It was always the same recordings that were played, and, usually, the guests knew the number of the record by heart. When Hitler said, for example, « Aida, last act : The fatal stone upon me now is closing. » , then one of the guests would shout the catalogue number to a member of the household staff : « Record number 100 whatever. » .

According to Albert Speer :

« Before long, the order of the records became virtually fixed. Ist, he wanted a few bravura selections from Wagnerian Operas, to be followed promptly with Operettas. »

All the while, he would try to guess the names of the singers and, as Speer remarked, « was pleased when he guessed right, as he frequently did » .

« Aïda » is an Opera in 4 acts by Giuseppe Verdi to an Italian libretto by Antonio Ghislanzoni, based on a scenario often attributed to French Egyptologist, Auguste Mariette. « Aïda » was Ist performed at the Khedivial Opera House in Cairo, on 24 December 1871, conducted by Giovanni Bottesini.

Adolf Hitler was not genuinely fond of Beethoven and, as time passed, his attendance at performances of his Symphonies was usually confined to official events. This was awkward.

Traditionally, Germans looked upon Beethoven along with Gøthe, Rembrandt and Shakespeare as the supreme figures of modern Western culture.

Unlike the others, however, Beethoven was never just a cultural figure, but also an ideological symbol, invoked by every political movement.

National-Socialists, and Alfred Rosenberg in particular, claimed the composer as an « Aryan » hero ; and his music as an elixir that would contribute to the Nation's renewal.

Ludwig van Beethoven (baptized 17 December 1770 - 26 March 1827) was a German composer and pianist. A crucial figure in the transition between the Classical and Romantic eras in Western art music, he remains one of the most famous and influential of all composers. His best-known compositions include his 9 Symphonies, his 5 Piano Concertos, his 32 Piano Sonatas, and his 16 String Quartets. He also composed other chamber music, choral works (including the celebrated « Missa solemnis ») , and lieder.

In his speeches, Adolf Hitler consequently felt obliged to give the composer his due, but his praise rarely rose above the perfunctory.

So, if Hitler had his Wagner, the Party had its Beethoven. When Hitler « entertained » on State occasions, Wagner was performed ; when the Party was « entertained » on Party occasions, Beethoven was played. And played he was, more often than any other Symphonic composer.

His works, above all the 9th Symphony, were the pre-eminent musical set pieces for important occasions. When Hitler wanted to impress State visitors, he hauled them off to a gala performance of a Wagnerian Opera.

In 1938, anxious to gain Hungarian support for his impending dismemberment of Czechoslovakia ; he invited the Prince Regent, Admiral Horthy, to make a State visit.

Miklós Horthy de Nagybánya, in German : Nikolaus von Horthy und Nagybánya (18 June 1868 - 9 February 1957) , was Regent of the Kingdom of Hungary during the years between World Wars I and II and throughout most of World War II, serving from 1 March 1920 to 15 October 1944. He was styled « His Serene Highness the Regent of the Kingdom of Hungary » (« Ő Főméltósága a Magyar Királyság Kormányzója ») .

The social high-point of the occasion was a stunning performance of the Opera « Lohengrin » , a rather tactless choice considering the Opera opens with a call to arms to defend Germany from the Hungarian invader.

The following year, Prince Paul, Prince Regent of Yugoslavia, was invited to Berlin for similar reasons, in this case the imminent invasion of Poland. He was treated to the happier « Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

Prince Paul of Yugoslavia, also known as Paul Karađorđević (27 April 1893 - 14 September 1976) , was Regent of Yugoslavia during the minority of King Peter II. Peter was the eldest son of his 1st cousin Alexander I. His title in Yugoslavia was « Његово Краљевско Височанство, Кнез Намесник » (His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent) . In 1939, Prince Paul, as acting head of State, accepted an official invitation from Adolf Hitler and spent 9 days in Berlin.

Hitler apparently believed that outstanding musical performances (like his magnificent works of architecture) would leave foreign leaders in awe of the greatness of the 3rd « Reich » and incline them to support his policies.

Hitler's admirer Hans Severus Ziegler and conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler traced his antipathy to the old rivalry between the « Brahms and Bruckner Camps » , in Vienna.

Hans Severus Ziegler (13 October 1893 - 1 May 1978) was a German publicist, intendant, teacher and National-Socialist Party official. A leading cultural director under the Nazis, he was closely associated with the censorship and cultural co-ordination of the 3rd « Reich » . Ziegler played a leading role in promoting the Nazi vision of culture, particularly with regards to « degenerate » music (« Entartete Musik ») . He was a strong critic of atonality, dismissing it as decadent « cultural Bolshevism » .

In an attempt to have him overlook history, and concentrate on the music, they persuaded him to attend a concert of the Berlin Philharmonic, which included the Brahms's 4th Symphony. But when he blithely commented afterwards, « Well, Furtwängler is such a good conductor that under such a baton even Brahms is impressive. » , they admitted defeat.

Johannes Brahms (7 May 1833 - 3 April 1897) was a German composer and pianist. Born in Hamburg, into a Lutheran family, Brahms spent much of his professional life in Vienna where he was a leader of the musical scene. In his lifetime, Brahms's popularity and influence were considerable ; following a comment by the 19th Century conductor Hans von Bülow, he is sometimes grouped with Johann Sebastian Bach and Ludwig van Beethoven (the 3 « B » 's) .

Unfortunately, the record is silent on what Adolf Hitler thought of Richard Strauß's Operas, or even which ones he knew.

Richard Georg Strauß (11 June 1864 - 8 September 1949) was a leading German composer of the late-Romantic and early Modern eras. He is known for his Operas, which include « Der Rosenkavalier » and « Salome » ; his lieder, especially his « 4 Last Songs » ; and his tone poems and other orchestral works, such as « Death and Transfiguration » , « Also sprach Zarathustra » , « An Alpine Symphony » , and « Metamorphosen » . Strauß was also a prominent conductor throughout Germany and Austria. Strauß represents the late flowering of German Romanticism after Richard Wagner, in which pioneering subtleties of orchestration are combined with an advanced harmonic style.

The story that Adolf Hitler begged money from relatives to attend the Austrian premiere of « Salome » in Graz, in May 1906, an event that also drew most of the eminent composers of the day, is possibly apocryphal.

« Salome », Opus 54, is an Opera in I Act by Richard Strauß to a German libretto by the composer, based on Hedwig Lachmann's German translation of the French play « Salomé » by Oscar Wilde. Strauß dedicated the Opera to his friend Sir Edgar Speyer.

The Opera is famous (at the time of its premiere, infamous) for its « Dance of the Seven Veils ». It is now better known for the more shocking final scene (often a concert-piece for dramatic sopranos), where Salome declares her love to (and kisses) the severed head of John the Baptist.

Not until after the « Anschluß », in 1938, did Hitler even visited Vienna.

Hitler liked the best-known Operas of Giuseppe Verdi and Giacomo Puccini. In fact, a performance of « Madama Butterfly » at the Berlin « Volksoper », in 1937, left him so delighted that he decided, then and there, to donate 100,000 Marks a year, to the Opera Company.

Even so, when once attending a performance of « La Bohème », what he talked about during the intermissions was Wagner and Bayreuth. Otherwise, there were few if any non-German composers whose works he could abide.

According to Heinrich Hoffmann, he especially disliked Igor Stravinsky and Serguei Prokofiev, and when Hoffmann's daughter, Henriette von Schirach, presented him with a recording of Piotr Ilyitch Tchaïkovsky's 6th Symphony, he brusquely refused to listen to it.

Heinrich Hoffmann (September 12, 1885 - December 11, 1957) was a German photographer best-known for his many published photographs of Adolf Hitler. Hoffmann married Therese « Lelly » Baumann, who was very fond of Hitler, in 1911, their daughter Henriette (« Henny ») was born on February 3, 1913 and followed by a son, Heinrich (« Heini ») on October 24, 1916. Henriette married « Reichsjugendführer » (National Hitler Youth commander) Baldur von Schirach, who provided introductions to many of Hoffmann's picture books, in 1932. Therese Hoffmann died a sudden and unexpected death, in 1928. Hoffmann and his 2nd wife Erna introduced his Munich studio assistant, Eva Braun, to Hitler. Braun later became Hitler's female companion.

Adolf Hitler liked his music to be melodic, euphonious and accessible. Hitler's taste underwent several significant changes, however. During most of his life, the music of Anton Bruckner held little appeal.

Anton Bruckner (4 September 1824 - 11 October 1896) was an Austrian composer known for his Symphonies, Masses, and Motets. The 1st are considered emblematic of the final stage of Austro-German Romanticism because of their rich harmonic language, strongly polyphonic character, and considerable length. Bruckner's compositions helped to define contemporary musical radicalism, owing to their dissonances, unprepared modulations, and roving harmonies. Unlike other musical radicals, such as Richard Wagner or Hugo Wolf who fit the « enfant terrible » mould, Bruckner showed extreme humility before other musicians, Wagner in particular. This apparent dichotomy between Bruckner, the man, and Bruckner, the composer, hampers efforts to describe his life in a way that gives a straightforward context for his music.

Heinrich Hoffmann did not so much as mention the composer's name when once identifying Hitler's favourites.

Even after becoming chancellor, Albert Speer noted, his interest « never seemed very marked » .

Anton Bruckner had, however, symbolic importance to him, both as a « home-town boy » and as a rival to Johannes Brahms, so beloved in Vienna. It was a fixed part of the Nuremberg rallies for the cultural session to open with a movement of one of his Symphonies.

In June 1937, Adolf Hitler was famously photographed paying his respects to Anton Bruckner ; standing in mute homage before a monument at « Walhalla Hall of Fame » near Regensburg, as Siegmund von Hausegger and the Munich Philharmonic played the magnificent Adagio of the 7th Symphony. Why Hitler staged that event is not known.

On 7 June 1937, Adolf Hitler installed the bust of austrian composer Anton Bruckner in the famous Regensburg « Walhalla » (a « Hall of Fame » for German Heroes built by Ludwig I of Bavaria from 1830 to 1841) . Richard Wagner, of course, had already been honoured in the « Walhalla » .

On the night of 13th - 14th January 1942, after hearing Bruckner's 7th Symphony, Hitler remarked :

« This work is based on popular airs of Upper-Austria. They're not textually reproduced, but, repeatedly, I recognise in passing Tyrolean dances of my youth. It's wonderful what he managed to get out of that folklore. As it happened, it's a priest to whom we must give the credit for having protected this great Master. The Bishop of Linz used to sit in his cathedral for hours at a time, listening to Bruckner play the organ. He was the greatest organist of his day. »

(« Hitler's Table Talk, 1941-1944 » , edited by H.R. Trevor-Roper ; introduction by Gerhard L. Weinberg.)

Speculation has ranged from the theory that the « Walhalla » intronisation ceremony was intended as a cultural precursor of the annexation of Austria, the following year, to the notion that it was out of nostalgia for his « beautiful time as a choirboy » and Lambach Abbey, with its Bruckner associations.

Undoubtedly, Hitler felt a personal kinship. Both had come from small Austrian towns, grew-up in modest circumstances, had fathers who died at an early age, were autodidacts, and made their way in life despite great obstacles. On a number of occasions, he contrasted the Austrian Catholic Bruckner, whom the Viennese shunned, to the north German Protestant Johannes Brahms, whom they idolized. Then, suddenly in 1940, he developed a passion for Bruckner's Symphonies. He even began mentioning him in the same breath with Wagner. Josef Gæbbels noted in his diary :

« He told me that it was only now during the War, that he had learned to like him at all. »

The enthusiasm steadily grew.

Paul Josef Gœbbels (29 October 1897 - 1 May 1945) was a German politician and « Reich » Minister of Propaganda in Nazi Germany, from 1933 to 1945. He one of Adolf Hitler's closest associates and most devout followers.

By 1942, Gœbbels placed Bruckner on a level with Beethoven, and categorized the former's 7th Symphony as « one of the most splendid manifestations of German musical creativity, the equivalent of Beethoven's 9th » .

His feelings about Bruckner, man and composer, are best conveyed by remarks he made after listening to a recording of the 1st movement of the 7th at his military headquarters, in January 1942 :

« Those are pure popular melodies from Upper-Austria, nothing taken over literally but, “ Ländler ” and so on, that I know from my youth. What the man made-out of this primitive material ! In this case, it was a priest who deserves well for having supported a great Master. »

« The Bishop of Linz sat for hours, alone in the cathedral, when Bruckner, the greatest organist of his time, played the organ. »

« One can imagine how difficult it was for a small peasant lad when he went to Vienna, that urbanized, debauched society. »

A remark by Bruckner about Johannes Brahms, which a newspaper recently carried, brought him closer to me :

« Brahms' music is quite lovely, but he preferred his own. »

« That is the healthy self-confidence of a peasant who is modest but when it came down to it knew how to promote a cause when it was his own. »

« That critic Hanslick made his life in Vienna hell. But when he could no longer be ignored, he was given honours and awards. But what could he do with those ? It was his creative activity that should have been made easier. Brahms was praised to the heavens. »

From then on, Hitler did everything possible to promote Bruckner and to enlist him in his vendetta against Vienna. Saint-Florian, where the composer's career had begun, was to be turned into a pilgrimage site in the manner of Bayreuth.

Gœbbels noted :

« He wants to establish a new cultural centre here. Simply as a counter-weight to Vienna, which must gradually be shoved aside. He intends to renovate Saint-Florian at his own expense. »

Accordingly, Hitler financed a centre of Bruckner studies there, had the famous organ repaired and augmented the composer's library.

He even designed a monument in his honour to stand in Linz, and endowed a Bruckner Orchestra which he was determined to make one of the world's best.

The publication of the Robert Haas edition of the composer's original scores was subsidized from his own funds. And he dreamed of constructing a bell tower in Linz with a carillon that would play a theme from the 4th Symphony.

An even more startling transformation in Hitler's musical taste was a growing passion for Operetta, in particular Franz Lehár's « Die lustige Witwe » (The Merry Widow) .

Franz Lehár (30 April 1870 - 24 October 1948) was an Austro-Hungarian composer. He is mainly known for his Operettas of which the most successful and best-known is « The Merry Widow » .

Adolf Hitler enjoyed Lehár's music, and hostility diminished across Germany after Goebbels's intervention on Lehár's part. The National-Socialist regime was aware of the uses of Lehár's music for propaganda purposes : concerts of his music were given in occupied Paris, in 1941. Even so, Lehár's influence was limited.

« Die lustige Witwe » is an Operetta by the Austro-Hungarian composer, Franz Lehár. The librettists, Viktor Léon and Leo Stein, based the story (concerning a rich widow, and her countrymen's attempt to keep her money in the principality by finding her the right husband) on an 1861 comedy play, « L'attaché d'ambassade » (The Embassy Attaché) by Henri Meilhac.

The Operetta has enjoyed extraordinary international success since its 1905 premiere in Vienna and continues to be frequently revived and recorded. Film and other adaptations have also been made. Well-known music from the score includes the « Vilja Song » , « Da geh' ich zu Maxim » (You'll Find Me at Maxim's) , and the « Merry Widow Waltz » .

There was a remarkable irony in this. Although Hitler almost always avoided mentioning the names of contemporary composers and their works, in speeches in 1920 and 1922, he singled-out « Die lustige Witwe » as a pre-eminent example of artistic « kitsch » . There is no way of knowing when he changed his mind. But, some time in the 1930's, that very Opera became one of his favourites. He never missed a new production of either that or Johann Strauß' « Die Fledermaus » , and drew large sums from his private account for lavish new stagings.

Johann Strauß II (October 25, 1825 - June 3, 1899) , also known as Johann Baptist Strauß or Johann Strauß, Junior, the Younger, or the Son (« Sohn ») , was an Austrian composer of light music, particularly dance music and Operettas. He composed over 400 waltzes, polkas, quadrilles, and other types of dance music, as well as several Operettas and a ballet. In his lifetime, he was known as « The Waltz King » , and was largely then responsible for the popularity of the waltz in Vienna during the 19th Century. Among his Operettas, « Die Fledermaus » and « Der Zigeunerbaron » are the best-known.

Eventually, Hitler came to revere Franz Lehár as one of the greatest of composers. So thrilled was he upon meeting the composer, in 1936, at a session of the « Reichskulturkammer » that he talked about the experience for days afterwards.

The « Reichskulturkammer » or « RKK » (« Reich » Chamber of Culture) was an institution in the 3rd « Reich » . It was established by law, on 22 September 1933, in the course of the « Gleichschaltung » (coordination ; making the same ; bringing into line) process at the instigation of « “ Reich ” Kunst Minister » Josef Gœbbels as a professional organization of all German creative artists. Defying the claims raised by the German Labour Front (« Deutsche Arbeitsfront » , or « DAF ») under rival Robert Ley, it was designed to control the cultural life in Germany, promoting art created by « Aryans » , and seen as consistent with National-Socialist ideals.

Every artist had to apply for membership on presentation of an « Aryan certificate » .

The « Reichskulturkammer » was affiliated with the Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda with its seat in Berlin and was headed by Doctor Paul Josef Gœbbels.

The importance of Franz Lehár's music in the last years of Hitler's life was evident when he celebrated his birthday, in 1943, by treating himself, and his guests, to a recording of « Die lustige Witwe » .

Clearly, Hitler had a keen ear, but how much did he actually know about music ?

He possessed a powerful memory, and, in fields that interested him, he often befuddled specialists with his detailed, even expert, knowledge.

In fact, confounding professionals, and showing-off to his entourage, gave him wicked pleasure, and those around him occasionally suspected that he boned-up on a topic only to bring the conversation round to it so that he could exhibit his « extraordinary knowledge » .

After the Viennese premiere of Richard Strauß' « Friedenstag » , Adolf Hitler gave a reception for the artists at which, according to one account, « He showed an astonishing array of musical knowledge, and was able, for example, to remind Hans Hotter of what he had been singing 10 years previously :

« Isn't Scarpia too high for you ? That G-flat in Act II ? »

While confirming the story, Hotter commented that it was difficult to draw much of a conclusion from it. « Hitler had an exceptionally good memory. »

According to the nature of an event (in this case, music) , he would prepare himself by reading relevant literature and surprise everybody by his insider's knowledge.

« Friedenstag » (Peace Day) is an Opera in 1 Act by Richard Strauß, his Opus 81, to a German libretto by Josef Gregor. The Opera was premiered in Munich, on 24 July 1938, and dedicated to Viorica Ursuleac and her husband Clemens Krauß, the lead and conductor respectively. Strauß had intended « Friedenstag » as part of a double-bill, to be conducted by Karl Böhm, in Dresden, that would include as the 2nd part his next Opera, « Daphne » .

Most accounts of Hitler's musical expertise relate to his knowledge of Wagnerian Opera.

Typical was a comment of Winifred Wagner who, as her secretary recorded, « could not stop raving about what an attentive listener he is and how well he knows the works, above all musically » .

In the same vein, Heinz Tietjen remarked that he was « amazed » at how well the « Führer » knew Richard Wagner's scores, citing as an example Hitler's comment after a performance that the oboe had not played quite in tune. « And I had to acknowledge he was right. » , the impresario said.

Heinz Tietjen (June 24, 1881 - November 30, 1967) was a German conductor and music producer. He was the director of the « Deutsche Oper » Berlin, between 1925 and 1927, then director of the Prussian State Theatre. From 1931 to 1944, he served as artistic director at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » for Winifred Wagner with whom he had a Romantic liaison.

More convincing are the comments of Baldur von Schirach. Writing after he had served 20 years in the prison of Spandau, he cannot be suspected of gilding the lily. He recalled a performance of « Die Walküre » , which Hitler had attended in Weimar, in 1925.

Schirach's father was managing director of the Opera House and, after the performance, Hitler was introduced to him and went on at great length about what he had seen and heard in a way that demonstrated he really knew his Wagner.

He compared the production with those he had attended in Vienna as a young man, naming singers and conductors, and so impressed the elder Schirach that he was invited home to tea. After he left, Schirach « père » (senior) was said to have commented :

« In all my life, I never met a layman who understood so much about music, Wagner's in particular. »

Baldur Benedikt von Schirach (9 May 1907 - 8 August 1974) was a Nazi youth leader later convicted of crimes against humanity. He was the head of the « Hitler-Jugend » or « HJ » (the Hitler Youth) ; and « Gauleiter » ; and « Reichsstatthalter » (« Reich » Governor) of Vienna. Schirach was born in Berlin, the youngest of 4 children of theatre director « Rittmeister » Carl Baily Norris von Schirach (1873-1948) and his American wife Emma Middleton Lynah Tillou (1872-1944) . Through his mother, Schirach descended from 2 signatories of the United States Declaration of Independence. He had 2 sisters, Viktoria and Rosalind von Schirach, and a brother, Karl Benedict von Schirach, who committed suicide in 1919, at the age of 19.

Schirach joined a « Wehrjugendgruppe » (military cadet group) at the age of 10 and became a member of the « NSDAP », in 1925. He was soon transferred to Munich and, in 1929, became leader of the « Nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Studentenbund » or « NSDStB » (National-Socialist German Students' League) . In 1931, he was a « Reichsjugendführer » (youth leader) in the « NSDAP » and, in 1933, he was made head of the Hitler Youth and given an « SA » rank of « Gruppenführer » . He was made a State secretary, in 1936.

To this account, Albert Speer added that, at his 50th birthday celebration in 1939, Hitler had been particularly excited by a gift of some of Wagner's original scores and, as he leafed through that of « Götterdämmerung », « showed sheet after sheet to the assembled guests, making knowledgeable comments » .

Which were Hitler's favourite Operas ?

Despite the poverty of his Vienna years, he managed to attend « Tristan und Isolde » alone 30 or 40 times, and, in the course of his life, heard it, and « Die Meistersinger », probably a 100 times.

« Tristan und Isolde » is an Opera, or music-drama, in 3 Acts by Richard Wagner to a German libretto by the composer, based largely on the romance by Gottfried von Straßburg. It was composed between 1857 and 1859 and premiered in Munich, on 10 June 1865, with Hans von Bülow conducting. Wagner referred to the work not as an Opera, but called it « eine Handlung » (literally : a drama, a plot or an action) .

Wagner's composition of « Tristan und Isolde » was inspired by his affair with Mathilde Wesendonck and the philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer. Widely acknowledged as one of the peaks of the Operatic repertory, « Tristan » was notable for Wagner's advanced use of chromaticism, tonality, orchestral colour and harmonic suspension.

According to his press chief, Otto Dietrich, Adolf Hitler knew « Die Meistersinger » by heart and could hum or whistle all its themes.

« Lohengrin » no doubt held a special place in his heart.

According to Joachim Fest, Hitler considered the final scene of « Götterdämmerung » to be « the summit » of all Opera.

Joachim Clemens Fest (8 December 1926 - 11 September 2006) was a German historian, journalist, critic and editor, best-known for his writings and public commentary on Nazi Germany, including an important biography of Adolf Hitler and books about Albert Speer.

Fest further cites Albert Speer as having told him, « In Bayreuth, whenever the Citadel of the Gods collapsed in flames amid the musical uproar, in the darkness of the loggia, he would take the hand of Frau Wagner, sitting next to him, and in deep emotion bestow a kiss upon it. » .

Be that as it may, it was « Tristan und Isolde » that meant most to him.

After listening one evening, in 1942, to a recording of the « Prelude und Liebestod » , Hitler commented : « Well, ' Tristan ' was his greatest work. » .

According to Christa Schröder, the « Liebestod » moved him so deeply that he said he wished to hear it at the time of his death.

And in a letter from Landsberg prison, in 1924, Hitler wrote that he often « dreamed of Tristan » .

At a 1938 Bayreuth performance, Winifred Wagner observed : « He is over-joyed at each beautiful passage that he especially loves ; then, his face just shines. »

There is no way of knowing whether it was the eroticism, the sense of longing, the triumph of sensuality over reason that (in contrast to his own repressed sexual instincts) appealed to him. Possibly, it was the cult of the night or the tragic end. Maybe just the music.

« Tannhäuser » engaged him less, and he was long familiar only with the composer's earliest score, the so-called « Dresden Version » .

At some point, in the 1930's, Hitler heard the later « Paris Version » , and was so taken with it that he ordered Goebbels and Göring to permit only that score to be performed.

Despite the fact that Hitler seemed to favour « Tristan » , the most significant of Wagner's works for Hitler, despite his comments about « Tristan » and « Götterdämmerung » , was « Parsifal » ; and that was the reason why he wanted Alfred Roller to re-stage it at Bayreuth.

This elucidates Hans Frank's story that, while riding on his train through the Rhineland, in 1936, Adolf Hitler asked to have played for him a recording of Karl Muck's performance of the « Parsifal Vorspiel » . Afterwards, in a deeply contemplative mood, he remarked, « Out of Parsifal, I shall make for myself a religion, religious service in solemn form without theological disputation. » .

He recalled that the Vienna Opera archive held sketches of Alfred Roller's 1914 production and he commended these as models for producers.

Not waiting for the « final victory » , Josef Goebbels passed on the word to his ministerial officials with instructions to have photographs of the Alfred Roller sketches circulated to every Opera House. Managers were informed that any future staging of the work was to follow the Roller model and « was no longer to be done in the Byzantine-sacred style that was common up to then » .

For Hitler, the Gnostic themes of the Grail Quest, and the cosmic struggle between « Light and Darkness » were perfectly portrayed in « Parsifal » .

Being an occult initiate, Hitler was aware of the Gnostic message behind « the externals of the story, with its Christian embroidery ; the real message was pure, noble blood, in whose protection and glorification the brotherhood of the initiated have come together » .

Adolf Hitler's interpretation of « Parsifal » : « I have built-up my religion out of “ Parsifal ”. Divine worship in solemn form without pretenses of humility. One can serve God only in the garb of the hero. » .

« What is celebrated in Wagner's “ Parsifal ” is not the Christian religion of compassion, but pure and noble blood ; blood whose purity the brotherhood of initiates has come together to guard. The king (Amfortas) then suffers an incurable sickness, caused by his tainted blood. Then, the unknowing but pure human being (Parsifal) is led into temptation, either to submit to the frenzy and to the delights of a corrupt civilisation in Klingsor's magic garden, or to join the select band of knights who guard the secret of life, which is pure blood itself. All of us suffer the sickness of miscegenated, corrupted blood. Note how the compassion that leads to knowledge applies only to the man who is inwardly corrupt, to the man of contradictions. And Eternal life, as vouchsafed by the Grail, is only granted to those who are truly pure and noble ! »

« Only a new nobility can bring about the new culture. If we discount everything to do with poetry, it is clear that elitism and renewal exist only in the continuing strain of a lasting struggle. A divisive process is taking place in terms of World History. The man who sees the meaning of life in conflict will gradually mount the stairs of a new aristocracy. He who desires the dependent joys of peace and order will sink back down to the unhistorical mass, no matter what his provenance. But the mass is prey to decay and self-disintegration. At this turning point in the World's revolution, the mass is the sum of declining culture and its moribund representatives. They should be left to die, together with all kings like Amfortas. »

« The old beliefs will be brought back to honour again. The whole secret knowledge of nature, of the divine, the demonic. We will wash off the Christian veneer and bring-out a religion peculiar to our race. »

It has sometimes been assumed that Hitler was attracted to Richard Wagner's works because of the plots, with their Classic conflict between the outsider and a rigid social order, their lonely heroes and dark villains, their Nordic myths and Germanic legends.

However (apart from « Parsifal ») , there is no record of any comment on how he interpreted the works, or whether he saw in them any ideological message ; much less whether he envisaged himself as « Lohengrin » , « Siegmund » , « Siegfried » , « Wotan » or any other Wagnerian character. It was the music that moved him.

Hitler said :

« When I hear Wagner, it seems to me like the rhythms of the primeval world. And I could imagine that science will one day find measures of creation in the proportions of the physically perceptible vibrations of the Rheingold music. »

Perhaps, he was trying to say what Thomas Mann wrote in « Doktor Faustus » that the elements of music are the 1st and simplest materials of the world, and make music one with the world, that « the beginning of all things had its music » .

Christa Schröder recalled his saying that, « Wagner's musical language sounded in his ear like a revelation of the divine » .

The vocabulary suggests that the feelings conjured by the Operas may have filled the void left by the conventional Catholic religious belief he lost, or never really had, and it is quite clear that Hitler saw « Parsifal » in religious terms. In one of his earliest speeches, he made the revealing comment that, in their way, Wagner's works were holy, that they offered « exaltation and liberation from all the wretchedness and misery as well as all the decadence that prevails » , and that they lift one « up into the pure air » .

If escape and purification were part of the appeal, the Operas also responded to that proclivity for the overwhelming, the oceanic, the Romantic, the orgasmic that was evident in his public rallies, parades and spectacles. Like Wagner himself, Hitler believed that music fully realized itself only when it fused with other arts in visible form on stage.

And, like Wagner, his interest extended to virtually every aspect of Operatic production, down to the fabric and design of the theatre itself. He was fascinated by backstage operations, including the functioning of stage machinery. During his visit to Weimar, in 1925, Hitler asked to go behind the stage at the National Theatre. Schirach was with him at the time and later remarked, « He was familiar with all sorts of lighting systems and could discourse in detail on the proper illumination for certain scenes. » .

Hans Severus Ziegler recalled taking a walk with Hitler one night at the Berghof, when the moon suddenly appeared from behind, a cloud and lit the surrounding meadow. Hitler stopped in his tracks and launched into a discussion of the colour of light necessary to achieve verisimilitude for moonlight on a stage, as in the concluding scene of the 2nd act of « Die Meistersinger » . He was insistent that it should be white ; but « it is often greenish or blueish and that is wrong » , he complained : « That is just Romantic “ kitsch ”. » .

Already in his youth, Hitler had made sketches of Wagnerian stage sets that he imagined or actually saw. Although a drawing of « Siegfried » holding a raised sword is a « Kujau » forgery, several authentic sketches survived. Among them is one of the 2nd Act of « Lohengrin » ; others include his rendering of the 2nd and 3rd Acts of the famous 1903 « Mahler-Roller » production of « Tristan und Isolde » , which he had attended in Vienna.

This interest in stage design increased after he became Chancellor, and reached such a level that it was common knowledge that the best way to get an appointment with him, which otherwise might take months, was to let him know that you had photos of a new staging of an Operetta or Opera, particularly Wagnerian. An invitation was almost certain to follow, and then Hitler would spend countless hours studying the pictures.

Most of all, he relished working with Benno von Arent, and, together, they designed several productions that he commissioned and paid for with his private funds. Among them, « Lohengrin » , in 1935, at the German Opera, in Berlin ; « Rienzi » , in 1939, at the Dietrich Eckart Open Air Theatre, in Berlin ; « Die Meistersinger » , in 1934 ; and, later years, at the Nuremberg Opera in connection with the Party rally.

Benno von Arent (19 July 1898 in Görlitz, Prussia - 14 October 1956) was a member of the National-Socialist Party and « SS » , responsible for art, theatres, movies. Self-taught, after various apprentice positions, he obtained his 1st theatre job in Berlin, in 1923, and became a stage-designer. He joined the « SS » , in 1931, and the « NSDAP » , in 1932. The same year, he was one of the founders of the « Bund nationalsozialistischer Bühnen- und Filmkünstler » (Union of National-Socialist stage and movie artists) , which was renamed « Kameradschaft deutscher Künstler » (Fellowship of German artists) after Adolf Hitler's rise to power, in 1933. Arent was appointed « Reichsbühnenbildner » (« Reich » stage-designer) , in 1936, and « Reichsbeauftragter für die Mode » (« Reich » agent for fashion) , in 1939. He designed the diplomatic uniform of the Nazi diplomatic service. In 1944, he was given the rank of « SS-Oberführer » .

He is listed under « Künstlerische Mitarbeiter » , in the 1938-1939 catalog issued by Porzellan-Manufaktur Allach, Munich.

Albert Speer recalled : « At the Chancellery, Hitler once sent-up to his bedroom for neatly executed stage designs, coloured with crayons, for all the Acts of “ Tristan und Isolde ” ; these were to be given to Arent to serve as an inspiration. Another time, he gave Arent a series of sketches for all the scenes of “ Der Ring des Nibelungen ”. At lunch, he told us with great satisfaction that, for 3 weeks, he had sat-up over these, night after night. This surprised me the more because, at this particular time, Hitler's daily schedule was unusually heavy with visitors, speeches, sight-seeing and other public activities. Undoubtedly, Arent's work reflected Hitler's taste. His setting for the 2nd Act of “ Tristan ”, for example, was similar to Roller's Vienna staging that Hitler adored. » .

The main trait of the « Hitler-Arent » style was, as Speer phrased it, « smashing effects » , and Arent's productions were smashing. Gigantic choruses and parades, huge casts of extras and glitzy costumes characterized « Lohengrin » and « Rienzi » . But the « Hitler-Arent » « chef-d'œuvre » was their 1934 joint production of « Die Meistersinger » . This culminated in a 3rd Act meadow scene staged in the manner of a Nuremberg Party rally, with massed banners and martial chorus. No detail of the production escaped Hitler's eye. He fretted over the moonlight scene in the 2nd Act and went into ecstasies over the brilliant colours he wanted for the final scene on the « Meistersingers' » meadow, and over the Romantic look of the little gabled houses opposite Hans Sachs's cobbler's shop. So proud of it was he that he sent it on tour : from Nuremberg to the « Deutsche Oper » in Berlin, in 1935 ; then, to Munich, in 1936 ;

Danzig, in 1938 ; Weimar, in 1939 ; and Linz, in 1941.

It even enjoyed a measure of resurrection after the War when the costumes were used, in 1951, at the Bayreuth Festival, then too impoverished to afford to make its own.

Hitler's adulation of Wagner « the composer » probably developed into veneration of Wagner « the man » rather quickly. Except for Frederick the Great and Bismarck, on no other person did he lavish such repeated and fulsome praise.

« I must be frank to say that Richard Wagner's personality meant more to me than Goethe's. » , he remarked on one occasion.

« The " Führer " talks to me of Richard Wagner, he reveres him and knows of no one like him. » , Goebbels once recorded.

Hitler even managed to introduce Wagner's name into his 1923 « Putsch » attempt, telling the Court, at his trial, that he had been partly inspired by the composer's example of preferring deeds to words.

« When I stood at Wagner's grave for the 1st time, my heart just overflowed with pride that, here, rested a man who would not permit the inscription on his tombstone : " Here lies Privy Counsellor, Music Director, His Excellency Baron Richard von Wagner. " I was proud that this man, like many men in German history, was content to leave his name to posterity, not a title. »

In the early 1930's, it was being argued that Wagner did not simply enchant Hitler with his music and inspire his anti-Semitism, stagecraft and political ideas, but also that he helped to create the very ideological atmosphere that put him in power.

« Of all German creative figures, Wagner is the real father of the current German state of mind. » , wrote Emil Ludwig. It was not by chance, he went on, that Hitler was a Wagnerian.

The 2 men were personally alike. Moreover, they worked the same material.

The composer took the German sagas just as they were. « Such were the ideals that Wagner proffered the German people. But it was not just the stories and the « musical sound » that created a mood of « mystical rapture » but, also, his use of the German language. Only Hitler's prose could compete with his. » These were themes developed in later years by Thomas Mann.

The novelist was scarcely less smitten by Wagner than was Hitler himself.

He too, as a youth, had haunted his local Opera House, and « Lohengrin » had also been the 1st of the Master's Operas he had attended.

Thomas Mann spoke of the composer as his « starkstes, bestimmendes Erlebnis » : his strongest and most formative experience. From the beginning to the end of his life, he was enthralled by the music, and bewitched by the man. Wagner was the subject, or important theme, of nearly a dozen essays, any number of letters and countless diary entries. But while Hitler admired everything he knew about the composer's life, character, ideology and musical creation, Mann was, in some ways, ambivalent about them.

Thomas Mann's most important commentary on Richard Wagner was an address to the Goethe Society of Munich, in February 1933, on the 50th anniversary of the composer's death. Entitled « The Sufferings and Greatness of Richard Wagner » , it was a deeply searching and astute treatment of Wagner's place in European culture. The fruit of years of thought, it placed the composer among the greatest of artistic figures.

In 1937, Mann noted in his diary that, on one hand, he found « elements of a frightening quality » in a poem Wagner had written for his wife Cosima and that, on the other, he had listened to a recording of « Die Walküre » « with admiration » .

According to Joachim C. Fest, « The youthful Hitler succumbed to the music of Richard Wagner. The charged emotionality of this music seemed to have served him as a means for self-hypnosis, while he found in its lush air of luxury the necessary ingredients for escapist fantasy. » . In fact, Hitler himself later declared that with the exception of Richard Wagner, he had « no forerunners » and, by Wagner, he meant not only the composer but Wagner the personality, « the greatest prophetic figure the German people has had » . The points of contact between the 2 temperaments (all the more marked because the young painter consciously modelled himself after his hero) produce a curious sense of family resemblance.

Joachim Clemens Fest (8 December 1926 - 11 September 2006) was a German historian, journalist, critic and editor, best-known for his writings and public commentary on Nazi Germany, including an important biography of Adolf Hitler and books about Albert Speer and the German Resistance. He was a leading figure in the debate among German historians about the Nazi period.

The style of public ceremonies in the 3rd « Reich » is inconceivable without Wagner's Operatic tradition, without the essentially demagogical art of Richard Wagner - for the « Master of Bayreuth » was not only Hitler's great exemplar, he was also the young man's ideological mentor.

Richard Wagner's political writings were some of Hitler's favourite reading, and his style unmistakably influenced Hitler's own grammar and syntax.

Those political writings, together with the Operas, form much of the framework for Hitler's ideology. Here, he found the « granite foundations » for his view of the world.

Nothing could have symbolized the association more provocatively than the opening scene of Hans Jürgen Syberberg's 1977 film, « Hitler » , in which the Dictator rises ectoplasmically out of Wagner's Bayreuth grave.

Hans-Jürgen Syberberg (born 8 December 1935) is a German film director, whose best-known film is his lengthy feature, « Hitler : A Film from Germany » . Born in Nossendorf, Pomerania, the son of an Estate owner, Syberberg lived until 1945, in Rostock and Berlin. In 1952 and 1953, he created his 1st 8 mm takes of rehearsals by the Berliner Ensemble. In 1953, he moved to West-Germany, where, in 1956, he began studies in literature and Art History, completing them the following year.

He earned his doctorate in Munich. For Syberberg, cinema is a form of « Gesamtkunstwerk » . Many commentators, including Syberberg himself, have characterized his work as a cinematic combination of Bertolt Brecht's doctrine of epic theatre and Richard Wagner's Operatic æsthetics. Well-known philosophers and intellectuals have written about his work, including Susan Sontag, Gilles Deleuze and Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe.

In 1975, Syberberg released « Winifried Wagner und die Geschichte des Hauses Wahnfried von 1914-1975 » ; a documentary about Winifred Wagner, wife of Richard Wagner's son, Siegfried. The documentary attracted attention because it exposed Winifred's admiration for Adolf Hitler. The film thus proved an embarrassment to the Wagner family and the Bayreuth Festival (which she had run from 1930 until the end of the Second World War) .

Syberberg is also noted for an acclaimed visual interpretation of the Wagner Opera « Parsifal » , in 1982.

What Hitler admired in the composer was what he admired in his other heroes : courage.

In a speech in 1923, he defined the vital quality of human greatness as « the heroic » and attributed it to 3 men : Martin Luther, Frederick the Great and Richard Wagner. The « reformer » because he possessed the courage to stand alone against the world ; the « king » because he never lost courage when his lot appeared hopeless ; the « composer » , because he had the courage to struggle in solitude. Each had fought alone and « like a titan » .

As a desperately lonely and friendless figure in his early days, Adolf Hitler must have seen his own situation mirrored in such struggles.

Richard Wagner was thus a symbol or, better, a model of someone who believed in his destiny and let nothing deter him from it. It was no doubt in this sense that he considered the composer, in the oft cited phrase, his only forebear.

Apart from his remarks about « Parsifal » , Hitler never ascribed any of his views to Wagner, not in « Mein Kampf » , his speeches, articles or recorded private conversations. However, there are many obvious parallels in outlook : anti-Semitism, Hellenism, the belief that culture was the « summum bonum » of a civilization, the notion that the arts should never be hostage to commerce, and the like.

Certainly, Wagner's pamphlet « Judentum in der Musik » resonates in Hitler's claim that Jews lack artistic creativity.

« Das Judenthum in der Musik » (Jewishness in Music) , is an essay by Richard Wagner which attacks Jews in general, and the composers Giacomo Meyerbeer and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, in particular. It was published under a pseudonym in the « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » (« NZM ») of Leipzig, in September 1850, and was re-issued, in a greatly expanded version, under Wagner's name, in 1869. It is regarded by some as an important landmark in the history of German anti-Semitism.

Some critics point-out that Wagner's opposition to Jews was not limited to his articles, and that the Operas contained such messages. In particular, the characters of Mime, in the « Ring » ; Klingsor, in « Parsifal » ; and Sixtus Beckmesser, in « Die Meistersinger » , appear to be Jewish stereotypes, although none of them are identified as Jews in the libretto.

However, at no time, did he ever trace his anti-Semitism to the composer, not even in his 1920 speech, « Warum sind wir Antisemiten ? » (Why are We Anti-Semites ?) , in which he expounded his views for the 1st time in public. This is not surprising, as his « doctrinal » anti-Semitism, was based on Gnostic and occult teachings, originating with Dietrich Eckart.

August Kubizek does say, however, that the youthful Hitler was said to have read every biography, letter, essay, diary and other scrap by and about his hero that he could lay his hands on.

So, we are left with the apprehension that Richard Wagner, and in particular his « Bühnenweihfestspiel » « Parsifal » , was a seminal influence on Adolf Hitler.

On January 13, 1933, the newly-elected National-Socialist Party celebrated the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death by staging a grandiose memorial ceremony in Leipzig, the composer's birthplace. Adolf Hitler invited Siegfried Wagner's widow, the English-born Winifred, and her son Wieland to be guests of honour at this event. This tribute by Hitler was the continuation of a deep friendship that had begun in 1923 between the « Führer » and the Wagner family, forging a link between the new Germany and the country's most revered composer.

Within weeks of becoming Chancellor of Germany, Hitler had appropriated Wagner and made him the « Reich » 's great beacon.

Each summer, from 1933 to 1939, Adolf Hitler attended the Bayreuth Festival, and he made the Wagner Estate, « Wahnfried » , his 2nd home.

Because she had been one of his earliest supporters, Hitler had great affection for Winifred. Hitler repaid the Wagner family gratitude by pledging his undying friendship, and his deepest devotion to Richard Wagner and Bayreuth.

With the assistance of Doctor Josef Gœbbels, Hitler's untiring Propaganda minister, Richard Wagner became the legendary and ideological voice of the new Party, and the musical standard by which all Classical composers would, from now on, be judged.

Around the time that Hitler came to power, the Bayreuth « Holy of Holies » still existed : the original Paul von Joukowsky (1845-1912) sets used at the premiere of « Parsifal » . They were still in use at the « Festspielhaus » , even though they were falling apart and were dangerous to the singers.

Realistically, the time had come to replace the production, and the logical person to design the sets would be Emil Preetorius.

The stage-designer Emil Preetorius (1883-1973) was born in Mainz and was one of the most important stage designers of the 1st half of the 20th Century. He studied law and art history in Giessen and, in 1909, he co-founded a school of illustration and the book trade in Munich together with Paul Renner. In 1928, Preetorius became a professor at the Munich « Hochschule für Bildende Künste » . He became the head of scenery for the Bayreuth « Festspiele » , in 1932. During the 1930's, Emil Preetorius's scenes, such as the rock of the Walkyrie for the « Ring des Niebelungen » , were among the most important and influential designs for Richard Wagner's works.

A petition began circulating against this decision, after all, this was the scenery « on which the eyes of the Master had reposed » , and the conservative faction at Bayreuth believed that the scenery needed to be kept and revered like a Holy Icon. Over a 1,000 signatures were collected, including those of conductor Arturo Toscanini and composer Richard Strauß. Winifred Wagner sent the petition to Hitler along with a pamphlet accusing Preetorius of being « un-German » and « under Jewish influence » . Hitler, on the other hand, favored a new Bayreuth production of « Parsifal » , and selected Alfred Roller to design it. The « Führer » was a great admirer of Roller's work, in Vienna.

Following all the controversy, Alfred Roller's production premiered in 1934. There were, however, only a few changes to the overall designs that had originated with Paul von Joukowsky. The temple cupola in the 2nd scene of Act I disappeared, and this made many conservatives very disappointed. Winifred, once again, appealed to Hitler that there should be, yet, another new production of « Parsifal » . Hitler agreed, and suggested that Wieland Wagner design the new sets.

Hitler had always revered Siegfried's son because he was a direct descendant of the Master. Once the War began, Hitler gave orders that Wieland should be permanently exempt from military service. Young Wieland, therefore, designed the sets for the 1937 « Parsifal » .

Wieland was the elder of 2 sons of Siegfried and Winifred Wagner, grandson of composer Richard Wagner, and great-grandson of composer Franz Liszt through Wieland's paternal grandmother. In 1941, he married the dancer and choreographer Gertrude Reissinger. They had 4 children : Iris (born in 1942) ; Wolf-Siegfried (born in 1943) ; Nike (born in 1945) and Daphne (born in 1946) .

Winifred Wagner's close friendship with Hitler meant that, as a teenager and young man, Wieland knew the Dictator as « Uncle Wolf » . His family connections allowed him to avoid the draft in the war.

Richard Wagner's Operas had an almost religious effect upon Adolf Hitler ; Wagner's skill for drama and dramatic music no doubt underscored the impact of the legends already known to Hitler from youth.

Hitler and many of his associates shared a fascination with the history and mythology of the German « Volk » , and the following discussion will focus on examples of « mythical influences » , and how they helped shape the personal and political activities of these men.

Richard Wagner's (1813-1883) most famous works are undoubtedly his music-dramas. « Der Ring des Nibelungen » , « Tristan und Isolde » and, most importantly, « Parsifal » were the works that are widely acknowledged as being of great musical significance.

The development and use of the leitmotiv, the parts written for the « helden » tenor, the manipulation of chromaticism in the tonal system, and the development of the music-drama itself are all very important aspects of Wagner and his music.

The ancient sagas that Wagner used as a basis for these music-dramas held for him revealed truths and insights into human behavior and emotions. He has not been alone in his interest and opinions. These myths have been used as an argument for, or illustration of, various beliefs and ideologies. ' The Ring ' has been variously interpreted as a look into the human psyche ; a means of promoting socialism ; a prophecy of the fate of the world and human kind ; and a “ parable ” about the industrial society that was coming of age in Wagner's lifetime.

It was also used by the Nazi Party to justify and glorify racism, and to supply a basis of fanatic loyalty in the Schutzstaffel, or SS.

The legends of German mythology are essentially the same as the old Nordic legends ; many of the proper names are the same in both cultures, and most of the remaining names are very similar to the Norse versions, differing only in spelling.

Thus the Norse Odin, the ruler of the gods, becomes Woden (or Wotan) , further south in the Germanic regions. In the same fashion, the Norse heroes known as Sigurd, Brynhild and Gudrun become Siegfried, Brünnhilde, and Günther in the German stories.

The extremely close parallels between the 2 cultures makes it an absolute certainty that both the Germanic stories and the earlier Norse legends were derived from the same ancient tales.

These early legends are known to the modern world from 2 collections : the Elder Edda, which is written in verse, and the Younger Edda (consisting of the sagas) , which is written in prose. The dating for these collections seems to be in some dispute ; in Bulfinch's Mythology rather specific dates are assigned : 1056 for the Elder Edda and 1640 for the Younger Edda. However, in Edith Hamilton's Mythology, she speaks of the oldest manuscript of the Elder as dating from circa 1300, some 300 years after the arrival of Christianity in Iceland, and almost 300 years after Bulfinch's date.

Hamilton does state, however, that all of these legends are completely pagan in nature (thus predating Christianity) , and that almost all scholars agree the stories must be much older than the oldest manuscript.

The dates for the Younger Edda are likewise apparently uncertain ; Bulfinch's date of 1640 is hard to reconcile with Hamilton's statement that the Younger was " written down by one Snorri Sturluson in the last part of the 12th Century ".

Regardless of date, it is agreed the most important collection is the Elder Edda.

These 2 very long epics furnish the material for almost all of the presently known myths and legends about the ancient gods of the North.

Unfortunately, as Christian missionaries from the Mediterranean area journeyed further north, they systematically destroyed all the pagan artifacts they could find in a remarkably successful attempt to completely obliterate all remnants of the belief system they were replacing.

Only a few fragments of the entire northern European prehistoric collection of myths have been preserved. The legend of Beowulf in England and the Nibelungenlied in Germany are two tales that survived the zeal of the missionaries.

The Eddas are known only from Iceland ; apparently Icelandic missionaries were less influential than their counterparts on the continent of Europe. Iceland was one of the last European countries to be Christianized.

All of these surviving legends are essentially gloomy and pessimistic in nature ; depressingly so to modern readers.

In Nordic and Germanic mythology the Earth (Midgard) and Heaven (Asgard) were destined to be utterly destroyed by the Frost Giants (who lived in Jötunheim) in a final great battle between Good and Evil, called Ragnarok. Ragnarok is paralleled by Götterdämmerung in Wagner's Ring Cycle.

In this final battle, Evil was predestined to win, and the entirety of creation was to be destroyed. The only bright factor in this thoroughly depressing viewpoint was the belief that, in spite of all, if one could die a courageous, heroic death, then all else faded into insignificance.

It is of interest to realize that the Western ideal of heroism and heroic deeds in the face of certain death springs almost entirely from these Nordic myths, and not from the Greek and Roman mythology that most people are more familiar with. The Greek gods were remarkably unheroic in their conduct. Of course, this idea of heroism and fighting to the death against any odds would fit very well with the kind of fanatic loyalty sought by Adolf Hitler and Heinrich Himmler.

When Richard Wagner embarked upon the composition of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' (around 1849), he chose as his framework the Teutonic epic of the Nibelungenlied. The Norse version of this legend is called the Volsungasaga.

Wagner finished the 1st 2 segments ('Das Rheingold' and 'Die Walküre') and part of the 3rd ('Siegfried') by 1857. But 17 years would go by before he would finish the great work with the completion of 'Siegfried' and the final music-drama in the cycle: 'Götterdämmerung'.

As mentioned earlier, the Teutonic versions of these myths are very similar to the Nordic versions, differing chiefly in descriptions of climate, and social condition. The Teutonic versions were generally slightly less violent than their Viking equivalents.

In turn, it seems apparent that Wagner again tempered the German tales somewhat; in 'Tristan und Isolde', after the hero Tristan is mortally wounded, he is kept alive by the power of love until he is united with his lover, Isolde. After Tristan's demise in her arms, she is overcome by waves of ecstatic love, and she dies.

As discouraging as this ending may seem, Richard Wagner saw it as the triumph of love in the face of all adversity; not even death could truly defeat it.

Of course, the story steps outside of the bounds of reality somewhere along the way, but this only adds to the transcendent quality of the story and of the music-drama itself.

Adolf Hitler's attraction to Richard Wagner's music began at an early age. In 1905, aged 16, Hitler left school (ostensibly because of illness) and was able to spend his time as he wished; which he later described as the happiest time of his life.

2 of his favourite pastimes were aimlessly roaming the streets of Linz and attending the opera at night.

He had a passion for music; most especially the mystic operas of Wagner, which he would attend night after night.

His meager supply of pocket money was spent mainly on the opera (a standing room ticket cost only the equivalent of 10 cents) and on purchasing books on German history and mythology, which he would read for hours at a time. His fascination with Wagner's operas seems to have had a profound effect upon him.

His only friend from this period of his life was one August Kubizek, (nicknamed "Gustl") who gave an interesting description: "The charged emotionality of this music seemed to have served him as a means for self hypnosis, while he found in its lush air of bourgeois luxury the necessary ingredients for escapist fantasy."

Kubizek goes on to relate the events of a particular evening spent in Hitler's company. They had attended a performance of Wagner's ' Rienzi ' and, according to " Gustl ", Hitler had a quite powerful reaction to the opera. The youthful Adolf was " overwhelmed by the resplendent, dramatic musicality " of the opera, as well as deeply affected by the story therein ; that of Cola di Rienzi, a medieval rebel who was an outcast from his fellows and was " destroyed by their incomprehension ". After the opera, Adolf Hitler began to orate. Words burst from him like a backed up flood breaking through crumbling dams. In grandiose, compelling images, he sketched for me his future and that of his people. 30 years later, the boyhood friends would meet again in Bayreuth, and Hitler would remark : " It all began at that hour ! " .

More convincing evidence of Wagner's influences can hardly be wished for after a statement such as this one, but there is more. Between 1909 and 1913, a time which Hitler described as " the saddest period of my life ", he resided in Vienna. It was here, by his own statement in « Mein Kampf » , that he became a confirmed anti-semite. The anti-Semitic opinions Richard Wagner had held were no secret, and the concurrence of opinion between these 2 men could only have served to pull Hitler closer to a greater regard for Wagner. Indeed, Hitler claims to have heard ' Tristan und Isolde ' 30 to 40 times during his years in Vienna. During these years in Vienna, at the Hofoper Opera House alone, at least 426 evenings featured performances of works by Richard Wagner.

In 1923, just before the abortive « Beer-Hall " Putsch " » , Hitler presented himself at Wahnfried, the home of the Wagner family. There, he met Siegfried Wagner (Richard Wagner's only son) and Siegfried's English born wife Winifred.

He is said to have sought out the Master's study, and, deeply moved, stood before Wagner's grave in the garden for a long time. Afterwards, he was introduced to Houston Stewart Chamberlain (Richard Wagner's English born son-in-law) , who was of advanced age and could not speak. Chamberlain later wrote a letter to Hitler voicing his support for Hitler's goals and ideas. Hitler valued this letter greatly, almost as if it were " a benediction from the Bayreuth Master himself " .

Hitler continued in his contacts with the family of Wagner, and it is rumoured that he had a relationship with Winifred after Siegfried's death. Hitler also became a favourite ' Uncle ' (uncle Wolf) to the Wagner's 2 sons, Wieland and Wolfgang.

His idea of the supreme expression of opera was the final scene in ' Götterdämmerung ' and, when in Bayreuth, whenever he witnessed this Finale, he would turn around in his darkened box, seek out the hand of Frau Winifred Wagner, and " breathe a deeply moved Handkuss upon it ". By this time, he had seen all of Wagner's operas countless times, and boasted of having listened to ' Tristan und Isolde ' and ' Die Meistersinger ' over a 100 times each.

Other indications of Wagner's influences are furnished by Albert Speer, who began as Hitler's chief architect and ended as « Reich » Armaments Minister. He speaks of the interior furnishings of Hitler's country house, the Berghof at Obersalzberg. The salon was furnished, along with normal items of furniture, with a " sideboard over 10 feet high and 18 feet long " which was used to store phonograph records. Against another wall was " a massive chest containing built-in speakers, and adorned by a large bronze bust of Richard Wagner by sculptor Arno Breker " .

There is yet another facet of Hitler's dwelling at Obersalzberg that shows his sense of unity with Germany's " heroic " past : the view. Obersalzberg, as one might imply from the name, is a mountain ; high enough to give a good view of the surrounding area. The Berghof, which was designed by Hitler himself, featured a large picture window which offered a view of the Untersberg, Berchtesgaden, and Mozart's home-town, Salzburg. Legend has it that the Emperor Charlemagne still sleeps in the Untersberg, but will someday awaken and restore the German Empire to its past glories. Adolf Hitler didn't hesitate to apply this prophecy to himself : " You see the Untersberg over there. It is no accident that I have my residence opposite it. " .

On the eve of World War II, Adolf Hitler's forces reoccupied the Rhineland. Returning from a triumphal trip through this area, and jubilant over the Allies' weakness, he requested that some Wagner be put on the phonograph. Listening to the Vorspiel to « Parsifal » , he remarked : " I have built up my religion out of « Parsifal » . Divine worship in solemn form without pretenses of humility. One can serve God only in the garb of the hero. " .

The record continued to play. The next selection was the funeral march from Götterdämmerung, and brought forth the following comments from Hitler : " I first heard it in Vienna (at the Opera) and I still remember as if it were today. " .

The Germanic myths and the dramatic presentation of these myths by Richard Wagner were, very obviously, a central tool of the Nazi Party. The psychological effects of these music-dramas and stories on the principal figures of the 3rd « Reich » are equally obvious, when they are looked for.

In Joachim Fest's biography of Adolf Hitler, there are no fewer than 34 references to Richard Wagner or his music. And of course, one cannot help but wonder what Richard Wagner would have thought about Adolf Hitler, one of his all time biggest fans ! However, it was Richard Wagner who declared in his ' music-dramas ' that the coming Master race was that of the Germans.

Originally, Friedrich Nietzsche had delighted in Wagner's music, but the latter's obsessive anti-semitism and conversion to an Aryanised Christianity caused him to denounce the composer with every twist of biting irony at his command. The great mass of people, however, were to respond more to Wagner's music than to Nietzsche's difficult writings, partly because it was great and inspired music and partly because its maker had resurrected the mythology of the German race. It is said that myths are the truest expression of a race's spirit and culture, and in ' The Ring ' the Teutonic ' Supermen ' bestrode a stage, wherein was war, treachery, courage, blood and fire, climaxed with a stupendous ' Götterdämmerung '. The world of Wotan and Thor, heroes and giants, great deeds, great victories, and great destruction had never been expressed with such power.

The beauty of Richard Wagner's music moved men to such an extent that Adolf Hitler would declare that to understand National-Socialist, Germany one must first know Wagner.

For Wagner believed that the virtues of the Teuton tribes had atrophied with the coming of industrial civilisation ; that courage and will had been poisoned or emasculated by Capitalism and race pollution ; that the Jews were responsible for the enervation and enslavement of the German spirit ; and that a new Siegfried must arise to lead the Germans to an awareness of their greatness and their glory.

Schopenhauer destroyed the meaning of values, Nietzsche proclaimed the need for passing beyond them, and Wagner supplied a new set to replace the old. These 3 men, renowned more posthumously than in their own lifetimes, challenged the world of 1889 and became, in time, the favourites of Adolf Hitler. From them, he derived what fundamental values he possessed. It is impossible to tell whether these men expressed what they felt around them, or what they sensed would be the future ; or whether they were determined to stamp their wills upon the world. Were they prophets ? Or were they magicians ?

We know that Nietzsche derived much of his inspiration from mystical trances which possessed him without warning, and that his greatest work « Thus Spake Zarathustra » was inspired by one such experience in the winter of 1882-1883. We know also that Wagner claimed that the sources of his inspiration flowed from similar supra rational experiences, and the effect of this can be seen in that extraordinary mystical opera « Parsifal » . Whatever the truth, it is at least certain that much of what they foretold, later came to pass.

Yet, the world of 1889 ignored these insignificant portents of change. People continued to live as though nothing important had happened or would happen, and no one so much as deigned to notice the birth of Adolf Hitler. Treaties and contracts were made and broken ; money was won and lost ; children were educated as though all was absolutely certain. Books were written and read which taught Christian, bourgeois, industrial Capitalist, Materialist, Humanist European values as if no other could ever be of the slightest relevance. And yet, it was these books which lacked all relevance.

Nietzsche who knew the true spirit of his age and of the age to come, wrote : “ ‘ And what doeth the Saint in the forest ? ’ asked Zarathustra. The Saint answered : ‘ I make hymns and sing them ; and, in making hymns, I laugh and weep and mumble : thus do I praise God. With singing, weeping, laughing, and mumbling do I praise the God who is my God. But what dost thou bring us as a gift ? ’ When Zarathustra had heard these words, he bowed to the Saint and said : ‘ What should I have to give thee ! Let me rather hurry hence lest I take aught away from thee ! ’ And thus, they parted from one another, the old man and Zarathustra, laughing like school boys. When Zarathustra was alone, however, he said to his heart : ‘ Could it be possible ! This old Saint in the forest hath not yet heard of it, that God is dead ! ’ ”

« Der Bayreuther Kreis » (« The Bayreuth Circle ») was a name originally applied by some writers to devotees of Richard Wagner's music who attended and supported the annual Bayreuth Festival, in the later 19th and early 20th Centuries. Many of these devotees espoused nationalistic German politics, and were supporters of Adolf Hitler from the 1920's onwards, and, therefore, this group of people were directly associated with the rise of Nazism.

There was never any organisation named Der Bayreuther Kreis, or any group of people who identified themselves by that name ; but the term has been used by many historians as a convenient label for Adolf Hitler supporters associated with Wagner and Bayreuth. Examples of such association are given in the following citations :

‘ Thus Hitler himself admitted : ‘It was Cosima Wagner’s merit to have created the link between Bayreuth and National-Socialism. ’

‘ It was « The Bayreuth Circle » which raised Wagner’s message to the status of gospel, manoeuvring his ideas into a Germanic Christian doctrine of salvation. ’

« Wagner's Racist Operas, the Blinding Truth »

Wagner caricature by K. Klic, Humoristische Blätter, Vienna, 1873. All Jews should be burned at a performance of Nathan the Wise.

Only one thing can redeem you (Jews) from the burden of your curse : the redemption of Ahasverus ; total destruction.

" Cursed Jew-scum "

I have cherished a long repressed resentment about this Jew money world, and this hatred is as necessary to my nature as gall is to blood.

By removing Jewish vermin, I don't necessarily mean destroying them. There are many ways, systematic, and comparatively painless, or at any rate bloodless, of causing races to vanish. We may take systematic measures to dam their great natural fertility. By doing this gradually and without bloodshed, we demonstrate our humanity.

The Jew is the parasite in the body of other nations.

The Jew must not be destroyed, because then " we should have to invent him. It is essential to have a tangible enemy, not merely an abstract one "

Which of the above statements were by Adolf Hitler (1889-1945) and which were by Richard Wagner (1813-1883) ? Most would agree that all of these statements share the brand of racism, and they use " Jew " as an expletive. It would come as no surprise if we discovered that they were all Hitler's. Hindsight is always the best sight, but the fact is that all but the last 3 came from Richard Wagner. If they were Hitler's, no one would be offering excuses. However, since they were Wagner's statements, his apologists react defensively. After all, they say, what actual harm did Wagner really do ?

I hope to show in this essay how devastating Wagner's legacy was, and, in some ways, still is. The evidence comes from the composer himself, from his " music-dramas ", diaries, letters, and essays. The fact is, that although Adolf Hitler was responsible for ordering the destruction of millions of innocent Jews and other " aliens ", it would be difficult to find public statements by him calling for greater destruction than the above by Richard Wagner. In fact, scholars are still trying to find Hitler's order for the Holocaust, and most of his public statements were more moderate than those cited by Wagner.

Wagner apologists have had to acknowledge Wagner's racism, since there is no way to deny something that was so well documented by Wagner himself. Recognizing that they cannot defend him on that ground, they then deny that any racism is expressed in his " music-dramas ". Some, after peeling away the veneer of fairy tales, are horrified at what they discover in the dramas, as was Thomas Mann in 1940. So, they then try to defend the music by divorcing it from the drama, which is completely contrary to the mandate of the composer's « Gesamtkunstwerke » (Total Works of Art), which will be respected here. They naively claim that music alone is amoral, i.e. , that it cannot communicate any moral or political messages. As such, the Operas are stripped down to mere tone relations in order to prevent and insulate them from the identification of possible racist propaganda.

" Genius ", " Masterpieces ", and " Greatness " have also been used as excuses for Wagner and his music, terms that came out of the very Romantic nationalist Kultur that claimed the superiority of German music in the 1st place. This value ridden rhetoric can no longer be presumed justified or meaningful without a convincing argument.

With all that is now known, it is clear that under the spell of compelling, emotionally charged music, Wagner's apologists are deluding themselves and insist on wearing critical blinders. Compare the following 2 citations :

« In all of Wagner's innumerable commentaries on his own works, there is not a single statement which would entitle us to interpret any of the characters in the music-dramas or any of the details of their plots in anti-Semitic terms, or even to interpret them as allusions to the Jews. The attempt to interpret the Nieblungs, and especially the figure of Mime, as mythic projections of the Jews (an interpretation based on Wagner's description of the physical appearance and speech patterns of Jews in his 1850 essay) is no more than an unverifiable hypothesis.

« No less an admirer than the Jewish composer Gustav Mahler freely admitted the Jewish nature of Mime : " No doubt with Mime, Wagner intended to ridicule the Jews with all their characteristic traits (petty intelligence and greed) the jargon is textually and musically so cleverly suggested ; but for God's sake, it must not be exaggerated and overdone as Julius Spielmann does it. I know of only one Mime and that is myself, you wouldn't believe what there is in that part, nor what I could make of it." »

The 1st is a statement from a Wagner apologist in the 1990's. Mahler (1860-1911) , on the other hand, was a contemporary of Wagner and was intimately familiar with both the Operas, which he conducted (Hitler himself saw Mahler's productions) , and the cultural sensibilities of the time in which he lived. Not only does Mahler's statement demonstrate an immediate recognition of Wagner's stereotypical Jew, it also shows his submission to these stereotypes, and a willingness to deprecate himself in a pathetic act of self-hatred. It is known that Jews who witnessed productions at that time immediately seized upon what they believed to be their invidious representation by Wagner, especially after his freshly published essay « Judaism in Music » in 1850. They rose up in protest when they identified Wagner's Beckmesser as a mocking depiction of Jews at the première performances of Meistersinger in Vienna and Mannheim.

The racist agendas of Wagner's Operas is revealed in the detailed and faithfully kept diaries of his wife, Cosima. She frequently referred to Wagners' friend, Arthur de Gobineau, the French racial theorist and author of « The Inequality of the Races » , which gained widespread acceptance in European communities, thanks to Wagner's assiduous promotion. Gobineau's theories corroborated what he himself had already decided about the " noble and ignoble " races. In Cosima's diary entry of October 17, 1882, she reported :

« In the evening, the 3rd act of Siegfried, well played by Herr Rubinstein, pleases both him and us : " That is Gobineau music " Richard says as he comes in, " that is race. Where else will you find 2 such beings looking at each other ! Here is just forest and rocks and water and nothing rotten in it." »

Richard Wagner himself is here pointing out a racial metaphor in his own music ! Thus, on the authority of the composer himself, it is no longer possible to deny that racial ideas have a direct and purposeful connection to his music. This opens up the entire field for such interpretation, which will be pursued here.

This statement also verifies the composer's race distinction based on appearance. According to Gobineau and Wagner, it is by recognizing similarity through appearance that enables Aryans to bond together and separate themselves from the inferior races.

Wagner was too clever to identify Jews in his music-dramas, especially after he had received critical reactions to his essay « Judaism in Music » , which he 1st published under a pseudonym. Of course, the reason for using a pseudonym was due to a justified fear of reaction. At the same time, he was engaged in writing the anti-Semitic Ring Cycle. After that, he backed off somewhat from offending his Jewish patrons, conductors, and performers, because they provided a substantial part of his support. But he was not about to abandon his virulent racism either (he republished Judaism in Music in 1869 under his own name) , which permeates all aspects of his music-dramas through metaphorical suggestion. Wagner is always just a step away from actually calling his evil characters " Jews ", even though it was obvious to his contemporaries.

Nevertheless, his hatred was so profound (and thus bound to appear in his Operas) , that he let it slip in his essay Know Thyself. He wrote : « If the Jew comes tinkling with his bell of paper (money) , our nation throws its savings at his feet, and makes him in one night a millionaire. »

« Clever though be the many thoughts expressed by mouth or pen about the invention of money and its enormous value as a civiliser, against such praises should be set the curse to which it has always been doomed in song and legend. If gold here figures as the demon strangling manhood's innocence, our greatest poet shows at last the goblin's game of paper money. The Nieblung's fateful ring become a pocket book, might well complete the eerie picture of the spectral world controller. By the advocates of our Progressive Civilisation, this rulership is, indeed, regarded as a spiritual, nay, a moral power; for vanished Faith is now replaced by " Credit ", that fiction of our mutual honesty kept upright by the most elaborate safeguards against loss and trickery. What comes to pass beneath the benediction of this Credit we now are witnessing, and seem inclined to lay all blame upon the Jews. They certainly are virtuosi in an art which we but bungle. »

Here, Wagner indicts the Jews and metaphorically links them to the Niebelungs, the curse, demons, goblins, and the lust for gold in the Ring drama. Thus, according to Wagner himself, it is Alberich, the greedy merchant Jew, who becomes the power crazed goblin demon lusting after Aryan maidens, attempting to contaminate their blood, and who sacrifices his lust in order to acquire the gold (his " pocket book ") , which would make him the " spectral world controller " .

Mime fares even worse, depicted as a stinking ghetto Jew. Siegfried, the Ring's hero, who knows no fear and is free of conscience, hates him merely for his appearance and smell : « That shuffling and slinking, those eyelids blinking. How long must I endure this sight ? When shall I be rid of this fool ? I'd like to catch you and end your shrinking and stop your blinking ! So deeply, Mime, do I loathe you. »

After being nearly choked to death, Siegfried brutally murders Mime with the sword, Nothung. This is Mime's reward for having raised Siegfried, like a father, from birth. Since Siegfried represents the conscience free, fearless Teuton, he feels no remorse. Wagner's music would have us justify Siegfried's form of personal vengeance. He is glorified as the warrior hero of the « Ring » , the archtypal proto-Nazi.

Moreover, as with Beckmesser in Meistersinger, Wagner cast the voices of Alberich and Mime in an abnormally high-register and gives them tritones and other awkward intervals to sing, which make their voices creak, shriek, croak, and buzz, just as he described the speech of Jews in Judaism in Music, " in an arbitrary distortion of our national idiom ". These characters are also typecast in the Opera productions as small, humpback, sulphurous, crooked, drab, and warty, as Siegfried describes Mime. (Where and when have Alberich and Mime ever been cast as tall, blond, blue eyed Aryans ?)

Wagner knew very well that to use Jewish names for his evil characters, or to call them Jews, would reduce his high minded « Gesamtkunstwerke » (Total Artworks) and « Artwork of the Future » to artless, obvious, and vulgar political tracts. His intent was far more artful and covert, but nevertheless still political : to reach his audience on an emotional, subliminal level, bypassing their critical faculties.

« I shall, within these 4 evenings, succeed in artistically conveying my purpose to the emotional (not the critical) understanding of the spectators. »

In other passages of « Opera and Drama » , Wagner cautions against arousing any critical reason in audiences. Thus, he clearly reveals his covert and insidious program of bypassing any critical assessment, and appealing directly to the now vulnerable intuitive and emotional being. Just when " spectators " have lowered their guard and are open to powerful emotional suggestions, veiled political metaphors are compellingly enforced by larger than life voices and a huge orchestra heavy with brass and percussion. (One is here reminded of the emotional power of Hitler's speeches.) Wagner musters all his musical powers to convince us that Siegfried's brutal murders are completely justified and even glorious, and he succeeds, for rarely does anyone question Siegfried's violent actions.

There was no need to name names or identify the " Jew ". Much of his contemporary audience, both Germans and Jews, knew very well who he was depicting, and those who didn't would get the message subliminally. (Nowadays, the more powerful subliminal message dominates.) He did not want his audience to take a critical view, but to uncritically accept the more powerful emotional one. The same appeal to uncritical emotions and attempt to evade critical reason is promoted in Adolf Hitler's book « Mein Kampf » , where he describes how crowds are to be persuaded and manipulated.

Richard Wagner's racist ideology is contained in letters, diaries, and essays such as « Modern, What is German ? » , « Know Thyself » and « Judaism in Music » . It reaches Nazi proportions in his last racist essay « Herodism and Christendom » . Here, all the racist historical models from Luther to Fichte, Feuerbach, Gobineau, Hegel, Schopenhauer, and Chamberlain, come to full maturity, when he wrote :

« We cannot withhold our acknowledgment that the human family consists of irremediably disparate races, whereof the noble could rule the ignoble, yet never raise them to their level by commixture, but simply sink to theirs. Indeed, this one relation might suffice to explain our fall. Whilst yellow races have viewed themselves as sprung from monkeys, the white traced back their origin to Gods, and deemed themselves marked out for rulership. It has been made quite clear that we should have no History of Man at all, had there been no movements, creations, and achievements of the white man. Incomparably fewer in number than the lower races, the ruin of the white races may be referred to their having been obliged to mix with them ; whereby, as remarked already, they suffered more from the loss of their purity than the others could gain by the ennobling of their blood. Nowhere in history do the root qualities of the Aryan race show forth more plainly than in the contact of the last pure bred Germanic branches with the falling Roman world. It was a weighty feature of the Christian Church that none but sound and healthy persons were admitted to the vow of total world renunciation ; any bodily defect, not to say mutilation, unfitted them. Manifestly, this vow was to be regarded as issuing from the most heroic of all possible resolves, and he who sees in it a " cowardly self-surrender " (as someone recently suggested) may bravely exult in his own self-retention, but had best not meddle any further with things that don't concern him. It certainly may be right to charge this purblind dullness of our public spirit to the vitiation of our blood ; not only by departure from the natural food of man, but, above all, by the tainting of the Hero blood of the noblest races with that of former cannibals now trained to be the business agents of Society. »

These " cannibals now trained to be business agents of Society " were the Jews. Cosima recorded in her Diaries, in 1879 :

« Richard is in favor of expelling them entirely. We laugh to think that it really seems as if his article on the Jews marked the beginning of this struggle. »

Thus, Cosima exposes their glee at the influence of « Judaism in Music » and in expelling Jews entirely. When news of Russian massacre of the Jews in August 1881 reached Wagner, she recorded him saying :

« That is the only way it can be done ; by throwing these people out and thrashing them. »

Richard Wagner's ideology is not only violently anti-Semitic, it is anti-Christian, following the lead of Friedrich Nietzsche. Christianity was vilified because it was contaminated by Judaism. Wagner wrote :

« Judaism is the evil conscience of our modern civilization. »

The significance of this proclamation is easily missed. Here, Wagner complains about a conscience, hence morality, with which the Jews have contaminated Christianity, and then German « Volk » . " Jews ", he said, " are the evil conscience of mankind ". This conscience is an affliction that must be cast off, because it has prevented the « Volk » from pursuing their Noth, i.e. , the need to recognize their own racial superiority (" Know Thyself ") and their destiny to rule the world. This is further clarified by Houston Smith Chamberlain, Wagner's son-in-law and racial theorist. Jews, said Chamberlain, are afflicted with a guilty conscience, a sense of sin, and this Jewish guilt infected Christianity. It was an evil influence on the Teutonic spirit, specifically on its Noth, or need of the " noble races to rule the ignoble ". This idea of racial Noth (which can only be felt by the « Volk ») has its roots in Fichte, Hegel, and Feuerbach. Only Germans (« Volk » , not to be confused with " folk ", is restricted to Germans) are privileged to feel the gemeinschaftliche Noth (the collective need) . Thus, Noth takes the place of conscience and law, represents the righteousness of the German mob, and is similar to the American concept of " lynch law " .

Richard Wagner's statement was later echoed by Adolf Hitler :

« Conscience is a Jewish invention. It is a blemish, like circumcision. »

Once this conscience is swept away, the German soul is purified and becomes privileged to pursue desires and needs free of any guilt, later making possible the Holocaust. This is why Siegfried feels no guilt when he slays Mime. Wagner's personal life reflects this belief in action. He used people for his personal gain and seemed to love only himself. His lack of conscience is reflected in his appropriation of friends' wives and daughters, his many betrayals, his self-righteous flight from creditors, and his callous treatment of those who could not be of use to him. His hatred of people in general is expressed in the following citation :

« My entire political creed consists of nothing but the bloodiest hatred for our whole civilization, contempt for all things deriving from it, and a longing for nature. In all Europe, I prefer dogs to these dog-like men. Only the most horrific and destructive Revolution could make our civilized beasts " human " again. »

Feuerbach's Noth finds expression in the Ring as the sword, called Nothung, or " Need-ung ". Once more, this disproves the apologists' claim that Wagner's politics do not enter his music. The sword Nothung, a weapon exclusive to murder and war, is glorified in the Ring Cycle. Its motive is cast in the brightest key, C major, as a rising, optimistic, blasting arpeggio. Wagner tries to dazzle us with its blazing music. The music tells us how wonderful the instruments of war are, and the composer even closely allies it with the Nature motive, which implies that war and murder are, after all, only natural.

Only Siegmund can draw Nothung from the world ash tree, only Wotan can smash it to pieces, and only Siegfried can reforge it again. These are the German Gods and their progeny, the « Volk » (called Volsungs in the drama) , destined to rule all other inferior races, if only they would recognize their need (Noth) for racial purity. Mime's is a futile attempt of the Niebelung Jew who will never succeed in forging Nothung, because he is incapable of feeling the collective need.

But what Noth does the sword represent ? Siegmund's need seems to be for a weapon to defend himself against Hunding, but it is much more than that. And, what is Siegfried's need in forging Nothung ? Marc Weiner most aptly expressed the answer :

« Little wonder that the sword's name is Nothung or " Need-ung " ; just as his Volsung father as a representative of the " Volk " had been driven to the sword in the hour of his " highest need ", so Siegfried as " Volk " will claim Nothung in the hour in which he liberates himself from his foreign dwarf father, a representative of the " Volk " 's enemy, the Jew, and in so doing metaphorically raises aloft the Artwork of the Future, an instrument for the destruction of non German art and of foreign presence in the realm of the future " Volk " . »

For Wagner, only German art was worthy of being called Kunst (Art) , but even then only if it wasn't made by Jews like Felix Mendelssohn-artholdy and Meyerbeer. This could have been a cue for Hitler's " Degenerate Art " (Entartete Kunst) exhibit of the 1930's, when he vilified " non-Germanic art " .

A denial of the importance of the political and racial metaphors in Richard Wagner's Operas reduces his dramas to mere fairy tales. Wagner himself would have laughed at such naïvety. Symbolism and metaphorical representation have long been documented in these works. To deny that racist tracts, like « Judaism in Music » , have no representation in his Operas is particularly naive. By the same " logic ", his other essays, such as « Opera and Drama » and « Artwork of the Future » would also have no bearing on his music, but no one claims that. In fact, Wagner himself stated the opposite. His prose works compile an ideology meant to bear upon and become manifest in his music.

In summary, the evidence shows that Wagner's racist ideology is not just expressed in his Operas, but is strong enough to support the contention that this ideology is the very reason that Wagner wrote them.

Indeed, his mature, post revolutionary music-dramas, written and composed in conjunction with diverse social æsthetic anti-Semitic tracts, constitute dramatic representations of the ideas found in his writings. Many Wagner scholars have been at great pains to dissociate his theories from the dramatic works for which he is largely remembered today, and especially to disavow any connection between his racism and his most celebrated « Total Works of Art », but comparison of these works with motifs and arguments in Wagner's prose writings demonstrates that the former are dramatic enactments of Wagner's theories concerning the preservation of the German community threatened by the Jew in the modern world.

Thus, Wagner's Operas can be seen as tools of racist, proto-Nazi hate propaganda, written for the purpose of redeeming the German race from Jewish contamination, and for expelling the Jews from Germany. In 1993, Gottfried Wagner, the great-grandson of the composer, in an act of self-imposed moral obligation and great personal sacrifice, restored to his roots the conscience that Richard Wagner and Adolf Hitler took away. He wrote :

« Wagner himself misused music as a vehicle of propaganda. Where arguments about Wagner are concerned, Germans quickly lose their sense of humor. With Wagner the German soul becomes exalted ! Woe betide anyone who questions Wagner. »

Richard Wagner, through his inflammatory anti-Semitic writings, was co-responsible for the transition from Bayreuth to Auschwitz.

From the composer himself :

« Consider well my new poem ; it contains the beginning and the end of the world (referring to the Ring) . I shall have to set it to music, after all, for the Jews of Frankfort and Leipzig ; it will justly suit them. »

Why did Wagner write this " for the Jews " ? And why does it " justly suit them " ? How can this statement be construed as other than a racist agenda ? After early denials, by 1940, even the ardent Wagnerite, German novelist and essayist Thomas Mann, recognized Nazi propaganda in Wagner's Operas.

« I find an element of Nazism, not only in Wagner's questionable literature. I find it also in his " music ", in his creative work, similarly questionable, though in a loftier sense (albeit I have so loved that work that even today I am deeply stirred whenever a few bars of music from this world impinge upon my ear) . The Ring emerges from the bourgeois humanist epoch in the same manner as Hitlerism. With its mixture of " roots in the soil and " and " eyes toward the future ", its appeal for a classless society, its mythical revolutionism it is the exact spiritual forerunner of the " meta-political " movement today terrorizing the world. »

Adolph Hitler once told Hermann Rauschnig (a German Conservative Revolutionary) :

« I recognize in Wagner my only predecessor. I regard him as a supreme prophetic figure. »

The German composer Richard Wagner revolutionized the Operatic genre and is seen as one of the great composers of Classical music, nevertheless, there exists another part to his legacy, his anti-Semitism. In the mid- 20th Century, Hitler discovered this prophetic voice and the Nazi dictator would then go on to realize Wagner's ideals regarding the Jewish people. The continuing influence of Wagner during Hitler's reign due to the Bayreuth Festival, consolidated Wagner's ideals in Nazi politics. The prophetic role of Wagner was then drawn full circle as Wagner was directly incorporated into Nazi life, regime and operations.

Wagner transformed Hitler :

Wagner, through his music, changed Hitler who, as a political leader, demonstrated and showed his people the wisdom and insight of the 19th Century composer and prophet. In 1905, the future dictator watched the performance of « Rienzi », in Linz. This piece transformed young Adolph. It is this Opera, which « inspired him to begin a political career ». When Hitler invited his childhood friend August Kubizek to attend the Bayreuth Festival, in 1939, Kubizek reminded Hitler of his past awe for Wagner's Opera, in 1905.

Hitler said : « At that hour, it all began ! » .

Hitler was « overwhelmed by the resplendent, dramatic musicality », after the performance, he « began to orate. Words burst from him like a backed-up flood breaking through crumbling dams. In grandiose, compelling images, he sketched for me his future and that of his people. » Hitler seems to have had a vision because of this specific performance.

Having been transformed and reformed by Wagner's music, as a political leader, Hitler then introduces Wagner's prophetic vision in his National-Socialistic world. In National-Socialist journals, particularly in the « Bayreuther Blätter » (monthly newsletter) , which Hitler used as propaganda through its musical context, one could read, « Richard Wagner is a guide towards National-Socialism ». For Hitler, it is fate that Wagner, a musical genius, who revolutionized Opera and pushed harmonies to the limit of their tonality, was German ; according to Hitler, as he says in his speech in Nuremberg, in 1933 :

« German art is the greatest defense of the German people. »

Since Wagner was Nazi Germany's most revered artist, he was also thus seen as the defender of the people ; not against exterior forces, but against the Jewish people who were the source of Germany's past failures and weaknesses. It is Wagner, their savior, who exposed these Jewish traitors and, in consequence, takes on the title of defender of the people. German music also shines and expresses the greatness of its people through the superiority of Wagner's art. Wagner has thus drastically influenced Hitler, who tries to exemplify Wagner's role as not only his savior but as that of his people.

Hitler and his Nazi regime fulfilled Wagner's ideals. Hitler's prophet's words were then incorporated in his National-Socialist society. Wagner comments on the negative effects that the Jews had on German music in his pamphlet, published in 1850, entitled « Judaism in Music » . In accord with Wagner's idea of the deterioration of music, due to Jewish musicians and composers, Hitler rapidly outlawed, in 1933, any Jewish participation in music. In Wagner's last text, « Know Thyself » (1881) , he argues that « Judaism and nationalism are antagonistic to such a point that only the disappearance of one, will lead to the regeneration of the other. » This aspect was realized through Hitler's internal policies as he was determined to eradicate, through concentration and labour camps, the Jewish virus, which was preventing German society from reaching its true and deserved glory, as Wagner also highlights in : « What is German ? » .

Wagner also physically sets apart the Jew from the common German. In « Der Ring des Nibelungen » and « Die Meistersinger » , Mime, Albrecht and Beckmesser are all respectively appropriated with Wagner's opinion of what it means and looks like to be Jewish. Wagner sets the voices of Beckmesser, Mime and Albrecht in a frantically high-register. The composer makes them sing lines full of dissonant tritons, as well as some other unconventional and musically awkward intervals and tones. This musical aspect of these characters' part makes their voices screech in a similar fashion to the description of Jewish speech in « Judaism in Music » , « in an arbitrary distortion of our national idiom » . In all productions of these 2 Operas, these individuals are hunched, disfigured, ugly and possess other such negative characteristics, as Siegfried describes Mime in several scenes. Similarly, the Nazis portrayed the Jews in an identical manner, most notably in « Der Stürmer » , a weekly tabloid. Just like in the Opera, the Jew was immediately identifiable due to his physical features (nose, forehead, overweight and often hunched) . In contrast to these repugnant caricatures, the main heroes from Wagner's Operas, Walther and Siegfried are always cast as tall, healthy, good-looking men, the embodiment of the Aryan man which the Nazis create as the Jew's counterpart, just as Wagner did.

Wagner also made several statements regarding how the Jewish people should be treated ; one of his most prominent viewpoints is shown as Siegfried chokes Mime to death. The hero does not feel any remorse, as he is fearless and conscience-free, Wagner here thus justifies Siegfried's actions. According to Wagner, the Jew must be rid of, as he is a detriment to the pure German society. Interestingly, Siegfried's actions can be assimilated to that of a model Nazi and Wagner's characterization of the Jewish is nearly identical to Hitler's perspective on these people. All the ideas, which Wagner expressed in his written and musical work, fit Hitler's needs of emulating the negative aspect and influence of the Jewish people on the true Aryans. In essence, Wagner's stated opinions fit almost to perfectly with those of Hitler, which lead to Hitler's fascination of use of the composer.

Even after Hitler's discovery of Wagner, the German composer kept on influencing the Nazis from beyond the grave. Spawning from Hitler's fascination for Wagner, Bayreuth played a key role in the association of Nationalist-Socialism and the composer's music. After Wagner's death, it was his wife, Cosima, who transformed the Festival into a symbol of the dominance of German culture. Hitler even said :

« It was Cosima Wagner's to have created the link between Bayreuth and National-Socialism. »

« The Bayreuth Circle » maneuvered Wagner's musical compositions and ideas, studied previously, into a specific doctrine. Chamberlain, Wagner's son-in-law, was Bayreuth's most notable ideologue. Chamberlain altered Bayreuth's passive racism and nationalism into an overwhelming force.

Chamberlain demanded the redemption of Aryan Christianity, which could only be achieved through the elimination of the Jewish people. For him, and most of the Festival attendees, 2 races stood across from one another and waged a silent war « in the heart of society but this struggle was above all others, for life and death » . According to historian Frederic Spotts, Bayreuth was « the place to learn, again and again, to have confidence in Germanness, in German idealism and in German selflessness » . Bayreuth is drawn-up to be almost a cradle and motor of Nazi ideology, as depicted by its members and founders. It also highly-influenced Hitler, as « only with timely support from « The Bayreuth Circle » , especially Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Winfried Wagner, and henchmen like Dietrich Eckhart in the Thule Society, could the unimpressive Hitler assume the self- then public image of a Wotan / Siegfried figure, complete with telling nickname : « Wolf » . Due to the creation of Bayreuth by Wagner, Wagner continuously influenced Hitler's Nazi regime through his legacy. Even through death, Wagner's prophetic hand and words were present as « the one who wants to understand a National-Socialist Germany must unavoidably know Wagner » .

In addition to Wagner's influence on Nazi Germany and its leader, Wagner was incorporated in almost every aspect of the Party's agenda, thus fulfilling his role of prophet as his ideals and person are introduced into everyday life. Bayreuth, evoked previously, was considered as the dictator's 2nd residence, it is in this domain that he would celebrate his birthdays and would bring along with him SS soldiers to educate them and display the magnificence of Wagner's music. Hitler also used Wagner's music to emblazon his regime. The Overture of « Rienzi » was made the official hymn for the Nazi Party's ceremonies and « Die Meistersinger » was seen and venerated as the pinnacle of the Operatic genre. His music was also played in concentration camps as Pascal Quignard says :

« Music is the only art which collaborated in the extinction of the Jewish people by the Germans, between 1933 and 1945. »

In concentration camps, music was either played over loudspeakers or inmates were forced to sing, most notably in the Dachau camp where Wagner's music was broadcasted and used to re-educate inmates. In contrast, in Buchenwald, the SS would sometimes allow prisoners to listen in over loudspeakers to other broadcasts of German concerts, and in most cases, it was Wagner's music they heard. This is quite shocking as the SS were the most cruel and brutal branch of the Nazi body.

One can thus see the importance which Wagner holds in the Nazis' eyes, as they wish to share the incredible genius and talent which he possessed. Wagner's music was also used militaristically. Hitler even used the terms « Nacht und Nebel » (Night and Fog) , which belonged to Wagner's « Rheingold » to designate the directive, on the 7th of December 1941, which was to commence deportations. In « Rheingold » , Alberich, the dwarf who symbolizes Jewish cupidity, casts a spell cursing the ring and all its future owners, as he wanted it for himself. The Nazis turn this magic against him, as they start what will become a Jewish genocide. Wagner's music was thus fully incorporated into Hitler's politics. The use of Wagner and his music was extensive, in its use for and by the Party, as well as against the Nazis' enemies. Wagner's voice is thus represented throughout National-Socialist society.

Adolf Hitler ou l'éveil par la musique de Richard Wagner

Un destin en parallèle : les années d'apprentissage (1900-1908)

Au moment où Houston Stewart Chamberlain commençait à revêtir le manteau de Richard Wagner à Bayreuth, un jeune homme âgé de 11 ans, et du nom d'Adolf Hitler, entreprenait ses études secondaires le 17 septembre 1900, à la « Realschule » de Linz. (1) D'après la version donnée dans « Mein Kampf », cette voie aurait été préférée par son père, Aloïs, en vue des aptitudes qu'il avait déjà tout jeune pour le dessin. Aloïs songeait davantage à une carrière de fonctionnaire pour son fils. L'entrée au collège fut une épreuve rude pour le jeune Adolf qui, pour rejoindre Linz depuis sa maison de Leonding, devait faire plus de 1 heure de marche à l'aller chaque jour. Alors qu'il était connu comme ayant du caractère à Leonding, les autres ne faisaient guère attention à lui à Linz. La 1^{re} année académique (1900-1901), son travail fut jugé « insatisfaisant » en mathématiques et en histoire naturelle, l'obligeant à redoubler. Selon ses professeurs, son application en cours était « variable ». Jusqu'en 1905, date à laquelle il quitta l'école, ses résultats furent jugés médiocres. En plus de ses difficultés à la « Realschule » de Linz, Hitler avait des problèmes avec son père car il ne voulait, en aucun cas, faire carrière dans l'administration publique comme le souhaitait son père. Ainsi, comme il le relate dans « Mein Kampf » :

« J'avais des nausées à penser que je pourrais être, un jour, prisonnier dans un bureau ; que je ne serais pas le Maître de mon temps. » (2)

Ce que nous venons de citer précédemment relève de « Mein Kampf » mais ce que savent les historiens peut s'avérer différent. Nous allons offrir une piste nouvelle pour répondre à des questions pendantes sur Hitler. Prenons l'exemple de la « religion de Hitler ». Certains historiens, depuis Friedrich Heer, insistent sur le lien entre le catholicisme autrichien et le Nazisme. D'autres, parlent de « néo-paganisme » en se fondant sur les cérémonies du 3^e « Reich ». Nous allons montrer comment Hitler est passé du catholicisme à la religion de Wagner. Comme il le confia au journaliste Frederick Öchsner, en 1936, durant le Festival de Bayreuth :

Déjà, à cette époque, le rêve d'Adolf Hitler était de devenir artiste ce que son père ne pouvait admettre :

« Artiste, non. Aussi longtemps que je vivrais, jamais ! » (4)

Avec « Mein Kampf », il s'invente une biographie d'artiste comme en atteste la formulation stylistique précédente, rédigée telle une réplique de théâtre.

On peut observer tout au long de « Mein Kampf » un mimétisme cultivé avec le destin de Wagner : le narrateur se présente comme un artiste contrarié : d'abord par son père ; ensuite par « les Juifs » qui l'ont empêché de répondre à sa vocation durant les années viennoises ; puis, du fait de la Guerre et de la défaite, qui l'ont obligé à « entrer en politique ». Plus tard, en 1940-1941, devenu provisoirement Maître d'une grande partie du continent européen, Hitler aimait se projeter dans la période où il se retirerait de la politique pour s'adonner à son goût de l'architecture et de l'art.

C'est le 3 janvier 1903 qu'Aloïs Hitler mourut, en laissant sa famille dans une situation confortable. Il est fort peu probable, malgré le chagrin de sa mère, qu'Adolf pleura son père. (5) Avec sa mort, nombreuses tensions et pressions parentales disparurent pour le jeune Adolf car sa mère, essayant d'abord de le faire poursuivre les rêves de son père, n'eut pas raison de la volonté de son fils d'accomplir son rêve de devenir artiste. Dans tous les cas, ses médiocres résultats scolaires excluaient une carrière dans la fonction publique. Changeant d'école, en 1904, et passant ainsi de Linz à Steyr, ses résultats ne devinrent guère meilleurs, excepté en sport et en dessin. Il réussit toutefois, au rattrapage, ses examens de fin de 1er cycle. Il abandonna alors l'école définitivement n'ayant aucune idée précise de ce qu'il allait faire. Ces 2 années (1905-1906 ; 1906-1907) commençaient par la fin de ses études et s'achevaient avec la mort de sa mère, Hitler n'y fit pas allusion dans « Mein Kampf ». Hitler est intéressant et banal parce qu'il est un fils de bourgeois de la fin du XIXe siècle qui a la religion de l'art.

Son ami d'alors, August Kubizek, parle de ces 2 années dans ses mémoires rédigés après la Guerre qui doivent cependant être traitées avec prudence sur le plan des détails et dans ses interprétations. En effet, à l'origine, c'est à l'initiative du Parti nazi que Kubizek fut chargé d'élaborer ses mémoires. (6) Selon l'historien Franz Jetzinger, Kubizek aurait eu tendance à inventer certains passages après sa propre lecture de « Mein Kampf » allant parfois jusqu'au plagiat afin de donner plus d'ampleur à des souvenirs personnels limités, voire effacés. (7) Nous pensons toutefois que l'ouvrage de Kubizek est intéressant dans la mesure où il en dit beaucoup sur le wagnérisme d'Hitler. Quelle que soit la part de l'œuvre de commande, Kubizek, avec toute sa naïveté, en dit beaucoup sur ce à quoi croyait Hitler.

Kubizek était de 9 mois plus qu'âgé qu'Adolf Hitler. C'est par hasard qu'ils firent connaissance dans le courant de l'automne 1905 lors d'une représentation à l'Opéra de Linz. Depuis déjà quelques années, Adolf Hitler était un admirateur de Wagner (8) et Kubizek partageait sa passion pour l'Opéra, en particulier ceux du « Maître de Bayreuth ». Kubizek était docile et impressionnable alors qu'Adolf était dominateur et décidé. Selon Kubizek, à l'époque :

Kubizek, contrairement à Hitler, avait des origines sociales relativement pauvres. Dès qu'Hitler parlait que ce fut d'Opéra, de Wagner, des fonctionnaires inutiles ou des enseignants, « Gustl » l'écoutait attentivement.

Le soir, tous 2 se rendaient au Théâtre ou à l'Opéra, après quoi Hitler faisait sa critique de la pièce vue. Bien que Kubizek s'y connût mieux que lui en musique, il restait toujours soumis dans leurs discussions. La passion de Hitler pour Wagner ne connaissait pas de limites et pouvait le plonger dans des fantasmes mystiques, Wagner incarnant pour lui, le génie artistique suprême. (10)

À cette époque, le jeune Hitler se comportait comme un oisif et attendait que sa mère lui donne l'argent nécessaire pour vivre. Il vivait dans un appartement de la rue Humboldt, à Linz. Comme il se rêvait artiste, sa mère lui offrit un piano sur lequel il prit des leçons 4 mois durant, entre octobre 1906 et janvier 1907. (11) À cette époque, Hitler se préoccupait uniquement de l'art ; la journée, il passait son temps à dessiner, à peindre, à lire ou même à écrire de la « poésie » et le soir, il allait au Théâtre ou à l'Opéra où il rêvait à son avenir d'artiste. Hitler communiait au culte de l'art qui caractérise la bourgeoisie de son époque.

À l'époque où Hitler commence à fréquenter de plus en plus assidûment l'Opéra, c'est à dire vers 1905, Wagner devient son utopie personnelle ; Hitler s'intéresse à tout ce qui touche au musicien de ses Opéras à ses écrits révolutionnaires, puis antisémites. Ce qu'il avait vu de Wagner, jeune garçon à Linz, devait se révéler décisif après qu'il eut entamé sa carrière politique, Wagner jouant le rôle en quelque sorte, de « langage commun » à Hitler et aux autres Allemands. (12)

En plus de la musique de Wagner, Hitler et Kubizek aimaient à parler d'architecture et de grand art. Alors que Kubizek était un excellent musicien, il se laissait impressionner par Adolf qui lui affirmait qu'il allait devenir un véritable artiste. D'ailleurs, alors que Kubizek travaillait dur dans l'atelier de son père, Adolf Hitler passait son temps à dessiner puis allait retrouver son fidèle « Gustl » après le travail de ce dernier. Au printemps de 1906, Adolf Hitler pria sa mère de l'envoyer passer quelques jours à Vienne pour étudier la galerie de tableaux du Musée de la Cour. Durant un peu plus de 2 semaines, il visita les endroits les plus connus de la ville. Les cartes postales qu'il devait réaliser plus tard, ainsi que son témoignage dans « Mein Kampf », montrent comme il admira les monuments et bâtisses de la rue du « Ring ». Il semble qu'il ait passé le plus clair de ses soirées à l'Opéra de la Cour où les mises en scène de « Tristan et Isolde » ou du « Hollandais volant » de Wagner par Gustav Mahler étaient supérieures à celles qu'il avait pu voir à Linz. À son retour d'un 1er séjour dans la capital des Habsbourg, il avait décidé qu'il allait passer par l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Vienne. Dans le courant de l'année 1907, cette idée se faisait de plus en plus concrète. Bien que sa mère eût insisté pour qu'il prenne enfin un emploi, Hitler la persuada de le laisser retourner à Vienne pour passer le concours des Beaux-arts. (13)

D'un point de vue pécunier, le jeune homme de 18 ans n'avait, à l're vue, aucun souci à se faire depuis que sa tante Johanna lui avait proposé un prêt de 924 Couronnes afin que son neveu puisse mener à bien ses études artistiques. Cet argent lui assurait de quoi vivre durant 1 bonne année. (14) À cette époque, sa mère Klara souffrait d'un cancer du sein et elle avait été opérée, début janvier, par le docteur Eduard Bloch. C'est Hitler qui régla la facture de 100 Couronnes ainsi que les frais d'hospitalisation. Quand il apprit que sa mère ne s'en sortirait pas, il pleura mais partit tout de même à Vienne, au début du mois de septembre 1907, juste à temps pour passer l'examen d'entrée à l'Académie des Beaux-arts. Chaque candidat devait présenter ses travaux et, comme il l'écrivit plus tard, il apporta « une épaisse liasse de dessins ». 113 candidats figuraient au départ et 33 furent éliminés lors du 1er test. Au début d'octobre eut lieu le second examen où les candidats devaient plancher sur des thèmes spécifiques. Parmi les 28 reçus, le nom d'Hitler manquait :

Telle fut la sentence. (15)

Hitler n'avait jamais pensé qu'il aurait pu échouer comme il allait l'écrire plus tard dans « Mein Kampf » :

« J'étais persuadé que ce serait un jeu d'enfant. J'étais si persuadé du succès que l'annonce de mon échec me frappa comme un coup de foudre dans un ciel clair. » (16)

Quand il demanda une explication au recteur, ce dernier lui dit que s'il serait inapte à suivre les cours de l'École de peinture, il avait des qualités pour l'architecture. Hitler en ressortit « doutant pour la 1re fois de sa vie » .

Après avoir réfléchi quelques jours, Hitler en conclut que le recteur avait raison :

« Je me vis architecte. »

Ayant trop souffert de cet échec, il garda ce dernier secret. Hitler accepta cependant la bifurcation vers l'architecture parce que cela reste de l'art, et surtout que Wagner a été architecte à Bayreuth.

Après la mort de sa mère, il poursuivit son rêve de devenir artiste et retourna à Vienne pour faire ses études d'architecte. Son objectif était clair :

« Je voulais devenir architecte et les difficultés rencontrées étaient de celles que l'on brise et non pas de celles devant lesquelles on capitule. »

Après les funérailles de sa mère, Hitler pouvait une fois de plus vivre sans travailler grâce à l'argent que sa mère avait épargné. Il regagna Vienne, en février 1908, avec Kubizek dans ses valises qui allait étudier la musique. Bien qu'il n'avait guère travaillé, Hitler décida de repasser l'examen d'entrée à l'Académie, l'année suivante. (17) Les années qui suivirent jusqu'en 1913 allaient devenir « la plus triste période de mon existence » , car Hitler n'arrivait pas à devenir artiste et à atteindre ainsi l'objectif qu'il s'était fixé.

La jeunesse d'un futur dictateur et la découverte d'une idole

C'est peu après son arrivée à Vienne, en février 1908, qu'Hitler retrouve son ami August Kubizek dont il avait convaincu les parents de laisser leur fils le rejoindre pour entamer des études de musique. Dès le 1er jour, et malgré la fatigue de son ami, Hitler l'entraîne à l'Opéra. C'est à cette époque qu'il se met à composer un drame dans un style wagnérien traitant de l'arrivée du christianisme dans les Alpes bavaroises (18) ; projet qui n'aboutira pas.

Dès cette époque, on peut dire qu'Hitler connaissait très bien les œuvres de Wagner car il alla jusqu'à essayer d'achever une esquisse d'Opéra de Wagner, « Wieland le forgeron » , qui n'a jamais vu le jour. D'après les souvenirs de Kubizek, Hitler se mit jour et nuit à ce travail afin de tenter de poursuivre l'œuvre de son idole, sans succès bien entendu.

De même qu'à Linz, sa passion pour Wagner ne connut plus de limites : Kubizek se souvient d'avoir assisté aux côtés de son ami à l'Opéra « Lohengrin » plus de 10 fois (19) ; et sa soeur Paula assurait quant à elle, en son temps, avoir vu en compagnie de son frère le « Crépuscule des Dieux » 13 fois à Linz (20) ; tandis qu'Hitler, lui même, assurait avoir vu « Tristan », « 30 ou 40 fois » . (21)

Kubizek rapporta aussi que :

Nous nous rallions au point de vue des historiens Bradley Smith (23) , Joachim Köhler et Joachim Fest (24) lorsqu'ils disent qu'on a toutes les raisons de croire Kubizek lorsqu'il rapporte qu'Adolf Hitler, avant même la période viennoise, fut tellement remué par une représentation de l'Opéra « Rienzi » (25) qu'il l'entraîna dans une longue promenade nocturne au sommet de Freinberg, près de Linz, et dans un état quasi extatique, l'entretint de la signification de ce qu'ils venaient de voir. Kubizek (26) vit dans cet épisode tel qu'il le raconte, à la manière des mystiques, une Ire vision prophétique de l'avenir d'Hitler. De toute évidence, l'étrange soirée lui avait fait une impression durable. D'ailleurs, il le rappela à Hitler lorsqu'ils se retrouvèrent en 1939, des années plus tard, à Bayreuth. Hitler s'en saisit sur le champ, pour faire valoir de ses qualités précoces de prophète à son hôtesse, Winifred Wagner, avant de conclure par ses mots :

« C'est à cette heure que tout a commencé. » (27)

Kubizek rappela dans son ouvrage de souvenirs comment Hitler et lui vécurent une véritable expérience théâtrale en assistant pour la Ire fois à une mise en scène de « Rienzi » au Théâtre de Linz. C'est là qu'Hitler aurait pris conscience de son destin politique, de sa mission allemande. Nous citerons donc cette longue anecdote de Kubizek « in-extenso » car elle est particulièrement importante dans le développement personnel du futur « Führer » :

« Il m'avait parlé de cet Opéra. Richard Wagner l'avait commencé à Dresde, en 1838, et y avait travaillé au cours d'un séjour au bord de la Baltique. »

C'était intéressant qu'il ait composé une œuvre sur la Rome médiévale, à l'époque où il travaillait sur le nord. Wagner acheva « Rienzi » à Paris et, quand l'œuvre fut créée à Dresde 2 ans plus tard, elle assit sa réputation comme compositeur d'Opéras même si elle était moins aboutie que ses œuvres suivantes. Après « Rienzi » , il concentra son attention sur le nord et fit des dieux de la mythologie germanique ; son domaine de prédilection. « Rienzi » , bien que l'action se passât en 1347, était inspiré de l'esprit et du rythme des événements révolutionnaires qui déferlèrent sur l'Allemagne, 10 ans plus tard.

en pensait. Il me lança un regard étrange, presque hostile.

Il répondit brusquement :

“ La ferme ! ”

Une brume froide montait, oppressante, dans les rues désertes. Nos pas solitaires résonaient sur le pavé. Adolf prit la route qui montait au Freinberg. Il avançait sans un mot. Il apparaissait presque sinistre, et plus pâle que jamais. Son col retourné accentuait cette impression.

Je voulais lui demander “ Où vas-tu ? ”, mais son visage était si dissuasif que je retins la question.

Comme poussé par une force invisible, Adolf atteignit le sommet du Freinberg et, alors seulement, je réalisai que nous n'étions plus seuls dans l'obscurité, car une voûte étoilée nous surplombait.

Adolf me fit face, me prit les 2 mains et les serra fortement. Il n'avait jamais fait un tel geste auparavant. Je sentis par cette prise combien il était ému. Ses yeux étaient fiévreux d'excitation. Les mots ne sortaient pas facilement de sa bouche comme de coutume, mais de façon éruptive, avec un son rauque.

À sa voix, je comprenais encore plus comme cette expérience l'avait secoué.

Petit à petit, son débit s'apaisa et les mots sortirent plus aisément. Jamais auparavant, et jamais ensuite, je n'ai entendu Adolf Hitler parler comme ce soir-là, alors que nous étions debout tout seuls sous les étoiles, comme si nous avions été les seuls êtres au monde.

Je ne peux pas redire tous les mots qu'il a prononcés. J'étais frappé par quelque chose d'étrange, que je n'avais jamais remarqué même quand il me parlait avec une grande excitation. C'était comme si un second être parlait à travers lui, et lui causait la même émotion qu'il me causait. Il ne s'agissait pas du cas où celui qui parle est excité par ses propres mots. Au contraire, j'avais l'impression que lui-même écoutait avec étonnement et émotion ce qui jaillissait de lui avec une force élémentaire. Je ne veux pas essayer d'expliquer ce phénomène, mais c'était un état d'extase complète et de ravissement, sous l'empire duquel, sans même se réclamer du héros comme d'un modèle ou évoquer son pouvoir visionnaire, il transférait le personnage de “ Rienzi ” sur le terrain de ses propres ambitions. Mais c'était plus qu'un simple emprunt ; l'impact de l'Opéra était plutôt une pure impulsion externe, qui le poussait à parler. Comme un torrent brisant ses digues, les mots jaillissaient de lui.

Il parlait d'une mission spéciale qui allait lui échoir un jour et moi, son unique auditeur, je pouvais difficilement comprendre de quoi il s'agissait. Il me fallut beaucoup d'années pour comprendre le sens de cette heure d'enchantement vécue par mon ami. » (28)

après un événement culturel à parler et à critiquer immédiatement la mise en scène, Adolf se tut longtemps après cette représentation là » . (29)

En effet, cette fois-ci, le héros de Wagner n'est pas issu de la mythologie comme le furent « Lohengrin » ou « Parsifal » mais est issu de l'histoire médiévale, d'une période historique ; réelle donc. Quand Hitler se définit dans « Mein Kampf » comme « un révolutionnaire politique et culturel ayant très tôt conscience de tout et sachant tirer les leçons de l'Histoire » (30) , il pense à « Rienzi » . (31)

Dès ses jeunes années, on l'a évoqué précédemment, Hitler fut totalement subjugué par la puissance des drames musicaux et l'évocation d'un passé germanique héroïque et supérieur. Son 1er Opéra, qu'il vit d'ailleurs avec son père à 12 ans, fut « Lohengrin » puis, aussitôt après, « Rienzi » qui se jouait au Théâtre de Linz depuis le 3 janvier 1905. (32) Comme Brigitte Hamann le relate dans son livre « La Vienne d'Hitler » :

Hitler fit dès cette époque, de Linz, sa capitale secrète et les historiens qui s'étonnent du fait oublient que c'est dans cette ville que Hitler eut, au sortir de l'enfance, la révélation de Wagner.

Joachim Fest explique dans la biographie qu'il consacre à Hitler les affinités entre le « Maître de Bayreuth » et le « Führer » :

Mann écrivait, en 1938, au point culminant des triomphes hitlériens :

« Qu'on le veuille ou non, ne faut-il pas reconnaître dans le cas Hitler une manifestation qui s'apparente à l'activité artistique ? En un style qui nous inspire sans doute de la honte, toutes les caractéristiques de l'artiste sont présentes dans le personnage : la “ difficulté ”, la paresse, la vague à l'âme pitoyable de l'adolescence, le vagabondage, l'irrésolution, l'errance à demi-stupide dans une bohème sociale et spirituelle du plus bas degré, le refus arrogant de toute activité raisonnable et honorable et sous quel prétexte ? Celui de se sentir obscurément voué à un destin tout à fait indéfinissable qui, si on le précisait, en admettant qu'il pût être précisé, provoquerait un éclat de rire général. Ajoutez à tout cela la mauvaise conscience, le sentiment de culpabilité, la colère contre le monde, l'instinct révolutionnaire, l'accumulation subconsciente de désirs explosifs de compensation, la conscience, la conscience têtue d'un besoin d'auto-justification, de plaidoyer ; c'est une parenté hautement pénible. Je ne me la dissimulerais pas. » (35)

« Il y a encore d'autres analogies surprenantes : ici, comme l'obscurité qui entoure l'identité des ascendants, l'échec scolaire, la fuite devant le service militaire, la haine pathologique du Juif, de même le végétarisme qui, chez Wagner, donne naissance à l'idée absurde et ridicule que l'humanité devra être régénérée par une alimentation à base de plantes. Ils ont aussi le caractère extrême de leurs réactions, l'état permanent d'exaltation dans lequel les dépressions et l'euphorie, les triomphes et les catastrophes alternent sans transition. » (36)

Comme l'explique Sebastian Haffner dans son ouvrage, « Deutschland : Jekyll und Hyde (1939) . Deutschland von innen betrachtet » , Hitler avait 3 buts personnels. Le 1er touchait à son propre développement personnel : il fallait qu'Hitler arrive à asseoir son pouvoir et à le développer. (37)

Le second but consistait à se venger des personnes et des institutions qui l'avaient fait souffrir. (38)

Enfin, le dernier but, et celui qui nous intéresse plus particulièrement : « mettre en scène » des Opéras wagnériens dont lui même, Hitler, serait le héros. (39)

Cette remarque de Sebastian Haffner fait, dans une certaine mesure, écho à celle de l'écrivain Gert Kalow (40) qui, dès 1967, proposa dans son ouvrage, « Hitler ein deutsches Trauma » , publié en allemand, un regard très proche de notre pensée actuelle :

« Hitler était un génie, ce qui veut dire comme il a assez dit lui-même : un artiste. Un artiste qui se servit de la nation toute entière comme d'un moyen d'expression personnel. Hitler nous a pris dans son rêve et nous prit pour fonction dans son “ Moi ” imaginaire. Il fut le metteur en scène qui manipula les masses de façon esthétique tel un chœur. Nous étions ainsi les interprètes et les figurants dans cette œuvre d'art totale, dans ce plus grand opéra wagnérien de tous les temps. » (41)

En effet, Hitler avait le don de manipuler la masse : reste à savoir s'il allait être capable de se comporter tel un chef d'orchestre dirigeant son propre « Parsifal » .

Did Richard Wagner Inspired Hitler ?

While Wagnerian fanatics undeniably include a contingent of what one critic memorably referred to as « leathery old Nazis » , these are now no longer taken seriously. After a period of intense academic / historical skirmishing in the late- 1980's to mid-1990's, recent advancements in Wagner studies scholarship have settled our understanding of the genealogical sources of his ideas. His anti-Judaism belonged to the Utopian, anti-clerical family of the sort held by Marx and Bauer as well as drawing on the race theorists and social Darwinism circulating at the time. His overriding obsession with purity of German myth and language metastasized easily into a crusade for purity of race. Adorno's once crankish position that Wagner's work was the decisive element linking the 19th Century rebirth of German Romanticism to the development of National-Socialism now approximates something akin to received wisdom. Hitler's love for the work, epitomized by his identification with the character of the sensitive misunderstood (and, eventually, victorious) artist Walther von Stolzing in « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » is a « fait accompli » matter in the Opera's patrimony and will, most likely forever, encrust the works with a grimy layer of infamy.

Given that Wagner's music has clearly stood the test of time, what remains is a host of delicate and unresolved questions about the implications of the composer's anti-Semitism and other toxic affinities : Was Wagner merely acting as a vessel for commonly accepted ideas ? Are the anti-Semitic tropes interwoven into the formal properties of the music and Operas themselves ? If music, as Wagner's defenders often proclaim, cannot be fascist, what about the contents of the librettos ? If the librettos are indeed not anti-Semitic, does that justify the lifting of Israel's unofficial ban on reciting his works ? Writing in the « New York Review of Books », last summer, the conductor Daniel Barenboim, perhaps the most ardent living champion of Wagner's rehabilitation, began his eloquent vindication of the right to play Wagner in Israel with the observation that « perhaps, no other composer in history sought to combine such obviously incompatible elements in his works » .

A new exhibition « Euphoria and Unease : Jewish Vienna and Richard Wagner » , at the Jewish Museum of Vienna, and a newly-translated biography « Richard Wagner : A Life in Music » , by German musicologist, Martin Geck, both attempt to give new answers to these often asked questions. Both are sketchily ethereal and less stridently judgmental about Wagner's proto-Nazism than has recently been the case, perhaps, auguring a new trend toward post-ideological enjoyment of the composer's work. Yet, there remains no definitive consensus on what drove Wagner to become an anti-Semite, in the 1st place.

The definitive scholarly examination for a general reader of Wagner's anti-Semitism remains Jacob Katz's 1986 monograph « The Darker Side of Genius » , which ably enumerates the conventional narrative of how Wagner developed his ideas about and violent hatred of the Jews. The Classical explanation lies in Wagner's deep resentment at the public success and facile genius of his 2 Jewish contemporaries in the German musical world : Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Giacomo Meyerbeer. That Mendelssohn was the wealthy and cosseted son of a banker, while Wagner grew-up in the shadow of poverty and illegitimacy did not help matters either. At 18, Wagner sent his only handwritten manuscript of an early Symphony to Mendelssohn. It was promptly lost in the mail - an accident that he probably blamed on the Jews. Despite his mixed feelings, Wagner only retroactively filtered his resentments through the lens of his rivals' Jewishness. He did so in his infamous 1850 essay, « Das Judentum in der Musik » (On Jewishness in Music) , which was written under a pseudonym (tellingly, it did not appear until after Mendelssohn's sudden death, in 1847) and that he had republished under his own name, 2 decades later.

A humiliating and unproductive sojourn Wagner took in Paris, during his mid- 20's, didn't help much, either. Having fled his conductor's appointment at the Court of Riga through the Russian border to avoid the clutches of his creditors (some of whom, yes, were Jewish) , Wagner arrived in Paris with great hopes, but the French reaction to his work was dismissively cool. Wagner's only income in Paris came from the German Jewish music-publisher Maurice Schlesinger, who commissioned him to correct musical proofs. Wagner bristled at the work, which was mostly of transcribing and collating the work of the now somewhat obscure French Jewish composer Fromental Halévy. The cloying sycophancy of the young Wagner's letters, to both Schlesinger and Meyerbeer, make for uncomfortable reading, and the composer's resentment must have congealed into rancor after Meyerbeer rebuffed him.

Decamping from Paris, he returned to Germany to witness the 1st stirring of the Revolutions of 1848 and was promptly banished from Dresden for his part in that city's failed uprising. His enthusiasm for Utopian politics of redemption curdled into a Romantic fantasia of escape from worldly corruption into a resurgent mytho-poetic dreamworld that would regenerate a conservative society into belatedly accepting the poet-composer as its savior.

Katz's own conclusion is that Wagner simply took himself too seriously, that « his consciousness of his brilliant originality in music seems to have given him a sense of confidence in his own judgment, even in areas in which he had very little knowledge at his disposal » .

Wagner's latest biographer, Martin Geck, worked on the « catalogue raisonné » of Wagner's works, as well as the critical edition of « Parsifal » before writing « A Life in Music » . He faces the underlying problem of all of the dozens of Wagner biographers in trying to find the impossible balance between rehashing the events of Wagner's fabulously picaresque life and laying-out the intellectual history / ideological critique and musicology. Geck's book falls squarely on the musicology corner of the intellectual-history / musicology axis. He is extremely perceptive in his explanation of the way Wagner used the echoes of Beethoven's and Bach's themes to synthesize an archaizing mood for his newly created genre of Symphonic Opera. Extremely spirited and fluid, the book, nonetheless, almost reaches a point of incomprehensibility to non-specialists. (For a straight account of Wagner's life, minus the semiotics and references to Heidegger and Julia Kristeva, the general reader should turn to Barry Millington's « Wagner : The Sorcerer of Bayreuth » .)

Geck also mostly avoids the 2nd problem of Wagner biographies, which is whether to rely on Cosima Wagner's voluminous diaries and Wagner's self-serving autobiography by opting for a dizzily erudite interpretive approach, making this, perhaps, the 1st post-modern Wagner biography. He, more or less, successfully defends Wagner's characters from the charge of being simple, anti-Semitic stereotypes of the wheeling, cringing, degenerate Jew by invoking the complexity and ambivalence with which Wagner imbued all of his characters, in Operas that are about the specter of violent redemption through love.

Geck's excellent 2009 essay, « What Was Eating Wagner ? » , makes clearer his allegiance to the « failed revolutionary » as the culprit for Wagner's turn to the « Dark Side » . Geck both concentrates attention on and elides a direct confrontation with the ideological place of anti-Semitism in Wagner's work by adding crisp, aphoristic « a word about » mini-chapters to the end of each of the book's 13 chapters. Each « a word about » discusses Wagner's relationship with or influence on a Jew, such as his self-loathing accompanist Josef Rubinstein.

The exhibition in the Vienna Jewish Museum exhibit showcases the expected Wagner collectibles, of which there are many, as Vienna housed some of the 1st, and most obsessive, Wagner Societies. The show focuses understandably on his Vienna years and connections. Consequently, and perhaps misleadingly, it focuses on minor quarrels and local characters in the Wagner saga. These include his wrangling with his Viennese seamstress Bertha Goldwag, and portraits of all-but-forgotten mid-Century oddballs and racists such as Felix Mottl, Otto Weininger, Guido von List, or the pan-German radical Georg Ritter von Schönerer. Wagner's relations toward Anton Bruckner can only be described as « snotty » .

The show also focuses on Wagner's prickly relations with scornful contemporary music-critics such as the Jewish critic Eduard Hanslick. Wagner blamed Hanslick for (what he wrongly perceived as) his lack of success and, after Hanslick got his hands on a trove of embarrassingly vain letters between Wagner and his seamstress, he published them with vindictive glee. The perennial problem faced by tempestuous personality types who collect enemies is in the risks of ascribing an essentialist group characteristic to one's enemies. Typically, Wagner failed to take note of the fact that not every music-critic is a Jew and that, conversely, not every Jew is a music-critic.

What the exhibit does extremely well is inculcating the facts of the sheer number of Jewish musicians and conductors that were instrumental in revealing Wagner's dark magic to the wider world as well as the ironic repercussions that dark magic wrought upon Viennese Jewry. (Mahler's 1st production, after leaving Vienna for New York, was conducting « Tristan und Isolde » , at the Metropolitan.) The Viennese musical world (the world of Gustav Mahler, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Arnold Schönberg, Alexander von Zemlinsky) was decimated by the « Anschluß » . Reading the plaques and dates on the wall, one cannot help but be shocked by how many Viennese Jews died in American exile.

As poised and thorough as the exhibit is, in another sense it is compromised by the adoption of an oddly over-solicitous tone - uncommitted to passing judgment on the Master himself, his disciples, or anyone who appropriated his music for their own ideological ends. It also spares from rebuke the apolitical ordinary listeners who choose to revel in the primordial ecstasy of Wagner's Operas while ignoring the unpleasant implications of his cosmology. Indeed, the exhibit is free to refrain from taking a position on Wagner by a calculated recitation of the judgments of others. It concludes, as this essay began, with a meditation of the Wagner ban in Israel, along with the presentation of dozens of epigrams about Wagner inscribed on the walls of the exhibit's final room.

Depending on one's sensibility, this culmination is either a curatorial sleight of hand or a daring, post-ideological invitation for debate. The quotes argue both the case for and the case against the rejection of the inherent putrescence of Wagner's legacy. The opinions range from the flippant and exculpatory to the outraged and damning. Some are mournfully apologetic, such as Gottfried Wagner's admission that the « ideology of Bayreuth contributed to Hitler's rabid madness and everything that ensued from it » . Several prominent Viennese critics and scholars protest both « Right-wing ideological » and « Israeli » appropriation of the music, demanding their right to enjoy it unmolested by the discomfort of complex emotions. We are reminded also of Woody Allen's immortal crack from « Manhattan Murder Mystery » that, « I can't listen to that much Wagner. I start getting the urge to conquer Poland. » . Finally, there is the recently deceased French Opera director Patrice Chéreau's simple declaration that, « Wagner is not sacred. » .

Yet, curiously absent from that wall are any of the epigrams from « Nietzsche contra Wagner » . Looking at that wall, there is one that I could not avoid recalling. Nietzsche knew full well what he was talking about when he predicted that « one has almost calculated the whole of the value of modernity, once one is clear concerning what is good and evil in Wagner » .

L'influence de Wagner sur Hitler et vice-versa

Adolf Hitler claimed that his « Weltanschauung » was derived from Richard Wagner. His youthful reaction to the opera Rienzi led him to exclaim 30 years later : « It began at that hour. » . In « Mein Kampf » , he praised Wagner as a great revolutionary and claimed to have no forerunner except Wagner. Fest suggests that Wagner had an immense effect upon Hitler. « The Master of Bayreuth » was not only Hitler's great exemplar ; he was also the young man's ideological Mentor. Wagner's political writings (together with his operas) form the entire framework for Hitler's ideology.

Here, he found the granite foundations for his view of the world. To Davidowicz, racial imperialism and the fanatic plan to destroy the Jews were the dominant passions behind Hitler's drive for power, « forming the matrix of his ideology and the ineradicable core of Nationalist-Socialist doctrine » . It was Hitler himself who placed responsibility for these ideas upon Wagner : « Whoever wants to understand National-Socialist Germany must know Wagner. » . Clearly, Wagner and his works were adopted as cultural symbols by Hitler and the 3rd « Reich » , but was his output misused by the Nazis, or does it contain elements that made appropriation possible ?

Richard Wagner's Operatic works reflect the complexity of his genius, being « many layered, not without loose ends, puzzles and internal contradictions » (Arblaster) . It is this that gives those who wish to see elements of racial nationalism in his Operas their opportunity. In Der Ring des Nibelungen, the hero is Siegfried, Wagner's « man of the future » . In the contrast between Siegfried and Mime, Brearley sees thinly disguised racism. To her, Mime represents the Jewish people his very name indicates his mimetic Jewish barrenness. Siegfried is care-free and fearless, while Mime is a scheming hypocrite. The dwarf Alberich is shown to possess unpleasant stereotypical characteristics of the Jew, hoarding gold, choosing power over love, and controlling those working for him. Blood purity also features in The Ring. When Siegfried and Gunther swear their oath of blood brotherhood, Hagen, another representative of Jewry, does not join in, explaining :

« My blood would spoil all you drink my blood's not pure and noble like yours. »

If these analogies were intended by Wagner, Mime's murder may be seen as a symbol of the ousting of all traces of Judaism from German music and society.

To Gutman, Wagner in « Parsifal » « set forth a religion of racism under the cover of Christian legend » . It is undeniable that ideas of blood purity play a role or that the opera may be seen as a fable about racial degeneration and regeneration. The Jew is shown in the guise of Kundry and Klingsor to have poisoned Aryan blood, personified by Amfortas, whose sin was to have sexual contact with a racial inferior. His blood is thus corrupted, and he can no longer act as leader of a male community committed to preserving Christ's sacred blood. « Parsifal » 's rejection of Kundry's blandishments is an affirmation of racial purity, which then enables him to rescue the beleaguered Grail community from its degeneration. That community becomes a metaphor for the Aryan race, threatened with decline by interbreeding but saved by a reassertion of the principle of racial exclusivity.

Wagner's detractors seek to corroborate interpretations of his operas with analysis of his letters and many essays. In a letter to Franz Liszt, he admitted that his « long suppressed resentment against this Jewish business » was as necessary to his nature « as gall is to the blood » . Most commonly quoted is Wagner's essay « Judaism in Music » , where he sought to explain why « actual physical contact » with the Jew remained for the non-Jew « instinctively repugnant » . He inveighed against Jewish artists, who, motivated solely by commercial instincts and lacking a culture of their own, could only imitate the art produced by the host culture. True Germans could only be repelled by the alien physical appearance of the Jews and by the offensive sibilant sound of their voices. The most condemned passage is Wagner's appeal to the Jews : « Join unreservedly in this work of redemption that you may be reborn through the process of self-annihilation and we shall all be united and indistinguishable but remember that only this alone can redeem you from the curse which weighs upon you : the redemption of Ahasuerus - Destruction (Untergang) » . To Zelinsky, this sentence contains within it the concept of genocide.

Windell considers that while Wagner's essays do contain elements of emotional nationalism and racial overtones, in his operas « it is almost impossible to find any relevant connection, whatever » . Furthermore, in Wagner's many commentaries upon his own works there is not (to Borchmeyer) a single statement entitling interpretation of any of the characters or details of the plots of his operas in anti-Semitic terms. Thus, in Der Ring des Nibelungen the attempt to interpret the Nibelungs as mythic projections of Jews is no more than an unverifiable hypothesis. In fact, Wagner's original conception of the prose scenario (The Nibelung Legend, 1848) had ended with the liberation of all the Nibelungs. The truth is that this many faceted work is capable of a multitude of interpretations. To Windell, the message of The Ring is that love and sacrifice alone can redeem the world from hatred and corruption, while to George Bernard Shaw, it is a drama about contemporary capitalism. As for « Parsifal » , the blood purity theory cannot stand, since « the blood which is referred to is the Saviour's, and whatever may happen to it, racial pollution is not among the conceivable risks » (Tanner) . Perhaps, this view is confirmed by the fact that Wagner allowed the 1st performance of his sacred drama to be conducted by Hermann Levi, the son of a rabbi.

Millington considers Wagner's anti-Semitism to be no isolated phenomenon. According to Völkish ideology, Jews were intrinsically un-German, inevitably cast as rootless outsiders : « Even among liberals and other progressives, it was part of the common currency of thought and discourse. » . Wagner's purpose was to explain the failure of the genuine integration of the Jews. He suggested that the very rootlessness of Jewish artists prevented them from articulating the emotions of the German people. Instead of presenting the depths of the soul, Jewish art dealt in surface appearances. Perhaps, Wagner's attitude may best be summed up by his comment : « If ever I were to write again about the Jews, I should say that I have nothing against them ; it is just that they descended on us Germans too soon, and we were not yet strong enough to absorb them. » .

As for « the Redemption of Ahasuerus - Destruction » , Zelinsky quotes this sentence out of context. It is not simply a question of « self-annihilation » , the voluntary nature of which excludes any thought of physical liquidation, but rather an act of a symbolic nature, intended to bring about the mystic transformation of the whole of humanity. Certainly, the Jew Joseph Rubinstein understood this to be the case when he sought admission to Wagner's household, arguing « that the Jews must perish » . Clearly, he did not mean physical death any more than Wagner, who aimed that « we » should be « united with and indistinguishable from » the Jews. In his treatise « Religion and Art » , Wagner re-examined the Jewish question, emphasising that the blood of Christ flowed not for any « one privileged race » , but for « the whole of humankind » . The natural inequality of the races had led to « a fundamentally immoral world order » as a result of the « domination and exploitation of the inferior races » . This must be compensated for by a moral equality « such as true Christianity must encourage » . Wagner regarded this essay as his final contribution to the Jewish question, as is clear from his letter to Angelo Neumann : « I have absolutely nothing in common with the modern anti-Semitic movement - an essay of mine will clarify this, to the extent that it should henceforth be impossible for anyone of intelligence to associate me with the movement. » .

Wagner's writings on the nation and the German spirit reveal no blueprint for later German history. In « On State and Religion » (1873) , he maintained that patriotism might serve as no more than a useful illusory means of bringing people together. To the enlightened ruler, the interests of mankind in general should transcend the role of power. In « What is German » (1865) , he warned of the yearning after German glory, in which Germans could dream of nothing but a resurrection of the Romish Kaiser-Reich. To Wagner, there was a universality in man that transcended race, religion and nationality. To encourage this to emerge required a people to act as role model - a unified Germany ruled by enlightened leadership. When other nation states emulated the « German spirit » , nationalism itself would wither away leaving only universal man. In his essay « Beethoven » (1871) , Wagner considered the most impressive aspect of the former's genius to be his ability to transcend ethnicity.

It is clear that Wagner was inconsistent in his views. He was « a supreme egoist in a Century of artistic egoists » , and his attitudes were almost invariably reactions to the situation in which he found himself as an artist. He became a revolutionary in 1848 because he hoped that in a new Germany a German artist would be heard. His often expressed disdain for Prussia melted completely after the Franco-Prussian War, for he felt that, in the new « Reich » , he would have his opportunity to regenerate society. Yet, his enthusiasm waned rapidly when Bismarck refused to subsidise his Bayreuth theatre, and it ended totally in 1876 when the Emperor abandoned the 1st Bayreuth Festival to attend military manœuvres ! Henceforth, Wagner would largely denounce the militarism of the German Empire. In tandem with his anti-Semitism, Wagner had an unusually large number of close Jewish friends, describing his early friendship with Samuel Lehrs as « the most beautiful friendship of my life » . He looked upon Karl Tausig as a son, appointing him to manage the entire plan for his proposed Bayreuth Festival. Joseph Rubinstein became 2nd in command at Bayreuth and claimed that, in 11 years, he had never experienced any hostility relative to his religion. Angelo Neumann was placed in complete charge of the production of all Richard Wagner's musical works outside Germany, and Hermann Levi was to conduct the world-premiere of Wagner's testamentary « Parsifal » . Interestingly, in moments of extreme artistic frustration, Wagner, the supposed staunch German nationalist, often considered moving to the United States : « If I am not successful, I shall go to America and never dream of returning to Germany. » .

Clearly, the link between Richard Wagner and Adolf Hitler is, by no means, as direct as that seen by Gutman and Zelinsky. To Windell, Wagner's anti-Semitism may be regarded as « offensive and unworthy of a great man, without seeing it as closely related to the unspeakable use of Hitler » . Magee too considers the charge against Wagner to be « mere guilt by association, Wagner's works have nothing whatever to do with Aryans, jackboots, or the gassing of Jews, and to suppose that they have is to accept the perversion of them propagated by the Nazis » . Yet, if this relationship is more tenuous than generally supposed, the question must be asked why the presumption of a direct intellectual relationship has continued to recur.

Newman was partly right when he claimed that it was not Wagner himself but his Bayreuth successors who turned Wagnerism into a cult. Wagner had established the Bayreuth Festival to provide a semi-religious environment where his works could be produced with the requisite seriousness. Yet, his 1st choice for his Festival had not been Germany but the antithesis of the nationalistic state : Switzerland. After his death, it was administered by Cosima, who converted Bayreuth into an international symbol of the cultural predominance of Germany. To her, every utterance of the Master was akin to revelation. She set the tone and interpreted the meaning of Wagner to Germany. Thus Hitler himself admitted :

« It was Cosima Wagner's merit to have created the link between Bayreuth and National-Socialism. » .

It was « The Bayreuth Circle » which raised Wagner's message to the status of gospel, manoeuvring his ideas into a Germanic-Christian doctrine of salvation. Nietzsche 1st diagnosed this :

« The Germans have constructed a Wagner for themselves whom they can revere. »

After Wagner's death, « The Bayreuth Circle » became increasingly sectarian. Thus Behr praised Bayreuth as « the place to learn, again and again, to have confidence in Germanness, in German idealism and in German selflessness » . The most significant Bayreuth ideologue was Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Wagner's son-in-law. Chamberlain called for the birth of a German Christian religion : the redemption of Aryan Christianity would be achieved only through the elimination of the Jew. To him, 2 « pure » races stood facing each other - the Jews and the Germans : « Where the struggle is not waged with cannon balls, it goes on silently in the heart of society but this struggle is above all others for life and death. » . Thus, Chamberlain transformed Bayreuth's passive nationalism and racism into an aggressive crusading force. Under his influence, the Bayreuther Blätter and the official Bayreuth Festival Guide became oracles of militantly nationalistic and viciously anti-Semitic views. Perhaps, above all, the real contribution of « The Bayreuth Circle » to future Fascism lay not in nationalist ideology nor in racist ideas, both of which could be found elsewhere : it lay in the resoluteness with which the opposition between Germandom and Jewry was raised to the central theme of world history, and in its exclusiveness, its « Knights of the Holy Grail » mentality, its total and submissive devotion to the Master. Here, were rehearsed socio-psychological mechanisms which became politically exploitable in the 20th Century.

It was not just that « The Bayreuth Circle » provided Adolf Hitler with the intellectual basis for his « Weltanschauung » . The Wagner family itself gave him the psychological support to counter « his insecurity, the painful sense of being an outsider in bourgeois society, which remained with him for a long time » . Winifred Wagner joined the NSDAP in 1926, giving Hitler the Wahnfried's total endorsement : « For years, we have been following with the deepest personal sympathy and approval the constructive work of Adolf Hitler who sacrifices his life for this ideal of a purified, united national Germany. » . This association lent Hitler an aura of high culture and prestige seldom enjoyed by German politicians, in a country proud of its musical heritage. It was by mixing with the cultural elite that Hitler acquired a sufficient veneer of refinement to make him appear a plausible candidate for high political office, despite his humble origins and minimal formal education. Corroboration of the importance of Winifred's role is contained in the judgement of 2nd July 1947 which convicted her for having « supported and promoted the NSDAP significantly through her friendship with Hitler » . It was, however, Houston Stewart Chamberlain who was to give Hitler the political legitimacy he sought, lauding him « not as the precursor for someone greater, but as the saviour himself, the key figure of the German counter-revolution » . As Fest comments : « To the demagogue, those words came as an answer to his doubts, as a benediction from the Bayreuth Master himself. » .

If « The Bayreuth Circle » , rather than Wagner himself, was the predominant influence upon Hitler, to what extent was the ostensible Wagner - Hitler link caused by Hitler's own appropriation of Wagner ? It is clear that the Nazi regime sought from its 1st days to link Wagner with itself. On Wagner's birthday in 1933, the Mayor of Bayreuth compared Wagner's struggle against « all the world on behalf of German culture and the German spirit » with the battle in which the Nazis were engaged. In that same year, the Liepziger Neueste Nachrichten commented : « Bayreuth is the symbol of the 3rd « Reich » . National-Socialism sees in the works of Richard Wagner something related to it in the essence and in the spirit. » . It is hardly surprising that a new revolutionary regime, seeking to capitalise on intense racial feeling, would claim for itself elements in the nation's cultural tradition which had already attained national and international prestige. Moreover, such views evidently represented Hitler's firm conviction too. Rauschnig reported a conversation with the Führer, in 1934, showing Hitler's firm belief that he truly comprehended the real meaning of Wagner's ideas. « Everything written by that great man that he had read was in agreement with his own innermost, sub-conscious, dormant conviction. » Thus, Hitler found in the composer's writings precisely what his inner convictions made him want to find. Kubizek, Hitler's childhood friend, stated that he sought in his reading « merely confirmation for principles and ideas which he already had » . All this is borne out by Hitler's remarks to Rauschnig on « Parsifal » : « It is not the Christian religion of compassion that is acclaimed, but pure, noble blood, in the protection and glorification of whose purity the brotherhood of the initiated have come together. » . Thus Hitler saw in « Parsifal » the religious vision of the SS plan for the new aristocracy of blood and soil. Wagner's Untergang or metaphorical Destruction was to be transformed into Hitler's Endlösung or Final Solution.

Adolf Hitler's appropriation of Richard Wagner continued into his years of political dictatorship. He claimed that his Emergency Decree of 4th February 1933, banning political meetings and newspapers, was necessary because Wagner had received negative press reviews of his music-dramas, and the Führer wished « to preserve the present day press from similar errors » . The very title Führer was appropriated from a passage at the end of « Lohengrin » : « Zum Führer sei er euch ernannt ! » - « Accept him as your leader ! » Surely, Hitler also identified with Siegfried as the avatar of racial purity. Most importantly, Hitler appropriated from Wagner a vision of the role of the artist in society. He always regarded himself as an artist who had condescended to become involved in politics. The real core of Hitler's political drive lay not in politics but in the religiosity he appropriated from Wagner. Hitler assumed from Wagner the absolute right of the artist to intervene on every subject he wished. He did not view politics as collective action to achieve limited objectives but rather believed in the dictatorship of genius, in the artist intervening like a philosopher-king to impose his will upon the people, leading them to a heroic goal.

It is not difficult to see that, with the apotheosis of Wagner and the glorification of Bayreuth, took root a perceived symbiotic relationship : Wagner - Bayreuth - Hitler - National-Socialism - 3rd « Reich » . Yet, the blame must be more accurately laid at the door of « The Bayreuth Circle » , the Wagner family and of Hitler himself. Wagner's output was used by « The Bayreuth Circle » to pursue its own agenda, and Wagnerism became a more consistent and powerful ideology than Wagner himself could ever have foreseen. The blame that may be attached to Wagner is that his works lent themselves too well to appropriation. It was rather Wagnerism that Hitler appropriated, but it was to Wagner that the « Führer » gave the credit. Nothing was more symbolic of this appropriation than the manner of the « Führer » 's defeat. Just as Siegfried and his lover Brunnhilde were consumed in a funeral pyre, Adolf Hitler and Eva Braun were immolated together in the Gotterdammerung that was Berlin. As always, Hitler followed the Wagnerian myth, for Wagner himself had died quietly in his bed in Venice, surrounded by his loving family.

The arrest in Vienna of discredited British historian David Irving for lying about the Holocaust got us to thinking : Is good news finally breaking out somewhere ? Austrian authorities are holding him without bail, pending trial, for breaking a 1947 law that criminalizes Holocaust denial. His lawyer now says he's changed his views - that gas chambers were, in fact, used in Auschwitz, contrary to a 1989 speech he gave in Austria 16 years ago, and that the Holocaust did indeed happen.

This also got us to thinking about our recent item on the hidebound circle jerks of the Vienna Philharmonic, whose long-buried historical relationship with the Holocaust still has contemporary echoes. For instance, at Anton Bruckner Private University (formerly, the « Bruckner-Konservatorium ») in Linz (Hitler's home-town) , not far from Vienna, the big concert-hall is named for Wilhelm Jerger, who was director of the Conservatory until 1973.

Jerger, right (a contrabassist in the Vienna Philharmonic, and a Lieutenant in the « Schutzstaffel » - SS) became the chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic in 1938, when a program was set in motion to « Aryanize » Austrian culture after Austria was made part of Germany through the « Anschluß » . Musicologist William Osborne tells us :

During Jerger's leadership, 6 Jewish members of the Vienna Philharmonic died in the concentration camps. 11 were able to save their lives by timely migration. 9 additional members were found to be of « mixed race » or « contaminated by kinship » (« Versippte ») and reduced to secondary status within the orchestra. 26 « non-Aryans » were thus either murdered, exiled or reduced in status while SS Lieutenant Jerger led the Orchestra.

For documentation, see : « Doktor Clemens Hellsberg, Demokratie der Koenige : Die Geschichte der Wiener Philharmoniker » (Zürich : Schweizer Verlagshaus : Wien : Kremayr & Scheriau ; Mainz : Musikverlag Schott, 1992) page 505. Hellsberg, who has a Ph.D. in musicology, is the current chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic. His book contains numerous discussions of Jerger's activities.

In 1942, Wilhelm Jerger wrote a book celebrating the Vienna Philharmonic's centennial : « Erbe und Sendung » . (Wien : Wiener Verlag Ernst Sopper & Karl Bauer, 1942.) Jerger's book illustrates his devotion to Nazi ideologies. He includes the genealogies of several prominent father-to-son generations that formed a historical continuum within the ranks of the Philharmonic. Jerger places an asterisk by the name of every « non-Aryan » listed in the tables. Jerger explains that the Aryan stock of these Philharmonic families was so « tough » that the purity of their « blood » was never notably damaged by what racists refer to as « dysgenic influences » :

« And here it is demonstrated, that in spite of manifold influences of blood from elsewhere, this Mind [Geist] continues to implant itself with great toughness through the ancestral lineage, and that it is often very sharply imprinted. It is understandable, that such an inheritance must beget outstanding musicians, who in their stylistic education and in their experience of orchestral playing are already extraordinarily schooled. This is Mind from Old Mind, which helps tradition and inheritance, a dominant trait [überkommene Anlage] to a special development and fulfillment. » (Page 87, translated from the German.)

Schooling is acknowledged as important, but only in the context of a special « blood » inheritance that transmits « Mind ». This follows National-Socialism's ideology of « Ahnenerbe », which asserts that cultural traits are genetically inherited. Jerger also presents a racist portrayal of Gustav Mahler, who became the General Music Director of the Vienna Philharmonic in 1898, replacing Hans Richter, who had led the Orchestra for the previous 23 years. (The Vienna Philharmonic refers to the Richter years as its « golden age ».) Mahler's tenure was troubled in part by a continual pattern of anti-Semitic harassment and he left the Orchestra after 3 years. Using his own words and quoting those of Max Kalbeck (a famous critic at the time) Jerger draws a comparison of Richter and Mahler that reveals the anti-Semitic attitudes Mahler confronted :

« A completely different type of personality entered with Mahler, ' as there ' (to speak with Max Kalbeck's vivid words) instead of the tall blond bearded Hun, who placed himself wide and calm before the Orchestra like an unshakable, solidly walled tower, there was a gifted shape [begabte Gestalt] balancing over the podium, thin, nervous, and with extraordinarily gangly limbs. In fact, a greater contrast was really not possible. There the patriarchal Hans Richter in his stolidity and goodness, and his extremely hearty and collegial solidarity with the orchestra, and here Gustav Mahler, oriented to the new objectivity [neue Sachlichkeit] (nervous, hasty, scatty, intellectualish) the music a pure matter of his overbred intellect. » (Page 57, translated from the German.)

Racist views are apparent in the language : " intellectualish ", " overbred ", " new objectivity " - a new æsthetic associated with Jews - , " gangly limbs ", " scatty " vs. " blond ", " stolid ", and so on. They reflect anti-Semitism and National-Socialist æsthetics. The transparent sub-text is one of chauvinistic masculinity and genetic superiority. The book illustrates that Jerger was not an innocent bystander caught-up in historical events. He was an active and avid cultural leader of the Nazi movement.

« Linz is by no means the only Musikhochschule with this problem. » , Osborne adds. « In Munich, Germany, the Musik Hochschule is housed in Hitler's personal office building. It was called the Fuehrerbau, and was designed by Paul Ludwig Troost, the same architect who designed Munich's Haus der Kunst. »

Osborne continues :

« The Fuehrerbau is considered to be one of the most perfect stylizations of Nazi architecture still in existence. A lot of people get the creeps just walking into the place. There are stories still in circulation that people were tortured in the basement where the student cafeteria now is. Across the street is a sister building that looks identical and was a Nazi administration building. Much of Munich was destroyed by Allied bombing, but, ironically, these 2 buildings survived almost unscratched.

Even though the Anton Bruckner Private University has only been known under this name for a short time, musical education in Linz has a tradition stretching back more than 200 years. As early as 1799, the city musical director

Franz Xaver Glöggel, a close friend of Michael Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, founded the 1st music school in Linz. Then, in 1823, the newly-founded Linz Musical Society set-up a singing school : the real precursor of the Anton Bruckner Private University.

The attempt to persuade Anton Bruckner to become director of the Music School in 1863 was unsuccessful. But another important name (the Bruckner biographer and former secretary to Franz Liszt, August Göllerich) was in charge of the newly-strengthened Institute from 1896 to 1923. And, in 1923, the name of Bruckner was finally established with the upgrading of the Music School to the Bruckner Conservatory Linz ; now re-named the Anton Bruckner Private University.

The original main function of the forerunner Institute, which was to raise the quality of musical life in Linz by improving the training of amateur musicians, was taken over by the Linz Music School in 1950. From that time on, the Bruckner Conservatory established itself progressively as a training ground for professional musicians. This development was carried through by the directors Carl Steiner (1945-1958) , Wilhelm Jerger (1958-1973) , Gerhard Dallinger (1973-1990) , Hans Maria Kneihls (1990-1995) and Reinhart von Gutzeit (from 1995-2006) , University Professor Anton Voigt (acting Rector from 2006-2007) , and Doctor Marianne Betz (2007-2012) . In autumn 2012, the Rectorship of the University was taken over by Ursula Brandstätter. From the 1990's on, the Bruckner Conservatory developed from a higher music school into one of the most active cultural centres in Linz. The educational spectrum of the former Bruckner Conservatory was likewise continuously expanded and became the educational basis when private university status was attained in 2004. The Anton Bruckner Private University now offers 22 separate branches of study and 3 university courses in the fields of Classical music, jazz, drama and contemporary dance. Students may study for the degrees Bachelor of Arts or Master of Arts, which are on a par with those of other European universities and Arts Academies.

Effects of the Music of Richard Wagner on the Pseudo-Mysticism of Adolf Hitler and the 3rd « Reich »

There are those (obviously misguided) individuals in today's world who claim that music is an irrelevant occupation for anyone capable of doing anything else, and that it doesn't really have any connection with reality. Apart from the fact that most of these individuals are probably tone-deaf and / or had their hearts broken by musicians, it may indeed be rather difficult to quickly think of an historical example where music has played an important or pivotal role in a major occurrence. There is the link between Adolf Hitler, Heinrich Himmler, the SS, and the Nazi Party ; and the music of Richard Wagner.

The police state of Nazi Germany has been well-publicized over the years, but the debt that state owed to prehistoric gods and myths has been somewhat overlooked. Wagner's music is intensely Romantic, violent, heroic, and of mythic proportions ; exactly, the qualities projected by the Nazi Party. Wagner's Operas may have had an almost religious effect upon Hitler ; Wagner's skill for drama and dramatic music no doubt underscored the impact of the legends already known to Hitler from youth. Hitler and many of his associates shared a fascination with the history and mythology of the German « Volk » , and the following discussion will focus on examples of « mythical influences » , and how they helped shape the personal and political activities of these men.

Richard Wagner's (1813-1883) most famous works are undoubtedly his music-dramas. « Der Ring des Nibelungen » and « Tristan und Isolde » are 2 works that are widely acknowledged as being of great musical significance. The development and use of the leitmotif, the parts written for the « heldentenor », the manipulation and « warping » of the tonal system, and the development of the music-drama itself are all very important aspects of Wagner and his music, and of these 2 works. (Sadie, page 352.)

The ancient sagas that Wagner used as a basis for these music-dramas held for him revealed truths and insights into human behavior and emotions. He has not been alone in his interest and opinions. These myths have been used as an argument for, or illustration of, various beliefs and ideologies. The « Ring » has been variously interpreted as a look into the human psyche ; a means of promoting socialism ; a prophecy of the fate of the world and human kind ; and a « parable » about the industrial society that was coming of age in Wagner's lifetime. It was also used by the Nazi Party to justify and glorify racism, and to supply a basis of fanatic loyalty in the « Schutzstaffel », or SS. (Sadie, page 353 ; Albert Speer, page 141.)

The legends of German mythology are essentially the same as the old Norse legends ; many of the proper names are the same in both cultures, and most of the remaining names are very similar to the Norse versions, differing only in spelling. Thus, the Norse Odin, the ruler of the gods, becomes Woden (or Wotan) , further south in the Germanic regions. In the same fashion, the Norse heroes known as Sigurd, Brynhild and Gudrun become Siegfried, Brünnhilde and Günther in the German stories. The extremely close parallels between the 2 cultures makes it an absolute certainty that both the Germanic stories and the earlier Norse legends were derived from the same ancient tales. (Hamilton, pages 303-304 ; Sadie, page 352.)

These early legends are known to the modern world from 2 collections : the Elder Edda, which is written in verse, and the Younger Edda (consisting of the sagas) , which is written in prose. The dating for these collections seems to be in some dispute ; in Bulfinch's « Mythology » rather specific dates are assigned : 1056 for the Elder Edda and 1640 for the Younger Edda. However, in Edith Hamilton's « Mythology » , she speaks of the oldest manuscript of the Elder as dating from circa 1300, some 300 years after the arrival of Christianity in Iceland, and almost 300 years after Bulfinch's date. Hamilton does state, however, that all of these legends are completely pagan in nature (thus predating Christianity) , and that almost all scholars agree the stories must be much older than the oldest manuscript. The dates for the Younger Edda are likewise apparently uncertain ; Bulfinch's date of 1640 is hard to reconcile with Hamilton's statement that the Younger was « written down by one Snorri Sturluson in the last part of the 12th Century » . (It should also be pointed-out that Bulfinch was writing in the 19th Century ; Hamilton, in the 20th. It is very likely Hamilton had the advantage of new data to guide her estimates.) Regardless of date, it is agreed the most important collection is the Elder Edda. (Bulfinch, pages 328-329 ; Hamilton, pages 301-303.)

These 2 very long epics furnish the material for almost all of the presently known myths and legends about the ancient gods of the North. Unfortunately, as Christian missionaries from the Mediterranean area journeyed further north, they systematically destroyed all the pagan artifacts they could find in a remarkably successful attempt to completely obliterate all remnants of the belief system they were replacing. Only a few fragments of the entire northern European prehistoric collection of myths have been preserved. The legend of Beowulf, in England, and the « Nibelungenlied » , in Germany, are 2 tales that survived the zeal of the missionaries. The Eddas are known only from Iceland ; apparently, Icelandic missionaries were less influential than their counterparts on the continent of Europe - Iceland was one of the last European countries to be Christianized. (Hamilton, pages 300-301.)

All of these surviving legends are essentially gloomy and pessimistic in nature ; depressingly so to modern readers. In Nordic and Germanic mythology the Earth (Midgard) , and Heaven (Asgard) , were destined to be utterly destroyed by the Frost Giants (who lived in Jötunheim) , in a final great battle between Good and Evil, called Ragnarok in the Norse legends. (Ragnarok is paralleled by « Götterdämmerung » in Wagner's « Ring » Cycle.) In this final battle, Evil was predestined to win, and the entirety of creation was to be destroyed. The only bright factor in this thoroughly depressing viewpoint was the belief that, in spite of all, if one could die a courageous, heroic death, then all else faded into insignificance. It is of interest to realize that the Western ideal of heroism and heroic deeds in the face of certain death springs almost entirely from these Nordic myths, and not from the Greek and Roman mythology that most people are more familiar with. (The Greek gods were remarkably un-heroic in their conduct.) This idea of heroism and fighting to the death against any odds would fit very well with the kind of fanatic loyalty sought by Adolf Hitler and Heinrich Himmler. (Bulfinch, pages 348-350 ; Hamilton, pages 300-302 ; Grout, page 746.)

(One may speculate that the hopelessness of Nordic religious beliefs made them considerably less attractive than the new, essentially optimistic, view being spread by Christian missionaries. The old beliefs probably hastened their own demise.)

When Richard Wagner embarked upon the composition of « Der Ring des Nibelungen » (around 1849) , he chose as his framework the Teutonic epic of the « Nibelungenlied » . (The Norse version of this legend is called the Volsungasaga.) Wagner finished the 1st 2 segments (« Das Rheingold » and « Die Walküre ») , and part of the 3rd (« Siegfried ») , by 1857, but 17 years would go by before he would finish the great work with the completion of « Siegfried » and the final music-drama in the cycle : « Götterdämmerung » . (Grout, pages 746-747 ; Hamilton, page 303.)

As mentioned earlier, the Teutonic versions of these myths are very similar to the Nordic versions, differing chiefly in descriptions of climate, and social condition. The Teutonic versions were generally slightly less violent than their Viking equivalents. In turn, it seems apparent that Wagner again tempered the German tales somewhat ; in « Tristan und Isolde » , after the hero Tristan is mortally wounded, he is kept alive by the power of love until he is united with his lover, Isolde. After Tristan's demise in her arms, she is overcome by waves of ecstatic love, and she dies. As discouraging as this ending may seem, Wagner saw it as the triumph of love in the face of all adversity ; not even death could truly defeat it. Of course, the story steps outside of the bounds of reality somewhere along the way, but this only adds to the transcendent quality of the story and of the music-drama itself. (Kerman, pages 288-289 ; Bulfinch, pages 351-352.)

It is generally thought that Wagner was anti-Semitic, and, indeed, he is described as such in a number of sources. Curiously, the only anti-Semitic act cited by any of these writers was the article he wrote for the « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » , in September of 1850, entitled « Das Judentum in der Musik » (« Judaism in Music ») . This article has apparently been interpreted in various ways ; several sources characterized it as an attack upon Jews in music in general and an attack upon Giacomo Meyerbeer, who had previously come to Richard Wagner's aid. One source said the article was aimed not only at Jews in general but specifically at Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, who had just died. The sole source that seemed to offer some evidence to the contrary was the entry in « The New Grove Dictionary » . In this article, Robert Marshall points-out several people who did not consider Wagner's article anything more than a bitter attack upon Meyerbeer, and spoke against its being interpreted in such a broad manner as to include all Jews. A Jewish writer stated the opinion that Wagner's statements « had come from the purest of motives » . (Marshall, page 111 ; Sadie, page 348 ; Kerman, page 284.)

If there remains some question as to the depth of Richard Wagner's anti-Semitism, there seems to be no mistake about his great pride in his German ancestry. Wagner himself wrote that he had « come into the world a particularly German type » , and that he considered himself « the most German of the Germans » . In a letter written to Crown Prince Albert of Saxony, he writes :

« No musician was ever so closely restricted to his lingual fatherland as I am, since I could create my music only to my texts and since both text and music in an unprecedented sense are based only on the German language and the German spirit. » (Strobel, page 2,397.)

These statements, taken together with the knowledge that Wagner went to some lengths to separate German music from French and Italian influences, can only reinforce the picture of Wagner as a proud member of the « German race » . (Strobel, page 2,401.)

Adolf Hitler's attraction to Richard Wagner's music began at an early age. In 1905, at the age of 16, Hitler quit school and spent the next 3 years being idle, which he later described as the happiest time of his life. 2 of his favourite pastimes were aimlessly roaming the streets of Linz, and attending the Opera at night. He had a passion for music ; most especially the mystic Operas of Wagner, which he would attend night after night. His meager supply of pocket money was spent mainly on the Opera (a standing-room ticket cost only the equivalent of 10 cents) , and on purchasing books on German history and mythology, which he would read for hours at a time. (Shirer, Pages 9-12.)

His fascination with Wagner's Operas seems to have had a profound effect upon him. His only friend from this period of his life was one August Kubizek (nicknamed « Gustl ») , who gave an interesting description :

« The charged emotionality of this music seemed to have served him as a means for self-hypnosis, while he found in its lush air of bourgeois luxury the necessary ingredients for escapist fantasy. » (Fest, page 22.)

Kubizek goes on to relate the events of a particular evening spent in Hitler's company. They had attended a performance of Wagner's « Rienzi » , and according to « Gustl » , Hitler had a quite powerful reaction to the Opera. The youthful Adolf was « overwhelmed by the resplendent, dramatic musicality » of the Opera, as well as deeply affected by the story therein ; that of « Cola di Rienzi » , a medieval rebel who was an outcast from his fellows and was « destroyed by their incomprehension » .

« After the Opera, Hitler began to orate. Words burst from him like a backed-up flood breaking through crumbling dams. In grandiose, compelling images, he sketched for me his future and that of his people. » (Fest, pages 22-23.)

30 years later, the boyhood friends would meet again in Bayreuth (probably catching an Opera) , and Hitler would remark : « It began at that hour ! » . More convincing evidence of Wagner's influences can hardly be wished for after a statement such as this one, but more there is. (Fest, pages 21-23.)

Between 1909 and 1913, a time which Hitler described as « the saddest period of my life » , he resided in Vienna. It was here, by his own statement in « Mein Kampf » , that he became a confirmed anti-Semite. The anti-Semitic opinions Richard Wagner had held were no secret, and the concurrence of opinion between these 2 men could only have served to pull Hitler closer to a greater regard for Wagner. Indeed, Hitler claims to have heard « Tristan und Isolde » , 30 to 40 times during his years in Vienna. (Shirer, pages 15-20 ; Fest, page 30.)

During these years in Vienna, at the « Hofoper » Opera House alone, at least 426 evenings featured performances of works by Richard Wagner. (Fest, page 769.)

The next example is not really surprising when one remembers Hitler's high-opinion of himself as an artist, but it was rather well, surprising, to discover the fact that Hitler, knowing absolutely nothing about composition, decided to write an Opera based on an idea considered but later dropped by Wagner. This was to have been a story concerning « Wieland the Smith, full of bloody and incestuous nonsense » . Drawing themes from Germanic sagas, he also attempted to write dramatic literary works. Apparently, none of these projects were ever completed. (Fest, page 31.)

Another insight into Hitler's fixation on Wagnerian Opera was the odd fact that even though at this very time Arnold Schönberg, Alban Berg, and Anton von Webern were, to quote Kubizek again, causing the « greatest uproar in Vienna's concert halls in the memory of man » , Hitler remained completely ignorant of any aspect of the controversy ; he also completely ignored the work of Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß, preferring instead a steady diet of Wagner and Bruckner. Later, when Hitler was essentially homeless and had lost contact with Kubizek, he met another vagabond, named Reinholt Hanisch, who would become Hitler's new only friend. Hanisch says by this time « only grandiose themes » interested Hitler ; « gods and heroes » , and « gigantic aspirations » . Hanisch adds : « In music, Richard Wagner brings him to bright flames. » . By the time, he left Vienna, on May 24, 1913, Hitler is described as leaving no friends behind, preferring the « company » of Karl Lueger, Ritter von Schönerer, and Richard Wagner. (Fest, pages 33, 47, 58.)

After entering politics, Hitler used a vaguely coherent mish-mash of ideas to further his own. During his speeches, he would call upon statements or ideas from Lenin, Gobineau, Nietzsche, Le Bon, Ludendorff, Lord Northcliff, Schopenhauer, Lueger, and, of course, Richard Wagner. (He would also use the so-called « Secret Protocols » supposedly written by the « Wise Men of Zion » , which had already been conclusively proven to be fakes.) He was also known to « rhapsodize at length » about Wagner and his music. (Fest, pages 125, 133.)

In 1923, just before the abortive « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » , Hitler presented himself at Wahnfried, the home of the Wagner family. He is said to have sought out the Master's study, and, deeply moved, stood before Wagner's grave in the garden for a long time. Afterwards, he was introduced to Houston Stewart Chamberlain (Wagner's son-in-law) , who was of advanced age and could not speak. He later wrote a letter to Hitler voicing his support for Hitler's goals and ideas. Hitler valued this letter greatly, almost as if it were « a benediction from the Bayreuth Master himself » . (Fest, pages 180-181.)

Hitler continued in his contacts with the family of Wagner. His idea of the supreme expression of Opera was the final scene in « Götterdämmerung » and, when in Bayreuth, whenever he witnessed this Finale, he would turn around in his darkened box, seek-out the hand of « Frau » Winifred Wagner, and « breathe a deeply moved “ Handkuss ” upon it » . By this time, he had seen all of Wagner's Operas countless times, and boasted of having listened to « Tristan und Isolde » and « Die Meistersinger » over a 100 times each. He often commented on problems of staging, and of the dramatic content, but even though he considered himself a music-lover, he never had anything to say about the musical considerations of these works. (Fest, page 520.)

Other indications of Wagner's influences are furnished by Albert Speer, who began as Hitler's chief architect and ended as « Reich » Armaments Minister. He speaks of the interior furnishings of Hitler's country house, the Berghof at Obersalzberg. The salon was furnished, along with normal items of furniture, with a « sideboard over 10 feet high and 18 feet long » which was used to store phonograph records. Against another wall was « a massive chest containing built-in speakers, and adorned by a large bronze bust of Richard Wagner by Arno Breker » . (Speer, pages 128, 135.)

The admiration Hitler had for Wagner was reciprocated by the Wagner family ; when furnishing this dwelling, the Wagners donated linens and china, and sent Hitler a complete set Richard Wagner's works, along with a page from the original score of « Lohengrin » . (Fest, page 251.)

There is, yet, another facet of Hitler's dwelling at Obersalzberg that shows his sense of unity with Germany's « heroic » past : the view. Obersalzberg, as one might imply from the name, is a mountain ; high enough to give a good view of the surrounding area. The Berghof, which was designed by Hitler himself (architect Speer rated Hitler's design as deserving of a « D » if it had been a project submitted by a student) , featured a large picture window which offered a view of the Untersberg, Berchtesgaden, and Mozart's home-town, Salzburg. Legend has it that the Emperor Charlemagne still sleeps in the Untersberg, but will someday awaken and restore the German Empire to its past glories. Hitler didn't hesitate to apply this prophecy to himself :

« You see the Untersberg over there. It is no accident that I have my residence opposite it. » . (Albert Speer, pages 128-131.)

On January 30, 1933, Hitler became Chancellor of Germany. On February 4, he caused a decree to be issued which gave the government the right to ban political meetings and to shut down the newspapers of his political rivals. A few days later, he was to justify this action by citing newspaper criticisms of Wagner. His stated aim was to « preserve the present-day press from similar errors » . (Fest, page 391.)

On the eve of World War II, Hitler's forces reoccupied the Rhineland. Returning from a triumphal trip through this area, and jubilant over the Allies' weakness in letting him get away with the re-occupation, he requested that some Wagner be put on the phonograph. Listening to the Overture to « Parsifal » , he remarked :

« I have built-up my religion out of “ Parsifal ” . Divine worship in solemn form without pretenses of humility. One can serve God only in the garb of the hero. » (Fest, page 499.)

The record continued to play. The next selection was the funeral march from « Götterdämmerung » , and brought forth the following comments from Hitler :

« I Ist heard it in Vienna, at the Opera. And I still remember as if it were today how madly excited I became on the way home over a few yammering “ Yids ” (very derogatory term for Jews) I had to pass. I cannot think of a more incomparable contrast. This glorious mystery of the dying hero and this Jewish crap ! » (Fest, page 499.)

Hitler's associates were aware of his interest in Wagner. There were several ploys routinely used by his « toadies » (a synonymous modern word might be « lobbyists ») , in an effort to direct the « Führer » 's attention to them. Hitler would always find the time to speak with someone who brought photographs of the latest stage of a building project, the plans for a new building, or photographs of the sets of a newly staged work, preferably a Wagner Opera. The bearer of such gifts was almost certain to achieve a private meeting with Hitler. (Albert Speer, page 181.)

Hitler's original affiliation with the early incarnation of the Nazi Party was not without trial ; the Party had been denounced by Hermann Esser as « an association of visionaries, worshipers of Wotan » , which was perhaps closer to the truth than Esser imagined. Even Gœbbels, who would become Hitler's Propaganda minister, called for Hitler's expulsion from the Party. (Höhne, page 59.)

Later, however (from 1921) , Hitler was in control of the « Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiter Partei » (National-Socialist German Workers Party) . He had already made the acquaintance of several men who were to become key figures in the Nazi regime ; among them were Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß, Alfred Rosenberg (another admirer of Wagner) , and Gregor Straßer. Straßer, a druggist who was to become the number 2 man in the Party, had as his secretary a bespectacled former chicken farmer named Heinrich Himmler. (Shirer, pages 29-30.)

Himmler was a small man, balding, and has been described as looking more like a college professor (!) than anything else. Contrary to his appearance, he was to become the most sinister and feared man in Germany. Uncomfortable in the company of men he considered superior to him, he was nonetheless an extremely organized and crafty individual, qualities that were to serve him well in his pursuit of power. Himmler had formally joined the SS (originally formed as a personal bodyguard for Hitler) , in 1925, as member No. 168. He came to regard Hitler as a god, and spent all of his spare time reading Hitler's speeches and works by Rosenberg and Walter Darré. These authors, in turn, led him to study books on Germanic lore (returning to an earlier, childhood, interest) , mysticism, and secret societies, which served to set the stage for his later beliefs and actions. (Herzstein, pages 82-83 ; Padfield, page 38.)

Himmler would eventually control all police functions for the Nazi Party and the state when, in 1943, he reached the zenith of his power with his appointment to the office of Minister of the Interior on August 25, 1943. Himmler was already in charge of the SS, which in August of 1942 had been granted sweeping judiciary rights by the newly appointed « Reich » Minister of Justice, Doctor Otto Thierack. (Herzstein, page 95.)

Both Hitler and, to use his description, his « ever-loyal » Himmler were affected deeply by the old sagas brought to dramatic life by Wagner. The torch-lit secret initiation ceremonies of the SS which took place every year all over Germany were held at midnight on April 20th, the « Führer » 's birthday. These gatherings were dominated by subtle and « not so subtle » references to the ancient Germanic myths, and incorporated a great deal of Wagnerian type dramatic stagecraft. This was due much more to Himmler's influences than Hitler's ; by this time, the SS was almost a state within a state. It was subordinate only at the very top of the organization - Himmler answered only to Hitler. (Herzstein, pages 82-83.)

There were several attractive reasons for a young man to want to join the SS (assuming, of course, he had the proper political views, and was « genetically pure ») ; economic, social. One of the most appealing reasons, for some, was the elite mystique that Himmler had worked so hard to implement. He used proclamations of the sacred status of the German lands and peoples as a creed. He borrowed from both ancient German and ancient Nordic mythology to supply the SS with its symbols, oaths, and rituals. The rooms where their secret meetings were held were decorated with runes, prehistoric markings which were said to give the power of prophecy to anyone who knew how to read them. The symbol of the « Schutzstaffel » itself (twin twisted lightning bolts resembling SS) is a runic symbol. (Herzstein, pages 84-89.)

On July 2nd, 1936, Himmler showed, once again, an effort to connect himself and the « Reich » to the glorious past of the German people. He attended an observance of the 1,000th year anniversary of the death of the Saxon king, Heinrich I, who was remembered historically as the « Conqueror of the Slavs » and was referred to by Himmler as his favourite hero. Himmler also harbored similar ideas of conquest, and fancied himself as the reincarnation of this earlier Heinrich. He showed his reverence to his previous self by laying a wreath on the tomb, an act which was conveniently captured by photographers and widely circulated throughout Germany. He was also photographed visiting an archeological site in Bavaria where he could inspect the ancient runic inscriptions which had been uncovered there. (Höhne, page 44 ; Herzstein, page 88-89.)

Early on, Himmler wished for German women to adopt the same moral code as displayed by the heroines of the ancient German sagas, regarding any extra-marital relations as offensive to his personal code. (Höhne, page 32.)

Apparently, his personal code underwent some revision, for it wasn't long before Himmler and the « Reich » began to encourage German women to have as many children as possible, whether or not they were married. (He and Hitler had both considered abolishing the criminal institution of the Christian Church known as marriage, but both came to the conclusion that many Germans were not yet ready to accept such a radical idea.) In order to substitute some sort of ceremony for those children born-out of wedlock, Himmler instituted a « secular christening » ceremony, called an « SS name giving ». The child was wrapped in a woolen blanket which was covered with embroidered swastikas and runes and set before an altar. The parents then laid their hands upon their child and spoke his or her name in a solemn manner. These « Lebensborn » children were remembered on their birthdays by the SS, each receiving a gift consisting of the appropriate number of candles for the child's birthday. The candles were manufactured at no charge to the SS by the prisoners at Dachau. (Herzstein, page 104.)

Himmler's mystical zeal seems to have exasperated even Hitler at times, although the « Führer » never tried to put a stop to it. Hitler himself wrote :

« What nonsense ! Here, we have at last reached an age that has left all mysticism behind it and, now, he wants to start that all over again. We might as well have stayed with the church. At least, it had tradition. To think that I may some day be turned into an SS saint ! Can you imagine it ? I would turn-over in my grave. » (Albert Speer, page 141.)

And also, concerning Himmler's archeological excavations :

« Why do we call the whole world's attention to the fact that we have no past ? It isn't enough that the Romans were erecting great buildings when our forefathers were still living in mud huts ; now, Himmler is starting to dig-up these villages of mud huts. All we prove by that is that we were still throwing stone hatchets and crouching around open fires when Greece and Rome had already reached the highest stage of culture. We really should do our best to keep quiet about this past. Instead, Himmler is making a great fuss about it all. The present day Romans must be having a laugh at these revelations. » (Albert Speer, page 141.)

Hitler's friend, Hermann Göring, also preferred a glorious myth to reality. During the winter of 1942, when some of the heaviest fighting of the War was taking place at Stalingrad, the « Reich » Marshall and his subordinates were celebrating the re-opening of the destroyed Berlin State Opera House by attending « a festive performance of Richard Wagner's " Die Meistersinger " ». This was immediately after Göring had given Hitler his personal assurances that the (foolishly) promised air supply of Stalingrad would be supervised by Göring himself. Stalingrad eventually fell to the Russian offensive, chiefly because of lack of re-inforcements and re-supply, and is regarded as one of the major turning points of the War. (Albert Speer, pages 329-331.)

Wagner's spell was, by no means, confined to the individuals involved in the Nazi drama. The pomp and spectacle of the huge Party rallies have been compared to the ritual of the Catholic Church, but equally valid (if not more so) , would be a comparison to the musical dramas of Richard Wagner. The dramatic, almost Operatic excesses of the rallies is partly due to these influences. These grand Festivals of Nazism displayed a fine understanding of the same dramatic principals used in Opera, and a knowledge of the « psychology of the common man » . (Fest, page 512.)

When the end came for Hitler, he staged his own « Götterdämmerung » , in his Berlin bunker. He refused to surrender, preferring the taking of his own life over an unheroic end. By his absolute refusal to even consider capitulation, he ensured vast, horrible destruction of lives and property long after these losses could have had any possible affect upon the outcome of the War. Hitler lived-out his fantasy to the end to the fullest ; precipitating the realization of his favourite Operatic scene, the final destruction of the gods and « Walhalla » . (Whiting, pages 184-185.)

The Germanic myths and the dramatic presentation of these myths by Richard Wagner were, very obviously, a central tool of the Nazi Party. The psychological effects of these music-dramas and stories on the principal figures of the 3rd « Reich » are equally obvious, when they are looked for. In Joachim Fest's biography of Hitler, there are no fewer than 34 references to Richard Wagner or his music. (To give this figure some perspective, Rudolf Heß, Hitler's « 2nd in command » until his flight to England, is mentioned only 30 times.) Indeed, a case could be made, following the judicial trend popular in America today, that the only reason Hitler started the Second World War, tried to carry-out genocide against the Jews and other « inferior races » , and devoted his misguided life to setting-up the « 1,000 Year “ Reich ” » , (thereby, causing the death of millions of people in the process) , was because he had viewed the violent, heroic music-dramas of Richard Wagner as a child ! After completing the research for this report, such a seemingly outlandish idea no longer sounds as outlandish - it could have been at least part of the reason for these heinous acts. (Will the wife of our vice-President now try to have warning labels applied to Wagner's Operas ?) The author will now bow to an irresistible urge to make the following comment : What some judges and juries in the United States need to realize is that reaching a determination of the causes of a criminal act does not necessarily excuse that act. Hitler was still guilty, no matter what influences guided him down the road to a destruction of such mythic proportions.

Finally, one cannot help but wonder what Richard Wagner would have thought about Adolf Hitler, one of his all-time biggest fans !

Richard Wagner, un antisémite Maître spirituel de Hitler ?

À propos du livre de Pierre-André Taguieff : « Wagner contre les Juifs » , éditions Berg International (2012) .

Définir aussi précisément que possible l'antisémitisme de Wagner, sans tomber dans l'anachronisme, ni céder à des raccourcis faciles, tel est l'objectif largement atteint de ce nouveau livre de notre éminent collègue Pierre-André Taguieff. Depuis le beau livre du grand historien israélo-hongrois Jacob Katz qui avait travaillé sur cette même question (« Wagner et la question juive » , traduit en 1986) , 2 écoles s'affrontent sur cette question, à la fois épineuse et cruciale : existe-t-il une ligne historique directe ou indirecte entre la détestation des Juifs par Wagner et l'antisémitisme exterminateur des Nazis ? En termes plus crus : Wagner a-t-il été, d'une manière ou d'une autre, une sorte de Maître à penser d'Adolf Hitler, au point de l'influencer dans son génocide largement planifié du peuple juif ? De la réponse à cette question dépend l'honorabilité ou, au contraire, la déchéance morale du grand musicien. Sans même parler du discrédit qui rejallirait alors inmanquablement sur son œuvre. Il y a, comme vient de l'écrire 2 tendances, grosso modo : l'une prétend que l'auteur de toute cette mythologie musicale germanique n'avait rien à voir avec l'hitlérisme et que sa judéophobie, largement partagée par d'innombrables secteurs de la population allemande au cours de la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle, faisait partie du « Zeitgeist » , tandis que l'autre entend établir un rapport incontestable de cause à effet entre les écrits théoriques de Wagner et l'antisémitisme racial et génocidaire des Nazis.

Pierre-André Taguieff a subtilement évité cet écueil dès son titre puisqu'il parle d'un Wagner contre les Juifs. Sans plus. Le reste, le lecteur attentif le découvrira s'il a, comme nous l'espérons, la patience de regarder les choses de près. L'antisémitisme wagnérien est incontestable mais encore faut-il en définir la nature. Wagner a incontestablement cherché à montrer, voire à prouver que la Germanité était inconciliable avec la Judéité. Et ce triste débat a connu un prolongement après la mort de Wagner, en 1912 dans la revue pan-germaniste « Kunstwart », entre Moritz Goldstein et Ernst Lissauer, le 1er se voulait partisan de l'affirmation de l'identité juive tandis que l'autre, auteur du tristement célèbre chant de haine contre l'Angleterre (« Haßgesang gegen England »), optait résolument pour une fusion, une disparition des Juifs au sein de l'ethnie allemande. Détail significatif : le rédacteur en chef de cette revue pan-germaniste, Ferdinand Avenarius, a reconnu avoir près d'une centaine de lettres de ses lecteurs. Il y a de nombreuses années, j'avais eu l'occasion de publier la traduction française de ces textes dont l'arrière-plan wagnérien n'était guère douteux.

Walter Scheel, alors Président de la RFA, avait eu l'idée (bonne ou mauvaise, à chacun de juger) de poser, à sa façon, la question des relations entre Richard Wagner et son admirateur, Adolf Hitler : « Was könnte Wagner dagegen ausrichten, daß Hitler ihn mochte ? » (Que pouvait faire Wagner contre le fait qu'Hitler l'aimait ?). Il n'est pas uniquement question ici de la musique du héros de Bayreuth, mais aussi de l'ensemble de son œuvre théorique puisque l'auteur de l'Anneau du Nibelung avait des idées politiques dont l'axe central demeurait tout de même le rejet, voire la haine du Juif.

On connaît la phrase désabusée de Hitler (« Quand je réalise qu'un Meyerbeer était le contemporain de Wagner ! ») dont le Ministre de la propagande Josef Gœbbels avait largement annexée la musique wagnérienne à la politique culturelle du « Reich ». Mais la tentation fut grande, jadis, de voir en Wagner, l'authentique interprète des mouvements les plus intimes de l'âme germanique, menacée selon lui par les Juifs, peuple étrange et étranger à la fois, venu édulcorer, par sa musique et sa littérature, la pureté et l'authenticité de la race germanique.

Beaucoup de gens importants dans la République des arts et des lettres ont succombé, au moins momentanément au charme de la musique de Wagner : le jeune Nietzsche n'y fait pas exception mais il ne tarda pas à rompre avec un milieu qui lui paraissait infesté de courtisans et de thuriféraires. Il va même jusqu'à écrire qu'il ne manque pas de malhonnêtes gens dans l'entourage du Maître, pas même les antisémites ! On ne peut pas y voir une allusion au gendre (posthume) du Maître, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, mais plutôt à sa propre épouse Cosima qui anima les « Bayreuther Blätter » après la disparition de Wagner.

Avec le soin scrupuleux de l'historien averti et du philologue exigeant, Pierre-André Taguieff revient sur un certain nombre de traductions de Wagner qu'il juge fautives : ainsi propose-t-il de traduire « Das Judentum in der Musik » non plus par « le Judaïsme dans la musique », mais par « la Juiverie dans la musique », au motif que, selon lui, ce terme « Judentum » (dans son orthographe ancienne avec un TH) aurait une connotation largement péjorative et renverrait à des idiosyncrasies cristallisant tout le négatif incarné par le Juif. C'est peut-être vrai, mais au plan géographique, pour marquer les sites d'implantation juive, la langue allemande utilise le terme (que je n'aime pas) de

Pierre-André Taguieff montre à l'envi que le trait le plus caractéristique de l'antisémitisme de Wagner et de sa chère épouse Cosima est et demeure l'ambiguïté, voire l'ambivalence. Celles-ci éclatent dans toute leur négativité lorsque le Maître et son épouse croient déceler en un Juif bien défini moins de défauts réhivitoires que ceux dont ils ont décidé d'affubler tous les autres. Le cas du chef d'orchestre juif Hermann Lévi, de surcroît fils de rabbin, est éloquent, puisqu'il fut choisi pour diriger « Parsifal » . Il y a aussi le cas d'un autre proche de Wagner, Angelo Neumann, son impresario, l'un des principaux architectes de Bayreuth (il se disait même que c'étaient eux, les Juifs, qui avaient construit le mythe de Bayreuth où ils aimaient se montrer) .

L'attitude face aux Juifs, on l'aura compris, ne laisse pas d'être largement contradictoire, le Maître oscillant entre un pseudo-désir d'être juste et de reconnaître les mérites de chacun, et cette tendance paranoïaque qui lui fait apparaître Giacomo Meyerbeer comme son ennemi mortel, complotant dans l'ombre pour lui nuire et entraver sa propre gloire ainsi que la large diffusion de sa musique. Cette rivalité d'ordre professionnel joue, selon nous, un grand rôle dans le rejet presque psychanalytique du Juif, et on pourrait même y ajouter les doutes que Wagner nourrissait quant à sa filiation. Déjà le livre de Jacob Katz avait accordé de longs développements aux relations de la mère de Wagner et d'un ami de ma famille nommé Ludwig Geyer, un acteur d'origine juive que sa mère épousera environ 1 an après le décès de son époux.

Il reste que Wagner a probablement été le compositeur qui avait le plus lu et médité les ouvrages de philosophie et d'histoire publiés de son temps. Un écrivain, diplomate de son état mais aussi auteur de théories « racialistes » exerça sur Wagner une influence relativement mineure, en raison du pessimisme qui s'exhalait de ses écrits et qui se révéla incompatible avec l'idée de régénération de Wagner. Il s'agit de Joseph Arthur de Gobineau dont la popularité en Allemagne dépassait (et de loin) ce qu'elle avait pu être en France. J'ai pu m'y arrêter longuement dans mon livre intitulé « Renan, la Bible et les Juifs » (publié chez Arléa, en 2009) : même le philosophe-historien de Tréguier sembla peu ouvert au pessimisme foncier du Comte et usa de toutes sortes de subterfuges pour ne pas recenser le 1er volume de son « Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines » . Mais ce fut tout de même Wagner qui parla à Ludwig Schemann de Gobineau dont il allait devenir le traducteur et le grand propagandiste en Allemagne.

Pierre-André Taguieff a mentionné une expression comme le « wagnéro-gobinisme » , qui me paraît fondamentale : elle exprime bien le grand retentissement prodigieux du fameux « Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines » en Allemagne. Mais j'avoue ne pas encore avoir compris pour quelles raisons précises, le rôle de corrupteur, de menace (même biologique) contre le peuple allemand, fut dévolu au Juif. On ne se rend pas immédiatement compte du caractère dévastateur de certaines formules de certains penseurs allemands contemporains, comme par exemple le grand historien nationaliste Heinrich von Treitschke ; ce dernier, empêtré dans une violente controverse avec son alter ego juif, Heinrich Grätz, avait écrit dans les « Annales Prussiennes » une phrase dont il ne soupçonnait nullement l'horrible retentissement : « Die Juden sind unser Unglück » (les Juifs sont notre malheur) .

Comme Wagner chez qui l'on trouve sans peine des formules tout aussi condamnables, l'on ne peut pas affirmer que von Treitschke savait quel usage sanguinaire les Nazis feraient de ses formules, moins de 4 décennies plus tard. Bien que ces 2 hommes, l'historien et le musicien, aient livré le creuset où s'élaborèrent tous ces ressentiments antisémites, on ne peut pas, sauf à tordre la vérité historique, leur imputer la paternité de l'extermination des juifs d'Europe. L'auteur passe au crible une analyse de Theodor Wiesengrund-Adorno qui impute à Wagner un rôle décisif dans l'extermination physique des Juifs ; Pierre-André Taguieff signale aussi, cependant, que vers la fin de sa vie, le grand universitaire de Francfort-sur-le-Main reconnaissait devant ses fidèles étudiants qu'il n'avait pas observé une distance critique suffisante pour juger objectivement de cette affaire. Il y a, c'est incontestable, cette terrible phrase terminale qui conclut « La juiverie dans la musique : sombrer ! ». Mais Wagner ne fut pas le seul à penser ainsi : j'ai souvenir d'une lettre que Rahel Varnhagen (qui finit par se faire baptiser) adressée à son frère où elle lui recommandait de « tuer les juifs en nous ». Je trouve Rahel bien plus violente que Wagner qui, lui au moins, n'est pas né juif, même si des doutes sérieux subsistent quant à sa réelle filiation.

Cette époque eut le triste privilège d'être celle où la « question juive » (comme aimait à le dire) se posait avec une acuité toute particulière et Pierre-André Taguieff expose dans un chapitre spécifique la solution wagnérienne. En France, on préférait parler du « problème juif » tandis qu'en Allemagne on a toujours dit la « question juive » (« Judenfrage »). On ne s'est jamais posé la question de savoir si les Juifs avaient été perçus par eux-mêmes comme une question ou s'ils n'étaient un problème qu'aux yeux des autres. Ces différentes appellations s'en référaient aux difficultés d'intégrer les Juifs d'Europe au sein de sociétés de culture chrétienne.

Comme Wagner a su se frayer un chemin en direction des riches et des puissants qui l'ont adulé et statué à Bayreuth et ailleurs, on omet souvent de rappeler qu'il fut, dans sa jeunesse, un authentique Romantique révolutionnaire et qu'il participa au soulèvement de Dresde ; il dut même fuir cette ville, en 1849, après avoir fait de l'agitation aux côtés d'un révolutionnaire autrement plus célèbre, Mikhaïl Bakounine. Mais de 1849 à 1871, Wagner avait fini par choisir son camp, celui des forces de la restauration et du conservatisme. Il avait dû affronter la misère pendant quelques années et cette épreuve avait suscité en lui une profonde aspiration : ne plus jamais être dans le besoin, pouvoir se procurer tout ce dont il avait besoin. Il suffit de relire les lignes échangées avec le roi Louis II de Bavière pour s'en convaincre. Il aspirait à devenir un musicien, un artiste d'État, être pensionné dès son plus jeune âge ! Et dans cette quête éperdue d'un bonheur matériel stable, Wagner a considéré que la juiverie, comme il aimait la nommer, était un obstacle sur son chemin. Ce qui explique que son pamphlet « la juiverie dans la musique » n'est nullement une improvisation ni une œuvre de circonstance, mais une véritable profession de foi, un témoignage crucial de sa « Weltanschauung ». Mais cette judéophobie, cet antisémitisme imprégnait largement, comme on l'a relevé supra, l'air du temps, le « Zeitgeist ». Même du côté juif, on pouvait lire les déclarations grinçantes d'un Henri Heine qui n'hésitait pas à maudire la vallée du Nil d'où les enfants d'Israël ont pu s'enfuir pour survivre jusqu'à son époque. Ce Heine qui considérait le judaïsme non point comme une religion (bonne ou mauvaise) mais comme une véritable maladie. À ses yeux, les Juifs souffraient d'une triple affliction : la souffrance, la pauvreté et la maladie car leur judéité n'était rien d'autre qu'une pathologie ! Wagner n'a donc pas tout inventé, l'idéologie antisémite avait déjà de solides soutiens dans le monde des idées. Le pamphlet de Wagner, publié pour la 1^{re} fois en 1850, connut une ré-édition en 1869. Et dans sa lettre à Madame Marie Mouchanoff, Wagner justifie son point de vue, n'hésite pas même à l'aggraver : il se complait dans une sorte de victimologie qui est le fruit de son imagination.

Pour parachever sa volonté de délégitimer le peuple juif, réputé le peuple élu, Wagner n'hésite à faire du peuple allemand le peuple originel, l' « Urvolk » , une idée déjà utilisée par Fichte dans ses « Discours à la nation allemande » . Mais l'aspect le plus inquiétant et qui pouvait augurer de la suite, à l'insu de son auteur probablement, concerne l'affirmation du caractère indélébile des traits juifs (« jüdische Merkmale ») . Certains antisémites allaient jusqu'à assurer que même la conversion n'y changerait rien. Si l'on pousse un tel raisonnement jusqu'au bout de sa logique criminelle, on aboutit à l'extermination pure et simple. Cependant, on ne trouve pas une telle déclaration explicitement énoncée dans l'ensemble de l'œuvre de Richard Wagner. Mais on est conduit à se poser la même question : pourquoi un tel acharnement ? Une telle obsession ? Certes, Wagner a pu avoir des concurrents juifs (Giacomo Meyerbeer, Jacques Offenbach) , mais cela justifiait-il une telle attitude ? À près de 20 ans d'intervalle, cette monomanie n'avait pris une ride, bien au contraire, elle s'affirmait avec toujours plus de force. L'historien des idées Hans Mayer, cité par Pierre-André Taguieff, rappelle que l'Allemagne de cette époque, en gésine d'un sauveur, voulait voir dans tout artiste créatif et inspiré, un sorte de génie, de sauveur ou de prophète, porteur d'un idéal quasi-messianique. Il n'est pas exclu que Wagner se soit senti investi d'une telle mission. Héros et prophète de l'Allemagne et de son génie insurpassable qu'il incarnait pleinement, quiconque se dressait sur son chemin devenait son ennemi et « eo ipso » celui de l'Allemagne dans son ensemble !

Le grand compositeur était animé d'un énorme ressentiment et éprouvait tant de sentiments de frustration : ainsi, après son échec retentissant à Paris, il envisagea, d'après le journal intime de sa femme Cosima, de demander à Bismarck d'écraser Paris sous les obus de son artillerie, voire même de brûler la capitale française qui faisait figure de grande pécheresse à ses yeux : vouloir annihiler toute une métropole au motif exclusif qu'elle n'avait pas honneur à l'un de ses drames musicaux. Wagner n'avait probablement jamais feuilleté le livre de Jonas qui exhale son dépit lorsque le Seigneur refuse d'annihiler Ninive et tous ses habitants.

Richard Wagner a-t-il été influencé dans son antisémitisme par les courants philosophiques irriguant l'Allemagne de son époque ? C'est quasi certain et la phrase de George Lachmann Mosse selon lequel l'antisémitisme allemand fait partie de l'histoire intellectuelle allemande recouvre, hélas, une triste réalité ! Et je me permets d'ajouter que vu mon cursus, c'est un constat qui me coûte. Le fondateur de la germanistique française, le grand Charles Andler (qui a, en autres, bien étudié les œuvres de Friedrich Nietzsche) et qui, natif d'Alsace en 1866, ressentit dans sa chair les oppositions franco-allemandes de son temps, nous a appris que nous devons faire le départ entre l'Allemagne spirituelle (« das geistige Deutschland ») et l'Allemagne politico-militaire, incarnée par le chancelier de fer Otto von Bismarck. Nous devons étudier les œuvres impérissables de la Ire sans nous préoccuper des méfaits de la seconde. Visiblement, Mosse va bien plus loin puisqu'il semble affirmer que la grande majorité des penseurs, philosophes et écrivains de l'aire germanique sont coupables d'antisémitisme.

Que Ludwig Feuerbach avec ses conceptions matérialistes ait cloué au pilori le christianisme, mais surtout sa source originelle, le judaïsme, pour privilégier le polythéisme grec, il n'y a là rien d'étonnant. Mais sa critique de la religion juive glisse inéluctablement vers des idées largement antisémites. Est-ce une nouveauté ? Pas vraiment, puisque même un homme comme Kant, pourtant ami de Juifs comme Markus Herz et Salomon Maimon (tous deux admiratifs de son criticisme) , ne nourrissait pas à l'égard du judaïsme des idées neutres. Il refusa de placer le judaïsme parmi les religions ou les spiritualités, arguant que c'était un conglomérat de statuts et articula même la violente accusation d' « Ethnizismus » (ethnisme) contre lui. Hermann Cohen, son disciple de Marbourg, signala cette tendance dans le recueil d'Écrits juifs (« Jüdische Schriften ») . Pourtant, les Kantiens juifs furent légion, même en Israël où l'on se montra très favorable à cet impératif catégorique qui évoquait aux yeux des Juifs religieux la notion de loi, et donc de Tora, contrairement à l'antinomisme Paulinien qui finit s'imposer au sein du christianisme primitif.

Mais Fichte ira, selon moi, bien plus loin, en dépit de son introduction dans les salons berlinois grâce à une célèbre femme juive. Ce philosophe nationaliste allemand (il suffit de se reporter à ses « Discours à la nation allemande » pour s'en convaincre) ne respectait véritablement qu'un seul Juif, Salomon Maimon, en raison de sa publication intitulée « Essai de philosophie transcendante » . Il ne tarissait pas d'éloges sur son mentor juif qui avait adressé au criticisme Kantien des remarques qui ont permis à l'idéalisme d'avoir une seconde vie. Fichte ne disait-il pas qu'il rêvait de couper la tête de tous les Juifs afin de la recoudre avec d'autres idées ? Voici un argument quelque peu étonnant sous la plume d'un philosophe ! En fait, Fichte ne supportait pas l'idée de l'élection divine des Juifs ni surtout leur statut de peuple prétendument originel. Il destinait cette place si enviée à son propre peuple, les Allemands. Et cette idée que le salut viendrait un jour du peuple allemand se retrouve, bien plus tard, même dans la bouche d'un social-démocrate allemand, Gustav Stresemann qui fit, en 1918, alors que son pays avait subi une effroyable défaite, la proclamation suivante : « Am deutschen Wesen wird die Welt genesen » (C'est par l'essence allemande que le monde sera régénéré.) . Cette « usurpation » messianique a donc fait florès depuis le milieu du XIXe siècle.

Arthur Schopenhauer ne fait pas exception dans cette galerie de philosophes germaniques, lui qui assignait au Nouveau Testament des origines hindoues ou brahmanes et ne voulait pas entendre parler de judaïsme qu'il stigmatisait copieusement pour sa joyeuse prise de possession du monde et pour son optimisme. Il reprenait les idées de Marcion dont le souci majeur est de couper l'Église de toutes ses racines juives. Mais l'auteur du « Monde comme volonté et représentation » (un livre qui avait nettement séduit son lecteur Wagner lequel lui tressa des couronnes sa vie durant) allait bien plus loin puisqu'il refusait le récit biblique de l'Exode des Hébreux d'Égypte, arguant que ce sont les Égyptiens qui les chassèrent du pays en raison de leurs maladies contagieuses et leur irrépressible kleptomane. Il ajoutait même que les chiffres avancés par la Bible étaient fantaisistes car comment un tel désert aurait-il pu fournir une alimentation suffisante pour une telle population ? Et pour bien montrer de quel côté penchait son cœur, Schopenhauer concluait que le monothéisme (originellement juif) avait pour corollaire l'intolérance. C'est ce philosophe qui insistera le plus sur ce qu'il nommait la « puanteur juive » , une remarque qui marquera profondément son fidèle lecteur Wagner.

Le problème auquel ce brillant ouvrage de Pierre-André Taguieff tente d'apporter une réponse est, on se le rappelle, le suivant : quel fut l'apport spécifique, individuel et originel de Wagner à l'antisémitisme allemand en général et dans quelle mesure a-t-il fourni des arguments (ou des munitions) à la Shoah ? Certains ont voulu voir en Wagner le père spirituel d'Adolf Hitler, mais il s'agit là d'un saisissant raccourci que les historiens les plus réputés et les plus fiables ont (à juste titre) refusé de valider. Taguieff consacre à cette problématique son chapitre le plus long et le plus nourri. On y rencontre un Wagner, certes, fidèle à ses idées mais qui refuse de signer une pétition publique d'une ligue antisémite par trop voyante et bruyante, redoutant peut-être des conséquences qu'il pourrait regretter par la suite. Mais cette retenue n'est pas du tout un retrait, l'homme reste fidèle à ses idées développées dans « la Juiverie dans la musique » tant en 1850 que 19 années plus tard.

Il convient de ne pas oublier les effets pervers de la grande crise économique qui suivit les fameuses « Gründerjahre » de l'ère Bismarckienne ; et là aussi, les Juifs devaient jouer le rôle de bouc-émissaire (« Sündenbock ») puisqu'on voyait en eux soit les instigateurs de la dépression soit ceux qui en tiraient le plus grand profit. Plus tard, lorsque le spectre de la Grande Guerre se profila avec une insistance toujours plus grande sur l'Europe, les Partis et les journaux antisémites désignèrent les Juifs comme les vrais responsables, les organisateurs de ce complot ourdi contre l'Allemagne avec la complicité active des grandes puissances, la France et l'Angleterre. Du coup, lorsque sonna l'heure de la défaite, les Juifs se retrouvèrent une fois encore sur le banc des accusés. Erich Ludendorff, le généralissime allemand, n'hésite pas à écrire dans un ouvrage paru en 1921 que « la juiverie internationale » (« Das Weltjudentum ») est responsable de la défaite de l'Allemagne. Les forces armées allemandes estimaient avoir été trahies par l'arrière alors qu'elles tenaient bon au front. D'où la fameuse légende du coup de poignard dans le dos (« Dolchstoßlegende ») .

On s'appuya, pour ce faire, sur les Protocoles des sages de Sion : même Adolf Hitler s'y réfèrera dans « Mein Kampf » en s'en prenant violemment aux Juifs. Le « Führer » stigmatisait le bolchévisme juif tandis que d'autres clouaient au pilori le rôle des Juifs dans le système capitaliste. Leur action politique dissolvante (certains d'entre eux dirigeaient la social-démocratie allemande, voire des mouvements d'extrême gauche) avait fini par causer la perte de la patrie allemande. Au fond, on finit toujours par retrouver le même raisonnement : le Juif, élément étranger, inassimilable, inéliminable, étranger nulle part et partout chez lui, dissout petit à petit l'identité germanique de l'Allemagne et mutile gravement l'âme de son peuple. Un peu plus tard, on stigmatisera la main mise des Juifs sur la presse, notamment libérale, et cela donnera naissance à la terrible accusation de « reptilisme journalistique » . Toujours, cette vieille assimilation du Juif à un animal venimeux dont le poison tue.

À la suite de spécialistes israéliens, Pierre-André Taguieff nous livre d'intéressants commentaires sur la fluidité terminologique des antisémites allemands de l'époque, et notamment de Wagner lui-même. Comme le discours antisémite est tout sauf cohérent (même lorsqu'il n'est pas dépourvu d'une certaine logique délirante interne) ses partisans font preuve involontairement d'un certain éclectisme, ce qui complique d'autant la définition même de leur haine anti-juive : est-ce un racisme biologique, la conviction que les Juifs sont définitivement un élément étranger inassimilable ? Est-ce que la solution de la question juive ne pouvait être que la « solution finale » (« Endlösung ») ? La question ne se laisse pas trancher facilement. Existe-t-il vraiment un lien direct entre Adolf Hitler, Alfred Rosenberg, Houston Stewart Chamberlain et Richard Wagner qui serait la base de ce monstrueux montage ? Au fond, c'est là toute la question car même Wagner ne répugnait pas, à l'occasion, à emprunter à la terminologie de l'antisémitisme biologique. Ne dit-il pas à maintes reprises, et dès les Ires lignes de « La Juiverie dans la musique » , que la seule présence (physique) d'un Juif dans son entourage suscitait en lui un sentiment de rejet et de malaise ? Ce wagnérisme a-t-il influencé Hitler ? On a du mal à tirer cela au clair car l'adolescent Hitler avait bien assisté à des représentations de Wagner dans sa ville de province et, en 1923, il reconnaîtra qu'il fut immédiatement conquis par un Maître qui savait, mieux que tout autre parler à l'âme allemande. Ayant conquis le pouvoir, le « Führer » instrumentaliserait les drames musicaux avec le redoutable concours d'un grand spécialiste de la propagande comme le docteur Josef Göbbels.

On ne doit pas omettre de souligner l'importance qui revient à l'ouvrage d'Alfred Rosenberg, « le Mythe du XXe siècle », paru en 1930 et où l'auteur tresse des couronnes à Wagner dont il fait l'interprète le plus accompli de la race nordique-germanique où les Juifs n'ont aucune place et d'où ils doivent être chassés. Dans cet ouvrage, Rosenberg se fait le champion du « désenjuivement » (« Entjudung ») puisque, selon lui, l'Allemagne souffre de « l'enjuivement » (« Verjudung »). À la lecture de tels syntagmes dont la seule langue allemande semble avoir le secret, on peine à en croire ses yeux ! Quand on pense à tous ces écrivains judéo-allemands qui érigèrent les plus beaux monuments de la littérature et de la philosophie allemandes et qui firent de cette langue le médium linguistique le plus influent de l'Europe de l'entre 2 guerres, on se demande quelle maladie a bien pu s'abattre sur ces gens. Ignoraient-ils la « Lorelei » de Heinrich Heine ou les « Schwarzwälder Dorfgeschichten » (Contes villageois de la Forêt-Noire) de Berthold Auerbach, un petit-fils de rabbin, qui avait même songé un temps à marcher sur les traces de son grand-père.

Je m'arrête un instant sur cette phrase incroyable de Paul de Lagarde qui affirmait sans rire : « Nous sommes antisémites mais pas des ennemis des Juifs. ». Voulait-on simplement dire que les Juifs devaient abandonner leur attachement à leur religion et à leur nationalité antique, en somme réaliser une conversion foncière au christianisme, et qu'une fois que cette formalité sera accomplie, le problème juif serait résolu ? Dans ce cas, il ne s'agirait pas ici d'une racialisation du Juif mais d'une simple coercition à caractère religieux, un peu comme le décret d'expulsion d'Isabelle la catholique qui laissait aux Juifs le choix entre la conversion et l'expulsion des possessions de la couronne. Une déclaration de Wagner, « Connais-toi toi-même », une phrase qui se retrouve, sous une forme très proche, dans « Mein Kampf » d'Hitler : Wagner parle de l'exemple le plus étonnant de permanence raciale que l'histoire mondiale ait jamais produit. Hitler, quant à lui, évoque le plus fort et le plus persistant instinct de conservation de ce peuple (« der stärkste Selbsterhaltungstrieb dieses Volkes »). Le « Führer » s'est simplement contenté de paraphraser sa source wagnérienne !

Pierre-André Taguieff montre qu'il y a Wagner et le wagnérisme car il est indéniable que le gendre et le thuriféraire du musicien, Chamberlain, a infléchi sa pensée politique dans le sens souhaité par les Nazis. Il serait donc en majeure partie responsable de la nazification à la fois de l'œuvre et des idées de son idole. Mais il y a plus : le « Cas Wagner » est insaisissable, même s'il a proféré des phrases qui, dûment nazifiées, ont conduit à une apocalypse. J'apprécie les 2 dernières phrases de Pierre-André Taguieff qui parle de la tâche indélébile de l'antisémitisme sur l'œuvre de Wagner tout en ajoutant que cette série de paradoxes nous donne matière à penser. Jacob Katz allait dans le même sens en écrivant à la fin de son ouvrage, « le Cas Wagner » : « Wagner sitzt zu Gericht über Wagner. » (Wagner comparaît devant lui-même, devant sa conscience.), s'il en avait vraiment une.

Un rapide coup d'œil sur les textes de Wagner excellemment traduits et très bien annotés montre que notre homme pensait les Juifs et les Allemands dans des catégories strictement antinomiques. Ceci est particulièrement criant dans la lettre à Madame Marie Mouchanoff et dans le texte intitulé « Modernes », ce dernier me rappelant le texte désespéré de Moritz Goldstein (Kunswart, 1912) où on pouvait lire cette phrase que même Wagner ne renierait pas : « Nous autres Juifs gérons le patrimoine culturel d'un peuple qui nous dénie le droit de le faire. ».

Une chose me touche au plus profond de moi-même : ce Wagner avait dit de lui-même qu'il était le plus allemand de tous les Allemands. Et pour nous qui avons porté au pinacle la langue et la philosophie allemandes dont il se prétendait le produit le plus abouti, ne sommes nous pas passés à côté de l'essentiel ?

The Psychopathology of Richard Wagner (Borderline Personality Disorder)

Richard Wagner is considered one of the most important and influential figures in the history of Western music. His music is among the greatest and most popular ever written, and can be heard around the world in concert halls, Opera Houses and, even, in movies and cartoons. At the same time, Wagner remains « one of the most controversial figures of his or any age » due to his anti-Semitism, fervent dislike of the French and their Operas, contradiction filled prose works on musical and political topics, and his desire to save and restore Germany and German culture through his art works. Over the years, the terms « egotist », « narcissist », « anti-Semite », and others have been used to describe Wagner. However, more effort should be expended on discovering evidence of psychological or psychiatric conditions that may have influenced his behaviors, as he was surely an individual who « strayed beyond the normal parameters of mental health ». As Julius Kapp stated :

« A one sided impression of him, such as he himself created in the Autobiography at the expense of his environment, cannot, in the interests of research, be tolerated ; for research demands that justice shall be done also to those who were in touch with him, and that, in so far as a re-examination of reliable sources is feasible, tendenciousness shall be replaced by an objective picture. »

In 2003, Professor John Louis Di Gaetani published a book entitled « Wagner and Suicide », in which he proposed, based on evidence from Wagner's letters, autobiography, Operas, and biographies about Wagner that the composer suffered from Bipolar Disorder. Likewise, I am proposing, based on evidence from not only his correspondence and biographical literature, but from research on Borderline Personality Disorder from mental health professionals, that Wagner may have suffered from Borderline Personality Disorder, possibly in addition to Bipolar Disorder. I do so by examining Wagner's letters and the biographies about him to find instances where his behavior matched the accepted behaviors of Borderline Personality Disorder as indicated in the latest edition of the « Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders Text Revision » and other relevant sources.

Since I am not a psychology, psychiatry, or any other kind of medical or mental health student or professional, I am not qualified to render a definitive diagnosis of anything on to anyone. For this reason, I feel it is imperative that I use relevant source material from mental health professionals to support the ideas in this paper. I believe that my research strategy, because it uses research and evidence from actual mental health experts, convincingly supports my ideas. I am aware that it is not possible to arrive at an indisputable conclusion. I have merely proposed an idea, and have provided relevant data to support it.

The « Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders 4th Edition Text Revision » , from 2000, lists 9 criteria for diagnosing an individual with Borderline Personality Disorder (page 710) . Any 5 of the 9 must be present in order to render a legitimate diagnosis. The 7 (instead of the minimum of 5) criteria that I believe Wagner displayed most strongly are :

Frantic efforts to avoid real or imagined abandonment.

A pattern of unstable and intense interpersonal relationships characterized by alternating between extremes of idealization and devaluation.

Identity disturbance : markedly and persistently unstable self-image or sense of self.

