

L'antisémisme

Dans toute l'histoire de la chrétienté, ou de l'Europe, et jusqu'au XXe siècle non compris, le sentiment anti-juif et les persécutions et discriminations qui s'ensuivirent furent le fait de l'anti-judaïsme chrétien, même si l'antisémisme de Voltaire n'est pas de source chrétienne. Cependant, selon Hannah Arendt, au XVIIIe siècle, les hommes des Lumières, à l'exception de Denis Diderot, méprisent les Juifs comme trop attachés à leur religion, alors qu'ils sont mieux considérés par les conservateurs :

« Les hommes des Lumières qui préparèrent la Révolution française méprisaient tout naturellement les Juifs : ils voyaient en eux les survivants de l'obscurantisme médiéval, les odieux agents financiers de l'aristocratie. Leurs seuls défenseurs déclarés en France furent les écrivains conservateurs qui dénoncèrent l'hostilité envers les Juifs comme “ l'une des thèses favorites du XVIIIe siècle ” » (J. de Maistre) - Hannah Arendt, Sur l'antisémisme, Calmann-Lévy (1973) , page 110.

L'antisémisme n'était pas un sentiment général dans les milieux intellectuels du XIXe siècle comme on le voit notamment avec Friedrich Nietzsche qui écrit :

« Or, les juifs sont sans aucun doute la race la plus forte, la plus résistante, et la plus pure qui existe actuellement, ils savent s'imposer grâce à certaines vertus dont on aimerait faire des vices, grâce surtout à une foi résolue. C'est un fait que les juifs, s'ils le voulaient, pourraient dès maintenant exercer leur prépondérance et même littéralement leur domination sur l'Europe, c'est un fait qu'ils n'y travaillent pas et ne font pas de projet en ce sens. Ils aspirent à s'établir enfin quelque part où ils soient tolérés et respectés. »

Cet anti-judaïsme doit être distingué de l'antisémisme moderne qui va s'exacerbant avec la crise des États-nations, et qui pointe avec l'affaire Dreyfus en France, les théories de Houston Stewart Chamberlain en Allemagne et qui va exploser en racisme avec le Nazisme exterminateur (voir pour cette histoire et la périodisation des différentes formes de persécutions anti-juives, de Raul Hilberg : « L'extermination des Juifs d'Europe ») .

Dans le monde moderne, avec le développement des grands États européens, certains banquiers Juifs comme les frères Péreire ou la dynastie des Rothschild ont joué un rôle important dans le financement du développement industriel et de grands projets nationaux (chemins de fer) . Cette place est assortie de privilèges, comme l'anoblissement, qui fait que, d'une part, les Juifs privilégiés sont en quelque sorte des hors-caste, sans que cela soit vu comme une marque d'exclusion (mais ces privilèges n'en suscitent pas moins les jalousies) , d'autre part, ces Juifs privilégiés seront eux-mêmes défavorables à l'extension de leurs privilèges à ceux des Juifs qui pâtissent de ces mesures gouvernementales discriminatoires. Dans l'ensemble, les Juifs riches bénéficient de cette manière d'une protection politique (ce qui est fréquent dans leur histoire, comme on le voit au début de l'Islam qui protégea les Juifs et en fit des administrateurs) , qu'il s'agisse des Juifs de Cour, ou de certains financiers du XIXe siècle. Par exemple, Bismarck, qui tenait des propos antisémites dans sa jeunesse, y renoncera plus tard. Par la suite, des antisémites l'accuseront d'être à la solde des Juifs.

Il apparaît ainsi que le développement de l'Europe, déjà tributaire de leur culture et de leur religion, fut tributaire de la puissance financière des Juifs les plus riches ; mais, comme le remarque Hannah Arendt, cette puissance s'accompagne d'une grande réticence à s'engager dans les événements du monde, contrairement à ce que diront les antisémites par la suite, avec la théorie du complot juif. Outre le rôle financier des Juifs dans l'Europe moderne, il faut remarquer que, du fait de leur présence dans tous les pays d'Europe, les Juifs furent une communauté internationale, par opposition à la montée en puissance de l'isolement nationaliste des autres peuples. Pour Diderot, un des rares philosophes des Lumières à ne pas détester les Juifs : ceux-ci sont, selon lui, le ciment indispensable des nations européennes. Les Juifs étaient, en effet, parfois considérés comme les financiers des aristocrates ; des socialistes du XIXe siècle, adhérant à l'antisémitisme, reprendront un argument similaire. Selon Hannah Arendt, encore, la gauche est majoritairement antisémite jusqu'à l'Affaire Dreyfus, où, par opposition aux cléricaux majoritairement anti-dreyfusards, elle défendra Dreyfus :

« Les cléricaux se trouvant dans le camp antisémite, les socialistes français se déclarèrent finalement contre la propagande antisémite au moment de l'affaire Dreyfus. Jusque-là, les mouvements de gauche français du XIXe siècle avaient été ouvertement antisémites. » (Hannah Arendt. « Sur l'antisémitisme », Calmann-Lévy, 1973 ; page 111.)

C'est vers cette époque que débute le mouvement d'émancipation des Juifs d'Europe et au début du XIXe siècle. Dans certains pays, ils obtiennent l'égalité des droits, parce que la notion de citoyenneté est jugée plus importante et plus universelle que la question de savoir si un individu est juif ou non.

Mais ce caractère international fut interprété également dans le sens d'un complot (dont la famille Rothschild, installée en France, en Autriche, en Angleterre, aurait été le symbole), alors qu'il est lié, en réalité, à la plus grande importance chez les Juifs de la famille par rapport à la nation. Aussi, les antisémites ont-ils projeté sur les Juifs des catégories de pensée qui sont étrangères à ces derniers.

Par la suite, au cours du XIXe siècle, l'influence financière des Juifs diminue fortement, et c'est à ce moment de leur histoire où les Juifs ne sont presque plus influents économiquement en ce qui concerne les affaires politiques, que naîtra cette haine virulente les accusant d'intentions qu'ils n'ont jamais réalisées quand ils l'auraient pu, et qu'ils n'étaient de fait plus capables de réaliser, même au cas où ils l'auraient voulu. En revanche, c'est à ce moment que les Juifs obtiennent des postes en nombre plus importants, dans l'administration par exemple, ce qui sera encore une fois jugé comme une menace (France enjuivée). Ces accusations ne sont pas seulement des contre-vérités économiques et politiques, mais elles ignorent également cette tendance fréquente chez les Juifs à l'assimilation, à la dissolution même de la communauté juive d'un pays, tendance freinée soit par un regain d'hostilité à leur égard, soit par une politique d'État visant à conserver le statut de Juif, eu égard à son utilité indiquée plus haut. Paradoxalement, on reproche aux Juifs leur particularité, leur « isolement social ». Et on les réprime lorsqu'ils entament des processus d'ouverture, d'assimilation à la société environnante. Au moment où l'antisémitisme explose en Europe et s'organise (vers 1870, après plusieurs vagues au cours du XIXe siècle) , les Juifs n'ont donc plus la même importance, et l'existence même de l'identité juive est en passe de disparaître, sans que la cause en soit une volonté délibérée de détruire leur culture.

L'organisation de l'antisémitisme commence donc dans les années 1870-1880. En Grande-Bretagne, l'afflux des réfugiés juifs originaires de Russie, où se multiplient les pogroms durant les années 1880, finit par provoquer des émeutes antisémites à Londres, cependant isolées et réprimées par la police. En Allemagne, les propos antisémites commencent à avoir du succès avec Adolf Stöcker, et avec Georg Ritter von Schönerer en Autriche, où la virulence de l'antisémitisme est plus grande du fait de l'opposition de la communauté allemande alors prépondérante contre l'État : le pan-germanisme y est particulièrement exacerbé, et les Juifs sont, on l'a vu, associés à l'État dans ce genre de propagande (le mouvement autrichien apparaît ainsi comme la véritable préfiguration du Nazisme) .

Un trait caractéristique de l'antisémitisme, à ce moment de son histoire, est son caractère supra-national, ce qui peut apparaître paradoxal. Le fait est cependant que les Partis antisémites allemands et autrichiens se présentant comme des Partis au-dessus des Partis (donc, des Partis qui ont vocation à contrôler totalement l'État, à incarner la nation) , se réunissent en congrès internationaux, et c'est à ce niveau qu'ils ont l'ambition de lutter contre les Juifs, qui sont alors le seul élément de dimension européenne. En somme, les antisémites imitent les Juifs tels qu'ils les imaginent, et projettent de prendre le pouvoir occulte qu'ils leur attribuent.

L'agitation antisémite n'est toutefois pas durable, et il n'y a pas d'intensification constante de cette idéologie jusqu'à l'avènement du Nazisme. Ainsi Stefan Zweig nota-t-il que la période 1900-1920 sembla un âge d'or pour les Juifs, au point que les précédentes agitations contre ces derniers ne semblaient plus qu'un mauvais souvenir.

Le 1er coup d'arrêt à l'antisémitisme en France fut la réaction à l'affaire Dreyfus (1894 à 1906) . L'Empire russe, lui, connaissait des vagues de pogroms successives, persécutions qui provoquèrent en réaction l'idée du projet sioniste créé par le journaliste, écrivain et homme politique Theodor Herzl afin de faire accéder les Juifs au rang de peuple politique, susceptibles enfin de bénéficier des mêmes droits politiques que tout autre peuple ou nation se donnant son organisation politique, ainsi que des Droits de l'homme que les États européens qui abritaient les Juifs durant la période nazie, n'avaient pas convoqués ni su faire jouer pour les protéger des persécutions du Nazisme. On lira à ce propos, avec intérêt, les analyses de Hannah Arendt, soulignant l'absence de contenu de la notion de « Droits de l'homme » en l'absence d'un État pour les faire valoir et les appliquer à une nation donnée. Avec les persécutions nazies, les Droits de l'Homme sont, en effet, apparus après-coup, comme étant équivalents aux « droits des peuples » dans le système de l'État-nation. Les peuples sans État (celui de leur nation) se trouvèrent là, démunis, privés de tous droits, et leurs droits, en tant qu'« hommes » n'étaient garantis par aucune institution. (« L'impérialisme » , Fayard, 1982.)

Des écrivains ont vivement pratiqué et encouragé l'antisémitisme : Charles Maurras, les Frères Goncourt, Édouard Drumont avec son pamphlet « La France juive » (1886) , Brasillach, Céline à l'époque où l'Europe sombra dans le fascisme. Charles Maurras donna à ses écrits une forme doctrinale, qui s'est développée dans le courant de l'Action française, entre 1899 et 1939, et fut condamnée à 2 reprises par le Vatican (en 1914 et en 1926) . Cette doctrine rejetait les racines juives du christianisme. Mais, à l'inverse d'autres écrivains, parfois catholiques comme Léon Bloy, soutiennent le rôle historique et religieux du peuple juif et sa qualité. Bloy écrit dans ses mémoires « quelques-unes des plus nobles âmes que j'ai rencontrées étaient des âmes juives. La sainteté est inhérente à ce peuple exceptionnel, unique et impérissable » .

Historiquement, de nombreux motifs ont été utilisés pour justifier, perpétuer ou susciter l'antisémitisme, incluant des éléments sociaux, économiques, nationaux, politiques, raciaux et religieux. Notamment :

La théologie chrétienne du « Vetus Israël / Verus Israël » (ancien Israël contre véritable Israël) développée par Augustin d'Hippone au IV^e siècle. Selon elle, le peuple chrétien serait désormais le véritable peuple de l'Alliance, car Dieu se serait détourné des Juifs. De ce fait, le judaïsme serait condamné à disparaître et les Juifs à se convertir. Cette position théologique se nomme le super-sessionisme ou théologie de la substitution. Elle a contribué à l'anti-judaïsme chrétien, lien qui a été mis en évidence lors de la conférence de Seelisberg (1947) et que Jules Isaac appelait l'Enseignement du mépris, pouvant conduire à des persécutions et des conversions forcées se résolvant, dans le meilleur des cas, dans le marranisme. D'après Yeshayahou Leibowitz, seul cet enseignement du mépris, inhérent selon lui au messianisme chrétien du sauveur dégageant l'homme du « joug de la Torah et des mitsvot » , explique que les populations et les élites dirigeantes européennes aient laissé faire et souvent réalisé elles-mêmes l'assassinat des Juifs d'Europe pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

La « limpieza de sangre » (pureté du sang) qui se développe en Espagne après le décret de l'Alhambra (1492) et l'expulsion des Juifs. Pour obtenir certaines charges honorifiques, exercer certaines professions, entrer dans certains ordres religieux, il est nécessaire de prouver qu'aucun ancêtre n'était juif ou musulman : la « Reconquista » terminée, Grenade prise, il s'agit à présent de reconstruire l'identité nationale. Ce statut n'est progressivement adopté par les archevêchés que dès la fin des années 1520. En pratique, la « limpieza » est reconnue à un seuil de 3 générations ; au-delà, il est quasi-certain que l'ancêtre ait du sang juif ou musulman, étant donné le métissage de l'Espagne médiévale. La reconnaissance de la « limpieza de sangre » se fait par enquête de l'Inquisition, sur dénonciation : enquête par définition longue, et coûteuse. Ainsi, qui sort de ce filet se trouve lavé de tout soupçon, mais généralement ruiné.

À la fin du XIX^e siècle, 2 documents fallacieux apparaissent à quelques années de distance. D'une part, le prêtre Pranaitis publie « Le Talmud démasqué » (1892) , ouvrage rempli de fausses citations du Talmud et destiné à faire croire à une volonté meurtrière des juifs contre les chrétiens. Pranaitis sera confondu lors de l'affaire Beilis mais son livre continuera à être diffusé. D'autre part, moins de 10 ans plus tard, la théorie du complot juif international est diffusée principalement par « Les Protocoles des Sages de Sion » (1901) , un faux fabriqué par Matvei Golovinski pour le compte de la police secrète de la Russie tsariste (l' « Okhrana ») . Les Protocoles sont un pamphlet qui décrit les prétendus plans de conquête du monde par les Juifs. Ce faux fut utilisé par les Nazis comme instrument de propagande et figurent en bonne place parmi les prétextes invoqués pour justifier la persécution des Juifs et leur extermination, la Shoah. Ce faux a été réactualisé ces dernières années en forme de série télévisée, et diffusée dans quelques chaînes diffusant en langue arabe. Il a été, de facto, censuré par la plupart des pays arabes pour son contenu inapproprié. Il est de nouveau édité en Russie et en Ukraine.

L'Église catholique romaine, par la déclaration « Nostra Ætate » de 1965, le discours de Jean-Paul II à la grande synagogue de Rome, en 1986, puis lors des repentances de la fin du II^e millénaire, a finalement reconnu avoir véhiculé dans l'Histoire un discours et une culture anti-judaïques, illustrés entre autres par l'expression de « peuple déicide » ou la mention des « Juifs perfides », restée dans la prière du Vendredi Saint jusqu'aux réformes du Concile Vatican II sous les papes Jean XXIII et de Paul VI.

...

Anti-Semitism is a starting place for trying to understand the tragedy that would befall countless numbers of people during the Holocaust.

Throughout history, Jews have faced prejudice and discrimination, known as anti-Semitism. Driven nearly 2,000 years ago by the Romans from the land now called Israel, they spread throughout the globe and tried to retain their unique beliefs and culture while living as a minority. In some countries, Jews were welcomed, and they enjoyed long periods of peace with their neighbors. In European societies, where the population was primarily Christian, Jews found themselves increasingly isolated as outsiders. Jews do not share the Christian belief that Jesus is the Son of God, and many Christians considered this refusal to accept Jesus' divinity as arrogant. For centuries, the Church taught that Jews were responsible for Jesus' death, not recognizing, as most historians do today, that Jesus was executed by the Roman government because officials viewed him as a political threat to their rule. Added to religious conflicts were economic ones. Rulers placed restrictions on Jews, barring them from holding certain jobs and from owning land.

At the same time, since the early Church did not permit usury (lending money at interest), Jews came to fill the vital (but unpopular) role of money-lenders for the Christian majority. In more desperate times, Jews became scapegoats for many problems people suffered. For example, they were blamed for causing the « Black Death », the plague that killed thousands of people throughout Europe during the Middle-Ages. In Spain, in the 1400's, Jews were forced to convert to Christianity, leave the country, or be executed. In Russia and Poland, in the late- 1800's, the government organized or did not prevent violent attacks on Jewish neighborhoods, called pogroms, in which mobs murdered Jews and looted their homes and stores.

As ideas of political equality and freedom spread in Western Europe during the 1800's, Jews became almost equal citizens under the law. At the same time, however, new forms of anti-Semitism emerged. European leaders who wanted to establish colonies in Africa and Asia argued that whites were superior to other races and, therefore, had to spread and take-over the « weaker » and « less civilized » races. Some writers applied this argument to Jews, too, mistakenly defining Jews as a race of people called Semites who shared common blood and physical features.

This kind of racial anti-Semitism meant that Jews remained Jews, by race, even if they converted to Christianity. Some politicians began using the idea of racial superiority in their campaigns as a way to get votes. Karl Lueger (1844-1910) was one such politician. He became Mayor of Vienna, Austria, at the end of the 19th Century, through the use of anti-Semitism - he appealed to voters by blaming Jews for bad economic times. Lueger was a hero to a young man named Adolf Hitler, who was born in Austria, in 1889. Hitler's ideas, including his views of Jews, were shaped during the years he lived in Vienna, where he studied Lueger's tactics and the anti-Semitic newspapers and pamphlets that multiplied during Lueger's long rule.

Key-Dates

1890's : A concocted Jewish Conspiracy.

In France, a member of the Russian secret police concocts the « Protocols of the Elders of Zion ». The Protocols promote claims that there exists a Jewish conspiracy to take-over the world. These forged documents are presented as the minutes of a supposed meeting of world Jewish leaders in which they finalized plans to dominate the world, and suggest that Jews have formed secret organizations and agencies through which they aim to control and manipulate political parties, the economy, the press, and public opinion. The Protocols are published in countries throughout the world, including the United States, and used by antisemites to re-inforce claims of a Jewish conspiracy. In the 1920's and 1930's, the Protocols are used to gain support for Nazi Party anti-Semitic ideology and policies.

1894 : The Dreyfus Affair Divides France.

Captain Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish officer in the French army, is arrested and falsely accused of handing over to Germany documents involving the national defense of France. After a summary trial before a military Court, Dreyfus is found guilty of treason and sentenced to life imprisonment on Devil's Island, located off the coast of French Guiana. This case divides the French nation into 2 opposing groups : those who insist that Dreyfus is guilty (conservatives, nationalists, and anti-Semitic groups) , and those who insist that Dreyfus should receive a fair trial (Liberals and intellectuals) . In 1899, Dreyfus receives a new trial, but is again found guilty by a military Court. However, the president of the French Republic intervenes, granting him a pardon. Shortly before World War I, Dreyfus is fully vindicated by a civilian Court. The controversy surrounding the Dreyfus affair reflects latent anti-Semitism in the French officer corps and other conservative French groups.

April 1897 : Karl Lueger, anti-Semitic Mayor of Vienna.

Karl Lueger is elected mayor of Vienna. He holds this position for 13 years, until his death in 1910. Lueger, co-founder of the Christian-Socialist Party, uses economic anti-Semitism to gain support from the small businessmen and artisans who are suffering after the surge of capitalism during the industrial revolution in Austria. He claims that Jews have a monopoly on capitalism and that they, thus, compete unfairly in the economic arena. This form of anti-Semitism is used by other Right-wing Parties in Austria and Germany in the early 20th Century as a means to broaden their popular appeal. Adolf Hitler, a resident of Vienna during Lueger's mayoral reign, is greatly influenced both by Lueger's anti-Semitism and by his ability to rally public support. Lueger's ideas are reflected in the Nazi Party platform in 1920's Germany.

Le mouvement « völkisch »

Le mouvement « völkisch » est un courant intellectuel et politique de la Révolution conservatrice apparu en Allemagne à la fin du XIXe siècle et au début du XXe siècle, héritée des « Teutomanes », pour désigner un entrelacs de personnalités, et de conglomérat d'associations, dont l'élément commun est le projet de donner à l'ensemble des Allemands une spiritualité païenne, en général le paganisme germanique.

Ce courant d'idées puise ses sources dans le Romantisme allemand des années 1840 et dans les désillusions de la période 1849-1862, entre l'écrasement du printemps des peuples et l'arrivée de Bismarck au pouvoir en Prusse.

Important par le nombre de groupuscules, mais peu par celui de ses adhérents, et de par les évolutions sociétales, le mouvement idéologique s'est trouvé face à de nouveaux problèmes lui imposant une nouvelle définition.

Pour les uns, le courant « völkisch » découle d'une vocation raciste permanente, lié aux apports de la biologie et du « darwinisme social ». Pour d'autres, il représente un courant foncièrement antisémite, ravivant un passé germanique largement mythique soit occultiste et luttant contre le christianisme, et plus généralement contre les monothéismes.

« Völkisch », terme difficilement traduisible en français, peut revêtir plusieurs significations ; en allemand aussi, le terme « Volk » revêt plusieurs significations : la nation, le peuple, dans un sens ethnique. En droit, ce mot désigne « le peuple », au sens du détenteur de la souveraineté au sein de l'État (« Dem Deutschen Volke », Au peuple allemand, est inscrit au frontispice du « Reichstag » à Berlin) . Enfin, « Volk » peut aussi dire le contraire de monarchique ou de capitaliste, tous les citoyens, par exemple dans les expressions de « Volksstaat » pour « République » (« Volksstaat » Hessen, de 1919 à 1933) ou de « Volksarmee » pour les forces armées de la République démocratique allemande.

Au XIXe siècle, le terme « völkisch » met l'accent (entre autres, par le mouvement « völkisch ») sur le caractère spécifique, exceptionnel, mystique du peuple allemand et le maintien de ses traditions. C'est ensuite l'affirmation de l'idée et du concept de race, de la supériorité des germaniques, unis par des liens de sang, de langue et de culture.

Les termes « völkisch » et « Volk » partagent en commun une racine : le terme « Volk », qui renvoie au terme français de « Peuple ». Le « Volk » ne renvoie pas uniquement à une population donnée, mais aussi, pour les théoriciens de la nation allemande au XIXe siècle, à quelque chose de plus abstrait, un intermédiaire entre les individus et une entité supérieure : pour certains, la nature (perçue comme spécifique à un espace donnée, vivante et spontanée) ; pour d'autres, l'univers.

Le « Volk » est non seulement inscrit dans un cadre précis, la nature et ses manifestations, mais aussi dans une histoire longue et mythifiée. Ainsi, le « Volk » est une entité historique oubliée, qui resurgit à la faveur de la Révolution française : est ainsi idéalisé le « Volk » médiéval, tel que le perçoivent les Romantiques allemands. Pour tous les penseurs du « Volk », l'enracinement de celui-ci à un paysage, à un pays, constitue l'un des piliers du « Volkgeist », notion difficilement traduisible, mais qui rend indissociable l'histoire, le territoire, l'architecture et le paysage (ou la nature) dans une totalité indivisible.

De plus, le « Volk » est un tout unique, une communauté immuable que les évolutions de la société dans les années 1860 désorganisent et disloquent. Ainsi, pour Paul de Lagarde, les agents de division de la nation allemande sont les Libéraux et les Juifs : les uns car ils sont favorables à la liberté de circulation ; les autres car ils forment précisément un « Volk » uni, qui tend à diriger les autres nations et sont les propagateurs du Libéralisme, mais des Juifs peuvent individuellement être détachés de ce « Volk » et intégrés dans la communauté germanique. Au fil des réflexions sur le « Volk », les penseurs « völkisch » développent un antisémitisme de plus en plus virulent : Lagarde, par exemple, voit dans le peuple juif un autre « Volk », puis, à partir de 1873, souhaite exterminer les Juifs comme on extermine de la « vermine » et des « bacilles » contagieux.

Face aux évolutions politiques et économiques de l'Allemagne du dernier tiers du XIXe siècle, un certain nombre de penseurs se réfugient dans la nostalgie d'un passé mythifié et magnifié. Ces penseurs tentent de ressusciter un moment historique dans lequel le « Volk » était uni et non divisé en multiples catégories sociales. Ainsi, l'Empire allemand ne répond pas à ces attentes, car il n'est pas tourné vers le retour aux espaces ruraux, mais s'oriente vers l'industrialisation et ses corollaires économiques et sociaux.

Mais surtout, les conditions de l'Unité, qui contrairement à 1848, n'a pas été l'occasion de grands élans populaires, déçoivent fondamentalement les précurseurs du « Volk ». Ainsi, dans les débuts de l'Empire, Paul de Lagarde s'en prend constamment aux fondements de l'État nouvellement unifié. Il ne cesse de se proclamer le principal adversaire de Bismarck, qu'il accuse d'avoir mis en place une petite-Allemagne atrophiée, qui ne peut ainsi réaliser son destin, la conquête de la « Mitteleuropa », définie comme l'Empire d'Autriche ; en outre, conservateur, Lagarde s'oppose à la forme institutionnelle prise par le nouveau « Reich », essentiellement la mise en place d'une forme de parlementarisme. De plus, dans son obsession de retour aux origines du « Volk », Lagarde s'oppose aux Libéraux, perçus par les conservateurs dont il fait partie, comme des fauteurs de troubles. Les Libéraux sont, en effet, ceux par lesquels les conflits arrivent, qui remettent en cause l'unité et l'esprit du « Volk ».

Mais les réserves de Lagarde ne sont pas celles de la génération suivante, qui analyse le « Reich », une fois Bismarck parti, comme une république avec une tête couronnée ; il appelle donc de ses vœux la création d'une pompe impériale, avec la création d'un Empereur secret, doté des attributs à la fois de Martin Luther, qui serait à la fois législateur éclairé et « Führer » du peuple, mais qui ne serait, en aucun cas, un représentant de la dynastie prussienne.

Le mouvement « völkisch » se dote très tôt d'une série d'idées et de penseurs, et forme ainsi une nébuleuse intellectuelle très active dès les années 1860. De ce fourmillement d'idées, certaines lignes de forces se dégagent.

Tout d'abord, un certain intérêt pour la genèse de l'Allemagne et des Allemands, donc pour l'histoire se fait jour. Ainsi, dès la phase finale de l'unification allemande (1867-1871), les anciens Germains décrits par Tacite, puis les Goths par leur activité, sont magnifiés, car ils représentent, les uns, les « Allemands de leur jeunesse », les autres, une valeur absolue, car, par leurs victoires, liées à leur vitalité, ils accélèrent la chute de Rome. Ainsi, le « Volk » allemand se trouve le dépositaire, par ces racines, de toute l'énergie de ces peuples disparus.

Ensuite, les penseurs « völkisch », obsédés par les racines du « Volk » germanique, défendaient l'idée de pureté de la race germanique ; dans un contexte scientifique marqué par le développement de l'anthropologie et de la philologie, certains penseurs « völkisch » déterminent non seulement un certain nombre de traits physiques communs à tous les peuples partageant des racines germaniques, mais aussi insistent sur les liens de parenté entre certaines langues, donc entre certains peuples, plongeant eux aussi leurs racines dans le terreau germanique. Mais cette pureté n'est pas seulement avérée par l'étude de la philologie ou de l'anthropologie, elle est aussi avérée par certains par des critères de pureté de la race : pour Max Müller, les populations européennes de langues germaniques sont les descendants directs des populations aryennes qui ont essaimé depuis l'Inde ; dans la lignée d'Arthur de Gobineau, les penseurs « völkisch » défendent la nécessité de pureté de la race, sous peine de disparition.

Un certain nombre de penseurs « völkisch », dans la lignée du courant Romantique, magnifie le passé médiéval de l'Allemagne, et s'intéresse à l'histoire allemande. Pour Julius Langbehn, le modèle impérial allemand reste celui incarné par les Hohenstaufen, dont les Hohenzollern ne sont que la triste et pâle copie.

Cette exigence de pureté de la race germanique trouve son prolongement logique dans le développement de différentes formes d'antisémitisme. L'existence de ces différentes formes illustrent les différentes conceptions de la figure du Juif qui sont présentes au sein du mouvement « völkisch ». Dès le départ, le Juif, habitant mystérieux d'un ghetto fantasmé, est perçu comme un élément étranger au « Volk » ; il peut être appréhendé comme un déraciné, donc privé des hautes-qualités morales permises par l'intimité du lien entre le « Volk » et son territoire, ou bien comme un acteur entreprenant de complots ourdis contre les non-Juifs.

Dans les années 1850, la littérature populaire présente le Juif comme un archétype caractérisé par l'avarice, l'ambition, l'envie, la laideur et l'absence d'humanité : il ne peut donc connaître l'ascension sociale que s'il s'appuie sur des procédés déloyaux, et l'oppose à l'Allemand (ou au chrétien), membre d'un « Volk », droit et honnête, qui finit par triompher du malhonnête par sa droiture et sa grandeur d'âme. Dans le cadre de cette opposition, la question juive n'est plus, pour les membres des courants « völkisch », seulement une question de race ou de religion, mais aussi une question d'éthique.

Pour Julius Langbehn, les Juifs sont des représentants d'un « Volk » étranger, que le « Volk » allemand ne peut assimiler (à l'image d'une « pomme qui ne peut se transformer en prune ») qu'il divise en 2 catégories : les Juifs orthodoxes et les Juifs assimilés. La 1^{re} est acceptée, car elle n'a pas répudié sa spécificité et les traits qui rendent ses membres parties d'un « Volk » spécifique ; la seconde, les Juifs assimilés, doivent par contre être exterminés, comme un « I ». Cette approche eschatologique, qui voit dans l'extermination d'éléments étrangers au « Volk » une étape vers la réalisation d'un projet national allemand à l'échelle du continent, se place ainsi dans une perspective de régénération du « Volk » allemand, par la victoire remportée par une conception du monde sur une autre conception du monde.

Pour les penseurs « völkisch », tout ce qui fait référence à la société industrielle, alors en cours de formation, est rejeté ; mais cette opposition touche différents domaines selon les auteurs : pour Paul de Lagarde, l'incarnation du mal, c'est le Libéralisme ; pour Julius Langbehn, c'est la science. Ce refus de la modernité est en réalité le refus d'un monde quantifiable, réductible à des équations mathématiques et à des phénomènes mécaniques, d'un monde physique composé uniquement d'atomes, c'est-à-dire de matière.

La modernité dans son ensemble est rejetée, car elle brise les liens qui unissent les membres du « Volk » , elle constitue la cause première du déclin de l'Allemagne ; corolaire de ce rejet, sont rejetés ceux qui apportent cette modernité, les Juifs, « peste et choléra passagers » selon le mot de Langbehn, peuple protéiforme, sans patrie, mais candidat à la domination sur les Allemands.

Ainsi est magnifiée l'image du paysan allemand. En effet, celui-ci n'est pas encore touché par la société moderne, qui est proche des racines du « Volk » germanique. Ces paysans ont leur aire de prédilection, la Basse-Allemagne, l'Allemagne du Nord-Ouest ; cette Allemagne authentique s'oppose à la Prusse, conglomérat de Slaves, de Juifs et de Français, mais fait cependant alliance avec elle pour faire renaître la germanité. C'est dans cette Allemagne du Nord-Ouest, l'ancienne Saxe d'avant la conquête carolingienne, que vivent les Allemands les plus authentiques, selon Langbehn : les paysans « Niederdeutsche » , dont le type même constitue l'incarnation du « Volk » germanique, non touché par la modernité, d'ascendance respectable, car enraciné sur un terroir.

Une partie importante de la nébuleuse « völkisch » souhaite un essor territorial de l'Allemagne bien au-delà des frontières du « Reich » . Les idéologues « völkisch » ne sont pas forcément favorable à une expansion outre-mer, mais plutôt à une expansion européenne, avec la création d'un vaste empire européen à coloniser par l'envoi de populations germaniques qui prendraient la place de populations non allemandes refoulées.

Ainsi, pour Paul de Lagarde, l'avenir de l'Allemagne est à l'Est, sur des territoires enlevés à l'Autriche ou à la Russie ; une fois annexée l'ensemble de l'Autriche, l'Allemagne devrait pouvoir librement coloniser le pourtour russe de la Mer Noire et l'Ukraine.

Julius Langbehn, dans la lignée de Paul de Lagarde, préconise la création d'un espace allemand d'Amsterdam à Riga, avec la réunification de tous les peuples du rameau germanique, dans le cadre de ce qu'il nomme une « I » .

Après la fondation dans les années 1890 des Ires associations « völkisch » comme le « Deutschbund » fondé en 1894, le mouvement « völkisch » , capable de souplesse en matière d'édition et de propagande, se créa au tournant du siècle en Allemagne sous la forme d'associations libres en étroit échange avec le nationalisme organisé, à savoir essentiellement l' « Alldeutscher Verband » . À côté de contacts soutenus entretenus avec le mouvement « Alldeutscher » autrichien qui leur était étroitement apparenté sur le plan des idées, des personnes et des institutions, il existait également de nombreux échanges formalisés avec les mouvements réformateurs qui avaient vu le jour en grand nombre depuis les années 1880. Dans le mouvement « völkisch » se retrouvaient des groupements qui divergeaient grandement tant sur leurs buts politiques, sociaux et culturels que sur le plan de leur forme organisationnelle et leur représentativité.

Dès ses débuts, les mouvements « völkisch » accordent une place importante à la jeunesse. En effet, déçus par l'âge des Épigones, comme on désigne le règne de Guillaume II, les intellectuels « völkisch » se représentent la jeunesse à leur image, déçus par le « Reich » bourgeois et grandiloquent qui a succédé au « Reich » de 1871. Ainsi, les principaux penseurs « völkisch » développent des corpus pédagogiques, pour former la jeunesse allemande à leurs idées. Paul de Lagarde, précocement, s'en prend au système éducatif du 2e « Reich », qui, à ses yeux, participe à la mise en place d'un esprit mercantiliste, dispensant un savoir cloisonné, utilitaire et conformiste.

Langbehn, de son côté, incite la jeunesse à prendre la tête du combat contre les Juifs et les Libéraux, ce qu'elle fait, d'après lui, en excluant d'office les Juifs des associations étudiantes, prenant modèle sur le corps des officiers et la congrégation des Jésuites.

En 1919, Møller van Den Bruck met en place une structure : le Front de la Jeunesse. Ce front, qui regroupe un certain nombre d'intellectuels conservateurs exerce une influence conservatrice sur l'ensemble des acteurs de la Révolution conservatrice de la République de Weimar. Son objectif est de mettre en place des éléments cohérents d'éducation populaire conservatrice, en partie grâce au journal hebdomadaire « Conscience ». Journal Indépendant pour la culture du peuple (« Volksbildung ») que ce cercle édite. C'est également à la jeunesse qu'il dédie son ouvrage « Les Allemands », espérant lui donner la « Weltanschauung » qui lui manque.

Selon Louis Dupeux, les idées « völkisch » sont la métamorphose de la révolution conservatrice au nationalisme. Ils se situent entre le « Kulturpessimismus » et la révolution conservatrice.

Le mouvement présentait des caractères protestataires nationalistes-réformistes, corroborés par une vision du monde teintée de fusion entre mysticisme, idée de décadence (Oswald Spengler), restauration de l'idée et du concept de race, notamment du peuple german, du droit « allemand », du calendrier et des fêtes, des mythes et des tendances profondes de la société.

Sa clientèle majoritaire, masculine et d'origine protestante, fait montre d'un profil social essentiellement bourgeois, émanant de l'ancienne comme de la nouvelle classe moyenne.

Partant d'une base idéologique raciste (antisémite, anti-slave et anti-romaine), le mouvement aspirait à une société organisée sur des principes anti-égalitaires (parfois phalocrates, mais aussi « féministes » - influence probable de Johann Jakob Bachofen - d'une certaine façon, et corporatistes) qui devait être fondée sur un christianisme germanique ou sur une religion païenne propre. Il avait pour objectif de créer au centre de l'Europe, sur la base d'un système de valeurs fondé sur des idéologies germaniques, un État racial ou, éventuellement, une fédération d'États pan-germaniques.

Après 1918, le nombre d'organisations et de leurs affiliés allait dans un 1er temps clairement s'accroître. Avec le « Deutschvölkischer Schutz- und Trutzbund » (1919-1923), le mouvement disposa même pour une courte période d'un cartel influent d'associations « völkisch » et des personnes adhérant à ces idées furent élues aux parlements des « Länder » comme au « Reichstag ». À partir de 1924-1925, en raison de ses déficiences structurelles, le mouvement allait néanmoins se trouver progressivement mis à l'écart de la politique par l'idéologiquement proche National-Socialisme qui était devenu la nouvelle caisse de résonance de la droite radicale.

Cependant, son influence sur des pans entiers de la société allemande reste forte. Ainsi, par le biais de son influence dans le monde scolaire, les idées développées par la nébuleuse « völkisch » attirent à elles une part non négligeable de la jeunesse du « Reich », séduite par la perspective du changement révolutionnaire promis par les idéaux « völkisch », par l'identification d'un bouc-émissaire facilement identifiable et soumise aux pressions idéologiques radicales.

En effet, l'idéologie « völkisch » postérieure à la Grande Guerre, fournit à la jeunesse un archétype idéal, le Juif, rendu responsable de tous les échecs présents, passés en futurs et sur lequel déverser ses frustrations. Cet antisémitisme est inculqué dès le plus jeune âge dans le système éducatif, de manière insidieuse : si les manuels ne portent aucune mention directe au Juif, ils développent néanmoins les thèses « völkisch » de l'âge d'or pré-industriel.

Malgré ses succès dans le primaire et le secondaire, les succès rencontrés par les idéaux « völkisch » à l'université s'apparentent à un triomphe. Tout d'abord, la concurrence pour les postes entre universitaires Juifs et non-Juifs exacerbent les tensions ; ensuite, reprenant les pratiques d'avant-guerre, les associations étudiantes excluent systématiquement les étudiants Juifs de leurs rangs, en dépit des pressions exercées par certains gouvernements fédérés ; de plus, en 1931, le « Reich » et l'Autriche connaissent dans leurs campus des émeutes antisémites massivement suivies et, en 1932, les universités de Breslau et d'Heidelberg excluent les enseignants juifs de leur corps enseignant.

Cependant l'antisémitisme ne constituait pas l'apanage de la totalité des mouvements de jeunesse d'inspiration « völkisch ». Ainsi, le marginal mouvement de jeunesse, organisé en Thuringe sur des bases élitistes autour de Muck Lamberty, développent simplement l'idée que les Juifs constituent un « Volk » différent du « Volk » germanique, tout en affirmant l'idée qu'un autre « Volk » pouvait s'immerger dans le germanisme originel.

Un certain nombre d'autres groupes de jeunesse marginaux membres de la nébuleuse « völkisch » des années 1920 apparaissent, prospèrent, dans une certaine mesure, puis se fondent avec des réserves, plus ou moins affirmées, plus ou moins formulées, dans le mouvement nazi, le plus souvent dans la mouvance Straßer, moins inféodée selon eux aux intérêts industriels. Mais les succès de Adolf Hitler et sa prise du pouvoir rendent cette allégeance fragile, car ils finissent par se rallier à la vision adoptée par Hitler et ses proches.

Des mouvements chrétiens proches du paganisme s'enthousiasmèrent également pour le mouvement « völkisch ». Ainsi, Artur Dinter, politicien « völkisch », propagandiste et écrivain raciste, créa en 1927 la « Geistchristliche Religionsgemeinschaft », précurseur de l'Organisation pour l'État populaire national-socialiste pour les Chrétiens, renommée en 1934 « Deutsche Volkskirche » (Église populaire allemande). Ainsi, le mouvement « völkisch » a servi de base pour le développement du National-Socialisme.

Le NSDAP essaya par la suite de se profiler comme la force agissante du mouvement « völkisch » en vue de mettre en avant sa vision du monde.

Ainsi, dans « Mein Kampf », Hitler écrit :

« Le Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands tire les caractères essentiels d'une conception " völkisch " de l'univers »

« Si aujourd'hui toutes les associations, tous les groupes, grands et petits (et, à mon avis, même de " grands Partis ") revendiquent le mot " völkisch ", c'est la conséquence de l'action du Parti national-socialiste. »

Le chef de la société Thulé, Rudolf Freiherr von Sebotendorff, fils de cheminot et aventurier haut en couleurs, devenu riche en faisant des affaires louches en Turquie et en épousant une riche héritière, offrit au mouvement « völkisch » de Munich son journal, le « Münchener Beobachter », rebaptisé en août 1919 le « Völkischer Beobachter ». Le Parti national-socialiste, au départ lui-même groupuscule « völkisch », le racheta en décembre 1920 pour en faire son organe de presse officiel.

À partir de 1933, les organisations subsistantes (et leurs dirigeants) perdirent rapidement de leur signification : certaines furent absorbées par les organisations national-socialistes, d'autres furent réprimées (cas du mouvement des époux Ludendorff dans les Ires années du régime), la plupart finirent par se dissoudre ou vivotèrent dans l'ombre jusqu'à leur interdiction par les Alliés après la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

...

The « völkisch » movement (originally, « völkische Bewegung ») is the German interpretation of the populist movement, with a Romantic focus on folklore and the « organic » (as : naturally grown community in unity - as opposed to a refined and sophisticated society characterized by diverging interests), characterized by the one-body-metaphor (« Volkskörper ») for the entire population. The term « völkisch » derives from the German word « Volk » (cognate with the English « folk »), corresponding to « people », with connotations in German of « people-powered », « folksy » and « folkloric ». According to the historian James Webb, the word also has « overtones of " nation ", " race " and " tribe " ». The term « völkisch » has no direct English equivalent, but it could be rendered as « ethno-nationalistic », « racial-nationalistic » or « ethno-racialist », or referred by some today as « folkish ».

The defining idea that the « völkisch » movement revolved around was that of a « Volkstum » (literally, « folkdom »), with a meaning similar to a combination of the terms « folklore » and « ethnicity », not to be confused with the « Volkssturm ». « Populist », or « popular », in this context would be « volkstümlich ».

The « " völkisch " movement » was not a unified movement but « a cauldron of beliefs, fears and hopes that found expression in various movements and were often articulated in an emotional tone », Petteri Pietikäinen observed in tracing « völkisch » influences on Carl Gustav Jung. The « völkisch » movement was « arguably the largest group » in the Conservative Revolutionary movement in Germany. However, like « conservative-revolutionary » or « fascist », « völkisch » is a complex term (« schillernder Begriff »). In a narrow definition, it can be used to designate only groups that consider human beings essentially preformed by blood, i.e. : by inherited characteristics.

The « völkisch » movement had its origins in Romantic nationalism, as it was expressed by early Romantics such as Johann Gottlieb Fichte in his « Addresses to the German Nation » published during the Napoleonic Wars, from 1808 onwards, especially the 8th address :

« What is a “ Volk ”, in the higher-sense of the term, and what is love of the fatherland ? »

... where he answered his question of what could warrant the noble individual's striving « and his belief in the eternity and the immortality of his work » , by replying that it could only be that « particular spiritual nature of the human environment out of which he himself, with all of his thought and action ... has arisen, namely the people from which he is descended and among which he has been formed and grown into that which he is » .

The movement combined sentimental patriotic interest in German folklore, local history and a « back-to-the-land » anti-urban populism with many parallels in the writings of William Morris.

A. J. Nicholls remarked :

« In part, this ideology was a revolt against modernity. »

The dream was for a self-sufficient life lived with a mystical relation to the land ; it was a reaction to the cultural alienation of the Industrial revolution and the « progressive » Liberalism of the later-19th Century and its urbane materialist banality. Similar feelings were expressed in the United States during the 1930's by the populist writers grouped as the Southern Agrarians.

In addition, the « völkisch » movement, as it evolved, sometimes combined the arcane and esoteric aspects of folkloric occultism alongside « racial adoration » and, in some circles, a type of anti-Semitism linked to exclusionary ethnic nationalism. The ideas of « völkisch » movements also included anti-Communist, anti-immigration, anti-Capitalist and anti-Parliamentarian principles. The « völkisch » ideas of « national community » (« Volksgemeinschaft ») came more and more to exclude Jews.

A number of the « völkisch » -populist movements that had evolved during the late-19th Century in the German Empire, under the impress of National Romanticism, developed along propagandistic lines after the German defeat in World War I, and the word « the people » (« Volk ») became increasingly politicized.

The same word « Volk » was used as a flag for new forms of ethnic nationalism, as well as by international socialist Parties as a synonym for the proletariat in the German lands. From the Left, elements of the folk-culture spread to the Parties of the middle-classes. But whereas « Volk » could mean « proletariat » among the Left, it meant more particularly « race » among the Center and Right.

Although the primary interest of the Germanic mystical movement was the revival of native pagan traditions and customs (often set in the context of a quasi-theosophical esotericism) , a marked preoccupation with purity of race came to motivate its more politically oriented off-shoots, such as the « Germanenorden » (the Germanic or Teutonic Order) . This latter was a secret society (founded at Berlin, in 1912) which required its candidates to prove that they had no « non-Aryan » bloodlines and required from each a promise to maintain purity of his stock in marriage. Local groups of the sect met to celebrate the summer solstice, an important neo-pagan festivity in « völkisch » circles (and later, in Nazi Germany) , and more regularly to read the Eddas as well as some of the German mystics. This branch of the « völkisch » movement quickly developed a hyper-nationalist sentiment and allied itself with anti-Semitism, then rising. Another « völkisch » movement of the same time was the Tatkreis.

George Mosse identified some of the more « respectable » and centrist channels through which these sensibilities flowed : school texts that transmitted a Romantic view of a « pure » Germanic past, the nature-oriented German Youth Movement, and novels with an ideally ruthless « völkisch » hero, such as Hermann Löns' « Der Wehrwolf » (1910) .

Not all folkloric societies with connections to Romantic nationalism were located in Germany. The « völkisch » movement was a force as well in Austria. While the community of Monte Verità (Mount Truth) which emerged in 1900 at Ascona, Switzerland, is described by the Swiss art-critic Harald Szeemann as « the southernmost outpost of a far-reaching Nordic lifestyle-reform, that is, alternative movement » . It embraced a mix of anarchism, libertarian communism and various forms of artistic bohemianism and neo-paganism.

The « völkisch » ideologies were influential in the development of Nazism. Indeed, Josef Goebbels publicly asserted in the 1927 Nuremberg rally that if the populist (« völkisch ») movement had understood power and how to bring thousands out in the streets, it would have gained political power on 9 November 1918 (the outbreak of the SPD-led German Revolution of 1918-1919, end of the German monarchy) .

Adolf Hitler wrote in « Mein Kampf » (My Struggle) :

« The basic ideas of the National-Socialist movement are populist (“ völkisch ”) and the populist (“ völkisch ”) ideas are National-Socialist. »

Nazi racial understanding was couched in « völkisch » terms, as when Eugen Fischer delivered his inaugural address as Nazi rector, « The Conception of the “ Völkisch ” State » in the view of biology. (29 July 1933)

This connection can be over-stated, however. According to Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke an imaginative mythology has grown up around the supposed influence within the Nazi Party of a « völkisch » group, the « Thule-Gesellschaft » (Thule Society) , which was founded on 17 August 1918 by Rudolf von Sebottendorff. Its original name was « Studiengruppe für Germanisches Altertum » (Study Group for Germanic Antiquity) , but it soon started to disseminate anti-Republican and anti-Semitic propaganda. In January 1919, the Thule Society was instrumental in the foundation of the « Deutsche Arbeiter-Partei » (German Workers' Party, or DAP) which later became the National-Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP) , commonly called the Nazi Party. Thule members or visiting-guests that would later join the Nazi Party included Rudolf Heß, Alfred Rosenberg, Hans Frank, Gottfried Feder, Dietrich Eckart and Karl Harrer, but notably not Adolf Hitler who never was a member of the Thule Society. Furthermore, the « Münchener Beobachter » (Munich Observer) , owned by Sebottendorff, was the press organ of another small nationalist Party and later became the « Völkischer Beobachter » (People's Observer) .

On the other hand, it can be noted that Karl Harrer, the Thule member most directly involved in the creation of the DAP in 1919, was side-lined at the end of the year when Hitler drafted regulations against conspiratorial circles, and the Thule Society was dissolved a few years later (Goodrick-Clarke, 1985 ; pages 150, 221) . It had no members from the top-echelons of the Party and Nazi officials were forbidden any involvement in secret societies. Adolf Hitler was never a member, while Rudolf Heß and Alfred Rosenberg were only visiting-guests of the Thule Society in the early years before they came to prominence in the Nazi movement (Goodrick-Clarke, 1985 ; pages 149, 201) . However, the « völkisch » circles did hand-down one significant legacy : Friedrich Krohn, a Thule member, designed the original version of the Nazi swastika, in 1919.

Georg Ritter von Schönerer

Georg Ritter von Schönerer est né le 17 juillet 1842 à Vienne et est mort le 14 août 1921 au château de Rosenau près de Zwettl, en Basse-Autriche. Il était un homme politique autrichien actif à la fin du XIXe siècle et au début du XXe siècle. Son pan-germanisme, qu'il oppose notamment au catholicisme politique, a influencé la pensée d'Adolf Hitler qui le cite dans « Mein Kampf » .

D'abord Libéral, il est élu au parlement d'Autriche, en 1873. Il devient, par la suite, nationaliste et se situe à l'extrême-droite au sein du Mouvement national-allemand : il est alors pangermaniste et antisémite.

...

Georg Ritter von Schönerer was born on 17 July 1842 in Vienna and died on 14 August 1921 at his Rosenau manor near Zwettl, Lower-Austria) was an Austrian land-owner and politician of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, active in the late- 19th and early 20th Centuries. A major exponent of pan-Germanism and German nationalism in Austria, as well as a radical opponent of political Catholicism and fiercely thedesh, his agitation exerted much influence on the young Adolf Hitler.

He was born as Georg Heinrich Schönerer. His father, the wealthy railroad pioneer Matthias Schönerer (1807-1881) , was knighted by Emperor Franz-Josef, in 1860. He had a younger sister, Alexandrine, later director of the « Theater an der Wien » , who strongly repudiated her brother's attitudes.

From 1861, he studied agronomy at the Universities of Tübingen, Hohenheim and Magyaróvár (Ungarisch-Altenburg, today a campus of the University of West Hungary) . He went on conducting the business affairs of his father's Estate at Rosenau, near Zwettl, in the rural Waldviertel region of Lower-Austria, where he became known as a generous patriarch of the local peasants and great benefactor. Shaken by the Austrian defeat in the 1866 Austro-Prussian War, the dissolution of the German Confederation and the foundation of the German Empire, in 1871, young Schönerer became a political activist and ardent admirer of German chancellor Otto von Bismarck.

During the turmoil of the Panic of 1873, he got elected to Cisleithanian Austria's Imperial Council parliament as a Liberal representative but became more and more German nationalist as his career progressed. A great orator and firebrand in parliament, he broke with his Party 3 years later, agitating against « Jewish » capitalism, the ruling Catholic Habsburg dynasty and the Austro-Hungarian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in 1878, which he stigmatised as betrayal of German interests. Schönerer's attitudes and political talent were attractive for national Liberal sections of the German-speaking population contemplating the lost chance of a Greater German nation-State, ultimately squandered in the failed Revolutions of 1848.

Tensions rose in 1879 after the accession of Austrian minister-president Eduard Taaffe, whose monarchist politics Schönerer and his followers considered « anti-German ». By 1882, he, together with politicians like Viktor Adler and Heinrich Friedjung, had worked-out the Linz Program (« not Liberal, not Clerical, but National ») of the German national movement, which would become a considerable force in Austrian politics. The program aimed at the autonomy of the predominantly German-speaking Cisleithanian crown lands, including the split-off of « alien » Galicia, Bukovina and Dalmatia, and their affiliation with the German Empire ruled by the House of « Hohenzollern ». These plans even fit with the ideas of Polish, Hungarian and Croatian nationalists, but would have entailed the disempowerment of the House of Habsburg and the Germanisation of the Czech lands in Bohemia.

By the peak of his career, he had transformed into a far-Right politician, considered by Left-leaning Liberals to be even a conservative. Schönerer developed a political philosophy that featured elements of a violent racial opposition to Jews which disregarded religious affiliations. His campaigning became especially vocal upon the arrival of Jewish refugees during the Russian Empire's pogroms, starting in 1881. He fiercely denounced the influence of « exploitative international Jews » and, in 1885, had an Aryan paragraph added to the Linz program, which led to the ultimate breach between him, on the one hand, and Adler and Friedjung, on the other.

Schönerer's approach became the model for German national « Burschenschaften » student fraternities and numerous associations in Cisleithanian Austria. In turn, Jewish activists, like Theodor Herzl, began to adopt the idea of Zionism. Schönerer's authoritarianism, popular solidarity, nationalism, pan-Germanism, anti-Slavism, and anti-Catholicism appealed to many Viennese, mostly working-class. This appeal made him a powerful political figure in Austria and he considered himself leader of the Austrian Germans.

(Image) Schönerer was imprisoned for his raid on a newspaper office. While doing so, he allegedly was drunk, hence this caricature.

In 1888, he was temporarily imprisoned for ransacking a Jewish-owned newspaper office and assaulting its employees for reporting the imminent death of the admired German Emperor Wilhelm I, prematurely. This action increased Schönerer's popularity and helped members of his Party get elected to the Austrian Parliament. Nevertheless, the prison sentence also resulted not only in the loss of his status as a noble, but also of his mandate in parliament. Schönerer was not re-elected to the Imperial Council until 1897, while rivals like the Vienna mayor Karl Lueger and his Christian-Social Party had taken the chance to get ahead.

Later in 1897, Schönerer still was able to help orchestrate the expulsion of Minister president Kasimir Felix Graf Badeni from office. Badeni had proclaimed that civil servants in Austrian-controlled Bohemia would have to know the Czech language, an ordinance which prevented many ethnic German-speakers (the majority of whom could not speak Czech) in Bohemia, from applying for governmental jobs. Schönerer staged mass protests against the ordinance and disrupted parliamentary proceedings, actions which eventually caused Emperor Franz-Josef to dismiss Badeni.

During these years, while the « Kulturkampf » divided Imperial Germany, Schönerer founded the « Los von Rom ! » movement, which advocated the conversion of all Roman Catholic German-speaking people of Austria to Lutheran Protestantism, or, in some cases, to the Old Catholic Churches. Schönerer became even more powerful in 1901, when 21 members of his Party gained seats in the Parliament. His career crumbled rapidly thereafter, however, due to his forceful views and personality. His Party suffered as well, and had virtually disintegrated by 1907. But his views and philosophy, not to mention his great skill as an agitator, would go on to influence Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party as a whole.

Schönerer died at his Rosenau manor near Zwettl, Lower-Austria, on 14 August 1921. He had arranged to be buried near Bismarck's mausoleum on his Estate at Friedrichsruh, Lauenburg in present-day Schleswig-Holstein, northern Germany.

...

Georg Heinrich Ritter von Schönerer (geboren 17. Juli 1842 in Wien ; gestorben 14. August 1921 auf Schloß Rosenau, Niederösterreich) war ein österreichischer Gutsherr und Politiker. Schönerer hatte von 1879 bis zur Jahrhundertwende Bedeutung als Führer zunächst der Deutschnationalen und später der Alldeutschen Vereinigung. Er war ein heftiger Gegner des politischen Katholizismus, ein radikaler Antisemit und übte starken Einfluss auf den jungen Adolf Hitler aus, der ihn als eines seiner Vorbilder ansah.

Georg Schönerer wurde als Sohn des Eisenbahnunternehmers Mathias Schönerer (1807-1881) und dessen Ehefrau Marie Anna Antonia Rehmanns (1819-1884) geboren, er hatte eine Schwester, Alexandrine. Nachdem Mathias Schönerer 1860 von Kaiser Franz Joseph I. in den erblichen Ritterstand erhoben wurde, konnten sich auch seine Kinder dieses Titels bedienen.

Georg von Schönerer betrieb seit 1861 landwirtschaftliche Studien in Tübingen, besuchte 1861-1863 die Landwirtschaftliche Akademie in Hohenheim und 1863-1865 die Höhere Landwirtschaftliche Schule in Ungarisch-Altenburg. Schönerer heiratete im April 1878 Philippine Edle von Gschmeidler (1848-1913) . Aus dieser Ehe gingen Sohn Georg und drei Töchter hervor. Georg junior, kurz vor der Entlassung aus dem Militärdienst und bereit für die Übernahme des väterlichen Gutes, und dessen Frau starben am 3. Oktober 1918 in Wien an der Spanischen Grippe. Seit 1869 verwaltete Schönerer senior nun das väterliche Landgut in Rosenau bei Zwettl, wo er einen landwirtschaftlichen Musterbetrieb aufbaute und führte.

Seine damalige « Stammverbindung » war die Burschenschaft Libertas Wien und er wurde in mehreren Burschenschaften auch Ehrenmitglied : Burschenschaft Germania Innsbruck (1893) , Burschenschaft Teutonia Wien (1893) und Burschenschaft Gothia Wien (1919) .

1873 wurde er für die liberale deutsche Fortschrittspartei in das Abgeordnetenhaus des Reichsrats gewählt, trat 1876 aus dieser Partei aus und war seit 1879 Führer der Deutschnationalen Bewegung (der Alldeutschen) in Österreich. 1878-1883 gehörte er auch dem niederösterreichischen Landtag an.

Er vertrat eine völkisch-germanische Ideologie, die mit einem radikalen Antisemitismus Hand in Hand ging, der bei ihm konsequent « rassistisch » begründet wurde. Seine Alldeutsche Bewegung verlangte 1900 im Wiener Parlament, eine Prämie für jeden « niedergemachten » Juden auszusetzen. Schönerer verkündete damals völkisch-antisemitische Parolen wie durch Reinheit zur Einheit - Ohne Juda, ohne Rom / wird gebaut Germaniens Dom oder Die Religion ist einerlei / im Blute liegt die Schweinerei. Schönerer war heftiger Gegner des habsburgisch-österreichischen Patriotismus (« Volksrecht bricht Staatsrecht ») und des Liberalismus. Er kämpfte für die Auflösung der Monarchie und den Anschluß ihrer westlichen Teile an das Deutsche Reich. Als Gegner der staatstragenden katholischen Kirche war er ein Vorkämpfer der « Los-von-Rom-Bewegung » . Er trat selbst 1900 zum Protestantismus über und verkündete etwa im Jahr 1887 die Abschaffung des christlichen Kalenders. Als neuen Nullpunkt für die Zeitrechnung bestimmte er das Jahr 113 vor Christus, in welchem die Kimbern und Teutonen das römische Heer in der Schlacht bei Noreia besiegt hatten. 1882 bestimmte Schönerer das deutschnationale « Linzer Programm » maßgeblich mit, das nationalistische, soziale und antisemitische Elemente miteinander verknüpfte.

Schönerer zählt zu den Gründungsmitgliedern des 1880 gegründeten Deutschen Schulvereines, der die deutsche Bevölkerung in den Gebieten Österreichs, in denen sie nur eine Minderheit bildeten, mit dem Bau von Schulen und dem Ankauf von Gütern unterstützen wollte. Da der Schulverein Juden die Mitgliedschaft gestattete, legte Schönerer 1885 aus Protest seinen Posten im Aufsichtsrat nieder und trat aus dem Schulverein aus. Danach gründete Schönerer den antisemitischen « Schulverein für Deutsche » .

Am 8. März 1888 betrauerte er in einem Gasthof in Begleitung einiger Anhänger den bevorstehenden Tod Wilhelms I. In einer Extraausgabe des Neuen Wiener Tagblattes wurde der noch nicht eingetretene Tod bereits verkündet ; kurze Zeit später erfolgte eine neuerliche Extraausgabe, welche meldete, daß der Kaiser noch am Leben sei. Darauf gerieten Schönerer und seine Begleiter in Zorn, weil er den Herausgebern des Neuen Tagblattes unterstellte, aus dem Tod des Kaisers Profit zu machen. So drang er mit Gleichgesinnten in die Redaktion des Neuen Wiener Tagblattes ein und bedrohte die Redakteure. Es kam zu einer Anzeige und Beantragung eines Haftbefehls gegen Schönerer. Der Staatsanwalt forderte vom Reichsrat die Auslieferung Schönerers. In seinem Antrag verteidigte sich Schönerer, man solle sich mäßigen und ihn nicht ausliefern. Er sei bereits fünfmal ausgeliefert worden und jedes Mal freigesprochen oder die Anklage sei zurückgezogen worden. Die Abgeordneten stimmten jedoch gegen Schönerers Antrag und hoben seine Immunität auf.

Vor Gericht sagten die Angestellten der Redaktion aus, Schönerer hätte gerufen : « Der Tag der Rache ist gekommen ! » Er selbst hingegen behauptete, er habe lediglich die tatsächlichen Fakten ermitteln wollen. Weiters wurde behauptet, daß Schönerer die Türe versperrt, die Angestellten mit einem Stock bedroht, dabei geschrien und zwei Redakteure festgehalten und mit Fäusten traktiert habe. Schönerer entgegnete dem Vorwurf, er habe sich über die Art und Weise dieses Pressegebarens Luft gemacht und dann den Raum verlassen. Eine große Anzahl von Zeugen bestätigte die Version der Journalisten, Schönerer nannte 19 Zeugen. Die widersprüchlichen Angaben und Fakten wurden vom Richter in seiner Begründung anerkannt, indem er bei weitem nicht das volle Strafausmaß von fünf Jahren ausschöpfte. Schönerer wurde am 5. Mai 1888 zu einer viermonatigen Kerkerstrafe verurteilt sowie des Abgeordnetenmandats für fünf Jahre und des Adelstitels verlustig erklärt. Deshalb mußte er die Führung der erstarkenden deutschnationalen Bewegung anderen überlassen. Ein großer Teil seiner Anhänger ging auch zu den Christlichsozialen Luegers über. 1897-1907 gehörte Schönerer als Außenseiter wieder dem Reichsrat an. Seine politischen Organe waren die 1881 gegründete Zeitschrift Deutsche Worte (seit 1883 Unverfälschte Deutsche Worte) und die Zeitungen Alldeutsches Tagblatt (1903 gegründet) und Grazer Wochenblatt.

Noch einmal erlangte Schönerer in den Jahren zwischen 1897 und 1901 eine gewisse Führungsrolle innerhalb des deutschnationalen Lagers aufgrund der Badeni-Krise. Als der österreichische Ministerpräsident Kasimir von Badeni 1897 im Parlament Verordnungen vorlegte, die für die künftige Einstellungen von Beamten in Böhmen und Mähren Kenntnisse der deutschen und der tschechischen Sprache vorsahen, konnte sich Schönerer an die Spitze der Protestbewegung gegen diese Maßnahme setzen. Über viele Monate wurde der österreichische Reichsrat durch eine gezielte Obstruktionspolitik arbeitsunfähig.

1901 wurden 21 Abgeordnete der Schönerer-Gruppe (oder Alldeutsche Vereinigung) in das Parlament gewählt. Doch innerhalb kurzer Zeit kam es zu einem innerparteilichen Streit zwischen Schönerer und seinem jüngeren Fraktionskollegen Karl Hermann Wolf. Die Alldeutsche Vereinigung zerfiel, Wolf gründete mit den meisten ehemaligen Abgeordneten der Schönerer-Gruppe die Deutschradikale Partei. Weitere Wahlerfolge erreichte Schönerer nicht mehr. 1907 wurde seine Partei auf drei Abgeordnete reduziert, er selbst scheiterte mit seiner Kandidatur, von da an blieb er eine politische Randfigur.

Über eine Massenbewegung gebot er nie. Am Höhepunkt 1885 hatte seine Monatszeitung Unverfälschte Deutsche Worte nicht einmal eine Auflage von 1700 Exemplaren. Die Mitgliederanzahl seines deutschnationalen Vereins betrug 1889 gerade 1.200 Personen.

1917 erhielt Schönerer durch eine Amnestie Kaiser Karls I. sein Adelsprädikat zurück. Auf seinen Wunsch hin wurde er, der Bismarck unter anderem aufgrund dessen vorbildlicher Sozialpolitik (gesetzliche Unfallversicherung, gesetzliche Krankenversicherung, deutsche Sozialversicherung) verehrte, 1922 in der Nähe von Bismarcks Gut Friedrichsruh im Sachsenwald bei Hamburg beigesetzt. Bismarck selbst hatte Schönerers Politik jedoch abgelehnt, da er an einer Destabilisierung Österreich-Ungarns kein Interesse hatte, sondern einen starken Bündnispartner wollte. Schönerers Grab befindet sich in Aumühle. Sein Grabstein trägt die Inschrift « ein Kämpfer für Alldeutschland » .

Schönerer entwickelte eine politische Symbolik, die sich teilweise noch heute in Österreich finden lässt. Als glühender Verehrer von Kaiser Wilhelm I. machte er die Kornblume zu einem der Parteisymbole. Ferner ließ er Lieder wie Die Wacht am Rhein singen und verschmähte österreichisch-patriotische Lieder. Auch ließ er in den Farben Schwarz-Rot-

Gold oder Schwarz-Weiß-Rot beflaggen und schmückte zu besonderen Anlässen die Bildnisse von Bismarck, Kaiser Wilhelm oder Moltke mit Lorbeerkränzen.

Mitgliedsurkunde des Floridsdorfer Turnvereins für Schönerer in Runenschrift. Transcription : « Durch Reinheit, zur Einheit » . Hochgeehrter Führer ! Der Deutschvölkliche Turnverein in Floridsdorf hat in seiner 31. Hauptversammlung den Beschluß gefaßt, Sie, werter Herr, in anbetracht Ihrer großen Verdienste um die gerechte Sache, die der Verein als Deutschvölklicher zu würdigen versteht, zu seinem Ehrenmitgliede zu ernennen. Floridsdorf, im Eis-Mond (Januar) 2009 (1896 nor Christus) , der Turnrath (Turnrat) .

Die andere Seite des Politikers Schönerer ist sein soziales Engagement, das er in seiner Position als Gutsherr zeigte. Vor allem in der Frühzeit seiner politischen Karriere spielten soziale Anliegen eine gewisse Rolle. Noch 1912 lobte die Arbeiter-Zeitung seine Standpunkte in der sozialen Frage, wenn sie auch seine politischen Ansichten ablehnte.

Schönerer stellte (im Gegensatz zu anderen Gutsbesitzern) überwiegend Ehepaare ein und begnügte sich mit 2,5 % Verzinsung aus seinen Gütern. Den Rosenauer Meierhof bewohnten nach Auskunft seiner Schwester 60 Menschen. Daneben besaß er noch zahlreiche Häuser, in denen er seine Angestellten und deren Familien unterbrachte. Er setzte sich im Reichsrat für Krankenkasse, Altersversicherung, Arbeitszeitbeschränkung, Sonn- und Feiertagsruhe und viele andere sozialen Errungenschaften ein. Schönerer gab seinen Beschäftigten, welche aus Alters- oder Krankheitsgründen nicht mehr arbeitsfähig waren die Möglichkeit, auf seinem Gut im sogenannten « Spital » (Altersheim) im Ausgedinge bis zu ihrem Tode zu verbleiben. Sein Motto war : « Für meine Ausgedienten Sorge ich ! » .

Bei existenzbedrohenden Brand- oder Viehschäden half Schönerer aus. Im Armenhaus der Doppelmonarchie, dem niederösterreichischen Waldviertel, hat er an die 200 Feuerwehren unterstützt oder begründet. Schönerer setzte sich persönlich für die Förderung der Raiffeisen-Darlehenskassen ein und gewährte seinen Leuten selbst Vorschüsse. Oftmals strich er selbst die Rückzahlung offener Lohnvorschüsse bei mangelnder Liquidität und ermöglichte so den Pächtern ein wirtschaftliches Arbeiten. Nachweislich fanden drei (von allen anderen Gutsbesitzern als untauglich abgelehnte) Taubstumme in seiner Gärtnerei Arbeit, zwei körperlich Versehrte verdingten sich als Esel führer des Milchfuhrwerks. « Auch sie haben Hunger » , pflegte er zu sagen.

Schönerer nahm außerdem Stellung gegen den auf Vor- und Nachmittag verteilten Unterricht in den Volksschulen auf dem Lande mit Rücksicht auf die langen Schulwege, außerdem forderte er im Interesse der Landwirtschaft eine Sommerbefreiung für Jugendliche. Von ihm wurde in Schloß Rosenau das Grundkapital für eine Suppenanstalt gestiftet, damit die Kinder mit langen Schulwegen im eisigen Winter des Waldviertels beim Wirt Suppe und damit auch einen warmen Aufenthaltsraum bekamen. Eine gleichartige Suppenanstalt befindet sich auch in der Hamerlinggemeinde Kirchberg. Von seinen Gutsverwaltern forderte er : « Geben Sie den Leuten, was rechtens ist ! » .

In Österreich-Ungarn bildeten zu Schönerers Zeit die Deutschen (deutsch sprechenden Bewohner) die Minderheit. Drei Viertel der Bevölkerung setzten sich aus anderen Völkern wie Ungarn, Tschechen, Polen und Serben und Kroaten zusammen. Die Furcht vor einer « Überfremdung » führte bei einigen Deutschsprachigen zum Wunsch, Österreich solle sich dem (gleichsprachigen) Deutschen Reich anschließen. Auch Schönerer vertrat diese Überzeugung, und mehr :

Österreich solle ausschließlich von deutschsprachigen Personen bewohnt sein. Schönerer ließ sich von seinen Anhängern mit « Führer » ansprechen und mit « Heil ! » -Rufen begrüßen.

Schönerers Wirken zeigte sich auch in der Gründung des « Neuen Richard-Wagner-Vereins », um « die deutsche Kunst aus Verfälschung und Verjudung zu befreien ». Er äußerte Propagandasprüche wie « Der unter kühlerem Himmel gereifte Mensch hat auch die Pflicht, die parasitären Rassen auszurotten, so wie man bedrohliche Giftschlangen und wilde Raubtiere eben ausrotten muß » oder Parolen wie « Ob Jud, ob Christ ist einerlei - in der Rasse liegt die Schweinerei » .

Schönerer verlangte die Entfernung von Juden aus dem Staatsdienst, aus Schulen, Universitäten, Vereinen und Zeitungen. 1888, im Jahr als er seine Haftstrafe verbüßte, reichte er eine « Antisemitische Petition » ein :

« In dem von uns bewohnten Viertel beginnt ganz allmählich eine nationale Umwandlung einzutreten, indem nicht nur slawische, sondern auch jüdische Unterwanderung überhand nimmt, und sogar auch Stellungen mit obrigkeitlichem Charakter mit Juden wiederholt besetzt wurden, was sich in auffälligster Weise bis auf die Kreise der Gendarmerie ins Waldviertel erstreckt hat. Durch das Slawentum könnte der deutsche Charakter unseres Landesteiles bedroht werden, durch das Judentum ist die Gefahr noch größer, denn dieses orientalische Volk trachtet unser heimisches Volk zu entnationalisieren. » (Friedrich Polleroß : Die Erinnerung tut zu weh.)

Adolf Hitlers Familie kam aus dem Waldviertel, nicht weit vom 120 Hektar großen Gutshof Schönerers entfernt, Hitler selbst verbrachte nur Ferien bei seinen dortigen Verwandten. An der Realschule in Linz begeisterten sich Realschüler, darunter auch Hitler, für die Thesen Schönerers, sie begrüßten sich mit « Heil ! » -Rufen und hefteten sich Kornblumen ans Revers.

Am 10. Oktober 1920 hielt Hitler im Waldviertel, im Kinosaal Gmünd, eine Versamlungsrede der NSDAP, gegen den Versailler Vertrag, gegen die sogenannte Zinsknechtschaft und gegen die Weimarer Republik. Bei der Nationalratswahl 1930 erreichte die NSDAP im Waldviertel bereits 10 % . Nach den Ende 1932 abgehaltenen Gemeinderatswahlen regierten in Stein, Zwettl, Gmünd und Krems nationalsozialistische Bürgermeister.

Während des NS-Regimes wurden auch einige Straßen und Plätze nach Schönerer benannt. So hieß der Münchner Habsburgerplatz zum Beispiel bis 1945 Schönererplatz. 1942 schrieb der Nationalsozialist Rudolf Lochner über das national und sozial gesinnte Vorbild :

« Mit Schönerer sich zu beschäftigen, heißt, großdeutsche Geschichte zu treiben. Schönerer einer der leidenschaftlichsten Deutschen, die je gelebt, ist der größte deutsche politische Erzieher nach Bismarck und vor Adolf Hitler. » (Rudolf Lochner : Georg von Schönerer, ein Erzieher zu Großdeutschland.)

Der nationalsozialistische Schriftsteller Otto Henke hob ebenfalls den Bezug hervor :

« Die Ahnenheimat des Führers wurde durch Georg Ritter von Schönerer zur Geistesheimat des erbitterten Kampfes

gegen das Judentum. » (Wolfgang Zdral : Die Hitlers. Die unbekannte Familie des Führers.)

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg geriet der Einfluss Schönerers auf Hitler nicht in Vergessenheit. Von Hannah Arendt wurde Schönerer als « geistiger Vater » Hitlers bezeichnet.

...

Schönerer absolvierte nach der Realschulausbildung in Wien eine landwirtschaftliche Ausbildung in Tübingen, Hohenheim und Ungarisch-Altenburg (bis 1865) . Anschließend arbeitete er auf verschiedenen Gütern, unternahm Studienreisen und verwaltete seit 1869 das väterliche Gut Rosenau im Waldviertel. 1873 in das Abgeordnetenhaus gewählt, schloß er sich dem linken Flügel der liberalen Verfassungspartei (Fortschrittspartei) an. Schönerer radikalisierte die nach dem Börsenkrach 1873 weit verbreitete Kritik an den Geschäftsverbindungen des rechten Flügels der Partei (« Verwaltungspartei ») , nahm insbesondere auch die Verbindungen zwischen der liberalen Presse und korrupten Firmenleitungen aufs Korn und propagierte bald einen zumal im studentischen Milieu auf Widerhall stoßenden Antisemitismus, der in diesem antiklerikalen Umfeld aber nicht auf religiösen Kriterien aufgebaut war, sondern das Abstammungskriterium als ethnischen Ausschließungsgrund hervorhob (« Rassenantisemitismus ») .

Nach den Wahlen 1879 blieb Schönerer dem liberalen Dachverband fern und gründete als Zwei-Mann-Fraktion den « Verband der Deutschnationalen » . 1882 veröffentlichte er in Zusammenarbeit und andere mit Engelbert Pernerstorfer (1850-1918) das « Linzer Programm » (1885 von Schönerer um die sogenannten « Arierparagraphen » erweitert) , unter Berufung auch auf die Thronrede Wilhelms I. zur Sozialpolitik 1881. Er war Gründer der Wochenschriften « Deutsche Worte » (1881-1884) , « Unverfälschte Deutsche Worte » (1884-1918) und des « Alldeutschen Tagblatts » (1903-1914) . In den Debatten um die Verlängerung des Privilegs der Nordbahn errang er als Verfechter der Verstaatlichung eine gewisse Popularität, die 1887-1888 auch von Wahlerfolgen für seine « Vereinigten Christen » begleitet war, die auch spätere Christlichsoziale umfaßten. Schönerer wurde jedoch 1888 nach einem nächtlichen Handgemenge in einer Zeitungsredaktion zu drei Monaten Haft verurteilt, verlor seinen Adelstitel - und seine Wiener Anhängerschaft an Karl Lueger (1844-1910) .

Nach seiner Haft predigte Schönerer, der schon zuvor einen forcierten Bismarck-Kult betrieben hatte, einen kaum verhüllten « alldeutschen » Irredentismus. Politisch gewannen seine « Alldeutschen » erst 1897, als Schönerer wieder in den Reichsrat (Abgeordnete bis 1907) gewählt wurde, als Vehikel des Protests der Deutschböhmen gegen die Badenischen Sprachenverordnungen an Gewicht. Als Reaktion auf das Bündnis der katholisch Parteien mit den Slawen rief Schönerer 1898 die « Los-von-Rom » -Bewegung ins Leben, brach nach dem Konflikt mit Karl Hermann Wolf (1862-1941) 1902 und der Abspaltung der « Frei-Alldeutschen Partei » aber mit dem Großteil seiner deutsche böhmisch Anhänger. Die Alldeutschen Vereinigung im Parlament löste sich 1904 auf, im letzten Abgeordnetenhaus folgten nur vier von über hundert deutsche nationalen Abgeordneten der erraticen Führung Schönerers, der Jauch bei reichsdeutsche Alldeutschen vielfach auf Unverständnis stieß und seine Feindschaft zur Habsburgermonarchie auch im Zeichen der Kriegssolidarität nicht milderte, nach 1918 politisch aber nicht mehr hervortrat.

Schönerers « gesinnungstreuer » Starrsinn war für sein mehrfaches Scheitern als Politiker ebenso verantwortlich wie für sein Weiterleben als Legende, die ihn rückblickend weit über seine tatsächliche Bedeutung hinaus als Symbolfigur des österreichische Deutschnationalismus erscheinen ließ, Adolf Hitler knüpfte ideologisch an Schönerers « Ausgrenzung » der Juden aus der Volksgemeinschaft an, hielt ihn aber politisch für kein Vorbild.

Ehrenbürger die Stadt Eger (1897, 1904 von Schönerer zurückgegeben) ; Gedenktafel am Geburtshaus in Wien.

...

Schönerer, Georg Ritter von (bis 1888) : geboren 17.07.1842 Wien ; gestorben 14. 8. 1921 Schloß Rosenau (Gemeinde Zwettl-Niederösterreich) , Gutsbesitzer, Politiker. Ab 1879 Führer der deutschnationalen Bewegung (der Alldeutschen) in Österreich ; heftiger Gegner des österreichischen Patriotismus, der katholischen Kirche und des Liberalismus. Vertrat einen radikalen Antisemitismus, kämpfte für engen Anschluß Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich, war ein Vorkämpfer der Los-von-Rom-Bewegung und trat selbst zum Protestantismus über. Seine autokratischen und terroristischen Methoden, sein nationalistischer Fanatismus waren typisch für seine Richtung. Seine Ideen haben später den jungen A. Hitler stark beeinflusst. Schönerer war 1882 an der Abfassung des deutschnationalen Linzer Programms maßgeblich beteiligt. Eine Gewaltaktion gegen politische Gegner (1888) brachte ihn ins Gefängnis und um Adelstitel, Reserveoffiziersrang und Abgeordnetenmandat. 1897-1907 war er wieder meist Abgeordneter. Er besaß zunächst auch auf Karl Lueger, E. Engelbert Pernerstorfer und Viktor Adler einen gewissen Einfluss, dem aufgrund seines Radikalismus Ablehnung folgte. Seine Anhänger (« Schönerianer ») waren insbesondere Burschenschaftler und Sudetendeutsche. Seine politische Organe waren die Zeitschrift « Unverfälschte deutsche Worte » (1890-1912) und die Zeitungen « Alldeutsches Tagblatt » und « Grazer Wochenblatt » .

31. August 1894 : Georg Schönerer verzichtet auf die Ehrenbürgerschaft von Zwettl

Die Vorgeschichte 1870 wird Georg Ritter von Schönerer Ehrenbürger von Zwettl

Georg Ritter von Schönerer mit 30 Jahren Mit dem « Reichsvolksschulgesetz » vom 14. Mai 1869 wurde neben zahlreichen anderen neuen Lehrgegenständen auch der Turnunterricht als obligatorisches Fach in Österreichs Pflichtschulen eingeführt. Von einer staatlich organisierten, flächendeckenden turnpädagogischen Ausbildung der Lehrer konnte bis zu diesem Zeitpunkt aber keine Rede sein. Es waren die nach 1861 entstandenen Turnvereine, allen voran der Erste Wiener Turn-Verein, die Kurse für interessierte Lehrer abhielten. Ab 1864 gewährte der Landtag von Niederösterreich immerhin erstmals acht Stipendien für Lehrer, die an diesen Kursen teilnahmen. 1870 gingen dann die niederösterreichische Statthalterei beziehungsweise der Landesausschuss daran, die Turnlehrausbildung zu institutionalisieren. Man kam überein, in jedem Landesviertel einen zentralen Ort auszuwählen, in dem Turnkurse für Lehrer abgehalten werden sollten. Neben Sankt Pölten, Wiener Neustadt und Korneuburg hatte man für das Waldviertel dabei an Zwettl gedacht.

Bezirkshauptmann Theodor Ritter von Kronenfels fragte im März 1870 bei der Stadtgemeinde Zwettl an, ob sie sich in der Lage sehe, die Voraussetzungen für solche Turnkurse zu schaffen. Die Stadtväter waren sich mit Sicherheit nicht bewusst, was da auf sie zukam, als sie sich dem Bezirkshauptmann gegenüber verpflichteten, die Turnkurse in Zwettl zu organisieren, denn Mitte Juli erfuhren sie, daß sie für den am 15. September startenden Kurs auf Gemeindegeldern einen entsprechenden Turnapparat anzuschaffen hätten. Wie dieses Gerät aussehen sollte, ist leider nicht überliefert.

Wahrscheinlich handelte es sich um eine Gerätekombination, wie sie beim Jahn'schen Turnen Verwendung fand. Jedenfalls war in Zwettl ein derartiger Turnapparat nicht aufzutreiben. In Langenlois gab es zwei Tischler, die ein ähnliches Gerät bereits hergestellt hatten, einen neuen Turnapparat aber frühestens im Spätherbst liefern konnten. Außerdem ließen sich die Kosten für dieses Gerät nicht eindeutig zu beziffern. Die Angaben schwankten zwischen 193 und 400 Gulden.

So war guter Rat teuer. Einerseits wollten sich die Zwettler Gemeindeväter keinesfalls vor Bezirkshauptmann und Landesverwaltung blamieren, andererseits konnte man die geforderten Bedingungen aus eigener Kraft nicht erfüllen. In dieser peinlichen Situation wandte man sich an einen neuen Nachbar um Hilfe. Im nahen Schloß Rosenau wohnte seit 1869 Georg Ritter von Schönerer (1842-1921). Dieser stand wahrscheinlich schon damals in Kontakt zu Turnerkreisen. Jedenfalls sicherte er den Zwettler Gemeindevätern seine Hilfe zu, und er beauftragte sogleich sein Personal, allen voran den Forstmeister Steidl, für die Herstellung des gewünschten Turngerätes zu sorgen. Und tatsächlich, noch vor dem 15. September 1870 lieferten Rosenauer Fuhrleute den fertigen Turnapparat in Zwettl ab.

Die Kosten für Holz und Transport übernahm Schönerer zur Gänze selbst. Für Zimmermanns-, Schloßer-, Sattler-, Tischler- und Seilerarbeiten hatte er insgesamt 95 Gulden und 52 Kreuzer ausgegeben. In einem Brief vom 15. September teilte er der Stadtgemeinde Zwettl mit, daß er auf diese Summe verzichte, die Gemeinde möge diesen Betrag aber einem wohltätigen Zweck zuführen.

Am 22. Oktober 1870 beschloß die Gemeindevertretung der Stadt Zwettl einstimmig, Georg Ritter von Schönerer wegen dieser seiner Verdienste um die Gemeinde zum Ehrenbürger zu ernennen. (1) Schönerer bedankte sich für diese Auszeichnung in einem Dankschreiben vom 30. März 1871. (2)

Der Turnkurs in Zwettl fand tatsächlich statt. Der Lehrer Johann Schoenbauer aus Martinsberg leitete ihn. Er hatte 1867 an einem Turnlehrgang des Ersten Wiener Turn-Vereins unter Johann Hoffer (1823-1891) erfolgreich teilgenommen. Allerdings war das Interesse an diesen Turnkursen in den einzelnen Landesvierteln nicht allzu groß. In Zwettl nahmen beispielsweise nur acht Lehrer aus dem hiesigen Bezirk teil, aus den Nachbarbezirken hatte sich niemand gemeldet. Der Bezirkshauptmann von Korneuburg, wo, wie bereits erwähnt, ein ähnlicher Kurs stattfand, regte bei der Statthalterei brieflich an, diese Kurse in Zukunft möglichst an den Standorten der neu gegründeten Lehrerbildungsanstalten abzuhalten, was letztlich auch geschah, und so blieb die Turnlehrerausbildung in Zwettl im 19. Jahrhundert eine kurze Episode.

Schönerers Verzicht auf seine Ehrenbürgerschaft

In den folgenden Jahren entwickelte Georg Ritter von Schönerer neben seiner Tätigkeit als Gutsherr umfangreiche politische Aktivitäten. So war er zwischen 1873 und 1874 sowie von 1885 bis 1888 Mitglied des Zwettler Gemeindegeldausschusses (Gemeinderates). Vor allem zog er aber ebenfalls bereits 1873 als Abgeordneter in den Reichsrat ein. Er gründete die Alldeutsche Bewegung, war ein glühender Verehrer des deutschen Reichskanzlers Bismarck und von Kaiser Wilhelm I., gründete die Los-von-Rom-Bewegung in Österreich und gilt als der Gründer des politischen

Rassenantisemitismus. Seine politische Agitation trug wesentlich zur Vergiftung des Klimas zwischen den Völkerschaften der Donaumonarchie bei. Adolf Hitler erwähnte ihn in « Mein Kampf » als eines seiner Vorbilder ...

Schönerer hatte zwar im späten 19. Jahrhundert in der Zwettler Bevölkerung eine beachtliche Anhängerschar, ebenso wie im gesamten Waldviertel und in weiten Teilen der Monarchie. Sein Verhältnis zur Zwettler Stadtregierung war allerdings zu dieser Zeit keineswegs konfliktfrei. Die Mehrzahl der Mitglieder der Zwettler Gemeindevertretung war klerikalen oder liberalen Gruppierungen, nicht aber Schönerers deutschnationaler Partei zuzurechnen.

Am 28. und 29. August 1894 fanden in Zwettl Gemeinderatswahlen statt. Damals gab es in Österreich noch kein gleiches und allgemeines Wahlrecht. Die Wahlberechtigten wurden nach ihrer Steuerleistung in drei Wahlkörper eingeteilt. Die Stimmen vermögender Staatsbürger hatten deutlich mehr Gewicht als solche wenig Begüteter. Frauen und arme Leute hatten kein Wahlrecht. Schönerers Parteigänger kandidierten 1894 im 3. Wahlkörper, das waren die Wahlberechtigten mit der geringsten Steuerleistung. Jeder der drei Wahlkörper entsandte (unabhängig von der Zahl der Wahlberechtigten) sieben Mitglieder in den Gemeindevorstand. Für den 3. Wahlkörper waren 1894 in Zwettl 479 Männer wahlberechtigt, 303 von ihnen gaben ihre Stimme ab. Von den sieben aus diesem Wahlkörper gewählten Mitgliedern des Gemeindevorstandes gehörten sechs der liberalen Partei und nur einer, nämlich der Hammerschmied Josef Fürst, der deutschnationalen Partei Schönerers an, und auch dieser wurde nur mit einem denkbar knappen Überhang von 5 Stimmen gewählt. Auch die 14 vom ersten und zweiten Wahlkörper gewählten Ausschussmitglieder waren der liberalen Partei zuzurechnen. (3) der Gefertigte ersucht zur Kenntnis zu nehmen und die löbliche Gemeindevertretung hievon zu verständigen, daß derselbe auf die ihm am 22. Oktober 1870 einstimmig verliehene Ehrenbürgerschaft Verzicht leistet und daher ersucht, seinen Namen aus dem I. Wahlkörper der Wählerliste zu streichen.

Ob dieser eindeutigen politischen Niederlage erbost, verfasste Schönerer ein Schreiben⁴ an den Zwettler Gemeindevorstand mit folgendem Inhalt :

Herrn Gemeindevorstand der I. f. (4) Stadt Zwettl

Achtungsvoll zeichnet

Georg Schönerer

Schloß Rosenau, 31. August 1894. (5)

Noten

(1) StAZ, Ratsprotokolle, Sign. 2-21, Protokoll vom 22. Oktober 1870.

(2) Stadtarchiv Zwettl (StAZ) , Karton 72, Unprotokollierte Akten, Dankschreiben Schönerers vom 30. März 1871.

(3) Zwettler Zeitung vom 1. Herbstmond (September) 1894, Seite 67 ; und vom 15. Herbstmond 1894, Seiten 70 und 71.

(4) l. f. = landesfürstliche.

(5) StAZ, Karton 85, Regierung Nummer 482/1894, Schreiben Georg Schönerers vom 31. August 1894.

Literatur

Friedel Moll. Zur Geschichte des Turnunterrichts in Zwettl, in : Ottomar Demal/Volker Hakala (Herausgegeben) , Festschrift zur Eröffnung der Turnhalle der Hauptschule Zwettl-NÖ, Zwettl (1993) ; hier Seiten 49-68.

Friedel Moll und Michaël Wladika. Georg Ritter von Schönerer (1842-1921) . Ein alldeutscher Politiker aus dem Waldviertel, in : Harald Hitz / Franz Pötscher / Erich Rabl / Thomas Winkelbauer. Waldviertler Biographien, Band 3 - Schriftenreihe des Waldviertler Heimatbundes Nr. 52, Horn-Waidhofen / Thaya (2010) ; Seiten 121-150.
www.daswaldviertel.at

Eduard Pichl (Pseudonym : Herwig) . Georg Schönerer und die Entwicklung des Alldeutschtums in der Ostmark, 6 Bände, Wien (1897 bis 1938) .

Friedrich Polleroß. 100 Jahre Antisemitismus im Waldviertel. Schriftenreihe des Waldviertler Heimatbundes Nr. 25, Krems (1983) ; www.daswaldviertel.at Friedrich Polleroß (Herausgegeben) . « Die Erinnerung tut zu weh » . Jüdisches Leben und Antisemitismus im Waldviertel - Schriftenreihe des Waldviertler Heimatbundes Nr. 37, Horn-Waidhofen / Thaya (1996) ;

www.daswaldviertel.at

Andrew G. Whiteside. Georg Ritter von Schönerer. Alldeutschland und sein Prophet, Graz-Wien-Köln (1981) .

Michaël Wladika, Hitlers Vätergeneration. Die Ursprünge des Nationalsozialismus in der Kaiserlich und Königlich Monarchie, Wien-Köln-Weimar (2005) .

Nazi-Ehrenbürger am Pranger

Bezirksblätter-Recherchen : Kein Hitler als Ehrenbürger, dafür aber sein politischer Ziehvater Georg Schönerer.

Waidhofen / Zwettl (pez/schab) . Georg Ritter von Schönerer (1842-1921) war kein besonders sympathischer Kerl: Er forderte unter anderem schon um die Jahrhundertwende den Anschluß des deutschsprachigen Teils der Monarchie an das Deutsche Reich. Von seinen Anhängern ließ er sich als „Führer“ ansprechen und mit „Heil“ begrüßen. Einmal forderte der Abgeordnete der Gemeinden in den Bezirken Zwettl und Waidhofen sogar Prämien für getötete Juden.

Deshalb gilt Schönerer auch als eines der Vorbilder Hitlers.

Wie vergangene Woche bekannt wurde, behauptete der Grünen-Abgeordnete Karl Öllinger auf der Homepage www.stopptdierechten.at, daß eben jener Schönerer Ehrenbürger von Zwettl ist. Nachdem in ganz Österreich über die Aberkennung von Ehrenbürgerschaften von Nazi-Größen diskutiert wird, stellte der Bürgermeister der Stadtgemeinde Zwettl, Herbert Prinz, aber klar: Georg Heinrich Ritter von Schönerer wurde am 22. Oktober 1870 von der Zwettler Gemeindevertretung zum Ehrenbürger ernannt. 1894, nach der Gemeinderatswahl vom 28. und 29. August, bei der Schönerers Kandidaten in Zwettl sehr schlecht abschnitten, legte er seine Ehrenbürgerschaft verärgert zurück. Das entsprechende Dokument befindet sich im Stadtarchiv. In Waidhofen wurde Schönerer nie zum Ehrenbürger ernannt.

Keine unliebsamen Ehrenbürgerschaften in Archiven.

Ein Rundruf in den Gemeinden des Bezirks und einige Recherchen in angestaubten Archiven förderten keine weiteren Nazi-Größen als Ehrenbürger in den Gemeinden zu Tage. Ganz so wie man es am Gemeindeamt in Ludweis-Aigen ausdrückte :

« Bei uns sind nur ehrenwerte Leute Ehrenbürger. »

Georg Ritter von Schönerer

Geboren wurde Georg Schönerer 1842 auf Schloß Rosenau. Er war zuerst Vertreter der Gemeinden von Waidhofen und Zwettl im Reichsrat und später Führer der Deutschnationalen sowie der Alldeutschen Vereinigung. Er war radikaler Antisemit und damit eines der Vorbilder Hitlers.

Schönerer et l'antisémitisme

En 1882, pour le « Deutschnationaler Verein » fut rédigé le « programme de Linz », qui porta la signature, à côté de celle de Schönerer, de personnalités juives, comme Victor Adler et Heinrich Friedjung. Ce programme conciliait les aspirations de la démocratie politique, de la réforme sociale et du nationalisme allemand, ce qui ne paraissait nullement contradictoire à ses divers signataires. Sur le plan politique étaient exigés l'extension du suffrage, l'établissement d'un impôt progressif, le développement de l'école publique ; sur le plan social, la nationalisation de diverses entreprises, le respect du travail « honnête », la suppression du colportage à domicile (amplement pratiqué par les Juifs), une limite placée à la « puissance de l'argent » ; sur le plan national, la reconnaissance de l'allemand comme langue d'État, la pratique obligatoire de l'allemand pour les examens donnant accès aux fonctions publiques, l'abandon par l'Autriche de ses provinces non-allemandes, la fusion de l'Autriche avec l'espace douanier allemand.

Bien que le « programme de Linz » ne comportât encore que des clauses relevant de l'antisémitisme économique, il a pu paraître étonnant que Adler et Friedjung s'y soient alors associés. Il faut bien voir que ceux qui jouent dans la société viennoise un rôle de 1er plan (394 avocats israélites à Vienne sur 681, en 1890 ; 48 % d'étudiants juifs à la faculté de médecine, monopole presque complet de la presse), se sentent entièrement assimilés à la culture allemande, ne croient pas à l'avènement de l'antisémitisme, n'ont que des paroles de mépris pour le sionisme, et, pour la plupart, partagent l'idéologie de la réunion de l'Autriche à l'Allemagne, qui est celle de Schönerer, parce qu'elle leur donnera des débouchés professionnels que ne peut leur fournir l'Autriche.

Bien que les premières manifestations de la popularité de Schönerer se soient déroulées au sein du « Reformverein », créé en 1881, qui rassemblait surtout des artisans et des petits commerçants et qui organisa à Vienne plusieurs réunions où furent acclamés les slogans antisémites, c'est incontestablement auprès des étudiants, bien qu'il n'ait jamais fait d'études universitaires, que Schönerer connut sa plus grande popularité, et qui contribuèrent à radicaliser son mouvement. C'est qu'au « Reichsrat » et en ville il fréquentait les « Alte Herren », c'est-à-dire les anciens membres des associations d'étudiants nationalistes et dont il fit ses principaux lieutenants : Engelbert Pernerstorfer et Anton Lenggaßner venaient de l'« Arminia », Otto Steinwender de la « Silesia », Julius Sylvester de la « Teutonia », et toutes ces personnalités gardaient des contacts étroits avec le monde des étudiants. Après la formation du gouvernement du comte Taaffe, en 1879, qui passait pour être beaucoup plus favorable aux Slaves, sous le couvert du fédéralisme, les sympathies des étudiants pour Schönerer se firent de plus en plus évidentes. L'institution qui permit aux groupes qui se disaient ouvertement « all-deutsch » de s'exprimer était celle des « Kommerse » ou toasts en l'honneur d'une certaine personnalité, suivis de libations et de discours.

Déjà, en 1881, la « Silesia » avait organisé à Vienne une grande manifestation en l'honneur du 10^e anniversaire de la fondation de l'Empire allemand. En mars 1883 eut lieu le « Kommers » en l'honneur de Richard Wagner, auquel participa Schönerer et où furent invités de nombreux membres de l'Université et du « Reichsrat » : l'Orchestre donna l'Ouverture de « Rienzi », « la Mort d'Yseult », et la fin du « Crépuscule des Dieux », à la suite de quoi l'on chanta le « Wacht am Rhein » et le « Deutschland über Alles », l'on lut une dépêche de Moltke qui regrettait de ne pas être présent, et l'on hissa les couleurs allemandes. La violence des propos tenus par Schönerer contre le gouvernement de l'Autriche entraîna la levée provisoire de son immunité parlementaire mais cette sanction provoqua une nouvelle agitation, notamment contre le recteur de l'Université, Friedrich Maaßen, que l'on accusa de trahir la cause allemande. Les réunions de cet ordre se multiplièrent au cours des mois suivants, notamment le « Luther-Kommers », auquel participèrent 2 éminents professeurs de l'Université, Adolf Exner et Ottokar Lorenz, et qui acclama la réunion des populations allemandes d'Autriche au « Reich » allemand. Parmi les étudiants les plus enthousiastes pour Schönerer se trouvait le jeune Hermann Bahr, qui devait devenir plus tard un patriote autrichien et dont la carrière devait le porter à la direction du « Burgtheater ». Mais dans son « Selbstbildnis », il explique ainsi son attitude comme étudiant viennois :

« Mon cœur était brisé : là-bas (en Allemagne) , il y avait Sedan, Bismarck, Richard Wagner, qu'avions-nous à leur opposer ? Quel homme était capable chez nous de réaliser une telle œuvre ? Je n'entendais qu'un nom, celui de Schönerer, l'homme du jour. J'avais besoin d'admirer quelque chose, il n'y avait rien d'autre en Autriche. »

Ou encore :

« Je ne pouvais penser qu'il y eût, parmi les étudiants autrichiens, des traîtres à leur patrie. En fait, ils avaient 2 patries : la petite dans laquelle ils vivaient, la grande par derrière. Ces traîtres à leur patrie étaient très résolus, leur

trahison était honorable, et ils étaient prêts à en payer les conséquences. La figure colossale de Bismarck faisait partie du rayon de lumière qui illuminait ces traîtres, alors que pour nos patriotes rien ne brillait. »

Étudiant duelliste et gros buveur, Hermann Bahr se fit exclure des Universités de Graz, Vienne et Czernowitz. Devant le Sénat académique de Vienne, il déclara :

« Oui, Messieurs, je suis un traître, nous le sommes tous : nous voulons être Allemands. »

À Czernowitz, il était resté ostensiblement assis au cours d'un toast porté à l'Empereur François-Joseph, et dans une beuverie en l'honneur de Martin Luther, vilipenda les Juifs et les Slaves et leva son verre en l'honneur de Schönerer : les autorités académiques lui permirent cependant, en fin de compte, de passer ses examens juridiques, à la condition de quitter aussitôt la ville. Son père, qui, bon bourgeois de Linz, déplorait ses orgies de paroles et de boisson, tenta une démarche auprès de Schönerer pour qu'il cessât d'exercer sur lui ses dangereux sortilèges. Bahr devait poursuivre ses études à Berlin, où il tenta vainement de se faire présenter à Bismarck, et évolua vers un « socialisme à la prussienne » .

Monsieur Bahr n'est pas un cas isolé : il est plus étonnant de trouver parmi les « Aldeutschen » , Theodor Herzl, le futur fondateur du mouvement sioniste, mais qui se trouvait, au début des années 1880, faire partie de la même « Burschenschaft » nationaliste surnommée « Albia » que Bahr, et qui éprouvait alors la même attirance pour le « Reich » bismarckien. Herzl considérait alors les Juifs dans leur ensemble avec dédain, estimant que leur vie de ghetto les avait abrutis physiquement et moralement. Bien que certains historiens aient mis en doute ses idées pan-germanistes, sa grande amitié avec Oswald Boxer, étudiant qui appartient au « Deutscher Klub » , formation parlementaire dirigée par Schönerer, ne permet guère d'en douter. Il dut pourtant s'exclure de la « Burschenschaft Albia » après les excès antisémites du « Kommerz Richard Wagner » . C'est l'époque, en effet, où les associations d'étudiants multiplient les paragraphes d' « arianité » : la « Silesia » à Vienne se vante d'avoir été la Ire à le faire en 1883 ; elle fut suivie par l' « Oppavia » , la « Teutonia » , la « Thuringia » , la « Germamia » ; à Graz, la « Styria » fut la Ire. L' « Oppavia » alla même jusqu'à placer l'antisémitisme comme le point central du programme national.

La popularité de Schönerer fut portée à son comble par la controverse, en 1884, sur l'affaire des Chemins de fer du Nord autrichien, dont la banque Rothschild possédait plus de la moitié des actions, et à qui Schönerer, qui dénonçait son administration, refusait que le renouvellement de la concession lui fût accordée. Cette affaire lui permit de concilier son anti-capitalisme, son antisémitisme et son anti-Libéralisme. En demandant la nationalisation de la « Nordbahn » , il mit toute la violente énergie de sa révolte œdipienne retardée à détourner l'animosité populaire contre la banque et la bourse dans le combat antisémite. Il accusa non seulement les Libéraux et les ministres mais, indirectement, la Cour elle-même de s' « agenouiller devant la puissance des Rothschild et de leurs compères » , et il menaça de tous les bouleversements populaires « colossaux et violents » si l'on ne mettait pas fin immédiatement à cette puissance.

Ce fut l'époque où, chez Schönerer, l'antisémitisme raciste se substitua à l'antisémitisme économique qu'il avait jusqu'alors professé.

« Écrasez la vipère et faites son sort au poison journalistique, si vous ne voulez pas que le peuple opprimé se fasse justice lui-même. »

Dès 1881, il avait fait allusion à la constitution des colonies pénitentiaires pour Juifs, en Bosnie-Herzégovine, et soutenu l'accusation de meurtre rituel contre un juif hongrois. En 1882, il avait demandé au « Reichsrat » que l'on interdise de séjour des Juifs russes qui fuyaient les pogromes. En 1887, il proposera avec ses amis Fürnkranz et Türck un projet de loi envisageant l'ouverture de prisons pour « les menteurs de la presse juive et les coupeurs de cheveux en 4 ». Il faisait savoir que, si son mouvement n'obtenait pas tout de suite ce qu'il voulait, « ceux qui nous vengeront naîtront du cosmos », et qu'à la terreur des oppresseurs sémites ils répondront par la loi du talion, œil pour œil, dent pour dent. Le leader nationaliste disposait au service de son agitation de moyens considérables : au « Reichsrat », il siégeait avec 7 députés qui constituaient le « Verband der Deutschnationalen », mais dont l'influence s'exerçait sur tous les groupes voisins, soit environ sur 80 à 90 députés ; dans son journal, « Unverfälschte Deutsche Worte », dont le tirage varie entre 3,000 et 50,000 exemplaires, l'anti-judaïsme agressif ne se porte plus seulement contre les errements de l'économie ou de la presse juive, mais contre le « sang » ou la « race » juive (« Ob Jude, ob Christ ist einerlei, In der Rasse liegt, die Schweinerei ! ») dans le « Deutscher Schulverein », organisation considérable qui comporta 100,000 membres, à qui Schönerer tenta de faire voter le paragraphe d'aryanité ; dans les sociétés de gymnastique (« Turnvereine ») au sein desquelles se dessine, à Vienne et en Basse-Autriche, une tendance (« Deutscher Turnerbund ») favorable à l'exclusion des Juifs et à l'appartenance à la citoyenneté allemande. Mais c'est toujours parmi les étudiants que se manifeste le plus grand enthousiasme pour Schönerer : le « Kommers » qui fut organisé en son honneur, en septembre 1884, par la « Burschenschaft Oppavia », à Vienne, et, 1 mois plus tard, par les étudiants allemands de Prague, à Brüx. En avril 1885, au cours d'un « Kommers » en l'honneur de Bismarck, 600 étudiants viennois chargeaient Hermann Bahr, qui étudiait alors à Berlin, de remettre une adresse au Chancelier. Les réactions des autorités académiques se montrent de plus en plus inefficaces : lorsque le Sénat viennois prend des mesures contre Josef Ursin, dont le père est député nationaliste au « Reichstag », celui-ci émigre à Innsbruck, où il fonde la « Burschenschaft Suevia », où il poursuit son agitation ; à Graz, Hermann Kinzl, fils d'un avocat Libéral de renom, mais en révolte contre lui, fonde la « Burschenschaft Styria », se fait 2 fois exclure de l'Université, pour devenir plus tard, comme directeur du « Grazer Volksblatt », l'un des principaux disciples de Schönerer. S'il est difficile de créer une fédération stable d'étudiants allemands, dont le particularisme s'oppose souvent au tempérament autoritaire de Schönerer, celui-ci dispose dans le « Waidhofener Verband wehrhafter Vereine » d'une organisation qui lui est entièrement dévouée.

Cette prodigieuse carrière politique fut brutalement interrompue par une espièglerie : au moment de l'agonie de Guillaume Ier, le journal « Neues Wiener Tag Blatt », dont le rédacteur principal était Moritz Szeps, ami intime de Rodolphe de Habsbourg, annonça prématurément la mort du souverain. Furieux, Schönerer décida d'aller châtier l'équipe de ce « torchon juif ». L'agression physique était patente. Schönerer fut condamné à une brève peine de prison, mais, ce qui était plus grave, à la suspension de ses droits politiques et à la perte de ses titres de noblesse. Il semblait que sa carrière politique était brisée.

Les années 1890 représentent pour Schönerer une époque, sinon d'oubli, mais de retraite. La Ire place revient au

Parti Chrétien-Social, qui édifie sur un programme réformateur et corporatif inspiré par les écrits de Karl von Vogelsang, mais auquel Karl Lueger donne un extraordinaire dynamisme et une vaste popularité auprès de la petite bourgeoisie viennoise. Antisémitisme comme Schönerer, Lueger l'était cependant avec moins de violence et sans racisme : il avait l'habitude de dire :

« Qui est juif, c'est moi qui en décide. »

Et il ne mettait pas en question l'existence de la monarchie des Habsbourg. Son élection à la mairie de Vienne (qui n'avait été ratifiée qu'à la 3^e fois, du fait de la résistance de l'Empereur) domina l'histoire des années 1890. Un certain nombre de lieutenants de Schönerer, comme Ernst Vergani et Robert Pattai passèrent à Lueger.

...

... tions du monde germanique, réhabiliterait les légendes païennes et délivrerait les Allemands de la « domination romano-juive » exercée par l'Église catholique. Cet aspect du mouvement « Los-von-Rom » a été particulièrement souligné par un ami de Schönerer, Adolf Lanz (appelé Lanz von Liebenfels), qui définit une religion reposant sur le culte des ancêtres et de la race, fonda lui-même dans son château de Westertein un ordre aristocratique dont il était le grand-Maître, utilisait l'emblème de la croix gammée et les caractères runiques, et préconisait dans sa revue « Ostara », du nom de la divinité germanique du printemps, la castration et la stérilisation des faibles. L'un de ses disciples, Guido von List, avait tenté de dégager de l'influence corruptrice du christianisme la pureté des mœurs germaniques originelles.

L'emprise de la pensée raciste dans l'Autriche, au tournant du siècle, a été retracée par l'historien de Schönerer, Eduard Pichl (pseudonyme : Herwig), qui contribua considérablement à répandre ses idées. Schönerer préconisait un nouveau calendrier, qui faisait commencer l'ère chrétienne en 133 avant Jésus-Christ, date où l'on célébrait une victoire des Germains sur le monde Romain, signant ses lettres en 1888 de l'an 2001. Il recommandait aussi l'« Edda » comme Bible pour les Germains et réhabilitait le salut « Heil ! », qui ne devait s'adresser ni aux Juifs ni aux Slaves. Les associations locales du Parti « Alldeutsch » avaient reçu les noms des héros germaniques (Odin, Kriemhild, Baldur, Siegfried) qui alternaient avec ceux de l'histoire de la Réforme (von Hutten, Wartburg). De nombreux journaux (« Odin », « Grobian », « Volksru », « Organ wider Römlinge », « Undeutsche Finsterlinge and soziale Pharisäer ») répandirent sur leurs adversaires des grossièretés dignes du « Der Stürmer » de l'éditeur nazi Julius Streicher. À Linz d'abord, au Tyrol plus tard, parut « Der Scherer » qui se réclamait d'anciennes figures de l'histoire allemande (Hermann le Chérusque, Martin Luther, Friedrich Ludwig Jahn, Karl Sand, Robert Blum et, bien entendu, Otto Bismarck), pour établir les bases d'un antisémitisme international, en publiant des adresses d'anti-Dreyfusards français, des textes de Giordano Bruno et de Richard Wagner, attaquant de façon indifférente l'émancipation des femmes, la dépravation des mœurs et les progrès de l'alcoolisme.

Quel fut le succès du mouvement « Los-von-Rom » ? Le nombre des conversions au protestantisme a été controversé : relativement élevé, entre 1899 et 1902, persistant jusqu'en 1910, puis disparaissant. L'on pense généralement qu'il y eut une quarantaine de mille de personnes qui se convertirent, auxquelles il faut ajouter une dizaine de mille qui rejoignirent l' « Altkatholizismus » . Cependant des chiffres plus élevés ont été avancés : jusqu'à 75,000 conversions. Celles-ci ne se limitèrent pas aux pays frontaliers de la Bohême, mais s'étendirent aux pays alpins, touchant essentiellement les classes moyennes (instituteurs, médecins, avocats) mais, de façon imperceptible, paysans et ouvriers, ainsi que la noblesse. Quant aux étudiants, il est certain que nombre d'entre eux, à Vienne et à Prague surtout, l'étudiant Karl Horn, qui appartenait à l' « Akademische Burschenschaft » de Graz, présenta dans une brochure le cléricalisme ultra-montain comme le déchaînement de toutes les forces hostiles à l'Allemagne et l'instrument de la dégermanisation de l'Autriche. L'étudiant Sepp Strohmeyer, de l'école technique de Léoben, voit dans les catholiques « des traîtres par nature, toujours prêts à tirer dans le dos des Allemands, hostiles à l'unité de 1871, complices des slavophiles, dépourvus de toute fibre germanique puisqu'ils ne participent à aucune ligue nationale, à aucune ligue de défense du germanisme » . Mais peu d'entre eux se décidèrent à franchir le pas, 500 environ, et se recrutant dans une monde qui était déjà indifférent en matière religieuse. Il semble que nombre d'entre eux se soient heurtés à la résistance de leur famille : un chaud partisan de Schönerer, Jürgen Rekus, rapporte qu'un étudiant se vit répondre par son père : « Nicht mehr Rom, nichl mein Solm ! » . D'autre part, Schönerer n'obtint pas du pan-germanisme allemand le secours escompté : bien que le mouvement de conversion ait été soutenu par de puissantes organisations protestantes, l' « Evangelischer Bund » et le « Gustav-Adolf-Verein » , l'on pensait généralement dans les milieux nationalistes allemands qu'il ne fallait pas accroître le prestige d'un groupe politique qui avait comme fin la destruction de la monarchie des Habsbourg : c'était là également, depuis Bismarck, le point de vue du gouvernement allemand. Si quelques revues étudiantes de Munich firent écho à l'enseignement de Schönerer, celui-ci ne put établir de liens avec le pan-germanisme allemand.

Le mouvement « Los-von-Rom » a contribué à affaiblir la situation politique de Schönerer. Karl Hermann Wolf, son plus fidèle lieutenant (il s'était battu en duel avec le Comte Badeni, ministre de l'Intérieur, au moment des ordonnances) , fait dorénavant cavalier seul. Une partie influente du clergé populaire allemand, qui avait été touché par l'antisémitisme catholique de Josef Scheicher, se détourna de Schönerer quand celui-ci s'attaqua directement à la « débauche » des prêtres, aux crimes contre les mœurs dont ils se rendent coupables. Schönerer eut conscience que son mouvement se disloquait, qu'il n'en était plus le Maître incontesté. Dès lors, depuis 1902, il semble se désintéresser des affaires de son temps. Il demeure indifférent à la tentative pourtant prometteuse, de Walter Riehl, cependant soutenue par ses plus chauds partisans, de créer un Parti allemand des travailleurs, qui mettait au 1er plan, dans les districts industriels de la Bohême, la défense de la nationalité allemande contre la concurrence tchèque. Plus surprenant encore, Schönerer porta un désintérêt complet aux grands événements universitaires de la dernière décennie qui précéda la 1re Guerre : qu'il s'agit de la menace de la création d'une Université catholique à Salzbourg, du combat que menaient ses partisans contre le projet d'établir une faculté italienne de droit dans la ville « allemande d'Innsbruck, ou de l'affaire « Wahrmond » , suscitée par la révocation de la même Université d'Innsbruck d'un professeur de théologie dont les Partis catholiques dénonçaient les tendances modernistes : dans ces 3 affaires, qui pourtant touchaient de près, ou son attitude hostile à la religion romaine, ou la défense des intérêts allemands, il ne fit rien pour soutenir les thèses « All-deutsch » .

Aussi, sa popularité est-elle rapidement en déclin. Aux élections de 1907, les Ires qui eurent lieu au suffrage universel - il ne fut pas réélu à Eger et dut reconnaître que les partisans de Wolf avaient plus de voix que les siens. Après les élections de 1911, auxquelles il ne se présenta pas, les députés élus comme « All-deutsch » se répartirent dans les Partis conservateurs voisins. En 1913, au cours d'une fête qui lui fut offerte, il répéta ce slogan :

« Ohne Juda, ohne Rom
Wird gebauet Deutschland Dom ! »

Puis, il poussa un triple « hurra » , en l'honneur de Bismarck. En fait, il est alors un homme fini. Ses partisans adoptèrent pendant la guerre une attitude ambiguë : l'assassinat de François-Ferdinand, qu'ils détestaient, ne leur parut pas être une cause valable pour entrer dans la guerre, qu'ils soutinrent pourtant, parce que l'Autriche-Hongrie était l'alliée du « Reich » allemand et qu'ils attendaient de la victoire de ce dernier l'annexion des Allemands d'Autriche. Ils n'exercèrent aucune influence, ni pendant la guerre ni sur les événements qui la suivirent. Quand mourut Schönerer, en juin 1921, ce n'était plus qu'un cadavre politique, que l'on enterra, selon son désir, en Allemagne, non loin de la tombe de Bismarck, à « Friedrichsruhe » .

Le recul du mouvement « All-deutsch » , après 1901, ne peut cependant pas s'expliquer par le vieillissement de Schönerer, mais plutôt par la dépolitisation que l'on note, surtout dans les milieux étudiants, et que signale, en particulier, l'historien Karl Knoll dans l'histoire qu'il a laissée de la puissante « Burschenschaft Oppavia » , à Vienne : le problème de l'appartenance au « Reich » allemand ne se pose plus guère à la veille de la guerre ; il est possible de faire la preuve que l'on peut être à la fois « bon Allemand » et loyal à l'égard de la dynastie des Habsbourg ; et il apparaît plus profitable, plutôt que de se raidir dans un radicalisme sans nuance, de collaborer avec les Partis de gouvernement, en particulier, les Chrétiens-Sociaux. Cette orientation est confirmée, à la suite de l'échec du mouvement « Los-von-Rom » , par le réveil des idées religieuses dans les associations d'étudiants : les « Burschenschaften » qui se créent après 1900 prennent le plus souvent le nom d' « Austria » , ou de personnalités qui ont illustré le passé catholique de l'Autriche, Rodolphe IV (« Rodolfiana ») , Charles II (« Carolina ») , Ferdinand II (« Ferdinandiana ») . Ce réveil religieux est en étroite relation avec la personnalité de Karl Lueger qui, alors en concordance de vue avec l'Archiduc François-Ferdinand, veut restaurer la mentalité « schwarz-gelb » et revenir aux sources catholiques de la mission des Habsbourg. La croyance dans la renaissance de l'idée autrichienne et du retour à la contre-Réforme se lit, à la veille de la guerre, dans l'œuvre du tyrolien Heinrich von Schullern, « Jung-Oesterreich » , dans les essais de Hermann Bahr, bien revenu de son borussisme de jeunesse, et surtout de Richard Kralik, dont l' « Histoire d'Autriche » (1913) , en accusant Frédéric II et Otto Bismarck, prend le contre-pied des idées de Schönerer.

Cependant ces remarques, qui valent surtout pour les sphères supérieures de la société viennoise, ne doivent pas dissimuler l'influence profonde qu'a exercée Schönerer, qui a eu, dans ses années de triomphe, sans doute 50 % de la population allemande de la Cisleithanie derrière lui. Le « Deutschnationalismus » s'est implanté dans les consciences, avec ses suites antisémites, anti-Slaves et anti-Catholiques, moins sous l'influence de Richard Wagner, de Houston Stewart Chamberlain ou de Julius Langbehn que par la diffusion d'innombrables feuillets, de revues, de courtes pièces, partiellement venues d'Allemagne comme « Der Gute Kamerad » , destiné aux jeunes, ou les romans de Felix Dahn, mais aussi publiés en Autriche, comme les nouvelles de Karl Hans Strobl et de Walter von Molo. Mais surtout dans les régions frontalières de la Bohême, de la Moravie et de la Slovénie s'est développée une littérature nationaliste allemande, dont les auteurs sont souvent, comme Anton Ohorn et Hans Kirchsteiger dans les pays sudètes, des prêtres ou des moines défrôqués, ou qui, comme Rudolph Hans Bartsch en Styrie du Sud, préconisent la conversion au protestantisme. « Conserver le “ Volkstum ” des ancêtres, voilà la mission sacrée. », tel est le thème qui revient sans cesse.

Cette littérature de frontière, qui connut un succès énorme (le « Beichsiegel » de Hans Kirchsteiger, rempli de détails souvent pornographiques sur l'immoralité et les vices du Clergé, eut avant la guerre jusqu'à 36 éditions) fut parfaitement connue d'Adolf Hitler. Dans le pays où il est né, en Haute-Autriche, l'imprégnation des idées de Schönerer n'est pas moindre : il apparaît que l'école technique de Linz, où vit Hitler, de 1903 à 1908, est dans sa majorité conquise aux idées « All-deutsch », que les « Pennalie » prennent des dénominations de divinités germaniques, pratiquent le « boycott » des Juifs, vouent une haine irréductible à l'archiduc François-Ferdinand, dont on dénonce les visées catholicisantes. On lit le « Deutschvölkischer Zeitweiser », version améliorée dans le sens de l'antisémitisme du fameux « programme de Linz ». Le Maître d'Hitler, Leopold Pötsch, lui aussi un moine détroqué de Saint-Florian, enseigne au jeune Hitler le respect du « Volkstum », le mépris des Habsbourg et des Slaves :

« Aidons, dit-il, nos frères allemands dans les pays opprimés. »

Autant de signes, comme l'a lumineusement montré Friedrich Heer dans son livre « Der Kampf um die österreichische Identität » à quel point la pensée de Hitler était préfigurée par celle de Schönerer, bréviaire des haines sur lesquelles s'est plus tard édifié son diabolique pouvoir.

Le Programme de Linz (1882)

The « Linz Program » : expression of German nationalist radicalism within Austria-Hungary, named after its town of origin in Upper-Austria (« Oberösterreich ») . It was drafted, in 1882, by the extreme nationalist Georg Ritter von Schönerer and, subsequently, by Victor Adler, Engelbert Pernerstorfer, Robert Pattai, and Heinrich Friedjung. Their main hope was to centralize the administration under German leadership while removing Slavic areas from the Austrian Empire. They demanded autonomy for Galicia (the north-eastern most part of the Empire) under its Polish inhabitants and for Dalmatia (in part, the coastal territory of modern Croatia) under its Italian minority, though they were ready to add the 2 to Hungary if the Magyars, many of whom disliked the Dual Monarchy, supported the Germans in Austria. The Program degenerated into anti-Slav sentiment, specifically, a dispute over the administrative partition of Bohemia. Other demands of the « Linz Program » were for extended franchise, progressive taxation, and protective legislation for the poorer sections of the community.

The « Linz Program » in : « Parlament und Verfassung in Österreich » (Parliament and Constitution in Austria) , Volume 3, edited by Gustav Kolmer, « Kaiserlich und Königlich Hof-Buchdruckerei », Vienna (1905) ; pages 212-214. Translated by Jeremy King and Rachel Coll (2001) .

In June 1882, Representative Schönerer returned from Breslau (in the German Empire) and set to strengthening the organization of his Party on the basis of a Program that men of the most diverse political orientations had assembled 2 years previously, for a German People's Party that never came into being. Engelbert Pernerstorfer and Doctor Victor Adler had given the Program a socialist content, while Doctor Friedjung, Doctor Pattai, Doctor Sylvester, and Diet

Representative Krenmayr had incorporated progressive and German populist (« deutschvolkliche ») themes. Now, Schönerer, with his closest adherents, made the so-called Jewish Plank (aimed at fighting Jewish corruption and maintaining the purity of the Aryan race) an underpinning to the far-reaching national, political, and economic Program. The slogan was : « Through Purity to Unity » . For the constituting of the new Party, a meeting of like-minded people was planned in Linz, for August 24, 1882. The police forbade the meeting, which was then postponed until September 24, and forbidden again. Representative Schönerer published his Program, which received the name of « Linz Program » and consisted of 36 points - the essence of which read as follows :

I - In the interest of making those crownlands of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy which previously belonged to the German Confederation into a maximally independent and strictly unitary organized whole, the following goals are to be pursued :

(1) Personal union with Hungary (i.e. , the reduction of Austria's relationship with Hungary to nothing more than a sharing of the same Habsburg ruler) .

(2) The incorporation of Dalmatia, Bosnia, and Herzegovina into Hungary.

(3) Either the unification of Galicia and the Bukovina with Hungary or the concession of a special status to those lands, similar to the status of Croatia « vis-a-vis » Hungary.

II - In the interest of preserving the German character of those crownlands which previously belonged to the German Confederation, a law is demanded that declares German to be the State language. It is to be decreed in particular that :

(4) The German language is to be the exclusive language of the military, representative bodies, and public offices and, accordingly, that all official internal communication is to be carried-out exclusively in German, and no one is to be allowed to hold a State position or any other public office unless he is completely fluent in German.

(5) In areas with a linguistically mixed population, at least one elementary school is to use German as the language of instruction, and the German language is to be an obligatory subject in all secondary schools, at the same time that no student may be forced to acquire another language, whether native to the crownland or the district.

(6) All State exams, the successful completion of which qualifies candidates for employment by the State or crownland, are to be administered exclusively in German.

III - In the interest of giving the fullest possible consideration to constitutional principles, the following goals are to be pursued :

(7) The current system of representation is to be transformed into a genuine popular assembly, through a progressive expansion of the right to vote.

(8) Only experienced men true to their principles and possessed of an uncompromising character and proven disinterestedness may be elected to the Parliament.

(9) Priests, State officials, and the presidents, members of the board, and directors of railroads or corporations that do business with the State, that are bankrupt, or are being liquidated may not be elected to the Parliament.

IV - The fullest possible implementation of the Liberal principles laid down in the Fundamental Laws of the State, and thus :

(10) Freedom of association and of assembly.

(11) Freedom of the press, the abolition of the newspaper stamp tax, security deposit, and legal restrictions, and the lifting of restrictions on the circulation of periodicals.

(12) Maintenance and complete implementation of the principles on which our elementary schools are built.

V - Serious efforts at establishing order in the State budget, and thus :

(13) A final settling of accounts with Hungary with regard to the shared debt and the debt of 80 million to the Austro-Hungarian Bank, as well as a shifting of the costs of occupation onto the occupied territories (i.e. , Bosnia and Herzegovina) .

(14) Regulation of the currency.

(15) The achievement of savings through simplification of the judiciary and administration, without endangering the defensive power of the Empire through a reduction of military expenditures, and the formation of a regular budget.

VI - Drastic changes to the current system of taxation, and thus :

(16) The introduction of a progressive income tax (the setting of a higher tax rate for income on investments.

(17) Reform of the inheritance tax, introduction of a luxury tax, taxation of stock market transactions.

(18) Reform of indirect taxes, such that the prices of indispensable food stuffs are affected little or not at all, while luxury items are affected considerably. Revision of the laws concerning administrative fees and stamps, as well as revision of tariffs.

VII - As a pre-condition for a prospering economy, the following goals are to be pursued :

(19) Creation of a common customs area with the German Empire, together with Hungary and the Balkan countries.

(20) Introduction of obligatory trade associations and workers' factory associations, and the creation of Chambers of Commerce with separate sections for commerce, the trades, agriculture, forestry, and the interests of the working-class.

(21) The creation of an Economic Council to which all legislative proposals and decrees having an economic content must be submitted for approval.

VIII - Economic undertakings of importance to all must be taken over by the State or regulated in such fashion that both public and private interests might be protected, thus :

(22) Nationalization of the railroads and regulation of transportation tariffs, as well as the creation of appropriate waterways, in particular the Danube-Oder Canal.

(23) Nationalization of the insurance industry.

(24) Passage of a law on corporations that provides protection against moral and economic threats.

IX - The support of domestic production and honest labor, and thus :

(25) Reform of trades regulations.

(26) Reform of factory legislation (establishment of standard working hours, employer liability for workers' injuries ; introduction of factory inspectors) .

(27) Creation of swift and equitable (« billig ») justice (introduction of oral and public proceedings, penal colonies for individuals who present a danger to the community) .

X - Maintenance of a strong peasantry, and thus :

(28) Creation of agricultural credit institutions.

(29) Effective intervention by the State to prevent further indebtedness and devaluation of farms, especially by providing-up to half of the legally assessed value (to the owner) in cases of foreclosure.

(30) Reform of rural inheritance rights, and creation of a homestead law.

XI - Protection of the Monarchy against external threats, and thus :

(31) Fortification of the eastern boundary of the Empire.

(32) Maintenance of the defensive capabilities of the Empire.

(33) Considerable expansion of the Navy.

XII - The devotion of special attention to foreign affairs, and thus :

(34) Support for a long-term strengthening of the alliance with Germany through a State treaty.

(35) Strong and purposeful policy in the Orient, in particular the defense of Austrian interests along the Lower-Danube and in the Balkan countries.

(36) Strong defense of Austria's maritime interests, especially in the Mediterranean and in the Mediterranean countries.

...

The « Linz Program » of 1882 was a political platform that called for the complete Germanization of the Austrian State. It was created in response to the rising social, economic and political position of the Slavic peoples within the Austria-Hungary Dual Monarchy. The framers of the Program were fearful that the Slavs were over-running the German element of the monarchy.

The « Linz Program » was created by 5 Austrian intellectuals of German descent :

Victor Adler : a Jewish physician, socialist and founder of the Social-Democratic Party in Austria. Ist associated with the Liberal German nationalist movement, he later became an activist for the Austrian working-class.

Georg Schönerer : a politician who began as a Liberal German nationalist only to, later in life, become a leading anti-Semite and supporter of an extreme Pan-German agenda.

Robert Pattai : a lawyer.

Heinrich Friedjung : a Jewish historian.

Engelbert Pernerstorfer : a writer and, later, Socialist activist.

The goal of the framers was to create a German-dominated Austrian State. They proposed ceding the regions of Galicia, Bukovina and Dalmatia to Hungary or giving the regions complete autonomy, and they wanted Austria's ties to Hungary to be only of a personal nature, with no administrative or legislative consequences. Additionally, German was to become the official language of Austria, and a proposed Customs union, which would be added to the monarchy's constitution, would provide strengthened ties to the German « Reich » .

Rather than being a blueprint for a political movement, the proposal was more rhetorical. The emotional inclinations of the framers are well-represented in the following excerpt from their manifesto :

« We protest against all attempts to convert Austria into a Slavic State. We shall continue to agitate for the maintenance of German as the official language and to oppose the extension of federalism. We are steadfast supporters of the alliance with Germany and the foreign policy now being followed by the Empire. » (Roman, page 512.)

Ultimately, Adler and the others wanted Austria to exist separate from the Habsburg Monarchy, which controlled much of central Europe at the time ; instead, they wanted to tie themselves as close as possible to Germany.

Following its creation, the « Linz Program » never gained much support in any influential political circles. Additionally, the framers eventually distanced themselves from the Program. This was due in large part to Schönerer's venomous anti-Semitic inclinations, which became associated with the Program, over time.

The German National movement from its beginnings up to the adoption of the Linz programme in 1882

The defeat of Austria by the Prussians at the Battle of Königgrätz, in 1866, and the subsequent withdrawal of the Habsburg Monarchy from the German Federation led to a major regrouping within the German National camp.

While the one group rejected the Habsburg State and espoused the cause of the unification of all Germans within a German nation State, the others accommodated themselves with the monarchy and focussed their policies on protecting German traditions against the increasing Slav influence.

Until well into the 1870's, the German National movement lacked political clout. At parliamentary level, it was initially only able to develop its ideas within the Liberal Constitutional Party. In 1871, this split into the Liberal Club and the Progressive Club with its German national orientation, whose members included the later German National leader, Georg Ritter von Schönerer. Although the latter's demagogic skills enabled him to spread the German national idea, his radical political style prevented him from acquiring any great significance. Nevertheless, Schönerer's ideological group became a gathering of all the national tendencies that were also to be seen in modified or weakened form in the other national groups.

Schönerer, a champion of the Smaller German idea, argued vehemently against the Habsburg State and pleaded in favour of the unification of the German-speaking territories of Austria with the German « Reich » . He pursued a radical German national course, inveighing against capitalists, Jews and the Catholic Church, with his « Away-from-Rome Movement » recommending conversion from Catholicism to the more German-friendly Protestantism. Aurelius Polzer, one of Schönerer's supporters, described the national ideology as follows :

« German and loyal, outright and true, / Free of Jews, free of Czechs, / Free of priests and free of foreigners, / In short, straight and pure. »

Schönerer succeeded in combining the reactionary solutions he advanced with democratic or even progressive ideas. He left the Liberal Party, at the end of the 1870's, creating his own 2 man Party together with Heinrich Fürnkranz, the mayor of Langenlois, in Lower-Austria. In 1882, the German National Association was founded, whose members included not only Schönerer but also the later Social-Democrats Engelbert Pernerstorfer and Victor Adler, the later Christian-Social Robert Pattai, the historian and journalist Heinrich Friedjung and the German National politician Otto Steinwender.

The 1882 « Linz Programme » set-out the most important principles of the German National Association. It included national demands, such as the wish for closer links with the German « Reich » and for the creation of a common customs territory. At the same time, it contained a number of social and democratic demands : the broadening of the suffrage ; the freedom of association and the press ; a progressive income tax ; regulated working hours ; and the reduction of child and women's labour. Since Jewish members were involved in the creation of the « Linz Programme » , it did not contain any Jewish clauses despite Schönerer's open espousal of anti-Semitism. It was only in 1885, when the list was increased by the addition of a demand for the « elimination of the Jewish influence on all fields of public life » that Adler, Friedjung and Pernerstorfer left the Association. Since in the House of Deputies, the programme was only supported by Schönerer and Fürnkranz, it had no direct consequences at parliamentary level. However, it became the most important programmatic manifesto of the German National movement.

...

Das Linzer Programm war ein 1882 in Linz erarbeitetes Grundsatzpapier des österreichischen Deutschnationalismus. Das Dokument stand unter dem Motto « nicht liberal, nicht klerikal, sondern national » und forderte die staatsrechtliche und wirtschaftliche Entflechtung der verschiedenen Völker Cisleithaniens, die engere Anbindung seiner deutschsprachigen Gebiete an das Deutsche Reich sowie Pressefreiheit, Versammlungsfreiheit und allgemeine Demokratisierung. Es enthielt darüber hinaus auch einige aus heutiger Sicht sozialistisch oder sozialdemokratisch scheinende sozialreformerische Vorschläge. Initiatoren und Leiter seiner Ausarbeitung waren die Politiker Victor Adler und Georg von Schönerer, der Politiker und Journalist Engelbert Pernerstorfer sowie der Historiker und Publizist Heinrich Friedjung.

War das Linzer Programm ursprünglich ein Dokument breiten Konsenses unter antiklerikalen Reformpolitikern unterschiedlichen sozialen und intellektuellen Hintergrunds, so wurde es nach der Auseinanderentwicklung Adlers und Schönerers und vor allem nach der 1885 von Schönerer vorgeschlagenen Hinzufügung eines sogenannten « Arierparagrafen » und anderer antisemitischer Regelungen praktisch nur noch von Anhängern Schönerers hochgehalten.

Kernforderung des Linzer Programms war die so gut wie vollständige Trennung von Cisleithanien und Transleithanien. Die beiden so genannten Reichshälften waren seit dem Österreichisch-Ungarischen Ausgleich von 1867 zwar formal voneinander unabhängige Staaten, hatten aber nicht nur ein gemeinsames Staatsoberhaupt und eine Gemeinsame Armee, sondern betrieben auch gemeinsame Außenpolitik und waren vor allem auch wirtschaftlich eng miteinander verflochten. Viele Österreicher empfanden die regelmäßigen Subventionszahlungen der österreichischen an die ungarische Reichshälfte als grundsätzlich ungerecht oder zumindest unverhältnismäßig hoch, darüber hinaus führten stockende jährliche Neuverhandlungen wiederholt zu wirtschafts- und sicherheitspolitischen Blockaden. Gemäß dem Linzer Programm sollte die Doppelrolle als Kaiser von Österreich und König von Ungarn, die das jeweilige Oberhaupt der Habsburger seit 1867 ausfüllte, erhalten bleiben; abgesehen davon und von einer eher vagen militärischen Beistandsverpflichtung sollten die beiden Staaten komplett entkoppelt werden.

Ähnlich wie Ungarn sollten auch Galizien und die Bukowina, zwei wirtschaftlich besonders schwache Kronländer Österreichs, in die faktische wie formale Eigenverantwortlichkeit entlassen werden. Die Provinzen Dalmatien, Bosnien und Herzegowina sollten vorläufig an Ungarn zediert werden, langfristig sollten sie gemeinsam mit dem bisher ungarisch regierten Kroatien ein « Königreich der Südslawen » bilden und als solches ebenfalls emanzipiert werden. Eine Umsetzung dieser Forderungen hätte den verbliebenen Rumpf Cisleithaniens politisch wie wirtschaftlich wesentlich entlastet, insbesondere dadurch, daß sich der Staat mit ihr fast aller seiner Polen und der meisten seiner « Ostjuden » entledigt hätte - Menschen, deren Gemeinschaften vergleichsweise wenig zur Dynamik der österreichischen Volkswirtschaft beitrugen und unter anderen Österreichern ausgesprochen unbeliebt waren.

Österreich hätte im Wesentlichen nur aus seinen deutsch-, tschechisch- und slowenischsprachig dominierten Kronländern bestanden. Diese Gebiete waren nicht nur verhältnismäßig wohlhabend und politisch gut entwickelt, es war ihnen vor allem noch deutlich anzumerken, daß sie alle Teile des 1806 untergegangenen Heiligen Römischen Reichs gewesen waren. Die Umsetzung des Linzer Programms hätte eine engere Anbindung oder überhaupt einen Anschluß des deutschsprachigen Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich, das Fernziel des Deutschnationalismus, nach Ansicht seiner Autoren damit wesentlich erleichtert. Als ersten Schritt in Richtung Vereinigung sah das Linzer Programm eine Zollunion Österreichs mit dem deutschen Reich vor.

Zusätzlich zu seinem deutschnationalen Kern enthielt das Linzer Programm Forderungen nach Pressefreiheit, Versammlungsfreiheit, Säkularisierung und Ausweitung des Wahlrechts auf bisher davon ausgeschlossene soziale Schichten. Darüber hinaus forderte das Manifest eine umfassende Sozialreform; unter anderem sollten eine staatliche Pensions- und Unfallversicherung eingerichtet, Frauen- und Kinderarbeit weitgehend verboten werden. Das Linzer Programm enthielt damit fast alle zentralen Forderungen der in Österreich erst 1889 ausgeformten Sozialdemokratie, ohne sich aber als marxistisch oder sozialistisch inspiriert zu sehen.

In seiner ursprünglichen Form war das Linzer Programm eher allgemein chauvinistisch als spezifisch jüdenfeindlich. Seine Autoren bekannten sich zwar offen zu der Auffassung, daß es für Österreich vorteilhaft wäre, seine runde Million galizischer Juden aus dem Staatsverband auszustoßen, da diese kulturell zu fremdartig und wirtschaftlich zu wenig leistungsfähig seien, sie vertraten die gleiche Annahme aber auch bezüglich der katholischen Polen und der orthodoxen Ruthenen. Der Vorschlag, zwischen den nicht oder kaum assimilierten, großteils bitterarmen « Ostjuden » und dem restlichen Österreich eine neue Staatsgrenze zu errichten, fand darüber hinaus auch unter vielen jüdischen und jüdischstämmigen Einwohnern westlicherer Kronländer Unterstützung. Neben anderen Mitautoren waren auch Adler und Friedjung selbst jüdischer Abstammung.

Explizit antisemitisch war die 1885 veröffentlichte Überarbeitung durch Schönerer. Schönerer war zwischen 1882 und 1885 zu der Auffassung gelangt, daß der « jüdische Einfluss » auf das öffentliche Leben Österreichs vordringlichstes Problem, die « Beseitigung » dieses Einflusses « unerlässlich » sei. Schönerer erweiterte das Linzer Programm in diesem Sinne um eine Bestimmung, die jüdische und jüdischstämmige Menschen von jeglicher Mitgliedschaft in deutschnationalen Parteien und Vereinen ausschloss, da ihnen die charakterliche Befähigung zur Teilhabe an der deutschen Nation abgesprochen wurde. Schönerer brach damit nicht nur mit Adler und Friedjung, sondern auch mit vielen anderen Deutschnationalen. Selbst Lueger, der einen neuzeitlichen Antijudaismus vertrat, konnte sich mit Schönerers Arierparagraph nicht identifizieren.

Adler und Lueger lehnten nicht nur Schönerers Überarbeitung ab, sondern wandten sich im Lauf der 1880er auch von der ursprünglichen Fassung ab. Ab Ende der 1880er bekannten sich praktisch nur noch die so genannten Schönerianer zum Linzer Programm. Mit der Zeit geriet in Vergessenheit, daß das Linzer Programm ursprünglich auch von späteren Sozialdemokraten und Christlichsozialen mitgetragen worden war. In der Erinnerung der Öffentlichkeit wurde das Papier zu einer von Anfang an spezifisch schönerianischen Angelegenheit, anstelle der gemeinschaftlich erarbeiteten Fassung galt nun die eigenmächtig erweiterte Version Schönerers als das echte und eigentliche Linzer Programm.

Karl Lueger (II)

Karl Lueger was born in Vienna, in 1844, and, having completed his studies, he initially practiced as a lawyer before dedicating himself to a political career, in 1875. Over the years, Lueger was a Member of Parliament and a member of the Lower-Austrian Provincial Legislature though the core of his political activity was taken-up by Viennese municipal politics. He was a member of the Vienna City Council for over 30 years and mayor of the city, from 1897 till his death, in 1910.

Lueger, who, at 1st, tended towards Liberalism, founded the Christian-Socialist Party, in 1893. The Party regarded itself as serving the interests of the lower middle-classes and attempted to address their needs and fears during a period of rapid social change by using slogans that were anti-Capitalist, anti-Liberal and explicitly anti-Semitic. In order to capture the votes of these social classes, a new kind of politician came into being at all levels of politics. He was the « tribuns plebes » and could be characterized as someone who entered into direct contact with the people in pubs, beer halls and market places, who tried to speak « the language of the people » and was no longer an unapproachable representative of the ruling class.

Karl Lueger was an outstanding example of this new kind of politician : he attempted to get a feeling for the mood of « the people » ; he like to hold speeches in dialect, took account of the intellectual level of his listeners, made complex issues simple and tried to entertain his public with humorous remarks. He was especially successful when he attacked the supposed enemies of his listeners. He stoked antipathy to politicians with different points of view, as well as national and religious minorities. His polemical attacks, sometimes extremely drastically formulated, were not directed towards reason but consciously appealed to emotions and instincts. Thus, he understood how to use rousing speeches to win over the Viennese population to his cause, consciously invoking stereotypical images of alleged enemies and, in particular, making use of anti-Semitic prejudice. Every set-back was reduced to a simple formula : « The Jews are to blame. » and stirred-up hatred with statements such as : « We will prevent the oppression of Christians and a new Palestine replacing the ancient Austrian Empire of Christians. » . In the process, he activated the traditional Catholic anti-Semitism directed against « the people who killed God » . He combined it with anti-Liberal and anti-Capitalist elements and thus addressed the widespread prejudice against « money and stock-market Jews » , « press Jews » , « ink Jews » (i.e. , Jewish intellectuals and businessmen) . Under his leadership, the Christian-Socialists regarded their main political task as the reduction of the « rapidly growing power of the Jews » and the reversal of their emancipation which had only taken place in 1867.

Around 1900, the accusations of ritual murder, a relict of the Middle-Ages, were, once again, revived. Catholic clergymen were prominent in disseminating many blood-curdling tales. Lueger was convinced that the Catholic Church was « protection and shield against Jewish oppression » and would « liberate Christian people from the shameful shackles of servitude to the Jews » . Lueger's championing of the man in the street's interests, his skill as a political speech-maker, as well as his ambitious programme of reforms led to his Party gaining the majority in the 1895 municipal elections. Lueger was elected to the office of mayor but Emperor Franz-Josef refused his consent because he considered that, in the light of Lueger's outspoken anti-Semitism, his confirmation would undermine the laws guaranteeing equality to all citizens. As a result, the elections had to be repeated 4 times before the monarch finally confirmed Lueger in the office of Mayor of Vienna.

During his period of office, as mayor of Vienna, he realized numerous large-scale projects such as the building of the 2nd Vienna mountain spring water pipeline, the municipalisation of the gas and electricity supply, the tramway system and the building of welfare institutions such as the almshouse in Lainz and the « Steinhof » psychiatric hospital. In addition to the problems that derived from the rapid social changes at the end of the 19th Century, Lueger's term as Mayor of Vienna was particularly influenced by national conflicts inside the Danube monarchy. Besides that, there were increases in unemployment and a wave of price increases so that people became increasingly receptive to radical nationalist slogans.

Lueger's oft-repeated principle was : « Vienna is German and must remain German. » . The vernacular, which, in the multi-ethnic State, was defined by nationality, formed the starting point for his political position : there was an energetic insistence that those Viennese who spoke no German be forced to communicate in that language.

Lueger also instigated changes in the Vienna naturalisation laws of 1890. The provisions stated that anyone who wished to become a citizen of Vienna had to have a spotless police and business record, have a fixed abode in Vienna for 10 years and be able to prove that they had paid their taxes for the same length of time. They had to be economically self-supporting and swear an oath to the mayor « that they would fulfill all the duties of a citizen as laid-out in the municipal laws and, to the best of their knowledge and abilities, they would work towards the well-being of the municipality » . An addition was made to this passage in the oath : « ... and to do everything in their power to uphold the German character of the city » . Furthermore, the ceremony of taking the citizen's oath in the City Hall was bound-up with a formal declaration of the principle that Vienna was a German city.

Even today, one can occasionally hear statements to the effect that although Lueger did utter Anti-Semitic slogans, he didn't mean them seriously. With his much quoted aphorism, « I decide who is a Jew ! » , he arrogated to himself the freedom to make exceptions. This was all harmless compared to the concurrent political activity of Georg Ritter von Schönerer who represented a form of anti-Semitism based on the construct of « race » .

This ignores the fact that Lueger was the 1st politician to make anti-Semitism « socially acceptable » and who used it to forge a conventional political movement. Thereafter, anti-Semitism appeared to many people to be both normal and respectable and it soon found its way into the political programmes of other Parties. After Lueger's death, anti-Semitism became a significant factor in Austrian political life and it was to remain so in the coming decades.

In 1926, a statue was erected to Lueger's memory. It was designed was by Josef Müller who emerged victorious from a competition, in 1912. Due to the 1st World War and the general lack of funding and materials, the actual building had been postponed. In 1922, the 25th anniversary of Lueger's conformation as Mayor of Vienna, the Christian-Socialist municipal Party organisation revived and forced through the planned construction. In September of 1926, the re-designed square with its new monument was officially re-opened to the public.

...

Karl Lueger (1844-1910) , leader of the anti-Semitic Christian-Social Party, in Austria. Born in Vienna into a lower middle-class family, he qualified as a lawyer. He began his political career with the left-wing of the Progressive Party and was elected as its candidate to the city council, in 1875. There, he associated with Jewish members, among them Ignaz Mandl, a Jewish lawyer who remained his friend and political adviser even after Lueger had ousted him from the Democrats, in 1889. In 1884, he sponsored the Democrats' electoral demand for « equality of all faiths » . Elected to the parliament, in 1885, he cooperated with the political anti-Semite Georg von Schönerer but denied being himself an anti-Semite. A year later, he berated the Liberal majority in the City Council for refusing to deliver a congratulatory address to Adolf Fischhof, on the occasion of his 70th birthday. In spite of this, Lueger made a violently anti-Semitic speech, in 1887, in support of Schönerer's bill against Jewish immigration from Russia and Romania. After allying himself with Karl von Vogelsang, in 1893, he united the different Christian factions into the Christian-Social Party (CS) , which he led until his death. Lueger was extremely popular with the lower middle-classes, largely because of his folksy and vulgar speeches uniting popular economic and religious anti-Semitic prejudices. He succeeded in forging a Party which channeled social discontent, depicting Capitalism and Marxism alike as products of the Jewish mind and fusing these new themes with the Centuries-old hatred of the Jews stemming from Church doctrine. In 1897, Emperor Franz-Josef I confirmed Lueger as mayor of Vienna, after he had refused to do so on 3 previous occasions. In this office, which he held until his death, he effected many social reforms. His administration pursued discriminatory practices against Jews, mainly through not employing them in the city services and limiting their numbers in high-school and the University. Nevertheless, he was in the habit of doing petty favors for poor Jews, even appearing in a synagogue wearing the mayoral chain. In his administration, he employed, besides Mandl (who was baptized at the age of 72) , the partly Jewish vice-mayor Julius Porzer and the renegade Max Anton Loew. He accepted invitations to Jewish homes and is reported to have said :

« Werein Jude ist, bestimme ich. » (It is up to me to decide who is a Jew.)

A collection of Lueger's papers, translated and edited by R. S. Geehr, was titled after this notorious phrase : « I Decide Who Is a Jew ! » (1982) .

Lueger's anti-Semitism was opportunistic rather than racist, but he had a profound influence on the young Adolf Hitler in his formative years, and established on a firm footing the Viennese anti-Semitic tradition.

...

In a prescient article, published in 1900, the editor-in-chief of the Viennese socialist newspaper « Arbeiter-Zeitung » , Friedrich Austerlitz tried to explain, in Marxist terms, the extraordinary popularity of the lord mayor of Vienna, Karl Lueger, leader of the Christian-Social Party. With characteristic irony, he pointed-out that, the career of this former lawyer is truly one of the most interesting phenomena of our times. The key to following and understanding it is provided by a knowledge of the psychology of the « petite bourgeoisie » . Lueger enriched political science by a great discovery : he transformed democracy, a political orientation that was dying of boredom, into modern demagogy, into the art of fobbing people off with the appearance instead of the reality of the situation.

11 years later, following the death of the man who was widely known and loved by his followers as the « King of Vienna » , the Social-Democrat Austerlitz acknowledged that Lueger was indeed « the 1st “ bourgeois ” politician who recognized the importance of the masses in politics » . The Social-Democrats, by 1911, already the chief rivals of Christian-Socialism, could afford to be generous, for with Lueger's exit from the scene, his Party lost 35,000 votes in Vienna and held on to only 4 of the Imperial capital's 33 seats, in the general elections of that year. Although the set-back proved to be only temporary and it would be an exaggeration to present the Christian-Social Party as the work of one man, however commanding his presence, it is certainly true that Doctor Karl Lueger was the representative political phenomenon of his time and place.

It is, however, less easy to define precisely what constituted this representative character of his political personality and to assess his historic significance from the perspective of the late- 20th Century. Can he be viewed properly as a mentor of Adolf Hitler, as a proto-fascist leader or as a pioneer of « post-rational politics » , as one influential cultural historian has claimed ? Or should he rather be seen as an ex-radical, traditionalist Conservative, a Habsburg loyalist who restored the decaying fortunes of political Catholicism in Austria and, ultimately, substituted clerical for Liberal rule ? If so, what is one to make of his impressive record as the civic-minded architect of Viennese « municipal socialism » ; as a social reformer who expanded the water supply, built schools, hospitals, publicly-owned abattoirs, while transforming the topography of Vienna by providing it with new city gas, electricity, tramlines ...

Lueger's 1st Anti-Semitic Speech

« For my part, I like to ignore the small differences which might exist between one or other of the Parties about the method of the struggle. I have very little regard for words and names, and much more for the cause. Whether Democrat or anti-Semite, the matter really comes to one and the same thing. The Democrats, in their struggle against corruption, come-up against the Jews at every step, and the anti-Semites, if they want to carry-out their economic programme, have to overcome not only the bad Jews but the bad Christians also.

All my Party comrades share my opinion that it is the 1st duty of a Democrat to take the side of the poor oppressed people and to take-up the fight with all determination against the unjustified and even harmful domination of a small fraction of the population. To be sure, the Manchester-Liberal papers have the habit of describing a Democrat in somewhat different terms. They aim, for instance, that it would be the duty of such a Democrat to come forward as an enemy of the Christian religion, to mock and ridicule its believers and priests. But we know that the motive of such a manœuvre is solely to mislead the people, which we may deduce from the remarkable fact that were anybody to come forward against the Jewish religion and ridicule its doctrines and believers he would be branded by the same organs as a reactionary obscurantist. However, this strange conception can be seen even more clearly in an economic question. Quite shamelessly, the Liberal organs threaten the confiscation of the property of the Church and claim that the goods of the “ dead hand ” are harmful. By this means, an attempt is made to divert the attention of the people from the property of the “ living hand ” which, in my view, harms the people in a most grievous way. But what a yell of rage would go up from the Liberal press if one were to substitute the slogan “ confiscation of Church property ” with the slogan “ confiscation of the goods of the conscious, living hand ” ! He who would dare this would risk, at once, being portrayed as injuring the sacred rights of property, as anarchist, a columnist who wanted to subvert the social order and destroy all existing things. And now, I ask : is the title of property of the conscious, living hand stronger or more sacred than the title to the property of the Church ? Surely not. And so, it is more than extraordinary if one were to confiscate the property of the comparatively poor priests and, through this help, the rich of another denomination to increase their wealth ! »

October 2, 1887. From Peter Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Antisemitism in Germany and Austria » (1964) .

Fragmentary draft of a speech presented in Moravia (about 1891)

« Gentlemen !

Citizens of this city have asked me, time and again, to deliver a talk in Iglau about the principles of the Christian-Social Party, and when I heeded this appeal, I considered this the fulfillment of a duty everyone has who represents the interests of the people.

Before I address the topic at hand, I want briefly to discuss two matters :

(1) I did not come to set citizen against citizen.

The Christian-Social Program does not aim to incite, but rather to reconcile ; it is not a fight of all against all, but rather a harmonious formation of different interest groups against the stratification of human society by professions and occupations.

(2) Press : here, too, as always in the Liberal press, abuses, invectives and the most insolent lies. After 15 years of fighting with the Liberal press, I have developed a rather thick skin, thank goodness. Therefore, I shall limit my comments and simply say that the Liberal press, sometimes also called Jewish Liberal, or Jewish Press, is the most impudent press on this earth, that it was and is the ally and accomplice of all robberies and thefts that have been committed against the Christian people. In Vienna, only fools and those on the same moral level support it ; all decent and intelligent people reject it with disdain. Whether or not what the “ Maehrische Grenzbote ” has said about me is true, you will be able to decide for yourselves by attentively listening to my talk. You will be able to judge whether I speak the truth or not - therefore, whether I belong to the instructors or the corrupters of the people.

When the ideas of freedom swept victoriously from France throughout Europe, all people embraced them joyously. A new time of happiness had dawned ; the road was paved for mankind to achieve its highest ideal of perfection. Barriers erected through the wisdom of our forebears for the purpose of upholding order were impetuously torn down. Old and established institutions that constrained the titanic powers of mankind were ridiculed. People yearned for the splendid dawn of a new day rising from the ruins.

In Austria, too, Enlightenment. People waited and waited for the happiness that was to come.

But happiness did not come. On the contrary, one felt ever more uncomfortable.

Even more freedom ; perhaps, this will help.

More freedom came, but happiness did not.

Shares were printed, banks were founded, wildest speculations were carried on at the stock-market ; then, came the crash and behold : the people were left with printed paper while others prospered with money.

Of course, in Austria, the so-called freedom turned into an incredible fraud.

Representatives of the people became representatives of capital and oppressors. The representatives were the ones who participated in all the fraudulent activities and, when salvation was necessary, they proceeded on the premise of “ manus manum lavat ”. You bow to me, I'll bow to you.

Tremendous amount of justified embitterment among the people.

When particularly, in Bohemia and Moravia, there wasn't a breakthrough, this was because of the nationalities' problem.

The embitterment is the reason for new Parties.

A long period of strife.

Finally, “ Vereinigte Christen ” ; now, strife again, but people will know how to put the agitators in their proper place. Therefore, together : the Christian-Social Program.

Protection of honest work (i.e. , both physical and mental, against the oppression by international capital) .

Farmers

Suspension of land division.

Land tax relief and determination of a debt ceiling.

Protective tariffs. Promotion of farmer's district cooperatives.

Craftsmen

Development of a cooperative system, etc.

Workers

International protection, etc.

Suspension of work on Sundays and holidays - also for officials.

Improvement of civil servants' skills.

Private Officials against abuses of temporary office worker system.

Protection against arbitrary termination.

Nationalization.

Politics for support and development of peoples' freedoms.

Education

Christian school and, therefore, separation according to University (and) confessions.

State revenues for the benefit of citizens.

Criticisms : extra homework, military supplies.

Clericalism : hatred for priests.

