will should be probated again, this time on « home » turf, in Austria. Shortly afterwards, in late-February 1948, the Communists took power in Czechoslovakia, and the claimants were no longer able to leave the country and could, henceforth, pay their lawyer only in Czechoslovak crowns. It now became even harder, almost impossible, for them to pursue their claims.

In the course of the proceedings at the People's Court of Justice (in which 3 of the 4 « Aryanizers » were sentenced) 80 % of the shares in the Ferris wheel were forfeited to the Republic of Austria. The lawyer of the heirs, Doctor Karl Lamac, under the Second Act on Restitution, sued to have this 80 % handed over together with the land it was on and the profits earned from it. The Provincial Revenue Office defended itself, saying that although the Republic of Austria had an 80 % share in the Ferris wheel company (Riesenrad OHG) , it was not a co-owner of the Ferris wheel itself and, consequently, could not be sued for it to be handed over under the Second Act on Restitution. For 6 years, the heirs, living in Communist Prague, fought against the chicanery of the Republic of Austria. They would never see the profits from the Ferris wheel. The Provincial Revenue Office of Vienna commented on it quite unperturbed : the money was simply gone.

« The public administrator (State-appointed trustee) Karl Hauffe, Ingénieur, had registered a claim of 40,000 Schillings on the estate of the former public administrator Rudolf Dworaczek, since this money had been unjustly taken from the coffers of the Ferris wheel company (Prater Riesenrad OHG) . Mr. Hauffe, who managed the business on behalf of the State, from November 1950 to 15 June 1953, had also embezzled a sum of 25,000 Schillings and, in addition, unjustly withdrew a sum of about 50,000 Schillings, which is why he was being held in remand. »

Rudolf Leopold, collector of looted art

Property of Otto and Irene Klein at No. 16 « Cobenzlgasse » , Döbling, 19th district of Vienna. Looted in 1938 by Rudolf Leopold, Juliane Leopold, Karl Eckling, and Maria Eckling. The stolen house became the headquarters of the local Nazi Party organization (Ortsstelle Grinzing) . The Klein family, who owned the well-known Viennese tailor-shop Heinrich Grünbaum, at No. 26 « Graben » , escaped in 1939 to Australia.

The son of the « Aryanizer » Rudolf Leopold Senoir (1898-1980) , Rudolf Leopold Junior (1925-2010) , bought and sold looted art. In an Austrian daily newspaper, he was called a « collector of looted art » . His collection, comprising 5,265 items, primarily works of Viennese Modernism (by Egon Schiele, Gustav Klimt, Richard Gerstl, and many others), was bought by the Republic of Austria in 1994. Since 2001, the collection has been shown in the Leopold Museum.

Hotel Imperial

The Hotel Imperial at No. 16 « Kärntner-Ring » was built in the style of the Italian Renaissance, between 1862 and 1865, as a palais for Duke Philipp of Württemberg. It was adapted as a hotel for the 1873 Vienna World's Fair.

On 14 March 1938, Adolf Hitler rented Apartment No. 103.

On 21 March 1938, the names of the « Jewish » members of the Board (Leopold Langer, chairman ; Paul Abel, lawyer ; Samuel Schallinger, « Kommerzialrat » ; and Heinrich Löwinger, « Kommerzialrat ») were deleted from the commercial register. And the names of the new, « Aryan » board members (Friedrich von Schöller ; Ernst Hoffmann, lawyer ; Hermann Klimpfinger ; and Günther Rustler) were entered.

Samuel Schallinger (born in Brno, Moravia, in 1867) was deported in 1942, and did not survive internment in the Theresienstadt ghetto.

Adolf Schärf, President of Austria

The President of Austria from 1957 to 1965, and leader of the Socialist Party of Austria, Adolf Scharf (1890-1965) , « moved » with his family, in autumn 1938, into the home of his fugitive lawyer and colleague, Arnold Eisler, located at No. 1 « Skodagasse » , just months after Adolf Hitler marched into Vienna.

A marble plaque on the façade of the house reads :

« Adolf Schärf, an architect of the new democratic Austria, lived here from 1938 to 1965. »

Schärf « took-over » the firm of Doctor Eisler, though not his clients, for Schärf had a very different clientele (including the « SS Untersturmführer » Erich Loos) , in his efforts to « Aryanize » the house located at No. 19a « Schüttelstraße » , Vienna.

After the War, Schärf was, among other things, vehemently opposed to his former members returning to Austria, for instance former client Hugo Breitner, into the Socialist Party. Nor did Arnold Eisler return. Remaining in the United States, he was, true to his principles, Chairman of the Socialists of Austria. In 1957, Schärf ran for the office of President of Austria.

In order to get the votes of former Nazis, he used the rhyming slogan :

« Wer einmal schon für Adolf war, wählt Adolf auch in diesem Jahr ! »

(Who ever was once for Adolf will vote for him again this year !)

Normalia's Orthopedic Medical Aids

Normalia's Orthopedic Medical Aids (« Normalias Orthopädische Heilbehelfe ») was owned until 1938 by Ernst and Fanny Fürth. Profiteer : Karl Clemens Kristen.

Whenever he was on his 1,600-hectare « Aryanised » Estate, Jörg Haider, a 2 time Governor of Carinthia, pointed to the « Aryanization » case in the family of the, then, Chancellor Franz Vranitzky.

« The “ Aryanizer ” Karl Clemens Kristen was the father of Mrs. Christine Vranitzky, the wife of the former chancellor. She still has a share in the Normalia company, which was not returned to the heirs of the Fürth family under restitution legislation nor was any compensation offered. »

In 1938, the purchase price was set at 3,220 « Reichsmark » to be paid into an escrow account under the name of Ernst Israel Fürth. The price was equal to 1 month's net profits of Normalia.

Karl Böhm, conductor

The Salzburg Festival board has decided to affix a plaque to the « Karl Böhm Saal », specifying that the conductor, while musically gifted, was an enthusiastic Nazi who used the inhumanities of the Hitler regime to advance his career. The plaque will be engraved in German and English.

« He was a great artist but fatally flawed politically » , said Festival president Helga Rabl-Stadler.

There is nothing new in that statement. Böhm was an outright Nazi who in 1938 told the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra that anyone who did not vote for Hitler's « Anschluß » could not be considered a proper German.

In 1938, the ardent Nazi conductor Karl Böhm announced in Vienna :

« Solange noch ein Jude in der Ostmark lebt, werde ich nicht zum Taktstock greifen. »

« As long as a single Jew still lives in the “ Ostmark ” (annexed Austria) , I won't pick-up my conductor's baton. »

However, the decision to out Böhm as a virulent Nazi leaves Salzburg with a major headache. Will local hero Herbert von Karajan, who profited no less than Böhm, receive a plaque of his own ?

The Swiss pianist Edwin Fischer, a career opportunist, declared after Jewish musicians were banned from performing :

« Now that the Jews are no longer allowed to play, the golden era begins for us. »

NS-Vergangenheit : Erklärung im Karl-Böhm-Saal

Der Karl-Böhm-Saal im Salzburger Festspielhaus soll jetzt mit einer Tafel ausgestattet werden, die auf die Rolle des Dirigenten in der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus hinweist. Das Festspielkuratorium beschloß das laut « Kurier » .

Der entsprechende Antrag wurde laut der Tageszeitung vom Festspielkuratorium einstimmig angenommen. Karl Böhm (1894-1981) war im Gegensatz zu Herbert von Karajan kein NSDAP-Mitglied, er gilt aber als Profiteur des Dritten Reichs. Das Festspielkuratorium vertrat die Meinung, daß der Saal aufgrund der « außergewöhnlichen künstlerischen Verdienste » des Dirigenten nicht umbenannt werden solle.

Das Direktorium habe dem Festspielkuratorium jedoch vorgeschlagen, beim Eingang zum Saal eine Erläuterungstafel anzubringen - « analog zur Vorgehensweise der Stadt bei belasteten Straßennamen » , erklärte Festspielpräsidentin Helga Rabl-Stadler. Auf der Tafel werde auf eine Internetadresse verwiesen, « wo in Deutsch und Englisch die Persönlichkeit Karl Böhms dargestellt wird als das, was er war : Ein großer Künstler, aber politisch fatal Irrender » .

Eine Tafel soll jetzt auf die NS-Verstrickung des Dirigenten Karl Böhm (hier auf eine Aufnahme aus dem Jahr 1979) hinweisen.

In der Stellungnahme zur Entscheidung hieß es weiters :

« Böhm war ein Profiteur des Dritten Reichs und arrangierte sich für die Karriere mit dem System. Sein Aufstieg wurde durch die Vertreibung jüdischer und politisch missliebiger Kollegen begünstigt. »

Doch Böhm habe zumindest « keine antisemitischen Äußerungen getätigt » .

Als Opernchef wegen Nazi-Nähe entfernt

Im April 1945 wurde Böhm, damals Direktor der Wiener Staatsoper, von den Alliierten wegen zu großer Nähe zum Nazi-Regime von seinem Posten entfernt und bis 1947 mit einem Auftrittsverbot belegt. Nach Karl Böhm ist im Salzburger Stadtteil Parsch auch ein Gehweg benannt. Der Dirigent stand bei den Salzburger Festspielen insgesamt 338 Mal am Pult.

Erst kurz vor Weihnachten holte die NS-Vergangenheit eine andere bekannte Persönlichkeit der Nachkriegszeit ein : Die Universität Salzburg erkannte dem Naturforscher Konrad Lorenz wegen dessen NS-Verstrickungen den Ehrendokortitel ab - mehr dazu in Uni widerruft Ehrendoktorat für Konrad Lorenz.

The Villa Geßner, built in 1907, is located at No. 70 « Sternwartestraße » in the 18th District. It was owned until 1938 by Paul Regenstreif. In 1942, Karl and Thea Böhm « Aryanized » the house.

Hubert Geßner, who worked in the practice of Otto Wagner, was the main architect of the « Red Vienna » .

Hubert Geßner (geboren 20. Oktober 1871 in Walachisch Klobouk ; gestorben 24. April 1943 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Architekt.

Hubert Geßner arbeitete und lernte in den Jahren 1898 und 1899 im Büro von Otto Wagner. In den Jahren 1907 bis 1912 arbeitete er vor allem mit seinem Bruder Franz Geßner zusammen. Nach Ende des Ersten Weltkrieges wurde er bald einer der führenden Architekten für Wohnbauten in Wien. In dieser Zeit entstanden unter anderem der Karl-Seitz-Hof und der Reumannhof. Mit dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich im Jahre 1938 erhielt er jedoch Berufsverbot und verstarb noch während des Zweiten Weltkrieges.

Zu den berühmtesten Werken von Hubert Geßner gehört unter anderem das im Jugendstil in den Jahren 1901 bis 1902 errichtete Arbeiterheim Favoriten. Während dieser Tätigkeit freundete er sich mit Victor Adler an. Mitglied der Sozialdemokratischen Partei wurde er allerdings nicht.

Funktionen und Mitgliedschaften :

Ordentliches Mitglied der Architektenkammer (ab 1923) .

Vizepräsident der Zentralvereinigung der Architekten Österreichs.

Mitglied des Niederösterreichischen Gewerbevereins.

...

Hubert Geßner wurde 1871 in Wallachisch Klobouk, Mähren, als Sohn eines Schönfärbers geboren. Nach dem Besuch der Bürgerschule in seinem Heimatort trat er in die höhere Gewerbeschule in Brünn, Abteilung Baufach, ein. Die Brünnener Gewerbeschule war damals Anziehungspunkt für etliche Schüler, die später als äußerst renommierte Architekten Bedeutung erlangen sollten : Adolf Loos war Geßners Klassenkamerad, und Leopold Bauer sowie Josef Hoffmann besuchten zwei Jahre später diese Anstalt. Nach der Reifeprüfung im Jahr 1889 praktizierte Geßner in verschiedenen Baubüros, wie etwa bei Otto Zeman in Bistritz, später bei einem Baumeister in Troppau und schließlich als Bauleiter im Büro des Baumeisters Ernst Zuber.

Im Jahr 1894 trat Geßner in Wien in die Meisterschule von Otto Wagner an der Akademie der bildenden Künste ein, wo er mit Josef Plecnik und Jan Kotera wiederum zwei in weiterer Folge bedeutende Architekten als Studienkollegen hatte. Nach Abschluß des Studiums arbeitete Geßner ein Jahr in Wagners Atelier, und anschließend war er durch dessen Vermittlung im mährischen Landesbauamt in Brünn tätig. Geßners Hauptaufgabe in diesem Amt war die Errichtung der Landesnervenheilanstalt in Kremsier (1905) . Gleichzeitig beteiligte er sich erfolgreich an etlichen Wettbewerben und errichtete etwa das Sparkassengebäude in Czernowitz im Jahr 1902 sowie das Krankenkassengebäude in Brünn (1903-1904) .

Noch während seiner Tätigkeit in Brünn beteiligte sich Geßner im Jahr 1902 am Wettbewerb für das « Arbeiterheim Favoriten » Wien 10, für dessen Entwurf er den I.Preis und den Auftrag zur Ausführung erhielt. Dieses Gebäude markiert den Beginn der Freundschaft mit Viktor Adler, dem Führer der Sozialdemokratischen Arbeiterpartei (SDAP) , sowie den Beginn seiner Karriere gleichsam als « Hausarchitekt » dieser Partei, was ihm zahlreiche bedeutende Aufträge einbrachte, wie etwa die Errichtung von Arbeiterheimen, diversen Gebäuden für den Wiener Konsum-Verein, Wohnhäusern, Lagerhäusern und sogar Fabriksanlagen, wie etwa die « Hammerbrotwerke » , die « ein wichtiges Symbol für den Aufstieg und die Stärke der proletarischen Verbrauchergenossenschaften darstellten » . (www.dasrotewien.at)

Nachdem Geßner im Jahr 1904 sein erstes eigenes Atelier eröffnet hatte, nahm er seinen jüngeren Bruder Franz, der zu diesem Zeitpunkt noch bei Otto Wagner studierte, als Partner auf. Auf Grund der vielen und umfangreichen Aufträge stellte Geßner in der Folge auch weitere Mitarbeiter in seinem Büro ein, so daß zum Teil bis zu zehn Architekten bei ihm beschäftigt waren (und andere Hans Paar, Rudolf Perco, Alfons Hetmanek und Franz Kaym) .

Im Jahr 1912 endete aus « familiären Gründen » die Zusammenarbeit der beiden Brüder. Hubert Geßner war weiter als erfolgreicher Architekt tätig, wobei er sich in der Zwischenkriegszeit vor allem als Erbauer etlicher groß dimensionierter Wohnhausanlagen für die Gemeinde Wien (die so genannten « Superblocks ») einen Namen machte. Daneben entstanden weitere Fabriken sowie kleinere Wohnbauten, und selbst der Brückenbau zählte zu seinem Repertoire (Wien 2, Augartenbrücke über den Donaukanal, 1928-1931) .

Unter dem nationalsozialistischen Regime wurde Geßner zeitweilig mit Berufsverbot belegt. Hubert Geßner verstarb noch während des Zweiten Weltkriegs im 72.Lebensjahr an Herzschlag in Wien und wurde am Neustifter Friedhof beigesetzt.

Hubert Geßner war ein viel beschäftigter und äußerst universeller Architekt. Der Bogen seiner Bauausführungen spannte sich vom Villenbau über den « Superblock-Gemeindebau » , vom Arbeiterheim über die ausgedehnte Fabrikanlage, bis hin zum Sparkassengebäude, zur Irrenanstalt, zum Hotel sowie Kinosaal und zum Brückenbau. So unterschiedlich diese Bauaufgaben auch waren, erweist sich Geßner bei der Konzeption seiner Gebäude doch stets unverkennbar als Schüler Otto Wagners. Symmetrie, ausgewogene Proportionalität, klare Grundrissdispositionen sowie die Betonung der Konstruktion blieben Zeit seines Lebens die bestimmenden Kriterien seiner Entwurfspraxis.

Geßners frühe Bauten zeigen mit der Verwendung von secessionistischem Formenvokabular, glasierten Ziegeln sowie auskragenden Dächern (Villa Geßner, Wien 18, Sternwartestraße 70, 1907) auch bei der Außengestaltung noch den Einfluß seines Lehrers. Auch das Druckerei- und Verlagsgebäude « Vorwärts » , Wien 5, Rechte Wienzeile 97 (1909-1910) weist Geßner in der gesamten formalen Gestaltung als typischen « Jugendstilarchitekten » aus. Bei dem markanten, abgetreppten Giebel, der sich über die ganze Hausbreite erstreckt, zeigt sich indessen schon eine typische Intention in Geßners Gestaltungsweise, nämlich den Gebäuden vor allem im Dachbereich unverwechselbare Individualität zu verleihen.

Unerachtet der grundlegenden Kontinuität seiner Gestaltungsprinzipien griff Geßner bei der formalen Ausführung der Gebäude doch auch jeweils aktuelle Trends im Baugeschehen auf, und so finden sich etwa durchaus auch barockisierende Motive bei der im Jahr 1896 entstandenen Villa Bratmann in Wallachisch-Klobouk. In der Folge läßt Geßner auch klassizierende Tendenzen erkennen, wie etwa bei der Versicherungsanstalt der Österreichischen Eisenbahner, Wien 4, Linke Wienzeile 48-52 (1912) , die Geßner durch Lisenen, Halbsäulen und pilasterartige Bänderungen einer ausgeprägten Vertikalisierung unterwarf.

Mit geometrischem Dekor, das meist die gesamte Fassadenfläche überzieht und teils mittels Kacheln, teils mittels Terrakottaziegeln oder im rechten Winkel verlaufenden Putzlinien erzielt wird, entwickelte Geßner jedoch auch eine sehr persönliche gestalterische Handschrift (Bezirkskrankenkasse Floridsdorf, Wien 21, Holzmeistergasse 9, 1904-1905) .

Bei den Bauten der 30er Jahre ist auch bei Geßner sodann die allgemein üblich gewordene Versachlichung der Formensprache feststellbar. Ein beeindruckendes Beispiel dafür verkörpert die « Kammer für Arbeiter und Angestellte Steiermark » in Graz, Hans Resel-Gasse 6, Steiermark (1929-1930) . Die dekorlosen Fassaden sind durch markante Gesimsbänderungen deutlich horizontalisiert und an der Ecke durch eine dynamisch gekurvte Ecklösung charakterisiert. Das Haus Geßner-Slupetzky, Wien 18, Gersthoferstraße 147 / Scheibenberggasse 52 (1934) , in dem Geßner vor seinem Tod lebte, erhielt zwar eine unpräntiöse Fassade, zugleich aber durch einen markanten Rundturm an der Ecke doch wiederum individuelle Signifikanz.

Die bedeutendsten Arbeiten schuf Geßner zweifellos als Architekt der Sozialdemokratischen Arbeiterpartei. Vor dem Ersten Weltkrieg errichtete er im Auftrag dieser Partei diverse Genossenschaftsbauten, Arbeiterheime, Krankenkassen und Fabriksbauten, wobei der Schwerpunkt auf der Errichtung von Brotfabriken lag, die im Zuge der steigenden Verbraucherpreise mit kostengünstigen Grundnahrungsmitteln vor allem die Versorgung der Arbeiterschaft sicherstellen sollten. In den 20er Jahren lag Geßners Bedeutung vor allem im Volkswohnungsbau.

Geßner folgte auch bei den Fabriksbauten seinem grundsätzlichen Anspruch, Zweckmäßigkeit mit künstlerischer Gestaltung zu verbinden. Funktionale Anordnungen der Innenräume korrespondieren den jeweils individuell und unverwechselbar strukturierten Außenfassaden. Kennzeichnend für die Fabriksanlagen, die als Solitäre auf freiem Feld entstanden, ist eine Zusammenfügung von unterschiedlich dimensionierten und gestalteten Baublocks zu dynamisch-plastischen Objekten. Dieser Eindruck wird verstärkt durch eine Betonung der Dachlandschaften, sodaß die Gebäude auch aus der Fernsicht eine markante Unverkennbarkeit ausstrahlen. Die Akzentuierung der Silhouette erfolgte etwa durch überbetonte Schornsteine (Hammerbrotwerke Wien 21, Schwaigergasse 1918) oder durch Ausbildung von Türmen, die sich über flache Dächer erheben (Hammerbrot-Werke, Schwechat, Innerbergstraße 28, Niederösterreich, 1908-1909).

Die diversen öffentlichen Gebäude der Sozialdemokratischen Arbeiterpartei erhielten mittels Dekor auffallende Fassaden, sodaß sich diese Bauten deutlich von den umgebenden Miethäusern abheben. Beim (heute stark veränderten) Gebäude des Ersten Niederösterreichischen Arbeiter Konsum-Vereins, Wien 12, Wolfganggasse 58-60 (1908-1909) etwa war die Fassade zur Gänze mit quadratischem sowie noppenförmigem Terrakottadekor überzogen.

Nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg war Geßner vor allem als Erbauer von Wohnhausanlagen für die Gemeinde Wien aktiv. Als Wagner-Schüler mit der Bewältigung von monumentalen Prestigebauten und urbaner Gestik vertraut, zählt er neben Schmidt/Aichinger, Karl Ehn und Rudolf Perco zu den wichtigsten Gestaltern der so genannten « Superblocks » . Die monumentalen, bis zu achtgeschoßigen Wohnblocks sind stets um begrünte Höfe gruppiert (« Reumann-Hof » , Wien 5, Margaretengürtel 100-112, 1924. Ursprünglich hatte Geßner hier sogar einen 12 Stockwerke hohen Baublock geplant) . Fast immer variieren romantische Rundbogenloggien, Klinkerbänderungen oder farbiger Edelputz mit expressiven, dreieckförmig vorspringende Erkern, Loggien oder Balkonen und mildern damit die Wucht der Fassadenausdehnungen. Sozioökonomisch stellten die Superblocks quasi eine Stadt in der Stadt dar. Die Zugänge zu den Stiegenhäusern erfolgen (von den umlaufenden Straßen abgeschirmt) von den Höfen aus. Immer sind Geschäfte, Waschküchen, Kindergärten, Büchereien, Mutterberatungsstellen etc. vorgesehen.

Der « Karl Seitz-Hof » in Wien 21, Jedleseerstraße 66-94, den Geßner nach einem Wettbewerbssieg in den Jahren 1926-1932 erbaute, bildet mit 1169 Wohnungen eine der größten Anlagen. Paradigmatisch demonstriert hier die weit ausladende halbrunde Hauptfassade, die einen großen Platz umfasst, den expressiven Pathos der Gemeindebauarchitektur der 20er Jahre, und ein hoch über die Dächer aufragender Uhrturm erinnert an die signifikanten Aufbauten bei Geßners Fabriken der Vorkriegszeit. Im Hof hingegen bedient sich Geßner mit der Ausbildung von Rundtürmen und Rundbogenarkaden allerdings durchaus wiederum einer romantisierenden Gestik, um wohnliche Geborgenheit und gemeinschaftliche Idylle zu evozieren.

Hubert Geßner zählt zu den bedeutendsten Architekten, die aus der Wagner-Schule hervorgegangen sind. Seine Leistung besteht insbesondere darin, daß er als Architekt der Sozialdemokratischen Arbeiterpartei für « seine » Klientel, die Arbeiterklasse, neue architektonische Lösungen schuf. Indem er nicht nur funktionale, sondern auch repräsentative, ästhetisch ansprechende Industriebauten gestaltete, ästhetisierte er gleichsam auch die Tätigkeit der Menschen, die in diesen Gebäuden arbeiteten. Die selbstbewußte Gestik der Fabriksbauten setzte am Beginn des 20. Jahrhunderts aber auch einen wesentlichen Impuls für eine Neubewertung von Arbeitsstätten insgesamt.

Auch die sorgfältig geplanten Gebäude der Arbeiterwohnheime beziehungsweise Krankenkassen sowie die monumentalen « Wohnpaläste » der Gemeinde Wien lassen eine analoge Intention erkennen. Immer ging es darum, die Arbeits- und die Wohnbedingungen der Menschen gleichermaßen zu verbessern und gleichzeitig innerhalb dieses sozioökonomischen Zusammenhangs durch die Erzielung einer ostentativen Repräsentanz (Borsi-Godoli spricht von « bürgerlicher Eleganz ») das Lebensgefühl der Menschen zu heben. Allerdings stießen diese « Volkswohnungspaläste » in der zeitgenössischen Rezension teilweise auch auf Kritik, da kleinbürgerliche Ideale fortgeschrieben wurden, statt für das Proletariat neue und womöglich adäquatere Ausdrucksmittel gefunden zu haben. Insgesamt demonstrieren Geßners Bauten aber vielleicht gerade auf Grund ihres sozialen und ihres ästhetischen Anspruchs eindrucksvoll das machtvolle Selbstverständnis der dynamisch aufstrebenden « Arbeiterpartei » .

Franz « Ferry » Dusika

Ferry Dusika (1908-1984) was Austria's most successful cyclist in the 1930's. Already an « underground » Nazi, Dusika « Aryanized » in 1938 the bicycle business of Adolf Blum, located at No. 45 of the « Brünnerstraße » . Dusika also tried to « Aryanize » the companies of Walter Liechtenstern, located at No. 106 of the « Währingerstraße » , and the one of Risa Mohr, located at No. 20 of the « Meidlinger-Hauptstraße » (both selling radios) ; the company of Walter Mandl, located at No. 20 of the « Klosterneuburgerstraße » ; and the shoe-maker's shop of Naftali Pluznik, located at No. 8 of the « Kleine-Sperlgasse » .

Austria's biggest in-door arena (for track cycling, tennis, and athletics) is named after Ferry Dusika.

The fate of the art collection of the industrialist Rudolf Kraus

The writer Karl Kraus (born in 1872 in Jičín, Bohemia ; died in 1943 in Auschwitz) had several brothers, all of whom were successful industrialists, financial backers of Kraus's literary work, and clients of the architect Adolf Loos. A large part of the Kraus family died in Nazi concentration camps. After the War, the survivors sought restitution of a painting by Georg Ferdinand Waldmüller (1793-1865), an important Biedermeier painter. They ran-up against the open resistance of the Austrian financial offices. Not until they had bought their property back from the Austrian Republic at the current market price could they, again, take possession of it. The bureaucrats had acted properly and conscientiously - with maximum loyalty to the authorities. In the restitution case of Helene Schanz and Francis H. Kraus, it was found that :

« Under Article 276 of the Civil Code, a trusteeship would be established for the German " Reich " and Doctor Anton Z. to protect the interests of the absent party concerning the restitution of a painting assigned to the trustee who was to represent the absent party until he himself (the absent party) or someone with his power of attorney appeared again. »

In 1950, were these authorities really waiting for the restoration of the German « Reich » ? Rudolf Kraus owned the painting « The Geymüller Family in the Park ». He gave it to a certain Hermann Flürschein for safe-keeping, but Flürschein sold the picture in 1939 to the art-dealer August Eymer. Rudolf Kraus did not recognize the sale as legitimate. But that was of little use to Kraus. The painting was sold again. This time by Eymer to the « Galerie Halberstock » in Berlin and, from there, to the « Führer Museum », in Linz.

After the War, the painting was placed in the custody of the Austrian Republic. Absurdly, in the restitution proceedings people who were once persecuted had now to demonstrate that the German « Reich », the buyer for Adolf Hitler's Museum, had not been a bonafide purchaser. Since the Krauses could not deliver the demanded documents, the competent court refused restitution 3 years later. Only after another 7 years of fighting against this Austrian legal standpoint could the heirs take possession of the painting, but first, the Republic of Austria forced them to a settlement : within 3 weeks, they had to deposit 60,000 Schillings in an account called :

« The Forfeiture of Adolf Hitler's Assets ; the Restitution Case of Rudolf Kraus's Heirs, and the Settlement Amount. »

That was in 1960.

The Nazification of the rich cultural life of Vienna after the « Anschluß » initially had disastrous effects, particularly on the theatre, since the exclusion of Jews meant that audiences dropped by a 3rd. Plays involving Jewish playwrights were banned and Jewish actors and directors dismissed or harassed-out of office. The resultant financial difficulties meant that several theatres had to close down over the summer of 1938.

In May 1939, the tour of « degenerate art » reached Vienna, purporting to show people the debased nature of « Bolshevik and Jewish » artists. Although popular, it seems some visitors came to enjoy the works rather than condemn them. The painter Rudolf Hausner, for example, said : « We would sit there enraptured by what we saw until someone else walked by. Then, we would fire-off all the Nazi invective about degeneracy until the danger had passed. » (Weyr, 2005 ; page 136.)

But culture in Vienna, albeit reflecting Nazi values and aesthetics, was important in legitimating the regime. « Kraft durch Freude » (Strength through Joy) was a programme that promoted all kinds of activities, including subsidies to music, so that, by 1940, most audiences for concerts and Opera in Vienna were sold-out, with people queuing for tickets.

After the performance of Odilo Globocnik and Josef Bürckel as « Gauleiters » of Vienna were judged inadequate by the Nazi hierarchy in Germany, Baldur von Schirach was appointed to the position in August 1940, a position he was to hold until the end of the War. Von Schirach was judged by Hitler to have the necessary tact and cultural know-how to win the hearts and minds of the Viennese while, at the same time, being a reliable servant in such matters as the deportation of remaining Jews to concentration and death camps (for which crime he received a sentence of 20 years at the Nuremberg trials) .

Von Schirach presided over a cultural programme that was somewhat more Liberal than in the rest of the « Reich » , and he got into conflict with Josef Gœbbels as a result. He appointed the relatively young, somewhat anti-Nazi Walther Thomas, to run the arts scene for him. Thomas was eventually ousted after relentless pressure from Gœbbels against him, but for 2 years, protected by von Schirach, pursued a cultural policy in Vienna that was significantly at variance with that in the rest of the « Reich » . He also attempted to save and protect individual Jews threatened with deportation.

In art, a degree of non-realism was acceptable, deviating from strict Nazi aesthetics. Some Theatre and Opera performances contained themes of oppression by one people of another, which made Nazi bosses in Berlin fret. A Mozart Festival was deemed by Gœbbels to represent an unwelcome opportunity for Austrian nationalists to demonstrate opposition to the German regime (something that already happened too much at football matches, working-class Viennese being harder to control than the middle-classes) and Gœbbels banned the broadcasting of the performances.

But, by 1943, with Thomas dismissed and von Schirach, though still in charge, out of favour, cultural life went downhill. Nazi historical pageants and Richard Strauß Operas became standard fare. Shakespeare's « Merchant of Venice » was staged, emphasising its anti-Semitic elements. People went to see films if they could, however bad or propagandising they were.

In the later months of 1944, theatres and concert-halls were closed by order of Gœbbels, to free people for War work. The Vienna Symphony Orchestra was disbanded in October. Musicians of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra were sent round armament factories to play musical interludes to encourage the workers. The Vienna Boys Choir performed at Christmas and, in January 1945, there were a few Classical music concerts. After that, the cultural life of the city ceased until the Russians (who, like the Nazis, attached enormous importance to cultural activities for their propaganda value) sought to revive it by sponsoring performances in surviving theatre and music venues.

The Austrian Copyright Society and black-listing during the Nazi Era

(Carla Shapreau)

After the March 13, 1938, « Anschluß », Jewish members of Austria's Society of authors, composers, and music-publishers (« Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger »), known as the « AKM », were black-listed. The nature, scope, and ramifications of the AKM's 1938-1945 history are the subject of new research in Austria, with the publication of a study expected soon. (1) This study follows on the heels of the 1st public exhibition of a recently discovered AKM black-list in the Vienna City Library in 2012. (2) Name by name, this diminutive, yet, chilling red-lined Nazi-era artifact was a prelude to evolving persecution in Austria for those in the musical world.