Impulsivity in at least 2 areas that are potentially self-damaging (e.g. , spending, sex, substance abuse, reckless driving, binge eating) .

Recurrent suicidal behavior, gestures, or threats, or self-mutilating behavior.

Chronic feelings of emptiness.

Inappropriate, intense anger or difficulty controlling anger (e.g. , frequent displays of temper, constant anger, recurrent physical fights) .

The other 2 main criteria of the disorder are :

Affective instability due to a marked reactivity of mood (e.g. , intense episodic dysphoria, irritability, or anxiety usually lasting a few hours and only rarely more than a few days) .

Transient, stress-related paranoid ideation or severe dissociative symptoms.

I used the evidence of Wagner's behaviors to complete the « Millon Inventory of Diagnostic Criteria » (MIDC) , developed by Doctor Aubrey Immelman of the Psychology Department of the College of Saint-Benedict at Saint John's University, in Minnesota. Doctor Immelman described the MIDC as « more applicable and yielding richer and more nuanced results of evaluating public figures at a distance » than the DSM alone. I initially contacted Doctor Immelman because I discovered that he conducted a posthumous psychological evaluation of one of the 9 / 11 hijackers. Since I have engaged in a similar project (a posthumous psychological evaluation of a person) , I contacted him for his input and opinions on the general idea and research strategies I have used. Doctor Immelman sent me the MIDC and instructed me to fill it out with the relevant data about Wagner's behaviors and to send it to him so he could make a judgment of whether Wagner displayed borderline tendencies. I sent Doctor Immelman the MIDC with the relevant information on January 17, 2010, and on January 19, 2010, I received an e-mail from him that contained the following quote :

« I think you have sufficient data to demonstrate a borderline pattern in Wagner. »

As for the 1st criterion, I have found information regarding his relationship to Minna Planer, his 1st wife. Wagner « thought he could not live without her » and that « it seemed impossible for him to live with her, but he could never really break free ». He also expressed fears of the abandonment that would come with his mother's passing in a letter to her from July 25, 1835 :

« O Mother, what if you should prematurely die, ere I had fully proved to you that it was to a worthy son, of boundless gratitude, you shewed so great a love ! »

Elbert Lenrow proposed that Wagner's autobiography, « Mein Leben » (My Life) , was written solely to « repay everyone he knew for real or fancied wrongs done to him » .

As for the 2nd criterion, I have found evidence that suggests that he experienced this kind of pattern in his relationships with his friends until they refused to lend him money. (On this matter, Alfred Einstein wrote that « Wagner was unable to hold a single friend, without crises, to the end of his life » .) An example of this is his friendship with Baron Robert von Hornstein, in the late- 1850's. Although they had a close relationship, Wagner eventually « devalued » Hornstein for his refusal to lend him money, in addition to another extravagant request. In response to Hornstein's letter, in which he refused to send him money, Wagner wrote that « it will probably not happen again that a man like me will apply to you » citing the « impropriety of your Hornstein's letter and labelling him totally ignorant of my works ». Wagner seems to have displayed idealization and devaluation on a much larger scale when, in 1849, he glorified the common working people in a prose work called « The Revolution », yet, in a letter from December 30, 1851, to his friend Kietz, he referred to his :

« Most bloody hatred of our entire civilization, and contempt for all that it has produced. That I ever set store by the workers as workers is something I must now atone for grievously : with the noises they make, these workers are the wretchedest slaves, whom anyone can control nowadays if he promises them plenty of " work ". In the whole of Europe, however, I prefer dogs to these doglike men. »

As for the 3rd criterion, with the elaboration from the DSM-III-R, from 1987, I believe that Wagner displayed this « markedly and persistently unstable self-image or sense of self ». Interestingly, it has been proposed that this can be caused by changes in « the fabric of traditional and organized societies », such as Wagner may have experienced growing-up in a society that was being changed by « rapid industrialization, immigration, mobility, technology, and mass communication » as well as by changes in his personal world as a result of being born « into a War torn country and a frequently uprooted family ». Garten explained this feeling of uncertainty of identity :

« At an age when most other composers had already achieved some Masterpieces or, at any rate, established their unmistakable identity, Wagner was drifting aimlessly, unsure which way to go. What is more, for quite some time, he vacillated between drama and music. »

Wagner also changed his outlook on musical aesthetics as well as political philosophy throughout his life. In his younger years, he was a « Young German » with left-wing political beliefs but, in his later years, he became disillusioned with the world and with politics and began following the pessimistic philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer. « In any case, he changed some of his key views over the years, in part radically, he rarely acknowledged the fact publicly and probably did not always admit it to himself. » These changes in beliefs have been attributed to the idea that : « Wagner did what most people tend to do in the fullness of time. He changed. » . However, I believe that his mental state may have had an influence on these changes, as they are too far reaching to be due to coincidence. For instance, in the years following his exile from Dresden, in 1849, he expounded his ideas of the « gesamtkunstwerk » or « total work of art » , in which music, dance, singing, and the visual arts of painting, architecture, and sculpture would be combined to achieve the large dramatic result, thus creating a more or less equal partnership between music and the other arts for this purpose. However, he seems to have deviated from this belief not only in that « it is music that in his “ Gesamtkunstwerk ” wins the real and final victories » but that it did so to the highest degree in « Tristan und Isolde » , completed in 1859, several years after he worked-out these theories.

As for the 4th criterion, I have found evidence to suggest that he behaved in self-damaging ways by engaging in reckless spending and substance abuse. « Hurn and Root » stated that :

« Wagner was always short of money. He never had as much as he wanted. This was partly because he wanted so much. His tastes were extremely extravagant. He ran through considerable sums in years when he was living in poverty because he spent as fast as he borrowed ; more often, he spent faster. He had to be smuggled across the frontier, at Riga, because he had left so many debts behind him. »

As for the 5th criterion, I have found information from his letters that would suggest suicidal intentions. In a letter to Franz Liszt, from March 30, 1853, Wagner stated :

« My nights are mostly sleepless ; weary and miserable, I rise from my bed to see a day before me which will bring me not one joy. Intercourse with people who torture me, and from whom I withdraw to torture myself ! I feel disgust at whatever I undertake. This cannot go on ; I cannot bear life much longer. »

In a letter from December 17th, 1853, he wrote :

« My head is burning. There is something wrong with me ; and sometimes, with lightning like rapidity, the thought flashed through me that it would be better, after all, if I died. »

In a letter from January 15, 1854, to Franz Liszt, Wagner wrote :

« Not a year of my life has passed recently without my finding myself at least once on the very brink of a decision to end my life. » .

Wagner also wrote in a letter to Otto Wesendonck :

« My life is a sea of contradictions, from which I can only hope to emerge through death. »

These letters seem to reflect « bouts of suicidal despair » .

As for the 6th criterion, I have found information in his letters. For instance, in a letter to Anton Pusinelli from February 9, 1866, he wrote :

« Oh God, how sad, how sad I am ! There are only wounds and scars in my heart, scarcely one single sound place. Life is boundlessly difficult for me, and the longer I live, the more difficult it becomes ! »

I believe that the letters in which he expresses suicidal intentions are indicative of « chronic feelings of emptiness » , especially if these feelings are so strong as to cause the person to wish for death.

As for the 7th criterion, I have found mention of incidents of domestic violence towards Minna Planer. There were « violent arguments between the 2 of them » in which he would « rant and rave all night, committing acts of domestic violence so serious that Minna “ lay there in convulsions for hours on end ”. Overcome by remorse, he would then throw himself at her feet and, weeping, “ beg for forgiveness like a child ”. » . 6 months after Wagner and Minna got married, « Minna, battered and bewildered by her husband’s lightning switches of mood from towering rage to tearful remorse, ran-off with a merchant » . His letters also express threats of violence should Minna not return to him and commit herself entirely to him. A letter to her from November 7, 1835, states :

« Open your heart Minna, if you don’t I am going to compel you ; by God, I shall come to Berlin and tear you away by force. »

A letter from the next day to Minna states :

« What is there left to say after my previous letters, to the girl whose heart has not been touched by these entreaties, by these presentations, these offers ? This girl would no longer be touched in her heart - only by a sharp knife. »

Most disconcerting is the contrast between these letters and his intention, expressed in a letter to her from a few days before, on November 4, to send « from now on only quite calm letters » .

It is also important to note that « separation from or loss of primary caregivers in childhood is associated with the development of the disorder » . Wagner’s father, Carl Friedrich Wagner, passed away in a typhus epidemic when Wagner was 6 months old and his « adoptive » father, Ludwig Geyer, who married Wagner’s mother Johanna after Carl’s death, passed away when Wagner was 8 years old.

I believe that Wagner displayed one of the emotional responses inherent in borderlines known as « projection » , which is « the displacement of the hate and anger those with borderline personality disorders feel towards themselves and attributing these unacceptable parts of themselves to others. Rather than dislike themselves, borderline patients believe it is others who dislike them and cause their problems » . For instance, he blamed Minna Planer's « mere existence for having “ destroyed ” his position as conductor in Dresden, when it is plain that he himself was largely responsible for the destruction of this as well as of his wife's position and possibly life » .

It seems that Wagner also displayed another one of the common emotional responses in borderlines known as « splitting » , which is the perception of « persons and institutions as all good or ideal, or all bad with no redeeming qualities » . One instance of this is in his views on Bismarck. He referred to him as a « barbarian Junker » when he argued against the rule of Germany by Prussia or Austria, but then held him to be the « new savior of Germany » and lauded Prussia as « the wave of the German future » and the embodiment of « the true German spirit » . He subsequently returned to a negative outlook on Bismarck, referring to him as a « pig caller » when he would not agree to fund Wagner's Bayreuth enterprise after a Prussian military victory.

Wagner also seemed to display « prominent patterns of manipulation of others » that are common in borderlines. « Wagner became a virtuoso at raking in money and, as in his art, he was not afraid of using extreme means, the excuses that he offered ranging from an urgent need for medical supplies to the threat of imprisonment for debt, a threat that on one occasion he even claimed had been realized. » He did this with « the cunning of little boys who often succeed in persuading their parents to buy them what they want » . He also seemed to manipulate his friends with efforts of « guilt tripping » , in order to obtain money from them. For instance, in a letter from November of 1862 to his niece Franziska, he asked her to ask a friend of his for a rather large loan, claiming that worrying about this matter had caused him to experience « a sleepless night » and also stating that « you alone can work it » . I believe that he behaved manipulatively in his political endeavors as well, as he was interested in the overthrow of the government in favor of one « whose chief interest would be Opera » so that he may achieve his own artistic dreams.

Although I have received the agreement of a psychiatrist for the idea that Richard Wagner may have had a borderline personality, it is not possible to absolutely prove that he suffered from one mental illness or another. However, it is still quite interesting to explore the literature on his life to obtain information that would suggest that he did, as it provides a more informed and enriched perspective through which we can view Wagner, and helps us to better understand how a creative genius can be afflicted with mental and emotional obstacles throughout his or her life. It is fascinating how, even though oppressed by personal and mental barriers, Wagner's mind was able to flourish and operate in such a way as to create some of the greatest musical art in existence. As Revelli wrote :

« To this great Master, the Orchestra of today owes a debt of gratitude, as do thousands of conductors, hundreds of thousands of musicians, and millions of music lovers, the world over. »

Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn et Mahler

Giacomo Meyerbeer (1791-1864) , Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (1809-1847) et Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) ont fait l'objet d'un acharnement idéologique dans la politique musicale nationale-socialiste. La figure de Meyerbeer est évoquée dans le contexte du séjour parisien de Richard Wagner. Ce dernier, malgré les échanges qu'ils aient pu avoir, s'est empressé par la suite de dénigrer le compositeur de « Robert le diable ». Les théoriciens antisémites ne manquèrent pas d'amplifier cette querelle à des fins de propagande. Le régime nazi ne ménagea pas non plus ses efforts pour effacer le souvenir de Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, dont la famille était d'origine juive. Dans la nuit du 9 au 10 novembre 1936, le monument édifié en son honneur, en 1892, devant le « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig fut démantelé. La même année, la rue portant son nom fut rebaptisée rue « Anton Bruckner ». Enfin, une série de commandes officielles devant donner naissance à un « Songe d'une nuit d'été » « arien » fut initiée.

Si le compositeur fait également l'objet d'un rejet de caractère racial, Adolf Hitler a toujours conservé une certaine estime pour Gustav Mahler chef d'orchestre, notamment dans la production de « Tristan und Isolde » mis-en-scène par Alfred Roller, spectacle qu'il avait vu à l'Opéra de Vienne lors de ses années d'apprentissage avant la Première Guerre mondiale. Parue dans la foulée des « Journées musicales du " Reich " » de 1938 et de son congrès sur « Musique et race », l'étude de Karl Blessinger « Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mahler ». 3 chapitres du Judaïsme dans la musique comme clé pour l'histoire de la musique du XIXe siècle (1939) fut abondamment citée dans les ouvrages postérieurs, notamment dans le « Dictionnaire des Juifs dans la musique » (1940). L'auteur fait remonter au XIXe siècle l'influence nocive du judaïsme dans la musique. Blessinger distingue 3 époques représentées par 3 compositeurs emblématiques : Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, « le Juif assimilé » ; Meyerbeer, le « Juif affairiste sans scrupules » ; et Mahler, le « type fanatique du rabbin d'Europe de l'Est ». Le livre de Blessinger fut ré-édité en 1944 sous le titre plus concis de « Judaïsme et musique ».

Felix Mendelssohn, whose Symphonies, Concertos and lieder had remained a basic part of bourgeois music culture, was another matter. The composer, who had converted to Christianity as a child, was eliminated, step by step, from German musical life. In 1936, the Mendelssohn monument in Leipzig, where he had lived and worked for many years, was destroyed under cover of darkness, and the family descendants were bullied and forced into exile. A famously absurd attempt was made to replace Mendelssohn's music for Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream ». The music, today the composer's most popular work, had been banned, but it had traditionally been used for performances of the play. Hans Pfitzner refused to provide a replacement in contrast to the ambitious young Carl Orff.

In the years around the « fin-de-siècle », a 3rd « Music Jew » came to the prominence, alongside Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn : Gustav Mahler. He, too, was helped little by his conversion to Catholicism. This permitted him the office of artistic director of the Vienna Court Opera, but did not protect him from the anti-Semitic campaigns which began as soon as he took on a leading position in Viennese cultural life and which followed him, with varying intensity, for the rest of his life. These campaigns, to be sure, were nonetheless directed less against Mahler, the conductor, than against Mahler, the composer. Mahler sought to escape this problem through suppression and concealment, and to a certain extent he succeeded. After his death, however, the discussions of the futility of his artistic efforts and of the absence of « true German depth » in his works continued with unabated intensity. One must consider, as drastic as it is, the truth : Had Gustav Mahler not died in 1911, he would have had to experience, at the age of 78, Hitler marching into Vienna and his enthusiastic reception there. He would have been bullied and deprived of his rights, as happened to Sigmund Freud, and had he not as Freud did chosen emigration in his old age, he would have been, and this may be said with certainty, deported to an extermination camp, as happened to his niece Alma Rosé.

To recall how the approach taken with these 3 composers of international reputation in the spirit of Richard Wagner, to whom go back all demonizations of Jewish composers set the tone for what happened to living composers and musicians, whether Jewish or, though non-Jewish, undesirable, whether politically or because proponents of avant-garde music (« Neutöner ») , one might have a look at the 1939 work of the National-Socialist musicologist Karl Blessinger, « Mendelssohn - Meyerbeer - Mahler. Drei Kapitel Judentum in der Musik als Schlüssel zur Musikgeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts » (Mendelssohn - Meyerbeer - Mahler. 3 Chapters of Jewry in Music as Key to the Music History of the 19th Century) . The formulation alone explains why works of these 3 composers form the basis of the program for Thomas Hampson's concerts, even though they were not directly affected by exile and persecution.

The « cardiac asthma of exile » (Thomas Mann) found its most compelling poetic formulation in the words of the emigrant Bertolt Brecht. A verse from his poem « An die Nachgeborenen » (To Those Born After) reads thus :

I would also like to be wise.

In the old books it says what wisdom is :

To shun the strife of the world and to live-out your brief time without fear to get by, too, without violence to repay evil with good

not to fulfill your desires but to forget them is thought wise.

All this I cannot do :

Truly, I live in dark times !

The composers of our lied project lived, like Brecht and millions of others, in truly dark times. Whatever their personal fates, they survived in their music. To remember this is our obligation. In the words of Theodor W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer :

« What is of value is not the conservation of the past, but instead the redemption of past hope. »

The author, born in Salzburg in 1943, studied German literature, history, musicology and voice. From 1982 to 1988, he was professor of literature at the University of Siegen. Since 1989, he is professor of theatre studies at the University of Munich. Author of many books, including : « Große Stimmen : Von Enrico Caruso zu Jessye Norman » (1993) ; « Jahrhundertdämmerung : Ansichten eines anderen “ Fin-de-siècle ” » (2000) ; « Richard Wagner's “ Das Judentum in der Musik ” » (2000) ; « Gustav Mahler : Der fremde Vertraute » (2003) .

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy : The Jewish Question

Mendelssohn dual name reflects a multi-faceted religious identity, but Hitler's 3rd « Reich » homed in on his Jewishness and banned Felix Mendelssohn's music.

On the paternal side, Mendelssohn was the grandson of the 18th Century Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786) , but was not raised in the Jewish faith.

On March 21, 1816 (as it happened, the birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach) , he was baptized, along with his 3 siblings, as a Lutheran. His parents, Abraham and Lea Mendelssohn, were baptized a few years later.

To acknowledge their new spiritual identity, the family adopted a 2nd surname, so that Felix Mendelssohn became Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Abraham intended that, eventually, his family would omit the Mendelssohn name altogether. His son never did so, however, and continued to sign his letters and publish his music under his dual name.

The issues of religious identity and intra-faith tolerance are critical to our understanding of the composer's life and work. Of Moses Mendelssohn's 6 children who survived into adulthood, 2 preserved their Jewish faith, while 2 converted to Lutheranism, and 2 to Catholicism.

Given this family history, it is telling that Mendelssohn set sacred texts for a variety of faiths, not just Lutheran, but Anglican and Catholic texts (« Tu Es Petrus » , « Lauda Sion ») .

He wrote a short hymn setting for the Huguenot church and, towards the end of his life, was in correspondence with the « Neues Tempel » of Hamburg, which commissioned him to compose several Cantata-like Psalm settings, ultimately unfulfilled.

Though Christian by virtue of his baptism and practising faith, Mendelssohn remained in the eyes of many a Jew. His family's wealth partially insulated him from anti-Semitic sentiments of the time ; but after his death, Richard Wagner attacked the composer's memory in a racist essay published anonymously, in 1850.

Wagner maintained that as a Jew, Mendelssohn could only imitate the profundities of Bach and Beethoven ; his music was derivative and ultimately superficial.

The rise of the 3rd « Reich » in the 20th Century did further, seemingly irreparable damage to Mendelssohn's reputation. The Nazis tore down his statue that had stood before the « Leipzig Gewandhaus » . The Nazis banned Mendelssohn's music but left his grave unscathed in the Trinity Cemetery of Berlin, liquidated the family banking house and banned his music.

But they were unable to expunge Mendelssohn completely from German culture. When Richard Strauß was asked by the Nazis to write new music for « A Midsummer Night's Dream » , he replied that he could not improve on Mendelssohn's music.

The life and music of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy are currently enjoying a healthy resurgence of interest in the scholarly literature. Throughout his short career, Mendelssohn endeavored to collect systematically his manuscripts and correspondence, much of which he had bound in volumes, almost as if he intended to preserve for future historians a careful record of his life's work. The survival of these precious materials has facilitated a critical reevaluation of Mendelssohn and has opened-up new avenues of inquiry about his music and central role in the European concert life of the 1830's and 1840's.

Probably no major composer of the 19th Century has had as unpredictable and mercurial a posthumous reception as Mendelssohn. Lionized and subjected to a kind of cult worship after his death, in 1847, he soon fell victim to Richard Wagner's mid-Century critique, « Das Judenthum in der Musik ». What is more, Mendelssohn's music, characterized in part by Classicist / historicist tendencies, by an emphasis on symmetry, and, in general, by an avoidance of dramatic modes of composition, was measured against Wagnerian criteria, and inevitably suffered in the comparison. During the 20th Century, of course, Mendelssohn's statue in Leipzig was destroyed and his music banned by the Nazis. The post-War era now has seen continuing attempts to reconstruct Mendelssohn's work. The eventual outcome of this process remains unclear, though the essential significance of Mendelssohn's influence on the development of 19th Century music cannot be denied.

Mahler et le judaïsme

Né le 7 juillet 1860 à Kalischt, petite communauté rurale située aux confins de la Bohême et de la Moravie, Gustav Mahler appartenait à une de ces familles juives émigrées, assignées à résidence au sud-est de la Bohême, mais originaires probablement de Galicie ou de Bukovine comme ce fut le cas pour d'autres noms illustres : Sigmund Freud, Franz Kafka, Karl Kraus ou Stefan Zweig. Le nom Mahler a sans doute été immatriculé à la suite de l'Édit de 1787 de Josef II. La généalogie de sa famille remontait à peine au-delà du XIXe siècle. Certains lui prêtèrent comme arrière grand-père possible un certain Abraham Mahler (1720-1800) , chanteur de synagogue, sans que cette filiation ait été ratifiée par la majorité des biographes. Le grand-père Simon Mahler est, en revanche, identifié avec certitude par des documents datant de 1825. Son épouse Maria Bondy, fille d'un gérant de cabaret-distillerie, donna naissance en 1827 à un fils, Bernhard, qui reprendra cette profession. Marié à Maria Hermann, en 1857, Bernhard Mahler eut 14 enfants : 11 garçons et 3 filles. Gustav, le 2e des garçons, vit mourir 6 de ses frères et 1 de ses sœurs. Ses 2 autres sœurs épouseront 2 frères Rosenblum qui deviendront célèbres sous le nom de Rosé. Justine se maria en 1902 avec Arnold Rosé (1863-1946) , violon solo de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne et fondateur du Quatuor Rosé, qui devint un proche collaborateur de Mahler durant sa direction de l'Opéra de Vienne. Leur fille, Alma Rosé, mourra en 1944 à Auschwitz après y avoir dirigé le célèbre Orchestre de femmes. L'autre frère, Eduard Rosé, violoncelliste du Quatuor, fut déporté à Terezín où il mourut en 1943.

Après la naissance de Gustav, la famille Mahler quitta Kalischt et s'installa à Iglau, en Moravie, 35 kilomètres plus loin. Après 13 années de résidence, Bernhard Mahler y obtint un droit de citoyenneté qui restait parcimonieusement accordé aux Juifs. Devenu notable, il acheta une vaste maison où la bibliothèque garnie d'œuvres Classiques et modernes allemandes faisait sa fierté et témoignait de son degré d'assimilation. Il resta cependant fidèle à la communauté israélite d'Iglau, forte de quelque 1,500 membres, mais les liens étaient plus sociaux que religieux, à la façon des Juifs moraves qui, selon Stefan Zweig, s'étaient émancipés de toute orthodoxie étroite. Bernhard Mahler ne se convertira pas pour autant car il aimait adopter des attitudes de libre-penseur.

Les 2 communautés religieuses d'Iglau vivaient en bonne entente et le jeune Gustav fit même partie du chœur de l'église catholique. C'est là qu'il entendit sans doute pour la 1^{re} fois des musiques de Haydn, Mozart et Beethoven. S'il a parfois fréquenté la synagogue avec sa mère, il ne semble pas qu'il en ait apprécié la musique. En revanche, les petits groupes de musiciens ambulants, bohémiens, tziganes ou klezmer, laisseront des traces évidentes dans son subconscient musical, tout comme les chants appris d'une servante tchèque de la maison familiale. Iglau appartenant à une bande étroite de langue allemande entourée de villages tchèques, Gustav Mahler pratiqua les 2 langues, toutefois, rien n'indique qu'il ait parlé yiddish. Après de 1^{res} études à Iglau, il s'inscrivit le 10 septembre 1875 au Conservatoire de Vienne. Il a alors à peine 15 ans mais jouit déjà de la protection de Julius Epstein (1832-1926), un ami de Johannes Brahms. C'est là qu'il rencontre ses futurs beaux-frères, les Rosenblum, qui viennent de Roumanie.

Les amis juifs ne manquent pas et Mahler retrouve notamment un camarade du lycée d'Iglau, Josef Steiner, son aîné et confident auquel il adressa en juin 1879, depuis les environs de Tétény, en Hongrie, une longue lettre qui n'est pas sans rappeler le « Testament d'Heiligenstadt » de Beethoven :

« Je suis devenu un autre. La plus intense joie de vivre et le sentiment le plus lancinant de la mort règnent tour à tour dans mon cœur mais je sais une chose : cela ne peut continuer ainsi ! Quelle issue peut-il y avoir sinon l'anéantissement de moi-même ? De toute l'énergie du désespoir, je m'accroche à la douleur qui est mon unique consolation. »

C'est ensuite Dieu lui-même qu'il accuse :

« Je te connais enfin, menteur (" Lügner ") . De la vallée de l'humanité, mes paroles doivent bien résonner à tes oreilles, là-haut sur tes hauteurs solitaires et froides. Comprends-tu enfin cette douleur indicible qui s'est amassée ici-bas pendant des millions de siècles et qui se dresse aujourd'hui comme une montagne. C'est sur le sommet de cette montagne que tu trônes sans doute avec ton rire sardonique ! Comment pourrais-tu donc répondre de cela un jour devant le Vengeur (" Rächter ") , toi qui n'as même pas su calmer la douleur d'une seule âme tourmentée. »

À ces lignes écrites le 17 juin, il ajoute le jour suivant une sorte d'auto-analyse :

« Rien ne parvient jamais à me réjouir vraiment et les larmes coulent même sur mon sourire le plus heureux. »

Il évoque alors la campagne et le paysage au bord du Danube où il aime se réfugier en des termes schubertiens :

« Les branches me bercent doucement comme les filles du Roi des Aulnes (" Erlkönig ") . Tout contre ma joue, je sens la caresse des fleurs et des feuilles de mon tilleul (" Lindenbaum ") bien-aimé. Nous voyons le joueur de vielle (" Leiermann ") , debout, tenant son chapeau dans ses mains décharnées. »

Après avoir évoqué des amis et lieux chers, ainsi que son frère Ernst mort à l'âge de 13 ans, Mahler décrit une vision :

« Les nuages s'éclaircissent et, tout à coup, comme dans une madone de Raphaël, apparaît une tête d'angelot et, au-dessous, Ahasverus avec toutes ses souffrances. Il voudrait monter vers lui et accéder à la félicité et à la rédemption mais l'ange s'envole en riant et disparaît. Ahasverus lui jette un regard d'une immense douleur puis, reprenant son bâton, poursuit sa marche, sans larmes, éternelle, immortelle. »

Le 3e jour, il conclut sa lettre en écrivant :

Mahler révèle ainsi, à la veille de son 19e anniversaire (le 7 juillet), non seulement ce qu'il appelle l'histoire de sa vie mais aussi certains aspects psychologiques de sa personnalité. Les allusions à Schubert ne sont pas dues au hasard. Son Maître et protecteur, Julius Epstein, était un fervent schubertien, éditeur des Sonates pour piano, à une époque où on les considérait comme des ébauches maladroites effacées par celles de Beethoven et où l'on préférerait noyer sous les vagues la permanence de la mort qui marque si fortement les destins viennois de Schubert et de Mahler. Le judaïsme et la judéité, voire leur rejet, sous-tendent clairement ce texte avec, en particulier, cette interpellation dramatique du Dieu inaccessible sur son Sinaï glacé, indifférent à l'égard de son peuple symbolisé clairement par Ahasverus, le Juif errant, traînant sa malédiction éternelle, n'ayant droit à la rédemption que dans l'anéantissement, selon la formule de Wagner à la fin de « Das Judentum in der Musik ».

Mahler reprend le même terme (« Selbstvernichtung ») et la même image de naufrage. Très jeune, il s'était fait membre de l'« Akademisches Wagnerverein », créé à Vienne en 1872. Il vit Wagner diriger 3 concerts entre octobre 1875 et mars 1876 mais n'osa pas l'aborder. La lecture de l'essai « Religion und Kunst », en 1880, le transporta au point de lui faire partager l'enthousiasme de Wagner pour le végétarisme et la théorie pour le moins originale de la consommation de viande comme cause du déclin du christianisme. Le 1er novembre, Gustav Mahler mentionnait dans une lettre à un ami qu'il était devenu végétarien complet et qu'il attendait du végétarisme la régénération de l'humanité. Selon le biographe de Mendelssohn, Eric Werner, Mahler aurait aussi affirmé très tôt que Wagner était le plus grand compositeur depuis Beethoven et qu'il serait bientôt reconnu partout comme un Maître alors que Mendelssohn sombrerait complètement dans l'oubli, ce qui paraît évidemment influencé par les thèses défendues dans les essais « Das Judentum in der Musik » (1850-1869) et « Zukunftsmusik » (Musique de l'avenir, 1861). Il n'est donc pas surprenant que Mendelssohn ne figurât pratiquement jamais au répertoire des concerts de Mahler. Celui-ci ne dirigea qu'une seule fois la « Symphonie écossaise » (Vienne, 1901) et la « Symphonie italienne » (New York, 1911), mais 167 fois, Wagner.

Cette conversion opportuniste coïncidait avec un intérêt personnel certain pour la culture germano-chrétienne, en même temps qu'avec une tiédeur manifeste vis-à-vis du judaïsme. Néanmoins, cela ne pouvait suffire à changer les convictions tenaces de ses adversaires les plus acharnés. En témoigne cette attaque du chef du Mouvement bourgeois antisémite, le chevalier Georg von Schönerer, après l'exécution sous la direction de Mahler de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven :

Mahler éprouvera durant toute sa vie les déchirements qui ont tourmenté tant d'autres Juifs convertis comme Heinrich Heine, Otto Weininger ou Ludwig Wittgenstein, le menant parfois comme ceux-ci à des réactions proches de l'antisémitisme. En revanche, il marquera toujours sa réprobation à l'égard des histoires antisémites qu'il entendait raconter autour de lui. Alma, qui se présente dans ses « Mémoires » comme une catholique devenue libre-penseuse à la lecture de Schopenhauer et de Nietzsche a raconté que dans ses discussions avec son mari sur des sujets religieux, celui-ci défendait toujours le christianisme, si bien qu'elle en vint à le qualifier de « juif chrétien » .

La foi chrétienne plutôt que le judaïsme trouvera place dans la musique de Mahler, grâce à la fraîcheur naïve du « Cor enchanté de l'enfant » (« Des Knaben Wunderhorn ») , célèbre recueil de poésies populaires qu'Achim von Arnim et Clemens Brentano ont collationnées à partir de 1803 dans les campagnes et les villes ou retrouvées dans les vieux almanachs et livres de prières. Curieusement, cette anthologie extrêmement riche a très peu intéressé les compositeurs Romantiques à l'exception de Robert Schumann (4 fois) et de Johannes Brahms (6 fois) . Mahler, le 1er, en exploitera véritablement les magnifiques possibilités musicales (au total, 24 fois) avec un goût marqué pour des poèmes à caractère ou sujet religieux. L'« Urlicht » (Lumière originelle) de la 2e Symphonie tout comme « Es sungen drei Engel einen süßen Gesang » (3 anges chantaient un doux chant) dans la 3e Symphonie comptent parmi les plus chargés de signification. Le Scherzo purement orchestral de la 2e Symphonie reprend la musique d'une mélodie sur Saint-Antoine prêchant aux poissons (Sankt Antonius fischpredigt) . À 3 reprises, Mahler a décrit le programme de cette 2e Symphonie. Même s'il l'a abandonné par la suite, ses commentaires restent révélateurs de ses intentions initiales. Le 1er mouvement reprend quasi textuellement un Poème symphonique antérieur intitulé « Todtenfeier » . Ce cérémonial funèbre est suivi d'un Andante rappelant les moments heureux de la vie avant que le Scherzo n'évoque avec une certaine ironie les interrogations métaphysiques et les sermons qui, comme ceux de Saint-Antoine, sont écoutés bouche-bée par les poissons curieux mais qui, le sermon fini, retournent aussitôt nager sans que rien soit changé. La parabole est claire mais Mahler la dramatise dans une lettre (décembre 1895) au critique Max Marschalk :

« Dénuée de sens paraît la vie, un affreux cauchemar dont on se réveille avec un cri de dégoût ! »

Après l'« Urlicht » qui ramène la sérénité confiante, « la voix touchante de la foi naïve » , l'énorme finale « Die große Appel » apporte la réponse de Mahler car, contrairement à ce que le titre « Auferstehung » (Résurrection) , provenant d'une Ode de Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock (1724-1803) , donne à penser, les 2 tiers du texte sont de Mahler lui-même. C'est en assistant aux funérailles d'Hans von Bülow, le 29 mars 1895, à la « Sankt Michælskirche » de Hambourg que Mahler entendit l'Ode de Klopstock chantée par le chœur avec accompagnement d'orgue sur une mélodie de cantique ou de choral protestant. Sitôt la cérémonie terminée, Mahler entama l'écriture du Finale de sa

Symphonie sur la base du sujet qui s'était ainsi brusquement révélé à lui. Il n'utilisa cependant que les 2 Ires strophes du poème original dont il supprima, en outre, le nom de Jésus-Christ et le refrain « Halleluiah ». Voulut-il ainsi écarter des accents trop explicitement chrétiens. Le problème d'une conversion officielle n'était pas encore posé et sa culture religieuse (sujet qui n'était pas davantage au 1er plan de ses préoccupations) restait surtout liée à l'Ancien Testament comme le montreront, 2 ans plus tard, ses réactions durant les leçons de catéchisme préparatoires à son baptême.

De quelle Résurrection s'agit-il donc ? Sans doute moins de celle définie par le « Credo » chrétien ou par l'iconographie de la pesée des âmes que d'un réveil des morts tel qu'il est évoqué dans l'Ancien Testament (Isaïe, XXVI, 19 ; et Ézéchiel, XXXVII, 12 et 27) dépourvu de véritable « Jugement dernier ». Le Talmud, la Michnah, Maïmonide dans son « Article sur la Résurrection » et beaucoup d'autres ont épilogué jusqu'aujourd'hui sur le sens à donner à la croyance en une résurrection et sur les conditions de sa réalisation. Le psychanalyste freudien Theodor Reik (1888-1969), né lui aussi en Bohême dans une famille juive, a consacré tout un livre à la 2e Symphonie de Mahler et, plus particulièrement, au thème de la résurrection dans son Finale. Le début de la dernière strophe peut être interprété comme l'immortalité que l'artiste conquiert par ses œuvres.

Avec des ailes que je me suis conquises / Je m'envolerai, je mourrai, afin de revivre

Mahler semble donc prendre ses distances à l'égard de la vision chrétienne du jugement des âmes, ce qu'accentueront le panthéisme et la référence nietzschéenne de la 3e Symphonie, puis le pessimisme fondamental des 6e, 9e et 10e Symphonies. Rien n'indique dans le cheminement des Symphonies une influence quelconque de la conversion de Mahler. À Alfred Roller qui lui demandait pourquoi il n'écrivait pas de Messe, il répondit que telle n'était pas son intention et que, de toute façon, il ne lui serait pas possible de mettre le « Credo » en musique. Peu après, lors d'une répétition de la 8e Symphonie, il lui lança :

« Voici ma Messe ! »

La Ire partie de cette Symphonie utilise le texte latin de l'hymne « Veni Creator Spiritus », attribué, sans doute à tort, à Raban Maur (784-856), un moine bénédictin qui devint Évêque de Mayence, tandis que la seconde repose sur la scène finale du « Second " Faust " » de Gœthe. Le 1er projet prévoyait 4 mouvements avec, au centre, un Scherzo et un Adagio intitulé « Caritas ». Le Finale portait le titre « Die Geburt des Eros » ou, plus tard, « Schöpfung durch Eros ». En dernière instance, seule la scène finale du « Second " Faust " » de Gœthe sera choisie pour servir de long second mouvement. Le rapprochement de 2 univers spirituels et poétiques aussi différents et d'autant plus intrigué que Mahler abandonne ici totalement les constantes populaires et tragiques de son inspiration au profit d'une double Cantate festive qui célèbre, en dehors de tout pessimisme, le pouvoir créateur de l'Esprit-Saint et de la vie avec l'« Éternel Féminin ». Unissant un texte liturgique latin à la poésie du plus illustre représentant de la littérature Romantique allemande, Mahler apporte un double tribut au christianisme et aux traditions culturelles germaniques. Il occupait alors depuis 9 ans, à la tête de l'Opéra de Vienne, le poste le plus prestigieux de la vie musicale autrichienne tandis que ses propres compositions étaient accueillies comme des événements, en dépit des controverses qu'elles pouvaient soulever. La plupart de ses adversaires reconnaissaient leurs mérites et ne contestaient pas la sincérité de l'artiste. Cette médaille dorée avait cependant son revers car rien ne semblait pouvoir effacer, dans certains milieux, le dogme wagnérien de l'impossibilité pour un Juif de représenter d'une façon pleinement valable la musique allemande. Pour eux, sa musique constituait un phénomène épisodique de mode, dû largement à son aspect spectaculaire que la 8e Symphonie, dite « des Mille », portait à son paroxysme. On attribuait son succès au soutien des milieux Libéraux et intellectuels, largement juifs, de Vienne ; mais, à l'aune du grand art éternel, profond, lourd de métaphysique généré par le sang et le sol germaniques, on estimait qu'une telle musique ne pouvait qu'être appelée à disparaître. Ces attaques régulièrement entretenues feront que l'interdiction de la musique de Gustav Mahler, à partir de 1933, ne soulèvera guère de protestations, même pas de ceux qui furent ses proches tel Richard Strauß (qui accepta sans hésiter la présidence de la « Reichsmusikkammer » chargée de l'élimination de la musique et des musiciens juifs) ou Hans Pfitzner.

La bibliographie du mépris

Mahler a vécu à Vienne à une époque où l'antisémitisme populaire, issu d'une tradition chrétienne millénaire, avait pris une dimension économique et sociale en réaction contre ce qui était perçu comme une concurrence juive se développant à tous les niveaux. Le Juif n'était plus ce corps étranger misérable traînant sa malédiction séculaire, il jouait à présent un rôle influent dans les circuits de la finance comme en témoigne la réussite des Rothschild, des Itzig, des Oppenheimer, des Mendelssohn ; il occupait également une fraction importante des postes d'enseignement supérieur, en médecine en particulier. Et voici qu'un petit Juif, venu des frontières de la Bohême et de la Moravie, s'empare à la fois de l'Opéra de Vienne, de la tradition symphonique beethovénienne, dont il revendique la succession, et de l'Orchestre wagnérien pour réaliser, à son tour, une musique de l'avenir et une autre religion de l'art !

Après le Festival germano-français, organisé en mai 1905 à Strasbourg, où Mahler était venu diriger sa 5e Symphonie et Richard Strauß sa « Sinfonia domestica », Romain Rolland, le Français qui comprenait alors le mieux la musique allemande, écrivit :

« C'est Beethoven qu'il veut être, ou Wagner. Il a tort : il lui manque leur équilibre et leur force herculéenne. »

Durant plus d'un demi-siècle, les musicologues allemands, mais parfois aussi français ou anglo-américains, vont dénoncer 100 fois, au nom de la culture européenne, cette appropriation contre-nature et cela bien avant que cette « défense » de la culture ne se transforme en un « Juden verboten ». Déjà légataires universels de l'héritage wagnérien, Cosima et Houston Stewart Chamberlain se feront les gardiens du temple de la culture germanique. Lorsque Mahler mit en scène l'Opéra oublié de Mozart, « Zaïde », sous la direction de Bruno Walter, Chamberlain écrivit à Cosima qu'il avait goûté grâce à la musique :

« Un des plaisirs les plus nobles et les plus délicats de sa vie, bien que, comme vous pouvez l'imaginer, tout cela a été joué avec une incompréhension vulgaire tout à fait monumentale. »

Cosima renchérit dans sa réponse, dénonçant l'influence de Mahler à Vienne qui « fait perdre aux gens toute leur pureté de perception ». Pureté (nationale, aryenne, raciale) et impureté (cosmopolite, sémite) seront les critères de toute une musicologie ou pseudo-musicologie pour laquelle ne suffit ni le passeport chrétien ni le témoignage d'une grande œuvre religieuse comme la 8e Symphonie de Mahler. Au contraire, la mégalomanie de la « Symphonie des Mille » et son immense succès lors de la création à Munich, en 1910, dans le plus grand des 6 halls construits pour l'Exposition de 1908, intensifieront les exaspérations. En honorant de leur présence cette création, les membres parmi les plus prestigieux de la vie culturelle allemande firent, en effet, de cet événement musical le plus important depuis l'inauguration de Bayreuth avec les représentations du « Ring », en 1876, ou la première de « Parsifal », en 1882. Il fut salué comme tel par Gerhard Hauptmann, Guido Adler, Paul Stefan qui virent en Mahler « un génie représentatif de la grande tradition allemande (Gerhard Hauptmann) ; un artiste « digne de figurer dans les rangs des grands Allemands » (Paul Stefan) . Un tel triomphe ne pouvait être au goût de tout le monde. On attribue à Hans Pfitzner ou Max von Schllings une réflexion ironique qu'ils répandirent avant la première :

« “ Veni Creator Spiritus ” ? Et si l'Esprit-Saint ne venait pas ? »

C'est ce que s'efforceront de prouver les contempteurs à l'aide d'arguments musicaux ou esthétiques souvent imprégnés de préjugés nationalistes ou racistes. Rudolf Louis, un biographe de Bruckner, attribua tout le succès de la Symphonie à la présence de Mahler, chef d'orchestre :

« Quiconque a jamais entendu une œuvre de Mahler avec un autre chef sait à quel point il reste alors peu de chose de cette musique. »

Et il ajoute :

« Mahler parle l'allemand avec l'accent, le rythme et les gestes du Juif par trop oriental. »

2 ans plus tard, dans un livre sur « La Musique allemande d'aujourd'hui » (Munich, 1912) , il dénonce de nouveau « le caractère foncièrement juif de Mahler, son ton de youpin, son inauthenticité repoussante même si son honnêteté subjective ne peut être mise en doute.

Pour Ludwig Schnittler du « Bayerische Kurier », Mahler « ne possède pas la plus infime capacité d'inventer une musique personnelle », rejoignant par ces propos la théorie wagnérienne de l'impuissance créatrice génétique.

Paul Ehlers de la revue berlinoise « Allgemeine Musikzeitung » ira plus loin encore, dénonçant la menace que les « fausses valeurs sémitiques » font peser sur l'art allemand :

« Plus Mahler lutte avec ferveur pour un art germano-catholique, plus s'affirme son caractère juif. »

Tout en prétendant n'avoir rien contre les Juifs et n'être pas raciste, il souligne que ceux-ci n'ont pas été capables de produire un grand compositeur et que, pour l'homme germanique, cette musique de couleur sémitique suscite un sentiment d'éloignement, d'étrangeté. 28 ans plus tard, à l'occasion du 50e anniversaire d'Hitler, le même Paul Ehlers saluera dans le « Zeitschrift für Musik » d'avril 1939 :

Le compositeur Max Reger avait écrit, peu après la mort de Mahler, au duc Georges II de Saxe-Meiningen :

« Tous ceux auxquels Dieu, notre Seigneur, a laissé pousser un nez sémitique sont naturellement des partisans convaincus de Mahler car les Juifs veulent à tout prix avoir un grand compositeur ! Pour être cela, il manque avant tout à Mahler du style et, sans ce style dont il est totalement dénué, aucune grande composition n'est pensable. Il me semble, et à beaucoup d'autres également, que Mahler est le Meyerbeer de notre temps ! Il y a chez tous les 2 une véritable intelligence sémitique, le travail à l'aide de moyens expressifs superficiels et l'absence de tout style. Comme disait Goethe : malheur à l'art dont on chante la louange dans toutes les rues ! »

Malgré la contradiction qu'il y a à décrire les musiciens juifs, à la fois, comme des imitateurs impuissants et, à la fois, comme dominant la culture allemande, ces arguments se retrouvent chez des auteurs comme Hans Joachim Moser (« Geschichte der Deutschen Musik », tome II, 1924) et Richard Eichenauer (« Musik und Rasse », 1932) , préparant ainsi le terrain pour les mesures brutales qui, dès l'arrivée d'Hitler au pouvoir, conduiront au bannissement de Mendelssohn et de Mahler de la vie musicale. Si les tentatives de substituer au 1er, soit le pur german Ludwig Spohr, ne furent guère couronnées de succès, il n'en est pas de même d'Anton Bruckner dont on fit, à l'aide de moyens musicologiques et médiatiques considérables, le substitut politiquement correct de la Symphonie mahlérienne.

Le retour à la liberté et à la dignité a permis à Mahler de conquérir enfin sa vraie place de plus important Symphoniste du début du XXe siècle et de traducteur incomparable de l'âme allemande dans ses mélodies avec Orchestre. Reste-t-il encore une place pour la judéité dans ces chefs-d'œuvre absolus de l'assimilation d'une culture germanique au rayonnement de laquelle Mahler a plus contribué que tout autre compositeur du XXe siècle ?

Felix Mendelssohn et le 3e « Reich »

La destruction de la statue du compositeur Felix Mendelssohn à Leipzig, dans la nuit du 9 au 10 novembre 1936, illustre la haine vouée à ce dernier par les autorités nazies. En s'en prenant à l'une des figures emblématiques du Romantisme allemand, 2 ans presque jour pour jour avant les pogroms de la « Nuit de Cristal » , le pouvoir veut alors faire passer un double message : d'une part, la poursuite de la politique de mise-au-pas et de purification de la vie musicale allemande entreprise dès la prise de pouvoir ; d'autre part, l'annonce que cette politique n'épargnera aucun des compositeurs juifs, fussent-ils de confession protestante, et aussi assimilés à la tradition musicale allemande que Mendelssohn. Dès avril 1933, l'Allemagne nazie se dote ainsi des outils juridiques et institutionnels de cette mise sous contrôle. La création de la « Reichskulturkammer », en septembre 1933, et de sa section musicale, la « Reichsmusikkammer » 2 mois plus tard, le développement du maillage territorial par la superposition des administrations et des organisations nazies, donnent au nouveau pouvoir les moyens juridiques et matériels de censurer la totalité de la vie musicale, ne se concentrant pas seulement sur les acteurs (compositeurs et interprètes) de cette dernière, mais surveillant également étroitement la conformité des programmes des manifestations publiques aux canons de la nouvelle politique.

Or, cette dernière est avant tout un antisémitisme. Mendelssohn, Mahler et Schönberg y joueront un rôle considérable, car à travers leur éradication, le pouvoir hitlérien mettra en place les prémisses culturelles du génocide qu'il s'emploiera plus tard à appliquer aux juifs européens. Mendelssohn tient dans ce dispositif une place particulière à cause de l'estime que lui portaient la plupart des compositeurs allemands de son temps, de Schumann à Brahms, et de son enracinement dans l'histoire de la musique nationale. De 1933 à 1938, sa disparition programmée de la mémoire culturelle allemande passera par 3 phases concomitantes : la 1^{re}, de caractère idéologique, est menée par les musicologues antisémites pour justifier esthétiquement la mise à l'écart du compositeur ; la seconde porte sur l'organisation par les autorités politiques de son éradication ; la 3^e enfin, examinera les problèmes soulevés par la très populaire musique-de-scène composée par Mendelssohn, en 1826, pour « le Songe d'une nuit d'été » de William Shakespeare.

Felix Mendelssohn et l'idéologie nazie

Lorsqu'il écrit « Mein Kampf », Adolf Hitler a parfaitement conscience de la nécessité de donner à l'antisémitisme une base scientifique solide :

« Le ton (des Ires brochures antisémites que j'ai lu) était tel qu'il faisait naître en moi des doutes, à cause de l'argumentation à la fois plate et extraordinairement anti-scientifique apportée au soutien de ses affirmations. »

À la même époque, il prenait soigneusement ses distances avec l'activisme primitif des Iers compagnons de route de son Parti. L'élargissement de son audience à des strates de la société jusqu'alors rebutées par ses vociférations de batteur d'estrade, leur adhésion à une vision totalitaire du monde, impliquaient le développement d'une argumentation dépassant le simple appel au pogrom. Le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (Ligue de combat pour la culture allemande) sera le cheval de Troie d'Alfred Rosenberg pour investir les milieux académiques et culturels et obtenir leur coopération afin d'élaborer une théorie des races scientifiquement fondée. Cette science des races, véritable « biologie nationale-socialiste », avait pour objectif tactique de conférer une aura de respectabilité à un discours politique cantonné jusqu'alors à l'imprécation. À plus long terme, cette pseudo-science servira, après la prise de pouvoir, à justifier l'extermination des juifs.

Le « Dictionnaire des Juifs dans la Musique » des musicologues nazis Theo Stengel et Herbert Gerick, paru en 1940, constitue un bon exemple de la phraséologie nazie en matière d'antisémitisme musical, et consacre plus de 2 pages à Felix Mendelssohn. Comme il était difficile, même à l'antisémite le plus acharné, de l'accuser de bolchévisme culturel (« Kulturbolschewismus »), concept par lequel les conservateurs allemands dénonçaient, à partir de 1918, les différents courants de la Nouvelle Musique, censée porter atteinte à l'intégrité culturelle de l'Allemagne défaite, le pouvoir national-socialiste s'acharnera à démontrer que le seul fait qu'il fût juif justifiait la mise à l'écart du compositeur et de son œuvre. L'article qui lui est consacré synthétise ainsi les positions avancées par les différents théoriciens. Rappelons que ce dictionnaire rassemblait environ 10,000 noms de musiciens juifs de toutes qualités, indiquant également leur ville de résidence. Il constituait ainsi un parfait outil de délation, non seulement pour s'assurer qu'aucun d'entre eux ne puisse exercer une quelconque activité professionnelle sur le territoire allemand, mais aussi dans la perspective de la solution finale qui allait être mise en place peu de temps après sa parution.

L'article consacré à Mendelssohn, rappelant sa filiation comme fils de banquier et petit-fils de Moses Mendelssohn, le « rationaliste des Lumières » (entre guillemets dans le texte) , présente sa situation éminente dans l'histoire du Romantisme allemand comme le produit d'une légende inventée par ses co-religionnaires. La redécouverte de Bach qui lui est attribuée ne serait qu'une falsification. Mendelssohn ne serait d'ailleurs pas un Romantique allemand, car en composant ses « Chansons sans paroles » , il aurait renié fanatiquement une des caractéristiques essentielles de ces derniers, celle de s'appuyer sur les textes de chansons populaires tels qu'avaient pu les réunir Herder, Arnim et Brentano. Il serait même un internationaliste (qualité éminemment juive) combattant d'Angleterre le principe de musique nationale propre au Romantisme. Les auteurs du Dictionnaire reprennent ensuite les diverses critiques antisémites de Richard Wagner dont parlera tout à l'heure Philippe Olivier et sur lesquelles nous n'insisterons donc pas, concluant en se référant à l'ouvrage de Karl Blessinger, « Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mahler » , 3 chapitres du « Judaïsme dans la musique » comme clé de l'histoire musicale du 19e siècle, paru en 1939 :

« Blessinger a prouvé que Mendelssohn (comme type de juif assimilé) appartient à la longue série de représentants de cette race qui ont consciemment détourné de son sens notre patrimoine culturel dans une perspective juive pour en organiser la falsification. »

Blessinger lui-même, dans l'ouvrage cité, tente de démontrer à quel point tout au long du XIXe siècle, les juifs ont organisé un complot contre la musique allemande. Sans revenir sur certains des arguments évoqués plus haut, il prétend par exemple que Mendelssohn ne s'est intéressé à la « Passion Saint-Matthieu » de Bach qu'afin que « le Judaïsme puisse prétendre s'imposer sur l'une des plus grandes créations allemandes » . Il cherche également à prouver que les juifs cherchèrent à maintenir artificiellement les œuvres de l'auteur de la « Symphonie écossaise » , et cite le cas (fantasmagorique) du violoniste Joseph Joachim qui aurait tout fait pour retirer le Concerto pour violon de Schumann afin qu'il ne fasse pas d'ombre à celui de Mendelssohn.

Un autre théoricien des relations entre race et musique, Richard Eichenauer, qui publia en 1932, un ouvrage intitulé « Musik und Rasse » (Musique et Race) , s'acharne sur notre compositeur. Adhérent de la cause nationale-raciste au Front Nordique dès 1923, puis du NSDAP en 1932, ce professeur de langues rejoint la même année le Bureau de la Race et de l'Installation de la SS, chargé de surveiller la pureté raciale de l'organisation, où il occupera le grade de lieutenant. Dans « Musik und Rasse » , Eichenauer fait abondamment référence aux théories raciales de l'anthropologue Hans Friedrich Karl Günther. Ce dernier, après avoir distingué 6 races européennes (nordique, dinarique, occidentale, orientale-alpine, baltico-orientale, phaelienne) , place à leur tête la race nordique, celle des chefs et des grandes civilisations. Selon Eichenauer, qui reprend à cet égard une théorie formulée par un autre musicologue raciste, Hans-

Joachim Moser, la musique européenne a été dominée par un combat entre les races nordiques et orientales. Cette opposition atteint son apogée au 19^e siècle avec l'émancipation des juifs, appartenant à la race orientale, dont certains sont assez habiles pour s'approprier les caractéristiques stylistiques de la musique nordique. Mendelssohn en est le parfait exemple dont le visage montre « un mélange de caractères à la fois moyen-oriental et juif oriental » . Tout comme Moser, il reproche à la musique de Mendelssohn sa superficialité, manquant ainsi du poids propre au « grand homme » dans la tradition nordique, et l'accuse d'être simplement un virtuose creux.

De nombreux autres musicologues ou personnalités du monde musical allemand emboîtent le pas à ces travaux soi-disant scientifiques pour s'attirer les grâces du régime. Ainsi Willy Strecker, propriétaire de la maison d'édition musicale Schott à Mayence (éditeur entre autres compositeurs juifs, de Erich Wolfgang Korngold et Ernst Toch) , déclare-t-il que les juifs n'ont aucun pouvoir créatif. Ils savent en revanche imiter, mais leur brillance et leur supériorité technique les conduisent à la superficialité, au maniérisme et à la trivialité. Et Strecker de déclarer que la musique de Mendelssohn écrit une musique « sucrée » , et que des œuvres comme « le Songe d'une Nuit d'été » étaient suspecte à cause de leur douceur creuse et semblable « à une anguille » .

Mendelssohn est également accusé d'être un plagiaire, et d'avoir imité Franz Schubert. Par ailleurs, sa musique, comme celle de tout compositeur juif, présente une dégénérescence du sentiment allemand en sentimentalité, dont la féminité s'oppose à l'héroïsme du Beethoven de la « Symphonie héroïque » , par exemple. Plus généralement, Mendelssohn est présenté par certains auteurs, tout comme Gustav Mahler, comme étant celui des musiciens juifs qui a le plus acquis un vernis allemand, parce que dans sa jeunesse, il aurait voulu être allemand et non juif, et parce qu'il maîtrisait à un tel point la technique de composition qu'il pouvait s'insérer dans une culture étrangère (l'allemande) sans être démasqué par l'auditeur moyen. Il appartenait donc aux musicologues du « Reich » de fournir aux autorités culturelles et au public les éléments permettant d'éclairer leur jugement afin d'échapper à la dictature de Mendelssohn et de ses co-religionnaires.

L'exécution de la musique de Felix Mendelssohn sous le National-Socialisme

Préparée par les théoriciens d'un antisémitisme scientifique appliqué à la musique comme Eichenhauer, Blessinger ou Moser, le pouvoir nazi ne tarda pas à mettre en place une politique de mise-au-pas de la vie musicale allemande, avec pour but d'en exclure tout élément jugé contraire à l'idéal national-socialiste. Cette politique résulte non d'un pouvoir unique et centralisé, mais de multiples officines aux influences contradictoires, guidées avant tout par la volonté de prendre l'ascendant au sein de la hiérarchie nazie. Étant donné le rôle joué par la musique dans la vie culturelle allemande, et le nombre considérable d'institutions et d'hommes qui en dépendent, il s'agit bien d'une lutte interne de pouvoir. Comme l'a souligné Hannah Arendt, chaque administration publique est par exemple doublée par une organisation du Parti nazi souvent concurrente. Les organisations nationales-socialistes elles-mêmes, qu'elles relèvent des différents échelons géographiques du Parti, ou d'organisations contrôlées par le Ministre de la Propagande Josef Gœbbels, l'idéologue Alfred Rosenberg, ou l'organisateur de la politique de loisirs nazie, Robert Ley, émettent des instructions contradictoires qui brouillent souvent les pistes. Dans le cas Mendelssohn, au nombre de ces organisations doit s'ajouter l'influent « Cercle de Bayreuth » qui continuera à colporter, en les radicalisant, les analyses de Richard Wagner au sujet du compositeur. Il n'est pas étonnant qu'il ait fallu ainsi 5 ans à cette politique pour se coordonner, la « Nuit de Cristal » des 8 et 9 novembre 1938 marquant, à cet égard, un point de non retour en ce qui concerne le déterminisme antisémite absolu de ses contenus.

Dans ce cadre, Mendelssohn fait l'objet d'une attention toute particulière des autorités nazies. Sa position essentielle dans la vie musicale allemande, la popularité d'œuvres comme son Concerto pour violon, la « Symphonie italienne » ou la musique-de-scène pour « le Songe d'une nuit d'été » de Shakespeare, restaient toujours incontestées en 1933. Peu de temps après sa création, la même année, la Chambre de la musique du « Reich » émet diverses instructions (plus ou moins suivies d'effets) interdisant l'exécution de la musique du compositeur. Certains catalogues d'œuvres (consacrés notamment à la musique chorale) font figurer devant celles de Mendelssohn la mention : « Ne doit pas être chanté pendant les concerts du Parti national-socialiste ». Un zèle tout particulier anime les NSKG (« National-sozialistische Kulturgemeinde » : Communautés culturelles nationales-socialistes) d'Alfred Rosenberg, idéologue radical du Nazisme, dont le responsable du département musical, Friedrich Herzog, déclare en 1937 :

« Une période illustre ne souffre aucun compromis. Si certains chœurs confessionnels ne veulent pas le comprendre, et, comme c'est arrivé récemment dans une ville rhénane, introduisent en fraude du Mendelssohn dans un concert simplement sans le nommer, il faut alors se poser la question de la confiance que l'on peut accorder à de tels chefs d'orchestre qui frapperont avec la dernière énergie à la moindre porte de service pour saboter consciemment nos entreprises de purification musicale. »

Ce zèle ne rencontre pas l'unanimité, même chez les théoriciens antisémites, comme par exemple Hans-Joachim Moser, qui écrit :

« Personne ne l'a plus admiré que Schumann, Brahms, Bülow et Reger - cela devrait donner à penser à tous ces petits Maîtres qui aujourd'hui se croient capables de remplacer Mendelssohn. »

Wilhelm Furtwängler et la Philharmonie de Berlin joueront encore des extraits du « Songe d'une nuit d'été », en 1933 et 1934. Le Concerto pour violon sera lui-même donné par le violoniste Wolfgang Schneiderhan sous la direction de Carl Schuricht, en 1934. Le boycott ne s'applique d'ailleurs pas aux interprètes étrangers qui pourront ainsi, comme l'écossais Frédéric Lamond, consacrer une soirée entière à notre compositeur, en 1935. Ici et là, des chœurs sont chantés, mais de plus en plus furtivement. De fait, l'hostilité du régime vis-à-vis de l'auteur des « Variations sérieuses » est affirmée de façon si appuyée, que très rares sont les artistes qui osent prendre le risque de maintenir ses œuvres dans leur répertoire. En 1938, la cause est entendue, et Mendelssohn disparaît totalement des programmes des concerts. Des concerts peut-être, mais pas encore des magasins de musique ou de disques. L'éditeur berlinois Bote & Bock publie encore, en 1938, des œuvres de compositeurs juifs, dont Mendelssohn à côté de compositeurs estampillés nazi bon-teint, et cela malgré les instructions données à ce sujet par Josef Goebbels, 2 années auparavant. Une incohérence comparable se retrouve dans les catalogues discographiques. L'une des principales compagnies allemandes, « Telefunken », exportait encore, en 1939, un enregistrement du Concerto pour violon.

Dans la réalité cependant (même si l'on peut imaginer que, dans le cadre de la « Hausmusik », Mendelssohn figurât encore parmi les compositeurs joués en famille, malgré les risques de dénonciation), notre compositeur disparaît de la vie musicale. À 2 exceptions près, l'une importante, puisqu'il s'agit des concerts donnés dans le cadre du « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (l'Union culturelle juive) ; l'autre, beaucoup plus marginale, celle des camps.

Rappelons que le « Jüdischer Kulturbund » fut créé à Berlin, en juillet 1933, à l'issue de négociations entre les associations représentant la communauté juive et le Ministère de la Propagande représenté à cette occasion par Hans Hinkel. La création d'un « Kulturbund » (Union culturelle) répondait à un double objectif : il fallait, d'une part, rassurer les artistes juifs (musiciens, acteurs, artistes de music-hall) qui, après avoir perdu leur emploi, retrouveraient ainsi du travail et la possibilité de créer ; et, d'autre part, stabiliser émotionnellement la communauté juive, au sein d'une organisation défendant une culture juive pour les juifs, à l'écart de la population allemande. Sous l'impulsion des diverses communautés régionales, la création d'associations culturelles juives dans les différentes régions allemandes, à la suite de celle de Berlin, avait entraîné la formation d'Orchestres et de divers ensembles de musique de chambre ou vocale. Il existait ainsi des Orchestres symphoniques à Mannheim, Francfort, Stuttgart et Berlin, qui étaient, ainsi que les autres formations de ces associations culturelles (chœurs, ensembles de musique de chambre, etc.) , les seuls en Allemagne habilités à jouer les œuvres de compositeurs juifs, dont Mendelssohn sera l'un des principaux. De ce dernier seront notamment donnés les grands Oratorios bibliques.

L'un des principaux problèmes auxquels eurent à faire face les différents « Kulturbünde » à travers l'Allemagne nouvelle, outre de récurrents problèmes financiers, fut l'exil progressif des meilleurs musiciens qui constituaient l'ossature de ses divers Orchestres ou formations. Tant et si bien que les diverses associations furent amenées à faire appel à des artistes juifs étrangers pour maintenir le niveau des concerts. La contralto Sabine Kalter, en exil à Londres, vint ainsi chanter des Lieder de Mendelssohn et Mahler, à Berlin, au printemps de 1937. Le « Kulturbund » fut interdit après la « Nuit de Cristal » , ses associations locales dissoutes, et fut ré-organisé en 1939, à partir de Berlin, où restait encore un chœur de chambre au programme duquel figurait des œuvres de Mendelssohn.

La musique de Mendelssohn sera aussi présente dans les camps de concentration. La création d'un grand nombre d'orchestres, créés avec l'assentiment ou sur l'ordre des commandants des camps, qu'il s'agisse des camps d'origine (Auschwitz, Auschwitz-Monowitz, Dachau, Mittelbau-Dora, Großrosen, Mauthausen, Natzweiler, Neuengamme, Janowska) , des détachements extérieurs (Blechhammer, Ebensee, Falkensee, Fürstengrubbe, Gleiwitz I. , Gollerschau, Gusen, Jawischowitz, Trawniki) , ou des camps d'extermination (Auschwitz-Birkenau, Belzec, Majdanek, Sobibor ou Treblinka) , illustre la réalité et l'intensité de cette vie musicale. Bien qu'il existât déjà des Orchestres (« Lagerkappelle ») dans certains d'entre eux, c'est une ordonnance du Bureau central de la sécurité du « Reich » , d'août 1942, qui en institua officiellement la création dans les principaux camps. Celui de Buchenwald avait été créé dès 1938 ; celui de Floßenbürg en 1940 ; le principal Orchestre de Dachau, au début de l'année 1941. L'ordonnance d'août 1942 améliora la situation des ensembles existants, et déclencha la création de nombreuses autres formations, comme celle de Mauthausen. Généralement forts d'une trentaine de musiciens, recrutés exclusivement parmi les prisonniers, ces Orchestres disposaient d'instruments provenant souvent des pillages nazis.

Au camp de Dachau, ouvert dès 1933, un groupe de détenus, musiciens amateurs, avait obtenu l'autorisation de constituer un Orchestre de salon à partir de 1940, qui donnait des concerts de musique légère pour divertir les « kapos » du camp. Au début de 1941, le commandant du camp décida la création d'un véritable Orchestre, dont le répertoire intégra rapidement quelques Classiques favoris comme la 2e « Rhapsodie hongroise » de Franz Liszt ; les Ouvertures d' « Orphée aux enfers » de Jacques Offenbach, de « la Pie voleuse » de Gioachino Rossini, ou de « Poète et paysan » de Franz von Suppé. Il existait également un Orchestre à cordes, formé par un musicien hollandais de la radio d'Eindhoven, au programme duquel figuraient des œuvres de Tommaso Giordani, Händel, Mozart, Beethoven et Grieg, et qui donna également le Concerto pour violon de Mendelssohn sous un faux nom de compositeur pour éviter la censure des autorités du camp.

Le ghetto de Terezín, créé en 1941 à l'ouest de Prague, est l'unique lieu de concentration des juifs européens où se développa, avec l'assentiment des autorités nazies et dans un but de propagande, une véritable vie culturelle. La population du ghetto, formée de nombreux artistes, médecins et intellectuels, comportait en son sein un grand nombre de musiciens autour desquels se développèrent plusieurs Orchestres, chœurs ou formations de chambre, qui donnaient des concerts réguliers. Mendelssohn figurait largement au programme de ces manifestations, notamment son Oratorio « Elias », donné entre autre à l'été 1944 sous la direction de Karl Fischer avec un chœur de 80 chanteurs accompagné par 2 pianos. Survivant de Terezín et d'Auschwitz, le violoniste Karel Fröhlich, qui émigra aux États-Unis, en 1948, raconte :

« J'ai plus joué à Terezín que dans ma " vie civile ". Je m'éveillais souvent à 3 heures du matin. À 4 heures, je commençais à travailler tout le répertoire pour violon : les Concertos de Brahms, Tchaïkovski, Sibelius, Mendelssohn. »

Le « Songe d'une nuit d'été » : aventures et nouvelles aventures

La très populaire musique de scène du « Songe d'une nuit d'été » est une parfaite illustration du « problème Mendelssohn » tel qu'il se posa au monde culturel nazi. Dès 1934, la pression mise sur les institutions culturelles par le nouveau pouvoir pour, comme on l'a vu, bannir les œuvres de Mendelssohn de la vie musicale allemande, incita certains théâtres à chercher des solutions alternatives au chef-d'œuvre de notre compositeur.

Une Ire remarque s'impose à cet égard. La pièce de Shakespeare avait suscité, bien avant 1933, d'autres musiques d'accompagnement. Pour faire court, on se limitera à évoquer celles de Bernhard Paumgartner à Vienne, en 1924, ou d'Ernst Křenek (archétype du « bolchéviste de la musique » dont la création de l'Opéra « Jonny spielt auf ! », en 1926, suscita en Allemagne et en Autriche des manifestations d'une rare violence, organisées par les Partis nazis de ces pays respectifs) pour le Festival de Heidelberg en 1926. Plus proche de nous peut être aussi évoqué l'Opéra éponyme de Benjamin Britten, composé en 1960. Pour le cinéma, Hans May avait écrit une partition dès 1925, sans oublier la Ire collaboration d'Erich Wolfgang Korngold avec Hollywood pour le film éponyme de Max Reinhardt, pour lequel le compositeur n'arrangea d'ailleurs rien d'autre que la partition de Mendelssohn. Dans tous ces cas, il s'agit d'œuvres suscitées par un besoin créatif, celui d'un compositeur émerveillé par le texte de Shakespeare, ou celui d'un metteur-en-scène cherchant auprès d'un compositeur contemporain une partition plus conforme à sa vision de l'œuvre que celle de Mendelssohn : toutes démarches inspirées par des conceptions et projets esthétiques parfaitement honorables.

Sous le Nazisme, l'apparition de plus d'une quarantaine de nouvelles partitions pour la pièce relève d'une toute autre démarche : il s'agit, pour des raisons raciales, d'éradiquer le chef-d'œuvre du compositeur d' « Elias » de la vie musicale. Dès 1934, le processus se met en marche, et les productions recourant à la partition traditionnelle se raréfient rapidement : si, le 10 avril 1934, celle-ci est encore utilisée à Ulm, elle n'est plus présente au mois de juin 1934, dans une représentation sur la scène de plein-air du Musée de Brandebourg, à Berlin, que diffusée sur disques, l'auteur et les morceaux restant anonymes. On peut citer encore quelques autres productions l'utilisant encore (ainsi, à Pâques 1935, au théâtre de Meiningen) avant sa disparition en juin 1937, date de sa dernière utilisation au théâtre municipal de Brandenburg / Havel.

Parallèlement, 2 des plus hautes autorités du Reich, le Ministre de la Propagande Josef Gœbbels, et le directeur de l'organisation nationale-socialiste de loisirs Kraft durch Freude (la force par la joie), Robert Ley, cherchent à inciter les compositeurs aryens à écrire une par autorités du « Reich », le Ministre de la Propagande, Josef Gœbbels, et le directeur de l'organisation nationale-socialiste de loisirs « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF : la force par la joie) , Robert Ley, cherchent à inciter les compositeurs aryens à écrire une partition de substitution à celle de Mendelssohn. La pièce de Shakespeare reste, en effet, très jouée sous le Nazisme, ne connaissant pas moins de 11 nouvelles productions en 1933 ; 20 en 1934 ; 11 en 1935 ; 13 en 1936 ; 12 en 1937 ; 17 en 1938 et 1939 ; et 20 en 1940. Le brusque accroissement du nombre de productions, entre 1933 (11) et 1934 (20) , semble traduire un retour à la confiance des directeurs de théâtre grâce à l'apparition de solutions de substitution à la partition traditionnelle.

Ces dernières se rangent en 2 catégories, celles compilant de la musique d'autres compositeurs, d'une part, et les partitions originales, d'autre part. Relèvent par exemple de la compilation, un arrangement de la musique d' « Obéron » de Carl Maria von Weber, réalisé en 1934 par Ernst Balzer. Des œuvres peu connues de Weber fourniront aussi le matériau d'une autre de ces compilations en 1937, à Königsberg. Au rang de ces pots-pourris aurait pu également figurer ce qui allait devenir en réalité la 1re musique originale « aryenne » du chef-d'œuvre de Shakespeare, celle du compositeur Edmund Nick, présentée le 15 septembre 1934, au Grand Théâtre de Berlin, récemment rebaptisé en Théâtre du Peuple. Nick avait d'abord travaillé sur des fragments de « The Fairy Queen » de Henry Purcell avant de se décider à écrire sa propre partition. Il fera par ailleurs carrière comme arrangeur d'œuvres proscrites, les « aryennisant » pour le compte du Bureau du « Reich » des Arrangements musicaux, en les débarrassant de toutes références qui, de prêt ou de loin, pouvaient rappeler les origines juives de leurs auteurs ou compositeurs.

Le moins que l'on puisse dire est que l'opération ne fut pas couronnée de succès. Même chez ceux des critiques dont l'engagement national-socialiste ne pouvait être mis en doute, l'idée de remettre en cause le chef-d'œuvre de Mendelssohn ne pouvait qu'être vouée à l'échec. Le très influent critique Fritz Stege écrivait alors dans la « Revue berlinoise de Musique » :

« Que l'on puisse avancer des doutes justifiés contre Mendelssohn, n'empêche pas que Mendelssohn a capté le mystère de la forêt d'une manière qui reste unique par son atmosphère. Nick aurait pu apprendre de Mendelssohn, comment se conformer à l'essence d'un projet dramatique, sans s'égarer dans un humour musical déplacé ou de la triviale musique de salon. Je passe aussi sur le fait de savoir lequel des 2 mérite le plus le reproche de sentimentalité. Il faut aussi constater que la soi-disant sentimentalité de Mendelssohn n'est pas prouvée dans son essence, mais seulement dans la falsification de son style d'interprétation. Non : il ne convient au « Songe d'une nuit d'été » que la musique de Mendelssohn. Aucun arrangeur ne tirera d'honneur à porter atteinte à ce chef-d'œuvre artistique. »

Quelques semaines après, la contradiction est apportée à Stege par Friedrich Herzog, directeur du département musical des NSKG (Communautés culturelles nationales-socialistes) d'Alfred Rosenberg, qui, bien que n'ayant pas apprécié la musique de Nick, propose de commander des partitions alternatives à 5 compositeurs en vue à l'époque : Werner Egl, Gottfried Müller, Hans Pfitzner (figure importante de l'antisémitisme musical allemand), Rudolf Wagner-Regeny et Julius Weismann. Seuls les 2 derniers accepteront.

Il est important de noter ici que cette surenchère dépasse largement l'œuvre de Mendelssohn. Elle traduit, en effet, la lutte de pouvoir que se livrent, par messagers interposés, les 2 principales tendances de la vie culturelle nazie, représentée l'une par Goebbels, l'autre par Rosenberg, et qui se poursuivra jusqu'en 1938. Si Rosenberg représente la fraction idéologique la plus radicale du National-Socialisme, Goebbels tente, jusqu'à 1935, d'être l'apôtre d'une forme modérée d'ouverture esthétique, quand bien même son activisme antisémite est au moins aussi violent que celui de son adversaire. Dans la « question Mendelssohn », Stege d'un côté, membre de la présidence de la « Reichsmusikkammer » (Chambre de la musique du « Reich »), composante de la « Reichskulturkammer » (Chambre de la Culture du « Reich »), présidée par Goebbels, et Herzog, porte-parole de Rosenberg, s'opposent comme ils s'opposent quelques mois plus tard dans l'affaire Furtwängler / Hindemith. Le célèbre chef d'orchestre avait publiquement pris fait et cause pour le compositeur, mis en cause par les Nazis les plus radicaux pour son « Kulturbolschewismus ». Dans cette dernière affaire, Hitler soutiendra les vues de Rosenberg. Comme le montrent ses carnets, Goebbels n'était pas dupe des dommages causés à la culture allemande par la mise-au-pas systématique prônée par Rosenberg et ses sbires, comme en témoigne son attitude lorsqu'il découvrit que Johann Strauß, compositeur favori du « Führer », avait des ascendances juives :

Quoiqu'il en soit, la partition du « Volksdeutscher » Wagner-Regeny, né en Transylvanie, écrite à partir du dépeçage d'un Concerto pour piano dont il était mécontent, fut créée lors du 3e congrès des NSKG à Düsseldorf, le 6 juin 1935. De forme néo-Baroque, intégrant des éléments proches du jazz (dans les limites du tolérable selon les canons nazis), elle reçut un accueil plutôt mitigé dans la presse, qui écrivait par exemple :

« La réalité de sa caractérisation (des personnages) est très peu différenciée, recourant à des tournures orchestrales inhabituellement simplistes ; le compositeur utilise, par exemple, pour la « Marche des Elfes » presque les mêmes accents de cuivres et roulement de tambour que pour celle des artisans. »

La musique de Weismann ne fut guère plus appréciée.

Plus prudents, les compositeurs reconnus qui avaient approchés par le régime, y compris et surtout ceux écrivant encore dans un style Romantique, même tardif, tels Hans Pfitzner et Richard Strauß, déclinèrent l'offre, déclarant ne rien pouvoir proposer de supérieur à l'œuvre de Mendelssohn. Cela n'empêcha par une ribambelle de plunitifs moins scrupuleux de s'atteler à la tâche : qu'ils se nomment Alfred Irmeler, chef à l'Opéra de Weimar dirigé alors par le commissaire d'État Hans Severus Ziegler, proche du clan Wagner et futur responsable de l'exposition « Entartete Musik » de Düsseldorf de 1938, qui composa une partition en septembre 1935 ; Werner Creuzburg, en octobre 1935 ; Robert Tants, en juillet 1937, pour n'en citer que quelques uns. Tous échouèrent, renvoyant à l'oubli cet épisode de la vie politico-musicale nazie, qui aurait pu n'être que ridicule s'il n'avait en réalité traduit l'acharnement du National-Socialisme à détruire toute trace de Mendelssohn, et partant, de l'ensemble des artistes d'origine juive, dans la culture allemande.

Certains de ceux qui contribuèrent à cette mascarade firent, après la guerre, amende honorable, tel Albert Imler déjà mentionné, ou une personnalité bien plus célèbre : Carl Orff. Celui-ci reçut, en avril 1938, la commande d'une nouvelle partition de la part de la ville de Francfort, représentée par son maire, Fritz Krebs, Nazi historique, ancien directeur régional de la Ligue de Combat pour la Culture allemande d'Alfred Rosenberg, directeur du Parti National-Socialiste de la région de Francfort, membre du conseil de la Chambre de Musique du « Reich », Hans Meißner, Intendant des scènes municipales de Francfort, et son adjoint Friedrich Bethge, « Obersturmführer » de la SS. Il reçut pour sa composition la somme de 5,000 « Reichsmark ». L'œuvre fut achevée en juin 1939, et reçut à nouveau un accueil mitigé, souffrant peu la comparaison inévitable avec l'œuvre de Mendelssohn. Orff tentera après la guerre de se justifier, déclarant qu'il était mécontent de l'œuvre, et qu'il n'avait fait que réaliser un projet qu'il aurait eu dans ses cartons depuis 1917, sur lequel il aurait travaillé à nouveau avant 1933 : bref, il s'agirait non pas d'une contribution au patrimoine musical du Nazisme, mais sa partition s'identifierait au contraire à celui de la République de Weimar.

Les 2 dernières partitions de substitution datent de 1944. La Ire, pot-pourri Baroque, fut créée au Théâtre de Braunschweig, le 16 juin de cette année ; l'autre, due à la plume de Franz Anton Wolpert, n'atteignit jamais la consécration publique puisque le théâtre d'État du gouvernement général de Cracovie, pour lequel elle était destinée, avait fermé ses portes lorsqu'elle fut achevée. Elle connut cependant une exécution concertante. Tout comme la musicologie nazie n'hésita pas à publier ses ouvrages racistes jusqu'à l'effondrement du 3e « Reich », lorsque ne résonnait plus sur l'Allemagne que le fracas des bombes (on pense ici à l'« Histoire de la Musique Allemande » de Karl Blessinger, publiée également en 1944), les autorités musicales nazies s'acharnèrent jusqu'à la fin pour faire disparaître toute trace de l'œuvre de Mendelssohn. Quelques mois plus tard, le 16 octobre 1944, le Nazisme déportait en bloc la quasi-totalité des musiciens et compositeurs du ghetto de « Theresienstadt » vers Auschwitz, où la plupart furent immédiatement assassinés. Mendelssohn se releva immédiatement de cette folie destructrice. Il en va malheureusement autrement des centaines, voire des milliers d'autres compositeurs juifs ou réprimés pour leur esthétique que le Nazisme persécuta. Pour beaucoup d'entre eux, l'Histoire est encore à écrire.

Olivier Lussac : « Musica Falsa » n° 8, avril - mai 1999, Ire partie, pages 25-27 et n° 9, juin - juillet - août 1999, 2e partie, pages 50-51.

« Celui qui est resté passif sait qu'il s'est rendu moralement coupable chaque fois qu'il a manqué à l'appel, faute d'avoir saisi n'importe quelle occasion d'agir pour protéger ceux qui se trouvaient menacés, pour diminuer l'injustice, pour résister. » (Karl Jaspers, « La Culpabilité allemande », 1948.)

L'idéologie Nationale-Socialiste, on le sait, commence par l'antisémitisme qui, en musique, a plusieurs sources. Aucune ne devrait être négligée. Pourtant, l'une des plus fortes et des plus claires fut celle de Richard Wagner qui publia, en septembre 1850, un essai intitulée « Judenthum in der Musik » (Judaïsme dans la musique) , dans lequel il s'attaque non seulement à Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, mais aussi à Giacomo Meyerbeer. À la lecture de cet essai, Franz Liszt, scandalisé, demanda des explications. Wagner y répondit de manière éloquente, le 18 avril 1851 : « Meyerbeer représente quelque chose de particulier pour moi : je ne le hais pas, mais il me dégoûte profondément. » . À la fois, Wagner était attiré par la puissance musicale de son collègue et, en même temps, le haïssait profondément, à cause du succès obtenu à Paris en 1840-1841. De même, sa relation avec Heinrich Heine était conflictuelle et son admiration exagérée tourna bien vite en rejet, jusqu'au moment où il déclara dans son essai que Heine était submergé « par les démons impitoyables de la négation » . Wagner accepta partiellement les théories raciales de Gobineau et, finalement, identifia les juifs aux diables. En 1881, le Théâtre du « Ring » à Vienne brûla et Wagner raconta à sa femme Cosima que tous les juifs devraient alors brûler dans un spectacle de « Nathan » .

Cette attaque si forte contre le juif, à la fin du texte, représentait pour Adolf Hitler une source précieuse pour sa « solution finale » . En tout cas, l'idéologie nazie devait pratiquer une relation entre les formes de l'art et les formes de société.

L'antisémitisme des musiciens allemands n'était pas seulement provoqué par les succès indéniables de Felix Mendelssohn-Baltholdy, Giacomo Meyerbeer ou même Jacques Offenbach, mais encore causé par la « musique répugnante » d'un Arnold Schœnberg, qui fut l'objet d'attaques et de dénonciations directes, précisément parce qu'il possédait une forte individualité.

Après la Première Guerre mondiale, la musique atonale représentait même l'équivalent de la musique bolchévique et de l'internationalisme juif. De tels jugements se trouvaient par exemple dans la revue « Zeitschrift Für Musik » dirigée en 1920 par le compositeur Hans Pfitzner. Comme de nombreux conservateurs, ce dernier se considérait apolitique. Cependant, au milieu de la Première Guerre, il dédia son « Deutsche Gesänge » à l'amiral von Tirpitz et, après la fondation de la République de Weimar, parla de la maladie sociale. Selon lui, tous les arts étaient les reflets de la condition étatique. Aussi, dans un écrit de 1920 intitulé « Die neue Ästhetik der Musikalischen Impotenz. Ein Verwesungssymptom ? » (La Nouvelle esthétique de l'impuissance musicale : un symptôme de la décadence ?) , Pfitzner attaqua le critique musical juif Paul Bekker et dénonça « l'œuvre internationale bolchévique de la subversion » , dans laquelle « le chaos atonal, correspondant à d'autres formes d'art, est le parallèle artistique du Bolchévisme qui menace l'Europe. » Depuis la guerre 14-18, nombreux sont les musiciens qui exigeaient de substituer la musique « non-germanique » par celle considérée comme « véritablement allemande » , tout spécifiquement durant l'année terrible de 1923. Et, à la fin de cette même année, Pfitzner publia dans le « Zeitschrift für Musik un Kampfblatt für deutsche Musik und Musikpflege » (Journal de combat pour la musique allemande et la culture musicale) . Un livre d'Erich Wolff et de Carl Petersen datant de 1923, intitulé « Das Schicksal der Musik von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart » (Le Destin de la musique de l'Antiquité jusqu'à aujourd'hui) , dénonça la musique atonale, « compréhensible seulement de manière pathologique » . Car la nouvelle musique, selon les 2 auteurs, préparait le terrain des ennemis de l'Allemagne « pour ériger un homme de pure machine, un animal intellectuel, un destructeur du monde, rangeant la culture du Christianisme dans le barbarisme » .

Aussi, Hans Schilling voyait-il, dans ses essais, notamment « Richard Wagner comme le prophète du monde aryen » (« Musik » , novembre 1933) , Wagner comme le prédécesseur de la révolution culturelle de Hitler. « Nous continuons la marche, écrivait Walter Engelsmann, que Wagner a commencé, comme un révolutionnaire et un pionnier de l'art allemand depuis 85 ans. » (« Musik » , octobre 1933) . En effet, lorsque l'Opéra « Parsifal » fut produit en 1934 à Bayreuth, Harlmut Zelinsky lui-même considérait que le « pur enseignement du Christ » était incarné dans « Parsifal » , conçu à l'antipode du monde judaïque, symbolisé par Kundry. « Parsifal » était pur, de noble sang capable de sauver et de préserver la nation. Cette idée de pureté du sang prit une place essentielle dans la politique raciale des Nazis. En prenant Wagner comme seul précurseur, Adolf Hitler se référa au caractère messianique du mythe wagnérien, pour repousser les forces obscures par le feu et le fer. Ainsi, il releva à son apogée l'esprit et la race allemande. Dans un livre de 1933, Hans Schlemm disait que « La musique allemande est à la 1^{re} place. C'est la plus germanique de tous les arts. L'esprit allemand trouve son expression ici comme le plus beau, le plus pur et le plus direct des arts. » (« Wege zur deutschen Musik ») . Encore, dans l'article « Vom Wesen deutscher Musikauffassung » (1939) , il était dit que « La musique imprime plus profondément l'esprit de notre peuple. » , comme moyen de formation du caractère allemand. Il fallait y songer, au-delà même du juif, ce qui pouvait déranger l'esprit allemand, c'était ce quelque chose d'impur qui pénétrait la musique allemande : l'étranger sous toutes ses formes, à partir duquel Herbert Gerigk, directeur de la revue « Musik » , devait écrire un « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » (Lexique des juifs en musique) , dans lequel il montrait que les juifs avaient pris le contrôle de tous les postes. Il fallait donc les éliminer.

Et pour comprendre cette nouvelle musique, il fallait, comme le fit Richard Eichenauer, trouver une correspondance avec les Chorales de Martin Luther, qui ne furent pas seulement considérés comme chrétiens, mais plutôt universellement et éternellement germaniques, fondement des caractéristiques des peuples nordiques. Jean-Sébastien Bach ne servit pas de modèle, mais ce fut plutôt Heinrich Schütz (comme Wagner et Bruckner) , qui fut joué par la jeunesse hitlérienne. Il fallait recouvrer la mélodie, comme le préconisait Eichenauer dans son livre « Musik und Rasse » : dans l'harmonie de Wagner, 2 caractéristiques semblaient dominer, la simplicité et l'illustration colorée ; une harmonie qui n'était pas difficile à comprendre, qui, dans la plupart des cas, manquait totalement d'intelligibilité compliquée. En d'autres termes, la musique ne peut être qu'émotion.

Les recherches sur la race musicale renvoyaient alors aux idées majeures qui servirent à développer l'essence de l'esprit allemand. Comme Hans Severus Ziegler l'écrivait, il fallait se battre « contre la culture négro, pour le caractère national allemand » . Il essaya alors de supprimer les œuvres de Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith et Ernst Křenek de tous les programmes de concert. Pour la commémoration « Wagner » de 1938 à Leipzig, Ziegler opposa l'héroïsme aryen au judaïsme et au bolchévisme, toujours considérés comme des forces du mal. Ce fameux discours mettait en lumière les idées d'une race en musique. Le juif correspondait au monde d'Alberich, de Beckmesser et de Kundry que Wagner utilisa dans sa Tétralogie, comme monde des profondeurs, de l'obscur, de l'enfer ; tandis que « Parsifal » s'apparentait au lumineux, au monde lumineux du peuple germanique, qualifié alors de « rein » (pur) et de « heil » (glorieux) . 2 mots qui, dans la langue allemande, possèdent plusieurs significations. « Rein » , en effet, signifie « pur », mais aussi « propre », « net ». La notion de purification était donc présente et les Nazis exploitèrent l'impureté comme un moyen pour juger et détruire. Dans son discours inaugural de l'Exposition « Entartete Musik » à Düsseldorf, Ziegler utilisa les 2 sens du mot, pour « une atmosphère propre et air frais et libre, où, dans le futur, la création, aussi bien que les musiciens de l'Allemagne, respirant librement, peuvent vivre et travailler ». La pureté était donc assimilée à la propreté et le reste à la saleté ! En même temps, il jugea l'atonalisme comme un charlatanisme. L'apparente extension de l'harmonie était considérée comme une dévaluation de la tonalité et provoquait donc une dégénérescence. Alors Ziegler s'en prend violemment à Arnold Schönberg, sans savoir que ce dernier se réfère aussi à Beethoven, lorsqu'il souligna : « Parce que l'atonalité a ses fondements dans l' " Harmonielehre " du juif Arnold Schönberg. Je déclare que cela est le produit de l'esprit juif et, finalement, manque la sensation pour la pureté du génie allemand Beethoven. ». Tout comme l'idée de pureté, une ambiguïté semblable se retrouve dans le terme « heil », aussi originaire de « Parsifal ». « Heil » se réfère à « heilig » (saint, sacré) . Comme nom, il exprime la santé et le salut. Le Christ est donc le Sauveur. Avec le mot « Heil / heil » (sainteté, santé et salut) , Ziegler avait dans l'esprit le sens même de la musique, qui était « une des places (salutaires) de notre profonde existence intérieure » . Il explicitait ainsi le sens de salut, comme le prouve le fameux « heil Hitler ! » , qui pouvait être tracé depuis Wagner et pouvait conduire à qualifier la bonne santé de l' « Esprit allemand » .

Opposée à cette idée de pureté du sang et de santé se trouvait l'idée de dégénérescence. Aussi, dans l'esprit de Ziegler, la musique pouvait être interprétée que comme de manière dégénérée. Et, en dépit d'une conférence sur le compositeur Johannes Brahms, en 1933, Arnold Schönberg avait sous-estimé le danger qui pouvait émerger de l'idéologie wagnérienne. Parce qu'il n'était pas certain que Wagner fut un aryen, il pensait, contrairement à d'autres compositeurs, que Wagner était tolérant envers les juifs, que ceux-ci pouvaient devenir de vrais Allemands. Pour Hans Severus Ziegler, cette possibilité était impossible. Pour lui, il s'agissait de préserver la pureté du sang et la supériorité de la race allemande. Les théories raciales devinrent ainsi un moyen efficace de contrôle et de modèle pour le musicien Beethoven, par exemple, en dépit de son apparence non-germanique ; Mozart en dépit de son accointance avec Da Ponte ; le cosmopolite Franz Liszt et Franz Schubert qui fut décrit par Eichenauer comme un « Nordique de l'est » . Pour Adolf Hitler et Josef Gœbbels, Anton Bruckner pouvait être considéré comme un représentant aryen : « Comme fils du sol autrichien, Anton Bruckner est spécifiquement choisi pour représenter à notre époque l'esprit indissoluble et la communauté émotionnelle du destin qui unit la nation dans son ensemble. » (Josef Gœbbels, 6 juin 1937.) Bruckner le provincial, comme Hitler, fut en effet rejeté par la métropole autrichienne et le compositeur fut considéré par les Nazis comme une victime du système juif, parce que le critique Eduard Hanslick s'était opposé à lui. Le dimanche 6 juin 1937, donc, un buste de Bruckner fut édifié dans un lieu symbolique, au « Walhalla » , près de Regensburg, en Bavière. Gœbbels proclama alors que Bruckner était le symbole de l'entière nation allemande.

Comment Ziegler pouvait-il préserver cette pureté de la race ? Lors du « Reichsmusiktage » du 28 mai 1938, le docteur Gœbbels proclama les « 10 principes de la création musicale germanique » :

contre le judaïsme dans la musique germanique ne sera jamais abandonnée. La musique est le plus sensuel des arts. Parce qu'elle parle plus au cœur et aux émotions qu'à la raison. Laissez-nous remercier Dieu de nous donner la capacité à écouter la musique, à l'expérimenter et à l'aimer passionnément. La musique est un art qui touche l'esprit plus profondément : il possède le pouvoir d'apaiser la peine et de bénir avec bonheur. Si la mélodie est l'origine de la musique, alors il s'ensuit que la musique pour le peuple ne peut pas s'épuiser elle-même dans les chorales ou les pastorales. Elle doit toujours retourner à la mélodie comme racine de son essence. Élever les trésors (de la musique) et les transmettre au peuple est notre devoir le plus important. Le langage des sons est quelque fois plus irrésistible que le langage des mots. Les grands Maîtres du passé sont par conséquent représentatifs de la majesté véritable de notre peuple. Pour maintenir et pour accroître la gloire et l'honneur de notre nation. »

De nombreux musiciens se rallieront à ce discours. Plus étrange encore, nombreux sont ceux qui officieront la musique après la Guerre : Josef Müller-Blattau devint professeur à Freiburg en 1937 et, après la guerre, eut la même fonction à l'Université de Saarbrücken. Son Maître, Wilibald Gurlitt, se proclama lui-même en faveur du « Chancelier du peuple » Adolf Hitler. Heinrich Bessler devint, en 1948, professeur à Iéna et, en 1956, à Leipzig. Walther Vetter glorifia les Opéras de Mozart aux conférences de Düsseldorf et, après avoir découvert l'origine de Da Ponte, il fut promu comme professeur et comme directeur de l'Institut de Musicologie de l'Université de Posen. Après 1945, il continua sa carrière comme l'un des plus éminents représentants de la musicologie allemande. Ernst Bücken embrassa très vite le darwinisme dans les recherches musicales. Ernst Kirsch proclama qu'« aucun juif ne peut être un camarade national » , lors des conférences de Düsseldorf.

Cependant, parmi les musicologues, certains résistèrent. Ce fut le cas de Hans Joachim Moser qui, en 1935, dans son dictionnaire de la musique, rappela que Robert Schumann et Johannes Brahms admiraient Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Friedrich Blume insista sur la mixité dans son essai « Musik und Rasse » : « Toute la musique qui est connue et comprise par nous a grandi sur le socle des caractéristiques nationales et s'est finalement mélangée racialement. » . De tels propos ne furent pas sans conséquence. Il n'obtint aucun poste de professeur, mais laissa à la postérité un fameux « Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » . Il questionna ainsi les rapports entre la race et la musique et en vint à cette conclusion : si on observe l'expérience raciale de la musique, selon les aryens, ceux-ci dissocient radicalement l'approche scientifique de l'approche intuitive. Le scientifique, au contraire, prend en compte les changements historiques de l'écoute et montre alors que l'association populaire du monde germanique avec la tonalité n'a pas de validité éternelle.

D'autres encore parmi les compositeurs refusèrent une telle entreprise. Béla Bartók fut absent de l'Exposition de l'« Entartete Musik » , parce qu'il appartenait à une nation amie. Il refusa ce traitement de faveur et, le 5 mai, avec Zoltán Kodály et d'autres artistes, protesta dans une résolution contre les lois raciales hongroises et demanda un peu plus tard d'être admis dans le cercle des « dégénérés » . Chez les compositeurs, ce fut alors une rébellion silencieuse, comme le souligne Gunter Weisenborn dans son « Rapport sur le mouvement de résistance du peuple allemand : 1933-1945 » . Le musicologue Kurt Huber était membre d'un groupe de résistance à Munich et fut condamné à mort en 1943. Le chef d'orchestre Leo Borchard demanda la fin de la guerre dans un tract. Le pianiste Helmut Roloff aida les juifs à émigrer. Le compositeur Karl Amadeus Hartmann dédicça son poème symphonique, « Miseræ » , aux victimes de Dachau. Il ne publia cette œuvre qu'à partir de 1945. Le critique musical Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt aida les artistes de l'avant-garde musicale, principalement dans les 1res années du régime nazi. La résistance, comme on le sait, s'organisa également dans les camps de concentration, notamment à « Theresienstadt » et dans les autres pays, avec les Hanns Eisler, Theodor W. Adorno, Paul Dessau et Kurt Weill. Ils furent également aidés par Arturo Toscanini, Ignaz Paderewsky et Pablo Casals, tandis que Ernst Busch passait à la radio russe des chansons anti-fascistes. En 1938, la « BBC » mit encore en place un service pour l'Allemagne et, en 1941, c'est la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven qui annonçait le programme créé par Martin Esslin, Richard Friedenthal, Alfred Kerr, Erika et Thomas Mann, Peter de Mendelssohn, Erich Ollenhauer et Robert Neumann, tandis que l'« Office of War Information », aux États-Unis, programmat un « We fight back », sous la direction de Ernst Joseph Aufricht.

Il est bien évident que, sans ces réactions salutaires, « On se reconnaîtra, en tant qu'individu, moralement coupable d'avoir par crainte laissé échapper de telles chances d'agir. » (Karl Jaspers, « La Culpabilité allemande », 1948.)

Musique, économie et opportunisme politique

In March 1933, clarinetist Valentin Grimm found himself caught in a dilemma. Having learned of Adolf Hitler's victory in late January, he had returned to Germany after spending many years as a professional musician in New York City. Being a card-carrying Nazi Party member, he was now looking for a comfortable job in one of Germany's many well-known Orchestras. No one offered to hire him, however, because there were no jobs. Grimm was facing a welfare existence unless things changed dramatically. They did not. In 1936, he finally landed a shaky part-time position with a Hamburg Pops Opera. The 185 Marks he was paid every month was too little to live on and too much to starve. As late as 1938, Grimm was so poor that he could not even afford the dark suit he needed to play in the Orchestra. Grimm seriously contemplated returning to New York.

In Berlin, the violinist Georg Kirchner did not fare much better. He had fallen victim to the tidal wave of unemployment sweeping across the waning Weimar Republic, and he also failed to make it back into the work force after Hitler's assumption of power. After several precarious years, on the dole, he gave-up all hope of a musical career and accepted work in a machine factory, in 1938. The cellist Friedrich Walther was only slightly better off. Having served in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra, from 1927 to 1933, he suddenly was discharged. Although Winifred Wagner, daughter-in-law of Richard Wagner and patron of the Festival, offered to recommend him for a new job elsewhere, Walther was judged to be somewhat less than accomplished during auditions. Still, he managed to secure work as a back-up cellist at the « Deutsche Oper » , in Berlin, earning a mere 360 Marks a month plus expenses and subject to dismissal with only 2 weeks' notice. In 1933, conductor Otto Klein was holed-up in the capital awaiting a suitable job offer. With no such prospect in sight, he begged the government for support money. 5 years later, Klein had still not found employment. To pass the time and sharpen his skills, he composed the Opera « Atlantis » , which was immediately doomed to oblivion. By this time, both Klein and his wife had been struck by illness. They were supported solely by Klein's 2 brothers, who sent him 230 Marks a month. Hanns Rohr, another conductor, had a doctorate in music. Having gotten by as an itinerant guest-conductor, from 1928 to 1934, he now accompanied his wife, a violinist, at the piano. If not for generous handouts from music-loving friends and the odd guest-conductor's job, the couple would have gone under. By 1937, Rohr was suffering from a heart condition ; 1 year later, his distraught wife entered a sanatorium.

During the 1st years of the Nazi regime, the fate of these musicians was hardly atypical ; in fact, their personal difficulties were symptomatic of the widespread economic confusion that characterized the cultural scene in Germany, following the last years of the Weimar Republic. The root cause could be traced back to January 1933. At that time, the new Hitler regime had inherited from the Republic a stagnant economy marked by high unemployment and low wages. This unemployment subsided only gradually ; it was not until 1936 that it fell below that of 1928-1929, and full employment was not achieved until 1938-1939. In 1933, real earnings were a mere 87 % of those in 1925-1929, a relatively stable phase for the Republic and, only in 1938, did they begin to surpass those of the peak years of Republican prosperity.

As difficult as these conditions were for the average German wage earner, they were much more onerous for the country's hundred thousand or so musicians, fewer than half of whom were devoted to the so-called Classics, or « serious music » . Not until about 1938 were they finally on an economic par with the national standard. One reason for this lag was that in tough economic times, matters of culture usually took 2nd place. This made itself felt even in Germany, a country with a tradition of staunch public support for its cultural institutions, including Opera Houses and Symphony Orchestras. Such support, which had been gradually withdrawn as a result of the depression during the later years of the Republic, was only haltingly restored in the 1st years of the 3rd « Reich » , as overall conditions improved. In the summer of 1933, for instance, some members of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, financially one of the best endowed of Germany's « culture Orchestras » (those musical organizations dedicated exclusively to « serious music ») , were still subjected to salary cuts of 40 % . In 1935, unemployed Munich musicians were performing recitals in nursing homes on a volunteer basis just to maintain their skills. Even as circumstances were improving, by late 1936, 4 out of 5 of Germany's gainfully employed musicians were bringing home less than 200 Marks a month - which was less than what most blue-collar workers earned. The jobless rate still hovered above the 20 % mark, more than twice the national average.

Matters improved more quickly between 1936 and 1939 against the backdrop of general economic progress. More specifically, musicians of all kinds were needed after the establishment of Hitler's « Wehrmacht » , in 1935, and the expansion of various government and Nazi Party organizations, notably the SS and the compulsory « Reich » Labor Service, all of which were eager to have their own bands. Moreover, geographic expansion caused by the annexation of Austria and, eventually, the Sudetenland and Memel created additional demands. In March 1938, an impending shortage of qualified musicians prompted the music lover Josef Gœbbels, head of all organized musicians under the Nazi regime, to promulgate a basic wage decree guaranteeing the profession's attractiveness. By this order, « culture Orchestras » were favored over mere dance and light-entertainment bands. Orchestras were divided into 5 competency classes, and musicians' salaries and pension payments were standardized by law.

These developments were reflected in an ascending salary curve for orchestra musicians, soloists, and conductors alike, with variations in each category based on qualifications, experience, and national prominence. Throughout the 3rd « Reich » , those musicians at the lowest end of the professional scale who were contractually employed consistently earned more in wages than any freelance work might net them. But at the upper end of the scale, an eminent artist might make as much from frequent guest appearances as from a guaranteed salary. If a musician was so fortunate as to be securely employed in 1933, his monthly earnings as an Orchestra member could be as high as 450 Marks. In 1936, the same salary could be as low as 350 Marks per month, but it might well have risen, as it did for 1st violinist Hans Ortleb of the « Deutsche Oper » , in Berlin, to over 600 Marks by early 1939. Concert Masters and soloists could expect to make at least double those amounts, depending on their opportunities for independent concertizing. This income placed them very close to the category of physicians, who, topping lawyers and dentists, were the highest-paid of the self-employed professional groups in the Nazi era.

Financially, conductors generally fared much better, with the world-famous Wilhelm Furtwängler the undisputed champion. In 1934, he received 1,000 Marks per concert, contractually performing 22 of them in Berlin alone, in addition to touring, which fetched an equivalent amount per event. By 1937, Furtwängler was already getting 2,000 Marks per appearance and, in 1938-1939, this figure doubled again. For all of 1939, he earned well in excess of 200,000 Marks, more than triple the 60,000 Marks (including 20,000 Marks in expenses) that his Austrian colleague Clemens Krauß was paid after assuming the directorship of the « Bayerische Staatsoper » in Munich, in 1937. Somewhat lesser-known conductors were still comfortably well off. For example, Hans Rosbaud, in 1934-35, was earning about 13,000 Marks per year at « Radio Frankfurt » . Other conductors employed for radio programs or as assistants throughout the « Reich » could be paid as much as a well-placed concert Master, but less qualified ones were dependent on touring, and received as little as 200 Marks per engagement.

It is almost impossible to gauge the earnings of composers, many of whom doubled as conductors, soloists, or Conservatory teachers. At one end of the spectrum was Carl Orff, who always tried to be fiercely independent. He subsisted for years on his publisher's advances, which he did not begin to make good on until the War, when Orff's Operas finally began to bring him wealth. No other composer of serious music earned as much as Richard Strauß who, in 1936 (not one of his banner years) , earned over 80,000 Marks from all sources ; high for a composer but noticeably trailing Furtwängler. Hans Pfitzner, who ranked just after Strauß in national importance, was making about half that much.

Because, in general terms, the economic situation of musicians was so bleak until 1938, Nazi Party and government agencies tried to do what they could to help. Special Symphony and chamber Orchestras were financially supported and filled with jobless Nazi musicians. When the British jazz band leader Jack Hylton applied to tour Germany, in 1934-1935, he was allowed to do so only on condition that he contribute 25 % of his earnings to unemployed German colleagues. The « Reich » made grants of thousands of Marks to aid the unemployed and facilitate the dignified retirement of older musicians. At Carnival time, in February 1935, a musicians' ball was organized in Munich's posh « 4 Seasons » Hotel (the « Hotel Vier Jahreszeiten Kempinski » on « Maximilianstrasse 17 ») for the benefit of impoverished musicians and, in 1936, Josef Goebbels instituted « Kunstlerdank », a social-assistance program backed with millions of Marks, from which the chronically indigent, such as involuntarily retired musicians and other artists, were to profit. From the fall of 1937 to the fall of 1938, « Kunstlerdank » benefited more than 3,000 musicians with up to 300 Marks each.

The program's work did not cease after economic conditions for musicians had improved. Even during World War II, when many musicians were in a position to exploit their unique talents, Goebbels called on musicians to entertain the troops and participate in various cultural schemes, to the extraordinary financial advantage of the musicians. But the very fact that « Kunstlerdank » was a creature of the regime raises the question of a possible inter-relationship between economic performance and pro-Nazi political deportment and, specifically, the question of opportunism. That is, did their financial straits motivate musicians to join the Nazi Party, between 1933 and 1945 ? Given the insufficient evidence to date, the answer can only be equivocal. From a largely north German sample of musicians of all stripes and qualifications, between 1933 and 1938, most of whom joined the Party, in 1934, it may be concluded that about 20 % of the profession was in the « Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » (NSDAP) (National-Socialist German Workers' Party or Nazi Party) before the War. Moreover, those who were employed showed a stronger tendency to join the NSDAP than those who were idle. Still, this does not rule-out destitution as a possible motive for Nazi Party membership. In 1934, for instance, though about one 3rd of all musicians were jobless, more than half of the employed ones had a monthly income of 100 Marks or less. It may have been only these who show-up as NSDAP members in the statistics. But why, then, was the proportion of Vienna Philharmonic musicians (among the best paid in the « Reich ») who were Nazi Party members also equal to 33 % after the « Anschluß » of Austria, in 1938, and why did this membership rise over the years, even with the economy on the up-swing ? It is clear that, in this case, factors other than purely economic ones were causing many artists to jump on the Nazi band wagon.

To be sure, interference in music professionals' lives by the Nazi regime was considerable, and not only in economic terms. Official dictates called for the nazification of music to the extent that art generally had to be « put to the service of an idea » which, in this case, meant the ideology of racist National-Socialism. At the height of the War, Wolfgang Stumme, chief of music in the « Hitler-Jugend » (Hitler Youth), still described German music as an antidote to « dangerous poison threatening the blood », that is, stimuli from the « Jewish, materialistic, Bolshevist environment ». In theory, then, only narrowly defined « German music » was to be produced and listened to. In 1938, Hans Pfitzner, under the impression that creative freedom was being stifled, remarked sarcastically to Hermann Göring, the boss of the « Preussische Staatsoper », that in present-day Germany « any criticism is forbidden, indeed abolished, so that you cannot write it if a soubrette sings badly, even when it is really so ». Of course, Pfitzner knew well that such policies represented merely the ideal condition called for by Nazi fanatics, and that they could not be enforced with any degree of consistency. Goebbels knew this also when he pronounced, in February 1934, that however tightly a government might rule, it had to keep loose reins on artistic and intuitive activities. Richard Strauß, as President of Josef Goebbels' « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber, or RMK) , took his cue from Goebbels when, in 1935, he listed the desirable qualities of a music director : he had to have good ears, he had to be able to play the piano well, he had to understand the art of singing, and he had to comprehend the dynamics of modern Opera (especially Strauß's own) . Significantly, in this catalog of virtues, Strauß failed to mention anything about Nazism or the Hitler regime.

These 2 conflicting tenets, censure and toleration, turned-out to be the guidelines for music creation and administration in the 3rd « Reich » . While they expressed opposite intentions, neither one in its pure and unadulterated form dominated the musical life of the nation. Typically representing compromise in combination, they tempered each other, ensuring that some degree of artistic freedom would always obtain. Such a fluctuating system of balances, as we know today, was characteristic of the overall policy structure of Hitler's 3rd « Reich » and served to keep it going.

Germane to the question of artistic opportunism, or the premeditated blending of art and politics in the 1st years of the regime, the principle of compromise found its practical embodiment in a 3 stage process of policy making : 1st, if a musician proved to possess artistic talent and loyalty to the regime in more or less equal measure, then professional success could be virtually guaranteed ; 2nd, if a lack of musical competence was painfully obvious, then no amount of political dedication could warrant artistic survival ; and 3rd, even if a musician's ties to the regime were minimal or non-existent, he could still forge an impressive career for himself if the quality and quantity of his musical output were high by any standards, unless he went-out of his way to insult the regime. The 3rd stage explains the relative success of conductors such as Hans Rosbaud and Wilhelm Furtwängler, of composers such as Richard Strauß, and of performers such as the bass-baritone Hans Hotter.

Officially, then, as with many occupations in the 3rd « Reich » , Nazi affiliation of one kind or another was held to be a prerequisite for career advancement in the « serious music » business, and prospective employers often applied pressure to individual musicians to join the Nazi Party. This prompted many artists of solid, but not outstanding ability, to find jobs or improve their situation on the basis of existing or newly earned Nazi credentials. The conductor Gerhart Stiebler was out of work and judged to be merely competent as a musician, but because he had joined the NSDAP, in 1932, and been very active as a Party speaker, he was hired as musical director of the Górlitz Theater, in June 1933. Regime officials as highly-placed as Prussian Minister of Education Bernhard Rust had seen fit to intervene on his behalf. Although, in 1936, the consensus was that Wilhelmine Holzinger, a freelance pianist always in search of a job, was but a mediocre musician, she had befriended « Gauleiter » Julius Streicher of Nuremberg and other Party leaders and, finally, was deemed worthy of further support in the form of a job at Radio Nuremberg. And, in Berlin, in 1936, there was Walter Lutze, a repertory conductor at the city's « Deutsche Oper » , which was within not Göring's but Goebbels's own jurisdiction. Lutze, too, was able but not brilliant and, like Stiebler, had joined the Party, in 1932. In addition, he was an old friend of Heinrich Hoffmann, Adolf Hitler's personal photographer, and father-in-law of Hitler Youth leader, Baldur von Schirach. When Lutze was served notice on artistic grounds, Goebbels personally intervened and prevented his dismissal ; although the conductor was slated for removal during the War, when musicians were scarce, the propaganda Minister protected him up to the end of the regime.

The entire Schirach family exemplifies Nazi patronage in the arts. Baldur's father, Karl von Schirach, long retired as « Generalintendant » of the Weimar stage but an old follower of Hitler, since the 1920's, was made intendant of the Wiesbaden Theater, in 1933. Rosalind, Karl's daughter, was a run-of-the-mill soprano at the Berlin « Deutsche Oper » . Together with her lover Gerhard Husch, the well-known baritone, she organized a powerful Nazi cell there that wielded much influence. One trade journal hailed her as the « ideal image of a Nordic-Aryan singer » .

Baldur himself wrote melodramatic poems, many of which venerated the « Führer » and were set to music, giving Cantatas such as those by the unexceptional Hans Ferdinand Schaub timely and very convenient content. In fact, gearing the thematic content of a musical composition to the spirit of the times could bring rich rewards to its creator ; Schaub found himself elevated to the position of « State composer » by the « Gauleiter » of Hamburg and was granted an unconditional sinecure. Friedrich Leiboldt of Naumburg composed his « Horst Wessel » Cycle in part on verses by von Schirach ; it was scheduled to be premiered by a mixed choir, in 1934. Rudolf Bockelmann, another famous baritone, acted as soloist in the song « For the “ Führer ” » , written by the little-known Hans Gansser and marketed by « Electrola » Records, in 1935. Paul Winter, who perhaps deservedly was to rise to the rank of general during World War II, crafted a hymn-fanfare and had it performed at Vienna Radio, in April 1938, after Hitler had marched his troops into Austria ; it was inspired by his profound joy over the « magnificent consummation of the union of Greater Germany » . Frequently, such politically inspired compositions were generated because venal regime leaders (Göring, Goebbels, or Alfred Rosenberg) had commissioned them.

But even though, in the 2 years of Hitler's rule, some 20,000 compositions with political applications were produced, the large majority, written by crass dilettantes of undoubtedly sterling Party reputation, were never recognized. Hitler himself, while admitting to only moderately sophisticated musical tastes, at least was shrewd enough to see through the most blatant cases of opportunism. Hence, he « disliked the newly composed Party rally music » and, by 1935, he had forbidden the inflationary practice of personal dedications to the « Führer » .

Not only career-conscious composers but also instrumentalists and conductors who, for lack of talent, had been failures in the pre-Nazi period now attempted to use the Party badge or other regime paraphernalia to pursue their goal. They still failed because of incompetence. Doris Kaehler, at 38, not the youngest contralto in the business, traveled from Berlin to Berchtesgaden, where she beleaguered Hitler at his « Berghof » , hoping that a chance to sing for him might lead to a spot at State radio. Kaehler was a Nazi « Old Fighter » (one of those who had joined the Party before January 1933) and the daughter of a minor Party functionary, but her artistic credentials were wanting. Paul de Neve, who in the « Marxist-Jewish “ Reich ” » had directed musical events for the Party for free, was hoping for restitution ; yet, he remained merely a candidate for « Kunstlerdank » for, in 1938, he was already 57 and had no particular artistic merits. Party comrade Otto Wartisch, a conductor, failed dismally to land a contractual post at the Munich Philharmonic, in 1936, as did Party comrade Fritz Müller-Rehrmann, hoping for a post as conductor, composer, or music professor anywhere in Germany, in 1937. Typically, artists such as Wartisch and Müller-Rehrmann over-estimated their chances and, on the basis of their Nazi pedigrees, aspired to positions they could never do justice to, even at the pleasure of benevolently minded dictators, as Goebbels himself correctly observed, in late 1936. The composer Paul Hindemith at the start of the Nazis' regime declared that :

« Bad works can't be pushed indefinitely, and the people they are now digging-out are all complete mediocrities. »

Agences nazies pour l'administration de la musique

One reason why the compromise between suppression and toleration was workable was the relative impotence of, and the lack of cooperation between, the agencies set-up to administer music in the regime. The 1st of these agencies was the « Kampfband für deutsche Kultur » (Combat League for German Culture or « Kfdk ») . The « Kfdk » , founded by the Nazi Party ideologue Alfred Rosenberg, in February 1929, was a political lobby aimed at rescuing German culture from what the National-Socialists considered pornography, Bolshevism, international Jewry, and the « gutter press » (all symbolized by « Bauhaus » art, critical writings in the left-wing « Weltbühne » , and modernist - or « atonal ») music. It was aimed at Germany's educated elite during Adolf Hitler's rise to power, at a time when he was eager to court the upper-strata of society. Until January 1933, conservative, nationalistic, and race-conscious Germans, most of them from academic circles but also performing artists, had joined its various regional cells. In the realm of music, the local « Kampfband » leaders would stage recitals and concerts, frequently with the help of unemployed musicians (such as a « Kampfband » choir) , and Nazi sympathizers with an interest in high culture would attend, as well as contribute money.

For administrative purposes, the « Kampfband » leadership created elaborate sub-divisions, including sections for serious and for light music, for Opera, for instrumental and vocal-music, for composition, and, not least, for music education. After January 1933, the « Kampfband » 's ambition to be the sole regulator of music in the 3rd « Reich » became stronger, fueled by Rosenberg's own sense of mission as the Party's official philosopher and warden of all things cultural. As job-creation schemes became ever more important, local music events featuring unemployed or under-employed instrumentalists, vocalists, even entire Orchestras or choirs took precedence in all the German provinces, such as in Halle, where an evening of Johannes Brahms sonatas and Richard Wagner's « Wesendonk Lieder » was organized in March 1933. The inclusion of Wagner signaled the « Kampfband » 's uppermost purpose, that of sweeping « the last bits of Jewish rot out of our German house, quickly and thoroughly » . This belligerent agency acquired some official currency when it managed to put on a celebration in honour of Hitler's birthday, on 20 April 1933, in Berlin, on which occasion Rosalind von Schirach's paramour Gerhard Husch presented songs by Johann Sebastian Bach and Franz Schubert. Similarly, unadulterated German fare was offered a month later in Leipzig, when « Kampfband » organizers penetrated the famous « Gewandhaus » Orchestra Hall to stage works by Brahms (supposedly, in honour of the Centenary of his birth) . And, in early summer, a special arts Festival in Berlin afforded Gustav Havemann's national « Kampfband » Orchestra the chance to present selections from Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » and « Der fliegende Holländer » . To emphasize the Nazi Party backing, at a « Kampfband » Festival, in Stettin in the fall, the pianist Annemarie Heyne, a niece of Deputy « Führer » Rudolf Heß, participated, and in Plauen so did Heinrich Bienert, a reciter of poetry as well as a « Standartenführer » in the SA.

The « Kampfband » was weak, however, and its domination over German music was tenuous and short-lived for 2 reasons. 1st, it was an unofficial, unauthorized Party organization, founded on impulse by one Nazi leader ambitious for overall cultural control, and without Adolf Hitler's committed backing. Throughout its existence, the « Kfdk » had its organizational and financial base only in the Nazi Party and was never grounded in government. Soon after, the regime had been installed, Rosenberg's reign was challenged by Josef Goebbels, Hermann Göring, and Prussian (later « Reich ») Culture and Education Minister Bernhard Rust, because of his jurisdiction over music education. 2nd, despite Rosenberg's historic role as founder and spiritual figurehead, the « Kampfbund » never enjoyed strong central leadership, either from Berlin or from Munich, the seat of Party headquarters. Instead, it was directed locally and regionally by mid-level Party bosses, not all of whom were musicians, and who were likely to be engaged in internecine feuding. Every provincial hamlet seems to have had a « Kampfbund » dictator « who issued directives capriciously » , as Paul Hindemith's frustrated music-publisher wrote him, in April 1933. And so, as a consequence of the « Kampfbund » 's shaky beginnings and lack of authority, centralization, and coordination, Rosenberg eventually was surpassed by stronger contenders for cultural control, the most persistent of whom turned-out to be Goebbels.

During 1933 and early 1934, the « Kampfbund » sought to fortify its influence with the aid of local delegates who held key positions in municipal music circles. In Rhenish Krefeld, it was conductor Walther Meyer-Giesow who lorded it over the municipal orchestra, a collegium musicum, and a madrigal choir, and who, throughout 1933, planned virtually all the musical activities in town. In Munich, « Kampfbund » dictator Paul Ehlers so usurped the traditional « Bach-Verein » and its choir and orchestra that Carl Orff who, before the 3rd « Reich » , had played a key role in it, withdrew in early 1934. And, in Marburg, the « Kfdk » chief used his power to organize as many musical events as possible, for the greatest number of Party faithful, at preferential ticket prices.

The undoing of Rosenberg's combative organization began as early as spring 1933, for it was taking liberties in music policy and administration for which it had no mandate, thus embarrassing not only civil but Party authorities as well. In April, a Rhenish « Kampfbund » cell, allegedly with Rosenberg's authorization, offered Munich composer and conductor Hans Pfitzner the directorship of the Düsseldorf Opera. But when Pfitzner checked with the lord mayor of Düsseldorf, who was ultimately responsible, he received no commitment. The « Kampfbund » then explained that it had merely tried to act on a suggestion from Rosenberg, but that, naturally, Pfitzner would have to deal with the mayor himself. The « Kampfbund » had lost face, and Pfitzner was chagrined.

In north German Schwerin, meanwhile, concert Master Karl Kramer was summarily dismissed from the Mecklenburg State Theater for displeasing one of his superiors. Kramer had the « Kampfbund » intercede with the « Gauleiter » , but since it was without authority, nothing came of the action. In Hamburg, « Kapellmeister » and « Kampfbund » member Willi Hammer set-down a definition of art meant to serve as a general directive for the « Reich » , but no sooner had it been promulgated than it sank into oblivion. By spreading lies, a Berlin « Kampfbund » functionary, in February 1934, tried to discredit the noted music-critic Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt, but was forced to apologize after Stuckenschmidt's vigorous protest.

By this time, Goebbels, who not only was in charge of propaganda for the Party but also, since March 1933, held a ministerial position authorizing him to oversee matters of culture almost everywhere, had put his « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) , or « RMK » , firmly into place, and it was now applying heavy pressure on Rosenberg's disparaged « Kampfbund » cells. Although Rosenberg was given an « Office for the Supervision of the Total Spiritual and Philosophical Education and Development of the NSDAP » , his remained a marginal Party agency, in contrast to Gœbbels's dual functions in the Party and the State. Within this new office, Rosenberg created yet another music control post, hoping to redouble the efforts of his lackluster « Kampfbund » on the strength of Party legitimacy while coupling the impotent « Kfdk » with the « Kraft durch Freude » (Strength-through-Joy or « KdF ») organization, of Robert Ley. The new control post, known as the Main Office for Music, was handed over to Herbert Gerigk, an ambitious musicologist and music-critic with impressive Nazi credentials. Meanwhile, the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » in its new guise became known as the « NSKG » , or « NS-Kulturgemeinde » (National-Socialist Cultural Community) ; henceforth, it would perform merely as a music (and theatre) lobby, purchasing cheap blocks of tickets for its many, now entirely passive, members throughout the « Reich » . It also organized concerts of its own. The « NS-Kulturgemeinde » was totally absorbed by « Strength-through-Joy » , in 1937 and, thereupon, ceased to exist as one of Rosenberg's cultural platforms. During the War especially, the « KdF » organized mass events for the sake of armaments production and troop entertainment ; in its service, German musicians performed for BMW workers as well as for « Waffen-SS » soldiers and civilians on the home front. Here, music's new calling as an instrument of politics and war had been fully realized.

Significant defections from the « Kampfbund » had occurred in the spring of 1933, when 4 leading functionaries left to organize a Nazi cartel of musicians in Berlin under violinist Gustav Havemann. Their « Reichskartell der Deutschen Musikerschaft » was organized along neo-corporatist lines, using notions borrowed in part from Italian Fascism, ideally thought to serve the collective interests of a professional group and popular long before Adolf Hitler with spokesmen for other occupations, such as lawyers and physicians. In the fall, this « Reichskartell » became the nucleus for the « Reich » Music Chamber.

In March 1933, Josef Gœbbels was still indicating his support for Rosenberg's « Kampfbund » but, by then, it was already clear that he intended to take-over the reins of culture in the « Reich » himself. Gœbbels fully realized this claim when, in late June, he was officially authorized to set-up the machinery for such control, utilizing his new « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » (« Promi » , or « Reich » propaganda Ministry) , and hence endangering any and all of Rosenberg's pre-existing Party institutions. Former Rosenberg sycophants such as Havemann were beginning to drift into Gœbbels's camp, and Hans Hinkel, once a « Kampfbund » secretary, was already in his employ.

The founding of the « Reichsmusikkammer » was formally announced on 1 November 1933, as part of an umbrella organization, the « Reichskulturkammer » (« Reich » Culture Chamber, or « RKK ») presided over by Josef Gœbbels. There were similar sub-chambers for visual arts, theatre, literature, journalism, radio and, later also, for film. Membership in the « Reichsmusikkammer » , as in the other chambers, was compulsory for all professionals in their respective categories. Havemann and other cronies from the « Kampfbund » (such as Heinz Ihler, a Berlin businessman, occasional piano player, and Nazi « Old Fighter » since 1927) commenced to staff the various sections, Havemann himself taking charge of musicians after merging his « Reichskartell » , and Ihler becoming the executive secretary. Hans Hinkel became responsible for the « Reichsmusikkammer » , in 1935, when he was appointed secretary-general of the « Reich » Culture Chamber. This much larger culture chamber was ceremoniously inaugurated on 15 November 1933, with Richard Strauß conducting his own « Festliches Präludium » . This was no accident, for at Gœbbels's behest Strauß had agreed to serve as president of the subordinate « Reichsmusikkammer » .

Since 1945, and even before, there has been much speculation as to why the world-famous composer consented to take on this (to say the least) questionable job. Richard Strauß certainly did not have to do so for financial reasons, for he was a wealthy man ; he was in no need of additional publicity ; and, in 1933, he was not yet under any sort of political pressure. The answer is not, as one German musicologist has contended, that he was a power-hungry, dyed-in-the-wool National-Socialist, but that he saw in the dictatorship of Adolf Hitler a convenient if somewhat distasteful tool to realize goals he himself had been anticipating for decades. Admittedly, no friend of the democracy of Weimar, Strauß believed that a dictatorial regime could finally implement the changes toward neo-corporatism that would benefit the German musical profession and, in particular, composers on behalf of which he had been toiling since the beginning of the 20th Century. As newly available documents from the Strauß family archive in Garmisch reveal, 3 goals were foremost in his mind. 1st, he wanted to upgrade musical culture in the country by instituting throughout the highest level of training and performance. 2nd, he wished to increase the profit share of serious composers « vis-à-vis » light-music composers, among whom he most detested the creators of Operettas such as Franz Lehár, a constant object of his vilification. 3rd, he aimed to extend the period of copyright for « serious music » compositions, for the sake of composers and their heirs.

His was a specialized agenda, sharply skewed toward the immediate concerns of people like himself. Significantly, Strauß chose to head the « Reichsmusikkammer » section for composers, personally. It is doubtful whether Gœbbels recognized the potential for conflict when he appointed the Mæstro - a conflict that inexorably developed over time. But for now, in the fall of 1933, he merely wished to exploit Strauß's immense prestige nationally and especially internationally, for Hitler's regime craved recognition abroad, just as Strauß intended to exploit the powers of a dictatorship. In any event, because of Strauß's professional self-interest in the « Reichsmusikkammer » and his reluctance to exchange the comfortable life of a composer in Garmisch for a functionary's presence in Berlin, he delegated most « Reichsmusikkammer » affairs to underlings, in particular to his business manager Ihlert, becoming personally involved only in matters dear to his heart. Strauß' letters to the few men in Berlin whom he trusted and regularly corresponded with, notably Ihlert, Hugo Rasch, and Julius Kopsch, demonstrate contempt for their daily routines, which he deemed far beneath him.

One immediate result of this absentee presidency was a lack of direction in the upper-ranks of the Berlin « Reichsmusikkammer » , leading to confusion, corruption, and infighting. At Berlin headquarters, Ihlert and Havemann, especially, were soon feuding with their colleagues ; Ihlert himself was accused of protectionism and inefficiency, others of tardiness and sexual misconduct. A 2nd result was a conspicuous absence of firm « Reichsmusikkammer » controls throughout the « Reich » , normally manifested in the fascist strictures and repression that even then typified Nazi policy in other areas.

It is true that under Richard Strauß's arm's-length presidency the « Reichsmusikkammer » initiated what became its traditional policy of conscripting professional musicians and demanding monthly membership fees. The « Reichsmusikkammer » also instituted musical competency tests in order to weed-out amateurs and frauds and, thereby, help define a professional code - all in the spirit of neo-corporatism that was a hallmark of the era. Moreover, the « Reichsmusikkammer » granted (and withheld) permission for musicians to travel abroad and spend a predetermined amount of hard currency. And to continue the job-creation programs already begun, on a much smaller scale, by the « Kampfbund » , it limited the number of foreign instrumentalists allowed into Germany who might snatch jobs away from natives.

Meanwhile, Goebbels, in order to assuage musicians' concerns, and in keeping with his stated principle of relative artistic freedom, maintained a fairly low profile as cultural enforcer in the early days of the regime. Hence, Strauß himself was able to hold controls and censorship to an absolute minimum. This, in fact, was one of the few areas of « Reichsmusikkammer » policy that still interested him and over which he tried to reserve decisions for himself, certainly whenever he could make it his business to be informed. This was evident not only in the matter of the proscription of Jewish colleagues, which he soft-pedaled, but also with regard to the nature of the music to be performed. For instance, when, in March 1934, the fanatical Nazi critic and « Reichsmusikkammer » presidium member Fritz Stege wished to censure a concert pianist with a penchant for modern works, the presidium opposed him on the grounds that « in principle, the " Reich " Music Chamber cannot forbid works of an atonal character, for it is up to the audience to judge such compositions » .

The immediate circumstances of Strauß's dismissal from his post by Goebbels, in July 1935, are well-known : in 1932, he had employed the Austrian Jewish novelist Stefan Zweig as librettist for his Opera « Die schweigsame Frau » , and that was looked upon as an affront to the National-Socialist regime. Moreover, when Zweig, finding his situation increasingly distasteful if not downright dangerous, attempted to extricate himself from the ongoing working relationship, Strauß wrote him, on 17 June 1935, stating that he was only playacting as « Reichsmusikkammer » president to prevent the worst from happening. Long suspicious of Strauß, the « Gestapo » intercepted the letter, and a disgusted Goebbels compelled him to resign. Public announcements indicated that Strauß had done so because of « old age » and « severely strained health » .

Although in the post-War literature, this has become the standard explanation of Strauß's break with the « Reichsmusikkammer » , the deeper and more important reasons were structural. During Strauß's denazification hearings, in 1947, it was said that the dismissal symbolized a « change in the system » , of the chain of command between Goebbels as cultural overseer and his chamber leaders, and of the overall policy to be observed within a chamber. The fact was that Strauß, although prestigious, was simply too single-minded and egotistically independent to serve the Nazis well over the long run. His absence from Berlin and his general lack of interest in the day-to-day administration of the « Reichsmusikkammer » had already caused disruptions ; and his skeptical attitude toward the « Jewish Question » made it clear that although he was authoritarian, he was by no means ruthless enough to implement the censorship and other controls Goebbels wanted to see applied throughout the « Reichsmusikkammer » . This had surfaced as a problem during the Paul Hindemith affair of 1934-1935, when Strauß advised his council that the composer should not be ostracized from the « Reichsmusikkammer » . Hindemith's as yet unperformed Opera « Mathis der Maler » hitherto had been the only contemporary « serious music » composition to be declared unwanted, not by any new æsthetic-ideological criteria but for political reasons, not the least of which had to do with Hitler's long-standing dislike of that composer, with his modernist reputation. It had not been Strauß who indicted him but the highest level regime leaders themselves.

Strauß was replaced by Peter Raabe, the retired « Generalmusikdirektor » of Aachen and a professor emeritus at the Technical University there. He was sufficiently non-descript to serve as Gœbbels's ideal puppet. Born in 1872, he had enjoyed a respectable if not spectacular career as conductor, and had earned a doctorate with a dissertation on Franz Liszt. He had just begun his retirement when the Minister's call reached him. Raabe had a personal motive for accepting this post, for his conducting career was in the process of being eclipsed by the meteoric rise of Herbert von Karajan, who, though active only a few months in Aachen, had outshone him there chiefly as conductor of the Municipal Opera. Although Raabe did not apply for Nazi Party membership until 1937, he was a fanatical follower of Adolf Hitler and, by all accounts, was deeply committed to Nazi cultural policy. Unlike Strauß, however, and probably influenced by his idol Liszt, whose harmonic innovations anticipated the atonality of Arnold Schönberg, Raabe was partial to the more modern composers, a weakness Gœbbels liked to ridicule, and which made Raabe even softer putty in the Minister's hands.

Raabe's far more subordinate position as president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » became obvious in a number of ways. Unlike Strauß, Raabe was made to wait in the antechambers of Gœbbels's Ministry when ordered to report to his lieutenants, and Raabe's protest went unheeded. Deciding to tighten his policy of public controls somewhat while still favoring persuasion and conversion over outright restriction, Gœbbels met with no objections from Raabe when he instituted closer monitoring of concert programming. In September 1935, a limited black-list of works by Jews and foreigners was issued, something Strauß most certainly would never have consented to. In 1936, Raabe, despite his protest, finally had to acquiesce in Gœbbels's decision to absorb into the « Reichsmusikkammer » the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » (General German Music Society), Liszt's creation of 1859, in which Raabe played a leading role and whose independence he wished to preserve. (It was at the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein »'s annual functions that Raabe had been observed to favor « modernism ».) The « ADMV » was duly liquidated in 1937. In the matter of Paul Hindemith's proscription, it was Raabe who at Gœbbels's insistence, in October 1936, signed an order placing all of Hindemith's works on a public performance index, something that could never have been entrusted to Strauß.

By this time, however, Raabe was no longer the Minister's sole pleni-potentiary in matters of musical culture in the « Reich » for, in late 1936, Gœbbels had appointed Heinz Drewes, the « General-Musik-Direktor » of Altenburg, to head a department of music in the Propaganda Ministry. The reasons for this move are not entirely clear, but it can be surmised that Gœbbels wished to have some sort of guarantee that Raabe would be held in check to avoid a repetition of the extreme embarrassment that Strauß had caused him. This would have been wholly in keeping with the National-Socialists' practice of establishing a « fragmented administration », with double and triple levels of jurisdiction, duplication of responsibility, and crossed chains of command. Ultimately, the higher leaders benefited from such institutionalized chaos, since only they could act as arbiters in seemingly endless disputes or in cases where government efficacy was seriously at stake. Invariably, this strengthened their position. This, incidentally, was the major reason why Adolf Hitler himself did not intervene in the initial rivalry between Rosenberg and Gœbbels for, in the final analysis, it was he who emerged supreme.

Göebbels made sure that he would always have the last word by artfully entangling the responsibilities of Raabe and Drewes. His scheme was clever enough : Raabe as president of the « Reichskulturkammer » came under Göebbels as president of the « Reich » Culture Chamber, of which the « Reichsmusikkammer » was a part. The « Reichskulturkammer » was of course rooted in Göebbels's « Promi » . Drewes, while an official of the « Promi » , was not given responsibility for Raabe, whose formal superior was Göebbels. On the contrary, just to keep Drewes in his place, he was cross-appointed to the « Reichsmusikkammer » 's presidium, thus making him nominally subordinate to Raabe. Predictably, Drewes and Raabe were constantly at each other's throats regarding « the leadership in music » , which made Göebbels happy, for he could always threaten either man with ammunition derived from the intrigues of the other.

In theory, Drewes's department was to have powers of policy creation and Raabe's agency powers of policy enactment. But, in practice, in those areas that really mattered to him, Göebbels towered over both men, conveying his wishes in person or using as his conduit a State secretary of his Ministry. As long as it lasted, this delineation meant that Raabe continued to exercise responsibility in practical matters such as coopting and regulating « Reichsmusikkammer » membership and devising technical rulings. In terms of ideological and content controls, however, Raabe seems to have been comparatively disadvantaged, or to have taken his cue from Drewes's department, if not (as in the case of Hindemith's banning, in 1936) directly from Göebbels. This is evident from the details of the long battle Raabe waged against jazz, a battle he could not win till the end, not least because Göebbels himself divined that jazz served certain propaganda functions, especially in War-time. In the « serious music » realm, Raabe's subservience became transparent in the summer of 1937, when Carl Orff, whom Rosenberg's « Kampfbund » had been battling since 1932, premiered his scenic Oratorio « Carmina Burana » . Drewes took an immediate dislike to Orff and, while never censuring outright any of the composer's current or future works, successfully intimidated him, keeping him in abeyance until well into the War. Raabe's office merely echoed Drewes's authority. Almost certainly, it was Drewes, too, not exactly a champion of modern music, who had prevailed on Göebbels to dissolve the « ADMV » against Raabe's wishes ; this, in fact, cemented the eternal enmity between the 2 functionaries.

Under the presidency of Peter Raabe, the « Reich » Music Chamber was to experience several personnel changes. The most important of these were the appointment of the composer Paul Græner as head of the composers' section, which Richard Strauß himself had led until the summer of 1935, and then Græner's own replacement 6 years later by Werner Egk, a former student and friend of Carl Orff and disposed, like Orff, toward the composition of more modern music. This change occurred over differences concerning the place of popular music, and because Göebbels, in the hope of establishing a uniquely Nazi musical style, had found it imperative to grant some leeway to the more progressive of Germany's composers. The traditionalist Græner, whom the Minister had derogatorily described as a « Santa Claus » , back in 1936, could give no such assurances. In any event, Egk's appointment at a nominally inferior but, in fact, extremely influential level after July 1941 reduced the power of both Drewes (who intermittently found himself at the war front) and Raabe who performed his duties rather perfunctorily, delivering speeches and conducting concerts throughout the « Reich » . Off and on, Göebbels considered replacing both Drewes and Raabe, for he could not say who was the duller of the 2. Wilhelm Furtwängler was reportedly interested in the « Reichsmusikkammer » post. In the end, both men proved indispensable for carrying-out the practical chores that had become their everyday routines in a period of scarce new talent. At the close of 1943, it was Drewes whom Göebbels credited with having resuscitated Berlin's musical scene after 1 year of severe British air attacks. But Raabe, too, had to postpone his plans to retire to private life « in order to write a couple more books ». Ironically, one of his final tasks was to decree, during late summer 1944, the dissolution of all major culture Orchestras in the « Reich », save for a fortunate few, such as the Berlin Philharmonic, that were still needed to uphold civilian and troop morale.

Berthold Goldschmidt (1903-1996) : Prominent Jewish composer and conductor who had experienced harassment as a Jew even before Adolf Hitler came to power. He escaped to England, in 1935. He stayed in obscurity until the 1980's when his work was again recognized internationally.

Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) : He emerged as one of the leading German conductors of his generation. After conducting « Tannhäuser », in 1933, on the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, Klemperer fled to the United States to escape Nazi persecution. He became conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1937. By 1955, after years of health problems, he was appointed the principal conductor of the London « Philharmonia » Orchestra.

Ernst Křenek (1900-1991) : Considered a respectable German Catholic until he wrote a modern Opera called, « Jonny Spielt Auf ! ». The storyline of the Opera featured a black man as the main character. The Opera was a musical mix of jazz, spiritual, and Classical. He employed special sound effects to depict traffic noise, trains, and sirens within the music.

Erik Wolfgang Korngold (1897-1957) : A Jewish child prodigy. By the age of 10, he composed « Der Schneemann » which was orchestrated and conducted by his teacher, Alexander von Zemlinsky. In 1934, he began writing musical arrangements for Hollywood films. While working in the United States, in 1938, the Nazis seized his Austrian home and property. Korngold never returned to live again in Austria. His lengthy Hollywood career produced 2 Academy Awards for film scores. He was a popular composer for films, generating music for more than 20 movies.

Arnold Schönberg (1874-1951) : Though he emigrated to the United States just after Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933, he understood what it meant to be persecuted and what lay ahead for the Jews who did not leave Germany. He foresaw the decimation of the Jews, and tried to get the public's attention.

His agenda stated :

« Anti-Semitism must be stopped. - A united Jewish Party must be created. - Unanimity in Jewry must be priority. - An independent Jewish State must be created. »

It is no wonder he drew the hatred of Adolf Hitler and the Nazis. He was telling the world that Hitler was dangerous before Hitler had a stranglehold on the German people.

Bruno Walter (1876-1962) : He was born Bruno Walter Schlesinger. Walter was the conductor of the Leipzig Orchestra and frequent guest-conductor of the Berlin Orchestra, prior to the 3rd « Reich » . In 1933, the Nazi government canceled his concerts due to the « threat to public order » . They could no longer guarantee his personal safety. Walter fled to Austria and, then, to the United States where he became a well-know conductor and music advisor.

Anton von Webern (1883-1945) : He was a staunch follower of Adolf Hitler, though not a member of the Nazi Party. He agreed with Hitler's writings, and felt that Hitler would moderate his policies concerning the Jews, after the 1st display of power. He was friends with Arnold Schönberg, an exiled German Jew whose music had been classified as degenerate and, thereby, banned. This friendship along with his advocacy of atonality in music got his works listed as degenerate. The Nazis burned his writings and forbade performances of his music after Hitler took-over Austria. He retired to a life in the country toward the end of the War. He was accidentally shot to death by an American soldier, in 1945, while smoking a cigarette at night, outside his daughter's home in Mittersill.

As with the visual arts, the Nazis aimed to demonstrate the difference between good « German » music and « degenerate » music by staging major cultural events. To this end, they organized the « Reichsmusiktage » (« Reich » Music Days) in Düsseldorf, from May 22 to 29, 1938. This week-long event included concerts and lectures that presented ideologically and ethnically « pure » music. It was accompanied by the « Degenerate Music » exhibition, which opened on May 24. The show was similar in concept to the « Degenerate Art » exhibition : its main purpose was to document the work of artists who had been defamed by the Nazi regime since 1933. The « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » (« Reich » Music Inspection Office) , which was part of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry, had drawn-up a list of « degenerate » artists and their works for this purpose. The exhibition covered all areas of music, from composition, performance and criticism to musicology and promotion. Examples of « degeneracy » were found in Classical music in composers such as Alban Berg, Paul Hindemith, or Igor Stravinsky, and in the genres of jazz and swing in general. The exhibit's main organizer was Privy Councilor Doctor Hans Severus Ziegler, who was director of the Weimar National Theatre. Ziegler was also head of the Cultural Office in the Gau of Thuringia, and had carried-out « cleansings against cultural Bolshevism » in Thuringia, even before 1933. The visual component of the exhibition consisted of photographs, portraits, paintings, caricatures, and posters intended to illustrate the « sub-human » character of the featured musicians and the inferiority of their works. One such example appeared on the cover of the Exhibition Guide. The image was based on the cover sheet of Ernst Křenek's Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (« Johnny Strikes-up the Band ! » , 1925-1926) , but replaced the carnation on the African-American saxophonist's lapel with a Star of David. The Opera had been banned in 1933, and Křenek, an Austrian, had emigrated to the United States after the annexation of his country (« Anschluß ») , in 1938.

The exhibition remained on view in Düsseldorf until June and subsequently traveled to other cities along with the « Degenerate Art » exhibit. As of 1938, the « Reich » Music Days were supposed to take place annually, but they were canceled after the beginning of the war in 1939.

Although the self-centered conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler might have periodically issued minor gestures of dissent or defiance, his musical activity served the requirements of the regime, at home and abroad. His performances often took place in « highly-propagandistic frameworks », such as when he directed Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » at the 1935 Nuremberg Party rally, which produced the Nuremberg racial laws and when he conducted at a performance honoring Adolf Hitler's birthday, in 1942. The regime paid the piper for his efforts. Hitler and especially Josef Goebbels made certain that Furtwängler's salary and other sources of income remained healthy. Michaël H. Kater concludes that Furtwängler was « an elitist, beholden to authority, and with a strongly conservative bent, a man who decided to ride-out a dangerous political storm, assuaging his ego with occasional humanitarian commitments which for him, the powerful culture broker, entailed very few risks » .

Whereas in Furtwängler's case, Kater seeks to revise existing scholarship. In other instances, Kater offers unprecedented political analysis of important figures. A good case in point is that of Carl Orff. Until Kater, we have known very little about the Nazi-era career of this composer, whose choral work « Carmina Burana » is the only work of « serious music » composed in the 3rd « Reich » that has become part of the standard repertory. (The sections on Carl Orff in « Twisted Muse » are drawn from a lengthier article by Michaël H. Kater in the « Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte », in 1995.)

Epitomized, the apolitical artist who, for the sake of his music, adjusted to political realities. Although he managed successfully to conceal the fact of his partial Jewish ancestry, he understandably perceived himself to be especially vulnerable. Kater argues that these circumstances led to « accommodate himself to a regime that, at heart, he detested » . The nature of Orff's compositions complicated his predicament. « Carmina Burana » , like most of Orff's compositions from the Nazi years, as certainly a far cry from the atonal modern compositions that the Nazis had ridiculed and banned, but as nevertheless « sufficiently idiosyncratic to be suspect » in some Nazi circles. His publishers and his producers shrewdly worked the system, sounding-out officials in the « Reich » Music Chamber and the Propaganda Ministry, in advance of performances. In Kater's estimation, this was the record of neither a « hero » nor a « Nazi villain » . Nor, it should be added, was it the record of a Nazi victim, as he preferred to portray himself, after 1945.

The example of Orff points-up a particular strength of the book, namely its ability to relate the fascinating details of individual careers to the unfolding of official policy and to institutional factors. For a musician, much could ride on an ability to negotiate one's way through the political-bureaucratic labyrinth. Those who succeeded in doing so should not automatically be categorized as Nazis. Yet, Kater's determination to illustrate the complexities and ambiguities of the era does not deter him from rendering harsh judgments where they are appropriate. Kater has little sympathy for German musicians, some of them household names, who collaborated with and prospered under National-Socialism, only to lie about their record after the War. In a particularly compelling section, Kater demolishes the post-War self-exculpatory assertions of soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. Kater also provides the most careful treatment to date of the Nazi-era career of Herbert von Karajan. As for musicians who were purged for artistic or « racial » reasons, never before has the readiness of large numbers of German musicians, both major and minor, to acquiesce or cooperate actively in the purge of their colleagues, been as thoroughly and persuasively documented.

Michaël H. Kater devotes many pages to German musicians who attempted to buck Nazi trends, and to those who left the country. His chapter on « Persecuted and Exiled Jewish and Anti-Nazi Musicians » offers fascinating portraits of several of the Century's most important musical figures, such as Bruno Walter, Arnold Schönberg, Otto Klemperer, and Kurt Weill. Kater has performed a valuable service by bringing their stories together in one place, integrating them into a study whose main focus is on what took place inside Germany's borders. These exiled German musicians were, after all, representatives of German musical traditions, a fact that should not be obscured by their physical separation from Germany, or by the willingness of the majority of their colleagues to make music under the auspices of National-Socialism.

Carl Orff

Carl Orff remains something of an enigma in the musical history of Nazi Germany. As an artist, the odds seemed stacked against him when the Nazis came to power : it was expected that the composer would become, yet, another victim of the 3rd « Reich » 's oppressive cultural policies. Yet, Orff managed to establish a place for himself and his music within Nazi Germany. Like that of Paul Hindemith and Ernst Křenek, Orff's music was often categorised as « degenerate » (« entartete ») . But the artist's attempts to ingratiate himself with the regime paid dividends. By the early 1940's, his music was celebrated by many Nazi elites, and his « Carmina Burana » was one of the most popular pieces in Nazi Germany. Yet, later on, by means of a misleading representation of his own « resistance activities » during the Nazi years, and by judiciously emphasising negative Nazi opinions of his music, he managed to secure a clean slate to perform and work in post-War Germany, untainted by his accommodationism throughout the Hitler years.

Carl Orff was born in 1895 into an upstanding Munich family of officers and scholars. His mother was an accomplished pianist who taught him when he was a child. While still a teenager, he enlisted, but returned home in 1917 after a near-lethal case of shell shock. After several years of experimentation, sampling various musical career possibilities, Orff became a partner in the Munich « Günther » School, an educational institution that united music and movement. The composer maintained a life-long interest in music education.

By the late- 1920's, Orff had established himself as a significant figure in the small but important modernist musical oasis in otherwise conservative Munich, the League for Contemporary Music. Founded in 1927, it presented works by Bartók, Hindemith, Schönberg and Stravinsky, among others. The young musician also collaborated briefly with Bertolt Brecht, and participated in the innovative new Bach Club in Munich, all of which solidified his reputation for being outside the mainstream, even avant-garde. Nonetheless, his star was slowly rising by the early 1930's, when Hitler came to power and the reality of making music in Germany was to change dramatically.

Like many other artists of the time, Orff was considered a leftist. He had many Jewish friends, including Kurt Weill and the poet Franz Werfel, and collaborated extensively with well-known Marxists like Brecht. There are also reports that Orff was a quarter Jewish, a fact that could only have added to his insecurities. Despite this, or perhaps because of it, Orff never either overtly or covertly resisted or opposed Nazi policies. Recognising the precariousness of his status in the new Nazi Germany, throughout the 1930's, he tried to establish his loyalty to the regime. Awarded a job composing music for schools, he developed his theories on music pedagogy, trying to integrate his ideas into the music policies of the « Hitler Jugend » (Hitler Youth) , sometimes tailoring them specifically to Nazi demands. Choosing to forget all associations with Jewish, leftist, or modernist artists, Orff emphasised his hatred of jazz music and the atonality of Schœnberg and his disciples, and emphasised his own sincere and deep-seated appreciation of folk music.

For years, Orff had been targeted by the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (Fighting League for German Culture, or « KfdK ») as a cultural bolshevist. This dangerous reputation was initially confirmed at the controversial premiere of what was to become his best-known work, « Carmina Burana » , in 1937. Despite Orff's increasing contacts with Nazi officials, and his well-regarded work in music pedagogy, the premiere was met with a stinging critique by the influential Nazi musicologist Hans Gerigk. According to Gerigk, « Carmina Burana » suffered from a « mistaken return to primitive elements of instrumentalism and a foreign emphasis on rhythmic formulae » . For most, such a damning review would have signalled the end of the piece, if not of the career of the composer. However, his positive contacts with high-ranking figures, and the sheer popularity of the piece with the public, gradually transformed it into a hit. Despite its exotic sounds and sexual themes, the piece came to be perceived as « a celebration of the power of an uninterrupted life instinct » and its elemental melodies and rhythms were said to bear witness to « the indestructible and always re-emerging power of the ways of the common people » .

The success of « Carmina Burana » led the mayor of Frankfurt to ask the composer to write alternative music for Mendelssohn's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » :

« His " Carmina Burana " exhibits exquisite beauty, and if we could get him to do something about his lyrics, his music would certainly be very promising. »

After the War, along with most artists who had continued to be active under the Nazis, Orff was placed on a black-list, as someone in potential need of denazification. However, he managed to clear his name with the help of an American friend. Suddenly afraid of being « too Nazi » , rather than not Nazi enough, Orff fabricated an elaborate account of his involvement in the Munich resistance group, the White Roses, organized by his friend Kurt Huber. (In fact, he had never had any involvement with the group.) In addition, despite « Carmina Burana » 's success under Adolf Hitler, he repeatedly represented the piece as covertly anti-Nazi. Orff died in Munich in 1982 as one of 20th Century Germany's most prominent composers.

The name Carl Orff generally means 1 of 2 things. The 1st is that Orff was the composer of the insistently earthy « Carmina Burana » , the ever-popular choral celebration of sex, drinking and youthful excess. The 2nd is that he was the foremost German composer to achieve international eminence during the Nazi years.

To a few people, Orff is also known for a small number of other works (especially those in which he attempted to repeat the success of « Carmina Burana ») and as the author of one of the 20th Century's most influential programmes of music education for children, a system still widely in use in many parts of the world. But these other achievements have inevitably been over-shadowed by « Carmina Burana » and the career in Adolf Hitler's Germany. The Cantata stands at the centre of Orff's output, while the Nazi connection affects every judgment about him.

It was the 1st performance of « Carmina Burana » in Frankfurt, in 1937, that established the Bavarian, then 41, as a major musical figure. Orff was so clear about the work's pivotal importance in his output that he later disowned almost everything he had written before it. But « Carmina Burana » also made Orff's name in Nazi cultural circles. After some initial official discomfort about the work's frank sexual innuendos, Orff's Cantata was elevated to the status of a signature piece in Nazi circles, where it was treated as an emblem of 3rd « Reich » « youth culture » . The Nazi newspaper, the « Völkischer Beobachter » , once pointed to Orff's Cantata as « the kind of clear, stormy, and yet always disciplined music that our time requires » .

But, as Tony Palmer's new film about Orff, « O Fortuna » , establishes, there is another thing we ought to know about the composer as well. The film, which takes its title from the opening phrase of « Carmina Burana » , makes it clear that Orff had the psychology of a permanent adolescent. He thought 1st and mainly about himself. He could not sustain adult relationships - including with a daughter whom he rejected. « He had his life and that was that » , she tells Palmer. The composer sought to avoid personal and moral responsibility in most things, and then wished to be forgiven for his failure to accept these responsibilities.

Mid- 20th Century Germany was unusually full of adults who wanted to forget their own and their society's failings during the Nazi years. Watching clips of Orff in Palmer's film, it is tempting to see him as a recognisable type of post-War German, a man carrying his part of a shared trauma about which he preferred to remain silent. Orff himself was never a paid-up Nazi. But he prospered under National-Socialist rule and he had a particular ugly secret of his own from the Nazi period, which Palmer's research has brought into the light.

In his home-town of Munich, Orff had long been a close friend of the Swiss-born academic Kurt Huber, who had helped him with his librettos for « Carmina Burana » and other works. Huber, however, was an anti-Nazi oppositionist, unlike Orff. Indeed, Huber was a founder of the « White Rose » resistance movement. This led to his arrest by the « Gestapo » , in February 1943, after which he was tortured, given a show trial and executed.

Orff called at Huber's house the day after the arrest, unaware of what had happened, and was informed about Huber's fate. His 1st reaction was to bewail the danger that he himself would now be ruined. Huber's wife pleaded with Orff to make representation or a statement on Huber's behalf. But Orff said nothing. « He only thought about himself » , recalls Huber's widow, Clara, in the film. She and the composer never met again.

Orff's self-protective reflex can certainly be understood. Which of us can be confident we would have reacted more bravely in such circumstances ? But Orff's moral slipperiness did not end there. Indeed, as Palmer shows, it gave way to a much less understandable hypocrisy. In 1946, the composer was interrogated by the denazification authorities. Eager to put himself on the right side of the Americans, Orff lied to his interrogators, claiming that he himself had been a co-founder of the « White Rose » group along with Huber.

Orff was given the all-clear ; he returned to public life and eminence in the new West Germany, where he worked and lived until his death, in 1982. Unsurprisingly, however, he was secretly ashamed of his guilty secret. Shortly after receiving his denazification all-clear, Orff wrote-out his feelings of guilt in an apologetic letter to the dead Huber - which was, of course, never made public.

All this tells us a lot about Orff the man. But what, if anything, does it tell us about Orff the musician ? On the face of it, nothing very much at all. And yet, as the 2 facts that most people know about Orff remind us, Orff's music has always been fated to be judged in the light of his severely compromised public life and of the deeply damaged personality Palmer's film so graphically depicts. It is hard to believe that either the enduring critical iciness towards Orff or the lack of establishment interest in performing any of his works other than « Carmina Burana » (and that only with a clothes-peg clamped ostentatiously over the managerial nose) are unrelated to Orff's chequered history.

In some ways, this is extremely unfair to Orff. He was, after all, a product of the Germany of his entire lifetime, not just of the Nazi years. For example, the life-long concern with « music for use » , which he shared with his contemporaries Paul Hindemith and Benjamin Britten, derives more from the egalitarian æsthetic preoccupations of the social democratic era of the Weimar Republic of the 1920's than from any specifically Nazi teaching.

The idea that composers should write music that was accessible to all classes (which Orff embodied in his « Schulwerk » projects for the musical education of children, and in some of his compositions for adult audiences) was widely shared in socialist and non-socialist Europe throughout the inter-War period, as well as in America. It is far from dead today, as the arts policies of the Labour government typify, and certainly far from discredited. As Alex Ross puts it in his lauded survey of 20th Century music, « The Rest Is Noise » (which skates rather quickly over Orff in other respects) :

« Untold millions of children would learn the basics of musical language by tapping-out notes on the mallet percussion instruments that Orff had constructed to his purposes. The man himself may have been politically duplicitous, but his passion for teaching was profound, and it probably touched more lives than any music described in this book. »

More than 60 years after the collapse of the 3rd « Reich » , the continuing popularity of « Carmina Burana » looks like outliving the taint of association that has harmed both the work and the composer for so long. The musical establishment may continue to agonise over the important question of whether a bad man can produce a great piece of work, or whether Orff's sub-Stravinskyan ostinatos are an explicit homage to the ethnic paganism in which the Nazis wallowed. But the musical public decided long ago that it has no such inhibitions.

Music, along with all other forms of culture, was subject to Nazification from January 1933 on. The policy of « Gleichschaltung » (coordination) meant that music had to conform to the Nazi ideal. Hence, some composers were tolerated and even elevated to a status of pure Nazism, while other composers, frequently Jewish, were shunned and effectively censored. Adolf Hitler, along with art, films and architecture, played a major part in what was musically tolerated and what was not.

German composers had played a huge part in defining Classical music during the 18th and 19th Centuries. Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Richard Wagner and Johannes Brahms all left their own individual mark on music and culture in general. In the 20th Century, the Austrian composer Arnold Schœnberg had also become very influential in Berlin, the city he worked in.

The influence of these composers, and others in Germany, was undeniable but their collective genius counted for nothing in Nazi Germany if they failed to impress Hitler. The « Führer » had an almost fanatical devotion to the work of Richard Wagner, which to Hitler represented everything that was good about culture in Nazi Germany. To Hitler, Wagner's music personified Nazism. His attendance at the Bayreuth Festival was very well publicised by the Ministry for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda. In fact, Hitler ordered that the Bayreuth Festival should become a National-Socialist annual event and performances continued up to 1944. The message Josef Gœbbels wanted to spread was a simple one : if the music of Richard Wagner was good enough for the « Führer » , everyone else in Nazi Germany should follow his lead and listen to good German / Nazi music. Therefore, there was enormous promotion of Wagner's music by German radio stations and major concert venues frequently played his music.

Other composers were not as favourably received and even listening to their music could have been deemed anti-Nazi and subversive with potentially dire consequences. Music by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Giacomo Meyerbeer was banned because they were Jewish. Arnold Schœnberg's music was banned because it was too radical and in the mind of Hitler simply not classically German. The same was true for the compositions of Paul Hindemith. He was an internationally recognized composer but, in Nazi Germany, his music was seen as being too experimental and decadent. Hitler banned his music from being played in concert halls while Gœbbels stated that Hindemith was an « atonal noise-maker » .

« Gleichschaltung » not only covered composers. Orchestras were purged of Jews as were the casts of Operas. For Hitler, only true Aryans could truly play the music of Wagner. Famous Jewish conductors went into exile to continue their work ; one of the most famous being Otto Klemperer who had international fame for his interpretation of Gustav Mahler. Equally famous for his interpretation of Mahler was Bruno Walter who was also a Jew. He had been criticised by Hitler pre-1933 and had to flee Germany once Hitler gained power. Walter went to Austria which was his primary base. Walter was working in Paris when the 1938 « Anschluß » took place and unable to return to either Germany or Austria, he settled in France which gave him citizenship.

Ironically, by fleeing Nazi Germany pre-1939, they may well have saved their lives. Despite the « Nazification » of music, some did stay in Hitler's Germany. The most famous was the conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler. He had fallen-out of favour with the Nazi establishment because of his defence of Paul Hindemith. However, he made his peace with the regime and remained in his posts at the Berlin Philharmonic and the Berlin State Opera. Richard Strauß was put in charge of the « Reich » Music Chamber, for some time, while the world famous pianist, Walter Gieseking, was sent abroad by Gœbbels to display his talent.

Concerts at halls such as the Berlin Opera House became major Party events. Senior Nazi functionaries were all but required to attend and there was a very good chance that the music on offer was composed by Richard Wagner.

What might be defined as popular music was also heavily controlled by the State. Jazz music was banned as it was considered to be « black music » with origins from the southern States of America. The Nazis associated jazz music with Black Americans and, as a result, it was labelled « degenerate » . Gœbbels also tried to ban « Lili Marlene » but had to backtrack when German soldiers throughout Europe requested that it was played on « Reich » controlled radio stations.

Chambre de la culture du « Reich »

The « Reichsmusikkammer » (« “ Reich ” Music Chamber » , « State Music Institute » , « State Music Bureau ») was a Nazi institution. It promoted « good German music » which was composed by Aryans and seen as consistent with Nazi ideals, while suppressing other, « degenerate » (« entartete ») music, which included atonal music, pop music such as jazz and country, those experimenting with electronics and music by Jewish composers as they were seen to be of non-artistic merit and produced solely for popularity and financial gain. The Institute was founded in 1933 by Josef Gœbbels and the « Reichskulturkammer » (State Bureau of Culture) , and it operated until the fall of the 3rd « Reich » , in 1945.

One of the Institute's primary goals (that of extolling and promoting « good German music » , specifically that of Beethoven, Wagner, Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Brahms and the like) was to legitimize the claimed world supremacy of Germany culturally. These composers and their music were re-interpreted ideologically to extol German virtues and cultural identity.

Music and composers who did not fall into the « Reichsmusikkammer » 's definition of « good German music » were deprecated and then banned. The Institute proscribed various great composers of the past, including the Jewish-by-birth composers Gustav Mahler, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, and Arnold Schönberg, and also Claude Debussy, who had married a Jew. The music of politically dissident composers such as Alban Berg was also banned. And composers whose music had ever been considered sexually suggestive or savage, such as Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky and the like, were denounced as « degenerate » and banned.

Jazz and swing music were seen as degenerate and proscribed. Jazz was labelled « Negermusik » (Negro Music) ; and swing music was associated with various Jewish band leaders and composers such as Artie Shaw and Benny Goodman. Also proscribed were Jewish « Tin Pan Alley » composers like Irving Berlin and George Gershwin.

The « Reichsmusikkammer » also functioned as a musicians' guild, with composers, performers, conductors, teachers, and instrument manufacturers being obliged to join in order to pursue or continue a career in music. Membership could be denied on grounds of race or politics. Dozens of composers, song writers, lyricists, and musicians were ruined or forced into exile because for one reason or another (often political or racial) they did not adhere to or comply with the « Reichsmusikkammer » 's standards. The career, for instance, of popular Operetta composer Leon Jessel was destroyed by the Institute when it promoted boycotts of his music and finally banned it.

Although Josef Goebbels and other high-level Nazis in the « Reichskulturkammer » (« Reich » Culture Institute) basically controlled the « Reichsmusikkammer » , titular presidents and vice-presidents were appointed ; in the beginning, this was largely for the sake of the Music Institute's public relations and prestige.

President :

Because of his international fame, composer Richard Strauß, although privately a critic of the Nazi « Reich » , was installed as president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , in November 1933. Strauß's motivations in accepting the post were largely to protect his Jewish daughter-in-law and Jewish grand-children, and to preserve and conduct the music of banned composers like Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy, and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. He was dismissed from the post, in June 1935, when a letter to his Jewish librettist Stefan Zweig, critical of Nazi racial profiling, was intercepted by the « Gestapo » .

Peter Raabe was appointed President after Strauß's dismissal. For much of his tenure as president, Raabe was not the sole leader regarding musical culture in the « Reich » . In 1936, Josef Goebbels appointed Heinz Drewes, then general music director of Altenburg, to head a department of music in the Propaganda Ministry, resulting in confused and tangled roles. Raabe tried to resign in 1938, but his resignation was not accepted, and he served until the end of the « Reich » , in 1945.

Vice-president :

Renowned conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler was appointed vice-President of the Institute, in 1933. However, he refused to adhere to the ban on Paul Hindemith's « Mathis der Maler » , and resigned in 1934 condemning anti-Semitism.

Paul Græner was appointed vice-president upon Furtwängler's resignation. He resigned in 1941.

« I have at last learned the lesson that has been forced upon me during this year, and I shall not ever forget it. It is that I am not a German, not a European, indeed perhaps scarcely a human being (at least, the Europeans prefer the worst of their race to me) but I am a Jew. » (Arnold Schönberg)

After the horrors of World War I, most Europeans expressed their sense of freedom by embracing the roaring 1920's. A decadent lifestyle was emerging from the night life of jazz clubs and cabarets. Berlin was at the heart of the bold and innovative music trends of the 1920's and 1930's. Musicians experimented with their art by pushing away from accepted musical forms and finding new ones.

While many Europeans were celebrating new-found freedom in the arts, Germany was already beginning to fall under the shadow of the swastika. For almost 100 years, an atmosphere of anti-Semitism had been growing in Europe. Richard Wagner, the well-known composer, had spoken publicly against the Jewish people in his booklet, « Das Judenthum in die Musik » (Judaism in Music) . The Nazi Party played upon these historic prejudices in their rise to power.

19th Century psychologists introduced the term degenerate (or « entartete ») to describe any deviance or clinical mental illness. Later, a broader definition was applied to include scientific literature (medical, biology and anthropology) . By 1933, Hitler's 3rd « Reich » referred to the mentally ill, communists, Gypsies, homosexuals and Jews as subspecies of the human race. The words « Jewish » , « Degenerate » , and « Bolshevik » were commonly used to describe any art or music not acceptable to the 3rd « Reich » .

After the race laws of 1933, the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) required a registry of all German musicians. As a result, 100's of talented composers had their work deliberately suppressed and careers ended simply because their race or style of music offended the 3rd « Reich » . By 1938, examples of degenerate music were on display at the « Entarte » Musik Exhibit for the public to view. Famous works by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Gustav Mahler, and Arnold Schönberg were used as examples of unacceptable music. A generation of incredibly innovative and promising musicians was virtually excluded from its place in music history.

The « Reichsmusikkammer » registry was completed in 1940 and included all musicians' race and religion. Those Jews who had escaped detection up until 1940 were now in jeopardy. It was easy to find and arrest Jews based on this list. The following composers were considered « degenerate » by the Nazi regime.

On 13 February 1934, the composer Richard Strauß gave a speech celebrating one of the central cultural institutions of the 3rd « Reich » : the « Reichskulturkammer » (« RKK » , or « Reich » Chamber of Culture) and its musical division, the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« RMK » , or « Reich » Chamber of Music) . His speech not only revealed the accommodationist approach taken by many (non-Jewish) musicians in Nazi Germany, but also reflected the ways in which some musicians who were not directly persecuted by these organisations hoped to profit from them. Strauß' speech began :

« The " Reichskulturkammer " (the dream and goal of all German musicians for decades) was created on 15 November 1933, thus constituting an important step in the direction of the reconstruction of our total German musical life. At this point, I feel compelled to thank « Reich » Chancellor Adolf Hitler and « Reich » Minister Doctor Goebbels, in the name of the entire musical profession of Germany, for the creation of the " Reichskulturkammer ", since Adolf Hitler's seizure of power has not only resulted in a transformation of the political situation in Germany, but also of its culture, and since the National-Socialist government has called to life the " Reichskulturkammer ", it is evident that the new Germany is not willing to allow artistic life to remain in isolation, but that new ways and means will be explored for the revival of our musical culture. »

After Strauß's declaration of loyalty and optimism, Gustav Havemann conducted an orchestral performance of those « most German » of composers, Beethoven and Wagner, and the event concluded with a group rendition of the Nazi hymn, the « Horst Wessel Lied » .

This celebration marked the beginning of a new phase of cultural production in Germany. For the duration of Adolf Hitler's rule, from 1933 to 1945, artists in Germany were mandatorily organized under one of the branches of the « Reichskulturkammer » . Founded only months after the Nazi seizure of power, the « Reichskulturkammer » was intended to consolidate, purify and strengthen Germany's cultural life. The « Reichskulturkammer » was divided into 7 separate branches : film, music, theatre, press, writing, visual art and radio. With its jurisdiction extending to all spheres of German music, the « Reichsmusikkammer » was sub-divided and organized regionally. It included branches for composers, musicians and music teachers, and separate departments for concerts, choral and folk music, music publishing houses and musical businesses. At its founding, Strauß was appointed president, and Wilhelm Furtwängler, his deputy. The organisation was intended to have a dual impact on German music. Its primary goal, especially in the early years, was the « cleansing » of the musical world, which consisted primarily of eliminating Jews, foreigners and political leftists from the musical scene, and ensuring that music composed by such « undesirables » was neither available nor performed. (Almost simultaneous with the creation of the « Reichskulturkammer » was the creation of the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Cultural League) , which was intended to temporarily employ the thousands of Jews fired by the actions of the « Reichskulturkammer ») . The 2nd goal of the organisation was improving the situation of « Aryan » musicians.

Under the leadership of Strauß and Furtwängler, the « Reichsmusikkammer » worked to improve the situation of German musicians, especially composers. As Paul Græner, future vice-President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , pronounced in 1934 :

« The great work of the " Reichskulturkammer " extended itself over all artistic professions thus the instrument was created for the application of the grand design of corporate reconstruction for the benefit of the art and artists. This refers not only to a renewal of organisation, inasmuch as the " Reichskulturkammer ", especially the " Reichsmusikkammer ", will watch over the intellectual and artistic life of the nation. »

In its role as guardian of the « artistic life of the nation » , the « Reichsmusikkammer » was especially interested in reforming music education programmes for youth, as well as in training young musicians. By the mid 1930's, it had successfully lobbied for increases in state spending for musicians, especially for Orchestras ; in 1935, standardised wages and maximum work hours for musicians were set by the State, and during the Chamber's 1st few years, the number of unemployed musicians fell substantially. There was also increased support for lesser-known « Aryan » musicians, and for rediscoveries of forgotten works.

Substantial as these improvements were, they were overshadowed by more high-profile acts of purging, defamation, intimidation and vilification. Indeed, Josef Gœbbels lost his 2 flagship leaders over such « Reichsmusikkammer » initiated actions : vice-President Furtwängler (as well as Gustav Havemann) , in 1934, over the « Hindemith affair » , and President Strauß, a year later, over his collaboration with Stefan Zweig. Their replacements (respectively, Paul Græner and Peter Raabe) were both more active and involved in the activities of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , but also far more ideologically committed to the Nazi agenda, and more subservient to Goebbels. One of Raabe's 1st actions as President was to establish a list of black-listed Jewish and foreign works, something Strauß had refused to do. The list included over 100 composers whose work could be neither publicly performed nor broadcast, and included Aaron Copland, Otto Klemperer and Artur Schnabel. Musicians were limited in the repertoire they were allowed to play ; all « undesirable » music (that of Jews and foreigners - especially Americans -, and jazz) was officially prohibited.

The bulk of « Reichsmusikkammer » energy was focused on eliminating « degenerate influences » from the musical world. From its inception, it required all members to be registered, which functioned as a racial screening process. 2 of the most successful Jewish musicians in Germany, conductor Bruno Walter and composer Arnold Schönberg, were harassed, forced to cancel performances and resign their positions. Jews began to be systematically purged as a centralised bureaucracy and replaced with more « ideologically reliable » people. Professional Jewish musicians were fired, and the music of Jewish composers was banned. There were also comprehensive bans on Poles (with the exception of Frederic Chopin) , Russians, French (except Georges Bizet) and black musicians. Many musicians eventually emigrated out of fear and financial desperation, including some of Germany's leading composers, conductors and instrumental virtuosi.

One of the highlights of « Reichsmusikkammer » activity was the 1938 Düsseldorf « Reichsmusiktage » (« Reich » Music Days) , intended to present the glory of « purified » German music. There was a focus on military music, but an exhibition was also put together on « Entartete Musik » (Degenerate music) , under the guidance of Hans Severus Ziegler. Due to its great popularity, the show was intended to become an annual event, allowing the general population to experience and celebrate « Aryan » music ; the outbreak of war, however, meant that the 2nd show, in 1939, was the last. War brought worsened conditions within Germany, as funding decreased, institutions shut down, musicians were enlisted, and travel became extremely difficult for Orchestras. Many « Reichsmusikkammer » activities had to be curtailed. There was also an increased conservatism in German music ; many previously tolerated composers, including Igor Stravinsky, were now subject to a ban. But despite the War, the « Reichsmusikkammer » continued to fight for the cause of German musicians, and, even at the peak of fighting, it was able to maintain a relatively high employment rate amongst musicians in Germany. There were also some new opportunities for German musicians, particularly performing for soldiers on the front. The importance that the Nazi Party ascribed to cultural activity is indeed reflected in the remarkable diversity and quantity of music and theatre offered to soldiers during the War.

As with the visual arts, the Nazis aimed to demonstrate the difference between good « German » music and « degenerate » music by staging major cultural events. To this end, they organized the « Reichsmusiktage » (« Reich » Music Days) in Düsseldorf, from May 22nd to 29th, 1938. This week-long event included concerts and lectures that presented ideologically and ethnically « pure » music. It was accompanied by the « Degenerate Music » exhibition, which opened on May 24th. The show was similar in concept to the « Degenerate Art » exhibition - its main purpose was to document the work of artists who had been defamed by the Nazi regime since 1933. The « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » (« Reich » Music Inspection Office) , which was part of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry, had drawn-up a list of « degenerate » artists and their works for this purpose. The exhibition covered all areas of music, from composition, performance and criticism to musicology and promotion. Examples of « degeneracy » were found in Classical music in composers such as Alban Berg, Paul Hindemith, or Igor Stravinsky, and in the genres of jazz and swing in general. The exhibit's main organizer was Privy Councilor Doctor Hans Severus Ziegler, who was director of the Weimar National Theater. Ziegler was also head of the Cultural Office in the « Gau » of Thuringia, and had carried-out « cleansings against cultural Bolshevism » in Thuringia even before 1933. The visual component of the exhibition consisted of photographs, portraits, paintings, caricatures, and posters intended to illustrate the « sub-human » character of the featured musicians and the inferiority of their works. One such example appeared on the cover of the exhibition guide. The image was based on the cover-sheet of Ernst Křenek's Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Jonny Strikes up the Band ! » , 1925-1926) , but replaced the carnation on the African-American saxophonist's lapel with a Star of David. The Opera had been banned in 1933, and Křenek, an Austrian, had emigrated to the United States after the annexation of his country (« Anschluß ») , in 1938.

The exhibition remained on view in Düsseldorf until June and, subsequently, traveled to other cities along with the « Degenerate Art » exhibit. As of 1938, the « Reich » Music Days were supposed to take place annually, but they were canceled after the beginning of the War, in 1939.

On 13 February 1934, the composer Richard Strauß gave a speech celebrating one of the central cultural institutions of the 3rd « Reich » : the « Reichskulturkammer » (« Reich » Chamber of Culture, or « RKK ») and its musical division, the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Chamber of Music, or « RMK ») . His speech not only revealed the accommodationist approach taken by many (non-Jewish) musicians in Nazi Germany, but also reflected the ways in which some musicians who were not directly persecuted by these organisations hoped to profit from them. Strauß's speech began :

« The " Reichskulturkammer " (the dream and goal of all German musicians for decades) was created on 15 November 1933, thus constituting an important step in the direction of the reconstruction of our total German musical life. At this point, I feel compelled to thank " Reich " Chancellor Adolf Hitler and " Reich " Minister Doctor Gœbbels, in the name of the entire musical profession of Germany, for the creation of the " Reichskulturkammer " since Adolf Hitler's seizure of power has not only resulted in a transformation of the political situation in Germany, but also of its culture, and since the National-Socialist government has called to life the " Reichsmusikkammer ", it is evident that the new Germany is not willing to allow artistic life to remain in isolation, but that new ways and means will be explored for the revival of our musical culture. »

After Strauß's declaration of loyalty and optimism, Gustav Havemann conducted an orchestral performance of those « most German » of composers, Beethoven and Wagner, and the event concluded with a group rendition of the Nazi hymn, the « Horst Wessel Lied » .

This celebration marked the beginning of a new phase of cultural production in Germany. For the duration of Hitler's rule, from 1933 to 1945, artists in Germany were mandatorily organized under one of the branches of the «

Reichskulturkammer » . Founded only months after the Nazi seizure of power, the « Reichskulturkammer » was intended to consolidate, purify and strengthen Germany's cultural life. The « Reichskulturkammer » was divided into 7 separate branches : film, music, theatre, press, writing, visual art and radio. With its jurisdiction extending to all spheres of German music, the « Reichsmusikkammer » was sub-divided and organized regionally. It included branches for composers, musicians and music teachers, and separate departments for concerts, choral and folk music, music publishing houses and musical businesses. At its founding, Strauß was appointed president, and Wilhelm Furtwängler his deputy. The organisation was intended to have a dual impact on German music. Its primary goal, especially in the early years, was the « cleansing » of the musical world, which consisted primarily of eliminating Jews, foreigners and political leftists from the musical scene, and ensuring that music composed by such « undesirables » was neither available nor performed. (Almost simultaneous with the creation of the « Reichskulturkammer » was the creation of the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Cultural League) , which was intended to temporarily employ the thousands of Jews fired by the actions of the « Reichskulturkammer ») . The 2nd goal of the organisation was improving the situation of « Aryan » musicians.

« Reichsmusiktage »

On 22 May 1938, the 125th anniversary of Richard Wagner's birth, the « Reichsmusiktage » (« Reich » Music Days) officially opened in Düsseldorf. This was a long-planned and carefully orchestrated event, intended to show both Germans and the international community that the musical arts were thriving under the Nazi regime. New works by leading « Aryan » composers were premiered, and the programme was dominated by the works of great German composers from Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart to Richard Wagner and Anton Bruckner. In addition to the wide-range of performances and lectures, the « Reichsmusiktage » also marked the opening of the « Entartete Musik » (degenerate music) exhibit, organized by Hans Severus Ziegler. Modelled after the previous year's successful exhibit of « Entartete Kunst » (degenerate art) , the exhibit was intended to show the cultural degradation and moral threat posed to the nation by Jewish and other « degenerate » musicians. The category of « degenerate » was difficult to define, in music as much as in the visual arts, but the dominant criteria for inclusion in Ziegler's show were race and « modernism » . The advertisement for the exhibit showed a black jazz musician with the features of an ape, playing a saxophone and wearing a Jewish star. Perhaps, ironically, the composer whose Opera was the source of this image was neither Jewish or black ; rather, it was the Catholic Austrian Ernst Křenek, whose enormously popular Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Jonny Strikes Up the Band ! » , 1925-1926) became the inspiration for Ziegler's nightmare of musical and racial degeneration.

...

kulturbolschewistischer » und « entarteter Kunst » auf der anderen Seite unterschieden. Inhaltliche und stilistische Argumente wurden dabei mehr und mehr durch rassistische Aussagen ersetzt. Die Nationalsozialisten versuchten die Gleichschaltung der Kunst durch Sonderveranstaltungen und Festspiele zu fördern und der Bevölkerung als das « Deutsche » nahezubringen. Hierzu gehörten auch die Reichsmusiktage, die am 22. Mai 1938, dem 125. Geburtstag von Richard Wagner, in Düsseldorf eröffnet wurden. Sie standen unter der Schirmherrschaft von Josef Goebbels, der sie als Veranstaltung für « musikpolitische Grundsatzklärungen und Weichenstellungen » bezeichnete. Die Veranstaltung dauerte vom 22. - 29. Mai und wurde von Heinz Drewes, dem Leiter der Musikabteilung im Propagandaministerium, organisiert.

Im Rahmen der Reichsmusiktage wurde am 24. Mai 1938 eine Ausstellung im Kunstpalast am Ehrenhof in Düsseldorf eröffnet, die unter dem Namen « Entartete Musik », an die im Jahre 1937 zuvor in München stattfindende Ausstellung « Entartete Kunst » anknüpfte. Als Hauptverantwortlicher der Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » galt Hans Severus Ziegler, einer der frühesten Anhänger von Adolf Hitler und seit 1935 Generalintendant des Weimarer Nationaltheaters.

In dieser Ausstellung wurde öffentlich die Musik angeprangert, die nicht in die Weltanschauung der Nationalsozialisten hineinpasste, besonders die Werke von jüdischen Künstlern. Wie schon zuvor in München, wurden auch auf dieser Ausstellung in Düsseldorf abschreckende Beispiele von « entarteter Musik » vorgeführt. In über 50 Vitrinen sah man neben Büchern, Partituren und Bühnenbildern auch Fotos und verunglimpfende Karikaturen. Außerdem konnten per Knopfdruck Ausschnitte aus Schallplatten-Einspielungen der angeprangerten Werke angehört werden.

In der Ausstellung wurden neben Musikern auch Musikwissenschaftler, Musikdirektoren, Musikkritiker, Musikpädagogen sowie Dirigenten angeprangert und deren Werke und Schriften als « entartet » bezeichnet. Sowohl « nicht-arische » Persönlichkeiten wie Alban Berg, Arnold Schönberg oder Kurt Weill als auch « arische » Musiker wie Paul Hindemith, der mit einer Jüdin verheiratet war, sowie Igor Strawinsky aus Russland waren verfeimt.

Die Ausstellung war in Düsseldorf bis zum 14. Juni 1938 zu sehen und wurde danach noch in Weimar, München und Wien gezeigt. Es gab dazu keinen begleitenden Katalog, sondern nur die als Broschüre gedruckte Eröffnungsrede von Hans Severus Ziegler im Düsseldorfer Kunstpalast. Auf der Titelseite dieser Broschüre war ein schwarzer Jazz-Saxophonist als Karikatur zu sehen. Provozierend daran war zum einen das bewußt überzeichnete Gesicht, im Kontrast zur Kleidung, Frack und Zylinder des Musikers, zum anderen aber auch der große Davidstern, der anstelle einer Nelke im Knopfloch prangte. Die Nationalsozialisten wählten diese fiktive Figur als Symbol der Ausstellung und auch der gesamten Reichsmusiktage 1938 als Inbegriff der Entartung. Die Karikatur erinnert an den schwarzen Musiker Jonny, die Titelfigur aus Ernst Kreneks Oper Jonny spielt auf ! , gegen die NSDAP-Mitglieder schon vor 1933 protestiert hatten.

Zum Höhepunkt der Reichsmusiktage zählte neben dieser Ausstellung auch eine « kulturpolitische Kundgebung » . Neben einer Ansprache von Reichspropagandaminister Goebbels und einer Rede von Gauleiter Friedrich Karl Florian dirigierte Richard Strauß selbst sein « Festliches Präludium Opus 61 » , ein Werk für Orchester und Orgel aus dem Jahr 1913, das er extra für diese Gelegenheit neu besetzte. Weiterhin wurden in ganz Düsseldorf auf verschiedenen Plätzen so genannte Platzkonzerte gegeben, musikwissenschaftliche Symposien sowie Fachtagungen von Komponisten und Musikpädagogen veranstaltet, wobei die Verkörperung und Darstellung des « Deutschen » in der Musikkultur diskutiert wurde. Es wurden außerdem insgesamt drei Opern uraufgeführt.

Eigentlich hatte Goebbels die Reichsmusiktage als feststehende, jährlich stattfindende Einrichtung vorgesehen, doch wurden sie nach einer Wiederholung im Mai 1939 wegen des Zweiten Weltkriegs nicht mehr durchgeführt.

Weder in Deutschland noch in der ausländischen Presse wurden die Reichsmusiktage 1938 als bedeutendes Ereignis wahrgenommen. Im Gegensatz zur vorausgegangenen Kunstausstellung im Jahr 1937 in München waren sowohl die Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » als auch die Reichsmusiktage als Ganzes für viele Mitläufer des nationalsozialistischen Kulturbetriebs ein Misserfolg. Da zumeist Künstler verurteilt wurden, die schon ins Ausland emigriert waren, konnte die gesamte Veranstaltung nicht direkt zu Beschlagnahmungen oder Verboten führen. Ebenso war die propagandistische Auswertung der Ausstellung damals begrenzt, die Reaktionen aus dem In- und Ausland waren eher bescheiden und zurückhaltend. Während manche Zeitungen immerhin ihre Verwunderung darüber aussprachen, warum so bekannte Komponisten wie Paul Hindemith und Igor Strawinsky als « entartet » eingestuft wurden, blieben die Reaktionen aus dem Ausland merkwürdig zurückhaltend. Die in den USA erscheinende Zeitschrift « Musical America » beschränkte sich lediglich auf eine Auflistung der als « entartet » eingestuften Werke und Komponisten. Die Londoner Times schien ganz im Zeichen der damaligen Appeasement-Politik sogar ein wenig Verständnis für diese Aktion aufzubringen. Der regimetreue Dirigent Peter Raabe, damaliger Präsident der Reichsmusikkammer, blieb den Eröffnungsfeierlichkeiten der Reichsmusiktage 1938 demonstrativ fern. Allerdings wurden solche negativen Reaktionen durch die nationalsozialistische Zensur von Presse und Rundfunk der Öffentlichkeit verschwiegen.

« Jüdischer Kulturbund »

En avril 1933, 2 mois après la proclamation du 3e « Reich », les Juifs allemands sont écartés de toute activité professionnelle publique. Avec les lois raciales de Nuremberg, en 1935, ils seront déchus de la nationalité allemande. Dès octobre 1933, les artistes juifs se regroupent en associations, tolérées par le régime, sous le contrôle du « Reichskulturverwalters » Hans Hinkel et jouant pour un public exclusivement juif dans des lieux exclusivement juifs. Le « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » est dirigé par le Docteur Kurt Singer et se développe dans 60 villes allemandes. Après 1935, parce qu'on ne peut pas être « Juif et Allemand en même temps », la fédération se transforme en « Jüdischer Kulturbund in Deutschland ». En 1938, une exposition appelée « Entartete Musik » à Düsseldorf, essayera de démontrer que la musique des Juifs est une musique dégénérée « nègre, bolchévique et cosmopolite » incompatible avec les standards de la musique allemande définis par Josef Goebbels suivant, en cela, les idées de Richard Wagner, de Theodor Stengel ou de Hans Pfitzner. Ainsi, en 1938, environ 2,300 musiciens juifs auront été chassés des activités musicales du « Reich ». Plus de 180,000 Juifs de toute l'Allemagne deviendront membres actifs de l'association. Pendant sa Ire année d'activité, le « Kulturbund » présentera 69 Opéras et 117 concerts et, de mi-1934 à mi-1935, 57 Opéras et 358 concerts. La fédération culturelle juive durera jusqu'en 1941. À partir de ce moment-là, tous les musiciens juifs auront, soit choisi l'exil, soit été directement assassinés, soit déportés dans des camps de concentration où ils seront assassinés peu après. Seuls quelques-uns survivront.

« Jüdischer Kulturbund » , or « Der Jüdische Kulturbund » , was a Cultural Federation of German Jews, established in 1933. It hired over 1,300 men and 700 women artists, musicians, and actors fired from German institutions, and grew to about 70,000 members, according to some authors. Saul Friedländer speaks of at least 180,000.

The organisation was originally named « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » (Cultural Federation of German Jews) , in 1933, but, in April 1935, the Nazi authorities (forcing the organisation to delete the term German from the name) imposed a change of the name into « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Cultural Federation) . Also known as the « Kubu » , this institution was created by unemployed Jewish performers with the consent of the Nazis « for » the Jewish population. The Nazis permitted this association to hide its oppression of Jews. The « Kulturbund » was one of the most famous examples of Jewish creativity in response to cultural exclusion. It provided a semblance of leisure for its 70,000 members in 49 different locals.

After the exclusion of Jewish Germans and gentile Germans of Jewish descent from participating in almost all organisations and public events, the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » tried to provide some compensation, as tried « Israelitisches Familienblatt » .

The « Kulturbund » put on theatrical performances, concerts, exhibitions, Operas and lectures all over Germany, performed by Jewish entertainers, artists, writers, scientists, which were no longer permitted by the Nazi Party regime to appear before audiences. Thus, Jewish performers could earn again their, however scarce, livelihood. The performances took place at authorized segregated venues with « Jewish only » attendance, meaning Jewish Germans and gentile Germans of Jewish descent and their eventually gentile spouses.

Following the « Kristallnacht » pogroms, on November 9 and 10, 1938, the « Kulturbund » was allowed to continue its activities ; however, the discrimination and persecution of Jews had driven many into impoverishment. The number of venues and of ensemble members was reduced.

On December 16, Hans Hinkel, State commissioner for Prussian theatre affairs including the « Kulturbund » , in Josef Goebbels' « Reich » 's Propaganda Ministry, declared in front of Doctor Werner Levie (1903-1945) , a Dutchman and, therefore, one of the few available members (not in hiding or arrested) of « Kulturbund » 's executive board that, until the end of December, all the still existing 76 Jewish German publishing companies were to be shut down or sold to so-called Aryan owners. The few publications, which would still be permitted to appear, were to be directed by a publishing department to be formed within « Kulturbund » . In January 1939, the « Kulturbund » 's publishing department opened in the offices formerly used by the « Zionist Jüdische Rundschau » , which had been shut down right after the Pogrom, with its former editor, Erich Liepmann, being the manager of the publishing department. The « Kulturbund » managed to save a great deal of the book stocks of the to-be-ceased publishing houses from being pulped. Levie reached the concession, that Jewish publishers obliged to liquidate their companies, might export their book stocks on their own until April 1939 if the respective purchasers would pay in foreign exchange to the « Reichsbank » . However, the publishers would be paid in inconvertible « Reichsmarks » only.

The « Kulturbund » 's publishing department bought the remaining book stocks from their old proprietors at a discount of 80 % to 95% of the original price and would only pay, once proceeds from sales abroad or to German or Austrian Jews and gentiles of Jewish descent would materialise. Also Austria, annexed by Germany in March 1938, was covered by the « Kulturbund » 's publishing department.

The Propaganda Ministry only allowed the « Kulturbund » to continue to exist, if it would change its statutes to that effect that the Minister (Göebbels) may (at any time) interfere in affairs of the executive board, even dissolve the « Kulturbund » and dispose of its assets. The changed statutes came into effect on 4 March 1939.

The « Kulturbund » 's executive secretary Levie emigrated to the Netherlands at the end of August 1939. He was succeeded by Johanna Marcus, who soon also emigrated and then by Willy Pless. The « Kulturbund » 's performing activities, nonetheless, were embraced by the Jewish population who previously were barred from all cultural and entertainment events.

On September 11, 1941, the « Gestapo » ordered the closure of the « Kulturbund » , but excepted its publishing department, which was to be taken over by the « Reichsvereinigung der Juden in Deutschland » .

Jewish observers state that, ironically, the « Kubu » produced what amounted to the best theatre, cabaret, concerts, Opera, conferences in Germany during the Nazi era.

The « Kulturbund » 's publishing department sold books from its stock to Jewish Germans and Austrians and thus created a surplus, which partly covered losses in the performing department. A considerable sum was transferred to the Central Office for Jewish Emigration, to pay emigration fees levied from lucky receivers of foreign visas, who, however, were too poor to pay them.

The conductor Joseph Rosenstock led the Opera department. The 1st opera was « The Marriage of Figaro on 14 November 1933.

Mozart in the Ghetto : The « Jüdischer Kulturbund » and « Figaros Hochzeit »

It seems ironic that one of the earliest manifestations of the Mozart Diaspora actually took place inside Nazi Germany. A staged performance of « Figaros Hochzeit » opening in Berlin, in November 1933, almost 10 months after the Nazis seized power, became the 1st Opera to have been performed by the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Cultural League) . Spearheaded by a group of idealists including Doctor Kurt Singer, the recently dismissed assistant director of the « Stadtische Oper » in Berlin, the theatre critic Julius Bab, Berlin's chief rabbi Leo Baeck, the former conductor of the Mannheim Opera, Joseph Rosenstock, producer Kurt Baumann and economist and journalist Werner Levie, the Jewish Cultural League was established by the Nazis to enable Jews to continue working in the cultural sphere despite being deprived of their employment opportunities in Germany's theatres and Opera Houses. It also provided an exclusively Jewish audience with cultural sustenance at a time when German Jews were undergoing the constant trauma of officially engineered boycotts and racial persecution.

Singer was given the job of persuading the Nazi authorities of the viability of the Jewish Cultural League. Despite some initial hesitancy on the part of the regime, the organisation was sanctioned in June 1933 by Hans Hinkel, who was then Commissar for the Prussian Ministry of Science, Education and Art. A memorandum of agreement between Singer and Hinkel, drafted on 7 July 1933, established the conditions under which the « Kulturbund » could operate, namely that all its members had to be Jewish, that performances were to be given to exclusively Jewish audiences who had paid seasonal subscriptions, that all programmes had to be approved by the regime at least 1 month in advance, and that any advertisements or announcements about its activities would only be placed in the Jewish press.

The summer months of 1933 were spent recruiting professional actors and musicians, while the small « Berliner Theater » on « Charlottenstraße » was leased for the Jewish Cultural League's exclusive use. As plans for its opening season were unveiled, the organisation published its 1st monthly letter, in October 1933. The central message, linking the various declarations included in this bulletin, promised that a peaceful co-existence between German and Jewish culture could be achieved, and that members of the Jewish Cultural League should be able to perform the Classic repertory with which all Germans, irrespective of racial origin, had grown-up. Julius Bab underlined this sentiment eloquently :

« This German culture, in its Classical form, as we have welcomed it, has always been an open gate to the entire world, a way to the whole of humanity ; and, in this very sense, we, as Gennan Jews, want to and have to enshrine it, if we want to escape the inwardly dangerous return to the " Ghetto ". For this reason, the Classical creators of Germany and the world, Lessing and Gœthe, Shakespeare and Molière, Mozart and Beethoven will continue to be essential for our theatrical experience.

The theatre that we are creating will be a Jewish one but, at the same time, a German one ; it will flourish from this very double root of existence, which nurtures us as Gennan Jews, and from which we cannot be separated as long as we live. »

An indication of the organisation's aims can be gleaned from the choice of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing's play « Nathan der Weise » (Nathan, the Wise) and Mozart's « Figaros Hochzeit » that were to open its 1st season. As a plea for religious tolerance, the Lessing, « written in a true spirit of brotherhood during the Enlightenment and dedicated to the dramatist's Jewish friend, the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn » , was produced in an audacious manner. Although the programme book respectfully asked the audience to refrain from indulging in political discussions, in or near the theatre, the decision to present « Nathan » alone on stage, in the final scene, rather than emphasise a sense of harmonious unity between Christian, Jew and Muslim, provided a telling commentary on the isolation that was currently facing Germany's Jews.

At 1st glance, « Figaros Hochzeit » , produced by Kurt Singer with Heinz Condell, as stage-designer, and Joseph Rosenstock, as conductor, must have seemed more remote from the immediate concerns of its Jewish audience than Lessing's play. Nonetheless, its selection cannot have been completely unintentional. Besides reflecting a triumphantly successful example of the fruitful creative partnership between the composer and his Jewish-born librettist, the Opera, at least in its original incarnation, represented a challenge to the established order, attacking authoritarianism and making a plea for equality, liberty and fraternity. Hinkel and the Nazi censors responsible for sanctioning the performance may have been unaware of its subversive undercurrents, merely regarding the work as an entertaining and diverting comedy.

The extent to which audiences at « Figaro » picked-up on these resonances remains unclear, judging by the reviews of the Opera that appeared in the Jewish press. Apart from praising the qualities of the performance, most critics naturally chose to emphasize the specifically Jewish elements that contributed to Mozart's work. Writing in the « Gemeinblatt der Jüdischen Gemeinde zu Berlin », Ludwig Misch made pointed reference to the Jewish provenance of Mozart's librettist, Lorenzo Da Ponte, as well as the modern German translation of the text by Hermann Levi. An anonymous writer in the « Jüdische Rundschau » commended the Jewish Cultural League for « not letting us down » by ensuring that :

« A Jewish Figaro should be a proper Figaro that does honour to our name. As Jews, we look at every great artwork with reverence, we absorb it and take pleasure in it, we attest our gratitude through the artistic seriousness with which we engage with it and with which we tackle its production and performance. »

Although the non-Jewish German press was forbidden from discussing the Jewish Cultural League's « Figaro », a review of the production by Herbert F. Peyser appeared in the New York ...

... (« Kulturbund Oper ») and contemplate adding further works to their repertory. In February 1934, the « Kulturbund Oper » took its « Figaro » production to Breslau, in February 1934, where, according to a report filed in the March 1934 issue of the « Kulturbund deutscher Juden Monatsblatt » , the company managed to overcome the problems of transferring their production from a small intimate theatre to one housing nearly 1,700 seats. At the end of the « Kulturbund Oper » 's 1st season, Kurt Singer outlined his plans for the coming years, making it abundantly clear that he had every intention of featuring more Mozart. « Die Zauberflöte » was very much in his sights and, in 1935, he also submitted a proposal to the Propaganda Ministry to stage « Così fan tutte » .

Unfortunately, neither of these projects was to come to fruition since Hinkel became increasingly preoccupied with the need to chip away at Singer's freedom of choice in the repertory that he wished to feature. As the « Manchester Guardian » reported on 27 June 1935, it had become a « thorn in the flesh » for the Nazis that the « Jews had created among themselves such an atmosphere of purely Gennan culture » . Hinkel retaliated by making the demand that the Jewish Cultural League should, in future, confine its activities to performing works by Jews or foreigners, and that « Aryan » composers, such as Mozart, were to be strictly off-limits. The intensification of cultural apartheid gathered pace in Berlin, over the summer of 1935. After concluding an agreement with the State Secret Police that they should be more vigilant in monitoring its activities, Hinkel told a press gathering that those holding responsibility in the Jewish Cultural League « may now show what they can do for their racial comrades. We shall not disturb them if they do not meddle in our German cultural life. Germany and its great cultural possessions belong to Germany. »

After such a public declaration, there was little chance of Hinkel sanctioning the performance of further Mozart Operas by the « Kulturbund Oper ». The final dress rehearsal of « Così fan tutte » had already taken place in November 1935 before the Nazi authorities (much to Singer's dismay) forbade the production altogether. The ban was seized upon by those opposed to the Nazis abroad as a further evidence of the erosion of Jewish civil liberties. For example, on 10 November, the anti-Nazi Czech Social-Democratic weekly « Neuer Vorwärts » carried the banner headline « Jews are no longer allowed to play Mozart », while the « Manchester Guardian », on 16 November, described the removal of the Opera as indicative of the « peculiar malignant meanness of the Nazi mind ».

Although Hinkel had thwarted Singer's plans to put on more Mozart in Berlin, his proscriptive policies were applied with far less rigour outside the German capital. Thus, in April 1936, the Frankfurt section of the Jewish Cultural League featured a staged performance of Mozart's « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » with Hans Wilhelm (William) Steinberg as conductor, following this, in November of the same year, with « Die Zauberflöte » under Richard Karp. Even in Berlin, a concert performance of « Figaro » with piano accompaniment at the « Joseph-Lehmann-Schule », in May 1936, seems to have taken place without Hinkel's intervention. Yet, the capacity of the Cultural League to make decisions as to its future repertory and direction was to be increasingly restricted over the following year. If Hinkel had not made his intentions perfectly clear in earlier directives, a more specific course of censorship was forthcoming. On 14 May 1937, Hinkel issued an order banning the Jewish Cultural League from performing Beethoven, Mozart and plays by Gøethe.

The screw was further tightened after the « Anschluß » with the Austrian-born Haydn and Schubert being added to the list of composers that could not feature in the Jewish Cultural League's programmes. Naturally, such sanctions only applied to public performance, since the Ministry of Propaganda did not have the power to prevent individual Jewish musicians from coming together in their homes to perform works by these composers. Yet, from 1937 onwards, the private performance of a Mozart chamber work by Jews in Germany was effectively an illegal activity which could have carried the risk of severe penalties had it been discovered by the police.

While Jews were being denied the right to perform Mozart in public in Nazi Germany, those who had left the country and chosen to settle in Palestine were appropriating the work of the same composer in order to establish their own sense of identity. In 1935, Hermann Swet reported in the « Pariser Tageblatt » on a remarkable concert given, on 22 April, in the amphitheatre of Mount Scopus by a student choir (the combined forces of the Jerusalem Academic Chorus and Choir of the YMCA) and a dilettante University Orchestra under the direction of Karl Salomon, a pupil of Max Reger, who had left Germany in 1933. The work to which they had devoted their attention was Mozart's 1771 biblical Oratorio « Betulia liberata » with an original text by Metastasio, performed on this occasion under the title of « Judith » in a Hebrew translation that was made by the Amsterdam-based 18th Century poet David Franco Mendes.

It would be tempting to suggest that political motives played a significant role in this performance, just as they did 1 year later in rather different circumstances when musicologist Hans Joachim Moser sought to revive « Betulia liberata » in Nazi Germany with an entirely new aryanised text. Certainly one could draw parallels between the Oratorio's plot, in which Judith frees the Israelites from the Assyrian-occupied town of Betulia, and the struggle during that period to assert an indigenously Jewish cultural stance in British-occupied Palestine. Yet, Swet's article, entitled «

Mozart at the Wailing Wall » and published in an exile newspaper, did not allude to such matters. Rather, it praised Salomon's pioneering efforts for presenting the composition probably for the 1st time in Hebrew, and highlighted the various moments in the score that seem to foreshadow « Die Zauberflöte » and the « Requiem ». The writer also commented, slightly less favourably, on a performance by the short-lived Palestine Chamber Opera of Mozart's « Die Entführung aus dem Serail », also in Hebrew translation. It was given at Jerusalem's Cinema Zion in rather intimidating circumstances, with Sir Arthur Wauchope, the British high commissioner to Palestine, and other colonial officials ostentatiously making their presence felt by sitting in the front row of the auditorium. Nonetheless, Swet noted the morale-boosting impact of hearing this repertory even under such difficult conditions, adding that it was thanks to the efforts and influence of musicians who had emigrated from Germany to Palestine during the past 2 years that « one gradually gets to appreciate and love Mozart all the more » .

Synagogue Organ Music

The Destruction of a Cultural Tradition

In the Jewish cultural realm, the organ can be heard in American Reform temples, in some British synagogues, as well as in the remote Jewish communities of Argentina and Curaçao. However, the organ in the synagogue represents a music culture deeply rooted in the German-Jewish tradition of the 19th and 20th Centuries. That, today, it is rather a neglected part of Jewish tradition, may lie in the fact that the organ was never elevated from its controversial status in Judaism. A rather marginal entity, the synagogue organ remains an oddity for Jews and non-Jews alike. Nonetheless, the German-Jewish tradition deserves to be remembered in light of its brutal elimination during the 3rd « Reich » . Indeed, this musical culture clearly shows the Holocaust's effect on music as a paradigm of « culturecide » .

The Synagogue Organ and Its Repertoire

With the introduction of organs into Reform synagogues, in the early 19th Century, a new branch of Jewish music began. The admission of organs into the synagogue service, which traditional Jews regarded as a « Christianisation » of the service, was the subject of vehement quarrels and debates surrounding the halachic question of whether one may play the organ on Sabbath and Holidays and, if so, whether a Jewish musician may perform. The debate extended to communities and to rabbinical conferences, and was the subject of various polemics.

After the synod in Leipzig, in 1869, most synagogues in German-speaking lands introduced organs, a development that would extend to other countries and continents as well, reaching its peak by the turn of the Century. With the legitimization of the organ, in the 2nd half of the 19th Century, its function also started developing and expanding. By then, the organist commonly played independently between cantorial solos and also in processionals and recessionals. Interludes served to introduce the congregation into the different moods of the service or to fill the silence during silent prayer. Thus, in the following decades, composers began to establish a specific style of organ music for use in the synagogue, mostly consisting of Jewish liturgical themes. At the beginning of the 20th Century, this repertoire evolved into a fusion of Western Classical music, liturgical, paraliturgical, and folk-melodies, eventually flowering into a form which could be performed at concerts as well as in the synagogue.

Organ Music in the « Kulturbund »

Although synagogue music under the Nazis might easily have been destroyed outright, it continued to develop within the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League), an all-Jewish performing arts ensemble maintained by the Nazis, between 1933 and 1941. The policy of cultural apartheid and the isolation of Jewish cultural activity from the rest of the German population led to an enhanced « Jewish » consciousness and awoke the desire for « Jewish experiences ». For music, including organ music, the consequence was a substantial enrichment of the repertoire, especially of that which was connected to Jewish folk and liturgical music, and to contemporary compositions. As a result, the mid-1930's witnessed a transformation of synagogue organ music.

In the « Kulturbund » concerts, the organ's original function in liturgical music shifted to the concert-hall. This development reached its climax with several synagogue concerts, which opened and closed with organ music. Sometimes the instrument also would have a solo-part within Jewish Oratorios. In addition to great organ compositions of a distinctly Jewish flavour, the Classical repertoire (e.g., preludes and toccatas by Johann Sebastian Bach and Dietrich Buxtehude, and pieces by Georg Friedrich Händel and Léon Boëllmann) would also be performed.

Although the « Kulturbund » seemed to act as an intermediary impetus for music, its establishment was an astute move by the National-Socialists. At first, the repertoire could be chosen freely but, later, censors restricted it to all works except those which were considered « German ». Thus, organ music consisting of Jewish musical themes or written by a composer of Jewish origin could be performed only in the synagogue. Only Jewish audiences could become acquainted with these compositions and culturally identify with them, and only organists of Jewish origin were allowed to play them. As a consequence, the repertoire became as isolated as the Jews themselves. Jewish music for organ (which was in origin an off-shoot, a partial imitation of Western musical forms and structures combined with essential ingredients of Jewish musical tradition) was definitively torn from one of its roots: the Western musical environment.

During the time of the « Kulturbund », and coinciding with the first years of their regime, the Nazis also succeeded by and large in proscribing the further publication of music by Jewish composers. In addition, although it took longer, they wrested away complete control of the various music publishing-houses that were owned by Jews. Thus, organ music was rarely or never published after 1933. Music written by composers of Jewish origin or by those who did not conform with the Nazis' ideas of « German music » was not allowed to be printed. Consequently, such music could not be reproduced, and much of the repertoire did not survive the Holocaust.

Synagogue Musicians during the 3rd « Reich »

The « Entjudung » (dejewification) and destruction of Jewish culture in Nazi Germany was a gradual process conducted in 5 successive phases. It began with a series of highly-publicized acts to ostracize prominent Jewish figures and their friends through defamation, boycott, and cultural ghettoization between 1933 and 1935. Next, came legal dismemberment and dissimulation, between 1935 and 1938. Then, came the destruction of the economic basis of existence through « bureaucratic exclusion » of all Jews. The total disfranchisement of the « Kulturbund » followed between 1939 and 1941. And, at last, from 1941-1945, came the « Final Solution » , the Nazis' plan to annihilate and exterminate the Jewish people.