Loss of countless German positions.

Jews to cherish their religion.

Nationalism : Bruenn, Germans in the Czech camp.

Anti-Semitism : Jews, the leaders of the Liberals Capital usurers. Exploiters of property. Incite the classes, incite the nations.

Jewish press against clergy and religion, therefore, we believe : the Jews have no right to become judges, political officials and officers, and must be pushed back.

Christians, again, have the upper-hand.

Indigenous property, indigenous labor. Then, peace and quiet will return. »

Karl Lueger's criticism of the Liberal press here anticipates Karl Kraus (Speech draft, around 1886)

Margarethen Meeting of the trade association. Thousands of posters. All voters. When they came, they were rudely insulted and depicted as disturbers of the peace and scandal mongers in the Liberal papers, and the papers lied about a reign of terror of the anti-Liberal League.

Friday, a meeting of the Democratic Club, in the 7th District was held.

Kronawetter, Doctor Lueger with his staff ? Doctor Leuger did not rise. Opponents and followers of Kronawetter. Naturally, you don't hear a whisper about those meetings attended by many thousands that proceed quietly, at which even our opponents can speak undisturbed - these meetings are simply ignored.

Whether these tactics will be useful ? I doubt it. For a while, the one or the other who gets his wisdom only from the daily press may let himself be deceived ; those, however, who know the truth only hate and resent this brood of liars all the more ; each one of them becomes an enthusiastic apostle of our teachings who will conquer for us more and more new territory among the people and who will undermine the ground on which the Liberal press carries on its doings.

But if you ask yourself : why has the Liberal press sunk to such depths ? There is only one answer : it sunk to this depth because the Party it serves had long since disappeared, and was replaced by lies and hypocrisy, corruption and thirst for power.

That is how it is with the « Presse » . In addition, it mostly belongs to Jews, and all events, therefore, are treated solely on the basis of whether they are useful or damaging to the Jew.

I said : lies and hypocrisy ; corruption and thirst for power.

That the Liberal press is full of lies needs no further proof.

It lies in editorials, reports, in local news, in municipal reports, in telegrams in the economic section ; it lies between the lines in the « feuilletons » ; it lies in novels ; it lies in advertisements.

It lies directly by inventing untruths, deliberate untruths.

It lies indirectly by ignoring important facts and, thereby, in readers to draw incorrect conclusions.

It is hypocritical. It flatters the powerful as long as it believes they are serving its interests. It does so, in order to deceive the powerful and the dangerous enemies who constantly work towards undermining the last vestiges of power.

It feigns reverence for the pope, because it believes it to be momentarily advantageous to throw sand into the eyes of the people. But it continues to ridicule Christianity, to undermine faith among people, solely so that the masses are robbed of any moral footing, that they become easy prey for big business and sink into slavery.

It feigns love for Vienna, lauds the golden Viennese heart, the good nature of the Viennese, and their cheerfulness, but it is the Liberal press that drove us Viennese out of the theatres, that made us suspicious and robbed us of our cheerfulness. It feigns love for the German nation ; but not the true national sentiment, rather only agitation against other nations. Any attempt to solve the national question is cunningly defeated ; anybody who views a Czech or a Slav as a human being is branded a traitor and encouraged to keep fighting ; all that, just so the sharks among the people can complete their destruction undisturbed.

It preaches love for property, but only insofar as it concerns its own property and that of its clients. It praises the great robbers who seize millions, even billions, in property of others, as the Masters of mankind ; and if one of these robbers has the misfortune of being accused by the public prosecutor, then, he is treated as kindly as if he had perished on the field of honour.

It is the great and overt opponent of the little lottery because its profit does not fill their pockets or those of certain bankers. On the other hand, it lauds certain minor lottery tickets and does everything possible to induce people to play the stock-market.

Now and then, they even oppose corruption, but only when they believe they can conceal their own corruption. They act like a thief who is being pursued and while trying to escape shouts with the rest « stop him » .

The Liberal press is corrupt ; it is corrupt because it exclusively serves high-finance.

Internal and external entanglements are created, in order to carry-out stock-market maneuvers ; telegrams are forged ; men with great influence on world affairs are left to become sicker and sicker and, then, they are made well again in a piquant way, however the press wishes. Pronouncements of monarchs are misquoted because the press knows very well that retractions are not requested pursuant to Article 19. But if an official paper prints a correction, then, the matter is twisted in such a clever way that the impression remains that the original article was true.

The way wages are paid is also corrupt. The exploited are being paid according to their cooperation.

It doesn't matter whether a company is solid and respectable or not. If the people are cheated, what does the press care so long as it profits ? The people are stupid, forget quickly, and are gladly taken in again by the sharks.

The Liberal press is immoral. Only piquant - that's the slogan. Whether family happiness is destroyed or people are sent to their death doesn't matter.

The Liberal press doesn't spare the family. It isolates the most intimate affairs, in order to publicize them, and if there is nothing, it simply fabricates stories. King Ludwig of Bavaria, and Crown Prince.

Reports about Court trials are corrupt, and the public literally has become a curse for the administration of justice.

The advertisement business is corrupt. Secret illnesses, fraudulent transactions, match-making ads.

Prying and merciless persecution mania.

Prying everywhere : Municipal Council, parliament, at all levels. If misfortune happens, janitor, Greissler. If he is thrown out, or he can't find-out anything, then he lies. If he is corrected, he says : the correction is wrong.

Conclusion : The Viennese Liberal press is the most corrupt and disgraceful press in the whole world. « Neues Wiener Tagblatt » - we do nothing ; we only shout, don't improve things. It is true ; we always want to fight these bandits on legal grounds, and we keep on believing that our call for help will be heard. We hope the State authorities not only will continue to enforce the present measures against the press, which we applaud, but also will vigorously proceed against the excesses of the Liberal press.

But I warn the Liberal press : it should not ridicule and scorn those whom it deceived, lied to, and exploited.

Farmer : cries for vengeance.

Tradesman : cries for vengeance.

Official : cries for vengeance.

Widows and Orphans : cry for vengeance.

Religion and fatherland cry out for liberation, and the day will come when these cries will be heard by the proper authority. The day of liberation for the Christian people from servitude, in which we now languish will come and the day of vengeance for the disgrace tolerated and suffered.

...

With his persuasive but polarizing rhetoric, Karl Lueger won a convincing victory in the elections for Mayor of Vienna. However, the Jewish population and Emperor Franz-Josef I were anything but pleased at the outcome.

Lueger's aggressive political anti-Semitism is clearly expressed in this extract from one of his speeches. From a speech given by Mayor Karl Lueger at a meeting of the Christian-Socialist Workers' Association, held on 20 July 1899, in Vienna :

« Here, in our Austrian fatherland, the situation is such that the Jews have seized a degree of influence which exceeds their number and importance. »

(Interjection : « Very true ! »)

« In Vienna, the poor craftsman has to go begging on Saturday afternoon, to turn the labour of his hands to account, he has to beg at the Jewish furniture dealer's. »

(« Quite right ! »)

« The influence on the masses, in our country, is in the hands of the Jews, the greater part of the press is in their hands, by far the largest part of all capital and, in particular, high-finance, is in Jewish hands, and, in this respect, the Jews operate a terrorism of a kind that could hardly be worse. For us, in Austria, it is a matter of liberating Christian people from the hegemony of Jewry. »

(In : « Weiningers Nacht » , Europa-Verlag, Vienna, 1989.)

The « Aulic Councillor of the Revolution », as Victor Adler was known, was opposed by the « Colossus of Vienna » , Karl Lueger. As leader of the Christian-Social Party, the latter drew his support from the small-scale traders who, particularly after the stock-market « krach » of 1873, felt themselves increasingly threatened by Capitalism. Lueger relied on anti-Capitalist, anti-Industrial and, above all, anti-Semitic propaganda. His extreme polarizing rhetoric was directed against those in power, Liberals, Capitalists and Aristocrats. In the hostile image of the « capitalist Jew » , he saw the root of all evil. Many of the Jews living in Vienna had become established members of the educated and professional middle-classes.

Lueger's authoritarian and anti-Semitic style of leadership (which Adolf Hitler also emulated and whose fatal consequences are well-known) brought him victory in the 1895 election and, thus, the office of Mayor of Vienna. But he was only able to take-up the office, in 1897, after a number of repeated elections, since Emperor Franz-Josef had repeatedly refused to confirm his appointment because of his radical anti-Semitism.

Towards the end of the 19th Century, the influence of the mass Parties increasingly obliged Emperor Franz-Josef to acquiesce to the wishes of the population. Moreover, the conflicts between the various nationalities, within the Empire, became more and more aggressive. The Monarchy had become unstable, in terms of both foreign and domestic policy, and this was ultimately to lead to the outbreak of the 1st World War.

L'antisémitisme de Karl Lueger

« So far, as his anti-Semitism goes, Lueger became milder after his inauguration, and his verbal sallies against political dissidents more measured, more statesman-like. »

(Johannes Hawlik. « Der Bürgerkaiser »)

« Clerical anti-Semitism, which prevailed mainly in the Austro-Hungarian Empire must be regarded as a forerunner of the biological-racialist anti-Semitism that the Nazis were to perfect ; it represents a long-standing, sinister tradition from which Adolf Hitler demonstrably was unable, and indeed unwilling, to escape. »

(Gerald Fleming. « Hitler and the Final Solution »)

No single aspect of Karl Lueger's career has roused more controversy than his anti-Semitism. There are 2 poles of opinion about Lueger as anti-Semite and little neutral ground in between. For a Century now, Lueger has often been attacked as one of the principal instigators of political anti-Semitism, on the one hand, or defended as an actual friend of the Jewson, on the other. Somewhat incongruously, those belonging to the latter camp have occasionally suggested that Lueger's anti-Semitism was justified. His defenders have included Austrian Jews, such as Arthur Schnitzler and Stefan Zweig, prominent literary figures of Vienna's high-culture during the early years of the 20th Century, and his more recent Austrian biographers. In the other camp, post World War II historians, such as Peter G. J. Pulzer and Carl E. Schorske, have seen Lueger as an important progenitor of modern political anti-Semitism and as a proto-fascist. At the heart of the issue since 1945 has been the question whether Lueger influenced the developing ideology of Adolf Hitler, and, thus, contributed to the preparation for the Holocaust. Hitler praised Lueger in « Mein Kampf », during his World War II « table talks », and elsewhere. Although critical of Lueger's peculiar variety of anti-Semitism, Hitler nonetheless lauded him as a statesman, suggesting that he may have owed the Schonerian racial focus of his own anti-Semitism to the rejection of Lueger's alternative brand.

The reluctance of Lueger's recent Austrian biographers to confront his (and his nation's) anti-Semitism becomes understandable within the framework of recent events. In a country where 75 years after Lueger's death, and 40 years after the end of World War II, an SS war criminal was welcomed by a minister of defense ; where, during the same year, the interment of the remains of an alleged victim of a medieval ritual murder became the center of a national controversy ; where, later the same year, a bomb destroyed a Jewish shop in Vienna's 2nd District, the former Jewish ghetto, as during Lueger's mayoralty ; and, where as late as 1986, a slogan from « Mein Kampf » graced a World War II memorial in a building of the University of Vienna - in such a country, it is scarcely surprising that Lueger's anti-Semitism is considered to be of « distinctly secondary importance » in most Austrian Lueger biographies. Those of us who lived in Austria during the 1986 national presidential campaign in which Kurt Waldheim was elected, and who have followed the series of anti-Semitic incidents that ensued, know that anti-Semitism continues to thrive in Austria and that « the Lueger tradition » has emerged again to reveal the power of the past over the present.

Until the early 1980's, some Anglo historians held that, while Lueger had dampened his anti-Semitism after becoming mayor, « the widespread acceptance of mild, almost incidental, anti-Semitic opinions » was an element in the climate that nurtured Nazi barbarism. However, in 1981, John W. Boyer challenged some aspects of the prevailing opinion about Lueger's anti-Semitism and his influence on Adolf Hitler. Specifically, Boyer denies as false Hitler's « perception of Lueger as a dictatorial, charismatic “ Führer-type ” ». Boyer also asserts that « Lueger never disliked Jews personally », that « after 1897, he frequently encountered and occasionally even befriended influential and wealthy Jews », that he « wore his professed anti-Semitism lightly and used it principally in the realm of public propaganda ». Lueger, Boyer adds, dealt with Jews « with sobriety and respect ». When questioned about unfair personnel practices in the treatment of Jewish municipal employees, « Lueger declared that all personnel matters were a question for the “ Stadtrat ” (City Council) and that, personally, he had adopted a neutral stance on the issue ». « In his parliamentary speeches », Boyer continues, « Lueger was surprisingly sparing in his use of the anti-Semitic issue. Usually, only an adverse turn in political events or a vital tactical manoeuvre which required an anti-Semitic “ cover ” would motivate Lueger to bother with the Jewish issue. Beyond this, he confined his anti-Semitism to occasional jokes, innuendoes, personal slanders and comic interludes. » In this light-hearted vein, « Lueger's prejudices were cultural and class-oriented, but not racial ». Though Boyer admits that Lueger once « commented that, personally speaking, he believed that Austrian Jews should be deprived of their voting rights », this « statement was a palpable lie, intended to protect his flanks (to refute charges) that Lueger was “ going soft ” on the anti-Semitic issue ». Boyer adds that Lueger could hate Jews for the tendency to create a culturally pluralistic society and for their often superior educational and intellectual backgrounds (but he) could not help but respect them since they “ were ” well-educated and talented, especially in light of the fact that many Austrian Jews had risen from “ petit-bourgeois ” social disabilities to achieve through their own energies bourgeois prominence, a pattern of social mobility quite similar to Lueger's own ». Within the larger European context, « in light of the enormous fund of protests that European Liberalism was “ dead ” or that it had somehow “ failed ”, men were forced to experiment with new modes of political behaviour and new ideological conceptions to fill the civic cultural void ». In a word, Boyer's arguments bring Lueger's anti-Semitism into the same ultimate pragmatism which, Boyer suggests, marks Lueger's political personality - as another technique rather than a principle.

In some respects, Boyer's article elaborated on conclusions in his monograph on Viennese radicalism. Building on Boyer's assertions, in both works, Robert Wistrich has suggested in writing about the ambiguities of Lueger's position that Lueger « partially succeeded in taming and domesticating Viennese anti-Semitism with a heavy dose of Austrian “ Gemütlichkeit ” » . In another work, Wistrich has stated that Lueger, « the anti-Semitic dragon-slayer of Austro-Liberalism became, in the twilight of his career, the conciliatory elder statesman of Habsburg loyalism and the civic-minded architect of Viennese “ municipal socialism ” » . Still more recently, Leon Poliakov in « The History of Anti-Semitism » , flatly states that « the enthusiastic tribute that Hitler paid (Lueger) in “ Mein Kampf ” does not seem justified, for the Jews did not suffer under his administration » , and Steven Beller adds that « Lueger was not a serious anti-Semite » .

No group of writers has been more fully in agreement with the assessments of Boyer, Wistrich, Poliakov, and Beller than most Lueger biographers since 1945. One post-1945 biographer virtually ignored Lueger's anti-Semitism altogether. This was Rudolf Kuppe, whose 1947 biography is a model of tactful historical reconstruction. Gone were the references to Lueger as a champion of « Aryan interests » that featured prominently in his 1933 biography. Gone, too, were the often lengthy quotations from Lueger's outspokenly anti-Jewish speeches. Another post-War Austrian biographer who has more to say about Lueger's anti-Semitism, but who, nonetheless, largely exonerates the mayor and Party leader from preparing for the Nazi era, is Kurt Skalnik :

« Doctor Karl Lueger is exonerated by the judgment of history. In 1880, 1890, 1900, life still proceeded along such a well-defined order, that one could afford to play with anti-Semitism without destroying human morality and descending into a demonic underworld. »

More recently, Johannes Hawlik has sketched the cultural-political environment of Lueger's anti-Semitism in one of the shortest, yet, most digressive chapters of a 1985 biography commemorating the 75th anniversary of Lueger's death. Hawlik does not completely dismiss the possibility of Lueger having influenced Hitler, but he nonetheless provides « a tiny defense » for Lueger's anti-Semitism :

« Under the influence of the Enlightenment and considering the belief in progress during the 19th Century, no one, not even the most virulent anti-Semite, conceived as possible a regression to the barbarism of the Middle-Ages (in the grand style of the 20th Century) as Hitler's “ Final Solution ”. »

Even Hawlik's « tiny defense » seems overstated, despite his qualification. In his futuristic work, « Aus dem Jahr 1920 » (1900) , Josef Scheicher, the Christian-Social politician and publicist priest, did « conceive as possible » the partial extermination of Austrian Jewry. Moreover, in December 1902, shortly before the Christmas recess, Hermann Bielohlawek, during a municipal council session presided over by Lueger, called for the destruction of the Jews and stated « that the Viennese population has as its program : the eradication (“ Ausmerzung ”) of Jewry. From that we shall not depart » . Bielohlawek's speech was received with « lively applause » and he was congratulated from all sides. Furthermore, another Christian-Social, Ernst Schneider, predicted, in 1901, a coming time when Jews would be « killed and burned. In Rumania, they're starting already to drive the Jews out, and with us, it will get to the point that we'll drive these parasites out of the country, which they only ravage. »

Boyer further refers to « the limitations of (Lueger's) power » , that even « had he wished to eliminate all discrimination against the Jews, the more anti-Semitic sub-elite of the Party would have expected some concessions » . It is the central argument of this chapter that far from « wish(ing) to eliminate all discrimination against the Jews » , through his continuing and malicious recourse to provocative anti-Semitism, and his overt or covert support for anti-Semitic legislation and other actively discriminatory measures, Lueger ensured the continuation and intensification of anti-Semitism as a central feature of Christian-Social politics throughout his mayoralty - and beyond. And only the limitations imposed on his power by the Imperial authority, and his own declining health, prevented a potentially more violent expression of anti-Semitism. It was the Imperial legal qualification on his power and its enforcement, in some cases, rather than any charitable attitude on the part of Lueger and his supporters toward the Jews, that prevented them from « suffer(ing) extensive material or cultural deprivations from Christian-Social rule » . Lueger made anti-Semitism respectable and, in so doing, made it more dangerous. After Lueger's death, younger Christian-Social politicians carried on his anti-Semitism in « the tradition of the Christian-Social Party » . Toward the end of the 1st Republic, they established a clerical fascist dictatorship. « Anti-Semitism flourished in the 1st Austrian Republic. Austrian anti-Semites may have been even more vicious toward the Jews, in the 1930's, than were their counterparts in Germany. » The roots of this variety of anti-Semitism were nurtured during the Lueger era.

Anti-Semitism was a constant instrument of Lueger's politics from 1887 until he became too ill to campaign. While his remarks were, sometimes, moderated in the public forums, anti-Jewish slurs remained frequent in his speeches to local constituencies. And, though anti-Semitism had penetrated the thinking of the highest officialdom by the time of Lueger's mayoralty, and was, therefore, not new (Kielmansegg referred to Gessmann as « an out and out "Judenstämmling" » (Jew) , with all the characteristic qualities, especially the intense acquisitive sense of this race » . Under Lueger, it became more comprehensive and more insidiously pervasive, in all aspects of cultural, social, and political life, than ever before. It remained an open feature of public life until 1945, and has continued if in, sometimes, more concealed or hypocritical forms. Although some Viennese refer to Schönenerer as the forerunner of Nazism and deplore his crude racist anti-Semitism, much as some Germans deplore that of Julius Streicher, Lueger is usually absolved by such Viennese from having contributed to the rise of Hitler. For them, Lueger remains « the respectable anti-Semite » .

When Lueger himself failed to initiate direct anti-Semitism, it was usually instigated by other Christian-Social leaders vying for his favor, a dependent group most of whom proved incapable of functioning politically once he was out of the picture. To them, Lueger was a sort of ultimate ideological authority for anti-Semitism, but not intimately involved in the details. « Lueger knew what he wanted, and everyone who knew him, knew it too. » , as Rudolf Spitzer observed in his 1988 Lueger study. Lueger was capable of hating, and probably did « hate Jews for the tendency to create a culturally pluralistic society, and for their often superior educational and intellectual backgrounds » , as Boyer has put it ; but there is little countervailing or contravening evidence to the speculation that he balanced this animosity with respect for their « education » and « talent » . Just the opposite seems to have been so. His stance goes beyond both political expediency and a theoretical preference for cultural unity. Lueger defended the most rabid Christian-Social anti-Semites, such as Father Joseph Deckert and Ernst Schneider. The mayor awarded a medal to Deckert, and silenced Liberal protests in parliament against Schneider, « the conscience of the Christian people » , according to Lueger, when Schneider proposed that a special police force supervise the Jews around Easter time « to prevent ritual murders » .

In the light of continuing Austrian anti-Semitism, it is not surprising that Austrian views of Lueger remain substantially unchanged, and that, recently, there has even been a return to some of the earlier pre-War emphases in Hawlik's biography. But the picture of Lueger as a man who, despite appearances, liked Jews or was, at least, indifferent, of Lueger the benign, of Lueger the closet philo-Semite, distorts and obscures his role and that of his Party in the development of 20th Century anti-Semitism and the violent form it took. Lueger's anti-Semitism, in reality, assumed several ominous if expedient shapes. His public remarks and the implications of his policies sometimes pointed to a racial bias, Boyer notwithstanding, but these were not the only indications of his attitudes.

Although it may be true, as Robert Wistrich has pointed-out, that « re-1914 Christian-Social agitation 1st synthesized hatred of socialists and Jews in Austria » , Lueger also, if in less original fashion, routinely linked anti-Semitism with hatred of Liberalism, Hungarians, and Freemasons. But, in all these hateful chimeras, « the Jew » was primary and constant : thus, « Judensozi » , « Judeolibemlismus » , « Judeo-Magyar » , « Judenfreimaurer » . Lueger also added another amalgam to the spurious alloys of anti-Semitism to describe Jewish journalists, « papierene Juden » . Toward this latter group, and especially the journalists of the Liberal press, Lueger directed his most implacable anti-Semitism. Even Kielmansegg, who denied that Lueger was authentically anti-Semitic, conceded that the mayor's anti-Semitism did extend to the offices of the « Neue Freie Presse » in the « Fichtegasse » (Lueger admitted this) , thereby suggesting Lueger's insight on the importance of propaganda and mind control.

Lueger made extreme and damaging anti-Jewish remarks before and after he became mayor. Thus, for example, in 1894 during a parliamentary session, he corrected a Liberal delegate, Heinrich Popper. Lueger denied having said at a mass meeting that it was immaterial to him whether one shot or hanged Jews. « Beheaded ! » , Lueger corrected the speaker. And before and after he became mayor, Lueger asserted in parliament that Jewish sects practiced ritual murder. Although Lueger's statements are remarkable in themselves, it is important to bear in mind their larger context as well. When he made them, European attention was occupied by the Dreyfus affair and, at the same time, a kind of ritual murder hysteria swept over parts of Eastern Europe. On one occasion, a Frenchman was mistakenly assaulted as a Jew by a group of brick-makers who thought he wanted to draw blood from their children. Referring to the Dreyfus affair, Lueger told an electoral meeting, in 1895, that the eyes of the French had been opened, « and even they will one day realize that the Jew has no fatherland and, therefore, knows no fatherland » .

For much of his later career, from the mid- 1890's until, at least, as late as 1907, Lueger attacked Jews in the University. Thus, for example, in 1899, he claimed in the Lower-Austrian Diet that « Rumanian and Galician Jews had reduced the Vienna medical school to a level that could not be thought of as lower » . It should be noted that Lueger's and his Party's anti-Semitism was not confined solely to verbal abuse. The Lueger regime tried to instill anti-Semitism in the youth by appropriating municipal funds for, and facilitating the printing and distribution of, « Wiener Kinder » in Vienna's elementary schools. This, outspokenly Christian-Social, and occasionally anti-Semitic children's periodical was printed by vice-Mayor Heinrich Hierhammer. Its contributors included Richard von Kralik and Josef Scheicher.

Under Lueger, Jewish representatives to elective bodies controlled by the Christian-Socials and presided over by him were insulted and sometimes intimidated, usually without his saying a word. In fact, Lueger occasionally defended the insulter. When, on rare occasions, Gentiles objected to Christian-Social behavior, they received the same abuse as the Jews. Lueger's government discriminated against the hiring and promotion of Jewish municipal employees and, sometimes, fired Jewish teachers. During his mayoralty, Lueger himself was directly involved in anti-Semitic incidents and scandals.

Considering the long history of anti-Semitism in Austria, it is perhaps more, rather than less, surprising that Lueger did not become an outspoken anti-Semite before he did. Opportunism was doubtless a factor here, but Lueger's had been a deeply traditional upbringing and home environment. Among most Austrian Catholics, the Jew was the eternal alien. Though guaranteed religious equality by law, the Jews of Lueger's time were regarded by Catholic Austrians as nonetheless unequal, a group apart, « un-German », even racially separate, by extremists. Yet, Austrians who thought this way were not necessarily active anti-Semites. Lueger surely realized this. Some of his more off-handed remarks about Jews betrayed a popular and more general habit of thought, rather than cunning political calculation. Thus, Jews might be tolerated or not, as circumstances and the mood dictated. This outlook had its roots in Medieval and Baroque times, when earlier Habsburg rulers had exploited or persecuted or merely tolerated Jews, as they saw fit. But there were other, more modern aspects to Lueger's anti-Semitism, such as his occasional racism, sometimes distinguishing as he did between Aryans and Jews. Moreover, his stated wish on one occasion that Jews be « weeded out » of the University medical Faculty anticipates the euphemistic language which would later be used by others to conceal the more violent practices of totalitarianism.

If Lueger's anti-Semitism, before his mayoralty, reflected his ruthless drive for power, his continuing anti-Jewish agitation and anti-Semitism, from 1897, betrayed criminal irresponsibility, because his pronouncements and actions carried the authority of official sanction and the Party he led continued until 1907 to extend its power and, thus, its anti-Semitism into regional and national politics. The context of his remarks and actions are significant. This was the Europe of the Dreyfus affair, an affair used by Lueger and his followers, after 1897, to incite hatred. Ritual murder cases were a continuing feature of late Habsburg history, and the authenticity of ritual murder had been endorsed by the mayor and Party leader himself. 12 ritual murder trials took place in the Habsburg Empire, between 1867 and 1914, and a pogrom in Galicia, in 1898, a pogrom so violent that a general revolt threatened and martial law had to be declared. The physical safety of Jews in the multi-national realm, at least the safety of lower-class Jews, was not as secure as Stefan Zweig has implied, and there are recorded instances of anti-Semitic violence during Lueger's mayoralty. Lueger and some of his lieutenants routinely exploited anti-Jewish developments in neighboring countries for whatever advantage they might afford. Actual restraint, or the threat of restraint by the Imperial government, limited violence against Jews by the mayor and his followers. There were also the subtler restraints imposed by nearly a Century of peace. The aggressions released by World War I would destroy not only traditional obedience to higher authority, as well as the traditional authority itself, but also loosen customary moral inhibitions. The post-War increase in violence was an escalation of what had formerly been merely verbal hostility ; anti-Semites of the 1920's did not have to create any new arguments because these had already been legitimized by Lueger and the Christian-Social Party.

Lueger's brand of anti-Semitism had been, at least, partly anticipated. Almost precisely 2 Centuries earlier, Abraham a Sancta Clara (1644-1709) , an Augustinian monk, mastered « the complex instrument of mass appeal » as no one else in Germany or Austria was to do until Lueger. A violent, though never opportunistic, anti-Semite unlike Lueger, Abraham nonetheless « responded to the pressure of the masses », and « became one of the chief carriers to spread (hatred of the Jews) in his Century ». Although the origins of Lueger's anti-Semitism are obscure (there is no indication that he was influenced by Abraham), anti-Semitism had re-appeared with periodical intensity in Austria during times of crisis. This recurring aspect of Austrian anti-Semitism sometimes also emerged in Lueger's behavior in times of crisis, thereby indicating that, here, he was completely traditional.

Richard S. Levy has suggested that a distinction between anti-Jewish sentiments and anti-Semitism ought to be drawn to clarify Lueger's significance :

« The 1st is endemic in Austria and Europe, in general ; the 2nd is a new phenomenon of the late- 1870's, and, even though it feeds-off tradition, it entails actions either directly against Jews or the exploitation of anti-Jewish sentiment for other political ends. The difference between action and sentiment is the difference between traditional suspicion, contempt, or hatred of Jews and anti-Semitism, the political harnessing and on-going cultivation of that feeling. The former can issue in an occasional pogrom, an occasional tract, or the retention of legal discrimination ; the latter can result in genocide. Lueger was an anti-Semite, not just a Jew-hater. His massive influence on Austrian politics has to do with the entrance of anti-Semitism into the political culture of Austrian life. It becomes a permanent institution embodied in Parties, propaganda Societies, its own press. In the modern era, it always entails a broader world-view and sees the Jewish question as insoluble unless other grievous problems are also faced - Liberalism, socialism, constitutionalism, vivisection, the gold standard, etc. Once its political potential has been demonstrated and, after a certain point, it possesses a dynamic and rationale of its own ; it can be relied upon to produce a certain kind of support for political ventures from the socially threatened. »

Although Lueger's University years marked the zenith of prosperous Liberalism and neo-Enlightenment influence, following the Austro-Prussian War of 1866, Pan-German members of, at least, one student fraternity attributed « Austrian patriotism to the dominance of " oriental elements " - that is, Jews ». Anti-Semitism spread and intensified during the hard times following the « krach » of 1873.

Ignaz Mandl had employed anti-Semitism during an 1877 election campaign and Lueger had been praised by the anti-Semite Karl von Zerboni, following the Fogerty affair of 1882. For the next few years, Lueger was evidently uncertain about supporting the anti-Semites. In 1886, in the municipal council, he praised a Jew, Adolf Fischhof, one of the famous revolutionary leaders of 1848 :

« No one of the gentlemen, here in this hall, can hold a candle to him and no one alive can compare to his political past, service to the city of Vienna and to his integrity. »

However, in 1887, Lueger placed himself squarely on the side of the anti-Semites by supporting Schönerer's anti-immigration bill in parliament. As Lueger drew closer to the clericals, the frequency and intensity of his anti-Semitic remarks increased. In February 1889, he broke with Mandl. A few months later, he was receiving advice from an anti-Liberal about how to achieve the maximum anti-Semitic effect in Northern Bohemia when he delivered a speech there, on September 1st. By the following year, the anti-Semitism that was to be significant in Lueger's rise, and would mark significant aspects of his politics for the duration of his career, had become a feature of his public personality.

Already he had coined the word « Judeo-Magyar » , which won him thousands of votes. As time passed, Lueger's anti-Semitism assumed a more threatening form than name-calling. During the Centennial of the French Revolution, in 1889, the Panama Canal scandal broke in France. Sensational revelations about bribery and corruption among the highest officials, and about Jewish middle-men, were given prominent coverage in Viennese papers. Lueger was doubtlessly referring to this in parliament when, during a lengthy anti-Semitic speech, in February 1890, he stated that :

« If revolution should break-out in France, not the archbishop of Paris, and no longer poor monks would be shot, but it would become unpleasant for other people. »

Lueger was to perfect this sort of thinly veiled anti-Jewish threat over the next 15 years.

During the 1890's, Lueger and his Party also attacked the alleged preponderance of Jews in some professions and, particularly, in the University medical school. One of the few to oppose this aspect of anti-Semitism was the rabbi Doctor Joseph Samuel Bloch. A parliamentary representative from Galicia, Bloch had exposed both the fraudulence of « Der Talmudjude » , a book that « sought to prove the depravity of the Jews by means of extracts from the Talmud » and of its author, Canon August Rohling, who claimed expertise as a specialist on Judaism. In 1891, in parliament, Bloch also exposed the hypocrisy of Karl Türk, the German Nationalist who, together with his family, had been treated by a Jewish doctor after Türk had delivered an anti-Semitic diatribe. And, during the same session, Bloch called Lueger's attention to the upsetting effects of anti-Semitism on children, an outcome that Lueger denied, for he claimed that children didn't attend « our meetings » . Bloch also asserted that Christian children had on 2 occasions struck-out the eyes of Jewish students and had been sentenced by the Courts.

Anticipating Nazi rhetoric, Lueger accused Jews of being « the destructive element » in every country :

« Whenever a State has allowed the Jews to become powerful, the State has soon collapsed, while in those States where they understood enough to isolate the Jews, the monarchical principle was saved, the people were saved from many things they would otherwise have suffered. »

This un-original aspect of Lueger's anti-Semitism (it was common practice of anti-Semites to accuse Jews thus) remained relatively constant, though he sometimes moderated his words after he became mayor. If Jews wanted to live among non-Jews, they had to subordinate themselves. He stressed this in a speech to his inner-city constituents, in 1905. In the relatively early phase of his parliamentary career (1892) , Lueger had stated that the Jew was behind all that was negative in modern life. For Lueger, the Jew alone ruled ; for the Jew alone was there prosperity. In the early 1890's, Lueger also attacked Austrian schools as a training ground for Jewish professionals. Accordingly, the « Jewish Liberal » teacher, as well as the « Jewish press » , were the most dangerous enemies within the later Jewish menace, not only because of their secular and anti-Catholic bias, but also because they allegedly served the implicitly alien Jewish nation. Whether they were « concealed » as members of the Liberal German School Association (« Deutscher Schulverein ») or occupied chairs at the University (almost no Jews had chairs at the University) , Jewish educators were singled-out, as individuals and as a group, as special targets of Christian-Social gibes. This aspect of his anti-Semitism, like the Jewish subordination theme, also remained constant. Although he sometimes trimmed his sails to obtain Jewish financial backing for one of his municipal building projects, sought the counsel of baptized Jewish financial advisers, such as August Lohnstein of the « Landerbank » , or even praised Baron Albert Rothschild after he had granted the city a free right-of-way through his property for water lines, Lueger never altered his opposition to Jews in Austrian education. A public statement to this effect, in November 1907, involved him in the last anti-Semitic controversy of his career, the Wahrmond affair.

No other aspect of Lueger's anti-Semitism resulted in more protracted or acrimonious disputes, for some of his adversaries, who often were not Jews, numbered among the Empire's most articulate people. They defended their positions with skill, carried the battle into the Christian-Social camp, and exposed Lueger and his Party for the unscrupulous manipulators they were. But the reasoned and often trenchant replies of oppositional intellectuals had little apparent effect on Lueger or on any of his followers, who continued to use anti-Semitism much as before, probably reckoning this as no more than another aspect of maintaining and extending their power. Only Lueger, and probably also Gessmann among the Party hierarchy, may have grasped the potentialities of modern political propaganda inherent in their insistence on Party, faith, and sometimes also on race, as pre-requisites for teaching, and for other appointments.

Lueger understood the importance of education, as a means to advancement and to control. He owed his 1st rise in no small measure to academic excellence, after all, and later to having applied his knowledge, though this was tempered by experience, a pragmatic knack, and often by intuitive understanding. And he had most certainly studied the Liberal management of teaching appointments in Vienna's Elementary and Secondary schools, and was thus prepared to refine such management techniques, once power was his. During his mayoralty campaign, in the mid-1890's, Lueger gave a foretaste of what was to come. The specific target of this Christian-Social attack was Hermann Nothnagel, a famous physician and teacher on the University medical staff. Though a non-Jew, Nothnagel was hated by leading Christian-Socials and, especially, by Lueger because he was a prominent defender of Jews. Nothnagel had probably become a marked man, as early as 1891, when he declared, « at the opening meeting of the Society to Combat Anti-Semitism, that anti-Semitism was a disgrace and that its consequences were degeneration and barbarism » . Both the name Nothnagel and the physical appearance of this Prussian lent themselves to the ridicule of his enemies. The name translates as make-shift, « “ stopgap ”, or “ emergency hook ” » , and his appearance was described by an astute observer. This was Sigmund Freud, who would abandon abstinence from tobacco when Emperor Franz-Josef refused to sanction Lueger's election to mayor, and « smoke a cigar to celebrate » . Freud characterized Nothnagel as :

« A germanic caveman, completely fair hair, head, cheeks, neck, eyebrows, all covered with hair and hardly any difference in color between skin and hair. 2 enormous warts : one on the cheek and one on the bridge of the nose ; no great beauty, but certainly unusual. »

Nothnagel remained a favourite target of Christian-Social abuse. Lueger once implied in the provincial Diet that only

Nothnagel's greed for profit made him oppose the moving of the clinics to the city's outskirts, because he could reach patients more swiftly in the center. On another occasion, Lueger withheld from Liberals the use of municipal assembly halls and schools for lectures, because they refused to « abandon » the lackey of the Jews : Nothnagel. Lueger demanded that all speakers and lecture topics be approved by the Christian-Social controlled City Council. Though Nothnagel had never even delivered lectures to this group of Liberals, their leaders refused to negotiate on the issue of censorship, in any case, and requested Lueger to reconsider his decision on the use of the halls. After all, he controlled the City Council. Smiling, Lueger replied :

« In all legal and technical-administrative matters, I am the cleverer, and allow no one else to intervene. But, so far as anti-Semitism goes, any old hand is as clever as I, or cleverer ! »

In this way, the Liberals were refused the use of the halls. At the time of Nothnagel's death, in 1905, Lueger's 1st vice-Mayor, Josef Neumayer, who, the same year, was quoted in the municipal Council as saying that « so far as he was concerned, all Jews could be burned alive » , remarked to Lueger that « we need not react to other “ great ” events (Nothnagel, etc.) » .

The occasion for Lueger's 1895 attack on Nothnagel was provided during a budgetary debate in the provincial Diet, over the amount of support to be given to the University medical schools. Following anti-Semitic slurs on University educators by Josef Gregorig, Lueger's supporters received a rebuff they long remembered. The remarkable feature of this incident was that the Jews were eloquently defended by Laurenz Müllner, a Catholic priest, who was, at the same time, Chancellor of the University of Vienna. Also remarkable was the fact that Müllner's speech was extemporaneous. On January 4, 1895, Müllner, a well-known teacher in his own right, lived-up to his title of « Rector Magnificus » , as well. Gregorig had ridiculed the University as « Jew-infested » . Punning on Nothnagel's name, Gregorig added :

« Only yesterday, I read that, once again, a new Jewish professor had just been appointed, and if you look at the whole business out there, you'll see how the holy halls have been transformed into a mumblatorium on an emergency hook. » (« in sin an einem Nothnagel hängendes Mauscholeum. »)

While Gregorig's remarks elicited mirth and applause from the anti-Semites, Müllner castigated him in his retort for making unsubstantiated generalizations and insulting the University and individual Faculty members. Even professional educators could no longer generalize about individual disciplines as Gregorig had done, Müllner added. There was no longer such a thing as « a doctor universalis » :

« Study itself makes one modest, and I expected here, least of all, to hear it flatly stated that we have retrogressed. A colleague was specifically named, Professor Nothnagel. I don't know what connection delegate Gregorig has to natural science. (Boisterous amusement : Gregorig was a shirt-maker.) But if he has such a connection, I recommend an easier book to read, though I think he may have a little trouble studying it, and this is the physiological psychology of Wundt. There, he can orientate himself, perhaps, about what is thought of Professor Nothnagel. Furthermore, I would like to say something as a Catholic scholar. I believe Dante was, perhaps, a Christian. I ask only that you examine his “ Divine Comedy ” and read Dante's remarks about a Semite, about Averroés. Dante's was a great spirit and Thomas

Aquinas was a man of high-nobility, and also a saint ; the tone of such men's remarks, even about Jewish scholars, is completely different, even where agreement is impossible. Every year, I necessarily refute Spinoza, but I say it here that, though I refute his system, I bow nonetheless before that great spirit and before that noble man. »

Müllner's words only irritated the anti-Semites. Lueger, who twice interrupted Müllner, and who was obviously stung by his remarks, revealed his racism and the « differential » aspect of his anti-Semitism by discounting Spinoza (for whom Lueger said he also had « great respect ») , as a typical Jew. Spinoza, Lueger informed his listeners, had been persecuted by his co-religionists and racial comrades, not by Christians. That, he added, was something « a priest of the Catholic religion should and must know » . The noble Jews had all vanished and those who remained were the ones Lueger fought. He implied that, as a Catholic priest, Müllner was a traitor for having defended them. Lueger's words were cheered by his followers. Ernst Schneider interjected that Müllner was an « honorary rabbi » and that he should get circumcised.

Having rejected humanistic considerations, Lueger suggested that the only values that truly counted were the ones that served palpable political goals, in this case to be determined by himself, and without reference to earlier mores or ethical considerations. And the tone of Lueger's remarks and the responses of his supporters suggested that the values themselves, which reflected a spontaneity, would be determined by an irrational interaction between speaker and audience. Lueger, the « artist and actor, unknowingly (fell) , more and more, into the mental attitude of the audience in the galleries » , as Bloch observed.

Such an interactive politics may have contributed to another significant anti-Semitic incident, again an attack on the Jewish members of the medical Faculty, in 1903. In any case, Lueger's behavior, in 1903, revealed that his demagogy remained undiminished. Moreover, the Christian-Socials then tried to extend their control over Vienna's hospitals, Kielmansegg's realm. In 1903, as in 1895, the budget was under debate. For some 2 weeks before the incident, Lueger's Party, in the provincial Diet, had been attacking the ostensible failure of Primary schools to deliver the educational goods. One of the central figures in the new incident was Hermann Bielohlawek, a merchant and something of a Court jester among the Christian-Socials, who flaunted his ignorance and Philistinism. According to Bielohlawek, students often left the schools with their heads stuffed full of useless knowledge and as ignorant of basic reading and arithmetic skills as when they had arrived. The fortunate ones received a more useful education only after they reached the University. As they had for some years, the Christian-Socials also criticized modern education for undermining religious faith. Bielohlawek implicated the Jews in the process, making it clear that his Party did not oppose them because of their religion. Instead, he shared with Schönerer the viewpoint that the race itself was at fault. In referring to the recent Hilsner ritual murder trial, in Bohemia, and the Dreyfus affair, Bielohlawek aroused « lively applause and amusement » when he announced that, deporting one Jew to Devil's Island where Dreyfus had been imprisoned, was insufficient ; only, after all, Jews had been sent there would « there be quiet in our fatherland Austria » . In a subsequent Diet session, Leopold Steiner, one of Lueger's closest friends, criticized the hospitals by painting the horrors of vivisection practices at the University anatomical institutes, to the growing indignation of his listeners. Steiner demanded that the government enforce an earlier decree prescribing control measures. He then described various malpractices against hospital patients by implicitly Jewish doctors, concluding that vivisection was responsible for inuring the doctors to patients' suffering. Only when administrative officials had replaced the doctors as leaders of the hospitals would such abuses cease. It seemed clear which Party would provide the administrative officials, at least to Kielmansegg, who opposed Steiner's criticism by correcting technical points and suggesting that some aspects of it were exaggerated.

Steiner's vivisection criticism rallied the Christian-Socials to his support. Josef Scheicher said that he wished Steiner's proposal had included a demand for the abolition of vivisection « once and for all » but the University Chancellor, Ritter von Escherich, was indignant « over the grave insults » leveled at « the entire medical Faculty and the medical profession » . This, in turn, elicited a Christian-Social interpellation that included quotations from a 1902 pamphlet « Murder in the Service of Science » by Doctor Paul Forster. A Party anti-Semite in Germany who held a Ph.D. , Forster luridly depicted the horrors of vivisection on man and animals. The interpellation ended with a demand for the abolition of vivisection and the « strict surveillance of all hospitals » , and, in particular, those that predominantly treated the poor. On October 28, the Diet was the scene of Christian-Social attempts to hinder the promotion of a Jewish doctor over his « more deserving » Christian compatriots, and of further revelations about vivisection and medical malpractice allegedly perpetrated by Jewish doctors. With the support of anti-Semitic shouts of other Christian-Socials, Steiner denounced as mendacious and distorted the reports of « the Viennese Jewish press » about the vivisection affair, the Diet, and its individual members. 2 days later, Lueger delivered a speech in support of a motion of urgency begun by himself and signed by other leading Christian-Socials. In the motion, he rejected as « insolent » a declaration of the University medical College Faculty protesting the interference of the Diet in the vivisection matter, and its meddling in the affairs of the medical institute.

Denying that either the medical College or the doctors' profession had been attacked, Lueger stated that the entire incident had been blown-out of proportion so that « certain men and animal knackers can act as though they alone were the doctors » . « The College of professors » , he added, « should look to itself, and rather endeavor to weed-out certain elements from the doctor's profession which only injure it, so that finally, a Christian conviction will return to these circles. »

Lueger's words were cheered as usual in Christian-Social assemblies, and subsequent speakers supported his remarks. When they had finished, Lueger summarized his thoughts on the vivisection issue by remarking that it was the duty of the Diet to protect poor people in the hospitals from vivisection. The doctors placed too much trust in scientific progress by « so-called graduate doctors who learned in the medical Faculty » . Great progress in medicine, Lueger assured his listeners, « had actually been made by laymen » , just as progress in legal education had usually been achieved by the laity. When torture was abolished, this had been due to someone who had possessed « no more than a warm heart for mankind » . Scholars should practice modesty. « If a scholar is so haughty that he says that no one else has anything to say (interjection : Then, he's certainly a Jew !) , then I say : my dear scholar, if you can make a blade of grass one day that a cow can eat (amusement) , then I'll take my hat off to you ; but so long as you are unable, then you're a quack like the rest of us (amusement) . » Lueger concluded by adding an amendment to his motion that all the « proposals, inquiries and debates » about the issue at hand were to be printed and distributed among the people, thus suggesting his appreciation of the value of this topic as agitation. His original motion and amendment were unanimously approved and Lueger was heartily applauded, cheered, and congratulated for many minutes after his speech.

In 2 succeeding sessions, Kielmansegg and the Socialist Karl Seitz voiced the opinions of moderates who must have been appalled at the spectacle of the mayor of Vienna and leader of what was rapidly becoming the leading Imperial Party denigrating scholars, celebrating amateurs, and calling for the « weeding-out (of) certain elements from the doctor's profession » , by which Lueger had meant the Jews. The satirists and caricaturists had a field day. Kielmansegg made the important points that most of the abuses cited in the pamphlet « Murder in the Service of Science » referred to foreign incidents and that, considering the many patients treated each year, often with complicated diseases, complaints about malpractice were negligible. The reputation of Vienna's hospitals was deservedly high and would remain that way, as long as they were under his jurisdiction. While Kielmansegg was applauded and congratulated by many for seeming to uphold the majority opinion, Seitz, who spoke the following day, was heckled by Gessmann, Bielohlawek, and Lueger for defending vivisection. The great physician Christian Albert Theodor Billroth, Seitz reminded his listeners, could never have performed his miraculous operations had he not first experimented on thousands of animals. Moreover, the patients who had experienced successful operations owed their recovery in no small measure to the thousands who had lain on the operating table before them. The real reason the Christian-Socials had provoked this incident, Seitz added, was that rich Jews, who were symbolized by the learned doctors, were the most dangerous enemies of the Christian-Socials. Bielohlawek, who spoke after Seitz, questioned whether the Christian-Socials had agitated against science or the doctors at all, but Lueger agreed with Seitz that the whole issue revolved around the Jewish question. In speaking thus, Lueger gave form to the incoherent anxieties of his followers and, possibly also, to his own subconscious fears. In any case, Lueger's words distilled his feelings about Jews in higher-education and revealed dissatisfaction with Vienna's hospitals as he alleged they were controlled by the Jews :

« When, at last, Jewish corpses are dissected, perhaps the doctors will then learn still more than they can from dissecting ours. The medical school in Vienna won world fame at a time when only Christian professors, a Skoda, Oppolzer, or however they were called, laid the foundation for the medical school's fame of the University of Vienna. But, as soon as the Jews got in, the fame of this school in Vienna sank low (cry : So, it is !) and when the accusation is made that we're opponents of science, then I say, no, we're not opponents of science, but we do oppose science being misused merely for the advantage of isolated dissolute, brutish, and brutalized individuals.

The medical school will only thrive again and the hospitals once more become places of refuge, whether for rich or poor, when the principle (out with the Jews from the University and the hospitals) is enforced, so that we Christians can be humanely treated (hearty applause) . »

Despite Lueger's continuing demagogic sallies, the furor over the hospitals gradually subsided, and the whole incident served more to reinforce the image of Lueger and the Christian-Socials as Philistines, rather than as anti-Semites, at least among the Liberal cartoonists. Karl Kraus saw both aspects. He commented that the Liberal dialectic had given place to the Christian-Social, and that the new tone was doubtless worse. Uglier and lower than flaunting education, as the Liberals had done, was flaunting snobbery over ignorance. To be a leader of the people, in the Luegerian sense, meant opening the floodgates to mass instincts and inundating defenseless culture. 2 Christian-Social program points had emerged from the affair :

« The Jews should have anatomical equality the same as Christians, that is, should be dissected as well as Christians ; but, while preparing them for equality as objects of medical study, they should lose their equality as subjects of medical study, be driven from the University and the hospitals. »

By 1903, Lueger usually had the last word on political matters in Vienna, and thus it was with the hospital affair, though this particular utterance carried an unintentionally ironic ring. When later in November, during a municipal Council session, a Christian-Social, Karl Glössl, described the traffic in human skeletons of poor Catholics between the hospitals and private purchasers, thus depriving the deceased of Christian burials, Lueger agreed with Glössl that it was « downright depressing » :

« I certainly have nothing against it that corpses serve learning. But if that is right, and if that is so important, then all men should participate : the rich with the poor, the Jews with the Christians. Justice for all ! (lively applause) » .

Unlike the Lueger-Müllner exchange of 1895 or the hospital incident of October-November 1903, the Wahrmond affair, 4 years later, was triggered neither by a budgetary debate nor a legislative conflict, but by a Lueger welcoming speech. Privately, he claimed that his remarks had been prompted by the desire to please the many priests attending the 6th « Katholikentag » , in November 1907, whom he greeted in his official position as mayor. Publicly, he insisted that he had been misunderstood, that his words had been directed against nationalistic violence in the Universities. Yet, Lueger's remarks may not have been as extemporaneous as he would have liked some to believe. As early as July 22, 1907, « Reichsrat » member, Ernst Count Sylva-Tarouca, informed Lueger that Cardinal Gruscha had inquired whether Tarouca would organize the « Katholikentag » , « since this was the wish of the Austrian episcopacy » . Gruscha « intended to precede (the meeting) with a collective pastoral epistle against the “ Los-von-Rom ” Movement and the anti-dynastic and anti-Austrian tendencies of the radicals » . Tarouca expressly requested Lueger's support and advice « in this affair » , which he had already mentioned to him the preceding winter.

Whatever the true inspiration for his remarks, in the furor that followed, the anti-Semitism of his « Katholikentag » speech was largely obscured in a larger controversy over secular versus religious education. During his welcome, Lueger had stated that much had been achieved in the Viennese schools, secular and religious teaching had been successfully integrated. And yet, another great task remained, « the conquering of the University » . No longer should the Universities be a seedbed for revolution, upheaval, and atheism, no longer should teachers have to be armed with clubs and whips to impart knowledge, as he had read in the papers that it was necessary for them to do :

« But there will be a hard struggle. So long as it is possible that, among 8 newly appointed professors, there are 7 Jews (indignation) , a great struggle must follow until we have come so far that, among 8 appointed professors, there are 7 Christians (applause) . I don't believe that any of us will slacken. »

Socialists, Liberals, members of smaller Parties and their respective presses, and prestigious scholars such as Friedrich Jodl and Ernst Mach censured or ridiculed Lueger's remarks, Mach stating that Lueger wanted to turn the clock back to the 14th Century, and that he had no desire to share the fate of such a people and country. Yet, the indignation of the University Faculty and that of Lueger's other critics provided but a foretaste of what was to come.

On January 18, 1908, Ludwig Wahrmund, professor of ecclesiastical law at the University of Innsbruck, delivered a lecture in the large municipal hall in Innsbruck, subsequently published as « Catholic “ Weltanschauung ” and Free Science » . He repeated the lecture in Salzburg. The thrust of Wahrmund's remarks had been anticipated by his earlier criticism of the discrepancies between church dogma and modern scientific inquiry. This had already roused the ire of local Church leaders and University administrators, but his most recent attack was the last straw. Wahrmund's lecture was confiscated in many places by the government, and the controversy over clerical or secular education, which had been raging in Austria for many years, erupted anew, spilling-over into political life, once more. In the Tirol, a long-standing feud between the Christian-Socials and Catholic Conservatives prompted the Conservatives to distinguish between Catholics and Christian-Socials « in religious respects » . In Graz, student violence reached such proportions that the University had to be closed for the summer, an action repeated in Innsbruck when Wahrmund returned from a short trip. At length, Wahrmund was transferred to Prague. He secretly signed an agreement accepting an annual 10,000 « Kronen » research sabbatical from the government for up to 2 years, and an annual pension of 2,000 « Kronen » should he choose to retire thereafter. By agreeing, Wahrmund thus removed himself from the political scene, for the terms of the new arrangement leaked-out and discredited him. Though he soon relinquished the honoraria, he was, in any case, deprived of a University platform for his agitation.

The Wahrmund affair had at least 2 significant after-effects. In the autumn of 1908, Freiherr von Beck resigned as prime minister, in part because he had lost the support of Archduke Franz Ferdinand, who thought Beck had « let Wahrmund down too lightly » . In the literary realm, the Wahrmund affair helped inspire Arthur Schnitzler's play « Professor Bernhardi » , which characterized the ignoble actions of some of the principal actors in the original affair.

Lueger, who, by 1907, could do no wrong, at least in the opinion of Christian-Social publicists and apparently also in the eyes of the archduke, emerged with his reputation enhanced as a defender of Catholic education. At the height of the affair, he was kept posted by Alfred Ebenhoch, the minister of agriculture, who seemed both casual and irritated by it all. To him, the affair was a cloud in the sky that would soon pass away :

« Wahrmund on every corner. How will it end ? It drives one crazy. »

2 weeks after Lueger's remarks, a minor Christian-Social paper, the « Badener and Mödlinger Bezirksnachrichten » , published « the authentic meaning » of Lueger's speech, at least as it was intended to be understood by the Party rank and file. The editor of this political weekly, Hans Arnold Schwer, one of the younger generation of Christian-Socials, was municipal Councillor, sometime playwright and vigorous defender of « Christian culture » . He had also had a somewhat minor, if vociferous, role in the Hilsner case, having written a polemic intended to silence the demands of Thomas Masaryk for Hilsner's retrial. Schwer claimed that Hilsner had murdered not 1, but 2 Christian girls. In a front-page « Bezirksnachrichten » article, « A Jewish Trick » , such issues as educational philosophy, freedom of speech among educators, and the threat to freedom of scientific inquiry were subordinated to the « threatening character of the progressive Jewish infestation among University professors » . According to the article, Lueger « had emphasized nothing other than what he had had to emphasize in his entire anti-Semitic past » . The « Bezirksnachrichten » implied that Germans should maintain unity in the face of Jewish attempts to sow dissent.

In the municipal Council, Lueger brushed aside objections from the Socialists that he had exceeded his authority by welcoming the clerical Parties at the « Katholikentag », in his official position as mayor. The Socialists asserted that Lueger had not spoken for « many thousands of Viennese who did not belong to the clerical Party, but who, in opposition to the tendencies represented at the “ Katholikentag ”, were deeply disquieted by the serious threat to the development of the entire culture ». Ridiculing the author of this challenge, Lueger asserted that there were « many things » outside the official statutes that he was obliged to do as mayor. Had he not attended this Catholic occasion in which « cardinals, archbishops and bishops had participated », he would have been « a coward », and betrayed his Catholicism as well. He had greeted the participants in the name of the majority Catholic population as « a courteous mayor of Vienna, the Imperial capital and residence », and would continue to do so whether the Socialists liked it or not.

The Müllner-Lueger exchange, Vienna hospital incident, and Wahrmond affair revealed Lueger's anti-Semitism toward Jews in higher-education. Other, more casually anti-Semitic remarks underlined his fundamental assumptions about the extent to which Jews were to be tolerated, in which areas of endeavor, and in what capacities. Lueger stated that he respected pious Jews and Hermann Bielohlawek subsequently added that he respected the religion but despised the race. However, Lueger's distinction suggests that he was less tolerant of Jews who were inconspicuous about their religion. He was suspicious of those who tried partly to assimilate. Individuals with semi-Jewish parentage who had become baptized Christians and staunch Catholics, such as vice-Mayor Josef Porzer, or those of partly Jewish descent, such as Gessmann, but whose Catholicism was beyond question, were awarded Lueger's toleration. He needed such men regardless of their heritage because of their ability, and particularly Gessmann, who was a gifted and ruthless organizer. However, Lueger became uneasy when identities were blurred, whether culturally, religiously, or racially. « Authenticity » was the thing. Lueger wanted to know whether someone was a « Mandl Oder ein Weibl » (man or a woman) . Blurred identities created uncertainties and impaired his apparent need to categorize, to place people and things and qualities in « proper » relationships and order. This need, which may have developed during his upbringing, when social hierarchy was much clearer and more distinct than it would be in the changing, dynamic society of « fin-de-siècle » Austria, was reinforced by his formal education, profession, and experience : he was, after all, a lawyer and insisted on legalistic categories if the need presented itself. Lueger's insistence on clear-cut distinctions, particularly as they affected the Jews, was shared by other prominent Christian-Socials. This insistence sometimes manifested itself as hostility, which suggests the nature of the obstacle that impeded Jewish advancement in late- Imperial Austria and thereafter. Christian-Social leaders rejected Jews for allegedly lacking intrinsic qualities believed to be possessed by « Christians » or, to some Christian-Socials, possessed by « Aryans » . Dynastic loyalism, anti-Liberalism, and clericalism were defenses for some, to preserve a stable, traditional order. Jews, who could assimilate and become « hidden foes » , stood for the opposite.

And, yet, despite his open or veiled anti-Semitism, some Jews defended Lueger and his administration, fearing, perhaps, that worse was to come once he departed the scene. This impression is conveyed by an anonymous and ungrammatical letter to Lueger from a « good patriotic Hungarian Jew » who, though he was an opponent of the mayor « on principle » , nonetheless admired his « administrative talent » . The letter contained a home remedy and was evidently received by Lueger while he was on one of his periodic cures :

« I convey the feelings of all Israelite Hungarian Jews when I wish you complete recovery and still more decades at the helm of the Imperial city of Vienna as mayor. I have the conviction that Austrian Jews also think this way, for if someone like Bilohlawek (sic) comes to power, then, woe to Israel in Vienna. »

Here again, Lueger was different things to different people, and sometimes had it both ways.

When it came to discriminating against Jews, in cultural matters, Lueger was notably less successful than in the professional realm. Although the Christian-Socials might withhold promotions from deserving Jewish teachers and municipal officials and, thus, immediately achieve the desired effect, Lueger learned early in his mayoralty that cultural anti-Semitism (the exclusion of Jews from cultural affairs organized or run by the Christian-Social municipal government) posed thorny problems. Other Party members were slower to understand these problems and continued to pursue ineffectual cultural policies, long after these had been discredited or had failed altogether. The fact that they could continue to do so, without Lueger's interference, suggests his increasing caution toward cultural anti-Semitism or, perhaps, his growing indifference, or an expression of the divergent tendencies among the ruling Party that appear to have become more frequent as Lueger's health deteriorated. In any event, Lueger's control over the Christian-Socials was never perfect, and the Party machine sometimes functioned most inefficiently, if at all. The « Aryan Theater » fiasco illustrates several such failures.

This Theatre was, in part, a result of attempts by Adam Müller-Guttenbrunn, a writer and unsuccessful theatre director, to make good his earlier failure while, at the same time, trying to revive a more traditional Germanic culture. According to Müller-Guttenbrunn, German cultural decline in Austria had been precipitated by Jewish literary predominance. Another impetus toward the creation of the Theatre was the desire for quick profits, the speculation by private citizens that their investments in the Theatre, at a favourable rate of interest, would be speedily rewarded. Still, another impetus was the desire by outlying District residents to create a major « suburban » Theatre, for most of the principal playhouses were in the 1st District.

Both Müller-Guttenbrunn and the Theatre enthusiasts revealed their anti-Semitism by excluding Jews as actors or playwrights from the new undertaking. They, thereby, probably hoped to capitalize on the prevailing anti-Jewish feelings of the Christian-Socials and German Nationalists. Things went wrong from the start. Intended as an important event in the 50th anniversary celebration of Franz-Josef's ascension to the throne, the opening of the « Aryan Theater », or « Kaiserjubiläums-Stadttheater », as it was more formally called, was clouded by the recent assassination of Empress Elisabeth. Lueger had shown interest in a popular and implicitly anti-Semitic Theatre project, as early as 1890. Although he had been a member of the « Jubiläums » Theatre Association, since 1896, he criticized the opening night play, Heinrich von Kleist's « Die Hermannsschlacht », a Classical « Aryan work » by an « Aryan playwright », in the thinking of Müller-Guttenbrunn. At a banquet, after the premiere, Lueger told the guests that a play in which a wench threw her lover to a bear did not correspond to the tastes of the Viennese, that they did not want « a disgraceful play » like Kleist's « Hermannsschlacht ». Lueger's words were ridiculed, from Vienna to Königsberg, as proof of Christian-Social philistinism. Although the mayor and Party leader was much more cautious, thereafter, in his remarks about theatre matters, he still continued, for a time, openly to defend the enterprise. During the following summer, for example, he boasted before an assembly of the Christian-Social Workers' Association that his Party had created its « own theatre to which Christian men can go and take their families, without fearing that the ears of their poor children will be dirtied by smut » , as he implied they were dirtied in theatres operated by Jews.

Lueger's biographer, Johannes Hawlik, has pointed-out that Jewish actors sometimes participated in « Jubiläumstheater » productions and that some « Jubiläumstheater » works were written by Jews. Whenever it became known that Jews were, overtly or covertly, participating in « Aryan Theater » productions, anti-Semitic papers would invariably call Müller-Guttenbrunn to task. Such incidents were comparatively few during his administration, and the toleration of Jewish collaboration may well have been calculated by Müller-Guttenbrunn to soften Jewish hostility toward himself, particularly after it became apparent that the Party Theatre was failing. The abandonment of the « Aryan clause » occurred during the administration of his successor, Rainer Simons, but only over the strident objections of some Christian-Socials. Anti-Jewish plays were, however, performed under Müller-Guttenbrunn, thereby, achieving one of the Party's central ideological purposes. Such works included « Der Rechtschaffene » , about the Offenheim corruption trial of the 1870's ; « Helden der Peder » , depicting Jewish influence-peddling in the Viennese literary world ; « Eigenthum » , portraying the victim of Jewish financial machinations ; and a mutilated version of « The Merchant of Venice » . These efforts were intended to proclaim the beliefs of « Aryan Theater » supporters, though they failed for artistic and other reasons. « The Merchant of Venice » , an early production, enjoyed the greatest agitational success of the 4 but was, in all other ways, fully unsuccessful. It created a « cause célèbre » and anticipated a similar agitational use of this work in Nazi Vienna.

The timing of Müller-Guttenbrunn's version, in October 1899, was a happy coincidence for the anti-Semites, taking place as it did a month after the 2nd conviction of Alfred Dreyfus for treason. This development, no doubt, intensified the critical controversy surrounding the play, for public opinion had become polarized : the Liberals condemned the injustice of the verdict in France ; the anti-Semites unanimously approved ! Lueger and many other leading Christian-Socials attended a performance. One Christian-Social observer remarked « that such a play would doubtless make a more powerful impression than an electoral meeting » , while a Liberal commented on the barbarousness of the audience, which « behaved as though Hilsner had been playing Shylock » . « The Merchant of Venice » might soon have disappeared from the critical scene had not a reviewer from the « Wiener Volksbothe » , a small Christian-Social paper that catered to the janitorial mind, mistakenly hailed Grillparzer as the author. This blunder prompted a sardonic letter to the « Volksbothe » from an unknown writer signing himself « William Shakespeare » , who demanded that his authorship be acknowledged. The « Volksbothe » promptly did so, and apologized for its error, adding that :

« No Freemason like Grillparzer (could have written) a play (of such obvious anti-Semitic tendencies) Grillparzer's body must, no doubt, (have been spinning) in its grave, but would now (come to rest in) its original position, because Mr. Shakespeare had so promptly corrected the " Volksbothe ". The publication of his letter had thus squared accounts. »

Responding to the original « Volksbothe » blunder, a Social-Democratic critic « rejoiced that the anti-Semitic and anti-English movement had been strong enough to refute the Jewish lies about Shakespeare being the author of the " Merchant " » . Word of the « Volksbothe » blunder spread as far as England, prompting the « Manchester Guardian » to observe with disdain that Johann König, the editor of the Viennese paper, « was a Christian-Social member of a school board “ entrusted with the education of hundreds of children ”. » A Liberal paper provided the last well-aimed shot in the affair, with a telling revelation of the disgust many felt over the prostitution of art for Party purposes and over the attempt to capitalize on contemporary hatred. The deeper meaning of the play had been obscured. Shakespeare's Shylock had been cheated of his justice ...

« through bad sophistry. Although that justice may be reprehensible, the wrong done him is even more egregious. This old, greedy, hate-filled Shylock who insists upon his bond, who rejects 3 and even 10 times his money and, remorselessly, covets that overdue pound of flesh, this dogged struggler for his justice - what sort of an idealist is he compared to the “ pedlars ” who scorn him and applaud the trampling of his justice as a victory of the good cause ?

There was no reply from the Christian-Socials to this comment. So far, as they were concerned, « the quality of mercy » toward the Jews was always strained.

Müller-Guttenbrunn and others involved in the Aryan theatrical venture were dissatisfied with the « mildness » of his anti-Jewish productions. Accordingly, he tried to stage more venomously antagonistic plays. However, such out-and-out anti-Semitic works as « Harte Hände », « Söhne Israels », and « Die Büsserin », all of which pointed forward to one of the most violent Nazi films, « Jud Süß », were forbidden by the censor. A residue of restraint, it seems, existed at some governmental levels, at least before World War I. Not to be put-off by official prohibition, Müller-Guttenbrunn published the 1st 2 works out of his own pocket and distributed thousands of copies. He was convinced of the ineffectiveness of other anti-Semitic plays by such writers as Ernst Vergani and Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels, evidently one of Adolf Hitler's early intellectual mentors, lamenting to Vergani that his play was too honestly objective, and that objectivity was « our old illness », by which Müller-Guttenbrunn probably meant that the play was not anti-Semitic enough. In his last effort, as a racist director, Müller-Guttenbrunn proved with « Athara », depicting the failure of inter-marriage, the truth of Jorge Luis Borges's aphorism that « censorship is the mother of the metaphor ». In any case, Müller-Guttenbrunn's dissemination of the forbidden plays won him the support of some of the more extreme Christian-Social anti-Semites in the provincial Diet and was remembered by them as one of his better achievements when he resigned, in October 1903, shortly before he went bankrupt.

In the autumn of 1903, during the demise of the « Aryan Theater », some Christian-Socials proposed the creation of a literary prize of 2,000 « Kronen » to be awarded to an Austrian writer of « Aryan origin » for « an artistically important dramatic work ». Such a prize was created and conferred several times during Lueger's mayoralty, on Meinrad Sadil, for example, a Benedictine monk, 2 of whose plays had been produced in the « Aryan Theater », and on Karl Domanig and Eduard Hlatky, among others. That these last 2 recipients were Lueger partisans and members of Richard von Kralik's circle vindicated an earlier Socialist observation that Christian-Social measures to promote « Aryan culture » had fostered a 2nd literary clique no lovelier than its Liberal counterpart. In this way, even after 5 years of artistic mediocrity and cultural-political fiascoes, Müller-Guttenbrunn's ideas not only continued to win, at least tacit support among some Christian-Socials, but also found welcome implementation. A cartoon in the racially anti-Semitic « Kikeriki » commented on the literary prize proposal, and afforded a « psycho-gram » of the prize's authors. In this supposedly complimentary cartoon, a well-dressed Weiskirchner, who became the last Christian-Social mayor of Vienna between 1912 and 1919, and Josef Sturm, another anti-Semitic member of the « Landtag », are shown trying to free Pegasus, the emblem of artistic inspiration, from a chariot representing the adverse Jewish influence over art and culture. Classical imagery is, thus, juxtaposed with the symbol of anti-Semitic racism in a blend of antique and contemporary. If one recalls Lueger's Classical references and elegant taste in clothing, one can see that, in some respects, this cartoon reflects his cultural predilections and racial prejudices, as well as those of Sturm and Weiskirchner.

Though Lueger became steadily disenchanted with the « Aryan Theater », Müller-Guttenbrunn continued to pursue his ideological convictions till the end. For those who had followed the development of the Theatre and knew about Müller-Guttenbrunn's racist preoccupations, the underlying intent of « Athara » would have been clear enough. It was well-received by the critics. After his bankruptcy, Müller-Guttenbrunn took to reflecting on his recent cultural failure. In one article, he proclaimed himself the prophet of a new socio-political salvation, whose Messiah had, perhaps, already been born, but who had not yet spoken. He then turned to writing novels. Among them was the anti-Semitic « Gärungen Klärungen ». Both the article and the novel were written under the pseudonym of Franz-Josef Gerhold. Müller-Guttenbrunn's career evinced a Péguyian blend of mysticism and cultural politics. Lueger was quintessentially political, by contrast, and far more practical. He never lost sight of the political cost of more adventurist cultural programs. Referring to the Theatre, he somewhat diffidently warned Müller-Guttenbrunn's successor to look at that bed before he lay down in it, and not to « be surprised if the fleas bite you ». This « bon mot » revealed another facet of Lueger's personality : his refusal to allow himself to be humiliated by failure, at least in public. This tendency, along with his apparently total indifference to contradictory behavior, was demonstrated on many an occasion. Once, for example, Lueger had delivered an anti-Semitic speech in the « Leopoldstadt ». A few days later, at a reception, he offered his hand to Alfred Stern, the chairman of the Israelite Religious Community. Stern refused to shake hands with Lueger, unless he took back his anti-Semitic remarks. « But you'll still give me your hand », said Lueger, jokingly. When Stern refused to extend his hand, Lueger simply moved on, joking all the while.

Some larger European developments should be sketched in, to provide a working context for Lueger's anti-Semitism. Although 1903 had been a quiet year for the great powers of Central and Eastern Europe, the calm was deceptive and soon to be shattered with far-reaching effects. In February 1904, War broke-out between Russia and Japan. Russian politics were transformed, not only because of the defeats suffered by that country, but also as a result of social and economic disruptions that culminated in an unsuccessful revolution the following year. These developments affected events in Austria-Hungary, as well. Emperor Franz-Josef, seeing the riots and strikes in Russia, and further disruption in major Habsburg industrial centers, had ordered his ministers to prepare legislation granting universal manhood suffrage. Well, did he recall the Revolution of 1848, which had brought him to power, and he was wise to have feared the 1905 specter of the earlier upheaval, which this time could have cost him his power. Granting the vote to the workers was intended to forestall this, just as the creation of a « Duma » in Russia, by Czar Nicholas II, was carried-out as a concession for much the same reason.

Alert to the consequences of the franchise reform, which meant a drastic increase in the number of worker voters, the Christian-Socials responded with their usual demagogic agitation, blaming Austria's ills on the insidious influence of « Jewish Social-Democracy », much as they had blamed « Jewish Liberals » for the woes of the Viennese lower middle-class, in the 1890's. Here, as before, the Jew remained the constant target. However, a more strident note and, in a more threatening key, resonated through their agitation, because of the revolutionary activity in Russia and the racial tone of the czarist response. There, too, Jews were being blamed for Russia's various ills, but with more immediate and destructive results. Czarist-sponsored pogroms, carried-out by bands of thugs known as the « Black Hundreds » , terrorized thousands. Many fled and sought refuge in other countries.

Austrian anti-Semites warned of anarchy in the Habsburg Empire should the « Jewish Social-Democrats » get the upper-hand, in some cases applauding the activities of the « Black Hundreds » , and agitating to close Austrian borders to Russian Jews. They were seen literally as the carriers of disease, for a cholera epidemic raged across Russia, in the summer of 1905, and less objectively as the carriers of revolutionary contagion, for it seems unlikely that the average person who had escaped from one revolutionary situation with little more than his life would have sought another in a country that served as a haven. Although Lueger took no definite stand on the Russian disorders until late in 1905, waiting as usual for the optimum moment, his feelings could easily be inferred. Earlier that summer, he had responded to an inquiry in the municipal Council about the effectiveness of border and hostel controls affecting « certain immigrants » , by promising to caution the appropriate authorities to be especially watchful. When Franz Schuhmeier questioned Lueger's use of the phrase « certain immigrants » , the mayor replied :

« I used the same term (as in the inquiry) . I know that the Jews are meant thereby (amusement) . »

Yet, another contemporary development should also be outlined, insofar as it, too, perpetuated ill feeling between Lueger and the Jewish community. This was the long-standing Christian-Social agitation against ritual slaughter, which peaked during 1905, a most turbulent year in several ways. Sometimes linked to agitation for the municipal slaughterhouse, demands for prohibition of « kosher » butchering were ultimately defeated, though not before a lengthy struggle in the municipal Council, Diet, and even parliament. The defeat of the Christian-Socials meant that the rights of a religious minority had been upheld as previously guaranteed by the law. This re-affirmation, however, did little to improve relations between Lueger's Party and the Jews.

In the lurid fantasies of some of Lueger's more macabre followers, ritual slaughter was inextricably linked to ritual murder. One anti-Semitic cartoonist even pictured Lueger as the possible victim of such a « kosher » plot. By the end of 1905, caricatures of ritual slaughter, ritual murder, and violent Russian revolutionary Jews had merged in a gory synthesis. The Jew, in various guises, thus continued to be the exclusive target of hate, though in a still more protean form than when Lueger had identified him as a « Judeo-Magyar » , « Judenlibemler » , and « Judenfreimaurer » . Intentional or not, such agitation within the context of 1905 events could have led to violence. The way Jews were perceived changed drastically in the eyes of an increasing number of Viennese during Lueger's day, through such anti-Semitic caricatures as were appearing in periodicals like « Kikeriki » and « Figaro » .

Lueger himself embodied the wishes of the extremists, often focusing their hatreds and articulating their destructive desires on such occasions as an electoral assembly, in December 1905. The tone of the assembly had been set throughout the autumn by a series of sometimes violent Socialist demonstrations for the universal franchise. These reached a grand finale, on November 28, when 250,000 Socialists paraded before parliament, this time peaceably, for 5 hours. The Christian-Socials used these occasions as fresh justifications for anti-Semitic agitation. Lueger and other Party leaders singled-out « Jewish Social-Democracy » for the injuries inflicted on those it had ostensibly led astray. Lueger indicated that the Jews among the Social-Democrats were cowards : during a demonstration in Vienna, early in November, at the decisive moment the Jewish majority had withdrawn. Harm had befallen only their Christian followers, Ernst Schneider added. For the remainder of the month the Christian-Socials continued to denounce « Jewish-incited turbulence » in cities across the Empire. The climax of Christian-Social agitation came on December 4, during a Lueger speech in Primmer's Hall, « Zum Franz Josefsland » . As he was speaking, Lueger uttered what was arguably the most sharply worded warning he had delivered to the Vienna Jewish community since he had become mayor, 8 years before. He admonished the Jews of Vienna that, if they supported the Social-Democrats, « the same thing could perhaps happen as in Russia » .

Yet, even this admonition had been anticipated in April of the same year when he had told the Jews that, if they « want to live among us, (they) must modestly take the place that the Lord and history have reserved for them » . In December, however, he went much further. Lueger had been preceded on the rostrum by other speakers, one of whom equated « good Austrians and good Christians » with « good anti-Semites » . Pointing-out that government authorization for Lueger's 60th birthday celebration had been withheld, in 1904, though the Social-Democrats had been granted permission to demonstrate all the while, another speaker implied that the government favored the Socialists over the Christian-Socials. Unless Socialist agitation among the youth was halted, he added, the morale of the army would be undermined and the troops would mutiny, as they had in Russia. Perhaps, Doctor Lueger would rouse the Christian-Socials of Vienna and Lower-Austria and, then, the government would realize that other, « more commanding » classes than the Social-Democrats would have a say in things.

The tone of the meeting thus having been established, Lueger mounted the speaker's podium. During the 1st part of his speech, he justified his position on a 5 year residency requirement in Vienna for the proposed universal franchise, insisting somewhat disingenuously that such a demand did not amount to withholding the franchise. Native Viennese had the right « to determine their own fate » , he stated, and transients should be excluded from voting. No Bohemian, who had lived in the capital for a few months, should become a Viennese, he added. At length, Lueger spoke of the recent Socialist demonstrations in the Empire and the need « from our side » to create order. One cause of the fear of violence in Austria had arisen out of the czarist October « Manifesto » , which had created a « Duma » , and, only recently, had it occurred to some Russians that the turbulence in their country was a result of Jewish revolutionary agitation. As a result, « so-called Jewish persecutions » had ensued, and papers all over the world had demanded protection for Russian Jews. Liberating « certain people » was « an ideal » only when it came to liberating them from the czar, but not « from the tyrants and the revolutionary elements » . And then, Lueger stated :

« Especially warn the Jews in Vienna not to go as far as their co-religionists in Russia, and not to admit the Social-Democratic revolutionaries. I warn the Jews, most expressly ; for the same thing could perhaps happen as in Russia. We, in Vienna, are anti-Semites but are certainly not inclined to murder and violence. But if the Jews should threaten our fatherland, then we will show no mercy. I wanted to warn of these sad possibilities. » (Emphasis in original.)

Lueger's remarks were frequently interrupted by cheers and lengthy applause, and when he had finished, minutes passed before the concluding speaker could be heard. His words seem to have produced a cathartic effect on his followers. 3 days later, Liberals and Socialists attacked Lueger's speech in 2 interpellations during a municipal council session :

« It would be a sad thing, if the security of an individual and / or property depended on political confession or on the grace of the lord mayor. » , said one.

Lueger's speech amounted to « legally prohibited incitement against a religious community » , added another.

Indignant at having been challenged, Lueger denied that the interpellations belonged within the competence of the municipal Council at all, since he had spoken, on December 4, « in (his) capacity as a Diet representative » . Lueger claimed he was accountable only to those municipal Councillors who had voted for him ; no one else had the right to criticize him :

« I am responsible to my electors alone. »

He then added that he had only permitted the interpellations to be read because he wanted to show how his opponents fought against him, so that all could see « how personal and political hate were joined in distorting everything » . Lueger defended his allegation that the Jews had aligned themselves with the Social-Democrats. When he looked at the leaders of the Social-Democratic Party, he could plainly see ...

« As must anyone admit who was halfway able to distinguish races, that the leaders of Social-Democracy were almost exclusively Jewish (lively applause) . It may well be that one or the other of the gentlemen is baptized but it's certain that many are absolutely authentic Jews, and also that the one who is supposed to be baptized (Doctor Adler) is certainly recognizable to anyone as a Jew. »

During his remarks, Lueger identified as almost exclusively Jewish the leaders of the Russian revolution, which was closely connected with the recent turbulence in Vienna, and he presented himself as a patriot willing to defend his country if it was threatened. His speech had been « completely correct » , he insisted, but now it was being used against him to start « a highly-unfair campaign » . He ridiculed those who had begged the prime minister for protection from Doctor Lueger :

« I can only say to you : rarely is there a Party, in which the mildest, by far the mildest, is the leader. Here, in the representative body of the community of Vienna, justice rules for all (applause) . For the Jews, too. If a decision had to be made, I never asked for a baptismal certificate ; never have I distinguished between Christian and Jew, and because I have appealed to the Jews not to tie themselves to a revolutionary and turbulent Party ; for that, all of a sudden, a clamor is raised against me. »

Ignoring the question of a Liberal municipal Councillor, Donat Zifferer, about who decided whether or not Austria was threatened, Lueger denied ever having committed injustice toward any Jew, « never in my whole life » , a statement that was palpably false, as some of the municipal Councillors must have known. Lueger then claimed to have protected Jews « very often often against the will of my Party. That's the truth about me and you know it, too, and should have considered that, before directing such interpellations at me. »

Though Lueger was cheered as usual, at the conclusion of his remarks, his opponents did not soon forget his December 4 speech. Moreover, his subsequent qualifications and defensive tone suggest that he suspected he had gone further than political prudence dictated. His pulling back was something even a hate-filled anti-Semitic article on the front page of the « Reichspost » could not conceal, and the Jews were warned by this paper, in much the same tone as they had been in Lueger's original speech. Some days later, in a municipal Council session, one of Lueger's old acquaintances, the Liberal Ferdinand Klebinder, tried a partial explanation of the man whom he had known for « about 40 years » . But the more Klebinder tried to conciliate, the more hostile other Councillors became. Lueger had « spoken to us from the heart ! It was high time that he spoke ! » , interjected one ; « The Jews robbed us blind ! » , shouted another. Another Councillor, Viktor Silberer, summed-up the feelings of the Christian-Social majority :

« One thing is clear: we have led a struggle against the Jews, and we shall lead it as long as God grants us life; so that in Vienna Christianity remains at the helm, so that the Christian people is master in its own house, and not foreign, alien Jews. »

Lueger had attracted many with such attitudes.

Despite what had appeared to be another anti-Semitic propagandistic victory for Lueger and his Party, early in December, the winners of the contest of autumn 1905 were the Socialists, though this would not become apparent until the next parliamentary elections in the spring of 1907. Socialist gains, at that time, surprised even Lueger. His plan had been to discredit the Socialists, but this had not to his consternation even slowed them. However, 1 or 2 things should have become apparent in 1905 to everyone. As Lueger approached the end of his career, his response to Socialist agitation had become mechanical. This suggests that he was beginning to lose touch with the lower-classes - their lack of representation, adequate housing, or a living wage for many workers. But, perhaps by this time, after nearly 10 years of power, he had grown indifferent to many immediate problems. He was more confident than ever of his popularity. What did he care if Jews were offended by his remarks ? By that time, by frequent application, anti-Semitism had been « normalized » as an agitational weapon, made « respectable » , thanks to him. And yet, the double-edged nature of his tactics was plain : Lueger dared not challenge the Imperial government and risk intervention by further incitement. Imperial Austria was not Imperial Russia. Although the czar followed the advice of his anti-Semitic advisers, with whose opinions he always agreed, Franz-Josef was not an anti-Semite, at least in his official position. The Emperor was the real bulwark against extreme anti-Semitism. Lueger knew this.

Lueger's remarks were often if not characteristically anti-Semitic. Another instance of anti-Semitism can be seen in an exchange with the Habsburg ambassador to Bucharest, János Markgraf von Pallavicini, where Lueger imputes a general cowardice to Jews. In the autumn of 1907, in a Christian-Social controlled parliament, Lueger informed the representatives that he had corrected Pallavicini about the number of Magyars in Bucharest. When Pallavicini had expressed concern about the possible effects of a more pro-Rumanian orientation by Austria, namely, that this would result in a bloodbath in Bucharest because of the many Magyars living there, Lueger had replied :

« But excellency, how can you say that ; there are very few Magyars in Bucharest ; there are Hungarian Jews in Bucharest (amusement) , and they, you can rest assured, will not spill their blood (renewed amusement) ; before that happens, they'll run a little further, where perhaps they will be protected against bloodshed. »

But Lueger's anti-Semitism reached well beyond general cultural matters, personal slurs, demagoguery, opposition to « kosher » slaughter, and attacks on alleged Jewish hegemony in Universities. In at least one area, his anti-Semitism had more concrete objects. To be a Jew and a municipal official during the Lueger era was to be at a distinct disadvantage. Complaints that promotion of deserving and sometimes senior Jewish officials was being denied cropped-up throughout his regime. Boyer balances Lueger's policy in personnel matters against those of his predecessors :

« In fairness to the Christian-Socials, even under the Liberal regime before 1895, the number of Jews appointed to important positions in the Magistrat was very low. The anti-Semites simply made a virtue out of the Liberals' vice. »

Evasive irony aside, however, Ludwig Klaar, a Viennese District chief medical officer during the Lueger era, was acutely aware that he had been discriminated against, when without real reasons, he was refused a promotion to the city medical department. Klaar would not have considered such a policy to be a virtue at all. On June 25, 1907, the Liberal municipal Councillor, Oskar Hein, was convinced that Klaar, « who has, for some time, performed the relevant functions to everyone's satisfaction, though recommended by his colleagues, was not promoted because of his Jewish origins. Instead, the position went to a medical officer junior to him, who, however, is the fortunate holder of 2 papal decorations. »

When confronted with the complaint, Lueger resorted to a familiar tactic : he appealed to irrelevant procedure. He declared that he was unaccountable, for he had been absent when the promotion had been discussed. He, therefore, « refused to accept any responsibility whatsoever » . He had « nothing to justify as (he had been) absolutely innocent of the whole affair » . After a 5 year effort, Klaar was eventually promoted, in 1912, and thus « achieved the dignities he had wanted and deserved » . But this did not take place until 2 years after the real roadblock had been removed by death and, then, only after the intervention of 3 leading Christian-Socials, including a priest. In 1907, unable to intervene directly against Klaar, Lueger had chosen « to manipulate from behind the scene » .

Lueger was perfectly willing to appear to cooperate with Jews, as circumstances required. He sometimes tolerated baptized Jews who had attained wealth and power, such as Rudolf Sieghart, who denied that Lueger was an anti-Semite, and August Lohnstein. But Lueger warned his followers to be watchful : though Jews might appear to be Christians, by attending church, they were still Jews and, therefore, not to be trusted. And though an evidently cordial relationship existed between him and August Lohnstein, Lueger categorically denied as false the assertion that Lohnstein was his adviser during a municipal Council session ; yet, later, during the same interview, he hinted that he had been less than truthful in his denial. When it was no longer possible to deny Jewish financial support for his municipal projects, Lueger dismissed and doubtless perplexed Liberal and Socialist criticism, stating that he was happy that his opponents were vexed that he had « obtained the money this way » . Both Lueger, as mayor, and the Christian-Socials happily embraced bequests from Jewish organizations and individuals. It was frequently stipulated by the donors that such bequests were to be bestowed on the municipality, or to charitable organizations and private persons, regardless of religious affiliation, to be determined by the leaders of the ruling Party.

In late October 1909, Lueger appeared at a mass rally, evidently for the last time. Both he and Kunschak spoke in Vienna's 13th District. Though Lueger's anti-Semitism was implicit (he remarked that he stood by his old principles as a « good German, good Christian, ever and evermore »), Kunschak fulminated against the Jews much as had his mentor years before, blaming them for sowing nationalistic strife. He became vitriolic in condemning the « Jewish press ». At another meeting, Kunschak ended an anti-Semitic harrangue with the words :

« Always and forever true to our German people, and battle Jewry till destruction ! » (thunderous applause)

At a provincial Diet session, chaired by Lueger the following February, 1910, only a few weeks before his death, anti-Semitic interjections by Bielohlawek and other Christian-Socials about alleged Jewish economic hegemony in Hungary prompted an irritated response from Karl Renner :

« I can't seem to drive it out of your heads : everywhere you see only Jews. You're so Jew-infested that you see Jews everywhere as an alcoholic can see only mice. You fail to see the great national economic facts and the determining factors ! »

Renner's words characterize Christian-Social anti-Semitism, at the time of Lueger's death : they saw only Jews. His admonition points to the growing imbalance and distortion of reality among Lueger's followers. The Party leader had both fostered and fed the delusions of the rank and file in what was a spiral of mutual re-inforcement. It remains, in this overview of Lueger's anti-Semitism, to glance at its effect on subsequent politics. Some of his biographers, even after 1945, argue that it was minimal. Prominent Austrian Jews are cited in support of their position. Although it cannot be denied that such authors as Arthur Schnitzler and Stefan Zweig largely discounted accusations of anti-Semitism against Lueger, the weight of their opinion must await a full appraisal of the depth of their knowledge of Lueger's politics. Schnitzler and Zweig were members of Vienna's Jewish upper middle-class who liked to think of themselves as assimilated, so secure that they could never be expelled. Such persons are often out of touch with the harsher realities of everyday politics and, sometimes, deny them, even when presented objective facts. This is a recurrent Austrian tendency. Schnitzler, who died in 1931, was spared witnessing the complete destruction of the world he had known, and of which he had been so penetrating a critic. Zweig was less fortunate. He committed suicide in 1942, mourning the loss of « the World of Yesterday » .

Another such Jewish writer is the Socialist Friedrich Austerlitz. Although he was not from the upper middle-class, he likewise dismissed Lueger as a serious anti-Semite. To him, Lueger « was a man who had not invented anti-Semitism but merely had given it political expression, in order to ventilate and exploit mass grievances against Liberal hegemony which, in Vienna, had acquired an unmistakably Jewish flavor in the late- 19th Century » . Austerlitz, like other Austrian Socialists of his time, dismissed anti-Semitism as « the Socialism of fools » and may have felt that, in time, those afflicted would come to their senses. This has not happened. And it should have been plain to Austerlitz that, far from abandoning anti-Semitism once the Liberals had been defeated, Lueger continued to exploit it, especially against the Socialists. Like Schnitzler, Austerlitz died in 1931, and was likewise spared final disillusionment. All 3 writers viewed the past from the vantage point of the barbarism of the 1920's and 1930's. Lueger naturally looked « minor league », in comparison. At the time of his death, Viennese Jewish papers divided roughly along class lines : bourgeois journalists tended to minimize Lueger's effect as anti-Semite ; proletarians saw him as an opportunist who tolerated Jews only when it was advantageous for him to do so.

Some Jewish politicians have qualified their criticism of Lueger's anti-Semitism. Joseph Samuel Bloch, for one, struck a psychological note and stated that :

« Doctor Lueger was pious, in the same sense as he was anti-Semitic. Personally, it was not of much account, but it was useful. »

Yet, one might temper Bloch's opinion with his general statement that :

« Towards the end of our life, (one) remembers the peaceful and happy hours only, and with growing years they shine in growing radiance whereas every thing (sic) sad and melancholy gradually sinks into oblivion, as if covered by a grey veil. »

This general qualification balances his other judgments about Lueger's anti-Semitism. Another Jewish politician, Josef Redlich, defended Lueger's anti-Semitism and praised him for stimulating a « new and healthy » Austrian patriotism. Redlich, who never adjusted his Imperial outlook to the Republic, died in 1936, 2 years before the « Anschluß ». And yet another Jewish politician, Sigmund Mayer, surprisingly condemned Lueger, not for being an anti-Semite, but for not being one « in reality ». Mayer seems to have disapproved of Lueger's apparent want of sincerity on any level of this topic.

In evaluating such mild opinions about Lueger's anti-Semitism, it is well to recall that the Vienna of Lueger's day was also the Vienna of Otto Weininger, Arthur Trebitsch, and other problematic self-hating Jews, some of whom saw in Lueger and the Christian-Socials a welcome counter-balance to the predominating Jewish cultural influence. Extremists, such as Weininger, evinced the « Hermann Levi syndrome » : they would bear any insult, suffer any indignity, and in Weininger's case, commit suicide, to be purged of their Jewishness.

Theodor Herzl was still another kind of man, though he, too, had been an extreme assimilationist at one time, and dreamed of leading a mass conversion of Vienna's Jews in Saint-Stephen's Cathedral. During Lueger's campaign for the mayoralty, Herzl saw Lueger outside a polling place and may thereby have grasped something of his true significance :

« A man next to me said with tender warmth but in a quiet voice : " That is our ' Führer ' ! " Actually, these words showed me more than all declamation and abuse how deeply anti-Semitism is rooted in the hearts of these people. »

It may be true, as Boyer asserts, that Lueger's « political mode was Baroque ». Even if this is interpreted to mean free-wheeling and eclectic, something more must be added : Lueger's supple responsiveness to the crowd and its passions and his willingness to swim in such perilous seas. In a word, pointedly, a distinction must be drawn between psychologizing his behavior and its hard reality. One judges a tree by the fruit it bears. It may well be that Lueger was even worse than an anti-Semite, that, given world enough and time, the rest of humanity would have been next. Such psychological questions may be interesting, but they remain academic in the arena of politics and people who die.

Did Lueger himself believe his anti-Jewish remarks ? We may never know. Over 40 years after Lueger's death, the last Imperial finance minister, Alexander Spitzmüller, asserted that Lueger told him, in April 1909, that anti-Semitism was a good means to get ahead in politics, but once one was on top, it was of no further use ; it was « the sport of the rabble » . If Lueger made this statement, it was shortly after having been elected mayor for the 7th time, after having received the most overwhelming vote of confidence in his career. He could afford to be generous, though such statements cost him little and had no effect on the Jews. There was a reflexive quality about all of Lueger's behavior - more than a touch of what J. Peter Stern has called « total immanence » . When Lueger delivered an anti-Semitic diatribe, no one may have believed ...

« in anything ; or rather, few if any believed in the man before them but all fully believed in the image they (had) created. »

No matter what he said, the public Lueger, the one that counts, did appeal to his listeners' « readiness to take part in the religious image-making, to connive at his self-dramatization as a messianic figure » .

In one respect, Lueger was consistently laudatory toward the Jews. Before and after he became mayor, he praised them for preserving the appearance and sanctity of their ancestors' graves and he added that he wished the Christians would be inspired with a similar spirit. In Vienna's otherwise carefully groomed Central Cemetery, dominated by the Lueger Memorial Church, the large old Jewish section is now overgrown and untended.

Vienna street severs anti-Semite link

« Anti-Semitic verbal incitement by politicians like Karl Lueger paved the way for the racial anti-Semitism of the Nazis. » (Oskar Deutsch, Head of Austrian Jewish community.)

The section of the « Ring » Boulevard contains some of Vienna's most famous buildings. The name of an anti-Semitic mayor is to be removed from a section of one of Vienna's most famous streets.

Part of the « Ring » Boulevard, in central Vienna, is currently named after Karl Lueger, who was mayor of the city from 1897 to 1910.

The decision to rename the street has been welcomed by Jewish groups and Left-wing Parties, but has been condemned by the far-Right.

Karl Lueger is often described as the father of modern political anti-Semitism.

A charismatic and popular leader known as « the Handsome Karl » , Lueger was a major influence on the young Adolf Hitler.

As mayor, he brought about extensive improvements to Vienna's infrastructure. He expanded the pipeline network that brings Alpine spring water to the city and he strengthened social welfare schemes and public transport. But his legacy is tarnished by his attacks on the city's Jewish minority.

His anti-Semitic campaigns were so notorious that when he was 1st elected mayor, in 1895, the Emperor Franz-Josef refused to endorse him. It took 2 years and a lot of pressure before he eventually gave way.

The part of the « Ring » Boulevard that bears his name contains some of Vienna's most prominent buildings, including the « Burgtheater » (one of Europe's largest theatres) and the headquarters of Vienna University.

It was named « Dr.-Karl-Lueger-Ring » , back in 1934, and has proved to be an embarrassing address for many of the city's academics.

Now, after years of debate, the city has decided to change the name to « Universitätsring » (University « Ring ») .

City officials say renaming streets is an unusual step to take, as the names reflect Vienna's history, good and bad.

But Vienna's Councillor for Cultural Affairs, Andreas Mailath-Pokorny, from the governing « Social-Democrat - Greens » coalition, said they were prepared to make an exception in this case.

Karl Lueger was considered by many a charismatic and popular mayor.

The head of Austria's Jewish Community, Oskar Deutsch, welcomed the move, which he said was long overdue.

« Anti-Semitic verbal incitement by politicians like Karl Lueger paved the way for the racial anti-Semitism of the Nazis » , he said.

Mr. Deutsch said it should « serve as a warning on our present politicians who frivolously and reprehensibly use anti-Semitic, racially motivated and xenophobic slogans » .

However the far-Right opposition Freedom Party, which is currently in 2nd place in the opinion polls, strongly criticised the decision.

Its leader, Heinz-Christian Strache, accused the Social-Democrats of setting-up a statue to « a foreign mass murderer like Che Guevara » while they stripped « an excellent Viennese mayor of a street name » . « It is a scandal » , he said.

Despite the renaming of the « Ring » , Lueger will not disappear from Vienna's streets.

There are currently no plans to remove his name from « Dr.-Karl-Lueger-Platz » : a central square, which is dominated by a statue of the former mayor.

Vienne et les Juifs

Être juif en Autriche signifiait jusqu'en 1919 faire partie d'un immense Empire où se côtoyaient des identités fort différentes. Minorité parmi les minorités, les Juifs subirent au cours des siècles les dispersions imposées par les pogromes, les législations contraignantes, la misère économique, les changements de frontières et, finalement, les lois et les crimes nazis. Les plus favorisés ou les plus doués avaient formé à Vienne, à la fin du XIXe siècle, une élite intellectuelle, culturelle et sociale qui exerçait une influence considérable malgré sa faible importance numérique. La plupart d'entre eux avaient cependant payé pour cela leur billet d'entrée, en se convertissant au catholicisme, religion officielle de l'Empire des Habsbourg. Toutefois, malgré la position très minoritaire du protestantisme en Autriche, près d'un quart des Juifs convertis à cette époque préférèrent la religion réformée plus proche du judaïsme, notamment par l'importance attachée aux écrits vétéro-testamentaires. Tels furent les choix de Victor et Alfred Adler, Peter Altenberg, Arnold Schœnberg, Otto Weininger, du père de Ludwig Wittgenstein. Il y eut aussi à la fin du XIXe siècle un courant protestataire chez les intellectuels non juifs qui, voulant adhérer au christianisme, se firent baptiser protestants plutôt que catholiques pour marquer leur opposition au courant anti-Libéral et antisémite des Chrétiens-Sociaux de Karl Lueger, bourgmestre de Vienne à partir de 1897. Ayant beaucoup d'amis juifs, voire des collaborateurs qu'il aimait protéger, Lueger utilisa le 1er la formule, « C'est moi qui décide qui est juif. » , reprise ensuite dans un contexte bien plus dramatique par Hermann Göring. Malgré ses excès de langage, l'antisémitisme de Lueger cherchait une solution dans l'assimilation et la conversion.

Le Concordat conclu entre Franz-Josef et le pape Pie IX, en 1855, avait accordé à l'Église catholique la main-mise sur l'ensemble de l'enseignement. Celle-ci disposait ainsi d'une nouvelle arme discriminatoire pour réaliser les conversions indispensables à l'accès aux fonctions administratives, éducatives ou académiques dans l'Empire des Habsbourg. 40 ans plus tard, les Juifs constituaient 30 % de la population estudiantine de la faculté de médecine de l'Université de Vienne. Le corps professoral d'origine juive représentait la moitié du personnel académique de cette Faculté, environ un tiers de celui de la Faculté de droit et un cinquième de la Faculté de philosophie, nécessairement plus cléricalisée. Ces taux sont à comparer à la population viennoise qui, au début du XXe siècle, ne comptait guère plus de 8 % de Juifs.

On a opportunément ré-édité en 1980 un livre de 1922 de Hugo Bettauer, « Die Stadt ohne Jaden » (La Ville sans Juifs) , qui décrivait ce que serait Vienne si un gouvernement antisémite bannissait tous les Juifs, convertis ou non, de la vie économique, intellectuelle et artistique. Sans Juifs, la musique, le Théâtre, l'Opérette, les cafés littéraires, le mouvement « Jung-Wien » , devenaient des coquilles quasi-vides. Seuls l'Opéra, les arts plastiques (Gustav Klimt, Egon Schiele ...) et l'architecture (Adolf Loos, Otto Wagner ...) semblaient pouvoir mieux survivre mais quel serait leur avenir dans un monde où leurs meilleurs soutiens - la bourgeoisie et les critiques juifs n'existeraient plus ? En présentant les choses de la sorte, Hugo Bettauer semble aujourd'hui enfoncer une porte ouverte, mais dans la Vienne du début des années '20, une telle constatation paraissait révolutionnaire, voire provocante, car elle allait à contre-courant de l'orgueil hérité de la « Kakanie » et des idées reçues, en particulier celles qui faisaient du Juif un créateur impuissant s'imposant par son habileté de copieur, jugement répété à satiété depuis plus d'un demi-siècle, notamment par Richard Wagner ou Hans Pfitzner et, côté latin, par Vincent d'Indy ou Ernest Ansermet.

3 ans après le livre de Bettauer, ces théories trouvaient leur généralisation délirante avec « Mein Kampf » . Le jeune Adolf Hitler s'était rendu une 1re fois à Vienne, en mai-juin 1906. Au « Staatsoper » , il avait assisté à la représentation de 3 Opéras de Wagner, dont « Tristan » le 8 mai, dirigé par Gustav Mahler. Lorsqu'il revint à Vienne, le 17 février 1908, pour s'installer définitivement, Mahler avait quitté son poste de directeur de l'Opéra pour occuper celui de chef-invité du « Metropolitan Opera » et de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York. De retour à Vienne, le 11 mai 1911, il meurt quelques jours plus tard, mettant ainsi un terme à une longue errance puisque, né en Bohême, élevé d'abord en Moravie puis à Vienne comme musicien, il avait comme chef d'orchestre parcouru toute l'Europe (Prague, Budapest, Leipzig, Hambourg, Amsterdam, Paris, Londres) avant de franchir l'Atlantique. L'Europe avait surtout reconnu en lui un Juif, de plus, promenant un talent incontestable d'interprète mais dont les ambitions comme créateur ne pouvaient se situer au niveau de génie des grands artistes germaniques. L'année même de la mort de Mahler, une étude d'Arthur Ruppin publiée à Cologne, « Die Juden der Gegenwart » (Les Juifs d'aujourd'hui) , mettait cependant en doute ce lieu commun hérité de l'antisémitisme et de la littérature raciste pseudo-scientifique de la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle. Theodor Gomperz laissa après sa mort, en 1912, un essai sur les limites et qualités intellectuelles des Juifs dans lequel il faisait une sorte d'inventaire des artistes, penseurs, écrivains qu'il avait beaucoup fréquentés grâce à sa sœur, Josephine von Wertheimstein, et à son célèbre salon. Esprit positiviste, il situait l'excellence des Juifs dans la pure rationalité, dans l'habileté casuistique héritée du Talmud, et dans le talent pour l'imitation des grands interprètes, tant au théâtre (Sarah Bernhardt, Rachel) qu'au concert (Joseph Joachim, Arthur Rubinstein ...) . Cela ne suffisait évidemment pas à modifier le préjugé tenace selon lequel le génie leur aurait été racialement inaccessible. Personne n'en fera davantage l'expérience que Gustav Mahler puis, dans des temps plus dramatiques, Arnold Schönberg.

Le Parti Chrétien-Social et Vienne

Abstract

Title of Thesis :

CHRISTIAN SOCIAL ANTI-SEMITISM IN VIENNA : A TEXTUAL ANALYSIS OF « DIE REICHSPOST » (1894-1897)

Adam Joshua Cohen, Master of Arts (2013) .

Thesis directed by :

Professor Marsha Rozenblit, Department of History.

Thesis submitted to the Faculty of the Graduate School of the University of Maryland, College Park, in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Arts (2013) .

Advisory Committee :

Professor Marsha Rozenblit, Chair ; Professor Jeffrey Herf ; Professor John Lampe.

This Master's Thesis is a close textual analysis of the anti-Semitic argumentation of the « Reichspost » , a Catholic and anti-Semitic newspaper associated with the Christian-Social Party and published in Vienna, between 1894 and 1938. This micro study examines the newspaper, from January 1894 through April 1897. During its early years, the « Reichspost » used economic, social, and political anti-Semitism, religiously motivated Jew-hatred, and historical misrepresentations against Jews and Judaism. In addition, the newspaper justified (but did not call for) anti-Semitic violence. The « Reichspost » moderated itself by rejecting racial anti-Semitism and leaving the possibility of baptism and conversion open to Jews. Moreover, the newspaper demonstrated State patriotism, dynastic loyalty, and some aspects of « positive » Christianity. The « Reichspost » molded these seemingly discordant views into consistent ideology with demands for the « re-Christianization » and « de-Jewification » of public life, and doing so differentiated it from racial and radical anti-Semites of its time and of later decades.

Introduction

The « Reichspost » (1) was a Catholic and anti-Semitic newspaper published in Vienna, from 1894 until 1938. The newspaper associated with the Christian-Social Party until the Party's dissolution in 1934. On May 17, 1895, the « Reichspost » explained its views and the goals of the Christian-Social Party in its front-page feuilleton, « Our Goals and Means to Those Goals » . These goals included the « re-Christianization of society » (« Wiederverchristlichung ») and the return of public life to « the basis of positive Christianity » . (2) Diminished in public life, Christian principles had to prevail again in government, politics, and the economy. With the support of Pope Pius IX and then Pope Leo XIII, the « Reichspost » called on Christians to practice their faith not only in their private lives, but also in their public works. The « re-Christianization » of public life required the defeat of Liberals, Social-Democrats, Freemasons, and Jews, in order to end their un-Christian and un-Catholic influence in society. Rejecting racial anti-Semitism, the « Reichspost » declared its anti-Semitic mission :

« What we fight, is not the Semite as a person, but the pernicious influence (“ verderbliche Einfluß ”) of the Jews, and above all also the “ Jew-Press ” » , a press that the paper claimed, « represented, maintained and promoted Jewish spirit in all of public life » . (3)

This Master's Thesis is a close textual analysis of the anti-Semitic argumentation of the « Reichspost » , a newspaper not well studied by historians, from its 1st issue, in January 1894, through April 1897. What is new and important about this micro-study is that it allows for a better understanding of the early development of « Reichspost » anti-Semitism. Moreover, it is worthwhile to study the newspaper from January 1894 through April 1897 because this was the period in which the Christian-Social Party became politically dominant in Vienna. Karl Lueger, the Party's anti-Semitic leader, became mayor of Vienna on April 8, 1897. (4) The « Reichspost » actively campaigned for the Christian-Social Party and Karl Lueger, and contributed to their electoral successes. This project helps us gain insight into the kinds of anti-Semitism that appealed to Viennese voters and the anti-Semitic views of the Christian-Social Party. Moreover, « Reichspost » anti-Semitic argumentation is worthy of study in its own right because it surely influenced its readers' attitudes towards Jews in late- 19th Century Vienna.

Throughout the period under study, the « Reichspost » used economic, social, and political anti-Semitism, religiously motivated Jew-hatred, and historical misrepresentations against Jews and Judaism. In addition, the newspaper justified (but did not call for) anti-Semitic violence. On the other hand, the « Reichspost » moderated its views by rejecting racial anti-Semitism and leaving the possibility of baptism and conversion open to Jews. Furthermore, the newspaper demonstrated State patriotism, dynastic loyalty, and some aspects of « positive » Christianity, therefore, distancing itself from radical German nationalism. The « Reichspost » molded these discordant views into a consistent ideology by grounding them in demands for the « re-Christianization » and « de-Jewification » of public life. What we learn here is this Catholic form of anti-Semitism in late- 19th Century Vienna demonstrated versatility and adapted both traditional religious Jew hatred and modern forms of anti-Semitism.

Historiography of Viennese and Christian-Social Anti-Semitism

Peter Pulzer, a British political historian, born in Vienna in 1929, published in 1964, « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria » . Pulzer explained the success of political anti-Semitism in Austria, as a reaction to Liberalism, capitalism, and Social-Democracy. He contended that in late- 19th Century Austria, certain sectors of society, especially artisans, peasants, and landowners perceived that Liberalism, capitalism, and Social-Democracy harmed them. These sectors of society, due to the economic, political, and social position of Jews, identified Jews with Liberalism, capitalism, and Social-Democracy. Therefore, in late- 19th Century Austria, anti-Semitism was a reaction to these 3 ideologies. The Christian-Social Party exploited this reaction and achieved political success. Moreover, pre-Liberal and pre-capitalist religious hatred of Jews played a role in the rise of political anti-Semitism. Pan-Germans such as Georg Ritter von Schönerer espoused racial anti-Semitism in reaction to Liberal values of equality and human rights, but his radical German nationalism was not popular in Vienna. (5) Speaking specifically to the anti-Semitism of Vienna and the Christian-Social Party, Pulzer argued that :

« In Vienna, anti-Semitism drew its strength from neither racial nor religious springs, but from economic springs. Neither Lueger nor his Party, nor the conservatives, nor the Church could afford to regard anti-Semitism as more than a means to an end. Racial anti-Semitism was out of the question. » (6)

In his 1981 book, « Political Radicalism in Late-Imperial Vienna : Origins of the Christian-Social Movement (1848-1897) », John Boyer contended that Christian-Social Party leader Karl Lueger and the majority of the Christian-Socials used anti-Semitism as an opportunistic weapon of politics. They used anti-Semitism to attack economic and political Liberalism, as well as Liberal anti-clericalism. Moreover, they presented anti-Semitism as a solution to real and perceived economic threats to the bourgeois classes, to increase Christian-Social voter participation and win elections. While some Christian-Socials pursued more radical anti-Semitism, most radical anti-Semites were excluded from its top leadership over time. However, the Christian-Social leadership continued to tolerate radical anti-Semitism among sub-elite journalists, priests, and ward politicians. Nevertheless, Boyer argued anti-Semitism was only one plank of the Christian-Social platform and was not central to Christian-Social ideology. (7) Boyer explained the Christian-Socials made both outlandish anti-Semitic promises to constituents as well as those with more « objective considerations such as better credit facilities, higher tax rates on big industry, the abolition of peddling, laws regulating competitive sales, and the like ». (8) Note that these promises with « objective considerations » the Christian-Socials made to constituents clearly intended to diminish the influence of Jews in commerce.

Steven Beller, in direct opposition to Boyer, argued that anti-Semitism was central to Christian-Social ideology. In « Vienna and the Jews (1867-1938) : A Cultural History » (1989) , Beller declared anti-Semitism had successfully unified Democrats, independent Liberals, artisans' leaders, clerics, and German nationals under the banner of Christian-Socialism. (9) In « A Concise History of Austria » (2006) , Beller elaborated how Christian-Socials did not have a national identity to rely upon. In addition, clericalism could not unite the Christian-Socials, as many supporters were anti-clerical, especially in Vienna. For this reason, the Christian-Social Party did not use the word « Catholic » in its name but rather « Christian » , which meant in context « not Jewish » . Beller remarked :

« Antisemitism was at the core of Christian-Social identity. » (10)

Austrian scholarship has further elaborated on Viennese and Christian-Social anti-Semitism. In 1965, Hellmut Andics published « The Eternal Jew : Causes and History of Anti-Semitism » . Andics related how Karl Lueger embraced clerical petty-bourgeois anti-Semitism, but not racial anti-Semitism. Lueger argued for a « quota » (Latin : « numerus clausus ») against Jews to scale back the influence of Jews to a level matching their small proportion of the population. With his anti-Jewish politics, Lueger evoked emotion and brought men to the polls to vote for the Christian-Social Party. (11)

In a 1974 article, « Tolerance, Emancipation and Anti-Semitism » , Wolfgang Häusler explained that Viennese anti-Semitism made impossible the complete integration into bourgeois society, emancipation, and assimilation of Jews. Häusler characterized Christian-Social anti-Semitism as anti-Liberal, anti-socialist, anti-capitalist, and motivated by religious Jew-hatred. Moreover, he portrayed Christian-Social anti-Semitism as an integral part of Christian-Social Party propaganda and press, and as a « political instrument » for electoral success. (12)

Historians' characterizations of Christian-Social anti-Semitism are only partially correct as characterizations of « Reichspost » anti-Semitism. An examination of the newspaper reveals that it identified Jews with Liberalism, Capitalism, and Social-Democracy, and attacked Jews as identical with these 3 ideologies. Furthermore, it depicted Jews as a threat to artisans, peasants, and landowners. The « Reichspost » saw Jews as a threat to all of society and public life. The newspaper also utilized pre-Liberal and pre-Capitalist religious hatred of Jews. Pulzer argued that Viennese anti-Semitism drew its strength from « economic springs » . Indeed, the « Reichspost » made frequent use of economic anti-Semitism. However, the newspaper used just as much religiously motivated hatred of Jews, which Pulzer had downplayed. Yet, Pulzer was right :

« Racial anti-Semitism was out of the question. » , for the « Reichspost » .

The « Reichspost » often used anti-Semitism in the same manner as the Christian-Social Party, as a weapon of politics, especially during elections. The newspaper used anti-Semitism in attacks against Liberals and Social-Democrats, and to play-off economic threats to the bourgeoisie. The « Reichspost » editorial staff consisted of Christian-Social « sub-elite » of journalists and priests, to whom Boyer referred. Like the Christian-Social Party, the « Reichspost » used anti-Semitism as a weapon against Liberal and Social-Democratic anti-clericalism. The newspaper viewed Liberals, Social-Democrats, and Jews as enemies of Christians, Christianity, and the Catholic Church. It specifically targeted Jews in calls for legal regulations of peddling and competitive sales, 2 important Christian-Social objectives. Same as the Christian-Social Party, the « Reichspost » called for quotas against Jews in academic and professional positions. Note, however, that the « Reichspost » called for these quotas in the name of the « re-Christianization » and « de-Jewification » of public life, demonstrating religious motivations on par with economic ones.

As Beller and others argued, anti-Semitism constituted much of the core identity of the « Reichspost » . In contrast to Beller's claims, however, Catholicism and « clericalism » also constituted the core identity of the « Reichspost » . The high-frequency with which the newspaper portrayed Christians and Catholics, Christianity and Catholicism, and the Catholic clergy positively matched the high-frequency with which it portrayed Jews, Judaism, and rabbis negatively.

Similarly, German nationalism was not important to the « Reichspost » . The newspaper professed State patriotism and identification with Austria-Hungary and the Habsburg monarchy. The name « Reichspost » means Imperial Post. From January 1, 1894, until September 27, 1894, the newspaper labeled itself an « independent daily paper for the Christian people of Austria » . In the rest of the period under investigation, the « Reichspost » changed « Austria » to « Austria-Hungary » , extending its State patriotism to the entire Empire and reaching as wide a Christian and Catholic audience as possible. The « Reichspost » often declared loyalty to Empire and dynasty. The newspaper was not German nationalist. It saw itself as Austrian, not German. Thus, the newspaper distanced itself from Georg Ritter von Schönerer and the Pan-German movement.

The weight of the existing scholarship on the Christian-Social Party emphasizes economic and political anti-Semitism and de-emphasizes social anti-Semitism and religiously motivated Jew-hatred. On the contrary, this study of the « Reichspost » demonstrates that the newspaper emphasized all of these forms of anti-Semitism and Jew-hatred. Equally important, the newspaper often entwined them in its argumentation against Jews. At the same time, the « Reichspost » was not German nationalist, rejected racial anti-Semitism, allowed Jews to convert to Christianity, and professed State patriotism, dynastic loyalty, and « positive » Christianity. Moreover, the « Reichspost » selectively remembered historic events and figures in its argumentation against Jews. The newspaper also justified pogroms against Jews without « crossing the line » and inciting anti-Jewish violence.

Origins of the « Reichspost »

Christian-Social politicians, Catholic clergy and Catholic laymen founded the « Reichspost » . At the 3rd Austrian Catholics Convention, in Linz, during summer 1892, the Christian-Socials presented their views, emphasizing anti-Semitism and the social rather than religious content of their program. This irritated Catholic conservatives and, consequently, the « Katholikentag » ended in disunity. Nevertheless, during this meeting the Christian-Socials founded the « Reichspost », which became a Christian-Social political organ more reliable than either Ernst Vergani's « Volksblatt » or Karl Freiherr von Vogelsang's « Das Vaterland ». (13)

Franz Martin Schindler (1847-1922), a Catholic cleric and professor of moral theology at the University of Vienna, from 1888 to 1917, led a committee that organized and obtained funding for the creation of the « Reichspost ». Roman Himmelbauer (1858-1929), an Augustinian cleric, political agitator, and editor of the Catholic « Correspondenzblatt », was an influential « Reichspost » committee member. By early 1893, funding was obtained for the « Reichspost » in the same manner as for the « Correspondenzblatt », by voluntary contributions from monks and clerics, as well as some investments by Catholic laymen such as Albert Gessmann. A Christian-Social politician, 2nd in command to Karl Lueger, Albert Gessmann, became « Reichspost » co-director. (14) With Gessmann as co-director, the newspaper probably had stronger ties to the Christian-Social Party than before him.

In a front-page article entitled, « To the Christian reader », on December 29, 1894 (more than 2 years after the « Katholikentag », in Linz), the « Reichspost » listed its owners. This included the aforementioned Albert Gessmann, Roman Himmelbauer, and Franz M. Schindler, as well as Adam Trabert, Ambros Opitz, Baron Vittinghoff-Schell, and Anton Weimar. (15) Adam Trabert (1822-1914) was a Catholic writer active in the Christian-Social movement, in the early 1890's. (16) Ambros Opitz (1846-1907) was chief editor for the « Reichspost » until 1903. A German cleric from northern Bohemia, Opitz had trained as a Jesuit and then became a priest in 1870. While « Reichspost » editor, he served as a member of the Bohemian Diet, from 1895-1901. A prolific publicist, Opitz founded several other Catholic newspapers as well. (17) Baron Vittinghoff-Schell was the organizer of the Austrian Catholics Convention, and a « Reichspost » co-publisher. (18)

During the period going from January 1894 through April 1897, the « Reichspost » listed its newspaper staff at the bottom of one of the last pages in each edition. Ambros Opitz, the newspaper's chief editor, was listed in every edition. Anton Weimar, also one of the newspaper owners, served alternately as publisher and / or responsible editor. Franz Winter and Hermann Hikisch, who were not listed as « Reichspost » owners, served as responsible editors. Friedrich Funder (1872-1959) became « Reichspost » feuilleton editor, in 1896. A traditional Catholic layman, he studied 3 semesters of theology in Graz, where he joined Catholic students in brawls against German nationalist fraternities. He studied law at the University of Vienna and received his « doctor juris », in 1898. In 1903, he succeeded Ambros Opitz as « Reichspost » chief editor. (19)

As Christian-Social politicians, Catholic clergy and Catholic laymen, the owners, editors, and publishers of the « Reichspost » demonstrated it was a Christian-Social and Catholic newspaper. Furthermore, the newspaper did not depend upon the church hierarchy for patronage. Of all the major Catholic newspapers in Austria-Hungary, the « Reichspost » was the only one with such independence. (20) In addition, the newspaper did not answer to Catholic conservatives, such as those irritated at the 3rd Austrian Catholics Convention by the Christian-Social display of anti-Semitism. These factors enabled and encouraged the overt display of anti-Semitism in the « Reichspost ». The following 3 chapters examine how traditional religious Jew hatred and modern forms of anti-Semitism informed the newspaper's anti-Semitic arguments.

Use of Economic / Social Anti-Semitism, and Justifications of Expulsions / Riots Targeting Jews

Use of Economic Anti-Semitism

« Buy only from Christians ! » (« Kaufet nur bei Christen ! ») (21)

The « Reichspost » used economic and social anti-Semitic argumentation to attack Jews and their role in the economy and society. In terms of economic anti-Semitism, the newspaper denigrated Jews as fraudulent and exploitative usurers, peddlers, stock-brokers, businessmen, bankers, industrialists, and millionaires. It represented Jews as the embodiment of capitalistic excess and a threat to a traditional economy, especially to artisans, farmers, and small businesses. This led to « Reichspost » calls for regulations on usury (lending money at excessive interest rates) , peddling, and stock-broking. The newspaper blended religiously motivated Jew-hatred with its economic anti-Semitism ; it condemned Jews for selling Christian religious objects, while exhorting Christians to « Buy only from Christians ! » and called for the cessation of commerce on Sundays, in observance of the Christian Sabbath.

In an article entitled, « The harmful Jewish influence on working life » , the « Reichspost » declared that the « Jewish Question » was above all an economic policy question. The newspaper pledged itself to « fight as independent organ of the people against the exceedingly detrimental effect of Jewish business ethics on the entire economy, especially also on production » . (22) In support of this position, the « Reichspost » discussed Doctor Leopold Caro's 1892 essay, « The Jewish Question, an Ethical Question » . (23) Doctor Caro, born a Jew and descended from a Spanish-Jewish rabbinical-family, was a Christian convert. The « Reichspost » assured its readers of Caro's credibility. He had converted earlier and never insulted or neglected his fellow Christians. The « Reichspost » explicitly rejected racial anti-Semitism, which allowed it to cite Caro, a convert, as an authority on the « Jewish Question » . According to the newspaper, Caro's work proved Jews were « corrupt » usurers, stock-brokers, bankrupters, and journalists. In addition, the « Reichspost » cited Caro's statistics about usury. According to Caro, from 1880-1887, of 441 usurers prosecuted in Austria, 277 (62.9 %) were Jewish, while 164 (37.1 %) were Christian. In Galicia, of a total 192 usurers prosecuted, 168 (87.5 %) were Jewish (24) , (12.5 %) were Christian. The statistics Caro used, according to the « Reichspost » , came from the Imperial and Royal Statistical Central Commission for the Austrian Monarchy. The « Reichspost » then declared the criminal statistics proved Jews were criminals out of greed. (24) In many additional articles, the newspaper derided Jews as usurers and / or stock exchange speculators, and called upon the government to regulate such economic activity. (25)

In a similar vein, the « Reichspost » often declared Jewish peddlers negatively impacted the economy. In « Check Peddling ! » , the newspaper described the 1883 trade regulation on peddling as insufficient. This regulation required peddlers to obtain peddling permits. Despite the regulation, peddlers, most of them Jews, flourished. The « Reichspost » claimed this economic activity harmed legitimate artisans and salesmen. Competing with peddlers, they could no longer sell their wares directly. Peddlers undercut their prices. Furthermore, peddlers harmed consumers by selling wares of varying quality and by offering installment loans. Nevertheless, the newspaper alleged, Liberal deputies who depended on Jewish votes defended peddling because there were 20,000 officially registered peddlers (mostly Jews) throughout Austria. In spite of Liberal opposition, the « Reichspost » called for further regulation. This included a minimum age for peddlers of 35 years and a requirement that a peddler must be a candidate for 1 year before becoming registered. The newspaper also called for prohibiting peddling from being a family business and children from working as peddlers. The « Reichspost » requested enforcement of observance of Sunday, as a day of rest. Furthermore, the newspaper called for excluding peddlers from selling herbs, meat and vinegar to prevent epidemics (implying Jews and their business practices were dirty) , as well as perfumes, pocket watches, and securities. The « Reichspost » desired a ban on peddling in local communities with more than 10,000 inhabitants. (26)

On many occasions, the « Reichspost » warned its readers that Jewish peddlers posed an economic and / or health threat. (27) In a report entitled, « Jewish brutality » , the newspaper recounted a scene on « Neubaugürtel » (a street in Vienna) where a « bow-legged haggler » led 1 donkey and 3 horses, all « run down and miserable » animals, along with a rope. When the animals no longer had the strength to continue, the haggler hit them with a stick. This aroused general indignation among passersby :

« To the allegations of some compassionate people ; the benevolent Hebrew responded (in a Yiddish accent) :“ What do you want, I lead them only so far to the butcher ! ” To slaughter such fagged animal stuff (“ Theirzeug ”) and offer it to the unsuspecting Viennese should then not be allowed. » (28)

The « Reichspost » used easily recognizable anti-Semitic stereotypes of the « bow-legged » Jew speaking German with a Yiddish accent. By recounting the Jew’s cruel treatment of the tired animals, his desire to slaughter them and sell their meat to unsuspecting Viennese customers, the newspaper meant to elicit anger and disgust from readers in support of its efforts to curb Jewish peddling.

In an article entitled, « Jews in the Food Trade » , the « Reichspost » noted Jews had expanded into the industry of butchering and called for regulation of Jews there as well. Here, the newspaper warned that Jewish butchers offered :

« The cheaper price at the expense of quality and sanitary requirements. Those familiar with the process of ritual slaughter (“ Schächtung ”) and the rigor in the selection of meat for specific Jewish purposes will understand well that the Jews have a very lively interest to sustain a meat trade between Galicia and Vienna. » (29)

The « Reichspost » did not explain how the process of Jewish ritual slaughter and meat selection affected meat quality. Uninformed readers were expected to imagine the worst. Note as well, here the newspaper used a mix of economic and religious arguments against Jews in the food trade.

The « Reichspost » contended bad Jewish business practices existed in all branches of trade. In « He’d have to earn » , a Jewish businessman and a Christian businessman came to an agreement. They helped each other sell goods at their respective shops to customers at the regular purchase price. The newspaper claimed that while the Christian sold the Jew’s wares honestly, the Jew over-charged the Christian’s customers slightly, and pocketed the difference. The «

Reichspost » claimed that the character of Jews explained his action :

« It is in the Jews' blood, he can't help it, to gain a little " profit " (" Rebbach ") . » (30)

In a series of articles, in March 1896, the « Reichspost » contended Jewish business owners exploited their workers to gain a competitive business advantage. Among cardboard producers, for example, Jewish industrialists employed 1,500 female and 200 male workers. The women workers were mostly younger than 30 years old. Bad working conditions, hours, wages, malnutrition and living standards caused high mortality rates. (31) The « Reichspost » described conditions in the feather adornment industry as well. Here, Jewish industrialists were fewer in number, yet, according to the newspaper, they exerted a negative influence due to their bad business practices. Highly-skilled women received better pay and could afford better living conditions. However, for the least experienced and lowest paid workers, « the main diet consists mainly of coffee and bread, in summer cherries and bread » . (32) In this series of articles on women at work, the « Reichspost » had attacked capitalistic excess, which it attributed to Jews.

The « Reichspost » depicted wealthy Jews as crafty and / or miserly. In « Beneficence in installments » (« Wohlthätigkeit auf Raten ») , the newspaper described the « beneficence » of the son of the deceased Jewish coal baron Wilhelm Guttman, who inherited millions of florins (« Gulden ») from his father. The « Reichspost » contended sarcastically that the son donated 20,000 florins to charities in installments to put himself in the best light :

« Every 2nd day, 1,000 florins, then comes the name of this " generous " donor, 20 times in the newspapers, and the world will cry-out in amazement : " Must have been a charitable person, this Guttman ! " This " beneficence in installments " is so genuinely Jewish. » (33)

In 2 reports on the Estate of Jay Gould (who died in 1892) , the American railway developer and speculator, the « Reichspost » negatively portrayed the deceased Gould and Jews who sought to profit from his Estate. In truth, Jay Gould was a Protestant. However, in « The Crazy Gold » (« Die meschuggenen Gold ») , the newspaper assumed Gould was a Jew from Hungary named Isaak Gold who migrated as a poor young man to America, where he changed his name to Jay Gould and made a fortune. The « Reichspost » declared :

« All Jews who listen to the precious name " Gold ", are, as a Jewish newspaper reported, become suddenly " crazy " . » (34)

Instead, it argued that many families in Austria-Hungary now carried the family name Gold and claimed familial relationship to the deceased. These claimants had formed a consortium and raised a 20,000 « Gulden » subscription to cover initial expenses :

« Provided with this money, an established lawyer in " Groß-Kanizsa " has already traveled to New York to represent the claims of the heirs. » (35)

By mislabeling Jay Gould a Jew, the « Reichspost » associated Jews with capitalism, and attacked both. Furthermore, the newspaper depicted Jewish claimants to his Estate as both greedy and opportunistic.

The « Reichspost » engaged in a tirade against the Gould family. The newspaper declared derisively :

« But the thing gets even better ! The Gould's testament decreed that the son George would be paid from the Estate $ 25,000,000 not as heir, but as a salary : the salary for 12 years working in the service of the company Gould ! This salary rate, per year, more than $ 2,000,000 ! » (36)

While the American public viewed such a salary as too high, Judge Dillon upheld the salary rate as justified. The Gould family dodged the inheritance tax. The « Reichspost » sneered :

« As one sees, the Jew whether rich or poor, is dirty, and anxious to dig only to gain an advantage. » (37)

The newspaper depicted Jews, rich and poor, as deceitful to gain an economic advantage. This article was another attack on the excess of capitalism, which the « Reichspost » associated with Jews.

The « Reichspost » further derided Jews for their economic roles in a series of articles covering a defamation lawsuit between 2 Jewish firms. In « For what purpose does a Jew use anti-Semitism » , the newspaper reported that Würtemberg and Co. , a scythes mail-order company (« Sensen-Versandhaus ») , in the Rhineland, filed a defamation lawsuit against its competitor firm Münzer and Co. Würtemberg and Co. claimed Münzer and Co. had sent-out 300,000 circulars warning clientele against buying Würtemberg's scythes, as the company was « Polish-Jewish » (« polnisch-jüdisch ») . (38) The « Reichspost » commented :

« So, in order to defeat a “ Cohn-national ” competitor, even the Jewish scythe dealer used anti-Semitism. » (39)

In « Jew versus Jew » , the « Reichspost » recounted the brothers David and Lazar Münzer had come from Galicia to Vienna to trade in scythes. The Münzer brothers distributed circulars in the countryside warning that its competitors, possibly Würtemberg and Co. , did « farmer con tricks » (« Bauern-fängerei ») selling magnetic scythes to farmers. In addition, the Münzer brothers reportedly sent-out 10,000 circulars warning clients against buying from their Jewish cousin Adolf Münzer's scythe dealing house, in Cologne. The Münzer brothers' circulars warned « this Galician scoundrel » Adolf Münzer sent advertisements to farmers selling « honed scythes » , when he actually manufactured « miserable trash scythes » and defrauded his customers. The « Reichspost » commented :

« Of course, Adolf felt violated in his business and in his “ honour ” and sued his cousins for “ defamation ”. » (40)

Note that the newspaper, put « honour » and « defamation » in quotation marks. This demonstrated its belief that Adolf Münzer, as a Jew, lacked honour, made false claims of defamation, and had a fraudulent scythes business.

Moreover, Adolf Münzer had also sent-out circulars against his cousins, the Münzer brothers in Vienna as well. The « Reichspost » noted that, for this reason, the Münzer brothers might be absolved. The newspaper expressed regret for the country people who had been enticed to buy from these scythe traders. (41) Alleging the bad business practices of these Jews implied that all Jews cheated. By recounting Jews' anti-Semitic accusations against Jews, the « Reichspost » meant to validate its economic anti-Semitism and portray Jews making petty attempts to gain economic advantages. The newspaper also made numerous accusations of Jewish fraud and swindling in all kinds of businesses and in banking. (42)

In particular, the « Reichspost » was upset that Jews sold Christian religious objects. In a front-page article, « The trade of Jewish businesses with Christian devotional or pilgrimage objects », the « Reichspost » reported that Jews had manufactured and sold Christian prayer books, holy pictures, and other Christian devotional objects. The newspaper claimed 4 Viennese Jewish firms made a profitable business selling pilgrimage objects to pilgrims. It lamented that enough Christians bought these items from Jews to cause Christian producers to struggle financially, and that Christian firms with weak capital needed assistance. Combining religiously motivated Jew-hatred and economic anti-Semitism, the « Reichspost » cited Rabbi Joseph Caro's 16th Century « Schulchan Aruch » (Code of Jewish Law) . The « Reichspost » claimed the « Schulchan Aruch » prohibited Jews from purchasing Jewish religious objects (« Cultusgegenstände ») from « Akums » (« Christen ») . (43) Here, the « Reichspost » translated « Akum » as Christian, for the sake of its anti-Semitic argumentation. « Akum » actually means « star worshipper » . (44)

Nevertheless, the « Reichspost » claimed that Jews should strictly observe their own laws, not sell Christian religious objects, and stated that it would reprove Christians for selling Jewish religious objects as well. The « Reichspost » noted that Jews and their press joked and sneered (« witzeln und höhnen ») at Christian veneration of Saints and pilgrimages, and ridiculed pious folk on pilgrimages. At the same time, Christians paid thousands of Crowns to Jewish businessmen when they visited Mariazell, Styria, and pilgrimage sites of Lower-Austria. The « Reichspost » exhorted readers :

« Buy only from Christians ! (« Kaufet nur bei Christen! ») (45) , which was also a leitmotif of the Christian-Social Party. It is the epigraph at the beginning of this chapter as well.

In « Buy only from Christians ! The confirmation business. » (« Kauft nur bei Christen ! Das Firmungsgeschäft. ») , the « Reichspost » claimed that Jewish merchants displaced Christian artisans in all branches of industry. Jewish merchants took their customers, reducing Master artisans to journeymen, and worse to « wage slaves » (« Lohnslaven ») of the Jews. The « Reichspost » warned its readers not to buy from Jews who, according to its reading of the « Schulchan Aruch » , debased prices and considered Christians as « domestic animals » . (46) The « Reichspost » then declared that, when Christians withdraw trade from Christian businesses, « we commit a crime against Christian national character » (« christlichen Volkstum ») . (47) The newspaper concluded with an emotional appeal :

« And now again, the request : buy from Christians ! Remember, that for thousands of poor craftsmen's children, there will be no festive joy, when your money enriches Jews. » (48)

The « Reichspost » emphasized the Christian-Social request « buy from Christians ! » by appealing to the reader's emotions with the image of Christian craftsmen's children made joyless (allegedly) by calculating and cold Jews and their unfair business practices. The newspaper published a poem by Johann Anton Leib, entitled « Christmas ! » which continued the theme in its 2nd stanza :

« Christmas ! No feast of the Jews ? / Yes, but ! You fill their cash boxes (“ Cassen ”) / With the money of those - good / Christians, they let themselves be fooled. » (49)

The « Reichspost » also implored its readers to buy Christian-Social memorabilia from Christian rather than Jewish businesses. In « Anti-Semitic pieces of jewelry » (« Antisemitische Schmuckgegenstände »), the newspaper reported that, in the 17th District of Vienna (« Hernals »), one of the Jewish shops sold anti-Semitic gold and silver jewelry, including Bismarck-, Schönerer-, and Lueger pins, pendants and so on. The « Reichspost » recommended to its readers in « Hernals » that they only order and buy their anti-Semitic jewelry from the skilled goldsmith Josef Ungrad, a Christian-Social sympathizer and German Christian, on « Hernalser Hauptstraße Nr. 35 » . (50)

The « Reichspost » supported legislation closing businesses on Sundays, the Christian Sabbath. In « On the Sunday rest » (« Zur Sonntagsruhe »), the newspaper described as « unconscionable and outrageous » that the « Jew-Press » had complained about recent regulations concerning Sunday rest and its effects on commerce. The « Reichspost » remarked that Christians were not permitted Sunday rest because the Jews would allow neither their profit nor their « domination » (« Herrschaft ») to be diminished. (51) The « Reichspost » call for the closure of businesses on Sundays was a prime example of the coterminous « re-Christianization » and « de-Jewification » of public life. It would have allowed Christians to observe the Christian Sabbath without worry of economic competition from Jews keeping their businesses open. On the other hand, it would have damaged Jews economically, especially those who observed the Jewish Sabbath on Saturday by making commerce impossible for them over the weekend. Exhortations to buy Christian religious objects from Christians (not Jews), references to the « Schulchan Aruch », and calls to end Sunday commerce, were a blend of economic anti-Semitism and religiously motivated Jew-hatred.

Use of Social Anti-Semitism

« Jewish swindler, you are malingering. » (« Jüdischer Schwindler, Du simulirst. ») (52)

The « Reichspost » depicted Jews as unable to adhere to normal standards of behavior. They were deceitful, sexually depraved, and violent. The newspaper portrayed Jews misbehaving in Christian and Jewish houses of worship and in Jewish neighborhoods, where they fought one another and peddled their wares. It depicted Jews in public life allegedly beating and sexually preying on Christian women and girls. Extreme examples of « Reichspost » social anti-Semitic argumentation included depictions of Jews as the sole perpetrators of « White Slavery » and as murderers for economic gain. The newspaper generally characterized Jewish family life as driven by self-interest and deceit, not by love and mutual-respect.

The « Reichspost » presented hostile images of Jewish public behavior, including in Christian and Jewish houses of worship. The newspaper published a report submitted by Johann Stadler, a Christian-Social collaborator, Leopold Neuhold, a Master locksmith (« Schlossermeister »), and Johann Bischinger, a government official, entitled : « Rudeness in the Hofburg Chapel » . Sunday Masses in the Hofburg chapel drew large crowds because of the wonderful musical performances. Due to the large crowds, some people who came late had to be turned away. The report submitters claimed they had witnessed Jews in attendance acting sacrilegiously, resting their hats, sticks, books, on the altar, and leaning themselves against the altar to listen comfortably to the music. Jews stood in groups talking Yiddish (« mauscheln ») (53) , criticizing the singing, and so on. This caused anger among the Christians and tested their patience. During consecration on Easter Monday, 2 giggling Jewish girls standing by the knees of Christians imitated them with mocking gestures. The report submitters lamented that Christians who came too late, and perhaps could not come earlier, were turned away, while Jews in attendance behaved so badly. They requested that a competent authority address the issue. (54) The « Reichspost » sought to demonstrate by publishing this submission that Jews disrespected Christianity and behaved badly, even in sacred spaces.

The « Reichspost » recounted Jews misbehaving in Jewish houses of worship too. In « Quarrel in the Jewish temple » (« Balgerei im Judentempel ») , the author noted :

« In the synagogue in Stryj (Galicia) , it came yesterday to bloody brawls between gymnasium students who wanted to organize a memorial service for a deceased colleague and the fanatical orthodox Party, who tried to prevent this devotion, as incompatible with the Orthodox traditions. As the local police could provide no assistance, the gendarmerie had to intervene in the synagogue. » (55)

The « Reichspost » portrayed Jews as violent and unruly, unable to adhere to norms of behavior in houses of worship. There was a tinge of religiously motivated Jew-hatred in the characterization of « the fanatical orthodox Party » as well.

The « Reichspost » was hostile to Jewish neighborhoods, especially those in the « Leopoldstadt » , a District of Vienna situated on an island on the Danube River. (56) In « Picture of a Mood » (« Stimmungsbild ») , the newspaper negatively represented « the Jew-island » (« Juden-insel ») of the « Leopoldstadt » , noting :

« Peace exists today on the wide plaza in the Jew-island, peace in the enchantingly beautiful Jew-lane (“ Judengassel ”) ! Anyone can now pass through this lane without risking his life. Quiet reigns in every house, no one will be by the melodic “ trade ” (“ Handleh ”) be shooed from his dreams. Even on the stock exchange, the traffic is weak, so that one might think : “ Oh, if only it always remains ! ” And what is the cause - that peace so deep prevails ? “ Tishrei 5655 ” - Jewish New Year. » (57)

The author insinuated that Jews were violent, that only by « risking one’s life » could one pass through the « Jew-island » of the « Leopoldstadt » . Furthermore, in remarking the « Jew-lane » was a noisy place marked by the sound of « melodic ‘ trade ’ » and the noise of the stock-exchange, the author implied Jews were neither polite nor genteel. Only during the Jewish New Year when most Jews were at synagogue could the author find peace and quiet in the « Leopoldstadt » . This passage was noteworthy for its combination of economic and social anti-Semitism and religiously motivated Jew-hatred.

In « From the ' ghetto ' of Vienna » (« Aus dem ' Ghetto ' Wiens ») , the « Reichspost » claimed the dark alleys of the « Glocken- » , « Blumauer- » , and « Novaragasse » (streets) in the « Leopoldstadt » were places where « light-shy, Jewish riff-raff » (« lichtscheuen, jüdischen Gesindels ») roamed and depraved women resided. Here, a brawl or public scandal among the Jewish families broke-out almost daily. The « Reichspost » reported :

« 2 Jewesses in the “ Glockengasse ”, Regina Löbl and Bertha Klimat, in accordance with the Jewish style (“ jüdischer Art ”) spat at each other, jabbed each other with umbrellas and pelted (each other) with plates and bowls, and then sued. » (58)

Brought before the criminal judge of the « Leopoldstadt » , Doctor Schuster, the Jewesses denied everything and mutually retracted their defamation claims. While an action for assault remained against Mrs. Löbl, the defendant managed to prove that Mrs. Klimat's injuries stemmed from an earlier incident. The « Reichspost » conjectured that the injuries likely came from a previous fight of this « heroine » (« Heldin ») , and noted the negotiation ended in acquittal. (59) The newspaper depicted these Jewish women as shameless and violent.

The « Reichspost » described acts of violence by Jewish men more often than by Jewish women. In « The Jews have, as is well-known, the intelligence » , the newspaper challenged the claim to Jewish intelligence in its account of a Jewish man beating a Christian woman and child. In a park in the 3rd District of Vienna (« Landstraße ») , the Christian charwoman Marie Mandl and her daughter walked their small dog. They then witnessed Jewish children beat the dog without cause. When the charwoman made them answer for their actions, they ran home to their father, the Jewish hemp dealer Max Kaufmann. The children complained to him that a Christian woman had rebuked them. Mr. Kaufmann then :

« rushed immediately to the park and gave the daughter of the charwoman 2 slaps with such force that she immediately began to bleed. The intelligent gentleman (“ intelligente Herr ”) had then still the audacity, when a watchman came, to slap in the face the mother of the abused child while the watchman stood by. Mr. Max Kaufmann, this model of “ quickwitted ” Jews, will have to stand trial soon because of this brutality. » (60)

The « Reichspost » depicted Jews as violent without cause against women, children, and animals. The newspaper also sought to demonstrate how Mr. Kaufmann, who it termed a « model of ' quick-witted ' Jews » , lacked well-known Jewish « intelligence » .

The « Reichspost » also represented cases where Jewish men were not only violent, but also sexually perverse. To catch the reader's eye, the newspaper printed « A naughty Jew » (« Ein frecher Jude ») in larger than normal type. The article reported that at « Berlin Alexanderplatz » , Alfonso Loewinsohn, a Jew, approached a young lady, Miss Selma Trost, « With the naughty words, “ Miss, I love you ! Do you (love) me ? ” » (61) Miss Trost, who was awaiting the arrival of a girlfriend, refused Loewinsohn. He then made a nastier remark to Miss Trost, openly doubted her « moral purity » , and gave her the impression of a « half-finished man » (« halbfertigen Menschen ») . (62) Miss Trost then remarked that she considered him « a dumb boy who should prefer to go home and do his homework » . (63) Loewinsohn acted offended and slapped her in the face. The young lady called a policeman who took statements and had Loewinsohn answer for his actions in Court.

While the prosecutor sought 40 Marks, the Court ordered a 10 Mark fine. (64) The « Reichspost » often cautioned Christian women to beware of Jewish men, depicting them as depraved and violent.

The « Reichspost » took its social anti-Semitic propaganda a step further in portrayals of Jewish men as sexual predators. In « What a good girl can experience in Jewish stores », the newspaper reported that a Jewish goldsmith in the « Leopoldstadt » accosted a Christian girl in his store. The girl wanted to buy some jewelry but had no money. The child said she would come later with her mother, but the Jewish goldsmith offered the jewelry to her « for nothing » if she would follow him into his room. Outraged, the girl left the shop and told her parents what happened. The « Reichspost » represented this scene as a « warning to all Christian mothers before these “ clean ” Jew's shops » (« sauberen Judengeschäfte ») . (65)

The « Reichspost » made similar warnings concerning Jews and the practice of « White Slavery » (« Mädchenhandel») , the sex trafficking of women and girls. « White Slavery » was a real problem. Christians and Jews trafficked Christian and Jewish women and girls as prostitutes. State governments as well as Christian and Jewish organizations fought against this crime. (66) However, the « Reichspost » reported almost exclusively on Jewish men and women as perpetrators and Christian women and girls as victims. The newspaper described « White Slavery » in a number of articles. Reportedly, Jewish men and women with the promise of a good marriage, employment, or vacation lured unsuspecting Christian women and girls from throughout Europe to travel with them to destinations in South America. If the innocent women and girls did not come voluntarily, the « white slavers » forced them against their will. Having arrived in South America, the innocent women and children were forced into prostitution. The « Reichspost » and the « white slavers » both referred to the « white slaves » as « Waare » (merchandise) . The « Reichspost » could also refer to a « white slaver » as « Waarensensal » (merchandise broker) . (67) The use of these terms signified how « white slavers » commodified the sex of innocent women and girls. The newspaper characterized Jews as exploitative and sexually depraved people from whom Christians needed to guard themselves, a combined economic and social anti-Semitic argument. That the « Reichspost » failed to depict any Christians as « white slavers » should not come as a surprise ; the newspaper held no pretense about the absence of bias.

The « Reichspost » characterized Jews as deceptive and cowardly as well. In an article entitled « The Jew-Press » (« Die Judenpresse ») , the « Reichspost » claimed « Jew-Press » bias and false reporting against the officer class. The « Jew-Press » of Erlau (Eger, in Hungary) , had reported that Löw, a « 1 year volunteer » reserve officer, had reported feeling unwell to the military doctor. Löw requested that he recover in his private residence rather than the garrison hospital. The « Jew-Press » claimed the military doctor made an anti-Semitic remark to Löw, which is also the epigraph of this chapter, « Jewish swindler, you are malingering. » (« Jüdischer Schwindler, Du simulirst. ») . At 5:00 pm, Löw went to his private residence to recover. The military doctor never visited him, and Löw died at 2:00 am the next day. The « Reichspost » rejected these accusations against the military doctor, arguing he sought to maintain military discipline, which required soldiers to recover in the garrison hospital. Furthermore, the « Reichspost » claimed Löw was drunk, and should have had a Jewish doctor attend to him earlier, but did not. A Christian doctor came, but too late. The « Reichspost » scoffed :

Who knows, whether this 1 year volunteer was not well-known as a malingerer ? No one will argue the fact that the Jews have a particular weakness for military service. Reasons to be pretty quiet, « offended » Israel ! The military doctor has only done his duty, since if this broke-down, any Jewish mama's boy (« Muttersöhnchen ») , that happens to be a soldier, when he has toothache could go to the « Mothers' home, and when an officer would forbid, he would be a “ anti-Semite ” and a “ disgrace (Schandfleck) of the Century ” ! » (69)

The « Reichspost » prejudged Löw as a Jew to be a malingerer and « mama's boy » , who breached military protocol to recover at home with his mother. In short, the « Reichspost » used this narrative to demonstrate Jewish cowardice and deceit. (70)

The « Reichspost » frequently depicted baser Jewish family relations than that between the supposed « malingerer Löw » and his mother. In « A Jewish-patriarchal family life » , the newspaper depicted Jewish family life as neither exemplary nor « patriarchal » , but rather dominated by self-interest and greed. In the 3rd District of Vienna (« Landstraße ») , lived a « Mr. K(ohn) » and his wife with their 2 unmarried daughters and 1 unmarried son. 2 other daughters and 1 son were already married and resided outside the home. All family members got along well. When the mother died, the children mourned and everyone expected the family to continue its intimacy. However, shortly after the mother's burial, the children sold the household goods and moved away from home. They abandoned the old father in the large residence, with only one bed as furniture. The « Reichspost » posed a rhetorical question to Josef Samuel Bloch, Rabbi in Vienna, editor of a Jewish newspaper, deputy for Kolomea, and an outspoken critic of anti-Semitism :

« We ask now Reb Bloch :“ Is this family life also exemplary (“ musterhaft ”) and patriarchal, how (you) mostly described the family life of the Jews to be kept-up ? ” What says Reb Bloch about it ? » (71)

The reader could answer this for himself or herself ; the « Reichspost » depicted Jewish family life as antithesis to the exemplary and patriarchal family ideal.

The « Reichspost » presented further negative portrayals of Jewish family life in the article « Jewish sibling love » . Wolf Glücklich, a nearly blind Jew, on the « Stefaniebrücke » (a bridge across the Danube Canal, in Vienna) often requested charity from passersby. One « fine » (note the word is printed as « faine » in German to appear Yiddish phonetically) lady who walked across the bridge was angered by the beggar's behavior and had a nearby watchman arrest him. The judge determined that the accuser (the « Reichspost » again used the word « faine » to describe her) wished to revenge herself against the blind beggar because he owed her 25 « Gulden » . Impoverished, he could not repay. In fact, the « Jewess is the blind beggar's - loving sister » . (72) The irony in describing her as a « loving sister » was apparent. The judge reproved the accused for breaking the law by accepting charity from a passer by. The accused claimed he did so because he only received 4 Florins 50 « Krone » , each month, from official charity. He then proved his incapacity with a medical certificate, and the judge acquitted him. This time, the « Reichspost » asked a Mr. Nothnagel, a Jewish docent at the University of Vienna, a rhetorical question :

« Mr. von Nothnagel, are also the Jewesses without bad habits ? » (« Unarten ») (73)

To the reader, the answer must have been clear ; the newspaper portrayed Jews as the embodiment of bad habits. The « Reichspost » depicted Jews acting-out of self-interest and greed, even to take advantage of family members.

The « Reichspost » also harshly described cases of familial murder among Jews. The newspaper reported one such case in « Jewish assassins sentenced to death » . The « Reichspost » took its information from a newspaper identified as « G. N. » . In Przemyslow (Galicia) , a Jew named Springstein and his sister had poisoned Springstein's wife and 6 other close relatives for their life insurance. Springstein and his sister « were found guilty and sentenced to death by hanging » . (74) The « Reichspost » set-out to demonstrate that Jewish family life was less than ideal. As in public life, the newspaper depicted Jews in their family life rejecting norms of behavior, exploiting, hurting, and even killing others for economic gain. In summation, the « Reichspost » depicted Jews as a dangerous and corrupting influence in the economy and society. The newspaper utilized such economic and social anti-Semitic argumentation to justify contemporary expulsions and riots that targeted Jews.

Justifying Expulsions and Riots Targeting Jews

The « Reichspost » justified contemporary expulsions of and riots against Jews throughout Eastern Europe as a reaction to, in its view, usurious, exploitative and corrupting Jews. These « Reichspost » economic and social anti-Semitic arguments mirrored those levied against the Jews of Austria. In July 1896, in « Russians and Jews » , the newspaper explained why Russia had expelled Jews from its villages :

« As is known, about 2 years ago, all the Jews were expelled from the villages of Russia, since the government was forced to recognize the harm of Jews in the villages, because the Jews led the residents astray to drink liquor (“ Schnapstrinken ”) , get into debt and to (practice) an immoral way of life (“ unmoralischen Lebensweise ”) ; they bought stolen goods, they advised the sons, daughters and servants of the grain farmer's, etc. , to steal, for which they then got from the Jews liquor, fake jewelry (“ falsche Schmucksachen ”) , and so on. Only now was this sensible regulation carried-out thoroughly, so that the Russians can certainly assert their villages exist cleansed of Jews (“ judenrein ”) . And in Austria ? » (75)

This economic and social anti-Semitic propaganda concerning the position of Jews in Russian villages mirrored to a great extent « Reichspost » views towards Jews in Austria. Asking, « And in Austria ? » suggested the newspaper would have approved of expelling Jews from Austria.

In « The Russian Jewish question » (« Zur russischen Judenfrage ») , the « Reichspost » justified farmer's riots against Jews as « self-help » against Jewish usury and exploitation :

« On 3 March (1897) , in the afternoon, the small-town Spola in the governorate Kiev was raided by a large number of farmers who smashed and looted all shops and warehouses belonging solely to Jews. In just under 4 hours, more than 100 houses and all the shops, even merchant's stores, were totally devastated. Home and business equipment (“ Wirthschaftsgeräthe ”) , furniture and goods lie about smashed in the streets. »

Such self-help is and remains unjust in all circumstances. However, without deeper reason, the farmers would not have been so bitter. It is expected because, as usual, usury and exploitation lie behind it. (76) The « Reichspost » contended the Jews got what they deserved for their « usury and exploitation ». The newspaper justified the Spola riot as an « outbreak of people's indignation » at the « economic flood of Jews in the south and southwest of the Empire and rage against the Jews ». (77) In other articles, the « Reichspost » blamed riots on Jews without specifying why. In « Fighting between Christians and Jews », the newspaper noted :

« In the small-town Diatlowka (Grodno Gouvernement) bloody clashes have broken-out between Christian and Jewish residents. Only the intervention of the gendarmerie succeeded in putting an end to the incidents. Dozens of people were injured. 70 people who disturbed the peace were arrested. In any case, the Jews will have caused the indignation of the population. » (78)

The « Reichspost » must have expected readers to take for granted, « the Jews will have caused the indignation of the population ». The newspaper had already given readers countless reasons to do so.

In « Against the Jews » (« Gegen die Juden »), the « Reichspost » reported how on a Russian Easter Monday, in the city of Jekaterinoslaw, an « angry riot » occurred against the Jews. At about 4 PM, workers began mishandling Jewish merchants in various streets, and rioting broke-out in 1 locality. When gendarmes attempted to disperse the rioters, they became even more incensed and by evening the excesses had spread throughout the city. Rioters shattered the windows of Jewish homes, demolished Jewish inns and businesses, as well as smashed and set on fire a barrel of petroleum in a street inhabited by Jews. The efforts of police and gendarmes to quell the riots remained without success. The mob pelted them with stones, seriously wounding a police-inspector. When the military arrived and arrested 100 rioters, the excesses ended. A rumor spread around the city that, the next day, the riots would be repeated and 1,000 factory workers from Brjansk would appear in Jekaterinoslaw. Authorities planned accordingly and had the military surround the factory in Brjansk, permitting no workers to leave. The « Reichspost » commented :

« So, a formal encirclement to protect - the Jews. » (« Also eine förmliche Einschließung zum Schutze - der Juden ») . » (79)

The newspaper implied the workers needed to be protected from what it so often described as exploitative Jews. Again, the « Reichspost » had already given readers innumerable reasons to believe this was the case.