Catalogued as « A91314 », the 1937 AKM membership directory was annotated with bold red-lines neatly hand-drawn through the names of Jewish AKM members, along with what appears to be a hand-written date in red of February 10, 1939, on the title-page. It is not known who prepared this Nazi-era black-list or how it ended-up on the library's shelves. Nor is it generally known whether similar lists of expelled AKM members from successive years up until 1945 are today in the AKM's archive. Austrian scholar, Doctor Christoph Lind, found the red-lined directory in 2010 among the printed works in the Vienna City Library while he and Doctor Georg Traska were conducting research for their 2012 biography of pianist, composer, and cabaret performer, Hermann Leopoldi, who survived internment in Dachau and Buchenwald. (4)

Founded in 1897, the AKM is a performing rights Society engaged in the business of granting licenses and collecting copyright royalties for the public performance of the musical works of its members, and distributing such royalties. After Austria's incorporation into the « Reich », its cultural institutions rapidly implemented anti-Semitic policies. In 1938, the AKM was placed under the control of the German performing rights Society, STAGMA (« Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung Musikalischer Urheberrechte »). (5) During the Nazi era, STAGMA generally banned Jews from membership and was administered by the « Reich » Culture Chamber (« Reichskulturkammer »), and its « Reich » Music Chamber (« Reichsmusikkammer »), all under the direction of Josef Goebbels and the Ministry of Propaganda. (6)

« On 17 March 1938, just 4 days after annexation, AKM's council had been dismissed, a Commissar Chairman appointed, and a questionnaire sent to all members asking, among other matters, racial and religious questions. » (7) Béla Bartók, a member of the AKM, wrote from Budapest on April 13, 1938, regarding the changed conditions in Austria :

« As regards my own affairs, I must say that things are not very good at the moment because not only has my publishing house (Universal-Edition) gone Nazi (the proprietors and directors were simply turned out) but also the AKM, the Viennese Society for performing rights, to which I belong (and Kodály, too), is also being " nazified ". Only the day before yesterday, I received the notorious questionnaire about grandfathers, etc. , then :“ Are you of German blood, of kindred race, or non-Aryan ? ” Naturally, neither I nor Kodály will fill in the form : our opinion is that such questions are wrong and illegal. We must insist on having nothing to do with this unlawful questionnaire, which therefore must remain unanswered ... » (8)

Universal-Edition was one of many music-publishers Aryanized or, otherwise, misappropriated during the Nazi era. (9)

« After the “ Anschluß ”, a State Commissar was appointed by the German Ministry of Propaganda for Universal-Edition and Mrs. (Jella) Hertzka (a member of the EU Board of Trustees) was compelled to sell her shares to him. » (10)

A hand-written note inside the AKM directory found in the Vienna City Library explains that some members had not yet been crossed-off the list because they had not submitted their completed questionnaires. The missing information was reportedly later provided by Heinrich Damisch and Helmut Wobisch, who identified Jewish AKM members. (11) Heinrich Damisch, music-critic, writer, and former director of the « Wiener Mozartgemeinde » , despite his authorship of the 1938 anti-Semitic article « Die Verjudung des österreichischen Musiklebens » and other efforts, was honoured post-War in Austria. (12) Helmut Wobisch, an ardent Nazi Party member, was a trumpeter with the Vienna Philharmonic during and, after the Nazi era, as well as managing director of the Vienna Philharmonic, from 1953 to 1969. (13)

According to one estimate, those persecuted by the AKM constituted approximately 42 % of the membership. (14) Throughout the « Reich » , musicians were similarly the subject of black-listing in the « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » , edited by Nazi musicologist and head of the Nazi « Sonderstab Musik » (a plundering task-force) , Doctor Herbert Gerigk and his co-editor Doctor Theo Stengel. (15)

The 1935 Nuremberg racial laws were adopted in Austria on May 20, 1938. Performances of compositions by Jewish composers and authors were generally banned under the « Reich » .

Until 1942, catalogues that featured Jewish composers, along with printed scores by Jewish composers, were either consigned to be pulped, or marked as unavailable for sale or performance. Sales of scores by Jewish composers from antiquarian shops were to be restricted to music historians, and clearly marked with the letter « J » along with a visible explanation as to its meaning. However, most publishers had taken the precaution of producing multiple copies, so that when some 30,000 printed scores and books were confiscated from Universal-Edition, almost everything could be recovered later. (16)

Copyright royalties due to persecuted AKM members or their heirs would primarily have resulted from performances outside Axis and occupied nations. Copyright royalties due to black-listed AKM members and collected by the AKM inured to the benefit of the « Reich » under the 11th Decree to the « Reich » Citizenship Law, passed on November 25, 1941. This legislation provided the « Reich » with legal authority to seize the assets of persecutees living outside the « Reich » 's borders, including those who had been deported or gone into exile.

Post-war claim files in the United States National Archive provide evidence reflecting alleged AKM copyright losses, amid claims for a vast range of confiscated property. This was the case with Viennese librettist and playwright Alfred Grünwald, who stated :

« When Hitler marched into Vienna, I was taken into “ security-custody ” - which means imprisoned and released only under the condition that I leave Austria in 4 weeks ! »

Among his many losses, Grünwald said of the « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger » :

« I was member of the directorium of the AKM (Österreichische Autoren-gesellschaft, Wien III. Baumann-gasse Nr. 8) and, in this capacity, co-owner of the whole assets of this great Society and entitled to a lifelong pension. One day before my arrest, they forced me to renounce my membership and to declare my disinterest in the AKM. » (17)

Grünwald fled from Vienna to Paris where he « had to escape in the middle of the night » , his residence plundered, then, to Morocco and eventually to the United States. After « a life long full of work and thriftiness » , Grünwald reported on November 23, 1945, all his property had been stolen, confiscated, or forcibly sold.

Song-writer and playwright Hans Jan Lengsfelder similarly wrote to the U.S. War Department Headquarters in Vienna, on June 7, 1946, making a claim against the « Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger (AKM) , Vienna III, Baumannstraße Nr. 8, for royalties collected for public performances of my works plus claims against the pension fund and a share in the assets of the Society » . Lengsfelder also sought from « Austromechana royalties collected for records of my works » . (18)

Music-publisher Franz Sobotka, who owned several music publishing houses in Vienna, which he identified as « Edition Bristol » , « Europaton Verlag » , and « Sirius Verlag » , fled Austria in mid-May 1938 with his wife, immigrating to New York, after he learned he was at risk of imminent arrest by the « Gestapo » . He reported to the U.S. Military Government, Headquarters in Vienna, « my entire fortune was confiscated » , claiming that his music-publishing houses and proceeds due to him from the AKM had been misappropriated. (19)

In an effort to recover lost AKM copyright royalties, on June 9, 1941, Franz Sobotka filed suit in New York for royalties collected by the American Society of Composers Authors & Publishers (ASCAP) for the AKM, resulting from U.S. performances. Sobotka alleged that, under a contract between the AKM and ASCAP, which ran from January 1, 1933, to December 31, 1938, $ 62,809.85 had accrued to AKM's account. The AKM had granted to ASCAP the exclusive right to license in the United States the public performance rights in certain musical works.

Sobotka's claim was complicated by the fact that the AKM had allegedly been liquidated during the Nazi era, that AKM royalties in the United States had been tied-up as « blocked assets » and characterized as « alien property » under U.S. law in light of a War-time order freezing such assets under the Trading With the Enemy Act. (20) Although the outcome of Sobotka's claim against the AKM is unclear, his lawsuit and the post-War claims of other persecuted AKM members raise a host of unanswered questions, including whether, and to what extent, uncompensated royalties accrued to persecuted composers, authors, and music-publishers on U.S. soil, and elsewhere, during the Nazi era.

The AKM was re-established in Austria as a new institution after World War II. The content of the AKM archive is not generally known. The study of the AKM's 1938-1945 history, and its aftermath, currently under preparation by musicologist Hartmut Krones and commissioned by the AKM in 2013, (21) will be a welcome addition to the evolving literature regarding music suppressed during the 3rd « Reich » and the many lives of those tethered to it.

Carla Shapreau teaches art and cultural property law at the University of California, Berkeley, School of Law, and is a Research Associate in the Institute of European Studies at U.C. Berkeley, where she is conducting research regarding music-related losses during the Nazi era and their 21st Century ramifications. Doctor Shapreau is co-author of Violin Fraud - Deception, Forgery, Theft and Lawsuits in England and America, Oxford University Press, and has written and lectured broadly on the topic of cultural property. She is also a violin-maker.

Les maisons d'édition viennoises menacées par les Nazis

The Music Business

The « Aryanisation » of music-publishers was a slow process. Nevertheless, the voluntary organisation of publishers and music-sellers (« Deutsche Musikalien Verleger Verein » , or DMVV) was incorporated into the « Reichsmusikkammer » (RMK) , in January 1934. Before that, as early as April 1933, the « Deutsche Musikalien Verleger Verein » had declared itself supportive of the new government, and although it initially did not explicitly ban Jews, Viktor Albertis, Wilhelm Zimmermann, Henri Hinrichsen, Gustav Bock and Kurt Eulenburg found themselves removed from the executive committee of the « Deutsche Musikalien Verleger Verein » and replaced with supporters of the new regime. Once incorporated into the « Reichsmusikkammer » , membership of the « Deutsche Musikalien Verleger Verein » became compulsory for all music-dealers and publishers. Between 1933 and 1938, about 40 publishers were run by Jewish owners or employed Jews in key executive positions. This amounted to a mere 10 % of music-publishers, but had a severe impact on publishers of serious music. Peters, Benjamin, Bote & Bock, Eulenburg, Fürstner and Alrobi were the leading German publishers most severely affected, and with the annexation of Austria, a further 24 publishers were added including such prestigious houses as Universal-Edition, Ludwig Döblinger and Josef Weinberger. Though there were no direct anti-Semitic attacks aimed specifically against Jews in the various trade magazines that served music-publishers, there were clear instructions coming from above that Aryanisation should proceed apace and that, under no circumstances, should German publishers collaborate with non-Aryan publishers newly-relocated abroad.

Hermann Göring, who had been granted dictatorial powers in the implementation of a draconian « 4 Year Plan » , started large-scale expropriation of Jewish businesses in 1936. Such powers allowed him to justify this as an « economic necessity » and the removal of the last legal obstacles before the total economic disenfranchisement of all German Jews. Following the Austrian annexation, publishing houses such as Josef Weinberger - Gustav Mahler's 1st publisher, and the publisher of many important Operetta composers, managed ...

... them confrontationally anti-Semitic. By the time of the officially unleashed overnight pogroms of 9-10 November 1938 (« Reichskristallnacht » or « Kristallnacht ») , and the stipulation the following month forbidding non-Aryans from attending any public events, Jews found themselves effectively removed from every means of social, economic or cultural interaction in what had formerly been their native country.

The concert-agency Wolff & Sachs in Berlin, formerly the representative for nearly all major performers in Germany and providing day-to-day management for the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, since its foundation in 1882, was dissolved in 1935. In Vienna, the publisher Hugo Knepler (brother of the librettist Paul Knepler, who had written texts for Leo Fall and Robert Stolz as well as for Franz Lehár's « Giuditta ») took-over Vienna's Emil Gutmann concert-agency in 1907 and became the city's most powerful concert promoter, mounting over 2,000 events and managing such important artists as Maria Jeritza, Arthur Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Jascha Heifetz, Bronisław Huberman, Artur Schnabel and many others until the company crashed in 1931. After Austria's annexation, Knepler fled to France but was captured and deported by the French Vichy Regime and murdered in Auschwitz, in 1944. Smaller Jewish agencies in Germany and Austria were broken-up, dissolved, subsumed or Aryanised under the « Reichsmusikkammer » .

The purging of musical life of all elements not deemed Aryan was fraught with complexities. As late as 1936 and 1937, Berlin Radio had compiled a black-list of artists who were to be banned from engagement or performance. This included musicians who were not remotely Jewish such as the Austrian composers Julius Bittner and Wilhelm Kienzl, while the Jewish Erich Wolfgang Korngold is conspicuous by his absence. Against such blatant and obvious inconsistencies, the idiosyncratic infringements of other musical « Gauleiters » , such as those who banned the non-Jewish Manfred Gurlitt while allowing the premiere of « Concertante Musik » by the partially Jewish Boris Blacher by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Carl Schuricht, in 1937, come across as arbitrary at best, or incompetent at worst.

An acute problem was caused by one of the mainstays of German literature, the Jewish writer Heinrich Heine, who died in 1856. Hardly any other poet had been set so enthusiastically by so many of the great German composers of the 19th Century. Karl Blessinger in « Judentum und Musik » (one of the most astounding anti-Semitic tracts of the Nazi era) makes the paranoid observation that Jews had camouflaged themselves through a clever use of language to conceal their ambitions for world domination. He even goes so far as to suggest that Robert Schumann was able to stop Jewish subterfuges by setting a sufficient number of Heine texts to nip Jewish plots ...

... tacit admission of the utter futility of such an undertaking - the name of Heinrich Heine is absent. This is a silent acknowledgment that the authorities could not expect singers to forgo such classics as Franz Schubert's « Die Lorelei » or Robert Schumann's « Dichterliebe » and « Liederkreis » - and even Richard Wagner's « Flying Dutchman » was based on a Heine source. In recital programmes featuring Heine settings by the likes of Brahms, Schumann, Schubert and Liszt, the solution chosen by most was not to mention the poet's name at all or, more iniquitously, to use alternative « Aryanised » texts provided by the « Reichsmusikbearbeitungen » . Failing this, they simply inserted someone else's name. Heine, more than anyone, proved the futility of trying to disentangle German and Jewish culture, though tragically, this did not stop the Nazis from continuing to try.

Emil Hertzka

The Musical Chronicle of Change : « Anbruch »

With the end of the War, in 1918, it was clear that society had changed. As early as 1905, the playwright and essayist Hans Müller was referring to « morbus Austriacus ». By 1919, this had turned into a self-fulfilled prophecy. Universal-Edition, publishers of such major figures as Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Franz Schreker, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Egon Wellesz, Joseph Matthias Hauer, Béla Bartók and Zoltán Kodály, along with Alfredo Casella, Leoš Janáček, Karol Szymanowski, Kurt Weill, Hanns Eisler, Ernst Křenek, Darius Milhaud and Gian Francesco Malipiero, decided to launch a magazine devoted to new music symbolically entitled « Musikblätter des Anbruch » (Music Leaves from a New Dawn) .

The « Jewishness » of Universal-Edition was described by Ernst Křenek :

« “ Fraulein ” Rothe (assistant to Director Emil Hertzka) was the only highly-placed employee of Universal-Edition who was not Jewish. Immediately under Director Hertzka was Doctor Kalmus, a relative of Hertzka's, if I'm not mistaken, and a good-natured oaf with lovely Old-Testament features. Peter Winter was the principal head of accounts, a fine, good-hearted person who was a genius in financial matters. Among the many projects that Universal-Edition supported was the monthly musical publication “ Musikblätter des Anbruch ”, an admittedly lame title that only made it clear that it was an artistic movement that wished to be called “ Anbruch ” (Dawn - a typically Expressionist term for “ beginning ”) , which was edited originally by Otto Schneider, a smooth roguish character who in all likelihood personified the revolutionary prototype of the coming age. I didn't much care for him. »

Theodor Adorno, Paul Pisk, Rudolf Réti and Paul Stefan were just some of the prominent Jewish musicians and thinkers who would join its editorial staff. The magazine's 1st issue, in January 1919, starts with an introduction by Guido Adler, followed by articles on a variety of subjects by Béla Bartók, Frederick Delius, Oskar Fried, Hugo Kauder, Rudolf Hoffmann (one of the founding members of the « Vereinigung schaffender Tonkünstler ») , Egon Lustgarten, Egon Wellesz, Rudolf Réti and Franz Schreker. As with the « Neue Freie Presse » , this was a publication that was dominated by assimilated, secular Jews and it quickly became one of the most influential musical chronicles of the period. It lasted for 19 years and 165 issues. Even more than its rival « Melos » , published by Schott, « Anbruch » (its title from 1929) would not so much reflect Jewish assimilation as Jewish dominance in matters of new music. Seen in the context of a 70 year progression starting from Richard Wagner's anti-Semitic pamphleteering of 1850, « Anbruch » appeared to represent the pinnacle of Jewish musical assimilation. The National-Socialists, unsurprisingly, would see things differently and Universal-Edition, along with « Anbruch » , would become Exhibit A in their propaganda campaign against the Jewish infiltration of German culture.

The influential and pioneering music-publisher Emil Hertzka was born on 3 August 1869 in Pest, Austria-Hungary ; and died on 9 May 1932 in Vienna. He was responsible for printing and promoting some of the most important European musical works of the 20th Century.

Hertzka studied chemistry and music at the University of Vienna. In 1901, he joined the Vienna-based music-publishing house Universal-Edition, which had only just been founded. In 1907, he became its Director and remained in that position until his death. It was due to Hertzka's efforts that Universal-Edition came increasingly to concentrate upon the publication of new music, and his voluminous correspondence with many of Europe's leading composers is a valuable resource for modern scholars. By the time of his death in Vienna, in 1932, Universal-Edition's catalogue comprised almost 10,000 items, including works by Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schœnberg, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Franz Schreker, Alfredo Casella, Leoš Janáček, Karol Szymanowski, Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály, Kurt Weill, Hanns Eisler, Ernst Křenek, Darius Milhaud, and Gian Francesco Malipiero.

Between 1932 and 1938, the Emil Hertzka Foundation offered an annual Composition Prize. This was 1st awarded in 1933, when it was shared between 5 composers, namely Roberto Gerhard, Norbert von Hannenheim, Julius Schloß, Ludwig Zenk and Leopold Spinner. The prize went to Joseph Matthias Hauer in 1934 ; to Viktor Ullmann in 1936 ; to Hans Erich Apostel in 1937 ; and to Karl Amadeus Hartmann in 1938. In 1934, Luigi Dallapiccola and Paul Dessau each received a « Special Acknowledgement » .

Hertzka and Universal-Edition

As Director of Universal-Edition from 1907 to 1932, Viennese music-publisher Emil Hertzka fashioned the company into one of the leading music publishing-houses of the 20th Century, his fame resting primarily on his advocacy of the more progressive composers at the turn of the 20th Century, and especially of the members of the Second Viennese School (Arnold Schœnberg, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern) , Kurt Weill, Béla Bartók, and Leoš Janáček.

Born in Budapest, Emil Hertzka studied chemistry, and also music and literature, at the University of Vienna. In 1893, he joined the music-publishing firm of Weinberger (some sources say that he 1st joined the publisher and concert agency Gustav Léwy, which sold out to Weinberger in 1897) , the proprietor of which, Josef Weinberger, was one of the founding subscribers of Universal-Edition, Vienna. Universal-Edition was formed in 1901 through the collaboration of 3 existing publishers, Josef Weinberger, Adolf Robitschek, and Bernhard Herzmannsky (of Ludwig Döblinger) , with the aim of creating Austrian editions of Classical composers, and providing educational materials for schools. After 6 years, the company was on the brink of failing when, in 1907, Hertzka was brought in to rescue it. While maintaining the 2 original lines, he moved contemporary music to the center of its enterprise. By sound judgement, a keen sense of publishing politics, and skillful negotiation, he identified many of the leading progressive and avant-garde composers. By entering into agreements with other companies (e.g. , Josef Eberle, Josef Aibl, Adolph Fürstner, Bote & Bock, Nikolaus Simrock) in the 1st few years, offering contracts to progressive composers (e.g. , Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schœnberg, Franz Schreker, Josef Bohuslav Fœrster) , with many of whom he forged strong personal bonds, and adopting aggressive advertising strategies, Hertzka brought to Universal-Edition the profile that it has had ever since as the leading publisher of contemporary music.

Later, Emil Hertzka launched in-house journals : « Musikpädagogische Zeitschrift » (1911) ; « Musica divina » (1913) ; « Musikblätter des Anbruch » (1919) ; « Pult und Taktstock » (1924) ; and « Schrifftanz » (1927) . They offered publicity and forums for discussion of Universal-Edition's catalog, and by acquiring the publishers Albert J. Gutmann in 1920 and « Philharmonischer Verlag » in 1927, he extended Universal-Edition's range significantly. As a result of all these developments, Universal-Edition became a principal publisher of the music of Max Reger, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, Anton Bruckner, Karol Szymanowski, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Franz Schreker, Josef Marx, Leopold Godowsky, Frederick Delius, Darius Milhaud, Ottorino Respighi, Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill and other late- 19th and early- 20th Century composers, in addition to almost all of the leading « modern » composers (with the notable exceptions of Igor Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith) .

Ernst Roth, who worked with him at Universal-Edition for 7 years, has the following description of the man : Emil Hertzka was a strange man, a mixture of commercial astuteness and rash idealism. His appearance seemed to contradict his actions : he looked as old-fashioned as any « fin-de-siècle » artist, with his long hair, long beard, brown velvet jacket and large black tie - a majestic figure, half Wotan and half Brahms, who contrasted strangely with the revolutionary music ; his thin, sharp voice seemed not to belong to his imposing figure. He was not a kindly or genial man but displayed a biting and often cynical sarcasm. He did what no other music-publisher at that time dared to do, and considerable sums of money were spent not only on engraving, printing, paper, binding and publicity but also on supporting financially the struggling prophets of the new art. All this was done without charm, grace or warmheartedness, without any evident generosity - and yet it was still a unique undertaking.

Heinrich Schenker was recruited as an editor in 1901 to Universal-Edition, with whom he published his edition of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach keyboard pieces and « Beitrag zur Ornamentik » (1903) . His 1st publication under Hertzka was the « Instrumentations-Tabelle » (pseudonymous author : Artur Niloff) (1908) , followed by his edition of Johann Sebastian Bach's Chromatic Fantasy & Fugue (1910) . Hertzka's arrival in 1907 rapidly created an environment wholly inimical to Schenker, and it was inevitable that the 2 men would come into conflict. Schenker goaded Hertzka with such remarks as that Universal-Edition was a publisher « that places its main emphasis these days on anti-musical music » (WSLB 52, 7 February 1910) . Hertzka's driven management style and use of modern publishing techniques (of which the typewriter was a symbol) irked Schenker, and it was perhaps the advertising of Arnold Schœnberg's 2nd String Quartet and « Klavierstücke » , Opus 11, in the 1910 catalog that marked the 1st decisive moment at which Schenker turned against the Director. Hertzka clearly valued Schenker's work, and was unfailingly courteous in his dealings with him ; nevertheless, Schenker showed increasing acrimony toward him throughout the 1910's, alternating with brief reconciliations during which Schenker articulated his vision for Universal-Edition as the leading music-publisher in Europe. At the same time, Schenker always insisted on corresponding only with Hertzka rather than with other officials of Universal-Edition.

Hertzka's slowness to take-up Schenker's planned « Kleine Bibliothek » (1st mooted in 1912) brought the 2 men to another crisis point in 1914 (diary, OJ 2/9-10, pages 821-823, 24 December 1914) . When the project eventually came to publication in 1921-1924 as « Der Tonwille » , Hertzka used Albert J. Gutmann as a shield for Universal-Edition, employing the fictional imprint « Tonwille-Flugblätterverlag » . Schenker resented this and Hertzka's exerting of editorial control, calling him « wrong, biased, and terroristic » (OC 52/574, 20 February 1923) , and accusing him of censorship as well as of administrative incompetence and falsifying accounts. Schenker resorted to an attorney in Fall 1924 in preparation for legal proceedings against Universal-Edition, but after a year of recriminations, a settlement was agreed on 10 December 1925 that resulted in « Der Tonwille » being continued with « Drei Masken Verlag » of Munich under the title « Das Meisterwerk in der Musik » (1925, 1926, 1930) . After a 4 year silence between the 2 men, correspondence began again in December 1928, and eventually normal civilities were restored ; Universal-Edition became Schenker's principal publisher again, issuing « Der freie Satz » posthumously in 1935, 3 years after Hertzka's death.

Hertzka was Jewish. Like Schenker, and most Viennese Jews at the time, he sought to assimilate into German culture. He was, however, a cosmopolitan Jew, nurturing an international network of business and cultural relationships within and beyond Europe, and traveling frequently to forge deals, develop personal contacts, and attend important performances ; Schenker, conversely, was a German nationalist, detested the Romance and Anglo-Saxon nations, and saw commerce and trade as detrimental to the world of the mind and to the arts. Hertzka was a pacifist and believed in democracy ; Schenker had militaristic tendencies and believed in rule by an enlightened aristocracy. Hertzka was optimistic about the future of music ; Schenker saw all about him only signs of its downfall.

Correspondence between Hertzka and Schenker is one of the largest exchanges of letters among Schenker's papers. It covers 1908 to 1931, and survives as most of the items from Schenker to Universal-Edition, WSLB I-444, and much of correspondence from Universal-Edition to Schenker, OC 52/I-939.

Alban Berg's commemorative address following the death of Emil Hertzka, director of the Viennese publishing house Universal-Edition is one of his most skillful public statements. He avoids the typical eulogy of Hertzka as an individual and focuses instead on the more complex issue of Hertzka's achievement in a world in which commerce intermingled with art. He stresses that idealism can successfully exist in the real world of business. Berg also returns to a theme that he addressed in other essays and lectures : that there exists in the world of modern music only a single movement, and that owing in part to Hertzka's nurturing it had grown from an early phase of interest groups and cliques to world-wide dominance.

Emil Hertzka (geboren 3. August 1869 in Pest, Österreich-Ungarn ; gestorben 9. Mai 1932 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Verleger. Er war von 1907 bis 1932 Direktor des Wiener Musikverlages Universal-Edition.

Emil Hertzka studierte zunächst Chemie und daneben Musik und Literatur an der Universität Wien, bis er das Chemiestudium aus gesundheitlichen Gründen aufgeben mußte. 1893 begann er beim Musikverlag Josef Weinberger zu arbeiten, war dann Geschäftsleiter des Verlages Gustav Lewy & Co und wechselte 1901 zu dem im selben Jahr gegründeten Musikverlag Universal-Edition-AG (UE) , einer Aktiengesellschaft, an der sich neben Josef Weinberger unter anderen auch der Musikverleger Bernhard Herzmannsky (Ludwig Döblinger) beteiligte. 1907 wurde Hertzka Direktor und blieb es bis zu seinem Tod im Jahr 1932. Hatte die Universal-Edition in den ersten Jahren ein eher traditionelles und klassisches Verlagsprogramm, wurde die Universal-Edition unter seiner Leitung zu einem der wichtigsten Verlage für zeitgenössische europäische Musik und prägte damit die Firma bis in die heutige Zeit.

1909 schloß er die ersten Verträge mit zeitgenössischen Komponisten, und zwar mit Gustav Mahler, Franz Schreker und Arnold Schönberg, dessen Oper « Der ferne Klang » das erste Bühnenwerk der Universal-Edition war. Außerdem übernahm er einen Großteil der Werke von Anton Bruckner aus dem Verlag Albert J. Gutmann. Nach und nach konnte er die damals bedeutendsten lebenden Komponisten, wie Karol Szymanowski, Franz Schmidt, Egon Wellesz, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Alfredo Casella, Leoš Janáček, Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály, Kurt Weill, Hanns Eisler, Ernst Křenek, Josef Matthias Hauer, Darius Milhaud oder Gian Francesco Malipiero an den Verlag binden.

Aber auch bei den Notenausgaben beschritt er neue Wege : ab 1912 arbeitete man im Verlag an der Herausgabe der Prachtedition « Klassiker der Tonkunst » . Von 1919 bis 1938 gab der Verlag die 1894 begründete Reihe der « Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich » und betreute sie mit dem Herausgeber Guido Adler bis zum 83. Band im Jahr 1938. Eine weitere Neuerung war die Sparte Buchverlag, wo neben einzelnen musiktheoretischen Veröffentlichungen, wie die « Harmonielehre » Arnold Schönbergs oder die Werkanalysen von Wöb und Specht, wichtige Periodika erschienen : die « Musikblätter des Anbruch » (1919-1937) oder « Pult und Taktstock » (1924-1930) .

Zum Zeitpunkt von Hertzkas Tod, er starb nach kurzer, schwerer Krankheit an einem Herzleiden, umfasste der Verlagskatalog rund 10.000 Titel. Sein Grab befindet sich auf dem Döblinger Friedhof (Israelitische Abteilung ; Gruppe I4, Reihe 3, Nr. IA) .

Zur Erinnerung an Hertzka wurde von 1933 bis 1937 ein jährlicher Kompositionspreis vergeben. Seine Frau Yella Hertzka (1873-1948) , geborene Fuchs, führte den Verlag nach seinem Tod bis zum Anschluß Österreichs 1938 und nach der Rückkehr aus dem erzwungenen Exil ab 1946 bis zu ihrem Tod.

Im Jahr 1959 wurde in Wien Favoriten (10. Bezirk) der Emil-Hertzka-Platz nach ihm benannt.

Im Vorwort zum Jahrbuch 1926 der Universal-Edition, das unter dem Titel « 25 Jahre Neue Musik » erschien, schrieb Emil Hertzka im Vorwort :

« Ein Vierteljahrhundert rastloser Arbeit liegt hinter uns. Der Rückschau gelte eine Atempause. Unser Ziel liegt noch fern und der Weg dahin ist weit. Wir gehen ihn aber leichten Schrittes, unbeschwert, denn wir gehen mit der Jugend. Von ihr lassen wir uns führen und irren mit ihr auch ohne Bedenken auf ungegangene, dornige Pfade. Wir fühlen, sie findet immer den rechten Weg vorwärts. Der Glaube an die Jugend, die Freude, daß wir für sie schon etwas geworden sind, und die Hoffnung, ihr noch viel mehr werden zu dürfen, geben uns die Kraft, unbeirrt weiter zu schreiten. »

Emil Hertzka, Musikverleger. Verbrachte seine Jugend in Pest, Österreich-Ungarn, wo sein Vater Leiter einer Textilfabrik war, studiert dann an der Universität Wien Chemie, nebenbei Musikwissenschaft und Literatur. Als er krankheitshalber das Chemiestudium aufgeben mußte, ging er für einige Zeit nach Italien. 1893 trat er in den Verlag Josef Weinberger in Wien ein, 1907 übernahm er die Leitung des 1901 gegründeten Musikverlages Universal-Edition A.G. , der durch die intensive Pflege zeitgenössische Musik eine führende Stellung im europäischen Musikleben einnahmen. Hertzka übernahm die Bestände des deutschen Aibl-Verlages, der durch die Herausgeber der Werke Max Regers und Richard Strauß zugrunde gerichtet worden war, gab Gustav Mahlers Symphonien heraus und trat für junge Komponisten ein, so für Franz Schreker, Arnold Schönberg, Alfredo Casella, Gian Francesco Malipiero, Anton von Webern, Joseph Marx und Josef Weinberger, dessen Oper « Schwanda der Dudelsackpfeifer » ebenfalls von Hertzka verlegt wurde.

Picture dating from 1929 - We see musicologist Alfred Schlee (3rd from left) at work with colleagues in the iconic « Bruckner Room » where Anton Bruckner taught and composed. The mezzanine level was, then, home to the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde Konservatorium ». This is presumably also where the young Gustav Mahler was given his (only !) 2 music-lessons by the Master of Saint-Florian - which Mahler called with passion : « artistic father » and « protagonist » of new music. Between 1875 and 1878, Mahler was a pupil at the Conservatory in the composition class of Franz Krenn, a rather distinguished (and pedantic !) teacher, nicknamed « Old Krenn » !

About Alfred Schlee ...

The Austrian-German musicologist, theatre scholar and music-publisher Alfred Schlee was born on 19 November 1901 in Dresden. He married Margarethe Molner in 1960. They had 2 sons. He died on 16 February 1999 in Vienna. Known as a very private individual, his funeral was over and done with before the world knew he had gone.

After completing his studies at Vizthumschen High-School, in his hometown of Dresden, Schlee attended for half a year, in the Dresden suburb of Hellerau, the experimental school (promoting music and rhythm) founded by Émile Jaques-Dalcroze - an old student of Anton Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory. He studied music theory, violoncello, and took piano lessons with Erwin Schulhoff. Then, he moved to Leipzig and Munich to study musicology (Adolf Sandberger) , composition (August Reuss) , philosophy and theater.

Schlee was already showing a deep interest in modern art : he was in close contact with the « Bauhaus » circle in Dessau and the architect Oskar Schlemmer, and, in 1925, he got to know the conductor Erich Kleiber, then busy preparing for the premiere of Alban Berg's Opera « Wozzeck » .

His 1st important job was as Universal's representative in Berlin, where the Nazis' cultural policies were putting large sections of the Universal catalogue out of bounds : Arnold Schœnberg and Alban Berg were both Jewish ; so, too, were Gustav Mahler, Darius Milhaud, Ernst Křenek, Karol Rathaus and many others ; and Anton von Webern, though an enthusiastic National-Socialist, also wrote « degenerate » music. For the Nazis, indeed, Universal was a « Jewish publisher » . Schlee watched the exodus of his friends with a heavy heart, bolstered by his conviction that Adolf Hitler's regime couldn't last ...

Schlee returned to Vienna in 1938, and his finest hour began, as Germany's swallowing of Austria (« Anschluß ») was repeated in music-publishing microcosm. With the weight of Hermann Göring behind them, the German publishers Schott bought-up Universal ; the prize was passed to another firm, Peters, when it was decided that Schott wasn't reliable either.