One of the Nazis' objectives focused on eliminating Jewish musicians, among whom were organists and composers of organ music. When the « Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums » (Law for the Reconstitution of the Civil Service) passed the « Reichstag » , in 1933, Jewish musicians were fired from civic positions. In 1935, the situation became worse when, on 27 August, Hans Hinkel banned Jewish musicians (already expelled from the « Reichsmusikkammer ») from playing organ in church, and Christian musicians from playing in synagogues. A number of Jewish musicians left Nazi Germany at this early stage, but most of those able to escape the « Reich » had financial means, and were able to find willing sponsors and continued support in their adopted lands.

Others changed their careers, becoming synagogue musicians, when they realized that synagogues in their home-towns and prospective countries of emigration could offer employment and that, unlike in the secular music-world, competition would be comparatively minor. Consequently, they prepared themselves before emigrating, and learned how to play the organ, or focused on composing for the synagogue service. Nonetheless, many musicians, even those participating in the « Kulturbund » , lost their roots. Ripped-out from their previous musical environment, they had to fight unemployment, re-organization, defamation, and anxiety, instead of dedicating themselves to their music.

Although many Jewish musicians were able to leave the « Reich » before the deportations began, a significant number could not do so and were interned in camps. Numerous Jewish musicians were deported and killed, among them Arno Nadel (1878-1943) and Siegfried Würzburger (1877-1941) . By the time of the last Jewish deportation, and with the brutal killing of organists and composers in concentration camps, German-Jewish musical culture had been nearly eradicated.

The Extinction of the Synagogue Organ

The paradoxical flourishing and development of organ music between 1933 and 1938 was also viciously ended by the destruction of the instruments on the night of 9 to 10 November 1938, during « Kristallnacht » . The destruction itself was a process that started with cultural anti-Semitic propaganda, the defamation of organs and the music. An example is given in « Der Stürmer » , from 19 October 1938 :

« It is a disgrace ! »

The Jew organ in the church of « Saint-Korbinian » in Munich

It is reported to us by a trustworthy source from Munich that the organ of the former Jewish synagogue in Munich has been acquired through purchase by the Bishop's Office from the Jewish religious community. Shortly before the demolition of the synagogue, the organ was moved by the transport firm A. Frank & Sons, at « Westendstraße Nr. 160 » , in Munich, to the church of Saint-Korbinian, on « Gotzingerplatz » . The organ case is said to have been bought through the Steinmeyer firm in Öttingen, in Bavaria, and installed in the church of Saint-Korbinian by the same company. Now, when the faithful arrive for worship in the church of Saint-Korbinian, they will have the peculiar pleasure of hearing music from an organ that has stood in a synagogue for years. The very organ that once accompanied the Jews' songs of hatred for non-Jews now adorns a Christian church. It is a disgrace !

Some organs were saved by selling them to churches. Since the price paid was so nominal, such deeds on the part of the churches can hardly be called heroic. More accurately the churches took the opportunity to feather their nests at the expense of others. Although they were physically saved, the « deportation » of organs from synagogues to churches represents a misuse of the instruments.

On the night of 9 to 10 November 1938, deliberate cultural destruction reached its peak. An eyewitness report of « Kristallnacht » in Königsberg's (now, Kaliningrad, in Russia) Jewish community describes how a gang of brawlers systematically demolished benches, pulled-out the Scrolls of the « Law from the Ark » , tore prayer books and piled everything up in a big heap in the middle of the synagogue. The report also details the « Kristallnacht » bombing and setting on fire of the organs. Adding insult to injury, the organ in the Königsberg synagogue was misused by playing the « Horst Wessel » Song, which was adopted as a Nazi national anthem by the SA. Thus, this single event comprised three distinct forms of culturecide : intellectual (through defamation) , musical (by the playing of Nazi music on the organ) , and physical (by burning and bombing) .

Nevertheless, a few organs escaped the wrath of « Kristallnacht » . Police officer Wilhelm Krützfeld prevented the setting of Berlin's « Oranienburger » Street New Synagogue on fire, thereby, also saving its organ from destruction. When Krützfeld realized that disguised SA members had started a fire in the anteroom of the synagogue, he chased them away and, then, called the fire brigade. This was a unique reaction to « Kristallnacht » when, for the most part, « Aryans » simply watched, and fire brigades did not respond. However, a few months later, the Berlin synagogue was requisitioned by the « Wehrmacht » , for use as a quarter-Master's store, « Heeresbekleidungsamt III » .

Both organs, the one in Berlin as well as the in Munich mentioned in « Der Stürmer » survived « Kristallnacht » , but not the bombing raids of 1943 over Berlin and, in 1944, over Munich. What was lost was not just the greatest synagogue organs in Munich and Berlin, but symbolic monuments to a specific cultural era in Germany.

The newly-emergent German-Jewish organ tradition abruptly ended at its peak in 1938, when most of the instruments (and, with them, the possibility of performing organ music) were destroyed on « Kristallnacht » . Although this date marks the beginning of the end, the extinction of this growing cultural tradition was a longer process that continued beyond 1938, with the emigration and murder of Jewish composers and musicians. Only the mass-exodus, beginning in 1933, prevented the cultural « Final Solution » from being completely consummated.

Today, there are again, though few in number, organs in German synagogues in Aachen, Berlin, Dresden, and Frankfurt-am-Main. The organ in the Frankfurt synagogue is not used during prayer services, as the congregation follows the Orthodox tradition, though it is sometimes played during weddings. The same is true of the reed organ in the Aachen synagogue. Despite the few remnants of the German-Jewish organ tradition, the historically significant organs have been annihilated and the tradition of organ music in synagogues no longer exists in Germany.

Directions as a result of Emigration

Although the emigration of artists and the transplantation of this particular form of German-Jewish culture initially did not appear to contribute to its destruction, in the long term its impact was decisive. At first, it managed to survive emigration from Germany and exile in the United States. Indeed, because of employment possibilities in the United States, many musicians became organists or composers of liturgical music. Prominent and highly-talented musicians, (among them : Hugo Chaim Adler, Herbert Fromm, Heinrich Schalit, Herman Berlinski, and Ludwig Altman) are, in a broader sense, responsible for the further development of this aspect of German-Jewish culture. They and others composed pieces especially for use in the synagogue, taught organ playing, and influenced the voicing and dispositions of organs in synagogues.

The developments and turns the German-Jewish organ tradition has taken in the United States illustrate the impact of the German-Jewish emigrants. Initially, the musicians tried to maintain their German-Jewish (musical) identity. However, many emigrants had to change direction and, instead of launching performing careers, had to adapt to new circumstances. In the end, the « émigré » composers were the last generation of German Jews involved in synagogue music. The following generation of synagogue musicians, despite musical freedom and possibilities, were apparently not really concerned with the further development of the organ in Jewish worship. In the end, with the death of the emigrant generation, synagogue organ music died as well. The next generation was no longer familiar with the musical tradition of the German synagogue and, in that way, the music was torn away from its cultural context. Emigration would finally confirm the culturecide, albeit after a delay.

Those musicians who escaped to Palestine or England had an even harder time, since there were no organs in synagogues, and little demand in churches ; and there was consequently no need for their skills. Although there has never been an organ in an Israeli synagogue, notable composers Paul Ben-Haim, Karel Salomon, Yochanan Samuel, and Chaim Alexander created a novel repertoire for the organ. These composers saw the organ's potential not as a liturgical instrument, but as a source of unusual sounds and as a concert instrument. Some of them were inspired by their recollection of the sound of the organ from their early years in Germany. The organ compositions of contemporary Israeli composers are as diverse as the origins of the composers themselves, most of whom are emigrants from Germany, Austria, Poland, Hungary, and the former Soviet Union ; a substantial number are Israeli-born. If there is no unified style or school of organ music in Israel, it is due to the lack of a long tradition of organ music and, because of such diverse (secular and religious, Eastern and Western) musical cultures, coming together.

On 7 April 1933, Adolf Hitler's regime began an official assault on Germany's cultural life with the « Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums » (Law for the Reconstitution of the Civil Service, or « GWB ») . By means of the law's Aryan paragraph, « civil servants who are not of Aryan ancestry » were to be dismissed. This measure prevented non-Aryans (defined, at that time, as any person descended from a Jewish parent or grandparent) from holding positions in the public sphere, especially at cultural institutions such as State-run music Conservatories, Opera Houses, concert halls and theatres. However, after a series of debates, Jews were allowed to continue as artists within their own separate organization : the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League) , originally called the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » (Culture League of German Jews) .

Kurt Baumann, a young production assistant, developed the preliminary plan for the « Kulturbund » , to be set in Berlin, in the 1st months of 1933. In his memoirs, he explained :

« My idea to found a Jewish cultural circle was based on very simple numbers ; at the time, 175,000 Jews alone lived in Berlin, many other big cities had, percentage wise, similar concentrations. I figured that a city of 175,000 inhabitants could have their own theatre, Opera, Symphony Orchestra, museum, lectures, and even " Hochschule " (Institute of Higher Education) , and this with the economic proportion of a mid-sized city. »

From the outset, he feared his plan would not be supported by Zionists, who would insist that the organization conduct its cultural activities in Yiddish or Hebrew, or by the majority of German Jews, who would respond to the suggestion of a pure Jewish cultural circle with the cry :

« We're not going voluntarily into the ghetto ! »

Nevertheless, within 14 days, he worked-out a detailed proposal and contacted the former director of Berlin's « Städtischen Oper » (Municipal Opera House) , Kurt Singer, whose assistant he had been from 1930 to 1932.

Singer had envisioned a similar organization and was the perfect choice to champion the « Kulturbund » . He had served as a military doctor in World War I and was known and respected in German national circles. Baumann and Singer revised the initial plan, which was not originally designed as a long-term venture, and recruited other Jewish leaders, such as Berlin's chief rabbi Leo Baeck, conductor Joseph Rosenstock, and journalist Werner Levie. When Baumann approached theatre critic Julius Bab with the project, the latter incredulously asked :

« Are we allowed to do this ? »

Indeed, it was not clear how the organization would win the Nazi government's sponsorship.

Singer struggled to generate interest within various government offices, but was eventually invited to meet with Hans Hinkel. Hinkel had been appointed head of the « Preußischen Theater-Ausschuß » (Prussian Theatre Commission) by the new Prussian minister Hermann Göring immediately after Adolf Hitler's ascension to power. He recognized several reasons to support the « Kulturbund » : the regime could exploit it as propaganda by citing it as supposed proof that Jews were not being mistreated ; it could function as a cultural outlet and source of income for Jews which would help to quell social unrest ; and, finally, the organization could help ensure the end of Jewish involvement in German culture. In April 1933, Hinkel began negotiating the operating terms for the creation of the « Kulturbund » with Singer. There were several stipulations : the « Kulturbund » was to be staffed only by Jewish artists and financed by the all-Jewish audiences through a monthly fee ; only the Jewish press was allowed to report on « Kulturbund » events, further isolating Jewish activities from the racially accepted German population ; League programmes were to be submitted to Hinkel for approval before performance. This latter requirement allowed the regime to promote a repertoire they saw as appropriate for a Jewish organization by censoring German culture and promoting Jewish culture. For « Kulturbund » leaders and members, this led to a debate about what constituted Jewishness in art that lasted for most of the organization's tenure. In the middle of May 1933, however, satisfied with these conditions, the « Kulturbund » received the Nazi government's support and one of the most paradoxical partnerships in German history began.

The « Kulturbund » had 8 separate departments. Anneliese Landau gave regular speeches on music, which were illustrated by « Kulturbund » performers. She was part of the « Kulturbund » 's lecture department, which included Julius Bab, Arthur Eloesser, Max Osborn, Julius Guttmann, and Ernst Landsberger. Bab also directed the play department, which was associated with the dramaturgy department. Heinz Condell, Hans Sondheimer and Werner Levie supervised the « décor » and costume division, the technical department, and the management division respectively. Levie, who worked as economic editor of the « Vossische Zeitung » (a Berlin newspaper named after one of its early owners Christian Friedrich Voß, 1724-1795) , until 1933, also acted as « Kulturbund » secretary and would later assume a more prominent role, as Singer's replacement, in 1938.

Along with Singer, Joseph Rosenstock led the Opera department, in which Baumann also worked. The concert department, linked with the Opera division, was headed again by Rosenstock and Singer, but also by the concert director Michaël Taube, who had been Bruno Walter's assistant at the Municipal Opera, in Berlin. Taube acted as conductor of the « Kulturbund » 's small Orchestra until he immigrated to Palestine, at the end of 1934. After his departure, Rosenstock as its conductor worked to expand the group. When he too left, for Tokyo, in 1936, Hans Wilhelm Steinberg (later, William Steinberg) replaced him. After only 3 months, Steinberg traveled to Moscow and then Tel Aviv to conduct the newly founded Palestine Symphony Orchestra, established by the violinist Bronisław Huberman and later know as the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. He was succeeded by Rudolf Schwarz, who had served as the main conductor under chief music director Josef Krips at the « Badisches Landestheater » in Karlsruhe, from 1925 to 1933.

The « Kulturbund » 's management leased as its performance hall the « Berliner Theater » on « Charlottenstraße » , in the northwest corner of Berlin, from the Berlin « Rathaus » (City Hall) . After 2 years as the « Kulturbund » 's home, in 1935, the « Kulturbund » lost the theatre, unable to renew its lease. « Kulturbund » operations then transferred to a slightly smaller space, the « Herrnfeld-Theater » on the « Kommandantenstraße » . « Kulturbund » management also had a hall built next to the theatre for chamber concerts, which opened on 28 November 1937 and began showing films on 24 September 1939.

The « Kulturbund » was not entitled to the government subsidy enjoyed by accepted Aryan musical institutions. Instead, membership dues were to fund these performance spaces as well as the salaries of its staff of artists. « Kulturbund » leaders advertised for these positions throughout Berlin : at synagogues, cafés, and music schools that still allowed Jews. From a total of 2,000 submissions, management hired, for its 1st season, 35 actors and singers ; 35 orchestral musicians ; 22 chorus members ; 10 female dancers ; 25 technical staff ; 26 box and cloakroom attendants ;

10 administrative staff ; and several manual workers. Approximately 200 of applicants (or 10%) found employment that 1st year, in addition to guest-conductors, concert soloists and lecturers.

The average monthly wage for members of the Opera and theatre ensemble was 200 « Reichsmark » , and for members of the Orchestra, 180 « Reichsmark » . With its mounting expenses, the « Kulturbund » struggled economically. By October 1933, the « Kulturbund » had about 12,500 members. This number increased to around 20,000 during the winter, approximately 10 % of the Jewish population. From 1934 to 1937, membership remained at about 18,500 with new members replacing those that emigrated.

After presenting at the door one's ticket and identification badge proving Jewish descent, members could attend 2 cultural events per month - alternately, an Opera and their choice of a lecture in the fields of philosophy, art, religion or music in 1 month and, the next month, a drama and a concert. On 11 September 1941, the « Kulturbund » was officially dissolved. The « Geheime Staatspolizei » (Secret Police) cited Paragraph 1 of the « Reich » president's order of 28 February 1933 as reason for the liquidation of the League - it was necessary for the protection of people and State.

The Jüdischer « Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League) , originally called the « Kulturbund » Deutscher Juden (Culture League of German Jews) , was a performing arts ensemble by and for Jews, created in Berlin in collaboration with the National-Socialist regime. The « Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums » (Law for the Reconstitution of the Civil Service) of April 7, 1933, generally dismissed non-Aryans (defined, at that time, as any person descended from a Jewish parent or grandparent) from holding positions in the public sphere, especially at cultural institutions such as State-run music Conservatories, Opera Houses, concert halls and theatres. (1) From 1933 to 1941, the League was the most significant site in Nazi Germany that still allowed, and, paradoxically, even encouraged Jews to participate in music as well as theatre.

In 1933, Kurt Baumann (1907-1983) , who, as a Jew, had been dismissed from his duties as a director's assistant, developed the preliminary plan for the League, which was to include theatrical plays, Opera, and orchestral concerts. (2)

In his memoirs, he explained :

« I based my idea of founding a Jewish cultural circle on very simple numbers. At the time, 175,000 Jews lived in Berlin alone, many other big cities had similar concentrations, percentage-wise. » (3)

Baumann shared his plan for the League with Kurt Singer (1885-1944) , whose assistant he had been at Berlin's « Städtische Oper » (Municipal Opera) . (4) Singer, a musicologist, neurologist and conductor, known and respected in nationalist circles, had envisioned a similar organization. Together, they worked to recruit other Jewish luminaries, such as Berlin's chief rabbi, Leo Baeck, journalist Werner Levie and conductor Joseph Rosenstock. When Baumann approached theatre critic Julius Bab with the project, Bab was justifiably skeptical :

« Dürfen wir denn das ? » (« Are we allowed to do it ? ») (5)

Singer attempted to generate support for the organization within various Nazi government offices, and he was eventually invited to meet with Hans Hinkel, who had been appointed head of the Prussian Theatre Commission by the new Prussian minister, Hermann Göring, immediately after Adolf Hitler's ascension to power. (6) In April 1933, Hinkel and Singer began to negotiate terms for the creation of the League - terms that included several stipulations : the League was to be staffed only by Jewish artists and financed by the all-Jewish audiences through a monthly fee ; only the Jewish press was allowed to report on League events ; League programs were to be submitted to Hinkel for approval before performance. This last requirement allowed the regime to exclude works of « Aryan » German origin and promote a repertoire considered appropriate for a Jewish organization - a repertoire that included « Jewish » art, according to Hinkel's definition of Jewish art. (7)

These stipulations explain the regime's otherwise apparently puzzling support of the Jewish organization. For the Nazi officials, the League was meant to function as propaganda : by pointing to their support of the League, the Nazis could claim that Jews were not oppressed but encouraged to find their own forum for cultural expression. (8) At the same time, however, through Hinkel's censorship of the repertoire, the League offered a way for the regime's leaders to attempt to segregate Jews from Germany's cultural life and prevent Jewish appropriation of so-called German art.

By the beginning of September 1933, the League consisted of 8 separate sections. Its lecture department included Anneliese Landau, Julius Bab, Arthur Eloesser, Max Osborn, Julius Guttman and Ernst Landsberger. Bab also directed the drama department, which was associated with the dramaturgy department. Heinz Condell, Hans Sondheimer and Werner Levie supervised the sets and costume division, the technical department, and the management division, respectively. Levie, who had worked until 1933 as economic editor of the « Vossische Zeitung » (a liberal Berlin newspaper) , also acted as League secretary. (9) Along with Singer, Joseph Rosenstock led the Opera department, in which Baumann also worked. (10) The concert department, linked to the Opera division, was also headed by Rosenstock and Singer as well as the concert director Michaël Taube, who had been Bruno Walter's assistant at the Municipal Opera, in Berlin. (11) When Taube left for Tokyo, in 1936, Hans Wilhelm Steinberg (later known as William Steinberg) replaced him. When Steinberg left for Palestine, later that year (to work with the newly conceived Palestine Orchestra) , he was succeeded by Rudolf Schwarz. (12)

Berlin's municipal administration leased the « Berliner Theater » on « Charlottenstraße » , in the northwest corner of Berlin, to the League's management, for use as a performance venue. But, in 1935, after 2 years, the League was not allowed to renew the lease and lost the theatre. League operations were then transferred to the « Herrfeld-Theater » on the « Kommandantenstraße » . By October 1933, the League had about 12,500 members ; this number increased to circa 20,000 (nearly 12 % of Berlin's Jewish population) during the following winter. From 1934 to 1937, membership remained at about 18,500, with new members replacing those that emigrated. (13)

The creation of the Jewish Culture League, in Berlin, was soon followed by the formation of active League chapters in Cologne and Frankfurt. Whereas the original Berlin League maintained a theatre ensemble, Opera company and Philharmonic Orchestra, the Cologne branch operated only an independent theatre ensemble, and the Frankfurt League, which had no Opera or theatre ensemble, focused on orchestral music and maintained its own Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, until he left for Berlin, in 1936. (14) Smaller off-shoots of the Berlin League were formed in Hamburg, Munich, Mannheim, Breslau, Kassel, Stuttgart and other locations. The most active League branches were in Berlin, Frankfurt, Cologne and Hamburg, which maintained a 3rd independent Jewish theatre ensemble. (15) The Berlin chapter, supervised by Singer, was the largest. By 1935, the Jewish Culture League had 46 local chapters in other towns and cities, which the Nazi regime put under the umbrella union, « Reichsverband der jüdischen Kulturbünde » (« Reich » Association of Jewish Culture Leagues) , also based in Berlin.

Singer was primarily in charge of program approval, which was no easy task given Hinkel's requirements for League performances and the censorship of offending offerings. Still, despite pressure from the regime, League organizers did not generally gravitate toward « Jewish » works. To some, such a repertoire was, in fact, at odds with their sense of Germanness and threatened to turn their Jewish organization into a ghetto. On the other hand, from the very start, the « Jüdische Rundschau » , a newspaper serving the Zionist movement, challenged this Teutonic mindset and demanded that the League confront the changing situation of Jews in Germany and the need for a repertoire specifically connected to Jewishness. (16) The existence of this conflict, which the heterogeneity of the Jewish public only compounded, helps to explain why League leaders did not follow the example of other organizations dedicated to the question of « Jewish » art. The League lacked the support for any specific program, as well as the time needed to create one. Indeed, the organization was never envisioned as a long-term venture ; at the time, most people did not expect the regime or its anti-Semitic policies to last long. (17) League organizers also differed as to the very definition of « Jewish » art. To address this controversy officially, Singer convened a Jewish Culture League Conference, designated « Die Kulturtagung des Reichsverbandes der Jüdischen Kulturbünde in Deutschland » , on September 5, 1936. In speeches given the following day, prominent theatre and music scholars advised League representatives how best to satisfy all those involved through the performances of recommended Jewish works. (18)

This conference probably represented the peak of official interest in the question of Jewish art within the League, but it yielded no definitive solutions. In the following years, as conditions worsened in Nazi Germany, other concerns overshadowed this debate. After « Kristallnacht » (on 9 and 10 November 1938) and, in the absence of Singer, who was visiting the United States, Levie was put in charge of the League and, on December 31, the League in Berlin and its various branches were consolidated into the « Jüdischen Kulturbund in Deutschland » (Jewish Culture League in Germany) , which was still based in Berlin. (19)

On September 4, 1939, Fritz Wisten, who had been involved in the League's theatrical productions, replaced Levie, who had left Germany at the end of August. (20) When the League had finally outlived its usefulness, the organization was officially dissolved on September 11, 1941. At this time, Germany was embroiled in War on 2 fronts - both with Britain and the Soviet Union. Adolf Hitler had also become committed to the elimination of European Jewry, and had approved the mass deportation of German Jews eastward. (21) Although the « Final Solution » was not discussed until the « Wannsee » meeting on January 20, 1942, Hitler's approval of deportation was a decisive turn toward murder. (22) The regime no longer needed the League for propaganda purposes and had found a more extreme means of segregation.

Still, as an explanation for the liquidation of the League, the secret police cited Paragraph I of the « Reich » president's order of February 28, 1933 - for the protection of people and State. (23)

« Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Cultural Association) : German Jewish organization founded in Berlin, in May 1933, when the National-Socialist regime dismissed Jewish high-school teachers, artists, and authors from their positions and excluded all Jews from German cultural life. The « Jüdischer Kulturbund » was initiated by Kurt Baumann, a young theatre director, and directed by Kurt Singer, who was a physician and a musician and a director of the Berlin Opera. Singer engaged some good Jewish artists to perform and also organized a series of lectures on scientific subjects. Their existence was accepted by the « Gestapo » only after the words « German Jews » were eliminated from its title and their activities were under Nazi scrutiny. The « Jüdischer Kulturbund » devoted itself to extensively spreading interest in Jewish art and culture, in spite of the Nazi persecution, and worked to secure continued cultural activity by providing funds from the resources of its members and through the communities themselves. Evidently, the work of the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » largely helped to maintain a closely knit Jewish population and awaken a love for the land of Israel by promoting Zionist ideas. This body also published the « Monatsblätter des Kulturbundes deutscher Juden » , from 1933 on, edited by Julius Bab. The paper was forced to change its name to « Monatsblätter des jüdischen Kulturbundes » in 1938, after « Kristallnacht » .

From its foundation until October 1938, it organized 8,457 programs, including lectures, concerts, plays, art exhibits, and Operas. Julius Bab, Joseph Rosenstock (a musical director who died in 1985) , Kurt Singer, Kurt Baumann, and Werner Levie (secretary general) directed the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » 's affairs. In early 1938, there were 76 branches of the « Kulturbund » in 100 towns, with more than 50,000 members and 1,700 artists. Membership and the scale of activities were proportionately larger outside of Berlin. Yet, in Berlin alone, the membership fluctuated between 12,000 and 18,000. The choice of the programs for lectures, plays, and concerts was often very difficult and was constantly controlled by the secret police (« Gestapo ») , the Chamber for Arts and Culture (« Reichskulturkammer ») , and the leadership (« Gauleitung ») of the Nazi Party, in Berlin. The « Kulturbund » was itself divided over whether to present general cultural programs or those of specific Jewish content as advocated by the Zionists. For every organized performance, the material had to be submitted in writing for approval by the State commissioner (« Staatskommissar ») Hinkel. Hinkel told the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » which plays and lectures could be performed and which articles and literary works could be published. After the November 1938 « Kristallnacht pogroms » , local activities were centralized and, therefore, better controlled by the national organization, which was disbanded in September 1941. A few of the leading organizers managed to emigrate, but the great majority of artists eventually perished in death camps. The « Kulturbund » provided spiritual support for Jews in Germany during a time of ever more intense persecution ; and, for individual artists, it provided both employment and an opportunity to remain creative and productive amidst the great struggle for basic survival.

« Ein Tanz auf dem Vulkan » : The Legacy of the Jewish Culture League

(Lily E. Hirsch.)

During the years 1933-1941, there was one significant site in Nazi Germany in which Jews were still allowed and encouraged to participate in music as well as theatre. This was the Jewish Culture League (« Jüdischer Kulturbund ») , originally called the Culture League of German Jews (« Kulturbund Deutscher Juden ») . This short article discusses the paradoxical legacy of this Jewish organization as it reflects post-World War II perceptions of the idea of resistance, the Jew as victim, and responses to the Holocaust in former West and East Germany. Specifically, it focuses on the « Geschlossene Vorstellung » exhibition and discussion of the League with former members, sponsored by the « Akademie der Künste » in Berlin, in 1992.

During the years 1933-1941, there was one significant site in Nazi Germany in which Jews were still allowed and encouraged to participate in music as well as theatre. This was the Jewish Culture League (« Jüdischer Kulturbund ») , originally called the Culture League of German Jews (« Kulturbund Deutscher Juden ») . In some ways, this organization appears a positive haven for Jews and music during the early years of the 3rd « Reich » . Thus, the circumstance may challenge our understanding of the Nazi regime's restrictive policies toward Jews, in Germany, and general brutality during the 3rd « Reich » . However, scholars and former League members have never agreed on the organization's ultimate meaning : was the Jewish Culture League a hard-won victory that enriched the lives of those who touched it, or was it ultimately a deal with the devil ? Radically different attitudes towards Jewish culture in the 2 Germanies after the War has only confounded this question and confused the recouping of this organization's history. In this short article, I will discuss the paradoxical legacy of this Jewish organization as it reflects post-World War II perceptions of the idea of resistance, the Jew as victim, and responses to the Holocaust in former West and East Germany. To do this, I will specifically focus on the « Geschlossene Vorstellung » exhibition and discussion of the League with former members, sponsored by the « Akademie der Künste » in Berlin, in 1992.

Kurt Baumann, a young German-Jewish former production assistant in Berlin, and Kurt Singer, a well-respected German-Jewish physician, musicologist, and music director, developed the initial League plan in the early months of 1933. The Jewish organization was to be set in Berlin, and, by its premiere, was intended in part as a shelter for the Jews dismissed from various musical posts following the Civil Service Laws of April 7, 1933. After struggling to gain official acceptance, Singer, acting as the organization's primary spokesperson, eventually met with the Nazi administrator Hans Hinkel. Hinkel found several reasons to support the organization : the regime could exploit the League as international propaganda by citing it as supposed proof that Jews were not being mistreated ; it could function as a cultural outlet and source of income for Jews which would help to quell social unrest. Finally, the creation of the League could help the Nazis ensure the end of perceived Jewish appropriation of German culture. To this end, Hinkel's office would censor within the League music by composers of German origin and generally encourage the performance of so-called Jewish music. (1)

With these Nazi goals and regime support, the Jewish Culture League gained an immediate following and soon inspired similar organizations throughout Germany. By 1935, the League had 46 local chapters in various towns and cities, which the Nazi regime put under the umbrella union, the « Reichsverband der jüdischen Kulturbünde » (« Reich » Association of Jewish Culture Leagues) . (2)

Despite this success, the League was not without conflict. Hinkel's program requirements inspired a heated debate about the idea of Jewish music and what constituted an appropriate repertoire for a Jewish organization among a diverse community - Zionist, assimilated, Eastern, rural, Orthodox. The heterogeneous League community continued this debate for most of its tenure - culminating in the Jewish Culture League Conference in Berlin, September 1936. (3) As conditions worsened for Jews in Germany, however, music of distraction, rather than a distinct nationality (Jewish or otherwise) became the order of the day. Former member Susanne Wisten-Weyl recalled :

« The people were so thankful whenever they could laugh. » (4)

In the League's latter years, after 1938, this laughter and entertainment, as it would be in the concentration camps, acted for some as a coping mechanism - a form of evasion, self-possession, and even liberation. (5)

By moving beyond its earlier debates and responding to the changing situation of Jews in Germany, the League was able to remain relevant until its very end on September 11, 1941. On this date, the League was dissolved « for the protection of people and State » . (6) Many League members had already emigrated by 1941. Today, some former members credit the League with giving them the financial and emotional support they needed to face leaving their homes. Ernest Lenart, a former actor in the organization, tied this positive function to the League's insignia. This emblem, a torch and the hexagonal Star of David, appeared on the League's monthly publication and many programs. Lenart explains :

« Not coincidentally, the torch was the symbol of the Culture League. » (7)

The organization was « a ray of hope in a cloudy time » . (8)

But the League has also been viewed in a more critical light. To exist, League leaders had to collaborate with the enemy and even lend legitimacy to the regime's plans as a means of propaganda. Most members were not aware of this function. (9) Not only that, the organization, according to some, may have contributed to the tragedy to come. The historian Alan Steinweis wrote :

« By providing Jewish artists and audiences with an outlet for creative expression, the Culture League rendered Jewish existence in National-Socialist Germany somewhat less desperate than it otherwise might have been, thereby, lulling German Jews into a tragically false sense of security about the future. » (10)

It is this idea that has inspired some of the worst criticism of the League. Martin Goldsmith, who wrote a popular memoir regarding his parents experience in the organization, asks directly :

« Had there been no Jewish Culture League, would there have been fewer Jewish deaths ? » (11)

These contrasting points were center stage during a podium discussion held in conjunction with the « Geschlossene Vorstellung » exhibition, in Berlin, which ran from January 26th through April 26th, 1992. The League exhibit was an official off-shoot of the popular larger exhibition entitled « Jüdische Lebenswelten » (Patterns of Jewish Life) , which showcased Jewish artifacts, paintings, photos, and videos from various Jewish cultures in the Martin Gropius Building, in Berlin. (12)

Just 2 years after the reunification of the 2 Germanys, in 1990, « Patterns of Jewish Life » represented an opportunity for former East Germans to learn more about the Nazi period and Jewish culture in general, which was sidestepped in East German education. (13) The GDR was, by and large, hostile to religion and nationalism, in keeping with Communist ideals, and thus intolerant of Zionism and, with few exceptions, of Jews in general. (14) Not only that, the GDR did not take responsibility for the Holocaust, in part for political reasons, taking shelter in the Communist resistance to Adolf Hitler. (15) And thus, the East did not attract the Jewish returnees that would populate West Germany. (16) With the reunification, a new sense of nationalism aggravated this attitude of denial, with calls of « We are the people. » or « We are one people. » , that, for many Jews, foretold of a heightened anti-Semitism. (17)

It should be mentioned that this anti-Semitism, around 1990, was not the sole province of former East Germans. In the Federal Republic, as Frank Stern explains, following World War II, Jews were treated as victims through outward displays of philo-Semitism - though anti-Semitism remained virulent. The public pro-Jewish attitude, in some ways, substituted for active rejection of anti-Semitic thinking - a reckoning with the fundamental attitudes that, for some, justified the Holocaust. (18) In the late- 1960's and 1970's, this expected display of philo-Semitism was slowly replaced with a verbalized desire to overcome collective guilt. (19) In the 1980's, as the United States « educated » Germany about its history, for example, in the Holocaust miniseries with Meryl Streep, some West Germans even re-evaluated the exceptionality of Germany's Jewish genocide. (20) In this way, West Germany witnessed different strains of anti-Semitic discourse which replaced the idea of Jewish suffering with a belief in the Jews as a source of suffering. (21) The exhibit of Jewish culture, in 1992, thus came at a significant juncture - an opportunity to educate and mold the New Germany at a time of increased intolerance in both former East and West Germany.

Hannah Kroner, once a dancer in the Jewish Culture League, was invited to attend the exhibition, along with 43 other former performing members. They had been contacted by the journalists and organizers Eike Geisel and Henryk Broder, who, together, had recently interviewed past League members. Upon arrival on March 30th, Kroner was greeted by news cameras and much fanfare. (22) On April 1st, she, along with other members, toured the League exhibit. (23) The following night, the « Akademie der Künste » sponsored a podium discussion of the League titled, « Actually, it was a Good Time - Or Was It ? » . The event underscored the ambivalence of the League's legacy. With Broder as moderator, the discussion included 6 former members, among them Kroner, and special guest Herbert Freeden, who had served in the League's theatre department and later written the 1st book on the League, published in 1964. Kroner recalled that, before the discussion, Freeden had threatened to leave the stage if panelists only discussed happy memories. (24) In an earlier interview, Freeden responded to criticism by affirming the League and its function during the 3rd « Reich » :

« Could it be that someone postponed his emigration because he could go to the Opera, theatre, concerts ? No one gave-up or postponed his emigration because the Culture League existed ; fundamentally, it had been moral support for the Jews. » (25)

In contrast, during the panel discussion, « playing devil's advocate » , Kroner recalls :

« Freeden's very definite conclusion was that " we were used " ; " that we were misled by our own leaders into a feeling of false security " ; that it was all an " illusion " ; and possibly contributed to a sense of false optimism, preventing many of us from seeking emigration. » (26)

The other panel members disagreed. Kroner herself defended the League from the stage :

« The organization most certainly did not deceive me into wanting to stay in Germany, but it provided the opportunity to stay in physical shape, so vital for a dancer. It was not a happy time off the stage, but it was constructive and also happy while on stage, for which I am grateful. » (27)

Though former members, on and off, the panel have expressed their own positive opinions of the organization (a luxury perhaps of survival) . Freeden's summation of negative charges that night was significant in several ways. For several Berlin Jewish organizations, the larger exhibit (« Patterns of Jewish Life ») did not « pay enough attention to Jewish suffering » . (28) The League exhibition was a prime candidate for such criticism. Of his work on the League with Broder, Geisel explained :

« Sometimes, we have been accused by critics of showing the entertainment of this theatre and that we pushed all the crimes into the background. » (29)

« The German audience didn't know how to react. Many didn't talk or say anything. They knew that, usually, Jews are victims. That's what they learned at school. They cannot bear a picture on TV or conversation when a Jewish actor says, ' I loved this theatre. It was the best part of my life and I didn't care about the Nazis.' » (30)

The League was a challenge to reigning perceptions of Jewish life under Adolf Hitler's rule. In other words, the idea of the League as entertainment, diversion (even a source of laughter or joy) for Jews in Nazi Germany contrasted 2 potent post-Holocaust tropes of the supposed Jewish experience during the 3rd « Reich » : that of resistance and victimization.

The idea of resistance has been fundamental to work on Jewish activity during the period, including discussions of life in the concentration camps and the « Judenräte » (Jewish Councils) . Of the League, Freeden, in fact, explained that the League's performance of music and theatre within a German tradition represented « an element of spiritual resistance » . (31) In contrast and complement, Yehoyakim Cochavi has discussed as resistance the embracing of Jewishness within the League. (32) In part, this idea of resistance, in either formulation, grows from the call of the young poet Abba Kovner, in January 1942, in the Vilna Ghetto in Lithuania :

« Let us not be led like sheep to the slaughter. » (33)

After the Holocaust, survivors were admonished for failing to adequately respond to this plea. (34) Any evidence of resistance (real or imagined) has been significant to survivors and scholars as a challenge to this claim and a way to regain lost honour.

After World War II, however, past and present Jewish culture in Germany for some had a new « rôle » (as living monument) from resistance to reminder. In New York, in December 1945, Leo Baeck, a former influential rabbi in Berlin, envisioned a Germany without Jews. There were moral and psychological reasons to leave, including the constant reminder of guilt and resultant self-contempt related to what has been termed « Survival Guilt Syndrome ». With the founding of Israel, in 1948, Jews were also needed elsewhere. (35) And so, that year's Jewish World Congress declared that, soon, no Jew would enter Germany again. (36) However, in the 1950's, Zwi Harry Levy, a prominent rabbi in Germany offered a religious justification for Jews to remain : Jews could be a monument for the German people. (37) In this way, the image of Jew as victim (a constant reminder of the past) became valuable as the basis for a so-called « negative symbiosis » . (38)

The idea of the League as diversion and amusement (a positive force for Jews in Nazi Germany) does not correspond to either of these influential images of the Jew. And, yet, in the Jewish Culture League, there was entertainment, and this entertainment, for some, saved lives. But that is not the whole story either. In way of conclusion, I offer 2 brief examples :

For some, League membership provided a certain degree of protection (exempting performers from forced labor and ensuring release from arrest) following « Kristallnacht » . This protection for the former League violinist Henry Meyer, later a member of the renowned « LaSalle Quartet » , continued even in the concentration camp. He recounted how, on the night before he was to be gassed, at the age of only 18, a Jewish prisoner doctor mentioned he was from Breslau. Meyer explained that he had played in Breslau with the Jewish Culture League. The doctor remembered Meyer and quickly left the barrack. A moment later, he returned with a dead body. He exchanged Meyer's information with that of the corpse, left the body, and carried Meyer out of the barrack.

Through that act, Meyer recalled :

« I was back alive. » (39)

Of course, many were not so lucky. In 1938, Kurt Singer, the co-founder and initial League leader, was visiting his sister and lecturing at Harvard University. (40) After « Kristallnacht » , though he was offered a university position in the United States, Singer returned to Europe out of loyalty and the import he placed on the League. (41) En route in Rotterdam, friends convinced Singer to suspend his homecoming. He remained in Holland and, for a time, participated in musical activities there, including concerts at Amsterdam's Jewish Theatre, originally the « Hollandsche Schouwburg » , which the Nazis established, in 1941, based on the model of the Berlin Jewish Culture League. (42) With the Nazi occupation of Holland, Singer tried to return to the United States, but was unable to procure a means of departure.

Because of his « outstanding service to Germany's artistic community », Singer was eventually sent to the « model » concentration camp of « Terezín », where he died on February 7, 1944. (43)

Whether or not Singer began this return trip in part because he believed Jews still had a home in Nazi Germany (a fallacy the existence of the League may have fostered) is hard to judge. What is clear from these examples is that the League served different functions for different people in what Freedman called, in 1964, « ein Tanz auf dem Vulkan » (a dance on the volcano) . (44) As Timothy B. Malchow rightly points-out, to reify the Jewish experience as solely that of victim or otherwise threatens to reinforce fixed thinking about the Jew - a practice fundamental to anti-Semitic thought. (45) As Terrence Des Prés writes in his essay « Holocaust Laughter » of 1987 :

« It's not fear and sorrow we need more of, but undaunted vision. » (46)

The Berlin « Jüdischer Kulturbund » and the « After-Life » of Franz Schubert : Musical Appropriation and Identity Politics in Nazi Germany

(Lily E. Hirsch.)

The interaction between the performance of a musical work and its audience varies according to aesthetic and social expectations belonging to a particular historical moment. The study of music reception can, therefore, disclose as much, if not more, about the audience and its environment than it does about the musical work alone. This logic is applied by examining the reception of some of Franz Schubert's music in the context of the Berlin « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League) , a cultural organization established by an alliance of Jews and Nazis, in 1933, and disbanded by the latter, 8 years later. The reception of Schubert by the League is a complicated matter, but it offers the opportunity to spotlight some of the contradictions inherent in the League's creation and operation, which also inform broader debates regarding « Jewish music » and musical politics during the 3rd « Reich » .

To set the stage for this examination, some preliminary comments about the creation of the organization are in order. The initial plan for the Jewish Culture League, originally called the Culture League of German Jews (« Kulturbund Deutscher Juden ») , was developed by Kurt Baumann in the early months of 1933. Between 1928 and 1933, he had served as a production assistant at the Berlin « Staatsoper » , the « Volksbühne » , and the « Städtische Oper » (Municipal Opera) , in Charlottenburg. When he was dismissed from his duties, at age 26, he realized that Berlin could support a separate Jewish cultural life. (1) In his Memoirs, he explained :

« My idea to found a Jewish cultural circle was based on very simple numbers ; at the time, 175,000 Jews lived in Berlin alone, many other big cities had similar concentrations, percentage wise. I figured that a city of 175,000 inhabitants could support its own theatre, Opera, Symphony Orchestra, museum, lectures, and even " Hochschule ", all within the economic conditions of a mid-sized city. » (2)

In 2 weeks, he worked-out a detailed proposal and contacted the former director of Berlin's Municipal Opera, Kurt Singer, whose assistant he had been, from 1930 to 1932. (3) Singer, who was also a physician, musicologist, and the director of the Doctors' Chorus (« Ärztechor ») , in Berlin, had envisioned a similar organization. After revising the initial plan drafted by Baumann (4) and recruiting other Jewish luminaries, (5) Singer struggled to win Nazi sponsorship. He was eventually invited to meet with Hans Hinkel, who had been appointed head of the Prussian Theatre Commission by the new Prussian Minister, Hermann Göring, immediately after Adolf Hitler's ascension to power. (6) Hinkel recognized several reasons why support of the League was prudent, especially after Hitler's Law for the Reconstitution of the Civil Service was enacted, on 7 April 1933. This measure effectively barred non-Aryans (defined then as any person descended from a Jewish parent or grandparent) from holding positions at State-run music Conservatories, Opera Houses, concert halls, and theatres. (7) The regime would be able to exploit the organization in international propaganda by citing it as evidence that Jews were not being mistreated ; it could function as a cultural outlet and source of income for Jews, which would help to quell possible social unrest ; and, finally, the creation of the League could help the Nazis control and, ultimately, ensure the end of Jewish involvement in German culture. Hinkel agreed to the founding of the League and, in mid- May, summoned Singer to a final meeting with Göring, who warned :

« If you do it properly and do as you're told by " Herr Hinkel ", all will go well. If you misbehave, then there will be trouble, as you well know. » (8)

Thus the League received the Nazi government's « blessing » (9) and one of the most paradoxical partnerships in German history began. (10)

The Jewish Culture League gained an immediate following and, at the beginning of September, the League already consisted of 8 separate sections : the drama department, which was associated with the dramaturgy department (directed by Julius Bab) ; the Opera department (headed by Singer and the general music director Joseph Rosenstock) , which was linked with the concert department (directed by Singer, Rosenstock, and conductor Michaël Taube, who was succeeded by Hans Wilhelm - William - Steinberg and, later, Rudolf Schwarz) (11) ; the set and costume division (Heinz Codell) ; the technical department (Hans Sondheimer) ; the management division (Werner Levie) ; and the lecture department, which was organized by Julius Bab, Arthur Eloesser, Max Osborn, Julius Guttmann, Ernst Landsberger, and Anneliese Landau. (12) The Jewish Culture League in Berlin became an example for the Rhine-Ruhr and the Rhine-Main areas, catalyzing the formation of active Leagues in Cologne and Frankfurt, respectively. Smaller off-shoots formed in Hamburg, Munich, Breslau, Kassel, and other locations. By 1935, the Jewish Culture League had 46 local chapters in other towns and cities, all of which the Nazi regime generalized under the umbrella union, « Reichsverband der jüdischen Kulturbünde » (« Reich » Association of Jewish Culture Leagues) . The Berlin chapter (the 1st and last site of League activity) was the largest with 20,000 members in early 1934. (13)

This growth and early success does not mean that the central Berlin branch was without conflict. Hinkel had insisted on certain operational terms for the League before agreeing to its creation. These terms included the condition that the League be staffed by Jewish artists only and financed by the all-Jewish audiences through a monthly membership fee of 2.50 « Reichsmark » per person. Only the Jewish press was allowed to report on League events, further isolating Jewish activities from the rest of the population. There was also a stipulation that League programs were to be submitted to Hinkel's office for approval. (14) This latter requirement allowed the regime to protect Germany's cultural legacy while promoting a repertoire they saw as appropriate for a Jewish organization. To this end, the censors in Hinkel's office began to encourage the performance of what they considered Jewish music (a composition by a Jewish composer or with a Jewish / Old Testament theme) and to suppress music by German composers : Richard Wagner and Richard Strauß were off limits from the start ; in 1936, Beethoven was added to the list, soon followed by Robert Schumann, Johann Sebastian Bach, and Johannes Brahms. Works by Franz Schubert and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, both officially Austrian until the « Anschluß » , as well as Georg Friedrich Händel (somewhat « tainted » by his Israelite Oratorios) could be performed until 1938, when they too were banned from the League's programs.

Some assimilated League members and associates feared the consequences of these early bans and insisted that an organization dedicated to Jewish music would, in effect, be no more than a cultural Ghetto. Members with Zionist ties, however, demanded a greater devotion to a repertoire that fostered a Jewish awareness. As the Zionist voice, with Nazi support, gained representation in the League, the League was forced to ask, « What is Jewish music in Nazi Germany ? » . This question culminated in the Jewish Culture League Conference, in September 1936. At this event, leaders in the field of music advanced conflicting ideas of what Jewish music was, including the belief that Jewish music did not yet exist, that all music created by composers of Jewish origin was Jewish music, and platforms between the 2 that privileged certain musical characteristics as markers of authentic Jewish music. The League's performance programs, collected in a 1992 volume entitled « Geschlossene Vorstellung : Der Jüdische Kulturbund in Deutschland 1933-1941 » (15) , reflect these debates, especially during the League's early years (1933-1937) , before the more pressing concerns of escape and survival took center stage.

There are many composers within this repertoire that may prompt us to ask the following questions : Why was Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy so popular ? Why was Arnold Schœnberg, who returned to the Jewish faith in 1933, so unpopular ? What could explain the increase in Gustav Mahler's popularity during the League's tenure ? Why was Kurt Weill completely absent from the repertoire ? To avoid generalizations that would undermine the complexities of the League's context, this article focuses solely on Franz Schubert, who might at 1st appear an unlikely choice. He is not usually considered in discussions of national controversies, and his own political dealings never reached the level of strife associated with composers such as Richard Wagner, Giuseppe Verdi, or Béla Bartók, to name a few. And yet, the prominence of his music in the League (a highly-charged nationalistic organization) makes him a necessary focus. Indeed, Schubert was the 2nd most frequently performed composer ; along with Beethoven, Schubert's music was included in 46 League performances. What could account for Schubert's extreme popularity within this Jewish organization ? What does his standing reveal about the League's debates or, by extension, about the national self-identification of those who participated in them ?

German Music and Identity in the League

One explanation for Schubert's popularity in the League concerns the prevalence of lieder and « German music » , that is, music composed by musicians of German origin. Despite Nazi censorship, Singer and other department directors programmed German music more regularly than so-called Jewish music, and it was more popular with audiences generally. This popularity challenged the foundation of the League as a Jewish organization.

Performance Breakdown

The prominence of German music is indicative of the strong German orientation of the League, especially in its early years, as well as of the German self-identification of its public and leaders. As Singer explained, members of Jewish communities in Berlin generally remained « theatre people of 1900, internally distant from Jewish pieces or pieces considered to be Jewish » . (16) As many have pointed-out, until the Nazis assumed power, many « Jews » had not considered themselves Jewish and continued to identify themselves as German. In « My German Question » , Peter Gay explains this psychology :

« For my parents and for me, cherishing our Jewishness was not an acceptable option. We did not want to be Jews by Nazi edict ; their definition of our “ race ” was just another lie that we repudiated as unhistorical and unscientific. We did not think of ourselves as members of a chosen people, divinely selected for glory or for suffering. Whatever our pious fellow-pariahs might say, we could not make ourselves believe what we did not believe. (17)

For League members, performing works by German composers functioned as a link to German culture and, thus, to the German nation as a whole. (18) Not only that, for some members, it was also a means of resistance against the cultural and intellectual ghettoization forced upon them by the Nazis. Herbert Freeden, a former member and early historian of the League, suggested as much when he wrote that “ in its stubborn refusal to give-up its bond to Europe and to deny its intellectual tradition, the “ Kulturbund ” became a moral reservoir of strength for Jewish Germans, and an element of spiritual resistance ”. » (19)

Lieder, a genre Richard Taruskin offers as the answer to the question « What is German ? » (« Was ist deutsch ? ») , (20) held a special significance within this struggle. Lieder connected League members to Germany through language, which, according to Johann Gottfried von Herder, was the defining feature of a nation and « exemplified the spontaneity of the “ Volksgeist ” » . (21) The Nazis shared this opinion and attempted to deny Jewish Germans access to language as a preliminary method of excluding them from the nation. For example, on 13 April 1933, Nazi students posted and otherwise made public, on university buildings and billboards throughout Germany, a list of 12 crimes allegedly committed by Jews. The 5th item on the list proclaimed : « The Jew who can only think Jewish but writes German lies. » . (22) Thus, the students demanded that works by Jewish authors appear only in Hebrew, or, if they must appear in German, be labeled as translations. (23) Along these lines, the Nazis « suggested » that the Jewish Culture League conduct its affairs in Hebrew rather than German - a difficult request given that most members of the League were not familiar with Hebrew. (24) The Nazis, however, viewed this as an insubordination, as a means of « passive resistance » . (25) Coming closer to the truth, the New York « Times » explained the Jewish Culture League's opposition to this order as reluctance to discard the « manifold Jewish cultural values that find expression through the medium of the German language » . (26)

This adherence to German culture and language as a means of asserting their members' place in German society was part of a much larger tradition. In the past, Jewish Germans had viewed German culture as their entry into German society. To this end, they had embraced the concept of « Bildung » , defined in the spirit of G ethe as both a process and a product imperceptibly « ushering its subjects to states of greater complexity and self-awareness » . (27) In the 19th Century, the medium of this transformation, or self-improvement, had been most often literature, philosophy, and the arts. (28) After the « Hep ! Hep ! » (29) riots of 1819, the jurist Eduard Gans, Jewish scholar Leopold Zunz, and merchant Moses Moser had met to consider ways to reduce the rampant « Judeophobia ». They established the Society for Culture and Science of the Jews with the goal of introducing Jews to German culture and, at the same time, re-inforcing Jewish identity. They hoped that their organization would form a bridge between the Jews and their German home, eliminating the image of the Jew as « outsider ». (30) As Moses Mendelssohn's example had proved long before, however, integration through « Bildung » did not necessitate religious transformation or full assimilation. Rather, German and Jewish culture could exist in parallel without merging. Thus, even in Orthodox homes, including those of rabbis, parents would sing both Hebrew and German songs with their children and, on official occasions, principal Orthodox personalities would cite both Talmudic dicta and quotations from the works of G ethe, Schiller, and even Wagner. (31)

But the appeal of lieder can also be credited to the League members' sentimental attachment to that musical tradition, nurtured by the nostalgia for the past implicit in the genre. (32) The members' familiarity with lieder, as well as the music of Beethoven, Bach, and Brahms, further enhanced this attraction. Indeed, studies in the psychology of music have suggested a strong connection between the brain's response to pleasure in conjunction with the recognition of familiar music, or repeated hearings of a musical piece. (33) Thus, although the League was committed to Jewish music (in a large part due to Nazi pressure) , German music mattered to League members who were painfully aware of the irony of their German cultural identity, attached as they were to the music they had always known, and nostalgic for a past without the threat of Nazi persecution.

Another Explanation : Lieder and « Hausmusik »

Still, the popularity of lieder, and Schubert's work in general, is not solely explained by connecting the League's German self-identification and traditions with the Germanness of their repertoire. Music, like people, rarely adheres to neat national distinctions, and although League administrators were expected to program music based on race and nationality, additional factors compounded the difficulty of their choices. These factors frustrate any hope for a straightforward overview of the repertoire choices, but, nonetheless, expose embedded cultural values and the conflicted processes that League organizers went through to meet their constituents' expectations as well as Nazi requirements.

To illustrate my point, the significance of lieder also relates to the belief that true Jewish music had to be vocal-music, as no instruments were allowed in the liturgy (34) - a point that featured prominently in the Jewish Culture League Conference. As Singer explained in his closing remarks there, « According to the knowledge and experiences of the real specialists, Jewish music only exists in synagogue music and in Jewish folksong. » . (35) He also proclaimed, « Jewish music is not orchestral music ; it is vocal, an ardent prayer, a song of the individual or many, but not instrumental. » . (36) The composition of song was therefore specifically emphasized and promoted during the conference. In fact, to close the meeting, League organizers announced a composition competition to promote Jewish music in the following genres : an Overture for orchestra ; a choral work for 4-voice mixed choir with orchestra ; a choral work for 2 or more voices for school or youth choirs ; a cycle of lieder for voice with piano ; and a cycle of choral songs for small choir a capella or with instruments. (37) The predominance of vocal-music within this list is undeniable and was only enhanced by lieder's special significance within Jewish communities, historically and during the 3rd « Reich » , as a genre appropriate for « Hauskonzerte » (home concerts) . (38)

During the early 19th Century, « Hauskonzerte » thrived in the Berlin salons hosted by Sara Levy and Amalie Beer, as well as in Vienna under the auspices of various Jewish financier families - the most famous of which was hosted by Felix Mendelssohn's great-aunt, Fanny Arnstein, who « virtually dominated Vienna's salon life between 1780 and 1818 » . (39) The Viennese salons allowed Jews, who were excluded from the social circles of the Austrian aristocracy, to create their own spheres of influence and cultivate their love of literature and music. During the reign of Emperor Franz-Josef I (1792-1835) and his minister Clemens von Metternich, when Vienna was permeated by spies, corruption, and deceit, these salons also provided a safe occasion for social gatherings. (40) Given the similar climate of fear in Nazi Germany, it is understandable that the Jewish Culture League was forced to turn to this tradition, which continued into the 20th Century, in both Vienna and Berlin, despite the rise of public concert life. (41)

Hilda Klestadt Jonas, a former performer in the League's Düsseldorf branch, remembered that « people felt more comfortable » during these concerts at private homes. (42) Since « Hauskonzerte » were less official than the League's standard offerings, a complete reconstruction of their content and frequency is impossible. Still, the programs collected in « Geschlossene Vorstellung » list several « Hauskonzerte » featuring lieder: in March 1934, a concert featured Franz Schubert lieder and Robert Schumann duets ; in December 1934, a full program of Schubert lieder ; in January 1935, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy lieder and duets ; in February 1935, lieder by Jakob Schønberg ; on 13 October 1935, a Schubert and Gustav Mahler lieder evening ; and, in January 1937, a concert featuring « Die schöne Müllerin » , to name a few. (43) These private performances represented a loophole, circumventing Hinkel's mandatory repertoire inspection. Henry Meyer, a member of the Berlin League's Orchestra, recalls :

« We were denied Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven. We then played them in many “ Hauskonzerte ”, where we did not have to work under these limitations. » (44)

This allowed the League to maintain a tradition of performing Bach and Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann - a tradition that, as the musicologist and League lecturer Anneliese Landau insisted, was fundamental to the next generation's education and « self-cultivation » . (45)

These concerts made a virtue out of need as well. The League was chronically plagued by a shortage of wind players ; and, as early as 1933, the emigration, often on short notice, of accomplished performing artists and prominent musicians presented a substantial impediment to rehearsal and performance schedules. (46) In a review of Mozart's « Le nozze di Figaro » , the League's 1st Operatic production in the « Berliner Theater » on « Charlottenstraße » , on 14 November 1933, Ludwig Misch, a composer and music-critic in Berlin, identified these limitations :

« The “ Kulturbund ” had only limited means at its disposal, which came from member contributions. The lack of Jewish wind players, which had to be taken into account in the programming of orchestral concerts became an object of mounting worry with regard to Opera. The obvious necessity to limit the choice of performers to the small circle of Jewish artists made gathering an ensemble an even greater problem than it already was. » (47)

Thus, traditional genres reserved for « Hauskonzerte » , such as lieder, were ideal for the League.

Franz Schubert's status, however, becomes more complicated when compared to Robert Schumann's. Heralded as preeminent lied composers, both Schumann and Schubert were accepted by the less-progressive League public. (48) Nevertheless, Schumann's music was included in only 14 performances, one less than Gustav Mahler's. Schubert's music, on the other hand, was included in over 3 times that number. What distinguished Schubert from Schumann in the eyes of League members ?

Schubert's Jewish Music

Schubert was an extremely prolific composer. He wrote approximately 630 songs, which is over 5 times the number of songs Schumann wrote during the period of productivity that many scholars have called Schumann's « Liederjahr » (1840-1841) . The League's performances of Schubert's music, however, were not just the result of a voluminous oeuvre. Rather, the League responded to contrasting images of the 2 composers. Both Schubert and Schumann set the poetry of Heinrich Heine, (49) forging a link between them and the icon of German-Jewish culture. But the commonalities end there. During the Nazi era, Schumann was heralded as representative of the German musical tradition, and, in Friedrich Welter's « Musikgeschichte im Umriss » , as a forerunner of National-Socialism. (50) As diagnosed by Nazi musicologist Wolfgang Boetticher, Schumann was said to have been strongly anti-Semitic in his reviews of Giacomo Meyerbeer's music, lamenting its « annoying, grumbling and indiscreet rhythm » while deploying the term Jew as an « insult » . (51) This picture of Schumann was hardly attractive to Jewish communities. Schubert, in contrast, was cast as a friend to Jews, owing perhaps to the fact that several of his works, arguably composed in response to his Catholic upbringing, could be considered « Jewish » .

Schubert, who was brought-up in a strict and religious household, participated in the Catholic Church as a choirboy. (52) This orthodox upbringing may account for the many liturgical works Schubert wrote throughout his life. However, as an adult, Schubert did not subscribe to the religion of his youth, a disinclination perhaps foreshadowed by his « bad » (« schlecht ») grade in religion at the « Kaiserlich-Königlich Normalhauptschule » . (53) The change in attitude is evident in a letter to Schubert, dated 12 October 1818, in which his free-thinking brother Ignaz warned :

« If you should wish to write to Papa and me at the same time, do not touch upon religious matters. » (54)

This admonition suggests that Schubert's religious outlook was closer to that of Ignaz, who perhaps feared reprisal from their father. Schubert also left clues about his later religious views in his sacred music. Unwilling to pledge loyalty to the Church, Schubert always omitted « Et in unam sanctam catholicam ecclesiam » from the Credo of his Masses and, occasionally, expunged the phrase « Et expecto resurrectionem » , the only statement of belief in the resurrection of the dead. (55) Furthermore, in a letter of January 1827, Schubert's friend Ferdinand Walcher wrote-out a musical incipit over the words « Credo in unum Deum ! » followed by the exclamation, « Not you, I know well enough. » . (56) Schubert may have been attracted to the humanist movement of the time. As Frank Ruppert concluded :

« Franz Schubert was a Christian humanist, the product of a synthesis of messianic Judaism and the platonic vision of life as an ascent to divine perfection. » (57)

This unorthodoxy, whether the result of humanism or not, is evidenced by his musical contribution to cantor Salomon Sulzer (1804-1890) and the new « Seitenstettengasse » Synagogue, in Vienna, inaugurated in 1826. After an unsuccessful attempt to secure a composition for the synagogue from Beethoven, Sulzer turned to Schubert. The composer, « in a remarkably generous gesture to the small community of Jews in Vienna » , (58) responded in July 1828 with a setting of Psalm 92 (« Tov L'Hodot » , or « It is good to give thanks to the Lord ») for mixed chorus and baritone solo. In 1841, the piece was published in « Schir Zion » , Sulzer's collection of 122 pieces for the liturgy and 37 commissioned compositions. In 1870, Schubert's setting of Psalm 92 was re-issued together with Moses Mendelssohn's translation « Lieblich ist's dem Ew'gen danken » . For the original setting, Schubert had used the Hebrew text, even though the German would have been acceptable to Sulzer. (59) The piece itself does not show characteristics commonly found in music considered Jewish. (60) Rather, it is homophonic and harmonically simple, typical aspects of some of Schubert's part-songs. It also pays homage to traditional sacred emblems : it has an overall plagal tonal scheme of I (C major, measures 1-28) - IV (F major, measures 29-70) - I (C major, measures 71-88) , and, in the opening and closing sections, a solo quartet and the choir alternate antiphonally as in responsorial psalmody. However, Schubert did make concessions to the piece's function : the middle-section, which is more complex harmonically, includes a baritone solo for the cantor. Sulzer, who must have chanted verse 1 and verses 10 through 16, which Schubert did not set. In keeping with the conventions of the synagogue, the piece is also a cappella.

The New Madrigal Society (« Neue Madrigalvereinigung ») , directed by Ludwig Misch « took-up the cause » (« sich eingesetzt hat ») of Schubert's Psalm 92. (61) Misch formed his Madrigal Society (later known as the « Jüdischer Madrigalvereinigung » or Jewish Madrigal Society) under the supervision of the League, which cleared the group's repertoire with Hinkel's office. (62) The Madrigal Society performed the work in Hebrew at League concerts in December 1934, twice in 1936, and recorded it in Berlin on the « Lukraphon » label at the beginning of 1935. (63) Those involved in these performances were in this way made aware of Schubert's unusual gift to the synagogue, if they were not already familiar with the work. The piece, cited as « den für Sulzer komponierten 92. Psalm » (the Psalm 92 composed for Sulzer) , (64) highlighted Schubert's connection to Sulzer, whose own sacred music was included in 2 League events.

This emphasis was consistent with the earliest performances of Psalm 92, as well as with its treatment within scholarship on Jewish music. Premiered at Sulzer's synagogue, in the summer of 1828, the work was 1st heard in a secular setting at an event organized in Vienna by the Society for the Collection and Preservation of Artistic and Historic Jewish Mementoes, on 12 May 1904, in celebration of the Centenary of Sulzer's birth. Schubert's setting of the Psalm opened the concert, a performance devoted solely to Hebrew music. (65) Both Abraham Wolf Binder, musician and scholar of Jewish musical studies in New York, and Aron Marko Rothmüller, a composer at one time associated with the League, have used the Psalm to illustrate Schubert's close friendship with Sulzer, who was, according to Binder, the « 1st recognized interpreter of the songs of Franz Schubert » . (66) The music-critic and author Artur Holde, active in Berlin until he immigrated to the United States, in 1936, also maintained that one of those who appreciated Sulzer's interpretive gifts was Schubert himself. (67) Could this consistent emphasis on the Psalm setting's connection to Sulzer have enhanced Schubert's overall popularity in the League ? Sulzer was indeed a significant ally. He had served as chief cantor at the « Seitenstettengasse » Synagogue for 45 years. During his tenure, he revitalized music for the Jewish liturgy and his innovative style would influence the development of synagogue music for decades to follow. (68) For these reasons, he was well-known and generally respected in Jewish communities. No doubt Schubert's treatment of Psalm 92 created a sympathetic image of the composer, and cast him as a friend to Sulzer and, by extension, to Jews in general.

Such a view was maintained and expanded during the Nazi era by the conductor Fritz Busch, a prominent and early non-Jewish victim of the Nazi regime. Parochial Party politics forced Busch to leave his job as the director of the State Opera in Dresden, in March 1933, and he eventually emigrated. (69) In March 1942, he appeared as conductor of the 3 Choir Festival of New York, which was sponsored by the Congregation Emanu-El and directed by Lazare Saminsky « in an expression of faith and principle » . Busch explained his appearance thus :

« In joining my work with that of a Jewish fellow-musician, Lazare Saminsky, director of the Festival, and in trying thus to help in the fostering of cultural comradeship and amity among creeds and races, I am not doing anything new : I merely follow in the footsteps of a very great and a very lovable German musician, Franz Schubert. 100 years ago, in another sinister period of history full of strife between creeds and nations, Schubert, German and Christian as could be, carried his high-minded friendliness so far as to compose a choral work to Hebrew words for the synagogal service of his friend, the famous cantor, Salomon Sulzer of Vienna. It is published in Sulzer's collection and is used by the Jewish people the world over as their own. This is what Schubert did. I am happy to follow his example. » (70)

Busch here propagates the posthumous picture of the German, rather than Austrian, Schubert, friend to Sulzer and spokesman for tolerance. He also asserted that the Jewish people claimed Psalm 92 as their possession, explaining that it was « used by the Jewish people the world over as their own » , implying a connection between Jewish music (conceived of as the cultural property of the Jewish people) and Psalm 92. He was not alone. In 1976, the composer and cantor Eduard Birnbaum, (71) whose « Talmudische Rhapsodie » was performed by the League, in 1935, similarly claimed Schubert in his article, « Franz Schubert as a Composer of Synagogue Music » . (72)

Schubert's other Psalm settings shed further light on the allure his music had within Jewish communities. He composed music for Psalms 13 (incomplete) and 23 and arranged Maximilian Stadler's setting of Psalm 8, (73) all to Moses Mendelssohn's translations. Schubert's Psalm 23 (1820) , for SSAA chorus and piano, was performed by the League at Berlin's « Friedenstempel » on « Markgraf-Albrecht-Strasse » , in November 1936. The Psalm, one of the most popular in the Psalter and ascribed to King David, describes a traveler who passes through luscious pastures and beyond still waters until he comes to « The Valley of the Shadow of Death » . (74) Here, the Psalm switches from 3rd person references to God (He) to 2nd person references (Thou) , addressing God directly and emphasizing that the traveler is no longer alone :

« He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil : for Thou art with me. » (75)

The German-Romantic theme of a lone traveler, meeting his fate and finding comfort, would have appealed to Schubert, who continually visited this subject in his compositions. For our purposes, however, Schubert's use of Moses Mendelssohn's translations is the main point of interest.

Mendelssohn had hoped that his translations, which were inspired by a desire to restore the Hebrew lyric, would become popular with musicians. Nevertheless, not even his grandson, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, made consistent use of them. (76) What is more, there is evidence that Felix refused a request from the Hamburg Temple, the 1st Reform synagogue in the city, for Psalm settings with Moses's translations, opting for the Lutheran instead. (77) In light of this, why and how would Schubert have come to employ Moses's translation in lieu of the others available ? Moreover, could the use of Moses's translation of Psalm 23 be considered another gesture of « cultural comradeship » by the League community ? In his article on the setting, Walther Dürr states :

« One has often wondered why Schubert had recourse to this Psalm in Moses Mendelssohn's German translation, which was certainly intended for the Jewish communities - if not directly for the synagogues. » (78)

Dürr immediately counters this hypothesis, which he restates only to cite common conclusions about the Psalm's destination. According to him, use of Moses's German translation does not necessarily imply a connection to the synagogue. A German, rather than Latin, version was appropriate for Psalm 23's secular destination, and Mendelssohn's German translation was desirable as « one of the most modern translations not compromised by the clash between denominations » . (79) Indeed, other composers had recognized the strengths of Mendelssohn's translations before Schubert and had set them to music. Among them was Maximilian Stadler, who knew Schubert and was most likely the source of Schubert's familiarity with these translations. Still, the fact that a Jewish connection has been assumed is a significant reality within Schubert reception history.

A final sacred work to consider in this discussion of Schubert's « Jewish music » is « Mirjams Siegesgesang » (Miriam's Song of Triumph) , composed in March 1828, for soprano solo and mixed chorus with piano accompaniment. This Cantata-like work, with a text specifically written for Schubert by Franz Grillparzer, describes the rejoicing of the Israelites after their deliverance from the Egyptians, accompanied by Moses's hymn of triumph and praise (Exodus 15) . (80) Given the subject matter, this work was « Jewish » . The work (based on an Old Testament theme) not only fit the Nazi definition of Jewish music but also had musical and thematic ties to Georg Friedrich Händel's Israelite Oratorios, which League organizers consistently designated as Jewish music. (81) The League's performance of the work at Bechstein Hall, in February 1936, enhanced this perception : the composition was programmed alongside Schubert's Psalm 92, and the lied « Dem Unendlichen » (To the Infinite One) , to a text with religious themes by Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock, along with sacred-themed works by Beethoven and vocal compositions by the Jewish composers Rosy Geiger-Kullmann, Cilly Zukmann-Bizony, and Gerhard Goldschlag. The work was also performed at the synagogue on « Oranienburgerstraße » , again with Psalm 92, among other works. While the February concert positioned Schubert as a composer of sacred music, the latter context suggested that these works could belong to a particular denomination. That is, the synagogue setting provided the proper context in which to appreciate Schubert's Psalm 92 and « Mirjams Siegesgesang » as « Jewish » .

Schubert, of course, could not have predicted the appeal of these sacred pieces to Jewish communities (or their subsequent rebirth as symbols of religious tolerance or reconfiguration as « Jewish » works) . However, reception history is the product of many, sometimes contradictory factors that have little to do with the composer and his life. This is especially true in the case of Schubert reception. (82) With few of his own letters to set the record straight, Schubert's biography is less restrictive than those of other composers, and a myriad of interpretations are possible. (83) Jewish communities could therefore claim Schubert for their own purposes - performing his work at the synagogue and satisfying the regime's definition of Jewish music with the works of an « Aryan » composer.

Schubert's general reception also played a role in this appropriation. The narrative post-humously ascribed to him includes the idea of « poor Schubert » (« armer Schubert ») and renders him an outsider or stranger. These images index a state of being to which the members of the League, who were experiencing increasing discrimination and forced estrangement, could no doubt relate. The 1st myth, that of « poor Schubert » (« the unrecognized genius, the artist who valiantly struggles for acceptance and, yet, is inexplicably ignored by the world until after his death ») (84) appears, again and again, in the writings of Schubert's friends, critics, and biographers, from the time of his death, on 19 November 1828, on. Schubert had referred to himself as such in his earliest surviving letter, written to his brother, in 1812, while away at school ; it was signed : « Your loving, poor, hopeful, once again poor, and not to be forgotten brother Franz. » (« Deines Dich liebenden armen, hoffenden und nochmal armen Bruders Franz zu erkennen. ») . (85) This idea was later propagated by Rudolf Hans Bartsch's well-known novel « Schwammerl » (1912) , which had reached a printing of 236,000 copies by 1932 and had been the basis of Heinrich Berté's Operetta « Das Dreimäderlhaus » (1916) . (86) Central to Bartsch's novel was both the relationship between Schubert and Beethoven, and the idea of Schubert as a struggling genius. However, as Alexander Stillmark noted, Bartsch gave the tribulations and deprivations of the genius a positive spin by accentuating the rewards to be reaped later. (87) The deprivations included the composer's precarious financial situation, which, although often exaggerated, quite literally necessitated the adjective « poor » , and his early death. Memoirs, reviews, and reference works have lamented the ephemeral life of the « all too young deceased composer of genius » , (88) and Oscar Bie wrote in his Centennial biography « Schubert, the Man » :

« If he had lived, he would have projected the distinction of his youth into a still riper manhood (into an indescribably fruitful future) and would have become the 1st and foremost of all. » (89)

League associates were aware of this myth and fixation on Schubert's early death. In the program leaflet for an October 1934 performance, Anneliese Landau wrote the following of Schubert's composition of the « Great » C major Symphony, his last complete Symphony (90) :

« He composed it half a year before his death, when all the still unsung lieder had to be sung before the great inexorable silence. » (91)

This dramatic description of Schubert and the Symphony he never heard performed corresponds to the Romantic traits of the Symphony itself, which moved beyond the spirit of the Classical period apparent in Schubert's 1st 6 Symphonies.

(92) The popularity of Schubert's « Unfinished » Symphony, performed once during the League's 1st season and twice in the 3rd season, similarly indexes a certain interest in Schubert's later, more Romantic compositions, as well as the tragedy of his short (« Unfinished ») life. Schubert's economic need (another aspect of the « poor » Schubert myth) may also have been a part of this awareness. In a speech delivered in 1939, shortly after her immigration to the United States, Landau said that :

« Schubert had the hard luck to live in a period of social changes. » (93)

Thus having to rely on his friends :

« These friends (not quite as poor as Schubert, but not blessed with wealth either) gave Schubert shelter and food through many years. » (94)

It is difficult to say whether Landau portrayed Schubert in such a light in her 1st speech to League members, in 1933. However, many of Landau's later speeches were based on, or were direct translations of, the speeches she gave at the League.

The 2nd myth (Schubert as an outsider) is visible in the Schubert iconography, where, as Antonio Baldassare observes :

« It is striking how often Schubert appears on the periphery within a group of people and how explicitly he avoids any visual contact in portraits. » (95)

He is present but never wholly accepted or included. For example, Leopold Kupelwieser, in his « Landpartie der Schubertianer von Atzenbrugg nach Aumühl » (1820) , depicts a group traveling in a cart drawn by 2 horses, from Vienna to Atzenbrugg. 2 smaller figures run ahead of the cart, while 2 others appear at the left margin of the watercolor, absorbed in conversation. These latter figures represent the artist, in a cap, and Schubert, wearing glasses and a top hat. Similarly, in Kupelwieser's « Charade : Gesellschaftsspiel der Schubertianer in Atzenbrugg » (1821) , Schubert again is near the margin, at the piano. In her 1939 speech on Schubert, Landau subscribed fully to the depiction of Schubert as the outsider or « Other » , seeing him as the representation of « the tragic loneliness of the Romantic artist » . (96) By calling him « perhaps the greatest of all Romantic composers » and « the 1st for whom the Lindenbaum with its majestic trunk, with its spreading shade became a symbol of protection against a hurting outside world » (97) , she catalogued Romantic tropes of protection and pain and connected Schubert to a world beyond suffering, represented by the « Lindenbaum » (lime tree) , the ultimate German symbol of « the innocence and security of childhood » . (98) She concluded her speech with « Schubert is beauty that never can be destroyed » . (99) Schubert was the Romantic ideal, threatened by a world to which he did not belong. Landau discussed Schubert in a similar way for League audiences, in 1933, explaining Romanticism as a stylistic period and « Weltanschauung » (world view) that focuses on the conflicted relationship of the individual to those around him. (100)

Schubert's music was instrumental to the creation of this myth : in it, the popular consciousness meshes Schubert's life with his musical subjects. One famous example of an outsider, linked to Schubert and the eternal Jew, (101) is the narrator of « Winterreise », a cycle of 24 songs composed a year before Schubert's death. This character is portrayed as lonely and forgotten in the 3rd song, « Gefror'ne Thränen », where he bemoans his unnoticed frozen tears, and in the 13th song, « Die Post », where he awaits a letter, any letter, and struggles to maintain his waning hope, which is reflected in the music by the alternation between major and minor. In the final piece, « Der Leiermann », the lonely wanderer confronts his « other » self, a beggar-musician, who embodies all his fears of solitude and estrangement from the world. This cold isolation is captured in the piano accompaniment, with the organ-grinder's empty open 5th in the left-hand functioning as a drone and, according to Jonathan Bellman, evoking the « style hongrois » to signify the Gypsy, another societal outcast. (102) As in Psalm 23, the end of the journey is marked by the narrator's switch from 3rd person to 2nd person in the 5th stanza, when the wanderer addresses the organ-grinder directly :

« But he lets it all go on as go it will ;
Keeps the handle ever turning, never still ;
Strange old organ-grinder, shall I go with you ? » (103)

This cycle was performed by the League, in October 1934 and on 7 April 1935. The popularity of the work is evident in a review of the 1934 performance. Jakob Schœnberg, critic for the « Jüdische Rundschau », wrote :

« Only enthusiastic devotion to the work could make possible the almost 2 hour, uninterrupted rendition of ' Winterreise ' without the slightest letting-up of the interpretive power. » (104)

This devotion can be credited to the appeal of the Romantic outsider, who, in Schubert's lied, « Der Wanderer », which the League programmed in its 1st and 3rd seasons, declares :

« I am a stranger everywhere. » (« Ich bin ein Fremdling überall. ») (105)

In a performance setting, the words and the human voice in Schubert's musical rendering allowed League members to take solace that they were not alone, (106) and established a link between them and Schubert. (107) Schubert and his musical depictions of loneliness and estrangement could also function as a form of catharsis, allowing League members to grieve while listening. This response to music, in Jerrold Levinson's estimation, « allows one to bleed-off in a controlled manner a certain amount of harmful emotion with which one is afflicted » . (108) Sad music is only therapeutic for « listeners currently in the grip of unhealthy emotions, whether on a conscious or unconscious level » . (109) The appeal of Schubert's music, in this vein, is evident in newspaper articles from the period, which highlight the profundity of emotion Schubert's music can conjure. A review of Schubert's « Great » Symphony, for example, emphasizes the work's « Slavic melancholy » (« slawische Melancholie ») and « depths of feeling » (« Tiefe des Empfindens ») . (110)

Nazi Policy

Schubert's music could no longer function in this way, after 1938. At this time, the Nazis banned Schubert from League programs. But why had they not done so earlier ? Beethoven had been banned 2 years prior, in 1936, the year

Germany entered the « danger zone » - a period of mobilization during which Germany prepared for expansion toward Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. (111) Already before 1936, they had censured Jewish enjoyment of Beethoven's music, canceling a League production of « Fidelio » , in 1934. (112) Moreover, in a letter to the director of propaganda of the Berlin Spandau district, dated November 19, 1934, the Charlottenburg propaganda office had condemned as « tactless » (« taktlos ») a recent issue of the League's monthly newsletter which had celebrated and discussed Beethoven and Gœthe. The propaganda officer complained :

« What do Beethoven and Gœthe have in common with the Jews ? » (113)

Perhaps, this opinion explains an order issued by Hinkel's office banning Beethoven's « An die ferne Geliebte » (To the Distant Beloved) , a song cycle set to verses written by a Jewish medical student, Alois Isidor Jeitteles. (114) There is no official explanation of this ban, but, generally, musical settings by German composers of texts by Jewish authors were more likely to be approved. (115) Although these conditions suggest a preference for Beethoven, this trend did not continue in the case of Beethoven's « An die ferne Geliebte » . Meanwhile, the Nazis allowed Schubert's setting of not only German texts by Jewish authors, but also a Hebrew text (Psalm 92) . Beethoven was clearly held in higher esteem than Schubert.

Within the regime's musical politics, Beethoven was privileged as the heroic « Aryan » ideal and placed beside Wagner as representative of German supremacy. In fact, in 1924, Josef Gœbbels had put him ahead of Wagner, musing :

« Why always put Wagner out front as a great man ? Why not Beethoven ? He stood immeasurably higher as a character. » (116)

The Nazis had begun propagating a « völkisch » image of the composer in the Weimar era. The idea of Beethoven as a « world conqueror » was an important element of this image, allowing Nazi music scholars to draw parallels between Beethoven and Hitler. (117) Beethoven was « not just a great composer but also a legendary spiritual leader who could unify the folk with his powerful art » . (118) The image of Beethoven, thus, could serve to legitimize the Nazi Party's political agenda by promoting the composer as « an artist, who, like Adolf Hitler, embodied National-Socialist heroic ideals » . (119) This alignment inspired critic Walter Jacobs, writing for the « Kölnische Zeitung » , to recommend that the National-Socialist politician use Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the « Eroica » , as the sonic emblem of the 3rd « Reich » . (120) Although the Nazis elected Anton Bruckner instead, Beethoven remained an important symbol. His music was regularly appropriated for Party rallies, Festivals, films - such as « Wunschkonzert » (Request Concert) , in 1940 - which recast Beethoven's « Pathétique » Piano Sonata as a March - and radio programs such as the internationally recognized « Beethoven Cycle » broadcast, in January 1934, on the « Deutschlandsender » , the national broadcasting station. (121) Furthermore, the « Schlusschor » of Beethoven's 9th Symphony was performed at the opening ceremonies of the 1936 Olympics in Berlin. One can assume that the universality of Schiller's lyrics (reflecting the atmosphere of the Olympics as an international event) was valued just as much as Beethoven's music. But organizers saw the work foremost as a « proclamation of the Nazi “ Volksgemeinschaft ” » . (122)

Schubert, on the other hand, represented « one of the most complicated problems of German music » (« eines der kompliziertesten Probleme der deutschen Musik ») . (123) In « Musik und Rasse » , an important work of the era, Richard Eichenauer identified in Schubert's music a « certain softening of voice leading » (« gewisse Erweichung der Linienführung ») , frequent shifts from major to minor, and harmonic weakness - which he credited to Schubert's supposed mixed ancestry. These characteristics, for Eichenauer, distinguished Schubert's work from the music of Beethoven. (124) Linked with femininity (and homosexuality) , this assessment is echoed in both past and present writings on Schubert. In fact, it was Robert Schumann who first coined the analogy of « Beethoven to Schubert as man to woman » . In his 1838 review of Schubert's « Grand Duo » , Schumann had compared Schubert to Beethoven, explaining that Schubert was « a feminine character (“ Mädchencharakter ”) , much more voluble, softer and broader ; or a guileless child romping among giants » , conducting himself « as a wife to husband, the one giving orders, the other relying on pleas and persuasion » . (125) Despite the subtleties Scott Messing identifies in Schumann's critique (and in his more plastic, androgynous understanding of the feminine in Schubert) , this statement represents the beginning of a school of critical analysis that has permanently fixed Schubert in gendered categories. (126) The endurance of this view is evident in Scott Burnham's summation of contemporary opinion :

« From Theodor W. Adorno to Carl Dahlhaus and Susan McClary, Schubert's music is consistently characterized as non-Beethovenian rather than as Schubertian. We can hardly begin to talk about Schubert in any other terms : Schubert is non-processual rather than processual ; reminiscent rather than goal-oriented ; the sense of self projected by his music is permeable rather than autonomous, or feminine rather than masculine, or “ gay ” rather than “ straight ”. » (127)

During the 3rd « Reich » , this thinking was partly based on the Symphonic / melodic opposition that, according to Sanna Pederson, « barely masks the masculine / feminine opposition that underlies it » . (128) In Nazi thought, the association of Schubert with the feminine would link the composer with Germany's « Other » , the Jew, who Otto Weininger had likened to women in his infamous « Sex and Character » . He wrote :

« It would not be difficult to make a case for the view that the Jew is more saturated with femininity than the Aryan, to such an extent that the most manly Jew is more feminine than the least manly Aryan. » (129)

The « cliché » that Schubert was a « typical Austrian » , or even the epitome of what was considered « Viennese » , further contributed to the gendered reading of Schubert and his music, at this time. On November 25, 1928, the American novelist Thomas Wolfe described the celebration of Schubert's Centenary as follows :

« This has been Schubert week (he died 100 years ago, and the ceremonies in his honour this past week have been endless ; their devotion to him is astounding) his picture is everywhere, books about him are everywhere, he has been sung, played, memorialized in churches, Opera, concert houses and public places all this week) and always to great crowds. I think Schubert has become a great symbol to these people, standing for all that was best and greatest in “ the good old time ”. He is Vienna incarnate and he is rooted in their hearts forever. » (130)

Faced with negotiating the embodiment of Vienna, Schubert reception is affected by an imagined dichotomy between the « weak Austrian » and the « manly German » . (131) This dichotomy is evident in the writing of Max Morold, who describes « softness » (« Weiche ») and « naïveté » as typical of music from Austria. (132) Nazi reception of Anton Bruckner's music overcame this characterization in spite of the fact that the composer was born in Ansfelden, near Linz ; this, too, may have relieved Bruckner of the burden of « personifying » his country's capital city. Adolf Hitler came to despise Vienna, though he, at one time, admired the city, especially its « Ringstraße » . (133) He had experienced rejection there, several times during his student days. (134) Still harboring a grudge, Hitler endeavored, once in power, to establish Linz as a counterweight to Vienna, which, according to Josef Goebbels, was to be « gradually phased-out of the picture » . (135) Hitler's position on this matter could not have enhanced Schubert's standing in Nazi Germany or encouraged the Nazis to « protect » Schubert, as they had Beethoven, from « appropriation by Jews » .

This is not to say that the Nazis completely ignored Schubert's work. To the contrary, although he did not hold the same place of honour as Beethoven, he was recognized as an Aryan and an important composer of « Hausmusik » , a genre ironically valued by the Nazis for 2 reasons : 1st, it resisted certain aspects of modernity that were equated with American culture (136) - government support of « Hausmusik » functioned to appease « Blood-and-Soil » purists, who objected to false mechanical progress and confirmed the greatness of the genre's German composers ; 2nd, « Hausmusik » allowed the Nazis to infiltrate domestic life, influencing the private as well as the public spheres and nurturing the family, exalted as the « germ cell » of the nation in Nazi thinking. (137) Schubert was useful in this scheme, as the regime's 1940 « Hausmusik » event dedicated to his work demonstrates. (138)

Schubert also had value as the annexation of Austria approached. The « Anschluß » of Austria, in 1938, was a distinct challenge for Germany, with doubts about the union lingering on both sides. Many Germans were suspicious of Austria and its cosmopolitanism and wanted to unite only with Austrians of what they considered complementary belief and style, if such a group even existed. In short, they saw Austria's culture and heritage as too irreconcilable with Germany's to warrant unity, despite the fact that both countries shared the same language. (139) The main task of resolving these doubts fell upon German historians, who endeavored to overcome the « kleindeutsch » historiography, which implied Austria's separateness. German education also changed to accommodate the annexation, emphasizing Austria's great men and its culture as they contributed to Germany. (140) This re-education was at the heart of Anton Bruckner's induction, on the eve of Austria's annexation, in 1937, into Regensburg's « Walhalla » , a replica of the Parthenon completed under the auspices of King Ludwig I of Bavaria, in 1841, to honour Germany's cultural Masters. (141) Schubert's induction, 7 years earlier, on the 100th Anniversary of his death, lacked the same level of political fanfare and exploitation. However, Schubert, like Bruckner, did play a role in political strategies preceding and following the annexation of Austria. Writings about Schubert reflect German scholars' efforts to make Schubert worthy of his membership in the German pantheon.

In 1939, Richard Benz attempted to distance Schubert from the so-called femininity of lyrical genres by positing his lieder as an outgrowth of absolute instrumental music. He wrote :

« The Schubertian lied is not the natural lied of the " Volk ", though it carries all its magnificence - it was born from absolute music, from instrumental music. » (142)

The film « Drei Mädel um Schubert » , produced under Nazi auspices, in 1936, was also meant to « set the record straight » (143) , amending Schubert's life as presented in « Dreimäderlhaus » , the 1916 Operetta by Heinrich Berté, a Jew. In 1934, Karl Hasse had attacked the Operetta as a « commercial exploitation of falsified or distorted anecdotes » (« geschäftliche Ausbeutung von gefälschten oder verzerrten Anekdoten ») in his article « Franz Schubert » (144) , and Richard Benz had denounced it in his « Die ewigen Meister » as « blasphemy » . (145) According to Benz, the specific offense perpetrated by Berté was the propagation of a popular, but extremely flawed, picture of Schubert as a sentimental Viennese aesthete whose music was inspired by the « Wiener Wald » and the Biedermeier movement. (146)

This re-education was particularly valuable in the case of Schubert. The Nazis, and Germans in general, recognized the power of music as a means of unification. (147) For example, when German troops marched into Yugoslavia, on 8 April 1941, to rejoin those regions which had once belonged to the « Reich » 's province of Styria, Adolf Hitler ordered the Styrian District Commissioner « Ueberreither » to « Make this land German again, for me. » . The commissioner responded by creating music schools, which disseminated German music, anchored young citizens in the German tradition, and ensured future stability and continuity. (148) The Nazis recognized music's ability to aid in the imagining of a nation, to borrow Benedict Anderson's term (149) , creating imagined cohesion by sonically indexing a common past and place. Schubert was useful, in this regard, as a shared sonic symbol, and his music could be appropriated to serve the construction of a Greater Germany.

Conclusions

The initiative taken by the Nazis to define musical identity and influence musical taste was, therefore, complicated in the case of Schubert. But within the League, he rivaled Beethoven in significance. Several explanations, as we have seen, account for his prominence : factors within Schubert's reception history contributed to his appeal, among them, the image of Schubert as outsider or stranger, and the intimate quality of his music, which allowed members to turn inward during a shared musical experience. In this regard, Schubert's popularity derived from League members' need for reflection and emotional release. More instructive, however, is the fact that Schubert achieved this popularity through interconnected factors relating to his multi-faceted association with Jewish, German, and Austrian communities. That is to say, the Nazis allowed Schubert to flourish longer in the League than Beethoven because he was Austrian, and League organizers were attracted to his music, which most considered both German and Jewish.

This latter explanation signals one more challenge, beyond Nazi restrictions, that undermined the League's process of repertoire selection. Though nationality and race were to guide the League organizers' musical programming, this criterion was hardly expedient in practice. The composers themselves (their lives, music, and reception history) confounded the already complex, discursive, and heavily performed debate about Jewish music and repertoire formation in the League. How could the League define « Jewish music » and « German music » and select their repertoire accordingly, when the nationality of composers could, as in the case of Schubert, concurrently represent Austrian, German, and Jewish loyalties ?

This complicated question undermines the very foundation of the League as an organization dedicated to the propagation of a distinct national music. However, it also exposes music's flexibility and fluidity in reception, which League organizers could exploit in their negotiations with the Nazis and in their search for an appropriate national repertoire. With Schubert's varied national appeal, League administrators could harness the music (both Jewish and German) of a single composer to meet the needs of its diverse constituency. In this way, music reception (in particular, how it is able to subvert and sustain ideas of national music) was, in many ways, both a blessing and a curse to the musical activities of the Berlin Jewish Culture League.

One important work, in this vein, was Karl Sessa's « Our Visitors » (« Unser Verkehr » , 1816) , which focused on the Jews' inability to speak German properly. (44) « Mozart, Haydn und Beethoven waren uns versagt. Die haben wir dann in den vielen Hauskonzerten gespielt, bei denen wir nicht unter dieser Beschränkung arbeiten mußten. » . Meyer in : Henryk M. Broder and Eike Geisel, « Premiere und Pogrom : Der Jüdische Kulturbund, 1933-1941 » , Wolf Jobst Siedler, Berlin (1992) , page 142. Anneliese Landau also argued that « Hausmusik » was important, in general, to Jewish communities in Germany, historically, and in Nazi Germany, « in a sense recreating musical communities within Jewish society » . Quoted in : Philip V. Bohlman, « The World Centre for Jewish Music in Palestine 1936-1940 : Jewish Musical Life on the Eve of WWII » , Clarendon Press, Oxford, United Kingdom (1992) , page 91.

(47) « Hat der Kulturbund nur die beschränkten Mittel zur Verfügung, die aus den Mitgliedsbeiträgen fließen. Der Mangel an jüdischen Bläsern, der schon bei der Aufstellung der Konzertprogramme in Rechnung gestellt werden mußte, wurde in der Opernfrage zum Gegenstand gesteigerter Sorge. Die selbstverständliche Notwendigkeit, sich auch in der Auswahl der Darsteller auf den begrenzten Kreis jüdischer Künstler zu beschränken, machte die Zusammenstellung des Ensembles zu einer noch problematischeren Angelegenheit als es sonst der Fall war. » Quoted in « Volker Dahm » , « Kulturelles und geistiges Leben » , in : « Die Juden in Deutschland 1933-1945 : Leben unter nationalsozialistischer Herrschaft » , edited by Wolfgang Benz, C. H. Beck Verlag, Munich (1988) , page 132.

(48) League audiences consistently demonstrated their conservative musical tastes, which Hans Nathan felt were « further feeding the views of the earlier Furtwängler public » (« die Anschauungen des früheren Furtwängler-Publikums weiter nährte ») . « Geschlossene Vorstellung » , page 288. According to Ronald Taylor, Furtwängler was devoted to the Classical tradition and « viewed music from a firm 19th Century platform of Beethoven, Wagner, Bruckner and Brahms » . Taylor, « Introduction to Furtwängler on Music : Essays and Addresses » , edited and translated Ronald Taylor, Scolar Press, Aldershot, United Kingdom (1991) , xi-xii.

(49) In the League's 2nd and 3rd years, there were concerts devoted specifically to settings of Heine's texts. Generally though, the degree of his popularity is difficult to assess : many programs collected in « Geschlossene Vorstellung » simply list lieder without further details.

The impulse to commemorate the alliance between Sulzer and Schubert endured well into the 1970's with the establishment of the annual Hermann Prey Schubert Festival in Hohenems (Sulzer's birthplace) , Austria. « Psalm 92 » was performed at this Festival, in the summers of 1976 and 1977. (67) Recounting what is most likely a myth, Holde explained that after asking Sulzer to sing his song « Der Wanderer » , 3 times in succession, Schubert allegedly exclaimed : « It's only now that I understand my own music and what I felt when I set the words : “ Ich wandere still, bin wenig froh, und immer fragt der Seufzer, wo ? ” » . Even today, « Psalm 92 » is performed in this context, most memorably at « The Papal Concert to Commemorate the Holocaust » , held on 7 April 1997, at the Vatican. The concert was conceived and organized by Pope John Paul II and the conductor Gilbert Levine to honour the victims of the Holocaust and to celebrate the Vatican's recognition of the State of Israel. In addition to « Psalm 92 » , the concert included Max Bruch's « Kol Nidre » , Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 2, « Chichester Psalms » , and excerpts from his « Kaddish » , and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, 3rd movement. (73) Stadler (1748-1833) was a Benedictine monk at Melk, Austria. He settled in Vienna, in 1796. Schubert slightly altered Stadler's melody, harmony, and rhythm (Hoorickx : « Schubert and the Bible » , page 954) .

(105) « Der Wanderer » was set to a poem by Georg Philipp Schmidt von Lübeck, who achieved fame for this single poem, published in 1808 under the title « Des Fremdlings Abendlied » (The Stranger's Evening Song) . The poem encapsulates a Romantic yearning particularly fitting of the League member's situation, especially as the « Wanderer » longs for a land of his own, which speaks his own tongue. See the translation of the poem and subsequent description in Reed. « The Schubert Song Companion » , page 137.

(106) I highlight the importance of the human voice in this creation of comfort and solace with Jacques Derrida in mind. He explains that « as soon as vocal signs strike your ear, they announce to you a being like yourself » . According to Derrida, through song alone, you are thus reminded that you are not alone. (110) « Das Berliner Kulturbundorchester in Hamburg » , « Hamburger Familienblatt » (29 November 1934) , « Fritz-Wisten-Archiv » , « Akademie der Künste » , Berlin. This emotional response to Schubert and his music may be related to the post-Freudian concept of « transference » and « the unusually intimate nature » of Schubert's music. Anneliese Landau observed the intimate quality of Schubert's music, and credited it to its relationship to the « I » (« Ich ») rather than a group identity. Landau. « Die Dezember-Konzerte » , in the December 1933 program accompanying the League's performance of « Othello » , « Fritz-Wisten-Archiv » , « Akademie der Künste » , Berlin, page 14. Richard Taruskin made a similar observation in his discussion of the solitary « I » at work in Schubert's music, versus the big « We » of Romantic nationalism. Taruskin identified this « I » not only in Schubert's lieder, but also in his Sonatas and Symphonies, which avoid the struggle evident in Beethoven's works, and favor instead predictable tonal and thematic closures that offer « serene satisfaction » rather than « strenuous gratification » . (114) See : Document No. 575, Wiener Library, London. The Nazi musicologist Karl Blessinger attempted to distance Beethoven from Jeitteles by dismissing the verses as a mere « stylistic exercise » (« Stilübung ») , and thus « without influence over the overall character of the music » (« ohne Einfluß auf den Gesamtcharakter des Zyklus ») . Blessinger. « Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mahler : Drei Kapitel Judentum in der Musik » , Bernhard Haynefeld Verlag, Berlin (1939) , page 47.

(115) Käthe Mende identified this tendency, which she learned from the League's central office, in a letter to the singer Käthe Fischer over an upcoming performance of their « Musikgruppe des jüdischen Frauenverband » . Mende did express some confusion as to whether or not the exception only applied to lieder or could also be applied to Opera : « Es ist mir freilich nicht ganz klar, ob die Zulassung infolge eines jüdischen Textdichters sich nur auf Lieder, oder auch auf ganze Oper bezieht. » . Under the leadership of Richard Strauß and Wilhelm Furtwängler, the « Reichsmusikkammer » worked to improve the situation of German musicians, especially composers. As Paul Græner, future vice-president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , pronounced in 1934 :

« The great work of the “ Reichskulturkammer ” extended itself over all artistic professions thus the instrument was created for the application of the grand design of corporate reconstruction for the benefit of the art and artists. This refers not only to a renewal of organisation, in as much as the “ Reichskulturkammer ”, especially the “ Reichsmusikkammer ”, will watch over the intellectual and artistic life of the nation. »

In its role as guardian of the « artistic life of the nation » , the « Reichsmusikkammer » was especially interested in reforming music education programmes for youth, as well as in training young musicians. By the mid- 1930's, it had successfully lobbied for increases in State spending for musicians, especially for Orchestras ; in 1935, standardised wages and maximum work hours for musicians were set by the State, and during the Chamber's 1st few years, the number of unemployed musicians fell substantially. There was also increased support for lesser-known « Aryan » musicians, and for rediscoveries of forgotten works.

Substantial as these improvements were, they were over-shadowed by more high-profile acts of purging, defamation, intimidation and vilification. Indeed, Josef Goebbels lost his 2 flagship leaders over such « Reichsmusikkammer » initiated actions : vice-president Furtwängler (as well as Gustav Havemann) , in 1934, over the Paul Hindemith « affair » , and president Strauß, 1 year later, over his collaboration with Stefan Zweig. Their replacements (respectively, Paul Græner and Peter Raabe) were both more active and involved in the activities of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , but also far more ideologically committed to the Nazi agenda, and more subservient to Goebbels. One of Raabe's 1st actions as president was to establish a list of black-listed Jewish and foreign works, something Strauß had refused to do. The list included over 100 composers whose work could be neither publicly performed nor broadcast, and included Aaron Copland, Otto Klemperer and Artur Schnabel. Musicians were limited in the repertoire they were allowed to play ; all « undesirable » music - that of Jews and foreigners (especially, Americans) , and jazz - was officially prohibited.

The bulk of « Reichsmusikkammer » energy was focused on eliminating « degenerate influences » from the musical world. From its inception, it required all members to be registered, which functioned as a racial screening process. 2 of the most successful Jewish musicians in Germany, conductor Bruno Walter and composer Arnold Schönberg, were harassed, forced to cancel performances and resign their positions. Jews began to be systematically purged as a centralized bureaucracy and replaced with more « ideologically reliable » people. Professional Jewish musicians were fired, and the music of Jewish composers was banned. There were also comprehensive bans on Poles (with the exception of Frederic Chopin) , Russians, French (except Georges Bizet) and black musicians. Many musicians eventually emigrated out of fear and financial desperation, including some of Germany's leading composers, conductors and instrumental virtuosi.

One of the highlights of « Reichsmusikkammer » activity was the 1938 Düsseldorf « Reichsmusiktage » (« Reich » Music Days) , intended to present the glory of « purified » German music. There was a focus on military music, but an exhibition was also put together on « Entartete Musik » (Degenerate Music) , under the guidance of Hans Severus Ziegler. Due to its great popularity, the show was intended to become an annual event, allowing the general population to experience and celebrate « Aryan » music ; the outbreak of War, however, meant that the 2nd show, in 1939, was the last. War brought worsened conditions within Germany, as funding decreased, institutions shut down, musicians were enlisted, and travel became extremely difficult for Orchestras. Many « Reichsmusikkammer » activities had to be curtailed. There was also an increased conservatism in German music ; many previously tolerated composers, including Igor Stravinsky, were now subject to a ban. But despite the War, the « Reichsmusikkammer » continued to fight for the cause of German musicians and, even at the peak of fighting, it was able to maintain a relatively high employment rate amongst musicians in Germany. There were also some new opportunities for German musicians, particularly performing for soldiers on the front. The importance that the Nazi Party ascribed to cultural activity is indeed reflected in the remarkable diversity and quantity of music and theatre offered to soldiers during the War.

The « Reich » Music Examination Office (« Reichsmusikprüfstelle ») was an organisation within the « Reich » Ministry for Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda whose role was to prevent the distribution of « undesirable » music within Nazi Germany. In doing so, it worked in conjunction with the Music Chamber of the « Reich » Chamber of Culture.

The Office was established as a result of an « Order Concerning Undesirable and Dangerous Music » , issued by the Music Chamber, in December 1937. Heinz Drewes became the Office's 1st director. Initially, the Office's remit was to screen all foreign music before publication or distribution but, in March 1939, this role expanded to encompass all music. As this task was too great for one bureau to deal with, publishers were only under compulsion to submit music to the Office if it was requested, although some composers submitted their own compositions anyway.

As part of its work, the « Reich » Music Examination Office published lists of « undesirable » compositions, the 1st of which was produced on 31 August 1938 and published in the Music Chamber's official journal, on 1 September. Several more of these lists were published. In practice, very few compositions were actually banned, as the mere existence of the Office had a self-regulatory effect.

As with the visual arts, the Nazis aimed to demonstrate the difference between good « German » music and « degenerate » music by staging major cultural events. To this end, they organized the « Reichsmusiktage » (« Reich » Music Days) in Düsseldorf from May 22-29, 1938. This week-long event included concerts and lectures that presented ideologically and ethnically « pure » music. It was accompanied by the « Degenerate Music » (« Entartete Musik ») exhibition, which opened on May 24. The show was similar in concept to the « Degenerate Art » exhibition - its main purpose was to document the work of artists who had been defamed by the Nazi regime, since 1933. The « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » (« Reich » Music Inspection Office) , which was part of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry, had drawn-up a list of « degenerate » artists and their works for this purpose. The exhibition covered all areas of music, from composition, performance and criticism to musicology and promotion. Examples of « degeneracy » were found in Classical music in composers such as Alban Berg, Paul Hindemith, or Igor Stravinsky, and in the genres of jazz and swing in general. The exhibit's main organizer was Privy Councilor Doctor Hans Severus Ziegler, who was director of the Weimar National Theatre. Ziegler was also head of the Cultural Office in the Gau of Thuringia, and had carried-out « cleansings against cultural Bolshevism » in Thuringia, even before 1933. The visual component of the exhibition consisted of photographs, portraits, paintings, caricatures, and posters intended to illustrate the « sub-human » character of the featured musicians and the inferiority of their works. One such example appeared on the cover of the exhibition guide. The image was based on the cover sheet of Ernst Křenek's Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (« Johnny Strikes-up the Band ! » , 1925-1926) , but replaced the carnation on the African-American saxophonist's lapel with a « Star of David » . The Opera had been banned, in 1933, and Křenek, an Austrian, had emigrated to the United States after the annexation of his country (« Anschluß ») , in 1938.

The exhibition remained on view in Düsseldorf until June and, subsequently, traveled to other cities along with the « Degenerate Art » exhibit. As of 1938, the « Reich » Music Days were supposed to take place annually, but they were canceled after the beginning of the War, in 1939.

Ernst Křenek

Le compositeur autrichien d'origine tchèque Ernst Křenek est né le 23 août 1900 à Vienne, dans l'Empire austro-hongrois ; et est mort le 22 décembre 1991 à Palm Springs, dans le sud de la Californie.

Fils d'un officier de l'Armée commune, mais d'origine tchèque, Křenek a fait ses études de 1911 à 1919, dans le lycée viennois de « Klostergasse » et a commencé en même temps, à l'âge de 16 ans, à étudier la composition avec Franz Schreker à Vienne. Après son service militaire, et avoir étudié pendant 2 semestres la philosophie, il a suivi son professeur en 1920, à Berlin, où il a fréquenté bientôt le cercle d'éminents musiciens, dont Ferruccio Busoni, Hermann Scherchen et Eduard Erdmann. Ses Ires œuvres sont écrites dans une atonalité libre et très personnelle, ainsi en est-il de son Opéra-comique, « Der Sprung über den Schatten » .

À partir de 1923, Křenek a vécu 2 années en Suisse et s'est ensuite rendu à Paris. En 1924, il épousa Anna Mahler, fille de Gustav Mahler, mais ce mariage a abouti à une séparation au bout de 1 an. Sous l'influence de Igor Stravinsky et du néo-Classicisme français, le style de composition de Křenek a changé pour devenir plus accessible et plus plaisant. Dans le cadre de ses activités de 1925 à 1927, en tant qu'assistant de Paul Bekker, le directeur artistique de l'Opéra de Kassel, Křenek a rencontré son plus grand succès auprès du public, le 10 février 1927, avec la création à l'Opéra de Leipzig de son « Opéra-jazz » « Jonny spielt auf ! » . Cet Opéra qui raconte l'histoire de l'opposition entre un violoniste classique et un violoniste de jazz, a été l'une des œuvres les plus jouées dans les années 1920 et a obtenu un grand succès public. Hanns Eisler, dans un article en octobre 1927, a qualifié l'Opéra de « pièce ennuyeuse et stupide » , mais a souligné expressément qu'il considérait au contraire Křenek comme un compositeur très talentueux.

Après le divorce avec sa Ire femme, Křenek a épousé la célèbre actrice Berta Hermann et est retourné à Vienne. Encore une fois, son style de composition a été transformé, après une étude approfondie de la musique de Franz Schubert, et a commencé sa phase de néo-Romantisme, qui a culminé avec l'Opéra « Das Leben des Orest » (la vie d'Oreste) et le cycle de lieder « Reisebuch aus den österreichischen Alpen » (les 2 pièces datant de 1929) . Mais, déjà la même année, il a commencé son exploration de la technique dodécaphonique de Arnold Schœnberg, qui a influencé son travail dans les années suivantes.

Depuis l'Opéra « Jonny spielt auf ! » , Křenek était devenu pour les Nazis un « bolchévique culturel » et, après leur arrivée au pouvoir en 1933, ses œuvres ont été interdites dans le « Reich » allemand. Křenek, converti au catholicisme après 1930, avait en même temps de la sympathie pour le Fascisme italien, dont il a fait état publiquement, même s'il n'approuvait pas ses actions politiques concrètes.

Křenek a composé dans la période 1930-1933, l'Opéra dodécaphonique « Karl V » , dont la première à Vienne en 1934, a cependant été empêchée pour des raisons politiques et n'a pu avoir lieu à Prague qu'en 1938. Cependant, dès l' « Anschluß » , il est déclaré « artiste dégénéré » par les Nazis et émigre en 1937 aux États-Unis. Après la Guerre, il n'a jamais pu se décider pour un retour en Europe. Aux États-Unis, il a alors commencé une intense activité d'enseignement, la première à partir de 1939 au « Vassar College » de Poughkeepsie, dans l'État de New York ; en 1942-1947, à la « School of Fine-Arts » de l'Université Hamline à Saint-Paul, au Minnesota. En 1945, il est devenu un citoyen américain. Il a alors changé pour des raisons de simplicité l'orthographe de son nom en « Křenek » . De 1947 à 1966, il a vécu à Los Angeles et a été invité par diverses universités. En 1950, il s'est marié avec sa 3e épouse, la compositrice Gladys Nordenstrom. Parmi les œuvres les plus importantes de ces années, on peut citer sa pièce chorale « Lamentatio Jeremiæ Prophetæ » (1941) et l'Opéra « Pallas Athene weint » (1955).

Křenek a poursuivi sans cesse l'expérimentation dans ses compositions. À partir des années 1940, il travaille sur la musique sérielle, et dans les années 1950, son travail aborde la musique électronique, avec l'Oratorio de Pentecôte « Spiritus intelligentiæ, Sanctus » (1955-1956, en collaboration avec le Studio de musique électronique de la « Westdeutscher Rundfunk » , à Cologne) . En 1966, il s'installe à Palm Springs, mais il est encore actif en Europe comme interprète de ses œuvres. Jusque ses dernières années, il compose sans relâche et son catalogue d'œuvres a atteint le numéro d'Opus 242. Son travail inclut presque tous les styles du XXe siècle et, comme Igor Stravinsky, il est arrivé à une Maîtrise extraordinaire quel que soit le style.

Le compositeur Ernst Křenek, l'un des plus originaux de l'école autrichienne contemporaine, se place dans le sillage de

Arnold Schœnberg ; il a néanmoins abordé les tendances d'écriture les plus diverses. Cet éclectisme et l'abondance de son œuvre l'ont rendu difficile à situer, et son importance a été souvent sous-estimée.

Il voit le jour à Vienne, le 23 août 1900, dans une famille d'origine tchèque (il abandonnera l'orthographe originale de son nom, Křenek, pour en simplifier la prononciation) . Il travaille à l'Académie de musique à partir de 1916, notamment avec Franz Schreker. Il étudie également la philosophie à l'université de Vienne en 1919-1920. Puis, il suit Schreker à Berlin, travaille à la « Musikhochschule » (1920-1923) et fréquente les figures marquantes de la vie musicale allemande, notamment Ferruccio Busoni et Hermann Scherchen. Après un séjour à Zürich (pendant lequel il épouse Anna Mahler, la fille du compositeur, dont il divorce en 1925 pour se remarier avec l'actrice Berta Hermann) , il débute dans la vie musicale active comme chef d'orchestre et assistant de Paul Bekker à l'Opéra de Kassel (1925-1927) et à l'Opéra de Wiesbaden (1927) . Il connaît vite le succès avec le scandale provoqué par son second Opéra, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (créé à Leipzig, en 1927) , dont l'argument traite des amours entre Noirs et Blancs. Cet ouvrage sera traduit en 18 langues. De retour à Vienne, en 1928, Křenek s'adonne à la critique musicale comme correspondant de la « Frankfurter Zeitung » (1929-1933) et se lie d'amitié avec Alban Berg et Anton von Webern. Il fait des tournées de conférences et dirige dans le monde entier. En 1938, lors de l' « Anschluß » , il quitte l'Autriche pour les États-Unis : il enseigne au « Vassar College » de Poughkeepsie, dans l'État de New York, de 1939 à 1942, et à Hamline University à Saint-Paul, dans l'État du Minnesota, où il est nommé à la tête du département musical (1942-1947) . Il obtient en 1945 la nationalité américaine. En 1947, il se fixe en Californie mais revient régulièrement en Europe à partir de 1950 pour diriger ses œuvres.

The Austrian composer (of Czech origin) Ernst Křenek was born on 23 August 1900 in Vienna, in the Empire of Austria-Hungary ; and died on 22 December 1991 in Palm Springs, South California. He explored atonality and other modern styles and wrote a number of books, including « Music Here and Now » (1939) , a study of Johannes Ockeghem (1953) , and « Horizons Circled : Reflections on my Music » (1974) . Křenek wrote 2 pieces using the pseudonym Thornton Winsloe.

Son of a Czech soldier in the Austro-Hungarian army, he studied there and in Berlin with Franz Schreker before working in a number of German Opera Houses as conductor. During World War I, Křenek was drafted into the Austrian army, but he was stationed in Vienna, allowing him to go on with his musical studies. In 1922, he met Alma Mahler, widow of the late Gustav Mahler, and her daughter, Anna, to whom he dedicated his Symphony No. 2, and whom he married in March 1924. That marriage ended in divorce before its 1st anniversary.

At the time of his marriage to Anna Mahler, Křenek was completing his Violin Concerto No. 1, Opus 29. The Australian violinist Alma Moodie assisted Křenek, not with the scoring of the violin part, but with getting financial assistance from her Swiss patron Werner Reinhart, at a time when there was hyper-inflation in Germany. In gratitude, Křenek dedicated the Concerto to Moodie, and she premiered it on 5 January 1925, in Dessau. Křenek's divorce from Anna Mahler became final a few days after the premiere. Křenek did not attend the premiere, but he did have an affair with Moodie, which has been described as « short-lived and complicated » . He never managed to hear her play the Concerto, but he did « immortalize some aspects of her personality in the character of Anita in his « Jonny spielt auf ! » . « Jonny » , his « Jazz-Opera » completed in 1926, was an enormous success across Europe and made Křenek a household name for several years ; there was even a brand of cigarettes, still on the market today in Austria, named « Jonny » . Křenek himself became uncomfortable with this success though, as his musical colleagues criticized the commercialisation of his music, and, shortly afterwards, changed his compositional direction radically.

The jazz-influenced score of « Jonny spielt auf ! » and its central character of a black jazz musician (who is also seen womanizing and stealing a priceless violin) brought Křenek the opprobrium of the nascent Nazi Party ; the image of Jonny was distorted to form the centre-piece of the poster advertising the « Entartete Musik » exhibition of so-called « degenerate » music in 1938. Křenek was frequently named as a Jewish composer during the 3rd « Reich » , although he was not, and was intimidated by the regime until his emigration ; on March 6, 1933, 1 day after the election in which the Nazis gained control of the « Reichstag » , Křenek's incidental music to Goethe's « Triumph der Empfindsamkeit » was withdrawn in Mannheim, and eventually pressure was brought to bear on the Vienna State Opera, which cancelled the commissioned premiere of « Karl V » .

In 1938, Křenek moved to the United States, where he taught music at various universities, the 1st being Vassar College in Poughkeepsie, State of New York. He later taught at Hamline University in Saint-Paul, Minnesota, from 1942 to 1947. There, he met and married his 3rd wife, his student and composer Gladys Nordenstrom. He became an American citizen in 1945. He later moved to Toronto, Canada, where he taught at The Royal Conservatory of Music during the 1950's. His students included Milton Barnes, Lorne Betts, Roque Cordero, Samuel Dolin, Robert Erickson, Halim El-Dabh, Richard Maxfield, Will Ogdon, and George Perle. He died in Palm Springs, California, where he had lived since 1966. In 1998, Gladys Nordenstrom founded the Ernst Křenek Institute ; in 2004, the private foundation moved from Vienna to Krems, Austria.

After meeting Křenek in 1922, Alma Mahler asked him to complete her late husband's Symphony No. 10. Křenek assisted in editing the 1st and 3rd movements but went no further. More fruitful was Křenek's response to an approximately contemporary request from his pianist and composer friend Eduard Erdmann, who wished to add Franz Schubert's « Reliquie » Piano Sonata to his repertoire, for completions of that work's fragmentary 3rd and 4th movements. Křenek's completion, dated to 1921 in some sources but to 1922 in his own memory, later found other champions in Webster Aitken in the concert-hall and Ray Lev ; Friedrich Wührer ; and, more recently, Stanislav Khristenko on records.

In his notes to the Lev recording, dated July 1947, Křenek offered insights into the challenges of completing another composer's works in general and the Schubert Sonata in particular :

« Completing the unfinished work of a great Master is a very delicate task. In my opinion, it can honestly be undertaken only if the original fragment contains all of the main ideas of the unfinished work. In such a case, a respectful craftsman may attempt, after an absorbing study of the Master's style, to elaborate on those ideas in a way which to the best of his knowledge might have been the way of the Master himself. The work in question will probably have analogies among other, completed works of the Master, and careful investigation of his methods in similar situations will indicate possible solutions of the problems posed by the unfinished work. Even then, the artist who goes about the ticklish task will feel slightly uneasy, knowing from his own experience as a composer that the creative mind does not always follow its own precedents. He is more conscious of the fact that unpredictability is one of the most jealously guarded prerogatives of genius. However, scruples of this kind may be set aside once we are certain that the author of the fragment has put forth the essential thematic material that was expected to go into the work. If this is not the case, I feel that no one, not even the greatest genius, should dare to complete the fragments left by another genius. »

As an example, Křenek explains that a careful student of Rembrandt's style might be able to complete a painting lacking 1 or 2 corners but could never supply 2 entirely missing paintings from a 4 painting series ; such an attempt would result only in « more or less successful fakes » . Turning to a musical example, Křenek, evidently unaware of the surviving sketch of a 3rd movement, avers that Schubert's own « Unfinished » Symphony was left by its creator with only 2 of its 4 movements written ; of the other 2, there is no trace. It would be possible to write 2 or more movements to the Symphony in the manner of Schubert, but it would not be Schubert.

Křenek's music encompassed a variety of styles and reflects many of the principal musical influences of the 20th Century. His early work is in a late-Romantic idiom, showing the influence of his teacher Franz Schreker, but, around 1920, he turned to atonality, under the influence of Ernst Kurth's text-book, « Lineare Kontrapunkt » , and the tenets of Ferruccio Busoni, Artur Schnabel, Eduard Erdmann, and Hermann Scherchen, amongst others.

A visit to Paris, during which he became familiar with the work of Igor Stravinsky (« Pulcinella » was especially influential) and « les 6 » , led him to adopt a neo-Classical style around 1924. Shortly afterward, he turned to neo-Romanticism and incorporated jazz influences into his Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Jonny Strikes Up the Band ! , 1926) and 1 Act Opera, « Schwergewicht » (1928) . Other neo-Romantic works of this period were modeled on music of Franz Schubert, a prime example being « Reisebuch aus den österreichischen Alpen » (Travelogue from the Austrian Alps, 1929) .

Křenek abandoned the neo-Romantic style in the late-1920's to embrace Arnold Schönberg's 12 tone technique, the method exclusively employed in Křenek's Opera « Karl V » (1931-1933) and most of his later pieces. His most uncompromising use of the 12 tone technique was in his 6th String Quartet (1936) and his Piano Variations (1937) . In the « Lamentatio Jeremiæ prophetæ » (1941-1942) , Křenek combined 12 tone writing with techniques of modal counterpoint of the Renaissance.

In 1955, he was invited to work in the Electronic Music Studio at the « Westdeutscher Rundfunk » in Cologne, and this experience motivated him to develop a total serial idiom. Beginning around 1960, he added to his serial vocabulary some principles of aleatoric music, in works such as « Horizon Circled » (1967) , « From 3 Make 7 » (1960-1961) , and « Fibonacci-Mobile » (1964) .

In his later years, his compositional style became more relaxed, though he continued to use elements of both 12 tone and total serial techniques.

On Křenek's 85th birthday, the City of Vienna donated the Ernst Křenek Prize.

« Křenek has an insatiable musical curiosity and, with regard to exterior influences, he is perfectly capable of adopting the attitude : I have to try everything once. All of Křenek's mature works are cast in one mold, they are all held together by one single musical temperament. His work tends to be lyrical elegiac, euphoric : qualities that characterize this uniquely generous, self-possessed, peaceable personality. He is truly the opposite of an “ artist as egotist ”. »

Even during his lifetime, Ernst Křenek, who left behind an « œuvre » of more than 240 Opus when he died at the age of 91, held quite an extreme position in music history. Because of his great versatility, critics in Europe often spoke of him as constantly changing his « style of composing » , tacitly implying that a creative life must be stylistically uniform. In the United States, however, he was deemed the « one-man history of 20th Century music » , a unique and nearly unbelievable fact Křenek lived-up to through his creation of work that spans more than 7 decades of the 20th Century, from the end of the 1910's until the end of the 1980's. When taken seriously, this « bon mot » does not refer to the temporal concordance of his works or his participation in the latest developments in music throughout his life ; it rather points to his role as a 20th Century contemporary.

In the early 1920's, when Křenek's chamber music 1st became well-known through his participation in the avant-garde music festivals in Donaueschingen and Salzburg, he was seen as a representative of « new » music - a form of music that responded to the re-shaping of society after 1918 and to the accelerated developments in technology by counteracting the high-expectations of art with humour and timeliness. A typical example of this attitude is the genre of the « Zeitoper » (contemporary Opera) , which Křenek also worked with. Yet, even then Křenek did not follow a specific pattern in working on his compositions : shortly before his contemporary Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Jonny Strikes Up the Band ! , 1926) became a smash-hit, his expressionistic Opera « Orpheus und Eurydike » , based on a play by Kokoschka premiered, and even prior to this (many years before Brecht's attempt) , Křenek had already written an « epic » music-theater piece, « Zwingburg » (1922) .

Because Křenek was not one of Arnold Schœnberg's Viennese students and was almost an entire generation younger than Alban Berg and Anton von Webern, it was not until 1930 that he 1st approached dodecaphony out of compositional necessity, but also, out of an æsthetic understanding. The agreement of his musical ideas with intellectual analysis became one of the trademarks of Křenek's work. (This agreement also had a political component in his 1st work using the 12 tone technique, the « musical drama » « Karl V » , which had already been banned in Austria, in 1934 ; it was the reason its premiere at the Vienna State Opera was prevented, and eventually also, led to Křenek's exile to the United States, in 1938.) In the 1950's, Křenek's contacts to the younger European avant-garde music scene encouraged him to begin composing electronic music, the serial arrangement of musical material and its counterpart, random operations. It was not simply his fascination with certain pieces works of this kind that utilized these techniques that sparked his interest but, again, because he wanted to fundamentally explore these new possibilities, both intellectually and artistically, it was also the new intellectual and artistic possibilities that could be explored through them.

Back in the early 1940's in the United States, he had already begun to experiment with sequence rotation in his 3rd Piano Sonata (which later became one of Glenn Gould's favourite pieces) and the great « a capella » work « Lamentatio Jeremiæ Prophetæ » - in doing so, he did not seek to push the dodecaphony further in the direction of serialism but, instead, to create a bridge to modal music. Significantly, his interest in linking this to history arose in the early years of exile, a time when Křenek feared that his loss of Europe could lead to a loss of history altogether. This played an audible role in his later works as well. During this phase, there are 2 particularly remarkable elements : the juxtaposition of phrasal techniques and historical elements (with quotations or allusions, also to some of his earlier works) and the breaking-up of the work's continuity into fragments. The one insured his compositions a place within (his own) history, while the other enabled him to reflect on them as irrevocably fragmented - giving him the ability to express his refusal to down-play the specific break in history, one of the most incisive experiences that the 20th Century inflicted upon its contemporaries.

A study of Viennese-born composer Ernst Křenek's prodigious output is rather like a study of 20th Century music in microcosm. Křenek moved with ease through the various æsthetic and stylistic changes that marked that turbulent Century, taking what he considered the best features of each and fusing them into a new language all his own. Born in August of 1900, Křenek began musical training at the age of 6, and later studied privately with Franz Schreker in Vienna before enrolling for formal training with the same at the Berlin Conservatory in 1920.

Křenek's music of the early-1920's (including the Symphony No. 1 from 1921, and the 1st 2 String Quartets) is chromatically charged and rather angst-ridden ; however, a 1924 trip to France, during which he was exposed to the more utilitarian, entertaining aspects of Parisian music (and Igor Stravinsky's neo-Classicism in particular) encouraged him to explore a more accessible style. In 1927, the Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Jonny Strikes Up the Band !) which fuses jazz idioms to Křenek's own brand of tonality, made Křenek a household name ; the work was such a popular success that it eventually received performances in over 100 cities in 18 different languages.

From 1925 to 1927, Křenek lived in Kassel and Wiesbaden, serving as assistant manager of those city's Operas. After returning to Vienna in 1928, Křenek began questioning his own musical aesthetic, and, upon meeting Alban Berg and Anton von Webern, made a serious study of the Second Viennese School's 12 tone techniques. By 1931, when he began composing the Opera « Karl V » (in celebration of the unifying virtues of Catholicism, as opposed to the degeneration of Germanic society in the 1930's) , Křenek was convinced of the merits of serial composition ; the Opera stands as his 1st thoroughly dodecaphonic work. Nazi officials were not oblivious to the political sub-text of the Opera, and the planned 1934 Vienna premiere of the work was canceled by the authorities. Křenek visited the United States in 1937, and when Hitler invaded Poland, Křenek was expelled from Austria and moved across the Atlantic permanently.

Křenek divided the remainder of his life between active composition (he remained prolific until his death in 1991) and teaching duties (1st at Vassar College in Poughkeepsie, State of New York, and later, at Hamline University in Minneapolis and as guest-professor/lecturer at many other American institutions) . Křenek was an American citizen from 1945 on.

In the 1950's and 1960's, Křenek began to explore electronic composition (like « Spiritus intelligentiæ, Sanctus » for voices and electronic sounds in 1956) , and also aleatoric (chance) music (like the 1957 work « Sestina ») . During the last decades of his life, Křenek scrupulously avoided all compositional « trends » and « systems » , choosing instead to rely on his own musical wits.

In 1992, 1 year after his death, Křenek's remains were transferred to the city of Vienna where, in later years, he had come to be honoured as befits a musician of his stature.

Ernst Křenek (1900-1991) was one of the most prolific musical figures of his time. Born with the Century in 1900, he lived until 1991 and was active as a composer for more than 7 decades. During that time, he played a part in many of the Century's significant artistic movements, from atonality to neo-Classicism and from jazz-influenced writing to total serialism, with turns to Schubertian lyricism and avant-garde electronic music at various points. In addition to his astonishing productivity as a composer (his work list includes 242 compositions) , he was also a prolific writer and critic as well as an avid educator. Virtually, the only figure of his time to have had both superstar popular success

(with his Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » - Jonny Strikes Up the Band !) and credibility as a major modernist, the experience of exile was particularly difficult for Křenek, who continued to be productive until the very end of his life without ever recovering his earlier stature.

Křenek was born in Vienna in 1900 and, like his compatriot Erich Wolfgang Korngold, was a prodigy, beginning his composing career at the age of 6 (though his Opus 1 dates from his 17th year) . A decade later, he began his studies with Franz Schreker at the Vienna Music Academy. Though Křenek would eventually break with Schreker as his music became more atonal, the composer played a major role in his early thinking about music. His 1st works are written in a late Romantic style, and already Křenek displays an almost Mozartian reach, writing pieces for keyboard, chamber ensemble, orchestra and Operatic forces (in his career, he wrote 22 Operas) .

In 1920, Křenek moved to Berlin to continue his studies with Franz Schreker, and there, he met such influential musicians as Ferruccio Busoni, Hermann Scherchen and Artur Schnabel. Though he had begun his career writing in a late-Romantic idiom, by the early 1920's, he adopted an un-compromising atonal style. In 1922, he completed his 2nd Symphony, Opus 12, a major work of epic proportions that reveals the young composer at his most original. 2 massive outer-movements, each more than 25 minutes in length and characterized by slow introductions, where ideas and concepts slowly emerge-out of a kind of primordial ooze, surround a motoric Allegro half that length, consisting of a series of contrapuntal expositions. While it has been noted that there is much Mahler in this composition (to make the comparison more tempting, Křenek had married the composer's daughter Anna just before he began composing the Symphony) , the work also stands apart from the spirit of Mahler and moves in what are, arguably, even riskier directions. Around this time, Křenek also completed his 1st dramatic work, the scenic Cantata « Die Zwingburg » based on a work by Fritz Demuth and a libretto by Franz Werfel, a Classic expressionist work of alienation and social commentary.

Between 1923 and 1925, Křenek spent time in Switzerland, where he met such figures as Friedrich Gubler (an editor of the « Frankfurter Zeitung ») and the poet Rainer Maria Rilke. He also met Theodor W. Adorno at this time, and their lively polemics on the subject of new directions in music is one of the most exciting intellectual exchanges of its time. During this period, he also visited Paris, where he became acquainted with Igor Stravinsky's neo-Classical style, particularly « Pulcinella » , and with the music of « les 6 » . Returning from France, he befriended Alban Berg, Anton von Webern and Arnold Schönberg.

Out of this ferment and virtual explosion of styles came the only work that Křenek could count as an unequivocal public success : the Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Plays On) . Combining the eclecticism of the times with a nod at a kind of « European jazz » as cultivated by Igor Stravinsky and Darius Milhaud in « le Boeuf sur le toit » , the piece was an instant hit and gave rise to hoards of imitations. Set in night-clubs, glaciers and trains, and referencing almost all the available styles of the time in some guise or other, the Opera tells the story of the lovers Max and Anita and their travels through the « demi-monde » , and especially their connection with the black violinist Jonny, who steals an Amati violin. The symbolic aspects of the tale, especially the contrast between the self-absorbed Central European intellectual and the « free man » , « Jonny » caught the imagination of audiences throughout Europe. The Opera was performed in dozens of different Opera Houses, and made its way to New York as early as

Ironically, it was the very success of Jonny, in particular its use of « jazziness », that made things difficult for Křenek later on. As the Nazis continued their inexorable rise to power, certain vernacular styles became convenient targets for the Nazis, and it was inevitable that « Jonny » would end-up being considered what some started calling « degenerate music » .

Of course, despite the runaway success of the work, it was hardly typical of Křenek. More characteristic, one could argue, was his other major Operatic work of the period, « Karl V », commissioned by the Vienna State Opera and completed in 1933. The work deals with the life and ideals of the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V, who ruled Austria in the 16th Century (1500-1558) . As he did research for the project, Křenek became convinced that the Emperor embodied a kind of Christian humanism that could oppose the barbarity of current political movements. For this special project, the composer used a musical approach that was to colour his works for the remainder of his career : the 12 tone system. Though he took a different attitude towards dodecaphonic music than Schönberg, he believed greatly in its rigour, its uncompromising standards and its possibilities for further development. The Opera was due to be performed in 1934, but was cancelled and not performed until almost 50 years later as a major gesture of reconciliation.

Křenek remained productive throughout the 1930's, devoting a great deal of time to writing essays and lecturing. It was in 1937 that he 1st visited the United States. He made a 2nd trip to the U.S. the following year, and was intending to return to Austria when the « Anschluß » of 1938 made that impossible. Křenek ended-up staying in the United States and accepting a position in the Department of Music at Vassar College in Poughkeepsie, State of New York. Despite the fact that he had been a rising superstar in European musical circles, in the United States, he was just another exile, and despite good connections, he struggled to find a position that would allow him both the freedom to compose and an environment where he could put his pedagogical theories into practice. Some of the conflicts that were to dog his career appeared early on in Vassar, where the assumption was that he would contribute to teaching music as a Liberal art. Křenek felt strongly that, even as such, it was important for students to understand the rigour of composition, particularly 12 tone composition, even if they never became composers, and in his high-minded but probably inflexible style, he alienated the rest of the music faculty and was forced to leave.

Despite these conflicts, he was characteristically prolific. His continued efforts to freshly exploit the 12 tone system and comment, through the lens of Christian humanism, on ongoing events led to the composition of « Lamentatio Jeremiæ Prophetæ » in 1942. Based on the biblical writings of the Prophet Jeremiah, the « Lamentations » is an astonishing work for « a cappella » voices. It explores intersections of various historical musical tendencies, and invokes a special musical spirit through the linkage of 12 tone and modal tendencies. In this work, contemporary style and basic principles of Netherlandish counterpoint mesh with an expressive power that is sustained for more than an hour.

In 1942, Křenek received an offer to become a professor and head of the Department of Music at Hamline University in Saint-Paul, Minnesota. Despite the small size and budget of the institution, this proved a productive time for the composer. Not only were the teaching conditions at the college congenial, but the conductor of the Minneapolis

Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos, took a keen interest in Křenek's compositions and performed several of his works with the Orchestra including the 2nd Symphony (which got a frosty reception) and the Piano Concerto No. 3 (which was a hit) . Křenek also helped to found a local chapter of the International Society for Contemporary Music that played a major role in local musical life and offered many significant premieres. Despite these activities, Křenek never really reconciled himself to the region (He once remarked : « I wonder what desperation drove people to settle in this latitude. ») and, rather suddenly, departed for the West Coast in 1947, leaving a good deal of bad feeling behind. Aside from a visiting stint, here and there, Křenek was to spend the rest of his life in California, in Los Angeles and Palm Springs. During this period, he continued to compose conduct, teach and write.

Křenek's California years cannot be characterized by a single style or approach ; indeed, the period contains over 100 compositions, including experimental works such as « From 3 Make 7 » (1961) and « Fibonacci Mobile » (1964) , takes in electronic works inspired by his visit to Cologne in 1955, and includes such autobiographical pieces such as « The Dissembler » (1978) and « Spätlese » (1972) . The latter, in particular, is a fine example of emotionally intense but technically more relaxed later style. Beautifully written for the voice, and profoundly expressive, the 6 poems reflect on the joys and bitterness of life, and on coming to terms with oneself.

Starting in the 1960's, and continuing for the remainder of his life, Křenek was honoured in many ways, most appropriately, as far as the composer was concerned, through a production of « Karl V » in Vienna, in 1983. Many Festivals of his work were mounted, especially in California. His last work, a « Suite for mandolin and guitar » was written in 1989. The composer died in 1991.

Born in Vienna in 1900, Ernst Křenek's life encompassed nearly the entire 20th Century : he died at the age of 91, in exile, in the United States. « Exile » could, indeed, be a fitting description of his enforced stay in America - after all, he might just as well have returned to Austria once World War II was over. He did spend some time in his native country every now and again, but only for short periods, perhaps because he no longer felt at home, neither was he prevailed upon by the cultural powers that were to settle once again in Vienna. For all his successes as a composer, the high-regard in which he was held as a teacher, and the fact that he was married to an American lady, Křenek did not really feel at home in the United States either. His was a Central European fate which he shared with many other « émigrés » .

Ernst Křenek lived an extraordinarily rich life, thanks to his multifarious gifts, his insatiable hunger for everything new, his tremendous creative impulse and the historical circumstances which had a bearing on his decisions.

His autobiography, which covers the 1st 37 years of his life, runs to nearly 1,000 pages. No wonder : Křenek was a keen observer of the political and art-scene, he absorbed whatever he deemed of significance for his development, drew his own conclusions and incorporated them in his music. Also, he was a remarkable writer : he was the author of the librettos of his numerous Operas and an esteemed contributor to the journal « Musikblätter des Anbruch » , released by his publisher, Universal-Edition.

Křenek wrote his autobiography in English ; it appeared in German translation under the title « Im Atem der Zeit » . Opposite the title-page is a photograph of the 25 year old composer, with a hat on his head, a cigarette between his fingers, and a smile on his lips and in his eyes. At the age of 25, the young man boasted a considerable body of work : 40 titles, including several Operas, 3 Symphonies and chamber music, sowed his wild oats during what are commonly known as the « Roaring 20's » .

Vienna was an important cultural centre in Křenek's youth. He, no doubt, had an inspiring time, with Arnold Schœnberg and his pupils, Franz Schreker (who was to become his professor of composition) , Sigmund Freud, Oskar Kokoschka (with whom he was to cooperate on the Opera « Orpheus und Eurydike ») , Karl Kraus (whose texts he was to set) , Adolf Loos, Peter Altenberg, Arthur Schnitzler, Franz Werfel and many others to be met in « cafés » and at concerts. Mahler had died in 1911, but Křenek knew his widow, married his daughter Anna, and had as a result access to the leading representatives of Austrian cultural life who frequented Alma Mahler's salon.

Similarly to Kurt Weill (also born in 1900) , who was recommended to Universal-Edition by his teacher, Ferruccio Busoni, Křenek, too, was brought to the publisher's attention by his professor, Franz Schreker : thanks to financial assistance by the Austrian Ministry of Culture, the publisher ran no risk in taking-on works by Schreker's most talented pupils. Křenek had been in touch with Universal-Edition before, in that he did some proof-reading in return for which he was paid in kind, that is, he could help himself to scores he could otherwise not have afforded. He felt honoured as he 1st entered the premises as a composer under contract rather than as a junior assistant.

He was aware, of course, that as a composer signed on by the prestigious Universal-Edition, with an option on his works to be written in the next 10 years, his standing in Austrian musical life had improved overnight. In his « Autobiography » , he devotes an entire chapter to Universal-Edition and its director, Doctor Emil Hertzka.

He has this to say about the Director :

« At any rate, Emil Hertzka was a man of great vision and exceptional business courage. I don't believe that he knew anything about music in a professional sense, but I don't think either that this is necessary for a good publisher. He had a certain flair for values, which in that business is more than scholarly knowledge and firmly established artistic principles, and a highly-enterprising spirit. »

At 25, Křenek started to work on an Opera which was to make him famous throughout Europe : « Jonny spielt auf ! » , referred to at the time as a « Jazz-Opera » , had in fact nothing to do with the music of the American blacks, but it did have a black musician as one of its principal characters. « Jonny » was a typical product of the 1920's, and was in no time programmed by Opera Houses all over the continent. Its unprecedented success proved a provocation for the Right-wing in Austria which organized demonstrations against the production at the Vienna State Opera House. « Jonny » gave the young composer (and not only him) a foretaste of what was lying in wait for Europe in a few years' time.

Křenek was to turn his back on « Jonny » and other works in that vein to embark on a new stylistic period in which he was inspired by Franz Schubert. (In fact, Křenek was comparable to Igor Stravinsky and, indeed, to Pablo Picasso in the way he tried his hand at different idioms and means of expression throughout his life) . The high-point of his Schubertian phase was the song cycle « Reisebuch aus den österreichischen Alpen » (Travelogue from the Austrian Alps) of which he also wrote the text. The 1st version for voice and piano was followed in 1973 by one for voice and orchestra under the title « 8 Songs from Travelogue from the Austrian Alps ») . Both versions are among Křenek's most popular compositions.

In the ensuing years, the composer remained faithful to the stage. « The Dictator » , composed at the age of 26, where he « shamelessly followed in Puccini's footsteps » as he put it, is a testimony to Křenek's keen awareness of the nature of Benito Mussolini's regime in Italy. He also possessed amazing pre-science, prophesying the advent of an even more dangerous dictator in Germany. No wonder this 1 Act piece is described by Křenek as a « tragic Opera » .

In the same year, 1926, he started to work on a 2nd 1 Act work, « The Secret Kingdom » , which is, in stark contrast to « The Dictator » , a fairy-tale Opera, with a king who finds his real happiness in Nature. A « green » Opera ? Křenek himself says in his « Autobiography » that, in this tale, he wished to say « yes » to simple life, to the love of Nature and pleasure in small things ; also, he wished to say « no » to modern civilization which, in his view, led to stress, commercialisation and corruption.

A reduced version was recently prepared with slight changes in the libretto, turning « The Secret Kingdom » into a successful children's Opera.

The tale was completed in 1927 and Křenek immediately set to work on the last piece of the trilogy, the « Burlesque Operetta » « Heavyweight or The Pride of the Nation » . It treated of the same subject as « The Secret Kingdom » , but in a satirical approach, which the composer himself found more satisfying. He was inspired by a statement given by the German ambassador to the United States on the occasion of a visit there by the star boxer Max Schmeling, to the effect that, in modern times, sportsmen were the real representatives of a nation's culture, rather than scientists or artists. Musically, it was Křenek's intention to write a genuine hit, whereas in the fairy-tale Opera he « revelled in a sweet, Romantic, pre-Wagnerian idiom, spiced with some atonality » .

Křenek's next assignment was the Opera « The Life of Orestes » (1928-1929) . He turned to the ancient Greek myth and created, as he called it, « a grand Opera » , which would contrast the Classical story with light-weight, catchy music. As so often with Křenek, the work had a profound philosophical message : the peril inherent in freedom. Orestes is free to do whatever he chooses - and he uses it to commit murder. Orestes faces the judge Aristoboulos (a character of the composer's invention) in the last act and hears him expound on the notions of justification, right, law and mercy, culminating in the question « What is the truth ? » - which had actually been the question posed by Pontius Pilate. With hindsight, Křenek realised that the moral and spiritual « climate » of the last act pre-empted his next Opera, the « chef-d'œuvre » « Charles V » (1930-1933) .

« Charles V » marked another new departure with regard to its idiom : it was the 1st product of Křenek's preoccupation with the 12 tone technique of composition as developed by Arnold Schœnberg. En route to dodecaphony, he had composed some vocal music, including the song-cycle « Songs Late in the Year » (1931) and 2 Karl Kraus's settings : « Through the Night » (1931) and « The Lark » (1931) .

He addressed himself with tremendous ambition to the work on the Opera, with thorough preliminary studies of the historical figure of the Emperor as well as of the new requirements imposed by dodecaphony.

In his « Autobiography » , Křenek writes :

« The work made very slow progress in the beginning. This was due to the fact that I had decided to employ for the 1st time the 12 tone technique, which I eventually had come to understand in its basic tenets. This sentence makes easy enough reading, but the mental agony that preceded my decision was awful, and the consequences of that decision have been, and are, of the greatest magnitude, as far as my personal life is concerned. The more I penetrated the 12 tone world, the closer I came toward making a decision as to my own active entering this world. The decision involved tremendous responsibility for, in the 1st place, I felt it was not something one might try and possibly drop, if not satisfied. I felt keenly that it had almost the character of a religious decision, that I had to sign-up for good, or never touch it at all. Furthermore, I knew that deciding for the technique meant forgetting, once and for all, about an easy way to success. At that time, the 12 tone technique was regarded as a hare-brained aberration, a sinister cult exercised by a few personally honourable musicians who through some appalling whim of fate had been misled to abominate their remarkable talents in such a perfectly silly manner. But, then, I had obviously reached an impasse from which I had to find a way out, or else, stop composing altogether. »

The elation Křenek felt on receiving an offer from the Vienna State Opera House (in the person of Clemens Krauß) , asking him to compose a music theatre piece, turned into disappointment and despair over the theatre's decision not to premiere the work. Křenek assumed that Krauß could not warm to the music, and was worried about its possible reception in the face of the growing political weight of the far-Right. For Křenek, the cancellation of the world-premiere was one of the bitterest and most humiliating shocks of his life. It was not until later that he realized his « naïveté » with regard to the political connotations of his Opera against the background of Austria shifting increasingly towards losing its independence and becoming a satellite of Nazi Germany.

The world-premiere of « Charles V » only took place in 1938, in Prague. As long as he lived, Křenek could not get over this disappointment.

As a convinced opponent of the Nazis, Křenek saw no other way out than to emigrate and begin a new life in the United States. During his years of exile, contact with Universal-Edition petered-out, and his new works appeared with a number of publishers, a fact which was not exactly helpful to the distribution of his compositions. A number of those pieces which were originally published in the United States have recently been taken-on by Universal-Edition. These include the ballet « 8 Column Line » of 1939 and the chamber Opera « Tarquin » of 1940.

After World War II, contact with Universal-Edition was quickly re-established. The Piano Concerto No. 3, composed just 1 year after the War, in 1946, is already part of the catalogue, as are numerous compositions written in the ensuing decades. Beyond works for orchestra and chamber music, they include the Opera « Pallas Athene weint » published jointly with Schott Music International and premiered in Hamburg, in 1955.

It was typical for Křenek and his insatiable thirst for new developments in music that he visited the electronic music studio of West German Radio in Cologne, as early as the mid-1950's. Years before, he had sketched a Whitsun Oratorio which he could not realize through traditional means - the studio offered the technical possibilities for him to turn the sounds he imagined into practice. The Oratorio, which bears the title « Spiritus Intelligentiæ, Sanctus » , is his Opus 152. It was 1st performed in Cologne on 30 May 1956, at a concert which also featured the world-premiere of Karlheinz Stockhausen's « Gesang der Jünglinge » .

The catalogue of Universal-Edition includes 156 compositions by Ernst Křenek, that is, the bulk of his « œuvre » . The earliest piece is his Piano Sonata, Opus 2, No. 1 (1919) , and the last one is the Organ Concerto, Opus 230, composed exactly 60 years later, in 1979.

In his « Autobiography » , Křenek expressed the fervent hope that his music would survive him and would be played, understood and valued by future generations. The future of Ernst Křenek's music is in safe hands : it is promoted by Universal-Edition, in cooperation with the composer's widow Gladys Křenek, as well as the Ernst Křenek Institute which looks after his estate.

Austrian-American composer Ernst Křenek is one of the prominent exponents of the serial technique of musical composition.

Křenek studied in Vienna and Berlin and was musical assistant at the German Opera Houses of Kassel (1925-1927) and Wiesbaden (1927-1928) . In 1938, he immigrated to the United States, where he taught composition at Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York (1939-1942) , and Hamline University, Saint-Paul, Minnesota (1942-1947) , before settling in Palm Springs, California.

Křenek's earliest compositions were influenced by Gustav Mahler (who was briefly Křenek's father-in-law) . In his 1st Operas, however, he turned to a dissonant, Expressionist style, as in « Zwingburg » (Dungeon Castle, 1924) . He gained international success with the Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Strikes Up the Band ! , 1927) , a work written in an idiom that mixed Expressionist dissonance with jazz influences and strove to reflect modern life in the 1920's. After a period in which he espoused the Romanticism of Franz Schubert, he began in the 1930's to use the 12 tone method of Arnold Schœnberg. His 1st significant 12 tone work was the Opera « Karl V » (1933 ; produced in 1938) . His other important 12 tone works were the Piano Concerto No. 2 (1937) and the Symphony No. 4 (1947) .

Křenek experimented widely with styles and techniques of composition. In « Sestina » (1957) , he used total serialization, in which not only pitch but all musical elements are arranged in basic series. In his Piano Concerto No. 3

(1946) , he temporarily abandoned the 12 tone method for traditional tonality ; his Symphony No. 5 (1950) is atonal but avoids serial technique. In his Oratorio « Spiritus Intelligentiæ, Sanctus » (1958) , he utilized electronically produced sound. In « Pentagram » , for wind quintet (1952 ; revised in 1958) , and in « Fibonacci Mobile » (1965) , mathematical ideas influence the musical content. Křenek's other compositions include Sonatas for harp and for organ ; « 12 Short Piano Pieces » (1938) , an introduction to 12 tone technique ; « 11 Transparencies for orchestra » (1954) ; and Operas. He also wrote several books, notably « Über neue Musik » (Music Here and Now, 1937) , « Studies in Counterpoint » (1940) , and « Selbstdarstellung » (Self-Analysis, 1948) , an autobiography.

Ernst Křenek was born in Vienna in 1900, and studied music in Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, with Franz Schreker among others. Deeply embedded in the cultural world of Weimar Germany, Křenek was friends with the greatest musicians of his day, and enjoyed a brief marriage to Gustav Mahler's daughter. His jazz-inspired Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » was one of the most popular and widely-performed compositions of the period, touring all over Europe and the United States.

In his early years, Křenek was not a modernist, but later, started using Arnold Schœnberg's 12 tone system. His musical alliance with Schœnberg, his brief marriage to Mahler's daughter and, above all, his Opera, convinced many Nazis that he must, somehow, be Jewish. Having already fled the increasingly reactionary environment of Germany in 1928 for his homeland in the early-1930's, the composer responded to the political crisis by re-asserting his faith in Catholicism as a supra-national religion and his faith in Austria as a supra-national State. His 1st work in the 12 tone system, the Opera « Karl V » , was conceived as anti-Nazi, pro-Austrian and Catholic. Commissioned by the Vienna Opera, « Karl V » was completed in 1933 but, under pressure from Adolf Hitler's supporters, its scheduled premiere was cancelled. In dire economic straits, the composer emigrated to the United States.

Unimpressed with the American lifestyle and cultural scene, Křenek had an initially difficult time. His early concerts were unpopular, and a teaching appointment ended in humiliation when suspicious colleagues got him fired in 1942 for his allegedly « Communist » modernist leanings. Despite the difficulties and restrictions of America, Křenek managed to establish a strong modern music scene in the small Minneapolis college of Hamline, before moving to California in 1950. Happy in the warm weather, and living in the Los Angeles area where both Schœnberg and Stravinsky had settled earlier, he secured a steady income for himself through teaching and composing. His Operas remained far more popular in Germany and Vienna than in the land that inspired his Masterpiece « Jonny spielt auf ! » . Křenek died at the age of 91, in California.

Ernst Křenek (geboren 23. August 1900 in Wien ; gestorben 22. Dezember 1991 in Palm Springs, Kalifornien ; ursprünglich Křenek) war ein US-amerikanischer Komponist österreichischer Herkunft.

Ernst Křenek, Sohn eines Kaiserlich-und-Königlich-Offiziers böhmischer Herkunft, besuchte von 1911 bis 1919 das Wiener Gymnasium Klostergasse und begann schon während dieser Zeit im Alter von 16 Jahren sein Kompositionsstudium bei Franz Schreker in Wien. Nach seinem Militärdienst und einem zweisemestrigen Philosophiestudium folgte er seinem Lehrer 1920 nach Berlin, wo er bald im Kreise bedeutender Musiker wie Ferruccio Busoni, Hermann Scherchen und Eduard Erdmann verkehrte. Seine frühesten Werke sind in freier, sehr individueller Atonalität geschrieben, so die komische Oper Der Sprung über den Schatten.

Ab 1923 hielt sich Křenek zwei Jahre in der Schweiz auf und reiste dann nach Paris. 1924 heiratete er Anna Mahler, die Tochter Gustav Mahlers, doch das Paar trennte sich noch im gleichen Jahr. Unter dem Einfluß Igor Strawinskis und des französischen Neoklassizismus veränderte sich Kreneks Kompositionsstil hin zum Eingängigeren und Unterhaltameren. In Verbindung mit seiner Tätigkeit von 1925 bis 1927 als Assistent von Paul Bekker, dem Intendanten der Oper Kassel, entstand so sein größter Publikumserfolg, die am 10. Februar 1927 im Opernhaus Leipzig uraufgeführte, so genannte « Jazz-Oper » Jonny spielt auf. Sie war eine der meistgespielten Opern der zwanziger Jahre und ein großer Publikumserfolg. Hanns Eisler hat sie in einer Rezension im Oktober 1927 als « langweiliges und geistloses Stück » bezeichnet, jedoch ausdrücklich darauf hingewiesen, daß er Křenek ansonsten für einen sehr begabten Komponisten halte.

Nach der Scheidung von seiner ersten Frau heiratete Křenek die bekannte Schauspielerin Berta Hermann und kehrte nach Wien zurück. Wieder wandelte sich sein Kompositionsstil ; nach einer intensiven Beschäftigung mit der Musik Schuberts begann seine neoromantische Phase, die ihren Höhepunkt in der Oper Das Leben des Orest und dem Liederzyklus Reisebuch aus den österreichischen Alpen (beide 1929) fand. Doch schon im gleichen Jahr begann seine Auseinandersetzung mit der Zwölftontechnik Arnold Schöenbergs, die in den folgenden Jahren sein Schaffen bestimmte.

Spätestens seit der Oper Jonny spielt auf war Křenek für die Nationalsozialisten ein « Kulturbolschewist » und nach ihrer Machtübernahme 1933 wurden seine Werke im Deutschen Reich als « entartet » verboten. Křenek konvertierte nach 1930 zum Katholizismus und hatte Sympathien für den italienischen Faschismus, die er auch öffentlich bekundete.

Křenek komponierte in der Zeit von 1930 bis 1933 die Zwölfton-Oper Karl V., deren Uraufführung in Wien 1934 allerdings aus politischen Gründen verhindert wurde und erst 1938 in Prag stattfinden konnte.

1937 reiste Křenek zum ersten Mal in die USA, in die er 1938 nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an das nationalsozialistische Deutschland emigrierte. Nach dem Krieg konnte er sich nie zu einer endgültigen Rückkehr nach Europa entschließen. In den USA begann er eine intensive Lehrtätigkeit, zuerst ab 1939 am Vassar College in Poughkeepsie, New York, von 1942 bis 1947 dann an der « School of Fine-Arts » der Hamline University in Saint-Paul, Minnesota. 1945 wurde er amerikanischer Staatsbürger. Die Schreibweise seines Namens hatte er in Amerika der Einfachheit halber von Křenek auf Křenek geändert. Von 1947 bis 1966 lebte er in Los Angeles und hielt

Gastvorlesungen an verschiedenen Universitäten. 1950 heiratete er seine dritte Frau, die Komponistin Gladys Nordenstrom. Zu den wichtigsten Werken dieser Jahre gehören das Chorwerk « Lamentatio Jeremiæ prophetæ » (1941) und die Oper Pallas Athene weint (1955) .

Ungebrochen war weiterhin die Experimentierfreudigkeit Kreneks. Seit den 1940er Jahren beschäftigte er sich mit der seriellen Musik, und in den fünfziger Jahren fand auch die elektronische Musik Einzug in sein Schaffen, so in dem Pfingstatorium « Spiritus intelligentiæ, Sanctus » (1955-1956, entstanden in Zusammenarbeit mit dem Studio für elektronische Musik des Westdeutscher Rundfunk in Köln) . 1966 zog er nach Palm Springs, doch längst war er auch wieder in Europa als Interpret seiner Werke tätig. Bis in seine letzten Lebensjahre komponierte er unermüdlich, sodaß sein « Œuvre » die Opusnummer 242 erreichte. Sein Schaffen umfaßt fast alle Stilrichtungen des 20. Jahrhunderts, und, ähnlich wie Igor Strawinski, erreichte er in jedem Stil eine außerordentliche Meisterschaft.

Privat pflegte Křenek regen Austausch mit den führenden Künstlern und Intellektuellen seiner Zeit wie Rainer Maria Rilke, Theodor W. Adorno, Thomas Mann, Schönberg und Strawinsky.

Křenek ist auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (Gruppe 33 G, Nummer 1) in einem Ehrengrab beigesetzt. Im Jahr 2011 wurde in Wien Liesing (23. Bezirk) die Ernst-Křenek-Gasse nach ihm benannt.

Anläßlich seines 85. Geburtstages stiftete die Stadt Wien zu seinem Gedenken den Ernst-Křenek-Preis.

Censure de la musique par le politique (1933-1945)

Political Music Censorship : Some Remarks on Nazi Music Regulations (1933-1945)

(Ursula Geisler)

How music is treated in a society is a relevant marker of how the space of individual freedom is defined. Texts dealing with what has been seen as the dangerous potential of music for society can be traced back a long time, with prominent examples since as early as Plato's Republic. (1) The imagination of the existence of « good » and « right » music in contrast to « bad » and « false » music has been used to construct a dichotomy between the « Self » and the « Other » in different historical periods. (2) This is particularly evident within the framework of dictatorships like National-Socialism. In order to secure and affirm « the moral, spiritual and cultural superiority of the German nation », music and musicians were extensively exposed to control and censorship measures in the years 1933-1945. (3)

The present article focuses on political music censorship, which, historically, has often been linked to the institutionalisation of ideological, social, religious and æsthetical principles. (4) More specifically, the present article deals with the « Reich » Department for Music Arrangements (« Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen », or RfM), the music censorship institution established by the National-Socialists after the beginning of World War II, in 1940. The aim is to shed light on how political music censorship was discursively constructed and by which means music censorship was envisioned to support the Pan-German vision of the after-War future.

Political music censorship

Political music censorship is intertwined with various aspects of a systematized assertion of governmental or majority interests. The focus and reasons for censorship change over time and space, as does the music it is opposed to. However, as Korpe, Reitov and Cloonan point-out, « censorship is a form of cultural protection and intended mass behavioural control ». (5) Such attempts to control the masses by regulatory music measures have been made throughout history in many countries world-wide. If music is censored by means of institutionalisation within a legal framework, the censorship implementation is suitable for describing the cultural construction of the society's legitimacy. It can, therefore, be relevant to focus on specific historical periods known for totalitarian structures that affected individuals' possibilities of choice in everyday life to an extreme degree. As a politically extremist government that built on mythological and racial discourses of culturally superiority, the Nazi regime, which held power from 1933 to 1945, put specific focus on establishing ways to control artists and the arts in general.

Nazi music censorship

As Friedrich Geiger has shown in his comparative work on the persecution of composers, both the Nazi and the Stalinist regime were rooted in an aesthetic concept of dominion. The different art forms (music, poetry, literature, architecture and film) were referred to by Geiger as « assistant arts » in the construction of a political « Gesamtkunstwerk ». Music, with its potential to organize people into a collective mass, was seen as especially suitable for achieving this target, (6) making this art form an especially important element in the political discourse and preservation of power. To support their attempt to establish an aestheticized political order, the National-Socialists sought to build on historic references and to continue the 19th Century's functionalization of music. The intense debates on the political and societal tasks of music from the 1920's onwards also laid the ground-work for an expanded positioning of music at all levels for the period 1933-1945. (7) On the one hand, music life (of a highly-controlled and specific type) flourished under direct support from the Nazi regime, and expanded into many areas. Examples include the Hitler Youth music ceremonies, Classical and choral music education and the Wagner Festivals in Bayreuth. On the other hand, certain music and musicians were banned and discriminated against on ideological grounds. The construction of racial dichotomies was combined with aesthetic and cultural values, as well as stereotypes regarding artistic potential. The political propaganda constructed Jews and Jewishness as the utmost « Other » to be defeated. The examples presented in the present article of the implementation of political music censorship measures, which were undertaken in the context of « Gleichschaltung » (enforced conformity) illuminate the dual strategies of cultural concessions and prohibitions. Special attention will be given to the elements of institutionalization and language.

Institutionalization

Although much has been written about the overall function of music in the racist ideology and propaganda of the National-Socialists, little has been written about the concrete execution of the music censorship laws and principles that were enforced by specialized institutions under the leadership of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry (« Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda ») . (8)

Nazi music censorship laws and orders were implemented both by the culture division (« Kulturabteilung ») and the music division (« Musikabteilung ») of the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda », as well as by the « Reich » Music Chamber (« Reichsmusikkammer ») . (9) Established in 1933, the « Reichsmusikkammer » was conceptualized as a superior organisational structure for professional music life in Germany. From a structural standpoint, the « Reichsmusikkammer » established specific offices for composers, musicians, concert life, music education, choir and folk-music, music-publishing, instrument-makers, and so on. These offices were placed at the centre of music control, and were connected as partners to working commissions, ministries, music organisations, and other associations within the « Reich » . However, although ambitious, the « Reichsmusikkammer » could not keep-up with this ambition in practice. The overall importance of the « Reichsmusikkammer » as a tool for the control of musical life in Germany after 1933 was thus intended, but not entirely achieved. (10) Membership in the « Reichsmusikkammer » was compulsory for all music professionals, and the organization was headed by certain famous people who were highly-regarded in the music industry, such as the composer Richard Strauß and the conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler.

Along with the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service (« Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums ») of 1933 and the Nuremberg Laws (« Nürnberger Gesetze ») of 1935, this « Reichsmusikkammer » membership requirement was used as a tool to discriminate against Jewish participation in musical life.

Music censorship legislation

In December 1937, Peter Raabe, the 2nd director of the « Reichsmusikkammer » after Richard Strauß, gave a new, very specific order on how to treat foreign music in Germany :

« All foreign music that shall be distributed in Germany by music-publishers must be submitted to the Music Inspecting Authority of the “ Reich ” Propaganda Ministry. It is prohibited to distribute sheet music that has been declared as unwanted by the Music Inspecting Authority. » (11)

This was the starting-point for the establishment of the « Reich » Music Inspecting Authority (« Reichsmusikprüfstelle ») as a sub-division of the « Reichsmusikkammer ». The « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » was charged with the task of « not only studying foreign music, but also supervising German production and taking action against unwanted and harmful music ». (12)

The distribution of so-called « unwanted » foreign musical scores was forbidden. The main-task of the « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » was to keep an eye on performances and on the publication of music. For this purpose, the « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » registered and examined all concert programs, and also required the examination of all planned publications - such as documents pertaining to musical education, biography, æsthetics, or theory. Additionally, the « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » was tasked with inspecting the scores that were to be distributed through German music-publishers and dealers. As Alan Steinweis shows, this order was difficult to carry-out, since the number of scores voluntarily submitted exceeded the authority's inspecting capacities. Since it was not possible to review all incoming material, the directive was subsequently modified to state that music-publishers were only required to send in works that had been specifically requested by the Inspecting Authority. (13)

In 1939, a new and more detailed decree was issued ; this ruling gave particular attention to foreign music, which had become more and more popular, and which the authorities had difficulties controlling :

Generally prohibited is any music whose composers, lyricists, arrangers, or publishers are Jews or members of enemy States (England, Poland, Russia, France ; Georges Bizet's « Carmen » and Frédéric Chopin are exceptions) . American refrain-song is forbidden, since it sounds identical to English. Prohibited is hot- and swing-music, both original and adaptations. Also prohibited is alien (« artfremd ») music in so far as it originates from Jews or Negroes, or tries to imitate negro music, as well as music with quotations from Jewish composers. All music that has been declared as unwanted by the Music Inspecting Authority (« Reichsmusikprüfstelle ») is included in the performance ban. (14)

In addition, 1 year before this 1939 decree, Josef Goebbels had made a speech at the cultural-political demonstration in connection with the exhibition of so-called « degenerate music » in 1938.

In this speech, Goebbels had underlined that :

« The German musical life has been definitely cleaned of the last traces of Jewish arrogance and domination. »

« Our Classical Masters, again, appear before the public in a pure and un-adulterated form. »

Bearing these 2 statements in mind, one might ask why it was so important to establish another censorship institution : the « Reich » Department for Music Arrangements (« Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » , or RfM) in 1940. (15)

The « Reich » Department for Music Arrangements

The « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » was established for at least 2 reasons : to control the field of Operetta and Opera by adjusting older texts to current political demands, and to place orders for new dramatic works. As Pamela Potter and others have shown, the staff for implementing and executing the different demands of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » 's departments and divisions were often recruited from the former musicology departments of German universities. One main-task was to legitimise the execution of music censorship. (16) Music institutions established after 1933 provided different possibilities for making a career in the various music-controlling institutions of the regime. One prominent example is Hans Joachim Moser (1889-1967) who until 1933 served as the director of the Academy for Church and School Music (« Akademie für Kirchen- und Schulmusik ») in Berlin, during the time of the Weimar Republic. After being the target of much hostility from several supporters of the Nazi Party, he retired around 1933, and, then, later tried to regain entry into the regime's music-related organizations. (17) He succeeded in 1940, when he was appointed the « Generalsekretär » (General Secretary) for the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » , which was under the direct control and authority of Josef Goebbels and the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » . When Goebbels established the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » , in April 1940, World War II had already been going on for 7 months and Norway was on the point of being occupied by the German « Wehrmacht » (the armed forces of the 3rd « Reich ») . The « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » was commissioned (like the « Musikprüfstelle ») to ensure that the music repertoire upheld Nazi ideals regarding racial and social purity along with the National-Socialist ideology.

The « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » 's main-tasks were to commission new musical scores and productions and to adjust existing musical scores and text-books to the ideological regulations of the Nazi regime. The revision of music, along with the revision of the lyrics of older Operettas and Operas, were important concrete working areas of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » , along with supporting the production of new music. Anselm Gerhard explains that Moser's task as General Secretary of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » was « systematically to “ de-Jewify ” (“ entjuden ”) the texts of several Händel Oratorios, as well as of all of Robert Schumann's “ Heine Lieder ” , and, thereby, to contribute to the destruction of Jewish traditions » . (18) Potter gives another example of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » 's modification specifications, referring to studies by Katja Roters and Werner Rackwitz (19) :

« The most radical changes made to the Old Testament Oratorios generally consisted of transforming biblical characters into anonymous heroes or completely transferring the setting of the action to a historical event that demonstrated Germanic heroism. » (20)

Another censorship measure concerned composers from the 19th Century, such as Georges Bizet (1838-1875) . In November 1940, Ernst Hartmann wrote to Josef Göbbels regarding his reported discovery of an unknown Opera by the French composer Georges Bizet. The « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » took-over the correspondence with Hartmann and requested more information about « Ivan, le Terrible » , which had been deposited at the « Conservatoire Nationale » in Paris by a friend of Bizet's. As late as April 1942, a contract was signed with Hartmann, for musical editing, and with « Josef Wenter in Wien » , for editing of the text. Excerpts from this correspondence provide many details about the censorship methods in use by the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » .

In January 1943, Moser wrote to Wenter about how to adjust the Opera libretto to the current political agenda :

« Taking place in Kiev, with the “ Tsar of the Tartars ”, is politically not at all appropriate. For all of these reasons, we propose to move the plot to a very early but already Christian France ; this would fit the kidnapping of woman, the procession, and the local musical colour. This could be, say, the western Franconian Merovingian Empire, or a legendary Aquitania in the 6th to 9th Century. The Zircassians in Caucasia could be replaced by the Basques in the Pyrénées ; instead of Moscow, it could be “ Tours ”, or another “ appropriate ” city ; the Visigoths could be mentioned - the main focus would be on the renaming of the main characters ; Olga could be transformed into the holy Oda, “ Renat ” or “ Turpin ” or something like that instead of Ivan, Marie could be replaced by an old-fashioned name. This operation would have some charm and advantages because of the fresh “ milieu ”, and it would (as I see it) at the moment even be politically desirable to show the, so to speak, “ Germanic-Romanian music culture ” of what would later be Burgundian soil. » (21)

This quotation gives a detailed demonstration of the methods of æsthetic-political music censorship used by the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » . The main-ways that music could be scrutinized and altered were spatially, temporally, nationally, and religiously. The naming and titles of key-actors and objects could also be changed.

War utopias and realities

Due to the increasing pressure by the realities of the War, this project to re-cast the Bizet Opera (which was to include a performance in German) was not completed before 1945. (22) The work of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » was seen as the last step in shaping the German music repertoire (although mainly its Operas and Oratorios) in line with a National-Socialist in age of the future European musical landscape. Through a detailed editing process, the German musical repertoire was bowdlerized and adjusted to the newly-formulated Pan-Germanic cultural needs. As the National-Socialists foresaw an expansion of German borders through the conquest of new territories, there was an increasing demand to expand the future musical repertoire, in accordance with National-Socialist ideals. In envisioning these future scenarios there was a more or less concrete definition of what kind of music should be at the core. Moser's (and through him, the Nazi regime's) musical ideals and visions were concretised in the 1st « year-book of German music » which came into being under on-going War conditions, 10 years after the 1933 « Machtergreifung ». The realities of the War, at this time, shine through Moser's report, not only in his indirect mention of on-going air-bombardments by the Allies on German territory (« heute luftbedrohte Bezirke des Altreichs »), but also in his mentions of the new borders of the postponed so-called « Dritte Reich », which was to have taken place after Germany won the War and was in the phase of recovering and restoring territory (« Aufbauzeit »). The work of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » was posited as being a decisive ingredient in what Moser called « caring peace planning » (« fürsorgliche Friedensplanung »). (23) What was formulated as a pan-Germanic utopian narrative was betrayed by the harsh reality. By 1944, it became obvious that the preparation and material requirements for « Total War » were so vast, and the concrete cultural production so limited, that all raw materials had to be dedicated to armament production. Moser was called to serve as a member on the « Orgelbeirat » (Organ commission), which decided which organs were least worthy and could, therefore, be melted down for War needs. Restrictions were also put in place for other materials and natural resources, such as paper for sheet music production. (24)

Censorship and language

Language has obviously played a crucial role in the legislation and discourse of National-Socialism. The Nazi regime's official language usage has also been characterized as a disturbed communication situation, (25) which gave rise to a National-Socialistic language usage built on historical contexts and sources. In reality, there was no genuinely new Nazi language system, but rather strong linguistic references to former patterns, movements and trends, such as nationalism, « völkisch » socialism, anti-Semitism, cultural pessimism (« Kulturpessimismus ») and racism.

The linguistic effects on music censorship were diverse, and incorporated the concrete establishment and usage of certain dichotomies outlining and defining the limits of accepted and desired versus condemned and forbidden music.

In Josef Goebbels' speech on the « Reich » Music Festival (« Reichsmusiktage ») in Düsseldorf, in 1938, he once again pointed to the regime's musical-political principles, which were later enforced by subordinate authorities like the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen ».

One of the 10 principles sums-up what was at the centre of music censorship :

« Like any other art, music is derived from mysterious and profound forces, which are rooted in ethnic belonging (« Volkstum »). Jewishness and German music are opposites, which by their nature stand in the starkest contradiction to each other. The fight against Jewishness in German music is, therefore, still today our major task, never to be revealed. » (26)

This racially grounded argumentation was imbedded in a framework of æsthetical and national values.

As Bernd Sponheuer points-out :

« National-Socialist ideas are not contained within individual concepts and ideological elements that can almost without exception be traced back to other sources, but within their specific arrangement and receptive embedding. » (27)

In the quote above, Goebbels states that there is a natural division between Jewishness and German music. Here, « Jewishness » and the « German » are set in direct opposition, with the « Other » to be defeated and the « Self » to be protected. This racially grounded dividing principle was the central Nazi argument for the exclusion of Jewish musical life from German contemporary musical development. It had a profound negative effect on the possibilities for so-called « unwanted » persons to maintain their participation in everyday music culture. (28)

As shown above, musicologists like Hans Joachim Moser were important for the formulation of the ideological goals of Nazi music regulation. In Moser's description of the starting-point for the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen », the main-focus was the desire « to broaden the program of both serious and light German music scenes - in accordance with " Reich " interests in order to encourage the valuable and to protect against commercialized productions and poor taste. » (29) In 1943, Moser summarized the preceding years of work in the field of music, with one of his articles in the « Jahrbuch der deutschen Musik 1943 » (Year-book of German Music 1943) entitled : « Von der Steuerung des deutschen Musiklebens » (About the regulation of German musical life) .

Moser's use of National-Socialist language in describing the necessity of regulating music is evident in such statements as :

« The tasks of the totalitarian State are largely determined : here, what is needed is less impulse, but more protection of the weak and guidance of the strong, so that the lurking subversive seeds will not gain any power. » (30)

Moser's use of the dichotomy of weak and strong to justify the necessity of regulating music exemplifies the use of language as a tool for discrimination ; his combination of protection of the weak with guidance of the strong is completed by an organicist assertion about subversive seeds (« Zersetzungskeime ») who lie in wait at every turn, ready to take advantage of any sustenance given to them. This kind of argumentation and language use had not been invented by the Nazis, but was sharpened and put into practice in the Nazi era. The Nazi use of language as a strong tool of discrimination was exemplified in music censorship, where language was mainly used to include and exclude specific music.

Nazi cultural revolution

When the Nazis came to power in 1933, they envisioned a « cultural revolution » that would implement a national-racist ideal of German art and music on all societal levels. This message was disseminated through public channels such as the school and the broader education system ; the Nazi Party was also adept at manipulating public opinion through media such as radio and film, mainly through the cinemas and weekly news films. Art-exhibitions were also conceived in order to guide public opinion and to emphasize the necessity and value of cultural-political censorship measures.

In July 1937, the exhibition « Degenerate Art » (« Entartete Kunst ») opened in Munich, showing 650 confiscated artworks from 32 museums (31) and, 1 year later, the exhibition « Degenerate Music » (« Entartete Musik ») followed in connection with the regime's 1st « " Reich " Music Festival » (« Reichsmusiktage ») in Düsseldorf. This exhibition was shown in Weimar, Munich and Vienna that same year, and plans were made to schedule further exhibitions in the coming years. Ultimately, these plans were not carried-out due to the outbreak of World War II. (32)

The exhibition « Degenerate Music » was supplemented by sound examples that attendees could listen to on demand. This multi-media exhibition is one more example of the technical modernisation that accompanied the Nazi regime's striving for total control of the population through aesthetic means.

The auditory and visual conceptualisations of the public sphere were also intended to extend into people's private spaces. Radio, for instance, which could be used as a direct propaganda channel to people's living-rooms, was a platform for the distribution of both permitted and favoured music. Thus, radio music was the audible media counterpart to silenced and censored music.

What is the opposite of music censorship ?

Political music censorship is a question of power relations and a consequence of the construction of music as powerful. Musical objects, subjects and expressions are defined and re-interpreted in the process of the establishment of music censorship in order to make them controllable and separable from accepted fields of music-making and expression. Through the process of censorship, music becomes subordinate to laws and regulations unrelated to aesthetics. Although the tools for political music censorship vary, one common feature is the assumption of an almost fixed and absolute Self from which music is defined and censorship of the Other can be constructed as meaningful. This positioning of « Self » and « Other » often provides music censorship with a legal framework within which to operate, although this framework can vary greatly depending on location and historical period. Music censorship is seldom a sudden implementation of a totally new agenda, but rather, is dependent on a number of known and established criteria, which serve as the conditions on which the regulations and the concrete design of censorship legislation rest. Those criteria are themselves culturally constructed. For instance, general views on music and its function in a given society will affect attitudes towards music taboos, as well as a society's treatment of individual access to music production and reception. Relevant questions relating to this issue are : Who is allowed to be a musician, a composer, a musical actor, etc. ? Which instruments and sound sources are accessible to whom ? Who is commissioned with representing social interests, and are they politically motivated or independent ? What narratives exist about the function of music in that society ?

The Nazi construction of German music, which was drawn mostly from the Classical repertoire, as well as from traditional folk-music (« Volksmusik ») , was considered desirable and given strong support by Nazi officials ; it was hardly surprising that these 2 genres therefore dominated the radio repertoire. At the same time, programmes that included Nordic music (« Nordische Musik ») also increased. The integration of Nordic music not only broadened the invisible borders of the imagined pan-German cultural nation, but also facilitated a concretisation of the racist and imaginary German affinity to Nordic culture. (33)

The question « What is the opposite of music censorship ? » may, at 1st glance, sound somewhat naive or provocative ; however, focusing on a question like this facilitates an understanding of the complexity of topics concerning censorship. It is not only a question of the music, musicians and other musical expressions that are not censored, but also of musical freedom and of what music is actively promoted and supported. Governmental support can influence the development of musical life in certain directions, and, together with censorship measures, can have a crucial effect on wide-ranging areas of the cultural landscape.

Researching music censorship

In order to study the topic of music censorship in the Nazi era, a broad range of secondary reference literature still needs to be supplemented with in-depth archival and library research. Relevant documents can be found in the German « Bundesarchiv » (National Archive) in Berlin. (34) Some of the most relevant sources have also been collected and compiled by individual researchers ; Fred K. Prieberg's « Handbuch deutscher Musiker 1933-1945 », for example, is one of the most extensive compilations of original sources on music and the 3rd « Reich » . Over more than 9,000 pages Prieberg compiles an enormous number of original text excerpts and pieces of information on relevant persons, institutions, journals, etc. ; this contribution represents an exceptional individual effort to shed light on what is often a consciously obscured period of music and politics. Prieberg's hand-book has been published only in a digital format, making it easily searchable and, therefore, a valuable resource for research on both individual musicians and composers, as well as on larger topics like censorship. (35) Prieberg's private archive, « The Prieberg Archive » , which totals about 50 metres of shelf space, was handed-over to the Institute of Musical Science at the Christian Albrechts University in Kiel, where it can be consulted by researchers. Since 2005, the « Lexikon verfolgter Musiker und Musikerinnen der NS-Zeit » has collected and systematically published the bibliographical information of musicians, musicologists and others involved in the national music life who were discriminated against or forced to emigrate from Germany after 1933 (or from Austria after 1938) . This ambitious reference project contains more than 4,000 names, of which several hundred have already been supplemented with more detailed information regarding their biography, music production and publications. An outstanding bibliography completes this resource, providing a helpful introduction to searchable archives, reference literature and other relevant sources concerning persecuted musicians in Nazi Germany. (36) This kind of publication on music censorship, from the perspective of the personal consequences, is an important research contribution, complementing research that focuses on cultural violations by the perpetrators of censorship.

Summary

Between 1933 and 1945, political music censorship in Germany was based on racial principles ; so-called atonality and Jewishness were, therefore, the main-targets of censorship activities. These censorship principles were built on music discourses from before 1933, using existing terminology such as Musical bolshevism, German music, and atonal music. Political music censorship carried-out by specific institutions like the « Reich » Department of Music Arrangements (« Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen ») and the « Reich » Music Inspecting Authority (« Reichsmusikprüfstelle ») was, thus, not only limited to the sphere of musical scores or text-books, but to all musical activities from « unwanted » (« unerwünscht ») persons.

For a better understanding of the systematically enforced music censorship in the Nazi era, one must remain aware of the embedding of music into the hierarchical political structures and institutions. Music underwent a crucial change during this time period, towards both an objectification and a symbolic transformation. This was paralleled by strategies of defining music and musicians in terms of « Otherness » as opposed to « Germanness » , in a racially and, thus, politically useful sense. Concrete music censorship activities were part of a racially grounded policy, which resulted in systematically enacted regulations. While Germany's reputation as a « Kulturnation » since the 19th Century had been based on the use of music mainly as a representation of nationalised universalism, the National-Socialist construction of cultural meaning employed music as a metaphor for genetic purity and superiority.

Aus all diesen Gründen schlagen wir vor, die Handlung in ein sehr frühes (wegen Frauenraub) , aber schon christliches (wegen der Prozession) Frankreich (wegen des musikalischen Lokalkolorits) , also in das westfränkische Merowingerreich oder ein etwas sagenhaftes Aquitanien des 5.-8. Jahrhunderts zu verlegen. Statt der Zirkassier im Kaukasus könnten die Basken in den Pyrenäen stehen, statt Moskau “ Tours ” oder eine andere “ einschlägige ” Stadt, die Westgoten könnten erwähnt werden-hauptsächlich käme es auf die Umtaufung der Hauptpersonen an ; Olga könnte die heilige Oda werden, statt Iwan “ Renat ”, “ Turpin ” oder dergleichen, für Marie vielleicht auch einen als altertümlich empfundenen Namen. Reiz und Vorteil dieser Operation wäre zugleich die Unabgebrauchtheit dieses Milieus, und es würde meines Erachtens sogar zur Zeit politisch ganz erwünscht sein, die sozusagen “ germanisch-romanische Musikkultur ” des später burgundischen Bodens zu zeigen. »

Musique classique et leadership nazi sous le 3e « Reich »

Music was not simply another art form in the 3rd « Reich » . In the Nazi imagination, music had a unique significance and power. As a nation, Germany had a long tradition of musical success (Germans are disproportionately represented among the great Classical composers, including Mozart, Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Schubert, and Wagner) leading some to claim that music was « the most German of all the arts ». The internationally acknowledged importance of German composers, conductors, and musicians was an enormous source of pride ; at the same time, the modernist and « cosmopolitan » trends in the arts of the inter-War world were felt, in some quarters, to pose an enormous threat. For the Nazis, the purported degeneration of German music was both a metaphor and a symptom of the degeneration of the nation.

The idea that Germany had a particular affinity for great music, and that this was under threat in the inter-War period, was not confined to the Nazi Party. Many conservative nationalists perceived the musical trends of this period as an omen of global degeneration, and it was Germany's defeat in World War I, the economic devastation that followed, and the humiliation of the Treaty of Versailles, that brought the situation to a head. For many, the increasing popularity of swing, jazz, avant-garde experimentation, and African-American and Jewish musicians were not a coincidence : they were both cause and effect of the general collapse of German society and German values. If German music was associated with heroism, love of nation, the drive toward creation, and rootedness in blood and soil, this « degenerate » music was profit- and thrill-driven, imitative and superficial, and lacking in originality because it was lacking its own healthy nation and culture. Many social critics and musicologists bemoaned these trends. While these concerns did not focus solely on Jews, they were a primary target. Although only a small percentage of German musicians were Jewish, the prominence of people like Arnold Schönberg, Otto Klemperer, Kurt Weill and others gave strength to the idea that Jews were in the vanguard of an organized cabal to pervert and appropriate German values. The threats that Jews seemed to pose to Germany and its musical heritage were summarised in their assumed foreignness and their link with an undesirable and destructive modernity.

Since their earliest years, the Nazis had envisioned themselves as a mass nationalist movement, and as powerful as visual arts, theatre, or literature might be, it was music that was seen as the great crowd-pleaser, the most effective way to seduce and sway the masses. As the Minister of Propaganda Josef Goebbels put it :

« Music affects the heart and emotions more than the intellect. Where then could the heart of a nation beat stronger than in the huge masses, in which the heart of a nation has found its true home ? »

The Nazi quest to purify the German music world from « degeneracy », and return it to its mythic Germanic-ness (a notoriously indefinable category) motivated an enormous amount of activity, planning, and policy-making. Almost immediately after Adolf Hitler was proclaimed Chancellor, in January 1933, Nazi supporters, in a continuation of the early activities of the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (Combat League for German Culture) , began to disrupt musical performances by Jewish artists.

Nazi-sponsored newspapers took particular glee in slandering the names and careers of « degenerate » musicians, often threatening violence in retaliation for « un-German » concerts. This early harassment, however, was only the beginning. In March 1933, Goebbels took control of all German radio stations and the press, summarily firing all of the art and music-critics who did not support his aesthetic agenda. 1 month later, on 7 April 1933, the Law for the Re-establishment of the Civil Service was passed, which led to the widespread dismissal of Jewish conductors, singers, music teachers, and administrators. In July, the 2 most important composers at the illustrious Prussian Academy of Art, Arnold Schönberg and Franz Schreker, were dismissed.

The rapidity with which these developments took place stunned Jews living in Germany, but there was very little protest from non-Jews, some of whom leapt at the opportunity to fill newly-vacant positions. (Isolated but significant protests mainly came from both Jewish and non-Jewish musicians and composers in the United States.) The only major German figure to offer any sort of public protest was the conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, who wrote an open letter to Goebbels. Although he approved of the elimination of « Jewish influence » over German music, he also insisted that there were brilliant individual Jews who should be allowed to continue performing ; he worried about filling the positions of some of the best musicians in his Orchestra. There were also some more established Jews who were deeply woven into the musical life of Germany and not as easy to summarily fire ; several such musicians maintained employment under the Nazis during the initial years of the regime. By the end of 1935, however, the purge was more or less complete. Many German-Jewish musicians had, by this point, fled Germany, the bulk going to the United States, England, or Palestine.

Confronted with a large population of unemployed Jewish artists, Nazi leaders developed a temporary « solution » . In the summer of 1933, the Prussian Ministry of Education met with leaders of the Berlin Jews and agreed to set-up the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Cultural League) , which was officially registered on 23 June 1933 under the organisation of Doctor Kurt Singer. In November 1933, the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber or « RMK ») , the branch of the « Reich » Cultural Chamber responsible for music, was initiated, an organisation that required a membership card, and thus « Aryan » status, for musical employment. The « Reichsmusikkammer » consolidated the multitude of existing unions and professional associations for musicians from Weimar Germany. Initially, German musicians were excited by the prospect of a centralised framework ; many were, thus, attracted to the Nazis not because of ideology but rather because of the potential artistic benefits. It soon became clear, however, that artistic freedom was allotted strictly on a racial basis. Following on, from the dismissals and purges of the early Nazi years, the Nuremberg Laws of September 1935 worsened the situation further, as now even « half-Jews » and those married to Jews were no longer legally able to perform or compose. The music publishing world was also targeted, and hundreds of leading publishers and staff were persecuted, fired, and imprisoned.

The year 1938 saw the mounting of the infamous « Entartete Musik » (Degenerate Music) exhibit, modelled on the successful earlier touring exhibition of « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) . Under the organisation of Hans Severus Ziegler, this ambitious production took place in Düsseldorf, and was intended to identify to the German public what music was « degenerate » , to demonstrate its dangers, and celebrate its purging from German society. Ziegler quickly realized, however, that « Degenerate Music » was remarkably difficult to define. Many of the pieces played at the exhibition as examples of degeneracy were, in fact, popular among listeners, and some feared that the display was attended by fans eager to hear them. In addition, while the firing of Jews had evoked little protest, this exhibit was more disturbing to German musicians, probably because « degeneracy » was not simply linked to blacks and Jews, but also to experimental and « foreign » music of diverse kinds.

The definition of « degenerate » fluctuated throughout the 3rd « Reich » even for the most committed Nazis. In addition to the practical difficulties of purging « undesirables » from Germany's musical world, there were many conflicts as pragmatism came into conflict with racial theory. One composition that troubled Nazi policy-makers was the 19th Century German-Jewish composer Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's « A Midsummer Night's Dream », a widely-admired work that continued to be performed, including by Wilhelm Furtwängler. Other examples that vexed censors and decision-makers were Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's collaboration with a Jewish librettist, Georg Friedrich Händel's setting of Old Testament texts to music, and both Robert Schumann and Franz Schubert's setting of the Jewish Heinrich Heine's poetry to music.

In general, however, Nazi policy succeeded in remaking Germany's musical scene, in a short time. The musicologist Hans Joachim Moser penned a celebratory summary of these policies :

« As is the case everywhere, Jewry has especially penetrated into the sphere of music in the USA and Europe ; publishers, agents and the press have arranged to have their racial comrades placed in almost all decisive positions and, thus, attempted to force their taste upon that of the common people. That individuals among them through assimilation and talent have, particularly as imitators / reproducers, produced some impressive works, we do not need to deny. Yet since, after 1933, they are removed from our cultural circle, so it is due to the righteous emergency defence of the Aryan people against the intellectual and economic tyranny forced on us by Jewry. »

For those left to profit from this « righteous defence » of German music, the situation was dramatically different than it had been before 1933. By 1937, the « Reichsmusikkammer » counted among its members tens of thousands of professional musicians and music workers and, under Josef Gœbbels, a new system of professionalisation of the music world took place. Every musician was assigned to 1 of 5 levels, each of which had a set wage. Gœbbels also developed many programmes to aid poor and unemployed musicians, which boosted many salaries and careers. Commitment to Nazi ideology, however, tended to be weighed more heavily than musical talent, allowing loyal mediocrity to be rewarded over skill. Composers and musicians could be used as propaganda weapons for the « Reich » , producing marches and light music to distract and entertain the population, and music for Party events and rallies. Countless compositions celebrated Adolf Hitler, Germany, and the glorious future of the Nazi Party.

On a broader social level, music was considered an important means of instilling « German values » , nationalism, and a sense of community. Countless musical organizations were established, musicians promoted, prizes awarded, and Festivals staged with the intent that « German » music reach into every home, school, and army barracks in the « Reich » . Music also formed an important part of the Nazi Party's own activities, and featured prominently at Party rallies and other public events. The « Horst Wessellied » (« Horst Wessel » song) , based on the mythic story of a young Nazi murdered by a gang of communists, was popular and widely sung. Many propaganda songs were aimed at the youth, and under the leadership of Baldur von Schirach, the « Hitlerjugend » (Hitler Youth) developed an elaborate music program. Even soldiers on the front were encouraged to attend cultural events, and to sing amongst themselves. Between 1933 and 1945, scores of soldiers' song books were published, the majority during the War years. A 1943 volume in the series « Yearbook of German Music » reminded its readers that, « at times of combat, music is a source of joy » .

Music was also a prominent feature of life under Nazi internment. There was a « music-corps » within the SS and, in some camps, there were separate SS bands. In occupied cities and towns, local musicians were frequently forced to perform for Nazi audiences. SS officers organized musical « cafés » and cabarets for their own entertainment in many of the large ghettos, including Warsaw. Many concentration camps had their own Orchestras, which played to entertain the Nazi guards. Music was also widely used as a means of torture : inmates were forced to play music while being beaten, or to sing while performing exhausting labour ; music accompanied public hangings and executions, and was broadcast over loudspeakers during mass shootings. The Italian Jew, Primo Levi, characterized this music as :

« The voice of the “ Lager ”, the perceptible expression of its geometrical madness, of the resolution of others to annihilate us 1st as men, in order to kill us more slowly, afterwards. »

The 3rd « Reich » entered the annals of History as the most extreme aberration of civilized society. Its benchmark was the murder of millions of people in the name of an elaborate ideology that planned to divide the world into superior and inferior race groupings. From 1933 until 1945, the Nazi leadership planned, organized, and executed their ideas, inflicting relentless misery in the European arena. Nearly 70 years after the War, the singularity of the period still generates more attention than most other episodes in History.

This essay, as part of that phenomenon, is the 2nd of 2 to appear in Yad Vashem's e-newsletter on the aspects of a cultured country whose cultural legacy is subverted by the new regime to serve its ideological aims. (The 1st article is online and titled, « The 3rd “ Reich ” and the Theft of a Musical Legacy ») . Ghettos, camps, marking, maiming, and murder are not the object of study here. However, to attain levels of persecution involving all the above and to the extent the Nazis succeeded, presupposes a level of control of every aspect of life in a country, including the cultural realm.

7 December 1933 : Berlin, Germany - (Photo) Adolf Hitler, Rudolf Heß, Heinrich Himmler, Josef Gœbbels and other senior officials at an SS concert, profits of the concert were dedicated to the winter charity project.

The focus of the essay is the sphere of Classical music in Germany, after 1933, and the largely successful attempts of the new regime to control the repertoire and everything connected with music for all the music-loving Germans in Germany and, from the outbreak of War, in the conquered territories as well. The article will cover aspects of the intricate relationship that developed between the regime and 2 of the most conspicuous conductors in Germany during the « Reich » , Wilhelm Furtwängler and Herbert von Karajan. They were to a large extent the public face of German culture that the world saw. Just as the international value of the Berlin Olympics, in 1936, was of major importance to the rulers of the 3rd « Reich » , so was the continued prominence of German music and culture on the world stage high on the « political » agenda of the « Reich » leaders. In fact, according to Eric Levi in his book, « Music in the 3rd “ Reich ” » , 5 prominent Nazis were in the forefront of this internal Nazi battlefield, for such it was. None other than Hermann Göring, Josef Gœbbels, and Alfred Rosenberg, 3 of the 5, were in virtual competition with each other in their efforts to garner additional spheres of influence. In this struggle, the visible faces of the conductors became the pawns of these powerful men. How each reacted to the inevitable pressures will be examined below.

Herbert von Karajan

When Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933, Herbert von Karajan, as a rising musical meteor in Germany, was all of 24 years old. 15 years later, at the end of the Nazi era, after investigations by Allied authorities, he became the German musician with the longest « sentence » of enforced unemployment which lasted for 2 1/2 years. He, who would become the dominant figure in German music after the War, constantly faced demonstrations and accusations based on his « War behavior » whenever he conducted in the United States. No persons ever presented pointed evidence against him and the atmosphere of guilt surrounding him appears to have been circumstantial.

However, Herbert von Karajan became one of the few senior musicians in Germany to join the Nazi Party. Many emigrated and most of the others remaining in Germany kept their distance from the Nazi Party. The date of Karajan's enrollment in the Party is in doubt. The fact of his enrollment is not. Copies of his Party card and their registration numbers show that he applied twice : once in Austria ; and the 2nd time in Ulm, Germany. Both applications were as early as April and May, 1933. He claimed a later date of 1935 and connected his enrollment with the formality of becoming the music director of Aachen.

What he did as a Nazi member or sympathizer in these 2 years will probably remain an open question unless more documentation is unveiled. He had connections with other Nazis and SS members, in this period, and at the young age of 28, he landed the plum position of Opera conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

Beyond voluntarily becoming a member of the Nazi Party, his activities on behalf of the Nazi regime were various and visible :

He conducted tributes on the occasion of Adolf Hitler's birthdays during the coming years.

He conducted at the official celebration of the « Reich » after the annexation of Austria, or « Anschluß » .

He dutifully presented programs of inferior musical propaganda material and, after the War, broke out. His clean-cut chiseled face was an integral part of the picture-perfect cultural representative of the 3rd « Reich » on the podiums of captured European capitals.

There is no doubt that the individual musicians enjoyed a surge in their financial situation as a result of Karajan's unparalleled success in the emerging recording markets but this came together with the price tag of enduring an autocratic mien that became the core of Karajan's projected image. He created an aura around him that has been likened to Hitler's « Führer » image and, although this kind of « talk » smacks of the sensational, Karajan grew-up in the Nazi era, became a member of the Party and never once disavowed his Nazi connections after the War. He has been accused of using anti-Semitic slurs about various Jews in his music circles despite their presence in his entourage.

It has been said of the famous German philosopher, Martin Heidegger, that his War-time Nazi affiliation and sympathies are dwarfed in their importance by his refusal to recant in the face of various approaches made to him after the War. The same atmosphere surrounds the silence of Karajan after the War. For many people, the undeniably beautiful recordings that he made after the War are besmirched by his silence. Karajan can be seen as an example of the relative failure of denazification in Germany after the War, bearing in mind that with everything described above, he achieved well-nigh total hegemony in the post-War world of Classical music.

Wilhelm Furtwängler

At 47, Wilhelm Furtwängler was double the age of Karajan when the Nazis rose to power, in 1933. Not a rising meteor but the shining northern star in the German music firmament, Furtwängler, the foremost representative of the German music legacy in Germany and around the world, was suddenly thrust into the maelstrom of Nazi totalitarian politics, and without prior experience in the razor-edged world of political manoeuvring, had to secure his position in a very insecure arena.

His situation was more precarious than Karajan's if only for the simple reason that he never joined the Nazi Party and, for the most, fought for the right to retain his artistic independence. Other internationally recognized « faces » of German music had been world-renowned names like Bruno Walter and Victor Klemperer, who as Jews, were forced to leave Germany after 1933. Furtwängler remained the pre-eminent conductor in Germany, after 1933, and his unenviable choices with the ensuing paths that he trod have brought both opprobrium and high-regard for the stances that he adopted.

The complexity of his situation stems from his initial decision to remain in Germany, after 1933, in order to fight for musical autonomy from within the new reality of a totalitarian politics.

After the War, the Berlin Philharmonic never again enjoyed the same surge that came from a feeling of togetherness and community, as they had under Furtwängler.

The authority struggle that developed between Wilhelm Furtwängler and Josef Goebbels is fascinating because both men needed each other to achieve their own aims. At the simplest level, Furtwängler needed the continued financial backing of Goebbels to keep the Berlin Philharmonic solvent and Goebbels needed Furtwängler's international standing to further the façade of German culture. There was a constant « give and take » in their relationship that mirrored the tension between the domain of art and music and the world of power politics. No totalitarian regime can afford a demonstrative creativity and independence from any agency under its aegis that admits values other than its own. An autonomous world of music would permit deviations according to guidelines external to the regime's dictates. Goebbels had the power to crush any unorthodoxy if he so wished and, yet, a subtle relationship of toleration within limits existed between the 2. Furtwängler collaborated, and Goebbels displayed flexibility.

Any judgment of the famous conductor would have to take the following points into consideration :

His decision to remain in Germany when voluntary exile was a definite option for him was taken with a view to maintaining artistic integrity and minimizing the invasive inroads of the political superstructure.

As mentioned above, Furtwängler, the very visible figure-head of German music, refused to join the Nazi Party. As an outsider, he remained suspect and susceptible.

He refused to conduct musical scores created for Nazi leaders.

By and large, he avoided conducting at Nazi functions in an attempt to minimize the visible aspect of his collaboration with them.

As far as possible, he avoided conducting in countries occupied by the « Wehrmacht » .

He refused the showering of gifts, like a house from Hitler himself and several cars from Göring.

Furtwängler intervened on behalf of Jews and other victims of the « Reich » 's racist policies and brazenly offended Nazi principles by continued association with them. He was unable to save his loyal Jewish personal secretary, Doctor Berta Geißmar, who was forced to leave Germany and settled in England. She had been his organizational lifeline and the concentrated effort of the regime to expel her indicates the extreme reaction of the « Reich » leaders « vis-à-vis » Furtwängler's Jewish associations.

Despite the points listed above, Furtwängler's record, before and during the War, was sullied by the very fact that he had collaborated with the regime. « Émigré » musicians especially were incensed that he had lent his honourable presence to Nazi legitimization in the eyes of the world. Berta Geißmar insisted that contact with Nazi officialdom was necessary if any attempt was to be made from within in the struggle of art against politics. Whatever his actions, one photograph of his bowing after a concert of the Berlin Philharmonic with Hitler, Goebbels, and Göring sitting in the front row looks very much like unbridled collaboration. But the critics weren't in the hall to hear the applause of adulation from the audience for the beloved national figure of Furtwängler. The regime's leaders were, and even to them, it was clear that a nuanced approach with this national treasure was advisable. Of all the prominent names in German music, Furtwängler alone remained to struggle for German artistic autonomy.

The 2 cases of Furtwängler and Karajan portrayed here indicate the importance of the world of culture and art to the Nazi regime. All the evidence shows that before the top echelon leaders would apply themselves to murderous racist policies, they were intimately involved in efforts to control art in the « Reich » on all fronts. « Decadent Art » was curtailed as antithetical to new artistic conventions of the « Reich » and the world of jazz was also targeted.

Clearly, the magnificent achievements of German Classical music could be retained as a beacon of light for the new Germany but, naturally, within the limits of new parameters. The narratives of Furtwängler and Karajan help to illustrate the tensions that began in 1933, and the different paths that 2 prominent musicians chose in confronting the 3rd « Reich » .

Elly Ney, pianiste des Nazis

Documentaire 52 minutes d'Axel Fuhrmann (Allemagne, 2014) sur « Arte » .

<http://www.zone-telechargement.com/emissions-tv/83630-nom-de-code-.html>

Elly Ney, pianiste des Nazis. Documentaire portrait (Nom de code : sonate au clair de lune, Elly Ney, pianiste sous le régime nazi) . Portrait de la pianiste Elly Ney (1882-1968) et rôle qu'elle joua pour populariser Beethoven lui-même récupéré par la propagande nazie (comme Strauß ou Wagner) . Après des débuts au « Carnegie Hall » et une brillante carrière aux États-Unis, l'interprète se spécialise dans de grandes célébrations théâtralisées en l'honneur de Beethoven, lisant notamment son fameux « Testament de Heiligenstadt » en pré-ambule à ses concerts. Elle fut la seule pianiste allemande de son temps à pouvoir s'affirmer au même niveau que ses collègues hommes (Artur Schnabel, Wilhelm Backhaus, Wilhelm Kempff, ce dernier également complaisant aux Nazis) . Ses enregistrements des œuvres pour piano de Beethoven se sont peu à peu imposées, devenant presque légendaires. Témoins de l'époque et historiens tentent d'expliquer pourquoi antisémite notoire, membre du Parti nazi dès 1937, elle soutint le régime hitlérien et ne dérogea pas de ses convictions jusqu'à sa mort. Ney gagna une quasi réhabilitation en finançant les travaux de réfection de la maison de Beethoven à Bonn, endommagée pendant la Guerre.

Photos, extraits de films et lettres permettent cerner le personnage, tandis qu'une graphologue analyse l'écriture de la soliste et que une pianiste se penche sur son jeu très particulier, très différent de celui de ses collègues Dame Myra Heß, Annie Fischer et Artur Schnabel notamment. À une époque où les femmes ne sont pas légions sur l'arène musicale, Elly Ney se distingue par son jeu à part et ses accointances discutables avec le régime hitlérien. À chacun de juger.

Pianiste élevée au rang de mythe, Elly Ney (1882-1968) a voué sa vie au culte de Beethoven. Mais celle qui se considérait avant tout comme une musicienne populaire se laissa aussi séduire par l'idéologie nazie et, en particulier, par l'antisémitisme, à l'instar de Leni Riefenstahl ou de Winifred Wagner. Ce documentaire retrace son parcours et s'interroge sur la personnalité complexe de cette artiste légendaire.

Autour de 1900, les compositions de Beethoven passaient pour injouables par des femmes, émanant d'un titan puissant et viril. Puis la pianiste Elly Ney vint et s'identifia (y compris physiquement, avec un regard habité et une volumineuse tignasse) au compositeur. Après des débuts au « Carnegie Hall » et une brillante carrière aux États-Unis, elle préféra célébrer des grand-messes en l'honneur de son idole, lisant notamment lors de ses concerts le fameux « testament de Heiligenstadt » , écrit en 1802 par un Beethoven très déprimé.

Le Testament de Heiligenstadt (« Heiligenstädter Testament ») est une lettre manuscrite de Ludwig van Beethoven à ses frères Kaspar et Johann, écrite le 6 octobre 1802 du Heiligenstadt, où le compositeur avait alors ses quartiers (au

6 de la « Probusgasse », dans la périphérie de Vienne, aujourd'hui le 19^e arrondissement) . Il s'agit d'un document historique, témoignage inestimable dans la vie de Beethoven puisque le musicien y exprimait son désespoir devant sa surdité débutante et la nécessité qui en découlait de s'isoler peu à peu des hommes. Mais Beethoven sortit victorieux de cette crise, résolu à affronter son destin plutôt que de s'abattre : c'était le début de la période « Héroïque » qui allait durer jusqu'en 1808 et l'apothéose de la 5^e Symphonie.

Écrite dans une période de profonde crise morale de Beethoven, alors que le compositeur achevait sa 2^e Symphonie, cette lettre ne fut jamais envoyée et fut retrouvée par Anton Schindler et Stephan von Breuning dans un tiroir secret de l'armoire de Beethoven, quelques jours après sa mort en mars 1827, aux côtés de la « Lettre à l'immortelle Bien-aimée » .