The 2 part front-page feuilleton, « The Jew of Rudnia », narrated graphic violence against the Jews, which the « Reichspost » justified as a reaction to Jewish guile. The story was told from the perspective of a post-man travelling through Rudnia (a city in present day Poland) with his coach-man. He witnessed the burning of a home of a Jewish ritual slaughterer while the non-Jews stood-by and watched with inner joy. With guilty pleasure, a Cossack declared the fire was not so bad. The Jew with the burning home despaired that his mother was still inside. The non-Jews laughed at him. (80) For the time being, the mother lived, as the flames did not take her. The Jewish son and his Jewish friend lacked courage to save her. The Jewish son offered a Cossack 5 silver Rubles (the « Reichspost » noted not a kopek more) to save her. The Cossack said it was not enough to risk his life but he had no time to waste so he went to save her. After the Cossack saved the Jew's mother, the Jewish son took from a purse under his caftan 1 Ruble (he had promised 5) and gave it to the Cossack who saved his mother's life. This enraged the Cossack who then ripped the Jewish mother he just saved from her children and threw her into the flames :

« As he stands now, enveloped in smoke and flames, he calls-out to the terrified Jews :“ A ruble, dog - you'll get your mother now for free ! ” » (81)

The feuilleton portrayed the Jew as : a coward who would not risk his life to save his mother ; a businessman who placed a monetary value on her life ; and a cheap liar who promised 5 Rubles to the Cossack to save her but only paid 1. Just as the non-Jews who stood by witnessing the flames with inner joy, the « Reichspost » staff may have felt pleasure in publishing the feuilleton as well.

During the period under investigation (January 1894 to April 1897) , the « Reichspost » did not publish articles concerning Christians attacking Jews, in Vienna. Yet, minor incidents of anti-Semites beating-up Jews and attacking Jewish property did occur. (82) Nevertheless, these incidents did not rise to the level of pogroms (83) , such as in Eastern Europe. That the « Reichspost » reported often on Jews attacking Christians in Vienna and failed to report on Christians attacking Jews there was not a surprise ; as noted previously, the newspaper held no pretense about the absence of bias.

Use of Political Anti-Semitism and History in Anti-Semitic Argumentation

Use of Political Anti-Semitism

« We hate the Jews not on account of their religion, but rather we combat them, because we want to overthrow Jewish morality and Jewish exploiters. » (84)

The « Reichspost » utilized political anti-Semitism in its attacks against Social-Democrats, Liberals and Jews. This included charges that the Social-Democratic and Liberal Parties were controlled by Jews and served Jewish interests. The newspaper declared most of the leaders of these Parties and their capitalist financiers were Jews. Moreover, it depicted Social-Democrats, Liberals and Jews as waging a war against Christians, Christianity, law, order, and traditional values such as the family, especially through acts of voter fraud, intimidation, and violence. Thus, the « Reichspost » depicted itself and Christian-Socials as waging a war of self-defense against Social-Democrats, Liberals, and Jews. Moreover, the newspaper used political anti-Semitism to help Christian-Social candidates win elections and to increase Party membership. In politics, it used economic and social anti-Semitic attacks against Social-Democrats, Liberals, and Jews, depicting them as exploiting and corrupting Christian Austrians. Christian-Social politician Leopold Kunschak (85) directed the words in the epigraph at the beginning of this chapter to the Social-Democrats present at a political meeting of the « Christian Civic Association in Hernals » , in Vienna. This pronouncement revealed how political, social and economic anti-Semitism intertwined among the Christian-Socials. During the meeting, a Social Democrat named Krump spoke against Karl Lueger and the persecution of the Jews. Mr. Kunschak responded that, to avoid a scandal, Christian-Socials could not allow any more Social-Democrats into the gathering. Furthermore :

« Would they behave themselves decently, they are always welcome. (loud applause.) “ Religion is a private matter.” (“ Religion ist Privatsache.”) , you say today, but otherwise you lead bitter combat against all Christians. We hate the Jews not on account of their religion, but rather we combat them, because we want to overthrow Jewish morality and Jewish exploiters. » (86)

Christian-Socials associated Social-Democrats and Jews. Kunschak's allegation that Social-Democrats could not « behave themselves decently » mirrored negative perceptions of Jewish behavior. Furthermore, Kunschak described as disingenuous the Social-Democrats' slogan « Religion is a private matter » . While claiming that Christian-Socials « hate the Jews not on account of their religion » , he nevertheless described Social-Democrats and Jews as waging « bitter combat against all Christians » . Kunschak cast political anti-Semitism as self-defense.

In an article entitled « Religion is a private matter » , the « Reichspost » provided its interpretation of the Social-Democratic slogan of the same name. The newspaper claimed that, in the cities, « religion is only then a private matter when it concerns the Jewish (religion) , the Christian religion is combated by all means at their disposal. » (87) Furthermore, it claimed workers were commanded to attend general meetings of the « free-thinkers » in Vienna, led by Victor Adler and his comrades. According to the « Reichspost » , whatever was left of the workers' faith (« Glauben ») would be torn-out at these meetings, making them more receptive to Social-Democratic ideas. (88)

That Jews were highly-visible in the leadership of the Social-Democratic Party provided grist for the mill of « Reichspost » political anti-Semitic propaganda. In the article « Jewish leadership ? » , the newspaper commented ironically :

« Say to me with whom you deal, and I will say to you who you are ! Social-Democracy will not be in Jewish hands, for in the Party leadership are only 11 Jews and 9 non-Jews. Jews include : Doctor Adler, Doctor Chonert, Doctor Kaliane, Doctor Ellenbogen, Doctor Ingwer, Ehrentraut, Leutner, Brod, Kaff, Feigl and comrade Glas. Honest workers (!!) , that “ earn ” their daily bread by the sweat of their brow ! » (89)

The « Reichspost » was making the case that, in its view, Social-Democracy really was in « Jewish hands » because Jews made-up the majority of the Social-Democratic leadership. In reference to the 11 Jews in the Social-Democratic leadership, the line « Honest workers (!!) , that “ earn ” their daily bread by the sweat of their brow ! » referred to the economic anti-Semitic argument that Jews earned money not by « the sweat of their brow » , the efforts of their own labors as the Bible commanded (90) , but through economic exploitation of Christians. The line also made fun of the fact that the Social-Democratic leaders were not workers.

The « Reichspost » depicted Jewish leaders of the Social-Democrats as corrupting Party members. The newspaper recounted the « Founding meetings of the Christian-Socialist Workers' Educational Association “ Unity ” » . Schmidt, the meeting initiator, called for the association to be a one in which members could develop themselves into good Christian workers and have entertainment. Schmidt contrasted it with the « Social-Democratic education associations » where, he claimed, Social-Democrats denigrated the Christian religion and Christian priests, trained to be rabbis, and studied Talmud. Schmidt continued, the « chief rabbi (“ Oberrabbiner ”) of the Social-Democrats » allowed this because « the leading figures of the Social-Democrats are men, who are not workers, but rather Asiatics (“ Asiaten ”) , who view the movement as a retirement fund » . (91) Mr. Schmidt branded Social-Democracy as entirely Jewish. Use of the term « Asiatics » denigrated Jews as outsiders and demonstrated profound disgust with them. Schmidt was making the claim that Jewish leaders of the Social-Democrats did not look-out for the best interests of Party members, but in typical « Jewish fashion » used Party finances for personal economic gain. It was an effective use of anti-Semitic demagoguery for a Christian-Social and anti-Semitic audience.

The « Reichspost » and Christian-Socials used equally venomous political anti-Semitism in attacks against Liberals. The newspaper recounted a January 11, 1894, meeting in « The Christian-Social Club » in which Prince Alois Lichtenstein and Karl Lueger, Christian-Social Party leaders, presented their views on Liberalism. Both leaders utilized political anti-Semitic arguments characterizing the « Jewish-Liberals » and capitalism as mortal threats to modern civilization. Lichtenstein couched the contemporary relationship between « Jewish-Liberals » and capitalism in Biblical terms :

« As on Sinai, already the Jews performed a gold-dance until the admonition from above, written on stone tablets, ended the idolatry of the golden calf. Lord God, in the newly beginning year (1894) , make the Jewish-Liberals gold-dance end for the salvation of modern civilization. » (92)

Lichtenstein used religiously motivated Jew-hatred in his Biblical references to the « idolatry of the golden calf » , and economic anti-Semitism in his representation of the « Jewish-Liberals gold dance » . He depicted Jews as greedy and always only concerned with money. Lichtenstein prayed God would intervene, as God did on Mount-Sinai, to put an end to the idolatrous « Jewish-Liberals gold dance » , this time to save modern civilization. Lueger continued the theme, calling for :

« The unity of all Christian Parties against the common enemy, Liberalism. However, today's civilization stands on a precipice ; it will be saved before the fall if people would remember that God created them free. Let us therefore be not slaves of desire (“ Leidenschaft ”) nor of capitalism. » (93)

The « Reichspost » published several reports on the suicide and burial of Heinrich Jacques, a Jewish Liberal parliamentary deputy, which utilized political anti-Semitism and anti-Liberal ideology. In the front-page article, « The Death of Doctor Heinrich Jacques » , the newspaper insisted that Jacques committed suicide due to his loss of « belief in God and His love wielding Providence » , and its replacement with the « modern idols » of « Enlightenment » , « Education and Good Breeding » , and « Humanity » . (94) The Christian-Socials and « Reichspost » viewed these three features and « godlessness » in Liberalism as damning. Indeed, the « Reichspost » stated that, in Jacques' case, suicide was the last but also the best resort. The newspaper had no complaints about Doctor Jacques death :

« He was still one of the foremost representatives of the Liberal-Jewish-Capitalist movement, against which the Christian-Social movement increasingly agitated. It was also well-known that Doctor Jacques wanted to bless our Christian Austrians immediately with the planned Hungarian civil marriage (emphasis in the original) . » (95)

As a Catholic newspaper, the « Reichspost » opposed Jacques' proposal of civil marriage in Austria.

In « The Wolf in Sheepskin », the « Reichspost » condemned the Liberals for selecting Constantine Noske (a non-Jew) to fill Jacques' vacated position as parliamentary deputy for the « Innere Stadt ». The newspaper characterized Noske as a proud opponent of « the anti-Jewish aspirations of reactionaries » (« judenfeindlichen Bestrebungen der Reactionären entgegenstellt ») . (96) The « Reichspost » screamed that the Liberals defended the human rights of the Jews alone, and that Christian Austrians needed protection from the selfishness and brutality of Jews :

« The glory of Noske is an indictment of the Liberal Party and his courage testifies to their great dereliction of duty. Jews ! » (97)

In other articles, the « Reichspost » elaborated how Christian-Socials and anti-Semites defended themselves against perceived abuses by Jews. In « Christian Socialism and Anti-Semitism » (1895) , the newspaper lauded the growing support for Christian-Socialism and anti-Semitism among the Christians in Vienna and the provinces, especially among the economically weak, politically oppressed, and those without rights. The « Reichspost » explained the benefits of the early successes of Christian-Socialism and anti-Semitism :

« The Christian spirit lives again in Christian Vienna and in the provinces, nationality hatred (“ Nationalitätenhaß ”) has lost its sharpness, and with I accord, the people rise against those who until now exploited, incited, and criminalized them : Jewish capital, the Jewish liberal press, it (Christian-Socialism and anti-Semitism) is led by real Austrian patriotism ; it is above all the salvation of the Emperor and the Empire. They (Christian-Socials and anti-Semites) wrote on their banners reconciliation of classes and peoples' interests, these goals are pursued legally so they can be reassured as to their further development. The practice of the Christian-Socialist and anti-Semitic ideas is already just a matter of time, for this conclusion justified their development just last year, in 1895 ! » (98)

Revival of « Christian spirit » in Austria fulfilled the Christian-Social and « Reichspost » objective of the « re-Christianization » of public life. The newspaper declared « Jewish capital (and) the Jewish Liberal press » damaged the Austrian economy and society, and lauded Christians unified in opposition to them. The « reconciliation of classes and peoples' interests » excluded Jews. Nevertheless, expressions of loyalty to « the Emperor and the Empire » demonstrated that the Christian-Socials and the « Reichspost » rejected Pan-Germanism.

The « Reichspost » railed against Social-Democrats, Liberals, and Jews in both political camps who, the newspaper claimed, participated in voter agitation, fraud, and violence. In « Do not be deterred ! » , the « Reichspost » advised its readers not to let Social-Democrats' threats deter them from voting :

« Every Christian voter come, on 9 March (1897) , to do his voting duty in the 5th Curia and not let himself by any chance be deterred by the crude threats of the Social-Democrats. All precautionary measures are taken so that no one will harm a hair. The women, in particular, are requested to not hold back their men for fear of the Reds (“ Rothen ”) . On the contrary, they should admonish their family members eligible to vote to contribute to the victory of the Christian people over revolution and Jew-money (“ Umsturz und Judengeld ”) ! » (99)

The 5th Curia (electoral constituency) comprised all voting age males. 5th Curia voters elected a small number of delegates. (100) The « Reichspost » exhorted its male readers in the 5th Curia to vote, promising Christian-Social protection from Social-Democratic violence. The assertion that Christian-Social victory would be a « victory of the Christian people over (Social-Democratic) revolution and Jew-money » connected Jews with Social-Democratic revolution and capitalism. In a front-page article « A perfidious manœuver », the « Reichspost » accused Social-Democrats (including Jews) of calling for or abetting violence on an Election Day (March 9, 1897) . As 5th Curia voters went to the polls, members of Social-Democratic clubs demonstrated with the slogan : « Fight unto blood » (« Kampf bis auf's Blut ») . (101) The « Jew-Press » and « Red Party-Press » (« rothen Parteipresse ») did not speak of « benevolent neutrality » or oppose « appeals to violence » . (102) The « Reichspost » reported on additional Social-Democratic demonstrations against the anti-Liberals and their leader, Karl Lueger, and called for the police and military to ensure security for free and fair voting. (103)

2 days after the 5th Curia elections of March 9, 1897, the « Reichspost » gleefully declared in its front page article, « But still anti-Semitic » (« Doch antisemitisch ») , and in several pages of election results that Christian-Social candidates won all available mandates : 5 from the electoral Districts of Vienna, and 4 from the vicinity of Vienna. (104) These Christian-Social candidates, according to the « Reichspost » , prevailed over the Social-Democrats and Liberals, as well as Jews in both political camps despite their « terrorism » and lies. The newspaper interpreted events thus :

« The harder the struggle, the more brilliant the victory, the same applies here, and the almost unprecedented voter turn-out (“ Wahlbetheiligung ”) teaches how brave and fearless the Christian conscript fulfills his duty, as the anti-Liberals are the only ones able to defend successfully State, family and religion against the “ Jewified ” revolution-preacher (“ jüdelnden Umsturzprediger ”) . » (105)

The « Reichspost » described combat against Social-Democrats, Liberals, and Jews in both camps as a defensive war against « the “ Jewified ” revolution-preacher » who sought to overthrow the Empire, as well as traditional family values and Christian religion.

In « The 2nd Ballot on 22 March, in Vienna » , the « Reichspost » alleged the few Liberal candidates who won elections did so through massive voter fraud. Successful Liberal candidates included Constantin Noske, Carl Wrabetz, Ferdinand Kronawetter, and Josef Kopp in the « Innere Stadt » , and Kareis in the « Leopoldstadt » . According to the « Reichspost » :

« The success of the united Jews was conditional on an unprecedented kind of voter agitation that worked with the extensive swindle-experiment. » (106)

The newspaper accused Liberals of buying votes at 20 florins a vote. It claimed that 80 arrests were made because of such voting drives (« Wahlumtreiben ») , and that all those arrested were Jews. (107) For the « Reichspost » , the anti-Liberals either won because they could overcome Liberal and Jewish treachery or lost because it was too great.

The « Reichspost » alleged encounters in which Jews used political violence, both verbal and physical, against Christian-Socials. This involved social anti-Semitic representations of Jews acting outside expected norms of public life. The « Reichspost » recounted one such incidence in « What the Jews permit themselves ! » (« Was sich die Juden erlauben ! ») . According to the newspaper, 2 Jews at a café on the « Praterstraße » in the « Leopoldstadt » watched participants in the Christian Women's Assembly marching home and cheering for Doctor Lueger. When one of the Jews asked the other what was wrong, he replied :

« These are “ Huren ” (whores) . They allow to give cheers to Lueger. » (108)

The « Reichspost » lamented how, « a greasy (“ schmieriger ”) Hebrew may insult the Christian civil women of Vienna in such a way. » (109)

In « Jewish impudence » (« Jüdische Frechheit ») , the newspaper stated, one midnight, a group of gentlemen travelled homeward from the Kaiser-Festival in the « Wiener Prater » , a large public park in the « Leopoldstadt » , carrying lanterns adorned with Lueger's image. 40 « viceless » (« Unartenlosen » , note the sarcasm) Jews surrounded them, cried-out « Today is not a Lueger-Festival ! » (« Hait is nix a Lueger-Fest ! » , printed in German as if Jews spoke with a Yiddish accent) beat the lanterns out of their hands and behaved wildly. The « Reichspost » concluded :

« Only the intervention of the security guard brought frenzied (“ rasende ”) Israel to its senses, and only after the impudent lantern heroes (frechen Lampionshelden) had been arrested, could Christian people continue on their path. » (110)

The « Reichspost » reported several more instances of Jews reacting violently to Christian-Social political activities. In « He wants to hear no Lueger marching song » , the newspaper recounted such a scene occurred in a « Prater » restaurant named Traxler. When chapel clergymen sang a Lueger march, Carl Toch (a Jew) flew into a rage. He threw mugs of beer at the band-Master to make them stop singing and, thus, aroused Christian indignation. Chief mechanic Carl Kober brandished an unloaded revolver. Both Toch and Kober were brought before the « Leopoldstadt » District Court. Witnesses testified that Kober's revolver was not loaded, and he was acquitted. The prosecutor charged Toch with violating the band-Master's expression, and Toch was transferred to the Regional Courts. (111)

The « Reichspost » claimed a Jew made an « assassination attempt on a Christian voter » , on the day of an election (March 22, 1897) , in the « Jew-Island » (« Judeninsel ») of the « Leopoldstadt » . That evening, the event occurred at the entrance of a house on the « Rotensterngasse » . According to witnesses, the Jewish Master shoe-maker Gustav Raffel hit Johann Nejedlik on the back, because Nejedlik had cheered for Lueger and Dittrich. 5 days later, Nejedlik remained in a doctor's care and had initiated legal steps against Mr. Raffel. (112)

For the « Reichspost » , the « re-Christianization » of Austrian public life necessitated its « de-Jewification » . (113)
The newspaper often decried what it viewed as the over-representation of Jews in the professions. In « The Jewification of the Viennese legal profession » (« Die Verjudung die Wiener Advocatie ») , the « Reichspost » bemoaned the list of newly added Viennese lawyers, in 1895, as it estimated, based on the names, that 20 % were Christian and 80 % were Jewish. The newspaper conjectured that, within 10 years, the pace of the « Jewification » of the lawyers would make it so that a Christian lawyer would be as rare as a « white raven » (« weißer Rabe ») or a Christian clothing manufacturer (« Confectionär ») . (114) By implication, Jews had displaced Christians in that occupation.

The « Reichspost » detested Jews at the University of Vienna. In the front-page article, « Nothnagel in Danger » , the newspaper described « Israel's invasion » (« Einmarsch Israels ») into the University of Vienna. It declared that, in the Law Faculty, of 46 professors and lecturers (« Dozenten ») , 15 were Jews or 37.5 % of the total. Among the Medicine Faculty of 127 professors and lecturers, 55 were Jews or 44 % of the total. Among the Philosophy Faculty, of 121 professors and lecturers, 31 were Jews or 26.5 % of the total. (115) The « Reichspost » conflated professors and lecturers. However, such distinction was important. Jews were barred by anti-Semitic prejudice from rising into the professorial ranks. The newspaper also noted high proportions of Jews among the student body at the University of Vienna. During the 1892 winter semester, Jews made-up 38 % and Christians 62 % of the student body. During the 1892 summer semester, Jews made-up 36 % and Christians 64 % of the student body. The « Reichspost » stated that, in Austria, the number of Jews amounted only to 5 % of the number of Catholics. The newspaper then characterized as disproportional the number of Jews at the University of Vienna, especially in medicine where Jews made-up 44 % of the teachers and more than 50 % of the students. (116)

Jews were not well-represented in the civil service, and the « Reichspost » resolved to keep it that way. In a page 1 article, « Too Few Jewish Civil Servants in Austria ?! » , the newspaper argued that the number of Jewish civil servants in Austria needed to be kept low. It wrote in response to Emil Byk, a Jewish Member of Parliament from Galicia, who claimed there were not enough Jews in the civil service, and Mr. Rappaport Ritter von Porada, Secretary of the National Bank, who found that Galician Jews faced difficulty acquiring civil service positions. The « Reichspost » sneered that Galician Jews who tried to acquire civil service positions were « usurers » and « tavern keepers » (« Branntweinschenker ») , and declared the civil service an honourable profession that should not be corrupted by Jews. Furthermore, the newspaper declared that the Austrian Fundamental Law opened all positions to Jews. The « Reichspost » claimed only Jews cared that there were few Jewish civil servants. The newspaper was content that a « Jewish invasion » of the civil service had not occurred and deemed it necessary to keep it that way. (117)

« Reichspost » political anti-Semitism had a practical use : helping Christian-Socials win elections and new Party members. However, it did much more than that as well. « Reichspost » political anti-Semitism contributed to a negative image of the Jew, which the newspaper created. With its political anti-Semitism, the newspaper portrayed Jews as godless and treacherous Liberals and Social-Democrats. In a modern age of mass politics, the « Reichspost » represented Jews not just as an economic, social, and religious threat to Christians and Christianity, but also a politically powerful one. With calls for restrictions on the number of lawyer, lecturer, student, and civil servant positions open to Jews, the « Reichspost » mirrored Karl Lueger and Christian-Socials' calls for quotas against Jews.

Use of History in Anti-Semitic Argumentation

« I know of no greater danger to the Empire and its peoples, than the horrible properties of these (Jews) , who by fraud, usury, and money transactions enriched themselves and destroyed the population. »

(« Reichspost » quotation of Empress Maria Theresa's Cabinet Order of June 19, 1777.) (118)

The « Reichspost » utilized a combination of economic, social, and political anti-Semitism to interpret historic events and figures. The newspaper idolized Emperor Leopold I (who reigned from 1658 to 1705) , Empress Maria Theresa (who reigned from 1740 to 1780) , and Emperor Joseph II (who reigned from 1780 to 1790) , and specifically any of their anti-Jewish rhetoric and / or policies. It also looked kindly on historic expulsions of and / or bans on Jews in Vienna depicting Jews as anti-dynastic and anti-Austrian participants in the 1848 Revolution. « Reichspost » interpretations of history demeaned Jews while demonstrating the newspaper's own State patriotism and dynastic loyalty. The newspaper omitted historical facts that could have cast doubt on its interpretations. However, as noted previously, it held no pretense about the absence of bias, and such omissions should not have come as a surprise.

In an article entitled « Szeps is proud of his forefathers » , the « Reichspost » reported on a speech of Moritz Szeps, a Jewish journalist and publisher of the « Wiener Tagblatt » . Szeps delivered the speech at the unveiling ceremony of the monument celebrating the defeat of the Ottoman Empire at the Battle of Vienna (in 1683) . Szeps reportedly said :

« And raising this monument to the heroic deeds of our ancestors (" Heldentaten unserer Ahnen ") may also have a (positive) effect for the future. » (119)

The « Reichspost » reminded Szeps and his editorial staff that, in 1679, Emperor Leopold I « had asked (the Jews) to move away from our town » , tore down their synagogue, and built the parish church of « Sankt Leopold » in its place. 4 years later, the Turks besieged Vienna. The « Reichspost » asked :

« Should the Jews, dismissed-out of Vienna with polite words, have come back as " volunteers " for the army defending Vienna just during the siege ? Possible - but it is not likely ! » (120)

In reality, Leopold I had not in 1679 « dismissed with polite words » the Jews from Vienna, as the « Reichspost » claimed. The newspaper downplayed the actions of Leopold I. In 1670, during the Catholic Counter-Reformation, Leopold I expelled all 3,000 to 4,000 Jews of Vienna who had refused baptism. Furthermore, he expelled the Jews at the behest of his Spanish wife, his Court preacher Abraham a Sancta Clara, Bishop Kollonitsch of « Wiener Neustadt » , Christian merchants and the municipal government of Vienna. They viewed Jews as godless, the cause of great misfortunes, or as economic competition. (121) The « Reichspost » had faulted Jews for not rushing to aid Vienna against the Turks, when they had been forcibly expelled more than a decade previously.

The « Reichspost » described, in « A historical memory » , the Cabinet-Order of Empress Maria Theresa of June 19, 1777. In it, Empress Maria Theresa ordered and explained her expulsion of Jews from Vienna. Only Jews who had her written permission would be allowed to remain. The « Reichspost » quoted this Cabinets-Order :

« My concern for the welfare of the Empire and its peoples is my most sacred duty - and inasmuch as I see leads me to ban all Jews without my written permission to stay in Vienna, because “ I know of no greater danger to the Empire and its peoples, than the horrible properties of these (Jews) , who by fraud, usury, and money transactions enriched themselves and destroyed the population ”. » (122)

This quote was chosen for this chapter's epigraph as it clearly represented how the « Reichspost » viewed Jews as a negative force in the Empire, especially in the economic arena. Ironically, Maria Theresa's policies pushed Jews to engage in commerce by limiting their employment to money changing, jewel trading, financial operations, and trade in domestic manufactured goods. Moreover, Maria Theresa never managed to expel the Jews of Vienna. However, Maria Theresa expelled the Jews of Prague, in December 1744. Maria Theresa suspected the Jews of Prague had helped Frederick the Great conquer Silesia during the War of Austrian Succession, which began in 1740. The Jews were allowed to return in August 1748 because influential city and guild representatives intervened on their behalf and the « Toleration Tax » on Jews was raised. In addition, Maria Theresa mandated that Jews remove themselves from public view during Christian processions, on the morning of the Christian Sabbath (Sundays) , and on Christian holidays. Maria Theresa also refused to speak to Jews in person. (123) With her anti-Jewish sentiment and policies, Maria Theresa was an important role model for the « Reichspost » .

In « Characteristic » (« Bezeichnend ») , the « Reichspost » cited Emperor Joseph II decree of August 3, 1786, concerning the conduct of the Jews. The « Reichspost » quoted :

« His Majesty has deigned to instruct the extremely corrupt morality of the Jews (“ Se. Majestät haben rücksichtlich der äußerst verdorbenen Moralität der Juden anzubefehlen geruht ”) so that the tolerated Jews (“ tolerirte Judenschaft ”) and, especially, the morality of their character will be elevated. » (124)

Clearly, the « Reichspost » felt that Jews did not know how to conduct themselves in public life. Yet, Joseph II did not provide a clear-cut model of anti-Jewish sentiment and policy, which the « Reichspost » made him appear to be.

In line with Enlightenment ideals, Joseph II had removed many anti-Jewish restrictions and given Jews many rights. On January 2, 1782, Joseph II issued the « Patent of Tolerance » (« Toleranzpatent ») in order to bring Jews out of cultural, occupational, and social isolation. It required Jewish children to attend German-language schools, allowed Jews to establish factories, employ Christians, engage in manual labor, discard their identifying Jewish dress and yellow emblem, and much more. The « Patent of Tolerance » was one of many reforms Joseph II directed at Jews to make them more economically and socially useful to the State. Nevertheless, Joseph II kept in place a number of restrictions on Jews. These included bans on Jews from the civil service, land ownership, and settlement in some parts of the Empire. Communal taxes and a limit on the Jewish population were maintained. In Vienna, where no Jewish communal organization was permitted, « tolerated Jews » had to pay their own dues. (125) Furthermore, in his August 3, 1786, decree, Joseph II revealed distaste for Jews by describing their morality as « extremely corrupt » and in need of instruction to be elevated. On balance, this proved sufficient for the « Reichspost » to cite Joseph II as an authority on (alleged) bad Jewish behavior.

The « Reichspost » in « A little comparison » (« Ein kleiner Vergleich ») demonstrated its negative attitudes towards the 1848-1849 Revolution and the role Jews had in it. The article cited « Austriacus » of the « Sonn und Montagszeitung » , who wrote :

« The same elements which propagate anti-Semitism also write anti-Austrianness on their banner. » (126)

To refute this claim, the « Reichspost » asked Austriacus and readers of the « Reichspost » to compare the answers to several questions concerning the 1848-1849 Revolution :

« 1) Who incited the anti-dynastic orgies of 1848 and participated (in them) most eagerly ? The anti-Semites or the Semites of Vienna ? 2) In the same year after the taking of Vienna, who cowardly had fled-out from Vienna or furthermore swindled-out (“ feige ”) , even in coffins (“ sogar in Särgen ”) ? Was it anti-Semites or Semites ? 3) Who participated most zealously in the Kossuth-scandals and all anti-dynastic rallies in Hungary ? The anti-Semitic or Semitic male youths ? 4) Who celebrated too lustily (“ aus vollem Halse zu ”) these anti-Austrian and anti-dynastic rallies ? The anti-Semitic or the Semitic press ? » (127)

The « Reichspost » expected its readers and « Austriacus » to answer that the « Semites » (Jews) and the « Semitic press » (« Jew-Press ») undermined both Empire and dynasty, in Austria and Hungary, and economically exploited Vienna during the 1848-1849 Revolution. In « Comparison » (reference the article title) , the anti-Semites, anti-Semitic Press, and anti-Semitic Parties were portrayed as loyal and true to Empire and dynasty. Concerning the claims of « Austriacus » , the « Reichspost » warned :

« He who lives in a glass house shouldn't throw stones ! » (128)

The Jews did have a predominant role in the 1848-1849 Revolution. However, while portraying Jews as anti-dynastic and un-patriotic, the « Reichspost » refused to recognize that revolutionary Jews fought for a better world. In March 1848, in Vienna, Liberal and radical Jews (academicians, doctors, medical students, journalists, and writers) fought alongside Christians to topple the authoritarian regime of State Chancellor Clemens von Metternich, who resigned and went into exile. Afterwards, revolutionary Jews and Christians killed in battle were buried together. Prominent in the revolutionary tribunes, student guard, and later the newly elected Parliament, Jews demanded for themselves and Christians greater civil and political rights, freedom of assembly, press, speech, and scientific research. Jews also circulated petitions for Jewish emancipation and published revolutionary newspapers. Catholics, conservatives and anti-Semites opposed to Jewish emancipation wrote anti-Jewish petitions, pamphlets, and newspapers. The « Reichspost » failed to mention that, in March, April, and May of 1848, there were violent anti-Jewish riots in « Preßburg » (today, Bratislava) and other Hungarian towns, as well as in Prague. Anti-Jewish mobs in Vienna limited attacks to Jewish property. In October 1848, an army under Prince Windischgrätz put down the revolution in Vienna. Again, Jewish and Christian revolutionaries died fighting side by side in battle. On March 4, 1849, a newly elected « Reichstag » passed a new constitution that emancipated Jews, enabled them to own property (mines excluded) , enter any legal employment, and marry non-Jews. In Hungary, many Jews participated in the resistance against the Austrian army. This led the Hungarian revolutionary government on July 29, 1849, 2 weeks before its military collapse, to proclaim the full emancipation of Jews. (129) Perhaps, Jewish emancipation in Austria and Hungary gave the « Reichspost » further cause to condemn Jewish participation in the 1848-1849 Revolution. Moreover, the « Reichspost » did not mention that Jews had fought for the betterment of all peoples ; that fact failed to comport with the newspaper's negative depictions of Jews.

In summation, the « Reichspost » had a selective awareness of the past, and misused history to strengthen its arguments against Jews. The newspaper idealized and depicted itself as belonging to an old and « venerable » tradition of Jew-hatred, which Austrian Emperors and Empresses practiced going back more than 200 years. Moreover, the « Reichspost » misrepresented the involvement of Jews in the 1848-1849 Revolution to further its economic, social, and political anti-Semitic arguments. We will keep in mind this selective awareness of the past in our consideration of « Reichspost » religiously motivated Jew-hatred.

Use of Religiously Motivated Jew-hatred and Rejection of Racial Anti-Semitism

« The Jews are the sworn enemies of Christianity, (and) of Christians. » (130)

The « Reichspost » used the Bible, teachings of the Church Fathers, and sermons of Christian theologians, past and present, in support of its religiously motivated Jew-hatred and anti-Jewish arguments. « Reichspost » staff members, many of whom were Catholic priests and theologians, saw themselves as belonging to the tradition of the Church Fathers. They took it upon themselves to assume what they described as a traditional role for the Catholic Church and clergy : defenders against the enemies of Christians and Christianity, enemies including (they claimed) the Jews. The « Reichspost » regularly labeled the Jews as « Christ killers » and « Witness People » (living testaments to the truth of Christ) . Furthermore, the newspaper attacked on religious grounds Judaism and Jewish religious texts, including the Old Testament, Talmud, and « Schulchan Aruch » , characterizing them as outmoded and / or morally corrupting. Equally significant, the « Reichspost » blended traditional religious Jew-hatred with modern economic, social, and political anti-Semitism in its arguments against Jews. In addition, the newspaper distorted the history of religion and Christian-Jewish relations during the Middle-Ages to make a case for revoking Jewish emancipation. The « Reichspost » idealized the medieval ghettoization of Jews. Moreover, the newspaper downplayed the real extent of anti-Jewish violence during the Middle-Ages ; it claimed only a few Jews were burned to death and failed to recount countless Jews killed in pogroms, often due to religiously motivated violence. Yet, the « Reichspost » moderated its Jew-hatred and anti-Semitism by rejecting racial anti-Semitism and, in traditional fashion, leaving open to Jews the possibility of conversion.

Over the course of 2 days, in March 1894, the « Reichspost » invoked the medieval German Franciscan monk Berthold von Regensburg (aka : Berthold Lech who died in 1272) . Berthold made missionary trips to Switzerland, Swabia, Thuringia, Bavaria, Bohemia, Moravia, Austria and Hungary. The newspaper claimed that his sermons were well-received, and that up to 200,000 people could have listened to them. The « Reichspost » looked to Berthold for guidance on the current « burning Jewish Question » . (131) To do so, it used Göbel's edition of Berthold's sermons. (132)

The « Reichspost » quoted Berthold, a 13th Century Franciscan monk, on the « Jewish Question » because, the newspaper claimed, Jews were neither better nor worse in its time than in Berthold's time ; Jews had always been « great sinners » (« große Sünder ») . (133) Berthold observed Jews as misers, usurers, businessmen, and tax collectors. He portrayed Jewish tax collectors as intermediaries between the State treasury (« Fiscus ») and its Christian victims, consequently driving Christians to Jewish usurers, which further victimized them. Berthold had stated the cycle led on occasion to « bloody Jew-baiting » (« Judenhetzen ») , and Christians to « always want to have war with the Jews » . (134)

The « Reichspost » demonstrated its view that Jewish women were immoral both in Berthold's time and contemporaneously. The newspaper claimed that in the late- 19th Century, there were comparatively more Jewish than Christian prostitutes. To prove its point, it quoted the « Archives Israélites de France » , a French Jewish periodical from 1857. The « Reichspost » then quoted Berthold to show it was the same in the 13th Century, when Jewish prostitutes wore in their hair recognizable « yellow ribbons » (« gelbes Gebände ») and plied their trade on the lane around the castle. (135)

As an expression of its economic, social, political anti-Semitism, and religiously motivated Jew-hatred, the « Reichspost » declared :

« The Jews are the sworn enemies of Christianity, (and) of Christians. »

And then, asked why Christians should tolerate them in a Christian State. (136) The newspaper quoted Berthold's 2 answers to this question :

« The 1st because they are witnesses, that our Lord was oppressed by them. And when a Christian man sees a Jew, he should be moved to prayer :“ Oh ”, he should think,“ You are the one from which our Lord Jesus-Christ was martyred, and suffered for our sins ! ” and the Christian people should thank God for their martyr when they see a Jew ; they should never forget their martyr, then He never forgets us also, and (Christians) should be warned of the Jews. The 2nd is : what of (the Jews) survives the Anti-Christ, they become before Judgment Day all to Christian people. » (137)

The « Reichspost » commented :

« So, the Jews are tolerated, protected as they are taken in ‘ peace ’. » (138)

As adherents to Catholic dogma, Berthold and the « Reichspost » believed Jews were « Christ-killers » , hence the line :

« You are the one from which our Lord Jesus-Christ was martyred, and suffered for our sins. »

Even so, Christians tolerated Jews as reminder to Christians of this evil act as well as a reminder to thank God for the martyred Lord Jesus-Christ. Furthermore, Berthold and the « Reichspost » believed :

« What of (the Jews) survives the Anti-Christ, they become before Judgment Day all to Christian people. »

This was a variation of the idea of Jews as the « Witness People » .

Beginning with Bishop Augustine of Hippo (354-430) in North Africa, Christian theologians developed the doctrine of « witness » . The doctrine was meant to explain the continued survival and existence of the Jewish people Centuries after the destruction of the 2nd Temple in Jerusalem, in 70 CE. Christian theologians saw continuities between Old Israel and New Israel. They argued that, because Jews continued to preserve the Old Testament, they bore witness to the truth of the New. Therefore, the doctrine of « witness » was meant to legitimize Christianity ; it provided a counterpoint to pagans who claimed Christianity was an invented religion. The doctrine of « witness » held that, upon witnessing the 2nd Coming of Christ, the Jews would recognize the truth of Christ and convert to Christianity, providing the ultimate testament to the truth of Christ as Messiah. (139)

Berthold argued that Jews and Christians should live together in peace, and that secular powers had a mandate to protect Jews and Christians from harming one another. He contended Christian education was necessary for Christians to recognize the enemies of Christianity and defend themselves against them. He made the case that :

« Because popes cannot be in every land, there are the patriarchs, cardinals, archbishops, other bishops, high-priests, abbots, and provosts (“ Pröpsten ”) , deans (“ Dechanten ”) , pastors, and under-pastors (“ Unterpfarren ”) given and awarded the power to protect the Christian people. » (140)

This important passage represented the view of the « Reichspost » that Catholic clergy, such as many on the « Reichspost » staff, needed to actively participate in the defense of Christians against enemies such as (allegedly) the Jews.

For Berthold, there were limits to toleration. He warned that when, « There are so many Jews that they want to gain from us the upper-hand, then one must fight them as heathens (“ Heiden ”) . » (141)

On treating Jews as « heathens » , the « Reichspost » quoted Franz Dingelstedt (who died in 1881) , a German poet, dramatist, and theatre manager, who said about the Jews :

« Go, lock them again in the old streets (the Jewish ghetto) , before they lock you in a Christian Quarter (“ Christenviertel ”) . » (142)

In addition, the « Reichspost » quoted from German Protestant anti-Semite Julius Langbehn's 1892 work, « The Rembrandt-German » :

« From a Friend of Truth :

At the present time, in which hundreds of thousands of German workers are slowly tortured to death and tens of thousands of German women and girls quickly handed misery as well as shame - this time has the least reason to weep for a few Jews burned in the Middle-Ages. This same Middle Ages was the most consistently healthy, brave and pious - though, here and there, still raw and violent. » (143)

The « Reichspost » glorified ghettoization and burning of Jews during the Middle-Ages, as defensive acts by Christians against a (perceived) Jewish threat. Such rhetoric demonstrated the newspaper was nostalgic for the Pre-Modern Era, wanted to undo Jewish emancipation, and rejected the Liberal values of equality and human rights. Moreover, the « Reichspost » proved selective in its use of history by citing Langbehn. Claiming only « a few Jews burned in the Middle-Ages » , Langbehn understated medieval violence against Jews. He disingenuously claimed the Middle-Ages was a wonderful period, only « here and there still raw and violent » .

A short catalogue of violence against Jews in Western and Central Europe, from the 11th to the 15th Century, discredits Langbehn's claims. During the 1st Crusade, in the late- 11th Century, a number of crusaders on their way through to the Rhine forcibly converted and killed Jews. While some bishops and other Christians sheltered Jews, the crusaders massacred Jews in the cities of Cologne, Mainz, Metz, Speyer, and Worms. From the 12th Century onward, « blood libel » accusations that Jews murdered Christians for their blood to bake « matzos » for Passover led to massacres of Jews in England, France, Germany, and Spain. In 1298, the Jews of Röttingen, Franconia were accused of desecrating the consecrated host, the communion bread used in Mass believed to have become the body of Jesus-Christ. Claiming divine inspiration, a minor nobleman named Rindfleisch assembled and led an army against the Jews of Röttingen, Rothenburg, Nuremburg, and elsewhere in Bavaria, Franconia, and neighboring Austria. The « Rindfleisch » massacres killed as many as 20,000 Jews. From 1336-1339, the « Armleder » , a band of peasants claiming divine inspiration, attacked about 120 Jewish communities in Alsace, Bavaria, and Swabia. Despite Christians who defended the Jews, the « Armleder » murdered thousands. From 1348-1350, throughout Central and Western Europe, mobs attacked and killed thousands of Jews accused of being « Christ-killers » , poisoning wells, causing the « Black Death » , « blood libels » , and usury. In one such instance, in 1349, with the approval of Emperor Charles IV (who reigned from 1346 to 1378) , the city magistrate and government of Nuremburg organized a mob that massacred thousands of Jews in the city. There were expulsions of Jews from England (1290) , France (1394) , and Spain (1492) . In Vienna, in 1421, charges of « Host » desecration led to more than 200 Jewish men and women being burned to death. Their children were spared, converted, and then sent to convents and monasteries to be raised. Any remaining Jews, in Vienna, were banned. (144)

Ironically, in « Jews and persecution of Christians » (« Juden-und Christenverfolgung ») , the « Reichspost » portrayed Jews as historic persecutors of Christians, rather than the other way around. The newspaper described Georg Rösels « Jews and the Persecution of Christians to the 1st Centuries of the Middle-Ages » (1893) , thus :

« In the current brochure, he seeks to show that the Jews were always the 1st and most zealous when it came to Christian persecution. Thus, have the Church Fathers already complained. When the Jews had power, they themselves killed (Christians) ; when they had no power, they sought to make themselves executioners subservient to the heathen world (“ suchten sie sich dem Henkerarm der Heidenwelt dienstbar zu machen ”) . (145)

In its recommendation of Rösels's work, the « Reichspost » demonstrated its conviction that Jews had been historic enemies of Christians and Christianity. The newspaper omitted that, between the 11th and 15th Centuries, Christians in Western and Central Europe had slaughtered tens of thousands of Jews in anti-Jewish riots. The « Reichspost » mis-used medieval religious history to strengthen its religious arguments against Jews. The newspaper idealized the violent Jew-hatred of the past, without admitting its true destructiveness. In addition, it mis-represented Jews as historically « the 1st and most zealous when it came to Christian persecution » .

The « Reichspost » justified and encouraged the participation of priests in Christian-Social and anti-Semitic movements. In an article about a political meeting in the 7th District (« Neubau ») , the newspaper approvingly quoted speaker G. R. Latschka :

« That we (Christian-Socials) stand in opposition against Liberalism, on the same ground as the popes and bishops. And, as we always meet the Jews in this struggle, anti-Semitism is justified and the priest forced to stand in the Christian-Social movement on the side of the people. » (146)

Simply put, the « Reichspost » exhorted priests to become involved in the Christian-Social movement, in order to help defend « the people » from the (perceived) excesses of Jews. Berthold had also argued church leaders had the power and authority to protect Christian people.

The « Reichspost » printed a series of sermons and articles about the Passion, Crucifixion, and Resurrection of Christ during Lent, Good Friday and Easter, which demonstrated its religious and / or economic arguments against Jews. The newspaper reprinted a sermon Father Heinrich Josef Maria Abel (147) delivered at Saint-Augustine's Church in Vienna, on March 16, 1894, 2 days before Palm Sunday. His sermon was on Jesus's entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday and how people welcomed him, which enraged the Pharisees, members of an ancient Jewish sect. Jesus turned-out the bankers, money-changers, and traders from the temple, and incensed the Pharisee high-priest.

The Jews advocating for the bankers asked Jesus :

« Where from have you the power, (to) drive them out of the temple ? »

And Father Abel commented :

« In those days, as today, these Jews made business with the bankers. » (148)

This scene of Jews defending bankers was one of many Father Abel used to demonstrate the eternally negative characteristics of Jews.

Father Abel continued :

« On the next day, Monday, Jesus taught people in the temple to guard themselves against the scribes and the Pharisees. When Jesus did so, the Jewish High-Priest Caiaphas. »

According to Father Abel, thought :

« It would be better that Jesus die, than the political nation of the Jews perish by the Romans. However, the Lord God had also endorsed his words, in another sense : It is better that Jesus-Christ, alone, perishes than the poor people, than the workers. Better he than that we all perish, whether Catholic, or Protestant, or Jewish (because also, Jews are safe here) whether believing Catholics and Protestants, or unbelieving, whether Orthodox or Reform-Jew. So had God understood the word of Caiaphas. » (149)

For his contemporary audience, Father Abel conflated past and present. He made biblical references to a « political nation » of Jews, as well as Reform Jews and Protestants, none of which existed at the time. Father Abel then described the hiring of « the traitor Judas » , on Tuesday, and the imprisonment of Jesus on Thursday. Father Abel pronounced the « terrorism of the Jews against the people began at this time » . (150) By implication, it continued to the present. With Jesus before Pilate, Father Abel proclaimed : the scribes and Pharisees ran about the crowd calling for the crucifixion of Jesus, for the people to vote for the freedom of the murderer Barabbas instead. Then, Father Abel made a number of connections between Jewish « terrorism » , past and present. Concerning what he termed the « terrorism of the phrase » , which included labels such as « clerical » and « ultramontane » against Catholics, Father Abel declared :

« We are not subject to the terrorism of the slogans of the phrase ! » (151)

Regarding what he termed the « terrorism of the press » , Father Abel declared the « Divine Savior Jesus-Christ » had said :

« The apostate Catholic, the apostate Christian is twofold worse than the Jew. Therefore, Christian men, again (we) request : Support the Christian Press ! » (152)

Father Abel, here, equated Christians abandoning the « Christian Press » and turning to the « Jew-Press » with apostasy. With regard to « terrorism of the majority » (in Father Abel's time, the Liberals) , Father Abel stated that :

« Not the majority makes truth ; when only few are for it, this can also be something true. »

And he narrated how only Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, in the Sanhedrin, took the (good) word for him (for Jesus) , Christ was done in with the whole Sanhedrin, with the majority of the Jewish people, who wander (« irrt ») around now the world-over as living witness (« lebender Zeuge ») , that our Lord Jesus-Christ is truly God. (153)

Father Abel, following in the tradition of the Church Fathers, believed the Jews to be both « Christ killers » and « Witness People » . In « Easter » , a front-page article, the « Reichspost » explicitly connected the Jews' (alleged) crucifixion of Christ and the actions of present day Jews. They (the Jews) have crucified him. He was laid in a grave and a heavy stone sealed the tomb. And watchmen watched over the grave. So did the Jews more than 1,800 years ago, and the enemies of Christ and of Christianity, the enemies of the Christian people have through 1,800 years followed this example. The Christian people's spirit was scourged with scorn and ridicule even in last Century, and every revolution was, at the same time, a new crucifixion of Christ and his people. (154) The « Reichspost » compared Christ's corpse to Christian consciousness (« christliche Bewußtsein ») and the watchmen to Jewish newspapers and magazines. Christ was resurrected after 3 days, the stone rolled away, and the watchmen fell-down blinded by the light. The « Reichspost » commented :

« Now, in the 19th Century, the Christian people have awakened and thrown-off their death sleep and now stand mighty before the blinded watchmen. » (155)

The newspaper warned its readers that the Jews still brandished their weapons against the « life force » of the people : Christianity. From present day, Judases and Pharisees, « again drool scorn and ridicule, again roll the silver coins, and again (they) will betray and sell Christ and his people, but the effort shall be vain, because Christianity shall overcome all » . (156) The article called for Christian-Social reform, « re-Christianization » of public life, and « awakening of Christian spirit » , in the people. (157)

On April 13, 1897, the « Reichspost » reprinted another sermon by Father Abel at Saint-Augustine's Church, in Vienna, on the Passion, Crucifixion, and Resurrection of Christ. At its conclusion, Father Abel exhorted his audience to « return to practical Christianity » . (158) The recommendations for the observance of « practical Christianity » were specific and concrete, and reflected the desire for a « re-Christianization » of public life and re-awakening of Christian spirit. Father Abel recommended observance of the Easter holiday and rest on Sundays, « avoidance of non-Christians » , supporting the Christian-Press, and joining Catholic clubs. He exhorted civil servants to attend the « Sankt-Vincenz » Conference, as they were not permitted to join political clubs. He urged Catholic youths to join Catholic worker's clubs and attend Catholic schools. He also recommended that Catholics avoid non-Christians, that is, Jews. (159)

In its Sunday Supplement, the « Reichspost » published August Schiffmacher's poem, « Easter Solace » (« Ostertröst ») . The 3 stanza poem encapsulated « Reichspost » views of Jews both as « Christ killers » and eternal enemies of Christianity and Christians :

Sie haben den Heiland getödtet
In ihrer blinden Wuth
Da ist er siegend erstanden
In gold'ner Morgengluth
Nun möchten sie seine Lehre
Vernichten und entweih'n,
Und seine treue Heerde
In alle Winde zerstreu'n.
Doch laßt sie nur toben und wüthen,

Sie werden wie Dunst vergeh'n,
Und immer und immer wieder
Wird Christus aufersteh'n.

They (Jews) have killed the Saviour
In their blind fury,
Because he is risen victorious
In the golden glow of morning.
Now they want to Destroy and desecrate his teaching,
And scatter to all the winds
His faithful flock.
But just let them rant and rage,
They will vanish like mist,
And time and time again
Christ will be resurrected. (160)

The title of the poem, « Easter Solace » , signified that the poet wished to comfort Christians saddened by Jews' (alleged) Crucifixion of Christ and put them at ease. Even though Jews (purportedly) continued to attack Christ and Christianity, they did so in vain :

« They (Jews) will vanish like mist, / And time and time again / Christ will be resurrected. »

The « Reichspost » directed its hatred not only at the Jews, but also at Judaism itself. In « Rabbinical Wisdom » , the « Reichspost » responded to claims by the « Jüdische Chronik » (Jewish Chronicle) , which the « Reichspost » claimed Bohemian rabbis published. The « Jüdische Chronik » described Jews as the people of God with a « world-historical calling » to develop Judaism into a « world religion » . (161) The « Reichspost » labeled such claims « arrogance » and responded that :

« Judaism has lost for 1,800 years temple, altar and sacrifice, these most important features of its confession, as today's Judaism split completely with Talmudism and modern Reform Judaism actually stands on the positions of atheism and materialism. Why now did the Jew-Press busy itself with such rabbinical wisdom ? » (162)

The « Reichspost » rejected claims by the « Jüdische Chronik » that Judaism was meant to be a « world religion » . Instead, the « Reichspost » asserted Judaism had lost credibility after the Romans destroyed the 2nd Temple in Jerusalem, in 70 CE. The « Reichspost » also took a swipe at Reform Judaism, declaring how its split from « Talmudism » reflected its « atheism and materialism » . These ideologies were anathema to the « re-Christianization » of public life.

The « Reichspost » attacked Jewish religious texts as well. Berthold von Regensburg, the 13th Century German Franciscan monk had insisted :

« The Old Testament is the night, the New Testament is the day. » (163)

Berthold also inveighed against the Talmud and declared it a heretical text. (164)

The « Reichspost » attacked Joseph Caro's 16th Century « Schulchan Aruch » (Code of Jewish Law) more than any other Jewish text. Indeed, it saw the « Schulchan Aruch » as the text Jews used to justify (alleged) economic exploitation of Christians. (165) The « Reichspost » had received reports of « Talmud Torah Schools » , Jewish supplementary schools that provided basic Hebrew and Bible instruction, educating pupils with the « Schulchan Aruch » . In response, the « Reichspost » (falsely) claimed the Grand Duchy of Baden had banned the « Schulchan Aruch » for promoting Jews' immoral acts against « Akum » (as previously noted, the « Reichspost » translated « Akum » as Christian for the sake of its anti-Semitic argumentation, but « Akum » actually means « star worshipper ») . The « Reichspost » noted that there was hardly a school in Vienna where the « Schulchan Aruch » was in use, except perhaps the Talmud Torah School, in the « Leopoldstadt » . The « Reichspost » then requested that the appropriate authorities conduct an inquiry concerning the use of the « Schulchan Aruch » at this school as well as the « hundreds of Talmud Torah Schools » , in Galicia and Bukovina. The « Reichspost » claimed the « Schulchan Aruch » compared « Akum » to dogs. The newspaper challenged defenders of the « Schulchan Aruch » who claimed that « Akum » meant only « star worshippers » (« Sternanbeter ») . While this translation could perhaps apply to the Talmud, to a certain extent, surely it did not to the 16th Century « Schulchan Aruch » . The « Reichspost » declared :

« About the meaning of the word “ Akum ” in the Talmud, (one) can argue ; in the “ Schulchan Aruch ”, “ Akum ” means Christians and only Christians because, at that time, heathens (“ Heiden ”, except the Moslems) , were no longer anywhere in Europe. We, therefore, want the high Imperial and Royal Ministry of Education to act the way Karlsruhe behaved. Ban from the schools a book with dubious morality, and (which) excused or justified most vicious actions if committed against Christians ! When a catechism or any other text book remotely contained an anti-Semitic passage, immediately the relevant text book would be suppressed ! Why should the “ Schulchan Aruch ” enjoy such exceptional preferences ? » (166)

In « Again, the “ Schulchan Aruch ” » , the « Reichspost » reported the « Schulchan Aruch » was found in not one, but 2 schools in Baden, despite the (falsely alleged) ban. The newspaper assumed there would be more elsewhere, considering there were 27,000 Jews in Baden and more than 1.5 million Christians, and in Austria 1.25 million Jews and 24 million (sic) Christians. The « Reichspost » demanded to know where else in Austria this « immoral » book was being used. (167) It is probable the newspaper hated the « Schulchan Aruch » so much because it fit its view that Jews were excessively legalistic.

The « Reichspost » used specious arguments about the « Schulchan Aruch » to condemn the Jews. Its arguments hinged entirely on a false definition of « Akum » . In addition, the newspaper failed to consider that by the late-19th Century most Jews did not abide by the « Schulchan Aruch » . Moreover, the « Reichspost » neglected a significant modernized « Schulchan Aruch » that further simplified « Torah knowledge » and made it applicable to everyday life. In 1864, in Uzhorod, Hungary, Rabbi Schlomo Ganzfried published his « Kitzur Schulchan Aruch » , an abridgement and update of Joseph Caro's 16th Century « Schulchan Aruch » . It disproved « Reichspost » claims that the « Schulchan Aruch » encouraged immoral business practices. In « Chapter 62 : Commerce and Trade » , the « Kitzur Schulchan Aruch » directed Jewish businessmen to deal honestly with both Jews and Gentiles. A Jew who cheated or deceived a Jew or Gentile when purchasing or selling goods, hiring or contracting labor, or exchanging currency violated Torah prohibitions. The « Kitzur Schulchan Aruch » recommended punishments for such violations ranging from beatings and fines, to being cursed in Court. (168)

Despite its intense hostility to Jews, the « Reichspost » nevertheless rejected racial anti-Semitism because it compromised the efficacy of baptism, which as good Catholics, the newspaper's editors upheld. A baptism could allow a person of any faith or nationality to wash away his or her sins (even the « sin » of being Jewish) and become Christian. Racial anti-Semites such as Georg Ritter von Schönerer believed in the primacy of biological origins. For them, Jews could not become Christians through baptism and a baptized Jew was still a Jew. On the other hand, the « Reichspost » acknowledged that Jews could become Christians through baptism.

On numerous occasions the « Reichspost » explicitly rejected racial anti-Semitism. In « Very true ! » (« Sehr Wahr ! ») , the newspaper declared :

« Certainly in love and unity may we already live with the Jews - but what is anti-Semitism other than a defensive war ? Christian anti-Semitism is not founded on religion (and race) hatred. » (169)

In the front-page article « Anti-Semitic and Christian-Social » , the « Reichspost » declared :

« Racial-anti-Semitism is un-Christian and unacceptable. » (170)

To emphasize the efficacy of baptism, in « Anti-Semitic and Christian-Social » the « Reichspost » proclaimed :

« Only Christian anti-Semitism has a reasonable content, moral efficacy and duration. » (171)

The newspaper justified this because, « Christian anti-Semitism does not forget that the Jews are human beings does not deny them equality after genuine acceptance of baptism and of the Christian faith only fights in the Orientals (Jews) the degeneracy of one to us foreign Semitic culture and against their attacks seeks to effectively protect the Christian state and social order. » (172)

The « Reichspost » criticized Martin Luther (1483-1546) , the Protestant Reformer, for warning against attempts to baptize Jews (while Luther believed in the efficacy of baptism, he made this warning because of the difficulty he had trying to convert Jews) . The newspaper quoted Luther's work « On the Jews and Their Lies » , in which Luther warned « German Christians » « not to convert the Jews, which is as impossible as to teach the devil » . (173) The « Reichspost » declared :

« Everyone has a right to it (baptism) , if they desire it honestly, and so too the Jew » . (174)

Along with State patriotism, dynastic loyalty, aspects of « positive » Christianity, and refraining from calls to physically attack Jews, the importance of the « Reichspost » 's rejection of racial anti-Semitism and allowing Jews to convert cannot be over-stated. These features of Jew-hatred and anti-Semitism differentiated the « Reichspost » from racial and radical anti-Semites of its time and of later decades. (175)

Conclusion

In its early years, January 1894 to April 1897, the « Reichspost » used economic, social, and political anti-Semitism, religiously motivated Jew-hatred, and distorted history to call for the « re-Christianization » and « de-Jewification » of public life. As demonstrated by close textual analysis, the newspaper utilized a wide-range of positive depictions of Christians, Christianity, and Christian clergy juxtaposed against negative depictions of Jews and Judaism. Moreover, the « Reichspost » proposed and / or supported anti-Jewish legislation. Nevertheless, the newspaper moderated its views by keeping open to Jews the possibility of conversion to Christianity, rejecting racial anti-Semitism, professing State patriotism and dynastic loyalty, and the rule of law. The « Reichspost » justified expulsion and violence against Jews past and present, and demonstrated bias in its reporting of contemporary Christian and Jewish violence in Vienna. However, the newspaper recognized when to draw the line and did not exhort its readers to pursue such « self-help » against the Jews.

So, what do we learn about anti-Semitism in Vienna ? Anti-Semitism in Vienna of the « Reichspost » variety, Catholic and Christian-Social, was multi-faceted. Moreover, traditional religious Jew-hatred and modern anti-Semitism co-existed, side by side. More than 4 decades after writing « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism » , in 2005, Peter Pulzer published an article entitled « 3rd Thoughts on German and Austrian Anti-Semitism » . In this article, Pulzer detailed the historiography of German and Austrian anti-Semitism and noted that historians have long debated « the ever-recurring question of continuity between the “ traditional ” and “ modern ” forms of Jew-hatred » . (176) The « Reichspost » was founded and run by traditional Catholic clergy and Catholic laymen associated with the Christian-Socials in modern Vienna, on the cusp of the 20th Century. For the « Reichspost » , traditional religiously motivated Jew-hatred and modern anti-Semitism went hand in hand. The newspaper did not hide this fact. In « The Wolf in Sheepskin » (« Der Wolf im Schafspelz ») , the « Reichspost » declared :

« It was not dead, the old Jew hatred, it had changed names and is now called : anti-Semitism and has become modern. » (177)

For economic, social, political, and religious ends, the « Reichspost » recognized and demonstrated the continuity between traditional Jew hatred and modern anti-Semitism in Vienna, at the turn of the 20th Century.

Notes

(I) All references to the « Reichspost » are to the main (morning) editions, unless otherwise indicated. All translations are the author's unless otherwise indicated. The Austrian National Library has digitized the « Reichspost » newspapers from 1894 to 1938, which are found at : <http://anno.onb.ac.at/cgicontent/anno?aid=rpt>.

(2) « Reichspost » (17 May 1895) ; pages 1-2.

(3) Ibid. According to Daniel Vyleta, anti-Semitic labels such as « Jew-Press » signified : « The anti-Semites' dismissal of these papers as “ Judenzeitungen ”, (it) presumes, a priori, that a journalist's Judaism would fully determine his language. » . Daniel Vyleta. « Crime, Jews and News : Vienna (1895-1914) » , Berghahn Books, New York (2007) ; page 129.

(4) In Vienna, from the early to mid 1890's, the anti-Semitic Parties scored successive victories against the Liberals. By 1895, they gained majority representation in the City Council (« Gemeinderat ») . Karl Lueger was nominated mayor of Vienna several times, thereafter. However, Emperor Franz-Josef (who reigned from 1848 to 1916) , the Austrian government, bureaucracy, and hierarchy, resisted Lueger's appointment. Franz-Josef, who was unsympathetic to anti-Semitism, used the Imperial veto 4 times, against Lueger. It was not until April 8, 1897, that Franz-Josef relented and permitted Lueger to become mayor of Vienna. Wolfgang Häusler. « Toleranz, Emanzipation und Antisemitismus. Das österreichische Judentum des bürgerlichen Zeitalters (1782-1918) » , in : « Das österreichische Judentum : Voraussetzungen und Geschichte » , edited by Nikolaus Vielmetti, « Jugend und Volk » , Vienna (1974) ; pages 117-118. Robert S. Wistrich. « The Jews of Vienna in the Age of Franz-Joseph » , Oxford University Press, Oxford (1989) ; page 179.

(5) Peter Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria » , 2nd edition, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1988) .

(6) Peter Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism » ; page 200.

(7) John W. Boyer. « Political Radicalism in Late-Imperial Vienna : Origins of the Christian-Social Movement (1848-1897) » , The University of Chicago Press, Chicago (1981) .

(8) John W. Boyer. « Political Radicalism » ; page 51.

(9) Steven Beller. « Vienna and the Jews (1867-1938) : a Cultural History » , Cambridge University Press, New York (1989) ; page 193.

(10) Steven Beller. « A Concise History of Austria » , Cambridge University Press, New York (2006) ; page 157.

(11) Hellmut Andics. « Der ewige Jude : Ursachen und Geschichte des Antisemitismus » , Verlag Fritz Molden, Vienna (1965) ; pages 240-241.

(12) Wolfgang Häusler. « Toleranz, Emanzipation und Antisemitismus. Das österreichische Judentum des bürgerlichen

Zeitalters (1782-1918) » , in : « Das österreichische Judentum : Voraussetzungen und Geschichte » , edited by Nikolaus Vielmetti, « Jugend und Volk » , Vienna (1974) ; pages 109, 115-118.

(13) Richard S. Geehr. « Karl Lueger : Mayor of “ Fin-de-Siècle ” Vienna » , Wayne State University Press, Detroit (1990) ; page 85. Daniel Vyleta characterized the « Deutsches Volksblatt » as a « Radically and dedicatedly anti-Semitic paper » , both « German-nationalist and racist » , and the « Vaterland » as « The monarchy’s leading Catholic who opposed extreme nationalism » . « Competed with the “ Reichspost ” for readers, though less populist in nature. » Vyleta. « Crime, Jews, and News » ; page 75. Reinhold Knoll stated that the « Vaterland » forfeited its position as the representative Catholic newspaper to the « Reichspost » . Reinhold Knoll. « Zur Tradition der christlichsozialen Partei : Ihre Früh-und Entwicklungsgeschichte bis zu den Reichsratswahlen (1907) » , Böhlau Verlag, Vienna (1973) ; page 178.

(14) John W. Boyer. « Political Radicalism » ; pages 70, 140, 339-340. Boyer. « Culture and Political Crisis in Vienna : Christian-Socialism in Power (1897-1918) » , The University of Chicago Press, Chicago (1995) ; pages 37-39, 169, 304.

(15) « Reichspost » (29 December 1894) ; page 1.

(16) Boyer. « Culture and Political Crisis » ; page 318.

(17) Ibid. ; page 41. Wilhelm Kosch. « Opitz, Ambros » , in : « Biographisches Staatshandbuch : Lexicon der Politik, Presse und Publizistik, Fortgeführt von Eugen Kuri, Zweiter Band » , A. Francke AG Verlag, Bern and Munich (1963) ; page 944. Elisabeth Lebensaft. « Opitz, Ambros (1846-1907) , Journalist, Verleger und Politiker » , in : « Österreichisches Biographisches Lexicon (1815-1950) » , « Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften » , Vienna (2003-2011) ; pages 233-234 - accessed March 23, 2013 :

http://www.biographien.ac.at/oebl/oebl_0/Opitz_Ambros_1846_1907.xml?frames=yes.

(18) Reinhold Knoll. « Zur Tradition der christlichsozialen Partei » ; page 318.

(19) Wilhelm Kosch. « Funder, Friedrich » , in : « Biographisches Staatshandbuch » , I. Band ; page 367. Kurt Skalnik. « Funder, Friedrich » , in : « Neue Deutsche Biographie » , 5. Band, « Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften » , Munich (1961) ; page 730 - accessed March 23, 2013 :

<http://www.deutsche-biographie.de/pnd118536869.html>.

(20) Boyer. « Political Radicalism » ; pages 339-340.

(21) « Reichspost » (17 April 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(22) « Reichspost » (4 March 1894) ; page 4.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid.

(25) For additional examples of Jews seen as usurers and / or speculators, see : « Reichspost » (1 February 1894) ; page 1 - (May 1894) ; page 3 - (10 May 1894) ; page 4 - (26 July 1895) ; page 5 - (2 April 1897) ; page 3.

(26) « Reichspost » (25 February 1894) ; page 9.

(27) For additional examples of Jews seen as peddlers, see : « Reichspost » , (1 May 1894) ; page 3 - (22 July 1894) ; page 1 - (10 August 1894) ; page 5 - (6 March 1895) ; page 4 - (7 March 1895) ; page 4 - (8 March 1895) ; page 6 - (9 March 1895) ; page 4 - (12 March 1895) ; page 5 - (17 December 1895) ; page 5.

(28) « Reichspost » (24 September 1896) ; page 5.

(29) « Reichspost » (5 June 1894) ; page 4.

(30) « Reichspost » (6 January 1895) ; page 6.

(31) « Reichspost » (« Abendblatt ») , (3 March 1896) ; page 3.

(32) « Reichspost » (« Abendblatt ») , (5 March 1896) ; page 4.

(33) « Reichspost » (18 July 1895) ; page 3.

(34) « Reichspost » (30 October 1895) ; page 6.

(35) Ibid.

(36) « Reichspost » (13 August 1896) ; page 10.

(37) Ibid.

(38) « Reichspost » (12 Januar 1895) ; page 5.

(39) Ibid.

(40) « Reichspost » (30 January 1895) ; pages 5-6.

(41) Ibid. The « Reichspost » documented additional Münzer defamation lawsuits in 2 articles entitled « Jews among themselves » (« Juden unter sich ») on 10 June 1896 (page 7) ; and on 11 June 1896 (page 9) .

(42) For additional examples of Jews depicted as frauds / swindlers in business and banking, see : « Reichspost » (26 January 1894) ; page 6 - (30 January 1894) ; page 3 - (10 February 1894) ; page 6 - (18 January 1895) ; page 5 - (6 May 1896) ; page 3.

(43) « Reichspost » (17 April 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(44) John W. Bowker. « Akum » , in : « The Concise Oxford Dictionary of World Religions » , Oxford University Press, Oxford (1997) , accessed March 22, 2013 : <http://www.encyclopedia.com/doc/10101-Akum.html>.

(45) « Reichspost » (17 April 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(46) « Reichspost » (10 May 1894) ; page 4.

(47) Ibid.

(48) Ibid. For additional examples of the « Reichspost » and Christian-Social motto « Buy only from Christians ! » being used, see : « Reichspost » (22 March 1894) ; page 5 - (2 May 1894) ; page 1. For an example of « Reichspost » calls for boycotts against the « Jew-Press » motivated by religious Jew-hatred and economic anti-Semitism, see : « Reichspost » (13 March 1897) ; page 4.

(49) « Reichspost » (23 December 1894) ; page 12.

(50) « Reichspost » (27 October 1895) ; page 6.

(51) « Reichspost » (31 May 1894) ; page 5.

(52) « Reichspost » (22 August 1895) ; page 6.

(53) Mauschel was the western Yiddish of Bohemia and Moravia imitated by anti-Semites. Vyleta. « Crime, Jews, and News » ; page 120.

(54) « Reichspost » (31 March 1894) ; page 10.

(55) « Reichspost » (20 December 1896) ; page 12.

(56) Jews created their own neighborhoods in Vienna because they desired to live among co-religionists. This residential behavior increased social contact and opportunities to form personal relationships between Jews, limited contacts with non-Jews, and re-inforced Jewish identity. Jews preferred residence among Jews more than among non-Jews even of their same class or from the same regions of Austria-Hungary. The District with the greatest proportion of Jewish residents was the « Leopoldstadt » ; in 1890, 31 % of residents were Jewish and, in 1900, 36.4 % . Marsha L. Rozenblit. « The Jews of Vienna (1867-1914) : Assimilation and Identity » , State University of New York Press, Albany, New York (1983) ; pages 74-94.

(57) « Reichspost » (2 October 1894) ; page 6.

(58) « Reichspost » (7 September 1895) ; page 5.

(59) Ibid.

(60) « Reichspost » (4 October 1895) ; page 6.

(61) « Reichspost » (8 May 1896) ; page 5.

(62) Ibid.

(63) Ibid.

(64) Ibid.

(65) « Reichspost » (17 December 1895) ; page 5.

(66) Studies demonstrated that the proportion of Jewish prostitutes in Buenos Aires brothels was as high as 90 % . See : Vyleta. « Crime Jews and News » ; pages 57-58, 68. For more information on « White Slavery » and Jewish efforts to combat it, see : Marion Kaplan. « The Jewish Feminist Movement in Germany : The Campaigns of the Jüdischer Frauenbund (1904-1938) » , Greenwood Press, Westport, Connecticut (1979) .

(67) See, also : the « Reichspost » articles « White Slaver » (« Mädchenhändler ») (28 June 1894) ; page 6 - and « White Slavery » (« Mädchenhandel ») (11 January 1896) ; page 4.

(68) « Reichspost » (22 August 1895) ; page 6.

(69) Ibid.

(70) For another example of an alleged deceitful Jewish officer in the military, see : « Reichspost » (5 April 1895) ; page 5.

(71) « Reichspost » (18 August 1894) ; page 5.

(72) « Reichspost » (21 September 1894) ; page 6.

(73) Ibid.

(74) « Reichspost » (12 November 1895) ; page 6.

(75) « Reichspost » (10 July 1896) ; page 10.

(76) « Reichspost » (14 March 1897) ; page 4.

(77) « Reichspost » (21 March 1897) ; pages 1-2.

(78) « Reichspost » (26 September 1896) ; page 10.

(79) « Reichspost » (22 May 1894) ; page 5.

(80) « Reichspost » (27 March 1897) ; pages 1-2.

(81) Ibid.

(82) Steven Beller. « Vienna and the Jews » ; pages 196-197.

(83) Robert S. Wistrich noted : « In spite of its vulgarity, Christian-Social anti-Semitism did not generate any pogroms in Vienna. It remained within the limits of a conciliatory, supra-national Habsburg State with a political culture based on respect for the law and mutual accommodation between ethnic groups. » .Wistrich. « The Jews of Vienna in the Age of Franz-Joseph » ; pages 236-237.

(84) « Reichspost » (4 January 1894) ; page 2.

(85) Leopold Kunschak (1871-1953) , founder of the « Christian Workers Movement » (« christlichen Arbeiterbewegung ») , see : Reinhold Knoll. « Zur Tradition der christlichsozialen Partei » ; page 311.

(86) Ibid.

(87) « Reichspost » (7 February 1894) ; page 3.

(88) Ibid.

(89) « Reichspost » (13 February 1894) ; page 3. Peter Pulzer noted : « The prominence of Jews in the Social-Democratic leadership provided ammunition for both anti-Semitism and anti-Socialism » , and furthermore : « Social Democratic ideology was determined to a considerable extent by Jewish influence » . Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism » ; page 252.

(90) « In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground ; for out of it wast thou taken : for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. » Genesis 3:19, King James Version.

(91) « Reichspost » (16 January 1894) ; page 3.

(92) « Reichspost » (13 January 1894) ; page 6. On the « Sin of the Calf » , see : Exodus :24.

(93) Ibid.

(94) « Reichspost » (27 January 1894) ; pages 1-2. Peter Pulzer summarized the « institutional aspects » of « 19th Century European Liberalism as parliamentary government, the rule of law, the absence of legally established class privileges, a “ laissez-faire ” economy, and freedom of speech and association » . Moreover, Liberalism was « a set of moral qualities, those of rationalism, humanism, and (to give it its German context) “ Aufklärung ” » . The anti-Semites combated « the institutions of Liberalism, its whole moral system, and its whole concept of human existence » . Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism » ; pages 29-30.

(95) « Reichspost » (27 January 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(96) « Reichspost » (28 March 1894) ; page 2.

(97) Ibid.

(98) « Reichspost » (1 January 1896) ; pages 2-3.

(99) « Reichspost » (6 March 1897) ; page 5.

(100) For more information on the 5th Curia and the general elections of March 1897, see : Boyer. « Political Radicalism » ; pages 406-407, 529.

(101) « Reichspost » (9 March 1897) ; page 1.

(102) Ibid.

(103) Ibid.

(104) « Reichspost » (11 March 1897) ; pages 1-3.

(105) « Reichspost » (11 March 1897) ; page 1.

(106) « Reichspost » (24 March 1897) ; pages 3-4.

(107) Ibid.

(108) « Reichspost » (4 December 1895) ; page 6.

(109) Ibid.

(110) « Reichspost » (30 August 1896) ; page 6.

(111) « Reichspost » (4 October 1896) ; page 10.

(112) « Reichspost » (27 March 1897) ; page 4.

(113) Peter Pulzer detailed how in Vienna Jews predominated in finance, medicine, journalism, law, academic professions, intelligentsia, cultural achievements and business. He stated : « There is no doubt that Jews were “ over-represented ” (if one accepts such a concept) in the educated classes and the professions » . Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism » ; page 11.

(114) « Reichspost » (16 December 1895) ; page 3.

(115) « Reichspost » (3 July 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(116) Ibid.

(117) « Reichspost » (12 April 1894) ; page 1.

(118) « Reichspost » (23 April 1896) ; page 3.

(119) « Reichspost » (16 September 1894) ; page 2.

(120) Ibid. Grand Vizier Kara Mustapha led the Ottoman army that besieged Vienna from July 4 to September 12, 1683. The people of Vienna defended the city until a rescue army of Duke Charles V of Lorraine, King Jan Sobieski of Poland, and Prince Eugene of Savoy defeated the Turks and lifted the siege. Peter Csendes. « Historical Dictionary of Vienna » , The Scarecrow Press, Inc. , Lanham, Maryland (1999) ; pages 200, 209.

(121) Bruce F. Pauley. « From Prejudice to Persecution : A History of Austrian Anti-Semitism » , The University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill (1992) ; pages 15-16.

(122) « Reichspost » (23 April 1896) ; page 3.

(123) Arno Parik. « Prague » , translated from Czech by Stephen Hattersley, in : « The YIVO Encyclopædia of Jews in Eastern Europe » , YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, accessed May 9, 2013 : <http://www.yivoencyclopedia.org/article.aspx/Prague>. Pauley. « From Prejudice to Persecution » ; pages 16-17.

(124) « Reichspost » (21 January 1896) ; page 3.

(125) Jacob Katz. « Out of the Ghetto : The Social Background of Jewish Emancipation (1770-1870) » , Syracuse University Press, Syracuse, New York (1998) ; pages 162-164. Pauley. « From Prejudice to Persecution » ; pages 17-18.

(126) « Reichspost » (14 August 1894) ; page 2. « Austriacus » in his remark (as it is reported) and the « Reichspost » in its response failed to make an important distinction between the Pan-German and Christian-Social anti-Semites. Pan-German anti-Semites would quite possibly « write anti-Austrianness on their banner » , while the Christian-Social anti-Semites, State-patriots and loyal to the dynasty, would not.

(127) « Reichspost » (14 August 1894) ; page 2.

(128) Ibid.

(129) Häusler. « Toleranz, Emanzipation und Antisemitismus » ; pages 97-103. William O. McCagg, Junior. « A History of Habsburg Jews (1670-1918) » , University Press, Indianapolis, Indiana (1989) ; pages 83-101. Pauley. « From Prejudice to Persecution » ; pages 20-21.

(130) « Reichspost » (10 March 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(131) « Reichspost » (9 March 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(132) The « Reichspost » cited Göbel : « Franciscan missionary sermons of Berthold von Regensburg » . Foreword by A. Stolz, 3rd enlarged and revised edition, Regensburg (1873) (« Missionspredigten des Franciskaner Berthold von Regensburg, mit einem Vorwort von A. Stolz, dritte vermehrte und verbesserte Auflage. Regensburg 1873 ») .

(133) Ibid.

(134) Ibid.

(135) « Reichspost » (10 March 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(136) Ibid. Note that the « Reichspost » considered Austria a Christian State.

(137) Ibid.

(138) Ibid.

(139) Mark R. Cohen. « Under Crescent and Cross : The Jews in the Middle-Ages » Princeton University Press, (Princeton (1994) ; pages 20-21, 139.

(140) « Reichspost » (10 March 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(141) Ibid.

(142) Ibid.

(143) Ibid.

(144) Leonard B. Glick. « Abraham's Heirs : Jews and Christians in Medieval Europe » , Syracuse University Press, New York (1999) ; pages 258-259, 268, 273. Lynn Hunt et al. « The Making of the West : Peoples and Cultures, A Concise History » Bedford / Saint-Martin's, New York (2003) ; pages 358-360, 450-452.

(145) « Reichspost » (13 December 1894) ; page 3.

(146) « Reichspost » (21 April 1894) ; page 5.

(147) Father Abel was the founder of the Marian Congregation in Vienna and the organizer of the pilgrimages to Mariazell. See : Reinhold Knoll. « Zur Tradition der christlichsozialen Partei » ; page 305.

(148) « Reichspost » (17 March 1894) ; pages 4-5.

(149) Ibid.

(150) Ibid.

(151) Ibid.

(152) Ibid.

(153) Ibid.

(154) « Reichspost » (25 March 1894) ; page 1.

(155) Ibid.

(156) Ibid.

(157) Ibid.

(158) « Reichspost » (13 April 1897) ; page 6.

(159) Ibid.

(160) « Sonntags-Beilage. Illustriertes Unterhaltungsblatt der “ Reichspost ” » (18 April 1897) ; page 121.

(161) « Reichspost » (29 July 1896) ; page 7.

(162) Ibid.

(163) « Reichspost » (10 March 1894) ; pages 1-2.

(164) Ibid.

(165) See, also : References to the « Schulchan Aruch » , in the MA Thesis section on the « Use of Economic Anti-Semitism » .

(166) « Reichspost » (21 July 1894) ; page 1.

(167) « Reichspost » (24 July 1894) ; pages 2-3.

(168) Shlomo Ganzfried. « “ Kitzur Schulchan Oruch ” : The Classic Guide to the Everyday Observance of Jewish Law » , translated by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing Corporation, New York (1991) ; pages xvii-xix, 265-270.

(169) « Reichspost » (2 July 1894) ; page 2.

(170) « Reichspost » (25 July 1896) ; pages 1-2.

(171) Ibid.

(172) Ibid.

(173) Ibid.

(174) Ibid.

(175) This distinction, though important, is not a justification of the vulgar hydra-headed anti-Semitism and Jew-hatred of the « Reichspost » .

(176) Peter Pulzer. « 3rd Thoughts on German and Austrian Anti-Semitism » , « Modern Jewish Studies » , Volume 4, No. 2 (July 2005) ; page 140.

(177) « Reichspost » (28 March 1894) ; page 2.

Bibliography

1. Newspapers « Reichspost » , Vienna (1894-1897) , « Sonntags-Beilage » , « Illustriertes Unterhaltungsblatt der Reichspost » , Vienna (1897) .

2. Secondary Sources Andics, Hellmut. « Der ewige Jude : Ursachen und Geschichte des Antisemitismus » , Verlag Fritz Molden, Vienna (1965) .

Steven Beller. « A Concise History of Austria » , Cambridge University Press, New York (2006) .

Steven Beller. « Vienna and the Jews (1867-1938) : a Cultural History » , Cambridge University Press, New York (1989) .

John W. Boyer. « Culture and Political Crisis in Vienna : Christian-Socialism in Power (1897-1918) » , The University of Chicago Press, Chicago (1995) .

John W. Boyer. « Political Radicalism in Late-Imperial Vienna : Origins of the Christian-Social Movement (1848-1897) » , The University of Chicago Press, Chicago (1981) .

Mark R. Cohen. « Under Crescent and Cross : The Jews in the Middle-Ages » , Princeton University Press, Princeton (1994) .

Peter Csendes. « Historical Dictionary of Vienna » , The Scarecrow Press, Inc. , Lanham, Maryland (1999) .

Peter Ganzfried. « “ Shlomo. Kitzur Schulchan Oruch ” : The Classic Guide to the Everyday Observance of Jewish Law » , translated by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing Corporation, New York (1991) .

Richard S. Geehr. « Karl Lueger : Mayor of “ Fin-de-Siècle ” Vienna » , Wayne State University Press, Detroit (1990) .

Leonard B. Glick. « Abraham's Heirs : Jews and Christians in Medieval Europe » , Syracuse University Press, New York (1999) .

Wolfgang Häusler. « Toleranz, Emanzipation und Antisemitismus. Das österreichische Judentum des bürgerlichen Zeitalters (1782-1918) » , In : « Das österreichische Judentum : Voraussetzungen und Geschichte » , edited by Nikolaus Vielmetti, « Jugend und Volk » , Vienna (1974) ; pages 83-140.

Lynn Hunt, Thomas R. Martin, Barbara H. Rosenwein, R. Po-Chia Hsia, and Bonnie G. Smith. « The Making of the West : Peoples and Cultures, A Concise History » , Bedford / Saint-Martin's, New York (2003) .

Jacob Katz. « Out of the Ghetto : The Social Background of Jewish Emancipation (1770-1870) » , Syracuse University Press, Syracuse, New York (1998) .

Reinhold Knoll. « Zur Tradition der christlichsozialen Partei : Ihre Früh-und Entwicklungsgeschichte bis zu den Reichsratswahlen (1907) » , Böhlau Verlag, Vienna (1973) .

William O. McCagg, Junior. « A History of Habsburg Jews (1670-1918) » , Indiana University Press, Bloomington (1989) .

Bruce F. Pauley. « From Prejudice to Persecution : A History of Austrian Anti-Semitism » , The University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill (1992) .

Peter Pulzer. « The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria » , 2nd edition, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1988) .

Peter Pulzer. « 3rd Thoughts on German and Austrian Antisemitism » , « Modern Jewish Studies » , Volume 4, No. 2 (July 2005) ; pages 137-178.

Marsha L. Rozenblit. « The Jews of Vienna (1867-1914) : Assimilation and Identity » , State University of New York Press, Albany, New York (1983) .

Daniel Vyleta. « Crime, Jews and News : Vienna (1895-1914) » , Berghahn Books, New York (2007) .

Robert S. Wistrich. « The Jews of Vienna in the Age of Franz-Joseph » , Oxford University Press, Oxford (1989) .

Le pan-germanisme

Le pan-germanisme est un mouvement politique irrédentiste du XIXe siècle visant l'unité de tous les germanophones d'Europe, ou identifiés comme tels par les penseurs de cette théorie : lui correspond la volonté de mettre en place la Grande Allemagne, c'est l'expression traduite de « Großdeutschland » (du latin : « Magna Germania ») qui désigne la

Germanie antique.

Les origines du pan-germanisme remonteraient au début des années 1800, suite aux guerres napoléoniennes. Ces guerres déclenchèrent un mouvement social, né en France, même suite à la Révolution française : le nationalisme. Le nationalisme était une menace sérieuse pour les anciens régimes aristocratiques. En effet, la plupart des groupes ethniques de l'Europe centrale étaient divisés par les frontières des Empires des vieilles dynasties des Romanov et des Habsbourg. Les Allemands, de leur côté, étaient un peuple sans unité politique depuis la Réforme, lorsque le Saint-Empire Romain germanique fut divisé en une série de petits États indépendants. Les nouveaux nationalistes allemands, principalement de jeunes réformistes, désiraient réunir l'ensemble du peuple partageant l'« übertragungsfactor » et la langue allemande, les « Volksdeutschen » .

Dans une Europe dominée par Napoléon Ier se regroupent autour de la Prusse des patriotes allemands dans une guerre patriotique et nationale que l'on appelle très vite guerre de libération (« Befreiungskriege ») . Apparaissent alors toute une série de libelles et de textes réclamant la constitution d'un État allemand groupant tous les peuples parlant la langue allemande, incluant au besoin des peuples en dehors de ce qui était, jusqu'en 1806, le Saint-Empire. Ainsi se développe le « Volkstum » , rassemblement de tous les hommes de même langue, de même culture.

Johann Gottlieb Fichte évoque dans ses « Discours à la nation allemande » la « puissante nationalité allemande » et le « Volkgeist » (esprit du peuple) allemand.

On trouve les sources intellectuelles dans les discours de quelques penseurs, comme :

Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744-1803) : Il développe la conception du « Volk » (peuple) , comprenant tous les hommes du même sang, quels que soient leur nationalité, leurs opinions ou leur habitat. Le « Volk » est un être en soi, qu'il cite comme une « force organique vivante » . Il estime que ces « caractéristiques nationales marquent profondément les vieux peuples et elles apparaissent, de manière indiscutable, dans toutes les manifestations de ces peuples sur terre » .

Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762-1814) : « Or voici ce qu'est un peuple au sens supérieur du mot, sens qu'il a si on admet l'existence d'un monde de l'esprit : un peuple, c'est l'ensemble des peuples qui vivent en commun travers les âges et se perpétuent entre eux sans adultération, physiquement et moralement, selon des lois particulières au développement du divin. »

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831) : « L'erreur la plus fatale pour un peuple, est d'abandonner ses caractères biologiques. » « L'Allemagne, proprement dite, s'est gardée pure de tout mélange, sauf sur sa frontière méridionale et occidentale où la bande de territoire en bordure du Danube et du Rhin fut soumise aux Romains. La région d'entre l'Elbe et le Rhin est restée absolument indigène. »

Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling (1775-1854) : « La création organique des États est ce qui permet à une masse d'êtres humains d'atteindre l'union de cœur et d'esprit, c'est-à-dire de devenir un « Volk ». »

Lorsque la concrétisation du pan-germanisme à l'Est enclenche l'esprit de revanche à l'Ouest : le contentieux principal entre les 2 nations était territorial : l'intégration de l'Alsace et de la Moselle dans l'Empire allemand, que le successeur Guillaume II d'Allemagne entérine par la restauration dans le style médiéval du château du Haut-Königsbourg, sur lequel sont placées ses armoiries. Symboliquement, cette place forte garde les marches de l'Empire. Côté français, la cession liée à la paix de 1871 porte atteinte à l'intégrité territoriale nationale, l'esprit de revanche se forge sur cette perception d'une amputation qui ne doit pas perdurer.

Dans les années 1860, les 2 plus puissants États germanophones étaient la Prusse et l'Autriche, et ces 2 puissances cherchaient à étendre leurs territoires et leur influence. La structure multi-ethnique de l'Empire autrichien était toutefois critiquée par des germanophones vivant à l'intérieur comme à l'extérieur des frontières de l'Empire. C'est pour affirmer sa multi-ethnicité que l'Empire s'est redéfini comme l'Empire Austro-Hongrois. La Prusse, sous Otto von Bismarck, utilisa, de son côté, le nationalisme pour réunir l'ensemble du territoire qui forme l'Allemagne moderne. L'Empire germanique, le 2e « Reich » , fut achevé en 1871, suite au couronnement de Guillaume Ier à la tête d'une union d'États germanophones.

Cependant, de nombreux Allemands habitaient toujours à l'extérieur du nouvel Empire. Ces groupes utilisèrent le sentiment nationaliste germanique pour tenter une unification de leur territoire avec la mère-patrie. L'Autriche et les Sudètes devinrent donc au centre de la controverse.

De nombreux Autrichiens commencèrent à avoir du ressentiment pour la diversité ethnique de leur propre Empire. Se définissant eux-mêmes comme les descendants des Bavarois, qui conquérèrent et s'établirent dans la région, de nombreux d'entre eux appuyèrent la séparation de l'Empire des Habsbourg pour rejoindre le nouvel Empire germanique.

Le pan-germanisme, à proprement parler, prend corps dans les années 1890. L'une des expressions politiques majeures en Allemagne lors de cette phase est l'émergence du Parti s'intitulant « Ligue Pangermanique » . Ce Parti qui défend le « Volkstum » (l'esprit de la race) , influence le jeune Adolf Hitler. Ce Parti extrémiste resta toutefois très minoritaire en Allemagne.

Selon certains, il ne faut pas confondre le « sursaut national » de 1814 et même la politique bismarckienne, plus prussienne que germanique, avec le pan-germanisme. Ce mouvement prend d'ailleurs corps en réaction à la pensée bismarckienne, centrée avant tout sur la Prusse. Bismarck s'appuyait de plus sur des alliances à l'Est qui lui interdisaient toute velléité d'expansion en Europe centrale et orientale.

On ne doit pas non plus associer le pan-germanisme à l'expansionnisme colonial allemand, fortement voulu par l'Empereur Guillaume II en vue de rivaliser avec les Empires britanniques et français. En effet, à l'image des autres grandes nations européennes, l'Allemagne veut se doter d'un Empire colonial.

En 1905, Joseph-Ludwig Reimer édite « Une Allemagne pangermaniste » , ouvrage référentiel de 400 pages. En interprétant l'histoire dans l'intérêt du pan-germanisme, il tente de prouver la supériorité de la race allemande par ses apports culturels et historiques au sein des nations voisines, comme la France, la Belgique ou les Pays-Bas. L'étude raciale et ethnographique y tient une grande place. Concernant la France, Reimer, s'inquiétant de sa « dégermanisation » grandissante, approuve la solution d'une colonisation de ce pays, en commençant par le Nord et l'Est. Cette conquête passant d'ailleurs, dans un 1er temps, par un retour aux frontières médiévales de la Lotharingie.

En 1911, Otto Richard Tannenberg développe les thèses pangermanistes dans un livre capital pour cette doctrine : « La Plus Grande Allemagne ». Il y expose clairement tous les arguments qui deviendront politique d'État avec Adolf Hitler, tel ce passage :

« Quelle situation pitoyable que la nôtre, si l'on considère que, pas moins de 25 millions d'Allemands, c'est-à-dire 28 % de la race, vivent au-delà des limites de l'Empire allemand ! C'est là un chiffre colossal, et un fait pareil ne saurait se produire dans un autre État quelconque sans susciter la plus vive indignation de tous les citoyens et l'effort le plus passionné pour remédier au mal sans plus attendre. Qui pourrait empêcher 87 millions d'hommes de former un Empire, s'ils en faisaient le serment ? »

Après la Première Guerre mondiale, l'influence de l'Allemagne en Europe fut considérablement réduite et ébranla les rêves d'Empire colonial pour les pangermanistes. L'Allemagne était humiliée et l'Empire austro-hongrois fut divisé en de nombreux États. La création de la Pologne, de la Tchécoslovaquie, de la Hongrie, ainsi que l'expansion de la Roumanie séparèrent de nouveau le peuple allemand, après avoir été presque entièrement réuni sous les 2 Empires autrichien et allemand. De nombreux États slaves nouvellement formés étaient préjudicieux envers leurs minorités germanophones, spécialement dans les territoires contrôlés anciennement par l'Empire austro-hongrois. Des actes de racisme et d'oppression furent recensés.

L'idée pan-germanique n'en a pas pour autant disparu et des penseurs et écrivains s'efforcent de la définir et de l'expliquer. En 1915, Friedrich Naumann publie la fameux « Mittel Europa ». En 1916, André Chéradame, dans l'ouvrage intitulé « Le Plan pangermaniste démasqué », décrit avec précision une autre vision du pan-germanisme. En effet, d'après cet auteur, le pan-germanisme n'a pas pour but de réunir des populations qui ont une langue germanique mais il vise, en dehors de toute question de langue ou de race, à absorber les diverses régions dont la possession est considérée comme utile à la puissance des « Hohenzollern ». En 1926, Hans Grimm vulgarise l'expression d' « espace vital » (« Lebensraum »). Adolf Hitler est en phase avec cette famille de pensée, comme le montre clairement « Mein Kampf » (Mon Combat, 1925). En 1927, il a d'ailleurs révisé lui-même le programme en 25 points commandé sur son ordre, en 1920, à Gottfried Feder, économiste du NSDAP. Dès les 1ers mots, ce programme demandait l'union de tous les allemands, afin de former un unique Grand « Reich » sur la base du droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes.

Adolf Hitler, après avoir pris le pouvoir, entama une politique radicale appliquant le pan-germanisme en faisant main basse sur tous les territoires décrétés « germaniques ». Les Sudètes, une région de l'actuelle République tchèque, étaient au centre de la controverse. En effet, majoritairement germanophone, le territoire avait été donné à la Tchécoslovaquie comme zone tampon afin de prévenir une future agression allemande. Hitler utilisa « l'oppression » des Allemands en Europe de l'Est pour justifier une invasion. À la fin de 1938, le sort des Sudètes fut débattu lors de la conférence de Munich. La région, où vivaient environ 3 millions d'Allemands, fut finalement cédée au 3e « Reich » .

Au cours de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les Autrichiens, Sudètes, Alsaciens-Lorrains, Allemands de Transylvanie et Allemands de la Mer Baltique furent tous sous le contrôle du 3e « Reich » et le rêve pan-germanique fut finalement réalisé. Mais cet état de fait ne comportait pas que des avantages aux populations germaniques. En effet, les Nazis réinstallèrent des Allemands à travers toute l'Europe à leur guise, déroulant un plan (« Generalplan Ost ») qu'ils avaient conçu sans tenir compte de l'avis et des désirs de ces Allemands de l'Est.

La défaite de 1945 mit fin aux rêves de pan-germanisme de la même façon que la Première Guerre mondiale provoqua la disparition du pan-slavisme. Les Allemands d'Europe de l'Est furent expulsés brutalement et l'Allemagne même fut dévastée, puis divisée politiquement entre République fédérale d'Allemagne (Ouest) et République démocratique allemande (Est) . Nationalisme et pan-germanisme devinrent des sujets tabous en raison de leur connotation nazie. Mais la réunification du pays, en 1990, après la chute du mur de Berlin a ravivé les vieux débats. La peur du passé demeure toutefois forte et explique la crainte que les Allemands eux-mêmes ont d'un « Volksdeutschen » uni.

Il existe actuellement d'importantes populations germanophones à l'extérieur de l'Autriche et de l'Allemagne : en Suisse, en Belgique, en France, en Europe de l'Est et dans l'ex-Union soviétique, même si de nombreux germanophones ont recherché la citoyenneté allemande après l'écroulement du bloc communiste. Aujourd'hui, l'idée même d'unification de l'Autriche et de l'Allemagne ravive le douloureux souvenir du Nazisme et rend peu probable une telle union dans un avenir proche.

...

Pan-Germanism was highly-influential in German politics in the 19th Century during the unification of Germany when the German Empire was proclaimed in as a nation-State, in 1871, without Austria (« Kleindeutsche Lösung » : Lesser Germany) , and the 1st half of the 20th Century in the Austro-Hungarian Empire and the German Empire. From the late- 19th Century, many Pan-Germanist thinkers, since 1891, organized in the Pan-German League, had adopted openly ethno-centric and racist ideologies and, ultimately, gave rise to the foreign policy « Heim ins Reich » pursued by Nazi Germany under Adolf Hitler, from 1938, one of the primary factors leading to the outbreak of World War II. As a result of the disaster of World War II, Pan-Germanism was mostly seen as a taboo ideology in the post-War period, in both the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic. Pan-Germanism remains practically extinct as an ideology, at most limited to some fringe groups of Neo-Nazism, in Germany and Austria.

The word « pan » is a Greek word element meaning « all, every, whole, all-inclusive » . The word « German » , in this context, derives from Latin « Germani » originally used by Julius Cæsar referring to tribes or a single tribe in north-eastern Gaul. In the late- Middle-Ages, it acquired a loose meaning referring to the speakers of Germanic languages (alongside « Almain » and « Teuton ») most of whom spoke dialects ancestral to modern German. In English, « Pan-German » was 1st attested, in 1892. In German, there exists a synonym, « Alldeutsche Bewegung » , which is a calque using German instead of Latin and Greek roots.

Pan-Germanism's origins began with the birth of Romantic nationalism during the Napoleonic Wars, with Friedrich Ludwig Jahn and Ernst Moritz Arndt being early proponents. Germans, for the most part, had been a loose and disunited people since the Reformation, when the Holy Roman Empire was shattered into a patchwork of States, following the end of the 30 Years' War with the Peace of Westphalia.

Advocates of the « Großdeutschland » (Greater Germany) solution sought to unite all the German-speaking people in Europe, under leadership of the Austrian Germans from the Austrian Empire. Pan-Germanism was widespread among the revolutionaries of 1848, notably among Richard Wagner and the Brothers Grimm. Writers such as Friedrich List and Paul Anton Lagarde argued for German hegemony in Central and Eastern Europe, where German domination, in some areas, had begun as early as the 9th Century AD with the « Ostsiedlung », Germanic expansion into Slavic and Baltic lands. For the Pan-Germanists, this movement was seen as a « Drang nach Osten », in which Germans would be naturally inclined to seek « Lebensraum » by moving eastwards to reunite with the German minorities there.

The « Deutschlandlied » (Song of Germany) , written in 1841 by Hoffmann von Fallersleben, in its 1st stanza, defines « Deutschland » as reaching « From the Meuse to the Memel / From the Adige to the Belt » , i.e. , as including East Prussia and South Tyrol.

Reflecting upon the 1st Schleswig War, in 1848, Karl Marx noted that :

« By quarrelling amongst themselves, instead of confederating, Germans and Scandinavians, both of them belonging to the same great race, only prepare the way for their hereditary enemy, the Slav. »

There is, in political geography, no Germany proper to speak of. There are Kingdoms and Grand Duchies, and Duchies and Principalities, inhabited by Germans, and each separately ruled by an independent sovereign with all the machinery of State. Yet, there is a natural undercurrent tending to a national feeling and toward a union of the Germans into one great nation, ruled by one common head as a national unit.

(Article from « The New York Times » , published on 1 July 1866.)

By the 1860's, the Kingdom of Prussia and the Austrian Empire were the 2 most powerful nations dominated by German-speaking elites. Both sought to expand their influence and territory. The Austrian Empire (like the Holy Roman Empire) was a multi-ethnic State, but the German-speaking people there did not have an absolute numerical majority ; the creation of the Austro-Hungarian Empire was one result of the growing nationalism of other ethnicities especially the Hungarians. Under Prussian leadership, Otto von Bismarck would ride on the coat-tails of nationalism to unite all of modern-day Germany. After Bismarck excluded Austria and the Austrian Germans from Germany, in the German War, and following a few other events over the next few years, the unification of Germany, created the Prussian-dominated German Empire (2nd « Reich ») , in 1871, following the proclamation of Wilhelm I as head of a union of German-speaking States, while disregarding millions of its non-German subjects who desired self-determination from German rule. After World War I, the Pan-Germanism Philosophy changed drastically during the reign of Adolf Hitler. Pan-Germanists originally sought to unify all the German-speaking populations of Europe in a single nation-State known as « Großdeutschland » (Greater Germany) , where « German-speaking » was sometimes taken as synonymous with Germanic-speaking, to the inclusion of the Frisian and Dutch-speaking populations of the Low-Countries, and Scandinavia.

Integrating the Austrian Germans nevertheless remained a strong desire for many people of Germany and Austria, especially among the Liberals, the Social-Democrats and also the Catholics who were a minority in Germany. Georg Schönerer and Karl Hermann Wolf articulated Pan-Germanist sentiments in Austria-Hungary. There was also a rejection of Roman Catholicism with the « Away from Rome ! » movement calling for German speakers to identify with Lutheran or Old Catholic churches. The Pan-German Movement was officially founded in 1891, when Ernst Hasse, a professor at the University of Leipzig and a member of the « Reichstag » , organized the Pan-German League an ultra-nationalist political interest organization which promoted Imperialism, anti-Semitism, and support for ethnic German minorities in other countries. The organization achieved great support among the educated middle- and upper-class ; the organization promoted German nationalist consciousness, especially among ethnic Germans outside Germany. In his 3 volume work, « Deutsche Politik » (1905-1907) , Hasse called for German Imperialist expansion in Europe. Similar expansionist policies were preached by Munich professor Karl Haushofer, Ewald Banse, and Hans Grimm, author of « Volk ohne Raum » and his brother Jacob, who published a treaty about German « Volksrecht » .

After the Revolutions of 1848-1849, in which the Liberal nationalistic revolutionaries advocated the Greater German solution, the Austrian defeat in the Austro-Prussian War (in 1866) with the effect that Austria was now excluded from Germany, and increasing ethnic conflicts in the multi-national Habsburg Monarchy, a German national movement evolved in Austria. Led by the thoughtful and theish German nationalist Georg von Schönerer, organisations as the Pan-German Society demanded the link-up of all German-speaking territories of the Danube Monarchy to the German Empire, and decidedly rejected Austrian patriotism. Schönerer's « völkisch » and identitarian German nationalism was an inspiration to Adolf Hitler's ideology.

In 1933, Austrian Nazis and the national-Liberal Greater German People's Party formed an action group, fighting together against the Austro-fascist regime which imposed a distinct Austrian national identity and in accordance said that Austrians were « better Germans » , while Kurt Schuschnigg adopted a policy of appeasement towards Austrian-born Hitler's annexing of Austria to the 3rd « Reich » and called Austria the « better German State » , he still struggled to keep Austria independent. With the « Anschluß » of Austria, in 1938, the historic aim of Austria's German nationalists was achieved. After 1945, the German national camp was revived in the Federation of Independents and the Freedom Party of Austria.

The idea of including the North Germanic-speaking Scandinavians into a Pan-German State, sometimes referred to as Pan-Germanicism, was promoted alongside mainstream pan-German ideas. Jacob Grimm adopted Peter Andreas Munch's anti-Danish Pan-Germanism and argued that the entire peninsula of « Jutland » had been populated by Germans before the arrival of the Danes and that, thus, it could justifiably be reclaimed by Germany, whereas the rest of Denmark should be incorporated into Sweden. This line of thinking was countered by Jens Jacob Asmussen Worsaae, an archaeologist who had excavated parts of Danevirke, who argued that there was no way of knowing the language of the earliest inhabitants of Danish territory. He also pointed-out that Germany had more solid historical claims to large parts of France and England, and that Slavs (by the same reasoning) could annex parts of Eastern Germany. Regardless of the strength of Worsaae's arguments, pan-Germanism spurred on the German nationalists of Schleswig and Holstein and led to the 1st Schleswig War, in 1848. In turn, this likely contributed to the fact that Pan-Germanism never caught on in Denmark as much as it did in Norway. Pan-Germanic tendencies were particularly widespread among the Norwegian independence movement. Prominent supporters included Peter Andreas Munch, Christopher Bruun, Knut Hamsun, Henrik Ibsen and Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. Bjørnson, who wrote the lyrics for the Norwegian national anthem, proclaimed in 1901 :

« I'm a Pan-Germanist, I'm a Teuton, and the greatest dream of my life is for the South Germanic peoples and the North Germanic peoples and their brothers in diaspora to unite in a fellow confederation. »

(Bjørnson.)

In the 20th Century, the German Nazi Party sought to create a Greater Germanic « Reich » that would include most of the Germanic peoples of Europe within it under the leadership of Germany, including peoples such as the Danes, the Dutch, the Swedes, the Norwegians, and the Flemish within it, with the exception of the English.

Anti-German Scandinavism surged in Denmark in the 1930's and 1940's, in response to the pan-Germanic ambitions of Nazi Germany.

World War I became the 1st attempt to carry-out the Pan-German ideology in practice, and the Pan-German movement argued forcefully for an expansionist Imperialism.

Following the defeat in World War I, influence of German-speaking elites, over Central and Eastern Europe, was greatly limited. At the Treaty of Versailles, Germany was substantially reduced in size. Austria-Hungary was split-up. A Rump-Austria, which to a certain extent corresponded to the German-speaking areas of Austria-Hungary (a complete split into language groups was impossible due to multi-lingual areas and language-exclaves) adopted the name « German Austria » (« Deutschösterreich ») in hope for union with the Germany. Union with Germany and the name « German Austria » was forbidden by the Treaty of Saint-Germain and the name had to be changed back to Austria.

It was in the post-WWI period that the Austrian-born Adolf Hitler, under the influence of the stab-in-the-back myth, 1st took-up German nationalist ideas in his « Mein Kampf » . Hitler met Heinrich Class, in 1918, and Class provided Hitler with support for the 1923 « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » . Hitler and his National-Socialist friends shared most of the basic pan-German visions with the Pan-German League but, nonetheless, differences in political style led the 2 groups to open rivalry. The German Workers Party of Bohemia cut its ties to the pan-German movement, which was seen as being too dominated by the upper-classes, and joined forces with the German Workers Party led by Anton Drexler, which later became the National-Socialist German Workers Party (Nazi Party) that was to be headed by Adolf Hitler, from 1921.

Nazi propaganda also used the political slogan « Ein Volk, ein Reich, ein Führer » (One people, one « Reich » , one leader) , in order to enforce pan-German sentiment in Austria for the « Anschluß » .

The « Heim ins Reich » initiative (literally : Home into the Empire, meaning Back to the « Reich ») was a policy pursued by the Nazis which attempted to convince the ethnic Germans living outside of the 3rd « Reich » (such as in Austria and the « Sudetenland ») that they should strive to bring these regions « home » into a Greater Germany. This notion also led the way for an even more expansive State to be envisioned, the Greater Germanic « Reich » , which Nazi Germany tried to establish. This pan-Germanic Empire was expected to assimilate practically all of Germanic Europe into an enormously expanded Greater Germanic « Reich » . Territorially speaking, this encompassed the already-enlarged « Reich » itself (consisting of pre-1938 Germany plus the areas annexed into the « Großdeutsche Reich ») , the Netherlands ; Belgium ; areas in north-eastern France considered to be, historically and ethnically, Germanic ; Denmark ; Norway ; Sweden ; Iceland ; at least, the German-speaking parts of Switzerland ; and Liechtenstein. The most notable exception was the predominantly Anglo-Saxon United Kingdom, which was not projected as having to be reduced to a German province but to, instead, become an allied seafaring partner of the Germans.

The eastern « Reichskommissariats » in the vast stretches of Ukraine and Russia were also intended for future integration, with plans for them stretching to the Volga or even beyond the Urals. They were deemed of vital interest for the survival of the German nation, as it was a core tenet of National-Socialist ideology that it needed « living space » (« Lebensraum ») , creating a « pull towards the East » (« Drang nach Osten ») where that could be found and colonized, in a model that the Nazis explicitly derived from the American Manifest Destiny in the Far-West and its clearing of native inhabitants.

World War II brought about the decline of Pan-Germanism, much as World War I had led to the demise of Pan-Slavism. Parts of Germany itself were devastated, and the country was divided, Istly into Soviet, French, American, and British zones and, then, into West Germany and East Germany. To add to the disaster, Germany suffered even larger territorial losses than it did in the 1st World War, with huge portions of Eastern Germany directly annexed by the Soviet Union and Poland. The scale of the Germans' defeat was unprecedented. Pan-Germanism became almost taboo because it had been tied so blatantly and self-destructively to racist concepts of the « Master race » and « Untermenschen » (sub-humans) by the Nazis. Indeed, racist terms such as « Volksdeutscher » , in reference to ethnic Germans in other countries manipulated by the Nazis during World War II, later developed into a mild epithet among Hungarians. However, reunification of Germany, in 1990, revived the old debates, and those who advocate a « Greater Germany » today are often labeled Fascist and / or neo-Nazi.

Le jeune Hitler : des provinces à la capitale

Adolf Hitler est né le 20 avril 1889 à Braunau-am-Inn, en Haute-Autriche, dans l'Empire austro-hongrois. Il est le 4e d'une fratrie de 5, d'une famille qui n'est pas allemande mais autrichienne.

Son père, Alois Hitler, est un fonctionnaire des douanes qui vit dans le confort. Il a épousé en 3es noces sa cousine Klara, plus jeune que lui de 22 ans.

Adolf jouit d'une enfance heureuse si ce n'est que son père veut le diriger vers la fonction publique tandis que lui souhaiterait s'épanouir dans les Beaux-arts (peinture ou architecture) .

Adolf connaît des années heureuses, parsemées de flâneries et de rêveries.

Le père d'Adolf Hitler meurt d'une hémorragie cérébrale en 1903, à l'âge de 65 ans. Sa veuve s'installe alors à Linz, au nord de l'Autriche avec ses 2 enfants survivants : Adolf (13 ans) et Paula (7 ans) .

La scolarité du jeune homme se révèle moyenne.

Impatient de se lancer dans l'art, il quitte le domicile maternel en 1907, à dix-huit ans, et gagne la capitale de l'empire, Vienne.

Le 3 octobre 1908, il subit son deuxième échec à l'examen d'entrée à l'École des Beaux-Arts de Vienne. Trois mois plus tard, le 21 décembre 1908, sa mère meurt. Les années qui suivent seront les plus pénibles de sa jeunesse.

Grâce aux quelques économies laissées par son père, le jeune homme mène une vie oisive et dilapide rapidement cette petite fortune. Il fréquente les théâtres, découvre la musique de Wagner, se passionne pour l'architecture et pratique de petits gagne-pains.

Sans le sou, il découvre la misère et les refuges pour sans-abri. Clochardisé, sans amis, il rumine sa haine de la bourgeoisie viennoise, joyeuse et prospère.

Ses loisirs se passent dans la lecture de livres de vulgarisation qui exaltent la nation germanique. Il vivote en vendant des tableaux (vues) de Vienne.

C'est ici que se forge son antisémitisme par ses lectures et ses rares fréquentations.

En 1912, il s'établit à Munich.

...

« Hitler » est une variante de « Hüttler » , de l'allemand « Hüttle » signifiant « petite cabane » (peut avoir désigné un homme vivant près d'une cabane ; en Bavière, désignait un charpentier) .

Les sources traitant des Ires années d'Adolf Hitler sont « extrêmement lacunaires et subjectives » . Les fonds d'archives, les témoins et Hitler lui-même donnent des interprétations très différentes de cette période qui s'étale de 1889 à 1919. De nombreux historiens se sont même penchés sur la possibilité d'une origine juive de Hitler, en concluant néanmoins la plupart du temps à de simples rumeurs infondées.

Adolf Hitler naît le 20 avril 1889, à 18h30, à Braunau am Inn, une petite ville de Haute-Autriche près de la frontière austro-allemande ; il est baptisé 2 jours plus tard à l'église de Braunau. Il est le 4e enfant d'Aloïs Hitler (1837-1903) et de Klara Pözl (1860-1907) . Ses parents, unis par le mariage depuis le 6 janvier 1885, sont originaires de la région rurale du Waldviertel, pauvre et frontalière de la Bohême.

En 1894, la famille Hitler déménage à Passau, du côté allemand de la frontière. L'an plus tard, Aloïs prend sa retraite et achète une petite ferme à Fischlham, près de Lambach, pour se consacrer à l'apiculture.

Adolf fait son entrée à l'école du village, le 2 mai 1895. Son Maître d'école, Karl Mittermaier, témoigne :

« Je me souviens combien ses affaires de classe étaient toujours rangées dans un ordre exemplaire. »

Au cours de l'été 1897, le patriarche décide de revendre sa ferme et installe sa famille à Lambach. Adolf devient élève au monastère du village où ses résultats restent bons. Il y devient enfant de chœur. En novembre 1898, Aloïs acquiert dans le village de Leonding, une maison à proximité de l'église et du cimetière. Selon des témoins de l'époque, Adolf est un enfant qui aime le grand-air et jouer aux Cowboys et aux Indiens comme de nombreux enfants de son âge. Sa sœur Paula déclarera à ce sujet :

« Quand on jouait aux Indiens, Adolf faisait toujours le chef. Tous ses camarades devaient obéir à ses ordres. Ils devaient sentir que sa volonté était la plus forte. »

À l'âge de 11 ans, en septembre 1900, Aloïs Hitler inscrit son fils à la « Realschule » de Linz, située à 4 kilomètres au nord-est de Leonding. C'est alors que ses résultats scolaires s'effondrent. Il finit par redoubler, le conflit entre Adolf et son père devient inévitable. En effet, le père veut que son fils devienne fonctionnaire comme lui alors que le jeune garçon souhaite devenir artiste-peintre.

« Pour la 1re fois de ma vie, je pris place dans l'opposition. Aussi obstiné que put l'être mon père pour réaliser les plans qu'il avait conçus, son fils ne fut pas moins résolu à refuser une idée dont il n'attendait rien. Je ne voulais pas être fonctionnaire. Ni discours, ni sévères représentations ne purent réduire cette résistance. Je ne serai pas fonctionnaire, non, et encore non ! »

(Adolf Hitler, « Mein Kampf » , 1925.)

Le 3 janvier 1903, Aloïs Hitler succombe à une crise cardiaque, un verre de vin à la main, à la brasserie Wiesinger, à Leonding. C'est un véritable tournant dans la vie du jeune Hitler. Mais les spécialistes sont divisés sur le sentiment d'Adolf Hitler vis-à-vis du décès de son père.

Klara, devenue veuve, devient de fait la tutrice d'Adolf et de Paula Hitler, âgés respectivement de 14 et 7 ans. Elle reçoit une aide de l'État de 600 Couronnes et, mensuellement, la moitié de la pension de son défunt mari (soit 100 Couronnes) , puis 20 Couronnes par enfant scolarisé. Son fils porte toujours la photographie de sa mère sur lui. Au printemps de 1903, Klara place Adolf en pension à Linz afin qu'il réussisse dans ses études. Léopold Pötsch, son professeur d'histoire, est un partisan du pan-germanisme mais aucun document ne peut attester un militantisme nationaliste de la part d'Adolf Hitler, à cette époque. En revanche, il baigne dans une société autrichienne d'esprit pan-germaniste. Voici le portrait du collégien Hitler qu'en brosse son professeur principal lors du procès du « “ Putsch ” de la Brasserie » , en 1923 :

« Il était incontestablement doué, quoique d'un caractère buté. Il avait du mal à se maîtriser, ou passait du moins pour un récalcitrant, autoritaire, voulant toujours avoir le dernier mot, irascible, et il lui était visiblement difficile de se plier au cadre d'une école. Il n'était pas non plus travailleur car, sinon, il aurait dû parvenir à des résultats bien meilleurs. Hitler n'était pas simplement un dessinateur qui avait un beau brin de crayon, mais il était capable aussi, à l'occasion, de se distinguer dans les matières scientifiques. »

(Eduard Hümer, 1923.)

À la rentrée scolaire de l'année 1904, pour une raison obscure, Hitler quitte l'école de Linz pour l'établissement de Steyr, à 45 kilomètres de là. Ses résultats scolaires ne s'améliorent pas et il ne termine pas sa 3e. Il prétexte une mauvaise santé, simulée ou exagérée, et finit par abandonner définitivement l'école. De ces années 1904-1905, le seul document authentique connu est un portrait de Hitler fait par son camarade Sturmlechner. On y distingue « un visage maigre d'adolescent avec un duvet de moustache et l'air rêveur » .

La politique antisémite de Karl Lueger, alors maire de Vienne, influença le jeune Hitler.

Au cours de l'été de 1905, Klara Hitler vend la maison de Leonding pour s'installer, en famille, dans un appartement loué dans le centre de Linz au numéro 31 de la « Humboldtstraße » . Adolf reçoit de l'argent de poche de sa tante Johanna qu'il utilise pour le cinéma et le théâtre. Il y rencontre, en novembre 1905, un apprenti tapissier : August Kubizek, passionné de musique. À en croire son ami, bien que sans emploi, Hitler se comporte en véritable « dandy » : fine moustache, manteau et chapeau noirs et canne au pommeau d'ivoire. Il boit de l'alcool, fume beaucoup et adhère à l'Association des Amis du musée de Linz. En mai 1906, sa mère lui offre un séjour à Vienne où il assiste à 2 Opéras de Richard Wagner : « Tristan und Isolde » « Der fliegende Holländer » . Il contemple la capitale Impériale qui, à la fois, le fascine et le met mal à l'aise : l'Empereur Franz-Josef représente à ses yeux le symbole du vieillissement de l'Empire. Il finit par revenir à Linz, début-juin. Ses discussions avec Kubizek lui donnent envie de devenir compositeur ; il convainc sa mère d'entamer des études de musique avant d'abandonner rapidement.

En janvier 1907, le médecin de famille, le docteur Eduard Bloch, examine Klara et diagnostique une tumeur à un sein qui est opérée à temps. Diminuée physiquement, Klara déménage de son appartement pour un logement à l'extérieur de Linz, à Urfahr. Adolf possède sa propre chambre tandis que Klara, Paula et Johanna, la tante d'Hitler, se partagent les 2 autres pièces. Durant l'automne, il décide enfin de se présenter à l'examen d'entrée de l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Vienne ; sa mère cède à contre-cœur. Hitler est refusé ; son travail est jugé « insuffisant » .

« J'étais si persuadé du succès que l'annonce de mon échec me frappa comme un coup de foudre dans un ciel clair. »

(Adolf Hitler, « Mein Kampf » , 1925.)

En octobre, le docteur Bloch déclare solennellement à la famille Hitler que l'état de Klara est irréversible : sa dernière volonté est de reposer aux côtés de son mari, Aloïs, à Leonding. Elle meurt le 21 décembre 1907, à 2 heures du matin.

Selon le docteur Bloch :

« Klara Hitler était une femme simple, modeste et pleine de bonté. Grande, elle avait des cheveux bruns soigneusement tressés et un long visage ovale avec de beaux yeux gris-bleu expressifs. Jamais je n'ai vu quiconque aussi terrassé par le chagrin qu'Adolf Hitler. »

(Eduard Bloch, médecin de la famille de Hitler.)

Lorsqu'il était revenu à Linz, au chevet de sa mère mourante, il n'avait pas osé lui avouer son échec à l'École des Beaux-arts. Âgé de 19 ans, Adolf Hitler est désormais un jeune homme mesurant 1,72 mètres et pesant 68 kilos. Entêté, il décide qu'il sera artiste-peintre ou architecte et retente l'examen d'entrée à Vienne. Apparemment, Hitler n'est pas, à cette époque, vraiment un nationaliste fanatique comme il le prétend dans « Mein Kampf ». En effet, pourquoi rejoindre une ville cosmopolite comme Vienne, aux nombreuses nationalités, plutôt que de rejoindre directement l'Allemagne ? Vienne représente, à ses yeux, un défi, une porte vers une ascension sociale. Hitler est subjugué par les représentations du chef d'orchestre Felix Weingartner, puis de Gustav Mahler à l'Opéra. Depuis 1897, Vienne est dirigée par Karl Lueger (1844-1910) , le fondateur du Parti Chrétien-Social. Le maire est violemment antisémite et rassemble une bonne partie de l'électorat catholique. Il favorise néanmoins le rayonnement de la ville : représentations musicales de Richard Strauß, picturales de Paul Gauguin et Gustav Klimt, littéraires avec Arthur Schnitzler, etc.

Au cours du printemps de 1908, August Kubizek rejoint Hitler à Vienne où il loue un piano à queue pour parfaire ses gammes. Selon son témoignage, Hitler se prive régulièrement de nourriture afin de se rendre plusieurs fois au Théâtre ou à l'Opéra. Il prétend également qu'Hitler ne s'intéresse guère aux filles, exceptée une jeune bourgeoise prénommée Stéphanie. Appelé par le service militaire, le musicien rentre à Linz, en juillet. Durant l'été, Hitler rompt les liens à la fois avec Kubizek et avec le reste de sa famille résidant à Spital. En octobre 1908, l'École des Beaux-arts recense 96 élèves dont Adolf Hitler qui « n'a pas été autorisé à passer l'épreuve ». Non pas qu'il soit mauvais dessinateur mais parce qu'il ne travaille pas assez, il est incapable de se soumettre à une discipline. Il déménage en août 1909, rue Felbert, puis rue Sechshauser et, enfin, rue Simon-Denk. Faute d'argent il est mis à la rue.

Les registres de police de Vienne indiquent qu'à partir du 8 février 1910, Hitler est domicilié dans un foyer pour hommes au numéro 27 de la rue Meldermann. Grâce à Reinhold Hanisch, un jeune homme de 5 ans son aîné, rencontré quelques mois plus tôt dans un foyer d'accueil pour sans-abris, il gagne un peu d'argent en déblayant la neige ou en portant les valises des voyageurs encombrés de la gare de l'Ouest (« Westbahnhof »). La nourriture se limite à une soupe le matin, et à un croûton de pain le soir. Selon « Mein Kampf », il aurait été manœuvre et aide-maçon mais aucun document ne le prouve. Certains témoins (dont Hanisch) insistent sur l'oisiveté d'Hitler qui refuse de travailler. Grâce aux 50 Couronnes envoyées par sa tante Johanna, il fait l'acquisition du matériel d'artiste-peintre : Hanisch se charge de vendre les peintures de Hitler en format de carte postale. Le 4 mai 1911, Angela Raubal réclame au tribunal de Linz la pension de Hitler afin d'élever dignement Paula, ce qu'il doit accepter malgré lui.

Après avoir touché le fond au cours de l'hiver 1909, le marginal Hitler vit toujours, en 1912, de ses peintures vendues sur la rue.

Selon Jacob Altenberg, l'un de ses marchands d'art juifs :

« Il avait pris l'habitude de se raser, il se faisait régulièrement les cheveux et portait des vêtements qui, pour être vieux et usés, n'en étaient pas moins propres. »

Hitler participe aux débats politiques qui éclatent dans le foyer. 2 sujets le mettent hors de lui : le Parti Social-Démocrate au pouvoir, et la Maison de Habsbourg-Lorraine. Aucun témoin ne fait état de propos antisémites de sa part. Selon « Mein Kampf », il serait devenu antisémite à son arrivée à Vienne :

« Un jour où je traversais la vieille ville, je rencontrais tout à coup un personnage en long caftan avec des boucles de cheveux noirs. Est-ce là aussi un Juif ? Telle fut ma 1^{re} pensée. À Linz, ils n'avaient pas cet aspect-là. »

(Adolf Hitler, « Mein Kampf », 1925.)

Or, les autres sources ne confirment pas cet état des choses. Kubizek affirme que son ami était déjà « farouchement antisémite » en arrivant à Vienne. Pourtant, de nombreuses anecdotes qu'il rapporte sont clairement douteuses.

Selon Reinhold Hanisch :

« À cette époque, Hitler n'était aucunement antisémite. Il l'est devenu plus tard. »

Il insiste sur son amitié avec Joseph Neumann, un jeune Juif rencontré à Vienne, au foyer pour hommes de la rue Meldermann. Kershaw doute de la véracité des dires de Hanisch.

Outre des brochures antisémites, Hitler lit alors très probablement la revue « Ostara » de Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels :

Selon Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke :

« L'hypothèse d'une influence idéologique de Lanz sur Hitler peut être acceptée. »

Ce dernier aurait « assimilé l'essentiel de l'aryosophie de Lanz : le désir d'une théocratie aryenne prenant la forme d'une dictature de droit divin des Germains aux cheveux blonds et aux yeux bleus sur les races inférieures ; la croyance dans une conspiration, continue à travers l'histoire, de ces dernières contre les héroïques Germains, et l'attente d'une apocalypse dont serait issu un millénium consacrant la suprématie mondiale des Aryens » .

Ian Kershaw, pour sa part, penche également en faveur de la présence de la revue parmi les lectures courantes d'Hitler à cette époque, mais conclut plus prudemment sur la nature précise de l'influence de Lanz sur ses convictions. Par ailleurs, il est en revanche improbable qu'Hitler ait connu alors l'aryosophe Guido von List et, s'il a pu être attiré par les aspects politiques de la pensée de List les plus similaires à celle de Lanz, il n'a jamais manifesté d'intérêt pour ses théories occultistes.

Au printemps de 1913, Adolf Hitler caresse l'espoir d'aller étudier à l'Académie de Munich. Pour ses 24 ans, il attend la perception de son héritage paternel (819 Couronnes) . De plus, ayant omis de s'inscrire en 1909 pour effectuer son service militaire, il pense à présent que l'administration autrichienne l'a oublié et qu'il peut passer la frontière tranquillement. Le 24 mai, habillé correctement, portant une valise et accompagné d'un homme, le commis Rudolf Häusler, il quitte le foyer pour la gare. En plus d'être une ville d'art, Munich lui paraît familière car proche de sa région natale. Arrivés sur place, Häusler et Hitler louent une chambre au numéro 34 de la rue Schleissheim. Häusler montre ses papiers autrichiens, Hitler se déclare apatride.

En janvier 1914, Hitler reçoit l'ordre de se rendre au consulat d'Autriche dans les plus brefs délais pour rendre compte de sa désertion. Il explique qu'il se serait présenté à l'Hôtel-de-ville de Vienne où il s'est fait enregistrer mais la convocation ne serait jamais arrivée. Qui plus est, il a peu de ressources et est affaibli par une infection. Le Consul croit en sa bonne foi et, le 5 février, Hitler est définitivement ajourné devant la Commission militaire de Salzbourg. Pendant longtemps, la présence d'Häusler aux côtés d'Hitler à Munich sera gommée, car il est l'un des rares témoins à connaître le rappel à l'ordre de l'armée autrichienne à Adolf Hitler qui n'a toujours pas fait son service militaire. Hitler ne souhaitait pas dévoiler cet épisode embarrassant. En réalité, il avait fui l'Autriche en refusant de porter les armes pour les Habsbourg.

Comme à Vienne, Hitler vit de ses peintures. Il aime reproduire l'Hôtel-de-ville, des rues, des brasseries, des magasins. Il vend chaque tableau entre 5 et 20 Marks, soit une centaine de Marks par mois. Dans « Mein Kampf », Hitler déclare avoir beaucoup lu et appris en politique à cette époque, mais aucun document ne le prouve. Peut-être fréquente-t-il les bars et les brasseries où il discute de politique.

Le 28 juin 1914, l'archiduc François-Ferdinand, l'héritier du trône Austro-Hongrois, est assassiné à Sarajevo par un étudiant serbe. Le 31 juillet, la mobilisation générale est proclamée à Berlin. Le Roi de Bavière, Louis III, envoie un télégramme à Guillaume II pour l'assurer de son soutien militaire.

Le 2 août 1914, au lendemain de la déclaration de guerre du « Kaiser », des milliers de Munichois se pressent sur l'« Odeonsplatz » pour applaudir le Roi de Bavière. Une photographie immortalise l'événement et Hitler y figure. Dans « Mein Kampf », il se déclare heureux de partir en guerre. C'est pourtant oublier qu'il a tenté de se dérober à l'armée autrichienne, quelques années plus tôt. D'après son livret militaire, il ne se serait présenté que le 5 août au bureau de recrutement. Il est définitivement incorporé le 16 août comme « volontaire » dans le 1er bataillon du 2e régiment d'infanterie de l'armée bavaroise (régiment « List », du nom du général qui le commandait). Le départ du 16e régiment bavarois pour le front, dans lequel il vient d'être incorporé, est fixé au 8 octobre. Le train atteint la frontière belge le 22 octobre, puis arrive à Lille le 23.

Le soldat Hitler connaît son baptême du feu le 28 octobre 1914, près d'Ypres. Au 1er novembre, son bataillon est décimé : sur 3,600 hommes, 611 seulement restent opérationnels. Pour récompenser son courage, Hitler est proposé par l'adjudant Gutmann à la décoration de la Croix de fer. Il a la position d'estafette auprès de l'état-major de son régiment : il va chercher les ordres des officiers pour les transmettre aux bataillons. En période de calme relatif, l'estafette Hitler sillonne la campagne des environs de Fournes pour peindre des aquarelles. Durant toute la durée de la guerre, Hitler n'est resté qu'au grade de caporal. Réputé pour son caractère difficile, il est néanmoins apprécié de ses camarades. Lui proposer de « coucher avec des Françaises » le met hors de lui, puisque « contraire à l'honneur allemand ». Il ne fume pas, il ne boit pas, il ne fréquente pas le bordel. Le soldat Hitler s'isole pour réfléchir ou lire. Les quelques photographies connues de cette période présentent un homme pâle, moustachu, maigre souvent à l'écart du groupe. Son véritable compagnon est son chien, « Foxl » et, un jour, il s'angoisse à l'idée de ne pas le retrouver :

« Le salaud qui me l'a enlevé ne sait pas ce qu'il m'a fait. »

Hitler est un véritable guerrier fanatique, aucune fraternité, aucun défaitisme ne doit être toléré. Il écrit :

« Chacun d'entre nous n'a qu'un seul désir, celui d'en découdre définitivement avec la bande, d'en arriver à l'épreuve de force, quoi qu'il en coûte, et que ceux d'entre nous qui auront la chance de revoir leur patrie la retrouvent plus propre et purifiée de toute influence étrangère, qu'à travers les sacrifices et les souffrances consentis chaque jour par des centaines de milliers d'entre nous, qu'à travers le fleuve de sang qui coule chaque jour dans notre lutte contre un monde international d'ennemis, non seulement les ennemis extérieurs de l'Allemagne soient écrasés, mais les ennemis intérieurs soient aussi brisés. Cela aurait plus de prix à mes yeux que tous les gains territoriaux. »

(Adolf Hitler, lettre à Ernst Hepp, 5 février 1915.)

The Dream of Linz

One of the last photographs of Adolf Hitler depicts him, shortly before his suicide, as he sits in the bunker of his Chancellery. While the Red Army advanced into the ruins of Berlin outside, he pondered a pompous architectural model of the Upper-Austrian provincial capital of Linz, the gigantic buildings illuminated by a sophisticated arrangement of spotlights : Linz, in the morning sun, at midday, at sunset glow, and at night. « No matter at what time, whether during the day or at night, whenever he had the opportunity during those weeks, he was sitting in front of this model

» , the architect Hermann Giesler reported, saying that Hitler stared at it as if at « a promised land into which we would gain entrance » .

Visitors to whom he showed the model, often at the most unusual hours of the night, were confused and horrified : the man who had reduced Europe to ashes and ruins had clearly lost his sense of reality and hardly noticed how many people were still dying in these last weeks, in his name, and according to his will, as he continued to refuse to capitulate and end the horror.

Hitler dreamed of Linz, his home-town, which he had appointed « the “ Führer ” 's sister city » and had wanted to make the Greater German « Reich » 's cultural capital, the « most beautiful city on the Danube » , the « metropolis » , the petrified glorification of his person and his policies : Linz owes everything it has and is, yet, to obtain to the « Reich » . Therefore, this city must become the carrier of the idea of the « Reich » . Every building in Linz should have the inscription « Gift from the German “ Reich ” » .

On the left bank of the Danube, in « Urfahr » , opposite the old part of town, a Party and administration center had been planned with an assembly area for 100,000 and grounds for celebrations accommodating 30,000 people, an exposition area with a Bismarck monument, and a technical University. According to the plan, a « District center » (with a new city hall, the « Reich » governor's house, the District and Party center, and the Linz community center) was to be built around a national commemorative site : Hitler's parents' tomb, with its steeple, visible from far away, whose chimes were to play (albeit, not every day) a motif from Anton Bruckner's « Romantic » 4th Symphony. This steeple was planned to be higher than that of Vienna's Saint-Stephen's Cathedral. Thus, Hitler said, he was making-up for an old injustice ; for, to the Linzers' vexation, during the construction of the neo-Gothic Linz cathedral, Vienna had reduced the height of the steeple so that the Stephen's Tower would remain the highest steeple in the country. A monument « to the foundation of the Greater German Empire » was to be built too, along with a large stadium. Hitler told the Upper-Danube District director, August Eigruber : The stones for this will be shipped by the Mauthausen concentration camp.

On the opposite side of the Danube, in « Alt-Linz » (the old part of town) , a boulevard was to be built under arcades, « wider than the “ Ring ” Boulevard, in Vienna » . A hotel was to be constructed for more than 2,000 guests, with a direct subway connection to the train station ; there, were also to be built the most modern hospitals and schools, among them an « Adolf Hitler School » , a District music school, and a « Reich » Motor Flying School for the « Luftwaffe » . There were projects for model settlements for workers and artists, 2 homes for SS and SA invalids, new streets, and an access road to the « autobahn » . In order to make Linz rich, Hitler advanced industrialization, bringing steel and chemical factories to Linz. Transforming the farm town into an industrial city was almost the only thing that was actually realized. The « Hermann Göring Factory » still exists as the Væst factory.

The planned cultural center was to have metropolitan proportions, in particular, the Linz art museum, which Hitler mentioned in his last will, the day before his death :

« I collected the paintings in the collections. I have bought, over the years, never for private purposes, but always exclusively for enlarging a gallery in my home-town of Linz, on the Danube. It would be my most fervent wish for this legacy to be realized. »

In fact, money for this project was always available, even when there was a shortage of foreign currency during the War. From April 1943 to March 1944 alone, Hitler purchased 881 works of art, among them 395 Dutch pieces from the 17th and 18th Centuries. By the end of June 1944, the museum had cost 92.6 million « Reichsmark ». Josef Goebbels wrote in his diary :

« Linz costs us a lot of money. But it means so much to the “ Führer ”. And it probably is good too to support Linz as a cultural competitor to Vienna. For, as Hitler remarked emphatically : “ I won't give Vienna a pfennig, and the ' Reich ' won't give it anything either ”. »

The most distinguished pieces for the Linz museum were requisitioned from private galleries, museums, and churches in the parts of Europe Hitler's army had occupied (for example, the « Veit Stoss Altar », in Cracow, or the « Van Eyck Altar », in the cathedral of Ghent) . Hitler derived particular satisfaction from transferring holdings from Vienna, for example from such « un-German » Viennese collections as those of Baron Nathaniel Rothschild. The formerly Imperial Art History Museum also gave pieces to Linz, which, as Hitler remarked, in 1942, his dear Viennese didn't like at all ; his dear Viennese, whom he knows so well after all, were so stodgy that when he was looking at some of the requisitioned Rembrandts, they tried to let him know, in their genial way, that all genuine paintings should really remain in Vienna, but that they would be glad to let galleries in Linz or Innsbruck have paintings by anonymous Masters. When he decided differently, it hit the Viennese between the eyes.

Hitler planned to spend his retirement on Mount-Frein above the old part of town, in a building modeled after an Upper-Austrian farm :

« I climbed these rocks when I was young. On this hilltop, looking over the Danube, I daydreamed. This is where I want to live when I'm old. And : I won't take anyone along except Miss Braun ; Miss Braun and my dog. »

Albert Speer (after 1945, to be sure) ironically characterized Hitler's exaggerated love for Vienna as a « provincial mentality », adding that :

« Hitler always remained one of the small-town people, an insecure stranger in the large metropolises. While he was almost obsessively thinking and planning in huge proportions, it was in a town like Linz, where he had gone to school and where everything was on a manageable scale, that he felt at home socially. »

The nature of this love, Speer claimed, was « one of escape » .

Yet, the point here is a lot more than the contrast between province and capital : it is the nationally homogenous, « German » Linz, on the one side, and multi-national Vienna, on the other. Furthermore, Hitler experienced the rural character of the provincial town as honest and rooted in the soil compared to the sophisticated, intellectual, and self-confident metropolis. Thus Goebbels, functioning as his Master's mouthpiece, remarked after a visit to Linz :

« Genuine German men. Not Viennese scoundrels. »

From a biographical perspective, Linz represented for Hitler the backdrop for an orderly, clean, « petit-bourgeois » time of his youth, which he spent with his beloved mother, whereas Vienna was witness to lonely, unsuccessful, and wretched years. However, most important from a political angle was Hitler's goal to dethrone the Hapsburg Empire's old capital and to subjugate it to the German capital of Berlin. Vienna, he said, exuded a huge, even gigantic fluidum. Therefore, it was a tremendous task to break Vienna's cultural preponderance in the Alpine and Danube districts.

Complicated Family Relations

Linz, Upper-Austria's rural capital, episcopal see, and educational center, situated in a bright landscape on the right bank of the Danube, had almost 68,000 inhabitants at the time of Hitler's youth, and thus (after Vienna, Prague, Trieste, Lemberg, Graz, Brünn, Cracaw, Pilsen, and Czernowitz) , was the 10th largest city in Cisleithania, as the western part of the Dual Monarchy was called.

Although he called it his « home-town » , Hitler lived in Linz only a short while, from ages 16 to 18, 1905 until February 1908. Until then, his life as the son of Austrian customs officer, Alois Hitler, had been unsteady. The border town of Braunau on the Inn, where he was born on April 20, 1889, and which he left when he was 3 years old, did not gain any significance until later, when Hitler could interpret it as fate :

« For this little town lies on the boundary between 2 German States which we, of the younger generation at least, have made it our life work to reunite by every means at our disposal. »

Family relations were complicated. Adolf was the product of his father's 3rd marriage, to Klara « née » Pölzl, who was 23 years her husband's junior. Adolf, his mother's 4th child, was the 1st one to survive. In the household were also 2 half-siblings from the father's 2nd marriage, Alois Junior, born in 1882 ; and Angela, born in 1883. In addition, there was « Haniaunt » , Johanna Pölzl, mother's hunchbacked and apparently feeble-minded sister, who helped with the household chores.

Family life was not peaceful : the father had fits of rage and battered his oldest son, Alois, who in turn was jealous of Adolf, pampered by his young mother. The half-brother remarked about Adolf :

« He was spoiled from early in the morning until late at night, and the step-children had to listen to endless stories about how wonderful Adolf was. »

But Adolf, too, was beaten by his father. According to Alois Junior, once Alois was even afraid he had killed Adolf.

Between 1892 and 1895 Alois went to work in Passau, on the German side of the border, during which time the 3 to 6 year old boy acquired his peculiar Bavarian accent :

« The German of my youth was the dialect of Lower-Bavaria. I could neither forget it, nor learn the Viennese jargon. »

In 1895, the 58 year old Alois Hitler retired after 40 years of service. He bought a remote Estate in the hamlet of Hafeld, in the community of Fischlham, near Lambach in Upper-Austria, to try to make a living as a farmer and bee-keeper. His son recalled, in 1942 :

« Bee stings were as normal as anything at home. Mother often took 45, 55 stings out of my old man when he returned from emptying the honeycombs. His father, he said, had protected himself against the bees only by smoking. »

After a fierce fight with his father, 14 year old Alois Junior left the home in Hafeld and was disinherited. 13 year old Angela, Adolf, and Edmund, born in 1894, remained at home. In 1896, Paula, the youngest child of the family, was born.

In May 1895, 6 year old Adolf entered the 1 room village school of Fischlham, which had 1 class. Hitler recalled :

« From the small ante-chamber, I used to listen, while I was in the lowest-grade, to what the pupils of the 2nd grade were doing, and later on, the pupils of the 3rd and 4th grades. Thank God, I left there. Otherwise, I would have had to go to the last grade for 2 or 3 years. »

Because the rundown farm could not be managed on a civil servant's pension and Alois's abilities as a farmer were insufficient, he sold the Estate, in 1897. The family moved into temporary quarters in the town of Lambach. Now, the 8 year old entered grade school in Lambach and, for a short time, also joined the Benedictine boys' choir school. There, he said, he had an excellent opportunity to intoxicate myself with the solemn splendor of the brilliant church Festivals. What, with all his criticism of the church, even later, Hitler would praise it for wonderfully exercising man's natural need for something super-natural. It had, he said, known how to work on people with its mystical cult, its large sublime cathedrals, with blessed music, solemn rites, and incense.

The Hitler family was not pious. Only Klara went to Sunday Mass, regularly. The anti-clerical father kept his distance and at most accompanied his family to services on holidays and on the Emperor's birthday, on August 18. For that was the only opportunity where he could don and display his civil servant's uniform, which the rest of the year hung in the closet unused.

At the end of 1898, the family moved to the village of Leonding, south of Linz where, for 7,700 Kronen, Alois Hitler acquired a small house next to the cemetery. In 1938, Josef Goebbels said about his visit to this place, which had become « the entire German people's place of honour » :

« Quite tiny and primitive. I am led to the room which was his realm. Small and low-ceilinged. This is where he designed plans and dreamed of the future. Then, there's the kitchen, where his good mother used to cook. Behind that, the garden, where little Adolf picked apples and pears at night. So, this is where a genius developed. I'm beginning to feel quite sublime and solemn. »

The 9 year old entered the village school in Leonding, where he was a happy rogue and saw himself as a young scamp :

« Even as a boy, I was no “ pacifist ”, and all attempts to educate me, in this direction, came to nothing. »

One of his schoolmates from Leonding, later Abbot Balduin of Wilhering, recalled and, by no means, unkindly :

« Playing war, always nothing but playing war. Even we, kids, found that boring after a while, but he always found some children, particularly among the younger ones, who would play with him. »

Otherwise, young Hitler practiced his « favourite sport » : shooting at rats with his hand-gun, in the cemetery next to his parents' house.

Around 1900, the Boer War, when the southern African Boer Republics tried to fight-off their English conquerors, excited many Austrians. The German nationalists firmly endorsed, even enthusiastically welcomed, « David's fight against Goliath » , the « poor farmers' freedom fight » against British Imperialism. Signatures and money were collected in support of the Boers. Boer marches and Boer songs were composed. Boer bats, herrings, and sausages (still popular in Vienna) became fashionable.

For young Hitler, the Boer War was « bonafide » summer lightning :

« Every day, I waited impatiently for the newspapers and devoured dispatches and news reports, happy at the privilege of witnessing this heroic struggle, even at a distance. The boys now preferred the game “ Boers against the English ”, with no one wanting to be an Englishman and everybody wanting to be a Boer. »

As late as 1923, Hitler would say :

« On the side of the Boers, the just will to liberty ; on the side of England, greed for money and diamonds. »

In 1900, 6 year old brother Edmund died in Leonding of the measles, and 11 year old Adolf was left the only son of the family. The difficulties with his father began to increase. Hitler's schoolmates described him as « hardly an engaging person, neither in his external appearance nor in his character » :

« Old Mr. Alois demanded absolute obedience. Frequently, he put 2 fingers in his mouth, let out a piercing whistle, and Adolf, no matter where he may have been, would quickly rush to his father. He often berated him, and Adolf suffered greatly from his father's harshness. Adolf liked to read, but the old man was a spendthrift and didn't hand-out any money for books. »

Alois Hitler's only book is said to have been a volume on the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-1871 :

« Adolf liked looking at the pictures in that book and was a Bismarck enthusiast. »

In « Mein Kampf » , however, Hitler himself mentions his father's library.

All witnesses portray Klara Hitler as a calm, loving mother and good housewife. A female fellow pupil from Leonding who passed the Hitlers' house daily remembers (after 1945, to be sure) that, when little Paula left for school, Klara would always walk her « to the fence door and gave her a kiss ; I noticed that because that was not what typically happened to us farm girls, but I liked it a lot, I almost envied Paula a little » .

Alois determined that his son should become a civil servant. After Adolf had had 5 years of grade school, in fall of 1900, Alois sent him to high-school (« Realschule » , a lower-level « Gymnasium ») in Linz, an hour's walk from Leonding. The 11 year old who, every day, had to switch from the roughness of country life to the strictness of the small-town school, could not adapt and did not do well. In his 1st year, he earned « unsatisfactory » marks in mathematics and natural history, and was kept back. In addition, according to school records, every year, he received a reprimand, alternately in general conduct and homework. Still, his tuition was waived, which indicates that his family was indigent.

In 1924, the well-meaning French teacher Doctor Hümer said of his former pupil :

« He was decidedly gifted, if one-sided, but had difficulty controlling his temper. He was considered intractable and willful, always had to be right and easily flew-off the handle, and he clearly found it difficult to accommodate himself to the limits of a school. He demanded “ unconditional subordination from his schoolmates ”, had enjoyed “ the role of the leader ”, and apparently had been “ influenced by Karl May stories and tales about Red Indians ”. »

Later, Hitler would frequently enjoy talking about his favourite author, Karl May :

« I read him by candlelight and with a large magnifying glass at moonlight. He thanked May for introducing me to geography. In 1943, he proudly showed his companions the “ Hotel Roter Krebs ”, in Linz, where the revered writer stayed in 1901, for a length of time. »

Young Hitler made no effort at advancing in school. According to a schoolmate, Klara frequently had to go to school « to check on him » . In « Mein Kampf » , Hitler states that he deliberately did not apply himself in school so that he would not have to become a civil servant. Later, he would criticize those parents who prematurely determine their children's careers, and then, if something goes wrong, start talking about their prodigal or ill-bred son. His father had dragged him at the age of 13 into Linz's main customs office, a genuine State cage where those old men had sat on top of one another, like monkeys. Thus, he had learned to deplore thoroughly the career of a civil servant.

His relationship with his father was coming to a head. His sister Paula remembered :

« Every night, Adolf got a thrashing because he came home late. »

Hitler summarized that period as follows :

« I was forced into opposition, for the 1st time in my life. Hard and determined as father might be in putting through plans and purposes once conceived, his son was just as persistent and recalcitrant in rejecting an idea which appealed to him not at all, or in any case very little. »

Among friends, Hitler would later paint a negative picture of his father. An entry in Josef Gœbbels's diary reads :

« Hitler suffered almost the same youth as I did. Father, a domestic tyrant, mother, a source of kindness and love. »

Supposedly, Hitler was to tell his lawyer Hans Frank that even, as a 10 to 12 year old, he had to take his drunk father home from the bar :

« That was the most horrible shame I have ever felt. Oh, Frank, I know what a devil alcohol is ! It really was (via my father) the worst enemy of my youth. »

Having retired, Alois Hitler had nothing to do and distracted himself by going to bars every day. Frequently, he met with the farmer Josef Mayrhofer, with whom he worked for the German nationalists. This might have been one of the « table Societies », those tiny party factions among the circle of family and friends that some German nationalist Parties entertained. Mayrhofer said of Hitler senior :

« He was a curmudgeonly, taciturn old man, a smart libertine, and like all libertines in those days, a staunch German-National, a Pan-German, but still, strangely enough, loyal to the Emperor. »

In Upper-Austria, at that time, it was the governing « Deutsche Volkspartei » (« DVP » : German People's Party) that was libertine, German-national, and loyal to the Emperor. Grown-out of the circle around the extremist German nationalist Georg Schönerer, it had a moderate German-national platform and accepted Jews as members. There is no reason to believe that Hitler misstated the truth in « Mein Kampf » when he said about his father that he had viewed anti-Semitism as cultural backwardness and that he had adopted more or less cosmopolitan views ... despite his pronounced national sentiments.

Politics at School

The atmosphere at the Linz high-school was politically turbulent. Together, « clericalists » and Hapsburg loyalists fought against libertines and German nationalists. Pupils eagerly collected and displayed their colors : while the high-school, students, loyal to the Emperor, collected « black and yellow » ribbons and badges, photographs of the Imperial family, and coffee cups depicting Empress Elizabeth and Emperor Franz-Josef, the German nationalists collected devotional objects such as Otto Bismarck busts made of plaster, beer mugs with inscriptions of heroic maxims about Germany's past, and, above all, ribbons, pencils, and pins with the « greater German » colors of 1848 : black, red, and gold. In « Mein Kampf », Hitler states that he too took part in the struggle of nationalities in old Austria. Collections were taken for the « Südmark » (i.e., Austria viewed as part of the Greater German Empire) and the school association ; we emphasized our convictions by wearing corn-flowers (the emblem of Austria's Pan-Germans) and red, black, and gold colors ; « Heil » was our greeting and, instead of the Imperial anthem, we sang « Deutschland über Alles », despite warnings and punishments.

The German-national associations « Deutscher Schulverein » (German School Association) and « Südmark » (South Mark) sold « defense treasury coupons » to finance the « protection against the Czechization » and the « preservation and spreading of Germandom ». The profits from these collections were used to finance German « kindergartens » and schools in mixed-language areas. The South Mark mainly supported German farmers in linguistic enclaves and also bought land for new settlements. These collections, which involved the entire population, were very popular - and probably served as the model for the National-Socialists' « Winter Relief » .

Cornflowers, the « Heil » greeting, and the colors « black, red, and gold » belonged to the Pan-Germans, those extreme German nationalists under the leadership of Georg Ritter von Schönerer who fought for German Austria's « Anschluß » to the German « Reich ». Thus, in their German nationalism, the high-school students were more radical than their teachers, who, as civil servants, had to remain loyal to the Emperor.

Most teachers at the high-school were German-national in outlook. They incited the youths' enthusiasm « for fighting for German soil at the border to Bohemia » - and, according to a schoolmate, did so doubtless « with pedagogic intent :

« You have to study diligently lest. We, in Austria, lose our leading role and so that you can prove yourselves in the national struggle ! »

Hitler reported something similar about his favourite teacher, Doctor Leopold Pötsch :

« He used our budding nationalistic fanaticism as a means of educating us, frequently appealing to our sense of national honour. By this alone, he was able to discipline us, little ruffians, more easily than would have been possible by any other means. »

Pötsch was Hitler's teacher from 1st through 3rd grade (1901-1904) , in geography ; and in 2nd and 3d grade, in history. He also ran the school library, where Hitler checked-out his books. As a special privilege, Hitler was allowed to bring his teacher maps, which put him in particularly close contact with him. Aside from his service at the school, Pötsch was a sought-after official speaker. He spoke at German-national associations, but also on the occasion of the Emperor's anniversary, in 1908. Thus he was, like Hitler's father, simultaneously German-national and a Hapsburg loyalist, which was in line with his chosen Party : in 1905, he joined the Linz city Council as a representative of the German People's Party.

Pötsch gave popular slide lectures entitled « Images of German History ». In them, he strongly emphasized the Germanic era and the time of the early German Emperors (that is to say, before the Hapsburgs) and proceeded to pinpoint the Germans' « national awakening » up until the Franco-Prussian War :

« Since the great days of the magnificent German victories of the years 1870-1871, we have become increasingly conscious of our Germanic identity and, now, thumb more ardently through the books of German myths, legends, and history. »

In the Hapsburg monarchy, the « Sedan celebrations » in commemoration of Prussia's victory over France were officially prohibited. The students celebrated clandestinely, invariably ending with the « Wacht am Rhein » (Guard on the Rhine) , the Prussian-German battle song against the « archenemy » , France and the German nationalists' anthem. In his speech after the « Anschluß » , in March 1938, Hitler mentioned another song of his youth :

« When these soldiers marched in, I again heard a song of my youth. Once upon a time, I sang it so often with a heart full of belief, that proud battle song :“ Das Volk steht auf, der Sturm bricht los. ” (The people are rising-up, the storm is breaking loose.) . And it was, indeed, the uprising of a people and the breaking loose of a storm. »

The students' actions against « black-yellow » teacher of religion, Schwarz, also clearly had a pan-German twist. Later, Hitler would relate with unabashed pride how, during religious instruction, he had spread pencils before him with the greater German colors black, red, and gold. The teacher said :

« You will immediately get rid of these pencils with those disgusting colors ! »

« Huh ! » , said the whole class.

« Those are the national ideals ! »

« You needn't have any national ideals in your hearts but only one ideal, and that is our fatherland and our house of Hapsburg. He who isn't for the house of Hapsburg isn't for the Church, and he who isn't for the Church, is not for God. Sit down, Hitler ! »

According to Hitler, there had been a generally revolutionary atmosphere at school, an assessment other former schoolmates confirmed.

Another example : When Linz's students were supposed to cheer Emperor Franz-Josef during his annual ride to his summer vacation in Ischl, their teacher found it necessary to advise them :

« You have to yell “ Hoch ! ” I don't want anyone to yell “ Heit ! ” »

« Heil » was the greeting of the German nationalists ; « Hoch » (up) , the shout for the house of Hapsburg.

Later, Hitler liked to emphasize that, on account of their experiences in the multi-national Empire, the German-Austrians had developed a much more alert and progressive form of nationalism than had the « “ Reich ” Germans » , even early on, when they still attended school. In this way, the child received political training in a period when, as a rule, the subject of a so-called national State knew little more of his nationality than its language. At the age of 15, Hitler reported, he had already realized the distinction between dynastic « patriotism » and folkish « nationalism » . At any rate, even at that early age, he clearly joined the camp of the radical « folkish nationalists » , rejecting the multi-national State as did the Schönererians. On this important issue, he thus distinguished himself from his father and his favourite teacher, Pötsch.

It is understandable, then, that Pötsch was annoyed when he, the Austrian patriot, discovered that, in « Mein Kampf » , he received high-praise as a teacher but, at the same time, was denounced as an enemy of Austria. For who could have studied German history under such a teacher without becoming an enemy of the State which, through its ruling house, exerted so disastrous an influence on the destinies of the nation ? And who could retain a loyalty to a dynasty that betrayed the needs of the German people, again and again, for shameless private advantage ?

When, in 1936, some teachers in Linz sent their now famous pupil photos to remind him of them, and they asked Pötsch to join them, he refused, arguing « that he did not agree with Hitler in his defamation of Austria ; he had sworn an official oath for Austria » . However, « the “ Führer ” 's beloved teacher » could no longer protect himself from a national funeral.

Jews and Czechs in Linz

The high-school in Linz apparently had a good reputation, for almost 1/3 of its students came from out of town. 50 pupils were from Lower-Austria, including Vienna ; 21 from Salzburg, Tyrol, Styria, and Carinthia ; another 21 from Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia ; 2 apiece from Galicia and Hungary ; 7 from the German « Reich » ; and 1 each from Italy, France, and Bosnia.