Schlee decided he would have to act if Universal-Edition was to survive.

From 1938 to 1945, Schlee was working for Universal-Edition in Vienna under the supervision of the « aryanised » shareholder John Petschull. With the support of Robert Kraus, Schlee was put in charge of the cultural department of the City of Vienna. The relocation of the publishing house at the « Altreich » (« Old Reich » : i.e. , Germany without Austria and the Sudetenland) helped to secure an invaluable amount of material.

With the help of some of the more humane officials in charge of Vienna (including the mother of composer Gottfried von Einem) , Schlee set about preserving the Universal catalogue. The mayor at the time, Hanns Blaschke (1943-1945) , the first deputy Mayor of Vienna responsible for cultural affairs, was of course a Nazi, but he was also a Austrian nationalist, and Schlee saw that he would be useful in preventing the wholesale loss of Universal to Germany. Highly-placed helpers made sure the « Gestapo » were kept-off Schlee's back - they called on Universal only once, confiscating music by Kurt Weill and Franz Schreker.

But Schlee saw the danger and immediately began removing scores and instrumental parts (printings, engravings, templates and manuscripts of works by Jewish « degenerate » composers, including the archives of Gustav Mahler) to safe havens inland or abroad, often in semi-official transport, on the grounds that the material had to be protected from bombing but, more essentially, from Nazi destruction.

Works of Arnold Schœnberg and Kurt Weill were hidden behind organs in country churches ; Schlee's own house in Semmering was used to secrete scores ; and, until the War was over, Schlee did what he could to export his forbidden music, correctly reckoning that the Nazis were even more interested in gaining foreign currency than in suppressing Jewish composers.

Alfred Schlee was one of the most important and least prominent arbiters of taste in 20th Century music. The enthusiasms of the conductors and pundits fill the headlines ; Schlee, head of the Vienna-based music-publishers Universal-Edition for 40 years, was more concerned with filling his catalogue, and he chose his composers with an impeccable ear for their likely development.

The list of Universal composers testifies to the acuity of his judgement : it bristles with names like Luciano Berio, Harrison Birtwistle, Mauricio Kagel, Olivier Messiaen, Arvo Pärt, Wolfgang Rihm, Kurt Schwertsik and Rodion Schtschedrin. The basis of his success was his unfailing intellectual curiosity.

Pierre Boulez, one of the modernist jewels in the Universal crown, said of Schlee :

« He always has his nose in the wind. »

Alfred Schlee studied piano, cello and music theory at school before moving on to Munich University to take courses in musicology with Adolf Sandberger and composition with August Reuss. Schlee was already showing a deep interest in modern art : he was in close contact with the « Bauhaus » circle in Dessau and the architect Oskar Schlemmer, and, in 1925, he got to know the conductor Erich Kleiber, then busy preparing for the premiere of Alban Berg's Opera « Wozzeck » .

Schlee had intended to go on to a Ph.D. in Vienna, but the combination of 2 factors - his father's sudden illness and the hyper-inflation that was then beginning to bite - put further study beyond his financial means. He took to the keyboard and the pen, acting as accompanist to the singers Mary Wigman and Yvonne Georgi and writing ballet-criticism. In 1924, he took-up a post as Dramaturg at the « Stadttheater » in Münster, where he also worked as « répétiteur » . It was now that he 1st came into contact with Universal-Edition (which, founded in 1901, was exactly the same age as he was) ; among the jobs he was given was the editing of a special number of « Anbruch » , the periodical of Vienna's musical avant-garde. In 1927, Hans Heinsheimer, the visionary head of the Operatic section of Universal-Edition, offered Schlee a job. Universal became his life - and he saved its.

His 1st important job was as Universal's representative in Berlin, where the Nazis' cultural policies were putting large sections of the Universal catalogue out of bounds : Arnold Schœnberg and Alban Berg were both Jewish ; so, too, were Gustav Mahler, Darius Milhaud, Ernst Křenek, Karol Rathaus and many others ; and Anton von Webern, though an enthusiastic National-Socialist, also wrote « degenerate » music. For the Nazis, indeed, Universal was a « Jewish publisher » . Schlee watched the exodus of his friends with a heavy heart, bolstered by his conviction that Adolf Hitler's regime couldn't last ...

Schlee returned to Vienna in 1938, and his finest hour began, as Germany's swallowing of Austria was repeated in music-publishing microcosm. With the weight of Hermann Göring behind them, the German publishers Schott bought-up Universal ; the prize was passed to another firm, Peters, when it was decided that Schott wasn't reliable either. Schlee decided he would have to act if Universal was to survive.

With the help of some of the more humane officials in charge of Vienna, Schlee set about preserving the Universal catalogue. The mayor of Vienna was, of course, a Nazi, but he was also an Austrian nationalist, and Schlee saw that he would be useful in preventing the wholesale loss of Universal to Germany. Highly-placed helpers made sure the « Gestapo » were kept off Schlee's back - they called on Universal only once, confiscating music by Kurt Weill and Franz Schreker.

But Schlee saw the danger and immediately began removing scores and instrumental parts to safe havens, often in semi-official transport, on the grounds that the material had to be protected from bombing. Works of Arnold Schoenberg and Kurt Weill were hidden behind organs in country churches ; Schlee's own house in Semmering was used to secrete scores ; and, until the War was over, Schlee did what he could to export his forbidden music, correctly reckoning that the Nazis were even more interested in gaining foreign currency than in suppressing Jewish composers.

After the War, and with Universal re-established as an Austrian, not a German, business, Schlee now began to expand the company. He had already contracted Rolf Liebermann and Frank Martin to Universal, with a view to publishing them « when that Hitler is out of the way » . Gottfried von Einem, whose mother had been instrumental in safeguarding condemned music, became a Universal composer ; so, too, did Luigi Dallapiccola, Bohuslav Martinů, and Mario Peragallo.

Schlee enthusiastically embraced the avant-garde, bringing into his fold Karlheinz Stockhausen, Roman Haubenstock-Ramati, Mauricio Kagel, Friedrich Cerha, Sylvano Bussotti and others, and extended his helping hand to Eastern bloc composers (György Kurtág, György Ligeti, Edison Denisov, Alfred Schnittke) being given the official cold shoulder by the Communists who had taken-over their homelands.

Schlee was an intensely private man. Pierre Boulez, who knew him for nearly 50 years, confessed :

« If you want to know something about him, you have to ask someone else. »

That privacy was maintained even in death : Schlee's funeral was over and done with before the world knew he had gone.

...

We usually think of music-publishers as functionaries at best. They are facilitators rather than creators, and they occupy the one role in the creation of new music that is seemingly motivated by finance rather than art. All that is grossly unfair, of course, and role of music-publishers in distributing and disseminating new music is all too easily overlooked.

Even so, the War-time activities of Alfred Schlee are truly extraordinary and deserve to be better-known. Schlee found himself at the head of Universal-Edition, Austria's leading new music-publisher at the « Anshluß » in 1938. Difficult times for all concerned, but Universal-Edition found themselves in deeper trouble than most, as the Nazis were in the process of banning a large section of the Universal-Edition roster. Taking Darius Milhaud and Ernst Křenek out of circulation was one thing, but banning performances of Gustav Mahler was really going to have an impact on the company's bottom-line. Worse still, the Nazis wanted Universal-Edition in German hands, so Herman Göring personally oversaw its take-over by Schott and, later, Peters.

So, what did Schlee do while all this was going on ? Well, he didn't panic. He was a personal friend of the mayor of Vienna, who, while a member of the Nazi Party, was also an Austrian nationalist. The mayor made sure that the « Gestapo » was kept at arm's length while Schlee did what he had to do. He began salting away all the company's « entarten » scores (which included large chunks of the output of Arnold Schönberg and Kurt Weill) pretty much anywhere he could think of. Apparently, the organs of village churches around Austria were filled with the manuscripts, as was Schlee's own house.

Then, there was Anton von Webern. The ascetic composer did himself no favours in terms of the financial viability of his lifestyle, but Schlee ensured him an income throughout the War by employing him as an arranger and reader. After the War, Universal-Edition was re-established as an Austrian company, and then began the 2nd heroic phase of Schlee's career. From the late-1940's onwards, the company, under Schlee's directorship, became a heaven for Soviet bloc composers who were having a hard time at home. So, names like György Ligeti, György Kurtág, Alfred Schnittke and Edison Denisov appeared on the international scene thanks largely to his single-handed support.

Alfred Schlee's name is known today mainly through the many works that were written in 1991 to mark his 90th birthday. The composers included Olivier Messiaen, Alfred Schnittke, György Kurtág, and Harrison Birtwistle - quite a line-up.

He was by all accounts a very private man. Pierre Boulez, another high-profile signing to Universal-Edition, said :

« If you want to know something about him, you have to ask someone else. »

That privacy might explain why there is no photograph of him to be found on the internet.

There aren't many publishers in the history of music who would warrant the biography treatment, but Alfred Schlee is surely the exception.

...

Alfred Schlee was initially Universal-Edition's representative in Berlin before moving to Vienna in 1938. During the Nazi dictatorship, Schlee hid scores in hideaways such as churches and at his house in Semmering, or he sent them to safe places abroad. This enabled pieces by those composers who are today regarded as having written the classic works of modernism to be played after 1945. From 1951 onward, he was a member of the Executive Board together with Alfred Kalmus and Ernst Hartmann. He attracted composers such as Karlheinz Stockhausen, Pierre Boulez, Luciano Berio, Arvo

Pärt and Wolfgang Rihm to the publishing house.

« The future was always our top priority » (Alfred Schlee)

In 1927, when I asked Hans Heinsheimer, whom I already knew quite well, if he could find a position for me at Universal-Edition, I certainly did not intend to stay there for the rest of my life. My admiration for the high-risk, international, modern production department at the publishing house and for its director, Emil Hertzka, had aroused my curiosity and I wanted to know how an institution like this functioned. I originally planned to spend 2 or 3 years finding this out, but it was not long before I was offered the post as representative of Universal-Edition in Berlin, a position I was more than happy to accept. In those days, Berlin was the centre of the world, particularly the musical world.

Nobody was bothered about whether or not Universal-Edition was a Jewish publisher. Unfortunately, the situation changed rapidly when Adolf Hitler unexpectedly assumed power in Germany with the Nazi Party, which had been considered in decline. My opinion of National-Socialism was unequivocal. As a student, I had once heard one of Hitler's speeches and thought it impossible that this person could ever pose any kind of threat. However, not even this terrible delusion prevented me from remaining unfailingly convinced, even in the worst hours and through the most tragic affairs, that this regime could only last for a short period of time.

My work now took on a new focus. The majority of my newly-found friends were gradually leaving Berlin. Most of the important works in the publishing house catalogue had been affected by the boycott imposed by Nazi racial or cultural laws. Even Universal-Edition itself came under fire, and its Jewish directors, employees and authors in Vienna were also subjected to targeted persecution. I went to the Austrian embassy in Berlin to obtain advice and gained the impression that they wanted to warn me against becoming too committed to the publishing house ; this filled me with terror. Alarm signals of this kind meant that I began to concentrate my thoughts on the survival of the publishing house. My suggestion that we should set-up an alternative company in Switzerland, was not, however, approved by my Viennese superiors. They felt safe in Austria and believed me to be a pessimist who had been frightened by the Nazis.

« Please, give me exclusive rights to your works. I promise you that I will print them when this terrible situation has passed. Please, send your scores to our friend Kurt Hirschfeld from Zürich Theatre ; they will reach me from there. I am naturally unable to print them now, but a little trust goes a long way. »

(Alfred Schlee to Rolf Liebermann, in 1943 or 1944. Liebermann latter recorded these recollections in 1998.)

However, in 1938-1939, things got nasty for Universal-Edition. The Viennese publishers were bought-out by the German publishing house Schott. However, an employee at Schott who had « Aryanised » the publishing house Peters convinced the relevant ministry that Schott was not « reliable » enough. Ownership of Universal-Edition was, therefore, passed on to Peters, who acquired it using capital released by Hermann Göring. Provisional administrators took-over the management in Vienna. We enjoyed a certain degree of protection ; they were civilized people who acted decently even towards Heinsheimer and Director Winter, whose emigration was facilitated by them.

It was now important for us to make sure that nothing happened that would make Universal-Edition unable to resume its international activities « once everything was over ». In other words, we needed to ensure that our core stock survived, that our manuscripts did not disappear, that banned and unperformed works were not lost, that any reproducible documents for these works were preserved and that these things would remain in our possession, even if they had to be moved owing to the risk of being bombed if the War was lost. It goes without saying that we had arguments with Peters over this.

With extensive help from Gottfried von Einem, and above all his mother, valuable material was taken to Ramsau. Even among the Nazis, there was a kind of Austrian patriotism that resisted the looting that was going on. The mayor of Vienna at the time (Hanns Blaschke) , who was a National-Socialist, helped me a great deal, as did an official at the Department of Culture. The « Gestapo » only came to the Universal-Edition offices once and, strangely, only confiscated Kurt Weill and Franz Schenker. After that, the Universal-Edition manuscripts were taken away in a sort of semi-official manoeuvre described as « bomb protection ». Most of them were hidden in churches ; works by Weill and Schönberg were stowed away in Zwettl, behind the organ, for example. I had rented a private house in Semmering and we used one of its rooms to store scores, manuscripts and instrumental parts. This enabled us to reproduce new material without too much trouble. Before War broke-out, we were also able to send material abroad. The Nazis' interest in foreign currency was greater than their concern that exports were helping the survival of the cultural assets which they were attempting to destroy.

I didn't think overly much about what was going on around me, but focused more on the future. It was always our top priority. Even when the Russians came, a great deal could be achieved if you weren't afraid. And so, with the help of a good many friends, we managed to preserve the existence of the publishing house in Vienna and could prepare to operate freely again following liberation. Once the shooting had stopped in Vienna, the best period in my life began. When Universal-Edition was in danger of being sold-off as « German property » while the company was being re-established immediately after the end of the War, Egon Seefehlner saved the day. Alfred Kalmus was able to restore the company's status as a joint-stock company, and he, then, concentrated on its publishing activities together with Ernst Hartmann, me and a host of enthusiastic young workers.

Alfred Schlee (geboren 19. November 1901 in Dresden ; gestorben 16. Februar 1999 in Wien) war ein österreichisch-deutscher Musikwissenschaftler, Theaterwissenschaftler und Musikverleger.

Nach Absolvierung des Vizthumschen Gymnasiums in seiner Geburtsstadt Dresden besuchte Alfred Schlee für ein halbes Jahr die von Émile Jaques-Dalcroze gegründete Bildungsanstalt für Musik und Rhythmus im Dresdner Vorort Hellerau. Schon während seiner Jugend privat in mehreren musikalischen Fächern (Klavier bei Erwin Schulhoff, Violoncello, Musiktheorie) unterrichtet, betrieb er in der Folge Studien in Musikwissenschaft, Komposition, Philosophie und Theaterwissenschaft in München und Leipzig. Der Studienabschluß an der Universität Wien mit einer geplanten Dissertation zur Programmentwicklung von Wanderbühnen wurde durch eine schwere Erkrankung seines Vaters und daraus resultierende finanzielle Schwierigkeiten verhindert. In der Folge arbeitete er als Pianist auf Tourneen der Tänzerinnen Mary Wigman und Yvonne Georgi, für die er teils auch selbst die Musik komponierte. Daneben betätigte er sich als Kritiker im Tanzbereich. 1924 wurde er Dramaturg und Korrepetitor am Stadttheater Münster, im Herbst 1925 Regieassistent am Fürstlich Reußischen Theater in Gera, wohin Yvonne Georgi mit ihrer Gruppe engagiert wurde und sie und andere mit Werken von Egon Wellesz, Darius Milhaud und Vittorio Rieti Akzente im Bereich des modernen Balletts setzten. Das Engagement endete bereits nach einer Spielzeit aufgrund mangelnden Publikumsinteresses an diesen Aktivitäten. 1927 organisierte Schlee mit Hanns Niedecken-Gebhard den ersten Deutschen Tänzerkongress in Magdeburg, in der Folge gemeinsam mit Rudolf Laban den zweiten und dritten Kongress.

Sein Interesse an neuesten Trends in der zeitgenössischen Kunst und Musik brachte Schlee und andere in Kontakt mit dem Dessauer Bauhaus-Kreis, dem Dirigenten Erich Kleiber, den er anlässlich der Uraufführung von Alban Bergs « Wozzeck » 1925 in Berlin kennenlernte, dem Tänzer Harald Kreutzberg und dem Maler und Bühnenbildner Oskar Schlemmer, bei dessen Pariser Produktion des « Triadischen Balletts » er 1932 den Klavierpart innehatte.

Schlees erster Kontakt mit dem Wiener Verlag Universal-Edition bestand ab 1927, zunächst in redaktioneller Mitarbeit für ein Sonderheft der Zeitschrift « Musikblätter des Anbruch ». 1928-1931 erfolgte auf seine Initiative in der Universal-Edition die Publikation der von der Gesellschaft für Schrifttanz herausgegebenen und von ihm als Schriftleiter betreuten Vierteljahresschrift « Schrifttanz ». Schlee hielt darin die damals neu entwickelte « Kinetographie Laban » als Notation aktueller Choreographien des modernen Tanzes fest. Parallel zu Schlees allmählichem Rückzug aus dem Tanzbereich bekam er Gelegenheit, sich in Wien intensiv ins Musikverlagswesen einzuarbeiten. Ab Beginn der 1930er-Jahre wurde er auf Initiative von Hans Heinsheimer Repräsentant der Universal-Edition in Berlin. Nach der Machtergreifung der Nationalsozialisten im Deutschen Reich konnte Schlee ab 1933 vielfach zwischen den Interessen des Verlags und den Ansprüchen der NS-Kulturpolitik vermitteln. 1937 sucht Schlee, zunächst erfolglos, bei der Österreichischen Botschaft in Berlin um die Österreichische Staatsbürgerschaft an. Diese wurde ihm am 22. Oktober 1946 zuerkannt.

1938-1945 arbeitete Schlee zunächst neben dem offiziell bestellten kommissarischen Leiter Ernst Geutebrück, dann unter dem neuen Hauptgesellschafter Johannes Petschull im arisierten Stammhaus der Universal-Edition in Wien. In dieser Zeit konnte er zum einen mit Hilfe von Robert Kraus, dem Leiter des Kulturamtes der Stadt Wien, die Verlegung des Verlags ins so bezeichnete « Altreich » verhindern, zum anderen war er entscheidend für die Rettung wesentlicher Bestände des Unternehmens verantwortlich. Gemeinsam mit Gleichgesinnten, darunter insbesondere dem Komponisten Gottfried von Einem, verbrachte er eine Vielzahl an Drucken, Stichvorlagen und Manuskripten von Werken jüdischer beziehungsweise damals als « entartet » bezeichneter Komponisten, darunter die im Verlagsarchiv befindlichen Autographen Gustav Mahlers, in Privathäuser und verschiedene andere Verstecke, wo sie bis zum Kriegsende vor der Vernichtung durch die Nationalsozialisten bewahrt blieben. Ein enger Kontakt verband Schlee während der Kriegsjahre mit Anton von Webern, nachdem es ihm gelungen war, dessen Freistellung vom Kriegsdienst zugunsten einer Mitarbeit in der Universal-Edition zu erreichen. Schon ab den frühen 1940er-Jahren machte sich Schlee Gedanken über die Neugestaltung des Verlagsprogramms, indem er etwa mündliche Vereinbarungen mit den Schweizern Frank Martin und Rolf Liebermann über deren spätere (während der faschistischen Herrschaft noch unmögliche) Inverlagnahme traf und Mitarbeiter für den Neubeginn nach Beendigung der Kämpfe um und in Wien auswählte.

Nach Kriegsende übernahm Schlee als öffentlicher Verwalter bis 1947 die Leitung des Verlags. Als prominente Persönlichkeit im Wiener Musikleben gehörte er seit Februar 1946 auch der Direktion der Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft an, eine Position, in der er sich ebenfalls mit Nachdruck für die Förderung des zeitgenössischen Schaffens einsetzte. Im selben Jahr wurde er Vorstandsmitglied der Urheberrechtsgesellschaft AKM. Ab 1951 bildete er mit Alfred Kalmus und Ernst Hartmann den Verlagsvorstand der Universal-Edition. Bis zu seinem Rückzug ins Privatleben 1985 galt sein primärer Aufgabenbereich dem Produktionsprogramm. Während vier Jahrzehnten bestimmte er maßgeblich, welche Namen dabei betreut wurden, wobei es ihm gelang, eine ausgewogene Balance zwischen österreichischen und ausländischen Komponisten zu schaffen. Besonderes Augenmerk wandte er auch jenen aufstrebenden Persönlichkeiten zu, die durch die Änderung der politischen Situation in Europa im kommunistischen Einflussbereich wirkten und teilweise von den Kontakten zu « westlichen » Ländern abgeschnitten. Durch ihre Bindung an die Universal-Edition wurde vielen von ihnen die Einbindung in die internationale Musikszene ermöglicht. Nicht zuletzt damit erhöhte sich damit auch markant das seit der Verlagsgründung 1901 angestrebte internationale Gewicht des Verlags.

Stellvertretend für die durch Schlees Initiative dem Verlag verbundenen Komponisten sind etwa zu nennen Gilbert Amy, Hans Erich Apostel, Theodor Berger, Luciano Berio, Harrison Birtwistle, Pierre Boulez, Francis Burt, Friedrich Cerha, Luigi Dallapiccola, Edison Denissow, Gottfried von Einem, Beat Furrer, Cristóbal Halffter, Roman Haubenstock-Ramati, Anton Heiller, Mauricio Kagel, Ernst Křenek, Ladislav Kupkovič, György Kurtág, Rolf Liebermann, György Ligeti, Frank Martin, Bohuslav Martinů, Olivier Messiaen, Arvo Pärt, Mario Peragallo, Henri Pousseur, Wolfgang Rihm, Karl Schiske, Alfred Schnittke, Rodion Schtschedrin, Kurt Schwertsik, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Jenő Takács, Alfred Uhl und Hans Zender. Zu den herauszuhebenden Einzelereignissen während seiner Arbeit gehören seine Initiativen zu wissenschaftlichen Gesamtausgaben von Arnold Schönberg und Alban Berg, die gegen einige Widerstände durchgesetzte, 1979 von Friedrich Cerha vorgenommene Fertigstellung des dritten Aktes und Publikation der vollständigen Fassung von Alban Bergs « Lulu » sowie das Bemühen um die Wiederentdeckung der 1938-1945 im Einflussbereich des Deutschen Reichs verbotenen und in der Folge vergessenen Komponisten Franz Schreker und Alexander von Zemlinsky. Weitere Schwerpunkte des Verlags während Schlees späterer Jahre waren und andere die Wiener Urtext Edition, die pädagogisch ausgerichtete « Rote Reihe », der mit Karl Scheit erfolgte Aufbau eines Gitarre-Katalogs sowie repräsentative Bildbiographien etwa zu Beethoven, Wagner und Mahler.

Zu den Alfred Schlee gewidmeten Werken zählen « Sonata pian' e forte » von Gilbert Amy ; « Fünf Bagatellen » Opus 20 von Hans Erich Apostel ; « Epifanie G », « Concertino » und « Formazioni » von Luciano Berio ; « Répons » von Pierre Boulez ; « Exercises » und « Netzwerk » von Friedrich Cerha ; « Areæ sonantes » von Paul-Heinz Dittrich ; « Cantiuunculæ amoris » von Karl Heinz Füssl ; « Mizar » von Cristóbal Halffter ; « Credentials » von Roman Haubenstock-Ramati ; « Bardo-Puls » von Günter Kahowez ; « Ludwig van » von Mauricio Kagel ; « Fragment » von György Ligeti ; « Und die Zeiger seiner Augen ... » von Bo Nilsson ; « Te Deum » von Arvo Pärt ; « Madrigal II » von Henri Pousseur ; « Im Innersten von » und « Zwiesprache » von Wolfgang Rihm ; « Khouang » von Tona Scherchen-Hsiao ; sowie die Symphonie Nr. 2 « Sankt Florian » von Alfred Schnittke. Schlees 90. Geburtstag wurde am 18. November 1991 mit einem Festabend mit dem Arditti Quartet im Wiener Konzerthaus gewürdigt, bei dem Gratulationsstücke von 37 Komponisten erklangen. Am 8. Dezember 2001 fand im Wiener Arnold Schönberg Center auf Initiative der Familie, von Pierre Boulez und Nuri Schœnberg-Nono ein Gedächtniskonzert anlässlich des 100. Geburtstages von Alfred Schlee statt. Unter der Leitung von Boulez brachten Mitglieder des « Ensemble intercontemporain » Werke von Schœnberg, Messiaen, Boulez, Rihm, Stockhausen, Kurtág, Cerha, Webern und Berio zur Aufführung.

Nach früheren Ehen mit Anna Taussig und Maria Bertha Hegner heiratete Schlee 1960 Margarethe Molner. Der Verbindung entstammen die Söhne Thomas Daniel Schlee und Alexander Schlee.

Universal-Edition

Universal-Edition (or UE) is a Classical music publishing firm. Founded in 1901 in Vienna, and originally intended to provide the core Classical works and educational works to the Austrian market (which had until then been dominated by Leipzig-based publishers) . The firm soon expanded to become one of the most important publishers of modern music.

In 1904, Universal-Edition acquired Josef Aibl publishers, and so acquired the rights to many works by Richard Strauß and Max Reger, but it was the arrival of Emil Hertzka as managing director in 1907 (who remained until his death in 1932) which really pushed the firm towards new music. Under Hertzka, Universal-Edition signed contracts with a number of important contemporary composers, including Béla Bartók and Frederick Delius in 1908 ; Gustav Mahler and Arnold Schœnberg in 1909 (Mahler's Symphony No. 8 was the 1st work Universal-Edition acquired an original copyright to) ; Anton von Webern and Alexander von Zemlinsky in 1910 ; Karol Szymanowski in 1912 ; Leoš Janáček in 1917 ; and Kurt Weill in 1924. Through their association with Schœnberg, they also published many works by Alban Berg.

The firm's avant-garde directions continued after World War II, when Universal-Edition published works by a number of significant composers, among them Luciano Berio, Pierre Boulez, Morton Feldman, Mauricio Kagel, György Kurtág, György Ligeti and Karlheinz Stockhausen. Later important additions to the catalogue include Georg Friedrich Haas, Wolfgang Rihm, Cristóbal Halffter, Robert Aitken, Richard Rodney Bennett, Harrison Birtwistle, Georges Lentz, Vyckintas Baltakas, Johannes Maria Staud, John Rea, Jay Schwartz, Arvo Pärt and Friedrich Cerha.

Universal-Edition have also published several significant historical editions, including the complete works of Claudio Monteverdi. In collaboration with Verlag B. Schott's Söhne, Mainz, they have published the « Wiener Urtext Edition » series since 1972. Originally consisting of works for 1 or 2 performers by composers from Johann Sebastian Bach to Johannes Brahms, the series was later expanded to include a limited number of later works, such as the « Ludus Tonalis » of Paul Hindemith.

Universal-Edition AG (häufig mit UE abgekürzt) ist der Name eines 1901 gegründeten österreichischen Musikverlages mit Hauptsitz am Karlsplatz 6 in Wien.

Hauptgrund der 1901 in Wien unter dem Namen « Universal-Edition Actiengesellschaft » erfolgte Verlagsgründung war die Intention Österreich-Ungarns, von Notenimporten, insbesondere der dominierenden Musikverlage in Leipzig, unabhängig zu werden. Die Gründer waren Adolf Robitschek, Josef Weinberger und Bernhard Herzmann von Döbblingen.

Stand zunächst Musik der klassischen und romantischen Epoche im Vordergrund, verlagerte sich der Schwerpunkt der Publikationen schon nach wenigen Jahren auf die jeweils zeitgenössische Musik. 1906 übernahm die Universal-Edition beispielsweise von anderen Verlagen die Rechte an Gustav Mahlers Sinfonien I bis 4, und schloß 1908 einen direkten Vertrag mit dem Komponisten über den Druck der 8. Sinfonie. Unter Emil Hertzka (Direktor von 1907 bis 1932) folgten Namen wie Arnold Schönberg, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Joseph Marx, Leoš Janáček, Karol Szymanowski, Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály, Kurt Weill, Egon Wellesz, Erwin Schulhoff, Franz Schreker oder Hanns Eisler. 1932 umfasste der Katalog der Universal-Edition rund 10.000 Nummern.

1919 gab der Verlag die Musikzeitschrift Musikblätter des Anbruch heraus, die bis 1937 erschienen. 1924-1930 gesellte sich Pult und Taktstock hinzu. Beide Organe nutzte der Verlag erfolgreich, um durch Artikel, Berichte und Rezensionen seine Verlagskomponisten international in die Diskussion zu bringen. Ein weiterer « Verkaufsschlager » wurde die 1939 ins Leben gerufene und von Karl Scheit herausgegebene Reihe Musik für Gitarre.

Im Dritten Reich erwirkte der Verleger Alfred Schlee durch Diplomatie bei den Nationalsozialisten, daß diese die Schulden des hochverschuldeten Verlags in Hinsicht auf die Erhaltung eines Denkmals Entarteter Musik beglichen und rettete dadurch den Verlag und zahlreiche Manuskripte vor dem Untergang. Der jüdische Teil der Verlagsredakteure wurde gezwungen, das Schicksal zahlreicher verlegter Komponisten zu teilen und mit Berufsverboten versehen, ins Exil getrieben oder deportiert.

Während des Zweiten Weltkrieges war die Firma in deutscher Hand und publizierte auch Werke wie Franz Schmidts Deutsche Auferstehung (1940) . Sie ging nach 1945 wieder in österreichischen Besitz über und setzte die Tradition der Aufnahme von Musik der Gegenwart in ihr Programm fort. Die ab 1955 von Herbert Eimert unter Mitwirkung von Karlheinz Stockhausen in der Universal-Edition publizierte Heftenfolge « die reihe » informierte über serielle und elektronische Musik. Zum Verlagsprogramm, das im Jahr 2000 rund 32.000 Titel umfasste, zählen neben weiteren Zeitschriften und Lehrbüchern auch Taschenpartituren, seit 1972 unter dem Titel « Wiener Urtext Edition » auch zahlreiche Urtextausgaben von Musik der Vorklassik bis zur Romantik, später auch des 20. Jahrhunderts (gemeinsam mit dem Verlag B. Schott's Söhne, Mainz) .

Zu den zeitgenössischen Komponisten im Verlagsprogramm der Universal-Edition zählen etwa Wolfgang Rihm, Pierre Boulez, Arvo Pärt, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Friedrich Cerha, Luciano Berio, Johannes Maria Staud, Georg Friedrich Haas, Georges Lentz, Daniel Schnyder oder Vykintas Baltakas.

Heinrich Strecker

The Austrian composer of Operettas and popular Viennese music Heinrich Strecker was born on 24 February 1893 in Vienna and died, aged 88, on 28 June 1981, in Baden near Vienna. He was married to Erika Strecker.

As a young child, Strecker was sent to Theux, in Belgium, where he was educated on a boarding school run by Lazarists. His talent for music was noticed here, and his interest nurtured. At the completion of his schooling, he could play 12 instruments. He professed a preference for the violin, in which he completed a Master-class. In 1907, Strecker made his public performance debut with his own composition, the Violin Concerto in A major, and, in the same year, he was asked to play it for the Belgian King Leopold II, and was honoured for doing so.

He returned to Vienna in 1910, at the age of 17, to study law at the University of Vienna. His studies were interrupted by the First World War, in which he was an army officer. After the War, he devoted himself solely to his music, studying with Professor Camillo Horn and beginning to compose Classical pieces.

Between commissioned pieces, such as dance and film music, he discovered Viennese songs. He became famous for this type of popular music, as well as for his « Singspiel ». He often collaborated with Fritz Gerold, Joe Grebitz and Bruno Hardt-Walden, who wrote the song-texts and libretti.

On 21 December 1931, his Operetta « Mädel aus Wien » (Girl from Vienna) premiered at the Vienna « Bürgertheater » and, immediately following the « Anschluß » of Austria by the 3rd « Reich », his Operetta « Der ewige Walzer » (The Eternal Waltz) premiered on 18 May 1938 at the « Volksoper ». His « Singspiel » « Ännchen von Tharau » (Little Ann from Tharau), which he wrote with Hardt-Walden, premiered at the « Raimund Theater », on 8 February 1940.