Le Testament de Heiligenstadt (octobre 1802)

« Pour mes frères Carl et Johann Beethoven,

Ô vous ! hommes qui me tenez pour haineux, obstiné, ou qui me dites misanthrope, comme vous vous méprenez sur moi. Vous ignorez la cause secrète de ce qui vous semble ainsi, mon cœur et mon caractère inclinaient dès l'enfance au tendre sentiment de la bienveillance, même l'accomplissement de grandes actions, j'y ai toujours été disposé, mais considérez seulement que depuis 6 ans un état déplorable m'infeste, aggravé par des médecins insensés, et trompé d'année en année dans son espoir d'amélioration. Finalement condamné à la perspective d'un mal durable (dont la guérison peut durer des années ou même être tout à fait impossible) , alors que j'étais né avec un tempérament fougueux, plein de vie, prédisposé même aux distractions offertes par la société, j'ai dû tôt m'isoler, mener ma vie dans la solitude, et si j'essayais bien parfois de mettre tout cela de côté, oh ! comme alors j'étais ramené durement à la triste expérience renouvelée de mon ouïe défaillante, et certes je ne pouvais me résigner à dire aux hommes : parlez plus fort, criez, car je suis sourd, ah ! comment aurait été-t-il possible que j'avoue alors la faiblesse d'un sens qui, chez moi, devait être poussé jusqu'à un degré de perfection plus grand que chez tous les autres, un sens que je possédais autrefois dans sa plus grande perfection, dans une perfection que certainement peu de mon espèce ont jamais connue - oh ! je ne le peux toujours pas, pardonnez-moi, si vous me voyez battre en retraite là-même où j'aurais bien aimé me joindre à vous. Et mon malheur m'afflige doublement, car je dois rester méconnu, je n'ai pas le droit au repos dans la société humaine, aux conversations délicates, aux épanchements réciproques ; presque absolument seul, ce n'est que lorsque la plus haute nécessité l'exige qu'il m'est permis de me mêler aux autres hommes, je dois vivre comme un exilé, à l'approche de toute société une peur sans pareille m'assaille, parce que je crains d'être mis en danger, de laisser remarquer mon état - c'est ainsi que j'ai vécu les 6 derniers mois, passés à la campagne sur les conseils avisés de mon médecin pour ménager autant que possible mon ouïe ; il a presque prévenu mes dispositions actuelles, quoique, parfois poussé par un instinct social, je me sois laissé séduire. Mais quelle humiliation lorsque quelqu'un près de moi entendait une flûte au loin et que je n'entendais rien, ou lorsque quelqu'un entendait le berger chanter et que je n'entendais rien non plus ; de tels événements m'ont poussé jusqu'au bord du désespoir, il s'en fallut de peu que je ne misse fin à mes jours. C'est l'art et seulement lui, qui m'a retenu, ah ! il me semblait impossible de quitter le monde avant d'avoir fait naître tout ce pour quoi je me sentais disposé, et c'est ainsi que j'ai mené cette vie misérable - vraiment misérable ; un corps si irritable, qu'un changement un peu rapide peut me faire passer de l'euphorie au désespoir le plus complet - patience, voilà tout, c'est elle seulement que je dois choisir pour guide, je l'ai fait - durablement j'espère, ce doit être ma résolution, persévérer, jusqu'à ce que l'impitoyable Parque décide de rompre le fil, peut-être que cela ira mieux, peut-être non, je suis tranquille - être forcé de devenir philosophe déjà à 28 ans, ce n'est pas facile, et pour l'artiste plus difficile encore que pour quiconque - Dieu, tu vois de là-haut mon cœur ; tu le connais, tu sais que l'amour des hommes et un penchant à faire le bien y habitent, - ô hommes ! lorsqu'un jour vous lirez ceci, songez que vous vous êtes mépris sur moi ; et que le malheureux se console d'avoir trouvé un semblable, qui malgré tous les obstacles de la nature, a pourtant fait tout ce dont il était capable pour être admis au rang des artistes et des hommes de valeur - vous, mes frères Carl et Johann, dès que je serai mort et si le Professeur Schmidt vit encore, priez-le en mon nom de décrire ma maladie, et joignez son récit à cette présente feuille, afin qu'au moins le monde se réconcilie autant que possible avec moi après ma mort - en même temps, je vous déclare ici tous 2 héritiers de ma petite fortune (si l'on peut l'appeler ainsi) , partagez-la loyalement, et supportez-vous et aidez-vous l'un l'autre, tout ce que vous avez fait qui me répugnait, vous le savez, vous a été pardonné depuis longtemps, toi frère Carl, je te remercie encore particulièrement pour l'attachement que tu m'as témoigné ces tout derniers temps, je vous souhaite une vie meilleure et moins soucieuse que la mienne, recommandez à vos enfants la vertu, elle seule peut rendre heureux, pas l'argent, je parle par expérience, c'est elle qui même dans la misère m'a élevé, je la remercie autant que mon art, pour m'avoir fait éviter le suicide - adieu et aimez-vous, - je remercie tous mes amis, en particulier le Prince Lichnowski et le Professeur Schmidt. - Je souhaite, si vous le voulez bien, que les instruments du Prince L.(ichnowsky) soient conservés par l'un de vous, mais qu'il ne s'élève à cause de cela aucune dispute entre vous, dès qu'ils pourront vous être utiles, vendez-les tout simplement, comme je serais heureux de pouvoir encore vous rendre service sous la tombe - s'il en va ainsi, c'est avec joie que je m'empresse vers la mort - mais si elle vient avant que je n'aie eu l'occasion de faire éclore toutes mes facultés artistiques, alors, malgré ma rude destinée, elle vient encore trop tôt, et je la souhaiterais volontiers plus tardive - pourtant, ne serais-je pas alors aussi content, ne me délivrerait-elle pas d'une souffrance infinie ? - viens quand tu veux, je vais courageusement vers toi - adieu et ne m'oubliez pas tout à fait une fois mort, j'ai mérité cela de vous, parce que j'ai souvent, dans ma vie, pensé à vous rendre heureux, soyez-le -

Ludwig van Beethoven, Heiligenstadt, le 6 octobre 1802. »

Beethoven an seine Brüder Kaspar Karl und Nikolaus Johann van Beethoven (« Heiligenstädter Testament »)
Heiligenstadt, 6. und 10. Oktober 1802

« O ihr Menschen die ihr mich für Feindseelig störisch oder Misanthropisch haltet oder erkläret, wie unrecht thut ihr mir, ihr wißt nicht die geheime ursache von dem, was euch so scheint, mein Herz und mein Sinn waren von Kindheit an für das zarte Gefühl des Wohlwollens, selbst große Handlungen zu verrichten dazu war ich immer aufgelegt, aber bedenket nur daß seit 6 Jahren ein heilloser Zustand mich befallen, durch unvernünftige Ärzte verschlimmert, von Jahr zu Jahr in der Hofnung gebeßert zu werden, betrogen, endlich zu dem überblick eines daurenden Übels das (deßen Heilung vielleicht Jahre dauren oder gar unmöglich ist) gezwungen, mit einem feurigen Lebhaften Temperamente gebohren selbst empfänglich für die Zerstreungen der Gesellschaft, muste ich früh mich absondern, einsam mein Leben zubringen, wollte ich auch zuweilen mich einmal über alles das hinaussetzen, o wie hart wurde ich durch die verdoppelte traurige Erfahrung meines schlechten Gehör's dann zurückgestoßen, und doch war's mir noch nicht möglich

den Menschen zu sagen : sprecht lauter, schreyt, denn ich bin Taub, ach wie wär es möglich daß ich da die Schwäche eines Sinnes angeben sollte, der bey mir in einem Vollkommenern Grade als bey andern seyn sollte, einen Sinn denn ich einst in der grösten Vollkommenheit besaß, in einer Vollkommenheit, wie ihn wenige von meinem Fache gewiß haben noch gehabt haben - o ich kann es nicht, drum verzeiht, wenn ihr mich da zurückweichen sehen werdet, wo ich mich gerne unter euch mischte, doppelt Wehe thut mir mein unglück, indem ich dabey verkannt werden muß, für mich darf Erholung in Menschlicher Gesellschaft, feinere unterredungen, Wechselseitige Ergießungen nicht statt haben, ganz allein fast nur so viel als es die höchste Nothwendigkeit fodert, darf ich mich in Gesellschaft einlassen, wie ein Verbannter muß ich leben, nahe ich mich einer Gesellschaft, so überfällt mich eine heiße Ängstlichkeit, indem ich befürchte in Gefahr gesetzt zu werden, meinen Zustand merken zu laßen - so war es denn auch dieses halbe Jahr, was ich auf dem Lande zubrachte, von meinem Vernünftigen Arzte aufgefordert, so viel als möglich mein Gehör zu schonen, kamm er mir fast meiner jezigen natürlichen Dispozition entgegen, obschon, Vom Triebe zur Gesellschaft manchmal hingerißen, ich mich dazu verleiten ließ, aber welche Demüthigung wenn jemand neben mir stund und von weitem eine Flöte hörte und ich nichts hörte, oder jemand den Hirten Singen hörte, und ich auch nichts hörte, solche Ereignisse brachten mich nahe an Verzweiflung, es fehlte wenig, und ich endigte selbst mein Leben - nur sie die Kunst, sie hielt mich zurück, ach es dünkte mir unmöglich, die Welt eher zu verlaßen, bis ich das alles hervorgebracht, wozu ich mich aufgelegt fühlte, und so fristete ich dieses elende Leben - wahrhaft elend, einen so reizbaren Körper, daß eine etwas schnelle Veränderung mich aus dem Besten Zustande in den schlechtesten versezen kann - Geduld - so heist es, Sie muß ich nun zur führerin wählen, ich habe es - daurend hoffe ich, soll mein Entschluß seyn, auszuharren, bis es den unerbittlichen Parzen gefällt, den Faden zu brechen, vielleicht geht's besser, vielleicht nicht, ich bin gefaßt - schon in meinem 28 Jahre gezwungen Philosoph zu werden, es ist nicht leicht, für den Künstler schwerer als für irgend jemand - Gottheit du siehst herab auf mein inneres, du kennst es, du weist, daß menschenliebe und neigung zum Wohlthun drin Hausen, o Menschen, wenn ihr einst dieses leset, so denkt, daß ihr mir unrecht gethan, und der unglückliche, er tröste sich, einen seines gleichen zu finden, der trotz allen Hindernißen der Natur, doch noch alles gethan, was in seinem Vermögen stand, um in die Reihe würdiger Künstler und Menschen aufgenommen zu werden - ihr meine Brüder Carl und Leerraum, sobald ich Tod bin und Professor schmid lebt noch, so bittet ihn in meinem Namen, daß er meine Krankheit beschreibe, und dieses hier geschriebene Blatt füget ihr dieser meiner Krankengeschichte bey, zu damit wenigstens so viel als möglich die Welt nach meinem Tode mit mir versöhnt werde - zugleich erkläre ich euch beyde hier für meine die Erben des kleinen Vermögens, (wenn man es so nennen kann) von mir, theilt es redlich, und vertragt und helft euch einander, was ihr mir zuwider gethan, das wist ihr, war euch schon längst verziehen, dir Bruder Carl danke ich noch in's besondere für deine in dieser leztern spätern Zeit mir bewiesene Anhänglichkeit, Mein Wunsch ist, daß ich euch ein beßers sorgenvolleresloseres Leben, als mir, werde, emphelt euren nach Kindern Tugend, sie nur allein kann glücklich machen, nicht Geld, ich spreche aus Erfahrung, sie war es, die mich selbst im Elende gehoben, ihr Danke ich nebst meiner Kunst, daß ich durch keinen selbstmord mein Leben endigte - lebt wohl und liebt euch ; - allen Freunden danke ich, besonders fürst Lichnovski und Professor schmidt - die Instrumente von fürst L.(ichnowsky) wünsche ich, daß sie doch mögen aufbewahrt werden bey einem von euch, doch entstehe deswegen kein Streit unter euch, sobald sie euch aber zu was nüzlichem dienen können, so verkauft sie nur, wie froh bin ich, wenn ich auch noch unter meinem Grabe euch nützen kann - so wär's geschehen - mit freuden eil ich dem Tode entgegen - kömmt er früher als ich Gelegenheit gehabt habe, noch alle meine Kunst-Fähigkeiten zu entfalten, so wird er mir trotz meinem Harten Schicksaal doch noch zu frühe kommen, und ich würde ihn wohl später wünschen - doch auch dann bin ich zufrieden, befreyt er mich nicht von einem endlosen Leidenden Zustande ? - Komm, wann du willst, ich gehe dir muthig entgegen - lebt wohl und Vergeßt mich nicht ganz im Tode, ich habe es um euch verdient, indem ich in meinem Leben oft an euch gedacht, euch glücklich zu machen, sey es -

« Heiligenstadt » Testament House on Probusgasse 6, in Vienna's 19th district

Beethoven wrote his « Heiligenstadt Testament » in this house. In fact, it was a letter to his brothers that he never posted. It was written in desperation as, at the age of just 32 and in the middle of writing his Symphony No. 2, Beethoven realized that his deafness was incurable. Despite all the misery and physical and mental anguish he suffered, Beethoven continued for another 25 years writing his great Symphonies and other unique works of music in a world of silence.

À travers photos, extraits de films, lettres et témoignages, ce documentaire retrace son parcours, en s'interrogeant à la fois sur le rôle qu'elle joua pour populariser Beethoven, lui-même récupéré par la propagande nazie, et sur son engagement pour le régime hitlérien. Seule pianiste allemande de son temps à pouvoir s'affirmer au niveau de ses collègues hommes (Artur Schnabel, Wilhelm Backhaus et Wilhelm Kempff) , elle a laissé des enregistrements légendaires des œuvres pour piano de Beethoven, tant son jeu singulier différait de celui de ses contemporains.

La pianiste allemande Elly Ney est née le 27 septembre 1882 à Düsseldorf et est morte le 31 mars 1968 à Tutzing. Après avoir passé ses années d'enfance à Düsseldorf, en compagnie de son père, Jakobus Ney, militaire de carrière, et de sa mère, Anna Ney, professeur de musique.

À l'âge de 10 ans, la jeune pianiste est prise en classes de Maître au Conservatoire de Cologne. C'est 9ans plus tard qu'elle reçoit le Prix Mendelssohn de la ville de Berlin, juste 1 an avant de recevoir le Prix Ibach, décerné par la ville de Cologne.

À partir de 1904, elle devient professeur de la classe de Maître de Cologne pour 1 année. Son 1er enregistrement connu est certainement celui des « 13 pièces pour piano » (« dreizehn Klavierstücke ») aux Éditions Welte-Mignon, datant du 9 février 1906. Elle donne aussi des concerts de la musique de Beethoven et dirige les élèves de Bonn.

Elle se marie en 1911 avec le chef d'orchestre et violoniste néerlandais Willem van Hoogstraten. Le couple vit tout d'abord à Bad Schlangenbad et, plus tard, à Bonn. Au début de la Première Guerre mondiale, Hoogstraaten perd sa nomination en tant que Maître de Chapelle de Bad Honnef. Ils fondent ensemble, avec le violoncelliste Fritz Otto Reitz, « Le Trio Elly Ney » (« Das Elly-Ney-Trio ») et donnent des concerts en Allemagne, en Suisse et aux Pays-Bas.

Le couple a une fille, en 1918, Eleonore van Hoogstraten, qui deviendra plus tard actrice.

Elly Ney est élue membre honoraire de la « Beethoven-Haus » de Bonn, en 1921.

Membre du Parti nazi, qu'elle rejoint en 1937, elle affichait ses vues antisémites. Elle fut bannie un certain temps après la guerre, mais se « réhabilita » , notamment en aidant aux réparations de la maison natale de Beethoven, endommagée pendant le conflit.

Elle réalisa, sur la fin de sa vie, des enregistrements prodigieux et très originaux, surtout de Beethoven, mais aussi les grands Maîtres germaniques, comme Mozart, Schubert et Mendelssohn.

The German romantic pianist Elly Ney was born on 27 September 1882 in Düsseldorf and died on 31 March 1968 in Tutzing. She specialized in Beethoven, and was especially popular in Germany.

In Düsseldorf, her mother was a music instructor and her father was a registrar. Her grandmother introduced her to the works of Beethoven, and supported her piano playing. She studied at Cologne with Isidor Seiß and Karl Bötcher. After winning the Mendelssohn Scholarship, in 1901, she studied in Vienna with Theodor Leschetizky and Emil von Sauer. She taught at the Cologne Conservatory for 3 years, then became a touring virtuoso. In 1927, she was given the honorary freedom of Beethoven's birthplace Bonn. In 1932, she founded the Elly Ney Trio with Wilhelm Stroß (violin) and Ludwig Hoelscher (cello) : in quintets, the group recorded with Florizel von Reuter (violin) and Walter Trampler (viola) . She traveled to many parts of the world, including the United States, playing at Carnegie Hall, in New York.

A pianist with a big-boned approach to the repertory, Elly Ney was as assertive regarding her career as she was in approaching the keyboard. Deciding that teaching was too confining, she determined to have an important career and pursued the means to achieve it. In chamber music performance, Ney was just as striking and individual a force as in her solo appearances. A number of recordings document her vigorous dedication to her art. After studying at the Cologne Conservatory with Karl Böttcher and Isidor Seiß, she traveled to Vienna to learn from Emil Sauer and the legendary Theodor Leschetizky. Leschetizky believed that those with slender hands needed to bring more pressure to their touch, in order to achieve a sensuous tone. Without any doubt, this issue was addressed in his work with the young German pianist and the results became an integral part of Ney's sound. At the age of 16, Ney won the Mendelssohn Prize and she also placed 1st in the Ibach competition. After 3 years of teaching at the Cologne Conservatory, Ney decided she preferred performance to life as an instructor and, thereafter, committed herself to concert work. Launching her career in Holland, Ney completed a successful tour of Europe. She became equally appreciated in the United States, where she presented herself as both an orchestral soloist and in recital. Following one of the pianist's early American performances, critic H. E. Krehbiel commented :

« She presses the truism of reposefulness, beautiful symmetry, and varied loveliness of tone upon nearly everything she plays. »

Among Ney's many honours was the Freedom of the City of Bonn, granted to her in 1927. That same year, she played the world-premiere of Ernst Toch's Piano Concerto in Berlin, repeating the work the following year in America with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. In 1932, Ney formed her own Piano Trio with violinist Max Strub and cellist Ludwig Hölscher. In 1937, Adolf Hitler chose to celebrate her birthday by bestowing upon Ney the title of professor. 2 years later, Ney received an invitation to assume direction of piano classes for the planned « Hochschule » at the Salzburg « Mozarteum » . Married to Dutch conductor Willem van Hoogstraaten, in 1911, Ney divorced in 1927 and, subsequently, married Paul Allais of Chicago. She retired after the end of WWII. Ney expressed particular appreciation for the music of Beethoven with Brahms as another favourite. Even in moments of bold display, however, the lessons learned from Teodor Leschetizky remained with her and the tone kept a rounded quality. The evidence of this may be found in her recordings.

BRAHMS : Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major, Opus 83 (recorded on 1, 2 and 5 June 1939 and 29 April 1940, with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and pianist Elly Ney) .

Matrix Nos. : 14704, 14712, 11393, 14744, 11414, 11424, 11433, 11443, 11453, 11464, 14721 and 14734 GS 9. 1st issued on « Grammophon » , 67566 through 67571.

The Brahms 2nd Piano Concerto conducted by Max Fiedler with Elly Ney is a lovely performance, imperturbable but never bland, the music cradled, deposited on a number of Cloud Nines, with a Finale unrivalled perhaps in my experience for its embracing of the grazioso in Brahms' allegretto marking.

Early in the 20th Century, Max Fiedler had earned the reputation in Germany as a Brahms specialist, and it was in that capacity that he made his only commercial records for « Grammophon / Polydor », all of which are presented here.

The B-flat Concerto set has an interesting history. Originally recorded over 3 days, in June of 1939, with 4 takes made for nearly every side, Ney was unhappy with some of the results, and wrote to the conductor in the fall of that year about scheduling a remake session. Fiedler was on tour in Stockholm at the time, and replied that it would have to wait until his return. However, his death there, in December of that year, appeared to doom the project.

Ultimately, « Grammophon » scheduled a session for April of the following year with a « ghost » conductor (who remains unknown, although Alois Melichar has been suggested as a likely suspect) . 5 of the 12 sides were done over, with the original Fiedler-conducted takes remaining on Side 3 of the 1st movement (CD 2, Track 3, 8:41 to 13:11) , all of the 2nd and 3rd movements, and the 1st side of the 4th movement (to 3:18 on Track 6) . As far as I am aware, this is the 1st release to acknowledge the extent of Fiedler's participation.

Multiple sources were assembled for each recording, and the best portions of each were used for transfer. The overture and the 4th Symphony came from laminated American Brunswicks ; the 2nd Symphony mostly from black label 1930's « Polydor » pressings ; and the Concerto from 3 different 1940's « Grammophon » and « Polydor » editions. Even so, some inescapable noise and distortion inherent in the original recordings remain.

The strongest early musical influence on Elly Ney came from her grandmother, who loved the music of Beethoven. When the child was 5, her father retired from the army and took a position on the town council in Bonn and, at the age of 10, Ney was taken to play for Doctor Franz Wüllner, principal of the Cologne Conservatory. He placed her under the tuition of Isidor Seiß himself a pupil of Friedrich Wieck, father of Clara Schumann. After 9 years of study with Seiß, Ney won the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin and decided she wanted to study with Teodor Leschetizky in Vienna, her motivation for this move being the fact that Leschetizky had studied with Carl Czerny who, in turn, had studied with Beethoven. Ney's final teacher was Emil von Sauer, one of Liszt's greatest pupils.

Ney began her successful performing career in 1904, making her Viennese debut 1 year later. She also took-over Seiß's class at the Cologne Conservatory but, after 3 years, abandoned it in favour of performance. Arthur Nikisch and the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra were frequent concert partners, and she also performed chamber music with her Trio comprising cellist Fritz Reitz and violinist Willem van Hoogstraten whom she married in 1911. In 1921, Ney and her husband travelled to the United States, where, until the outbreak of World War II, Ney enjoyed great success. In 1927, Ney was awarded honorary freedom of the city of Bonn, Beethoven's birthplace, and in the 1930's, she formed a new piano Trio with cellist Ludwig Hoelscher and violinist Wilhelm Stroß, later replaced by Max Strub. During World War II, Ney taught at the « Mozarteum » in Salzburg, but because she stayed within the 3rd « Reich » and did not renounce Hitler and his ideals, she came to be seen, like Furtwängler, as a Nazi sympathiser.

Ney's mature style was eminently suited to the music of Beethoven. Nobility, grandeur, and her complete immersion in his works resulted in performances of great profundity ; but the young Ney had a virtuoso repertoire and, in the 1920's, she recorded Liszt, Chopin, Schubert, Debussy, Gottschalk and MacDowell for « Brunswick » Records. However, it is her recordings from the 1930's of Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2, Opus 83 ; Schumann's « Kinderszenen » , Opus 15 ; Schubert's « Wanderer » Fantasy, D. 760 ; Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 15, K. 450 ; and, most of all, the works of Beethoven that are important. Ney's best recording is of Beethoven Piano Sonata, Opus 111, recorded in May 1936. In the « Arietta » , Ney plumbs the depths of Beethoven's musical psyche in a performance of utter concentration that is one of the finest readings of this work on disc. She brings the same attributes to her reading of Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2, Opus 83, with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and Max Fiedler. Most of these recordings, plus Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 15, K. 450, and Richard Strauß's « Burleske » (conducted by her husband, Willem van Hoogstraten) have been re-issued on compact disc.

Later in her career, Ney recorded for the German label « Colosseum » . Between 1960 and 1968, she recorded a large amount of her repertoire which was recently re-issued on 12 compact discs. 7 of the discs are devoted to Beethoven, including the last 3 Concertos with Willem van Hoogstraten, and some Sonatas and shorter pieces. One disc contains recordings made on Beethoven's own piano, an instrument that became too fragile to be used thereafter, but these recordings are only of historical interest. The sound quality varies, and a recording from 1964 of Schubert's « Wanderer » Fantasy has a piano with an unpleasant tone. Other major works include Schumann's « Études symphoniques » , Opus 13 ; 3 Mozart Sonatas ; and a robust Piano Sonata in F minor, Opus 5, by Brahms ; plus a few previously unreleased items. Good as it is to hear Ney in this varying repertoire, she was already in her late- 70's when she began this series of recordings, and 86 by its end. The 1968 recording of Beethoven's last Piano Sonata, Opus 111, may have a lifetime of experience behind it, but it is in Ney's recordings from the 1930's that she really makes her mark.

During the 3rd « Reich » , she voluntarily joined the Nazi Party in 1937, participated in « cultural education » camps, and became an honorary member of the League of German Girls. She held anti-Semite views. Ney was awarded the War Merit Cross, 2nd Class for care for troops. After the War, the city of Bonn imposed a stage ban on her. In 1952, a request for lifting the ban was rejected, stating that Ney was a « pronounced National-Socialist » . Nevertheless, she was named Honorary Citizen of Tutzing, in 1952. She continued touring until her death, increasingly concentrating on Beethoven's piano works.

A female pianist in the last Century, a Beethoven specialist, did not sit on the broad fence like most of us, but who stood in the gardens on opposite sides with utter conviction and determination. Elly Ney (1882-1968) wrote adoring letters to « mein Führer » . According to the pianist Edward Kilenyi, who was a captain in the U.S. Army at the time, she would read extracts of Hitler's writings and soldiers' letters from the concert stage ; and, in Salzburg, where she taught during the War, she used to honour Beethoven's bust with a Nazi salute. During the War, Ney taught at the « Mozarteum » in Salzburg, but because she stayed within the 3rd « Reich » and did not renounce Hitler and his ideals, she came to be seen, like Furtwängler, as a Nazi sympathiser. Her career, which had flourished in the earlier years of the 20th Century, never recovered. The mayor of Tutzing, the small Bavarian town where she died, removed her portrait from the Town Hall.

Elly Ney was strongly in favour of National-Socialism and held anti-Semitic views. In 1937, Adolf Hitler gave her the title of professor as a birthday gift. During the War, she was a teacher at the « Mozarteum » in Salzburg and she was a member of several Nazi organizations.

The Nazi era had damaged her reputation and, only in 1952, she was able to resume her career. Until old age, she played with technical brilliance and did tours and recordings. She was most famous for her interpretations of Beethoven and Brahms.

Elly Ney, a charismatic, leonine performer whose Beethoven captivated European audiences, spent the Nazi years yearning for an opportunity to give a private recital for the « Führer » , an honour ultimately granted to Wilhelm Backhaus, whom she deeply envied thereafter. Ney was obliged to find fulfillment in Hitler's handshake, an encounter that she later described as her life's apogee. Her commitment to National-Socialism barely faltered after the War, and it is this, and her sustained anti-Semitism, that makes her case so particularly compelling. Although Ney ultimately renounced Hitler (in 1952 !) , declaring that the « Nazis had betrayed Germany » , her true allegiance remained constant, even as her touring career gradually petered-out. It is more than a little depressing to note that her biography skips over her devotion and sterling service to the 3rd « Reich » - a dedication so enthusiastic that she regularly preceded her concerts with a devotional peroration on the glories of National-Socialism.

50 years ago, a white haired woman stood on a stage in Bad Godesberg, a small-town south of Germany's « Cold War » capital, Bonn. She stood for 20 minutes as the crowd stomped and applauded her performance of a series of Beethoven pieces on the piano.

The pianist, Elly Ney, was one of Germany's most talented during the 3rd « Reich » . But her political loyalties and actions caused her to be banned from ever playing again in the birth city of her beloved Beethoven, Bonn. Of her exile she said :

« I will never go back to Bonn. I prefer to play in a prison since the people there are not so demanding. »

As talented as she was, the Bonn city council could not tolerate Elly Ney's Nazi past - and would not allow her to publicly play any piano within city boundaries.

In the 1930's, Elly Ney was noted among German musicians for her enthusiastic anti-Semitism. She considered, for example, the work of Richard Strauss's librettist, Stefan Zweig to be « ugly, Jewish-demonic » . Jazz to Elly Ney, was also dangerous due to its racially « impure » qualities.

In 1933, Ney refused to perform in Hamburg after she was asked to replace a Jewish pianist, Rudolf Serkin. For her, replacing a Jew was unbearable.

A devout member of the Nazi Party, the pianist supported Adolf Hitler's efforts to remove Jews from important posts including the cultural sector and was pleased when Jewish musicians were no longer allowed to perform in Hitler's Germany.

The section of Nazi musicians would be incomplete without a discussion of 2 women, Li Stadelmann and Elly Ney. Both were keyboard artists (as were most German female instrumentalists) , and befitting the regime's character as a male-supremacist society, they were without any Party, State, or other institutional office. Yet, they were confirmed National-Socialists nonetheless, and they had an impact on the musical life of the nation.

In both cases, these women's National-Socialist beliefs were driven by genuine anti-Semitism, stemming from what they regarded as bitter experiences in pre-regime days. Li Stadelmann was a Munich-based harpsichordist specializing in Baroque music, especially that of Bach. Even in the 1920's, she was sufficiently accomplished to be invited to concert engagements abroad. In 1929, while on a tour of West Prussia (which then belonged to Poland) , she had played with the violinist Andreas Weisgerber, a Jew. Stadelmann reacted angrily when Weisgerber's sensitive interpretation of the Classical German composers was enthusiastically accepted by their audiences. In 1933, she hailed the coming of Adolf Hitler, rejoicing that « our German Masters will find German interpreters » . She immediately joined the Nazi Party and, subsequently, at least 3 additional Nazi organizations. After the Munich « Bach-Verein » was usurped by the « Kampfbund » to cleanse it of « Jewish influence », church-music recitals relied heavily on Stadelmann. The harpsichordist continued to make her name as one of the most sought after chamber musicians of the Nazi period.

Elly Ney's case is much more significant because she was both a greater artist and a more fanatical National-Socialist. Born in 1882, in Düsseldorf, the daughter of an active Imperial army sergeant and a music teacher, she was a child prodigy, giving public concerts as a teenager and touring the United States extensively from 1921. By 1930, she had performed as a piano soloist in all the larger cities of the union and in many other countries as well. Most probably her intense nationalism derived from the narrow-mindedness of her « petit bourgeois » military home, which appears to have rendered her entirely xenophobic. When, as a 10 year old, she trained under the Jewish Cologne Conservatory piano teacher Isidor Seiß, she immediately took a dislike to him because of his « racially alien » qualities. As she later recalled, she made-up for this unpleasant experience by spending more time in the choir of conservatory director Franz Wüllner, a Gentile. During her concert tours, she was keen to propagate German values abroad, as in the United States, where she fancied herself fighting for « spiritual ideals and for German music » and, in Switzerland, where she had German poems recited before her concerts. Characteristically, she was skeptical of the newer composers such as Arnold Schönberg and Ernst Toch, but deeply appreciated the German-rooted Hans Pfitzner, with whom she shared a general suspicion of Jews.

Even before 1933, Elly Ney had developed a personal idealism that was not without its eccentricities. Like Hitler, she was a fervent vegetarian ; she valued special herbs and juices and explored the spiritual powers of hydrotherapy !

From a history of the Eden vegetarian colony, founded in 1893, north of Berlin :

« Eden got support from artists like the conductor Karl Klindworth, the pianist Elly Ney and the sculptor Wilhelm Groß. » (It is not clear when Elly Ney was giving this support.)

16th World Vegetarian Congress (1960) in Hannover and Hamburg :

« Later in the evening, The Animal Protection Society gave a concert with the famous professor Elly Ney. Now 82 years of age, giving a wonderful piano recital of Bach, Schubert and Beethoven. Vladimir Ruzdak (baritone) and Gisela Litz (mezzo-soprano) charmed the audience with their singing. »

Quote from Elly Ney (unknown date) :

« Vegetarianism has been a concern of mine for decades, and I think it is the natural way of living for people. It is incomprehensible to me that not every animal friend is at the same time a vegetarian. »

(« Der Vegetarismus ist mir seit Jahrzehnten ein inneres Anliegen, und ich halte ihn für die naturgemäße Lebensweise des Menschen. Es ist mir unbegreiflich, daß nicht jeder Tierfreund zugleich Vegetarier ist. »)

She subscribed to a sort of humanitarian ethics, which her admirers today interpret as having been universal, but upon closer examination turns-out to have applied only to racially pure and patriotic Germans - in a word, to fellow Nazis. Indeed, within the 3rd « Reich » , she was altruistic to the point of self-sacrifice, performing virtually free of charge for young German audiences ; but they tended to be members of the Hitler Youth. On those occasions, when she played for blue-collar audiences, it was for workers in the German Labor Front of Robert Ley ; and when she entertained soldiers, they frequently included the Waffen-SS. Her chosen medium was Beethoven, whose compositions she interpreted impressively, and after whom she styled herself physically, displaying that same heroic facial expression and that well-known untamed mane. Beethoven, of course, was in vogue in the 3rd « Reich » ; he stood for the heroic spirit with which Hitler himself identified. Ney came to enjoy the appellation of high-priestess that music-critics bestowed upon her, for the aura of the quasi-divine was very much to her taste. Nor does she seem to have minded the translation of that concept from an originally Christian setting to a neo-Pagan Germanic one.

With her exuberant talent and thoroughly professional background, Ney would have flourished no matter what political regime she found herself in ; indeed, the distinguished Trio that she headed, along with cellist Ludwig Hølscher and violinist Wilhelm Ströb (later, Max Strub) , had been founded in the final phase of the Weimar Republic. But, given her personal and political predilections, she was fated to do particularly well in the 3rd « Reich » , to the point where many regarded her as the prototypical National-Socialist musician. For her own commercial benefit, she exploited the national Beethoven-mania for all it was worth, performing the Master's works repeatedly in concerts and making many recordings ! And though at least one knowledgeable foreign observer found her approach insensitive, she became something of a Mozart specialist as well, with the help of an adjunct faculty position at Salzburg's famous « Mozarteum » Conservatory.

But Ney's ambition reached beyond the music that was her life. She aimed to become the personal friend of as many Nazi regime leaders as possible, for she regarded them as Germany's true saviours from all the perceived ills besetting it, particularly Judaism. Ney's abiding anti-Semitism is probably unique among the outstanding German musicians of the time. She was obsessed with Jews as firmly as she believed in the curative powers of medicinal herbs. Early on in the regime, she claimed to have realized how insidiously the Jews had oppressed the Gentiles, without using any force at all, and later, once she had read Richard Wagner's treatises on the so-called « Jewish Question » , she became even more convinced. Over time, she came to accept all the vicious prejudices proliferating in Nazi Germany : that a disagreeable interpretation of a Bruckner Symphony could have been the result of Jewish manipulation ; that the writings of Stefan Zweig, Richard Strauss's librettist, were « ugly, Jewish-demonic » ; and so on. She also regarded the art of jazz as racially « degenerate » and « dangerous » , precisely because, technically, it is of such great virtuosity. Not surprisingly, these sentiments influenced her career decisions. As early as spring 1933, when she was asked to perform in Hamburg, in place of the young Jewish pianist Rudolf Serkin (who, then, living in Switzerland, had already been banned) , she regarded this as an insult. In a letter, she claimed that the thought of sitting in for a Jew was distasteful to her and that she could bear it only by concentrating « on the work alone » .

For Ney, Adolf Hitler was the cure to rid Germany of this alleged disease. She welcomed his early attempts to remove Jews from influential positions. « He is proceeding slowly, yet, radically » , she remarked. Of course, she was aware that she, herself, was one of the beneficiaries of such measures. Upon recording Franz Schubert's « Forellenquintett » (Trout Quintet) for « Electrola » , she commented on the absence of « Jewish recordings » with great satisfaction. She was equally delighted that foreign Jewish soloists of the stature of Carl Flesch, Jascha Heifetz, and Vladimir Horowitz had all « played themselves out » .

Ney's tireless public service for the benefit of any conceivable Party organization, especially the Hitler Youth, found a natural complement in her persistent lobbying for the favour of the leaders. With Josef Gæbbels, the chief of the « Reich » Culture Chamber, she does not seem to have had any notable rapport while, at the same time, he appears to have been indifferent to her artistry. In any event, she was interested, 1st and foremost, in the « Führer » . Enthralled by several of Hitler's early broadcast speeches, she was determined to play for him in private, and she was beside herself with envy after learning that her colleague Wilhelm Backhaus had already managed to do so, by May 1933. In the summer of 1936, the pianist, who in her public addresses never neglected an opportunity to praise Hitler, finally enjoyed his vicarious presence when she was seated close to the « Führer's » box at the Bayreuth Festival. Barely 1 year later, Hitler bestowed upon Ney, who had dutifully held a number of Party organization memberships, the honorary title of professor. Finally, in the summer of 1938, she met him during an official dinner, where he shook her hand warmly. Thus encouraged, she asked outright to be allowed to play for him, but again, this came to naught. By the fall of 1939, when War had broken-out, Ney had to resign herself to the fact that « the “ Führer ” is occupied » . All those other Party eminences she communed with (Hinkel, Frick, Heß, Rust, von Schirach) could never quite make-up for this disappointment.

Elly Ney (geboren 27. September 1882 in Düsseldorf ; gestorben 31. März 1968 in Tutzing) war eine deutsche Pianistin, die als Interpretin der Klavier-Werke Ludwig van Beethovens Bedeutung erlangt hat. Die Künstlerin ist wegen ihrer Nähe zum Nationalsozialismus umstritten.

Elly Ney wurde am 27. September 1882 als Tochter des Feldwebels Jakobus Ney und der Musiklehrerin Anna Ney in Düsseldorf geboren. Da ihre Mutter nicht in einer Kaserne leben wollte, wechselte der Vater in eine Beamtenstelle nach Bonn. Ihre Kindheit und Jugend war geprägt von einem militaristischen und musischen Elternhaus ; der Historiker Michæl Kater nennt ihre Erziehung xenophob.

Sie war unter anderem Schülerin von Franz Wüllner und Isidor Seiß sowie von Teodor Leszetycki und Emil von Sauer. Als 10-jährige wurde sie in die Meisterklasse des Kölner Konservatoriums aufgenommen. Als 19-jährige gewann Elly Ney den « Mendelssohn-Preis » der Stadt Berlin, mit 20 Jahren erhielt sie in Köln den « Ibach-Preis » .

Ab 1904 war sie selbst für einige Jahre Lehrerin der Kölner Meisterklasse. Am 9. Februar 1906 nahm sie dreizehn Klavierstücke für das Reproduktionsklavier Welte-Mignon auf, sicherlich die ältesten von ihr überkommenen Aufnahmen. Sie gab Konzerte und Einführungen in die Musik Beethovens für Bonner Schüler.

1911 heiratete sie den niederländischen Dirigenten und Violinisten Willem van Hoogstraten. Das Paar lebte zunächst in Schlangenbad und später in Bonn. Nach dem Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkriegs verlor Hoogstraten seine Stellung als Kurkapellmeister in Honnef. Zusammen mit dem Cellisten Fritz Otto Reitz gründete das Paar das Elly-Ney-Trio und gab in Deutschland, der Schweiz und in den Niederlanden Konzerte. 1918 bekam das Ehepaar eine Tochter, die spätere Schauspielerin Eleonore van Hoogstraten.

Von 1921 an lebte Elly Ney zeitweise in den USA und entwickelte sich zur Spezialistin für Beethoven und Brahms. Zahlreiche Berichte der « New York Times » aus den 1920er Jahren besprechen ihre Konzerte in Spielorten wie der « Carnegie Hall » in New York. Bei ihrem Debüt-Konzert in den USA am 15. Oktober 1921 spielte sie nur Beethoven, im zweiten Konzert Brahms, Schubert und Chopin. Hoogstraten leitete mehrere Orchester und wurde 1925 Musikdirektor des Oregon Symphonie Orchesters. Mit Orchestern unter Hoogstratens Leitung gastierte Ney als Solistin in fast allen großen Städten der USA. Auch als Solo-Künstlerin wurde sie für Konzerte überall in den USA engagiert ; zum Beispiel trat sie im Rahmen einer Freiluftkonzertreihe Symphonies under the Stars 1929 in Hollywood auf. In den USA entstanden in den 1920er Jahren ihre ersten Plattenaufnahmen. 1928 heiratete sie in zweiter Ehe den Kohlewerkdirektor Paul Allais (1895-1990) aus Chicago, der ihr zuvor einige Jahre bei ihren Konzerten in den USA nachreiste. Diese Ehe hatte nur kurz Bestand. Obwohl nicht mehr verheiratet, lebte Ney mit ihrem ersten Mann Hoogstraten danach weiter in einer Lebensgemeinschaft und feierte 1961 mit ihm Goldene Hochzeit ; beide haben ein gemeinsames Grab in Tutzing.

Auch in Deutschland blieb Elly Ney in den 1920er Jahren weiter aktiv. Für ihren Beitrag zum besonders glanzvollen Gelingen des Beethovenfestes 1927 und für ihre internationale Karriere, die auch ihrer Heimatstadt Bonn zu Ansehen verhalf, wurde ihr im selben Jahr die Ehrenbürgerschaft der Stadt Bonn zugesprochen.

Ab 1930 verlagerte sie ihren künstlerischen Wirkungskreis wieder nach Europa. Mit dem Geiger Wilhelm Stroß und dem Cellisten Ludwig Hoelscher gründete sie 1932 erneut ein Elly-Ney-Trio, welches in verschiedenen Ländern erfolgreiche Auftritte absolvierte.

1933 beantragte Ney, die nach Heirat mit einem Amerikaner und Scheidung staatenlos war, die Wiedereinbürgerung. Angesichts der prominenten Antragstellerin wurde vom zuständigen Beamten die Frage, ob « die Antragstellerin in nationaler Hinsicht als wertvoller Bevölkerungszuwachs anzuerkennen sei » , positiv beantwortet. Sie sei als Künstlerin im deutschen Sinne tätig gewesen, wenngleich ihre Heirat mit einem Amerikaner an sich gegen eine gute deutsche Gesinnung spräche, so der Beurteiler der Stadt Bonn über deren Ehrenbürgerin.

1933 begeisterte sich Elly Ney für Adolf Hitler und wandte sich dem Nationalsozialismus zu. In einem Brief an Willem van Hoogstraten vom März 1933 schrieb sie :

« Eben hörte Hitler 45 Minuten sprechen. Bin tief erschüttert. Eine ungeheure Gewalt. Lies die Rede ! Das ist Wahrheit einer tief empfindenden und entflamten Menschenseele. Hitler sprach mir aus der Seele über die Kunst. Endlich wird es ausgesprochen und wird die Bahn frei. »

Am 20. April 1937 wurde sie von Hitler zur Professorin ernannt, am 1. Mai 1937 wurde sie Mitglied der NSDAP (Nr. 6.088.559) . Für ihre Mitarbeit bei den Olympischen Spielen 1936 verlieh Hitler ihr 1937 eine Erinnerungsmedaille. Ney war Mitglied weiterer nationalsozialistischer Organisationen, unter anderem Ehrenmitglied im Bund Deutscher Mädel (BDM), und hielt Reden an die Jugend, in denen sie Beethoven und die « nordische Musik » im Geist des Nationalsozialismus deutete. Im Zweiten Weltkrieg, in der Zeit des Generalgouvernements Polen gastierte Elly Ney 1941 auch in Krakau, wo damals die « Philharmonie des Generalgouvernements » eingerichtet war. Ihre missionarische Musikauffassung bewies sie 1942 in Görlitz, wo sie die zweite Aufführung von Carl Orffs Carmina Burana unter Protest verließ, das Werk als « Kulturschande » bezeichnete und ein lokales Aufführungsverbot erreichte. Ney spielte im Verlauf des Kriegs zunehmend Konzerte in Lazaretten und Krankenhäusern. 1943 erhielt sie das Kriegsverdienstkreuz 2. Klasse für Truppenbetreuung. 1944, in der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde sie von Hitler in die Gottbegnadetenliste der unersetzlichen Künstler aufgenommen. In der Anfangsphase der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus gab sie zahlreiche kostenfreie Konzerte für Organisationen der NSDAP und beschwerte sich beim Reichspropagandaministerium über zu wenige staatliche Aufträge als Honorarkünstlerin. Später wurde sie offenkundig häufiger bezahlt, denn für 1943 meldete sie zirka 190.000 Reichsmark Einnahmen.

Elly Ney hatte Talent, eine solide Musikausbildung und erlangte zweifelsfrei bereits vor der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus Anerkennung und Ruhm; ihre Karriere wäre in jedem System erfolgreich weiter verlaufen. Einer Interpretin von ihrem Rang wäre mit hoher Wahrscheinlichkeit auch unter anderen politischen Verhältnissen ein Lehrauftrag und ein Professorentitel angedient worden. Die Bedeutung der Musik Beethovens für den Nationalsozialismus und die Rassegesetze von 1936, die unter anderem Juden die Aufführung der Werke Beethovens untersagten, förderten ihre Karriere in den 1930er Jahren jedoch nachhaltig.

Elly Ney hatte in den 1920er und 1930er Jahren maßgeblichen Anteil an der Gestaltung und Entwicklung der Beethovenfesttage in Bonn. Sie war mit dem Elly-Ney-Trio und als Solistin die dominante Musikerin dieser Musikereignisse. Wegen ihrer nationalsozialistischen Verstrickung wurde sie von der Stadt Bonn jedoch in der Nachkriegszeit bis 1952 mit einem Auftrittsverbot belegt.

Trotz ihrer nationalsozialistischen Vergangenheit konnte Elly Ney in den 1950er Jahren eine Alterskarriere beginnen, die bis wenige Wochen vor ihrem Tod andauerte. In Gefängnissen und Flüchtlingslagern gab sie Konzerte. Sie veröffentlichte 1952 eine Autobiographie und spendete für den Neubau der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Nachdem jedoch durch die Presse verbreitet worden war, daß sie dem rechtsextremistischen Deutschen Kulturwerk Europäischen Geistes nahestand, stellte sie ihre Zahlungen ein. In ihrem Nachlaß wurde allerdings ein Sparbuch mit dem Zweck « Spenden für den Wiederaufbau der Beethovenhalle » gefunden, auf welches bis 1959 Spenden eingingen. Der Betrag von circa 75.000 DM wurde 1995 für Renovierungsarbeiten an der Beethovenhalle verwendet. Ebenfalls 1952 erhielt sie die Ehrenbürgerschaft der Gemeinde Tutzing in Bayern aufgrund ihrer Verdienste um die Musik und ihrer musikalischen und kulturellen Aktivitäten an ihrem damaligen Wohnort.

Elly Ney spielte noch im hohen Alter schwierige Werke der Klavierliteratur. Sie unternahm ausgedehnte Tourneen und spielte zwischen ihrem 79. und 86. Lebensjahr einen Großteil ihres Repertoires als Solistin oder unter ihrem Lebenspartner Willem van Hoogstraten als Dirigent des Fränkischen Landesorchesters Nürnberg auf Stereoschallplatten ein. Ebenso machte sie Film- und Fernsehaufnahmen. Am 6. Februar 1965 gab sie im Kanzlerbungalow für Ludwig Erhard und ausgewählte Gäste ein Hauskonzert. Auch andere bedeutende Politiker der Nachkriegszeit wie Theodor Heuß und Kurt Georg Kiesinger besuchten Konzerte von Elly Ney und würdigten ihre Kunst. Im Herbst 1964 nahm sie als Solistin im Alter von 82 Jahren an einer 19-tägigen Tournee des Berliner Symphonischen Orchesters unter Carl August Bunte durch die Bundesrepublik Deutschland teil. Zu ihrem 85. Geburtstag gab die Stadt Bonn einen Empfang, an dem auch der damalige Bundespräsident Heinrich Lübke teilnahm.

Elly Ney war Klavierlehrerin renommierter Musiker wie zum Beispiel von Franz Hummel.

Sie starb 1968 im 86. Lebensjahr in Tutzing und wurde dort neben ihrem 1965 verstorbenen Ex-Ehemann und Lebenspartner Willem van Hoogstraten beerdigt. Der damalige Oberbürgermeister von Bonn, Wilhelm Daniels, hielt eine Trauerrede.

Bezüglich ihres sogenannten romantischen Klavierspiels, das sich auch bei ihren Zeitgenossen Alfred Cortot oder Edwin Fischer findet und sich vom Klavierspiel späterer Generationen deutlich unterscheidet, schrieb der Musikkritiker Joachim Kaiser : Immer wieder versuchte sie, herauszuholen, worüber blendende Pianisten gern hinwegwollen : die Innigkeit.

Siegfried Mauser, Rektor der Hochschule für Musik und Theater München und Professor für Musikwissenschaften, datiert den Leistungshöhepunkt von Elly Ney auf die 1920er Jahre und bewertet ihre späteren Leistungen als die einer durchschnittlichen Pianistin. Mauser bezeichnet Ney als Vertreterin eines kunst-religiösen Beethoven-Interpretationsstils, der von den Nationalsozialisten ähnlich wie die Musik Wagners für ihre Zwecke missbraucht wurde, was Ney andererseits eine Verlängerung ihrer Karriere ermöglichte. Die Qualität von Neys Musikinterpretationen nach 1930 ist laut Mauser geringer als die von Pianisten wie Artur Schnabel oder Edwin Fischer.

Höheres gibt es nichts, als der Gottheit sich mehr nähern als andere und von hier aus die Strahlen der Gottheit unter das Menschengeschlecht zu verbreiten lautet das Schlusswort von Elly Neys Vortrag Wie ich zu Beethoven kam. Das belegt den religiösen und missionarischen Aspekt ihrer Musikinterpretation.

Bei ihrem ersten Konzert in den USA spielte Elly Ney drei Klaviersonaten von Beethoven, Nr. 29 (Hammerklavier) , Nr. 23 (Apassionata) und Nr. 14 (Mondscheinsonate) sowie Sechs Variationen für Klavier und Andante favori. Die « New York Times » schrieb dazu :

« Madame Ney as a neo-Classicist, is no stickler for the letter of the law, Beethovenian or otherwise, but she had ideas about the music, chosen at risk of monotony and anti-climax, and she created a mood unconventional but not inappropriate to the spiritual titan of sculpturesque sounds whose works rank with Angelo and Rodin. »

« In den Sympathiebekundungen der Ney-Gläubigen wurde diskret darüber hinweggesehen, daß das Spiel der greisen

Pianistin nicht mehr immer sachlicher Kritik standzuhalten vermag, von subjektiver künstlerischer Beurteilung ganz zu schweigen. Diskret ist auch längst Elly Neys pianistischer Großeinsatz im Dritten Reich vergessen. Erfahrene Ney- und Beethoven-Kenner leugnen indes nicht, daß die Altmeisterin mitunter in der Hingabe des Spiels ganze Passagen versehentlich wegläßt. »

(Peter Stähle 1965 in der Zeit.)

(Der Weser-Kurier, 1967.)

(Hans D. Hoffert, zitiert in « Pro Classics » .)

« Hier huldigt eine Grande Dame des Klaviers derart beeindruckend ihren Hausgöttern Beethoven, Mozart und Schubert, daß man geneigt ist, die politischen Verfehlungen ihres Lebens rundheraus gering zu achten. Darin liegt für kritisch reflektierende Hörer ein Dilemma, das selbst unter weniger gestrengen historischen und moralischen Maßstäben kaum aufzulösen ist. Und dieser Zwiespalt wird eher mit jedem Takt größer - so einzigartig und tief sinnig wirkt dieses Klavierspiel. Fast schon unerklärlich ist diese ungebrochene Gestaltungskraft bei der Beethoven-Platte, die als Glanzstück das gewaltige Adagio aus der " Hammerklaviersonate " enthält. Dies ist eine große, dabei völlig uneitle Kunst, deren Magie man sich kaum entziehen kann. »

(Christine Lemke-Matwey in der Zeit zu einer Neuveröffentlichung von Kammermusik-Aufnahmen im Jahr 2004.)

Am 23. Juni 1935 sagte Elly Ney in ihrer Ansprache zum Auftakt des 5. Volkstümlichen Beethovenfestes in Bonn :

« Wir haben ja das wunderbarste Vorbild an unserem Führer, bei dem jedes Wort und jede Handlung eine Wiedergabe ist von heiligster Überzeugung, von unerschütterlichem Glauben. Diesen Glauben wollen wir doch in uns hüten und stärken, er ist unser Stern, dem wir treu bleiben wollen, er ist unser Quell, aus dem die göttliche Musik unseres Meisters entsprang. Was ist denn klarer, wahrer, echter als die Musik unseres Beethoven ? Gerade diese Musik brauchen wir heute, die Musik des Kämpfers und Siegers für die Kämpfenden und Siegenden. Das ist die Quelle, die im Herzen unseres Volkes als Gottesgabe verborgen liegt, die uns erlöst vom Banne des Feindlichen, Fremden, die uns zur Besinnung führt auf unsere Pflichten für unser Volk, unsere Jugend. »

Nachdem sie am 20. April 1937 von Hitler zur Professorin ernannt worden war, schrieb sie in einem Danktelegramm an Reichskulturwart Hans Hinkel vom Propagandaministerium :

« Es wird weiterhin mein heißes Bestreben sein, unserer Jugend die Einheit des gewaltigen Geschehens durch unseren Führer mit den erhabenen Schöpfungen unserer Meister nahezubringen. »

In einem Telegramm an Adolf Hitler vom 17. Dezember 1938 heißt es :

« Mein Führer, nach meinem Berliner Schubert-Abend in der Philharmonie lebte aufs neue mein sehnlichster Wunsch auf, Ihnen, mein Führer, einmal Schubert vorspielen zu dürfen. Seit Jahren war es mein größter Wunsch, meinen innigverehrten Führer an dieser ergreifenden Sprache der Ostmark teilnehmen zu lassen. »

1938 sagte sie in einem Arbeitslager der Reichsjugendführung :

« Die Jugend vertraut ihren Führern bedingungslos, weil diese sich die idealistischen, von Adolf Hitler vorgeschriebenen Ziele zu eigen gemacht haben. »

1940 schrieb sie in einem Brief an das Reichspropagandaministerium über eine Reise in die besetzten Niederlande :

« Es ist mir nicht sehr angenehm, daß ich dort im Hotel Central wohnen muß. Jedoch hoffe ich, daß sich dort keine Juden mehr aufhalten, so wie es früher war. »

Aus privaten Briefen ihres Nachlasses in Bonn ergeben sich zahlreiche weitere Belege ihres Antisemitismus und ihrer Unterstützung der Ideologie des Nationalsozialismus, zum Beispiel teilte sie im Mai 1933 Willem van Hoogstraten in einem Brief mit, daß sie die Bücherverbrennung der Nationalsozialisten befürworte. In einem weiteren Brief zeigte sie sich begeistert von der Entfernung jüdischer Musiker aus staatlich finanzierten Stellen und die Folgen von Boykott-Aufrufen für die Konzerte jüdischer Musiker. Diese seien « ausgespielt », während ihre eigenen Konzerte ausverkauft seien. 1933 empfand es Elly Ney als Zumutung, für Rudolf Serkin in Hamburg einzuspringen, der nach dem Reichstagsbrand am 28. Februar 1933 auf Druck aus Berlin für das Reichs-Brahmsfest in Hamburg eingeladen wurde.

Ihrem Lebenspartner Willem van Hoogstraten teilte sie in einem Brief mit : aber inzwischen erlebe ich doch, wie ohne Gewalttaten aber doch tatsächlich die Christen jahrelang durch die Juden unterdrückt waren. Sympathisch ist es mir nicht, für Serkin in Hamburg zu spielen. Ich leide darunter und kann es nur, wenn ich an das Werk allein denke. Elly Ney spielte auf dem Hamburger Reichs-Brahmsfest an Stelle von Rudolf Serkin. (Rudolf Serkin kannte diese Abneigung vermutlich nicht. Er würdigte Elly Neys Klavierspiel ; die Abendzeitung München, zitierte ihn im Nachruf bei Elly Neys Tod.)

Hinweise auf eine unmittelbare Schädigung anderer Personen durch Elly Ney, etwa durch Denunziation gibt es nicht. Allerdings gibt es auch keine Hinweise, daß sie wie Wilhelm Furtwängler ihre Kooperation mit den Nationalsozialisten nutzte, um für verfolgte Personen einzutreten. Elly Ney hatte persönlichen Umgang mit vielen prominenten Politikern der NSDAP, es ist jedoch nur ein persönliches Zusammentreffen mit Hitler belegt.

Der Historiker Michæl Kater kommt auf Grund der vorliegenden Quellen zu dem Urteil, daß Ney eine fanatische Nationalsozialistin war und ihr unverbrüchlicher Antisemitismus einmalig unter den herausragenden Musikern jener Zeit. Der Historiker Hans Mommsen zählt Elly Ney zu den Personen, die die Nazi-Diktatur aktiv getragen und moralisch gestützt haben.

Nach Interpretation von Beatrix Borchard setzte Ney das System Beethoven ein, um den Zweiten Weltkrieg als kulturellen Abwehrkampf gegen Klänge und Rhythmen, welche sie wie den Jazz als minderwertig und artgefährlich sah, zu rechtfertigen. Ney zitierte häufig bei Kerzenschein das Heiligenstädter Testament, ehe sie ihr Konzert begann. Nach Berichten der « New York Times » und des Hamburger Abendblatts hat Elly Ney ihre Konzerte mit dem Hitlergruß eröffnet.

Kurt Wolff, ein nach New York emigrierter Jugendfreund von Elly Ney, schrieb an ihren Lebenspartner Willem van Hoogstraten in einem Brief aus dem Jahr 1947, daß er es bei ihrer Leidenschaft und ihrem Temperament sehr gut verstehe, daß sie 1933 auf die « braunen Götter » reingefallen sei. Er fragte aber, wie es sein könne, daß sie 1937 in die Partei eintrat und zwischenzeitlich nicht bemerkte, was vorging.

Der 1952 amtierende Oberbürgermeister von Bonn Peter Maria Busen erklärte, Elly Ney habe ihm bei einem Besuch mündlich mitgeteilt, sie sei den Täuschungen des Nationalsozialismus erlegen wie andere und bedaure das tief und ehrlich. Mit Entsetzen habe sie später die Erkenntnis von dem verderblichen Einfluß des Nationalsozialismus und von seinen Verbrechen gewonnen. Bonn nahm nach dieser Einlassung ein Auftrittsverbot zurück. Zuvor hatte sich im Stadtrat von Bonn mehrfach die Fraktion der FDP für eine Aufhebung des Auftrittsverbots eingesetzt ; eine Fürsprache des Ney-Bewunderers Theodor Heuß wird vermutet.

Wilhelm Hausenstein schrieb in seinen Tagebüchern :

« Es wurde mir glaubwürdig erzählt, daß amerikanische Offiziere nazistische Künstler heranziehen, in privater, aber (bei Offizieren) doch immerhin offiziöser Form. So sei Elly Ney im Wagen zu einem General geholt worden, nach Bad Heilbronn, wenn ich es richtig behalten habe. Sie ist das Exemplar eines ebenso dummen wie talentierten

Künstlertums ; ihr Hitlerismus war die aufgelegte Blödheit (vielleicht mit einiger Hysterie vermischt) und ist, wenn überhaupt, so aus der Blödheit zu einem Teil exculpabel. »

In ihrer Autobiografie ging Elly Ney nicht auf ihre nationalsozialistische Vergangenheit ein, eine öffentliche Erklärung und Distanzierung ist nicht bekannt. Das wird kontrovers als Scham oder Starrsinn beurteilt.

Ehrungen

Josef Weinheber, Hans von Wolzogen, Heinrich Lersch, Agnes Miegel und Ina Seidel widmeten ihr Gedichte.

1927 : Ehrenbürgerin von Bonn.

1937 : Ernennung zum Professor honoris causa durch Hitler.

1937 : Silberne Olympia-Erinnerungsmedaille für den Einsatz bei den Olympischen Spielen 1936 durch Hitler.

1937 : Porträtierung durch den Maler Hans Trimborn.

In den frühen 1940er Jahren erhielt Elly Ney die Beethoven-Medaille der Stadt Bonn.

1943 : Kriegsverdienstkreuz 2. Klasse für Truppenbetreuung.

1943 : Beethovenmedaille, am 17. Oktober mit Karl F. Chudoba.

1944 : Ehrenmitglied der Universität Rostock.

1952 : Ehrenbürgerin von Tutzing.

1967 : Konzert und Empfang durch die Stadt Bonn zum 85. Geburtstag.

Das Zusatzschild « Ehrenbürgerin » wurde entfernt.

Der Text der neuen Tafel erinnert an die nationalsozialistische Vergangenheit der Pianistin. Der Hinweis auf die Ehrenbürgerschaft fehlt.

Die rote Farbe sind Reste einer Beschädigung durch Unbekannte nach der umstrittenen Entscheidung des Tutzinger Gemeinderats, das Denkmal der in den Nationalsozialismus verstrickten Künstlerin nicht zu entfernen.

2008 begann in der Gemeinde Tutzing eine Debatte über die Ehrung von Elly Ney, die bundesweite Aufmerksamkeit erregte. Elly Ney ist Ehrenbürgerin der Gemeinde, ferner ist dort eine Straße nach ihr benannt und ihr wurde ein Denkmal an einer Promenade am Starnberger See gewidmet. Der bei der Kommunalwahl 2008 erstmals gewählte parteifreie Bürgermeister Stephan Wanner ließ ein Bild von Elly Ney im Rathaus entfernen, was die Debatte auslöste. Unter anderem sprach sich die Vorsitzende des Zentralrats der Juden in Deutschland, Charlotte Knobloch, gegen die fortgesetzte Ehrung wegen der unzweifelhaft feststehenden antisemitischen Haltung von Elly Ney aus. Am 25. Januar 2009 veranstaltete die Evangelische Akademie Tutzing eine Podiumsdiskussion zur Ney-Problematik über Erinnerungskultur, die vom Fernsehen des Bayerischen Rundfunks am 31. Januar 2009 gesendet wurde.

Michæl H. Kater, emeritierter Professor für Geschichte an der York-Universität in Toronto und Autor des Fachbuchs Die mißbrauchte Muse. Musiker und Komponisten im Dritten Reich, empfahl in einem Interview mit der Süddeutschen Zeitung deutliche Distanzierung. Er bewertete Ney als « abstoßende Figur der deutschen Musikgeschichte ». Ihr Antisemitismus sei unentschuldig und teilweise schlicht egoistisch durch ihr lästige Konkurrenz jüdischer Musiker motiviert.

Hans Maier, Bayerischer Staatsminister an der Donau und Professor für Geschichte und Politikwissenschaften, hält zur Beurteilung die Frage, ob sich Ney in der Nachkriegszeit vom Nationalsozialismus distanziert hat, für entscheidend. Wenige dazu vorhandene Dokumente werden jedoch kontrovers beurteilt. Maier vertritt die Auffassung, daß geehrte Künstler nicht unbedingt Vorbild-Qualitäten in ihrem gesamten Wirken haben müßen.

Der Gemeinderat von Tutzing beschloß am 9. Februar 2009 gegen den Antrag des parteifreien Bürgermeisters, das Elly-Ney-Denkmal an seinem Platz zu belassen, aber ein Zusatzschild mit einer Information zu ihrer nationalsozialistischen Verstrickung anzubringen. Über die Ehrenbürgerschaft müße man nicht beraten, da diese mit ihrem Tod erloschen sei. Auf diesen juristisch zutreffenden Sachverhalt haben andere Gemeinden in ähnlichen Fällen mit der symbolischen Aberkennung einer historischen Ehrenbürgerschaft reagiert. Von dieser Möglichkeit der posthumen Aberkennung machte der Gemeinderat von Tutzing auf derselben Sitzung vom 9. Februar 2009 im Fall des früheren Münchner Gauleiters und Gründers des Konzentrationslagers Dachau Adolf Wagner Gebrauch, da in seinem Fall ein unterschiedlicher Unrechtsgehalt vorliege, Elly Ney sei hingegen nur « aktive Mitläuferin » gewesen. Die in Vergessenheit geratene historische Ehrenbürgerschaft von Wagner in Tutzing war im Verlauf der Ney-Diskussion bekannt geworden. Das Ehrenggrab von Elly Ney in Tutzing soll weiter auf Kosten der Gemeinde gepflegt werden, der Begriff Ehrenbürger soll aus der Beschriftung des Elly-Ney-Denkmal und der Elly-Ney-Straße entfernt werden. Der Gemeinderat distanzierte sich von den antisemitischen Aussagen von Elly Ney und ihrer Unterstützung des Nationalsozialismus.

Die Entscheidung wurde kritisch kommentiert, so von der Osnabrücker Zeitung als « beschämende Peinlichkeit ». Gerhard Summer schrieb in der Süddeutschen Zeitung :

« Eine distanzierte Ehrung jedenfalls gibt es nicht - entweder man steht zu jemanden oder nicht. »

Die Elly-Ney-Gedenkstatue wurde am 11. Februar 2009 von unbekanntem Tätern beschädigt ; ein Zusammenhang mit der Entscheidung des Tutzing Gemeinderats über das Denkmal wird vermutet.

Die Entscheidung über eine Neubeschriftung des Elly-Ney-Denkmal vertagte der Gemeinderat von Tutzing auf seiner Sitzung vom 16. Juni auf den 7. Juli 2009, da man sich noch nicht auf eine Formulierung einigen konnte. Unter anderem war von dem in Tutzing lebenden Journalisten Heinz Klaus Mertes das Augustinus-Zitat « Bekämpfe den Irrtum, nicht den, der irrt ! » vorgeschlagen worden. Die Gemeinde Tutzing teilte auf ihrer Internetseite im Juli 2009 mit :

« Die Geschichte in ihrer Gesamtheit nicht in Vergessenheit geraten zu lassen und davor zu warnen, sich als Nutznießer von totalitären Systemen vereinnahmen zu lassen, ist Absicht dieser Tafel. »

Der Satz steht so auf der neuen Tafel, wodurch das ehrende Denkmal tendenziell zu einem Mahnmal umdefiniert wird.

2008 wurde zur Erinnerung an den Pianisten Karlobert Kreiten im Rahmen der Beethovenfesttage in Bonn ein von Hans Christian Schmidt-Banse zusammengestelltes « Concerto Recitativo » mit Titel An diesem unglückseligen 3. Mai des Jahres 1943 aufgeführt. Kreiten hat sich im privaten Kreis kritisch zum Nationalsozialismus geäußert und war nach Denunziation hingerichtet worden. Dem wurde in den verlesenen Texten das Verhalten von Elly Ney gegenübergestellt, die sich, ihre Kunst und die Musik Beethovens in den Dienst des Nationalsozialismus gestellt hat.

Elly Ney wurde auch als Reichsklaviergroßmutter, Witwe Beethoven und später als Hitlers Pianistin bezeichnet. Dieses letztere Epitheton ist jedoch missverständlich, da es Ney trotz einiger Versuche nicht gelang, Hitler persönlich vorzuspielen ; ihre Unterstützung bezog sich auf das nationalsozialistische Regime.

Mauricio Kagel ließ in seinem Film Ludwig van eine Elly Ney darstellende Karikatur in einer satirischen Sequenz die Waldstein-Sonate spielen und Beethoven zitieren.

Der amerikanische, in Wien ansässige, renommierte Begleit-Pianist und Puppenspieler Norman Shetler, ein großer Verehrer von Elly Ney, lässt bei seinen Aufführungen eine Puppe namens « Nelly Ey » auftreten, die zu den Klavierklängen von Beethovens 5. Sinfonie mit ganzem Körpereinsatz auf ein kleines Klavier eindrischt.

La vie musicale à Berlin

Au début du XVIIe siècle, Berlin entra dans l'histoire de la musique avec des musiciens tels Johannes Eccard et Nikolaus Zangius, Maîtres de chapelle à la Cour du prince électeur. La musique protestante fut représentée dans la 1re moitié du XVIIe Siècle par Johann Crüger. Pendant la guerre de 30 Ans, l'activité musicale connut un ralentissement comme dans le reste de l'Allemagne. En 1701, Berlin prit rang de résidence royale. C'est sous le règne de Frédéric II (1740-1786) que la ville devint un foyer musical important, les artistes se partageant entre la capitale de la Prusse et le séjour royal de Potsdam. On y rencontre Johann Joachim Quantz, Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, Fanz et Johann Georg Benda, Carl Heinrich et Johann Gottlieb Graun, Johann Friedrich Reichardt, Christoph Nichelmann, Johann Philipp Kirnberger, Friedrich Wilhelm Marpurg et Carl Friedrich Zelter. Les compositeurs de l'École de Berlin se sont illustrés dans les domaines de la Symphonie, de la musique instrumentale, du lied et de l'Opéra. En 1742, fut inauguré l'Opéra royal « Unter den Linden » ou « Hofoper » (Opéra de la Cour) . Berlin était également réputé, à cette époque, comme centre de théorie musicale.

Au XIXe siècle et dans la 1re moitié du XXe siècle régna une activité intense : les Orchestres, les Sociétés chorales, les académies de musique religieuse, les Opéras et les Écoles de musique se multiplièrent, en particulier, de 1800 à 1832, sous l'impulsion de Zelter. La musique orchestrale se développa particulièrement dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle. De nombreuses formations furent créées : la « Musikausübende Gesellschaft » , fondée par Johann Philipp Sack, en 1752, l' « Orchestervereinigung Berliner Musikfreunde » , devenue ensuite le « Berliner Orchesterverein » , le « Königliches Hoforchester » , devenu ensuite la « Staatskapelle » , qui compta parmi ses chefs Félix Weingartner et Richard Strauß, et, enfin, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin qui, fondé en 1882, est considéré depuis plusieurs dizaines d'années comme l'un des meilleurs Orchestres du monde ; il a eu notamment pour chefs : Hans von Bülow (1887-1892) ; Arthur Nikisch (1897-1922) ; Wilhelm Furtwängler (1922-1945 et 1947-1954) ; Sergiù Celibidache (1945-1947) ; et Herbert von Karajan (1954-1989) . Au XXe siècle, sont venus s'ajouter les Orchestres de la radio : « Berliner Rundfunk » pour Berlin-Est ; « Nordwestdeutscher Rundfunk » et « RIAS » pour Berlin-Ouest. L'Orchestre « RIAS » a connu une période de grande notoriété lorsque Ferenc Fricsay en était le directeur (1948-1954) .

Parmi les Sociétés chorales figurent le Chœur philharmonique, le Chœur de la cathédrale Sainte-Hedwige et la célèbre « Singakademie » , fondée en 1791, par Christian Fasch et dirigée ensuite par Zelter ; c'est avec le concours de cette formation que Félix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy dirigea, en 1828, la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu de Jean-Sébastien Bach, tombée dans l'oubli depuis près d'un siècle. Les Académies de musique religieuse les plus importantes sont l' « Akademie für Kirchenmusik » , fondée en 1822, la « Gesellschaft zur Förderung der kirchlichen Tonkunst » et le « Cäcilienverein » .

Plusieurs grandes scènes d'Opéra ont valu à Berlin sa renommée dans le domaine lyrique. Inaugurée en 1742, la « Hofoper » a vu la création de l'Opéra « Der Freischütz » de Carl Maria von Weber, en 1821, et l'opposition entre les partisans de cette œuvre de style nouveau et ceux du style de Gaspare Spontini, qui était alors directeur musical du Théâtre. « Les Joyeuses Commères de Windsor » d'Otto Nicolai y furent créées, en 1849. Baptisée, après 1918, « Staatsoper » (Opéra d'État) , cette scène a eu pour intendants ou directeurs de la musique Richard Strauß, Félix Weingartner, Karl Muck, Max von Schillings, Heinz Tietjen. Les créations de « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg (1925) ; « Christophe Colomb » de Darius Milhaud (1930) ; « Das Herz » de Hans Pfitzner (1931) et « Peer Gynt » de Werner Egk (1938) s'y sont, entre autres, déroulées. Située dans l'ancien secteur Est, la « Staatsoper » a eu pour directeurs musicaux, après la guerre, Franz Konwitschny (1955-1961) et Otmar Suitner (1964-1975) .

Le « Deutsches Opernhaus » , inauguré en 1912, et appelé après 1918 « Städtische Oper » (Opéra municipal) , a compté parmi ses intendants Carl Ebert et parmi ses directeurs musicaux Bruno Walter et Ferenc Fricsay. Détruit en 1944, lors d'un bombardement aérien, il a repris en 1961 le nom de « Deutsche Oper » .

Inaugurée en 1924, le « Kroll Oper » devint rapidement célèbre par son orientation très particulière ; notamment sous la direction d'Otto Klemperer (1927-1931) , ce fut un Théâtre de créations et une scène d'avant-garde en ce qui concerne les décors et la mise-en-scène du répertoire. Une position comparable, dans le domaine de l'interprétation scénique, a été occupée après la dernière guerre par le « Komische Oper » , qui, ouverte en 1947, a appuyé sa célébrité sur les mises-en-scène de son intendant Walter Felsenstein.

Dans le domaine de l'enseignement de la musique, les institutions les plus importantes sont l'Université, où ont professé Philipp Spitta et Arnold Schering, la « Hochschule für Musik » , fondée en 1869, le Conservatoire municipal (autrefois « Stern'sches Konservatorium ») , le Conservatoire Klindworth-Scharwenka, l' « Institut für Musikforschung » et la « Berliner Kirchenmusikschule » .

Berlin était, avec Vienne, l'un des Iers centres de création musicale de l'Europe, mais où les nouveaux détenteurs du pouvoir ont mis un frein à tout débordement. Dès 1933, la musique a été pour le 3e « Reich » au cœur d'un dispositif esthétique-politique tentaculaire qui, jouant sur le goût inné du peuple allemand pour la musique, pénétrait toutes les classes de la société. Si la création était bridée, les Orchestres, les Théâtres d'Opéra qui, sous la République de Weimar et frappés par la crise, avaient fini par vivre d'expédients, devinrent, en quelques semaines, l'objet de toutes les attentions du régime.

Berlin comptait 2 maisons d'Opéra fameuses. Tout d'abord, le vieil Opéra « Unter den Linden » , du nom de l'avenue « Sous les tilleuls » où il s'élevait. Héritier de l'ancien Opéra de Cour, il abrita, en 1821, la création du « Freischütz » de Carl Maria von Weber, qui marqua la vraie naissance de l'Opéra allemand. En 1919, la Cour et son souverain abolis, le Théâtre prit le nom d'Opéra d'État. Le « Staatsoper » , sous la direction de Max von Schillings, redevint vite une grande maison. Un chef tel qu'Erich Kleiber domina la scène berlinoise, notamment avec la création, en 1925, de l'une des œuvres emblématiques du XXe siècle, le « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg d'après la tragédie de Georg Büchner. Mais, en 1935, Max von Schillings s'était effacé devant un formidable personnage, le nouvel intendant Heinz Tietjen.

Le second opéra de Berlin était d'origine plus récente. Le « Deutsches Opernhaus » (ou « Städtische Oper » : Opéra de la Ville) , avait été créée par la municipalité, dans le faubourg de Charlottenburg. Il s'agissait, face au plus traditionnel Opéra « Unter den Linden » , de disposer d'un haut-lieu du théâtre lyrique plus novateur, plus démocratique aussi.

Placé après la Première Guerre mondiale sous l'autorité du chef Bruno Walter et de l'intendant Heinz Tietjen et bénéficiant d'aménagements scéniques exceptionnels, le « Deutsche Oper » connut jusqu'en 1929 un âge d'or qui vit s'y produire les plus grands chanteurs de l'époque. Après le départ d'Heinz Tietjen pour l'Opéra « Unter den Linden » , le « Deutsche Oper » fusionna un temps avec son rival plus ancien.

Outre l'Opéra Comique (« Komische Oper ») , il y avait une 3e maison d'Opéra : le « Kroll Oper » (ou « Oper am Königsplatz ») fut amené à fermer en 1933 parce que trop moderne, trop engagé aussi, avec des metteurs-en-scène avant-gardistes, qui donnaient des œuvres de Kurt Weill, naturellement détesté à Berlin, avec des décorateurs venus souvent de l'École du « Bauhaus » et d'un modernisme outrancier aux yeux du régime. C'est le grand Otto Klemperer qui avait fait régner là un esprit nouveau, jouant Igor Stravinsky ou Leoš Janáček. Après l'incendie du « Reichstag », le « Kroll Oper », inhabité, devint le siège du « Reichstag » national-socialiste.

Dans les années 1920, l'une des périodes culturellement les plus riches de l'histoire berlinoise, la capitale de l'Allemagne se distinguait aux yeux du monde lyrique par la présence de 3 Théâtres d'influence internationale. Il y avait l'Opéra de Charlottenburg, fondé en 1912 à l'aide de capitaux privés, sous le nom de « Deutsches Opernhaus », puis rattaché à la municipalité sous la dénomination de « Städtische Oper ». Sous l'impulsion du chef Bruno Walter et d'Heinz Tietjen, ce Théâtre sut attirer, jusqu'à l'avènement du Nazisme, les plus grands chanteurs de l'époque (Lotte Lehmann, Maria Ivogün, Lauritz Melchior, Alexander Kipnis) . Il y avait le « Staatsoper », situé sur l'avenue « Unter den Linden », et où le chef d'orchestre Erich Kleiber effectua certaines créations capitales dont le « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg, en 1925. Et enfin, il y avait le mouton noir, l'enfant terrible, le « Kroll Oper », où le jeune avant-gardiste Otto Klemperer se lança dans une politique radicale d'enrichissement du répertoire et de dépoussiérage des conventions. Entouré de metteurs-en-scène comme Gustav Gründgens, de décorateurs comme Ewald Dülberg ou Oskar Schlemmer, il rendit la scène accueillante aux tendances esthétiques les plus nouvelles, comme le « Bauhaus », le Surréalisme ou la « Neue Sachlichkeit ». Les Ires auditions d'œuvres de Paul Hindemith (« Cardillac ») ; d'Arnold Schönberg (« Neues vom Tage ») ; d'Igor Stravinsky (« Mavra » et « Œdipus Rex ») y côtoyaient le décor cubiste du « Fidelio » de Beethoven ou celui, surréaliste, des « Contes d'Hoffmann » de Jacques Offenbach, à l'origine de fameux scandales. Le régime hitlérien, puis la division de la ville, avaient mis un coup d'arrêt de près de 60 ans à cette situation unique.

Introduction

In April 2006, the Swedish Scientific Council (« Vetenskapsrådet ») presented the results of various research projects examining Sweden's relations with Nazism, Nazi Germany, and the Holocaust (« Sveriges förhållande till Nazism, Nazityskland och Förintelsen ») . (I) Several researchers and journalists were surprised at how much Sweden had accommodated Nazi Germany and how much Sweden complied with Nazi Germany's demands. The project report seemed to adopt the perspective that Nazism was something that came to Sweden from Germany. But earlier research has established that Sweden also took part in developing Nazism, for example through the inspiration of Swedish racial biologists. My study, « Music and Politics in the Shadow of Nazism : Kurt Atterberg and Swedish-German Musical Relations » , (2) shows how both countries stimulated each other in Swedish-German musical relations during the Nazi period in Germany (1933-1945) and how music was used as a political tool. In my study, I also wanted to answer the following questions : Which ideas about « good » and « bad » music were brought to the fore ? What kinds of national tales were created and what did they imply for Swedish-German musical relations at the time in the shadow of Nazism ? I argued that music can only acquire a political meaning when it is placed in a verbal or symbolic context. In my study, I analyzed conversation and debates about music to find-out what meaning becomes attached to music in different verbal contexts.

The book focuses on material from Swedish, German, and Austrian archives by and about the Swedish composer Kurt Atterberg (1887-1974) . I studied correspondence, memoirs, minutes, newspaper articles, and radio programmes, and talked to contemporary Swedish composers. Kurt Atterberg was a central figure in Swedish music during the 1st half of the 20th Century, and his life gives a glimpse of the spirit of the time. Atterberg composed 9 Symphonies, 5 Operas, and several orchestral works, Concertos, and pieces of chamber music. Many of his compositions have a national Romantic character and a popular style. Atterberg also worked as music-critic for the newspaper « Stockholms-Tidningen » (1919-1957) . He stood-up for composers' rights and was one of the founders of the Swedish Composers' Society (« Föreningen Svenska Tonsättare » , or FST) and the Swedish Performing Rights Society (STIM) . He was also a Swedish representative in several international composers' rights organizations. Between 1940 and 1953, he was the secretary of the Royal Academy of Music (« Kungliga Musikaliska Akademien » , or KMA) in Stockholm. During the 1st half of the 20th Century, Atterberg had a strong influence not only on Swedish musical life, but also on international musical relations. Atterberg left a huge amount of material behind. Among other material, he collected about 10,000 letters and wrote about 1,500 pages of memoirs, which have never been published. Atterberg's archives are today kept by the Music Museum in Stockholm.

The theoretical platform for the study is a critical discourse analysis, inspired by the model proposed by the Austrian professor in linguistics, Ruth Wodak, and her research team at the Research Centre for Discourse, Politics, and Identity at the University of Vienna (Wodak et al. , 2003) . Critical discourse analysis implies a political commitment to social change (Winther Jørgensen and Phillips, 2000 ; pages 67-70) . One purpose of this kind of analysis is to uncover unequal power relations and oppression (Fairclough, 1992 ; Wodak, 1996 ; van Dijk, 1997 ; Chouliaraki and Fairclough, 2001 ; Wodak and Reisigl, 2001) . I define discourse as a form of social practice which entails the use of language in speech and writing. Discourse as a social practice implies a dialectical relationship between a particular discursive event and the situation, institution, and social structure that frame it. The discursive event is shaped by them, but it also shapes them. Discourses constitute situations, objects of knowledge and social relations between people. They are constitutive in the sense that they can sustain and reproduce the social status quo and in the sense that they can transform it (Wodak, 1996 ; page 15) . Within this theoretical framework, the subject is seen principally as decentred ; the subject comes into existence through discursive events. The discursive struggle produces objects of knowledge and power. I understand power as something that is practised and functions as a productive force (Foucault, 2003 ; page 195) . Inspired by Wodak's analytical model, my analyses consist of 3 parts :

1) The text's content.

2) Argumentative strategies.

3) Realization of these strategies through language (Wodak et al. , 1998 ; page 71ff) . Wodak insists on the importance of studying each text in its historical and political context.

An English-language summary of the topics covered may be found in my book (pages 267-278) . These include the reception of Atterberg's person and music in Nazi Germany, the struggle in Swedish music life for « good » national music and its consequence for Swedish-German musical relations, and the discussion in Sweden after World War II about Atterberg's involvement with Nazi Germany.

My study shows how Sweden and Germany inspired each other in their musical relationship. Both countries encountered similar problems in the 1st half of the 20th Century, as modernization accelerated in Europe, occasioning dramatic changes in musical life. Different ideas were circulating on how to deal with these problems. Composers' rights organizations were founded and musical life became more bureaucratized. Many composers endeavoured to strengthen national identity ; others looked at music as something supranational and cosmopolitan. I argue that the struggle for the best expressions for national identity and their musical representation was important for the development of relations between Sweden and Nazi Germany. For many European composers and musicians, an engagement with Nazi Germany was interpreted as a contribution to the establishment of a strong national identity and the improvement of their own national musical life. But the struggle for a strong national identity in the different European countries could be used by the Nazi government to spread its political propaganda, especially with the support of « apolitical » artists such as Atterberg, with his central position in Swedish musical life and large international network.

Swedish-German musical relations were also influenced by different views on music and politics in Sweden and Germany. For Nazi politicians, music and politics ran together and music was to give expression to Nazi ideology. In Sweden, music and politics were to be kept apart. Most Swedish composers and musicians defined their engagement with Nazi Germany as purely musical work. The Nazi government, for its part, used Nordic composers and music to confirm Nazi ideas on race biology and to spread Nazi propaganda.

The extract translated below is the 1st part of Chapter 3 of my book. This Chapter deals with the efforts to establish copyright organisations and international music exchange and their implications for music and politics in the shadow of Nazism. The extract is a detailed analysis of Kurt Atterberg's article in the Swedish newspaper « Stockholms-Tidningen » on the 1st meeting of a new music organization in Nazi Germany, the Federation of German Composers (« Berufsstand deutscher Komponisten ») , in Berlin, in February 1934. This meeting was the starting point for a more centralized organization of Nazi German musical life. Here, the Nazi government presented its political programme for music. I compare Atterberg's report of the meeting in the Swedish newspaper « Stockholms-Tidningen » with accounts in 3 different German newspapers, « Völkischer Beobachter » , « Der Berliner Westen » and « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » . These newspapers were chosen because they had a nation-wide coverage and reported in great detail about the meeting. The aim with the analysis was not to find-out the « true » story of this meeting, but to show the different interpretations of the meeting in the German and the Swedish contexts. This kind of analysis can give an insight into how National-Socialist linguistic usage could be reproduced or transformed in a Swedish context. Newspaper articles also give information about the frame of reference, that is, which kinds of stories were seen as normal and acceptable in a society and which were not.

Kurt Atterberg worked as a music-critic for « Stockholms-Tidningen », one of the largest dailies in Sweden at the beginning of the 20th Century. Its political affiliation was liberal (3) until 1956 and Social-Democrat thereafter. (4) My investigation of the paper's reporting on Nazi Germany during the 1930's and 1940's, as part of which I sampled and read some 100 articles, showed that the writers of « Stockholms-Tidningen » usually avoided criticism of, or reported positively about, the events in Germany. There were, however, also a few critical articles (see also : Blomberg 2003 ; page 25) . National-Socialist language (words or concepts that were frequently used in National-Socialist contexts) was used in all Swedish dailies, including « Dagens Nyheter », « Svenska Dagbladet », and « Göteborgs Handels-och Sjöfartstidning » . This was partly due to the fact that direct references were being made to German-language texts, or that attempts to translate German material as accurately as possible often involved some transfer of the text to Swedish (Brylla, 2005 ; page 117) . Linguist Charlotta Brylla has argued that, in dealing with the use of National-Socialist language in Swedish newspapers, one can detect 3 main strategies :

1) The direct quote (« Det okommenterade citatet ») . National-Socialist speeches were retold as accurately as possible without commentary. Examples of this strategy are found, for example, in « Dagsposten » .

2) The direct quote with journalistic commentary (« Citatet med referatmarkering ») . This was used in many dailies, among them « Dagens Nyheter », « Svenska Dagbladet », « Nya Dagligt Allehanda », and « Stockholms-Tidningen » . Here, the quotes are embedded in reporting, contextualized through a journalist's simple annotation, for example, « Hitler strongly criticized » or « Hitler emphasized » .

3) An editorial / journalistic commentary on an event / speech (« Det kommenterade referatet ») . Here, the original was not quoted but described in an analytical and often critical context. This sort of commentary was most common in papers that were critical of Nazi Germany, as for example : « Göteborgs Handels- och Sjöfartstidning », « Dagens Nyheter », « Eskilstuna-Kuriren », and « Social-Demokraten » (Brylla 2005a ; page 207, see also : Almgren 2005 ; pages 62-63) .

Clearly, the types of quotes and reports published can provide insight into an author's and the paper's approach to National-Socialist messages.

This essay incorporates this kind of analysis, departing from an examination of Atterberg's published article about the Composers' Meeting that took place on February 18, 1934, in the University Assembly Hall and Philharmonic Hall in Berlin, and then comparing his account with those from 3 German papers. My purpose is not to demonstrate whether or not Atterberg had a naïve or incorrect perception of the Composers' Meeting, or whether or not he saw through the plans of National-Socialism ; rather, my intention is to investigate different narratives of the Composers' Meeting in Swedish and German contexts.

« Stockholms-Tidningen » published Atterberg's article called « Droit moral och internationellt utbyte av folklig musik. Tyska tonsättares strävan » (« Droit moral » and international exchange of « folklig » music) on March 10 of the same year. Atterberg had been invited to the meeting by Richard Strauß. (5) The trip was financed by the Swedish government's support of Atterberg's attendance of the premiere of his Opera « Flammendes Land » in Braunschweig, on February 17, the day before the Composers' Meeting. (6) That the Swedish government was interested in the events at the meeting in Berlin is clear from a confidential report that Atterberg sent to the State Department, on February 28, 1934. The report is very similar in style to the article I am analyzing here. (7)

In the article, written after his return, Atterberg described in detail who had attended the meeting, what speeches were given, and the content of the music-political program. Atterberg described a rise of music in Germany and the beginning of a new era. According to his report, the Composers' Meeting was characterized by enthusiasm and progress. German composers' and politicians' aim to support « music for the people » and oppose « ultra-modern music » was apparent at the meeting and welcomed by Atterberg :

« För första gången ha Tysklands alla tonsättare samlats i ett enda förbund. För första gången har man gemensamt anordnat en " demonstration " med flygande fanor och klingande spel. Det klingande spelet var en realitet : Philharmonikerkonsert med Furtwängler, Pfitzner, Hausegger, Řezníček, Hindemith, Georg Schumann, Græner som dirigenter och Richard Strauß åhörande sin egen odödliga tondikt " Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche " under Furtwänglers trollstav. De flygande fanorna syntes väl ej, men deviserna på standaren vid denna demonstration voro " Internationellt utbyte av folklig musik ", och, i brist på lämplig översättning, den franska juridiska termen " Droit moral ". Den som förde dessa standar var tonsättaren juris doctor Julius Kopsch, sedan många och långa år Richard Strauß' högra hand i kampen för ett enat komponisternas Tyskland.

Jag kom för sent till den inledande Mozartkvartetten, men fick i stället fägna mig åt anblicken av den av en ganska unik publik fyllda aulan.

Framför talarstolen och bänkade i långa led å ömse sidor därom satt nästan allt, vad Tyskland hade att uppvisa i fråga om tonsättare och tonkonstnärer i konstnärligt eller administrativt ledande ställning : Strauß, Pfitzner, Hausegger, Græner, Reznicek, Furtwängler, den nya ledaren för Musikhochschule professor Fritz Stein för att nu nämna några. Av de utländska representanter märktes den österrikiske tonsättaren Kienzl, " Evangeliemannens " skapare, och konservatoriedirektören Marx från Wien, vice ordföranden i den franska tonsättarsammanslutningen Carol-Bérard, en av dirigenterna vid Stora operan i Paris Medlemmar av diplomatiska kåren, riksjustitieminister dr Gürtner och som representant för propagandaminister Gœbbels statssekreterare Funk. » (8)

For the 1st time, all of Germany's composers have gathered in one Society. For the 1st time, one has jointly organized a « manifestation » with flying banners and sounding performance. The sounding performance was a reality : a concert with the Philharmonic conducted by Wilhelm Furtwängler, Hans Pfitzner, Siegmund von Hausegger, Emil von Řezníček, Paul Hindemith, Georg Schumann, Paul Græner, and with Richard Strauß attending the performance of his own immortal music poem « Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche » under Furtwängler's magic baton. The flying banners were invisible, but the slogans on the standards during this manifestation were « International exchange of “ folklig ” music » (« folkish » music, popular music, music based on folk or national music) , and, lacking a proper translation, the French juridical term « Droit moral » . Carrying these standards was composer juris Doctor Julius Kopsch, for many long years Richard Strauß's right-hand in the struggle for a united composers' Germany.

I arrived too late for the opening Mozart Quartet, but could instead take pleasure in (« fägna ») the sight of the hall, filled with a fairly unique audience.

In front of the pulpit and seated in long rows on each side was almost everybody whom Germany could parade in terms of composers and musicians in leading artistic or administrative positions : Strauß, Pfitzner, Hausegger, Græner, Řezníček, Furtwängler, the new head of « Musikhochschule » Professor Fritz Stein, to mention a few. Among the foreign representatives were the Austrian composer Wilhelm Kienzl, the creator of « The Man of the Gospels » (« Der Evangeliemann ») and director Joseph Marx of the Vienna Conservatory, the deputy chair of the French Society of composers, Carol Bérard, one of the conductors at the « Grand Opéra de Paris » , members of the diplomatic corps, national secretary of justice Doctor Franz Gürtner, and Walther Funk, State Secretary at the Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, who appeared as a representative for « Reich » Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda Josef Gœbbels.

The enthusiasm for the supposed up-swing of musical life is clear in these quotes and throughout the entire article. Atterberg's fascination comes into view : he enjoys « the sight of the hall, filled with a fairly unique audience » , and describes the event lightly with the metaphor of « flying banners » . He describes the opening as the beginning of a new epoch in music life, staged by the ones in charge as a « manifestation » . Using such words of concord as « united » , « only one » , and « unity » , and the parallel construction, « For the 1st time ... For the 1st time » , he emphasizes harmony and a new unity through unification, a rhetorical strategy displaying coherence, solidarity, and common interests. It is also an example of discontinuity. A positive change is stressed : music has at last received a prominent role, and earlier divisions have been overcome. Music's new role in society is also shown through the prominent people who were invited, namely « almost everybody who Germany could parade » . Music has, according to Atterberg, gained value through the joint engagement of prominent composers and politicians. The naming of famous people is a strategy of authority, and legitimizes the new musical culture : since « important » figures are present at the Composers' Meeting, musical life is in good hands and finally receiving the prominence that many composers and musicians had long craved. The choice of wording also illustrates an extensive confidence that the authorities will manage their task in a professional way.

Atterberg also explains the concept of « Droit moral » in the article, a concept that would become important during the following years. According to Atterberg, « Droit moral » implied the artist's ideal exclusive conceptual rights. (9) It would prevent the « destruction » of musical works. As an example of the latter, he mentions Bedřich Smetana's Opera « The Bartered Bride » . This Opera, « the Czech nation's pride and jewel » , was to become a film. « With the knowledge of these film makers' psyche » the filming was, according to Atterberg, seen as an attempt at « vandalization » in Czechoslovakia, and the production was banned. The production was then moved to Germany, where there were no laws assigning the artist's « conceptual rights » . Atterberg received this information from Julius Kopsch, who was also present in Berlin. According to Kopsch (and Atterberg agreed) strong measures were necessary to prevent the « vandalization » of music. As an example, Atterberg mentioned an American publisher that specialized in « the jazzification of Classical Masterworks and distributed its publications across the entire world » . He had « heard and seen how the Pilgrim Chorus had been jazzed to at the Royal » . (10) From this example, it follows that « Droit moral » signified a protection against the making of modern arrangements without the permission of the creator. By using the concept of vandalizing as a topos of catastrophe, a threatening picture is painted, namely that modernism's more powerful, « destructive » impact on musical life must be effectively limited.

Atterberg expressed enthusiasm that German composers were finally unified and collectively wanted to fight this threat. But, according to Atterberg, not only German but also global common laws were necessary in order for the fight to be effective :

« But a conceptual protection for the artist becomes empty if identical rules are not adopted in all countries. The collective and unified generation of German composers is now aiming for the adoption of such rules. » (11) Again, Atterberg emphasizes unity as connected not only to a defined nationality, but to a specific generation. From the earlier mentioned names, it becomes clear that he refers to men born towards the end of the 19th Century, who had achieved important positions in musical life and in politics. These were also the agents during the Composers' Meeting and it was their works that were performed.

The speech described in the greatest depth in both German papers and Atterberg's report was that of secretary Funk, who appeared as a representative of the Nazi government. Atterberg begins his account of Funk's speech as follows :

« Han började sedan med att påpeka, hur all äkta konst är framsprungen ur folket och att det vore den nya regeringens mål att åter göra konsten till folkets sak. Utan att nämna den ultramoderna konsten och musiken gav han ultramodernismen en kraftig snärt genom att påpeka, hur tyska konstnärer och musiker i en tid av “ tygellös ” Liberalism med dess nedrivande tendenser och med sitt “ dissekerande ” själsliga arbete hade blivit främmande för folket och hur de måste förlora folklighetens fasta mark av det enkla skäl, att sådan mark ej hade funnits. Han sammanfattade de nya strävandena ungefär med orden “ Folket skall leva i konsten och konsten i folket. ” »

He then began pointing-out how all real art sprang from the people and that it is the new government's goal to make art once again a matter of the people. Without mentioning ultra-modern art and music, he gave ultra-modernism a powerful hit by describing how, during a time of « uncontrolled » Liberalism with its downward-pulling tendencies and its « desecrating » mental (« själsliga ») work, German artists and musicians had alienated themselves from the people, and how they had lost their firm grip on the ground of popular consciousness for the simple reason that there never was such a ground. He characterized the new tendencies approximately by the words, « the people should live in art and art in the people » .

Atterberg begins his summary of Funk's speech with a direct quote with journalistic commentary :

« He then began pointing-out ... , » which I understand to be aiming at a style of neutral reporting. He then recounts the speech with a few added comments - for example, about the ultra-modern. « The people should live in art and art in the people » is a direct quote. Through the entire article, Atterberg's reporting oscillates between direct quotes and the direct quote with journalistic commentary. Atterberg tries to contextualize Funk's speech for his Swedish readers by explaining what is not explicitly stated. There are no critical comments in the article.

« Real art » is defined as having « sprung from the people » (« art » and « the people » are connected) by contrast with « ultra-modern » art, which has « lost the firm ground of the people » . « Ultra-modern » art is connected to « uncontrolled Liberalism » with « its downward pulling tendencies » and « desecrating mental work » . Liberalism was a word with negative connotations within the National-Socialist movement and was used to describe a lack of order and discipline that, according to the National-Socialists, was due to an increased level of individualism and egoism. Liberalism was often connected with the Weimar period and the failure of democracy. Art not originating from the people is described as rootless and destructive. The negative attributes of « unregulated » , « downward pulling » , and « desecrating » (as opposed to the positive « folklight ») emphasize polarization in order to contrast the situation of art before and after the National-Socialists' assumption of power : while art's situation before 1933 seemed dark, now everything would improve. The new government would save « real art » .

In Atterberg's narrative, non-genuine art is connected to the « ultra-modern » , a link not explicitly stated in the German reports, in which the negative development of the musical life is attributed to the chaos that had existed under the previous government. Moreover, in the German reports, the connection of art to Germanness is significantly more emphasized than in Atterberg's description. Those reports talk about German art and German music, and the musicians are labeled as the most German of artists. Music and Germanness are joined, something that is not done to the same extent in Atterberg's report.

Specifically, it becomes clear that Atterberg has translated the German word « Volkstum » with « folklight » : « folklightens mark » (the soil of « folklight ») is the translation of « der Boden des Volkstums » . (12) In National-Socialist vocabulary during the 3rd « Reich » , the German word « Volkstum » took on a racial element : « race » and the « folk » were connected. The concept of « folk » experienced a semantic shift during this period. « Folk » was a positively-charged concept and implied, among other things, a group of people who shared a culture and a language. To a large extent, there were no biological components until the beginning of the 19th Century. But towards the end of the 19th Century, a notion spread of « folk » as a « race community » (« rasgemenskap ») . National-Socialism was highly-influenced by ideas of « folk » as an expression of « blood » and « race » , a concept that became part of the official language in Nazi Germany.

Atterberg's translation of « Volkstum » as « folklight » conceals the National-Socialistic content from his Swedish readers. It is not apparent how Atterberg himself understood the « folk » concept, whether he considered « folk » primarily as a unity of culture and language or as a unity of race. Here, he remains vague. But because the importance of Germanness in the speech is not made visible, Nazi Germany's aim of retaining the privilege of interpretation on musical matters is also not made visible. But, perhaps, Atterberg wanted to emphasize the international aspect for his Swedish readers.

Atterberg continues his report from the speech :

« Han (Funk) gick vidare in på medlen för realiserandet av detta mål och som första tes av vikt förkunnade han :“ I vår tid finns inga mecenater mer. Staten måste därför vara mecenat för konsten och konstnärerna.” »

« Funk went on to describe the means for realizing this goal and, as his 1st thesis of importance, he declared :“ In our time, there are no longer any benefactors. The government, therefore, has to become the benefactor for art and the artists.” »

This paragraph begins with a direct quote with journalistic commentary : « ... as his 1st thesis of importance, he declared ... » . A certain degree of irony is possibly apparent here : it is not until now that Funk states anything important. Atterberg does not ascribe the same importance to Funk's earlier and more theoretical elaborations on music and art ; he is interested in the practical music-political issues. The direct quote emphasizes the importance of the message : now, « the government » should « become the benefactor for art and the artists » ; it wants to take everybody under its wings.

This section of the speech is recounted, in a different way, in the German articles. Something that is mentioned in several German accounts and not in Atterberg's article is the following section of Fritz Stege's report :

« Es geht nicht um die Richtung der Kunst, sondern um die Art der Kunst. Das Volk soll wieder in der Kunst und der Künstler im Volke leben ! Das ist die erste Aufgabe der nationalsozialistischen Kunstpolitik. » (13)

It is not about the direction of art, but the essence of art. The « folk » shall live again in art and the artist shall live in the « folk » . This is the 1st task for National-Socialist art policy.

Here, the symbiosis between art and « folk » is explicitly connected with National-Socialism. In a different German account, these thoughts are further extended :

« Es ginge nicht um die Richtung der Kunst, sondern um ihre Art. Ihre Aufgabe sei, die deutsche Wesensart zum Ausdruck zu bringen. Nur wenn die Kunst im Volkshaften wurzele, könne auch das Volk in der Kunst und mit ihr leben ; unter diesen Voraussetzungen sei der Staat bereit, das Amt eines Mäzens dem Künstler gegenüber zu übernehmen. (14)

« It was not about the direction of art, but about its essence. The task of art is to express the German spirit (“ Wesensart ”) . Only if art is anchored in the people's steadfast roots (“ im Volkshaften ”) , could the people live in and with the arts ; under these conditions, the State is willing to take-over and perform the duties of a patron to the artist. »

Not only are art and « folk » connected in these statements, but also « folk » and Germanness. The idea of art as having a mandate for expressing the « German spirit » , of being anchored in the people's steadfast roots (« im Volkshaften wurzele ») implies a notion of a national « soul », common to all Germans, that should be expressed in art. Only « under these conditions », should the German State support the artists. All artists are excluded who could not be considered as expressing « the German spirit ». What « German spirit » referred to is not made explicit.

In Atterberg's report of the speech, the reader gets the impression that the German State will take care of all artists with no exceptions and no demands :

« In our time, there are no benefactors any longer. The government must, therefore, become the benefactor for art and the artists. »

Phrased that way, the demand for art's expression of Germanness becomes invisible. Instead, the statement is coupled with ultra-modernism's threat against the artists. In this context, the message might well be that the German State takes good care of all artists in order to combat the ultra-modern and its consequences. Atterberg continues his report of the speech :

« Han relaterade, hur genom regeringsingripande splittringen bland de tyska tonsättarna bragts ur världen och hur de nu enats under den man, som i årtionden kämpat för detta mål : Richard Strauß. Han slutade sitt tal med utpekande av Richard Strauß som den verkliga ledaren av Tysklands musikliv och som förbindelselänken mellan detta och regeringen. » (15)

He related how, through governmental intervention, the split among the German composers has been made to disappear and how they now have been united behind the man who for decades fought for this goal : Richard Strauß. Funk concluded his speech by declaring Richard Strauß to be the true leader of Germany's musical life and as its link to the government.

According to Atterberg's account, the German government intervened in and repaired the composers' earlier conflicts. However, Atterberg does not refer to any concrete examples of « governmental intervention » (note how the passive sentence constructions « been made to disappear » and « been united » lack agency) which means that a Swedish reader did not receive any concrete information about how the governmental intervention had been put in place.

From the German articles, it becomes clear that the organization referred to was the National Organization for German Composers (« Berufsstand der deutschen Komponisten ») , as part of the « Reichsmusikkammer » and « STAGMA » (« Reichsmusikkammer » and « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Urheberrechte ») . These were National-Socialist organizations with obligatory membership ; in order to practice one's profession, each artist had to be a member. Jewish artists were excluded by an « Aryan clause » . These exclusions disappear in Atterberg's article, along with the idea of compulsory membership. Instead, the split among composers is contrasted with their unification under Richard Strauß, who thus acquires the status of a hero (see : Kargl, 1997 ; page 43) . Strauß is the one who worked for many years for artists' rights and the one who unified the artists. Again, unity is emphasized. I would like to label this mode of speech as a discourse of unity, since the speech of a new unity and unification was central in National-Socialist texts, contrasting these with earlier conflicts (divisions) - among others, in the Weimar Republic. The politics of unity was also referred to as « Gleichschaltung » (making the same) , which implied that the Nazi regime banned all organizations that did not adapt to the politics of National-Socialism - as, for example, when they refused to implement the « Aryan clause » . On the contrary, conforming organizations, including the National Organization of German Composers, could expect governmental support.

Strauß is described as the link between Germany's musical life and the government. Again, Funk's speech receives a comment, as Atterberg writes :

« It is a fact that Strauß is an unselfish leader of German musical practitioners : from the composers to the unemployed music engravers, from choral Societies to the piano manufacturer, in short, of everything. » (16)

Strauß is also described as an ideal agent for German musical life. The narrative about Strauß as a benefactor for others is a rhetorical strategy emphasizing unselfishness, a description of a man who is always available and who acts without any thought of personal gain. The critique of individualism was central in the national discourses of the 1930's : the individual should by free will subordinate him, or herself, to the needs of the nation and the people. Such notions also existed, during the same period, in the Swedish Social-Democrat concept « folkhemmet » (literally, « the people's home » ; or, the nation for the people) , according to which one should behave in « solidarity with society » and subordinate one's needs to the common good (Frykman and Löfgren, 1985 ; page 137) . Exactly the same idea occurs in Atterberg's comments : Strauß Ist appears as an individual, and is described later as one who subordinates himself to the collective. But other accounts do not support this picture of the artist providing unconditional help to his colleagues. Although Strauß nurtured those who shared his musical taste, he opposed colleagues who had adapted a more modern style than the one he advocated (Splitt, 1987) .

German articles about the Composers' Meeting also portray Strauß as a hero : he is labeled the « Reichführer » (State Leader) of the composers, nominated by the government, which has « fought for decades » against division among composers. (17) The statement can also be interpreted as meaning that Strauß is the personification of the ideal national realization of the musical life. Atterberg's and the German reporting are similar on this point ; however, some of the racist attributions in the German texts disappear when transferred to a Swedish audience.

Several of the foreign guests gave speeches at the Composers' Meeting. Atterberg spoke on behalf of Sweden, Carol Bérard for France, Adriano Lualdi for Italy, and Wilhelm Kienzl for Austria. In Atterberg's article, and in the German articles, the speakers are mentioned by name but the speeches by Funk and Strauß are given most attention. Atterberg describes himself in his article as a representative for the Nordic countries rather than for Sweden. One reason for this was that he had been asked to represent Norway and Denmark as well, since their representatives (Sverre Hagerup Bull and Peter Jørgensen Gram) were unable to attend. The Finnish representative was Yrjö Kilpinen. (18) Atterberg is likewise mentioned by the German writers as a representative for Sweden and for « den skandinavischen Norden » . (19) « Norden » (The Nordic Countries) was a commonly used term for the modern Scandinavian countries during the 1930's , in Germany (Leiska, 2005 ; pages 69-80) , and its use emphasized the relationship between the Nordic countries and Germany.

According to the German reports, the foreign guests spoke as representatives for their respective composers' organizations, and distributed greetings from those who were positive to the idea of cooperation with the new regime. (20) These foreign appearances are represented in the German articles as examples of the German composers' successful international collaborations.

The German accounts of the ordering of the speeches give a view of how conscientiously the organizers had staged the Composers' Meeting. Funk spoke 1st, as the representative of the government, and he concluded his speech with the celebration of Strauß, who then took-over, to large applause. The last speaker was Wilhelm Kienzl from Austria, who was received « enthusiastically ». According to Fritz Stege's and Peter W.'s reports, at the same moment that Kienzl appealed to the « German brotherhood », a String Quartet performed the German national anthem. (21) Here, the National-Socialist message of Austria's forthcoming « Anschluß » to Germany was staged musically, and Kienzl symbolized Austria's apparent longing to come home to the German « Reich ». By using a representative of the Nazi regime to open the Composers' Meeting, and an Austrian to conclude the speeches, climaxes were created at the beginning and the end. Atterberg does not mention the musical staging of Austria's « homesickness » in his article. Likewise, while the German commentators mention « Sieg-Heil » calls and Hitler salutes during the celebration, Atterberg does not. Here, again, the impact of National-Socialism on the event is not evident to Swedish readers.

After the opening ceremony, a conference was held at the Hotel « Kaiserhof » where attempts were made to consolidate the international musical exchange. Atterberg describes it thus :

« Man beslöt därvid att igångsätta ett stort anlagt internationellt utbyte av musik av sådan art, som kunde fattas av den stora publiken. Själv tillät jag mig föreslå att betydelsen av musikaliskt framåtskridande måste erkännas i ett eventuellt programuttalande, men detta vann icke gehör. Synbarligen är man i alla länder grundligt led vid allt, som kan tangera modernism. De närvarande utlänningarna rapporterade, var och en i sin stad, vilka organisationer, som existerade i deras länder och som kunde tänkas vara lämpliga organ för det internationella utbytet. Tyskarna hade sin "Allgemeiner deutscher Tonkünstlerverein", vilken man nu erbjöd som operationsbas. » (22)

« One decided to begin a large-scale international exchange of music such as could be understood by the general audience. I allowed myself to propose that the importance of musical progress must be recognized in a possible program statement, but that idea was rejected. Obviously, there is fatigue in all countries about everything that touches upon modernism. The foreigners present reported, each for their city, which organizations existed in their countries that could be suitable venues for the international exchange. The Germans had their "Allgemeiner deutscher Tonkünstlerverein", which was offered as an operational base. »

Atterberg does not elaborate further on « the general audience », and in the 1st sentence the subject « one » is an example of vagueness and anonymity. The reader does not find-out concretely which music should be exchanged and who should make the choice. Atterberg's suggestion to acknowledge musical progress was not welcomed, which Atterberg interprets as the result of fatigue with modernism.

The musical exchange was to be organized with the aid of the foreign guests present and, according to Atterberg's description, there was agreement as to how this exchange should be structured. The guests were considered to be national representatives for their home States and were assigned authority to direct the musical selections in their respective countries, so that the « right music » was the target for the exchange.

The German authors do not mention this conference at all, or only very briefly. In the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , Robert Oboussier wrote that the Public German Music Society (« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » , or « ADMV ») should contact the other European countries to promote « foreign folk-connected music » (« die ausländische volksverbundene Musik ») . (23) The « ADMV » obviously assumed a main role in the music exchange. In Atterberg's article, this is portrayed as an offer from the German side :

« The Germans had their “ Allgemeiner deutscher Tonkünstlerverein ”, which was offered as an operational base. »

Generally, Atterberg provides a more egalitarian description of the collaboration between the countries that would organize the musical exchange, although it is made clear in the German articles that the music exchange should be organized by Germany.

The opening ceremony of the Composers' Meeting concluded with a large concert at the « Alte Philharmonie » , with Josef Göebbels as one of the honorary guests. Wilhelm Furtwängler conducted performances of works by Richard Strauß, Max von Schillings, Georg Schumann, Siegmund von Hausegger, Paul Hindemith, Paul Græner, and Hans Pfitzner. (25) These musicians were to have a great impact during the beginning of the 3rd « Reich » , and several of them became members of the new National Organization for German Composers.

The Composers' Meeting was used extensively in Nazi propaganda. Sections of the opening ceremony were filmed and broadcast on radio. The National-Socialist paper « Völkischer Beobachter » described it as an advancement of National-Socialist cultural policies, and there was a great enthusiasm for the « The New Germany » (« im neuen Deutschland ») . (26) « The New Germany » was a central National-Socialist concept for the positive changes (in the eyes of the National-Socialists) in German society, after 1933 (see : Brylla, 2005 ; page 127) .

Atterberg chose the headline « “ Droit moral ” and international exchange of “ folklig ” music » for his article. In the German articles, this music was described as « völkische Musik, volksverbundene Musik » (music close to the people) , and « Musik des Volkes » (the music of the people) : a music that would « emerge naturally » from the « individuality of a people » . (27) « “ Folklig ” music » was described, in different ways, by the German writers. « Völkische Musik » was a concept with clear race-biological connotations, while « volksverbundene Musik » and « Musik des Volkes » did not necessarily imply race. Here again, appears the semantic shift in the concept of « folk » that was discussed earlier. « Völkisch » was a central National-Socialist concept that defined different peoples by their biological racial characteristics. It also included a clear hierarchy of the different peoples in which the « German » and « Nordic races » were at the top (Geisler, 2006 ; page 64 - Almgren 2005 ; page 39ff) . « Volksverbundene Musik » or « Musik des Volkes » did not imply this component, per se, although the concepts could be charged with a race-biological content in the National-Socialist context.

The different labels for « folk-inspired music » constitute one example of how the National-Socialists used « innocent, harmless words » , on the one hand, and charged words, on the other. Charged concepts such as « völkische Musik » were used, side by side, with more neutral terms, such as « volksverbundene Musik » and « Musik des Volkes » which, in turn through this use, assumed a charged, racial-biological content. The parallel use of concepts that, at the same time, were used in non-National-Socialist and National-Socialist contexts, the semantic shift between non-National-Socialist and National-Socialist concepts, characterized linguistic usage in the Nazi German totalitarian State. Language thus became an effective tool of dissemination, in that the use of « harmless » and, yet, « charged » expressions led people without any National-Socialist connection to spread National-Socialist concepts. For an observer like Atterberg, whose mother tongue was not German, the difference between the various concepts was probably even harder to perceive.

Atterberg translated all 3 terms, « völkische Musik » , « volksverbundene Musik » , and « Musik des Volkes » , as « folklig musik » (Almgren and Brylla, 2005 ; page 108 - Geisler, 2006 ; page 64) . The Swedish word « folklig » is still a word with mainly positive connotations (for example, meaning « natural » , « original » , and « simple ») . At the beginning of the 20th Century, the concept was often used to describe an authentic national culture that was threatened with extinction and had to be saved by collecting « folk culture » , among other things (Frykman, 1993 ; page 140 - Lilja, 1996 ; page 31) . Many people in Sweden, during the 1st half of the 20th Century, considered a concern for « folklig musik » as a remedy against « foreign mass culture » , and an effective protection for « the preservation of Swedishness » (Ling, 1979 ; page 22 - Bohman, 1979 ; pages 56-57) . When Atterberg translated « völkisch » as « folklig » , the National-Socialist content of the term disappeared for his readers and it became a positively charged Swedish word.

This transformation shows that people like Atterberg, who were eager to preserve a national music and wanted to protect it against the impact of modernism, could perceive the exchange of « folklig musik » as a positive act for saving their own national « folk culture » . Germany's wish for an exchange of music of « folkish character » with other countries also meant that other countries' music would be protected against « the modernist threat » . From this perspective, Nazi Germany performed a good deed in saving the domestic national (here, being the Swedish) « cultural heritage » .

It is not clear from Atterberg's texts how much he had adopted the race discourse of the time. He is vague regarding the relationship between race and national identity. He seldom writes about race, though much about Swedishness. He used the term « race » exclusively when describing the Jews. One possible explanation could be that the relationship between race and nation was so obvious in the contemporary conception that the terms were used interchangeably.

Both Atterberg and the German writers portray Germany as a model for opposition to modernist tendencies in musical life, and actively promoting better copyright legislation. According to their descriptions, Germany actively demoted modernist currents by prioritizing a « folk-based » national music, among others. At the same time, Germany appeared as a State eager to improve the life situation of its artists, for example, by modernizing copyright law, by intervening in and preventing conflicts between copyright organizations, while, at the same time, creating new centralized organizations. From Atterberg's account, it is clear that he considered the centralization of musical life in Nazi Germany as a positive phenomenon since it remedied earlier conflicts and permitted decisions to be made much more quickly. An effective, modern bureaucracy had been established that promoted the « right » music. There is a clear ambivalence towards modernity (Bauman, 1998) : on the one hand, an aspiration to preserve the traditional « folk culture » , and, on the other, an aspiration towards renewal, through new legislation and new institutions.

The Composers' Meeting was described, both by Atterberg and in the German articles, as a heroic departure. A new period in musical life was initiated and set in contrast to a past in which the authentic national had been under threat and the artist was a toy in the hands of the publisher and the entertainment industry. The descriptions of the Composers' Meeting show the expectations that Atterberg and many other composers and conductors had of the Nazi regime's music politics : the anticipation that an effective Germany could deal with rapid changes in musical life, and help other nations along the way. Germany's apparent « success » in dealing with these changes led to a continuous collaboration between German politicians, composers, conductors, and musicians, along with many colleagues in other countries.

Postscript

In my book, I wanted to show the reader why so many composers and musicians were fascinated by Nazi music politics, but I also wanted to show the consequences of these politics and, of course, I am very critical of them. In Chapter 3, I am trying to give some examples of this fascination. Because the translated excerpt is taken-out of its context, the end may sound too positive. To avoid misunderstandings, I would like to add the following paragraphs from the English summary of my thesis :

Many composers and musicians in Sweden and Germany experienced the dramatic changes in musical life during the 1st half of the 20th Century as a threat to established music styles and techniques. In their opinion, a clear national identity could provide security and stability in a changing world. For many of these Swedish composers and musicians, a commitment to Nazi Germany was interpreted as a beneficial contribution to the establishment of a strong national identity, to improvement of their own national musical life and, of course, to the making of a musical career. Their engagement with Germany was totally voluntary and there were no demands from Germany for cooperation. The Nazi government could, for its part, use Nordic composers and music to confirm Nazi ideas on racial biology and to spread Nazi propaganda.

In the 1990's, the effectiveness of Sweden's neutrality during World War II was questioned by Swedish scholars. Several Universities started research projects in different disciplines concerning Sweden's relationship to Nazi Germany. (28) Today, scholars are convinced that Sweden cooperated with Nazi Germany to a much larger extent than was earlier assumed, not only for the purpose of staying-out of the War, but also to serve its own economic and cultural interests. In the sphere of music, many Swedish composers and musicians continued their cooperation with German colleagues during the Nazi period, but there were others who resisted and criticized Nazi politics. (29) Kurt Atterberg is an example of the group that continued its cooperation with German institutions after 1933 and defined its work as purely musical and unpolitical. A composer such as Atterberg, who had a central position in Swedish musical life and a large network of international contacts, helped to legitimize Nazism and to strengthen Nazi politics by spreading positive impressions about Nazi Germany and cooperating with the Nazi regime in music-political work. This kind of cooperation became a very effective tool in Nazi propaganda.

In my study, I also discuss the assessment of Atterberg that occurred as an expression of the need for new national stories after the War. To secure democracy and create a new, modern, and peaceful Europe, it was necessary to mark a distance from Nazism. Nazism now meant the Holocaust, evil, and a threat to democracy. Strategies for dissociation included the denazifications in Germany and the countries which had been occupied by Germany, and it became necessary to exclude people who had been active in Nazi Germany, to brand them as Nazis or Nazi sympathisers. I argue that Atterberg was a suitable scapegoat for Swedish involvement in Nazism, partly because of his reputation as a powerful and sometimes intolerant person, and partly because his music was not looked on in Sweden as very successful. I compare Atterberg's case with the treatment of Richard Strauß and Wilhelm Furtwängler after the War. Both were accused of having been Nazis because of their involvement in Nazi musical politics but, at the same time, their successful musical careers were emphasized. In such cases, a difference is expressed between the (apolitical and strong) artist and the (political and weak) human being.

Richard Strauß : avant, pendant et après le régime nazi

Le cas de Richard Strauß est contigu à celui de Wilhelm Furtwängler. L'auteur du « Chevalier à la Rose », en 1933, a 69 ans. Sa notoriété l'auréole de gloire et il apparaît comme le père tutélaire de la musique allemande. Immense compositeur né à Munich, c'est un homme emblématique d'une culture européenne intense et protéiforme dont l'Allemagne est le berceau. Il connaît le succès dès 1905 avec toute une suite d'Opéras sublimes qui assureront sa gloire : « Salomé » (1905) ; « Elektra » (1909) ; et « le Chevalier à la Rose » (1911) .

Artiste dans l'âme, il ne vit que pour la musique, et tout au long des années alors qu'il connaît la gloire et les honneurs, il œuvre pour protéger la vie sociale et économique de ses autres collègues musiciens certes moins connus. Son jugement politique peu familier du débat des enceintes parlementaires ou des journaux ne s'intéresse qu'à l'art. Il semble un temps attiré par le 3^e « Reich » . Le plus grand compositeur allemand de son temps, il est nommé 1^{er} président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » (RMK) , le 15 novembre 1933. Il pensait alors, tel un Candide, qu'il pourrait utiliser sa fonction pour développer une politique musicale de grande envergure. Mais il prend conscience très rapidement de sa naïveté et s'oppose à Gustav Havemann, un musicien opportuniste qui transitera du gauchisme au Nazisme et l'antisémitisme (phénomène dont seuls les simples d'esprit pourraient s'étonner) , ainsi qu'à Herbert von Karajan « le petit K » aux dents longues.

Richard Strauß voulait développer une politique en faveur de l'éducation musicale et du droit d'auteurs des compositeurs. Il refusera de participer au processus d'aryanisation de la musique allemande qui avait, entre autres buts, de supprimer toutes références aux compositeurs allemands d'origine juive. Il avait de sa personne une idée très narcissique se considérant comme l'héritier de Bach, de Mozart, Beethoven et Wagner et aimait voir ceux qui possédaient l'autorité politique lui donner l'illusion de sa suprématie.

Après la mort, en 1929, de son librettiste Hugo von Hofmannsthal (lui même d'origine juive) , il demanda à l'écrivain juif autrichien Stefan Zweig de travailler pour lui. De cette collaboration naîtra « Die schweigsame Frau » (La Femme silencieuse) . Stefan Zweig conscient de l'antisémitisme virulent au pouvoir en Allemagne demandera à Strauß, pour ne pas compromettre la carrière du compositeur, de retirer son nom de l'affiche. Richard Strauß refusera et maintiendra le nom de Zweig. La première de l'œuvre sera donnée à Dresde, en 1935, avec Karl Böhm à la direction d'orchestre.

Le 17 juin 1935, la « Gestapo » intercepte une lettre de Richard Strauß à Stefan Zweig, où le compositeur décrit sa charge de Président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » comme étant purement un rôle de composition. On le contraint de démissionner et l'Opéra ne sera plus joué. Plus tard, il composera un Hymne olympique pour les Jeux d'été, mais son aura est déjà sur son déclin.

Après la Guerre, dans les enquêtes pour dénazification qui seront conduites, on lui reprochera un manifeste qu'il avait signé en 1933 contre Thomas Mann et d'avoir remplacé, au pied levé, le chef d'orchestre d'origine juive Bruno Walter interdit de concert. Il fut entièrement blanchi de toute collaboration.

Au plan de sa personne et de sa vie privée, sa belle-fille Alice était juive, donc selon les critères nazis ses petits-enfants l'étaient aussi. Durant la « Nuit de Cristal » (« Kristallnacht ») , il réussit à les protéger par ses interventions auprès de personnes amies. Ensemble, ils déménagèrent à Vienne en 1942 où ils bénéficièrent un temps de la protection du « Gauleiter » Baldur von Schirach. Vers la fin de la Guerre, alors que le compositeur s'était absenté, les Nazis arrêterent Alice qui fut incarcérée pendant plusieurs jours. C'est avec de grandes difficultés que Richard Strauß réussit à la faire relâcher. Il put l'emmener ainsi que les enfants à Garmisch où ils demeurèrent en résidence forcée, gardés par les Nazis jusqu'à la fin de la Guerre. Pendant ce temps, la famille proche d'Alice fut déportée au camp de Theresienstadt. Les lettres que Richard Strauß envoya pour demander leur libération demeurèrent sans effet. Il se rendit en voiture en personne au camp mais on refusa de le recevoir à son grand désarroi. Tous moururent ou furent assassinés à Theresienstadt ou dans d'autres camps.

Richard Strauß est mort le 8 septembre 1949.

Si, d'évidence, le Nazisme et ses miasmes contaminèrent des artistes en Allemagne ou en Autriche, la peste brune toucha aussi, hélas, des artistes dans d'autres pays. En France, dans le monde de la musique, le pianiste Alfred Cortot crut jouer une partition de grand talent dans une collaboration crapoteuse avec le régime de Vichy. Le compositeur Florent Schmitt, né en Lorraine, afficha ouvertement ses convictions nazis.

The lines between resistance, collaboration and passivity are hard to draw for many artists working within the 3rd « Reich » . While some committed themselves publicly to the project of Nazism, many simply tried to adapt to the new regime as best they could, supporting those in power where possible, and dissenting only when personally threatened. An example of the latter was the composer Richard Strauß, exonerated in his denazification trial as innocent of any ties to the Nazi State, yet, condemned by Thomas Mann after the War as a « Hitlerian composer » . Proud of his lack of involvement in politics, he asserted that « they can all turn their backs on me. I just sit here in Garmisch and compose ; everything else is irrelevant to me. »

Born on 11 June 1864, Strauß was raised in the culturally rich environment of 19th Century Munich. Encouraged in his desire to play and compose, he dedicated himself early on to music. In 1894, he married Pauline de Ahna, and they had their only child, Franz Alexander, in 1897. Strauß achieved his 1st major success through his pre-World War I Operas, « Salome » (1905) , « Elektra » (1909) and « Der Rosenkavalier » (1911) , which were widely popular. Although he was conservative and sometimes anti-Semitic, Strauß collaborated frequently with the part-Jewish intellectual Hugo von Hofmannsthal, was a great fan of Felix Mendelssohn, and had many Jewish friends.

One of Strauß' primary concerns was strengthening the economic situation of musicians in Germany. Throughout his life, he lobbied for revised copyright policy, better insurance and job protection, and increased government funding for professional musicians. His judgment of politics was often based on the support of culture, particularly music, and this was apparently the source of his early support for the 3rd « Reich » . Strauß was made the 1st president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , on 15 November 1933. Although he hoped that the position would allow him to achieve his long-term musical goals for Germany, he quickly came into conflict with both Gustav Havemann and Wilhelm Furtwängler, the organization's other leading figures.

In addition to pursuing more innocuous projects like improved music education and copyright protection for composers, Strauß also tried to replace the works of foreign composers with German works, including his own. But he refused to participate in the process of « Aryanizing » the musical world, particularly the black-listing of German-Jewish composers ; he would occasionally even pull strings to minimize artistic censorship, or to limit the impact of restrictive policies. Despite these occasional conflicts, Strauß was generally on good terms with the Nazi Party (probably, the biggest source of conflict with the Nazis was his ego : seeing himself as last in line after the German greats Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner) .

Strauß once said :

« I am the last mountain of a large mountain range. After me, come the flatlands. »

On his 70th birthday, on 11 June 1934, he received framed autographed portraits of Adolf Hitler and Josef Gæbbels, dedicated to « the venerable great tone Master with respectful gratitude » .

Relations soon grew tense, however. After the 1929 death of his librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Strauß was seeking a new and equally talented collaborator, and settled on the Jewish writer Stefan Zweig, with whom he wrote the Opera « Die Schweigsame Frau » (The Silent Woman) in 1934. The work was premiered in Dresden under Karl Böhm, in June 1935. Zweig, aware of how their partnership would compromise Strauß's position, had been trying to break-off the collaboration, but Strauß refused. On 17 June 1935, the « Gestapo » intercepted a letter from Strauß to Zweig in which the former characterized his job as « Reichsmusikkammer » president as merely play-acting. The letter ultimately resulted in the composer's forced resignation, and led to the cancellation of all further productions of the Opera ; it was not performed again in Nazi Germany. In an act of damage control, Strauß wrote a personal letter to Hitler assuring him that the letter to Zweig « does not represent my view of the world nor my true conviction » . He never received a reply. Though it represented the beginning of his downfall, this event did not signal the end of Strauß's career in Nazi Germany. He composed an Olympic Hymn that premiered at the Summer Games, just months after his dismissal. His works also continued to be performed widely in Germany. He certainly had many strikes against him when it came to accusations of collaboration : he had signed an anti-Thomas Mann manifesto in early 1933, for example, and when a performance by the Jewish conductor Bruno Walter was cancelled at the last minute, he agreed to substitute. Nonetheless, he also suffered increasingly at the hands of the Nazis.

This suffering was not only professional but also personal. Strauß's daughter-in-law Alice was Jewish, as were (according to Nazi racial law) his grandchildren. He was able to use personal connections to prevent his family from the full-force of harassment during « Kristallnacht » , in November 1938, and, in 1942, he moved with them to Vienna, where they benefited from the protection of Hitler Youth leader and Vienna « Gauleiter » Baldur von Schirach. Towards the end of the War, however, while Strauß was away, Nazis arrested Alice and held her for several days ; Strauß was barely able to secure her release, moving her and the family to Garmisch, where they were kept under house-arrest until the War's end. In addition, many members of Alice's immediate family were deported to Theresienstadt. When Strauß's letters asking for their release were unsuccessful, the composer drove to the camp personally, but to no avail ; all died or were murdered, in Theresienstadt and other camps.

Richard Strauß died on 8 September 1949, absolved of any Nazi affiliations.

Richard (Georg) Strauß was born on June 11, 1864 in Munich, Germany. His father was a renowned horn player and he enjoyed a privileged life. To many, Strauß was nothing short of a musical genius. His 1st composition was published at the tender age of 12, and his portfolio was extensive by the time he completed his schooling. Perhaps influenced by his father, Strauß's earliest works were Classical and conservative in nature. Starting his career at such a young age enabled Strauß to enjoy a degree of prominence by his early 20's. Some older, yet, very accomplished composers never reached the level of stature occupied by Strauß. At 22, Strauß's Symphonic fantasy « Aus Italien » (From Italy) revealed the strong Wagnerian influence on the young composer. Strauß's most notable stylistic focuses were his « tone poems » which were derivatives of the older Symphonic poems. The 1st of these, « Don Juan » , was published in 1888 continuing through 1903 with « Sinfonia Domestica » . Following this series of 8 poems, Strauß achieved unrivaled popular success and furthered his position as one of the most advanced composers of the time. During this period, he also held highly-reputable positions as a conductor in Meiningen, Munich, Weimar, Berlin and Vienna. He also served as guest-conductor on numerous occasions and his compositions were frequently performed.

A great portion of Strauß's prolific career developed under the strong sense of nationalism and political unrest throughout Europe. This national pride was furthered by Germany's successes and Germany gained the position of political and industrial power of Europe. Strauß fully embraced the sentiment of national pride and superiority of Germans. Perhaps, his empowering self-confidence was in some way derived from his feeling of belonging to this superior group. Whatever the foundation of his confidence, it is an identifying characteristic of his compositional style. « Ein Heldenleben » (A Hero's Life, 1898) is the culmination of his confidence. Some critics claim the hero in this piece is identified as Strauß himself, who possesses powers to overcome all obstacles he encounters.

In addition to his tone poems, Strauß was also an accomplished composer in Opera, Symphonic music, songs and choral works :

« Extending Wagner's practice, he carried the leitmotif over into a purely instrumental context. Using an array of very brief, though readily identifiable, melodic figures presented in rapid alternation and shifting combinations, Strauß fashioned complex polyphonic textures only barely contained within a highly-inflected and intensely chromatic harmonic framework. » (Mac Morgan, page 31.)

The result was a compression of an unprecedented amount of material, in a very short amount of time. This intense context made a lasting impression upon his contemporaries. Strauß also demanded the highest levels of instrumental playing for his Orchestras, only to be seconded by Gustav Mahler. Despite his nationalism, Strauß also experimented with foreign musical influences to create different sounds with the musical instruments.

Richard Strauß' Operas possessed similar stylistic qualities with his tone poems, and were essentially works staged to accompany the orchestral music. « Salome » (1905) and « Elektra » (1908) were among his most technically advanced :

« The technical developments encountered in the earlier works are carried to a new and critical stage : the tonal underpinnings are now strained to the breaking point, and the unfolding of the musical argument achieves an almost unbearable level of intensity and complexity. » (Mac Morgan, page 32.)

His next Opera composition, « Der Rosenkavalier » (The Cavalier of the Rose, 1910) , returned to a more traditional composition style with regard to tonality. While his earlier Operas pushed the boundaries of tonality, undermining the foundation of the old tonal system, Strauß preferred to return to the confines of traditional tonality. The plots of the earlier Operas revolved around compulsive obsessions and murderous desires, while « Der Rosenkavalier » was the more traditional love story. This initial path of progression followed by an abrupt return to traditional style marked a turning point in Strauß's career. He never again reached the level of modernity achieved in « Salome » and « Elektra » . His preference to conservatism will later be significant when his position within the 3rd « Reich » is examined.

After Germany's defeat in World War I, Strauß continued in his strong devotion to the arts and met with officials of the Weimar Republic to discuss the administration of culture. At a glance, the musical scene under the Weimar Republic (1919-1933) would seem entirely progressive in nature. Major developments flourished in this environment to include 12 tone composition, experimentation with jazz, a new objectivity, and refreshing conventions of Music Theatre. Some of the more accomplished composers found themselves in an elite community within Berlin. These included Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith, and Kurt Weill, in addition to non-German composers such as Igor Stravinsky and Béla Bartók. Wilhelm Furtwängler became conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1922, helping it become one of the finest ensembles in Europe. Despite this new found artistic expression and recognition, the foundation of the Weimar Republic itself was in turmoil as Germany struggled to recover from World War I and the severe punishments rendered through the Treaty of Versailles because of Germany's role in the War. Economic, social and political unrest contributed to cultural attitudes both positively and negatively. The increase in popularity of the extremist Nazi Party led to a rise in conservative and traditional cultural ideals promoting a return to Germany's national Romanticism and rejection of all foreign influences. As previously discussed, Richard Strauß belonged to the Romantic genre and appreciated the return to traditional German music. This belief aligned him with the values of the Nazis and led to his appointment in a rather prestigious role following Hitler's appointment as Chancellor of Germany, in 1933. Nevertheless, his role in the music scene under Hitler's regime resulted in much skepticism, criticism along with appreciation.

The rise of Strauß's career under the Nazi regime was a result of his many accomplishments and attitude regarding conservative cultural values :

« Strauß's appointment by (Josef) Gœbbels as President of the " Reich " Music Chamber, in November 1933, was the logical consequence of a lifetime of efforts spent on behalf of the professional interests of German musicians in general and composers in particular. » (Michaël Kater, page 216.)

Among Strauß's many accomplishments, include his lobbying for a union of musicians, a revision of copyright laws that would favor the composer instead of the publisher, and an extension of the royalty rights, from 30 years to 50 years. Despite these achievements, Strauß had a vast array of goals that had, yet, to be realized at the collapse of the Weimar Republic. As noted, Strauß possessed a strong sense of national pride and opposed foreign music unless it was up to the level of his extremely high artistic standards. Many German composers were also deemed unworthy in his standards largely because of their progressive tendencies. Among these, include highly-accomplished composers Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith and Alban Berg.

Coinciding with Strauß's high artistic standards, one of his goals was to have all inadequate composers and music genres censored to prevent contamination of the works of his peers and his own. He also proposed all Orchestras and Operatic stages that were not comprised of quality musicians be shut down regardless of patronage. He believed the Republic should hire only the best musicians and sufficient funds should be set aside to assure Germany would receive the highest quality of music and musical performance. For these and other unrealized goals, Strauß believed in Adolf Hitler as someone who would be more sympathetic to the arts and who had a more authoritarian nature that would bypass the red tape of any parliament entity. With these expectations, Strauß welcomed the coming of the 3rd « Reich » . He seemed to be able to downplay the violent aspects of the 3rd « Reich » , in order to pursue his cultural visions.

Before his presidency over the « Reich » Music Chamber, Strauß had become very integrated within the National-Socialist Party and had proved early on to be a useful tool for Nazi propaganda. Early on, Strauß also learned his aggressive goals would not be so quickly realized within the confines of the 3rd « Reich » . He continually drafted proposals and submitted these to Josef Gœbbels who utilized as many delay tactics as possible to avoid responding to these proposals. When Strauß realized he might be the renowned figurehead the regime wanted he was able to gain leverage for his causes.

This, then, was the immediate background to an understanding between Strauß and Gœbbels that the composer act as head of a new corporatist professional chamber according to the fascist model now also successfully tried by dictators such as music-loving Benito Mussolini, and that in return, and within the organizational framework, Strauß could service his detailed music-specific interests, those dear to his heart for decades. (Michaël Kater, page 220.)

Richard Strauß's involvement with the inner workings of the Nazi regime was not prompted by anti-Semitic sentiments, but largely an act of personal gratification and a boost to his ego. Additionally, Strauß accepted this appointment because he « believed that a dictatorial regime could finally implement the changes toward neo-corporatism that would benefit the German musical profession, and in particular composers » . (Michaël Kater, 1997, page 18.)

Given the subjectivity involved in several of his administrative platforms, the difficulties he encountered within the organization were largely based upon a personal rather than professional basis.

He began his position as President on a strong footing. On November 15, 1933, Strauß conducted his « Festliches Präludium » for the opening ceremony of the « Reich » Cultural Chamber (« RKK ») , in Berlin. Following this ceremony, Josef Gœbbels extended Strauß's responsibilities to include leader of Professional Composers, which was then included in the music chamber. One of his 1st official actions was the organization of the Composers' Festival in Berlin where he requested the presence of all German composers in an effort to centralize all musicians primarily by banning all lobbies operating without authorization from the « Reichsmusikkammer » . One of his most significant accomplishments, however, was the successful formation of an international composers' cooperation with countries that were either neutral or friendly to Nazi Germany. Naturally, these composers had to meet Strauß's standards, which largely meant they had to be traditionalist oriented. This organization was founded on June 6, 1934, and had an original membership of 13 nations, which quickly expanded to 20. Strauß also served as President of this organization.

Richard Strauß always maintained a high-standard of musicianship and this sentiment did not waiver under the confines of the Nazi Regime. He wholeheartedly believed that Germans should only be exposed to the best musicians and his primary focus rested with Operas. Although not officially enforced, censorship of specific composers and / or compositions was encouraged. For instance, performances of Verdi and Puccini Operas were reduced in favor of German or Austrian works. Operas by Richard Wagner, Max von Schillings, and Alexander Ritter were among the favored selections, in addition to his own compositions of course. Small and understaffed Opera Houses were to be shut down as these could not possibility reach the performance standards of serious works and larger Opera Houses. The Opera Houses, in general, should be consolidated in order to weed-out less competent artists and provide incentives for the recruitment of accomplished and renowned artists. Josef Gœbbels, however, was not supportive of these proposed reforms.

his campaign efforts and believed his role as President of the « Reich » Chamber Music would finally prove to be the vehicle toward success. The Nazis, however, believed his role as President was that of a respected and useful ally. Nevertheless, the conflicts between Strauß and the administration became continuous events. Strauß's confidence and egoism led to extreme difficulties in conforming his compositions to meet the standards of the Nazi Regime. Additionally, he teamed-up with writer Stefan Zweig, who by Nazi definition was a full Jew, to complete the Opera « Die schweigsame Frau » . His association with Zweig compromised his position as head of the « RKM » . At this time, the performance of music by Jewish composers was forbidden. Yet, Goebbels, with Adolf Hitler's permission, granted an exception and Strauß was able to premiere his Opera, in 1935. Although Strauß originally welcomed this seemingly act of good will by the Regime, he later chose to delay the premiere given the audiences attitude toward Jewish composers. He did not wish to cause Zweig any further humiliation than he had already encountered. (It was common for the audience to withhold applause or even shout obscenities at performances with Jews at the helm.) Eventually, in efforts to re-establish his alliance with the Nazi leaders, the Opera indeed premiered on June 24, 1935, against Zweig's numerous protests. Zweig officially dissolved his partnership with Strauß noting his solidarity with his fellow Jewish artists who had been persecuted by the Nazis. With this solidarity, maintaining a professional relationship with the head of the « Reichsmusikkammer » was impossible. Strauß genuinely wished to continue his working relationship with Zweig and even convinced him to agree to a secret arrangement. In further defense of himself, he sent a letter to Zweig that his role in the « Reichsmusikkammer » was nothing more than that of a figurehead. This letter was intercepted by the « Gestapo » and delivered to Goebbels. Strauß was subsequently ordered to resign « due to ill health and old age » . (Michaël Kater, pages 242-243.)

Richard Strauß's professional career suffered after his relationship with the Party had dissolved. His works that were previously acceptable under the Nazi standards were now facing censorship. The loss of Zweig as his partner also affected his creative output, coupled with the increased emotional stress Strauß was experiencing. He further mistakenly believed his direct relationship with Hitler was not affected by his termination and requested Hitler meet with him for a private discussion to personally defend his actions. For many months, he utilized every contact he had in order to secure a meeting with Hitler and Goebbels. Strauß was reasonably concerned he would no longer be permitted to conduct in Party sanctioned events. This was somewhat alleviated when he was allowed to conduct the Olympic Hymn he had specifically written for the Summer Olympic Games, held in 1936.

Outside the control of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , Strauß maintained his position as President of the International Composers Association. In this regard, Goebbels still valued the media attention associated with Strauß. Although Strauß still proved to be useful to the Nazis, his status was, by no means, one of mutual respect :

« It required of Strauß to show-off his regime marketable qualities and a continuation of the subservient, sometimes groveling, attitude that had Ist manifested in that self-demeaning letter to Hitler (requesting a meeting) , in July 1935. » (Michaël Kater, page 249.)

Thus, Richard Strauß continued his turbulent relationship with the Regime from the Olympic Games, in 1936, through 1944. It was also during this period that Strauß's Jewish daughter-in-law, Alice Strauß, was harassed as part of the November « Pogrom » , in 1938, also known as « Kristallnacht » . Strauß's relationship with Zweig and his lack of support for the anti-Semitic policies were perhaps responsible for Alice's harassment. The November « Pogrom » was primarily targeted at males, and Jewish women married to Aryan men were unharmed. Alice was undeniably targeted because of her connection to Richard Strauß. Strauß, still aware of his value to the Regime, demanded Aryan rights be fully extended to his daughter-in-law and grand-children. While Hitler extended certain concessions, the Strauß family remained at risk. Unfortunately, many of Alice Strauß's Jewish relatives were sent to concentration camps where they were murdered. Alice and her husband Franz were also jailed at one point by the « Gestapo ». All these events occurred at the behest of Josef Gœbbels while he was working « professionally » with Strauß.

As the War progressed into 1944, the Nazis no longer cared about propaganda as all efforts needed to be focused on War. Strauß's professional career began to increasingly suffer, and many of his ties with the upper-echelons of the Regime were dissolved. Previous national festivities in honour of his birthday were canceled, leaving the only ceremony for his 80th birthday, held in Vienna. Strauß was deeply wounded by this affront. The Salzburg Festival held, that same year, was also canceled ; he was to premiere one of his last Operas, « Weltschmerz », at this event. The cancellation of the Festival was not directly aimed at Strauß, but fell under the blanket cancellation of cultural events by Gœbbels because of the War. Nonetheless, Strauß suffered severe anguish as a result ; not only at the cancellation of his Opera, but also because of the damage done to the cultural atmosphere in Germany. Following the War, Strauß was the defendant in his own denazification trial, in 1947. Among the charges were Strauß's anti-Semitic activities and his affiliation with the Nazi Party. The trial was ultimately canceled a few months into the proceedings as Strauß did not meet the definitions of any of the Nazi categories. He was formally vindicated in 1948.

In the years following the end of the 3rd « Reich », Strauß composed numerous works and his compositions were performed internationally. Some of these compositions include the « Metamorphosen » for 23 strings (1945) and the « 4 Last Songs » for voice and orchestra (1948) . (Mac Morgan, page 35.)

Yet, there was, and still remains, a stigma associated with Strauß because of his involvement with the Nazi Regime. His overall musical achievements, however, established his historical greatness even prior to his involvement with the Nazis. With the exception of Israel, his works were never banned by the international music community. Strauß died in 1949 and left behind a legacy as « the last German Operatic Master of world-wide importance » . (Jane McClelland, page 347.)

Although his major technical contributions to music were made early on his career (most notably « Elektra ») , his continued devotion to the cultural arts and attempts to improve conditions for his fellow artists are what makes his career and life so much more distinguished. For many years, he led a privileged life and while his motives have been called into question, he continued making strides for musicians even under the direst conditions he experienced under the Nazi Regime. Of course, these conditions were not so dire in comparison to his fellow artisans, but for a man of his esteem to him these were almost intolerable.

Richard Strauß and Hitler's « Reich » : Jupiter in Hell

(Michaël H. Kater.)

Most German composers were in for a hard time when the « Allies » descended on Adolf Hitler's « Reich » , in 1945. Hans Pfitzner, who had strived unsuccessfully to be the « Führer » 's court composer, was lying low in shabby south German quarters. Carl Orff, who had composed an « Aryan » version of incidental music to « A Midsummer Night's Dream » to replace Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's original, among other follies, lied to American denazification officers about having helped found the anti-Nazi resistance group « White Rose » . He was speedily rehabilitated. His friend Werner Egk, who had been an official in the cultural bureaucracy but who lacked Orff's opportune connections, took much longer to whitewash himself.

Only Richard Strauß seemed unperturbed. As his grandson Richard Strauß, Junior, tells it, American jeeps pulled-up to Strauß's villa in Garmisch, at the end of April. Richard Junior, then 17, ran into the composer's study, shouting : « Grandpa, we are being evacuated within 20 minutes. » .

« Easy, easy. » , the composer said, slowly opening a drawer. He fetched a number of papers, including certificates of honorary citizenship from cities in the United States, and some scores. Then, tall and imposing, he planted himself at the front of his house and announced to the soldiers in halting English :

« My name is Richard Strauß. I am the composer ... » , he held-up pages from his Opera « Der Rosenkavalier » : « Here, you may look at them if you want. »

The Americans stepped back in awe. Nothing happened to Strauß's family. Instead, officers arrived a few days later for dinner. Strauß and his wife were then allowed recuperation in Switzerland. In 1948, after perfunctory German denazification, Strauß was classified « not incriminated » .

This was the unspectacular end of a career in the Nazi regime by a man whose biographers have usually called him either « fascist » or « apolitical » . Strauß, who loved Mozart's « Jupiter » Symphony above all and himself expected to be called home to the gods after having fulfilled what he saw as Germany's highest cultural mission : this Jupiter said that he never meddled in politics. In fact, neither label applies. As late as 1930, Strauß derided the Nazi Party culture broker Alfred Rosenberg as a political « ingénu » , « who did not have one clue » .

All the same, by January 1933, Strauß, guided by his belief in authority, thought that a Adolf Hitler dictatorship might have the stuff to institute reforms in Operatic production, music instruction and the like. In the fall of that year, he calculatingly accepted the offer of Josef Gœbbels, the « Reich » propaganda Minister, to make him President of the « Reich » Music Chamber. An aes theocrat, Strauß wanted to regulate the affairs of music and musicians in the German « Reich » according to his rarefied canon. For one thing, he wanted an assurance that musicians would earn more money, especially composers, and especially he. Since early in the Century, he had harbored professional and personal goals that had never been realized.

Not that any such short- or long-term frustrations have got in the way of Strauß's ultimate vindication as a bright and permanent light in the musical universe. Whatever else may have been going on, after all, Strauß did continue to write the music that solidified his fame, from « Arabella » , which had its premiere in 1933, through the « Metamorphosen » of 1945 right down to the « 4 Last Songs » of 1948.

Strauß assumed his highly-political job when (in November 1933, as the new head of the music Chamber but, by no means, a Nazi) he thanked Gœbbels and Hitler for allowing him to use the National-Socialist leadership principle in an effort to coordinate the German music establishment tightly. Strauß had enough political savvy to see him through the 1st few months of the Nazi regime's music administration, but he implemented few reforms, for a combination of reasons.

1st, he preferred staying at home in mountainous Garmisch and composing music to directing the Chamber's turgid bureaucracy from Berlin. His deputies, though largely hand-picked, were 3rd rate, and they soon succumbed to internecine quarrels and intrigues against him.

2nd, he could have delegated more authority to his vice-President, the famous conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, but Furtwängler, Strauß's greatest rival as German musician laureate at the time, felt overlooked too often and caused ill will.

3rd, Strauß's sensible-sounding reform proposals offended Gœbbels : not least those for downgrading the Berlin Opera that was under the propaganda Minister's jurisdiction, the « Deutsches Opernhaus » , to a sort of pops company. Strauß wished to leave the serious repertory to Prussian Minister-President Hermann Göring's « Berlin Staatsoper » .

And 4th, Strauß mixed-up his own business with that of his office when he encouraged stagings of his Operas. These included, in June 1935, his newest one, « Die Schweigsame Frau » , with a libretto by Stefan Zweig, an Austrian Jew. Strauß thus created conflicts of interest, which the leaders of the 3rd « Reich » frowned on, and he violated the regime's official policy of anti-Semitism, an infraction that weighed even more heavily because of his earlier refusal to enact discriminatory policies against Jewish musicians.

Josef Gœbbels ordered Strauß to resign the Chamber presidency, in July 1935, « on account of ill health » , and Strauß complied. He had experienced more than his share of trouble with the music administration in Berlin, and he realized that, even if Hitler and Göring were on his side (a reasonable assumption only in Göring's case) , Gœbbels, his immediate superior, could not stand him.

At any rate, the fact that Strauß was doing his best to retain the services of the Jewish Zweig as his librettist did not escape the leaders of the regime. Gœbbels, especially, was furious. After a couple of repeat performances of « Die Schweigsame Frau » , further presentations were prohibited. Moreover, as the Nuremberg Race Laws were being prepared for promulgation at the Nazi Party rally, in September 1935, it was becoming obvious to the leadership that Strauß was bent on protecting his Jewish daughter-in-law, Alice, as well as his grandsons, Richard, aged 7, and Christian, aged 3.

Richard Strauß, 71 at the time, should have been able to retire to a quiet life as head of his family in Garmisch and as the pre-eminent and still awesomely creative composer of his day. Instead, he entered into a new working relationship with the regime, which has puzzled Strauß biographers ever since. By its unwritten terms, Strauß, for his part, continued to serve the 3rd « Reich » in various representative functions, like President of the Nazi-controlled Permanent Council for the International Cooperation of Composers. He also provided his « Olympische Hymne » for the Olympic Games of 1936, in Berlin, and he conducted his own works as the centerpiece of a « Reich » music Festival in Düsseldorf, in 1938.

But if events of 1935 had constituted a humiliating defeat for him, as he tried to intimate in a pained letter to the « Führer » , in July of that year, why did he cooperate further, and what did he expect in return ? For one thing, this Jupiter, grand-signorial, yet, also disarmingly charming in his arch-Bavarian manner, had never been a recluse ; he loved company. In addition, his music would continue to be performed often and prominently, something very important to his ego : his « sacro egoismo » , as it had always been.

Perhaps, more critical still, behind a facade of what outsiders might have mistaken as immense wealth, Strauß was forced to earn money and spend it moderately, even if, by ordinary standards, he was very well off. He was the sole breadwinner for his extended family, which included that of his son, Franz, whom Strauß employed as his personal secretary.

With « Die Schweigsame Frau » off limits and foreign enemies of Germany now against him, Strauß was acutely dependent on the performance of other compositions, his past and future Operas, in the « Reich » . Apart from personality frictions, he knew that the Nazi leaders, including Josef Gœbbels, not only loved them but also used them as a showcase. Contrary to rumors spread abroad, supposedly by Jewish exiles, German culture, it was claimed, still had cachet, with Strauß as its symbol.

So, when his new composition, « Friedenstag » , was given its premiere in Vienna to celebrate his 75th birthday, in 1939, with Hitler and Goebbels present, both sides knew that Strauß was caught as the weaker partner in a relationship of mutual dependence with the regime. By then, Strauß had no choice but to continue doing the bidding of the Nazi leadership, for it had placed him under permanent pressure, in effect holding his daughter-in-law and grand-children for ransom as life in the 3rd « Reich » was becoming ever more unbearable for Jews.

In a carefully planned collaboration between Goebbels's Ministry and Heinrich Himmler's « Gestapo » , Alice Strauß and her sons had already been harassed during the Pogrom of November 1938. This action was taken solely to keep the composer in line. Jewish spouses of « Aryan » Germans were then generally not molested. (Nor later, as partners in « privileged » marriages, were they typically evacuated to the Eastern camps.) Moreover, during that infamous « Kristallnacht » , only men, rarely women, were singled-out for punishment. And just to drive the regime's point home, Christian and his brother Richard were man-handled, spat on and kicked by storm troopers in the market square of Garmisch, alongside the small-town's adolescent male Jews.

Richard Strauß used the occasion of the Viennese birthday celebrations, in 1939 (which, both sides understood, were needed window dressing for the outside world) , to demand guarantees from Goebbels that vital confiscated documents would be returned to his daughter-in-law and that his grandsons would not be encumbered in their education and careers. Eventually, the grandsons should also be permitted to marry « Aryan » women. Strauß noted that such concessions would free his creative forces « from a pressing burden » : a strong hint that he was prepared to withhold his side of the bargain. Still, it took the Mephistophelean Goebbels almost 2 years before he asked Hitler to extend to the boys « Aryan » privileges, limited to their formal education.

Then, in 1941, the regime again reminded Strauß who was boss. Alice's Jewish grand-mother, Paula Neumann (« née » Hauowitz) , 3 years older than Strauß himself, was being interned in Prague, as were many other of Alice's Czech-based relatives. Helped by Alice's mother, Marie von Grab, herself safe in Lucerne, Switzerland, Strauß and his son, Franz, tried for several months to move « Frau » Neumann from the Nazi-occupied Czech Protectorate to Vienna, where Gauleiter Baldur von Schirach had recently emerged as the latest of the composer's few benevolent but ultimately impotent allies in the regime. At a time, when other Jews were often protected or set free by the highest Nazi leaders (examples being the wives of Adolf Hitler's favourite light-music composer, Franz Lehár, and of the Viennese film comedian, Hans Moser) , the regime pretended not to notice Strauß's plight.

In 1942, Strauß wrote to « SS-Obersturmbannführer » Doctor Günther of the Prague « Gestapo » , reminding him that « the old woman is without any help » and asking whether he would assist her in traveling to the Swiss border. Strauß had already secured the cooperation of the Swiss « with the greatest of difficulties » , he wrote. But now, « what I was able to accomplish abroad does not seem possible for me in my own fatherland, and that is to facilitate the emigration of a totally innocent and harmless woman to Switzerland, without a single penny of her own » .

No answer came, so Strauß set-out in his « Horch » limousine. Chauffeured right-up to the gates of the « Theresienstadt » concentration camp, he stepped-out, announcing to the SS guards, as he later would to American G.I.'s : « I am Doctor Strauß, the composer. » . This time, they looked right through him and ordered him to turn around, without Paula Neumann. In the end, she was killed, along with 25 other relatives of Alice Strauß, in the Eastern camps.

In this case, the Nazi regime's reticence was just as calculated as was Josef Goebbels's decision to award carefully selected medals and cash prizes to the Master, from 1942 to 1944. Nor did Strauß's daughter-in-law escape further chicanery ; she and even her husband, Franz, were repeatedly arrested by the « Gestapo » .

Richard Strauß himself was harried in Garmisch, where he was supposed to surrender parts of his house to civil engineers. His social intercourse with Nazi personnel was interdicted (not that he now cared) . Border crossings to his favourite spa in Switzerland were forbidden, and he was denied a full measure of 80th birthday honours, in 1944. (These slights, he minded very much.) His last Opera awaiting performance, « Die Liebe der Danae » , in which the magnificent baritone Hans Hotter was to star (in the role of Jupiter) that summer, was granted only a dress rehearsal in Salzburg.

Clearly, Strauß, the Jupiter of the composer gods, had compromised himself through his working arrangement in Adolf Hitler's hell, by the time the American soldiers looked him up in 1945. He was no hero, as his biographer George Marek has astutely noted, but then Strauß had satirized himself and somehow forewarned his audience, Eulenspiegel-like, in his tone poem « Ein Heldenleben » , half a Century before. Other than for the safety of his family and his personal amenities, he did not do battle with the 3rd « Reich » .

All the same, never having censored a work of art during his short administrative tenure, and having resisted censorship of his own music, he did what he would always claim to have accomplished : he respected art for art's sake even when he disliked it, as with abstract paintings, Paul Hindemith's early atonal experiments and Arnold Schönberg's dodecaphony. As much as he was Jupiter, the last 2 decades of Richard Strauß's life were tainted by misfortune. A child of the 19th Century, he had foolishly tried to use the modern-day phenomenon of totalitarian Fascism for a good cause, or so he thought.

At the cost of personal hardship, he had to be disabused of that notion. Still, he was fortunate not to have come to realize the depths of political corruption and crime that might have lain in wait had he overstayed the Nazis' welcome for him as music Chamber President beyond the summer of 1935.

Herbert von Karajan

Heribert, Ritter von Karajan (chevalier de Karajan) est né dans une famille autrichienne de Salzbourg dont un ancêtre, côté paternel, était originaire de Macédoine. Son arrière-arrière-grand-père, l'Aroumain Geòrgios Johannes Karajànnis, originaire de Kozani, dans l'actuelle Grèce, partit pour Vienne en 1767, puis pour Chemnitz en Saxe. Lui et son fils furent anoblis par l'Électeur de Saxe, Frédéric-Auguste III, le 1er juin 1792, en reconnaissance de leur contribution au développement de l'industrie textile saxonne ; Karajànnis devint Karajan, auquel fut ajoutée la particule « von » . Il est le second fils d'Ernst, chirurgien et directeur du principal hôpital de Salzbourg, et Martha Cosmac, issue d'une famille de notables de la région de Graz.

Son père qui est clarinettiste au « Mozarteum » de Salzbourg, initie tôt ses enfants à la musique. Son frère-aîné, Wolfgang, se révèle peu doué pour le piano mais Herbert, caché sous l'instrument, profite des leçons laborieuses de Wolfgang, avant même de recevoir des leçons et de devenir un interprète doué. De 1916 à 1926, il étudie au « Mozarteum » de Salzbourg. Le directeur du Conservatoire local, le pédagogue Bernhard Paumgartner, le prend sous son aile et devient son mentor, lui conseillant de se concentrer sur la composition et la direction d'orchestre, cette conversion étant favorisée par une tendinite chronique qui affecte les doigts d'Herbert.

Il poursuit ses études musicales à l'Académie de musique de Vienne auprès du professeur Franz Schalk.

Herbert von Karajan fait ses débuts officiels de chef d'orchestre, en 1929, en dirigeant « Salomé » de Richard Strauß à Salzbourg et devient, jusqu'en 1934, 1er Maître-de-chapelle de l'Opéra d'État d'Ulm. En 1933, il fait ses débuts au Festival de Salzbourg en dirigeant « la Nuit de Walpurgis » de Felix Mendelssohn dans une production du « Faust » de Goethe par le metteur en scène Max Reinhardt. La même année, il présente à Salzbourg une 1re demande d'adhésion au Parti nazi, qui n'aboutit pas à cause des restrictions décidées au sein du Parti nazi après l'arrivée au pouvoir d'Adolf Hitler ; mais il y adhère finalement 2 ans plus tard, en mars 1935, notamment dans le but d'obtenir le poste ardemment convoité de chef de l'Orchestre symphonique du Théâtre d'Aix-la-Chapelle. Cette adhésion fait suite à l'expression répétée de sympathies vis-à-vis de l'extrême-droite dans sa jeunesse, et ne peut être réduite à son carriérisme.

En 1935, il est le plus jeune directeur musical (« Generalmusikdirektor ») allemand et il est invité par Hitler à diriger à Stockholm, Bruxelles et Amsterdam. En 1937, il fait ses débuts à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et de l'Opéra national dans « Fidelio » de Beethoven.

En 1938, il obtient son 1er grand succès à Berlin en dirigeant le « Tristan und Isolde » de Richard Wagner ; le critique berlinois Edwin von der Nüll titre ainsi son article : « Das Wunder Karajan » (le miracle Karajan) . Il devient alors un pion utilisé contre Wilhelm Furtwängler dans la guerre culturelle interne qui oppose Josef Gœbbels à Hermann Göring pour le contrôle du monde musical allemand, Gœbbels soutenant l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et Göring l'Opéra national. Le 26 juillet 1938, il épouse la chanteuse d'Opérette, Elmy Holgerloef. Ils divorcent en 1942, Herbert se remariant le 22 octobre de la même année avec la jeune héritière d'une grande dynastie d'industriels allemands, Anna Maria Gütermann (appelée Anita) .

En 1939, Karajan s'attire l'inimitié d'Hitler lors d'un concert de gala donné en l'honneur des monarques yougoslaves où, en raison de l'erreur du baryton Rudolf Bockelmann, il perd le fil des « Maîtres-Chanteurs de Nuremberg » de Wagner (qu'il dirigeait sans partition, comme à son habitude) , les chanteurs cessent alors de chanter et, dans la plus grande confusion, le rideau tombe.

Furieux, Hitler donne cet ordre à Winifred Wagner :

« Moi vivant, " Herr " von Karajan ne dirigera jamais à Bayreuth. »

Karajan demeure cependant à la tête de l'Orchestre de la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, à l'Opéra national.

Après la Guerre, en 1947, il est « dénazifié » par les Alliés et pris sous contrat par Walter Legge, pour devenir l'année suivante chef d'orchestre permanent du « Philharmonia Orchestra » de Londres. À la ré-ouverture du Festival de Bayreuth, en 1951, ainsi que l'année suivante, il est invité à diriger l'Orchestre du Festival, notamment dans un « Tristan und Isolde » devenu légendaire. Le chef d'orchestre Wilhelm Furtwängler meurt à la fin de 1954. Karajan est nommé, en 1955, « chef à vie » de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, ce qui lui permet de réaliser son rêve de toujours : devenir le successeur de l'illustre chef allemand.

Sa nomination signe le départ de Sergiù Celibidache, le chef-associé du Philharmonique de Berlin. Karajan vouait une inimitié à Celibidache et raya son nom de la liste des chefs titulaires du Philharmonique. Ce dernier ne redirigera le Philharmonique qu'une seule fois, soit en 1992, après la mort de Karajan. Son nom ne fut rétabli parmi la liste des chefs titulaires que tardivement par Simon Rattle, lors de sa prise de fonction à la tête du Philharmonique de Berlin, en 1999.

Il est alors à la tête de l'Orchestre qui est considéré, à l'époque, et depuis longtemps déjà, comme le plus prestigieux du monde et Karajan peut se considérer comme l'héritier de la plus grande tradition allemande de direction orchestrale (Richard Wagner, Hans von Bülow, Arthur Nikisch et Wilhelm Furtwängler) . La qualité de l'Orchestre est telle que Karajan confia une fois à ses nouveaux musiciens qu' « il avait l'impression de s'appuyer contre un mur épais lorsqu'il les dirigeait » .

En 1955, après un 1er concert au « Carnegie Hall » de New York, il fait avec l'Orchestre une grande tournée aux États-Unis, qu'il renouvelle l'année suivante. C'est dans ces années que se met en place le « système Karajan » très élaboré, qui consiste à faire travailler l'Orchestre en studio avant d'enregistrer les Opéras sur disque, de sorte qu'au moment des représentations sur scène, l'Orchestre est parfaitement rodé.

Herbert von Karajan, le prestigieux chef d'orchestre du Philharmonique de Berlin vedette « star » de la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » a, après la Guerre, tenté de dissimuler son passé nazi. À l'occasion d'un séminaire qui vient de se tenir à Vienne, l'historien autrichien Oliver Rathkolb éclaire d'un jour nouveau cet épisode de la vie de Karajan en présentant des documents inconnus à ce jour.

Certes, on savait qu'il avait pris sa carte au Parti nazi, qu'il s'était « acoquiné » avec ces derniers comme bien d'autres d'ailleurs, sans qu'on sache réellement à quelle date, qu'il avait dirigé en 1939 « les Maîtres-chanteurs » devant Hitler, à l'occasion d'une soirée de gala donnée à Berlin en l'honneur du Régent Paul de Yougoslavie. (Le concert ne plut d'ailleurs pas au « Führer » . Hitler aurait alors traité Karajan de « freluquet autrichien » , il considéra cela comme un affront personnel et lui en voulut.)

On connaissait la rivalité farouche qui l'opposait à son aîné, Wilhelm Furtwängler, qui le détestait et qui l'appelait « le petit K ». On avait connaissance du soutien que lui avait apporté Josef Gœbbels, chef de la propagande et, à ce titre, en charge des arts, Hermann Göring lui préférait Furtwängler. Karajan, à la demande d'Hitler, fit le tour des capitales occupées par les Nazis (Amsterdam, Copenhague, Bucarest) . À Paris, en 1941, à l'Opéra Garnier, il dirigea « Tristan und Isolde » avec la soprano française Germaine Lubin dans le rôle d'Isolde.

Jamais durant sa carrière qui le hissa au pinacle de la renommée mondiale (il fut, avant l'heure, une « star » faisant la une des journaux papier glacé, et sa vie mondaine très médiatisée constituait après la musique le second volet de sa personnalité) n'admit-il de reconnaître ses (comment dire ?) fautes ... Bien au contraire, il dépêchait alors immédiatement ses avocats pour faire taire toutes critiques.

Le passé nazi de Karajan lui a valu de nombreuses manifestations hostiles lors de sa tournée initiale aux États Unis, en 1955 (au « Carnegie Hall » de New York, en particulier) . Karajan fut, finalement, admis à diriger en URSS à partir des années 1960. Mais jamais en Israël (le 1er concert du « Berliner Philharmoniker » à Tel-Aviv est récent) .

Arturo Toscanini, Eugène Ormandy et d'autres ont refusé de le rencontrer. Arthur Rubinstein a boycotté l'Allemagne jusqu'à la fin de ses jours, en 1982 !

De sa vie personnelle, il fit état pour se défendre présentant ainsi son 1er mariage avec Anita Gütermann dont le grand père était juif, comme élément en faveur de son innocence. Au lendemain de la Guerre, il utilisa ce même argument pour se défendre contre les Russes qui lui avaient interdit de diriger. Bref, sa renommée était entachée par des zones d'ombre.

Karajan nazi ? Il fallut, en 1945, 2 années pour conduire son procès en dénazification, avant de tourner la page. Légalement. Car Karajan n'a jamais exprimé de regret, n'a jamais rien dit sur la « Shoah », et des musiciens tels qu'Isaac Stern ou Itzhak Perlman ont toujours refusé de le côtoyer. Ce silence sur 10 années noires, qui sont au cœur de sa carrière, pèse plus encore que les années elles-mêmes.

Les documents présentés par le Professeur Oliver Rathkolb, à Vienne, sont rien moins que troublants et découvrent du chef d'orchestre une personnalité plutôt glauque et nauséabonde que celui-ci résolument occulta. L'on pouvait jusqu'à ce jour penser que l'attitude de Karajan envers le Nazisme relevait plus du carriérisme que de la conviction. Les nouveaux documents présentés balaient cette interprétation. Voici ce qu'on y apprend :

Karajan a adhéré au Parti nazi (NSDAP) dès le 8 avril 1933 (Adolf Hitler arrive au pouvoir en janvier 1933) avec la carte numéro 1.607.525 alors que le mouvement hitlérien devait être plus tard interdit en Autriche et le restera jusqu'à l'annexion (« Anschluß ») en 1938.

N'ayant pas payé ses cotisations, une nouvelle carte d'adhérent (numéro 3.430.914) lui a ensuite été délivrée, rétroactivement au 1er mai 1933. Ce type de carte d'adhérent rétroactive était accordée par le Parti nazi à des personnalités de prestige. Ces éléments figurent, noir sur blanc, dans un fichier de cartes d'adhérents du NSDAP, avec une photo du jeune Herbert von Karajan et une confirmation écrite de son adhésion par le chef d'orchestre, datée du 26 novembre 1936.

Devant une Commission de dénazification des Alliés, en 1945-1946, Herbert von Karajan avait certes admis avoir adhéré au NSDAP, tout en affirmant l'avoir fait non par conviction, mais par souci de sa carrière à une époque où les Nazis contrôlaient totalement la vie culturelle en Allemagne, avec comme maître-d'œuvre le chef de la propagande nazie, Josef Goebbels. La culture était une compétence du ministère de la propagande, détail qui ne pouvait échapper à personne. Et « le petit K » devint une pièce du dispositif.

Ces choix n'étaient pas obligés. L'hydre nazi apparut au grand jour dès 1933, lres arrestations, développement « ad vomitum » de l'antisémitisme, de la haine anti-juive, ouverture des lers camps, autodafés de milliers de livres jugés subversifs, artistes bannis, condamnés, artistes et intellectuels contraints de fuir. A-t-on jamais entendu ce grand chef défendre des démocrates pourchassés ou des artistes juifs menacés ?

Or, durant sa jeunesse, Herbert von Karajan avait déjà manifesté ses sympathies pour l'extrême-droite nationaliste : lycéen, il était adhérent d'une association ultra-nationaliste, la Corporation pan-germaniste « Rugia ». Dans des lettres de l'époque, il ne faisait pas mystère de son antisémitisme, dénonçant par exemple « l'enjuivement du “ Volksoper ” » à Vienne.

Lorsque Hitler arrive au pouvoir, en 1933, Karajan a 25 ans, il a les dents longues et baigne intellectuellement dans ce milieu nationaliste, antisémite, raciste et xénophobe qui porte Hitler au pouvoir. Les mythes de la suprématie allemande et de l'aryen le séduisent, il barbote dedans et c'est au cœur de ce borbier idéologique fétide et nauséeux qu'il cherche à trouver le pouvoir en musique. Son rival c'est Wilhelm Furtwängler, alors âgé de 47 ans.

Les relations entre les 2 hommes sont sans chaleur, le plus jeune envie avec convoitise le rayonnement et l'aura de l'aîné. Wilhelm Furtwängler est alors un chef célébré au sommet de son génie, une quasi institution, et fait figure de proue du génie allemand. Bien sûr, Hitler et les Nazis voudront le circonvenir, et tentèrent de mille manières de l'attirer dans leurs rets. Les Nazis avaient plus besoin de Furtwängler et de son image que le Furtwängler n'avait besoin d'eux. Furtwängler ne cédera pas. Göring l'installera dans des charges honorifiques symboliques du monde de la musique, perverse manœuvre qui avait pour double but de faire oublier à l'opinion publique qu'il avait refusé d'adhérer au Nazisme, et d'utiliser son image pour la propagande du régime. Après la Guerre, on lui reprochera d'avoir donné l'impression de cautionner le pouvoir en place.

Furtwängler voudra maintenir sans souillure la réputation de la musique allemande dont il était le plus prestigieux représentant. Pas davantage ne répondra-t-il à l'antisémitisme alors de mode en Allemagne. Il ne dépassera pas le champ de l'art, et n'intervint pas dans celui plus terrible du champ politique. Certes il n'avait pas en restant en Allemagne la liberté d'expression nécessaire pour cela.

Il croyait à la transcendance de l'art et de la musique et aux valeurs de l'humanisme. Il refusera d'adhérer au Parti nazi.

En 1943, il écrivait :

« Le message que Beethoven a donné à l'humanité me semble plus que jamais nécessaire aujourd'hui. »

Quelques années après la Guerre, il fit la déclaration suivante au « Chicago Tribune » :

« C'eût été plus facile d'émigrer, mais il fallait que subsistât un centre d'intégrité pour tous les allemands bons et honnêtes qui étaient contraints à rester derrière. J'ai alors senti pour moi que faire de la bonne musique s'opposait avec force à l'esprit de Buchenwald et d'Auschwitz et plus fort que les mots ne pourraient le dire. »

Cela sera d'ailleurs corroboré par le lier violon du Philharmonique de Berlin, Richard Wolff (dont la femme de confession juive, fut sauvée grâce à la protection de Furtwängler) . Furtwängler était de façon épidermique et intense attaché à son orchestre.

Si on peut sourire en lisant ces propos, on en mesure la fragilité face à un pouvoir totalitaire, tyrannique et barbare.

Le passé doit toujours éclairer le présent et il serait particulièrement intéressant de le relire à la lumière de certains événements majeurs qui bouleversent aujourd'hui le concert des nations et dépassent les cadres du cartésianisme occidental ! Les proximités historiques ne sont pas si éloignées que cela !

En 1933, Klaus Mann, le fils de Thomas Mann, avait eu le courage de fuir l'Allemagne, son pays, pour combattre par la plume le Nazisme, puis de prendre la nationalité américaine et combattre au sein de la « U.S. Army » contre l'Allemagne. Quand un intellectuel n' a pas peur d'affronter les sarcasmes pitoyables de la société grégaire, se dresse seul face à la violence assassine, l'obscurantisme et aux ténèbres de la pensée, alors chapeau bas !

Herbert von Karajan, born Heribert, Ritter von Karajan (5 April 1908 in Salzburg, Austria-Hungary - 16 July 1989) was an Austrian conductor. He was principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra for 35 years. He is generally regarded as one of the greatest conductors of the 20th Century, and he was a dominant figure in European Classical music from the mid-1950's until his death. Part of the reason for this was the large number of recordings he made and their prominence during his lifetime. By one estimate, he was the top-selling Classical music recording artist of all time, having sold an estimated 200 million records.

The Karajans were of Greek or Aromanian ancestry. His great-great-grandfather, Georg Karajan (Georgios Karajánnis) , was born in Kozani, in the Ottoman province of Rumelia (now in Greece) , leaving for Vienna in 1767, and eventually Chemnitz, Electorate of Saxony. He and his brother participated in the establishment of Saxony's cloth industry, and both were ennobled for their services by Frederick Augustus III, on 1 June 1792, thus, the prefix « von » to the family name. The surname Karajánnis became Karajan. Although traditional biographers ascribed a Serbian or simply a Slavic origin to his mother, Karajan's family from the maternal-side, through his grandfather who was born in the village of Mojstrana, Duchy of Carniola (today, in Slovenia) , was Slovene. By this line, Karajan was related to Austrian composer of Slovene descent, Hugo Wolf. Karajan seems to have known some Slovene.

Karajan was a child prodigy at the piano. From 1916 to 1926, he studied at the « Mozarteum » in Salzburg with Franz Ledwenke, theory with Franz Zauer, and composition with Bernhard Paumgartner. He was encouraged to concentrate on conducting by Paumgartner, who detected his exceptional promise in that regard. In 1926, Karajan graduated from the Conservatory and continued his studies at the Vienna Academy, studying piano with Josef Hofmann (a teacher with the same name as the pianist) and conducting with Alexander Wunderer and Franz Schalk.

In 1929, he conducted the Opera « Salome » at the « Festspielhaus » in Salzburg and, from 1929 to 1934, Karajan served as « Kapellmeister » at the « Stadttheater » in Ulm. His senior colleague in Ulm was Otto Schulmann. After Schulmann was forced to leave Germany, in 1933, Karajan became 1st « Kapellmeister » . In 1933, Karajan made his conducting debut at the Salzburg Festival with the « Walpurgisnacht » Scene (on music by Felix Mendelssohn) in Max Reinhardt's production of « Faust » . It was also in 1933 that von Karajan became a member of the Nazi Party, a fact for which he would later be criticized.

In Salzburg, in 1934, Karajan led the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra for the 1st time and, from 1934 to 1941, he was engaged to conduct Operatic and Symphonic concerts at the « Theater Aachen » .

Karajan's career was given a significant boost in 1935 when he was appointed Germany's youngest « Generalmusikdirektor » and performed as a guest-conductor in Bucharest, Brussels, Stockholm, Amsterdam and Paris. In 1938, Karajan made his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the Berlin State Opera, conducting Beethoven's « Fidelio » . He, then, enjoyed a major success at the State Opera with Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » . His performance was hailed by Berlin music-critic Edwin von der Nüll as « Das Wunder Karajan » (the Karajan miracle) .

The critic asserted that :

« Karajan's success with Wagner's demanding work, “ Tristan und Isolde ”, sets himself alongside Furtwängler and Victor de Sabata, the greatest Opera conductors in Germany at the present time. »

Receiving a contract with the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , that same year, Karajan made the 1st of numerous recordings, conducting the « Staatskapelle Berlin » in the Overture to « The Magic Flute » . On 26 July 1938, he married Operetta singer Elmy Holgerloef. They divorced in 1942.

On 22 October 1942, at the height of the Second World War, Karajan married Anna Maria (« Anita ») Sauest, born Gütermann. She was the daughter of a well-known manufacturer of yarn for sewing-machines. Having had a Jewish grandfather, she was considered a « Vierteljüdin » (one-quarter Jewish woman) . By 1944, Karajan was, according to his own account, losing favour with the Nazi leadership, but he still conducted concerts in War-time Berlin, on 18 February 1945. A short time later, in the closing stages of the War, he and Anita fled Germany for Milan, relocating with the assistance of Victor de Sabata. Karajan and Anita divorced in 1958.

Karajan joined the Nazi Party in Salzburg, on 8 April 1933 ; his membership number was 1.607.525. In June 1933, the Nazi Party was outlawed by the Austrian government. However, Karajan's membership was valid until 1939. In that year, the former Austrian members were verified by the general-office of the Nazi Party. Karajan's membership was declared invalid but his accession to the Party was retroactively determined to have been on 1 May 1933, in Ulm, with membership number : 3.430.914.

British musicologist and music-critic Richard Osborne states :

« What are the facts ? Ist, though Karajan was nominated for membership in the as yet unbanned Party in Salzburg, in April 1933, he did not collect his card, sign it, or pay his dues, though the registration itself (No. 1607525) got on to the files and crops-up in many memoranda and enquiries, thereafter. 2ndly, he did not join the Party on 1 May 1933, despite “ prima-facie ” evidence to the contrary. In the 1st place, the membership number 3430914 is too high to belong to that date. The highest-number issued before the freeze on membership, which lasted from May 1933 to March 1937, was 3262698. However, during the freeze, various functionaries, diplomats, and others were issued cards bearing an “ NG ”, or “ Nachgereichte ”, designation. These cards were, by convention, back-dated to the start of the freeze : 1 May 1933. Karajan's Aachen membership was an “ NG ” card, and its number accords with batches issued in 1935, the year Karajan had always identified as the one in which he was asked to join the Party. »

Karajan's prominence increased from 1933 to 1945, which has led to speculation that he joined the Nazi Party solely to advance his music career. Critics such as Jim Svejda have pointed-out that other prominent conductors, such as Arturo Toscanini, Otto Klemperer, Erich Kleiber, and Fritz Busch, fled from fascist Europe at the time. However, Richard Osborne noted that, among the many significant conductors who continued to work in Germany throughout the War years (Wilhelm Furtwängler, Ernest Ansermet, Carl Schuricht, Karl Böhm, Hans Knappertsbusch, Clemens Krauß and Karl Elmendorff) , Karajan was one of the youngest and, thus, one of the least advanced in his career. Karajan was allowed to conduct various Orchestras and was free to travel, even to the Netherlands to conduct the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra and make recordings there, in 1943.

Karajan was discharged by the Austrian denazification examining-board on 18 March 1946, and resumed his conducting career shortly thereafter.

In 1946, Karajan gave his 1st post-War concert in Vienna with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, but he was banned from further conducting activities by the Soviet occupation authorities because of his Nazi Party membership. That summer, he participated anonymously in the Salzburg Festival.

On 28 October 1947, Karajan gave his 1st public concert following the lifting of the conducting ban. With the Vienna

Philharmonic Orchestra and the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , he performed Johannes Brahms' « A German Requiem » for a gramophone production in Vienna.

In 1949, Karajan became artistic director of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » ,Vienna. He also conducted at La Scala, in Milan. His most prominent activity, at this time, was recording with the newly-formed « Philharmonia » Orchestra in London, helping to build them into one of the world's finest. Starting from this year, Karajan began his lifelong attendance at the Lucerne Festival.

In 1951 and 1952, Karajan conducted at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » .

In 1938, the same year that Adolf Hitler's Germany annexed Austria, a 30 year old conductor from Salzburg led the Berlin State Opera in a production of Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » . The show was spectacular, and the Austrian conductor Herbert von Karajan was hailed as a wonder. Soon after, he signed a lucrative contract with « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » . Already a member of the Nazi Party, von Karajan was on the way to becoming one of the leading musicians of the 3rd « Reich » . Like many of his fellow non-Jewish German musicians, however, von Karajan was to emerge from World War II relatively unscathed, going on to become one of the most-recorded musicians in the world. While his egotism and ambition were no secret, his political convictions were vague enough to allow the post-War musical world to look the other way.

Herbert von Karajan was born on 5 April 1908 in Salzburg, the son of a successful physician. As a youth, he studied music and conducting in Salzburg. In 1929, he took-up the position of orchestra conductor in Ulm and, in 1934, was appointed as « Kapellmeister » at Aachen, where he remained until 1941. He joined the Nazi Party in 1933 or 1935, and his break-through came in 1938, when he emerged as a favourite of the Nazi elites. In Berlin, he made a name for himself as a conductor of politically-acceptable contemporary music, particularly the works of Carl Orff and Richard Strauß. After a 1941 performance of the popular « Carmina Burana » , the composer himself said admiringly, « the orchestra under Karajan sounds fantastic » . Constantly striving to further his career, von Karajan was irked by the looming figure of Wilhelm Furtwängler - a man who, despite his politically ambiguous relationship to the « Reich » , was the undisputed pre-eminent German conductor. The competition between the young von Karajan and the older Furtwängler did not go unnoticed, but few thought that von Karajan posed a real challenge. An exiled Russian princess wrote that von Karajan « is very fashionable and some people tend to consider him better than Furtwängler, which is nonsense. He certainly has genius and much fire, but is not without conceit » .

Although von Karajan never involved himself in any explicit political affairs, he profited from the re-organization of the musical world under Hitler. Most famously, Richard Strauß's being fired after his defence of the Jewish librettist Stefan Zweig gave Peter Raabe a job which, in turn, allowed von Karajan to take Raabe's post at the Aachen Opera. Eventually, his name was included in Josef Goebbels' list of musicians « blessed by God » . However, even he was not to remain immune from the « Führer » 's notoriously fickle affections. In 1939, von Karajan led a performance of Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » that was a total failure. Hitler, in the audience, took this as a personal affront and purportedly never forgave him. Even more scandalously, von Karajan married Anita Gütermann, the heiress to a textile fortune who was burdened with a Jewish grandfather.

However, the very thing that threatened his career in the 3rd « Reich » was to salvage it after the War was over. After the War, the Soviets issued a prohibition on the conductor's public performances - his voluntary entrance into the Nazi Party, several years before the War, began was enough to condemn him. By 1947, though, all bans had been lifted, and he was free to perform and conduct at will. The clearing of his name was largely thanks to his part-Jewish wife, whose Jewishness he exploited in order to plead « resistance » to the « Reich ». Some historians believe that he deliberately lied in order to ensure his denazification. In any case, his career continued on its astronomical trajectory toward fame and fortune. In 1955, von Karajan took-over as music-director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra ; in addition, he led the Vienna State Opera and the Salzburg Festival, as well as working extensively in London and around the world. He remained the artistic director of the Berlin Philharmonic until he retired in 1989, due to poor health. Soon after retiring, von Karajan died in Salzburg, one of the wealthiest and most famous conductors in the world.

Æsthetic Realism explains there are 2 kinds of ambition : one ethical and healthy ; the other, ugly and hurtful.

In issue No. 64 of « The Right of Æsthetic Realism to Be Known » , Mr. Eli Siegel wrote :

Every person, every moment of his life, is trying to like the outside world on an honest basis. Along with this aim, which is a large part of man's unconscious, a person would like to despise, put aside, be angry with, have contempt for the outside worlds as a means of making himself important.

Until a man understands these 2 desires, he is not free. The reason for this is, even if we seemingly « succeed » at an ambition which has contempt as its source, we defeat ourselves. To succeed in despising the world is to make ourselves mean and lonely.

Ambition in an Austrian Conductor

Tonight, I will speaking about some aspects of the life and work of Herbert von Karajan, the late-conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. I am using a 1986 biography by Roger Vaughan.

In Eli Siegel's lecture, « Mind and Ambition » , he explained :

4 things are present in ambition : you want power ; you want approval ; you want people to envy you ; and you want to show-off. To be ambitious means you want to do things to people and to have them like you at the same time. But the problem is, if you don't feel you deserve that, even if you win, you'll be in a tangled state.

These 4 things were crucial in the life of Herbert von Karajan.

Karajan was born in 1908 in Salzburg, Austria, to a prestigious family. 100 years earlier, a relative founded the textile industry of Saxony. For this, he was knighted, and the family name changed. From the Greek « Karajannis » , it became the noble « von » Karajan.

As a child, he climbed trees and played with his older brother Wolfgang. He loved the Alps, liked learning languages, was goalie of his school's soccer team. He also showed deep talent for music. By 15, he was touring the Salzburg area as a concert pianist. At 21, he was conductor of the Opera House of Ulm, Bavaria.

His happiest years, I believe, were at Ulm, where he worked closely with the singers, bicycling to their homes to coach them in their parts. He helped with the costumes, and took-up a hammer to build sets. He even worked cooperatively with another conductor, each assisting the other with productions. « We took time » , von Karajan said years later, « to think things out. The small theatres in Germany operated with great care for the material. At Ulm, I could express myself, get to know my faults by what I did. »

And a love for the great conductor Toscanini deepened. Roger Vaughan tells how the young man, « once got on his bicycle and rode 200 miles to hear Toscanini conduct » . This, I believe, represented the best kind of ambition in von Karajan.

However, he also had another kind of ambition. Being very handsome, coming from a family with social rank, and having artistic talent, he felt certain things were coming to him. « I was born to command » , he told Vaughan. And Vaughan quotes von Karajan as saying :

It was difficult for my father to make-up his mind. Always, he would say « ask your mother » , when I came to him with a question. Then, he wouldn't be happy with her decisions. I think this made a big impression on me. Because from childhood, it has always been me who commanded.

As Adolf Hitler came to power, saying he believed in the « basic aristocratic principle in nature » , it met something von Karajan was already disposed to feel. As with millions of other Germans and Austrians, Hitler encouraged and confirmed the worst possible ambitions. In 1933, von Karajan joined the Nazi Party. « We have to show people that we are better than they are » , Mr. Siegel said in « Mind and Ambition » , « because this is the one way we know of being sure of ourselves » .

The tragedy of von Karajan's life (and every man can learn from him) is that, with all his ability at music, he preferred contempt to art.

In 1935, in appreciation of a Festival organized by von Karajan in honour of Adolf Hitler, the Nazi paper, « Der Westdeutsche Beobachter » , wrote :

Herbert von Karajan is the man who can lead the new organization of our cultural life in the spirit and direction which National-Socialism demands.

Karajan was now general music-director of the city of Aachen - a major post, which he helped secure through his loyalty to the Party. He was just 27. Yet, he dreamed of bigger things. He hired, as his agent, a colonel of the SS, Rudolf Vedder, a close friend of Heinrich Himmler. He divorced his 1st wife, and married a wealthy woman who, however, was 1/4 Jewish. This got him into some trouble until his agent managed to get Josef Gœbbels, Minister of Propaganda, to declare her, in effect, an « honorary Aryan » .

His conducting was becoming known for its dynamism and, in keeping with his respect for Toscanini (with whom he worked in the summers at the Salzburg Festival while hiding his Nazi connections) , von Karajan knew his scores and aimed for precision. But while the sound he got from an orchestra was brilliant, hardly any critic, then or later, ever praised it for warmth, or depth of feeling. Said Joseph Wechsberg, in 1962, of von Karajan's conducting for the Vienna State Opera :

His flair for exactness is evident, but also his love of effect. Everything he does is high-voltage, but also missing in depth.

When one's ambition is bad, the desire to impress gets ahead of the desire to feel deeply.

In 1938, the most renowned of German conductors, Wilhelm Furtwängler, got into trouble with the Nazi high-command because he refused to fire Jewish musicians, and after Hitler personally cancelled a production of a new Opera by Paul Hindemith (« Mathis der Maler ») , Furtwängler wrote an open-letter of protest.

To punish Furtwängler, « Reichsmarschall » Hermann Göring called von Karajan to Berlin and gave him Furtwängler's position at the State Opera. Von Karajan always wanted that post, and he eagerly accepted. The horrible state Eli Siegel described in « Mind and Ambition » was his : he had won, but wasn't proud of the basis. He couldn't be sure - had he been called to conduct at the greatest German Opera House because of his talent, his years of carefully studying music, or because he had been a loyal member of the Party ?

Mr. Siegel said in his lecture :

The feeling that we are all right deeply doesn't come that easily. Ambition can be called, in its bad sense, a substitute for the ability to like oneself. In the good sense, it is an extension of the ability to like oneself.

This bad kind of ambition and the politics that accompany it are not confined to Nazi Germany. They go on in every family, in every country, and it is one huge reason Æsthetic Realism is desperately needed by the world.

Von Karajan told his biographer that around this time :

I began having problems with concentration. I couldn't express myself as I wanted. I felt enclosed in a glass case, restricted.

He tried yoga ; later, psychoanalysis. But what he felt in Berlin, as he vied with other musicians for the approval of Hitler while Nazi armies overran France, Greece and the Ukraine, can be explained only by Æsthetic Realism. In the historic issue No. 134 of « The Right Of », the 1st to carry the headline, « Contempt Causes Insanity » , Eli Siegel writes :

The insensibility of steel is what the contemptuous person is trying to attain. To be insensible to what is going on outside of oneself is the ambition of a constant part of self. Every person has been conquered by contempt somewhat.

Von Karajan may have conquered musical Germany, but contempt had conquered him, and he suffered.

As I write about Herbert von Karajan, I understand myself better and see with a fresh sense of gratitude how much pain I was spared because I had the god fortune to meet and study Æsthetic Realism.

In my 1st consultation, I was asked :

Where do you think your individuality comes from - where you are different from other people, or where you are the same ?

I answered, « different » , and my consultants explained this had to do with all my difficulties. I was living a contradiction : I wanted, in music, to show my feelings ; but I wanted in life to act lofty and maintain a picture of myself as deeper than other people - too deep, in fact, for anyone to understand me.

A classmate of von Karajan, from his years at the Conservatory in Vienna, gives this picture of the young conducting student :

He was a serious fellow. He didn't bother with the girls. The rest of us were struggling to conduct, while von Karajan was already doing Brahms from memory. No one could get close to him. There was a buffet downstairs where we all ate. Karajan would arrive, eat his sandwich quickly, and disappear.

Every man wants to distinguish himself - but there is an honest and a dishonest way. In 1975, I had the honour to be studying Æsthetic Realism in classes with Eli Siegel and learning what musicians throughout the Centuries have longed to know - this great principle :

The resolution of conflict in self is like the making one of opposites in art.

At the same time, I was working as an apprentice to a composer who talked about music very differently. He saw music as a unique realm of technical knowledge which only people possessed of special talent could understand.

This was utterly false ; also tremendously flattering. But I was too stupid to see it. My music began to take on a wrong complexity.

Mr. Siegel said to me in a class :

« You planned to make music a hide-away from life, and now you are seeing there is a relation between the technical aspects of music and what people feel. All music has gone for showing that the world can be liked. I hope you like that. »

He was my friend as he showed me the battle raging between opportunism and honesty, between the self truly ambitious for art and the self ambitious to use art as a means of elevating myself. He saved me from narrowness. « Fascism » , Eli Siegel writes in issue No. 111 of « The Right Of » , « begins with the preference by man for his way against truth in any Century. »

It is very hard to trace von Karajan's life in the later years of World War II. For a while, he conducted in occupied countries. In Paris, he is bitterly remembered for having begun an evening at the « Opéra Garnier » with the infamous « Horst Wessel » song of the Nazi Party as a prelude.

Herbert von Karajan (geboren 5. April 1908 in Salzburg ; gestorben 16. Juli 1989 in Anif, Salzburg ; geboren als Heribert Ritter von Karajan, in Österreich amtlich Heribert Karajan) war ein österreichischer Dirigent. Als dieser zählt er zu den bekanntesten und bedeutendsten des 20. Jahrhunderts. Karajan arbeitete mit vielen angesehenen Symphonieorchestern, wirkte an bedeutenden Opernhäusern und veröffentlichte zahlreiche Einspielungen klassischer Musik. Er arrangierte auch die Hymne der Europäischen Union.

Herbert von Karajan stammt aus der Familie von Karajan - einer ursprünglich aus der (damals unter dem Namen Rumelien zum Osmanischen Reich gehörenden, heute nordgriechischen) Provinz Makedonien stammenden Familie namens Karagiannis (oder Karaioannes) griechischer Herkunft, die erstmals 1743 in Kozani urkundlich erwähnt ist. Er war der Urenkel des Kaufmanns Georg Karajan, eigentlich Geórgios Ioánnēs Karagiánnis, des Inhabers einer Baumwollhandlung im kursächsischen Chemnitz, und Urenkel von Theodor von Karajan. Georg Karajan wurde mit Ehefrau und seinen Söhnen Demeter und Theodor am 1. Juni 1792 während des Reichsvikariates durch den sächsischen Kurfürsten Friedrich August III. in den erblichen Reichsadelstand erhoben. Die Anerkennung dieses Adelsstandes in Österreich erfolgte für dessen Witwe und die Söhne durch Erlass vom 4. Jänner 1832. Theodor von Karajan wurde am 11. Juli 1869 in Wien mit dem Ritterkreuz des Leopold-Ordens ausgezeichnet und aufgrund der Ordensstatuten als « Ritter von Karajan » in den erblichen österreichischen Ritterstand erhoben. Herbert von Karajans Vater Ernst von Karajan war als Chirurg in Salzburg tätig. Seine Mutter Marta Kosmač entstammte einer slowenischen Familie ; ihr Vater Mihæl Kosmač war in Mojstrana (heute Stadtteil von Kranjska Gora, deutsch : Kronau) geboren. Herbert hatte einen um zwei Jahre älteren Bruder Wolfgang.

Von der Aufhebung des Adels im Jahr 1919 war auch die (österreichische) Familie von Karajan betroffen, deren Familienname zu Karajan ohne vorangestelltes « von » wurde. Der Künstler Karajan hatte seinerseits angedroht, in Österreich nicht aufzutreten, wenn sein früheres « von » auf den Ankündigungsplakaten nicht erscheinen dürfe. Daraufhin wurde ihm Herbert von Karajan als Künstlername zugestanden.

1912 begann Karajan eine pianistische Ausbildung bei Franz Ledwinka. Von 1916 bis 1926 war Karajan Schüler am Konservatorium Mozarteum in Salzburg bei Ledwinka (Klavier), Bernhard Paumgartner (Komposition, Kammermusik) und Franz Sauer, Organist (Harmonielehre). 1925 wurde er Konkneipant der Alldeutschen Gymnasialverbindung Rugia Salzburg im ÖPR. 1926 machte er die Matura am Humanistischen Gymnasium in Salzburg. In seiner schriftlichen Arbeit beschäftigte er sich mit Thermodynamik und Explosionsmotoren. Von 1926 bis 1928 studierte er drei Semester lang Maschinenbau an der Technischen Hochschule in Wien, gleichzeitig Musikwissenschaft an der Universität Wien und bis 1929 an der Wiener Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst Klavier bei Josef Hofmann (1865-1927) sowie Dirigieren bei Franz Schalk und Alexander Wunderer.

Am 22. Jänner 1929 trat Herbert von Karajan zum ersten Mal öffentlich mit dem Mozarteumorchester in Salzburg auf, worauf der Intendant des Ulmer Stadttheaters Karajan zum Probedirigat einlud.

In Ulm wurde Karajan 1930 Erster Kapellmeister am Stadttheater und beim Philharmonischen Orchester.

Der NSDAP trat Karajan in Salzburg am 8. April 1933 bei und bezahlte die Aufnahmegebühr (Mitgliedsnummer 1.607.525). Diese Mitgliedschaft blieb formell bis 1939 gültig, ruhte aber wegen des ab Juni 1933 geltenden Verbots der NSDAP in Österreich. Im Zuge der Überprüfung der österreichischen Beitritte in der Zentrale der NSDAP in München 1939 wurde die Mitgliedschaft amtlich für ungültig erklärt, aber rückwirkend mit Beitrittsdatum in Ulm am 1. Mai 1933 ersetzt; seine nunmehrige Mitgliedsnummer war 3.430.914. Ein zweimaliger Partei-Eintritt lag nach Forschungen der schwedisch-deutschen Historikerin Gisela Tamsen 1939 jedoch nicht vor, Oliver Rathkolb widerspricht jedoch Tamsens Einschätzung, daß Karajan nur aus Karrieregründen der NSDAP beigetreten sei. So polemisierte Karajan 1934 in einem Brief an seine Eltern gegen die Wiener Volksoper, wo er nicht dirigieren wolle, da es sich um ein Vorstadttheater ohne Namen handle, « außerdem wird das gesamte Palästina dort gesammelt sein ».

1934 endete sein Vertrag in Ulm, und so ging er zur Reichsmusikkammer, zum damaligen Leiter der Konzertabteilung Rudolf Vedder. Dieser muß tief beeindruckt gewesen sein, denn er wurde ein wichtiger Förderer. Vedder war eng mit dem Generalmusikdirektor Peter Raabe am Stadttheater Aachen bekannt, und so wurde bereits im April 1934 ein Probedirigat angesetzt. 1935 wurde er am Stadttheater Aachen der jüngste Generalmusikdirektor Deutschlands. Da auch schon der Dirigent Hans von Benda von Vedder protegiert wurde, hatte Benda kein Problem damit, Karajan später nach Berlin zu holen.

Während seiner Aachener Zeit trat Karajan auch bald bei Veranstaltungen der Nationalsozialisten auf. So dirigierte er am 20. April 1935 eine Tannhäuser-Vorstellung anlässlich des « Führergeburtstags », einen KdF-Operabend (Beethovens « Fidelio ») am 30. April. Am 29. Juni 1935 leitete er in einem Konzert zum Kreisparteitag der NSDAP die Aufführung der Propagandawerke Festlicher Hymnus von Otto Siegl, Unsere Seele von Bruno Stürmer sowie Flamme empor und Feier der neuen Front (nach Texten von Baldur von Schirach) von Richard Trunk.

Am 8. April 1938 leitete Karajan als Gast erstmals das Orchester, das er in seinem Leben später noch mehr als 1.500 Mal dirigieren sollte : die Berliner Philharmoniker. Auf dem Programm standen Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts Sinfonie Nr. 33 (KV 319) , Maurice Ravel's « Daphnis et Chloé » , Suite Nr. 2 und Johannes Brahms' 4. Symphonie.

Weithin bekannt wurde Karajan, nachdem er am 30. September 1938 in der Berliner Staatsoper mit Beethovens « Fidelio » debütiert und am 21. Oktober Wagners « Tristan und Isolde » dirigiert hatte. Nach der Tristan-Aufführung prägte der Kritiker der Berliner Zeitung am Mittag, Edwin von der Nüll, am 22. Oktober 1938 das Schlagwort vom « Wunder Karajan » . Urheber der Kritik soll aber nicht von der Nüll gewesen sein, sondern Generalintendant Heinz Tietjen, der Karajans Karriere auf Kosten Wilhelm Furtwänglers fördern wollte.

Ein erster Vertrag mit der « Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft » wurde geschlossen. In der Folge wurde er Dirigent der Staatskapelle Berlin, am 20. April 1939 verlieh ihm Hitler den Titel « Staatskapellmeister » .

Karajan sank aber in der Gunst von Adolf Hitler, als er in der von ihm auswendig dirigierten Aufführung von « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » in der Berliner Staatsoper am 2. Juni 1939 falsche Einsätze gegeben haben soll und die Vorstellung mit dem Fallen des Vorhanges unterbrochen werden mußte. Karajan selbst sprach in Bezug auf diesen Vorfall vom « dem Alkohol zugeneigten » Sänger Rudolf Bockelmann, der die zweite Strophe ausgelassen hatte, worauf er improvisieren mußte und den Umständen entsprechend noch elegant aus der Situation herausgekommen sei. Jedenfalls entschied Hitler daraufhin, so in den Erinnerungen von Winifred Wagner, daß Karajan niemals bei den Bayreuther Festspielen dirigieren dürfe. Da er jedoch der Favorit von Göring war, leitete er weiterhin die Staatskapelle Berlin, mit der er in der Staatsoper bis 1944 etwa 150 Abende gestaltete.

Karajan dirigierte auch Konzerte in den von der deutschen Wehrmacht besetzten Gebieten, so in Paris vom 16. bis 19. Dezember 1940 mit dem Ensemble des Aachener Theaters und im Mai 1941 im Rahmen eines Gastspiels der Berliner Staatsoper mit Tristan. 1942 wurde Karajans Vertrag an der Staatsoper von Tietjen nicht verlängert. Als Grund gab Tietjen an, daß Karajan maßlose Forderungen gestellt habe. Noch 1943 wurde in einer Kartei der Reichsmusikkammer vermerkt, daß bezüglich Karajans politischer Einstellung laut Reichssicherheitshauptamt keine « nachteiligen Notierungen in politischer Hinsicht » vorliegen würden. Auch seine Heirat mit der « Vierteljüdin » Anita Gütermann veranlaßte das NS-Regime zu keiner Änderung dieser Einschätzung.

Am 19. und 20. April 1944 leitete er aus Anlass von Hitlers Geburtstag das Orchester von Radio Paris im « Théâtre des Champs-Élysées » . In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn vor einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte. Im selben Jahr begann Karajan eine Anstellung beim « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » in Linz. Noch im Dezember 1944 sollte das Orchester zu « Ehren des Führers » zum besten Orchester des Deutschen Reichs gemacht werden, bevor das Kriegsende dieser Vorstellung ein Ende setzte.

Am 18. Februar 1945 gab Karajan ein letztes Konzert mit der Staatskapelle in Berlin und setzte sich danach mit dem Flugzeug nach Italien ab. Das Kriegsende verbrachte er zusammen mit seiner damaligen Frau Anita in Mailand und am Comer See, wo er sich (so sagte er) « versteckte, um einem Einberufungsbefehl zu der Kampfpropagandatruppe “ Südstern ” zu entgehen » .

Edward Astley, der als britischer Offizier im « Intelligence Corps » in Mailand und Triest teilweise englischsprachige Radiosender sowie in Triest auch das örtliche Theater leitete, beschäftigte Karajan unmittelbar nach Kriegsende und setzte sich für dessen Engagement bei den Wiener Philharmonikern ein. Karajans Entnazifizierungsverfahren wurde ohne schriftliche Belege abgeschlossen, Karajan habe « genug gelitten » und habe immer nur für die Musik gelebt. Am 12. Januar 1946 gab er in Wien sein erstes Konzert nach Kriegsende, wurde jedoch daraufhin von der sowjetischen Besatzungsmacht wegen seiner NSDAP-Mitgliedschaft mit Berufsverbot belegt ; dieses wurde 1947 wieder aufgehoben.

Musique et musiciens approuvés par les Nazis

Under the Nazi regime, all music produced had to fit within certain standards defined as « good » German music. Suppression of specific artists and their works was common, yet, musicians were permitted limited artistic freedom. The Nazis attempted to create a balance between censorship and creativity in music to appease the German people.

This blend of art and politics led to a 3-prong policy regarding musicians and artists :

Loyal Nazi members who were talented musicians were guaranteed a job.

Loyal Nazi members who were not talented musicians were not guaranteed a job.

Any non-Jewish person who demonstrated a « genius » for music and was a member of the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) was permitted employment. This exception in policy permitted musicians like conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler and composer Richard Strauß to continue working.

According to Adolf Hitler and Josef Goebbels, the 3 Master composers that represented good German music were Ludwig van Beethoven, Richard Wagner, and Anton Bruckner. All 3 composers lived prior to the 20th Century.

Ludwig van Beethoven (1770-1827) believed that « strength is the morality of the man who stands-out from the rest » . Hitler identified himself with Beethoven as possessing that heroic German spirit. Beethoven was so loved by the German people that his legacy of music was unrivaled by any other composer.

Richard Wagner (1818-1883) : He was Adolf Hitler's favourite composer. During World War I, it is reported, he carried Wagner's music from « Tristan » in his knapsack. Often, Hitler had Wagner's music performed at Party rallies and functions. Wagner's music was uncompromisingly serious, and intensely Teutonic. It was not only Wagner's music that « struck a chord » with Hitler, but also his political views. Wagner wrote a violently anti-Semitic booklet in the 1850's called « Das Judentum in die Musik » (Judaism in Music) insisting the Jews poisoned public taste in the arts. He founded the Bayreuth Festival which, in the 1930's and 1940's, was used by the Nazi Party as a propaganda tool against the Jews.

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) : He considered himself a disciple of Richard Wagner. Bruckner and Wagner were contemporaries composing much of their music between 1845 and 1880. Bruckner met Wagner, in 1865, at the premiere of « Tristan und Isolde » , in Munich. He dedicated his 3rd Symphony to Wagner. Music historians have referred to Bruckner's Adagio of the 7th Symphony as the Adagio of premonition. It is music written with funerals in mind. Wagner died shortly after Bruckner finished it, in 1883. Like Hitler, Bruckner had humble beginnings. He never forgot his « peasant roots » . Much of Bruckner's early training and education was under the guidance of Augustine monks. He had a genuine love of nature and « the great German Fatherland » . To Hitler, Bruckner exemplified the people. A movement from Bruckner's 7th Symphony was played upon the news of Hitler's death, in April 1945.

Most musicians and composers who lived during the 3rd « Reich » were less fortunate in their ability to please the « Führer » . For many musicians, survival meant compromise. Many tried to strike a balance between allegiance to Germany and commitment to their work. It was a difficult balance to achieve, knowing that to fail meant deportation or, perhaps, death. The following musicians were all involved to some extent with the 3rd « Reich » :

Hans Hotter (1909-2003) : Classical Opera singer Adolf Hitler regarded as « the greatest baritone of the future » . Even though Hotter was not a member of the Nazi Party and had been known to make fun of Hitler at parties, he was given several prestigious positions within the « Reich » .

Herbert von Karajan (1908-1989) : Wealthy gifted musician and conductor, was the youngest director of an Opera company in Germany, in the 1930's. In order to obtain better conducting positions, Karajan joined the Nazi Party where it was rumored he bought some of his appointments. After the War, he was banned from conducting until 1948. He became the permanent director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1958, and was considered one of Europe's most popular conductors.

Clemens Krauß (1893-1984) : The illegitimate child of the Archduke of Hapsburg and a Viennese actress was an accomplished Opera conductor. He was a favourite of Adolf Hitler, though he was not a Party member. Krauß became a captive of Hitler's music Ministry. Though he tried to be transferred to Vienna on numerous occasions, Hitler insisted that he work in Munich.

Elly Ney (1882-1968) : The daughter of a music teacher and an army sergeant was a child prodigy. When she was 10, she had a Jewish piano teacher at the Cologne Conservatory. She disliked her teacher immensely, because of his race. In 1933, she was asked to fill in for a Jewish musician who had been banned from performing, she regarded this as an insult, and said she only managed to do it by concentrating on the music.

Hans Pfitzner (1869-1949) . He called himself a German genius. He was a rabid nationalist who believed that all art should serve the Fatherland. He once tried to persuade Gustav Mahler that the most essential feature of Richard Wagner's music was that it was German, rather than good. Mahler responded that all great artists leave their nationality behind and strive to produce a Masterpiece. Pfitzner left the room in a fit of rage. He was compared to Richard Strauss, yet, is almost unknown today. His most famous Opera was « Palestrina » .

Li Stadelmann : A harpsichord player who specialized in Bach's music. She joined the Nazi Party, in 1933, stating :

« Our German Masters will find German interpreters. »

She was an anti-Semite, who felt that Jews had no place in German culture or society.

Richard Strauß (1864-1949) : He was appointed president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) when Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933. Strauß accepted it as a way to get legislation passed which would benefit « serious » composers in a country he felt had become too commercial in its musical taste. His primary interest was purely musical, whether or not a person was Jewish was irrelevant to him. He regularly refused to fire Jewish musicians and continued to work with Jewish librettist, Stefan Zweig. In written statements to Zweig, he indicated his aversion to political policies. This politically incorrect stance put him at odds with the Nazi government. Josef Goebbels felt Strauß was opportunistic and distrusted him, considering his music borderline German. Only his world-wide fame kept him from being a « persona non grata » . Because Strauß had Jewish relatives (his daughter-in-law) , he was forced to deal cautiously with the authorities. There is a story that he attempted to visit his daughter-in-law's mother who was imprisoned at « Terezín » . The camp guards refused him entrance. Her photograph was returned to Strauß soon after her death. Strauß was forced to resign, in 1935, after which time his music was censored by the « Reichsmusikkammer » .

La discothèque d'Hitler dans le « Bunker »

A NEWLY discovered box of Adolf Hitler's records included music by Jewish composers or played by Jewish musicians

Kept in a box for 62 years, in the attic of a « dacha » near Moscow, the collection of gramophone discs, 78 rpm shellac recordings, which also contains works by Hitler's German favourites, mainly Wagner and Beethoven, had been taken from Hitler's « Wilhelmstraße » Bunker, in Berlin, by a Red Army reconnaissance officer, Captain Lev Besymenski, who died in the summer of 2007, at the age of 86.