One of the Viennese students, from 1903 until his graduation in 1906, was Ludwig Wittgenstein, the son of the industrialist Karl Wittgenstein. He was only a few days Hitler's junior but, instructed by private tutors, was 2 grades ahead of him. Hitler is bound to have, at least, laid eyes on Wittgenstein for, in Linz, the latter was a conspicuously bizarre fellow : he spoke an unusually pure High-German, albeit with a slight stutter, wore very elegant clothes, and was highly-sensitive and extremely unsociable. It was one of his idiosyncracies to use the formal form of address with his schoolmates and to demand that they too (with the exception of a single friend) address him formally, with : « Sie » and « Herr Ludwig » . He did not love school (his 1st impression, recorded in his notebook, was : « Crap ») and he was frequently absent and had an average record. When he went to Berlin, in 1906, to attend University, his spelling was scarcely better than Hitler's.

As Hitler's schoolmates would later affirm, pupils of Jewish descent, like Wittgenstein, had no trouble at the high-school in Linz, especially not if, like Wittgenstein, they participated in religious instruction as Catholics. According to statistics, at that time, only 17 pupils in the school were Jewish, next to 323 Catholics, 19 Protestants, and a visiting Bosnian student who was Greek Orthodox.

Indeed, anti-Semitism can hardly have played a major role, and Hitler's statement in « Mein Kampf » is probably correct : at the « Realschule » , to be sure, I did meet one Jewish boy who was treated by all of us with caution ... but neither I nor the others had any thoughts on the matter. Only at the age of 14 or 15 had he encountered the word Jew with more frequency, partly in connection with political discussions.

Around 1900, only 1,102 Jews lived in all of Upper-Austria, 587 of them in Linz (in other words, less than 1 % of the city's population) and 184 in Urfahr. The numbers for 1910 were : 1,215 in Upper-Austria ; 608 in Linz ; 172 in Urfahr. The Linz Jews, for the most part, came from Furth, in Bavaria, or from Bohemia and were assimilated into the rest of society. Most of the 224 Jewish heads of household, living in Linz at the time, were merchants, professionals, or manufacturers. Some were esteemed as patrons and held honorary federal posts ; April 7, 1907, the Upper-Austrian governor gave Rabbi Moriz Friedmann the Franz-Josef Medal in appreciation of Friedmann's 25 years as a member of the Austrian District school board.

The number of Jews in Linz, then, stayed approximately the same and Eastern Jews did not immigrate into the little provincial city. In the meantime, more and more Czechs came to town. Most of them were seasonal workers who were not included in official statistics. In any case, the « fight against Slavization » , and thus against the Czechs, dominated the almost uniformly German-speaking town far more than anti-Semitism against the German-speaking Jews. In the 20 years before 1914, the « Czech question » was the main topic for discussion in the Linz City Council as well as the Linz newspapers - and the schools.

The Linz newspapers fanned the native Linzers' fear of over-alienation, of losing their jobs on account of cheap competition, of « selling-out » their native soil, and of a soaring crime rate. According to the pan-German « Linzer Fliegende » , Linz's main-square had long been a « reservoir » of « Czech boys » :

« Every night, you can see a number of Czechs on the asphalt pavement - who speak Czech rather loudly and march up and down in tight circles. That way, they simply want to prove that they have already conquered downtown Linz. »

The « defense battle against advancing Slavdom » was a « central topic » among students, according to a former classmate of Hitler :

« To be sure, we didn't look at the Slavs as an inferior ethnic group, but we fought against the curtailing of our rights. Frequently, we are told, there was some wrangling between young “ Slavic ” and “ Germanic ” men. »

Another schoolmate stated :

« The competition between the languages and the frictions in Parliament made a great impression on us pupils. We were totally against the Czechs and the ethnic Babel. »

Hitler was to tell Albert Speer that almost all his Linz schoolmates had rejected « Czech immigration to German Austria ». He hadn't recognized the « danger of Jewry » until he was in Vienna. And, in Munich, in 1929, he said :

« I lived my youth enmeshed in the border struggle for German language, culture, and thought, of which the great majority of the German people had no idea during peace time. Even when I was 13, that fight incessantly pushed itself on us, and it was fought in every high-school class. »

Yet, the Linz « Realschule » did not really have a nationality problem : of 359 pupils in the academic year 1902-1903, 357 named German as their mother tongue, and only 2 Czech. It was not much different at the other schools of higher-education in Linz : the Czech inhabitants of Linz were almost exclusively railroad workers who could not afford to send their children to advanced schools, or seasonal workers whose children lived in Bohemia.

Hitler was 14 when, in 1903, a language fight broke-out in Linz. When the Bishop permitted a Czech sermon in a Linz church, the city Council requested in a unanimous, urgent motion « to cancel the Czech service, which has been misused for Czech demonstrations » and, at the same time, advised all Linz businessmen, in the future, only to hire « German assistants and apprentices ». In March 1904, German national pupils and students broke-up a concert by Czech violinist Jan Kubelík. Thus the national question continued to be pushed into the foreground.

The question of whether someone was « Germanic » or « Slavic » played an important role even among the high-school students of Linz. According to a statement by his schoolmate Josef Keplinger, young Hitler diligently studied the alleged differences between races. One day, he apparently told Keplinger :

« You are not Germanic, you have dark eyes and dark hair ! »

Another time, he is said to have divided his classmates at the entrance of their classroom into 2 groups, left and right, « Aryans and Non-Aryans », according to purely external characteristics. What group the dark-haired Hitler joined we do not know.

Alois's Death

On January 3, 1903, at 10 A.M. , 65 year old Alois Hitler suddenly died of pulmonary bleeding. He was sitting in a tavern, at the time.

The obituary in the « Linz Tagespost » described him as « a thoroughly progressive man » and a « true friend of the free school », an allusion to the deceased's anti-clerical tendencies, his involvement in the association « Free School », and an argument he had had with the local priest. Socially (in other words, in the tavern) , he had « always (been) happy, of a downright youthful joyfulness event », and also « a friend of song ». Plus : « Even though a rough word may have escaped his lips once in a while, a good heart was hiding behind a rough exterior. » This discreet way of putting things seems to indicate that he was cheerful in the bar but tough at home. Hitler's future guardian Josef Mayrhofer confirms this :

« In the bar, he always had to be right and had a quick temper. At home, he was strict, not a gentle man ; his wife didn't have an easy life. »

At least, the 13 year old boy must have felt relief at his tyrannical father's death. Hitler was to tell his secretary a great deal « about his mother's love » , which he returned. « I didn't love my father » , he used to say, « but I was all the more afraid of him. He had tantrums and immediately became physically violent. My poor mother would always be very scared for me. »

Still, there was no improvement in school. On account of continued bad grades, Hitler was asked to leave the Linz high-school, in 1904. Yet, his mother was not ready to give-up and sent him to the next closest « Realschule » , to Steyr, an industrial town with a population of 17,600, where he lived with a couple who boarded him. This was a great financial sacrifice for the civil servant's widow. She sold the house in Leonding and moved to Linz, to the 3rd floor of a house at number 31 « Humboldtstraße » .

The separation from his mother was very hard on the 15 year old. Josef Gœbbels would note :

« The “ Führer ” talks about his childhood. And how he was longing and pining away when his mother sent him to Steyr. And almost became ill over it. And how he still hates Steyr as a city, to this day. »

While the Hitlers lived in Steyr, the Russo-Japanese War broke-out. Hitler would later say that his class was divided into 2 camps : the « Slavs » had been for Russia, and the others for Japan :

« When, during the Russo-Japanese War, the news of Russia's defeat arrived, the Czech boys in my class cried, while we others cheered. Even then, Hitler, just like the German nationalists in Linz, suspected school children of harboring pan-Slavic convictions. »

At Whitsuntide, in 1904, the pubescent Hitler, who still did not want to study, was confirmed at the Linz cathedral. His godfather would later say :

« Among all my candidates, there was not one who was as gruff and obstinate as this one, you had to climb inside him for every word. »

The boy had not appreciated his confirmation present, a prayer-book. Neither had the expensive ride from Linz to Leonding in a carriage excited him :

« I had the impression that he found the whole confirmation disgusting. »

In Leonding, a « pack of boys » was already waiting for him, and he « quickly took-off » . The godfather's wife added :

« They behaved like Red Indians. »

To be sure, such conduct was not unusual for a 15 year old. In 1942, Hitler would say, in retrospect :

« At 13, 14, 15, I no longer believed in anything, certainly none of my friends still believed in the so-called communion, only a few totally stupid honour students ! Except, at the time, I thought everything should be blown-up. »

With 3 unsatisfactory grades (in German, math, and stenography) , Hitler was again kept back :

« This idiot of a professor spoiled the German language for me, this bungling, pathetic gnome. I would never be able to write a proper letter ! Imagine ! With a D minus from that buffoon, I never could have become a technician. »

In this situation, he would write, suddenly an illness came to his help, my serious lung ailment, which ultimately decided the eternal domestic quarrel. He was allowed to abandon his career at school and return home to his mother.

According to relatives, the sick boy let himself be pampered by his mother during the following summer in Waldviertel, having her bring him a big mug of warm milk every morning. He lived like a recluse, avoiding almost all contact with his various cousins.

This alleged serious illness must have been a temporary indisposition ; otherwise, the new family doctor, Doctor Eduard Bloch from Linz, would have known about it. After checking his files, the doctor later maintained that he treated the boy only for minor ailments, colds, or tonsilitis, and that Hitler had been neither robust nor sickly. He certainly did not have any serious illness whatsoever, let alone a lung disease.

Doctor Bloch, a Jew, was born in Frauenburg in Southern Bohemia, in 1872. After attending school in Prague, he served as an army doctor and, from 1899 on, was stationed in Linz, where he settled after his discharge. In 1901, he opened his office in the Baroque house at 12 « Landstraße » , where he also lived with his family : his wife Emilie, « née » Kafka, and their daughter Trude, born in 1903. According to Linz's future mayor Ernst Koref, Doctor Bloch was held « in high-regard, particularly among the lower and indigent social classes. It was generally known that, even at any time at night, he was willing to call on patients. He used to go on his visits in his hansom, wearing a conspicuously broad-brimmed hat » .

As an old man, in American exile, Doctor Bloch published his memoirs, in which he painted a remarkably positive picture of young Hitler, saying he had been neither a ruffian nor untidy nor fresh :

« This simply is not true. As a youth, he was quiet, well-mannered, and neatly dressed. »

He had patiently waited in the waiting room until it was his turn, then, like every well-behaved 14 or 15 year old boy, made a bow, and always thanked the doctor politely. Like the other boys in Linz, he had worn short lederhosen and a green woolen hat with a feather, he had been tall and pale and looked older than he was :

« His eyes (inherited from his mother) were large, melancholy and thoughtful. To a very large extent, this boy lived within himself. What dreams he dreamed I do not know. »

The boy's most striking feature was his love for his mother :

« While he was not a “ mother's boy ”, in the usual sense, I have never witnessed a closer attachment. »

This love had been mutual :

« Klara Hitler adored her son. She allowed him his own way wherever possible. »

For example, she admired his watercolor paintings and drawings and supported his artistic ambitions, in opposition to his father ; « at what cost to herself, one may guess » . However, the doctor expressly denies the claim that Hitler's love for his mother was pathological.

According to Doctor Bloch, the family's financial resources were scarce. He mentions that Klara Hitler had not even indulged in « the smallest extravagance » and lived extremely modestly and frugally. We have some data on the Hitlers' family budget : Klara Hitler's widow's pension amounted to 100 Kronen per month, plus 40 Kronen in federal aid for Adolf's and Paula's education. The sale of the house in Leonding yielded 10,000 Kronen, minus mortgage, taxes, expenses, and the inheritance for Adolf and Paula (frozen until their 24th birthdays) of 652 Kronen each.

At 4 % interest, the remaining approximately 5,500 Kronen may have netted some 220 Kronen annually. In addition, Klara was permitted to dispose of the interest for Adolf's and Paula's inheritance, up to their 18th year, which yielded another 52 Kronen per annum. However, the interest total of no more than 23 Kronen per month did not cover the current rent. The family of 4, who now no longer even had the Leonding fruit and vegetable garden at its disposal, had to live very modestly, particularly because around 1905 inflation had become noticeable and Klara had fallen ill. Even if « Haniaunt » contributed to the family's expenses, from then on, Klara Hitler had to fall-back on her savings. Even though their apartment was small, she acquired an additional boarder, 12 year old Wilhelm Hagemuller, the Leonding baker's son, who on schooldays ate lunch with the family.

16 year old Adolf, by now « the only man » in the family, acted just as if he were a son of a better family. He had his own room, the cabinet (which means that the 3 women shared the only remaining room and the kitchen) . He spent his days taking walks, with nightly entertainments, reading, and drawing. Thus, in « Mein Kampf » , he pays tribute to the 2 ensuing years in Linz as the happiest days of my life, which seemed to me almost a dream. He says he had lived as his mother's darling in the hollowness of comfortable life and on a soft downy bed. After the unpleasant period in Steyr, he now enjoyed the attractions of the provincial capital. At 15 or 16, he would say in 1942, he went to all the wax works and everywhere it said, « Adults Only » .

During that time, the young man began to devour newspapers. There was a large number of papers in Linz, among them off-shoots of the large Viennese Party organs that brought such Viennese topics to Linz as anti-Semitism. For example, the Christian-Social « Linzer Post » advocated the slogan « Don't buy from Jews ! » and commented :

« If money supply is cut-off from the Jews, then, they themselves have to retreat and Austria will be rid of the disgusting lice infestation. »

« The Jews » were portrayed as seducers of girls, as a danger to the State, and as Socialists, for « always and everywhere, the fellow tribesmen of these workers' tormentors are the tried leaders of Social-Democracy » .

The « Linzer Fliegenden » , on the other hand, subtitled « Volkisches Witzblattl » (folkish joke journal) , propagated ethnic anti-Semitism, in the manner of the pan-Germans. The journal was anti-clerical, rejected the multi-national State, and made propaganda against the Hungarians (the « Huns ») , the Czechs, and the Jews. There was a great deal of publicity for the « Alldeutsches Tagblatt » , whose writers, including Guido von List and Jorg Lanz von Liebenfels, were quoted frequently.

The paper distributed pan-German brochures, including the speeches of Georg Ritter von Schönerer, and « Jew coupons » - sheets of 40 coupon-like stamps at 10 Heller each with, more or less fabricated anti-Semitic utterances, by famous people, such as Helmuth Count of Moltke :

« The Jews form a State within the State ; following their own laws, they know how to bypass those of the country » ; or even Tacitus :

« The Jews are the abomination of the human race. Everything that to us is sacrosanct, is contemptible to them ; while they are permitted to do anything that is an outrage to us. They are the lowliest of all peoples. » (« deterrima gens »)

When these sayings reappeared on doors and windows of Jewish shops in Linz ; Linz's Austrian Israelite Union retaliated on October 16, 1907, by pressing criminal charges.

One of the readers of the « Linzer Fliegenden » is said to have been young Hitler. Even at that early age, he had fallen under the influence of the pan-Germans, whose main enemy were the Social-Democrats.

In a 1929 speech, Hitler would brag about being one of the early fighters against the « Reds » :

« When I was a boy, I wore the black, red, and gold badge and, like innumerable of my early friends, was seriously beaten-up by Marxists. They tore-up the black, red, and gold flag and kicked it in the mud. »

Theatre and 1st Love

In Linz, young Hitler discovered his love for the theatre. Linz's regional Theatre performed Operas, Operettas, and plays from the typical repertoire for the educated : from Mozart's « Magic Flute » to Strauß Operettas and comedies of manners. Standing room only, in the 3rd gallery, cost just 50 Heller, hardly more than a ticket for a concert by the army Orchestra or the extremely popular movies.

In 1905, the 100th anniversary of Schiller's death, the German nationalists celebrated their « freedom poet » . In the regional Theatre, Schiller's plays were at the center of the program, above all, « William Tell » . Krackowizer wrote on May 4, 1905 :

« Anniversary celebrations wherever German hearts are beating. »

The most popular official speaker was Leopold Pötsch.

Richard Wagner's œuvre was also being cultivated, for Linz's music director August Göllerich (Anton Bruckner's student and biographer) was old enough to have known the Mæstro personally. Among the regional Theatre's repertoire was « Lohengrin » and, since January 3, 1905, also the early Opera « Rienzi », which received particular notice as the town's gymnastics club took part in the famous « sword dance » .

Later, Klara Hitler's boarder Hagmüller would relate that young Hitler frequented the regional Theatre and even outlined plans for its reconstruction. According to Hagmüller, Hitler preferred Wagner Operas and Schiller plays and liked to sing « Du Schwan zieh hin » from « Lohengrin » while walking back and forth in his room. When, in 1938, an emissary of the NSDAP archive collected biographical material on the « Führer » in Linz, he learned much to his amazement that « funnily enough » , Hitler's favourite actors in Linz (that is to say, his Wagner and Schiller heroes) , were « almost exclusively Jews » .

In 1905, in the regional Theatre's standing room, Hitler met August (« Gustl ») Kubizek, who was almost the same age. They became friends. Kubizek worked as an upholsterer's apprentice in his father's shop ; his father was happy that « Gustl » had such a well-behaved and polite friend as Adolf Hitler. He profited from Kubizek's excellent training in music. The 2 shared their enthusiasm for Wagner. In his memoirs, Kubizek describes in detail the outstanding impression « Rienzi, der letzte der Tribunen » (Rienzi, the last of the tribunes) made on young Hitler. The pompous work required a large Orchestra with a great deal of brass and drums, and contained thrilling scenes with large crowds ; the endings of its acts were over-powering, and it was full of roaring shouts of « Heil » .

In the 14th Century, Cola di Rienzi rose from being the son of a Roman bartender to the people's tribune, unifying splintered Italy into a powerful Republic after a Classical model, but he was subsequently toppled by the people and died during an uprising. In the 19th century, the age of national unification, his story was romantically glorified in a much-read novel by Edward George Bulwer-Lytton. During the preliminaries of the revolution of 1848, young Richard Wagner also tried his hand at this national material. For him, « Rienzi » was the hero who saved and liberated the people, in Wagner's words, an « extreme enthusiast who, like a flashing beam of light, appeared among a people that had sunk low and was degenerated but which, he believed, he was called upon to enlighten and lift-up high » .

After the Opera, Kubizek later wrote, 16 year old Hitler walked with him in a « totally transported state » to Linz's Frein Mountain, until the early hours of the morning. « In grand, infectious images, he outlined to me the future of the German people » . Kubizek quoted at length verses that had « touched (their) hearts » , such as when « Rienzi » sings, « doch wählet ihr zum Schützer reich / der Rechte, die dem Volk erkannt, / so blickt auf eure Ahnen hin : / Und nennt mich euren Volkstribun ! » (and if you choose me as your protector of the people's rights, look at your ancestors and call me your people's tribune !) The masses reply : « Rienzi, Heil ! Heil, people's tribune ! » .

Later, it was important to Hitler to be looked on as « Rienzi » re-incarnate. Among the Kubizek family, his alleged statement, « I want to become a people's tribune » , was passed on. The spirited « Rienzi » Overture became the secret anthem of the 3rd « Reich » , well-known as the introduction to the Nuremberg Party conventions.

According to Kubizek, 16 year old Hitler was a puny, pale, serious young man, always simply, but neatly and properly attired :

« Adolf made much of polite conduct and strict, proper form. »

With his only suit, pepper-and-salt with perfect creases, he wore white shirts ironed by his mother and black kid gloves, as well as a special touch, a little black ebony cane and sometimes even a top hat, an outfit like a college student's. Kubizek wrote :

« Since Linz didn't have a University, the young people of all classes and strata of society all the more eagerly emulated students' customs. »

Young Hitler's manner of speaking, Kubizek noted, was « very choice » . In other words, contrary to those around him, he did not speak a dialect but High-German. In addition, he had a « well-developed sense of performing » . The young man displayed his desire to be the center of attention by being given to talking much and persistently, always in the form of monologues. He did not permit anyone to contradict him :

« Sometimes, when he became entirely lost in his fantasies, I got the suspicion that everything he said was nothing but an exercise in oratory. »

Kubizek was surprised that his friend avoided all contact with his former schoolmates. Once, he reported, they ran into a former classmate of Hitler, on the promenade in Linz. To the question, « How are you ? » Hitler only brusquely replied that : « that was none of his business, just as Adolf himself couldn't care less what the other one was up to » .

It was probably in the spring of 1906 that the 17 year old Ist fell in love. To be sure, the blonde Linz beauty of higher-standing, 2 years his senior, never noticed her shy admirer, who watched her from afar as she walked in the Linz main street with her mother. Stefanie had already graduated and then been to Munich and Geneva for professional training, and was now back in her home-town of Linz. She had many admirers, a fact Hitler jealously observed during the strolls, particularly if they were officers. He called them « lazybones » and got flustered about their social standing, « but particularly about the opportunities these airheads had with the ladies » . According to Kubizek, Hitler only lived for « that woman who possessed all of his passionate affection, without being aware of it » .

And, « he envisions Stefanie as his wife, he is building the house in which she lives with him, surrounds it with a magnificent park » , and so on. Yet, according to Kubizek, he did not exchange a single word with this « being in his dream world » .

Ist Time in Vienna

Even though his guardian urged him to alleviate some of the burden in his mother's household, Hitler did not accept any jobs nor start an apprenticeship. Instead, he announced his desire to become an artist, an aspiration his mother supported. She even paid for a trip to Vienna so he could go to the Imperial art gallery, an unusual and expensive undertaking for the son of a civil servant's widow. In May 1906, after a 6 hour trip on an accommodation train, the 17 year old arrived in the Imperial capital and residence for the 1st time.

The size, the tumult, and the brightness of the metropolis impressed and confused anyone arriving from the provinces. Nowhere in the Austrian-Hungarian monarchy was traffic as heavy as it was in Vienna. In 1907, 1,458 automobiles, more than half the total number registered in the whole Empire, were in the capital. They caused 354 accidents per year, even with a speed limit of 15 miles per hour in the city. More important still were horsedrawn carriages : there were 997 hansoms drawn by 2 horses ; 1,754 1 horse carriages ; and 1,101 cabs, which altogether caused 982 accidents.

The 10 inner Districts were already electrified, so in the streets, there were no longer any gas lights. The Westbahnhof (the western station, where trains arrived from Linz) was illuminated by electric lights too. Electrification of tenement buildings was progressing rapidly : in 1908, in non-official buildings alone, there already were 176 arc lamps and 657,625 incandescent lamps - 1 incandescent lamp per person. Linz, on the other hand, had only 6 electric arc lamps on the main square and 1 on the bridge between Linz and Urfahr ; otherwise, it had only gas and kerosene lamps.

We do not know where, in Vienna, Hitler lived. That he found lodgings with his godfather Johann Prinz, as is frequently claimed, does not seem possible. In a document from 1885, Mr. and Mrs. Prinz are mentioned as « a married couple, the husband being a swimming pool attendant at the “ Sofienbad ”, in Vienna » , living in the 3rd District, 28 « Löwengasse » . That they were still at that address, in 1906, is not documented, and there is no other information about this either. According to Kubizek, Hitler never visited relatives ; « even later, this never came-up during conversation » .

Hitler's 1st visit to Vienna, he later says in « Mein Kampf », triggered his enthusiasm for the architecture of the « Ring » Boulevard :

« The purpose of my trip was to study the picture gallery in the Court Museum, but I had eyes for scarcely anything but the museum itself. From morning until late at night, I ran from one object of interest to another, but it was always the buildings that held my primary interest. For hours, I could stand in front of the Opera ; for hours, I could gaze at the Parliament ; the whole “ Ring ” Boulevard seemed to me like an enchantment out of “ The 1,001 Nights ”. »

The only sources concerning this first trip to Vienna are 4 picture postcards to Kubizek. They are the earliest-known autographs of Hitler to date.

Not even the post-office stamps reveal how long the trip lasted. (In « Mein Kampf », Hitler suggests 2 weeks.) One card, post-marked May 7, 1906, contains a 3 part view of the « Karlsplatz », where Hitler marked the music club building with an « X » : to indicate the place of the Conservatory school, which Kubizek dreamed of attending one day. The card reads :

« Sending you this card, I must, at the same time, apologize to you for not having written sooner. So, I did arrive all right and now walk around busily. Tomorrow, I will go to the Opera to hear “ Tristan ”, the day after tomorrow, “ The Flying Dutchman ”, etc. Even though I like everything fine, I am still looking forward to being back in Linz. Today, to the City Theatre. With best regards, Your friend Adolf Hitler. »

The 17 year old, having been taught by his mother to be polite, does not forget to ask Kubizek to give his regards to his parents.

What Hitler mentioned matches perfectly with the program : on Tuesday, May 8, 1906, there was a performance of « Tristan und Isolde », from 7 to 11:30 , with Erik Schmedes as « Tristan », Anna von Mildenburg as « Isolde », and Richard Mayr as « King Marke » . On Wednesday, May 9, « The Flying Dutchman » was scheduled. On May 7, 1906, the City Theatre performed a rural farce by Ludwig Anzengruber. The other postcards depict views of the outside and inside of the Opera and Parliament.

At any rate, on at least 2 evenings, the young man experienced the ultimate of contemporary Wagner interpretation at the Court Opera : the Wagnerian « total work of art », constructed by Court Opera director Gustav Mahler and his stage director Alfred Roller and « cleared » of tradition. What is most important is this : for the 1st time in his life, young Hitler witnessed Gustav Mahler as a Wagner conductor - in the May 8 performance of « Tristan » .

After this 1st sojourn in Vienna, the capital attracted the young man like a magnet. Kubizek observed :

« In his thoughts, he frequently was no longer in Linz but was already living right in the center of Vienna. »

But even if the provincial town may have become too small for him, it still offered quite a few attractions : on May 26, 1906, the « Buffalo Bill Circus Show » performed a spectacle entitled « Wild West » , involving 800 performers in costumes, among them 100 American Indians, plus 500 horses. On June 7, the young people in Linz marveled at 150 luxury cars and their noble « gentleman drivers » , who were making a stop in Linz during their race. On September 28, the performances by the American cinema group « The Royal Video » started in the « Volksfesthalle » (people's Party hall) , and according to Krackowizer, performances were « jam-packed every day, netting a fortune » .

On October 13, the State Theatre, for the 1st time, performed the greatest music hit of the era, Franz Lehár's Operetta « The Merry Widow » . Via gramophones, the tunes spread « ad nauseam » into cafés and bars. Hitler remained faithful to this favourite Operetta of his until the end : in 1943-1944, at the Wolf Entrenchment in East-Prussia, he was not listening to Wagner, but « never anything but “ The Merry Widow ” » , as an earwitness reported with a moan.

From October 1906 on, Hitler took piano lessons with Kubizek's teacher, for no less than 5 Kronen a month. He did not get very far. The teacher visibly cringed when, in 1938, he was supposed to tell the NSDAP's main archive his memories of the « Führer » :

« As far as the lessons are concerned, he was never distracted, and (as for other conversations, before or after the lessons) rather reserved. In short, at the time, I wouldn't have had the slightest idea as to what a great Statesman was taking lessons with me. »

In January 1907, when his life was about to take a turn, Hitler decided to discontinue his lessons. On January 14, 1907, Klara Hitler, who was in excruciating pain, consulted with the family physician, Doctor Bloch. He detected a breast tumor and advised an operation, which was performed 4 days later, at the Hospital of the Sisters of Mercy, in Linz. Because she had no health insurance, such a hospital stay posed an enormous financial burden, particularly because the daily rate, was set at 5 Kronen instead of the usual 2. In addition, there were various other invoices, such as the surgeon's bill. For the 20 day stay (from January 17 to February 5) , the hospital charged 100 Kronen, which, according to the bill, was paid by « the son » who, at the time, was 17 years old. Furthermore, Klara needed after-care by the family doctor, Bloch, and this was getting more and more costly. Apparently, 17 year old Hitler made the necessary decisions by himself. His 17 year old sister Paula was too young, and his married half-sister Angela Raubal was no longer part of the common household. Besides, she was only Klara's step-daughter. « Haniaunt » was not up to such tasks and kept so much in the background that neither Doctor Bloch nor Kubizek mentioned her.

It was the spring of the 1st national elections since the introduction of the general, direct, and equal suffrage for men. Krackowizer wrote on May 2 1907 :

« Those interested get extremely excited during national elections : flyers, assemblies, etc. , galore. »

The right to vote invigorated the Social-Democrats, who were now serious competitors against the Nationals and Clericals. They gained all of Linz's 3 parliamentary mandates. It is certainly possible that Hitler's hatred for the « Reds » goes back, in part, to this bitter and, in the end, lost election campaign of what had been Linz's main Parties - fought and lost especially by the German People's Party (DVP) .

After a brief recuperation period, 46 year old Klara Hitler had difficulty climbing the stairs to the 3rd floor. In early May 1907, the family moved to the small-town of Urfahr, across the Danube, to 46 « Hauptstraße » . Financial difficulties may have been a factor too. In any case, Urfahr, which was not incorporated into Linz until 1917, was said to be particularly cheap, for one thing, because of its agrarian markets, but also because it was free of the consumption tax that made all goods more expensive in Linz. According to Kubizek, even before that time, Hitler had done the family's major shopping in Urfahr.

After only 2 weeks, the family moved once again, this time to nearby 9 « Blütenstraße » , in Urfahr. At 50 Kronen, rent on the 1st floor of this nice, even elegant house was very high for Urfahr, amounting to almost half of Klara's widow's pension, which was certainly more than the family could afford. Thus, it continued to be necessary to tap the small capital acquired from the sale of the house. Klara, who was seriously ill, lived another few comfortable months there.

According to Doctor Bloch, the apartment had 3 small rooms. The windows offered a magnificent view of Mount Postling :

« My predominant impression of the simple furnished apartment was its cleanliness. It glistened ; not a speck of dust on the chairs or tables, not a stray fleck of mud on the scrubbed floor, not a smudge on the panes in the windows. “ Frau ” Hitler was a superb house-keeper. »

The house belonged to the widow of a District Court judge, Magdalena Hanisch, who lived in an adjoining apartment on the 1st floor and showed great concern for Klara Hitler. In the house also, lived a retired post-Master with his wife, a retired professor, and (apparently, in the basement rooms) 2 day-laborers.

According to Doctor Bloch's cash book, Klara Hitler visited his office on July 3 and did not return until September 2. It is not clear whether the doctor's office was closed during the summer (in which case, however, he would have noted the name of his substitute, Doctor Kren) or if the patient had left once more for Waldviertel with her family to recuperate there. Considering travel conditions at the time, the ride was relatively comfortable ; the train went from Linz to Gmund and, from there, a pair of oxen took the family to Klara's parent's house in the village of Spital, near Weitra.

August Kubizek

Le chef d'orchestre autrichien August Kubizek est né le 3 août 1888 à Linz, en Haute-Autriche ; et est mort le 23 octobre 1956 à Linz.

Surnommé « Gustl », il était l'ami et le co-locataire d'Adolf Hitler à Linz et à Vienne, entre 1904 et 1908.

Les parents d'August Kubizek sont des Autrichiens d'origine tchèque. Après des études élémentaires, August travaille comme apprenti-tapissier dans l'entreprise de son père. En outre, sa véritable passion est la musique. À la Toussaint de l'année 1904, il fait la rencontre d'Adolf Hitler à l'Opéra de Linz. Les 2 jeunes gens sont mélomanes et particulièrement attirés par les grands compositeurs germaniques en vogue à la fin du XIXe siècle : Richard Wagner, Gustav Mahler ou encore Felix Mendelssohn.

À la même époque, Hitler, qui suit encore un enseignement, est renvoyé de la « Realschule » de Linz, où il s'ennuie. Son professeur d'histoire, Léopold Pötsch, est un fervent pan-germaniste. D'ailleurs, entre les 2 jeunes gens, c'est Hitler qui dirige les discussions politiques et artistiques. Il habite avec sa mère Klara Pözl, à « Urfahr », dans la banlieue, alors qu'August vit chez ses parents à Linz même. Les 2 adolescents flânent régulièrement dans les rues de la ville, jusqu'au jour où Hitler tombe amoureux d'une jeune bourgeoise, nommée Stéphanie, rencontrée sur la « Landstraße », alors qu'elle se promenait avec sa mère. On a la mention qu'Hitler aurait voulu se suicider dans le Danube, ne parvenant pas à séduire la jeune fille au cours du printemps 1906. Klara Pözl, désormais convaincue que son fils ne fera rien de bon au collège, accepte qu'il tente son entrée aux Beaux-arts.

Hitler s'apprête à tenter le concours d'entrée aux Beaux-arts de Vienne, en octobre 1907, il déménage dans la capitale autrichienne. Lorsqu'Adolf Hitler échoue une 1re fois, il ne prévient pas Kubizek ni sa mère et continue d'étudier le dessin. En décembre 1907, il apprend l'hospitalisation de sa mère et court à son chevet à Linz : elle succombe à un cancer du sein, le 21. La famille Kubizek a alors proposé à Hitler de passer les fêtes de Noël avec eux, ce dernier refuse. D'après le témoignage de Kubizek, Hitler aurait réussi à convaincre le père de ce dernier de lui permettre de tenter le Conservatoire de Vienne (en février 1908) . Ils louent une petite chambre avec un piano dans la « Stumpergasse » . August apprend le violon et réussit son entrée au Conservatoire. Ils ont peu d'argent pour vivre, bien que l'un reçoive de l'argent de poche de Linz et que l'autre perçoive une pension d'orphelin. Le 8 octobre 1908, Hitler retente son entrée aux Beaux-arts, c'est un nouvel échec. On ne sait pas exactement pour quelle raison, peut-être qu'il effectuait son service militaire, Kubizek était absent à cette période-là. Il reçoit des cartes postales d'Hitler et lorsqu'il revient à Vienne au mois de novembre, il retrouve la chambre vide, Hitler est parti.

August Kubizek ne retrouve pas Hitler, qui vit pourtant toujours à Vienne. Kubizek poursuit ses études et devient, à partir d'octobre 1912 et jusqu'à l'éclatement de la Première Guerre mondiale, chef d'orchestre au théâtre de Marburg sur Drau (aujourd'hui, Maribor) . En août 1914, Kubizek est enrôlé dans l'armée austro-hongroise. Après la démobilisation de 1918, il accepte un poste de chef d'orchestre au théâtre d'Eferding (à 30 kilomètres de Linz, en Haute-Autriche) , la musique continue à être sa passion. Il se marie, deux 2 sont nés de cette union. En 1933, il félicite personnellement Adolf Hitler pour sa nomination à la Chancellerie. Les Nazis lui demandent d'écrire un ouvrage sur la jeunesse du « Führer » (« Réminiscences », 2 tomes, 1938) . Entre 1938 et 1940, il est l'invité personnel au Festival de Bayreuth aux côtés du « Führer » . Entre 1945 et 1946, il est emprisonné par les Américains qui l'accusent d'avoir été proche d'Hitler, mais il est finalement libéré et rédige un ouvrage sur cette amitié en 1953, sous le titre : « Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund » (Adolf Hitler, mon ami d'enfance, Gallimard, 1954) .

Il décède à Linz en octobre 1956 à l'âge de 68 ans.

Dans les années 1950 et cela jusqu'à une date récente, les historiens, en particulier les américains, remettaient sérieusement en doute les informations données par Kubizek, en l'accusant d'inventer la plupart des anecdotes. Brigitte Hamann, puis d'autres, ont proposé de revaloriser son témoignage. En y regardant de plus près, on se rend compte finalement qu'il a fourni des détails authentiques. À partir de là, Lothar Machtan s'est demandé si Kubizek n'avait pas eu une relation homosexuelle avec Hitler, ce que rejette fermement Ian Kershaw. Pourtant, Kubizek note dans ses mémoires qu'à l'époque où ils cohabitaient à Vienne, et même à Linz, Hitler a toujours eu des avances de filles ou de femmes, ce qu'il ne supportait pas. Il note également que son ami était fou amoureux de Stéphanie qu'il voulait épouser. Kubizek fait une longue description de cette relation à distance entre Hitler et la jeune fille. Dans les années 1950, cette personne était devenue la veuve du colonel Rabatsch. Installée en banlieue viennoise, elle fut très sollicitée.

Elle finit par rédiger une note :

« Je ne me souviens pas d'Adolf Hitler. Ce qu'a dit Monsieur Kubizek de l'amour qu'il m'aurait porté est possible ; les indications qu'il a données sur les lieux de mes promenades avec ma mère, sur ma famille, sur moi-même sont exactes sauf sur un point : mes cheveux n'étaient pas coiffés en longues tresses. C'était interdit au collège. Je me souviens avoir reçu, vers l'âge de 20 ans, une lettre d'un garçon inconnu. Il m'écrivait qu'il partait pour Vienne, où il allait entrer à l'Académie des Beaux-arts, mais qu'il reviendrait m'épouser. Je ne sais plus si c'était signé ni de quel nom. À l'époque, les jeunes filles ne s'intéressaient pas à des garçons plus jeunes qu'elles. »

(Stéphanie Rabatsch)

Cela révèle donc que les informations données par Kubizek sont exactes. En fait, selon François Delpla, il n'a même pas commis d'erreur puisqu'il ne dit pas que Stéphanie a porté des tresses sur le chemin du collège, mais seulement sur une photo que lui-même a connu beaucoup plus tard. On pense aujourd'hui que la veuve a essayé de dissimuler une relation qui aurait peut-être pu voir le jour si Hitler n'avait pas été timide et s'il n'avait pas connu la pauvreté à la suite de son second échec à l'examen d'entrée aux Beaux-arts, en 1908.

Par contre, les historiens doutent toujours aujourd'hui de Kubizek au sujet de l'émergence de l'antisémitisme chez le jeune Hitler. D'ailleurs, il est assez confus dans ses informations. Selon lui, Adolf Hitler était un jeune homme soigné, posé, qui détestait la guerre jusqu'à critiquer les frères Wright d'avoir expérimenté le tir aérien. A contrario, Brigitte Hamann, affirme, en se fondant sur un discours qu'il a donné en 1923, à Munich, sur la Seconde Guerre des Boers, qu'Hitler adorait la guerre depuis son enfance. Kubizek note également que son ami nourrissait une vocation de dictateur qu'il aurait trouvée dans l'Opéra « Rienzi » , de Richard Wagner, qui raconte l'ascension d'un chef politique en s'appuyant sur les masses. On ne sait pas vraiment si le jeune Hitler, qui vivait à Vienne en 1908, était antisémite ou non comme il l'affirme lui-même dans « Mein Kampf » . Kubizek, quant à lui, fait remonter l'antisémitisme d'Hitler à l'époque de Linz (donc, avant 1908) . Il explique que, lors d'une balade, Hitler et lui seraient passés devant une synagogue et que Hitler aurait fait remarquer que cela ne faisait pas partie de Linz. Puis, une autre fois, à Vienne, Hitler aurait dénoncé à la police un mendiant juif qui arnaquait les passants. Ces informations ne peuvent pas être vérifiées et reposent donc seulement sur les dires de Kubizek. Les historiens tendent aujourd'hui à expliquer la « période de Linz » plutôt comme une approche du pan-germanisme ; Hitler se serait déclaré plutôt patriote allemand comme le lui a enseigné le professeur Pötsch. Quant à l'émergence de sa haine des Juifs, elle est probablement à situer lorsqu'il devint manœuvre et petit-peintre (hiver 1908-1909) dans une ville où il était normal de détester les Juifs, comme le soulignait avec virulence le maire antisémite de Vienne, Karl Lueger.

...

August (« Gustl ») Kubizek was born on 3 August 1888 in Linz ; and died on 23 October 1956 in Linz.

He was a close friend of Adolf Hitler when both were in their late-teens. He later wrote about their friendship in his book : « The Young Hitler I knew » (1955) .

August was born into a middle-class Austrian family with Czech roots, he was the 1st born and only surviving child of Michael and Maria Kubizek. His sisters Maria, Therese and Karoline died in early childhood. Kubizek later wrote that this was a striking parallel between his own life and that of Adolf Hitler, whose mother had lost 4 children prematurely. As the surviving sons of grief-stricken mothers, August and Adolf could not help but feel they had been spared or « chosen » by fate.

Kubizek and Hitler 1st met while competing for standing room in the « Landestheater » in Linz, Upper-Austria. Because of their shared passion for the Operas of Richard Wagner, they quickly became close friends and later room-mates in Vienna while both sought admission into college. The 2 shared a small-room at number 29/2 « Stumpergasse » , Door 17, in the 6th district of Vienna, from 22 February to early July 1908.

As the only son of a self-employed upholsterer, August was expected to someday take-over his father's business, but he secretly harboured dreams of becoming a conductor. With Adolf's encouragement, he devoted more and more of his time to this passion, completing all the musical training available to him in Linz. However, to achieve his goal, he would require higher-education in music which was offered only in Vienna.

It was Adolf Hitler who, at the age of 18, successfully persuaded Kubizek's father to let his son go to the metropolis to attend the Conservatory. This, Kubizek wrote, changed the course of his life for good.

He was immediately accepted into the Vienna Conservatory where he quickly made a name for himself. Hitler, however, was twice denied entrance into Vienna's art academy, a fact which he kept hidden from his friend for some time. In 1908, Hitler abruptly broke-off the friendship and drifted into homelessness. Kubizek completed his studies in 1912 and was hired as conductor of the Orchestra in Marburg on the Drau, in Lower-Styria (called : Maribor, in Slovenia, after 1918) . He was later offered a position at the « Stadttheater » in Klagenfurt, but this job and his musical career were cut short by the beginning of World War I. Before leaving for the front, he married Anna Funke (born on 7 October 1887 ; and died on 4 October 1976) , a violinist from Vienna with whom he had 3 sons : Augustin, Karl Maria and Rudolf.

From August 1914 until November 1918, Kubizek served as a reservist in Regiment No. 2 of the Austro-Hungarian Infantry. In the Carpathian winter campaign of 1915, he was wounded at Eperjes, in Hungary (now, Prešov in Slovakia), and later evacuated to Budapest in an ambulance train. After months of convalescence, he returned to the front and was attached to a mechanized corps in Vienna. After the War, Kubizek accepted a position as an official in the municipal council of Eferding, Upper-Austria and music became his hobby.

After seeing Hitler on the front-page of the « Münchner Illustrierte » (around 1920), Kubizek followed his friend's career with some interest, although he did not attempt to contact him until 1933 when he wrote to congratulate him on having become Chancellor of Germany. On 4 August of that year, Kubizek received an unexpected reply from Hitler, who wrote to his old friend :

« “ Gustl ”, I should be very glad to revive, once more with you, those memories of the best years of my life. »

30 years after Hitler had broken-off contact with Kubizek, the 2 friends were re-united on 9 April 1938, during one of Hitler's visits in Linz. The 2 spoke for over an hour at the Hotel Weinzinger and Hitler offered Kubizek the conductorship of one of Germany's leading Orchestra, which Kubizek politely refused. Upon learning of his friend's 3 sons, Hitler insisted on financing their educations at the Anton Bruckner Conservatory, in Linz. Hitler later invited Kubizek to attend the Bayreuth Festival as his guest in 1939 and, again, in 1940, experiences described by Kubizek as « the happiest hours of my earthly existence » .

In 1938, Kubizek was hired by the Nazi Party to write 2 short propaganda booklets called « Reminiscences » about his youth with Hitler. In one episode, Kubizek said that Hitler had a great love for a girl named « Stefanie » and wrote her many love poems but never sent them. Hitler biographer John Toland noted that when Stefanie learned she had been an early object of Hitler's affection, she was stunned.

Kubizek saw Hitler for the last time on 23 July 1940, although, as late as 1944, Hitler sent Kubizek's mother a food basket for her 80th birthday.

Hitler told Kubizek :

« This War will set us back many years in our building programme. It is a tragedy. I did not become Chancellor of the Greater German “ Reich ” to fight wars. »

Hitler was speaking after the successful campaigns in Poland and France that he, as « Führer » , had led.

When the tide began to turn against Hitler's favour, Kubizek, who had avoided politics all his life, became a member of the Nazi Party in 1942 as a gesture of loyalty to his friend.

In December 1945, Kubizek gathered the collection of post-cards and other keepsakes given to him by Hitler during their youth and concealed them carefully in the basement of his house, in Eferding. He was arrested shortly afterwards and held at Glasenbach, where he was imprisoned and interrogated by the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command for 16 months. His home was searched, but the Hitler correspondence and drawings were not found. He was released on 8 April 1947, after over 12 months imprisonment by American authorities without ever being accused of breaking any law.

In 1951, Kubizek, who had rejected other post-War offers for his memoirs, agreed to publish « Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund » (Adolf Hitler, My Childhood Friend) through the « Leopold Stocker Verlag ». The original manuscript was 293 pages long and included several pictures, many of which showed post-cards and sketches given to the author by the young Hitler, between the years 1906 and 1908. The book is divided into 3 parts and consists of a prologue, 24 chapters and an epilogue.

It caused a stir when it was released in 1953 and was later translated into several languages. In the epilogue, Kubizek wrote :

« Even though I, a fundamentally un-political individual, had always kept aloof from the political events of the period which ended forever in 1945, nevertheless, no power on earth could compel me to deny my friendship with Adolf Hitler. »

Kubizek's 2nd wife and widow Pauline (1906-2001) was credited with having provided the « Stocker Verlag » with additional photographs for the book's 4th edition, in 1975.

On 8 January 1956, Kubizek was named the 1st honorary member of the « Musikverein », in Eferding. He died on 23 October 1956, aged 68, in Linz and is buried in Eferding, Upper-Austria.

...

August Kubizek, the only surviving child of Michæl and Maria Kubizek, was born on 3rd August 1888. He had 3 sisters but they all died in childhood. After leaving school, he found work with a upholsterer in Linz, Upper-Austria.

Kubizek met Adolf Hitler at a Opera House, in 1904.

As Louis L. Snyder has pointed-out :

« Before long, August began to regard his chance acquaintance as his best friend. The 2 subsequently became room-mates and took frequent walks through the town and went on country excursions. The serious, tense, and meticulous Adolf dominated his friend, who served as a kind of audience. »

August later claimed that Hitler felt very strongly about political issues :

« It seemed like a volcano erupting. It was as though something quite apart from him was bursting out of him. »

Hitler's mother, Klara, was operated on for breast cancer in February, 1907.

Kubizek went to visit her :

« “ Frau ” Klara seemed more careworn than ever. Her face was deeply lined. Her eyes were lifeless, her voice sounded tired and resigned. I had the impression that, now that Adolf was no longer there, she had let herself go, and looked older and more ailing than ever. She certainly had concealed her condition from her son to make the parting easier for him. Or, perhaps, it was Adolf's impulsive nature that had kept-up her vitality. Now, on her own, she seemed to me an old, sick woman. »

Kubizek dreamt of becoming a conductor and, in 1908, Kubizek left his upholsterer's shop and journeyed to Vienna to study the viola at the Academy of Music. Hitler joined him as he intended to study art in the city. The 2 men roomed together at number 29/2 « Stumper Alley » (« Stumpergasse ») , Door 17, in the 6th district of Vienna. However, Hitler was rejected by the Academy of Fine-Arts, a blow from which he never recovered.

Kubizek claims that Hitler took the news very badly :

« Choking with his catalogue of hates, he would pour his fury over everything, against mankind in general who did not understand him, who did not appreciate him and by whom he was persecuted and cheated. I had the impression that Adolf Hitler became unbalanced. »

Kubizek completed his studies in 1912 and was hired as conductor of the Orchestra in Marburg. In 1914, he married Anna Funke and, over the next few years, she gave birth to 3 sons (Augustin, Karl Maria and Rudolf) . On the outbreak of the First World War, he joined the Austro-Hungarian Infantry. He was wounded in 1915 and, after making a full-recovery, he returned to action.

After the War, he became an official in the municipal council of Eferding, in Upper-Austria. In 1933, Kubizek sent Adolf Hitler a letter congratulating him on becoming Chancellor of Germany. Hitler replied but did not meet Kubizek until 9th April 1938, during a visit to Linz. Hitler offered to arrange for Kubizek to conduct one of Germany's leading Orchestra. When his friend politely refused, Hitler insisted on financing Kubizek's 3 sons education at the Anton Bruckner Conservatory. Hitler also hired Kubizek to write 2 short propaganda booklets about Hitler's early life.

Kubizek was arrested in December 1945 and was imprisoned and interrogated by United States Army officers. He was not released until 8th April 1947. His book, « The Young Hitler I Knew » , was published in 1953.

Ian Kershaw has argued in « Hitler 1889-1936 » (published in 1998) :

« Kubizek's post-War memoirs need to be treated with care, both in factual detail and in interpretation. They are a lengthened and embellished version of recollections he had originally been commissioned by the Nazi Party to compile. However, for all their weaknesses, his recollections have been shown to be a more credible source on Hitler's youth than was once thought. There can be no doubt that, whatever their deficiencies, they do contain important reflections of the young Hitler's personality, showing features in embryo which were to be all too prominent in later years. »

August Kubizek died on 23rd October 1956.

...

Aside from Opera, Adolf Hitler had little interest in Classical music. Sometimes, his friend musician August Kubizek got free tickets at the Vienna Conservatory for concerts performed in the « Goldensaal » of the « Musikverein » . There, Hitler, for the 1st time, listened to the music - more precisely, the 4th Symphony (the « Romantic ») of his Upper-Austrian compatriot, Anton Bruckner, which was still rarely played at the time and, according to Kubizek, was « intoxicated in every respect » . In later years, Hitler would proudly mention Bruckner ; for example, in 1942, after a performance of the 7th Symphony :

« Everything, folk-tunes from Upper-Austria, none of them adopted literally, but still, piece by piece, slow regional waltzes and other tunes I've been familiar with since my youth. What that man made out of the primitive material ! You can imagine what a rough time that little farmer had when he arrived in Vienna, in that metropolitan, decadent society. »

...

Adolf Hitler was obsessed with buildings and was constantly planning new living spaces, bridges, stations and museums. He also planned plays and endlessly discussed with August Kubizek the Operas they had seen together. Kubizek had genuine musical skills and could more than keep-up on this front. Richard Wagner, Franz Lehár and Anton Bruckner were their favourite composers. Adolf was always somewhat inscrutable, Kubizek says, but when faced with great art, fired by « his enthusiasm for beauty » , he would lower his defences. Adolf, however, was « a deeply serious man » who showed a « deadly earnestness, he never ceased to attack new problems, a care-free letting-go of himself was alien to him » .

...

No biographer can claim that August Kubizek was anything but an intimate and expert commentator on Adolf Hitler and his association with music.

Kubizek gives us a brief portrait of the teenager recalled half a Century later when he decided to write about his extraordinary friendship with the young Hitler. Music was the single common factor that most linked them together, and Kubizek remains superbly qualified to tell us about Hitler's interest, knowledge, and talent in music. Kubizek's account supports a view that Hitler, with or without his friend, attended an extraordinary number of Opera and music performances in numerous Opera Houses, including the Linz Opera House, the Vienna « Hofoper » , and the « Volksooper » in the Viennese district of Währing where performances featured the likes of Gustav Mahler and Anton Bruckner as conductors. Both Kubizek and Hitler considered Richard Wagner as their « nec plus ultra » composer and « just as other people quote their Gœthe and Schiller, we would quote Wagner, preferably “ Die Meistersinger ” » . And, « we studied, with the libretto and the music-score, those works we had not seen in Linz » . In precious 1st hand detail, Kubizek recalls some of the musical performances that Adolf and he attended, and the list is impressive :

In Vienna :

« The Flying Dutchman » , « Lohengrin » , « Tannhäuser » , « Tristan und Isolde » , « Die Meistersinger » have remained unforgettable as has « The Ring » and even « Parsifal » .

Earlier in Linz, in addition to performances of Richard Wagner, they had seen together « a surprisingly good “ Figaro ” » and « The Magic Flute » by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and « Der Freischütz » by Carl Maria von Weber.

These details of Hitler's romance with Classical music, out of childhood and youth, suggest that he had considerable knowledge about Classical music, in general, and formidable knowledge of Wagnerian Opera and similar grand Opera by the time he was only 18. We must suspect that he had begun attending serious music performances earlier, around ages 13 or 14.

Later, in the early stages of the Nazi movement, Hitler developed a friendly and even relaxed personal relationship and political association with the urbane, upper-class art reproduction scion Ernst Hanfstængl who was well-educated and talented in music. Hanfstængl noted in his memoir that he had acquired something of a reputation at Harvard University in piano.

He elaborated :

« My teachers in Munich had been August Schmid-Lindner and Bernhard Stavenhagen, the last pupil of Liszt, and my hands had given me a Mastery of the Romantic school. »

Hanfstængl's son, Egon, commented in the 1994 afterword to the memoir that one of his father's teachers of musicology, Schmid-Lindner, had said that, in his long career as a pedagogue, he had « never known anyone as naturally at home on the keyboard as this Ernst Hanfstængl » . Hanfstængl commented that at his « Pienzenauerstraße » house, in Munich, after a performance of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » at the « Hof-Theater » , in January 1933, Hitler and he discussed the experience. Hitler was « in his most benign mood. The conductor, that evening, had been Hans Knappertsbusch and Hitler had not liked his “ tempi ” and interpretation and was expatiating on the subject. He could really do so with good sense and would hum or whistle many of the passages, the words of which he knew by heart, in order to show what he meant » .

The most recent great biographer, however, with casual disparagement, dismisses Hitler's capabilities to understand

Wagner in the following words :

« Many attending the Wagner performances including Kubizek himself, were more skilled than Hitler, with his self-taught, amateurish, opinionated approach, in understanding and interpreting Wagner's music. »

And the denigration does not stop here but shifts to a different plane :

« Hitler, the non-entity, the mediocrity, the failure who wanted to live like a Wagnerian hero. »

Bombarded with so critical a view of Hitler, readers might ask :

How is it possible that such a man could even recognize a Wagnerian hero ?

Yet, the opinionated, amateurish non-entity would ultimately march through the vaunted Wagnerian themes of betrayal, sacrifice, redemption, and heroic death more closely and with greater effect than any man in life or myth. Hitler would make this latter-day, up-country march inspired significantly by Wagner's Operas.

Hitler's 2 favourite Operas were « Lohengrin » and « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , and his own character comprised elements of Lohengrin (chasteness) , « Meistersinger » 's Hans Sachs (paragon of the supremacy of German song) , Walter von Stolzing (artistic, noble competitor for the love of a pure and beautiful woman) , and the Flying Dutchman (doomed to wander the world's oceans seeking the love of a special woman faithful unto death) .

These figures are all actors in Wagner Operas and we can begin to sense the young man with the ineradicable artistic temperament developing into a many-sided human being and actor in a Wagnerian-styled Opera. Such a performer does not require a beautiful soul to perform beautifully, but rather « the actor must have the actor's facility for dramatization, momentary self-hypnosis » . Hitler, by late- 1908, was becoming not only a potential lead-voice in a Wagner-like Opera, but also, through his ambition in architecture, the designer of the stage-setting and the Opera House itself. And if this were not enough, Hitler, through his « studies » of Germanic myth and history, could also be imagined as both composer and director. Finally, through some as-then undiscovered talent, he would be the lead-voice in the whole drama. It would take Hitler, from 1908 to 1914, to develop a more intense nationalist outlook, and a Great War, from 1914 through 1918, to provide motive and opportunity to project himself into German nationalist politics in 1919. But when Hitler entered the German political scene at that time, it was not so much that he entered as an actor in a Wagner-like spectacle but that he, himself, began to compose what could be likened to a vast German political Opera.

The great biographers note that Hitler attempted to compose an Opera, in 1908, inspired by his discovery that Wagner had left behind an outline of a musical-drama about a mythical German hero, Wieland the Smith. Hitler would embrace the project based on his driving interest in and general knowledge of Opera and German mythology. To supplement his technical musical knowledge, Hitler made the effort an involuntary joint project with the gifted Kubizek. The biographers characterize the effort as contemptible, utopian, and trivial, and use it to show Hitler ineffectually scattering his efforts among chimerical schemes. In a work of over 800 pages, one of the great biographers would dismiss the episode of the Opera in a single contemptuous sentence, noting that « he took-up an idea that Wagner had dropped, and began writing an Opera about Wieland the Smith, full of bloody and incestuous nonsense » . Kubizek spent an entire chapter on the project, however, and continued to be affected by the artistic results. He commented in 1954 that :

« I still have before my eyes the Wolf Lake, where the 1st scene of the Opera was laid. From the Edda (old Norse epic) , a book that was sacred to him, he knew Iceland, the rugged island of the north. There, he laid the scene of his Opera. »

The intense work on the Opera brought the 2 friends closer together, and Kubizek remarked in an invaluable summary of 19 year old Hitler's character that :

« There was an incredible earnestness in him, a true passionate interest in everything that happened, and most important, an unflinching devotion to the “ grandeur ” of art. »

Pregnant with consequence for comprehending a future Hitler in politics, his friend of early manhood would point-out that :

« When a self-imposed task engrossed him completely and forced him to unceasing activity, it was as though a demon had taken possession of him. Oblivious of his surroundings, he never tired, he never slept. He ate nothing never before had I been so deeply impressed by this ecstatic creativeness. »

The great biographers portray Hitler in Vienna, in 1908, as indolent, lazy, and directionless-factors that apply to him but scarcely dominated his character.

Kubizek presents insights into the special imagination of the artistically tempered young Hitler in, yet, another remarkable paragraph ignored or missed by the biographers. Concerning music, Hitler remarked at this time in Vienna that it was not professors' wisdom in Conservatories that counted for creating Opera, but genius. This ambition to genius led him to a most extraordinary experiment. According to Kubizek, naturally gifted in music and with serious formal training :

« Adolf harked-back to the elementary possibilities of musical expression. Words seemed to him too complicated for this purpose (in Opera) and he tried to discover how isolated sounds could be linked to notes of music ; and, with this musical language, he combined certain colours. »

Quite remarkably, Hitler conceptualized an Opera in terms of sound, not words sung, and colour which would be merged and would become the foundation of what would finally appear on stage. Kubizek ends this nagging remembrance by noting that he was reminded of Hitler's essays, in this type of « composition » , a few years later when a « Russian composer caused some sensation in Vienna by similar experiments » .

Kubizek claimed that Hitler suddenly realized, during a free-seat attendance at the Vienna Concert Hall, that immortal music being presented should be available to the rural masses and the urban lower-classes, not given exclusively at one hall in Vienna to only 500 people. He was listening specifically to Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major, at the time. There already existed some pioneers of the idea of bringing art to « the people », but while the pioneers applied modest measures and approached their goal haltingly, Hitler, in a way that would characterize him as an adult and as leader of Germany, disdained half measures and conceptualized total solutions.

In the 1908 affair of bringing art to the people, Hitler 1st gave an indication that he had a fresh idea on the world of music by using a peculiar new expression with Kubizek : « that Orchestra which tours the provinces » . Soon, Hitler used the words « mobile Orchestra » because the word « touring » reminded him of 2nd rate theatrical companies. Finally, Hitler referred to his new instrument of mass-culture as a « mobile “ Reich ” Orchestra », eerily reminiscent of his later exploitation of automobile and airplane for political campaigning and his backing of the motorization of the German army of the 1930's. The basic idea of a mobile « Reich » Orchestra illustrates Hitler's artistic imagination. Kubizek recalled the project in so much detail because of his own interest and technical superiority in music and commented that :

« Adolf's solution was both brilliant and simple : an Orchestra under a gifted conductor would be organized, capable of performing Classic, Romantic, and modern Symphonic music and sent-out to the country. »

The problem of getting beyond the span of the railway would be solved by using the newly-emergent motor-car. Hitler's imagination triumphed again when faced with the fundamental problem of just where such an Orchestra would present its program in the numerous small-towns of the Empire. He informed Kubizek that there were churches everywhere with a propiate cover, variable but reasonable dimensions, and effective acoustics, therefore, the Operas and Symphonies should be presented in them.

2 additional confrontations between Kubizek and Hitler highlight the latter's style of action and are invaluable for understanding his future political actions. In a scene ridiculous for intense argument over a fantasy project but sublime for insight into Hitler's mindcast of final solutions and lack of ordinary sense of proportion, note the following collision over the subject of instruments for the Orchestra in which Hitler outlandishly insisted on 3 large and expensive double-action harps ...

Kubizek :

« To what purpose an experienced conductor can manage with only one ? »

Hitler :

« Ridiculous. How can you play the “ Fire Music ” with only 1 double-action harp in the Orchestra ? »

Kubizek :

« Then, the “ Fire Music ” won't be included in the repertoire. »

Hitler :

« You bet it will. »

« Adolf Hitler - My Boyhood Friend »

« He alone knows Hitler, the “ Führer ”, who knows Hitler, the boy. »

In 1951, August Kubizek, who had rejected other post-War offers for his memoirs, agreed to publish « Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund » (Adolf Hitler, My Boyhood Friend) through the « Leopold Stocker Verlag » .

It caused a stir when it was released in 1953 and was later translated into several languages.

In the epilogue, Kubizek wrote :

« Even though I, a fundamentally unpolitical individual, had always kept aloof from the political events of the period which ended forever in 1945, nevertheless, no power on earth could compel me to deny my friendship with Adolf Hitler. »

Editor's Note

Kubizek wrote « Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund » in German, for a mainly German and Austrian readership.

The world that he describes in his account is the world of central Europe, (« Mittel-Europa ») , as it was at the end of the 19th Century, and the beginning of the 20th Century.

He assumes a knowledge, on the part of his readers, of the politics, culture, and personalities of that particular place and time.

For English readers, who may not be familiar with the particular period of history in question, the editor has provided copious notes, plus a brief « Foreword » and a short biography of August Kubizek.

FOREWORD

Adolf Hitler is undoubtedly the most enigmatic figure of the 20th Century or, possibly, of any Century in recorded history.

Here is a man, un-remarkable in most ways in his youth and early manhood, who eventually was looked upon, quite literally, as a god by most Germans and Austrians, and who held an entire society, from aristocrats to generals, intellectuals, university professors, captains of industry, artists, architects, engineers, philosophers (in fact, almost all levels of society) in his sway, captivating them in a way that no other person has been able to captivate whole generations.

And when defeat and annihilation faced these same people, the vast majority continued to be held by this man's strange power right to the end, and to the very gates of death.

But this man had only one friend (a friend from his boyhood) and, even then, it was a one-sided relationship with Hitler, as always, dominating.

And so, here we have the recollections of this friend (biased undoubtedly) but giving us a fascinating insight into the personality of Adolf Hitler.

August Kubizek : a brief biography

August (« Gustl ») Kubizek (born on 3 August 1888, in Linz ; died on 23 October 1956, in Eferding) .

This account deals with the darkest, perhaps, the most formative and, therefore, in some sense, the most interesting period of Hitler's life.

His public life is now fully-indeed oppressively-documented ; his mature character is now, seemingly, fully-known.

But his crucial early years, the years between leaving school and joining the Bavarian army are, in the language of one of his biographers (Thomas Orr. « Das War Hitler-Revue » , Munich, 1952, No. 4) , « impenetrable » .

And, yet, those are the years in which that character, that unparalleled « will power » , that relentless systematic mind was formed.

Any light on those undocumented years is welcome.

The light shed by this account is more than that : it penetrates and reveals the character of the young Hitler as no other study has done.

But, before showing this, let us examine the meagre framework of fact into which it is fitted.

August was the 1st born and only surviving child of Michael and Maria Kubizek.

His sisters Maria, Therese and Karoline died in early childhood.

Kubizek later wrote that this was a striking parallel between his own life and that of Adolf Hitler, whose mother had lost 4 children prematurely.

As the surviving sons of grief stricken mothers, August and Adolf could not help but feel they had been spared or « chosen » by fate.

Kubizek and Hitler 1st met while competing for standing room in the « Landestheater » in Linz, Upper-Austria.

Because of their shared passion for the Operas of Richard Wagner, they quickly became close friends and, later, room-mates in Vienna while both sought admission into college.

Editor's Note

Wilhelm Richard Wagner (born on 22 May 1813 ; died on 13 February 1883) was a German composer, conductor, theatre director, philosopher, music theorist, poet, essayist and writer, primarily known for his Operas (or « music-dramas » , as they were later called) .

Wagner's compositions, particularly those of his later-period, are notable for their complex texture, rich harmonies and orchestration, and the elaborate use of leitmotifs : musical themes associated with individual characters, places, ideas or plot elements.

Unlike most other Opera composers, Wagner wrote both the music and the libretto for every one of his stage-works. Perhaps, the 2 most well-known extracts from his works are the « Ride of the Valkyries » from the Opera « Die Walküre » , and the Wedding March (Bridal Chorus) from the Opera « Lohengrin » .

...

The 2 shared a small-room at number 29/2 « Stumpergasse » , Door 17, in the 6th district of Vienna, from 22 February to early July 1908.

Editor's Note

In 1804, during the Napoleonic Wars, Vienna became the capital of the Austrian Empire and continued to play a major role in European and world politics, including hosting the 1814 Congress of Vienna.

After the Austro-Hungarian Compromise of 1867, Vienna remained the capital of what was, then, the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

The city was a centre of Classical music, for which the title of the First Viennese School is sometimes applied.

During the latter half of the 19th Century, the city developed what had previously been the bastions and glacis into the « Ringstraße », a new boulevard surrounding the historical town and a major prestige project.

Former suburbs were incorporated, and the city of Vienna grew dramatically.

In 1918, after World War I, Vienna became capital of the First Austrian Republic.

From the late- 19th Century to 1938, the city remained a centre of high-culture and modernism.

A world capital of music, the city played host to composers such as Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß.

The city's cultural contributions in the 1st half of the 20th Century included, amongst many, the Vienna Secession movement, psychoanalysis, the Second Viennese School, the architecture of Adolf Loos and the philosophy of Ludwig Wittgenstein.

...

As the only son of a self-employed upholsterer, August was expected to, someday, take-over his father's business, but he secretly harboured dreams of becoming a conductor.

With Adolf's encouragement, he devoted more and more of his time to this passion, completing all the musical training available to him in Linz, however, to achieve his goal, he would require higher-education in music which was only offered in Vienna.

It was Adolf Hitler who, at the age of 18, successfully persuaded Kubizek's father to let his son go to the metropolis to attend the Conservatory.

This, Kubizek wrote, changed the course of his life for good.

He was immediately accepted into the Vienna Conservatory where he quickly made a name for himself.

Hitler, however, was twice denied entrance into Vienna's art academy, a fact which he kept hidden from his friend for some time.

Then, quite suddenly, on November 20th, 1908, Kubizek returned to Vienna and, arriving at number 29 « Stumpergasse », found that his friend had disappeared, leaving no address.

It was only 40 years later that Kubizek was to learn what had happened :

« My friend had moved-out of the “ Stumpergasse ” because the rent was too much for him and had found much cheaper accommodation at a so-called Men's Hostel on the “ Meldemannstrasse ”. »

Adolf had disappeared into the shady depths of the Metropolis.

Then, began for him, those years of bitterest misery of which he himself says little and of which there is no reliable witness.

Kubizek completed his studies in 1912 and was hired as conductor of the Orchestra in Marburg an der Drau, in Lower-Styria (called : Maribor in Slovenia, after 1918) .

He was later offered a position at the « Stadttheater » in Klagenfurt, but this job and his musical career were cut short by the beginning of World War I.

Before leaving for the front, he married Anna Funke (born on 7 October 1887 ; died on 4 October 1976) , a violinist from Vienna with whom he had 3 sons : Augustin, Karl Maria and Rudolf.

From August 1914 until November 1918, Kubizek served as a reservist in Regiment No. 2 of the Austro-Hungarian Infantry.

In the Carpathian winter campaign of 1915, he was wounded at Eperjes, in Hungary (now, Prešov, in Slovakia) , and later, evacuated to Budapest in an ambulance train.

After months of convalescence, he returned to the front and was attached to a mechanized corps in Vienna.

After the War, Kubizek accepted a position as an official in the municipal council of Eferding, in Upper-Austria, and music became his hobby.

After seeing Hitler on the front-page of the « Münchner Illustrierte » (around 1920) , Kubizek followed his friend's career with some interest, although he did not attempt to contact him until 1933 when he wrote to congratulate him on having become Chancellor of Germany.

6 months later, Kubizek received an unexpected reply from Hitler, who wrote to his old friend :

« “ Gustl ”, I should be very glad to revive once more with you those memories of the best years of my life. »

30 years after Hitler had broken-off contact with Kubizek, the 2 friends were reunited on April 9th, 1938, during one of Hitler's visits in Linz.

The 2 spoke for over 1 hour at the Hotel Weinzinger and Hitler offered Kubizek the conductorship of an Orchestra, which Kubizek politely refused.

Upon learning of his friend's 3 sons, Hitler did, however, insist on financing their educations at the Anton Bruckner Conservatory in Linz.

Hitler later invited Kubizek to attend the Bayreuth Festival as his guest, in 1939, and, again, in 1940. Experiences described by Kubizek as :

« The happiest hours of my earthly existence. »

Editor's Note

The Bayreuth Festival (« Bayreuther Festspiele ») is a music Festival held annually in Bayreuth, Germany, at which performances of Operas by the 19th Century German composer, Richard Wagner, are presented.

Wagner himself conceived of and promoted the idea of a special Festival to showcase his own works, in particular, his monumental cycle « Der Ring des Nibelungen » and « Parsifal » .

Performances take place in a specially designed theatre, the « Bayreuth Festspielhaus » .

Wagner personally supervised the design and construction of the theatre, which contained many architectural innovations to accommodate the huge Orchestras for which Wagner wrote as well as the composer's particular vision about the staging of his works.

In the 1920's, well before the rise of the Nazi Party, Winifred Wagner became a strong supporter and close personal friend of Adolf Hitler ; her correspondence with Hitler has never been released by the Wagner family.

She and other Festival leaders were members of Nazi chief ideologue Alfred Rosenberg's « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (Fighting League for German Culture) which actively suppressed modernist music and works by « degenerate » artists.

The Festival maintained some artistic independence under the 3rd « Reich » .

It was under the 3rd « Reich » that the Festival made its 1st break from tradition, abandoning the deteriorating 19th Century sets created by Richard Wagner.

Many protested at the changes, including prominent conductors such as Arturo Toscanini and Richard Strauß, and even some members of the Wagner family.

In their view, any change to the Festival was a profanation against « the Master » (Wagner) .

Nevertheless, Hitler approved of the changes, thus, paving the way for more innovations in the decades to come.

...

Kubizek saw Hitler for the last time on 23 July 1940, although as late as 1944, Hitler sent Kubizek's mother a food basket for her 80th birthday.

His friend told him :

« This War will set us back many years in our building programme. It is a tragedy. I did not become Chancellor of the Greater German “ Reich ” to fight wars. »

The « Führer » was speaking after the successful campaigns in Poland and France.

When the tide began to turn against Hitler's favour, Kubizek, who had avoided politics all his life, became a member of the NSDAP, in 1942, as a gesture of loyalty to his friend.

In December 1945, Kubizek gathered the collection of post-cards and other keepsakes given to him by Hitler during their youth and concealed them carefully in the basement of his house, in Eferding.

He was arrested shortly afterwards and held at Glaserbach, where he was imprisoned and interrogated by the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command for 16 months.

His home was searched, but the Hitler correspondence and drawings were not found.

On 8 January 1956, Kubizek was named the 1st honorary member of the « Musikverein » , in Eferding.

He died on 23 October 1956, aged 68, in Linz and is buried in Eferding, Upper-Austria.

And what is the character which Hitler showed to Kubizek in these 4 years of friendship ?

Externally, Hitler appears a drifting character : he has failed at school, has no employment, has been rejected by the Academy, is in Vienna for no clearly stated purpose, and lives on a pittance eked-out by painting post-cards.

But behind this shiftless exterior, Kubizek constructs what must have been there, although it was not apparent to casual acquaintances : the character of the man who, from these beginnings, without any other natural advantages besides his own personality, became the most powerful ruler and conqueror of modern history.

Here, we see along with the incipient monomania, the repetitive « clichés », and the Wagnerian Romanticism of his later years - the early evidence of that unbreakable will power, that extraordinary self-confidence.

We see the penniless, unemployed, unemployable young Hitler, at 16, confidently re-building in his imagination the city of Linz, as he was afterwards to rebuild it in fact and, never for a moment, doubting that he would one day carry-out these improbable plans ; we see him exercising over an elderly Austrian upholsterer that irresistible hypnotic power with which he was, afterwards, to seduce a whole nation ; we see him, in Vienna, fortifying himself against a corrupt and purposeless society by adopting an iron asceticism, like some ancient crusader guarding himself against corruption in a pagan world.

And then, turning to detail, we see in Vienna, when Kubizek was closest to him, the working of Hitler's mind as it feels its way towards the beginnings of National-Socialism : his voracious but systematic reading ; his sudden discovery of politics ; his hatred of the social injustice of urban life represented to him, the architect, by squalid slum buildings ; his fear - the fear which he was afterwards to exploit among millions of lower-middle-class Germans of sinking into proletarian status.

Behind the outward meaninglessness of his hand-to-mouth existence, we see the inner purposefulness of his studies, his experiences, his reasoning.

The account may sometimes be romanticized, but not, I think, much, or more than is legitimate and indeed inevitable in the recollections of youth.

By all external checks, Kubizek's account is reliable, and to anyone who has studied the mind and character of Hitler, it is also inherently plausible.

Hitler's character, in the years after 1908, undoubtedly became harder.

In some respects, it also changed, not its quality but its direction.

We learn casually from Kubizek that, in his Vienna days, Hitler was a pacifist ; and, certainly, the ruthlessness of his later worship of war becomes more comprehensible when we realize that it was the religion of a convert.

But, fundamentally, we see here what we have never seen before, and what superficial observers have never shown : the formation of that positive character which, afterwards, achieved the dreadful miracle of 20th Century ; the character of the man who, in circumstances of apparent hopelessness, resolved not to rest till he had found an answer not only to his problem, but to the problem of a continent.

Kubizek says :

« He did not know what resignation meant. He who resigned, he thought, lost his right to live. »

Thanks to the experience and the harsh thought of those years, Hitler was afterwards able, in circumstances which he could not then have envisaged, to mobilise, some of the best as well as some of the worst instincts of a defeated people :

« What though the field be lost ?
All is not lost ; the unconquerable Will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate.
And courage never to submit or yield :
And what is else not to be overcome ? »

The Austro-Hungarian Empire

The setting for Kubizek's description of the early life of Adolf Hitler is the Austro-Hungarian Empire : an Empire which disappeared at the conclusion of the Great War of 1914-1918.

The Austro-Hungarian Empire, more formally known as the Kingdoms and Lands Represented in the Imperial Council and the Lands of the Holy Hungarian Crown of Saint-Stephen, was a constitutional monarchic union between the crowns of the Austrian Empire and the Kingdom of Hungary in Central Europe.

The union was a result of the Austro-Hungarian Compromise of 1867, under which the House of Habsburg agreed to share power with the separate Hungarian government, dividing the territory of the former Austrian Empire between them.

The Austrian and the Hungarian lands became independent entities enjoying equal status. Austria-Hungary was a multi-national realm and one of the world's great powers at the time.

The dual monarchy had existed for 51 years until it dissolved, on 31st October 1918, before a military defeat on the Italian front of the First World War.

The realm comprised modern-day Austria : Hungary, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Slovenia, and parts of Italy, Montenegro, Poland, Romania, Serbia, and Ukraine.

The Habsburg monarch ruled as Emperor of Austria over the western and northern half of the country that was the Austrian Empire (Cisleithania or Lands represented in the Imperial Council) , and as King of Hungary over the Kingdom of Hungary (see small arms left) (Transleithania or Lands of the Crown of Saint Stephen) which enjoyed a great deal of sovereignty with only a few joint affairs (principally, foreign relations and defence) .

The division was so marked in fact that there was no common citizenship : a person was either an Austrian or a Hungarian citizen (legally, it wasn't allowed to hold both citizenships at the same time) .

The 2 capitals of the Monarchy were Vienna for Austria and Buda for Hungary, the latter united with neighbouring Pest as Budapest from 1870.

Vienna, however, would serve as the nation's primary capital.

Austria-Hungary was geographically the 2nd largest country in Europe after the Russian Empire (621,538 square kilometres - 239,977 square miles - in 1905) , and the 3rd most populous (after Russia and the German Empire) . As a multi-national Empire and great power in an era of national awakening, it found its political life dominated by disputes among the 11 principal national groups.

The Monarchy bore the name internationally of « Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie » (on decision by Franz-Josef I, in 1868) .

Empire of Austria (Cisleithania) : 1. Bohemia, 2. Bukovina, 3. Carinthia, 4. Carniola, 5. Dalmatia, 6. Galicia, 7. Küstenland, 8. Lower-Austria, 9. Moravia, 10. Salzburg, 11. Silesia, 12. Styria, 13. Tyrol, 14. Upper-Austria, 15. Vorarlberg.

Kingdom of Hungary (Transleithania) : 16. Hungary, proper 17. Croatia-Slavonia.

Austrian-Hungarian Condominium : 18. Bosnia and Herzegovina.

During the period covered by Kubizek's account, the ruler of the Austro-Hungarian Empire was Franz-Josef I.

Franz-Josef I (in Hungarian, I. Ferenc József) born on 18 August 1830, and died on 21 November 1916. He was Emperor of Austria, King of Bohemia, King of Croatia, Apostolic King of Hungary, King of Galicia and Lodomeria and Grand Duke of Cracow, from 1848 until his death in 1916.

In December of 1848, Emperor Ferdinand I of Austria abdicated the throne as part of « Ministerpräsident » Felix zu Schwarzenberg's plan to end the Revolutions of 1848 in Austria, which allowed Ferdinand's nephew Franz-Josef to ascend to the throne.

Largely considered to be a reactionary, Franz-Josef spent his early reign resisting constitutionalism in his domains.

The Austrian Empire was forced to cede most of its claim to Lombardy-Venetia to the Kingdom of Piedmont-Sardinia following the conclusion of the Second Italian War of Independence, in 1859 ; and the 3rd Italian War of Independence, in 1866.

Although Franz-Josef ceded no territory to the Kingdom of Prussia after the Austrian defeat in the Austro-Prussian War, the Peace of Prague (23 August 1866) settled the German question in favour of Prussia, which prevented the unification of Germany under the House of Habsburg (« Großdeutsche Lösung ») .

Franz-Josef was troubled by nationalism during his entire reign.

He concluded the « Ausgleich » of 1867, which granted greater autonomy to Hungary, hence, transforming the Austrian Empire into the Austro-Hungarian Empire under his Dual Monarchy.

His domains were, then, ruled peacefully for the next 45 years, although Franz-Josef's personal life became increasingly tragic after the suicide of his son, the Crown Prince Rudolf, in 1889, and the assassination of his wife, the Empress Elisabeth, in 1898.

Franz-Josef died on 21 November 1916, after ruling his domains for almost 68 years.

He was succeeded by his grandnephew Karl.

INTRODUCTION

« I was born in Linz on the 3rd of August, 1888. »

« Before his marriage, my father had been an upholsterer's assistant at a furniture manufacturer's in Linz. »

Editor's Note

Linz is the 3rd largest city of Austria and capital of the State of Upper-Austria (« Oberösterreich ») .

It is located in the north centre of Austria, approximately 30 kilometres (19 miles) south of the Czech border, on both sides of the river Danube.

The city was founded by the Romans, who called it « Lentia » .

The name « Linz » was 1st recorded in the year 799 A.D. , after Bavarians expanded south and Linz became a center of trade.

It was a provincial and local government city of the Holy Roman Empire, and an important trading-point connecting several routes, on either side of the river Danube from the East to the West and Bohemia and Poland from north to the Balkans and Italy to the south.

Being the city where the Habsburg Emperor Friedrich III spent his last years, it was, for a short period of time, the most important city in the Empire.

It lost its status to Vienna and Prague after the death of the Emperor, in 1493.

One important inhabitant of the city was Johannes Kepler, who spent several years of his life in the city teaching mathematics.

He discovered, on 15 May 1618, the distance-cubed-over-time-squared (or « 3rd ») law of planetary motion.

The local public university, Johannes Kepler University, is named after him.

Another famous citizen was Anton Bruckner, who spent the years between 1855 and 1868 working as a local composer and church organist in the city.

The local concert-hall, the « Brucknerhaus », and a local private music and arts university are named after him.

...

My father used to have his mid-day meal in a little “ café ” and it was there he met my mother who was working as a waitress.

They fell in love, and were married in July, 1887.

At 1st, the young couple lived in the house of my mother's parents.

My father's wages were low, the work was hard, and my mother had to give-up her job when she was expecting me. Thus, I was born in rather miserable circumstances.

1 year later, my sister Maria was born, but died at a tender age.

The following year, Therese appeared ; she died at the age of 4.

My 3rd sister, Karoline, fell desperately ill, lingered-on for some years, and died when she was 8. My mother's grief was boundless. Throughout her life, she suffered from the fear of losing me, too ; for I was the only one left to her of her 4 children.

Consequently, all my mother's love was concentrated upon me.

Meanwhile, my father had set-up on his own and had opened an upholsterer's business at number 9 « Klammsstraße » .

The old « Baernreiterhaus », heavy and ungainly, which still stands there unaltered, became the home of my childhood and youth.

The narrow, sombre « Klamstraße » looked rather poor in comparison with its continuation, the broad and airy promenade, with its lawns and trees.

Our unhealthy housing conditions had certainly contributed to the early death of my sisters.

In the « Baernreiterhaus » , things were different. On the ground-floor, there was the work-shop and, on the 1st floor, our apartment, which consisted of 2 rooms and a kitchen. But now, my father was never free from money troubles. Business was bad.

More than once, he contemplated closing-down the business and, again, taking a job with the furniture-makers. Yet, each time, he managed to overcome his difficulties at the last moment.

I started school, a very unpleasant experience.

My mother wept over the bad reports I brought home. Her sorrow was the only thing that could persuade me to work harder. Whereas for my father, there was no question but that I should, in due course, take-over his business (why else did he slave from morning till night ?) , it was my mother's desire that I should study in spite of my bad reports ; 1st, I should have 4 years at the Grammar School, then, perhaps, go to the Teachers' Training College (« Präparandie ») .

But I would not hear of it, I was glad when my father put his foot down and, when I was 10, sent me to the Council School. In this way, my father thought, my future was finally decided.

For a long time, however, there had been another influence in my life for which I would have sold my soul : music. This love was given full-expression when, at 9 years of age, I was given a violin as a Christmas present.

I remember distinctly every single detail of that Christmas, and when today, in my old age, I think back, my conscious life seems to have started with that event. The eldest son of our neighbour was a young pupil-teacher and he gave me violin lessons. I learned fast and well.

When my 1st violin teacher took a job in the country, I entered the lower-grade of the Linz School of Music, but I did not like it there very much, perhaps, because I was much more advanced than the other pupils.

After the holidays, I once more had private lessons, this time with an old Sergeant-Major of the Austro-Hungarian Army Music Corps, who straightway made clear to me that I knew nothing and, then, began to teach me the elements of violin playing « in the military fashion » . It was real barrack-square drill with old Kopetzky.

Sometimes when I got fed-up with his rough sergeant-major manners, he consoled me by assuring me that, with more progress, I should certainly be taken as apprentice-musician into the army, in his opinion, the peak of a musician's glory.

I gave-up my study with Kopetzky and entered the intermediate class of the School of Music where I was taught by Professor Heinrich Dessauer, a gifted, efficient and sensitive teacher. At the same time, I studied the trumpet, trombone and musical theory, and played in the students' Orchestra.

I was already playing with the idea of making music my life's work when hard reality made itself felt. I had hardly left the Council School when I had to join my father's business as an apprentice. Formerly, when there was a shortage of labour, I had had to lend a hand in the work-shop and, so, was familiar with the work.

It is a repulsive job to re-upholster old furniture by unravelling and remaking the stuffing. The work goes-on in clouds of dust in which the poor apprentice is smothered. What rubbishy old mattresses were brought to our work-shop !

All the illnesses that had been overcome (and some of them not overcome) left their mark on these old beds. No wonder that upholsterers do not live long. But soon, I also learnt the more pleasant aspects of my work : personal taste and a feeling for art are necessary in it, and it is not too far removed from interior decorating. One would visit well-to-do homes, one saw and heard a lot and, above all, in winter there was little or nothing to do.

And this leisure, naturally, I devoted to music.

When I had successfully passed my journeyman's test, my father wanted to take on jobs in other workshops. I saw his point, but for me the essential thing was, not to improve my craftsmanship, but to advance my musical studies.

Thus, I chose to stay on in my father's work-shop, since I could dispose of my time with more freedom there than under another Master.

« There are generally too many violins in an orchestra, but never enough violas. »

To this day, I am grateful to Professor Dessauer for having applied this maxim and turned me into a good viola player.

Musical life in Linz, in those days, was on a remarkably high-level ; August Göllerich was the Director of the Music Society (« Musikverein ») .

Being a disciple of Franz Liszt's and a collaborator of Richard Wagner's at Bayreuth, Göllerich was the very man to be the musical leader of Linz, so much maligned as a « peasants' town » .

Editor's Note

The 19th Century Hungarian composer, pianist, conductor, and teacher Franz Liszt was born on 22 October 1811 and died on 31 July 1886.

Liszt became renowned in Europe during the 19th Century for his virtuosic skill as a pianist.

He was said by his contemporaries to have been the most technically advanced pianist of his age.

In the 1840's, he was considered by some to be, perhaps, the greatest pianist of all time.

He was also a well-known composer, piano teacher, and conductor.

He was a benefactor to other composers, including Richard Wagner, Hector Berlioz, Camille Saint-Saëns, Edvard Grieg and Alexander Borodin.

As a composer, Liszt was one of the most prominent representatives of the « Neudeutsche Schule » (New German School) .

He left behind an extensive and diverse body of work in which he influenced his contemporaries.

Some of his most notable contributions were the invention of the Symphonic poem, developing the concept of thematic transformation as part of his experiments in musical form and making radical departures in harmony.

...

Every year, the Music Society gave 2 Symphonic concerts and 1 Special concert, when usually a choral work was performed, with orchestra.

My mother, in spite of her humble origin, loved music, and hardly ever missed one of these performances.

While still a small boy, I was taken to concerts.

My mother explained everything to me, and, as I came to master several instruments, my appreciation of these concerts grew.

My highest aim in life was to play in the orchestra, either on the viola or the trumpet.

But, for the time being, it was still a matter of remaking dusty old mattresses and papering walls. In those years, my father suffered much from the usual occupational diseases of an upholsterer. When persistent lung trouble once kept him in bed for 6 months, I had to run the work-shop alone.

Thus, the 2 things existed side by side in my young life : work, which made calls on my strength and even on my lungs ; and music, which was my whole love.

I should never have thought that there could be a connection between the 2.

And, yet, there was.

One of my father's customers was a member of the Provincial Government, which also controlled the Theatre.

One day, they came to us for repair the cushions of a set of Rococo furniture.

When the work was done, my father sent me to deliver them to the Theatre.

The stage-manager directed me to the stage, where I was to replace the cushions in their frames. A rehearsal was in progress. I don't know which piece was being rehearsed, but it was certainly an Opera.

What I remember still is the enchantment which came over me as I stood there on the stage, in the midst of the singers.

I was transformed as though now, for the 1st time, I had discovered myself.

Theatre ! What a world !

A man stood there, magnificently attired. He seemed to me like a creature from another planet. He sang so gloriously that I could not imagine this man could ever speak in the ordinary way. The Orchestra responded to his mighty voice. Here I was on more familiar ground but, in this moment, everything that music had hitherto meant to me seemed to be trifling. Only in conjunction with the stage did music seem to reach a higher, more solemn plane, the highest imaginable.

But there I stood, a miserable little upholsterer, and fitted the cushions back into their place in the Rococo suite. What a lamentable job ! What a wretched existence !

Theatre, that was the word that I had searched for. Play and reality became confused in my excited mind. That awkward fellow with ruffled hair, apron and rolled-up shirt sleeves who stood in the wings and fumbled with his cushions as though to justify his presence - was he really only a poor upholsterer ? A poor, despised simpleton, pushed from pillar to post and treated by the customer as if he were a step-ladder, placed here, placed there according to the moment's need and, then, its usefulness over, put aside ?

It would have been absolutely natural if that little upholsterer with his tools in his hand had stepped forward to the footlights and, at a sign from the conductor, had sung his part only to prove to the audience in the stalls, nay to an attentive world, that, in reality, he was not that pale, lanky fellow from the upholsterer's shop on the « Klammsstraße » , but that his place was really on the stage in the Theatre !

Ever since that moment, I have remained under the spell of the Theatre.

Washing down the walls in a customer's house, slapping on the paste, affixing the undercoat of newspaper and, then, pasting on the wallpaper, I was all the time dreaming of roaring applause in the Theatre, seeing myself as conductor in front of an Orchestra.

Such dreaming did not really help my work, and, at times, it would happen that the pieces of wallpaper were sadly out of position.

But, once back in the work-shop, my sick father soon made me realize what responsibilities faced me.

Thus, I swayed between dream and reality.

At home, nobody had any inkling of my state of mind ; for rather than utter a word about my secret ambitions, I would have bitten-off my tongue.

Even from my mother, I hid my hopes and plans, but she, perhaps, guessed what was occupying my thoughts. But should I have added to her many worries ? Thus, there was no one to whom I could unburden myself.

I felt terribly lonely, like an outcast, as lonely as only a young man can be to whom is revealed, for the 1st time, life's beauty and its danger.

The Theatre gave me new courage.

I didn't miss a single Opera performance. However tired I was after my work, nothing could keep me from the theatre. Naturally, with the small wages that my father paid me, I could only afford a ticket for standing-room.

Therefore, I used to go regularly into the so-called « Promenade » , from which one had the best view ; and, moreover, I found no other place had better acoustics. Just above the « Promenade » was the Royal box supported by 2 wooden columns.

These columns were very popular with the « habitués » of the « Promenade » as they were the only places where one could prop oneself up with an undisturbed view of the stage. For if you leaned against the walls, these very columns were always in your field of vision.

I was happy to be able to rest my weary back against the smooth pillars, after having spent a hard day on the top of the stepladder ! Of course, you had to be there early to be sure to get that place.

Often it is the trivial things which make a lasting impression on one's memory. I can still see myself rushing into the Theatre, undecided whether to choose the left - or the right-hand pillar. Often, however, one of the 2 columns, the right-hand one, was already taken ; somebody was even more enthusiastic than I was.

Half-annoyed, half-surprised, I glanced at my rival.

He was a remarkably pale, skinny youth, about my own age, who was following the performance with glistening eyes. I surmised that he came from a better-class home, for he was always dressed with meticulous care and was very reserved.

We took note of each other without exchanging a word.

During the interval of a performance, some time later, we started talking, as apparently neither of us approved of the casting of one of the parts. We discussed it together and rejoiced in our common adverse criticism.

I marvelled at the quick, sure grasp of the other.

In this, he was undoubtedly my superior.

On the other hand, when it came to talking of purely musical matters, I felt my own superiority. I cannot give the exact date of this 1st meeting ; but I am sure it was around All Saints' Day, in 1904.

This went on for some time - he revealing nothing of his own affairs, nor did I think it necessary to talk about myself. But all the more intensely did we occupy ourselves with whatever performance there happened to be and sensed that we both had the same enthusiasm for the Theatre.

Once, after the performance, I accompanied him home to number 31 « Humboldtstraße » .When we took leave of each other, he gave me his name : Adolf Hitler.

FIRST MEETING

From now on, we saw each other at every Opera performance and, also, met outside the Theatre and, on most evenings, we would go for a stroll together along the « Landstraße » .

While Linz, in the last decade, has become a modern industrial town and attracted people from all parts of the Danube region, it was then only a country town.

In the suburbs, there were still the substantial, fortress-like farm-houses, and tenement houses were springing-up in the surrounding fields where cattle were still grazing.

In the little taverns, the people sat drinking the local wine ; everywhere, you could hear the broad country dialect. There was only horse-drawn traffic in the town and the carriers took care to see that Linz remained « in the country » . The townspeople, though largely themselves of peasant origin and often closely related to the country folk, tended to draw away from the latter the more intimately they were connected with them.

Almost all the influential families of the town knew each other ; the business world, the civil servants and the military determined the tone of society.

Everybody who was anybody took his evening stroll along the main-street of the city, which leads from the railway station to the bridge over the Danube and is called significantly « Landstraße » .

As Linz had no university, the young people in every walk of life were all the more eager to imitate the habits of university students.

Social life on the « Landstraße » could almost compete with that of Vienna's « Ringstraße » . At least, the Linzers thought so.

Patience did not seem to be one of Adolf's outstanding characteristics ; whenever I was late for an appointment, he came at once to the work-shop to fetch me, no matter whether I was repairing an old, black horse-hair sofa or an old-fashioned wing chair, or anything else.

My work was to him nothing but a tiresome hindrance to our personal relationship. Impatiently, he would twirl the small black cane which he always carried. I was surprised that he had so much spare time and asked innocently whether he had a job.

« Of course not. » , was his gruff reply.

This answer, which I thought very peculiar, he elaborated at some length.

He did not consider that any particular work, a « bread-and-butter job » , as he called it, was necessary for him.

Such an opinion I had never heard from anybody before. It contradicted every principle which had so far governed my life. At 1st, I saw in his talk nothing more than youthful bragging, although Adolf's bearing and his serious and assured manner of speaking did not strike me at all as that of a braggart. In any case, I was very surprised at his opinions but refrained from asking, for the time being, at least, any further questions, because he seemed to be very sensitive about questions that did not suit him ; that much I had already discovered. So, it was more reasonable to talk about « Lohengrin » , the Opera which enchanted us more than any other, than about our personal affairs.

Perhaps, he was the son of rich parents, I thought, perhaps, he had just come into a fortune and could afford to live without a « bread-and-butter job » - in his mouth, that expression sounded full of contempt. By no means, did I imagine he was work-shy, for there was not even a grain of the superficial, care-free idler in him.

When we passed by the « Café Baumgartner » , he would get wildly worked-up about the young men who were exhibiting themselves at marble-topped tables behind the big window-panes and wasting their time in idle gossip, without apparently realizing how much this indignation was contradicted by his own way of life. Perhaps, some of those who were sitting « in the shop window » already had a good job and a secure income.

Perhaps, this Adolf is a student ? This had been my 1st impression.

The black ebony cane, topped by an elegant ivory shoe, was essentially a student's attribute.

On the other hand, it seemed strange that he had chosen as his friend just a simple upholsterer, who was always afraid that people would smell the glue with which he had been working during the day. If Adolf were a student, he had to be at school somewhere.

Suddenly, I brought the conversation round to school.

« School ? » This was the 1st outburst of temper that I had experienced with him. He didn't wish to hear anything about school. School was no longer his concern, he said.

Editor's Note

Empress Maria Theresa instituted the « General School Regulations » , in 1774, creating the Austrian educational system.

8 compulsory education was introduced in 1869.

4 years of elementary school (« Volksschule » for ages 6 to 10) are followed by secondary education in a « Hauptschule » , or the 1st 4 years of « Gymnasium » as intermediate school.

It has to be noted that, in particular in the rural areas, there is quite often no « Gymnasium » available, so everyone attends the « Hauptschule » .

After the age of 14, students have their 1st real choice to make, no matter which they have attended until then. They can spend 1 year at the polytechnic school which qualifies them for vocational school as part of an apprenticeship. Or they can go to the « Höhere Technische Lehranstalt » , which are technically-orientated higher-colleges and a unique feature of the Austrian educational system within Europe.

Finalising the « Höhere Technische Lehranstalt » permits to use the title « Ing. » or « Ingénieur » (Engineer) .

Another option would be the « Handelsakademie » with a focus on accounting and business administration.

Finally, there is the « Gymnasium » which ends with the « Matura » examination as the ultimate preparation for a further education at a university.

...

He hated the teachers and did not even greet them any more, and he also hated his schoolmates whom, he said, the school was turning into idlers. No, school I was not allowed to mention. I told him how little success I had had at school myself.

« Why no success ? » , he wanted to know.

He did not like it at all that I had done so badly at school, in spite of all the contempt he expressed for schooling. I was confused by this contradiction. But so much I could gather from our conversation, that he must have been at school until recently, probably a grammar school or, perhaps, a technical school, and that this presumably had ended in disaster. Otherwise, this complete rejection would hardly have been possible.

For the rest, he presented me with ever recurring contradictions and riddles. Sometimes, he seemed to me almost sinister.

One day when we were taking a walk, he suddenly stopped, produced from his pocket a little black notebook (I still see it before me and could describe it minutely) and read me a poem he had written.

I do not remember the poem itself any longer ; to be precise, I can no longer distinguish it from the other poems which Adolf read to me in later days. But I do remember distinctly how much it impressed me that my friend wrote poetry and carried his poems around with him in the same way that I carried my tools.

When Adolf later showed me his drawings and designs which he had sketched (somewhat confused and confusing designs which were really beyond me) when he told me that he had much more and better work in his room and was determined to devote his whole life to art, then, it dawned on me what kind of person my friend really was.

He belonged to that particular species of people of which I had dreamed myself in my more expansive moments ; an artist, who despised the mere bread-and-butter job, and devoted himself to writing poetry, to drawing, painting and to going to the Theatre.

This impressed me enormously. I was thrilled by the « grandeur » which I saw here. My ideas of an artist were then still very hazy - probably as hazy as were Hitler's. But that made it all the more alluring.

Adolf spoke but rarely of his family. He used to say that it was advisable not to mix too much with grown-ups, as these people with their peculiar ideas would only divert one from one's own plans. For instance, his guardian, a peasant in Leonding called Mayrhofer, had got it into his head that he, Adolf, should learn a craft. His brother-in-law, too, was of this opinion.

I could only conclude that Adolf's relations with his family must have been rather peculiar. Apparently among all the grown-ups he accepted, only one person, his mother.

And, yet, he was only 16 years old ; 9 months younger than I.

However much his ideas differed from « bourgeois » conceptions, it did not worry me at all - on the contrary ! It was this very fact, that he was out of the ordinary, that attracted me even more. To devote his life to the arts was, in my opinion, the greatest resolution that a young man could take ; for secretly, I, too, played with the idea of exchanging the dusty and noisy upholsterer's work-shop for the pure and lofty fields of art, to give my life to music. For young people, it is by no means insignificant in what surroundings their friendship 1st begins. It seemed to me a symbol that our friendship had been born in the Theatre, in the midst of brilliant scenes and to the mighty sound of great music. In a certain sense, our friendship itself existed in this happy atmosphere.

Moreover, my own position was not dissimilar to Adolf's. School lay behind me and could give me nothing more. In spite of my love and devotion to my parents, the grown-ups did not mean very much to me. And, above all, in spite of the many problems that beset me, there was nobody in whom I could confide.

Nevertheless, it was at 1st a difficult friendship because our characters were utterly different. Whereas I was a quiet, somewhat dreamy youth, very sensitive and adaptable and, therefore, always willing to yield, so to speak, a « musical character » , Adolf was exceedingly violent and high-strung. Quite trivial things, such as a few thoughtless words, could produce in him outbursts of temper which I thought were quite out of proportion to the significance of the matter. But, probably, I misunderstood Adolf in this respect. Perhaps, the difference between us was that he took things seriously which seemed to me quite unimportant. Yes, this was one of his typical traits ; everything aroused his interest and disturbed him - to nothing was he indifferent.

But, in spite of all the difficulties arising-out of our varying temperaments, our friendship itself was never in serious danger. Nor did we, as so many other youngsters, grow cool and indifferent with time. On the contrary ! In everyday matters, we took great care not to clash. It seems strange, but he who could stick so obstinately to his point of view could also be so considerate that, sometimes, he made me feel quite ashamed. So, as time went on, we got more and more used to each other.

Soon, I came to understand that our friendship endured largely for the reason that I was a patient listener. But I was not dissatisfied with this passive role, for it made me realize how much my friend needed me. He, too, was completely alone. His father had been dead for 2 years. However much he loved his mother, she could not help him with his problems. I remember how he used to give me long lectures about things that did not interest me at all, as for example, the excise duty levied at the Danube bridge, or a collection in the streets for a charity lottery. He just had to talk and needed somebody who would listen to him. I was often startled when he would make a speech to me, accompanied by vivid gestures, for my benefit alone. He was never worried by the fact that I was the sole audience. But a young man who, like my friend, was passionately interested in everything he saw and experienced had to find an outlet for his tempestuous feelings. The tension he felt was relieved by his holding forth on these things. These speeches, usually delivered somewhere in the open, seemed to be like a volcano erupting. It was as though something quite apart from him was bursting out of him.

Such rapture I had only witnessed so far in the Theatre, when an actor had to express some violent emotions and, at 1st, confronted by such eruptions, I could only stand gaping and passive, forgetting to applaud.

But, soon, I realised that this was not play-acting. No, this was not acting, not exaggeration, this was really felt, and I saw that he was in dead earnest. Again and again, I was filled with astonishment at how fluently he expressed himself, how vividly he managed to convey his feelings, how easily the words flowed from his mouth when he was completely carried-away by his own emotions.

Not what he said impressed me first, but how he said it. This to me was something new, magnificent. I had never imagined that a man could produce such an effect with mere words. All he wanted from me, however, was one thing -- agreement. I soon came to realise this. Nor was it hard for me to agree with him, because I had never given any thought to the many problems which he raised.

Nevertheless, it would be wrong to assume that our friendship confined itself to this unilateral relationship only. This would have been too cheap for Adolf and too little for me. The important thing was that we were complementary to each other. In him, everything brought forth a strong reaction and forced him to take a stand ; for his emotional outbursts were only a sign of his passionate interest in everything. I, on the other hand, being of a contemplative nature, accepted unreservedly all his arguments on things that interested him and yielded to them, always excepting musical matters.

Of course, I must admit that Adolf's claims on me were boundless and took-up all my spare time. As he himself did not have to keep to a regular time-table, I had to be at his beck and call. He demanded everything from me, but was also prepared to do everything for me. In fact, I had no alternative. My friendship with him did not leave me any time for cultivating other friends ; nor did I feel the need of them, Adolf was as much to me as a dozen other ordinary friends. Only one thing might have separated us - if we had both fallen in love with the same girl ; this would have been serious. As I was 17 at the time, this might well have happened. But it was precisely in this respect that fate had a special solution in store for us.

Such a unique solution (I describe it later, in the chapter called « Stefanie ») that, rather than upsetting our friendship, served to deepen it.

I knew that he, too, had no other friends besides me. I remember in this connection a quite trivial detail. We were strolling along the « Landstraße » when it happened. A young man, about our age, came around the corner, a plump, rather dandified young gentleman. He recognized Adolf as a former class-mate, stopped, and grinning all over his face, called out :

« Hello, Hitler ! »

He took him familiarly by the arm and asked him quite sincerely how he was getting on. I expected Adolf to respond in the same friendly manner, as he always set great store by correct and courteous behaviour. But my friend went red with rage. I knew from former experience that this change of expression boded ill.

« What the devil is that to do with you ? » , he threw at him excitedly, and pushed him sharply away.

Then, he took my arm and went with me on his way without bothering about the young man whose flushed and baffled face I can still see before me.

« All future civil servants and, with this lot, I had to sit in the same class. » , said Adolf, still furious.

It was a long time before he calmed down.

Another experience sticks-out in my memory. My venerated violin teacher, Heinrich Dessauer, had died. Adolf went to the funeral with me, which rather surprised me as he did not know Professor Dessauer at all. When I expressed my surprise, he said :

« I can't bear it that you should mix with other young people and talk to them. »

There was no end to the things, even trivial ones, that could upset him. But he lost his temper most of all when it was suggested that he should become a civil servant. Whenever he heard the word « civil servant » , even without any connection with his own career, he fell into a rage. I discovered that these outbursts of fury were, in a certain sense, still quarrels with his long-dead father, whose greatest desire it had been to turn him into a civil servant. So to speak, a « posthumous defence » .

It was an essential part of our friendship at that time, that my opinion of civil servants should be as low as his. Knowing his violent rejection of a career in the civil service, I could now appreciate that he preferred the friendship of a simple upholsterer to that of one of those spoilt darlings who were assured of patronage by their good connections and knew, in advance, the exact course their life would follow. Hitler was just the opposite.

With him, everything was uncertain. There was another positive factor which made me seem, in Adolf's eyes, pre-destined to be his friend : like him, I considered art to be the greatest thing in man's life. Of course, in those days, we were not able to express this sentiment in such highfalutin words. But, in practice, we conformed to this principle, because, in my life, music had long since become the decisive factor - I worked in the work-shop only to make my living.

For my friend, art was even more. His intense way of absorbing, scrutinizing, rejecting, his terrific seriousness, his ever active mind needed a counterpoise. And only art could provide this.

Thus, I fulfilled all the requirements he would look for in a friend : I had nothing in common with his former class-mate, I had nothing to do with the civil service and I lived entirely for art. In addition, I knew a lot about music. The similarity of our inclinations welded us closely together as did the dissimilarity of our temperaments.

I leave it to others to judge whether people who, like Adolf, find their way with a sleepwalker's sureness, pick-up at random the companion that they need for that particular part of their path, or whether fate chooses for them. All I can say is that, from our 1st meeting in the Theatre up to his decline into misery in Vienna, I was that companion for Adolf Hitler.

DESCRIPTION OF HITLER

Adolf was of middle-height and slender, at that time, already taller than his mother.

His physique was far from sturdy, rather too thin for its height, and he was not at all strong.

His health, in fact, was rather poor, which he was the 1st to regret.

He had to take special care of himself during the foggy and damp winters which prevailed in Linz.

He was ill, from time to time, during that period and coughed a lot. In short, he had weak lungs.

His nose was quite straight and well-proportioned, but in no way remarkable. His forehead was high and receded a little. I was always sorry that, even in those days, he had the habit of combing his hair straight-down over his forehead.

Yet, this traditional forehead-nose-mouth description seems rather ridiculous to me.

For in this countenance, the eyes were so outstanding that one didn't notice anything else. Never in my life have I seen any other person whose appearance (how shall I put it) was so completely dominated by the eyes.

They were the light eyes of his mother, but her somewhat staring, penetrating gaze was even more marked in the son and had even more force and expressiveness.

It was uncanny how these eyes could change their expression, especially when Adolf was speaking.

Editor's Note

Professor Trevor-Roper concurs :

« Hitler had the eyes of a hypnotist which seduced the wits and affections of all who yielded to their power. »

One does not acquire such power by accident !

Josef Gœbbels wrote about his 1st meeting with Hitler :

« I was fascinated by Hitler's blue eyes. »

Traudl Junge, his last secretary, often told in interviews, that :

« People were amazed about Hitler's blue eyes. »

Martha Dodd writes in her book that :

« Hitler's eyes were startling and unforgettable. They seemed pale blue in colour. They were intense, unwavering, hypnotic. »

One only acquires such power of the eyes by patient training, and undoubtedly Hitler's ability to use his eyes in such a way resulted from his time with Lodz and Eckart - and does the nickname of « Wolf » for Hitler come from this pseudo-canine dominance trait of the eyes ?

...

However, even when he was young, Hitler's eyes were remarkable.

To me, his sonorous voice meant much less than the expression of his eyes.

In fact, Adolf spoke with his eyes and, even when his lips were silent, one knew what he wanted to say.

When he 1st came to our house and I introduced him to my mother, she said to me in the evening :

« What eyes your friend has ! »

And I remember quite distinctly that there was more fear than admiration in her words.

If I am asked where one could perceive, in his youth, this man's exceptional qualities, I can only answer :

« In the eyes. »

Naturally, his extraordinary eloquence, also, was striking. But I was, then, too inexperienced to attach to it any special significance for the future.

I, for one, was certain that Hitler, some day, would be a great artist, a poet I thought at 1st, then, a great painter ; until later, in Vienna, he convinced me that his real talent was in the field of architecture. For these artistic ambitions, his eloquence was of no use, rather a hindrance. Nevertheless, I always liked to listen to him. His language was very refined.

He disliked dialect, in particular Viennese, the soft melodiousness of which was utterly repulsive to him.

To be sure, Hitler did not speak Austrian in the true sense.

It was rather that in his diction, especially in the rhythm of his speech, there was something Bavarian.

Perhaps, this was due to the fact that, from his 3rd to his 6th year, the real formative years for speech, he lived in Passau, where his father was then a customs official.

There is no doubt that my friend Adolf had shown a gift for oratory from his earliest youth. And he knew it. He liked to talk, and talked without pause.

Sometimes, when he soared too high in his fantasies, I couldn't help suspecting that all this was nothing but an exercise in oratory.

Then, again, I thought otherwise.

Did I not take everything for gospel that he said ?

Sometimes, Adolf would try-out his powers of oratory on me or on others.

It always stuck in my memory how, when not yet eighteen, he convinced my father that he should release me from his work-shop and send me to Vienna to the Conservatory. In view of the awkward and unforthcoming nature of my father this was a considerable achievement.

From the moment I had this proof of his talent -- for me so decisive -- I considered that there was nothing that Hitler could not achieve by a convincing speech.

He was in the habit of emphasizing his words by measured and studied gestures.

Now and then, when he was speaking on one of his favourite subjects, such as the bridge over the Danube, the rebuilding of the Museum or even the subterranean railway station which he had planned for Linz, I would interrupt him and ask him how he imagined he would ever carry-out these projects - we were only poor devils.

Then, he would throw at me a strange and hostile glance as though he had not understood my question at all. I never got an answer ; at the most, he would shut me up with a wave of his hand. Later, I got used to it and ceased to find it ridiculous that the 16 or 17 year old boy should develop gigantic projects and expound them to me down to the last detail.

If I had listened only to his words, the whole thing would have appeared to be either idle fantasy or sheer lunacy ; but the eyes convinced me that he was in deadly earnest.

Adolf set great store by good manners and correct behaviour.

He observed with painstaking punctiliousness the rules of social conduct, however little he thought of society itself.

He always emphasized the position of his father, who as a customs official ranked more or less with a captain in the army.

Hearing him speak of his father, one would never have imagined how violently he disliked the idea of being a civil servant.

Nevertheless, there was in his bearing something very precise.

He would never forget to send regards to my people, and every post-card bore greetings to my « esteemed parents » . When we lodged together in Vienna, I discovered that, every evening, he would put his trousers carefully under the mattress so that, the next morning, he could rejoice in a faultless crease.

Adolf realized the value of a good appearance, and, in spite of his lack of vanity, knew how to make the best of himself. He made excellent use of his undoubted histrionic talents, which he cleverly combined with his gift for oratory.

I used to ask myself why Adolf, in spite of all these pronounced capabilities, did not get on better in Vienna ; only later, did I realize that professional success was not at all his ambition.

People who knew him in Vienna could not understand the contradiction between his well-groomed appearance, his educated speech and his self-assured bearing, on the one hand ; and the starveling existence that he led on the other, and judged him either haughty or pretentious. He was neither. He just didn't fit into any « bourgeois » order.

Adolf had brought starvation to a fine-art, though he ate very well when occasion offered.

To be sure, in Vienna, he generally lacked the money for food. But, even if he had it, he would prefer to starve and spend it on a Theatre seat.

He had no comprehension of enjoyment of life as others knew it. He did not smoke, he did not drink, and, in Vienna, for instance, he lived for days on milk and bread only.

With his contempt for everything pertaining to the body, sport, which was, then, coming into fashion, meant nothing to him. I read somewhere of how audaciously the young Hitler had swum across the Danube. I do not recollect anything of the sort ; the most swimming we did was an occasional dip in the Rodel stream.

He showed some interest in the bicycle club, mainly because they ran an ice-rink in the winter. And this only because the girl he adored used to practise skating there.

Walking was the only exercise that really appealed to Adolf.

He walked always and everywhere and, even in my work-shop and in my room, he would stride-up and down. I recall him always on the go. He could walk for hours without getting tired.

We used to explore the surroundings of Linz in all directions.

His love of nature was pronounced, but in a very personal way.

Unlike other subjects, nature never attracted him as a matter for study ; I hardly ever remember seeing him with a book on the subject. Here was the limit of his thirst for knowledge.

Details did not interest him, but only nature as a whole. He referred to it as « in the open » . This expression sounded as familiar on his lips as the word « home » .

And, in fact, he did feel at home with nature.

As early as in the 1st years of our friendship, I discovered his peculiar preference for nocturnal excursions, or even for staying overnight in some unfamiliar district.

Being in the open had an extraordinary effect upon him.

He was, then, quite a different person from what he was in town.

Certain sides of his character revealed themselves nowhere else.

He was never so collected and concentrated as when walking along the quiet paths in the beech woods of the Mühlviertel, or at night when we took a quick walk on the Freinberg.

To the rhythm of his steps, his thoughts would flow more smoothly and to better purpose than elsewhere.

For a long time, I could not understand one peculiar contradiction in him.

When the sun shone brightly in the streets and a fresh, revivifying wind brought the smell of the woods into the town, an irresistible force drove him out of the narrow, stuffy streets into the woods and fields. But hardly had we reached the open country, than, he would assure me that it would be impossible for him to live in the country again. It would be terrible for him to have to live in a village.

For all his love of nature, he was always glad when we got-back to the town.

As I grew to know him better, I also came to understand this apparent contradiction. He needed the town, the variety and abundance of its impressions, experiences and events ; he felt there that he had his share in everything ; that there was nothing in which his interest was not engaged. He needed people with their contrasting interests, their ambitions, intentions, plans and desires. Only in this problem-laden atmosphere did he feel at home.

From this point of view, the village was altogether too simple, too insignificant, too unimportant, and did not provide enough scope for his limitless need to take an interest in everything. Besides, for him, a town was interesting in itself as an agglomeration of houses and buildings.

It was understandable that he should want to live only in a town.

On the other hand, he needed an effective counter-weight to the town, which always troubled and excited him and made constant demands on his interests and his talents.

He found this in nature, which even he could not try to change and improve because its eternal laws are beyond the reach of the human will.

Here, he could once more find his own self, since here he was not obliged, as he was in town, eternally to be taking sides.

My friend had a special way of making nature serve him. He used to seek out a lonely spot outside the town, which he would visit again and again. Every bush and every tree was familiar to him. There was nothing to disturb his contemplative mood. Nature surrounded him like the walls of a quiet, friendly room in which he could cultivate undisturbed his passionate plans and ideas.

For some time, on fine days, he used to frequent a bench on the « Turmleitenweg » where he established a kind of open-air study.

There, he would read his books, sketch and paint in watercolours.

Here were born his 1st poems.

Another spot, which later became a favourite, was even more lonely and secluded. We would sit on a high, overhanging rock looking down on the Danube.

The sight of the gently flowing river always moved Adolf.

How often did my friend tell me of his plans up there ! Sometimes, he would be overcome by his feelings and give free reign to his imagination.

I remember him, once, describing to me so vividly Kriemhild's journey to the country of the Huns that I imagined I could see the mighty ships of the kings of Burgundy drifting down the river.

Quite different were our far-ranging excursions.

Not much preparation was necessary - a strong walking stick was the only requisite. With his everyday clothes, Adolf would wear a coloured shirt and, as a sign of his intention to undertake a long trip, would sport instead of the usual tie a silk cord with 2 tassels hanging down.

We wouldn't take any food with us but, somewhere, would manage to find a bit of dry bread and a glass of milk. What wonderful, carefree times those were !

We despised railways and coaches and went everywhere on foot.

Whenever we combined our Sunday trip with an outing for my parents, which for us had the advantage that my father treated us to a good meal in a country-inn, we started-out early enough to meet them at our destination, to which they had come by train.

My father was particularly fond of a little village called Walding, which attracted us because, nearby, was the Rodel stream in which we liked to bathe on warm summer days.

A little incident stands-out in my memory.

Adolf and I had left the inn for a bathe.

We were both fairly good swimmers, but my mother, nevertheless, was nervous. She followed us and stood on a protruding rock to watch us. The rock sloped-down to the water and was covered with moss. My poor mother, while she was anxiously watching us, slipped on the smooth moss and slid into the water. I was too far away to help her at once, but Adolf immediately jumped in after her and dragged her out. He always remained attached to my parents. As late as 1944, on my mother's 80th birthday, he sent her a food parcel, and I never discovered how he came to know about it.

Adolf was particularly fond of the Mühlviertel.

From the Pöstlingberg, we would walk across the Holzpoldl and the Elendsimmerl to Gramastetten or wander through the woods round the Lichtenhag Ruins.

Adolf measured the walls, though not much of them remained, and entered the measurements in his sketch-book, which he always carried with him.

Then, with a few strokes, he sketched the original castle, drew in the moat and the drawbridge and adorned the walls with fanciful pinnacles and turrets.

He exclaimed there once to my surprise :

« This is the ideal setting for my sonnet ! »

But when I wanted to know more about it, he said :

« I must Ist see what I make of it. »

And, on our way home, he confessed that he was going to try to extend the material into a play.

We would go to Sankt Georgen, on the Gusen, to find-out what relics of that famous battle in the Peasants' War still remained.

When we were unsuccessful, Adolf had a strange idea.

He was convinced that the people who lived there would have some faint memory of that great battle.

The following day, he went again alone, after a vain attempt to get my father to give me the day off. He spent 2 days and 2 nights there, but I don't remember with what result.

For the sole reason that Adolf wanted, for a change, to see his beloved Linz from the east, I had to make with him the unattractive climb up the Pfennigberg, in which the Linzers, as he complained, didn't show enough interest.

I also liked the view of the city but, least of all, from this side. Nevertheless, Adolf remained for hours in this uninviting spot, sketching.

On the other hand, Saint-Florian became for me, too, a place of pilgrimage, for here, where Anton Bruckner had worked and hallowed the surroundings by his memory, we imagined that we actually met « God's musician » and heard his inspired improvisations on the great organ in the magnificent church.

Then, we would stand in front of the simple grave-stone let into the floor beneath the choir, where the great Master had been buried 10 years earlier.

Editor's Note

Anton Bruckner (born on 4 September 1824 ; died on 11 October 1896) was an Austrian composer known for his Symphonies, Masses, and Motets.

The 1st are considered emblematic of the final stage of Austro-German Romanticism because of their rich harmonic language, complex polyphony, and considerable length.

Bruckner's compositions helped to define contemporary musical radicalism, owing to their dissonances, unprepared modulations, and roving harmonies.

Unlike other radicals, such as Richard Wagner or Hugo Wolf who fit the « enfant terrible » mould, Bruckner showed extreme humility before other musicians, Wagner in particular.

This apparent dichotomy between Bruckner, the man, and Bruckner, the composer, hampers efforts to describe his life in a way that gives a straightforward context for his music.

His works, the Symphonies in particular, had detractors, most notably the influential Austrian music-critic Eduard Hanslick, and other supporters of Johannes Brahms, who pointed to their large size, use of repetition, and Bruckner's propensity to revise many of his works, often with the assistance of colleagues, and his apparent indecision about which versions he preferred.

On the other hand, Bruckner was greatly admired by subsequent composers, including his friend Gustav Mahler, who described him as « half simpleton, half God » .

...

The wonderful monastery had aroused my friend to the heights of enthusiasm.

He had stood in front of the glorious staircase for an hour or more - at any rate, much too long for me.

And how much did he admire the splendour of the library !

But the deepest impression was made on him by the contrast between the over-decorated apartments of the monastery and Bruckner's simple-room.

When he saw its humble furniture, he was strengthened in his belief that on this earth genius almost always goes hand in hand with poverty.

Such visits were revealing to me, for Adolf was by nature very reserved.

There was always a certain element in his personality into which he would allow nobody to penetrate.

He had his inscrutable secrets and, in many respects, always remained a riddle to me.

But there was one key that opened the door to much that would have remained hidden : his enthusiasm for beauty. All that separated us disappeared when we stood in front of such a magnificent work of art as the Monastery of Saint-Florian.

Editor's Note

The monastery, named after Saint-Florian, was founded in the Carolingian period.

From 1071, it has housed a community of Augustinian Canons, and is thus one of the oldest operational monasteries in the world following the Rule of Saint-Augustine.

Between 1686 and 1708, the monastery complex was reconstructed in Baroque style by Carlo Antonio Carlone, of whom Saint-Florian's is reckoned the Masterpiece.

After his death, the work was continued by Jakob Prandtauer.

The result is the biggest Baroque monastery in Upper-Austria.

The frescoes were created by Bartolomeo Altomonte.

Construction of the library wing was not begun until 1744, by Johann Gotthard Hayberger.

The library comprises about 130,000 items, including many manuscripts.

The gallery contains numerous works of the 16th and 17th Centuries, but also some late-medieval works of the Danube School, particularly by Albrecht Altdorfer.

Saint-Florian's Priory possesses 2 organs, the larger one of which is known as the « Bruckner organ » (« Brucknerorgel ») of more than 7,000 organ pipes.

It was played by composer and organist Anton Bruckner, previously a choir-boy at the monastery, when he was the organist, between 1848 and 1855.

He is buried beneath the organ inside the church.

Saint-Florian is also known for its boys' choir (« Sankt Florianer Sängerknaben »), founded in 1071.

This choir has been a traditional part of the monastic worship from its foundation.

...

Then, fired by enthusiasm, Adolf would lower all his defences and I felt to the full the joy of our friendship.

I have often been asked, and even by Rudolf Heß, who once invited me to visit him in Linz, whether Adolf, when I knew him, had any sense of humour.

One feels the lack of it, people of his entourage said. After all, he was an Austrian and should have had his share of the famous Austrian sense of humour. Certainly one's impression of Hitler, especially after a short and superficial acquaintance, was that of a deeply serious man. This enormous seriousness seemed to overshadow everything else. It was the same when he was young. He approached the problems with which he was concerned with a deadly earnestness which ill suited his 16 or 17 years. He was capable of loving and admiring, hating and despising, all with the greatest seriousness. One thing he could not do was to pass-over something with a smile.

Even with a subject in which he did not take a personal interest, such as sport, this was, nevertheless, as a phenomenon of modern times, just as important to him as any other. He never came to the end of his problems.

His profound earnestness never ceased to attack new problems, and if he did not find any in the present, he would brood at home for hours over his books and burrow into the problems of the past. This extraordinary earnestness was his most striking quality.

Many other qualities which are characteristic of youth were lacking in him : a care-free letting go of himself, living only for the day - the happy attitude of « What is to be, will be » . Even « going off the rails » , in the coarse exuberance of youth, was alien to him.

His idea, strange to say, was that these were things that did not become a young man. And because of this, humour was confined to the most intimate sphere as if it were something taboo. His humour was usually aimed at people in his immediate circle, in other words, a sphere in which problems no longer existed for him.

For this reason, his grim and sour humour was often mixed with irony, but always an irony with friendly intent. Thus, he saw me once at a concert where I was playing the trumpet. He got enormous amusement out of imitating me and insisted that with my blown-out cheeks I looked like one of Rubens' angels.

I cannot conclude this without mentioning one of Hitler's qualities which, I freely admit, seems paradoxical to talk about now.

Hitler was full of deep understanding and sympathy.

He took a most touching interest in me.

Without my telling him, he knew exactly how I felt. How often this helped me in difficult times !

He always knew what I needed and what I wanted.

However intensely he was occupied with himself, he would always have time for the affairs of those people in whom he was interested.

It was not by chance that he was the one who persuaded my father to let me study music and, thereby, influenced my life in a decisive way. Rather, this was the outcome of his general attitude of sharing in all the things that were of concern to me.

Sometimes, I had a feeling that he was living my life as well as his own.

Thus, I have drawn the portrait of the young Hitler as well as I can from memory.

But for the question, then unknown and unexpressed, which hung above our friendship, I have not to this day found any answer :

« What were God's intentions when he created this man ? »

HITLER'S MOTHER

When I first met her, Klara Hitler was already 45 years old and a widow of 2 years' standing.

Whenever I saw her, I had (I don't know why) a feeling of sympathy for her, and felt that I wanted to do something for her.

She was glad that Adolf had found a friend whom he liked and trusted and, for this reason, « Frau » Hitler liked me, too. How often did she unburden to me the worries which Adolf caused her. And how fervently did she hope to enlist my help in persuading her son to follow his father's wishes in the choice of a career !

I had to disappoint her, yet, she did not blame me, for she must have felt that the reasons for Adolf's behaviour were much too deep, far beyond the reach of my influence.

Just as Adolf often enjoyed the hospitality of my parents' home, I went often to see his mother and on taking leave was unfailingly asked by « Frau » Hitler to come again. I considered myself as part of the family - there was hardly anybody else who visited them.

Number 31 « Humboldtstraße » is a 3 storied, not unpleasant tenement building. The Hitlers lived on the 3rd floor. I can still visualise the humble apartment.

The small kitchen, with green painted furniture, had only one window, which looked-out on to the court-yard. The living-room, with the 2 beds of his mother and little Paula, overlooked the street.

On the side-wall hung a portrait of his father, with a typical civil servant's face, impressive and dignified, whose rather grim expression was mitigated by the carefully groomed whiskers « à la » Emperor Franz-Josef.

Adolf lived and studied in the closet, off the bedroom.

Paula, Adolf's little sister, was 9 when I 1st met the family.

She was a rather pretty girl, quiet and reserved. I never saw her gay.

We got on rather well with each other but Adolf was not particularly close to her.

This was due, perhaps, to the difference in age - he always referred to her as « the kid » .

Paula never married and later lived in Königssee, near Berchtesgaden.

Another acquaintance I made in the Hitler family was a striking-looking young woman of just over 20, called Angela, whose place in the family puzzled me at 1st, although she addressed Klara Hitler as « Mother » , just as Paula did. Later, I learned the solution of the mystery.

Angela, born on the 28th July, 1883, that is to say 6 years before Adolf, was a child of the father's previous marriage. Her mother, Franziska Matzelsberger, died the year after her birth. 5 months later, the father married Klara Pözl.

Angela, who naturally had no recollection of her own mother, looked upon Klara as her mother.

In September 1903, 1 year before I became acquainted with Adolf, Angela had married a revenue official called Raubal. She lived with her husband nearby and often came to visit her step-mother, but never brought him with her ; at any rate, I never met Raubal. Angela was quite unlike « Frau » Hitler, a jolly person who enjoyed life and loved to laugh. She brought some life into the family.

She was very handsome with her regular features, and her beautiful hair which was as dark as Adolf's.

From Adolf's description, but also from some hints of his mother's, I gathered that Raubal was a drunkard.

Adolf hated him.

He saw in him a personification of everything he despised in a man.

He spent his time in the pub, drank and smoked, gambled his money away and, on top of that ... he was a civil servant.

And as though that were not enough, Raubal thought it was his duty to support his father-in-law's views by urging Adolf to become a civil servant himself.

This was enough to antagonize Adolf completely.

When Adolf talked of Raubal, his face assumed a truly threatening aspect.

Perhaps, it was Adolf's pronounced hatred of his half sister's husband that kept Raubal away from the « Humboldtstraße » .

At the time of Raubal's death, only a few years after his marriage to Angela, the break between him and Adolf was already complete.

Angela re-married later, an architect in Dresden, and died in Munich in 1949.

I learned from Adolf that, from his father's 2nd marriage, there was also a son, Alois, who spent his childhood with the Hitler family but left them while they were living in Lambach.

This half brother of Adolf's (born on December 13th, 1882, in Braunau) was 7 years older than Adolf.

While his father was alive, he still came to Leonding a couple of times but, as far as I know, he never appeared in the « Humboldtstraße » .

He never played any important part in Hitler's life, nor did he take any interest in Adolf's political career.

He turned-up once in Paris, then, in Vienna, and, later, in Berlin.

His 1st marriage was to a Dutch woman and they had a son, William Patrick Hitler, who, in August 1939, published a pamphlet, « My Uncle Adolf » ; a son by his 2nd wife, Heinz Hitler, fell as an officer on the Eastern Front.

« Frau » Hitler did not like to talk about herself and her worries, yet, she found relief in telling me of her doubts about Adolf.

Naturally, she didn't get much satisfaction from the vague and, for her, meaningless utterances of Adolf about his future as an artist.

The preoccupation with the well-being of her only surviving son depressed her increasingly.

She used to say to Adolf :

« Our poor father cannot rest in his grave because you will flout his wishes. Obedience is what distinguishes a good son, but you don't know the meaning of the word. That's why you did so badly at school and why you're not getting anywhere now. »

Gradually, I learned to understand the suffering this woman endured.

She never complained, but she told me about the hard time she had had in her youth.

So, I came to know, partly by experience, partly by what I was told, the circumstances of the Hitler family.

Occasionally mention was made of some relations in the Waldviertel, but it was difficult for me to understand whether these were his father's relations or his mother's.

Editor's Note

The « Waldviertel » (Forest Quarter) is the north-western region of the Austrian State of Lower-Austria.

It is bounded to the south by the Danube, to the south-west by Upper-Austria, to the north-west and the north by the Czech Republic and to the east by the Manhartsberg (537 miles) , which is the survey-point dividing Waldviertel from Weinviertel.

In any case, the Hitler family had relations only in the Waldviertel, quite unlike other Austrian civil servants, who had relatives scattered all over the country.

Only later, did I come to realize that Hitler's paternal and maternal lineage already merged in the 2nd generation, so that, from the grandfather upwards, Adolf had only one set of forebears. I remember that Adolf did visit some relatives in the Waldviertel.

Once he sent me a picture post-card from Weitra, which is in the part of the Waldviertel nearest to Bohemia.

Editor's Note

Weitra is a small-town in the district of Gmünd in the Austrian State of Lower Austria.

It is located within the rural Waldviertel region on the upper Lužnice (Lainsitz) river, near the border with the Czech Republic.

The municipality consists of the Katastralgemeinden Brühl, Großwolfgrers, Oberwindhag, Reinprechts, Spital, Sankt Wolfgang, Sulz, Waltersschlag, Weitra and Wetzles.

...

I do not know what had taken him there.

He never spoke very willingly about his relations in that part of the country, but preferred to describe the landscape ; poor, barren country, a striking contrast to the rich and fertile Danube valley of the Wachau.

This raw, hard peasant country was the homeland of both his maternal and paternal ancestors.

« Frau » Klara Hitler, « née » Pölzl, was born on August 12th, 1860, in Spital, a poor village in the Waldviertel.

Her father, Johann Baptist Pölzl, was a simple peasant.

Her mother's maiden name was Johanna Hüttler.

The name Hitler is spelt differently in the various documents.

There is the spelling Hiedler and Hüttler, while Hitler is used for the 1st time by Adolf's father.

This Johanna Hüttler, Adolf's maternal grandmother, was, according to the documents, a daughter of Johann Nepomuk Hiedler.

Thus, Klara Pölzl was directly related to the Hüttler-Hiedler family, for Johann Nepomuk Hiedler was the brother of that Johann Georg Hiedler who appears in the baptismal register of Döllersheim as Adolf's father's father.

Klara Pölzl was, therefore, a 2nd cousin of her husband.

Alois Hitler always referred to her before their marriage simply as his niece.

Klara Pölzl had a miserable childhood in the poor and wretched home where there were so many children.

In 1875, when she was 15 years old, her relative, the customs official Alois Schicklgruber at Braunau, invited her to come and help his wife in the house.

Alois Schicklgruber who, only in the following year, assumed the name Hiedler, which he changed into Hitler, was then married to Anna Glasl-Hörer.

This 1st marriage of Alois Hitler with a woman 14 years older than himself remained without issue and they finally separated.

When his wife died in 1883, Alois Hitler married Franziska Matzelsberger, who was 24 years his junior.

The children of this marriage were Adolf's half-brother, Alois, and half-sister, Angela. Klara, who had continued living in the house during the time he was separated from his 1st wife, left on the 2nd marriage and went to Vienna.

As Franziska, the 2nd wife, fell gravely ill after the birth of her 2nd child, Alois Hitler called his niece back to Braunau.

Editor's Note

Braunau-am-Inn is a town in the Innviertel region of Upper-Austria (« Oberösterreich ») , the north-western State of Austria.

It lies about 90 kilometres west of Linz and about 60 kilometres north of Salzburg, on the border with the German State of Bavaria.

A port of entry, it is connected by bridges over the River Inn with its Bavarian counterpart, Simbach-am-Inn.

The town was 1st mentioned around the year 810 and received a statute in 1260, which makes it one of the oldest towns in Austria. It became a fortress-town and important trading-route junction, dealing with the salt trade and with ship traffic on the River Inn.

Throughout its history, it changed hands 4 times.

It was Bavarian until 1779 and became an Austrian town under the terms of the treaty of Teschen, which settled the War of the Bavarian Succession.

As a major Bavarian settlement, the town played an outstanding role in the Bavarian uprising against the Austrian occupation during the War of the Spanish Succession, when it hosted the Braunau Parliament, a provisional Bavarian Parliament in 1705 headed by Georg Sebastian Plinganser (born in 1680, in Pfarrkirchen ; and died 7 May 1738, in Augsburg) .

Under the terms of the treaty of Pressburg, Braunau became Bavarian again, in 1809.

In 1816, during re-organization of Europe after the Napoleonic Wars, Bavaria ceded the town to Austria and was compensated by the gain of Aschaffenburg. Braunau has been Austrian ever since.

...

Franziska died on August 10th, 1884, barely 2 years after her marriage. (Alois, the 1st child of this union, had been born-out of wedlock and adopted by his father.)

On January 7, 1885, 6 months after the death of his 2nd wife, Alois Hitler married his « niece » Klara, who was already expecting a child by him, the 1st son, Gustav, who was born on May 17th, 1885, that is to say 5 months after the marriage, and who died on December 9th, 1887.

Although Klara Pözl was only a 2nd cousin, the couple needed an ecclesiastical dispensation for their marriage.

The application for this, in the clean, copper-plate hand-writing of an Austro-Hungarian civil servant, still exists in the archives of the Episcopate in Linz under the number : 6.911/11/2 1884. The documents read as follows :

Application of Alois Hitler and his « fiancée » , Klara Pözl, for permission to marry.

Most Reverend Episcopate !

Those, in humblest devotion undersigned, have decided to marry. According to the enclosed family tree, they are prevented by the canonical impediment of collateral affinity in the 3rd degree touching the 2nd. They, therefore, humbly request the Reverend Episcopate to graciously procure them dispensation on the following grounds :

According to the enclosed death certificate, the bridegroom has been a widower since 10th August of this year and is father of 2 infant children, a boy of 2 and a half (Alois) and a girl of 1 year and 2 months (Angela) for whose care he needs a woman-help as he, being a customs official, is away from his home the whole day and also often at night, and, therefore, hardly able to supervise the education and up-bringing of the children. The bride has looked after the children ever since the death of the mother and they are very fond of her, so that it may be justifiably assumed that the up-bringing would be successful and the marriage a happy one. Moreover, the bride is without means and it is, therefore, unlikely that she will ever have another opportunity of a good marriage.

For these reasons, the undersigned repeat their humble petition for the gracious procurement of dispensation from the impediment of affinity.

Braunau, 27th October, 1884.

ALOIS HITLER, Bridegroom - KLARA PÖLZL, Bride

The Linz Episcopate declared itself not competent to issue the dispensation and forwarded the application to Rome where it was granted by papal decree.

Alois Hitler's marriage with Klara was described by various acquaintances as very happy, which was presumably due to the submissive and accommodating nature of the wife.

Once she said to me, in this respect :

« What I hoped and dreamed of, as a young girl, has not been fulfilled in my marriage. »

And added resignedly :

« But does such a thing ever happen ? »

The birth of the children in quick succession was a heavy psychological and physical burden for the frail woman : in 1885, the son Gustav was born ; in 1886, a daughter, Ida, who died after 2 years ; in 1887, another son, Otto, who only lived 3 days ; and, on April 20th, 1889, again a son, Adolf.

How much suffering is hidden behind these bare figures !

When Adolf was born, the 3 other children were already dead. With what care the sorely tried mother must have looked after this 4th child !

She told me, once, that Adolf was a very weak child and that she always lived in fear of losing him, too.

Perhaps, the early death of the 3 children was due to the fact that the parents were blood relations.

I leave it to the experts to give the final verdict.

But, in this connection, I would like to draw attention to one point to which, in my opinion, greatest importance should be attached.

The most outstanding trait in my friend's character was, as I had experienced myself, the unparalleled consistency in everything that he said and did.

There was in his nature something firm, inflexible, immovable, obstinately rigid, which manifested itself in his profound seriousness and was, at the bottom of all, his other characteristics. Adolf simply could not change his mind or his nature.

Everything that lay in these rigid precincts of his being remained unaltered for ever. How often did I experience this ! I remember what he said to me when we met again, in 1938, after an interval of 30 years.

« You haven't changed, Kubizek, you have only grown older. »

If this was true of me, how much more was it of him ! He never changed.

I have tried to find an explanation for this fundamental trait in his character. Influence of surroundings and education can hardly account for it, but I could imagine (although a complete layman in the field of genetics) that the biological effect of the inter-marriage in the family was to fix certain spheres and that those « arrested complexes » have produced that particular type of character. It was just this inflexibility that was responsible for Adolf Hitler's causing such innumerable sorrows to his mother.

Once more, the mother's heart was sorely tried by destiny.

5 years after Adolf's birth, on March 24th, 1894, she gave birth to a 5th child, a son, Edmund, who also died young, on June 29th, 1900, in Leonding.

Although Adolf had no recollection of the 1st 3 children in Braunau, and never spoke of them, he could clearly remember his brother Edmund, at the time of whose death he was already 11 years old.

He told me once the Edmund had died of diphtheria. The youngest child, a girl called Paula, born on January 21st, 1896, survived.

Thus, an early death had deprived Klara Hitler of 4 of her 6 children. Perhaps, her mother's heart was broken by these terrible trials.

Only one thing remained, the care of the 2 surviving children, a care which she had to bear alone after the death of her husband. Small comfort that Paula was a quiet, easily led child ; all the greater was the anxiety over the only son, an anxiety that only ended with her death.

Adolf really loved his mother. I swear to it before God and man.

I remember many occasions when he showed this love for his mother, most deeply and movingly during her last illness ; he never spoke of his mother but with deep affection. He was a good son. It was beyond his power to fulfil her most heartfelt wish to see him started on a safe career. When we lived together in Vienna, he always carried his mother's portrait with him.

HITLER'S FATHER

Although his father had been dead nearly 2 years when I 1st met Adolf he was still « ever present » to his family. The mother perpetuated his personality in every way, for with her malleable nature she had almost entirely lost her own, and what she thought, said and did was all in the spirit of the dead father. But she lacked the strength and energy to put into effect the father's will.

She, who forgave everything, was handicapped in the up-bringing of her son by, her boundless love for him. I could imagine how complete and enduring the influence of this man had been on his family, a real patriarchal father-of-the-family, whose authority was unquestioningly respected. Now, his picture hung in the best position in the room. On the kitchen shelves, I still remember, there were carefully arrayed the long pipes which he used to smoke. They were almost a symbol in the family of his absolute power.

Many a time, when talking of him, « Frau » Hitler would emphasize her words by pointing to these pipes as though they should bear witness how faithfully she carried on the father's tradition.

Adolf spoke of his father with great respect.

I never heard him say anything against him, in spite of their differences of opinion about his career. In fact, he respected him more as time went on. Adolf did not take it amiss that his father had autocratically decided on his son's future career ; for this was considered his right, even his duty.

It was quite a different matter when Raubal, his step-sister's husband, this un-educated person, who was himself only a little revenue official, arrogated to himself this right.

Adolf would certainly not permit him to interfere in his personal affairs. But the authority of his father still remained, even after his death, the force in the struggle with which Adolf developed his own powers.

His father's attitude had provoked him 1st to secret, then, to open rebellion.

There were violent scenes, which often ended in the father giving him a good hiding, as Adolf told me himself.

But Adolf matched this violence with his own youthful obstinacy, and the antagonism between father and son grew sharper.

The customs official Alois Hitler showed a marked sense of ceremony all his life.

Consequently, we have good pictures showing him at various stages of his life. Not so much at his weddings, which were always under an unlucky star, but at the various promotions in his career, did he have his picture taken.

Most of the pictures show him, with his dignified civil servant's face, in gala uniform of white trousers and dark tunic, on which the double row of highly-polished buttons gleamed. The man's face is impressive. A broad, massive head, the most notable feature being the side-whiskers, modelled on those of his supreme Master, the Emperor.

The expression of the eyes is penetrating and incorruptible, the eyes of a man who, as a customs official, is obliged to view everything with suspicion. But, in most pictures, dignity prevails over the « inquisitiveness » of the gaze. Even the pictures taken at the time when Alois Hitler had already retired show that this man was, in spirit, still on duty.

Although he was past 60, he didn't show any of the typical signs of age.

One of the pictures, probably the last one, which can also be seen on his grave in Leonding, shows Alois Hitler as a man whose life consisted of service and duty.

To be sure there is also an earlier photograph, dating from his Leonding days, which, emphasizing his private life, depicts him as a comfortable, well-to-do citizen, fond of good living.

Alois Hitler's rise from being the illegitimate son of a poor servant girl to the position of a respected civil servant is the path from insignificance and inferior status to the highest-rank open to him in the service of the State.

His colleagues in the Customs Service describe him as a precise, dutiful official who was very strict and had his « weak spots » .

As a superior, Alois Hitler was not very popular. Out of office, he was considered a Liberal-minded man who did not conceal his convictions.

He was very proud of his rank. Every day, he would pay his morning visit to the inn with an official's punctuality. His regular drinking companions found him good company but he could flare-up over trifles and become rude, displaying both his in-born violence and the sternness that he had acquired in his job.

His illegitimate birth is conclusively proved by the Church register of the Parish of Strones. According to this, the 42 year old servant maid, Anna Maria Schicklgruber, gave birth to a son on July 7th, 1837, who was christened Alois.

The godfather was her employer, the peasant Johann Trummelschlager, in Strones. As far as is known, the child was the 1st and the only one. The identity of the father was not revealed by the mother.

Anna Maria Schicklgruber married the mill-worker Johann Georg Hiedler, in 1842, when the illegitimate child was already 5 years old.

The Church Register of Döllersheim contains the following entry :

« The undersigned hereby confirm that Johann Georg Hiedler, who is well-known to the undersigned witnesses, has acknowledged paternity of the child Alois of Anna Maria Schicklgruber and requests that his name be entered in the Baptismal Register. »

The entry is signed by the Parish priest and 4 witnesses.

Johann Georg Hiedler again acknowledged his paternity in an official document concerning some inheritance in 1876, before the Notary in Weitra. He was then 84 years old and the child's mother had been dead for over 36 years. Alois Schicklgruber had been a customs official in Braunau, for many years.

As the boy was not officially adopted after his mother's wedding, his name remained Schicklgruber. He would have kept this name throughout his life had not Johann Nepomuk Hiedler, Johann Georg's younger brother, made a will and left a modest sum to the illegitimate son of his brother. But he made the condition that Alois should assume the name Hiedler, and on June 4th, 1876, the name Alois Schicklgruber in the Church Register of the Parish of Döllersheim was altered to Alois Hiedler ; the local government authority in Mistelbach ratifying this alteration on January 6th, 1877. From now on, Alois Schicklgruber called himself Alois Hitler, a name which meant as little as the other, but which secured him his legacy.

Once when we were talking about his relatives Adolf told me the story of his father's change of names. Nothing his « old man » ever did pleased him as much as this ; for Schicklgruber seemed to him so uncouth, so boorish, apart from being so clumsy and unpractical. He found « Hiedler » too boring, too soft ; but « Hitler » sounded nice and was easy to remember.

It is typical of his father that, instead of accepting the version « Hiedler » , as did the rest of his relations, he invented the new spelling, « Hitler » .

It was in keeping with his mania for ceaseless change.

His superiors had nothing to do with this ; for in all his 40 years of service, he was transferred only 4 times.

The towns to which he was posted, Saalfelden, Braunau, Passau and Linz, are so favourably situated that they form the ideal setting for a customs official's career.

But hardly had he settled-down in one of these places, when he began to move house.

During his period of service in Braunau, there are recorded 12 changes of address ; probably, there were more.

During the 2 years in Passau, he moved twice.

Soon after his retirement, he moved from Linz to Hafeld, from there to Lambach - 1st in the Leingartner-Inn, then, to a mill, that is to say, 2 changes in 1 year - then, to Leonding. When I met Adolf, he remembered 7 removals and had been to 5 different schools.

It would not be true to say that these constant changes were due to bad housing conditions. Surely, the Pommer-Inn (Alois Hitler was very fond of living in inns) , where Adolf was born, was one of the finest and most presentable buildings in the whole of Braunau.

Nevertheless, the father left there soon after Adolf's birth. Actually, he often moved from a decent dwelling into a poorer one. The house was not the important thing ; rather, the moving. How can one explain this strange mania ? Perhaps, Alois Hitler simply hated to remain in one spot ; and as his service forced on him a certain stability, he, at least, wanted some change in his own sphere.

As soon as he had got used to certain surroundings, he grew weary of them. To live meant to change one's conditions, a trait which I experienced in Adolf too.

3 times, Alois re-modelled his family. It is, perhaps, true that this was due to outside circumstances. But if so, certainly fate played strangely into his hands.

We know that his 1st wife, Anna, suffered very much from his restlessness, which eventually led to their separation and was partly responsible for her unexpected death.

For while his 1st wife was still alive, Alois Hitler already had a child by the woman who became his 2nd wife. And, again, when the 2nd wife fell gravely ill and died, Klara, the 3rd, was already expecting a child of his. Just sufficient time elapsed for the child to be born in wedlock. Alois Hitler was not an easy husband. Even more than from « Frau » Hitler's occasional hints could one gather this from her weary, drawn face. This lack of inner-harmony was, perhaps, partly due to the fact that Alois Hitler never married a woman his own age. Anna was 14 years older, Franziska, 24 years younger, and Klara, 23 years younger.

This strange and unusual habit of the father's, always to change his circumstances, is all the more remarkable as those were peaceful, comfortable times without any justification for such change. I see in the father's character an explanation of the strange behaviour of the son, whose constant restlessness puzzled me for so long.

When Adolf and I strolled through the familiar streets of the good, old town (all peace, quiet and harmony) , my friend would sometimes be taken by a certain mood and begin to change everything he saw. That house there was in a wrong position ; it would have to be demolished. There was an empty plot which could be built-up instead. That street needed a correction in order to give a more compact impression. Away with this horrible, completely bungled tenement block ! Let's have a free vista to the Castle.

Thus, he was always rebuilding the town. But it wasn't only a matter of building.

A beggar, standing before the church, would be an occasion for him to hold forth on the need for a State scheme for the old, which would do away with begging.

A peasant woman coming along with her milk cart drawn by a miserable dog - occasion to criticize the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for their lack of initiative.

2 young lieutenants sauntering through the streets, their sabres proudly clanking - sufficient reason for him to inveigh against the short-comings of a military service which permitted such idleness.

This inclination to be dissatisfied with things as they were, always to change and improve them, was ineradicable in him.

And this was, by no means, a peculiarity which he had acquired through external influences, by his up-bringing at home or at school, but an innate quality that was also apparent in his father's unsettled character. It was a supernatural force, comparable to a motor driving a thousand wheels.

Nevertheless, father and son were affected by this quality in different ways. The father's unruly nature was bridled by one steady factor : his position. The discipline of his office gave his volatile character purpose and direction. Again and again, he was saved from complications by the hard exigencies of his duties.

The uniform of the customs official served as a cover for anything that may have gone on in the stormy sphere of his private life. In particular, being in the service, he unreservedly accepted the authority on which the service was built. Although Alois Hitler was inclined to Liberal views (an inclination not un-common in the Austrian Civil Service) , he would never have questioned the authority of the State, epitomized in the person of the Emperor. By fully-submitting to this accepted authority, Alois Hitler was able to steer safely through all the dangerous reefs and sand-banks of his life, on which otherwise he might have foundered.

This also throws a different light on his obstinate efforts to make a civil servant of Adolf.

It was for him more than a father's usual preoccupation with his son's future. His purpose was rather to direct his son into a position which necessitated submission to authority. It is quite possible that the father did not himself realize the inner-reason of his attitude, but his determination in insisting on his point of view shows that he must have felt how much was at stake for his son. So well did he know him.

With equal determination Adolf refused to comply with his father's wishes, although he himself had only very hazy ideas about his future. To become a painter would have been the worst possible insult to his father, for it would have meant just that aimless wandering to which he (the father) was so much opposed.

With his refusal to enter the Civil Service, Adolf Hitler's path diverges sharply from that of his father ; it takes a different course, final and irrevocable. It was, indeed, the great decision of his life. The years that followed it, I spent at his side.

I could observe how earnestly he tried to find the right path for his future, not merely a job that would provide a livelihood, but real tasks for which his talents were fitted.

Alois Hitler died suddenly.

On January 3rd, 1903 (he was 65 and still strong and active) , he went, as usual, punctually at 10 o'clock in the morning to have his drink.

Without warning, he collapsed in his chair. Before a doctor or a priest could be called, he was dead.

When the 14 year old son saw his dead father he burst out into uncontrollable weeping.

SCHOOL

When I 1st knew Adolf Hitler he had, as far as he was concerned, already finished with school.

To be sure, he was still attending the technical school in Steyr and frequently came home, usually every Sunday.

Editor's Note

Steyr is a town, located in the Austrian Federal State of Upper-Austria. The town is situated at the confluence of the rivers Steyr and Enns. Steyr is Austria's 12th most populated town and, simultaneously, the 3rd largest town in Upper-Austria.

It has a long history as a manufacturing center and has given its name to several manufacturers headquartered there, such as « Steyr Mannlicher » (a fire-arms manufacturer best known for the Steyr AUG) , Steyr Tractor, and Steyr Automobile.

Historically, Steyr has had a number of well-known residents or visitors, including Franz Schubert who wrote his « Trout Quintet » there while on holiday, composer Anton Bruckner, was the organist at the local « pfarrkirche » (parish church) .

Adolf Hitler spent a brief period there, while in his teens. Hitler, who lived in a room at the « Grünmarkt » , went to the high-school of Steyr, in 1904. The school is located in the same building as the famous Saint-Michael's Church.

Only for his mother's sake had he (as he put it) consented to this « last of all attempts » .

His report from the 3rd form of the technical school in Linz had indeed been so bad that « Frau » Hitler had been advised to let Adolf continue his studies at another school.

To put it bluntly, the difficult pupil had been promoted only on the condition that he left. In this manner, the school in the capital of the Province got rid of its less satisfactory pupils by pushing them off into the schools of the smaller towns.

Adolf himself was infuriated by this sly method and from the very start regarded his attempt in the 4th form of the technical school in Steyr as a failure.

By this time, he knew all that there was to know about schools and had come to the conclusion that in view of his own plans for his future, school was of no more use to him.

The knowledge that he lacked, he would make-up by studying by himself.

Art had long since captured him. To art, he dedicated himself with youthful passion, convinced that this was his true vocation. Compared with art, school with its routine appeared grey and monotonous.

At long last, he wanted to be free and go his own way, and despised those young men who did not think likewise. As he emancipated himself from the hated atmosphere of school, so did our friendship gain in value and importance. What his old class-mates in all their insignificance had not been able to give him, he expected from his new friend.

At the elementary school, Hitler was always one of the best pupils. He was quick to learn and made progress even without working very hard. His 1st teacher, Karl Mittermaier, gave him a report :

« Full marks in every subject. »

Mittermaier lived till 1938, when he was naturally asked to tell what he remembered of his former pupil. Although he still remembered the pale and sickly boy, he had little to say about him. The little Adolf had been very docile, his school things always in perfect order.

For the rest, there was nothing outstanding about him, either good or bad. Incidentally, when Adolf Hitler was Chancellor, in 1939, he visited that school, again, and seated himself at the same desk at which he had learned to read and write.

As usual, he made good use of his visit and changed everything possible. He personally bought the old school building and ordered the construction of a fine new school. The teacher who had succeeded old Mittermaier was invited to Obersalzburg, together with her pupils.

But things altered when Adolf Hitler, in September 1900, entered the technical school at Linz. He, himself, writes about those years :

Only one thing was certain, my obvious failure at school. I learned what I liked - in particular, all that which I considered would be useful to me, as a painter later. What I thought was unimportant in this respect or what did not attract me, I neglected completely. My marks in this period show extremes, varying according to the subject and my regard for it : there is « Praiseworthy » and « Excellent » but also « Fair » and « Unsatisfactory » . By far, my best efforts were in geography and even more in history, my favourite subjects, in which I was far ahead of the rest of the class.

One is apt to get a wrong picture of Adolf's school-days from his own words. Although Adolf spoke to me of his school-days with reluctance and always with a curious indignation, nevertheless our friendship was, so to speak, overshadowed by them. In this way, I got quite a different impression from the one he conveys in his writings of 15 years later.

In the 1st place, the 11 year old boy found it difficult to adapt himself to the new surroundings. Every day, he had to make the long journey from Leonding into the town to school. He often told me that, nevertheless, this daily walk was one of the nicest things he could remember of those years. At least, this hour's journey to school assured him a bit of freedom, which he appreciated all the more as until then he had always lived in the country. Everything in town seemed strange and unfriendly to him. His class-mates, mostly from rich homes, did not accept as an equal the queer youngster who came daily to town « from the peasants » . His teachers' interest in him was confined to their classes. All this had been so different at the elementary school, where the easy-going teacher knew all his pupils intimately and used to take his regular drink with their fathers in the evening. At the elementary school, the boy had been accustomed to passing-up each year, without any special effort. At his new school, to start with, he also tried improvisation at which he was a Master. He had to do it all the more as he found little pleasure in learning by heart, so much valued by his teachers. But here, the trick did not work. So, he started to sulk and let things drift. Nobody took much notice of him in class ; he had no friends and did not want any. Sometimes, some of his spoiled classmates would make him feel that they did not accept as one of them this village boy - a sufficient reason for him to withdraw even more. It is significant that not one of his many schoolmates could claim any close relationship or friendship with him.

Thus, after his 1st year at the technical school, Hitler brought home to his father a report bearing twice «

Unsatisfactory » and the verdict that the pupil would not pass-up into the next class.

Adolf never told me how his father reacted to this, but it can be imagined.

Now, he had to start all over again.

His form Master was now Professor Eduard Hümer, who besides German, also taught French, the only foreign language taught in the lower-forms of the technical school and also, to my knowledge, the only foreign language which Adolf Hitler ever studied, or rather was made to study.