Strecker became a member of the Nazi Party in 1933, and was the regional representative of the cultural community of Vienna. In addition to the « Excelsior » and « Stage » publishers, which he founded in Vienna in 1926, he took-over the « Bristol, Sirius and Europaton » music-publishers under the guise of Aryanization.

The complete catalogue of Heinrich Strecker's works comprises more than 350 individual pieces. During his career, he composed many popular songs, Walzes, Marches, Operettas, and film-scores. His music is still popular in Austria, and concerts are sometimes given in his old home in the Viennese suburb of « Baden bei Wien ».

Heinrich Strecker (1893-1981) is an Austrian composer. He was born in Vienna but was educated in Belgium in a Catholic school run by German brothers. Strecker would later remember his school years :

« Given my extraordinary musical talent, my teachers gave me free lessons in piano, cello, tenor horn, trumpet, flugelhorn, horn, trombone and organ. Besides, I was trained to play the violin upon a Master level. I was soon regarded not only as the best musician but also as the best singer of the school. No feast day went by without me singing Gregorian chants as a soloist in Church or performing before the highest ecclesiastical and secular dignitaries like the King of the Belgians for whom I played, as a climax, my own composition, a Violin Concerto. »

In 1910, Strecker returned to Vienna and would become the self-proclaimed saviour of the « Wienerlieder » (Viennese Songs) . « Wienerlieder » were critical, ironic, funny songs about life in and around Vienna, sung in the local dialect and blending humour with melancholy. These popular songs had known their heyday in the 19th Century's last quarter. According to Strecker, the « Wienerlied » had little chance against the modern foxtrot :

« Publishers had only a pitying smile for my futile struggle for the dying “ Wienerlied ”. »

Still, Heinrich Strecker sensed the financial potential of its revival and, in 1922, founded his own music publishing company, the « Wiener Excelsior Verlag » . He composed Operettas and hundreds of songs which « glorified Vienna and began their triumphal march throughout the world » .

We are coming to the gist of our story. In 1933, Strecker became member of the NSDAP, the German Nazi Party. At that time, the Austrian government tried to suppress National-Socialism, and his Nazi affiliation cost Heinrich Strecker 6 months of detention in 1936. After his release, he conveniently made an extended tour in Germany. Strecker returned to his homeland in 1938, right after the « Anschluß » . Our composer welcomed this annexation of Austria to the German « Reich » with 2 songs : « Deutsch-Österreich ist frei ! » and « Wach auf Deutsche Wachau » . This last song became also known as the « Ostmarklied » , « Ostmark » being the new Nazi name for Austria. The words of the song allow little doubt as to Strecker's sympathies :

Von Burg zu Burg die Frage geht, wann denn die Ostmark aufersteht, ob auch der Bruder endlich heimwärts fand, heim in das große Vaterland ?

From castle to castle the question spreads,
when will Ostmark rise again,
whether the brother finally found home, back into the great fatherland ?

No wonder that this « Ostmarklied » became a Nazi battle song. The same « honour » also « befell Heimat » , another one of Strecker's successes.

Tellingly, it was in Bremen (Germany) that his Operetta « The Eternal Waltz » premiered in February 1938. Not until 3 months later, after the « Anschluß » , could Strecker triumph its premiere at the Vienna « Volksoper » . By that time, Nazi rules already had started the persecution in the Austrian musical world. Jews were prohibited to own commercial enterprises. The work of Jewish composers and authors were banned : performances were prohibited as was the sale of their sheet music. Their printed scores were destroyed or marked as unavailable.

Barely 3 months after the annexation, Heinrich Strecker became vice-president of AKM (« Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger ») , the music copyright agency. It was then already fully compliant with Nazi rules. Earlier, in March 1938, AKM's council had been dismissed and a Commissar Chairman appointed. Immediately, a questionnaire had been sent to all members asking racial and religious questions. In June of the same year, the AKM was replaced by STAGMA, the Society for musical performing rights from Nazi Germany. STAGMA was administered by the « Reichsmusikkammer » directed by Josef Gæbbels.

In 1939, in a booklet containing an AKM membership directory, someone deleted the names of Jewish members by hand with a neat red-line. The legend written on the booklet reads :

« ... = Jüden. »

These were to be black-listed ! A hand-written note inside this booklet chillingly explains that some members had not yet been crossed-off because they had not submitted their completed questionnaires, asking them about their race.

« According to a notice from STAGMA, some of the persons whose name is deleted with a red-line are Jews. The crossing-out did not take place because these persons did not submit the questionnaire. »

Franz Sobotka, a Viennese music-publisher owning several companies, was part of the list but his name was not deleted. Nonetheless, in mid-May, the month in which Strecker was attending the premiere of his Operetta, Sobotka fled Vienna with Hermine, his Jewish wife. He had heard that his family was at risk of imminent arrest by the « Gestapo » . They crossed the border to Czechoslovakia and reached the safety of Karlsbad (Karlovy Vary) . Later, Strecker will do away with the Sobotka's refuge as a « health cure » .

From Karlsbad, the family emigrated to New York. Sobotka's car was confiscated and he was expropriated of a great deal of his assets. In 1939, Heinrich Strecker acquired the publishing companies (Bristol Verlag, Sirius and Europaton) which belonged to his « long-time friend » Franz Sobotka for a paltry sum. At that time, the companies had 18 employees and totalled a significant revenue. Strecker merged Sobotka's companies together with his own to form the « Am Schubertring Verlag » .

While Sobotka was forced to rebuild his life in New York, Strecker was successfully performing in Austria, with many sold-out evenings. In 1942, he was able to buy a castle-like villa.

Villa Strecker, located in Baden about 26 kilometers south of Vienna. The villa boasts a cast-iron veranda porch, coming from the Austrian Pavilion in the Paris Exposition.

At the end of the War, Strecker fled from Vienna. In 1946, he was accused of high-treason for illegal activity, abusive enrichment and insult to the dignity of the librettist Alfred Steinberg-Frank. Strecker's publishing house was placed in the custody of the American Property Control : Franz Sobotka, now a U.S. citizen, reclaimed his properties and accused Strecker of taking-over his editions under the guise of aryanisation. Aryanisation meant confiscation or forced sale far below the real value. The exchange of letters between Strecker, Sobotka and the American Property Control is made public by Fold3, an online collection of original U.S. military records. The scanned, typewritten letters make a fascinating read.

Strecker's defence is a litany of self-pity, presenting himself as a victim of the German « occupation » and of unfortunate circumstances. Like so many other Austrians, he refused to acknowledge that he had participated in the persecution of Jews. He denied ever being a member of the Nazi Party : it was his father, conveniently also called Heinrich, who had been a member. He himself « was persecuted by the Nazis » . Strecker enumerated his countless successes as a composer and blamed slander by jealous people for his present situation :

« Viennese art was my goal, glory my companion, and I was envied by the yapping pack of incompetents as is often the case for successful artists. »

In his defence, Strecker recounts how, in 1944, he got into trouble with a Nazi rival and, subsequently, his business was closed down. He also argues that he worked closely together with Jewish artists. Which is true : he created for example several songs together with Alfred Steinberg-Frank, who would later accuse him in 1946. Strecker also argues that Goebbels wanted to destroy the « Wienerlied » . Thus, Strecker having been its « pioneer, front-runner and king, he also had to fall » .

Strecker declared that after hearing about the aryanisation by Josef Goebbels of several music-publishers (Universal-Edition, Josef Blaha Verlag, Figaro Verlag, Josef Weinberger Verlag and Friedrich Hofmeister Verlag) , he wanted to save at least one Viennese publishing house, namely Bristol Verlag. The perfidious argument of Strecker was that he couldn't be accused of aryanisation because Sobotka wasn't a Jew, but an « Aryan » . Also, part of his defence was his allegation that due to Sobotka's manipulations he had bought an almost worthless business. Or, in Strecker's words : « by being so magnanimous, I had suffered a terrible ordeal » .

Declassified document concerning the USA Property Control case Strecker-Sobotka.

Never in all the letters and accounts did Strecker show a hint of empathy with the Sobotka family who had been forced to flee and had been stripped of its possessions. He was ultimately convicted for high-treason. Heinrich Strecker asked for clemency and, in 1950, after a few years of being ostracised, he was re-integrated and re-habilitated. For 3 decades, he continued his work, public activity and lived in the Villa Strecker with his 3rd wife Erika, who is 45 years his junior.

Austria gradually comes to terms with its Nazi past.

In 2013, Austrian president Heinz Fischer said :

« The crimes of Hitler's 3rd Reich could not have taken place without the help of the “ countless perpetrators, accomplices, informants and Aryanisers ” who worked as cogs in the Nazi machine. »

Heinrich Strecker (geboren 24. Februar 1893 in Wien ; gestorben 28. Juni 1981 in Baden bei Wien) war ein österreichischer Komponist von Operetten und Wienerliedern.

Heinrich Strecker war der Sohn des aus Laibach stammenden Heinrich Georg Strecker, Schneidermeister in Wien-Margareten, und dessen aus Wien gebürtigen Ehefrau Theresia. Ab dem sechsten Lebensjahr wuchs Strecker bei seiner Großmutter in Wien auf, von wo er nach deren Tod zu seinem Vater nach Aachen zog, der dort eine Stellung als Schneidermeister gefunden hatte. Strecker senior schickte seinen Sohn 1903 nach Theux (Belgien) in das Internat des Lazaristenordens, wo er sieben Jahre zur Schule ging. Dort wurde auch seine Begabung für Musik erkannt und sein Interesse dafür geweckt. Am Ende seiner Schulzeit beherrschte Strecker zwölf Instrumente.

Nach eigenem Bekunden, war die Violine sein Lieblingsinstrument, für das er auch die Meisterklasse absolvierte. 1907 konnte Strecker mit seiner ersten Komposition, einem Violinkonzert in A-Dur debütieren. Dieses Stück durfte er noch im selben Jahr dem belgischen König Leopold II. vortragen und wurde dafür auch ausgezeichnet.

1910 kehrte Strecker nach Wien zurück und begann nach der Externisten-Matura in Wels ein Jurastudium an der Universität Wien. Der Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkriegs unterbrach Streckers Studium. Danach widmete sich Strecker ausschließlich der Musik ; er studierte zwei Jahre bei Camillo Horn und komponierte zunächst klassische Werke.

Über Auftragsarbeiten, wie Tanz- und Filmmusik kam er aber schon bald zu den Wienerliedern. Für diese Art von Volksliedern wurde er bekannt ; ebenso für seine Singspiele. Dabei arbeitete er häufig mit Fritz Löhner-Beda, Fritz Gerold, Alfred Steinberg-Frank, Joe Gribitz und Bruno Hardt-Warden zusammen, welche ihm die Liedtexte und die Libretti lieferten.

Am 20. Jänner 1932 erfolgte die Uraufführung seiner Operette Mädel aus Wien am Wiener Bürgertheater. Sein Singspiel Ännchen von Tharau, das Strecker zusammen mit Bruno Hardt-Warden geschaffen hatte, wurde am 21. September 1933 in Breslau uraufgeführt. Auch das Lied Drunt' in der Lobau ... entstammt seiner Feder.

Strecker war 1934 Gauobmann und Landeskulturleiter der im Austrofaschismus verbotenen NSDAP und der Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde Österreichs und somit « von Amts wegen » Mitglied der österreichischen NSDAP. In dieser Funktion wurde er 1936 kurzfristig inhaftiert. Seine Operette Der ewige Walzer kam am 5. Februar 1938 im Staatstheater Bremen zur Uraufführung. Erst nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich erfolgte am 18. Mai 1938 die österreichische Erstaufführung der Operette an der Wiener Volksoper.

Nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs 1938 komponierte Strecker ein Lied mit Klavierbegleitung Deutsch-Österreich ist frei ! und das Lied für Chor und Orchester Wach auf, deutsche Wachau ! Im selben Jahr wurde er Vizepräsident der österreichischen Urheberrechtsgesellschaft AKM. Zu dem von ihm im Jahr 1926 gegründeten Wiener Excelsior-Verlag und den Wiener Bühnenverlag konnte er sich nach 1938 auch noch die Musikverlage Edition Bristol (1941) , Sirius und Europaton durch « Arisierung » aneignen.

Heinrich Strecker lebte ab 1940 in Baden (mit Ausnahme der unmittelbaren Nachkriegszeit) und besaß seit 5. September 1942 in der Marchetstraße 76 die 1846 erbaute Villa, in der heute (2014) die Heinrich-Strecker-Gesellschaft sowie der Musikverlag Heinrich Strecker, Notenantiquariat ihren Sitz haben. Streckers dritte Ehe, mit (der 45 Jahre jüngeren) Erika Eszler, Tochter eines Badener Schuhmachers, ging auf die Bekanntschaft im Jahr 1956 zurück und konnte wegen Streckers laufendem Scheidungsverfahren erst 1978 legitimiert werden. Die Witwe veranstaltet im Park der Villa Strecker jährlich ein an ihren Ehemann erinnerndes Konzert.

Eine der letzten Würdigungen Streckers durch die Stadt Baden war die Einrichtung eines in das Kaiser-Franz-Josef-Museum (Hochstraße Nr. 51) integrierten Heinrich-Strecker-Stüberls, das unter diesem Namen bis März 2013 Bestand hatte.

Heinrich Streckers Grabstätte befindet sich auf dem Helenenfriedhof in Baden.

Heinrich Strecker wurde am 24. Februar 1893 im 5. Wiener Gemeindebezirk geboren, im Lazaristenkloster in Theux in Belgien erzogen. An dieser Schule wurde der Grundstein zu seiner musikalischen Laufbahn gelegt. Er erlernte 12 Musikinstrumente, absolvierte an der Musikschule die Meisterklasse für Violine, schrieb mit 14 Jahren sein erstes Violinkonzert in A-Dur, das er dem damaligen belgischen König vortragen durfte und dafür eine hohe Auszeichnung erhielt. 1910 nach Wien zurückgekehrt, begann er Jura zu studieren, nachdem er vorher in Wels die Externistenmatura abgelegt hatte.

Danach widmete sich Strecker ausschliesslich der Musik, studierte zwei Jahre bei Professor Camillo Horn, komponierte anfänglich Klassisches, aber die Wiener Musik, besonders das Wiener Lied, die Operette und das Singspiel haben seinen Ruf geschaffen.

Das Gesamtschaffen von Heinrich Strecker umfasst nicht weniger als über 350, mit Opus-Zahlen versehene Werke, der Grossteil davon sind Volkskompositionen, das heißt Lieder der verschiedensten Genres. Seine größten Erfolge feierte er auf dem Gebiet des Wienerliedes und der Operette. Melodien wie « Drunt in der Lobau » , « Das war in Petersdorf » , « Ja, ja der Wein ist gut » , « Ja, hätt ma's net, so tät ma's net » , « Sing mir das Lied noch einmal » sind weltbekannte Beispiele dieses Genres. Die Operetten « Mädels aus Wien » , « Der ewige Walzer » , « Ännchen von Tharau » erlebten und erleben hunderte Aufführungen.

Über 20 Revuen wie « Lorelei » , « Erzherzog Johann » , « Die Kleine vom Zirkus » entstammen seiner Feder. Filmmusik « Narren im Schnee » , « Meine Tochter lebt in Wien » , « Vier Mädels aus der Wachau » und jede Art von Wiener Tanzweisen vom Marsch bis zum Walzer runden seinen musikalischen Einfallsreichtum ab.

Die Fertigstellung seiner letzten Operette « Honeymoon » , durfte Strecker noch erleben. « Honeymoon » ist die vollständige Überarbeitung einer alten Vorlage, der Operette « Küsse im Mai » , die in der Welt eines Bienenstaates spielt. Auf Initiative der Witwe des Komponisten, Frau Regulares Rat Erika Strecker, fand die Uraufführung am 30. Juni

2002 in Baden bei Wien, 21 Jahre nach dem Ableben des Komponisten, statt. Für sein Schaffen erhielt Strecker hohe Auszeichnungen und viele Ehrenmitgliedschaften. Nach einem Herzinfarkt verstarb Prof. Heinrich Strecker am 28. Juni 1981 in Baden.

Nach eigenem Bekunden war Heinrich Strecker seit 1933, also noch vor dem « Anschluß » Österreichs, Mitglied der NSDAP und bekleidete in der Folgezeit und andere den Posten des « Gau-Obmanns der N.S. Kulturgemeinde Wien » . In dieser Funktion wurde er 1936 kurzfristig inhaftiert. Von seiner damaligen politischen Gesinnung zeugen von ihm als « Kampflieder » bezeichnete Werke wie « Wach auf, deutsche Wachau » , « Deutsche Frau » und « Deutsch-Österreich ist frei » .

Wie viele andere Künstler seiner Generation bemühte sich auch Heinrich Strecker um Erfolg im nationalsozialistischen Kulturbetrieb, was ihm mit seiner dem Zeitgeist der 1930er Jahre entsprechenden Operette « Ännchen von Tharau » (1933) am ehesten gelang.

Seine wirtschaftliche Absicherung über seine (Neben-)Tätigkeit als Musikverleger (« Wiener Excelsior-Verlag » und « Wiener Bühnenverlag ») versuchte Strecker durch den Ankauf anderer Verlage auszubauen. Bei der Übernahme der Konkurrenzunternehmen « Edition Bristol » , « Sirius » und « Europaton » ist nach derzeitiger Quellenlage von einem Erwerb im Rahmen der sogenannten « Arisierung » auszugehen.

Seit Jahren bemüht sich die Heinrich Strecker Gesellschaft um eine möglichst genaue Aufarbeitung des Zeitabschnittes zwischen 1933 und 1945 in Streckers Biographie und nimmt wissenschaftlich abgesicherte Ergänzungen gerne entgegen. Um dabei gleichzeitig Streckers künstlerischen Beitrag zum österreichischen Kulturerbe zu erhalten, plädiert die Heinrich Strecker Gesellschaft für eine sachliche Trennung von Person und Werk des Komponisten, so wie diese auch bei vergleichbaren Künstlerpersönlichkeiten jener Jahre akzeptiert worden ist. Insbesondere soll Streckers Leistung um die formale und inhaltliche Weiterentwicklung der Musik-Gattungen « Operette » und « Wiener Musik/Wienerlied » gewürdigt und weitergegeben werden.

Maison d'édition Josef Weinberger

Josef Weinberger is synonymous with popular musical theater. In 1885, Josef Weinberger and Carl Hofbauer started an art and music store in Vienna, but 5 years later, Weinberger set-up on his own. He saw the potential, in publishing and licensing, of the craze for Operetta, and made a connection with Johann Strauß II. Within a few years, all the great Operetta composers were his clients : Johann Strauß II, Carl Millöcker, Carl Zeller, Emmerich Kálmán, Oscar Straus, Robert Stolz, and Leo Fall. He even provided licensing services for the last great Viennese Operetta composer, Franz Lehár, who published through his own company, « Glocken Verlag » .

The firm expanded quickly, opening branches in Paris (1885) and Leipzig (1889) where they worked with Friedrich Hofmeister. They took an active part in setting-up a trade association, « AKM » (Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger » ; Society of authors, composers and publishers) in 1897. Then, in 1901, they participated in the founding of Universal-Edition in Vienna, providing them space in their premises until 1914.

The founder died in 1928 leaving the firm to his daughters Katharina and Margarethe Weinberger, for whom the founder's nephew Otto Blau (1893-1980) acted as manager. Blau could see the worsening situation for Jewish businesses in central Europe and, wisely, set-up a branch in London in 1936. After Adolf Hitler's « Anschluß » , in 1938, the firm was confiscated and given to Sikorski of Berlin, with the name « Doktor Hans C. Sikorski KG Berlin » , as was Anton J. Benjamin in Hamburg. Blau had an eventful war, being interned for a time in United Kingdom as an « enemy alien on the Isle of Man » (as were 2 members of the future Amadeus String Quartet) and, later, being deported to Australia. Fortunately, Blau survived the War, although both Katharina and Margarethe Weinberger died in 1941. Blau rebuilt the firm from 1947, and even continued to expand, opening a branch in Frankfurt and taking-over Octavia Music Co., Ltd.

In the last 70 years, each branch of the firm has independently found opportunities in its local market. For example, the British branch has gone into music for the media, opening a production music library, JW Media Music, Ltd. , and it also represents the Broadway publisher Music Theatre International, licensing their shows in Europe.

Josef Weinberger founded his publishing business in Vienna in 1885. Through an association with Johann Strauß II, he began licensing performances of Strauß's Operettas. Licensing stage-works has been a vital part of our work ever since and the principal Viennese Operetta composers are represented in our catalogue : Strauß II, Millöcker, Zeller, Kálmán, Oscar Straus, Stolz and Fall. We have administered the copyrights of Franz Lehár for many years for Lehár's own company, « Glocken Verlag » .

We have expanded into several other musical genres over the years : contemporary classical, light orchestral, educational, brass and military band, and religious. Our associated production music library, JW Media Music Ltd, is a leader in its field, while our sister companies in Vienna and Frankfurt have developed repertoire for their own respective markets.

Today, our theatre catalogue spans the Century, from Viennese Operettas to British musicals of the 1990's. It spans the globe too, through our representation for the United Kingdom and other European territories of the prestigious Broadway show catalogues of Music Theatre International. 1998 saw another development, our expansion into the arena of the play with the acquisition of rights in the stage-works of the Hungarian playwright Ferenc Molnár.

1885 eröffnete Josef Weinberger in Wien eine « Kunst- und Musikalienhandlung » . Wenig später folgten Verlagsgründungen in Leipzig und Paris. 1897 schloß er den ersten Verlagsvertrag mit dem jungen Gustav Mahler. In den folgenden Jahren erschienen Mahlers Symphonien Nr. 1-3, das « Klagende Lied » und die « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » im Druck. 1901 war Josef Weinberger entscheidend an der Gründung des Wiener Verlages Universal-Edition beteiligt.

Bis zu seinem Tod 1928 konnte Weinberger den Verlagskatalogen weitere klingende Namen hinzufügen, darunter Johann Strauß II, Emmerich Kálmán, Franz Lehár, Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari, Erich Wolfgang Korngold.

Im « Dritten Reich » wurden Verlage jüdischer Eigentümer systematisch enteignet, « arische » Werke anderen Verlagen einverleibt. Otto Blau, der Neffe des Verlagsgründers, hatte zwar 1936 eine Firma in London gegründet, doch die « Arisierung » führte unweigerlich zur Zerschlagung des Wiener und des Leipziger Hauses. Nach Kriegsende stellte Blau sich zusammen mit dem Wiener Johann Michel der mühevollen Aufgabe, das Verlagsgeschäft auf dem Kontinent neu aufzubauen. Neben Wien nahm man 1953 auch in Deutschland wieder die Arbeit auf, neuer Verlagssitz wurde hier Frankfurt-am-Main.

Von herausragender Bedeutung ist die enge Partnerschaft mit dem Glocken Verlag, die 1964 begründet werden konnte. Seither ist Weinberger weltweit mit der Administration und Auswertung nahezu aller Werke des Komponisten Franz Lehár betraut.

Operette, Oper und Musical sind bis heute die Säulen unseres Verlagsprogramms, doch auch konzertante Werke von Mahler bis Tarkmann nehmen einen wichtigen Platz ein. In Kooperation mit Weinberger London werten wir die amerikanischen Concert Libraries von Music Theatre International (MTI) und der « amerikanischen » Werke Kurt Weills aus. Unsere Frankfurter Tochter Heros Musikverlag verlegt Instrumentalschulen wie die « Schule der Rockgitarre » und vertritt den italienischen Traditionsverlag Casa Musicale Sonzogno. Mit Ring Musik betreiben wir zudem seit 1964 eine eigene Musikproduktion für Film, Fernsehen und Werbung.

Otto Blau

In January 1940, Doctor Otto Blau, a director of the firm Josef Weinberger, musical publishers, had written to K. A. Wright, then, Assisrant Director of Music, suggesting that Gustav Mahler's « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » should be broadcast that summer for, if Mahler had been alive on 7 July 1940, he would have been 80 years old. (Letter of 30 January 1940.)

Wright replied on 8 February 1940 :

« I am afraid that we cannot keep pace with birthdays under War-time conditions - let alone hypothetical ones, i.e. , birthdays people would have had had they remained alive. But Sir Adrian Boult tells me to say that he, among others, is very fond of these songs and that some time or other we shall certainly be doing them again, but at the moment we cannor say when. »

...

Otto Blau, Musikverleger, Jurist : geboren am 1. März 1893 in Wien, Österreich-Ungarn (heute : Österreich) ; gestorben am 27. Januar 1980 in Lugano (Tessin) , Schweiz.

Otto Blau nahm 1914 bis zu seiner Verwundung am Ersten Weltkrieg teil. Sein Jurastudium an der Universität Wien schloß er 1919 mit der Promotion ab. Nachdem er zunächst als Jurist in einem Chemiewerk gearbeitet hatte, holte sein Onkel, Josef Weinberger, der selbst keinen Nachfolger in der Firma hatte, ihn 1922 als Leiter der Bühnenabteilung und bald darauf als Einzelprokuristen in den auf Operetten spezialisierten Bühnen- und Musikalienverlag Josef Weinberger. Nach dem Tod des Onkels übernahm er 1928 die alleinige Leitung des Verlags. Er setzte sich für die Verlängerung der Urheberschutzfrist auf 50 Jahre ein und wurde Vorstandsmitglied in der AKM (Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger) sowie Vertreter der Sektion Musik-, Bühnenverlag und -vertrieb in der seit Anfang 1937 bestehenden berufsständischen Organisation Zwangsgilde der Wiener Buch-, Kunst- und Musikalienhändler.

Kurz nach dem « Anschluß » 1938 wurde die AKM « gleichgeschaltet » und Otto Blau seines Vorstandspostens enthoben. Der Weinberger Verlag wurde im Juni 1938 durch die Cautio Treuhand GmbH und Hans C. Sikorski als deren Treuhänder « arisiert ». Der Versuch, einen Scheinverkauf der Firma an Carl Günther in Leipzig zu arrangieren, scheiterte. Bereits an die 1936 in London gegründete Firma Josef Weinberger Ltd. übertragene Rechte mußten nach Abschluß des « Arisierungsvertrags » an die Wiener Firma zurückübertragen werden. Otto Blau ging im September 1938 nach Großbritannien ins Exil. Es gelang ihm nicht, die beiden Töchter des Firmengründers Josef Weinberger, Margarethe und Katharina Weinberger, ebenfalls nach Großbritannien zu bringen. Durch ihre Krankheit war ihnen vermutlich die Aufnahme in einem Asylland verwehrt. Sie wurden 1941 in der Wiener Heil- und Pflegeanstalt Am Steinhof Opfer der Euthanasie. Otto Blau erhielt in Großbritannien als « feindlicher Ausländer » keine Arbeitserlaubnis. Nach einer zeitweisen Internierung auf der Isle of Man wurde er im September 1940 nach Australien deportiert, wo er als Dolmetscher arbeitete und versuchte, mit der Musikverlagsbranche in Kontakt zu bleiben. Auf telegraphischem Wege gelang es ihm, Verhandlungen über Bühnen- und Filmproduktionen in den USA zu führen, so etwa über eine Bearbeitung der « Fledermaus » durch Max Reinhardt und Erich Wolfgang Korngold, die unter dem Titel « Rosalinda » 1942 im New Yorker 44th Street Theatre sowie an anderen Bühnen aufgeführt wurde. In London realisierte Blau später noch weitere Bearbeitungen von Erich Wolfgang Korngold (« A Night in Venice », 1944 ; « Gay Rosalind », 1945) . Darüber hinaus nahm er 1943 mit dem aus Leipzig nach London geflohenen Musikverleger Adolf Aber, der für den britischen Musikverlag Novello arbeitete, Kontakt auf. Er machte den Vorschlag, die Vertretung von Novello für Australien zu übernehmen. Der britische Verlag lehnte das Ansuchen allerdings ab.

Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs ging Otto Blau nach Großbritannien zurück. Die Ausgangslage für den Bühnen- und Musikalienverlag Weinberger war jedoch schwierig. Der Wiener Verlag wurde erst 1949 nach einem Restitutionsverfahren zurückgegeben, Tantiemen waren während des Kriegs nicht ausgezahlt worden, und es gab kaum finanzielle Reserven. Auch waren Wiener Operetten im Vergleich zu US-amerikanischen Musicals in Großbritannien wenig gefragt. Dennoch begann Otto Blau parallel zum Wiederaufbau der Wiener Firma damit, Weinberger in London zu etablieren. Diese Aufbauarbeit beinhaltete vor allem eine Anpassung des Repertoires an die Musikkultur des Gastlandes. Die von Weinberger verlegten Operetten mußten nicht nur ins Englische übersetzt, sondern auch an die orchestralen sowie stimmlichen Gegebenheiten der Amateurbühnen, von denen in Großbritannien Operetten aufgeführt wurden, angepasst werden. Weinberger übernahm daneben die Vertretung zahlreicher US-amerikanischer und britischer Musicals und baute einen Katalog in ganz unterschiedlichen Bereichen auf. Dazu zählten Unterhaltungsmusik für Rundfunkorchester, liturgische Musik, ernste Konzertmusik, aber auch Backgroundmusiken für Film und Fernsehen auf

Schallplatten. Darüber hinaus übernahm Otto Blau in Großbritannien für die Erben Viktor Albertis die Leitung von Octava Music Co. Ltd. sowie für Franz Lehár die Leitung des Glocken-Verlags. Otto Blau zog sich 1962 aus dem aktiven Geschäft zurück und lebte anschließend in der Schweiz. Er starb am 27. Januar 1980 in Lugano.

Maison d'édition Friedrich Hofmeister

Friedrich Hofmeister opened a music-shop in March 1807, and started selling music by 1808. (« Franz Liszt and His World », Gibbs & Gooley, Princeton University Press, 2006 ; page 256.) It later purchased Whistling of Leipzig (1829) (apparently different from F. Whistling) , Laue & Christiani of Berlin (1832 and 1840) and Brüggemann of Halberstadt (1832) .

« Hoffmeister Monatsbericht » - Monthly publication started in 1829 giving details of publisher issues of over 330,000 titles. The portion through 1900 is now available online, as are all or most more recent volumes through 1947 (the latter through Google Books and at « Hofmeister Monatsberichte » , online at the Austrian National Library) .

In the 20th Century, it bought the rights to many publications of Ernst Chailier and Carl Merseburger.

« Friedrich Hofmeister Musikverlag » (abbreviated to Hofmeister) is a publisher of Classical music, founded by Friedrich Hofmeister in Leipzig, in 1807. Early listings included composers Ludwig van Beethoven, Frédéric Chopin and Franz Liszt. Hofmeister was the 1st to publish Gustav Mahler's 2nd Symphony. Pedagogical works, such as a « Violinenschule » of Hubert Ries (1841) , are still in use. The company sells sheet music internationally, including Asia and America.

Friedrich Hofmeister, born in 1787, 1st founded a music-store in Leipzig in April, 1807. Early listings include composers : Ludwig van Beethoven, Luigi Cherubini, Franz Anton Hoffmeister, Carl Maria von Weber, Johann Nepomuk Hummel, John Field and Franz Liszt.

In the early years, he published a balance of music by popular composers, pedagogical material, and young composers such as : Robert Schumann, Frédéric Chopin, Clara Wieck-Schumann and Hector Berlioz. Pedagogical volumes included a « Gitarrenschule » (guitar) by Johann Traugott Lehmann (1811) ; the « Violinenschule » (violin) of Hubert Ries (1841) is still in use, and several volumes of etudes published in the 19th Century.

Hofmeister's early publishing practices sometimes brought him into conflict with composers. In 1833, Hector Berlioz objected to publication by Hofmeister of an un-authorized 4 handed piano version of his « les Franc-Juges » Overture, saying :

« Your arranger has butchered my score, clipped its wings, and sewn it back-up again such that I find a ridiculous monster. »

Although Hofmeister maintained friendly as well as professional relations with Franz Liszt for many years, in 1839, his company published a pirated edition of 12 « Études » by Liszt, which led to later disputes with the composer.

After 1847, control of the company largely devolved onto Hofmeister's 2 sons, Adolph Moritz Hofmeister and Wilhelm Hofmeister.

Hofmeister was one of 4 major publishers to disseminate the music of Gustav Mahler and the 1st to publish Mahler's 2nd Symphony. Hofmeister also published several songs in the early 20th Century by composer Eugen Haile.

In the 20th Century, the company had various owners until its appropriation by East-Germany after World War II. It remains in operation today, with branches in Frankfurt and Leipzig.