After his death, his daughter Alexandra brought the box of some 100 LP's to Germany's « Spiegel » magazine. She said her father had told her that, in May 1945, he and his comrades had been dispatched to take an inventory of objects in Hitler's bunker and the chancellery, which lay in ruins. While others collected silverware engraved with the initials « AH » , he took albums from Hitler's collection, which he found in numbered boxes, packed for delivery to the « Eagle's Nest » headquarters, in Berchtesgaden.

Hitler's collection included works by the Russian composers Borodin, Rachmaninov and Mussorgski. Scratchmark on recordings by Mendelssohn and Offenbach suggest they were among his favourites.

Russian composers were banned under the 3rd « Reich ». But in private, Hitler repeatedly played Rachmaninov and Tchaïkovsky and hundreds more works he publicly labelled « sub-human music » .

In one of Hitler's albums, the famous Polish Jewish violinist Bronisław Huberman played works by Tchaikovsky. This has surprised historians, since Huberman, who fled Vienna in 1937, 1 year before the « Anschluß » , had been declared an enemy of the 3rd « Reich » . Hitler wrote in « Mein Kampf » that Jewish art « never existed » .

A Souvenir from the « Bunker » Hitler's Record Collection surfaces in Moscow

(By Georg Bönisch and Matthias Schepp, in Moscow.)

Part of the music collection stored at the « Führerbunker » , Adolf Hitler's underground shelter during World War II, has been discovered in Moscow, where it lay in the attic of a former Soviet officer for decades. The Nazi leader apparently enjoyed listening to records made by his enemies.

The story sounds like the fairy tale « Open Sesame ! »

It is set on a mid-May day, in 1945, in War-ravaged Berlin. Lev Besymenski, the captain of the military intelligence service of the 1st Belarussian Front, is given a mission : together with 2 other officers, he is to inspect the « Reich » Chancellery (stormed just a few days before) including the underground « bunker » where Hitler stayed during the War and eventually committed suicide.

Besymenski is an expert, and he also speaks German. He served as an interpreter during the arrest of Field Marshal Friedrich Paulus in Stalingrad, in 1943, and had only recently, on 1 May, translated the news for Stalin, from German General Hans Krebs, that Hitler had died. Later, he will reveal to the world what the Soviets long treated as something akin to a State secret - that they found the remains of Hitler's corpse in the garden of the « Reich » Chancellery.

But, on this day, he is standing in the imposing building on Berlin's « Wilhelmstraße » . He has meticulously searched the headquarters of the Nazi regime for several hours. Suddenly, the Soviet commander responsible for the building asks him what souvenir he would like to take with him.

His comrades have already helped themselves to cutlery engraved with the initials « A. H. » . They have selected leather cases containing medals and other trinkets. But Besymenski is thinking of something else. He asks the officer to open several large iron doors for him that have been secured with special locks.

He would write, decades later :

« We were faced with a strange sight. Several rows of sturdy wooden boxes stood in each room, numbered and packed closely together. »

German service staff said the boxes were packed for shipment to the Berghof, Hitler's residence in Bavaria, but the trip never took place, according to Besymenski. The boxes were filled with crockery and various household effects.

Besymenski fills a box with souvenirs for himself and, later, takes it back to Moscow on a special train. 46 years will go by before his daughter Alexandra discovers the booty by chance.

It is August 1991, a pleasant summer day in the « dacha » settlement Nikolina-Gora, close to Moscow, where the Besymenski family owns a house. The family has visitors, and steaming « blinis » are placed on the veranda table at lunchtime. Then it's time to relax. Besymenski sends his daughter into the attic to get badminton rackets.

A Record Collection from the « Führerhauptquartier »

It's dark and cramped-up there, with boxes of books standing around.

Besymenskaya (who is 53 at the time) recounts :

« My shin hit something solid. It was a stack of records. »

They are labelled with rectangular, finely serrated stickers that make her freeze. The print on the stickers reads : « Führerhauptquartier » .

She rushes downstairs excitedly with her discovery :

« Daddy, what's this, and why is it lying on the attic ? »

The 70 year old grumbles :

« Can't you see, they're records. I switched to CDs years ago. »

That is all he wants to say.

One of his guests will later remember :

« I sensed how uncomfortable Lev Besymenski was about the topic. »

The reason for his nervousness was presumably that Besymenski, who became a respected historian and a professor at the military Academy in Moscow, after the War, was trying to prevent people from suspecting him of being a plunderer. Nowhere in his later books about Hitler does he mention what he personally took from Berlin to Moscow, in 1945 : parts of the record collection, at the « Führer » 's headquarters.

While it was customary, at the time, for the victors to take plentiful souvenirs back home, some of them went too far and became embroiled in scandal. Take the example of Marshal Georgy Zhukov. The man who won the battles of Moscow and Stalingrad and, later, became the Supreme Military Commander of the Soviet Occupation Zone, in Germany, made-off with, among other things (according to Moscow secret police records) :

« 55 works of Classical painting ; 6 boxes containing expensive tableware and tea set ; 9 golden watches ; and 713 pieces of silverware. »

The booty came from the Prussian palaces, in Potsdam, near Berlin.

Music-lover Besymenski, on the other hand, took from the « Reich » Chancellery what corresponded to his personal passion. He had been a frequent guest at the Moscow Conservatory before the War. He died in June 2007, at the age of 86. His daughter Alexandra allowed DER SPIEGEL to view the collection of about 100 shellac records.

Most of them are stored in red, and some of them in blue albums. Each album contains about a dozen records. Some records are scratched and others are broken, but most are well preserved.

Album No. 1 : weather-beaten due to the dampness and the temperature shifts in the attic of the Besymenski « datcha » , contains nothing particularly surprising. It includes the Piano Sonatas No. 24 in F-sharp major and No. 27 in E minor by Ludwig van Beethoven, for example, or the Overture to Richard Wagner's « Der Fliegende Holländer » , performed by the Orchestra of the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » conducted by Heinz Tietjen (the director of the « Festspielhaus » , between 1931 and 1944) .

Hitler's 2nd passion, after architecture, was music. He went to the Opera House almost daily, during his time in Vienna, to listen to the music of Beethoven, Wagner, Liszt or Brahms. But to him, only German music counted. Yet, Besymenski's collection astonishingly contains works by composers the Nazis considered « sub-humans » , including Russian composers such as : Pyotr Ilyich Tchaïkovsky, Alexander Borodin and Sergei Rachmaninov.

For example, the item with the inventory number « Führerhauptquartier 840 » contains a recording by the « Electrola » company labeled « Bass in Russian with Orchestra and Chorus » - a recording of the aria « The Death of Boris Godunov » by Russian composer Modest Mussorgsky, sung by Russian bass Feodor Chaliapin.

Another album contains nothing but works by Tchaïkovsky, with solo performances by star violinist Bronisław Huberman, a Polish Jew.

« I feel this is a sheer mockery of the millions of Slavs and Jews who had to die because of the racial ideology of the Nazis » , a stirred-up Alexandra Besymenskaya remarks today.

Taking Refuge in the Music of His Enemies

As Hitler, possessed by his manic idea of conquering the world, grew increasingly solitary and seldom faced the public anymore, he apparently tried to relax by listening to records. His radio operator Rochus Misch, who was 90 years old in 2007, and was the last surviving witness from the « bunker » , told DER SPIEGEL about how Hitler once ordered his servant to play a record following an intense argument with the command of the « Wehrmacht » at the « Werwolf » headquarters, in Vinnytsia, Ukraine :

« Then, he sat there, absorbed in thought. The “ Führer ” probably wanted to distract himself. » , Misch says.

In moments like that, the otherwise bigoted Hitler apparently didn't care who the music was by - notwithstanding the fact that he had always denied that Jewish people were capable of independent cultural achievement. In « Mein Kampf » , he insists there has never been such a thing as Jewish art, and that :

« The Queen of all arts (architecture) owes nothing original to the Jews. »

As late as his last directive to the soldiers on the Eastern Front, from April 15, 1945 (one day before the Soviet Red Army crossed the Oder River and prepared to siege Berlin) , Hitler ranted against the « mortal Jewish-Bolshevik enemy » , from the « Führerbunker » beneath the garden of the Old « Reich » Chancellery.

But the Dictator and his minions were quite capable of appreciating the works of Jewish artists. The record collection, which was presumably stored in the air-raid shelter beneath the New « Reich » Chancellery, includes recordings of musicians such as Austrian Jew pianist Artur Schnabel. Schnabel left Germany immediately after the Nazis came to power, in 1933. His mother, though, stayed behind and was deported to the « Theresienstadt » concentration camp and murdered by the Nazis.

Besymenski, himself Jewish, was surprised by the number of famous Russian names he discovered on the records from the « bunker » :

« They were recordings of Classical music, performed by the best Orchestras in Europe and Germany, with the best solo performers of the time. I was surprised that it also featured Russian music. » , the historian wrote when he was pressured by his daughter, 3 years before, for the sake of posterity, to leave a written testimony of how he obtained the collection.

American troops had already discovered numerous records in a cavern in the Berghof, in 1945 - a different part of the musical collection that was compiled for Hitler and other high-ranking Nazis. Historian Philipp Gassert of the Heidelberg University had access to some of these records when he was doing research in the United States. Like the records now rediscovered in Moscow, those examined by Gassert had small serrated labels.

Lev Besymenski sometimes listened to the Nazi records together with his best friends. Sometimes, he wrote, he also lent them to musicians - including conductor Kiril Kondrashin and famous pianists Emil Gilels and Jakow Sak.

His daughter Alexandra says she will think calmly about what she wants to do with her father's collection, « over a glass of wine » . That's the name of a cheeky soldier's song set to music by the Court chapel Master of Braunschweig, Franz Abt, in the 19th Century. The number of the record is « Führerhauptquartier 779 » .

« Ein Volk, Ein Reich ... Und Eine Disko »

For more than half a Century, historians have wondered what the Nazis would have done had they won the Second World War. Now, the matter can be settled. A report, unread for 65 years, reveals the Nazis' top priority once they had destroyed the Allies, exterminated the Jews and occupied Europe. They were going to build a big, flash nightclub in Berlin.

« It'll be the most beautiful, the most modern, the most elegant in Europe » , enthused the report's author, Giuseppe Renzetti. « The project is said to have met with the ardent approval of the “ Führer ”. »

Renzetti, Italy's consul in Berlin, told his superiors that already, in mid-1940, the Nazis were preparing their capital for the tourist boom they expected would follow victory. He understood « a manager has already been found for the night-club and that it had been decided to restrict entry to foreigners, the diplomatic corps and the members of Berlin high-society. »

Extracts from the report, dated July 23 1940, were published in « Corriere della Sera » . Italy's former consul was as close as any foreigner to Adolf Hitler ; Josef Gæbbels wrote that Renzetti could almost be seen as a Nazi. To compile his report, the diplomat interviewed top officials including the SS leader, Heinrich Himmler.

But Renzetti found the Germans split over what to do with Britain. Some argued it should be « destroyed » . Some wanted « an understanding » .

The « Führer » , he said, was with the doves.

Hitler has wanted to take into account the wishes of a large mass of the Germans who feel themselves to be related to the British and fear others could profit more than them from the British Empire's destruction.

He said Hitler also felt British and German industry could find a way to coexist.

Renzetti said the Nazis were anticipating a post-War Europe in which they would be « feared and respected » . The economy would be run centrally in collaboration with the Italians, German colonists would be settled in areas such as Alsace and Lorraine, and society would be ruled with a strong hand. Himmler, he said, had indicated a « strong interior policy aimed at avoiding the sort of disturbances that often follow a war » . The head of the SS aimed « to continue with surveillance operations both of the masses and individuals » . But, in passing, Himmler noted that he had been disappointed with the battlefield performance of SS troops. In the new order, Renzetti reported, Germany itself would be homogenised and its strong regional traditions ended.

Renzetti, who had acted as a go-between, carrying messages from Hitler to Mussolini, was consul in Berlin, from 1938 until 1941, when he was posted to Stockholm. He died near Pisa, in 1953.

AB 112 : Pages sombres de l'histoire de la musique en Allemagne

Au lendemain de la défaite de 1918, les milieux nationaux allemands s'opposent avec violence aux défenseurs de la démocratie de Weimar. Il s'agit pour eux de retrouver l'honneur perdu de la nation allemande humiliée par le Traité de Versailles. Cependant, dans cette 1^{re} moitié du XX^e siècle, la musique apparaît comme un élément fondateur des critères du régime nazi, elle est, pour ainsi dire, récupérée à des fins de propagande du régime. Mais dans quels cadres évolue-t-elle ?

Sans exagération, on peut affirmer que, depuis des siècles, la musique en Allemagne apparaît à tous les échelons de la société. On sait, par ailleurs, que la musique s'inscrit dans la vie quotidienne des Allemands comme facteur d'épanouissement de l'individu. Le chant choral a joué un rôle déterminant dans l'établissement du protestantisme et dans l'unification du peuple. Qu'elle soit sous forme communautaire ou religieuse : « Gemeinschaftsmusik » ; utilitaire : « Gebrauchsmusik » ; ou encore pratiquée à la maison : « Hausmusik » , on la retrouve partout. Une véritable dynamique dans la pratique musicale de la jeunesse allemande est mise en œuvre par le pouvoir. Des milliers de chorales parsèment l'Allemagne, mobilisant une large part de la population. Une « dictature du chant » entre les années 1920 et 1940 voit le jour par l'intégration progressive de chants nazis aux répertoires religieux et populaire précédents.

Or, dès 1905, se succèdent des mouvements artistiques dont le contenu et l'expression se dressent contre la pression sociale et le contrôle idéologique véhiculés par le pouvoir politique. À Vienne, Berlin, Dresde, Munich, ces créations artistiques semblent contribuer à saper l'ordre établi, à défaut d'attaquer ouvertement le pouvoir. La modernité artistique incarne un certain mécontentement et le manifeste en s'immisçant dans la lutte sociale. Le mouvement « expressionniste » est un exemple frappant, en ce sens qu'il fait « rayonner la puissance de la vision intérieure en réaction à la vacuité du monde réel » . Il s'agit, bien entendu, d'art abstrait ou en d'autres termes, de créations, dont les significations, loin d'être immédiatement perçues, supposent une interrogation, conduisent donc à penser. Par conséquent, une telle création artistique s'avère extrêmement gênante pour l'édification d'un « Reich » qui se veut millénaire et dont l'enrégimentement des esprits précisément est la préoccupation première.

Au nom d'un art accessible immédiatement et conforme aux schèmes de perception depuis longtemps imposés dans l'imagerie populaire, le Nazisme considère l'art abstrait comme un « art dégénéré » . Mais, plus loin encore dans sa démarche politique, le régime nazi conçoit l'art dit « dégénéré » comme un art « étranger » et réprime tout art qui n'aurait un contenu facilement reconnaissable, rassurant. S'impose alors un art « aryen » dont les thèmes obligent à l'obéissance des valeurs établies et au respect de la force. L'organisation culturelle nazie se révèle dans son slogan de « La force par la joie » : « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF) . Ainsi, tout ce qui est d'origine étrangère est suspect, dégénéré, dangereux. Toute rupture avec la tradition esthétique se devait donc d'être écartée. Le visage totalitaire du Nazisme dans l'art oppose le beau au laid, le national au non-allemand, le sain au dégénéré. Dans cet ordre d'idée, l'esthétique nazie s'associe au beau dans le sens de néo-Classicisme teinté d'inspiration antique et de réalisme populaire célébrant les valeurs du « sang et du sol » : « Blut und Boden » .

L'art, réduit aux canons de l'idéologie officielle, oblige à mettre l'accent sur les théories centrées sur la question « musique et race » et souligne le caractère « laid, non-allemand, dégénéré » de la musique et de ceux qui la composent. Ainsi, de telles démarches conduisent-elles à la mise sous tutelle de la création et du patrimoine. L'artiste devient un sujet fonctionnel dont l'intégrité n'existe pas face au pouvoir. Il est totalement muselé. S'il refuse de se soumettre, il est taxé de réactionnaire, et les « ennemis intérieurs » sont jugés indésirables et poursuivis. Une haine de tout anti-conformisme s'empare de l'Allemagne musicienne.

De violentes attaques antisémites contre la modernité viennoise et contre l'avant-garde de la république de Weimar contraignent le compositeur juif Arnold Schönberg (1874-1951) et le dramaturge et écrivain juif Kurt Weill (1900-1950) à l'exil. Cette haine démesurée pour les juifs vise l'intégrité des êtres. Les slogans raciaux font appels à des notions neurologiques touchant aux concepts de décadence, d'impuissance, de décomposition, de folie, de déraillement. Comment faire face à de telles attaques quand le symbole même de la dégénérescence biologique est cristallisé sur le « juif » qui « aurait du sang nègre dans les veines » et qui tenterait ainsi de contaminer le « corps sain germanique » !

Les musiciens idolâtrés et les musiciens « ennemis »

Le régime nazi rejette donc ce qu'il a appelé « musique dégénérée » et opte pour une musique officielle. En 1933, lorsque Adolf Hitler s'impose comme unificateur d'une nation qui a terrassé ses « ennemis intérieurs », il se présente comme mécène dont les références se concentrent autour de 3 musiciens : Beethoven (1770-1827), Wagner (1813-1883) et Bruckner (1824-1896). Le programme culturel, en effet, est fondé sur la reconquête du Grand « Reich », combat politique s'appuyant sur les icônes qui font la fierté du pays. Beethoven, Wagner et Bruckner sont les figures romantiques les plus instrumentalisées par le régime.

Le tableau de Josef Jurutka (1880-1945) intitulé « Nature morte au masque beethovénien » présenté en 1939 à la Maison de l'art allemand, témoigne de l'admiration du « Führer » pour ce grand musicien. Hitler pensait que la musique de Beethoven illustre le Grand œuvre de son régime. De plus, lors des cérémonies d'ouverture des congrès du Parti nazi, était joué un hymne officiel : l'Ouverture de l'Opéra « Rienzi » de Richard Wagner. En outre, la représentation des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » à l'Opéra allemand de Berlin, en 1935, devint l'Opéra officiel du 3e « Reich ». Avec ce dernier, Anton Bruckner constitue la grande icône du régime nazi. En juin 1937, le buste du compositeur fut solennellement installé dans les environs de Regensburg, au Panthéon du « Walhalla », temple d'inspiration néo-grecque dorique édifié au début du XIXe siècle et dédié aux grandes figures de l'histoire allemande. Temps fort de la politique musicale et culturelle du régime nazi.

Le dictateur a la certitude d'une conscience musicale innée et supérieure chez l'être germanique. C'est pourquoi il n'hésite pas à présenter l'Allemagne, comme « pays de la musique ». L'affiche sur papier glacé de Lothar Heinemann (1911-1966) intitulée « L'Allemagne, pays de la musique », réalisée en 6 langues, est adressée aux principaux pays européens comme message esthétique-politique : l'aigle figurant l'état allemand place l'orgue - instrument roi - sous son aile protectrice. En 1936, à Nuremberg, un orgue monumental destiné à accompagner les manifestations de Parti nazi révèle, par le gigantisme de sa facture, la puissance des principes du « Führer ». Ce grand-orgue possède 220 registres, 16,000 tuyaux dont le plus haut est de 12 mètres. Ainsi, l'art et la nation sont-ils désormais indissociables. Le docteur Josef Gœbbels affirme que le peuple allemand est « le 1er peuple musicien de la Terre » .

Les musiciens considérés comme « ennemis » sont effacés des mémoires par le régime nazi. Cette volonté d'anéantir une culture musicale qui avait été florissante dans la période précédente commence, dans la nuit du 9 au 10 novembre 1936. Le monument édifié, en 1892, en l'honneur du musicien d'origine juive Félix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, devant le « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig, fut démantelé. De même, la « rue Mendelssohn » fut rebaptisée « rue Anton Bruckner » . Dans le même ordre d'idée de sape des musiques composées par des juifs, un « Songe d'une nuit d'été » version aryenne fut officiellement commandé par les Nazis pour remplacer l'œuvre « ô combien mythique » de Félix Mendelssohn-Barthold ! Le compositeur Carl Orff, rendu populaire avec son « Carmina Burana » , acceptera de s'y pencher.

Selon Karl Blessinger (1888-1962) , auteur du « Dictionnaire des Juifs dans la Musique » , datant de 1940, l'influence « nocive » du judaïsme remonterait au XIXe siècle. 3 figures emblématiques de la musique allemande y sont calomniées : Mendelssohn (1809-1847) bien sûr, mais aussi Giacomo Meyerbeer (1791-1864) et Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) . Ce livre fut ré-édité en 1944 avec un titre plus précis : « Judaïsme et musique » . Cette volonté marquée d'antisémitisme dans la musique empêche donc de faire connaître les œuvres de ces pourtant illustres compositeurs. Le régime censure tout spectacle ayant un rapport avec la cause juive. On sait que « l'Opéra de quat'sous » de Kurt Weill fut interdit, ou que des ouvrages musicaux pédagogiques tels que « Harmonielehre » d'Arnold Schoenberg ou « Unterweisung im Tonsatz » de Paul Hindemith furent stigmatisés.

Hitler et la destruction de la musique en Allemagne

The Vienna Philharmonic recently issued a report by a group of independent historians in which the Orchestra officially acknowledged for the 1st time the closeness of its relationship to the 3rd « Reich » . Not only had half its players become members of the Nazi Party by 1942, but all 13 of its Jewish players had been fired 4 years earlier, and 5 of them later died in the camps. A few weeks later, « Der Spiegel » published a 6,000 word essay called « Wagner's Dark Shadow : Can We Separate the Man from His Works ? » in which Dirk Kurbjuweit dealt no less honestly with the continuing inability of many German music-lovers to grapple with the fact that Richard Wagner was a virulent anti-Semite whose writings directly influenced Adolf Hitler.

The extent to which Hitler and his cultural commissars sought to control and shape European musical life has been chronicled in detail. But most of these books have dealt primarily, or exclusively, with German-speaking performers and those performing artists from other countries, France in particular, who collaborated with the Nazis. Yet, the unswerving determination of the Nazis to rid Europe of what they called « Entartete Musik » (degenerate music) may well have had an even more far-reaching effect on post-War European musical culture. After all, many well-known Jewish Classical performers (Fritz Kreisler, Artur Schnabel and Bruno Walter among them) managed to emigrate to America and other countries where they continued their careers without significant interruption. Not so the Jewish composers whose music was banned by the Nazis. Some of them were killed in the Holocaust, and none of those who survived succeeded in fully reconstituting their professional lives after the War.

A turning-point in our understanding of the effects of Nazism on European Classical composition came in the 1990's when « Decca /London » began to release a series of albums called « Entartete Musik » containing some 30-odd works by such celebrated Jewish composers as Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Franz Schreker, Arnold Schönberg, and Kurt Weill, all of whom had their music banned. After the series came to an end, Michæl Haas, its producer, decided to devote himself to further study of the subject. Now, he has written a book called « Forbidden Music : The Jewish Composers Banned by the Nazis » (Yale University ; 352 pages) . It is, amazingly, the 1st full-length history of what happened to the composers who ran afoul of the Nazi regime.

Though Haas is not a historian by training, « Forbidden Music » is still an outstandingly fine piece of work, one that not only tells the story of what happened to these composers but also places it in the historical context without which we cannot fully understand their sufferings. For the history of « Entartete Musik » is, in large part, a tale of Jewish assimilation and its discontents - and of Richard Wagner, whose own mad obsession with Judaism had much to do with the fate of the composers who later felt Hitler's wrath.

Prior to the social emancipation of Jewry that followed the establishment of Austria-Hungary's dual monarchy, in 1867, and the German « Reich » , in 1871, it was all but impossible for German-speaking Jewish Classical composers to achieve success in their native lands. The most important ones either emigrated (like Jacques Offenbach) or spent large parts of their career in other countries (like Felix Mendelssohn) .

Given the extent to which Austro-German musical culture dominated Classical music throughout the 19th Century, it stands to reason that emancipation should have inspired many Jewish composers not merely to assimilate socially but to embrace a new cultural identity for which they had longed so intensely. It was, Haas writes, « the long-awaited entry of the Jews into the most “ élite ”, educated and cultivated “ club ” on earth » . Arnold Schönberg, the least « clubbable » of men, went so far as to proclaim that his invention of the 12 tone method of atonal composition would (in his oft-quoted words) « ensure the supremacy of German music for the next 100 years » .

Not surprisingly, many of these composers sought to expunge all recognizably Jewish elements from their music, hoping thereby to compose in the « true » Germanic tradition. Those who, like Karl Goldmark, failed to purge their styles with sufficient thoroughness were attacked for that very reason by such assimilated Jewish critics as Vienna's Eduard Hanslick, who complained in a review of one of Goldmark's Operas of his « musical transliteration of Jewish Orientalism. It's even used when general human feelings are called for rather than anything specifically Jewish » .

Despite their fondest hopes, these musicians were never able to escape the blight of anti-Semitism. Part of the problem was that their success led to growing envy on the part of less accomplished Gentile musicians. Just as important, though, was the emergence of a specifically racial brand of anti-Semitism of which Richard Wagner was the 1st major proponent. In « Judaism in Music and Other Essays » (1850) and other writings, Wagner proclaimed his « instinctive repugnance against the Jew's prime essence » and decried « the be-Jewing of modern art » , going so far as to claim that Judaism threatened German culture itself, since Jews were « the purest of all races and it matters not with whom they mix : the Jewish race always dominates » .

Wagner's race-based anti-Semitism became an accepted part of the cultural conversation in « fin-de-siècle » Europe, and it may have had an inhibiting effect on, at least, some of the Jewish composers of the period. The vast majority of German-speaking Jewish composers of the post-emancipation era were so determined to emphasize their « Germanness » that their music became derivative. Some favoured Wagner's hyper-Romanticism, others the conservative traditionalism of Johannes Brahms, but whatever their choice, the result was a body of work that is (with good reason) almost totally forgotten today.

Not until Gustav Mahler, whose 1st Symphony was performed in 1889, did a Jewish composer of profound, even radical, originality appear on the scene. Yet, Mahler's relationship to his Jewish heritage was complex in the extreme. On the one hand, he unhesitatingly incorporated Jewish elements into his music - the slow movement of the 1st Symphony, for instance, contains a section that evokes the pungent sound of what would come to be called klezmer. At the same time, though, Mahler was, as Haas explains, equivocal about his background. Not only did he convert to Roman Catholicism to facilitate his appointment as director of the Vienna « Hofoper » (later to be the Vienna State Opera) , but he « shuddered at the sight of kaftan-wearing, bearded Jews from Eastern Europe and refused to identify with them » .

Whatever his personal feelings about Judaism, Mahler was the key-figure in the development of the next generation of post-emancipation Jewish composers. For those who were convinced that Wagner's all-encompassing Romanticism was a dead end (a « debilitating condition » , as the musicologist Alfred Einstein put it, that threatened to smother Austro-German musical culture) , Mahler's symphonically oriented style, at once more acerbic and more linear, offered budding modernists such as Schönberg a much-needed alternative to the stodgy conservatism of the Jewish composers of the late- 19th Century.

Schönberg soon found himself in the vanguard of musical modernism, though he and his followers, Jewish and otherwise, were outnumbered by other composers who still looked to Wagner or Brahms for guidance. But whatever their musical allegiance, these men all followed the path of assimilation, for they were true believers in Austro-German musical culture who wanted to preserve or (in Schönberg's case) improve it. It never occurred to them that their passport to that culture could be revoked.

How would Austro-German musical culture have evolved had Jewish composers continued to play a part in its development ? The question, while provocative, is unanswerable, for starting in 1933, Adolf Hitler removed them from the scene.

It is in no way surprising that Hitler should have paid close attention to Germany's musical establishment, since he was an æsthete « manqué » with a passion for Classical music. His ideas, moreover, about music and musicians had been shaped by Richard Wagner.

He declared :

« Whoever wants to understand National-Socialist Germany must know Wagner. »

Hitler read Wagner's writings closely and took them seriously, declaring Wagner to be his favourite « political » writer and describing him as one of « the great reformers » in « Mein Kampf » :

« Beside Frederick the Great, we have such men as Martin Luther and Richard Wagner. »

Wagner's pathological anti-Semitism was the insane root of the 3rd « Reich » 's suppression of Jewish composers. But one of the most striking aspects of this policy was the fact that, even though Hitler promulgated a staunchly anti-modernist doctrine, it was not absolute in practice. Except for Hitler himself, Nazi leaders were comparatively indifferent to whether a given composer was a traditionalist or a modernist, so long as he played ball with them. What mattered to them (and to Hitler) was blood. If you were Jewish, it was irrelevant whether you were assimilated or observant, much less whether you were an atonal modernist or a Brahmsian conservative : either way, you threatened the racial purity of German culture.

This attitude completely defeated such fully-assimilated composers as Franz Schreker, who was not raised as a Jew and never thought of himself as one. An influential late-Romantic composer and teacher with modernist tendencies whose Operas, in particular « Der ferne Klang » (1912) and « Der Schatzgräber » (1920) , had had great success, Schreker found himself without employment once the Nazis came to power, and was so shocked that he died of a stroke in 1934.

« Aryan » musicians, by contrast, saw the coming of Hitlerism as an opportunity to get-back at the Jews who, in many cases, had deprived them of the prestige that they saw as their birth right. The great violinist Adolf Busch and his brother Fritz, one of Germany's leading conductors, were the only non-Jewish musicians of international stature who emigrated after 1933 as a matter of principle.

Jewish composers who were in a position to emigrate did so, whenever possible to America. Upon arriving, though, they discovered that they spoke the wrong musical language. America's modern-music culture in the 1930's and 1940's was not Austro-German but Franco-Russian in orientation and, so, had little use for them.

A fortunate few, like Erich Wolfgang Korngold, managed to re-invent themselves as film-music composers, and Kurt Weill found a different kind of success by writing such popular Broadway musicals as « Knickerbocker Holiday » (1938) and « Lady in the Dark » (1941) . The rest were left to struggle. Whether they remained abroad or returned to their native lands after World War II, none of the Austro-German « émigré » composers had a major post-War career, and the lives of many of the younger ones were cut short by the Holocaust. As for Gustav Mahler, his music did not return to the concert-halls of Berlin and Vienna until the 1960's.

And what of the vast quantities of music that were flung into the memory hole of the 3rd « Reich » ?

Most of the conservative Jewish composers of the late- 19th and early- 20th Centuries were too derivative to survive, even such genuinely gifted ones as Hans Gál, a Brahms-influenced neo-Classicist of considerable talent and some real originality. At the same time, the music of modernistically inclined Romantics, like Korngold and Schreker, had already come to be widely seen as « passé » before the Nazis came to power. (In a much-repeated quip, the Jewish conductor Otto Klemperer, referring to the economy of the Weimar Republic, dismissed Schreker's Operas as « typical inflation music » .) Undeniably popular though they were before the War, their music is no longer widely performed. As for the composers who died in the Holocaust, none of their surviving works has found a secure place in the standard repertoire, not even Viktor Ullmann's original and masterly 1944 Chamber Opera, « The Emperor of Atlantis » , which was fortunately recorded as part of « Decca / London » 's « Entartete Musik » series.

Might it have been otherwise had history taken a different turn ? We cannot know. What we do know is that the provincialization of Austro-German music that was already apparent prior to the rise of Adolf Hitler continued after his demise, and it seems safe to say that the near extermination of European Jewry was, at least partly, responsible for this fact. It is surely no coincidence that Paul Hindemith was the only indisputably major German-speaking composer to follow Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß, and he has had no real successor. (Hindemith also emigrated in 1938, but he had been willing to cooperate with the Nazi regime prior to the banning of his music, wrongly assuming that his accommodation would temper the regime's anti-Semitic excesses.)

In Michæl Haas's bluntly ironic words :

« Germany and Austria, rendered virtually “ Judenfrei ” after 1945, have struggled in the decades following to regain their prominence as leaders of musical development. These 2 German nations found themselves overtaken by the very countries that had given refuge to their “ émigrés ”. »

Indeed, what happened to Austro-German music in the 20th Century can be understood as a spectacular illustration of the law of unintended consequences. By persecuting Jewish Classical performers and suppressing the music of Jewish composers, Hitler sought to ensure for all time the supremacy of Austro-German musical culture. Instead, he destroyed it.

Compositeurs persécutés - Musique persécutée

Essay by Jens Malte Fischer. (English translation by Ben Letzler.)

How It Began

On May 10, 1933 (the new regime wasted no time) , the books of unfavored authors were burned on the « Opernplatz » on « Unter den Linden » , in Berlin, and in other German cities as well. Among those authors were many writers who had played a major role in the Weimar Republic : Alfred Kerr, Kurt Tucholsky, Carl von Ossietzky, Erich Maria Remarque, Heinrich Mann, and Erich Kästner. « Classics » , too, were banned and symbolically destroyed : Sigmund Freud, still living, was discredited in the form of the « Freudian School » , and a much older author of world-historical significance was consigned to the flames with the slogan, « Against class struggle and materialism, for national community and idealist living » : Karl Marxówhich made clear that the National-Socialist furor for extermination was very much thought historically. The book burnings of these May days came just after the boycott, which went-off according to plan, of Jewish shops and businesses, on April 1, 1933, and they showed with brutal clarity what the new rulers, and the millions of enthusiastic Germans who followed and celebrated them, were capable of, and would be capable of. Anyone with eyes to see and ears to hear could clearly discern the true character of the regime. With these 2 actions, the April boycott and the May book burnings, the spring of 1933 had already seen the start of the inexorable process which led from discrimination to ostracism, then to deportation, and ultimately to the physical extermination of all those who had not placed themselves out of reach of violence, and could no longer escape it. Heinrich Heine's much quoted, truly prophetic phrase proved true to a terrible extent :

« Wherever they burn books, they will, in the end, burn people ! »

The Anti-Semitic Components

The exclusion and persecution of « undesirable elements » soon came to encompass, not only regime opponents from the left of the political spectrum, but also, with radical consistency, Jewish Germans and all European Jews. Anti-Semitism was the glowing core, hardly a secret, of the National-Socialist world view, not for Adolf Hitler alone, though in him to an extreme degree. A swift succession of legal measures forced German Jews out of every field and profession ; they were bullied and, little by little, robbed of their civil rights. This applied to doctors and shop-keepers, lawyers and University instructors and, of course, to writers and musicians as well. There was nonetheless no « notes burning » comparable to the book burnings. In musical matters, the National-Socialists deprived individuals of their rights in a less spectacular fashion than was the case in the field of literature. It is easy to explain why this was so : Liberal or outright Leftist writers, writers who had defended the Weimar Republic or had dared, before 1933, to speak-out against the gathering storm of poisonous National-Socialist ideology, were easy to identify, whether Jewish or not. On the other hand, nothing, with the exception of hard Left struggle anthems, is known of compositions directed against this poisonous ideology before 1933. The art of music, traditionally many-faceted and purportedly unpolitical, always had an easier time staying-out of the battles of the day. There was no way to find a « Jewish » or « Aryan » dominant 7th chord, even if the triad had been successfully identified as « Germanic » , whereas atonal or 12 tone music was ascribed to the « Jewish Ungeist » . Nor were there composers, before 1933, who could clearly be identified as Leftist, Hanns Eisler, and to a lesser extent Kurt Weill, notwithstanding. Here, the criterion of « Jewishness » had to serve as the defining characteristic of choice. For the National-Socialist, subordination (« Gleichschaltung ») of all cultural life, Josef Góebbels created the « Reichskulturkammer » , which, in its sub-groupings, encompassed all « cultural artists » of the German « Reich » . Those who were not members of this organization soon had no chance to work in a profession related to writing, painting, composing or performing. As early as April 1934, the « Reichsmusikkammer » issued guidelines for the acceptance of « non-Aryans » into the trade associations, and made unmistakably clear what was meant :

« Non-Aryans are to be regarded as fundamentally unsuitable as bearers and tenders of the German cultural heritage, and must, therefore, show particular proof of the reliability and suitability required. »

It is almost, needless to say, that proof of particular suitability for non-Aryans, that is, for Jews, could be furnished only in exceptional cases, and these exceptions, too, quite soon grew obsolete.

That German culture needed purification from « un-German elements », termed jointly or separately « cultural Bolshevism » and « Jewish intellectualism », was hardly an idea that had to be invented after January 1933. Here, as in all fields, the National-Socialists were only talented revivers and radicalizers of 2nd hand ideas that had largely arisen at the end of the 19th Century and, then, found new life amidst the confused and uncertain feelings of the Germans and Austrians who, after 1918, had suffered a devastating defeat and had dim prospects for betterment in a Republic that was thoroughly disapproved of and, at best, unloved. In the realm of culture, these ideas, taken together, were captured in the term « degeneracy », and the history of this term culminated in 2 hate exhibitions, the « Entartete Kunst » exhibit in Munich, in 1937, proverbial even today ; and « Entartete Musik » in Düsseldorf, in 1938, which elicited much less attention, but was symptomatic and fateful nonetheless.

Exclusion and Persecution

Both were visible expressions of a swiftly implemented « purification » of German musical life from « elements foreign to the German people and race ». There were, characteristically, no bans on individual works or composers. Rather, it was simply very soon clear to directors of Opera Houses, radio editorial staff, concert agents and Symphony Orchestras which composers and works could no longer be performed, which « non-Aryan » musicians and directors had to be removed from Orchestras and board-rooms. The situation was clear : anyone with too many Jewish grandparents (and the questionnaires expressly inquired after them) 1st had to prove exceptional dependability, as mentioned above, and soon there were no transitional rules any longer. 2 hand-books existed to assist with any possible unclarities : the quite vulgarly anti-Semitic « Musikalisches Juden ABC » (1935) and, following on it, the significantly more serious « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » (1940) , officially sanctioned by the « Reichsmusikkammer ». In the latter book, one could read, for example, of Franz Schreker :

« It was altogether fitting for the age of decay (meaning the Weimar Republic) to place a “ poet-composer ”, who made the most varied sexual aberrations the subject of his musical works for the stage, at the head of the foremost music academy of the “ Reich ”. »

With every indication of contentment, the Schreker article of this lexicon concludes as follows :

« In July 1932, already under the sign of the coming political change in Germany, Schreker had to resign his post as director of the “ Berlin Hochschule für Musik ”. »

This lexicon, along with the Düsseldorf exhibition « Entartete Musik » of 1938, was the ideological lining for countless intrusions into the biographies of individual musicians. The exhibition's initiator, the Weimar Theatre director, Hans Severus Ziegler, set a tone in the accompanying text in which the will to exterminate cannot be ignored :

« What has been collected for the exhibition “ Entartete Musik ” reflects the witches' sabbath and the most frivolous sort of spiritual-artistic cultural Bolshevism, and reflects the triumph of sub-humanity, of arrogant Jewish impudence and utter spiritual feebleness. »

The exhibition itself put in the stocks, in sound and pictures, such individuals as Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, Kurt Weill, Ernst Křenek, Leo Fall, Otto Klemperer, and Paul Hindemith. Incidentally, neither Hans Severus Ziegler nor the other exhibition organizers were ever held responsible for this act of spiritual terrorism. Ziegler's career in the theatre was over, in 1945, to be sure, but he found a job all the same, as a teacher at a north German boarding school.

There existed, in addition to the Jewish composers and musicians, a smaller group of non-Jewish artists who had already been pursued by the National-Socialist press before the seizure of power and they, too, fell victim to the exclusionary measures. For a brief transitional period, well-wishers still entertained illusions that this process could be deflected (prey to this illusion was, among others, Wilhelm Furtwängler) but, soon, the seriousness of the situation could be ignored no longer.

One must recall how this process of banning and banishments drained musical life in Germany (and, soon, in Austria too) , a process carried-out with all the perfection of a properly functioning civil service and which had the character of torture, of turning the screws tighter and tighter. Only a few representative names can be mentioned here. Among those driven-out, expelled and persecuted were the composers Paul Abraham, Ralph Benatzky, Alban Berg, Paul Dessau, Hanns Eisler, Berthold Goldschmidt, Friedrich Holländer, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Ernst Křenek, Karol Rathaus, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, Erwin Schulhoff, Robert Stolz, Wladimir Vogel, Franz Waxman(n) , Kurt Weill, Egon Wellesz, Stefan Wolpe, and Alexander von Zemlinsky. Among the conductors driven-out and persecuted were Maurice Abravanel, Leo Blech, Gustav Brecher, Fritz Busch, Oskar Fried, Erich Kleiber, Otto Klemperer, Erich Leinsdorf, Hermann Scherchen, Hans Wilhelm (William) Steinberg, Bruno Walter, and Fritz Zweig. Among the singers driven-out and persecuted were Alexander Kipnis, Lotte Lehmann, Emanuel List, Richard Tauber, and Joseph Schmidt ; among those engaged in music criticism, Theodor W. Adorno, Paul Bekker, and Alfred Einstein ; among instrumentalists, Emanuel Feuermann and Artur Schnabel. Lastly, those who were driven-out, persecuted and murdered in Auschwitz and other camps were those who sought to save themselves by going, so to speak, in the wrong direction. Among the composers might be mentioned : Pavel Haas, Gideon Klein, Hans Krása, Erwin Schulhoff, and Viktor Ullmann. These are only a few names, only the best-known. Of the countless violinists and clarinetists of Jewish extraction to be driven-out of German and, after 1938, Austrian Orchestras, often only names, not even individual fates, are known. In a short period, in 1938, following the « Anschluß » , the Vienna Philharmonic lost 21 members. The case of the violinist Alma Rosé has attained a melancholy fame, in particular because she was the niece of Gustav Mahler. She was a highly-gifted violinist who founded a successful women's Orchestra for entertainment music. Though her family emigrated to London, she herself continued to travel on tour. She was arrested in France, in 1942, and deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau, in 1943, where she conducted the camp Orchestra until she died of an illness in the camp, in 1944.

Another example is Viktor Ullmann. Only these individual biographies allow something approaching an understanding of the terrorist quality of the intrusions into the lives of the individuals who, taken together, made-up the immense mass of millions of the persecuted and ultimately the murdered.

The Case of Viktor Ullmann

Viktor Ullmann was born in Teschen, in 1898, the son of Jewish parents who had converted to Catholicism. (In the age of racial anti-Semitism, conversions to Christianity no longer offered protection from discrimination and persecution) . Ullmann studied composition in Vienna, under Arnold Schönberg, among others. In 1919, he went to Prague, where he worked as choir director and « répétiteur » at the « Deutsches Theater » , the musical director of which was Alexander von Zemlinsky. From Prague, Ullmann went, in the late- 1920's, to Aussig as Opera director, then to Zürich, where he conducted music at the « Schauspielhaus » and achieved success with his 1st compositions. His acquaintanceship with the anthroposophy of Rudolf Steiner changed his life. He became head of a specialist book-shop in Stuttgart, then left National-Socialist Germany quite early, in 1933, and returned to Prague, where with difficulty he started-over and began composing again. Slowly, the new successes came, and Ullmann was on his way to becoming known as a composer of the avant-garde when the Germans marched into Prague, in March of 1939. Ullmann, declared a Jew, was forbidden any public activity as a musician though this did not hinder him from continuing to compose. In September 1942, he was brought to the « Theresienstadt » concentration camp, which the National-Socialists, with unparalleled cynicism, used as a « model camp » . There, a rich cultural life among the prisoners was all but subsidized to create the illusion of normality, and it is no coincidence that 4 of the most important persecuted composers, all of Bohemian-Moravian extraction, lived in « Theresienstadt » , at the same time, and were able to work under the circumstances, as indeed the camp directors encouraged them to : Pavel Haas, Gideon Klein, Hans Krása and Viktor Ullmann. Also worthy of note is the Czech conductor Karel Ančerl, later world-famous, who would be among « Theresienstadt » 's few survivors.

« Theresienstadt » was not an extermination camp, and the living conditions were significantly better than those in other camps, though deceptively so nonetheless. Altogether unjustified was the illusion of many prisoners that they could survive there or that, here, they were somehow protected, for example owing to their intensive artistic involvement in the realm of music. How people could do creative work under the conditions is simply inexplicable. Viktor Ullmann, for example, wrote an entire Opera, « Der Kaiser von Atlantis » , which he finished at the end of 1943, and which has shown its expressive power in numerous performances since its rediscovery some years ago. Shortly after the Opera's completion, the inconceivable radicalization of the extermination measures carried-out in the second-to-last year of the War destroyed all illusions. The so-called « Artist Transport » of October 16, 1944, brought Haas, Klein, Krása and Ullmann to Auschwitz. Haas, Krása and Ullmann were sent to the gas chambers, in a matter of days. Gideon Klein, the youngest and strongest, had to do forced labor for a time, then was murdered during the evacuation of the camp, in January of 1945. 4 of the most important German composers of their generation thus fell victim to the genocide.

Richard Wagner's Fateful Role

Once more, our view must travel back, and our historical perspective must expand, to explain the basis on which musicians, not only (but in particular) Jewish, could be persecuted and deprived of their rights. In this, the insane National-Socialist terror was able, unfortunately, to base its claims on a star witness with a mighty reputation : Richard Wagner. Under a pseudonym, Wagner published the pamphlet « Das Judentum in der Musik » (Jewry in Music) in a well-known music journal, in 1850. He published the same text again, 19 years later, this time as a brochure and under his own name which, by then, had become known throughout Europe. « Das Judentum in der Musik » is, and one cannot put it more mildly, a central document of 19th Century anti-Semitism, with significance far beyond the musical context. The work's central thesis is that Jews might be exceptionally clever interpreters in the field of music, but are incapable of original creative work, and thus worthless as composers. The Jewish influence on musical life in Europe is portrayed as ominous, and as something to be fought against. Felix Mendelssohn and Giacomo Meyerbeer are made particular examples of these theses. Wagner attacked the former, with whom he had been well acquainted, in relatively moderate fashion. But Meyerbeer, Wagner's competitor in the field of Opera, and from whom he had received personal support (of which he made no mention), Wagner attacked with the worst sort of rancor. The pamphlet and, in particular, the 2nd edition of 1869, created a tremendous sensation. The discussion went as far as England and the United States, and numerous translations were published.

From that moment on, nothing could get rid of the prejudice that Jewish composers were only clever eclecticists, assembling material stolen from various sources, spreading their works with the help of other Jews, and earning a great deal of money in the process. This suspicion was entertained not only by radical anti-Semites, but rather throughout broad circles of the educated European bourgeoisie, a group which grew increasingly receptive to anti-Jewish prejudices often hardly recognized as such by those affected in the closing years of the 19th Century. Giacomo Meyerbeer's Operas, once world-wide triumphs, had already begun to lose favor with the public in that period. By the beginning of the 1930's, the Operas were so seldom to be heard that no further defensive measures were necessary from the National-Socialist administrations.

On comprend ainsi que la musique était devenue une arme formidable du régime nazi. Elle était à la fois outil et mécanisme de la propagande. Contrôlée par le docteur Josef Goebbels, la musique imprègne tous les secteurs de la vie publique à travers la radio, le cinéma, les actualités hebdomadaires. Avec la radio, dont la production industrielle de « récepteurs du peuple » (25% de foyers détenteurs en 1933 ; 65% en 1941), des messages politiques et autres programmes de divertissement, soigneusement choisis par la censure, permettaient une couverture efficace. Ce recours massif à la radio devait contribuer à mettre en pratique l'idée politique de communauté du peuple. Mais, bridés sur les ondes moyennes, ces appareils ne permettaient pas de capter les stations étrangères. Eugen Hadamovsky, directeur de la radio du « Reich », concrétise les objectifs idéologiques édictés, en 1934, par Hitler lui-même :

« Toute propagande doit être populaire et doit adapter son niveau intellectuel aux capacités réceptives des personnes les plus limitées parmi celles à laquelle elle pense s'adresser. Quand il s'agit de tenir bon en temps de guerre, on ne saurait jamais éviter avec assez de prudence des pré-supposés intellectuels élevés. La réceptivité des masses est petite, grande est leur capacité à oublier. »

On assiste donc à une véritable politisation de l'esthétique par une mécanique sordide d'embrigadement. Fin 1942, dans une période où le moral de la population allemande se détériore, le Ministère de la Propagande organise un concours de « Chansons optimistes ». Peu de temps auparavant, la chanteuse et comédienne Zarah Leander interprète

2 grands succès cinématographiques : « La habanera » et « Le grand amour » . Les chansons « Je sais qu'il arrivera un miracle un jour. » et « Ce n'est pas la fin du monde. » , issues de ce dernier film, furent des succès radiophoniques, étant compris comme un appel à tenir bon.

L'art est donc totalement réduit aux « desiderata » de l'idéologie officielle. On récupère, à cette fin même, la musique de jazz et la musique légère. Divertir et soutenir le moral en musique devient le mot d'ordre. Il faut une musique « facile, distrayante, séduisante, qui n'engage à rien et pendant laquelle ce n'est pas un sacrilège si quelqu'un raconte une blague ou si on tape le carton » , affirme Goebbels en 1941. Cette musique de divertissement n'est qu'en apparence apolitique puisqu'elle rend les auditeurs de fait plus réceptifs aux messages Nationaux-Socialistes. Le jazz a confronté le Ministère de l'Éducation du peuple et de la Propagande à un véritable dilemme.

Sur le plan idéologique, le jazz était mal considéré, et, cependant, il incarnait la jeunesse et la modernité. Pour pallier les interdictions frappant le jazz et les artistes juifs, le Ministère de la Propagande encouragea le développement de formations de musique légère allemande, composées de musiciens « aryens » . Fondé en 1934, l'ensemble « Sept en or » (« Die Goldene Sieben ») tend à faire oublier les « Comedian Harmonists » . Créé en 1928, ce formidable sextuor vocal est un fait musical social marquant de la République de Weimar. Malgré leurs interprétations « jazzifiantes » très en vogue, doublées d'un subtil humour littéraire, l'ensemble fut contraint de cesser ses activités en 1935 à la suite de la politique raciale des Nazis, 3 membres du groupe étant juifs. N'oublions pas que tout individu identifié comme juif avait par principe perdu le droit de vivre et devait donc fuir une situation où l'existence était menacée.

Il faut ajouter que, bien qu'officiellement proscrit depuis cette même année 1935 comme « musique nègre » , le jazz continua d'être joué et écouté dans les grandes villes, mais la danse dite « swing » fut proscrite. La répression était tellement forte que même écouter la « BBC » pendant la guerre pouvait mener en camp de concentration.

Les camps de concentration et la musique

Nombreux furent les juifs, et les musiciens de plus est, qui furent contraints de partir pour les camps de concentration, la politique nazie visant à l'extermination totale de ce peuple. Élimination, déportation, expulsion, fuite, accueil en terre d'asile étaient autant de persécutions endurées par les musiciens juifs sous le 3^e « Reich » . Toute profession en rapport avec la musique est fustigée : les pédagogues, les thérapeutes, les musicologues, les critiques musicaux, les rédacteurs de textes sur la musique, les éditeurs de musique et leurs employés, les directeurs de théâtre, les journalistes musicaux, les interprètes.

Étant exposés sans nuances aux projets de la « solution finale » des Nazis, vieillards et enfants, pauvres et riches, célèbres et anonymes, furent déportés dans des camps de concentration, des camps d'extermination. Lorsqu'ils étaient musiciens, ils devaient participer à l'orchestre du camp. À Auschwitz, un « bataillon musical d'Auschwitz » , appelé « Orchestre du camp de Birkenau » , se produisait au milieu de ce camp de la mort.

Le violoniste Henry Meyer, déporté à Auschwitz mais évadé, témoigne :

« N'oubliez pas que nous jouions sur fond de crématoires ! Il nous est même arrivé plusieurs fois de jouer à l'intérieur de l'un de ces fours où se consumait de la chair humaine ! Pourquoi fallait-il que là, en un lieu si terrible, on fasse de la musique ? Un orchestre qui joue des marches en enfer ? »

La claveciniste Zuzana Ruzickova, déportée au camp de concentration de « Terezin » et aux camps d'extermination d'« Auschwitz » et de « Bergen-Belsen », déclare en se remémorant sa libération en 1945 :

« À vrai dire, j'avais le sentiment que, sans la musique, ma vie était dépourvue de sens. »

Elle semble attribuer à la musique par la pratique de son instrument, une sorte de fonction thérapeutique qui lui permet d'oublier son atroce condition existentielle.

Quoi qu'il en soit, des familles entières de musiciens furent décimées par cette politique. L'exemple le plus connu est celui de l'une des familles de musiciens les plus importants du XIXe et du XXe siècle : la famille juive Rosenblum. À la fondation du quatuor, le violoniste Arnold Rosenblum et son frère Eduard, violoncelliste, changèrent leur nom pour « Rosé ». Le quatuor « Rosé », apparenté à Gustav Mahler, était très demandé à Vienne. Johannes Brahms lui confia, en 1890, la création de son 2e Quintette à cordes. Ils ont créé encore les 1ers et 2e Quatuors d'Arnold Schönberg ainsi que les 5 Mouvements, Opus 5, d'Anton von Webern. Malgré leurs compétences, tous les membres de cette famille « Rosé » furent victimes de la terreur nazie.

La musique faisait partie intégrante du système concentrationnaire nazi. Aujourd'hui encore, on a envie d'oublier cette politique d'extermination accompagnée de musique, d'autant que la musique, comme nous l'avons déjà expliqué avant, était considérée par les Nazis comme un art majeur purement allemand permettant l'épanouissement des individus. On a tendance à éluder le fait qu'elle ait pu accompagner la terreur et l'Holocauste. Les témoignages sur la musique dans les camps nous sont parvenus avec parcimonie, car les rescapés ne voulaient pas laisser penser que la présence de la musique pouvait atténuer leurs conditions de vie épouvantables. On constate que la plupart des œuvres musicales qui nous sont parvenues, furent écrites au camp de concentration de « Terezin ». C'est là que la créativité artistique et musicale des déportés a pu s'exprimer, tolérée et même encouragée par les Nazis. Mais qu'est-ce que cette forteresse de « Terezin » ?

L'histoire remonte à 1780, lorsque l'Empereur d'Autriche-Hongrie, Joseph II, sentit la nécessité de protéger son territoire par une place forte, pour prévenir une probable expansion germanique venant du nord. Il fonda une ville de garnison à proximité d'une forteresse et la baptisa « Theresienstadt », la « ville de Thérèse », du nom de sa mère, l'Impératrice Marie-Thérèse. La ville est située au confluent de l'Elbe et de l'Eger, et la chaîne montagneuse de Bohême centrale se profile en arrière-plan. Durant l'occupation nazie, « Terezin » devint l'un des plus terribles camps de concentration pour les détenus politiques, et un rouage important du projet de « solution finale du problème juif ».

En réalité, le camp de « Terezin » était une vitrine culturelle mise sur pied par le régime nazi pour détourner l'attention des pays voisins sur les atrocités qu'il perpétrait. En isolant les compositeurs dans la ville-forteresse, Adolf Hitler faisait croire à une chance donnée à ce peuple, alors qu'il ne considérait ce camp que comme une anti-chambre des camps d'extermination de l'Est. Certes, les déportés ont pu ainsi créer en marge de leurs tâches officielles, tout en témoignant sous forme dissidente jusqu'au bout de leur force, au péril de nouvelles répressions, avant d'embarquer dans les convois de la mort. Parqués à « Terezin » où le pouvoir donnait l'apparence d'une existence décente, les juifs n'étaient que des marionnettes fantomatiques, prisonniers de la logique d'extermination dont la dernière station était « Auschwitz » .

Le héros de « l'Opéra de quat'sous » , l'acteur Kurt Gerron, arrêté à Amsterdam, fut placé comme « animateur des loisirs » de « Terezin » . On lui demande de réaliser un film de propagande, un documentaire intitulé : « Thierienstadt, ein dokumentarfilm aus dem jüdischen Siedlungsgebiet » , répandu après coup sous le titre : « Le “ Führer ” fait don d'une ville aux juifs » . Le documentaire flatte la grandeur et la générosité de Hitler bien sûr, cependant, avec la même logique implacable, le tournage achevé, le réalisateur est embarqué sans ambages dans un convoi de la mort. Il apparaît donc clairement que ce camp n'est qu'un leurre destiné aux visiteurs ou spectateurs extérieurs, voire aux diplomates.

Music has been essential to German culture and national identity for Centuries. For the Nazis, music was seen not only as a source of national pride but also a tool that could be used to reshape German society to reflect the racial and cultural ideology of the 3rd « Reich » . Shortly after taking power in 1933, Nazi officials sought to « coordinate » German music by establishing the « Reich » Chamber of Music to supervise all musical activities in Germany and encourage music that upheld « Aryan » values. Orchestras and conservatories were nationalized and subsidized by the State, while popular performers were recruited to serve as propaganda outlets for the « Reich » . Jewish musicians were stripped of their positions, and those who chose or were forced to remain in Germany formed the Jewish Culture Association (« Jüdischer Kulturbund ») to operate an orchestra, theater, and Opera company composed of Jewish performers. The Nazis also ascribed a racial element to music, denouncing popular music like jazz as well as modern, « avant-garde » orchestral compositions as corrupting influences on traditional German values. A 1938 exhibition in Düsseldorf entitled « Entartete Musik » condemned this so-called « degenerate » music and the artists who performed it.

In the ghettos and concentration camps, music was used as a form of spiritual and cultural resistance against the Nazis. Orchestras, choirs, and other musical groups were formed in many ghettos to give clandestine performances for fellow residents. The ghetto at Terezín (Theresienstadt in German) , which the Nazis used for propaganda purposes as a « model ghetto » , held many of the most prominent Jewish musicians and composers from across Europe, including Gideon Klein, Hans Krása, Pavel Haas, and Viktor Ullmann. Music composed and performed in Theresienstadt and other ghettos reflect the dire living conditions under the Nazis and longing for what was being destroyed. Several concentration camps, including Auschwitz, Sachsenhausen, and Buchenwald, had prisoner orchestras that were forced to give performances for SS officers and visiting dignitaries. For these performers, music became a form of « useful work » that could help guarantee survival.

Love and Loss, Set to Music, During the Holocaust

(« The New York Times » , 4 May 2016.)

Through the crackle of an old phonograph recording, the tenor's voice sounds musky and slightly metallic, but the German words ring out sharp and clear. The soprano's tone is warm, opulent and heady.

I am listening to the love duet from Act II of Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » in a 1943 recording, with Max Lorenz and Paula Buchner as the doomed lovers. For me, it is a recording into my family's history. To a cold April Sunday in 1944 in the Buchenwald concentration camp. My grandfather, Hermann da Fonseca-Wollheim, a doctor and at the time a political prisoner, had recently been transferred there from a « Gestapo » prison in Hamburg, where he was interrogated about what authorities suspected were subversive views. 6 weeks later, he was dead of acute dysentery, one of more than 50,000 who perished there and one of the millions of victims commemorated on Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day.

My grandfather wrote a letter that day to his wife, Käthe, in which he tried to re-assure her that he was in good health, enjoying the fresh air (a reference, most likely to his work in the camp's quarries) and the « splendid » views of the Harz Mountains.

The letter, which is now in the possession of my uncle, is fascinating from a different angle. On the 70th anniversary of the end of the War in Europe last year, my husband, a political commentator for « The Wall Street Journal » , used it as a point of departure to interview my father (who turned 11 on V-E Day) about his War-time memories and to reflect the tensions facing 21st Century Europe.

(Photo) A letter written by Hermann da Fonseca-Wollheim to his wife, Käthe. He later perished in 1944 in the Buchenwald concentration camp, where he had been transferred from a « Gestapo » prison in Hamburg.

But what caught my attention, and set me on the search that brought me to the vintage recording of « Tristan » , was a single line in the letter. « Tonight, at 6, I will listen to the Furtwängler concert on the radio » , my grandfather wrote to my grandmother. « Why don't you, too, turn on the radio on Sundays, so we can think of each other fervently. »

What was the concert that was broadcast that day ? What music might have served as a bridge between a bunk in Block 59 and the bourgeois living-room of his family's Hamburg villa, where my grandmother now did her best to raise 2 young boys on her own amid frequent air-raids ?

I was moved by the notion of music as a kind of telepathic conduit between 2 lovers separated by fate. In some ways, it seemed so modern, similar to the late-night requests to radio stations for songs dedicated to faraway sweethearts. Today, in the age of streaming, on-demand listening, that sense of music as a public space, capable of sheltering secret trysts, seems to be vanishing.

I haven't been able to find-out whether the speaker system at Buchenwald, normally used for barking-out orders, really was given over to Classical music broadcasts every Sunday evening. The Buchenwald survivor and author Jorge Semprún, who wrote a memoir of his time in the camp, mentions the concert broadcasts but suggests that they were subject to the whims of the guards.

As for the program, I received answers from Jörg Wyrchow, an archivist at the German Broadcasting Archive in Frankfurt. What my grandfather referred to as the « Furtwängler Concert » was, in fact, a weekly Classical music hour featuring an array of ensembles and conductors that was broadcast, at Josef Goebbels's behest, beginning in 1944. Each one opened with a « Fanfare » from the 1st movement of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony, signaling, in the words of one radio host at the time, « the fighting spirit of the German people and its attachment to the indelible musical Masterworks of its culture » .

A glance at the program for Spring 1944 shows that these « indelible » Masterworks included Operetta arias as well as Johann Sebastian Bach's « Saint-Matthew's Passion » , waltzes and that 2nd Act from « Tristan » , which aired the day of my grandfather's letter.

Did Käthe receive it in time for the following Sunday's broadcast of Bruckner's 4th, with its wistful opening horn solo ? If so, did it remind both of the pilgrimage they had made to Bruckner's grave in the Saint-Florian Monastery ?

My grandfather, who spent lavishly on books and music, owned a fine gramophone and a large collection of recordings. In the early years of their marriage, he and Käthe hosted listening parties for their friends at which guests seated themselves on a staircase while Hermann nimbly flipped records : One side could hold only about 8 minutes of music. They must have created a deep stock of shared musical memories in my grandparents.

Were Hermann and Käthe able to listen to the following weeks' broadcasts of music by Mozart, Händel and Strauß ? And if so, how did the joyous « Hallelujah » chorus from Händel's « Messiah » resonate with the starving and terrified inmates of Buchenwald ?

On April 17 of this year, my uncle and 2 of my cousins attended a re-dedication ceremony at the Buchenwald memorial, where a new permanent exhibition was unveiled. Among the individual stories singled-out for display is that of my grandfather. Apparently, the reason for his arrest (the word scrawled on his police file) was so unusual that it caught the eye of researchers. « Ausländerfreundlichkeit » was the verdict that would ultimately carry a death sentence : « friendliness to foreigners » .

As a doctor (whose Jewish grandfather made him, in the eyes of the Nazis, a « 2nd degree mongrel ») , he had treated Ukrainian forced labourers employed in a nearby factory, showing them great kindness and teaching himself Russian to better care for them. « One day, we'll all have to learn Russian. » , he was overheard saying - a dangerously defeatist statement and possibly, my grandmother speculated, the cause for his arrest. The « Gestapo » would also find a note one of the Ukrainian women had written for Hermann attesting to his kindness, to show in event of a Red Army victory.

Among those acts of kindness : sliding open the doors that connected his medical studio to his living-room and playing Classical records for his Ukrainian patients, in the belief that, however temporarily, music could offer some solace.

« Lager » : l'organisation musicale dans les camps

Le chant était une obligation. Pour le détenu, chanter n'était pas un plaisir. Il fallait impérativement chanter dans le travail, dans tous les déplacements. Entonner des chants populaires apparemment anodins lors des interminables appels, lors de longues marches, chanter de grands airs d'Opéra par le détenu pendant que celui-ci même était fouetté voire battu à mort, sont des sévices instrumentalisés par les SS. La haine du détenu intensifiait ses brimades pernicieuses et sadiques. L'auteur Primo Levi écrit à propos de ces « chansons populaires chères aux cœurs allemands » :

Pour les SS, la musique était non seulement un moyen de ridiculiser et de tourmenter les détenus, mais s'affirmait comme instrument de torture défiant l'entendement.

Les orchestres aussi durent accompagner, malgré leur souffrance, les rituels quotidiens du camp par des « chansonnettes gaies » ou de « joyeuses marches ». L'orchestre était contraint de jouer aussi lorsqu'un détenu était battu publiquement ou exécuté. On sait encore que des concours d'hymne de camps avaient été organisés par les Nazis. On retrouve ces hymnes officiels à « Lichtenburg », « Esterwegen », « Mauthausen-Gusen », « Buchenwald » .

De plus, peut-être grâce aux orchestres dans les camps, certains musiciens ont pu survivre à la déportation ou parfois échapper à l'Holocauste. Leurs aptitudes musicales les auraient sauvés. L'attrait primordial d'un orchestre de déportés était sans doute pour les SS la possibilité de l'exploiter pour leur propre agrément, à toute heure du jour et de la nuit, dans toute sorte de répertoire. Cette corvée d'esclave était susceptible d'augmenter les chances de survie des détenus. Leur situation au sein du camp leur offrait certes un toit, les exposait à des conditions de travail un peu moins inhumaines, même si la faim les tenaillait, l'hygiène manquait et que les menaces de mort pesaient malgré tout sur chacun.

Les camps d'extermination avaient leur orchestre : à « Treblinka », « Belzec », « Sobibor », « Auschwitz ». Esther Bejanaro, membre par intermittence de l'orchestre féminin d'« Auschwitz-Birkenau » raconte :

« Nous devons jouer quand les trains arrivaient et que les gens étaient immédiatement poussés dans la chambre à gaz. Les déportés nous saluaient joyeusement, pensant que là où il y a de la musique, on ne doit pas être si mal que ça. Cela faisait partie de la tactique des SS. »

L'orchestre féminin d' « Auschwitz-Birkenau » dont Alma Rosé était le chef d'orchestre montre bien que jouer dans l'orchestre ne suffit malheureusement pas pour rester vivant. Alma Rosé n'a d'ailleurs pas survécu à la déportation.

Les déportés ont entrepris de leur propre chef, malgré des conditions d'encadrement extrêmement restrictives, d'organiser des activités musicales. En dépit de la douloureuse réalité concentrationnaire, des ensembles de musique de chambre, des quatuors à cordes, des chorales, des formations de jazz voient le jour. À « Terezin, on a compté 4 orchestres de musique Classique légère ou populaire, un orchestre municipal. On y a représenté des Opéras du répertoire dans leur intégralité, donné d'innombrables concerts de solistes et de musique de chambre, rédigé des critiques musicales, établi un « studio de musiques nouvelles » , composé des œuvres, assisté à des premières, dispensé des cours et des conférences.

La vie artistique et musicale intense qui régna à « Terezin » témoigne de l'incroyable force de résistance de l'esprit humain. Chaque jour, le besoin de nourriture spirituelle se manifestait davantage chez les détenus alors que les Nazis pensaient : « Laissons-les se distraire, demain, ils ne seront plus de ce monde. » . Les musiciens ne manquaient pas une occasion d'apporter un peu de beauté, de distraction, et même de rire, aux détenus pour leur faire oublier un court instant leur terrible réalité.

Comment ces mêmes hommes, qui aspiraient à un art supérieur, symbole d'humanité, ont-ils pu paradoxalement exterminer leurs « alter ego » ? Comment pouvaient-ils être à la fois sensibles à la musique et insensibles aux crimes qu'ils commettaient ? En tout cas, la rencontre de l'art et la barbarie a causé un traumatisme dont nombre d'intellectuels ont refusé de vivre la réalité. Les suicides des écrivains Einstein, Tucholsky, Zweig signifiaient le refus de continuer à exister dans un monde dont les valeurs étaient anéanties à tout jamais. Il fallut pour d'autres subir la terreur jusqu'aux tréfonds de leur chair. Mais l'enfermement des juifs allemands dans une Alliance Culturelle, auto-administrée par les juifs et sous censure nazie n'était-il pas déjà un signe avant-coureur de la "solution finale" ?

Une production musicale de « Terezin »

L'Opéra pour enfants, « Brundibár » , exprime l'esprit de résistance et la foi inébranlable en la justice. Les origines de cet Opéra pour enfants remontent aux années qui précèdent le déclenchement de la guerre. « Brundibár » est un ouvrage du compositeur Hans Krása sur un livret d'Adolf Hoffmeister, écrit pour un concours prévu en 1938 et organisé par le ministère de l'Éducation et de la Culture de Tchécoslovaquie. Le concours n'eut jamais lieu en raison de l'évolution politique du pays. La partition originale ayant été perdue, seule subsistait au moment de l'occupation allemande, sa réduction pour piano. Le directeur de l'orphelinat juif Belgická Ulice : Rudolf Freudenfeld, mélomane passionné et chanteur amateur, encouragea les activités musicales de ses pupilles.

En 1941, l'Opéra de Krása, pas encore représenté, fut travaillé sous la direction de Rafael Schächter à Prague. Une telle activité était interdite par les Nazis et Schächter partit, en novembre 1941, avec le 1er convoi à destination de « Terezin » . Le fils de Rudi Freudenfeld dirigea avec succès la première en 1942-1943, avec des décors de František Zelenka dans la salle à manger de l'orphelinat, dans la plus grande discrétion. Fin juillet 1943, tous étaient déportés à « Terezin » . C'est alors que des répétitions eurent lieu dans le grenier du bloc L-417. La première de « Brundibár » eut lieu en septembre 1943 dans les bâtiments « Magdebourg » . On donna 55 représentations à « Terezin » , mais avec une distribution parfois changeante du fait des perpétuels convois en partance pour « Auschwitz » . De plus, les mémoires des déportés demeurent parfois contradictoires sur l'accompagnement de cet Opéra : certains se souvenant d'un orchestre, d'autres d'un vieil harmonium. Dans tous les cas, Hans Krása avait écrit une nouvelle version orchestrée, composée sur mesure pour les virtuoses présents au ghetto.

L'orchestration nécessitait 13 instruments : 1 flûte, 1 clarinette, 1 trompette, 1 guitare, 1 accordéon, 1 piano, 1 percussion, 4 violons, 1 violoncelle et 1 contrebasse. Le chœur était constitué de 40 choristes. En réalité, il s'agissait d'une sorte d'Opéra contemporain de dimension réduite. Ce conte moral était l'attraction majeure de « Terezin » et, voir et entendre « Brundibár » , était symbole du statut social des déportés du camp. Dans cette représentation, les enfants jouent le rôle de l'avenir, des lendemains qui finiraient bien par chanter, tandis que l'argument lui-même avait pris peu à peu une tournure politique. Mais quel est l'argument ?

2 jeunes enfants, Pepicek et Aninka, se font du souci pour leur mère malade. Le docteur ayant prescrit à la malade de boire du lait, les enfants se mettent en quête de l'argent nécessaire. Ayant remarqué un vieil homme du nom de « Brundibár » et joueur d'orgue de Barbarie, ils commencent à chanter, au grand dam des passants et de « Brundibár » qui les chasse. 3 animaux, le Chien, le Chat et la Fauvette, leur viennent en aide. Avec le concours des enfants du quartier, ils chantent tous les 5 une charmante berceuse et les gens leur donnent un peu d'argent. Profitant d'un moment d'inattention, le vieux musicien mendiant les vole. Tous les enfants et les animaux le chassent et récupèrent l'argent.

L'Opéra s'achève sur un chant victorieux général, célébrant la déconfiture de l'organiste malfaisant. Bien entendu, le misérable « Brundibár » personnifiait le mal. Lorsque les enfants entamaient le chœur final, « Brundibár est vaincu, nous l'avons eu » , aucun doute ne se manifestait dans l'esprit du public : les enfants parlaient bel et bien d'Adolf Hitler. Quoiqu'il en soit, à la fin du mois de septembre 1944, Hans Krása, qui avait été déporté depuis avril 1942 et pourtant membre de l'Administration des loisirs du ghetto, n'était plus d'aucune utilité à « Terezin » . Aussi fut-il gazé en octobre 1944 au camp d' « Auschwitz » .

Musique dans les ghettos et les camps

Ghetto songs served 3 major purposes : documentation of ghetto life, a diversion from reality, and the upholding of tradition. The ghetto songs reveal the capacity for suffering and the elemental will to survive and the urge to create, to sing and even to laugh. The ghetto had its street singers, its coffee and teahouses. It had its beggars and madmen. One popular tune which was supposedly started by a beggar said :

« Me hot zey in dr'erd, me vet zey iberlebn, me vet noch derlebn. » (To hell with them, we will survive them, we will yet survive.)

Laughter became a necessity and a channel for the hatred of the enemy ; it became the catalyst for expressions of anger and bitterness when the means of struggle were still not clearly defined. In Alina Kentof's play, « Doctor Yanush Korczak » , the opening scene depicts the children of an orphanage in the Warsaw ghetto, preparing for a concert. One child cries :

« I cannot sing. I'm so hungry. »

Mrs. Stepha, the caretaker, replies :

« We all are ! That is why we must sing. »

Either a single person or small group of people performed ghetto songs, with accompaniment consisting of a single chord-playing instrument, a small band, or an orchestra.

Street Songs

Street songs, a sub-genre of ghetto music, emphasized 4 dominant themes : hunger, corrupt administration, hope for freedom, and a call for revolt. A majority of ghetto street songs were sung to pre-existing melodies, a technique known as « contra fact » . « Contra fact » became necessary because composers couldn't generate new music fast enough for all of the lyrics being written.

Domestic Songs

In traditional Jewish homes, music has always been a part of the family, a religious rite of the Sabbath, and a fundamental element of holiday tradition. Some traditional occasions in which music plays a central part include the Passover and « Yom Kippur » (the Day of Atonement) . Jewish families gather for a Festive meal and sing songs and prayers from the « Hagaddah » , on Passover. For « Yom Kippur » , Jews chant the « Kol Nidre » , a mournful prayer song that asks God's forgiveness.

Domestic songs tended to be more expressive and explicit in their lyrics than street songs. They expressed themes of hopelessness and helplessness, death and revenge.

Resistance Fighter or Partisan Songs

Of all the songs of all the ghettos, the one which spread like wildfire, was the « Song of the Partisans » by Hirsh Glik : « Zog nit keynmol az du geyst dem letstn vet » (Never Say that You Are Trodding the Final Path) . It used a tune by the Soviet brothers Pokras, and it became the official resistance hymn of all the Eastern European partisan brigades. It was translated into Hebrew, Polish, Russian, Spanish, Romanian, Dutch, and English. It was well-known in all the concentration camps.

Songs of the Camps

At each of the 5 extermination camps, the Nazis created Orchestras of prisoner-musicians, forcing them to play while their fellow prisoners marched to the gas chambers. The suicide rate among musicians was higher than that of most other camp workers except the death details. Many musicians had been forced to watch helplessly as their friends and families were destroyed. Auschwitz had 6 Orchestras, 1 of which contained from 100 to 120 musicians.

Fania Fenelon, describes her experience as a member of a women's Orchestra in Auschwitz, from January 1944 to liberation, in her book, « Playing for Time ». Fenelon states that even though she had clean clothes and daily showers, she had to play « gay, light music and marching music for hours on end while our eyes witnessed the marching of thousands of people to the gas chambers and ovens » .

Anita Lasker-Walfisch was able to survive Auschwitz by playing in the women's Orchestra.

« Terezín »

« Terezín » (« Theresienstadt ») was a concentration camp located in Czechoslovakia that was created by Adolf Hitler as a « model camp » to mislead the world about conditions within the camps and ghettos. Many prominent Jewish artists and musicians were sent here. Because of the large number of musicians and performers, the cultural life at « Terezín » was very rich. This richness was used by the Germans to convince outsiders that the Nazis were treating the Jews very well, and that the concentration camps were really resettlement areas. Hitler deemed it best not to exterminate prominent Jewish people until he had conquered all of the « lost » German lands. Conditions were no better than at most of the other camps. For most of the prisoners, « Terezín » was just a transit camp on the way to Auschwitz.

The « Terezín » Chamber Music Foundation is a non-profit organization dedicated to assuring the permanence of the music written by composers who perished in the Holocaust.

« Against All Odds » was composed at « Terezín » , by Alex Ross.

One especially tragic story comes-out of « Terezín » . The Opera of Children Going to the Gas, « Brundibar, the Organ Grinder » , was performed for camp inmates. Seizing an opportunity for a massive propaganda campaign, the Germans also had the Opera moved to a nearby theatre and performed for the International Red Cross. The Red Cross workers were impressed and, shortly thereafter, the camp commander ordered the entire cast and crew to the gas chambers.

The most famous Opera to be written at « Terezín » is probably « The Emperor of Atlantis » , by Viktor Ullman. The Opera is based on the horrors of the concentration camps. The « Emperor » is Hitler, the « Loudspeaker » and « Drummer-girl » cast as Gœbbels and Göring. The soldier and young girl are human pawns in the chaos that is War. In its original version, the « Emperor » had a cast of 7 singers : The « Emperor » , « Death » , the « Harlequin » , the young girl, the « Drummer-girl » , the soldier, and the « Loudspeaker » . It is orchestrated for a small chamber orchestra : 3 woodwinds, 1 String Quartet, 1 trumpet, 1 saxophone, 1 alto, 1 banjo, 1 keyboard player, and some percussion instruments. The libretto is the symbolic story of « Emperor Overall » who cannot rule chaos on earth any longer because « Death » has decided to go on strike. His strike is caused by his unwillingness to cope anymore with war and famine. « Death » has decided to take the side of the unfortunate humans, and will accept the natural order of things as soon as the « Emperor » agrees to accept his own death. This Opera was never performed until after the War.

Important People

Kasriel Broydo was an author and director of theatre revues and concerts in the Vilno ghetto. He was arrested by the « Gestapo » and deported to a Latvian concentration camp. He was drowned by the Germans in the Baltic Sea, in 1945.

Rudi Freudenfel was the director of the children's Opera « Brundibar, the Organ Grinder » .

Mordecai Gebirtig was born in 1877, in Kraków. He worked all his life as a carpenter in Kraków, and became one of the most popular « folk balladeers » , in Poland. He was deported to the Kraków Ghetto under the German occupation and was killed there, in 1942. His poem, « Our Town Is Burning » , written in 1938, became one of the most popular songs in the ghettos and concentration camps.

Mordecai Gebirtig, Yiddish folk poet, was killed in the Kraków ghetto.

Hirsh Glick was born in 1920, in Vilna. When the ghetto was liquidated, he was sent to a concentration camp, in Estonia. He escaped from the camp and joined the partisans, and died while fighting as a partisan. His partisan song, « Zog Nit Kainmol » (Song of the Partisans) , became the hymn of the underground organization.

Pavel Haas was born in Brno, in 1899. Haas belonged to a group of Czech avant-garde composers. After the German occupation, he spent 3 years in « Theresienstadt » . He died in Auschwitz on October 17, 1944.

Peysakh Kaplan was a writer, composer and music-critic. He wrote the words to a song commemorating the death of 5,000 Jews who were shot to death on the Sabbath of July 12, 1942. The women whose husbands were killed that day were called « shabesdike » , or the Sabbath Ones. He died in the Bialystok ghetto, in 1943.

Hans Krása was a prisoner of the « Terezín » ghetto. He wrote the children's Opera « Brundibar, the Organ Grinder » before the War, in 1938. It was used in the Nazi propaganda film, « The “ Führer ” gives the Jews a City » , filmed in « Terezín » , in 1944. It was performed in Israel, in 1988.

Shmerke Kaczerginski was a poet and ghetto partisan fighter of the Vilna ghetto. He collected and preserved many of the ghetto songs, which have survived today.

Gideon Klein was a composer who was a prisoner of the « Terezín » ghetto.

Aleksander Kulisiewicz was born in Kraków, in 1918. He aspired to become a musician, but ended as a prisoner of the « Sachsenhausen » concentration camp. Even while in the camp, he continued to collect, compose, and perform songs illegally. When an informant told the « Gestapo », they injected him 3 different times with diphtheria. Each time, fellow prisoners managed to smuggle in the antidote. Though his voice was damaged from the repeated dosages of the disease, his collected songs were recorded to preserve the memory of people who were joined together by having been victims of the Nazi camp.

Olivier Messiaen wrote « Quartet for the End of Time », a 49 minute instrumental for the piano, clarinet, violin, and violoncello. These instruments are an unusual combination, chosen because they were the only ones available in the Silesian internment camp where Olivier was a prisoner of War. The French composer wrote :

« Never had I been listened to with such attention and understanding. »

Leyb Rozental wrote a number of plays and several songs in the ghettos. He was drowned by the Germans in the Baltic Sea, near Königsburg, in January 1945.

Martin Rosenberg was a professional conductor before the War. He was arrested, in 1939, and sent to the « Sachsenhausen » concentration camp where he was tortured. While at the camp, he organized a secret chorus of Jewish prisoners. They would perform for other prisoners in some of the less guarded barracks for political prisoners. Rosenberg and the chorus were deported to Auschwitz, in 1942, where they all died in the gas chambers. Before he died, Rosenberg wrote a parody of an old Yiddish folk song called, « Tsen Brider » (10 Brothers) . In the parody, all 10 brothers are murdered in the gas chambers, one by one.

Ervin Schulhoff came from a Prague German-Jewish family. After serving in World War I, Schulhoff spent 4 years in Germany where he was influenced by the « Dada » movement. His jazz music was an attempt to distance himself from « bourgeois » tastes. Schulhoff was arrested and died of tuberculosis after about a 1 year imprisonment in the Wulzburg camp.

Hannah Sennesh was a Hungarian partisan who was captured and executed by the Nazis, in Budapest. She wrote the famous poem, « Eli, Eli », which was later turned into music. Her poem states :

« May these things never cease : the sand and the sea, the sound of the water, the thunder in heaven, the prayer of Man. »

Viktor Ullman was deported to the « Terezín » ghetto on September 8, 1942. While there, he composed 22 works, as well as a libretto for an Opera about Joan of Arc. His most famous piece was the Opera, « Der Kaiser von Atlantis oder Der Tod dankt ab » (The Emperor of Atlantis, or Death Abdicated) . Just before its premiere, most of the musicians of the ghetto were deported to Auschwitz. He was deported to Auschwitz and murdered in October of 1944. Several years after the War, the Opera was finally performed.

Ela Stein Weissberger was a child who sang in performances of « Brundibar » - and lived to tell the story :

« When we sang, we forgot hunger, we forgot where we were. When we were on the stage, we forgot everything. And when we sang the victory song at the end, we imagined that we overcame Hitler. There was such power in this music. »

Musique dans le camp de Dachau

On 20 March 1933, just weeks after Adolf Hitler came to power in Germany, Heinrich Himmler announced in the national press :

« On Wednesday 22 March 1933, the 1st concentration camp will be opened in the vicinity of Dachau. It can accommodate 5,000 people. Here, will be gathered together the entire Communist and, as much as necessary, the (Left-wing) “ Reichsbanner ” and Social-Democratic Party functionaries who threaten the security of the State since, in the long term, it is impossible and draining for the State to house them in government prisons. It has become clear that it is not viable to leave these people free, as they continue to make trouble and disturb the peace. We have adopted this measure, undeterred by paltry scruples, in the conviction that our action will help to restore calm to our country and is in the best interests of our people. »

Thus, was announced the formation of one of the most infamous concentration camps on German soil, one that was to hold the dubious distinction of being the longest running camp under Nazi authority, functioning for the duration of the Nazi reign from 1933 to 1945.

Established only 11 miles northwest of the Bavarian city of Munich, the town of Dachau had been famous since the late-19th Century as a cultural centre and an artists' colony. With the outbreak of World War I, in 1914, a gun-powder factory was built on the outskirts of the town ; it was shut-down after the War. The abandoned factory housed the main-camp, though it was expanded and modified frequently throughout the 12 years of its operation. From the outset, Nazi leaders assigned to Dachau the role of primary training centre for SS concentration camp staff. The camp's organisation and routine were intended to serve as the model for all Nazi concentration camps.

Those interned in the camp in the pre-War years for « re-education » in « protective custody » (« Schutzhaft ») were mainly members of anti-Nazi organisations, religious groups and resistance movements, or outspoken individuals. The 1st Jewish prisoners were sent there on account of their political affiliations, not their religion or « race » . However, after « Kristallnacht » and the annexation of Austria, thousands of Jews were sent there. With the influx of different categories of inmates, particularly after the outbreak of War, political prisoners continued to dominate, and they held the key-positions in the internal prisoner hierarchy throughout the camp's 12 existence. The prominence of political prisoners in the hierarchy had important implications for leisure activities in Dachau. Political prisoners were more likely to maintain an active opposition to the regime during their imprisonment, and their relative power in the hierarchy meant that they could organise events amongst themselves and assist other prisoners in arranging their own clandestine gatherings.

The nature of daily life in Dachau changed markedly over the years, according to the demands of the Central Administration for Camps, the seasons and the whims of camp commanders and personnel. Free time in Dachau was always limited, but there were periods of relaxation. For example, games were permitted during the short rest periods, up to 1938. From 1941, permission was once again granted for cultural activities and amusements : theatrical entertainments, concerts, revues and lectures were arranged, and a substantial library was built-up. As the « Reich » suffered military set-backs in 1943, it relied increasingly on slave labour, and conditions in the camps were subsequently slightly improved with a view to increasing output : supplementary food was provided, parcels could be received by certain categories of prisoners and a few sporting and cultural activities were authorized. Conditions worsened rapidly in the autumn of 1944 with the imminence of German defeat. Apart from these periods of shifting levels of tolerance displayed by the authorities, Dachau inmates also engaged in clandestine music-making throughout the camp's existence.

As the War progressed, Dachau's population became remarkably diverse. Until 1938, it was made-up almost exclusively of Germans, and later of Austrians, but the camp gradually acquired more prisoners as the Nazi net widened across Europe. Communists and Social-Democrats were joined by Jehovah's Witnesses, Roma and Sinti, and homosexuals of various nationalities. Dachau also incarcerated the largest group of clergymen of any camp : almost 3,000, most of whom were Poles. Thousands of Jewish prisoners were interned after « Kristallnacht » , in November 1938, although many were released soon after - at this time, the Nazi authorities encouraged mass Jewish emigration as the solution to Germany's « Jewish Question » . Especially during the later War years, the social composition of Dachau (political, religious, and international) fed the diversity of the camp's musical life.

A wide-range of musical activities took place in Dachau, both forced and voluntary. Testimonies include descriptions of orchestral concerts, cabaret performances, communal singing, choirs, church music and forced singing. There were also, of course, inmates who did not encounter cultural activities at all. One prisoner remembered that :

« Camp music belonged to the tradition of the KZ Dachau. It was a part of every deception put on by the commission, the inspections and the delegations. When some high-level visitor gave the camp the honour of a visit, because he had nothing better to do at the time, and was feeling a little loosened-up by a meal and visit, the band stood upright in front of the canteen block and played cheerful marches, smiled upon with good will. Or, it was a string orchestra, playing Sunday afternoons in the bathroom for the other comrades. »

As was the case in other Nazi camps, forced singing was a regular part of the daily marches and roll-call. Former inmates like Karl Röder recounted having to sing uninterruptedly after returning to the camp from the day's heavy labour :

« I don't know how many hours I sang for in the camp. It must have been thousands. We sang when we went-out to work, and sang when we came-back to the camp. We sang for hours on the roll-call square, in order to drown-out the screams of the ill-treated, but we also sang when the camp commander felt like having us sing. They set great store on rhythm. We had to sing in a brisk military manner, and above all loudly. After hours of singing, we could often no longer produce a sound. They knew that we saw this singing as punishment, and for that reason they always had us sing at military drills. »

The camp authorities often demanded that the prisoners sing German marches and nostalgic songs. Other inmates described the torture of Dachau's « Moor Express » : while pulling heavy lorries like cattle (attached to the vehicle by ropes and beams) , they were forced to sing in order to « keep the SS amused » . Escaped prisoners who had been caught were forced to march through the camp holding the sign « I'm here again » , while being followed by a small orchestra. Karl Röder remembered :

« Every one of these songs we sang so constantly, it was always the same. I never could manage to simply sing them mechanically. Hate and anger always choked me, and I felt like I was suffocating. I would have preferred physical abuse. »

Private concerts for SS officers were also reasonably common. Prisoners would be asked or forced to provide entertainment at events ranging from birthday parties to quiet dinners. They would generally be remunerated for their work with extra-food or cigarettes, which were valuable bartering items, but many were nonetheless disturbed by such experiences.

Dachau's use of music as a form of torture had another, more unusual aspect as well. Of all the camps under Nazi rule, it was Dachau that made the most extensive use of radio to indoctrinate and explicitly to torture prisoners. The camp commander blasted Nazi radio through loudspeakers, at night and during meals. Inmates were, thus, forced to listen to Adolf Hitler's speeches, news of the « inevitable victory » of the German army, and to songs that mocked prisoners' political, religious, and communal value systems. Radio was often played while prisoners were being beaten, and « the music from the radio speakers set-up in the camp mixed with the groans and screams of the tortured » .

In addition to these coerced musical activities, voluntary music-making was also wide-spread and varied in Dachau. Compared with camps such as Mauthausen and Auschwitz, Dachau afforded inmates a relatively large amount of flexibility in their daily activities. Musical performances not sanctioned by the authorities were ultimately secret and risky, but the situation was helped by the tolerance of influential political prisoners, and the willingness of some SS officers to accept bribes.

The distinction between voluntary and forced music-making was blurred when it came to the camp song, composed in 1938 by Herbert Zipper and Jura Soyfer. This song, as was frequently the case with official camp songs, lived a sort of double life. Loved by the Nazis for its martial quality and marching rhythm, prisoners also loved it for its message of resistance and perseverance. It was, thus, one of the few songs sung both by command of the SS and voluntarily by the inmates.

Informal singing made-up a great deal of the prisoner-organized music life in camp. There were also, however, secret choirs and musical groups, string quartets and orchestras and cabaret shows. Although it is doubtful whether a large number of inmates was ever able to enjoy these shows, for those lucky enough to attend them they were clearly a powerful experience :

« In an incarceration without foreseeable end, whose sole purpose is the mental and physical destruction of thousands of human beings, the flight into unconsciousness becomes the greatest danger. Seen in this light, the performances were a valuable component of inner-resistance. »

Communal singing was one of the most popular and widely-practised activities amongst Dachau inmates. Political prisoners sang well-known German folk-songs, songs common to the international revolutionary movement, and camp songs common to political prisoners across the Nazi system such as the « Moorsoldatenlied » . In fact, in the early years of the camp, most records of musical activity by prisoners are of singing the songs of youth or radical movements. In the context of a camp like Dachau, national folk-songs proved especially important for creating and expressing prisoner solidarity, and for sharing memories of what had been lost or left behind. Often, it was at night in the barracks, after an exhausting day of forced labour, that the singing would take place, sometimes lasting for several hours. As one survivor recalled :

« Somebody raised himself ; then quietly, then a little louder, a church hymn rang-out. The singer (a cantor from a large church in Poland) had an excellent lyrical tenor voice. Attentively, we listened. After this church song came some Yiddish ones, these being more solemn, even tragic. After a half hour, or an hour, it became quiet. The singer was silent. The block elder spoke again, but this time sounding quieter and more human ; “ Who else wants to sing ? ” The new voice sounded sharper, stronger. It sang “ Valentine’s Prayer ”. “ An Opera singer from Prague ”, someone whispered near me. After a passage from “ Faust ” came other Opera arias. The last song, “ my little city Beltz ” was choked-off in sobs. The singer wept, and also the block elder. They wept for their destroyed homes and their murdered relatives : “ a happy song ” demanded the block elder. The singer from Prague was quiet. An entertainer from the 7 mountains region stood-up. He began to sing a hit song, stopped almost immediately, however. Instead, he sang again the song of home, of the city Beltz, and then he also grew quiet. It became still. »

In addition to such pre-existing repertoire, many prisoner groups composed new songs. As was typical for concentration camps, most songs composed there were topical, telling about the suffering of daily life, or communicating practical information or advice. Many of the songs were based on existing melodies ; the composers of the remaining melodies remain for the most part unknown. Along with informal group singing, there was also a variety of choirs, both officially sanctioned and clandestine.

As previously mentioned, one of the things that set Dachau apart from other camps was its large and well-established population of priests. Their contribution to camp cultural life was primarily in the form of choral music. The Polish choir was particularly active on Christmas entertainments : they sang « Koledy » (Carols) and music from « Szopki » (Nativity plays) . German and Austrian priests organized regular services that quickly developed into a special form of block performance revolving around the chorus.

In May 1938, Herbert Zipper put together a small orchestra that held secret concerts for prisoners, performing at night or on Sundays for small groups of inmates. Basing his research on the testimonies of former Czech prisoners, historian Milan Kuna documents the existence of 3 instrumental ensembles in the camp during the War years : an officially-sanctioned orchestra, established in 1941 and made-up primarily of Czech musicians ; a separate wind-band, equipped with uniforms, set-up in September 1941 from the ranks of the main orchestra, playing primarily marches for the prisoners leaving and returning to camp for work ; and a 3rd orchestra led by a prisoner called Von Hurk. This orchestra included several professional musicians in its ranks, and played a variety of Classical pieces, including prohibited non-Aryan composers. The composition and functions of Dachau's orchestras were much the same as those of ensembles in other camps. Musicians made use of the combination of instruments available in the camp or those they were allowed to receive from home, and generally wrote their own scores and arrangements. They had the privilege of receiving additional bread rations for their playing and worked almost exclusively inside the camp. Performances were mostly for the SS or important visitors ; repertoire consisted mainly of German marches and popular melodies. Although many prisoners did not have access to the orchestra's concerts, efforts were made to put on clandestine performances exclusively for inmates.

Satirical cabaret performances became a regular feature of Dachau life in 1938 with the arrival of the 1st Viennese victims of the « Anschluss » . Well-known artists including Hermann Leopoldi, Fritz Grünbaum, Paul Morgan, and Fritz Löhner-Beda gave regular Sunday concerts, which were popular and well-attended. This is how former inmate Bruno Heilig described their performances :

« Every Sunday, a cabaret performance was given by the artists in the camp, Fritz Grünbaum, Paul Morgan, Hermann Leopoldi, and the Berlin singer Kurt Fuß. At 1st, the idea of starting a cabaret in a concentration camp seemed to us absurd ; but it proved a success. Crowds of prisoners attended the performances. Grünbaum and Morgan gave their old sketches, which were uproariously applauded by their comrades. Leopoldi made a great hit with Viennese lieder. Kurt Fuß sang sophisticated ballads about women and love.“ From early youth the cunning band has had me on the string ” - this song had not been absolutely the latest thing even when I was still a school boy but, in a concentration camp, it is of no importance to hear only the latest popular favourites. These cabaret matinees gave us the illusion of a scrap of freedom. For 1 hour or 2, one almost had a sense of being at home. »

Most of the cabaret musicians were transported to Buchenwald in late-1938, where they also organized performances.

Dachau was liberated by American troops on 29 April 1945.

L'influence de Wagner sur Hitler et sur l'Holocauste

« Hitler as Lohengrin » (a captured German painting by the U.S. Army) .

« I have an enormous desire to commit artistic terrorism. » (Richard Wagner)

« With the exception of Richard Wagner, I have no forerunner. » (Adolf Hitler)

« Whoever wants to understand National-Socialist Germany must first know Wagner. » (Adolf Hitler)

There is probably no other composer in history who had a greater impact on world events than did Richard Wagner, and his devastating political legacy is 2nd only to Adolf Hitler. The fact that racism was common in Germany, Austria, and other European countries has been used as an excuse for Wagner (and even for Hitler) . But Wagner was not just a musician. He was a national hero and powerful political force to be reckoned with. Writers, philosophers, and politicians testified to his profound influence. His idolatry by King Ludwig II of Bavaria was an example of Wagner's political influence, an influence that was felt throughout Germany. (Among other things, Ludwig helped finance the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » , which was designed specifically by Wagner for the performance of his Operas.)

The circle closes here that Wagner had already begun to forge, in 1850 : the idea of the Festival was realized as the Bayreuth Festival, which was very soon to have a propaganda effect all over Germany. Added to this, were Wagner Societies springing-up everywhere, that appeared in the German-nationalistic « Bayreuther Blätter » . From the beginning of the Festival, then, anti-Semitism and racism were among the ingredients of the Bayreuth Opera undertaking, whether implicit or explicit. Wagner's anti-Semitism was closely connected to this.

Wagner and Adolf Hitler had so much in common, that it is difficult, at times, to keep them separate. They were both rabid racists. Both were artists and politicians (Wagner, a would be politician ; and Hitler a would be artist) . Both feared they had Jewish paternity, which led to fierce denial and destructive hatred.

The following are other beliefs that Richard Wagner and Adolf Hitler shared :

Race is based on appearance, language, nationality, and « blood » (genetics) .

An « Aryan » white race is the foundation of racial purity, beauty, and goodness.

Germans (the « Volk ») are destined by an urgent need (« Noth ») to rule the world.

All other « races » are inferior.

Friedrich Nietzsche's « Will to Power » and social Darwinism are axiomatic.

A struggle (« Kampf ») for racial survival is inevitable (hence, « Mein Kampf ») .

Conscience (guilt) is an evil Jewish invention and must be purged.

Jews and other foreigners were contaminating German blood.

Jesus was not a Jew.

Jews have no religion.

Jews lust after money and power.

Jews are physically repulsive.

Jews are parasites.

Jews are demons and must be expelled or destroyed.

Wagnerian Art would save the world.

Condemnation of composers Giacomo Meyerbeer and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and non-German art in general.

Theoretical tracts by philosophers would corroborate their bigotry.

Believed the world owed them a living.

Believed they were infallible.

Extreme egocentrism.

As a young man, Adolf Hitler fancied himself as a composer and artist, modeling himself after his idol, Richard Wagner. He attended Wagner Opera productions obsessively and boasted that he had read everything that the Master wrote. In 1904 or 1905, while attending the Linz Opera Theatre, he met a young Czech musician named August Kubizek, who later published « Adolf Hitler, Mein Jungenfreund » (« The Young Hitler I Knew » , 1953) . It presents one of the few portraits of Hitler's formative years, and much of it has since been documented. This book reveals how Wagner became a model for Hitler's ideas.

The young Hitler was aspiring to be an artist and managed a meager subsistence by painting postcards. Kubizek had attended the Linz School of Music, and so was a training musician. The 2 became inseparable during these early years, and shared their enthusiasm for Wagner's works. They experienced and discussed many musical productions that occurred locally. While Kubizek had broader musical interests, Hitler insisted on the superiority of Wagner's music. Hitler obsessed about attending every possible Wagner production, no matter how poor.

Then one day, the pair went to see a performance of Wagner's Opera « Rienzi » (probably, 1905-1906) . This became a decisive event for the teenaged Hitler, as he was to refer to it after he came to power. It is worth quoting Kubizek's entire account of this extraordinary event :

« It was the most impressive hour I ever lived through with my friend. So unforgettable is it, that even the most trivial things, the clothes Adolf wore that evening, the weather, are still present in my mind as though the experience were exempt from the passing of time. »

« Adolf stood outside my house in his black overcoat, his dark hat pulled down over his face. It was a cold, unpleasant November evening. He waved to me impatiently. I was just cleaning myself up from the work-shop and getting ready to go to the Theatre. “ Rienzi ” was being given that night. We had never seen this Wagner Opera and looked forward to it with great excitement. In order to secure the pillars in the Promenade, we had to be early. Adolf whistled, to hurry me up. »

« Now, we were in the Theatre, burning with enthusiasm, and living breathlessly through “ Rienzi ” 's rise to be the Tribune of the people of Rome and his subsequent downfall. When, at last, it was over, it was past midnight. My friend, his hands thrust into his coat pockets, silent and withdrawn, strode through the streets and out of the city. Usually, after an artistic experience that had moved him, he would start talking straight away, sharply criticising the performance, but, after “ Rienzi ”, he remained quiet a long while. This surprised me, and I asked him what he thought of it. He threw me a strange, almost hostile glance. “ Shut up ! ”, he said brusquely. »

« The cold, damp mist lay oppressively over the narrow streets. Our solitary steps resounded on the pavement. Adolf took the road that led-up to the Freinberg. Without speaking a word, he strode forward. He looked almost sinister, and paler than ever. His turned-up coat collar increased this impression. »

« I wanted to ask him : “ Where are you going ? ”. But his pallid face looked so forbidding that I suppressed the question. »

« As if propelled by an invisible force, Adolf climbed-up to the top of the Freinberg. And only now, did I realise that we were no longer in solitude and darkness, for the stars shone brilliantly above us. »

« Adolf stood in front of me ; and now, he gripped both my hands and held them tight. He had never made such a gesture before. I felt from the grasp of his hands how deeply moved he was. His eyes were feverish with excitement. The words did not come smoothly from his mouth as they usually did, but rather erupted, hoarse and raucous. From his voice, I could tell even more how much this experience had shaken him. »

« Gradually, his speech loosened, and the words flowed more freely. Never before and never again, have I heard Adolf Hitler speak as he did in that hour, as we stood there alone under the stars, as though we were the only creatures in the world. »

« I cannot repeat every word that my friend uttered. I was struck by something strange, which I had never noticed before, even when he had talked to me in moments of the greatest excitement. It was as if another being spoke-out of his body, and moved him as much as it did me. It wasn't at all a case of a speaker being carried away by his own words. On the contrary, I rather felt as though he himself listened with astonishment and emotion to what burst forth from him with elementary force. I will not attempt to interpret this phenomenon, but it was a state of complete ecstasy and rapture, in which he transferred the character of “ Rienzi ”, without even mentioning him as a model or example, with visionary power to the plane of his own ambitions. But it was more than a cheap adaptation. Indeed, the impact of the Opera was rather a sheer external impulse which compelled him to speak. Like flood waters breaking their dykes, his words burst forth from him. He conjured-up in grandiose, inspiring pictures his own future and that of his people. »

« Hitherto, I had been convinced that my friend wanted to become an artist, a painter or, perhaps, an architect. Now, this was no longer the case. Now, he aspired to something higher, which I could not yet fully grasp. It rather surprised me, as I thought that the vocation of the artist was for him the highest, most desirable goal. But now, he was talking of a mandate which, one day, he would receive from the people, to lead them out of servitude to the heights of freedom. »

« It was an unknown youth who spoke to me, in that strange hour. He spoke of a special mission which one day would be entrusted to him, and I, his only listener, could hardly understand what he meant. Many years had to pass before I realized the significance of this enraptured hour for my friend. »

« His words were followed by silence. »

« We descended into the town. The clock struck 3. We parted in front of my house. Adolf shook hands with me, and I was astonished to see that he did not go in the direction of his home, but turned again towards the mountains. »

« “ Where are you going now ? ”, I asked him, surprised. He replied briefly : “ I want to be alone.” »

Hitler never forgot this decisive moment. In 1939, after he had become the German Chancellor, he visited Richard Wagner's daughter-in-law, Winifred Wagner, in Bayreuth. Upon recounting the event he exclaimed :

« It was in that hour that it all began. »

Thus, we hear from Hitler himself how influential Wagner and his music was on his later life and political ideals. The prelude to « Rienzi » was often used at Nazi rallies and prefaced Hitler's speeches.

Flanked by Wieland and Wolfgang Wagner, Hitler often visited Wagner's heirs at Villa Wahnfried (Wagner's home) , in Bayreuth, during his War years and rise to power. Bayreuth became a respite and Wagnerian shrine for him and other Nazi leaders. Wagner's family made a cult out of Hitler and considered him to be Germany's Savior. Hitler played with Wagner's grand-children, of whom Wieland and Wolfgang later headed the Bayreuth Festival, and told them stories of his adventures. When he visited on September 30, 1923, Wagner's 86 year old widow Cosima embraced and kissed him. At the same meeting, he was warmly welcomed by Wagner's son, Siegfried, his wife Winifred, and son-in-law, the racial theorist, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, who called Hitler : « God's gift to Germany » . Chamberlain forms one of the living links between Richard Wagner and Adolf Hitler. He was friends with and revered them both. His racial theory of the destiny of superior Aryans to rule inferior races, as expressed in his book, « Foundations of the 19th Century »

(1899) , was embraced by both the composer, Cosima, and other Wagner heirs. Hitler found the approval of the Wagner family and Chamberlain to be a rally for his political goals. Chamberlain immediately wrote to Hitler :

« With one blow, you have transformed the state of my soul that Germany, in the hour of her greatest need, brings forth a Hitler that is proof of her vitality. »

Thus, Hitler was the « Messiah » that Wagner's legacy longed for. Wagner's son, Siegfried, and his wife Winifred, who ran Bayreuth during the Nazi era, were also anti-Semites and idolized Adolf Hitler. A special annex was built at Wahnfried for Hitler to welcome his visits. Winifred wrote :

« For years, we have been following with the greatest inner sympathy and approval the uplifting work of Adolf Hitler, this German man who, filled with ardent love for his fatherland, is sacrificing his life for his idea of a purified, united, national greater Germany, who has set himself the task of opening the eyes of the working-class to the enemy within. »

And Siegfried wrote :

« The times of the Spanish Inquisition have returned. Perjury and betrayal are sanctified, and Jew and Jesuit are working hand in glove to exterminate Germanness ! But, perhaps, Satan has miscalculated this time. Should the German cause really succumb, then I'll believe in Jehova, the God of revenge and hatred. My wife is fighting like a lioness for Hitler. Ist rate ! »

The young Hitler was so taken with Wagner and his music that, at one point (around 1907) , he decided to write a « Wagnerian » Opera. Although he had had no musical training, he did not consider this an obstacle. His plan was to have « Gustl » (Hitler's nickname for August Kubizek) write down the notes as he (Hitler) banged-out his conception on the piano. For some reason, Kubizek agreed to this. When he learned through his schooling that Wagner had written a sketch for the Edda legend « Wieland the Smith » as a topic for one of his music-dramas (found in Wagner's posthumous notes) , Hitler siezed on the topic and was determined to complete the project unrealized by his hero :

« Listen “ Gustl ”, I am going to make Wieland into an Opera. »

« Wieland the Smith » is a ghoulish Icelandic legend that was attractive to both Wagner and Hitler. Kubizek described it as follows :

« King Nidur is entirely motived by avarice and greed. Wieland kills his sons out of vengeance, rapes his daughter, and drinks from beakers fashioned-out of the skulls of his sons. »

Hitler did not even flinch at this, but Wagner's version doesn't seem to bear much resemblance to it.

Hitler's conception was grandiose, with Icelandic erupting volcanos, glaciers, old Teutonic instruments, Wagnerian tubas, « Walküre » 's riding through clouds, winged metal helmets ... In spite of unrealistic determination and unrelenting energy, the Opera eventually bogged down and was left unfinished, no doubt due to his lack of musical ability. Even so, it would be fascinating to see the notes and a production of this fragment for its historical significance. If it still exists, it would be a fitting Bayreuth production.

Years later, Hitler associates drew parallels between Hitler's studied methods of public speaking and Wagner's use of leitmotifs. Hitler used endless repetition, thundering crescendi, and rhythmic speech to mesmerize his audiences. He studied theories of mob control, such as Gustave Le Bon's « Crowd » (1895) , and it is clear that he used Le Bon's theory to manipulate and control his audiences. Ernst Hanfstaengel, one of Hitler's political musicians, often played Wagner's music to Hitler on the piano, and he noticed that when he played the « Meistersinger » prelude, one of Hitler's favourites :

« Whole interweavings of leitmotifs, of embellishments of counterpoint, and musical contrast and arguments, were exactly mirrored in the patterns of his Hitler's speeches, which were Symphonic in construction and ended in a great climax, like the blare of Wagner's trombones. »

« My baton will, yet, become the scepter of the future Hanfstaengel also referred to Hitler's arm movements while speaking as similar to those of a conductor swinging a baton. »

Later, while in Landsberg prison, Hitler wrote « Mein Kampf » (My Struggle) to the thunder of Wagner's music, played on gramophone records. The paper for « Mein Kampf » was supplied by Winifred Wagner. She believed that Hitler would « pull the sword out of the German oak » and save Germany from Jewish corruption. Thus, Winifred drew this political metaphor from Wagner's « Die Walküre » , when Siegmund pulls the sword out of the world ash tree. After the War and revelation of Hitler's extermination camps, she maintained that the Holocaust was a lie made-up by American Jews.

The influence of Richard Wagner's music upon Adolf Hitler cannot be over estimated. For him, they were fantasies to be made real. During the rise of National-Socialism, and before Hitler came to power, he predicted the end of the great world conflagration that was to come, and for which he would be responsible.

« Hitler hummed motifs from Wagner's Operas. He seemed to me preoccupied and moody. From having been communicative, he fell suddenly into a dry silence. The political movement was in danger. National-Socialism was approaching one of its crises. The Party was in a well nigh desperate position. But Hitler's every word rang with the firm conviction that he would soon be in power, and be able to lead the German people to a new destiny. We spoke of the result of the War, and the tragical turn of all German victories :

« We shall not capitulate. No, never. » , Hitler exclaimed.

« We may be destroyed, but if we are, we shall drag a world with us : a world in flames. » , he hummed a characteristic motif from the « Götterdämmerung » .

« “ Parsifal ” , the last of Wagner's music-dramas, is possibly his most racist Opera. » (Adolf Hitler)

« Out of “ Parsifal ”, I have made a religion. » (Adolf Hitler)

What did Hitler mean by this last provocative statement ?

Wagner intended « Parsifal » to be a profound religious parable about how the whole essence of European humanity had been poisoned by alien, inhuman, Jewish values. It is an allegory of the « Judaization of Christianity and of Germany » ; and of purifying redemption. In place of theological purity, the secularized religion of « Parsifal » preached the new doctrine of racial purity, which was reflected in the moral and indeed religious, purity of « Parsifal » himself. In Wagner's mind, this redeeming purity was infringed by Jews, just as devils and witches infringed the purity of traditional Christianity. In this scheme, it is axiomatic that compassion and redemption have no application to the inexorably damned Judaized Klingsor and, hence, the Jews.

(Image) « Siegfried » Hitler, by George Grosz.

Adolf Hitler explained his own interpretation of « Parsifal » to one of his associates, in 1934 :

« Behind the absurd externals of the story, with its Christian embroidery and Good Friday mystification, something altogether different is revealed as the true content of this most profound drama. It is not the Christian religion of compassion that is acclaimed, but pure noble blood. The King is suffering from the incurable ailment of corrupted blood. The uninitiated but pure “ Parsifal ” is tempted to abandon himself in Klingsor's magic garden to the lusts and excesses of corrupt civilization (Kundry) . For myself, I have the most intimate familiarity with Wagner's mental processes. At every stage of my life, I come back to him. If we strip “ Parsifal ” of every poetic element, we learn from it that selection and renewal are possible only amid the continuous tension of a lasting struggle. »

Thus, Hitler clearly understood the racist agenda of « Parsifal » . Only Wagner apologists are left to wear blinders. The sub-text of racist metaphors has not diminished in Wagner's Operas, so they will continue to exert a subliminal influence. To deny this is akin to the same kind of denial that today's violent television, movies, and subliminal advertising have no effect on young people.

The word « struggle » (« Kampf ») is a code word that appears in the writings of Wagner, his heirs, and Hitler (« Mein Kampf ») . It was not an abstract « struggle » against some unknown force, but referred specifically to the struggle against the Jews and other « aliens » . Another code word was « Wolf » , which referred to the God Wotan in the « Ring » Cycle, and to Hitler by Wagner's heirs, and even by Hitler as a reference to himself. Thus, we hear of the « Wolf's Lair » as a reference to Hitler's sanctuary, during the War. « Barbarosa » was another code word shared by Wagner and Hitler. This word specified the « struggle » as War and has its root in the word « barbaric » or « barbarian » , a metaphor for the proud return of the German people to their barbarous roots, free of conscience, and, therefore, free to wage war and havoc. « Barbarosa » was the ancient Teuton Hero and Warrior, the original ruthless barbarian.

Of course, none of this proves that Wagner « caused » the Holocaust. Yet, there can be no doubt that, he and his music, were partly responsible. He wasn't there, but to speculate that he wouldn't have been a staunch Hitler supporter, as were his heirs of the Nazi years, is simply blind denial.

During the years of the Nazi rise to power in Germany, music history began to be rewritten by German musicologists to conform to Nazi political ideology. Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Giacomo Meyerbeer and Gustav Mahler were vilified and their music lost favor among audiences and performers. At the same time, Wagner was elevated to a God-like status and his music was officially sanctioned. Musicologists began to quote from Wagner's racist essays as support for the Nazi agenda purging all Jewish and non German influences. Since history is written by the victors, if the Nazis had won the War, one can only imagine what music history would be like today. Certainly, it would be a very different tale.

The historic significance of Wagner's racism would be much diminished if it had not been for Hitler and the Nazi Holocaust. Even then, it could not be isolated and seen merely as the unfortunate aberration of a composer obsessed with bigotry. Nevertheless, that is how apologists try to excuse Richard Wagner and his music from their consequences. History is rightfully and unavoidably seen through the lens of the present. Thereby, the horrific consequences of Wagner's racist legacy cannot be denied or diminished.

AB 113 : Musiques interdites par le 3e « Reich »

Nazisme et musique dégénérée

(Un texte de Gil Pressnitzer.)

Ce texte porte sur un aspect important de la machine-à-tuer nazi : le rapport à la musique et son utilisation comme arme de destruction.

La musique comme arme

« La musique est un art mineur car elle disparaît en même temps qu'elle se forme. »

Et pourtant, la musique a souvent été une arme pour les régimes totalitaires (l'URSS et l'art prolétarien) et elle deviendra pour les Nazis une arme essentielle pour la démonstration, à la fois du génie éternel du peuple allemand et de la supériorité aryenne. La musique participe donc à l'établissement du « Reich » de 1,000 ans, son pouvoir est utilisable. Elle sera donc la force de frappe du Nazisme, ainsi jusqu'au tout dernier bombardement les concerts eurent lieu fréquentés par tous les dignitaires.

Écoutons Pascal Quignard :

« La musique est le seul, de tous les arts, qui ait collaboré à l'extermination des Juifs organisée par les Allemands de 1933 à 1945. Il faut souligner, au détriment de cet art, qu'elle est le seul qui ait pu s'arranger de l'organisation des camps, de la faim, du dénuement, du travail, de la douleur, de l'humiliation, et de la mort. Il faut entendre ceci en tremblant : c'est en musique que ces corps nus entraient dans la chambre. La musique viole le corps humain. Elle met debout. Les rythmes musicaux fascinent les rythmes corporels. À la rencontre de la musique, l'oreille ne peut se fermer. La musique étant un pouvoir s'associe de fait à tout pouvoir. Elle est d'essence inégalitaire. Ouïe et obéissance sont liées. Un chef, des exécutants, des obéissants telle est la structure que son exécution aussitôt met en place. Partout où il y a un chef et des exécutants, il y a de la musique ... Cadence et mesure. La marche est cadencée, les coups de matraque sont cadencés, les saluts sont cadencés. »

La Ire fois où Primo Levi entendit la fanfare à l'entrée du camp jouant le « Rosamunde » de Schubert, il eut du mal à réprimer le rire nerveux qui se saisit de lui. Alors il vit apparaître les bataillons rentrant au camp avec une démarche bizarre. Les hommes étaient si dépourvus de force que les muscles des jambes obéissaient malgré eux à la force propre aux rythmes que la musique du camp imposait et que Simon Laks dirigeait.

Primo Levi a nommé « infernale » la musique :

« Leurs âmes sont mortes et c'est la musique qui les pousse en avant comme le vent les feuilles sèches, et leur tient lieu de volonté. »

Ce fut pour augmenter l'obéissance et les souder tous dans la fusion non personnelle, non privée, qu'engendre toute musique.

Ce fut une musique rituelle. La musique, écrit-il, était ressentie comme un « maléfice » . Elle était une « hypnose du rythme continu qui annihile la pensée et endort la douleur » .

Comment entendre la musique, n'importe quelle musique, sans lui obéir ? (Pascal Quignard. « La haine de la musique » .)

« Qu'elle soit spontanée ou imposée, officielle ou acte de résistance, la musique était inscrite dans la vie quotidienne des camps. » , précise Pascal Huynh. Elle était utilisée par les Nazis avec un sadisme défiant l'entendement. « Opérations punitives et exercices journaliers étaient scandés par des marches exécutées par des déportés, notamment lorsque certains d'entre eux tentaient de s'évader. » Et cette perversité des geôliers, qui imposaient aux détenus de jouer de la musique pour accompagner les exécutions capitales !

La musique aura donc un pouvoir de soumission pour les faibles, d'exaltation pour les forts et combien d'exécutions auront lieu au son d'Anton Bruckner ou de Beethoven, et les officiers des camps de la mort écoutaient en pleurant Schubert, entre 2 massacres. Et jamais un pays, dont les nouveaux Maîtres étaient convaincus que leur mission était de restaurer l'honneur national, ne se soucia autant de l'élévation de son patrimoine. Jamais la vie des concerts ne fut autant favorisée, jusque dans la tourmente des bombardements.

Les origines du concept nazi de musique dégénérée

Le Romantisme allemand

La musique Romantique, donc la musique Romantique allemande, est conçue comme essence de toute la musique.

La musique est conçue comme langue de toutes les émotions - comme langue supérieure à la raison.

La musique est conçue comme effusion ou comme fusion.

Le Romantisme a pris naissance en Allemagne, à la fin du XVIIIe siècle, en réaction au rationalisme. Au primat de la raison, il oppose, afin de la connaître, un primat de l'imagination, des choses invisibles - l'imagination entendue comme le médium où se révèle cette vérité supra-rationnelle. Le Romantisme réclame ici une musique miraculeuse : une musique qui élève l'âme à la vérité ; une musique qui, don de Dieu, élève l'âme à la contemplation de Dieu. Mais le Romantisme réclame aussi une musique nationale : une musique née du peuple ; plus encore : une musique destinée au peuple - non pas destinée aux gens de qualité.

Cela vient de pêle-mêle de :

La montée de l'obscur, la mythologie du Moyen-âge, le développement du moi.

Le Romantisme et les mythes populaires, contes et notion du sang et de la race glanés dans la mythologie du Nord avec la « pureté » du fol, de l'innocent, face aux intrigues de l'intellectuel.

Le surhomme face au reste du monde.

Le pouvoir prométhéen de la musique.

L'impérialisme de l'Orchestre qui écrase les autres formes de musique.

Richard Wagner, autant philosophe que musicien : le wagnérisme « Nacht und Nebel » (Nuit et Brouillard) tiré de « l'Or du Rhin » , qui ensuite est devenu le nom de code d'un ordre célèbre organisant les Ires déportations dès le 7 décembre 1941, Hitler avait publié le décret « Nacht und Nebel » .

Il y a un mélange qui associe, au sein du wagnérisme, la pensée hellénique à la pensée Romantique et qui prépare aussi le terrain au Nazisme : le thème de la dégénérescence, y tient une place si essentielle, l'anéantissement, le héros pur, la ploutocratie de l'or.

La philosophie allemande : la théorie du déclin ; l'appel du gouffre ; le surhomme ; la fascination du bûcher final ; Schopenhauer ; Nietzsche.

La musique cristallise, dès le milieu du XIXe siècle avec Wagner, 2 aspects essentiels de l'idéologie allemande, le nationalisme et l'antisémitisme.

La pensée musicale nazie

La culture musicale de Hitler : elle est celle d'un artiste raté vivant à Vienne. Aussi, il connaît un peu et admire beaucoup le Gustav Mahler de 1906 et les valse viennoises ; mais ses goûts iront vers Anton Bruckner et Richard Wagner.

L'inculture de Hermann Göring et de Josef Goebbels qui, donc, mépriseront toute pensée artistique.

L'ordre moral nazi

Les 3 K : « Kirche » , « Küche » , « Kindern » (église, cuisine, enfants) qui formateront l'asservissement du peuple.

Malgré l'homosexualité latente du Nazisme (les Sections d'Assaut, les SA, mais aussi les SS) , on se raccroche aux valeurs conservatrices et profitant des provocations modernistes (Paul Hindemith, Arnold Schönberg) ou populistes (Kurt Weill, Paul Dessau) ; on rassure le peuple vaincu et déçu par la République de Weimar, par des retours aux vieilles valeurs rassurantes.

La théorisation de l'art dégénéré

La réaction politique contre « 14 ans de République des Juifs » , alliant la haine de la république de Weimar à la recherche de coupables.

La suite logique des lois raciales de Nuremberg (races inférieures, donc musique inférieure noire et juive) : « Les juifs sont incapables de manier la musique et le verbe et empoisonnent le beau. »

Le mauvais goût nazi : on a peur du moderne on veut rejoindre l'ordre grec mais en démesure (défilé, architecture) les arcs-de-triomphe remplacent les lauriers, l'art doit accompagner la cérémonie (la musique et le christianisme) donc être édifiant et monumental.

Le vecteur de Richard Wagner et de Bayreuth : par la main mise sur les théories délirantes de Wagner et sa musique qui les porte en elle, par l'ouverture de Bayreuth à Hitler qui en fera quasiment sa villégiature.

En fait, l'idéologie est celle de la dictature nazie et la musique un prétexte et une arme de propagande, d'une prise de pouvoir.

La prise de contrôle de l'Art : l'Art conçu comme un aspect essentiel de la vie culturelle.

Cette prise de contrôle représente un aspect lui-même essentiel de la prise de contrôle de toute la vie culturelle.

Prise de contrôle elle-même nécessaire à la domination totalitaire. Hitler a énoncé la nécessité de cette mise sous tutelle de l'Art. Le paragraphe 23 du programme de 1920 propose, en ce sens, la réunion de toutes les bonnes volontés face à la prétendue décadence qui règne, en Allemagne, au niveau de l'Art. Aux yeux de Hitler, la décadence qui règne au niveau de l'Art annonce, pire encore, elle prépare la décadence qui touchera bientôt la nation tout entière ; elle prépare la décadence qui la détruira.

Aussi, tout est boursoufflé et marqué par une forme de confusion mentale : donc, pêle-mêle, on met dans le même sac le sérialisme et Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

Le détournement des musiques

Selon l'idéologie nazie, le peuple allemand était le « 1er peuple musicien de la terre » et Richard Wagner, son héros, et Anton Bruckner, le pauvre et doux, son prophète. Pour ancrer leur théorie, les Nazis ont ré-écrits l'histoire et détournés la pensée musicale des compositeurs du passé.

Les théoriciens de l'anti-sémitisme ont revisité le passé allemand, tentant d'en séparer le bon grain aryen de l'ivraie juive, et ce, dès Händel, dont ils changent les paroles des Oratorios, parlant du peuple juif. Il faut ré-écrire l'histoire de la musique allemande et autrichienne, (pauvre Mozart !), pour « laver les souillures ».

Bach est utilisé, ainsi que Bruckner et surtout Beethoven, figure Romantique par excellence, le surhomme prométhéen. Sa 9e Symphonie est l'œuvre de référence de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et de son directeur musical Wilhelm Furtwängler.

Franz Liszt devient allemand et non plus hongrois. Richard Wagner, avec l'aide de sa famille, est amplifié et donc exploité.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, de part son origine juive (il était le petit-fils de Moses Mendelssohn, le grand penseur de l'« Aufklärung » juif), fut une des « victimes » préférées des théoriciens de l'anti-sémitisme musical malgré sa conversion au christianisme. Sa statue à Leipzig fut détruite, la rue qui portait son nom fut rebaptisée du nom d'Anton Bruckner, et, enfin, un grand concours fut organisé pour recomposer son « Songe d'une nuit d'été » dans une version aryenne. Ce fut finalement Carl Orff qui eut cet « honneur ».

Dès 1933, les programmes de musique Classique à la radio sont contrôlés. Mendelssohn est pratiquement interdit de diffusion. Les Wagner et consorts sont, eux, matraqués sans cesse en concert et à la radio, dans les défilés, dans les célébrations.

Musique dégénérée

« Entartete musik » : musique « dégénérée ». C'est ainsi que les Nazis, entre 1933 et 1945, appelaient toute musique qui ne correspondait pas aux normes de l'art officiel. « Musique qui a perdue les qualités habituelles de son genre, de sa race », loin de l'idéal aryen, de la race supérieure.

Ils appelaient donc « Art dégénéré » la musique des années 1930, qui allait de la musique atonale au jazz. Dans l'esprit nazi prédomine cette idée de décadence de dégénérescence, d'empoisonnement de cette pureté des origines, alors que leur mythologie celte ou germanique est basée sur l'inceste et le viol !

Dès leur arrivée au pouvoir, les dirigeants nazis entreprennent une éradication de « l'Art dégénéré » (« Entartete Kunst »), fondée sur une normalité créatrice visant à rejeter toute avant-garde au nom de la pureté de la race aryenne. La catégorie de musique dégénérée se présente comme une catégorie haïe où le régime nazi range toute la musique qui lui semble éloignée de sa propre vision de la musique ou toute la musique qui lui semble éloignée de sa vision du monde.

La conception du monde national-socialiste se fonde sur l'idée du sang, de la race, du peuple, puis sur l'idée d'un état totalitaire. Et comme cela était écrit dans « Mein Kampf » :

« Les juifs étaient incapables de manier la musique et le verbe. »

Quelles sont les musiques dégénérées ?

1) Toute la musique non allemande, au sens très étroit que le régime donne à la notion de « musique allemande ». Ce qui signifie : toute la musique de musiciens aux origines juives ; le jazz conçu comme une musique afro-américaine ; ou encore toute la musique prolétarienne : laquelle emprunte au jazz nombre de ses procédés.

2) Toute la musique qui ne se prête pas à la récupération politique, ou mieux : à la propagande. Toute la musique qui ne pourra être mise à contribution comme moyen de domination. Toute la musique aux capacités critiques. Toute la musique vivante. Ce qui signifie : toute la musique atonale, le jazz, là encore, toute la musique prolétarienne.

Au nom de ses critères, au nom de ses critères politiques. Critères où l'idéologique se mêle à l'esthétique, l'esthétique à l'idéologique, le régime nazi a ré-écrit l'histoire de la musique allemande ; comme il a ré-écrit l'histoire de toutes les Allemagnes.

Les prémices de la répression culturelle

Mais la chasse à l'intelligence avait commencé bien plus tôt, sans que personne ne s'en émeuve, et surtout pas les juifs allemands. Dès 1924, Adolf Hitler s'en prenait à l'art d'avant-garde.

À l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis, les mesures destinées à contrôler la vie culturelle furent immédiates. Josef Goebbels, président de la Chambre de la culture du « Reich », organisa toutes les professions artistiques. À partir de 1933, une loi allemande exigea que tous les musiciens allemands soient officiellement déclarés et enregistrés. Ceux qui, pour des raisons raciales ou artistiques, ne correspondaient pas à l'idéal nazi voyaient leur carrière brisée. Certains musiciens quittèrent alors l'Allemagne, d'autres rejoignirent la Ligue culturelle des juifs allemands. On a alors créé des Orchestres juifs, sous administration juive et destinés à un public juif. Cette ligue fonctionna jusqu'en 1941, date à laquelle la plupart de ses membres furent envoyés à Terezín, atroce anti-chambre d'Auschwitz.

La Société Nationale de la Culture Allemande (« Reichskammer der Bildenden Künste ») était fondée très tôt. Cette organisation voulait mettre fin à la corruption de l'Art et convaincre le public de la relation entre l'origine raciale et l'art. La Ire exposition organisée par le pouvoir a eu lieu en 1933, à Erlangen, où les dessins d'enfants et des malades mentaux se virent accrochés à côté des œuvres sélectionnées de la « Mannheimer Kunsthalle » afin de bien souligner l'aspect pathologique de l'Art moderne. Les interprètes, les compositeurs sont bannis ou interdits et 1938 ne fait que théoriser cela. Il faut savoir que le public réagit de manière très favorable à l'initiative et l'aspect propagandiste en fut agencé avec soin. Cette réaction du public était très prévisible : le XIXe siècle avait déjà vu se manifester la peur, l'aversion du public envers cet inconnu qu'est toujours l'Art moderne. Mais tout cela se nourrissait de la crise économique et d'un anti-sémitisme croissant. 2 facteurs très souvent liés au cours de l'histoire. À la haine des Juifs s'ajoute le rejet du Communisme ; l'un et l'autre ayant partie liée dans le délire nazi. Le concept de Bolchévisme musical est ainsi appliqué à l'encontre de « La Nuit transfigurée » d'Arnold Schönberg. Dans la République de Weimar existait déjà un fort courant anti-sémite et anti-moderniste. Ainsi, Alban Berg, appelé « l'empoisonneur des fontaines de la musique allemande » a envoyé en 1925 son certificat d'aryen pour sauver « Woyzeck » .

Dès 1928, des affiches du Parti nazi appellent à manifester contre « l'Opéra-jazz », traité d' « insolente salissure judéo-nègre » (« Jonny spielt auf ! » d'Ernst Křenek) . En 1938, l'exposition « Entartete Musik » (Musique dégénérée) , à Düsseldorf, dénonce le jazz comme une musique à la fois « juive, bolchévique et nègre » (!) .

À Munich, en 1937, Adolf Hitler inaugure le « Große Deutsche Kunstausstellung 1937 » , (la grande exposition de l'Art 1937) . L'art Allemand accepté montrait des toiles qui soulignaient l'héroïsme, la patrie, le devoir familial, le travail aux champs et autres choses semblables. Avec plus de 3 millions de visiteurs, ce fut la grande exposition de notre temps.

Adolf Hitler dans le discours d'inauguration déclara :

« Avant que le National-Socialisme ne prenne le pouvoir, il n'y avait en Allemagne que le soi-disant “ art moderne ” : chaque année, un autre art moderne. Nous, nous voulons un art Allemand d'une valeur éternelle. L'art n'est pas fondé sur le temps, une époque, un style, une année, mais uniquement sur un peuple. Et tant qu'un peuple existe, l'art est un jalon, le point stable dans les apparences fugitives. C'est l'existence et la durable prestation d'un peuple, et pour cela l'art est l'expression de l'essentiel de l'existence, un monument éternel, en soi-même l'existence et la performance.

Le Cubisme, le Dadaïsme, l'Impressionnisme, l'Expressionnisme, tout cela est complètement sans valeur pour le peuple Allemand. »

Donc, dès 1933, commence le schéma de la valise ou la mort, les musiciens et les chefs clairement « dégénérés » pour les Nazis, qui n'ont eu d'autres « choix » que l'exil ou les camps de concentration. Vers 1933, les termes « Juif » et « Bolchévique » étaient devenus synonymes pour tout art moderne.

L'exposition de Düsseldorf de 1938

Tout était donc en place pour cette exposition. L'extermination des ennemis passait aussi par l'extermination de la culture. Ses ennemis étaient tous les créateurs car la création est par essence subversive « un régime comme celui de l'Allemagne Nationale-Socialiste ne peut supporter que l'ordre établi risque d'être remis en cause » .

Sus donc à la « juiverie internationale et bolchévique » qui avaient élevé au rang d'œuvres d'art les productions bâtardes de véritables « malades mentaux » (d'où l'appellation : « Arts dégénérés ») .

« Bolchévisme culturel ! Arrogante impudence juive ! » , c'est dans ces termes que Josef Goebbels stigmatise les œuvres d'Arnold Schönberg, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, Ernst Křenek et tant d'autres, lors de l'inauguration de l'exposition diffamatoire intitulée « Musique dégénérée » , ouverte à Düsseldorf, le 22 mai 1938, date anniversaire des 150 ans de la naissance de Richard Wagner. Elle fait suite à celle dite de l' « Art dégénéré » qui s'est tenue à Munich, 1 an plus tôt. Sur la brochure de l'exposition de Düsseldorf figure un saxophoniste nègre porteur de l'étoile jaune. Sous-titrée : « Un règlement de comptes » , la manifestation qui fut un échec, crache sa haine à tout va. Dans les 2 cas, à Düsseldorf comme à Munich, en musique comme en peinture, on présente toutes ces œuvres comme œuvres folles ou comme œuvres criminelles. On les présente comme l'œuvre de tarés : comme l'œuvre de dégénérés. À cette fin, on en souligne, tantôt, le manque de sens, la prétendue incohérence ; tantôt, encore, on en souligne le manque de fini, la réalisation défailante, les prétendues fautes de composition. Dans les 2 cas, en musique comme en peinture, le rôle de l'exposition consiste, non sans démagogie, à prendre le peuple à témoin de la prétendue décadence où a sombré l'Allemagne ; jusqu'au niveau de la peinture ou même de la musique. Ou encore : à rendre le peuple sensible à la tâche salutaire, à la tâche quasi-sanitaire de purification que mène le régime nazi. Dans les 2 cas, la dénonciation véhémement précède la liquidation ; la liquidation définitive. Bientôt, on brûlera nombre de ces tableaux. Déjà, on a commencé à faire taire tous ces musiciens.

À Düsseldorf, l'exposition est placée sous la tutelle de responsables nazis, On y trouve sous la catégorie de musique dégénérée : la musique atonale de la Nouvelle École de Vienne, le jazz, la musique prolétarienne, bref, l'ensemble de la nouvelle musique apparue ou répandue en Allemagne depuis environ 30 ans : toute la nouvelle musique que rejette le régime nazi. Mais toute cette musique, ou mieux : toutes ces musiques, toutes ces œuvres, cette exposition ne les expose pas : au contraire, elle les exhibe, pêle-mêle. Toutes ces œuvres, elle les accompagne des commentaires les plus corrosifs, des commentaires les plus agressifs, afin de les rendre ridicules, afin de mieux les mettre en accusation, afin de mieux les mettre au pilori. Une liste noire est établie et tout orchestre se voit interdit de jouer ces œuvres. Ces musiques sont pour les Nazis des musiques d'aliénés, c'est l'art des Juifs et des fous. Il fallait prouver que les artistes de l'avant-garde (les expressionnistes, les Dadaïstes, les membres du « Bauhaus ») étaient des gens dégénérés, séniles, dérangés, fous ou schizophréniques et en plus Juifs ou Communistes !

Était donc considérée comme musique dégénérée celle émanant des races inférieures, qu'elles soient « juives » ou « nègres » et l'on l'oublie trop souvent « tziganes » . Sait-on, d'ailleurs, que l'improvisation caractéristique du jazz était interdite en musique, et que le jazz considérait comme une musique à la fois « juive, bolchévique et nègre » conduit Josef Gœbbels à créer un jazz nazi. « Charlie and his Orchestra » . Les paroles devenaient de la propagande nazie.

C'est une recension de la « musique dégénérée » , où l'anathème était jeté sur la modernité du début du XXe siècle et sur la musique « juive » . La couverture de la brochure de l'Exposition représentait un Noir jouant du saxophone avec « l'Étoile de David » au revers de son veston, détournement abject de l'Opéra-jazz d'Ernst Křenek, « Jonny spielt auf ! » , grand succès des années 1920. À l'occasion de l'exposition étaient présentées les théories sur « musique et race » , qui aboutirent à la publication, en 1940, d'un « Dictionnaire des Juifs dans la musique » .

La notion même de « musique dégénérée » (« Entartete Musik ») , objet de l'exposition de Düsseldorf, ne fait pourtant que démontrer la diversité des styles concernés et le caractère éminemment racial et politique des critères retenus. Placée sous la tutelle de responsables nazis, cette exposition présente, pêle-mêle, sous la catégorie de musique dégénérée : la musique atonale de la Nouvelle École de Vienne, le jazz, la musique prolétarienne, bref, l'ensemble de la nouvelle musique apparue ou répandue en Allemagne depuis environ 30 ans : toute la nouvelle musique que rejette le régime nazi.

C'est ainsi que de très nombreux compositeurs et interprètes, taxés de judaïsme, de dégénérescence ou de bolchévisme, ont perdu, et ce dès 1933, tout moyen d'expression et de subsistance « pure » conforme au National-Socialisme.

Toutes ces musiques, toutes ces œuvres, cette exposition ne les expose pas : au contraire, elle les exhibe, pêle-mêle. Toutes ces œuvres, elle les accompagne des commentaires les plus corrosifs, des commentaires les plus agressifs, afin de les rendre ridicules, afin de mieux les mettre en accusation, afin de mieux les mettre au pilori.

Sur la brochure de l'exposition de Düsseldorf figure un saxophoniste noir porteur de l'étoile jaune. Sous-titrée « Un règlement de comptes » . Arnold Schœnberg, surnommé « le charlatan sans racines » , est inévitablement visé. « Quiconque en mange, en meurt » , fulmine Josef Gœbbels.

Les grandes figures de la musique atonale, ces « faiseurs de bruits » , subissent le même sort. Arnold Schœnberg, Alban Berg et Anton von Webern, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Kurt Weill, Karol Rathaus, Norbert Glanzberg et Alexander von Zemlinsky (beau-frère de Schœnberg) font partie du pilori.

Sont tout particulièrement visés la « musique nègre » , autrement dit le jazz, et les compositeurs juifs, dont certains, comme Schœnberg, sont les représentants d'une avant-garde pour laquelle les Nazis n'ont que haine et mépris. Ainsi, la musique atonale (dont un critique de l'époque considère qu'elle détruit « cet élément très évidemment allemand qu'est l'accord parfait ») est, pour les Nazis, le produit par excellence de « l'esprit juif ». Les Nazis lui opposent Richard Wagner, non sans quelque absurdité, si l'on garde à l'esprit ce que lui doit la musique moderne, Gustav Mahler et Arnold Schönberg, en particulier. Wagner, auteur d'un pamphlet anti-sémite, « Le Judaïsme en musique », incarne, aux yeux des idéologues du régime, une musique censée régénérer l'âme allemande, sur laquelle les Juifs sont accusés d'avoir exercé leur influence néfaste.

Interdits de concert, chassés des Orchestres et des Conservatoires, privés de toute possibilité de gagner leur vie au pays de Bach et de Beethoven, nombreux sont les compositeurs et interprètes, juifs ou non, qui choisissent de s'exiler, notamment aux États-Unis. C'est le cas, de Kurt Weill, de Paul Hindemith, d'Otto Klemperer ou d'Arnold Schönberg. Mais beaucoup d'autres, malgré la qualité de leur œuvre, et quel qu'ait été leur destin, sont tombés dans l'oubli. Ils commencent à peine d'en sortir.

Les Compositeurs et les Interprètes de la musique dégénérée

La liste est longue. Plus de 200 noms. Aussi citons simplement :

Les Compositeurs

Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, Kurt Weill, Hans Eisler (ami de Bertolt Brecht) , Viktor Ullmann, Joseph Marx, Pavel Haas, Franz Schmidt, Richard Stein, Erwin Schulhoff, Jefim Golyscheff, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Miklos Rozsa, Eric Zeisl, Franz Waxman (Oratorio « la Chanson de Terezín ») , Paul Hindemith, Alexander von Zemlinsky (la « Symphonie lyrique ») , Karol Rathaus, Rudolf Karell, Léon Jessel, Norbert Glansberg, Igor Stravinsky (qui lâchement protesta en hurlant qu'il n'avait jamais été « communiste, matérialiste, athéiste ou bolchéviste » , lettre du 14 avril 1933) , Darius Milhaud, Anton von Webern (mis aussi à l'index tout en étant pro-Nazi voulut convaincre Hitler que le dodécaphonisme assurerait la domination allemande sur la musique pendant 1,000 ans !) , Béla Bartók (considérant comme un honneur le fait d'être traité de « dégénéré » par le régime Nazi aurait lui-même demandé que sa musique soit incluse dans l'Exposition) .

Mais c'est essentiellement sur 3 compositeurs que s'acharnèrent les Nazis : Giacomo Meyerbeer, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy et Gustav Mahler. Ils sont jugés comme la source de la dégénérescence juive au sein de la musique Romantique allemande au XIXe siècle. Ainsi, Blessinger, grand théoricien anti-sémite, voyait dans Mendelssohn le modèle du « Juif assimilé » ; dans Meyerbeer, celui du « Juif affairiste sans scrupules » ; et dans Mahler, « le type fanatique du rabbin d'Europe de l'Est » (Mahler est né en Bohême) . Meyerbeer restait le rival heureux de Wagner, donc, un ennemi.

D'autres furent également maudits. Ernst Křenek, qui n'est pas, lui, d'origine juive, est également flétri parce qu'il utilise le jazz (« cette invasion nègre » , toujours selon Josef Gæbbels !) dans son Opéra « Johnny mène la danse » (1927) . L'auteur, qui met en scène les amours d'un homme noir et d'une femme blanche, est accusé d'être le « pionnier du mélange racial » . Avant-gardiste, il détourne à dessein l'Opéra sérieux, son retour à la mélodie, au conte, au mythe, au sol et au sang, tels que prônés par Richard Strauß. Ce dernier, malgré ses démêlés avec les autorités, fit l'objet d'un consensus car ses compositions répondaient parfaitement aux attentes du régime : prédominance de la ligne mélodique et nostalgie d'un monde révolu.

Les Interprètes

La vie culturelle à Berlin était soutenue par Otto Klemperer à la tête du « Kroll Oper ». À Vienne (avant l'« Anschluß »), Bruno Walter faisait rayonner la musique, Fritz Busch régnait sur la musique-de-chambre. Tous durent fuir. Par contre, l'ordre nazi délivrera de faux-certificats d'aryanité pour Johann Strauß, Franz Lehár, ces idoles de la vie viennoise qui ne pouvaient valser sur des notes juives. On en vint à détourner les paroles de jazz pour en faire, sur les mêmes airs, de belles chansons allemandes.

La musique officielle national-socialiste

Plusieurs compositeurs s'arrangèrent plutôt bien avec le régime. Cérémonie des Jeux olympiques, des grandes messes nazies, pour cela ces musiciens furent mis à contribution. Mais il n'y eut pas de musiciens véritablement emblématiques de ce nouvel ordre fasciste. Trop de talents avaient fui et les compositeurs favorables aux thèses nazies étaient en fait Werner Egk et Carl Orff, dont les célèbres « Carmina Burana » connurent un grand succès après leur création en 1937, Hans Pfitzner et Richard Strauß, monstre d'égoïsme qui poursuivait son bonhomme de chemin sans révolte ni soumission.

Aussi, on fit appel aux morts qui ne pouvaient pas contredire le « Führer ». Bach, Beethoven, mais surtout et avant tout Richard Wagner et Anton Bruckner. Bayreuth devint la résidence secondaire d'Adolf Hitler. Il y célébrait ses anniversaires et pouvait se vautrer dans les mythes dont il enveloppait sa tuerie. Bayreuth sera donc le temple du Nazisme et Wagner, son Dieu : l'Ouverture de l'Opéra « Rienzi » est l'hymne officiel des cérémonies du Parti ; « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg », l'Opéra culte.

La recherche d'une musique pure conforme à la pureté aryenne ?

L'art nazi, figé en stéréotypes, fondé sur la dynamique du groupe agressif, a besoin d'harmonie et de sons rassurants selon les lois de l'habitude. Musique chorale et Classique qui favorisent les élans de foule sont souhaitées. Exaltation des blocs orchestraux. Rythmiques répétitives, d'où ne se détache aucun élément particulier, retour à la mélodie, au conte, au mythe, au sol et au sang.

Des rituels de « Grande Messe » contre la pratique de la réflexion solitaire évitent tout risque de pensée négative. Les Nazis espèrent mettre en place la preuve du beau par le laid, et entretenir l'illusion d'un monde paysan atemporel par le discrédit des œuvres travaillées par les affres de la modernité industrielle. C'est ainsi que, face à l'exposition des « Arts dégénérés », le citoyen allemand était convié à apprécier, dans un autre pavillon, l'exposition des « Arts allemands », un ensemble d'œuvres académiques et rassurantes.

Il fallait flatter le conformisme des classes moyennes, apeurées par le dérèglement du monde traditionnel par l'économie capitaliste industrielle. Donc, la modernité effrayait et le bon peuple se réfugiait dans les mythes éternels et la propagande édifiante du guide. « La culture Nazie » fut réactionnaire par essence, elle se positionna en s'opposant à toute innovation. Cette « épuration » des Arts (qui provoqua l'exil des plus grands créateurs) ne rencontra pas de résistance majeure dans la population, les goûts de Hitler rejoignant ceux de la classe moyenne, en flattant son conformisme et son anti-intellectualisme.

Entre 1933 et 1945, les hauts-dignitaires nazis décident de ce que le peuple doit aimer en matière de musique. Pour la musique sérieuse, les Maîtres Baroques, Beethoven, Bruckner et surtout Wagner (dont les œuvres sont ancrées dans la mythologie germanique) , les marches militaires, les chants de propagande et les mélodies évoquant le « terroir » (la fameuse « Heimat ») . Pour la musique légère, il faut avant tout distraire les foules et créer une impression de bonheur et d'insouciance. On voit donc fleurir les comédies musicales, les bluettes et les revues dansées. Le régime nazi engage d'excellents compositeurs et musiciens dont ils exigent des œuvres de qualité, modernes, mais exemptes de toute trace d'influence américaine. Ils doivent travailler selon des formes fixées par la censure. C'est ainsi que naît un genre musical étrange, fortement sentimental, où les improvisations sont en réalité prévues dans la partition. Des années durant, les tubes du 3e « Reich » , enjoués et populaires, prétendent ainsi véhiculer la joie-de-vivre et l'âme Romantique des Allemands. Parallèlement, les Nazis bannissent ce qu'ils décrètent être la musique « dégénérée » : le jazz et toute tendance musicale venue d'outre-Atlantique, les musiques « de nègres » , les œuvres dodécaphoniques, celles de compositeurs d'origine juive ou de compagnons de route de Bertolt Brecht comme Kurt Weill, Paul Dessau ou Hanns Eisler.

Les buts des Nazis

Autant que de propagande, il s'agit de haine profonde, totale. Ce n'est pas qu'une histoire du mauvais goût légendaire des Josef Gœbbels, Hermann Göring, Adolf Hitler (peintre viennois raté dès 1908) , mais cette volonté d'anéantissement de tout un pan de la culture, et cette peur panique de l'Art moderne. La pensée nazie va vers le paganisme des origines et rejette la raison éclairante. Il s'agit aussi d'édifier un nouveau culte, un nouvel ordre esthétique. Cette folie anti-sémite aura conduit à la haine totale. La musique dégénérée aux yeux des Nazis est bien plus qu'une catégorie esthétique, c'est un critère idéologique illustrant la vision du monde nazie. Les 2 se mélangent et se complètent, une musique acceptable pour les Nazis est interdite si elle est celle d'un sous-être ou d'un opposant. Celle de proches idéologiques interdites si elle trop avancée. La hantise de la dégénérescence, de la souillure, le mélange d'idéologie et de goût petit-bourgeois ont donné cette notion d'art dégénéré. La chasse à la dégénérescence en art aura donné dès l'arrivée au pouvoir, en 1933, une implacable répression. Toute une éclosion artistique aura été brisée, et combien de carrières cassées, d'exils, de meurtres en camp de concentration ou de suicides. Des centaines d'interprètes et de compositeurs ont ainsi été frappés Il y aura eu un Auschwitz culturel aussi. Le nombre des musiciens persécutés par les Nazis se situerait entre 5,000 et 10,000 selon les sources. Comme Bertolt Brecht l'écrivait à Paul Hindemith :

« La musique n'est pas une arche sur laquelle on peut survivre au déluge. »

Le comportement du régime nazi envers la musique ou les arts est un révélateur important de sa folie meurtrière.

Qu'en est-il encore aujourd'hui ?

On a réhabilité toute la littérature interdite et tous les livres brûlés ont été ré-édités, mais la musique dégénérée n'a pas eu encore sa reconnaissance, pire on encense les pires musiciens du Nazisme : Carl Orff, Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner et la vision de la musique allemande par les Nazis n'a pas disparu loin de là : Beethoven génie tellurique que l'on continue à jouer « à la Furtwängler » , Richard Wagner reste le dieu de l'art total.

Il faut remarquer que certaines des œuvres mises au pilori ne s'en sont toujours pas remises :

Le long tunnel de la reconnaissance de Gustav Mahler, jusqu'en 1970 !

Les œuvres maudites qui n'ont jamais été joués et dont on possède les partitions.

Les œuvres dont on se méfie encore (Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Kurt Weill) .

Les bourreaux deviennent comme souvent les victimes : le culte envers les Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Karl Böhm, Clemens Krauß, Hans Knappertsbusch (le cas d'Herbert von Karajan est plus compliqué) ; et on fera de ces « collabos » le cœur de la dénazification musicale des années 1950 !

12 ans de totalitarisme absolu doit nous rendre méfiant envers les pouvoirs de la musique et son dévoiement. On est passé de Bach aux « Camps de la Mort » , presque sans problème. Mais il ne faut pas rejeter la musique allemande ni les autres musiques d'ailleurs. La banalité du mal a tout souillé, il ne faut pas qu'elle continue à triompher.

« La musique creuse le ciel » , dit Baudelaire.

Cela reste toujours vrai, même si le ciel a servi de tombeau à des millions de gens.

...

Dans le cadre des Ires journées de la musique du 3e « Reich » , du 22 au 29 mai 1938, une exposition intitulée « Entartete Musik » (musique dégénérée) est inaugurée à Düsseldorf le 24 mai, elle accueille le public jusqu'au 14 juin.

Cette exposition est organisée par le docteur Hans Serverus Ziegler (1893-1978) , « Gauleiter » de Thuringe dès 1933, Conseiller d'État, et Directeur des théâtres du régime hitlérien. Après la Guerre, il dirige des théâtres, enseigne, et dans sa vieillesse publie des livres orientés à l'extrême-droite, notamment des ouvrages biographiques sur Adolf Hitler.

Josef Goebbels y prononce un discours de politique musicale, le 22 mai, Richard Strauß y assure la partie musicale.

Il s'agit pour les Nazis de préserver la pureté de la musique allemande, de montrer ce qui a été censuré (nettoyé) depuis 5 ans. On y retrouve l'irrationalité de leurs thèmes, les condamnations outrancières, la propagande massive et spectaculaire, les slogans haineux, et en arrière-plan, la propagation d'un mot d'ordre : « l'Allemagne, pays de la musique », qui a encore aujourd'hui de la résonance.

C'est pour que l'Allemagne devienne le pays de la musique Classique, qu'il faut la purifier, la libérer de la « presse d'égoût » et de la « domination juive ». Grâce au National-Socialisme, les artistes se trouvent devant un avenir pur et non falsifié, dit Goebbels dans son discours du 28 mai (en y amalgamant un « expressionnisme atonal »).

C'est une exposition, diffamatoire contre des artistes, qui utilise l'attirail idéologique incohérent et bricolé de la droite populiste, raciste, nationaliste, et anti-démocratique. On y retrouve également des éléments de polémique, autour des musiques atonales, jugées, dès 1920, « bolchéviques », par le compositeur Hans Pfitzner.

Dans la visée, autour de la thématique « musique et race », les musiques atonales, celles de la Seconde École de Vienne (musique sérielle), le jazz « nègre », la musique tzigane, les compositeurs de confession juive, ou issus de familles de confession juive, les compositeurs de gauche, une grande partie des musiques « modernistes » du 1er tiers du XXe siècle.

Une liste d'œuvres interdites aux orchestres est établie. Un dictionnaire des Juifs dans la musique est publié en 1940.

Plus de 200 compositeurs sont mis à l'index. Les musiciens contemporains sont privés de travail sous le régime hitlérien, certains s'exilent, d'autres sont assassinés dans les camps de concentration.

L'affiche, un musicien noir affublé d'une « Étoile de David », et jouant du saxophone, est une référence à l'Opéra « Jonny spielt auf ! » (« Johnny mène la danse ! ») d'Ernst Křenek, qui met en scène des amours entre blancs et noirs. Cet opéra, composé en 1925, a connu un très grand succès international jusqu'en 1930.

Giacomo Meyerbeer (1791-1864) .

Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) .

On trouve également :

Béla Bartók (1881-1945) considérant comme un honneur le fait d'être traité de « dégénéré » par le régime Nazi aurait lui-même demandé que sa musique soit incluse dans l'Exposition.

Alban Berg (1885-1935) .

Des chef-d'œuvres condamnés au nom du totalitarisme mais dont les verdicts furent hélas reconduits par les hégémonies modernistes de l'après-guerre sont encore en attente de réelle libération : à savoir, trouver enfin un public qui pourra ainsi appréhender sa propre histoire de pair à l'histoire de la musique du XXe siècle. Cependant, entre ces musiques tellement interdites (qu'on ne sait même plus qu'il y eut interdit ou qu'il y eut un jour musique) et l'absolue évidence du génocide, la relation de causalité (voire de générique) est à soumettre à l'évidence. Quoi de commun entre l'index musical des Nazis et la volonté d'exterminer une partie de l'humanité ? Quel lien entre l'annihilation culturelle et la volonté finale ? Comment peut-on institutionnaliser l'une pour fonctionnaliser l'autre ? À moins que tout ne soit contenu anonymement dans la nasse que forge le Pouvoir afin d'assurer son absolue cécité sur un monde rendu sourd par cessation de musique ?

Le 7 avril 1933, la ségrégation antisémite nazie s'édifie avec la Loi de Reconstitution de l'Administration qui exclue implicitement les juifs du cadre public, loi complétée en 1935 par les Lois de Nuremberg qui élargiront l'interdit à tout le champ social. Dès 1933, les compositeurs et musiciens juifs ne peuvent plus exercer leur art en Allemagne. Le cas particulier de l'immense compositeur Frank Shreker (1878-1934) , obligé de démissionner de la direction du Conservatoire de Berlin, dès 1932, nous signifie ce que fut le climat mafieux qui présida au vote de la loi.

C'est en mars 1933 que Shreker, exaspéré par les tensions subies, écrit au Directeur de l'Académie des Arts :

« Lorsque l'année dernière, poussé par Monsieur Havemann qui vint me voir en quelque sorte comme représentant du Parti, j'ai démissionné de mon poste de directeur, Monsieur Havemann s'engagea (il me le garantissait) à ce qu'on me laisse désormais en paix. Et voici que la menace recommence à nouveau *. Mon ascendance : ma mère descend d'une vieille famille aristocratique ; mon grand-père maternel était major de l'armée autrichienne ; mon père était hongrois.

Je ne sais rien d'autre de lui que, selon une lettre, il était protestant. Mais il est vraisemblable qu'il était d'ascendance juive. Il avait reçu de nombreuses décorations autrichiennes et allemandes et la grande médaille d'or pour les arts et les sciences d'Autriche ainsi, je crois, que de Bavière et du Wurtemberg. J'ai moi-même la croix de guerre autrichienne de 2e classe pour le service civil. J'ai été élevé comme catholique, et je me suis assis dès 16 ans au banc d'orgue d'une église viennoise. Que veut-on donc de moi * ? Quant au fait qu'un gouvernement socialiste m'est nommé, je n'y puis rien. »

Lettre morte, Franz Shreker, à l'annonce de son renvoi de l'Académie, sera victime d'une violente crise cardiaque. Un des plus grands compositeurs occidentaux mourra ainsi le 21 mars 1934, sans connaître ce qu'allait devenir « la menace » ni ce que « l'on allait vouloir de lui ». Avant d'essayer de répondre à cette double interrogation, on peut remarquer que cette lettre donne à lire entre les lignes d'une angoisse toute personnelle le syntagme culturel nazi qui ne se manifestera officiellement que 4 ans plus tard :

Musique vivante (malgré sa continuité avec la tradition) - Socialisme (Weimar veut dire bolchévique) - Juif.

Le 24 mai 1938 fut inaugurée à Düsseldorf l'Exposition « Entartete Musik » (musiques dégénérées), écho de l'Exposition « Entartete Kunst » (art dégénéré) qui avait eu lieu à Munich, l'année précédente. « Entartete Musik » regroupait de manière tout à fait arbitraire sous le terme générique de « dégénéré » tout ce qui avait été l'actualité musicale florissante sous la république de Weimar : une thématique était consacrée au jazz et à « l'opérette juive de jadis au rythme du jazz », une autre fustigeait toute l'activité musicale professionnelle (éducation, diffusion, Opéra) sous le terme de « bolchévisme musical », une section étant réservée aux théoriciens de l'atonalité, figuraient au nombre des partitions exposées en tant que « dégénérées » entre autres les chef-d'œuvres :

Aucun lien formel ne relie ces compositeurs si ce n'est qu'ils contribuaient tous à l'actualité de la vie musicale. Seule une volonté d'éradiquer la musique dans son ensemble paraît tout d'abord être l'objectif de l'Exposition : il n'y a pas eu de catalogue de l'« Entartete Musik » car un tel catalogue était impossible à documenter. Mais il y eut une brochure dont la couverture, sous forme d'affiche, référait à l'Opéra de Ernst Křenek (1900-1992) : « Jonny spielt auf » (Jonny mène la danse !), créé à Berlin en 1925 et dont le héros était un noir.

Voici ce que Křenek écrivit après avoir pu s'exiler aux États-Unis :

scène des individus de mon acabit. Il est évident que le Nazisme devait une grande part de son succès à la jalousie hystérique des démunis. »

Nous verrons qu'un compositeur à l'acuité aussi brillante que Křenek peut lui aussi s'illusionner sur le véritable objectif sous jacent à la liste des condamnés de l'« Entartete Musik ». Si l'on revient à l'affiche de l'exposition de 1938 qui cite iconiquement son Opéra, nous pouvons dégager ses prédicats : un Křenek noir, jouant du saxophone, portant à la boutonnière de son smoking de concert « l'Étoile de David ». C'est-à-dire un ensemble de métissage : un noir (certainement américain, donc un esclave), un saxophone (instrument moderne exclus de la nomenclature Classique), un « smoking » (référant au rituel du concert), l'« Étoile de David » (une anti-décoration, un marquage). Métissage qu'avait déjà souligné, en 1930, l'idéologue Alfred Rosenberg (qui se verra ravir par Josef Gœbbels la main mise sur la culture) à propos de la reprise de « Jonny spielt auf ! » à Munich :

« " Jonny ", le symbole du Maître du monde abâtardi, judéo-nègre, est debout sur une grande mappe-monde et, à ses pieds, l'humanité blanche danse au son du jazz, saute en cercle autour du globe en faisant des courbettes, comme jadis les juifs autour du veau d'or, tout en " chantant " en chœur. Ces mots d'humanité blanche dansant autour du nègre " Jonny " avec des convulsions abominables de lascivité, le remerciant du déchaînement des plus bas instincts, proclament à la face du monde le triomphe victorieux du sang judéo-nègre sur l'ancienne culture aryenne. »

Il est un fait que Křenek est un de ces compositeurs « mis à l'index » par les Nazis qui ne soit pas juif. Mais, en tant que compositeur de l'Opéra « Jonny » et par la suite d'œuvres dodécaphoniques, en tant qu'époux de la fille de Gustav Mahler, Ernst Křenek sera toujours identifié par le régime comme compositeur « dégénéré » donc juif. De même dans l'Exposition « Entartete Musik », la caricature de Igor Stravinsky portait la légende : « qui a inventé l'histoire selon laquelle Stravinsky descendrait de la noblesse russe ? », présupposant une ascendance juive du compositeur complètement fautive. Si nous regardons à nouveau l'affiche « Entartete Musik », nous pouvons envisager le glissement qui va du métissage en tant que cause de la dégénérescence de la musique allemande à la notion de race en tant que fondement d'idéologie nazie : « l'Étoile de David » n'est plus une anti-décoration mais l'unique marquage porteur de tous les dangers de contamination.

C'est un véritable terme vicariant qui va servir à identifier tout et tous ce qui peut(vent) être menace pour la pureté d'une utopique musique allemande - celle-ci impérialisant les traditions autrichiennes (l'invasion de l'Autriche ne date que de 2 mois), tchèques, slovaques, hongroises, roumaines, et jusqu'à française (Darius Milhaud, Paul Dukas) - la Musique ne pouvant être que celle d'un « Reich » unique, d'un Peuple unique et du « Führer » unique telle qu'elle fut embaumée par Hitler lui-même dans le « temple » du « Walhalla », près de Ratisbonne, en 1937, lorsqu'il ajouta au Panthéon (où l'on retrouve déjà Ludwig van Beethoven et Richard Wagner) le petit paysan Bruckner en butte à l'hostilité de la société viennoise corrompue par la « juiverie »*.

Cependant, pour le public de l'Exposition de Düsseldorf, ce qui menaçait la musique allemande dans son utopique unicité n'était qu'une liste improvisée et non exhaustive de compositeurs disparates de par leur origine, leur génération et leur esthétique (ainsi Béla Bartók qui n'était pas à l'origine dans la liste noire exigea d'en faire partie). Nous avons vu l'impossibilité d'un catalogue raisonné qui puisse fonder le concept d'« Entartete Musik ». Mais reportons-nous à cet extrait du texte accompagnant la brochure rédigée par le pseudo-commissaire Hans Severus Ziegler et qui demeure le seul « prétexte » de l'Exposition :

« Ce qui est réuni dans l'Exposition " Entartete Musik " représente le reflet d'un véritable sabbat de sorcières et du bolchévisme culturel le plus frivole, aux plans spirituel et artistique ; c'est aussi le reflet du triomphe de la sous-humanité, de l'arrogante impudence juive et d'un complet abrutissement intellectuel. La musique juive et la musique allemande demeurent étrangères. Les lois de la musique juive ou les constructions intellectuelles et les doctrines du faux-semblant, la physique et la physiologie juives du son se développent actuellement de façon clairement prédominante dans le monde musical de sang allemand, de telle sorte qu'il existe des imbéciles beni-oui-oui allemands qui ne peuvent se soustraire aux influences d'une race inférieure à cause de leur propre faiblesse et de leur manque de force créatrice et d'inspiration. La dégénérescence de la musique et de la création musicale allemandes naît alors par la force des choses. La musique " dégénérée " est ainsi au fond une musique non allemande, pour laquelle la partie saine du peuple ne trouvera également aucun organe de réception, aucune émotion et aucune réceptivité. »

Le titre du texte de Ziegler figurant sur l'affiche « Entartete Musik » est « Eine Abrechnung » (un règlement de compte) , écho du titre donné par Adolf Hitler au 1er volume de « Mein Kampf » . Mais Hitler, dans son livre, ne reliait la dégénérescence qu'au seul bolchévisme. Dans l'extrait jargonnesque de Ziegler, on voit que le syntagme :

« Musique Vivante - Bolchévisme - Juif » est remplacé par le postulat :

« Musique de sabbat (tous styles confondus : du jazz au post-Romantisme en passant par l'atonalisme et le dodécaphonisme) + Bolchévisme + Non Humanité = Son Juif »

* En janvier 1941, Adolf Hitler, suite à l'écoute de la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner dans son « Repaire du Loup » , qualifia son opposant le compositeur Johannes Brahms de « phénomène de salon porté aux nues par la juiverie » . Le critique musical Eduard Hanslick, qui était « demi-juif » et qui défendait Brahms, avait fait de la vie à Vienne du « petit paysan » Bruckner « un enfer » . Et Hitler d'ajouter que c'était « la chose la plus amère » que « de devoir vivre dans un environnement qui ne comprend pas ce qu'on crée ou ce qu'on pourrait créer » !

L'histoire culturelle a longtemps laissé la musique et la vie musicale de côté, accordant la primauté à la littérature et aux arts plastiques. On ne trouve ainsi, avant les années 1980, aucune étude d'ensemble sur la musique sous le Nazisme : seul le recueil de documents réuni et présenté par Joseph Wulf, qui s'inscrit dans la série d'ouvrages que ce dernier a consacrés au 3e « Reich » , est paru en 1966. (1) Il faut ensuite attendre 1982, soit près de 20 ans, pour voir paraître l'ouvrage de Fred Prieberg. (2) Depuis lors, les publications se sont multipliées, en particulier en Allemagne : en témoignent notamment l'ouvrage de Hanns-Werner Heister et Hans-Günther Klein (3) et, en 1988, la reconstitution de l'exposition de Düsseldorf de Albrecht Dümling et Peter Girth marquant le 50e anniversaire de cette exposition, accompagnée d'un ouvrage collectif, présentant documents d'archive et commentaires. (4) Dans les années 1990 ont paru plusieurs études en anglais, dont celles de Michæl Meyer (5) et d'Erik Levi (6) (à laquelle cet article doit beaucoup) , suivie 3 ans plus tard par celle de Michæl H. Kater. (7) En outre, des équipes de recherche, comme celle de Peter Petersen à Hambourg, s'activent actuellement à mettre au jour les activités précises d'organismes et de personnalités du monde musical pendant le Nazisme, et s'efforcent de réhabiliter les œuvres de compositeurs persécutés. En 1993, à l'instigation de Michæl Haas et Albrecht Dümling, est ainsi née la collection « Entartete Musik » chez « Decca » , consacrée aux œuvres oubliées par l'histoire.

Force est pourtant de constater qu'on ne trouve pas d'écho dans notre pays de ces travaux, aucun des ouvrages cités n'ayant été traduit et aucune étude n'ayant paru en français (8) sur ce sujet, alors même que s'est tenu en Italie, par exemple, un colloque en 1989. (9) Il a d'ailleurs fallu attendre une date récente pour que s'amorcent des recherches sur la vie musicale en France sous l'Occupation, (10) et le chemin qui reste à parcourir est encore long et semé d'embûches, tant sont fortes les résistances auxquelles se heurtent les chercheurs pour consulter les archives de l'époque. Pourtant, l'importance de la musique dans l'identité allemande mérite qu'on s'intéresse à la place que lui accordait le Nazisme. On évoquera donc à grands traits la place de la musique dans l'organigramme du pouvoir nazi, avant de tenter de discerner les critères selon lesquels une musique était taxée de « dégénérée » .

Le contrôle de la vie musicale

Un État totalitaire contrôle, par définition, toutes les sphères de la société, ce qui inclut la vie culturelle. Josef Gœbbels, qui avait été nommé dès mars 1933 ministre de la Propagande et de l'Éducation du peuple (« Volksaufklärung ») , avait vu ses attributions étendues à tout ce qui concernait « l'influence spirituelle de la nation, la propagande en faveur de l'État, de la culture et de l'économie, l'information de l'opinion publique allemande » . Le 22 septembre, une loi du ministère de la Propagande institua la « Reichkulturkammer » (Chambre de la Culture du « Reich ») , illustrant ainsi la volonté de mettre l'art et la culture au service de la promotion de l'État. Conformément à l'organisation interne du régime, le pouvoir sur la culture était partagé entre un ministre du « Reich » (Gœbbels) et un dirigeant du Parti (Alfred Rosenberg) , auxquels s'ajoutait (avec la régionalisation) le président du Conseil de la puissante région de Prusse, Hermann Göring.

La Chambre de la Culture était divisée en 7 départements (théâtre, littérature, presse, radio, arts plastiques, musique et cinéma) , dont les présidents étaient nommés par le ministre. Son inauguration eut lieu le 15 novembre devant le « Krolloper » , lieu chargé de sens puisque c'est devant ce théâtre, si actif pendant la République de Weimar, que s'était déroulé l'autodafé, 6 mois plus tôt. Cette organisation eut pour conséquence immédiate l'exclusion des Juifs de la vie artistique, tout artiste devant obligatoirement y être inscrit pour avoir le droit d'exercer. Le département musical, la « Reichmusikammer » , couvrait l'ensemble des professions de la musique ; il comprenait la section des compositeurs, celle des instrumentistes, l'union des agents et organisateurs de concert, l'union des sociétés chorales et folkloriques, la section des éditeurs de musique, celle des marchands de musique et enfin, celle des facteurs d'instruments. L'éducation musicale et la musicologie dépendaient, quant à elles, du ministère de l'Éducation. À sa tête furent nommées 2 grandes figures du monde musical : le compositeur Richard Strauß, comme président, et le chef de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, Wilhelm Furtwängler, comme vice-président. Mais ces personnalités se heurtèrent rapidement au régime, faisant les frais des conflits de pouvoir entre Gœbbels, qui n'était pas hostile à l'art moderne, et Rosenberg, avant tout idéologue du régime. Le 1er, qui s'était adonné à la littérature dans les années 1920, avait d'abord protégé Paul Hindemith, qui fut finalement limogé de son poste de professeur de composition au Conservatoire de Berlin, en octobre 1933, à la suite de l'action de Rosenberg contre son Opéra « Mathis der Maler ». À la suite de cette affaire, Furtwängler, qui avait soutenu Hindemith, dut démissionner en décembre 1934. Quant à Richard Strauß, il fut contraint d'abandonner son poste le 13 juillet 1935, (11) en raison d'une lettre qu'il avait adressée à Stefan Zweig, le librettiste (juif) de « Die schweigsame Frau » (12) et Hitler demanda même à la presse de rester discret à l'occasion du 80e anniversaire du compositeur en 1944. Strauß et Furtwängler furent remplacés par des compositeurs de peu de renom mais loyaux serviteurs du régime : Peter Raabe et Paul Graener.

Erik Levi souligne l'ambiguïté de l'action de la « Musikkammer ». En étendant sa main-mise sur les institutions musicales (sauf Bayreuth, directement placé sous le contrôle de Hitler), et en les subventionnant, le gouvernement leur permit aussi de se redresser. En prenant par exemple en charge, en octobre 1933, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (qui était alors au bord de la banqueroute) pour en faire un véritable orchestre officiel du « Reich », l'État assurait ainsi le plus haut salaire jamais donné à ses musiciens. (13) De même, les instrumentistes, qui avaient conservé leur poste, bénéficièrent de mesures telles que l'instauration d'un salaire minimum, la journée de travail de 6 heures ou l'instauration d'un jour de congé obligatoire. Raabe publia également un décret en 1936 interdisant aux musiciens de l'Orchestre de la radio de jouer à l'extérieur, ce qui offrait aux instrumentistes sans poste fixe davantage d'occasions de se produire et permettait de lutter contre le chômage. Ainsi, l'Allemagne pouvait cultiver son image de protectrice des arts et de « pays de la musique », diffusée à l'extérieur par les tournées de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Pourtant cette politique, issue autant des conceptions politiques que du goût personnel des dirigeants, était souvent incohérente et eut à l'évidence une influence limitée sur le goût du public : l'admiration d'Adolf Hitler pour Richard Wagner eut peu d'influence sur le répertoire des Orchestres, qui programmaient surtout Johannes Brahms, Richard Strauß, Anton Bruckner et Max Reger, et n'enraya pas le déclin de Wagner au profit de Verdi sur la scène. (14)

Richard Wagner, modèle de la musique allemande

La promotion d'un art authentiquement allemand s'appuya sur l'utilisation et la glorification de Richard Wagner : dans « Mein Kampf », Hitler décrit l'admiration qu'il conçut pour le compositeur lors d'une représentation de « Lohengrin » à laquelle il aurait assisté à l'âge de 12 ans. Il est trop rare qu'un musicien occupe une telle place dans les fondements idéologiques d'un État pour qu'on ne s'y arrête pas quelque peu. Certes, la musique faisait partie des attributs de l'identité du pays, comme les nationalistes ne se privèrent pas de le rappeler : « Deutschland das Land der Musik » peut-on lire sur une affiche de l'époque, slogan réaffirmé par un aigle au corps figuré par un rang de tuyaux d'orgue. (15) L'auteur des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » avait certainement contribué à réactiver cette idée, vraisemblablement née du Romantisme allemand, de « l'Allemagne, pays de la musique » : n'avait-il pas, dans un article de 1841, affirmé que les Allemands étaient « le peuple le mieux doué par Dieu qui fit naître un Mozart et un Beethoven » ? (16) Aussi, Wagner était-il abondamment utilisé au service de l'idéologie nationaliste et, dans son Histoire de la musique allemande, Josef Müller-Blattau ne manqua pas de citer la phrase lapidaire de l'illustre compositeur : « L'Italien est un chanteur, le Français un virtuose, l'Allemand un musicien. » (17) Les idées de Wagner reflètent le préjugé selon lequel les Français auraient des mœurs légères et faciles et une musique conforme à cette image, alors que les Allemands, réputés sérieux, seraient détenteurs de l'art véritable. Wagner réussit dans sa révolution esthétique, à concilier l'Opéra, en vogue à Paris, avec la musique instrumentale sérieuse des Allemands. Cette révolution se concrétisa par la construction de l'Opéra de Bayreuth, où le théâtre, lieu traditionnel du divertissement, s'était métamorphosé en un sanctuaire de la musique, exigeant le plus grand recueillement, dont il était lui-même le Créateur, « le Dieu irradiant un sacre », selon Stéphane Mallarmé. Bayreuth devint ainsi, dès la fin du 19^e siècle, un centre de pèlerinage où l'on accourait de tous les pays. En France, le fameux guide d'Albert Lavignac, paru en 1897 et maintes fois ré-édité, débute par une véritable profession de foi :

« On va à Bayreuth comme on veut, à pied, à cheval, en voiture, à bicyclette, en chemin de fer, et le vrai pèlerin devrait y aller à genoux. » (18)

Les livrets, conçus par le compositeur lui-même, participent de cette religion. Sans se livrer ici à une exégèse de la symbolique de Wagner, on peut noter que le caractère cosmique et an-historique de ses textes, prenant la forme de mythes universalistes, les rendaient particulièrement aptes à une récupération politique. Les pseudo-mythes nordiques pouvaient ainsi se substituer aux Églises en place, « la mythologie wagnérienne n'étant pas la religion chrétienne, mais un culte spécial sorti du cerveau de Wagner » . (19) Quant à Hitler, il lui était facile de s'identifier à Siegfried, ce héros germanique et rédempteur qui tue Mime, le nain répugnant des Niebelung, dont l'analogie avec le Juif, tel que se le représentait Wagner, apparaît explicitement dans les écrits de son épouse Cosima.

Comme l'écrivait Theodor W. Adorno, en 1938, « l'antisémitisme wagnérien rassemble en lui tous les ingrédients de l'antisémitisme ultérieur » , (20) même si, ce qu'on a appelé « le Cercle de Bayreuth » , dont faisait notamment partie Houston Stewart Chamberlain, a contribué dans une large mesure à le théoriser. (21) Le fait que le pamphlet de Wagner, « Le judaïsme et la musique » , ait été utilisé dans les écoles pour inculquer l'antisémitisme durant le Nazisme (22) est révélateur de l'importance qui lui était accordée. C'est que cet écrit de 1850 (ré-édité en 1869) est d'un antisémitisme des plus virulents, utilisable tel quel par le régime.

On y lit, pour n'en citer qu'un exemple, que la laideur physique du Juif est incompatible avec l'art :

Anton Bruckner, héritier de Beethoven et de Wagner

Si Wagner incarnait un des principaux héros de la musique allemande, il était aussi considéré comme l'héritier de l'un de ses plus illustres prédécesseurs, Beethoven. L'affiche de la Semaine artistique allemande à Paris (24) , en septembre

1937, représentait ainsi la musique nationale par le buste de Beethoven, placé devant celui de Wagner, qui regarde dans la même direction que son glorieux prédécesseur. De fait, les Symphonies de Beethoven (en particulier, la 9e) furent abondamment jouées pendant cette période, notamment pour l'anniversaire de Hitler en 1942 et au concert final de l'exposition de Düsseldorf en 1938. (25)

Afin d'étoffer le rang des héros de l'histoire nationale, le régime trouva dans la personne d'Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) un compositeur non seulement digne de figurer aux côtés des 2 héros, mais permettant de les unir. Auteur de musique instrumentale essentiellement, en particulier des Symphonies, il réalisa l'union entre l'art symphonique de Beethoven et le langage wagnérien, et fut l'équivalent, pour la Symphonie, de Wagner, qui « eut le temps de voir réalisé par les Symphonies de Bruckner ce que lui-même rêvait d'accomplir » . (26) Le Festival organisé en juin 1937, les « Bruckner-Tage » (Journées Bruckner) , fut ainsi l'occasion de réaffirmer la suprématie de la musique germanique. Un buste en marbre du compositeur fut inauguré en présence de Hitler au « Walhalla » de Regensburg (Ratisbonne) , temple monumental érigé par Louis Ier de Bavière au sommet d'une colline dominant le Danube. Le cérémonial fut grandiloquent, le chancelier déposant une couronne de laurier au pied du piédestal sous le regard de l'aigle impérial. Le soir, on joua la 3e Symphonie et, à l'automne suivant, c'est également une œuvre de ce compositeur, le Finale de sa 5e symphonie, qui fut choisie pour clore les cérémonies de la Fête du travail (« Parteitag der Arbeit ») . Certes, Bruckner avait été fortement marqué par Wagner, dont il avait découvert en 1863 « Tannhäuser » et « Tristan und Isolde » , comme en témoignent l'ampleur de l'orchestre et le traitement des cuivres de ses longues Symphonies et de ses Messes, animées par la foi et la gloire de Dieu. L'attitude de recueillement que suscitait sa musique, et qui devait servir de modèle à l'attitude à adopter devant le nouveau Messie, explique sans doute aussi la faveur dont il fut l'objet. En outre, il avait été organiste, obtenant même d'être enterré sous l'orgue de l'abbatiale de Saint-Florian, où il avait été enfant de chœur. Or, l'orgue était particulièrement bien vu du régime pour sa puissance religieuse et cérémonielle et, comme on l'a vu, servait d'emblème à la musique. Enfin, comme le souligne Albrecht Dümling, (27) le fait que Bruckner fût autrichien ne gênait nullement les autorités mais leur permettait au contraire d'annexer musicalement ce pays germanophone, avant de le faire par les armes quelques mois plus tard. Les « Journées Bruckner » préparaient, en quelque sorte, l'« Anschluß » .

L'exposition de la musique « dégénérée »

Mais c'est surtout la politique d'exclusion systématique qui caractérise le régime nazi. Les « Journées musicales du “ Reich ” » (« Reichsmusiktage ») qui se déroulèrent en mai 1938, à Düsseldorf, considérée comme la capitale de la musique, furent l'occasion de présenter une exposition de propagande visant à dénoncer la musique « dégénérée » . Calquées sur le modèle des « Journées de l'art allemand » (« Tage der deutschen Kunst ») , qui s'étaient déroulées à Munich, en juillet 1937, et avaient donné lieu à l'exposition « Entartete Kunst » , ce Festival présenta ainsi l'exposition « Entartete Musik » , dont l'inauguration coïncidait avec le 125e anniversaire de la naissance de Richard Wagner (22 mai 1813) . La date relativement tardive de cette manifestation semble indiquer que la musique n'avait pas été la 1re des préoccupations du nouveau régime ; elle était traitée, en tout état de cause, après la peinture et la sculpture. Cette initiative tenait peut-être au fait qu'il restait à convaincre une partie de la population : le public n'avait-il d'ailleurs pas, l'année précédente, boudé l'exposition de l'art « authentiquement allemand » pour se presser à celle de l'art « dégénéré » qui présentait des œuvres de Franz Marc, Paul Klee et Wassily Kandinsky ?

Bien qu'organisée sous l'égide du ministère de la Propagande, dont Heinz Drewes dirigeait le département musical, l'exposition reflétait essentiellement les opinions de son commissaire, Hans Severus Ziegler, directeur du Théâtre national allemand de Weimar, antisémite notoire et pourfendeur de toute innovation artistique. C'est ce qui explique, comme le relève Erik Levi, que Igor Stravinsky fut présenté comme « dégénéré », alors même que son ballet « Perséphone » venait d'être autorisé par la Chambre du théâtre. La brochure que Ziegler fit paraître à cette occasion (28) permet de se faire une idée de l'idéologie ambiante. On y trouve tout d'abord une justification de la politisation de la musique, qui montre que les esprits restaient à convaincre : selon lui, la révolution national-socialiste concerne l'être humain tout entier, et doit s'occuper non seulement des conditions externes (le système politique) mais aussi de la partie intime de son existence, pour laquelle l'artiste doit avoir un rôle éducatif. Il s'agit donc d'appliquer en art la même action qu'en politique : comme la politique doit se libérer des idées démocratiques et « bolchéviques », la création artistique doit se débarrasser des esprits destructeurs de la nation. La politisation de l'art est ici si clairement revendiquée, qu'il paraît désormais difficile à un artiste de prétendre de bonne foi exercer son art dans le cadre du régime sans faire de politique, comme l'avait fait Furtwängler :

« Celui qui croit que la politique et l'art n'ont rien à voir et que les questions d'art pourraient ne pas être examinées sous l'angle du renouveau spirituel du nouveau peuple, ne comprend rien au National-Socialisme. » (29)

Ziegler tente également de définir le concept de « dégénérescence », emprunté à la médecine criminologique du 19^e siècle, qui désignait une dégradation par rapport à ce qui était défini comme une norme. Comme il le résume lui-même, « au fond, la musique dégénérée est la musique anti-allemande » (« entdeutsche Musik ») . (30) Cette conception de la musique, réduite à une simple opposition entre musique dégénérée et musique allemande, prenait modèle sur l'opposition (d'ailleurs, encore en vigueur en Allemagne) , entre Juifs et Allemands. Le terme « dégénéré », tout en englobant théoriquement tout ce que le Nazisme considérait comme s'opposant à son idéologie, comme le modernisme et le « bolchévisme », se réduisait « de facto » essentiellement au « Juif », tous ces termes étant d'ailleurs utilisés de manière confuse et indistincte par Ziegler. Celui-ci souligne pourtant la difficulté qui consiste à reconnaître une musique dégénérée, en dehors de l'Opéra, facilement repérable par son contenu littéraire. De fait, les compositeurs d'Opéras furent particulièrement exposés, comme le rappelle le cas de Richard Strauß, victime de ses relations avec son librettiste juif. Aussi, il ne sembla pas inutile de s'adjoindre la caution scientifique de musicologues. Comme l'a montré Pamela Potter, (31) la crise n'avait pas épargné la musicologie sous la République de Weimar. Aussi, la mise en place de projets sur la musique folklorique allemande ou soutenant l'idéologie et les buts du Parti, et les possibilités de promotion ouvertes par la vacance des postes anciennement occupés par des Juifs, suffirent à attirer les sympathies de nombreux musicologues. L'exposition de Düsseldorf était divisée en 5 groupes de travail (32) intitulés :

« Musique allemande », sous la direction de Joseph Maria Müller-Blattau, professeur à l'Université de Freiburg, que l'on peut considérer comme le musicologue officiel du Nazisme (c'est son ouvrage qui fut traduit en français sous l'Occupation) . (33)

« Musicologie », sous l'autorité de Werner Korte.

« Musique et race », sous la direction de Friedrich Blume, de l'Université de Kiel, connu aujourd'hui comme le coordinateur de la grande encyclopédie de la musique MGG (« Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart »), dont les Iers volumes parurent en 1949.

Les œuvres étaient donc jugées essentiellement selon 2 critères, l'un s'appliquant au langage musical, l'autre à l'identité du créateur. Or, comme on va le constater, il n'était pas rare que ces 2 critères fussent en conflit.

Le rejet du jazz

L'un des principaux genres musicaux interdits était le jazz, représenté sur l'affiche de l'exposition de Düsseldorf par un joueur de saxophone. Cette affiche présente d'ailleurs le cas-type du détournement d'image à des fins politiques. Elle fait référence à l'affiche de l'Opéra qui connut (avec « l'Opéra de quat' sous ») le plus grand succès sous la République de Weimar : « Jonny spielt auf ! », du compositeur autrichien Ernst Křenek (1900-1991). (34) Mais, sur l'affiche, le personnage de Jonny est remplacé par une caricature grossière d'un noir aux lèvres démesurées, avec une étoile juive en guise de boutonnière. L'effet obtenu est saisissant et illustre le concept de « dégénérescence », par un habile mélange de tout ce qui est diabolisé : le Juif, le Noir, l'Amérique et le jazz.

Cette musique (en particulier, le « swing » qui connaissait alors une très grande vogue en Europe) était considéré à la fois comme le produit des Noirs, des Juifs (le clarinettiste Benny Goodman était sur toutes les ondes) et comme l'expression d'une morale dépravée. L'amalgame entre jazz et Juif (le jazzman de l'affiche est caricaturé comme Juif) n'était pas nouveau mais avait été renforcé en Allemagne par le fait que Bernhard Sekles, directeur du Conservatoire de Francfort, avait ouvert la Ire classe de jazz dans les années 1920. Sur le plan musical, on dénonçait l'utilisation débridée des syncopes et de la batterie ainsi que l'utilisation d'instruments primitifs. Pourtant, malgré une interdiction de diffusion à la radio, le jazz connaissait une vogue telle que les autorités durent assouplir leur politique, notamment en germanisant les plus grands succès : c'est ainsi que « Saint-Louis Blues » fut rebaptisé « Chanson de Louis bleu » (« Lied vom blauen Ludwig ») ! Aussi, malgré son succès phénoménal, l'Opéra de Křenek, créé le 10 février 1927 au « Neues Theater » de Leipzig (et qui donna lieu, dès la Ire saison, à 421 représentations dans plus de 40 villes allemandes, sans compter Moscou, Saint-Pétersbourg, Prague et même New York) choqua par le mélange des genres. C'est ce que reflète le ton ironique de ses défenseurs :

« Comment ? ces salles sacro-saintes, consacrées par les mystères de la musique de Mozart et de Wagner devraient résonner de rythmes insolents de jazz venus de la rue ? » (35)

Ernst Křenek, qui avait quitté Vienne pour Berlin en 1920, à la suite de son professeur de composition, et qui avait débuté par de la musique atonale, avait changé radicalement de langage dans cette œuvre, cherchant, comme il s'en expliquait lui-même, à renouer avec le public :

« Je découvris de nouvelles relations entre l'art et la vie et appris qu'établir une relation directe entre l'artiste et le public n'était pas seulement possible mais souhaitable, et plus difficile à atteindre qu'un radicalisme extrême, qui se révélait incontrôlable et dans le fond très simple. » (36)

Pour le compositeur, il s'agissait d'entrer dans la sphère des intérêts du public plutôt que de l'élargir à une esthétique qu'il jugeait artificielle, par la perte du contact avec la réalité. C'est ce qui explique son retour au langage tonal et les emprunts à la musique à succès de son époque, le jazz.

Compositeurs juifs d'avant-garde

La politique d'exclusion s'explique ainsi en partie par une réaction épidermique à la République de Weimar et au foisonnement culturel qu'elle permit, le Nazisme opérant un amalgame entre l'esthétique musicale et le régime politique de l'époque. Dans la jeune métropole qu'était alors Berlin, on avait assisté, pour reprendre l'expression de Pascal Huynh, à un « bouillonnement musical », (37) dans lequel étaient représentés tous les courants, sans compter le jazz, les revues nègres et le music-hall. Berlin avait vu le début de l'éclatement des langages musicaux, témoignant de la volonté des compositeurs de trouver une voie après Wagner, et nombre d'entre eux (comme on vient de le voir pour Křenek) avaient adopté des courants successifs. Nombre d'entre eux cherchèrent, au sein de la « Neue Musik » (Nouvelle musique), à s'opposer radicalement à l'esthétique du Romantisme post-wagnérien de Max Reger, Hans Pfitzner ou Richard Strauß, qui avait mené à une expressivité exacerbée, un formalisme excessif et un recours à l'instrumental surdimensionné. C'est ainsi que se côtoyaient l'expressionnisme, la « Neue Sachlichkeit » (la Nouvelle objectivité) et le néo-Classicisme, sans compter les expérimentateurs influencés par le dadaïsme, tels que Erwin Schulhoff ou Stefan Wolpe. Ces derniers cherchaient à « choquer le bourgeois », car la présence de la droite nationaliste radicalisait les positions de 2 mondes qui se haïssaient et c'est Vienne, la ville la plus conservatrice, qui avait vu naître l'avant-garde la plus extrême, incarnée par Arnold Schönberg et ses disciples. Aussi, nombre de compositeurs autrichiens avaient-ils trouvé à Berlin un environnement plus favorable que dans leur pays.

Parmi eux figurait Franz Schreker (1878-1934), dont l'Opéra de style expressionniste, « Die Gezeichneten » (Les stigmatisés), créé à Francfort en 1918, avait frappé par les sonorités inouïes d'un orchestre de 120 musiciens, et reçu un accueil triomphal dans toute l'Allemagne. Son Opéra suivant, « Der Schatzgräber » (Le Chercheur de trésor) le consacra comme l'un des plus importants compositeurs d'Opéras de sa génération ; aussi, Schreker se vit-il offrir en 1920 le poste de professeur et directeur de la prestigieuse « Hochschule » (Conservatoire) de Berlin, pour lequel il abandonna celui de professeur de composition à la « Staatsakademie » de Vienne, entraînant à sa suite plusieurs de ses élèves. Son enseignement non dogmatique permit à toute une génération de compositeurs d'Allemagne et des pays limitrophes aussi différents que Karol Rathaus, Berthold Goldschmidt, Ernst Křenek ou Paul Dessau, de développer des styles variés, tout en s'attirant les foudres de la droite réactionnaire. À peine nommé à l'Académie prussienne des arts, en 1932, il fut limogé de toutes ses fonctions dès mars 1933, tant à cause de ses origines partiellement juives que de ses fonctions à la tête d'une institution considérée comme subversive. L'incompréhension de Schreker fut à la mesure des positions qu'il occupait, comme le montrent les démarches pathétiques qu'il entreprit auprès de Schilling, le nouveau président de l'Académie des arts, et il mourut d'une crise cardiaque l'année suivante.

De même, Arnold Schönberg avait obtenu en 1925 le poste de la classe supérieure de composition de l'Académie prussienne des arts. Après avoir inventé en 1922 le dodécaphonisme en s'appuyant sur les 12 tons du total chromatique pour remplacer la tonalité, il avait appliqué ce système de manière stricte dans le Quintette pour vents, Opus 26, en 1924, et poursuivi cette écriture à Berlin, notamment dans les Variations pour orchestre, Opus 31, et le 3^e Quatuor à cordes, Opus 30. L'année où Schönberg obtenait son poste à Berlin, son disciple Alban Berg voyait son Opéra « Wozzeck » représenté au « Staatsoper » de Berlin sous la baguette d'Erich Kleiber. Même s'il refusa par 3 fois un poste au Conservatoire, Berg était donc aussi en relation étroite avec la capitale allemande et la « Suite lyrique », qui avait connu un grand succès en 1927, à Vienne, y était créée 2 ans plus tard dans sa version orchestrale.

Or, le langage musical des schœnbergiens était considéré comme subversif, et son intellectualité s'opposait radicalement à l'idée que se faisait Hitler de l'art allemand, qui se résumait, comme il l'avait déclaré au congrès de 1934, à : « être allemand, c'est être clair » .

Faut-il pour autant voir là la raison principale du limogeage de Schönberg en 1933 ? Comme le souligne Erik Levi, l'atonalité était considérée comme le produit d'une « conspiration juive » ; le sort réservé aux compositeurs « aryens » était moins prévisible, comme en témoigne le cas de Anton von Webern, le plus radical des disciples de Schönberg. Alors que sa Ire œuvre totalement dodécaphonique, le Trio à cordes, Opus 20, datait de 1928, venant après une période atonale et aphoristique qui remontait à 1909, il fut d'abord protégé, recevant même des subsides de l'État, (38) sans doute à cause de son attitude bienveillante à l'égard du régime. Après l'« Anschluß », son nom figura néanmoins sur la liste des compositeurs « dégénérés », ce qui illustre le fait rare d'un compositeur interdit pour sa seule esthétique, (39) mais qui put, de ce fait, rester en Autriche jusqu'à la fin de la Guerre.

Cette opposition entre Wagner et l'École de Schönberg peut sembler paradoxale de nos jours, où l'on s'accorde à considérer le fameux accord du début du prélude de « Tristan und Isolde », cette sorte « d'anarchie harmonique », selon l'expression du compositeur Henri Barraud, (40) comme le germe du dodécaphonisme. Par l'emploi continu de la modulation et du chromatisme, Wagner a, en tout cas, œuvré de manière significative dans le sens d'une destruction du langage tonal. De même, on peut voir dans sa mélodie continue, caractérisée par cette absence d'air individualisé et mémorisable qui avait de tout temps assuré le succès de l'Opéra, les prémices du « Sprechgesang » (chant parlé), que Schönberg développa à partir du « Pierrot lunaire », en 1912. En fait, ce que le Nazisme retient de Wagner, c'est moins la technique d'écriture musicale, que l'idée selon laquelle la musique doit parler aux sens, à l'âme, et non à l'intellect, comme le font l'art abstrait et la musique atonale, taxés d'intellectualisme et supposés loin des préoccupations du peuple. Selon Ziegler, « La politique culturelle consiste à promouvoir l'âme et la force créatrice du peuple, ainsi que tout ce qui fait la valeur des composantes populaires, que l'on entend par le terme "folklore" ». (41) Il acceptait les dissonances, tant qu'elles ne remettaient pas en cause la tonalité, dans laquelle avaient été composés les plus grands chef-d'œuvres allemands. La musique devait répondre à un idéal de clarté, symbolisé par l'accord parfait, qui permettait son accessibilité au plus grand nombre. C'est ainsi que Carl Orff bénéficia d'un changement d'opinion : ses fameux « Carmina Burana », d'abord critiqués par Herbert Gerigk lors de la création en 1937, furent finalement défendus en 1940 par Alfred Rosenberg, qui louait la simplicité mélodique et harmonique de la pièce, s'inspirant du folklore bavarois, et y voyait « la musique claire, ardente et disciplinée que demande notre époque ». (42) Schreker et Schönberg, à la fois modernes et juifs, étayaient donc facilement la thèse du complot judéo-bolchévique visant à détruire l'Allemagne éternelle. Mais comment d'autres compositeurs d'avant-garde, cette fois non juifs, furent-ils traités ?

Compositeurs aryens modernes : Hindemith, Stravinski et Bartók

Le « cas Hindemith », pour reprendre le titre du fameux article de 1934 de Wilhelm Furtwängler qui marqua la fin du régime de faveur dont bénéficièrent le compositeur et le chef d'orchestre, est révélateur des hésitations du régime et des divergences de ses dirigeants vis-à-vis des compositeurs non-juifs. Goebbels tenta en effet de rallier Hindemith (1895-1963) à sa cause, car c'était alors l'un des compositeurs allemands les plus réputés, qui avait en outre manifesté dans ses dernières œuvres un retour au langage tonal et à la simplicité. Comme la plupart de ses contemporains, celui-ci avait en effet expérimenté plusieurs styles : alors que ses Ires œuvres étaient marquées par l'expressionnisme, il devint l'un des principaux représentants de la « Nouvelle objectivité », prônant au contraire une esthétique d'où était bannie toute sensibilité individuelle. Ce fut notamment l'époque de la Suite de 1922 pour piano, où le caractère percussif de l'instrument prend le pas sur la beauté de la sonorité. Hindemith joua, en outre, un rôle décisif dans l'essor du Festival de Donaueschingen, entre 1921 et 1926, qui fut le 1er Festival consacré entièrement à la musique nouvelle, et en devint le centre européen à Aix-les-Bains jusqu'en 1930, donnant lieu à la création d'œuvres de Dessau, Eisler, Hindemith, Křenek, Milhaud, Webern ou Weill, entre autres.

Or, Hindemith, qui enseignait la composition depuis 1927 au Conservatoire de Berlin, se mit à s'intéresser à la pédagogie. Il écrivit des pièces simples pour les enfants et les amateurs, empruntant parfois au folklore, comme dans les « Konzertmusiken » (1930), qui pouvaient, selon Goebbels, être compatibles avec la nouvelle idéologie. Attaché à une politique de prestige, ce dernier pensait que le régime ne pouvait, sans mettre en péril son image, se permettre d'exclure tous les compositeurs importants, sous prétexte qu'ils étaient modernes, juifs, que leur librettiste était juif, que le traducteur de leur librettiste était juif, ou que l'argument de leur musique avait un rapport quelconque avec les Juifs. (43) Aussi, Hindemith se vit-il offrir une place au sein du conseil de la « Reichsmusikkammer ». Mais, dès 1934, à l'occasion de l'Opéra « Mathis der Maler », dont le livret relate les relations difficiles entre l'art et la politique, Hindemith, qui présentait en outre le défaut majeur d'avoir une épouse juive, fut désavoué publiquement par Goebbels. Celui-ci n'était plus en mesure de le défendre contre les attaques de Rosenberg, dont l'unique préoccupation était l'« aryanisation » de la vie musicale et dont le pouvoir devait s'accroître, surtout après l'entrée en Guerre. (44) Hindemith prit alors congé de son poste de professeur avant de séjourner en Suisse et de s'exiler enfin aux États-Unis.

Quant aux compositeurs étrangers, leur sort dépendait d'avantage de leur pays d'origine que de leur style musical. Stravinsky était considéré comme le représentant de l'internationalisme qui avait marqué la culture de Weimar et avait eu une grande influence sur les compositeurs allemands. D'abord taxé de « bolchévique » (alors qu'il avait quitté la Russie pour la France), il bénéficia ensuite de l'effet du pacte germano-soviétique. Admirateur de Benito Mussolini, il chercha à préserver ses liens avec l'Allemagne et se plaignit en 1939, lors d'une conférence à Harvard, de ce qu'on l'avait fait révolutionnaire malgré lui. Sa musique ne fut officiellement interdite qu'à partir de 1940, après qu'il eût choisi de rester aux États-Unis.

Béla Bartók, en revanche, ne cacha jamais son hostilité au régime et avait quitté la maison d'édition viennoise Universal, dès son « aryanisation » lors de l'« Anschluß ». Mais, ressortissant d'un pays allié, il ne fut pas interdit et ses œuvres continuèrent d'être jouées dans plusieurs villes allemandes durant le Nazisme, y compris sa Musique pour cordes, percussions et célesta (1936), l'une des plus difficiles du point de vue harmonique. L'opposition au régime d'un Hongrois paraissait moins grave que celle d'un Allemand.

Compositeurs bolchéviques et / ou juifs

Les compositeurs allemands marqués politiquement à gauche étaient évidemment des cibles privilégiées ; or, par une « heureuse » coïncidence, les principaux compositeurs engagés étaient juifs, comme Theodor W. Adorno (1903-1969) (seul son père était juif), Paul Dessau (1894-1979), Kurt Weill (1900-1950) et Hanns Eisler (1898-1962). Ils ne légitimaient que trop l'idéologie du complot judéo-marxiste, même si, sur le plan musical, leur langage était paradoxalement conforme aux idées populistes des Nazis. Ainsi Eisler, élève de Arnold Schönberg jusqu'en 1923, était retourné au langage tonal après avoir intégré le Parti communiste allemand en 1926, et avait composé une série de chœurs, d'hymnes et de chants de marches entre 1926 et 1933, qui devinrent des classiques du mouvement socialiste. (45) Ses vues sur la nouvelle musique appelée, selon lui, à transformer la société, l'opposèrent à Schönberg, mais aboutirent à une esthétique proche de celle des Nazis : ceux-ci réutilisèrent certains de ses chants en transformant les paroles, comme « Der rote Wedding » (Wedding la rouge), qui devint « Die Hitler-Jugend marschiert » (La Jeunesse hitlérienne avance). Le langage de Kurt Weill, qui avait également été l'élève de Schönberg, suivit un parcours analogue, comme en témoignent les œuvres issues de sa collaboration avec Bertolt Brecht, telles que « l'Opéra de quat' sous » (1928).

Schönberg, en revanche, n'avait jamais affiché d'opinions politiques marquées (46) ; c'est son langage musical qui était taxé de « bolchévique ». L'atonalité, comme l'abstraction en peinture, était considérée, on l'a vu, comme révolutionnaire, et le fait que Schönberg fût juif permettait d'introduire un concept racial dans l'analyse musicale : le musicologue Hans Joachim Moser considérait l'atonalité comme le « signe d'une décadence culturelle sous l'influence juive ». (47) Dès lors, toute musique composée par un Juif, quel que fût son style, était automatiquement considérée comme dégénérée, ce qui explique que, parmi les principaux compositeurs post-wagnériens nés dans les années 1860-1870 comme Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauß (le seul resté en vie à l'époque qui nous concerne) et Max Reger, seul le premier ait été interdit.

Seule l'origine du compositeur comptait alors, sans prise en compte de sa musique. 2 compositeurs, Erich Wolfgang Korngold (1897-1957) et Berthold Goldschmidt (1903-1995), remarquables sous la République de Weimar mais qui n'appartenaient pas au courant de la « Neue Musik » et n'avaient pas rompu avec l'héritage post-wagnérien, furent ainsi contraints de s'exiler en 1934 et 1935. Pianiste et chef d'orchestre né en Moravie, Korngold avait été l'un des rares enfants prodiges de la composition. Son ballet, « Der Schneemann » (Le Bonhomme de neige), composé à l'âge de 11 ans dans un style post-Romantique, fit sensation lorsqu'il fut joué à l'Opéra de la Cour de Vienne, et Richard Strauß ne cacha pas son admiration. Il composa avant l'âge de 15 ans plusieurs pièces de musique de chambre avant d'acquérir une renommée internationale avec « Die tote Stadt » (Hambourg et Cologne, 1920) , Opéra en 3 actes, (48) suivi en 1927 par « Das Wunder der Heliane » , en 1927, qui fut un demi-échec, du fait d'une querelle l'opposant à Ernst Křenek. (49) Après son départ de Vienne en 1934 pour Hollywood, il ne composa pratiquement plus que de la musique de film, genre qu'il porta à son apogée et pour lequel il obtint 2 Oscars. Héritier malgré lui d'un monde disparu, il appliqua brillamment le langage wagnérien au cinéma américain, sans jamais réussir à se refaire un nom dans le monde musical d'après-Guerre, hostile à toute sensibilité Romantique, désormais associée au Fascisme. (50) Quant à Goldschmidt, qui avait étudié auprès de Franz Schreker à Berlin, il rejoignit l'Angleterre en 1935, après que les représentations de son Opéra « Der gewaltige Hahnrei » prévues à Berlin pour la saison 1932-1933 eurent été annulées, et ses activités de chef d'orchestre interdites. Comme Korngold, sa carrière de compositeur pâtit de son exil : successivement critiquée par les conservateurs et interdite par les Nazis, sa musique fut oubliée après la Guerre. Les œuvres qu'il composa en Angleterre, loin de ce qui se déroulait désormais à Darmstadt, restaient marquées par l'esthétique des années 1930, témoignage passé d'un monde disparu. Goldschmidt cessa alors de composer, ce long silence de 25 ans illustrant les conséquences tragiques de l'exil sur son destin. Par une cruelle ironie, l'esthétique de Korngold et de Goldschmitt, héritée de la tradition germanique, comme celle de Gustav Mahler, correspondait peu ou plus à l'esthétique prônée par les Nazis.

Pour le National-Socialisme, la musique se résumait donc à une opposition manichéenne entre musique allemande et musique dégénérée ; sa politique consistait à « aryaniser » la vie musicale, en particulier à la fin des années 1930, lorsque l'influence de Alfred Rosenberg prit le pas sur celle de Josef Gœbbels. La bonne musique, composée par un Allemand pure race, devait répondre à l'idéal de clarté et de sensibilité, qui caractérisait l'esthétique traditionnelle des grands Maîtres allemands. L'Opéra devait mettre en scène les symboles archétypaux de l'idéologie nazie, tels que la puissance, le courage et la supériorité raciale. Toute musique ne correspondant pas à ces critères était taxée de dégénérée, terme dont l'absence de définition précise permettait d'interdire toute œuvre suspecte. Mais les critères pseudo-esthétiques s'effaçaient devant des considérations politiques et raciales : était d'abord suspect l'homme (pour ses opinions politiques et / ou son origine juive) avant sa musique, peu dangereuse lorsqu'elle n'était pas vocale. De fait, seuls les compositeurs ni juifs ni ouvertement marxistes furent l'objet (au moins un temps) d'hésitations ou d'opinions divergentes parmi les dirigeants, et même Anton von Webern, sans doute le compositeur le plus extrémiste de sa génération, fut d'abord protégé.

Néanmoins, l'administration des théâtres et le public restèrent peu convaincus par le répertoire néo-wagnérien conforme à la nouvelle idéologie de Paul Graener, de Georg Vollerthun, de Siegfried Wagner ou de Max von Schillings : l'Opéra « Der Prinz von Homburg » , que Paul Graener fit représenter à Berlin en 1935 grâce à ses hautes-fonctions, ne resta que 3 jours à l'affiche. Les effets de cette politique se firent sans doute moins sentir pendant le Nazisme qu'indirectement après la Guerre. En effet, à l'appauvrissement de la création musicale de l'après-Guerre, amputée de la quasi-totalité des compositeurs d'Europe centrale, anéantis physiquement ou artistiquement, vint s'ajouter le radicalisme de l'avant-garde musicale, forme de revanche inconsciente sur la politique du 3e « Reich » , qui rejeta un peu plus dans l'oubli les derniers survivants de cette époque ?