But, in the meantime, he had « acclimatized » himself.

His 2nd year in the 1st form was more successful and he was promoted to the 2nd form. But, from there, again, he passed only by the skin of his teeth.

Again, his father had to acknowledge a report which showed « Unsatisfactory » in mathematics. Obviously, this judgment was not due to ill-will on the part of the teachers.

Hitler hated mathematics because it was too dry and required hard, systematic work.

We often talked about it.

Later, in Vienna, Hitler realized that he would need mathematics if he wanted to become an architect. But this made no difference to his violent aversion.

He finished the 3rd form again with 2 « Unsatisfactory » reports, again in mathematics and in addition in German, although Professor Hümer was one of the teachers whom, he later admitted, he respected.

This was the year of his father's death.

Professor Hümer explained to his mother that promotion to the 4th form was only possible if he went to another school. It is, therefore, not correct to say that Adolf Hitler was thrown-out of the Linz technical school. He was only moved « to the country » .

If, up till now, it was by his father's order that he stayed at school, so now, it was mother's love which urged him to continue his studies. He did not like his transfer to Steyr.

After reading Dante's « Divine Comedy » , he talked to me of the school as « Purgatory » .

In Steyr, Hitler lodged with a Court official by the name of Edler von Cichini at number 19 « Grünmarkt » , but whenever he had a moment's spare time, he would come to Linz.

As could be foreseen, the result was bad and remained so when he repeated his examination between September 1st and 15th, 1905.

As well as the usual « Unsatisfactory » for mathematics, there appeared another « Unsatisfactory » for practical geometry.

When Professor Hümer, who had been Hitler's form Master for 3 years, gave evidence as to his pupil's character at the Treason Trial after the unsuccessful « Putsch » of November 1923, he said :

« Hitler was certainly gifted, although only for particular subjects, but he lacked self-control and, to say the least, he was considered argumentative, autocratic, self-opinionated and bad-tempered, and unable to submit to school discipline. Nor was he industrious ; otherwise, he would have achieved much better results, gifted as he was. »

Having passed this rather negative judgment Professor Hümer, in a more sentimental mood, added :

« Yet, as experience shows, what happens at school has not much bearing on life, and while model pupils sink from view without leaving a trace, the difficult boys develop only when they have the elbow room they need.

My former pupil Hitler seems to belong to this latter species and I hope from the bottom of my heart that he will recover from his recent hardships and upsets and live to see the fulfillment of those ideals which he harbours in his bosom, which do credit to him, as they do to any German. »

These words, written in 1924, are certainly not influenced by wisdom after the event.

They show remarkable solidarity between teacher and former pupil.

In an indirect way, Professor Hümer proclaims that the ideals for which Adolf Hitler was, then, standing his trial were indeed the ideals of his school.

And this, in spite of the fact that in the subject which Doctor Hümer taught, German, Hitler by no means excelled ; which is borne-out by the many spelling mistakes in the letters and cards which he sent to me.

Among the teachers who, although their subject did not appeal to him, were favourably looked upon by Hitler for their personality was the science Master, Professor Theodor Gissinger, who replaced Professor Engstler.

Gissinger was very fond of the open-air, a hardy walker and mountaineer and enthusiastic about gymnastics. He was the most rabid of all the Nationalist teachers.

The political differences of that period were also evident within the teaching body, indeed, even more so than in the general public. This atmosphere charged with political tension was more important for the intellectual development of the young Hitler than anything he was taught.

As is generally the case, not the subjects taught, but the atmosphere of a school determines its value.

Incidentally, Professor Gissinger too has in later years given his judgment on his former pupil, Hitler. This remarkable document reads :

« As far as I was concerned, Hitler left neither a favourable nor an unfavourable impression in Linz. He was, by no means, a leader of the class. He was slender and erect, his face pallid and very thin, almost like that of a consumptive, his gaze unusually open, his eyes brilliant. »

The history teacher, Doctor Leopold Pötsch, was the 3rd and last of those teachers who found favour in Hitler's eyes. He is the only one of almost a dozen teachers of whom Hitler, already at that time, approved. However reluctant, Hitler was to talk to me of his former teachers, he made an exception of Pötsch.

The words which Hitler dedicated to his former history teacher are well-known :

« It was, perhaps, decisive for my whole life that chance gave me a history teacher who understood, as few others did, the paramount importance of this principle in teaching and examining (namely, to retain the essential and to forget the inessential) . My teacher, « Herr » Doktor Leopold Pötsch of the Technical School in Linz, fulfilled this condition in truly ideal manner. An old gentleman, kind but, at the same time firm, he was able not only to hold our attention by his brilliant eloquence but to fire us with enthusiasm. I am still touched when I think of the grey-haired man, the fire of whose words sometimes made us forget the present and, as though by magic, transported us into the past, and out of the mists of time transformed the dry historical facts into vivid reality. There we sat, wildly enthusiastic, sometimes moved to tears. »

Undoubtedly, this subsequent judgment is exaggerated.

This is borne-out by the fact that Hitler's last school report in Linz shows only a « Fair » for history, although perhaps, the change of school had something to do with it.

Nevertheless, this teacher's influence on the very sensitive boy should not be underestimated. If it is true to say that the greatest value of the study of history is the enthusiasm which it arouses, then Doctor Pötsch has achieved his end. Pötsch was a native of the southern border region and, before he came to Linz, had taught in Marburg and other places near the German language border. He, therefore, had a vivid experience of the struggle among the nationalities. I believe that the absolute love for everything that was German which Pötsch combined with his aversion to the Hapsburg Monarchy was the decisive revelation for the young Hitler. This fervent devotion to the German people gave him a firm foundation for the rest of his life.

Adolf Hitler remained grateful to his old history teacher throughout his life, indeed, his attachment to school and teacher grew with the passing of the years. In 1938, Hitler came to Klagenfurt and met Pötsch again. He spent more than an hour in a room alone with the frail old man, when he left the room he said to those accompanying him :

« You cannot imagine how much I owe to that old man. »

Editor's Note

Leopold Pötsch (born on 18 November 1853 ; and died on 16 October 1942) was an Austrian history teacher.

He was a high-school teacher of Adolf Hitler and influenced the future leader's later views.

Doctor Leopold Pötsch came from the southern German border regions.

There, political struggles between Slavs and ethnic Germans angered him and turned him into a loud and fiery proponent of the Pan-German movement.

He began teaching in Maribor, and later moved to Linz to teach history.

Pötsch was Hitler's teacher from 1st through 3rd grade (1901-1904) in geography, and in 2nd and 3rd grade in history. He also ran the school library.

...

As a special privilege, Hitler was allowed to bring his teacher maps, which put him in particularly close contact with him.

Aside from his service at the school, Pötsch was a much sought after official speaker.

He spoke at German national associations but, also, on the occasion of the Emperor's anniversary, in 1908. In 1905, he joined the Linz City Council as a representative of the German People's Party.

Hitler became enamored of Pötsch as a teenager, captivated by the professor's fiery speeches.

Pötsch was a fervent pan-German.

Pötsch despised the Habsburgs and forcefully argued that all ethnic Germans should be united by a single government. Like many Austro-Germans, Pötsch wanted to see the old Empire break-up and Austria join Germany, to the north.

He asserted that the Aryan race was stronger, healthier, and more fit to rule than any other people. Pötsch declared that Jews and Slavs were what he termed « inferior races » . (This position was not un-common among impoverished Germans after World War I.)

Hitler hated all his classes except Pötsch's history class.

Hitler was captivated by Pötsch's teachings and began regularly reading a local anti-Semitic newspaper.

Pötsch captured the imagination of his young students with heroic tales of the ancient Teutons and German victories. In his later years, Hitler spoke of Pötsch as a « great man » .

As dictator of Germany, Hitler attempted to unite all German-speaking people, just as Pötsch's lectures had demanded, and persecuted Slavs, Jews, Gypsies, and other minorities, eventually attempting to exterminate them in the « Final Solution » .

Hitler stated that :

« Pötsch used our budding nationalistic fanaticism as a means of educating us, frequently appealing to us our sense of national honour. »

Under Pötsch, Hitler came to the realization that :

« Germanism could be safe-guarded only by the destruction of Austria, and, furthermore, the national sentiment is in no sense identical with dynastic patriotism ; that, above all, the house of Habsburg was destined to be the misfortune of the German national. »

Pötsch gave popular slide lectures entitled « Images of German History » . In them, he strongly emphasized the Germanic era and the time of the early German Emperors before the rule of the Habsburgs and proceeded to pinpoint the German national awakening-up until the Franco-Prussian War.

The following is a quote from one of his speeches :

Since the great days of the magnificent German victories of the years 1870-1871, we have become increasingly conscious of our German identity and, now, thumb more ardently through the books of German myth, legends and history.

However, during those Hitler's teenage years while he may have been inspired by Leopold Pötsch's class, he was not motivated enough to become involved in politics. His only obsession was to become an artist.

Though a fervent pan-German, Pötsch was also an Austrian patriot at the same time.

Later in life, Pötsch was very annoyed when he discovered that, in « Mein Kampf », he received high-praise as a teacher but, at the same time, was denounced as an enemy of Austria. In reference to Pötsch, Hitler wrote :

« For who could have studied German history under such a teacher without becoming an enemy of the State which, through its ruling house, exerted so disastrous an influence on the destinies of the nation. And who could retain a loyalty to a dynasty that ... betrayed the needs of the German people, again and again, for shameless private advantage. »

In 1936, when some teachers in Linz sent their now-famous pupil photos to remind him of them, and they asked Pötsch to join them, he refused, arguing that he did not agree with Hitler in his defamation of Austria as he had sworn an official oath for Austria.

But these subsequent opinions of Hitler's about his teachers should not falsify the real picture of his school-days anymore than the subsequent opinions of the teachers about their former pupil - not to speak of the very contradictory opinions of his numerous class-mates.

The truth is (and I am witness to it) that Adolf left school with a fundamental hatred for it. I would take care not to bring the conversation round to the subject ; but he, sometimes, would be seized by the necessity to hold forth against it violently.

He never tried to keep in touch with any of the teachers, not even with Pötsch. On the contrary, he avoided them and pretended not to recognize them when he met them in the street.

His quarrel with school was going on at the same time as another conflict, which was much more important to him : his settling of accounts with his mother. This expression should not be misunderstood.

Adolf tried to spare his mother as much as he could. But this became impossible when he finally failed at school and so gave-up the career which his father had envisaged for him. Adolf was much more preoccupied with this psychological conflict than with the eternal guerrilla war with the teachers. What did he care about bad reports ? But to his mother, they meant that Adolf would not reach his goal.

I myself witnessed how Adolf tried to spare his mother during the last school year and, yet, he could not spare her because it was impossible to convince her that his future lay elsewhere. Where, he did not yet know himself ; and not for many years after his mother's death. So, she took this, her greatest worry, the future of her son, with her into the grave.

In those gloomy days of autumn, 1905, Adolf was on the razor's edge.

Superficially, the decision the 16 year old had to take was whether to repeat the 4th form in the technical school at Steyr, or leave school forever. But its meaning for him was graver : should he, for his mother's sake, continue on a path which he knew was mistaken and hopeless for him ; or should he ignore the grief that he would cause his mother and choose the other way, of which he could only say that it was the path towards art, a word which, one can understand, didn't offer much comfort to his mother ?

But, in view of his nature, this was not for Adolf really a decision in the true sense of the word ; for, in reality, there was no dilemma at all. He simply could not do otherwise and, leaving school, he embarked on the 2nd path without looking back. But he knew how upset his mother was by this decision and this, I know, caused him immeasurable grief.

In those months Adolf passed through a grave crisis, the gravest during the years of our friendship. It manifested itself by his falling seriously ill.

He describes it in his book as lung trouble.

His sister Paula mentions a hemorrhage. Others, again, assert that it was some gastric trouble brought on by auto-suggestion.

I visited him almost every day during his illness, because I had to give him regular reports about Stefanie who, even at that time, he worshiped.

As far as I can remember, his illness was actually some lung trouble. I know that, for a long time afterwards, he was plagued by coughs and nasty catarrhs, especially on damp, foggy days.

Also, in his mother's eyes, he was released by this illness from continuing school. Thus, it just suited his decision. To what extent this illness was auto-suggestion, to what extent it was the natural consequence of his inner-crisis, to what extent it was purely constitutional, I cannot say.

When Adolf rose from his sick-bed, he had made-up his mind. He had definitely finished with school and without the slightest doubt or inhibition he steered his way towards the career of an artist.

The 2 years of his life that followed were without any visible aim.

« In the hollowness of the life of leisure » is the title he gave to this phase when, in compiling « Mein Kampf » , he discovered with some un-easiness this gap in his career.

Superficially, this title is correct.

He did not go to school, he did not bother about any practical training, he lived with his mother and let her keep him.

In reality, this chapter of his life was filled with unceasing activity.

He sketched, he painted, he wrote poems and he read.

I cannot remember that Adolf was ever idle or felt bored even for a single hour. If, by chance, he got fed-up with something, as for instance, a play that we saw, his boredom made him condemn the play so vehemently that, in this way, he roused himself to highest-activity.

To be sure, he was as yet not very systematic. There was no apparent purpose, no clear goal. He only accumulated with unbounded energy impressions, experience and material. What would ever become of it all remained an open question. He did nothing but search, he searched everywhere and always.

Meanwhile, Adolf found a way of proving to his mother how useless any further schooling would have been for him. He proved it (how typical of his way of tackling problems) by convincing his mother of the futility of the whole school system.

He told her :

« One can learn much better by oneself. »

He subscribed to the library of the Adult Education.

He joined the Museum Society and borrowed books from its library. He also used some lending libraries. From that moment, I remember Adolf as always surrounded by books, especially by the volumes of his favourite work, with which he never parted, the German Mythology. How often did he persuade me, when I came from my work, to take with me and study this or that book which he had just read so that he could discuss it with me. Now, suddenly, he had all the qualities which he had lacked at school ; application, interest and pleasure in learning. He had, as he said, beaten the school at its own game.

Stefanie

To tell the truth, it is not very agreeable for me to be the only witness (apart from Stefanie herself) who can tell of my friend's youthful love, which lasted 4 years from the beginning of his 16th year.

I fear that by giving a picture of the actual facts, I shall disappoint those who are expecting sensational disclosures. Adolf's relations with this girl from a much respected family were confined to those permitted by the prevailing code of morals and were absolutely normal, unless today's conception of sexual morality is so upside-down that one considers it abnormal if 2 young people have an affair and (to put it briefly) « nothing happens » .

I must ask to be excused from mentioning this girl's surname, as well as her later married name. Occasionally, I have revealed it to persons engaged in research on Hitler's youth, who had satisfied me as to their good faith.

Stefanie, who was one, or perhaps, 2 years older than Adolf, later married a high-ranking officer and now lives, a widow, in Vienna.

The reader will, therefore, understand my discretion.

One evening, in the spring of 1905, as we were taking our usual stroll, Adolf gripped my arm and asked me excitedly what I thought of that slim blonde girl walking along the « Landstraße », arm-in-arm with her mother.

He added resolutely :

« You must know, I'm in love with her. »

Stefanie was a distinguished-looking girl, tall and slim.

She had thick fair hair, which she mostly wore swept back in a bun. Her eyes were very beautiful - bright and expressive. She was exceptionally well-dressed and even her bearing indicated that she came from a good, well-to-do family.

Editor's Note

The young girl named was Stephanie Rabatsch, to whom Hitler sent 1 anonymous love-letter, in 1908, just before to depart for Vienna : in it, he asked her to wait for him to graduate from Art School and they would get married.

He never dared to approach her and was always satisfied with a quick glance from her. He even wrote a poem about her entitled « Hymn to the beloved » .

Urged by Kubizek to be more decisive and bolder, Hitler shunned-away, arguing he was not yet in a position to conquer the heart of his beloved.

She got engaged to a Captain from the Hessian command in Linz, soon after.

After the War, this woman confirmed to have been the recipient of an anonymous love-letter in the 1900's, but always maintained she was unaware of the identity of the writer.

The photograph by Hans Zivny, taken in Urfahr, on her leaving school, was somewhat earlier than this meeting and Stefanie could only have been then 17, or, at the most, 18 years old. It shows a young girl with pretty, regular features.

The expression of the face is completely natural and open. The abundant hair, still worn in the Gretel fashion, serves to strengthen this impression. A freshness and lack of affectation show in the girl's healthy countenance.

The evening stroll along the « Landstraße » was, in those years, a favourite habit with the Linzers.

The ladies looked at the shop-windows and made little purchases. Friends met - and the younger generation amused themselves in innocent ways. There was a lot of flirting and the young army officers were particularly good at it. It seemed to us that Stefanie must live in Urfahr, for she always came from the bridge up the main-square, and strolled-down the « Landstraße », arm-in-arm with her mother. At 5 o'clock, almost precisely, mother and daughter appeared - we stood waiting at the Schmiedtoreck. It would have been improper to salute Stefanie, as neither of us had been introduced to the young lady. A glance had to take the place of a greeting.

From then on, Adolf did not take his eyes off Stefanie. In that moment, he was changed, no longer his own-self.

I found-out that Stefanie's mother was a widow and did, indeed, live in Urfahr, and that a young man who occasionally accompanied them, to Adolf's great irritation, was her brother, a law student in Vienna.

This information eased Adolf's mind considerably. But, from time to time, the 2 ladies were to be seen in the company of young officers. Poor, pallid youngsters like Adolf naturally could not hope to compete with these young lieutenants in their smart uniforms.

Adolf felt this intensely and gave vent to his feelings with eloquence. His anger, in the end, led him into uncompromising enmity towards the officer class as a whole, and everything military in general.

He used to call them :

« Conceited block-heads. »

It annoyed him immensely that Stefanie mixed with such idlers who, he insisted, wore corsets and used scent.

To be sure, Stefanie had no idea how deeply Adolf was in love with her ; she regarded him as a somewhat shy but, nevertheless, remarkably tenacious and faithful admirer.

When she responded with a smile to his inquiring glance, he was happy, and his mood became unlike anything I had ever observed in him ; everything in the world was good and beautiful and well-ordered, and he was content.

When Stefanie, as happened just as often, coldly ignored his gaze, he was crushed and ready to destroy himself and the whole world.

Certainly, such phenomena are typical of every 1st great love, and one might, perhaps, be tempted to dismiss Adolf's feelings for Stefanie as calf love.

This may have been true as far as Stefanie's own conception of them was concerned, but for Adolf himself, his relation to Stefanie was more than calf love.

The mere fact that it lasted more than 4 years, and even cast its splendour over the subsequent years of misery in Vienna, shows that Adolf's feelings were deep and true, and real love. Proof of the depth of his feelings is that for Adolf, throughout these years, no other woman but Stefanie existed - how unlike the usual boy's love, which is always changing its object. I cannot remember that Adolf ever gave any thought to another girl.

Later, in Vienna, when Lucie Weidt roused his enthusiasm in the part of Elsa, in « Lohengrin », the highest-praise he could give her was that she reminded him of Stefanie.

Editor's Note

Lohengrin is a character in German Arthurian literature.

The son of Parzival (Percival) , he is a knight of the Holy-Grail sent in a boat pulled by swans to rescue a maiden who can never ask his identity.

His story, which 1st appears in Wolfram von Eschenbach's « Parzival » , is a version of the Knight of the Swan legend known from a variety of medieval sources.

Wolfram's story was expanded in 2 later romances.

In 1848, Richard Wagner adapted the medieval tale into his popular Opera, « Lohengrin » .

...

In appearance, Stefanie was ideally suited for the part of Elsa, and other female roles of Wagner's Operas, and we spent much time wondering whether she had the necessary voice and musical talent. Adolf was inclined to take it for granted.

Just her « Valkyrie » -like appearance never failed to attract him, and to fire him with un-bounded enthusiasm.

Editor's Note

In Norse mythology, a valkyrie (from Old Norse « valkyrja » : « chooser of the slain ») is one of a host of female figures who decides who dies in battle. Selecting among half of those who die in battle (the other half go to the goddess Freyja's after-life field, called « Fólkvangr ») , the valkyries bring their chosen to the after-life hall of the slain, Valhalla, ruled-over by the god Odin. There, the deceased warriors become « einherjar » .When the « einherjar » are not preparing for the events of Ragnarök, the valkyries bear them mead. Valkyries also appear as lovers of heroes and other mortals, where they are sometimes described as the daughters of royalty, sometimes accompanied by ravens, and sometimes connected to swans or horses.

...

He wrote countless love poems to Stefanie.

« Hymn to the Beloved » was the title of one of them, which he read to me from his little black notebook.

Stefanie, a high-born damsel, in a dark-blue, flowing velvet gown, rode on a white steed over the flowering meadows, her loose hair fell in golden waves on her shoulders.

A clear spring sky was above. Everything was pure, radiant joy.

I can still see Adolf's face, glowing with fervent ecstasy, and hear his voice reciting these verses. Stefanie filled his thoughts so completely that everything he said, or did, or planned for the future, was centred around her.

With his growing estrangement from his home, Stefanie gained more and more influence over my friend, although he never spoke a word to her.

My ideas about these things were much more prosaic, and I remember very well our repeated arguments on the subject - and my recollections of Adolf's relationship to Stefanie are particularly distinct.

He used to insist that, once he met Stefanie, everything would become clear without as much as a word being exchanged. For such exceptional human beings as himself and Stefanie, he said, there was no need for the usual communication by word of mouth ; extraordinary human beings would understand each other by intuition.

Whatever the subject, we might discuss at any time, Adolf was always sure that Stefanie not only knew his ideas exactly, but that she shared them enthusiastically.

If I dared to comment that he hadn't spoken to Stefanie about them, and to express my doubts as to whether she was at all interested in such things, he became furious and shouted at me :

« You simply don't understand, because you can't understand the true meaning of extraordinary love. »

In order to quiet him down, I asked him if he could transmit to Stefanie the knowledge of such complicated problems simply by gazing at her.

He only replied :

« It's possible ! These things cannot be explained. What is in me, is in Stefanie too. »

Of course, I took great care not to push these delicate matters too far.

But I was pleased that Adolf trusted me so much, for to nobody else, not even to his mother, had he talked about Stefanie.

He expected Stefanie to reciprocate his love for her to the exclusion of all others. For a long time, he put-up with the interest she took in other young men, especially the officers, because he regarded it as a sort of deliberate diversion to conceal her own tempestuous feelings for him. But this attitude often gave way to fits of raging jealousy ; then, Adolf would be desperate when Stefanie ignored the pale youth who was waiting for her, and concentrated her attention instead on the young lieutenant escorting her. Why, indeed, should a lively young girl have been satisfied with the anxious glances of a secret admirer, while others expressed their admiration so much more gracefully ?

But I, of course, would never have dared to express such a thought in Adolf's presence.

One day he asked me :

« What shall I do ? »

Never before had he asked for my advice and I was extremely proud that he did ; at last, for a change, I could feel superior to him.

I explained :

« It's quite simple. You approach the 2 ladies and, raising your hat, introduce yourself to the mother by giving your name, and ask her permission to address the daughter and to escort them. »

Adolf looked at me doubtfully and pondered my suggestion for quite a while. In the end, however, he rejected it.

« What am I to say if the mother wants to know my profession ? After all, I have to mention my profession straightway ; it would be best to add it to my name - “ Adolf Hitler, academic painter ”, or something similar. But I am not yet an academic painter, and I can't introduce myself till I am. For the mama, the profession is even more important than the name. »

I thought for a long time that Adolf was simply too shy to approach Stefanie.

And, yet, it was not shyness that held him back.

His conception of the relationship between the sexes was already, then, so high that the usual way of making the acquaintance of a girl seemed to him undignified.

As he was opposed to flirting in any form, he was convinced that Stefanie had no other desire but to wait until he should come to ask her to marry him.

I did not share this conviction at all ; but Adolf, as was his habit with all problems that agitated him, had already made an elaborate plan.

And this girl, who was a stranger to him and had never exchanged a word with him, succeeded where his father, the school and even his mother had failed : he drew-up an exact program for his future which would enable him, after 4 years, to ask for Stefanie's hand.

We discussed this difficult problem for hours, with the result that Adolf commissioned me to collect further information about Stefanie.

In the Music Society, there was a cellist whom I had occasionally seen talking to Stefanie's brother.

Through him, I learned that Stefanie's father, a higher-government official, had died some years earlier. The mother had a comfortable home and was in receipt of a widow's pension, which she used to give her 2 children the best possible education.

Stefanie had attended the Girl's High-School and had already matriculated. She had a great number of admirers - small wonder, beautiful as she was.

She was fond of dancing and, the previous winter, had gone with her mother to all the important dances of the town. As far as he knew, the cellist added, she was not engaged.

Adolf was highly-satisfied with the result of my investigations - that she was not engaged he had, anyhow, taken for granted.

There was only one point in my report that disturbed him greatly : Stefanie danced, and, according to the cellist's assurance, she danced well, and enjoyed it. This did not fit at all into Adolf's own image of Stefanie.

A Valkyrie who waltzed round the ballroom in the arms of some « block-head » of a lieutenant, was for him too terrible to be contemplated.

What was the origin of this strange, almost ascetic trait in him which made him reject all the pleasures of youth ?

Adolf's father, after all, had been a man who enjoyed life and who, as a good-looking custom's official, had certainly turned many a girl's head.

Why was Adolf so different ? After all, he was a most presentable young man, well-built, slender, and his somewhat severe and exaggeratedly serious features were enlivened by his extraordinary eyes, whose peculiar brilliance made one forget the sickly pallor of his face.

And, yet - dancing was as contrary to his nature as smoking or drinking beer at a pub.

These things simply did not exist for him, although nobody, not even his mother, encouraged him in this attitude. After having been his butt for so long, at last, I had a chance of pulling his leg.

I proclaimed, with a straight face :

« You must take dancing lessons, Adolf. »

Dancing immediately became one of his problems. I well-remember that our lonely perambulations were no longer punctuated by discussions on « The Theatre » or « Reconstruction of the Danube Bridge » , but were dominated by one subject : dancing.

As with everything that he couldn't tackle at once, he indulged in generalizations.

He said once to me :

« Visualize a crowded ballroom, and imagine that you were deaf. You can't hear the music to which these people are moving and, then, take a look at their senseless progress, which leads nowhere. Aren't these people raving mad ? »

I replied :

« All this is no good, Adolf, Stefanie is fond of dancing. If you want to conquer her, you will have to dance around just as aimlessly and idiotically as the others. »

That was all that was needed to set him off raving.

He screamed at me :

« No, no, never ! I shall never dance ! Do you understand ! Stefanie only dances because she is forced to by society on which she unfortunately depends. Once she is my wife, she won't have the slightest desire to dance ! »

Contrary to the rule, this time, his own words did not convince him ; for he brought-up the question of dancing, again and again.

I rather suspected that, secretly at home, he practised a few cautious steps with his little sister. « Frau » Hitler had bought a piano for Adolf.

Perhaps, I thought, I might soon be asked to play a waltz on it and, then, I would chaff Adolf about being deaf while he danced.

He did not need music for his movements. I also intended to point-out to him the harmony between music and bodily movements, of which he did not seem to have any conception. But it never got as far as this.

Adolf went on, brooding for days and weeks, trying to find a solution.

In his depressed mood, he hit on a crazy idea : he seriously contemplated kidnaping Stefanie. He expounded his plan to me in all its details and assigned me my role, which was not a very rewarding one ; for I had to keep the mother engaged in conversation, while he seized the girl.

I asked prosaically :

« And what are you both going to live on ? »

My question sobered him up a little, and the audacious plan was abandoned.

To make matters worse, Stefanie was, at that time, in an unfriendly mood.

She would pass the Schmiedtoreck with her face averted, as though Adolf didn't exist at all.

This brought him to the verge of despair.

He exclaimed :

« I can't stand it any longer ! I will make an end of it ! »

It was the 1st and, as far as I know, the last time that Adolf contemplated suicide seriously.

He would jump into the river from the Danube bridge, he told me and, then, it would be over and done with.

But Stefanie would have to die with him - he insisted on that.

Once more, a plan was thought-up, in all its details.

Every single phase of the horrifying tragedy was minutely described, including the part I would have to play ; even my conduct as the sole survivor was ordained.

This sombre scene was with me, even in my dreams.

Soon, the sky was blue again and, for Adolf, came that happiest of days in June 1906 which I am sure remained in his memory as clearly as it did in mine.

Summer was approaching and a flower festival was held in Linz. As usual, Adolf waited for me outside the Carmelite Church, where I used to go every Sunday with my parents ; then, we took-up our stand at the Schmiedtoreck.

The position was extremely favourable, as the street there is narrow and the carriages in the parade had to pass quite close to the pavement.

The regimental band led the string of flower-decked carriages, from which young girls and ladies waved to the spectators. But Adolf had no eye nor ears for any of this ; he waited feverishly for Stefanie to appear. I was already giving-up hope of seeing her when Adolf gripped my arm so violently that it hurt. Seated in a handsome carriage, decorated with flowers, mother and daughter turned into the « Schmiedtorstraße » . I still have the picture clearly, in my mind. The mother, in a light-grey silk dress, holds a red sunshade over her head, through which the rays of the sun seemed to cast, as though by magic, a rosy glow over the countenance of Stefanie, wearing a pretty silk frock.

Stefanie has adorned her carriage, not with roses as most of the others, but with simple, wild blossoms : red poppies, white marguerites and blue corn-flowers. Stefanie holds a bunch of the same flowers in her hand. The carriage approaches Adolf is floating on air.

Never before has he seen Stefanie so enchanting. Now, the carriage is quite close to us. A bright glance falls on Adolf. Stefanie sends him a beaming smile and, picking a flower from her bouquet, throws it to him.

Never again, did I see Adolf as happy as he was at that moment.

When the carriage had passed, he dragged me aside and, with emotion, he gazed at the flower, this visible pledge of her love. I can still hear his voice, trembling with excitement :

« She loves me ! You have seen ! She loves me ! »

During the following months, when his decision to leave school had caused a conflict with his mother, and he was ill, his love for Stefanie was his only comfort and he always kept her flower in his locket.

Adolf was never in greater need of my friendship ; for as I was the only person who shared his secret, it was only through me that he could get news about her.

I had to go every day to the usual spot at the Schmiedtoreck and to report to him all my observations and tell him, in particular, who had spoken to mother and daughter.

That I stood alone at the familiar corner, Adolf felt, would naturally upset Stefanie immeasurably. It did not, but I kept it from him.

Fortunately, it had never occurred to Adolf that I might fall in love with Stefanie, for his slightest suspicion in this respect would have meant the end of our friendship ; and, as there was no real reason for it, I was able to give my reports to my poor friend wholly disinterestedly.

Adolf's mother had been aware for a long time of the change in her son.

One evening (I remember it well because it embarrassed me considerably) , she asked me straight out :

« What's the matter with Adolf ? He's so impatient to see you. »

I muttered some excuse and hurried into Adolf's room.

He was happy when I brought him some new facts concerning Stefanie.

I told him one day :

« She has a good soprano voice. »

He jumped-up :

« How do you know that ? I followed her very closely, for some time, and I heard her speak. I know enough music to be able to tell that somebody with such a clear and pure voice must be a good soprano. »

How happy this made Adolf. And I was pleased that he, languishing in his bed, had a moment of happiness.

Every evening, I had to get back to the « Humboldtstraße » from the evening stroll by the quickest route.

I would often find Adolf sketching a big blueprint.

He said, in dead earnest, after having heard my report :

« Now, I have made-up my mind. I have decided to build the house for Stefanie in Renaissance style. »

And, then, I had to give my opinion, especially as to whether I was satisfied with the shape and size of the music-room. He had paid special attention to the acoustics of the room, he said, and asked me to say where the piano should go, and so on, and so on.

All this, in a manner as though there were not the slightest doubt that the plans would be carried-out.

A timid inquiry about the money brought forth the rude reply :

« Oh, to hell with the money ! » , an expression which he frequently employed.

We had some arguments as to where this villa would be built ; as a musician, I was all for Italy. Adolf insisted that it could only be built in Germany, in the neighbourhood of a big city so that he and Stefanie could go to the Opera and concerts.

As soon as he could leave, his bed he went down and took-up his position at the Schmiedtoreck ; he was still very pale and ill.

Punctually, as usual, Stefanie and her mother appeared. Seeing Adolf, pale-faced and hollow-eyed, she smiled at him.

He asked me happily :

« Did you notice ? »

From that moment on, his health improved rapidly.

In spring 1906, when Adolf left for Vienna, he gave me detailed instructions how I should behave « vis-à-vis » Stefanie ; for he was convinced that she would soon ask me whether my friend, was ill again, as I was there alone.

Then, I was to answer as follows :

« My friend is not ill, but he had to go to Vienna to take-up his studies at the Academy of Art. When his studies are finished, he will spend 1 year travelling, abroad, of course. »

(I insisted on being allowed to say « in Italy » . Very well, then, Italy.)

« In 4 years time, he will return and ask for your hand in marriage. In case of an affirmative answer, the preparations for the wedding would be put in hand forthwith. »

While Adolf was in Vienna, I naturally had to send him regular written reports about Stefanie.

As it was cheaper to send post-cards than letters, Adolf gave me a code word for Stefanie before he left.

It was « Benkieser » , the name of a former class-mate.

A picture post-card which he sent me on May 8th, from Vienna, shows how much this « Benkieser » was still on his mind in spite of his many new and varied impressions in Vienna.

It reads :

« I am longing to return to my beloved Linz and Urfahr. »

The word « Urfahr » is underlined, alluding, of course, to Stefanie, who lived there.

« I have to see Benkieser again. I wonder what he's doing. »

A few weeks later, Adolf returned from Vienna and I met him at the station.

I still remember how we took turns carrying his bag and he urged me to tell him all about Stefanie, at once.

We were in a hurry because the evening stroll would begin in an hour's time.

Adolf would not believe that Stefanie had not asked after him, for he took it for granted that she was longing for him just as much as he was for her.

But, at heart, he was glad that I had not had the opportunity to tell Stefanie about his grandiose plans for the future, as his prospects at the moment were not very bright.

We hardly stopped in the « Humboldtstraße » to greet his mother before we hurried-off to the Schmiedtoreck.

Full of excitement, Adolf waited.

Punctually, Stefanie and her mother appeared. She threw him a surprised glance. That was sufficient - he did not want more. But I became impatient.

I said to my friend :

« You can see that she wants you to talk to her. »

He answered :

« Tomorrow. »

But the morrow never came, and weeks, months and years passed without his taking any steps to change this state of affairs which caused him so much unrest.

It was natural that Stefanie did nothing beyond that 1st phase of exchanging glances.

The most Adolf could have expected of her was the flower thrown at him with a roguish smile in the care-free atmosphere of the Flower Festival. Besides, any move of hers beyond the rigid limits of convention would have destroyed the picture of her which Adolf kept in his heart. Perhaps, even his strange timidity was prompted by the fear that any closer acquaintance might destroy this ideal. For, to him, Stefanie was not only the incarnation of all womanly virtues, but also the woman who took the greatest interest in all his wide and varied plans. There was no other person, apart from himself, whom he credited with so much knowledge and so many interests. The slightest divergence from this picture would have filled him with unspeakable disappointment.

Of course, I am convinced the 1st words he exchanged with Stefanie would have caused that very disappointment, because she was fundamentally a young, happy girl, like thousands of others, and certainly had the same kind of interests.

Adolf would have sought in vain for those grandiose thoughts and ideas with which he had surrounded her to such an extent as to make her the female image of himself.

Only the most rigid separation could preserve his idol.

It is most revealing that the young Hitler, who so thoroughly despised « bourgeois » society, nevertheless, as far as his love-affair was concerned, observed its codes and « étiquette » more strictly than many a member of the « bourgeoisie » itself. The rules of « bourgeois » conduct and « étiquette » became for him the barricade behind which he built-up his relationship to Stefanie.

« I have not been introduced to her. »

How often have I heard him say these words, although ordinarily he would make light of such obstacles. This strict observance of social customs was part of his whole nature.

It was apparent in his neat dress and in his correct behaviour as much as in his natural courtesy, which my mother liked so much about him.

I never heard him use an ambiguous expression or tell a doubtful story.

So, in spite of all apparent contradictions, this strange love of Hitler for Stefanie falls into the pattern of his character. Love was a field where the unforeseeable might happen, and which might become dangerous. How many men who had set-out with great intentions had been forced-off their path by irregular and complicated love-affairs.

It was imperative to be on one's guard ! Instinctively, the young Hitler found the only correct attitude in his love for Stefanie : he possessed a being whom he loved and, at the same time, he did not possess her.

He arranged his whole life as though he possessed this beloved creature entirely. But, as he himself avoided any personal meeting, this girl, although he could see that she walked the earth, remained nevertheless a creature of his dream-world, towards whom he could project his desires, plans and ideas.

And, thus, he kept himself from deviating from his own path ; indeed, this strange relationship, through the power of love, increased his own will.

He imagines Stefanie as his wife, builds the house in which they live together, surrounds it with a magnificent garden and arranges his home with Stefanie, just as, in fact, he did later on the Ober-Salzburg, though without her.

This mixing of dream and reality is characteristic of the young Hitler.

And, whenever there is a danger that the beloved would entirely escape into the realm of fantasy, he hurries to the Schmiedtoreck and makes sure that she really walks the earth.

Hitler was confirmed in the choice of his path, not by what Stefanie actually was, but by what his imagination made of her.

Thus, Stefanie was 2 things for him : 1 part reality, and 1 part wish and imagination.

Be that as it may, Stefanie was the most beautiful, the most fertile and purest dream of his life.

HITLER THE NATIONALIST

As I begin to describe the young Hitler's political beliefs and ideas, I seem to hear his voice again, saying :

« You don't understand it. »

or,

« These are matters I can't discuss with you. »

Sometimes, he was even more scathing, as for instance when listening to some of his political observations, I would nod assent, instead of expressing disgust, as he had expected :

« In politics, “ Gustl ”, you are nothing but a fool. »

After all, I had only one interest in life : music.

To begin with, Adolf agreed with me about the supremacy of art. But, during the years we spent together, his interest in politics gradually became paramount, although he never lost sight of his artistic aspirations.

One could put it this way : the years in Linz were dominated by art ; the following years in Vienna, by politics.

I was fully aware that it was only in artistic matters I counted for him.

And the more he became interested in politics, the less our friendship mattered. Not that he showed it to me ; for one thing, he took our friendship too seriously and, for another, perhaps, he didn't even realize it himself.

Politics had always been the critical point in our relationship. Having no political ideas of my own, or where I did have, not feeling strongly enough about them to defend them or to impose them on others, I was an unsatisfactory partner for Adolf in our discussions. He would rather have converted me than convinced me. But in fact, I accepted everything he said readily and uncritically, and even retained something so that I could occasionally throw in a clever remark, But to contradict, as he would have liked, I was not capable. I just was not fertile soil for politics. I was like a deaf-mute in front of an orchestra, who sees that the musicians are playing, but hears nothing. I had simply no political sense.

This reduced Adolf to despair.

It seemed inconceivable to him that there should be on earth a specimen so absolutely innocent of politics. He tried all means to prove to me that this was impossible. And he was none too gentle with me. In Vienna he compelled me repeatedly to go with him to Parliament, although I did not like it at all and would have preferred to spend the time at the piano. But Adolf did not yield. I had to go with him, although he knew very well that I was always terribly bored by this Parliament business. But Heaven help me if I had said so.

It is generally believed that politicians come from politically conscious circles. This was certainly not so in the case of my friend. On the contrary !

Here, again, is one of Hitler's innumerable contradictions.

The father was rather fond of talking politics and never hid his Liberal opinions. But he would not hear a word against the Monarchy : this old, faithful civil servant would never go as far as that.

When on the Emperor's birthday, on the 18th of August, he put on his gala uniform, he was a loyal servant of his Imperial and Royal Majesty.

Probably, Adolf, when little, never heard much talk of politics from his father, for politics, the father believed, was not a matter to be discussed in the family circle, but in the pub. And I cannot remember that Adolf had ever quoted his father for any one of his political opinions.

Still less was there any sign of it in the quiet home at number 31 « Humboldtstraße ». Adolf's mother was a simple, devout woman, far removed from politics. When the father was still alive, she might have heard him grumble occasionally about the political situation, but it had not sunk-in and, certainly, she had not passed it on to the children.

After his death, they never had visitors who might have introduced politics and I cannot remember ever hearing any political discussion in « Frau » Hitler's house.

Even when some political event was agitating the whole town, nothing of it would penetrate into this quiet household, for even Adolf would not mention such things at home. Their life flowed quietly on.

The only change I ever saw in the family was that « Frau » Klara, towards the end of 1906, moved from the « Humboldtstraße » to Urfahr.

Editor's Note

Urfahr received, on 16 December 1808, the legal market and, on 4 November 1882, became a town.

Since 1888, the « Mühlkreisbahn » connects the Linz-Urfahr train-station with the one of Aigen-Schlägl, in Upper-Mühlviertel. In 1919, the 1st community of Pöstlingberg, located near the pilgrimage church, was incorporated to Urfahr, shortly afterwards, and was even incorporated to Linz.

At the time of incorporation, Urfahr counted approximately 15,000 residents.

The name evolved from the word crossing, which was necessary to get from Linz there.

...

This was, by no means, an after-effect of the father's restlessness, it was rather the result of purely practical considerations.

In those days, Urfahr, which is now a part of Linz, was still a separate parish of mainly rural character, a favourite residence for retired people.

As no excise duties were levied there, many things, for instance meat, were cheaper than in town. « Frau » Klara hoped to be able to manage better with her modest pension of 140 Crowns (90 for herself, and 25 each for Adolf and Paula) . And she was glad to be living among meadows and fields again.

The quiet house at number 9 « Blütengasse » still stands as it was and, sometimes, when I pass by, I think I can see « Frau » Klara standing on the little balcony.

For Adolf, it was a special source of satisfaction to live « on the same bank » as Stefanie.

Our nightly journey home was made longer because of the move to Urfahr. But this suited us well, for the problems which we tackled had become more profound and numerous. The way across the bridge was, sometimes, too short for us, so that if we were particularly concerned with a problem we had to walk to and fro across the Danube until our subject was exhausted. To be exact, Adolf needed the time for talking, and I for listening.

In studying the political career of such an extraordinary man as Adolf Hitler, one has to distinguish between external influences and the man's own predispositions, for I believe that the latter are much more important than the external events. After all, many other young people had the same teachers as Adolf, experienced the same political incidents, rejoicing or getting angry over them and, yet, these very same people have become worthy businessmen, technicians or manufacturers and never rose to political significance.

The spirit of nationalism dominated the Linz Technical School.

The class was secretly opposed to all traditional institutions, such as patriotic plays, dynastic manifestations and festivals, to Divine Service in school and to « Corpus Christi » processions. Adolf Hitler describes in his book this atmosphere which to him was more important than the lessons.

Money was collected for « Sudmark » and « Schulverein » , one's sentiments were manifested by wearing corn-flowers and black-red-gold colours, we used « Heil » as a greeting and sang « Deutschland über Alles » , instead of the Hapsburg Imperial Hymn.

All this, in spite of warnings and punishment.

The struggle for existence of the German population in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy agitated the younger generation in those days ; understandably, for Austria's German population stood alone in the midst of the Slav, Magyar and Italian nations of Austria-Hungary.

Linz, to be sure, was remote from the racial border and was entirely German. But there was always trouble in neighbouring Bohemia.

In Prague, one street demonstration after another took place.

Even in Linz, much indignation was caused by the fact that the Imperial and Royal police were not capable of protecting German houses from the Czech mob, so that it was necessary to proclaim a state of siege in Prague, in peace time.

Budweis was then still a German town with German administration and a German majority in the Town Council. Those of Adolf's class-mates who came from Prague, Budweis or Prachatitz used to weep with rage when they were jokingly called « Bohemians » ; for they wanted to be solely German, like the others. Soon, there was even unrest in Linz.

A few hundred Czechs lived there, as quiet and modest workmen and artisans, without anybody taking much notice of them.

Now, a Capucine Monk, a Czech named Jurasek, founded a Sokol Club, preached in Saint-Martin's Church in Czech, and collected money for the building of a Czech school.

This caused a great sensation in the town and some worthy Nationalists already saw in the action of the fanatic monk the preparation of a Czech invasion. Of course, that was exaggerated. Nevertheless, just this Czech activity made the indolent Linzers feel that they were threatened, with the result that, almost unanimously, they joined in the Nationalist struggle.

Those teachers of the Technical School, who were nationalists, led the struggle. Doctor Leopold Pötsch, the history teacher, was an active politician.

As a member of the Town Council, he was one of the leading lights of the Nationalist Party. He hated the Hapsburg multi-racial State (which today, what a change, seems to us to be the very model of a supra-national community) and all the enthusiastic young Nationalists took-up his watch-word.

« Who could remain loyal to a dynasty which, again and again, vilely betrayed, past and present, the interests of the German people for their own advantage ? »

Thus, Hitler definitely and irrevocably had abandoned his father's ways in favour of a pan-German program. When Adolf, raging on, let himself go on this train of thought, I could hardly keep-up with what he was saying, let alone take an active part in the discussion.

Yet, one word, which regularly cropped-up in his discourse, always struck me : the « Reich » .

With this word, he used to wind-up his long out-pourings. Whenever he had talked himself into a blind alley and was at a loss how to continue, he would say categorically :

« This problem will be solved by the “ Reich ”. »

If I asked, for instance, who would finance all these gigantic building projects which he sketched on his drawing-board, his brief answer was :

« The “ Reich ”. »

Even trivialities were left to the care of the « Reich ». There was a « “ Reich ” 's Stage-Designer », who would improve the unsatisfactory equipment of provincial theatres. (It is well-known that, after 1933, there really was a man who filled that post. I remember that Adolf Hitler coined that term as far back as his Linz days, when he was 16 or 17.) Even the care of the blind, or the protection of animals belonged, in his opinion, to the jurisdiction of the « Reich » !

The word « Reich » is used in Austria for the territory of Germany ; its inhabitants are called « Reich » 's Germans. But my friend's use of the term, meant more than merely the German State, though he carefully avoided any more exact definition. For, to him, the word was simply a « porte-manteau » expression, which comprised everything that was politically important for him - and that was a lot.

With the same fanaticism with which he loved the German people, and this « Reich », did he reject everything foreign. He had no desire to know other countries. That longing for distant lands so typical of all open-minded young people was utterly alien to him - even the artist's Classical enthusiasm for Italy. There was only one place for his plans and ideas : the « Reich » .

His violent nationalism, which was unequivocally directed against the Hapsburg Monarchy, showed all the particular predispositions of his character, especially the iron consistency with which he stuck to everything he had once accepted as correct.

The Nationalist ideology became his political creed and formed an unalterable element of his nature. No failure or setback would change him. He remained till his death what he had been at 16 : a Nationalist.

With this end firmly fixed before his eyes, he observed and studied the existing political conditions. Nothing was too unimportant ; he gave his attention to even the most trivial things. He took a stand in regard to everything - the less it concerned him, the more heatedly. He made-up for the utter-insignificance of his own existence by taking an interest in all public affairs, thus, giving aim and direction to his urge to change things.

With all his all-embracing interests, he had so much against him, and he saw everywhere only obstacles and hostility. And, yet, nobody had ever heard of him.

Sometimes, I was even sorry for him. With his undoubted gifts, what a happy life he could have led ; and how difficult he made things for himself !

He was always up against something and at odds with the world. Just that healthy, care-free spirit which distinguishes most young people was utterly alien to him.

I never saw him take anything lightly ; everything had to be thoroughly studied and tested for how it would fit into his great political design. Tradition, in the political sense, meant nothing to him. To sum-up : the world had to be radically changed in all its aspects.

Yet, it would be wrong to conclude that the young Hitler threw himself heart and soul into the political struggle of the day.

A pale, sickly, lanky youth, quite unknown and inexperienced in the ways of the city, shy and reticent rather than pushing, he carried on this intense activity all on his own. Only the most important ideas and solutions, that needed an audience, would he propound in the evening to me, an equally insignificant and lonely figure.

The young Hitler's relationship to politics is similar to his attitude to love - if I may be permitted this rather indelicate comparison.

The more intensely he was intellectually occupied with politics, the more did he refrain from taking part in practical, political activity.

He did not join any Party or organization, did not take part in Party manifestations, and took care not to spread his own ideas outside of our friendship.

What I noticed then in him, in Linz (to stick to my metaphor) , may be described as a 1st ogling with politics, nothing more, as though he had had a presentiment of what politics would come to mean to him.

For the time being, politics remained for him only an exercise in the realm of ideas. This striking reticence shows a trait in his character that seems to contradict his impatience : his ability to wait.

Politics remained for him for some years a matter of watching, of criticising social conditions, of study, gathering experience; it remained a matter private to himself, and consequently without any importance for the public life of that day.

It is interesting to note that the young Hitler, in those years, was strongly opposed to everything military. This seems to be contradicted by a passage in « Mein Kampf » .

While going through my father's library, I came across several books on military subjects, among them, a popular edition of the history of the Franco-German War of 1870-1871 ; 2 volumes of an illustrated magazine of those years now became my favourite reading and, before long, this heroic struggle had become my greatest intellectual experience. From now on, I grew increasingly enthusiastic for everything that had anything to do with war or soldiers.

I suspect that this recollection owes its existence to the circumstances of his imprisonment in Landsberg, where his book was written ; for when I knew Adolf Hitler, he was utterly averse to « anything to do with war or soldiers » .

Of course, he was annoyed by the young lieutenants who fluttered around Stefanie. But his aversion was deeper.

Even the idea of compulsory military service could infuriate him. No, he would never let himself be forced into being a soldier. If he ever became a soldier, he would do it of his own free will, and certainly never in the Austrian army. Before concluding on Adolf Hitler's political development, I would like to deal with 2 questions, which seem to me to be more important than anything else there is to say about politics : the young Hitler's attitude to Jewry and to the church. Adolf Hitler himself writes about his attitude to the Jewish problem during the years in Linz :

It is difficult, if not impossible, for me, today, to say when the word « Jew » Ist gave me food for thought.

At home, in my father's lifetime, I cannot remember ever having heard the word. I believe that the old gentleman would have thought it a cultural retrogression to give this word any special emphasis. In the course of his life, he had acquired some more or less cosmopolitan ideas, which not only co-existed with his strong nationalism, but influenced me too. And, at school, nothing led me to change this inherited conception.

It is true that, at the Technical School, I met a Jewish boy, whom we all handled with care, but only because owing to various experiences, we couldn't rely on him not to give us away. But we didn't give the matter any thought.

Not before I was 14 or 15 years old did I occasionally hear the word « Jew » , partly in the course of political conversations. I felt a slight resentment against it and the usual unpleasant feeling that overcame me when people quibbled about religious matters in my presence.

That was all I knew about it. There were not many Jews in Linz.

All this sounds very plausible, but it doesn't correspond to my impressions.

To begin with, it seems to me that the character sketch of his father had been touched-up to emphasise his Liberal ideas. The circle in which he moved in Linz already subscribed to the ideas of Georg Ritter von Schönerer, and it can, therefore, be presumed that his father was also against Jews.

In describing the school years, Hitler omits to mention that some of the teachers of the Technical School were openly anti-Semitic and made no bones about acknowledging their hatred of the Jews in front of their pupils ; and Hitler, at the Technical School, must certainly have been aware of the political aspects of the Jewish problem. It cannot have been otherwise, for when I met Adolf Hitler first, his anti-Semitism was already pronounced.

I remember distinctly that, once, when we were going along the « Bethlehemstraße » and passed the little synagogue, he said to me :

« This shouldn't be here. »

As far as I know, Adolf Hitler was already a confirmed anti-Semite when he went to Vienna. And although his experiences in Vienna might have deepened this feeling, they certainly did not give birth to it.

In my opinion, Adolf Hitler's own version seeks to convey the following :

In Linz, where the number of Jews was negligible, the question did not concern me. It was only in Vienna, where the Jews were more numerous, that I was forced to face this problem.

His attitude to the church is a somewhat different matter. « Mein Kampf » hardly mentions it at all, except for a description of his childhood experiences in Lambach.

As I had singing lessons at the Monastery in Lambach, in my spare time, I had an excellent opportunity of revelling, again and again, in the festive splendour of the magnificent church ceremonies.

Nothing was more natural than that I should see a most desirable ideal in the Abbot, as once my father had done in the little parish priest. This was so, at any rate, for some time.

Hitler's forebears were certainly religious, church-going people, as is natural with peasant folk.

But Hitler's own parents were divided in this respect ; his mother was pious and devout, his father Liberal, a lukewarm Christian.

It is certain that the question of the church interested his father more than the Jewish problem. As a servant of the State, in view of the close connection between State and Church, he could not afford to be openly anti-clerical.

As long as the little Adolf remained close to his mother, he was completely influenced by her devout behaviour and receptive to all the « grandeur » and beauty of the church.

The pale little choir boy was absorbed by his faith.

Though Hitler devotes only a few words to the subject, what he does say means a lot. The magnificent monastery had become familiar to him.

In his childish susceptibility, he was attracted by the church and his mother certainly encouraged him.

As he grew away from his childhood experience, with the passing of the years, and became closer to his father, the latter's Liberalism gained in influence.

The school in Linz also helped.

Franz Sales Schwarz, who taught religion at the Technical School, was not the man to have any effect on these young people, for the pupils did not take him seriously.

My own recollections can be summed-up in a few sentences : as long as I knew Adolf Hitler, I never remember his going to church.

He knew that I used to go every Sunday with my parents, and accepted this fact. He never tried to persuade me not to go, though he said occasionally that he couldn't understand me - his mother was also a religious woman but, nevertheless, he would not let her drag him to church. Moreover, he made these comments only by the way, with a certain tolerance and patience, which was not usual with him. But, in this case, apparently, he was not even interested in imposing his own idea. I cannot remember that, when he used to meet me at the close of the Sunday service, he ever made any derogatory remarks about this Sunday church-going, or behaved improperly. To my astonishment, he never made this an occasion for an argument.

Yet, one day, he came to me full of excitement and showed me a book about witch trials and, another time, about the Inquisition. But however worked-up he got about the events described in these books, he never drew any political conclusions from them. Perhaps, this was a case in which he did not consider me the right audience.

Every Sunday, his mother went, with little Paula, to Mass.

I can't remember that Adolf ever accompanied her, or that Frau Klara would have asked him to. Devout as she was herself, she was resigned to the fact that her son was different.

It may be that, in this case, she was held back by the different attitudes of the father, whose precept and example was still her model for her son.

In conclusion, I would describe Hitler's attitude towards the church, at that time, as follows : he was, by no means, indifferent to the church, but the church could give him nothing.

To sum-up, it can be said : Adolf Hitler became a Nationalist.

I have seen with what absolute dedication, even as early as that, he gave himself to the people whom he loved.

Only in this people could he live. He knew nothing other than this people.

HITLER AND ART

While I was undecided whether to list my friend among the great musicians or the great poets of the future, he sprang on me the announcement that he intended to become a painter.

I immediately remembered that I had seen him sketching, both at home and on our excursions.

As our friendship progressed, I saw many samples of his work. In my job as an upholsterer, I had occasionally to do some sketches, which I always found difficult, so the more was I astonished by my friend's facility.

He habitually carried with him various types of paper.

The start had always been the worst part for me ; for him, it was the other way round. He would take his pencil, and throwing a few bold strokes on the paper, would express his meaning.

Where words failed him, the pencil would do the job.

There was something attractive about these 1st rough lines - it thrilled me to see a recognisable design gradually emerge from their confusion. However, he wasn't so keen on finishing the rough draft.

The 1st time I went to visit him at home, his room was littered with sketches, drawings, blueprints.

Here was « The New Theatre » ; there, the Mountain Hotel on the Lichtenberg.

It was like an architect's office.

Watching him at work, at the drawing board (he was more careful then, and more precise in details than he used to be in moments of happy improvisation) , I was convinced that he must long since have acquired all the technical and specialized skill necessary for his work. I simply could not believe that it was possible to set-down such difficult things on the spur of the moment, and that everything I saw was improvised.

The number of these works is sufficient to allow one to form a judgment of Adolf Hitler's talents. There is, in the 1st place, a watercolour - rather, watercolour is not the right term, as it is a simple pencil drawing coloured with tempera.

But just the rapid catching of an atmosphere, of a certain mood, which is so typical of a watercolour and which, with its delicate touch, imparts to it freshness and liveliness - this was missing completely in Adolf's work. Just here, where he might have worked with fast, intuitive strokes, he has painted with painstaking precision.

All I can say about Adolf's artistic activity refers to his 1st attempts, and the only watercolour of his I possess is one of these.

It is still very clumsy, impersonal and really primitive though, perhaps, this gives it a special attraction. In vivid colours, it depicts the Pöstlingberg, the landmark of Linz. I still remember when Adolf gave it to me.

One cannot expect any artistic revelations from this watercolour and the hundreds which followed it.

His intention was not to express any of his own emotions, but just to paint pleasant little pictures. So, he chose popular subjects, for preference architecture and, rarely, landscapes. If these post-cards and pictures had not been painted by Adolf Hitler, no one would have bothered about them.

His drawings are a different matter, but there are only a few of them in existence.

Although he gave me several, only one of them is left, a purely architectural drawing with little meaning.

It shows a villa at number 7 « Stockbauerstraße » .

It had just been built and it appealed to Adolf. So, he drew it and made me a present of it.

Apart from revealing his love for architecture, it is of no significance.

Casting my thoughts back to those years, I have to say this : Adolf never took painting seriously ; it remained rather a hobby outside his more serious aspirations.

But building meant much more to him. He gave his whole self to his imaginary building and was completely carried away by it. Once, he had conceived an idea he was like one possessed. Nothing else existed for him - he was oblivious to time, sleep and hunger. Although it was a strain for me to follow him, those moments remain unforgettable.

There, he stood with me, in front of the new Cathedral, this pallid, skinny youth, with the 1st dark brown showing on his upper-lip, in his shabby pepper-and-salt suit, threadbare at the elbows and collar, with his eyes glued to some architectural detail, analyzing the style, criticizing or praising the work, disapproving of the material - all this with such thoroughness and such expert knowledge as though he were the builder and would have to pay for every short-coming out of his own pocket.

Then, he would get-out his drawing pad and the pencil would fly over the paper. This way, and no other, was the manner of solving this problem, he would say. I had to compare his idea with the actual work, had to approve or disapprove, and all this with a passion as though both our lives depended on it.

Here, he could give full vent to his mania for changing everything, because a city always has good buildings and bad.

He could never walk through the streets without being provoked by what he saw.

Usually, he carried around in his head half a dozen different building projects and, sometimes, I could not help feeling that all the buildings of the town were lined-up in his brain like a giant panorama. As soon as he had selected one detail, he concentrated on this with all his energy.

I remember, one day, when the old building of the bank for Upper-Austria and Salzburg, on the central square, was demolished.

With feverish impatience he followed the re-building.

He was terribly worried lest the new building should not fit into its surroundings. When, in the middle of the re-building, he had to leave for Vienna he asked me to give him periodical reports on the progress of the work. In his letter of July 21st, 1908, he wrote :

« As soon as the Bank is completed, please send me a picture post-card. »

As there was no picture post-card available, I got-out of it by procuring a photograph of the new building and sending it to him. Incidentally, the building met with his approval.

There were a lot of such houses in which he took a constant interest. He dragged me along wherever there was a building going-up. He felt responsible for everything that was being built. But, even more than with these concrete examples was, he taken-up with the vast schemes that he himself originated.

Here, his mania for change knew no limit. At 1st, I watched these goings-on with some misgiving and wondered why he so obstinately occupied himself with plans which, I thought, would never come to anything. The more remote the realisation of a project was, the more did he steep himself in it. To him, these projects were, in every detail, as actual as though they were already executed and the whole town rebuilt according to his design. I often got confused and could not distinguish whether he was talking about a building that existed or one that was to be created. But, to him, it did not make any difference ; the actual construction was a matter of only secondary importance.

Nowhere is his unshakable consistency more evident. What the 15 year old planned, the 50 year old carried-out, often, as for instance in the case of the new bridge over the Danube, as faithfully as though only a few weeks, instead of decades, lay between planning and execution. The plan existed ; then, came influence and power and the plan became reality. This happened with uncanny regularity, as though the 15 year old had taken it for granted that, one day, he would possess the necessary power and means. This is just too much for me to take in. I cannot conceive that such a thing is possible. One is tempted to use the word « miracle » , because there is no rational explanation for it.

Indeed, the plans which that unknown boy had drawn-up for the re-building of his home town Linz are identical to the last detail with the town planning scheme which was inaugurated after 1938. I am almost afraid of giving, in the following pages, my account of these early plans, lest my veracity should be suspected. And, yet, every single syllable of what I am going to recount is true.

On my 18th birthday, August 3rd, 1906, my friend presented me with a sketch of a villa. Similar to that planned for Stefanie, it was in his favourite Italian Renaissance style. By good luck, I have preserved the sketches. They show an imposing, Palazzo-like building, whose frontage is broken-up by a built-in tower. The ground plan reveals a well-thoughtout arrangement of rooms, which are pleasantly grouped around the music-room. The spiral staircase, a delicate architectural problem, is shown in a separate drawing and, so, is the entrance-hall, with its heavy beamed ceiling. The entrance is outlined with a few brisk strokes in a separate sketch. Adolf and I also selected a fitting site for my birthday present ; it was to stand on the « Bauernberg » . When, later, I met Hitler in Bayreuth, I took good care not to remind him of this imaginary house. He would have been capable of actually giving me a villa on the « Bauernberg » , which presumably would have been finer than the original idea, and very much in the taste of the epoch. More impressive are 2 sketches still in my possession, samples of his numerous designs for a new concert-hall, in Linz. The old theatre was inadequate in every respect, and some art-lovers in Linz had founded a Society to promote the construction of a modern theatre. Adolf immediately joined this Society and took part in a competition for ideas. He worked for months on his plans and drafts and was seriously convinced that his suggestions would be accepted. His anger was beyond measure when the Society smashed all his hopes by giving-up the idea of a new building and, instead, had the old one renovated.

I refer to his biting remarks in the letters he sent me on August 17th, 1908 :

« It seems they intend to patch-up, once more, the old junk heap. »

Full of fury, he said that what he would like to do best would be to wrap-up his manual of architecture and send it off to the address of this « Theatre - Rebuilding - Society - Committee - for - the - Execution - of - the - Project - for - the - Rebuilding - of - the - Theatre » . How well did this monster title express his rage !

My 2 sketches, on either side of one sheet, date from that period. The one side shows the auditorium. Columns break up the walls and the boxes are placed in between them. The balustrade is adorned by various statues. A mighty domed ceiling covers the hall. On the back of this bold project, Adolf explained to me the acoustic conditions of the intended building, in which I, as a musician, was particularly interested. It clearly shows how the sound waves, rising from the orchestra, are reflected from the ceiling in such a way as to be, so to speak, poured-over the audience below. Adolf took a great interest in acoustic problems. I remember, for instance, his suggestion to remodel the « Volksgarten » Hall, whose bad acoustics always annoyed us, by structural alterations of the ceiling.

And, now, for the re-building of Linz ! Here, his ideas were legion, yet, he did not change them indiscriminately and, indeed, held fast to his decisions once they were taken. That is why I remember so much about it. Every time we passed one spot or another, all his plans were ready immediately.

The wonderfully compact main-square was a constant delight to Adolf, and his only regret was that the 2 houses, nearest to the Danube, disturbed the free vista on to the river and the range of hills beyond. On his plans, the 2 houses were pushed apart sufficiently to allow a free-view on to the new, widened bridge without, however, substantially altering the former aspect of the square, a solution which later he actually carried-out. The Town Hall, which stood on the square, he thought unworthy of a rising town like Linz. He visualized a new, stately Town Hall, to be built in a modern style, far removed from that neo-Gothic style which, at that time, was the vogue for town-halls, in Vienna and Munich, for instance. In a different way, Hitler proceeded in the re-modeling of the old Castle, an ugly, box-like pile which over-looked the old city. He had discovered an old print by Merian depicting the castle as it was before the great fire. Its original appearance should be restored and the castle turned into a museum.

Another building which never failed to rouse his enthusiasm was the Museum, built in 1892. We often stood and looked at the marble frieze which was 110 metres long and reproduced scenes from the history of the country in relief. He never got tired of gazing at it. He extended the Museum beyond the adjoining convent garden and enlarged the frieze to 220 metres to make it, as he asserted, the biggest relief frieze on the Continent. The new Cathedral, then, in course of construction, occupied him constantly. The Gothic revival was, in his opinion, a hopeless enterprise, and he was angry that the Linzers could not stand-up to the Viennese. For the height of the Linz spire was limited to 134 metres, out of respect for the 138 metre high Saint-Stephen's spire in Vienna. Adolf was greatly pleased with the new Corporation of Masons which had been founded in connection with the building of the Cathedral, as he hoped this would result in the training of a number of capable masons for the town. The railway station was too near the town, and, with its network of tracks, impeded the traffic as well as the town's development. Here, Adolf found an ingenious solution which was far ahead of his time. He removed the station out of the town into the open country and ran the tracks underground across the town. The space gained by the demolition of the old station was designated for an extension of the public park. Reading this, one must not forget that the time was 1907, and that it was an unknown youth of 18, without training or qualification, who propounded these projects which revolutionized town planning, and which proved how capable he was, even then, of brushing aside existing ideas.

In a similar way, Hitler also reconstructed the surroundings of Linz. An interesting idea dominated his plans for the re-building of Wildberg Castle. Its original state was to be restored and it was to be developed as a kind of open-air museum with a permanent population - quite a new idea. Certain types of artisans and workmen were to be attracted to the place. Their trades had to be partly in the medieval tradition, but should also partly serve modern purposes, a tourist industry, for instance. These inhabitants of the Castle were to dress in ancient fashion. The traditions of the old guilds should rule, and a Master Singer School was to be established. « This Island where the Centuries had stood still » (these were his very words) would become a place of pilgrimage for all those who wanted to study life as it was lived in a medieval stronghold. Improving upon Dinkelsbühl and Rothenburg, Wildberg would not only show architecture but real life. Visitors would have to pay a toll at the gates and, so, contribute to the up-keep of the local inhabitants. Adolf gave much thought to the choice of suitable artisans and I remember that we discussed the subject at great length. After all, I was just about to take my Master's examination and was, therefore, entitled to have my say.

Quite a different project, of absolutely modern design, was the tower on the Lichtenberg. A mountain railway should run-up to the peak, where a comfortable hotel would stand. The whole was dominated by a tower 300 metres high, a steel construction which kept him very busy. The gilded eagle on the top of Saint-Stephen's in Vienna could be seen on clear days through a telescope from the highest-platform of the tower. I think I remember seeing a sketch of this project.

The boldest project, however, which put all the others in the shade, was the building of a grandiose bridge which would span the Danube at a great height. For this purpose, he planned the construction of a high-level road. This would start at the Gugl, then, still an ugly sand-pit, which could be filled in with the town's refuse and rubbish, and provide the space for a new park. From there, in a broad sweep, the new road would lead-up to the « Stadtwald » . (Incidentally, the city engineers went, thus, far some time ago, without knowing Hitler's plans. The road which has meanwhile been built corresponds exactly to Hitler's projects.)

The « Kaiser-Franz-Josef-Warte » in the « Jagermayerwald » (it is still standing) was to be demolished and replaced by a proud monument. In a Hall of Fame, there would be assembled the portrait busts of all the great men who had deserved well of the Province of Upper-Austria ; from the top of the hall, one would have a magnificent view over a vast expanse of country ; and the whole edifice was to be crowned by a statue of Siegfried, raising aloft his sword, « Nothung » . (The Hall of Liberation at Kehlheim and the Hermann Monument in the « Teutoburger Wald » were obvious models.) From this spot, the bridge sweeps in one arch to the steep slope of the opposite bank. Adolf got his inspiration for this from the legend of a daring horseman who, pursued by his enemies, is said to have jumped from this point into the appalling depths below, to swim across the Danube and reach the other side. My imagination boggled at the dimensions of this bridge. The span of the arch was calculated to be more than 500 metres. The summit was 90 metres above the level of the river. I much regret that no sketches of this really unique project survive. This bridge, across the deep valley, my friend declared, would give Linz an edifice without rival in the whole world. When we stood on one bank of the river, or the other, Adolf would explain to me all the details of the scheme. These bold, far-reaching plans made a strange impression on me, as I still clearly remember. Although I saw in the whole thing nothing but a figment of the imagination, I could, nevertheless, not resist its peculiar fascination. What exercised my friend's mind, and was hastily jotted-down on scraps of paper, was more than nebulous fantasticism ; these apparently absurd conceptions contained something compelling and convincing : a sort of superior logic.

Each idea had its natural sequel in another, and the whole was a clear and rational chain of thought.

Purely Romantic conceptions, such as the « Medieval Revival of Wildberg Castle » , obviously betrayed Richard Wagner's paternity. They were linked to extremely modern technical devices, such as the replacement of level crossings by underground railway tracks. This was no unbridled wallowing in sheer fantasy, but a well-disciplined, almost systematic process.

This « Architecture set to Music » attracted me, perhaps, just because it seemed fully-feasible - although we 2 poor devils had no possibility of realizing these plans. But this did not disturb my friend in the least. His belief that, one day, he would carry-out all his tremendous projects, was unshakable. Money was of no importance - it was only a matter of time, of living long enough. This absolute faith was too much for my rational way of thinking.

What was our future ? I might become, at best, a well-known conductor. And Adolf ? A gifted painter or draughtsman, perhaps, a famous architect. But how far distant were these professional goals from that standing and reputation, those riches and power necessary for the re-building of an entire city ! And who knows whether my friend, with his incredible flights of fancy and impulsive temperament, would stop at the re-building of Linz, for he was incapable of keeping his hands off anything within reach. Consequently, I had grave doubts and, occasionally, I dared to remind him of the undeniable fact that all our worldly possessions put together did not amount to more than a few crowns - hardly enough to buy drawing paper.

Usually, Adolf brushed my objections impatiently aside, and I still remember his grim expression and his disdainful gesture on such occasions. He took it for granted that, one day, the plans would be executed with the greatest of exactitude, and prepared for this moment accordingly.

Even the most fantastic idea was thought out in the greatest detail. How was the material to be transported for the bridge across the Danube ? Should it be stone or steel ? How were the foundations for the end abutments to be laid ? Would the rock stand the weight ?

These questions were, in part, quite irrelevant for the expert, in part, however, very much to the point. Adolf lived so much in his vision of the future Linz that he adapted his day-to-day habits to it ; for instance, we would visit the Hall of Fame, the Memorial Temple or our « Medieval Open-air Museum » .

One day, when I interrupted the bold flow of his ideas for the National Monument and asked him soberly how he proposed to finance this project, his 1st reply was a brusque :

« Oh, to hell with money ! »

But, apparently, my query had disturbed him. And he did what other people do who want to get rich quickly - he bought a lottery ticket. And, yet, there was a difference between the way Adolf bought a lottery ticket and the way other people did. For other people, only hope, or rather, dream of getting the 1st prize, but Adolf was sure he had won from the moment of buying the ticket and had only forgotten to collect the money. His only possible worry was how to spend this not inconsiderable sum to the best advantage.

It was typical of him that he often mingled his most fantastic ideas with the coolest calculations, and the same thing happened with the purchase of the lottery ticket. While he was already, in his imagination, spending his winnings, he carefully studied the lottery conditions and worked-out our chance with the greatest precision. Adolf invited me to go shares with him in this venture. He was quite systematic about it. The price of the ticket was 10 Crowns, of which I had to find 5. He stipulated, however, that these 5 Crowns should not be given to me by my parents, but I had to earn them myself. At that time, I earned some pocket money and also got occasional tips from the customers.

Adolf insisted on knowing exactly where these five crowns came from, and when he was satisfied that my contribution was really my own, we went together to the office of the State Lottery to buy the ticket. It took him a long time to make up his mind, and I still don't know what considerations prompted his choice.

In the end, he found his winner.

He said :

« Here, it is ! » , and put the ticket carefully away in the little, black notebook in which he wrote his poems.

The time that elapsed before the draw was for me the happiest period of our friendship. Love and enthusiasm, great thoughts, lofty ideas, all that we had already. The only thing that was lacking was money. Now, we had that, too. What more could we want ?

Although the 1st prize represented a lot of money, my friend was, by no means, tempted to spend it thoughtlessly. On the contrary. He went about it, in the most calculating and economical way. It would have been senseless to invest the whole sum in one of the projects, say the re-building of the Museum, for this would only have been a small part within the framework of the great town-planning scheme. It was more reasonable to use the money for our own benefit, to help us to a standing in public life which would enable us to progress further towards our ultimate aims. It would have been too expensive to build a villa for ourselves ; it would have swallowed-up so much of our fortune that we would have moved into this splendour quite penniless. Adolf suggested a compromise : we should rent a flat, he said, and adapt it to our purpose.

After long and careful examination of the various possibilities, we selected the 2nd floor of number 2 « Kirchengasse » , in Urfahr ; for this house was in a quite exceptional position.

Near the bank of the Danube, it had a view over the pleasant green fields which culminated in the Pöstlingberg. We crept into the house secretly, looked at the view from the staircase window, and Adolf made a sketch of the ground plan.

Then, we moved in, so to speak. The larger wing of the flat should be for my friend, the smaller one was reserved for me.

Adolf arranged the rooms so that his study was as far removed as possible from mine, so that he, at his drawing board, would not be disturbed by my practising.

My friend also saw to the furnishing of the rooms, drawing each single piece of furniture to scale on the ground plan. The furniture was of most beautiful and superior quality, made by the town's leading craftsmen, by no means cheap, mass-produced stuff. Even the decorations for the walls of each single-room were designed by Adolf. I was only allowed to have a say about the curtains and draperies, and I had to show him how. I suggested dealing with the rooms he had given me. He was certainly pleased with the self-assured manner in which I co-operated with the arrangement of the flat.

We had no doubt that the 1st prize was ours. Adolf's own faith had bewitched me into believing as he did. I, too, expected to move into number 2 « Kirchengasse » very soon.

Although simplicity was to be the key-note of our home, it was nevertheless imbued with a refined, personal taste. Adolf proposed to make our home the centre of a circle of art-lovers. I would provide the musical entertainment. He would recite something, or read aloud, or expound his latest work. We would make regular trips to Vienna to attend lectures and concerts, and to go to the Theatre. (I realized, then, that Vienna played an important part in my friend's world of ideas. Strange that he had opted for the « Kirchengasse » , in Urfahr.)

Winning the 1st prize would not alter our mode of life. We would remain simple people, wearing clothes of good quality, but certainly not ostentatious. With regard to our dress, Adolf had a delicious idea which delighted me immeasurably. We should both dress in exactly the same way, he suggested, so that people would take us for brothers. I believe that, for me, this idea alone made it worthwhile to win the Lottery. It shows how our mere Theatre acquaintance had ripened into a deep, Romantic friendship.

Of course, I would have to leave my parents' home and give-up my trade. My future musical studies would leave me no time for such things ; for, as our studies progressed, our understanding for artistic experiences increased and engrossed us completely.

Adolf thought of everything, even the running of the household, which was necessary as the day of the draw was approaching.

A refined lady should preside over our home and run it. It had to be an elderly lady, to rule-out any expectations or intentions which might interfere with our artistic vocation. We also agreed on the staff that this big household would need. Thus, everything was prepared.

This image remained with me for a long time to come : an elderly lady, with greying hair, but incredibly distinguished, standing in the brilliantly lit hall, welcoming, on behalf of her 2 young, gifted gentlemen of 17 and 18 years, the guests who formed their circle of select, lofty-minded friends.

During the summer months, we were to travel.

The 1st and foremost destination was Bayreuth, where we were to enjoy the perfect performances of the great Master's music-dramas.

After Bayreuth, we were to visit famous cities, magnificent cathedrals, palaces and castles, but also industrial centres, ship-yards and ports.

Adolf said :

« It shall be the whole of Germany. »

This was one of his favourite sayings.

The day of the draw arrived.

Adolf came rushing wildly round to the work-shop with the list of results. I have rarely heard him rage so madly as then.

1st, he fumed over the State Lottery, this officially organized exploitation of human credulity, this open fraud at the expense of docile citizens.

Then, his fury turned against the State itself, this patchwork of 10 or 12, or God knows how many nations, this monster built-up by Hapsburg marriages. Could one expect other than that 2 poor devils should be cheated-out of their last few Crowns ?

Never did it occur to Adolf to reproach himself for having taken it for granted that the 1st prize belonged to him by right ; and this, in spite of the fact that he had brooded for hours over the conditions of the Lottery and calculated exactly how small our chances were in view of the number of tickets in existence and the number of prizes offered. I could find no explanation for this contradiction in his character. But, there it was.

For the 1st time, he had been deserted by his will power which always seemed to move matters that concerned him in the desired direction. This he could not bear, for it was worse than the loss of the money and having to give-up the flat and the lady-housekeeper receiving our guests with distinguished « nonchalance » .

It seemed to Adolf more reasonable to rely on himself and build his own future, rather than trust government institutions like lotteries. This would spare him from such set-backs.

Thus, after a short period of utter-depression, he returned to his earlier projects.

One of his favourite plans was the replacement of the bridge which linked Linz and Urfahr.

We used to cross this bridge daily, and Adolf was particularly fond of this walk. When the floods of May 1868 destroyed 5 supports of the old wooden bridge, it was decided to build an iron bridge, which was completed in 1872. This rather ugly bridge was far too narrow for the traffic, although, in those days, there were not even any motor-cars ; and it was always over-crowded to a frightening degree.

Adolf liked to listen to the cursing drivers, who with wild oaths and much cracking of the whip, would try to make a way for themselves.

Although, generally, he showed little interest in the thing at hand and preferred to take the long-view for his projects, he suggested, here, a provisional solution to remedy the existing state of affairs. Without altering the bridge itself, to either side should be added a foot-path, 2 metres wide, which would carry the pedestrian traffic and, thus, relieve the roadway.

Naturally, nobody in Linz listened to the suggestions this young dreamer, who could not even produce decent school reports. All the more enthusiastically did Adolf now occupy himself with the complete re-building of the bridge.

The ugly iron structure must be demolished. The new bridge must be so proportioned as to give the visitor who approached the Danube from the main-square the impression of seeing, not a bridge, but a broad, impressive street. Mighty statues would underline the artistic aspect of the whole.

It is greatly to be regretted that, so far as I know, none of the numerous sketches which Hitler, then, made for the new bridge has been preserved ; for it would be very interesting to compare these sketches with the plans which, 30 years later, Adolf Hitler prepared for this bridge and ordered to be executed.

We owe it to his impatience to see the new Linz built that, in spite of the out-break of War, in 1939, that structure, being the central project of the Linz town-planning, actually was completed.

THE BEGINNING

It was the most impressive hour I ever lived through with my friend.

So unforgettable is it, that even the most trivial things, the clothes Adolf wore that evening, the weather, are still present in my mind as though the experience were exempt from the passing of time.

Adolf stood outside my house, in his black over-coat, his dark hat pulled-down over his face.

It was a cold, unpleasant November evening.

He waved to me impatiently. I was just cleaning myself-up from the work-shop and getting ready to go to the Theatre.

« Rienzi » was being given that night.

We had never seen this Wagner Opera and looked forward to it with great excitement. In order to secure the pillars in the « Promenade » , we had to be early.

Adolf whistled, to hurry me up.

Editor's Note

« Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen » (WWV 49) , « Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes » is an early Opera by Richard Wagner in 5 acts, with the libretto written by the composer after Bulwer-Lytton's novel of the same name (1835) . The title is commonly shortened to « Rienzi » . Written between July 1838 and November 1840, it was 1st performed at the « Hofoper » , in Dresden, on October 20th, 1842, and was the composer's 1st success.

The Opera is set in Rome and is based on the life of Cola di Rienzi (1313-1354) , a medieval Italian populist figure who succeeds in out-witting and, then, defeating the nobles and their followers, and in raising the power of the people. Magnanimous at 1st, he is forced by events to crush the nobles' rebellion against the people's power, but popular opinion changes and even the Church, which had urged him to assert himself, turns against him.

In the end the populace burns the Capitol, in which Rienzi and a few adherents have made a last stand.

...

Now, we were in the Theatre, burning with enthusiasm, and living breathlessly through Rienzi's rise to be the Tribune of the people of Rome and his subsequent down-fall.

When, at last, it was over, it was past midnight.

My friend, his hands thrust into his coat pockets, silent and withdrawn, strode through the streets and out of the city. Usually, after an artistic experience that had moved him, he would start talking straight away, sharply criticizing the performance but, after « Rienzi » , he remained quiet a long while. This surprised me, and I asked him what he thought of it. He threw me a strange, almost hostile glance.

He said brusquely :

« Shut-up ! »

The cold, damp mist lay oppressively over the narrow streets.

Our solitary steps resounded on the pavement. Adolf took the road that led-up to the Freinberg. Without speaking a word, he strode forward. He looked almost sinister, and paler than ever. His turned-up coat collar increased this impression.

I wanted to ask him :

« Where are you going ? »

But his pallid face looked so forbidding that I suppressed the question.

As if propelled by an invisible force, Adolf climbed-up to the top of the Freinberg.

And only now did I realize that we were no longer in solitude and darkness, for the stars shone brilliantly above us. Adolf stood in front of me ; and, now, he gripped both my hands and held them tight. He had never made such a gesture before. I felt from the grasp of his hands how deeply moved he was. His eyes were feverish with excitement. The words did not come smoothly from his mouth as they usually did, but rather erupted, hoarse and raucous. From his voice, I could tell even more how much this experience had shaken him.

Gradually, his speech loosened, and the words flowed more freely. Never before and never again have I heard Adolf Hitler speak as he did in that hour, as we stood there alone under the stars, as though we were the only creatures in the world.

I cannot repeat every word that my friend uttered.

I was struck by something strange, which I had never noticed before, even when he had talked to me in moments of the greatest excitement.

It was as if another being spoke-out of his body, and moved him as much as it did me.

It wasn't at all a case of a speaker being carried-away by his own words. On the contrary ; I rather felt as though he himself listened with astonishment and emotion to what burst forth from him with elementary force.

I will not attempt to interpret this phenomenon, but it was a state of complete ecstasy and rapture, in which he transferred the character of Rienzi, without even mentioning him as a model or example, with visionary power to the plane of his own ambitions.

But it was more than a cheap adaptation. Indeed, the impact of the Opera was rather a sheer external impulse which compelled him to speak. Like flood waters breaking their dikes, his words burst forth from him. He conjured-up in grandiose, inspiring pictures his own future and that of his people.

Hitherto, I had been convinced that my friend wanted to become an artist, a painter or, perhaps, an architect. Now, this was no longer the case.

Now, he aspired to something higher, which I could not yet fully grasp.

It rather surprised me, as I thought that the vocation of the artist was for him the highest, most desirable goal. But, now, he was talking of a mandate which, one day, he would receive from the people, to lead them out of servitude to the heights of freedom.

It was an unknown youth who spoke to me in that strange hour.

He spoke of a special mission which, one day, would be entrusted to him, and I, his only listener, could hardly understand what he meant.

Many years had to pass before I realized the significance of this enraptured hour for my friend.

His words were followed by silence.

We descended into the town. The clock struck 3. We parted in front of my house. Adolf shook hands with me, and I was astonished to see that he did not go in the direction of his home, but turned again towards the mountains.

I asked him, surprised :

« Where are you going now ? »

He replied briefly :

« I want to be alone. »

In the following weeks and months, he never again mentioned this hour on the Freinberg.

At 1st, it struck me as odd and I could find no explanation for his strange behaviour, for I could not believe that he had forgotten it altogether. Indeed, he never did forget it, as I discovered 33 years later. But he kept silent about it because he wanted to keep that hour entirely to himself. That I could understand, and I respected his silence. After all, it was his hour, not mine. I had played only the modest role of a sympathetic friend.

In 1939, shortly before War broke-out, when I, for the 1st time, visited Bayreuth as the guest of the « Reich » Chancellor, I thought I would please my host by reminding him of that nocturnal hour on the Freinberg, so I told Adolf Hitler what I remembered of it, assuming that the enormous multitude of impressions and events, which had filled these past decades, would have pushed into the background the experience of a 17 year old youth.

But, after a few words, I sensed that he vividly recalled that hour and had retained all its details in his memory.

He was visibly pleased that my account confirmed his own recollections.

I was also present when Adolf Hitler retold this sequel to the performance of « Rienzi » , in Linz, to « Frau » Winifred Wagner, at whose home we were both guests.

Thus, my own memory was doubly confirmed.

The words with which Hitler concluded his story to « Frau » Wagner are also unforgettable for me.

He said solemnly :

« In that hour, it began. »

Editor's Note

Winifred Wagner (born on 23 June 1897 ; died on 5 March 1980) was an English-born Welsh woman married to Siegfried Wagner, Richard Wagner's son.

She was the effective head of the Wagner family, from 1930 to 1945, and a close friend of German dictator Adolf Hitler.

Winifred Williams was born Winifred Marjorie Williams, in Hastings, England, the daughter of John Williams, a writer, and his wife, the former Emily Florence Karop.

Winifred lost both her parents before the age of 2 and was initially raised in a series of homes. 8 years later, she was adopted by a distant German relative of her mother, Henrietta Karop, and her husband Karl Klindworth, a musician and a friend of Richard Wagner.

The Bayreuth Festival was envisioned as a family business, with the leadership to be passed from Richard Wagner to his son Siegfried Wagner, but Siegfried, who was secretly homosexual, showed little interest in marriage.

It was arranged that Winifred Klindworth, as she was called at the time, aged 17, would meet Siegfried Wagner, aged 45, at the Bayreuth Festival in 1914. 1 year later, they were married.

It was hoped that the marriage would end Siegfried's homosexual encounters and the associated costly scandals, and provide an heir to carry-on the family business.

Following their marriage, on 22 September 1915, they had 4 children in rapid succession :

Wieland (1917-1966) ; Friedelind (1918-1991) ; Wolfgang (1919-2010) ; and Verena (born in 1920) .

After the death of Siegfried Wagner, in 1930, Winifred Wagner took-over the Bayreuth Festival, running it until the end of World War II.

In 1923, Winifred met Adolf Hitler who, as we have seen earlier, greatly admired Wagner's music.

When Hitler was jailed for his part in the Munich « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » , Winifred sent him food parcels and stationery on which Hitler's autobiography « Mein Kampf » may have been written.

In the late 1930's, she served as Hitler's personal translator during treaty negotiations with England.

Although Winifred remained personally faithful to Hitler, she denied that she had ever supported the Nazi Party. Her relationship with Hitler grew so close that, by 1933, there were rumours of impending marriage.

« Haus Wahnfried » , the Wagner home in Bayreuth, became Hitler's favourite retreat, and he had his own separate accommodation in the grounds of « Wahnfried » , known as the « Führerbau » .

Hitler gave the Festival government assistance and tax exempt status, and treated Winifred's children, particularly Wieland and Wolfgang, solicitously.

According to biographer Brigitte Hamann, Winifred Wagner was reported to be « disgusted » by Hitler's persecution of the Jews. In one notable incident, in the late- 1930's, a letter from her to Hitler prevented Hedwig and Alfred Pringsheim (their daughter Katia was married to Thomas Mann) from being arrested by the « Gestapo » .

According to Gottfried Wagner, Winifred's grandson, she never admitted the error of her ways.

After the War, her posthumous devotion to the man she cryptically referred to as « USA » (« Unser Seliger Adolf » : our blessed Adolf) remained undimmed.

She corresponded with Hitler for nearly 2 decades.

Scholars have not been allowed to see the letters which are kept locked away by one of Winifred's grandchildren, Amélie Lafferentz.

VIENNA

I had been noticing for along time that Adolf, whether he was talking about art, politics or his own future, was no longer satisfied with friendly and familiar, though Philistine Linz, and cast his eyes more and more frequently towards Vienna.

Vienna, still a resplendent Imperial city and the metropolis of a State of 45 million people, promised him fulfillment of all his hopes for the future.

At the time of which I speak, the summer of 1907, Adolf knew Vienna from a visit he had paid it in the previous year.

In May and June, 1906, he had stayed there long enough to grow enthusiastic about everything that had specially attracted him : the « Hofmuseum », the « Hofoper », the « Burgtheater », the magnificent buildings on the « Ring » - but not long enough to observe the distress and misery which were concealed by the magnificent façade of the city.

This deceptive picture, largely produced by his artistic imagination, held a powerful attraction for him.

In his thoughts, he was often no longer in Linz but already in Vienna, and his incredible capacity for ignoring the reality in front of him, and for accepting as real what existed only in his imagination, now came here into full-play. I have to correct, here, a small error which Adolf Hitler made in « Mein Kampf », in regard to his 1st stay in Vienna.

He is wrong when he says that he was, then, not yet 16 years old, for actually, he had just had his 17th birthday. For the rest, his account of it corresponds entirely with my own.

I well remember the enthusiasm with which my friend spoke of his impressions of Vienna. Details of his account, however, escape my memory.

It is all the more fortunate that the post-cards he wrote to me, on this 1st visit, are still preserved. There are, altogether, 4 post-cards which, apart from their biographical interest, are important graphological documents ; for they are the earliest substantial examples of Adolf Hitler's hand-writing still existing.

It is a strangely mature, rather flowing hand, which one would hardly connect with a youth of barely 18, while the incorrect spelling not only bears witness to patchy schooling but, also, to a certain indifference in such matters. All the picture post-cards he sent me were, significantly enough, of buildings. A different kind of young man of his age would certainly have chosen a different kind of picture post-card for his friend.

The 1st of these cards (dated May 7th, 1906) is a Masterpiece of the post-card production of the period and must have cost him a pretty penny : it opens-out into a kind of triptych, with a full-view of the « Karlsplatz », with the church (the « Karlskirche »), in the centre.

The text is :

« In sending you this post-card, I have to apologize for not having written sooner. Well, I have safely arrived and am going around everywhere. Tomorrow, I am going to the Opera : “ Tristan ” and, the day after, “ The Flying Dutchman ”, etc. Although I find everything very beautiful, I am longing for Linz. Tonight, “ Stadt-Theatre ”. Greetings, your friend, Adolf Hitler. »

On the picture-side of the card, the Conservatory is expressly marked, probably the reason for his choice of this particular view, for he was already playing with the idea that, someday, we would study together in Vienna, and never missed an opportunity of reminding me of this possibility in the most alluring form.

On the lower-margin of the picture, he adds :

« Greetings to your esteemed parents. »

I would like to mention that the words :

« Although I find everything very beautiful, I am longing for Linz. » do not refer to Linz but to Stefanie, for whom his love was all the greater the farther from her he was.

It certainly satisfied his impetuous longing for her that he, a lonely stranger in this heartless metropolis, could write these words which only his friend who shared his secrets would understand.

On the same day, Adolf sent me a 2nd post-card which depicts the stage of the « Hofoper » .

Presumably, this particularly successful photograph, which shows a part of the decor, had appealed to him.

On it, he wrote :

« The interior of the edifice is not very stirring. If the exterior is mighty majesty, which gives the building the seriousness of an artistic monument, the inside, though commanding admiration, does not impress one with its dignity. Only when the mighty sound waves flow through the hall and when the whispering of the wind gives way to the terrible roaring of the sound waves, then, one feels the “ grandeur ” and forgets the gold and velvet with which the interior is overloaded. Adolf H. »

On the front of the card, there is again added :

« Greetings to your esteemed parents. »

Adolf is completely in his element, here.

The friend is forgotten, even Stefanie is forgotten ; no greeting, not even a hint, so overwhelmed is he by his recent experience.

His clumsy style clearly reveals that his power of expression is not sufficient to do justice to the depth of his feelings. But even his poor style, which sounds like the ecstatic stammering of an enthusiast, reveals the magnitude of his experience. After all, it had been the greatest dream of our boyhood in Linz to see, someday, a perfect production at the Vienna Opera House instead of the performances in our provincial Theatre, which left so much to be desired. Certainly, Adolf, with his glowing description, aimed at my own art-loving heart. For what could make Vienna more attractive to me than the enthusiastic echo of such artistic impressions ?

On the very next day, May 8th, 1906, he wrote again ; it is rather surprising that he wrote 3 times in the space of 2 days.

His motive becomes clear from the contents of the post-card, which shows the exterior of the Vienna Opera House.

He wrote :

« I am really longing for my dear Linz and Urf(h)ar. Want and must see “ Benkieser ”, again. What might he be doing, so, I am arriving on Thursday at 3h55, in Linz. If you have time and permission, meet me. Greetings to your esteemed parents ! Your friend, Adolf Hitler. »

The word « Urfar » (misspelt in the hurry) is underlined, although Adolf's mother was still living on « Humboldtstraße » , and not in Urfahr.

Of course, that remark referred to Stefanie (i.e. , and, so, did the agreed code-word : « Benkieser » . The phrase : « Want and must see “ Benkieser ” » is typical of Adolf's style and character.

Also significant are the words :

« If you have time and permission, meet me. »

Although it was a matter of urgency for him, he respects my duty of obedience towards my parents, nor does he omit to greet them on this card.

Unfortunately, I cannot verify whether Adolf really returned to Linz on the following Thursday, or if this indication was only intended to satisfy his unappeasable longing for Stefanie.

His remark in « Mein Kampf » that his sojourn in Vienna lasted only a fortnight is incorrect.

Actually, he stayed there about 4 weeks, as is evidenced by the post-card of June 6th, 1906. This card, which shows the « Franzensring » and House of Parliament, is on conventional lines :

« To you and to your esteemed parents, I send herewith best wishes for the Holidays and kind regards. Respectfully, Adolf Hitler. »

With this memory of his 1st stay in Vienna, transfigured by his yearning for Stefanie, Adolf entered the critical summer of 1907.

What he suffered in those weeks was, in many respects, similar to the grave crisis of 2 years earlier. Then, after much heart-searching, he had finally settled his accounts with the school and made an end of it, however painful this might be for his mother.

A grave illness had rendered the transition easier for him. But this transition led him only to the « hollowness of the life of leisure » .

Without school, with no career in mind, he had spent 2 years living with his mother and not earning a penny.

These were, by no means, idle years.

Having had daily contact with Adolf, I can testify how intensely my friend, studied and worked in those days, but this private study, as well as his artistic activity, had no determined goal.

He felt himself that it couldn't continue. Something had to happen, a profound change would give a clear direction to his aimless, day-to-day mode of life.

Outwardly, this seeking for a new path showed itself in dangerous fits of depression. I knew only too well those moods of his, which were in sharp contrast to his ecstatic dedication and activity, and realized that I couldn't help him.

At such times, he was inaccessible, un-communicative and distant.

It might happen that we didn't meet at all for 1 day or 2.

If I tried to see him at home, his mother would receive me with great surprise.

She would say :

« Adolf has gone-out, he must be looking for you. »

Actually, Adolf would wander around aimlessly and alone for days and nights in the fields and forests surrounding the town.

When I met him at last, he was obviously glad to have me with him. But, when I asked him what was wrong, his only answer would be :

« Leave me alone. »

Or a brusque :

« I don't know myself. »

And, if I insisted, he would understand my sympathy and, then, say in a milder tone :

« Never mind, “ Gustl ”, but not even you can help me. »

This state lasted several weeks.

One fine summer evening, however, when we were strolling beside the Danube, the tension began to ease.

Adolf reverted to his old, familiar tone. I remember this moment exactly. As usual, we had been to see Stefanie pass by arm-in-arm with her mother. Adolf was still under her spell. Even though he saw her, at this time, almost every day, these meetings never became something common place for him.

While Stefanie had probably long since become bored by the silent, but strictly conventional adulation of the pale, thin youth, my friend lost himself increasingly in his wishful dreams the more he saw her. Yet, he was past those Romantic ideas of elopement or suicide.

He explained to me, in eloquent words, his state of mind : the vision of the beloved pursued him day and night ; he was unable to work or even to think clearly ; he feared he would go mad if this state of affairs went on much longer, though he saw no way of altering the situation, for which Stefanie was not to blame, either.

He cried :

« There is only one thing to be done. I must go away - far away from Stefanie. »

On our way home, he explained his decision in greater detail.

His relationship with Stefanie would become more bearable for him, once he was living at a distance and could not meet her every day. It did not occur to him that, in this way, he might lose Stefanie altogether - so, deeply convinced was he that he had won her forever.

The true situation was different.

Adolf, perhaps, already realized that if he wanted to win Stefanie, he would have to speak to her or take some such decisive step - it is probable that even he began to find the exchange of glances on the « Landstraße » a little childish.

Nevertheless, he felt instinctively that it would abruptly destroy his life's dream if he actually made Stefanie's acquaintance. Indeed, as he said to me :

« If I introduce myself to Stefanie and her mother, I will have to tell her, at once, what I am, what I have and what I want. My statement would bring our relations abruptly to an end. »

This awareness, and the simultaneous realisation that he had to put his relationship with Stefanie on a firm basis to avoid ridicule, were the horns of a dilemma for him, from which he saw only one way out : flight.

He started, at once, to expound his plan to the last detail.

I received precise instructions what to tell Stefanie if she asked, full of astonishment, what had become of my friend. (She never did !)

Adolf himself realized that if he wanted to marry her, he would have to offer her a secure existence.

But this unsolved and, for a person of my friend's nature, insoluble problem of his relationship with Stefanie was only one of the many reasons which prompted him to quit Linz, although the most personal and, therefore, decisive.

Another reason was that he was anxious to escape the atmosphere that prevailed at home.

The idea that he, a young man of 18, should continue to be kept by his mother had become unbearable to him.

It was a painful dilemma which, as I could see for myself, made him almost physically ill. On the one hand, he loved his mother above everything ; she was the only person on earth to whom he felt really close, and she reciprocated his feeling to the same extent, although she was deeply disturbed by her son's unusual nature, however proud she was at times of him.

She used to say :

« He is different from us. »

On the other hand, she felt it to be her duty to carry-out the wishes of her late husband, and to prevail on Adolf to embark on a safe career.

But what was « safe » , in view of the peculiar character of her son ?

He had failed at school and had ignored all his mother's wishes and suggestions. A painter - that's what he had said he wanted to become.

This could not seem very satisfactory to his mother, for, simple soul that she was, anything connected with art and artists appeared to her frivolous and insecure.

Adolf tried to change her mind by telling her of his intention to study at the Academy. That sounded better ; after all, the Academy, of which Adolf spoke with increasing enthusiasm, was really a kind of school, where his mother thought he might make-up for what he had missed in the Technical School.

When listening to these domestic discussions, I was always surprised by the sympathetic understanding and patience with which Adolf tried to convince his mother of his artistic vocation. Contrary to his habit, he never became cross or violent on these occasions.

Often « Frau » Klara would also un-burden herself to me, for she saw in me, too, an artistically gifted young man with high-aims.

Having a better understanding of musical matters than of her son's dabbling in drawing and painting, she frequently found my opinions more convincing than his, and Adolf was very grateful for my support. But, in « Frau » Klara's eyes, there was one important difference between Adolf and me : I had learnt an honest trade, finished my apprenticeship and passed my journeyman's examination. I would always have a safe haven to shelter in, whereas Adolf was just steering into the unknown.

This vision tormented his mother unceasingly. Nevertheless, he succeeded in convincing her that it was essential for him to go to the Academy and study painting.

I still remember distinctly how pleased he was over it.

He told me, one day :

« Now, mother will not raise any more objections. I definitely go to Vienna at the beginning of September. »

Adolf had also settled with his mother the financial side of his plan.

His living expenses and the Academy fees were to be paid-out of the small legacy left him by his father and now administered by his guardian.

Adolf hoped that, with great economy, he would be able to manage on this for a year. What would happen afterwards remained to be seen, he said. Perhaps, he would earn something by the sale of some drawings and pictures.

The main opponent of this plan was his brother-in-law, Raubal, who, with his limited revenue official's horizon, was incapable of understanding Adolf's thoughts.

That was rubbish, he said ; it was high-time that Adolf learned something respectable. Although Raubal, after some violent altercations with Adolf, in which he always came-off worst, avoided any further argument with him, he tried all the harder to influence « Frau » Klara. Adolf found-out most of this from « the kid » , as he used to call his I I year old sister.

When Paula told him that Raubal had been to see his mother, Adolf would fall into a rage.

He once remarked to me furiously :

« This Pharisee is ruining my home for me. »

Apparently, Raubal had also got in touch with Adolf's guardian, for one day the worthy peasant Mayrhofer, who would have liked best to make a baker out of Adolf and had already found an apprenticeship for him, came from Leonding to see « Frau » Klara.

Adolf was afraid that his guardian might induce her to hold back the legacy.

This would have put a stop to his moving to Vienna. But the plan did not get so far, though for some time the decision was very much in doubt.

By the end of this tough struggle, everybody was against Adolf - even, as happens in tenement buildings, the other tenants.

« Frau » Klara listened to this more or less well-meant chatter and became completely confused by it all.

Often, when Adolf had his fits of depression and was wandering through the woods, I used to sit with her in her little kitchen, listening sympathetically to her laments, trying hard to comfort the wretched woman without being unfair to my friend and, at the same time, helping him where I could.

I could easily put myself in Adolf's shoes. It would have been simple enough for him, with his great energy, just to pack-up and go, if consideration for his mother had not prevented him. He had come to hate the Philistine world in which he had to live.

He could hardly bear to return to that narrow world after lonely hours spent in the open. He was always in a ferment of rage, hard and intractable. I had a lot to put-up with in those weeks. But the secret of Stefanie, which we shared, bound us inseparably together.

The sweet magic which she, the unattainable, radiated calmed the stormy waves. So, as his mother was so easily influenced, the matter remained undecided, although Adolf had long since made-up his mind.

On the other hand, Vienna was calling.

That city had a thousand possibilities for an eager young man like Adolf, opportunities which might lead to the most sublime heights or to the most sombre depths.

A city magnificent and, at the same time, cruel, promising everything and denying everything - that was Vienna. She demanded the highest-stake from everyone who pledged himself to her. And that is what Adolf wanted.

No doubt, Adolf had his father's example before him.

What would he have become if he hadn't gone to Vienna ?

A poor, haggard cobbler somewhere in the poverty-stricken Waldviertel. And see what Vienna made of this poor, orphaned cobbler's boy !

Ever since his 1st visit in the spring of 1906, these rather vague ideas had assumed concrete form in Adolf's mind. He who had dedicated his life to art could develop his talents only in Vienna, for in that city were concentrated its most perfect achievements in every field.

During his 1st short stay, there he had already been to the « Hofoper » and seen « The Flying Dutchman », « Tristan », and « Lohengrin » .

By these standards, the performance in the Linz Theatre appeared provincial and inadequate.

In Vienna, the « Burgtheater » , with its Classic productions, awaited the young man.

There was also the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra which, with justification, was then considered the best in the world.

Then, the museums, with their immeasurable treasures, the picture galleries, the « Hofbibliothek » , provided unending possibilities for study and self-improvement.

Linz had little more to offer Adolf.

What re-building had to be done in this city he had already done, mentally, and no more large tempting problems were left for him to solve. And I was always there to report any further alterations to the town, such as the new building of the Bank of Upper-Austria and Salzburg on the main-square, or the projected new theatre.

But he wanted to look at grander things (the magnificent buildings of the centre of Vienna, the vast, truly Imperial layout of the « Ringstraße ») rather than the humble little « Landstraße » , in Linz. Moreover, his growing interest in politics found no outlet in conservative Linz, where political life ran in well-defined grooves.

Simply nothing happened that might have had any political interest for a young man ; there was no tension, no conflict, no unrest. It was a great adventure to move from this absolute calm into the centre of the storm. All the energies of the Hapsburg State were concentrated in Vienna. 30 nations struggled for their national existence and independence and, thus, created an atmosphere like that of a volcano. How the young heart would rejoice at throwing itself unrestrainedly into this struggle !

At long last, the great moment arrived.

Adolf, beaming with delight, came to see me at the work-shop, where we were very busy at that time.

He said briefly :

« I'm leaving tomorrow. »

He asked me to accompany him to the station, as he didn't want his mother to come. I knew how painful it would have been for Adolf to take leave of his mother in front of other people. He disliked nothing more than showing his feelings in public. I promised him to come and to help him with his luggage.

Next day, I took time-off and went to the « Blütengasse » to collect my friend.

Adolf had prepared everything. I took his suitcase, which was rather heavy with books he did not want to leave behind, and hurried away to avoid being present at the farewells. Yet, I couldn't avoid them entirely.

His mother was crying and little Paula, whom Adolf never bothered with much, was sobbing heart-rendingly.

When Adolf caught-up with me on the stairs and helped me with the suitcase, I saw that his eyes, too, were wet.

We took the tram to the railway station, chatting about trivialities, as often happens when one wants to hide one's feelings. It moved me deeply to say goodbye to Adolf, and I felt miserable going home alone. It was a good thing that there was so much work waiting for me at the work-shop.

Unfortunately, our correspondence of that period is lost.

I only remember that, for several weeks, I had no news at all from him. And it was during those days that I felt most deeply how much he meant to me.

Other young people of my age did not interest me, as I knew in advance that they would only turn-out to be disappointing, with few interests other than their own shallow and superficial doings. Adolf was much more serious and mature than most people of his age.

His horizon was wide and his passionate interest in everything had carried me along with it.

Now, I felt very lonely and miserable, and to find some comfort I went to the « Blütengasse » to see « Frau » Klara.

Talking to somebody so fond of Adolf would certainly make me feel better.

I thought that Adolf would already have written to his mother, for after all, it was a fortnight since he had left ; and I would get his address and write to him, according to instructions, of all that had happened meanwhile.

Actually, not much had happened, but for Adolf, every detail was important.

I had seen Stefanie at the Schmiedtoreck and, indeed, she was surprised when she saw me there alone, for that much she knew about us that, in this « affair » , I played only a secondary role. The chief protagonist was missing.

That seemed strange to her. What could it mean ?

Though Adolf was only a silent admirer, he was more persistent and tenacious than all the others. She did not want to lose this faithful adorer. Her enquiring glance caught me so unexpectedly, that I was almost tempted to address her. But Stefanie was not alone, being, as usual, accompanied by her mother, and moreover my friend had given me strict instructions to wait until Stefanie, herself asked me.

Surely, as soon as she realized that he had gone for good, she would take the 1st opportunity of running-over the bridge alone to entreat me impetuously to tell her what had become of my friend.

Perhaps, he had had an accident, or he was ill again as he was that time 2 years ago or, perhaps, even dead. Unthinkable ! Anyhow, though that conversation had not yet taken place, I had enough material to fill 4 pages of a letter. But what on earth had happened to Adolf ?

Not a line from him.

« Frau » Klara opened the door to me and greeted me warmly, and I could see that she had been longing for me to come.

She asked me, still at the door :

« Have you heard from Adolf ? »

So he hadn't written to his mother either, and this made me feel anxious.

Something out of the ordinary must have happened.

Perhaps, things hadn't gone according to plan in Vienna.

« Frau » Klara offered me a chair. I saw how much good it did her to be able to un-burden herself. Ah, the old lament, which I had come to know by heart ! But I listened patiently.

« If only he had studied properly at the technical school, he would almost be ready to matriculate. But he won't listen to anybody. »

And she added :

« He's as pig-headed as his father. Why this crazy journey to Vienna ? Instead of holding on to his little legacy, it's just being frittered away. And after that ? Nothing will come of his painting. And story-writing doesn't earn anything either. And I can't help him - I've got the little one to look after. You know yourself what a sickly child she is, but just the same she must get some decent training. Adolf doesn't give it a thought, he goes his way, just as if he were alone in the world. I shall not live to see him making an independent position for himself. »

« Frau » Klara seemed more care-worn than ever.

Her face was deeply lined. Her eyes were lifeless, her voice sounded tired and resigned.

I had the impression that, now that Adolf was no longer there, she had let herself go, and looked older and more ailing than ever.

She certainly had concealed her condition from her son to make the parting easier for him - or, perhaps, it was Adolf's impulsive nature that had kept-up her vitality.

Now, on her own, she seemed to me an old, sick woman.

I forget, unfortunately, what happened during the course of the following weeks.

Adolf had briefly informed me of his address.

He was living in the 6th District, at number 29 « Stumpergasse » , Staircase II, 2nd floor, Door number 17, in the flat of a woman with the curious name of Zakreys.

That was all he wrote. But I guessed that there was more behind this obstinate silence, for I knew that Adolf's silences usually meant that he was too proud to talk.

I quote, therefore, from his own description in « Mein Kampf » of his 2nd sojourn in Vienna which, by general consent, is entirely truthful :

« I had gone to Vienna with the intention of taking the entrance examination for the Academy. I had set-out, armed with a thick wad of drawings, convinced that it would be child's play to pass. At the technical school, I had been by far the best in my class at drawing and, since then, my ability had developed quite extraordinarily ; so, I was quite satisfied with myself and this made me proudly and happily hope for the best. »

So, here I was for the 2nd time in the beautiful city, waiting impatiently but, hopefully, for the result of the entrance examination. I was so sure of success that the news of my rejection hit me like a bolt from the blue. Yet, that was what happened. When I went to see the Rector and asked to know the reasons why I had not been admitted to the general painting school of the Academy, I was told by this gentleman that the drawings I had submitted showed clearly that I had no aptitude for painting, my ability seemed rather to lie in the field of architecture, and I should not go to the painting school, but rather to the school of architecture of the Academy. That I had never been to a school for building, nor received any training in architecture, seemed to him hard to believe.

Defeated, I left the monumental building on the Schiller Square, for the 1st time in my young life at variance with myself. For what I had been told about my ability seemed to me to disclose in a flash of lightning a discord from which I had long suffered without, hitherto, clearly realizing the why and wherefore.

In a few days, I knew myself that I would become an architect. Yet, this was an incredibly difficult path, for what I had missed, out of obstinacy, in the technical school, now took its bitter revenge. The attendance at the school of architecture of the Academy was dependent on the attendance at a technical school for building, and entrance to the latter required one to have passed the matriculation examination at a secondary school. I didn't fulfil any one of these conditions. As far as could be foreseen, therefore, the fulfilment of my dream to become an artist was impossible.

He had been refused by the Academy, he had failed even before he had got a footing in Vienna. Nothing more terrible could have happened to him.

But he was too proud to talk about it, and so he concealed from me what had happened.

He concealed it from his mother, too.

When, later, we met again, he had to some extent already lived-down this hard verdict. He did not mention it at all. I respected his silence and didn't ask him any questions, because I suspected that something had gone wrong with his plans.

Not until the next year, when we were living together in Vienna, did all these circumstances gradually become clear to me.

Adolf's talent for architecture was so obvious that it would have justified an exception - how many less talented students were to be found at the Academy !

This decision was, therefore, as biased and bureaucratic as it was unjust.

Yet, Adolf's reaction to this humiliating treatment was typical.

He made no attempt to obtain exceptional treatment, or to humiliate himself in front of people who did not understand him. There were neither revolt nor rebellion ; instead, came a radical withdrawal into himself, an obstinate resolve to cope alone with adversity, an embittered « Now, more than ever ! » which he flung at the gentlemen of the « Schillerplatz » , just as, 2 years earlier, he had settled his account with his school teachers.

Whatever disappointments life brought him, they were but a spur for him to brave all obstacles, and to continue on the path on which he had embarked.

In his book « Mein Kampf » , he writes

« As the Goddess of Misery took me in her arms and so often threatened to break me, the Will to Resist grew, and in the end, the Will triumphed. »

DEATH OF HITLER'S MOTHER

I remember that Adolf's mother had to undergo a serious operation at the beginning of 1907.

She was, then, in the Hospital of the Sisters of Mercy on the « Herrenstraße » , and he visited her there daily.

I forget what her illness was, but it was probably cancer of the breast. Although « Frau » Klara recovered sufficiently to run her household again, she remained very weak and ailing, and every now and then she had to take to her bed. Yet, a few weeks after Adolf had left for Vienna, she seemed to be better, for I met her by chance on the « Promenade » , where, at that time, a street-market used to be held, peasant women coming in from the country to sell eggs, butter and vegetables.

She told me contentedly :

« Adolf is right. If only I knew what on earth he is studying ! Unfortunately, he does not mention that at all. However, I imagine that he is very busy. »

That was good news, which pleased me, too, for Adolf had not written to me about his activities in Vienna.

Our correspondence was mainly concerned with « Benkieser » - otherwise, Stefanie.

But his mother, of course, must not be told of that.

I asked « Frau » Klara how she was.

Not at all well, she said ; she had a lot of bad pain, and very often could not sleep at night. But she warned me not to write to Adolf about it for, perhaps, she would soon be better. When we parted, she asked me to come to see her soon.

We were then very busy in the work-shop, indeed business had never before been as good as in that year, and orders came in regularly and often.

Yet, in spite of this heavy work, I devoted every moment of leisure to my musical training, I played the viola both in the « Musikverein » and the « Große-Symphonieorchester » .

So, the weeks passed, and it was late in November when, at last, I found time to visit « Frau » Hitler.

I was shocked when I saw her.

How wilted and worn was her kind, gentle face !

She was lying in bed and stretched-out her pale, thin hand to me.

Little Paula pushed a chair up beside her.

She started, at once, to talk about Adolf and was happy about the hopeful tone of his letters.

I asked her if she had informed him of her illness, and offered to do so for her, in case writing was too great an effort. But she hastily refused. If her condition did not improve, she said, she would have to send for Adolf from Vienna.

She was sorry she had to tear him away from his hard work - but what else could she do ?

The little one had to go to school every day, Angela had enough worries of her own (she was expecting a 2nd baby) and on her son-in-law, Raubal, she could not rely at all.

Since she had taken Adolf's side and supported him in his decision to go to Vienna, Raubal had been angry with her and, now, never showed-up ; he had even prevented his wife from looking after her. So, she said, there was nothing left but to go to the hospital - as the doctor had advised.

The Hitlers' family doctor was the very popular Doctor Eduard Bloch, known in the town as the « poor people's doctor » , an excellent physician and a man of great kindness, who sacrificed himself for his patients.

Editor's Note

Eduard Bloch was an assimilated Austrian-Jewish physician who first came into contact with the Hitler family in the town of Leonding on the outskirts of Linz when he treated Adolf's father, Alois Hitler, shortly before his death, in 1903.

According to Bloch, young Adolf was quiet, well-mannered and neatly dressed.

He had patiently waited in the waiting-room until it was his turn, then, like every 14 or 15 year old boy, made a bow, and always thanked the doctor politely.

In 1907, Bloch diagnosed his mother Klara with breast cancer.

Adolf was devastated.

Bloch noted that the young man was utterly devoted to his mother, but not in any unwholesome way.

« He slept in the tiny bedroom adjoining that of his mother so that he could be summoned at any time during the night. During the day, he hovered about the large bed in which she lay. »

Upon Klara's death, Doctor Bloch asked for only a modest fee from the struggling family and refused to charge them for house-calls and extra-medications.

A few days after the funeral, Adolf and his sisters came to visit the doctor at his office, in Linz.

Adolf wore a dark-suit and a loosely knotted cravat.

Then, as now, a shock of hair tumbled over his forehead.

His eyes were on the floor while his sisters were talking.

Then, came his turn. He stepped forward and took my hand. Looking into my eyes, he said :

« I shall be grateful to you forever. »

That was all.

Then, he bowed. I wonder if today he recalls this scene. I am quite sure that he does, for in a sparing sense Adolf Hitler has kept to his promise of gratitude. Favours were granted me which I feel sure were accorded no other Jew in all Germany or Austria.

Bloch stated that, during Hitler's Vienna days, when the frustrated artist was supposedly already a convinced anti-Semite, he mailed Bloch a post-card with the words :

« From Vienna, I send you my greetings. Yours, always faithfully, Adolf Hitler. »

Hitler also, once, sent New Year's wishes on one of his own self-painted post-cards and even presented the doctor with one of his paintings.

Many years later, « Gestapo » agents came to Bloch's home and politely confiscated the 2 post-cards. He had lost track of the painting long before.

Doctor Bloch recalls Hitler's youth :

Bloch tells us that the young Hitler enjoyed walks in the mountains, swimming in the Danube, free-concerts, and attending Wagnerian Opera at Linz's local « Schauspielhaus » (Theatre) .

An avid reader, Hitler was « fascinated » with the stories about American Indians written by James Fenimore Cooper and German author, Karl May.

The Hitlers were poor and ate the same food as other families in their situation.

Meat was a twice-weekly affair, and most meals included potato or cabbage-soup, bread, dumplings, and a pitcher of apple and pear cider.

The family wore clothing made of « Loden » , a rough woolen cloth.

Like the other boys in Linz, he had worn short « Lederhosen » and a green woolen hat with a feather.

He had been tall and pale and looked older than he was.

His eyes which were inherited from his mother were large, melancholy and thoughtful.

To a very large extent, this boy lived within himself. What dreams he dreamed I do not know.

His love for his mother was intense.

Doctor Bloch had never seen a mother and son as close as Klara and her boy Adolf.

« Frau » Hitler encouraged her son's desire to become an artist.

Well-bred boy, after his visits to Doctor Bloch, he would bow and thank him respectfully.

If Doctor Bloch had advised « Frau » Hitler to go to the hospital, her condition must be grave.

I was wondering whether it was not, after all, my duty to inform Adolf.

« Frau » Klara said how awful it was for her that Adolf was so far away.

I never realized as clearly as on that visit how devoted she was to her son. She thought and planned for his welfare with all the strength that was left to her. In the end, she promised me that she would tell Adolf of her condition.

When I took leave of her that evening, I was very dissatisfied with myself.

Was there no way of helping the poor woman ?

I knew how devoted Adolf was to his mother ; something had to be done.

If his mother really needed help, little Paula was too clumsy, too frightened to be of any use. When I got home, I talked to my mother. She offered, at once, to look after « Frau » Hitler, although she was a complete stranger. But this was vetoed by my father who, with his exaggerated ideas of correct behaviour, thought it was bad manners to offer one's help without being asked.

A few days later, I went again to see « Frau » Klara.

I found her up, busy in the kitchen.

She felt somewhat better and she was already regretting that she had told Adolf about her illness.

I stayed with her a long time that evening ; she was more talkative than usual and, quite contrary to her habit, she began to tell me about her life.

Some of it, I understood, and a lot I guessed at, though much was left unsaid ; nevertheless, the story of a life of suffering was disclosed to a young man then in the full hopes of his 19 years.

But in the work-shop, time was pressing, and my father was a strict boss.

Even concerning my artistic ambitions, he used to say : Work 1st - then, music. And with a special performance coming on, there was one orchestral rehearsal after another.

Sometimes, I literally didn't know how to cram in everything.

Then, one morning, as I was energetically filling a mattress, Adolf suddenly appeared in the room.

He looked terrible. His face was so pale as to be almost transparent, his eyes were dull and his voice hoarse. I felt that a storm of suffering must be hidden behind his icy demeanour. He gave me the impression that he was fighting for life against a hostile fate.

There was hardly a greeting, no question about Stefanie, nothing about what he had been doing in Vienna.

« Incurable, the doctor says. »

This was all he could utter.

I was shocked by the unequivocal diagnosis.

Probably, Doctor Bloch had told him of his mother's condition. Perhaps, he had called in another doctor for consultation ; and he couldn't reconcile himself to this cruel verdict.

His eyes blazed, his temper flared-up.

He screamed :

« Incurable, what do they mean by that ? Not that the malady is incurable, but that the doctors aren't capable of curing it. My mother isn't even old. 47 isn't an age where you give-up hope. But, as soon as the doctors can't do anything, they call it incurable. »

I was familiar with my friend's habit of turning everything he came across into a problem. But never had he spoken with such bitterness, with such passion as now.

Suddenly, it seemed to me as though Adolf, pale, excited, shaken to the core, stood there arguing and bargaining with Death, who remorselessly claimed his victim.

I asked Adolf if I could help him. He didn't hear me - he was too busy with this settling of accounts.

Then, he interrupted himself and declared in a sober, matter-of-fact voice :

« I shall stay in Linz and keep house for my mother. »

I asked :

« Can you do that ? »

« One can do anything, when one has to. »

And he said no more.

I went with him as far as the street.

Now, I thought, he would certainly ask after Stefanie ; perhaps, he had not liked to mention her in the work-shop. I would have been glad if he had, because I had carried-out my instructions faithfully and could tell him a good deal, even though the expected conversation had not taken place.

I also hoped that Adolf, in his deep spiritual affliction, would find comfort in the thought of Stefanie. And it certainly was so.

Stefanie meant more to him in those dark weeks than ever before. But he stifled any mention of her, so deeply engrossed was he in his preoccupation with his mother.

I cannot recollect exactly when Adolf returned from Vienna. It was, perhaps, late in November, but possibly even December.

But the weeks that follow remain indelibly in my memory ; they were in a certain sense the most beautiful, the most intimate weeks of our friendship.

How deeply these days impressed me can be gathered from the mere fact that, from no other period of our association, do so many details stand-out in my memory.

He was as though transformed.

So far, I had been certain that I knew him thoroughly and in all his aspects. After all, we had lived together for more than 3 years in an exclusive friendship that did not permit of any secrets. Yet, in those weeks, it seemed to me that my friend had become a different person.

Gone were the problems and ideas which used to agitate him so much, gone all thoughts of politics. Even his artistic interests were hardly noticeable. He was nothing but his mother's faithful and helpful son.

I had not taken Adolf very seriously when he said that he would now take-over the household at the « Blütengasse » , for I knew Adolf's low-opinion of such monotonous chores, necessary though they were. And so, I was skeptical as to his good intentions and imagined that they would not exceed a few well-meant gestures.

But I was profoundly mistaken.

I did not understand that side of Adolf sufficiently, and had not realized that his unbounded love for his mother would enable him to carry-out this unaccustomed domestic work so efficiently that she could not praise him enough for it.

Thus, one day, on my arrival at the « Blütengasse » , I found Adolf kneeling on the floor.

He was wearing a blue apron and scrubbing-out the kitchen, which had not been cleaned for a long time.

I was really immensely surprised and I must have shown it, for « Frau » Klara smiled in spite of her pain and said to me :

« There, you see, Adolf can do anything. »

Then, I noticed that Adolf had changed the furniture around.

His mother's bed now stood in the kitchen because that was heated during the day.

The kitchen cup-board had been moved into the living-room and, in its place, was the couch, on which Adolf slept, so that he could be near her during the night as well.

The little one slept in the living-room.

I could not refrain from asking how he managed the cooking.

Adolf said :

« As soon as I've finished the scrubbing, you can see for yourself. »

But, before I did, « Frau » Klara told me that, every morning, she discussed the dinner with Adolf.

He always chose her favourite dishes, and prepared them so well that she herself couldn't have done better. She enjoyed her food immensely, she insisted, and she had never eaten with such good appetite as since Adolf came home, I looked at « Frau » Klara, who had sat-up in bed.

The fervour of her words had coloured her usually pale cheeks.

The pleasure of having her son back and his devotion to her had transfigured the serious, worn face. But, behind this mother's joy, were the unmistakable signs of suffering. The deep lines, the drawn mouth and the sunken eyes showed how right the doctor had been.

To be sure, I should have known that my friend would not fail, even in this out-of-the-ordinary task, for whatever he did, he did thoroughly.

Seeing the seriousness with which he carried-out the running of the household, I suppressed a chaffing remark, although Adolf, who was always so punctilious about his neat dress, certainly looked comical in his old clothes with the apron tied around him.

Nor did I utter a word of appreciation, so touched was I by his changed attitude, knowing how much self-restraint this work was costing him.

« Frau » Klara's condition was changeable.

Her son's presence improved her general state and cheered her up.

Sometimes, she would even get-up in the afternoon and sit in the arm-chair. Adolf anticipated her every wish and took the most tender care of her. I had never before seen in him such loving tenderness.

I didn't trust my own eyes and ears.

Not a cross word, not an impatient remark, no violent insistence on having his own way.

He forgot himself entirely in those weeks, and lived only for his mother. Although Adolf, according to « Frau » Klara, had inherited many of his father's traits, I realized then how much his nature resembled his mother's.

Certainly, this was partly due to the fact that he had spent the last 4 years of his life alone with her. But, over and above that, there was a peculiar spiritual harmony between mother and son which I have never since come across. All that separated them was pushed into the background. Adolf never mentioned the disappointment which he had suffered in Vienna. For the time being, cares for the future no longer seemed to exist. An atmosphere of relaxed, almost serene contentment surrounded the dying woman.

Adolf, too, seemed to have forgotten everything that had preoccupied him.

Only once, after I had said goodbye to « Frau » Klara, did he come to the door with me and ask me if I had seen Stefanie.

But this question was now put in a different tone. It no longer expressed the impatience of the impetuous lover, but the secret anxiety of a young man who feared that fate would now deprive him of the last thing that made life worth living. I gathered from his hasty question how much this girl meant to him in those grave days, more perhaps than if she had actually been as close to him as he would have wished. I reassured him ; I often met Stefanie, with her mother, going over the bridge, and everything seemed unaltered.

December was cold and unfriendly.

For days on end, damp, heavy mist hung over the Danube ; the sun shone rarely, and when it did, so feebly as to give no warmth at all.

His mother's condition deteriorated visibly and Adolf asked me to come only every other day. As often as I entered the kitchen, « Frau » Klara greeted me by lifting her hand a little and stretching it out towards me, and a faint smile would pass over her face, now distorted with pain.

I remember a small but significant incident.

Going through Paula's exercise books, Adolf had noticed that she was not getting on in school as well as her mother expected. Adolf took her by the hand and led her to their mother's bed and there made her swear always to be a diligent and well-behaved pupil.

Perhaps, Adolf wanted to show his mother by this little scene that he had meanwhile realized his own faults.

If he had stayed on at the Technical School until matriculation, he would have avoided the disaster in Vienna. No doubt this decisive event which, as he said later, had for the 1st time put him at variance with himself was at the back of his mind during those terrible days and added to his depression.

When I returned to the « Blütengasse » , 2 days later, and knocked softly on the door, Adolf opened it immediately, came-out into the corridor and closed the door behind him.

He told me that his mother was not at all well and was in terrible pain. Even more than his words, his emotion made me realize the seriousness of the situation. I thought it better to leave and Adolf agreed with me. We silently shook hands, and I departed.

Christmas was approaching. Snow had fallen at last and the town had assumed a festive garb. But I didn't feel like Christmas.

I walked across the Danube bridge to Urfahr.

I learned from the people in the house that « Frau » Hitler had already received Extreme-Unction.

I wanted to make my visit as short as possible.

I knocked, and Paula opened the door. I entered hesitantly. « Frau » Klara was sitting-up in bed. Adolf had his arm around her shoulders to support her, as, while she was sitting-up, the terrible pain was less severe.

I remained standing by the door. Adolf signed to me to go.

As I was opening the door, « Frau » Klara waved to me with her out-stretched hand. I shall never forget the words which the dying woman then uttered in a whisper.

She said :

« “ Gustl ”, go-on being a good friend to my son when I'm no longer here. He has no one else. »

Usually, she called me « Herr » Kubizek but, in that hour, she used the name by which Adolf always called me.

With tears in my eyes, I promised, and, then, I went.

This was the evening of December 20th.

The next day, Adolf came to see us at home.

He looked worn-out and we could tell from his distraught face what had happened.

His mother had died in the early hours of the morning, he said. It was her last wish to be buried by the side of her husband, in Leonding. Adolf could hardly speak, so deeply shaken was he by the loss of his mother.

My parents expressed their sympathy, but my mother realized that the best thing was to turn to practical matters straight away.

Arrangements had to be made for the funeral.

Adolf had already seen the undertakers and the funeral was fixed for December 23rd, at 9 am. But there was much else to be seen to.

The removal of the body to Leonding had to be arranged, the necessary documents procured and the funeral announcements printed.

All this helped Adolf to get over his emotional shock, and he calmly made the necessary preparations.

On December 23rd, 1907, I went with my mother to the house of mourning.

The weather had changed ; it was thawing and the streets were covered in slush. The day was damp and misty, and one could hardly see the river.

We entered the apartment to take leave of the dead with flowers, as was customary.

« Frau » Klara was laid-out on her bed. Her waxen face was transfigured. I felt that death had come to the dead woman as a relief from terrible pain.

Little Paula was sobbing, but Adolf restrained himself. Yet, a glance at his face was sufficient to know how he had suffered in those hours. Not only had he now lost both his parents but, with his mother, he had lost the only creature on earth on whom he had concentrated his love, and who had loved him in return.

My mother and I went down into the street. The priest came.

The body had been laid in the coffin, which was brought-down to the hall. The priest blessed the dead and, then, the small « cortège » moved-off. Adolf followed the coffin.

He wore a long black over-coat, black gloves, and carried in his hand, as was customary, a black top hat.

The dark clothing made his white face seem even paler. He looked stern and composed.

On his left, also in black, was his brother-in-law, Raubal, and, between them, the 11 year old Paula. Angela, who was well-advanced in pregnancy, followed the mourners in a closed carriage.

The whole funeral made a wretched impression on me.

In addition to my mother and myself, there were only a few tenants of number 9 « Blütengasse » , and a few neighbours and acquaintances from their former home on the « Humboldtstraße » .

My mother, too, felt how miserable this « cortège » was but, in the kindness of her heart, she immediately defended those who had stayed-away. Tomorrow was Christmas, she said, and it was quite impossible for many women, with the best will in the world, to get away.

At the church door, the coffin was taken from the hearse and carried inside.

After the Mass, the 2nd blessing took place.

As the body was to be taken to Leonding, the funeral « cortège » , then, went through the Urfahr « Hauptstraße » .

The church bells were ringing as it approached.

Instinctively, I raised my eyes to the windows of the house where Stefanie lived.

Perhaps, my ardent wish that she should not desert my friend in this, his gravest hour had called her. I can still see how the window opened, a young girl appeared, and Stefanie looked down, interestedly, at the little procession that was passing beneath.

I glanced at Adolf ; his face remained unchanged, but I did not doubt that he, too, had seen Stefanie.

He told me, later, that this was indeed so, and confessed how much in that painful hour the sight of the beloved had comforted him.

Was it by intention or was it by chance that Stefanie came to the window at that moment ? Perhaps, it was just that she had heard the church bells and wondered why they were ringing so early in the morning.

Adolf, of course, was convinced that she wanted to show him her sympathy.

On the « Hauptstraße » , a 2nd closed carriage was waiting, which Adolf and Paula entered, while the procession broke-up. Raubal joined his wife. Then, the hearse and the 2 carriages started-off to Leonding for the interment.

On the following morning, December 24th, Adolf came to my house.

He looked worn-out, as though, any minute, he might collapse.

He seemed to be desperate, quite empty, with no spark of life in him. As he felt how worried my mother was about him, he explained that he had not slept for days. My mother asked him where he was going to spend Christmas Eve. He said that the Raubals had invited him and his sister ; Paula had already left, but he had not made-up his mind yet whether he would go or not.

My mother exhorted him to help to make Christmas a peaceful occasion, now that all the members of the family had suffered the same loss, Adolf listened to her in silence. But when we were alone he said to me brusquely :

« I shall not go to Raubal's. »

I asked him impatiently :

« Where else will you go ? After all, it's Christmas Eve. »

I wanted to ask him to join us. But he did not even let me finish, and shut me up quite energetically, in spite of his sorrow.

Suddenly, he pulled himself together and his eyes became bright.

He said :

« Perhaps, I shall go to Stefanie. »

This answer was doubly characteristic of my friend : 1st, because he was capable of forgetting completely in such moments that his relationship with Stefanie was nothing but wishful thinking, a beautiful illusion, and, 2ndly, because even when he realized this he would, after sober reflection, prefer to stick to his wishful thinking rather than unbosom himself with real people.

Later, he confessed to me that he had really been determined to go to Stefanie, although he knew very well that such a sudden visit, without a previous appointment, without even having been introduced to her, and moreover on Christmas Eve, was contrary to good manners and social convention and would probably have meant the end of his relationship with her.

But, he told me, on his way he had seen Richard, Stefanie's brother, who was spending his Christmas holiday in Linz. This unexpected meeting had made him give-up the idea, for it would have been painful for him if Richard, as was inevitable, had been present at the interview.

I did not ask any more questions ; it really did not matter whether Adolf was deceiving himself with this pretext, or whether he only offered it to me as an excuse for his behaviour.

Certainly I, too, had seen Stefanie at the window, and the sympathy which showed on her face was undoubtedly genuine. However, I doubt very much if she recognized Adolf at all in his extraordinary attire and in these peculiar circumstances.

But, of course, I did not express this doubt to him, because I knew that it would only have robbed my friend of his last hope.

I can well imagine what Adolf's Christmas Eve, in the year 1907, was really like.

That he did not want to go to Raubal, I could understand.

I could also understand that he did not want to disturb our quiet little family celebration, to which I had invited him. The serene harmony of our home would have made him feel his loneliness even more. Compared with Adolf, I considered myself fortune's favourite, for I had everything that he had lost : a father who provided for me, a mother who loved me and a quiet home which welcomed me into its peace.

But he ? Where should he have gone that Christmas Eve ?

He had no acquaintances, no friends, nobody who would have received him with open arms. For him, the world was hostile and empty.

So he went - to Stefanie. That is to say - to his dream.

All he ever told me of that Christmas Eve was that he had wandered around for hours.

Only towards morning had he returned to his mother's home and gone to sleep.

What he thought, felt and suffered, I never knew.

HITLER AND « GUSTL » IN VIENNA

Adolf had often said these words jestingly when speaking of his intention of going to live in Vienna. But, later-on, when he realized how impressed I was by his remarks, the idea grew in his mind that we would go there together, he to attend the Academy of Arts, and I the Conservatory.

With his magnificent imagination, he produced such a colourful picture of this life, so clear and so detailed, that I often did not know whether it was just wishful thinking or reality.

For me, such fantasies had a more practical aspect. To be sure, I had learned my trade well and satisfied my father as well as our customers by my efforts. But the hours in the dusty workshop had impaired my health, and our doctor, my secret ally, advised emphatically against my continuing to work as an upholsterer. This meant for me that I would try to make my beloved music my profession, a desire which assumed a more and more concrete shape, although the obstacles were many. I had learned all that there was to be learned in Linz.

My teachers, too, encouraged me in my decision to devote my life to music, but this meant my going to live in Vienna.

Thus, the « Come with me, “ Gustl ” » which my friend had at last uttered so lightheartedly took on the character of a firm invitation and a definite goal.

Nevertheless, I feel that, without Adolf's determined intervention, my unadventurous nature would not have allowed me to change my profession and go to live in Vienna.

Yet, my friend certainly thought primarily of himself.

He had a horror of going alone, because this, his 3rd journey to Vienna, was a quite different proposition from his earlier visits.

Then, he still had his mother, and though he was away, his home still existed. He was not, then, taking a step into the unknown, for the knowledge that his mother was waiting to welcome him with open arms at any time and, in any circumstances, gave a firm and reliable substance to his insecure life. His home was the quiet centre round which his stormy existence revolved.

Now, he had lost it.

Going to Vienna would be the last and final decision from which there was no turning back - a jump into the dark. During the months he had spent there, last autumn, he had not succeeded in making any friends ; perhaps, he had no desire to do so.

Relatives of his mother were living there with whom he had formerly had some contact and, unless I am mistaken, he had even stayed with them during his 1st visit.

He never went to see them again and did not even mention them.

It was quite understandable that he should have avoided his relatives, because he was afraid that they might question him about his work and livelihood.

They would certainly have discovered, then, that the Academy had rejected him, and he would have suffered starvation and misery rather than have appeared to be in need of help.

Nothing, therefore, was more natural than that he should take me with him, as I was not only his friend but, also, the only person with whom he shared the secret of his great love.

Since his mother's death, Adolf's « Come with me, “ Gustl ” » had begun to sound more like a friendly entreaty.

After New Year's Day, 1908, I went with Adolf to visit the grave of his parents.

It was a fine winter-day, cold and clear, which has forever remained in my memory. Snow covered all the familiar landmarks. Adolf knew every inch of our route, as for years, this had been his way to school.

He was very composed, a change that surprised me for I knew that his mother's death had shaken him deeply, and had even caused him physical suffering that had brought him near to collapse from exhaustion. My mother had invited him to share our meals during Christmas, in order that he might recover his strength and leave for a while the empty, cold house in which everything reminded him of his mother.

He had come, but had sat silent and serious at our table. It was not, yet, time to talk to him of future plans.

Now, as he walked solemnly by my side, looking much older than I, much more mature and manly, he was still deeply immersed in his own affairs.

Yet, I was surprised how clearly and detachedly he spoke of them, almost as if it were of someone else's business.

Angela had let him know that Paula could now live with them. Her husband had agreed to that, but had refused to receive Adolf into his family as he, Adolf, had behaved disrespectfully to him. Thus, he was relieved of his greatest worry, for the child at least had a secure home.

He, himself, had never intended to seek asylum with the Raubals.

He had expressed his gratitude to Angela and had informed her that all his parents' furniture would go to Paula.

The funeral expenses were paid-out of his mother's estate.

Incidentally, Angela had had a baby girl the day before, who was also to be christened Angela, and his guardian, he added, the Mayor of Leonding, had promised to settle the affairs connected with the inheritance and also to help him to apply for an orphan's pension.

All this sounded very sober and sensible.

Afterwards, he began to talk of Stefanie.

He was determined, he said, to bring the present state of affairs to an end. At the next opportunity, he would introduce himself to Stefanie and her mother, as this had not been possible during the Christmas holidays. It was high-time, he said, to bring matters to a head.

We were walking through the snow-covered village.

There was a small one-storied house, number 61, which had once belonged to Adolf's father ; the big bee-hive, of which his father had been so proud, was still there but, now, it was owned by strangers. Next to it was the cemetery. His father's grave, in which his mother had now been buried, was near the eastern wall, and the fresh little mound was covered with snow. Adolf stood in front of it with a stern, set face ; he looked hard and severe, and there were no tears in his eyes. His thoughts were with his beloved mother. I stood by his side and prayed.

On our way back, Adolf said that he would probably stay in Linz throughout the month of January until the home was finally disposed of and the estate settled. He foresaw, he said, some heated arguments with his guardian. Certainly, his guardian wanted to do his best for Adolf, but what use was this to him if the « best » was nothing more than an apprenticeship to a Master-baker in Leonding ?

Old Josef Mayrhofer, Hitler's guardian, now well-advanced in years, still lives in Leonding. Naturally, he has often been asked about his experiences with the young Hitler, and his impressions of him. In his simple, disinterested manner, he has replied to all questioners (1st the enemies ; then, the friends ; and, then, again, the enemies of his ward) and his replies have always been the same, irrespective of the questioner's opinions.

One day, in January, 1908, he would say, the Hitler-Adi, grown tall, with dark down on his upper lip and a deep voice, almost a grown man, came to see him to discuss the question of his inheritance. But his 1st sentence was :

« I am going to Vienna again. »

All attempts to dissuade him failed - a stubborn fellow, like his father, the old Hitler.

Josef Mayrhofer still has in his possession the documents relating to these discussions. The application for an orphan's pension for himself and his sister, which Adolf made at his guardian's request, reads as follows :

« To the Respected Imperial and Royal Finance Administration.

The respectfully undersigned herewith request the kind allocation of the Orphans' Pension due to them. Both of these applicants, after the death of their mother, widow of an Imperial and Royal Customs Official, on December 21st, 1907, are now without either of their parents, are minors, and are incapable of earning their own living. The guardian of both applicants -(Adolf Hitler, born on the 20th April, 1889, in Braunau-on-Inn ; and Paula Hitler, born on the 21st January, 1898, in Fischlham, near Lambach, Upper-Austria) is “ Herr ” Joseph Mayrhofer, of Leonding, near Linz. Both applicants are domiciled in Linz.

ADOLF HITLER - PAULA HITLER »

Incidentally, Adolf obviously signed the application for his sister Paula, for the name « Hitler » in both signatures shows the same downward-sloping tendency which was so characteristic of his signature in later years. Besides, he made a mistake in the date of birth of his sister ; Paula was not born in 1898, but in 1896.

According to the legislation, then, in force regarding State officials, orphans of under 24 years of age, with no means of their own, were entitled to claim an orphan's pension amounting to one half of the widow's pension which their mother had been receiving.

« Frau » Hitler had received a pension of 100 Crowns a month since her husband's death ; therefore, Adolf and Paula were entitled to a total of 50 Crowns a month, and Adolf's share was, thus, 25 Crowns a month. This, of course, was not enough for him to live-on : for example, he had to pay 10 Crowns a month for his room at Mrs. Zakreys'.

The application was granted, and the 1st payment was made on February 12th, 1908, when Adolf was already in Vienna.

Incidentally, 3 years later, he renounced his share in favour of his sister Paula, although he could have continued to claim it until he reached the age of 24 (i.e. , in April, 1913) .

The document of renunciation, dated May 4th, 1911, is still in the possession of his guardian, Joseph Mayrhofer.

The document concerning the inheritance, which Adolf signed in the presence of his guardian before he left for Vienna, also mentioned his share in his father's estate, amounting to about 700 Crowns.

It is possible that he had already spent part of this money during his previous stay in Vienna but, in view of his very economical way of life (the only large item in his budget was books) , he was left with enough to tide him over, at least the beginning of his new sojourn there.

As regards our future together, Adolf was more fortunate than I, not only because he had some capital and a fixed monthly income, however small (a matter which I had still to arrange with my parents) but also because, having prevailed over his guardian, he was free to make his own decisions, whereas my decisions were subject to my parents' confirmation.

For me, moreover, moving to Vienna meant giving-up the trade I had learned, whereas Adolf could continue to lead there more or less his previous life.

All these circumstances made it increasingly difficult for me to come to a decision ; Adolf could not understand this for some time, although, from the beginning, he had taken the lead in this whole difficult affair.

As far back as the beginning of our friendship, when I could still only visualize my future in the dusty, upholsterer's work-shop, Adolf, though nearly 1 year younger than I, had made it abundantly clear to me that I ought to become a musician.

Having put this idea into my head, he never gave-up his efforts to persuade me.

He comforted me when I despaired, he bolstered-up my self-confidence when I was in danger of losing it, he praised, he criticized, he was occasionally rude and violent and railed at me furiously, but he never lost sight of the goal which he had set for me ; and, if sometimes we had such furious rows that I believed it was the end of everything, we would enthusiastically renew our friendship after a concert performance in which I had taken part.

By God, nobody on earth, not even my mother who loved me so much and knew me so well, was as capable of bringing my secret desires into the open and making them come true as my friend, although he had never had any systematic musical training.

In the winter of 1907, when work in our business was slackening and I had more time to myself, I took lessons in harmonics from the conductor of the Linz Theatre.

My studies were as thorough as they were successful, and filled me with enthusiasm. Unfortunately, there was no scope in Linz for studying the other special subjects of musical theory, such as counterpoint, orchestration and the history of music.

Nor was there a seminary for training in conducting and composition, much less any stimulus for free composition. This sort of training was only available at the Vienna Conservatory ; besides, there, I would have the opportunity of hearing 1st class performances of Operas and concerts. Though I had made-up my mind to go to Vienna, unlike my friend, I lacked the necessary determination to carry-out my decision against all odds.

But Adolf had already prepared the ground.

Without my knowledge, he had succeeded in convincing my mother of my musical vocation ; for what mother does not like to hear a brilliant career prophesied for her son as a conductor, especially when she, herself, is so devoted to music ? Thus, she soon became our ally.

And there was also her justifiable anxiety about my health, as my lungs could no longer stand the perpetual dust in the work-shop.

So, my mother, who had grown fond of Adolf just as « Frau » Klara had become fond of me, was won over, and everything now depended on my father's consent.

Not that he openly opposed my wish. My father was in every respect the opposite of Adolf's father, as he had been described to me by my friend.

He was always quiet, and apparently took no interest in what was going on around him.

All his thoughts were devoted to the business which he had created out of nothing, had successfully steered through grave crises, and had now built-up into a reputable, prosperous enterprise. He regarded my musical tastes as idle dilettantism, as he could not believe that it was possible to build a secure existence on more or less useless fiddling and strumming. To the last, he could not understand that I, knowing poverty and distress, was willing to renounce security in favour of a vague future.

How often did I hear him say :

« A bird in the hand is worth 2 in the bush. »

Or bitterly :

« What was the use of all my drudgery ? »

I was working harder than ever in the work-shop, as I did not want it said that I was neglecting my trade for the sake of my musical studies.

My father saw in my industry a sign that I wanted to remain in the trade and take-over his business someday. My mother knew how devoted my father was to his work and, so, kept silent in order not to upset him. So, at the time when my musical future depended absolutely on my attending the Vienna Conservatory, things seemed to have reached a dead-lock within our domestic circle : I worked feverishly in the work-shop, and said nothing. My mother also said nothing, and my father, thinking that I had finally abandoned the plan, did the same.

At this juncture, Adolf came to see us.

At one glance, he realized what the situation was, and intervened immediately.

To begin with, he brought me back into « form » .

During his stay in Vienna, he had made detailed enquiries about the study of music and, now, he gave me exact information on the subject, telling me, in his tempting way, how much he had enjoyed attending Operas and concerts. My mother's imagination was also fired by these vivid descriptions and, so, a decision became more and more imperative. It was, however, essential that Adolf himself should convince my father.

A difficult enterprise ! What use was the most brilliant eloquence if the old Master upholsterer had no regard for any thing connected with art ? He was quite fond of Adolf but, after all, he only saw in him a young man who had failed at school and thought too highly of himself to learn a trade.

My father had tolerated our friendship but, actually, would have preferred a more sound companion for me.

Adolf was, therefore, in a decidedly unfavourable position, and it is astonishing that he nevertheless managed to win over my father to our plan in so comparatively short a time.

I would have understood it if there had been a violent clash of opinions ; in that case, Adolf would have been in his element and able to play all the trump cards which he held.

But that was not the case.

I cannot recollect that any argument in the usual sense took place at all.

Adolf treated the whole matter as of no great importance and, in particular, implied that the decision rested with my father alone.

He accepted the fact that my father only half gave his consent, suggesting a temporary solution : as the current scholastic year at the Conservatory had already started in the previous autumn, I should go to Vienna for a trial period only to look around for a while. If the facilities for training came-up to my expectations, I could, then, make a final decision, but failing this, I could return home and enter my father's business.

Adolf, who hated compromise and with whom it was usually all or nothing, was, surprisingly enough, agreeable to this course. I was blissfully happy as never before in my life, for now, I had achieved my purpose without up-setting my father, and my mother shared my joy.

At the beginning of February, Adolf returned to Vienna.

His address remained the same, he told me when he left, as he had continued to pay his rent to Mrs. Zakreys, and I should write to him in good time announcing my arrival.

I helped him carry his luggage to the station, 4 cases altogether unless I am mistaken, every one of them very heavy.

I asked him what they contained, and he answered :

« All my belongings. »

They were almost entirely books.

At the station Adolf once again spoke of Stefanie.

Unfortunately, he had had no opportunity to talk to her, he said, for he had never met her unaccompanied.

What he had to tell Stefanie was for her ears only.

He added, in conclusion :

« Perhaps, I shall write to her. »

But I thought that this idea, expressed by Adolf for the 1st time, was merely a sign of embarrassment, or at the most, a cheap consolation.

My friend entered the train and, standing at the window, shook me by the hand.

As the train moved-off, he called-out to me :

« Follow me soon, “ Gustl ”. »

My good mother had already started preparing my clothes and linen for my journey to great, unknown Vienna. In the end, even my father wanted to contribute something ; he made me a big wooden box which was re-inforced with strong iron bands. I put into it my music, and my mother filled the remaining space with clothes and shoes.

In the meantime, a post-card arrived from Adolf, dated February 18th, 1908, showing a view of the Armour Collection at the Vienna Museum of the History of Art.

It began with :

« Dear Friend »

This form of address proved how much our relationship had deepened since his mother's death.

« Dear Friend, am anxiously expecting news of your arrival. Write soon so that I can prepare everything for your festive welcome. The whole of Vienna is awaiting you, therefore, come soon. I will, of course, come and meet you. »

On the back of the post-card, he wrote :

« Now, the weather here is improving. I hope you will have better weather too. Well, as I said before, at 1st, you will stay with me. Later, we shall see. One can get a piano here in the so-called “ Dorotheum ” for as little as 50 to 60 Florins. Well, many regards to you and your esteemed parents, from your friend, Adolf Hitler. »

Then, a postscript :

« Beg you again, come soon. »

Adolf had addressed the card as usual to « Gustav » Kubizek.

He spelt Gustav sometimes with a « v » , and sometimes with a « ph » .

He heartily disliked my 1st name, August, and always called me « Gustl » , which was more like Gustav than August.

He would probably have preferred it had I formally changed my 1st name.

He even addressed me as Gustav when he wrote to me on my Saint's Day, the feast of Saint-Augustine, on August 28th.

Under my name, there is the abbreviation « Stud. » (« Studium ») , and I remember that he liked to refer to me as « Stud. Mus. » (« Studium Musik ») .

This post-card, unlike the previous ones, is much more cheerful.

Typical of Adolf's mood is his humour, which permeates it.

He says :

« The whole of Vienna is awaiting you. »

And he intends to prepare a « festive welcome » .

All this indicates that, after the dark and depressing days which he had spent in Linz following his mother's death, he was feeling relaxed and free in Vienna, however uncertain the future might be.

Nevertheless, he must have been very lonely. The « anxiously » in the 1st sentence of his card was no doubt meant seriously, and the fact that he repeats the « come soon » , even in the form « beg you again to come soon » , proves how much he was looking forward to my arrival.

Even the information as to the cheap piano was intended to encourage me to come without delay. He may have feared secretly that my vacillating father would change his mind at the last moment.

The day of my departure arrived. In the morning, I went to church with my mother ; I felt how painful my departure was for her, although she stuck tenaciously to her resolve.

Yet, I also remember a typical remark which my father made when he saw my mother weeping.

He said :

« I can't understand why you are so depressed, Mother. We haven't asked “ Gustl ” to leave his home ; he wanted to himself. »

My mother, in her grief at our parting, concentrated on my creature comforts, giving me a nice piece of roast pork ; and the dripping, which was to be spread on my bread, was put into a special container. She baked some buns for me, gave me a large piece of cheese, a jar of jam and a bottle of coffee. My brown canvas bag was full to overflowing with food.

So, off I went to the station after my last dinner at home, well-provided for in every respect. My parents saw me off ; my father shook my hand and said :

« Always remain honest. »

But my mother, with tears in her eyes, kissed me and, as the train started, made the sign of the Cross on my forehead.

For a long time, I felt her tender fingers there as they traced the Cross.

IMPRESSIONS OF VIENNA

My 1st impression on arriving in Vienna was one of noisy and excited confusion.

I stood there, holding my heavy case, so bewildered that I did not know which way to turn. All these people ! And this noise and tumult ! This was terrible.

I was almost inclined to turn tail and go straight home again.

But the crowds, thrusting and complaining, were jostling me through the barrier where the ticket inspectors and police stood, till I found myself in the Station Hall looking round for my friend.

I shall always remember this 1st welcome in Vienna.

While I stood there, still overwhelmed by all the shouting and hustling, recognizable from a mile away as a country bumpkin, Adolf behaved as a perfectly acclimatised city dweller. In his dark, good-quality over-coat, dark hat and the walking stick with the ivory handle, he appeared almost elegant.

He was obviously delighted to see me and greeted me warmly and, as was then the custom, kissed me lightly on the cheek.

The 1st problem was the transport of my bag for, thanks to my mother's presents, this weighed very heavily.

As I was looking around for a porter, Adolf grabbed one of the handles and I took the other.

We crossed the « Mariahilferstraße » with people everywhere, coming and going about their affairs, and such a terrible noise that one could not hear oneself speak ; but how thrilling were the electric arc-lights that made the station yard as bright as day.

I still remember how glad I was when Adolf soon turned into a side-street, the « Stumpergasse » .

Here, it was quiet and dark. Adolf stopped in front of a fairly new-looking house on the right-side, number 29. As far as I could see, it was a very fine house, most imposing and distinguished looking, perhaps, too distinguished for such youngsters as we were, I thought. But Adolf went straight through the entrance and crossed a small court-yard.

The house on the far-side of this court-yard was much humbler. We went-up a dark staircase to the 2nd floor. There were several doors opening on this floor - ours was number 17.

Adolf unlocked the door.

An unpleasant smell of kerosene greeted me and, ever since, this smell has been connected, for me, with the memory of that apartment. We seemed to be in a kitchen, but the landlady was not about. Adolf opened a 2nd door. In the small room that he occupied, a miserable kerosene lamp was burning. I looked around me.

The 1st thing that struck me were the sketches that lay around on the table, on the bed, everywhere.

Adolf cleared the table, spread a piece of newspaper on it and fetched a bottle of milk from the window. Then, he brought sausage and bread.

But I can still see his white, earnest face as I pushed all these things aside and opened the bag. Cold roast pork, stuffed buns, and other lovely things to eat.

All he said was :

« Yes, that's what it is to have a mother ! »

We ate like kings. Everything tasted like « home » .

After all the commotion, I began to collect myself.

Then came the inevitable question about Stefanie.

When I had to confess that I had not been for the evening stroll on the « Landstraße » for some considerable time, Adolf told me that I ought to have gone for his sake. Before I could reply there was a knock on the door. A little old woman, withered, and altogether of a rather comic appearance slipped inside.

Adolf rose and introduced me in his most formal manner :

« My friend, Gustav Kubizek, of Linz, a music student. »

The old woman repeated several times :

« Pleased to meet you, pleased to meet you. »

And announced her own name : Maria Zakreys.

From the sing-song tone and the peculiar accent, I realized that « Frau » Zakreys was not a real Viennese. Or rather, she was a Viennese, perhaps even a typical one, but she had not Ist seen the light of day in Hernals or Lerchenfeld but rather in Stanislau or Neutitschein.

I never asked and never found-out and, after all, it made no difference. In any case, « Frau » Zakreys was the only person in this city of millions with whom Adolf and I ever had any dealings.