The company supports projects of regional importance, such as « Edition Denkmäler Mitteldeutscher Barockmusik » . The collection of works by composers from Saxony, Thuringia and Saxony-Anhalt started with a « Passion » Cantata as a « pasticcio » of Johann Christoph Altnikol, Johann Sebastian Bach, Carl Heinrich Graun, Johann Kuhnau and Georg Philipp Telemann in 1997, and includes Gottfried Heinrich Stölzel's « Christmas » Cantatas (2007) and the « Bockes-Passion » (2011) .

Hofmeister kept the tradition of the publishing the works of new composers, including :

Harald Banter, Vytautas Barkauskas, Árni Egilsson, Elisenda Fábregas, Christoph Förster, Bernd Franke, Patrick Hagen, Walter Thomas Heyn, C. René Hirschfeld, Stephan König, Ralf Kubicek, Claus Kühnl, Martin Kürschner, Rainer Lischka, Rafael Lukjanik, Peter Mai, Cecilia McDowall, Kelly-Marie Murphy, Gisbert Näther, Loretta K. Notareschi, Lorenzo Palomo, Hannes Pohlit, Kateřina Růžičková, Stefan Schäfer, Kurt Schwaen, Siegfried Thiele, Karl Ottomar Treibmann, Siegfried Tiefensee and Graham Waterhouse.

On 20th April 1807, Friedrich Hofmeister (1782-1864) announced the founding of a music dealership and, at the same time, opened a music lending library and a music publishing house, associated with a book publishers. In the same year, Hofmeister founded a copyright office, through which he became the Leipzig representative to such eminent foreign publishers as Hug & Co (Zürich) , Ricordi & Co. (Milan) as well as August Cranz (Hamburg) . A few years later, he announced he would additionally be dealing with portraits of musicians as well as with pianos from his own workshops.

Friedrich Hofmeister gained his 1st experience in the field of publishing serving as apprentice to Breitkopf & Härtel and, subsequently, as assistant in the « Bureau de Musique » which was founded in 1800 by Franz Anton Hoffmeister and Ambrosius Kühnel. In February 1852, Friedrich Hofmeister transferred the publishing house to his sons Adolph Moritz (1802-1870) and Wilhelm Friedrich Benedict (1824-1877) , who had already been helping him for a number of years. It was mainly Adolph Hofmeister who continued the business, whilst Wilhelm became increasingly involved in natural sciences, leaving Leipzig in 1863 to take-up a professorial post in botany in Heidelberg and, in 1872, a similar post in Tübingen. He went on to become one of the leading natural scientists of his day.

The business was handed down through Wilhelm Hofmeister to the grandson of the founder, Carl Wilhelm Günther (1878-1956) . In 1952, illegally dispossessed of the business by the SED government, he fled East-Germany and set about re-establishing the publishing house in Frankfurt. The business continued to operate in Leipzig as a « Volkseigener Betrieb » (« VEB Friedrich Hofmeister Musikverlag ») , a so-called « publicly owned company » .

Following the death of Eva Günther, in 1964, the direction of the publishing house passed to Karl Heinz Schwarze. Initially, he ran the business from Frankfurt and, from 1964, from Hofheim in Taunus.

In July 1996, he definitively re-established Leipzig as the headquarters of the publishing house.

Since 1998, this traditional Leipzig-based firm has been led by his daughter Stefanie Clement.

Friedrich Hofmeister : a versatile individual

Friedrich Hofmeister was an exceptionally versatile individual and he became a spokesman for the general interests of publishers and music-dealers. He was an energetic protagonist in the enforcement of copyright laws. It was on his initiative that the so-called Conventional-Acte came into being, a safeguard against illegal re-prints. It was signed by all the leading music-publishers of the day. At the same time, he founded the Union of Music Publishers against Musical Reprints, which later developed into the « Deutsche Musikverleger-Verband » (Union of German Publishers) or DMV. Friedrich Hofmeister became secretary of the Union.

The name Hofmeister is closely linked with developments in the field of German bibliography. In 1819, he published a few additions to the « Handbook of Musical Literature » , which was edited by Carl Friedrich Whistling. From 1829 onwards, he published monthly reports, together with abstracts, as well as the yearly catalogues of printed music and musical literature, which continued to appear up to 1990 (from 1943 in partnership with the « Deutsche Bücherei, Leipzig ») . Thus, it was thanks to Friedrich Hofmeister that Leipzig became a centre of musical bibliography.

Any assessment of Hofmeister would be incomplete without a consideration of his personal qualities. Beyond his business associations, he built-up friendships with composers which often lasted over a period of many years. In publishing their early works, he provided younger composers with the means for achieving wider recognition. In his free time, Hofmeister found relaxation in his botanical garden which he personally laid-out in Reudnitz and which was later opened to the public.

Core areas of the Hofmeister Music-Publisher

Even in the early publisher's catalogues, virtually all the eminent composers of the day were represented - among them : Ludwig van Beethoven, Luigi Cherubini, Franz Anton Hoffmeister, Carl Maria von Weber, Johann Nepomuk Hummel, John Field, Frédéric Chopin, Antonín Dvořák and Franz Liszt. Among the lesser-known composers also represented are names such as : Albert Gottlieb Methfessel, Friedrich Kuhlau, Franz Wieck, Carl Czerny, Friedrich Kalkbrenner, Ignaz Moscheles, Theodor Kirchner and Heinrich Marschner.

The early works of Robert Schumann, Clara Wieck-Schumann, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Charles Bériot, Hector Berlioz and, at a later date, of Antonín Dvořák appeared for the 1st time in Germany with the Friedrich Hofmeister Publishers.

From its very beginnings, Hofmeister Publishers placed particular emphasis on the publishing of special editions for educational purposes, other priorities being chamber music and domestic music making. Numerous tutors and volumes of studies bear witness to this, many of which date from the earliest times of the publishers. The 1st Guitar tutor of Johann Traugott Lehmann appeared as early as 1811. Tutors for other instruments followed and appeared in numerous editions. The « Violin Tutor » of Hubert Ries, which 1st appeared in 1841, is still in use today. Many sets of studies published in the 19th Century still form part of the standard teaching literature.

Founder shows foresight

The fact that the profile of Hofmeister Publishers has never significantly changed testifies to the foresight of the founder. The repertoire has since widened, whereby the respective fashions of the age have always influenced the type and selection of the editions and the attempts have always been made to realize new ideas.

Songs accompanied by plucked instruments, for instance, enjoyed great popularity during the 1st 10 years of the 20th Century. So also did collections of folk-dances, arrangements for orchestras of folk-instruments as well as collections of songs. Probably the most popular collection, one that is still known today, is « Der Zupfgeigenhansl ». In 1920 alone, the print run reached 120,000 copies.

Today, the catalogue covers virtually every instrument of the orchestra as well as piano, organ, recorder, guitar, mandoline, accordion and a wide selection of choral literature.

Critical 1st editions or new publications take their place beside publications prepared from a didactic point of view for pedagogical purposes and a wide variety of performing literature for domestic music making and for the concert-hall.

Among the editors and arrangers associated with the publishing house are eminent instrumentalists, pedagogues and musicologists, amongst others, Günter Angerhöfer, Sergio Azzolini, Peter Bruns, Peter Damm, Tobias Glöckler, Ludwig Güttler, Klaus Hertel, Werner Seltmann, Klaus Trumpf and William Waterhouse.

Particular emphasis has been placed on orchestral studies for all instruments. For many decades, these have been known in the musical world as « Hofmeister Orchesterstudien » (Hofmeister Orchestral Studies) . Recently, a new project within this field has been initiated : a chronologically arranged collection of orchestral studies for bassoon taken from works from the international repertoire from Bach up to the present-day, hitherto unique in scale and conception.

Press and releases

Since 1997, Hofmeister has published the series « Denkmäler mitteldeutscher Barockmusik » (monuments of Baroque music central Germany) , edited by the « Ständigen Konferenz Mitteldeutsche Barockmusik in Sachsen, Sachsen-Anhalt und Thüringen » (commission for central German Baroque music in Saxony, Saxon-Anhalt, and Thuringia) . These representative editions contribute to the dissemination of hitherto un-published works from central Germany and are intended to stimulate musicological and practical activities within the cultural heritage.

A similar project is the series « Music from the Court of Rheinsberg », which was begun in 1999. The aim of this series is to make publicly available compositions from the musical life of the Court of Rheinsberg in « Urtext » editions. The series began with the works of Christoph Schaffrath.

It is not just the musical past, however, which characterizes the latest work of the publishers. Just as the founder of the publishing house once represented the composers of his day, so Hofmeister publishers are actively involved with music of the present-day.

Friedrich Hofmeister (geboren 24. Januar 1782 in Strehla ; gestorben 30. September 1864 in Reudnitz) war ein deutscher Verleger. Er eröffnete im Jahr 1807 eine Musikalienhandlung aus der ein eigener Musikverlag in Leipzig hervorging. In den 1950er Jahren wurde aus dem Verlag ein Volkseigener Betrieb (VEB) .

Kenntnisse über die Verlagstätigkeit hatte Hofmeister als Lehrling bei Breitkopf & Härtel und anschließend als Gehilfe im Bureau de Musique, das 1800 von Franz Anton Hoffmeister (1754-1812) und Ambrosius Kühnel gegründet worden war, erworben.

Friedrich Hofmeister setzte sich nachdrücklich für allgemeine Belange der Verleger und Musikalienhändler ein. Er war ein energischer Verfechter des Urheberschutzes. Auf sein Betreiben wurde im Jahr 1829 die « Conventional-Acte » zum Schutz gegen unerlaubten Nachdruck von allen führenden Musikverlegern der Zeit unterzeichnet und gleichzeitig der Verein der Musikverleger gegen musikalischen Nachdruck gegründet, aus dem später der Deutsche Musikverleger-Verband (DMV) hervorging. Friedrich Hofmeister wurde Sekretär des Vereins.

Untrennbar verbunden ist der Name Hofmeister auch mit der Herausbildung des deutschen Bibliophileswesens : Seit 1819 druckte er zunächst einige Nachträge zu dem von Carl Friedrich Whistling herausgegebenen Handbuch der musikalischen Literatur, und (anknüpfend daran) publizierte er seit 1829 die Musikalisch-Literarischen Monatsberichte sowie deren Zusammenfassungen, die Jahresverzeichnisse der Musikalien und Musikschriften, die noch bis 1990 erschienen sind (ab 1943 in Partnerschaft mit der Deutschen Bücherei, Leipzig) . Leipzig wurde somit durch Friedrich Hofmeister zum Zentrum der Musikbibliographie.

Der Verlag gab ab der vierten Auflage das Liederbuch Der Zupfgeigenhansl heraus, dessen 10. Auflage von 1913 heute noch die Grundlage von Nachdrucken darstellt.

Zu vielen Komponisten baute Hofmeister über die geschäftlichen Kontakte hinaus Freundschaften auf, die jahrelang währten ; jungen Komponisten gab er durch die Veröffentlichung ihrer Frühwerke die Chance, bekannt zu werden. Hofmeister legte in Reudnitz einen Botanischen Garten an, den er der Öffentlichkeit zugänglich machte. Sein Sohn ist der Botaniker Wilhelm Hofmeister (1824-1877) , nach dem in Leipzig die Hofmeisterstraße benannt ist. Wie später auch der Sohn wurde Friedrich Hofmeister 1825 in die Leipziger Freimaurerloge « Apollo » aufgenommen.

Der Friedrich Hofmeister Musikverlag ist ein Verlag für klassische Musik, der 1807 von Friedrich Hofmeister in Leipzig gegründet wurde. Der Verlag ist bis heute in den Händen der Familie des Firmengründers geblieben. Zum Verlag gehört ein Musiklabel für klassische Musik. Außer in Deutschland ist der Verlag im Musikalienhandel auch international tätig, und andere in Europa, Asien oder Amerika.

Am 20. April 1807 gründete Friedrich Hofmeister im Graphischen Viertel von Leipzig eine Musikalienhandlung und eröffnete gleichzeitig ein Musikalien-Leihinstitut und einen Musikverlag mit angegliedertem Buchverlag. Im gleichen Jahr gründete Hofmeister eine Kommissionsabteilung, durch die er Verlage des In- und Auslandes wie Hug & Co. (Zürich) , Ricordi & Co. (Mailand) , August Cranz (Hamburg) in Leipzig vertreten konnte. Einige Jahre kam der Handel mit Musikerporträts und Klavieren aus eigener Fabrikation hinzu.

Kenntnisse über die Verlagstätigkeit hatte Hofmeister als Lehrling bei Breitkopf & Härtel und anschließend als Gehilfe im « Bureau de Musique » , das 1800 von Franz Anton Hoffmeister und Ambrosius Kühnel gegründet worden war, erworben. 1852 übertrug er den Verlag seinen Söhnen Adolph Moritz (1802-1870) und Wilhelm Friedrich Benedict (1824-1877) . Vor allem Adolph Hofmeister führte in der Zukunft den Verlag weiter, während sich Wilhelm zunehmend den Naturwissenschaften widmete, 1863 Leipzig verließ, um eine Professur für Botanik in Heidelberg und ab 1872 in Tübingen anzunehmen. Er wurde zu einem der führenden Naturwissenschaftler seiner Zeit.

Über die Nachkommen Wilhelm Hofmeisters vererbte sich das Geschäft an den Urenkel seines Gründers, an Carl Wilhelm Günther (1878-1956) . Günther wurde 1952 durch die DDR-Regierung enteignet, floh in den Westen und begann in Frankfurt-am-Main mit dem Wiederaufbau des Verlages. Gleichzeitig bestand die Firma in Leipzig als Volkseigener Betrieb (VEB) Friedrich Hofmeister Musikverlag weiter.

Der westdeutsche Zweig des Hofmeisterverlags wurde in Hofheim am Taunus weitergeführt. 1964 ging der Verlag an den Erben Karl Heinz Schwarze über, der ihn zunächst in Frankfurt und ab 1964 in Hofheim am Taunus weiterführte. 1992 erfolgte die Restitution des ehemaligen VEB-Verlages. 1996 kehrte der Verlag wieder an seinen Gründungsort Leipzig (Graphisches Viertel) zurück. Seit 1998 ist Stefanie Clement (« née » Schwarze) Geschäftsführerin des Verlages.

Erstmals in Deutschland erschienen hier und andere die Frühwerke von Robert Schumann, Clara Wieck-Schumann, Friedrich Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Charles Bériot, Hector Berlioz und später Antonín Dvořák. Von Anfang an war ein Verlagsschwerpunkt (neben der Edition von Werken der Haus- und Kammermusik) spezielle Ausgaben für den Unterricht zu veröffentlichen. Bereits 1811 erschien die erste Gitarrenscheule von Johann Traugott Lehmann. Weitere Schulen für andere Instrumente folgten und erschienen in zahlreichen Auflagen. Die Violinenscheule von Hubert Ries, Erstaussgabe 1841, ist noch heute in Gebrauch. Auch zahlreiche Etüdenwerke, die im 19. Jahrhundert verlegt wurden, gehören noch immer zur Standardliteratur für die Instrumentalausbildung.

In ersten Jahrzehnten des 20. Jahrhunderts wurde das Verlagsprogramm um Lieder mit Begleitung von Zupfinstrumenten erweitert, ebenso kamen Volkstanzsammlungen, Arrangements für Volksinstrumentenorchester und Liedersammlungen hinzu. Die bekannteste Sammlung ist « Der Zupfgeigenhansl », der in der Jugendbewegung einen großen Stellenwert einnahm. Allein 1920 wurde er in einer Auflage von 120.000 Exemplaren gedruckt.

Heute umfasst das Verlagsprogramm Ausgaben für Orchesterinstrumente sowie für Klavier, Orgel, Blockflöte, Gitarre, Mandoline und Akkordeon und Chorliteratur. Quellenkritische Erst- beziehungsweise Neudrucke stehen neben didaktisch aufbereiteten Publikationen für den Unterricht und Spielliteratur für das häusliche Musizieren und zum Konzertieren. Einen Schwerpunkt bilden die Orchesterstudien für alle Instrumente, die als « Hofmeister Orchesterstudien » erscheinen. Weiterhin erschien eine chronologisch geordnete Sammlung von Orchesterstudien für Fagott aus Werken der Weltliteratur von Johann Sebastian Bach bis zur Gegenwart.

Seit 1997 erscheint im Hofmeister Verlag die von der « Ständigen Konferenz Mitteldeutsche Barockmusik in Sachsen, Sachsen-Anhalt und Thüringen eingetragener Verein » herausgegebene Reihe « Denkmäler mitteldeutscher Barockmusik ». Ein ähnliches Projekt ist die seit 1999 erscheinende Ausgabenreihe « Rheinsberger Hofmusik », die Kompositionen aus dem Rheinsberger Musikleben in Urtext-Editionen allgemein zugänglich macht. Begonnen wurde mit Werken von Christoph Schaffrath.

Hofmeister verlegt zeitgenössische Musik von Komponisten wie Harald Banter, Vytautas Barkauskas, Árni Egilsson, Elisenda Fábregas, Christoph Förster, Bernd Franke, Patrick Hagen, Walter Thomas Heyn, C. René Hirschfeld, Stephan König, Ralf Kubicek, Claus Kühnl, Martin Kürschner, Rainer Lischka, Rafael Lukjanik, Peter Mai, Cecilia McDowall, Kelly-Marie Murphy, Gisbert Näther, Loretta K. Notareschi, Lorenzo Palomo, Hannes Pohlit, Kateřina Růžicková, Stefan Schäfer, Kurt Schwaen, Siegfried Thiele, Karl Ottomar Treibmann, Siegfried Tiefensee and Graham Waterhouse.

Maison d'édition Bristol

Der Stifter Herbert Uhl wurde am 9. Dezember 1907 in Hamburg geboren und verstarb am 9. November 1997 in Baden-Baden (Baden-Württemberg). Sein Vater Conrad Uhl war ein bekannter Hotelier, seine Mutter eine gebürtige US-Amerikanerin. Nach Kinder- und Jugendjahren in Berlin, Hamburg, in den USA und in der Schweiz (während des I. Weltkrieges), ging Herbert Uhl 1921 nach dem Tode seines Vaters mit seiner Mutter in die Vereinigten Staaten. Er besuchte in Amerika die Highschool und das Dartmouth College in Hanover NH USA. Später zog die Mutter wieder in die Schweiz, wo Herbert Uhl an der Handelshochschule Sankt Gallen studierte und später in London in einer Bank volontierte. Ab 1928 lebte er in Berlin, wo er seine Frau Ruth Lenzian kennen lernte und 1932 heiratete. Und andere war Herbert Uhl in dieser Zeit auch als Verleger tätig (zum Beispiel für Riccarda Huch). Dort lebte das Ehepaar bis 1939. Die Kriegereignisse führten zu mehreren Wohnungswechseln, so nach Zürich und 1941 nach Liechtenstein. Nach vielen Jahren mit grösseren Pass-Problemen (weil ihm die Amerikaner seinen Pass nicht mehr verlängerten) konnte er sich in Liechtenstein einbürgern. Er kaufte in Schaan ein Grundstück, baute sein Haus in einem von ihm gepflanzten Park. Er sollte es dann bis zu seinem Lebensende behalten. Später lebte er in Wien und wieder in Zürich, 1979 kehrte er aus Altersgründen in das Land seiner Geburt zurück und wohnte in Baden-Baden, wo seine Frau im Jahre 1988 verstarb.

Bereits 1951 wurde Herbert Uhl Hauptgesellschafter und Geschäftsführer einer 1848 gegründeten Brauerei in Rastatt (Baden-Württemberg). Die nach dem II. Weltkrieg wieder aufgebaute und unter Denkmalschutz stehende Anlage war der Mittelpunkt im Leben des Stifters und ist laut testamentarischer Verfügung Bestandteil der Stiftung. Herbert Uhl hat die bewegte Zeit, in der er lebte, in einer Schrift « Dreimal Brandenburger Tor », 1991 im Battert-Verlag, Baden-Baden erschienen, beschrieben. Das Ehepaar Uhl war besonders tierliebend und wollte mit dieser Stiftung für die Natur etwas Gutes tun.

La maison d'édition Franz Ernst Christoph Leuckart

F.E.C. Leuckart was founded 1782 in Breslau (now, Wrocław) by Franz Ernst Christoph Leuckart (1748-1817). After Leuckart's death in 1817, his widow continued running the business, followed by their 2 children Carl August Ferdinand and Auguste Henriette. They were being supported by the latter's husband Johann Carl Wilhelm Sander (1786-1859). The son Constantin Sander (1826-1905) continued the business, and his name appeared on scores until the 1890's. Throughout the 19th Century, production was vigorous; HMB notes 3,217 items between 1829 and 1900. During the Breslau years, the catalog contained both church music (Hahn) and dances (Lanner), piano pieces (Spindler), violin pieces (Schœn) and songs (Abt, Gumbert, Genee).

The company moved to Leipzig in 1870. Publication of songs (Jael, Franz), piano pieces (Jadassohn, Bendix, Wilm, Hiller) and violin pieces (Schœn, Dont, Becker, Michælis, Ferdinand Ries, Sauret, Saran) continued. In the 20th Century, members of the Sander family managed the company. 1907 saw the acquisition of Heinrich vom Ende's publishing company (of Trier). In 1941, under the Nazi Aryanization policy, the firm took-over Eulenburg. Horst Sander died in captivity in 1945, and his family moved to Munich that year. Despite damage in the War, the firm continued until 1994, although the Sander connection ceased practically in 1945, and legally in 1956.

La maison d'édition Hans C. Sikorski

The corner-stone of the publishing company was laid by Doctor Hans C. Sikorski (1899-1972) in the year 1935, following activities as principle managing director of the « Deutsches Studentenwerk » in Dresden, which he helped to found, as publishing director of the press concern Mosse as well as editor of the renowned journal « Die geistige Arbeit » (The Spiritual Work) published by Walter de Gruyter with the « Neuer Theaterverlag » in Berlin. Already within just a few years, the new theatre and music publishing company had already attained considerable weight in the areas of dance and entertainment music as well as in dramatic and music-dramatic literature. During this period of ever-present political repression, in the cultural sector as well, the young enterprise nonetheless grew rapidly. An additional factor was that numerous, mostly Jewish, owners of publishing companies were forced to sell their enterprises by the National-Socialist regime, some of which were continued by Sikorski (whilst continuing to employ the former owners abroad, in some cases) and were considerably expanded in their catalogues during the course of the ensuing years.

The most serious destruction of the publishers' possessions in Berlin and Leipzig was caused by the bombings of the year 1943. Following interim stations in Bad Aussee and Bad Kissingen, Sikorski set-up its new headquarters in Hamburg in 1946, where, along with Johann August Böhme (Germany's oldest music assortment, founded in 1795), the only part of the enterprise that had remained halfway intact was located. Following detention by the Allies, continuous de-nazification procedures and recovery of its publishing license, Sikorski gave-back the « Aryanized » publishing companies during the course of various restitution procedures and / or re-imbursed their original owners. Many composers of the pre-War period remained true to the publishers ; emigrants such as Hugo Hirsch (« Wer wird denn weinen, wenn man auseinander geht ») and Kurt Schwabach entrusted their works to the publishing company after their return.

STAGMA et GEMA

The « Gesellschaft für musikalische Aufführungs- und mechanische Vervielfältigungsrechte » (Society for musical performing and mechanical reproduction rights), or GEMA, is a State-authorized collecting society and performance rights organization based in Germany, with administrative offices in Berlin and Munich. GEMA represents the usage rights stemming from authors' rights (e.g., mechanical licensing, broadcast licensing, synchronization licensing) for the musical works of those composers, lyricists, and publishers who are members in the organization. It is the only such institution in Germany. Other collecting societies include the « Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger » (AKM) in Austria and SUISA in Switzerland.

Upon coming into effect in January 1902, the Law Concerning Author's Rights to Works of Literature and Musical Art (« Gesetz betreffend das Urheberrecht an Werken der Literatur und der Tonkunst ») set-down in law that the public performance of a musical work required the permission of the author.

The Consortium of German Composers (« Genossenschaft Deutscher Tonsetzer », or GDT) subsequently founded the Institute for Musical Performing Rights (« Anstalt für musikalische Aufführungsrechte », or AFMA) in 1903. This came much later than in other States such as France, where the collecting society SACEM had already been founded in 1851, having its roots in the Agence Centrale, an interest group of musicians and publishers. Founders of the AFMA included Richard Strauß, Hans Sommer and Friedrich Rösch. The GDT was headed by some of the most successful composers of the time, including Engelbert Humperdinck, Georg Schumann and most notably Richard Strauß.

In 1904, the GDT published a memorandum on the spirit and purpose of the AFMA, as there remained a great deal of confusion - as much among musicians as among event promoters and users. A central point of the memo was the following paragraph, most of whose contents now appear in the association rules of GEMA :

« The Institute pursues absolutely no private business purposes. It is only an intermediary agency. It does not collect reserve funds. A trade profit is out of the question. Administrative costs will be deducted from incoming fees, along with a further 10 % contribution to the co-operative's relief fund. All remaining income, down to the last penny, will be distributed to the beneficiary composers, lyricists, and publishers. »

The time after the foundation of the AFMA was quite turbulent.

In 1909, the GDT founded a 2nd society focused exclusively on the exploitation of mechanical reproduction for vinyl records, the Institute for Mechanical-Musical Rights LLC (« Anstalt für mechanisch-musikalische Rechte GmbH », or AMMRE) .

In 1913, the Austrian Society of Authors, Composers, and Music Publishers (« Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger », or AKM) entered the German market and opened a German branch-office.

In 1915, a few members of the GDT split off from the organization and founded GEMA (« Genossenschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte », which is not identical to the present-day GEMA) . One of the founding members was composer Leon Jessel. In 1916, GEMA and AKM's German branch merged into the Association for the Protection of Musical Performing Rights in Germany (« Verband zum Schutze musikalischer Aufführungsrechte für Deutschland ») .

All of this resulted in a situation that had effects contrary to the original interests of authors and promoters as well as users - that is, 2 competing collecting societies.

In 1930, the GDT (in the form of the AFMA) joined with the « Verband » under the label « Verband zum Schutze musikalischer Aufführungsrechte für Deutschland » . However, the business units and facilities of both societies were not impacted by the consolidation. Both collecting societies continued to operate separately - all the while pretending to operate under a unified corporate name.

This came to an end during the 3rd « Reich » with the « Reich » Law regarding the Intermediation of Musical Performance Rights (« Reichsgesetz über die Vermittlung von Musikaufführungsrechten ») . The legislator responsible for this law, Josef Goebbels, did so with the aim of bringing all collecting societies into line and granting them a monopoly position.

On September 28, 1933, the State-Approved Society for the Exploitation of Musical Performing Rights (« Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte », or STAGMA) arose-out of the « Verband zum Schutze musikalischer Aufführungsrechte für Deutschland » and was issued a monopoly on the exercise of musical performing rights. The still-existing AMMRE was annexed into STAGMA, in 1938. The « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Chamber of Music, or RMK) , under the direction of then-president Richard Strauß, stipulated in its guide-lines that, « non-Aryans are categorically not to be viewed as bearers and stewards of German cultural goods » . This amounted to an occupational ban on the approximately 8,000 Jews active in the « Reichsmusikkammer » . STAGMA was tightly enmeshed in the Nazi power structure, and the leading members of STAGMA were die-hard and voluntary Nazis. The CEO of STAGMA was Leo Ritter, who occupied the same position in the original GEMA and was in the habit of giving Adolf Hitler's « Mein Kampf » as a prize to worthy employees.

STAGMA continued its work after the Second World War, but under the title of GEMA (« Gesellschaft für musikalische Aufführungs- und mechanische Vervielfältigungsrechte ») starting from August 24, 1947. Erich Schulze was the chairman and general director from 1947 to 1989, to whom was dedicated the Erich Schulze Fountain in front of the GEMA headquarters in Munich. Starting in 1950, the chairman of the board of directors was Werner Egk. Both Schulze and Egk already occupied leading positions in STAGMA. Albrecht Dümling's book, « Musik hat ihren Wert » (Music has its Value) was published to mark the 100-year anniversary of the 1st collecting society in Germany. This book shed light on the role of the collecting society after the Nazi era.

In 1950, after the founding of the German Democratic Republic (GDR) and the partition of Germany (and as a consequence of the division in currencies) , a society with comparable functions came into being in the GDR, the Institute for the Preservation of Performing and Reproduction Rights in the Area of Music (« Anstalt zur Wahrung der Aufführungs- und Vervielfältigungsrechte auf dem Gebiet der Musik » , or AWA) .

Die Gesellschaft für musikalische Aufführungs- und mechanische Vervielfältigungsrechte (GEMA) ist eine staatlich legitimierte Verwertungsgesellschaft, die in Deutschland mit ihren Generaldirektionen in Berlin und München die Nutzungsrechte aus dem Urheberrecht von denjenigen Komponisten, Textdichtern und Verlegern von Musikwerken wahrnimmt, die als Mitglied in ihr organisiert sind. Gegründet wurde die GEMA 1903, allerdings hatten ihre Vorläuferorganisationen noch wechselnde Namen, weshalb ihr namentlicher Start auf 1933 zurückzuführen ist.

Mit dem Inkrafttreten des Gesetzes betreffend das Urheberrecht an Werken der Literatur und Tonkunst im Januar 1902 wurde niedergeschrieben, daß es zur öffentlichen Aufführung eines musikalischen Werkes der Genehmigung eines jeden Autors bedarf.

In der Folge wurde von der Genossenschaft Deutscher Tonsetzer (GDT) am 1. Juli 1903 die Anstalt für musikalisches Aufführungsrecht (AFMA) gegründet. Dies ist deutlich später als zum Beispiel in Frankreich, wo bereits 1851 die Verwertungsgesellschaft SACEM gegründet wurde, deren Ursprünge in einem Interessenverband aus Musikern und Verlegern, der Agence Centrale, zu finden sind.

Initiatoren des Gründungsprozesses in Deutschland waren Richard Strauß, Hans Sommer und Friedrich Rösch. Geführt wurde die GDT von den erfolgreichsten Komponisten der Ersten Musik (E-Musik) der damaligen Zeit, unter anderem von Engelbert Humperdinck, Georg Schumann und vor allem von Richard Strauß. Der Vorstand der GDT war gleichzeitig der Vorstand der AFMA.

1904 wurde von der GDT eine Denkschrift zum Zweck und Sinn der AFMA veröffentlicht, da sowohl unter Musikern als auch unter Veranstaltern und Nutzern noch große Verwirrung bestand. Zentraler Punkt der Schrift ist folgender Abschnitt, dessen Sinngehalt zum Großteil auch heute noch in der Vereinssatzung der GEMA zu finden ist :

« Die Anstalt verfolgt keinerlei privatwirtschaftliche Zwecke. Sie ist nur eine Vermittlungsstelle. Einen Reservefonds sammelt sie nicht. Ein Geschäftsgewinn ist für sie ausgeschlossen. Von den eingegangenen Gebühren werden die Verwaltungskosten abgezogen, ferner ein Betrag von 10 % für die Unterstützungskasse der Genossenschaft. Sämtliche übrigen Einnahmen werden bis auf den letzten Pfennig an die bezugsberechtigten Tonsetzer, Textdichter und Verleger verteilt. »

Nach Gründung der AFMA wurde es in Deutschland recht turbulent. Die GDT/AFMA schloß im Herbst 1903 einen Gegenseitigkeitsvertrag mit der österreichischen « Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musik-Verleger » (AKM) , der eine Vereinbarung zwischen AFMA und AKM darstellte.

1909 gründete die GDT eine zweite Gesellschaft, welche sich ausschließlich mit der Verwertung mechanischer Vervielfältigungsrechte für Schallplatten befasste, die Anstalt für mechanisch-musikalische Rechte GmbH (AMMRE) .

Am 1. Januar 1911 löste die AKM den Gegenseitigkeitsvertrag mit der GDT/AFMA. 1913 kündigten 51 Verleger und Komponisten ihren Berechtigungsvertrag mit der GDT/AFMA. Der Berechtigungsvertrag der AFMA wurde durch das Reichsgericht als « nichtig » angesehen. Daraufhin wurde eine Zusatzvereinbarung durch die E-Musik-Komponisten verfasst, die der AFMA beziehungsweise dem Vorstand der GDT die Weiterführung des AFMA-Berechtigungsvertrages erlaubte.