« Entartete Musik »

C'est sous l'appellation « Entartete musik » que les Nazis, entre 1933 et 1945, désignaient toute production musicale qui ne rentrait pas dans les normes artistiques étroites édictées par le 3e « Reich » .

En 1938, le régime nazi alors au pouvoir en Allemagne présentait à Düsseldorf l'exposition « Reichsmusiktage » , soit un Festival de musique du « Reich » . Cette manifestation importante, organisée du 22 au 29 mai, était destinée à présenter des concerts et des conférences « idéologiquement corrects » et « ethniquement purs » pour l'édification des masses dans le cadre des actions de propagande dont le « Reich » était coutumier.

En marge du « Reichsmusiktage » , une autre exposition intitulée « Entartete Musik » , organisée par Adolf Ziegler, directeur du Théâtre National de Weimar, et inaugurée le 24 mai, avait pour but de stigmatiser pour la musique ce qu'une autre exposition de 1937 à Munich avait fait pour certaines autres formes d'art en les qualifiant d' « Entartete Kunst » (d'Art dégénéré) . Dans son discours d'inauguration, Ziegler expliqua que la décadence de la musique était due à l'influence du judaïsme et du capitalisme, boucs émissaires des difficultés de l'Allemagne à cette époque.

Cette étiquette « Entartete » appliquée à différentes formes d'art depuis le début des 1930 s'inscrivait dans la théorie pseudo-scientifique dont les Nazis se faisaient les champions : celle d'une « dégénérescence » d'une partie de la race humaine, coupable d'une « déviance » de la norme officielle et « justifiant » les monstrueuses exterminations de triste mémoire.

Qu'il s'agisse d'arts graphiques et plastiques ou de la musique, le but était le même : discréditer, isoler, décourager, voire même interdire ces créations.

En ce qui concerne la musique, aussi bien la composition que l'exécution, la critique, la musicologie et la publicité étaient visées par cette discrimination.

Pour le gouvernement nazi plusieurs types de musiques entraient dans cette catégorie pour des raisons bien différentes.

Comme on peut s'en douter, les œuvres de musiciens ou d'interprètes juifs ou d'origine partiellement juive étaient concernées. C'est ainsi que Felix Mendelssohn, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, Walter Braunfels, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Kurt Weill, Gustav Mahler, David Nowakowsky et Berthold Goldschmidt parmi d'autres furent mis à l'index. Mais cela ne s'arrêtait pas là car il suffisait que les œuvres mettent en scène ou utilisent des thèmes ou des personnages juifs ou africains, comme ceux d'Ernst Křenek, ou même aient pour auteurs des artistes d'inspiration marxiste, comme Hanns Eisler, ou tout simplement que les artistes aient montré de la sympathie pour des opposants au régime nazi. Tel fut le cas pour Anton von Webern, « coupable » d'avoir maintenu des liens avec Arnold Schönberg qui s'était exilé.

Mais la musique « moderne » (nous dirions aujourd'hui « contemporaine »), comme pour qualifier les œuvres de Paul Hindemith, Alban Berg, Arnold Schönberg ou Anton von Webern, tombait également sous ce qualificatif de « dégénérée ».

En fait, un coup d'arrêt à l'évolution de la musique avait été décidé afin de témoigner de la loyauté du régime envers les grands compositeurs allemands des XVIIIe et XIXe siècles qui portaient témoignage de la grandeur de l'esprit allemand. De plus, la modification de la forme et de la structure musicales vers lesquelles évoluait la musique en ce début de siècle, apparaissait comme une menace à la culture de la Loi, de l'Ordre et du contrôle de la société sur laquelle reposait le régime nazi.

Bien entendu, dans ce cadre, le Jazz était tout autant, sinon plus, considéré comme dégénéré en raison de ses origines, de l'ethnie de la plupart de ses interprètes et, d'une manière générale, en raison de son association avec une culture afro-américaine honnie.

Cette politique de muselage de tout un riche et multiple courant de création mise en œuvre dès le début du régime nazi, principalement par le Ministère de la propagande du sinistre Josef Gœbbels, rendit pour ces artistes de plus en plus difficile, puis totalement impossible, de pouvoir s'exprimer, de faire jouer leurs œuvres ou même de se produire en public pour les interpréter. Nombreux furent ceux qui choisirent l'exil, quand ils le purent, tels Arnold Schönberg, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, Berthold Goldschmidt, ou se cachèrent comme Karl Amadeus Hartmann ou Boris Blacher quand ils ne furent pas exterminés dans des camps tels Viktor Ullmann ou Erwin Schulhoff.

Ironiquement, quelques œuvres, après avoir été qualifiées de « Entartete Musik » furent ensuite adoptées avec enthousiasme par le régime nazi pour les besoins de sa propagande.

Dans le milieu des années 1990, la firme discographique « Decca » a publié, dans une collection intitulée « “ Entartete Musik ” » - Music suppressed by the 3rd “ Reich ” », une série d'œuvres peu ou connues voire inconnues des compositeurs qui ont été victimes de la censure nazie. Grâce à cette heureuse et courageuse initiative éditoriale, de nombreuses œuvres ont été enregistrées, ce qui a rendu un grand service à la Musique.

Aujourd'hui, cette résurrection se poursuit. Ainsi, parmi d'autres, « le Nain » d'Alexander von Zemlinsky, « la Cruche brisée » de Viktor Ullmann, « les Oiseaux » de Walter Braunfels et « la Passagère » de Mieczyslaw Weinberg sont disponibles commercialement.

Exposition « Musique Dégénérée », Düsseldorf, 24 mai au 14 juin 1938

(Conférence de Michel Pastore dans la cadre de « la Shoah et l'Europe », ARES, tenue les 11 et 12 juillet 2007.)

En tant que conseiller culturel au Consulat Général d'Autriche, je fus contacté par ARES pour intervenir sur le thème « La Shoah et l'Europe ». Mon action depuis 2004 au Consulat consiste à réhabiliter les œuvres musicales interdites par le 3e « Reich ». J'ai eu l'opportunité de créer un Festival Musiques Interdites consacré à la recréation de ce patrimoine essentiel à notre culture. Des chefs-d'œuvre condamnés au nom du totalitarisme mais dont les verdicts furent, hélas, reconduits par les hégémonies modernistes de l'après-guerre sont encore en attente de réelle libération : à savoir trouver enfin un public qui pourra ainsi appréhender sa propre histoire de pair à l'histoire de la musique du XXe siècle. Cependant, entre ces musiques tellement interdites (qu'on ne sait même plus qu'il y eut interdit ou qu'il y eut un jour musique) et l'absolue évidence du génocide, la relation de causalité (voire de générique) est à soumettre à l'évidence. Quoi de commun entre l'index musical des Nazis et la volonté d'exterminer une partie de l'humanité ? Quel lien entre l'annihilation culturelle et la volonté finale ? Comment peut-on institutionnaliser l'une pour fonctionnaliser l'autre ? À moins que tout ne soit contenu anonymement dans la nasse que forge le Pouvoir afin d'assurer son absolue cécité sur un monde rendu sourd par cessation de musique ?

Le 7 avril 1933, la ségrégation antisémite nazie s'édifie avec la Loi de Reconstitution de l'Administration qui exclut implicitement les Juifs du cadre public, loi complétée en 1935 par les Lois de Nuremberg qui élargiront l'interdit à tout le champ social. Dès 1933, les compositeurs et musiciens juifs ne peuvent plus exercer leur art en Allemagne. Le cas particulier de l'immense compositeur Frank Shreker (1878-1934), obligé de démissionner de la direction du Conservatoire de Berlin dès 1932, nous signifie ce que fut le climat maffieux qui présida au vote de la loi. C'est en mars 1933 que Shreker, exaspéré par les tensions subies, écrit au Directeur de l'Académie des Arts :

« Quand, l'année dernière, poussé par Monsieur Havemann, qui vint me voir en quelque sorte comme représentant du Parti, j'ai démissionné de mon poste de directeur, Monsieur Havemann s'engagea (il me le garantissait) à ce qu'on me laisse désormais en paix. Et voici que la menace recommence à nouveau.* Mon ascendance : ma mère descend d'une vieille famille aristocratique, mon grand-père maternel était major de l'armée autrichienne ; mon père était hongrois. Je ne sais rien d'autre de lui que, selon une lettre, il était protestant. Mais il est vraisemblable qu'il était d'ascendance juive. Il avait reçu de nombreuses décorations autrichiennes et allemandes et la grande médaille d'or pour les arts et les sciences d'Autriche ainsi, je crois, que de Bavière et du Wurtemberg. J'ai moi-même la Croix de guerre autrichienne de 2e classe pour le service civil. J'ai été élevé comme catholique, et je me suis assis dès 16 ans au banc d'orgue d'une église viennoise. Que veut-on donc de moi ? * Quant au fait qu'un gouvernement socialiste m'est nommé, je n'y puis rien. »

Lettre morte, Shreker, à l'annonce de son renvoi de l'Académie, sera victime d'une violente crise cardiaque. Un des plus grands compositeurs occidental mourra ainsi le 21 mars 1934 sans connaître ce qu'allait devenir « la menace » ni ce que « l'on allait vouloir de lui ». Avant d'essayer de répondre à cette double interrogation, on peut remarquer que cette lettre donne à lire entre les lignes d'une angoisse toute personnelle le syntagme culturel nazi qui ne se manifestera officiellement que 4 ans plus tard :

Musique vivante (malgré sa continuité avec la tradition) - Socialisme (Weimar = bolchévique) - Juif

Le 24 mai 1938 fut inaugurée à Düsseldorf l'exposition « Entartete Musik » (Musique Dégénérée), écho de l'exposition « Entartete Kunst » (Art Dégénéré) qui avait eu lieu à Munich l'année précédente. « Entartete Musik » regroupait de manière tout à fait arbitraire sous le terme générique de « Dégénéré » tout ce qui avait été l'actualité musicale florissante sous la République de Weimar : une thématique était consacré au jazz et à « l'Opérette juive de jadis au rythme du jazz », une autre fustigeait toute l'activité musicale professionnelle (éducation, diffusion, Opéra) sous le terme de « bolchévisme musical », une section étant réservée aux théoriciens de l'atonalité, figuraient au nombre des partitions exposées en tant que dégénérées entre autres les chef d'œuvres :

Aucun lien formel ne relie ces compositeurs si ce n'est qu'ils contribuaient tous à l'actualité de la vie musicale. Seule une volonté d'éradiquer la musique dans son ensemble paraît tout d'abord être l'objectif de l'exposition : il n'y a pas eu de catalogue de l'« Entartete Musik » car un tel catalogue était impossible à documenter. Mais il y eut une brochure dont la couverture, sous forme d'affiche, référait à l'Opéra de Ernst Křenek (1900-1992) « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny mène la danse !), créé à Berlin en 1925, et dont le héros était un noir.

Voici ce que Křenek écrivit après avoir pu s'exiler aux États-Unis :

« Il est un fait que je me trouvais en tous les cas sur la liste noire des Nazis (ou sur une liste du même genre), que l'on m'ait considéré comme juif, comme aryen, communiste, catholique, tchèque, autrichien ou je ne sais quoi d'autre. Tout simplement, ils n'aimaient ni ma musique ni ma philosophie artistique et avaient recueilli du matériel à ma charge depuis des années. La liste de mes crimes était impressionnante, voire interminable, dans mon exaltation du nègre dans « Jonny spielt auf ! » *, mon cas était donc clair. Bien trop de gens attendaient de voir disparaître de la scène des individus de mon acabit. Il est évident que le Nazisme devait une grande part de son succès à la jalousie hystérique des démunis. »

Nous verrons qu'un compositeur à l'acuité aussi brillante que Křenek peut lui aussi s'illusionner sur le véritable objectif sous-jacent à la liste des condamnés de l'« Entartete Musik ». Si l'on revient à l'affiche de l'exposition de 1938 qui cite icôniquement son Opéra, nous pouvons dégager ses prédicats : un noir, jouant du saxophone, portant à la boutonnière de son smoking de concert « l'Étoile de David » . C'est-à-dire un ensemble de métissage : un noir (certainement américain, donc un esclave) , un saxophone (instrument moderne exclus de la nomenclature Classique) , un smoking (référant au rituel du concert) , « l'Étoile de David » (une anti-décoration, un marquage) . Métissage qu'avait déjà souligné en 1930 Alfred Rosenberg (qui se verra ravir par Goebbels la main-mise sur la culture) à propos de la reprise de « Jonny spielt auf ! » , à Munich :

« “ Jonny ”, le symbole du Maître du monde abâtardi, judéo-nègre, est debout sur une grande mappe-monde et, à ses pieds, l'humanité blanche danse au son du jazz, saute en cercle autour du globe en faisant des courbettes, comme jadis les Juifs autour du Veau d'or, tout en “ chantant ” en chœur. Ces mots d'humanité blanche dansant autour du nègre “ Jonny ” avec des convulsions abominables de lascivité, le remerciant du déchaînement des plus bas instincts, proclament à la face du monde le triomphe victorieux du sang judéo-nègre sur l'ancienne culture aryenne. »

Il est un fait que Křenek est un de ces compositeurs mis à l'index par les Nazis qui ne soit pas juif. Mais, en tant que compositeur de l'Opéra « Jonny » et, par la suite, d'œuvres dodécaphoniques, en tant qu'époux de la fille de Gustav Mahler, Křenek sera toujours identifié par le régime comme compositeur dégénéré, donc juif. De même dans l'exposition « Entartete Musik » , la caricature de Igor Stravinsky portait la légende :

« Qui a inventé l'histoire selon laquelle Stravinsky descendrait de la noblesse russe ? » , présupposant une ascendance juive du compositeur complètement fausse. Si nous regardons à nouveau l'affiche « Entartete Musik » , nous pouvons envisager le glissement qui va du métissage en tant que cause de la dégénérescence de la musique allemande à la notion de race en tant que fondement d'idéologie nazie : « l'Étoile de David » n'est plus une anti-décoration mais l'unique marquage porteur de tous les dangers de contamination. C'est un véritable terme vicariant qui va servir à identifier tout et tous ce qui peut(vent) être menace pour la pureté d'une utopique musique allemande (celle-ci impérialisant les traditions autrichiennes - l'invasion de l'Autriche ne date que de 2 mois - , tchèques, slovaques, hongroises, roumaines, et jusqu'à française ; Darius Milhaud, Paul Dukas) , la Musique ne pouvant être que celle d'un « Reich » unique, d'un Peuple unique et du « Führer » unique telle qu'elle fut embaumée par Hitler lui-même dans le « temple » du « Walhalla » , près de Ratisbonne, en juin 1937, lorsqu'il ajouta au Panthéon Beethoven-Wagner, le petit paysan Anton Bruckner en butte à l'hostilité de la société viennoise corrompue par la « juiverie » .*

Cependant, pour le public de l'exposition de Düsseldorf, ce qui menaçait la musique allemande dans son utopique unicité n'était qu'une liste improvisée et non exhaustive de compositeurs disparates de par leur origine, leur génération et leur esthétique (ainsi Béla Bartók qui n'était pas à l'origine dans la liste noire exigea d'en faire partie) . Nous avons vu l'impossibilité d'un catalogue raisonné qui puisse fonder le concept d' « Entartete Musik » . Mais reportons-nous à cet extrait du texte accompagnant la brochure rédigée par le pseudo-commissaire Hans Severus Ziegler et qui demeure le seul « prétexte » de l'exposition :

faux-semblant, la physique et la physiologie juives du son se développent actuellement de façon clairement prédominante dans le monde musical de sang allemand, de telle sorte qu'il existe des imbéciles beni-oui-oui allemands qui ne peuvent se soustraire aux influences d'une race inférieure à cause de leur propre faiblesse et de leur manque de force créatrice et d'inspiration. La dégénérescence de la musique et de la création musicale allemandes naît alors par la force des choses. La musique dégénérée est ainsi au fond une musique non allemande, pour laquelle la partie saine du peuple ne trouvera également aucun organe de réception, aucune émotion et aucune réceptivité. »

Le titre du texte de Ziegler figurant sur l'affiche « Entartete Musik » est « Eine Abrechnung » (Un règlement de compte), écho du titre donné par Adolf Hitler au 1er volume de « Mein Kampf ». Mais Hitler, dans son livre, ne reliait la dégénérescence qu'au seul bolchévisme. Dans l'extrait jargonnesque de Ziegler, on voit que le syntagme :

« Musique Vivante - Bolchévisme - Juif » est remplacé par le postulat :

« Musique de sabbat (tous styles confondus : du jazz au post-Romantisme en passant par l'atonalisme et le dodécaphonisme) + Bolchévisme + Non Humanité = Son Juif »

* En janvier 1941, Adolf Hitler dans le « Repaire du Loup », suite à l'écoute de la 7e Symphonie de Anton Bruckner, qualifia Johannes Brahms de :

« Phénomène de salon porté aux nues par la juiverie. »

Eduard Hanslick, qui était « demi-juif » et défendait Brahms, avait fait de la vie à Vienne du « petit paysan » Bruckner « un enfer », et Hitler d'ajouter que c'était :

« La chose la plus amère que de devoir vivre dans un environnement qui ne comprend pas ce qu'on crée ou ce qu'on pourrait créer ! »

Nous parlons de jargon a posteriori : comme l'a montré Viktor Klemperer, il s'agit en fait d'une langue (« Lingua Tertii Imperii ») où le jargon s'ennoblit en quelque sorte parce qu'il légitime la terreur. Malgré le fatras grotesque de la pseudo-démonstration, à partir du postulat énoncé par Ziegler, tout compositeur dégénéré ne pourra être que juif (voir le cas des non-juifs Křenek, plus haut ; et le cas de Karl Amadeus Hartmann et de Rudolf Karel ou Hugo Distler, plus bas) et devra donc être annihilé en tant qu'artiste (son œuvre ne peut pas avoir été) et en tant qu'être (sa personne ne doit pas avoir existé) .

C'est ainsi que la politique culturelle musicale nazie sert en même temps à cautionner la solution finale : on connaît le souci de l'efficacité nazie à « faire feu de tout bois » et à savoir opérer une véritable synergie totalitariste. C'est ainsi que sont confondus compositeurs, musiciens et Juifs dans cette « menace » que présentait, de par sa puissance créatrice, Shreker mais dont il lui était impossible, de par cette même puissance, d'imaginer l'horreur totalisante. « Que veut-on donc de moi ? » s'interrogeait-il en 1933 quand il pouvait, sinon « être » encore socialement, mais du moins être en se prononçant. Les Nazis voulaient non seulement qu'il n'existe plus mais qu'il n'ait pas été : qu'il s'arroe en somme de lui-même ce néant identitaire sur lui-compositeur et sur lui - descendant de Juif. Au nom du « sang musical allemand », le sang juif doit disparaître : pour atteindre l'objectif final, la musique allemande doit rendre toute autre musique « exsangue ». Il ne peut s'agir de crime dans le cas de ces musiques « autres » puisque celles-ci, en tant que dégénérées, n'avaient de toutes façons pas de « sens ». Dans le cas des hommes, le crime s'appellera « solution » .

Le 13 mars 1933, l'Autriche est envahie : il aura fallu 5 ans pour épurer la nouvelle Allemagne de ses citoyens juifs. Les mêmes mesures seront réalisées alors en moins de 6 mois. Le 2 avril 1938, le correspondant de « l'Illustration », Roger de Craon-Poussy, écrivait :

« L'« Anschluß », bonheur des uns, est devenu pour les autres, avouons-le, une effroyable catastrophe. D'abord les israélites. Il est impossible de se faire une idée en Occident des conséquences du rattachement pour 300,000 citoyens autrichiens qui représentaient souvent une élite intellectuelle et morale. Médecins, avocats, artistes, acteurs, journalistes, qui ont parfois servi la société avec dévouement depuis des dizaines d'années, les voici sur le pavé, du jour au lendemain, sans la moindre possibilité de gagner leur subsistance ou même d'enseigner ; quoi d'étonnant qu'il y ait parmi eux une véritable épidémie de suicides. Il y a eu, durant les Iers jours, une masse de perquisitions illégales, avec confiscations, pillages et violence physiques. Heinrich Himler a fait sévèrement punir les auteurs d'actions isolées. Évidemment, ce n'était jamais des Nazis, mais toujours des provocateurs communistes. »

En fait, Himler profita des exactions pour réprimer des opposants : la terreur culturelle et raciale fut appliquée immédiatement.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold, alors un des compositeurs les plus connus d'Europe et du « Nouveau Monde », devait créer durant l'automne de 1938, à l'Opéra de Vienne, son 4e (et suite aux circonstances dernier) Opéra « Kathrin » sous la direction de Bruno Walter. Non seulement l'invasion annula « de facto » la première, mais les Nazis saisirent la propriété de Korngold vendant ce qu'ils pouvaient et détruisant le reste dont le manuscrit de « Kathrin ». Heureusement, une copie avait déjà été envoyée aux éditions « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » (Schott refusant, dès avant l'invasion, d'éditer les compositeurs juifs) et c'est Weinberger qui, malgré les risques énormes, envoya 2 hommes pénétrer dans la maison occupée afin de sauver le reste des manuscrits. « Kathrin » qu'on peut considérer comme un chef-d'œuvre sera créée en territoire neutre en 1939, à Stockholm, et sera accueillie par des critiques antisémites. Repris en 1950, à Vienne, l'Opéra, victime de la dictature moderniste et du culte de l'austérité d'après-guerre (voire aussi de la non réelle dénazification des postes clefs), connaîtra un échec et ne sera plus jamais joué.

Le destin de Korngold représente sous une autre (ou est-ce la même dans un autre registre) forme ce que fut la « menace » et « ce que l'on voulait de lui ». En effet, musicien-star des années '20 à '30, il fut demandé par Hollywood, le 22 janvier 1933, pour composer la musique du film « The Adventures of Robin Hood » mettant en vedette Errol Flynn. « Prends-le comme un présage et pars », lui conseilla le Doctor Alfred Eckmann, directeur de l'Opéra de Vienne, lui assurant le succès de « Kathrin » pour l'automne. Korngold eut donc la chance de survivre grâce à l'exil aux États-Unis. Là, il sera catalogué comme musicien de film et ne pourra réaffirmer sa dimension de compositeur « post-Romantique ». Après guerre, il reviendra en Autriche où l'on préférera l'oublier pour ne pas réveiller le « vieux monde » . Il faudra attendre 2004 pour que le Festival de Salzbourg réhabilite son Opéra, « La Ville Morte » . L'Opéra de Paris ne l'a toujours pas inscrit à sa programmation et il faudra attendre le débutant Festival Musiques Interdites, en 2006, pour assister en France à la création de son Concerto de piano pour la main gauche. Korngold a pu échapper à la « menace » en sauvant sa vie, mais, malgré la pseudo-protection d'un pays d'accueil, il n'a pu se soustraire à la condamnation nazi de n'être plus rien : son identité de compositeur lui fut de son vivant refusée (lui-même s'arrêtera de composer) et demeure toujours en attente d'une totale réhabilitation.

Car pour certains compositeurs, la « chance » de l'exil fut aussi celle d'une brusque descente vers cette « néantisation » édictée par les Nazis. Comparons, pour ce, l'exil de Kurt Weill et de Norbert Glanzberg. Dans une vidéo diffusée au cours de l'Oratorio « Paroles d'Exil » que nous avons créée en 2006 et repris en 2007, Glanzberg nous interpelle :

« On avait peur en Allemagne d'Hilter ! »

Jetés sur les routes de l'exil par l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis, en 1933, Glanzberg et Weill font partie des nombreux artistes et intellectuels qui débarquèrent à Paris dans l'espoir d'y trouver un refuge leur permettant de continuer à créer. Leur statut est à l'époque complètement différent : Weill, de 10 ans plus âgé, est un compositeur reconnu, dont les œuvres, marquées par la volonté idéologique d'écrire pour les masses, reposent sur un langage et une dramaturgie inspirés par le jazz et les différentes formes de musique populaires. Protégé par la Princesse de Polignac, il proposera à Glanzberg de partir pour les États-Unis où il connaîtra le succès que l'on sait en adaptant son art à la forme de « Broadway » . Mais Glanzberg ne le suivra pas : né en 1910, en Galicie, doté d'une formation musicale parfaitement Classique, ayant été assistant d'Alban Berg sur « Wozzeck » , à Aix-la-Chapelle, il connaîtra à Paris la misère et survivra en tant que musicien de cabaret. Durant la guerre, il est caché au château de Montredon par la Comtesse Pastré mais sera arrêté à Nice, en 1943, et miraculeusement sauvé des convois. Après guerre, il écrira pour Edith Piaf quelques-uns de ses plus grands succès. Il écrira aussi pour Yves Montand, Tino Rossi, et composera des musiques de films. Ce n'est qu'à la fin de sa vie qu'il se souviendra qu'il avait été en Allemagne un musicien Classique et qu'il se remettra à composer des œuvres pour grand orchestre comme la « Suite Yiddish » et le Concerto pour 2 pianos. Dans les années 1980, marqué par la lecture du livre de Paul Celan, « La Mort, Maître de l'Allemagne » , il reviendra à la musique de sa jeunesse et composera dans un style Romantique marqué par l'influence de la musique yiddish et par l'efficacité de la chanson populaire les « Holocaust Songs » et les « Holocaust Lieder » . Norbert Glanzberg est mort en 2001.

Si l'exil fut, pour certains, la condamnation à un véritable mutisme musical (au double sens de « muer » et de « muet ») , il fut, pour d'autres, l'injonction au témoignage. Ainsi Erich Istor Kahn (1905-1956) , artiste discret et intransigeant, qui reste encore aujourd'hui un inconnu. Protégé par le chef Hans Rosbaud, collaborateur permanent à Radio de Francfort, ami et disciple de Arnold Schönberg, il crée nombre d'œuvres remarquables dans les années 1930. Le 1er avril 1933, Kahn est démis de ses fonctions. Début novembre, il émigre avec sa femme définitivement à Paris. Malgré les difficultés de vie en France, il compose en 1938 la « Rhapsodie Hassidique » pour chœur d'hommes. Dès la déclaration de la guerre, en 1939, Kahn est interné une Ire fois en tant qu'étranger au camp de Marolles, près de Blois, puis, dans des conditions particulièrement inhumaines, au camp des Milles, près d'Aix-en-Provence. Lors de ses divers internements, Erich Istor Kahn continue à composer : le Psaume XIII « Seigneur, combien de temps vas-tu m'oublier ? » pour soprano et piano. C'est au cours de son internement dans le Camp des Milles qu'il compose l'hymne « Nenia judæis qui hac ætate perierunt » (Thrène pour les Juifs qui en ces temps périrent) *, véritable prémonition de la solution finale qui se mettait en place en France. Sauvé de la déportation par Varian Fry, Kahn et sa femme partent en 1941 pour New-York. Il continuera à composer et recevra l'appui de René Leibowitz et de Pablo Casals. Kahn mourra subitement en 1956.

Nous retrouvons cette volonté de témoigner « malgré tout » chez les compositeurs qui sont « restés » : à savoir ceux qui ont choisi volontairement un « exil intérieur » et les autres, tous les autres, qui n'ayant pu partir, devront vivre l'atroce condamnation nazi jusqu'à son terme.

Rudolf Karel (1880-1945)

Rudolf Karel fut un des principaux élèves de Antonín Dvořák. Compositeur fécond et reconnu par le public austro-tchèque, il est nommé en 1923 au Conservatoire de Prague et s'impose avec son Opéra, « la Mort Marraïne ». Farouchement anti-Fasciste, il s'engage dans la résistance active et devient chef de réseau. Arrêté en 1943, il est incarcéré à la prison de Pankrác : durant cette période de détention, soumis à la torture, Karel continue de composer dans sa cellule n° 127 notamment l'Opéra-conte, « Les 3 cheveux d'or du grand-père omniscient » qu'il dut écrire sur du papier toilette avec pour crayon des échardes de bois brûlés. Transféré dans la citadelle de Terezín, dans des conditions inhumaines, il continuera à composer un « Nonette » : malade, âgé de 65 ans, Karel fut condamné à mourir de froid, le 5 mars 1945.

Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1905-1963)

Karl Amadeus Hartmann incarne, lui, une autre forme de l'exil intérieur : celui peut-on dire d'une « résistance passive » dont témoigne cette lettre qu'il écrivit suite à sa rencontre avec Anton von Webern (1883-1945) qui montrait son approbation du régime :

« Je suis largement à blâmer de ce que la conversation revenait de façon répétée à la politique. C'était une erreur, parce qu'avec mes fortes sympathies pour l'anarchie, j'en vins à savoir des choses que j'aurais préféré éviter d'entendre sa bienveillance à l'égard de ceux qui le pressent contre le mur m'est incompréhensible. »

On sait que Webern sera abattu par un soldat américain lors de la libération de Vienne. Hartmann, malgré sa tendance « anarchiste » (en fait, le courant Social-Démocrate de sa famille artiste), aurait pu devenir l'alibi « musique nouvelle » des Fascistes. Au lieu de collaborer, il choisit volontairement d'interdire toute publication et toute exécution de ses œuvres en Allemagne. Il continue cependant de composer et déploie tous ses efforts pour être joué en dehors de son pays : ainsi, en 1935, à Prague, sera créée son Poème symphonique « Miseræ » dédié « à mes amis qui durent subir 1,000 morts, qui reposent pour l'éternité, nous ne vous oublierons pas (Dachau, 1933-1934) ». Il refusera de s'inscrire à la « Reichsmusikammer » et de répondre au questionnaire sur ses origines raciales. Il montrera son opposition au régime en composant, à partir de 1938, son chef-d'œuvre : l'Opéra « Simplicius Simplicissimus » (créé en 1948, à Munich). Après la guerre, il continuera sa « résistance passive » en refusant de cautionner la dictature musicale stalinienne instauré en Allemagne de l'Est et en participant, en 1960, avec les compositeurs Paul Dessau (1894-1979) et Hans Werner Henze (1926), à l'œuvre collective « Jüdische Chronik » afin de répondre à la remontée de l'antisémitisme en Allemagne.

L'Hymne « Nenia Judæis qui hac ætate perierunt » fut créé lors du Festival « Musiques Interdites », le 3 juillet 2007, à Marseille. Ce chef-d'œuvre pour violoncelle et piano prouve en quelques 15 minutes combien l'homme reste libre face à l'annihilation et sort vainqueur d'un combat qui semble désespéré. Le 7 juillet 2005, lors du 1er Festival « Musiques Interdites » avait été exécuté l'« Actus Tragicus » pour quintette à vent et quintette à cordes d'Igor Kahn.

Hugo Distler subira l'exil intérieur sans trouver les moyens politiques ou artistiques d'exprimer sa survie. Descendant de l'école musicale protestante, il enrichit très tôt cette tradition de la richesse culturelle de la République de Weimar. Nouveau talent musical de sa génération, Distler n'avait que 25 ans quand Adolf Hitler prend le pouvoir : il venait d'être nommé chef du département de musique de chambre au Conservatoire de Lübeck. Ces convictions spirituelles apportent un renouveau à la musique protestante traditionnelle mais cette nouvelle sonorité représente une intensité religieuse que les Nazis ne pouvaient tolérer. Il doit quitter son poste d'organiste au temple pour rejoindre la « Wehrmacht ». Contraint par un ordre fasciste qui l'avait déclaré « Compositeur Dégénéré » au meurtre de son prochain, Distler préféra poser sa tête dans son propre four à gaz et de mettre fin à sa vie à l'âge de 34 ans.

Mais « l'exil intérieur », s'il fut possible pour les musiciens interdits non-juifs, fut interdit pour les musiciens juifs qui n'avaient pu fuir l'Europe hitlérienne. Ceux-ci se retrouvèrent pris dans la nasse nazi, parqués dans les camps d'internement et, pour la plupart, assassinés dans les camps d'extermination. Leur nombre rend impossible un compte rendu sur chacun d'eux (même pour les compositeurs les plus importants) d'autant que leur liste ne peut être exhaustive par le fait même du génocide nazi.

Nous choisissons de mentionner Viktor Ullmann car, non seulement c'est un des plus grands compositeurs du XXe siècle toujours en attente de retrouver sa place, mais parce que son histoire personnelle est emblématique. Fils d'un officier de l'Empire, Viktor Ullmann s'engagea à l'âge de 18 ans en tant que volontaire dans l'armée et vécut les horreurs de la Première Guerre sur le front de l'Isonzo. À son retour, dans un monde bouleversé, il entra dans le séminaire de composition de Arnold Schönberg qui eut sur lui une influence considérable. Mais Ullmann ne fit jamais partie de la stricte « avant-garde » : il fut toujours en quête d'un lien entre la tonalité et l'atonalité. En 1920, il devint directeur de chœur et répétiteur puis, en 1922, chef d'orchestre au Nouveau Théâtre Allemand de Prague dont le directeur était alors Alexander von Zemlinsky. En 1924, les 7 Lieder pour orchestre (aujourd'hui disparus) obtinrent un succès critique et public grâce à leur impact lyrique et déclamatoire. Entre 1927 et 1931, Ullmann fut chef d'Opéra à Aussig et engagé en tant que compositeur pour musique de scène et chef à l'Opéra de Zürich. C'est au cours de cette période qu'il devint membre de la Société d'Anthroposophie. Il épousa Anna Winternitz, s'établit à Stuttgart, abandonna son activité de musicien pour se consacrer à l'anthroposophie dans sa « Librairie Novalis ». En 1933, il dut fuir l'Allemagne, avec sa femme et son fils, et retourner à Prague où se confirmèrent ses talents de compositeur et de pédagogue : le prix Hertzka lui fut décerné pour sa version orchestrale de ses « Variations Schœnberg » . En 1935, ce prix lui fut décerné une seconde fois pour son Opéra, « la Chute de l'Antéchrist » , d'après le drame d'Albert Steffen. Sur des poèmes du même auteur, Ullmann composa, en 1937, les 6 Lieder pour soprano, déjà caractéristiques du langage tonal indéfini qu'il développera dans les œuvres de « Theresienstadt » . Après l'invasion, les lois raciales qui sévissaient en Allemagne furent appliquées à Prague, interdisant, entre autres, toute activité artistique aux Juifs. Sans espoir d'exécution, Ullmann poursuivit son travail de composition avec, notamment, les très émouvantes « Chansons d'amour de Ricarda Huch » .

Le 8 septembre 1942, Ullmann fut interné dans le camp de « Theresienstadt » (à présent, Terezín) , construit pour accueillir une garnison de 5,000 soldats et où plus de 60,000 Juifs furent parqués en attendant l'achèvement des camps d'extermination. En dépit des conditions de vie épouvantables, une riche activité culturelle due à l'internement de nombreux artistes se développa, progressivement admise par le commandement SS : activités créatrices d'êtres humains confrontés à l'agonie et à la mort. Ullmann fut un des artistes les plus productifs, même si l'on trouve écrit dans son extraordinaire journal intime :

Au cours des 26 mois que dura sa détention, il composa, sur du papier de qualité misérable, plus de 20 œuvres dont les sublimes 3 dernières Sonates pour piano, 2 Symphonies, l'Ouverture « Don Quixote danse le fandango » , l'Opéra « l'Empereur de l'Atlantique ou le Refus de la Mort » , et le mélodrame « Le Chant d'Amour et de Mort du Cornette Christoph Rilke » *. Il était en train de commencer l'orchestration de l'œuvre lorsqu'il fut déporté pour Auschwitz avec sa femme et les compositeurs Pavel Haas, Gideon Klein, Hans Krása. Il mourut gazé, le 18 octobre 1944. Pavel Haas, Gideon Klein, Hans Krása ont été gazés dans le courant d'octobre 1944.

À travers ses quelques exemples, choisis certes arbitrairement (comment référer ne serait-ce qu'à tous les principaux compositeurs de cette période ?) , le fait que la terreur musicale instauré par le 3e « Reich » servit à cautionner le judaïcide paraît fondé. Mais, de même, se fonde en retour le fait que, malgré la solution finale, la musique persista toujours à témoigner de sa force vitale, et ce, malgré les conditions extrêmes auxquelles ses compositeurs furent contraints. Restituer à tous ces grands artistes la place qu'ils méritent, c'est nous ré-approprier une partie essentielle de notre patrimoine culturel. Recréer, un demi-siècle après, ces œuvres magistrales, c'est aussi refaire avec elles le chemin de l'exil, de l'interdit, du génocide. Si la stratégie nazie fut de justifier le crime contre l'humanité en utilisant la culture comme leurre, à l'inverse, la culture comme vérité peut en se reconstituant autour de ces œuvres « dégénérées » dénoncer à jamais le crime. Il s'agit alors de signifier à travers une esthétique, un impératif moral :

« Plus jamais cela car cela a pu avoir lieu. »

Revenons pour finir au texte déjà cité de Hans Severus Ziegler :

« La musique dégénérée est ainsi, au fond, une musique non allemande, pour laquelle la partie saine du peuple ne trouvera également aucun organe de réception, aucune émotion et aucune réceptivité. »

On sait qu'Hitler n'appréciait pas beaucoup la musique hors mise sa fascination pour Richard Wagner et les Opérettes. Dans le « bunker » final, ce fut le silence absolu qui prévalut : plus un son, si ce n'est le bruit de la radio pour écouter l'avancée des ennemis. Ne plus entendre, ne plus ressentir : cet autisme culturel réclamé au peuple allemand dans le manifeste « Entartete Musik » ne pouvait s'achever après avoir accompli l'acte criminel (envers la Musique et envers l'Humain) que dans le néant.

Néant que niera toujours la musique.

Cet aperçu des Musiques Interdites par le 3e « Reich » ne se prétend pas travail d'historien ni de spécialiste. Ce n'est que mon point de vue personnel en tant que programmateur d'un Festival consacré à cette période noire de l'histoire de la musique. Je tiens enfin à saluer le livre d'Amaury du Closel « Voix Étouffées du 3e “ Reich ”, “ Entartete Musik ” » aux Éditions Actes Sud (véritable somme sur le sujet) qui fut la principale source de cet exposé.

Michel Pastore, Consulat Général Autriche, 27 cours Pierre Puget, 13006 Marseille.

* Dans ce chef-d'œuvre ultime (créé en français au Festival Musiques Interdites 2005 avec Dominique Sanda) , Ullmann relève et réussit le défi qui a hanté toute l'histoire du lyrisme : accomplir une symbiose parfaite et fascinante entre la parole et la musique, le drame et la contemplation. Fidèle à la lumière rilkéenne, la mort est lieu de sérénité dans ce testament de Viktor Ullmann.

Dès 1933, une grande majorité du monde musical est d'origine juive, même lointaine : professeurs, directeurs de théâtre, chefs d'orchestre, et évidemment compositeurs. Tous sont victimes d'interdiction de d'exercer, diriger, composer, ou être diffusés ... mis au ban pour l'unique raison suffisante de leur origine sémite. 3 ans plus tard, en 1938, se tient à Düsseldorf l'exposition « Die Entartete Musik » (« musique privée de généalogie, de génération ») qui précise finalement les enjeux culturels de ce bannissement. Sur l'affiche : un noir, jouant du saxophone, portant à la boutonnière de son smoking de concert « l'Étoile de David » . Un noir (un américain, donc un esclave, un sous-homme) , un saxophone (instrument moderne exclus de la nomenclature Classique) , un smoking (tenue emblématique du chef d'orchestre, dans l'exercice de sa fonction dirigeante) , « l'Étoile de David » (marquage de la culture juive dominante) . Musique métissée donc dégénérée, dirigée par la « juiverie » . Hans Severus Ziegler, commissaire de l'exposition explique :

« Ce qui est réuni dans l'exposition “ Entartete Musik ” représente le reflet d'un véritable sabbat de sorcières et du bolchévisme culturel le plus frivole, aux plans spirituel et artistique ; c'est aussi le reflet du triomphe de la sous-humanité, de l'arrogante impudence juive et d'un complet abrutissement intellectuel. La musique juive et la musique allemande demeurent étrangères. Les lois de la musique juive ou les constructions intellectuelles et les doctrines du faux-semblant, la physique et la physiologie juives du son se développent actuellement de façon clairement

prédominante dans le monde musical de sang allemand, de telle sorte qu'il existe des imbéciles beni-oui-oui allemands qui ne peuvent se soustraire aux influences d'une race inférieure à cause de leur propre faiblesse et de leur manque de force créatrice et d'inspiration. La dégénérescence de la musique et de la création musicale allemandes naît alors par la force des choses. La musique dégénérée est ainsi au fond une musique non allemande, pour laquelle la partie saine du peuple ne trouvera également aucun organe de réception, aucune émotion et aucune réceptivité. »

Sans parler des Mahler, Meyerbeer et Mendelssohn frappés rétroactivement d'anathème pour leur seule origine sémite, 3 catégories de musiciens sont considérés comme dégénérés :

Les musiciens « bolchéviques »

Sont dits « bolchéviques », les musiciens engagés dans le socialisme ou le communisme.

Kurt Weill (1900-1950)

Compositeur allemand né à Dessau, le 2 mars 1900 et mort à New York, le 3 avril 1950. Sa musique, considérée par les Nazis comme « dégénérée », lui vaudra de voir ses partitions brûlées. Ses origines juives et ses sympathies pour le communisme font qu'il est contraint de quitter l'Allemagne en 1933.

Paul Dessau (1894-1979)

Avant les années 1930, ce compositeur allemand occupa des postes de chef d'orchestre à Hambourg, Cologne, Mayence et Berlin, tout en composant une musique d'avant-garde notamment pour le cinéma. Engagé plutôt à droite qu'à gauche et d'origine juive, il quitta l'Allemagne dès 1933 pour la France, puis les États-Unis, avant de revenir en Europe après la Guerre et de se fixer à Berlin-Est. Il collabora alors avec Bertolt Brecht pour les musiques de scène de « Mère courage » et du « Cercle de craie caucasien ». D'abord attiré par la musique dodécaphonique, il s'en est éloigné pour s'attacher à une musique réaliste, volontiers engagée et accessible au plus grand nombre.

Les musiciens jazz

Le jazz est considéré par les nazis comme l'« invasion nègre » d'une musique afro-américaine, donc non allemande.

Eddie Rosner (1910-1976)

Trompettiste, compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand d'origine polonaise. Quasiment inconnu en France, cet enfant prodige du jazz surnommé « l'Amstrong Blanc » par Louis Amstrong lui-même devint, au terme d'une épopée poignante, le « tsar » du jazz en U.R.S.S. Artiste maudit persécuté par les Nazis en tant que dégénéré, consacré « Musicien d'État » par Joseph Staline avant d'être banni et déporté au goulag, Rosner est libéré à la mort du dictateur. Oublié de tous, il parvient à s'installer à Berlin en 1973, avant de mourir dans la pauvreté 3 ans plus tard.

Ernst Křenek (1900-1991)

Dans les années 1928-1938, il est l'un des compositeurs vivants les plus joués grâce à son Opéra, créé en 1927, « Johnny spielt auf » (dont l'affiche de l'exposition est l'illustration directe) et qui raconte l'histoire de l'opposition entre un violoniste Classique et un violoniste de jazz. Cependant, dès l'« Anschluß », il est déclaré « artiste dégénéré » par les Nazis et émigre aux États-Unis où il étudie la musique médiévale et la musique sérielle. Bien qu'il reste très prolifique et compose jusqu'à sa mort dans les genres les plus divers, Ernst Křenek ne réussit pas à renouer avec sa célébrité d'antan. Au cours de sa période américaine, il est surtout reconnu en tant que pédagogue et musicologue, notamment par Glenn Gould.

Les musiciens utilisant les nouvelles harmonies

Issus de l'école d'Arnold Schönberg, ils détournent le Classicisme allemand vers l'atonalité, le sérialisme, le dodécaphonisme.

Hanns Eisler (1898-1962)

Un des principaux élèves d'Arnold Schönberg (avec Anton von Webern et Alban Berg), il compte parmi les grands compositeurs de musique vocale du 20^e siècle. Compagnon de route de Brecht, compositeur de chants de combat ou pionnier de la musique de cinéma, Eisler composa également pour piano et musique de chambre. Ces textes, écrits en Allemagne ou en exil aux États-Unis (certains avec Theodor Wiesengrund Adorno ou Ernst Bloch) montrent que Hanns Eisler fut aussi un penseur de la musique et de ses rapports avec la société. Il a notamment étudié systématiquement les problèmes de la musique de film ; son ouvrage « Composing for the films » est peut-être ce que l'on a écrit de plus intelligent sur le sujet. Ce n'est que depuis la fin du conflit Est-Ouest qu'on peut aborder, délivrée de tabous et de préjugés, la richesse de son œuvre.

Itor Kahn (1905-1956)

D'origine allemande, formé à « Hochschule für Musik » de Francfort, américain d'adoption et par la naturalisation, Erich Itor Kahn compositeur, pianiste soliste et musicien de chambre, associe une discipline de travail typiquement germanique à une conscience professionnelle de responsabilité qu'entraîne le processus de création, toujours préoccupé par la compatibilité de la forme et de son contenu. La technique compositionnelle d'Erich Itor Kahn découle d'une interprétation toute personnelle et originale des principes architecturaux de Schönberg, tandis que sa mentalité créative le rapproche plutôt de Charles Ives. Erich Itor Kahn occupe une place à part dans l'histoire de musique contemporaine.

Les musiciens dégénérés « volontaires »

On dresse une liste d'environ 300 compositeurs dégénérés : certains choisissent volontairement de figurer sur cette liste, bien que les Nazis ne les aient pas comptés, parce qu'ils n'étaient ni juifs, ni « modernistes », ni communistes.

Béla Bartók (1881-1945)

Grâce à ses recherches, Béla Bartók, d'origine hongroise, pose les bases de l'ethno-musicologie. Il y découvre l'échelle pentatonique et des combinaisons poly-rythmiques qu'il utilise dès ses premières œuvres. Concertiste en Europe et aux États-Unis, il se produit avec le violoniste Joseph Szigeti et le clarinetiste de jazz Benny Goodman. Il fut absent de l'exposition de l'« Entartete Musik », parce qu'il appartenait à une nation amie. Mais Bartók refuse ce traitement de faveur et proteste avec Zoltán Kodály et d'autres artistes, en édictant une résolution contre les lois raciales hongroises. Il demanda un peu plus tard d'être admis dans le cercle des « dégénérés ». Il fuit le régime hongrois pro-nazi et émigre aux États-Unis. En 1943, le succès de son « Concerto pour orchestre » lui vaut de nombreuses commandes, trop tardives car Béla Bartók décède peu de temps après.

Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1905-1963)

Né et mort à Munich, n'ayant aucune origine sémitique, c'est dans cette ville qu'il effectue ses études. Dans l'Allemagne hitlérienne, au lieu de collaborer comme Hitler le lui demanda, il choisit volontairement d'interdire toute publication et toute exécution de ses œuvres en Allemagne. Il continue cependant de composer et déploie tous ses efforts pour être joué en dehors de son pays : ainsi en 1935, à Prague, sera créé son poème symphonique « Miseræ » dédié « à mes amis qui durent subir 1,000 morts, qui reposent pour l'éternité, nous ne vous oublierons pas (Dachau, 1933-1934) ». Le public allemand ignorait quasiment tout de ce compositeur caché. Après la Guerre, il cumulera les fonctions officielles à Munich et en Bavière (il y crée notamment le cycle de concerts de musique contemporaine « Musica Viva »).

Terezín

De la naissance du ghetto, jusqu'au 20 avril 1945, près de 140,000 personnes passent à Terezín dont de nombreux artistes (Robert Desnos y est mort). Terezín restera dans l'histoire comme la plus grande mystification du régime nazi.

Victor Ullmann (1898-1944)

Pianiste et compositeur tchèque (autrichien selon d'autres sources), il entame en 1923 une carrière pleine de succès qui durera jusqu'au début des années 1930. Jusqu'à sa déportation, en 1942, son œuvre comporte 41 Opus. Mais la plus grande partie de ces œuvres a disparue : les manuscrits ont été vraisemblablement perdus pendant la période d'occupation allemande. Son œuvre la plus connue est l'Opéra « Der Kaiser von Atlantis » composé et créé en 1944 dans le camp de concentration de « Theresienstadt », et qui est devenu l'ouvrage symbole de la destruction de plusieurs générations d'artistes juifs.

Gideon Klein (1919-1945)

Compositeur et un pianiste tchèque, Gideon Klein a donné son 1er concert à 14 ans. En 1938, il fréquente la « Master-class » de piano de Vilém Kurz. Une carrière de pianiste se dessine alors. Mais l'occupation nazie, en 1940, met fin à ses études. Il est empêché de se rendre à la « Royal Academy of Music », à Londres, pour étudier et ne peut se produire comme pianiste en public. En décembre 1941, il est déporté à Terezín. Avec des musiciens comme les compositeurs Hans Krása, Viktor Ullmann et Pavel Haas, le chanteur Karel Berman, le pianiste et chef d'orchestre Rafael Schächter ou le futur chef d'orchestre de la Philharmonie tchèque Karel Ančerl, il est un acteur important de la vie culturelle du camp. En octobre 1944, 9 jours après avoir achevé son Trio à cordes, il est déporté à Auschwitz puis au camp de concentration de Fürstengrube, une installation extérieure d'Auschwitz. Il y travaille à la mine et meurt peu de temps avant la libération dans des circonstances restées inconnues.

Hans Krása (1899-1944)

Compositeur tchéco-allemand, il est élève d'Albert Roussel, et travaille comme chef de chœur au Nouveau théâtre allemand, à Prague. C'est en 1921 qu'il obtient son 1er succès comme compositeur avec les Lieder avec orchestre, Opus 1, sur des textes de Christian Morgenstern. En 1938, Hans Krása écrit l'Opéra pour enfant, « Brundibár », à l'occasion d'un concours du Ministère de l'enseignement et de l'Éducation Populaire. Mais Adolf Hitler envahit la Pologne et cet Opéra ne peut être joué. Malgré tout, en 1941, la première sera donnée secrètement dans un orphelinat juif. Le 10 août 1942, Hans Krása est déporté au Camp de concentration de Terezín. « Brundibár » y sera donné 55 fois. Dans le camp, il sera marié quelques mois avec Eliška Kleinová pour empêcher sa déportation en tant que femme seule. Dans la nuit du 16 octobre 1944, Hans Krása est transporté en chemin de fer vers Auschwitz. Il meurt dans la chambre à gaz dès son arrivée.

Rudolf Karel (1880-1945)

Fils d'un employé des chemins de fer, Rudolf Karel, d'origine tchèque, a étudié la composition de 1899 à 1904 avec Antonín Dvořák. À Prague, où il est professeur de composition au Conservatoire, il participe à la Résistance contre les Nazis. Il est arrêté le 19 mars 1943, puis interné à la prison de Pankrác. Malgré la torture, Karel commence dans sa cellule n° 127 à écrire une nouvelle œuvre ; son Conte, « Les 3 cheveux d'or du grand-père omniscient ». Sans disposer de papier à musique, il compose sur des petits bouts de papier de toilette, utilisant des éclats de bois qu'il arrache au plancher et qu'il noircit avec du charbon animal - un médicament précieux. Jour après jour, au fil de l'avancement du travail, et sans que l'auteur ait pu se relire, un gardien tchèque fait sortir les feuillets de la prison pour les mettre soigneusement à l'abri (il y en eut 240). En février 1945, il est déporté à Terezín : il compose « Nonette ». Obligé de rester dehors, nu, toute une nuit sous prétexte d'épouillage, il meurt de froid 1 mois plus tard.

Pavel Haas (1899-1944)

Compositeur tchèque, Pavel Haas fut l'un des élèves les plus doués et les plus originaux de Leoš Janáček, mêlant brillamment les influences du jazz, du folklore juif, avec sa Bohême natale. À l'instar de Erich Wolfgang Korngold, il composa de nombreuses musiques de films et de théâtre. Malade et affaibli mais encouragé par Gideon Klein, il compose à Terezín une Étude pour orchestre à cordes (reprise dans le film de propagande nazie, « Der Führer Schenkt den Juden eine Stadt ») et les « 4 Chants », son chef-d'œuvre. Il est déporté à Auschwitz, le 16 octobre 1944, avec Gideon Klein, Krása et Ullmann, où il meurt dans une chambre à gaz 2 jours après son arrivée. Son épouse et leur jeune fille survécurent à la guerre, grâce à la courageuse initiative de Haas d'orchestrer son divorce.

Bien d'autres compositeurs anonymes ont disparu dans l'anéantissement programmé par le régime nazi, parfois avant même de pouvoir donner la pleine mesure d'un talent qui n'a pas eu le temps d'éclorre.

Conséquences du bannissement

Le régime nazi a finalement réduit au silence la plus grande partie de l'élite musicale qui avait fleuri sous la République de Weimar. Qu'ils aient disparu en déportation ou dans l'anonymat de l'exil, bon nombre des compositeurs dégénérés qui ont survécu à l'extermination n'ont toujours pas retrouvé la place qui devrait être la leur dans la vie musicale de l'après-guerre : soit parce qu'ils ont perdu leur notoriété qu'ils n'ont pas réussi à regagner, soit parce que l'hégémonie de la Seconde École de Vienne et leur théoricien Theodor W. Adorno les ont éclipsés de la scène musicale. Ils restent encore souvent considérés comme des musiciens de second plan.

Norbert Glanzberg (1910-2001)

Doté d'une formation musicale parfaitement Classique, ayant été assistant d'Alban Berg sur l'Opéra « Wozzeck », à Aix-la-Chapelle, il connaîtra à Paris la misère et survivra en tant que musicien de cabaret. Durant la Guerre, il est caché au Château de Montredon par la Comtesse Pastré mais sera arrêté à Nice, en 1943, et miraculeusement sauvé des convois. Après la Guerre, il écrira pour Edith Piaf quelques-uns de ses plus grands succès. Il écrira aussi pour Yves Montand, Tino Rossi, et composera des musiques de films. Ce n'est qu'à la fin de sa vie qu'il se remettra à composer des œuvres pour grand orchestre, comme la Suite « Yiddish » et le Concerto pour 2 pianos.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold (1897-1957)

Fils du critique autrichien Julius Korngold, enfant prodige, il fut recommandé à Gustav Mahler et à Alexander von Zemlinsky. Le triomphe remporté en 1920 à Hambourg, où il était devenu chef d'orchestre, par son Opéra, « Die tote Stadt » (d'après « Bruges, la morte » de Georges Rodenbach), marqua le sommet de sa carrière. Contraint d'émigrer aux États-Unis en 1934, il s'y spécialisa dans la musique de film. Alors qu'il est un des compositeurs les plus connus d'Europe et du Nouveau Monde, les Nazis saisirent sa propriété vendant ce qu'ils pouvaient et détruisant le reste de son œuvre. L'exil et l'Amérique le contraignent à rester musicien de film. Identifié comme tel dans le monde musical d'après-guerre, il reste considéré comme un compositeur de second ordre, notamment en raison de son refus d'adhérer au sérialisme et au dodécaphonisme. Il devait constater, après son retour en Europe, que ses ouvrages, si fêtés un quart de siècle plus tôt, avaient quitté le répertoire. Korngold est mort sans revenir aux grandes formes musicales (Opéras, Lieders) qui avaient été son expression musicale initiale.

Conclusion

Michel Pastore conclu ainsi sa conférence :

« À travers ses quelques exemples choisis certes arbitrairement (comment référer ne serait-ce qu'à tous les principaux compositeurs de cette période ?) , le fait que la terreur musicale instauré par le 3e " Reich " servit à cautionner le judaïsme paraît fondé. Mais de même se fonde en retour le fait que, malgré la " solution finale ", la musique persista toujours à témoigner de sa force vitale et ce malgré les conditions extrêmes auxquelles ses compositeurs furent contraints. Restituer à tous ces grands artistes la place qu'ils méritent, c'est nous ré-approprier une partie essentielle de notre patrimoine culturel. Recréer, un demi-siècle après, ces œuvres magistrales, c'est aussi refaire avec elles le chemin de l'exil, de l'interdit, du génocide. Si la stratégie nazie fut de justifier le crime contre l'humanité en utilisant la culture comme leurre, à l'inverse la culture comme vérité peut en se reconstituant autour de ces œuvres " dégénérées " dénoncer à jamais le crime. Il s'agit alors de signifier à travers une esthétique, un impératif moral :

Degenerate music (« Entartete Musik ») was a label applied in the 1930's by the Nazi government in Germany to certain forms of music that it considered to be harmful or decadent. The Nazi government's concern for degenerate music was a part of its larger and more well-known campaign against degenerate art (« Entartete Kunst ») . In both cases, the government attempted to isolate, discredit, discourage, or ban the works.

The Nazi government considered several types of music to be degenerate, for several different reasons. Any music that was opposed to the Nazi regime by virtue of its content or the political views of its composers and performers was considered degenerate. This included works by Jewish and Jewish-origin composers (such as Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Arnold Schoenberg, Franz Schreker, Walter Braunfels, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Kurt Weill, Gustav Mahler, David Nowakowsky and Berthold Goldschmidt) ; works that featured Jewish or African characters (such as those by Ernst Křenek) ; or works by composers of Marxist persuasion (like Hanns Eisler) . It also applied to artists that had shown sympathy for opponents of the Nazi Regime (such as Anton von Webern, who had maintained a friendship with Schoenberg during his exile from Germany) . Modernist music, such as works by Paul Hindemith, Alban Berg, Arnold Schoenberg, and Anton von Webern, was also considered degenerate. Modernist music was judged to be inferior to previous Classical music and it, therefore, offended the Nazis' sense of progress and civilization in general - and, in particular, their loyalty to Germany's many great Classical composers. In addition, one might speculate that Modernist music's abandonment of traditional structure and form presented a threat, albeit immaterial, to the culture of order and control that fascist regimes such as the Nazi Party both developed and relied on. Finally, jazz music was considered degenerate because of its roots in and association with the African-American culture.

However, it promoted the works of German composers, especially those of Richard Wagner who was also much admired by Adolf Hitler as well as many others. Especial favourites were « Rienzi » and the « Ring » cycle with all its links to German mythology. Military marches were highly-approved, and widely used as in the films of Leni Riefenstahl such as « Triumph of the Will » .

From the Nazi seizure of power onward, these composers found it increasingly difficult, and often impossible, to get work or have their music performed. Many went into exile (Arnold Schœnberg, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, Berthold Goldschmidt) ; or retreated into « internal exile » (Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Boris Blacher) ; or ended-up in the concentration camps (Viktor Ullmann, Erwin Schulhoff) .

Some works which were later enthusiastically adopted by the Nazi regime, such as the hugely popular « Carmina Burana » by Carl Orff (1937) , were initially described as degenerate by local music-critics.

Like degenerate art, examples of degenerate music were displayed in public exhibits in Germany, beginning in 1938. One of the 1st of these was organized in Düsseldorf by Hans Severus Ziegler, at the time super-intendent of the Weimar National Theatre, who explained in an opening speech that the decay of music was « due to the influence of Judaism and capitalism » . Ziegler's exhibit was organized into 7 sections, devoted to :

(1) The influence of Judaism.

(2) Arnold Schœnberg.

(3) Kurt Weill and Ernst Křenek.

(4) « Minor Bolsheviks » (Franz Schreker, Alban Berg, Ernst Toch) .

(5) Leo Kestenbergh, director of musical education before 1933.

(6) Paul Hindemith's Operas and Oratorios.

(7) Igor Stravinsky (anon. 1938, 629) .

From the mid- 1990's, the « Decca » Record Company released a series of recordings under the title « Entartete Musik : Music Suppressed by the 3rd “ Reich ” » , covering lesser-known works by several of the above-named composers.

The 1938 Anti-Semitic 3rd « Reich » Exhibition Guide

This extremely rare exhibition guide of the 1938 exhibition entitled « Entartete Musik » by « Staatsrat » Doctor Hans Severus Ziegler was published in 1938 by « Völkischer Verlag » , in Düsseldorf. It is even more rare today than the 3rd « Reich » publication on « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) ! Very few copies are known to exist today.

The cover that Ziegler used for his work originally was a Nazi propaganda poster, a crude exaggeration of the original poster for the Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » . This grotesque figure became the Nazi symbol for all they considered « degenerate » in the arts.

« Degenerate Music » (« Entartete Musik ») was a label applied in the 1930's by the Nazi government in Germany to certain forms of music that it considered to be harmful or decadent. The Nazi government's concern for « degenerate music » was a part of its larger and more well-known campaign against « degenerate art » (« Entartete Kunst ») . In both cases, the government attempted to isolate, discredit, discourage, or ban the works. The Nazi government considered several types of music to be « degenerate » , for several different reasons. Any music that was opposed to the Nazi regime by virtue of its content or the political views of its composers and performers was considered « degenerate » . This included works by Jewish and Jewish-origin composers (such as Felix Mendelssohn, Arnold Schœnberg, Franz Schreker, Walter Braunfels, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Kurt Weill, Gustav Mahler, and Berthold Goldschmidt) ; works that featured Jewish or African characters (such as those by Ernst Křenek) ; or works by composers of Marxist persuasion, e.g. , Hanns Eisler. It also applied to artists that had shown sympathy for opponents of the Nazi regime (such as Anton von Webern, who had been a moderate supporter of Adolf Hitler but had maintained a friendship with the Jewish composer Schœnberg during his exile from Germany) . Modernist music, such as works by Paul Hindemith, Alban Berg, Arnold Schœnberg, and Anton von Webern, was also considered « degenerate » . Modernist music was judged to be inferior to previous Classical music and it, therefore, offended the Nazis' sense of progress and civilization in general - and, in particular, their loyalty to Germany's many great Classical composers. In addition, one might speculate that Modernist music's abandonment of structure and form presented a threat, albeit immaterial, to the culture of order and control that Fascist regimes such as the Nazi Party both developed and relied on. Finally, Jazz music was considered « degenerate » because of its roots in and association with the African-American culture. From the Nazi seizure of power onward, these composers found it increasingly difficult, and often impossible, to get work or have their music performed. Many went into exile (e.g. , Arnold Schœnberg, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, Berthold Goldschmidt) ; or retreated into « internal exile » (e.g. , Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Boris Blacher) ; or ended-up in the concentration camps (e.g. , Viktor Ullmann, or Erwin Schulhoff) . Some works which were later enthusiastically adopted by the Nazi regime, such as the hugely popular « Carmina Burana » by Carl Orff (1937) , were initially described as « degenerate » by local music-critics. Like « degenerate art » , examples of « degenerate music » were displayed in public exhibits in Germany, beginning in 1938. One of the 1st of these was organized in Düsseldorf by Adolf Ziegler, at the time super-intendent of the Weimar National Theatre, who explained in an opening speech that the decay of music was « due to the influence of Judaism and Capitalism » . Ziegler's exhibit was organized into 7 sections, devoted to :

(1) The influence of Judaism.

(2) Arnold Schœnberg.

(3) Kurt Weill and Ernst Křenek.

(4) « Minor Bolsheviks » (Franz Schreker, Alban Berg, Ernst Toch, etc.) .

(5) Leo Kestenberg, director of Musical education before 1933.

(6) Paul Hindemith's Operas and Oratorios.

(7) Igor Stravinsky.

« I have at last learned the lesson that has been forced upon me during this year, and I shall not ever forget it. It is that I am not a German, not a European, indeed perhaps scarcely a human being (at least, the Europeans prefer the worst of their race to me) but I am a Jew. » (Arnold Schönberg)

After the horrors of World War I, most Europeans expressed their sense of freedom by embracing the « Roaring 20's ». A decadent lifestyle was emerging from the nightlife of jazz clubs and cabarets. Berlin was at the heart of the bold and innovative music trends of the 1920's and 1930's. Musicians experimented with their art by pushing away from accepted musical forms and finding new ones.

While many Europeans were celebrating new-found freedom in the arts, Germany was already beginning to fall under the shadow of the Swastika. For almost 100 years, an atmosphere of anti-Semitism had been growing in Europe. Richard Wagner, the well-known composer, had spoken publicly against the Jewish people in his booklet, « Das Judentum in die Musik » (Judaism in Music) . The Nazi Party played upon these historic prejudices in their rise to power.

19th Century psychologists introduced the term « degenerate » (or « entartete ») to describe any deviance or clinical mental illness. Later, a broader definition was applied to include scientific literature (medical, biology and anthropology) . By 1933, Adolf Hitler's 3rd « Reich » referred to the mentally ill, communists, Gypsies, homosexuals and Jews as subspecies of the human race. The words « Jewish » , « Degenerate » , and « Bolshevik » were commonly used to describe any art or music not acceptable to the 3rd « Reich » . The Nazi propaganda poster (black man playing the saxophone with the « Star of David » on his jacket) is a crude exaggeration of the original poster for Ernst Křenek Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » . This grotesque figure became the Nazi symbol for all they considered « degenerate » in the arts. Hitler envisioned the day when German culture would be free of « morbid excrescencies of insane and degenerate men » .

After the race laws of 1933, the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) required a registry of all German musicians. As a result, hundreds of talented composers had their work deliberately suppressed and careers ended simply because their race or style of music offended the 3rd « Reich » . By 1938, examples of degenerate music were on display at the « Entarte Musik » Exhibit for the public to view. Famous works by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Gustav Mahler, and Arnold Schönberg were used as examples of unacceptable music. A generation of incredibly innovative and promising musicians was virtually excluded from its place in music history.

The « Reichsmusikkammer » registry was completed in 1940 and included all musicians' race and religion. Those Jews who had escaped detection, up until 1940, were now in jeopardy. It was easy to find and arrest Jews based on this list. The following composers were considered « degenerate » by the Nazi regime.

Berthold Goldschmidt (1903-1996) was a prominent Jewish composer and conductor who had experienced harassment as a Jew even before Adolf Hitler came to power. He escaped to England, in 1935. He stayed in obscurity until the 1980's when his work was again recognized internationally.

Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) emerged as one of the leading German conductors of his generation. After conducting « Tannhäuser » in 1933, on the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, Klemperer fled to the United States to escape Nazi persecution. He became conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1937. By 1955, after years of health problems, he was appointed the principal conductor of the « Philharmonia » Orchestra of London.

Ernst Křenek (1900-1991) was considered a respectable German Catholic until he wrote a modern Opera called « Jonny Spielt Auf ! ». The storyline of the Opera featured a black man as the main character. The Opera was a musical mix of jazz, spiritual, and Classical. He employed special sound effects to depict traffic noise, trains, and sirens within the music.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold (1897-1957) was a Jewish child prodigy. By the age of 10, he composed « Der Schneemann » which was orchestrated and conducted by his teacher, Alexander von Zemlinsky. In 1934, he began writing musical arrangements for Hollywood films. While working in the United States, in 1938, the Nazis seized his Austrian home and property. Korngold never returned to live again in Austria. His lengthy Hollywood career produced 2 Academy Awards for film scores. He was a popular composer for films, generating music for more than 20 movies.

Arnold Schœnberg (1874-1951) . Though Schœnberg emigrated to the United States just after Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933, he understood what it meant to be persecuted and what lay ahead for the Jews who did not leave Germany. He foresaw the decimation of the Jews, and tried to get the public's attention. His agenda stated :

- 1) Anti-Semitism must be stopped.
- 2) A united Jewish Party must be created.
- 3) Unanimity in Jewry must be priority.
- 4) An independent Jewish State must be created.

It is no wonder he drew the hatred of Hitler and the Nazis. Schœnberg was telling the world that Hitler was dangerous before he had a stranglehold on the German people.

Bruno Walter (1876-1962) was born Bruno Walter Schlesinger. Walter was the conductor of the Leipzig Orchestra and frequent guest-conductor of the Berlin Orchestra prior to the 3rd « Reich ». In 1933, the Nazi government canceled his concerts due to the « threat to public order ». They could no longer guarantee his personal safety. Walter fled to Austria and then to the United States where he became a well-known conductor and music advisor.

Anton von Webern (1883-1945) was a staunch follower of Adolf Hitler, though not a member of the Nazi Party. He agreed with Hitler's writings, and felt that Hitler would moderate his policies concerning the Jews after the 1st display of power. He was a friend of Schönberg, the exiled German Jew whose music had been classified as « degenerate » and thereby banned. This friendship along with his advocacy of atonality in music got his works listed as « degenerate » . The Nazis burned his writings and forbade performances of his music after Hitler's annexation of Austria (or « Anschluß ») . He retired to a life in the country toward the end of the War. He was accidentally shot to death by an American soldier, on the evening of 15 September 1945, while smoking a cigarette outside (in the dark) at his daughter's home, in Mittersill.

What are we to make of the composers who decided not to leave Germany and Austria with the arrival of Adolf Hitler ? A very small number, with the means to do so, simply withdrew from public life : Karl Amadeus Hartmann is the most notable example of this so-called « inner-immigration » . This was a situation whereby performances of works were withdrawn by the composer himself in Nazi occupied Europe. Such integrity came at the price of lost income and Hartmann was forced to live-off of the benevolence of his father-in-law.

Others thought National-Socialism an absolutely splendid idea and composed bombastically in approval. A few joined the Party, while a considerable number had their membership application rejected, no matter how undying their devotion to the Aryan cause.

One of the most bizarre instances was Leon Jessel, a Jewish composer whose wife was a member of the NSDAP. Jessel applied for membership to the Nazi « Kampfbund für Kultur » , but was rejected despite having composed « Schwarzwaldmädel » (The Black Forest Girl) , a light Opera that was a favourite of Adolf Hitler. His eventual arrest and assault by the « Gestapo » led to an early death.

Another bizarre case involved the very fine composer Manfred Gurlitt who even joined the NSDAP, only to be chucked-out when he was (falsely) thought to have Jewish blood.

Many composers, however, simply signed whatever was shoved in front of them in order to continue making a living.

Eduard Erdmann and Max Tiessen's works were banned, but they tried to keep things ticking over in whatever manner they could manage, either by teaching or performing. Erdmann joined the Party, in order to continue his career as pianist, a situation that was repeated with Felix Petyrek. Both had moved in « cultural Bolshevik » circles prior to Hitler's arrival and, even afterwards, there is little indication of their conviction to National-Socialism.

Berthold Goldschmidt reminded me that an affidavit obtained for someone who was in no physical danger from the Nazis, was an affidavit less for someone who was. People without connections or funds abroad and families to support found it easier to do whatever was necessary in order to carry-on as normal - whatever « normal » was. The oppressive conventionalism that became the 3rd « Reich » 's preferred musical ideal was not an overnight phenomenon. Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt and Viktor Zuckerkandl both file reports of interesting musical events taking place after January 30th 1933, such as Paul von Klenau's 12 tone Opera, « Michael Kohlhaas » . In 1934, Alexander von Zemlinsky's « Kreiderkreis » ran for some 20 performances in Berlin, though not without incident. He was Arnold Schönberg's brother-in-law and a Jew. Jewish composers were officially banned from publicly subsidised venues. Atonality and 12 tone music, even today, does not always make for « easy listening » though it was, partially and occasionally, performed under Nazi auspices.

Paul von Klenau's Symphony from 1941, « Der Sturm » . Klenau was originally from a German speaking Danish family and was married to the daughter of Soma Morgenstern. Despite his persuasive arguments in favour of a « non-Jewish 12 tone system » , winning favour among Nazi cultural arbiters, with a Jewish wife, he felt it safer to leave Germany, returning to Denmark in 1940.

Composers who were promoted by the Nazis were either Richard Strauß, whom we know, or Hans Pfitzner and Franz Schmidt, with whom we are at best familiar. Carl Orff is also often mentioned as a « Nazi favourite » , as are Eugène d'Albert and Franz Lehár, both of whom, by the way, were partial to « non-Aryan » librettists - as, indeed, was Richard Strauß. Lehár, like Klenau, had a Jewish wife, which further compromised him. A huge number of other composers, of whom we know little, have simply been relegated to the status of cowardly, unethical and immoral opportunists.

As a recent correspondent has pointed-out to me, our reaction to these particular individuals either results in throwing out the baby with the bathwater, or over-emphasising and wilfully misreading the evidence of their innocence. And, of course, there is the « case » of Paul Hindemith, a composer apparently all too willing to come to an accommodation with the Nazi regime, had Adolf Hitler's strong disapproval and personal intervention not thwarted his intentions and resulted in his reluctant emigration.

« Und wenn du noch so doll den fuß dagegen stemmst, glaub nicht daß du die Zeit in ihrem Laufe hemmst. » :

A pun on the name of (Engelbert) Dollfuß (Crazy Foot) when time states that trying to hold-back the inevitable by stamping on developments with your « foot » is « crazy » .

At the same time, there were composers such as Friedrich Hartmann, who as a supporter of the Austro-Fascist governments of Engelbert Dollfuß and Kurt Schuschnigg, were forced to flee Nazism following the « Anschluß » , in March 1938. Austro-Fascism was not, despite appealing portrayals of the singing von Trapp family, a democratic, pluralistic government. Social-Democrats and Nazis were both persecuted, though more often than not, it was Social-Democrats who were beaten to a pulp in Austro-Fascist prisons or ended on the Dollfuß/Schuschnigg gallows. The infiltration of Austria's police force by the Nazis, between 1933 and 1938, led to Hitler's « saboteurs » and terrorists being covered-up, or if captured, let-off. The 1st convicted Nazi Party member to be hanged was the Dollfuß assassin, Otto Planetta, later hailed as a Nazi martyr.

Otto Planetta (Nazi who murdered Engelbert Dollfuß) was executed by the Austro-Fascist dictatorship on July 31st, 1934.

It should not go unmentioned that the innocent sounding folk-songs performed by the von Trapps were, in fact, instruments of Austro-Fascist propaganda, attempting to shore-up a uniquely Austrian identity, distinct from its German neighbour. Austrian Catholicism was another means by which Austro-Fascists boosted Austrian singularity. Indeed, British journalists at the time, such as George Eric Rowe Gedye, often referred to the governments of Dollfuß and Schuschnigg as a « clerical dictatorship » .

Austrian folk-music, customs and religion were seen as important propaganda tools against a rampant pan-German movement, a movement that in of itself was not necessarily Nazi or even anti-Semitic, but eventually saw Nazism as the most practical means of uniting all German speakers within a single State. Other composers who were close to the « Ständestaat » , as the dictatorship was called, were Ernst Křenek and Jewish born, but Catholic convert, Egon Wellesz. The very concept of « Stände » refers to the individual's corporative position within society : military ; clergy ; workers ; lawyers ; doctors, etc. It saw the individual as a part of the larger « corporative » body of the State, and it was an idea that appealed to those who wished to address the class-warfare of Marxism with a non-democratic alternative.

Yet, contradictions abound and I fear that a very unpleasant reality will soon dawn : with Hitler's 12 years of madness passing from memory into history, progressive composers in the morally « grey-zone » of acquiescence, such as Max Butting, Eduard Erdmann, Felix Petyrek , Heinz Tießen will be ignored, while those who kept to Late-Romanticism such as Julius Bittner, Friedrich Hartmann, Wilhelm Kienzl, Egon Kornauth, Joseph Marx, Franz Schmidt, Florent Schmitt or Emil von Řezníček will enjoy an inevitable revival. Indeed, it does not surprise me that open supporters of the Nazi regime such as Paul Græner are already enjoying a surprisingly welcome reception.

The rehabilitation of Stalinist composers already demonstrates that an accommodation with dreadful political regimes has become less significant in our assessment of their output. Personally, I don't hold to the view that having to be creative while living under a criminal regime should condemn an artist to being written-out of history - regardless of their degree of compliance. The question which is more difficult to address is whether composing in a conservative language allowed talented composers to express themselves and political compliance was merely a by-product.

The ethical dilemma, however, remains : does a composer of audience-friendly Late-Romanticism, who resisted a murderous regime, deserve more support than a progressive, more original voice who « came to an accommodation » with the bandits in power ? And, of course, the question can be reversed and present us with the same ethical dilemma. The argument that an « anti-Nazi æsthetic » is more important than the actual degree of support a composer demonstrated to a repugnant ideology is equally troublesome. Max Butting was a progressive who composed music that could never guarantee friends in high-places within the Nazi Party, yet, he eventually joined the Party himself. So, should Max Butting be performed for the continuing re-education of German and Austrian audiences at the expense of say, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Franz Schreker or Walter Braunfels ?

This is especially awkward in times when new repertoire that appeals to paying audiences and important musicians is not being supplied by today's composers or, indeed, the platforms meant to profile today's composers. What option is there in a market-driven environment but to revive those who were formerly compromised ? The fact is, their devoted participation, or perceived acquiescence with evil political regimes has resulted in their effective exclusion from 20th Century history. Their post-War influence was stymied by being on the losing side of ideological wars. Yet, pre-War composers who had fresh ideas and original approaches were equally stymied once initially silenced by malevolent regimes, then, forced to compromise solely in order to survive. Post-War, these same composers found themselves condemned for being acquiescent to policies that they could not influence in a country, from which they could not flee. Unless our generation tries to unravel our very confused thinking on the subject of guilt and artistic output, future generations will simply judge composers on their ability to connect with the listener. Arguably, this is the only approach that truly matters, otherwise why listen to Richard Wagner ?

One needs to be honest enough to acknowledge that authoritarian governments encouraged music that drew people together in a mutually binding listening experience. Frankly, it wasn't just dictatorships : America was also encouraging music that made the singularity of being American a mutually binding experience : Aaron Copland was an expert at composing the sort of « Americana » that translated populist ideals at the same time as composers in the USSR were churning-out « Soviet Realism » . The use to which such music was put was ultimately the same : it spoke directly to the listener, providing them with a cultural identity and a sense of common destiny.

Berthold Goldschmidt Opera, « Der Gewaltige Hahnrei » (1930) was to have been performed in Berlin, in 1933. So, why are some composers accepted and not others ? Do we spend too much time checking-up which ideologies they supported and too little time assessing their actual music ? Again, Berthold Goldschmidt's opinion needs to be taken into consideration :

« Those of you who did not live through the terror cannot know the fear that was felt by every individual. What people said and did, in order to keep their daily lives quiet, cannot be taken as representing their true character. Fear distorts character. And it was not just the fear for oneself, but the fear for family and friends. »

A composer such as Joseph Marx represents these contradictions. His music is immediately appealing, exceptionally well-composed and gaining ground quickly amongst connoisseurs of rarities. A trawl through his correspondence reveals much that indicates a distaste of the Nazi regime and much that shows him to have profited from it. As music-curator at the Jewish Museum, in Vienna, I exhibited 2 letters written by Marx : one to Franz Schreker, from 1933, informing him that in his opinion :

« The Jews themselves were responsible for today's anti-Semitism, due to their outrageous behaviour. »

He didn't offer Schreker a temporary life-line, which as Chancellor of Vienna's Music Academy, was within his power. He would no doubt have argued that he had practical reasons for not doing so. His reference to « Jews » being responsible for anti-Semitism suggests he felt appointing Schreker may have fanned the flames of Viennese anti-Semitism. It didn't matter that Schreker had in all likelihood never set foot into a synagogue and had played the organ at his local Catholic church. It didn't matter that Schreker's mother was from Austria's high-aristocracy, nor did it matter that Schreker was not a Jew. His father, Ignaz, who died while Schreker was still a boy, was a convert from Judaism, and that was all it took. The stress of rejection stemming from something outside of his control, led to the stroke that killed him in 1934.

To me, Marx's letter is very damning indeed. Yet, his correspondence with Korngold is friendly and gregarious. I exhibited a letter from Korngold to Marx in which Korngold puns on the words « Atonal » and « Atomic » . There is nothing in their many letters to suggest that Marx was anti-Semitic. Others cite indictments made by Korngold's librettist, Ernst Décsey, who denounced Marx as an anti-Semite of the 1st order. Like Marx, he too was from Graz and was referencing local knowledge rather than official documentation. If personal political views make music unsuitable for consumption, why on earth do we continue to listen to Wagner, Chopin, Berlioz or Liszt, all of whom wrote repellent things about Jews ? Should we ban everyone we don't agree with ? Wouldn't that be just a bit ... Nazi ??

A critical reconstruction of the Düsseldorf exhibition of 1938

(Created by Albrecht Dümling and Peter Girth.)

Doctor Albrecht Dümling, Berlin musicologist and critic focusing especially on 20th Century musical and cultural history.

The Nazi Exhibition

When, in 1933, the Nazis became rulers of Germany, they regarded this as the beginning of a political as well as a cultural revolution. In order to overcome the « chaotic » artistic pluralism of the Weimar Republic, they persecuted as different artists as Arnold Schönberg, Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill and Hanns Eisler, who as « non-Aryans » did not meet the requirements of the racial laws. They attacked also « Aryan » artists that (like Paul Hindemith and Igor Stravinsky) had close contact with Jews or were married to Jewish partners.

The town of Weimar, in Thuringia, had already, before 1933, been infiltrated by Nazi ideology. In 1930, Paul Schultze-Naumburg, the new director the school of arts, gave orders to remove the paintings of « Bauhaus » artists. Other prominent Nazis in this town were Baldur von Schirach, Heinz Drewes and Hans Severus Ziegler. Drewes, director of the music department of the Ministry of Propaganda, organized the 1st « “ Reich ” Music Days » of the new State, opening in Düsseldorf, on May 22nd, 1938 ; Richard Wagner's 125th birthday. As part of this music Festival, Ziegler, General manager of the German National Theatre in Weimar, opened the propaganda show « Entartete Musik » (Degenerate Music) , which he himself had arranged, following the example of the « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) exhibition of Munich, in 1937.

The reconstruction

Whereas the art exhibition had already been reconstructed several times, the music show was nearly forgotten. The musicologist Albrecht Dümling encountered the historic exhibition, in 1986-1987, when he arranged several concerts accompanying a « Degenerate Art » Festival, in Düsseldorf. Peter Girth, then, General Manager of the Düsseldorf Symphony Orchestra, had stimulated that project.

Besides the attempt of a reconstruction of the propaganda show the new exhibition demonstrates, how the musical life of the Weimar Republic was destroyed, and offers (like the « “ Reich ” Music Days ») an overview of the German musical life in the 1930's. This included the « racial research » of prominent German musicologists, who lectured during the « “ Reich ” Music Days » .

For the brochure with Ziegler's opening speech, the Nazis used the black musician « Jonny » from Ernst Křenek's popular Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Strikes-up the Band !) (1927) ; the musician's carnation they turned into a « Star of David » .

The poster of 1988 combines this manipulation with Anton Bruckner's silhouette (using the famous portrait by Hermann von Kaulbach) . For those in power, Bruckner represented the genuine German composer ; several of their Party Rallies ended with a movement of a Bruckner Symphony, and a Bruckner fanfare was chosen as the musical symbol of the « Days of German Art 1937 » , in Munich.

50 years after the propaganda show of the Nazis, the new exhibition opened in Düsseldorf. Further venues were already in the 1st year of its existence the Festivals of Vienna and Zürich and the Centenary of the « Concertgebouw » of Amsterdam. In winter 1989-1990, the exhibition travelled to the Germanic National Museum in Nuremberg, where it was combined with an extensive program of concerts and discussions.

As a complement to the exhibition, the film « Verbotene Klänge. Musik unter dem Hakenkreuz » (Forbidden Sounds. Music under the Swastika) was created, showing for example Ernst Křenek remembering the hatred against his Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » .

The Los Angeles Philharmonic Association arranged an English version of the exhibition that opened in March 1991 at the Music Center Los Angeles.

In 2006-2007 also, a Spanish version of the exhibition was created for the University of Seville.

Considering new findings that led to a more differentiated picture of the Nazi's music policies, a new German version of the exhibition seemed necessary. Thus, in 2007, sponsored by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the « Alten Tonhalle Düsseldorf » , the exhibition « Das verdächtige Saxophon.“ Entartete Musik ” im Dritten Reich » (The ominous saxophone. « Degenerate Music » in the 3rd « Reich ») came into being. There, as already in the exhibition of 1938, jazz and Operetta gained greater prominence.

« It was a chilling reminder that such a thing could happen. I only wish we could have had this exhibit last year. It could have been a reminder of what happens when a government starts making artistic judgments. »

(The Los Angeles Times)

« The exhibit documents the Nazi's scurrilous, illogical slander of musicians as disparate as Ernst Křenek, Bruno Walter, Richard Tauber and Josephine Baker, and shows with sickening clarity how susceptible music is to political ideology. As an audio-tape plays, you tap your foot to a catchy march until you realize it was composed for some brown-shirt rally. Then, a chill goes up your spine. »

(The Wall Street Journal)

« The exhibition stands as a worthy tribute to a lost epoch of music and a reminder that freedom of the arts cannot be taken lightly. »

(The Jewish Chronicle, London)

Defining « Degenerate Music » in Nazi Germany

During the 12 years of the 3rd « Reich » 's existence, there was no shortage of hyperbole in the representation of art's role and artists' obligations within the new State. Anyone who approaches the subject will be familiar with Leni Riefenstahl's brilliant piece of film propaganda, « Triumph of the Will » , with the sleek and imposing neo-Classicism of the Olympic stadium and « Reich » Chancellery, with their muscle bound statuary and with Paul Ludwig Troost's House of German Art. Digging deeper, one discovers that Hitler laid the corner-stone for this art museum amidst a pompous procession of the history of « German » art that borrowed shamelessly from ancient Greece, and that the museum's grand opening, in 1937, featured not only a hand-selected collection of works considered truly German but, also, an accompanying exhibit of illegally seized modernist art displayed, mockingly, as the « degenerate » work of charlatans, racial inferiors and the mentally deranged.

1 year later, it was music's turn with the creation of the « Reich » Music Days, which assembled music organizations from around the country and which Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels opened with a speech on the « 10 Commandments » for German music. A parallel exhibit on « degenerate music » vilified jazz, modernism and the alleged Bolshevik and Jewish domination of German musical taste under the Weimar Republic.

Yet, tempting though it may be to take the Degenerate Music exhibit at face value and to regard it as a global statement of Nazi Germany's repression of musical freedom, some important questions must be asked in order to arrive at an understanding of the event and its impact. Could an exhibit about music successfully convey a clear delineation between ideals of « good » and « bad » creative work as effectively as an exhibit of visual arts ? Did this exhibit truly represent the state of German musical life at the time or merely the wishful thinking of rabid ideologues ? The images and vitriolic language of this event are abhorrent to our 21st Century sensibilities, but how might such visual and verbal rhetoric have resonated in 1938 ?

Although the events of the « Reich » Music Days - which spanned more than a week and included performances by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and conducting appearances by Richard Strauß as well as concerts at local factories - aimed to highlight the superior features of German music, even the glib Goebbels was strikingly vague in his keynote speech. He circuitously suggested that « the nature of music lies in melody » rather than in theoretical constructs ; « all music is not suited to everyone » ; music is rooted in the folk, requires empathy rather than reason, deeply affects the spirit of man, and is the most glorious art of the German heritage ; and musicians of the past must be respected. (1) Goebbels was not alone in his inability to put his finger on what made music German, for the elusiveness of music in general, and German music in particular, had plagued experts on both musical and political fronts for decades, if not Centuries. (2)

But what about the task of defining « un-German » or « anti-German » music ? The Degenerate Music exhibit, a focal point of the « Reich » Music Days, should have been able to teach Germans how to recognize destructive musical influences and drive them out of the new State. Instead, it offered only a confusing mixture of all music that was construed as alienating, overly intellectual, sarcastic, erotic, socialistic, capitalistic or American. Furthermore, its heavy reliance on the imagery and devices of the art exhibit upon which it was modeled only highlighted the difficulties inherent in pinning labels on music, and the listening booths for sampling the « witches-sabbath » of cacophony may have been the most popular feature for those attendees who actually enjoyed listening to the music that was under fire. (3)

Like Goebbels, Hans Severus Ziegler, the exhibit's curator, was not a musician, and he clearly felt uncomfortable delving into musical issues. In the catalogue, he stated outright that he did not intend to « write prescriptions or outline laws for the new formation of German musical life » , but rather to educate the country's youth. (4) Ziegler indulges in polemics against democracy, Bolshevism and Jews but pays more attention to Jewish literary figures than to musicians. One notable exception was Arnold Schoenberg, who was explicitly attacked as the inventor of atonality and the would-be underminer of the « German » triad. (5)

The fact that the organizers were heavily influenced by the success of the 1937 art exhibit is made even clearer thanks to the abundance of music-related images similar to those used as examples of degenerate art. The art exhibit had heightened its attack on modern artworks by arranging them in a crowded and chaotic fashion on walls strewn with graffiti-like commentary, and the music exhibit was set-up in a similar manner. (6) Furthermore, the music exhibit's catalogue exploited the shock value of some modern art by linking it to music wherever possible. It featured a sketch of a stage-design for a Schoenberg Opera by Oskar Schlemmer, one of the defamed Bauhaus artists ; reproduced caricatures of Jewish musicians that were drawn by Jewish artists ; (7) and showed 2 abstract paintings with musical subjects by the « degenerates » Paul Klee and Carl Hofer, with the inscription, « degenerate art and degenerate music hand in hand » . (8)

When they were not leaning on visual associations, the organizers tapped into popular tropes of racism and anti-Semitism as well as indulging in Janus-faced attacks on Bolshevism and capitalism without ever taking pains to sort out the inherent contradictions. The catalogue's cover, with its depiction of a black saxophonist with a Jewish star on his lapel, was meant to incite an immediate aversion to racial otherness : since the 1920's, the saxophone had symbolized concerns about the invasion of American culture, and the Jewish star supposedly revealed the manipulative power behind the alleged American conspiracy to debase German culture. An unflattering portrait of Arnold Schœnberg, on page 13 of the catalogue, is accompanied by an observation (by Siegmund Pisling, who was Jewish) that describes him as an explorer who tries to open-up new horizons by turning sounds of anguish and hysteria into music. (9) A « portrait of his Aryan » student, Anton von Webern, is captioned with the comment that the student exceeds the Master « even in the length of his nose » , (10) and another « Aryan » composer, Ernst Křenek, is targeted for « propagating race dishonour » with his hugely successful Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (This work from the 1920's featured, as its central character, a black jazz musician with criminal leanings ; it is defamed elsewhere in the catalogue as « Bolshevist » and was probably also the inspiration for the cover illustration.) (11) The Jewish Opera composer Franz Schreker, whose works had been quite successful throughout the 1920's, and who had died in 1934, was linked with the sex-researcher Magnus Hirschfeld, (12) and Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill's satire of Capitalism was twisted to represent their purported encouragement of greed and corruption. (13)

The « Degenerate Music » exhibit neither provided guide-lines for musicians nor reflected current or developing music policy. The repeated attacks against Schœnberg, for one, would hardly have aroused much surprise in Germany in the 1930's, or even in the 1920's. Following the successes of « Pelleas und Melisande » (composed in 1902-1903) , « Pierrot Lunaire » (in 1912) , and the « Gurrelieder » (in 1900-1903, 1910-1911) , Schœnberg abandoned traditional harmony in his atonal and 12 tone works and inspired several other composers to follow suit. By the late- 1920's, however, many younger composers had set their minds on forging stronger relationships with the general public and had shunned Schœnberg's esoteric experiments, for which critical reception had been less than enthusiastic. Following the 1930 premiere of the composer's Opera, « Von heute auf morgen » , musicologist and critic Alfred Einstein reprimanded Schœnberg for his half-hearted attempt to compose a work for the masses by choosing a story with broad appeal but setting it to a 12 tone score with « fanatical seriousness and an overwhelming lack of humour » . This resulted in a work of « pure self-gratification » that was « unsocial and inhumanly difficult » , (14) wrote Einstein - who, like Schœnberg, was later forced to emigrate. Schœnberg had been named director of the prestigious composition Master-class at the Prussian Academy, in 1925, and his public humiliation and resignation, in 1933, attracted much attention as a 1st step toward fulfilling the Nazis' mission to remove all Jews from musical life. The fact that Schœnberg was a Jew whose work had recently declined in popularity provided a convenient coincidence for racist propagandists.

The denigration of Schœnberg did not, however, signal the death of his compositional methods in Germany : several atonal and 12 tone works were created and performed during the 3rd « Reich » , and a few were commissioned by Nazi organizations and premiered in prominent venues. (15) On the occasion of Schœnberg's 60th birthday, in 1934, music-critic Herbert Gerigk, an employee of the Nazi ideologue Alfred Rosenberg, went so far as to suggest that, in the right hands (i.e. , in the hands of a composer who was pure of blood and pure in character) , atonal composition could be an effective means of expression. (16)

By 1938, when the Degenerate Music exhibit was mounted, Schœnberg and most of the other individuals attacked in it had either emigrated or died, which made them easy targets. Their absences also became retroactive « evidence » of the new order's successful eradication of destructive forces. Curiously, Ziegler names « l'Histoire du soldat » as a work that had « insulted German audiences » , but he fails to name its composer, Igor Stravinsky. (17) The Russian Master was enjoying great success in Germany, at the time of the exhibit, (18) and was being cited as a possible mentor and inspiration for young composers in the 3rd « Reich » . (19) His experiments with rhythm and meter unmistakably influenced Carl Orff's hugely successful Nazi era composition, « Carmina Burana » . (20)

The other prominent object of vilification in the exhibit was jazz, but the attacks did little to alter its fate in Nazi Germany. Jazz, like atonality, started-out as an easy target : already, during the 1920's, it had symbolized foreign corruption in the minds of conservative music-critics, leaders of the youth movement and (a little later, during the Depression) practicing musicians who feared competition from the influx of foreign jazz musicians. (21) It is ironic that Germans acquired a much more sophisticated appreciation of jazz during the 1930's, and the genre's popularity would spike during the Second World War, as soldiers demanded it and the German public threatened to tune into foreign broadcasts if German radio refused to offer it on their air-waves. (22) Jazz also managed to thrive in night clubs, some of which were the frequent haunts of SS and SA officers who themselves were jazz enthusiasts. (23)

Finally, in assessing the success or failure of the exhibit, we must try to envision the « Zeitgeist » of 1938, in Germany and abroad - and, here, we encounter even more surprising contradictions. Musicologist Albrecht Dümling, who has long been engaged in reconstructing and understanding the 1938 event and its implications, recently made the stunning discovery that its shrill tone actually repelled some committed National-Socialists, whereas the exhibit may have resonated with the adherents of concurrent strains of xenophobia, in Britain and America. Peter Raabe, who was then President of the all-encompassing national musicians union (« Reichsmusikkammer ») , founded in 1933, tendered his resignation in response to the exhibit ; his predecessor, Richard Strauß, the « godfather » of German music, expressed his dismay more subtly, whereas other prominent musicians simply shunned the event - to such an extent that Josef Gœbbels shut the exhibit down prematurely. At the same time, however, an American reporter completely white-washed the racist content of the exhibit, and a reporter for Britain's « Musical Times » uncritically noted how it « illustrated the sorry plight of German music during the period of “ Jewish influence ” . » (24)

Taken together, all of these contradictions within and surrounding the Degenerate Music exhibit do nothing to mitigate the fact that, at the very least, the event added to the ammunition that was being stock-piled by those who wished to destroy their enemies, Jews and non-Jews alike. Its barrage of anti-Semitic rhetoric was just one more factor that contributed to the German public's acceptance of the assault on the rights, property and physical safety of Jewish citizens, and the exhibit's attacks on so broad a spectrum of musical tastes only increased the possibilities for personal advancement and vindictiveness in an atmosphere rife with denunciation and betrayal.

The terms « degenerate art » and « degenerate music » were used to describe works of art and, in this case, music that was created by Jewish or Jewish-origin composers, works that featured either Jewish or African characters (Ernst Křenek's Opera, « Jonny Spielt Auf ! » , is a good example of this) , and works by composers who had different ideological backgrounds (for example, Hanns Eisler was thought to be one of the composers who should be persecuted because he was a communist) . This term has been applied as well to composers who maintained close relationships with banned composers (for instance, Anton von Webern) . In 1938, during the « Reichsmusiktag » (« Reich » 's Musical Day) , in Düsseldorf, Goebbels revealed the « 10 Commandments » for musical creation. These doctrines could be summarized as follows : music needs to have melody and be based on the folk element, and music was and is the greatest art in which Germany had excelled for many years. These basic doctrines were intended to make-up the core of Fascist ideology concerning musical creation. During the Düsseldorf event, a « degenerate music » exhibition was held in order to make the argument stronger.

On the other hand, « avant-garde » music was targeted as degenerate and out of Fascist context. The modernist idioms were thought to be against the ideas of Fascist ideology, mainly because melody was not a key-issue. This attitude resulted in quite a few composers and musicians leaving the country before the outbreak of the War, and many others escaped during the War. However, many of them suffered the consequences of discrimination and were sent to prison camps, where some of them suffered a tragic death.

Paul Hindemith secured an appointment in the « Reich » Chamber of Music, in February 1934. The post came as a result of his relationships with Chamber President Richard Strauß and Vice-President Wilhelm Furtwängler. Strauß had approached Hindemith back in November 1933 and inquired whether he would join the executive council of the composers' section in the Chamber. The appointment was subsequently widely reported. It also certainly entailed Goebbels' assent as president of the « Reich » Chamber of Culture. The appointment within the « Reich » Chamber of Music helped in other ways. It facilitated the above-noted discussions about music pedagogy with Robert Ley, Baldur von Schirach, and Bernhard Rust. It was much safer to interact with him now that Hindemith was a high-ranking official in the Chamber. The appointment also enhanced his reputation as a composer. At the 18 February 1934 concert, to celebrate the inauguration of the Chamber, his 1930 piece Concert Music for Strings and Wind Instruments was performed by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, along with works by Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, and others on the executive council. The event was billed as the « 1st German Composers' Day », and Hindemith himself climbed the podium to conduct his piece. As he noted in one letter :

« One really could not ask for more in the way of an official introduction. »

Many of the ensuing reviews of his piece were also glowing.

But the performance of his work at this high profile « Festkonzert » also elicited « outrage » from certain Nazi « stalwarts », and Hindemith continued to endure a rash of attacks. According to Pamela M. Potter, these arose-out of the political rivalries beyond his control, rather than out of any heroic acts of resistance on his part.

She stated :

« Rosenberg and Goebbels, for their part, displayed relatively little knowledge of music and showed far less interest in engaging in the æsthetic debates surrounding it, and even Goebbels's key-note speech for the opening of the “ Reich ” Music Days, in 1938, where he outlined the “ 10 Commandments ” for German music, was strikingly vague. »

Goebbels, as « Gauleiter » of Berlin, controlled the former City Opera in Charlottenburg, as well as the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which he transformed into the « Reich » Orchestra, and he exhibited more interest in administrative issues than in æsthetic policy. When he did engage in the latter, he proved inconsistent with regard to modernism - just as with the visual arts. Rosenberg also relied on aides when music policy was involved.

Of all of the artistic realms Josef Gœbbels claimed to have Germanized by the end of 1936, music was perhaps the most elusive. By its very nature, music usually conveys no clear messages or meanings, especially when it stands alone without any text, choreography, or other dramatic or visual cues. For this reason, it has been easier to assign arbitrary labels to music than to other forms of cultural output, but also more difficult to justify these labels. Thus, the progressive experiments of Arnold Schœnberg and his School could be designated as « Bolshevik » by the Nazis and « bourgeois » by the Soviets. Such elusiveness posed difficulties for using music as a propaganda tool : its ambiguity made it susceptible to arbitrary labels, but the same ambiguity could keep the labels from sticking. While Nazi ideologues such as Alfred Rosenberg and propaganda minister Josef Gœbbels were quite articulate in their views toward modernism in the visual arts, they had relatively little knowledge of music and showed far less interest in engaging in the æsthetic debates surrounding it. In the 12 years of the Nazi regime, government and Party interests never managed to establish any consistent æsthetic criteria for music, despite the loud out-cries against musical « Judaism » , « Bolshevism » , and « Americanism » . Furthermore, the Nazi system neglected to enforce effective measures to suppress those types of music it may have considered unacceptable.

The most coherent public presentation of any ideologically based musical criteria came in 1938 with the 1st « Reich » Music Days (« Reichsmusiktage ») , in Düsseldorf, and the accompanying exhibit on « Degenerate Music » , though even these events failed to convey consistent guide-lines and came into direct conflict with measures in practice. The stated purpose of the « Reich » Music Days was to foster communication between the creators of music and the public, providing a forum for composers, performers, bureaucrats, educators, and scholars to present their achievements to the « people's community » . The festivities lasted 8 days and were spread all over the city, including concerts at local factories sponsored by the « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF : Strength Through Joy) organization. High-points included Richard Strauß conducting some of his own works, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra's performance of Beethoven's 9th Symphony, and an address by Josef Gœbbels. The event should have been able to illustrate the differences between « good » and « bad » music, but even Gœbbels, a masterful orator in his own right, was strikingly vague in his keynote speech. The « 10 Commandments » he offered for German music in a half-hearted attempt to set the tone for the event provided only hazy notions such as : « the nature of music lies in melody » and not in theoretical constructs ; « not all music is suited to everyone » ; music is rooted in the Volume 9, requires empathy rather than reason, deeply affects the spirit of man, and is the most glorious art of the German heritage ; and musicians of the past must be respected. Gœbbels was not alone in his inability to put his finger on what made music German. For decades, or even Centuries prior to the Nazi era, music-critics, musicians, and scholars had written countless books and articles on the subject, but could conclude only that German music was distinct for its depth, clarity, and « that certain something » that made it recognizably German.

But what about un-German music or anti-German music - the music that was supposed to have been eradicated from Nazi society ? The « Degenerate Music » exhibit, a focal point of the « Reich » Music Days, was intended to teach Germans how to recognize destructive musical influences and root them out from the new State. Instead, the exhibit offered only a confusing array of « ad bominem » attacks, many of them self-contradictory. Furthermore, a look at how music functioned in the 3rd « Reich » reveals that even the most relentlessly attacked subjects of the exhibit survived the regime unscathed.

The exhibit was modeled on the exhibit of « degenerate art » shown in Munich 1 year earlier, and its purpose was to present a picture of negative Jewish and foreign influences that had threatened German music until the Nazi revolution succeeded in eradicating them. But rather than clearly delineating the difference between good and bad, the exhibit merely threw together a confusing mixture of anything construed as alienating, intellectual, sarcastic, erotic, socialist, capitalist, or American. The cover of the exhibit catalogue is only the 1st illustration of this « mélange » , depicting a black saxophonist, with the « Star of David » on his lapel, against a red background (a possible allusion to Bolshevism) . The image of the black musician immediately incites an aversion to racial otherness, his saxophone invokes the old worries that had peaked in the 1920's about American culture becoming too influential, and the Jewish star apparently is meant to divulge the manipulative power lying behind this destructiveness. Elsewhere in the catalogue, further examples of fear-mongering draw on various conspiracy theories that involve Jews, Bolsheviks, psychoanalysts, capitalists, and Expressionist artists. An unflattering portrait of Arnold Schœnberg accompanies an observation, notably by another Jew, that describes him as an explorer attempting to open-up new horizons by turning sounds of anguish and hysteria into music. A portrait of his student, Anton von Webern, an Aryan, is captioned with the comment that the student exceeds the Master « even in the length of his nose » .

« Gestapo » eyes and ears were everywhere. People were disappearing. What could Wilhelm Furtwängler do about the hell into which his country was now sliding ? If the true realm of music is above politics, he reasoned, then, someone must keep that realm open to those for whom every other means of redemption has been denied. He was not about to join a resistance movement, but music making itself now became a symbol of his own kind of opposition to Adolf Hitler and totalitarianism, and Furtwängler saw that this was his destiny.

This form of insurgency dwelt beyond the « Gestapo » 's « terrain » ; there was no concrete means of identifying it and, so, it could not be easily terminated. And here, perhaps, lay the secret to Furtwängler's phenomenal longevity throughout his peculiar kind of defiance against the regime right-up to the end : Furtwängler's realm was in the aural, the suggestive, the intangible, and the very impalpability of music shielded his unique style of sedition. While evidence could easily be produced against writers and visual artists from their own work, it was all but impossible to catch Furtwängler in flagrante « delicto » in his.

Josef Gœbbels was well aware of how Furtwängler was exploiting this chink in Party dogma and set about filling it by making the Nazi Ideal of acceptable music both explicit and tangible under his ongoing program of « Total Conformity » (« Gleichschaltung ») . He long since had succeeded in bringing to heel everything relating to literature, film, the visual arts, and the press. And now, in 1938, he set his target on music by sponsoring a Festival of German Music Days, in Düsseldorf, in conjunction with the city's 650th anniversary celebration.

The week-long « Musikfest » lasted from 22 May until 29 May and included more than 2 dozen events involving the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Hermann Abendroth, the Düsseldorf Municipal Orchestra, endless parades utilizing army units, the « Hitler Youth », labour groups, music students, and a variety of amateur instrumental and choral clubs. Richard Strauß' Opera, « Arabella », Hans Pfitzner's Cantata, « Of the German Soul », and Beethoven's 9th Symphony were among the large-scale musical offerings trotted-out during that week to affirm German identity at its highest and best. Musicologists from all parts of Germany were brought in for lectures, seminars, and panels to discuss the nature of German music.

Throughout the festivities, a side-show called « Degenerate Music » (« Entartete Musik ») was put on to demonstrate how savagely certain « elements » had ravaged German music. The idea first occurred to Hans Severus Ziegler, State Commissar of the Thuringian Theaters, when he saw the huge success accorded the exposition of « Degenerate Art » (« Entartete Kunst ») held in Munich a year earlier, in 1937. In that infamous exhibit, the works of such reprehensible artists as Pablo Picasso, Oskar Kokoschka, Vassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee, Emil Nolde, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Max Beckmann and many others were held-up for ridicule in one building, while the works of artists acceptable to the « Reich », such as Adolf Ziegler, who supervised the exposition, Arno Breker, Richard Scheibe, and Sepp Hilz were displayed for adulation in another. (Adolf Ziegler, incidentally, was no relation to Hans Severus Ziegler.) The latter readily saw how a corresponding exposition of « degenerate music » could serve a number of purposes - especially, his own-and he recruited the help of 3 friends from Weimar : Otto zur Nedden, Chief Dramaturg at the « Deutsches Nationaltheater », Paul Sixt, a young conductor, and Ernst Nobbe, the General Intendant in Weimar.

This lubricious quartet started their project without prompting from any government authority, but their ultimate aim was to gain Berlin's assent in more ways than one. Their overt intention was simply to heap scorn on Jews in music, although such « Aryans » as Paul Hindemith and Alban Berg were not to be spared. No « superior » « Aryan » musicians, however, were produced for contrast. Jazz and blacks were also special targets of the exhibit, and the cover of the exhibition booklet showed a thick-lipped, wide-eyed black-man playing a saxophone with a flat carnation shaped as a « Star of David » stuck to his tuxedo lapel.

The covert and primary intention of the show, however, was to produce a « trading-card » for its organizers that could be used in their tenuous dealings with the government. Ziegler took the lead in bringing the project to fruition because it was his idea and he had the most at stake. He had long been widely suspected of being homosexual, and « certain rumours » about his conduct in Weimar had brought about an official investigation, in January 1935. Such proclivities were a grave and frequently capital offense in the 3rd « Reich », and the grounds for the inquiry were sufficiently serious for him to be suspended from his duties as Commissar. Ziegler appealed to the highest-levels of the « Reich », in Berlin. A few weeks later, the press reported that charges against him had been dropped. Such an abrupt halt in official proceedings of this sort could have been authorized only at the very top. Indeed, Ziegler had many friends in the highest-echelons of the Nazi hierarchy, and he had known Adolf Hitler since 1925. And while the soles of his libido may have traversed the gutter from time to time, both his pedigree and his qualifications were far from down at the cuff. Born in Eisenach, in 1893, his father was a banker, and his maternal grandfather had founded one of the most prestigious and enduring music-publishing houses in the United States, Gustav Schirmer & Sons. Ziegler apparently inherited his musical gifts from his mother's side and developed them through advanced studies in organ, at Cambridge, England, and in cultural history in Weimar and at Greifswald University. He had been active in editing Nazi publications since 1924 and rapidly moved-up through various capacities in theatrical production and administration until his loyal work for the Brown-shirts was rewarded with the leading position in the Thuringian Theaters, in 1933.

Ziegler received a stern warning for his « peccadillos » and kept his job, but he apparently felt that his personal ties in Berlin could continue to exempt his drives from prosecution. Nonetheless, the pursuit of the love that dared not speak its name, at that time, was fast becoming more dangerous than exciting, and he realized his position was weakening. So, the idea of an anti-Semitic and anti-Black music exhibit flowered into a means of ingratiating himself and his cronies with top-level authorities.

A few months before the Festival was to take place, Ziegler presented the project to Josef Gœbbels and chief Nazi ideologue, Alfred Rosenberg. They both expressed great interest. Since the German Music Days were set to begin 22 May, they had to act quickly. In a rare moment of amicable collaboration, they agreed to include it as part of the festivities. Scores, posters, and other « proofs » of « degenerate music » were displayed in vitrines and along the walls of the exhibition, and visitors could enter private booths equipped with speakers to hear recordings of such worthless composers as Arnold Schœnberg, Gustav Mahler, Felix Mendelssohn, Ernst Křenek, and Paul Hindemith performed by such talentless artists as Fritz Kreisler, Emanuel Feuerrmann, Bruno Walter, and Otto Klemperer. The exhibit went on tour from Düsseldorf to Munich and Vienna, but Gœbbels forbade further press coverage when he foresaw its popularity and began to suspect Ziegler's real motive in producing it.

The German Music Days Festival was an unqualified success as a Party event, and the « Degenerate Music » side-show was well attended. But their long-range impact on Germany's populace was at best dubious. The « Degenerate Music » exhibition, in particular, represented little more than a contemptible joke among the informed and a repository of noisy curiosities to the ignorant. Nonetheless, what was indubitably odious to those who knew of Ziegler and his friends was the shameless spectacle this exhibit produced of one persecuted minority cynically flailing another with utter impunity. Wilhelm Furtwängler was invited to participate, but he and most of the other leading musical figures left in Germany steered clear of having anything to do with it. Absence, however, could not mitigate the pernicious enormity of what Furtwängler alone was now up against. The circus in Düsseldorf may merely have been hoopla, but he could not ignore the fact that the intellectual forces behind it and the exhibit could no longer be dismissed as Brown-shirt rabble-rousers. Intelligent, cultured individuals such as Hans Severus Ziegler and his friends not only were boarding the Nazi band-wagon but were now helping drive it. The very plexus of musical culture in Germany was becoming palpably « degenerate » .

Later that year, Furtwängler expressed how he felt about the « Degenerate Music » project and the base intentions of its creators by boldly presenting the German premiere of the suite from « The Fairy's Kiss » by Igor Stravinsky. He got away with it because music remained a somewhat murky area in Nazi ideology, despite the enormous expense both Josef Gœbbels and Alfred Rosenberg lavished on proving otherwise, and it resisted codification and made strict enforcement of policy rules almost impossible. This circumstance was peculiar to music alone in the 3rd « Reich » , and it further enabled Furtwängler to zigzag through that narrow gray zone with his own line of defense, always a whiff beyond Heinrich Himmler's Dobermans. But Furtwängler's performance of Stravinsky's bitter-sweet ballet music was the last time this « Bolchevist noise-maker » was heard in Germany, until after World War II.

The Nazis' take on « Degenerate Music »

An exhibition opened May 24th, 1938, in Düsseldorf titled « Degenerate Music » that aimed to galvanize public hatred of music deemed « un-German » by the Nazis. A current exhibition now reviews what the original showcased.

The National-Socialists' racial fanaticism left nothing untouched, including the realm of music, which they hoped to see ridded of all « un-German », « un-Aryan » influences. To drive the point home, an exhibition titled « Entartete Musik » (Degenerate Music) opened in Düsseldorf, on May 24th, 1938, as part of a week celebrating « national music ». Everything that was to have no place in the Nazis' musical culture was presented by way of audio snippets, pictures and accompanying texts.

The vilified genres included « Schlager », Operetta and atonal music (but especially music by Jewish composers) as well as jazz, dismissed as « nigger music ».

The exhibition became a starting-point for an unprecedented campaign against musicians and their music. None of the individuals included in the exhibition were allowed to continue their work under the regime. A ban on their work and playing their compositions was the 1st step, leading ultimately to physical pursuit and deportation.

« Effigies of wickedness »

The exhibition was intended as a deterrent, at least according to the intentions of Adolf Hitler admirer, Hans Severus Ziegler. The Nazi official and former director of the State Theater, in Weimar, organized the exhibition.

In a speech that opened the show, he said :

« What has been collected in this exhibition represents an effigy of wickedness - an effigy of arrogant Jewish impudence and complete spiritual insipidness. »

The title-page of the exhibition's accompanying brochure made Ziegler's intentions immediately clear to visitors. A perfidious caricature depicted « Jonny », a black jazz musician known at the time as the title figure in Ernst Křenek's Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Strikes-up the Band !), as well as through Friedrich Holænder's « chanson », « Jonny, wenn du Geburtstag hast » (When It's Your Birthday, Jonny), which Marlene Dietrich made famous in a pointedly erotic interpretation. On the brochure, « Jonny » had been mutated into a monkey, bearing the Star of David rather than a carnation in his button-hole. It would become a prominent figure within Nazi propaganda and the symbol of « degenerate » music.

« Jonny » in the spotlight

As early as 1930, Ziegler had fumed against jazz, saying the genre was helping black culture to « victory ».

Regarding Křenek's jazz Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » , debuted in 1927 in Leipzig to great success, Ziegler wrote in the exhibition brochure :

« A people that nears hysteria in its praise for “ Jonny ”, who has already shown-off much too long for that people, has grown spiritually and mentally ill, and is internally confused and unclean. »

The propaganda exhibition was similarly over-blown. Once celebrated, Jewish Operetta composers like Emmerich Kálmán, Leo Fall, Paul Abraham or Leon Jessel as well as star-singers like Richard Tauber were pictured with obscured faces and demeaned as mentally ill. Sound booths allowed listeners to hear Ist-hand the « corrosive powers » of jazz and swing music.

There were also displays offering polemics against Arnold Schönberg and his followers, whose atonal music was said to have « mocked Classical Masterpieces and flouted hallowed traditions » . Paul Hindemith was also condemned as the « theoretician of atonality » .

The « suspicious saxophone »

The exhibition in Düsseldorf ran through June 14th, 1938, and, then, moved in Weimar, Munich and Vienna. The outbreak of World War II, in 1939, prevented the addition of further stops.

While the Nazi exhibition « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) has been reconstructed and shown numerous times since 1945, « Entartete Musik » was long forgotten. It was not until 50 years later, in 1988, that the musicologist Albrecht Dümling created a commented reconstruction. Since then, the exhibition has traveled to more than 40 cities in countries including Israel, the Netherlands, Switzerland and, under the title : « Banned by the Nazis : “ Entartete Musik ” » , in the United States.

New scholarship on the Nazis' politicization of music, particularly with respect to jazz and Operetta, allowed Dümling to expand the reconstruction in 2007. Under the title : « Das verdächtige Saxophon. “ Entartete Musik ” im NS-Staat » (The Suspicious Saxophone. « Degenerate Music » under the National-Socialists) , there are now around 80 pieces in the exhibition and many original sound-clips. It's a nightmarish documentation that shows not just how the Nazis exploited music and how they defamed musicians, but also makes an appeal to visitors to be vigilant when words like « degenerate » are used to dismiss art.

MUSIC : It Wasn't Music to Their Ears : An exhibition re-creating the Nazis' 1938 denouncement of « degenerate » composers

In 1988, 2 German musicologists doing research at the Düsseldorf library stumbled upon evidence of a little known music exhibition that had been assembled 50 years earlier by Adolf Hitler's propaganda machine.

Newspaper archives revealed how Josef Goebbels, minister of enlightenment and propaganda in charge of film, music, theater and visual arts, with much fanfare had inaugurated in Düsseldorf a Festival of music (the « Reichsmusiktage » , or the « Reich » 's Music Days) in celebration of German culture.

But along with the chamber music programs, lectures and performances by the « Hitler Youth » singers and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Goebbels and his cohorts also organized, that summer of 1938, a small exhibition denouncing the composers of so-called « entartete musik » or « degenerate music » . It was part of the larger purge of cultural elements offensive to Nazi ideals, which included the infamous 1937 « entartete kunst » or « degenerate art » exhibition (subject of a current reconstruction at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art) .

Jews Arnold Schœnberg, Kurt Weill, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Franz Schreker, Ernst Toch and Hanns Eisler were ridiculed and maligned in « Entartete Musik » ; so was Alban Berg. Also on display at the Düsseldorf's « Alten Tonhalle » were pictures, posters, manuscripts and memorabilia pertaining to Paul Hindemith, the famed German pedagogue and composer who had married a half-Jew and whose Opera, « Neues vom Tage » , had enraged Adolf Hitler, and Austrian Ernst Křenek, a Catholic deemed politically undesirable because of his progressive musicality and outspoken views against the 3rd « Reich » . A special section of the exhibit denigrated jazz.

Fascinated with these findings, Peter Girth, then general-manager of the Düsseldorf Symphony (he had held a similar post with the Berlin Philharmonic) and Albrecht Dumling, music-critic for « Der Tagesspiegel » in Berlin, worked obsessively to reconstruct the exhibit. Their re-creation, which was included in a German 50 year retrospective on « degenerate art » , has to date traveled to 22 European cities, attracting large crowds in Vienna, Frankfurt, Zürich, Leipzig and Berlin.

Now, « Entartete Musik » comes to America, opening Thursday for a month-long stay at the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion. (The exhibit then goes to Chicago's Ravinia Music Festival.)

« There were many reasons to describe an artist as “ entartete ” and being Jewish was only one » , reflected Girth, who these days serves as general-manager at the State Opera House, in Darmstadt. »

« Stravinsky and Prokofiev were labeled “ Bolshevik ” and unsuitable ; still, others were politically undesirable. And, then, there were those who collaborated with Jewish composers. »

« The Nazis wanted music to be positive and nice-sounding and based on melodies that everyone could sing. » , added Dumling, speaking by phone from Berlin.

« The Nazis could not stand anything critical. They hated jazz because it did not belong to the German race. They hated syncopation and atonal music and anything dissonant. »

« They researched the biographies of each artist, and were delighted, for instance, to find that Anton Bruckner was pure “ Aryan ” from the peasant side. They wanted no mixture and no French or English blood. The life history of a composer became very important to them. »

Banned and persecuted in their homelands, several composers (and writers and musicians, including Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch) fled to America where they met with varying degrees of success.

Kurt Weill, hailed in Europe for his « Die Dreigroschenoper » (The 3 Penny Opera) , went on to earn considerable acclaim as a Broadway composer, while Erich Wolfgang Korngold's film-scores made him the toast of Hollywood. Refugee Arnold Schœnberg, reviled by the Nazis for his atonal compositions (and fired from his teaching post at Berlin's Prussian Academy of Arts) settled in Southern California, as did Hanns Eisler who later was deported for his communist sympathies. Emigre Ernst Křenek, now 90 and living in Palm Springs, remains an important figure in Europe, but has been largely neglected in Southern California.

« Much of the musical life of America is based on these emigrants. » , Dumling reflected. « What was a loss for Germany was a positive effect for America. »

« We worked so hard on this exhibition because it's important, especially with the re-unification of Germany taking place, not to forget the past so it will not happen again. And it is good for Americans to know that Germans are still looking back. »

During a recent phone conversation, Křenek said he 1st became aware of « antagonism » towards his music in 1927, when his most celebrated Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Strikes-up the Band !) was produced in Vienna.

« In “ Jonny ”, the Nazis objected that I brought in an American black-man as the main character. » , Křenek recalled. « They also objected to the music saying it was tainted jazz music, which it was not. At that time, I didn't know jazz very well, but we knew American entertainment music like George Gershwin and Cole Porter. Perhaps, there was some influence from that. »

« Reichsmusiktage »

The facts that Adolf Hitler's coming to power took place in 1933 near the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death (on February 13) and that the opening of the Düsseldorf exhibit « Entartete Musik » occurred only 2 days after the 125th birthday of the Master (on May 22, 1938) was, for Hans Severus Ziegler as for many Nazis, of deep, symbolic significance and a strong argument for the interpretation of Nazi politics as a long-expected cultural revolution. In a memorial speech given in Leipzig to open the Richard Wagner Year, in February 1938, Ziegler, alluding to the « Ring of the Nibelungen » , proclaimed :

« Through one of its best messengers, destiny once held before us, in an over-powering metaphor, the whole tragedy of the Siegfried-Being as an eternal warning. But, at the same time, and not in the least, through the creator of the work himself and his life's struggle, it has shown that the heroic principle (and that is the Aryan principle) will finally attain victory over all forces of darkness. »

With this, Ziegler placed Aryan heroism opposite Bolshevism and Judaism as the forces of darkness. The adjectives with which he characterized Jewishness corresponded mostly with those that Wagner had used for the worlds of Alberich, Beckmesser, and Kundry. In contrast, key-words for the luminous world of the Germanic peoples, as in « Parsifal » , were « rein » (pure) and « heil » (whole) . Both words have more than one meaning in German. « Rein » means not only « pure » but also « clean » . The notion of purification and cleansing (« Säuberung ») recurred again and again in Nazi propaganda. Thus, the book burnings of 1933 were supposed to cleanse the German spirit of the filthy literature of the 1920's. The double meaning of the German word « rein » (pure and clean) is worth noting. The Nazis exploited it by judging all intermixing as « dirtying » , as « impurity » . Their demand for racial purity became all the more plausible to the Germans since they had always understood « purity » as « cleanliness » .

In June 1936, the « Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein » (General German Music Society) , founded in 1861 by Franz Liszt, celebrated its 75th anniversary in Weimar, with both Ziegler and his colleague, Doctor Ernst Nobbe, director of the « Deutsches Nationaltheater Weimar » (German National Theater) , as members of the honorary committee. When they saw the program, they both immediately protested, claiming that it contained mostly atonal music. This protest, whose sharpness also was motivated by private reasons, led Josef Gœbbels to dissolve the « Musikverein » . With the « Reich's » Music Days in Düsseldorf, he created a substitute for the earlier « Tonkünstlerfeste » (Music Festivals) of this society. Part of the 1st « Reich's » Music Days, in 1938, was the exhibit « Entartete Musik » , initiated by Hans Severus Ziegler as a follow-up to his activities in Weimar, in 1930 and 1936.

In his opening speech at the Düsseldorf exhibit, Ziegler also played on the double meaning of the word « Reinheit » (purity) . As he emphasized right at the beginning, he was concerned with « a clean atmosphere and free and fresh air, where, in the future, the creative as well as the interpretative musicians of Germany, breathing freely, can live and work » . When Ziegler later juxtaposed the « pure » idealism of German artists with Jewish materialism, the charge of Jewish uncleanness almost went without saying. The audience that cheered Ernst Křenek's Opera « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Strikes-up the Band !) was considered by him to be internally so confused and « unclean » that it could no longer understand the « purity » and emotional depth of the 1st measures of Carl Maria von Weber's Romantic Opera « Der Freischütz » . As a counter-example to German purity, Ziegler also mentioned Křenek's Opera « Leben des Orest » (The Life of Orestes) , which he characterized as « rotten through and through » .

From his own Saxon-Thuringian perspective, Ziegler had singled-out Ernst Křenek, who happened to be highly-celebrated in Leipzig, as the main opponent. Arnold Schœnberg, as the father of atonality, also played a significant role in Ziegler's speech as well as in the exhibit. Because Ziegler proceeded on the assumption that music had to be grounded in the natural law of the triad, he (like Richard Strauß) judged atonality as charlatanism. The extension of harmony led to a devaluation of tonality and with that to its « Entartung » (degeneration) . It is, of course, a much disputed point in musicology how far the emancipation of dissonance really was a necessary consequence of the historical development of musical material. There is, nonetheless, no foundation to Ziegler's charge that with the transition to atonality, Schœnberg wanted to disavow the tonal works of music history or shut them off from youth. Likewise, erroneous is Ziegler's conviction that Schœnberg's « Harmonielehre » (Theory of Harmony) was a theory of atonality :

« Because atonality has its basis in the “ Harmonielehre ” of the Jew Arnold Schœnberg, I declare it to be the product of the Jewish spirit. Whoever eats of it, will die. Whoever learns in the school of Beethoven cannot possibly find his way across the threshold of Schönberg's work-place (" Werkstatt "). Whoever, though, has dwelled longer in the workshop of Schönberg, necessarily loses the feeling for purity of the German genius Beethoven. »

Ziegler apparently did not know how much Schönberg referred to the German tradition and to Beethoven, in particular, as a teacher. Thus, aside from the charge of atonality, the only criterion still remaining in Ziegler's charge referred to Schönberg's so-called racial group, which, indeed much too often, had to conceal the absence of any real stylistic criteria on Ziegler's part. Looking to the world of atonal music, he found still another instance of the Nazi world-view, which saw the Jew as an agent of pollution and degeneration.

Like the idea of « purity », the similarly ambiguous word « heil » also originated from « Parsifal ». It means « whole » and is, like the English word « whole », related to « holy » (« heilig »). As a noun, « Heil » signifies « health » and « salvation ». The « Heiland » (Redeemer) Jesus-Christ is the Saviour. Accordingly, in the German words « Heil/heil » meanings of holism, health, and salvation merge. This web of meaning and linguistic conjuring is what Ziegler had in mind when he called music « one of the holiest areas of our entire inner-being ». Thus, he implicitly named the idea of salvation that (similar to the cry « Heil Hitler ! ») could be traced back to Richard Wagner. What was expected from music was nothing less than the healing of the German soul.

Standing opposite these ideas of purity of blood and healthiness was the charge of « Entartung », which fixed the concept of « degeneracy » to a new norm, namely, the ideal of a music dictated by laws of racial origin. It goes without saying that under these conditions Schönberg's music could only be interpreted as « entartet ». Despite his 1933 lecture, « Brahms, the Progressive », where he deliberately opposed the nationalistic Wagner euphoria, Schönberg seems to have under-estimated the danger emerging from the ideology of the Wagnerians. Because Schönberg was not certain whether Wagner was a pure Aryan (there were rumours about Jewish elements in his family background), he thought, unlike his followers, Wagner had been relatively tolerant to Jews insofar as he allowed them the possibility of becoming « real Germans ». For Hans Severus Ziegler, this possibility of German-Jewish assimilation did not exist. For him, preserving purity of blood was a holy duty. Thus, it was no coincidence that Ziegler moved from Weimar to Bayreuth after World War II, where he saw a good deal of Hitler's patron, Winifred Wagner. Very symbolically, Ziegler chose his last place of residence in Bayreuth, on « Parsifalstraße » (Parsifal Street).

When Ziegler opened the exhibition « Entartete Musik » on May 24, 1938, in Düsseldorf's « Kunstpalast » (Palace of Art), he cited Wagner's essay « Das Judentum in der Musik » (Jewry in Music) in support of the undertaking. Making reference to the earlier exhibition in Munich « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art), held in 1937, Ziegler stressed that this new exhibition « should now bring about a clear decision for music as well : what was and is diseased, unhealthy, and highly-dangerous in our music and that, for this reason, must be eliminated ». Nearly everyone of note in modern music was anathema, among them Paul Hindemith, Alban Berg, Ernst Toch, Hanns Eisler, Ernst Křenek, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, Kurt Weill, and Igor Stravinsky. Since criteria of « race » were of prime importance, the stylistic spectrum of banned music was very broad, ranging from Léon Jessel's popular Operetta melodies and film hits by Friedrich Holländer to complex 12 note compositions. All sectors of German musical life were affected by the accusation of being « degenerate » : orchestral music and Opera, Operetta and cabaret, film and working-class culture, publishers and music-critics, concert promotion, musical education, and musicology.

The « Entartete Musik » exhibition was not universally acclaimed. In protest against the exhibition, Peter Raabe announced on May 15 his resignation as president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Chamber of Music) . His resignation, however, was not accepted by Goebbels nor was it ever published. Following this protest, no prominent musicians (with the exception of Paul Græner, Elly Ney, and Ludwig Hœlscher) came to the opening. Since Goebbels recognized that this was a more controversial issue than the Munich art-show, he decided to have this event publicized on a low-key. By June 14, the exhibit was closed prematurely. Subsequently, it traveled to Munich and Vienna as well as to the residence of its creators in Weimar. There, even Richard Strauß, who otherwise always tried to be on good terms with Hitler and Goebbels, dared to utter a few critical words. But because of the official character of the exhibition, open criticism was not allowed.

Geraldine de Courcy, in her report for « Musical America » under the head-line « Düsseldorf Exhibits “ Degenerate Music ”. “ Reichs Week ” Festival Displays Atonalists’ Works and Books of “ Cultural Bolshevism ” » , gave a list of the main-exhibits without even mentioning the racist tendency. The head-line in the « London Times » was much clearer : « “ Degenerate ” Music. Anti-Jewish Exhibition in Germany. » The article itself, however, seems to express some sort of sympathy with the organizers :

« The success which has attended the exhibition of “ degenerate art ” , in Munich and Berlin, has now led the German cultural authorities to assemble an exhibition of “ degenerate music ” , which was formally opened yesterday in Düsseldorf. The object of the exhibition is to illustrate the sorry plight of German music during the period of “ Jewish influence ” , from 1920 to 1933, and to show how this process of disintegration is now being checked. The organizers of the exhibition have made it possible for visitors to obtain both ocular and aural proof of the degeneration of German music during the post-War period. »

Whereas this article echoed British appeasement policy that preceded the Treaty of Munich, Arno Huth in his review of the Zürich premiere of Paul Hindemith's Opera « Mathis der Maler » was more open. After praising the new work as « the artistic credo of a great musician » , he wrote :

« The composition, which is national Opera in the very best sense, and gives powerful expression to a part of German history, German art and German mores, was lifted-out of the baptismal font in the very hour when Hindemith's scores were being pilloried in the Düsseldorf exhibition of “ Degenerate Music ” as un-German ! »

The inclusion of Hindemith in the exhibition, like that of Hermann Reutter, Hermann Erpf, and Igor Stravinsky, had led to critical reactions. For Hindemith, like Strauß, who, up to this date, had not dared to distance himself from Nazi politics, this exhibition made it perfectly clear that his place was no longer in Germany. In March 1939, he ended a letter from Los Angeles after expressing critical thoughts about the U.S. music industry (« This is a nightmare ! ») with these lines :

« The attitude toward artists in Germany is in line with all other actions of the “ Reich ” , which seem to be dictated only by megalomania, sadism, and shortage of raw material. I see myself as the mouse that frivolously danced before the door of the trap and that even went inside ; just by chance, (the mouse) was outside when the door closed ! »

In his « 10 Principles of German Music Creativity » (1938) , Josef Gœbbels proclaimed :

« Like every other art, music also arises from mysterious and profound powers, which are rooted in the national character. It can, therefore, only be produced and managed by the « children of the national character » according to the needs and the intractable musical urge of the nation. »

Gœbbels added :

« Jewry and German music, those are opposites, which by their nature stand in harshest contradiction to each other. »

The so-called primary emotional element of music was, thus, expanded to include the instinctive, the « intractable musical urge » , the natural, and the racial. Since the Nazis understood art as the expression of the « racial soul » and simultaneously declared the preservation of racial purity as their goal, they excluded Jews from the production and management of German, that is, Aryan music. Neither as interpreter or composer, nor as publisher, teacher, concert manager, or culture policy-maker were any opportunities left for Jews after 1933.

The regime aimed at keeping the musical representatives of the (Leo) Kestenberg period out of the limelight, and the Jews out of everything. This aim was so thoroughly achieved that in 1940 Herbert Cerigk could write with complete assurance in the preface to his « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » (Lexicon of Jews in Music) that « the purge of our cultural life, and hence also of our musical one, of all Jewish elements has been achieved » . From 1940 onward, the « purge » was even extended to the occupied lands of Europe, and such composers, conductors, and musicians as had not been able to flee ended their careers in Theresienstadt and Auschwitz.

Never before in any historical period had participants in the musical professions been so systematically and in such numbers silenced and exiled from a blossoming musical culture. These journeys into exile, mainly in 1933 and 1938, took them to all parts of the world, to Honduras or to Argentina ; to South Africa or to Hong Kong ; to the Soviet Union or to Australia ; to Turkey or the Philippines. Most of them, though, went to the United States, where some of them, such as Bruno Walter, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Franz Waxman, Alfred Einstein, Kurt Weill, and Paul Hindemith were able to get on brilliantly, whereas others, such as Arnold Schœnberg, Ernst Toch, Ernst Křenek, Paul Dessau, and Alexander von Zemlinsky were left to decline. Some were able to carry-on with their careers without any remarkable break, whereas others who had promisingly begun were left stranded.

Even as late as 1944, Karl Blessinger published an enlarged and revised edition of his « Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mahler : 3 Chapters on Jewry in Music as the Key to the Music History of the 19th Century » (1938) with the ideologically motivated title « Jewry and Music : A Report on Cultural and Racial Politics » . In the last chapter, the author now stressed that :

« The fight for or against “ Entartung ” in music is a very eminent political matter, indeed, part of the enormous world struggle within which we now stand. For that reason, the struggle for the final recovery of German music also reaches much further beyond the artistic-cultural arena. »

Until the bitter end, Nazi propaganda maintained that the War was instigated by the Jews and, therefore, had to be undertaken to defend German culture.

Inter-mixing of races was impermissible for the Nazis because this would (so, they believed) endanger the « purity » , « wholeness » , and « essence » of the German species. Since music was regarded as the expression of the soul, as the essence of the German being, racial laws were administered even more strictly in this domain than otherwise required. As of 1936, « one-quarter Jews » and their spouses were no longer permitted to remain members of the « Reichskulturkammer » (« Reich » Chamber of Culture) . As of 1938, attendance at German cultural events was denied to Jews. Non-Aryan and Aryan Germans were strictly separated from one another. In order to undo cultural assimilation, the Nazis, already in 1933, had stimulated the founding of a « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (League for Jewish Culture) . There, often exceptionally high-quality performances of works by, for example, Felix Mendelssohn, Jacques Offenbach, Gustav Mahler, and Kurt Weill, were given before exclusively Jewish audiences. This practice continued in an even more intensive form in the ghetto of Theresienstadt (Terezin) , that fortress near Prague where thousands of Jewish intellectuals and artists were interned from 1942 onward. In spite of the wretched living conditions, the inmates created new works and regularly organized concerts and Opera performances there. This astounding artistic productivity helped the prisoners to maintain their consciousness of the fact that they were still human beings in spite of all the humiliations and misery. It is only in recent years that these treasures have begun to be rescued from obscurity and made accessible. There is still much work to be done on the fatal consequences of Nazi cultural policies for music in exile.

Arnold Schoenberg had claimed in his 1931 essay, « National Music » , that only German and Austrian composers had influenced him. Although he wanted to be seen solely as a German composer before 1933 and solely as a Jewish composer after 1933, it would be difficult to trace his musical genius back to « racial » purity. Vienna was such a fertile and stimulating music city precisely because in the Austro-Hungarian multi-national State so many different influences met. In this sense and in deliberate opposition to the racial principles of the Nazis, Béla Bartók published in 1942, in the magazine « Modern Music » , his essay, « Race Purity in Music » . As a result of his research on folk-music, he compared the diversity of Balkan folklore with the limited musical variety in such parts of the Arabic world, where racial mixing was supposed to be less frequent.

Bartók came to the following conclusion, which certainly is not just valid for the Balkan peninsula alone :

« Contact with foreign material not only results in an exchange of melodies, but (and this is even more important) it gives an impulse to the development of new styles. The situation of folk-music in Eastern Europe may be summed-up thus : as a result of uninterrupted reciprocal influence upon the folk-music of these peoples, there are an immense variety and a wealth of melodies and melodic types. The “ racial impurity ” finally attained is definitely beneficial. »

Since the richness of the German musical culture had certainly also always owed a great deal to foreign influences, Johann Joachim Quantz, the flute teacher of the Prussian King Frederick II, explained the German taste as the « mixed taste ». This, and the very great variety in the later development of German music, stood in sharp contrast to the limited view of the Nazis and their goal of racial purity.

In what was generally a laudatory review of « Die Gezeichneten » (Opera in 3 Acts by Franz Schreker) , published in a special issue of « Anbruch » dedicated to Schreker and his music, in 1922, the music-critic Joachim Beck opens with a puzzling remark :

« In looking at a phenomenon like Franz Schreker, it seems to me necessary to keep in mind that there are 2 kinds of creative genius : the genius which starts something ; and that which is in decline. However, the exhaustion of this 2nd type can have something intoxicating to it as well. »

The notion that Schreker is a « genius in/of decline » (« deszendentes Genie ») may strike us as a strange compliment to begin with, but it is made even stranger by the fate that would befall « Die Gezeichneten » 16 years later.

The Nazi government put on the « Reichsmusiktage » in Düsseldorf, on May 22, 1938, Richard Wagner's 125th birthday. The event was organized at the behest of Josef Gœbbels, who sought, as his speech on the occasion put it, to elaborate « the principles of German musical creativity ». 2 days after the Festival kicked-off (with Richard Strauß conducting his « Festliches Präludium » in a new arrangement for orchestra) , the musicologist and director of the Weimar « Nationaltheater » , Hans Severus Ziegler, presented an exhibition entitled « Entartete Musik » , in deliberate reference to the exhibition « Entartete Kunst » , which had toured Germany the year prior to great success. The exhibition was intended to hold-up for ridicule and rejection much of the music of the early-20th Century, music that was either atonal, influenced by non-European traditions, or written or promoted by Jews.

Ziegler wrote in an essay accompanying the show :

« We, descendants of Richard Wagner, should possess the acuity to unmask the charlatans of the most recent past, who lorded over our Opera and concert life for decades. »

Schreker, who had passed away 4 years prior, was one of the most prominent of those supposed « charlatans » . The exhibition catalogue described him as :

« The Magnus Hirschfeld of the Opera world. There was no sexual-pathological aberration that he didn't set to music. »

Both the « Reichsmusiktage » in general and Ziegler's exhibition fell short of the organizers' expectations, perhaps not surprisingly. After all, « Entartete Kunst » had physically presented modernist visual art of the kind the Nazis deemed « degenerate » and had brought the German public directly face-to-face with the art the organizers wanted them to reject. The « Reichsmusiktage », by contrast, did not present any actual « degenerate » music, and, indeed, could not readily do so. Commandeering a few paintings by Max Pechstein and Otto Dix, slapping them into a lazy display, and counting on the average Fritz's knee-jerk aversion to all things abstract or formalist was one thing. Getting Orchestras to study, rehearse, and perform the music by Franz Schreker, Arnold Schœnberg, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, or Ernst Křenek, and risking people applauding at the end of the performance was quite another. Ziegler's exhibition, almost by necessity, relied on paraphernalia-posters, photos of composers, and the like. Ziegler's essay on « Entartete Kunst », printed as a kind of exhibition guide, features 17 images : The vast majority are unflattering photographs or cruel caricatures of (preferably Jewish) composers, conductors, and critics, a few others show stage-design or actual performances. There is only 1 picture of a score, from Weill's autograph of the « Dreigroschenoper » - with a note that we are meant to judge his hand-writing, rather than the music. In his May 28 speech at the « Reichsmusiktage », Josef Gœbbels conjured-up « a past we have at last overcome », of which « we can barely imagine any more that it was once reality ». And, of course, it was not going to be the job of the assembled musicians and Nazi-aligned composers and musicologists to bring-back into reality this spectral past. The composers (to say nothing of the performers and conductors) the exhibition insulted were silenced more thoroughly than Pechstein and Dix.

But there was another problem that made « Entartete Musik » a perplexing concept and undertaking. Gœbbels's remarks present a racialized æsthetic, unwittingly highlighting the fact that there were no purely æsthetic properties in « degenerate » music the Nazis objected to, analogous to, say, their allergy to all things abstract or subjectivist in the visual arts. In his speech, Gœbbels charged « Jewish elements » with « trivializing » the « German folk-song » ; he charges « Jewish cliques of publishers and conductors » with « falsifying the German Masters », rails against « kitsch and jazz », and praises a « new » German music that has supposedly replaced « the constructions of a barren, atonal expressionism » with true « artistic intuition ». As the phrase « barren, atonal expressionism » shows, it is unclear throughout Gœbbels's speech what kind of music he has in mind here (only the kind of person who made or championed it) : « expressionism » was, even then, a label only rarely applied to music, and the music it might plausibly be attached to was anything but « atonal », to say nothing of « barren ». Conversely, the atonal musicians attacked in the « Entartete Musik » exhibition were often concerned with the exact opposite of subjective expression.

Ziegler's own screeds, as close as « Entartete Musik » comes to theoretical under-pinnings, are similarly opaque. Kurt Weill, Arnold Schœnberg, Franz Schreker, the Operetta composer Oskar Strauß, Darius Milhaud, Otto Klemperer, and jazz-musicians are all and sundry attacked as « cultural Bolsheviks ». What features of their music mark them as such, Ziegler won't say. He mentions « foreign » tonalities and rhythms, but his essay cites not one musical example. Again and again, he appeals to « our German feeling », « our healthy understanding of art ». This contrasts with the case of the « Degenerate Art » exhibition, which clearly set itself the task of distinguishing a « good » (i.e. , Aryan) modernism and a « bad » modernism.

Another problem confronted by Ziegler and Gœbbels in putting-on their show is perhaps less immediately obvious, but becomes clear in view of Joachim Beck's review of Schreker, and the many like it in the 1910's and 1920's. Beck was not a Nazi, and his review was overall extremely positive. And yet, his invocations of « decline » and « exhaustion » uncomfortably anticipate the terms of Josef Gœbbels's exorcisms of « degenerate music » : the attributes that Beck admiringly attaches to Schreker's work are generally those that would lead the Nazis to suppress the Opera as « degenerate » music.

By dint of a peculiarity of music history, music castigated as « degenerate » found itself in a very different position than, say, the paintings expurgated from museum collections, or the books burned at Berlin's « Opernplatz » after 1933. There was a long tradition of querying Opera for possible « degeneracy » by the time the Nazis got around to it, so long in fact, that the medium itself had begun to grapple quite self-consciously with the label. What counted as « degeneracy », and what ought to be done about it, was no clearer than in the tirades of Gœbbels and Ziegler, but the term hovered as a threat over the Operas produced in the 40 years after Richard Wagner's death. They were, as the critic Leopold Schmidt said about « Die Gezeichneten », not just « works », but « questions » requiring positioning. This stems at least partially from the fact that much of the music the Nazis labeled as « degenerate » was modernist in only a highly-ambivalent sense, and often enough hewed quite self-consciously to neo-Romantic, 19th Century idioms - this was still very much the music of decadence.

By comparison, the kind of visual art that understood itself as somehow decadent or degenerate was several decades old by the time the Nazis staged their « degenerate art » exhibition in Munich, in 1937.

This peculiarity has also affected the reception history of the Operas silenced by Gœbbels, Ziegler, and their ilk. Not every work the Ziegler branded as « degenerate » had self-consciously grappled with the label. But those that refused to do so, the ones we label today as « avant-garde » (the music of Alban Berg, Arnold Schœnberg, and Paul Hindemith, for instance) entered or re-entered the musical canon with much greater ease after the War (in both Germany and the United States) , while works like « Die Gezeichneten », works understood as « genius in/of decline », had a much harder time doing so, and, in some cases, still remain in the wilderness into which Ziegler and his cohorts cast them. « Die Gezeichneten », for one, had its American premiere in 2010. While it may do (in the case of the visual arts) to simply reject the suggestion of « degeneracy » out of hand, this is not possible when it comes to Opera, whose works had obsessed over their relationship to decline, degeneracy, and decadence for nearly 40 years by the time the Nazi arbiters of musical « health » actually set about to decide which works were to be deemed degenerate, and which weren't.

But if the terms « degeneracy » and « degeneration » were everywhere in discourses about Opera after Wagner, there wasn't a clear narrative one could attach to them. Just who was degenerate, and what « genus » they were degenerating from, was subject to changes and slippages depending on the cultural politics of the day and the political orientation of the writer employing the concept. When the term « Entartung » had 1st attained currency in the wake of Max Nordau's book of the same title, it had attached itself above all to the work of Richard Wagner - that is, someone the Nazis were not very likely to attach it to. The fact that Ziegler and Gœbbels opened their « Reichsmusiktage » on the Master's birthday points to the fact that the « degeneration » they had in mind required a return to Wagner. In the decades since the composer's death, the general discourse around Opera had frequently suggested (even if not in the biologicistic terms of Nordau, Ziegler, and Gœbbels) that Opera had undergone something of a degeneration since Wagner, rather than with Wagner.

As Richard Batka put it in 1899 :

« What if Wagner's work of art was the peak of this development, and perfect in itself, such that every attempt at making him more perfect would be useless, and that every attempt to change it would necessarily lead to a degradation (" Verschlechterung ") of this wondrous artistic organism ? »

The anxiety-provoking possibility that they constituted a « degradation » was inscribed into post-Wagnerian music-dramas in ways entirely different from other musical genres or other arts.

Die Reichsmusiktage fanden vom 22. bis 29. Mai 1938 in Düsseldorf statt. Sie waren eine Veranstaltung der NS-Propaganda und standen unter der Schirmherrschaft von Josef Goebbels. Goebbels hatte ursprünglich eine jährliche Wiederkehr der Reichsmusiktage geplant. Diese wurden zwar im Mai 1939 erneut durchgeführt, entfielen aber nach dem Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs.

In der Ideologie der Nationalsozialisten wurde zwischen deutscher und nationaler Kunst auf der einen Seite und « kulturbolschewistischer » und « entarteter Kunst » auf der anderen Seite unterschieden. Inhaltliche und stilistische Argumente wurden dabei mehr und mehr durch rassistische Aussagen ersetzt. Die Nationalsozialisten versuchten die Gleichschaltung der Kunst durch Sonderveranstaltungen und Festspiele zu fördern und der Bevölkerung als das « Deutsche » nahezubringen. Hierzu gehörten auch die Reichsmusiktage, die am 22. Mai 1938, dem 125. Geburtstag von Richard Wagner, in Düsseldorf eröffnet wurden. Sie standen unter der Schirmherrschaft von Josef Goebbels, der sie als Veranstaltung für « musikpolitische Grundsatzklärungen und Weichenstellungen » bezeichnete. Die Veranstaltung dauerte vom 22.-29. Mai und wurde von Heinz Drewes, dem Leiter der Musikabteilung im Propagandaministerium, organisiert.

Im Rahmen der Reichsmusiktage wurde am 24. Mai 1938 eine Ausstellung im Kunstpalast am Ehrenhof in Düsseldorf eröffnet, die unter dem Namen « Entartete Musik », an die im Jahre 1937 zuvor in München stattfindende Ausstellung « Entartete Kunst » anknüpfte. Als Hauptverantwortlicher der Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » galt Hans Severus Ziegler, einer der frühesten Anhänger von Adolf Hitler und seit 1935 Generalintendant des Weimarer Nationaltheaters.

In dieser Ausstellung wurde öffentlich die Musik angeprangert, die nicht in die Weltanschauung der Nationalsozialisten hineinpasste, besonders die Werke von jüdischen Künstlern. Wie schon zuvor in München, wurden auch auf dieser Ausstellung in Düsseldorf abschreckende Beispiele von « entarteter Musik » vorgeführt. In über 50 Vitrinen sah man neben Büchern, Partituren und Bühnenbildern auch Fotos und verunglimpfende Karikaturen. Außerdem konnten per Knopfdruck Ausschnitte aus Schallplatten-Einspielungen der angeprangerten Werke angehört werden.

In der Ausstellung wurden neben Musikern auch Musikwissenschaftler, Musikdirektoren, Musikkritiker, Musikpädagogen sowie Dirigenten angeprangert und deren Werke und Schriften als « entartet » bezeichnet. Sowohl « nicht-arische »

Persönlichkeiten wie Alban Berg, Arnold Schönberg oder Kurt Weill als auch « arische » Musiker wie Paul Hindemith, der mit einer Jüdin verheiratet war, sowie Igor Strawinsky aus Russland waren verfeimt.

Die Ausstellung war in Düsseldorf bis zum 14. Juni 1938 zu sehen und wurde danach noch in Weimar, München und Wien gezeigt. Es gab dazu keinen begleitenden Katalog, sondern nur die als Broschüre gedruckte Eröffnungsrede von Hans Severus Ziegler im Düsseldorfer Kunstpalast. Auf der Titelseite dieser Broschüre war ein schwarzer Jazz-Saxophonist als Karikatur zu sehen. Provozierend daran war zum einen das bewusst überzeichnete Gesicht, im Kontrast zur Kleidung, Frack und Zylinder des Musikers, zum anderen aber auch der große Davidstern, der anstelle einer Nelke im Knopfloch prangte. Die Nationalsozialisten wählten diese fiktive Figur als Symbol der Ausstellung und auch der gesamten Reichsmusiktage 1938 als Inbegriff der Entartung. Die Karikatur erinnert an den schwarzen Musiker Jonny, die Titelfigur aus Ernst Křeneks Oper Jonny spielt auf, gegen die NSDAP-Mitglieder schon vor 1933 protestiert hatten.

Zum Höhepunkt der Reichsmusiktage zählte neben dieser Ausstellung auch eine « kulturpolitische Kundgebung » . Neben einer Ansprache von Reichspropagandaminister Goebbels und einer Rede von Gauleiter Friedrich Karl Florian dirigierte Richard Strauß selbst sein « Festliches Präludium Opus 61 » , ein Werk für Orchester und Orgel aus dem Jahr 1913, das er extra für diese Gelegenheit neu besetzte. Weiterhin wurden in ganz Düsseldorf auf verschiedenen Plätzen so genannte Platzkonzerte gegeben, musikwissenschaftliche Symposien sowie Fachtagungen von Komponisten und Musikpädagogen veranstaltet, wobei die Verkörperung und Darstellung des « Deutschen » in der Musikkultur diskutiert wurde. Es wurden außerdem insgesamt drei Opern uraufgeführt.

Eigentlich hatte Goebbels die Reichsmusiktage als feststehende, jährlich stattfindende Einrichtung vorgesehen, doch wurden sie nach einer Wiederholung im Mai 1939 wegen des Zweiten Weltkriegs nicht mehr durchgeführt.

Weder in Deutschland noch in der ausländischen Presse wurden die Reichsmusiktage 1938 als bedeutendes Ereignis wahrgenommen. Im Gegensatz zur vorausgegangenen Kunstausstellung im Jahr 1937 in München waren sowohl die Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » als auch die Reichsmusiktage als Ganzes für viele Mitläufer des nationalsozialistischen Kulturbetriebs ein Misserfolg. Da zumeist Künstler verurteilt wurden, die schon ins Ausland emigriert waren, konnte die gesamte Veranstaltung nicht direkt zu Beschlagnahmungen oder Verboten führen. Ebenso war die propagandistische Auswertung der Ausstellung damals begrenzt, die Reaktionen aus dem In- und Ausland waren eher bescheiden und zurückhaltend. Während manche Zeitungen immerhin ihre Verwunderung darüber aussprachen, warum so bekannte Komponisten wie Hindemith und Strawinsky als « entartet » eingestuft wurden, blieben die Reaktionen aus dem Ausland merkwürdig zurückhaltend. Die in den USA erscheinende Zeitschrift « Musical America » beschränkte sich lediglich auf eine Auflistung der als « entartet » eingestuften Werke und Komponisten. Die Londoner Times schien ganz im Zeichen der damaligen Appeasement-Politik sogar ein wenig Verständnis für diese Aktion aufzubringen. Der regimetreue Dirigent Peter Raabe, damaliger Präsident der Reichsmusikkammer, blieb den Eröffnungsfeierlichkeiten der Reichsmusiktage 1938 demonstrativ fern. Allerdings wurden solche negativen Reaktionen durch die nationalsozialistische Zensur von Presse und Rundfunk der Öffentlichkeit verschwiegen.

Paul Sixt, Kapellmeister, Dirigent, Komponist : geboren 22. Februar 1908 in Stuttgart ; gestorben 8. Januar 1964 in Detmold. Er war beteiligt an der Konzeption der NS-Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » .

Sixt studierte in Stuttgart und wurde danach Theaterkapellmeister in Weimar. Bereits seit 1930 gehörte er der NSDAP an. Seit 1935 war er Staatskapellmeister und seit 1936 Generalmusikdirektor in Weimar. Ab 1938 war er Leiter der Reichsmusikkammer im « Gau Thüringen » . Zusammen mit Staatsrat Hans Severus Ziegler konzipierte er die Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » , die am 25. Mai 1938 in Düsseldorf eröffnet wurde und in der und andere Igor Strawinski, die Zwölftonmusik und den Jazz als « entartet » denunziert wurden. Später wurde die Ausstellung noch in Weimar, München und Wien gezeigt. 1939 wurde Sixt Rektor der Musikhochschule Weimar.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg leitete Sixt zunächst ein Kammerorchester in Stuttgart und wurde 1950 Generalmusikdirektor in Detmold, wo er bis zu seinem Tode (seiner Vergangenheit ungeachtet) die Musiksparte des Lippischen Landestheaters leitete.

Nach dem Studium an der Hochschule für Musik in seiner Heimatstadt Stuttgart wirkte Paul Sixt von 1927 bis 1945 in Weimar, zunächst als Solorepetitor, ab 1935 als Staatskapellmeister und seit 1936 als Generalmusikdirektor am Deutschen Nationaltheater. Von 1939 bis 1945 leitete er zudem die Hochschule für Musik. Nach dem Krieg ging er in den Westen, wo er von 1947 bis 1951 Leiter der Volksoper in Stuttgart war, danach bis zu seinem Tod Generalmusikdirektor in Detmold.

Als Komponist schrieb er das 1930 in Altenburg uraufgeführte Märchenspiel « Schlumm » , das Werk « Etüden » , ein Streichquartett sowie Klavierstücke und Lieder.

Über die Leistung von Sixt als Dirigent hieß es 1964 im Nachruf des Deutschen Bühnen-Jahrbuches :

« Für das Dirigentenpult des Detmolder Landestheaters gab es keinen besseren geeigneten Mann als ihn. Die Wertschätzung von Sixt war systemübergreifend - 1941 hatte Josef Gæbbels in sein Tagebuch notiert :

“ Sixt reißt seine Staatskapelle zu einer begeisterten Wiedergabe der Lisztschen ' Preludes ' hin. ” »

Für Gæbbels Wohlwollen hätte Sixt nichts gekonnt, ein Künstler kann Menschen unabhängig von System und Weltanschauungen, unabhängig von ihren Taten und Untaten begeistern. Aber Sixt war nicht nur seit 1930 Mitglied der NSDAP, sondern auch Mitträger des Regimes und seiner Ideologie :

Ab 1938 leitete er die Reichsmusikkammer Gau Thüringen, ebenfalls 1938 hat er sich als Mitverantwortlicher der Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » in Düsseldorf hervorgetan, die im NS-Geist den Jazz, die Zwölftonmusik und auch einzelne Komponisten wie Igor Strawinsky verunglimpfte. Zudem widmete Sixt seine Komposition « Hymnisches Vorspiel » dem später in Nürnberg als Hauptkriegsverbrecher verurteilten Thüringer Gauleiter Fritz Sauckel. Obwohl die ganz großen Untaten erst durch die kleinen aktiven Rädchen ermöglicht werden, gehörte Paul Sixt zu den vielen, die in Ehren unbehelligt blieben.

Landestheater Detmold

Das Landestheater Detmold ist ein Dreispartentheater mit fünf Spielstätten in Detmold. Mit seinen Gastspielen in mehr als hundert Orten in Deutschland und dem benachbarten Ausland gilt das Theater als die größte Reisebühne Europas.

1820 entschloß sich Fürst Leopold II. , unterstützt von seiner Mutter Fürstin Pauline, in Detmold ein Hoftheater errichten zu lassen, und beauftragte damit den Landesbaumeister von Natorp. Die Grundsteinlegung erfolgte am 18. April 1825.

Nach nur siebenmonatiger Bauzeit hob sich am 8. November 1825 erstmals der Vorhang des Hochfürstlich Lippischen Hoftheaters zur Oper Titus, der Gütige von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Zum Direktor des neuen Theaters wurde August Pichler ernannt. Die angesehene Pichlersche Truppe war schon im alten Detmolder Komödienhaus zu Gast gewesen. Auf dem Spielplan standen sowohl Musiktheater als auch Schauspiel. Am Theater wirkten so berühmte Künstler wie Christian Dietrich Grabbe als Autor und gefürchteter Kritiker sowie Albert Lortzing als Sänger, Schauspieler und Kapellmeister.

Am 5. Februar 1912 brannte das Theater während der Aufführung des Stückes Der Bettler von Syrakus von Hermann Sudermann wegen eines schadhafte Schornsteins bis auf die Grundmauern nieder. Es wurde aber schon während des Ersten Weltkrieges 1914-1915 nach Plänen des Berliner Architekten Bodo Ebhardt neu errichtet. Die Finanzierung des Neubaus erfolgte mit Spenden der Detmolder Bürger und Geldern des Fürstenhauses. Die laufende Spielzeit konnte im Detmolder Sommertheater provisorisch zu Ende gebracht werden. Vor der Wiedereröffnung ging das Gebäude des Theaters in die Hände des Freistaates Lippe über und wurde am 28. September 1919 mit Lortzings Oper Undine wieder eröffnet.

Wie alle deutschen Bühnen mußte das Theater im Verlauf des Zweiten Weltkriegs, am 1. September 1944, seine Pforten schließen. Nach Kriegsende richtete die englische Besatzungsmacht hier ihr Offizierskasino ein. Der Spielbetrieb wurde daher ins Detmolder Sommertheater verlegt. Am 5. Juli 1952 erfolgte die Freigabe und der Spielbetrieb normalisierte sich wieder. Generalmusikdirektor wurde Paul Sixt, der 1938 mitverantwortlich für die Ausstellung Entartete Musik in Düsseldorf gewesen war.

Die 1843 gegründete Fürstlich-Lippische-Hofkapelle gilt als Vorläufer des Orchesters des Landestheaters. Das Schloß in Detmold war der Sitz des seinerzeit kleinsten deutschen Fürstentums Lippe. Die Regenten gründeten und förderten das Musiktheater derart, daß so namhafte Komponisten wie Albert Lortzing und Johannes Brahms ihren Wohnsitz in Detmold nahmen.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg übernahm das Musikensemble die Aufgaben eines Theaterorchesters im Landestheater Detmold mit den Schwerpunkten Oper, Operette, Musical und Ballett. Zum Programm des Musiktheaters gehören so anspruchsvolle Inszenierungen wie Georg Friedrich Händels Alcina oder Purcells King Arthur. Daneben kommen Opern von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Giacomo Puccini, Giuseppe Verdi und Richard Wagner zur Aufführung, sowie zeitgenössische Opern von Giselher Klebe, Hans Werner Henze und Udo Zimmermann. Die leichte Muse ist mit Operetten von Franz Lehár, Johann Strauß und Karl Millöcker und zunehmend mit Musicals vertreten.

Hans Severus Ziegler

The German publicist, intendant, teacher and Nazi Party official Hans Severus Ziegler was born on 13 October 1893 in Eisenach and died on 1 May 1978 in Bayreuth. A leading cultural director under the Nazis, he was closely associated with the censorship and cultural coordination of the 3rd « Reich » .

Ziegler was the son of a banker and, through his mother, the grandson of Gustav Schirmer. His grandmother, the American-born Mary Francis Schirmer, was a close friend of Cosima Wagner and from an early age Ziegler was attracted to the militant nationalism in which the Wagner family were steeped. Ziegler studied German literature at University, completing his education to doctoral standard. He became a journalist, writing mostly for extreme Right organs such as the « Deutsche Wochen-Zeitung » .

On 31 March 1925, Ziegler became a member of the Nazi Party, with his membership number being the comparatively low 1317. From 1925 to 1931, he worked under Wilhelm Frick in Thuringia, serving as deputy « Gauleiter » , from 1930 to 1931. In 1928, he was appointed head of the Militant League for German Culture. It was also Ziegler who, in 1926, came-up with the name « Hitler-Jugend » (Hitler Youth) for the Nazi youth movement. Ziegler was a close friend of the Schirach family and, in 1925, he introduced Baldur von Schirach, who would go on to lead the « Hitler Youth » , to Adolf Hitler.

Ziegler was associated with the hard-line racist wing of the Nazi Party, which looked to Alfred Rosenberg as its champion. In keeping with this Wing, he was particularly staunch in his anti-Semitism.

In 1933, Ziegler was appointed to the Council of State and as a member of the State Government of Thuringia. In addition, he served as President of the « Deutsche Schillerstiftung » and « Reich » culture Senator. In 1936, he was appointed the General Manager of the « Deutsches Nationaltheater » and « Staatskapelle Weimar » and State Commissioner for the State Theatre in Thuringia. In 1935, he was placed on leave whilst he was investigated for alleged breaches of Paragraph 175, the anti-homosexual legislation, although the case was dropped.

Ziegler played a leading role in promoting the Nazi vision of culture, particularly with regards to « degenerate » music. He was a strong critic of atonality, dismissing it as decadent « cultural Bolshevism » . He curated the « Entartete Musik » exhibition in Düsseldorf, with Karol Rathaus and Wilhelm Grosz amongst those receiving the strongest condemnation in the pamphlet he wrote to accompany the exhibition. Whilst working under Frick, in Thuringia, Ziegler had also overseen the removal of modern art pieces from museums and public buildings, and helped to bring about a crack-down on the « glorification of Negroidism » by restricting the performance of jazz music. Promulgated in his 1930 edict, « Against Negro Culture » , the Thuringian foreshadowed the co-ordination of culture that was to happen under the Nazi government. « Entartete Musik » would continue Ziegler's crusade against jazz, whilst also condemning Ernst Křenek's Opera, « Jonny spielt auf ! » as the archetype of Weimar decadence and miscegenation.

In the Soviet occupation zone, several of Ziegler's writings, as well as a book about him, were placed on the « Liste der auszusondernden Literatur » (List of banned Literature) .

After the War, he worked as a representative for « Gaststättenporzellan » and, subsequently, as a private tutor in Essen. He also directed a private theatre, from 1952 to 1954. Politically, he was active in the « Deutsches Kulturwerk Europäischen Geistes » , an extreme-Right study group established in 1950. In this role, he became a regular guest of Winifred Wagner, who regularly hosted such other far-Right luminaries as Adolf von Thadden, Edda Göring and Oswald Mosley.

...

Hans Severus Ziegler (geboren 13. Oktober 1893 in Eisenach ; gestorben 1. Mai 1978 in Bayreuth) war ein deutscher Publizist, Intendant, Lehrer und NS-Funktionär.

Hans Severus Ziegler wurde in Eisenach als Sohn des Kaufmanns und Bankiers Severus Ziegler und einer Amerikanerin geboren. Seine Schwester Eva sollte später den Dramatiker Otto Erlen heiraten.

In Dresden und Zittau besuchte er das Gymnasium. Vor Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkrieges diente Ziegler als Einjährig-Freiwilliger, wurde aber wegen einer Krankheit dienstunfähig geschrieben. Bis Januar 1919 tat er Lazarettendienst. Danach studierte Ziegler Germanistik, Geschichte, Kunstgeschichte und Philosophie in Jena, Greifswald und Cambridge. 1925 wurde er auf Anregung seines geistigen Mentors Adolf Bartels nach der erfolgreichen Verteidigung seiner Dissertation über « Friedrich Hebbel und Weimar » promoviert.

Zwischen 1922 und 1923 arbeitete er in Weimar als Sekretär des völkischen Literaturhistorikers Adolf Bartels und war zugleich Redakteur der Monatszeitschrift Deutsches Schrifttum. 1924 wurde er Gründer und Herausgeber der politischen Wochenzeitung Der Völkische und der daraus entstandenen Tageszeitung Der Nationalsozialist.

Ziegler war seit dem 31. März 1925 Mitglied der NSDAP mit der niedrigen Parteinummer 1317.[1] Zwischen 1925 und 1931 war Ziegler als stellvertretender NSDAP-Gauleiter des Gau Thüringen und von 1930 bis 1931 als Referent im thüringischen Volksbildungsministerium unter Wilhelm Frick tätig. Auf seinen Vorschlag hin erhielt 1926 auf dem NSDAP-Parteitag in Weimar die NS-Jugendorganisation den Namen Hitler-Jugend. Seit 1928 betätigte er sich in Thüringen auch als Gauleiter des nationalsozialistischen Kampfbunds für deutsche Kultur.

1933 erfolgte Zieglers Ernennung zum Staatsrat und Mitglied der Staatsregierung von Thüringen. Ferner fungierte er als Präsident der Deutschen Schillerstiftung und Reichskultursenator. 1936 wurde er zum Generalintendant des Deutschen Nationaltheaters in Weimar und Staatskommissar für die thüringischen Landestheater bestellt. 1935 wurde er kurzfristig beurlaubt, da eine Ermittlung wegen § 175 StGB gegen ihn lief, die aber eingestellt wurde.

Im Rahmen der Reichsmusiktage 1938 in Düsseldorf (zu deren Eröffnung Richard Strauß sein Festliches Präludium von 1913 dirigiert hatte) organisierte Hans Severus Ziegler in Anlehnung an die Münchner Ausstellung « Entartete Kunst » von 1937 (mit deren Organisator Adolf Ziegler er jedoch nicht verwandt war) die Ausstellung « Entartete Musik », in der er gegen Jazz und die Musik von jüdischen Künstlern und Komponisten polemisierte und deren Entfernung aus dem deutschen Musikleben forderte. Anschließend wurde die Ausstellung in Weimar, München und Wien gezeigt. Das Deckblatt der Broschüre trug neben der Karikatur eines schwarzen Jazzmusikers, der einen Davidstern im Knopfloch trägt, die Aufschrift : « Entartete Musik - eine Abrechnung von Staatsrat Doktor Hans Severus Ziegler, Generalintendant des Deutschen Nationaltheaters zu Weimar ». Bereits 1930 (noch als stellvertretender Gauleiter) hatte er mit einem Erlaß für das Land Thüringen unter dem Titel « Wider die Negerkultur, für deutsches Volkstum » seine diesbezügliche Gesinnung offenbart.

In der Sowjetischen Besatzungszone wurden mehrere seiner Schriften sowie ein Buch über ihn auf die Liste der auszusondernden Literatur gesetzt.

Nach Kriegsende arbeitete Ziegler zunächst als Vertreter für Gaststättenporzellan und dann als Privatlehrer in Essen. Von 1952 bis 1954 war er dort Theaterleiter des privaten Kammerschauspiels. Anschließend war er bis 1962 auf der Nordseeinsel Wangerooge als Erzieher und Lehrer im Internat des Arztes und Bürgermeisters Doktor Siemens tätig. Er unterrichtete am damals privaten, später staatlichen Inselgymnasium die Fächer Deutsch und Englisch. Außerdem leitete er die Theatergruppe der Schule, die jährlich im Kinosaal der Insel Aufführungen veranstaltete (zum Beispiel Raub der Sabinerinnen, Die Deutschen Kleinstädter, Prozess um des Esels Schatten, Wilhelm Tell) . Er agierte auch selbst als Schauspieler, meist in Hauptrollen. Daneben war er im rechtsextremistischen Deutschen Kulturwerk Europäischen Geistes tätig.

Nach seiner Pensionierung veröffentlichte Ziegler Beiträge und Bücher im rechtsextremistischen Umfeld und lebte bis zu seinem Tod im 84. Lebensjahr in Bayreuth. 1965 erstattete der Künstler Arie Goral Strafanzeige gegen Ziegler und dessen Verleger, den ehemaligen SS-Führer Waldemar Schütz. Zieglers im Vorjahr erschienenes Buch Adolf Hitler - aus dem Erleben dargestellt « verherrliche den Nationalsozialismus und strotze vor antisemitischem Gedankengut » .

Anlässlich seines Ablebens veröffentlichten die « Ehemaligen Schüler des Inselgymnasiums Wangerooge » in der Tageszeitung Die Welt eine große Todesanzeige. Ziegler war nie verheiratet und starb kinderlos.

Introduction

La place et le rôle des Arts dans un régime comme celui du 3e « Reich » ont toujours exercé une grande fascination parmi les historiens de la culture. Mais, cependant, les différents arts ne prêtent pas tous au même intérêt, il est aisé de le remarquer dans les productions d'histoire culturelle réalisées depuis 1945. On peut ainsi se rendre compte très rapidement que la majorité de ces écrits sont dédiés aux arts visuels et à l'architecture. Erik Levi, dans l'introduction à son ouvrage intitulé « Music in the 3rd " Reich " », le remarque d'emblée. (1) D'autres historiens se sont attelés à ce genre de statistiques : Helen Kehr et Janet Langmaid, dans leur bibliographie intitulée « The Nazi Era » (Londres, 1982) , comptent près de 30 livres parus après 1945 et consacrés à l'histoire de l'art, et 8 ayant pour thème central l'architecture. Le rôle des médias, et principalement celui du cinéma, n'est pas en reste : de nombreux ouvrages, souvent très détaillés, leur sont consacrés. En comparaison, la musique semble avoir beaucoup moins attiré les historiens ; preuve en est, seulement une dizaine de livres en langue allemande traitent exclusivement du sujet, parmi lesquels il faut citer : « Musik im dritten Reich » de Joseph Wulf (1962) ; « Musik im NS-Staat » de Fred K. Prieberg (1982) ; « Musik und Musikpolitik im faschistischen Deutschland » de Hanns-Werner Heister et Hans-Günther Klein (1984) ; ainsi que « Entartete Musik » de Albrecht Dümling et Peter Girth (1988) .

Ce constat peut paraître troublant : en effet, l'Allemagne est bel et bien terre musicale, berceau de compositeurs de génie, de musiciens exceptionnels, mais ne dispose pas d'une historiographie développée sur le sujet en ce qui concerne la période nazie. Plusieurs raisons peuvent, en partie, expliquer cette lacune, et elles tiennent à la spécificité propre de la musique, qui est probablement le plus abstrait des arts, et impose plus de difficultés, à un historien, pour montrer des parallèles incontestables entre musique et idéologie politique. Ces parallèles sont quasi-immédiatement visibles, et ce dans tous les sens du terme, dans les arts picturaux ou le cinéma. Il serait cependant faux et dangereux de conclure que des liens entre musique et idéologie politique ne peuvent être mis en valeur, sachant par exemple que le contexte social et politique a, sans conteste, des répercussions plus ou moins importantes sur la composition, et sur la réception des œuvres.

D'autres facteurs expliquent ce relatif désintérêt des historiens culturels pour la musique sous le 3e « Reich » : parmi ces facteurs, le manque de sources brutes. Le fait que le personnel musical de l'après-guerre est majoritairement celui de la guerre, et souvent déjà, celui de la République de Weimar, l'explique en grande partie. Il est ainsi très légitime de penser que la volonté de ces acteurs fut, en 1945, de réduire au maximum les éléments les concernant sur une période trouble, et sur laquelle on aurait été en droit de leur demander des comptes. Tous les historiens s'accordent sur la disparition d'éléments dans l'immédiat après-guerre allemand.

D'autres thèmes d'étude ont été dégagés, comme l'impact de la politique antisémite sur la vie musicale allemande, politique qui a conduit à de nombreuses émigrations, voire à la disparition de personnalités musicales éminentes. Au contraire, peu d'historiens semblent attirés par la biographie de musiciens, pour le moins importants, qui ont choisi de rester, et de collaborer peut-être parce que ces mêmes musiciens ont été les grandes pointures de l'après-guerre musicale, et que des investigations et déclarations historiques auraient pu déranger.

Ceci montre, sous de grands traits, la difficulté à peindre un tableau précis de la vie musicale en Allemagne nazie. Mais de suite, il faut souligner un écueil à éviter : à la fin de la Guerre, après la découverte de l'Holocauste, il fut tentant de lier toutes les activités artistiques en Allemagne, entre 1933 et 1945, aux Nazis. Ainsi, croire que la musique est entrée dans des temps obscurs sous le Nazisme serait une grande erreur : certes, le régime a été cruel et souvent intolérant, mais la musique s'est enrichie de nouveaux courants, de nouveaux compositeurs, d'œuvres qui ont bouleversé l'histoire de la musique. La musique ne s'est pas tus et n'a pas régressé ; au contraire, elle a continué son développement, et on peut aller jusqu'à affirmer que la poussée réactionnaire qui accompagne l'arrivée au pouvoir de Hitler favorise la création moderniste, débutée durant la République de Weimar. Il n'y a donc pas césure dans l'histoire de la musique en Allemagne au XXe siècle, mais bel et bien une vraie continuité, de même qu'il n'y a pas opposition entre la musique allemande, et celle des autres pays européens, ou même celle de la Russie de Staline. Tout au contraire !

Le but de cette étude est d'observer quelle était la vie d'un musicien en Allemagne nazie : quelles en étaient les difficultés, le contexte, les impératifs, ou les interdits. L'idée est partie d'un constat relativement simple sur 2 chefs allemands majeurs du XXe siècle : Herbert von Karajan et Wilhelm Furtwängler. Bien que de générations et de tempéraments différents, la Guerre les a fait se croiser, se déchirer, et tous 2 se trouvent dans la même situation face à la dénazification, en 1945. À la fin de la Guerre, tous 2 sont ainsi interdits de scène et accusés d'avoir servi le régime, pour être restés en Allemagne, et avoir continué à y jouer. Cependant, leur comportement fut totalement opposé durant ces années, Karajan flirtant gentiment avec le régime qui lance sa carrière ; Furtwängler, plus rebelle, s'opposant souvent à Josef Gœbbels, tout en occupant des postes d'administration dans la Chambre de la musique du « Reich » (« Reichsmusikkammer ») . Alors, comment est-il possible que 2 attitudes aussi éloignées l'une de l'autre, mènent finalement au même résultat ?

Cette étude s'intéresse aussi bien à des aspects politiques, qu'à la personnalité propre des 2 chefs mentionnés ci-dessus ; car cette dernière ne peut s'expliquer sans avoir examiné, au moins en partie, le contexte politique et social qui entoure le monde musical en Allemagne nazie. Il semble tout d'abord nécessaire de s'interroger sur l'idéologie et la politique musicale mises en place, depuis les courants du début des années 1930 (le modernisme face au conservatisme réactionnaire) , jusqu'au bolchévisme culturel ou à l'antisémitisme, liés dans la notion globale d'« Entartung » : la dégénérescence. Afin de faire respecter cette idéologie, le régime a mis en place une structure étatique, liée à des organisations culturelles très précoces, puis représentée par la « Reichsmusikkammer » et le Ministère de la Propagande, sur fond de luttes intestines entre politiciens, notamment entre Gœbbels et Alfred Rosenberg. Dans ce monde bouleversé, le chef d'orchestre s'inscrit dans un processus commencé depuis le début du XIXe siècle et qui l'affirme comme une personnalité majeure du monde musical, détrônant divas et virtuoses, et s'imposant sur le devant de la scène, puis au dehors, jusqu'à devenir une « star » . « Star » qui fait partie intégrante de la vie artistique, et donc, ne peut se cacher et faire fi de la situation politique de son pays ; tout au contraire, et ce principalement en Allemagne. C'est ainsi que Karajan et Furtwängler seront obligés de prendre position et de composer avec (ou contre ...) le régime, leur statut public les impliquant dans la vie artistique du pays, et donc, dans sa vie politique. Ils choisiront tous 2 des chemins différents, en raison de leur personnalité, leur arrivisme ou leur sentiment national, mais aucun des 2 ne sortira indemne de la période du Nazisme.

Idéologie et politique musicale

Attitudes musicales réactionnaires (1919-1928)

Au regard des années 2000, la République de Weimar, née en 1919, apparaît comme l'une des périodes les plus stimulantes de l'histoire de la musique du XXe siècle, une période où l'Allemagne semble abandonner les chaînes du Romantisme national et ouvrir ses portes à un nombre insensé de nouvelles expérimentations artistiques, comme la « Neue Sachlichkeit » (Nouvelle Objectivité) , la composition dodécaphonique, et les liens avec le jazz. La tolérance en matière de musique semble à l'ordre du jour, puisque l'Allemagne accueille alors une multitude de talents, allemands ou non, et ce particulièrement à Berlin, capitale musicale nationale, et rivale de Paris pour le titre de capitale musicale européenne.

Mais, cependant, cette variété artistique présente ne doit pas être idéalisée, car des réactions conservatrices existent parallèlement au progressisme culturel de Weimar. Ainsi, un environnement particulièrement turbulent se dessine, dans lequel 2 attitudes culturelles vont s'opposer. De plus, négliger le poids des forces réactionnaires en action dans la République de Weimar rendrait plus difficile à comprendre l'accession au pouvoir du Nazisme, et l'attrait de la population pour son programme culturel, déjà postulé dans les cercles conservateurs à la fin de la Première Guerre mondiale.

On peut discerner 3 grands types d'opinions culturelles conservatrices durant la République de Weimar. Premièrement, il existe un conservatisme traditionnel émanant des classes aristocratiques, des professions Libérales et des cadres, qui veulent préserver leurs statuts, tout en acquérant une position confortable sous la République. La seconde et la plus radicale des branches du conservatisme, largement alimentée par les intellectuels des classes moyennes, rejette l'ordre social et politique présent et en appelle à une révolution démocratique pour renverser la République. Enfin, à l'extrême-droite, se trouve une pléthore de nationalistes, de Partis politiques fanatiques et d'associations, qui entrent dans le débat culturel lorsque les Nazis émergent comme force politique influente, dans le milieu des années 1920.

La situation instable de l'Allemagne, en 1919, exerce un profond impact moral sur de nombreux musiciens influents. Celle-ci favorise l'ascension de jeunes compositeurs comme Paul Hindemith et Ernst Křenek, alors que les tenants du mouvement néo-wagnérien et Romantique tardif, incluant Max von Schillings, Siegmund von Hausegger et Hermann Waltherhausen, se sentent incapables de continuer à produire dans un tel contexte. Alors que Richard Strauß, regardé comme le compositeur allemand le plus influent, leur est un moment favorable, il semble cependant peu enclin à devenir un porte-parole du conservatisme ; son rival, Hans Pfitzner, prend alors une part active à la défense de ces principes. Aussi bien dans ses œuvres (comme la Cantate « Von deutscher Seele » , de 1921) , que dans ses débats polémistes, Pfitzner reste l'un des piliers de la réaction conservatrice, attachée à l'honneur allemand, a une identité nationale que la Première Guerre Mondiale, véritable catastrophe nationale, a réduit à néant. Ainsi, en 1920, dans le « Süddeutschen Monatshefte » (article intitulé : « Die Neue Ästhetik der musikalischen Impotenz. Ein Verwesungssymptom ? ») , Pfitzner attaque le critique Paul Bekker, qui dresse un parallèle entre les Symphonies de Beethoven et celles de Gustav Mahler. Mais Pfitzner y critique aussi la situation politique et culturelle ambiante, définissant la décadence artistique comme corollaire à la désintégration nationale, et assimilant « le chaos atonal » au bolchévisme » (2) . Il déclare aussi que la culture allemande est totalement au-dessus des menaces des « internationalistes juifs » . Sa position est strictement défensive : il veut protéger et conserver les intérêts allemands. Il est rejoint par Reinhold Zimmermann, dans l'article intitulé « Der Geist des Internationalismus in der Musik » , publié dans le journal antisémite « Deutschlands Erneuerung » . Zimmermann va plus loin que Pfitzner en développant une théorie du complot juif international mené pour détruire l'identité nationale de la musique allemande, citant Mahler et Arnold Schœnberg. Des échos de ces positions se trouvent dans des essais d'historiens contemporains, comme Karl Storck dans « Die Musik der Gegenwart », où il condamne Schœnberg pour son « chaos tonal » (3) et consacre un chapitre entier au « Problème Mahler », se concentrant sur les origines raciales du compositeur.

Malgré leurs efforts, ces tenants du conservatisme se sentent seuls et isolés dans leur croisade : le modernisme progresse et, en 1920, par exemple, le chef Hermann Scherchen fonde le magazine « Melos » pour promouvoir la musique contemporaine internationale, et l'« International Society for Contemporary Music » (ISCM) voit le jour en 1922. Le milieu des années 1920 et Bayreuth marquent un tournant dans l'histoire du conservatisme : en 1924, le Festival de Bayreuth rouvre, et après l'exécution de l'Opéra « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg », l'assemblée entonne spontanément l'hymne allemand, le « Deutschland über alles ». Durant les années qui suivent, Bayreuth devient le siège du conservatisme musical et une base d'attaque contre la République de Weimar : le « Cercle de Bayreuth », avec ses multiples associations (comme l'« Allgemeiner Richard-Wagner-Verein », ARWV), devient l'un des piliers du conservatisme musical et politique. Les positions du Cercle de Bayreuth peuvent être définies à partir du journal édité par le disciple de Wagner, Hans von Wolzogen, le « Bayreuther Blätter ». En 1921, par exemple, il publie un article élogieux sur l'essai d'Alfred Rosenberg, « Die Spur des Juden im Wandel der Zeiten » ; il salue le pèlerinage d'Adolf Hitler à Bayreuth, en 1923, occasion pour le chef du National-Socialisme de se lier avec la famille Wagner et le théoricien des races, Houston Stewart Chamberlain. Pour lui rendre hommage, le « Bayreuther Blätter » publie en couverture des extraits de ses discours. Le journal fondé par Robert Schumann, en 1834, le « Zeitschrift für Musik » (ZfM), sauvé de la crise économique par Alfred Heuß, devient lui aussi un écho des positions conservatrices, dissertant sur « l'influence juive dans les compositions allemandes récentes » (4). Plus tard, le « Zeitschrift für Musik » est requalifié pour attirer un lectorat plus important, il devient le « Journal pour le renouveau spirituel de la musique allemande ». Les éditoriaux deviennent chauvins et les articles dédiés à la musique contemporaine sont remplacés par des éloges de compositeurs conservateurs, Heuß condamnant l'influence de compositeurs étrangers sur la vie musicale allemande. Sa cible privilégiée est l'« International Society for Contemporary Music » (ISCM), établie, selon lui, pour que « les Français, les Juifs, et les Bolchéviques puissent torpiller la culture nazie, du dedans ».

À ce titre, le contrat que Schœnberg obtient à Berlin comme professeur de Composition à la « Musikhochschule », en 1925, aurait pu causer la consternation dans les cercles musicaux conservateurs ; mais, en vérité, peu s'intéressent à sa musique. Les conservateurs sont plus engagés contre la popularité croissante du jazz. C'est après que le jazz soit entré dans le monde de l'Opéra, avec l'exemple de « Jonny spielt auf ! » de Ernst Křenek (en février 1927), et le « Die Dreigroschenoper » de Kurt Weill (en août 1928) qu'une propagande active commence à être influente ; dès lors, le « Zeitschrift für Musik » condamne Křenek et Weill en leitmotiv récurrent.

Le modernisme musical et ses courants (1919-1933)

En 1923, Arnold Schœnberg présente sa méthode de composition sérielle qui assurera, selon lui, « l'hégémonie de la musique allemande pendant 100 ans ». Faisant référence à la germanité de sa musique, il se place dans la tradition musicale, qui va de Bach à Wagner, en passant par Mozart, Beethoven et Brahms - comme il l'explique dans un texte de février 1931, « Du nationalisme en musique » (5). Il s'oppose alors totalement à l'idéologie national-conservatrice ambiante en Allemagne. Ce même Schönberg, à l'origine de la musique atonale, suivi par Anton von Webern et Alban Berg, sera lui-même jugé dépassé par d'autres modernes, dès les années 1920 ; mais l'atonalité reste l'une des formes les plus importantes de la modernité musicale sous la République de Weimar.

Né à Vienne, en 1874, dans une famille juive modeste, Schönberg, violoncelliste autodidacte, est propulsé dans l'univers musical et artistique par le compositeur et chef d'orchestre Alexander von Zemlinsky, qui le prend sous sa protection. En 1904, Schönberg fonde le « Verein schaffender Tonkünstler » (Société des musiciens créateurs), dont la présidence est confiée à Gustav Mahler, lieu d'expérimentation musicale regroupant des créations contemporaines et un petit public d'artistes et de mélomanes, Société qui, malgré sa courte vie (une année), crée de solides liens entre les compositeurs. Cette solidarité est d'autant plus renforcée par le rejet massif par le public de la musique nouvelle, abandonnant la tonalité, rejet se manifestant au cours des concerts par des sifflets, et parfois même, des émeutes :

« En 1905, lors de la première du Poème symphonique “ Pelleas und Melisande ”, le public ne se contenta pas d'interrompre le concert par des sifflets, mais sortit en masse au beau milieu de la séance, en s'appliquant à faire claquer les portes. » (6)

C'est à l'époque de la « double trahison » (1908 : sa femme le trompe avec son ami, qui se suicide) que Schönberg abandonne les derniers vestiges de la tonalité dans son Second Quatuor à cordes, Opus 10, dont le 2e mouvement contient la phrase : « Alles ist hin » (Tout est fini) ; il compose le fameux « Pierrot lunaire » (1912), magnifiant le « Sprechgesang », et les 2 drames musicaux « Erwartung » et « Die glückliche Hand ».

Dans le souci de plus en plus pressant de rationalisation de sa musique qui est dans une impasse intellectuelle depuis quelques années (crise d'inspiration vers 1912, et repli sur la peinture), Schönberg commence, à partir de l'été 1921, à réfléchir de façon approfondie sur l'organisation des 12 sons. Cette entreprise de rationalisation l'amène, en 1923 (Suite pour piano, Opus 25), à ce qui est communément nommé « dodécaphonisme sériel », c'est-à-dire l'utilisation, toujours dans le même ordre, sans répétition ni omission, de chacune des 12 notes de la gamme chromatique, le nombre donné d'intervalles étant lui-même présenté dans un ordre strict (la série). On peut voir dans cette formalisation de l'atonalité à la fois un besoin personnel de cohérence formelle, mais aussi une forme de légitimation du système atonal par la procédure codifiée.

Mais c'est déjà dès 1908 qu'une rupture émerge entre les courants musicaux en Allemagne : le conservatisme de Engelbert Humperdinck, Ferruccio Busoni ou Hans Pfitzner, le mélange expressionnisme / impressionnisme (« Jugendstil ») de Franz Schreker et Alexander von Zemlinsky, et la démarche d'expérimentation de Arnold Schönberg. Ainsi, pour observer la diversité du monde de la composition musicale, il suffit de comparer les résultats musicaux obtenus face à une même source d'inspiration. La poésie de Georg Trakl est ainsi mise en musique par Paul Hindemith (« Die Junge Magd », Opus 23b, de 1922) et par Anton von Webern dans « Ein Winterabend », Opus 13 (1918) et les « Sechs Lieder », Opus 14 (1921). Les musiques sont écrites au même moment, sur l'inspiration d'un même poète, mais sont radicalement différentes (quand bien même étant toutes les 2 de la musique de chambre, ces cycles vocaux opposent « l'esthétique proche de Schönberg pour Webern, au dépouillement de l'écriture tonale de Hindemith » (7). Parallèlement, le « Jugendstil », qui domine en Allemagne depuis le début du siècle, est en déclin progressif, l'échec d'« Irrelohe » de Franz Schreker le démontre ; Paul Hindemith lui-même, un temps lié à l'« expressionnisme de Francfort » rejette, dès 1921, ses œuvres de jeunesse et le style musical auquel elles se référaient.

Schreker, Busoni et Schœnberg, seront ainsi remis en cause par leurs élèves ; avec eux, les 3 courants de 1908 fondent cependant des bases sûres pour la musique moderne : Ernst Křenek renverse la musique de Schreker, en opposant aux sujets vénéneux et sensuels et à l'orchestre touffu de son Maître, le jazz, la musique anti-Romantique et les sujets d'actualité. Weill s'oppose à Busoni, souhaitant une synthèse entre la tradition de Bach et Mozart et celle de la jeune musique ; dès son 1er Opéra, « Der Protagonist », Weill pose les bases de son esthétique : orchestre réduit, rejet de l'action dramatique traditionnelle, pantomimes. Hanns Eisler enfin, s'oppose à Arnold Schœnberg auquel il reproche son conservatisme et l'élitisme bourgeois de sa musique. La rupture a lieu après « Palmström », Opus 5, œuvre à la fois hommage et satire de la musique de Schœnberg, la musique d'Eisler évoluant alors vers des formes totalement différentes dès cette époque.

Paul Hindemith renonce définitivement à l'expressionnisme avec les « Kammermusiken », créées en 1922 sous la direction de Hermann Scherchen : la musique est plus forme que discours, indépendante de tout message, et devient objective par rapport à la subjectivité Romantique et expressionniste. La « Neue Sachlichkeit » est née. Dans sa forme lyrique, elle devient le « Zeitoper » ; qui se base sur des sujets d'actualité, et intègre des éléments fonctionnels jusqu'alors absents de l'Opéra (sonnette, téléphone, ...). Ce genre est créé par les Opéras de Křenek, et le « Zeitoper » se diffuse avec « Mahagonny » de Weill ; « Hin und Zurück » ou « Neues vom Tage » de Hindemith.

Dès 1926, le saxophoniste noir de « Jonny spielt auf ! » de Křenek, puis l'Opéra « Der Sprung über den Schatten », consacrent l'entrée du jazz dans la musique savante. Les rythmes du jazz attirent de nombreux compositeurs d'avant-garde : Darius Milhaud souligne, dans la revue « Anbruch », les possibilités nouvelles apportées par le jazz à l'orchestration (8). Parmi les pionniers de l'intégration du jazz, figurent Erwin Schulhoff et Paul Hindemith, avec le « Ragtime » pour orchestre ou la « Kammermusik » n° 7 (1921). Schulhoff compose, en 1919, 5 « Pittoresques » pour piano, avec « ragtime », « fox-trot » et « one-step », puis les 5 « Études de Jazz », en 1927, avec tango. Des élèves de Schreker sont également tentés : Wilhelm Grosz (« Jazzyband », pour violon et piano, de 1924) et Alois Haba (« Danses modernes » avec « Blues », « Boston » et tango). Schreker, lui-même, utilise le jazz dans son « Zeitoper », intitulé « Christophorus ». Mais c'est pour montrer la déchéance due à la drogue plus que pour l'utilisation même de la forme. Le jazz constitue aussi une partie de la carrière compositionnelle de Karl Amadeus Hartmann, avec la 2e Suite pour violon seul (1927) ou la « Jazz Toccata et Fugue » (1928).

Bolchévisme musical et « Kulturbolschewismus »

Le concept de « Kulturbolschewismus » (bolchévisme musical) naît dans les décombres de la Première Guerre mondiale, et fait rage tout au long de la République de Weimar. Au cours du temps, il devient partie intégrante de la critique culturelle conservatrice ; il est même utilisé par l'idéologie nationaliste, au même titre que l'antisémitisme, pour constituer l'« Entartung », la dégénérescence. Le bolchévisme musical dénonce, dès 1918 et en réaction à la Révolution d'Octobre en Russie et aux mouvements spartakistes en Allemagne, les compositeurs et propagateurs de la musique nouvelle, au rang desquels Arnold Schœnberg et Hermann Scherchen. Scherchen est un grand diffuseur de cette musique, fondant en 1919, avec Wolfgang Gurlitt, le frère de Manfred, la Société pour la musique nouvelle (« International Society for Contemporary Music ») ; celle-ci organise des concerts dans la galerie d'art berlinoise de Gurlitt. En 1922, la Société disparaît, mais Scherchen continue son combat, créant de nombreuses œuvres contemporaines comme la Ire Symphonie de Ernst Křenek (1922), la « Kammermusik » n° 1 de Paul Hindemith (1921), les « Drei Bruchstücke aus Wozzeck » (1924) et le Concerto à la mémoire d'un Ange (1936) de Berg. À cause de son engagement pour la musique nouvelle et de ses sympathies communistes, Scherchen devient alors « le bolchévique » par excellence, alors même que le NSDAP récupère en 1932 des chants russes qu'il a arrangés, en y ajoutant des strophes nationalistes ! Il est même qualifié de « politicien de la musique d'orientation communiste » (1932, « Zeitschrift für Musik »). Ce même Scherchen désigne dès 1919 Schönberg comme l'une des figures majeures de la musique du futur. Schönberg, qui, selon la revue « Signale », incarne « le bolchévisme dans la musique », est lui victime de son engagement atonal. En effet, l'assimilation entre destruction de l'ordre tonal et la gauche politique se poursuit en Allemagne. On parle ainsi, des années 1910 jusqu'aux années 1920, d'« anarchisme musical » pour décrire des œuvres comme « Pelleas und Melisande » ou son Quatuor à cordes, Opus 7.

Cependant, force est de constater que le bolchévisme musical n'a pas de définition claire, et tient « souvent plus de l'invective que de la critique raisonnée » (9). Selon le musicologue allemand Eckhard John (10), il relève d'un amalgame d'idées aussi diverses que : Schönberg, futurisme, expressionnisme, musique atonale, dissonance, anarchie, socialisation, maladie, impuissance, révolution, danger, menace ... Termes auxquels s'ajoutent 2 grandes idées du conservatisme politique : l'anticommunisme et l'anti-intellectualisme. La notion de bolchévisme est rapidement assimilée, dès 1919, au concept de révolution et de destruction de l'ordre : ainsi, le bolchévisme musical se trouve en rapport avec la destruction de la monarchie en Allemagne et en Autriche, car lui-même lié à la destruction de l'ordre tonal. Le terme de bolchévisme musical est donc très vaste, et il inclut des réalités musicales très différentes les unes des autres. Pour exemple, le « Zeitschrift für Musik » l'applique « au flot puant du futurisme musical de Schreker, Schönberg, Stravinski et consorts » (11), alors même que les compositeurs sont très éloignés musicalement dès 1922 : Franz Schreker dans le post-Romantique ; Arnold Schönberg dans le dodécaphonisme ; et Igor Stravinski dans le néo-Classicisme. La confusion est égale en politique : la critique musicale assimile toute idée de modernisme musical à celle d'une idée de gauche, révolutionnaire. Or, Schönberg était un fervent admirateur de la maison des Habsbourg, et s'oppose à son élève Eisler, très engagé dans la lutte politique de gauche.

Au milieu des années 1920, la notion plus générale et tout aussi péjorative de « Kulturbolschewismus » remplace celle de bolchévisme musical. Le bolchévisme culturel est l'apanage de tous les Partis bourgeois dès 1930, et il est transcendé par le Nazisme dans sa dénonciation de la dégénérescence. Le terme prend le sens d'« étranger et destructeur du peuple », en termes politiques et moraux. Il est associé à « la démoralisation (« Entsittlichung ») du peuple, à l'émancipation des femmes, au déchaînement de la sexualité, à la corruption morale de la jeunesse, à l'antimilitarisme, bref, à l'ensemble des phénomènes centrifuges qui parcourent la société allemande » (12). « Véritable psychose du satanisme », on lui impute même la « déchristianisation des masses » (se référer à Karl Fœrtsch, pasteur berlinois) (13). Kurt Hutten, dans « Kulturbolschewismus. Eine deutsche Schicksalsfrage. », paru en 1932, explique : « le bolchévisme culturel porte en lui cette conception de la liberté conduisant à un art de mauvaise qualité selon lui, il a pour corollaire la « sexuelle Entfesselung » (le déchaînement sexuel), et la déchéance morale et spirituelle. « Kulturbolschewismus » et « Entartung » vont donc de pair. Carl von Ossietzky résume ainsi :

« Le bolchévisme culturel est le dogme démocratique des frères Mann, un morceau de Hindemith ou de Weill. Tous sont des acolytes payés ou volontaires de Moscou. » (14)

Devenu mot d'ordre politique à part entière lors des élections du 5e « Reichstag », en 1930, le bolchévisme culturel envahit le vocabulaire politique. Il participe à la défense des valeurs chrétiennes soutenues par les organisations catholiques, et il est l'objet de débats radiophoniques ou au « Reichstag ». Les attaques contre le « Kulturbolschewismus » se renforcent après 1930, liées à la progression de la musique atonale de Schönberg, puis, à la popularité croissante du jazz, auxquelles s'ajoute dès lors une politisation des sujets musicaux chez certains compositeurs.

Déjà, en 1923, la polémique est lancée par le « Harmonielehre » de Schönberg, qui définit l'ordre dodécaphonique, même si celui-ci s'en était distancié en écrivant :

« Je suis un musicien, je n'ai rien à voir avec l'atonalité. »

L'idée est reprise par Berg, en 1930, mais l'argument ne suffit pas et les critiques continuent à voir dans l'atonalité, l'expression de la dégénérescence, poussant même jusqu'à rallier des musiciens de la nouvelle musique contre l'atonalité. La campagne contre le « Kulturbolschewismus » s'étend dès 1927 au domaine de la musique légère et du jazz. La violence contre le jazz est inouïe ; les haines et les pulsions se déchaînent. Les relations entre « la musique de nègre », la liberté sexuelle et le communisme sont données comme arguments contre le jazz. Le saxophone représente ainsi « le chant d'un nègre castré » et le jazz devient une menace pour la virilité de l'homme allemand. Le sentiment de haine contre le jazz atteint son paroxysme avec les « arrangements jazz » ou « Verjazzung » et, par exemple, la transcription de « Tannhäuser » en formation « charleston ». La forme même de ce style, sans chef, est décrite comme relevant du bolchévisme : on parle de « Kappellen-Kommunismus » .

Antisémitisme

Les Nazis, à travers leur programme antisémite, ont un but final : l'effacement total de toute influence juive sur la musique allemande. Le thème du « complot juif international » domine toute la période de la République de Weimar et celle du 3e « Reich » : cependant, si des statistiques de juin 1933 montrent que seulement 2 % de la profession musicale allemande est d'origine juive (15), la présence sur la scène musicale de personnalités controversées comme Schönberg, Weill, ou Klemperer aident les Nazis à renforcer l'idée que le complot juif domine dans le monde de la musique, et que seule l'extermination de toute influence juive et de toute réminiscence de la République de Weimar sauvera la culture allemande.

Quand ils accèdent au pouvoir en 1933, les Nazis ne perdent pas de temps et appliquent leurs propositions : des lois sont promulguées pour bannir l'emploi de Juifs dans les salles de concerts et les maisons d'Opéras. La musique de compositeurs juifs est progressivement supprimée des programmes de concerts et des diffusions radiophoniques. L'antisémitisme touche à peu près tous les éléments de la vie musicale en Allemagne durant la période, mais 2 grands aspects peuvent être particulièrement soulignés : l'élimination des musiciens et compositeurs juifs et la redéfinition du répertoire en une aryanisation de la musique.

Arrivé au pouvoir le 30 janvier 1933, Adolf Hitler commence sa politique d'élimination systématique des Juifs à partir d'une série de mesures législatives. Concernant le monde musical, l'acte le plus important est le « Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums », approuvée par le « Reichstag », le 7 avril 1933 : cette loi devient l'arme légale du gouvernement pour éliminer les Juifs de l'administration publique. Seules les personnes qui peuvent prouver leurs origines aryennes sont désormais autorisées à servir l'État. Dans la sphère musicale, cette loi barre l'accès aux Juifs aux maisons d'Opéras et aux salles de concerts.

Mais déjà avant cet acte, le régime nazi avait commencé sa lutte face aux musiciens juifs ou opposés au régime : le 7 mars 1933, Fritz Busch, opposé aux Nazis, est arrêté en pleine répétition de « Rigoletto » au « Dresden Oper » ; le 16 mars, Bruno Walter, d'origine juive et chef principal du « Leipzig Gewandhaus », trouve les portes de sa salle de concert closes par les Nazis ; 4 jours plus tard, alors qu'il doit donner un concert à Berlin avec le « Berliner Philharmoniker », il demande la protection du Ministère de la Propagande, et reçoit en retour un avis stipulant que le concert ne pourrait se tenir qu'avec un chef aryen : c'est finalement Richard Strauß qui dirigera le concert, se trouvant à Berlin au « Staatsoper » pour « Elektra ». Quelques jours plus tard, le journal nazi « Völkischer Beobachter » rapporte que Strauß a sauvé le concert comme « un salut pour la nouvelle Allemagne » (16). Walter quitte alors l'Allemagne pour l'Autriche, départ salué par la presse nazie (17). Une autre cible du régime est Otto Klemperer, chef influent durant la République de Weimar, directeur du « Kroll Oper », de 1927 à 1930. Klemperer prend parti pour la cause des « modernistes », et dirige régulièrement en U.R.S.S. L'opposition au chef devient très prononcée en 1933, lorsqu'il dirige une production controversée de « Tannhäuser » au « Staatsoper », pour le 50^e anniversaire de la mort de Richard Wagner. Fritz Stege, dans le « Zeitschrift für Musik », parle d'un affront à la mémoire de l'un des plus grands compositeurs allemands. La production est interdite par les Nazis après 2 représentations, et Heinz Tietjen, intendant du « Staatsoper », décide d'annuler les concerts de Klemperer à la « Staatskapelle ». Finalement, Klemperer quitte l'Allemagne le 5 avril 1933. 2 jours après, la loi sur le service public amène des départs en masse de chefs d'origine juive, comme Fritz Stiedry et Fritz Zweig à Berlin ; Jasha Horenstein à Düsseldorf ; Wilhelm (William) Steinberg à Francfort ; Gustav Brecher à Leipzig. De nombreux directeurs de Conservatoires sont licenciés : Bernhard Sekles à Francfort ; Walter Braunfels à Cologne. Pendant ce temps, de nombreux autres de leurs collègues ont déjà quitté l'Allemagne, comme Hanns Eisler, Ernst Toch ou Kurt Weill. La purge se développe partout en Allemagne (Schreker et Schönberg sont interdits à l'Académie de Musique prussienne), et dans les médias, la radio étant contrôlée par Josef Goebbels, Ministre de la Propagande. Le personnel de la radio, mais aussi de la presse, est épuré : les critiques Alfred Einstein, et Hugo Leichtentritt, par exemple, sont remplacés par des membres du Parti nazi. Quelques musiciens expriment leur désaccord face à l'épuration : Wilhelm Furtwängler, par exemple, qui écrit à Goebbels pour défendre Walter et Klemperer. Paul Schwers, dans le « Allgemeine Musikzeitung », soutient la lutte antisémite, mais craint les conséquences d'une épuration systématique sur la vie musicale.

Il faut également souligner que des exceptions sont faites lorsqu'il s'agit d'assurer une qualité artistique aux maisons musicales allemandes : Hermann Göring, qui dirige le « Staatsoper », garde les solistes juifs Igor Kipnis et Emanuel List. Goebbels, qui respecte Furtwängler comme musicien, accepte sa demande de garder des musiciens juifs au «

Berliner Philharmoniker » , du moins jusqu'en 1935, date à laquelle il revoit sa position. Mais, parallèlement, des listes de musiciens bannis par le « Reich » sont publiées dans « Die Musik » , les agents musicaux juifs sont interdits sur le sol allemand, les chanteurs juifs du « Sängerbund » sont licenciés. En novembre 1933, Goebbels dévoile la « Reichsmusikkammer » (RMK) , à laquelle l'adhésion est obligatoire pour exercer une activité musicale. Les lois de Nuremberg, promulguées en 1935, ont de sérieuses implications sur les carrières de nombreux musiciens allemands mais, sans être appliquées équitablement, Hindemith est condamné pour avoir épousé une non-aryenne, alors que Rudolf Wagner-Régeny reste applaudi du régime, bien que marié à une Juive.

Une propagande musicale antisémite se développe également, aussi bien dans les journaux, comme « Die Musik » , le « Zeitschrift für Musik » , que dans des ouvrages : « Der Kampf um deutsche Musik » de Karl Grunsky (1933) ; « Das Judentum in der Musik » de Erich Müller (dans : « Handbuch der Judenfrage » de Theodor Fritsch, 1932) . Le Parti nazi soutient un ouvrage rédigé par Herbert Gerigk, le « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » (1937) , très virulent, où l'auteur, éditeur de « Die Musik » et habilité à accéder aux archives de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , fustige nombre de compositeurs et musiciens : Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, entre autres. Karl Blessinger est un autre propagateur de l'idéologie musicale antisémite, à travers des essais tels « Die Überwindung der musikalischen Impotenz » (1920) où il attaque Mahler ; et « Judentum und Musik : Ein Beitrag zur Kultur- und Rassenpolitik » (1944) , qui résume l'ensemble de sa pensée.

Très vite après l'établissement de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , en novembre 1933, des directives officielles sont données pour interdire toute représentation d'œuvres composées par des Juifs. Des groupes au sein du Parti nazi, souvent loyaux à Alfred Rosenberg, rival de Josef Goebbels, souhaitent cependant des mesures plus poussées et donc, l'expurgation de toute influence ou souvenir judaïques » sur scène.