Tired as I was during this Ist evening, I remember that Adolf showed me around the city.

How could a person who had just come to Vienna go to bed without having seen the Opera House ?

So, I was dragged to the Opera House.

The performmace was not yet over.

I admired the entrance-hall, the magnificent staircase, the marble balustrade, the deep, soft carpets and the gilded decorations on the ceiling.

Once away from the humble abode on the « Stumpergasse » , I felt as though I had been transported to another planet, so overwhelming was the impression.

Now, it was I who insisted on seeing the Saint-Stephen's Spire.

We turned into the « Kärntnerstraße » . But the evening mist was so thick that the spire was lost to view. I could just see the heavy, dark mass of the nave stretching-up into the grey monotony of the mist, almost unearthly, as though not built by human hands.

In order to show me something else special, Adolf took me to the « Maria am Gestade » Church, which, compared with the over-powering bulk of Saint-Stephen's, seemed to me like a delicate Gothic chapel.

When we got home, we each had to pay the grumpy concierge whom we had awakened a « Sperrsechserl » (a penny for unlocking) for opening the big door of the house.

Mrs. Zakreys had made me up a primitive bed on the floor of Adolf's room.

Although midnight was long past, Adolf still kept talking excitedly. But I stopped listening - it was just too much for me.

The moving farewell from my home, my mother's sad face, the journey, the arrival, the noise, the clamour, the Vienna of the « Stumpergasse », the Vienna of the Opera House - worn out, I fell asleep.

Of course, I could not stay at « Frau » Zakreys'.

Anyhow, it was impossible to put a grand piano in the little room. So, the next morning, when Adolf finally got-up, we set-out to look for a room.

As I wanted to stay as near as possible to my friend, we wandered, at 1st, along the nearby streets.

Once more, I saw this alluring city, Vienna, from the « other side » .

Gloomy court-yards, narrow, ill-lit tenements and stairs, ever more and more stairs.

Adolf paid « Frau » Zakreys 10 Crowns, and that was what I reckoned to pay. But the rooms we were shown at that price were mostly so small and wretched that it would have been impossible to get a grand piano into them, and when we did find a room that would have been big enough, the landlady would not hear of having a lodger who played the piano.

I was very depressed and low-spirited and full of home sickness.

What kind of big city was this Vienna ?

Full of indifferent, un-sympathetic people - it must be awful to live here.

I walked, despairing and miserable, with Adolf along the « Zollergasse » .

Once more, we saw a notice : « Room to Let » .

We rang the bell and the door was opened by a neatly dressed maid, who showed us into an elegantly furnished room containing magnificent twin beds.

The maid said, curtsied,

« Madame is coming immediately. »

And vanished.

We both knew, at once, that it was too stylish for us. Then, « Madame » appeared in the door-way, very much a lady, not so young, but very elegant.

She wore a silk dressing gown and slippers trimmed with fur.

She greeted us smilingly, inspected Adolf, then me, and asked us to sit-down.

My friend asked which room was to let.

She answered :

« This one. » , and pointed to the 2 beds.

Adolf shook his head and said curtly :

« Then, one of the beds will have to come-out, because my friend must have room for a piano. »

The lady was obviously disappointed that it was I and not Adolf who wanted a room, and asked whether Adolf already had a room. When he answered in the affirmative, she suggested that I, together with the piano I needed, should move into his room and he should take this one.

While she was animatedly suggesting this to Adolf, through a sudden movement the belt which kept the dressing gown together came undone.

The lady exclaimed :

« Oh, excuse me, gentlemen. »

And immediately fastened the dressing gown together, again. But that second had sufficed to show us that, under her silk covering, she wore nothing but a brief pair of panties.

Adolf turned as red as a peony, gripped my arm, and said :

« Come, “ Gustl ”. »

I do not remember how we got-out of the house. All I remember is Adolf furiously exclaiming as we got into the street again :

« What a Mrs. Potiphar. »

Apparently, such experiences, too, were part of Vienna.

Adolf must have realized how hard it was for me to find my way around in this bewildering city and, on our way home, he suggested that we should take a room together. He would speak to « Frau » Zakreys ; perhaps, she would fix-up something in her own house.

In the end, he succeeded in persuading « Frau » Zakreys to move into his little room and let us take-over the somewhat bigger room that she occupied.

We agreed on a rent of 20 Crowns a month. She had nothing against my playing the piano, so, this was an excellent solution for me.

The next morning, while Adolf was still asleep, I went to register at the Conservatory.

I produced my references from the Linz Music School and was immediately examined.

Ist, came an oral examination, then, I had to sing something at sight, and finally, a test in harmony.

All went well, and I was asked to go to the Administration Office, Director « Kaiser » - and, for me, he was really the Emperor-congratulated me, and told me about the curriculum.

He advised me to register as an extra-mural student at the University and to attend lectures in the history of music. Then, he introduced me to the conductor, Gustav Gutheil, with whom I should study, among other things, the practical side of conducting. In addition to this, I was accepted as viola player in the Conservatory's Orchestra.

All this was quite straightforward and, soon, in spite of the initial bewilderment, I felt on firm ground. As so often happened in my life, I found help and consolation in music ; even more, it now became my whole life. I had finally escaped from the dusty upholsterer's work-shop and could devote myself entirely to my art.

In the nearby « Liniengasse » , I discovered a piano store, called « Feigl » . I inspected the instruments for hire ; of course, they were not particularly good ones, but I did finally find a grand piano that was fairly good and I hired it for 10 Crowns a month.

When Adolf came home in the evening (I did not, yet, know how he spent his days) , he was astonished to see the grand piano. For that comparatively small room, an upright model would have been more suitable. But how was I to become a conductor without a grand piano ! Admittedly, it was not as easy as I had thought.

Adolf immediately took a hand to try-out the best place to put it. He agreed that, to get enough light, the piano had to stand near the window.

After much experiment, the contents of the room - 2 beds, 1 night chest, 1 wardrobe, 1 washstand, 1 table and 2 chairs, were distributed to the best advantage. In spite of this, the instrument took-up the whole space of the right-hand window. The table was pushed into the other window enclosure. The space between the beds and the piano, as well as that between the beds and the table, was hardly more than 1 foot wide. And, for Adolf, room to stride-up and down was every bit as important as playing the piano was for me. At once, he tried it out. From the door to the curve of the piano - 3 steps ! That was enough, because 3 steps one way, and 3 steps the other made 6, even though Adolf in his continual pacing, up and down, had to turn so often that it became almost a case of moving around his own axis.

The bare, sooty rear-side of the house in front was all we could see from our room. Only if you stood very close to the free window, and looked sharply upwards, would you see a narrow slice of the firmament, but even this modest bit of sky was generally hidden by smoke, dust or fog. On exceptionally lucky days, the sun would shine through. To be sure, it shone hardly at all on our house, much less in our room. But, on the rear of the house in front, streaks of sunshine were to be seen for a couple of hours, and this had to compensate us for the sun that we so sorely missed. I told Adolf that I had got through the entrance examination at the Conservatory quite well and was glad that I was now firmly settled-down to my studies. Adolf remarked baldly :

« I had no idea I had such a clever friend. »

This did not sound very flattering, but I was used to such remarks from him.

Apparently, he was at a very critical period, was very irritable, and shut me up brusquely when I began to talk about my studies.

He finally reconciled himself to the piano. He could practise a bit too, he remarked. I said I was willing to teach him - but here, again, I had put my foot into it. Ill-temperedly, he snarled at me :

« You can keep your scales and such rubbish. I'll get on by myself. »

Then, he calmed down again and said, in a propitiating tone :

« Why should I become a musician, “ Gustl ” ? After all, I have you ! »

Our circumstances were modest in the extreme. I certainly could not do much with the monthly allowance my father made me.

Regularly, at the beginning of each month, Adolf received a certain sum from his guardian. I do not know how much this was, perhaps, only the 25 Crowns orphan's pension, of which he had immediately to pay-out 10 to « Frau » Zakreys ; perhaps, it was more, if his guardian was paying-out of capital in installments whatever his parents may have left. Perhaps, relatives helped to support him, for instance, the humpbacked Aunt Johanna ; but I do not know. I only know that, even then, Adolf often went hungry, although he would not admit this to me.

What did Adolf have for an ordinary day's meals ? A bottle of milk, a loaf of bread, some butter. For lunch, he often bought a piece of poppy-seed cake or nut-cake to add to it. That is what he made do with.

Every fortnight, my mother sent a food parcel and, then, we feasted. But, in money matters, Adolf was very precise. I never knew how much, or rather, how little, money he had. Doubtless, he was secretly ashamed of it. Occasionally, anger got the better of him and he would shout with fury :

« Isn't this a dog's life ? »

Nevertheless, he was happy and contented when we could go, once more, to the Opera, or listen to a concert, or read an interesting book.

For a long time, I could not find-out where he ate his lunch. Any enquiries about it he would crossly dismiss - these were not subjects one discussed. As I had some spare time in the afternoon, sometimes I used to come home directly after lunch ; but I never found Adolf at home. Perhaps, he was sitting in the « Soup-Kitchen » on the « Liniengasse » where I sometimes had my mid-day meal. No, he was not there, I went to the « Auge Gottes » . Neither was he there. When I asked him, in the evening, why he never came to the « Soup-Kitchen » , he made a long speech about the contemptible institution of these « Soup-Kitchens » which only symbolize the segregation of the social classes.

As an extra-mural student of the university, I was permitted to eat in the canteen (it was still the old canteen, for the new one erected by the German Schools Society did not, then, exist) and I could also procure cheap meal tickets for Adolf and, finally, he consented to come with me. I knew how much he liked sweets, so, as well as the main dish, I got some cakes. I thought he would enjoy this because you could see from his face how hungry he was, but as he sulkily gulped it down, he venomously hissed at me :

« I don't understand how you can enjoy anything among such people ! »

Of course, there used to gather in the canteen students from all the nations of the realm, together with several Jewish students. That was reason enough to stop him going there. But, to tell the truth, in spite of all his determination, he let hunger get the better of him. He squeezed himself in next to me in the canteen, turned his back on the rest and greedily wolfed-down his favourite nut-cake. Many a time, in my political indifference, was I secretly amused to see him swinging between anti-Semitism and his passion for nut-cake.

For days on end, he could live on milk and bread and butter only. I certainly was not spoiled, but this was beyond me. We did not make any acquaintances. Adolf would never have permitted me time for anybody but himself.

More than ever did he regard our friendship as one that excluded any other relationship. Once, as a result of pure chance, he treated me to a very explicit reproof in this respect.

Harmony was my hobby-horse ; in Linz, too, I had shone at it, and here I got on swimmingly.

One day, Professor Boschetti called me to the office and asked me whether I would like to do some coaching in the subject. Then, he introduced me to my future pupils. The 2 daughters of a brewer in Kolomea, the daughter of a land-owner in Radautz ; and, also, the daughter of a businessman in Spalato.

I was most depressed by the startling differences between the good-class boarding-house in which these young ladies lived and our wretched hole that always stank of kerosene.

Usually, at the end of the lesson, I took tea so substantially that it served me for supper as well. When was added to the group the daughter of a cloth manufacturer from Jägerndorf, in Silesia, and the daughter of a magistrate in Agram, my half-dozen pupils together represented every corner of the wide-spread Hapsburg Empire.

And, then, the unexpected happened. One of them, the girl from Silesia, found she could not get on with a piece of written homework, and came round to me on the « Stumpergasse » to ask for my help.

Our good old landlady raised her eyebrows when she saw the pretty young girl. But that was all right ; I was, indeed, only concerned with the musical example which she had not understood, and I explained it to her.

As she copied it down quickly, Adolf came in.

I introduced him to my pupil :

« My friend from Linz, Adolf Hitler. »

Adolf said nothing. But hardly had the girl got outside when he went for me wildly - for since his unfortunate experience with Stefanie, he was a woman hater.

Was our room, already spoilt by that monster, that grand piano, to become the « rendez-vous » for this crew of musical women, he asked me furiously ?

I had a job to convince him that the poor girl was not suffering from the pangs of love, but from examination-pains. The result was a detailed speech about the senselessness of women studying. Like blows the words fell upon me, as though I were the cloth-manufacturer or the brewer who had sent his daughter to the Conservatory.

Adolf got himself more and more involved in a general criticism of social conditions.

I cowered silently on the piano stool while he, enraged, strode the 3 steps along and the 3 steps back and hurled his indignation in the bitterest terms, 1st against the door ; and, then, against the piano.

Altogether, in these early days in Vienna, I had the impression that Adolf had become un-balanced.

He would fly into a temper at the slightest thing.

There were days when nothing I could do seemed right to him, and he made our life together very hard to bear.

But I had known Adolf now for over 3 years.

I had gone through terrible days with him after the wreck of his scholastic career, and also after his mother's death. I did not know to what this present mood of deep depression was due, but I thought that, sooner or later, it would improve.

He was at odds with the world.

Wherever he looked, he saw injustice, hate and enmity.

Nothing was free from his criticism ; nothing found favour in his eyes.

Only music was able to cheer him up a little, as, for instance, when we went on Sundays to the performances of sacred music in the « Burgkapelle » .

Here, one could hear, at no expense, soloists from the Vienna Opera House and the Vienna Boys' Choir.

Adolf was particularly fond of this famous Boys' Choir, and he told me, again and again, how grateful he was for that early musical training he had received at Lambach.

But, in other ways, to remember, just at that time, his care-free childhood was particularly painful to him.

All this time, he was ceaselessly busy.

I had no idea what a student at the Academy of Arts was supposed to do.

In any case, the subjects must have been exceedingly varied ; one day, he would be sitting for hours over books, then, again, he would sit writing till the small hours or, another day, would see the piano, the table, his bed and mine, and even the floor, completely covered with designs.

He would stand, staring tensely down at his work, move stealthily on tip-toe among the drawings, improve something here, correct something there, muttering to himself all the time and underlining his rapid words with violent gestures.

Woe betide me if I disturbed him on these occasions. I had great respect for this difficult and detailed work, and said I liked what I saw of it.

When, getting impatient, I would open the piano, he would shuffle the sheets quickly together, put them in a cupboard, grab-up a hook and make-off to Schönbrunn.

He had found a quiet bench there, among the lawns and trees, where no one ever disturbed him. Whatever progress he made with his studies in the open-air was accomplished on this seat. I, too, was fond of this quiet spot, where one could forget one lived in a metropolis. Often, in later years, I visited this lonely bench.

It would seem that a student in architecture could spend much more time in the open-air and work more independently than could a Conservatory student.

On one occasion, when he had, once more, written till all hours of the night (the ugly little smoky kerosene lamp had nearly burnt-out and I was still awake) , I asked him bluntly what was going to be the end of all this work.

Instead of answering, he handed me a couple of hastily scribbled sheets. Astounded, I read :

« Holy Mountain in the background, before it, the mighty sacrificial block surrounded by huge oaks ; 2 powerful warriors hold the black bull, which is to be sacrificed, firmly by the horns, and press the beast's mighty head against the hollow in the sacrificial block. Behind them, erect in light-coloured robes, stands the priest. He holds the sword with which he will slaughter the bull. All around, solemn, bearded men, leaning on their shields, their lances ready, are watching the ceremony intently. »

I could not see any connection between this extraordinary description and the study of architecture, so I asked what it was supposed to be.

« A play. » , replied Adolf.

Then, in stirring words, he described the action to me.

Unfortunately, I have long since forgotten it. I only remember that it was set in the Bavarian mountains, at the time of the bringing of Christianity to those parts.

The men who lived on the mountain did not want to accept the new faith. On the contrary ! They had bound themselves by oath to kill the Christian missionaries. On this was based the conflict of the drama.

I would have liked to have asked Adolf whether his studies in the Academy left him so much free-time that he could write dramas, too, but I knew how sensitive he was about everything appertaining to his chosen profession.

I could appreciate his attitude because, certainly, he had struggled hard enough to get his chance to study. I suppose that is what made him so touchy in this respect. But, nevertheless, there seemed to me something not quite right about it all.

His mood worried me more and more as the days went by. I had never known him torment himself in this way before.

On the contrary ! In my opinion, he possessed rather too much than too little self-confidence. But, now, things seemed to have changed round. He wallowed deeper and deeper in self-criticism. Yet, it only needed the slightest touch (as when one flicks on the electric light and everything becomes brilliantly clear) for his self-accusation to become an accusation against the times, against the whole world ; choking with his catalogue of hates, he would pour his fury over everything, against mankind in general who did not understand him, who did not appreciate him and by whom he was persecuted. I see him before me, striding up and down the small space in boundless anger, shaken to his very depths.

I sat at the piano with my fingers motionless on the key-board and listened to him, upset by his hymn of hate and, yet, worried about him, for his ranting at the bare walls was heard only by me and, perhaps, by « Frau » Zakreys working in the kitchen, who would be worrying about whether the crazed young man would be able to produce his next month's rent.

But those at whom these burning words were directed, they did not hear him at all. So, of what use was all the great display ?

Suddenly, however, in the middle of this hate-ridden harangue where he challenged a whole epoch, one sentence revealed to me how deep was the abyss on whose edge he was tottering :

« I shall give-up Stefanie. »

These were the most terrible words he could utter, for Stefanie was the only creature on God's earth whom he excepted from this infamous humanity - a being who, made radiant by his glowing love, gave his tormented existence sense and purpose.

His father dead, his mother dead, his only sister still a child, what was there left to him ?

He had no family, no home ; only his love, only Stefanie in the midst of all his sufferings and catastrophes had remained steadfastly by his side - admittedly, only in his imagination.

Until now, this imagination had been strong enough to be a help to him. But, in the spiritual convulsion through which he was now passing, apparently even this obstinately held conviction had broken-down.

Meaning to help him by this suggestion, I interposed :

« I thought you were going to write to her ? »

He brushed my remark away with an impatient gesture (it was only 40 years later that I learned that he really had written to her, then) and, then, came words that I had never before heard him utter :

« It's mad to wait for her. Certainly, " Mama " has already picked-out the man for Stefanie to marry. Love ? They won't worry about that. A good match, that's all that matters. And I'm a poor match, at least, in the eyes of " Mama ". »

Then, came a furious reckoning with the « Mama » , with everybody who belonged to these fine circles who, through cleverly arranged marriages among themselves, continue to enjoy their un-merited social privileges.

I gave-up the attempt to practise the piano, and went to bed, while Adolf became absorbed in his books.

I still remember how shocked I was, then. If Adolf could no longer cling to the thought of Stefanie, whatever would become of him ?

My feelings were divided : on the one hand, I was glad that he was finally released from this hopeless love for Stefanie ; and on the other hand, I knew that Stefanie was his only ideal, the only thing that kept him going and gave his life an aim.

The next day, for a trifling reason, there was a bitter row between us.

I had to practise, Adolf wanted to read. As it was raining, he could not go off to Schönbrunn.

He shouted at me :

« This eternal strumming. One's never safe from it. »

I answered :

« It's quite simple. » I answered.

I got-up, took my time-table out of my music case and, with a drawing-pin, fixed it on the cup-board door. Now, he could see exactly when I was out, when not, and just when my hours for practising were.

I added :

« And, now, hang your time-table under it. »

Timetable ! He didn't need any such thing. He kept his time-table in his head. That was good enough for him and it had to be good enough for me.

I shrugged my shoulders doubtfully. His work was anything but systematic. He worked practically only at night ; in the morning, he slept.

I had quickly settled into the life of the Conservatory, and my teachers were satisfied with my work - more than satisfied, as was shown by their offering me the extra-coaching. Naturally, I was proud of it, and certainly a bit conceited.

Music is, perhaps, the one art where a lack of formal education does not seem to matter so much. So, pleased with myself, and contented, I set-off happily every morning for the Conservatory. But just this sureness of purpose, this certainty of success, awoke in Adolf the most bitter comparisons, although he never mentioned it.

So now, the sight of the time-table stuck on the wall, which must have seemed to him like an officially accredited guarantee for my future, brought about an explosion.

He screamed :

« This Academy, a lot of old-fashioned fossilized civil servants, bureaucrats, devoid of understanding, stupid lumps of officials. The whole Academy ought to be blown-up ! »

His face was livid, the mouth quite small, the lips almost white. But the eyes glittered. There was something sinister about them. As if all the hate of which he was capable lay in those glowing eyes !

I was just going to point-out that those men of the Academy on whom he so lightly passed judgment in his measureless hatred were, after all, his teachers and professors, from whom he could certainly learn something. But he forestalled me.

« They rejected me, they threw me out, they turned me down. »

I was shocked. So, that was it. Adolf did not go to the Academy at all.

Now, I understood a good deal that had puzzled me about him.

I felt his hard luck deeply, and asked him whether he had told his mother that the Academy had not accepted him.

He replied :

« What are you thinking of ? How could I burden my dying mother with this worry ? »

I could not help but agree.

For a while, we were both silent.

Perhaps, Adolf was thinking of his mother.

Then, I tried to give the conversation a practical turn.

I asked him :

« And what now ? »

He repeated irritably :

« What now, what now. Are you starting too - what now ? »

He must have asked himself this question a hundred times and more, because he had certainly not discussed it with anyone else.

He mocked my anxious inquiry, again :

« What now ? »

Instead of answering, he sat himself down at the table and surrounded himself with his books.

« What now ? »

Then, he adjusted the lamp, took-up one of the books, opened it and began to read.

I made to take the time-table down from the cup-board door.

He raised his head, saw it and said calmly :

« Never mind. »

VIENNA

We often saw the old Emperor when he rode in his carriage from Schönbrunn through the « Mariahilferstraße » to the « Hofburg » .

On such occasions, Adolf did not make much ado about it, neither did he refer to it later, for he was not interested in the Emperor as a person but only in the State which he represented, the Austro-Hungarian monarchy.

All my recollections of life in Vienna are sharpened by contrasts, and are, thus, more clearly etched in my memory. Indeed, in the course of the turbulent year 1908, there took place 2 political events which agitated the people.

On the one hand, there was the Emperor's Diamond Jubilee.

On the other, there was the annexation of Bosnia, decreed in connection with the Jubilee, a matter which caused heated arguments among the citizens.

This extension of the external power of the country only revealed its weakness within and, soon, all the signs were of War. In fact, the events which took place in 1914 might easily have happened then, 6 years earlier.

It was no mere coincidence that the 1914-1918 War actually had its origins in Sarajevo.

The people of Vienna, among whom we, 2 unknown youngsters, were living, were, at that time, torn between loyalty to the old Emperor and anxiety about the threatening War.

Everywhere, we noticed a deep chasm between the social classes.

There was the vast mass of the lower-classes who often had not enough to eat and merely existed in miserable dwellings without light or sun. In view of our standards of living, we unhesitatingly included ourselves in this category. It was not necessary for us to go out to study the mass-misery of the city - it was brought into our own home. Our own damp and crumbling walls, bug-infested furniture and the un-pleasant odour of kerosene were typical of the surroundings in which hundreds of thousands of people in this city lived.

When we went with empty stomachs into the centre of the city, we saw the splendid mansions of the nobility with garishly attired servants in front, and the sumptuous hotels in which Vienna's rich society (the old nobility, the captains of industry, land-owners and magnates) held their lavish parties ; poverty, need, hunger on the one side, and reckless enjoyment of life, sensuality and prodigal luxury on the other.

I was too home-sick to draw any political inferences from these contrasts. But Adolf, homeless, rejected by the Academy, without any chance of changing his miserable position, developed during this period an ever growing sense of rebellion.

The obvious social injustice which caused him almost physical suffering also roused in him a demoniacal hatred of that un-earned wealth, presumptuous and arrogant, which we saw around us.

Only by violently protesting against this state of affairs was he able to bear his own « dog's life ». To be sure, it was largely his own fault that he was in this position ; but this he would never admit. Even more than from hunger, he suffered from the lack of cleanliness, as he was almost pathologically sensitive about anything concerning the body. At all costs, he would keep his linen and clothing clean.

No one, meeting this carefully dressed young man in the street, would have thought that he went hungry every day, and lived in a hopelessly bug-infested back-room in the 6th District.

It was more the lack of cleanliness in the surroundings in which he was forced to live than the lack of food which provoked his inner-protests against the prevailing social conditions.

The old Imperial City, with its atmosphere of false glamour and spurious Romance and its, now, evident inner-decay, was the ground on which his social and political opinions grew.

All that, he later became, was born of this dying Imperial Vienna.

Although he wrote later :

« The name of this city of lotus eaters represents for me 5 years of misery and distress. »

This statement shows only the negative side of his experience in Vienna. The positive side was that his constant revolt against the existing social order produced his political philosophy to which little was added in later years.

In spite of his sympathetic interest in the poverty of the masses, he never sought direct contact with the inhabitants of the Imperial City.

He profoundly disliked the typical Viennese.

To begin with, he could not stand their soft, though melodious accent, and he even preferred the clumsy German spoken by « Frau » Zakreys.

Above all, he hated the subservience and dumb indifference of the Viennese, their eternal muddling through, their reckless improvidence.

His own character was just the opposite.

As far as I can remember, Adolf was always very reserved, simply because he disliked any physical contact with people ; but, within him, everything was in a ferment and urged him on to radical and total solutions.

How sarcastic he was about the Viennese partiality to wine, and how he despised them for it ! Only once, did we go to the « Prater » Pleasure Gardens, and this, only out of curiosity.

He could not understand why people wasted their precious time with such nonsense. When he heard people laughing uproariously at some side-show, he would shake his head, full of indignation at so much stupidity, and ask me angrily if I could understand it.

In his opinion, they must have been laughing at themselves, which he could well-understand. In addition, he was disgusted at the medley of Viennese, Czechs, Magyars, Slovaks, Rumanians, Croats, Italians and God knows what else which surged through the « Prater » . To him, the « Prater » was nothing but a Viennese Babel. There was, here, a strange contradiction which always struck me : all his thoughts and ambitions were directed towards the problem of how to help the masses, the simple, decent, but under-privileged people, with whom he identified himself - they were ever-present in his thoughts.

But, in actual fact, he always avoided any contact with people. The motley crowd in the « Prater » was physically repugnant to him ; however much he felt for the little man, he always kept him at the greatest possible distance. On the other hand, the arrogance of the ruling classes was equally alien to him, and he understood even less the apathy and resignation which in those years was gaining a hold on the leading intellectuals.

The knowledge that the end of the Hapsburg State was inevitable had bred, especially among the traditional upholders of the Monarchy, a kind of fatalism which accepted whatever might befall, with the typically Viennese :

« There's nothing one can do about it. »

This bitter-sweet tone of resignation prevailed also among Vienna's poets ; for instance, Hofmannstahl, Wildgans : names which never reached us, not because we had no appreciation of the words of a poet, but because the mood which prompted the work of those poets was foreign to us ; we had come from the country and were nearer to nature than were the townfolk.

In addition, we were of a different generation from those weary and resigned people.

While the hopeless social conditions in their apparent inevitability produced in the older generation nothing but apathy and complete indifference, they forced the younger generation into racial criticism and violent opposition.

And Adolf, too, felt the urgent need to criticize and counter-attack.

He did not know what resignation meant.

He who resigned, he thought, lost his right to live.

But he dissociated himself from his contemporaries who were, at that time, very arrogant and turbulent, and went his own way, refusing to join any of the, then, existing political parties. Although he always felt a sense of responsibility for everything that happened he was always a lonely and solitary man, determined to rely upon himself only, and to reach his goal.

One other thing should be mentioned : Adolf's visit to the typical working-class district of Meidling.

Although he never told me exactly why he went there, I knew that he wanted to study personally the housing and living conditions of the workers' families.

He was not interested in any individual ; he only wanted to know the ways of the class as a whole. He, therefore, made no acquaintances in Meidling, his aim being to study a cross-section of the community quite impersonally. However much he avoided close contact with people, he had nevertheless grown fond of Vienna as a city ; he could have lived quite happily without the people, but never without the city.

Small wonder, then, that the few people whom he came later to know in Vienna thought of him as a lone wolf and an eccentric, and regarded as pretence or arrogance his refined speech, his distinguished manners and his elegant bearing, which belied his obvious poverty. In fact, the young Hitler made no friends in Vienna.

All the more enthusiastic was he about what people had built in Vienna.

Think only of the « Ringstraße » !

When he saw it for the 1st time, with its fabulous buildings, it seemed to him the realisation of his boldest artistic dreams, and it took him a long time to digest this overwhelming impression. Only gradually did he find his way about this magnificent exhibition of modern architecture. I often had to accompany him on his strolls along the « Ring » .

Then, he would describe to me, at some length, this or that building, pointing-out certain details, or he would explain to me its origins.

He would literally spend hours in front of it, forgetting not only the time but all that went on around him. I could not understand the reason for these long drawn-out and complicated inspections ; after all, he had seen everything before, and already knew more about it than most of the inhabitants of the city.

When I occasionally became impatient, he shouted at me rudely, asking whether I was his real friend or not ; if I was, I should share his interests. Then, he continued with his dissertation.

At home, he would draw for me ground plans and sectional plans, or enlarge upon some interesting detail.

He borrowed books on the origin of various buildings, the « Hofoper », the House of Parliament, the « Burgtheater », the « Karlskirche », the « Hof-Museums », the Town Hall ; he brought home more and more books, among them, a general hand-book of architecture. He showed me the various architectural styles, and particularly pointed-out to me that some of the details on the buildings of the « Ringstraße » demonstrated the excellent workmanship of local craftsmen.

When he wished to study a certain building, the external appearance alone did not satisfy him. I was always astonished how well-informed he was about side-doors, staircases, and even back-doors and little-known means of access.

He approached a building from all sides ; he hated nothing more than splendid and ostentatious façades intended to conceal some fault in the layout.

Beautiful façades were always suspect.

Plaster, he thought, was an inferior material that no architect should use.

He was never deceived and, often, was able to show me that some construction, which aimed at mere visual effect, was just bluff.

Thus, the « Ringstraße » became for him an object by which he could measure his architectural knowledge and demonstrate his opinions.

At that time also, his 1st schemes for the re-planning of large squares emerged. I distinctly remember his expositions : for instance, he regarded the « Heldenplatz », between the « Hofburg » and the « Volksgarten », as an almost ideal spot for mass-meetings, not only because the semi-circle of the adjacent buildings lent itself in a unique way to holding the assembled multitude but, also, because every individual in the crowd would receive a great monumental impression whichever way he looked.

I thought these observations were the idle play of an over-heated imagination but, nevertheless, I always had to take part in such experiments.

The « Schwarzenbergplatz » was also very much beloved by Adolf.

We sometimes went there, during an interval at the « Hofoper », in order to admire in the darkness the fantastically illuminated fountains. That was a spectacle after our own hearts. Incessantly, the foaming water rose, coloured red, yellow and blue, in turn, by the various spotlights. Colour and movement combined to produce an incredible abundance of light effects, casting an unreal and unearthly spell-over the whole square.

To be sure, Adolf, influenced by the « Ringstraße » architecture, was also interested in great projects during his time in Vienna : concert-halls, theatres, museums, palaces, exhibitions. But, gradually, his style of planning changed.

In the 1st place, these monumental buildings were, in a certain sense, so perfect that even he, with his un-bridled will to build, could find no room for change or improvement. Linz had been quite different in this respect.

With the exception of the massive pile of the old Castle, he had been completely dissatisfied with every building he had seen in Linz.

Small wonder, therefore, that he planned a new and more dignified successor to the old Town Hall of Linz which was rather narrow and, squeezed in among the houses of the main-square, was not very imposing ; and that, in the end, during our strolls through the town, he rebuilt the whole city.

Vienna was different, not only because it was difficult for him to conceive as a unit the enormous dimensions of the city but, also, because with growing political understanding, he became increasingly aware of the necessity for healthy and suitable housing for the masses of the population.

In Linz, it had never been a matter of great concern to him how these people, who would be affected by his great building projects, would react to them.

In Vienna, however, he began to build for people. What he explained to me in long, nocturnal discussions, what he drew and planned, was no longer, as it had been in Linz, building for building's sake, but conscientious planning which took into account the needs and requirements of the occupiers.

In Linz, it was still purely architectural building ; in Vienna, social building ; that is how one could describe his progress. This was also due to the merely external factor that Adolf had been fairly comfortable in Linz, especially in the pleasant apartment in Urfahr.

Now, in contrast, in the gloomy sunless back-room of the « Stumpergasse » , in Vienna, he felt every morning when he awoke, looking at the bare walls and depressing view, that building was not, as he had thought hitherto, mostly a matter of show and prestige, but rather a problem of public health, of how to remove the masses from their miserable hovels.

Adolf had told me that, during the past winter when he was still alone in Vienna, he had often been to warmed public rooms in order to save fuel, of which his inadequate stove consumed large quantities without giving much heat.

There, one could sit in a warmed room without payment, and there were plenty of newspapers available. I suppose that Adolf, in his conversations with the people who frequented these places, gained his 1st depressing insight into the scandalous housing conditions of the metropolis.

In our hunt for lodgings which, so to speak, heralded my entry into Vienna, I had had a foretaste of the misery, distress and filth that awaited us.

Through dark, foul-smelling back-yards, up and down stairs, through sordid and filthy hallways, past doors behind which adults and children huddled together in a small sunless room, the human beings as decayed and miserable as their surroundings - this impression has remained unforgettably with me, just as the reverse side of the medal that, in the one house which might have come-up to our sanitary and æsthetic standards, we met that acme of viciousness which, in the person of the seductive « Mrs. Potiphar » , seemed to us more repulsive than the wretchedness of the poor people.

There followed those nocturnal hours in which Adolf, striding up and down between door and piano, explained to me in powerful words the causes of these squalid housing conditions.

He started with the house in which we ourselves were living. On an area which was hardly large enough for an ordinary garden, there were tightly packed 3 buildings, each in the others' way and robbing each other of light, air and elbow room.

And why ? Because the man who bought the ground wanted to make as large a profit as possible. He, therefore, had to build as compactly as possible and as high as possible, because the more of these box-like compartments he could pile one on top of the other, the more income he received. The tenant, in his turn, has to get from his apartment as much value as he can and, therefore, sub-lets some of the rooms, usually, the best ones ; take, for instance, our good « Frau » Zakreys. And the sub-tenants crowd together, in order to have room available for a lodger. So, each one wants to make a profit out of the other, and the result is that all except the landlord have not enough living space. The basement flats are also a scandal, getting no light, sun or air. If this is un-bearable for grown-ups, for children it is deadly.

Adolf's lecture ended in a furious attack on the real estate speculators and the exploiting landlords.

One word which I heard for the 1st time on that occasion still rings in my ears : These « professional landlords » who make a living from the awful housing condition of the masses. The poor tenant usually never meets his landlord, as the latter does not live in these tenements he owns (God forbids) but somewhere in the suburbs, in Hietzing or Grinzing, in luxurious villas where they enjoy in abundance that of which they deprive others.

Another day, Adolf made his observations from the tenant's angle.

What were such a poor devil's minimum needs for a decent home ? Light : the houses must be detached. There must be gardens, playgrounds for the children. Air : the sky must be visible ; something green, a modest piece of nature. But look at our back-building, he said. The sun shines only on the roof. The air - of that we would rather not speak. The water : there is one single tap outside on the landing, to which 8 families have to come with their pails and jugs. The whole floor has one highly-unsanitary lavatory in common, and it is almost necessary to take one's turn in a queue. And on top of all that, the bugs !

When, during the weeks that followed (I had learned in the meantime that he had been rejected by the Academy) , I asked Adolf occasionally where he was during the day, he answered :

« I am working on the solution of the housing problem in Vienna, and I am doing certain research for this purpose ; I, therefore, have to go around a lot. »

During that period, he would often pore-over his plans and drawings throughout the night, but he never spoke about it, nor did I ask him any more questions. But, suddenly, I think it was towards the end of March, he said :

« I shall be away for 3 days. »

He returned on the 4th day, dead tired.

Goodness knows where he had been, where he had slept and how hungry he had been ! From his scanty reports, I gathered that he had approached Vienna from some outlying point, perhaps, from Stockerau or from the Marchfeld, to gain an idea of the land available for the purpose of relieving the city's congestion.

He worked all night again and, then, at long last, he showed me the project.

In the 1st place, some simple ground plans, workers' flats with the minimum requirements : kitchen, living-room, separate bedrooms for parents and children, water laid on in the kitchen, lavatory and, at that time, an unheard-of innovation : a bath.

Then, Adolf showed me his plans for various types of houses, neatly sketched in India ink.

I remember them so clearly because, for weeks, these sketches were hanging on our walls, and Adolf returned repeatedly to the subject.

In our airless and sunless subtenants' existence, I realized more sharply the contrast between our own surroundings and Adolf's attractive light and airy houses. For, as my glance wandered away from these pretty sketches, it fell on the crumbling, badly distempered wall which still showed traces of our nightly bug hunt. This vivid contrast has indelibly printed on my memory the vast and grandiose plans of my friend.

« The tenements will be demolished. »

With this pithy pronouncement, Adolf began his work.

I should have been surprised had it been otherwise, as in everything he planned, he went all out and detested half measures and compromise - life itself would bring these. But his task was to solve the problem radically - that is to say, from the roots.

Private speculation in land would be forbidden. Areas along both banks of the Danube would be added to the open spaces resulting from the demolition of the working-class districts, and wide roads would be laid across the whole. The vast building area would be provided with a network of railway lines. Instead of big railway stations, there would be suitably scattered over the whole territory, and connected with the town centre, a series of small local stations which would cater for specified districts and offer favourable speedy communication between home and place of work. The motor-car, at that time, had not been envisaged as an important means of transport. The streets of Vienna were still dominated by the horse-drawn fiacre. The bicycle was only slowly becoming a cheap and practical means of travel. Only the railways were, in those days, able to provide transport for the masses.

Adolf's design was by no means concerned with the one family or owner-occupier type of house, as is being built today, nor was he interested in « settlement » .

His idea was still based on the old type of tenement house, carved-up into fractions.

Thus, came into being as his smallest unit the 4-family house, a one-storied, well-proportioned structure, containing 2 flats on the ground-floor and 2 on the 1st floor.

This basic unit was the prevailing type. Where conditions required, from 4 to 8 of these units were to be combined to form housing blocks for 8 or 16 families, but these blocks, too, remained « near the ground » , that is to say, they still consisted of 1 story only, and were surrounded by gardens, playing-grounds and groups of trees. The 16-family house was the limit.

Having designed the types of house necessary to relieve the congestion in the town, my friend could now turn his attention to the problem itself.

On a big map of the town, which was too large for the table and had to be spread-out on the piano, Adolf laid-out the network of railways and roads. Industrial centres were marked, residential districts suitably located. I was always in his way when he was engaged on this vast planning job.

There was, indeed, not a square-foot of space in the room that was not utilised for this task. If Adolf had not pursued his course with such grim determination, I would have regarded the whole thing as an interesting but idle pastime. Actually, I was so depressed by our own bad housing that I became almost as fanatical as my friend, and that is no doubt the reason why so many details have remained in my memory.

In his way, Adolf thought of everything. I still remember that he was preoccupied with the problem of whether inns would be necessary or not in this new Vienna. Adolf was as radically opposed to alcohol as he was to nicotine. If one neither smoked nor drank, why should one go to an inn ? In any case, he found for this new Vienna a solution which was as radical as it was bold : a new popular drink !

On one occasion, in Linz, I had to re-decorate some rooms in the office building of the firm of Franck, who manufactured a coffee substitute.

Adolf came to see me, there.

The firm provided the workers with an excellent iced beverage which cost only one heller a glass. Adolf liked this drink so much that he mentioned it, again and again.

If one could provide every household, he said, with this cheap and wholesome beverage, or with similar non-alcoholic drinks, one could do without the inns.

When I remonstrated that the Viennese, from my knowledge of them, would be most unlikely to give-up their wine, he replied brusquely, « You won't be asked ! » as much as to say in other words « Nor will the Viennese either. »

Adolf was particularly critical of those countries, and Austria was one of them, which had established a tobacco monopoly.

In this way, he argued, the State ruined the health of its own subjects ; therefore, all tobacco factories must be closed and the import of tobacco, cigars and cigarettes forbidden. But he did not find a substitute for tobacco as a companion to his « People's Drink » .

Altogether, the nearer Adolf came in his imagination to the realisation of his projects, the more utopian did the whole business become.

As long as it was only a matter of the basic principles of his planning, everything was quite reasonable ; but when he thought out the details of its execution, Adolf juggled with ideas which seemed to me completely nebulous.

Having to pay 10 of my father's hard-earned Crowns for a half-share in a bug-ridden room, I had the fullest sympathy with the idea that in his new Vienna there should be no landlords and tenants.

The ground was to be owned by the State, and the houses were to be not private property but administered by a sort of housing cooperative.

One would pay no rent but instead a contribution to the building costs of the house, or a kind of housing tax. So far, I could follow him.

But when I timidly asked him :

« Yes, but in this way you cannot finance such an expensive building project. Who is going to pay for it ? »

I provoked his most violent opposition.

Furiously, Adolf flung replies at me, of which I understood but little. Besides, I can hardly remember details of these explanations, which consisted almost entirely of abstract conceptions. But what remains in my memory were certain regularly recurring expressions which, the less they actually meant, the more they impressed me.

The principal problems of the whole project were to be solved, as Adolf put it :

« In the Storm of the Revolution. »

It was the 1st time that in our wretched dwelling this ponderous word was uttered.

I do not know if Adolf picked it up from his copious reading. At any rate, at the moment when his flight of ideas would come to a standstill, regularly the bold words « Storm of the Revolution » would crop-up and give a new fillip to his thoughts, though he never paused to explain the phrase. It could mean, I found-out, either nothing or everything.

For Adolf, it was « everything » , but for me « nothing » , until he, with his hypnotic eloquence, had convinced me, too, that it only needed a tremendous revolutionary storm to break-over the tired old earth to bring about all that which had long since been ready in his thoughts and plans, just as a mild rain in late-summer brings the mushrooms springing-up everywhere.

Another ever recurring expression was the « German Ideal State » , which, together with the conception of the « Reich » , was the dominating factor in his thinking.

This « Ideal State » was in its basic principles, both national and social, social above all in respect of the poverty of the masses of the working-class.

More and more thoroughly, Adolf worked on the idea of a State which would give its due to the social requirements of our times.

But the idea remained vague and was largely determined by his reading.

Thus, he chose the term, « Ideal State » (most likely, he had read it in one of his many books) and left it to the future to develop the details of this ideal State, for the time being only sketched in general outline, but, of course, with the « Reich » as its final aim.

Also, in connection with his bold building projects, Adolf 1st adopted a 3rd expression which had already become a familiar formula in that period : « Social Reform » .

This expression, too, embraced much that was still swirling around in his brain in a very un-formed State.

But the eager study of political literature and visits to the House of Parliament, to which he dragged me, too, gradually lent the expression « Social Reform » a concrete meaning.

One day, when the « Storm of the Revolution » broke and the « Ideal State » was born, the long overdue Social Reform would become reality.

This would be the moment to tear-down the tenements of the « professional landlords » , and to begin with the building of his model houses in the beautiful meadows behind Nussdorf.

I have dwelt so long on these plans of my friend's because I regard them as typical of the development of his character and his ideas during his sojourn in Vienna.

To be sure, I realized from the beginning that my friend would not remain indifferent to the misery of the masses of the metropolis, for I knew that he did not close his eyes to anything and that it was quite contrary to his nature to ignore any important phenomenon.

Yet, I would never have believed that these experiences in the suburbs of Vienna would have stirred-up his whole personality so enormously. For I had always thought of my friend as, basically, an artist, and would have understood if he had grown indignant in the face of the masses, who appeared to be hopelessly perishing in their misery, yet, remained aloof from all this, so as not to be dragged down into the abyss by the city's inexorable fate.

I reckoned with his susceptibility, his æstheticism, his constant fear of physical contact with strangers (he shook hands rarely and, then, only with a few people) and I thought this would be sufficient to keep him at a distance from the masses.

This was only true of personal contacts. But with his whole, over-flowing heart, he stood then in the ranks of the under-privileged.

It was not sympathy, in the ordinary sense, he felt for the disinherited.

That would not have been sufficient. He not only suffered with them, he lived for them and devoted all his thoughts to the salvation of these people from distress and poverty. No doubt this ardent desire for a total re-organisation of life was his personal response to his own fate, which had led him, step by step into misery. Only by his noble and grandiose work, which was intended « for everybody » and appealed to « all » , did he find again his inner-equilibrium.

The weeks of dark visions and grave depressions were past ; he was, again, full of hope and courage.

But, for the time being, good old Maria Zakreys was the only person who occupied herself with these plans.

To be exact, she did not really occupy herself with them, for she had given it up as a bad job to try to bring order into this mess of plans, drawings and sketches. She was satisfied as long as the 2 students from Linz paid their rent punctually.

As far as Linz was concerned, Adolf had not contemplated more than to transform it into a fine, attractive town whose distinguished buildings should raise it from its low, provincial standing. But Vienna he wanted to transform into a modern residential town in which distinction and prestige did not matter - this, he left to the Imperial Vienna : what mattered was that the uprooted masses, who had become estranged from their own soil and their own people, should again settle-down on firm ground.

The old Imperial City changed, on the drawing-board of a 19 year old youth who lived in a dark back-room of the Mariahilf suburb, into a spacious, sunlit and exuberant city, which consisted of 4, 8, and 16-family houses.

HITLER AND CULTURE

There can be no doubt that Adolf was, at that time, convinced that he was destined to become an architect.

How he would ever find his way into practice, even with this thorough private study, unable as he was to produce any testimonials and diplomas - this never caused him any worry. We hardly ever spoke about it, for my friend was absolutely sure that, by the time he had concluded his studies, circumstances would have changed (either peacefully or with violence, as a consequence of his « Storm of the Revolution ») to such an extent that formal qualifications would no longer matter, but only actual ability.

Thus, Adolf saw his future clearly before him.

Back in Linz, he had already defeated what he called his school's biased, unjust and idiotic treatment of him, by throwing himself heart and soul into the study of a subject of his own choosing, so he had no difficulty in doing the same here, in Vienna, where a similar situation confronted him. He cursed the old-fashioned, fossilized bureaucracy of the Academy where there was no understanding for true artistry. He spoke of the trip-wires which had been cunningly laid (I remember his very words !) for the sole purpose of ruining his career. But he would show these incompetent, senile fools that he could go ahead without them ! From his salvos of abuse of the Academy, I gained the impression that these teachers, by rejecting the young man, had involuntarily engendered in him more eagerness and energy than their teaching would ever have done.

But my friend had to face another problem : What was he to live on during his years of study ? Many years would pass before he could make himself a position as an architect. Personally, I doubted if, indeed, anything would ever come of my friend's private studies. Admittedly, he studied with incredible industry and a determination which one would have thought beyond the strength of his under-nourished and weakened body. But his pursuits were not directed towards any practical goal. On the contrary, every now and again, he got lost in vast plans and speculations. Drawing a comparison with my musical studies, which were progressing absolutely according to plan, I could only conclude that Adolf was casting his nets far too wide and dragging in anything that had even the remotest connection with architecture ; and he did it, moreover, with the greatest thoroughness and precision. How could all that ever lead to any conclusion - not to mention the fact that more and more new ideas assailed him and distracted him from his professional training.

The contrast between his boundless, un-systematic labours and my precisely regulated studies at the Conservatory did nothing to help our friendship, if only because our respective work at home necessarily led to friction. When, on top of this, Professor Boschetti sent me some private pupils, our disagreements became sharper. Now, one could see, he said, that bad luck was pursuing him ; there was a great conspiracy against him - he had no possibility of earning any money.

One evening (I suppose it was after a pupil of mine had been in for a lesson) , I seized the opportunity to try to persuade him to look around for some remunerative work. Of course, if one is lucky, one can give lessons to young ladies, he began. I told him that without my taking the initiative, Professor Boschetti had sent me these pupils - it was a pity that they had to be taught harmonics rather than architecture. Incidentally, I went on more firmly, if I were as gifted as he was, I would have long since looked around for some part-time job.

He listened with interest, almost as though the whole thing did not refer to him at all, and then I let him have it : drawing, for instance, that was something he really could do, as even his teachers had admitted. What about looking for a job with a newspaper or in a publishing firm ? Perhaps, he could illustrate books, or do sketches for newspapers. He answered evasively that he was glad I credited him with such skill, but anyhow this kind of newspaper illustration was best left to the photographers, for not even the best artist could be as quick as a photographer.

Then, what about a job as a dramatic critic, I continued ?

This was a job which he was actually doing because, after every visit to the Theatre, he came home to me with a very severe and radical, yet, interesting and comprehensive review.

Why should I remain the only inhabitant of Vienna ever to hear his opinions ? He should try to get in touch with an influential paper. But he would have to take care not to show too much bias. What did I mean by that, he wanted to know ?

The Italian, Russian and French Operas, too, had their right to exist, I replied.

One had to accept foreign composers as well, for art has no national frontiers.

We started a heated argument, as whenever music was the topic under discussion I stood my ground ; for I did not speaking for myself alone, but felt that I was the representative of the Institute whose pupil I was.

Although I fully shared Adolf's enthusiasm for Richard Wagner, I could nevertheless not bring myself to reject all the rest. But he stuck uncompromisingly to his point.

I still remember well that, in my excitement, I flung at Adolf the words from the final Chorus of Beethoven's 9th Symphony, « Seid umschlungen Millionen, diesen Kuss der ganzen Welt. » (Oh you millions I embrace you - this kiss I give to the world !)

The work of the artist must belong to the whole world.

So, there was trouble even before he took the job of an Opera-critic, remarked Adolf.

And so, this plan, too, was buried.

Adolf wrote a great deal during this period.

I had discovered that it was mainly plays, dramas actually.

He took the plots from the Germanic Mythology or German history.

But hardly any of these plays were really finished. Nevertheless, it might have been possible to make some money out of them.

Adolf showed me some of his drafts, and I was struck by the fact that he attributed much importance to magnificent staging.

Except for the drama about the coming of Christianity, I cannot remember any one of these plays, but only that they all required an enormous production.

Wagner had accustomed us to the idea of pretentious productions, but Adolph's ideas dwarfed anything devised by the Master.

I knew a thing or two about Operatic production and was not slow to utter my doubts.

With his settings ranging through Heaven and Hell, I explained to him, no producer would accept any one of his plays. He should be much more modest in all that concerned his scenery. Altogether, it would be best for him not to write Operas at all, but rather simple plays, comedies perhaps, which were popular with the public. The most profitable thing would be to write some unpretentious comedy. Unpretentious ? This was all that was needed to make him furious. So, this attempt, too, ended in failure.

Gradually, I came to realize all my efforts were wasted.

Even if I had managed to persuade Adolf to submit his drawings or his literary work to a newspaper editor or a publisher, he would soon have quarreled with his employer, for he could never tolerate any interference with his work, and it would presumably make no difference that he was getting paid for it.

He simply could not bear taking orders from people, for he received enough orders from himself.

So, I chose another way.

Through the generosity of my parents and through the private lessons I gave, I was financially better off than he was, and, therefore, I helped him wherever I could, preferably without his realising it at all, for he was very touchy and sensitive in these matters.

Only on our walks and excursions did he consent to be my guest.

Later, when we had already parted, Adolf found, in Vienna, a very characteristic solution for this problem, which enabled him to make a modest living and still remain his own Master.

As his talent was best suited to drawing works of architecture rather than the human figure, he made most accurate and neat sketches of famous Vienna buildings, such as the « Karlskirche », the House of Parliament and similar subjects, coloured them and sold them whenever he could.

Having no expert knowledge, I cannot give any opinion on the special studies Adolf was, then, pursuing.

Moreover, I was too busy myself to get any real idea of his work. What I noticed, however, was that he surrounded himself increasingly with technical books.

I recall especially a big history of architecture because he loved to choose one of its pictures at random, cover the caption, and tell me what it was, Chartres Cathedral, for instance, or the « Palazzo Pitti » in Florence.

His memory was prodigious ; it never failed him and was, of course, a great advantage in his work.

He worked tirelessly on his drawings. I had the impression that he had already learnt, in Linz, the basic principles of draughtsmanship, though only from books. I do not remember Adolf ever having tried to apply in practice what he had learnt, or ever attending classes in architectural drawing.

He never showed any desire to mix with people who shared his own professional interests, or to discuss with them common problems.

Rather than meet people of specialized knowledge, he would sit alone on his bench in the Schönbrunn Park, holding imaginary conversations with himself about the subject matter of his books.

This extraordinary habit of studying a certain subject and penetrating deeply into its very essence, while anxiously avoiding any contact with its practical application, this peculiar self-sufficiency, reminded me of Adolf's relationship with Stefanie.

His boundless love of architecture, his passionate interest in building remained fundamentally a mere intellectual pastime. Just as he used to rush to the « Landstraße » to see Stefanie when he needed some tangible confirmation of his feelings, so he would escape from the over-powering effects of his theoretical studies into the « Ringstraße » , and recover his inner-equilibrium among its splendours.

As time went on, I came to understand my friend's one-sided preference for the « Ringstraße » , although, to my mind, the impact of such buildings as Saint-Stephen's, or the Belvedere (older and more original in their style) was stronger and more convincing.

But Adolf, altogether, disliked Baroque, as it was too ornate for his taste.

The « Ringstraße » buildings had been constructed after the demolition of the city's fortifications ; that is to say, in the 2nd half of the past Century, and were anything but uniform in style.

On the contrary ! Almost every style was represented.

The House of Parliament was in the Classic, or rather pseudo-Hellenic style, the Town Hall neo-Gothic, and the « Burgtheater » , an object of Adolf's special admiration, late-Renaissance. Yet, they had one thing in common which was especially attractive for my friend-their ostentation.

But the real motive for his unceasing preoccupation with these buildings, his use of the « Ringstraße » as his professional training-ground, was the fact that these buildings of the preceding generation enabled him to study without difficulty the history of their construction, to redraw their plans, to re-erect, so to speak, by his own effort every single structure, and to recall the life and achievements of the great architects of that epoch : Theophil Hansen, Gottfried Semper, Karl von Hasenauer, August Sicard von Sicardsburg and Eduard van der Nüll.

I discovered with apprehension that new ideas, experiences and projects disorganised my friend's professional studies. As long as these new interests had some connection with architecture, they became just part of his general education, but there was much that was diametrically opposed to his professional plans, and, moreover, politics gained an increasingly firm hold on him.

I asked Adolf, occasionally, what connection there was between the remote problems which we encountered during our visits to Parliament and his professional preparation.

He would answer :

« You can build only when you have 1st created the political conditions for it. »

Sometimes, his answers were rather rude.

Thus, I remember him, once, answering my question as to how he proposed to solve a certain problem :

« Even if I had found the solution to this problem, I wouldn't tell it to you because you wouldn't understand it. »

But although he was often brusque, moody, unreliable and far from conciliatory, I could never be angry with him because these unpleasant sides of his character were over-shadowed by the pure fire of an exalted soul.

I stopped asking him questions about his profession. It was much better for me to go quietly my own way and show him my own ideas of how to reach one's goal. After all, I had not even reached the lower-classes of the technical school and had only been to a council school, but just the same, I was now a student at the Conservatory, as good as any boy who had matriculated. But my friend's studies took just the opposite course to mine.

While normally, training for a profession grows more and more specialized in the course of time, Adolf's studies became more general, more diffuse, more abstract and remote from anything practical.

The more tenaciously he repeated his own slogan, « I want to become an architect. » , the more nebulous did this goal become in reality.

It was the typical attitude of a young man who would actually be hindered by a profession in reaching what he feels is his true vocation. That was always the case with my friend.

Books were his whole world. In Linz, in order to procure the books he wanted, he had subscribed to 3 libraries. In Vienna, he used the « Hofbibliothek » so industriously that I asked him once, in all seriousness, whether he intended to read the whole library through which, of course, earned me some rude remarks. One day, he took me to the library and showed me the big reading-room. I was almost overwhelmed by these enormous masses of books, and I asked him how he managed to get what he wanted. He began to explain to me the use of the catalogue, which confused me even more.

Hardly anything would disturb him when he was reading. But sometimes he disturbed himself, for as soon as he opened a book he started talking about it, and I had to listen patiently whether I was interested in the subject or not.

Every now and then, in Linz even more frequently than in Vienna, he would thrust a book into my hands and demand that I, as his friend, should read it. It did not matter so much to him that I should widen my own horizon as that he should have somebody with whom he could discuss the book, even though that somebody was only a listener.

As I have mentioned before, outstanding among his books were the German heroic legends. Whatever his mood or external circumstances, he always came-back to them and read them again, although he already knew them all by heart.

The volume which he had in Vienna was, I believe, entitled : « Legends of Gods and Heroes : the Treasures of Germanic Mythology » .

Already in Linz, Adolf had started to read the Classics.

Of Goethe's « Faust » , he once remarked that it contained more than « the human mind could grasp » .

Once he saw, at the « Burgtheater » , the rarely-performed 2nd part, with Joseph Kainz in the title-role.

Adolf was very moved and spoke of it for a long time.

It is natural that, of Schiller's works, « Wilhelm Tell » affected him most deeply.

On the other hand, strange to relate, he did not like « Die Räuber » very much. He was profoundly impressed by Dante's « Divine Comedy » although, to my mind, he was much too young when he read it.

I know that he was interested in Herder, and we saw together Lessing's « Minna von Barnhelm » . He liked Stifter, partly perhaps because he encountered in his writings the familiar picture of his native landscape, while Rosegger struck him, as he once put it, as too « popular » .

Every now and then, he would choose books which were then in vogue but, in order to form a judgment of those who read them, rather than of the books themselves.

Ganghofer meant nothing to him, while he greatly praised Otto Ernst, with whose works he was familiar.

Of modern plays we saw Frank Wedekind's « Frühlingserwachen » , and « Der Meister von Palmyra » by Wilbrandt.

Adolf read Ibsen's plays in Vienna without being very much impressed by them.

As for philosophical works, he always had his Schopenhauer by him, later Nietzsche, too.

Yet, I knew little about these, for he regarded these philosophers as, so to speak, his own personal affair - private property which he would not share with anybody.

This reticence was possibly also due to the fact that we shared a love of music and this provided us with common ground more rewarding than that of philosophy, which for me was rather a remote subject.

In conclusion, I should like to stress the same point with regard to my friend's reading that I have mentioned before, in describing his professional studies : he read prodigiously and, with the help of his extraordinary memory, stored-up an amount of knowledge which was far above the normal standard of a 20 year old - but he avoided any factual discussion about it.

When he urged me to read a certain book, he knew in advance that I would never be his equal in any argument, and it is even possible that he selected the books which he recommended me to read with this thought in mind.

He was not interested in « another opinion » , nor in any discussion of the book.

His attitude to books was the same as his attitude to the world in general. He absorbed with fervour everything he could lay his hands on, but he took great care to keep at a safe distance from anything that might put him to the test.

He was a seeker, certainly, but even in his books, he found only what suited him.

One day, when I asked him if he really intended to complete his studies by the aid of books alone, he looked at me, surprised, and barked :

« Of course, you need teachers, I can see that. But for me they are superfluous. »

In the further course of this conversation, he called me an « intellectual scrounger » and a « parasite at other people's tables » .

I never felt, and particularly not in those days when we were living together in Vienna, that he was seeking anything concrete in his piles of books, such as principles and ideas for his own conduct ; on the contrary, he was looking only for confirmation of those principles and ideas he already had.

For this reason, his reading, except perhaps the German Mythology, was not a matter of edification, but a sort of check-up on himself.

I remember him, in Vienna, expounding his many problems and usually winding-up with a reference to some book :

« You see, the man who wrote this is of exactly the same opinion. »

HITLER AND THE OPERA

The high-spots of our friendship were our visits together to the « Hofoper » , and memories of my friend are inseparably connected with these wonderful experiences.

The Theatre in Linz saw the beginning of our youthful friendship, and this was re-affirmed whenever we visited the foremost Opera House in Europe.

As we grew older, the contrasts between us made themselves increasingly noticeable and the difference in our family backgrounds, our professional aspirations and our attitude to public and political life separated us more and more. Yet, our fervent enthusiasm for everything that was beautiful and noble, which found its highest-artistic expression in the performances of the Vienna Opera, linked us ever more closely.

In Linz, our relationship had been smooth and harmonious. But, in Vienna, the conflicts and tensions grew, largely owing to our living together in a single-room.

It was fortunate that, at the same time, the influence of our common artistic experience fortified our friendship.

True to tradition, we humble poverty-stricken students had to fight hard for the chance of seeing those performances. It is true that, in theory, there existed cheap tickets for the « Promenade » which, in Vienna, as in Linz, used to be our aim ; but we never got one, not even through the Conservatory. So, we had to pay the full-price (2 Crowns) a lot of money, when one thinks that Adolf, after having paid his rent, was left with 15 Crowns for the whole month. And although we paid full-price, we had to fight hard to get these tickets, the sale of which started only 1 hour before the performance began.

Having finally secured the ticket, there started a rush towards the « Promenade » , which fortunately was not far from the box-office.

It was below the Imperial box and one could hear excellently.

Women were not admitted to the « Promenade » , which pleased Adolf hugely but, on the other hand, it had the disadvantage of being split-up into 2 halves by a bronze railing ; one for civilians, one for the military.

These young lieutenants who, according to my friend, came to the Opera less for the sake of the music than, for social reasons, paid only 10 Hellers for their tickets, while we, poor students, were fleeced 20 times that amount.

This always made Adolf very wild.

Looking at these elegant lieutenants who, ceaselessly yawning, could hardly wait for the interval to display themselves in the foyer as though they had just come out of their box, he said that among the visitors to the « Promenade » , artistic understanding varied in inverse proportion to the price of the tickets. Moreover, the military half of the « Promenade » was never full, while in the civilian half students, young employees and artisans trod on each others' toes.

One disadvantage was that the « Promenade » was usually the haunt of the claque, and this often spoiled our pleasure.

The usual procedure was very simple : a singer who wanted to be applauded at a certain point would hire a claque for the evening.

Its leader would buy their tickets for his men and, in addition, pay them a sum of money. There existed professional claqueurs who « worked » at a fixed rate. So, it would often happen that, at a most unsuitable moment, roars of applause would break-out around us. This made us boil with indignation.

I remember once, during « Tannhäuser » , that we silenced a group of claqueurs by our hissing.

One of them, who continued to shout « Bravo » although the Orchestra was still playing, was punched in the side by Adolf.

On leaving the Theatre, we found the leader of the claque waiting for us with a policeman.

Adolf was interrogated on the spot and defended himself so brilliantly that the policeman let him go, but he was in time to catch-up with the claqueur in question in the street and give him a sound box on the ears.

As nobody was admitted to the « Promenade » in hat and coat, we left them behind when we went to the Opera, to save the cloak-room fee.

To be sure, it was often bitterly cold, coming-out of the over-heated Theatre into the night. But what did that matter after « Lohengrin » or « Tristan » ?

What was most annoying for us was that we had to be home by 10 o'clock, at the latest, if we wanted to save the « Sperrsechserl » (the tip for the concierge) . It took us, according to Adolf's precise calculations, at least 15 minutes to walk home from the Opera and, so, we had to leave there at a quarter to 10. The consequence was, that Adolf never succeeded in hearing the end of those Operas which finished later and I had to play for him on the piano what he had missed.

Richard Wagner's music dreams were still the object of our undivided love and enthusiasm.

For Adolf, nothing could compete with the great mystical world that the Master conjured-up for us.

Thus, for instance, when I wanted to see some magnificent Verdi production in the « Hofoper » , he would bully me until I gave-up my Verdi and went with him to the « Volksoper » , in Währing, where they were doing Wagner.

He preferred a mediocre Wagner performance a 100 times to a 1st class Verdi.

I thought differently, but what was the use ? I had to yield, as usual, for when it was a question of a Wagner performance, Adolf would tolerate no opposition. No doubt, he had heard a much better performance of his work in question (I do not remember whether it was « Lohengrin » or « Tristan ») , at the « Hofoper » . But this was not the point at issue.

Listening to Wagner meant to him, not a simple visit to the Theatre, but the opportunity of being transported into that extraordinary state which Wagner's music produced in him, that trance, that escape into a mystical dream-world which he needed in order to endure the tensions of his turbulent nature.

The standard of the cast and Orchestra at the « Volksoper » was remarkably high and much superior to anything we had been accustomed to in Linz.

Another advantage was that one could get a cheap seat there without having to line-up at the box-office.

What displeased us was the cold, modernistic style of the building, and the dull, un-imaginative inside of the Theatre, which was matched by the lack of glamour in its productions.

Adolf used to call this Theatre : the « Soup-Kitchen » .

Our Theatre-going in Linz had given us the grounding for the full-enjoyment in Vienna of the immortal Master's work. We were thoroughly familiar with his Operas, without having been spoiled and, consequently, the « Hofoper » and even the more modest Theatre in Währing seemed to create anew for us Richard Wagner's world.

Of course, we knew by heart « Lohengrin » , Adolf's favourite Opera (I believe he saw it 10 times during our time together in Vienna) , and the same is true of « Die Meistersinger » . Just as other people quote their Goethe or Schiller, we would quote Wagner, preferably « Die Meistersinger » . We know, of course, that Wagner intended to immortalize his friend Franz Liszt in the figure of Hans Sachs, and to attack his bitter enemy Eduard Hanslick, in the person of Beckmesser.

Adolf often quoted from the 3rd Scene of the 2nd Act :

« And still I don't succeed.
I feel it and, yet, I cannot understand it.
I can't retain it, nor forget it,
And if I grasp it, I cannot measure it. »

In this, my friend saw the unique, eternal formula with which Richard Wagner castigated the want of comprehension of his contemporaries and which, so to speak, applied to his own fate ; for his father, his family, his teachers, although they certainly had « felt » that there was something outstanding about him, for the love of God could not understand it.

And when people had, at long last, grasped what he wanted, they still remained incapable of « measuring » the extent of his will.

These lines were for him a daily exhortation, a never failing comfort which helped him in his dark hours.

We studied, with libretto and score, those works of Wagner that we had not seen in Linz.

So, Wagnerian Vienna found us well-prepared and, naturally enough, we entered at once the ranks of his worshipers, and, wherever we could, we acclaimed the work of the Master of Bayreuth with fervent enthusiasm.

What had been for us the height of artistic experience in Linz was reduced to the level of poor, well-intentioned provincial performances after we had seen the perfect Wagner interpretations by Gustav Mahler at the Vienna « Hofoper » . But Adolf would not have been Adolf if he had contented himself with regretful memories.

He loved Linz, which he always thought of as his home-town, although both his parents were dead and there was only one human being left there to whom he was passionately devoted, Stefanie, who still did not know what she meant to the pale youth who had stood and waited for her, day after day, at the Schmiedtoreck.

The cultural life of Linz had to be brought to a level commensurate with that of Vienna : with savage determination Adolf set to work.

On leaving Linz, he had put great hopes in the Theatre Building Society, of which he had become an enthusiastic member. But these worthies who had got together to give Linz a new, dignified Theatre apparently were making no headway. Nothing was ever heard of it and Adolf's impatience grew. So, he started working on his own.

He took pleasure in applying to his own home-town that style of monumental architecture that he had become familiar with in Imperial Vienna.

He had already removed from the central area of the town the railway station with its ugly work-shops, smoke-stained sheds and cumbersome railway tracks and transferred it to the outskirts. This enabled him to enlarge the Park and add a Zoo, a Palm House and, of course, an illuminated fountain. It was in the centre of this well-tended park that the new Linz Opera House should be erected, smaller in size than the Vienna « Hofoper » , but its equal in technical equipment. The old Theatre was to become a Playhouse and was to be put under the same direction as the Opera. In this way, my friend got over the deplorable conditions of his home-town and all the greater was the enjoyment that he derived from Vienna's artistic attractions.

We saw almost all Richard Wagner's works.

« The Flying Dutchman », « Lohengrin », « Tannhäuser », « Tristan und Isolde », « Die Meistersinger » have remained unforgettable to me, as has « The Ring », and even « Parsifal » .

Occasionally, of course, Adolf saw other Operas as well, but they never meant as much to him as Wagner's.

In Linz, we had already seen a surprisingly good « Figaro », which had filled Adolf with delight. I still remember him saying, on our way home, that the Linz Theatre should in future concentrate on Operas which, like « Figaro », were within their scope.

A production of Mozart's « The Magic Flute », on the other hand, was a complete failure, and Weber's « Freischütz » was so bad that Adolf never wanted to see it again.

But in Vienna, of course, every thing was different.

We saw perfect performances, not only of the Mozart Operas, but also of Beethoven's « Fidelio ». Italian Opera never attracted Adolf, although Italian composers like Donizetti, Rossini, Bellini and especially Verdi, as well as Puccini, who was then still very modern, were highly-appreciated in Vienna and played to full-houses.

The Verdi Operas we saw together were « The Masked Ball », « Il Trovatore », « Rigoletto » and « La Traviata », but « Aïda » was the only one which he liked at all.

For him, the plots of Italian Operas laid too much emphasis upon theatrical effect. He objected to trickery, knavery and deception as the basic elements of a dramatic situation.

He said to me, once :

« What would these Italians do if they had no daggers ? »

He found Verdi's music too un-pretentious, relying too much on melody.

How rich and varied by comparison was Wagner's range ! One day, when we heard an organ grinder playing « La donna e mobile », Adolf said :

« There's your Verdi ! »

When I replied that no composer was safe from such profanation of his works, he barked at me furiously :

« Can you imagine “ Lohengrin ” 's narration on a barrel organ ? »

Neither Gounod, whose « Faust » he regarded as vulgar, nor Tchaikovsky, nor Smetana met with his approval.

No doubt, he was handicapped here by his obsession with German mythology.

He rejected my contention that music should appeal to all races and nations.

For him, nothing counted but German ways, German feeling and German thought.

He accepted none but the German Masters. How often did he tell me that he was proud to belong to a people who had produced such Masters.

When he listened to Wagner's music, he was a changed man ; his violence left him, he became quiet, yielding and tractable.

His gaze lost its restlessness ; his own destiny, however heavily it may have weighed upon him, became unimportant. He no longer felt lonely and outlawed, and misjudged by society. He was intoxicated and bewitched.

Willingly, he let himself be carried away into that mystical universe which was more real to him than the actual work-a-day world. From the stale, musty prison of his back-room, he was transported into the blissful regions of Germanic antiquity, that ideal world which was the lofty goal for all his endeavours.

30 years later, when he met me again, in Linz, his friend whom he had last seen as a student of the Vienna Conservatory, he was convinced that I had become an important conductor ; but, when I appeared before him as a humble municipal employee, Hitler, then, « Reich » Chancellor, said to me :

« So, you have become a pen-pusher ? But you are an artist. We'll talk about it. »

With these words, he was probably alluding to the possibility of my assuming the direction of an Orchestra.

I declined, gratefully. I no longer felt-up to the task.

When he realized that he could not help his friend with this generous offer, he recalled our common experiences in the Linz Theatre and in the Vienna « Hofoper » , which had elevated our friendship from the common-place to the sacred sphere of his own world, and invited me to come to Bayreuth.

I should never have thought that those outstanding artistic experiences of my Vienna student days could still be surpassed. And, yet, this was the case.

For what I experienced in Bayreuth as the guest of the friend of my youth was the culmination of everything that Richard Wagner had ever meant in my life.

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

My friend's interest in music was gratifyingly broadened in Vienna.

Having previously been interested in Opera only, he now turned increasingly to concerts.

To be sure, even in Linz, he had frequented the Symphony concerts organized by the « Musikverein » , and must have heard in those years altogether, say, 6 or 7 concerts. But he came less for the sake of the music than for my sake, as I was playing in the Orchestra, a fact that was important to him. With my quiet, compliant nature, he did not think me capable of playing in public and, each time, he was eager to see the result. At any rate, I remember that, after the performances, he used to speak much more about me than about the concert.

Vienna changed all this, helped by the fact that, at the Conservatory, I was given 2 or sometimes 3 concert tickets every week. Adolf always got one of these, sometimes even 2 or all 3, when I was prevented from going by my evening practice. As these free-tickets were usually for good seats, this was not such a strain as going to the « Hofoper » .

In discussing these concerts with him, I noticed to my surprise that Adolf was developing a taste for Symphonic music. This pleased me because it created for us a new common interest.

The head of the Conductors' School of the Conservatory, Gustav Gutheil, was also the conductor of the Vienna Concert Society. But our special favourite was Ferdinand Löwe, the director of the Conservatory, who occasionally conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra ; he was a great admirer of Anton Bruckner. The musical life of Vienna, at that time, was still dominated by the Brahms-Bruckner controversy, although both Masters had been dead for over 10 years. Eduard Hanslick, the formidable music-critic, whom we always called « Beckmesser » , was also dead, but his pernicious influence was still noticeable. Hanslick who was our declared enemy, if only because he had attacked Richard Wagner violently and not always fairly, had firmly supported Brahms and fought furiously against Bruckner. In Ferdinand Löwe, on the other hand, Bruckner had an inspired partisan ; and, also, Franz Schalk, later director of the Vienna Opera, was a Bruckner supporter.

For our part, we had no difficulty in making-up our minds in this controversy. I loved Bruckner and Adolf, too, was thrilled and moved by his Symphonies. Besides, Bruckner came from our part of the country and, in exalting his work, we were exalting our homeland. Yet, this was no reason for us to reject Brahms. In this dispute, we regarded ourselves as representatives of the younger generation, paid our tribute to both Masters and smiled at the zeal of the older people, which seemed to us utterly superfluous. As for Adolf, he went even further. Just as Bayreuth had become the centre of Richard Wagner's most impressive work, he said, so Linz should become the shrine of Anton Bruckner's works.

The Linz Concert-Hall, plans for which he had just finished, should be consecrated to Bruckner's memory.

Apart from the great Symphonies by the Classical Masters, Adolf liked especially the music of the Romanticists, Carl Maria von Weber, Franz Schubert, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Robert Schumann. He was sorry that Richard Wagner had written only for the stage and not for the concert-hall, so that usually only the Overtures or some of his Operas were performed.

I must not forget Edward Grieg, of whom Adolf was particularly fond and whose Piano Concerto in A minor always delighted him.

In general, Adolf was not very partial to virtuoso performances by soloists.

But certain Concertos he never missed, such as Mozart and Beethoven's Piano and Violin Concertos, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor and, above all, Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor.

EPILOGUE

« I believe that it was the will of God to send a boy from here into the “ Reich ”, to make him great, to raise him up to be the “ Führer ” of the nation. »

(Adolf Hitler)

Later contact with Hitler

After seeing Hitler on the front-page of the « Münchner Illustrierte » (around 1920), Kubizek followed his friend's career with some interest, although he did not attempt to contact him until 1933 when he wrote to congratulate him on having become Chancellor of Germany. 6 months later, Kubizek received an unexpected reply from Hitler, who wrote to his old friend « Gustl », saying :

« I should be very glad to revive, once more, with you those memories of the best years of my life. »

30 After Hitler had broken-off contact with Kubizek, the 2 friends were re-united on April 9th, 1938, during one of Hitler's visits in Linz. The 2 spoke for over an hour at the Hotel Weinzinger and Hitler offered Kubizek the conductorship of an Orchestra, which Kubizek politely refused. Upon learning of his friend's 3 sons, Hitler did, however, insist on financing their educations at the Anton Bruckner Conservatory in Linz. Hitler later invited Kubizek to attend the Bayreuth Festival as his guest, in 1939, and again, in 1940, experiences described by Kubizek as :

« The happiest hours of my earthly existence. »

In 1938, Kubizek was hired by the Nazi Party to write 2 short propaganda booklets called « Reminiscences » about his youth with Hitler. In one episode, Kubizek said Hitler had a great love for a girl named « Stefanie » and wrote her many love-poems but never sent them. Hitler biographer, John Toland, noted that, when Stefanie learned she had been an early object of Hitler's affection, she was stunned.

Kubizek saw Hitler for the last time on July 23rd, 1940, although as late as 1944, Hitler sent Kubizek's mother a food-basket for her 80th birthday.

His friend told him :

« This War will set us back many years in our building programme. It is a tragedy. I did not become Chancellor of the Greater German “ Reich ” to fight wars. »

The « Führer » was speaking after the successful campaigns in Poland and France.

When the tide began to turn against Hitler's favour, Kubizek, who had avoided politics all his life, became a member of the NSDAP in 1942, as a gesture of loyalty to his friend.

After a course of 4 years intensive study at the Vienna Conservatory, I was engaged as assistant-conductor by the Municipal Theatre in Marburg an der Drau and opened my career there with Lortzing's « Der Waffenschmied » .

I was very happy about this 1st, independent job. Although the town was smaller than Linz, it was very interested in art. I produced several good light Operas, of which, in particular, Flotow's « Martha » had a great success.

At the end of the season, I moved, with my Orchestra, to Bad Pystian to conduct the music there for the summer season.

My engagement in Marburg continued for the following season and I was already completely at home in that bright little town.

The support which I encountered on all sides increased my youthful self-assurance and spurred on my enthusiasm. One night, after a 1st performance of « Eva » , the director called me to his box and introduced me to the Head of the Klagenfurt Municipal Theatre, who was looking for an Opera conductor. He was, apparently, so impressed by my performance that he engaged me on the spot for the next season.

So, in the early summer of 1914, at the close of the season in Marburg, on my way home to Linz, I broke my journey in Klagenfurt and made some enquiries about my future sphere of activities.

A good Orchestra, 40 strong, a nice house, a modern stage, and all this in the capital city of Carinthia, renowned for its love of music.

Here, I could give « Lohengrin » , perhaps, even « Die Meistersinger » .

What more could I ask ? Truly, the heavenly violins were, almost literally, already playing for me.

Then, so near to their fulfillment, my youthful dreams disappeared in the fire of the Russian batteries when, a few months later, as a reservist of the Austro-Hungarian Infantry Regiment No. 2, I experienced my baptism of fire on the Galician front.

This was not the music I had dreamed of. Although I was so unsuited to soldiering, I tried, like all my comrades, to do my duty.

This endeavour brought me, after the frightful winter of 1915 in the Carpathians, to the wretched field hospital of Eperjes, in Hungary.

The sick and severely wounded were taken to Budapest, a terrible journey of 7 days ; at all the larger stations, the dead were unloaded.

I had given-up hope and had already calculated at which station they would dump me.

By a miracle, I survived all the horrors and miseries of this journey - but my strength was gone forever.

When, after months of sickness, I was so much improved as to be able to visit my parents again, there too, I found everything changed.

My father, worn-out by work and betrayed in his fond hope of handing-over to his only son the firm he had so painstakingly built-up had given-up the business in 1916 and had bought a small farm at Fraham, near Eferding.

There, he sought to regain his health but, in vain, and, while I was at the front for a 2nd time, in September 1918, he died in all the misery and despair that filled those days.

How I wish I could have made his old age happier !

The end of the War came while I was with a transport formation in Vienna and, here, on November 8, 1918, I was demobilized. What should I do now ?

All the provincial Theatres were closed, so, I travelled to Vienna to look for some kind of job.

To be sure, both the State Theatres were still open, but it was hopeless to try to get a position in one.

The Orchestra in which, for many years, while studying, I had earned my keep as a cellist had been disbanded. Nothing remained but a few dance bands in the big « cafés » .

No, that was no good for me. For some while, I conducted a 6 piece band in one of the new cinemas, a band that was supposed to « provide the musical illustration » for the silent-films, but I got no satisfaction out of this. I tried to get a job as a cellist or, at least, to get some occasional engagements of this kind, but with no success. Nor was there any demand for private lessons.

I was at the end of my tether when a letter came from my mother.

She wrote me that, in the town of Eferding, they were advertising for a Secretary to the Council.

With all her mother's guile, she knew how to make this far from attractive job seem more palatable to me.

She had told the Mayor of my musical ability and added that, in addition, they would like the future Council Secretary to re-organize the « Musikverein » that had broken-up during the War and to undertake its direction.

I went home and looked into the proposition ; the salary was small and the artistic possibilities seemed very limited. But, meanwhile, I had given-up hope of becoming a professional conductor and, mainly to please my mother, I sent in my application. Then, I returned to Vienna still hoping to get into an Orchestra.

There, in January 1920, I received a notification from the Mayor advising me that the job of Secretary to the Council had been awarded to me out of a list of 38 applicants.

Thus, I became a civil servant.

Gradually, I became familiar with the work and, some years later, I passed the Upper-Austrian State examination for municipal employees.

It was a humble job but it left me free to give myself up to my music. I built-up a respectable Orchestra and, soon, the musical life of the little town began to develop very well indeed.

What with the quiet chamber music of a string quartet, the open-air performances of the brass band and the gala performances of the Choral Society there was much satisfying and successful work for me.

Throughout all this period, I never succeeded in getting any news of the friend of my earlier years who had deserted me in such a strange fashion and I had finally given-up trying. Besides, I had no idea how to try to find-out about him.

His brother-in-law, Raubal, was long since dead.

Angela, his sister, was no longer living in Linz. Anything might have happened to my friend.

That he was a better soldier than I had been, I was convinced ; perhaps he, like so many of our generation, had been killed.

Now and again, I would hear talk of a German politician who was called Adolf Hitler. But I thought it must refer to some other man who happened to have the same name.

After all, the name of Hitler was not so un-common. I imagined that if, ever again, I heard of my erstwhile friend it would be to learn that he had become an important architect or, at least, an artist, not just some insignificant politician, least of all in Munich.

Then one evening, as I was crossing our quiet market-square, for no particular reason, I stopped to look into the book-shop.

There, in the show window lay the « Münchner Illustrierte » .

On the front-page was the picture of a man in about the middle 1930's with small, pale features - I recognized him the very first moment.

That was Adolf ; he had hardly changed at all.

I reckoned how long it was since the days when we had lived together on the « Stumpergasse » - 50 years !

The face seemed to have become sterner, more mature, more manly, but hardly any older.

The caption read :

« The well-known National-Socialist orator, Adolf Hitler. »

So, my friend was, in fact, one and the same as that politician of whom there was so much talk. I was very sorry that he, like myself, had not been able to achieve an artistic career. I knew only too well what it meant to bury all one's hopes and dreams.

And, now, he had to earn his living by making speeches at meetings.

A hard job, although he was indeed a good and convincing speaker - I had had proof of that often enough.

I could also understand his interest in politics, but politics was a thankless task as well as being dangerous. I was glad that, if only through my professional position, I was obliged to hold myself aloof from political events as, now, being Town Clerk, I had to work in the interests of all the townfolk alike, without any distinction.

But my friend went full-steam ahead into politics and I was not at all surprised that his stormy activities of which I read in the papers landed him in jail, at Landsberg.

But he turned-up again and the press gave him more space than ever. His political ideas, which gradually found supporters in Austria too, did not surprise me in the least because, fundamentally, they were the same as those he used to expound to me, admittedly still confused and exaggerated, in Vienna.

When I read his speeches, I could actually see him in front of me, striding up and down in the gloomy back-room in the « Stumpergasse », between the door and the piano, holding forth unceasingly.

In those days, I was his only listener ; now, his audience was counted in thousands.

One heard his name everywhere and, soon, they were asking :

« Where does he come from, this Hitler ? »

Well, I was certainly in a better position than many others to tell them.

Did I not still have letters and drawings of his ?

I had forgotten all about them but, now, I climbed-up to the loft and there it still stood, the old wooden chest that had remained in my parents' house, at Fraham, until the time my mother sold the little farm and moved in with me, bringing it with her.

I found the key and unlocked the chest. And, in fact, there lay a large blue envelope bearing the name « Adolf Hitler », written in my hand.

I could not recollect this envelope. In the frightful happenings of the War and the misery that followed I had completely forgotten about it, just as my friend, too, would have faded slowly from my mind if he had not appeared again, as a politician.

I opened the envelope ; there were my friend's post-cards, letters and drawings, though certainly only a part of those I had received from him. But, nevertheless, some well worthy of interest ; I re-read his cards and letters.

What should I do with them ?

Should I send him back the whole correspondence. But why ? He had other things to do now than to warm-up old boyhood memories.

Perhaps, he had long since forgotten the lanky, music-mad carpenter's apprentice whom he had met in the Linz Theatre.

Should I write to him ?

That, too, seemed to me pointless, as even in those days, he had scorned me for my feeble interest in politics and, now, he would be more than ever disappointed in me.

So, I contented myself with reading what the newspapers said about him.

His supporters could now be counted by the million.

Without stepping onto Austrian soil he managed, with his radical conceptions and ideas, to bring excitement and unrest to our shrunken little Austria, and this was even more reason for me to keep quiet.

It might seem incomprehensible that, after Adolf had made himself a name as a politician, I did not immediately try to get in touch with him.

But, yet, looking back, I must say this : our boyhood friendship had sprung from our common interest in art ; politics had no attraction for me and, so, I no longer felt drawn towards Adolf who, in turn, could not be expected to have any interest in me.

Then, on January 30th, 1933, I heard the news that Adolf Hitler had become « Reich » Chancellor. Immediately, I thought back to that night on the Freinberg when Adolf had described to me how he, like Rienzi, would rise to be the Tribune of the people.

What the 16 year old had seen then, in a visionary's trance, had really come to pass.

So, I sat-down and wrote a few lines to « The “ Reich ” Chancellor Adolf Hitler, in Berlin. »

I didn't expect any reply.

A Chancellor had more important things to do than to answer the letter of one August Kubizek, from Eferding, with whom he had been friendly a quarter of a Century earlier.

But it seemed to me, politics apart, the right thing to do as a former friend to congratulate him on the position he had reached.

But, one day, to my great astonishment, I received the following letter :

To the Town Clerk « Herr » AUGUST KUBIZEK, Eferding, Upper-Austria.

ADOLF HITLER

Munich, August 4th, 1933 The Brown House

My dear Kubizek,

I have only just been shown your letter of February 2nd.

In view of the hundreds of thousands of letters I have received since January, this is not to be wondered at.

So much the greater was my pleasure to receive news of you after so many years and to have your address.

I should be very glad (once the period of my hardest struggles is past) to revive, once more with you, those memories of the best years of my life.

Perhaps, you could come to visit me. With all good wishes to you and your mother, I remain, in memory of our old friendship.

Yours, ADOLF HITLER

So, he had not forgotten me.

That, in spite of all the strain of his work, he remembered me made me very happy. He called the years we had spent together the « best years » of his life.

So, he had already forgotten the misery that went with them and only the exuberance of his youth remained a fond memory. But the end of the letter caused me some embarrassment.

He wrote :

« Perhaps, you could come to visit me. »

That was easier said than done. I couldn't just simply go up to his house on the Obersalzberg and say :

« Here, I am. »

Besides, this reunion would only have been a nuisance to him.

What could I have told him ?

My own life, compared with his, was un-important and un-interesting ; to tell him about Eferding would only bore him.

And for the rest, I had nothing to relate.

So, I let the matter rest and persuaded myself that this friendly invitation was just a formal courtesy, like the stereotyped greetings at the end of his letters ; 25 years ago to my parents, now only for my mother.

Of course, it is very nice when a friend is so consistent in his behaviour, but I thought it was nonsense to be equally consistent in the continuance of our friendship, as fate had only too obviously cast us into paths so widely divergent. On March 12th, 1938, however, on the very spot where his father had once served as a customs official, Adolf Hitler crossed the frontier.

The German Army marched into Austria. On the evening of March 12th, Adolf Hitler addressed the assembled populace from the balcony of the Linz Town Hall, which was still as modest and as shabby as it had been in our youth.

I should have liked to have gone to hear him speak, but I was so busy with the billeting of the German troops that I could not leave Eferding.

But, when Hitler came again to Linz, on April 8th, and stayed at the Hotel Weinzinger after a political demonstration at the Kraus locomotive works, I did make an attempt to see him.

The Square, in front of the hotel, was crammed with people, but I made my way through to the cordon of S.A. men and told them that I would like to speak to the Chancellor.

At 1st, they gave me a queer look, probably thinking I was mad.

Only after I had shown them one of Hitler's letters did they prick-up their ears.

They called over an officer and, when he too had seen the letter, he let me through immediately and conducted me to the entrance-hall of the hotel but, in there, it was like a bee-hive ; generals were standing around in groups waiting and discussing events.

Ministers of State whom I recognized from the illustrated papers, high-up Party leaders and other uniformed personalities came and went. A.D.C.s, recognizable by their gleaming shoulder tabs, strode busily about.

And all this exciting activity centred around the man to whom I, too, wished to speak. I became quite giddy and realized that it had been foolish of me to come.

I had to accept the fact that my erstwhile friend had become « Reich » Chancellor and this highest-position in the State had created between us an un-bridgeable gulf.

The years when I had been the only one to whom he gave his friendship and when he had confided to me the most intimate affairs of his heart, were definitely over.

Therefore, the best thing I could do was to disappear quietly and not be a nuisance to these high-ranking gentlemen who un-doubtedly were there on most important missions.

One of the senior A.D.C.s, Albert Bormann to whom I had confided my request, soon approached me and told me that the « Reich » Chancellor was not very well and would not be receiving anybody else that day ; would I come again tomorrow at lunch-time. Bormann, then, invited me to sit-down for a moment as there were things he wished to ask me. Had the Chancellor in his youth always gone to bed so late ? he inquired plaintively ; he never went to bed before midnight and slept far into the morning, whereas his entourage who were obliged to stay-up late with him in the evening had to be up and about early the next day.

Bormann went on to complain about Hitler's outbursts of temper which nobody could cope with and about his queer diet, which consisted of meatless dishes, puddings and fruit juices.

Had the Chancellor always eaten thus ?

I said yes, only adding that, in his youth, he had still been fond of meat.

With this, I took my leave. This Albert Bormann was a brother of the well-known Martin Bormann.

The next day, again, I went to Linz.

Everybody was out in the streets, which were packed with people, and the closer I got to the Hotel Weininger the thicker became the throng.

Finally, I managed to fight my way through to the hotel and, once more, took-up my obscure position in the foyer.

The excitement and agitation was even greater than the previous day.

For this was the eve of the plebiscite in Austria.

It can be imagined that all big decisions had to be taken by Hitler himself.

At any rate, I could not have chosen a more unfortunate moment for our reunion than this.

I recalled that, at the beginning of July, 1908, we had said goodbye in the hall of the « Westbahnhof » ; today was April 9th, 1938. So, almost exactly 30 years had passed between our abrupt separation and today's meeting - always supposing this did take place. 30 years : a whole lifetime ! And what world-shaking events these 30 years had brought.

I had no illusions about what would happen if Hitler did see me.

A brief hand-shake, perhaps, a familiar clap on the shoulder, a few friendly, hasty words in passing - I would have to be satisfied with this modest portion.

For my part, I had prepared a few suitable words but I was somewhat worried about the form of address.

I couldn't possibly call the « Reich » Chancellor, « Adolf » . I knew what a stickler for form he was. It would be best to keep to the formal mode of address.

But, then, I didn't even know if I would get as far as making the little speech.

The memory of what really did happen is naturally influenced by my deep emotional feelings at the time.

As Hitler suddenly came-out of one of the hotel rooms, he recognized me immediately and with the joyful cry, « Gustl ! » , he left his entourage standing there and came and took me by the arm. I still remember how he took my out-stretched right-hand in both of his and held it firmly and how his eyes, which were still as bright and as piercing as ever, gazed into mine.

He was obviously moved, just as I was. I could hear it in his voice.

The worthy gentlemen in the hall looked at each other.

Nobody knew this curious civilian whom the « Führer » and Chancellor greeted with such warmth.

Then, I pulled myself together and delivered myself of the speech I had prepared. He listened attentively, smiling slightly.

When I had finished he nodded at me, as if to say, « You've learnt it well, “ Gustl ” » or, perhaps even, « And, now, my boyhood friend talks to me just like all the others » .

But to me, any familiarity on my part seemed out of place.

After a little pause he said, « Come with me » , using the formal mode of address, « Sie » . Perhaps, through my prepared speech, I had forfeited that familiar « Du » which he had used in his letter of 1933.

But, to tell the truth, I was relieved to hear him use « Sie » .

The Chancellor preceded me to the lift.

We went-up to the 2nd floor where he had his rooms ; the A.D.C. opened the door.

We entered ; the A.D.C. left. We were alone.

Once more, Hitler took my hand, gazed at me for a long time and said :

« You are just the same as you always were, Kubizek. I should have recognized you immediately anywhere. You have not changed at all, just got older. »

Then, he led me to the table and invited me to take a seat. He assured me how glad he was to see me, once again, after so long.

He had been particularly pleased with my congratulations, as nobody knew better than I what a hard fight he had had.

The present moment was not suitable for a heart-to-heart talk, but he hoped to have an opportunity for it in the future.

He would let me know ; it was not advisable to write to him direct as such letters often never even reached him, and all had to be carefully gone through to save his time.

« I no longer have a private life as in those days, and can't do just what I want like other people. »

With these words, he rose and went over to the window which looked-out onto the Danube. The old iron bridge which, even in his boyhood, used to annoy him still stood there. As was to be expected, he started immediately :

He exclaimed :

« That ugly thing, still there ! But not for much longer, you can be sure of that, Kubizek. »

And, then, he turned to me again and smiled :

« Just the same I'd like to stroll across the old bridge with you, once again. But that's no longer possible. Wherever I go, I'm surrounded. But, believe me, Kubizek, I've got a lot of plans for Linz. »

Nobody knew that better than I.

As I expected, he propounded, once again, all the plans which had occupied him in his youth as though not 30 years, but, at the most, 3 years had passed since then.

Shortly before he received me, he had driven through the streets of the town to find-out what alterations there had been. Now, he went through each single plan.

The new Danube bridge, which was to be called the Nibelungs Bridge, was to be a Masterpiece. He described to me in detail the shape of the 2 bridge-heads.

Then, he went on to talk (I knew in advance in which order he would discuss things) of the Theatre which, above everything, was going to be equipped with a modern stage.

When the new Opera House, to be built on the site of the ugly station, was ready, that Theatre would only be used for plays and Operettas.

In addition to this, Linz needed a modern concert-hall if it were to be worthy to be known as the « City of Bruckner » :

« I want Linz to have a leading place in culture and I will see that everything is done to this end. »

I thought that, now, the interview was finished.

But, then, Hitler began to speak of setting-up a grand Symphony Orchestra in Linz and, with this, the conversation suddenly took a more personal turn :

« Now, tell me, Kubizek, what have you become ? »

I told him that, since 1920, I had been a municipal employee and, at that moment, had the job of Town Clerk.

He asked :

« Town Clerk, what's that ? »

I was a bit embarrassed.

How could I describe to him briefly what this job really involved ?

While I was still searching for suitable words, he broke-in :

« So, you've become a civil servant, a pen-pusher ! That's not the right thing for you. What has happened to your music ? »

I answered truthfully that the War we had lost had completely ruined my career. I had to get a different job, or starve.

He nodded grimly and said :

« Yes, the War we lost. »

Then, looking at me, he said :

« You won't end your days as a pen-pusher, Kubizek. »

Moreover, he would like once to have a look at this Eferding place I had mentioned.

I asked him if he really meant it.

He remarked :

« Of course, I will come to see you, Kubizek, but my visit will be for you alone. Then, we will go strolling along the Danube. I can't manage it here - they don't leave me alone. »

He wanted to know if I was still so keen on music.

And, now, I was off on my hobby-horse and I told him at length of the musical activities in our little town. Considering the weighty and world-shaking problems that he had to deal with, I was afraid that my recital would bore him ; but I was mistaken. If, to save time, I mentioned something only cursorily, he interrupted me immediately :

« What, Kubizek, you even give Symphonies in this little Eferding ! But that's marvellous. Which Symphonies have you played ? »

I recounted, Schubert's « Unfinished » , Beethoven's 3rd, Mozart's « Jupiter » Symphony, Beethoven's 5th.

He wanted to know how many strong my Orchestra was and how it was composed, was amazed at the details I gave him and congratulated me on my success.

He exclaimed :

« This is where I must help you, Kubizek. Make me out a report and tell me what you need. And how are you getting on, personally ; you are not hard-up ? »

I replied that, while my job brought in only a modest income, it was enough for my needs and, consequently, I had no personal requests.

Astonished, he glanced-up ; it was obviously new to him that one should have no personal wishes.

« Have you any children, Kubizek ? »

« Yes, 3 sons. »

He shouted, impressed :

« 3 sons. »

He repeated it several times with a most earnest expression :

« So, you've got 3 sons, Kubizek. I have no family. I am alone. But I should like to look after your sons. »

I had to tell him all about my boys - he wanted to know every detail. He was pleased that they were all 3 musically gifted and that 2 of them were also clever draughtsmen.

He said to me :

« I shall make myself responsible for the training of your 3 sons, Kubizek. I don't want gifted young people to have such a hard time of it as we had. You know best what we had to go through in Vienna. But the worst time came for me later on, after we had parted. Young talent must no longer be allowed to perish through sheer poverty. Wherever I can help personally, I do, and all the more when it's a question of your children, Kubizek ! »

I hasten to add here that the Chancellor did, indeed, arrange for the musical studies of my 3 sons at the Bruckner Conservatory, in Linz, to be paid through his office and, on his orders, the drawings of my son Rudolf were examined by a Professor of the Academy, in Munich.

I had reckoned on a hasty hand-shake and, here, we were sitting together for a good hour.

The Chancellor rose. I thought the interview was now at an end, and I rose too.

But he only called in his A.D.C. and gave him instructions concerning my sons ; the A.D.C. took the opportunity of reminding him of his youthful letters which were still in my possession.

And, now, I had to spread the letters, post-cards and drawings out on the table. He was greatly surprised to see the number of mementoes I had and asked how these papers had come to be preserved.

I told him of the black-painted trunk in the attic with the pocket in the lid and the envelope bearing the words, « Adolf Hitler » .

He paid particular attention to the watercolour of the Pöstlingberg.

He explained to me that there were certain clever painters who could copy his watercolours, so, exactly that they couldn't be distinguished from the original.

These people carried-on a flourishing business and could always find fools ready to be taken in ; the safest thing was never to let the original out of my hands.

As there had already been attempts to get this material from me, I asked the Chancellor his opinion.

He answered :

« These documents are your own personal property, Kubizek. No one can claim them. »

This led him to speak of Rabitsch's book. Rabitsch had attended the Linz Technical School, a couple of years after Hitler and, certainly with the best of intentions, had written a book about Hitler's school years.

But Hitler was very angry about it because Rabitsch had never known him personally.

He added :

« You see, Kubizek, from the very beginning, I was not in favour of this book being written ; only those who really know me should write about me. If anybody is indicated for it, it is you, Kubizek. »

And turning to his A.D.C. , he added :

« Make a note of that immediately. »

Then, he once more gripped my hand :

« See, Kubizek, it's really necessary that we should meet more often. As soon as it's possible, I will send for you. »

The meeting was over ; in a state of numbness, I left the hotel.

Unrest entered into my quiet, retired life during the following days and I was to discover that it was not all honey to have been the boyhood friend of such a famous man.

Although I had told hardly anybody about it and was determined to be even more discreet in the future, I was soon to experience the draw-backs of having been a friend of Hitler's.

Already in the previous March, I had had a taste of what was in store for me.

Hardly had Austria become part of the German « Reich » , than, one day, a motor-car drew-up at my house in Eferding.

The 3 men in uniform who got-out of it had come direct from Berlin.

They had instructions from the « Führer » to collect from me all the documents relative to his youth and to take them to the Chancellery so that they could be kept in safety.

Luckily, I did not allow myself to be taken in.

As was now clear to me, Hitler, at the time that attempt at confiscation had been made, had no idea that I was in possession of these papers.

It was the independent move of some Party Office which had learned of my existence. In any case, I refused to hand over the papers to the three S.S. men, which seemed to them hardly believable. Evidently, they had expected to find the people in Austria more pliable than I was.

Their brusque manner did not make the desired impression - and to make matters worse this obstinate civilian wasn't even a member of the Party !

Extraordinary what queer fish the « Führer » had chosen for friends in his youth, they must have thought, as they went-off with empty hands.

It was lucky that I had stood firm against this 1st attack.

Those that followed were easier to parry as I could quote Hitler's own words, that these documents were my own personal property.

In the following months, the various Party Offices tried to out-do each other.

As I now learned, often, when among his intimates the conversation turned on his youth, Hitler would refer them to me. « Ask “ Gustl ” » was the stereotyped reply they would get for anything that concerned his youthful experiences. But, now, this « Gustl » , who had previously been more or less out of reach, had with the « Anschluß » suddenly become a German citizen and well within the grasp of all the political departments.

« Reich » Minister Josef Gœbbels sent a very likable young man to me.

His name was Karl Cerff, but his rank and position I have forgotten. Cerff explained to me that they were preparing the publication of a great biography of the « Führer » , of which I was to be in charge of the period 1904-1908. At the appropriate time, I would be called to Berlin so that I could carry-out this work with the help of acknowledged specialists, meanwhile, they would like me to make a start with detailed notes of my memoirs.

I explained to the young man that I could not possibly find the time then as, since the « Anschluß » , we, municipal employees, were overwhelmed with work. He realized that I didn't wish to bind myself and was very, amused at my way of putting it.

But he exhorted me not to underrate my « unique responsibility to History » , as he expressed it. If I so wished, he could easily get me leave of absence.

This, I refused definitely.

So, he departed, promising to come at a « better moment » . But, as the future only brought « worse moments » , I never saw Karl Cerff again. In any case, he had tried to carry-out his ticklish job with tact and charm.

Much more insistent and unpleasant were the instructions that reached me from Martin Bormann, who seemed to feel himself solely responsible for me and my affairs and kept an anxious watch that no one else should come in contact with me.

His letters and orders read as though he had taken a lease on the life of Adolf Hitler and nobody must say or write one word about it without its being examined and agreed on by him.

When he failed in his attempts to get these documents from me to deposit them with the Party Central Office « where they belonged » , as he wrote, he sent me strict orders that these papers should never be given-up without his permission and that no outsider should be permitted a glimpse of them. For this, I certainly didn't need Martin Bormann's admonition - this had always been my intention.

But, when he instructed me to write-out immediately the memoirs of my youthful friendship with Adolf Hitler and submit the draft to him, then, I replied that I should have Ist to talk this over with Hitler himself. This method was a decided success.

In the future, when I was being pressed by any of these bullying gentlemen, I had only to say :

« Excuse me, but I must first discuss your suggestions with the Chancellor personally. What was the name again ? »

This changed their attitude completely and I was, then, handled with the utmost delicacy and care.

In contrast to this, I recollect my meeting with Rudolf Heß with pleasure. He had come to Linz and invited me to call on him ; he sent a car for me which took me to the « Bergbahn » Hotel on the Pöstlingberg.

« Reich » Minister Heß greeted me warmly.

He exclaimed, beaming :

« So, this is Kubizek ! The “ Führer ” has told me so much about you. »

I sensed immediately that this friendliness was really genuine and heartfelt.

Also, through this visit, I was able to confirm an impression I had that, the closer to the Chancellor a person stood, the more he had been told about me.

Rudolf Heß and « Frau » Winifred Wagner were the most fully-informed about Hitler's youth and, consequently, about me.

The Minister invited me to lunch which was served on the beautiful terrace of the hotel.

After the meal, I had to recount to him all my memories in great detail. He frequently commented and, again and again, asked me questions.

I had the feeling that, in a real, human way, Rudolf Heß was much closer to Hitler than many others and I was glad about this. The other gentlemen, too, who were at the table joined-in and we had an animated and unrestrained conversation, markedly different from those dealings with the officials of the Party Central Office.

I was particularly glad that, from this wonderful spot high above the city, I could point-out to the Minister the position of all the places of which we spoke as they lay before us.

Rudolf Heß made a good impression on me with his simple, straightforward manner which differed so much from the behaviour of other, far less important political personalities.

I was only sorry that he appeared so ill.

Meanwhile, in my own country, too, they seemed to have become aware of me.

To be sure I was still not a Party member, which seemed strange to many, as in their opinion, the boyhood friend of Hitler's should actually have been Party member No. 2.

But, even in those days, politically, I had always been a dubious supporter of my friend, not exactly because I actively disagreed with his politics, but politics did not interest me ; or, rather, I did not understand them.

Naturally, too, I was soon flooded with requests for help and support from people who, for one reason or another, were in trouble and wanted me to intercede for them.

I was willing to help, although I had no illusion about my actual influence over political decisions and it was soon made clear to me that being « a boyhood friend of Adolf Hitler's » was not sufficient title to warrant an active interference in these affairs.

It was pointed-out to me, politely but firmly, that this or that particular matter was quite outside my sphere.

As I expected, the visit to Eferding that Hitler had planned did not take place.

Then, suddenly, my state of resignation, induced more by common sense than by sentiment, was broken into by the unexpected arrival of a registered letter from the « Reich » Chancellery. My heart was thudding as I opened the envelope.

There, in its full-glory, printed on the finest hand-made paper stood what was to become the greatest joy of my whole life.

By the command of the « Reich » Chancellor, I was invited to be present at this year's Richard Wagner Festival, in Bayreuth.

I was to report to « Herr » Kannenberg in « Haus Wahnfried » , on July 25th, 1939.

It had always been my greatest desire to make the pilgrimage to Bayreuth to experience a performance of the great Master, there.

But I was not well-off and with my humble position could never even contemplate such a journey.

And, now, suddenly, I was going !

I arrived in good time for the performance ; the Festival, in 1939, opened with « The Flying Dutchman » . An Orchestra 132 strong - I was bewitched.

The next day, they gave « Tristan und Isolde » , an unforgettable performance.

Thursday, July 27th, « Parsifal » was presented. I had already prepared myself for this, at home, had studied the piano-score and read all the relative literature.

The soft strains of the « Abendmahl » motif were heard, the world around me changed and I lived through the most happy hours of my earthly existence.

With « Götterdämmerung » , on Wednesday, August 2nd, my stay in Bayreuth came to an end. I prepared for my journey home and went, once more, to « Herr » Kannenberg to thank him for his care of me.

He asked me with a meaning smile :

« Must you really leave ? It would be a good idea if you could stay another day. »

I understood his hint immediately and stayed in Bayreuth, till August 3rd.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, an S.S. officer came to fetch me ; it was not far to « Haus Wahnfried » .

In the hall, « Obergruppenführer » Julius Schaub was waiting for me and he led me to a large salon where many people, whom I recognized from the former Linz visit or from the illustrated papers, were present.

There stood « Frau » Winifred Wagner in lively conversation with « Reich » Minister Heß.

« Obergruppenführer » Brückner was chatting with « Herr » von Neurath and several generals.

Indeed, there was a preponderance of military personalities present and it struck me that the general situation was very strained, in particular with regard to Poland, and there was even talk of a resort to arms.

I felt very out of place in this tense atmosphere and the same sinking feeling, like stage-fright, that I had experienced in the Hotel Weininger, in Linz, came-back to me. Probably, the « Reich » Chancellor wanted to exchange a few friendly words with me before he went-back to the capital.

With my heart beating wildly, I prepared a few words of thanks. On the far-side of the hall, were large double folding doors.

Suddenly, the A.D.C. standing by these doors signals to « Obergruppenführer » Schaub, whereupon he leads me forward. The A.D.C. opens both doors and steps aside. « Obergruppenführer » Schaub steps in with me and announces :

« “ Mein Führer ”, here is “ Herr ” Kubizek. »

Saying which, he steps-back and closes the doors behind him.

I am alone with the « Reich » Chancellor.

His bright eyes shine with the pleasure of seeing me again and he comes towards me with a beaming face.

Nothing in his behaviour betrays the immense responsibility which rests on his shoulders ; he seems to me just like any ordinary visitor to the Festival.

He, too, shares that happy atmosphere which pervades Bayreuth.

Now, he takes my right-hand in both of his and wishes me welcome.

This heartfelt greeting on this holy spot moves me so much that I can hardly speak.

My expressions of gratitude must have sounded very awkward and I was much relieved when his friendly, « Well, let's sit-down » , released me from my confusion.

I had to tell him all about my journey to Bayreuth, my visits to the various places associated with Wagner and, of course, in the greatest detail, what I thought of the Festival performances.

In doing this, I recovered my self-control and, now, we were talking in just the same way as we had done in our youth about all that enchanted us.

And this brought him round to the Wagner performances we had seen in Linz and Vienna and he exposed to me his plan to make the work of Richard Wagner available to the greatest possible number of the German people.

Ah, how well I knew these plans from long ago ! In his talks of nearly 35 years ago, their fundamentals were already determined. But, now, it was no longer mere fantasy.

6,000 people, he told me, who had previously never been able to afford it were, this year, as a result of excellent organization, among the guests at the Bayreuth Festival. I replied that I, myself, was among the number. He laughed and said (I remember his words exactly) :

« Now, I have you as my witness in Bayreuth, Kubizek, for you were the only one present when as a poor, unknown person, I first gave utterance to these ideas. In those days, you used to ask me how these plans could be realized. And, now, you can see what has come of it. »

He went on to describe to me all that had been done up till then, and what was still going to be done for Bayreuth, almost as though he had to render account to me.

But, now, I had a very concrete problem. In my pocket was a large bundle of post-cards, bearing his picture.

In Eferding and Linz, there were a great number of worthy people whom I could make happy with a photograph with Hitler's autograph.

For some time, I hesitated to bring-out the cards as my desire seemed, then, very common-place.

On the other hand, Hitler was just sitting there at his desk ; if I missed this opportunity, perhaps, I should never get such a one, again. I thought of the people at home and plucked-up courage.

He took the cards and, as he looked for his glasses, I handed him my fountain pen. Then, he signed and I helped him by drying the signatures with the blotting pad.

In the middle of signing the cards, he looked-up, and seeing me standing by with the up-lifted blotter, said smilingly :

« One can see that you're a pen-pusher, Kubizek. But I just don't understand how you can stick to that job. In your place, I'd have cut loose long ago. And, incidentally, why didn't you come and see me much earlier ? »

I was very embarrassed and searched for a suitable excuse.

I said :

« Seeing that you wrote me on the 4th of August, 1933, that you would like to revive our common memories but only when the period of sternest struggle was over. I wanted to wait until then. Besides, until 1938, as an Austrian subject, I would have needed a passport to come to Germany. And I certainly should not have got that if I had revealed the true purpose of my visit. »

He laughed heartily and answered :

« Yes, politically, you were always a child. »

I, too, laughed now because I had expected him to use a different word.

The « fool » of the « Stumpergasse » had, meanwhile, become a « child » .

Then, the « Reich » Chancellor packed the cards together, and got-up.

I thanked him and put them carefully in my coat pocket. Now, I thought, the interview was at an end. Then, he said solemnly :

« Come ! »

He opened the french windows and preceded me into the garden, down the stone steps. Well-tended paths brought us to a high, wrought-iron gate. He opened it.

There, were flowers and shrubs in full-bloom, and the mighty trees, forming a roof above us, threw the place into semi-darkness.

A few more paces and we stood in front of Richard Wagner's tomb.

Hitler took my hand and I could feel how moved he was.

It was quite still ; nothing disturbed the solemn peace.

Hitler broke the silence :

« I am happy that we have met, once more, on this spot which always was the most venerable place for us both. »

I pondered on the inscrutable ways of destiny.

Whoever had known us both, in those days in Vienna, must have been certain that my future was, to all intents and purposes, predictable.

After finishing at the Conservatory, I would start my career as an Opera conductor, a career to which my early successes pointed.

It must have seemed equally certain that Adolf, with his purposeless studies and his disdain for all professional training, would turn-out a failure.

Now, fate had given its verdict.

Here, at Richard Wagner's tomb stood, hand in hand, the 2 poor unknown students from the dark back-room of the « Stumpergasse » .

And what were they now ? The « dead cert » was a little insignificant clerk in a small Austrian town who also dabbled in music ; and the other whose future had been so much in doubt had risen to be the Chancellor of the « Reich » .

And what did the future have in store for us ?

Only one thing could be safely predicted : while the one would remain in his obscurity, whatever might happen the other would go down in history.

Afterwards, the « Reich » Chancellor showed me around « Haus Wahnfried » .

Wieland Wagner, « Frau » Winifred's son and the Master's grandson, was waiting for us at the garden entrance.

He unlocked the various rooms for us and the Chancellor showed me all the relics.

We started our tour with the old building, whose rooms were already familiar to me from pictures.

In the music-room, there was the grand piano at which the Master had worked ; it was left open, a gesture which moved me deeply. I saw also the magnificent library.

Then, Wieland left us and the Chancellor introduced me to « Frau » Wagner, who was obviously pleased to meet me. When our conversation turned on the youthful enthusiasm with which we had dedicated ourselves to the works of the Master, I recalled again that memorable « Rienzi » performance, in Linz. And, now, Hitler evoked for « Frau » Wagner the unique experience of that night, concluding with the words that have remained engraved in my memory :

« In that hour, it began. »

Before we parted, Hitler gave me a few more words of advice.

On my way home, he said, I should stop in Munich and hear the « Reich » Symphony Orchestra, which had been so much on our minds when we were young, and I should also visit the great German Art Exhibition.

He thought it would not be a good thing for us to meet in his home on the Obersalzberg, so he had given orders that I should always be able to come to Bayreuth when he was there.

He said :

« I should like you to be always here, with me. »

And shook me by the hand.

He stood at the garden gate and waved to me as I went.

Soon, I heard the cheers of the crowds greeting him on the « Richard-Wagner-Straße » - the Chancellor was leaving Bayreuth to fly to Berlin.

When, on July 8th, 1940, I received the tickets for the 1st cycle of the Richard Wagner Festival which the Chancellor's office had sent me, I was faced with a dilemma.

War had brought changes to our service and duties at home, too ; would it not be irresponsible of me to leave my urgent tasks to go to Bayreuth ?

True, the Chancellor had expressed the desire to have me, there, with him.

But there was a War on, and nobody was more occupied with it than Hitler himself. Would he even be able to come ? Unlike the previous year, apart from « The Flying Dutchman » , only « The Ring » was performed.

« Frau » Wagner informed me that she had spoken to the « Führer » on the telephone and confirmed that he would be flying straight from his Head-quarters to the performance of « Götterdämmerung » but had to return immediately afterwards.

She added :

« He asked me whether you were here, “ Herr ” Kubizek. He wants to talk to you during the interval. »

On Tuesday, July 23rd, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the trumpets (provided for the occasion by the « Wehrmacht ») sounded the Siegfried motif, announcing the beginning of the Opera. I took my seat and, shortly after, Hitler entered his box.

The « Awakening Motif » , the solemn, fateful tones swelled-out. I forgot my surroundings and gave myself up to the magic of the wonderful work.

During the 1st interval, Wolfgang Wagner came hurriedly to tell me that the « Führer » wanted to see me.

We went to the drawing-room where there were about 20 people standing around in groups engaged in lively conversation.

I could not spot Hitler immediately as he was no longer in civilian clothes but in uniform.

But his personal A.D.C. had already told him of my presence and he came towards me with both hands out-stretched.

He wore a simple grey-green tunic and his face was fresh and sunburnt.

His delight at seeing me seemed to be even deeper, more heartfelt. Perhaps, the War had made him even more serious.

And I represented for him one who had known his youth, a friend who had been at his side during one period of his life.

Hitler took me aside and we stood alone while the other guests continued their conversations at a distance.

He said :

« This year, this is the only performance which I can see. But it can't be helped, there's a War on. »

And, then, with an undertone of anger in his voice :

« This War is holding-up our work of reconstruction for many years. It is a shame. After all, I have not become the Chancellor of the Greater German " Reich " to make war. »

I was astonished to hear the Chancellor speak in this way after the great military victories in Poland and France. Perhaps, he was influenced by the fact that my presence reminded him of his age ; for we had been young together and, as he noticed in me the unmistakable signs of the advancing years, he must have realized that the years must also have left their mark on him, although, in all the time of our acquaintance, I had never seen him looking so strong and healthy.

« This War is robbing me of my best years. You know my plans, Kubizek, you know how much I still want to build. That's what I want to see in my lifetime, you understand ?

You know best how many projects I have made ever since I was young. And only a few of them have I been able to realize so far. I still have so infinitely much to do. Who else is there to do it ?

And, here, I have to stand by and watch the War robbing me of my best years. It is a shame. Time doesn't stand still. We are growing older, Kubizek. Not many more years - and it will be too late to do what remains to be done. »

And with that strangely excited voice so familiar to me from our early years, vibrating with impatience, he began to detail for me his great plans for the future, the development of the « Autobahnen » , of canals, the modernisation of the railways and much else. I was hardly able to follow.

But, once again, as in the previous year, I felt that he wanted to justify himself before me, the witness of his youthful ideas.

I tried to turn the conversation to the experiences we had shared in our youth.

He immediately picked-up a remark of mine and said :

« Poor students, that's what we were. And, Heaven knows, we starved. Off, we used to go with only a crust of bread in our pocket. But all this has changed now. It was only last year that young people went to Madeira in our ships. »

And, so, Hitler came to speak of his cultural plans.

The crowds in front of the Festival Theatre were wanting to see him.

But he had worked himself up to such a state that it was not possible to interrupt him, perhaps, because he felt, just as in our conversations in the gloomy room of « Frau » Zakreys, that I followed him with full-enthusiasm whenever he spoke of art and its problems.

He concluded :

« I am still tied-up by the War. But, I hope it won't last much longer and, then, I'll be able to build again and to carry-out what remains to be done. When that moment comes, I shall call you, Kubizek, and, then, you must stay with me always. »

Outside the trumpets sounded to remind us that the performance was about to continue. I thanked the Chancellor for this demonstration of his friendship and wished him luck and success for the future.

The « Götterdämmerung » came to an end ; it was a performance that moved me to the core.

I walked slowly down the drive leading from the Theatre and noticed that the street was roped-off.

I stopped at the corner of « Adolf-Hitler-Straße » to see the Chancellor, once more.

A few minutes later, a motor column approached along the street. Hitler stood erect in his car ; on either side, close to the ropes, moved the cars of his entourage.

I shall never forget what happened during the next few moments. « Generalmusikdirektor » Karl Elmendorf with « Frau » Lange and Sister Susi, and an old lady, a painter, whose name I don't remember (she was living in the « Haus Wahnfried ») stood with me and congratulated me. I didn't really know why. But, now, the motor column had reached us and was passing at a slow pace.

I was standing near the cordon and I saluted.

At this moment, the Chancellor recognized me and made a sign to the driver.

The column halted and his car approached me.

Hitler smiled at me, leaned-out of his car and, taking my hand, shook it heartily, saying :

« Auf Wiedersehen. »

And as the car moved-off, Hitler turned round and waved farewell.

Then, the column proceeded to the air-field.

Pandemonium broke-out around me.

The by-standers wanted to know who that strange civilian was to whom Hitler had paid so much attention in public. I myself was hardly able to utter a word.

The shouting and pushing grew frightening. Up to this moment, my meetings with the Chancellor had always been in private or, at the most, in the presence of a limited number of people, which had preserved the personal and intimate character of our friendship.

But, now, it had become, so to speak, a matter of public interest and, only now, did I fully understand how much this friendship of my youth really meant.

Everybody wanted to shake hands with me.

My friends tried to give some explanations to the crowd - in vain ! They were unable to make themselves heard.

I was being pushed and knocked about - everybody wanted to see me. Heaven knows what the people thought I was. Perhaps, a foreign diplomat who had come to offer peace - this, at least, would have made the pushing worth while. At long last, I could breathe more freely.

I shouted :

« Ladies and gentlemen, let me go - I'm only a boyhood friend of his ! »

On that 23rd of July, 1940, I saw Hitler for the last time.

Eduard Bloch

Le docteur juif autrichien Eduard Bloch est né le 30 janvier 1872 à Frauenberg, en Bohême du Sud (aujourd'hui, Hluboká nad Vltavou, en République tchèque) ; et est mort 1er juin 1945 dans le Bronx, New York. Il a pratiqué la médecine à Linz, capitale de la Haute-Autriche. Jusqu'en 1907, Bloch est le médecin de la famille d'Adolf Hitler. Plus tard, après l'annexion de l'Autriche par les Nazis, Hitler assurera une protection spéciale pour Bloch.

Eduard Bloch étudie la médecine à Prague, puis sert comme médecin-officier dans l'armée autrichienne. En 1899, il est en poste à Linz, où il ouvre en 1901, après sa démobilisation, un cabinet médical privé au n° 12 de la « Landstraße », dans une maison de style Baroque, qui sert aussi d'habitation pour lui et sa petite famille : sa femme Emilie (née Kafka) et leur fille Gertrude (« Trude »), née en 1903.

Selon le futur maire de Linz, Ernst Koref, Bloch est particulièrement apprécié par ses patients, principalement par ceux des classes sociales inférieures et les indigents. Il est connu pour se déplacer, même au milieu de la nuit, pour visiter ses malades, en utilisant pour ses visites son « hansom cab » et portant un ostensible chapeau à large bord. Comme la plupart des Juifs de Linz, la famille Bloch est parfaitement assimilée.

Le 1er membre de la famille Hitler que Bloch va voir est le jeune Adolf. En 1904, Hitler est sérieusement malade et est alité avec une sérieuse infection des poumons. Pour cette raison, Hitler est autorisé à abandonner ses études à l'école et à rester chez lui. Cependant, plus tard, en consultant le dossier médical d'Hitler, Bloch affirmera qu'il ne l'a alors soigné que pour des maladies bénignes, rhumes ou angines, et qu'Hitler n'était ni robuste ni chétif. Il affirmera aussi qu'Hitler n'a jamais eu aucune maladie grave quelle qu'elle soit, et encore moins de maladie pulmonaire.

En 1907, la mère d'Hitler, Klara, est diagnostiquée avec un cancer du sein. Elle meurt le 21 décembre dans de grandes souffrances, qui nécessitent des sédatifs souvent donnés par Bloch. En raison de la situation économique de la famille d'Hitler à cette époque, Bloch a travaillé en réduisant ses honoraires, et même parfois sans se faire payer. Hitler qui a alors 18 ans, lui accorde sa gratitude éternelle (« Ich werde Ihnen ewig dankbar sein ») . Il le confirmera dans une carte postale de 1908 écrite à Bloch. Le jeune Hitler exprimera aussi sa gratitude et son respect en offrant à Bloch un de ses tableaux, qui, d'après la fille de Bloch, Gertrude Kren (née en 1903, en Autriche ; décédée en 1992, aux États-Unis) , a été perdu lors des différents déménagements. Même en 1937, Hitler se renseigne sur la situation de Bloch et l'appelle « Edeljude » (noble Juif) .

Bloch aussi a apparemment une certaine affection pour la famille d'Hitler, ce qui va lui servir dans le futur.

Après l'« Anschluß » (l'annexion de l'Autriche par le 3e « Reich ») , en mars 1938, la vie devient très difficile pour les Juifs autrichiens. Le cabinet de Bloch est fermé le 1er octobre. La fille et le gendre de Bloch (son jeune assistant, le docteur Franz Kren : né en 1893, en Autriche ; décédé en 1976, aux États-Unis) émigrent vers les États-Unis.

Bloch, qui a alors 66 ans, écrit à Hitler pour lui demander de l'aide. En réponse, il est mis sous la protection spéciale de la « Gestapo » . C'est le seul Juif de Linz avec ce statut. Bloch reste à la maison avec sa femme, sans être importuné, jusqu'à ce que toutes les formalités pour son émigration aux États-Unis soient réglées.

Sans aucune ingérence des autorités, ils vendent leur maison pour une somme assez importante. Cependant, ils ne sont autorisés à sortir d'Autriche que la somme de 16 « Reichsmark » ; normalement pour les Juifs, la somme maximale était fixée à 10 « Reichsmark » .

En 1940, Bloch émigre en Amérique et s'installe dans le Bronx, au 2755 Creston Avenue, New York City, mais ne peut exercer en tant que médecin car son diplôme médical n'est pas reconnu. Il meurt d'un cancer de l'estomac à 73 ans, en 1945, pratiquement 1 mois après la mort d'Hitler. Il est enterré au cimetière juif « Beth David » (section D, bloc 3) , à Elmont, New York.

En 1941 et en 1943, Bloch est interrogé par l' « Office of Strategic Services » , l'ancêtre de la « Central Intelligence Agency » , qui désire obtenir des informations sur la jeunesse d'Hitler.

Bloch publie aussi ses mémoires sur sa rencontre avec celui qui deviendra plus tard, le « Führer » , dans la revue « Collier's Weekly » dans lesquelles il fait un tableau remarquablement positif du jeune Hitler, affirmant qu'il se comportait très correctement et qu'il n'était pas un voyou :

« Ceci n'est simplement pas vrai. Quand il était jeune, il était calme, se comportait bien et était habillé avec soin. Il attendait patiemment dans la salle d'attente jusqu'à ce que ce soit son tour puis, comme tous garçons de 14 ou 15 ans, s'inclinait et toujours remerciait le docteur poliment. Comme les autres garçons de Linz, il portait un “ Lederhose ” court et un chapeau vert en laine avec une plume. Il était grand et pâle et paraissait plus grand que son âge. Ses yeux qu'il avait hérités de sa mère, étaient grands, mélancoliques et méditatifs. Dans une certaine mesure, ce garçon vivait renfermé sur lui-même. Quels rêves rêvait-il, je ne sais pas. »

Il indique aussi que le trait le plus frappant d'Hitler, était son amour pour sa mère :

« Bien qu'Hitler ne soit pas dans le sens usuel du terme un garçon à sa maman, je n'ai jamais été témoin d'un attachement aussi profond. Son amour était mutuel. Klara Hitler adorait son fils. Elle l'encourageait à suivre sa propre voie chaque fois que c'était possible. Par exemple, elle admirait ses peintures à l'eau et ses dessins et soutenait ses ambitions artistiques, à l'opposé de son père, quel qu'en soit le coût pour elle-même comme on pouvait le supposer. »

Cependant, Bloch conteste expressément que l'amour d'Hitler pour sa mère soit pathologique.

Dans ses mémoires, il mentionne qu'Hitler était « l'homme le plus triste qu'il n'ai jamais vu » lorsqu'il apprit la mort imminente de sa mère. Il se souvient que Klara Hitler était une femme pieuse et bienveillante. « Elle se retournerait dans sa tombe si elle savait ce qu'il est devenu. » Selon Bloch, après la mort de son père, les ressources financières de la famille étaient maigres. Il écrit que Klara Hitler ne se permettait pas la moindre extravagance et vivait frugalement.

En dépit de l'affection évidente qu'Hitler montrait pour Bloch, l'historien Rudolph Binion croit qu'il fut l'un des facteurs contribuant à l'antisémitisme d'Hitler, qui conduisit plus tard à la « Shoah » . À l'opposé, l'historienne Brigitte

Hamann soutient que l'antisémitisme d'Hitler s'est forgé plus tard, durant les années à Vienne du futur dictateur.

Parmi les autres connaissances de Bloch, on trouve Hedda Wagner, auteure et militante pour les droits des femmes, qui écrivit un livre qui lui est dédié.

Le roman « 1940 » de l'écrivain Jay Neugeboren se passe dans le Bronx et traite d'événements autour d'Eduard Bloch.

...

The Austrian doctor Eduard Bloch was born on 30 January 1872 in Frauenberg, Southern Bohemia (today, Hluboká nad Vltavou, in the Czech Republic) ; and died on 1 June 1945, in Bronx County, New York. He practiced in Linz, the capital of Upper-Austria. Until 1907, Bloch was the physician of Adolf Hitler's family. Hitler later awarded Bloch special protection after the Nazi union of Austria and Germany (« Anschluß ») .

Bloch studied medicine in Prague and, then, served as a medical officer in the Austrian army. In 1899, he was stationed in Linz and opened a private doctor's practice after his discharge in 1901, in the Baroque house at number 12 on the « Landstraße » , where he also lived with his family : his wife, Emilie (« née » Kafka) and their daughter Gertrude, born in 1903. According to Linz's future mayor Ernst Koref, Bloch was held in high-regard, particularly among the lower and indigent social classes. It was generally known that, at any time at night, he was willing to call on patients. He used to go on visits in his hansom, wearing a conspicuous broad brimmed hat. Like most Jews in Linz, at the time, the Bloch family were assimilated.

The 1st member of the Hitler family Bloch was to see was little Adolf. In 1904, Hitler had become seriously ill and was bedridden due to a serious lung ailment. Due to this, he was allowed to abandon his school career and return home. However, after checking Hitler's files, Bloch later maintained that he had treated the youth for only minor ailments, cold or tonsillitis and that Hitler had been neither robust nor sickly. He also stated that Hitler did not have any illness whatsoever, let alone a lung disease.

In 1907, Hitler's mother, Klara, was diagnosed with breast cancer. She died on 21 December after intense suffering involving daily medication with iodoform, a foul-smelling and painful corrosive treatment typically used at the time, and administered by Bloch. Because of the poor economic situation of the Hitler family, Bloch charged reduced prices, sometimes taking no fee at all. The, then, 18 year old Hitler granted him his « everlasting gratitude » for this (« Ich werde Ihnen ewig dankbar sein ») . This showed in 1908 when Hitler wrote Bloch a postcard assuring him of his gratitude and reverence which he expressed with hand-made gifts, as for example, a large wall painting which, according to Bloch's daughter Gertrude (« Trude ») Kren (born in 1903, in Austria ; died 1992, in the United States) was lost in the course of time. Even in 1937, Hitler inquired about Bloch's well-being and called him an « Edeljude » (noble Jew) . Bloch also apparently had a special fondness for the Hitler family which was to serve him well in the future.

After Germany's union with Austria (« Anschluß ») , in March 1938, life became harder for Austrian Jews. After Bloch's medical practice was closed on 1 October 1938, his daughter and son-in-law, Bloch's young colleague Doctor Franz Kren (born in 1893, in Austria ; died in 1976, in the United States) , emigrated overseas.

The 62 year old Bloch, then, wrote a letter to Hitler asking for help and was as a consequence put under special protection by the « Gestapo » . He was the only Jew in Linz with this status. Bloch stayed in his house with his wife undisturbed until the formalities for his emigration to the United States were completed. Without any interference from the authorities, they were able to sell their family home at market value, highly-unusual with the distress sales of emigrating Jews at the time. However, they were allowed to take only the equivalent of 16 « Reichsmark » out of the country ; the usual amount allowed to Jews was a mere 10 « Reichsmark » .

In 1940, Bloch emigrated to the United States and settled in the Bronx, at 2755 Creston Avenue, New York City, but was no longer able to practice medicine as his medical degree from Austria-Hungary was not recognized. He died of stomach cancer in 1945, at age 73, barely 1 month after Hitler's death. He is buried in « Beth David » Cemetery (Section D, Block 3) , Elmont, New York.

In 1941 and 1943, Bloch was interviewed by the Office of Strategic Services (a predecessor of the Central Intelligence Agency) to get information about Hitler's childhood.

He also published his memories about the encounter with the later « Führer » in the « Collier's Weekly » in which he painted a remarkably positive picture of young Hitler, saying that he was neither a ruffian nor untidy nor impolite :

« This simply is not true. As a youth, he was quiet, well-mannered and neatly dressed. He waited patiently in the waiting-room until it was his turn, then, like every 14 or 15 year old boy, bowed as a sign of respect, and always thanked the doctor politely. Like many other youngsters of Linz, he wore short “ lederhosen ” and a green woolen hat with a feather. He was tall and pale and looked older than his age. His eyes, which he inherited from his mother, were large, melancholic and thoughtful. To a very large extent, this boy lived within himself. What dreams he dreamed, I do not know. »

Bloch also said that Hitler's most striking feature was his love for his mother :

« While Hitler was not a mother's boy in the usual sense, I never witnessed a closer attachment. Their love had been mutual. Klara Hitler adored her son. She allowed him his own way whenever possible. For example, she admired his watercolor paintings and drawings and supported his artistic ambitions in opposition to his father at what cost to herself one may guess. »

However, Bloch expressly denies the claim that Hitler's love for his mother was pathological.

In his memory, Hitler was the « saddest man I had ever seen » when he was informed about his mother's imminent death. He remembered Klara, Hitler's mother, as a very « pious and kind » woman.

« Sie würde sich im Grabe herumdrehen, wenn sie wüßte, was aus ihm geworden ist. »

(She would turn in her grave if she knew what became of him.)

According to Bloch, after Alois Hitler's death, the family's financial resources were scarce. He mentioned that Klara had lived frugally and had not indulged in even the smallest extravagance.

Despite the obvious affection Hitler showed to Bloch, the historian Rudolph Binion believes that he was one of the contributing factors to Hitler's anti-Semitism that, later, resulted in the Holocaust. Historian Brigitte Hamann takes the opposite view, arguing that Hitler's anti-Semitism coalesced later, after Hitler's years in Vienna.

Among the other acquaintances of Bloch was Hedda Wagner, an author and supporter of women's rights, who wrote a book dedicated to him. Writer Jay Neugeboren set his novel « 1940 » in the Bronx and focuses on events surrounding Eduard Bloch.

Resumee of interview with Doctor Eduard Bloch (March 5th, 1943)

It was definitely established that Doctor Eduard Bloch treated the Hitler family, in 1906 and 1907 (possibly, also, previous to this date) .

At that time, Hitler's father was dead already. Doctor Bloch's impressions of the family life, « quiet, the only bone of contention being Adolf, who refused to become an official and wanted to become an artist ; his mother backing him against his father » seem to be based on his reading of Heiden's biography rather than on actual knowledge.

The mother was a big, stoutish woman, very pious and kind.

« Sie würde sich im Grab umdrehen, wenn sic wüßte, was aus ihm geworden ist. »

Adolf was a source of worry to her, yet, she seems to have complied with all his deficiencies.

« Wißen Sie, Herr Doktor, der Adolf ist halt noch zu jung. »

The sisters were married already, at that time, and did not live at home any more.

Mother and son lived in a rented apartment, small place, rather poor ; the pension afforded a modest income on which they could just manage to live.

« Eines ist sicher : er (Adolf) hat seine Mutter abgoettisch geliebt ! »

Doctor Bloch stresses that the relationship between mother and son, their reciprocal adoration, was unusual.

Klara Hitler was her husband's 2nd cousin ; daughter of a cousin (?) ; she had been brought-up in his house and seems to have taken care of the household during, at least, his 2nd marriage, possibly also during his 1st ; after his 2nd wife's death, he married her and changed his name. Allegedly for an inheritance (Heiden ??) . She had been her husband's foster daughter since she had been an orphan.

She died from a cancer in her breast ; she was operated on, but it was too late since there were already metastases in the pleura.

Her illness was very painful ; during the last months, Doctor Bloch gave her an injection every day.

No physical deformity ; definitely no tuberculosis ; though tuberculosis was hereditary in the family from the father's side.

Not afraid of the Doctor.

Very good behaviour towards the Doctor. But difficulties at school, always quarrels with school-mates. Allegedly got a hiding from a class-mate, name of Hatschek (Eternit-Hatschek) , who, according to Doctor Bloch, was very much afraid of retaliation when Hitler annexed Austria. Made a gift to the « Gestapo » of his villa (??) .

Difficulties at school obviously a fact. Here, Doctor Bloch speaks of something he knows and he was familiar with, at the time. Adolf did not learn anything ; except drawing and history.

« Das hat mir sein Professor selbst erzählt ... »

During his mother's illness, he had been in Vienna for the 1st time. Post-cards to Doctor Bloch « Ihr ewig dankbarer A.H. » One of them a drawing, obviously copied from a well-known picture, monk with wine-glass. The other (sent from his 2nd and decisive sojourn in Vienna ?) , ordinary post-card.

Reason for going to Vienna : wanted to attend Academy. Was refused. (Here, Doctor Bloch's memories obviously get very much mixed-up with his reading.)

Queer enough, Doctor Bloch mentions a 3rd sister, but no 2nd brother. He had a vague memory that there had been other children who had died in their infancy.

Doctor Bloch :

I knew Adolf Hitler as a boy and as a young man. I treated him many times and was intimately familiar with the modest surroundings in which he grew to manhood. I attended, in her final illness, the person nearer and dearer to him than all others : his mother.

Ist, I might introduce myself. I was born in Frauenburg, a tiny village in southern Bohemia which, in the course of my lifetime, has been under 3 flags : Austrian, Czechoslovakian and German. I am 69 years old. I studied medicine in Prague, then, joined the Austrian army as a military doctor. In 1899, I was ordered to Linz, capital of Upper-Austria, and the 3rd largest city in the country. When I completed my army service, in 1901, I decided to remain in Linz and practice medicine.

As a city, Linz has always been as quiet and reserved, as Vienna was gay and noisy. In the period of which we are about to speak (when Adolf Hitler was a boy of 13) , Linz was a city of 80,000 people.

The Hitler family moved to Linz in 1903, because, I believe, of the good schools there. The family background is well-known. Alois Schicklgruber Hitler was the son of a poor peasant girl. When he was old enough to work, he got a job as a cobbler's apprentice, worked his way into the government service and became a customs inspector at Braunau, a tiny frontier-town between Bavaria and Austria. Braunau is 50 miles from Linz. At 56, Alois Hitler became eligible for a pension and retired. Proud of his own success, he was anxious for his son to enter government service. Young Adolf violently opposed the idea. He would be an artist. Father and son fought-over this, while the mother, Klara Hitler, tried to maintain peace.

As long as he lived, Alois Hitler persevered in trying to shape his son's destiny to his own desires. His son would have the education which had been denied him ; an education which would secure him a good government job. So, Father Alois prepared to leave the hamlet of Braunau for the city of Linz. Because of his government service, he would not be required to pay the full-tuition for his son at the « Realschule » . With all this in mind, he bought a small farm in Leonding, a Linz suburb.

The family was rather large. In later life, Adolf has so over-shadowed the others that they are, for the better part, forgotten. There was a half-brother Alois, whom I never met. He left home at an early age, got a job as a waiter in London and, later, opened his own restaurant in Berlin. He was never friendly with his younger brother.

Then, there was Paula, the oldest of the girls. She later married « Herr » Rubal, an official in the tax-bureau in Linz. Later still, after her husband's death and her brother's rise to power, she went to Berchtesgaden to become house-keeper at Hitler's villa. Sister Klara, for a while, managed a restaurant for Jewish students at the University of Vienna ; and sister Angela, youngest of the girls, married a Professor Hamitsch at Dresden, where she still lives.

The family had barely settled in their new home, outside of Linz, when Alois, the father, died suddenly from an apoplectic stroke.

At the time, « Frau » Hitler was in her early 40's. She was a simple modest, kindly woman. She was tall, had brownish hair which she kept neatly plaited, and a long, oval face with beautifully expressive gray-blue eyes. She was desperately worried about the responsibilities thrust upon her by her husband's death. Alois, 23 years her senior, had always managed the family. Now, the job was hers.

It was readily apparent that son Adolf was too young and, altogether, too frail to become a farmer. So, her best move seemed to be to sell the place and rent a small apartment. This she did, soon after her husband's death. With the proceeds of this sale and the small pension which came to her because of her husband's government position, she managed to hold her family together.

In a small town in Austria, poverty doesn't force upon one the indignities that it does in a large city. There are no slums and no serious over-crowding. I do not know the exact income of the Hitler family but, being familiar with the scale of government pensions, I should estimate it at $ 25 a month. This small sum allowed them to live quietly and decently unnoticed little people in an out-of-the-way-town.

Their apartment consisted of 3 small rooms in the 2 story house at number 9 « Blütenstraße » , which is across the Danube from the main-portion of Linz. Its windows gave an excellent view of the mountains.

My predominant impression of the simple furnished apartment was its cleanliness. It glistened ; not a speck of dust on the chairs or tables, not a stray fleck of mud on the scrubbed floor, not a smudge on the panes in the windows. « Frau » Hitler was a superb house-keeper.

The Hitlers had only a few friends. One stood-out above the others ; the widow of the post-Master who lived in the same house.

The limited budget allowed not even the smallest extravagance. We had the usual provincial Opera in Linz ; not good, and not bad. Those who would hear the best went to Vienna. Seats in the gallery of our Theater, the « Schauspielhaus » , sold for the equivalent of 10 to 15 cents, in American money. Yet, occupying one of those seats to hear an indifferent troupe sing « Lohengrin » was such a memorable occasion that Hitler records it in « Mein Kampf » !

For the most part, the boy's recreations were limited to those things which were free ; walks in the mountains, a swim in the Danube, a free band concert. He read extensively and was particularly fascinated by stories about American Indians. He devoured the books of James Fenimore Cooper, and the German writer Karl May - who never visited America and never saw an Indian.

The family diet was, of necessity, simple and rugged. Food was cheap and plentiful in Linz ; and the Hitler family ate much the same diet as other people in their circumstances. Meat would be served, perhaps, twice a week. Most of the meals they sat-down to consisted of cabbage or potato-soup, bread, dumplings and a pitcher of pear and apple cider.

For clothing, they wore the rough woolen cloth we call « Loden » . Adolf, of course, dressed in the uniform of all small boys ; leather shorts, embroidered suspenders, a small green hat with a feather in its band.

What kind of boy was Adolf Hitler ? Many biographers have put him down as harsh-voiced, defiant, untidy ; as a young ruffian who personified all that is unattractive. This simply is not true. As a youth, he was quiet, well-mannered and neatly dressed.

He was tall, sallow, old for his age. He was neither robust nor sickly. Perhaps, « frail looking » would best describe him. His eyes (inherited from his mother) were large, melancholy and thoughtful. To a very large extent, this boy lived within himself. What dreams he dreamed, I do not know.

Outwardly, his love for his mother was his most striking feature. While he was not a « mother's boy » in the usual sense, I have never witnessed a closer attachment. Some insist that this love verged on the pathological. As a former intimate of the family, I do not believe this is true.

Klara Hitler adored her son, the youngest of the family. She allowed him his own way wherever possible. His father had insisted that he become an official. He rebelled and won his mother to his side. He soon tired of school, so, his mother allowed him to drop his studies.

All friends of the family know how « Frau » Hitler encouraged his boyish efforts to become an artist ; at what cost to herself, one may guess. Despite her poverty, she permitted him to reject a job which was offered in the Post-office, so that he could continue his painting. She admired his watercolours and his sketches of the country-side. Whether this was honest admiration or whether it was merely an effort to encourage his talent, I do not know.

She did her best to raise her boy well. She saw that he was neat, clean, and as well fed as her purse would permit. Whenever he came to my consultation-room, this strange boy would sit among the other patients, awaiting his turn.

There was never anything seriously wrong. Possibly, his tonsils would be inflamed. He would stand obedient and unflinching while I depressed his tongue and swabbed the trouble spots. Or, possibly, he would be suffering with a cold. I would treat him and send him on his way. Like any well-bred boy of 14 or 15, he would bow and thank me courteously.

I, of course, know of the stomach trouble that beset him later in life largely as a result of bad diet while working as a common labourer in Vienna. I cannot understand the many references to his lung trouble as a youth. I was the only Doctor treating him during the period in which he is supposed to have suffered from this. My records show nothing of the sort. To be sure, he didn't have the rosy cheeks and the robust good health of most of the other youngsters ; but, at the same time, he was not sickly.

At the « Realschule » , young Adolf's work was anything but brilliant. Authority for this, I have the word of his former teacher, Doctor Karl Hümer, an old acquaintance of mine. I was « Frau » Hümer's physician. In « Mein Kampf » , Hitler records that he was an indifferent student in most subjects, but that he loved history. This agrees with the recollections of Professor Hümer.

Desiring additional training in painting, Hitler decided he would go to Vienna to study at the Academy. This was a momentous decision for a member of a poor family. His mother worried about how he would get along, I understand that she even suggested pinching the family budget a little tighter to enable her to send him a tiny allowance. Credit to the boy, he refused. He even went farther ; he signed his minute inheritance over to his sisters. He was 18 at the time.

I am not sure of the exact details of what happened on that trip to Vienna. Some contend that he was not admitted to the Academy because of his unsatisfactory artwork. Others accept Hitler's statement that his rejection was due to his failure to graduate from the « Realschule » . In any case, he was home again within a few weeks. It was later in this year (1908) that it became my duty to give Hitler what was, perhaps, the saddest news of his life.

One day, « Frau » Hitler came to visit me during my morning office hours. She complained of a pain in her chest. She spoke in a quiet, hushed voice ; almost a whisper. The pain she said, had been great ; enough to keep her awake nights on end. She had been busy with her household so had neglected to seek medical aid. Besides, she thought the pain would pass away. An examination showed that « Frau » Hitler had an extensive tumour of the breast. I did not tell her of my diagnosis.

I summoned the children to my office, on next day, and stated the case frankly. Their mother, I told them, was a gravely ill woman. Without surgery, I explained, there was absolutely no hope of recovery. Even with surgery, there was but the slightest chance that she would live. In family council, they must decide what was to be done.

Adolf Hitler's reaction to this news was touching. His long, sallow face was contorted. Tears flowed from his eyes. Did his mother, he asked, have no chance ? Only, then, did I realize the magnitude of the attachment that existed between mother and son. I explained that she did have a chance ; but a small one. Even this, shred of hope gave him some comfort.

The children carried my message to their mother. She accepted the verdict as I was sure she would - with fortitude. Deeply religious, she assumed that her fate was God's will. It would never have occurred to her to complain. She would submit to the operation as soon as I could make preparations.

I explained the case to Doctor Karl Urban, the chief of the surgical staff at the Hospital of the Sisters of Mercy, in Linz. Urban was one of the best-known surgeons in Upper-Austria. He was (and is) a generous man, a credit to his profession. He willingly agreed to undertake the operation on any basis I suggested. After examination, he concurred in my belief that « Frau » Hitler had very little chance of surviving but that surgery offered the only hope.

« Frau » Hitler arrived at the hospital one evening, in the early summer of 1908. I do not have the exact date, for my records of the case were placed in the archives of the Nazi Party, in Munich.

In any case, « Frau » Hitler spent the night in the hospital and was operated on the following morning. At the request of this gentle, harried soul, I remained beside the operating table while Doctor Urban and his assistant performed the surgery.

2 hours later, I drove in my carriage across the Danube to the little house at number 9 « Blütenstraße », in the section of the city known as Urfahr. There, the children awaited me.

The girls received the word I brought with calm and reserve. The face of the boy was streaked with tears, and his eyes were tired and red. He listened until I had finished speaking. He had but one question. In a choked voice, he asked :

« Does my mother suffer ? »

As weeks and months passed after the operation, « Frau » Hitler's strength began visibly to fail. At most, she could be out of bed for 1 hour or 2 a day. During this period, Adolf spent most of his time around the house, to which his mother had returned.

He slept in the tiny bedroom adjoining that of his mother so that he could be summoned at any time during the night. During the day, he hovered about the large bed in which she lay.

An illness such as that suffered by « Frau » Hitler, there is usually a great amount of pain. She bore her burden well ; unflinching and uncomplaining. But it seemed to torture her son. An anguished grimace would come over him when he saw pain contract her face. There was little that could be done. An injection of morphine, from time to time, would give temporary relief ; but nothing lasting. Yet, Adolf seemed enormously grateful even for these short periods of release.

I shall never forget Klara Hitler during those days. She was 48 at the time ; tall, slender and rather handsome, yet, wasted by disease. She was soft-spoken, patient ; more concerned about what would happen to her family than she was about her approaching death. She made no secret of these worries ; or about the fact that most of her thoughts were for her son.

She said repeatedly :

« Adolf is still so young. »

On the day of December 20th, I made 2 calls. The end was approaching. So, the word that Angela Hitler brought me the following morning came as no surprise. Her mother had died quietly in the night. The children had decided not to disturb me, knowing that their mother was beyond all medical aid. But, she asked, could I come now ? Someone in an official position would have to sign the death certificate.

The post-Master's widow, their closest friend, was with the children, having more or less taken charge of things. Adolf, his face showing the weariness of a sleepless night, sat beside his mother. In order to preserve a last impression, he had sketched her as she lay on her deathbed.

I sat with the family for a while, trying to ease their grief. I explained that, in this case, death had been a saviour. They understood. In the practice of my profession, it is natural that I should have witnessed many scenes such as this one, yet, none of them left me with quite the same impression. In all my career, I have never seen anyone so prostrate with grief as Adolf Hitler.

I did not attend Klara Hitler's funeral, which was held on Christmas Eve. The body was taken from Urfahr to Leonding, only a few miles distant. Klara Hitler was buried beside her husband in the Catholic cemetery, behind the small yellow stucco church. After the others (the girls, and the post-Master's widow) had left, Adolf remained behind ; unable to tear himself away from the freshly filled grave.

A few days after the funeral, the family came to my office. They wished to thank me for the help I had given them. There was Paula, fair and stocky ; Angela, slender, pretty but rather anemic ; Klara and Adolf. The girls spoke what was in their hearts while Adolf remained silent. I recall this particular scene as vividly as I might recall something that took place last week.

Adolf wore a dark suit and a loosely knotted cravat. Then, as now, a shock of hair tumbled over his forehead. His eyes were on the floor while his sisters were talking. Then, came his turn. He stepped forward and took my hand. Looking into my eyes, he said :

« I shall be grateful to you forever. »

That was all. Then, he bowed. I wonder if, today, he recalls this scene. I am quite sure that he does, for in a sparing sense, Adolf Hitler has kept to his promise of gratitude. Favours were granted me which I feel sure were accorded no other Jew, in all Germany or Austria.

During this period (1st years in Vienna) , he took time-out to send me a penny post-card. On the back was a message :

« From Vienna, I send you my greetings. Yours, always faithfully, Adolf Hitler. »

Official Nazi publications also record that I received one of Hitler's paintings : a small landscape. If I did, I am not aware of it. But it is quite possible that he sent me one and that I have forgotten the matter. In Austria, patients frequently send paintings or other gifts to their physicians as a mark of gratitude.

I did, however, preserve one piece of Hitler's artwork. This came during the period in Vienna when he was painting post-cards, posters, etc. , making enough money to support himself. Hitler sent me one of these cards. It showed a hooded Capuchin monk hoisting a glass of bubbling champagne.

Under the picture was a caption :

« Prosit Neujahr. »

On the reverse-side, he had written a message :

« The Hitler family sends you the best wishes for a Happy New Year. In everlasting thankfulness, Adolf Hitler. »

(Reports about confiscation of these souvenirs by the « Gestapo » who issued receipt for them.)

When he left for Vienna, Adolf Hitler was destined to disappear from our lives for a great many years. Not until the beginning of his political career, in 1920, were we, again, to get news of this quiet, polite boy who grew-up among us.

In 1937, a number of local Nazis attended the Party conference at Nürnberg. After the conference, Hitler invited several of these people to come with him to his mountain villa at Berchtesgaden. The « Führer » asked for news of Linz. How was the town ? Were people there supporting him ? He asked for news of me. Was I still alive, still practicing ? Then, he made a statement irritating to local Nazis.

He said :

« Doctor Bloch is an “ Edeljude ” (a noble Jew) . If all Jews were like him, there would be no “ Jewish Question ”. »

About Hitler's return to Linz :

It was a moment of tense excitement. For years, Hitler had been denied the right to visit the country of his birth. Now, that country belonged to him. The elation that he felt was written on his features. He smiled, waved, gave the Nazi salute to the people that crowded the street. Then, for a moment, he glanced-up at my window. I doubt that he saw me but he must have had a moment of reflection. Here was the home of the « Edeljude » who had diagnosed his mother's fatal cancer ; here was the consulting-room of the man who had treated his sisters ; here was the place he had gone as a boy to have his minor ailments attended.

It was a brief moment, then, the procession was gone.

Hitler established himself in the Weinzinger Hotel, particularly requesting an apartment with a view of the Bestling Mountain. This scene had been visible from the windows of his modest apartment where he had spent his boyhood.

The following day, he called in a few old acquaintances : Oberhammer, a loyal Party functionary ; Kubitschek, the musician. Liedel, the watch-maker ; Doctor Hümer, his former history teacher. It was understandable that he couldn't ask me, a Jew, to such a meeting ; yet, he did inquire after me.

Hitler arrived Saturday evening. Sunday, he visited his mother's grave, and reviewed local Nazis as they marched before him. On Monday, Hitler departed for Vienna.

Reports about special treatment by the « Gestapo » . Yellow star removed from home and office of Doctor Bloch. He also was allowed to remain in his apartment (did not have to vacate Linz) . Matter apparently handled « by Berlin » .

About trying to get favour to take life savings with them :

I knew that I could not see Adolf Hitler. Yet, I felt that if I could get a message to him this would, perhaps, give us some help.

If Hitler, himself, was inaccessible, perhaps, one of his sisters would aid us. Klara was the nearest : she lived in Vienna. Her husband had died and she lived alone in a modest apartment in a quiet residential district. Plans were made for my daughter, Gertrude, to make the trip to Vienna to see her. She went to the apartment, knocked, but got no answer. Yet, she was sure that there was someone at home.

She sought the aid of a neighbour. « Frau » Wolf (Klara Hitler) received no one, the neighbour said, except a few intimate friends. But this kind woman agreed to carry a message and report « Frau » Wolf's reply. My daughter waited. Soon, the answer came-back. « Frau » Wolf sent greetings and would do whatever she could. By good fortune, Hitler was in Vienna that night, for one of his frequent but unheralded visits to the Opera. « Frau » Wolf saw him and , I feel sure, gave him the message. But no exception was made in our case.

...

Eduard Bloch (geboren 30. Januar 1872 in Frauenberg , Böhmen ; gestorben 1. Juni 1945 in Bronx, New York City, USA) war der Hausarzt von Adolf Hitlers Eltern.

Bloch studierte als Schüler von Alfred Pribram Medizin in Prag und ging darauf als Arzt zur österreichischen Armee. 1899 wurde er nach Linz in Oberösterreich beordert, wo er im Anschluß an seine Militärzeit 1901 eine Privatpraxis eröffnete. Er heiratete 1902 Lilli Kafka. Sie hatte eine Tochter, Trude. In diese Praxis kam aus der Linzer Vorstadt Leonding zwei Jahre später die Familie Alois Hitlers, der kurz darauf verstarb.