Am 16. Dezember 1915 wurde die Genossenschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte GEMA gegründet, deren Vorstand und Aufsichtsrat vorwiegend aus Komponisten, Textdichtern und Verlegern der Unterhaltungsmusik (U-Musik) bestand. Zum Vorstand wählte man die Verleger Hermann Rauh und Robert Lienau sowie die Komponisten Heinrich G. Noren und Victor Holländer. Der Aufsichtsrat bestand aus 9 Mitgliedern : Als Verleger Volkmann, Örtel, Hoffmann, Stahl ; als Komponisten Edgar Istel, Johannes Dölber, Walter Kollo ; als Textdichter Robert David Winterfeld (Robert Gilbert) und Max Reichardt.

Am 20. Februar 1916 verband sich die GEMA mit der AKM zu einem « Verband zum Schutze musikalischer Aufführungsrechte für Deutschland » . Damit war in Deutschland eine Situation geschaffen, die völlig entgegen den ursprünglichen Interessen von Urhebern und Veranstaltern beziehungsweise Nutzern wirkte - zwei konkurrierende Verwertungsgesellschaften. AFMA = E-Musikautoren /GEMA/AKM = U-Musikautoren.

Nun wurde der bereits spätestens seit Gründung der GDT durch Richard Strauß und Friedrich Rösch betriebene Kampf gegen die von ihnen als « Afterkunst » bezeichneten U-Musik-Autoren erst richtig schädigend. Es folgte ein jahrelanger wütender Kampf, den Richard Bars, der 1924 Mitglied im Aufsichtsrat der GEMA wurde, wie folgt beschrieb :

« Es war nicht bloß eine Sturm-und-Drang-Periode, sondern ein echter Kampfeszustand. » = E-Musik gegen U-Musik.

Am 22. Juli 1930 unterzeichneten Leo Ritter, Gustav Bock, Fritz Oliven, Eduard Künneke und Jean Gilbert (GEMA) , Max

Butting, Arnold Ebel und Heinz Tiessen (GDT/AFMA) sowie Bernhard Herzmansky und Alfred Kalmus (AKM) in Berlin den Vertrag über den neuen « Verband zum Schutze musikalischer Aufführungsrechte für Deutschland » . Die Geschäftsstelle blieb unter der GEMA-Adresse in der Linkstraße 16 unter der Bezeichnung GEMA-AKM-Organisation. Die GDT war nun nur noch eine von mehreren Komponistenorganisationen. Richard Strauß übernahm den ihm angebotenen Ehrenvorsitz der GDT.

Die Partner GDT/AFMA, GEMA und AKM hatten mit dem Schutzverband (GEMA-AKM-Organisation) eine gemeinsame Inkassostelle gegründet, existierten sonst aber selbstständig weiter. So fungierte die GDT weiterhin als Interessenvertretung vor allem der ernstesten Komponisten. Arnold Schönberg hatte es strikt abgelehnt, mit Unterhaltungskomponisten gemeinsame Sache zu machen. Ausgelöst durch einen Artikel im « Schaffenden Musiker » kritisierte er 1931 in einem Brief an Max Butting heftig das Nebeneinander von E- und U-Musik in einer Verwertungsgesellschaft :

« Es ist unmöglich im gleichen Geschäft Perlen, Diamanten, Radium und sonstige teure Dinge zu handeln, wo auch Stecknadeln, alte Hosen und Ramschware verkauft werden. Und es wird nie möglich sein, eine Arbeit, die so viel Zeit erfordert wie die Kontrolle der Schlager und Versageraufführungen zu verrichten, und daneben die Genauigkeit und feine Abschätzung für seltenere Ware zu haben, wie sie die ernste Musik beansprucht. »

Anfang 1932 konnte die AFMA auf ein erstes Jahr gemeinsamer Zusammenarbeit mit GEMA und AKM zurückblicken. Dieses erste normale Jahr nach der Krise verlief, wie der Geschäftsbericht der AFMA vermerkte, reibungslos nach innen, und gemeinsam mit der GEMA wurde der Vertrag mit der ASCAP (USA) getätigt.

Am 24. März 1933 fand auf Betreiben der GEMA eine außerordentliche Generalversammlung statt. Auch auf Seiten der GEMA erkannte man jetzt die Notwendigkeit einer einzigen reichsdeutschen Aufführungsrechtsgesellschaft. Bei ausdrücklicher Betonung der Verbundenheit und Freundschaft zu den österreichischen Kollegen und der österreichischen Schwestergesellschaft erklärte Leo Ritter für die GEMA und Max Butting für die AFMA die Bereitschaft zur Vereinigung der beiden Gesellschaften und zur Gründung einer neuen einzigen reichsdeutschen Aufführungsgesellschaft. Eine mit großer Mehrheit verabschiedete Resolution, die der Komponist Hans Bullerian formuliert hatte, lobte die Umgestaltung der GEMA im Sinne der neuen Regierung und forderte Entsprechendes für die GDT/AFMA. Es solle in Zukunft nur noch eine einzige Standesorganisation der Komponisten geben, nämlich die GDT, und eine einzige Wirtschaftsorganisation, die GEMA.

Am 28. September 1933 wurde der Staatlich genehmigten Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte (STAGMA) , hervorgegangen aus dem Verband zum Schutze musikalischer Aufführungsrechte für Deutschland (GEMA-AFMA) , das Monopol zur Wahrnehmung von Musikaufführungsrechten erteilt. Die zu dieser Zeit immer noch existierende Anstalt für mechanisch-musikalische Rechte von 1909 (AMMRE) wurde 1938 an die STAGMA angegliedert. Die Reichsmusikkammer unter ihrem Präsidenten Richard Strauß hatte 1934 in ihren Richtlinien festgelegt, daß « Nichtarier grundsätzlich nicht als geeignete Träger und Verwalter deutschen Kulturguts anzusehen » seien. Dies bedeutete das Berufsverbot für die damals etwa 8.000 in der Reichsmusikkammer organisierten Juden. Die STAGMA war fest in das nationalsozialistische Machtgefüge eingebunden und die leitenden Mitglieder der STAGMA waren eingeffleischte und freiwillige Nationalsozialisten. Geschäftsführer der Stagma wurde Leo Ritter, der dieses Amt schon seit 1928 bei der ursprünglichen GEMA innehatte und Hitlers « Mein Kampf » als Prämie für verdiente Mitarbeiter zu verschenken pflegte.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg führte die STAGMA ihre Arbeit fort, ab dem 24. August 1947 allerdings unter der Bezeichnung GEMA, Gesellschaft für musikalische Aufführungs- und mechanische Vervielfältigungsrechte. Vorstand und Generaldirektor von 1947 bis 1989 war Erich Schulze, ihm widmete die GEMA den gleichnamigen Brunnen vor der Generaldirektion in München. Aufsichtsratsvorsitzender war ab 1950 der Komponist Werner Ekg. Sowohl Schulze als auch Ekg hatten schon in der STAGMA führende Positionen bekleidet. Zum 100-jährigen Bestehen der musikalischen Verwertungsgesellschaft in Deutschland erschien das wissenschaftlich belegte Buch Musik hat ihren Wert von Albrecht Dümling. Dieses stellt ausführlich den Werdegang der urheberrechtlichen Verwertung seit der Gründung des « Gesetzes betreffend das Urheberrecht an Werken der Literatur und der Tonkunst » im Jahr 1902 dar und es beleuchtet die Rolle der Verwertungsgesellschaft nach der Zeit der nationalsozialistischen Diktatur.

Nach Gründung der DDR und der Spaltung Deutschlands sowie als Folge der Währungsspaltung, entstand am 1. April 1951 in der DDR die AWA (Anstalt zur Wahrung der Aufführungs- und Vervielfältigungsrechte auf dem Gebiet der Musik) , eine Gesellschaft mit vergleichbaren Aufgaben.

L' « Anschluß » à Vienne

L' « Anschluß » est l'annexion de l'Autriche par l'Allemagne nazie, le 12 mars 1938.

Les événements de 1938 ont marqué le point culminant des pressions transnationales pour unifier les populations allemandes et autrichiennes au sein d'une même nation. Dans les années qui précédèrent l' « Anschluß » , l'Allemagne nazie avait soutenu le Parti Nazi autrichien dans sa tentative de conquérir le pouvoir et de doter l'Autriche d'un gouvernement nazi. Totalement attaché à l'indépendance de son pays, mais soumis à des pressions grandissantes, le chancelier autrichien, Kurt von Schuschnigg, tenta d'organiser un référendum pour demander à la population autrichienne si elle souhaitait rester indépendante ou être incorporée à l'Allemagne.

Alors que le chancelier espérait un résultat favorable au maintien de l'indépendance de l'Autriche, le Parti Nazi autrichien organisa un coup d'État, planifié de longue date, le 11 mars 1938, peu avant le référendum qui fut annulé. Le pouvoir ayant été transféré à l'Allemagne, les troupes de la « Wehrmacht » entrèrent en Autriche pour soutenir l'annexion, sans rencontrer la moindre opposition. Au cours du mois suivant, les Nazis organisèrent un plébiscite, demandant au peuple de ratifier le rattachement de l'Autriche au « Reich » , qui, de facto, avait déjà eu lieu : 99 % des votes furent favorables à l'annexion.

Si les Alliés de la Première Guerre mondiale étaient, en théorie, responsables du respect des termes du traité de Versailles et du traité de Saint-Germain-en-Laye, qui prohibaient une union entre l'Allemagne et l'Autriche, l' « Anschluß » ne suscita que peu de protestations de la France ou du Royaume-Uni, protestations qui furent d'ailleurs uniquement diplomatiques et n'eurent aucun effet.

L'« Anschluss » fut une des étapes majeures dans la création, voulue depuis longtemps par Adolf Hitler, d'un « Reich » regroupant les pays et territoires germanophones. Avant l'« Anschluss », l'Allemagne avait déjà récupéré la Rhénanie et la Sarre, après 15 années d'occupation par les troupes françaises ; après l'annexion de l'Autriche, elle s'empara du territoire des Sudètes, en Tchécoslovaquie, le reste du pays étant transformé en protectorat, en 1939. Au cours de la même année, l'Allemagne annexa également le territoire de Memel, en Lituanie, ce qui constitua le dernier agrandissement territorial du 3e « Reich » sans recours aux armes, avant le déclenchement de la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

L'« Anschluss » entraîna une profonde « nazification » de la société autrichienne, qui laissa encore des traces dans l'histoire politique récente du pays, et l'Autriche cessa d'exister en tant qu'État indépendant jusqu'en 1945. Considérée comme « la 1re victime du Nazisme » par les Alliés, l'Autriche fut dotée d'un gouvernement provisoire, le 27 avril 1945, lors de sa libération par l'Armée rouge. Elle retrouva sa pleine souveraineté en 1955.

Le projet de regrouper tous les Allemands au sein d'un seul État fait l'objet de débats sans suite concrète depuis la fin du Saint-Empire germanique, en 1806. En 1848, le parlement de Francfort émet le vœu de rassembler tous les Allemands en un seul État national homogène, intégrant les Allemands autrichiens et rejetant la monarchie multi-nationale des Habsbourgs. En 1850, l'Autriche rejoint la confédération germanique dont elle est exclue par Otto von Bismarck, en 1866, à la suite de la guerre austro-prussienne.

Dans les années qui suivent, le rattachement à l'Allemagne n'est soutenu en Autriche que par le Parti national allemand, qui reste minoritaire et n'est pas soutenu par l'Allemagne : craignant que l'Autriche ne cherche à fonder une coalition anti-allemande, Bismarck adopte, à partir de 1870, une politique qui vise à rassurer Vienne et déclare, le 7 février 1871, que les aspirations de la fraction qui œuvre à l'intégration des territoires allemands de la couronne autrichienne à l'Allemagne ne correspondent pas aux objectifs de sa politique. L'Autriche se rapproche à nouveau de l'Allemagne, en octobre 1879, lorsqu'elle conclut avec celle-ci un traité d'alliance militaire défensive :

« François-Joseph devenait l'allié de Guillaume Ier en attendant d'être, en 1914, “ le brillant second ” de Guillaume II. »

Cette « confédération germanique sous une forme actualisée » suscite des réserves en Autriche, à cause de la prépondérance de Berlin.

Du point de vue des idées, par contre, les idéologues « Völkisch », opposés à Bismarck, appellent de leurs vœux le rattachement de l'Autriche à l'Allemagne : ainsi, Paul de Lagarde voit dans l'« Anschluss » la 1re étape de la réalisation de la « Mitteleuropa » germanique, il propose même un plan précis d'union entre le « Reich » et la Double Monarchie, dont les 1res étapes seraient un traité d'alliance indissoluble ; ensuite, le plan de Lagarde prévoit l'expulsion des populations non germaniques, envoyées dans des zones où elles seront confinées, la mise en place d'institutions communes, d'inspiration conservatrices, une union douanière et la possibilité d'une union personnelle.

Lorsque l'Empire austro-hongrois éclate à la suite de sa défaite lors de la Première Guerre mondiale, de nombreux Allemands et Autrichiens germanophones espèrent une unification des 2 États, dans le cadre de la réorganisation de l'Europe : les traités de Versailles et celui de Saint-Germain, en son article 80, excluent explicitement la possibilité d'une unification entre l'Autriche et l'Allemagne sauf à obtenir l'accord de la Société des Nations, les vainqueurs voulant maintenir les vaincus dans une situation d'impuissance militaire.

Toujours sous la pression des Alliés, le nom du nouvel État initialement dénommé, en octobre 1918, « Deutsch-Österreich » (République d'Autriche allemande) est transformé en « Republik Österreich ». Les milieux politiques autrichiens sont divisés sur la question de l'unification : si certains Sociaux-Démocrates, emmenés par Otto Bauer, souhaitent une unification, les Sociaux-Chrétiens y sont opposés, notamment par crainte du protestantisme allemand. En Allemagne, dès 1920, le programme du Parti Nazi exige la fusion de tous les Allemands dans une grande Allemagne, ce qui préfigure implicitement l'« Anschluß » ; en 1925, dans « Mein Kampf », Adolf Hitler est nettement plus explicite :

« L'Autriche allemande doit revenir à la grande patrie allemande et ceci, non pas en vertu de quelconques raisons économiques. Non, non : même si cette fusion, économiquement parlant, est indifférente ou même nuisible, elle doit avoir lieu quand même. Un seul sang exige un seul " Reich ". » (Adolf Hitler, « Mein Kampf » .)

Le 18 mars 1931, le projet d'union douanière dit « plan Schober-Curtius », du nom des Ministres des affaires étrangères autrichien, Johann Schober, et allemand, Julius Curtius, est signé entre l'Allemagne et l'Autriche. La France s'y oppose. Le 3 septembre, les 2 Ministres annoncent officiellement à la Commission des affaires européennes de la Société des Nations qu'ils y renoncent. Le 5 septembre 1931, la Cour internationale de justice de La Haye, s'appuyant sur l'article 88 du traité de Saint-Germain-en-Laye et sur le protocole de Genève du 4 octobre 1922, condamne cette union douanière par 8 voix contre 711.

Au cours des années 1930, les Nazis autrichiens connaissent une notable progression sur le plan électoral, en passant de 112,000 voix aux élections de 1930 à 230,000 voix lors des élections partielles de 1932, dans les « Länder » de Vienne, Salzbourg et Styrie. Maintenus dans l'opposition, ils se lancent dans une stratégie de tension et recourent au terrorisme, ce qui débouche, le 19 juin 1933, sur l'interdiction du Parti Nazi à la suite d'un attentat meurtrier contre des gymnastes catholiques. Face aux tensions entre les Socialistes, appuyés par leur milice, le « Schutzbund », et les catholiques, eux aussi appuyés par une milice, les « Heimwehren », le Chancelier chrétien-social Engelbert Dollfuß établit, en mars 1933, une dictature clérico-fasciste à parti unique, connue sous le nom d'Austro-fascisme : il ajourne le parlement, dissout le Parti communiste et le Parti Nazi, et utilise les « Heimwehren » comme police auxiliaire pour écraser le soulèvement des Socialistes viennois, en mars 1934 ; la répression fait un millier de morts et 3,000 à 4,000 blessés.

Le 25 juillet 1934, les Nazis autrichiens tentent un coup d'État lors duquel ils assassinent Dollfuß, assassinat vraisemblablement commandité par Adolf Hitler ; la tentative de prise de pouvoir échoue, au grand dam de celui-ci, qui n'ose cependant intervenir en raison de la position de l'Italie fasciste, Benito Mussolini garantissant l'indépendance de l'Autriche.

Bien qu'il ait affirmé, lors de la parution du 1er volume de « Mein Kampf », en 1925, que l'union de l'Allemagne et de l'Autriche était, pour les Allemands, « une tâche que les Allemands devaient s'employer à accomplir, par tous les moyens et tout au long de leur vie », l'échec du « Putsch » et l'attitude de l'Italie forcent Adolf Hitler à adopter une position publique conciliante et rassurante : dans l'important discours qu'il prononce devant les membres du « Reichstag », le 21 mai 1935, Hitler affirme que « l'Allemagne n'a ni l'intention, ni le désir de se mêler des affaires intérieures de l'Autriche, d'annexer l'Autriche ou de réaliser l'« Anschluß » ». L'absence de réaction des puissances alliées, à l'entrée des troupes allemandes en Rhénanie, en mars 1936, permet à Hitler de renforcer la pression sur l'Autriche et de contraindre le successeur de Dolfuss, Kurt von Schuschnigg, à entamer avec Franz von Papen, ambassadeur à Vienne, des négociations visant à rapprocher les 2 pays sous l'égide allemande.

De 1934 à 1938, Schuschnigg mène une intense mais prudente activité diplomatique afin de faire garantir l'indépendance de son pays par l'Italie, la France et la Grande-Bretagne pendant que le chef d'état-major de l'armée autrichienne, Alfred Jansa, dresse des plans pour s'opposer militairement à une éventuelle agression allemande.

Si l'accord du 11 juillet 1936 réaffirme le maintien de l'indépendance de l'Autriche, celle-ci est désignée comme « le second État allemand » et elle s'engage à « mener une politique extérieure conforme aux intérêts pan-germaniques » et à autoriser l'activité politique du Parti Nazi. Au cours de l'été 1937, Adolf Hitler fait part à Josef Goebbels de sa volonté de résoudre le problème autrichien par la force, non seulement pour des raisons idéologiques, stratégiques et militaires, mais aussi pour des motifs économiques, l'Autriche disposant d'importantes réserves d'or et de devises, de main-d'œuvre et de matières premières ; ces motifs économiques expliquent le rôle majeur joué par Hermann Göring, Ministre du plan quadriennal, dans la préparation et l'exécution de l'« Anschluß ». Lors de la signature par Benito Mussolini du pacte anti-Komintern, le 6 novembre 1937, le Duce déclare à Joachim von Ribbentrop que les événements en Autriche peuvent suivre leur cours naturel : la souveraineté de l'Autriche a perdu son dernier garant, la France et la Grande-Bretagne n'ayant pas montré d'intérêt pour la défense de l'indépendance autrichienne.

Début 1938, Adolf Hitler a consolidé son pouvoir en Allemagne, notamment avec la mise à l'écart de Werner von Blomberg et de Werner von Fritsch, et il est prêt à atteindre l'un des objectifs qu'il s'est fixé de longue date : l'expansion du « Reich » .

Adolf Hitler rencontre le Chancelier autrichien Kurt von Schuschnigg, le 12 février 1938, à Berchtesgaden, en Bavière. Schuschnigg est accueilli à la frontière par Franz von Papen, pourtant limogé de son poste à Vienne depuis le 4 février, qui lui annonce que la rencontre se déroulera en présence de Wilhelm Keitel, le nouveau chef de l'OKW, de Walter von Reichenau, commandant des forces terrestres dans la zone austro-bavaroise, et de Hugo Sperrle, responsable de la « Luftwaffe » dans la même région, « arrivés par hasard ». Hitler accueille Schuschnigg avec une courtoisie minimale et se lance, dès le début de leur tête-à-tête, dans une diatribe cinglante. Ses vitupérations durent toute la matinée et mettent le Chancelier autrichien sous une forte pression.

« Vous avez tout fait pour empêcher une politique amicale. L'histoire de l'Autriche n'est qu'un acte ininterrompu de haute-trahison. Ce paradoxe historique doit maintenant parvenir à son terme, qui devrait être depuis longtemps échu.

Et je puis vous l'affirmer ici, monsieur Schuschnigg : je suis absolument résolu à ce que cela cesse. Le " Reich " allemand est l'une des grandes puissances et personne n'osera élever la voix s'il décide de régler le problème de ses frontières. » (Adolf Hitler au chancelier Schuschnigg.)

Dans l'après-midi, Joachim von Ribbentrop et von Papen présentent à Schuschnigg un projet d' « accord » , en lui précisant qu'il n'est pas négociable. L'interdiction des activités du Parti Nazi autrichien doit être levée et ses membres en prison amnistiés. Arthur Seyß-Inquart, un avocat membre du Parti Nazi, doit être nommé Ministre de l'Intérieur ayant l'autorité sur les services de police et de sécurité, et Edmund Glaise-Horstenau, Ministre sans portefeuille. Les armées allemande et autrichienne doivent établir des relations étroites, et le système économique autrichien doit être intégré à celui de l'Allemagne. Lors de la seconde entrevue du Chancelier autrichien avec Adolf Hitler, celui-ci le menace explicitement d'une intervention militaire en cas de refus : Schuschnigg finit par céder, ce qui inspire à Hitler le commentaire que « les canons parlent toujours le bon langage » .

De retour à Vienne, Schuschnigg fait part au Président de la République autrichienne, Wilhelm Miklas, des exigences allemandes, qui doivent être officiellement acceptées, au plus tard le 15 février, et mises en œuvre le 18 ; devant le refus de Miklas de mettre Seyß-Inquart à la tête des forces de police et de sécurité, Adolf Hitler, informé par von Papen, fait organiser des manœuvres militaires le long de la frontière. Miklas cède à son tour et, le 16 février, le gouvernement autrichien annonce l'amnistie générale des Nazis emprisonnés, y compris des assassins d'Engelbert Dollfuß, et la nomination de Seyß-Inquart comme ministre de la Sûreté.

Le 18 février, les SA défilent en uniforme à Linz avec d'immenses drapeaux à croix gammée. Le 1er mars, Arthur Seyß-Inquart se rend à Graz et, selon un journaliste britannique, on croirait entrer dans une ville de l'Allemagne nazie : la majorité des gens dans les rues portent des emblèmes à croix gammée, soit des insignes en métal, soit le sigle officiel du NSDAP, et les jeunes gens échangent des saluts hitlériens et certains chantent le « Horst-Wessel Lied » .

Malgré l'acceptation de l' « accord » , Adolf Hitler durcit encore le ton lors d'un discours devant les membres du « Reichstag » , le 20 février 1938.

« Plus de 10 millions d'Allemands vivent dans 2 des États qui ont une frontière commune avec nous. Pour une puissance mondiale, il est intolérable de savoir qu'à ses côtés des frères de race subissent à chaque instant les plus cruelles souffrances parce qu'ils se sentent solidaires de la nation tout entière, en union avec elle, avec sa destinée et son " Weltanschauung ". C'est au " Reich " allemand de protéger les peuples germaniques qui ne sont pas en mesure d'assurer, par leur propre effort, le long de nos frontières, leur liberté politique et spirituelle. » (Adolf Hitler)

4 jours plus tard, dans un discours au « Bundestag » , le parlement autrichien, Schuschnigg réplique en déclarant que « l'Autriche s'est engagée sur la voie des concessions jusqu'au point où nous devons nous arrêter, nous n'irons pas plus loin » et en affirmant que l'Autriche ne renoncera jamais à son indépendance. La radiodiffusion du discours de Schuschnigg suscite de violentes réactions des Nazis autrichiens : à Graz, 20,000 Nazis envahissent la place de l'Hôtel de ville, détruisent les haut-parleurs et remplacent le drapeau autrichien par la bannière allemande à croix gammée, sans que la police, soumise à l'autorité de Seyß-Inquart, n'intervienne.

Au cours des semaines qui suivent, le Chancelier autrichien recherche le soutien de la classe ouvrière au travers des syndicats et du Parti Social-Démocrate, dont il a pourtant maintenu l'interdiction prononcée par Dollfuß, après la répression de 1934 ; cela n'empêche pas les Socialistes de proclamer leur soutien au gouvernement pour préserver l'indépendance du pays et d'organiser un rassemblement populaire, le 4 mars, leur seule demande étant que leur activité politique soit à nouveau autorisée, comme cela a déjà été le cas pour celle du Parti Nazi autrichien.

Le 9 mars 1938, Schuschnigg fait une dernière tentative pour préserver l'indépendance de l'Autriche : il annonce, lors d'un discours à Innsbruck, sans avoir prévenu ses Ministres, la tenue d'un référendum pour le 13 mars, appelant les électeurs à soutenir « une Autriche libre et allemande, indépendante et sociale, chrétienne et unie, pour la liberté et le travail, et pour l'égalité de tous ceux qui se déclarent pour la race et la patrie », formulation qui laisse augurer d'un vote largement positif. Afin de s'assurer une large majorité, il fixe l'âge minimum pour voter à 24 ans, afin d'exclure les électeurs plus jeunes, largement acquis au Nazisme. L'organisation de ce référendum constitue un pari risqué pour Schuschnigg : selon Alfred Jodl, « le “ Führer ” est résolu à ne pas tolérer cela ». Dans la soirée du 9 et dans la nuit du 9 au 10, Adolf Hitler consulte de nombreux dignitaires politiques et militaires nazis, et ordonne à Wilhelm Keitel, dès le matin du 10 mars, d'envahir l'Autriche, le samedi 12. Au cours des journées des 10 et 11 mars, Keitel, Ludwig Beck, et Erich von Manstein préparent l'opération et arrivent à envoyer les ordres de mobilisation aux unités concernées, dès le 11 mars vers 18 heures. Pendant ce temps, Adolf Hitler envoie un courrier à Benito Mussolini, par lequel il lui fait part de sa décision « de rétablir la loi et l'ordre dans son pays natal », faisant état de la situation d'anarchie qui règne en Autriche et du fait que l'Autriche et la Tchécoslovaquie se préparent à lancer 20,000,000 hommes à l'assaut de l'Allemagne, assertions qui sont, selon William L. Shirer, « un tissu de mensonges » .

Le vendredi 11 mars, Schuschnigg est réveillé à 5h30 du matin, par un appel téléphonique du chef de la police autrichienne, qui lui annonce la fermeture de la frontière à Salzbourg, l'arrêt des transports ferroviaires entre l'Allemagne et l'Autriche et des concentrations de troupes allemandes ; à 10 heures, Arthur Seyß-Inquart et Edmund Glaise-Horstenau font part au Chancelier autrichien de l'exigence d'Adolf Hitler de voir le plébiscite annulé sous peine d'invasion militaire. Expirant normalement à midi, l'ultimatum est reporté jusqu'à 2h30, heure à laquelle Schuschnigg accepte d'annuler le plébiscite. Prévenu de cette décision par Seyß-Inquart, et après avoir conféré avec Hitler, Hermann Göring formule de nouvelles exigences : la démission de Schuschnigg et son remplacement par Seyß-Inquart. Il demande également à ce dernier d'envoyer, dès sa nomination, un télégramme demandant aux autorités allemandes d'envoyer des troupes en Autriche pour y maintenir l'ordre.

Dans un 1er temps, le Président autrichien, Wilhelm Miklas, refuse la démission du Chancelier, ce dont Göring est immédiatement averti par téléphone par Seyß-Inquart. À la suite de cette nouvelle, Göring se rend chez Hitler, dont il obtient, après 30 minutes de discussion, qu'il donne l'ordre à la 8e Armée d'entrer en Autriche, à l'aube du 12 mars. Soumis à des pressions de plus en plus fortes, Miklas accepte finalement la démission de Schuschnigg, mais refuse de désigner Seyß-Inquart comme Chancelier.

Schuschnigg annonce sa démission peu après 19h30, dans un communiqué radiophonique :

« Le gouvernement allemand a remis aujourd'hui au Président Miklas un ultimatum lui ordonnant, dans un délai imposé, de nommer au poste de Chancelier une personnalité désignée par le gouvernement allemand ; en cas de refus, les troupes allemandes envahiraient l'Autriche. Le Président Miklas m'a demandé de faire savoir au peuple d'Autriche que nous avons cédé à la force parce que nous refusons, même en cette heure terrible, de verser le sang. Nous avons donc décidé d'ordonner aux troupes autrichiennes de n'opposer aucune résistance. Je prends donc congé du peuple autrichien, en lui adressant cette formule d'adieu allemande, prononcée du plus profond de mon cœur : que Dieu protège l'Autriche. » (Kurt Schuschnigg, le 11 mars 1938.)

À cette annonce, la foule se déchaîne à Vienne, brisant les vitrines des commerces appartenant à des Juifs ou molestant ceux-ci. Un journaliste, témoin des faits, décrit la scène :

« La ville se transforme en un cauchemar peint par Jérôme Bosch. Ce qui se déchaîne à Vienne est un torrent d'envie, de jalousie, d'amertume, d'aveuglement, une malveillante envie de revanche. »

Bien organisés, les Nazis autrichiens prennent le pouvoir en Carinthie et en Styrie, et occupent des bâtiments publics et des gares ferroviaires à Innsbruck, Linz, Salzbourg, Graz, Klagenfurt et Vienne. Le refus du président Miklas de constituer un gouvernement nazi dirigé par Seyß-Inquart, et l'absence d'un télégramme d'appel à l'aide venant de celui-ci, mettent Adolf Hitler hors de lui : à 20h45, il donne formellement l'ordre d'invasion ; 3 minutes plus tard, il fait transmettre à Seyß-Inquart le texte du télégramme, en précisant qu'il n'est plus nécessaire de l'envoyer mais simplement de marquer son accord sur son contenu. Dans la nuit, le texte du télégramme est envoyé à la presse allemande qui le publie le lendemain matin : la 1^{re} page du « Völkischer Beobachter » porte comme manchette « L'AUTRICHE ALLEMANDE SAUVÉE DU CHAOS ». Vers minuit, après que les principaux centres du pouvoir à Vienne sont tombés entre les mains des Nazis autrichiens et que la plupart des membres du gouvernement a été arrêtée, et vu l'absence de réaction de la France, de la Grande-Bretagne, de l'Italie et de la Tchécoslovaquie, le président Miklas accepte de nommer Seyß-Inquart comme Chancelier. Celui-ci tente, en vain, d'empêcher l'arrivée des troupes allemandes, en appelant la Chancellerie du « Reich » et l'OKW :

« Hitler avait pris l'une de ses décisions inébranlables ; il ne pensait pas seulement qu'il était immoral de laisser une telle armée désœuvrée, il considérait également que les Nazis autrichiens n'étaient pas dignes de confiance. »

Le matin du 12 mars 1938, la 8^e Armée de la « Wehrmacht » franchit la frontière austro-allemande. Les troupes allemandes ne rencontrent aucune résistance de la part de l'armée autrichienne, bien au contraire : elles sont accueillies par des acclamations, des « Heil Hitler », des drapeaux nazis et des fleurs, ce qui explique que cette invasion soit parfois nommée « Blumenkrieg » (« la guerre des fleurs »). Après les unités motorisées, c'est à l'infanterie d'entrer en Autriche, non en formation de combat, mais en défilant avec drapeaux et musique militaire. Pour un officier :

« Jamais des troupes allemandes n'ont été accueillies aussi chaleureusement depuis le défilé triomphal de Bismarck lors de la fondation du « Reich ». »

Peu avant midi, la 2e division blindée, commandée par Heinz Guderian, arrive à Linz. Guderian y est rejoint par Heinrich Himmler, Arthur Seyß-Inquart et Edmund Glaise-Horstenau qui lui annoncent que l'arrivée d'Adolf Hitler est prévue vers 15 heures. La « Wehrmacht » révèle cependant son impréparation puisque pas moins de 70 % de ses véhicules tombent en panne sur la route de Vienne.

Adolf Hitler pénètre en Autriche peu avant 16 heures à Braunau, son village natal. En raison de la foule amassée sur son passage, il n'arrive à Linz que vers 19h30, où il reçoit un accueil enthousiaste ; lorsqu'il y prend la parole d'un balcon de l'Hôtel de ville, il est acclamé par 60,000 à 80,000 personnes.