Ainsi, pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, un programme d'aryanisation du répertoire est mis en place, avec le soutien du Ministère de la Propagande. Cette décision a des répercussions principalement sur 3 compositeurs : Felix Mendelssohn, d'origine juive ; Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, qui a écrit ses Opéras avec un Juif, Lorenzo da Ponte ; et Georg Friedrich Händel, qui a utilisé les textes de l'Ancien Testament. Le régime encourage la création de nouvelles partitions pour remplacer la musique de Mendelssohn pour « Ein Sommernachtstraum » (Le Songe d'une nuit d'été) (18) . Les textes des libretti de « Don Giovanni » , « Così fan tutte » , ou « Le Nozze de Figaro » , sont retraduits en allemand par le musicologue Siegfried Anheisser, soutenu par Göring dès 1931, et publiés par le « Deutscher Musikverlag in der NSKG » , en remplacement de la traduction du chef juif Hermann Levi (19) . Hermann Stephani révisé le « Requiem » de Mozart, et efface les mots d'origine hébraïque, comme « Sabath » (20) . La situation est la même pour Händel.

Alfred Rosenberg déclare ainsi :

« Les œuvres religieuses de Bach, Händel, Mozart et Beethoven doivent être nettoyées de toutes leurs chansons de Jéhovah » (21)

Il décide donc l'aryanisation de la majorité des Oratorios de Händel, comme « Le Messie » dès 1935, ou « Judas Maccabeus » (nouveau poème par Hermann Burte en 1936 et Hermann Stephani en 1939, le rebaptisant « Der Feldherr »). Goebbels crée, en mai 1940, la « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitung », Chambre d'arrangement musical, qui transforme « Judas Maccabeus » en « Wilhelm von Nassauen » grâce à Harke et Johannes Klöcking. Ils arrangent également « Israël en Égypte » en « Mongelensturm » (1942), puis finalement, en 1944, en « Opfersieg von Walstatt » (l'Oratorio raconte implicitement la victoire du Prince Blücher sur la France, en 1813). Cette campagne d'aryanisation du répertoire a beaucoup de succès dans le « Reich », jusqu'en 1944, mais il est difficile d'examiner jusqu'où les musiciens suivent la « Reichsstelle » et utilisent les versions arianisées.

Se produit également une germanisation du répertoire qui passe par la représentation de compositeurs protégés par le « Reich » : Richard Wagner figure parmi les compositeurs lyriques les plus populaires, entre 1932 et 1940 ; la musique de Richard Strauß préempte pendant la République de Weimar et le 3e « Reich », comme celle de Johannes Brahms et d'Anton Bruckner ; Gustav Mahler est remplacé par Hans Pfitzner, compositeur du « Reich » ; Paul Græner et Max Trapp, membres du Parti, sont également promus, dès 1933, au rang des compositeurs les plus joués (22).

La purge du répertoire moderniste en 1933 et « l'affaire Hindemith »

Les maisons d'Opéra allemandes se trouvent souvent en difficulté économique durant la saison 1932-1933, et ainsi, les directeurs refusent de prendre des risques en programmant de la musique moderne. Non pas que cette musique soit subitement bannie : au contraire, juste après l'arrivée au pouvoir de Hitler, le « Staatsoper » programme le « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg ; l'Opéra de Kassel donne l'« Œdipe Rex » d'Igor Stravinski. Le chef Hermann Scherchen dirige des pièces de Anton von Webern et Ernst Křenek à Munich ; la « Suite lyrique » de Berg est jouée à Cologne. Béla Bartók, lui-même, vient à Francfort pour donner son Second Concerto pour piano, en février 1933.

Mais fin février, le climat change : Kurt Weill est banni et, 6 jours après l'incendie du « Reichstag », les Nazis invoquent la nécessité d'obtenir les pouvoirs absolus. C'est alors qu'ils vont se livrer à une purge sans égal dans le monde musical allemand : le 1er objectif est d'éliminer les Juifs, les sympathisants politiques ennemis, et les musiciens et compositeurs appelés « dégénérés » (« entartete »). En juin 1933, les Nazis ont mis à l'index une liste de « musiciens dégénérés », au rang desquels on trouve Arnold Schœnberg, surnommé « le charlatan sans racines ... quiconque en mange, en meurt » (Josef Goebbels) ; ou encore Kurt Weill, Hanns Eisler, Ernst Toch, Otto Klemperer, Hermann Scherchen.

« Comme l'Allemagne se redécouvre, s'estime à nouveau, il lui appartient d'avoir un art sain, un art qui peut l'aider, un art de nouveau Romantique. » (23)

« Romantique » est le mot utilisé, car tous ces compositeurs dont les sympathies se rapprochent du « Reich » veulent faire revivre cet esprit Romantique, au contraire des modernistes. La propagande de Græner fonctionne, et ainsi, des compositeurs Romantiques tardifs comme Georg Vollerthun (« Der Freikorporal ») sont programmés à Berlin. Le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » continue à combattre le modernisme, et organise des Festivals où est exaltée la musique de compositeurs membres du Parti. C'est en novembre 1933 que Goebbels, avec la « Reichskulturkammer », retire à Rosenberg son rôle purgatoire. Il apparaît d'abord suivre Græner dans la nécessité d'une renaissance d'un art national Romantique, mais dans un discours de juin 1934, il devient plus pragmatique par rapport au modernisme :

« Nous, Nationaux-Socialistes, nous sommes loin d'être démodés. Au contraire, nous pensons être les meilleurs porte-parole du modernisme le plus avancé, tant politiquement et socialement, que spirituellement et artistiquement. » (24)

Mais il oscille entre Libéralisme temporaire face à certains modernistes et attitudes réactionnaires quand le régime est en danger. C'est enfin en 1936, au Festival de l'« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » (ADMV), qu'il prend la décision radicale de bannir toute musique moderniste.

Le cas du compositeur Paul Hindemith est, à cet égard, significatif : Hindemith s'est acquis une réputation d'enfant terrible qu'illustre le coup d'éclat que fut le « Lehrstück » (sur un texte de Bertolt Brecht, 1929). Cette œuvre fit scandale lors de sa création, avec son thème de l'absence de solidarité entre les hommes, sa musique de cirque, et le lien qu'elle crée avec le public. Professeur de composition à Berlin, en 1927, Hindemith touche à tous les genres du modernisme, après avoir tourné le dos à l'expressionnisme : la musique de film (« Vormittagsspuk », 1927) ; le jazz (« Ragtime Wohltemperiert », 1921) ; l'Opéra constructiviste (« Hin und zurück », 1927) ; le « Zeitoper » (« Neues vom Tage », 1929). Déjà, avant 1933, les audaces de Hindemith lui valent l'hostilité de certains Nazis. Sa collaboration avec Brecht le classe dans le bolchévisme culturel ; en 1930, déjà, Wilhelm Frick, ministre de l'Éducation de Thuringe, gouvernement en majorité nazi, fait interdire ses œuvres dans la région. Hitler lui-même avait été dégoûté par la sexualité explicite de « Neues vom Tage » (25). Mais 2 facteurs l'aident à garder sa place en marge du régime : sa propre évolution, et le soutien qu'il reçoit de membres influents du NSDAP.

Hindemith se détourne ainsi du musicien à scandale, pour une écriture plus instrumentale (« Konzertmusik », Opus 48 à 50). Il se lie au poète sympathisant nazi Gottfried Benn, avec qui il écrit la Cantate « Das Unauffhörliche », Hindemith met un terme à ses expériences modernistes et revient à des formes musicales plus traditionnelles. Ce changement est salué par Gustav Havemann, membre du NSDAP et du « Kraft durch Freude », qui demande sa réintégration et lui propose un programme pour l'enseignement de la théorie musicale. Il coopère avec le pouvoir, reste à Berlin, et ne manifeste aucune réaction devant le sort de bon nombre de ses collègues, ni devant l'internement en camp du beau-frère de sa femme. Richard Strauß lui propose une place à la « Reichsmusikkammer » qu'il accepte en 1934. Avec sa « Konzertmusik für Streicher und Bläser », donnée pour l'inauguration de l'institution, puis avec la création de la Symphonie « Mathis der Maler », dirigée par Wilhelm Furtwängler, en mars 1934, il rompt avec son style antérieur. Mais Alfred Rosenberg dénonce la femme de Hindemith, Gertrud Rottenberg, d'origine juive, et ses liens avec les musiciens juifs Emanuel Feuermann ou Bronisław Huberman. Paul Zschorlich, dans le « Deutsche Zeitung » puis le journal « Die Musik » s'attaquent à lui : pour avoir joué pour l'« International Society for Contemporary Music », dominée par les Juifs, et chantre du bolchévisme musical » et pour avoir « déformé atonalement la glorieuse « Bayrischer Avanciermarsch » ».

Josef Gœbbels intervient personnellement pour la défense du compositeur, le 25 juin 1934 :

« Hindemith doit être reconnu, sans ambages, comme l'un des plus importants talents de la jeune génération de compositeurs. »

Mais la nouvelle organisation d'Alfred Rosenberg, les « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde » (NSKG) , amplifie les attaques contre lui (avec Friedrich Herzog, conseiller musical des « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde ») . Hindemith menace de s'exiler en novembre 1934, et un bref répit permet à sa Symphonie « Mathis der Maler » d'être jouée à Essen. Furtwängler publie alors dans le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » un article intitulé « Der Fall Hindemith » , où il défend le compositeur face à Rosenberg, espérant obtenir de Hitler l'autorisation de créer l'Opéra « Mathis der Maler » qu'il devait diriger. Furtwängler déclare que l'opposition n'est pas faite en raison de ses liens avec des Juifs, mais sur ses œuvres de jeunesse « douloureuses » .

Il conclut en demandant :

« Hindemith ne s'est jamais engagé en politique : où irons-nous si les méthodes de dénonciation politique étaient appliquées à l'art ? »

Destinée avant tout à faire reculer Rosenberg, l'initiative de Furtwängler reste vaine, et Gœbbels se range avec Rosenberg. Quelques jours après, Gœbbels, à travers le journal « Der Angriff » met en cause Hindemith, et Furtwängler est contraint de démissionner. Au Palais des Sports de Berlin, lors d'une réunion de politique culturelle du NSDAP, Gœbbels se lance dans une violente diatribe contre Furtwängler et Hindemith, louant la loyauté des artistes allemands au régime nazi (26) . Le soutien de Havemann, du critique Fritz Stein, voire de Richard Strauß lui-même n'y fait rien. En décembre 1934, Hindemith se met en disponibilité de son poste à la « Musikhochschule » et part en mission pour le gouvernement turc. Il déclare alors servir la culture allemande à l'étranger, salue en mars 1935 les « efforts intellectuels décadents de Schönberg » et prête serment à Hitler, le 17 janvier 1936. Il joue de plus en plus à l'étranger, mais le Ministère de la Propagande du « Reich » interdit l'exécution de ses œuvres, en réponse à la volonté d'Hitler d'une purification renforcée des arts. Hindemith démissionne de son poste berlinois et s'installe en Suisse, en septembre 1938, puis aux États-Unis, en 1940.

Il y écrira :

« En Allemagne, l'artiste se mesure également à l'aune de toutes les autres entreprises du “ Reich ”, qui semblent dictées exclusivement par la folie des grandeurs, le sadisme et le manque de matière première. Il me semble avoir été la souris qui danse stupidement devant la souris et finit par y entrer. Une fois ressortie, la porte s'est refermée. »

L'exposition « Entartete Musik » de Düsseldorf en 1938

Une atmosphère de grande répression musicale s'installe en Allemagne, en 1938, après des périodes ambivalentes face au modernisme musical. C'est la division musicale du Ministère de la Propagande qui applique des mesures strictes envers le répertoire contemporain, succédant au « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde », absorbé en 1937 par l'organisation « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF). Le 1er acte de cette politique est la réunion initiale de la « Reichsmusikprüfstelle », en décembre 1937, qui publie des listes de musiques considérées comme dangereuses pour la nation allemande (29), le jazz par exemple.

Un autre indice du changement de politique face au modernisme est l'organisation de l'exposition « Entartete Musik », qui s'ouvre en mai 1938, à Düsseldorf, en addition aux journées musicales du « Reich », les « Reichsmusiktage » de 1938 (30). L'idée est probablement liée à l'exposition « Entartete Kunst », qui s'est tenue à Munich, l'année précédente. Bien que la manifestation de Düsseldorf fait l'objet de moins de publicité au niveau national et international, elle demeure l'un des exemples les plus criants de la répression musicale durant la période nazie.

Le Ministère de la Propagande n'y joue qu'un rôle mineur, bien que l'exposition soit organisée pendant les « Reichsmusiktage » ; c'est Hans Severus Ziegler, dont la croisade contre le modernisme commence dès 1930, alors qu'il travaillait au Ministère de l'Éducation de Wilhelm Frick, en Thuringe, qui en est le principal instigateur. Ziegler siège, dès 1937, au « Reichskultursenat » de Goebbels, mais cela ne lui suffit pas : il décide de programmer sa propre propagande anti-moderniste, à l'écart des institutions officielles. Cela explique pourquoi aucun catalogue officiel publié n'accompagne l'exposition, « sorte d'affaire improvisée » (31). Pour le choix du matériel d'exposition, Ziegler s'est offert les services de Paul Sixt, chef d'orchestre, ainsi que ceux du critique Herbert Gerigk.

Les photographies et les portraits de compositeurs contemporains jugés dégénérés constituent l'élément principal de l'exposition. La sélection comprend des figures centrales comme Arnold Schönberg, Igor Stravinski, Paul Hindemith, Anton von Webern et Ernst Křenek, des « faiseurs de bruit » selon Goebbels, mais aussi des compositeurs d'Opérettes d'origine juive comme Oscar Straus et Leo Fall. Un slogan violent accompagne les œuvres, attaquant l'origine raciale et le caractère moderne de chaque compositeur. Par exemple, la légende au portrait de Stravinski par Jacques-Émile Blanche souligne le fait que les origines du compositeur sont suspicieuses :

(Qui a propagé l'idée folle que Stravinski descendait de la noblesse russe ?)

D'autres exemples de « dégénérescence musicale » sont données à travers les œuvres théoriques comme « Harmonielehre » de Schönberg, « Unterweisung im Tonsatz » de Hindemith, ou « Studien zur Harmonie und Klangtechnik der neueren Musik » de Hermann Erpf ; ou, encore, des magazines comme « Melos » et « Anbruch », qui, selon Ziegler, promeuvent la cause de la « musique bolchévique avancée ». Au milieu de la salle, une grande affiche dénonce l'influence pernicieuse du jazz.

La curiosité du public est cependant attirée par les extraits de musique « dégénérée » proposés sur des disques gramophone. 6 cabines spéciales sont construites tout particulièrement pour l'exposition, et le public choisit, en appuyant sur un bouton, d'écouter de la musique de Alban Berg, Paul Hindemith, Kurt Weill, Ernst Křrenek et d'autres.

Ziegler inaugure l'exposition avec un discours qu'il intitule « Abrechnung » (une vengeance, un règlement de comptes) . Le contenu de son discours a été publié dans un petit livret illustré de photographies provocantes ; la couverture représente un nègre jouant du saxophone avec une étoile de David sur sa manche. Ziegler utilise une citation du « Mein Kampf » d'Adolf Hitler pour justifier ce qu'il appelle : une croisade. Il offre une vision particulièrement colorée de la musique « dégénérée » , comme en témoigne cette définition devenue célèbre :

« L'exposition “ Entartete Musik ” présente l'image d'un véritable sabbat de sorcières et du bolchévisme culturel le plus frivole. C'est aussi le reflet du triomphe de la sous-humanité, de l'arrogante impudence juive et d'un complet abrutissement intellectuel. La musique “ dégénérée ” est ainsi, au fond, une musique non-allemande, pour laquelle la partie saine du peuple ne trouvera aucun organe de réception, aucune émotion et aucune réceptivité. » (32)

Alors qu'il concentre ses efforts principalement sur les produits musicaux de la République de Weimar, Ziegler souligne que ces forces « dégénérées » sont toujours en mouvement et représentent un véritable danger pour la vie musicale nationale, « même si elles sont en train de disparaître lentement » (33) . Il pense que l'exposition peut aider à clarifier les choses pour les générations futures, afin que « les musiciens créatifs d'Allemagne soient une nouvelle fois capables de respirer, de vivre et de travailler librement dans une atmosphère clarifiée » (34) .

Il essaie d'adjoindre à ses arguments raciaux des arguments plus musicaux : il croit en la beauté de l'harmonie diatonique et au bienfait de la mélodie simple, argument proche de celui que les Staliniens utiliseront pour condamner, quasi au même moment, la musique de Dimitri Chostakovitch. Mais bien que l'exposition attire beaucoup de public et que le livret de Ziegler soit publié, l'impact sur la vie musicale allemande est moindre. Une explication à cela peut être trouvée dans le rapport qu'entretient Ziegler lui-même avec les autorités musicales. En s'étant mis à dos Peter Raabe, en raison de son opposition au Festival de l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » en 1936, Ziegler ne peut pas compter sur l'appui de la « Reichsmusikkammer » . Raabe, alors président de l'institution, à la suite de Richard Strauß, se dissocie même totalement de l'exposition, et refuse de la visiter. De plus, comme l'exposition n'est pas organisée par le Ministère de la Propagande, la presse ne rend compte que peu du projet, se limitant à des rapports allusifs dans des journaux locaux. Mais la raison la plus importante est sans doute la date de sa tenue : en mai 1938, les intérêts nationaux portent moins sur la culture que sur la politique étrangère, suite à l' « Anschluß » et aux ambitions nazies sur la Tchécoslovaquie et la Pologne.

En tous cas, l'exposition « Entartete Musik » demeure une attaque explicite et organisée contre la musique moderniste, avec plus ou moins de résultats, mais elle exacerbe la répression contre les compositeurs contemporains, sur fond d'arguments raciaux plus que musicaux.

Musique et contrôle étatique

Les Ires organisations culturelles nazies

La mise en place du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (KfdK) a lieu le 23 février 1929, à Munich ; il s'agit d'une simple association, indépendante du NSDAP, comme l'a voulu son fondateur Alfred Rosenberg. Parmi les membres, on peut retenir l'architecte Paul Schultze-Naumburg, l'historien Adolf Bartels, Eva Chamberlain, Winifred Wagner, Alfred Heuß. S'inspirant du programme et des théories racistes de la « National-sozialistische Gesellschaft für deutsche Kultur » (NGDK), le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » lutte contre l'anéantissement du domaine culturel. Le rôle du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » est double : jusqu'à l'arrivée au pouvoir de Hitler, il est « l'instrument de lutte du Nazisme contre la République de Weimar dans le domaine culturel » (35) ; après 1933, et jusqu'en 1934, date de sa disparition, il participe à la « mise au pas » de la vie culturelle et encourage « à un art allemand conforme à la race » (36). L'extension du mouvement est rapide : de 25 à 240 groupes locaux, entre avril 1929 et janvier 1933 ; soit de 300 à 6000 membres ! Il dispose d'une presse, le « Mitteilungen des Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur », publié de 1929 à 1931, puis, le « Deutsche Kultur-Wacht » fondé par Hans Hinkel ; organe officiel de l'association, dès décembre 1932.

3 types d'intervention sont mises en place par le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » : des manifestations culturelles ; des conférences ; des interventions d'agit-prop contre la politique culturelle de la politique de Weimar. Dans une conférence en 1929, à l'Université de Munich, Alfred Heuß s'en prend ainsi à Ernst Křenek et Kurt Weill. Avec Heuß, rédacteur en chef du « Zeitschrift für Musik » (ZfM), le journal bascule sous l'égide du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » et propage ses idées : il participe ainsi à la campagne permanente contre le jazz. À partir de 1931 et la participation des Nazis au gouvernement de Thuringe, les interventions du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur », tant dans la presse que radiophoniques, deviennent très agressives. Les faiblesses de l'organisation se révèlent dans son indépendance face au NSDAP, bien que Goebbels l'ait reconnue, en 1932, comme organisation culturelle allemande et national-socialiste. Face à l'organisation implacable du Parti Nazi, elle se révèle faible et également en proie à des difficultés économiques et à des luttes intestines : elle doit se résoudre à accepter la primauté du Parti.

À la suite du jeu des alliances entre les Partis extrémistes et la Droite bourgeoise, Wilhelm Frick, membre du NSDAP, prend le contrôle de la Thuringe, comme Ministre de l'Intérieur et de l'Éducation populaire (1930-1931). Il appelle à son service 3 personnalités qui vont, dès lors, faire main basse sur la culture dans le « Land » : Hans Severus Ziegler, le chef du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » de Thuringe, nommé conseiller pour les théâtres, musées et établissements d'enseignement artistique ; Paul Schultze-Naumburg pour l'École d'Architecture ; et Hans F. K. Günther, pour l'anthropologie sociale à Iéna. Dès lors, le gouvernement prend des mesures radicales, parmi lesquelles l'« ordonnance contre la culture nègre », en avril 1930 (tout concert de jazz est interdit en Thuringe, les œuvres de Stravinski et Hindemith sont bannies). Entre 1929 et 1940, la part des pièces de théâtre et Opéras contemporains en Thuringe passe de 57 % à 14 %.

Bien que la présence des Nazis en Thuringe soit limitée dans le temps, les efforts de Frick sont largement remerciés dans la presse du Parti (37) ainsi que dans le « Zeitschrift für Musik », après que le journal soit passé sous le contrôle de l'éditeur Gustav Bosse et de Heuß. Accompagné de Fritz Stege, membre actif des « Deutschvölkische Freiheitsbewegung », organisation associée au NSDAP, le « Zeitschrift für Musik » devient rapidement au service du Parti, publiant des articles musicaux, mais aussi d'autres essais touchant à des thèmes politiques. En 1932, le « Zeitschrift für Musik » publie un article du « Deutschlands Erneuerung » où les Nazis sont décriés comme les seuls capables d'atteindre « de si grandes aspirations politiques » (38) . Les Nazis soutiennent ouvertement le journal : dans la section musicale du « Praktische Kulturarbeit im Dritten Reich » , Ziegler cite le journal pour avoir toujours défendu la musique allemande et nationale (39) .

Une autre organisation très rapidement contrôlée par les Nazis est l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » (ADMV) , fondée par Franz Liszt, en 1861, et destinée à protéger et favoriser la cause de la musique allemande. Durant les années 1920 et 1930, l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » propose, à travers ses Festivals, tout l'éventail de la diversité musicale de la République de Weimar, mais en évitant déjà certains répertoires « problématiques » . Après l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir, l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » purge son conseil intérieur des juifs et des sympathisants de gauche. Sous la direction de Peter Raabe et Siegmund von Hausegger, 2 membres actifs du Parti nazi, l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » montre une loyauté presque sans faille au régime, et expose sa volonté de parfaire les objectifs de la nouvelle politique culturelle (40) . Le programme du Festival de Dortmund, en juin 1933, est ainsi très vite modifié : les compositions de Walter Braunfels et Anton von Webern sont supprimées et remplacées par celles de Max Trapp et Hermann Unger, 2 membres influents du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » . Dès cette période, l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » montre sa volonté de s'affilier à la politique culturelle du « Reich » . Le Festival de l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » de 1934, qui se tient à Wiesbaden, explicite bien cet attachement : on célèbre les compositeurs du passé, et un hommage spécial est rendu à 3 compositeurs allemands : Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, et Max von Schillings. Le jeu de musique contemporaine programmée est presque totalement diffamée, comme en témoigne l'article de Friedrich Herzog dans « Die Musik » contre la cantate « Zeit zu Zeit » de Hermann Erdlen, l'accusant d'usage de « Sprechstimme » , « technique utilisée par le compositeur juif Max Brand dans son Opéra « Maschinist Hopkins » (41) . À cette époque, « Die Musik » devient le porte parole du « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde » de Rosenberg, destiné à succéder au « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » et à défier l'organisation de Goebbels. L'indépendance de l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » dans l'Allemagne nazie, alors que les autres organisations culturelles sont toutes coordonnées, suscite la méfiance des autres organisations.

La Ire offensive du « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde » contre l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » commence dans la seconde moitié de l'année 1935 : « Die Musik » critique vivement l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » pour son élitisme (42) . Gerigk va jusqu'à accuser l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » d'être infiltrée et contrôlée par les Juifs, citant la promotion par l'organisation du compositeur juif Ernt Toch, avant la période nazie. « Die Musik » attaque aussi l'influence moderniste qui se fait sentir, selon elle, dans l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » . Or, depuis 1935, l'organisation de Rosenberg montre avec succès des exemples de déviance par rapport à l'idéologie du Parti de la part de quelques artistes. Richard Strauß, par exemple, a été démis de ses fonctions à la « Reichsmusikkammer » (RMK) , pour avoir collaboré avec un Juif (Stefan Zweig) pour l'écriture de « Die sebwigsæue Frau » (la Femme silencieuse) ; Paul Hindemith a déjà quitté ses fonctions à Berlin. Le « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde » échoue donc dans sa volonté de voir disparaître l' « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » , dont Peter Raabe reste le président. Ce dernier réussit à apaiser les tensions avec le « Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde » et à appliquer la politique du Parti dans l'organisation. Mais s'annonce alors une phase de relative quiétude pour le répertoire moderniste : en avril 1936, Hindemith et Stravinski présentent leurs nouvelles œuvres à Baden-Baden, une « Arbeitskreis für Neue Musik » voit le jour à Francfort, faisant la promotion des compositions de Béla Bartók, Igor Stravinski, Serge Prokofiev, Albert Roussel et Bohuslav Martinů, qui avaient tous reçu des critiques de la part du gouvernement nazi. Plusieurs explications peuvent être avancées : tout d'abord, les Jeux olympiques de 1936 à Berlin amènent une relâche de la censure pour éviter des critiques de l'étranger ; de plus, les Nazis ne voient plus d'un mauvais œil l'internationalisme, et Richard Strauß lui-même, en 1934, essaie d'organiser un Conseil permanent de coopération internationale entre les compositeurs. Cette organisation représente une alternative à l'« International Society for Contemporary Music », que l'Allemagne avait quittée en 1933. Ainsi, la scène allemande est plus ouverte aux compositeurs étrangers, et Alfred Rosenberg le prend comme une attaque. La controverse s'envenime au Festival de Weimar, en 1936, pour les 75 ans de l'« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » ; Raabe veut monter le « Doktor Johannes Faust » de Georg Reutter ; l'intendant du Théâtre, Ziegler, s'y oppose en raison du bolchévisme culturel du compositeur et de sa musique atonale. Cependant, l'Opéra est maintenu, et Ziegler remonte jusqu'à Gœbbels, lequel répond en demandant la suppression dans la programmation de tous les compositeurs bannis. Raabe campe sur ses positions, et renie les accusations de Ziegler. Les implications de ces tensions sont considérables : Gœbbels n'assiste pas au Festival, et décide de casser l'indépendance de l'« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein », situation clarifiée le 22 décembre 1936 lorsque Raabe déclare que l'« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » est placée sous le contrôle de la « Reichsmusikkammer ». L'« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » survit jusqu'en juin 1937, avec les Festivals de Francfort et de Darmstadt, ensuite remplacés par les « Reichsmusiktage », Festivals musicaux nationaux dirigés par le Ministère de la Propagande. Ziegler sort renforcé des luttes, organisant en 1938 l'exposition « Entartete Musik » ; Raabe en sort extrêmement diminué.

Lorsque les Nazis arrivent au pouvoir, en 1933, la question n'est pas tant de savoir quand et comment former un corps pour la politique musicale, mais plus de désigner quel politicien va avoir le droit d'exercer le contrôle sur cette politique. Les protagonistes majeurs dans cette lutte sont : Alfred Rosenberg, l'idéologue en chef du Parti, et Josef Gœbbels, fondateur du Service de Propagande du « Reich », en 1930. En janvier 1933, Rosenberg se sent le plus à même de prendre en main la politique culturelle, ayant fondé le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » et gagné le contrôle du journal « Die Musik ». Mais Hitler hésite à donner à Rosenberg un pouvoir d'État, Gœbbels ayant été promu au Ministère de l'Information du peuple et de la Propagande, assurant « la reconstruction nationale du pays de nos ancêtres » (43). Mais les ambitions de Gœbbels vont plus loin que la propagande, il souhaite diriger les affaires culturelles du pays, de la radio au théâtre, en passant par la presse culturelle.

Il est contré dans son projet par Rosenberg, mais aussi par d'autres membres du cabinet d'Hitler, le « Führer » n'ayant pas délimité les sphères de pouvoir précises de chacun de ses ministres. Hermann Göring, par exemple, veut diriger tous les théâtres du pays, fondant la « Preussischer Theaterausschuß ». Comme Ministre de Prusse, il demande à exercer son plein droit sur les maisons du « Preussisches Staatstheater », qui inclut le « Berliner Staatsoper », empiétant ainsi sur les fonctions de Gœbbels, tout juste nommé « Gauleiter » de Berlin.

Gœbbels doit également faire face à Bernhard Rust, Ministre de l'Éducation de Prusse, qui se dit spécialiste en musique et organise, en juin 1933, une commission de censure des œuvres jouées à Berlin, avec Max von Schillings, Georg Kulenkampff et Wilhelm Furtwängler. Robert Ley, le leader du « Deutsche Arbeitfront » (DAF) joue un rôle encore plus dangereux : le « Deutsche Arbeitfront » a réduit la puissance des syndicats et gagné le ralliement des travailleurs, parmi lesquels nombre de musiciens. Naturellement, ces rivalités internes au Parti rendent plus difficile encore la mise en place d'une politique culturelle cohérente. De nombreux musiciens veulent apporter leur soutien au « Reich » et ainsi, achever la « Gleichschaltung » - la coordination de la vie musicale : Paul Græner, Max von Schillings ... Ce dernier est félicité par Hitler et autorisé à participer à la réorganisation de la vie musicale dans le pays (44) . Il obtient le poste de Président de l'Académie des Arts de Prusse, et doit purger l'assemblée des membres indésirables, licenciant au passage Arnold Schönberg et Franz Schreker. Il prend également le poste d'Intendant du « Städtische Oper » de Berlin, en succession à Carl Ebert, victime des purges. Il meurt en juillet 1933, Goebbels est débarrassé d'un rival.

D'autres veulent aussi participer activement à la « Gleichschaltung » : le critique Fritz Stege qui crée le « Arbeitsgemeinschaft Deutscher Musikkritiker » ; ou encore, le violoniste et chef d'orchestre Gustav Havemann, membre de la section berlinoise du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » . Pendant l'été 1932, il rédige un plan d'organisation d'une Chambre de la Musique, avec Friedrich Mahling, Max Trapp et Paul Græner. Mais ses plans échouent, malgré des débuts de négociations. Le 10 mai 1933, il fonde le « Reichskartell der deutschen Musikerschaft » . Le 4 juillet, l'organisation propose la mise en place de cartes nécessaires pour l'accès à des fonctions musicales, et obtenues après contrôle racial et politique. Ce projet reçoit l'approbation du Parti, mais Havemann doit faire face au « Deutsche Arbeitfront » de Robert Ley, qui inclut la plus grande union professionnelle de musiciens allemands, la « Deutsche Musikerverband » , avec ses 20,000 membres.

Goebbels prépare aussi ses plans : il se rapproche du pouvoir lorsque Hitler décrète que le Ministre de la Propagande a le pouvoir de s'occuper de « toutes les sphères qui influencent l'esprit, incluant un pouvoir absolu sur les affaires culturelles » (45) . Goebbels demande à Hitler d'accepter son projet de « Reichskulturkammer » (RKK) , qui serait apte à superviser toutes les activités intellectuelles et culturelles du pays. Parallèlement, la lutte entre Rosenberg et Goebbels s'intensifie : les 2 hommes s'opposent sur le pouvoir, mais aussi au niveau de la politique culturelle. Rosenberg est très réactionnaire, totalement opposé au modernisme ; Goebbels, au contraire, paraît moins attaché à des principes idéologiques et privilégie l'action.

À cette date, Hitler a peu confiance en Rosenberg pour diriger la politique artistique du pays.

Goebbels écrit ainsi dans son journal, le 19 juillet 1933 :

« Hitler parle aigrement contre Rosenberg, parce qu'il réussit tout et n'importe quoi (" alles und nichts ") » (46)

Rosenberg, dans le même temps, reprend à son compte l'organisation de la « Reichskulturkammer » en l'appliquant à son « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » , assignant à chaque personnalité la responsabilité d'un secteur, comme l'Opéra, la musique dans les écoles, la musique religieuse, etc. Goebbels recherche le soutien d'autres hommes influents dans sa lutte contre Rosenberg, alors que Hitler, dans son discours sur la culture au Congrès de Nuremberg, le 1er septembre 1933, prône le compromis et le consensus. C'est finalement le 22 septembre qu'il se prononce pour Goebbels, et la « Reichskulturkammer » , incluant la « Reichsmusikkammer » , est créée et inaugurée le 15 novembre à Berlin.

Entre temps, Goebbels s'est réconcilié avec Hermann Göring, qui a dissout la « Preussischer Theaterausschuß » mais garde le contrôle sur le « Berliner Staatsoper ». Goebbels s'allie avec le « Deutsche Arbeitfront » de Ley, attachant ses membres à la « Reichsmusikkammer ». La mise en place de la « Reichsmusikkammer » annonce la fin du « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » et de l'« Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein », à plus ou moins long terme.

Goebbels, la « Reichsmusikkammer » et le Ministère de la Propagande (1934-1939)

La vie musicale allemande semble stabilisée en 1934 : ayant éliminé Rosenberg, et allié avec Göring et Ley, Goebbels peut installer son autorité sur le monde musical. La « Reichsmusikkammer », quelquefois en conflit avec le Ministère de la Propagande pour des attributions de fonctions, n'en reste pas moins sous la responsabilité de Goebbels. Ce n'est qu'en 1935 que le Ministère de la Propagande prend le dessus sur la « Reichsmusikkammer ». Mais pour comprendre ce résultat, il est nécessaire d'étudier la structure et les fonctions de la « Reichsmusikkammer », ainsi que les attitudes de ses membres.

Comme l'indique la loi du 1er novembre 1933, la « Reichsmusikkammer » est l'une des 7 Chambres de la « Reichskulturkammer », organisation centrale du « Reich » qui embrasse toutes les activités artistiques et créatrices du « Reich », avec Goebbels pour président. Dans sa conception originale, comme la « Reichskulturkammer », la « Reichsmusikkammer » est aussi divisée en 4 niveaux (47) :

Un Comité exécutif, avec Président, Vice-Président, Directeur Économique et Conseil intérieur.

Une organisation administrative interne, avec des départements en charge de la publicité, de la propagande culturelle, du contrôle financier et législatif.

7 départements comprenant les différentes professions musicales des organisations locales dans les 31 districts, sous le contrôle du « Landeskulturwalter » .

La structure paraît très ordonnée, et cela correspond au souhait de restaurer l'ordre dont parle Goebbels à la cérémonie d'ouverture de la « Reichskulturkammer », en novembre 1933. Il essaie de définir les fonctions des différentes Chambres : en soulignant le fait que le régime nazi n'a pas l'intention de « restreindre le développement culturel », il est cependant « nécessaire de conjuguer tous les champs de création sous l'auspice du “ Reich ” et d'obéir à sa volonté. Lorsque cela sera achevé, seulement, les artistes allemands se sentiront protégés et auront le sentiment heureux d'être aussi indispensables à la nation que ceux qui fournissent au peuple les moyens de subsistance » (48) . Selon Heinz Ihert, la « Reichsmusikkammer » pourrait « améliorer la qualité de la musique allemande », en « luttant contre le chômage et en assurant que 50,000 musiciens d'orchestre, professeurs, et musiciens d'église perçoivent un salaire décent » (49) .

Peter Raabe, futur président de la « Reichsmusikkammer », souligne ces propos dans un discours en 1934 :

Mais, cependant, en examinant la loi du 1er novembre 1933, on s’aperçoit que les fonctions de la Chambre sont aussi restrictives et prohibitives. L’appartenance à la Chambre est limitée à des musiciens racialement et politiquement « sûrs » . Par là-même, tout musicien dont l’adhésion se voit refusée ne peut travailler en Allemagne (51) .

La « Reichsmusikkammer » commence son travail le 28 décembre 1933, publiant en 5 ans 43 articles, dans le « Amtliche Mitteilungen der Reichsmusikkammer » , articles concernant le plus souvent l’adhésion d’organisations musicales à la Chambre. D’autres ordonnances visent à limiter la liberté des musiciens, soumettant à examen le droit de voyager à l’étranger (7 mai 1934) , demandant à ce que les programmes de concerts soient présentés à l’avance pour approbation (16 juillet 1934) , interdisant l’usage de pseudonymes aux consonances étrangères (29 septembre 1934) , ou obligeant à utiliser un piano allemand en concert (2 juillet 1934) .

En 1934, la « Reichsmusikkammer » paraît toute puissante dans le domaine musical : la publicité, les ordonnances abondent, et les personnalités comme Richard Strauß et Wilhelm Furtwängler, respectivement nommés Président et Vice-président, ont une influence énorme. Strauß pense que son poste peut lui permettre d’influencer la vie musicale dans un sens positif. Lors de l’adresse inaugurale de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , le 15 novembre 1933, il adresse à Hitler et Goebbels « les remerciements les plus vifs de l’ensemble de la profession musicale allemande » pour renouer le lien entre le peuple et la musique (52) . Il réaffirme sa loyauté au régime en « ouvrant la voie à la créativité saine » et en s’assurant que « la maladie et le mal disparaîtront » (53) . Mais Strauß n’est pas entièrement libre de son pouvoir : il est lui-même interdit de concert à Salzbourg, selon l’ordonnance de mai 1934 de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , et sa collaboration avec Stefan Zweig pour le libretto de « Die schweigsæue Frau » (la Femme silencieuse) est condamnée ; une lettre qu’il envoie à son ami est interceptée par la « Gestapo » , donnée à Hitler et Strauß, est contraint à la démission d’autres membres du conseil exécutif sont aussi éliminés : Furtwängler et Havemann, qui soutiennent Hindemith, sont poussés à la démission, comme Friedrich Mahling. Peter Raabe remplace Strauß, et Paul Græner remplace Furtwängler. Raabe se montre plus présent et actif dans la « Reichsmusikkammer » . En 1936, il étend l’organisation, créant de nouveaux départements pour la propagande extérieure et les archives. Parallèlement, la « Reichsmusikkammer » est renforcée au niveau local avec des représentants musicaux dans les villes, les « Musikbeauftragter » . Raabe prend des mesures efficaces contre le chômage des musiciens, fait évoluer les conditions de travail des musiciens d’orchestre (6 heures par jour en plus d’un jour de congé) , des musiciens de radio, et dispense les musiciens sans emploi du travail forcé.

Mais Goebbels devient méfiant, et renforce alors le pouvoir du Ministère de la Propagande sur la vie musicale ; ainsi, le « Reichskulturwalter » Hans Hinkel doit rendre compte des activités de la « Reichskulturkammer » à Goebbels, et c’est lui, et non Raabe, qui élabore, le 11 septembre 1935, la première liste de compositeurs bannis par le « Reich » . Goebbels crée une division musicale dans le Ministère de la Propagande, à la tête de laquelle il place Heinz Drewes, un jeune chef d’orchestre. Le conflit entre le Ministère de la Propagande et la « Reichsmusikkammer » est ouvert : désormais, le Ministère fixe la politique, et la « Reichsmusikkammer » applique les directives. Parmi les actions de Drewes au Ministère de la Propagande, il faut citer l'instauration de la « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » (54) destinée à censurer toutes les publications nouvelles et les enregistrements contraires à l'esprit allemand. Dans le même temps, Goebbels demande à Raabe de renforcer la politique de purification des musiciens.

Ceci n'est pas sans poser de problèmes : les non-aryens sont exclus, mais la question est délicate pour les musiciens ayant une moitié ou un quart de sang juif. La décision revient alors au président de la « Reichsmusikkammer », ou alors, le musicien peut s'en retourner au Parti nazi. Le processus est long, bureaucratique, et engendre les rivalités. D'autres problèmes existent : il est ainsi obligatoire pour les employés du monde de l'Opéra d'être membre à la fois de la « Reichstheaterkammer » et de la « Reichsmusikkammer » ; les critiques doivent appartenir à la « Reichspressekammer » et à la « Reichsmusikkammer ». Mais les communications sont rares et laborieuses entre les Chambres, et beaucoup de problèmes émergent, comme par exemple le cas de Richard Mohaupt, banni de la « Reichsmusikkammer » pour son instabilité politique, mais membre de la « Reichstheaterkammer » comme chef de ballet. L'erreur est rectifiée en 1938 et le compositeur est banni.

Bien que Goebbels ait assuré la primauté du Ministère de la Propagande sur la « Reichsmusikkammer », en 1937, il n'a pas réussi à réduire les conflits entre Raabe et Drewes. Le problème est l'ambition de Drewes d'interférer dans l'application de la politique musicale, rôle que Goebbels a assigné en entier à Raabe et la « Reichsmusikkammer ». En 1938, une réforme administrative est appliquée à la « Reichsmusikkammer » : les compositeurs et solistes sont regroupés en une Chambre, et la Chambre chargée de la musique religieuse disparaît.

Pendant la Deuxième Guerre mondiale : aryanisation renforcée, extension aux territoires annexés et enjeux politiques

L'entrée en Guerre ne produit pas de changements immédiats dans l'organisation bicamérale du contrôle étatique sur la musique. En 1939, les pouvoirs du Ministère de la Propagande sont enracinés, et le conflit entre Peter Raabe et Heinz Drewes n'est plus à l'ordre du jour. En effet, l'activité du Ministère est constituée en majorité par la politique de censure. Avant la Guerre, la « Reichsmusikprüfstelle » de Drewes n'a établi qu'une seule liste de musique déclarée inacceptable dans le « Reich ». Il en fait publier 3 en plus : le 15 avril 1940, le 15 mai 1941 et le 15 juillet 1942.

La loi sur la « Reichskulturkammer » est ensuite étendue à l'Autriche le 1er juillet 1938, aux Sudètes, le 1er novembre de la même année, puis, à l'ensemble du protectorat de Bohême en Moravie, le 15 février 1941, et, enfin, à l'Alsace-Moselle, les 15 février et 15 mai 1943. L'extension de la « Reichskulturkammer » en Autriche amène la dissolution de la « Österreichischer Komponisten » dirigée par des personnalités comme Max Brand, Hans Gál, Egon Wellesz et fervente défenseuse de la musique de Schönberg. Elle est remplacée par le « Bund der deutschen Komponisten in Österreich », dirigé par Friedrich Bayer, critique du « Völkischer Beobachter ».

Le Ministère prend aussi des mesures prohibitives en relation avec le conflit présent : des décrets sont instaurés interdisant la publication et l'exécution de musique de compositeurs juifs et de celle composée par des musiciens de pays ennemis. Mais la perception de la « musique de l'ennemi » est très variable selon les alliances politiques. Ainsi, le pacte germano-soviétique de 1939 permet à la musique de compositeurs soviétiques d'être jouée en Allemagne, alors qu'elle avait été interdite en 1933. Mais, en 1941, lorsque l'Allemagne envahit l'URSS, l'ordonnance est révoquée. La musique française, quant à elle, subit un sort inverse d'abord bannie à l'exception notable de « Carmen » de Georges Bizet, elle est rétablie en 1943, pour mettre en avant le rôle de la France alliée au côté de l'Allemagne contre l'Angleterre et les États-Unis.

La période de Guerre amène aussi la création de la « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitung », le 1er mai 1940, sous la direction de Drewes, et du musicologue Hans Joachim Moser. Cet organe est destiné, comme on l'a déjà vu, à l'aryanisation du répertoire, ainsi qu'au ré-arrangement d'Opéras oubliés ou rejetés du XVIIIe et du XIXe siècle, en les accordant aux volontés du régime : Drewes et Moser réhabilitent « Jessonda » de Louis Spohr, « Euryanthe » de Carl Maria von Weber. Mais seuls « Iphigénie en Tauride » de Christoph Willibald Gluck, arrangés en allemand par Joseph Müller-Blattau, et 2 œuvres inconnues d'Otto Nicolai sont présentées en 1942. Parallèlement, l'aryanisation du répertoire se poursuit, avec des œuvres plus ou moins connues, des libretti de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart à ceux de Oskar Nebdal, dont le « Polenblut » est transféré de Varsovie aux Sudètes, pour coller à l'annexion.

Mais le Ministère de la Propagande doit aussi faire face au problème du contrôle de la musique dans les territoires occupés. Josef Goebbels en a une vision très précise. Il dit ainsi à Drewes, concernant la vie musicale à Prague, que les « Allemands doivent être supérieurs aux Tchèques en tous points de vue, et ne doivent en aucun cas travailler avec des adversaires qui n'en auront jamais la carrure. Ainsi, nous devons instaurer à Prague un grand Orchestre allemand » (55) . Drewes installe ainsi un Orchestre symphonique allemand, mais ailleurs, dans les régions occupées, la situation n'est pas toujours aussi simple.

Dans le territoire allemand du « Reich », l'effort de Goebbels consacré sur la Guerre l'éloigne des activités dans les provinces. Ainsi, des rivalités se développent entre le Ministère et les régions. La nomination de Baldur von Schirach, directeur de la « Hitlerjugend » au poste de « Gauleiter » de Vienne, en 1939, en est un exemple. Schirach pense pouvoir passer outre la direction nazie sur les éléments concernant la musique, lui qui est le compositeur du « Horst Wessel Lied » . Par exemple, alors que Goebbels perd patience face au manque de coopération de Richard Strauss avec le régime, Schirach lui accorde sa protection personnelle. Le Ministère s'oppose aussi à lui quand il veut organiser un Festival de musique contemporaine à Vienne, pendant l'été 1941, programmant des compositeurs bannis par Berlin.

En lisant les journaux de Goebbels, entre 1939 et 1941, on s'aperçoit que des tensions se créent entre le Ministère de la Propagande et Drewes, lequel apparaît, selon le Ministre de la Propagande, réticent à « comprendre la musique comme instrument pour les masses » (56) et à dépenser plus pour la musique populaire (Goebbels considère la musique populaire comme d'une importance capitale dans l'effort de guerre) . Drewes se plie finalement aux exigences de Goebbels et conserve son poste.

Pendant la Guerre, l'influence de Peter Raabe sur la vie musicale commence à diminuer. La « Reichsmusikkammer » publie toujours tous les décrets du Ministère de la Propagande, mais n'y joue plus aucun rôle de décision et n'a plus aucun avis à donner. En avril 1940, Goebbels pense même remplacer Raabe par Furtwängler (57) , mais l'idée n'aboutit jamais. Un an plus tard, Raabe accepte, comme Drewes, de participer à l'effort de musique populaire, en échange de fonds pour financer le Musée Liszt de Weimar. Durant la Guerre, Goebbels ne manque pas de souligner le chaos qui règne dans l'organisation de la « Reichskulturkammer » , et propose une ré-organisation totale, avec indépendance absolue par rapport au Ministère. Hans Hinkel est encore une fois l'instigateur de ces réformes.

L'examen de l'État et des organisations culturelles nazies, en 1943, montre que ni Goebbels, ni le Parti n'ont réussi à créer un contrôle absolu sur la vie musicale allemande. Le département en charge de la musique au sein du Ministère de la Propagande s'est considérablement développé, avec 7 départements reliés à la musique et au théâtre, à la fois pour le « Reich » et les territoires occupés. Les réformes de Hinkel pour la « Reichsmusikkammer » n'apportent aucun changement majeur dans le fonctionnement de l'institution, qui reste archaïque et bureaucratique. Au niveau du NSDAP, Rosenberg continue de jouer un rôle majeur. À la fin de la Guerre, son département musical est en phase de détrôner celui de Goebbels, tant il est en avance dans l'aryanisation du répertoire et dans la lutte contre le jazz. Cette multitude d'organisations et d'acteurs démontre, en quelque sorte, « les inconstances et les contradictions politiques qui caractérisent la vie musicale sous le 3e " Reich " » (58) .

Hitler et Wagner : Hitler et son idéologie de l'art

Beaucoup a été dit et écrit sur les liens entre Adolf Hitler et la musique, notamment celle de Anton Bruckner ou plus encore, celle de Richard Wagner. L'instrumentalisation de la musique de Wagner par les Nazis tient pour beaucoup sur le culte que Hitler vouait au compositeur, et sur le rapprochement entre Bayreuth et le futur Chancelier, dès les années 1920. « En recevant Hitler à la villa Wahnfried, le 1er octobre 1923, le clan Wagner pense avoir trouvé en ce dernier le rédempteur de l'Allemagne » (60) . À Bayreuth, on s'intéresse dès 1919 à l'agitateur nationaliste par l'intermédiaire de 2 membres de son entourage, Josef Stolzing-Czerny et Michæl Georg Conrad. Le chef spirituel du clan Wagner, à cette époque, est l'écrivain raciste Houston Stewart Chamberlain, époux d'Eva Wagner, fille de Cosima et Richard Wagner : il prône la séparation absolue entre Aryens et Juifs, et ses théories sur la pureté du sang et la sélection des plus forts sont explicitées dans « Die Grundlagen des 19. Jahrhunderts », publié en 1899. Ce livre influence beaucoup Hitler, qui le découvre lors de son séjour à Vienne.

Hitler suscite l'enthousiasme dans la famille Wagner, jusqu'à en devenir un intime (61) . Quelques semaines après son accueil à Wahnfried, il est interné pour le « " Putsch " de la Brasserie » manqué de Munich. Winifred fait alors diffuser une pétition de Chamberlain pour Hitler, signée par plus de 1,000 sympathisants, au rang desquels le couple Chamberlain, Siegfried et Winifred Wagner, et Hans von Wolzogen.

Siegfried Wagner écrit ainsi lui-même :

« Dieu soit loué qu'il y ait encore des Allemands. Hitler est un homme superbe. Il doit aller jusqu'au bout ! » (62)

La pétition de 1924 reçoit plus de 10,000 signatures, dont celle d'un habitué de la villa Wahnfried, Ziegler, futur « Gauleiter » adjoint de Thuringe, fondateur de l'hebdomadaire nazi « Der Völkische » et organisateur de l'exposition « Entartete Musik » de 1938. L'engagement en faveur d'Hitler des « Bayreuther Blätter », le journal du cercle de Bayreuth, est manifeste dès 1924.

Dans un numéro s'ouvre par une citation de Hitler :

« Notre combat concerne la substance sacrée. » ...

Chamberlain met en parallèle Hitler et Wagner, tous 2 « révolutionnaires », et il entraîne avec lui tout le cercle de Bayreuth, conservateur, à croire dans ce « rédempteur de l'Allemagne ». Dès lors, les « Bayreuther Blätter » s'emploient à rapprocher les pensées des 2 hommes.

Hans von Wolzogen approuve le « Führer » en 1930 et compare son rôle à celui de Wagner dans le domaine de l'art :

« L'authentique expérience de Bayreuth, c'est la masse humaine qui incarne l'idéalisme en prêtant serment sur la " pensée " du Maître Wagner. Voilà ce que le Maître a fait de la masse. La masse a de nouveau trouvé son Maître. Comment une masse a-t-elle pu devenir aussi émouvante et émue, si ce n'est avec le " Führer ". » (63)

Karl Grunsky ajoute, en 1933 :

« Que Hitler ait une relation intérieure et certaine avec l'art se manifeste par l'importance que Wagner a pour lui. La vie des 2 grands hommes trahit de nombreux points communs. » (64)

Le Festival de Bayreuth de 1933, marquant le Cinquantième de la mort de Wagner, s'ouvre sur l'entrée triomphale de Hitler dans le « Festspielhaus », symbole du rapprochement entre le « Führer » et celui qu'il considérait comme son seul précurseur, Wagner. Josef Goebbels et Alfred Rosenberg deviennent peu à peu, eux aussi, des familiers de Bayreuth, et la musique de Wagner, rattachée pour longtemps dans les esprits à la culture nazie, souffrira d'un discrédit certain après-guerre.

Dès « Mein Kampf », Hitler a une vision claire du rôle de l'État nazi dans le domaine de la culture, en affirmant que son rôle est d'« empêcher le peuple d'être poussé dans les bras de la folie spirituelle » ; il prône ainsi l'épuration de la culture allemande et la soumission de la création artistique aux normes édictées par le nouveau pouvoir et déterminées par les principes de « l'hygiène raciale ». L'art est, en effet, pour Hitler la forme supérieure d'expression d'une race. Selon lui, la race aryenne est « créatrice de culture », et l'art ne peut donc être créé que par elle. Pour prouver la supériorité de la race aryenne, il tente une définition de la beauté, résultante de l'efficacité (« Zweckmäßigkeit ») de l'œuvre d'art. À cette conception de l'idéal de la beauté, il oppose le « faux-sentiment de beauté » de l'art moderne, de celui de la République de Weimar. Il ajoute la dimension du génie, qui pressent le principe de finalité dans la nature et de beauté dans l'art, avec la pré-éminence d'une personnalité géniale, équivalent artistique du « Führerprinzip » politique. Par ailleurs, c'est la pureté raciale qui détermine chez l'artiste ou chez un peuple la capacité à produire un art harmonieux. Le métissage racial est synonyme de dégénérescence artistique ; les Juifs sont toujours le bouc-émissaire. « Ce furent et ce sont toujours les Juifs qui ont amené les nègres sur le Rhin, dans le but de détruire par un inévitable abâtardissement la race blanche et d'abattre sa grandeur culturelle et politique pour la dominer. » (65)

Rosenberg le théorique, Gœbbels le pragmatique.

En mars 1933, Josef Gœbbels est nommé Ministre de l'Information du peuple et de la Propagande ; en janvier 1934, Alfred Rosenberg est Chargé d'affaires du « Führer » pour la supervision de l'ensemble de la formation intellectuelle et idéologique du NSDAP (« Überwachung der gesamten geistigen und weltanschaulichen Schulung und Erziehung der NSDAP ») . Ils incarnent à eux 2, au-delà de leurs luttes intestines, l'ensemble de la politique culturelle nazie. Rivalité d'hommes, nourrie par des volontés d'ambition personnelle, mais aussi rivalité d'action, l'un choisissant le cadre du Parti avec le « Promi », le Ministère de la Propagande ; l'autre, l'indépendance avec des organisations comme le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » . Mais les 2 hommes sont aussi très idéologiquement opposés, en matière de culture, et leurs doctrines se sont fondées dès les années 1920 ; alors, sans visée politique.

Rosenberg développe très tôt une esthétique raciale fondatrice d'un idéal de beauté. Il pense que les valeurs héroïques germaniques sont exprimées dans l'idéal de beauté aryen. Selon lui, après l'architecture Gothique, après Rembrandt ou après Bach et Wagner, la culture allemande a régressé. Les tentations modernes sont des agressions contre l'idéal de beauté aryen et autant de dangers qui risquent de provoquer « l'anéantissement de tous les idéaux artistiques de la nation allemande » (66) .

Dans « le Mythe du XXe siècle » , il exprime pleinement son idéologie raciste :

Ainsi, en remède, il exige une « hygiène raciale » permettant l'amélioration de la race et exige la discrimination raciale contre les Juifs. La pensée culturelle de Rosenberg s'organise donc essentiellement sur la théorie du déclin racial et il développe une attitude très critique face aux créateurs de son époque ; il est aussi un des principaux acteurs de la lutte contre le modernisme.

La théorie de l'art pour le peuple de Josef Gœbbels s'est développée bien avant sa prise de fonctions comme chef de la propagande au sein du NSDAP. C'est après ses études de lettres qu'il débute une carrière d'auteur de théâtre et de romans ; son seul ouvrage, « Michæl » , développe déjà quelques unes de ses conceptions sur l'art, et l'œuvre est empreinte d'expressionnisme. C'est lui qui ordonne la « Nuit de Cristal » (1938) et la « Solution finale » (1942) , mais son antisémitisme est différent de celui de Hitler et de Rosenberg, comme le remarque Amaury du Closel (68) . Dans sa jeunesse, il lit Heinrich Heine, écoute Gustav Mahler, et n'a aucun sentiment antisémite, et lorsqu'il rejoint le NSDAP, c'est plus par conception héroïque et socialiste que par attachement national-socialiste. Il est cependant fasciné par la personne du « Führer » , celui qu'il appelle dans son « Journal Politique » , le 1er janvier 1925 :

« Adolf Hitler, guide et héros, tambour de la renaissance, de la foi et de la ferveur allemandes. »

Son antisémitisme est lié à sa volonté de faire carrière, et donc, de plaire à Hitler. La publication de « Michæl » avec des citations antisémites, en 1929, relève d'un ajout postérieur à l'adhésion de Gœbbels au NSDAP :

« Le Juif est un abcès sur le corps de nos malades. Il n'est pas du tout rusé. Il n'est que raffiné, roublard, retors, futé, et sans scrupules. »

Mais Gœbbels ne présente ni l'antisémitisme aux arguments raciaux et génétiques de Rosenberg, ni la haine zélée du Juif des membres du Parti : il se contente de suivre le mouvement, en quelque sorte. Et sa situation particulière est remarquée dans un de ses articles intitulé « Die Radikalisierung des Sozialismus » , publié dans le « Nationalsozialistische Briefe » du 15 décembre 1925 :

« L'antisémitisme est le point de départ de notre prise de conscience, mais il n'est pas tout. »

Mais Gœbbels saura utiliser la politique antisémite et ordonner l'exécution de solutions d'extermination du peuple juif, dans les années 1940, à priori, dans un but pragmatique d'efficacité au sein du régime.

Gœbbels est également très ouvert, notamment au début des années 1920, au modernisme, ne serait-ce que par tactique : il cherche à s'entourer des meilleurs artistes du moment, et peu importe à quel courant ils sont rattachés. Il tente ainsi de provoquer le retour de Hermann Scherchen, grâce à Wilhelm Furtwängler. Ce n'est pas lui qui expulse les Juifs des Opéras de Berlin, mais Hermann Göring ; c'est Bernhard Rust qui renvoie Arnold Schönberg et Franz Schreker. Lui, montre une certaine tolérance face au modernisme. Jusqu'en 1936, il tolère même à Berlin des expositions d'art moderne, soutenant le maintien d'œuvres d'Edvard Munch, Lyonel Feininger, Emil Nolde et Franz Marc, décriées par les Nazis, au Palais du « Konzprin » . Mais, face à la volonté d'Hitler de contrer tout modernisme, Gœbbels renonce et suit la ligne droite du Parti.

Gœbbels tient à l'idée d'un art au service de la propagande, en marche vers l'unité nationale et, afin de voguer vers cette unité, il s'engage dans la pensée culturelle admise et l'utilise à la fois comme nourriture et enjeu de sa propagande.

Être chef d'orchestre en Allemagne nazie : l'exemple de Herbert von Karajan et Wilhelm Furtwängler

Rivalités orchestrales

Herbert von Karajan et Wilhelm Furtwängler, peut-être les 2 personnalités musicales les plus représentatives du XXe siècle en Allemagne, ont toujours été mis en opposition, en concurrence, voire en combat. Et ce n'est pas un hasard si l'ouvrage d'un ancien timbalier du « Berliner Philharmoniker » , Werner Thärichen, rappelle le nom des 2 directeurs successifs de l'Orchestre : « Furtwängler ou Karajan » .

Dans sa préface à l'essai, Rémy Louis conclut :

« Furtwängler ou Karajan ? Mieux vaut dire ... Furtwängler “ et ” Karajan. Chacun a laissé derrière lui une œuvre, mieux encore : un monde. À ce degré de réalisation, et quels que soient les critères esthétiques ou politiques que l'on se fixe, il est sans doute désormais inutile de choisir. » (69)

Mais il n'en a pas toujours été ainsi. Dans l'affrontement entre Karajan et Furtwängler, qui constitue l'un des épisodes les plus singuliers de l'histoire de l'interprétation musicale européenne du XXe siècle, la situation politique de l'Allemagne joue un rôle plus qu'important.

Herbert von Karajan est né le dimanche 5 avril 1908, à Salzbourg, dans une dynastie aristocratique de médecins et d'universitaires autrichiens d'ascendance grecque (les « Karajanides ») . Il commence très tôt le piano, avec son frère Wolfgang, et, à 4 ans, au « Landestheater » de Salzbourg, assiste à une représentation des « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » de Richard Wagner ; de retour à la maison, le tout jeune garçon, qui s'appelle encore Heribert, construit des répliques en carton des personnages et il est capable de mimer toute la mise en scène.

Il entre très vite au « Mozarteum » , obtient son baccalauréat en 1926, et s'inscrit à la fois à l'École Technique Supérieure de Vienne et au Conservatoire National, où il a pour professeur Franz Schalk en direction d'orchestre. Il dirige son 1er orchestre en 1928, puis loue l'Orchestre du « Mozarteum » pour sa 1re direction en public, avec la 5e Symphonie de Tchaïkovski, le Concerto pour piano n° 23 en la majeur (KV 488) de Mozart, et le « Don Juan » de Richard Strauß.

Il est remarqué par le Directeur du Théâtre d'Ulm, et en devient son « Kappelmeister » ; à cette occasion, il donnera son premier Opéra, « le Nozze di Figaro » . En 1934, il est engagé comme chef d'orchestre permanent à Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle) , poste qu'il conservera jusqu'en 1942, et il dirige la même année le Philharmonique de Vienne. En 1935, il est nommé « Generalmusikdirektor » à Aachen, le plus jeune en fonction à ce poste : il n'a que 27 ans !

Il fait des débuts triomphants à Berlin, en 1938, à tel point que Robert Oboussier, fervent admirateur de Furtwängler, écrit :

« Ce musicien qui n'a pas encore 30 ans est destiné aux plus grandes choses. » (70)

Herbert von Karajan est nouveau dans la capitale allemande, et Furtwängler ne voit pas d'un très bon œil son arrivée dans la sphère berlinoise : il le considère comme « une nouvelle version autrichienne de Toscanini » (71) ; et quand on sait que Furtwängler s'était montré très irrité par le succès de Toscanini en Allemagne, en 1929-1930, se profile déjà à l'horizon une jalousie monstre envers celui qu'il appellera toute sa vie « Herr von K. » , refusant de prononcer son nom. En 1938, Karajan représente la synthèse entre germanité et italianité, le modèle du chef d'orchestre de l'avenir, alors que Furtwängler symbolise plus le sentiment de défense de la germanité inconditionnelle.

Mais alors que naît le « Wunder Karajan » (expression d'Edwin van der Nüll) , Furtwängler se trouve en situation délicate face aux autorités du « Reich » : sa lettre ouverte de 1934 et sa prise de position pour Paul Hindemith le poussent à la démission de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , en décembre. Mais il veut rester en Allemagne, à tout prix, car il pense être « une conscience musicale dont la présence est nécessaire aux Allemands » (72) . Herbert von Karajan adhère au Parti nazi dès 1933, par 2 fois, et accepte de jouer pour le régime, lors des fêtes du NSDAP par exemple.

L'opposition entre les 2 chefs est croissante, et le poste de « Gastdirigent » confié à Karajan pour le « Deutsche Oper » de Berlin, avec « Tristan und Isolde » , rend Furtwängler furieux. Ils deviennent en quelque sorte les pions d'un jeu de pouvoir entre Goebbels, le « Reichsmarschall » Hermann Göring, et Heinz Tietjen (directeur de l'Opéra « Unter den Linden » , Directeur artistique du Festival de Bayreuth, et Indentant des Théâtres de Prusse) : Karajan, protégé de Göring et Tietjen, va favoriser le déclin de Furtwängler, soutenu occasionnellement par Goebbels, puis, il deviendra le grand Mæstro de la guerre en Allemagne, évinçant son rival des scènes pour une décennie.

Le Docteur Oliver Rathkolb, de l'Institut d'Histoire contemporaine de l'Université de Vienne, résume assez bien la situation :

« On n'a toujours pas bien établi à quel point Karajan a servi à éliminer ou, tout au moins, à neutraliser l'assise artistique de Furtwängler, devenu encombrant politiquement. Karajan servit de contrepoids. » (73)

Karajan lui-même explique à Roger Vaughan (74) que c'est Tietjen qui organise, en grande partie, la rivalité entre lui et Furtwängler. Tietjen appelle Karajan à son service dès septembre 1938, à Berlin, pour se venger de Furtwängler qui l'a quitté, quelques temps plus tôt, en raison de « l'affaire Hindemith » .

Il mentionne que :

« Goebbels se foutait de ce que Furtwängler pensait des Nazis. Il l'aimait beaucoup. » (75)

Mais Tietjen se rétracte fin-1943, peut-être sous l'ordre de Goebbels ; et Furtwängler revient diriger à Berlin. Karajan perd son auréole de gloire, mais gagne quelques postes, en représentation à l'étranger, ou enregistrer Anton Bruckner, en 1942, jusqu'à son départ d'Allemagne fin-1944 (76) .

Karajan dirige les Concerts symphoniques de l'Opéra de Berlin, d'octobre 1940 à février 1943, ne laissant aucune place à son aîné. Il se déplace en pays occupé : à Paris, en 1940, dans la Messe en Si de Bach, en mai 1941 à l'Opéra Garnier, dans « Tristan und Isolde » avec Germaine Lublin ; il se rend aussi à Rome, en mars 1941. Furtwängler se plaint de la popularité de Karajan à Goebbels, et de sa mise à l'écart.

Goebbels note à ce propos dans son « Journal » , en décembre 1940 :

« Furtwängler se plaint de Karajan, j'y ai mis le holà. Furtwängler se conduit très bien, il est notre plus grand chef. »

Karajan cesse alors ses activités à Aachen, et il est remercié de son poste berlinois, en 1943.

Karajan connaît alors les ennuis avec les autorités : il épouse, en secondes noces, une jeune fille avec un quart de sang juif, Anita Güttermann. Goebbels intervient pour étouffer le problème, car il sent que Karajan peut lui être utile : Furtwängler est, en effet, de plus en plus mal vu, et désespéré. Mais la fin de la guerre approche, et tous 2 connaissent alors les mêmes déboires. Ils doivent s'éloigner d'Allemagne : Furtwängler en Suisse ; Karajan en Italie, alors que leurs parcours avaient été plus que différents pendant la période nazie.

Après-guerre, nouveaux enjeux

La période de la dénazification est sombre pour les 2 hommes. Ils sont autorisés à diriger tous 2, dès 1947, et la concurrence entre eux repart de plus belle : à Vienne, puis, à Salzbourg.

À la fin de la Guerre, Furtwängler se trouve en Suisse ; Karajan à Salzbourg chez ses parents. Il y est invité pour diriger le « Wiener Philharmoniker », en janvier 1946 :

« Vienne avait trouvé, une fois encore, son idole. » (77)

Au lendemain du concert, Karajan est interdit de scène, mais participe aux Ires ébauches du Festival de Salzbourg. Beaucoup d'institutions demandent son retour, comme celui de Clemens Krauß, Hans Knappertsbuch, ou Karl Böhm. Parmi les acteurs de cette demande : Alexander von Hryntschak, président de la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde », Rudolf Gamsjäger, son secrétaire-général ; le Baron Heinrich von Puthon, président du Festival de Salzbourg ; Bernhard Paumgartner, chef de l'Orchestre du « Mozarteum » ; et Walter Legge, qui développera la carrière de Karajan par le disque, avec le « Philharmonia Orchestra » de Londres, dès 1946.

Furtwängler revient à Berlin en mai 1947, puis, à Vienne, pour le 100e anniversaire de la mort de Felix Mendelssohn. En novembre 1947, il est invité pour le « Deutsches Requiem », à Vienne, et il en profite pour se plaindre du fait que « Herr von K. » dirige « son répertoire » : la 9e de Beethoven avec le « Wiener Philharmoniker ». Son ennemi s'impose devant ses yeux à Vienne, à Berlin et à l'étranger : à Vienne, il devient « “ Dirigent ” à vie » (1947), « Ehrenmitglieder » (1947), puis « “ Konzerdirektor ” à vie » (1950) du « Singverein der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ». De 1948-1949 à 1963-1964, les « Karajan-Zyklus » fleurissent avec les « Wiener Philharmoniker » et « Berliner Philharmoniker ». Il devient chef principal et directeur musical du « Philharmonia » de Walter Legge, dirige au Festival de Salzbourg en 1948, et à Bayreuth en 1951-1952.

Les rivalités entre les 2 hommes ne cessent jamais, et apparaissent à chaque détour de leurs carrières : si Furtwängler ouvre, en 1949, le Festival de Salzbourg avec le « Zauberflöte », c'est Karajan qui l'enregistre en 1er avec Legge (même si l'enregistrement devait être d'abord réalisé avec Furtwängler, le producteur choisit finalement Karajan). En 1950, Furtwängler obtient de Hilbert que Karajan soit absent de Salzbourg jusqu'à ce que lui-même y revienne.

Furtwängler aurait déclaré :

« Si ce “ Monsieur von K. ” vient ici, je dirigerai un programme qu'ils vont haïr. »

Karajan devra attendre l'année 1955 et la mort de Furtwängler pour y diriger à nouveau. Mais Furtwängler n'est pas invité pour les festivités du 200^e anniversaire de la mort de Bach à Vienne, en 1950 (« Internationale Bach-Fest 1950 der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde »), qui s'ouvrent et se ferment avec Karajan.

Certes, Furtwängler reprend sa pré-éminence à Vienne, où Karajan cesse de diriger entre 1950 et 1957, à Berlin ensuite, où Karajan disparaît jusque 1953. Mais « tout est en quelque sorte déjà joué » (78) : Furtwängler meurt en novembre 1954, épuisé et déprimé par une dénazification qui s'était avérée longue et problématique, dépassé par un rival plus jeune que lui. En mars 1955, Karajan accepte de renoncer à tous ses engagements pour accepter l'offre du « Berliner Philharmoniker », à condition d'y être nommé « chef à vie ». Il s'octroie un cumul de fonctions jusqu'alors inconnu. Il dirige donc : le « Berliner Philharmoniker » ; le Festival de Salzbourg, et ce, dès 1956 ; l'Opéra de Vienne, la même année ; et s'impose dans le monde du disque. 30 ans de domination mondiale s'offrent alors pour celui qui avait déclaré, à Salzbourg, en 1955 :

« Je serai dictateur. » (79)

Le « Cas Karajan »

Karajan n'a jamais accepté de parler ouvertement de la période de guerre et de la dénazification. Certains y ont vu l'aveu d'une culpabilité évidente ; d'autres ont laissé au « plus grand Mæstro du siècle » (80) (selon Carlos Kleiber) l'avantage du doute sur son passé politique pour ne retenir de lui que son testament musical, qui comprend des milliers de concerts et Opéras, presque autant d'enregistrements, et un mythe qu'il s'est lui-même forgé.

Lorsque le 20 janvier 1946, Walter Legge, le producteur anglais, le rejoint à Vienne, où il est invité à diriger, il commet un délit, puisqu'il est un « Allié » qui traite avec un « ennemi allemand ». Vienne connaît une renaissance musicale rapide après la Guerre : 3 semaines après la reddition, on y donne « le Nozze di Figaro », avec « toutes les “ stars ” du 3^e “ Reich ” » (81) : Maria Cebotari, égérie berlinoise de Hitler ; le ténor Julius Patzak ; le baryton-basse Hans Hotter. La ville attire, dès lors, l'attention du monde musical entier. Legge pense à Furtwängler pour être chef du « Philharmonia », l'Orchestre qu'il fonde à Londres spécialement pour l'enregistrement. Mais il désire quelqu'un de plus jeune, et son choix se porte sur Karajan, rentré de son exil italien. Malheureusement, il est recherché par les autorités comme figure de proue de la culture nazie encensée par Josef Gœbbels contre Furtwängler, au moment où celui-ci est disgracié. Karajan est interdit de scène, mais Legge convainc les autorités anglaises de le laisser enregistrer, même sous interdiction de scène : plus que n'importe quel autre chef, « Karajan sera alors fabriqué par le disque » (Walter Legge). Legge se défend contre ses anciens collègues qui l'accusent de collaborer avec d'anciens Nazis, en rétorquant : « traiter un artiste de nazi est un sabotage ! Ces artistes n'avaient pas le choix du camp dans lequel ils se sont retrouvés ». Mais un tel argument est-il recevable ?

Le 3^e « Reich », on l'a vu, prend le pouvoir sur la musique en 2 temps : la loi du 7 avril 1933 qui évince les Juifs des institutions de l'État, et l'appartenance nécessaire à la « Reichskulturkammer », en date du 15 novembre 1933.

Hinkel, général SS, directeur de la « Reichskulturkammer » et Commissaire d'État pour la Musique auprès de Goebbels, institue les fiches sur les artistes, où sont mentionnés les origines raciales et les soutiens des autres musiciens. Si la carte est nécessaire, l'appartenance au Parti nazi n'est mentionnée nulle part dans la législation comme corollaire obligé à l'exercice d'un emploi. Certains musiciens ont émigré, d'autres ont refusé l'enrôlement total, comme Furtwängler, Krauß ou Knappertsbusch.

Citons, à son propos, une anecdote. Au cours d'une conversation avec l'ambassadeur d'Allemagne en Hollande, il lui demande :

« Êtes-vous un Nazi obligé ou un Nazi convaincu ? »

Interloqué, l'ambassadeur lui demande la différence.

Knappertsbusch répond :

« L'un est un salaud (" Schweinehund ") ; l'autre, une saloperie (" Schanerei ") . » (82)

Kempe rejoint l'armée plutôt que de licencier l'altiste de son orchestre, qui est Juif. Eugen Jochum, comme Hans Swarowsky, et Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt, ne rejoignent jamais le Parti.

Norman Lebrecht explique l'engagement dans le NSDAP des artistes par 2 points : soit une ferveur raciste, sous laquelle il range Paul Græner, Max Trapp ; soit des motifs opportunistes, afin d'accéder plus vite à un poste. C'est cette explication qu'il donne à l'adhésion de Karajan au NSDAP. Karajan adhère par 2 fois au Parti : à Salzbourg, le 8 avril 1933 (carte n° 1607525) ; à Ulm, le 1er mai 1933 (carte n° 3430914) (83) . Karajan les déclare « faux » lorsqu'on les lui présente en fac-similé, en 1982, et explique qu'il a adhéré au Parti en 1935, pour avoir le poste de « Kappelmeister » à Aachen.

Il déclare ainsi :

« Devant moi, il y avait ce morceau de papier qui me séparait de l'exercice d'un pouvoir sans limite. Aussi, me suis-je dit, au diable ! Et j'ai signé. » (84)

Selon Lebrecht, Karajan se présente comme un « Muß Nazi » (85)

Roger Vaughan, dans sa biographie sur Karajan (86) , envisage les choses d'un autre point de vue. Il rappelle que Paul Moor, le 1er a divulgué après-guerre les éléments relatifs à l'adhésion au NSDAP de Karajan, prouve la double adhésion de Karajan, en 1933, au NSDAP par maints documents trouvés à la mission américaine à Berlin. Quand le musicologue allemand Fred K. Prieberg, 25 ans plus tard, sort son livre « Musik im NS-Staat » , Karajan déclare à Vaughan que les documents qu'il utilise sont « pure fabrication » et que « Prieberg veut juste faire de l'argent » (87) . Enfin, quand le biographe présente les documents personnellement à Karajan, celui-ci lui montre qu'ils ne sont pas signés par lui et que ce sont des faux antidatés à une date antérieure à son adhésion réelle (1933 pour Prieberg ; 1935 pour Karajan) . Mais la signature n'était pas toujours imposée lors de l'adhésion, et cette date de 1933 est encore aujourd'hui soumise à nombre d'interrogations, en témoignent les échanges de lettres entre les différents bureaux du NSDAP concernant la question.

Ainsi :

Une lettre du 5 janvier 1939 des bureaux du NSDAP de Munich, à la Trésorerie du NSDAP d'Autriche, souligne que Karajan a adhéré 2 fois au Parti, en avril et mai 1933, et demande si « l'adhésion professionnelle d'avril 1933 » est effective.

La réponse du représentant du Parti en Autriche au Trésorier munichois affirme que c'est aux bureaux de Salzbourg de stipuler sur l'adhésion d'avril.

Une lettre du 4 février 1939 du NSDAP de Vienne au Trésorier du NSDAP de Salzbourg demande une enquête sur la question Karajan.

Le 15 mai 1939, le groupe « Neustadt » de Salzbourg répond au Trésorier de Salzbourg que Herbert Klein, qui a fait signer Karajan au Parti, a donné un reçu au chef et a personnellement établi son adhésion.

Une lettre du 7 juillet 1939 des bureaux munichois du Parti au Trésorier du NSDAP à « Köln-Aachen » , déclare que l'adhésion d'avril est invalide car Karajan n'a pas payé les droits ; celle de mai est déclarée pleinement valable.

Le 12 décembre 1942, l'« Oberreichsleiter » Schneider annonce à la Chancellerie de Berlin que la date officielle pour l'adhésion de Karajan au NSDAP est celle du 1er mai 1933, sous le n° 3430914, et que sa carte a été disponible le 13 juillet 1939.

Karajan persiste cependant à dater son adhésion de 1935. Vaughan s'interroge sur la raison :

« Est-ce pour donner une explication rationnelle à l'action ? Car, avoir adhéré en avril ou mai, 1 ou 2 mois après l'accession de Hitler au pouvoir, sonnerait comme un soutien enthousiaste à Hitler, à sa politique, et à ses projets. Et cela serait moins compréhensible. » (88)

Karajan s'exprime lui-même sur ce point :

« C'est la chose la plus difficile à comprendre pour ceux qui n'ont pas vécu en Allemagne ou en Autriche en ce temps là. »

De plus, cela explique que les idées économiques du « Führer » étaient globalement bonnes, et que c'est ce point qui donne du pouvoir à Hitler. Sebastian Haffner, dans « The Meaning of Hitler » (1979) développe le même argument.

Vaughan conclut sur le sujet en affirmant que Karajan n'a pas été un fervent Nazi, ni même un supporter du mouvement et laisse la discussion ouverte sur la date d'adhésion au régime.

D'autres éléments sont portés à charge contre Karajan, après la Guerre : en 1935, pour les fêtes du NSDAP, il dirige 750 chanteurs et 100 musiciens dans des partitions dédiées au nouveau régime, comme le « Feier der Neuen Front » de Richard Trunk, un hommage à Hitler sur un texte de Baldur von Schirach. En 1943, il assiste à la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner donnée par l'Orchestre de la « Waffen SS » sous la direction de l'« Oberstuführer SS » Rudolf Vedder. On lui reproche des remarques antisémites. À son décorateur Günther Schneider-Siemssen : « Vous avez les yeux bruns, ceux d'un traître » ; ou encore, cette remarque de 1934 face au « Volksoper » de Vienne où « toute la Palestine s'est donnée rendez-vous » . Enfin, on condamne sa collaboration avec son agent de la période, l'« Oberstuführer SS » Vedder.

Mais, pour sa défense, il rétorque avoir épousé une femme au quart de sang juif, Anita Güttermann, et cite ses assistants et amis juifs : Emil Jücker, Rita Köhler, Ernst Haußermann son biographe, son directeur artistique Michel Glotz, son « Konzertmeister » Michel Schwalbé, et son protégé, le chef James Levine. Au niveau de la musique contemporaine, il explique avoir dirigé et enregistré de son plein-gré, en avril 1944, le Concerto pour orchestre de Gottfried von Einem, compositeur banni par le « Reich » : sa musique intègre du jazz, et le compositeur et sa mère sont même internés par la « Gestapo » .

1941 est une année difficile pour Karajan : les bombardements détruisent Berlin, Furtwängler le devance sur une production au « Deutsche Oper » , et ainsi, il compte s'engager dans l'aviation, mais Josef Goebbels le lui interdit. Van der Nüll, le père de l'expression « das Wunder Karajan », est envoyé au front et y meurt : Karajan y voit une attaque personnelle du régime (89) . De plus, le poste d'Aachen est donné au Hollandais Paul van Kempen, et il échoue à succéder à Karl Böhm à Dresde. C'est ainsi qu'il décide de quitter l'Allemagne, après une série de concerts à Berlin, en décembre 1944 : il se rend à Milan, puis à Côme. Découvert, il part pour Salzbourg dans un wagon à bestiaux. Commence alors le processus de dénazification.

Le « crime de l'opportunisme » et ses conséquences

C'est à Vienne, où il est rentré pour un concert, que débute son procès en dénazification. Karajan subit un interrogatoire intensif, les charges retenues contre lui sont très lourdes. On l'accuse d'être le musicien par excellence du « Reich » , et même d'avoir été un espion, d'avoir dénoncé ses collègues juifs et clandestins. Il nie toutes les accusations en bloc, dont la plupart ont été inventées ou déformées, mais admet son appartenance au NSDAP, en 1935.

Dans son autobiographie, Karajan revient sur cet événement :

« Ces gens qui se préparaient à agir contre moi n'en avaient pas le droit. J'en savais trop sur eux pour les reconnaître comme autorités compétentes. » (90)

Le Colonel soviétique Epstein, qui fait interdire ses concerts à Vienne en 1945, déclare :

« Karajan est un fervent Nazi. Il a eu de nombreux honneurs à Berlin. C'est un Nazi de la 1re heure » (91)

Otto de Pasetti, enquêteur pour la Commission de dénazification autrichienne, demande une grâce immédiate :

« Karajan est un personnage arrogant et ambitieux, très imbu de lui-même, pas vraiment sympathique, mais il est impossible qu'il soit un fervent Nazi, ou même un sympathisant. Son adhésion au NSDAP est uniquement professionnelle. » (92)

Par ailleurs, Ernst Lothar veut un long bannissement, pour punir les conséquences et la signification de son engagement au Parti nazi. Cependant, en 1946, Karajan participe à l'organisation du Festival de Salzbourg, mais il est expulsé du « Festspielhaus » par des officiers américains, et remplacé par Hans Swarowsky. Avant la levée de son interdiction de scène, on sait peu de choses sur le déroulement du procès en dénazification ; si ce n'est que, pendant les négociations et les décisions, il est quand même nommé à des postes de 1re importance, à Lucerne ou à Vienne.

Ce « crime de l'opportunisme » , comme le qualifie Eberhardt Manfred, musicologue berlinois, lui est reproché longtemps après la Guerre. Il passe 30 mois au chômage, des manifestations contre lui ont lieu lorsqu'il doit diriger à New York, en 1946. Il est également soumis à une enquête aux États-Unis, cette même année, mais aucun témoin ne réussit à être entendu. S'il explique avoir pris son adhésion au NSDAP, comme « on aurait pris une inscription dans un club de ski alpin » , il semble surtout avoir été prêt à tout pour diriger, et obtenir les postes qu'il convoitait.

« Nous étions tous Nazis : Furtwängler, Böhm, moi. » , déclare-t-il à la presse, en 1948.

Mais il est le seul chef d'orchestre à se voir fermer les portes du « Metropolitan Opera » de New York par Rudolf Bing parce que, selon ce dernier :

« Karajan avait fait plus que ce qui était nécessaire sous la botte nazie. » (93)

Dans l'immédiat après-guerre, Karajan est disqualifié ; il est jugé comme un fervent nazi, d'allure aryenne, et fait en quelque sorte figure d'anti-héros face à un Furtwängler divinisé, grand vainqueur moral, mais non musical, de cette rivalité. Certains musicologues, comme John Culshaw (94) , vont jusqu'à affirmer qu'il donne l'impression d'être un substitut au « Führer » disparu :

« Il remplit le vide laissé par la mort de Hitler dans cette partie de la mentalité collective allemande qui réclame à corps et à cris un chef. Il émanait de lui une aura, qui, si elle avait fait l'objet d'un calcul, aurait été répugnante. »

Norman Lebrecht explicite les points communs entre Hitler et Karajan : une puissance de concentration, une quête inlassable du but à atteindre, une sexualité étrange, qui attire autant les hommes que les femmes, un grand besoin d'amour (comme en témoigne ses 3 mariages successifs, ou encore ses lettres d'amour à la journaliste américaine Mary Roblee, en 1955) . Il souligne aussi un profond narcissisme, de part l'orchestration de ses rappels, des applaudissements, aussi bien que dans les photographies officielles contrôlées par le Mæstro lui-même. Toujours selon Lebrecht, il maintient entre lui et les autres une certaine distance, un espace. Un haut-responsable de l'industrie discographique va jusqu'à dire que « dans son esprit, il était Hitler ». Son biographe américain pense qu'il admire sincèrement Hitler. Pour finir son accusation, le critique du « Sunday Times » affirme que, comme Hitler, Karajan apprend à manipuler l'image, mentionnant les films consacrés aux Symphonies de Beethoven, où il est éclairé par un rayon de lumière, « comme celui de Albert Speer pour l'arrivée du “ Führer ” à Nuremberg » (95) . Il divise pour conquérir, comme Hitler, qui dresse Josef Gœbbels contre Hermann Göring, et les 2 contre Heinrich Himmler. En effet, Karajan travaille toujours en même temps pour 2 Compagnies et 2 Orchestres, au minimum ! Comme le « Führer » enfin, il exerce un contrôle sur son entourage. « Son but était d'édifier son propre “ Reich ” », note l'un de ses biographes, et son « Reich » s'appelait : Berlin, Vienne, la Scala, Salzbourg, Londres, Paris. Berlin et Salzbourg restent à jamais les places fortes de son empire : Berlin et son contrat à vie avec le « Berliner Philharmoniker », Salzbourg où il impose ses volontés, la ville étant même qualifiée peu à peu par les anglo-saxons de « Sleazbourg », la ville de la corruption et de l'avidité. Lebrecht achève Karajan en jetant le doute sur l'origine de sa fortune, estimée à 500 millions de « Deutsche Mark » : il ne peut imaginer qu'elle relève de cachets de concerts, mais la rattache à la récompense d'un pouvoir occulte.

Lebrecht conclut ainsi :

« Le pouvoir absolu fut l'ultime leçon qu'il reçut du 3e “ Reich ”, et devint l'obsession de sa carrière après-guerre. » (96)

Peut-être faut-il relativiser les propos de Lebrecht et s'en tenir aux faits plus qu'aux parallèles hasardeux entre Hitler et Karajan. Et appliquer à Karajan les propos d'Hermann Heße sur Richard Strauß :

« Nous n'avons pas le droit de lui faire de grands reproches, mais nous avons, je crois, celui de garder nos distances. » (97)

Car l'attitude d'Herbert von Karajan tient finalement plus d'une ambition dévorante que d'idées politiques précises, et il est donc moralement condamnable.

À sa mort, en 1989, il est à la tête d'un empire musical créé de toutes pièces, et il a incarné pendant près de 40 ans, le mythe du chef d'orchestre omniscient et omniprésent. Il fit usage d'un pouvoir souvent absolu, sans scrupules, voulant à tout prix réaliser ses objectifs.

Zubin Mehta, son élève, a résumé la situation dans une phrase, certes cruelle, mais opinée :

« Le problème avec Karajan, c'est que la musique ne lui a jamais suffi. » (98)

Ce qu'il voulait par-dessus tout, c'était la gloire, la réussite, la perfection. À n'importe quel prix. Quitte à faire un pas dans l'immoralité.

De 1933 à 1945 : face au régime nazi

L'attitude de Wilhelm Furtwängler sous le régime nazi est globalement celle d'une cohabitation intéressée, une conciliation dans le but de défendre les valeurs allemandes, mais aussi les artistes juifs et les compositeurs contemporains. Né à Berlin, le 25 janvier 1886, Furtwängler connaît jusqu'en 1933 une carrière sans obstacle, ses amis et ennemis musicaux reconnaissant unanimement sa valeur artistique. Directeur de l'Opéra de Mannheim pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, il effectue des tournées en Suède, et participe à la renaissance musicale de Berlin après 1918. C'est dans la capitale qu'il propose en concert des compositeurs étrangers, comme Béla Bartók ou Igor Stravinski ; mais son cœur est tout entier à la musique allemande, « manifestation la plus caractéristique, la plus profonde, la plus pure et la plus éclatante de l'esprit allemand » (99) . En 1925, à 39 ans, il dirige 6 concerts au « Carnegie Hall » de New York, et cela le propulse au rang de grand chef international. En 1933, principal chef d'Allemagne avec Richard Strauß, il est en quelque sorte, au sommet. À partir de cette date, cependant, commence une attitude unique de conciliation et de résistance mêlées face au régime.

Pour la célébration de l'avènement du 3e « Reich » , il dirige « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » de Richard Wagner , ce qui conduit Thomas Mann à le qualifier de « laquais du “ Reich ” » . Il est filmé dirigeant la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven devant le drapeau nazi et Hitler, Göring, et Goebbels, sans pour autant faire le salut hitlérien, grâce à un jeu de passe-passe avec sa baguette de direction. Il accepte les titres du régime, comme celui de « Generalmusikdirektor » ou de vice-Président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » . Pendant 2 ans, il cohabite avec les Nazis mais, en même temps, il aide les Juifs en situation délicate, il dirige de la musique bannie ; ainsi, c'est lui qui assure la création de la Suite symphonique tiré de l'Opéra « Mathis der Maler » de Paul Hindemith, non sans mal.

Les ennuis commencent réellement quand il rédige une lettre ouverte (100) pour des amis et musiciens connus mais bannis par le « Reich » , comme Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer ou Max Reinhardt (101) . En novembre 1934, ensuite, il intervient pour Paul Hindemith, dans un article en Ire page du « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » : cet article, intitulé, « Der Fall Hindemith » , fait l'effet d'une bombe et, dès lors, « la guerre contre la politique culturelle nazie est ouverte » (102) .

Furtwängler conclut son article ainsi :

« Il est certain que personne n'a fait plus pour mettre en valeur aux yeux du monde la musique allemande, dans la jeune génération, que Paul Hindemith. »

Le jour de parution de l'article, il dirige « Tristan und Isolde » au « Staatsoper » , en présence de Josef Goebbels et de Hermann Göring ; l'arrivée du Mæstro, saluée par une ovation de près de 20 minutes, inquiète le régime, qui lui inflige, dès lors, une torture mentale. Il est harangué par Göring, fustigé dans un discours par Goebbels, et doit donc céder. Il abandonne ses charges, mais il est sommé de rester en poste au Philharmonique de Berlin.

Lebrecht explique ainsi :

« Châtié d'une main, on le flattait de l'autre. Il fut la victime d'une guerre d'usure psychologique sophistiquée. » (103)

On ordonne à sa secrétaire, Bertha Geißmar, de quitter Berlin, ce qui l'affaiblit.

Le sachant, Göring déclare :

« Si Furtwängler était privé de sa Geißmar, sa personnalité musicale s'effondrerait comme un château de cartes. »

En mars 1935, pour sauver sa secrétaire, il fait publier une lettre d'excuses publiques à Goebbels pour l'affaire Hindemith. Goebbels maintient Furtwängler en poste à Berlin, et souligne dans son « Journal », en 1939 :

« Il nous a rendu un grand service à l'étranger. Il remporte des triomphes partout. Nous pouvons tirer parti de lui. »

Furtwängler refuse les dons du régime (Hitler lui propose une maison ; Göring, des voitures) , mais il cesse de diriger vers 1943 pour composer, et émigre peu avant la fin de la Guerre. Mais pourtant, pendant la Guerre, ses concerts à Berlin sont salués comme des moments d'espérance.

Boleslaw Barlog, Intendant du Théâtre de Berlin après la Guerre, souligne :

« Tous les 8 ou 15 jours, les concerts de Furtwängler étaient notre raison de vivre. »

Selon l'épouse de Wilhelm Furtwängler, Elisabeth :

« Il subissait une guerre sur 2 fronts : dans son propre pays, c'était un opposant surveillé et espionné ; à l'étranger, un Nazi insulté et diffamé. » (104)

Mais face aux persécutions du régime, à la torture morale, il choisit cependant de rester en Allemagne car, selon lui, là est sa place et son devoir de musicien allemand. Il écrira dans ses « Carnets », en 1945 :

« Ceux qui émigrèrent ou ceux qui exigèrent que l'on quitte l'Allemagne ont, avant tout, accredité l'idée que Hitler représentait le peuple allemand. Ils croyaient qu'il s'agissait de quitter une Allemagne nazie. C'est précisément ce qui est faux. L'Allemagne n'a jamais été une Allemagne nazie, mais une Allemagne gouvernée par les Nazis. »

Furtwängler a cependant l'occasion de fuir l'Allemagne, très tôt : il a une demeure à Saint-Moritz, et Arturo Toscanini le désigne comme son successeur à New York, pour « sauver son âme » . Furtwängler consulte Goebbels sur la proposition, et souhaite continuer à diriger en Allemagne, d'où d'immenses protestations contre lui aux États-Unis.

Furtwängler note dans ses « Carnets », à ce propos (105) :

« Les controverses politiques me sont très désagréables. Je ne suis pas un politicien, mais un défenseur de la musique allemande qui est le bien de l'humanité, sans lien avec la politique. »

Dans les derniers mois de la Guerre, les Nazis sont très agressifs avec lui. Concernant la question du poste proposé à New York, Goebbels lui déclare :

« Vous pouvez partir si vous le désirez, mais aussi longtemps que nous serons ici (et vous le savez, nous avons fondé un " Reich " qui durera 3,000 ans) , vous ne serez plus autorisé à fouler le sol allemand. »

En janvier 1945, Albert Speer, lui-même, lui conseille de partir en Suisse afin d'éviter le châtime nazi. Il se rend compte qu'il est surveillé, il est apeuré et, en concert à l'étranger, ne rentre pas à Berlin. Il reste en Suisse, dès février 1945, et vit 2 ans et demi à Clarens, dans le Vaud, presque sans revenus, chez Niehaus. Selon Daniel Gillis (106) , il écrit à la délégation américaine un compte-rendu sur son activité contre les Nazis. L' « Information Control Division » est d'accord pour qu'il reprenne ses activités en Allemagne, en septembre 1945, grâce à l'obtention d'un permis. Mais il ne se lance pas, préfère composer et rester avec sa famille. Fin-1945 commence alors une longue période de 2 ans et demi de dénazification et de réhabilitation.

Les années de silence : la dénazification

En 1945, les 4 puissances d'occupation de l'Allemagne ont des idées très diverses sur la régénération culturelle. La dénazification qu'elles engagent est très importante et fournit des « résultats complexes et controversés » (107) . Elle est d'abord mise en place pour ôter leurs emplois à ceux qui ont appartenu au NSDAP. Mais, très vite, la Commission de dénazification organise un système de permis après enquête sur les activités et relations entre musiciens et pouvoir pendant les années de guerre. Il faut noter que la plupart des chefs d'orchestre en contrats, à la fin de la Guerre, les conservent après ; pour les autres, la dénazification est rapide et réduite.

Ce n'est pas le cas pour Furtwängler. Il est exilé en Suisse depuis 1945, et se retrouve, malgré son appel aux autorités américaines en début d'année, sur la liste des musiciens et personnalités du monde culturel empêchés de travailler pendant la dénazification. La liste, publiée par les 3 Alliés, le condamne car il a été « Staatsrat » et vice-Président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » . Le 12 décembre, il envoie une lettre à André Schulhof, organisateur de concerts à New York, où il explique que son exil est une déconvenue personnelle pour lui et un élément de désastre pour sa civilisation, « l'Allemagne réelle » (108) . Sa condamnation tient, selon lui, de la mauvaise présentation des faits au public. Il explique aussi avoir soumis son cas à Dwight D. Eisenhower, et avoir essuyé de sa part un refus de le réhabiliter.

En février 1946, alors qu'il dirige à Vienne, il subit une nuit de détention à Innsbruck, zone contrôlée par les Français. En Autriche, l'accord de dénazification était nécessaire pour travailler. Il obtient l'accord d'un tribunal viennois pour diriger en Autriche, le 9 mars. C'est à Vienne qu'il rencontre Curt Rieß, juif allemand émigré suite au Nazisme, de nationalité américaine mais travaillant en Suisse. D'abord opposé au retour sur scène de Furtwängler, il change d'avis et prend la défense du chef, qui lui confie l'intégralité de ses documents officiels. Il devient son « conseiller en dénazification » (109) et va à Berlin donner les dossiers de défense à Robert McLure. Celui-ci veut faire lever l'interdiction contre le Mæstro mais lui demande de se rendre en Suisse, pour éviter que l'opinion publique pense à une pression sur les Alliés. Cependant, le 10 mars 1946, Furtwängler se rend à Berlin, en utilisant un avion que les autorités soviétiques ont mis à sa disposition. Il donne une conférence à Berlin-Est et, compte tenu de la compétition culturelle qui existe entre les zones d'occupation, la venue de Furtwängler est vue comme une grande opportunité par les Soviétiques.

Furtwängler déclare pendant la conférence : « Je suis à Berlin uniquement à titre privé », alors même que la capitale le rappelle dès février : « Votre patrie vous supplie de revenir. » (110) Mais cette escapade berlinoise ne plaît pas à McLure qui confirme l'interdiction de scène, à laquelle les Soviétiques répliquent en proposant à Furtwängler la direction du « Staatsoper », en zone soviétique. Mais le chef sait que cela lui exclut la possibilité de travailler à nouveau avec le « Berliner Philharmoniker ». Il retourne donc en Suisse et accepte le procès en dénazification.

En 1946, Berlin est administrée par une « Commandanture » quadripartite alliée, qui contient un comité d'affaires culturelles. Celui-ci inclue également un sous-comité à la dénazification, avec un bureau situé sur « Schlüterstraße », en zone britannique. Son secrétariat est assuré par le « Intelligence Section of British Information Services » : son rôle est de formuler la liste des 25,000 membres de la « Reichsmusikkammer » et de superviser le tribunal, le « Spruchkammer ». Les membres du NSDAP ou ceux des « Kulturkammer » doivent comparaître devant ce tribunal pour obtenir un permis de scène. Les décisions du « Spruchkammer » sont cependant soumises à la ratification des Alliés. Il comprend 22 membres allemands chargés de superviser « la révocation de leurs positions de responsabilité des Nazis et des personnes hostiles aux résolutions des Alliés ». En mars 1946, le sous-comité de dénazification est supervisé par George Clare, officier britannique, de son vrai nom Georg Klaar, juif viennois exilé d'Allemagne en 1938, à l'âge de 17 ans ; c'est lui qui est en charge du dossier Furtwängler. Le Major Sely, son supérieur, lui donne 4 semaines pour boucler le travail.

Clare écrit à ce sujet :

« Le « Spruchkammer » aurait à donner son verdict, mais sur quoi ? Pouvait-on vivre dans une totale dictature en restant sans tâche ? Passer des compromis avec le mal pour éviter le pire ; cette justification est toujours vaine. Mais savoir cela après les faits est aussi facile qu'il est difficile de reconnaître la malignité dès le début. »

En avril, à la réunion du sous-comité de dénazification, Clare évoque le dossier Furtwängler. Les représentants des 4 puissances veulent la réhabilitation du chef, car ils savent qu'il n'a pas été nazi.

Arsenyi Gouliga, le représentant soviétique, déclare :

« Il est ridicule de faire faire la queue comme n'importe qui au plus grand chef d'orchestre du monde. Toute cette histoire est inutile. »

Les 3 autres puissances sont cependant d'avis de faire un procès rapide à Furtwängler, sur les mêmes bases que n'importe quel autre musicien, et la procédure de dénazification commune s'engage.

Furtwängler doit alors attendre 6 mois avant de passer devant le « Spruchkammer » ; des commentateurs y ont vu la malveillance des autorités américaines, comme Sam H. Shirakava (III) , qui déclare :

« Le procès de Furtwängler se devait d'être une mise au bûcher. »

Il explique que les autorités américaines ont retardé le procès pour laisser la primauté au procès de Nuremberg (qui se déroule du 20 novembre 1945 au 6 septembre 1946) , et « que rien ne devait détourner l'attention de cet événement. Le monde entier serait ainsi prêt pour le procès de la bande des leaders hitlériens en décembre » . En vérité, cela est très peu probable, car le retard vient après que le sous-comité de dénazification transmette le dossier au « Spruchkammer » , et les Américains n'ont aucune puissance dans le tribunal, très indépendant. L'autonomie du tribunal est défendue par Wolfgang Schmidt, secrétaire et juge principal, et Alex Vogel, son président, tous 2 membres d'un mouvement berlinois anti-nazi pendant la Guerre. Le long délai pour l'audition de Furtwängler provient ainsi très probablement d'une masse de cas à juger et du temps nécessaire pour recueillir l'ensemble des éléments du dossier.

Furtwängler est accusé sur 2 points : le fait d'avoir été « Staatsrat » et vice-Président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , même s'il y a été nommé sans avis ; et sur 2 faits précis : il dirige lors de 2 cérémonies du NSDAP, et a fait une remarque antisémite contre Victor de Sabata.

Vogel ouvre la séance du tribunal en déclarant :

« Furtwängler n'a été membre d'aucune organisation nazie, il a essayé d'aider des gens persécutés, et a évité les formalités telles que le salut à Hitler. »

Des investigations sont menées, et elles sont en faveur de Furtwängler. Schmidt, à la tête du tribunal par son aisance et son autorité (qui, selon Clare, le faisaient souvent ressembler à Gœbbels ...) , peine à reconnaître la victoire de Furtwängler. Hans von Benda, son témoin, ancien membre du NSDAP, change son témoignage en cours de procès et nie l'antisémitisme de Furtwängler.

Schmidt en est réduit à déclarer des absurdités, telles que :

« Il est possible que, sans être antisémite, vous n'en pensiez pas moins que certaines choses ne devraient pas être exécutées par des Juifs. »

Furtwängler répond stoïquement :

« C'est ridicule. »

Roger Smithson note :

« L'ensemble des débats a été marqué par une sorte de confusion et d'absence du sens des réalités. »

Le Major Sely relate aussi cette impression :

« Ce fut le cirque plus que jamais. Le résultat était connu d'avance, même si notre gaillard s'est comporté comme un éléphant dans un magasin de porcelaine. Vogel a essayé de coller à Furtwängler la responsabilité de la mort de Van der Nüll : une absurdité. »

Le « Spruchkammer » proclame l'acquittement de Furtwängler, le 17 décembre 1946 : la ratification est retardée de plusieurs mois, car de nombreux cas sont à traiter avant celui de Furtwängler, et aussi parce qu'il manque du papier pour taper les comptes rendus des affaires. Le 1er engagement de Furtwängler intervient en Italie, en avril 1947, puis avec le « Berliner Philharmoniker », le 27 mai de la même année, pour la 1re fois depuis 2 ans et demi.

Après 2 ans et demi de procès, celui dont Heinrich Himmler avait dit : « Il n'y a pas un Juif pour lequel Furtwängler ne soit intervenu. », gagne une réhabilitation, en même temps qu'il revient à la direction. Cet épisode le marque profondément.

Il note ainsi dans ses « Carnets », en 1946 :

« J'ai essayé, très profondément, de juger mon attitude. Je ne suis pas meilleur que d'autres. Mais 2 choses me dictait mon instinct : l'amour pour ma patrie et mon peuple, qui est physique et spirituel ; et le sentiment d'avoir, ici, la tâche de réparer un tort. »

Pour sa défense au tribunal, interrogé sur la raison pour laquelle il n'a pas émigré avant les menaces finales de Goebbels, il cite Arnold Schönberg, lequel lui demande en 1933 :

« Il faut que vous restiez en Allemagne, pour diriger de la bonne musique. »

Le compositeur écrit pour sa défense :

« Je suis sûr qu'il n'a jamais été Nazi. Il appartient à ces nationaux-allemands démodés. Je suis persuadé qu'il n'a jamais été antisémite. De plus, c'est un vrai talent. Et il aime la musique, lui. »

Après son procès, Furtwängler subit des attaques aux États-Unis (112) où on le qualifie de Nazi. En 1948, on lui propose un poste à l'Orchestre de Chicago, mais un tollé se forme contre sa nomination, mené par James Petrillo, Président du Syndicat des Musiciens Américains. Yehudi Menuhin, qui soutient Furtwängler pendant le procès en dénazification et pour sa réhabilitation, se déclare outré de « l'attitude insolente » déployée « pour exclure un illustre collègue » (113) Après 1948, Furtwängler organise des tournées avec le « Berliner Philharmoniker » en Europe, et même en Égypte, mais il a perdu beaucoup de sa force dans un procès long et pénible, lui qui se croyait hors de tout soupçon.

Il a aussi perdu foi en son pays et en son devoir, comme lorsqu'il écrit, toujours dans ses « Carnets » (113) :

« Il n'est pas un peuple au monde qui sache estimer aussi peu ses grands hommes que les Allemands. »

C'est en novembre 1954 qu'il s'éteint, paisiblement, épuisé, et évincé par son rival, Herbert von Karajan.

Furtwängler est donc resté en Allemagne, pour diriger et défendre l'esprit allemand :

« Je savais que l'Allemagne vivait une terrible crise, je me sentais responsable de la musique allemande, et mon devoir était de l'aider à traverser cette crise. Thomas Mann croit-il vraiment que, dans l'Allemagne de Himmler, on ne devait pas diriger les œuvres de Beethoven ? Jamais ce peuple n'avait autant eu besoin d'écouter la musique de Beethoven et son message de paix et d'amour. »

Il déclare ainsi à un journaliste anglais, après-guerre :

« La simple exécution d'un chef-d'œuvre allemand représentait un plus cinglant démenti à l'esprit de Buchenwald ou d'Auschwitz que tous les discours. Un artiste ne peut pas être totalement apolitique, il doit avoir des convictions. En tant que citoyen, c'est le devoir d'un artiste d'exprimer ses convictions. Mais, comme musicien, je suis plus que citoyen, je suis allemand au sens éternel. » (114)

Peut-être peut-on conclure par les mots d'Emst Lothar, assistant de Max Reinhardt, et officier chargé des questions culturelles en Autriche :

« Furtwängler était totalement allemand, et il l'est resté, en dépit des attaques. Il n'est pas resté auprès de Hitler et de Himmler, mais auprès de Beethoven et de Brahms. » (115)

Historiographie

Les rapports entre musique et politique n'ont pas toujours été un élément clé des recherches des historiens du culturel, ni des musicologues intéressés à l'histoire. Mais, cependant, la place et le rôle de la musique dans les régimes comme l'Allemagne nazie ou l'URSS stalinienne, semblent exercer une certaine fascination chez les spécialistes d'histoire culturelle. Et même si, par rapport à la peinture ou l'architecture, la musique ne détient pas le nombre le plus élevé de productions, celles-ci se sont développées après 1950, en Europe et aux États-Unis.

Concernant la période nazie, il existe tout d'abord des ouvrages contemporains, écrits le plus souvent par des membres du NSDAP, ou de fervents sympathisants. C'est le cas de productions destinées à examiner le rôle pervers des Juifs dans la musique, comme :

Hans Brückner. « Judentum und Musik - mit dem ABC jüdischer und nichtarischer Musikbessener. » , 2e édition (1935) ; 3e édition (1938) .

Richard Eichenauer. « Musik und Rasse » , 2e édition (1937) .

Friedrich Herzog. « Was ist deutsche Musik ? » , tiré de : « Die Musik » , Band XXVI (11 août 1934) .

Alfred Rosenberg. « Blut und Ehre - Ein Kampf für deutsche Wiedergeburt. Reden und Aufsätze von 1919-1933 . » (1936) .

Herbert Gerigk et Theoth Stengel. « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik. Mit einem Titel Jüdischer Werke. » (1940) .

Des ouvrages de propagande sont aussi écrits par les autorités officielles pour promouvoir la théorie musicale du régime : cela commence avec le gouvernement de Thuringe, dès 1930, avec le « Amtsblatt des Thüringischen Ministeriums für Volksbildung » (1930) , puis, le « Kampf um Deutschland Ein Lesebuch für die deutsche Jugend » de Philipp Bouhler (Munich, « Zentralverlag der NSDAP » , 1932) . Les propos du « Führer » concernant la musique sont même publiés : « Führerworte an den deutschen Musiker. Aus der großen Kulturrede auf dem Reichsparteitag 1938 » , ou dans le « Amtliche Mitteilungen der Reichsmusikkammer » (septembre 1938) . L'exposition « Entartete Musik » , antisémite et anti-modernisme, voit son catalogue publié très tôt ; très rapidement, des ouvrages se développent sur le sujet. Un mois à peine après l'exposition, on compte ainsi « Die Reichsmusiktage in Düsseldorf Ausstellung " Entartete Musik " - Eine Ahrechnung » , de Friedrich Herzog. Peter Raabe, grand rival de Josef Goebbels dans la lutte pour le contrôle de la vie musicale, publie lui aussi un essai, « Die Musik im Dritten Reich, Kulturpolitische Reden und Aufsätze » (1935) . D'autres dignitaires du régime s'expriment sur le rôle de la musique dans l'éducation du Peuple, par exemple, Fritz Reusch dans « Musik und Musikerziehung im Dienste der Volksgemeinschaft » (1938) , ou encore, Wolfgang Stumme dans « Musik im Volk. Grundfragen der Musikerziehung » (1939) .

Les compositeurs de la période 1933-1945 fournissent également nombre d'informations sur la vie musicale en période nazie, par leurs correspondances ou leurs mémoires. Citons pour exemple : « Schriften / Musik und Politik 1924-1948 » de Hanns Eisler ; « Du nationalisme en musique » (II) (1937) de Arnold Schönberg (dans : « Le Style et l'Idée » , 1977) ; les « Correspondances » de Richard Strauss (avec Hugo von Hofmannsthal et Stefan Zweig) ; « Chroniques de ma vie » de Igor Stravinski ; ou encore, « Ausgewählte Schriften » de Kurt Weill.

Après quelques années de réflexion et de débats, les historiens allemands commencent des recherches plus poussées sur la musique en période nazie. On peut citer pour exemple : « Musik im dritten Reich » de Joseph Wulf (1962) ; Musik im NS-Saat » de Fred K. Prieberg (1982) ; « Musik und Musikpolitik im faschistischen Deutschland » de Hanns-Werner Heister et Hans-Günther Klein (1984) ; ainsi que « Entartete Musik » de Albrecht Dümling et Peter Girth (1988) . En 1997, Thomas Mathieu publie un remarquable essai sur la politique artistique du National-Socialisme, « Kunstauffassungen und Kulturpolitik im Nationalsozialismus » , qui complète l'ouvrage de Hildegard Brenner (1980) , « Die Kunstpolitik des Nationalsozialismus » . En 2004, le brillant historien culturel Friedrich Geiger publie « Musik in zwei Diktaturen. Verfolgung von Komponisten unter Hitler und Stalin » , où il étudie les types de répression face aux compositeurs en Allemagne nazie et en URSS. À la « Freie Universität » et à la « Musikhochschule » de Berlin, une équipe de musicologues et d'historiens de la culture, menée par Eberhardt Manfred et Albrecht Riethmüller, de l'« Institut für Musikwissenschaft », travaillent actuellement sur les rapports entre le régime nazi et la musique.

Dans les pays anglo-saxons, comme c'est le cas en Allemagne, la recherche ne se divise pas entre historiens de la culture et musicologues ; les travaux sont souvent communs, et menés de front sur les 2 niveaux, sans affirmer une dominante musicologique ou historique. Parmi les travaux les plus importants, il faut citer : Erik Levi et son « Music in the 3rd " Reich " » ; Jonathan Petropoulos et ses 2 essais, « Arts and Politics in the 3rd " Reich " » et « The Faustian Bargain : The Art World in Nazi Germany » ; Alan E. Steinweis se concentre sur le contrôle de la vie musicale en publiant « Art, Ideology & Economics in Nazi Germany : The " Reich " Chamber of Music, Theater and the Visual Arts » ; en 2004, Michal Meyer réalise un ouvrage complet sur la politique musicale du « Reich », intitulée : « The Politics of Music in the 3rd " Reich " ». L'un des principaux historiens culturels s'étant penché sur le thème de la musique sous le régime nazi est Michael H. Kater qui, par ses 2 ouvrages, « Composers of the Nazi Era » et « The Twisted Muse : Musicians and Their Music in the 3rd " Reich " », réalise un tableau d'ensemble de la musique entre 1933 et 1945.

En France, la recherche sur les relations entre histoire et musique est assez peu développée et divisée entre musicologues et historiens. Du côté des historiens de la culture, Michel Vovelle a été l'un des précurseurs et l'ont suivi dans cette voie. Esteban Buch, qui enseigne à l'École des Hautes-Études en Sciences Sociales (EHESS), auteur de « La 9e de Beethoven : une histoire politique ; Beethoven et le 3e " Reich " : profil d'un Titan conservateur » dans : « Le 3e " Reich " et la musique » de Pascal Huynh ; ou encore, « Le chef d'orchestre. Pratiques de l'autorité et métaphores politiques », Annales HSS, 57e année, n° 4 (juillet-août 2002). Pascal Huynh, justement, a préparé l'exposition et le catalogue de « La Musique et le 3e " Reich " », à la Cité de la Musique, Paris (2004). À l'E.H.E.S.S., un groupe de recherche sur le thème « Musique et politique » s'est constitué autour de Jean-Marie Donegani, Esteban Buch, Gil Delannoi, Laure Schnapper, Frédéric Ramel, ..., et a publié un dossier intitulé : « Musique et politique » (mai 2004), incluant des études sur la musique sous le 3e « Reich ». À l'Institut de Sciences Politiques de Paris, Myriam Chimenes et Manuela Schwartz travaillent sur la musique en Allemagne Nazie et dans la France occupée : Myriam Chimenes a ainsi dirigé le recueil « La Musique sous Vichy ».

Du côté des musicologues, on peut citer les essais de François Caodou, de l'Institut Français de Musicologie, comme « Une philosophie de la Musique dégénérée ; La vie musicale sous Vichy » ; ou encore, « Wagner et Hitler ». Amaury du Closel, musicologue et chef d'orchestre, réalise en 2004 un essai sur la vie musicale sous le régime nazi et, plus précisément, sur les compositeurs et musiciens interdits d'expression, ou pire, éliminés par le régime (« Entartete Musik : les voix étouffées du 3e " Reich " »).

Concernant la recherche sur la vie musicale sous le régime nazi, les perspectives d'étude restent donc largement ouvertes, tant sur les organisations officielles du régime, que sur le rôle des politiciens du « Reich », et les destins de musiciens et compositeurs.

Conclusion

« La musique n'est pas une arche sur laquelle on peut survivre au déluge », écrivait Bertolt Brecht à Paul Hindemith. Cette remarque semble à elle seule exprimer la complexité, l'enjeu et le dilemme soulevés par l'exercice d'un art sous une dictature. Et nombre de musiciens, durant la période nazie, en auront fait l'expérience, qu'ils soient condamnés pour « bolchévisme », « modernisme », ou « juiverie » : leur art ne les a pas sauvés de l'implacable tyrannie.

À l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir, en 1933, les mesures destinées à contrôler la vie culturelle sont immédiates : comme le souligne Pascal Huynh, organisateur de l'exposition « Le 3e " Reich " et la Musique » (116) :

« Jamais un pays, dont les nouveaux Maîtres étaient convaincus que leur mission était de restaurer l'honneur national, ne se soucia autant de l'élévation de son patrimoine. Jamais la vie des concerts ne fut aussi favorisée. »

Ainsi, un art de propagande, avec des compositeurs officiels du « Reich » tels Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, Paul Græner ou Max Trapp, se développe, alors que les courants du modernisme musical, sont, dans l'ensemble et à l'exception de certaines périodes précises, liquidés : Arnold Schœnberg, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Kurt Weill, Ernst Křenek, et même Paul Hindemith, un temps idolâtré du régime, sont bannis. Des compositeurs de l'héritage germanique, comme Anton Bruckner et Richard Wagner, sont, à l'inverse, érigés en gloires nationales. Le répertoire est aryanisé pour répondre aux exigences idéologiques du régime, détournant les livrets de Lorenzo da Ponte ou de Georg Friedrich Händel.

À cet égard, la lutte contre les musiciens classés « dégénérés » par le régime, soit parce qu'ils sont Juifs, affiliés au modernisme musical ou au jazz, bolchéviques, ... , bref, porteurs pour le régime de toutes les marques de l'« Entartung », cette lutte est symbolisée par un événement exemplaire : l'exposition « Entartete Musik » de 1938, organisée par Hans Severus Ziegler, et qui fustige tous les compositeurs et musiciens bannis par le « Reich » .

Josef Gœbbels et d'autres politiques du Parti nazi, comme Alfred Rosenberg, Hermann Gœring ou encore Peter Raabe, se battent afin d'obtenir le contrôle de la vie musicale. C'est finalement le Ministre de la Propagande qui l'emporte et peut exercer son pouvoir sur les arts, en mettant en place une véritable « Gleichschaltung » de la vie musicale. C'est par différents organismes qu'il va assujettir la musique au service du régime nazi : les chambres artistiques, comme la « Reichsmusikkammer », en sont le meilleur exemple. Il crée aussi une « Reichsmusikprüfstelle », organisme de censure, ainsi qu'une division musicale au sein même du « Promi », qu'il confie à Heinz Drewes. Mais, en 1943, la multiplicité des organes de contrôle, leur manque de cohésion et de concertation, et leur difficile fonctionnement, montre que ni Gœbbels, ni le Parti nazi n'ont vraiment réussi à mettre au point un contrôle absolu sur la vie musicale allemande, même si de nombreux et éminents musiciens en ont été victimes.

Dans ce 20e siècle troublé, une personnalité part à l'assaut du monde musical : le chef d'orchestre. Avec Hans von Bülow, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, et Arthur Nikisch, le chef devient une personnalité respectée et reconnue. Elle est sacrée avec Arturo Toscanini, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer ou encore Leopold Stokowski, qui deviennent des « stars » au sens propre du terme, des étoiles qui brillent sur les scènes du monde entier. La génération suivante les transformera en demi-Dieux : Georg Solti, Leonard Bernstein, et plus encore, Herbert von Karajan monopolisant la vie musicale par leurs interprétations et leurs personnalités.

Parmi ces derniers, 2 chefs ont vécu le régime nazi : Furtwängler et Karajan. Les 2 n'ont pas choisi le même chemin, la même attitude face au régime, mais tous 2 ont connu le même sort après la Guerre : la dénazification, et un certain discrédit qui influera sur leurs carrières respectives. Furtwängler a choisi de servir son art en demeurant en Allemagne, coûte que coûte, en intégrant certaines organisations, telles la « Reichsmusikkammer », et a justifié cette attitude en déclarant n'avoir fait que « sauver, du mieux (qu'il a pu), la culture et la musique (allemandes) », conformément à ce que lui aurait demandé Schönberg lors d'une rencontre en France. Furtwängler fait preuve d'un certain courage en prenant position ouvertement pour la défense de musiciens juifs comme Klemperer, et pour Hindemith le moderniste. Mais, en 1945, ses concerts pour le régime et sa participation à la vie musicale nazie le font suspecter et il doit subir la dénazification, dont il sort blanchi, mais blessé dans son honneur. Karajan, quant à lui, est propulsé et érigé en rival jeune et puissant par le régime contre un Furtwängler quelquefois dérangeant. Son attitude face au Parti nazi est moins ambiguë : il y adhère par 2 fois et, dès 1933, accepte d'aller écouter la musique SS dans des camps, travaille avec un « Obersturmführer ». Lui aussi est soumis à la dénazification, et subit 30 mois de chômage, avant de connaître la gloire à Londres, Rome, Vienne, puis Berlin. Face à un Furtwängler sur le déclin, il devient le « Generalmusikdirektor » de l'Europe jusqu'à sa mort, en 1989.

Ce mémoire s'est voulu une 1re approche dans l'étude du monde musical sous le 3e « Reich » : elle ne se veut ni exhaustive, ni achevée. Toute une partie de la vie musicale de 1933 à 1945 a été volontairement éludée dans ce mémoire, à savoir celle organisée par les Juifs eux-mêmes. Certains d'entre-eux choisissent l'exil, en France, comme Erich Kahn, Hanns Eisler ou Joseph Kosma, en Grande-Bretagne, ou aux États-Unis, comme Miklós Rosza, Ernst Křenek, ou Paul Hindemith. D'autres rejoignent la Ligue culturelle des Juifs, le « Jüdischer Kulturbund », qui développe des Orchestres juifs, sous administration juive et destinés à un public juif. Selon l'historien Herbert Freedman (118), ces activités n'étaient pas vaines, dans la mesure où « soir après soir, se trouvait réfuté l'argument de ceux qui pensaient que les Juifs étaient incapables de manier la musique et le verbe ». Cette Ligue fonctionne jusqu'en 1941, date à laquelle la plupart de ses membres sont envoyés à Terezín, antichambre d'Auschwitz. C'est dans ce camp de concentration que des compositeurs comme Pavel Haas, Hans Krása, et Viktor Ullmann seront amenés à composer des œuvres magistrales, mais trop longtemps oubliées. Ullmann compose ainsi l'Opéra « Der Kaiser von Atlantis » comme un testament, avant d'être mené à la mort.

Que peut-on conclure de cette étude ? Que le Nazisme a soumis la musique, comme les autres formes d'art, à son régime ? Que musique et politique ne font pas bon ménage, en témoignent les exemples de Furtwängler ou Karajan ? Certes, ces remarques paraissent simplistes, trop certainement. Cette musique, cependant, a été muselée, humiliée, voire détruite, mais n'a jamais cessé et s'est au contraire enrichie et développée, comme dans un élan d'espoir, comme pour exprimer une volonté de vie à travers l'Art. Peut-être aussi parce que, « sans la musique, la vie serait une tragédie », comme le dit Friedrich Nietzsche, et que, sans la musique, la barbarie nazie aurait sans doute encore été plus barbare.

Résumé

Ce mémoire a été réalisé afin d'observer quels ont été les rapports entre musique et politique durant la période nazie, en Allemagne. Le fait que le « Reich » ait imposé une doctrine politique, sociale mais aussi artistique, a profondément bouleversé la vie des personnels artistiques, des musiciens, et des compositeurs. Il est aussi intéressant de voir à quel point la musique, et les arts en général, sont devenus un enjeu politique certain : si dans certaines périodes troublées de l'Histoire de l'humanité, la musique n'a pas joué un rôle de 1er plan, il semble qu'en Allemagne nazie, la musique, et particulièrement les musiciens, aient été un élément important de la politique artistique, et plus encore, de la politique globale du régime.

Ainsi, le but de cette étude est double :

Observer comment le 3e « Reich » a établi une doctrine artistique, et par quels moyens l'État a réussi à la faire appliquer.

Étudier comment 2 chefs d'orchestre allemands (Karajan et Furtwängler) , parmi les plus marquants de leur génération, ont subi et / ou collaboré avec le régime, et quels en ont été les conséquences après-guerre sur leurs carrières.

Afin de répondre à ces interrogations, des aspects théoriques ont été utilisés : les lois du « Reich » et les décrets-lois de Josef Gœbbels relatives aux Arts, l'organisation de la « Reichskulturkammer » ou de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , des statistiques de performances par compositeur, par chef. La politique musicale de l'État nazi nous a aussi conduit à nous intéresser à des notions plus abstraites comme l'« Entartung » , symbolisée musicalement par le jazz ou le modernisme ; l'aryanisation du répertoire ; ou encore les courants de la musique contemporaine de l'époque, à travers leurs spécificités et leur diversité. Enfin, des débats historiographiques ont été soulevés, portant sur les attitudes de politiciens importants du régime, et sur celles des 2 chefs mentionnés ci-dessus.

La 1re partie s'intéresse à l'idéologie et à la politique musicale mise en œuvre lors de l'accession au pouvoir des Nazis, en 1933, en théorisant les notions de modernisme (« Kulturbolschewismus ») , « antisémitisme » ou encore « Entartung » . Dans le second temps, les organisations destinées au contrôle de la politique artistique sont détaillées, ainsi que les luttes politiques pour leur contrôle : la « Gleichschaltung » , la « Reichsmusikkammer » , le rôle de Gœbbels ou de Rosenberg. La dernière partie de l'étude concerne les carrières et les attitudes de Karajan et Furtwängler durant la période nazie, ainsi que les conséquences à long terme de leurs actions, de leurs prises de positions, ou de leurs silences.

Il ressort de ces éléments que musique et politique ont été intimement liées durant ces années « noires » , et que bien des carrières de musiciens ont été bouleversées par une machine étatique appliquant une doctrine plus ou moins précise, mais toujours implacable ...

Le jazz sous le 3e « Reich »

During the Weimar Republic, jazz conquered Germany and in the process became a symbol of the « Roaring 20's » . Yet, bitter protest was already stirring from nationalist conservatives and right-wing circles. After Adolf Hitler took power, in 1933, the conflict over jazz intensified. The so-called « Fremdländisch » (alien) music had to be eradicated. After some early prohibitions, in this regard, and the creation of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , which would mean exclusion for Jewish musicians and impede artistic exchange with foreign musicians, there followed a liberal phase owing to the 1936 Olympic games being held in Berlin. With the success of the new jazz-style swing and the strengthening of the so-called « Swingjugend » (Swing Youth) , however, further repression came in 1937 and 1938. District Nazi Party leaders, police directors and local business people began to issue numerous decrees prohibiting swing, jazz, and swing dancing for their respective region, city or local establishment. Despite these restrictions, jazz's presence continued, because of the ease with which ignorant inspectors were out-smarted, and the sympathies for the agreeable swing style harboured even by some Nazi functionaries.

After the beginning of World War II, the boycott of cultural products from so-called enemy nations, and bans on dancing, also came to affect jazz. Nevertheless, jazz experienced an upturn in the years of the German « Blitzkrieg » , so much so that after the initial War successes, the prohibition on swing dancing, for example, was once again lifted. On the other hand, jazz bands were brought from countries occupied by or allied with Germany as a substitute for the German musicians called into the armed services. These bands satisfied the demand for syncopated popular music by the civilian population as well as by soldiers on leave from the front. For economic reasons, the Nazi regime, for a long time, even tolerated the production and distribution of German as well as foreign records and films with jazz content. On various occasions, moreover, swing music was actually used in foreign propaganda. This occurred, for example, in recordings and radio broadcasts of the propaganda big band « Charlie and his Orchestra » , which was assembled by order of Josef Gœbbels' « Propagandaministerium » (Ministry of Propaganda) . Only on 17 January 1942, were public and private dance events finally prohibited. The defeat at Stalingrad (31 January - 2 February 1943) and Gœbbels' proclamation of « Total War » (18 February 1943) signalled the end for most of the venues used by swing bands, which in the end led to the downfall of jazz as well.

Despite all the campaigns of defamation and prohibition, as well as the incarceration of some jazz musicians and jazz fans, it cannot be said that there was no German jazz scene in the 3rd « Reich » . Sustained by professional and amateur musicians, jazz bands, and also by enthusiastic swing fans and record collectors, it is more accurate to say that the development of jazz was severely encumbered by political conditions. This made the jazz scene increasingly dependent for its survival upon the loopholes of Nazi cultural policy. Such loopholes existed because the cultural politics of the 3rd « Reich » « vis-a-vis » jazz and jazz-related music was characterized by the coexistence of contradictory and ambivalent measures, for which no unified strategy existed. Depending on the inner dynamic of Nazi ideology and foreign policy developments, Nazism's response to jazz oscillated between prohibition for ideological reasons, and toleration and appropriation for economic and market-driven considerations. This explains why the Nazis did not decree an all-encompassing, nationwide ban on jazz, nor issue any corresponding law.

Jazz in the Camps

Though ostracized by the Nazi regime as « degenerate », reports by historical witnesses and survivors substantiate the claim that jazz, as well as jazz-related music, could be heard within numerous Nazi camps. That such reports do not constitute the exception is made clear by similar activities of prisoners of War, in camps for foreign civilians and forced labour camps, in police detainment camps, in the internment camps of Vichy (France) , in the Dutch transport camp « Westerbork » , and in the Polish ghettos of Łódź, Warsaw and Vilna, not to mention the equally secret jazz sessions of the members of the « Swingjugend » in youth detention and concentration camps. A few examples should serve to make the spectrum of these jazz activities clear.

In the French prisoner camp in Perpignan, in 1942, for example, the Viennese Erich Pechmann, imprisoned because of his Jewish faith, sang blues pieces and, in addition, imitated instruments with his voice. Using only these simple methods, as Fred Wander relates, Pechmann was able to boost the morale of his fellow prisoners :

« When he played, everything became quiet. He magically produced the sound of an entire band. Everywhere where Pechmann went, he reassured these frightened people. »

Pechmann himself would not survive his detention, and died on 4 August 1944 of typhus.

In November 1939, a group of students from Czechoslovakia founded a vocal octet called the « Sing Sing Boys » in Sachsenhausen. One part of their programme consisted of well-known musical dance numbers of film melodies in a swing arrangement. Beyond that, they used compositions in the jazz idiom from their musical leader Karel Štancl as well as satirical songs from the Liberated Theatre in Prague, which had been closed in 1938 due to its anti-Fascist leanings. These songs contained the heavily jazz-influenced melodies of Jaroslav Ježek, and their performance was prohibited by the German occupiers. Josef Šárka described the concerts of the « Sing Sing Boys » in a letter :

« These appearances were regularly planned. Saturday, Sunday, but also spontaneously, when the oldest camp prisoners came to visit for example. Or during recreational time, when there was no trouble brewing in the camp and it was unlikely that the SS would enter the camp. »

Sometimes even SS members were in the audience, looking for a distraction. Even those prisoners who did not have the energy or opportunity to be present at such concerts were, after a note from Štancl, thankful for the encouragement and variety :

« I cannot think of a single appearance in front of the comrades which was not well-received, with satisfaction and even a certain amount of thankfulness. »

All members of the « Sing Sing Boys » were released under the auspices of a prisoner amnesty program by spring 1943.

In the concentration camp at Buchenwald there were already plans, in 1939, to found a jazz ensemble, but this could only be realized 4 years later, with the support of the illegal International Camp Committee of inmates. This organization had been able to place politically active prisoners in key positions in the camp bureaucracy. Herbert Weidlich, active in the office detail, could now assign all of the musicians of the jazz orchestra « Rhythm » to the specially created work detail for « Transport Protection » . This provided enough time for rehearsals, which were held secretly during time officially allotted for work. A further advantage was that the musicians were not threatened by dangerous or physically demanding work. Not least, the « manipulation » of transports from Buchenwald to other camps guaranteed a constant supply of personnel. Gradually, « Rhythm » developed into a big band with an international personnel that ranged from the amateur to the professional. Older prisoners, who had at 1st rejected « bourgeois » jazz music, recognized that these performances served not only to boost the morale of the prisoners, but also as camouflage for illegal meetings of the camp committee. The concerts themselves took place in specific blocks and, with the knowledge of the SS, also at entertainment evenings held in the movie barracks, so that here, too, jazz music could be heard. Through newly arrived musicians allocated to the band, band members were even made familiar with the latest stylistic developments in jazz. According to Jiri Zák, a U.S. pilot who had been shot down told the band about « Bebop » and « Gillespie's and Parker's " Workshop " on 52nd Street » .

Due to its special position as a « show camp » , « Theresienstadt » had at its disposal an extraordinary amount of cultural freedom and a high-standing (both quantitatively and qualitatively) musical life. Alongside numerous performances of Classical music, there were regular jazz concerts. The jazz combo of the clarinetist and saxophonist Bedrich « Fritz » Weiß was one of the 1st music groups to be formed there. Besides this, the incarcerated jazz and dance musicians accompanied cabaret shows and grouped together to form various bands. The most famous of these was the « Ghetto-Swingers » , which matured from a Czech amateur band under the leadership of the pianist Martin Roman to become an big band. Their music was often rejected by older camp inmates, while younger ones like Klaus Scheurenberg considered the musicians, a sensation :

« “ Nigger jazz ” was offered here, in outstanding form, without objection from the SS. For us, young people, Viennese “ Café ” music was boring, but the new style of the “ Ghetto-Swingers ” buoyed us through their weekly performances in front of the café. »

This popularity and even a performance in a propaganda film about the camp could not, however, protect the « Ghetto-Swingers » from deportation to Auschwitz-Birkenau. Those who had survived the selection formed the core for the newly-founded camp band. Guitarist Coco Schumann talked about this in an interview :

« So the camp “ Kapo ” (leader of work commandos) and “ Lagerälteste ” (camp leader) had a party for the “ Blockältesten ” (block leaders) . And we played. They came in woman's clothing and shoes. Then, they were drunk. One of them took his shoe off and I had to drink champagne from it. But as hard criminals often are, when they hear music, they start crying like babies. »

If the musicians in « Theresienstadt » could fashion a pure, artistically ambitious jazz repertoire, then they became mere musical slaves in Auschwitz, where their lives depended upon the momentary disposition of the SS and functionaries. Because the musicians were useful for them, the camp band did offer the possibility of escaping the gas chamber. Later, the remaining musicians were transferred via Berlin and Sachsenhausen into a satellite camp of Dachau. But only a few members of the « Ghetto-Swingers » survived the Shoah.

Depending on the particular camp and the specific situation of the camp, the function of jazz and jazz-influenced music in the Nazi camp system was extremely variable. On the one hand, it was an essential component of illegal and / or tolerated camp culture ; on the other, it was a means of propaganda and distraction for the henchmen of the Nazi regime. In their own field of responsibility, individual SS members hardly bothered themselves about the music guidelines of the regime. And so, it came to pass that even the « SS-Rottenführer » (an SS leader) Percy Broad jammed together with Dutch jazz musicians in the men's section of Auschwitz-Birkenau. Only through such varying motivations could the scorned jazz « survive » in, of all places, the Nazi camps. Likewise, the saxophonist Miroslav Hejtmár summarized of his performances with the Buchenwald jazz orchestra « Rhythm » :

« Music that was strictly prohibited as “ racially impure ” by the 3rd “ Reich ” was played before a public so international in composition that, under any other circumstances, it would not have come together. And all of these listeners understood what it was about. The SS, though, did not get it. »

Swing as an Attitude Towards Life

Arising in the mid-1930's and originating in the United States, the newest style of jazz, swing, brought forth a renewed interest in jazz across the world, even in Nazi Germany. As the world began to recover from economic depression, swing and swing-influenced music came to represent the latest trend in popular music. Despite discrimination against jazz music and jazz culture in the 3rd « Reich » , swing found an enthusiastic and dance-hungry audience. For a group of mostly young fans, however, swing music and dancing represented more than a passing fad. For them, it became an overall attitude towards life. These enthusiastic swing fans created their own discrete youth culture. They were to be found primarily in large cities across almost the entire European continent, e.g. , in England, France (« Les Zazous ») , Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Austria (« Schlurfs ») , Switzerland and in the former Czechoslovakia. In comparison with developments in other countries, however, German swing fans were decisively affected not only by the stigmatization of jazz by the Nazi regime, but also by preparations for War and / or experiences of War. This meant that it was only in Germany, with allowance for the annexed Austria, that the « Swingjugend » became a political matter.

Swingjugend

The 1st German « Swing Cliques » , as they were snidely termed in Nazi jargon, originated in 1935-1936 in Hamburg, Berlin, and Frankfurt-am-Main. Incidentally, though the term « Swingjugend » (Swing Youth) also derives from Nazi parlance and is similarly discriminatory in intent, it became the standard term. By contrast, the term « Swing Kids » is not historically founded and appeared for the 1st time in the film of the same name (United States, 1993, directed by Thomas Carter) . In the 1st years of the War, the « Swingjugend » movement registered a comparably large influx of members and developed into a protest movement that the Nazi regime had to take seriously. The « Swingjugend » rejected the Nazi State, above all because of its ideology and uniformity, its militarism, the « Führer principle » and the leveling « Volksgemeinschaft » (People's Community) . They experienced a massive restriction of their personal freedom. They rebelled against all this with jazz and swing, which stood for a love of life, self-determination, non-conformism, freedom, independence, Liberalism, and internationalism.

In addition to the polite external appearance of the « Swingjugend » which accompanied a cool and laid-back demeanor based on Anglo-American clothing and lifestyle, the Nazis were affronted above all else by their Liberal attitude towards life. Because the « Swingjugend » hardly bothered about curfews, bans on dancing, or the ban on listening on so-called « enemy radio stations » once the War began, they got into further conflicts with the Nazi State. Added to this, the « Swingjugend » began to express their oppositional stance more and more explicitly. This ranged from their mockery of the Nazi movement through provocative actions and violent confrontations, to their refusal of compulsory membership of the « Hitlerjugend » and of the « Bund Deutscher Mädel » (League of German Girls) or of military service in the army. However, commitment to jazz led to their discrimination, isolation, and, finally, criminalization, only when it occurred in connection with non-musical reasons for oppression (alleged moral waywardness, rejection of service in the « Hitlerjugend » or « Bund Deutscher Mädel » , being of the Jewish faith, etc.) . Such acts resulted in swing enthusiasts having to suffer all kinds of sanctions and acts of reprisals. But the fight against the « Swingjugend » was hampered by the fact that the Nazi State had no nation-wide agreed-upon means of dealing with them. Also, in the « Swingjugend » , the Nazis were not confronting a unified organization, but loosely organized, informal peer-groups of friends.

Hamburg's Swing Fans in Nazi Camps

Because Hamburg was considered the center of the « Swingjugend » , the « Gestapo » , police, and other governmental organizations proceeded with special cruelty against the swing movement there. Many « swing boys » and « swing girls » had to endure discriminating interrogations, torture, and detention by the « Gestapo » . This led many a swing fan to commit suicide. Even the national leader of the SS, Heinrich Himmler himself, demanded in a letter from 26 January 1942, that their « ring-leaders » be locked away in concentration camps for 2 to 3 years. Between 40 and 70 of Hamburg's Swing Boys and Swing Girls were deported to various Nazi camps. Youths under the age of 18 were, generally speaking, consigned to the so-called « Jugendschutzlager » (Youth Detention Camps : a type of concentration camp for young people) . The boys were sent to the male-camp Moringen, while the girls were sent to the female camp Uckermark, which was situated near Ravensbrück. After March 1942, adults and Jewish swing members, on the other hand, were deported to Theresienstadt or to concentration camps in Bergen-Belsen, Buchenwald, Harzungen, Dora-Mittelbau, Neuengamme, Ravensbrück, Sachsenhausen or Auschwitz.

The Swing Girls were housed separately at the Uckermark youth detention camp in 1942, and were subjected to constant acts of intimidation by the SS. Since the Swing Boys had been categorized as politically oppositional prisoners at Moringen youth detention camp, they were all held together in the same block. This meant that they could mutually support each other. Together, they secretly sang popular swing titles like « Jeepers, Creepers » ; « Caravan » ; « Some Of These Days » ; « The Flat Foot Floogie » ; « Sweet Sue, Just You » ; or « Goody Goody » . Like their fellow prisoners, they had to work days as forced labourers at a munitions factory. But since the factory did not fall under the oversight of the SS, they could collectively indulge in their passion for jazz in the pauses. Günter Discher remembers how they would imitate the performance of a big-band :

« The salt mine where we worked had really nice acoustics. One of us played on the cartridges - these were like wooden boxes, and he would play drums with some sticks. We improvised all sorts of things. Sometimes, it sounded horrible. Either way, we had successfully gotten through our so-called breakfast break. It was a survival strategy.

Far more dangerous was the unauthorized eaves-dropping on radio programmes in the SS cantina. By means of such actions, the Swing Boys not only used jazz to retain their group identity in Moringen, but were also able to bring-out their oppositional stance and to distinguish themselves from the rest of the prisoners. Their fellow prisoners, according to Discher, didn't know what to do with swing music. We swings became quickly arrogant and had little contact with the others. »

In contrast, the Hamburg Swing Girls in the concentration camp Ravensbrück expressly sang for their fellow prisoners. They were housed together with other female political prisoners in the same block. To this group belonged the sisters Jutta and Inga Madlung, who performed different swing tunes after work or after lights out. In an interview, Jutta Madlung recalled :

« They liked it and were happy about the variety it brought whenever we sang “ In the Mood ” or “ Bei mir bist du schön ” or “ A Tisket, a Tasket ”, or whatever.

But precautions had to be taken so that the performance of hated jazz melodies was not accidentally discovered by an overseer :

“ Sometimes at night, after lights out, we were quite precocious and would cover the windows with our bed sheets and then we would sing. ” »

Herbert Schemmel, interned at the concentration camp Neuengamme, tells of an audacious part of swing history. After his confiscated private record collection was handed-over to his parents, this jazz fan had the records sent to him in the camp. It was possible for him to do this because the SS had had to make concessions to the prisoners after the middle of 1942, in order to make-up for their increased use of prisoners for forced labour. Thus, prisoners were allowed to form camp-bands or to receive food packets. Schemmel took the risk of having the records sent, because as « Lagerschreiber » (Camp Scribe) , he occupied a high-position within the so-called « Häftlingsselbstverwaltung » (Prisoner Self-government) , appointed by the camp's commanders.

« Thereupon, I had my portable record player, along with about 100 records sent to me : English and American swing records. They got here, but I never received them. Schitli (Wilhelm Schitli, head of the detention camp) called for me and said that there was already something in my files about connections to English industrial circles. The records, therefore, had to be confiscated and would be stored along with my effects. »

This was then done. But the SS man checked-out these records, allegedly dangerous to the State, and the record player and used them at a party at his own home. In the confusion of the last months of the War, Herbert Schemmel was finally able, in January 1945, to illegally smuggle his property out of the effects room and to play the jazz records again.

That Herbert Schemmel did finally recover his records tells us much about the persecution of the members of the swing movement. In the final analysis, the Nazi regime was not able to exercise complete control over the « Swingjugend » and many swing fans remained true to their music, even in the camps of the 3rd « Reich ». Precisely in this extreme situation, music provided a strong footing and constituted a form of intellectual resistance, strengthened all the more by the memory of the many years of persecution for their ties to jazz. Yet, despite such bold activities, it must not be forgotten that many of the Swing Boys and Swing Girls died because of the inhumane conditions of their imprisonment.

« Negermusik »

« Negermusik » (Negro Music) was a pejorative term used by the Nazis during the 3rd « Reich » to signify musical styles and performances by African-Americans that were of the Jazz and Swing music genres. They viewed these musical styles in a racist fashion as inferior works belonging to an « inferior race » and, therefore, prohibitive. The term, at that same time, was also applied to indigenous music styles of black Africans.

At the time of the Weimar Republic during 1927, Ernst Křenek's Opera of « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny Strikes-up the Band !) contained jazz musical performances that caused protests among some Right-wing ethnic-nationalist groups in Germany at the time. In 1930, the American musician Henry Cowell wrote in the « Melos » journal that jazz interpreted a mixture of African-American and Jewish elements, stating that :

« The fundamentals of jazz are the syncopation and rhythmic accents of the Negro. Their modernization is the work of New York Jews. So, Jazz is Negro music seen through the eyes of the Jews. »

Such views were readily picked-up by the Nazis. Their criticisms have included « gratuitous use of syncopation » and « orgies of drums ». More statements from the Nazis included such things as « artistic licentiousness » and « corruption seed in the musical expression » with « indecent dance forms ». They went on to scrutinize all modern music of the 1930's as a « political weapon of the Jews ». On 4 May 1930, Wilhelm Frick, the « Reich » 's newly appointed Minister of the Interior and Education for Thuringia made a decree called : « Against the Negro Culture - For Our German Heritage » .

In 1932, the national government under Franz von Papen pandered to the Nazis by banning all public performances by black musicians. After Adolf Hitler gained « seizure of power » , in 1933, the « Reich » 's Music Chamber was also created in that same year. This was, then, followed by a full legal ban on this music, on October 12, 1935, across all German national radio. This ban was spear-headed by the German « Reich » 's radio conductor, Eugen Hadamovsky, who purportedly stated :

« Mit dem heutigen Tag spreche ich ein endgültiges Verbot des Negerjazz für den gesamten Deutschen Rundfunk aus. »

(As of today, I am speaking on a definitive ban on the negro jazz for the entire German Radio.)

In 1938, the Nazis organized the « Entartete Musik » public exhibition in Germany, mainly held in Düsseldorf. This exhibition included a poster displaying a cartoon caricature of an African-American male playing on a saxophone with the Star of David on his tuxedo lapel. The overall theme of the exhibition was that of a defamation of contemporary American music as « Negro music » and as another Jewish « plot » upon German culture.

The « Swing Kids » (« Swingjugend ») were a group of jazz and swing-lovers in Germany in the 1930's, mainly in Hamburg (« Sankt Pauli ») and Berlin. They were mainly composed of 14 to 18 year old boys and girls. They defied National-Socialism (Nazism) by listening and dancing to this same banned music in private quarters, clubs, rented halls and vacant « cafés » . Jazz music was offensive to Nazi ideology, because it was often performed by blacks and a number of Jewish musicians. The « Swing Kids » gave the impression of being apolitical, similar to their zoot suiter counter-parts in North America.

On 18 August 1941, in a brutal police operation, over 300 « Swing Kids » were arrested. The measures against them ranged from cutting their hair and sending them back to school under close monitoring, to the deportation of their leaders to Nazi concentration camps.

Prior to the D-Day landings, during the German occupation of the Netherlands, Josef Goebbels's propaganda ministry published pamphlets written in Dutch, named : « Greetings from England - The Coming Invasion » . These pamphlets contained in-between statements, such as « old jazz-records » and a further full statement declaring « at the celebration of liberation your daughters and wives will be dancing in the arms of real Negroes » . This further equated Jazz music with « blackness » during this time to stir up racism and anti-Allied propaganda within occupied Europe.

Ironically, Goebbels managed to create a Nazi-sponsored German swing-band named « Charlie » and his Orchestra whose propagandistic purpose was to win over Nazi support and sympathy from British and American listeners through short-wave radio.

Additionally counter-propaganda was used by Allied forces which played upon the fears of the Nazi's banned music. One such example is Glenn Miller, who was a White American Jazz musician, that initially provided Jazz music, through radio, to Allied combat soldiers for the purposes of entertainment and morale. His same music was used as counter-propaganda by AFN radio broadcasting to denounce fascist oppression in Europe with even Miller once stating himself :

« America means freedom, and there's no expression of freedom quite so sincere as music. » (Glenn Miller)

Jazz was much more than just a creative pastime ; in fact, people saw jazz as the « essence of the era's modernism » , a strong surge toward greater equality and emancipation, posing as a perfect advocate for a democracy in Germany. With its debonair, carefree interdependence on chorus-line culture of the cabarets of Berlin, some dubbed jazz as the « incarnation of American vitalism » . Yet, despite the Liberal attitudes of the Weimar democracy, the public and private sentiment toward blacks, including African Americans, was ambivalent ; there was a lack of black jazz musicians in Germany. Regardless of their social situation, the deeply engrained and institutionalized racism of German society was not tolerant of blacks. For instance, many nationalistic student fraternities rejected student members who were coloured or married to coloured females. Furthermore, in 1932, all the conservative musicians and critics were denigrating jazz as a product of « Negro » culture, which provided the government the fodder to forbid the hiring of black musicians. Thus, for many African-American artists, popularity was a mere facade of a grim reality of being seen as a « racial alien » . One critic even went as far as to call jazz a mere « negro noise » , having only one purpose : « To introduce obscenities into society. »

Paul Schewers, a music-critic, brought forth crude images of lewdly dancing black boys and girls in the service of procreation, implying that the lower-forces were always surging through blacks, overtaking the rational light of morality and reason the way the white man grasped it. Undoubtedly, sensuality has an affinity with dance, and it was pervasive in jazz and in the lyrics, but this became a means of judging it as void of morality, and even æsthetics, reduced to being inferior to « high-German culture » .

In neighbouring European countries, the trend continued in the 1930's. Fan magazines were created for jazz and so-called « hot clubs » . The Nazi regime pursued and banned the broadcasting of jazz on German radio, partly because of its African roots and because many of the active jazz musicians were of Jewish origin ; and partly due to the music's certain themes of individuality and freedom. For the Nazis, jazz was an especially threatening form of expression. An anti-jazz radio broadcast « From the Cake Walk to Hot » sought a deterrent effect with « particularly insisting musical examples » .

Perhaps, the source of the critique against jazz was the modernity it implied ; in fact, many of the Jazz-critics were those who were against any form of modernity. Those World War I veterans with Fascist pretensions and of the anti-Semitic « Freikorps » banded with other members in the National-Socialist movement in denouncing Jews and blacks. This burgeoning hatred of jazz and its sub-culture infected the entire Nazi Party structure that Adolf Hitler and his followers were trying so desperately to erect.

Hitler was not fond of modernism in the arts, which included music ; in the Nazi Party's program of February 1920, he threatened to enforce future governmental laws against such inclinations in art and literature. Even though he never publicly spoke-out against jazz, specifically in the Weimar Republic, one can infer that Hitler's sentiments toward jazz must have had strong ties to his perception of racial hierarchy, with jazz, not surprisingly, being at the very bottom.

In the 1930's, jazz began to see its downturn and started to suffer. Jazz's potential for being linked with the downtrodden minorities and pariahs of German society (the blacks and Jews) rendered it suspect. The future policies emerging against Jazz were encouraged by German musicologists and radio spokesmen. In 1935, attempting to widen the perceived gap between « Nigger-Jew Jazz » and « German Jazz » , Hans Otto Fricke used his prominent status as the director of « Radio Frankfurt » , giving a 2 part lecture series on the subject. To a great extent, Jazz shared a similar fate with other post-War modernist art such as atonal music. It wasn't until 1931 that many crucial British and American jazz players began to leave the country as they faced increasing xenophobic harassment from colleagues and authorities. Many thought that the death of Jazz was upon them, but little did they anticipate that it would be reborn into vitality and health under a dictatorship.

Up until 1935, Josef Gœbbels, the « Reich » Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, had hoped to convince and persuade the public via anti-Jazz propaganda, rather than prohibit jazz. However, jazz was banned in 1935 (WFMU Staff) . In 1935, the Nazi government did not allow German musicians of Jewish origin to perform any longer. The Weintraub Syncopators (most of whom were Jewish) were forced into exile. They worked abroad during much of the 1930's, touring throughout Europe, Asia, and the Middle-East before settling in Australia, in 1937. Even people with a single Jewish grandparent like swing trumpeter Hans Berry were forced to play undercover or to work abroad (in Belgium, the Netherlands or in Switzerland) .

Other dance bands and musicians were not even that fortunate. For example, Mitja Nikisch, son of the celebrated Classical conductor Arthur Nikisch and himself a respected Classical pianist, had created a fine popular dance ensemble in the 1920's, the « Mitja Nikisch Tanz Orchester » , which played in prominent venues. The Nazi regime brought about its demise, leading Nikisch to commit suicide in 1936.

From 1937 onward, American musicians in Europe couldn't cross German borders. Admittedly, in spite of such persecution it was still possible, at least in major cities, to buy jazz records until the beginning of the War ; however, the further development of, and the contact with, the American Jazz World were largely interrupted. The « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) supported dance music that bore some traits of Swing, but listening to foreign stations, which regularly played jazz, was penalised from 1939 on. Even after certain songs and performers were banned in Germany, several radio stations played jazz music by printing a new, German-centric label. For example, the song « Tiger Rag » became « Schwarzer Panther » , or the « black panther » . « Josef ! Josef ! » became « Sie will nicht Blumen und nicht Schokolade » , which translates as « She wants neither flowers nor chocolate. » (WFMU Staff) .

Some musicians did not want to follow this command. Thus, for example, when Jazz was finally prohibited by the Nazis at the beginning of the War, the clarinetist Ernst Höllerhagen left Germany for exile in Switzerland.

At that time, only a relatively small number of people in Germany knew how jazz music sounded in America (at that time, swing) and that it was Jazz. With the pressing War-time effort, from 1941 to 1943, the Nazis accidentally fostered the jazz craze by forcing bands from Nazi-occupied nations in Western Europe to perform, bringing hot swing. Eventually, the Nazi Party realized that jazz could not be removed entirely from Germany (WFMU Staff) . The Nazis even re-developed and newly produced some pieces, giving them new lyrics, in special studios. One example is the song « Black Bottom » , which was presented as « Schwarzer Boden » . For some Germans, the banned foreign stations with jazz programs were very popular.

The Nazis, on the one hand, would jam transmissions from the Allies' stations but, on the other hand, would also copy them. The band « Charlie and His Orchestra » is considered as a negative example, also called « Herr Gœbbels Jazz Band » . Several of Germany's most talented swing musicians, such as saxophonist Lutz Templin and vocalist Karl « Charlie » Schwedler, were active in a Jazz band. Here, the Nazis replaced the original texts with their own provocative propaganda texts that were pro-Nazi and anti-American/British. For example, the lyrics for « Little Sir Echo » has anti-American/British appeal with lyrics such as :

« German U-boats are making you sore, You're always licked, not a victory came through. You're nice, little fellow but, by now, you should know that you can never win this War ! »

Gœbbels' propaganda was broadcast over pirated short-wave frequencies into America, Britain, and Canada, in order to spread fear and weaken the morale of Germany's enemies (WFMU Staff) .

The situation intensified in 1942 with the entry of the United States in the War. For diplomats of foreign embassies and « Wehrmacht » members, a couple of jazz clubs continued to remain open in Berlin. In addition, individual, illegitimate venues and private parties still played jazz. In 1943, jazz record production was stopped.

The « Swing-Jugend » (Swing Kids) was a movement among mainly youth from 14 to 20 years old who dressed, danced, and listened to jazz in defiance of the Nazi regime. The Nazi Party acted against this movement by detaining several of the young leaders of the « Swing Youth » and sending them to concentration camps. However, the « Swing Youth » continued to resist the Nazi Party by participating in prohibited swing and jazz activities (Neuhaus) . « Charlie and His Orchestra » was moved in the still bombproof province. Jazz was also incorporated into musical works such as Operas and chamber music through « art-jazz » , which utilized jazz-inspired and ragtime-inspired syncopated rhythms and modes. Famous Operas such as Ernst Křenek's « Jonny spielt auf ! » and Boris Blacher's Concertante Music for Orchestra are examples of art-jazz (Dexter) .

The Nazi regime passed notorious edicts banning jazz records and muted trumpets calling them degenerate art (« entartete Kunst ») . « Degenerate Music » was an exhibit sponsored by the Nazi regime that singled-out « degeneracy » or the use of atonal music, jazz, discordant-sounding organization of tones and the individual composers and conductors, both of Aryan and non-Aryan descent. The « Degenerative Music » exhibit actually had the opposite effect of what the Nazis had hoped because soldiers became interested in genuine jazz (Potter) . The documentary film « Swing Under the Swastika » looks at Jazz music under the Nazi regime in Germany, and at the cases of the Madlung sisters who were sent to Ravensbruck concentration camp merely for owning jazz records. There are also interviews with jazz drummer and guitarist Coco Schumann and pianist Martin Roman, who were saved in the camps so they could and had to play for SS officers and during executions in Auschwitz as part of the « Ghetto Swingers » .

While Black people in Nazi Germany were never subject to mass-extinction as in the cases of Poles, Jews, and Romani, they were still considered by the Nazis to be an inferior race and, along with Romani people, were subject to the Nuremberg Laws under a supplementary decree.

Even before World War I, Germany struggled with the idea of black Germans. While inter-racial marriage was legal under German law at the time, beginning in 1890, some colonial officials started refusing to register them, using eugenics arguments about the inferiority of mixed-race children to support their decision. By 1912, this had become official policy in many German colonies, and a debate in the « Reichstag » over the legality of the inter-racial marriage bans ensued. A major concern brought-up in debate was that mixed-race children born in such marriages would have German citizenship, and could, therefore, return to Germany with the same rights to vote, serve in the military, and hold public office as white Germans.

After World War I, French occupation forces in the Rhineland included African colonial troops, some of whom fathered children with German women. Newspaper campaigns against the use of these troops focused on these children, dubbed « Rhineland bastards » , often with lurid stories of un-civilized African soldiers raping innocent German women. In the Rhineland itself, local opinion of the troops was very different, and the soldiers were described as « courteous and often popular » , possibly because French colonial soldiers harbored less ill-will towards Germans than War-weary French occupiers. While subsequent discussions of Afro-German children revolved these « Rhineland Bastards » , in fact, only 400 to 600 children were born to such unions, compared to a total black population of 20,000 to 25,000 in Germany, at the time.

In « Mein Kampf » , Adolf Hitler described children resulting from marriages to African occupation soldiers as a contamination of the white race « by Negro blood on the Rhine in the heart of Europe » .

He thought that :

« Jews were responsible for bringing Negroes into the Rhineland, with the ultimate idea of bastardizing the white race which they hate and, thus, lowering its cultural and political level so that the Jew might dominate. »

He also implied that this was a plot on the part of the French, since the population of France was being increasingly « negrified » .

Under eugenics laws during the 3rd « Reich » , race alone was not sufficient criteria for forced sterilization, but anyone could request sterilization for themselves or a minor under their care. The cohort of mixed-race children born during occupation were approaching adulthood when, in 1937, with Hitler's approval, a special « Gestapo » commission was created and charged with « the discrete sterilization of the Rhineland bastards » . It is unclear how much these minors were told about the procedures, or how many parents only consented under pressure from the « Gestapo » . An estimated 500 children were sterilized under this program, including girls as young as 12.

Black people in Germany were socially isolated and forbidden to have sexual relations and marriages with Aryans by the racial laws. Black people were placed at the bottom of the racial scale of non-Aryans along with Jews and Romani/Roma people. The Nazis originally sought to rid the German State of Jews and Romani by means of extermination, while black people were to be segregated and eventually exterminated through compulsory sterilization.

Beyond the compulsory sterilization program in the Rhineland, there was no coherent Nazi policy towards African Germans. In one instance, when local officials petitioned for guidance on how to handle an Afro-German who could not find employment and had become a repeat criminal offender, they were told the population was too small to warrant the formulation of any official policy and to settle the case as they saw fit. Due to the rhetoric at the time, Black Germans experienced discrimination in employment, welfare, and housing, and were also barred from pursuing a higher-education.

A number of blacks served in the « Wehrmacht » . The number of German blacks was low, but there were some instances where blacks were enlisted within Nazi organizations such as the Hitler Youth and later the « Wehrmacht » . In addition, there was an influx of foreign volunteers during the African campaign, which led to the existence of a number of blacks in the « Wehrmacht » and SS in such units as the Free Arabian Legion.

While no orders were issued in regards to black prisoners of War, some German commanders undertook to separate blacks from captured French units for summary execution. There are also documented cases of captured African American soldiers suffering the same fate. In the absence of any official policy, the treatment of black prisoners of War varied widely, and most captured black soldiers were taken prisoner rather than executed. However, violence against black prisoners of War, while against the Geneva Conventions, was also never prosecuted by Nazi authorities.

In prisoner of War camps, black soldiers were kept segregated from white, and generally experienced worse conditions than their white comrades, conditions that deteriorated further in the last days of the War. Roughly, half of the French colonial prisoners of War did not survive captivity. Groups such as North Africans were sometimes treated as blacks, sometimes as whites.

Weimar

Dans toutes les sociétés, le maintien de l'ordre public et l'application de la loi comptent parmi les tâches les plus importantes de la police. Or, leur mise en œuvre peut s'avérer particulièrement problématique lors d'un changement majeur de l'organisation politique de la société.

Les Nazis accédèrent au pouvoir en Allemagne, le 30 janvier 1933, et établirent une dictature mettant fin à l'expérience démocratique allemande, celle de la République de Weimar, qui n'avait duré que 12 ans. La police, qui avait été chargée de défendre la République de Weimar, s'adapta relativement facilement au régime nazi. Il n'y eut ni purge ni démission massives de policiers.

En 1933, la plupart des policiers n'étaient pas nazis, même s'ils étaient dans leur grande majorité conservateurs. Ils se considéraient comme des professionnels neutres et des serviteurs impartiaux de la loi. Ils étaient censés remplir leur tâche indépendamment de leurs opinions politiques personnelles. Néanmoins, les policiers se révélèrent prêts à soutenir le gouvernement nazi qui détruisait la démocratie. La police en particulier, et les conservateurs en général, apportèrent leur appui aux Nazis en 1933. Les conservateurs en vinrent à considérer la dictature nazie comme une solution non seulement à la faiblesse de la République de Weimar mais à toute une série de difficultés professionnelles spécifiques à la police.

Les plus grandes faiblesses de la République de Weimar tenaient à ses origines. La défaite de la Première Guerre mondiale avait sérieusement affaibli la monarchie et conduit à la proclamation de la République de Weimar en 1918. En dépit de la responsabilité de la monarchie dans le déclenchement de la Première Guerre mondiale, de nombreux Allemands tinrent les Partis démocratiques pour responsables de la défaite et de l'humiliant traité de paix qui suivit. Les policiers se montrèrent particulièrement sceptiques envers les Partis démocratiques (Sociaux-Démocrates, Centristes, Libéraux) car ils avaient été formés sous la monarchie à les considérer comme des ennemis de l'État. Dans la république de Weimar, ces Partis dominaient. Les policiers continuèrent à servir l'État notamment parce qu'ils se considéraient comme des professionnels tenus d'appliquer la loi, indépendamment de leurs sentiments personnels, même si la plupart d'entre eux n'étaient pas des démocrates convaincus.

Les bouleversements économiques liés à la Première Guerre mondiale ainsi que la déstabilisation de l'économie provoquée par les réparations firent que les gouvernements de la République de Weimar étaient toujours à court d'argent. Des coupes sombres touchèrent la police avec des conséquences sur le recrutement, la formation, l'avancement et les augmentations de salaire. Il n'y avait pas d'argent non plus pour la modernisation, l'achat de nouveau matériel de laboratoire ou d'armes à feu. D'autre part, il fallait intégrer des policiers venus des territoires perdus par l'Allemagne à la suite de la défaite. Il fallait leur trouver un emploi alors même que les dépenses de fonctionnement étaient réduites au maximum. L'absence d'avancement professionnel qui en résultait démoralisa les élèves policiers et les jeunes recrues.

Parallèlement aux coupes budgétaires touchant les forces de police, la crise économique contribua à un accroissement rapide des actes criminels. Le crime organisé, actif dans la prostitution, la drogue, le jeu, la pornographie, le vol et les cambriolages, se développait. Bien organisés, les gangs fonctionnaient souvent à cheval sur plusieurs régions, compliquant les enquêtes policières. Sous la République de Weimar, il n'existait pas de police nationale. Chaque État de la Fédération allemande possédait sa propre police et suivait une politique distincte de maintien de l'ordre. Le manque de coordination des forces freinait les enquêtes criminelles qui s'étendaient sur plusieurs États. La police de la République de Weimar n'était pas de taille face à ces gangs.

De même que les crimes de droit commun se multipliaient, les crimes politiques atteignirent des sommets encore inégalés en cette période de constante instabilité politique. Des milliers de vétérans armés et d'unités para-militaires émanant de Partis politiques de droite comme de gauche, s'affrontaient dans des batailles rangées et attaquaient l'État. Certaines de ces forces para-militaires possédaient des armes lourdes et, soutenues par de nombreux partisans, l'emportaient parfois sur la police. Le crime rampant et les troubles politiques amenèrent les forces de police à un point de rupture.

Malgré leur professionnalisme, les policiers avaient des difficultés à s'adapter au nouvel ordre démocratique de Weimar. Ils étaient frustrés par les restrictions pesant sur leur autorité. Certaines affaires criminelles n'aboutirent pas car la police n'avait pas réussi à garantir les droits des accusés ou parce que des éléments de preuve avaient été refusés en raison d'erreurs dans les procédures policières. L'émergence d'une presse libre, très critique des activités de police, exacerba ces frustrations. Les policiers développèrent alors une mentalité d'assiégés. Ils étaient irrités du fait que le public les blâmait alors que les limites constitutionnelles et le manque de crédits les empêchaient d'agir.

The city of Weimar (Latin : « Vimaria ») is well-known because of its large cultural heritage and its importance in German history.

It was a focal point of the German Enlightenment and home of the leading characters of the literary genre of Weimar Classicism, the writers Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Friedrich Schiller. In the 19th Century, famous composers like Franz Liszt made a music centre of Weimar and, later, artists and architects like Henry van de Velde, Wassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee, Lyonel Feininger and Walter Gropius came to the city and founded the « Bauhaus » movement, the most important German design school of the inter-War period. However, the political history of 20th Century Weimar was inconsistent : it was the place where Germany's 1st democratic constitution was signed after the First World War, giving its name to the Weimar Republic period in German politics (1918-1933) , as well as one of the cities mythologized by the National-Socialist propaganda.

Until 1948, Weimar was the capital of Thuringia. Today, many places in the city centre have been designated as UNESCO World Heritage sites (either as part of the Weimar Classicism complex or as part of the « Bauhaus » complex) and tourism is one of the leading economic sectors of Weimar. Relevant institutions in Weimar are the « Bauhaus » University, the Liszt School of Music, the Duchess Anna Amalia Library and 2 leading Courts of Thuringia (Supreme Administrative Court and Constitutional Court) . In 1999, Weimar was the European Capital of Culture.

Archæological finds dating back to the Thuringii epoch (3rd to 6th Centuries) show that the Weimar part of the Ilm valley was settled early, with a tight network of settlements where the city is today.

The oldest records regarding Weimar date to 899. Its name changed over the Centuries from Wimares through Wimari to Wimar and, finally, Weimar ; it is derived from Old High German wīh- (holy) and -mari (standing water, swamp) . Another theory derives the 1st element from OHG win (meadow, pasture) . The place was the seat of the County of Weimar, 1st mentioned in year 949, which was one of the mightiest actors in early-Middle Ages Thuringia. In 1062, it was united with the County of Orlamünde to the new County of Weimar-Orlamünde, which existed until the Thuringian Counts' War, in 1346, and fell to the Wettins afterwards.

The Weimar settlement emerged around the count's wooden castle and 2 small churches dedicated to Saint-Peter (which became later the main church) , and to Saint-James. In 1240, the count founded the dynasty's monastery in Oberweimar, which ran under Cistercian nuns. Soon after, the counts of Weimar founded the town, which was an independent parish since 1249, and called civitas in 1254. From 1262, the citizens used their own seal. Nevertheless, the regional influence of the Weimar counts was declining as the influence of the Wettins in Thuringia increased. Hence, the new small town was relatively marginal in a regional context, also due to the fact that it was situated far away from relevant trade routes like the « Via Regia » . The settlement around Saint-James Church developed into a suburb during the 13th Century.

After becoming part of the Wettin's territory, in 1346, urban development improved. The Wettins fostered Weimar by abolishing socage and granting privileges to the citizens. Now, Weimar became equal to other Wettinian cities like Weißensee and grew during the 15th Century, with the establishment of a town-hall and the current main church. Weimar acquired woad trade privileges in 1438. The castle and the walls were finished in the 16th Century, making Weimar into a full city.

After the Treaty of Leipzig in 1485, Weimar became part of the electorate of the Ernestine branch of Wettins with Wittenberg as capital. The Protestant Reformation was introduced in Weimar in 1525 ; Martin Luther stayed several times in the city. As the Ernestines lost the Schmalkaldic War, in 1547, their capital Wittenberg went also to the Albertines, so that they needed a new residence. As the ruler returned from captivity, Weimar became his residence in 1552 and remained as such until the end of the monarchy in 1918. The 1st Ernestine territorial partition in 1572 was followed by various ones, nevertheless Weimar stayed the capital of different Saxe-Weimar States. The court and its staff brought some wealth to the city, so that it saw a 1st construction boom in the 16th Century. The 17th Century brought decline to Weimar, because of changing trade conditions (as in nearby Erfurt) . Besides, the territorial partitions led to the loss of political importance of the dukes of Saxe-Weimar and their finances shrunk. The city's polity weakened more and more and lost its privileges, leading to the absolutist reign of the dukes in the early-18th Century. On the other hand, this time brought another construction boom to Weimar, and the city got its present appearance, marked by various ducal representation buildings. The city walls were demolished in 1757 and, during the following decades, Weimar expanded in all directions. The biggest building constructed in this period was the « Schloß » as the residence of the dukes (North and East wing, 1789-1803 ; West wing, 1832-1835 ; South wing, 1913-1914) . Between 1708 and 1717, Johann Sebastian Bach worked as the Court's organist in Weimar.

The period from the start of the regencies of Anna Amalia (1758-1775) and her son Carl August (1775-1828) through to Goethe's death, in 1832, is denoted as the « golden » or the « Classical » age because of the high-level of cultural activity in Weimar. The city became an important cultural centre of Europe, having been home to such luminaries as Goethe, Friedrich von Schiller, Johann Gottfried von Herder, Christoph Martin Wieland and Friedrich Justin Bertuch ; and, in music, the piano virtuoso Johann Nepomuk Hummel. It has been a site of pilgrimage for the German intelligentsia since Goethe first moved to Weimar, in 1775. Goethe was also active in civic duties while living there. He served as Privy Councilor to the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach for an extended period. The tombs of Goethe and Schiller, as well as their archives, may be found in the city. Goethe's « Elective Affinities » (1809) is set around the city of Weimar. In comparison to many major German States, the dukes' policy was Liberal and tolerant in this period. The Liberal Saxe-Weimar constitution was brought into effect in 1816.

The time after Goethe's death is denoted as the « silver » age because Weimar remained an influential cultural centre. The 1st emphasis was fostering music. In 1842, Franz Liszt moved to Weimar to become the Grand Ducal court conductor. Liszt organized the premiere of Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » (1850) in the city. The Weimar School of Music was founded in 1872 as Germany's 1st Orchestra school. Richard Strauß worked in Weimar between 1889 and 1894 as 2nd conductor in the acclaimed « Staatskapelle Weimar » (the Court Orchestra founded in 1491) . Several of his encores for works such as « Don Juan » and « Macbeth » were performed by the « Staatskapelle Weimar » . In 1897, Friedrich Nietzsche moved to Weimar and died here, in 1900.

In 1860, the Weimar Saxon-Grand Ducal Art School, the precursor of today's « Bauhaus » University, was founded. This was the beginning of academic arts education in Weimar. The institution created its own painting style, the « Weimar School » of painting with representatives such as Max Liebermann and Arnold Böcklin. The « Kunstgewerbeschule Weimar » was found by Henry van de Velde with the support of Grand Duke William Ernest in 1902, and represents the other root of the « Bauhaus » , known as « Das Neue Weimar » (The New Weimar) around Harry Graf Kessler. It was a foundation against Prussia's restrictive arts policy favouring Historicism instead of international Arts and Crafts and « Art Nouveau » (« Jugendstil ») .

As early as the 19th Century, the curation of Weimar and its heritage started. Many archives, Societies and museums were founded to present and conserve the cultural sights and goods. In 1846, Weimar was connected by the Thuringian Railway. In the following decades, the city saw a construction and population boom (like most late-19th Century cities in Germany) . Nevertheless, Weimar did not become industrialised, and remained a city of clerks, artists and rentiers. During the German Revolution of 1918-1919, the last reigning grand duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, William Ernest, had to abdicate and went in exile to Heinrichau in Silesia.

The period in German history from 1919 to 1933 is commonly referred to as the Weimar Republic, as the Republic's constitution was drafted here. Berlin as the capital was considered too dangerous for the National Assembly to use as a meeting place, because of its street rioting after the 1918 German Revolution. The calm and centrally located Weimar had a suitable place of assembly (the theatre) , hotels and infrastructure, so it was chosen as the capital.

In 1920, the Federal State of Thuringia was founded by an association of 8 former micro-States (Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach ; Saxe-Gotha ; Saxe-Altenburg ; Saxe-Meiningen ; Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt ; Schwarzburg-Sondershausen ; Reuß-Gera ; and Reuß-Greiz) and Weimar became its capital. Due to that fact, the city experienced another period of growth.

In 1919, Walter Gropius founded the « Bauhaus » School by a merger of the Weimar Saxon-Grand Ducal Art School with the « Kunstgewerbeschule Weimar » . The « Bauhaus » in Weimar lasted from 1919 to 1925, when it moved to Dessau, after the newly-elected Right-wing Thuringian council put pressure on the School by withdrawing funding and forcing its teachers to quit. Many buildings in Weimar today have influences from the « Bauhaus » period. However, only one original « Bauhaus » building was constructed during 1919-1925, the « Haus am Horn », now used for exhibitions and events on « Bauhaus » culture.

The Weimar Republic era was marked by a constant conflict between progressive forces and reactionary Right-wing forces, the former represented by Harry Graf Kessler and the latter Adolf Bartels in Weimar. After 1929, the Right-wing forces prevailed and Weimar became an early centre of Nazism.

Weimar was important to the Nazis for 2 reasons : 1st, it was where the hated Weimar Republic was founded ; and 2nd, it was a centre of German high-culture during recent Centuries. In 1926, the NSDAP held its Party convention in Weimar. Adolf Hitler visited Weimar more than 40 times prior to 1933. In 1930, Wilhelm Frick became minister for internal affairs and education in Thuringia, the 1st NSDAP minister in Germany. In 1932, the NSDAP came to power in Thuringia under Fritz Sauckel. In 1933, the 1st Concentration Camps were established around Weimar - in Nohra (the 1st one in Germany) and Bad Sulza. Most prisoners at this time were Communists and Social-Democrats. After « Kristallnacht », in 1938, harassment of Jews became more intense, so that many of them emigrated or were arrested.

During the 1930's, the barracks in Weimar was greatly extended. One famous person serving as a soldier in Weimar was Wolfgang Borchert, later a well-known poet and playwright. As it was the capital of Thuringia, the Nazis built a new Roman-Fascist-style administrative centre between the city centre and the main-station. This « Gauforum », designed by Hermann Giesler, was the only Nazi governmental building completed outside Berlin (though there were plans for all German State capitals) . Today, it hosts the Thuringian State Administration. Other Giesler buildings are the « Villa Sauckel », the Governor's palace and the « Hotel Elephant » in the city centre.

In 1937, the Nazis established Buchenwald concentration camp only 8 kilometres from Weimar city centre. The slogan « Jedem das Seine » (To each his own) was placed over the camp's main-entrance gate. Between July 1938 and April 1945, some 240,000 people were incarcerated in the camp by the Nazi regime, including 168 Western Allied POWs. The number of deaths in Buchenwald is estimated at 56,545. The Buchenwald concentration camp provided slave labour for local industry (arms manufacturer Wilhelm-Gustloff-Werk) .

The city centre was partially damaged by U.S. Air Force bombing in 1945, with some 1,800 people killed and many historic buildings destroyed. Nevertheless, most of the destroyed buildings were restored soon after the War because of their importance in German cultural history. The Allied ground advance into Germany reached Weimar in April 1945, and the city surrendered to the U.S. 80th Infantry Division on April 12, 1945. The residents of Weimar were ordered to walk through Buchenwald, to see what had been happening so close to the city, as documented in Billy Wilder's film « Death Mills ». The city ended-up in the Soviet zone of occupation, so U.S. troops were soon replaced by Soviet forces.

From 1945 to 1950, the Soviet Union used the occupied Buchenwald concentration camp as a NKVD special camp to imprison defeated Nazis and other Germans. The camp slogan remained « Jedem das Seine ». On 6 January 1950, the Soviets handed-over Buchenwald to the East-German Ministry of Internal Affairs.

In 1948, the East-German government declared Erfurt as Thuringia's new capital and Weimar lost its influence on German contemporary culture and politics. The State of Thuringia itself was dissolved in 1952 and replaced by 3 Districts (« Bezirke ») in a local government reform. The city was the headquarters of the Soviet Union's 8th Guards Army as part of the Group of Soviet Forces in Germany. Due to its fame and importance for tourism, Weimar received more financial subsidies from the GDR government and remained in better condition than most East-German cities.

The Weimar Republic was the 1st attempt to establish constitutional Liberal democratic government in Germany. The republic's name symbolically evoked memories of the German writer Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, who had spent a number of years at the Court of Weimar, and of the nation's humanistic cultural traditions. Goethe's Weimar was contrasted with the Prussian Germany of authoritarianism, military swagger, and Imperialism. Many Germans, however, remained attached to the old order and lacked a genuine commitment to Republican ideals. Both the Social-Democrats and those who harkened back to the Prussian past were opposed by the radical opposition, whose program included revolutionary tactics. German culture under the Republic reflected the ideological diversity of a politically fragmented society.

The Warburg Library, the Psychoanalytic Institute, the German Academy for Politics, and the Marxist Institute for Social Research, founded soon after World War I, were dedicated to the critical analysis of political and social values. These institutions reflected the desire of Weimar intellectuals to reconsider the German past. Eckart Kehr's « Schlachtflottenbau und Parteipolitik » (Battleship Construction and Party Politics) , published in 1930, pursued the same critical objective, revealing the domestic socio-economic basis for Imperial Germany's naval policy.

The cult of the hero survived in the poet Stefan George's literary society, known as the George Circle, which, in addition to publishing « elevated » poetry and translating the Classics, displayed its aristocratic mentality in biographies about great historical figures. Ernst Kantorowicz's Emperor Frederick II, a biography of the 13th Century Hohenstaufen ruler, received wide-spread public acclaim. Kantorowicz, a former Prussian army officer, describes the Weimar Republic as the triumph of mediocrity, and, in his preface, he speaks of Germany's secret longing for its Emperors and heroes. In his biography, he mythically portrays Frederick II as a superman who defies all authority and is voraciously eager to taste all of life.

Many German artists during this period were part of the expressionist movement. Both literary and visual expressionism were primarily concerned with representing the immediate present. In contrast to the strict form in the writings of the George Circle, literary expressionism consciously simplified, abbreviated, and distorted sentence structures to give expression to passionate inner-feeling. A reaction to inhuman social conditions and the horrors of World War I, expressionist writing called for a new man and a new world that would be united in brotherly love. The outsider, as a victim of society, became the hero. Writers whose works represent this kind of reaction include Georg Heym and Fritz von Unruh. Although some writers, for example, Kurt Hiller and Heinrich Mann, became politically active extremists, expressionists were, for the most part, solely literary revolutionaries. Inner-experience is also emphasized in the bold and symbolic colours and distorted forms found in the drawings and paintings of expressionist artists such as Franz Marc and Emil Nolde. In his grotesque figures and suggestive juxtapositions, the post-War artist George Grosz satirized the materialistic pseudoculture of the bourgeoisie.

The dilemma of the Weimar intellectual, who had to choose between the Conservative past and the Liberal present, can be approached through the novelist Thomas Mann. A monarchist before World War I, a common-sense Republican after the War, Mann finally made a genuine commitment to the Republic in the mid-1920's. In 1924, he published « Der Zauberberg » (The Magic Mountain) , a novel that describes Hans Castorp's education through life. While visiting a tubercular cousin in a Swiss sanatorium, the protagonist contracts the disease himself and stays for 7 years. The sanatorium is a cross-section of European civilization in which Castorp is exposed to a variety of political ideologies, including enlightened Liberalism. Significantly, Castorp (and the conservative Mann) cannot choose Liberalism. Love, not reason, the novel concludes, will provide the basis for social reconciliation.

After 1929, National-Socialism offered a different social and political solution. The Nazi Party took full-advantage of political instability and economic depression, launched a large-scale propaganda campaign, and won a mass following. Nazi ideology, authoritarian but promising social revolution, appealed particularly to German youth, who longed for the restoration of order.

Weimar, which is perhaps best-known today as the location of the Nazi concentration camp Buchenwald, had a long history in the 3rd « Reich » . The 1st Nazi Party Rally Day, following the 1925 refounding of the Party, was held in Weimar on 4 July 1926, and the Party met there again, in 1936. Weimar was also the scene of large Nazi rallies during the election campaign of 1932.

When Adolf Hitler was in Weimar, he stayed in the « Haus Elephant » hotel on the « Marktplatz » , and he often greeted crowds and reviewed marching columns from the front of the hotel.

In the view at top, Hitler salutes from his car in front of the hotel, with Rudolf Heß seen in the background ; on the right, Hermann Göring strikes a martial pose, with Hitler at the left and « Gauleiter » Fritz Sauckel in front. These photos were probably taken during the 1932 campaign (the view just above was later, probably 1933 or 1934) . The façade of the hotel was changed during a remodeling in 1936-1937.

Architect Hermann Giesler remodeled the « Haus Elephant » in 1936-1937, adding a « Führer » Balcony over the main-entrance and another in the back court-yard, which has changed hardly at all today. Werner Lindner and Erich Böckler, « Die Stadt : Ihre Pflege und Gestaltung » , Munich (1939) .

The most ambitious 3rd « Reich » building project in Weimar was the « Gauforum » , north of the city center. During the 3rd « Reich » , this was known as the « Adolf-Hitler-Platz » ; under the East-Germans as « Karl-Marx-Platz » ; and now as « Platz-des-Friedens » . Similar complexes were planned in many German cities, but few were started and fewer still were completed to the level of the Weimar « Gauforum » (which was, indeed, never completed to plan) .

On the left above, Hitler examines a model of the « Gauforum » , along with Fritz Sauckel, Albert Speer, Julius Schaub (chief-of-staff) , and Wilhelm Brückner (personal adjutant) . On the right is an artist's conception of the completed « Gauforum » . The large community-hall at the left was never built. The « Reichsstatthaltereie » at the « Gauforum » served as the headquarters for « Gauleiter » Fritz Sauckel. The bell-tower was originally planned to be considerably higher, but it was never finished.

AB 114 : Idéologie et appropriation - Bruckner dans le 3e « Reich »

The 1st of the Bruckner controversies, on Bruckner's standing as a composer, had acquired a political dimension as early as 1885, when Josef Schalk had suggested, in an article for « Deutsche Worte » , that Bruckner was not appreciated because he was « too German » . If Josef remained a cultural rather than a political « Neudeutscher » , only a few years later Robert Hirschfeld was regretting (in « Die Presse » , 24 December 1890) that Bruckner « had fallen into the hands of political partisans » because of the constant « scorn and ridicule of conservative critics » . This is, presumably, a reference to « Neue Richard Wagner-Verein » set-up in 1890 (motto : « German visitors always welcome. ») , whose members included August Göllerich. In the post-War period, Bruckner's more nationalistic pupils found natural allies on the far right, and, in January 1929, Friedrich Klose signed the manifesto of Alfred Rosenberg's « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » , set-up « to inform the German people about the inter-connection between art, race, knowledge and moral values » ; another signatory was Winifred Wagner.

IBG (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») links with the Nazi regime predated the « Anschluß » , when Adolf Hitler had assisted the « Bruckner-Gesellschaft » in a project of great symbolic if no practical importance. In 1931, the IBG had petitioned the Bavarian Ministry of Culture to have a bust of Bruckner installed in Ludwig the 1st's « Walhalla » , in Regensburg, a Parthenon replica and cultural display cabinet for Germanic heroes. The petition was unsuccessful, but, by the time the final instalment of Max Auer's completion of August Göllerich's Bruckner large biography appeared in 1937, he was able to bring the work to what was evidently intended to be a satisfying conclusion with the following :

« The “ Führer ” and Reichs-Chancellor of the German “ Reich ” , Adolf Hitler, has at last agreed to the request of the International Bruckner Society that a bust of Bruckner be installed in the Pan-Germanic Hall of Honour, the “ Walhalla ” , in Regensburg. »

Hitler received the IBG's 1st Medal of honour as a reward, thereby gaining a considerable amount of cultural credibility at absolutely no cost to himself. The installation took place, in June 1937, during the 8th Bruckner Festival in Regensburg. Siegmund von Hausegger conducted excerpts from the 8th Symphony at a special ceremony, following which Hitler was photographed, hat in hand, admiring Adolf Rothenburger's bust of the composer, its plinth draped for the occasion with Nazi regalia.

Adolf Hitler had taken a special interest in Bruckner ever since, as a young man, he had attended August Göllerich's « Bruckner-Festkonzerte » , in Linz. Hitler and Bruckner had both spent their early years in the Linz region, they both idolized Richard Wagner, and the composer of patriotic male-voice choruses and stately Symphonies could be pressed into service to support some of the more simplistic ideas propounded by Nazi ideologues as to what German music should be : steady, serious and spiritual, but not overly chromatic or excitable. A movement from a Bruckner Symphony was played before each of Hitler's « cultural speeches » at the Nuremberg rallies ; for instance, the fugue from the 5th Symphony, a personal favourite of Hitler's, preceded the Party Congress in 1937. Bruckner was also connected, via Linz, with Hitler's frustrated dreams of becoming an architect. The 18 year old Hitler had drawn a design for a new concert-hall in Linz, and, as « Führer » , he had elaborate scale models made for the new Linz that was to be built following the War, the centrepiece of which was to be a monument on the banks of the Danube glorifying Bruckner, Hitler's parents and Hörbiger's « Universal Ice Doctrine » (« Welt Eis Lehre ») . Bruckner's commemoration was therefore to be lumped together with a lunatic fringe pseudoscience and a dictator's personality cult. Hitler's promotion of Linz was part of a private campaign against cosmopolitan Vienna, where he had spent unhappy years as a student, and he planned to make Linz, rather than Vienna, the cultural capital of both the « Ostmark » and the German « Reich » , even proposing to be buried there.

In the wake of the « Anschluß » , the Nazi Party assumed control of all cultural bodies in Austria, including the IBG, which now became the « Deutsche Bruckner Gesellschaft » , Wilhelm Fürtwängler regrettably allowing himself to be installed as President in the place of Max Auer. The new authorities had no difficulty in finding allies in its ranks. Alfred Orel proved assiduous in eradicating « Jewish influences » from the « Musikhochschule » , « while Robert Haas seems to have been far from alone in being a Nazi supporter long before the “ Anschluß ” » . Siegmund von Hausegger has likewise been described as « a prominent supporter of the Nazi regime » who, in 1934, conducted the Munich Philharmonic in a special concert « intended as the SS's art manifesto » . Erik Levi depicts a musical culture in which increasing emphasis, after 1933, was placed on what was perceived as the solid German tradition Bruckner was believed to represent, as opposed to the « decadence » of the Weimar Republic era. Broadcasting also helped to give his work a higher profile.

For some, a lingering unease attends the fact that Bruckner was singled out for promotion by the new regime. But the Nazi misappropriation of Bruckner is due more to a series of historical accidents than because any aspect of his life or work connects him to the regime and its ideology. Bruckner had originated from the same « Gau » (Nazi-era administrative region) as Adolf Hitler, and he was also associated with a venue, Saint-Florian, which was both historic and photogenic (inviting for a regime always seeking to legitimize itself by co-opting Germanic tradition) and had even contrived to monumentalize his own remains, unwittingly initiating a funerary sub-culture. His music seemed to embody a mythic dimension absent from the work of the sober North German Johannes Brahms, and while Brahms's appeal was universal, the then limited reception of Bruckner's music outside the German-speaking world made it easier to represent Bruckner as a composer who addressed himself specifically to ethnic Germans. He was also closely associated with Hitler's favourite composer, Richard Wagner, an accusation that could not be levelled against Brahms.

While the idea of a « Bruckner-Festspielhaus » in Saint-Florian was by no means new, Hitler's ideas went further, as Josef Gœbbels remarked :

« Drive to Saint-Florian. To the monastery where Bruckner used to compose. What a beautiful Baroque building. We intend to turn the priests out of here and found a Music College and a home for the Bruckner Society. A marvellous plan Hitler intends to establish a centre of culture here. As a counterweight to Vienna, which will have to be gradually phased-out of the picture. He intends to make alterations to Saint-Florian, at his own expense. »

The monastery was to become a « House of Culture » and the great « Bruckner Organ » was to be used « in the service of the People », meaning that it was to assist in the ritualization of Nazi Party activities. In the words of Heinrich Kronsteiner, « the Bruckner Organ in Saint-Florian was the prototype of all the organs in the Upper-Danube District, and indeed in all Austria, and one saw it alreadding becoming a secular rather than a religious instrument ». The « Reich » 's best-known organists were called upon to display their prowess on this iconic instrument, and, in the 1937 « Bruckner-Blätter », Friedrich Högner duly described « the 1st Upper-Danube Organ Competition in the form of displays of improvisation on given themes on the Bruckner Organ in Saint-Florian near Linz, under the auspices of the " Gaulieters " and " Reichsstathalters " and in association with the National-Socialist " Strenght Through Joy " association (KdF) ». .

Despite War-time demands on resources, a new orchestra was founded, the « Bruckner-Orchester Sankt Florian des Grossdeutschen Rundfunks ». No effort or expense was spared. Georg-Ludwig Jochum (the brother of Eugen Jochum) was engaged as principal conductor, and guest-conductors included Carl Schuricht, Joseph Keilberth and the young Herbert von Karajan. The repertoire ranged from Antonio Vivaldi to Zoltán Kodály, but inevitably centred on a high-profile Bruckner cycle.

Much of the ritual attending the Bruckner cult practised in Saint-Florian, at the time, bears the stamp of the senior official of the scene, « Reichsintendant » Heinrich Glasmeier, a fanatical Hitlerite and a devout Catholic who, in a previous posting, had attended High Mass at Cologne Cathedral in the uniform of an SS « Oberturmführer ». Glasmeier's style is evident in the dedication ceremony held to inaugurate the year-long training programme that began on 1 April 1943. 2 days later, the players, escorted by torch-bearing uniformed SS men, assembled in the crypt of Saint-Florian's church for a special wreath-laying ceremony, at which Glasmeier addressed Bruckner sarcophagus, swearing allegiance to Adolf Hitler. On the following day, 4 April 1943, Hitler himself paid a surprise visit, and, he too, descended into the crypt to commune with Bruckner's remains.

A similar ceremony inaugurated the « Bruckner-Chor Sankt Florian », on 9 May 1944, as double-bass player Fritz Westermann described in a letter to his wife. While the Bruckner Organ played overhead, choir members descended to the crypt, where Glasmeier gave the « German greeting » over Bruckner's coffin, members of the SS, carrying lighted torches, standing on either side. The flickering torchlight played over the thousands of skulls, all too reminiscent of Heinrich Himmler's rites in the « Wewelsburg » Castle (Westermann's description of the scene as « very interesting » is somehow inadequate.) . The Bruckner Orchestra, now renamed the « Linz Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » , was one of the few orchestras allowed to remain active following Josef Goebbels' declaration of (« Total War - Shortest War » (« Totaler Krieg - Kürzester Krieg ») , in August 1944.

The need to ritualize Bruckner's work coincided with a fashion for performances in cathedral acoustics, Saint-Florian presenting itself as the ideal Bruckner space. It is all too easy to see how the supposed sacral character of Bruckner's music could lend itself to employment at the secular rituals through which the Party sought to invest itself with the status of tradition :

After the 1937 Regensburg Festival, Max Auer commented, concerning a concert given in a deconsecrated Minorite Church that « everyone who experienced it came to the conclusion that only a mystic ecclesiastical venue is adequate for Symphonies Nos. 5 and 9 » . « The Concert Hall of the future Bruckner House must employ sacral architecture. »

The choice of words is unfortunate. Performances of Bruckner's Symphonies in ecclesiastical venues can indeed be effective if the acoustics are not too reverberant (in which case they sound dreadful, no matter how slowly the music is taken) but to state that the 5th and the 9th can only make their effect in « mystic ecclesiastical venues » is an example of the tendency to exempt Bruckner from ordinary considerations (those regarding textual fidelity, for instance)

In an article in the Festival Programme for the Regensburg « Brucknerfest » , pianist and conductor Hans Weisbach identified a flexible interpretative approach with the pattern of unauthorized intervention then being detected in the 1st published editions, and argued for a broad « sacral » approach that he equated with fidelity to both the text and the composer's intentions :

« In the soul of this man, who did not take the experiences of earthly life as the inspiration for his art but sent his creative spirit to endless distances, for whom the divine miracles of the universe were transformed into sounds and into which he poured the hot blood of a human heart ; in the soul of this man, music has to transform into a solemnly flowing deep river of noble grandeur. He who has not yet understood that this music has no tendency towards dramatic affect or effect can learn it from every page of the original versions ; he will also learn, to his surprise, how little variation of the basic tempo Bruckner wishes. His tempo indications do not mean to tie the interpreter down, as one so often felt, and only reluctantly followed, in those 1st editions, but to set the interpreter free, because they are in complete harmony with the nature of the music. Intimately related to the tempo (again, clearly evident from the original versions) is the treatment of phrasing indications in the strings. Especially during cantabile moments of the greatest expression, we encounter Bruckner's characteristic of omitting slurs and instead specifying individual bowings for each single note. By adding the comment " lang gezogen " (drawn out) , he gives the conductor as well as the players the opportunity to realize the solemn tempo with the greatest sound and deepest expression, rather than restrict both sound and expression by thrifty usage of the bow. »

The connection between architecture, ambience, and interpretative approach was made explicit by Heinrich Hofer in the « Völkische Beobachter » , reviewing Herbert von Karajan's July 1944 performance of the 8th given in Saint-Florian by the Bruckner Orchestra :

« Here, in the solemn, devotional space of the church, between the starkly laid-out altar and the towering rows of organ pipes, the meaning of Bruckner's musical architecture became particularly evident. The boldly arching and clearly delineated structural elements of the space call for monumental music. Karajan filled the space by grandly letting the music breathe, making it exert great serenity of spiritual introversion. »

This culmination of the cycle, and of the Bruckner Orchestra's activity, was a performance of the 9th Symphony under Wilhelm Fürtwängler (11 October 1944, the anniversary of Anton Bruckner's death) . Fürtwängler later recalled this performance, « given in the last and worst phase of this unholy war » , as exceptional.

We need not, however, assume that it was exceptionally slow, certainly not if Fürtwängler's live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, recorded only 4 days previously, is anything to go by. Even Karajan's 8th was praised for « not over-stretching the tempi » , and acetates of Weisbach conducting the « Grosses Orchester des Reichssenders Leipzig » in the sketches for the Finale of the 9th Symphony, edited by Fritz Öser and recorded for the German Radio in October 1940, reveal an approach that is dignified and stately rather than ponderous. Contemporary recordings vary hugely in terms of interpretative approach, with surprisingly rapid tempi from Wilhelm Fürtwängler and Oswald Kabasta warning against assumptions concerning an approved « Nazizeit » interpretative approach to Bruckner. Nor does anyone seem to have been concerned when Hans Knappertsbusch, who remained loyal all his life to the 1st published editions, conducted the « Bruckner-Orchester » in the 4th Symphony. But there may be more substance to the argument that Robert Haas's later editions, in their elevation of instinct over scholarship, show the influence of Nazi thinking.

Erik Levi has shown how Richard Wagner's writings had given credibility to a specifically Nazi ideology that expressed itself in simplistic polarities : German-Jewish, rural-urban, honest-sophisticated, intellectual-intuitive. One can see how the rustic, unsophisticated, inspired, non-intellectual Bruckner could have been slotted into these stereotypes, and one can also see how Haas's editions of Symphonies Nos. 2, 7 and 8, in which scholarship yields to a mystical-spiritual identification with the composer's imaginative world, were very much products of their time.

6 weeks after the « Anschluß » of March 1938 (which coincided with the completion of Robert Haas's version of the 2nd Symphony) Haas presented a « Report on the Collected Edition of Anton Bruckner's Works » , which he « dedicated to the German people and to our " Führer " Adolf Hitler » . He added that « there were always battles to be fought in public since every performance was accompanied by the same abuse, lies, and defamation by the Jewish press that in his own time Bruckner, the Master, also had to endure » .

Readers familiar with the post-War 1948 preface to Robert Haas' edition of the 8th Symphony will be brought-up short by the conducting passage of this original 1939 preface :

« As for the significance of the content of the 8th, let the " German Michaël " mythos be briefly thought of here, in which Bruckner became wondrously absorbed after 1885. Its transfiguration is the Finale with the mystico-technical contrapuntal device of combining the 4 themes of the Symphony at the end. The meaning of this mythos, as an attitude of mind, seems to me to be realized in the concept of the Greater Germany. It is a sign from Providence that the restored score could ring-out precisely in this year as a greeting from the " Ostmark ". »

As the official term for Austria in the 3rd « Reich » , « Ostmark » has become associated with that era, but the name was long-established, and appears in the text of Bruckner's 1882 « Volkslied » (WAB 94/2) . Robert Haas' attempt to represent the transfiguration of the « German Michaël » motif, at the end of the Symphony, as an assertion of transcendent pan-Germanic identity now seems both bizarre and slightly pathetic, but it is consistent with the nebulous exaltation of any aspect of Bruckner's work that could be made to bear nationalist overtones then prevalent. A similar tendency was adumbrated, in equally nebulous terms, by Amalie Klose, to whom Bruckner had played the Scherzo of the 8th on his elderly « Bösendorfer » piano around 1889, asking her : « Hören's den Michel, hören's sein Hörndl ? » (Can you hear Michel, can you hear his little horn ?) . In answer to my question, he said that this « Michaël » represented « der Urtypus des Deutschen » (the essential German character) . I saw and heard the Master in the full joy of creation ; at the same time, I also saw with enriched (« gereifterem ») understanding, that, in this so familiar « Michaël » , lay the quintessence of the spirit of the People, directly experienced and brought to realization by the essentially German (« kerndeutsche ») Upper-Austrian composer, Anton Bruckner.

But neither this statement, or Bruckner's comment to his friend Theodor Helm that « the Austrian-German (character) is intended » (« Der michl ist der österreich. Deutsche gemeit. ») , amounts to being « wondrously absorbed » in a « Teutonic mythos » . The « Upper-Austrian Anton Bruckner » had no problems with identifying himself as « essentially German » in strictly ethnic terms, but this sense of identity was a product of his own, very different, era.

The rise of Nationalism in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which culminated in the 1870 « Ausgleich » , had led to a new awareness of German ethnicity among German-Austrians. This pride in Germanic culture was part of the male-voice Choral Society ethos ; the 1883 « Sängerbund » (WAB 82) by Bruckner was praised, for example, because « its powerful chords sealed the vow of everlasting faithfulness to German song in every phrase of the destiny of the German people » , and it is, therefore, not surprising to find assertions of Germanic identity in several of the texts set by Bruckner. But there is no evidence that Bruckner felt that these assertions need, in any way be incompatible with fidelity to the Austrian crown, he served in the « Hofkapelle » . In the words of the chorus « Laßt Jubeltöne laut erklingen » (WAB 76) from around 1854 : « God protect Austria's double eagle, and hear our pious prayer : protect our noble ruling couple, Franz Josef and Elisabeth. » . The text is a complacent expression of safe, traditional values (with music to match) .

Anton Bruckner was also known for his tolerance and friendship with Jews. « According to doctor Max von Oberleithner » , Bruckner appears to have found the word « Jew » uncomfortably direct, preferring the more respectful term « the Israelite gentlemen » (« Die Herren Israeliten ») ; he explicitly denied an accusation of anti-Semitism made by a contemporary newspaper, and made a point of telling « Königstein » that « I have nothing against the Israelite gentlemen » . There is of course the following notorious passage in the August Göllicher - Max

Auer impressive biography :

« His aversion to Jews differed from the indiscriminate hatred of the anti-Semites, in that on account of his true and deep piety he changed this feeling into profound compassion. »

But the comment reveals more about August Göllerich, a man who was barred from giving a speech at Bruckner's doctoral award ceremony because of his anti-Semitic views, than about Bruckner. There is no evidence for any « aversion to Jews » on Bruckner's part. There are no anti-Semitic references in his letters, and no anti-Semitic remarks are attributed to him. One can hardly equate his sorrowful approach to a Jewish student : « Tell me, do you really think that the Messiah has not come ? » ; or his unguarded 1st reaction to Karl Almeroth's suggestion that he sit for one of the apostles in Fritz von Uhde's painting of the « Last Supper » : « But I'm not Jewish ! » ; with the outpourings of Richard Wagner, recorded by Cosima in her diary on an almost daily basis (entries began in January 1869, just as Wagner was revising « Das Judentum in der Musik ») . It would be a grave injustice to blame Bruckner for the Nazi appropriation of his work ; but the appropriation would nevertheless continue to the very end, when the Adagio of the 7th Symphony was played on the German radio following the announcement of Adolf Hitler's death.

From the relatively unremarkable life of composer Anton Bruckner, the Nazi ideologues were to construct an elaborate and almost entirely fictionalised narrative of Germanic glory and Jewish oppression. Bruckner's biography was recreated as the story of an Austrian peasant who found success, a lad whose connection to the German soil and German blood made him a worthy symbol of « Aryan » supremacy. Certain aspects of his life were emphasized - as a teacher descended from a long line of teachers, Bruckner fitted into the Nazi obsession with education, and the raising of future generations of « authentic Germans » . Other aspects of his biography were modified : the devout Catholic became instead « a believer in God » , a man who had rejected formal religion in favour of the sort of nationalist spirituality preferred by Adolf Hitler.

Despite the fact that he composed many pieces explicitly for the Church, his music was said to represent the deep spirituality that was liberated from the clerical world. According to myth, his 1st exposure to Richard Wagner inspired him to leave his job as a church organist to become a Symphonist. Finally, much of his biography was simply invented by the Nazi press - this was particularly true when it came to the fact that Bruckner's music received a relatively poor reception for most of his life.

In the eyes of the Nazi musicologists, Bruckner was the ultimate victim of the loathed Jewish « bourgeoisie » . His lukewarm reception by the Viennese music-critics was, accordingly, attributed to simple racial discrimination : a brilliant composer and biologically « pure » member of the Germanic race had, yet again, been oppressed, attacked, or simply ignored by the Jewish conspiracy that held the city of Vienna in its grip. As a native Austrian and an under-appreciated artist, Bruckner provided an ideal figure of identification for that other under-appreciated artist, Adolf Hitler. As Josef Gœbbels noted in his diary, in Hitler's eyes the composer was « a farm boy who conquered the world with his music » - a figure analogous to the « Führer » himself. There was also a functional aspect to the centrality of Bruckner to Nazi music history : as an Austrian, Bruckner served to embody the pan-German fantasies of the Party. It is said that, after listening to Bruckner's 7th Symphony, Hitler cried :

« How can anyone say that Austria is not German ! Is there anything more German than our old pure Austrianness ? »

The important role that Bruckner played in the musical life of the 3rd « Reich » is undeniable. His works were perceived as unproblematically and unapologetically German. The playing of his music preceded speeches at the Nuremberg rallies, and he was one of the most performed composers during the years of Nazi rule. The Nazi Party donated substantial amounts of money to the « Bruckner Gesellschaft » (Music Society) , and developed many Bruckner prizes and Bruckner concert days. Ultimately, they planned a major music Festival, intended to compete with Bayreuth's Wagner Festival in size and glory. For the leader of the « Reich » , Bruckner's music was instilled with the power to cleanse and rebuild the weakened Germanic race. After the loss of World War I and the degeneration of the Weimar Republic, there was but one remedy : a return to the pure sources ! What is purer than that born of the deep religiosity of Johann Sebastian Bach, Ludwig van Beethoven and ... Anton Bruckner ! Now, especially Bruckner's God-consecrated art found a fertile soil, at last it was rightly understood. For many thousands, it was the guide to a beautiful, spiritual world.

AB 115 : Le spectre du Nazisme sur Anton Bruckner

Bruckner, Mahler et l'antisémitisme

« I gratefully acknowledge assistance received in putting this essay together from :

Doctor Dermot Gault ; Doctor Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt ; Doctor Margaret Notley ; Tanya Buchdahl Tintner ; Doctor Crawford Howie. » (Ken Ward)

Most of the following events post-date the days in the 2nd half of the 1870's when Gustav Mahler was a student in Vienna and Anton Bruckner became his « adopted father-in-learning » but none of the reports, certainly none from Mahler himself, nor even any from avowedly anti-Semitic sources, justifies Norman Lebrecht's distasteful invention that Mahler had to put-up with repeated disparagements of his Jewishness from his friend Anton Bruckner.

...