Er war unter anderem der Hausarzt von Adolf Hitlers Mutter Klara. Nachdem 1907 ein Tumor in ihrer Brust diagnostiziert worden war, wurde sie im Linzer Krankenhaus Die Barmherzigen Schwestern behandelt. Die Chancen standen allerdings von vornherein schlecht und Bloch eröffnete dem 18-jährigen Hitler den Ernst der Lage. Eine langwierige Therapie konnte das Leben Klara Hitlers nur noch verlängern, aber nicht mehr retten. Sie verstarb am 21. Dezember 1907. Der Arzt erinnerte sich später, er habe in seiner ganzen Laufbahn noch nie jemanden so leiderfüllt gesehen wie Hitler, der zu seiner Mutter stets eine enge Bindung gehabt hatte.

Deren Tod soll gemäß Rudolph Binion Hitlers Judenhass mit ausgelöst haben, da der Jude Bloch ihren Krebs nicht heilen konnte. Die Tatsachen sprechen jedoch gegen diese These. Bloch hatte mit 300 Kronen ein relativ bescheidenes Honorar verlangt und verzichtete auf einen Zuschlag für die unzähligen Hausvisiten und Behandlungen mit Iodoform und Morphin. Als die Familie am 24. Dezember 1907 zu ihm fuhr, um die Rechnung zu bezahlen und ihm zu danken, verbeugte sich Hitler sogar vor dem Arzt mit den Worten « Ich werde Ihnen ewig dankbar sein » . 1908 schrieb er ihm eine Karte, in der er sich nochmals für seine Bemühungen bedankte. 1937 erkundigte sich Hitler in Berlin bei Besuchern aus Linz nach Bloch, und als er 1938 im Zuge des Einmarsches in Linz Station machte, fragte er bei Hofrat Adolf Eigl sofort nach « seinem guten alten Doctor Bloch » und nannte ihn einen « Edeljuden » .

Nach dem Anschluß Österreichs an Deutschland 1938 wurde Bloch zuerst wie alle anderen jüdischen Ärzte in der Ausübung seines Berufs eingeschränkt ; schon kurze Zeit später erkannte er aber, daß er anscheinend bevorzugt behandelt wurde. Er durfte seine Innenstadtwohnung behalten, bekam kein J in seinen Pass gestempelt und mußte seine Praxis nicht als « jüdisch » kennzeichnen. Die Gestapo konfiszierte allerdings die zwei von Hitler geschriebenen Dankeskarten ; obwohl Bloch sich bemühte, bekam er diese nie zurück. Bei der Gestapo bedeutete man ihm, daß sein Fall von Berlin aus « behandelt » werde. Die Nationalsozialisten wollten Eduard Bloch in der Folge zum « Ehrenarier » machen, was ihm und seiner Familie ein weiteres Leben in Deutschland ermöglicht hätte. Doch Doctor Bloch lehnte diese seltene Auszeichnung ab, da er nicht bereit war, seinen Glauben zu verraten. Daraufhin begnügte die Gestapo sich damit, ihn zu überwachen.

Da die Lebensbedingungen aber immer schlechter wurden und Bloch aus den Reaktionen auf seine Bitte, ihm die beiden Karten von Hitler zurückzugeben, zu erkennen meinte, daß die Protektion durch den Diktator begrenzt war, entschloß er sich zur Emigration. Im November 1940 wanderte das Ehepaar in die Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika aus, nachdem andere Mitglieder seiner Familie schon ein Jahr vorher Deutschland verlassen hatten. In den USA übte Bloch seinen Beruf nicht mehr aus, da seine Approbation dort nicht anerkannt war.

Von US-amerikanischen Dienststellen wurde er in den Jahren 1941 und 1943 vernommen, um tiefere Einblicke in die Entwicklung Adolf Hitlers zu bekommen. Bloch selbst veröffentlichte bereits 1941 seine Erinnerungen an Hitler in « Collier's Weekly » .

Er war bekannt mit Hedda Wagner, die eine Patientin war und ihm einen Roman widmete. Er selbst interessierte sich für Bücher von James Fenimore Cooper und Karl May.

...

Soon, the procession arrived - the great, black Mercedes car, a 6 wheeled affair, flanked by motor-cycles. The frail boy I had treated so often (whom I had not seen for 30 years) stood in the car. I had accorded him only kindness ; what was he now to do to the people I loved ? I peered-over the heads of the crowd at Adolf Hitler.

It was a moment of tense excitement. For years, Hitler had been denied the right to visit the country of his birth. Now, that country belonged to him. The elation that he felt was written on his features. He smiled, waved, gave the Nazi salute to the people that crowded the street. Then, for a moment, he glanced-up at my window. I doubt that he saw me, but he must have had a moment of reflection. Here was the home of the « Edeljude » who had diagnosed his mother's fatal cancer ; here was the consultation-room of the man who had treated his sisters ; here was the place he had gone as a boy to have his minor ailments attended.

It was a brief moment. Then, the procession was gone. It moved slowly into the town square - once, « Franz-Josef-Platz » , soon to be renamed « Adolf-Hitler-Platz » . He spoke from the balcony of the town-hall (« Rathaus ») . I listened on the radio. Historic words : Germany and Austria were now one.

Hitler established himself at the Weinzinger Hotel, particularly requesting an apartment with a view of the Pöstling Mountain. This scene had been visible from the windows of the modest apartment where he spent his boyhood.

The following day, he called in a few old acquaintances : Oberhammer, a local Party functionary ; Kubitschek (Kubizek) , the musician ; Liedel, the watch-maker ; Doctor Hümer, his former history teacher. It was understandable that he couldn't ask me, a Jew, to such a meeting ; yet, he did inquire after me. For a while, I thought of asking for an audience, then, decided this would be unwise.

Hitler arrived Saturday evening. Sunday, he visited his mother's grave, and reviewed local Nazis as they marched before him. Not equipped with uniforms, they wore knicker-bockers, ski pants or leather shorts. On Monday, Hitler departed for Vienna.

Soon, we were brought to a sharp realization of how different things were to be. There were 700 Jews in Linz. Shops, homes and offices of all these people were marked with the yellow-paper banners now visible throughout Germany : « JUDE » (Jew) .

The 1st suggestion that I was to receive special favours came one day when the local « Gestapo » telephoned. I was to remove the yellow signs from my office and home. Then, a 2nd thing happened : my landlord, an Aryan, went to the « Gestapo » headquarters to ask if I were to be allowed to remain in my apartment.

He was told :

« We wouldn't dare touch that matter. It will be handled by Berlin. »

Hitler, apparently, had remembered. Then, something happened that made me doubt.

For no reason whatsoever, my son-in-law, a young physician, was jailed. No one was allowed to see him, and we received no news of him. My daughter went to the « Gestapo » .

She asked :

« Would the “ Führer ” like to know that the son-in-law of his old physician had been sent to prison ? »

She was treated rudely and brusquely for her temerity. Had not the signs been removed from her father's house ? Was not that enough ? Yet, her visit must have had some effect. Within 3 weeks, her husband was released.

My practice, which I believe was one of the largest in Linz, had begun to dwindle as long as 1 year before the arrival of Hitler. In this, I might have seen a portent of things to come. Faithful older patients were quite frank in their explanations. The hatred preached by the Nazis was taking hold with the younger people. They would no longer patronize a Jew.

By decree, my active practice was limited to Jewish patients. This was another way of saying that I was to cease work altogether. For plans were in the making for ridding the town of all Jews. On November 10, 1938, the ruling was issued that all Jews were to leave Linz within 48 hours. They were to go to Vienna. The shock that attended this edict may be imagined. People who had lived all their lives in Linz were to sell their property, pack and depart in the space of 2 days.

I called at the « Gestapo » . Was I to leave ? I was informed that an exception had been made in my case. I could remain. My daughter and her husband ? Since they had already signified their intention of emigrating to America, they also could stay. But they would have to vacate their house. If there was room in my apartment, they would be permitted to move there.

After 37 years of active work, my practice was at an end. I was permitted to treat only Jews. After the evacuation order, there were but 7 members of this race left in Linz. All were over 80 years of age.

It is understandable that my daughter and her husband would wish to take their life savings with them when they departed for America. So would I, when my turn came to depart. Getting any local ruling on such a matter was out of the question. I knew that I couldn't see Adolf Hitler. Yet, I felt that if I could get a message to him he would, perhaps, give us some help.

If Hitler himself was inaccessible, perhaps, one of his sisters would aid us. Klara was the nearest ; she lived in Vienna. Her husband had died and she lived alone in a modest apartment in a quiet residential district. Plans were made for my daughter, Gertrude, to make the trip to Vienna to see her. She went to the apartment, knocked, but got no answer. Yet, she was sure that there was someone at home.

She sought the aid of a neighbour. « Frau » Wolf (Klara Hitler) received no one, the neighbor said, except a few intimate friends. But this kind woman agreed to carry a message and report « Frau » Wolf's reply. My daughter waited. Soon, the answer came-back. « Frau » Wolf sent greetings and would do whatever she could. By good fortune, Hitler was in Vienna that night, for one of his frequent but unheralded visits to the Opera. « Frau » Wolf saw him and, I feel sure, gave him the message. But no exception was made in our case. When our turn came, we were forced to go penniless, like so many thousands of others.

How has Hitler treated an old friend - one who cared for his family with patience, consideration and charity ? Let's sum-up the favours :

I don't believe that another Jew in all Austria was allowed to keep his passport. No « J » (Jew) was stamped on my ration card, once food became scarce. This was most helpful because Jews, today, are allowed to shop only during restricted hours which are often inconvenient. Without the « J » on my card, I could buy at any time. I was even given a ration card for clothes - something generally denied Jews.

If my relations with the « Gestapo » were not precisely cordial, I at least didn't suffer at their hands as did so many others. I was told on good authority, and I can well-believe it, that the bureau in Linz had received special instructions from the Chancellery, in Berlin, that I was to be accorded any reasonable favour.

It is possible, but unlikely, that my War record was particularly responsible for these small considerations. During the War, I had charge of a 1,000 bed military hospital, and my wife supervised welfare work among the sick. I was twice decorated for this service.

« My Patient, Hitler » : A Memoir of Hitler's Jewish Physician

(By Doctor Eduard Bloch.)

« My Patient, Hitler, as told to J. D. Ratcliff » , originally appeared in 2 parts in the March 15th and March 22nd, 1941, issues of Collier's magazine. In those pre-television days, Collier's was one of the most influential and widely-read periodicals in the United States. Regarded by serious historians as an important primary historical source about Hitler's youth, this essay is cited, for example, in the bibliography and reference notes of John Toland's acclaimed biography, « Adolf Hitler » (Doubleday, 1976) . It is also cited as a source in Robert Payne's study, « The Life and Death of Adolf Hitler » (Präger, 1973) and in Louis Snyder's « Encyclopædia of the 3rd “ Reich ” » (McGraw Hill, 1976) . While frankly describing the devastating impact of Hitler's anti-Jewish measures on his own life and career, Doctor Bloch also writes about the teenage Hitler with an honesty and sensitivity that would be almost unthinkable in any large-circulation American magazine today. The complete text of the original 2 part essay, including original sub-titles, is reprinted here, with only a few minor additions in brackets.

We were 3 days out of Lisbon, bound west for New York. The storm on Saturday had been bad but, on Sunday, the sea had subsided. A little before 11 o'clock that night, our ship, the small Spanish liner « Marques de Comillas » , got orders to stop. British control officers, aboard a trawler, wanted to examine the passengers. Everyone was told to line-up in the main lounge.

4 British officers, wearing life jackets, entered. Without comment, they worked their way down the line, scrutinizing passports. There was a feeling of tenseness. Many of those aboard the ship were fleeing ; they thought they had made good their escape from Europe once anchor was hoisted in Lisbon. Now ? No one knew. Perhaps, some of us would be taken-off the ship.

Finally, it was my turn. The officer in charge took my passport, glanced at it and looked-up, smiling.

He asked :

« You were Hitler's physician, weren't you ? »

This was correct. It would also have been correct for him to add that I am a Jew.

I knew Adolf Hitler as a boy and as a young man. I treated him many times and was intimately familiar with the modest surroundings in which he grew to manhood. I attended, in her final illness, the person nearer and dearer to him than all others : his mother.

Most biographers (both sympathetic and unsympathetic) have avoided the youth of Adolf Hitler. The unsympathetic ones have done this of necessity. They could lay their hands on only the most meager facts. The official Party biographies have skipped-over this period because of the dictator's wishes. Why this abnormal sensitivity about his youth ? I do not know. There are no scandalous chapters which Hitler might wish to hide, unless one goes back over 100 years to the birth of his father. Some biographers say that Alois Hitler was an illegitimate child. I cannot speak for the accuracy of this statement.

What of those early years in Linz, Upper-Austria, where Hitler spent his formative years ? What kind of boy was he ? What kind of a life did he lead ? It is of these things that we shall speak here.

Ist, I might introduce myself. I was born in Frauenburg, a tiny village in southern Bohemia which, in the course of my lifetime, had been under 3 flags : Austrian, Czechoslovakian and German. I am 69 years old. I studied medicine in Prague, then, joined the Austrian army as a military doctor. In 1899, I was ordered to Linz, capital of Upper-Austria, and the 3rd largest city in the country. When I completed my army service, in 1901, I decided to remain in Linz and practice medicine.

As a city, Linz has always been as quiet and reserved, as Vienna was gay and noisy. In the period of which we are about to speak (when Adolf Hitler was a boy of 13 - actually, 14) , Linz was a city of 80,000 people. My consultation rooms and home were in the same house, an ancient Baroque structure on « Landstraße » , the main thoroughfare of the city.

The Hitler family moved to Linz in 1903, because, I believe, of the good schools there. The family background is well-known. Alois Schicklgruber Hitler was the son of a poor peasant girl. When he was old enough to work, he got a job as a cobbler's apprentice, worked his way into the government service and became a customs inspector at Braunau, a tiny frontier town between Bavaria and Austria. Braunau is 50 miles from Linz. At 56, Alois Hitler became eligible for a pension and retired. Proud of his own success, he was anxious for his son to enter government service. Young Adolf violently opposed the idea. He would be an artist. Father and son fought over this while the mother, Klara, tried to maintain peace.

As long as he lived, Alois Hitler persevered in trying to shape his son's destiny to his own desires. His son would have the education which had been denied him ; an education which would secure him a good government job. So, Father Alois prepared to leave the hamlet of Braunau for the city of Linz. Because of his government service, he would not be required to pay the full-tuition for his son at the « Realschule » . With all this in mind, he bought a small farm in Leonding, a Linz suburb.

The family was rather large. In later life, Adolf has so overshadowed the others that they are, for the better part, forgotten. There was half-brother Alois, whom I never met. He left home at an early age, got a job as a waiter in London and later opened his own restaurant in Berlin. He was never friendly with his younger brother.

Then, there was Paula, the oldest of the girls. She later married « Herr » Rubal, an official in the tax-bureau in Linz. Later still, after her husband's death and her brother's rise to power, she went to Berchtesgaden to become house-keeper at Hitler's villa. Sister Klara, for a while, managed a restaurant for Jewish students at the University of Vienna ; and sister Angela, youngest of the girls, married a Professor Hamitsch at Dresden, where she still lives.

The family had barely settled in their new home outside of Linz when Alois, the father, died suddenly from an apoplectic stroke.

At the time, « Frau » Hitler was in her early 40's. She was a simple, modest, kindly woman. She was tall, had brownish hair which she kept neatly plaited, and a long, oval face with beautifully expressive gray-blue eyes. She was desperately worried about the responsibilities thrust upon her by her husband's death. Alois, 23 years her senior, had always managed the family. Now, the job was hers.

It was readily apparent that son Adolf was too young and, altogether, too fragile to become a farmer. So, her best move seemed to be to sell the place and rent a small apartment. This she did, soon after her husband's death. With the proceeds of this sale and the small pension which came to her because of her husband's government position, she managed to hold her family together.

In a small-town in Austria, poverty doesn't force upon one the indignities that it does in a large city. There are no slums and no serious over-crowding. I do not know the exact income of the Hitler family but, being familiar with the scale of government pensions, I should estimate it at $ 25 a month. This small sum allowed them to live quietly and decently - unnoticed little people in an out-of-the-way town.

Doctor Eduard Bloch, who was Jewish, treated Hitler as a young man, along with his mother and other members of the Hitler family. This picture of Doctor Bloch in his office in Linz was taken in 1938, on order of Martin Bormann for Hitler's « personal film file » .

The inscription reads :

« The “ Führer ” often sat on the chair beside the desk. »

Their apartment consisted of 3 small rooms in the 2 story house at No. 9 « Blütenstraße », which is across the Danube from the main portion of Linz. Its windows gave an excellent view of the mountains.

My predominant impression of the simple furnished apartment was its cleanliness. It glistened ; not a speck of dust on the chairs or tables, not a stray fleck of mud on the scrubbed floor, not a smudge on the panes in the windows. « Frau » Hitler was a superb house-keeper.

The Hitlers had only a few friends. One stood-out above the others ; the widow of the post-Master who lived in the same house.

The limited budget allowed not even the smallest extravagance. We had the usual provincial Opera in Linz : not good, and not bad. Those who would hear the best went to Vienna. Seats in the gallery of our theater, the « Schauspielhaus », sold for the equivalent of 10 to 15 cents, in American money. Yet, occupying one of these seats to hear an indifferent troupe sing « Lohengrin » was such a memorable occasion that Hitler records it in « Mein Kampf » !

For the most part, the boy's recreations were limited to those things which were free : walks in the mountains, a swim in the Danube, a free band concert. He read extensively and was particularly fascinated by stories about American Indians. He devoured the books of James Fenimore Cooper, and the German writer Karl May (who never visited America and never saw an Indian) .

The family diet was, of necessity, simple and rugged. Food was cheap and plentiful in Linz ; and the Hitler family ate much the same diet as other people in their circumstance. Meat would be served, perhaps, twice a week. Most of the meals they sat-down to consisted of cabbage or potato soup, bread, dumplings and a pitcher of pear and apple cider.

For clothing, they wore the rough woolen cloth we call « Loden » . Adolf, of course, dressed in the uniform of all small boys : leather shorts, embroidered suspenders, a small green hat with a feather in its band.

What kind of boy was Adolf Hitler ? Many biographers have put him down as harsh-voiced, defiant, untidy ; as a young ruffian who personified all that is unattractive. This simply is not true. As a youth, he was quiet, well-mannered and neatly dressed.

He records that, at the age of 15, he regarded himself as a political revolutionary. Possibly. But let us look at Adolf Hitler as he impressed people about him, not as he impressed himself.

He was tall, sallow, old for his age. He was neither robust nor sickly. Perhaps, « frail looking » would best describe him. His eyes (inherited from his mother) were large, melancholy and thoughtful. To a very large extent, this boy lived within himself. What dreams he dreamed, I do not know.

Outwardly, his love for his mother was his most striking feature. While he was not a « mother's boy », in the usual sense, I have never witnessed a closer attachment. Some insist that this love verged on the pathological. As a former intimate of the family, I do not believe this is true.

Klara Hitler adored her son, the youngest of the family. She allowed him his own way wherever possible. His father had insisted that he become an official. He rebelled and won his mother to his side. He soon tired of school, so his mother allowed him to drop his studies.

All friends of the family know how « Frau » Hitler encouraged his boyish efforts to become an artist ; at what cost to herself, one may guess. Despite their poverty, she permitted him to reject a job which was offered in the post-office, so that he could continue his painting. She admired his watercolours and his sketches of the country-side. Whether this was honest admiration or whether it was merely an effort to encourage his talent, I do not know.

She did her best to raise her boy well. She saw that he was neat, clean and as well-fed as her purse would permit. Whenever he came to my consultation-room, this strange boy would sit among the other patients, awaiting his turn.

There was never anything seriously wrong. Possibly, his tonsils would be inflamed. He would stand obedient and unflinching while I depressed his tongue and swabbed the trouble spots. Or, possibly, he would be suffering with a cold. I would treat him and send him on his way. Like any well-bred boy of 14 or 15, he would bow and thank me courteously.

I, of course, know of the stomach trouble that beset him later in life, largely as a result of bad diet while working as a common labourer in Vienna. I cannot understand the many references to his lung trouble as a youth. I was the only doctor treating him during the period in which he is supposed to have suffered from this. My records show nothing of the sort. To be sure, he didn't have the rosy cheeks and the robust good health of most of the other youngsters ; but, at the same time, he was not sickly.

At the « Realschule » , young Adolf's work was anything but brilliant. As authority for this, I have the word of his former teacher, Doctor Karl Hümer, an old acquaintance of mine. I was « Frau » Hümer's physician. In « Mein Kampf » , Hitler records that he was an indifferent student in most subjects, but that he loved history. This agrees with the recollections of Professor Hümer.

Desiring additional training in painting, Hitler decided he would go to Vienna to study at the Academy. This was a momentous decision for a member of a poor family. His mother worried about how he would get along. I understand that she even suggested pinching the family budget a little tighter to enable her to send him a tiny allowance. Credit to the boy, he refused. He even went further : he signed his minute inheritance over to his sisters. He was 18, at the time.

I am not sure of the exact details of what happened on that trip to Vienna. Some contend that he was not admitted to the Academy because of his unsatisfactory artwork. Others accept Hitler's statement that his rejection was due to his failure to graduate from the « Realschule » - the equivalent of an American high-school. In any case, he was home again within a few weeks. It was later in this year (1908 ; 1907 according to some sources) that it became my duty to give Hitler what was, perhaps, the saddest news of his life.

One day, « Frau » Hitler came to visit me during my morning office hours. She complained of a pain in her chest. She spoke in a quiet, hushed voice ; almost a whisper. The pain, she said, had been great ; enough to keep her awake nights on end. She had been busy with her household so had neglected to seek medical aid. Besides, she thought the pain would pass away. When a physician hears such a story, he almost automatically thinks of cancer. An examination showed that « Frau » Hitler had an extensive tumour of the breast. I did not tell her of my diagnosis.

I summoned the children to my office the next day and stated the case frankly. Their mother, I told them, was a gravely ill woman. A malignant tumour is serious enough today, but it was even more serious 30 years ago. Surgical techniques were not so advanced and knowledge of cancer not so extensive.

Without surgery, I explained, there was absolutely no hope of recovery. Even with surgery, there was but the slightest chance that she would live. In family council, they must decide what was to be done.

Adolf Hitler's reaction to this news was touching. His long, sallow face was contorted. Tears flowed from his eyes. Did his mother, he asked, have no chance ? Only then, did I realize the magnitude of the attachment that existed between mother and son. I explained that she did have a chance ; but a small one. Even this shred of hope gave him some comfort.

The children carried my message to their mother. She accepted the verdict as I was sure she would - with fortitude. Deeply religious, she assumed that her fate was God's will. It would never have occurred to her to complain. She would submit to the operation as soon as I could make preparations.

I explained the case to Doctor Karl Urban, the chief of the surgical staff at the Hospital of the Sisters of Mercy, in Linz. Urban was one of the best-known surgeons in Upper-Austria. He was (and is) a generous man, a credit to his profession. He willingly agreed to undertake the operation on any basis I suggested. After examination, he concurred in my belief that « Frau » Hitler had very little chance of surviving but that surgery offered the only hope.

It is interesting to note what happened to this generous man nearly 3 decades later - after « Anschluß » (union) with Germany. Because of his political connections, he was forced to abandon his position at the hospital. His son, who pioneered in brain surgery, was likewise forced from several offices.

« Frau » Hitler arrived at the hospital one evening, in the early summer of 1908 (1907 ?) . I do not have the exact date, for my records of the case were placed in the archives of the Nazi Party, in Munich. In any case, « Frau » Hitler spent the night in the hospital and was operated on the following morning. At the request of this gentle, harried soul, I remained beside the operating table while Doctor Urban and his assistant performed the surgery.

2 hours later, I drove in my carriage across the Danube to the little house at No. 9 « Bluetenstraße », in the section of the city known as « Urfahr ». There, the children awaited me.

The girls received the word I brought with calm and reserve. The face of the boy was streaked with tears, and his eyes were tired and red. He listened until I had finished speaking. He has but one question. In a choked voice, he asked :

« Does my mother suffer ? »

As weeks and months passed after the operation, « Frau » Hitler's strength began visibly to fail. At most, she could be out of bed for 1 hour or 2 a day. During this period, Adolf spent most of his time around the house, to which his mother had returned.

He slept in the tiny bedroom adjoining that of his mother so that he could be summoned at any time during the night. During the day, he hovered about the large bed in which she lay.

In illness such as that suffered by « Frau » Hitler, there is usually a great amount of pain. She bore her burden well ; unflinching and uncomplaining. But it seemed to torture her son. An anguished grimace would come over him when he saw pain contract her face. There was little that could be done. An injection of morphine, from time to time, would give temporary relief ; but nothing lasting. Yet, Adolf seemed enormously grateful even for these short periods of release.

I shall never forget Klara Hitler during those days. She was 48, at the time ; tall, slender and rather handsome, yet, wasted by disease. She was soft-spoken, patient ; more concerned about what would happen to her family than she was about her approaching death. She made no secret of these worries ; or about the fact that most of her thoughts were for her son.

She said repeatedly :

« Adolf is still so young. »

On the day of December 20th, 1908 (or 1907) , I made 2 calls. The end was approaching and I wanted this good woman to be as comfortable as I could make her. I didn't know whether she would live another week, or another month ; or whether death would come in a matter of hours.

So, the word that Angela Hitler brought me the following morning came as no surprise. Her mother had died quietly in the night. The children had decided not to disturb me, knowing that their mother was beyond all medical aid. But, she asked, could I come now ? Someone in an official position would have to sign the death certificate. I put on my coat and drove with her to the grief-stricken cottage.

The post-Master's widow, their closest friend, was with the children, having more or less taken charge of things. Adolf, his face showing the weariness of a sleepless night, sat beside his mother. In order to preserve a last impression, he had sketched her as she lay on her death-bed.

I sat with the family for a while, trying to ease their grief. I explained that, in this case, death had been a saviour. They understood.

In the practice of my profession, it is natural that I should have witnessed many scenes such as this one, yet, none of them left me with quite the same impression. In all my career, I have never seen anyone so prostrate with grief as Adolf Hitler.

I did not attend Klara Hitler's funeral, which was held on Christmas Eve. The body was taken from « Urfahr » to Leonding, only a few miles distant. Klara Hitler was buried beside her husband in the Catholic cemetery, behind the small, yellow stucco church. After the others (the girls, and the post-Master's widow) had left, Adolf remained behind ; unable to tear himself away from the freshly-filled grave.

And so, this gaunt, pale young man stood alone in the cold. Alone with his thoughts on Christmas Eve while the rest of the world was gay and happy.

A few days after the funeral, the family came to my office. They wished to thank me for the help I had given them. There was Paula, fair and stocky ; Angela, slender, pretty but rather anemic ; Klara and Adolf. The girls spoke what was in their hearts while Adolf remained silent. I recall this particular scene as vividly as I might recall something that took place last week.

Adolf wore a dark suit and a loosely knotted cravat. Then, as now, a shock of hair tumbled over his forehead. His eyes were on the floor while his sisters were talking. Then, came his turn. He stepped forward and took my hand. Looking into my eyes, he said :

« I shall be grateful to you forever. »

That was all. Then, he bowed. I wonder if, today, he recalls this scene. I am quite sure that he does, for in a sparing sense, Adolf Hitler had kept to his promise of gratitude. Favours were granted me which I feel sure were accorded no other Jew in all Germany or Austria.

Almost immediately after his mother's funeral, Hitler left for Vienna, to attempt once more a career as an artist. His growth to manhood had been a painful experience for this boy who lived within himself. But ever more trying days were coming. Poor as the family was, he had at least been assured food and shelter while living at home. This couldn't be said of the days in Vienna. Hitler was entirely engrossed with the business of keeping body and soul together.

We all know something of his life there - how he worked as a hod-carrier on building-construction jobs until workmen threatened to push him off a scaffold. And we know that he shoveled snow and took any other job he could find. During this period, for 3 years, in fact, Hitler lived in a man's hostel, the equivalent of a flop-house in any large American city. It was here that he began to dream of a world remade to his pattern.

While living in the hostel, surrounded by the human dregs of the large city, Hitler says :

« I became dissatisfied with myself for the 1st time in my life. »

This dissatisfaction with himself was followed by dissatisfaction with everything about him - and the desire to alter things to his own liking.

The vitriol of hate began to creep through his body. The grim realities of the life he lived encouraged him to hate the government, labour unions, the very men he lived with. But he had not yet begun to hate the Jews.

During this period, he took time-out to send me a penny postcard. On the back was a message :

« From Vienna, I send you my greetings. Yours, always faithfully, Adolf Hitler. »

It was a small thing, yet, I appreciated it. I had spent a great deal of time treating the Hitler family and it was nice to know that this effort on my part had not been forgotten.

Official Nazi publications also record that I received one of Hitler's paintings : a small landscape. If I did, I am not aware of it. But it is quite possible that he sent me one and that I have forgotten the matter. In Austria, patients frequently send paintings or other gifts to their physicians as a mark of gratitude. Even now, I have half a dozen of these oils and watercolours which I have saved ; but none painted by Hitler among them.

I did, however, preserve one piece of Hitler's artwork. This came during the period in Vienna when he was painting post-cards, posters, etc. , making enough money to support himself. This was the one time in his life that Hitler was able to make successful use of his talent.

He would paint these cards and dry them in front of a hot fire, which would give them a rather pleasing antique quality. Then, other inmates of the hostel would peddle them. Today, in Germany, the few remaining samples of this work are more highly-prized and sought after than the works of Picasso, Gauguin and Cézanne !

Hitler sent me one of these cards. It showed a hooded Capuchin monk hoisting a glass of bubbling champagne. Under the picture was a caption :

« Prosit Neujahr - A toast to the New Year. »

On the reverse side, he had written a message :

« The Hitler family sends you the best wishes for a Happy New Year. In everlasting thankfulness, Adolf Hitler. »

Why I put these cards aside to be saved, I do not know. Possibly, it was because of the impression made upon me by that unhappy boy. Even today, I cannot help thinking of him in terms of his grief and not in terms of what he has done to the world.

Those postal cards had a curious history. They indicated the extent to which Hitler has captured the imagination of some people. A rich Viennese industrialist (I do not know his name because he dealt through an intermediary) later made me an astonishing offer. He wanted to buy those 2 cards and was willing to pay 20,000 Marks for them ! I rejected the offer on the ground that I could not ethically make such a sale.

There is still another story in those 2 cards. 17 days after the collapse of the Schuschnigg government and the occupation of Austria by German troops, an agent of the « Gestapo » called at my home. At the time, I was making a professional call, but my wife received him.

He said :

« I am informed that you have some souvenirs of the “ Führer ”. I should like to see them. »

Acting sensibly, my wife made no protest. She didn't wish to have her home torn apart as so many Jewish homes had been. She found the 2 cards and handed them over.

The agent scribbled a receipt which read :

« Certificate for the safe-keeping of 2 post-cards (one of them painted by the hand of Adolf Hitler) confiscated in the house of Doctor Eduard Bloch. »

It was signed by the agent, named Grömer, who was previously unknown to us. He said I was to come to headquarters the following morning.

Almost as soon as the Nazis entered the city, the « Gestapo » took-over the small hotel on « Gesellenhausstraße » , formally patronized by traveling clergymen. I went to this place and was received almost immediately. I was greeted courteously by Doctor Rasch, head of the local bureau. I asked him why these bits of property had been taken.

Those were busy days for the « Gestapo » . There were many things to be looked after in a town of 120,000 people.

It developed that Doctor Rasch was not familiar with my case. He asked if I were under suspicion for any political activity unfavorable to the Nazis. I replied that I was not ; that I was a professional man with no political connections.

Apparently as an afterthought, he asked if I were a non-Aryan. I answered without compromise :

« I am a 100 % Jew. »

The change that came-over him was instantaneous. Previously, he had been business-like but courteous. Now, he became distant.

The cards, he said, would be retained for safe-keeping. Then, he dismissed me, neither rising nor shaking hands as he had when I entered. So far, as I know, the cards are still in the hands of the « Gestapo » . I never saw them again.

When he left for Vienna, Adolf Hitler was destined to disappear from our lives for a great many years. He had no friends in Linz to whom he might return to visit and few with whom he might exchange correspondence. So, it was much later that we learned of his wretched poverty on those days, and of his subsequent moving to Munich, in 1912 (actually, in May 1913) .

No news came-back of the way in which he fell on his knees and thanked God when War was declared in 1914 ; and no news of his War service as a corporal with the 16th Bavarian Reserve Infantry. We heard nothing of his being wounded and gassed. Not until the beginning of his political career, in 1920, were we again to get news of this quiet, polite boy who grew-up among us.

Occasionally, the local newspapers would run items about the group of political supporters that Hitler was gathering about himself in Munich ; stories of their hatred of the Jews, of the Versailles Peace Treaty, of nearly everything else. But no particular importance was attached to these activities. Not until 20 people died in the « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » of November 8, 1923, did Hitler achieve local notoriety. Was it possible, I asked myself, that the man behind these things was the quiet boy I had known - the son of the gentle Klara Hitler ?

Eventually, even the mention of Hitler's name in the Austrian press was prohibited ; still, we continued to get word-of-mouth news of our former townsman : stories of the persecutions he had launched ; of German re-armament ; of War to come. This smuggled news reached responsive ears. A local Nazi Party sprang-up.

In theory, such a Party could not exist ; it had been outlawed by the government. In practice, authorities gave it their blessings. Denied uniforms, local Nazis adopted methods of identifying themselves to everyone. They wore white stockings. On their coats, they wore a small wild flower, very much like the American daisy and, at Christmas time, they burned blue candles in their homes.

We all knew these things, but nothing was done. From time to time, local authorities would find a Nazi flag on Klara

Hitler's grave, in Leonding, and would remove it without ceremony. Still, the gathering storm in Germany seemed remote. It was quite a while before I got any 1st hand word from Adolf Hitler. Then, in 1937, a number of local Nazis attended the Party conference in Nuremberg. After the conference, Hitler invited several of these people to come with him to his mountain villa at Berchtesgaden. The « Führer » asked for news of Linz. How was the town ? Were people there supporting him ? He asked for news of me. Was I still alive, still practicing ? Then, he made a statement irritating to local Nazis.

Hitler said :

« Doctor Bloch is an “ Edeljude ” (a noble Jew) . If all Jews were like him, there would be no “ Jewish Question ”. »

It was strange and, in a way, flattering that Adolf Hitler could see good in, at least, one member of my race.

It is curious now to look back on the feeling of security that we had by virtue of living on the right side of an imaginary line, the international boundary. Surely, Germany would not chance invading Austria. France was friendly. Occupation of Austria would be inimical to the interests of Italy. Oh, but we were blind, in those days ! Then, we were caught-up in a breathless rush of events. It was with hope that we read of Austrian Chancellor Schuschnigg's trip to Berchtesgaden ; his plebiscite ; his inclusion of Seyß-Inquart in his cabinet. Possibly, we would ride through this crisis untouched. But hope was doomed to death within a very few hours. As soon as Seyß-Inquart was taken into the cabinet, buttons sprouted in every lapel :

« One People, One Realm, One Leader. »

On Friday, March 11th, 1938, the Vienna radio was broadcasting a program of light-music. It was 7:45 at night. Suddenly, the announcer broke in. The Chancellor would speak. Schuschnigg came on the air and said that, to prevent bloodshed, he was capitulating to the wishes of Hitler. The frontiers would be opened, he ended his address with the words :

« Gott schütze Österreich. » (May God protect Austria.)

Hitler was coming home to Linz.

In the sleepless days that followed, we clung to our radios. Troops were pouring over the border at Passau, Kufstein, Mittenwalde, and elsewhere. Hitler, himself, was crossing the Inn River at Braunau, his birthplace. Breathlessly, the announcer told us the story of the march. The « Führer », himself, would pause in Linz. The town went mad with joy. The reader should have no doubts about the popularity of « Anschluß » with Germany. The people favoured it. They greeted the onrushing tide of German troops with flowers, cheers and songs. Church bells rang. Austrian troops and police fraternized with the invaders and there was general rejoicing.

The public square in Linz, a block from my home, was a turmoil. All afternoon, it rang with the « Horst Wessel » song and « Deutschland über Alles » . Planes droned overhead, and advance units of the German army were given deafening cheers. Finally, the radio announced that Hitler was in Linz.

Advance instructions had been given to the townspeople. All windows along the procession route were to be closed. Each should be lighted. I stood at the window of my home facing the « Landstraße » . Hitler would pass before me.

Soon the procession arrived - the great, black Mercedes car, a 6 wheeled affair, flanked by motorcycles. The frail boy I had treated so often (and whom I had not seen for 30 years) stood in the car. I had accorded him only kindness ; what was he now to do to the people I loved ? I peered over the heads of the crowd at Adolf Hitler.

It was a moment of tense excitement. For years, Hitler had been denied the right to visit the country of his birth. Now, that country belonged to him. The elation that he felt was written on his features. He smiled, waved, gave the Nazi salute to the people that crowded the street. Then, for a moment, he glanced-up at my window. I doubt that he saw me, but he must have had a moment of reflection. Here was the home of the « Edeljude » who had diagnosed his mother's fatal cancer ; here was the consultation-room of the man who had treated his sisters ; here was the place he had gone as a boy to have his minor ailments attended.

It was a brief moment. Then, the procession was gone. It moved slowly into the town-square - once, « Franz-Josef-Platz » , soon to be renamed « Adolf-Hitler-Platz » . He spoke from the balcony of the town-hall. I listened on the radio. Historic words : Germany and Austria were now one.

Hitler established himself in the Weinzinger Hotel, particularly requesting an apartment with a view of the Pöstling Mountain. This scene had been visible from the windows of the modest apartment where he spent his boyhood.

The following day, he called in a few old acquaintances : Oberhammer, a local Party functionary ; Kubitschek (Kubizek) , the musician ; Liedel, the watch-maker ; Doctor Hümer, his former history teacher. It was understandable that he couldn't ask me, a Jew, to such a meeting ; yet, he did inquire after me. For a while, I thought of asking for an audience, then, decided this would be unwise.

Hitler arrived Saturday evening. Sunday, he visited his mother's grave, and reviewed local Nazis as they marched before him. Not equipped with uniforms, they wore knicker-bockers, ski pants or leather shorts. On Monday, Hitler departed for Vienna.

Soon, we were brought to a sharp realization of how different things were to be. There were 700 Jews in Linz. Shops, homes and offices of all these people were marked with the yellow-paper banners now visible throughout Germany : « JUDE » (Jew) .

The 1st suggestion that I was to receive special favours came one day when the local « Gestapo » telephoned. I was to remove the yellow signs from my office and home. Then, a 2nd thing happened : my landlord, an Aryan, went to « Gestapo » headquarters to ask if I were to be allowed to remain in my apartment.

He was told :

« We wouldn't dare touch that matter. It will be handled by Berlin. »

Hitler, apparently, had remembered. Then, something happened that made me doubt.

For no reason whatsoever, my son-in-law, a young physician, was jailed. No one was allowed to see him, and we received no news of him. My daughter went to the « Gestapo » .

She asked :

« Would the “ Führer ” like to know that the son-in-law of his old physician had been sent to prison ? »

She was treated rudely and brusquely for her temerity. Had not the signs been removed from her father's house ? Was not that enough ? Yet, her visit must have had some effect. Within 3 weeks, her husband was released.

My practice, which I believe was one of the largest in Linz, had begun to dwindle as long as 1 year before the arrival of Hitler. In this, I might have seen a portent of things to come. Faithful older patients were quite frank in their explanations. The hatred preached by the Nazis was taking hold with the younger people. They would no longer patronize a Jew.

By decree, my active practice was limited to Jewish patients. This was another way of saying that I was to cease work altogether. For plans were in the making for ridding the town of all Jews. On November 10th, 1938, the ruling was issued that all Jews were to leave Linz within 48 hours. They were to go to Vienna. The shock that attended this edict may be imagined. People who had lived all their lives in Linz were to sell their property, pack and depart in the space of 2 days.

I called at the « Gestapo » . Was I to leave ? I was informed that an exception had been made in my case. I could remain. My daughter and her husband ? Since they had already signified their intention of emigrating to America, they also could stay. But they would have to vacate their house. If there was room in my apartment, they would be permitted to move there.

After 37 years of active work, my practice was at an end. I was permitted to treat only Jews. After the evacuation order, there were but 7 members of this race left in Linz. All were over 80 years of age.

It is understandable that my daughter and her husband would wish to take their life savings with them when they departed for America. So would I, when my turn came to depart. Getting any local ruling on such a matter was out of the question. I knew that I couldn't see Adolf Hitler. Yet, I felt that, if I could get a message to him, he would perhaps give us some help.

If Hitler himself was inaccessible, perhaps, one of his sisters would aid us. Klara was the nearest ; she lived in Vienna. Her husband had died and she lived alone in a modest apartment in a quiet residential district. Plans were made for my daughter, Gertrude, to make the trip to Vienna to see her. She went to the apartment, knocked, but got no answer. Yet, she was sure that there was someone at home.

She sought the aid of a neighbour. « Frau Wolf » (Klara Hitler) received no one, the neighbour said, except a few intimate friends. But this kind woman agreed to carry a message and report « Frau » Wolf's reply. My daughter waited. Soon, the answer came-back. « Frau » Wolf sent greetings and would do whatever she could. By good fortune, Hitler was in Vienna that night, for one of his frequent but unheralded visits to the Opera. « Frau » Wolf saw him and, I feel sure, gave him the message. But no exception was made in our case. When our turn came, we were forced to go penniless, like so many thousands of others.

How has Hitler treated an old friend - one who cared for his family with patience, consideration and charity ? Let's sum-up the favours :

I don't believe that another Jew in all Austria was allowed to keep his passport. No « J » was stamped on my ration card, once food became scarce. This was most helpful because Jews today are allowed to shop only during restricted hours which are often inconvenient. Without the « J » on my card, I could buy at any time. I was even given a ration card for clothes - something generally denied Jews.

If my relations with the « Gestapo » were not precisely cordial, I at least didn't suffer at their hands as did so many others. I was told on good authority, and I can well believe it, that the bureau in Linz had received special instructions from the Chancellery in Berlin that I was to be accorded any reasonable favour.

It is possible, but unlikely, that my War record was particularly responsible for these small considerations. During the War, I had charge of a 1,000 bed military hospital, and my wife supervised welfare work among the sick. I was twice decorated for this service.

Hitler still regards Linz as his true home, and the changes he has wrought are astonishing. The once quiet, sleepy town had been transformed by its « godfather » - an honorary title particularly dear to Hitler. Whole blocks of old houses have been pulled-down to make way for modern apartment houses ; thereby, causing an acute but temporary housing shortage. A new theater has gone-up and a new bridge has been built over the Danube. The bridge, according to local legend, was designed by Hitler himself and plans were already completed at the time of « Anschluß » . The vast « Hermann Göring Iron Works » , built in the past 2 years, is just starting operations. To carry-on, this program of reconstruction whole train-loads of labourers have been imported : Czechs, Poles, Belgians.

Hitler has visited the city twice since the « Anschluß » , once, at the time of the election which was to approve union with Germany ; a 2nd time secretly to see how reconstruction of the town was progressing. Each time had stayed at the Weininger Hotel.

On the 2nd visit, the proprietor of the hotel was informed that Hitler's presence in town was not to be announced ; that he would make his inspection tour in the morning. Delighted at having such an important personage in his house, the proprietor could not resist boasting. He telephoned several friends to give them the news. For this breach of discipline, he paid heavily. His hotel was confiscated.

Many times, I have been approached by Hitler biographers for notes on his youth. In most instances, I have refused to speak. But I did talk to one of these men. He was a pleasant middle-aged gentleman from Vienna, who came from the government department headed by Rudolf Heß, of the Nazi inner-circle. He was writing an official biography. I gave him such details as I could recall, and my medical records which he subsequently sent to the Nazi Party headquarters, in Munich. He stayed in Linz and Braunau for several weeks ; then, the project terminated abruptly. I was told he had been sent to the silence of the concentration camp. Why, I do not know.

When it finally became my turn to leave Linz for America, I knew that it would be impossible for me to take my savings with me. But the « Gestapo » had one more favour for me. I was to be allowed to take 16 Marks from the country instead of the customary 10 !

The Nazi organization of physicians gave me a letter, of what value I do not know, which states that I was « worthy of recommendation » . It went on to say that, because of my « character, medical knowledge and readiness to help the sick » , I had won « the appreciation and esteem of my fellow men » .

A Party official suggested that I was expected to show some gratitude for all these favours. Perhaps, a letter to the « Führer » ? Before I left Linz on a cold, foggy November morning, I wrote it. I wonder if it was ever received. It read :

Your Excellency :

Before passing the border, I want to express my thanks for the protection which I have received. In material poverty, I am now leaving the town where I have lived for 41 years ; but I leave conscious of having lived in the most exact fulfillment of my duty. At 69, I will start my life anew in a strange country where my daughter is working hard to support her family.

Yours faithfully,

Eduard Bloch

Guido von List

Le journaliste, dramaturge, romancier et occultiste autrichien, théoricien de l'armanisme intégral (forme d'aryanisme) , Guido Karl Anton List (mieux connu sous le nom de Guido von List) , est né le 5 octobre 1848 à Vienne et est mort le 17 mai 1919 à Berlin. Auteur d'ouvrages romanesques sur fond de néo-paganisme germanique, et à l'origine de l'ésotérisme nazi, cher à Heinrich Himmler. D'après l'historien Ian Kershaw, il aurait été le 1er à faire de la croix gammée un symbole aryen. L'alphabet à 18 runes qu'il va inventer, se basant sur les « futhark » récents, a servi de base pour tous les symboles du Nazisme (symboles des divisions SS, etc.) . Il est également à la base de l'idéologie raciale nazie, plaçant les aryens au-dessus des autres peuples.

La Société Guido von List, créée en 1908, est parfois confondue avec la Société Thulé, dont il aurait aussi été membre. Parmi ses membres, on peut citer Karl Heise, figure majeure à Zürich du culte mystico-végétarien Mazdaznan.

...

The Austrian occultist, journalist, playwright, and novelist Guido Karl Anton List (better known as Guido von List) was born on 5 October 1848 in Vienna, then part of the Austrian Empire ; and died on 17 May 1919 in Berlin. He expounded a modern Pagan new religious movement known as Wotanism, which he claimed was the revival of the religion of the ancient German race, and which included an inner set of Ariosophical teachings that he termed Armanism.

Born to a prosperous middle-class family, he was the eldest son of Karl Anton List, a leather goods dealer who was the son of Karl List, a publican and vintner. Guido's mother, Marian List, was the daughter of builder's merchant Franz Anton Killian. List was raised in the city's 2nd District, on the eastern-side of the Danube canal. Like most Austrians at the time, his family were members of the Roman Catholic denomination of Christianity, with List being christened into this faith at Saint-Peter's Church in Vienna. Reflecting the family's wealth and bourgeoisie status, in 1851, a watercolour portrait of List was painted by the artist Anton von Anreiter.

Accounts suggest that List had a happy childhood. Developing a preference for rural areas rather than urban ones, he enjoyed family visits to the countryside of Lower-Austria and Moravia, and (encouraged by his father) , he began to sketch and paint the castles, prehistoric monuments, and natural scenery of these areas. According to his later account, he developed an early interest in the pre-Christian religions of Austria, coming to believe that the catacombs beneath Saint-Stephen's Cathedral, in Vienna, had once been a shrine devoted to a pagan deity. He claimed that, on an 1862 visit to the catacombs with his father, he knelt before a ruined altar and swore that when an adult he would construct a temple to the ancient god Wotan.

Although List wanted to become an artist and scholar, he reluctantly agreed to his father's insistence that he enter the family's leather goods business. During his leisure time, he devoted himself to writing and sketching as well as rambling, riding, or rowing in the countryside, becoming both a member of the Viennese rowing club Donauhört and the secretary of the Austrian Alpine Association (« Österreichischer Alpenverein ») . He was involved in both solitary and group expeditions into the Austrian Alps, and it was on one of the latter journeys that he left his mountaineering group to spend Midsummer night alone atop the Geiselberg hillfort. On 24 June 1875, he and four friends rowed down the Danube before camping for the night at the site of the ancient Roman fortification of « Carnuntum » to commemorate the 1500th anniversary of the Battle of Carnuntum, in which Germanic tribes defeated the Roman Army. List later claimed that while his friends caroused, he celebrated the event with a fire and by burying 8 bottles of wine in the shape of a Swastika beneath the arch of the monument's Pagan Gate.

In 1877, List's father died. List soon abandoned the leather goods business that he inherited, intent on devoting himself to literary endeavours as a journalist, even if this meant a significant reduction in his income. On 26 September 1878, he married his 1st wife, Helene Förster-Peters. From 1877 to 1887, he wrote for the nationalist magazines « Neue Welt » (New World) ; « Heimat » (Homeland) ; « Deutsche Zeitung » (German Newspaper) ; and the « Neue Deutsche Alpenzeitung » (New German Alpine Newspaper) , with his articles being devoted to the Austrian countryside and the folk-customs of its inhabitants. His interpretations emphasised what he believed were the pagan origins of Austrian place-names, customs, and legends, describing the landscape as being embodied by « genius loci » , and expressing clear German nationalist and « Völkisch » sentiment.

In 1888, List published his 1st novel, « Carnuntum » , in 2 volumes. Set in the late- 4th Century CE, the narrative focused on a romance set against the background of the conflict between Germanic tribes and the Roman Empire around the area of the eponymous Roman fort. The novel established List as a recognized figure within Austria's Pan-German community, a movement of individuals unified in their belief that the majority German-speaking areas of the multi-linguistic and multi-ethnic Austro-Hungarian State should cede and join with the newly-established German Empire. The book also brought him to the attention of Friedrich Wannieck, a wealthy industrialist who was the chairman of both the Prague Iron Company and the 1st Brno Engineering Company. Wannieck was also president of the « Verein “ Deutsches Haus ” » (German House Association) , a nationalist organisation of linguistically German inhabitants of Brno who felt encircled by the largely Czech population of South Moravia. List and Wannieck began corresponding, resulting in a lifelong friendship between the 2 men. The « Verein “ Deutsches Haus ” » subsequently published 3 of List's works in its series on German nationalist studies of history and literature.

List began regularly writing for a weekly newspaper, the « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » (East German Review) , which had been established in 1890 by the Austrian Pan-German parliamentary deputy Karl Wolf. In 1891, List anthologized many of the magazine articles that he had written over the previous decades in his book « Deutsch-Mythologische Landschaftsbilder » (German Mythological Landscape Scenes) , extracts of which were then published in the « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » . Further « Völkisch » articles on various topics pertaining to Austria's folk-culture and to its ancient Germanic tribes followed during the 1890's, although mid-way through that decade his work took on an explicitly anti-Semitic nature with articles such as « Die Juden als Staat und Nation » . Other Austrian German nationalist newspapers which published his articles during this period included the « Bote aus dem Waldviertel » (The Waldviertel Herald) and « Kyffhäuser » .

List began lecturing on these subjects ; for instance, in February 1893, he spoke to the nationalist « Verein “ Deutsches Geschichte ” » (German History Association) on the ancient priesthood of Wotan. He also worked as a playwright and, in December 1894, his play « Der Wala Erweckung » (The Wala's Awakening) was premiered at an event organized by the « Bund der Germanen » (Germanic League) which was devoted to the German nationalist cause, with Jews being explicitly banned from attending the event. Alongside his affiliation with the « Bund » , List was also a member of the « Deutscher Turnverein » (Germanic Gymnastic League) , a strongly nationalistic group to whom he contributed literary works for their events.

In 1893, List and Fanny Wschiansky founded a belletristic society devoted to encouraging German nationalist and neo-Romantic literature in Vienna, the « Literarische Donaugesellschaft » (Danubian Literary Society) . The group was partly based upon the 15th Century « Litteraria Sodalita Danubiana » created by the Viennese humanist Conrad Celte, about whom List authored a brief biography in 1893. He also authored 2 further novels during the 1890's, both of which were historical romances set in Iron Age Germany. The 1st appeared in 1894 as « Jung Diethers Heimkehr » (Young Diether's Homecoming) , which told the story of a young Teuton living in the 5th Century who has been forcefully converted to Christianity but who returns to his original solar cult. The 2nd was « Pipara » , a 2 volume story published in 1895 which told the story of an eponymous Quadi maiden who escaped captivity from the Romans to become an Empress. In 1898, he then authored a catechism exhibiting a form of pagan deism titled « Der Unbesiegbare » (The Invincible) .

List's activities had made him a celebrity within the Austrian Pan-German movement, with the editors of the « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » convening a Guido List evening, in April 1895 ; and South Vienna's Wieden Singers' Club holding a List Festival, in April 1897. Having divorced his previous wife, in August 1899, List married Anna Wittek, who was from Stecky in Bohemia. Despite List's modern Pagan faith, the wedding was held in an evangelical Protestant church, reflecting the growing popularity of Protestantism among Austria's Pan-German community, who perceived it as a more authentically German form of Christianity than the Catholicism that was popular among Austria-Hungary's other ethnic and linguistic communities. Wittek had previously appeared in a performance of List's « Der Wala Erweckung » and had publicly recited some of his poetry. Following their marriage, List devoted himself fully to drama, authoring the plays « König Vannius » (King Vannius) , in 1899 ; « Sommer-Sonnwend-Feuerzauber » (Summer Solstice Fire Magic) , in 1901 ; and « Das Goldstück » (The Gold Coin) , in 1903. He also authored a pamphlet titled « Der Wiederaufbau von Carnuntum » (The Reconstruction of Carnuntum) , in 1900, in which he called for the reconstruction of the ancient Roman amphitheatre at Carnuntum, as an open-air stage through which Wotanism could be promoted.

« List belonged to an older generation than most of his pre-War fellow ideologues and, thus, became a cult-figure on the Eastern edge of the German world. He was regarded by his readers and followers as a bearded old patriarch and a mystical nationalist guru whose clairvoyant gaze had lifted the glorious Aryan and Germanic past of Austria into full-view from beneath the debris of foreign influences and Christian culture. In his books and lectures, List invited true Germans to behold the clearly discernible remains of a wonderful theocratic Ario-German State, wisely governed by priest-kings and gnostic initiates, in the archaeology, folklore, and landscape of his homeland. »

(Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, Historian of esotericism.)

According to the historian Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, the year 1902 marked « a fundamental change in the character of List's ideas : occult ideas now entered his fantasy of the ancient Germanic faith » . This began when he received an operation to remove a cataract from his eye, after which he was left blind for 11 months. During this period of rest and recuperation, he contemplated questions surrounding the origins of the German language and the use of runes. He subsequently produced a manuscript detailing what he deemed to be a proto-language of the Aryan race, in which he claimed that occult insight had enabled him to interpret the letters and sounds of both runes and emblems and glyphs found on ancient inscriptions. Terming it « a monumental pseudo-science » , Goodrick-Clarke also noted that it constituted « the Masterpiece of his occult-nationalist researches » . List sent a copy to the Imperial Academy of Sciences in Vienna, but they declined to publish it. In 1903, List published an article in « Die Gnosis » magazine, which reflected a clear influence from the ideas of the Theosophical Society.

List had occasionally used the title of « von » in his name, from 1903 onward ; but began using it permanently in 1907. The term was used to denote that an individual was a member of the nobility, and when the nobility archive ordered an official enquiry into List's use of the term, he was called before magistrates in October 1907. He defended his usage of the term with the claim that he was the descendant of aristocrats from Lower-Austria and Styria, and that his great-grandfather had abandoned the title to become an inn-keeper. Goodrick-Clarke noted that whatever the legitimacy of List's unproven claims, claiming the title of von was « an integral part of List's religious fantasy » because, in his mind, it connected him to the ancient Wotanist priesthood, from whom he believed Austria's aristocrats were descended. It is possible that List decided to adopt the usage of the term after his friend, the fellow prominent Ariosophist Lanz von Liebenfels, had done so in 1903.

List's popularity among the Pan-Germanist movement resulted in suggestions that a Society devoted to the promotion of List's work be established. This materialized as the « Guido-von-List-Gesellschaft » , in March 1908, which was largely funded by the Wannieck family but which also included many prominent figures from middle and upper-class Austrian and German society. At Midsummer 1911, List founded the High Armanen Order (« Hoher Armanen-Ordem ») , or HAO, as an inner-group of Armanist practitioners within the List Society with whom he went on pilgrimages to various places that he believed had been ancient cultic sites associated with the worship of Wotan. He operated as leader of this group, using the title of Grand Master. The List Society also produced 6 booklets authored by List himself, between 1908 and 1911. Titled « Ario-Germanic research reports » , they covered List's opinions on the meaning and magical power of runes, the ancient Wotanic priesthood, Austrian folklore and place-names, and the secret messages within heraldic devices. In 1914, the Society then published List's work on runes and language that the Imperial Academy had turned down. The 1st 3 of these publications furthered List's reputation across both the « Völkisch » and nationalist sub-cultures within both Austria and Germany. Many other writers were inspired by List, with a number of works being specifically dedicated to him. The editor of Prana, Johannes Balzli, authored a biography of List that was published in 1917.

During World War I, List erroneously proclaimed that there would be victory for the Central Powers of Germany and Austria-Hungary, claiming to have learned this information from a vision that he experienced in 1917. By 1918, List was in declining health, furthered by the food shortages experienced in Vienna as a result of the War. In the spring of 1919, at the age of 71, List and his wife set-off to recuperate and meet followers at the manor house of Eberhard von Brockhusen, a List Society patron who lived at Langen in Brandenburg, Germany. On arrival at the Anhalter Station at Berlin, List felt too exhausted to continue the journey. After a doctor had diagnosed a lung inflammation, his health deteriorated quickly, and he died in a Berlin guest-house on the morning of 17 May 1919. He was cremated in Leipzig and his ashes laid in an urn and then buried at the Vienna Central Cemetery (« Zentralfriedhof ») . An obituary of List authored by Berlin journalist Philipp Stauff, then, appeared in the « Münchener Beobachter » .

List promoted a religion termed « Wotanism », which he saw as the exoteric, outer-form of pre-Christian Germanic religion, while « Armanism » was the term he applied to what he believed were the esoteric, secret teachings of this ancient belief system. He believed that while Wotanism expounded polytheism for the wider population, those who were members of the Armanist elite were aware of the reality of monotheism. List's Armanism would later be classified as a form of « Ariosophy », a term which was coined by Lanz von Liebenfels in 1915. Goodrick-Clarke considered List's ideas to be a « unique amalgam of nationalist mythology and esotericism ». Religious studies scholar Olav Hammer noted that List's Wotanism « increasingly came to consist of an original synthesis of his reading of Germanic mythology with Theosophy ». List's early Theosophical influence came largely from the writings of German Theosophist Max Ferdinand Sebaldt von Werth, who had combined Theosophical ideas with his own interpretations of Germanic mythology and emphasis on racial doctrines, thus, anticipating Ariosophy. In later work, this Theosophical influence over List's thinking grew, and he began referencing works such as Helena Blavatsky's « Die Geheimlehre » and William Scott Elliot's « The Lost Lemuria » in his publications. He expressed the view that Norse mythology accorded with (and thus proved) the cosmogonical teachings of Theosophy.

Much of List's understanding of the ancient past was based not on empirical research into historical, archaeological, and folkloric sources, but rather on ideas that he claimed to have received as a result of clairvoyant illumination. Later writer Richard Rudgley, thus, characterized List's understanding of the « pagan past » as an « imaginative reconstruction ». List's Wotanism was constructed largely on the Prose Edda and the Poetic Edda, 2 Old Norse textual sources which had been composed in Iceland during the late Middle-Ages ; he nevertheless believed that they accurately reflected the belief systems of Germany, having been authored by « Wotanist » refugees fleeing Christianity. He believed that, prior to the spread of Christianity into Northern Europe, there had once been a culturally unified German civilisation that had been spread across much of Europe, which came to be degraded and divided under the impact of Christianity. He believed that the Danubian region of modern Austria had, thus, been part of this unified German civilisation before the growth of the Roman Empire, an idea in contrast to the view accepted by historians of the time that linguistically German communities only settled in the area during the reign of the Frankish King Charlemagne in the 9th Century CE, pushing-out the pre-existing linguistically Celtic groups.

List believed that the basic teachings of Wotanism were found in the runic alphabet, believing that they could be deciphered by linking these letters with particular runic spells which appear in the Old Norse Havamal. He claimed to have deciphered these secret meanings himself, translating them as statements such as « Know yourself, then you know everything », « Do not fear death, he cannot kill you », « Marriage is the root of the Aryan race ! », and « Man is one with God ! ». List emphasized the importance of a mystical union between humans and the universe, viewing divinity as being immanent in nature, with all life being an emanation of it. Connected to this, he believed in a close identification between the racial group (the « Volk », or folk) and the natural world. List believed that human beings had an immortal soul, and that it would be re-incarnated according to the laws of karma until eventually uniting with divinity.

In the 1890's, List initially devised the idea that ancient German society had been led by a hierarchical system of initiates, the « Armanenschaft », an idea which had developed into a key-part of his thinking by 1908. List's image of the « Armanenschaft » 's structure was based largely on his knowledge of Freemasonry. He claimed that the ancient brotherhood had consisted of 3 degrees, each with their own secret signs, grips, and passwords. He believed that the « Armanenschaft » had societal control over the ancient German people, acting as teachers, priests, and judges. In List's interpretation of history, the Christian missionaries persecuted the « Armanenschaft » , resulting in many fleeing northward into Scandinavia and Iceland. He believed that they developed a secretive language for transmitting their teachings, known as « kala » .

List claimed that he abandoned his family's Roman Catholic faith in childhood, instead devoting himself to the pre-Christian god Wotan. Spending much time in the Austrian countryside, he engaged in rowing, hiking, and sketching the landscape. From 1877, he began a career as a journalist, primarily authoring articles on the Austrian countryside for nationalist newspapers and magazines. In these, he placed a « Völkisch » emphasis on the folk-culture and customs of rural people, believing that many of them were survivals of pre-Christian, pagan religion. He published 3 novels : « Carnuntum » (1888) ; « Jung Diethers Heimkehr » (1894) ; and « Pipara » (1895) , each set among the German tribes of the Iron Age, as well as authoring several plays. During the 1890's, he continued writing « Völkisch » articles, now largely for the nationalist « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » newspaper, with his works taking on an anti-Semitic dimension half-way through that decade. In 1893, he co-founded the « Literarische Donaugesellschaft » literary Society, and involved himself in Austria's Pan-German nationalist movement, a « milieu » which sought the integration of Austria into the German Empire.

During an 11 month period of blindness, in 1902, List became increasingly interested in occultism, in particular coming under the influence of the Theosophical Society, resulting in an expansion of his Wotanic beliefs to incorporate Runology and the « Armanen Futharkh » . The popularity of his work among the « Völkisch » and nationalist communities resulted in the establishment of a List Society, in 1908 ; attracting significant middle and upper-class support, the Society published List's writings and included an Ariosophist inner-group, the High Armanen Order, over whom List presided as Grand Master. Through these ventures, he promoted the millenarian view that modern society was degenerate, but that it would be cleansed through an apocalyptic event resulting in the establishment of a new Pan-German Empire that would embrace Wotanism. Having erroneously prophesied that this Empire would be established by victory for the Central Powers in World War I, List died on a visit to Berlin in 1919.

List claimed that, after the Christianisation of Northern Europe, the Armanist teachings were passed down in secret, thus, resulting in their transmission through later esoteric traditions such as Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism. He also claimed that the Medieval Knights Templar had been keepers of these Armanist secrets, and that they had been persecuted by the Christian establishment as a result of this ; he believed that the deity they were accused of worshipping, Baphomet, was actually a sigil of the Maltese Cross representing Armanist teachings. According to List, a number of prominent Renaissance humanists (including Giovanni Pico della Mirandola, Giordano Bruno, Johannes Trithemius, Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa, and Johann Reuchlin) were also aware of this ancient Armanist teaching, with List claiming that he was actually the re-incarnation of Reuchlin. In addition, List claimed that in the 8th Century, Armanists had imparted their secret teachings to the Jewish rabbis of Cologne in the hope of preserving them from Christian persecution ; he believed that these teachings became the « Kabbalah » , which he therefore reasoned was an ancient German and not Jewish innovation, thus legitimising its usage in his own teachings. Rudgley stated that this « tortuous argument » was used to support List's anti-Semitic agenda.

List generally saw the world in which he was living as one of degeneration, comparing it with the societies of the Late Roman and Byzantine Empires. He bemoaned the decline of the rural peasantry through urbanisation, having witnessed how Vienna's population tripled between 1870 and 1890, resulting in over-crowding, a growth in diseases like tuberculosis, and a severe strain on the city's resources. A staunch monarchist, he opposed all forms of democracy, feminism, and modern trends in the arts, such as those of the Vienna Secessionists. Influenced by the Pan-Germanist politician Georg Ritter von Schönerer and his « Away from Rome ! » movement, List decried the growing influence of linguistically Slavic communities within the Austro-Hungarian Empire. He was opposed to « laissez-faire » Capitalism and large-scale enterprise, instead favouring an economic system based on small-scale artisans and craftsmen, being particularly unhappy with the decline in tradesmen's guilds. He was similarly opposed to the modern banking sector and financial institutions, deeming it to be dominated by Jews ; in criticizing these institutions, he expressed anti-Semitic sentiments. Such views of the country's economic situation were not uncommon in Austria at the time, having become particularly widespread following the Panic (« Krach ») of 1873. The later Heathen and runologist Edred Thorsson noted that List's « theories were to some degree based on the anti-Semitic dogmas of the day » , while Hammer stated that the Ariosophic tradition promulgated by List and others was « unambiguously racist and anti-Semitic » .

List believed that the degradation of modern Western society was as a result of a conspiracy orchestrated by a secret organisation known as the Great International Party, an idea influenced by anti-Semitic conspiracy theories. Adopting a millenarianist perspective, he believed in the imminent defeat of this enemy and the establishment of a better future for the Ario-German race. In April 1915, he welcomed the start of World War I as a conflict that would bring about the defeat of Germany's enemies and the establishment of a golden age for the new Ario-German Empire. Toward the War's end, he believed that the German War dead would be re-incarnated as a generation who would push through with a national revolution and establish this new, better society. For List, this better future would be intricately connected to the ancient past, reflecting his belief in the cyclical nature of time, something which he had adopted both from a reading of Norse mythology and from Theosophy. Reflecting his monarchist beliefs, he envisioned this future state as being governed by the House of Hapsburg, with a revived feudal system of land ownership being introduced through which land would be inherited by a man's eldest son. In List's opinion, this new Empire would be highly-hierarchical, with non-Aryans being subjugated under the Aryan population and opportunities for education and jobs in public service being restricted to those deemed racially pure. He envisioned this Empire following the Wotanic religion which he promoted.

During his lifetime, List became a well-known figure among the nationalist and « Völkisch » sub-cultures of Austria and Germany, influencing the work of many others operating in this « milieu » . His work, propagated through the List Society, influenced later « Völkisch » groups such as the « Reichshammerbund » and « Germanenorden » , and through those exerted an influence on both the burgeoning Nazi Party and the SS. After World War II, his work continued to influence an array of Ariosophic and Heathen practitioners in Europe, Australia, and North America.

« It was Guido von List, a Viennese mythomaniac who, more than anyone else, laid the foundations for the Romantic blend of ideas that links these proto-Nazis uncannily with the Greens and New-Agers of today : an interest in natural living, vegetarianism, anti-industrialism, an appreciation of prehistoric monuments and the wisdom of those who built them ; a feeling for astrology, earth energies, and natural cycles ; a religious outlook vaguely resembling that of Theosophy. »

(Joscelyn Godwin, Historian of esotericism, 1996.)

Writing in 2003, the historian of religion Mattias Gardell believed that List had become the « revered guru of Ariosophic paganism » . Gardell considered the Austrian esotericist to have been « a legend in his lifetime » , with List's ideas being embraced by many « Völkisch » groups in Germany. German members of the List Society included Philipp Stauff, Karl Hellwig, Georg Hauerstein, Bernhard Koerner, and Eberhard von Brockhusen, who were founding members of the « Reichshammerbund » and « Germanen-Orden » ; through the « Germanen-Orden » 's Munich offshoot, the Thule Society, a lineage can be drawn between the List Society and the early Nazi Party as it was established after World War I. Goodrick-Clarke opined that « this channel of influence certainly carries most weight in any assessment of List's historical importance » . The scholar of Western esotericism Joscelyn Godwin expressed the view that List was one of the « 3 godfathers of Nazi Thule » alongside Lanz von Liebenfels and Rudolf von Sebottendorff, while Richard Rudgley went further by claiming that List's vision of a future German Empire constituted « a blueprint for the Nazi regime » .

Other German « Völkisch » figures promoted Listian ideas to the wider public during and after the First World War. Further individuals (notably Rudolf John Gorsleben, Werner von Bülow, Friedrich Bernhard Marby, Herbert Reichstein, and Frodi Ingolfson Werhmann) took List's Ariosophical ideas alongside those of Liebenfels and built upon them further, resulting in a flourishing Ariosophical movement in the late- 1920's and 1930's, with some of these individuals being within the coterie of prominent Nazi Heinrich Himmler and influencing the symbolism and rituals of the SS. His was also exerted an influence on the Australian Odinit and Ariosophist Alexander Rud Mills.

Both Goodrick-Clarke and, later, the religious studies scholar Stefanie von Schnurbein described List as « the pioneer of “ Völkisch ” rune occultism » , with the latter adding that « the roots of modern esoteric runology are found in Guido List's visions » . In 1984, Edred Thorsson expressed the view that List's impact was such that he was « able to shape the runic theories of German magicians (although not necessarily their political ones) from that time to the present day » . In 1976, 2 longstanding activists in the « Völkisch » and far-Right « milieu » , Adolf and Sigrun Schleipfer, established the « Armanen-Orden » , in order to revive List's ideas, adopting a strong anti-modernist stance and a desire to revive pre-Christian religion. It was through the « Armanen-Orden » that Thorsson, who joined it, learned about List's work. Thorsson then spearheaded « the post-War runic revival » , founding an initiatory organisation known as the « Rune Gild » in 1980. Thorsson was responsible for translating a number of List's works into English, alongside those of other « Völkisch » mystics like Siegfried Adolf Kummer. These publications brought awareness of List to an English-speaking readership, with his 1988 translation of List's « The Secret of the Runes » initiating a surge of interest in Ariosophy among the Heathen community of the United States. List's runology also made an appearance in Stephan Grundy's 1990 book, « Teutonic Magic » . List's Armanist ideas have been cited as an inspiration for the American Odinit militant David Lane, with « Wotansvolk » , a group that List was involved in establishing, viewing their own activism as a continuation of that begun by List. List was also of interest to the Heathen Michael Moynihan, who spent time visiting the places in Austria that are associated with List's life.

Société Thulé

La Société Thulé ou l'Ordre de Thulé (« Thule-Gesellschaft ») fut une société secrète allemande de Munich qui, à l'origine, était un groupe d'études ethnologiques s'intéressant tout spécialement à l'Antiquité germanique et au pan-germanisme aryen. Ses mythes racistes et occultistes inspirèrent le mysticisme nazi et l'idéologie nazie.

Elle tire son nom de Thulé, partie la plus septentrionale d'Europe et lieu mythique pour les anciens Grecs et Romains, dans lequel le dieu Apollon viendrait passer une partie de l'hiver. Le nom de Thulé figure notamment dans l'Énéide du poète romain Virgile, et il est généralement admis que l'« Ultima Thule » des Grecs de l'Antiquité désignait les terres les plus au nord, et tout particulièrement la Scandinavie. Certains discours de la fin du XIXe siècle, abondamment repris par la suite, affirment que Thulé aurait été le nom magique d'une civilisation germanique avancée, mais disparue. Cette idée est reprise par les membres de la Société Thulé, qui pensaient que Thulé était ce qui subsistait d'un continent aujourd'hui disparu, appelé Hyperborée, et que ce continent était le berceau de la race aryenne. « Ultima Thule » aurait été la capitale du 1er continent colonisé par les Aryens.

Au départ simple loge au sein d'une société secrète pan-germaniste, « Völkisch » et antisémite, la Société Thulé a été constituée par Rudolf Glauer, qui se prétend baron Rudolf von Sebottendorf, le 17 août 1918. Diffusée à Munich, l'idéologie de cette société prônait l'antisémitisme, l'anti-républicanisme, le paganisme et le racisme. Son symbole, la croix de Wotan, divinité pré-germanique, n'est pas sans rappeler la croix gammée. Le salut de Thulé « Heil und Sieg » (Salut et victoire) fut repris par Adolf Hitler qui le transforma en « Sieg Heil ». Ce salut, en liaison avec le bras levé, était un rituel magique utilisé pour la formation de voltes.

Vers 1923, Rudolf Heß, revenu à Munich, devient l'un des animateurs de l'Ordre de Thulé, dont Hermann Göring est l'un des membres les plus célèbres.

Autour de cette société secrète gravitent un certain nombre de groupuscules, dont est issu le NSDAP, le « Deutsche Arbeiterverein » de Karl Harrer, qui devient le « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei », fondé par Anton Drexler et Harrer ; pour bien marquer leur filiation, les fondateurs du « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » reprennent la croix gammée.

Expulsé du « Reich » en 1934, Sebottendorf se serait suicidé en se jetant dans le Bosphore en 1945, mais il a été retrouvé par les services secrets britanniques et a fini sa vie en 1950, en Égypte.

L'idéologie de l'Ordre était fondée sur la croyance en l'existence de surhommes et d'une race humaine supérieure : les Aryens qui auraient vu le jour dans l'hypothétique Hyperborée. L'un de ses textes de référence est les « Protocoles des Sages de Sion ». Ce texte fut repris par Adolf Hitler comme pièce maîtresse de la propagande antisémite du 3e « Reich » et par Alfred Rosenberg dans son ouvrage « Le Mythe du XXe siècle ».

L'idéologie professée par la Société Thulé s'inspire d'un corpus d'éléments ésotériques et mystiques puisés dans l'Ariosophie de Guido von List, chez Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels, un autre faux-baron s'appelant simplement Lanz, Rudolf von Sebottendorf, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, Arthur de Gobineau, et des théories aryano-centristes de certains archéologues allemands. List se propose de diriger les Aryens vers une société paysanne, patriarcale et esclavagiste.

Selon plusieurs auteurs grecs et latins, il aurait existé dans des temps très reculés un continent situé à l'Extrême-Nord, qu'ils appelaient Hyperborée (« Ultima Thule »), lequel aurait été peuplé d'hommes transparents. Ceux-ci, en s'alliant aux autres hommes, auraient donné naissance à des êtres humains de plus en plus opaques, mais leurs descendants auraient néanmoins conservé leurs facultés, supérieures à celles des humains ordinaires (voir Ánd).

Un des paradoxes de cette société est que plusieurs membres lisaient le Talmud dans le but de pratiquer l'occultisme et de formuler une théosophie anti-juive, alors que le Talmud est pourtant essentiel à la religion juive.

La plupart des membres sont ariosophes ; certains sont initiés à la Franc-maçonnerie, même si certaines de leurs idées s'opposent radicalement, comme celle de la fraternité universelle : l'aryen est dit d'une race humaine d'origine divine, tandis que le Juif est considéré être un sous-homme.

Comme les multiples groupuscules « Völkisch » qui fleurissent en Allemagne après la défaite de 1918, la Société Thulé développe une rhétorique antisémite, raciste et nationaliste, tout en prêtant son nom à un groupe de combat antisémite engagé dans la répression de la République des Conseils à Munich.

Ses liens avec le mouvement nazi sont nombreux, mais leur nature réelle largement ignorée aujourd'hui encore.

Propriétaire du journal, le « Völkischer Beobachter », la société a revendu le titre au « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei », et a accueilli la rédaction du journal après l'avoir revendu.

Le Svastika dextrogyre, la croix gammée, utilisée par les occultistes depuis le XVIIIe siècle, a été proposée comme emblème du « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » par un militant membre de la société, lors du congrès de Salzbourg : il a néanmoins été modifié par Hitler, peu après.

Personne ne connaît exactement la liste complète des membres, ce qui a amené certains auteurs à échafauder des théories diverses sur l'adhésion de personnalités à une section secrète de la Société Thulé notamment au sein de l'élite SS.

Des auteurs comme Werner Gerson dans l'ouvrage cité ci-après, Jacques Bergier dans le « Matin des Magiciens », et Trevor Ravenscroft dans la « Lance du Destin », rapportent que les membres de Thulé, considéraient Rudolf Steiner et ses disciples comme leurs pires ennemis. Steiner a été secrétaire-général de la section allemande de la Société théosophique, avant la fondation de la Société Thulé. Comme certains membres de la Société Thulé auraient aussi été membres de la Société théosophique, l'amalgame était facile.

René Alleau affirme avoir découvert en Allemagne la liste des membres de la Société Thulé, publiée en 1933 par Rudolf von Sebottendorf, laquelle comprend 226 noms, mais pas celui de Rudolf Steiner. Dans sa liste, von Sebottendorf ne mentionne pas Hitler comme membre de la Société Thulé, mais écrit en 1933, qu'il fut fréquemment « l'hôte de la Thulé » .

Quelques-uns des autres membres cités par divers auteurs sont : Rudolf von Sebottendorf, Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels, Guido von List, Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß, Alfred Rosenberg, Julius Streicher, Hans Frank, Bernhard Stempfle, Theo Morell.

Dès les années 1930, et plus encore après sa dissolution, la Société Thulé exerce une forte fascination dans certains milieux, notamment les groupes occultistes et les associations d'extrême-droite nostalgique du 3e « Reich » .

On crédite cette société d'une forte influence non seulement sur les dirigeants du 3e « Reich » , mais aussi dans les premiers moments du mouvement nazi, mais il semblerait, que, sur ce dernier point, les chercheurs soient incapables de se prononcer clairement dans un sens ou dans un autre, ce qui génère de nombreuses spéculations sur la question, aujourd'hui encore.

Durant les années 1960, certains auteurs proches des milieux occultistes, Jan van Helsing, notamment, défend, sur la base du témoignage largement remis en cause de Hermann Rauschning, l'idée que Hitler serait un initié, membre important de la Société Thulé, transformée pour la cause en société initiatique.

...

The Thule Society (« Thule-Gesellschaft ») , originally the « Studiengruppe für germanisches Altertum » (Study Group for Germanic Antiquity) , was a German occultist and « Völkisch » group in Munich, named after a mythical northern country from Greek legend. The Society is notable chiefly as the organization that sponsored the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » (DAP ; German Workers' Party) , which was later re-organized by Adolf Hitler into the National-Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP or Nazi Party) . According to Hitler biographer Ian Kershaw, the organization's « membership list reads like a Who's Who of early Nazi sympathizers and leading figures in Munich » , including Rudolf Heß, Alfred Rosenberg, Hans Frank, Julius Lehmann, Gottfried Feder, Dietrich Eckart, and Karl Harrer.

However, Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke contends that Hans Frank and Rudolf Heß had been Thule members, but other leading Nazis had only been invited to speak at Thule meetings or were entirely unconnected with it.

According to Johannes Hering :

« There is no evidence that Hitler ever attended the Thule Society. »

The Thule Society was originally a « German study group » headed by Walter Nauhaus, a wounded World War I veteran turned art-student from Berlin who had become a keeper of pedigrees for the « Germanenorden » (Order of Teutons) , a secret society founded in 1911, and formally named in the following year. In 1917, Nauhaus moved to Munich ; his Thule Society was to be a cover-name for the Munich branch of the « Germanenorden » , but events developed differently as a result of a schism in the Order. In 1918, Nauhaus was contacted in Munich by Rudolf von Sebottendorf (or Sebottendorff) , an occultist and newly-elected head of the Bavarian province of the schismatic offshoot known as the « Germanenorden Walvater » of the Holy Grail. The 2 men became associates in a recruitment campaign, and Sebottendorff adopted Nauhaus's Thule Society as a cover-name for his Munich lodge of the « Germanenorden Walvater » at its formal dedication on 18 August 1918.

A primary focus of the Thule Society was a claim concerning the origins of the Aryan race. In 1917, people who wanted to join the « Germanic Order » , out of which the Thule Society developed in 1918, had to sign a special « blood declaration of faith » concerning their lineage :

« The signer, hereby, swears to the best of his knowledge and belief that no Jewish or coloured blood flows in either his or in his wife's veins, and that among their ancestors are no members of the coloured races. »

« Thule » (Greek : Θούλη) was a land located by Greco-Roman geographers in the farthest north (often displayed as Iceland) . The term « Ultima Thule » (Latin : most distant Thule) is also mentioned by Roman poet Virgil in his pastoral poems called the Georgics. Thule originally was probably the name for Scandinavia, although Virgil simply uses it as a proverbial expression for the edge of the known world, and his mention should not be taken as a substantial reference to Scandinavia.

The Thule Society identified « Ultima Thule » as a lost ancient landmass in the extreme north, near Greenland or Iceland, said by Nazi mystics to be the capital of ancient Hyperborea. These ideas were derived from earlier speculation by Ignatius Loyola Donnelly that a lost landmass had once existed in the Atlantic, and that it was the home of the Aryan race, a theory which he supported by reference to the distribution of Swastika motifs. He identified this with Plato's Atlantis, a theory further developed by Helena Blavatsky, an occultist during the 2nd part of the 19th Century.

The Thule Society attracted about 250 followers in Munich, and about 1,500 elsewhere in Bavaria. Its meetings were often held in the luxury « Hotel Vierjahreszeiten » (4 Seasons Hotel) in Munich.

The followers of the Thule Society were very interested in racial theory and, in particular, in combating Jews and Communists. Sebottendorff planned but failed to kidnap Bavarian Socialist prime minister Kurt Eisner, in December 1918. During the Bavarian revolution of April 1919, Thulists were accused of trying to infiltrate its government and of attempting a « coup » . On 26 April, the Communist government in Munich raided the Society's premises and took 7 of its members into custody, executing them on 30 April. Amongst them were Walter Nauhaus and 4 well-known aristocrats, including Countess Heila von Westarp who functioned as the group's secretary, and Prince Gustav of Thurn and Taxis who was related to several European Royal families. In response, the Thule organized a citizens' up-rising as White troops entered the city, on 1 May.

In 1918, the Thule Society bought a local weekly newspaper, the « Münchener Beobachter » (Munich Observer) , and changed its name to « Münchener Beobachter und Sportblatt » (Munich Observer and Sports Paper) in an attempt to improve its circulation. The « Münchener Beobachter » later became the « Völkischer Beobachter » (People's Observer) , the main Nazi newspaper. It was edited by Karl Harrer.

Anton Drexler had developed links between the Thule Society and various extreme-Right workers' organizations in Munich. He established the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » (German Workers' Party) , or DAP, on 5 January 1919, together with the Thule Society's Karl Harrer. Adolf Hitler joined this Party, in September the same year. By the end of February 1920, the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » had been reconstituted as the « Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » (National Socialist German Workers' Party) , or NSDAP, often referred to as the Nazi Party.

Sebottendorff, by then, had left the Thule Society, and never joined the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » or the Nazi Party. Dietrich Bronder (« Bevor Hitler kam » , 1964) alleged that other members of the Thule Society were later prominent in Nazi Germany : the list includes Dietrich Eckart (who coached Hitler on his public speaking skills, along with Erik Jan Hanussen, and had « Mein Kampf » dedicated to him) , as well as Gottfried Feder, Hans Frank, Hermann Göring, Karl Haushofer, Rudolf Heß, Heinrich Himmler, and Alfred Rosenberg. Historian Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke has described this membership roll and similar claims as « spurious » and « fanciful » , noting that Feder, Eckart, and Rosenberg were never more than guests to whom the Thule Society extended hospitality during the Bavarian revolution of 1918, although he has more recently acknowledged that Heß and Frank were members of the Society before they came to prominence in the Nazi Party. It has also been claimed that Adolf Hitler himself was a member. Evidence on the contrary shows that he never attended a meeting, as attested to by Johannes Hering's diary of Society meetings. It is quite clear that Hitler himself had little interest in, and made little time for, « esoteric » matters. (See also Hitler's Nuremberg speech of 6 September 1938 on his disapproval of occultism.)

Wilhelm Laforce and Max Sesselmann (staff on the « Münchener Beobachter ») were Thule members who later joined the « Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » .

Early, in 1920, Karl Harrer was forced-out of the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » as Hitler moved to sever the Party's link with the Thule Society, which subsequently fell into decline and was dissolved about 5 years later, well before Hitler came to power.

Rudolf von Sebottendorff had withdrawn from the Thule Society in 1919, but he returned to Germany in 1933 in the hope of reviving it. In that year, he published a book entitled « Bevor Hitler kam » (Before Hitler Came) , in which he claimed that the Thule Society had paved the way for the « Führer » :

« Thulers were the ones to whom Hitler Ist came, and Thulers were the Ist to unite themselves with Hitler. »

This claim was not favourably received by the Nazi authorities : after 1933, esoteric organisations were suppressed (including « Völkisch » occultists) , many closed down by anti-Masonic legislation in 1935. Sebottendorff's book was prohibited and he, himself, was arrested and imprisoned for a short period in 1934, afterwards departing into exile in Turkey.

Nonetheless, it has been argued that some Thule members and their ideas were incorporated into the 3rd « Reich » . Some of the Thule Society's teachings were expressed in the books of Alfred Rosenberg. Many occult ideas found favour with Heinrich Himmler, who had a great interest in mysticism, unlike Hitler, but the « Schutzstaffel » (SS) under Himmler emulated the structure of Ignatius Loyola's Jesuit order rather than the Thule Society, according to Heinz Höhne.

The Thule Society has become the center of many conspiracy theories concerning Nazi Germany, due to its occult background (like the « Ahnenerbe » section of the SS) . Such theories include the creation of vril-powered Nazi UFOs.

La Société Thulé et Hitler

The planning of the Second World War started when Adolf Hitler joined a secret society called the Thule Society in 1919. It was in this group that he found the perverted beliefs that were later to lead him in his control of the German government.

In the Thule Society :

« The sun played a prime role as a sacred symbol of the Aryans, in contrast to the moon, revered by the Semitic peoples. The “ Führer ” saw in the Jewish people, with their black hair and swarthy complexions, the dark side of the human species, whilst the blond and blue-eyed Aryans constituted the light side of humanity. Hitler undertook to extirpate from the material world its impure elements. »

In addition to sun (or light) worship, the Thule Society also practiced Satan worship :

« The inner-core within the Thule Society were all Satanists who practiced Black Magic. »

The Society was not a working-man's group as it included amongst its members :

« Judges, police-chiefs, barristers, lawyers, university professors and lecturers, aristocratic families, leading industrialists, surgeons, physicians, scientists, as well as a host of rich and influential bourgeois. »

The membership of the Thule Society also became the foundation of the Nazi Party :

« The Committee and the 40 original members of the New German Workers' Party were all drawn from the most powerful occult society in Germany - the Thule Society. »

One of the founders of both groups, the Nazi Party and the Thule Society, was Dietrich Eckart :

« A dedicated Satanist, the supreme adept of the arts and rituals of Black Magic and the central figure in a powerful and wide-spread circle of occultists - the Thule Group. He was one of the 7 founder members of the Nazi Party. »

Eckart claimed to be the initiator of Hitler into the secrets of Satan worship. He is quoted as saying on his deathbed :

« Follow Hitler. He will dance, but it is I who have called the tune ! I have initiated him into the “ Secret Doctrine ” ; opened his centres in vision and given him the means to communicate with the Powers. Do not mourn for me : I shall have influenced history more than any German. »

But it was not just the Thule Society that gave Hitler the support he needed to become the leader of the German government. There were additional sources of Hitler's strength. One who offered an explanation of Hitler's easy rise to power was Walter Langer, a noted psychoanalyst. Langer wrote in his book « The Mind of Adolf Hitler » that it was his theory that Hitler was himself one-quarter Jewish and the grandson of a Rothschild.

He wrote :

« There is a great deal of confusion in studying Hitler's family tree. Adolf's father, Alois Hitler, was the illegitimate son of Maria Anna Schicklgruber. It was generally supposed that the father of Alois Hitler was Johann Georg Hiedler. Alois, however, was not legitimized, and he bore his mother's name until he was 40 years of age when he changed it to Hitler. »

A peculiar series of events, prior to Hitler's birth, furnishes plenty of food for speculation.

There are some people who seriously doubt that Johann Georg Hiedler was the father of Alois. Thyssen and Kœhler, for example, claim that Chancellor Dolfuss (the Chancellor of Austria) had ordered the Austrian police to conduct a thorough investigation into the Hitler family. As a result of this investigation a secret document was prepared that proved Maria Anna Schicklgruber was living in Vienna at the time she conceived.

At that time, she was employed as a servant in the home of Baron Rothschild. As soon as the family discovered her pregnancy, she was sent-back to her home in Spital where Alois was born.

In a postscript in Langer's book, Robert G. L. Waite adds this comment :

« But even when Langer is mistaken and his guesses prove incorrect, he is often on the right track. »

Consider his hint that Hitler's grandfather might have been a Jew. There is no reason to believe the unlikely story told by Langer's informant that Hitler's grandmother Maria Anna Schickelgruber, a peasant woman in her 40's from the Waldviertel of rural Austria, had had an intimate « liaison » with a Baron Rothschild in Vienna.

But Hitler had worried that he might be black-mailed over a Jewish grandfather and ordered his private lawyer, Hans Frank, to investigate his paternal lineage.

Frank did so and told the « Führer » that his grandmother had become pregnant while working as a domestic servant in a Jewish household in Graz.

The facts of this matter are in dispute - and a very lengthy dispute it has been. The point of overriding psychological and historical importance is not whether it is true that Hitler had a Jewish grandfather, but whether he believed that it might be true.

He did so believe and the fact shaped both his personality and his public policy.

It is possible that Hitler discovered his Jewish background and his relation to the Rothschilds, and aware of their enormous power to make or break European governments, re-established contact with the family. This would partially explain the enormous support he received from the international banking fraternity, closely entwined with the Rothschild family, as he rose to power.

One thing is certain, however. Hitler started World War II by moving into Austria 1st. It has been theorized that he moved into this country for 2 reasons. 1st, he wanted to silence Dolfuss who Hitler believed knew that he was a descendant of the Rothschilds, and 2ndly, he wished to remove all traces of his ancestry from the Austrian records.

...

« When I first knew Adolf Hitler in Munich, in 1921 and 1922, he was in touch with a circle that believed firmly in the portents of the stars. », remembered prominent American journalist Karl H. von Wiegand in an interview with « Cosmopolitan » magazine in 1939.

The « circle » mentioned here by the chief correspondent from Hearst International News Service was a Society listed in the Munich Register of Associations as a harmless study group that researched early German history. Members were affluent, influential people from Munich society : professors, noblemen, manufacturers, senior officials, business people. Before Hitler came into contact with the Thule Society, in 1919, the group had already been organising public talks on various Celtic and Teutonic cultural topics for some time. However, the public was not aware of what took place at the secret meetings, to which only Thule members were invited.

In reality, the Thule Society was much more than an innocent study group : it was a secret brotherhood. The emblem of the Thule Society was the Swastika (facing counter-clockwise like the Nazi symbol) and a dagger. The name Thule referred to the old « Ultima Thule », the Land of the North, the mythological homeland of the Teutons. Like Atlantis, legend had it that Thule was a vanished civilisation. The members of the Thule Society believed that the lost civilisation of the Teutons had possessed psychic abilities that were far beyond the technical achievements of the twentieth century. They hoped to rediscover the secrets of this legendary civilisation through occult practises.

There were « Teutonic » secret societies of this kind in Austria and Germany from the mid- 19th Century. The spiritual concepts of these factions can be grouped under the term « Ariosophy », coined by the Austrian seer Guido von List.

These Ariosophic groups were independent of each other organisationally, although many of them were more or less closely linked through personal friendships and mutual members. The notions of the Ariosophes referred to Hindu, Gnostic and hermetic ideas. Magical practises from early and medieval Teutonic times played an important part and the different groups were influenced variously by the Pythagorists, the Neoplatonics, the British mystic Madame Helena Blavatsky, the Rosicrucians, Jakob Böhme, Paracelsus and others. As different as the mystic-magical concepts of the individual groups were, they were linked by their belief in the racist philosophy of Guido von List, which asserted the superiority of the Aryans. In their organisational structure, rituals and terminology, the Ariosophic groups resembled the Freemasons, whom they nevertheless rejected due to their supposed « infiltration by Jews » . As with the Freemasons, there were different levels of initiation in the Ariosophes. The members were gradually introduced to the practises of ritual magic. In these rituals, light, colours, rhythms, symbols or aromas were used to focus mental powers and channel them in a specific direction. The Ariosophes believed this would enable them to bring about changes on the material plane.

The Thule Society was the Bavarian branch of the Ariosophic « Germanenorden » (Teutonic Order) , an association of occultists formed in Leipzig, in 1912, by the esoteric and anti-Semite Theodor Fritsch. In 1916, after a meeting with Fritsch, Baron Rudolf von Sebottendorff assumed leadership of the Bavarian arm, calling it the Thule Society. Sebottendorff was an adventurer and occultist, born in Hoyerswerda, Saxony, in 1875 under the name Ernst Rudolf Glauer. In his autobiography « Der Talisman des Rosenkreuzers » (The Talisman of the Rosicrucian) , Sebottendorff discusses his life, which Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke has researched in more detail. Glauer-Sebottendorff had worked on ships, travelling to New York, Sydney, Cairo and Constantinople. He eventually settled in Turkey and, there, he became involved with occultism. He established contact with the Mevlevi sect of the Whirling Dervishes and was acquainted with the teaching of the Sufis. In his studies, Glauer-Sebottendorff came to the conclusion that Islamic mysticism had Aryan roots. This opinion linked him with Guido von List. The forefather of Ariosophy proclaimed that not just Islam but all religious systems were derived from one single original religion, the religion of the Aryans. In 1910, Glauer-Sebottendorff founded a mystic lodge in Constantinople. 1 year later, he was adopted by Baron Heinrich von Sebottendorff, and so, became a baron himself. He returned to Germany in 1913 and married the daughter of a prosperous Berlin businessman. 3 years later, he assumed leadership of the Thule Society in Munich.

Women were scarcely represented in the Thule Society, the higher-levels of initiation being reserved exclusively for men. Those wishing to join had to complete a questionnaire and submit a photograph, which was examined for purity of race. The following « blood declaration » also had to be filed :

« The undersigned assures to the best of his knowledge and conscience that no Jewish or coloured blood flows through his veins or those of his wife and that there are no family members of coloured race among his forefathers. »

Unlike most other Ariosophic groups, the Thule Society was not content merely with influencing material circumstances through visualisations and ritual magic : the group was also politically active. When the Bavarian King was deposed and the Communists took power in November 1918, the opulent meeting place of the Thule Society, the luxury « 4 Seasons » Hotel, became a centre of counter-revolutionary activities. The Thule Society also set-up a fighting division that took an active part in the power struggle during the revolution in Munich. In April 1919, it enlisted volunteers, who were smuggled by train in their hundreds to Eichstätt to participate in the attack against the Communist regime from there. After the overthrow of the Communist government, in May 1919, the Thule Society shifted its political activities to the field of propaganda. In October 1918, when German defeat in the First World War was imminent, the Thule Society established a Political Workers' Union, from which the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » (German Workers' Party) , or DAP, arose. Individual Thule members, then, appeared as speakers in the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » . Adolf Hitler came across the small, insignificant Party during a lecture, in September 1919. Soon afterwards, he became the 55th member of the Party. Hitler must have quickly realized who was behind the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » , because he promptly demanded an end to the influence of the Thule Society over the Party. 2 months after Hitler joined, he set-down points of order that stated :

« Excludes all forms of dictation (for the Party committee) by a superior or lateral government, whether it be a circle or lodge, once and for all. »

This put an end to the Thule Society's influence over the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » . Thule Party chairman Karl Harrer resigned. However, some Thule members maintained close contact with Hitler after separation of the Thule Society and the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » , most notably the eventual Deputy « Führer » , Rudolf Heß, and the subsequent editor-in-chief of the most important Nazi paper, the « Völkischer Beobachter » (Nationalist Observer) , Dietrich Eckart. It is known that Eckart soon came to see Hitler as the long-awaited « saviour » . Rudolf Heß also seems to have been mesmerised by Hitler. Most Thules saw Hitler as the « drummer » , the herald, the prophet of who was to come. Some, like Rudolf Heß, might have seen him from the very beginning as being « the one » . But certainly, there were also other opinions of Hitler in the Thule Society. It is very likely that the ex-DAP chairman Harrer was not the only one to reject the monopolisation of the Party by Hitler. It seems reasonable to assume that Hitler would have been the cause of disagreements and divisions within the Thule Society.

At any rate, after Hitler joined the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » , the Thule Society fell quiet. It was not involved in the power struggles between the different radical Right-wing groups and splinter groups in Munich at the start of the 1920's. It is not proven that Hitler ever set foot in the meeting rooms of the Thule Society in the « 4 Seasons » Hotel. Johannes Hering's notes on meetings of the Thule Society, between 1920 and 1923, mention the presence of several Nazi leaders but never Hitler himself. Hitler certainly knew how to use his contacts with influential Thule members to his advantage. Their patronage and financial support was of decisive importance during the initial period of his rise. Dietrich Eckart put Hitler in contact with affluent Munich residents, and Thule sympathiser Wilhelm Frick, advisor of Munich's Chief of Police, guarded his Party protectively.

Driven by Hitler's relentless propaganda, the DAP (which Hitler renamed the NSDAP) rapidly developed into a mass movement. The National-Socialist movement no longer had anything in common with the conspiratorial gatherings of the Thule members. The dignified atmosphere of the « 4 Seasons » with talks on the early Teutonic age and magic initiation rituals as outlined by Guido von List was in stark contrast to the Party meetings in beer cellars, where drunkenness, raucousness and often brawls were common-place. The mass deployments of the SA (Stormtroopers) were also a world apart from the rarefied atmosphere of the luxury hotel. It is hardly surprising that the number of Thule members who joined the NSDAP was relatively low. However, some of those who did join the Party later took-up important positions.

After 1926, there were no further signs of life from the Thule Society, but it reappeared with the triumph of the Nazis in 1933. Sebottendorff, who had lived abroad since 1919, re-emerged in Munich and published a book entitled « Bevor Hitler kam » (Before Hitler Came) . He also published a magazine, the « Thule Bote » (Thule Herald) , and organized Thule meetings at the « 4 Seasons » Hotel again. However, the rebirth of the Thule Society was short-lived. When the 2nd edition of Sebottendorff's book was about to appear in 1934, it was seized by the Nazis and the author was imprisoned. His fate had been sealed when he claimed that Hitler owed his initial successes to the Thule Society. Hitler, who never mentioned the Thule Society in « Mein Kampf » or elsewhere, knew that it could only harm him politically if it were to emerge that such a close link existed between an obscure society of spiritualists and the start of his movement. There are contradictory accounts of Sebottendorff's eventual fate. Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke reports that Sebottendorff travelled through Switzerland to Turkey, where he committed suicide in 1945 after Germany's defeat. Reginald H. Phelps quotes Sebottendorff's publisher, H. G. Grassinger Verlag, who claims that Sebottendorff was killed by the Nazis. The Thule Society continued to exist officially until 1937 and, then, quietly disbanded.

The Thule Society is significant to the Nazi movement not just because Hitler assumed control of the « Deutsche Arbeiterpartei » from it. Sebottendorff, the Grandmaster of the Thule Society, was also the owner of the Eher publishing house, which Hitler bought in 1920 and turned the newspaper produced there into the « Völkischer Beobachter » (Nationalist Observer) , which quickly became the most important weapon in the Nazi propaganda arsenal. Additionally, evidence suggests that Hitler also appropriated the Thule Society's emblem, the Swastika, as well as the « Sieg Heil » form of greeting.

Hitler took the Party, his 1st supporters, the newspaper, the gestures and the Swastika from the Thule Society and used these external aspects as a « suit of armour » (in the words of Sebottendorff) . The Grand Master of the Thule brotherhood is not exaggerating when he claims that it was this « suit of armour » that helped Hitler to gain power in a period of time that would, otherwise, seem unnaturally short. The many links between Hitler and the Thule Society have been proven incontrovertibly by historical research. The counter-revolutionary activities of the Thule members during the revolutionary period in Munich have been examined and documented in detail. Conversely, the occult background of this secret society (the rituals and esoteric teachings of the Ariosophes) is barely acknowledged in serious historical texts and is often not even mentioned. There are, however, countless non-scientific books that deal mainly with the occult aspect of the Thule Society. As the correlation between the Thule Society and the beginnings of the Nazi movement is not disputed, the fact that the Thule Society was also an occult lodge opens-up a virtually endless realm of possible speculation. Some « Nazi occult » authors come to the conclusion that the roots of National-Socialism can be found in the occult philosophies of the Thule Society. However, this is not strictly accurate.

Historical science may never have addressed the theories of Nazi occult authors seriously, but the flood of Nazi occult publications has created its own reality over time. In the world of these theories, National-Socialism becomes a movement controlled by higher-powers. Some authors claim that Hitler was used by the Thule members for their purposes. Hidden Masters of the Thule Society allegedly manipulated Hitler using telepathy and turned him into a medium. Other authors claim that Hitler was instructed in magical practises by the Thule Society. However, there is not the slightest evidence of the secret command group that was supposed to have controlled Hitler, or of Hitler's occult leanings. What can be said with great certainty on the basis of historically proven fact is that Hitler exploited the Thules, and not vice versa. He maintained the necessary contact as long as it was advantageous to him. Once he no longer needed the Thule Society, he ignored it and denied it. However, that does not mean that the mystic notions of the Thules did not play a significant part in Hitler's rise. On the contrary : what would have become of Hitler if he had not come across this Society ? What would have become of his delusions if certain members of this group of influential people had not validated them ? This, in turn, could only happen because the spiritual beliefs of the Thules led them to expect a messianic figure, a saviour, referred to as « der Starke von Oben » (the Strong One from above) . The myth that immediately formed around Hitler and was instrumental in his meteoric rise to power has its origin in the beliefs of the faithful disciples of Thule.

Paul de Lagarde

Le bibliste, orientaliste et polymathe allemand Paul Anton Bötticher (dit Paul de Lagarde) est né le 2 novembre 1827 à Berlin et est mort le 22 décembre 1891 à Göttingen. Il est un orientaliste et un théoricien politique allemand du mouvement « Völkisch », conservateur et contre le judaïsme.

Il change de nom en hommage à sa grand-tante maternelle, Ernestine de Lagarde, qui l'avait élevé après le décès de sa mère.

Il entame des études de théologie, de philosophie et de langues orientales : d'abord dans sa ville natale Berlin (1844-1846) puis à Halle (1846-1847) , mais aussi à Londres (1852-1853) et à Paris (1853) .

En 1854, il devient enseignant dans une école publique berlinoise.

En 1869, il succède à Heinrich Ewald au poste de professeur de langues orientales à l'Université de Göttingen. Il y publie des travaux de philologie sémitique notamment « Septuaginta Studien » (1891-1892) .

Il exerce une grande influence dans l'Allemagne contemporaine par ses écrits nationalistes et antisémites compilés dans les « Deutsche Schriften » (Écrits allemands, 1878-1881) . Certaines de ses idées seront reprises a posteriori par les Nazis comme :

L'espace vital à l'Est.

La construction d'une « Mitteleuropa » (Europe centrale) sous la domination germanique.

L'aspiration à un « christianisme allemand » expurgé de ses éléments juifs (notamment, Saint-Paul) qui influencera directement Alfred Rosenberg dans son livre « Le Mythe du XXe siècle » (1930) .

Son nationalisme se base essentiellement sur la religion. Selon Paul de Lagarde, la germanité est fondée sur « l'âme » plutôt que la pureté d'une race germanique, prenant l'exemple d'illustres allemands comme Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing ou Emmanuel Kant qui étaient d'origine slave ou écossaise. Toujours selon lui, les Juifs doivent impérativement choisir entre leur religion ou devenir tout de suite des Allemands à part entière et il ne mâche pas ses mots à leur égard dans ses « Écrits allemands ». Nette radicalisation de l'anti-judaïsme qui annonce l'antisémitisme virulent du mouvement « Völkisch » et du Parti nazi (qui saluera d'ailleurs Lagarde comme l'un de ses inspireurs) .

Les idées de Paul de Lagarde illustrent la lente transition au cours du XIXe siècle en Allemagne, d'un nationalisme Libéral et Romantique, au lendemain de l'aventure napoléonienne, à un nationalisme racial.

...

The German polymath, biblical scholar and orientalist Paul Anton de Lagarde was born on 2 November 1827 in Berlin as Paul Bötticher ; and died on 22 December 1891 in Göttingen. He has been cited as one of the greatest orientalists of the 19th Century.

In early adulthood, he legally adopted the family name « de Lagarde » of his maternal line, out of respect for his great-aunt who raised him. At Humboldt University of Berlin (1844-1846) and University of Halle-Wittenberg (1846-1847) , he studied theology, philosophy and Oriental languages.

In 1852, his studies took him to London and Paris. In 1854, he became a teacher at a Berlin public school, but this did not interrupt his biblical studies. In 1866, he received 3 years leave of absence to collect fresh materials and, in 1869, succeeded German orientalist and theologian Heinrich Ewald as professor of oriental languages at the University of Göttingen. Like Ewald, Lagarde was an active worker in a variety of subjects and languages ; but his chief aim, the elucidation of the Bible, was almost always kept in view. Lagarde was easily the most renowned Septuagint scholar of the 19th Century, and he devoted himself ardently to Oriental studies.

His great learning and gifts were curiously mixed with dogmatism and distrust in the activities of others. In politics, he belonged to the Prussian Conservative Party.

Parallel to his academic work, he attempted to establish a German national religion whose most striking manifestations were an aggressive anti-Semitism and expansionism. He held few concrete religious beliefs at the ready for his postulated national religion as his 1st political treatise « Über das Verhältnis des deutschen Staates zu Theologie, Kirche und Religion. Ein Versuch Nicht-Theologen zu orientieren » (On the Relationship between the German State to Theology, Church and Religion : A Non-Theological Essay) demonstrates. In regard to the State, he called for its initial and most important task to be to create a climate in which a national religion could flourish. Meanwhile, he obliged those who had faith in God to a radical morality wherein they distinguish solely between « duty or sin » in their every action. In addition, 1st a formal language must be developed for the religiosity of these new-born men. In the 2nd part of his 1875 book, « Über die gegenwärtige Lage des deutschen Reichs. Ein Bericht » (On the Current Situation of the German « Reich » : A Report) , he connected thereto and specified as follows :

« Germany is the totality of all German-feeling, German-thinking, German-willing Germans : In this sense, every one of us is a traitor if he does not consider himself personally accountable in every moment of his life for the existence, fortune and future of the fatherland, and each is a hero and liberator if he does. »

The historian Ulrich Sieg classifies his position as follows :

« He despised the Christianity that he considered bland and lukewarm and hoped for a folkish religion of the future. »

Lagarde was conversant with Adolf Stöcker, the founder of the anti-Semitic Berlin Movement. He also showed interest in folkish-anti-Semitic Societies such as the « Deutscher Volksverein » of Bernhard Förster and Max Liebermann von Sonnenberg, as well as the « Deutschsoziale Partei » of Theodor Fritsch. To the latter, he established contact in 1886 by sending his treatise « Die nächsten Pflichten deutscher Politik » (The Coming Tasks of German Politics) , at the core of which he considered to be a German policy of settlement in Eastern Europe. In « German Writings » , in which he compiled his previously published political essays, there can be found numerous anti-Semitic passages in which we learn, among other things, that he considered Jews to be the greatest barrier to German unification, whereas he simultaneously avowed the concept of a German colonization of southeastern Europe and proposed that the Jewish population settled there at the time be resettled to Palestine or Madagascar. The only alternatives for Lagarde were the total assimilation or emigration of the Jews.

In his 1887 essay « Jews and Indo-Germanics » , he wrote :

« One would have to have a heart of steel to not feel sympathy for the poor Germans and, by the same token, to not hate the Jews, to not hate and despise those who (out of humanity !) advocate for the Jews or are too cowardly to crush these vermin. Trichinella and bacilli would not be negotiated with. Trichinella and bacilli would also not be nurtured. They would be destroyed as quickly and as thoroughly as possible. »

In addition to his influence on anti-Semitism, Lagarde is also of importance to the formation of German Imperialist thought. In this regard, he concentrated on German border colonization within Europe rather than the acquisition of overseas colonies. This bears a close resemblance to the later concept of German « Lebensraum » most notably espoused by Friedrich Ratzel. In 1875, Lagarde maintained that the primary objective of German politics was the « gradual Germanization of Poland » . Since he was concerned about how many Germans emigrated in their search for land, he advocated a border colonizing land acquisition for the peasantry, which he considered the « true foundation of the State » . This land acquisition aimed to create a « Mitteleuropa » under German leadership « that reaches from the Ems to the mouth of the Danube, from the Neman to Trieste, from Metz to about the Bug » .

In his 1918 book, « The New Europe » , Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk regards Lagarde as one of the leading philosophical and theological spokesmen of Pan-Germanism, and furthermore describes Heinrich von Treitschke as its historian, Wilhelm II as its politician and Friedrich Ratzel as its geopolitical geographer. In all of them, he saw the representatives of the imperialistic « German “ Drang nach Osten ” » that threatened the Slavic countries.

Lagarde's anti-Semitism laid the foundations for aspects of National-Socialist ideology, in particular that of Alfred Rosenberg. He argued that Germany should create a « national » form of Christianity purged of Semitic elements and insisted that Jews were « pests and parasites » who should be destroyed « as speedily and thoroughly as possible » . His library now belongs to the New York University.

Lagarde edited the « Didascalia apostolorum syriace » (1854) and other Syriac texts collected in the British Museum and in Paris. He edited the Aramaic translation (known as the « Targum ») of the Prophets according to the Codex Reuchlinianus preserved at Karlsruhe ; « Prophetæ chaldaice » (1872) ; the « Hagiographa chaldaice » (1874) , an Arabic translation of the Gospels ; « Die vier Evangelien, arabisch aus der Wiener Handschrift herausgegeben » (1864) , a Syriac translation of the Old Testament ; « Apocrypha, Libri V. T. apocryphi syriace » (1865) , a Coptic translation of the « Pentateuch » ; « Der Pentateuch koptisch » (1867) ; and a part of the Lucianic text of the Septuagint, which he was able to reconstruct from manuscripts for nearly half the Old Testament.

Of the Armenians, he published « Zur Urgeschichte der Armenier » (1854) and « Armenische Studien » (1877) . He was also a student of Persian, publishing « Isaias persice » (1883) and « Persische Studien » (1884) . He followed-up his Coptic studies with « Ægyptiaca » (1883) , and published many minor contributions to the study of oriental languages in « Gesammelte Abhandlungen » (1866) ; « Symmicta » (I. 1877, ii. 1880) ; « Semitica » (i. 1878, ii. 1879) ; « Orientalia » (1879-1880) ; and « Mittheilungen » (1884) . Mention should also be made of the valuable « Onomastica sacra » (1870 ; 2nd edition, 1887) .

In « Deutsche Schriften » (1878-1881 ; 4th edition, Göttingen, 1903) , he attempted to involve himself in politics. It deals with the position of the German State relative to theology, the church and religion. It became a nationalist text.

...

Paul Anton de Lagarde, ursprünglich Paul Anton Bötticher, üblich Paul de Lagarde (geboren 2. November 1827 in Berlin ; gestorben 22. Dezember 1891 in Göttingen) , war ein deutscher Kulturphilosoph und Orientalist. In seinen politischen Ansichten war er Vertreter des « modernen Antisemitismus » und Propagandist einer expansionistischen Grenzkolonisation sowie einer entschiedenen Gegnerschaft zur Frauenemanzipation.

Lagarde war der Sohn des Oberlehrers Johann Friedrich Wilhelm Bötticher und dessen Ehefrau Luise Klebe. Die Mutter starb noch im Jahr seiner Geburt. 1831 heiratete der Vater Pauline Seegert. Als 1854 auch seine Stiefmutter starb, ließ sich Lagarde von seiner Großtante mütterlicherseits, Ernestine de Lagarde, adoptieren.

Lagarde's schulische Ausbildung erfolgte am Friedrich-Wilhelm-Gymnasium in Berlin, ab 1844 studierte er evangelische Theologie bei den Professoren Ernst Wilhelm Hengstenberg und August Neander sowie Orientalistik bei Friedrich Rückert. Im Wintersemester 1844-1845 belegte er zusammen mit Max Müller bei Rückert Persisch. 1849 beendete Lagarde sein Studium mit der Dissertation Initia chromatologiæ arabicæ. Er wechselte an die Universität Halle zu August Tholuck und konnte sich 1851 mit der Arbeit Arica habilitieren.

Lagardes berufliche Tätigkeit war heftig umstritten. Auch unter seinen Wissenschaftskollegen war er « wegen seines antiquierten Weltbilds und mangelnden Methodenbewusstseins » unbeliebt und hatte viele Feinde. Seine Streitsucht wurde als so notorisch eingeschätzt, daß sie in Meyers Konversationslexikon von 1897 thematisiert wurde.

Zunächst machten ihn seine lexikologisch-grammatischen und textkritischen Arbeiten unter den Fachkollegen durchaus positiv bekannt. Theodor Benfey bezeichnete ihn in diesem Zusammenhang als « schwarzer Husar unter den jungen Orientalisten ». Der preußische Botschafter Christian von Bunsen förderte ihn und vermittelte ihm für die Jahre 1852-1853 einen Studienaufenthalt in London.

1853 ging Lagarde (wiederum mit Bunsens Unterstützung) nach Paris und machte die Bekanntschaft von Ernest Renan. Ende 1853 kehrte er nach Deutschland zurück, da er sich Hoffnung auf einen Lehrstuhl an der Universität Halle machte. Diese Hoffnungen zerschlugen sich, und Lagarde nahm eine Anstellung am Köllnischen Realgymnasium an. 1858 wechselte er an das Friedrichwerdersche Gymnasium in Berlin, wo er bis 1866 unterrichtete.

Während seiner Zeit als Gymnasiallehrer forschte und veröffentlichte Lagarde ; 1866 wurde ihm durch König Wilhelm I. ein dreijähriger bezahlter Forschungsurlaub gewährt. Bis 1869 ließ sich Lagarde in Schleusingen (Provinz Sachsen) nieder. In dieser Zeit entstand eine kritische Ausgabe der griechischen Übersetzung der Genesis, für die er 1868 durch die Universität Halle mit dem Titel Doktor der Philosophie Honoris Causa geehrt wurde.

Im März 1869 wurde Lagarde als Nachfolger von Heinrich Ewald an die Universität Göttingen berufen. Dort übernahm er den Lehrstuhl für orientalische Sprachen und wurde (nach anfänglichen Anfeindungen) als Mitglied in die Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen aufgenommen. Dort wirkte er bis zu seinem Tod, wobei sein wissenschaftliches Werk schnell hinter seinen Arbeiten zur Auseinandersetzung mit der Rolle Deutschlands zurücktrat. Am 1. Dezember 1890 wurde er als korrespondierendes Mitglied in die Russische Akademie der Wissenschaften in Sankt Petersburg aufgenommen.

Lagarde stand im Briefwechsel mit Moritz von Egidy, Julius Langbehn, Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk, Ferdinand Tönnies und Richard Wagner. Der einzig bedeutende Schüler Lagardes ist Alfred Rahlfs.

Lagarde erlag kurz nach Rückkehr von einer Studienreise nach Italien am 22. Dezember 1891 im Göttinger Mariahilf-Krankenhaus einem Krebsleiden. Sein Nachlaß wird von der Universitätsbibliothek Göttingen betreut. Seine große Privatbibliothek, deren Katalog 1892 publiziert wurde, kaufte die New York University als Ganzes. 1897 veröffentlichte seine Witwe Anna de Lagarde eine Gesamtausgabe seiner Gedichte.

Parallel zu seinem wissenschaftlichen Werk versuchte er, eine deutsche Nationalreligion zu gründen, deren auffälligste Äußerungsformen ein aggressiver Antisemitismus und expansionistisches Denken waren. Denn für die geforderte Nationalreligion hielt er wenig konkret Religiöses oder gar ein Glaubensbekenntnis bereit, wie seine erste politische

Schrift Über das Verhältnis des deutschen Staates zu Theologie, Kirche und Religion. Ein Versuch Nicht-Theologen zu orientieren von 1873 zeigt. Vom Staat verlangt er zunächst als dessen wichtigste Aufgabe, daß er ein Klima schaffe, in dem eine nationale Religion gedeihen könne. Die auf Gott hoffenden Menschen verpflichtet er einstweilen, in radikaler Moralität bei jeder Handlung ausschließlich zwischen « Pflicht oder Sünde » zu unterscheiden. Denn für die Religiosität des neugeborenen Menschen selbst müße erst noch eine Formensprache entwickelt werden. Im zweiten Teil seines 1875 erscheinenden Buches Über die gegenwärtige Lage des deutschen Reichs. Ein Bericht schließt er daran an und konkretisiert folgendermaßen :

« Deutschland ist die Gesamtheit aller deutsch empfindenden, deutsch denkenden, deutsch wollenden Deutschen : jeder Einzelne von uns ein Landesverräter, wenn er nicht in dieser Einsicht sich für die Existenz, das Glück, die Zukunft des Vaterlandes in jedem Augenblicke seines Lebens persönlich verantwortlich erachtet, jeder Einzelne ein Held und Befreier, wenn er es tut. »

Der Historiker Ulrich Sieg ordnet seine Position wie folgt ein :

« Er verachtete das seiner Ansicht nach fade und halbherzige Christentum und hoffte auf eine völkisch gefärbte Religion der Zukunft. »

Bekannt war Lagarde mit dem Gründer der antisemitischen Berliner Bewegung, Adolf Stöcker. Interesse zeigte er auch für völkisch-antisemitische Vereinigungen wie den Deutschen Volksverein von Bernhard Förster und Max Liebermann von Sonnenberg, und für die Deutschsoziale Partei von Theodor Fritsch. Diesem schickte er 1886 zur Kontaktaufnahme seine Schrift Die nächsten Pflichten deutscher Politik, als deren Kern er eine deutsche Siedlungspolitik in Osteuropa ansah. In seinen Deutschen Schriften, in denen er in den ab 1878 erfolgenden Auflagen seine bereits publizierten politischen Aufsätze zusammenstellte, finden sich zahlreiche judenfeindliche Passagen, aus denen unter anderem hervorgeht, daß er Juden als größte Barriere für die deutsche Einigung ansah, während er gleichzeitig das Konzept einer deutschen Besiedlung Südosteuropas weiterverfolgte und die dort ansässige jüdische Bevölkerung nach Palästina oder Madagaskar umzusiedeln vorschlug. Denn es gab für ihn nur die Alternative der völligen Assimilation oder Auswanderung der Juden.

In seiner Schrift « Juden und Indogermanen » 1887 schrieb er :

« Es gehört ein Herz von der Härte der Krokodilhaut dazu, um mit den armen ausgesogenen Deutschen nicht Mitleid zu empfinden und (was daßelbe ist) um die Juden nicht zu hassen, um diejenigen nicht zu hassen und zu verachten, die (aus Humanität !) diesen Juden das Wort reden oder die zu feige sind, dies Ungeziefer zu zertreten. Mit Trichinen und Bazillen wird nicht verhandelt, Trichinen und Bazillen werden auch nicht erzogen, sie werden so rasch und so gründlich wie möglich vernichtet. »

Aus diesem Grund zählt er zu den Wegbereitern des modernen Antisemitismus.

Neben seinem Einfluß auf den Antisemitismus ist Lagardes Denken für das sich formierende deutsche imperialistische Denken von Bedeutung. Diesbezüglich konzentrierte er sich im Sinne eines Deutschen Grenzkolonialismus auf Europa und dachte nicht an den Erwerb von Kolonien in Übersee. Das kommt den später vor allem von Friedrich Ratzel entworfenen deutschen Lebensraumvorstellungen in Richtung Osteuropa nahe. 1875 hielt Lagarde die « allmähliche Germanisierung Polens » für das Hauptziel deutscher Politik. Da er besorgt darüber war, wie viele Deutsche bei ihrer Landsuche auswanderten, ging es ihm um einen grenznahen kolonisierenden Landerwerb für einen Bauernstand, den er als « wirkliche Grundlage des Staates » ansah. Dieser Landerwerb zielte auf ein Mitteleuropa unter deutscher Führung, « das von der Ems- zur Donaumündung, von der Memel bis Triest, von Metz bis etwa zum Bug reicht » .

In seinem 1918 in den USA abgeschlossenen Buch Das neue Europa zählt Tomáš Garrigue Masaryk Lagarde zu den führenden philosophischen und theologischen Wortführern des Pangermanismus, wobei er weiterhin Heinrich von Treitschke als dessen Historiker, Wilhelm II. als dessen Politiker und Friedrich Ratzel als dessen geopolitischen Geographen bezeichnet. In ihnen allen sieht er Vertreter des « deutschen Dranges nach Osten » , der die slawischen Länder imperialistisch bedroht.

Das Handbuch der Frauenbewegung von 1901 nannte Paul de Lagarde als einen der führenden Gegner der Frauenrechte.

Über die Bildungsmöglichkeiten von Mädchen schrieb er :

« Jedes Weib lernt wirklich nur von dem Manne, den es liebt, und es lernt dasjenige, was und soviel wie der geliebte Mann durch seine Liebe als ihn erfreuend haben will. »

Während Paul de Lagarde heute mehr oder weniger vergessen ist, waren sein unmittelbares Nachleben und sein Nachruhm bis in die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus von intensiver Breitenwirkung im deutschen Bürgertum. Über den Verlag Eugen Diederichs, ab 1921 mit Erlöschen der Schutzfrist für seine Werke über die Verlage Bärenreiter (Augsburg) ; Langenscheidt (Berlin) ; den Insel Verlag, den Alfred Kröner Verlag, den Reclam-Verlag und Bernhard G. Teubner (Leipzig) ; den Verlag Ferdinand Schöningh (Paderborn) ; besonders über Julius Friedrich Lehmann und seinen Münchener Verlag erfuhren seine kulturphilosophischen Werke, vor allem die Ideen aus den Deutschen Schriften, in Anthologien weite Verbreitung.

Zu seinen bekanntesten Lesern zählten Houston Stewart Chamberlain, der in Lagarde einen seiner wichtigsten Gewährsmänner sah, der Vorsitzende des Alldeutschen Verbandes Heinrich Claß, Adolf Hitler, Karl Lamprecht, Julius Langbehn, Friedrich Nietzsche, Alfred Rosenberg, der von Lagarde die Idee zum so genannten Madagaskarplan übernahm, Artur Dinter, der ihm seinen Roman Die Sünde wider die Liebe (1922) widmete, Hans Rothfels, Richard Wagner, aber auch Thomas Mann (vergleiche « Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen ») und Martin Buber. Auch an den 180 Lagarde-Feiern, die zu seinem 50. Todestag am 22. Dezember 1941 deutschlandweit stattgefunden haben sollen, lässt sich sein posthumer Erfolg ablesen.

Schriften

Initia chromatologiæ arabicæ (1849) .

Arica (1851) .

Konservativ ? (1853) .

Über die gegenwärtigen Aufgaben der deutschen Politik (1853) .

Didascalia apostolorum syriace (1854) .

Anmerkungen zur griechischen Übersetzung der Proverbien (1863) .

Gesammelte Abhandlungen (1866) .

Genesis græce (1868) .

Über das Verhältnis des deutschen Staates zu Theologie, Kirche und Religion. Ein Versuch Nicht-Theologen zu orientieren (1873) .

Über die gegenwärtige Lage des deutschen Reichs. Ein Bericht (1875) .

Armenische Studien (1877) .

Symmicta (Januar 1877 - Februar 1889) .

Semitica (1878) .

Deutsche Schriften (1878, 5. Auflage 1920, versammelt fortlaufend alle politischen Schriften) .

Orientalia (Januar 1879 - Februar 1880) .

Persische Studien (1884) .

Juden und Indogermanen (1887) .

Übersicht über die im Aramäischen, Arabischen und Hebräischen übliche Bildung der Nomina (Januar 1889 - Februar 1891) .

Posthume Ausgaben

Erinnerungen aus seinem Leben für die Freunde zusammengestellt von Anna de Lagarde. Kæstner, Göttingen (1894) .

Gedichte. Gesamtausgabe, besorgt von Anna de Lagarde. Horstmann, Göttingen (1897) .

Erinnerungen an Friedrich Rückert. Dieterich, Göttingen (1897) .

Schriften für Deutschland. August Messer (Herausgeber) . Alfred Kröner Verlag, Stuttgart (1933) .

Bekenntnis zu Deutschland. Auswahl aus seinen Schriften. Friedrich Daab (Herausgeber) . Diederich, Jena (1933) .

Nationale Religion. Georg Dost (Herausgeber) . Diederichs, Jena (1934) .

Franz Overbecks Briefwechsel mit Paul de Lagarde. Niklaus Peter und Andreas Urs Sommer (Herausgeber) , in : Zeitschrift für Neuere Theologiegeschichte, Band 3 (1996) ; Seiten 127-171.

Theodor Fritsch

L'écrivain allemand antisémite Theodor Fritsch est né le 28 octobre 1852 à Wiesenena, en Saxe ; et est mort le 8 septembre 1933 à Gautzsch (aujourd'hui Markkleeberg) , en Saxe. Il est persuadé de la supériorité de la race et du peuple allemand. Il a écrit sous les pseudonymes de Thomas Frey, Fritz Thor et Ferdinand Roderich-Stoltheim.

Disciple de Wilhelm Marr (à qui l'on doit la création du terme « antisémitisme ») , il publia en 1887, le « Antisemiten-Katechismus » (Catéchisme des antisémites) . Il fut le 1er traducteur allemand des Protocoles des Sages de Sion, un faux-document antisémite attribué à Mathieu Golovinski. Il était membre de la Ligue allemande.

Nietzsche écrivit à son propos :

« Il n'est vraiment pas en Allemagne de clique plus effrontée et plus stupide que ces antisémites. Cette racaille ose avoir dans la bouche le nom Zarathoustra. Dégoût ! Dégoût ! Dégoût ! »

...

The German publisher and journalist Theodor Fritsch was born on 28 October 1852, in Wiedemar, Saxony ; and died on 8 September 1933, in Markkleeberg, also in Saxony. His anti-semitic writings did much to influence popular German opinion against Jews in the late- 19th and early- 20th Centuries. His writings also appeared under the pen names Thomas Frey, Fritz Thor, and Ferdinand Roderich-Stoltheim.

He is not to be confused with his son, also Theodor Fritsch (1895-1946) , likewise a book-seller and member of the SA.

Fritsch (born Emil Theodor Fritsche) was the 6th of 7 children to Johann Friedrich and August Wilhelmine (« née » Ohme) Fritsche. 4 of his siblings died in childhood. He attended vocational school in Delitzsch where he learned casting and machine building. He then undertook study at the Berlin Institute of Technology, graduating as a technician in 1875. In the same year, he found employment in a Berlin factory. He gained independence in 1879 through the founding of a technical bureau associated with a publishing firm. In 1880, he founded the « Deutsche Müllerbund » (the Miller's League) which issued the publication « Der Deutsche Müller » (the German Miller) . In 1905, he founded the « Saxon Small Business Association » . He devoted himself to this organization and to the interests of crafts and small businesses (« Mittelstand ») , as well as to the spread of anti-Semitic propaganda. When he changed his name to Fritsch is unclear.

Fritsch created an early discussion forum, « Antisemitic Correspondence » , in 1885, for anti-Semites of various political persuasions. He offered editorship of it to Right-wing politician Max Liebermann von Sonnenberg in 1894, where it became an organ for Sonnenberg's Party under the name « German Social Articles » .

Fritsch founded a Leipzig publishing firm, « Hammer-Verlag » , in 1902, whose flagship publication was « The Hammer : pages for German Sense » (1902-1940) . The firm issued German translations of the « Protocols of the Elders of Zion » and « The International Jew » (collected writings of Henry Ford from « The Dearborn Independent ») as well as many of Fritsch's own works.

In 1890, Fritsch became, along with Otto Böckel, one of the 1st deputies of the « Antisemitic People's Party » , founded by Böckel and Oswald Zimmermann, to the « Reichstag » . The Party was renamed the Reform Party in 1893, achieving 16 seats. The Party failed, however, to achieve significant public recognition. One of Fritsch's major goals was to unite all anti-semitic political parties under a single banner ; he wished for anti-semitism to permeate the agenda of every German social and political organization. This effort proved largely to be a failure, as, by 1890, there were over 190 various anti-semitic Parties in Germany. He also had a powerful rival for the leadership of the anti-semites in Otto Böckel, with whom he had a strong personal rivalry.

Fritsch founded the « Reichshammerbund » (« Reich » 's Hammer League) , in 1912, one of the 1st political groups to adopt the Swastika. He also founded the secret « Germanenorden » in that year. Members of these groups formed the Thule Society, in 1918, which eventually sponsored the creation of the Nazi Party. The « Reichhammerbund » was eventually folded into the « Deutschvölkischer Schutz und Trutzbund » , on whose advisory board Fritsch sat. He later became a member of the German « Völkisch » Freedom Party. In the general election of May, 1924, Fritsch was elected to serve as a member of the National-Socialist Freedom Movement, a Party formed in alliance with the « Völkisch » Freedom Party by the Nazis as a legal means to election after the Nazi Party had been banned in the aftermath of the Munich « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » . He only served until the next election in December, 1924.

A believer in the absolute superiority of the Aryan race, Fritsch was upset by the changes brought on by rapid industrialization and urbanization, and called for a return to the traditional peasant values and customs of the distant past, which he believed exemplified the essence of the « Volk » .

In 1893, Fritsch published his most famous work, « The Handbook of the Jewish Question » , also known as the « Anti-Semitic Catechism » which leveled a number of conspiratorial charges at European Jews and called upon Germans to refrain from intermingling with them. Vastly popular, the book was read by millions and was in its 49th edition by 1944 (330,000 copies) . The ideas espoused by the work greatly influenced Adolf Hitler and the Nazis during their rise to power after World War I. Fritsch also founded, in 1902, an anti-Semitic journal, « the Hammer » and this became, in 1912, the basis of a movement, the « Reichshammerbund » .

Another work, « The Riddle of the Jew's Success » , was published in English in 1927 under the pseudonym : Ferdinand Roderich-Stoltheim.

...

Theodor Fritsch, whose father was an agriculturist, was born in Wiesenena (in the Delitzsch district) on October 28, 1852. After his schooling, Fritsch absolved an apprenticeship in machine design and attended the Vocational Institute in Halle (Saale) , after which he studied at the Technical University of Berlin. Fritsch aspired to self-employment and, in the late 1870's, he settled in Leipzig, where he opened a mill machinery business. Along with his business activities, he became active in industry association politics and with journalistic endeavors. Fritsch founded the German Association of Millers and, later, published the technical journal, « Der deutsche Müller » (The German Miller) . His involvement in the millers' association sparked his concern for problems faced by small and medium-sized businesses in Germany. During the crisis years of the German Empire, around 1900, Fritsch became one of the founding members of the « Deutsche Mittelstandsvereinigung » (German Alliance of Small and Medium-Sized Businesses) , whose purpose was to represent the interests of existing and new businesses, along with those of diverse segments of the economy, from small retailers to large landlords.

By the end of the 1870's, Fritsch had become a radical anti-Semite and an advocate of politically-sanctioned anti-Semitism. He blamed the Jews for the economic difficulties being suffered by small and medium-sized businesses. In November 1905, Fritsch became chairman of the « Mittelstandsvereinigung » (Alliance of Small and Medium-Sized Businesses) of the Kingdom of Saxony. Fritsch was a « Freiheitspartei » (Freedom Party) representative to the « Reichstag » . He was motivated by strong populist-socialistic convictions, and was one of the 1st Germans to draft plans for a utopian « Garden City » .

Fritsch viewed Social-Democracy as an arch political threat, and viewed its rise to be the direct result of a Jewish-funded subversive movement. He continually intensified his efforts against this perceived Jewish threat. In 1880, he founded the « Hammer Publishing House » in Leipzig and, under the pseudonym « Thomas Frey » , sporadically published anti-Semitic leaflets. In 1885, he began publishing anti-Semitic correspondence. Fritsch became increasingly well-known as a writer and publisher, and expanded his anti-Semitic activities within the professional associations to which he belonged. He became head of the German Reform Party and, in 1886, founded the German Anti-Semitic Alliance. In 1887, he published a book under the title « Antisemiten-Katechismus » (The Anti-Semitic Catechism) . This publication, which, in 1907, was re-named « The Handbook of the Jewish Question » became the standard reference for the « Völkische Bewegung » (the nationalist Right-wing) during the German Empire. When the « Antisemitische Deutschsoziale Partei » (Anti-Semitic German-Socialist Party) , or DSP, came into being in 1891, Fritsch was among its founding members. A few years later, he withdrew from the anti-Semitic political movement. In 1900, Fritsch purchased a parcel of land in Gautzsch, known today as Markkleeberg-West.

Fritsch conceived the idea for a new anti-democratic journal, which would scrutinize the many subversive emancipatory movements of the day. In 1902, he published « Hammer. Blätter für deutschen Sinn », an anti-Semitic, anti-Catholic, anti-freemason magazine. In 1912, he founded the « Reichshammerbund » (National Hammer League) , with which he hoped to usher in a new era of non-partisan anti-Semitism. His anti-Semitic tirades landed Fritsch in Court on more than one occasion, but he generally got away with only a light sentence.

Fritsch died on September 8, 1933, in Gautzsch. The National-Socialists named him the « Architect of Anti-Semitism » and saw him as an important contributor to Nazi doctrine.

His funeral, on September 12, 1933, had all the trappings of a State funeral and was staged as a major propaganda event by the new power-holders. His burial was attended by : « NSDAP Gauleiter und Saxon Reichsstatthalter » Martin Mutschmann ; « Reich » Minister of the Interior Wilhelm Frick ; Leipzig « NSDAP Kreisleiter » Walter Dönicke and the National-Socialist Protestant Bishop, Friedrich Coch.

...

Theodor Fritsch (Geburtsname Emil Theodor Fritsche ; geboren 28. Oktober 1852 in Wiesenena ; gestorben 8. September 1933 in Gautzsch) war ein deutscher Publizist und Verleger, der eine treibende Rolle bei der Gartenstadt-Bewegung der Jahrhundertwende um 1900 hatte. Er schrieb und verlegte auch eine Reihe antisemitischer Schriften. Fritsch schrieb auch unter den Pseudonymen Thomas Frey, Fritz Thor und Ferdinand Roderich-Stoltheim.

Sein gleichnamiger Sohn (1895-1946) war ebenfalls Buchhändler sowie SA-Mitglied, Mitglied des Aktionsausschusses des Börsenvereins Deutscher Buchhändler und Mitglied des Präsidialrats der Reichsschrifttumskammer.

Theodor Fritsch wurde als Emil Theodor Fritsche im heutigen Wiedemar (Kreis Delitzsch) geboren. Seine Eltern waren der Bauer Johann Friedrich Fritsche und Auguste Wilhelmine, geborene Ohme. Er war das sechste von sieben Kindern. Vier seiner Geschwister starben im Kindesalter. Nach dem Besuch der Realschule in Delitzsch lernte er Gießer und Maschinenbauer. Danach nahm er ein technisches Studium an der Berliner Gewerbeakademie auf, das er 1875 als Techniker abschloß. Im gleichen Jahr trat er in eine Berliner Maschinenfabrik ein und machte sich 1879 durch Gründung eines technischen Büros, das mit einer Verlagsanstalt verbunden war, selbstständig. 1880 gründete Fritsch den Deutschen Müllerbund und gab dessen Zeitschrift Der Deutsche Müller heraus. 1898 gründete er die « Mittelstandsvereinigung im Königreiche Sachsen ». Er widmete sich der Artikulation und Organisation der Interessen von Handwerk und Mittelstand, aber auch der Verbreitung antisemitischer Propagandaschriften. Wann er seinen Namen in « Fritsch » geändert hat, ist nicht eindeutig geklärt.

Die Stadt der Zukunft (1896) wurde zum Vorbild einer Reihe von Siedlungsbauten der Gartenstadtbewegung, die wie unter anderem Heimland von der Vegetarierkolonie Eden bei Oranienburg inspiriert wurden.

In seinem 1902 in Leipzig gegründeten Hammer-Verlag erschienen neben der Zeitschrift Der Hammer - Blätter für deutschen Sinn (1902-1940) zahlreiche antisemitische Propagandaschriften, darunter auch deutsche Übersetzungen der Protokolle der Weisen von Zion und der von Henry Ford unter dem Titel Der internationale Jude herausgegebenen Zeitschriftenaufsätze des Dearborn Independent. Mit der Antisemitischen Correspondenz schuf Fritsch 1885 eine Art Diskussionsforum für Antisemiten verschiedener politischer Richtungen. 1894 gab Fritsch die Redaktion der Zeitschrift an Max Liebermann von Sonnenberg ab, der sie unter dem Namen Deutsch-soziale Blätter zum Organ seiner Partei machte.

In seinen zahlreichen eigenen Publikationen untersuchte Fritsch die angebliche « Verjudung » der christlichen Religion, des Adels, des Landbesitzes, der Presse, der Richterschaft und diverser anderer Berufsgruppen. Seine ultraradikalen Ansichten zur « Judenfrage » brachten ihm Geld- und Gefängnisstrafen ein. Öffentliches Aufsehen erregten vor allem die Gotteslästerungsprozesse zwischen 1910 und 1913. Im Hammer und in seinen Büchern Mein Beweis-Material gegen Jahwe (1911) und Der falsche Gott (1916) hatte Fritsch die sittliche Minderwertigkeit der jüdischen Religion zu erweisen versucht. Der Centralverein deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens (CV) zeigte ihn daraufhin wegen Beleidigung einer Religionsgemeinschaft und Störung der öffentlichen Ordnung an. In den ersten beiden Prozessen wurde Fritsch zu Gefängnisstrafen verurteilt, im dritten Prozess aufgrund eines umstrittenen theologischen Gutachtens Rudolf Kittels freigesprochen.

Fritsch widmete sich auch anderen Themenkomplexen wie zum Beispiel der auch von der völkischen Bewegung popularisierten Gartenstadtidee, zu der er bereits durch sein 1896 erschienenes Buch Die Stadt der Zukunft beitrug, und der Mittelstandsfrage.

Fritschs Antisemiten-Catechismus erschien erstmals 1887 im Verlag von Hermann Beyer. Eine aktualisierte und erweiterte Fassung gab Fritsch unter dem Titel Handbuch der Judenfrage ab 1907 heraus. Das Buch besteht aus mehreren Teilen, die einen hohen Gebrauchswert für Antisemiten haben sollten. So findet sich etwa eine antisemitische Zitate-, Literatur- und Argumentsammlung, antisemitische Forderungen und Statistiken (zum Beispiel Anteile von Juden an bestimmten Bevölkerungsgruppen), Angaben über die Größe der jüdischen Gemeinden einzelner Städte, umstrittene Auszüge aus dem Talmud. Daneben findet sich das Parteiprogramm der antisemitischen Deutschsozialen Partei oder Listen, die antisemitische Buchhandlungen, Verlage oder Zeitschriften aufzählen oder « judenfreie » Geschäfte (« Verzeichnis empfehlenswerter deutscher Firmen ») zum Beispiel für den Bezug von Apfelwein oder Olivenöl benennen. Unter den empfohlenen Tageszeitungen finden sich nicht nur Parteiblätter der Antisemiten, sondern auch zahlreiche (besonders katholische) Regionalzeitungen des deutschsprachigen Raumes, die aufgrund ihres Antisemitismus ausgewählt wurden. Die antisemitische Polemik geht dabei nahtlos in die offene und ausdrückliche Bekämpfung des Christentums und besonders des Katholizismus (« in seiner Substanz jüdisch ») über. Die Schriftleitung übergab Theodor Fritsch an Ludwig Franz Gengler. Das Buch erlebte bis 1945 insgesamt 49 Auflagen, in denen auch neuere Ereignisse in Fritschs antisemitisches Deutungsmuster integriert wurden. So behauptete er nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg, Preußen-Deutschland habe seinen Wohlstand durch ehrliche, nationale Arbeit erwirtschaftet. Dadurch sei es ein Hindernis für die Weltherrschaftspläne des internationalen Judentums gewesen, das es daher durch die Niederlage im Krieg und die Novemberrevolution unterworfen habe. Diese Verschwörungstheorie wurde 1924 von Adolf Hitler in seiner Programmschrift Mein Kampf übernommen.

Fritschs Handbuch der Judenfrage bildet, teilweise bis heute, eine Fundgrube für Nationalsozialisten, Neonazis und Revisionisten.

Auch im parlamentarischen Bereich ist Theodor Fritschs Einfluß festzustellen. 1890 brachte Fritsch über die von ihm, Otto Böckel und Oswald Zimmermann gegründete Antisemitische Volkspartei mit Otto Böckel den ersten Programm-Antisemiten als Abgeordneten in den Reichstag. Die 1893 in Deutsche Reformpartei umbenannte Gruppierung erreichte in diesem Jahr 16 Reichstagsmandate. Sieht man von politischen Skandalen ab, hat diese Partei jedoch eine erkennbare politische Wirkung oder eine nennenswerte öffentliche Anerkennung nicht erreicht. Fritsch verfolgte parteipolitisch auch mehr das Ziel, den Antisemitismus in allen Reichstagsfraktionen zu verankern und ihn durch Vereine und Verbände zu verbreiten, zum Beispiel durch die Sächsische Mittelstandsvereinigung, an deren Gründung (1905) und Leitung er maßgeblich beteiligt war. Auch an der Gründung des Reichsdeutschen Mittelstandsverbandes wirkte er als Ideengeber maßgeblich mit. Auch an der Gründung des Kartell der schaffenden Stände war er beteiligt.

Fritsch gründete 1912 den Reichshammerbund, der die Leser seiner Zeitschrift in Diskussionszirkeln zusammenfasste, gleichzeitig den Germanenorden als geheime Zwillingsorganisation. Mitglieder des Germanenordens gründeten 1918 die Thule-Gesellschaft für wiederum öffentliche politische Treffen. Der Reichshammerbund ging im Deutschvölkischen Schutz- und Trutzbund auf, in dessen Beirat Fritsch später saß. Im Frühjahr 1919 hatte Fritsch zudem zu den Unterzeichnern des Aufrufes zur Gründung des Deutschen Schutz- und Trutzbundes gehört, der ebenfalls im Deutschvölkischen Schutz- und Trutzbund aufging. Später wurde er Mitglied in der Deutschvölkischen Freiheitspartei (DVFP) .

Bei der Reichstagswahl Mai 1924 wurde Fritsch für die Nationalsozialistische Freiheitspartei, einer gemeinsamen Liste der DVFP und der verbotenen NSDAP, in den Reichstag gewählt und gehörte ihm bis zur nächsten Wahl im Dezember 1924 an. Ab 1925 gehörte er der Reichsleitung der DVFP-Nachfolgeorganisation Deutschvölkische Freiheitsbewegung (DVFB) an. Fritsch verließ die DVFB im Februar 1927 im Zuge von Auseinandersetzungen um ein stärker an den Interessen der Arbeitnehmer ausgerichtetes Programm.

Fritsch verstarb 1933 in Gautzsch im Alter von 80 Jahren nach einem Schlaganfall. 1935 setzten die Nationalsozialisten Theodor Fritsch in Berlin-Zehlendorf ein Denkmal. Es wurde um 1942 aus Kriegsgründen eingeschmolzen.

Im Frühjahr 1887 sandte Fritsch einige Nummern seiner Antisemitischen Correspondenz dem Philosophen Friedrich Nietzsche zu. Dieser schickte sie zurück und verspottete in einem Begleitbrief :

« Dieses abscheuliche Mitredenwollen noiser Dilettanten über den Werth von Menschen und Rassen, diese Unterwerfung unter “ Autoritäten ”, welche von jedem besonneneren Geiste mit kalter Verachtung abgelehnt werden (zum Beispiel Eugen Dühring, Richard Wagner, Johannes Heinrich August Ebrard, Adolf Wahrmund, Paul de Lagarde - wer von ihnen ist in Fragen der Moral und Historie der unberechtigtste, ungerechteste ?) , diese beständigen absurden Fälschungen und Zurechtmachungen der vagen Begriffe “ germanisch ”, “ semitisch ”, “ arisch ”, “ christlich ”, “ deutsch ”. »

Privat notierte sich Nietzsche :

« Neulich hat ein Herr Theodor Fritsch aus Leipzig an mich geschrieben. Es giebt gar keine unverschämtere und stupidere Bande in Deutschland als diese Antisemiten. Ich habe ihm brieflich zum Danke einen ordentlichen Fußtritt versetzt. Dies Gesindel wagt es, den Namen Zarathustra in den Mund zu nehmen ! Ekel ! Ekel ! Ekel ! »

Le « Deutsche Zentrumspartei »

Le « Deutsche Zentrumspartei » (« Zentrum » : Centre) est un des principaux Partis politiques de l'Empire allemand puis de la République de Weimar. Fondé en 1870 et dissous le 5 juillet 1933, il représente les idées des catholiques, minoritaires en Allemagne. Le Parti est refondé après la Seconde Guerre mondiale mais est marginalisé rapidement par la CDU qui devient le principal Parti de la démocratie chrétienne en Allemagne.

Le « Zentrum » est le représentant politique du catholicisme. La politisation de l'Église catholique est un processus lent et irrégulier. Avec le recès d'Empire de 1803, le titre de prince-évêque disparaît. Cela marque une rupture pour le catholicisme, qui a joué un rôle structurant important au sein du Saint-Empire germanique. En 1815, avec le Congrès de Vienne et la fin de la domination napoléonienne sur l'Allemagne, l'anti-cléricalisme est associé à la Révolution. En réaction, on assiste à un réveil religieux dans la population, ainsi le Romantisme remet en valeur l'inconscient et l'irrationnel, tandis que le mouvement nationaliste allemand est fondamentalement chrétien.

La politisation a plusieurs aspects : d'abord, le mouvement ultramontain, en faveur de la toute-puissance du pape, ce qui culmine avec la proclamation du dogme de l'infaillibilité papale, met fin à la théologie influencée par les Lumières. Ensuite, elle doit faire face aux princes allemands, qui ne veulent pas perdre leur pouvoir, et au mouvement Libéral. Dans les années 1830, le conflit qui oppose le royaume de Prusse à l'Église catholique, à Cologne notamment, est à son paroxysme. L'archevêque Clément-Auguste Droste zu Vischering est emprisonné en 1837, ce qui provoque une vague de protestations dans toute l'Allemagne catholique.

L'opposition des Libéraux et de l'État permet aux catholiques de se souder. Ainsi, au parlement de Francfort de 1848, ils se rassemblent dans le club des catholiques, qui est un groupe lâche de députés issus de différents groupes parlementaires ayant en commun de vouloir protéger l'Église contre l'État. En 1852, un groupe parlementaire catholique est fondé au parlement prussien. Il est dissout en 1867 dans les parlements d'autres États allemands, également des groupes parlementaires catholiques.

Les conférences qui ont lieu à Søest à partir du 12 janvier 1864, et qui rassemblent les frères Georg et Hermann von Mallinckrodt, Alfred Hüffer, Wilderich von Ketteler, Friedrich Wilhelm Weber et Eduard Klein jouent un rôle important dans la formation du « Zentrum ». Les réunions sont organisées à intervalles irréguliers jusqu'en 1866 et jusqu'à la Guerre austro-prussienne. La défaite autrichienne, protectrice historique des catholiques en Allemagne, est également une défaite pour ces derniers. Le catholicisme continue toutefois de se politiser, le clergé local soutient fortement ce mouvement. Cela est notamment confirmé par un rapport administratif des années 1860 dans le Sauerland. Le mouvement est partagé entre une aile pro-prussienne dans le nord de l'Allemagne menée par Ketteler ; dans le sud de l'Allemagne, l'anti-borussisme domine. Au sein du « Zollparlament » , Ludwig Windthorst, jusque là ambivalent, se ligue avec les seconds et influence la suite des événements en faveur du particularisme.

Ce n'est malgré tout qu'en 1869, l'an avant les élections de la Chambre des représentants de Prusse, que les projets de création d'un Parti catholique se concrétisent. Des rencontres à Ahlen en Westphalie, Münster et à Essen permettent à Hermann von Mallinckrodt et Peter Reichensperger de s'accorder sur un programme politique.

L'indépendance de l'Église et de ses institutions est revendiquée. Les écoles confessionnelles doivent être préservées. L'unification de l'Allemagne doit se faire selon un principe fédéral avec une autonomie importante pour les États fédérés.

Des revendications allant dans le sens d'une politique sociale sont également présentes dans le programme d'Essen du 30 juin 1870. Afin d'alléger la charge pesant sur le peuple, le budget militaire ne doit plus être augmenté, la répartition des recettes fiscales doit également être plus équitable afin de limiter les inégalités les plus flagrantes. Le programme de Søest du 28 octobre 1870 prévoit que les meneurs du futur Parti doivent être issus des rangs de la Chambre des représentants de Prusse. Le 13 décembre 1870, le groupe parlementaire du « Zentrum » est fondé, il a 48 membres et, pour président, Karl Friedrich von Savigny. Les autres membres influents sont Peter et August Reichensperger, Hermann von Mallinckrodt, Ludwig Windthorst, Friedrich Wilhelm Weber, Ernst Lieber et Eduard Müller.

Aux élections législatives du 3 mars 1871, le Parti obtient 18,6 % des suffrages et 63 mandats. Cela en fait le second groupe parlementaire au « Reichstag » derrière celui du Parti National-Libéral.

Le « Zentrum » est dans l'opposition du gouvernement Bismarck, sa politique économique Libérale et ses tentatives d'imposer le pouvoir politique à l'Église étant contraire aux positions du Parti. L'oppression que fait subir le chancelier aux minorités, qu'elles soient polonaise, d'Alsace-Lorraine ou autres, et donc majoritairement catholique, est également vivement rejetée par le Parti qui rassemble en son sein toutes ces minorités. Le Parti est par ailleurs très attaché à la notion d'État de droit et constitutionnel. Le fédéralisme est également un de ses crédos. À l'inverse, le suffrage universel ne fait pas partie des revendications du « Zentrum » . Par ailleurs, le Parti est comme son nom l'indique centriste.

Dans la 1^{re} décennie d'existence de l'Empire allemand, la politique intérieure du chancelier impérial est orientée contre les catholiques, ceux-ci ne semblant pas soutenir l'unité au moyen de la solution « petite-allemande » qui les a mis en minorité face aux protestants. Bismarck parvient à obtenir le soutien à la fois des Libéraux et des conservateurs et a donc les mains libres afin de lutter contre les ultramontains et l'influence du pape dans l'Empire. Il tente ainsi d'affaiblir l'Église catholique et, surtout, son Parti politique qu'est le « Zentrum » . Les conservateurs participent à cette lutte parce qu'ils s'opposent à toute influence étrangère sur la politique allemande ; quant aux Libéraux, ils voient dans le Vatican une force réactionnaire, un sentiment alors renforcé par le « Syllabus » et le 1^{er} concile œcuménique du Vatican ayant affirmé l'infaillibilité pontificale.

Au début des années 1870, la politique dite du « Kulturkampf » fait des catholiques allemands des « ennemis de l'Empire » . Un autre objectif de la manœuvre est de détourner l'attention de la crise économique. Le « Zentrum » , ennemi de l'Empire par extension, se ligue alors aux autres minorités que sont les Polonais, les Alsaciens, les Danois et les partisans des Welf afin de lutter contre la politique du chancelier.

Windthorst, meneur incontesté du Parti, répond à cette politique en prenant des positions à la fois conservatrices et Libérales. D'un côté, il lutte contre le mariage civil et l'école laïque en cherchant à s'attirer la sympathie des conservateurs. De l'autre, il réaffirme les droits du parlement, que ce soit lors du vote de la loi sur le septennat en 1874 ou sur celle censurant les députés en 1879, la liberté de la presse et la limitation du pouvoir militaire. Il va plus loin, en apportant son soutien aux propositions des Libéraux en faveur d'un gouvernement parlementaire, d'un salaire pour les députés et d'une réforme électorale dans le royaume de Prusse ce qui plutôt contraire à l'esprit du « Zentrum » et de ses électeurs.

Le « Kulturkampf » ne remplit toutefois pas ses objectifs. Certes, il enregistre quelques succès comme la création d'un état civil communal, le mariage civil et une certaine laïcité à l'école, mais il renforce surtout la solidarité entre catholiques. Le « Zentrum » s'en trouve renforcé à son tour, il devient le Parti des catholiques contre la domination prusso-protestante dans l'Empire. Aux élections de 1874, au plus fort de la politique anti-Catholique, il réalise le score de 28 % des suffrages. Lors des élections suivantes, sa part est semblable ce qui se traduit par entre 90 et 100 sièges au « Reichstag » .

Il est le Parti du centre et des catholiques. Ceux-ci, indépendamment de leur position sociale votent massivement en sa faveur. Ainsi dans les années 1880, environ 80 % des catholiques votent « Zentrum » .

Bismarck marque un tournant dans sa politique, il se distance de la politique économique Libérale et adhère au protectionnisme. Cela permet au « Zentrum » de voter pour la 1re fois pour une loi gouvernementale avec le tarif douanier de 1879. Il commence à mener une politique sociale dictée en partie par le Parti du centre. La période est également le début de la lutte contre la Sociale-Démocratie avec lois anti-Socialistes que le Parti rejette en bloc. En bref, le chancelier et son gouvernement se rapprochent du Parti. La fin du « Kulturkampf » , avec pas moins de 5 lois entre 1880 et 1887, réchauffe également ces relations. Le Parti en ressort renforcé, il a le plus grand groupe parlementaire de l'assemblée allemande, de 1881 à 1912. Il a un rôle important dans l'introduction de la sécurité sociale en Allemagne, notamment avec la loi Galen en 1877.