L'occupation systématique de la totalité du territoire autrichien se poursuit méthodiquement : à Salzbourg, les troupes de montagne allemandes découvrent une ville pavoisée de drapeaux nazis et à son arrivée à Vienne, vers minuit, Guderian reçoit un accueil enthousiaste. S'il n'était pas prévu, à l'origine, d'envoyer des troupes en Styrie et en Carinthie, Adolf Hitler modifie ses plans au vu de l'accueil réservé aux soldats allemands par la population autrichienne : dans la journée du 13 mars, les hommes du 2e régiment de parachutistes atterrissent à Graz ; dans ces 2 provinces, les unités sont à nouveau « bombardées de fleurs, même dans les hameaux slovènes à la frontière avec la Yougoslavie » . Dans la soirée du 14 mars, toute l'Autriche est occupée.

Le 14 mars 1938, Adolf Hitler quitte Linz pour se diriger vers Vienne en faisant une étape à Melk, puis à Sankt Pölten : de cette ville, il poursuit son trajet vers la capitale, à 20 kilomètres par heure, afin de satisfaire la foule. Peu avant 18 heures, le « Führer » pénètre à Vienne par la « Ringstraße » et se rend à l'Hôtel Impérial pour y rencontrer les membres du nouveau gouvernement, dirigé par Seyß-Inquart. Bien que la foule ait été avertie que Hitler était trop fatigué pour prendre la parole, des milliers de personnes restent massées à l'extérieur de l'Hôtel : Hitler adresse cependant à la population un bref discours qu'il conclut par « personne ne pourra jamais diviser à nouveau le “ Reich ” allemand tel qu'il existe aujourd'hui » .

Le lendemain, au milieu de la matinée, près de 250,000 personnes se dirigent vers la « Heldenplatz » , où Adolf Hitler arrive vers 11 heures et reçoit un accueil triomphal de la foule, rassemblée sur la place et à ses alentours. « Elle est composée de personnes issues de toutes les classes sociales. Pour une fois, ouvriers et bourgeois se tiennent côte à côte, avec un enthousiasme indivisible. Mon impression prédominante est qu'elle est composée de jeunes plutôt mal habillés. Il ne s'agit pas d'un rassemblement de réactionnaires réunis pour célébrer leur triomphe. Quelle que soit sa motivation, c'est le peuple de Vienne qui emplit les rues. »

Par la suite, Adolf Hitler commente cet épisode comme suit :

« Certains journaux étrangers ont prétendu que nous nous sommes abattus sur l'Autriche en employant des méthodes brutales. Quand j'ai franchi la frontière, j'ai été submergé par un flot d'amour tel que je n'en avais jamais connu. Nous ne sommes pas arrivés en tyrans mais en libérateurs. »

Dans la soirée du 15 mars, comme lors de celle du 11, une partie de la foule s'en prend aux Juifs, forçant les familles à sortir de chez elles et à s'agenouiller dans les rues, sous les cris de « Mort aux Juifs » .

Selon Ewan Burr Bukey, l'enthousiasme d'une grande partie de la population à l'égard de l' « Anschluß » est spontané et tient essentiellement à 4 facteurs : l'annexion s'est déroulée sans effusion de sang ; les troupes allemandes sont perçues à la fois comme le moyen d'éviter une guerre civile et comme une protection contre une agression extérieure ; l'essor économique de l'Allemagne devrait également améliorer la situation en Autriche ; enfin, il n'y a que peu de doutes sur le fait que des millions de personnes ont soutenu l' « Anschluß » en y voyant une chance de mettre fin à ce que l'on appelle la question juive.

Dès leur entrée en Autriche, les Allemands recherchent et obtiennent le soutien de 12 piliers de la société autrichienne, à savoir : la hiérarchie catholique et les dirigeants Sociaux-Démocrates.

Le cardinal Theodor Innitzer qui est, en outre, une des personnalités du mouvement Social-Chrétien, déclare dès le 12 mars :

« Les Catholiques viennois devraient remercier le Seigneur pour le fait que ce grand changement politique se soit déroulé sans effusion de sang, et prier pour un grand avenir pour l'Autriche. Il va de soi que tout le monde devrait obéir aux ordres des nouvelles institutions. »

Les autres évêques autrichiens adoptent la même position dans les jours qui suivent et remercient l'Allemagne d'avoir « sauvé l'Autriche du péril bolchévique ». Le 27 mars suivant, une déclaration collective de l'épiscopat d'Autriche est lue dans toutes les Églises :

« Nous reconnaissons avec joie que le mouvement national-socialiste a fait et fait encore œuvre éminente dans le domaine de la construction nationale et économique comme aussi dans le domaine de la politique sociale pour le “ Reich ” et la nation allemande, et notamment pour les couches les plus pauvres de la population. Au jour du plébiscite, il va sans dire que c'est pour nous un devoir national, en tant qu'Allemands, de nous déclarer pour le “ Reich ” allemand, et nous attendons également de tous les chrétiens croyants qu'ils sauront ce qu'ils doivent à leur nation. »

À Rome, Radio Vatican dénonce aussitôt la diffusion de ce texte, et le pape Pie XI et le cardinal secrétaire d'État Pacelli, demandent à Innitzer de venir s'expliquer devant eux. Le 6 avril, avant de rencontrer le pape, Innitzer s'entretient avec le secrétaire d'État Pacelli, qui lui ordonne de rédiger un document, au nom de tous les évêques d'Autriche, à paraître dans « L'Osservatore Romano », affirmant que :

« La déclaration solennelle des évêques autrichiens n'avait pas pour but d'être une approbation de quelque chose qui est incompatible avec la loi de Dieu », et précisant également que cette Ire déclaration avait été faite sans l'accord de Rome.

Même le Social-Démocrate Karl Renner, père fondateur de la Ire République, annonce son soutien à l' « Anschluß » et appelle tous les Autrichiens à voter favorablement lors du plébiscite. Pendant l'été et l'automne 1938, il écrit un ouvrage de 80 pages au titre révélateur : « Die Gründung der Republik Deutschösterreich, der “ Anschluß ” und die Sudetendeutschen » (La fondation de la République austro-allemande, l' « Anschluß » et les Allemands des Sudètes) .

Les réactions à l'étranger peuvent être considérées comme modérées. Pour le « Times » de Londres, l' « Anschluß » n'est pas tellement différent de la réunion de l'Écosse à l'Angleterre accomplie 2 siècles auparavant. La position officielle de la Grande-Bretagne est exprimée par le Premier ministre Neville Chamberlain, à la Chambre des communes, le 14 mars 1938 :

« J'imagine que, suivant les tempéraments des uns et des autres, les événements que nous avons à l'esprit aujourd'hui peuvent susciter des regrets, de la tristesse et peut-être de l'indignation. Ils ne peuvent être vus par le gouvernement de Sa Majesté avec indifférence ou sérénité. Ils auront des conséquences qui ne peuvent encore être mesurées. Leur résultat immédiat est l'intensification du sentiment d'insécurité en Europe. Ce n'est pas le moment de prendre des décisions hâtives ou de prononcer des mots imprudents. Nous devons analyser la nouvelle situation rapidement, mais de sang-froid. » (Neville Chamberlain)

La réaction modérée de la Grande-Bretagne, partagée par les États-Unis, est l'une des lres conséquences majeures de la politique d'apaisement strictement observée par le Royaume-Uni.

C'est de l'étranger que s'élèvent des voix autrichiennes contre l' « Anschluß » : un groupe d'artistes cosmopolites, dont Joseph Roth à Paris, Oskar Kokoschka à Londres et Stefan Zweig à Bath, fondent le mouvement « Autriche libre » , qui regroupe, en 1943, 27 organisations comptant plus de 7,000 membres.

L' « Anschluß » produit ses effets juridiques, dès le lendemain de l'entrée des troupes allemandes, de par la loi du 13 mars, soumise à ratification par plébiscite : l'Autriche devient la province d'Ostmark du « Reich » et Seyß-Inquart en est nommé gouverneur. Le même jour, Adolf Hitler charge le « Gauleiter » de Saare-Palatinat, Josef Bürckel, d'organiser un plébiscite « libre et au vote secret » , le 10 avril 1938.

Bürckel lance officiellement la campagne au Concert Hall de Vienne, en émaillant son discours de nombreuses attaques antisémites, qui sont applaudies avec beaucoup d'enthousiasme ; dans les jours qui suivent, les principaux dirigeants nazis, dont Hitler, Hermann Göring, Josef Goebbels et Heinrich Himmler, sillonnent l'Autriche pour soutenir l'annexion. Les Nazis jouent sur un double registre, alliant propagande et répression. Pour influencer favorablement le vote des Autrichiens, Göring annonce, le 26 mars, un investissement de 60 millions de Marks dans le développement de l'industrie et la modernisation de l'agriculture autrichienne ; dans les jours qui suivent, le système de sécurité sociale allemand est étendu à l'Autriche ; le paiement d'allocations aux chômeurs est repris par l'Allemagne ; 100,000 écoliers et 25,000 adultes y sont envoyés en vacances ; des distributions de nourriture sont organisées pour les plus pauvres.

Les méthodes brutales utilisées par Adolf Hitler pour éliminer toute opposition en Allemagne sont immédiatement mises en place en Autriche, dans les semaines qui précèdent le plébiscite. Avant même l'intervention de la « Wehrmacht » , Heinrich Himmler et quelques officiers SS arrivent à Vienne dès le 12 mars, bientôt rejoints par 40,000 membres des forces de sécurité allemandes. Durant les quelques semaines qui séparent l' « Anschluß » du plébiscite, 70,000 personnes, Sociaux-Démocrates, Démocrates-Chrétiens, comme Richard Schmitz et Leopold Figl, communistes et autres opposants politiques, Juifs, sont arrêtés et emprisonnés ou envoyés en camp de concentration.

Bulletin de vote du plébiscite du 10 avril 1938, il est écrit :

« Es-tu d'accord avec la réunification de l'Autriche avec le " Reich " allemand qui fut décrétée le 13 mars 1938, et votes-tu pour le parti de notre chef Adolf Hitler ? »

Le grand cercle est marqué « Oui » et le plus petit « Non » . Le résultat officiel est un vote favorable à 99,08 % , en Allemagne ; et à 99,75 % , en Autriche.

Si les historiens s'accordent sur le fait que le résultat du plébiscite n'a pas été truqué, le processus de vote n'a été ni libre, ni secret : des officiels sont présents à côté des isolements et reçoivent le bulletin de vote de la main à la main, contrairement aux pratiques du vote secret, au cours duquel les bulletins sont déposés par les électeurs dans une urne scellée ; de larges fentes sont en outre aménagées dans les isolements afin de pouvoir constater comment votent les électeurs.

L'Autriche fait désormais partie du 3e « Reich » et le restera jusqu'à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Le 27 avril 1945, le gouvernement provisoire autrichien déclare l'« Anschluß » nul et non avenue. Après guerre, l'Autriche, occupée par les Alliés, est reconnue et traitée comme un pays indépendant de l'Allemagne ; elle retrouve sa souveraineté, en 1955, avec le Traité sur l'État autrichien et la déclaration autrichienne de neutralité, en grande partie à cause du développement rapide de la « Guerre froide » .

La faiblesse des réactions à l'étranger à la suite de l'« Anschluß » conduisent Adolf Hitler à conclure qu'il peut utiliser des méthodes plus agressives dans sa marche pour élargir le 3e « Reich » , ce qu'il fera plus tard lors de l'annexion du territoire des Sudètes. En confirmant que la Grande-Bretagne a décidé qu'une logique d'apaisement est la bonne manière de négocier avec Hitler, et que la France est incapable d'intervenir, l'« Anschluß » ouvre la voie aux accords de Munich, en septembre 1938, puis à l'invasion de la Tchécoslovaquie, en 1939.

L'« Anschluß » se traduit également par une profonde « Nazification » de la société autrichienne : lorsqu'en 1945, les anciens Nazis doivent se faire enregistrer, ils sont 600,000 à s'inscrire, et avec leurs familles, ils représentent un tiers de la population du pays ; si la population autrichienne ne représente que 8 % de la population de la Grande Allemagne, les Autrichiens constituent 14 % des membres de la SS et 40 % du personnel lié à la mise en œuvre de l'assassinat des malades mentaux et de la « Shoah » . Parmi les Autrichiens ayant occupé de hauts-postes au sein du 3e « Reich » , outre Adolf Hitler lui-même, on peut citer Franz Böhme, Lothar Rendulic, Julius Ringel et Alexander Löhr : généraux dans la « Wehrmacht » et la « Luftwaffe » ; Adolf Eichmann, l'un des principaux organisateurs de la « Shoah » ; Odilo Globocnik, lui aussi impliqué dans la « Shoah » ; Amon Göth, commandant du camp de concentration de Plaszow ; Franz Stangl, commandant des camps d'extermination de Sobibor et Treblinka ; Ernst Kaltenbrunner, successeur de Reinhard Heydrich à la tête du RSHA ; Otto Skorzeny, qui organisa notamment l'évasion de Benito Mussolini du Gran Sasso. Quant à Arthur Seyß-Inquart, après avoir été l'adjoint de Hans Frank en Pologne, il fut Commissaire du « Reich » , aux Pays-Bas. Quant aux Juifs autrichiens, 128,000 d'entre eux sont contraints de s'exiler et 65,459 sont victimes de la « Shoah » .

L'héritage historique de l' « Anschluß » : rattachement ou annexion ?

Le dictionnaire en ligne franco-allemand Larousse traduit le terme « Anschluß » , dans le contexte politique, par rattachement. Selon le dictionnaire en ligne Leo, la traduction allemande d'annexion est : « Annektierung » ou Annexion, ; celle d'incorporation : « Eingliederung » .

« L'Encyclopædia Britannica » décrit l' « Anschluß » comme une annexion plutôt que comme un rattachement. Cette traduction est reprise par la quasi-totalité des auteurs cités dans l'article.

Comme le relève Ewan Burr Bukey, lors du départ des troupes alliés d'occupation, le 25 octobre 1955 :

« La plupart des citoyens autrichiens se réjouit que se termine enfin une période de 17 années d'occupation. »

Englobant sous le même terme, la période de 1938 à 1945 et celle de 1945 à 1955.

La Déclaration de Moscou de la création de la Seconde République, signée en 1943 par les gouvernements de l'Union soviétique, des États-Unis et de Grande-Bretagne, comprend une déclaration sur l'Autriche :

« Les gouvernements du Royaume-Uni, de l'Union soviétique et des États-Unis d'Amérique sont d'accord sur le fait que l'Autriche, le 1er pays libre tombé à la suite de l'agression hitlérienne, sera libéré de la domination allemande. Ils considèrent l'annexion imposée à l'Autriche, le 15 mars 1938, comme nulle et non avenue. Ils affirment leur souhait de voir la liberté et l'indépendance de l'Autriche restaurées, ouvrant ainsi la voie au peuple autrichien, ainsi qu'à ceux des autres états confrontés aux mêmes problèmes, pour créer la sécurité économique et politique, seule base d'une paix durable. Cependant, l'Autriche a une responsabilité, qu'elle ne peut éluder, dans sa participation au conflit aux côtés de l'Allemagne hitlérienne. Au moment du jugement final, il sera inévitablement tenu compte de sa propre contribution à sa libération. »

Le dernier paragraphe de la déclaration relève de la propagande et vise à susciter les premiers signes d'une résistance autrichienne. Bien que des Autrichiens aient été reconnus comme « Justes » parmi les nations, il n'y eut jamais en Autriche de résistance armée comme celle qui s'est manifestée dans d'autres pays occupés. La déclaration de Moscou est suivie, le 27 avril 1945, par une déclaration sur l'indépendance de l'Autriche, qui stipule en son article 2 que :

« L' « Anschluß », imposé au peuple autrichien en 1938, est nul et non avenue. »

Et, en son article 4, que :

« Tous les serments militaires, officiels, ou individuels, prêtés par des Autrichiens à l'égard du « Reich » allemand et de son gouvernement, sont considérés comme nuls et non avenues. »

La vision des événements de 1938 a de profondes racines dans les 10 années d'occupation par les Alliés et dans la lutte de l'Autriche pour retrouver sa souveraineté. La « victimisation » joue un rôle essentiel lors des négociations avec les Soviétiques à propos du Traité d'État autrichien. S'appuyant sur la Déclaration de Moscou, les hommes politiques autrichiens, hantés par le souvenir de la guerre civile qui a détruit la Ire République, n'ont d'autre choix, afin de favoriser la reconstruction économique et la recomposition de la société, que de « créer une fiction historique qui n'a que peu de rapport avec la réalité ». Le traité sur l'État autrichien et la déclaration de neutralité permanente, qui lui fait suite, constituent des étapes fondamentales pour la consolidation de l'indépendance et de l'identité nationale autrichienne au cours des décennies qui suivent.

Le processus de dénazification est lancé à la suite de la loi sur les Nationaux-Socialistes du 25 juillet 1945 qui oblige, notamment, les anciens membres du Parti Nazi à se faire enregistrer et les prive temporairement de leur droit de vote :

« Devant l'inscription de près de 600,000 personnes dans ces registres, les Partis politiques, devant cette masse d'enregistrés, pensèrent que bien des gens allaient retrouver leur droit de vote un jour ; aussi, au lieu de mener une lutte idéologique contre le National-Socialisme et les crimes hitlériens, ils évitèrent la discussion sur le passé en flattant la masse des anciens Nazis promus au rang de doubles victimes. »

Le contexte de la « Guerre Froide » et la volonté de l'Autriche de bénéficier du plan Marshall jouent également un rôle important dans l'occultation du débat sur l' « Anschluß » et sur le passé nazi de l'Autriche. En présentant l'Union soviétique comme l'ennemi principal de l'Autriche, ses dirigeants ont esquivé « certains problèmes fondamentaux comme la véritable prise de conscience des crimes nazis, l'élimination des responsables Nazis de la vie publique, la liquidation sérieuse de l'idéologie National-Socialiste. »

Pour Ernst Bruchmüller : « Le rôle de victime (" Opferrolle ") est devenu un pré-requis pour la formation d'une identité nationale contemporaine. » .

De 1945 à 1948, les tribunaux autrichiens condamnent 10,694 personnes pour crime de guerre, essentiellement commis sur le sol autrichien, dont 43 sont condamnées à la peine capitale ; mais, dès 1948, le processus de dénazification s'éteint et tant le SPÖ que l'ÖVP cherchent à gagner les votes des anciens Nazis. Une Ire loi amnistiant les Nazis n'ayant pas occupé de postes importants (« die Minderbelasten ») est votée le 21 avril 1948 suivie, en 1953, d'une 2e amnistie, nettement plus large, qui permet aux anciens Nazis « de peser lourdement dans la balance des forces politiques » .

En 1952, le FPÖ, issu de la VdU (« Verband der Unabhängigen » : Fédération des indépendants) dans la droite ligne de l' « Anschluß », affirme que les Autrichiens font partie du peuple allemand, avec tous les droits et tous les devoirs résultant de cette appartenance.

Pendant des décennies, la théorie de la « victimisation » établie dans l'opinion publique autrichienne reste largement incontestée ; la population est rarement forcée de se confronter à l'héritage laissé par le 3^e « Reich ». En 1964, la déclaration du directeur de l'institut pédagogique de Graz, le Docteur Franz Göbhart, qui, en réponse à une invitation du « Deutsches Kulturwerk für europäische Geister », affirme que les machinations nationalistes allemandes n'ont pas leur place dans les écoles autrichiennes, suscite une vaste polémique relayée au parlement par le FPÖ ; en 1965, les déclarations ouvertement antisémites et nationalistes du professeur d'histoire économique Taras Borodajkewycz déclenchent des manifestations de protestation au cours desquelles un rescapé des camps de concentration, Ernst Kirchweger, est assassiné par un militant de droite lors d'émeutes. Ce n'est qu'au cours des années 1980 que l'Autriche doit massivement faire face à son passé sous le régime nazi. Le catalyseur de cette remise en question, connue sous le terme « Vergangenheitsbewältigung », est l'affaire Kurt Waldheim. Lorsque celui-ci est accusé, lors de sa candidature au poste de secrétaire-général de l'ONU (poste qu'il obtiendra), d'avoir été membre du Parti Nazi et de la SA, et de crimes de guerre (accusation dont il sera disculpé), la seule réponse du gouvernement autrichien consiste à affirmer que ces accusations constituent des interventions inamicales dans les affaires intérieures du pays. Malgré les réactions politiques face aux critiques internationales, l'affaire Waldheim marque le début d'une discussion de fond sur le passé nazi de l'Autriche et l'« Anschluß », et la remise en cause fondamentale du « mythe du 1^{er} pays libre victime de l'agression hitlérienne ».

Un autre facteur influençant la relation de l'Autriche à son passé nazi est l'émergence, au cours des années 1980, de Jörg Haider et de son Parti, le FPÖ, qui forme une coalition gouvernementale avec l'ÖVP, le 4 février 2004. Le programme de celui-ci, fondé en 1955, combine des éléments de la droite pan-germaniste avec des éléments du libéralisme ; lorsque Haider accède à la présidence du Parti, les aspects libéraux deviennent marginaux, au profit d'une rhétorique nationaliste et anti-immigrants. Haider est souvent critiqué pour sa définition de l'intérêt national autrichien sur une base ethnique (« Völkisch »), avec un slogan comme « l'Autriche aux Autrichiens », et pour son apologie du passé, notamment lorsqu'il définit les membres de la « Waffen SS » comme des « hommes d'honneur ». Haider va jusqu'à affirmer que l'existence de la seconde République autrichienne est « une anomalie idéologique congénitale ». Selon Megan Green, le succès du FPÖ provient de l'échec de l'Autriche à analyser en profondeur son passé nazi et à en tirer les leçons, et le FPÖ trouve ses racines idéologiques dans le Nazisme.

Haider n'est pas le seul à émettre des avis controversés sur le passé de l'Autriche. En 2000, son ancien partenaire au gouvernement, le Chancelier Wolfgang Schäussel, déclare au « Jerusalem Post » que l'Autriche a été la 1^{re} victime de l'Allemagne.

Dénonçant le simplisme de la théorie de la « victimisation » et l'époque de l'austro-fascisme, la pièce de Thomas Bernhard Heldenplatz, fait l'objet de controverses avant même sa 1^{re} représentation, en 1988, 50 ans après l'« Anschluß ». De nombreux hommes politiques de toutes tendances demandent que la pièce ne soit pas jouée au « Burgtheater » de Vienne. Kurt Waldheim, à cette époque Président de la république, qualifie l'œuvre d'insulte grossière au peuple autrichien. Toujours en 1988, lors du 50^e anniversaire de l'« Anschluß », le Président Waldheim et le Chancelier Franz Vranitzky reconnaissent pourtant, lors d'une cérémonie regardée par des millions de téléspectateurs, la complicité de l'Autriche dans l'Holocauste ; quelques mois plus tard, à l'occasion de l'anniversaire de la « Nuit de Cristal », le Chancelier rappelle à ses concitoyens la longue histoire de l'antisémitisme autrichien.

Dans le contexte de l'après-guerre, la République fédérale d'Allemagne est confrontée à un véritable combat pour en finir avec le passé : le « Vergangenheitsbewältigung ». En partie institutionnalisé, ce processus concerne les domaines de la littérature, de la culture, de la politique et de l'enseignement, et suscite des débats parfois vifs, comme dans le cadre de l'« Historikerstreit » (querelle des historiens). Dans un cadre similaire, mais plus tardivement, l'Autriche crée, en novembre 1998, une Commission d'historiens, la « Historikerkommission ». Son mandat est d'analyser le rôle de l'Autriche dans la confiscation des biens juifs opérée par le régime nazi et dans la mise en place d'un système de travail forcé, sous un angle plus historique que juridique. Comme son nom l'indique, il s'agit d'une commission historique, sans pouvoir particulier, à la différence d'une commission d'enquête parlementaire, et sans capacité de dépasser le stade de l'analyse et des recommandations. Cette mission est notamment définie pour répondre aux critiques dont le pays fait l'objet pour son traitement des plaintes des ayants droit des biens confisqués. Cette nouvelle impulsion, donnée en 1998, est confirmée, 10 ans après, lors de la visite d'État du Président autrichien Heinz Fischer, en Israël : durant son séjour, il déclare notamment « que la conscience du problème que représentent les questions liées à l'Holocauste s'est accrue dans les 10 dernières années » et que « depuis le milieu des années 1990, de vraies mesures ont été prises par le gouvernement ».

Cependant, le centre Simon Wiesenthal maintient ses critiques quant à la réticence persistante de l'Autriche, depuis les années 1970, à mener des enquêtes et à traduire devant les tribunaux des Nazis pour crimes de guerre et crimes contre l'humanité :

« Compte tenu du fait des très faibles résultats de l'Autriche en ce qui concerne la poursuites des exécutants de la “ Shoah ”, un fait clairement établi dans notre dernier rapport sur la situation mondiale en ce qui concerne les enquêtes et les poursuites de criminels de guerre nazis, je crois que la visite du Ministre des affaires étrangères d'Autriche en Israël constitue une opportunité unique pour que le gouvernement autrichien annonce son intention de s'occuper sérieusement, pour la 1re fois depuis des décennies, du problème des criminels de guerre nazis autrichiens impunis. C'est le bon moment pour que l'Autriche déclare qu'elle est prête à créer une unité d'enquête spécialisée pour traiter ces dossiers et pour établir clairement que sa volonté politique de traduire les Nazis devant la justice s'est finalement concrétisée à Vienne. » (Communiqué du Centre Simon-Wiesenthal, du 28 juillet 2003)

En 2003, le centre Wiesenthal lance une campagne mondiale, l'Opération de la dernière chance, pour rassembler des informations sur les Nazis encore en vie et qui pourraient faire l'objet de poursuites. Lors de cette campagne, le centre Wiesenthal met en évidence, en 2005, le cas de Milivoj Ašner, un Croate âgé de 92 ans qui fait partie des 10 Nazis les plus recherchés ; Ašner s'est réfugié en Autriche, en 2004, après que la Croatie a annoncé l'ouverture d'une enquête sur les crimes de guerre dans lesquels il aurait pu être impliqué. Malgré les critiques quant à la liberté dont jouit Ašner, le gouvernement fédéral autrichien retarde, « sine die », tant le traitement de la demande d'extradition formulée par la Croatie que le déclenchement de poursuites par le parquet de Klagenfurt. Ayant vécu en Autriche de 1946 à 1991, Ašner en a acquis la nationalité et ne peut donc être extradé.

The « Anschluß » (German for " connection " or union, political annexation) , also known as the « “ Anschluß ”

Österreichs » , was the occupation and annexation of Austria into Nazi Germany, in 1938. This was in contrast with the « Anschluß » movement (Austria and Germany united as one country) , which had been attempted since as early as 1918 when the Republic of German-Austria attempted union with Germany which was forbidden by the Treaty of Saint-Germain and Treaty of Versailles peace treaties.

Austria was annexed into the German 3rd « Reich » , on 12 March 1938. There had been several years of pressure by supporters in both Austria and Germany (by both Nazis and non-Nazis) for the « Heim ins “ Reich ” » movement. Earlier, Nazi Germany had provided support for the Austrian National-Socialist Party (Austrian Nazi Party) in its bid to seize power from Austria's Austrofascist leadership.

Under considerable pressure from both Austrian and German Nazis, Austria's Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg tried to hold a referendum for a vote on the issue. Although Schuschnigg expected Austria to vote in favour of maintaining autonomy, a well-planned « coup d'état » by the Austrian Nazi Party of Austria's State institutions in Vienna took place on 11 March 1938, prior to the referendum, which they canceled.

They transferred power to Germany, and « Wehrmacht » troops entered Austria to enforce the « Anschluß » . The Nazis held a plebiscite within the following month, asking the people to ratify the « fait accompli » . They claimed to have received 99.7 % of the vote, in favor.

Although the Allies were committed to upholding the terms of the Treaty of Versailles and Saint-Germain, which specifically prohibited the union of Austria and the German Empire, their reaction was only verbal and moderate. No military confrontation took place and even the strongest voices against the annexation, particularly Fascist Italy, France and Britain (the « Stresa Front ») remained at peace.

The « Anschluß » was among the 1st major steps of Adolf Hitler's creation of a Greater German « Reich » which was to include all ethnic German and all the lands and territories which the German Empire had lost after World War I. Although Austria had never been a part of 20th Century Germany (the unification of Germany, of the mid to late 1800's, created a Prussian dominated nation State, in 1871, leaving Austria as a part of « Lesser Germany ») , it was seen as a German State. Prior to the 1938 annexation, the 3rd « Reich » had re-militarized the Rhineland, and the Saar region was returned to Germany after 15 years of occupation through a plebiscite. After the « Anschluß » , Hitler targeted Czechoslovakia, provoking an international crisis which led to the Munich Agreement, in September 1938, giving the 3rd « Reich » control of the industrial Sudetenland, which had a predominantly ethnic German population. In March 1939, Adolf Hitler then ended Czechoslovakia by recognizing the independence of Slovakia and making the rest of the nation a protectorate. That same year, Memelland was returned from Lithuania.

With the « Anschluß » , the German speaking Republic of Austria ceased to exist as a fully independent State. At the end of World War II, a Provisional Austrian Government was set-up, on 27 April 1945, and was legally recognized by the Allies in the following months. It was not until 1955 that Austria regained full sovereignty.

The idea of grouping all Germans into a nation State country had been the subject of debate in the 19th Century, from the ending of the Holy Roman Empire of the German nation until the ending of the German Confederation. By 1871, the decision was to form a « kleindeutsch » German Empire based on Prussia and excluding Austria. Austria had its own Empire at the time, comprising Hungarians, Slavs and other ethnic groups ruled by a German minority. Austria had wanted a « Großdeutsche Lösung » (greater Germany solution) , whereby the German States would be united under the leadership of the Austrian Germans (the Habsburgs) . This solution would include all the German States (including the non German regions of Austria) , but Prussia would have to take 2nd place. This controversy, called dualism, dominated Prusso-Austrian diplomacy and the politics of the German States, for the next 20 years.

Elite and popular opinion in Austria after 1918 largely favoured some sort of union with Germany, but it was explicitly forbidden by the peace treaties. The Austro-Hungarian Empire broke-up in 1918, and, on 12 November that year, German Austria was officially declared a republic. The provisional national assembly drafted a provisional constitution that stated that « German Austria is a democratic republic » (Article 1) and « German Austria is a component of the German Republic » (Article 2) . Later, plebiscites in the German border provinces of Tyrol and Salzburg yielded majorities of 98 % and 99 % , in favor of a unification with the German Republic.

The Treaty of Versailles and the Treaty of Saint-Germain (both signed in 1919) explicitly prohibited the inclusion of Austria to politically join the German State. This measure was criticized by Hugo Preuss, the drafter of the German Weimar Constitution, who saw the prohibition as a contradiction of the Wilsonian principle of self-determination of peoples, intended to help bring peace to Europe. Following the destruction of World War I, however, France and Britain feared the power of a larger Germany and had begun to disempower the current one. Austrian particularism, especially among the nobility, also played a role in the decisions ; Austria was Roman Catholic, while Germany was dominated by Protestants, especially in government (the Prussian nobility, for example, was Lutheran) . The constitutions of the Weimar Republic and the 1st Austrian Republic included the political goal of unification, which was widely supported by Democratic Parties. In the early 1930's, popular support in Austria for union with German Empire remained overwhelming, and the Austrian government looked to a possible customs union with German Republic, in 1931.

The rise of the Nazis led by Adolf Hitler to power in the Weimar Republic initially caused the Austrian government to withdraw from such economic ties. Hitler, an Austrian German by birth, picked-up his patriotic German nationalist ideas whilst serving in the German army during WWI. In accordance to this, one of the Nazi's ideologies was to reunite all Germans either born or living outside of the « Reich » , in order to create an « all German “ Reich ” » . From the early beginning of his leadership in the Nazi Party, Hitler had publicly stated in his 1924 autobiography (« Mein Kampf ») that he would create a union between his birth country and Germany, by any means possible :

« German-Austria must be restored to the great German Motherland. » ; « People of the same blood should be in the same “ Reich ”. »

Austria shared the economic turbulence of the Great Depression, with a high unemployment rate and unstable commerce and industry. During the 1920's, it was a target for German investment capital. By 1937, rapid German rearmament increased Berlin's interest in annexation, because Austria was rich in raw materials and labor. It supplied Germany with magnesium and the products of the iron, textile and machine industries. It had gold and foreign currency reserves, many unemployed skilled workers and hundreds of idle factories, and large potential hydro-electric resources.

The 1st Republic, dominated from the late- 1920's by the anti- « Anschluß » Catholic nationalist Christian-Social Party (CS) , gradually disintegrated from 1933 (dissolution of parliament and ban of the Austrian National-Socialists) to 1934 (Austrian Civil War, in February, and ban of all remaining Parties, except the CS) . The government evolved into a pseudo fascist, corporatist model of one Party government, which combined the CS and the para-military « Heimwehr » with absolute State domination of labour relations and no freedom of the press.