In his recently published book, « Why Mahler ? » , Norman Lebrecht writes, on page 40 :

« Mahler calls Bruckner his “ father-in-learning ”, overlooking his repeated disparagements of Mahler's Jewishness. It is the price he has to pay for having a mentor. » (1)

Lebrecht gives no reference as to the source that leads him to make this unprecedented assertion about Bruckner's behaviour towards Mahler, but the sentence does have one footnote, referring to Paul Stefan's early Mahler biography, where you will read that it was Guido Adler's (2) expression, not Mahler's :

« Adoptiv-Lehrvater » - (adoptive / adopted father-in-learning) - and « Adoptiv » could suggest the action of adopting was Bruckner's as much as Mahler's. (3) But in Stefan's book, you will find only descriptions of Bruckner's respect, exaggerated respect even, towards Mahler :

Stefan reports Theodor Rättig telling him Bruckner always spoke of Mahler with extreme respect or deference (« äußerst Achtung ») . Indeed, you will find the same memoir recycled in Lebrecht's own book, « Mahler Remembered » , page 27, footnote :

« Bruckner's publisher, Theodor Rättig, told Paul Stefan that :“ Bruckner always spoke of Mahler with the greatest respect whenever Mahler visited, he always insisted on accompanying the young man down the 4 flights of stairs, hat in hand. ” » (4)

Searching the biographical literature of both composers and a variety of memoirs, I can find no evidence whatever that Bruckner ever once said anything to Mahler disparaging his Jewishness, let alone repeatedly. The only suggestion that Bruckner might have had any reservations on that account comes in a letter written by Rudolf Krzyzanowski's sister-in-law, Marie Lorenz. Krzyzanowski was Mahler's friend, and they were both amongst the small band of enthusiasts who applauded Bruckner at the end of the disastrous performance of the 3rd Symphony, on 16 December 1877, and they shared the task of making the 4 hand piano transcription of the Symphony, this transcription being Mahler's 1st published work. Lorenz had some spiteful comments to make about Mahler, whose confidence, ambition, success and friendship with Bruckner she obviously resented. One suspects she would have loved to have quoted disparaging comments by Bruckner of Mahler's Jewishness, but this even she was unable to do. She writes of Mahler and of his relationship with Bruckner :

« I knew Mahler from his modest times (when he was a student at the Conservatory) and, even at that time, he could not bear being put in the shade in any way. Step-by-step seeking the heights, limb by limb, good fortune easing his path. Tyrannical to the verge of heartlessness, stepping on all obstacles in his way, accessible only if one happened to find him in good humour and, at a propitious moment, he could still act obsequiously at times. Did he have time to devote to Bruckner ? If the question of playing a work was involved ! Yes, but for how long ? And what was left for Bruckner's personal, marvellous, divinely-gifted nature ? And, even so, Bruckner, who had the pure naivety of a child, would be overjoyed to receive a letter from his one-time pupil ! » (5)

As Henry-Louis de La Grange points-out, Mahler did not conduct any Bruckner until many years later, so Lorenz's comment that Mahler had time to devote to Bruckner only if there was a work of his to be performed is obviously untrue. This appears in the 9 part biography of Bruckner by August Göllerich and Max Auer, published between 1922 and 1937 : « Anton Bruckner - Ein lebens- und Schaffens-Bild » . Göllerich quotes Lorenz again, this time where she makes explicit mention of Bruckner's alleged dislike of Mahler's Jewishness and of Bruckner's anti-Semitism, but one wonders how much this might be an expression of her own, not to mention Göllerich's, anti-Mahler, anti-Semitic, views rather than a true reflection of Bruckner's feelings for Mahler :

« He (Bruckner) took Krzyzanowski to his heart, as opposed to Mahler the Jew, who he valued as an extraordinary musician, but by whom, reports Krzyzanowski's sister-in-law " Frau " Marie Lorenz, he was disturbed. " The Jews ", she further reports, " were to him altogether unlikeable and he was horrified by the word ' Jew ' as though he had committed a great insult against them should the word accidentally slip-out, and he corrected himself with a more delicate description, where he would say, ' the Israelite gentlemen ' ". » (6)

Göllerich continues :

« His dislike of the Jews differentiates itself nevertheless from the indiscriminate hate of anti-Semites, so that for reasons of his sincere and deep religiousness this feeling was transformed into deep compassion. »

This uneasy distinction is then illustrated by the story from Johann Kerschagl's reminiscences of attending Bruckner's lectures at the Vienna Conservatory, the occasion when Bruckner entered the classroom and noticed a small Jewish boy sitting in the front row, gazed a while at him, then put a hand upon his head and said to him, « almost compassionately » :

« Dear child, do you really believe that the " Messiah " has not yet come to earth ? » (7)

According to Kerschagl's memoir, as retold by Göllerich, the whole place burst into laughter, but Bruckner was altogether serious.

August Göllerich was a virulent anti-Semite, so much so that, even though he was Bruckner's « official » biographer, the University of Vienna asked him to withdraw from the celebration of Bruckner's receipt of an honorary doctorate, on 11 December 1891, at which he had been due to speak. (8) That such a man was Bruckner's biographer, and an enormous proportion of the biographical information we have about Bruckner's life comes from his work, renders it necessary to treat his anecdotes and reports with some circumspection, and it is perhaps surprising, and even reassuring, that he found nothing more blatantly anti-Semitic in Bruckner's attitude and behaviour to report in that lengthy biography than the extracts I quote in this essay.

There is a further reference to Bruckner's view of Mahler and Mahler's Jewishness in Göllerich-Auer.

Wilhelm Zinne (1858-1934) , a friend and supporter of Gustav Mahler in Hamburg, who shared Mahler's love of Bruckner and cycling, visited Bruckner in 1892, at the time of the Vienna Theatre and Music Exhibition. Göllerich-Auer quotes Zinne's own report of his meeting with Bruckner. In the rather bare, modest room, with manuscript paper and scores lying on the piano and harmonium, he sat down with Bruckner who « soon asks after " his beloved Mahler ", who he appeared to regard very highly. Let him prepare his Symphony - the 7th above all, which to Bruckner himself was the dearest. » (9)

They drank a bottle of red wine, the conversation became more convivial.

« He expressed great joy over the enthusiasm of the Viennese for his works. He was pleased too by the Berliners and the performance of the “ Te Deum ” under Siegfried Ochs, who was probably a Jew, but that doesn't matter ; Mahler is also a Jew but he rails terribly against the Jews. All this in jest, as he was on this day uncommonly cheerful and in the mood for joking. » (10)

It is hard to read into this reminiscence an anti-Semitism so unforgiving and mean-minded as would have expressed itself in repeated disparagement of « his beloved Mahler » 's Jewishness.

Alma Mahler and Max von Oberleithner both write of Bruckner's preference for the expression « the honourable Israelites » . (11) Our consideration of what to make of this preference must include the likelihood that Bruckner was actually at pains not to be anti-Semitic. As Dermot Gault points-out :

« Bruckner was known for his tolerance and friendship with Jews. » (12)

His long-term friendship with his student Friedrich Eckstein, (13) not to mention his consideration of a proposal of marriage to his pupil Marie Pohoryles, a Polish Jewish young woman who seems to have taken lessons from Bruckner for almost 10 years, (14) are both witness to affections that were free of any of that restraint as would have arisen had Bruckner been anti-Semitic. And, beyond that, he was prepared to rebuke those, like Norman Lebrecht, who would label him in print as anti-Semitic :

Generally, he was, as Doctor Franz Marschner (15) reports, not really in sympathy with the anti-Semitism of some of his most outstanding students, since he currently saw himself strongly promoted by several noble representatives of that race. One thinks only of what Eckstein and Levi had done for him !

That « Circle » , which should have recognized and supported the prophets in their ranks, at that time, did absolutely nothing positive for the Master - but he was, however, good enough to become set-up by the newspapers as an anti-Semite, which could only damage him. One day, at « The Red Hedgehog » Restaurant-Hotel (« Gasthof Zum Rothen Igel ») , just when he had again been denounced in the newspaper as an anti-Semite, he met Doctor Königstein, the critic of the « Illustriertes Wiener Extrablatt » .

Bruckner addressed him :

« So, “ Herr ” Doctor, what it says in the newspapers is absolutely not true - I have absolutely nothing against the Israelite gentlemen ! » (16)

Bruckner also fought against anti-Semitism on behalf of the requirements of his students. Bruckner arranged for the purchase of a fine « Organ-harmonium » from the firm of Bernhard Kohn, in Vienna, for the students of the organ-playing course (the Conservatory had no instrument for the students of the course to play on !) but, after its installation, the Conservatory administration said they could not use it because the Conservatory would not take an organ from a Jewish firm. The students were outraged, and Bruckner took it upon himself to report this outrage to the administration : the following week the « organ-harmonium » was back in service - and that instrument stayed with Bruckner until his final year. (17) That the Conservatory should have sought to forbid the use of a fine instrument because it was obtained from a Jewish firm gives an idea of the extraordinary prevalence of anti-Semitism at that time.

Tanya Tintner, who describes the anti-Semitism in Vienna in her book, « Out of Time : The Vexed Life of Georg Tintner » , (18) gives the background which helps to place Bruckner's reported relations with Mahler and Jews in context. In an e-mail exchange, she wrote :

In Bruckner's time, anti-Semitism was endemic in Austria, and was even to be found in « mild-mannered » and intelligent and, otherwise, perfectly reasonable Austrians ; it was so much part of the fabric of Austrian life that, if you weren't on the receiving end of it, you simply didn't notice it. Low-level anti-Semitism was not only regarded as perfectly acceptable, it wasn't even seen as any sort of negative prejudice at all. It was just the way you dealt with Jews, the way you saw them. Non-Jews had dealings with Jews in Vienna all the time, but that didn't mean that the former had anything other than contempt for the latter, entirely because of their Jewishness. Alma Mahler is a good example of this : she married 2 Jews but it didn't stop her writing and saying the most vile things about Jews in general - see : Oliver Hilmes' book, « Witwe im Wahn » , Siedler Verlag, München (2004) . In Austria, at the time, there was nothing contradictory about this. Nowadays, Alma's behaviour would be utterly unacceptable ; at the time, it was just pretty normal. So, it would be perfectly possible for Bruckner to admire Mahler, be grateful to Mahler, and despise Jews all at the same time.

The question is whether Bruckner was just your regular Austrian (an anti-Semite by current standards, not an anti-Semite by late- 19th Century standards, background anti-Semitism as it were) or something rather worse. Most likely, Bruckner was one of the more tolerant Austrians (and being non-Viennese makes it, yet, more like it was in Vienna, home to a quarter of a million Jews, where the hatred was so extensive) , and anti-Semitism, if any, that might be attributed to him would be of the endemic, « common-or-garden » , background variety.

It is, perhaps, difficult to see Bruckner as at all anti-Semitic, but even if his attitude to Jews fell within the pale of this « background » variety of anti-Semitism, the same cannot be said of some of those with whom he was associated. The primary agency by which Bruckner's works were promoted in Vienna, in the 1880's and 1890's, was the Vienna Academic Wagner Society (« Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein ») . Josef Schalk was active in this Society on Bruckner's behalf and many of Bruckner's works received piano transcription performances under the auspices of this Society. (19)

Margaret Notley writes :

« Indeed, the Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein included many Jews. This organization, which Theodor Helm likened, in 1891, to “ a miniature Bayreuth for Bruckner ”, declined to support the anti-Semitic politics that began to pose a serious threat to Viennese Liberalism, in the 1880's. » (20)

But, in 1890, the extreme Pan-German nationalist and anti-Semite, Georg von Schönerer, together with a splinter group of sympathisers, left the « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » to form the New Richard Wagner Society (« Neuer Richard-Wagner-Verein ») .

The Society declared :

« As national artist, Richard Wagner was an anti-Semite, so must every Wagner Society be un-contaminated German, so that it does not become a caricature of an artistic association that bears the name of “ Wagner ”. » (21)

(The event was reported in the anti-Semitic newspaper, « Deutsches Volksblatt » , on 27 March 1890.)

The 1st motion now put by the board, that « Meister » Anton Bruckner, the heir to Beethoven's genius long silenced to death by the press, be appointed honorary member, and the spiritual creator of the New Richard Wagner Society, Herr August Göllerich be appointed honorary Chairman, was unanimously adopted and called forth a storm of true German enthusiasm. (22)

Both Wagner Societies promoted talks about and performances of Bruckner's works, which didn't happen elsewhere in the conservative music establishment, which leads Doctor Robert Hirschfeld to comment in « Die Presse » , on 24 December 1890 :

« The conservative critics have always treated Anton Bruckner with ridicule and scorn. So, he fell into the hands of political partisans who took pains to take in the “ abandoned man ” in all spheres, in order in the end to discredit him altogether. » (23)

Although this group of anti-Semitic supporters was keen to claim Bruckner as a great German « Meister » , and described such a being as free from Jewish influence, nowhere is there a word or action of Bruckner's that records him as ever being active in their cause. We have no evidence of any response from him to his appointment as honorary member, not even in August Göllerich's biography, nor any evidence of him taking an active role in the « Neuer Richard-Wagner-Verein » at all. Although their programme was anti-Semitic, and they chose Bruckner as their artistic mascot, they seem to have found him totally unusable to follow in Wagner's foot-steps in the vanguard of anti-Semitism. Bruckner continued his association with Jews, including Gustav Mahler, Friedrich Eckstein, Ferdinand Löwe and Herman Levi, and with the somewhat more liberal « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » of which he had also been appointed honorary member, in 1885.

Bruckner's letters to Göllerich are fulsome in their statements of sympathy and friendship, but in the ones that have come down to us, and indeed in all the other letters in the collected letters, there are no anti-Semitic sentiments expressed. Not even when he complains about his fate and that of his music, does he choose to blame « the Jews » , or even « the honourable Israelites » . They don't get a mention. Just as he skirted around the word

« Jude » , referring « politely » , as Alma Mahler describes it, to « the honourable Israelites » , he seems to have deliberately avoided any involvement in the prevalent and increasing anti-Semitism of his times, possibly seeing it as repugnant and probably an irrelevance or even a hindrance to his own concerns, which were primarily to advance his success as a composer. There is, indeed, to my knowledge no record of him having been involved in the promotion of or opposition to any social or political cause, beyond personal representations with regard to his own career and reputation or his music's reception. There is no record of him being remotely involved in the battle within the « Wagner Verein » that led to the defection of August Göllerich et al. , both Societies presumably retaining him as an honorary member, but nor do we know how he responded to the example provided by Rudolf Weinwurm, his very close friend since 1856, who resigned from the « Akademischer Gesangverein » , in 1887, because of its increasing anti-Semitism. (24) Surely, it cannot be, as Thomas Leibnitz speculates, that « Bruckner was unaware of the polemical and aggressive aspects of nationalistic German rhetoric » , (25) but he does seem to have acted, on the whole, as if none of it was anything to do with him nor anything that he had to be explicitly involved with - and I think we can take him at his word : he had absolutely nothing against the Israelite gentlemen.

Juin 1935 : Peter Raabe succédera au compositeur Richard Strauß (après que ce dernier eut envoyé une lettre à son librettiste juif Stefan Zweig, un farouche opposant à l'antisémitisme, qui sera intercepté par la « Gestapo ») comme président du « Reichsmusikkammer ». La Chambre de la musique du « Reich », une corporation de droit public, sera chargée du contrôle de la vie musicale allemande. C'était l'un des 7 organismes de la Chambre de la culture du « Reich » (« Reichskulturkammer ») , créée le 22 septembre 1933 et placée sous la tutelle du ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande.

L'adhésion à la Chambre était obligatoire pour exercer une activité professionnelle ou se produire publiquement, ce qui permettait au régime nazi d'écarter les artistes qu'il considérait comme « dégénérés » ou « non allemands » , notamment les Juifs.

Durant une grande partie de son règne en tant que président, Raabe ne sera pas le seul en selle en matière de culture musicale. En 1936, Josef Goebbels nommera Heinz Drewes, alors directeur musical général de l'Altenburg, à la tête d'un département de musique au ministère de la Propagande. Ce qui ajoutera à la confusion des responsabilités. Raabe tentera de démissionner en 1938, mais sa démission sera refusée. Il devra servir jusqu'à la fin de 1945.

Anton Bruckner et le 3e « Reich »

One of the greatest German composers of the 19th Century, Anton Bruckner, exerted an enormous influence on the development of music in the modern age. Artists as diverse as Arnold Schönberg, Gustav Mahler, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Paul Hindemith and Herbert von Karajan found inspiration in his grand and innovative Symphonies. Yet, his public integration into the Nazi world and Adolf Hitler's frequently avowed identification with the long dead musician strongly affected Bruckner's post-War reception. Unlike that of Richard Wagner, the name Bruckner does not bear the taint of anti-Semitism, nor has the mythologisation of his life attained the same heights. Nonetheless, Bruckner's music was intimately tied to the workings of the 3rd « Reich » , and, for many years after the War, he was rarely heard outside the German speaking world. Not explicitly rejected for his association with the horrors of Hitler's War, Bruckner was instead quietly downplayed. It is only in the past few decades that musicians and musicologists in the United States and Western Europe have begun to turn again to Bruckner, exploring both his music and his significance to the Nazi Party.

From the relatively unremarkable life of Bruckner, the Nazi ideologues were to construct an elaborate and almost entirely fictionalised narrative of Germanic glory and Jewish oppression. Bruckner's biography was recreated as the story of an Austrian peasant who found success, a lad whose connection to the German soil and German blood made him a worthy symbol of « Aryan » supremacy. Certain aspects of his life were emphasized : as a teacher descended from a long line of teachers, Bruckner fitted into the Nazi obsession with education, and the raising of future generations of « authentic Germans » . Other aspects of his biography were modified : the devout Catholic became instead « a believer in God » , a man who had rejected formal religion in favour of the sort of nationalist spirituality preferred by Adolf Hitler.

Despite the fact that he composed many pieces explicitly for the Church, his music was said to represent the deep spirituality that was liberated from the clerical world. According to myth, his 1st exposure to Richard Wagner inspired him to leave his job as a church organist to become a Symphonist. Finally, much of his biography was simply invented by the Nazi press. This was particularly true when it came to the fact that Bruckner's music received a relatively poor reception for most of his life.

In the eyes of the Nazi musicologists, Bruckner was the ultimate victim of the loathed Jewish « bourgeoisie » . His lukewarm reception by the Viennese music-critics was, accordingly, attributed to simple racial discrimination : a brilliant composer and biologically « pure » member of the Germanic race had, yet again, been oppressed, attacked, or simply ignored by the Jewish conspiracy that held the city of Vienna in its grip. As a native Austrian and an under-appreciated artist, Bruckner provided an ideal figure of identification for that other under-appreciated artist, Adolf Hitler. As Josef Gœbbels noted in his diary : in Hitler's eyes, the composer was « a farm boy who conquered the world with his music » , a figure analogous to the « Führer » himself. There was also a functional aspect to the centrality of Bruckner to Nazi music history : as an Austrian, Bruckner served to embody the pan-German fantasies of the Party. It is said that after listening to Bruckner's 7th Symphony, Adolf Hitler cried :

« How can anyone say that Austria is not German ! Is there anything more German than our old pure Austrianness ? »

The important role that Bruckner played in the musical life of the 3rd « Reich » is undeniable. His works were perceived as unproblematically and unapologetically German. The playing of his music preceded speeches at the Nuremberg rallies, and he was one of the most performed composers during the years of Nazi rule. The Nazi Party donated substantial amounts of money to the Bruckner Society, and developed many Bruckner prizes and Bruckner concert days. Ultimately, they planned a major music Festival, intended to compete with Bayreuth's Wagner Festival, in size and glory. For the leader of the « Reich » , Anton Bruckner's music was instilled with the power to cleanse and rebuild the weakened Germanic race. After the loss of World War I and the degeneration of the Weimar Republic, there was but one remedy : a return to the pure sources ! What is purer than that born of the deep religiosity of Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner ! Now especially, Bruckner's God consecrated art found a fertile soil, at last it was rightly understood. For many thousands it was the guide to a beautiful, spiritual world.

As the Nazi regime stabilized, the virtues of Beethoven's heroism and defiance gave way to Bruckner's reverence - the title of a popular biography from the 3rd « Reich » . Even Bonn, the city of Beethoven's birth, founded a branch of the Bruckner Society, in the winter of 1943-1944, amid blistering air raids. The political significance of the ceremony was unmistakable, with the presence of Richard Ohling, the propaganda leader for the Cologne / Aachen branch of the Nazi Party (« Gaupropagandaleiter ») and Karl Franz (Johann) Chudoba, who was University rector, as well as the academic liaison to the Party and regime (« Gaudozentrenführer ») .

Bruckner's Symphonies performed a range of political functions in the 3rd « Reich » , beyond their regular programming in the concert-hall. If Beethoven's Symphonies seem to compress the passage of time (again, to cite Theodor W. Adorno) , Bruckner's Symphonies, lasting an hour or more, project a vast structure by means of orchestration that pits the registral extremes against one another. The spatial expanse of the music, along with its monumental passage of time, may be one reason why Bruckner, and not Beethoven, was programmed as part of Hitler's cultural campaign to win the allegiance of Saarland residents, who faced a vote, in 1935, on whether to rejoin Germany or remain part of France ; one is ostensibly absorbed into a Bruckner Symphony, yet, swept away by Beethoven.

... of aesthetic experience popularized by Josef Goebbels's ban on arts criticism in favor of the « contemplation » of art. This motivic expansiveness and the alleged transcendence of worldly concerns were the qualities stressed by the editors of the « original » versions published in the 1930's under the aegis of the « Bruckner Gesellschaft ». The endeavor began in 1930 but, only in the mid-1930's, did the method and reception of the editions become politicized. The sweeping claims made for the new editions seemed wholly unjustified to a reviewer at the « Musical Times » who compared the 2 scores of the 4th Symphony while attending a 1936 performance of the Leipzig Radio Symphony under Hans Weisbach, at London Queen's Hall. (« The case had been overstated in regard to both the quality of the Masterpiece and the effect of the “ restoration ”. ») At the same time, whatever politics contributed to the reception of the « original » editions, little changed after the fall of the « Reich ». In his 1947 reflections on « Bruckner today », Fred Hamel spoke-out against the omission of a lengthy development (122 bars) in the Finale of the 5th Symphony. Through this powerful effect of the Chorale, the thematic opposition escalates from the dramatic into the ritualistic, and the idealistic power of the Symphony evolves into the religious.

The search for a « pure » Bruckner score, free from intrusion of his colleagues, went hand in hand with a performance practice developed by Hans Weisbach. As director of the Vienna Philharmonic (renamed after the « Anschluß ») , he conducted a number of « Festliche Dunkelkonzerten » (Festival Concerts, in the dark) beginning on November 17, 1939. Each featured a Bruckner Symphony performed in complete darkness, and other works (including Mozart, for example, in concerts on November 15 and December 6, 1940) in semi-darkness. Inspiration for the practice was probably not artistic - although precedents for adjusting the lighting to dramatic ends existed in Opera, along with some earlier reforms in Lieder performances. More likely is that the air raid practices were elevated into an artistic context. Perhaps, too, the 2nd tier director wished to emulate Herbert von Karajan, who conducted everything from memory, with his eyes firmly shut, and had recently gained so much attention from the press.

With its capacity for transcendence and gravity, Bruckner's music served as commemoration (real or imagined) at the end of the 3rd « Reich ». Sequestered in his bunker, in February 1945, Hitler drew comfort from envisioning buildings, including a bell tower in Linz whose carillon would, on special occasions, chime a « motif » from Bruckner's 4th Symphony. In recounting these conversations, his architect Hermann Giesler sought to portray the dictator's humanity :

« “ This melody, which moves me so deeply, is suitable for a glockenspiel. ” He stood-up, grasped my arm, and said : “ You understand me, Giesler. ” »

Adolf Hitler's chief architect, Albert Speer, warned his friends and the musicians of the Berlin Philharmonic that, when Bruckner's 4th was performed (a work « especially dear » to him « for its architectonic final movement ») , they should escape from the Soviet army by fleeing to Bayreuth, which would be taken-over by American soldiers. On the afternoon of April 12, 1945, Speer changed the program to include the most celebrated Finale in the Operatic literature, the immolation scene of Richard Wagner's « Götterdämmerung » , Beethoven's Violin Concerto (a work of immense pleasure and intimacy) and, as a sublime ending, the Bruckner. Afterward, uniformed « Hitler Youth » allegedly stood at the exit doors holding baskets of free cyanide capsules to distribute to those who feared the ravages of the Soviet army. And, finally, the Adagio of the 7th Symphony, that iconic commemoration of Wagner's death, was broadcast on Hamburg Radio (the only surviving remnant of the « Reich » Radio) , along with excerpts from various Wagner Operas, to prepare for the announcement of Hitler's death, to be made by the commander in chief for the North, Karl Dönitz, whom Hitler's will designated as his successor as « Führer » . The recording was made by the Berlin Philharmonic under Wilhelm Furtwängler, in 1942.

What made Bruckner so quintessentially German, at least in the 3rd « Reich » ? The composer seemed to embody a Parsifalian « naïveté » : the « ingénu » from the « Großdeutsch » rural landscape whose genius was nevertheless undeniable. When Reinhold Zimmerman set-out to write a book on « racial identity in German music » , his focus was Bruckner, not Beethoven or Bach. Admittedly, Beethoven's racial pedigree had long been called into question, as a man of darker complexion (in some paintings) . It is not difficult to find reasons why, coincidentally, Bruckner's music suited National-Socialist ideology. Yet, the fact remains that many accounts of actual performances avoided the subject of the music itself. The instrumentalization of the 7th Symphony is a case in point.

Bruckner's 7th, and not a Beethoven Symphony, was programmed at the inaugural concert of the SS « artistic appreciation » series (« Bekenntnis der SS. zur Kunst ») , in November 1934, featuring the Munich Philharmonic. Oscar von Pander, student of the anti-Semite Rudolf Louis, saw « unimaginable significance » in the event, by its placing culture at the service of National-Socialism. But his report, despite its length and the venue (a music journal) , included nothing about the composition or performance except that this was Bruckner's « Eroica » (on account of its heroic character, as well as the allusions of its slow movement to the funeral march of Beethoven's 3rd Symphony) . He did, however, recount that, afterward, the audience (« Völker » , a politically resonant term) broke into song, and several impromptu songs concluded the concert.

Peter Raabe programmed the 7th Symphony (along with Georg Friedrich Händel and Max Reger) when, as president of the « Reich » Music Chamber, he returned to Aachen to conduct the « Städtisches Orchester » , where he had been music director. On the program, each composer was listed by family name except one, hailed as « the Master Bruckner » . In his report on the concert, Zimmermann, who was based in Aachen, wrote nothing of Raabe's interpretation or, again, the music. Yet, he lingered over the reaction to this highest ranking musician in the regime. The enthusiasm and stormy applause « surpassed all expectations and overwhelmed even the most staid occupants of the concert-hall » . Wary, perhaps, that the response to Raabe verged on « Führer » adoration and could challenge a regime and culture in which Hitler alone commanded such attention, Zimmermann assured that Germans rarely pay homage to an individual ; they do so only in cases of the most obvious merit.

In August, 1944, Josef Goebbels closed down all theatres and concert halls, exempting only the Berlin Philharmonic. Despite the thinning of its ranks and changes in performance venue, the Orchestra persevered, including a recording of Bruckner's 9th under Wilhelm Furtwängler, from October 7, which is unsurpassed in its intensity and intelligence, profundity and power. The choice of the 9th was eminently suitable - a Symphony ostensibly left incomplete, thus without a victorious Finale, the Adagio serves as a more profound conclusion. The circumstances that, if anything, encouraged an escape from the imploding regime, on that Saturday afternoon, as the musicians and conductor gathered in the hall, with a few Nazi echelons sitting quietly in the front row during those 59 minutes. The United States Army had launched its 1st attack on German territory on the Western-Front on Monday, successfully breaking through Hitler's much-cherished « Siegfried Line » , on Tuesday. The German counter-attack, on Wednesday, had failed. On Thursday, the conscription age was lowered to 16 and hospitals were placed under military control. Friday saw heavy air raids on Berlin, during day and night. Furtwängler had neither the will nor the courage to extricate himself until, 3 months later, Speer had warned him that defeat was near and advised emigrating to Switzerland. Furtwängler was able to cross the border on February 7, 1945, under the pretense that he would return. Despite complications in Switzerland, Furtwängler succeeded, although denazification would last until December 1946, and its ratification came only in April 1947.

From the Symphony to the « Symphonic »

For all the ideological hue and cry, few Symphonies were composed during the 3rd « Reich » ; of those that were, still fewer were by overt Nazi sympathizers or Party members. This avoidance reflected less an « anxiety of influence » , as befell the generation after Beethoven, than an uncertainty about the creative statement to be made through the genre. The problem was not unique to Germany but, elsewhere, the political stakes of the genre were not high. Nor was there encouragement from above. When Peter Raabe organized a conference on the role of German composers (« Reichstagungen des Berufsstandes der deutschen Komponisten ») , in the summer of 1936, the Symphony had no place in the agenda set by Hans Hinkel as to « what we expect from German composers » : music for Nazi celebrations, entertainment music, Opera, music for amateurs » . In the very era when the Symphony had become so politically freighted, the genre seemed in jeopardy in Germany - and especially in Austria.

Josef Reiter, an Austrian born 2 years after Gustav Mahler, pursued nationalistic topics as early as his 1899 « Deutscher Siegesmarsch » (German Victory March) for orchestra. An avid supporter of National-Socialism in the 1920's, Reiter dedicated his only undertaking in the genre, the « Gœthe-Symphonie » (1931) , to Hitler. Johann Nepomuk David, an Austrian who accepted a position at the Leipzig Conservatory, in 1934, and curried favor with the political establishment, wrote only 3 Symphonies during the Nazi regime, despite his total output of 8 symphonies and 3 Sinfonias (as well as 2 epigonic Symphonies that he later destroyed) . A subvention from the « Reich » Music Chamber for an orchestral composition led him to compose a set of « Symphonic » variations on a theme by Heinrich Schütz (1942) . Its Baroque theme notwithstanding, David pursued the military character and narrative that were historically allied with the genre of the Symphony, including the movement titles : (1) « Battle procession » ; (2) « Fear and worship » ; (3) « Portent for the enemy » ; and (4) « Battle, victory, and thanksgiving » .

... composed 4 Symphonies and, after the War, he would compose 2 more. But the only Symphony dating from the period of the 3rd « Reich » was his 5th, performed at the 1936 International Music Festival, in Baden-Baden. When Hermann Grabner, a member of the Nazi Party teacher's Union (« Nationalsozialistische Lehrerbund ») and the SA, revised his popular music textbook, in 1940, striking any references to composers and theorists who were Jewish or supposedly modernist, the Mahler examples were replaced by works of Hermann Emil Alfred Max Trapp and the neo-

Romantic Austrian, Egon Kornauth.

Hans Pfitzner's late interest in Symphonic composition was unusual for a composer working in Nazi Germany. Unlike Richard Strauß in his late-period, Pfitzner turned away from the genres most familiar to him in an effort to contribute to the Symphony, the genre cherished by conservatives and National-Socialists, just as he had already composed 5 Operas - the other genre esteemed by the regime. In the period following the Nazi seizure of power, Pfitzner produced only 3 choral works (in 1941), including 2 for the historically political genre of male chorus. The Symphonic recomposition of his Quartet, from 1932, was only one of his attempts to contribute to the Symphonic genre. In 1939, at age 70 (after avoiding the genre for his entire creative life), Pfitzner composed his « Small Symphony » (« Kleine Sinfonie ») despite the unwieldiness of the genre for his compositional voice and, the following year, he wrote a 1 movement Symphony in C major.

The tendency to compose Symphonic works in lieu of Symphonies was a phenomenon strongest with amateur composers who had an Orchestra at their disposal. Wilhelm Furtwängler composed an unnumbered Symphony, at age 17, but only returned to the genre 3 decades later, in the 3rd « Reich ». His role as a collaborator, if dismissed by a few scholars, became amply clear when he sought to prove his ideological loyalty, particularly once the young Herbert von Karajan's success threatened to overshadow his own. In the period 1936-1945, Furtwängler completed his « Sinfonisches Konzert » (Symphonic Concerto), his 1st and 2nd Symphonies, and no other works except 2 Sonatas for violin and piano.

The challenge facing composers was considerable : to write music that would be both clear and folk-inspired and that, at the same time, would make use of the modern, large-scale orchestra. A contemporary idiom that would reflect the Nazi embrace of modern technology and culture, was difficult in the medium of the Orchestra.

Anton Bruckner and National-Socialism

« In the early 1920's, the National-Socialists had rarely concerned themselves with cultural propaganda. Cultural issues were only raised in so far as they related to such broad issues as the treaty of Versailles and the influence of the Jews. »

(Erik Levi ; page 8.)

I shall investigate how this changed, and how the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner became the target of political appropriation. In the 1st part of this essay, I will describe how and why Bruckner's Symphonies were used by the Nazi Party.

After covering this aspect in some detail, I shall turn my attention to post-War reception, and some of the issues faced by Bruckner scholarship today. This will inevitably involve consideration of the various editions of his works and how these relate to performance practice and reception.

Josef Goebbels' Regensburg Address and the Appropriation of Bruckner

Josef Goebbels's Regensburg address may be seen as the pivotal point in the Nazi appropriation of Anton Bruckner. As the Minister for propaganda, Goebbels gave his ceremonial speech « in order to honour one of the greatest Masters of the German musical art » (translation : John Michael Cooper ; page 605) . This event may be seen as paving the way for the subsequent German annexation of Austria. Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt shows how Adolf Hitler's reading of a Bruckner Symphony takes on ideological significance,

« After listening to a recording of the 7th Symphony given to him by Goebbels, Hitler is reported to have said :

« How can anyone say that Austria is not German ! Is there anything more German than our old pure Austrianness ?!
»

Hitler's own interest in the composer was also an important factor. Bryan Gilliam (1994) says that :

« The Nazi propaganda campaign glorifying Bruckner would never have taken place were it not for Hitler's personal interest in and identification with Bruckner as a man, a composer, and a fellow Upper-Austrian. »

Goebbels began his Regensburg address by comparing Bruckner to Beethoven. Bruckner's music is celebrated as the continuation of a Germanic Symphonic tradition. In Goebbels words, he like Beethoven, « left to us an artistic legacy of 9 mighty Symphonies » (translation : John Michael Cooper ; page 605) . It is not long before Goebbels draws attention to Bruckner's peasant roots. His mystical nature and simple character are also highlighted, as well as « the child-like purity of his delight in life which he rested upon a faith in God » (translation : John Michael Cooper ; page 606) . This focus on Bruckner's roots and mystical nature may be seen as Goebbels attempt to ally Bruckner with the « völkische » tradition, which plays such an important role in the Nazi ideology. The « child-like purity » alluded to may also be seen as forming an opposition to bourgeois intellectualism and modernistic decadence, key-elements that the Nazi Party wished to purge from German society. Goebbels also emphasizes the hostile reception afforded to Bruckner by certain critics. This could be seen as bolstering support for the recent ban on art criticism, and opposing Viennese Liberalism in general.

« If the public practice of art commentary (" Kuntsbetrachtung ") has been restricted by law to official channels in the new Germany, then, we believe we have also resolved a debt of gratitude to the Master who struggled in solitude, tortured-up to his moment of death by his tormenters. »

Consideration of the points discussed above, may show why Bruckner became an important part of the cultural propaganda campaign. Bruckner's life and works (particularly, the Symphonies) may have been regarded as the ideal vehicle for this cause. Through emphasizing or concealing certain factors of Bruckner's biography, Goebbels could appropriate the composer to promote National-Socialist ideals. There was one area of Bruckner's life though, that did not quite fit with the Nazi line of thought. Bruckner was a church musician (« Kantor ») , and devout Roman catholic. These religious beliefs had to be re-interpreted to fit the Nazi conception of « Gottlaubigkeit » (God believing) . In order to free Bruckner from his catholic roots, Goebbels places emphasis on the influence of Richard Wagner. Bruckner would, no doubt, have been aware of Wagner as a composer, and may well have been influenced by his style. Goebbels account though, sees Bruckner's 1st experience of Wagner's music as having « an almost revolutionary effect on the sonority of his musical language » and states that « from that moment onwards, the church musician, at once, retreats almost entirely and, out of him, emerges the distinct Symphonist » (translation : John Michael Cooper ; page 607) . Bryan Gilliam (in 1994) , points out that this interpretation completely ignores Bruckner's sacred works such as the « Te Deum » and the « 150th Psalm » (Bryan Gilliam ; page 593) . This refusal to acknowledge Bruckner's Catholicism may be seen as an attempt to ally the composer with the Nazi conception of « Gottlaubigkeit » . Gilliam supports this view by saying that :

« The 1937 Regensburg Ceremony placed Bruckner as a God in the Holy-Temple of Walhalla. His music would be the sacred language and Nazism the mystical religion. »

The Viennese « Dunkelkonzerte » may also be seen as an important factor in this portrayal of Bruckner. The « Dunkelkonzerte » was a candle-light concert which lent a religious tone to the music.

According to Gilliam :

« The “ Weiner Konzerthaus ” was transformed into a sacred space where listening to Bruckner became tantamount to attending church. »

(Bryan Gilliam ; page 596.)

Bruckner may not have been the only composer featured, but it was always a Bruckner Symphony that formed the main focus of these events.

It can be seen from the above accounts that Goebbels Regensburg address focused on 4 important points :

Providing a link between Germany and Austria which would help in securing the subsequent annexation or « Anschluß » .

Promoting the blood and soil ethic exemplified by the « Völkische » ideal.

Gaining support for the recent ban on art criticism.

Promoting « Gottlaubigkeit » as the new religion.

I have tried to show above how Bruckner's Symphonies have played a key-role in supporting each of these goals. The Regensburg address drew attention to Bruckner's life and works by unveiling a commemorative marble bust of the composer. The commemorative function of this event though, may be considered as of secondary importance. The main goal can be seen as promoting Nazi ideology through the appropriation and aryanisation of a cultural icon.

Post-War Reception

After the War, Bruckner's symphonies could not easily be freed from the Nazi appropriation. This was mainly because their performance was still tied to the scores published under the Nazi government. This is an area of Bruckner scholarship which remains contentious, up to the present day. Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt (in 1996) says that :

« Establishing “ authentic ” editions of the composers works is still largely governed by arguments and interpretations that originated in connection with the 1st critical edition of Bruckner's works. »

These editions, edited by Robert Haas, were published between 1930 and 1944. Korstvedt shows that these « gesamtausgabe » editions overcame initial criticism to become « established as the authoritative source of Bruckner's works » (Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt ; page 143) . The « gesamtausgabe » project also received support and funding from the Nazi government. This may be seen as good reason to reject them outright. It may be hard to imagine why the Nazi Party would fund such a venture, if it was not in their interest to do so. The Robert Haas editions though, did seek to present a credible version of Bruckner's works. In Haas' view, the earlier publications had been corrupted. The new critical edition aimed to rectify this situation by referring only to the original autograph manuscripts. Korstvedt addresses some of the problems faced by this view and the rejection of the 1st editions :

« Bruckner never attempted to suppress the editions published in his lifetime nor did he ever publicly renounce or even criticize their authenticity ; moreover, substantial textual evidence exists that testifies to the authority of these editions. »

These issues are obviously extremely important and may be felt to have a profound effect on the reception of Bruckner's Symphonies today. The various editions may highlight or hide certain aspects of the score, and it may be difficult to verify the validity of these changes. Korstvedt notes that :

« Haas's scores are considerably sparser in their notation of nuances of tempo and dynamics than are the texts Bruckner published. »

Haas also supplemented his editions with material he had composed himself. Although only small sections were added, some may question Haas' approach in this matter. The « gesamtausgabe » editions have also been criticized because of the ideological motivations behind them. It may be considered more than a coincidence that the 1st edition, which was rejected as corrupt, employed editors of a Jewish origin. It is also stated by Korstvedt that « part of the covert mission of the “ gesamtausgabe ” seems to have been to remove Bruckner's scores from the purview of the Viennese publishing-house, Universal-Edition. »

This may have been a reaction against Universal-Edition's identification with « such deleterious forces as modernism, atonality, Bolshevism, and Judaism » . (Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt ; page 145.)

A later edition of Bruckner's Symphonies was published by Leopold Nowak.

According to Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt :

« He revised all of Haas's editions and rectified Haas's most questionable leaps of faith, notably those found in Haas's editions of the 2nd and 8th Symphonies. »

Even so, Leopold Nowak still used the original autograph manuscripts as his source. It seems that the rejection of the 1st editions is still a prominent factor today. This may be unjustifiable if we consider Bruckner's willingness to have them published at the time. It may be seen from these accounts that the problems surrounding Bruckner scholarship are not easily overcome. The reception of Bruckner's Symphonies has inherited a dark cloud of ideology which is not easy to ignore. It may also be considered unwise to ignore such a problem. Bryan Gilliam (in 1994) suggests that, maybe :

« Important post-War Bruckner interpretations (exemplified by slower tempi and luscious sonorities) have unwittingly carried over this phenomenon of Bruckner as Nazi religious icon to the contemporary Symphony-hall or recording studio ? »

In an attempt to separate ideology and methodology, Julian Horton (in 2004) , investigates 2 musical analyses. The 1st, by Hans Grunsky, is of the 9th Symphonies 1st movement. This analysis « clearly pre-empt's Nazi cultural politics » and also defends Bruckner against his critics. The 2nd is Robert Haas' analysis of the 8th Symphony's Finale. This is also shown to be imbued with political ideology.

« In Haas's philological, hermeneutic and analytical inclinations the imprints of Nazi cultural politics are plain : an emphasis on the spiritual over the intellectual, and a concomitant notion of textual " purity " ; a sense that this project was embattled by the forces of Jewish Liberalism ; a nationalist context seeing in Bruckner's music the embodiment of an unadorned " German essence ". »

Julian Horton concludes that it is possible to separate the ideology from the methodology. Grunsky's account is seen to rely heavily on metaphors. These are used to establish links between the politics and the music. Once these links are removed, it is posited that the details pertinent to the composition may still be judged on their own merits. A similar situation is found in Haas' analysis, where « a fundamental shift of politics and philological strategy has little more than a peripheral impact on the structure and analytical interpretation of the music » (Julian Horton ; page 87) .

Analysis may be considered one of the most important areas regarding the reception of Bruckner's Symphonies. This is especially so, if the autograph manuscripts are the chosen source. The lack of essential markings in these scores may leave room for various interpretations of the music. All that may be left to decide is how an analysis of these scores should proceed. The performance of any given Symphony may bring-out certain features of the piece. It could emphasize Bruckner as the church organist or mystical genius. It may focus on the harmonic implications of the music and the influence of Richard Wagner's music-dramas. Another choice may be to opt for the 1st edition where more detail is provided in the score. Leon Botstein (in 1996) favours the 1st « Schalk » edition of the 5th Symphony saying that :

« I believe the 1986 edition to be valid biographically (in terms of Bruckner's relationship to it ; it may bear his explicit approval) , historically (this was the version that helped establish Bruckner's fame and reputation and was in use for nearly half a Century) and musically (I have performed it several times and plan to record it next season because of its persuasive structural balance and economy and its effective orchestration) . »

It may be the case that any performance of a Bruckner Symphony contains a certain amount of subjectivity. Botstein compares this scenario with that of Gustav Mahler's Symphonies, and suggests that modern performance practice does not entirely reflect the composer's intention.

« One suspects that the surface of sensuality, scale, sentiment, and mere pathos in Mahler has been highlighted by smug devotees who in their nearly hysterical attachment to a particular image of the music and the man satisfy a need to demonstrate to others their own presumably profound artistic sensibilities. »

It may be inferred from this statement that the « artistic sensibilities » described differ somewhat from Botstein's own. This only underlines the subjectivity that is involved in any musical performance. The most brilliant and passionate of musical performances may well be the product of Botstein's « smug devotees » .

Conclusion

The Symphonies of Anton Bruckner have had a more colourful reception history than most. The Nazi appropriation can still be felt to affect certain aspects of Bruckner scholarship today. Among the most important of these is the choice of performing editions. The underlying problem being how to distinguish which editions are authentic, and which are a product of National-Socialist ideology. The use of Bruckner's Symphonies as cultural propaganda is not something that can be swept under the carpet. In searching for a truly authentic performance of a Bruckner Symphony, its reception history must be taken into account. This situation seems to be complicated further by the modern conception of the musical work, whereby, an authentic performance is tied to a definitive version of the score. The music on the page may be one half of the story, the Symphony only really coming to life once it is performed. If there is no general consensus as to which score should be used, then, there is no reason why this should stand in the way of a good performance. The autograph manuscripts contain enough detail to enable a performance. A certain freedom of interpretation should be encouraged. It may be that a new performance alters people's perception of that piece. There will always be good and bad performances and it is hopefully the good ones that will be remembered and influence further performances. In the same way that the history of Bruckner's Symphonies should not be forgotten, the present-day will obviously make its own impression. As much as some would like to realize an authentic 19th Century performance, this may be as impossible as Bruckner composing a 21st Century film-score. The thoughts and ideas that inspired Bruckner to compose these pieces may forever be a mystery. Even if we did know exactly what this motif, and that crescendo meant to Bruckner, a 21st Century musician would still only provide an interpretation of these thoughts. Regarding the Nazi appropriation, these are aspects of the music which are almost impossible to translate into a modern-day performance. In this day and age where sympathy for the Nazi Party is almost non-existent, it may be felt that the only possible translation of the music in this way would be as a bitter reminder of one of the greatest tragedies in human history.

« Dunkelkonzerte »

In the 1930's, in Germany and Austria, the popularity of the so-called « Dunkelkonzerte » reached its height. Concerts for which the hall was entirely darkened and the Orchestra invisibly sunk in its pit, so that the sense of sight should not operate to remind one (while Johannes Brahms, Richard Wagner or Anton Bruckner was being played) of one's difference from the others ; from the crowd that was, thus, an extension of oneself, breathless and unutterably moved, as if possessed by God.

...

The 1937 Regensburg ceremony placed Anton Bruckner as a God in the Holy Temple of « Walhalla » . His music would be the sacred language, and Nazism the mystical religion. His Symphonies, especially in those spiritual slow movements, were deemed a religious experience, and only those who shared the same blood and soil could fully-comprehend the message.

Nowhere is this phenomenon better exemplified than in the Viennese « Dunkelkonzerte » of the early 1940's, in which the darkened « Wiener Konzerthaus » was transformed into a sacred space where listening to Bruckner became tantamount to attending church. Concert of November 15th, 1940, celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra : before intermission (in a partially darkened hall) , the « Symphoniker » played Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Regina cœli » ; after intermission (in a fully-darkened hall) , Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony.

The War-time « Dunkelkonzerte » took place in the « Wiener Konzerthaus » . The tendency to view dimming of lights as a sacralization of space was a notion the « Dunkelkonzerte » fed-off, with Anton Bruckner Symphonies performed as if holding Holy-Mass.

The 1st « Dunkelkonzert » which took place on November 7th, 1939, offered the Prelude to the Opera « Parsifal » by Richard Wagner ; an organ work by Max Reger ; and the 7th Symphony by Anton Bruckner.

History of acousmatic sound includes a hidden-choir of nuns singing from behind a grill, concert-hall architecture designed to obscure the Orchestra culminating in Richard Wagner's Bayreuth Opera House, and the quasi-religious Nazi recuperation of Anton Bruckner via the pitch-black « Dunkelkonzerte » .

Between November 1939 and March 1944, the « Wiener Symphoniker » performed a series of darkened concerts, or « Dunkelkonzerte » . The musicologist Bryan Gilliam describes how « the darkened “ Wiener Konzerthaus ” was transformed into a sacred space » , in particular, a space in which to hear the transcendent spiritual meaning of Anton Bruckner's Symphonies. At the time, Bruckner had undergone a revival (and revision) under the Nazis, becoming a figure of reverence for the leadership. An « infamous » photograph from Regensburg 1937 captures Adolf Hitler, dressed in full-military garb, respectfully gazing-up at a bust of Bruckner atop a pedestal emblazoned with an iron eagle and swastika. According to Gilliam, in order to « annex » Bruckner, Josef Goebbels and others involved in Nazi cultural propaganda downplayed Bruckner's Catholicism in favour of themes more agreeable to the Party. In Goebbels's Regensburg address, he emphasized Bruckner's rustic peasant roots and his victimization at the hands of music-critics (like the Jewish critic Eduard Hanslick) . In a true act of revisionism, Goebbels described Bruckner's conversion to a new Symphonic style after encountering Richard Wagner, claiming that :

« From that moment onwards, the church musician at once retreats almost entirely, and out of him emerges the distinctive Symphonist »

Bruckner the Aryan, the composer of « Blut und Baden » , is substituted for Bruckner the devout Catholic since, « in order to comprehend him, one must look to the roots of his existence, the elemental forces of blood and race that propelled his humanity » . The comprehension of Bruckner's music, Gœbbels argued, could only occur when situated in the correct (i.e. , Nazi) context, for his style is subject to a « complete misunderstanding » when lumped « under the rubric of religious art » or characterized as Masses without texts. After his conversion to Wagner, Bruckner's religious faith had broken free of all Catholic confines and become purely German :

« It has its roots in the same heroic feeling for the world from which all truly Great and eternal creations of German art blossom. »

All the better that Bruckner, like Hitler, was a « son of Austrian soil » but was called to the « intractable intellectual and spiritual common fate that envelops our entire German people » .

The Viennese « Dunkelkonzerte » always featured a Symphony by Bruckner, along with other works with strongly spiritual themes. Gilliam reproduces a concert program from November 15th, 1940 (celebrating the 40th anniversary of the « Wiener Symphoniker ») , that opened with Mozart's « Regina cœli » , performed in a « half-darkened hall » (« Im halbberdunkelten Saal ») and, after the intermission, closed with Bruckner's 9th Symphony in a « completely darkened hall » (« Im gänzlich berdunkelten Saal ») . The effect, according to reviewers, was « excellent » , the « Dunkelkonzerte » being especially effective for works with a « mysterious Romantic character » . But it was not quite Romanticism the organizers of the concerts were after. Rather, the conservatism of the concert-hall reformers, from the turn of the 19th Century (like Paul Marsop) , who sought to æsthetically shape the listening public into a new social body, was outdone by the organizers of the « Dunkelkonzerte » and their « national æstheticism » - to borrow a phrase from Lacoue-Labarthe. A new social body was to be formed through the communing of listeners in the darkened auditorium, hearing in Bruckner's Symphonies the spiritual mission to which they were called. The « Dunkelkonzerte » employed all the conditions of acousmatic phantasmagoria in its production of transcendence. The eye and ear were separated by the obscure darkness ; the music was separated not only from the source of the Orchestra but from the context of Bruckner's religious faith ; the sound of the Orchestra became a vehicle for sounding-out the Holy Art of the German people, a transcendental sonic message of spiritual destiny and fate. But what about the receivers of this message ? Even if, according to the review, the effect was excellent, who knew exactly what message was being received ?

In Gilliam's words :

« Whether or not contemporary German audiences believed the Nazi propaganda, whether or not they sensed their common soil upon hearing a rustic Scherzo, communed with God during an Adagio, or even perceived Teutonic heroism in a fugal Finale is a large, complex issue yet to be sorted-out. »

Complex indeed, but not without its conditions and history.

The appropriation of Anton Bruckner's music was significant on an æsthetic level ; that is, it was an enterprise carefully calculated to engage in the awe-inspiring theatrical spectacle of monumental architecture, extravagant ornament and meticulously planned ritual. This is clear from the session's organization : always beginning at precisely 8 PM , on the evening of the 1st day of the rally, it was held in the town's newly-refurbished Opera House, clad externally in the symbols of the Party. Inside, the familiar red of the Party (the colour that communicated « the social idea of the movement » for Adolf Hitler) was set-off against the stage-curtain, which displayed in its midst the symbol of the rally against a sky-blue background (a colour with « wonderful esthetic effect ») . Garlands, flowers, and laurel leaves strewn about the stage and seating areas added a particularly extravagant touch, and the splendour of the back-drop was set-off against the uniforms of the audience : the dominating brown of the political leaders and the SA, the black and silver of the SS, and the field-grey of the armed forces, next to which shone the « medieval splendour » of the velvet robes of the Rectors and Deans from the highest German schools, lending « a special character to the radiant picture » .

After a preliminary speech by Nazi ideologue Alfred Rosenberg and the awarding of the Party « Prizes for Art and Science » (from 1937, the German National Prizes as an alternative to the Nobel Prizes) , Hitler would take the podium to deliver the crowning address of the event, his annual « Kulrurrede » . An oration of some length, its dominant themes were always similar : the forcing of « degenerate » modern art upon the « Volk » as a result of Jewish and Bolshevist-led decadence, the glory of German culture throughout history, and the National-Socialist remit as its bearers and protectors. Via the media of newspapers, souvenir handbooks and radio, dissemination of the « Kulrurredren » to the farthest corners of the « Reich » could be guaranteed ; Josef Gœbbels, indeed, had identified the latter medium as « the most modern and most important instrument for influencing the masses » and had complemented domestic receivers with speaker systems set-up at street-corners and in work-places. Total audience figures for 1937 show that over 9 million people could be reached by means of the radio ; we should, therefore, not be surprised to find one commentator projecting that Hitler's « lucid words » that year would be « enthusiastically attended by millions » .

In his final « Kulrurrede » of 1938, prefaced by a performance of Anton Bruckner's 7th Symphony given by Hans Weisbach and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Hitler would outline some telling æsthetics that give us a further sense of the significance of Bruckner's Symphonies in this venue. Music, while undoubtedly « the greatest creator of feelings and moods » , is to be hierarchized beneath speech on the grounds that music appears « least suitable to satisfy the intellect » . It is speech alone that can truly claim to stimulate the intellect, and this accounts for the effect of the works of « the great Master of Bayreuth » : in fusing music and speech together in the form of the music-drama, Wagner, for Hitler, had won for art its greatest triumph, grasping the spectator's mental faculties while deepening their emotional response through the musical medium. Conversely, « the great “ Symphoniker ” » (an ambiguous term that could refer to conductors, Symphonists or even the players in the Orchestra but, following shortly after a performance of the 7th, the specific connection to Bruckner must surely be made) « strive to give an account of more general moods » , an objective for which « they are also in need of an introduction for the listeners, however, by means of certain general clues laid-down in language » . I am led to conclude, then, that Bruckner's Symphonic music was selected here in part because its trajectory could provide an intensifying emotional medium for the message of Hitler's « Kulturredens » ; that is, it acted as a substrate over which this so-called « material for the intellect » could be laid.

Indeed, if we chart the course of the 1937 culture session performance (the Finale of the 5th Symphony played by the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra under Siegmund von Hausegger) , we gain a strong sense of the motives underlying its selection. Following initial reminiscences of themes from the preceding movements (not the least of which is the 1st movement's solemn pizzicato processional) exposed melodic fragments in the clarinets readily coagulate into nothing less Germanic than a « fortissimo » fugal exposition for the strings. A lyrical 2nd theme, purveyor of Bruckner's dogged adherence to the Sonata principle in the midst of the fugue, is eventually succeeded by a forceful chorale, 1st intoned by the 11 strong brass section and, ultimately, the subject of its own fugal exposition ; at this juncture, Bruckner skilfully binds the chorale and fugue themes into an extended contrapuntal development. However, even this display of compositional finesse pales before the concluding « Steigerung » , in which the motto theme of the Symphony is brought into grand coalition with the Finale's principal themes ; the sonorous mass of over 70 instruments playing « sempre fff » , thus, bring the movement to a close with a sheer expanse of sound in the tonic of B-flat major. The Finale's narrative implications (a trajectory of glorious victory through bitter struggle, of the reunion of fragments into a consummate whole) cannot be dismissed, and nor can they be distanced from the analogous message of Hitler's thoughts on German culture.

At the grand « tutti » of the movement, von Hausegger, thus, manipulated his multitude in a tremendous unity of sound and image, just as only minutes before, Hitler (a personality no less flamboyant in dramatic and rhetorical gesture than the average conductor and Symphony) had addressed his faithful masses. An atmosphere surcharged with emotion had been built-up, and just as Hitler's final words (« beschirmten Gemeinschaft als Träger und Wächter einer höheren Kultur » , surely calculated for their abrasive rhythm and syllabic effect) had initiated an electrical discharge of devotional oaths to leader and nation, so the striking of the final orchestral hammer blow provoked a mass catharsis throughout the Opera House.

This catharsis, however, was not effected through applause, shouts of « encore » , or other customary means. Rather, much as the performance of « Die Meistersinger » , at the re-opening of the Bayreuth Festival, in 1924, had sparked « a hearty rendition of the German national anthem » , the discharge of emotion was voiced in an apparently spontaneous communal chorus ; as one report of the evening relates :

« The exceptional tenor of triumph of Bruckner's Finale turned into the song of the national hymn. »

Bruckner's concluding Chorale statement had been stripped of its religious vestige and clothed instead in the pervasive dogma of nationalism ; the Finale, here, became « gleichgeschaltet » as a mouth-piece of Nazi ideology, engaging with the elaborate theatre of Hitler's « Kulturtagung » in order to play a crucial role in the fascination of the masses, the inculcation of ritual and the propitious communication of political message. At Nuremberg, « absolute » music was pressed into the service of « absolute » power.

It seems unlikely that Bruckner and his Symphonies will ever escape their pernicious association with extreme political movements. This connection, initiated during Bruckner's lifetime as a result of his presence in Wagnerian circles, was capitalized upon immediately after his death : in 1897, Bruckner's « official » biographer, the virulently anti-Semitic and German Nationalist August Göllerich, successfully petitioned the Parish Council of Linz (« Gemeinderat ») to subsidize a series of concerts in memory of the composer. These concerts, scheduled biennially over the course of the following 25 years, aimed to present all of Bruckner's significant works as well.

As Göllerich was a central figure in the musical life of Linz, at the time (inhabiting posts such as director of the City's « Musikverein » and of several of its « Sängerbünde »), it seems plausible that Hitler, who spent much of his childhood in the city, attended some of these Bruckner performances.

1 June 1906 : Article in the London « Musical Times » ...

(LINZ) Some years ago, the Town Council of this little city on the beautiful blue Danube, at the suggestion of « Herr » August Göllerich, voted a sum of money ; the interest from which, for 25 years, was to be devoted to a bi-annual Anton Bruckner Festival Concert, at popular prices. Up to the present, the 1st 6 Symphonies of the composer have been given at these concerts. Bruckner was organist at Linz Cathedral, from 1855 to 1867, when he succeeded Simon Sechter, organist of the « Hofkapelle », becoming at the same time a professor at the Vienna « Conservatorium ». Bruckner was born, on September 4th, 1824, in Ansfelden, in the Archduchy of Upper-Austria, of which Linz is the capital. There is, consequently, some method in the Linz Town Council's madness : a laudable desire to do honour to the memory of an artist who, after suffering cruel neglect in his lifetime, is now becoming more and more appreciated in Austria and Germany, and even spoken of as the greatest Symphonist since Beethoven. The 5th of the concerts was given on April 7th, 1906, by the Linz « Musikverein » Orchestra, the program consisting of the 7th Symphony, the « Te Deum », and a setting, for 5 part chorus and 3 trombones, of « Psalm 114 ». The last-named was performed for the 1st time, though its composition dates from the period in the 1850's when Bruckner was still organist at the « Stift » (Abbey) of Saint-Florian where, as a boy, he was a chorister. The performances of the 3 works were exceedingly fine, that of the gigantic Symphony especially creating the greatest enthusiasm. The concert attracted many visitors from Vienna and other Austrian towns, and its striking success reflects the greatest credit on the Linz « Musikverein » no less than on the little cathedral town itself, with its 60,000 inhabitants.

It is all too easy to see how the supposed sacral character of Anton Bruckner's music could lend itself to employment at the secular rituals through which the Party sought to invest itself with the status of tradition :

After the 1937 Regensburg Festival, Max Auer commented, concerning a concert given in a deconsecrated Minorite church that :

« Everyone who experienced it, came to the conclusion that only a mystic ecclesiastical venue is adequate for Symphonies 5 and 9. The Concert-Hall of the future Bruckner House must employ sacral architecture. »

(« Bruckner-Blätter » , 1937.)

The choice of words is unfortunate. Performances of Bruckner's Symphonies in ecclesiastical venues can indeed be effective if the acoustics are not too reverberant (in which case, they sound dreadful, no matter how slowly the music is taken) but to state that the 5th and the 9th can only make their effect in « mystic ecclesiastical venues » is an example of the tendency to except Bruckner from ordinary considerations (those regarding textual fidelity, for instance)

In an article in the Festival Programme for the Regensburg « Brucknerfest » , Hans Weisbach identified a flexible interpretative approach with the pattern of unauthorized intervention then being detected in the 1st published editions, and argued for a broad « sacral » approach that he equated with fidelity to both the text and the composer's intentions :

« In the soul of this man, who did not take the experiences of earthly life as the inspiration for his art but sent his creative spirit to endless distances, for whom the divine miracles of the universe were transformed into sounds and into which he poured the hot blood of a human heart - in the soul of this man, music has to transform into a solemnly flowing deep river of noble " grandeur ". He who has not yet understood that this music has no tendency towards dramatic affect or effect can learn it from every page of the original versions ; he will also learn (to his surprise) how little variation of the basic tempo Bruckner wishes. His tempo indications do not mean to tie the interpreter down, as one so often felt, and only reluctantly followed, in those 1st editions, but to set the interpreter free, because they are in complete harmony with the nature of the music. Intimately related to the tempo (again, clearly evident from the original versions) is the treatment of phrasing indications in the strings. Especially during cantabile moments of the greatest expression, we encounter Bruckner's characteristic of omitting slurs and, instead, specifying individual bowings for each single note. By adding the comment " lang gezogen " (drawn-out) , he gives the conductor, as well as the players, the opportunity to realize the solemn tempo with the greatest ... »

Conductor Hans Weisbach explicitly allied the publication of the Symphonies in their « ursprüngliche Gestalt » with Bruckner's « prophetically foreseen " later times " . »à

The Problem of Time

Concepts of « musical space » could be applied no better than to Anton Bruckner. As Bruckner scholar Mathias Hansen has pointed-out :

« No other musician, not even Richard Wagner or Richard Strauß, indeed, no other great artist of the past was occupied so unconditionally and completely by Fascist ideology as Bruckner. What is more, Bruckner's music was habitually attributed to the mentality of earlier-periods. Thus, in 1934, the Bruckner specialist Robert Haas declared him effectively the heir of an earlier musical sense :

“ The medieval feeling for spaciousness (' Weimtumigkeit ') , which was retained throughout the Baroque way of life and the Enlightenment could fully-vibrate in ecstatic hymns praising the glory of God and the world. ” »

Others, similarly, considered him the product of a « subterranean transmission of the South-German Austrian Baroque » , a « continuer, indeed, the consummator of an age-old world of expression, that flourished in the 17th and 18th Centuries but was later swamped by other artistic currents, filled with powerful sensuality, love of brilliance, and a mighty richness of form drawn from “ pre-Classical ”, appealingly “ objective ” sense of form » . The attempt to classify Bruckner as a Romantic composer (that is to say : a figure of his age) was resoundingly rejected, as his gigantic forms were felt to bear no relation to the formal miniatures of his Romantic contemporaries.

A favourite for triumphal occasions in this respect was Bruckner's 5th symphony, whose fugal Finale (with the famous final chorale apotheosis) constituted a compendium of monumental effects. What is more, the practice of performing this Finale with an additional brass ensemble, positioned at the back of the concert-hall, to re-inforce the final chorale would seem to be the epitome of a palpable musical space. It is no surprise that in the process of replacing these versions with the « Originalfassungen » or « Urfassungen » , during the 1930's, this performance tradition was only given-up with considerable reluctance. In Bruckner's Symphonies, after all, the « sounding cathedral » of absolute music and the « space of cultish celebrations » of earlier musical practices finally came together.

Thus, it was only a matter of time before Bruckner was going to be associated with the « Mütter » . Richard Strauß's successor at the « Reichsmusikkammer » , Peter Raabe, made this clear in his speech for the Regensburg Bruckner Festival of June 1937 :

« For those to whom the works reveal themselves, listening to Bruckner is not merely an artistic enjoyment : it is a descent to the mothers, to the sources of feeling, to which leads no thinking, no knowledge or searching, but only the will to be small before the infinitude of creation, and to be great in striving for the good. »

It is difficult in this context not to think of the popular « Dunkelkonzerte » , in which Bruckner's music was played in fully-darkened concert-halls, enveloping the audiences in a cathedral of sound, as a musical return into the womb. Raabe's reading of the key-scene describing « Faust » 's encounter with the « Mütter » , with his strange emphasis on humility and goodness, may be a little eccentric among interpretations of « Faust » , but it shows the basic principle of individual insignificance in the presence of such overwhelming sounding bodies all the more clearly.

He continued :

« What he saw in those blissful hours of creation could not be conveyed by words. For, it is precisely the tremendous part of absolute music, which places it above all the other arts (including dramatic music, including Song, Mass, Oratorio) that it is their task to pronounce that which can be said neither in words nor in gestures. And if we were to try to pin-down this mysterious power of Symphonic art, it could only be in the words of Gæthe's “ chorus mysticus ” from the end of “ Faust ” II : “ the indescribable, here, it is done. ” »

Bruckner's own lack of written commentary on his work was a rarity among composers in the later- 19th Century. Here, the absence of words is turned into the unsayability topos of absolute music. Like « Faust », who could age, and, indeed, only for a circle of friends and connoisseurs. For the « Urfassungen » movement, this admission was crucial : this later age, the « Golden Age » for Bruckner, had finally begun.

Some authors, like Otto Schumann, brought a racial explanation for « Urfassungen » into play :

The « Nordic » race (located in areas of Germany that conveniently coincided with the Protestant regions) , austere and beholden to the whole, would consider the work with the view to preserving its integrity as a whole. By contrast, the South-German and Austrian « Dinaric » race (who also were predominantly Catholic) was particularly in thrall to the splendor of the individual moment. The sensuous experience, from moment to moment, mattered most to them, just like Catholic Mass - there could not be enough of those magical moments, their basic penchant was instinctually for long versions. Not coincidentally, Schumann's explanation of the sense-driven « Dinaric » outlook matches closely Arnold Schering's concept of monumentality.

As philological exactitude was enlisted to bring about the authentic « Erlebnis » , other commentators were more emphatic in their demand for un-adulterated (and uncut) versions of Bruckner's works :

More drastic still than retouchings are cuts, for they tear-up the formal unity and often render the developmental processes incomprehensible. It is obvious how such interventions could disfigure the construction of whole movements, could render it unrecognizable. We have been deprived of the originals ; not only do we have the right, we have a veritable duty to demand them.

Indeed, the very lengths of Bruckner's music seemed to be a feature that was particularly associated with its essentially German nature. Ernst Bücken, for one, argued that the miniature « temporality of Romanticism » could not be applied to Bruckner. Instead, he saw a direct correlation between the magnitude Bruckner's monumental forms and the ascent of the German nation to greatness. And Karl Grunsky would go even further in a nationalistic diatribe :

« For foreign audiences, the length of Bruckner's Symphonies is hard to bear. »

Only to continue in an almost charming aside which should, strictly speaking, cause his entire racist framework to collapse :

« One can hardly claim, however, that every German could follow them without problems. »

This was precisely the crux with Bruckner. For all the emphatic nationalist rhetoric with which Bruckner and his spacious and expansive forms are appraised, and for all its propensity for « musical space » , the music really did not enjoy as much popular support as his proponents would have wished. In this, the lengths (and, especially, the greater lengths of the restored « Urfassungen ») proved the biggest stumbling block. Critics could well argue that the magnitude of Bruckner's Symphonies corresponded to the ascent of the German nation, but this did not mean much if the people who were to identify with them were bored or put-off by the sheer lengths of the Symphonies. What had to happen was to find a way to make the nation experience the greatness of Bruckner. In this, philology could only go so far.

Bruckner's Popularity

It is here, at last, that the wordlessness of the « Mütter » has doubled-up on the National-Socialist appropriation of Bruckner and led into an impasse. On the one hand, the ideology of origins valued primordial truths - or, to use the pseudo-scientific parlance of the time, it recognized Bruckner's « chthonic-telluric » elements (which can best be translated as « earthy-earthly ») . On this basis, the « Urfassungen » were considered to provide a more authentic, and, therefore, more immediate access to his musical creation. This, in turn, added to the valorization of the lengths of the Symphonies, which were already considerable. More broadly, the imperative to honour his artistic integrity meant that only the totality of his Symphonic creations (without cuts or alterations) could provide access to the spiritual depths his music conveyed wordlessly. In other words, the very dimensions of Bruckner's Symphonies became an expression of their quintessential Germanness. On the other hand, however, the very same ideology of the « Mütter » also built on the immediacy of a « lived experience » that preceded (or defied) rational reflection and verbal description. The more « völkisch » interpretation of this ideology, therefore, demanded a uniform and un-mediated, felt understanding of Bruckner's music, irrespective of prior education. And that was evidently not forthcoming.

When put in these more general terms, in fact, the problem of Bruckner falls squarely into wider debates about popularity and high-culture that occupied National-Socialist policy-makers at all levels. More than for other political movements, the task of bringing the values of high-art in line with the appeal of popular art was imperative to the cultural politics of the National-Socialist regime.

Bruckner and the National-Socialists in Germany : Ephemera from a Dark Time

(John F. Berky.)

The life and music of composer Anton Bruckner would be interesting if it simply encompassed the years of his life, but unlike most composers, Bruckner's music and even his life took on an added dimension of interpretation during the reign of the National-Socialist Party, in Germany, from 1933 to 1945. The appropriation of Bruckner's music by the Nazi Party is a fascinating study and one that has been well-covered in several scholarly essays. The purpose of this essay is not so much to discuss that complex time, but to look at that era through the examination of several artifacts from that time. In most cases, the objects are small and ephemeral in nature but it is often these overlooked and easily discarded objects that can tell an interesting sidelight and lead us to a better realization of the tenor of the times.

Program Booklets :

One of the most ephemeral, but often most informative musical objects of this time are concert program booklets. Often simply discarded after the concert, an occasional notice or program book can give a glimpse into the musical activity of the time. My interest has always centered around the year 1937, because in that year, the appropriation of Bruckner's music became official with the establishment of the « Day of German Art » celebrations and the placing of Bruckner's bust in the Temple of « Walhalla », the shrine overlooking the Danube in Regensburg, near Munich (Germany) . It was at this ceremony, on June 6th, 1937, that Hermann Goebbels, the Propaganda Minister of the National-Socialist Party, in the presence of Adolf Hitler, presented his skillfully crafted speech which linked Bruckner to the German people and to the mission of the National-Socialists. Below is a program announcement for the Donau Week which took place in Saint-Florian, Linz and Steyr in July of 1937.

A Bruckner 6th by Hans Weissbach and a Symphony No. 3 conducted by Oswald Kabasta would certainly be interesting to hear but, unfortunately, no recordings survive. It is also interesting to see that Eugene Ormandy, who recorded the Bruckner 7th, in 1936, and received a Bruckner Society of America medal of honour, is in Austria several months prior to the « Anschluß » conducting the Symphony No. 5.

Program notes more closely associated with the ceremony at « Walhalla », in Regensburg, exist as shown in the example below :

There are also pictures associated with the installation of Bruckner's bust at « Walhalla » :

There is a more tangible souvenir associated with the Regensburg event. For the occasion, sculptor Karl Goetz (1875-1950) was commissioned to strike the following commemorative coin :

A few weeks after the Regensburg event, the Nazis celebrated the opening of a museum in Munich devoted to the glorification of « German Art ». At the same time, an exhibit was opened to show what the National-Socialists' arbiters of taste considered to be « degenerate art ». The opening event was a national celebration entitled, « Der Tag der Deutsche Kunst » (The Day of German Art) . Programs books and posters were produced as well as postcards of the logos for the 1937 and 1938 events. In 1938, a postage stamp was issued.

For this special day, there was also a radio component with approved German music being presented over the stations of the « Reichs Radio Gesellschaft » (RRG) . In between the radio reports, a special music « stinger » was commissioned which incorporated the opening theme motto of Bruckner's Symphony No. 3. The recording, pressed by « Polydor » still survives. The National-Socialists were actively recording Bruckner's music for broadcast. Transcription discs (like the one shown below featuring Fritz Lehmann) were distributed via transcription discs to the regional radio stations.

With commercial releases, the National-Socialists made it a point to promote acceptable artists while removing recordings by « unacceptable » performers. The most notable example was the deletion of the Jascha Horenstein / Berlin Philharmonic recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 with the same Symphony and Orchestra conducted by Carl Schuricht.

Perhaps, the most unusual bit of ephemera that has come our way is the set of 2 « 78 rpm » discs of a partial performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 with the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by Wilhelm Furtwängler. The recording was made on April 1st, 1942, and only the Adagio exists. What makes this particular set of records so special is that they come from one of the « Führer » bunkers occupied by Adolf Hitler. Based on information gleaned from German periodicals (most notably, « Der Spiegel »), the discs probably come from the bunker under the « Reich » Chancellery, in Berlin. The discs can be identified by the inventory labels attached to them.

« Neuaufbau » des Linzer Musiklebens

Während das Musikleben der Stadt Linz schon vor dem « Anschluß » aufgrund der raschen Expansion der Stadt kaum mit dem wachsenden Bedarf nach musikalischen Veranstaltungen mithalten hatte können, so gab es zwei Gründe, warum es nach dem « Anschluß » bis etwa 1940 dauerte, bis die Nationalsozialisten dieses « neu aufgebaut » hatten. Zum einen war man bestrebt, die am 11. Juni 1938 ergangene Verordnung über die Einführung der Reichskulturkammergesetzgebung im Lande Österreich umzusetzen und die musikpolitische « Gleichschaltung » durchzuführen, zum anderen waren die politischen Größen des Gaus und der Stadt anfangs mit « anderen » Vorhaben beschäftigt. Zudem hatten die zunächst eingesetzten Verantwortlichen wenig bis keine Affinitäten zur Musik, geschweige denn Kenntnisse über ein funktionierendes Musikmanagement. Ämterkumulierung, Missgunst, Neid und Vernachlässigung waren an der Tagesordnung, etwa auch zwischen den sich befehdenden Musikfunktionären Oberösterreichs Franz Kinzl und Othmar Heide sowie Josef Straub - und dies, obwohl die Reichsmusikkammer bereits im Dezember 1934 Richtlinien für die Bestellung eines Musikbeauftragten festgelegt hatte : Dieser müsse nicht « musikalisch ausübend » sein, allerdings solle er « musikverständlich und musikliebend » sein. Die Bestellung erfolge « von der Stadtverwaltung im Einvernehmen mit der örtlichen Parteistelle und der Ortsmusikerschaft » und müsse von der Reichsmusikkammer bestätigt werden.

Weisungen der Berliner Reichsmusikkammer (RMK) wurden vor allem zur Amtszeit Othmar Heides allerdings mehr oder weniger ignoriert. Man hielt sie für eine politisch unzuverlässige Einrichtung, « weil Richard Strauß [Strauß war Präsident der RMK], den [Othmar] Heide für einen “ Judenknecht ” hielt, sein Amt niedergelegt hatte und Herr Raabe den Parteigrößen [in Oberdonau] überhaupt nicht imponierte » .

Richard Strauß und die RMK

Richard Strauß war von 1933 bis 1935 Präsident der Reichsmusikkammer. Er wurde für seine « Musikpolitik » immer mehr angefeindet. 1935 legte er das Amt zurück, nachdem von der Gesta Die schweigsame Frau, abgefangen worden war. Strauß hatte und andere darauf beharrt, daß Zweigs Name genannt werden mußte. (Genauerer dazu Oliver Rathkolb : « Führertreu und gottbegnadet ») .

Lediglich in der Durchsetzung persönlicher Anliegen der Beteiligten wurde auch die Reichsmusikkammer angerufen, oder man berief sich auf die Umsetzung ihrer Richtlinien. Neben den internen Querelen gab es auch diverse Bestrebungen, die Fäden in der Linzer Musikpolitik von oberster Stelle zu ziehen : Adolf Hitler plante neben dem wirtschaftlichen Ausbau von Linz auch, die Stadt Wien gegenüber kulturell aufzuwerten.

« Gleichschaltung »

Die verordnete musikpolitische « Gleichschaltung » forderte nicht nur die Auflösung einzelner Vereine, wie etwa der Magistratskapelle Linz, die erst wieder im Juni 1945 unter Kapellmeister Josef Froschauer revitalisiert wurde, sondern auch die aktive Umsetzung der NS-Richtlinien, welche aufgrund der skizzierten Umstände häufig nicht nachhaltig waren.

Im Bereich der « klassischen » Musik setzte man nach dem « Anschluß » zunächst darauf, diese zu popularisieren :

« Musik verlangt begeisterungsfähige Menschen als Hörer, am wenigsten Sätze und Gleichgültige. Sinfonische Werke setzen eine gewisse heroische Seelenstimmung beim Empfänger voraus. Nun hat aber die verfllossene Kampfzeit gezeigt, daß seelischer Heroismus und Begeisterungsfähigkeit in der bisherigen Oberschicht unseres Volkes nicht allzu häufig zu finden sind. Die mittleren und unteren sozialen Schichten müßen also gewonnen werden. Dies geschieht durch zwei Mittel : Erziehung und Propaganda. »

(Linzer Tages-Post, 26. Juli 1938.)

In der praktischen Umsetzung der Hinführung der « Massen » zur Hochkultur setzte man - wie in der Linzer Tages-Post vermerkt, auf eine « Senkung der Eintrittspreise » und « eine gewisse Lockerung des Toilettezwanges bei Konzerten » . Darüber hinaus sollten das Volksbildungswerk der Organisation « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF) und die « neuzuschaffenden “ Musikschulen für Jugend und Volk ” » Erziehungsarbeit leisten.

Bald wurde aber auch den Linzer NS-Propagandisten klar, daß Populärmusik und -unterhaltung größeren Propagandawert hatten ; vor allem nach Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs und mit Kriegsverlauf wurde die Operette « kriegswichtiger als die Oper ! » .

(Oberösterreichisches Landesarchiv, Karton Landestheater.)

Georg Ludwig Jochum und das « Reichsbrucknerorchester »

1940 kam « endlich » musikalische Kompetenz von außen nach Linz : der Dirigent Georg Ludwig Jochum. Dieser Bestellung stehen allerdings diverse Mythen um Hitlers Engagement für das Linzer Musik- und Kulturleben gegenüber. So soll sich Adolf Hitler beispielsweise selbst um den Sängernachwuchs für das Linzer Opernensemble gekümmert und den Münchner Generalmusikdirektor Clemens Krauß mit dessen Heranbildung beauftragt haben :

« Er [Hitler] sei diesen Weg gegangen, weil er es für besser halte, gute Stimmen durch eine vorsichtige, mehrjährige

Ausbildung zu Höchstleistungen zu befähigen, als sie zufälligen Entwicklungsmöglichkeiten zu überlassen. Es sei ihm um der Sache willen gleich, ob er auf diese Weise einer ganzen Reihe von Sängern Ausbildungszuschüsse für mehrere Jahre zukommen lassen müsse, wenn ihm nur gewährleistet werde, daß sie nur in den Rollen herausgestellt würden, denen sie gewachsen seien. »

(Henry Picker : Hitlers Tischgespräche im Früherhauptquartier 1941-1942 ; Seite 302.)

Der Dirigent Clemens Krauß soll von Hitler auch mit der Heranbildung eines « wirklich guten Dirigenten » für Linz betraut gewesen sein.

Die genannten Vorhaben Hitlers waren fiktiver Natur, und auch wenn die Bestellung Georg Ludwig Jochums, eines Bruders des Dirigenten Eugen Jochum, nicht erste Wahl war, so gab es in seiner Person eine anzuerkennende Autorität. Georg Ludwig Jochum hatte es dennoch nicht leicht, all den Kulturfunktionären des Gaus und der Stadt zu entsprechen : Er saß als Leiter des Städtischen Symphonieorchesters und des Opern- beziehungsweise Theaterorchesters gewissermaßen zwischen den Stühlen.

Später kam auch noch die Funktion als Leiter des « Reichsbrucknerorchesters » mit Sitz im Stift Sankt Florian hinzu.

Zur Entlastung Jochums im Landestheater trug vor allem Kapellmeister Willy Wickenhäuser bei, der auch die Hauptlast der Probenarbeit zu tragen hatte. Das « Duo » war darüber hinaus für Anrechtskonzerte, « Konzerte außer Anrecht », darunter Aufführungen für die Wehrmacht, Kammerkonzerte, Schallplattenaufnahmen in Sankt Florian und Konzerte für diverse Feierstunden, etwa für den « Heldengedenktag » am 9. November 1941, zuständig.

Stadt und Gau beziehungsweise deren Vertreter bis hin zum Oberbürgermeister und zum Gauleiter trugen Streitigkeiten um die Zuständigkeit der Orchester aus. Im Februar 1944 schließlich sah sich Gauleiter August Eigruber veranlasst, in einem Brief an den Oberbürgermeister von Linz, die Dinge klarzustellen :

« Das Bruckner-Orchester des Großdeutschen Rundfunks ist ein Reichsorchester, welches seinen Sitz in Sankt Florian beziehungsweise derzeit in Linz hat und keinesfalls als städtisches oder Gauorchester anzusprechen ist. »

Es werde « nur fallweise der Stadt Linz als Synphonieorchester [sic] zur Verfügung stehen ». Daher sei die Sicherung des « Bestand[es] des Sinfonieorchesters der Stadt Linz » erforderlich ; es sei « zu vergrößern und in der instrumentaln Leistung zu verbessern ». Das Städtische Orchester habe « den musikalischen Bedürfnissen der Stadt Linz voll und ganz Rechnung zu tragen », werde aber, obwohl es der Stadt unterstehe, auch « zu Gastspielreisen im Gau, insbesondere in den Sommermonaten an den Fremdenverkehrsorten, herangezogen » .

(Oberösterreichisches Landesarchiv, Karton Landestheater.)

Darüber hinaus werde es kein eigenes Theaterorchester (das Theater unterstand verwaltungstechnisch dem Gau) geben, und das Städtische Sinfonieorchester müsse sich gewissermaßen dem Spielplan des Intendanten unterordnen.

Musikerziehung

Der musikalischen « Nachwuchsförderung » sollte ein am 7. September 1941 durchgeführte Orgelwettbewerb dienen. Aber nicht nur, der Wettbewerb sollte nicht zuletzt die Orgel als Instrument « säkularisieren » , sie dem kirchlichen Bereich entziehen und für den Einsatz in der nationalsozialistischen « Feierstunde » adaptieren. Neben dem « Wert der Improvisation » wurde im Ausschreibungstext « Der Kampf als Auslese » hervorgehoben :

« Der Kampf ist höchste Produktivität. Er ist nicht bloß Erprobung bereits erkannter, er ist auch Weckung aller bisher unbeachtet schlummernden Kräfte. Darum ist der Wettstreit das einzige und tatsächlich erfolgreiche Mittel jeder Begabtenförderung. [Hervorhebungen im Original] Es ist bestimmt kein Zufall, wenn uns diese Erkenntnis gerade jetzt neu aufdämmert, während unser Volk im größten und siegreichsten Kampf seiner Geschichte steht und wenn die letzten Jahrzehnte, jene Zeit pazifistisch-demokratischer Lethargie auch auf dem Gebiet der Kunst durch eine gewisse Freiheit vor wirklichem Bekennen und vor kämpferischem Eintreten gekennzeichnet waren. »

(Archiv der Stadt Linz, Kulturarchiv.)

Am Wettbewerb nahmen insgesamt 54 Organisten, darunter 36 Musiker aus « Gruppe I (Unbekannte Begabungen) » teil. Zum öffentlichen Spiel wurden aus diesem Pool schließlich Josef und Hermann Kronsteiner sowie Martin Ritschel zugelassen. Aus der zweiten Gruppe, die sich aus Komponisten zusammensetzte, kamen Franz Kinzl, Rudolf Keldorfer und Friedrich Ziegler in die Endrunde, und aus der dritten Gruppe, jener der Konzertorganisten und Orgellehrer, Georg Pirkmayr, Ludwig Daxperger und Adolf Trittinger. Die Jury setzte sich aus Professor Johann Nepomuk David, Professor Joseph Meßner aus Salzburg und Hofrat Professor Max Springer aus Wien zusammen ;Vorsitzender des Gremiums war der Komponist Professor Josef Haas.

« Beim ausgezeichnet besuchten öffentlichen Wett-Turnier war die Stiftskirche [Sankt Florian] festlich geschmückt, ebenso die Tische der Preisrichter vor dem Hochaltar. Auf dem Chor waren die Vorgänge hinter großen Blumengirlanden gut getarnt, sodaß der Spieler auch bei Zu- und Abgang nicht gesehen werden konnte. In den Chorstühlen rechts und links vom Hochaltar hatte der Gauleiter und Reichsstatthalter August Eigruber mit den Spitzen von Partei, Behörden und Wehrmacht, sowie einer großen Anzahl auswärtiger Ehrengäste und Vertretern des Musiklebens aus dem ganzen Reich Platz genommen. Auch Berichterstatter und Lichtbildner zahlreicher Blätter waren vertreten. »

(Archiv der Stadt Linz, Kulturarchiv)

Die Improvisationen der Wettbewerbsteilnehmer wurden sowohl vom Reichssender Wien auf Wachsplatten als auch von der Hauptstelle Rundfunk des Gaupropagandaamtes auf « Tonstreifen » aufgenommen. Es war geplant, die Platten « im Musikarchiv des Gaus für die Zukunft » aufzubewahren.

Nachdem das « Urteil der Kenner » und das « Urteil der Liebhaber » (auch Laien waren als Wertungsrichter zum Wettbewerb zugelassen) zusammengeführt worden waren, stand die Reihung fest. Problematisch für den Gau war die

Wertung insofern, als der 26-jährige Autodidakt und « Dorfforganist Hermann Kronsteiner (Windischgarsten) den Gausieger stellte », der ebenso wie sein Bruder Joseph (erhielt einen zweiten Preis) Priester war, was dem Ansinnen der « Entkonfessionalisierung » des Instruments zuwiderlief.

Es gibt Hinweise darauf, daß 1942 ein zweiter derartiger Wettbewerb abgehalten wurde oder abgehalten werden sollte. Georg Ludwig Jochum gab auf Anfrage von Anton Fellner, dem Kulturbeauftragten des Gauleiters und Reichsstatthalters, 1942 seinen Favoriten preis. Er hielt Ludwig Daxspurger von den ihm « bekannten Organisten des Gaus » für « den besten » - im Vergleich mit Adolf Trittinger, Wolfgang Auler und Hellmuth Müllner ; Letztere hatten am ersten Wettbewerb nicht teilgenommen. Weiters gibt es eine Skizze von Josef Kronsteiner, die mit « “ Unser ” Thema » titulierte und mit « Pfingstsonntag, 24. Mai 1942 » (Rudolf von Zinnhobler : Das Bistum Linz im Dritten Reich, XIII) datiert ist.

« Musikbolschewismus »

Einerseits galt es 1938 in Österreich den zwar nicht eindeutig definierten und klar handhabbaren Begriff « Musikbolschewismus » als Selektions- und Eliminierungsmechanismus einzuführen (hierfür erfolgten die « Vorarbeiten » bereits ab 1933 in NS-Deutschland) , andererseits war man bestrebt, den selbst initiierten Verlust auszugleichen, da viele Komponisten und ihre Werke nach diesem Prinzip nicht mehr zugelassen waren.

In Linz war 1938 die Ausschaltung ausübender jüdischer Künstlerinnen und Künstler aufgrund der vorhergegangenen antisemitischen Kulturpolitik nicht mehr vonnöten. Einzig der in den Jahren 1937 bis 1939 in Linz als Opernbariton und 1938 auch als Spielleiter der Oper engagierte Rolf Telasko durfte als jüdischer « Mischling » in der ersten Spielzeit noch in Linz verblieben sein. Er wurde auch 1939-1940 wieder engagiert, nützte aber die Theaterferien, um über Südfrankreich und Argentinien in die USA zu emigrieren. Eine weitere Ausnahme stellte der am 12. Februar 1892 in Linz geborene jüdische Pianist Alfred Spitz dar, der, unter dem persönlichen Schutz Gauleiter August Eigrubers stehend, bis März 1942 auftreten durfte. Eigruber soll ihm im « Anschluß » persönlich außer Landes verholfen haben. Die Komponistin und Dichterin Hedda Wagner, die als Sozialdemokratin bereits 1934 in die innere Emigration gegangen war, wurde im Juli 1938 vom deutschen Reichsverband der deutschen Presse abgelehnt und nützte « ihre unfreiwillige Muße » « zu eigenem Schaffen » .

1941 verfasste Franz Kinzl, der sich bereits im September 1938 als Musikbeauftragter der Stadt Linz durch einen antisemitischen Artikel mit dem Titel Jüdische Tarnung in der Musik hervorgetan hatte, in seiner Funktion als « Leiter des Musikreferates im Gaupropaganda-Amt » unter dem Titel Judentum und Musik eine Liste der jüdischen Komponisten als Unterlage für Säuberungsaktionen auf dem Gebiet der Musik, die er mit einem Vorwort beziehungsweise einer Anordnung versah, wie in Hinkunft mit Werken dieser Komponisten zu verfahren sei. Handlungsbedarf sah man, da die Musikkapelle von Sankt Wolfgang bei einem Ständchen für Reichspropagandaminister Josef Goebbels den Fackeltanz von Giacomo Meyerbeer gespielt hatte, der jüdischer Abstammung war. Als Vorlage für diese Broschüre diente das von Theo Stengel, einem Referenten der Reichsmusikkammer, und Herbert Gerigk, dem « Leiter der Hauptstelle Musik beim Beauftragten des Führers für die Überwachung der gesamten geistigen und weltanschaulichen Schulung und Erziehung der NSDAP » 1940 erstmals herausgegebene Lexikon der Juden in der Musik. Mit der Herausgabe des Heftes sollten alle

Vereinnahmung von Komponisten

Die Verherrlichung Bruckners war bereits im so genannten Altreich « vorgelebt » worden, so etwa mit der Aufstellung einer Bruckner-Büste im Marmortempel Walhalla bei Regensburg am 6. Juni 1937. Darüber hinaus versuchten die Musikverantwortlichen der NS sowie die « Musikbetrachter » (darunter Doktor Cornelius Preihs) in Ermangelung (im Sinne der nationalsozialistischen Gleichschaltung), Kunstbetrachtungs- und Musikpolitik akzeptabler - « guter » zeitgenössischer oberösterreichischer Kompositionen, krampfhaft einen Bezug zu all jenen Komponisten herzustellen, die Oberösterreich beziehungsweise Linz zumindest auf der Durchreise gestreift hatten. Die Liste reicht von Christoph Willibald Gluck über Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (vor allem die Linzer Symphonie KV 425, die Mozart 1783 auf der Durchreise von Salzburg nach Wien komponierte), Franz Schubert, Josef Lanner, Carl Michael Ziehrer bis hin zu Johannes Brahms und nicht zuletzt Richard Wagner und Hugo Wolf.

Ein Komponist, bei dem unklar war, ob man ihn als Oberösterreicher, « instrumentalisieren » sollte / durfte, war der 1857 in Waizenkirchen geborene Komponist, Opernkapellmeister, Librettist und Schriftsteller Wilhelm Kienzl. Kienzl stand (wahrscheinlich als Komponist der Melodie zur Bundeshymne der Ersten Republik und ob seiner Freundschaft zu Karl Renner) zunächst aus politischen Gründen bereits 1937-1938 auf der « schwarzen Liste » des Reichssenders Berlin. Fridolin Dallinger erwähnt in einer Kurzbiografie Kienzls, ohne näheres Datum, dessen Tagebucheintrag :

« Auffallende Vernachlässigung meiner Opern in der Ostmark (dem einstigen lieben Österreich) . »

In der zweiten Auflage des Lexikons der Juden in der Musik aus dem Jahr 1943 verwiesen die Autoren auf « unklare Fälle » :

« Unter den lebenden Vierteljuden, die versehentlich des öfteren auch bei Veranstaltungen von Parteigliederungen aufgeführt wurden, sind Boris Blacher und Heinrich Kaminski die wichtigsten. Wilhelm Kienzl, der vor einiger Zeit verstorbene Komponist der Oper “ Der Evangelimann ”, ist gleichfalls Vierteljude. »

(Joseph Wulf : Musik im Dritten Reich ; Seite 428.)

Wilhelm Kienzl, der im Oktober 1941 in Wien verstarb, versuchte man in Oberösterreich erst nach Kriegsende wieder zu Ehren zu verhelfen.

« Arische Moderne »

Besondere Schwierigkeiten gab es im Gegenzug, die « arische » Moderne in das öffentliche Musikleben zu integrieren.

Georg Ludwig Jochum erkannte wahrscheinlich die mangelnde (?) Qualität der einzelnen Werke und opponierte, wenn auch nicht offen, gegen die Aufführung zeitgenössischer Komponistinnen und Komponisten des Gaus. Als Gruppe traten diese Komponierenden « ernster Richtung des Gaus Oberdonau » erstmals im Oktober 1940 auf. Unter ihnen war der Arzt Franz Schnopfhagen (für kurze Zeit Landesleiter der Reichsmusikkammer in der Reichskulturkammer Oberdonau und Organist der Linzer Stadtpfarre) , Franz Neuhofer, Franz Kinzl, der Leiter des Domchores Ludwig Daxspurger, Robert Keldorfer und Franz Xaver Müller aus Linz, der Rieder Gymnasialprofessor Karl Rausch und der Krummauer Komponist Isidor Stögbauer. Als einzige Frau schloß sich die 1891 in Wien geborene, aber zur damaligen Zeit als « die Linzer Komponistin » geltende Frida Kern an.

Alle angeführten Komponistinnen und Komponisten unterzeichneten jenen, vermutlich von Franz Kinzl verfassten Brief, der im Oktober 1940 an den Linzer Oberbürgermeister mit einer Reihe von Vorschlägen ging. Ausschlaggebend war die Gründung des « Beirats für Musikpflege und Konzertwesen » , dem unter anderem Theodor Kerschner (der Vorstand des Gaumuseums) , der Großkaufmann Fritz Wied, Oberstudienrat Walter Gabl, der akademische Musiklehrer Robert Tremel, Franz Schnopfhagen als Leiter der Fachschaft für Komponisten in der Reichsmusikkammer, der Facharzt Karl Kleinschmid, Helmut Müllner in seiner Funktion als Kulturberichterstatter der NS-Tageszeitung Volksstimme sowie die Großindustriellengattin Dora Franck angehörten. Die Komponistinnen und Komponisten waren « der Ansicht, daß die politischen Ereignisse große Hemmungen für das gegenwärtige Schaffen mit sich bringen » und fürchteten um eine « Vertagung jeder Kunstförderung auf unbestimmte Zeit » , bei der besonders die Musik im Vergleich mit Architektur und Literatur ihrer Meinung nach ins Hintertreffen zu geraten schien. Unter der Verwendung von « Volk- und-Rasse » -Termini versuchten sie, die sich als Komponistinnen und Komponisten des Gaus verkannt und unterschätzt fühlten, zu begründen, wie und warum die neue Musik gefördert werden müße :

« Allerdings kann eine Erneuerung niemals von der übermäßigen Pflege des Alten, Ererbten, ihren Ausgang nehmen und ist es nur durch innigsten Kontakt der politischen Führer mit den lebenden Schaffenden selbst möglich, da nur Letztere imstande sind, die nötigen Anregungen für wirksame Maßnahmen zu geben. »

(Archiv der Stadt Linz, Kulturarchiv.)

Etwa einen Monat nach Beginn des Russlandfeldzuges, am 22. Juni 1941, wurde « auf Anordnung des Reichsministeriums für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » auch die Aufführung von Werken russischer Autoren und Komponisten « bis auf weiteres » verboten : Franz Kinzl sah darin erneut eine Chance, Georg Ludwig Jochum dazu zu bringen, oberösterreichische Komponisten aufzuführen :

« Da Sie in Ihren Anrechtskonzerten am 23. September 1941 und 10. Februar 1942 jedesmal Tschaikowsky zu bringen beabsichtigen, empfehle ich Ihnen, die durch die Anordnung des Ministeriums freigewordenen Plätze durch Kompositionen von Autoren aus Oberdonau auszufüllen. »

(Archiv der Stadt Linz, Kulturarchiv.)

Im darauf folgenden Jahr wandten sich die Komponistinnen und Komponisten an Anton Fellner, den Kulturbeauftragten des Gues, der erneut bei Georg Ludwig Jochum Fürsprache einlegte :

« Wir müßen es als Ehrenpflicht betrachten, auch die zeitgenössischen Komponisten unseres Gues in einem stärkeren Ausmaß als bisher aufzuführen. Da wir gerade in Oberdonau eine Reihe sehr beachtlicher Komponisten haben wird es sich hiebei vielleicht als praktisch beste Lösung erweisen, in womöglich jedem Anrechtskonzert ein solches Werk aufzuführen, wobei unabhängig, aber nicht am Ende sondern am besten in der Mitte der Saison ein Konzert gaeigener Komponisten gemacht werden könnte. Die heuer geplante Lösung hat sich als nicht sehr zweckdienlich herausgestellt, da auch nach Ansicht der Musikschaffenden das Publikum der Anrechtskonzerte zweifellos für solche Aufführungen oder Uraufführungen, die immer einen gewissen Anspruch stellen, besser geeignet ist als das weniger geschulte KdF-Publikum, so verdienstvoll auch das Eintreten der KdF für die gaeigenen Komponisten anzuerkennen ist. »

(Archiv der Stadt Linz, Kulturarchiv.)

Georg Ludwig Jochum sollte in die Anrechtskonzerte « je eine gaeigene, zeitgenössische Komposition » einbauen. Dies sei der beste Weg « sich mit den zeitgenössischen Musikschaffenden auseinanderzusetzen » .

(Archiv der Stadt Linz, Kulturarchiv.)

Anton Fellner war also sehr bewusst, daß das Konzept des auch von Gauleiter August Eigruber propagierten Konzepts « Kultur ins Volk » zu tragen, nicht aufgegangen war.

Die Quellenlage zur Musikgeschichte der NS-Zeit in Linz und Oberösterreich

Eine wichtige Quelle für die historische Forschung zur Linzer Musikgeschichte stellt der umfangreiche Aktenbestand « Kulturarchiv » im Linzer Stadtarchiv dar, wobei hier auch Akten aus der Zeit nach 1945 einen starken Bezug zur NS-Zeit aufweisen.

Darüber hinaus sind zahlreiche Streuakten zu verzeichnen, die in den nicht als musikbezogenen Sammlungen zu finden sind. Auch das Oberösterreichische Landesarchiv verwahrt dementsprechende Archivalien.

Fragwürdige Kontinuitäten und « späte Ehren »

Einerseits wurde die Entnazifizierung beziehungsweise die Erteilung der Auftrittsgenehmigungen für Musikerinnen und Musiker sowie Künstlerinnen und Künstler durch den « Information Services Branch » (ISB) der « Headquarters der United States Forces in Austria » in Linz ernsthaft durchgeführt, andererseits gab und gibt es hinsichtlich der direkten Kontinuitäten in Linz sehr prägende Gestalten, die als solche häufig nicht mehr im Bewusstsein der Öffentlichkeit stehen. Die NS-Protagonistinnen und NS-Protagonisten aus der Musikwelt wurden nicht nur rasch wieder integriert, erhielten Preise, Ehrentitel und Ehrenpensionen von Stadt und Land, sondern werden und wurden vielfach ohne Hinterfragung ihrer Biografien immer wieder positiv erinnert.

Darüber hinaus dürfte sich Linz nach 1945 relativ rasch den Ruf erworben haben, daß man hier als « Ehemaliger » unkompliziert wieder zu Ehren kommen konnte. Dies läßt sich nicht nur anhand der Musikdirektoren der Stadt Linz (von Friedrich Reidinger über Robert Schollum bis hin zu Kurt Wöb) festmachen, sondern beispielsweise auch am Oberspielleiter und Intendanten des Linzer Landestheaters Oskar Walleck (SS-Standartenführer, Träger des Totenkopfringes der SS und des Ehrendegens des RFSS [« Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS »]) und am Leiter des Brucknerkonservatoriums Wilhelm Jerger. Die Biografie des Landestheaterintendanten Ignaz Brantner wurde dagegen trotz eingehender Recherchen nicht vollkommen transparent.

Nachrufe auf Protagonisten der NS-Zeit

Kurzbiografien und Nachrufe auf Akteurinnen und Akteure der NS-Zeit erweisen sich als sehr problematisch, da diese häufig von ehemaligen Kollegen und Gesinnungsgenossen verfasst wurden.

Anton Bruckner pendant le 3e « Reich » et après

« I owe thanks to William Carragan and Bryan Gilliam for their helpful comments on this essay. » (Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt)

« I do not believe that we as yet know how to think what Nazism is. » (Jacques Derrida, « The Ear of the Other » .)

Idéologie et réception du compositeur

It is no secret that Anton Bruckner figured importantly in the cultural pantheon of National-Socialism. (1) Like many other German speaking artists of the past, Bruckner was exploited by the Nazi cultural program. Both the image of Bruckner and his music were imagined to exemplify the essence of Aryan art and were thus enlisted in the campaign to legitimate Nazism. The outlines of this dark chapter in the history of Bruckner reception are well documented. (2) Bruckner's music was featured at overtly political events ; each of Hitler's cultural speeches at the Nuremberg rallies, for example, was preceded by the performance of a movement from a Bruckner Symphony. (3) Radio broadcasts were announced with the trumpet theme that opens Bruckner's 3rd Symphony. (3) The Nazi government sponsored numerous Bruckner Festivals. (5) Adolf Hitler even hoped to hold an annual Bruckner Festival in Saint-Florian that would rival the prestigious Bayreuth Festival. Although these plans were never fulfilled, in 1943 the « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » of Linz was formed for this purpose. (6) Such crass political exploitation of « German » culture was characteristic of National-Socialism ; yet, the Nazi appropriation of Bruckner was extreme even by the standards of its time and place. As Mathias Hansen put it, Bruckner, even more than Richard Wagner or Richard Strauß, was « occupied by fascist ideology » . (7)

A number of coincidental circumstances fueled the National-Socialist appropriation of Bruckner. Bruckner's music fit Nazi aesthetic desiderata : with its monumental sweep, its outwardly clear and balanced formal outlines, its chorale-like passages, and its prominent use of brass instruments, it was easily heard as profoundly « German » music untainted by decadent cosmopolitanism. Adolf Hitler publicly declared his fondness for Bruckner's music, and seems to have identified personally with the composer : not only were both, he and Bruckner, born in Upper-Austria, but Hitler imagined that his own unsuccessful attempts to establish himself as an artist in Vienna paralleled Bruckner's ambivalent reception by the Viennese music community. With characteristic paranoia, Hitler ascribed both his and Bruckner's difficulties in Vienna largely to the hostility of the Jewish Viennese establishment. (8) In addition, the tenor of Bruckner criticism in the 1920's and 1930's facilitated the Nazi appropriation of Bruckner. Bruckner had been an icon for conservative and reactionary elements in Austrian society since the 1890's. (9) By the early part of the 20th Century, the image of Bruckner and his music had become identified with militaristic, feudalistic, and nationalistic tendencies. (10) This pattern of reception only intensified after the 1st World War ; the Bruckner literature of the 1920's is shot through with anti-modern mythologizing and partisan rhetoric. (11) The consistent rightward slant of much, if not most, Bruckner reception in the early decades of the 20th Century effectively prepared the ground for developments in the 3rd « Reich » .

These conditions (consideration of musical style, Hitler's personal predilections, and trends in Bruckner criticism) certainly did facilitate the Nazi appropriation of Bruckner. Taken by themselves, however, they are insufficient to explain the trajectory of Bruckner reception in the 3rd « Reich » ; something else was at work. We can only make sense of these developments if we account for the dark political ideology that informed them. Consider the enshrinement of Bruckner in « Walhalla » , an « ersatz » 19th Century Parthenon built by Ludwig I of Bavaria, during the Regensburg Bruckner Festival of June 1937. (12) At the culmination of the ceremony, Hitler personally consecrated the new bust of Bruckner by laying a laurel wreath at the foot of its pedestal. (13) One observer characterized Hitler's gesture as « an elevated symbol of the unlimited solidarity of the “ Führer ” and the German people » . (14) In reciprocation for the honour granted to Bruckner, Max Auer, the president of the « Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , presented Hitler with the Society's 1st « Ehrenmedaille » , describing it as « a small token of our deep gratitude for the admission of the bust of Bruckner to “ Walhalla ” » . (15)

The symbolism of these events was glossed in no uncertain terms by the other speakers at the Festival. In his address at the unveiling ceremony, Josef Gœbbels claimed Bruckner as a mystical symbol of German destiny. (15) :

« As a son of the Austrian soil, Anton Bruckner is a particularly apt symbol of the spiritual and emotional community of destiny, insoluble even to this day, that unites the entire German people. His installation in « Walhalla » was a symbolic event of more than simply artistic significance for us. » (17)

The comments of Peter Raabe, the head of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , painted a less overtly political, yet, still tendentious, picture of Bruckner's personality and his historical position. (18) He depicted Bruckner as an artist « out of step » with the negative tendencies of his epoch : a simple man in an era of pretentious and cultured artists, a mystically religious man in an age of secularism - in short, a healthy man in a decadent world. As a result of its lack of artifice and its ideal genuineness, Bruckner's music was able to express something essentially German :

« Therefore, for those who are receptive to them, listening to these works is something more than simply enjoying art : it is a return to the “ mother lodes ”, to the sources of feeling, to which no thinking can lead, nor knowledge and research, rather only the Will, small before the infiniteness of creation but great in its striving after good. » (19)

The speeches by Goebbels and Raabe, like the agenda of the Regensburg Festival as a whole, are so transparently political that the temptation is strong to dismiss the entire event as nothing more than politically expedient propaganda. While it is true that Nazism exploited Bruckner (among others) for political purposes, it is not sufficient to leave the analysis at that. The enshrinement of Bruckner in « Walhalla » « was » politically expedient, and it was a perverse misappropriation of the composer. But it was more than that : far from being an eccentric or isolated event, the « Walhalla » ceremony was a public performance of the ideology that subtended German Bruckner reception between 1933 and 1945. (20) It is in the nature of performances to focus ideological energy and to represent it in a desired form. As Richard Poirier wrote, a performance is an « exercise of power » that produces « a form that presumes to compete with reality itself for control of the mind exposed to it. » (21) The goal of this essay is to uncover something of this ideological underpinning in the hope of understanding an important phase of the genealogy of modern Bruckner reception. Since current views of Bruckner are still shadowed by traditions of reception that crystallized under National-Socialism, this history has immediate pertinence. Ultimately, this project means to clear the way for more critical and sensitive approaches to the composer. We may not, « pace » Derrida, « know how to think what Nazism is » ; but by patiently unraveling how National-Socialism appropriated Bruckner and his music, we might grasp the conceptual dynamics that governed Bruckner reception in the 3rd « Reich » .

National-Socialism and the Ideology of Bruckner Criticism

Although the Nazi State was governed with previously unimagined brutality, its political authority was founded on the exploitation of the cultural power of aesthetic values as well as authoritarian terrorism. Since, even this most brutal of totalitarian regimes was unable to exert actual physical control over all phases of life, the stability of the Nazi government depended not only on State terror and mass murder but also on the compliance of the populace. As Wolfgang Benz has argued, a populace willing to comply with National-Socialism was engendered by what he termed the « ecstasy of the ruled » . This « ecstasy » was fostered largely by aesthetic means : the self-representation of the regime, in flattering terms, State rituals that substituted for religion, and the stylization of the people as a « cultic fraternity » . (22) As Peter Adam wrote, these « rituals and public activities with quasi-religious overtones had one purpose in common, to enfold Party members and, by extension, all Germans in a seamless web of propaganda. » (23) The aestheticization of politics and power was a necessary constituent of the National-Socialist project ; it allowed totalitarian terror and appeals to the greyness of German art not only to coexist but to reinforce each other.

It was necessary for this aestheticization of politics to remain largely beneath the threshold of conscious public awareness ; had it been consciously recognized, it would have lost much of its efficacy. As Josef Goebbels put it :

« This is the secret of propaganda : whomever propaganda seeks to capture is thoroughly imbued with the idea of the propaganda without realizing at all that he is thus imbued. » (24)

Yet, at the same time, the National-Socialist government loudly and frequently proclaimed that art was a fundamental part of the totalizing « geistige Kampf » it was waging. Not only did the ideology of National-Socialism systematically exploit the propagandistic value of culture and artistic representation as sources of both power and legitimization, but it saw art as a way of formulating and promulgating ideologically desired consciousness. The ultimate goal of Nazi aesthetics was to affirm ruling ideological paradigms ; above all, art was called upon to promote and valorize the myths of race, « Volk » , and German essence, and to offer idealized metaphors of the fascist order. These tropes are evident in Gœbbels's screed on the role of the art in the new State :

« The mission of art and artists is not only to unite, their mission is, far more, to form, to give shape, to get rid of the sick, to clear the way for the healthy. As a German politician, I am therefore not able simply to recognize the distinction between good and bad art. Art should not only be good, but it must also appear to be conditioned by the Volk, better said, only an art arising out of the total " Volkstum " itself can, in the end, be good. » (25)

This conceptual desire to regulate art (to separate the « good and bad ») was supported by extensive, and brutal, practical means. All artistic, literary, and musical activities were subjected to a highly-regimented campaign to take control of the apparatus of artistic production. As part of this « Gleichschaltung » of German culture, the Nazi government organized the « Reichskulturkammer » , headed by Josef Gœbbels, in the fall of 1933. (26) The official charge of the « Reichskulturkammer » was to « promote German culture on behalf of the German " Volk " and " Reich " » and to « regulate the economic and social affairs of the cultural professions » . (27)

Equally important were the ways in which Nazism drew upon well a entrenched traditions of cultural reaction, and by selectively exploiting them generating, in Allan Steinweis' words, « key areas of consensus between official policy and prevailing sentiment in the art world » . (28) We can see this dynamic at work in the large body of Bruckner criticism that appeared in the 1930's and 1940's. (29) Reading Bruckner criticism, from these years, is an often jarring experience ; much of this literature often seems absurdly beholden to reactionary political agendas. Bruckner and his music are often glossed in terms of the « völkische » narrative of cultural decline and imminent rebirth. The 2 paradigmatic manifestations of this tendency were the prevalent representations of Bruckner as an Aryan hero and the identification of Bruckner's music with a mythical lost spirituality. Here is a remarkable example, written in 1936 by Max Auer :

« For 4 years (1914-1918) , destruction was visited upon Europe. Out of deepest need, the people called-out for guidance. False leaders brought nations and peoples to the edge of the precipice in the following decades. Without spiritual renewal, recuperation was not possible. A yearning for elevation out of the misery, caused by the crass materialism of the preceding Century (19th) , grew ever greater. Artistic bolshevism was carried to extremes. Against all this, there was but one remedy : a return to the pure sources ! What art was purer than that born of the deep religiosity of Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner ! Especially, Bruckner's God-consecrated art now found a fertile soil, at last it was rightly understood. For many thousands, it was the guide to a beautiful, spiritual world and, thereby, the foundations were laid for a healthy and strong Bruckner movement, which is only now, after the World War, succeeding with elemental power. » (30)

The bizarrely apocalyptic rhetoric of this example may be unusual, but its themes are not. Besides evoking a number of leitmotifs that echo the authoritarian « Führer » cult, its diagnosis of the ills of modern society was in keeping with the Party line, as was its call for « a return to the pure sources » and a concomitant spiritual renewal and salvation from decadence and modernism.

An even more sharply political view can be seen in Fritz Skorzeny's article « Anton Bruckner in Light of the German Resurrection » which allied the increased popularity of Bruckner's music with the imagined « resurrection » of the German spirit effected by National-Socialism. (31) Skorzeny claimed that these 2 moments were 2 sides of 1 coin : the source of the new « understanding » and « love » of Bruckner's music was nothing other than the rebirth of the German « Volksgeist » .

Skorzeny wrote :

« It was reserved for our age, to experience for the 1st time, with the deepest emotion, the break of dawn light, the great “ Awake, the day draws night ”. In this light, the miracle of Anton Bruckner is fulfilled. » (32)

Although these passages by Auer and Skorzeny are extreme, their tendentiousness is symptomatic. Both exploited the political resonance of portraying Bruckner as an innocent soul persecuted by nefarious (often ostensibly « Jewish ») modern critics, representing Bruckner's music as spiritual, pure, free from the contamination of modernity, and sacralizing it as an embodiment of the German « Volksgeist » . (33)

One recurrent sub-text of real topical import was the belief that Bruckner symbolized the rightful status of Germany and Austria as 1 nation. After listening to a recording of the 7th Symphony given to him by Josef Gœbbels, Adolf Hitler is reported to have said :

« How can anyone say that Austria is not German ! Is there anything more German than our old pure Austrianness ?! » (34)

Skorzeny's article, which appeared only weeks before the « Anschluß » , related Bruckner reception to German expansionism in no uncertain terms :

« The earth of this land (Austria) is, perhaps, the most precious and sacred in all Germany. In the remote past, profoundly stirred-up by the plow of Barbarian invasions, having drunk the blood of all the German races over the course of Centuries such soil became profound, powerful and fateful, like the people that sprang from it. Thus long ago, it transpired that Austria was selected as the spiritual seedbed for the plant garden of the entire German people. Her gardeners were certainly not always the best, however, and often permitted weeds and poisonous plants to long hinder the noblest seeds. When these were transplanted in the wide German mother-earth, they became mighty trees and bore ripe fruit. Herein lies the crux of Austrian destiny. » (35)

Skorzeny further claimed that « just as Bruckner's personality embodied the essential image of the Austrians, the destiny of his works is, in its deepest essence, characteristically Austrian » . (36) His works, like Austria itself, could come to full fruition only when they were replanted in Germany. The metaphorical unity between Austria and Germany, publicly endorsed at the Regensburg Bruckner Festival by the enshrinement of Bruckner in « Walhalla » and in Josef Göbbels' speech, was made concretely manifest less than 1 year later with the « Anschluß » , in March 1938. (37) Racism was never far from the surface of « völkisch » Bruckner criticism. Certainly, Bruckner's status as an Aryan was essential to his canonization, and discussions of the essentially German profundity of Bruckner's music pre-supposed that he was an Aryan. (In fact, Ernst Schwanzara actually « demonstrated » the « purity » of Bruckner's blood-lines by tracing his lineage back to the 14th Century. (33) While issues of race remained relatively discrete, anti-Semitism was often explicit. Thus, the slow public acceptance of Bruckner music in Vienna, in the 1880's and 1890's, was often interpreted in racial terms ; in Skorzeny's brazenly anti-Semitic view :

« As Bruckner set-out on his artistic life journey, world Jewry, in the guise of European Liberalism, had already taken-up the battles against the German “ Geist ” which had begun to stir in art. » (39)

Or consider Karl Grunsky's complaint that Herman Kretzschmar's « “ Führer ” durch den Konzertsaal » devoted excessive space (11 pages) to Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's 5 Symphonies, in contrast to the short shrift (« barely more than 1 page ») given to Bruckner's Symphonies. It was, he wrote, a « gross instance of imbalance between Jewish and Aryan in a German book ! » . (40) The critical remodeling of Bruckner also flowed along ideological channels that are perhaps less immediately apparent. On the one hand, National-Socialism set-out quite deliberately to appropriate the tradition of « German music » . The canon of Ausro-German Classical music was identified with the Aryan race and was seen to symbolize its greatness ; in 1939, for example, Peter Raabe went so far as to identify Germany as « das Volk Bachs, Beethovens und Bruckners » and to ally the fate of the 3rd « Reich » with the fate of German music. (41) Indeed, the legacy of great German composers not only was seen as a sign of German intellectual and spiritual power but was actually imagined to have prefigured the « awakening of the German people » and the rise of Nazism. (42) On the other hand, this nationalistic agenda also had other, less obvious dimensions. Perhaps, the most important function of the exploitation of this repertory was its symbolism of power. (43) As Bernd Sponheuer wrote :

« High art as such appeared (like the “ Führer ”, the “ Volk ”, and the State) as the representation of “ eternal laws ”, which demanded subordination and unquestioning obedience. » (44)

The desired stagings of power through music depended on a complex interpretative edifice that included not only ritualized performance contexts but also verbal and critical explanations of the meaning and significance of the music. Due to the non-representational (and, thus, radically polysemous) character of music, this ideological appropriation had to circumscribe the potential meaning of German music. (45) Thus, the project of musical propaganda in the 3rd « Reich » needs to be seen, in large measure, as a systematic remodeling of musical hermeneutics in terms of the hegemonic narrative of Nazism.

This re-interpretative process had several facets. The most basic included purposeful exploitation of music in the context of Nazi rituals and the coupling of exemplary Classical music with popular or explicitly Nazi music in broadcasts. (46) The use of music in such definitely politicized contexts attempted to impose a rigidly disciplined musical hermeneutics : by seeking to ensure that music served the unified, totalizing telos of National-Socialist mythology and, thereby, narrowing the possible meanings of the musical compositions it employed, it pressed them into the service of contemporary ideological needs. All refractory tendencies that might have been latent in either an artwork or its « Wirkungsgeschichte » were erased or masked beneath a ritualized, prefigured interpretation.

The henneneutical remodeling of Bruckner also encompassed biographical revision. It embraced the « völkische » tradition of portraying Bruckner as parochial and oddly anachronistic. This biographical tradition emphasized Bruckner's piety, « naïveté », simplicity, provinciality (as opposed to urbanity), mystical profundity (as opposed to intellectual calculation), and essential Germanness; at its most extreme, it saw Bruckner as a « prophet of the “ völkische ” and racial rebirth of greater Germany and the victory of “ earthy ”, stable life-will over decadent civilization ». (47) Bruckner, like the « völkische » movement itself, was believed to be ahead of his time. As critical attacks against Bruckner in the liberal press, in the 1880's and 1890's, supposedly demonstrated during his life, the German culture was not yet ready to recognize the genius of Bruckner's works; such hostility was taken as a sign that « his time was yet to come. » (48)

These biographical constructions were then read back into Bruckner's music. Since Bruckner supposedly stood outside of the cultural and historical currents of his time and place, his works were imagined to be free from the influence of practical contingencies and the corruptions of the marketplace. (49) Indeed, Bruckner's music was often considered to represent a primordial mystical experience, an « Urmusik » that expressed archetypal Germanic truths. (50) These musical qualities were often openly linked with « völkisch » appeals to Bruckner's « peasant » origins, his rural nature, and his « rootedness ». Consider, for example, Werner Danckert's comments from 1938 :

« After decades of unusually stubborn misunderstanding, an audience, prepared by experience, has presently developed for the “ Master of Saint-Florian ”. There is no lack of smart and informative explanation for this. However, it seems to me, an essential prevailing tendency in Bruckner's work and life has eluded virtually every comprehensive interpretation: Bruckner's unique position in his historical environment. » (51)

According to Danckert, Bruckner's music contained a « “ subterranean ” transmission of the South German-Austrian Baroque ». (52) The composer was, in the strict sense, « unzeitgemäss » : he was the « continuer, indeed the consummator, of an age-old world of expression, that flourished in the 17th and 18th Centuries but was later swamped by other artistic currents. It is filled with powerful sensuality, love of brilliance, and a mighty richness of form drawn from a “ pre-Classical ”, appealingly “ objective ” sense of form. » (53)

This strange historiography played with the covertly political mythology of art as timeless verity; such mythic interpretations of Bruckner tied into the continual appeals to « eternal values » by the German Right during the upheavals following the 1st World War and the Weimar Republic. (54) Adolf Hitler, for example, claimed that « true art is and remains eternal. It does not follow the laws of fashion : its effect is that of a revelation arising from the depths of the essential character of a people. » (55) This jargon of timelessness was deeply complicit with Nazism. As Berthold Hinz wrote :

« The notion of “ eternal German art ” was often invoked as a proof to support the idea of a 1,000 year “ Reich ”, which was itself a metaphor for permanence and immutability. At the same time, the National-Socialist concept of history, based as it was on the æsthetic category of “ greatness ”, precluded any possibility of progress or change. »

The Musicological Appropriation of Bruckner

Most of the critical writing about Bruckner that emanated from Germany in 1930's and 1940's is so clearly a function of the corrupt cultural climate of Nazi Germany that it demands a highly-suspicious reading. Today, very little of this output retains any degree of legitimacy ; instead, the enduring contributions to Bruckner studies date (with few exceptions) from either the 1920's or from after the War. Nevertheless, one product of this musicological appropriation of Bruckner has remained largely unchallenged : the central issue in modern Bruckner scholarship (establishing « authentic » editions of the composer's works) is still largely governed by arguments and interpretations that originated in connection with the « 1st Critical Edition » (« Erste Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of Bruckner's works, the « Anton Bruckner, Sämtliche Werke : Kritische Gesamtausgabe », edited by Robert Haas, which was prepared and published between 1930 and 1944.

Haas began the « Gesamtausgabe », unexceptionably, by publishing works that Bruckner had left unpublished, including 2 early Masses, the 1st version of the 1st Symphony (Linz), and the 9th and 6th Symphonies. But, in the mid-1930's, when Haas turned to works that Bruckner had published (a group that included 7 of the 9 numbered Symphonies), he took a revolutionary position, namely that the published texts of these works had been corrupted by intrusive, unauthorized editing and thus needed to be supplanted by modern editions based exclusively on the « pure » texts of Bruckner's autograph manuscripts. Following this approach, Haas produced new editions of all of Bruckner's numbered Symphonies, except the 3rd.

Haas's edition refigured the canon of Bruckner's works. It made available a substantial number of important texts, including previously unpublished versions of the 1st, 4th, 5th, and 9th Symphonies. The text-critical program of the « Gesamtausgabe » did, however, have a more radical dimension ; Haas's dogmatic insistence that works not preserved in extant autograph manuscripts could not be accepted as authentic, entailed abandoning the versions of a number of compositions (notably, the 2nd, 4th, 5th and 8th Symphonies) published during Bruckner's lifetime and supplanting (not supplementing) them with modern editions based solely on the earlier versions preserved in Bruckner's holographs. Indeed, at times, Haas's zeal to produce new, « authentic » editions prompted him to employ highly-questionable editorial methods : for example, his editions of the 2nd and 8th Symphonies do not correspond to any known versions Bruckner himself wrote ; rather, Haas conflated discrete texts to produce what he imagined Bruckner would or should have written in the best of all possible circumstances.

Whatever their philological status, Haas's editions differ musically from those published in the 1880's and 1890's. While they are basically similar in their fundamental thematic, harmonic, and rhythmic substance, the versions of the Symphonies Haas favored often contain passages (typically, short ones) not found in the original published scores. In addition, the orchestration of the « Gesamtausgabe » scores tends to be more rugged and, especially in the brass, more imposing, if occasionally less transparent and finely judged. Moreover, as a rule, Haas's scores are considerably sparser in their notation of nuances of tempo and dynamics than are the texts Bruckner published and, thereby, convey a more massive and, thus, less dynamic image of the music, a factor that bears crucially on performance practice.

The historical justification of the categorical judgment against the authority of the editions printed during Bruckner's lifetime is, as I have argued in detail elsewhere, beset by a number of unresolved historiographic and evidential problems that render it highly-doubtful. (57) For example, Bruckner never attempted to suppress the editions published in his lifetime nor did he ever publicly renounce or even criticize their authenticity ; moreover, substantial textual evidence exists that testifies to the authority of these editions. These concerns were countered (and still often are) by assertions that Bruckner may, whether as a result of expedience, « naïveté » , or coercion, have allowed his scores to be altered, and even partially re-written, prior to publication, and that he always believed his unpublished manuscripts contained the « real » , essential versions of his works. Thus, by publishing these texts, the « Gesamtausgabe » claimed to carry-out Bruckner's ultimate will. Many critics saw the « Gesamtausgabe » as the disclosure, after decades of obscurity, of the « true Bruckner » . As Franz Moißl wrote, the « Gesamtausgabe » was « a liberation of the true Symphonic will of the Master » . (58)

Although many of the arguments and rationales that were used to justify the outright dismissal of the 1st printed editions of Bruckner's Symphonies and, by extension, to promote the exclusive preserve of the « Gesamtausgabe » may seem tenuous to a skeptical observer, their claim to truth came to seem all but self-evident in the 3rd « Reich » (and indeed beyond) . This acceptance was, in part, an overtly political affair. The new edition was not only consistently heralded and praised in State-sanctioned journals, but it received financial and moral endorsement from the Nazi government. In his speech at the 1937 Regensburg Bruckner Festival, Josef Gæbbels declared that since Bruckner's Symphonies were a precious national legacy, the « Bruckner Gesellschaft » would, henceforth, receive an annual contribution to fund the editing of the « original versions » . Gæbbels not only offered financial support to the « Gesamtausgabe » , he also granted it Adolf Hitler's imprimatur :

« The “ Führer ” and his government consider it their honourable duty to do all that is within their power to permit the whole German people to receive this (Bruckner's) fortunate legacy and, by means of a large-scale promotion of Bruckner cultivation, assist its effects to penetrate not only deeply, but broadly. On these grounds, they have decided to make a substantial annual contribution to the “ Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft ” for the editing of the original versions of his Symphonies until the complete works of the Master are produced in the form he envisioned. » (59)

The politicization of the new Bruckner edition directly affected the course of its reception and legitimation. When the initial volumes of the « Gesamtausgabe » began to appear in the early 1930's, their merits were debated vigorously in the German musical press. This debate, the so-called « Bruckner-Streit » occupied pages of the leading journals and was joined by both staunch opponents of Robert Haas's methodology as well as those in favor of Haas' text-critical position. Yet, by 1937, the « Bruckner-Streit » had fallen silent and the « Gesamtausgabe » was clearly established as the authoritative source of Bruckner's works. « Gesamtausgabe » editions largely replaced others in performance, and, more importantly, the arguments in their favor were generally accepted by the German-speaking scholarly community.

The tenor of the whole discussion about the textual problems of Bruckner's works clearly changed in the wake of the Regensburg Festival as historical and philological questions gave way to ideologically over-determined aesthetic and stylistic issues as the main concern of Bruckner scholars. The support given to the « Gesamtausgabe » by Josef Goebbels and, by proxy, Adolf Hitler at the Regensburg Festival had a pivotal effect. In the ideological climate of the 3rd « Reich », where scholarship and historical truth were both theorized as political functions, Goebbels's public opinion weighed heavily in favor of the « Gesamtausgabe » and, soon, it became de facto official policy to uphold, if not simply assume as a proven fact, the absolute authority of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

In addition to the effect of Goebbels's sanction, there were other ways (perhaps, more important ones) in which the cultural climate shaped the discourse that legitimated the « Gesamtausgabe » . This discourse depended, in large part, on then current text-critical beliefs, including the view that artworks transcend the material facts of their production, a notion of authorship as the free play of genius, and a belief that the goal of editing should be to produce a hypothetical « urtext » . But this discourse also drew heavily on a complex set of ideological and aesthetic presumptions that gained credence and weight from their resonance with the culture of the 3rd « Reich » . In a culture increasingly committed to « völkisch » theories of « Wissenschaft » , the mission of uncovering the « real » Bruckner carried a real emotional and ideological charge. Advocates of the « neue Bruckner-Bewegung » exploited « völkisch » sentiments by adopting exaggerated tones of fatefulness. As early as 1936, Max Auer referred to the « spiritual battle for the possession of the “ real ” Bruckner » . (60) In the next year, Hans Weisbach wrote that the issues facing Bruckner scholars were « weighty because our generation, which was presented with this decision by fate, bears the responsibility for the form in which Bruckner's Symphonies will live in the spiritual life of humanity » (61) Horst Büttner assumed a similarly portentous tone when he claimed that opinion had decided in favor of the new edition of the 9th Symphony and that « due to the heightened sense of responsibility at present for great national cultural treasures, the time cannot be distant when the “ Originalfassungen ” of the 4th, 5th, and 6th Symphonies will also have won out. » (62)

This « völkische » attitude also placed great import in « public opinion » as a determinant not only of value but also of truth. The German art historian Hans Weigert argued, in 1935, that the « consensus omnium » was a decisive determinant of aesthetic quality since it reflected the « given and native » (« gegeben und eingeboren ») evaluative standards of the « people » . (63) Although, as Bettina Preiss noted, this position is « theoretically virtually meaningless » , (64) such thinking played an important role in the legitimation of the « Gesamtausgabe » . Many who advocated the « Gesamtausgabe » asserted that the new edition allowed the German people to experience, for the 1st time, the greatness of Bruckner's music in its pure form. Consider Max Auer's statement that :

« In view of the victory march of the “ Originalfassungen ” through the concert halls, in view of the not-to-be-explained-away “ authenticity ” of the scores written down by the Master's own fingers, the old compromise versions have lost their right to exist. » (65)

The importance of the « Gesamtausgabe » to the « public » was reflected in Oskar Lang's comment, in 1936, that, unlike most collected editions, which are generally purely academic enterprises, the Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe » was different :

« It is attempting a great feat (and this must be emphatically pointed-out to the public) which concerns the whole music world, for it removed the spell that until now lay over Bruckner's works. » (66)

As the public became aware of these new editions, they did seem to be persuaded that they contained the « truth » of Bruckner's music. Or, at least, so the critics claimed : in 1938, after the tide had clearly turned, Fritz Öser declared that performances of the new critical editions of Bruckner's Symphonies « aroused unconditional approval among completely unbiased listeners, who set aside their prejudice against the original versions out of respect for the inviolable work of genius. » (67)

Another set of ideological premises also weighed heavily in the debates about the « Gesamtausgabe » : the pursuit of imagined textual purity resonated with the National-Socialist obsession with race. Viewed critically, it is hard to avoid the suspicion that the editors of the « Gesamtausgabe » aimed in part to free Bruckner's works from the specter of an imagined history of Jewish influence, especially since some of those who were accused of corrupting Bruckner's scores were of Jewish descent, notably the conductor Ferdinand Löwe and the publisher Albert J. Gutmann. Max Auer, for instance, said that older editions of Bruckner's music transmitted texts that reflected the deleterious influence of « overly refined city folk » (« überkultivierte Städter ») , a coded term for Jews. (68) An undercurrent of racism swirled in the suggestion that the psychological difficulties Bruckner supposedly suffered late in life (which were believed, by some, to have affected the authorship of the 1st edition of a number of his works) were largely induced by the trauma of conductor Hermann Levi's rejection of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony in 1887. (69) Similarly, part of the covert mission of the « Gesamtausgabe » seems to have been to remove Bruckner's scores from the purview of the Viennese publishing house Universal-Edition. (70) Universal-Edition, which had established its reputation by publishing such composers as Gustav Mahler, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Arnold Schönberg, and Alban Berg, had long been a target for reactionary critics, who identified it with such supposedly deleterious forces as modernism, atonality, bolshevism, and Judaism ; it is not surprising that the Nazis would have been eager to dissociate Bruckner from the firm. (71)

In a less overt way, too, the desire to remove all « foreign » traces from the texts of Bruckner's compositions and to present pure, « authentic » versions resonated with the mythos of racial purity. In a discussion of the textual differences between 19th Century editions of Bruckner's works and those published in the « Gesamtausgabe » , Rolf Pergler transposed the metaphor of purity from a sociological to a textual plane. He claimed that Bruckner's works were governed by the truth of the « Brucknerian formal principle » (« Brucknersche Gestaltungsprinzip ») ; accordingly, textual contaminations, or, as he called them, « foreign bodies » (« Fremdkörper ») found in the older scores could be easily identified by their lack of harmony with the overall form and eliminated. (72) Pergler's stated wish to « eliminate » such « foreign bodies » made manifest a desire that had been latent since the start of the project. In April 1932, Alexander Berrsché compared the « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the 9th Symphony with the earlier edition, edited in 1903, by Ferdinand Löwe. Berrsché wrote :

« It is hardly to be believed what Löwe alone made-out of the Scherzo in Bruckner's version, it inhabits an entirely different sphere of sound and expression. Löwe cleverly and ingeniously gussied-up the piece ; his work alone induced the view that the Scherzo of the 9th has an elfin, “ Midsummer Night's Dream ” atmosphere and, on the whole, seems a synthesis of Mendelssohn, Berlioz, and Bruckner. Now, it is gone forever, and we may confidently pack away the old comparisons. The actual Bruckner Scherzo may be without any sparkling bubblieness, but it stands on firm, sturdy legs, on the native soil of the Upper-Austria land. » (73)

The nationalistic, anti-Semitic, and gendered subtext of this review is clear : the polemical implications of the references to Mendelssohn and the use of the terms « elfin » and « sparkling bubblieness » are obvious. So too is its appeal to the politically loaded metaphor of purification ; the « original version » was imagined to have rescued Bruckner's music by cleansing it of alien elements.

During the period 1936 to 1938, the claim that the 1st editions were inauthentic and that the « Gesamtausgabe » alone contained the « real » texts of Bruckner's works gradually metamorphosed from a text-critical hypothesis into dogma. Direct public criticism of the « Gesamtausgabe » was increasingly suppressed. For example, the official journal of the « Bruckner-Gesellschaft », the « Bruckner-Blätter, became increasingly unwilling to publish views that were unsympathetic to the « Gesamtausgabe » . During the mid- 1930's, as the official Bruckner establishment closed ranks, its intolerance grew so strong that it prompted at least 2 writers who were ambivalent about the « Gesamtausgabe » (Friedrich Klose and Friedrich Herzfeld) to use the terminology of religious apostasy in describing their positions. In 1936, Herzfeld wondered aloud if it was considered « blasphemy » (« Gotteslästerung ») even to raise reasonable arguments against the text-critical claims of the « Gesamtausgabe » . (74) Klose wrote that even « at the danger of excommunication » (« auf die Gefahr hin exkommuniziert zu werden ») , he preferred the 1st printed edition of the 9th Symphony to the « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») . (75) Thus, by the time of Josef Gæbbels' speech at Regensburg, in June 1937, the debate was ready to be peremptorily ended.

And After

It remains to evaluate how present-day understanding of Bruckner betrays an indebtedness to Nazi-era reception, to determine if and how our engagements with Bruckner and his music are still shadowed by ghosts from this past. In the immediate post-War period, Bruckner scholars generally shied away from explicitly wrestling with the legacy of the 1930's and 1940's, yet, the field did strive to reform itself. Although these efforts at renovation were something less than thoroughgoing, it would be a mistake wholly to discount them. In the late- 1940's, several East German scholars and musicians did attempt forthrightly to confront the Nazi appropriation of Bruckner, most importantly Emil Armbruster. (76) Also, in 1946, in Leipzig, the conductor Heinz Bongartz performed the old edition of the 5th Symphony, which had been damned by Robert Haas. (77) Bongartz's gesture was intended, in part, as a repudiation of Haas' Bruckner project, but it was not understood as such by critics. In the same year, the progressive West German critic Heinrich Strobel addressed the politics of Bruckner reception, if only in passing. His lead essay in the inaugural post-War issue of « Melos » , which was resuscitated in 1946, following its dissolution by the Nazis in 1934, was built around the contention that :

« One certainly cannot simply blot-out the last 12 years and pick-up again where one left off, in 1933. » (78)

Significantly, Strobel singled-out Bruckner reception for comment ; he saw the celebration of « Bruckner as the incarnation of the German urge for endless depths or heights » as particularly hard to disentangle from residue of the Nazi era. (79)

Western Bruckner scholars generally, however, took a more indirect approach to this painful issue ; typically, they have tried to move Bruckner reception onto new ground and to distance it from its immediate past, without explicitly mentioning National-Socialism or the 3rd « Reich » . For example, in 1947, Leopold Nowak published an oddly allusive monograph on Bruckner's « Te Deum » in which he aggressively reclaimed Bruckner for Catholicism (and hence away from the « Gottgläubigkeit » imposed on him by Josef Gœbbels) and modeled Bruckner as a beacon that could help to guide Austria out of the spiritual confusion sown by the War. (80) A similar tendency to move away from the attitudes of the Nazi era is evident in some of the articles published in the issue of the « Österreichische Musikzeitschrift » , in 1946, devoted to Bruckner on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of his death. (81) A new critical direction can be sensed in Wilhelm Waldstein's essay « Anton Bruckner : Versuch einer kritischen Skizze » , which compares Bruckner with Gœthe, an artist who was not popular with the National-Socialists. (82) Franz Gräßlinger's contribution, « Anton Bruckner und Hermann Levi, sein “ Edelster Gönner ” und “ Höchstberühmster Vater ” » , also evinces the changed political climate. Its topic, Bruckner's close association with Hermann Levi, was pointedly ignored by the Nazis. Although it stems, from Bruckner himself, the notion of the Jewish Levi as Bruckner's « noblest patron » and « most famous father » would have been anathema in the 3rd « Reich » . Analytic studies of Bruckner's music have also broken with the past. Since the 1960's, progressive German musicologists have focused their attention on exactly those aspects of Bruckner's music (its constructivist tendencies, its motivic intensity, its dissonance) that were minimized if not ignored by « völkische » interpretations of Bruckner. (83)

All of these scholars, intent on not re-opening old wounds unnecessarily, addressed the problem of Nazi reception gingerly. This approach, which has typified much post-War German culture, has been sufficient to expunge the most politically complicit tendencies emanating from Nazi-era Bruckner reception ; no one now sees Bruckner either as a victim of Jewish critics or as the muse of a new Aryan world order. Yet, as a result of the failure to tackle the Nazi appropriation of Bruckner head-on, some of the subtler and more conceptually slippery dimensions of the traditions of reception fostered by National-Socialism still haunt our engagements with Bruckner and his music. As a result, present-day understanding of Bruckner betrays a subtle (even subterranean) indebtedness to Nazi-era reception in 2 areas : the image of the composer as a naive genius and the editorial status of Bruckner's music.

The prevailing image of Bruckner is that of an exceptionally naive character, a notion derived in large measure from the « völkisch Brucknerbild » that was canonized in the 1930's. As Bruckner scholars have become more sophisticated about the nature and value of anecdotal evidence (thanks largely to the work of Manfred Wagner and Erich Wolfgang Partsch) , the scholarly credibility of old stereotypes about Bruckner's psyche has faded. (84) Yet, while most Bruckner scholars recognize the composer's sophistication and his ambition as well as his simplicity, the popular image of Bruckner has not been similarly corrected. One can still read descriptions of Bruckner that paint the composer as a virtual cipher. As recently as 1992, Robert Simpson wrote that it « almost defeats the imagination » to reconcile Bruckner's « legendary personal naïvety, his provincial background, his total lack of general culture, and his willingness to alter his scores at the behest of self-appointed mentors » with his undeniable compositional achievements. (85) Simpson's work is not simplistic, but is, rather, generally thoughtful and often perceptive. Yet, his credulous acceptance of the image of Bruckner as a « Parsifal » -like « reiner Tor » demonstrates the extent to which such notions continue to infuse modern consciousness of Bruckner : Simpson's misprision is symptomatic of the widespread failure to appraise critically the ideological commitments of the received wisdom about Bruckner. No scholar subscribes any longer to the « völkisch » ideology of Bruckner reception but, through inattention, there is a real and present danger of re-inscribing piecemeal fragments of this very tradition.

Similarly, despite the critical suspicion now rightly accorded to most German Bruckner reception of the 1930's and 1940's, very little such skepticism exists about the Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe » of 1930-1944. The textual criticism of the 1st Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe » has, of course, been subject to major revision, most importantly by Leopold Nowak, Haas's post-War successor as the general editor of the « Gesamtausgabe » . Nowak did not merely pick-up where Haas had left-off. Indeed, although Nowak did share Haas's exclusive preference for manuscript sources, he revised all of Haas's editions and rectified Haas's most questionable text-critical leaps of faith, notably those found in Haas's editions of the 2nd and 8th Symphonies. (86) Haas's editions themselves may no longer universally be accepted, but Bruckner scholars do continue to accept the flawed central premise of the « Gesamtausgabe » as a proven historical fact : autograph manuscripts are still considered the only representations of the « real Bruckner » , and the early printed editions are dismissed as corruptions of Bruckner intentions. As Deryck Cooke wrote in his article on Bruckner in « The New Grove Dictionary » :

« The 1st editions have been utterly discredited. » (87)

As the rejection of the 1st editions has become an inherited article of faith, it has assumed an undeserved mantle of truth, and its connection to the ideological environment of National-Socialism has largely escaped our consciousness.

The confluence of these 2 vestiges of the dark past of Bruckner reception (namely, the image of the composer as an unwitting genius and a dogmatic belief in the tightness of modern editorial conclusions about Bruckner) substantially governs our approach to his music. We can see this dynamic at work in contemporary Bruckner performance practice. The dominant modern approach to Bruckner interpretation emphasizes monumental sonorities, sets steady, generally slow tempi, and presents Bruckner's forms with architectural severity rather than with dynamic sweep. This style, made famous by Herbert von Karajan, Günter Wand, and Carlo Maria Giulini, among others, is a post-War phenomenon. Performances of Bruckner's Symphonies by musicians of an earlier generation exemplify a quite different approach to the music, one much more concerned with shaping Bruckner's music gesturally and dynamically, and with conveying not the massive coherence of Bruckner's music but its mercurial drama. (88)

The evolution of modern Bruckner performance is, of course, part of a broader post-War trend toward « objective » performance styles ; but it also derives (crucially) from the peculiar course of Bruckner reception in the 20th Century. On one hand, with their emphasis on grandeur, weight, and depth of tone, modern interpretive approaches to Bruckner appear as musical analogues of the biographical construction of Bruckner as a mystical genius, singing great hymns of piety and reverence. On the other, modern performances of Bruckner's Symphonies concretize the biases of modern Bruckner editing. Performances of the old school reflect the texts of the editions printed in the 1880's and 1890's ; these older scores contain abundant indications for subtleties of tempo and dynamics that are absent from Bruckner's earlier unpublished manuscript texts. Haas' and Nowak's scores more or less faithfully reproduce these manuscript sources ; as a result, they are spartan in their tempo, expression, and dynamic markings. Modern conductors, innocent of the genealogy of modern Bruckner editing and abjuring the old, supposedly corrupt scores, take the texts of modern critical editions as gospel and « then read these texts all too literally » . (89) In so doing, they perpetuate an interpretative style that is alien to earlier traditions.

We would be mistaken to posit any direct influence of politics on the changes in Bruckner performance practice. Indeed, many conductors active in the 3rd « Reich » (like most Bruckner conductors who cut their teeth before Haas' editions were published) retained elements of the 1st printed editions, even when they used Haas' scores. (90) Rather, the current state of affairs reflects the odd mixture of continuity and rupture that has characterized modernist Bruckner reception. The post-War ideology of scholarly objectivity has succeeded in overthrowing the conscious tendentiousness promulgated in the 3rd « Reich » . At the same time, this creed has sown its own confusion : while modernist paradigms of scholarship, which do not actively account for ideology, have relegated the most egregious historical and critical misapprehension borne in the 1930's and 1940's to obscurity, with their stubborn empiricism they have, paradoxically, shielded us from seeing how Bruckner reception continues to be shaded by this ideology. For example, since the pursuit of « authentic » « urtexts » is central to the practice of modern musicology, the essentials of the text-critical project inaugurated by Haas were easily taken-over largely intact in the post-War era. Indeed, the belief that the editions published in the 19th century are « inauthentic » has deepened its hold in the past 50 years ; certainly the replacement of these editions by new critical editions is now complete. Yet, as a result of the narrow focus of this editorial program, we have lost sight of the compromising origins of the dismissal of these older editions. And, at least partially as a result of understandable hesitance to grapple with old demons, we have failed to weigh the historical and evidential merits of this received text-critical position. The longer we persist in failing to account for the after-effects of the purgatory through which Bruckner reception passed in the 1930's and 1940's, the more pernicious this legacy. The past will not go away, even if we stare at it long and hard. All we can do is to address it squarely and try bravely to grasp how it shapes the present.

Notes

(1) This issue has not received the attention it merits. The earliest discussions are short and relatively insubstantial : Peter Gülke. « Der schwierige Jubilar : Zu Anton Bruckners 150. (29) The increased importance of Bruckner to musical scholarship in the 3rd « Reich » is evident in the remarkable inflation in the number of articles on Bruckner and related topics that were published in the « Zeitschrift für Musik ». In the decade of the 1920's, the « Zeitschrift für Musik » published fewer than a dozen articles on Bruckner but, after 1932, the volume rose sharply, peaking, in 1936, with 21 contributions on Bruckner, in that year alone.

Falsche “ Führer ” brachten in den weiteren Jahrzehnten Völker und Nationen an den Abgrund. Ohne geistige Erneuerung kann es eine Gesundung nicht geben. Immer mehr wuchs die Sehnsucht nach innerer Erhebung aus dem Elend, das der krasse Materialismus des vergangenen Jahrhunderts hervorgerufen hatte. Der Bolschewismus in der Kunst wurde auf die Spitze genieben. Gegen all dies gab es nur ein Mittel : Rückkehr zu den reinen Quellen ! Welche Kunst aber wäre reiner als die aus tiefer Religiosität geborene eines Bach, Beethoven und Bruckner ! Besonders Bruckners gottgeweihte Kunst fand nun einen günstigen Nährboden, nun erst das richtige Verständnis, er wurde vielen Tausenden zum “ Führer ” in eine schöne geistige Welt, und damit war die Grundlage für eine gesunde und starke Bruckner-Bewegung gegeben, die nun, nach dem Weltkrieg mit elementarer Gewalt sich durchsetzte » ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » , Bosse, Regensburg (1936) , Volume IV, Chapter 4, pages 61-62. « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » has a complex history. Bruckner himself selected Göllerich to write his biography, but Göllerich died, in 1923, without having come close to finishing the work. Auer subsequently took-over Göllerich's notes and sketches and finished the biography. The quotation above is from the final volume (published in 1936) and is undoubtedly the work of Auer.

(88) Numerous examples of this performance tradition are preserved in recordings from the 1930's, 1940's, and 1950's by Eugen Jochum, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Hans Knappertsbusch, Carl Schuricht, and Jascha Horenstein.

(89) Nikolas Hamoncourt's comments in the notes to his recent recording of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony offer a recent example of these phenomena (« Teldec », CD : 4509-98405-2) :

« I think Bruckner knew perfectly well how he imagined his works would sound and that he set this down quite clearly. He said : " My work is in the score. " . The versions that various friends and conductors forced-out of him were concessions to these friends and to audiences, prompted by the wish to be performed at all. » (7)

Hamoncourt also decried the unwritten decelerandos often taken in the slow movement of the 3rd Symphony :

« There isn't the slightest indication in the score that this is how these passages should be taken. And yet, Orchestras are used to playing them like this. But when a composer like Bruckner writes even the tiniest change of tempo into the score and when he prescribes even the least expressive nuance by means of footnotes and explanations, I'm tempted to agree with him and I am inclined to clear away all this ballast. » (8)

I am grateful to William Carragan for bringing Hamoncourt's remarks to my attention.

(90) Tempo schemes derived from these older texts can be heard quite clearly in. For example, Karl Böhm's 1936 recording of the 4th Symphony with the « Sächsische Staatskapelle » (re-issued on « Da Capo » , LP : IC 053.28 924M) and Eugen Jochum's 1939 recording of the 4th Symphony with the Hamburg Philharmonic (re-issued on « Lys » , CD : 007/8) . Similarly, Siegmund von Hausegger, who was one of Robert Haas' consultants and premiered the « Gesamtausgabe » edition of the 9th Symphony in 1932, adopted some of the tempo and dynamic indications found only in Ferdinand Löwe's 1903 edition when he recorded the « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the Symphony, in 1938, with the Munich Philharmonic (re-issued on « Preiser » , CD : 90148) . On the continued prevalence of many of the performance indications of Löwe's edition of this Symphony, see : Mark Kluge. « Furtwängler and the Art of Bruckner Interpretation : Conclusion » , « The Newsletter of the Wilhelm Furtwängler Society of America » , Volume 4, No. 4 (1993) , pages 6-13. Furthermore, when performing Haas's edition of the 5th Symphony, several conductors adhered to a practice derived from the text of the 1st edition : adding supplementary brass players (the famous « 11 Apostles » , consisting of 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones and 1 bass tuba) in the peroration of the Finale (measures 583-635 in Haas's edition ; compare the passage beginning at rehearsal U, in the 1896 edition) . Hausegger probably did this in the 1st performance in Munich, in October 1935 ; Oswald Kabasta definitely did so in the Viennese premiere, in March 1936, as did Eugen Jochum at a concert in Berlin, in 1938 ; see : Brüstle.

Anton Bruckner et Adolf Hitler

Adolf Hitler aimait la musique mélodique, euphonique et accessible. Mais ses goûts subirent plusieurs changements importants. Pendant la majeure partie de sa vie, la musique d'Anton Bruckner ne lui dira rien.

Selon le photographe personnel d'Hitler, Heinrich Hoffmann, Hitler mentionnera que très peu souvent le nom de Bruckner parmi ses compositeurs préférés.

L'architecte du « Reich » , Albert Speer, a souligné que l'intérêt de Hitler pour le compositeur « n'a jamais semblé très marqué » , même après être devenu Chancelier.

Anton Bruckner avait cependant pour le « Führer » une importance symbolique ; celle du « petit garçon du patelin » qui deviendra le rival de Johannes Brahms, si cher à Vienne. Lors des grands rassemblements du Parti à Nuremberg, un mouvement de l'une des Symphonies de Bruckner était toujours utilisé.

...

La Ire publication des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner se fera avec l'approbation du Parti Nazi. Bruckner était l'un des compositeurs préférés d'Adolf Hitler. Selon la propagande, ces 2 fils de la patrie, en provenance de Haute-Autriche, avaient réussi à triompher de la bourgeoisie viennoise. L'adulation (bien documentée) de Bruckner pour Richard Wagner de même que l'association de ce dernier (le « Cercle Wagner ») avec les prédécesseurs ultra-nationalistes du Parti Nazi a certainement contribué à sa reconnaissance comme grand compositeur dans l'univers culturel du 3e « Reich ». Avec la progression des années '30, la musique de Bruckner devint de plus en plus associée avec les théories racistes du National-Socialisme qui affirmait que les versions retouchées avaient été victimes de « contamination » de la part d'influents « étrangers » (voire d'origine juive) . Les Symphonies de Bruckner devaient être « purifiées » pour enfin révéler son véritable génie germanique. Malgré le discours politique auquel il a été associé, il faut saluer l'apport du musicologue Robert Haas dans le processus de publication.

Les chœurs patriotiques pour voix d'hommes et les majestueuses Symphonies de Bruckner seront utilisés pour soutenir les idées infantilisantes des idéologues nazis sur la redéfinition de la musique allemande : simple, sérieuse, spirituelle, sans être délurée et sans trop chromatisme.

1936 : Au-delà du 40e anniversaire de la mort d'Anton Bruckner (1896-1936) , Josef Gœbbels commentera l'année en ces termes :

« Nous nous sommes finalement libérés des chaînes de Versailles. » En effet, l'Allemagne était redevenue une formidable « machine de guerre » .

1940 : Tout à coup, Adolf Hitler va développer une véritable passion pour les Symphonies de Bruckner. Il va même commencer à l'introduire dans les discours qu'il tient sur son idole, Richard Wagner. Josef Gœbbels notera dans son journal : « Il m'a dit que ce n'est que pendant la guerre qu'il apprit à l'apprécier. » . Son engouement ne cessera de croître.

Nuit du 13 au 14 janvier 1942 : Après avoir écouté un enregistrement du 1er mouvement de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner directement de son quartier général militaire (le « Repaire du Loup ») , Adolf Hitler fera ce commentaire : « Cette œuvre est basée sur des airs populaires provenant de la Haute-Autriche. Ils ne sont pas reproduits textuellement, mais, à plusieurs endroits, je reconnais les danses tyroliennes (Ländler) de ma tendre jeunesse. C'est extraordinaire ce qu'il a réussi à faire à partir de ce folklore. Il faut donner, en l'occurrence, le crédit à un prêtre pour avoir parrainer ce grand Maître. L'évêque de Linz avait l'habitude de s'asseoir pendant des heures dans sa cathédrale à écouter religieusement Bruckner jouer de l'orgue. Il était le plus grand organiste de son époque. » (« Hitler's Table Talk » : 1941-1944. Édité par H. R. Trevor-Roper avec un avant-propos de Gerhard L. Weinberg.)

Il est indéniable qu'Hitler se sentait personnellement très proche de ce compositeur. Les 2 provenaient d'une petite localité autrichienne de la même région ; ils grandirent dans un milieu modeste ; leurs pères moururent de manière précoce ; ils étaient autodidactes ; et malgré les nombreux obstacles, ils réussirent à s'affirmer. Souvent, Hitler mettra en opposition Bruckner, ce catholique autrichien contesté des Viennois, et Brahms, ce protestant venu du nord de l'Allemagne qu'ils idolâtraient.

« This work is based on popular airs of Upper-Austria. They're not textually reproduced, but repeatedly I recognized in passing Tyrolean dances of my youth. It's wonderful what he managed to get-out of that folklore. As it happened, it's a priest to whom we must give the credit for having protected this great Master. The Bishop of Linz used to sit in his cathedral for hours at a time, listening to Bruckner play the organ. He was the greatest organist of his day. »

1942 : Josef Gœbbels placera Bruckner au même niveau que Beethoven. Il dira de la 7e Symphonie qu'elle est « l'une des plus belles manifestations de la créativité musicale allemande, l'équivalent de la 9e de Beethoven » .

« Pendant des heures, l'évêque de Linz demeurait assis, seul dans la cathédrale, pour écouter Bruckner, le plus grand organiste de son temps, jouer de l'orgue. » (Josef Gœbbels)

« On peut imaginer combien il fut difficile pour ce petit garçon paysan de se rendre à Vienne, une société urbaine débauchée. » (Josef Gœbbels)

« Une remarque récemment parue dans un journal, faite par Bruckner à l'endroit de Johannes Brahms, le rapproche de moi : " La musique de Brahms est tout à fait charmante, mais je préfère la mienne. " » . (Josef Gœbbels)

« Bruckner avait la saine confiance en soi du modeste paysan. Il sut, en temps et lieu, promouvoir les causes qu'il lui tenait à cœur. » (Josef Gœbbels)

« Ce critique Hanslick a fait vivre l'enfer à Bruckner à Vienne. Lorsqu'il était devenu impossible d'ignorer ce grand compositeur, les honneurs et les distinctions ont suivi. Mais que pouvait-il en faire ? On aurait dû plutôt faciliter son activité créatrice. Au même moment, Brahms était porté aux Cieux. » (Josef Gœbbels)

À partir de là, Adolf Hitler fera tout son possible pour promouvoir la musique de Bruckner en l'engageant dans sa « vendetta » contre Vienne.

Pour Adolf Hitler et Josef Gœbbels, Anton Bruckner pouvait être considéré comme un représentant aryen :

« Comme fils du sol autrichien, Anton Bruckner est spécifiquement choisi pour représenter à notre époque l'esprit indissoluble et la communauté émotionnelle du destin qui unit la nation dans son ensemble. » (Josef Gœbbels, 6 juin 1937.)

Bruckner le provincial, comme Hitler, fut en effet rejeté par la métropole autrichienne (Vienne) et le compositeur fut considéré par les Nazis comme une victime du système juif, parce que le critique Eduard Hanslick s'était opposé à lui. Le dimanche 6 juin 1937, donc, un buste de Bruckner fut édifié dans un lieu symbolique, au « Walhalla » , près de Regensburg, en Bavière. Gœbbels proclama alors que Bruckner était le symbole de l'entière nation allemande.

Adolf Hitler had taken a special interest in Anton Bruckner ever since, as a young man, he had attended August Göllerich's « Bruckner-Festkonzerte » in Linz. Hitler and Bruckner had both spent their early years in the Linz region, they both idolized Richard Wagner, and the composer of patriotic male-voice choruses and stately Symphonies could be pressed into service to support some of the more simplistic ideas propounded by Nazi ideologues as to what German music should be : steady, serious and spiritual, but not overly chromatic or excitable. A movement from a Bruckner Symphony was played before each of Hitler's « cultural speeches » at the Nuremberg rallies ; for instance, the fugue from the 5th Symphony, a personal favourite of Hitler's, preceded the Party Congress in 1937. Bruckner was also connected, via Linz, with Hitler's frustrated dreams of becoming an architect. The 18 year old Hitler had drawn a design for a new concert-hall in Linz, and as « Führer » , he had elaborate scale-models made for the new Linz that was to be built following the War, the centre-piece of which was to be a monument on the banks of the Danube glorifying Bruckner, Hitler's parents and Horbiger's « Universal Ice Doctrine » (« Welt Eis Lehre ») : Bruckner's commemoration was, therefore, to be lumped together with a lunatic fringe pseudo-science and a dictator's personality cult. Hitler's promotion of Linz was part of a private campaign against cosmopolitan Vienna, where he had spent unhappy years as a student, and he planned to make Linz, rather than Vienna, the cultural capital of both the « Ostmark » (Austria) and the German « Reich » , even proposing to be buried there.

In the wake of the « Anschluß » , the Nazi Party assumed control of all cultural bodies in Austria, including the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (IBG) , which now became the « Deutsche Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (DBG) , conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler regrettably allowing himself to be installed as President to replace Max Auer (a Jew) . The new authorities had no difficulty in finding allies in its ranks. Alfred Orel proved assiduous in eradicating « Jewish influences » from the « Musikhochschule » , while Robert Haas seems to have been far from alone in being a Nazi.

It is all too easy to see how the supposed sacral character of Bruckner's music could lend itself to employment at the secular rituals through which the Nazi Party sought to invest itself with the status of tradition :

After the 1937 Regensburg Festival, Max Auer commented, concerning a concert given in a de-consecrated « Minorite » Church that :

« Everyone who experienced it came to the conclusion that only a mystic ecclesiastical venue is adequate for Symphonies 5 and 9. The Concert-Hall of the future “ Bruckner-Haus ” must employ sacral architecture. »

The choice of words is unfortunate. Performances of Bruckner's Symphonies, in ecclesiastical venues, can indeed be effective if the acoustics are not too reverberant (in which case, they sound dreadful, no matter how slowly the music is taken) but to state that the 5th and the 9th can only make their effect in « mystic ecclesiastical venues » is an example of the tendency to except Bruckner from ordinary considerations (those regarding textual fidelity, for instance)

In an article in the Festival Program for the Regensburg « Brucknerfest » , conductor Hans Weisbach identified a flexible interpretative approach with the pattern of un-authorized intervention, then, being detected in the 1st published editions, and argued for a broad « sacral » approach that be equated with fidelity to both the text and the composer's intentions :

« In the soul of this man, who did not take the experiences of earthly life as the inspiration for his art but sent his creative spirit to endless distances, for whom the divine miracles of the universe were transformed into sounds and into which he poured the hot blood of a human heart - in the soul of this man, music has to transform into a solemnly flowing deep river of noble “ grandeur ”. He who has not yet understood that this music has no tendency towards dramatic affect or effect can learn it from every page of the original versions ; he will also learn (to his surprise) how little variation of the basic tempo Bruckner wishes. His tempo indications do not mean to tie the interpreter down, as one so often felt, and only reluctantly followed, in those 1st editions, but to set the interpreter free, because they are in complete harmony with the nature of the music. Intimately related to the tempo (again, clearly evident from the original versions) is the treatment of phrasing indications in the strings. Especially during “ cantabile ” moments of the greatest expression, we encounter Bruckner's characteristic of omitting slurs and, instead, specifying individual bowings for each single note. By adding the comment “ lang gezogen ” (drawn-out) , he gives the conductor, as well as the players, the opportunity to realize the solemn tempo with the greatest ... »

Implication de Hans Wildermann durant le 3e « Reich »

Déjà dans les années 1920, l'artiste Hans Wildermann était devenu un ardent nationaliste et, depuis 1933, s'était lié d'amitié avec la maison d'édition musicale National-Socialiste « Gustav Bosse, Regensburg » . Il sera un acteur important dans la rédaction de l'almanach de la bibliothèque de la musique allemande (1920-1927) et aura le privilège d'avoir son propre éditorial. Auparavant (en 1923) , Wildermann avait été responsable de la quasi-totalité du graphisme pour cette maison d'édition.

En 1942, Hans Wildermann va illustrer la poésie de Dante dans le bouquin écrit par le « Duce » , Benito Mussolini : « Eine Anthologie » (Gauverlag-NS-Schlesien) . La même année, il sera honoré pour le livre de Siegmund Skraup : « Die Oper als lebendiges Theater durch die Abbildung von 35 Bühnenbildern gewürdigt. » (L'Opéra théâtral. Cartographie de 35 décors.) . En 1942, il va illustrer le « Die Schildbürger » , une publication distribuée en 63,000 exemplaires dans tous les postes militaires nazis. En 1944, pour souligner son 60e anniversaire, un hommage sera rendu à Hans Wildermann (pour ses réalisations comme scénographe - peintre de décors - , intellectuel et idéologue) par Carl Niessen dans une revue militaire sur la musique (volume I ; pages 7 à 9.) . Niessen avait été mandaté par le bureau-chef du « NSDAP » pour superviser la formation et l'éducation.

Hans Wilhelm Wildermann (geboren 21. Februar 1884 in Kalk ; gestorben 1. November 1954 in Köln) war ein deutscher Bühnenbildner, Maler und Bildhauer.

Hans Wildermann wurde als Sohn des Prokuristen Heinrich W. Wildermann und seiner Ehefrau Maria Wildermann, geborene Röhr geboren. Er besuchte zunächst Schulen in Recklinghausen und Köln und studierte dann in Düsseldorf, Berlin und München.

Ab 1907 lebte Wildermann wieder in seiner Heimatstadt, wo er unter Max Martersteig und dessen Dirigenten Otto Lohse an der Ausstattung der Kölner Bühnen sowie als Bildhauer arbeitete. Martersteig hatte Wildermanns Radierung Tor der Phantasie gesehen. Der Kontakt entstand dann über Lohses Ehefrau, in deren Salon sich die Theaterwelt aus Deutschland und anderen Ländern traf. Wildermann wirkte dann 1911 an den Opernfestspielen mit und nahm im Jahr darauf an der Kölner Sonderbund-Ausstellung teil, wo er für den Vorplatz der Ausstellungshalle am Aachener Tor die Figurengruppe « Jüngling mit Pony » sowie « Mädchen mit Reh » schuf, die später bis zum Zweiten Weltkrieg in den Grünanlagen des Deutschen Rings standen. 1912 entstand der Mülheimer Schifffahrtsbrunnen.

1912 holte ihn Johannes Maurach als Gastbühnenbildner ans Stadttheater Essen. Ein Jahr später, 1913, ging er nach München, wo er auf Paul Klee traf. Danach kam es zu Zusammenarbeiten mit dem Opernhaus Berlin, dem Nationaltheater München und dem Opernhaus Leipzig. Im August 1919 folgte Wildermann wieder Maurach, der nun Intendant an den Städtischen Bühnen Dortmund war. 1920 heiratete er dann in Berlin Erna Maria Concordia Hoheisel. Als Maurach 1922-1923 nach Nürnberg ging, folgte auch Wildermann ihm zunächst. Jedoch gelang es dem neuen Dortmunder Intendanten Karl Schäffer Wildermann nach Dortmund zurückzuholen. 1926 wechselte Hans Wildermann nach Breslau, wo er eine Professor für Theatermalerei an der Staatlichen Akademie für Kunst und Kunstgewerbe erhielt. Ab 1936 war er Leiter des Ausstattungswesens am Breslauer Opernhaus. Die Nationalsozialisten beschlagnahmten 1937 sein Triptychon « Transfiguration » und erklärten es zur entarteten Kunst.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg kehrte Hans Wildermann in seine Heimatstadt Köln zurück, wo er zuletzt in Riehl unweit des Zoologischen Gartens wohnte. Am 1. November 1954 starb er in der Universitätsklinik im Stadtteil Lindenthal. Aus seiner Ehe ging eine Tochter, Angelika, hervor.

Schon in den 1920er Jahren verband Wildermann eine tiefe Freundschaft zu dem nationalistischen und seit 1933 nationalsozialistischen Regensburger Musikbuchverleger Gustav Bosse. Dieser ließ ihn den Almanach der Deutschen Musikbücherei (1920-1927) umfänglich bebildern und widmete ihm eine eigene Verlagslinie, Hans-Wildermann-Werke, in der schon 1923 fast das gesamte graphische Werk erschienen war. Wildermann schnitt 1936 die Anton-Bruckner-Medaille der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft anlässlich der Enthüllung der Büste Anton Bruckners in der « Walhalla » am 6. Juni 1937 ; ein Auftrag, der einmal mehr von Bosse ausging. Noch 1942 illustrierte er das Buch Italienische Dichtung von Dante bis Benito Mussolini - Eine Anthologie (Gauverlag-NS-Schlesien) , wurde im gleichen Jahr mit dem Buch von Siegmund Skrap Die Oper als lebendiges Theater durch die Abbildung von 35 Bühnenbildern gewürdigt. Seine Illustrationen zu « Die Schildbürger » erschienen in der Feldpostausgabe 1942 zum 63tausendsten Mal. Zu seinem 60. Geburtstag 1944 erschien in der Zeitschrift Musik im Kriege - Organ des Amtes Musik beim Beauftragten des Führers für die Überwachung der gesamten geistigen und weltanschaulichen Schulung und Erziehung der NSDAP die Hommage von Carl Niessen Hans Wildermann als Bühnenbildner (Heft 1, Seiten 7-9) .

Hans Wildermann begann seine Karriere während der wirtschaftlich schwierigen Zeit der Weimarer Republik. Er nutzte die finanziellen Engpässe aber als Chance und setzte neue Entwicklungen aus der Malerei in der Bühnenbilderei um. Statt aufwendiger, dekorativer Kulissen verwendete er einfache Formen und erzielte gewünschte Effekte mit Farben und Beleuchtung.

Neben seiner Arbeit als Bühnenbildner arbeitete Wildermann auch stets als Bildhauer, Maler und Grafiker. Das Dortmunder Kunst- und Gewerbemuseum widmete ihm einen Platz in seiner Dauerausstellung.

Die 1933 von Doktor Ernst Scheyer, Kustos und stellvertretender Direktor des schlesischen Museums für Kunstgewerbe und Altertümer zu Breslau herausgegebene « Werkfolge » der Werke Hans Wildermanns umfasst 589 Titel. Darunter 72 Gemälde und 60 Plastiken.

1936 : Au-delà du 40e anniversaire de la mort d'Anton Bruckner (1896-1936) , Josef Gœbbels commentera l'année en ces termes :

« Nous nous sommes finalement libérés des chaînes de Versailles. » En effet, l'Allemagne était redevenue une formidable « machine de guerre » .

The strong role music played in Nazi politics may strike some as unusual ; contemporary political and cultural wars have more to do with sex and violence than with atonality and dissonance. But, in the Germany of the 1930's, music was seen as the most Sacred manifestation of what Hans Sachs, in Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » , calls « holy German art » , and the stakes were high.

Il ne faut pas oublier la filiation nostalgique de Hitler et de Bruckner à travers leur expérience comme enfant de chœur (le 1er à l'abbaye de Lambach et le second à celui de Saint-Florian) . Le futur Chancelier développa un intérêt particulier pour Bruckner lorsque, jeune homme, il assista à un « Bruckner-Festkonzerte » organisé à Linz par le proche du compositeur, August Göllerich.

Hitler's Day of German Art, Munich (1937)

« Tag Der Deutschen Kunst, München (1937) »

« Hitler's Day of German Art (1937) » provides a unique insight into the very little-known celebrations, which took place at each opening of the annual Great German Art Exhibition, from 1937 to 1944, usually during the month of July. The celebrations of the « Day of German Art » lasted 3 days and always began on a Friday. The Sunday marked the climax with the official opening of the exhibition as a large procession entitled, « 2,000 Years of German Culture » , moved through the streets of Munich. The procession illustrated German history, legends and myths and how they were linked to the 3rd « Reich » . The re-print of this rare book will be welcomed by scholars of the period as an indispensable primary source offering a valuable perspective on the formation and development of Nazi ideology.

Les liens de l'IBG (l' « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») avec le régime nazi ont précédé l' « Anschluß » de 1938. Adolf Hitler avait alors aidé la « Bruckner-Gesellschaft » dans un projet fort symbolique et politique, mais sans aucune importance pratique. En 1931, l'IBG avait demandé au Ministère bavarois de la Culture de voir un buste du compositeur Anton Bruckner être installé à l'intérieur du Panthéon du « Walhalla », une vitrine culturelle pour la promotion des héros germaniques. (Le compositeur Richard Wagner avait été intronisé au même Panthéon pan-Germanique en 1913.) Ce temple néo-dorique en marbre surplombant le Danube, inspiré du Parthénon de l'Acropole et érigé entre 1830 et 1841 par Louis Ier de Bavière, se trouve à Donaustauf, à 10 kilomètres en aval de Ratisbonne (« Regensburg »). La pétition a échoué, mais, au moment de l'achèvement de la dernière tranche de l'exhaustif ouvrage sur Bruckner amorcé par son biographe personnel August Göllerich et complété, suite à son décès, par le musicologue Max Auer, ce dernier sera en mesure d'apporter le « dernier coup de pouce nécessaire » au projet d'intronisation, lors de sa publication intégrale des volumes en 1937 :

« Le “ Führer ” et Chancelier du “ Reich ” allemand, Adolf Hitler, a enfin accédé à la demande de la Société internationale Bruckner que le buste du compositeur soit installé dans la Salle d'honneur pan-germanique du “ Walhalla ” de Ratisbonne. »

Der originale Bruckner* Erfahrungen und Erkenntnisse von Hans Weisbach, Leipzig

(* Vergleiche hierzu den Artikel von Hans Weisbach in der von der I. B. G. herausgegebenen Broschüre « Anton Bruckner - wissenschaftliche und künstlerische Betrachtungen zu den Originalfassungen » .)

In der folgenden Abhandlung soll nicht ein Eingreifen in den schwebenden Streit um die Fassungen, sondern nur eine Mitteilung persönlicher Erfahrungen und Erkenntnisse erfolgen.

Die Tatsache, daß wir jetzt von einigen Symphonien Bruckners außer den als Erstdrucke bekannten Fassungen, deren Herkunft beziehungsweise deren Herausgeber zum großen Teil nicht feststehen, die den Brucknerschen Handschriften genau entsprechenden sogenannten Originalfassungen besitzen, zwingt jeden, der sich ernsthaft mit der Darstellung der Symphonien Bruckners befaßt, seinem künstlerischen Gewissen die Frage vorzulegen, welche von den Fassungen nach seiner Meinung den schöpferischen Willen Bruckners zum Ausdruck bringt.

Es handelt sich bei der Beantwortung dieser Frage nicht um eine Sache des musikalischen Geschmacks wie etwa bei der Auswahl einer von den vielen Bearbeitungen der Beethovenschen Klaviersonaten, sondern um eine ernste und schwerwiegende Entscheidung, die zugleich ein Bekenntnis bedeutet.

Schwerwiegend deshalb, weil der Unterschied der Fassungen eben nicht in belanglosen Retuschen besteht, sondern weil er grundsätzlicher Natur ist, und zwar in so bedeutendem Maße, daß wir uns zwei in wesentlichen Zügen stark voneinander abweichenden Gestaltungen desselben Kunstwerks gegenübersehen. Schwerwiegend auch deshalb, weil ich glaube, daß unsere Generation, die vom Schicksal vor diese Entscheidung gestellt wurde, gewissermaßen die

Verantwortung dafür trägt, in welcher Form in Zukunft die Symphonien Bruckners im Geistesleben der Menschheit lebendig sein werden.

Da sich nun der Unterschied oftmals in einer tiefgehenden Verschiedenheit der musikalischen Struktur zeigt, scheidet für mich die Möglichkeit, beide Fassungen könnten die Autorschaft Bruckners in gleicher Weise für sich in Anspruch nehmen, vollkommen aus. Bruckner steht mir zu hoch, als daß ich ihm eine so indifferente künstlerische Haltung anzudichten imstande wäre, daß er heute einen in hymnischer Verzückung zur stärksten Glut des Ausdrucks sich steigernden Gesang niederschreibt, um ihn morgen so abzuändern, daß er in einem schwächlichen pp verendet (Adagio der 9. Symphonie).

Es steht für mich fest, daß nur eine von den Fassungen die richtige, den Urgestaltungswillen Bruckners darstellende sein kann.

Den einzigen Weg, um zu einer innerlich begründeten Entscheidung zu gelangen, erblicke ich darin, daß wir (unabhängig von dem Streit der Wissenschaftler) den rein künstlerisch-nachschöpferischen Standpunkt zum entscheidenden machen, daß wir gleichsam Bruckner selbst befragen, indem wir uns nach den Originalfassungen von neuem ein Bild seines Wesens, seiner Geisteskraft, seines Musikgefühls und der daraus entstandenen Klangwelt in ihren unerhörten Ausmaßen herstellen.

Es muß aber doch wohl jedem, der sich die Originalfassungen gründlich zu eigen gemacht hat, klar geworden sein, daß unsere bisherige Vorstellung von der geistigen und besonders von der klanglichen Gewalt dieser Tonsprache nicht ausgereicht hat. Dafür müßten allein schon die uns bisher vorenthaltenen Stücke der 4. und 5. Symphonie genügen. Oder soll uns zugemutet werden, auf ein noch großartigeres, kräftigeres Bild Bruckners, wie es uns die Originalfassungen offenbaren, zu verzichten zugunsten eines matteren und schwächeren ?

Wenn ich erkläre, daß ich in Zukunft die Symphonien Bruckners nie mehr anders als in den Originalfassungen aufführen werde, so geschieht das, weil ich die Überzeugung gewonnen habe, daß diese allein den ursprünglichen künstlerischen Willen Bruckners darstellen und daß sie allein vollkommen dem geistigen Gehalt und der Form- und Klangwelt seiner Werke entsprechen.

Zu dieser Überzeugung bin ich nicht dadurch gelangt, daß ich mich nach Kenntnisnahme der verschiedenen Argumente, die die Wissenschaftler für und gegen die Originalfassungen vorgebracht haben, einfach einer der streitenden Parteien angeschlossen habe, sondern es haben mich rein künstlerische Erwägungen dazu geführt, die mit dem Erscheinen der Originalfassung der 9. Symphonie begannen (also ehe von einem Streit die Rede war) und dann ihre selbstverständliche Bestätigung und Fortsetzung mit der Veröffentlichung der weiteren Originalfassungen fanden.

Der Kenntnis der Originalfassungen aber ging voraus eine fast anderthalb Jahrzehnte lange Arbeit oder (besser gesagt) ein Ringen um eine end- und vollgültige Gestaltung der Brucknerschen Symphonien. Zu den Erfahrungen, die ich mit der Aufführung dieser Werke nicht nur in vielen deutschen Städten, sondern auch vor ausländischem Publikum (Budapest, Stockholm, Kopenhagen) gemacht habe, gesellten sich die von zwei vollständigen Zyklen sämtlicher Symphonien, der letzte mit allen bisher erschienenen Originalfassungen.

(Ich erwähne das nur deshalb, weil nach meiner Ansicht eine derartig intensive Arbeit an der Darstellung Bruckners die Voraussetzung für die Berechtigung ist, seine persönliche Meinung in die Waagschale zu werfen.)

Und nun möchte ich einmal alle Dirigenten, denen die Darstellung der Brucknerschen Symphonien zur Herzenssache, wenn nicht zur Lebensaufgabe geworden ist, fragen, ob nicht auch ihnen das Erscheinen der Originalfassungen eine endgültige Befreiung von allerlei Zweifeln bedeutet hat, die sich bei jeder Aufführung immer wieder erneut einstellen und einen nie zu einer vollen Befriedigung über die eigene nachschöpferische Gestaltung kommen ließen.

Ich glaube, sie werden zugeben, daß dort, wo früher Probleme auftauchten, jetzt plötzlich absolute Klarheit, Selbstverständlichkeit und zwingende Logik des Aufbaus und Ablaufs herrscht. Denn im Gegensatz zu den durchaus nicht immer einheitlich und konsequent durchgeführten Bearbeitungen der Erst-drucke bringen die Originalfassungen den künstlerischen Willen Bruckners mit einer solchen eindeutigen Bestimmtheit zum Ausdruck, daß die Möglichkeit, diese Musik verschieden zu « deuten » oder « aufzufassen », von vornherein ausgeschaltet wird.

Und wenn wirklich nachzuweisen wäre, daß manches an den anderen Fassungen von Bruckner selbst genehmigt wurde, so kann doch niemand an der Tatsache rütteln, daß die mit den Handschriften übereinstimmenden Originalfassungen das ursprüngliche Ergebnis des eigentlichen Schaffensprozesses, das heißt die erste in die Materie des Klanges umgewandelte Form der Eingebungen, die erste, durch Skizzen allmählich gewonnene Gesamtgestaltung des geistig erschauten Kunstwerks darstellen.

Sie müssen also als Fundament für jede Interpretation gelten, um so mehr, als wir wissen, daß die vollständige Niederschrift bei Bruckner niemals in Eile geschah, sondern stets die Frucht eines lang en Reifens war.

Welche Erkenntnisse sind aus den Originalfassungen abzuleiten ?

Die Bedeutung der Originalfassungen erhöht sich für mich durch die Feststellung, daß sie unter sich die gleichen Wesenszüge tragen. Was wir in der 9. Symphonie finden, begegnet uns auch schon in der 4. oder 5. Aus der Fülle von Beispielen greife ich die Abstufung vom fff bis zum ppp heraus. Da bei Bruckner nicht nur die seelische, sondern auch die formale Gestaltung enger als bei anderen mit dem Klang verknüpft ist, ergibt eine strenge Innehaltung seiner Vorschriften -das heißt ein wahrnehmbarer Unterschied zwischen pp und ppp und zwischen ff und fff - ganz von selbst einen so natürlichen und einfachen Aufbau der Klangräume, daß alle Zutaten der Dirigenten (wie sie in den alten Erstdrucken in Form von erescendi, diminuendi, ritardandi und accelerandi in großen Mengen hinzugesetzt wurden) nicht nur überflüssig werden, sondern sogar im Gegenteil die Stileigentümlichkeit vernichten, die in einer großlinigen, gesunden und kraftvollen Entwicklung jedes musikalischen Gedankens ihren Ausdruck finden. (Allerdings ist die Voraussetzung immer das richtige Tempo.)

Auffallend ist, daß Bruckner in der 9. Symphonie noch genau wie in der 4. das fff gleichmäßig durch die ganze Partitur schreibt und kein Instrument davon ausnimmt. Wenn er diese Forderung eines ungeheuer starken, elementaren Klangerlebnisses in seinem letzten Werk genau so ausdrückt wie in seinen früheren und uns außerdem noch bei der Bearbeitung der I. Symphonie den besonders auffallenden Beweis dieser Willensrichtung gibt, indem er die in der Linzer Fassung noch anzutreffende Gepflogenheit, die Trompeten und Pauken um einen Stärkegrad schwächer zu notieren, an einigen Stellen aufgibt, um in der Wiener Fassung dafür das durchgehende ff zu verlangen (I. Satz, Buchstabe A) oder das ff durch ,ein durchgehendes fff zu ersetzen (I. Satz, 4 Takte nach Z) , so müssen wir diese Tatsache nicht nur nicht als « Unbeholfenheit » oder « Unerfahrenheit » , sondern im Gegenteil als einen ganz kategorischen Hinweis darauf werten, daß derartige Klangperioden unbedingt für den Aufbau des Ganzen erforderlich sind.

Die Erfüllung dieser Forderung aber birgt zugleich eine innere Rechtfertigung der Riesendimensionen der Symphonien in sich. Denn wir müssen sie so verstehen, daß er von dem wunderbaren Wesen, von dem unendlichen Reichtum und der Weite seines erhabenen Weltgefühls nicht anders Kunde geben konnte als durch die ruhevoll sich entwickelnde Gestaltung der vielen feinen Abstufungen vom leisesten Ahnen einer ewigen Stille bis zu überwältigenden Klangentladungen. Das klangliche Gleichgewicht der Sätze aber ist mit solchem Feingefühl abgewogen, daß jede Abschwächung des fff und jede Verstärkung des ppp eine formzerstörende Nivellierung der großartig geschauten Konturen bedeutet.

Bruckners Klangwelt

Die Originalfassungen geben uns eine ganz klare Erkenntnis von der Klangwelt Bruckners. Darunter verstehe ich das ganz besondere Klanggebilde, das er sich schaffen mußte, um seine musikalischen Ideen für andere sinnlich wahrnehmbar zu machen. Aber ebenso wie diese Ideen einmalige Geisteserzeugnisse des Genies sind, kann ihnen nur eine einzige, und zwar aus demselben Geist geborene Klangerscheinung entsprechen.

Es gibt keinen größeren Irrtum, als wenn man die Brucknersche Klangwelt in irgend eine Beziehung oder gar in ein Abhängigkeitsverhältnis zu der Richard Wagners bringt. Im Gegenteil : die schöpferische Kraft Bruckners erweist sich gerade dadurch so stark, daß er trotz der unsagbaren Verehrung, mit dem er den « Meister der Meister » geradezu anbetete, trotz des eifrigsten Bestrebens, aus den Partituren Wagners zu lernen, sich seine ureigene Klangwelt schuf, die von der Wagners ebenso weit entfernt ist wie dessen Geisteswelt von der seinigen.

Das Wesen der Klangwelt Bruckners ist das einer reinen Naturkraft, deren Aeußerungen in jeder Phase ihres Wirkens die Ruhe ihres göttlichen Ursprungs ausstrahlt, ob sie nun die atemlose Stille ewiger Fernen oder die Weihe hymnischer Gesänge oder die majestätische Gewalt eines elementaren Naturereignisses kündigt.

Die Originalfassungen aber fordern gebieterisch, dieser Klangwelt an sich größere Bedeutung zuzumessen, als das bisher geschah. Wir stehen ja überhaupt vor der merkwürdigen Tatsache, daß (wie die vielen ausgezeichneten Bücher über Bruckner beweisen) das Wesen der Brucknerschen Musik zwar geistig und theoretisch in seiner ganzen Größe und Eigenart erkannt worden ist, daß aber die Praxis damit nicht gleichen Schritt gehalten hat und nicht halten konnte, weil die Dirigenten in den vielen Bezeichnungen für Tempo und Dynamik, die sich in den Erstdrucken finden, unbedingt zu respektierenden Anweisungen Bruckners erblicken zu müssen glaubten. Nun aber lehren es die Originalfassungen anders.

Wie weit die Bearbeiter der Erstdruckfassungen sich und die ihnen ausgelieferten Dirigenten vom « wahren » Bruckner entfernt haben, erweist ein Blick auf das Scherzo der 9. Symphonie. An Stelle der huschenden, erregenden Pizzikati, durch die Bruckner offensichtlich die unheimliche Spannung bis zu dem dämonischen Einschlag des ff erzeugen will, bekommen wir fröhliche Flöten- und Fagottstakkati zu hören. Als Erklärung für eine solche Instrumentationsänderung kann man nur ein mißverständenes Tempo annehmen, und die Bearbeiter bestätigen die Richtigkeit dieser Annahme sogleich durch die Aenderung des gewaltigen Streicher-Unisono am Ende des ersten und zweiten Teiles des Scherzo. Bruckner verlangt dort von den Bässen dieselben sich aufbäumenden Achtelläufe wie von den Geigen. Die Bearbeiter müßen eine sehr geringe Meinung von der Intelligenz des Meisters gehabt haben, wenn sie ihn, nachdem er neun Symphonien geschrieben, darüber belehren zu müßen glaubten, daß man auf dem Kontrabaß solche Stellen in einem schnellen Tempo nicht spielen kann und einfach die an einem Pult spielenden Musiker sich in die Noten teilen ließen. Die praktische Auswirkung dieser Maßnahme aber ist, daß in Wirklichkeit die ganze Stelle nur von der Hälfte aller Streicher gespielt und die von Bruckner zweifellos beabsichtigte Vehemenz auf die Hälfte abgedrosselt wird. Besser hätte man getan, sich die Tempobezeichnung Bruckners genau anzusehen, die mit den sehr klaren Worten « bewegt, lebhaft » jeden Hinweis auf ein « schnelles » Tempo vermeidet.

In welchem Gegensatz dazu steht die Klangwelt, wie sie nach dem Bild, das uns die Originalfassungen vermitteln, in der Phantasie Bruckners gelebt haben muß ! Ganz einheitlich belehren uns diese darüber, daß er von den Streichinstrumenten eine Klangvorstellung hatte, deren Verwirklichung eine große Besetzung voraussetzt.

Die charakteristische Bemerkung Weingartners in einem Brief an Bruckner, ihm müße wohl die große Streicherbesetzung der Wiener Philharmoniker bei der Instrumentation der 8. Symphonie vorgeschwebt haben, könnte sich ebenso auf alle anderen Symphonien beziehen. Denn was er Geigen, Bratschen, Celli und Bässen an reinsten naturgesegneter Sinnenschönheit anvertraut, das muß in üppigster, klanggesättigter Fülle aufblühen ; und was er ihnen an feuriger Bewegtheit und flammender Kraft anvertraut, das muß mit der elementaren Wucht eines gebändigten Naturereignisses zu Klang werden.

Wir dienen also dem Kunstwerk Bruckners, wenn wir die in den Originalfassungen deutlich ausgesprochene Forderung, dem Bläserchor einen an Klangentfaltung ebenbürtigen Streichkörper entgegenzustellen, erfüllen, denn ebenso wie ein noch klingendes fff läßt sich auch ein schon klingendes ppp Tremolo nur mit einem starken Streichkörper erzielen ; besonders, wenn sich dieses aus leisestem, mystischem Schauer stetig anwachsend bis zum flimmernden Glanze hellsten Lichtes entwickeln soll, wie am Schluß der 4. Symphonie. Bemerkenswert ist hier, daß die Bearbeiter des Erstdrucks diese Stelle in den Geigen mit einer schwerfalligen Achtelbewegung beginnen lassen. Der Grund hiefür ist jedenfalls die Befürchtung, daß die Streicher bei der sehr langen Stelle ermüden. Eine starke Besetzung aber wirkt dieser natürlichen Ermüdung gegenüber ausgleichend und läßt sie weniger in Erscheinung treten.

Was nützen aber alle diese Erkenntnisse von Bruckners Klangwelt, wenn sie nicht von der richtigen Empfindung für seine Tempi begleitet sind !

Tempo und Phrasierung

Hier haben glücklicherweise die Originalfassungen wie ein reinigendes Gewitter Klarheit geschaffen.

In der Seele dieses Mannes, der nicht in Erlebnissen des irdischen Daseins Anlaß zum künstlerischen Schaffen fand, sondern seinen schöpferischen Geist in unendliche Fernen sandte, dem sich die göttlichen Wunder des Weltalls zu Klängen formten, in die er das heiße Blut seines Menschenherzens hineinströmen ließ, in der Seele dieses Mannes mußte die Musik zu einem ruhig und machtvoll hinfließenden, tiefen Strom eines erhabenen Weltgefühls werden. Wer bisher nicht erkannt hat, daß dem Wesen dieser Musik jede Tendenz zum dramatischen Affekt und Effekt fremd ist, dem sagen es die Originalfassungen auf jeder Seite und lassen ihn staunend erkennen, wie wenig Veränderungen des Grundtempos Bruckner wünscht. Seine Tempo-angaben bedeuten nicht Zwang wie bei so vielen Bezeichnungen in den Erstdrucken, denen man sich nur widerwillig fügte, sondern sie erzeugen das befreiende Gefühl eines freiwilligen und freudigen Sichunterordnens, weil sie mit dem Wesen der Musik eine vollkommene Einheit bilden. In unmittelbarem Zusammenhang mit dem Tempo steht die (wiederum in allen Originalfassungen einheitlich erkennbare) Behandlung der Phrasierungsbögen in den Streichinstrumenten. Gerade bei gesangvollen Stellen höchster Ausdruckskraft begegnen wir immer wieder der Brucknerschen Eigenart, die Bindebögen wegzulassen und jeder einzelnen Note den Nachdruck eines besonderen Bogenstrichs zu verleihen. In Verbindung mit der charakteristischen Bezeichnung « lang gezogen » erreicht er dadurch, daß nicht durch sparsame Bogeneinteilung die vollströmende Ton- und Ausdrucksgebung gehemmt wird oder (positiv ausgedrückt) , daß sowohl dem Dirigenten wie auch den Spielern die Möglichkeit gegeben wird, das ruhige Tempo mit höchstem Klang und tiefstem Ausdruck zu erfüllen.

Zugleich verrät Bruckner damit eine außerordentlich feine Kenntnis des Orchesterklanges : er weiß genau, daß trotz Fehlens der Bindebögen solche Kantilenen bei einem stark besetzten Streichkörper wie gebunden klingen. Außerdem aber ergibt sich noch eine andere - für sein Wesen sehr charakteristische Auswirkung : Alle solche Stellen bekommen einen edleren, reineren (ich möchte fast sagen) keuscheren Ausdruck.

Kürzungen

Auf die wohl am meisten umstrittene Frage der Kürzungen gibt uns Bruckner selbst eine so bündige, klare Antwort, daß diese Streitfrage damit eigentlich ein für allemal erledigt sein müßte. Es heißt Bruckner fälschen, wenn man die an Weingartner gerichteten Worte : « Bitte sehr, das Finale so wie es angezeigt ist, fest zu kürzen » , wiedergibt, ohne den nachfolgenden Satz hinzuzufügen : « denn es wäre viel zu lange und giltnurspäteren Zeiten » . Oder wenn man die Worte : « Die Tempi bitte ich ganz ad libitum abändern zu wollen » wiedergibt, ohne den Satz aus einem anderen Brief hinzuzufügen : « Bitte nur zu verfügen, wie es Ihr Orchester erfordert ; aber die Partitur bitte ich nicht zu ändern ; auch bei Drucklegung die Orchesterstimmen unverändert zu lassen, ist eine meiner innigsten Bitten. »

Noch deutlicher konnte es Bruckner nicht ausdrücken, daß er alle Freiheiten, die er dem Dirigenten einräumte (hier dürfen wir auch die auf Rat seiner Freunde von ihm gemachten oder genehmigten Änderungen einbeziehen) , nur als vorläufige gelten lassen wollte, solange es sich darum handelte, alles aus dem Wege zu räumen, was sich damals einer Aufführung seiner Werke entgegenstellen könnte. Denn die Sorge, daß seine Werke, wenn sie nicht noch zu seinen Lebzeiten aufgeführt würden, ganz der Vergessenheit anheimfallen könnten, schien angesichts der feindseligen Haltung der Presse berechtigt.

Nun ist es an uns, auf die Frage Antwort zu geben, ob wir den Anspruch erheben dürfen, die von Bruckner prophetisch geahnten « späteren Zeiten » zu sein.

Ein holländisches Buch über Bruckner Wouter

Wouter Paap : « Anton Bruckner, sein Land, sein Leben und seine Kunst. » (Die Gemeinschaft, Bilkoven 1936.)

Wouter Paap hat ein in vieler Beziehung vortreffliches Buch über Bruckner geschrieben, welches warme Empfehlung verdient. Der Verfasser war von der Absicht geleitet, eine Einleitung zu Bruckners Werk zu schreiben und als Ausgangspunkt wählte, er die Verbundenheit zwischen dem Menschen und dem Künstler Anton Bruckner. Dieser Gedanke scheint mir wichtig genug. Lange Zeit war es üblich, in dem Phänomen « Bruckner » den Menschen vom Künstler zu trennen ; von einem psychologischen Rätsel zu sprechen, wie eine derartige Musik gerade in solch einer Persönlichkeit entstehen konnte, wobei man dann Bruckners Menschlichkeit als beschränkt und lächerlich-naiv ansehen wollte. Paap betrachtet die Musik als eine Aeußerung des Menschen Bruckner und zeigt die Verbindung zwischen dieser Menschlichkeit und dem Boden, dem sie entsprossen ist : dem oberösterreichischen Land und als dessen Kern dem Barockkloster Sankt Florian. Als eine Aeußerung selbständigen Denkens ist das dritte Kapitel dieses Buches, betitelt « Der Künstler des Barock » , wohl das wertvollste, obwohl der Verfasser hier zu Ansichten gelangt, die vielleicht anfechtbar sind. Denn so wahr es auch ist, daß die Barockkunst, die Bruckners Jugend umgab, seinen Lebensstil mehr oder weniger stark beeinflussen mußte, scheint es mir doch unrichtig, sein ganzes Wesen um anderthalb Jahrhunderte zurückzusetzen. Bruckner ist doch irgendwie auch eine Erscheinung des 19. Jahrhunderts, zum Beispiel in seinen Scherzi mit ihren « romantischen » Trios ; andererseits ist das Barock als Lebensstil wesentlich raffinierter und sinnlicher als je eine musikalische Aeußerung Bruckners.

Was Paap in dieser Beziehung über die Parallelität zwischen Musik und bildenden Künsten bemerkt, fordert zu einigem Widerspruch heraus. Wenn er zum Beispiel in der Musik von Froberger bis Bach die Charakteristiken des Barockstils der bildenden Künste vermißt (Seite 55) , dann kommt dies daher, daß er sich ausschließlich auf den Klavierkomponisten beschränkt und vergißt, daß in jener Periode Meister wie Lully, Purcell, Corelli, Buxtehude gewirkt haben, deren Musik sicher in Verbindung mit jenen Aeußerungen bildender Kunst zu bringen wären, welche man in dem Sammelnamen « Barock » zusammenzufassen pflegt, einem Stil, der jedoch so verschiedenartig ist, daß man die wesentlichen Eigenschaften eher in den besonderen Charakteristiken als in der allgemeinen Kunstrichtung suchen muß.

Doch auch aus diesem Kapitel ergibt sich, daß Wouter Paap seine Monographie gründlich vorbereitet und die in Betracht kommende Hauptliteratur gründlich durchgearbeitet hat. Daher ist es zu begrüßen, daß er es verstanden hat, seine Schreibweise trotz des vielen biographischen, ästhetischen und anekdotischen Materials so packend und angenehm lesbar zu halten. Dieses Büchlein von etwa 160 Seiten enthält ungefähr alle Daten, die für eine einigermaßen gründliche Kenntnis von Bruckners Persönlichkeit nötig sind. Schade ist nur, daß dadurch die Musik selbst einigermaßen in den Hintergrund geraten ist. Wohl gibt Paap hie und da typische Beispiele von Bruckners Chorstil und seiner melodischen Schreibart. Mit Recht sieht er als Ausgangspunkt von Bruckners Kunst « Musik in ihrer elementarsten Erscheinungsform : die Melodie, das Thema » (Seite 13) . Aber man würde auf diesem Gebiete doch wohl etwas mehr Ausführlichkeit und besonders eine tiefere Charakterisierung wünschen. Doch scheint sich der Verfasser dies nicht als Aufgabe gestellt zu haben.

Auch die Daten über das Verhältnis der Außenwelt mit Beziehung zu Bruckners Musik sind mit Sorgfalt und Gefühl für das Wichtige zusammengestellt ; besonders jene Seiten, auf welchen über die Bruckner-Aufführungen in den Niederlanden gesprochen wird (Seite 137 ff.) , sind sicher von Bedeutung.

Das Eduard van Beinum gewidmete Büchlein ist mit Geschmack zusammengestellt, wenn auch die köstlichen Schattenbilder (nicht « Karikaturen » !) von Otto Böhler nicht besonders glücklich wiedergegeben sind. Eine zugehörige Literaturliste verstärkt den « einleitenden Charakter » dieser Monographie, welche in diesem Rahmen mit Ehren genannt werden darf.

VIII. BRUCKNERFEST DER INTERNATIONALEN BRUCKNER-GESELLSCHAFT AUS ANLASS DER ENTHÜLLUNG DER BRUCKNER-BÜSTE IN DER WALHALLA ZU REGENSBURG, DURCHGEFÖHRT VON DER STADT REGENSBURG, 5. BIS 7. JUNI 1937.

Festgruß

Von Professor Max Auer, Präsident der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft.

Festlich geschmückt lädt Regensburg in Gemeinschaft mit der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft zu einem Hochfest deutschen Geistes ein. Die Walhalla, von König Ludwig I. von Bayern den Schöpfern deutscher Geisteskultur geweiht, öffnet ihre Pforten einem Manne aus österreichischem Bauernblut, dem Großmeister der Tonkunst Anton Bruckner, dessen Büste nunmehr durch den Führer und Reichskanzler Adolf Hitler auf Ansuchen der Bruckner-Gesellschaft in großzügiger Weise in diesen Tempel des gesamten Deutschtums aufgenommen wird.

Eine neue, durch Not und Tod geschrittene, nach Höherem sich sehnde Menschheit hatte erwachen müssen, um Bruckners erlösender Kunst ganz teilhaftig zu werden ; erst in unseren Tagen enthüllt sich uns seine wahre, starke und herbe Größe, die seine Zeit weder erfassen noch ertrasen konnte.

Wie Bruckners Kunst dank ihrer tiefen Verwurzelung im Boden der Heimat nicht nur deutschen Raum durchstrahlt ; sondern mit ihrer universellen Kraft auch andere Völker Zu beglücken berufen ist, so sollen uns diese Tage auch ein Fest der Gesamtkultur und Völkerver-söhnung bedeuten.

Herzlichen Bruckner-Gruß allen, die zur Ehre des Meisters nach Regensburg gekommen sind !

Intronisation de Bruckner au « Walhalla »

Dimanche, le 6 juin à 11 heures - 2e Concert Gala donné au « Staatsakt » du Temple du Walhalla

Lors de la cérémonie spéciale (fort médiatisée : filmée et photographiée) dite « de Ratisbonne » (« Regensburg ») , en Bavière, qui s'est déroulée au Temple du « Walhalla » (le « Temple de la Renommée des Grands Allemands » d'inspiration néo-grecque dorique, édifié au début du XIXe siècle) dans le contexte du 8e Festival Bruckner, le Chancelier Adolf Hitler a solennellement intronisé (parmi les autres demi-Dieux de ce Panthéon) un buste de son compositeur de prédilection, Anton Bruckner, aux sons du mouvement lent de sa 8e Symphonie.

Il lui rendra solennellement hommage, debout en silence chapeau à la main au son de l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie, après avoir placé le buste du compositeur (une œuvre du sculpteur Adolf Rothenburger) sur son socle, drapé pour l'occasion avec des insignes nazis. Ce qui sera suivi du dépôt, devant le monument, d'une immense couronne de laurier (« laurea insignis » ; aussi appelée couronne triomphale ou « corona triumphalis ») entourée d'une banderole.

(Curieusement, le buste de Bruckner sera le seul à être ajouté au Panthéon du « Walhalla » durant la période du National-Socialisme.)

Étaient aussi présents :

Josef Gæbbels.

« Reichsführer SS » Heinrich Himmler.

« Reich Minister » Franz Gürtner.

« Reich » Minister Walther Darré.

Franz Ritter von Epp.

The ambassador of the German « Reich » in Vienna Franz von Papen.

The Austrian ambassador in Germany Stephan Tauschitz.

Bavarian Premier Ludwig Siebert.

La raison exacte de la tenue d'un tel événement n'est pas connu. Mais il est possible que le « Führer » voulait faire du « Maître de Saint-Florian » un précurseur culturel de l'annexion (« Anschluß ») de l'Autriche au « Reich » , qui aura lieu l'année suivante.

Pour Adolf Hitler et Josef Gœbbels, Anton Bruckner pouvait être considéré comme un représentant aryen :

« Comme fils du sol autrichien, Anton Bruckner est spécifiquement choisi pour représenter à notre époque l'esprit indissoluble et la communauté émotionnelle du destin qui unit la nation dans son ensemble. » (Josef Gœbbels, 6 juin 1937.)

At the culmination of the ceremony, Adolf Hitler personally consecrated the new bust of Bruckner by laying a laurel wreath at the foot of its pedestal. One observer characterized Hitler's gesture as « an elevated symbol of the unlimited solidarity of the “ Führer ” and the German people » . In reciprocation for the honour granted to Bruckner, Max Auer, the President of the « Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , presented Hitler with the Society's 1st « Ehrenmedaille » , describing it as « a small token of our deep gratitude for the admission of the bust of Bruckner to “ Walhalla ” » .

One observer characterized Hitler's gesture as « an elevated symbol of the unlimited solidarity of the “ Führer ” and the German people » .

Le Prélude festif pour orgue à la mémoire d'Anton Bruckner (« Festpräludium für Orgel in memoriam Anton Bruckner ») du compositeur, musicien d'église et maire de la ville de Klosterneuburg, Vinzenz Goller (1873-1943) , est interprété pour l'occasion. La pièce dure environ 4 minutes.

On assistera à des discours, des concerts et la tenue du Congrès de la « Bruckner Gesellschaft » avec, à sa tête, le musicologue Max Auer comme Président. La presse parlera alors du « grand Symphoniste allemand » .

The President of the Bruckner Society, Professor Max Auer, presented Adolf Hitler (during an act of State, on the occasion of the revelation of an Anton Bruckner bust) the Bruckner medal.

Max Auer, the Society's President, who had decried the cultural corruption of the Weimar Republic, described Bruckner's music as a « return to the pure sources » , and the search for purity formed the ideological basis for the 1st Bruckner Edition, edited by Robert Haas. That purist legacy, which rejected early printed editions of Bruckner's works as inauthentic and deemed manuscript sources the only authentic texts for the composer's music, lingers even today.

Max Auer is known to have disagreed passionately : for him, the gulf that separated the Theatre centred Wagner and the church trained Bruckner was more important than superficial resemblances. Auer must have « swallowed hard » when he heard what Gœbbels had to say at Regensburg, but, on this occasion at least, he kept his counsel.

Le chef Siegmund von Hausegger à la tête du Philharmonique de Munich interprétera, pour la circonstance, le magnifique Adagio de la 7e Symphonie, des extraits de l'imposante 8e, la 3e Symphonie dédiée à Richard Wagner, au complet, de même que l'Ouverture en sol mineur de 1862-1863, éditée de manière posthume en 1921.

L'artiste-sculpteur Hans Wildermann (choisi par ses patrons nazis, en 1936) dévoilera, lors de cette cérémonie, la « Ire Médaille de la Société internationale Bruckner » (« Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft Ehrenmedaille ») . Elle sera remise par Max Auer (le Président en titre de la Société) à Adolf Hitler comme un « humble témoignage de notre profonde gratitude pour l'intronisation du buste d'Anton Bruckner au “ Walhalla ” » .

(According to Frederic Spotts' « Hitler and the Power of Aesthetics » , Adolf Hitler compared the 7th Symphony of Anton Bruckner favorably with Beethoven's 9th Symphony. A recording of the Adagio was played before the official radio announcement of the German defeat at Stalingrad, on 31 January 1943, and before Admiral Karl Dönitz announced Hitler's death on Radio Berlin, on 1 May 1945 ; a recording by Wilhelm Furtwängler was used.)

Josef Gœbbels stresses the « Wagnerian » element in Bruckner. Bruckner's discovery of Wagner's music-dramas, he asserts, caused a total personal and artistic revolution :

« From that moment onwards, the church musician, at once, retreats almost entirely, and out of him emerges the distinctive Symphonist. »

In his speech, Gœbbels declared that since Bruckner's Symphonies were a precious national legacy, the « Bruckner Gesellschaft » would, henceforth, receive an annual contribution to fund the editing of the « original versions » .

Gœbbels not only offered financial support to the « Gesamtausgabe » , he also granted it Adolf Hitler's imprimatur :

« The “ Führer ” and his government consider it their honourable duty to do all that is within their power to permit the whole German people to receive this (Bruckner's) fortunate legacy and, by means of a large-scale promotion of Bruckner cultivation, assist its effects to penetrate not only deeply, but broadly. On these grounds, they have decided to make a substantial annual contribution to the “ Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft ” for the editing of the original versions of his Symphonies until the complete works of the Master are produced in the form he envisioned. »

A remarkable line from Josef Gœbbels's speech promised a « considerable annual contribution to the International Bruckner Society for editions of the original versions of his Symphonies, until the Master's complete works are available in the form he envisioned » . Gœbbels, the politician, sounds strangely like a musicologist. But if Bruckner was to assume an oracle-like status for the new Nazi religion, the scores to his Symphonies were the Sacred texts, and the clear implication was that these texts had been corrupted by outside Jewish influences.

In a speech at the ceremonial unveiling, Josef Gœbbels declared his Party's financial support to the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (IBG) for their publication of the « original versions » of Bruckner's Symphonies. Gœbbels' intervention seemed to have put an end to concerns about the reception of Bruckner's music, including the copyright dispute. With the « Anschluß » the following year, the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » was increasingly politicized in favor of the Nazi government, which, at the same time, facilitated the « Gesamtausgabe » . In 1938, the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » (MWV) was transferred to Leipzig.

You can see from this new angle that a small male choir (boys and men) was positioned not far from the « Führer » . (Gilles)

Thanks Gilles,

I have wanted to know exactly where within the temple the ceremony took place. Due to the temple's symmetry, it was hard to determine. But this photo makes it clear.

Thanks again !!!

Zur Enthüllung der Büste Anton Bruckners in der Walhalla am 6. Juni 1937

Ich und mein Magnum

Niemals zuvor aber und niemals danach wurde die Aufnahme einer neuen Walhalla Büste so sehr zum politischen Instrument vergewaltigt wie im Fall Bruckners 1937. Mit ihr wurde symbolisch schon der « Anschluß » Österreichs vorweggenommen, der ja de facto erst ein Dreivierteljahr später stattfinden sollte. Am Samstag, dem 5. Juni, dem Tag vor der Zeremonie, porträtierte der Völkische Beobachter den österreichischen Komponisten :