Power was centralized in the office of the Chancellor, who was empowered to rule by decree. The predominance of the Christian-Social Party (whose economic policies were based on the papal Encyclical « Rerum Novarum ») was an Austrian phenomenon. Austria's national identity had strong Catholic elements that were incorporated into the movement, by way of clerical authoritarian tendencies not found in Nazism. Both Engelbert Dollfuß and his successor, Kurt Schuschnigg, turned to Austria's other fascist neighbour, Italy, for inspiration and support. The statist corporatism often referred to as Austrofascism bore much more resemblance to Italian Fascism than German National-Socialism. For his part, Benito Mussolini supported the independence of Austria, largely due to concern that Adolf Hitler would eventually press for the return of Italian territories once ruled by Austria. However, Mussolini needed German support in Ethiopia. After receiving a personal assurance from Hitler that Germany would not seek territorial concessions from Italy, Mussolini began a client relationship with Berlin that began with the 1937 Berlin - Rome Axis.

On 25 July 1934, Chancellor Dollfuß was assassinated by Austrian Nazis in a failed coup. The 2nd civil war followed, lasting until August 1934. Afterward, leading Austrian Nazis fled to Germany but they continued to push for unification from there. The remaining Austrian Nazis started to make use of terrorist attacks against Austrian governmental institutions, causing a death toll of more than 800, between 1934 and 1938.

Following Dollfuß' assassination, his successor was Kurt Schuschnigg, who followed a similar political course. In 1935, Schuschnigg used the police to suppress the Nazi supporters in Austria. Police actions under Schuschnigg included gathering Nazis (and Social-Democrats) and holding them in internment camps. The Austro-Fascism of Austria between 1934-1938 focused on the history of Austria and opposed the absorption of Austria into the 3rd « Reich » (according to the philosophy Austrians were « better Germans ») . Schuschnigg called Austria the « better German State » but struggled to keep Austria independent. Eventually, Schuschnigg gave-up his anti-Nazi program and, in July 1936, he signed the Austro-German Agreement, which, among other concessions, allowed the release of Nazis imprisoned in Austria and the inclusion of National-Socialists in his Cabinet. This did not satisfy Hitler and the pro-Germany Austrian Nazis grew in strength.

Following increasing violence and demands from Adolf Hitler that Austria agree to a union, Schuschnigg met with Hitler, on 12 February, at Berchtesgaden, in an attempt to avoid the take-over of Austria. Hitler presented Schuschnigg with a set of demands which included appointing known Austrian Nazi sympathizers to positions of great power in the Austrian government. The key appointment was that of Arthur Seyß-Inquart who would take-over as Minister of Public Security, with full and unlimited control of the police forces in Austria. In return, Hitler would publicly reaffirm the treaty of 11 July 1936 and reaffirm his support for Austria's national sovereignty. Schuschnigg accepted Hitler's « deal », returned to Vienna and made the changes to his government.

Arthur Seyß-Inquart was a long time Nazi who sought the union of all Germans in one State. Leopold argues he was a moderate who favoured an evolutionary approach to union. He opposed the violent tactics of the Austrian Nazis, collaborated with Catholic groups, and wanted to preserve a measure of Austrian identity within the 3rd « Reich » .

1 week later, Adolf Hitler made a speech in which he stated :

« The German “ Reich ” is no longer willing to tolerate the suppression of 10 million Germans across its borders. »

This was clearly directed at Austria and Czechoslovakia.

On 9 March 1938, in an effort to preserve Austria's independence, Schuschnigg scheduled a plebiscite on the issue of unification for 13 March. To secure a large majority in the referendum, Schuschnigg set the minimum voting age at 24, as he believed younger voters were now supporters of the German Nazi ideology. This was a risk and, the next day, it became apparent that Hitler would not simply stand by while Austria declared its independence by public vote. Hitler declared that the referendum would be subject to major fraud and that Germany would not accept it. In addition, the German ministry of propaganda issued press reports that riots had broken-out in Austria and that large parts of the Austrian population were calling for German troops to restore order. Schuschnigg immediately responded publicly that reports of riots were false.

On 11 March, Adolf Hitler sent an ultimatum to Schuschnigg demanding that he hand-over all power to the Austrian National-Socialists or face an invasion. The ultimatum was set to expire at noon, but was extended by 2 hours. Without waiting for an answer, Hitler had already signed the order to send troops into Austria at 1 o'clock.

Schuschnigg desperately sought support for Austrian independence, in the hours following the ultimatum. Realizing that neither France nor Britain was willing to take steps, he resigned as Chancellor that evening. In the radio broadcast, in which he announced his resignation, he argued that he accepted the changes and allowed the Nazis to take-over the government « to avoid the shedding of fraternal blood » (« Bruderblut ») .

It is said that, after listening to Bruckner's 7th Symphony, Adolf Hitler cried :

« How can anyone say that Austria is not German ! Is there anything more German than our old pure Austrianness ? »

On the morning of 12 March, the 8th Army of the German « Wehrmacht » crossed the border to Austria. The troops were greeted by cheering German-Austrians with Nazi salutes, Nazi flags and flowers. Because of this, the Nazi annexing is also-called the « Blumenkrieg » (War of flowers) , but its official name was « Unternehmen Otto » . For the « Wehrmacht » , the invasion was the 1st big test of its machinery. Although the invading forces were badly organized and coordination among the units was poor, it mattered little because no fighting took place.

Adolf Hitler's Mercedes crossed the border in the afternoon, at Braunau, his birthplace. In the evening, he arrived at Linz and was given an enthusiastic welcome at City Hall.

Adolf Hitler's travel through Austria became a triumphal tour that climaxed in Vienna, on 15 March 1938, when around 200,000 German-Austrians gathered around the « Heldenplatz » (Square of Heroes) to hear Hitler say, in front of tens of thousands of cheering people, that :

« The oldest eastern province of the German people shall be, from this point on, the newest bastion of the German “ Reich ”. » ; followed by his « greatest accomplishment » (completing the annexing of Austria to form a Greater German “ Reich ”) by saying : « Als “ Führer ” und Kanzler der deutschen Nation und des Reiches melde ich vor der deutschen Geschichte nunmehr den Eintritt meiner Heimat in das Deutsche “ Reich ”. »

Translation :

« As leader and chancellor of the German nation and “ Reich ”, I announce to German history now the entry of my homeland into the German “ Reich ”. »

Hitler later commented :

« Certain foreign newspapers have said that we fell on Austria with brutal methods. I can only say : even in death, they cannot stop lying. I have, in the course of my political struggle, won much love from my people but when I crossed the former frontier (into Austria) there met me such a stream of love as I have never experienced. Not as tyrants have we come, but as liberators. »

The « Anschluß » was given immediate effect by legislative act, on 13 March, subject to ratification by a plebiscite. Austria became the province of Ostmark, and Arthur Seyß-Inquart was appointed governor. The plebiscite was held on 10 April and officially recorded a support of 99.7 % of the voters.

Adolf Hitler's forces worked to suppress any opposition. Before the 1st German soldier crossed the border, Heinrich Himmler and a few SS officers landed in Vienna to arrest prominent representatives of the 1st Republic, such as Richard Schmitz, Leopold Figl, Friedrich Hillegeist and Franz Olah. During the few weeks between the « Anschluß » and the plebiscite, authorities rounded-up Social-Democrats, Communists and other potential political dissenters, as well as Jews, and imprisoned them or sent them to concentration camps. Within only a few days of 12 March, 70,000 people had been arrested. The plebiscite was subject to large scale propaganda and to the abrogation of the voting rights of around 400,000 people (nearly 10 % of the eligible voting population) , mainly former members of Left-wing Parties and Jews.

While historians concur that the result was not manipulated, the voting process was neither free nor secret. Officials were present directly beside the voting booths and received the voting ballot by hand (in contrast to a secret vote where the voting ballot is inserted into a closed box) . In some remote areas of Austria, people voted to preserve the independence of Austria, on 13 March (in Schuschnigg's planned but officially cancelled plebiscite) , despite the « Wehrmacht » 's presence. For instance, in the village of Innervillgraten, a majority of 95 % voted for Austria's independence. However, in the plebiscite, on 10 April, 73.3 % of votes in Innervillgraten were in favor of the « Anschluß » , which was still the lowest number of all Austrian municipalities.

A largely unhindered voting process occurred in the Italian harbour city of Gaeta, where an extra-territorial vote of German and Austrian clerics, studying at the German college of Santa Maria dell'Anima, took place. The vote was concluded on board the German cruiser Admiral Scheer, which was anchored in the harbour. Contrary to the overall result, these clerical votes rejected the « Anschluß » by over 90 % , an incident which became known, at the time, as the « Shame of Gaeta » (« Vergogna di Gaeta, Schande von Gaeta ») .

Austria remained part of the 3rd « Reich » until the end of World War II, when a preliminary Austrian government declared the « “ Anschluß ” null und nichtig » (« null and void ») , on 27 April 1945. After the War, then Allied occupied Austria was recognized and treated as a separate country. It was not restored to sovereignty until the Austrian State Treaty and Austrian Declaration of Neutrality, both of 1955, largely due to the rapid development of the Cold War and disputes between the Soviet Union and its former allies over foreign policy.

Austria, in the 1st days of the 3rd « Reich » , had many contradictions : at one and the same time, Adolf Hitler's terror regime began to tighten its grip in every area of society, beginning with mass arrests as thousands of Austrians tried to escape ; yet, other Austrians cheered and welcomed the German troops entering their territory. Many Austrian political figures announced their support of the « Anschluß » and relief that it happened without violence.

Cardinal Theodor Innitzer (a political figure of the CS) declared as early as 12 March :

« The Viennese Catholics should thank the Lord for the bloodless way this great political change has occurred, and they should pray for a great future for Austria. Needless to say, everyone should obey the orders of the new institutions. »

The other Austrian bishops followed suit, some days later. Vatican Radio, however, broadcast a strong denunciation of the German action, and Cardinal Pacelli, the Vatican Secretary of State, ordered Innitzer to report to Rome. Before meeting the Pope, Innitzer met Pacelli, who had been outraged by Innitzer's statement. He told Innitzer that he needed to retract his statement ; he was made to sign a new statement, issued on behalf of all the Austrian bishops, which provided :

« The solemn declaration of the Austrian bishops was clearly not intended to be an approval of something that was not and is not compatible with God's law. »

The Vatican newspaper reported that the German bishops' earlier statement had been issued without approval from Rome.

Robert Kauer, president of the minority Lutheran Church in Austria, greeted Adolf Hitler on 13 March as « Saviour of the 350,000 German Protestants in Austria and liberator from a 5 year hardship » .

Karl Renner, the most famous Social-Democrat of the 1st Republic, announced his support for the « Anschluß » and appealed to all Austrians to vote in favour of it, on 10 April.

The international response to the « Anschluß » was publicly moderate. « The Times » commented that, 300 years before, Scotland had joined England as well, and that this event would not really differ much. On 14 March, the British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, noted in the House of Commons :

« His Majesty's Government have throughout been in the closest touch with the situation. The Foreign Secretary saw the German Foreign Minister on the 10th of March and addressed to him a grave warning on the Austrian situation and upon what appeared to be the policy of the German Government in regard to it. Late on the 11th of March, our Ambassador in Berlin registered a protest in strong terms with the German Government against such use of coercion, backed by force, against an independent State in order to create a situation incompatible with its national independence. »

However, the speech concluded :

« I imagine that, according to the temperament of the individual, the events which are in our minds today will be the cause of regret, of sorrow, perhaps of indignation. They cannot be regarded by His Majesty's Government with indifference or equanimity. They are bound to have effects which cannot, yet, be measured. The immediate result must be to intensify the sense of uncertainty and insecurity in Europe. Unfortunately, while the policy of appeasement would lead to a relaxation of the economic pressure under which many countries are suffering today, what has just occurred must inevitably retard economic recovery and, indeed, increased care will be required to ensure that marked deterioration does not set in. This is not a moment for hasty decisions or for careless words. We must consider the new situation quickly, but with cool judgement. As regards our defence programmes, we have always made it clear that they were flexible and that they would have to be reviewed, from time to time, in the light of any development in the international situation. It would be idle to pretend that recent events do not constitute a change of the kind that we had in mind. Accordingly, we have decided to make a fresh review and, in due course, we shall announce what further steps we may think it necessary to take. »

Within this speech, Neville Chamberlain also said :

« The hard fact is that nothing could have arrested what has actually happened in Austria, unless this country and other countries had been prepared to use force. »

The subdued reaction to the « Anschluß » (the United States issued a similar statement) led to Adolf Hitler's conclusion that he could use more aggressive tactics in his « road map » to expand the 3rd « Reich » , as he would later in annexing the Sudetenland.

The « Anschluß » : annexation or union ?

The word « Anschluß » , outside the context of March 1938, is properly translated as « joinder » , « connection » , « unification » , or « political union » . In contrast, the German word « Annektierung » , that would mean military annexation unambiguously, was and is not commonly used in this context. The usage of the term « Anschluß » has been widespread before and, in 1938, describing an incorporation of Austria into Germany. Calling the incorporation of Austria into Nazi Germany an « Anschluß » , that is a unification or joinder, was also part of the propaganda used, in 1938, by Adolf Hitler and the Nazis to create the impression the events of March 1938 were not backed and enforced by military pressure. Hitler described the incorporation of Austria as its return to its original home (« Heimkehr ») . The word « Anschluß » has endured during and following World War II, despite being a euphemism for what took place.

Some historical sources, like the « Encyclopædia Britannica » , describe the « Anschluß » as an « annexation » rather than a union. Neither word captures the differences between the « Anschluß » and other Nazi annexations backed by force : that much of the Austrian population either supported or were indifferent to the incorporation of Austria into the 3rd « Reich » .

The 2nd Republic :

The Moscow Declaration of 1943, signed by the United States, the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom, included a « Declaration on Austria » , which stated the following :

« The governments of the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and the United States of America are agreed that Austria, the 1st free country to fall a victim to Hitlerite aggression, shall be liberated from German domination. They regard the annexation imposed on Austria by Germany, on 15 March 1938, as null and void. They consider themselves as, in no way, bound by any changes effected in Austria since that date. They declare that they wish to see re-established a free and independent Austria and, thereby, to open the way for the Austrian people themselves, as well as those neighbouring States which will be faced with similar problems, to find that political and economic security which is the only basis for lasting peace. Austria is reminded, however, that she has a responsibility, which she cannot evade, for participation in the War at the side of Hitlerite Germany, and that in the final settlement account will inevitably be taken of her own contribution to her liberation. »

The declaration was mostly intended to serve as propaganda aimed at stirring Austrian resistance. Although some Austrians aided Jews and are counted as Righteous among the Nations, there never was an effective Austrian armed resistance of the sort found in other countries under German occupation. The declaration is said to have a somewhat complex drafting history. At Nuremberg, Arthur Seyß-Inquart and Franz von Papen, in particular, were both indicted under count one (conspiracy to commit crimes against peace) specifically for their activities in support of the Austrian Nazi Party and the « Anschluß » , but neither was convicted of this count. In acquitting von Papen, the Court noted that his actions were in its view political immoralities but not crimes under its charter. Seyß-Inquart was convicted of other serious War crimes, most of which took place in Poland and the Netherlands, was sentenced to death and executed.

Austrian identity and the « victim theory » :

After World War II, many Austrians sought comfort in the idea of Austria as « the Nazis' 1st victim » . Although the Nazi Party was promptly banned, Austria did not have the same thorough process of de-Nazification at the top of government which was imposed on Germany for a time. Lacking outside pressure for political reform, factions of Austrian society tried for a long time to advance the view that the « Anschluß » was only an annexation at the point of a bayonet.

This view of the events of 1938 has deep roots in the 10 years of Allied occupation and the struggle to regain Austrian sovereignty : the « victim theory » played an essential role in the negotiations on the Austrian State Treaty with the Soviets, and, by pointing to the Moscow Declaration, Austrian politicians heavily relied on it to achieve a solution for Austria different from the division of Germany into separate Eastern and Western States. The State Treaty, alongside the subsequent Austrian declaration of permanent neutrality, marked important milestones for the solidification of Austria's independent national identity during the course of the following decades.

As Austrian politicians of the left and right attempted to reconcile their differences in order to avoid the violent conflict that had dominated the 1st Republic, discussions of both Austrian Nazism and Austria's role during the Nazi era were largely avoided. Still, the Austrian People's Party (ÖVP) had advanced, and still advances, the argument that the establishment of the Dollfuß dictatorship was necessary in order to maintain Austrian independence. On the other hand, the Austrian Social-Democratic Party (SPÖ) argues that the Dollfuß dictatorship stripped the country of the democratic resources necessary to repel Adolf Hitler ; yet, it ignores the fact that Hitler himself was a native to Austria.

In contrast with the 1st victim theory, it has also helped the Austrians develop their own national identity as before. After World War II and the fall of the 3rd « Reich » , the political ideology Pan-Germanism massively declined and is now seen by the vast majority of German speaking people as taboo. Unlike earlier in the 20th Century era when there was no Austrian identity separate from a German one, in 1987, only 6 % of the Austrians identified themselves as « Germans » . Today, over 90 % of the Austrians see themselves as an independent nation. The logic of the existence of an independent Austrian State is no longer questioned as it was in the inter War period.

For decades, the victim theory remained largely undisputed. The Austrian public was rarely forced to confront the legacy of the 3rd « Reich » ; most notably, it had to face issues during the events of 1965, when Taras Borodajkewycz, a professor of economic history, made anti-Semitic remarks following the death of Ernst Kirchweyer, a concentration camp survivor killed by a Right-wing protester during riots. It was not until the 1980's that Austrians confronted their mixed past. The catalyst for the « Vergangenheitsbewältigung » was the Waldheim affair. When Kurt Waldheim, the successful candidate of a presidential election and former UN Secretary General, was accused of having been a member of the Nazi Party and of the infamous SA (he was later absolved of direct involvement in War crimes), Austrians said that scrutiny was an unwelcome intervention in the country's internal affairs. Despite the politicians' reactions to international criticism, the Waldheim affair started the 1st serious discussions about Austria's past and the « Anschluß » .

Another factor was the rise of Jörg Haider and the Freedom Party of Austria (FPÖ) , in the 1980's. The Party had combined elements of the pan-German right with free-market Liberalism since its foundation in 1955, but after Haider ascended to the Party chairmanship, in 1986, the Liberal elements became increasingly marginalized. Haider began to openly use nationalist and anti-immigrant rhetoric. He was criticised for using the « völkisch » (ethnic) definition of national interest (« Austria for Austrians ») and his apologetics for Austria's past, notably calling members of the Waffen SS « men of honour » . Following a dramatic rise in electoral support, in the 1990's, that peaked in the 1999 elections, the FPÖ entered a coalition with the Austrian People's Party (ÖVP) , led by Wolfgang Schüssel. This was condemned in 2000. The coalition prompted the regular « Donnerstagsdemonstrationen » (Thursday demonstrations) in protest against the government, which took place on the « Heldenplatz » where Adolf Hitler had greeted the masses during the « Anschluß » . Haider's tactics and rhetoric, often criticised as sympathetic to Nazism, forced Austrians to reconsider their relationship to the past. Haider's coalition partner, former Chancellor Wolfgang Schüssel, in a 2000 interview with the « Jerusalem Post » , stated that Austria was the 1st victim of Adolf Hitler's Germany, repeating the victim story.

The political discussions and soul searching were reflected in other aspects of culture. Thomas Bernhard's last play, « Heldenplatz » (1988) , generated controversy even before it was produced, 50 years after Adolf Hitler's entrance in Vienna. Bernhard made the historic elimination of references to Hitler's reception in Vienna emblematic of Austrian attempts to claim its history and culture under questionable criteria. Many politicians called Bernhard a « Nestbeschmutzer » (damaging the reputation of his country) and openly demanded that the play should not be staged in Vienna's « Burgtheater » . Waldheim, still president, called the play « a crude insult to the Austrian people » .

Historical Commission and outstanding legal issues :

In the context of the post-War Federal Republic of Germany, one encounters a « Vergangenheitsbewältigung » (struggle to come to terms with the past) that has been partially institutionalised, variably in literary, cultural, political, and educational contexts (its development and difficulties have not been trivial) . In 1988, Austria formed a « Historikerkommission » (Historian's Commission or Historical Commission) with a mandate to review Austria's role in the Nazi expropriation of Jewish property from a scholarly rather than legal perspective, partly in response to continuing criticism of its handling of property claims. Its membership was based on recommendations from various quarters, including Simon Wiesenthal and Yad Vashem. The Commission delivered its report, in 2003. Noted Holocaust historian Raul Hilberg refused to participate in the Commission and, in an interview, stated his strenuous objections in terms both personal and in reference to larger questions about Austrian culpability and liability, comparing what he thought to be relative inattention to the settlement governing the Swiss bank holdings of those who died or were displaced by the Holocaust :

« I personally would like to know why the WJC has hardly put any pressure on Austria, even as leading Nazis and SS leaders were Austrians, Adolf Hitler included. Immediately after the War, the U.S. wanted to make the Russians withdraw from Austria, and the Russians wanted to keep Austria neutral, therefore, there was a common interest to grant Austria victim status. And later, Austria could cry poor ; though its per capita income is as high as Germany's. And, most importantly, the Austrian PR machinery works better. Austria has the Opera ball, the Imperial castle, the “ Mozartkugeln ” chocolate. Americans like that. And Austrians invest and export relatively little to the U.S. , therefore, they are less vulnerable to blackmail. In the meantime, they set-up a commission in Austria to clarify what happened to Jewish property. Victor Klima, the former chancellor, has asked me to join. My father fought for Austria in the 1st World War and, in 1939, he was kicked-out of Austria. After the War, they offered him 10 $ per month, as compensation. For this reason, I told Klima, no thank you, this makes me sick. »

The Simon Wiesenthal Center continues to criticise Austria (as recently as June 2005) for its alleged historical and ongoing unwillingness aggressively to pursue investigations and trials against Nazis for War crimes and crimes against humanity from the 1970's onwards. Its 2001 report offered the following characterization :

« Given the extensive participation of numerous Austrians, including at the highest levels, in the implementation of the “ Final Solution ” and other Nazi crimes, Austria should have been a leader in the prosecution of Holocaust perpetrators over the course of the past 4 decades, as has been the case in Germany. Unfortunately, relatively little has been achieved by the Austrian authorities in this regard and, in fact, with the exception of the case of Doctor Heinrich Groß which was suspended this year under highly-suspicious circumstances (he claimed to be medically unfit, but, outside the Court, proved to be healthy) not a single Nazi War crimes prosecution has been conducted in Austria since the mid 1970's. »

In 2003, the Center launched a world-wide effort named « Operation : Last Chance » , in order to collect further information about those Nazis still alive that are potentially subject to prosecution. Although reports issued shortly thereafter credited Austria for initiating large scale investigations, there has been 1 case where criticism of Austrian authorities arose recently : The Center has put 92 year old Croatian, Milivoj Asner, on its 2005 « Top 10 » list. Asner fled to Austria, in 2004, after Croatia announced it would start investigations in the case of War crimes he may have been involved in. In response to objections about Asner's continued freedom, Austria's federal government has deferred to either extradition requests from Croatia or prosecutorial actions from Klagenfurt, neither of which appears forthcoming (as of June 2005) . Extradition is not an option since Asner also holds Austrian citizenship, having lived in the country, from 1946 to 1991.

Austrian political and military leaders in Nazi Germany :

Adolf Hitler ; Ernst Kaltenbrunner ; Arthur Seyß-Inquart ; Odilo Globocnik ; Amon Göth ; Lothar Rendulic ; Alfred Ritter von Hubicki ; Alexander Löhr ; Franz Böhme ; Otto Skorzeny ; Julius Ringel ; Adolf Eichmann ; Erhard Raus ; Hans Fischböck.

Maire nazi de Vienne : Hermann Neubacher (1938-1940)

The Austrian Nazi politician Hermann Neubacher was born on 24 June 1893 in Wels and died, aged 67, on 1 July 1960 in Vienna. He held a number of diplomatic posts in the 3rd « Reich ». During the Second World War, he was appointed as the leading German foreign ministry official for the Balkans (including Greece, Serbia, Albania and Montenegro) .

Neubacher was educated in Kremsmünster and Vienna before seeing service in Italy in World War I. Initially connected to the Social-Democratic Party of Austria through his friendship with a number of leading members whilst in charge of a housing project in Vienna, he became attracted to Pan-Germanism and, in 1925, founded his own « Österreichisch-Deutscher Volksbund » as a society for this school of thought. He was also a member of the « Deutsche Gemeinschaft » secret society and, in this group, he built-up friendships with fellow members Engelbert Dollfuß and Arthur Seyß-Inquart.

Neubacher became a member of the Nazi Party in Austria because he felt it was the best way to bring about « Anschluß », although he was more in tune with the Anton Reinthaller led moderate faction than the extremists under Theodor Habicht. After a spell as assistant to Josef Leopold, he became « Landesleiter » of the Austrian Nazi Party in 1935, attempting to restructure the banned group. His tenure came to an end the same year when he was imprisoned for distributing illegal material and upon his release he dropped-out of politics to take-up a role with « IG Farben » .

Under the Nazis, he was chosen to serve as Mayor of Vienna, although he soon incurred disfavour for his habit of working with former Social-Democrats and his lax attitude towards the Jews and, before long, he was downgraded to the role of general representative of Josef Bürckel.

When War broke-out, Neubacher took on the role of a special plenipotentiary envoy in the Balkans and Greece, initially serving as an economic adviser in Romania before taking on the role of ambassador to the same country and, afterwards, Greece as well. In Greece, he was joined by Italian Alberto D'Agostino, with the 2 men given full-authority over economic and financial matters after discussions between the Greek government and the occupiers aimed at reducing occupation costs. During the final days of the occupation of Greece, the more moderate Neubacher became embroiled in a struggle with « Sicherheitspolizei » chief Walter Blume, after Blume suggested that the Nazis should undertake a policy of executing all members of the political elite suspected of having links to the United Kingdom, so as to leave the country leaderless (the so-called « Chaos thesis ») . Neubacher rejected this as counter-productive, arguing that, as long as politicians opposed the work of the Communist-controlled National Liberation Front and the Greek People's Liberation Army, their British links should be ignored. In the end, Neubacher's line was approved and Blume was withdrawn, a move that ultimately left in place a strong pro-British Right-wing governing class in post-liberation Greece.

In 1943, he devised the Neubacher Plan as a means to improve German occupation in the Balkans. In a wide ranging raft of reforms, Neubacher suggested 5 main ideas to Joachim von Ribbentrop. These were :

The return of Montenegro to Serbia.

Installing General Milan Nedić as President of the resulting Greater Serbia.

Autonomy in Montenegro.

The re-opening of the University of Belgrade and an end to German supervision of cultural life.

Reduction in German military presence and the establishment of a gendarmerie controlled by the new government.

Ultimately, only point 4 of his proposals was approved, although he did succeed in ending German military reprisals and, in combating to an extent, the Ustaše reprisals against Serbs.

After the War, Neubacher faced trial in the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and, in 1946, a military court in Belgrade sentenced him to 20 years of hard labour, although he was not ultimately required to serve the full-sentence. He served his prison term in Belgrade, in the building of the former « Gestapo » headquarters. He was released from prison in November 1952 due to poor health. Back in Austria, he worked as a building constructor in Salzburg, and from 1954-1956, he worked in Ethiopia as a consultant to Emperor Haile Selasie.

Hermann Neubacher (geboren 24. Juni 1893 in Wels, Oberösterreich ; gestorben 1. Juli 1960 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Wirtschaftsfachmann und Politiker der Nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Arbeiterpartei. Von 13. März 1938 bis 14. Dezember 1940 war er Bürgermeister von Wien.

Hermann Neubacher war Kriegsteilnehmer und hatte als Kaiserlich und Königlich Offizier eine kroatische Kompanie geführt. Im Jahr 1919 legte er an der damaligen Hochschule für Bodenkultur eine Dissertation zu einem forstwirtschaftlichen Thema vor. Seit seinem Studium war er Mitglied im Wiener Akademischen Turnverein. Neubacher war ab dem Jahre 1920 in der Holzindustrie tätig. Außerdem fungierte er in Wien als Generaldirektor der GESIBA (Gemeinnützige Siedlungs- und Baustoffanstalt) , die maßgeblich am sozialen Wohnungsbau in Wien beteiligt war. Als Mitglied des « Österreichisch-Deutschen Volksbundes » agitierte Neubacher zusammen mit Arthur Seyß-Inquart und anderen großdeutsch eingestellten Politikern für den « Anschluß » Österreichs an Deutschland und wurde nach der « Machtergreifung » Adolf Hitlers am 30. Januar 1933 im Deutschen Reich Mitglied der Nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Arbeiterpartei in Österreich.

Als österreichische Nationalsozialisten am 25. Juli 1934 den Versuch unternahmen, den austrofaschistischen Ständestaat durch einen Putsch zu beseitigen (Juliputsch) , und dabei Bundeskanzler Engelbert Dollfuß ermordeten, tauchte die Partei unter ; in dieser Phase der Illegalität übernahm zeitweilig Neubacher die Führung der mittlerweile verbotenen österreichischen NSDAP, wurde aber im Juni 1935 zusammen mit seinem innerparteilichen Widersacher Josef Leopold verhaftet. Beide wurden aufgrund des Juliabkommens von 1936 amnestiert, Neubacher war fortan « für die reichsdeutschen IG-Farben als Balkanexperte (unter Einschluß Österreichs) tätig » .

Nachdem der Anschluß Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich tatsächlich mit dem Einmarsch der Wehrmacht am 12. März 1938 vollzogen wurde, löste Neubacher bereits am folgenden Tag Richard Schmitz als Bürgermeister Wiens ab ; diese Position behielt er bis zum 14. Dezember 1940. Anschließend wurde Hermann Neubacher Abgesandter in Bukarest und Athen.

Am 15. Oktober 1942 wurde Neubacher zum « Sonderbeauftragten des Reiches für wirtschaftliche und finanzielle Fragen in Griechenland » berufen, dem die monopolistische DEGRIGES direkt unterstand. Zum Finanz- und Superminister über alle « produktiven Resorts » bestimmte er Hektor Tsironikos, von dem er sagte, daß dessen « Deutschfreundlichkeit über jeden Zweifel erhaben » sei.

Vom 24. August 1943 bis Kriegsende war Neubacher Sonderbevollmächtigter des Auswärtigen Amtes für den Südosten und dem Militärbefehlshaber Südost in Serbien gleichgestellt. Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges wurde er in Jugoslawien im Jahr 1951 zu 20 Jahren Gefängnis verurteilt, jedoch bereits nach wenigen Monaten schwer krank entlassen. In den Jahren 1954 bis 1956 war Neubacher von der Regierung des Kaiserreichs Äthiopien als « Berater und Verwaltungskommissar der Stadt Addis Abeba » eingesetzt. Während des zweieinhalbjährigen Aufenthalts in Äthiopien lernte er das Land kennen und verfasste ein Buch über diese Zeit.

Hermann Neubacher kehrte zurück nach Österreich und war vor allem als Bauunternehmer in Salzburg tätig.

Marcus J. Carney versuchte in einer Dokumentation Film Projekt Neubacher die Geschichte seines Onkels sowie seiner Familie und deren Aufarbeitung nach dem Weltkrieg darzustellen und legte es auf die österreichische Nachkriegsgeneration um, der er den « morbus austriacus » (die österreichische Krankheit) attestierte.

Maire nazi de Vienne : Philipp Wilhelm Jung (1940-1943)

The German Nazi politician Philipp Wilhelm Jung was born on 16 September 1884 in Nieder-Flörsheim, in the Grand Duchy of Heße ; and died on 9 September 1965 in Worms, West Germany.

Jung was the son of an elementary school teacher. He earned a doctoral degree in law. He joined the SA in 1927 and the Nazi Party in 1930. In 1933, after the Nazi « Machtergreifung » , he became president of the Hessian parliament. After the dismissal of Wilhelm Ehrhard by the Nazis, Jung was appointed provisional mayor of the city of Mainz. Already, in May 1933, he was displaced by Robert Barth. He was prime minister of the People's State of Heße from September 1933 until March 1935 when this function was taken over by Jakob Sprenger. During World War II, Jung was the mayor of Vienna from 1940 to 1943.