Le retrait de Bismarck en 1890 marque un recul de la partie catholique et confessionnelle dans le programme du Parti au profit de la politique sociale. La création en 1890 de l'association populaire pour l'Allemagne catholique, ayant des idées plus à Gauche que le Parti, comptant parmi ses membres de nombreux de ses militants et qui diffusent des tracts et organisent des réunions afin de soutenir la politique sociale permet au Parti d'élargir sa base électorale chez les ouvriers.

Après la mort de Windthorst, en 1891, Ernst Lieber devient le meneur au parlement allemand.

Les chanceliers impériaux suivants Bismarck sont globalement soutenus par le Parti que ce soit en matière de politique intérieure, extérieure, coloniale ou sur la question très symbolique de la marine impériale allemande à partir de 1898. Il est donc clairement devenu un Parti de la majorité. Ainsi, il vote le « Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch » en 1896 alors que celui-ci entérine le mariage civil. Il commence également à coopérer avec le Parti National-Libéral, ennemi pendant le « Kulturkampf ». Malgré le rejet du Parti de la « Zuchthausvorlage », loi dirigée contre les Socialistes et les syndicats, la coopération se renforce avec le vote du tarif douanier de 1902, le soutien de la politique sociale et économique de Arthur von Posadowsky-Wehner jusqu'en 1906. En contre-partie, le gouvernement renonce à lutter contre la Sociale-Démocratie par la voie légale. Le Parti dispose alors de la réalité du pouvoir et aucune décision ne peut se faire sans lui.

Les catholiques n'en restent pas moins des citoyens de second rang, auxquels les plus hauts postes restent inaccessibles.

À l're vue, le Parti est relativement stable pendant le règne de Guillaume II, néanmoins, de nombreux conflits internes divisent le Parti. La fin du « Kulturkampf » marque en effet la fin de l'union sacrée au sein du Parti. Jusqu'alors, son aile gauche proche du Parti progressiste dominait les débats comme le montre le refus des députés de voter en faveur du septennat alors même que le pape les y avait invité. Des courants internes se développent ; par exemple, l'aile conservatrice et agricole, l'aile populiste, soutenue par les paysans et les artisans, l'aile bourgeoise et, enfin, l'aile ouvrière qui gagne en influence au fil des ans. Les différences sociales créent également des tensions. Ainsi, alors que le Parti est fondamentalement monarchiste depuis ses débuts, les ouvriers et les populistes montrent des tendances démocratiques. Ces conflits peuvent être plus forts en région, parfois. Par exemple, après la mort de Peter Reichensperger, le Sauerland, véritable bastion du Parti, plusieurs candidats se réclamant du Parti luttent entre eux pendant plus de 10 ans. De manière générale, le Parti est divisé entre ses penchants pour la protection de la religion à l'école, le protectionnisme, la méfiance contre les lois du marché et la défense de la ruralité qui le rapprochent des conservateurs d'un côté, et son attachement à la constitution ainsi qu'aux droits des minorités de l'autre, qui sont des idées Libérales.

Le développement industriel est défavorable sur le long terme au Parti. Même si le milieu catholique tente de séduire les ouvriers, notamment avec une politique d'endiguement de la Sociale-Démocratie avec la protection des ouvriers en programme, le Parti perd des électeurs potentiels dans les grandes villes et les régions industrielles. Les appels à la sécularisation jouent un rôle important dans ce phénomène, qui ne touche, bien sûr, ni les petites villes ni les campagnes. Ainsi, dans le Sauerland, 90 % des électeurs votent pour le « Zentrum ». Cette stagnation du Parti entrouvre la porte à sa transformation en un Parti populaire ouvert également aux protestants. Ce projet, défendu par le journaliste Julius Bachem en 1906, mène à de graves dissensions dans le Parti (dite « Zentrumstreit ») et n'est finalement pas suivi d'effet.

Le Parti reste certes opposé au SPD, mais une première brèche est faite en 1899 avec une alliance électorale avec ce dernier Parti pour démocratiser le droit de vote en Bavière, à Munich, et dans le Palatinat, puis, en 1905, lors des élections régionales bavaroises. Au niveau national, les critiques de Matthias Erzberger au sujet de la politique coloniale et l'augmentation des impôts décidée par le chancelier von Bülow conduisent ce dernier, en 1906, à dissoudre le parlement. Malgré tout, le Parti ne s'allie ni aux Libéraux, ni aux Sociaux-Démocrates, mais aux conservateurs avec la formation du Bloc Noir-Bleu.

L'Alsace-Lorraine pose également un problème : bien que 3/4 de sa population est catholique, les revendications autonomistes de ses députés en désaccord avec la ligne du Parti les poussent à prendre leur distance avec le groupe parlementaire centriste. En 1906, le Parti du centre d'Alsace-Lorraine est fondé et devient le 1er Parti du « Land » .

Pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, le Parti participe à la paix des forteresses, l'équivalent de l'union sacrée en Allemagne, et soutient ainsi la politique extérieure et de guerre de l'Empereur et de l'OHL. À un tel point, que le Parti cesse quasiment toute activité dans certaines régions.

Toutefois, le Parti se lasse rapidement de la Guerre. En 1917, il se ligue au SPD et au Parti Populaire Progressiste, 3 Partis stigmatisés dans l'Empire allemand, pour former le comité inter-groupe parlementaire et coordonner leurs actions. Le 19 juillet 1917, cela mène au vote d'une résolution de paix au « Reichstag » . Cette résolution qui cherche une motion de paix, reste néanmoins sans effet direct à cause de la dictature qu'exerce « de facto » le duo de dirigeants de l'OHL : Paul von Hindenburg et Erich Ludendorff. Par contre, elle pose les bases de la coalition de Weimar. Graf Georg von Hertling, membre du Parti, devient chancelier impérial de novembre 1917 à septembre 1918, c'est le 1er chancelier issu des rangs du « Zentrum » . La réforme d'octobre impose le régime parlementaire, le Parti est représenté dans le cabinet de Max von Baden par 3 secrétaires d'État.

Le « Zentrum » ne soutient pas la Révolution de novembre. Sur le plan régional, le débat pour savoir si le système politique à choisir est la Monarchie ou la République fait rage avec des partisans des 2 solutions. Dans certaines communes, les dirigeants du Parti sont représentés dans les conseils d'ouvriers et de soldats. Le Parti est cependant réticent devant cette politique de l'action accomplie. Il soutient finalement après de longs débats internes la République appelée par Philipp Scheidemann et prend contact avec ses partenaires de l'ancien comité inter-groupe parlementaire.

Afin de protester contre la politique centralisatrice de Matthias Erzberger, l'aile agricole bavaroise se sépare du Parti en 1920 pour fonder le « Bayerische Volkspartei » (BVP) .

Le « Zentrum » joue un rôle déterminant dans la République de Weimar à cause de sa position centrale. Il peut en principe faire alliance avec les Partis du parlement allant du SPD au DNVP, toutefois, il doit ménager ses dissensions internes. Le Parti est présidé par Felix Porsch qui aide à maintenir l'équilibre interne. Le Parti a ainsi une forte influence au sein de l'assemblée nationale de Weimar et du gouvernement de la République.

Il fait partie des coalitions suivantes durant la République de Weimar : coalition de Weimar avec le SPD et le DDP ; la grande coalition avec le SPD, le DDP et le DVP ; et, enfin, le « Bürgerblock » avec le DDP, le BVP, le DVP et le DNVP. À quelques exceptions près, il est représenté dans tous les gouvernements de la République de Weimar, et 5 chanceliers impériaux sont issus de ses rangs : Konstantin Fehrenbach, de 1920 à 1921 ; Joseph Wirth, de 1921 à 1922 ; Wilhelm Marx, de 1923 à 1925 puis de 1926 à 1928 ; et Heinrich Brüning, de 1930 à 1932. Aux élections présidentielles de 1925, le candidat du Parti, Wilhelm Marx, est défait par Paul von Hindenburg.

Matthias Erzberger est assassiné par un militant d'extrême-droite, le 26 août 1921. Sous sa présidence puis celle de Marx, le Parti défend la constitution de la République de Weimar et tente de faire progresser l'État-providence. Une assurance-chômage est ainsi créée, principalement grâce au Parti. Le milieu des années 1920 marque un tournant vers plus de conservatisme et de nationalisme. Ainsi, l'élection de Ludwig Kaas à la présidence du Parti, en 1928, contre le meneur syndical Adam Stegerwald montre clairement cette tendance.

Cette élection est également une réaction aux résultats des élections législatives de 1928 qui sont un véritable revers pour le Parti : il a perdu des voix non seulement dans les grandes villes, mais également dans les petites et à la campagne. Une partie du « Zentrum » pense que seul un retour du clergé permettrait d'éviter cette perte d'influence.

Le « Zentrum » lutte lors des élections suivantes contre les Partis des extrêmes, en particulier contre le KPD et les Nazis. L'arrivée de Brüning à la chancellerie marque le passage définitif du Parti à une politique conservatrice. En menant une politique de déflations et de rigueur, il n'a pas seulement pour but d'assainir les finances publiques mais également de démontrer aux pays vainqueur de la Première Guerre mondiale que l'Allemagne n'est pas en mesure de remplir économiquement ses obligations liées au Traité de Versailles. Elle a un besoin impérieux d'un report de paiement, voire d'une annulation de dette.

Le 13 avril 1932, Brüning interdit les organisations nationales-socialistes que sont les SA et les SS en utilisant la découverte des documents de Boxheimer, dans lesquels des plans de coups d'État sont fait. Le NSDAP est déclaré ennemi d'État. Brüning est cependant renvoyé par Hindenburg avant que l'interdiction ait été suivie d'effet.

Le dernier chancelier impérial membre du « Zentrum » est Franz von Papen. Il est néanmoins « de facto » dans l'opposition au Parti depuis qu'il s'est rangé du côté d'Hindenburg après son élection en 1925. Il quitte d'ailleurs le Parti 2 jours après avoir été nommé chancelier, anticipant une décision du comité du Parti. Ce dernier combat par la suite avec acharnement le cabinet du Baron comme les membres du « Zentrum » le surnomment.

Le 30 janvier 1933, Hitler est nommé Chancelier. Le NSDAP et le Parti national (DNVP) forment une coalition gouvernementale. Cependant, Franz von Papen est nommé vice-Chancelier de ce gouvernement dans le groupe du Parti national.

Suite à l'incendie du « Reichstag » du 28 février 1933, les députés du KPD sont emprisonnés en masse. Le 9 mars 1933, le général von Epp, avec l'aide des SA, renverse le gouvernement catholique de Bavière. Afin d'obtenir les pleins pouvoirs, le NSDAP et Hitler ont besoin d'une majorité de 2/3 sans prendre en compte les communistes. Leurs menaces envers les députés du SPD et du « Zentrum » ainsi qu'un accord avec ce dernier permet à la loi d'être votée le 23 mars 1933. Hitler a fait oralement différentes promesses à Ludwig Kaas afin d'obtenir son consentement : le président fédéral doit garder ses droits ; le « Reichstag » et le « Reichsrat » seraient maintenus ; la politique sur l'éducation et le rapport entre l'État et la religion doivent être préservés et ne pas être affectés par la loi. Les espoirs de signature d'un concordat entre l'Allemagne et le Vatican influencent fortement la position du Parti. Le vote de la loi est également une dernière tentative d'exercer un contrôle sur Hitler et sur les Nationaux-Socialistes et, ainsi, de protéger pense-t-on le pays et le parlement d'une prise de pouvoir total. Cela se révèle totalement illusoire.

Le 5 mai, la présidence du Parti passe de Kaas à Heinrich Brüning, le 1er est à Rome pour préparer le concordat. Il espère pouvoir préserver le « Zentrum » grâce à une collaboration avec le NSDAP, cependant, il doit rapidement se rendre à l'évidence. Le concordat rédigé par von Papen est fortement critiqué par Brüning, le Parti perd alors également l'appui du Saint-Siège. Les menaces du NSDAP deviennent plus palpables, certains membres du Parti sont emprisonnés. Josef Goebbels demande le 28 juin à Brüning de « fermer son magasin dans les plus brefs délais ». La majorité des députés du « Reichstag » et du parlement prussien se prononcent alors pour une dissolution spontanée du Parti ; parmi eux : Brüning, Ernst Grass et Karl Hettlage. Finalement, le Parti cesse d'exister le 5 juillet 1933.

Malgré cette collaboration lors du vote de la loi des pleins pouvoirs, le « Zentrum » n'est en rien un allié du NSDAP sur le plan local. Ainsi, les régions où le « Zentrum » a ses bases votent très peu pour les Nazis. Les électeurs du Parti, principalement catholique, jouent un rôle important dans la formation de la résistance contre le Nazisme.

Ceci explique que les Nazis se méfient des membres de l'ancien Parti après leur prise de pouvoir, beaucoup sont discriminés, emprisonnés, ou envoyés dans les camps de concentration. Cela concerne aussi bien les hauts-fonctionnaires que les simples militants. Ainsi, dès 1933, le camp de Osthofen détient des membres du Parti. Le NSDAP voit dans l'Église catholique et ses représentants un danger ; en représaille, les évêques refusent de donner les sacrements aux membres du Parti nazi. L'Église interdit d'ailleurs expressément à ses fidèles de soutenir et voter pour le Parti nazi. Avec la prise de pouvoir de ce dernier, elle est toutefois obligée, conformément aux règles chrétiennes, de reconnaître l'autorité en place le 28 mars. Par la suite, le concordat est signé, les prêtres et fidèles catholiques ne doivent pas être persécutés massivement, contrairement à ce qui est alors en vigueur en URSS, la liberté de culte doit être garantie.

Cependant, à partir de 1935, l'Église catholique devient de l'avis que le concordat est un échec : il n'a pas permis de protéger ses fidèles. En conséquence, nombreux sont les catholiques à rejoindre les rangs de la résistance face au 3e « Reich » ; parmi eux, beaucoup sont d'anciens membres du « Zentrum » .

Après l'attentat du 20 juillet 1944, les persécutions contre les membres du « Zentrum » s'intensifient. Par exemple, Franz von Galen, frère de l'évêque Clemens August Graf von Galen qui est un opposant aux Nazis, est emprisonné dans un camp de concentration.

...

Au départ, malgré son électorat populaire, les députés du Parti « Zentrum » sont des notables, des avocats et des journalistes. Le Parti ne possède alors pas de structure. La progression du Parti lors des Ires élections mène à la reconduction des députés. Ce n'est qu'à partir de la seconde moitié des années 1880 que des candidats plus populistes font leur apparition. Le Parti peut s'appuyer sur les associations catholiques, qui sont de fait également des associations de militants, pour sa représentation locale.

Le Parti est intimement lié à l'Église catholique, et la fidélité au pape est fondamental en son sein. Cela conduit parfois à des frictions entre les dirigeants du Parti et ceux du clergé, même si celles-ci ne sont souvent pas exposées au grand jour. Ainsi, le pape Léon XIII fait des concessions à Bismarck sur les lois anti-Socialistes en 1878 et 1880 et sur le septennat en 1887 afin de faciliter la fin du « Kulturkampf », le tout sans que les dirigeants du Parti ne soient impliqués dans les négociations.

L'association populaire pour l'Allemagne catholique, fondée en 1890, forme une sorte d'association de masse pour le Parti, surtout dans l'ouest du pays.

Les électeurs du « Zentrum » sont surtout des catholiques. Le Parti ne cible pas une classe en particulier : son électorat va des nobles aux paysans en passant par les bourgeois et les artisans. Toutefois, la population catholique allemande est légèrement différente du reste de la population : elle est surtout constituée de petites gens, d'une population pré-industrielle et de ce qui deviendra par la suite le prolétariat. Le Parti a ainsi ses bases dans les campagnes et les petites villes. La Ruhr est certes catholique mais la grande proportion d'ouvriers la rend instable. Le Parti y est menacé par le Parti National-Libéral, puis par la suite par le SPD.

Les années 1870 sont des années de grands succès électoraux pour le « Zentrum ». Le climat politique et les associations créant un état de mobilisation permanent de l'électorat. Le Parti n'a presque pas besoin de faire campagne pour que les catholiques votent massivement pour lui. Ses électeurs sont donc d'une grande fidélité.

Par la suite, si le nombre d'électeurs du Parti augmente plus rapidement à la fois que la population allemande et le nombre d'électeurs potentiels, l'augmentation de la participation aux élections fait baisser au fil de celles-ci la part des voix du Parti. Par ailleurs, la part des catholiques votant « Zentrum » passe d'environ 83 % en 1874 à 54,6 % en 1912. Au niveau du nombre de sièges, le bilan est meilleur ; le Parti a un pourcentage de mandats plus élevé que celui de ses voix à partir de 1878 à cause de sa forte représentation dans les campagnes, qui sont sur-représentées des suites du découpage électoral. Il a également le plus grand nombre de circonscriptions imprenables de tous les Partis.

Au niveau des parlements régionaux, le Parti détient entre 20,4 % et 23,3 % des mandats à la chambre des représentants de Prusse, entre 1872 et 1914. Au parlement de Bavière, il obtient entre 50,6 % et 53,4 % des sièges, entre 1875 et 1912. Dans le Wurtemberg, où il ne fait son apparition que dans les années 1890, il a entre 25,7 % et 28,3 % des sièges. Dans le pays de Bade, environ 33 % .

En 1912, avec la fin du Bloc Noir-Bleu constitué avec les conservateurs, le Parti essuie une défaite, perdant 14 mandats et 3 % des suffrages.

...

The German Centre Party (« Deutsche Zentrumspartei » or « Zentrum ») is a lay Catholic political Party in Germany during the « Kaiserreich » and the Weimar Republic. In English, it is often called the Catholic Centre Party. Formed in 1870, it battled the « Kulturkampf » which the Prussian government launched to reduce the power of the Catholic Church. It soon won a quarter of the seats in the « Reichstag » (Imperial Parliament) , and its middle position on most issues allowed it to play a decisive role in the formation of majorities. Its support for the Nazi Party was decisive in the passage of the Enabling Act, whereby Adolf Hitler assumed dictatorial powers.

After World War II, the Party was re-founded, but could not rise again to its former importance, as most of its members joined the new Christian Democratic Union (CDU) . The Centre Party was represented in the German parliament until 1957. It exists as a marginal Party, mainly based in the State of North Rhine-Westphalia.

The Centre Party belongs to the political spectrum of « Political Catholicism » that, emerging in the early-19th Century after the turmoil of the Napoleonic Wars, had changed the political face of Germany. Many Catholics found themselves in Protestant dominated States.

The 1st major conflict between the Roman Catholic Church and a Protestant State was the « Colonial Church conflict » , when the Prussian government interfered in the question of mixed marriages and the religious affiliation of children resulting from these. This led to serious aggressions against the Catholic population of the Rhineland and Westphalia and culminated in the arrest of the Archbishop of Cologne.

At that time, one of the founding fathers of Political Catholicism was journalist Joseph Görres, who called upon Catholics to « stand united » for their common goals, « religious liberty and political and civil equality of the denominations » . The conflict relaxed after 1840, with Frederick William IV's accession to the throne.

The Revolution of 1848 brought new opportunities for German Catholics. In October, the Bishops had their 1st meeting in 40 years in Würzburg and the local « Catholic Federations » assembled in Mainz to found the « Catholic Federation of Germany » . In the National Assembly, which was convened to draw-up a German constitution, a « Catholic club » was formed. This was not yet a comprehensive Party, but a loose union aimed at protecting the Church's liberties in a future Germany, supported by many petitions from the « Pius federations for religious liberty » . The later demise of the National Assembly proved to be a major set-back for Political Catholicism.

In Prussia, the revised Constitution of 1850 granted liberties, which in parts even exceeded those of the Frankfurt draft constitution, yet, 2 years later, the Minister for culture, Hans Friedrich Wilhem Ernst von Raumer, issued decrees directed mainly against the Jesuits. In reaction, this led to a doubling of Catholic representatives in the subsequent elections and the formation of a Catholic club in the Prussian Diet. In 1858, when the « New Era » governments of Wilhelm I adopted more lenient policies, the club renamed itself « Fraction of the Centre » in order to open itself up to include non-Catholics. This name stemmed from the fact that in the Prussian Diet the Catholic representatives were seated in the centre, between the Conservatives on the right and the Liberals on the left. Faced with military and constitutional issues, where there was no definite Church position, the group soon disintegrated and disappeared from parliament after 1867.

Growing anti-Catholic sentiment and policies, including plans for dissolving all monasteries in Prussia, made it clear that a re-organisation of the group was urgently needed in order to protect Catholic minority rights, enshrined in the 1850 Constitution, and to bring them over to the emerging nation State.

In June 1870, Peter Reichersberger called on Catholics to unite and, in October, priests, representatives of Catholic federations and the Catholic gentry met at Søst and drew-up an election programme. The main-points were :

Preservation of the Church's autonomy and rights, as accepted by the constitution. Defense against any attack on the independence of Church bodies, on the development of religious life and on the practice of Christian charity.

Effectual implementation of parity for recognised denominations.

Rejection of any attempt to de-Christianise marriage.

Preservation or founding of denominational schools.

There were also more general demands such as for a more federal, decentralized State, a limitation of State expenditure, a just distribution of taxes, the financial strengthening of the middle-classes and the legal « removal of such evil States, that threaten the worker with moral or bodily ruin » .

With such a manifesto, the number of Catholic representatives in the Prussian Diet rose considerably and, in December 1870, they formed a new « Centre » faction, also called the « Constitution Party » to emphasize its adherence to constitutional liberties.

3 months later, early in 1871, the Catholic representatives to the new national parliament, the « Reichstag » , also formed a « Centre » faction. The Party not only defended the Church's liberties, but also supported representative government and minority rights in general, in particular those of German Poles, Alsatians and Hannoverians. The Centre's main-leader was the Hannoverian advocate Ludwig Windthorst and other major figures included Karl Friedrich von Savigny, Hermann von Mallinckrodt, Burghard Freiherr von Schorlemer-Alst, the brothers August Reichensperger and Peter Reichensperger, and Georg Count Hertling.

Also in other German States, Catholic Parties were formed, cooperating with the Prussian Centre Party in the « Reichstag » :

In Bavaria, the « Bavarian Patriotic Party » , with a particularistic-conservative bent, since 1887 called the « Bavarian Centre » .

In Baden, the « Catholic People's Party » ; since 1881, formally linked to the national « Centre Party » ; and, since 1888, adopting the name « Centre Party » .

In the age of nationalism, Protestant Germans, whether Conservative (like Otto von Bismarck) or Liberal, accused the Centre of Ultramontanism or having a greater loyalty towards the Pope than to their own nation. After the First Vatican Council, Bismarck launched the « Kulturkampf » (cultural struggle) against the Catholic Church. But the Catholics fought back vigorously and with near-unanimity. The Centre Party gained greater support from the Catholic population. Following Bismarck's 1878 turn from free-trade to protectionism, and from the National Liberal Party to the Conservative Parties, he also abandoned the unsuccessful « Kulturkampf » .

The Centre Party remained a Party of opposition to Bismarck, but after his resignation in 1890, it frequently supported the following administrations' policies in the « Reichstag » , particularly in the field of social security.

The « Kulturkampf » had re-inforced the Catholic character of the Centre Party, but even during it Ludwig Windthorst had defended the Party against Bismarck's accusation of being a « denominational Party » in describing the Centre as « a political Party with a comprehensive political programme and open to anyone, who accepts it » . However, few Protestants took-up this offer and the Centre remained - by the composition of its members, politicians and voters, an essentially Catholic Party.

Loyal to the Pope in church matters, the Centre Party steered a course independent of the Holy-See on secular matters. This became apparent in the « septennat dispute » of 1886. Since the Centre Party rejected Bismarck's military budget, the Chancellor negotiated with the Holy-See and promised to abolish some « Kulturkampf » related laws and to support the Pope in the Roman question, if the Vatican persuaded the Centre Party to accept his bill. Despite this agreement, the Centre Party rejected the budget and Bismarck called new elections. He also published the letters with the Vatican, intending to drive a wedge between Catholic voters loyal to the Pope and the Centre Party with the slogan :

« The Pope against the Centre ! »

Windthorst managed to avert this by re-affirming the Party's autonomy, which the Pope had accepted, and by interpreting the published letters as expressions of papal confidence in the Party.

As the « Kulturkampf » declined, debates about the character of the Party emerged culminating in the Centre dispute, in 1906, after Julius Bachem had published the article « We must get-out of the tower ! » He called upon Catholic politicians to fulfill Windthorst's word and get-out of their perpetual minority position by an effort to increase Protestant numbers among their representatives in parliament. His proposal was met with passionate opposition by the greater part of Catholic public, especially since it also included the Christian trade-unions and other Catholic organizations. No side could win the upper-hand, when the outbreak of World War I ended the dispute.

After the War, Adam Stegerwald, leader of the Christian trade-unions, made another attempt at transcending the Party's exclusively Catholic character and uniting Germany's fragmented Party spectrum. In 1920, he advocated the formation of a broad Christian middle-Party, that would transcend denominations and social classes and which could push-back the Social-Democrats' influence.

The Polish minority in the German Empire formed one of the largest Catholic groups, but the Centre Party pursued a steady anti-Polish course in its politics and even as members of opposition, the enmity between it and Poles remained.

The Party boldly supported the Imperial government in the years prior to World War I openly declaring Germany's « great political and moral mission » in the world. With the outbreak of World War I, the Party also used the debates about War bonds to push for a repeal of the last remnants of anti-Jesuit laws. As the War continued, many of the leaders of the Centre's Left-wing, particularly Matthias Erzberger, came to support a negotiated settlement, and Erzberger was key in the passage of the « Reichstag » Peace Resolution of 1917.

The same year, the Centre's Georg Count Hertling, formerly Ministers-President of Bavaria, was appointed Chancellor, but he could not overcome the dominance of the military leadership of Hindenburg and Ludendorff. When a parliamentary system of government was introduced in October 1918, the new chancellor Max von Baden appointed representatives from the Centre Party, the Social-Democrats and the Left-Liberals as ministers.

After the fall of the monarchy, conflict arose between the Party and the new Social-Democratic government. Adolf Hofmann, the Prussian minister for culture, attempted to decree a total separation of Church and State, forcing religion out of schools. This stirred-up a wave of protest among the Catholic population, and Bishops, Catholic organizations and the Centre Party itself united to combat the « Red Danger ». This conflict bridged internal tensions within the Party and secured its continual existence despite the turmoil of the revolution.

The Party, however, was weakened by its Bavarian wing splitting-off and forming the Bavarian People's Party (BVP) , which emphasized autonomy of the States and also took a more conservative course.

In the 1919 elections for the National Assembly, the Centre Party gained 91 representatives, being the 2nd largest Party after the Social-Democratic Party (SPD) . The Centre's Konstantin Fehrenbach was elected president of the National Assembly. The Party actively cooperated with Social-Democrats and Left-Liberal German Democratic Party (DDP) in drawing-up the Weimar Constitution, which guaranteed what the Centre had been fighting for since its founding : equality for Catholics and autonomy for Roman Catholic Church throughout Germany. The Party was less successful in the school question. Although religious education remained an ordinary subject in most schools, the comprehensive, inter-denominational schools became default.

The Centre Party, whose pragmatic principles generally left it open to supporting either a Monarchical or Republican form of government, proved one of the main-stays of the Weimar Republic, continuing the cooperation with SPD and DDP in the Weimar Coalition. This combination, however, lost its majority in the 1920 elections.

The Party was a polyglot coalition of Catholic politicians, ranging from Leftists like Matthias Erzberger and Joseph Wirth to Right-wingers like Franz von Papen. As a result of the Party's flexibility, it was a member of nearly every government coalition in the Weimar Republic, both with the Left and Right. However, this also damaged the Party's prospects because it was increasingly associated with all of the conflicts, problems, and failures of the Republic.

The Centre had a share of the odium attached to the so-called « Weimar Establishment » which was blamed, especially on the Right, for the « stab in the back » of the German army at the end of World War I as well as for the humiliations of the Versailles Treaty and reparations. Erzberger himself, who had signed the armistice, was assassinated by Right-wing extremists in 1920.

Although the Parties of the Weimar Coalition remained the base of the Weimar Republic, they could not agree to resume a formal coalition government, especially because of disagreements between the Centre Party and the Social-Democrats on issues like religious schools or a nation-wide Concordat with the Holy-See. Between 1919 and 1932, the Centre participated in all administrations, providing mainly the ministers for finance and labour and, on 4 occasions, the Chancellor.

After the break-up of the Weimar Coalition, in June 1920, the Centre's Konstantin Fehrenbach formed a new cabinet that also included the Left-Liberal DDP and the National-Liberal German People's Party (DVP) .

In May 1921, the Weimar Coalition, once again, resumed government under the Centre's Joseph Wirth as Chancellor, but this Coalition collapsed again in November 1922. After this, the Centre participated in the non-affiliated Wilhelm Cuno's « government of the economy » , together with both Liberal Parties and the Bavarian People's Party (BVP) .

In August 1923, the DVP's Gustav Stresemann formed a Grand Coalition administration, comprising the Centre, both Liberal Parties and the Social-Democrats, which lasted until November, when the Social-Democrats left the coalition and the Centre's Wilhelm Marx became chancellor of a cabinet of the remaining Parties.

In January 1925, the non-affiliated Hans Luther was appointed chancellor and formed a coalition between the Centre, both Liberal Parties, the BVP and, for the 1st time, the Right-wing German National People's Party (DNVP) . The Centre, the BVP and the DNVP jointly supported legislation to expand religious schools.

In the same year, Wilhelm Marx was the Centre's candidate in the presidential elections. In the 2nd round, combining the support of the Weimar coalition Parties, he gained 45.3 % of the vote and finished a close 2nd to the victorious Right-wing candidate Paul von Hindenburg with 48.3 % .

In May 1926, Chancellor Luther resigned and Marx again assumed his former office.

In June 1928, the general elections had resulted in losses for the government Parties and in gains for the Social-Democrats and the Communists. The Grand Coalition of 1923 was resumed, this time including the BVP and the Social-Democrat Hermann Müller became chancellor.

During the years of the Weimar Republic, debates about the Catholic character of the Party, as described above, persisted. The Left-wing of the Party, led by Erzberger and Wirth, had close ties to the Christian trade-unions led by Adam Stegerwald. The Right-wing advocated a move towards the Right and a closer cooperation with the national movements. The middle-ground emphasized their loyalty to the Church and rejected both extremes. To mediate the tension between the wings and to strengthen their ties with the Bishops, the Party, in September 1928, did not elect the 2 favourites Joseph Joos and Adam Stegerwald, but rather the cleric Ludwig Kaas as chairman.

In 1930, the Grand Coalition fell apart and Heinrich Brüning, from the moderate-conservative wing of the Party, was appointed as Chancellor. Brüning was confronted with economic crises exacerbated by the Great Depression and had to tackle the difficult tasks of consolidating both budget and currency when faced with rising unemployment, and of also negotiating changes to the War reparations payments. His course of strict budget discipline, with severe cuts in public expenditure, and tax increases made him extremely unpopular among the lower- and middle-classes as well as among the Prussian Junkers.

In the 1930 elections, the Parties of the Grand coalition lost their majority, forcing Brüning to base his administration not on the support of a Party coalition but on that of the presidential decree (« Notverordnung ») of article 48 of the Constitution. This provided for the circumventing of parliament, and the informal toleration of this practice by the Parties. For this way of government based on both the President and cooperation of parliament, Brüning coined the term « authoritative (or authoritarian) democracy » .

The Centre consistently supported Brüning's government and, in 1932, vigorously campaigned for the re-election of Paul von Hindenburg, calling him a « venerate historical personality » and « the keeper of the constitution » . Hindenburg was re-elected against Adolf Hitler, but his moving further to the Right shortly afterwards resulted in Brüning's resignation on 30 May 1932.

President Hindenburg, advised by General Kurt von Schleicher, appointed the Catholic nobleman Franz von Papen as Chancellor, a member of the Centre's Right-wing and former cavalry captain. The intention was to break the connection of the Centre with the other Republican Parties or to split the Party and integrate it into a comprehensive conservative movement. However, the Centre refused to support Papen's government in any way and criticized him for « distorting and abusing good old ideals of the Centre, acting as the representative of reactionary circles » . Papen forestalled being expelled by leaving the Party.

Following Brüning's resignation, the Centre Party entered the opposition. Though they also opposed the National-Socialists, their energies were directed mainly against the renegade Papen. Some Centre politicians were soothed by Hitler's strategy of legality into downplaying the Nazi threat. This hampered their ability of being a bulwark of the Republic against the rising National-Socialists.

In regard to the government, the Centre Party rejected a « temporal solution » , such as Papen's presidial cabinets, and rather advocated a « total solution » - i.e. : a government according to the rules of the constitution. Since the Centre considered Papen's administration of being « in a dangerous way dependent on radical Right-wing Parties » , chairman Ludwig Kaas advised the President to recognize this connection by basing the government on a coalition with the rising Right-wing Parties, the « logical result of current development » . This would force the radicals to « take their share in responsibility » and « acquainting them with international politics » . The Centre would then act as the Party of opposition to this administration.

As Papen was faced with almost uniform opposition by the Parties, he had the « Reichstag » dissolved. In the subsequent elections, the Centre Party campaigned on 2 fronts, against both the Papen government and National-Socialists and re-affirmed their stance as the « constitution Party » opposed to « any measure contrary to constitution, justice and law » and « unwilling to yield to terror » . The July 1932 elections brought further losses to the mainstream Parties and gains to the extremist Parties. The National-Socialists supplanted the Social-Democrats as the largest Party in parliament.

As Communists and National-Socialists together had won the majority of seats, no government coalition could be formed without one of them. Papen tried to justify his authoritarian style of government by pointing-out that parliament could no longer function properly. Countering this reasoning, the Centre and the BVP tried to re-establish a working parliament by cooperation with the National-Socialists, since the 3 Parties together had attained 53 % of the seats. When Papen called upon the people to « reject the dictatorship of a single Party » , the Centre Party agreed « without reservation » , but it also stated that « with the same resolution, we reject the dictatorship of the nameless Party, now in power, even if cloaked with the illusion of non-partisanship » .

After Papen's attempts to attain Adolf Hitler's support for his administration had failed, the Centre began their own negotiations with the National-Socialists. They started in the State of Prussia, where the Weimar Coalition had lost its majority. An alternative majority could be not found and the Papen administration had seized this opportunity to assume control of Germany's largest State in the « Prussian coup » via presidential decree. Now, the National-Socialists proposed to end this direct rule by forming a coalition with the Centre Party, promising an equal share in government. Since this went too far for the Centre's national leadership, the negotiations were transferred to the national level, where Heinrich Brüning conferred with Gregor Straßer. During that period, the anti-Nazi polemics ceased in order not to disturb the negotiations. Since the NSDAP was the larger Party, the Centre was willing to accept a Nazi as Chancellor, provided he could gain the trust of the President which, at that time, seemed quite a difficult task.

The negotiations were bound for failure, since the aims of the 2 groups were largely incompatible. The Centre argued that the vote of July had « called Hitler not to dictatorship but to responsibility, to getting in line with law and constitution » . They hoped to « build a strong government without touching the substance of the constitution » , to create « clear responsibilities » and to « preclude anti-constitutional experiments » . The Centre advocated a return to Brüning's « authoritarian democracy » , which they considered up to the times and tested by experience, against Papen's « omnipotent State and independent leadership » , while the Nazis would only accept a coalition that would serve their purpose of achieving total dominance. Not expecting a successful conclusion, Hitler used the Centre negotiations in order to put pressure on the Papen administration.

The negotiations were also met with criticism from within the Centre Party. Some rejected them as « currying favour with the National-Socialists » and giving credence to Hitler's strategy of legality. The journalists Fritz Gerlich and Ingbert Naab dismissed as « illusionary » the attempt to « uphold the constitution and the legal order » with a man such as Hitler with his « unconditional propensity to evil » . Instead of « driving-out the devil by Belzebug » , the Centre should act as the parliament's conscience. The Party leadership answered their critics by calling it a « duty of conscience » to try to achieve a constitutional government.

Though Papen did not expect the negotiations to succeed, he was nonetheless concerned as a success would have led to a presidential crisis, as Hindenburg was unwilling to have a coalition Parties dictate the administration. In September, he ended all speculations by dissolving the « Reichstag » again, almost immediately after its 1st meeting.

Papen's act did not end the negotiations between Centre and NSDAP. In fact, it made further meetings possible, since the Centre Party's leadership blamed the failure not on the Parties' incompatibility but on Papen calling for new elections. Since the NSDAP vote dropped again in the elections of November 1932, the Centre Party considered their strategy successful and resumed negotiations, this time under the slogan of forming a « Notgemeinschaft » (Community of need) , even though the Centre, BVP, and NSDAP together no longer formed a majority in parliament.

Chairman Ludwig Kaas advised President von Hindenburg not to continue Papen's « administration of conflict » ; he advocated « national concentration including the National-Socialists » , but did not comment on an alternative Chancellor, since he considered that the « personal prerogative of President » . Hindenburg's negotiations with Hitler failed, however, as did Kaas' attempt to form a coalition in parliament. By avoiding a clear statement, Hitler managed to pin the blame for this failure on the DNVP's Alfred Hugenberg, who had rejected Kaas' proposals.

In December, the President appointed General Kurt von Schleicher Chancellor, since the cabinet had refused to support Papen's planned « coup d'État » , a permanent dissolution of the « Reichstag » . The Centre Party contributed to the failure of Kurt von Schleicher's « Querfront » policy, since it could not bring itself to supporting the new administration actively. This pushed the General-Chancellor further in the direction of Papen's proposed « coup d'État » , a move the Centre Party, as well as the other Parties, refused to condone. Under these circumstances, President Hindenburg refused to back the « coup » and Schleicher accordingly resigned on 28 January 1933.

Meanwhile, von Papen had formed an intrigue to oust his successor. He conferred with Hugenberg and industrial magnates and bankers and after a feverish night, in which the outcome was unclear to all participants. On 30 January 1933, Hitler was appointed Chancellor with Franz von Papen as Vice-Chancellor and Hugenberg as minister for economics. President of the « Reichsbank » under the Weimar Republic was Hjalmar Schacht.

Though seeing their adversaries Papen and Hugenberg join forces with Hitler, the Centre Party still did not give-up building a broad coalition government. Since the new administration was still lacking a majority in parliament, the Centre was ready to support it, either by toleration or by coalition. Hitler intended to minimize non-Nazi participation, but feigned a willingness to cooperate with the Centre and blamed Papen and Hugenberg for denying cabinet posts to the Centre. When Kaas requested a broad outline of his government's objectives, Hitler used his questionnaire to declare the talks a failure and obtain the President's approval for calling for new elections, for the 3rd time in about half a year.

These elections, in March 1933, were already marred by the SA's terror, after the « Reichstag » fire and civil rights had been suspended by President Hindenburg through the « Reichstag » Fire Decree. Still the Centre Party campaigned hard against the Hitler administration and managed to preserve their former vote of roughly 11 %. The government Parties NSDAP and DNVP however jointly won 52 % of the vote.

This result shattered the Centre Party's hopes of being indispensable for obtaining a majority in parliament. The Party was now faced with 2 alternatives : either to persist in protesting and suffer reprisals like Communists and Social-Democrats ; or to declare their loyal cooperation, in order to protect their members. As shown by subsequent events, the Party, though deeply uncomfortable with the new government, opted for the latter alternative.

The government confronted the newly-elected « Reichstag » with the Enabling Act that would have vested the government with legislative powers for a period of 4 years. As the bill required a 2/3 majority in order to pass and the coalition Parties only controlled 340 of the 647 seats (52.5 %) , the government needed the support of other Parties.

The Centre Party, whose vote was going to be decisive, was split on the issue of the Enabling Act. Chairman Kaas advocated supporting the bill in parliament in return for government guarantees. These mainly included respecting the President's Office retaining veto power, religious liberty, its involvement in culture, schools and education, the concordats signed by German States and the existence of the Centre Party. Via von Papen, Hitler responded positively and personally addressed the issues in his « Reichstag » speech but he repeatedly put-off signing a written letter of agreement.

Kaas was aware of the doubtful nature of such guarantees but when the Centre Party assembled on 23 March to decide on their vote, Kaas advised his fellow Party members to support the bill, given the « precarious state of the Party » .

He described his reasons as follows :

« On the one hand, we must preserve our soul but, on the other hand, a rejection of the Enabling Act would result in unpleasant consequences for faction and Party. What is left is only to guard us against the worst. Were a 2/3 majority not obtained, the government's plans would be carried through by other means. The President has acquiesced in the Enabling Act. From the DNVP no attempt of relieving the situation is to be expected. »

A considerable number of parliamentarians opposed the chairman's course, among these former Chancellors Heinrich Brüning, Joseph Wirth and former minister Adam Stegerwald.

Brüning called the Act the « most monstrous resolution ever demanded of a parliament » and was sceptical about Kaas' efforts :

« The Party has difficult years ahead, no matter how it would decide. Sureties for the government fulfilling its promises have not been given. Without a doubt, the future of the Centre Party is in danger and, once it is destroyed, it cannot be revived again. »

The opponents also argued that Catholic social teaching ruled-out participating in acts of revolution. The proponents argued that a « national revolution » had already occurred with Hitler's appointment and the presidential decree suspending civil rights. The Enabling Act would contain the revolutionary forces and move the government back to a legal order. Both groupings were not unaffected by Hitler's self-portrayal as a moderate seeking cooperation as opposed to the more revolutionary SA, led by Ernst Röhm. Even Brüning thought it would be « decisive which groups of the NSDAP will be in power in the future. Will Hitler's power increase or will he fail, that is the question. »

In the end, the majority of Centre parliamentarians supported Kaas' proposal. Brüning and his followers agreed to respect Party discipline by also voting in favour of the bill. The « Reichstag » assembled under turbulent circumstances. SA men served as guards and crowded outside the building to intimidate any opposition while the Communist and some Social-Democratic members of the « Reichstag » had been imprisoned and were, thus, prevented from voting. In the end, the Centre voted as planned in favour of the Enabling Act, as did all the other Parties apart from the SPD, which was also the only Party to speak against the Act. The support of the Centre Party proved to be decisive and the Act was passed on 23 March 1933.

With the passing of the Enabling Act, the Centre Party had set in motion its own demise. As promised during the negotiations, a working committee chaired by Hitler and Kaas and supposed to inform about further legislative measures, met 3 times (31 March ; 2 April ; 7 April) without any major impact.

At that time, the Centre Party was weakened by massive defections by Party members. Loyal Party members, in particular civil servants, and other Catholic organizations were subject to increasing reprisals, despite Hitler's previous guarantees. The Party was also hurt by a declaration of the German Bishops that, while maintaining their opposition to Nazi ideology, modified the ban on cooperation with the new authorities.

The issue of the concordat prolonged Kaas' stay in Rome, leaving the Party without a chairman, and, on 5 May, Kaas finally resigned from his post. The Party now elected Brüning as chairman. The Party adopted a tempered version of the leadership principle ; pro-Centre papers now declared that the Party's members, or « retinue » , would fully-submit itself to Brüning. It was not enough, however, to relieve the growing pressure that it and other Parties faced in the wake of the process of « Gleichschaltung » . Prominent members were frequently arrested and beaten, and pro-Centre civil servants were fired. As the summer of 1933 wore on, several government officials (including von Papen) demanded that the Centre either dissolve or be closed-down by the government.

By July, the Centre was the only non-Nazi Party that had not been browbeaten into dissolving itself (or had been banned outright, like the SPD) . On 1 July, von Papen and Kaas agreed that as part of the concordat, German priests would stay-out of politics. Earlier, as part of negotiations, it was agreed that the Party would dissolve as soon as the concordat had been concluded. As it turned-out, the Party dissolved on 5 July - much to the dismay of Cardinal Pacelli, who felt the Party should at least have waited until after the conclusion of negotiations. The day after, the government issued a law declaring the NSDAP the only legally permitted party in the German State.

Les Chrétiens allemands

Les Chrétiens allemands (« Deutsche Christen », ou DC) étaient un mouvement raciste et antisémite au sein du protestantisme allemand. En 1933, ils prennent le pouvoir au sein de l'Église protestante du « Reich » nouvellement constituée. Les opposants se regroupent alors dans l'Église confessante.

Fondés en 1932, ils gagnent à partir de juin 1933, la direction de quelques églises. Ces protestants et chefs d'églises protestantes ont salué l'élection de Adolf Hitler à la Chancellerie du « Reich », le 30 janvier 1933, comme étant la rédemption de la nation et la venue de temps nouveaux.

En 1933, dans le cadre de la politique de « mise au pas » (« Gleichschaltung »), le pouvoir nazi contraint les Églises protestantes à fusionner dans l'Église protestante du « Reich ». En juillet 1933, les Chrétiens allemands remportent la victoire aux élections ecclésiastiques.

Le symbole du groupe est une croix chrétienne traditionnelle avec une croix gammée en son centre et les initiales du groupe : « DC ». Les Nazis se sont servis des Chrétiens allemands pour consolider leur pouvoir, mais ils perdront leur importance dès 1935.

Cependant, bien qu'Hitler cherche à garder certaines apparences, le National-Socialisme, et particulièrement son élite, s'oppose clairement à l'ensemble du christianisme, même remodelé. Malgré l'obséquiosité des Chrétiens allemands à se plier au Nazisme, ceux-ci ne gagnèrent jamais l'estime de l'élite du Parti.

« Les Chrétiens allemands avaient comme but de purifier la Bible (et, par conséquent, la foi chrétienne) de tous les aspects juifs qu'elle contenait. Ils écartaient l'Ancien Testament, voulaient éliminer l'Apôtre Paul du Nouveau Testament, voulaient un Jésus aryen, non-juif. »

Le mouvement des Chrétiens allemands présentait de fortes tendances syncrétistes. Il s'alignait sur les tendances intellectuelles et culturelles de l'époque. Sa théologie était très politique et sécularisée. Le mouvement évolua vers le « Völkisme », l'adoration du « Führer » et l'antisémitisme racial.

Ainsi, un de ses principaux penseurs, Emmanuel Hirsch, est un théologien dialectique et existentialiste, reflet inversé du théologien Paul Tillich.

La conception des « Deutsche Christen » impliquait un Christ fort en se basant sur des versets du type « Je ne suis pas venu apporter la paix, mais l'épée. » (Marc, 10). Alors que ces versets sont généralement compris à l'aune du reste de la Bible, les « Deutsche Christen » interprétaient la Bible à l'aune de ces versets. Les versets qui parlent ainsi de violence, de force ne sont pas majoritaires, mais pas négligeables non-plus, ils ont ainsi basé leur théologie dessus pour développer une compréhension d'un Christ glorieux, d'un Dieu fort et puissant dont on peut remarquer la puissance et l'action ici-bas.

Ils se basaient sur la possibilité de reconnaître l'action de Dieu dans l'histoire, telle que de nombreux théologiens l'avaient développée depuis la fin du XIXe siècle, et notamment pendant la Première Guerre mondiale. Ainsi, Hitler a pu être reconnu comme tel : un envoyé de Dieu pour sauver l'Allemagne. C'est du fait de ce fondement que Barth s'opposera à toute théologie naturelle et se méfiera du principe de l'expérience religieuse. Barth participera à la fondation de l'Église confessante, un mouvement plus ou moins caché et secret au sein de l'Église allemande, afin de s'opposer à cette conception pervertie de l'Évangile. Tillich a, par exemple, refusé de signer la confession de foi de Barmen (confession de foi de l'Église confessante) non parce qu'il adhérerait au « Deutsche Christen », mais parce qu'il refusait l'impossibilité stricte de connaître Dieu en dehors de la raison. Or, ce point était indispensable selon Barth afin de renforcer l'impossibilité de reconnaître l'action de Dieu dans l'histoire. Le but de Barth était ici de protéger la théologie contre toute tentative séculière d'en prendre le pouvoir en se basant sur la révélation seule. Dieu n'est ainsi, selon lui, connaissable qu'en Christ crucifié. On peut regretter que ce faisant, Barth ait exclu des théologiens qui n'avaient rien à voir avec les « Deutsche Christen », mais qui avaient un différend théologique avec lui. Ainsi Paul Tillich ou Emil Brunner.

La crucifixion du Christ est, dans la lignée de la théologie chrétienne, une partie importante et inséparable de la révélation. Alors que pour les « Deutsche Christen », il s'agissait d'un crime des Juifs à l'encontre de Dieu. Selon eux, Dieu se révèle dans les actes de puissance, et certainement pas dans la faiblesse d'un crucifié. C'est également là la raison de leur refus du corpus paulinien, puisque ce dernier accentuait justement le paradoxe de la force dans la faiblesse et faisait de la crucifixion le cœur de la foi chrétienne :

« C'est pourquoi je me plais dans les faiblesses, dans les outrages, dans les privations, dans les persécutions, dans les angoisses, pour Christ ; en effet, quand je suis faible, c'est alors que je suis fort. »

...

The « Deutsche Christen » (« German Christians ») were a pressure group and movement within German Protestantism aligned towards the anti-Semitic and « Führerprinzip » ideological principles of Nazism with the goal to align German Protestantism as a whole towards those principles. Their advocacy of these principles led to a schism within 23 of the initially 28 regional church bodies (« Landeskirchen ») in Germany and the attendant foundation of the Confessing Church.

During the period of the German Empire, before the Weimar Republic, the Protestant churches (« Landeskirchen ») in Germany were divided along State and provincial borders. Each State or provincial church was supported by and affiliated with the regnal house (if it was Protestant) of its particular region ; the crown provided financial and institutional support for its church. Church and State were, therefore, to a large extent, combined on a regional basis. Monarchies of Roman Catholic dynasties also organized church bodies territorially defined by their State borders. The same was true for the 3 Republican German States within the pre-1918 Empire. In Alsace-Lorraine, the Napoleonic system of « établissements publics du culte » for the Calvinist, Jewish, Lutheran and Roman Catholic congregations and umbrellas remained in effect.

With the end of World War I and the resulting political and social turmoil, the regional churches lost their secular rulers. With revolutionary fervour in the air, the conservative church leaders had to contend with Socialists who favoured disestablishment.

After considerable political maneuvering, State churches were abolished (in name) under Weimar, but the anti-disestablishmentarians prevailed in substance : churches remained public corporations and retained their subsidies from government. Religious instruction in the schools continued, as did the theological faculties in the universities. The rights formerly held by the princes in the German Empire simply devolved to church councils.

Accordingly, in this initial period of the Weimar Republic, the Protestant Church in Germany now operated as a federation of 28 regional (or provincial) churches. The federation operated officially through the representative German Evangelical Church Confederation (« Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenbund » , or DEKB) ; the League was itself established in 1922 by the rather loose annual convention called Church General Assembly (« Kirchentag ») , which was composed of the members of the various regional churches. The League was governed and administered by a 36 member Executive Committee (« Kirchengeschäft ») which was responsible for ongoing governance between the annual conventions of the « Kirchentag » .

Save for the organizational matters under the jurisdiction of the national League, the regional churches remained independent in other matters, including theology, and the federal system allowed for a great deal of regional autonomy.

The « Deutsche Christen » were, for the most part, a « group of fanatically Nazi Protestants » . They began as an interest group and eventually came to represent one of the schismatic factions of German Protestantism.

Their movement was sustained and encouraged by factors such as :

The 400th anniversary (in 1917) of Martin Luther's posting of the « 95 Theses » in 1517, an event which served to endorse German nationalism, to emphasize that Germany had a preferred place in the Protestant tradition, and to legitimize anti-Semitism. This was re-inforced by the Luther Renaissance Movement of Professor Emmanuel Hirsch.

The revival of « völkisch » traditions.

The de-emphasis of the Old Testament in Protestant theology, and the removal of parts deemed « too Jewish » .

The respect for temporal (secular) authority, which had been emphasized by Luther. The movement used scriptural support (Romans, 13) to justify this position.

The « Deutsche Christen » were sympathetic to the Nazi regime's goal of « co-ordinating » the individual Protestant churches into a single and uniform « Reich » church, consistent with the « Volk » ethos and the « Führerprinzip » .

The « Deutsche Christen » were organized as a « Kirchenpartei » (Church Party ; meaning a nominating group) in 1931 to help win elections of presbyteries and synods (i.e. : legislating church assemblies) in the Evangelical Church of the old-Prussian Union, the largest of the independent « Landeskirchen » . They were led by Ludwig Müller, a rather incompetent « old fighter » who had no particular leadership skills or qualifications, except having been a longtime faithful Nazi. He was advised by Emanuel Hirsch. The group achieved no particular notoriety before the Nazi assumption of political power in January 1933. In the Prussian church elections of November 1932, « Deutsche Christen » won 1/3 of the vote.

Adolf Hitler was appointed Chancellor on 30 January 1933 and the process of « Gleichschaltung » was in its full-sway in the 1st few months of the regime. In late-April 1933, the leadership of the 1922 founded German Evangelical Church Confederation, in the spirit of the new regime, agreed to write a new constitution for a brand new, unitary « national » church, which would be called the German Evangelical Church (« Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » , or DEK) . The new and unified national « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » would completely replace and supersede the old federated church with its representative league.

This church re-organization had been a goal of the « Deutsche Christen » for some time, as such a centralization would enhance the coordination of Church and State, as a part of the overall Nazi process of « Gleichschaltung » . The « Deutsche Christen » agitated for Müller to be elected as the new Church's Bishop (« Reichsbischof ») .

Unfortunately for the Nazis, Müller had poor political skills, little political support within the Church and no real qualifications for the job, other than his commitment to Nazism and a desire to exercise power. When the federation council met in May 1933 to approve the new constitution, it elected Friedrich von Bodelschwingh as « Reichsbischof » of the new Protestant « Reich » Church by a wide-margin, largely on the advice and support of the church leadership.

Needless to say, Hitler was infuriated with the rejection of his candidate, and things began to change. By June 1933, the « Deutsche Christen » had gained leadership of some « Landeskirchen » within the « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » and were, of course, supported by Nazi propaganda in their efforts to reverse the humiliating loss to Bodelschwingh. After a series of Nazi-directed political maneuvers, Bodelschwingh resigned and Müller was appointed as the new « Reichsbischof » in July 1933.

Further pro-Nazi developments followed the elevation of Müller to the « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » bishopric : in late-summer, the old-Prussian general synod (led by Müller) adopted the Aryan Paragraph, effectively defrocking clergy of Jewish descent and even clergy married to non-Aryans.

With their « Gleichschaltungspolitik » and their attempts to incorporate the Aryan Paragraph into the church constitution so as to exclude Jewish Christians, the « Deutsche Christen » entered into a « Kirchenkampf » with other evangelical Christians. Their opponents founded the Confessing Church in 1934, which condemned the « Deutsche Christen » as heretics and claimed to be the true German Protestant Church.

The Nazis found the « Deutsche Christen » group useful during the initial consolidation of power, but removed most of its leaders from their posts shortly afterwards ; « Reichsbishop » Müller continued until 1945, but his power was effectively removed in favour of a government agency as a result of his obvious incompetence.

The « Deutsche Christen » were supportive of the Nazi ideas about race. They issued public statements that Christians in Germany with Jewish ancestors « remain Christians in a New Testament sense, but are not “ German Christians ” ». Also, they supported the call from the Nazi Party platform for a « positive Christianity » that does not stress human sinfulness. Some went so far as to call for removal of the « Jewish » Old Testament from the Bible. Their symbol was a traditional Christian cross with a swastika in the middle and the group's German initials « D » and « C » . It was claimed and remembered, as a « fact » , that the Jews had killed Christ, thus, appealing to and actively encouraging existing anti-Semitic sentiment among Christians in Germany.

The fore-runner of the « Deutsche Christen » ideology came from certain Protestant groups of the German Empire. These groups sought a return to perceived « völkisch » , nationalistic and racist ideas within traditional Christianity, and looked to turn Christianity in Germany into a reformed intrinsic folk-religion (« arteigene Volksreligion ») . They found their model in the Berlin « Hofprediger » Adolf Stoecker, who was politically active and tried to position the Christian working-classes and lower middle-classes against what he perceived as Jewish « Überfremdung » .

The « Bayreuther Blätter » devoted its June 1892 issue to a memorial of Paul Lagarde and it emphatically recommended his work to its readers.

Ludwig Schemann, one of the most prolific of Bayreuth Germanics and racists, and, later, the author of a full-length biography of Lagarde, summarized his life and work and concluded that :

« For the comprehension of Lagarde's whole being, one must above all remember that he always considered himself the prophet and guide of his people - which, of course, he actually was. »

For Schemann, his legacy consisted largely of his struggle against the Jews :

« Not since the days of Schopenhauer and Wagner is the German thinker so mightily opposed this alien people, which desecrates our holy possessions, poisons our people, and seeks to rest our property from us so as to completely trample on us, as Lagarde has. »

It was this image of Lagarde, the anti-Semitic prophet of a purified and heroic Germany, which the political Wagnerites and the « Bayreuther Blätter » and kept alive.

Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Richard Wagner's son-in-law and intellectual disciple, wrote :

« For us, the “ Deutsche Schriften ” have for a long time belonged to our most precious books, and we consider Lagarde's unabashed exposure of the inferiority of Semitic religious instincts and the pernicious effects on Christianity as an achievement that deserves our admiration and gratitude. »

(Houston Stewart Chamberlain. « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » , 5th edition, Munich, 1904 ; page lxii.)

In 1896, Arthur Bonus advocated a « Germanization of Christianity » . Max Beyer alleged in his 1907 book, « Der deutsche Christus » (The German Christ) , Jesus stemmed from German soldiers in the Roman garrison in Galilee and his preaching showed the influence of « German blood » . He concluded that the Germans were the best Christians among all peoples, only prevented from the full-flowering of their spiritual faculties by the materialistic Jews. Julius Bode, however, concluded that the Christianization of the Germans was the imposition of an « un-German » religious understanding, and that Germanic feeling remained alien to it and so should remain exempt from it.

On the 400th anniversary of the Protestant Reformation, in 1917, the Flensburg pastor Friedrich Andersen, the writer Adolf Bartels and Hans Paul Freiherr von Wolzogen presented « 95 Thesen » on which a « German Christianity on a Protestant basis » should be founded.

It stated :

« The newer racial research has finally opened our eyes to the pernicious effects of the blood mixture between Germanic and un-German peoples and urges us, with all our forces, to strive to keep our “ Volkstum ” pure and closed. Religion is the inner-strength and finest flower in the intellectual life of a people, but it can only strongly affect expression in popular culture. A deep connection between Christianity and Germanness can only be achieved when it is released from this un-natural connection, wherever it stands nakedly approached by the Jewish religion. »

For the authors of the « Thesen » , the « angry thunder-god » Jehovah was the same as the « Father » and « Holy Ghost » , that Christ preached and that the Germans would have guessed. Child-like confidence in God and selfless love was, to them, the essence of the Germanic « people's soul » in contrast to Jewish « menial fear of God » and « materialistic morality » . Church was not an « institution for the dissemination of Judaism » , and they felt religious and confirmation materials should no longer teach the Old Testament and the 10 Commandments, nor even the New Testament, which they held to be of Jewish influence that had to be « cleaned » so that the child Jesus could be used as a model for « self-sacrifice » and « male heroism » .

In 1921, Andersen wrote « Der deutsche Heiland » (The German Saviour) , in which he opposed Jewish migration as an apocalyptic decision :

« Who will win, the 6 cornered star or the Cross ?

The question is, for now, not yet evident. The Jew goes on his way purposefully, in any case, his deadly hatred will defeat his opponent. When the Christian Good Friday is celebrated, it should at least not weigh in his dreams ; otherwise, there could come a whole lot of terrible Golgothas, where Jews across the whole world dance their jubilee songs on the grave of Christianity as heirs of a murdering people, singing to the Jahu they destroyed. »

Against the « contamination by Jewish ideas » , mainly from the Old Testament, the Churches and Germany should (he argued) be « mutually benefits and supports » , and then, Christianity would win back its status as « a religion of the “ Volk ” and of the struggle » and « the great exploiter of humanity, the evil enemy of our “ Volk ” would finally be destroyed » .

In the same year, 1921, the Protestant-dominated and « völkisch » oriented League for German Churches (« Bund für deutsche Kirche ») was founded in Berlin. Andersen, pastor Ernst Bublitz and teacher Kurd Joachim Niedlich brought out the twice-monthly « The German Church » (« Die Deutsche Kirche ») magazine, which in 12,000 articles advanced the Bund's ideas. Jesus should be a « tragic-Nordic figure » against the Old Testament's « religious idea » , with the Old Testament replaced by a « German myth » . Each biblical story was to be « measured under German feelings, so that German Christianity escapes from Semitic influence as Beelzebub did before the Cross » .

In 1925, groups such as the « Bund » united with 10 « völkisch » , Germanophile and anti-Semitic organizations to form the German Christian Working Group (« deutschchristliche Arbeitsgemeinschaft ») . The Christian-Spirit Religious Society (« Geistchristliche Religionsgesellschaft ») , founded in 1927 in Nuremberg by Artur Dinter, saw more effect in the churches, striving for the « de-Judification » (« Entjudung ») and the building of a non-denominational People's Church (« Volkskirche ») .

The proposed abolition of the Old Testament was, in part, fiercely opposed among Christian German nationalists, seeing it as a racist attack on the foundations of their faith from inside and outside.

The theologian Johannes Schneider, a member of the German National People's Party (« Deutschnationale Volkspartei ») , or DNVP - a Party fairly close to the political aims of the NSDAP) , wrote in 1925 :

« Whoever cheapens the Old Testament will soon also lose the New. »

In 1927, the Protestant Church League (« Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenbund ») reacted to the growing radicalization of German Christian groups with a « Churches Day » in Königsberg, aiming to clarify Christianity's relation to « Fatherland » , « Nation » , « Volkstum » , « Blood » and « Race » . Many local church-officers tried to delineate, such as with regards to racism, but this only served to show how deeply it had intruded into their thinking.

Paul Althaus, for example, wrote :

« “ Volkstum ” is a spiritual reality. Certainly, there will never be a “ Volkstum ” without the pre-condition of, for example, the blood unit. But, once a “ Volkstum ” is begotten, it may exist as a spiritual reality ; even foreign blood may be lent in to it. How great the significance of blood might be in intellectual history, but the rule is, even if one is born into a “ Volkstum ”, the spirit and not the blood. »

On this basis, the radical « German Christians » ideas were hardly slowed-down. In 1928, they gathered in Thuringia to found the Thuringian « German Christians' » Church Movement (« Thüringer Kirchenbewegung Deutsche Christen ») , seeking contact with the Nazi Party and naming their newsletter « Letters to “ German Christians ” » (« Briefe an Deutsche Christen ») .

Alfred Rosenberg's book, « The Myth of the 20th Century » (« Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts ») resonated in these circles and gave them re-newed impetus. His polemic against all « un-German » and « root-stock » elements in Christianity was directed against the Christianity and the denominational organizations of the time. Marxism and Catholic Internationalism were attacked as 2 facets of the Jewish spirit, and Rosenberg stated the need for a new national religion to complete the Reformation.

The Associated German Religious Movement (« Arbeitsgemeinschaft Deutsche Glaubensbewegung ») , founded in Eisenach at the end of 1933, was also an attempt to create a national religion outside and against the churches. It combined 6 earlier Nordic « völkisch » oriented groups and a further 5 groups were represented by individual members. Jakob Wilhelm Hauer became the group's « leader and representative » by acclamation, and other members included the philosopher Ernst Bergmann (1881-1945) , the racial ideologue Hans Friedrich Karl Günther, the writer Ernst Graf zu Reventlow, the historian Herman Wirth, Ludwig Fahrenkrog and Lothar Stengel-von Rutkowski.

Some churches remained led by « German Christians » until 1945. In 1939, with the approval of 75 % of the German Protestant churches, the Eisenacher « Institute for Research and the Elimination of Jewish influence on German Church Life » was founded, led by Walter Grundmann. One of its main-tasks was to compile a « People's Testament » (« Volkstestament ») in the sense of what Alfred Rosenberg called a « 5th Gospel » , to announce the myth of the « Aryan Jesus » . It became clear in 1994 that the Testament's poetic text was written by the famous ballad-poet and proprietor of the « Eugen-Diederichs-Verlag » , Lulu von Strauß und Torney. Despite broad church support for it (even many Confessing Christians advocated such an approach, in the hope that the disaffiliation of 1937 to 1940 could be curbed) , the 1st edition of the text did not meet with the expected enthusiastic response.

After 1945, the remaining German Christian currents formed smaller communities and circles distanced from the newly-formed umbrella of the independent church bodies Evangelical Church in Germany. German Christian related Parties sought to influence the historiography of the « Kirchenkampf » in the so-called « church-historical working group » , but they had little effect, from then on, in theology and politics. Other former members of the « German Christians » moved into the numerically insignificant religious communities known as the Free People's Christian Church (« Freie Christliche Volkskirche ») and the People's Movement of Free Church Christians (« Volkskirchenbewegung Freie Christen ») after 1945.

...

German Christian, any of the Protestants who attempted to subordinate church policy to the political initiatives of the German Nazi Party. The « German Christians' » Faith Movement, organized in 1932, was nationalistic and so anti-Semitic that extremists wished to repudiate the Old Testament (Hebrew Bible) and the « Pauline Letters » because of their Jewish authorship. The movement acceded to the Nazi definition of a Jew based on the religion of his or her grandparents and to the racist principles embodied in the Nürnberg Laws of 1935. Thus, many practising Christians whose families had converted a generation before were defined as Jews and excluded from the church.

In July 1933, the Protestant churches of the various German Federal States merged to form the German Evangelical Church, and, in September, the German Christian candidate, Ludwig Müller, assumed leadership of the church as « Reichsbischof » (« Reich » Bishop) . Müller's efforts to make the church an instrument of Nazi policy were resisted by the Confessing Church, under the leadership of Martin Niemöller. After World War II, the German Christian Church Party was banned.

...

In 1932, the German Christian movement (« Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen ») established itself as an important National-Socialist splinter group within the Protestant Church. It was organized in strict accordance with the « Führer Principle » and promoted the synthesis of racial and ecclesiastical doctrines. Among other things, « German Christians » demanded racial purity within the church and the « Entjudung » (de-Judification) of religion through the abolition of the Old Testament. After Adolf Hitler became Chancellor, the movement's membership greatly increased. It won the church elections for the new, unified German Protestant Church (« Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » or DEK : « Reich » Church) on July 23, 1933, occupied the new church's most important ecclesiastical offices, and tried to bring the church into doctrinal and institutional alignment with Nazi ideology (« Gleichschaltung ») . Sermons, for example, were supposed to emphasize the theological foundations of racial theories and the allegedly « Nordic » character of Christ. Churches were decorated with swastikas, and a series of new symbols and rituals aimed to demonstrate the unity between the church and the Nazi State. When the « German Christians » introduced rules restricting church offices to Aryans, a group of Protestant theologians and clergymen centered around around Pastor Martin Niemöller protested by founding the Pastors' Emergency League, out of which the « Confessing Church » (« Bekennende Kirche ») developed. This internal protest movement challenged the competence and legitimacy of the « Reich » Church and the « German Christians » , and declared itself the only legitimate Protestant Church. Thus, instead of creating uniformity and unity, the « German Christians » actually divided the church more than ever before and steadily lost influence in the following years. Total State control and « coordination » of the Protestant Church would never be achieved.

« Kirchenkampf »

Par « Kirchenkampf » , pris au sens strict, l'on désigne le conflit qui opposa en Allemagne, entre 1933 et le début de la Seconde Guerre mondiale en 1939, d'une part les Chrétiens évangéliques allemands appartenant à la « Bekennende Kirche » (ou BK : l'Église confessante) , et d'autre part, les « Deutsche Christen » (ou DC : Chrétiens allemands) , mouvement raciste et antisémite orchestré par les Nazis, qui visait à créer un « nouveau christianisme » rejetant l'Ancien Testament et les épîtres de l'Apôtre Paul. Dans un sens plus large, le terme sert à désigner, de façon plus générale, la période dans l'histoire des églises d'Allemagne correspondant à l'époque nazie ; dans cette dernière acception, le terme de « Kirchenkampf » englobe :

La lutte menée par le pouvoir national-socialiste contre l'Église évangélique et, dans une certaine mesure aussi, contre l'Église catholique, et contre leurs structures d'organisation traditionnelles, aux fins de réalisation de la « Gleichschaltung » (mise au pas) .

La lutte menée par les Nazis, au-dedans et en dehors des églises, contre le christianisme confessionnel, afin de rendre celui-ci compatible, par « déjudaïsation » (« Entjudung ») , avec l'idéologie nazie, ou, à défaut, de lui substituer une religiosité en accord avec le génie propre allemand (« Arteigen ») .

La résistance de l'Église confessante et de la frange conservatrice des églises à ces tentatives.

Le point de vue du National-Socialisme sur le christianisme est ainsi résumé par Martin Bormann en 1942 dans un mémorandum confidentiel à des « Gauleiter » que le pouvoir de l'Église « doit être finalement et absolument détruit » , car le Nazisme est totalement incompatible avec le christianisme.

Le terme « Kirchenkampf » apparut dès 1933 et servit à désigner le conflit qui opposa les « Deutsche Christen » et les cercles qui, en 1934, s'étaient regroupés dans la « Bekennende Kirche » (l'Église confessante) . Dans les travaux d'historiographie religieuse de l'après-Guerre, on tend à rassembler sous ce terme toute l'histoire de l'église protestante en Allemagne de 1933 à 1945.

Aujourd'hui, cette acception est controversée, car elle suscite la fausse impression que les églises évangéliques auraient, dans leur totalité, « combattu » le régime nazi. Certes, il y avait, tant du côté évangélique que du côté catholique, des dignitaires ecclésiastiques et des groupes de croyants qui, individuellement, s'enhardirent à critiquer ouvertement le régime hitlérien, voire à pratiquer une résistance politique clandestine. Cependant, il n'y eut point, de la part des églises, d'opposition soudée contre le National-Socialisme et sa politique.

Au cœur du « Kirchenkampf » (celui mené au sein même de l'église évangélique) se trouvait un désaccord sur la manière de comprendre et d'interpréter les évangiles. Cette discussion théologique a pu prendre l'allure d'une opposition politique indirecte contre l'État, dans la mesure où elle conduisait à rejeter toute immixtion du régime dans le contenu de la foi et le mode d'organisation de l'Église, ce qui en soi déjà contredisait les ambitions totalitaires inhérentes à l'idéologie nazie. Mais cette opposition politique n'était pas pour autant proprement intentionnelle, ni ne découlait de la dite discussion, abstraction faite de quelques exceptions. Nombre de Chrétiens confessants étaient en même temps antisémites, votaient pour le NSDAP, voire en étaient membres actifs, et leur contestation de l'action du pouvoir se limitait expressément à celles qui concernaient les affaires intérieures de l'Église.

Néanmoins, le terme de « Kirchenkampf » a réussi à s'imposer au sein du protestantisme, car l'enjeu de ce combat était la manière dont l'Église se concevait elle-même. En effet, le groupe, assez restreint, des Chrétiens confessants parmi les chrétiens évangéliques se réclamait des fondements mêmes de la foi, tels qu'on les trouve dans la Bible et dans la profession de foi, et pouvait donc se dire habilité à représenter la chrétienté évangélique tout entière. À cette revendication, il fut fait droit par l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne après 1945, la « Bekennende Kirche » ayant en effet été reconnue Église véritable (« wahre Kirche ») et les documents produits par elle (au 1er rang desquels la Déclaration théologique, dite Déclaration de Barmen) ayant été intégrés dans les professions de foi de plusieurs sections régionales de l'Église protestante.

L'élément déclencheur et l'objet du « Kirchenkampf » fut la tentative entreprise par le régime nazi de faire adopter par les églises, avec l'aide des « Deutsche Christen », des conceptions racistes et de décider de leur mode d'organisation. Si le pouvoir y voyait un conflit politique, les Chrétiens confessants y voyaient un conflit d'ordre théologique. Ainsi, le « Kirchenkampf » ne se laisse-t-il appréhender comme conflit entre État et Église qu'avec cette restriction qu'il portait initialement sur la manière dont l'Église évangélique entendait se définir elle-même, discussion produisant secondairement des effets politiques. Du reste, le « Kirchenkampf », pris ainsi au sens de réforme, ne fut pas clos avec la fin du régime nazi, mais s'est poursuivi jusqu'à nos jours.

Les tentatives d'étendre le terme de façon à englober les conflits entre les Églises et les États socialistes sont restées sans effet.

Le protestantisme Libéral du XIXe siècle, lequel s'était, en Allemagne plus particulièrement, associé à l'idéalisme philosophique ou au Romantisme, partait, par induction, de l'expérience religieuse pour la porter à la conscience des individus et l'affermir par la prédication de l'Église (Friedrich Schleiermacher). Elle affirme l'autonomie des domaines de vie, en tant que source indépendante de connaissance révélée, et dit sa foi dans le constant progrès moral et culturel de l'Homme : les finalités historiques furent ainsi élevées au rang de points de référence obligés du discours et de l'action religieux.

L'orthodoxie luthérienne, en revanche, demeurait étroitement liée à la noblesse et à la monarchie et représentait depuis 1789 un bastion conservateur contre le rationalisme et le Libéralisme. Des théologiens influents, tels que Richard Rothe (1799-1867), acclamèrent avec enthousiasme la réunification allemande de 1871 et virent en Otto von Bismarck celui qui allait parachever la Réforme. Toutefois, si la plupart des églises régionales se virent imposer une constitution synodale qui prévoyait de renforcer le droit de codécision des communes, elles gardèrent leurs liens confessionnels propres et leurs structures de fonctionnement. En tant que souverain, l'Empereur était, comme dans d'autres monarchies, également l'évêque du « Reich », habilité à édicter ou à abolir les lois ecclésiastiques.

Les fêtes commémoratives de Martin Luther qui eurent lieu en 1883 et 1917 suscitérent un renouveau luthérien : les progrès de la civilisation étaient considérés avec scepticisme et vus sous l'angle de la peccabilité de principe de toute entreprise humaine. L'on s'efforçait de cultiver une certaine image de Luther, en mettant en évidence tels de ses traits confessionnels et nationaux propres à le démarquer de Rome et de Paris, c'est-à-dire de la tradition catholique et de la philosophie des Droits de l'homme.

La Première Guerre mondiale mit durablement à mal la croyance au progrès humain. D'autre part, la Révolution allemande mit fin à l'alliance du trône et de l'autel, entre pouvoir prussien et luthéranisme. Néanmoins, dès janvier 1919, Friedrich Ebert donna aux églises évangéliques des assurances que la nouvelle constitution en gestation ne remettrait pas en cause leurs privilèges, en particulier la perception par l'État de l'impôt d'église. Ce nonobstant, le protestantisme fit à nouveau figure, durant la République de Weimar, de haut-lieu d'un nationalisme anti-démocratique. Après que des Sociaux-Démocrates eurent fait leur entrée dans le gouvernement, c'est la nation qui tint lieu désormais, pour beaucoup de Chrétiens évangéliques, d'autorité publique. Ils considéraient la fin de la Guerre en 1918 comme une défaite, et la démocratie et le socialisme comme des ennemis du christianisme.

Après la promulgation de la constitution de Weimar, le président du Conseil supérieur des églises évangéliques, Reinhard Möller (1855-1927), adressa ses « sincères remerciements à notre souverain protecteur », c'est-à-dire à l'Empereur destitué ; les chefs ecclésiastiques, comme Detlev von Arnim-Kröchlendorff (1878-1947), par ailleurs jubilaient : « Notre Église est restée hors du champ des bouleversements politiques. » La continuité des églises régionales, compétentes, à titre d'église du peuple (« Volkskirche »), à remplir tous les besoins religieux des Allemands baptisés, avait été préservée.

Seules quelques personnalités en marge considéraient la question sociale dès avant 1914 comme un problème devant aussi intéresser le christianisme. À cette époque, être à la fois chrétien et membre du SPD était pour ainsi dire impensable. Le cas du piétiste souabe Christoph Blumhardt était à cet égard une rare exception. Cependant, après 1918, le Socialisme chrétien gagna en audience également en Allemagne, jusqu'à atteindre à un certain moment quelque 10,000 partisans. La Ligue des socialistes religieux d'Allemagne (« Bund religiöser Sozialisten Deutschlands »), fondée en 1926, animée par Georg Fritze et Georg Wunsch, fut parmi les Iers et parmi les plus fermes à mettre en garde contre le National-Socialisme émergent.

La Théologie dialectique (mouvement, au sein du protestantisme allemand, qui pose l'impossibilité d'une approche rationnelle ou naturelle de Dieu, inaccessible dans une perspective humaine) modifia, à partir de 1919, le paysage spirituel et religieux, en posant énergiquement la question de la responsabilité de l'Église devant la parole de Dieu et, partant, devant le monde. Le théologien suisse Karl Barth remit radicalement en question les théologies dites de trait-d'union (« Bindestrich-Theologien »), qui prétendent pouvoir relier entre eux des desseins temporels et éternels, ainsi que l'idée, passant pour allant de soi, que le « protestantisme de civilisation » (« Kulturprotestantismus ») aurait été la « grande institutrice » de la société.

Cependant, dans la pratique, ces avertissements restèrent sans effet sur la politique conduite par les églises protestantes. C'étaient alors plutôt les diplomates des églises qui donnaient le ton, tels qu'Otto Dibelius (1880-1967), surintendant-général de la « Kurmark », qui écrivit dans son ouvrage « Das Jahrhundert der Kirche » (1926) :

« L'église évangélique se trouve au commencement d'une ère nouvelle. D'immenses possibilités s'élèvent devant nous ! D'immenses tâches ! »

Les églises ne furent guère touchées par la crise financière mondiale grâce à la sécurité de leurs avoirs financiers garantie par l'État ; la crise fut même perçue comme une occasion d'augmenter leur pouvoir d'influence. Le « Kirchliches Jahrbuch » (Annuaire de l'Église) de 1930 annonça triomphalement que l'Église avait, dans un contexte d'inflation généralisée, « accru sa valeur ».

À l'encontre de cette auto-satisfaction, Karl Barth écrivit en 1930 une cinglante réplique, l'essai « Quousque tandem ? », où il déclare :

« ... où de telles paroles sont prononcées, là est Catilina, là gît la conjuration véritable et dangereuse contre l'essence même de l'Église évangélique. L'essence de l'Église est la promesse faite à elle, et la foi dans cette promesse. Quand donc cette promesse ne serait-elle pas devenue, sous l'effet d'un réel défi du dehors, plus grande, plus claire, plus lumineuse ? Lorsqu'elle dit " Jésus-Christ ", et le dirait-elle encore un millier de fois, l'on entendra, et l'on devra entendre, sa propre suffisance et sa propre assurance, et elle ne devra s'étonner si, en dépit de tout son " Jésus-Christ " jeté au vent, ses paroles passent à côté des besoins réels des gens réels, de la même façon que, passant à côté de la parole de Dieu, elle a fait des exhortations, consolations et enseignements de la Bible et des réformateurs, de l'eau à ses propres petits moulins. »

En 1930, les églises évangéliques régionales se dotèrent d'une structure commune assez lâche, le « Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenbund » (DEK) . En outre, elles conclurent le 11 mai 1931 un accord avec l'État libre de Prusse, accord que de nombreux dirigeants des églises ressentirent comme une victoire sur la spoliation de droits par la Constitution de Weimar. Cet accord leur assurait l'enseignement de la religion et des moyens financiers publics. En même temps, les droits des synodes, en tant que parlements au sein de l'Église, furent renforcés, ce qui favorisa l'émergence de camps antagonistes à l'intérieur des églises.

Le National-Socialisme montant avait placé au centre de son programme politique la lutte pour l'hégémonie de la race de seigneur aryenne, la conquête d'espace vital dans l'est de l'Europe sous l'aspect d'une croisade anti-Bolchévique, et l'extermination des Juifs. Ces objectifs ne pouvaient être atteints que si l'on pouvait s'appuyer sur une population dressée dans l'esprit national-socialiste, prête à se détourner de la morale juive compassionnelle propre au christianisme. L'idéologie nazie devait donc s'affirmer comme une conception du monde qui fût globale et ne laissât aucune place à des interprétations ou systèmes de sens religieux ou politiques concurrents. Un Parti unique devait être le moyen politique d'imposer cette idéologie en en faisant une doctrine d'État.

Après l'échec du « " Putsch " de la Brasserie » de Munich, conscient du besoin de rassembler la population et les forces politiques, Adolf Hitler tempore avec l'anti-Christianisme fervent de son Parti.

Ainsi, il répond à Erich Ludendorff qui lui reprochait son manque de virulence anti-Chrétienne :

« Je suis entièrement d'accord avec Son excellence, mais son Excellence peut se permettre d'annoncer à ses adversaires qu'il va les frapper à mort. Mais j'ai besoin, pour la construction d'un grand Parti politique, des Catholiques bavarois autant que des protestants de Prusse. Le reste peut venir ensuite. »

Il évite ainsi de s'attaquer directement au christianisme, et dans « Mein Kampf » , et dans le « Programme en 25 Points » , dont l'Article 24 prône de façon ambiguë la liberté religieuse. Cette stratégie permettra effectivement de rallier une grande partie des chrétiens allemands.

Ce n'est qu'avec la publication du livre d'Alfred Rosenberg, « Le Mythe du XXe siècle » et sa définition du christianisme positif, que les églises commencèrent à s'inquiéter. Si beaucoup de fidèles se retrouvaient dans le nationalisme et l'anti-Communisme nazis, de nombreuses voix s'élevèrent contre le National-Socialisme. Ainsi, à la tête des catholiques allemands, le cardinal Adolf Bertram, annonça dans son message de la Nouvelle Année 1931 que le nationalisme extrême, le racisme et la glorification de la race étaient le fait d'agitateurs et de faux-prophètes, contraires à l'enseignement de Dieu. Ainsi, lors de la conférence épiscopale de Fulda en 1932, il fut interdit aux catholiques d'adhérer au NSDAP et aux Nazis d'assister aux cérémonies religieuses.

Le « Zentrum », Parti catholique cherchant à jouer un rôle modéré et médiateur, s' alarma de la droitisation et la montée du nationalisme dans l'électorat catholique. Il s'allia dans les années 1920 avec le Parti Social-Démocrate d'Allemagne afin d'essayer d'empêcher l'effondrement de la République de Weimar et de la démocratie. Cependant, ce Parti était de moins en moins bien perçu par l'épiscopat allemand. Celui-ci, sous l'influence d'Eugenio Pacelli, décourageait les tendances socialistes dans l'Église. Certains prêtres encourageaient leurs fidèles à rejoindre le NSDAP et sa croisade nationaliste contre le Bolchévisme pour le christianiser de l'intérieur.

Face aux églises, le NSDAP mit donc en œuvre une stratégie double, de séduction et de confrontation directe. Jusqu'en 1930, il les laissa en dehors de son champ d'action. Son programme portait de tenter d'abord d'attirer les chrétiens en propageant un « christianisme positif » sans attache confessionnelle ; un ajout, passant la plupart du temps inaperçu, y apportait cependant cette restriction : « pour autant qu'ils ne heurtent pas les mœurs et le sens moral de la race germanique ». La religion ne devait être possible que dans les limites du sentiment national ; aussi une foi allemande n'était-elle en mesure de trouver Dieu que dans l'Histoire allemande. La révolution nationale était donnée pour l'accomplissement de toutes les aspirations religieuses.

S'y ajoutait un antisémitisme militant, pour lequel du reste le terrain avait été déblayé depuis longtemps du côté chrétien. Adolf Stöcker (1835-1909) déjà le fit figurer en 1880 au programme politique de son parti, le Parti Chrétien-Social (« Christlich-soziale Partei »), programme avec lequel de nombreux chrétiens luthériens conservateurs pouvaient s'identifier. Ainsi, trouvaient-ils dans l'idéologie nazie quantité de choses familières.

Hitler lui-même avait écrit dans « Mein Kampf », en 1923 :

« En me défendant contre les Juifs, j'accomplis l'œuvre du Seigneur. »

Après la signature de l'accord sur les églises de 1930, le NSDAP commença à mener une campagne offensive visant à ce que les chrétiens évangéliques se joignissent à sa lutte contre le « système de Weimar », dont les ingrédients seraient « le Marxisme, les Juifs et le Centrisme » : des troupes de SA assistaient en groupe aux offices évangéliques et montaient des factions dissuasives (« Mahnwachen ») devant les églises, pour intimider les pasteurs aux idées pacifistes ou social-religieuses. L'on réussit ainsi, par exemple, à empêcher, en provoquant un mouvement d'indignation, le pasteur berlinois Günther Dehn (1882-1970) d'assumer ses fonctions d'enseignant à Halle. En effet, Dehn avait justifié devant une assemblée de fidèles, lors d'une conférence prononcée en 1928 intitulée : « Der Christ und der Krieg » (le Chrétien et la Guerre), bible à l'appui, le refus de service militaire comme étant un choix chrétien.

En 1932, fut en outre fondé la « Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen » (Mouvement de foi des Chrétiens allemands, ou DC) , par lequel les Nationaux-Socialistes chrétiens évangélistes baptisés se constituaient en association. Après avoir donné à l'idéologie nazie droit de cité dans leur église, ils voulurent, après qu'en 1930 les « Deutschnationalen » ou le « Christlich-soziale Volksdienst » eut remporté l'élection au sein de l'église en Prusse, en faire l'idéologie unique. Ils voulaient pratiquer un christianisme spécifiquement allemand (« Arteigen ») , rénové par une religiosité néo-Paganiste enracinée dans le peuple allemand. Ils entendaient que le « Principe du " Führer " » fût ancré dans l'Église et s'efforçaient d'unifier les églises régionales, jusque-là réparties selon les différentes confessions, en une seule « Église du " Reich " » (« Reichskirche ») . La « Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen » était dirigée par Joachim Gustav Wilhelm Hossfelder (1899-1976) , pasteur originaire de Breslau, et appuyée par des théologiens de renom, tel que Emanuel Hirsch (1888-1972) qui, dès 1920, avait préparé l'idéologie de la « Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen » par le biais de son ouvrage « Deutschlands Schicksal » (la Destinée de l'Allemagne) . Paul de Lagarde (1827-1891) et Artur Dinter (1876-1948) ont joué également un rôle de précurseur, en condamnant, comme le faisait la « Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen » Saint-Paul de Tarse comme corrupteur du christianisme, en présentant le Christ comme un « prophète anti-juif » , et en préconisant une religion allemande nationale.

L'Église confessante avait ainsi, en tant que mouvement rénovateur au sein de l'Église créé après 1933, à lutter sur plusieurs fronts à la fois : contre la politisation, la « Gleichschaltung » et l'instrumentalisation de l'Église imposées par les Nazis, et contre les tendances à l'accommodement venant de l'intérieur, contre les parcours confessionnels singuliers, et aussi, et surtout, contre la propre peur, lâcheté et inconséquence, qui contrariaient une résistance efficace.

La nomination d'Adolf Hitler comme chancelier du « Reich » , le 30 janvier 1933, fut acclamé par la majorité des chrétiens comme le salut de la patrie.

Par l'Ordonnance du 28 février 1933 pour la protection du peuple et de l'État (« Verordnung zum Schutz von Volk und Staat vom 28. Februar 1933 ») , dite aussi : « Reichstagsbrandverordnung ») , Hitler supprima le 28 février 1933 (1 jour seulement après l'incendie du « Reichstag ») toutes les libertés individuelles inscrites dans la Constitution de Weimar ; par la suite, cette même loi autorisait également la surveillance et l'emprisonnement de personnalités ecclésiastiques. Cependant, c'est à peine si les églises y perçurent un quelconque danger ; au contraire, lors de la journée de Potsdam (le 21 mars, où eut lieu une mise en scène grandiose de la prise de pouvoir par Hitler) , Otto Dibelius célébra, dans l'église de la Garnison (« Garnisonkirche ») à Potsdam, la victoire électorale de Hitler du 5 mars par une messe d'action de grâces pour le « rétablissement de l'ordre » . Le même jour fut promulguée la Loi contre les attaques sournoises à l'encontre de l'État et du Parti et protégeant les uniformes du Parti (« Gesetz gegen heimtückische Angriffe auf Staat und Partei und zum Schutz der Parteiuniformen ») , mieux connue sous l'appellation : « Heimtückegesetz ») , laquelle loi menaçait d'emprisonnement quiconque critiquait le gouvernement de Hitler à l'attention de l'étranger.

Le 23 mars, 1 jour avant la promulgation de la loi des pleins pouvoirs, Hitler rassura les églises par une déclaration gouvernementale, dans laquelle il promit :

« Le gouvernement national voit dans les 2 confessions chrétiennes les facteurs les plus importants pour la préservation de notre caractère national (Volkstum) . »

Il y affirme qu'il « leur accordera l'influence qui leur revient et les consolidera » et qu'il voit « dans le christianisme les fondements inébranlables des mœurs et de la morale de notre peuple » .

Le 30 mars, de nombreux œcuménistes de haut-rang des églises protestantes et des églises libres donnèrent suite à la « recommandation » du NSDAP les incitant à écrire des lettres à leurs interlocuteurs étrangers, dans lesquelles ils priaient ceux-ci de s'inscrire en faux contre la « campagne de dénigrement » (« Hetze ») de l'ordre nouveau en Allemagne. Tout se passe, était-il ainsi affirmé, dans une « tranquille discipline » et « va dans le sens de la paix » . Dibelius déclara dans une émission de radio aux États-Unis, par exemple que les détenus dans les prisons étaient « traités correctement » . 2 jours après fut instauré, en partie par la violence, le boycott des commerces juifs, ce que Dibelius s'efforça de légitimer comme « rétablissement de l'ordre » de l'État et « légitime défense » . De même, il qualifiait les réactions déclenchées au sein du Mouvement œcuménique par la persécution des Juifs de campagne de dénigrement de l'étranger (« Auslandshetze ») , qu'il mit sur le compte d'influences juives internationales.

Les 3 et 4 avril se tint à Berlin un congrès (« Reichstagung ») des « Deutsche Christen » : y participèrent, à côté de représentants du NSDAP comme Hermann Göring, des théologiens universitaires tels que Karl Fezer ; ce dernier voulait mettre à profit la faveur de l'heure pour accomplir une « mission nationale intérieure » (« innere Volksmission ») . Les orateurs plus radicaux cependant voulaient transposer le principe du « Führer » et l'impératif de conformité au génie national (« Artgemäßheit ») directement sur l'Église tout entière, réclamaient l'exclusion des Juifs baptisés, et menaçaient de faire intervenir, y compris au sein de l'Église, des commissaires de l'État (« Staatskommissare ») - ce qui se produisit pour la 1re fois le 22 avril dans l'église régionale du Mecklembourg.

Le 7 avril fut adoptée la 1re loi sur les « non aryens » en vue du redressement de la fonction publique (« Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums ») . Le paragraphe relatif aux aryens contenu dans cette loi menaçait de licenciement les fonctionnaires, professeurs d'université et même les pasteurs d'origine juive. Dietrich Bonhoeffer fut un des 1ers à réagir, par le biais de son article « Die Kirche vor der Judenfrage » (l'Église face à la question juive ; article achevé le 15 avril, publié en juin) . Il y posait sans équivoque que ce qui était mis en jeu, par l'exclusion des Juifs, était l'existence même de l'Église en tant que communauté de foi.

Mais l'Église doit, écrivait-il, protéger contre les abus de l'État non seulement les Juifs baptisés, mais aussi tous les Juifs, quels qu'ils soient :

« L'Église a des devoirs inconditionnels vis-à-vis des victimes de l'ordre social quel qu'il soit, même lorsque ces victimes n'appartiennent pas à la communauté chrétienne. »

Elle a le devoir de demander à l'État les raisons qui l'autorisent à déposséder de ses droits une minorité ; si, à cette requête, celui-ci répond en continuant à user de violence, elle a le devoir « non seulement de panser les victimes sous la roue, mais encore de se précipiter dans les rayons de la roue elle-même » .

Pour Bonhoeffer, la relation avec les Juifs était donc le point central du « Kirchenkampf » . Il en venait déjà à revendiquer le droit à la résistance, alors que la plupart des chrétiens prenaient le parti d'ignorer la violence dont usait l'État contre les Juifs, voire montraient pour elle de la compréhension.

À cela, il rétorque de manière incisive :

« Le devoir de la prédication chrétienne est de dire : ici, où Juif et Allemand se tiennent ensemble sous la parole de Dieu, c'est l'Église, et c'est aussi là que se vérifie si l'Église est encore Église ou non. »

De même, en mai, 11 prêtres westphaliens, parmi lesquels Hans Ehrenberg et le futur martyr Ludwig Steil, rejetèrent l'exclusion des Juifs, la déclarant une hérésie. Le mouvement Jeune-Réformateur (« Jungreformatorische Bewegung ») également déclara dans ses Principes de la Refondation de l'Église (« Grundsätze zur neuen Gestaltung der Kirche »), au point 7 :

« Nous faisons profession de notre foi en l'Esprit-Saint et, pour cette raison, rejetons par principe que des non-aryens soient exclus de l'Église ; car une telle exclusion repose sur une confusion entre État et Église. Le rôle de l'État est d'orienter, celui de l'Église, de sauver. »

Les lois étaient ainsi condamnées qui faisaient obligation à l'Église d'exclure les personnes d'origine juive. Ce point de vue était sous-tendu par la vision luthérienne traditionnelle des 2 Royaumes, selon laquelle l'État pouvait définir par ses propres lois le contenu qu'il entend donner au Droit et son application, tandis que l'Église devait se borner à œuvrer pour le salut des âmes. En conséquence, il n'y eut pas d'opposition de la part de l'Église contre les futures lois raciales de Nuremberg.

La conclusion suivante, à laquelle parvint en août 1933 le rapport de la faculté de théologie évangélique de l'université de Marbourg, ne souffrait aucune restriction :

« C'est pourquoi le paragraphe sur les aryens est une hérésie de l'Église, propre à détruire son essence même. »

Selon le rapport, prétendre élever une loi politique au rang de loi religieuse, constitue une hérésie, que tout chrétien se doit de rejeter absolument. Les auteurs du rapport insistaient que cette loi soit, en tout état de cause, rejetée comme inique et appelaient à s'opposer à l'État sur ce point particulier. Ce nonobstant, il n'y eut guère, de la part des chrétiens confessants, de prise de position mettant en cause la légitimité des mesures prises par l'État contre les Juifs.

À la tête des Églises, l'on ne se préoccupait guère du sort des Juifs, mais plutôt du mode d'organisation des Églises elles-mêmes : les chefs ecclésiastiques, dans l'espoir de reprendre l'initiative et de refouler les « Deutsche Christen », se saisirent à leur tour de l'appel à réformer les Églises. Le projet de constitution de Wilhelm Zöllner (1860-1937) du 13 avril (un parmi de nombreux autres) prévoyait une « Église évangélique de la Nation allemande », au sein de laquelle une Église luthérienne et une Église réformée officielles (« Reichskirche ») co-existeraient.

Avant même que cette constitution eût pu être rédigée, Hitler nomma le 25 avril l'aumônier militaire Ludwig Müller (1883-1945), national-socialiste convaincu, « homme de confiance et plénipotentiaire pour les questions relatives à l'église évangélique ». Aussitôt, les « Deutsche Christen » désignèrent Müller comme leur tuteur et exigèrent des élections afin de faire de lui l'évêque du « Reich » (« Reichsbischof »). Au cours des concertations avec Müller qui suivirent, Hermann Kapler (1867-1941), August Friedrich Karl Marahrens (1875-1947) et Hermann Klugkist HeBe (1884-1949) en étaient déjà venus à considérer matière négociable la notion d'Église nationale (« Reichskirche ») et le « Principe du “ Führer ” » ; seule la conformité au génie national allemand (« Artgemäßheit ») fut écartée par eux du débat. Le paragraphe sur les aryens ne touchant que peu de membres ecclésiastiques (quelque 110 prêtres, ainsi qu'un nombre inconnu d'étudiants en théologie d'ascendance juive), la disposition à céder, sur ce point également, à la pression du Parti et des « Deutsche Christen » allait croissant.

En même temps se constituait, à partir de plusieurs groupes déjà existants et ayant concernant l'Église des aspirations rénovatrices différentes (par exemple : le mouvement de Berneuchen, « Berneuchener Bewegung »), la confrérie de Sydow (« Sydower Bruderschaft »), la « Neuwerkbewegung » - un Mouvement Jeune-Réformé (« Jungreformatrische Bewegung »), lequel, s'il réclamait lui aussi une Église unifiée, demeurait attaché aux professions de foi réformées et favorisait la candidature de Friedrich von Bodelschwingh comme leur évêque. Les directions des Églises régionales avaient déjà entamé leur transformation en une Église évangélique allemande (« Deutsche Evangelische Kirche », ou DEK) et, le 27 mai, élurent Bodelschwingh évêque national (« Reichsbischof »), avant même que cette fonction ne fût inscrite dans la constitution de cette Église.

Sur ce, le ministre prussien du Culte, invoquant une violation du contrat d'État, entreprit de transformer l'appareil de direction de l'Église. Le 24 juin, sous la pression du pouvoir, Bodelschwingh dut se démettre. Le 14 juillet, il fut imposé à la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche », par une loi, une nouvelle constitution, et de nouvelles élections synodales furent annoncées pour le 23 juillet. Après que Hitler eut pris parti, la veille de l'élection, par la radio, en faveur des « Deutsche Christen », ceux-ci remportèrent avec le slogan « ein Volk, ein Reich, eine Kirche » (« un peuple, un État, une Église ») une victoire écrasante sur le groupe « Evangelium und Kirche » (Évangile et Église), fondé par les Jeunes Réformateurs. En vue de créer une Église assujettie à l'État, les « Deutsche Christen » s'employèrent à occuper les instances dirigeantes des églises et à remodeler les églises régionales selon le principe du Führer et suivant les diocèses historiques. Le 27 septembre, leurs directions élurent Müller évêque national. Les représentants battus à l'élection votèrent eux aussi pour Müller. L'opposition obtint cependant que la référence aux professions de foi de la Réforme soit inscrite dans la nouvelle constitution de l'Église.

Les forces radicales au sein des « Deutsche Christen », fortes de leur succès électoral, réclamèrent toutefois, par analogie avec la Révolution nationale, le « parachèvement de la Réforme », impliquant que fût éliminé du culte et de la foi tout élément non-allemand, que l'évangile fût « déjudaisé » et que fût instauré un christianisme « en accord avec le génie propre (de l'Allemagne) » (artgemäß), où serait vénéré un « Christ héroïque » (heldischer Jesus). Ce programme fut exposé le 13 novembre au Palais des Sports de Berlin, puis adopté avec une seule voix contre. Le discours du représentant des « Deutsche Christen » Reinhard Krause déclencha cependant un scandale et poussa de nombreux « Deutsche Christen » modérés à se détourner de ce parti, et certains même à démissionner de leurs fonctions. Par la suite, le groupe des « Deutsche Christen » se désagrégea en plusieurs groupuscules.

Le 20 décembre, l'évêque national Müller entreprit d'incorporer dans les Jeunesses hitlériennes les fédérations de jeunesse évangéliques, qui s'étaient auparavant réunies dans le Evangelisches Jugendwerk Deutschlands, et cela sans concertation avec leurs dirigeants et à l'encontre de leur volonté expresse. Si Müller croyait avoir fait ainsi à Hitler son « plus beau cadeau de Noël », il avait en revanche largement perdu la confiance de la jeunesse évangélique, laquelle commença à s'organiser elle-même de diverses manières. Même Hitler laissa choir Müller à partir de 1934.

Attitude des catholiques face au régime national-socialiste

Côté catholique, compte tenu du Concordat conclu en juillet 1933, le terme de Kirchenkampf n'est pas utilisé pour la période 1933–1945, ce terme étant réservé pour désigner le Kulturkampf pendant l'ère bismarckienne. La population catholique préférerait garder depuis lors une attitude distante vis-à-vis des innovations politiques. Les évêques catholiques d'Allemagne avaient du reste formulé des mises en garde répétées contre l'idéologie nazie. C'est ce qui explique pourquoi le Parti du Centre obtint lors des élections parlementaires de mars 1933 une nouvelle fois 13,9 pour cent des voix. En Rhénanie et en Bavière, régions à prédominance catholique, le NSDAP n'obtint guère plus de 20 pour cent des voix émises, contre plus de 60 pour cent par endroits dans les contrées protestantes.

Dès avant la prise de pouvoir par les Nazis, l'épiscopat allemand avait pris ses distances d'avec le national-socialisme, en interdisant aux catholiques de s'engager dans le NSDAP et en interdisant aux groupements nazis de se joindre aux processions religieuses. L'ensemble des diocèses sera amené en 1932 à déclarer « incompatible avec la foi chrétienne » l'appartenance au NSDAP.

À la suite de la déclaration gouvernementale de Hitler, laquelle promettait une politique modérée en matière d'églises, les évêques révoquèrent leur déclaration d'incompatibilité. Lorsque la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » se fut constituée, beaucoup de catholiques allemands souhaitèrent ne plus rester à l'écart de la Révolution nationale. Beaucoup d'entre eux espéraient la reconstitution d'une Allemagne chrétienne-nationale, attitude dans laquelle l'anticommunisme traditionnel joua un rôle. Ceci contribue à expliquer pourquoi une opposition chrétienne conjointe contre l'idéologie nazie ne vit pas le jour.

Le 20 juillet 1933, la Curie, de façon inopinée, signa le Concordat du Reich, ce que Hitler fit ensuite valoir comme un succès diplomatique : son régime acquit ainsi une caution morale et de la crédibilité au niveau international. De l'autre côté, les évêques catholiques purent grâce à ce Concordat garder une certaine influence sur la société, dont ils usèrent aussi contre les injustices et exactions commises par le pouvoir. Néanmoins, les catholiques n'échappèrent pas à la politique de Gleichschaltung des nationaux-socialistes. Le Parti du Centre fut interdit à l'automne 1933, au même titre que tous les autres partis démocratiques, les syndicats chrétiens furent dissous, les écoles et ordres catholiques ne purent préserver qu'à grand peine leur autonomie. La SA agressait, dans des combats de rue, les membres d'associations catholiques, telles que la Kolpingjugend. Bien que ces conflits missent à mal les relations avec le régime nazi, ils furent, eu égard au Concordat, pour la plupart résolus dans la discrétion et ne donnèrent lieu qu'à des protestations privées. Ce ne sera qu'en 1937 que l'encyclique Mit brennender Sorge protestera contre les exactions et établira l'incompatibilité entre racisme et christianisme.

Ce nonobstant, certains théologiens catholiques comme Karl Eschweiler (1886—1936) ou Hans Barion saluèrent l'idéologie nazie et adhérèrent au NSDAP. Les deux se virent temporairement privés par la Curie de l'autorisation d'enseigner en raison de leur approbation, en 1934, de la loi sur la stérilisation forcée des malades héréditaires ; mais la loi en tant que telle ne fut point critiquée. Certes, quelques individualités comme l'évêque Clemens August Graf von Galen ou le cardinal Michæl von Faulhaber s'exprimaient dans leurs sermons ouvertement contre de telles mesures de l'État ; von Galen obtint même la suspension pendant un temps du programme d'euthanasie national-socialiste, l'Action T4.

En 1939, c'est, avec Pie XII, un des principaux initiateurs du Concordat qui accéda au pontificat suprême. Selon les sources disponibles à l'heure actuelle, il plaçait tout son espoir dans la diplomatie, en vue de minimiser les dégâts et de sauver des gens par des actions clandestines. Cette attitude eut pour effet de restreindre la marge de manœuvre des catholiques en Allemagne. Les protestations non publiques demeuraient ainsi l'affaire du Vatican, et il n'y eut donc point d'opposition déclarée contre l'Holocauste. Mais, en ce cas également, des individualités mirent leur vie en jeu pour des Juifs et devinrent des martyrs, parmi lesquels les prêtres Alfred Delp, Maximilien Kolbe, Rupert Mayer et Bernhard Lichtenberg. Le clergé polonais en particulier eut de nombreuses victimes dans ses rangs après 1939.

Dans l'ensemble, l'attitude des catholiques en Allemagne était plus unitaire et peu embarrassée par des conflits internes : s'ils ne se plièrent pas au national-socialisme idéologiquement, ils ne le combattirent pas davantage. En tant qu'église universelle, sa direction tenta au premier chef de protéger ses propres structures et membres. Il s'ensuit que le terme de Kirchenkampf n'est pas appliqué à l'Église catholique dans le Troisième Reich.

Apparition de la Bekennende Kirche

Le Pfarrernotbund

Le 21 septembre 1933, une Ligue de secours pour pasteurs (Pfarrernotbund) s'était formée à Wittenberg sous la direction de Martin Niemöller ; parmi les dirigeants de la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche », seuls y figuraient le président westphalien Jakob Emil Karl Koch (1876—1951) et Otto Dibelius. La Ligue obligeait ses membres, par son règlement interne, à s'opposer à l'application, au sein de l'Église réformée, du paragraphe sur les Aryens, celui-ci impliquant en effet une « violation de l'état de confession » (en latin : status confessionis), et s'efforçait d'aider financièrement les pasteurs d'origine juive menacés d'exclusion de l'Église.

Ce faisant, les auteurs (Bonhœffer und Niemöller) plaçaient la question juive au même rang d'importance théologique que les thèmes qui passaient aux yeux des réformateurs du XVI^e siècle pour l'essence inaliénable de la foi évangélique. L'appel à se déclarer publiquement opposé à la majorité opprimante, ecclésiastique et sociale, renfermait en lui un engagement implicite de défendre ce crédo jusqu'à la mort, s'il y a lieu. « Seulement avec les Juifs » était, aux yeux de ces confessants, équivalents au quadruple « sola scriptura », « sola fide », « sola gratia », « solus Christus » de Martin Luther, lequel avait lui aussi, comme individu, mis en jeu sa propre vie.

C'est le point de départ de l'opposition à l'infiltration, au sein de l'Église évangélique allemande, des idées nationales-socialistes dans la doctrine chrétienne. Désormais, partout dans le Reich, se constituaient éparses des « communes confessantes ». Début 1934, la Ligue de secours se réunit avec ses représentants, afin de se porter à la défense de « l'Évangile ».

Communauté confessante et déclaration théologique de Barmen

Müller tenta d'étouffer la discussion qui s'amplifiait au sein de la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » au moyen d'un « décret Muselière » et par de nombreuses mesures disciplinaires. Cependant les plaintes à son endroit ne cessaient de se multiplier, à tel point qu'une réunion eut finalement lieu le 25 janvier 1934 entre Hitler et les dirigeants de l'Église. Ceux-ci l'assurèrent de leur loyauté ; la chute de Müller toutefois ne vint pas. Celui-ci s'attacha alors à réorganiser les autres églises régionales.

En réaction, les forces d'opposition internes de l'Église se groupèrent au niveau national. En mars, ils se liguèrent en une Communauté confessante de la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » (« Bekenntnisgemeinschaft der DEK ») et mirent à sa tête un Conseil confrérial national (« Reichsbruderrat ») chargé de la diriger. Lors d'une réunion à Ulm le 22 avril, elle exprima, contre la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » « occupée » par les « Deutsche Christen », la revendication d'être l'« Église évangélique légitime d'Allemagne ». Du 29 au 31 mai se déroula ensuite à Barmen le 1er synode confessant, auquel les Luthériens, les Réformés et les Unifiés dépêchèrent des représentants de leurs communes. Ils y fondèrent l'Église confessante (« Bekennende Kirche »).

Dans leur déclaration fondatrice, rédigée par Karl Barth, il est affirmé :

« Jésus-Christ, tel qu'il est attesté dans les Saintes-Écritures, est l'unique parole de Dieu à laquelle nous ayons à obéir, à laquelle nous devons faire confiance dans la vie et dans la mort.

Nous rejetons la fausse doctrine selon laquelle l'Église peut et doit reconnaître, pour source de sa prédication, en dehors et en sus de cette unique parole de Dieu, des événements et des puissances, figures et vérités autres que la révélation divine.

Nous rejetons la fausse doctrine selon laquelle l'Église a le droit de laisser son propre bon vouloir ou le jeu changeant des convictions philosophiques et politiques du jour déterminer le contenu de son message et la forme de son organisation.

Nous rejetons la fausse doctrine selon laquelle l'Église est habilitée et autorisée à se donner ou à se laisser donner, en dehors des nécessités de son service, des dirigeants particuliers, doté de compétences décisionnelles.

Nous rejetons la fausse doctrine selon laquelle l'État doit et peut, en sus de sa mission spécifique, se poser en ordonnateur unique et total de la vie humaine et, par là, prendre aussi en charge la destinée de l'Église.

Nous rejetons la fausse doctrine selon laquelle l'Église doit et peut, au-delà de sa mission spécifique, s'appropriier la manière d'être, les attributions et les prérogatives d'un État et devenir de ce fait elle-même un organisme de l'État.

Nous rejetons la fausse doctrine selon laquelle l'Église peut, par sa seule autorité humaine, mettre la parole et l'œuvre du Seigneur au service de quelconques souhaits, buts et desseins qu'elle aurait définis elle-même. »

Ce positionnement (l'allégeance au Christ seul) était à la base de toutes les négations ; celles-ci traçaient, par le biais des « rejets », les contours d'une hérésie, qu'il y avait lieu d'exclure du champ de l'Église. Ces négations permettaient de se démarquer :

De la théologie des « Deutsche Christen », mais aussi de la théologie Libérale, qui posaient comme divinités, en plus du Christ, d'autres incarnations (« andere Gestalten »), telles que le génie national (« Volkstum »), l'État, le sang, la race, le chef (« Führer »).

De la politisation de l'Église, telle que la concevait l'idéologie nazie.

Du « Principe du " Führer " », que l'Église se voyait imposer de l'intérieur (à travers l'obéissance par provision) ou de l'extérieur (par la « Gleichschaltung »).

De l'État total, prédefinisant une certaine conception du monde.

De l'Église d'État en tant qu'organisme et prolongement de l'État.

De la subordination de la parole chrétienne à quelque intérêt social ou revendication sociale que ce soit.

Pour la 1^{re} fois, la théologie dialectique de la Parole de Dieu, que Barth avait développée depuis 1918, se fit opérante sur le plan de la politique religieuse, et par là même indirectement, sur le plan politique.

L'interprétation des thèses de Barmen et leur traduction en situation donna lieu ensuite à des dissensions au sein même de la « Bekennende Kirche ». La plus grande lacune de la déclaration était le défaut d'engagement à une inébranlable solidarité pan-chrétienne avec les Juifs persécutés. L'effet s'en révéla funeste : très peu de chrétiens, en effet, exercèrent une résistance directe aux mesures prises par le pouvoir contre les Juifs, résistance qui pourtant allait être, au plus tard après les pogroms de novembre 1938, impérative. Ces résistants ne furent guère soutenus, pas même par l'Église confessante elle-même. Seules quelques individualités entendaient la résistance au régime nazi comme découlant, de façon nécessaire et incontournable, de la foi chrétienne.

La déclaration de Barmen eut pour effet tout d'abord d'intensifier la résistance contre la politique d'embrigadement de Müller, surtout dans les communes évangéliques du Wurtemberg et de Bavière. De nombreux procès firent apparaître le caractère illégal de l'action de Müller. Lorsque, le 23 septembre, il se fit installer en qualité d'évêque national (« Reichsbischof ») à la cathédrale de Berlin, il avait manqué son objectif d'une Église protestante pilotée par le pouvoir politique.

Le 20 octobre, lors du 2^e synode des confessants à Berlin-Dahlem, le Droit ecclésiastique d'exception (« Kirchliches Notrecht ») de Dahlem, déjà appliqué en Prusse, fut proclamé applicable dans toute l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne, cependant que fut constitué un Conseil confrérial national (« Reichsbruderrat ») , pour faire contrepoids aux dirigeants des « Deutsche Christen » . Cela revenait quasiment à une administration à part, et donc à une scission. L'avoué de Müller, August Jäger, démissionna le 26 octobre. Les demandes de démission à l'adresse de Müller se multipliaient, à la suite de quoi le pouvoir résolut de lever l'ensemble de la législation sur les églises de 1934. Hitler reçut une nouvelle fois quelques évêques (Theophil Wurm, Hans Meiser, Marahrens) et indiqua que l'idée d'une Église nationale (« Reichskirche ») avait cessé de l'intéresser.

L'Église évangélique allemande s'était ainsi désagrégé en plusieurs groupes, qui se côtoyaient dans une situation juridiquement incertaine :

Les diocèses déjà restructurés, dirigés par des Deutsche Christen (DC), et qui se voyaient comme faisant partie de l'Église unifiée.

Les Églises régionales restées intactes (Hanovre e.a.), qui continuaient à appartenir à l'Église unifiée, mais rejetaient Müller pour leur chef.

Les Églises régionales démantelées, dont les communes confessantes refusaient d'adhérer à l'Église unifiée.

La « Bekennende Kirche » , qui se considérait comme la « vraie » Église évangélique et dans laquelle des communes luthériennes et réformées luttèrent conjointement contre la Gleichschaltung. Avec les dirigeants des Églises régionales intactes (par exemple : la Bavière et le Wurtemberg) elle forma, à partir du 20 novembre, une Direction provisoire des Églises protestantes (« Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » , ou VKL) , laquelle revendiquait la direction de l'Église évangélique allemande tout entière.

Au sein de la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » surgirent rapidement des divergences dans les attitudes vis-à-vis des instances ecclésiastiques officielles. Alors que les dirigeants des églises régionales restées intactes souhaitaient préserver la continuité des accords, toujours en vigueur, avec l'État prussien, et s'efforçaient d'obtenir une reconnaissance officielle, les Dahlémites radicaux (parmi lesquels Dietrich Bonhoeffer) voulaient rompre avec la mise sous tutelle par l'État, voyant dans une telle rupture la conséquence logique de la déclaration de Barmen. Les dissensions amenèrent Barth, Niemöller, Karl Immer et Hermann Albert Heße à se retirer du Conseil confrérial, ce qui eut pour effet d'affaiblir la « Bekennende Kirche » et de lui faire perdre, en dépit de la montée en puissance de ses communes, son orientation.

En 1935 fut lancée, à l'instigation du pouvoir, une nouvelle campagne de propagande au sein de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne : le Mouvement allemand de la Foi (« Deutsche Glaubensbewegung ») se mit à répandre des idées néo-païennes similaires à celles des « Deutsche Christen » . Dans le même temps, Müller interdit que des questions de politique religieuse fussent mises en débat public. Les pasteurs de la « Bekennende Kirche » ayant passé outre cette interdiction dans leur prêches dominicaux furent temporairement détenus. Les sections financières prussiennes prirent le contrôle sur l'administration de l'Église protestante, tandis qu'un service de décision (« Beschlussstelle ») surveillait les recours juridiques des partisans de la « Bekennende Kirche » .

Cela conduisit le synode de l'Église de l'Union de la Vieille Prusse (« Kirche der Altpreußischen Union »), la plus importante des églises régionales évangéliques autonomes à avoir rejoint la « Bekennende Kirche », à adresser en mars un avis, affirmant :

« Nous voyons notre peuple menacé d'un mortel péril. Le péril consiste en une religion nouvelle. En elle, les conceptions raciale-ethniques sont élevées au rang de mythe. En elle, le sang et la race, le génie national, l'honneur et la liberté ont valeur d'idoles. »

Le racisme, comme idéologie globale, était repoussé, mais l'on continuait à faire silence sur les conséquences concrètes de celui-ci pour les Juifs.

Du 4 au 6 juin se réunit le 3^e synode de la « Bekennende Kirche » à Augsburg : la rupture avec les autorités ecclésiastiques fut évitée et il fut décidé de suivre la ligne conservatrice des Églises régionales luthériennes. Mais, d'autre part, le synode chargea le Conseil confrérial national de mettre en œuvre ses décisions, de sorte que Niemöller, Heße et Immer ré-intégrèrent la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » .

Le 16 juillet, Hitler nomma Hanns Kerrl ministre des Affaires religieuses. Une loi du 24 septembre, destinée à « garantir » l'unité de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne, servit à légitimer de nombreuses ordonnances prises dans les années suivantes. Un Comité national des Églises (« Reichskirchenausschuß », ou RKA), nouvellement créé, sous la houlette de Wilhelm Zoellner, prit la direction de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne, en lieu et place de Müller, et dès lors bénéficia dans l'année qui suivit d'un soutien croissant de la part des églises régionales intactes ainsi que de quelques Conseils confrériaux.

En conséquence, la « Bekennende Kirche » se scinda lors du 4^e synode de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne tenu à Bad Oeynhausen du 17 au 22 février 1936. La Ire « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » démissionna unanimement ; une nouvelle « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » fut investie le 12 mars par le Conseil confrérial national. Cela aboutit à la formation de différents camps : le 18 mars, les églises luthériennes régionales restées intactes de Bavière et du Wurtemberg, et les conseils confrériaux luthériens de la « Bekennende Kirche » se groupèrent en un Conseil de l'Église évangélique-luthérienne d'Allemagne (« Rat der Evangelisch-Lutherischen Kirche Deutschlands »), dit aussi « Lutherrat » .

La résistance contre les tentatives de main-mise du pouvoir n'était plus désormais portée que par la nouvelle « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » et la « Bekennende Kirche » prussienne. Le 4 juin, celle-ci adressa à Hitler un mémorandum, qui, en des termes d'une limpidité et d'une simplicité jamais plus atteintes avant 1945, dénonçait l'action de l'État totalitaire, tout en fondant cette critique sur une base théologique :

« Si le sang, la race, le génie national et l'honneur acquièrent ici le statut de valeurs éternelles, le chrétien évangélique sera contraint, de par le 1^{er} commandement, à rejeter cette échelle de valeurs. Si, dans le cadre des conceptions nationales-socialistes, un antisémitisme est imposé de force aux chrétiens, leur faisant obligation de haïr les Juifs, il se doit de lui opposer l'impératif chrétien de la charité. »

Le devoir religieux met des limites à l'obéissance chrétienne au pouvoir politique : quand celui-ci tente d'empêcher la transmission de l'évangile, il menace de détruire l'œuvre de l'Église, voire l'Église elle-même. La conséquence, à savoir la résistance directe, nécessaire en ce cas, des chrétiens contre le pouvoir, était évidente, mais demeura inexprimée comme telle.

Le mémorandum devait rester secret, mais, par des voies inconnues, fut révélé et publié à l'étranger. Il fut ensuite recommandé à toutes les communes confessantes comme paroles à prononcer du haut de la chaire pour le 23 août, il est vrai avec omission des phrases particulièrement critiques citées ci-haut. Ce nonobstant, l'aile conservatrice de la « Bekennende Kirche » répudia aussitôt cette « haute-trahison » .

Le 20 novembre 1936, elle déclara :

« Nous appuyons, aux côtés du “ Reichskirchenausschuß ”, le “ Führer ” dans sa lutte pour la survie du peuple allemand contre le Bolchévisme. »

Cet anti-Communisme était le lien idéologique décisif entre, d'une part, les chrétiens imprégnés de la vision luthérienne-nationaliste, quel que soit leur camp ; et, d'autre part, le régime nazi ; ce lien idéologique concourait avec la traditionnelle loyauté luthérienne à l'égard de l'autorité pour empêcher une résistance plus affirmée de l'Église dans son ensemble. Seule une minorité, y compris dans la « Bekennende Kirche » elle-même, rejetait la collaboration avec le régime.

Mais la « Glaubensbewegung Deutsche Christen » se scinda à son tour en une aile modérée, prête à coopérer avec le « Reichskirchenausschuß » , et le groupe radical « Nationalkirchliche Einigung » , dont le centre se situait en Thuringe. La déconfessionnalisation, hostile aux Églises, pour laquelle œuvrait ce dernier groupe avait pour but de supprimer la référence à la profession de foi chrétienne comme fondement doctrinaire des Églises évangéliques et d'effacer leur influence dans la vie publique. À cela s'attachaient également, en vain, tant le « Reichskirchenausschuß » que le ministre des affaires religieuses Kerrl, ce qui eut pour effet de renforcer, au sein de la « Bekennende Kirche » , le soupçon que pour le pouvoir il ne s'agissait pas, en réalité, de la préservation, mais du délabrement organisationnel (selon les termes d'Alfred Rosenberg) des Églises, et de leur future éviction. La « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » , invoquant la Ire thèse de la déclaration de Barmen, continua donc de décliner toute collaboration avec le « Reichskirchenausschuß » .

Les relations que l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne entretenait avec le mouvement œcuménique venaient interagir avec le conflit de politique intérieure allemande autour de l'organisation et des droits des églises ; en effet, le mouvement œcuménique avait dès 1934 reconnu la « Bekennende Kirche » comme une des représentantes de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne et établi des contacts avec elle, en investissant le président Koch comme membre du Conseil œcuménique des Églises. Mais le mouvement œcuménique considérait d'autre part qu'il n'était pas en son pouvoir de prendre une résolution en faveur de la « Bekennende Kirche » , contre l'Église « officielle » . Cela permit au Bureau international sous la direction de Theodor Heckel de garder son influence sur l'évolution du mouvement œcuménique. La «

Bekennende Kirche » ne parvint pas, en dépit de ses contacts personnels, à développer sa propre action internationale. En dépit des protestations de Bonhoeffer et d'autres, des représentants du « Reichskirchenausschuß » furent également invités à l'assemblée œcuménique de Chambly. Les représentants de la « Bekennende Kirche » renoncèrent, quoique invités, à assister aux conférences consécutives, à Oxford puis Édimbourg en 1937, craignant d'être destitués de leur fonction et appréhendant leur arrestation. Zœllner démissionna le 12 février 1937, lorsque lui aussi fut empêché de voyager à l'étranger. Cela signa l'échec de l'offre de médiation officielle du « Reichskirchenausschuß » .

Le successeur de Zœllner, Hermann Muhs, membre du NSDAP, vint réintégrer « ad hoc » l'Église, afin de piloter celle-ci par voie d'ordonnances. Un arrêté de Hitler du 15 février instituant de nouvelles élections pour le synode général de la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » ne fut pas mis à exécution. Une conférence des dirigeants des Églises régionales ne réussit pas à se mettre d'accord sur une nouvelle direction commune de la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » . Muhs entreprit alors de dissoudre les administrations ecclésiastiques encore existantes, tandis que la « Bekennende Kirche » et le Conseil luthérien (« Lutherrat ») construisaient chacune leur propre administration.

Dans le même temps, Heinrich Himmler interdit que des pasteurs fussent encore formés par la « Bekennende Kirche » ; cependant, ces formations furent poursuivies dans l'illégalité. Dès 1935 fut fondée à cet effet à Elberfeld la clandestine École ecclésiastique supérieure (« Kirchliche Hochschule ») . La « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » publiait, sur les sujets d'actualité, des prises de position imprimées clandestinement, notamment sur la persécution des opposants au système politique et des Juifs, sur l'idéologie raciale et le danger de guerre.

Cela conduisit, le 1er juillet 1937, à l'arrestation de Martin Niemöller, le dirigeant officieux de la « Bekennende Kirche » . Son procès eut lieu en mars 1938 ; bien qu'aucune activité contre la sécurité de l'État ne put être retenue contre lui, il fut emmené comme « prisonnier personnel » de Hitler au camp de concentration de Sachsenhausen, où il survécut jusqu'à la fin de la Guerre. À cette issue heureuse avaient contribué les nombreuses protestations venues de l'étranger, en particulier celles exprimées au Royaume-Uni par l'évêque anglican George Bell, qui présidait à l'époque le Conseil œcuménique « Life and Work » et était lié d'amitié avec Bonhoeffer, qui le tenait en permanence au courant de l'évolution de la situation dans le « Reich » allemand. Ces relations internationales entre la « Bekennende Kirche » et le mouvement œcuménique permit, dans quelques cas individuels, de sauver des vies.

En octobre, ce fut le tour à un autre militant « Bekennende Kirche » de la 1re heure à se faire arrêter : Paul Schneider, qui se fera connaître dans le camp de concentration comme prédicateur de Buchenwald. Il avait rejeté radicalement, dès le départ, les conceptions nazies et s'était solidarisé avec les Juifs persécutés. Même depuis sa cellule d'isolement, il s'appliquait à contredire, par des apostrophes et des encouragements lancés aux détenus, et sous l'invocation de l'Évangile, la terreur nazie. Il fut assassiné le 18 juillet 1939 au camp de Buchenwald. Dietrich Bonhoeffer le qualifia de 1er martyr chrétien de la lutte contre le National-Socialisme.

En juillet 1937, la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » , la conférence des dirigeants des Églises et le Conseil luthérien tentèrent une nouvelle fois de parvenir à un consensus sur la direction de la « Bekennende Kirche » . Le seul résultat en fut la publication, le 31 octobre 1937, d'un nouveau memorandum contre les pamphlets « Dunkelmänner » (Hommes de ténèbres) et « Rompilger » (Pèlerins de Rome) , très hostiles aux églises, qu'avait rédigés Rosenberg. Le 10 décembre, Kerrl dépêcha vers les Églises régionales détruites et vers la « Deutsche Evangelische Kirche » dans son ensemble un nouveau dirigeant, Werner, membre du consistoire suprême.

Après l'« Anschluß », de nouvelles tensions se firent jour au sein de l'Église évangélique allemande. Cela incita le ministère des Affaires religieuses de Kerrl à exiger le 20 avril 1938 de tous les prêtres un serment de fidélité au « Führer ». Cette prestation de serment fut soutenue par la plupart des Églises régionales, y compris la « Bekennende Kirche » prussienne. Il est apparu par la suite que l'ordre en ce sens n'émanait pas de Hitler lui-même. À partir de juillet, Kerrl tenta en outre de faire appliquer la réforme administrative engagée par Müller et Zœllner.

Lorsque la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung », à l'occasion de la crise tchèque, édita le 30 septembre une liturgie de prière (« Gebetsliturgie ») qui recelait une intercession en faveur des Tchèques, Kerrl incita les évêques des Églises régionales intactes à rompre avec la « Bekennende Kirche » « pour raisons religieuses et patriotiques ». Ce qui avait motivé cette injonction était surtout la lettre de Karl Barth adressée à Josef Hromádka (1889-1965), qui se trouvait à la tête de la faculté théologique de l'Université Charles de Prague, lettre dans laquelle Barth appelait tous les Tchèques à la résistance armée contre l'entrée des troupes nationales-socialistes, en la justifiant explicitement comme une résistance nécessaire aussi pour l'Église, en ce qu'elle découle du 1er commandement.

Cependant, même la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » désavoua cette lettre, la taxant de « politique ». La « Bekennende Kirche » perdit ainsi tout lien avec les Églises régionales et s'engagea dans sa crise la plus grave. En même temps, Kerrl déclina les nouvelles propositions de conciliation de la Conférence des dirigeants des Églises et forma au contraire, en avril 1939, un front unitaire (« Einheitsfront ») composé de « Deutsche Christen » de Thuringe et de représentants modérés des Églises régionales. Leur objectif demeurerait la création d'une Église nationale. Finirent pas s'y rallier aussi les évêques d'Hanovre, de Brunswick et de HeBe électorale-Waldeck. Seuls les Conseils confrériques de la « Bekennende Kirche » et les Églises de Bavière et du Wurtemberg repoussèrent ces avances, à la suite de quoi ils furent presque exclus du Conseil luthérien.

Entretiens, Werner s'employait à mettre l'activité des autorités ecclésiastiques au diapason du projet fondamental d'une « Reichskirche », et c'est donc en fonction de cet objectif qu'il distribuait les postes, infligeait des sanctions disciplinaires, décidait de la répartition de l'impôt culturel et des buts de collecte. Il fut protesté contre cet état de fait lors du 8e synode de la « Bekennende Kirche » de Prusse tenu à Steglitz les 21 et 22 mai. Kerrl tenta une conciliation, en réduisant la portée de ces mesures. Le 29 août, il forma, à l'intention de la l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne, un Conseil spirituel de confiance (« Geistlicher Vertrauensrat »), qui devait garder la direction théologique et dont les représentants devaient être désignés par les Églises elles-mêmes, cependant que l'administration financière serait entièrement assumée par des représentants de l'État et des « Deutsche Christen ». Mais le processus de décomposition de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne était désormais inexorable.

Après la « Nuit de Cristal », le 9 novembre 1938, ni la direction de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne, ni la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » n'eurent le moindre mot de protestation. Seuls quelques pasteurs tels que Helmut Gollwitzer, le successeur de Niemöller à Berlin-Dahlem, et Julius von Jan dans le Wurtemberg, prirent position dans leur sermons contre cette action. Ils furent mis en accusation pour agitation hostile au peuple (« volksfeindliche Hetze »). Ce ne furent pas alors les Juifs, mais seulement leurs défenseurs malmenés par le pouvoir, que la « Bekennende Kirche » prit alors en protection dans son intercession. L'évêque Theophil Wurm écrivit au ministre de la Justice qu'il ne contestait nullement au pouvoir le droit de combattre les Juifs comme un « élément dangereux » ; toutefois, le fait que « des actes tels que l'incendie volontaire et des mauvais traitements physiques, çà et là aussi des vols, aient pu être commis sous les yeux des autorités » était de nature à affliger profondément la population. Il garda le silence sur la « Nuit de Cristal » de même que sur l'incarcération de 30,000 Juifs dans des camps de concentration à partir du 10 novembre 1938.

À partir de décembre 1938, le bureau Grüber commença, pour le compte de la « Bekennende Kirche », à aider les non-aryens (c'est-à-dire chrétiens juifs) évangéliques persécutés, pour leurs affaires juridiques et scolaires et dans leurs démarches d'émigration. À cet effet fut mis en place un réseau de 22 bureaux d'aide dans 20 grandes villes. Ces bureaux d'aide travaillaient en étroite collaboration avec les bureaux similaires de l'Église catholique, des quakers et de l'Association nationale (« Reichsvereinigung ») des Juifs allemands.

Afin d'éradiquer « l'influence juive » de la théologie et de la Bible fut fondé en mai 1939 à Eisenach un Institut de recherche et d'élimination de l'influence juive sur la vie religieuse allemande (« Institut zur Erforschung und Beseitigung des jüdischen Einflusses auf das deutsche kirchliche Leben ») . Les Églises régionales dominées par les « Deutsche Christen » avaient commencé dès cette année-là à mettre à exécution le paragraphe sur les aryens et à écarter du service religieux les titulaires de poste « non aryens » .

Contre cela furent amenés à protester 27 pasteurs de la « Bekennende Kirche » de l'Église évangélique de la province ecclésiastique de Saxe et 131 du Mecklembourg, soulignant que la loi portant exclusion des Juifs chrétiens équivalait à une annulation des vœux d'ordination et à mettre en cause l'unité de l'Église. De son côté, le Conseil œcuménique des Églises protesta également et souligna, en se référant à Jean 4,22, que le salut vient des Juifs, attendu que le Christ est le Messie d'Israël. Le bureau extérieur de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne désavoua cette déclaration et en exigea le retrait immédiat. Il apparut clair dès lors que les représentants des luthériens modérés dans les Églises régionales restées intactes et les « Deutsche Christen » se situaient sur la même ligne raciste.

Dès le début de la Guerre, le « Vertrauensrat » , dont faisait partie Marahrens, n'émettait plus quère que des appels patriotiques. Un décret d'amnistie visant les procès en cours devant des juridictions ecclésiastiques et les procédures contre des fonctionnaires de l'Église était destinée à rassérer les membres de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne durant la Guerre. Entretemps, la propagande anti-chrétienne du NSDAP, patente déjà dès le congrès national du Parti à Nuremberg, fut poursuivie.

Depuis 1937, et surtout entre 1939 et 1945, les « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » , les Conseils confrériques ainsi que de nombreux prêtres, y compris une partie parmi eux qui n'appartenait pas à la « Bekennende Kirche » , devinrent plus fréquemment la cible de mesures de la part des Églises régionales et de la « Gestapo » . La « Bekennende Kirche » s'appliquait à faire connaître dans ses communes, à travers ses demandes de prières d'intercession, les abus de pouvoir de l'État les plus graves.

Depuis le début de la Guerre, la partie de l'Église évangélique qui n'appartenait pas aux « Deutsche Christen » avait été affaiblie par l'appel sélectif sous les drapeaux de chrétiens critiques. En nombre d'endroits, cette situation amena les femmes, en particulier les épouses de pasteur, à assumer pour la 1^{re} fois dans l'histoire de l'Église évangélique, des tâches de prédication et de direction.

En 1940 débuta l'« Action T4 », c'est-à-dire l'euthanasie de « vie indigne de vivre », décidée comme découlant des nécessités de la Guerre. Elle fut perpétrée dans des instituts convertis en instituts de mise à mort, parmi lesquels aussi des infrastructures du diaconat réquisitionnées. Protestèrent à cette occasion, côté évangélique, les évêques Theophil Wurm, Friedrich Bodelschwingh et le pasteur Paul Braune à Lobetal, et côté catholique, l'évêque Clemens August Graf von Galen, qui obtinrent dans cette affaire un succès partiel.

Les échanges épistolaires à l'intérieur de l'Église furent, en raison d'une prétendue pénurie de papier due à la guerre, presque entièrement interrompus. Les cérémonies du baptême, du mariage, de la confirmation, des funérailles devaient obligatoirement être remplacées par les célébrations du Parti ; cette consigne ne pouvant être mise à exécution que sous réserve, les manifestations obligatoires des Jeunesses hitlériennes et des Jeunesses allemandes (« Deutsches Jungvolk ») étaient délibérément programmées les dimanches avant-midi, pour retenir les enfants et les jeunes de se rendre à l'église. Pendant les offices religieux, les Jeunesses hitlériennes faisaient leurs exercices directement à côté des églises.

C'est en l'année 1941 que furent prises à l'encontre de la « Bekennende Kirche » les mesures de persécution jusque-là les plus dures : l'Église nationale, à laquelle appartenaient désormais les chefs de 7 églises régionales intactes, déstitua le 17 décembre 1941 tous les Juifs baptisés de leurs fonctions et finit donc par faire appliquer dans les églises le paragraphe sur les Aryens. La « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung », l'évêque régional du Wurtemberg Wurm et le consistoire prussien protestèrent contre cette déstitution, celle-ci étant, selon eux, « incompatible avec la profession de foi de l'Église ». Le commandement du baptême du Christ ne reconnaît pas de limites de race ; si la loi était appliquée, il faudrait exclure de l'Église tous les Apôtres et le Christ lui-même. À cause de la Guerre, et vu la scission intervenue entretemps, la vague de protestation n'était pas comparable, tant s'en faut, aux protestations de 1933.

Le 6 juillet parut une circulaire confidentielle de Martin Bormann, ordonnant l'élimination complète de tout moyen d'influence de l'Église. Les représentants de la « Vorläufige Kirchenleitung » furent tous temporairement détenus. 18 pasteurs de la « Bekennende Kirche » trouvèrent la mort dans des camps de concentration ou furent assassinés lors d'interrogatoires ou d'autre façon. De même, les directeurs du bureau d'entraide Grüber pour Juifs et Juifs chrétiens, Heinrich Grüber (1891-1975) et son successeur Werner Sylten (1893-1942), un Juif chrétien, furent tour à tour, en 1940 et en 1941, enfermés dans des camps de concentration. Sylten fut tué le 26 février 1942 dans le centre d'extermination de Hartheim, près de Linz, vraisemblablement gazé en même temps que d'autres Juifs.

Dans le pays de la Warthe occupé (région de Poznań), Alfred Rosenberg entreprit de convertir, sur ordre du Pouvoir, et en guise d'essai, la structure de l'Église protestante en une structure assujettie au droit d'association. Quelque 2,000 prêtres catholiques polonais furent incarcérés, dont 1,300 environ périrent dans des camps de concentration allemands ou y furent assassinés.

Après le décès de Kerll, le 14 décembre 1941, Muhs acquit un pouvoir accru sur la gestion financière de l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne. Il fit geler le salaire de beaucoup de pasteurs, de telle façon qu'en fussent touchés surtout les titulaires de la « Bekennende Kirche », de sorte que ceux-ci ne pouvaient plus que fort péniblement, moyennant des dons volontaires, poursuivre leur travail. Au cours de cette phase apparurent, dans les communes de la « Bekennende Kirche », des formes nouvelles de prédication autonome, comportant des soutiens aux sermons illégaux, des feuillets pour l'instruction des catéchumènes, des activités de jeunesse, etc. Une partie des pasteurs « Bekennende Kirche » travaillant illégalement obtint après mutation un nouveau poste légal dans l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne.

À partir de 1942, les Juifs vivant parmi les chrétiens dans le cadre de mariages mixtes furent à leur tour persécutés ; les bureaux d'aide intensifièrent leur activité consultative. En 1944, il apparut qu'un de leurs collaborateurs dirigeants, le Docteur Erwin Goldmann, était un mouchard de la SS, en conséquence de quoi les bureaux furent fermés.

Après 1943, le travail ecclésial tout entier ne pouvait plus être maintenu en ordre de marche qu'avec des laïcs, lesquels déployaient dorénavant une activité considérable. Les vicaires devinrent des pasteurs de plein exercice. À l'automne 1944, un rapprochement organisationnel eut lieu entre ce qui restait de la « Bekennende Kirche » et la conférence des Dirigeants des Églises, qui jeta le germe d'une refondation de l'Église évangélique après la Guerre.

Depuis la conférence de Wannsee de janvier 1942, la rumeur de l'existence de camps d'extermination à l'est se répandait progressivement dans le « Reich ». L'évêque Wurm garde publiquement le silence à ce sujet et s'abstint de dénier toute légitimité à la persécution des Juifs organisée par le Pouvoir.

Mais il dénonce, dans de nombreuses lettres et requêtes aux autorités nazies, l'injustice commise :

« Le fait de tuer sans nécessité militaire et sans sentence préalable est contraire au commandement de Dieu, même si l'ordre en émane des autorités légales. »

En juillet 1943, il écrit à Hitler personnellement, le priant de s'opposer à la « persécution et l'extermination de non aryens » :

« Ces desseins, de même que les autres mesures de destruction prises à l'encontre d'autres non-aryens, sont en contradiction absolue avec le commandement de Dieu. »

Il est à craindre sinon, estime Wurm, que les « aryens privilégiés » ne finissent aussi par être traités de semblable façon. Wurm croyait manifestement, avec naïveté, comme beaucoup à cette époque, que le « Führer » était totalement ignorant des camps d'extermination.

Le synode de l'Église confessante de la Vieille Prusse fut seul à souligner publiquement, lors de sa conférence annuelle à Breslau, le 17 octobre 1943, que le commandement de Dieu « Tu ne tueras point » doit s'appliquer également en temps de guerre. Cela vaut aussi pour « la manière indirecte de tuer, consistant à priver son prochain de l'espace nécessaire pour vivre » ; par exemple : « par la déprivation de nourriture et de vêtements » .

La justice divine ne connaît pas de notions telles que « exterminer » , « liquider » et « vie sans valeur » :

« Détruire des Hommes, pour la seule raison qu'ils appartiennent à la famille d'un criminel, sont âgés ou souffrent de maladie mentale, ou font partie d'une autre race, ce n'est pas faire bon usage du glaive que Dieu a mis à la disposition des autorités. »

Pour la journée de Pénitence et de Prière, ce synode écrivit à ses communes :

« Malheur à nous et à notre peuple, si celui-ci tient pour légitime de tuer des gens au motif qu'ils seraient à considérer comme indignes de vivre ou qu'ils appartiennent à une autre race, lorsque se répandent la haine et la cruauté. »

Ces 2 paroles furent jusqu'à la fin de la Guerre les seules prises de position publiques de la « Bekennende Kirche » relatives à l'Holocauste. Elle non plus ne nommait les Juifs directement et ne mettait en question en tant que telle la notion de race, mais était cependant sans équivoque à condamner l'extermination sur base raciale.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer joua un rôle particulier dans le « Kirchenkampf » : s'il professait, lors des formations clandestines de pasteurs de la « Bekennende Kirche » , au séminaire de Finkenwalde, une stricte imitation du Christ, il prit néanmoins part dans le même temps dès 1937 aux préparatifs conspirateurs visant à assassiner Hitler. Sa motivation était (à la différence de celle de la plupart des résistants regroupés dans le « Kreisauer Kreis » autour de Hans Oster et Hans von Dohnanyi) de stopper l'Holocauste des Juifs. À cette fin, il était aussi en faveur de l'emploi de la violence contre les autorités de l'État. Après son incarcération, la direction de la « Bekennende Kirche » ne l'inclut point dans les prières en faveur des membres incarcérés de la « Bekennende Kirche » , et prit strictement ses distances d'avec lui après que fut connue sa participation à l'attentat du 20 juillet 1944.

Outre ceux qui agissaient dans le « Kirchenkampf » de façon plus ou moins ouverte, il y avait d'autre part en de nombreux endroits une désobéissance d'inspiration biblique. En particulier, dans les milieux piétistes et dans le cadre du YMCA, des cours bibliques et des activités de jeunesse se tenaient dans la clandestinité dans toute une série de communes jusqu'au printemps 1945. Mais dès avant la Guerre, l'on assista à un certain nombre de désobéissances isolées. Un exemple de désobéissant était Theodor Roller de Tübingen. En tant que chrétien, il refusa systématiquement de prêter le serment de fidélité au drapeau pour Hitler et qualifiait celui-ci de menteur. Cela lui valut d'être interné pendant 6 ans dans l'établissement psychiatrique de Weißenau.

À travers l'aveu de culpabilité de Stuttgart d'octobre 1945, les églises régionales évangéliques s'efforcèrent de trouver la base d'une refondation commune. Les autorités d'occupation laissèrent aux Églises elles-mêmes le soin de la dénazification interne, de sorte que l'on assista, dans l'immédiat après-Guerre, à une ample vague de réhabilitation des chrétiens naguère nazis ou simples suiveurs. La parole de Darmstadt de 1947 fut promptement oubliée et n'eut pas au sein de la l'Église évangélique d'Allemagne d'effet en largeur.

Dans l'église évangélique d'Essen-Werden se trouve une verrière remarquable, la Fenêtre du « Kirchenkampf » , qui fut créée puis installée dans la conque nord de cette église par les anciens membres de la Commune confessante après leur retour dans leur communauté religieuse, après que celle-ci eut cessé d'être dominée par les « Deutsche Christen »

Cette fenêtre contient une référence au I Timothée 6,125,6 :

« Combats le bon combat de la foi, assure-toi la vie éternelle en vue de laquelle tu as été appelé et as fait la belle confession de foi devant un grand nombre de témoins. »

D'un point de vue ecclésiologique, le « Kirchenkampf » représente un tournant dans la conception évangélique de ce qu'est l'Église et le droit ecclésiastique. L'on avait généralement fait jusque-là, dans la théologie évangélique, une stricte séparation entre d'une part l'Église en tant que Communauté des Saints et Corps du Christ sur terre, et d'autre part l'Église en tant qu'institution. La conviction qu'il importe grandement de savoir qui dirige les Églises régionales et dans quel esprit a gagné en importance dans la lutte contre la « Gleichschaltung » et contre les « Deutsche Christen » . La conception ecclésiologique des Églises évangéliques tend depuis lors à emprunter un chemin mitoyen entre la vision catholique, selon laquelle l'institution est constitutive de l'Église, et une représentation de l'Église totalement spiritualisée.

C'est par les activités œcuméniques de Dietrich Bonhoeffer et de quelques conspirateurs du 20 juillet 1944 qu'existaient des contacts avec les Églises d'autres pays, en particulier chez les Alliés. Grâce à cela, les Églises d'Allemagne purent à l'issue du « Kirchenkampf » se réintégrer relativement vite dans la communauté œcuménique mondiale.

...

« Kirchenkampf » (Church Struggle) is a German term pertaining to the situation of the Christian churches in Germany during the Nazi period (1933-1945) . Sometimes used ambiguously, the term may refer to one or more of the following different « church struggles » : the internal dispute between the « German Christians » (« Deutsche Christen ») and the Confessing Church (« Bekennende Kirche ») over control of the Protestant churches ; the battle between the Nazi regime and the Protestant church bodies ; and the battle between the Nazi regime and the Roman Catholic Church. Around 2/3 of Germans were Protestant, and 1/3 Catholic when the Nazis took power. Many historians maintain that Hitler's goal in the « Kirchenkampf » entailed not only ideological struggle, but ultimately the eradication of the churches. Other historians maintain no such plan existed. The Salvation Army, Christian Saints and 7th Day Adventist Church all disappeared from Germany during the Nazi era.

Nazi ideology was hostile to traditional Christianity in various respects and the Nazi Party saw the « Church Struggle » as an important ideological battleground. Hitler biographer Ian Kershaw wrote of the « Struggle » in terms of an ongoing and escalating conflict between the Nazi State and the Christian churches. Historian Susannah Heschel wrote that the « Kirchenkampf » refers only to an internal dispute between members of the Confessing Church and members of the Nazi-backed « German Christians » over control of the Protestant church. Pierre Aycoberry wrote that for Catholics the phrase « Kirchenkampf » was reminiscent of the « Kulturkampf » of Otto von Bismarck's time - a campaign which had sought to destroy the influence of Catholicism in majority Protestant Germany.

Nazism wanted to transform the subjective consciousness of the German people (their attitudes, values and mentalities) into a single-minded, obedient « national community ». According to Ian Kershaw, in order to achieve this, the Nazis believed they would have to replace class, religious and regional allegiances by a « massively enhanced national self-awareness to mobilize the German people psychologically for the coming struggle and to boost their morale during the inevitable War ». The Nazis disliked universities, intellectuals and the Catholic and Protestant churches. According to Gill, their long term plan was to « de-Christianise Germany after the final victory » .

The Nazis co-opted the term « Gleichschaltung » (Coordination) to mean conformity and subservience to the National-Socialist German Workers' Party line :

« There was to be no law but Hitler, and ultimately no god but Hitler. »

Nazi ideology conflicted with traditional Christian beliefs in various respects - Nazis criticized Christian notions of « meekness and guilt » on the basis that they « repressed the violent instincts necessary to prevent inferior races from dominating Aryans ». Aggressive anti-Church radicals like Josef Goebbels and Martin Bormann saw the conflict with the Churches as a priority concern, and anti-Church and anti-Clerical sentiments were strong among grass-roots Party activists.

East Prussian Party « Gauleiter » Erich Koch on the other hand, said that :

« Nazism had to develop from a basic Prussian-Protestant attitude and from Luther's unfinished Reformation. »

Hitler himself disdained Christianity :

« In Hitler's eyes, Christianity was a religion fit only for slaves ; he detested its ethics in particular. Its teaching, he declared, was a rebellion against the natural law of selection by struggle and the survival of the fittest. »

(Extract from « Hitler a Study in Tyranny » , by Alan Bullock.)

Though raised a Catholic, Hitler rejected the Judeo-Christian conception of God and religion. Though he retained some regard for the organisational power of Catholicism, he had utter contempt for its central teachings, which he said, if taken to their conclusion, « would mean the systematic cultivation of the human failure ». Hitler ultimately believed « one is either a Christian or a German » - to be both was impossible. However, important German conservative elements, such as the officer corps, opposed Nazi persecution of the churches and, in office, Hitler restrained his anti-Clerical instincts out of political considerations.

Hitler biographer Ian Kershaw wrote that, while many ordinary people were apathetic, after years of warning from Catholic clergy, Germany's Catholic population greeted the Nazi take-over with apprehension and uncertainty, while among German Protestants, many were optimistic a strengthened Germany might bring with it « inner, moral revitalisation ». However, within a short period, the Nazi government's conflict with the churches was to become a source of great bitterness.

The « Kirchenkampf » can be divided into 5 stages.

1st (spring to fall 1933) :

Hitler makes efforts to assimilate the churches into the culture of National-Socialism.

Hitler moves to eliminate Political Catholicism : dissolution of Catholic aligned political Parties and signing of « Reichskonkordat » with Vatican. Sporadic persecution of Catholics.

Preparation to create unified single « Reichskirche » from the 28 regional Protestant churches : Hitler installs pro-Nazi chaplain Ludwig Müller as « Reich » Bishop ; splitting German Protestants.

2nd (fall 1933 - fall 1934) :

Regime attempts to bring churches under control of the Nazi State (« Gleichschaltung ») .

Nazi breaches of Concordat commence immediately after signing : sterilization law promulgated, Catholic Youth Leagues dissolved ; clergy, nuns and lay leaders harassed.

Heretical views of « Reich » Bishop and « German Christians » , leads Martin Neimoller to found Pastors' Emergency League which grows into Confessing Church, which reasserts authority of Bible and from which some clergymen oppose regime.

3rd (fall 1934 - February 1937) :

Regime tries to bring the Protestant churches under its control by taking charge of church finances and governance structures.

Failure of Müller to unite Protestants in Nazified Church sees Hitler appoint Hans Kerrl as Minister for Church Affairs.

1936 : Nazis remove crucifixes in schools. Catholic Bishop of Münster August von Galen protests and public demonstrations follow.

1936 : Confessing Church protest to Hitler against anti-Semitism, « anti-Christian » tendencies of regime, and interference in church affairs. Hundreds of pastors arrested, funds of the church confiscated, collections forbidden.

Martin Niemöller was sent to the Concentration camps in 1937. He founded the Confessing Church after the Nazis attempted to subjugate Protestants in a « Reich » Church.

4th (February 1937 - 1939) :

More open conflict based on « Nazism itself and its anti-Christian world-views » . Regime increases imprisonment of resistant clergy.

March 1937 : Pope Pius XI issues « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical, denouncing aspects of Nazi ideology, protesting regime's violations of Concordat and treatment of Catholics, and abuse of human rights.

Regime responds with intensification of « Church Struggle » . Trumped-up « immorality trials » against clergy and anti-Church propaganda campaign. Christmas 1937 address, Pope tells cardinals « rarely has there been a persecution so grave » .

1 July 1937 : Confessing Church banned. Martin Niemöller arrested. Theological universities closed, pastors and theologians arrested.

5th stage (1939-1945) :

More clergy were imprisoned - Clergy Barracks established at Dachau.

July-August 1941 : Bishop von Galen's sermons denounce lawlessness of « Gestapo » , confiscations of church properties and Nazi euthanasia. Government takes program underground.

Clergy were drafted into the military.

Church publications were censored or banned.

Services and functions restricted or banned.

22 March 1942 : The German Catholic Bishops issued a pastoral letter on « The Struggle against Christianity and the Church » :

Nazi assault on churches and « Christian conscience » motivates many of the « July Plot » participants in failed 1944 « coup » against Hitler. Leading clerical resisters Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Alfred Delp are implicated. Both executed in 1945.

The Nazi persecution of the Christian Churches.

The Nazi propaganda minister, Josef Goebbels, among the most aggressive anti-Church Nazis, wrote that there was « an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view » .

Prior to the « Reichstag » vote for the Enabling Act under which Hitler gained the « temporary » dictatorial powers with which he went on to permanently dismantle the Weimar Republic, Hitler promised the « Reichstag » , on 23 March 1933, that he would not interfere with the rights of the churches. However, with power secured in Germany, Hitler quickly broke this promise. He divided the Lutheran Church (Germany's main Protestant denomination) and instigated a brutal persecution of the Jehovah's Witnesses. He dishonoured a Concordat signed with the Vatican and permitted a persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany. A special Priests Barracks was established at Dachau Concentration Camp for clergy who had opposed the Hitler regime - its occupants were mainly Polish Catholic clergy. Martin Bormann, Hitler's « deputy » from April 1941, also saw Nazism and Christianity as « incompatible » and had a particular loathing for the Semitic origins of Christianity.

To Alfred Rosenberg, a neo-Pagan, and the official Nazi Philosopher, Catholicism was one of Nazism's chief enemies. He planned the « extermination of the foreign Christian faiths imported into Germany » , and for the Bible and Christian cross to be replaced with « Mein Kampf » and the swastika.

Leading Nazis varied in the importance they attached to the « Church Struggle » .

Kershaw wrote that, to the new Nazi government, Race policy and the « Church Struggle » were among the most important ideological spheres :

« In both areas, the Party had no difficulty in mobilizing its activists, whose radicalism in turn forced the government into legislative action. In fact, the Party leadership often found itself compelled to respond to pressures from below, stirred-up by the “ Gauleiter ” playing their own game, or emanating sometimes from radical activists at a local level. »

As time went on, anti-Clericalism and anti-Church sentiment among grass-roots Party activists « simply couldn't be eradicated » and they could « draw on the verbal violence of Party leaders towards the churches for their encouragement » .

Hitler himself possessed radical instincts in relation to the continuing conflict with the Catholic and Protestant Churches in Germany. Though he occasionally spoke of wanting to delay the « Church Struggle » and was prepared to restrain his anti-Clericalism out of political considerations, his « own inflammatory comments gave his immediate underlings all the license they needed to turn-up the heat in the “ Church Struggle ”, confident that they were “ working towards the ' Führer ' ” » .

Bullock wrote that the Churches and the army were the only 2 institutions to retain some independence in Nazi

Germany and « among the most courageous demonstrations of opposition during the War were the sermons preached by the Catholic Bishop of Münster and the Protestant Pastor, Doctor Niemöller » but that :

« Neither the Catholic Church nor the Evangelical Church, however, as institutions, felt it possible to take-up an attitude of open opposition to the regime. »

In the Nazi police State, the ability of the Church and its members to oppose Nazi policy was severely restricted. In 1935, when Protestant pastors read a protest statement from the pulpits of Confessing churches, the Nazi authorities briefly arrested over 700 pastors and the « Gestapo » confiscated copies of Pius XI's 1937 anti-Nazi papal Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » from diocesan offices throughout Germany. For refusing to declare loyalty to the « Reich », or be conscripted into the army, Jehovah's Witnesses were declared « enemies », with 6,000 of a total population of 30,000 sent to the concentration camps.

Alfred Rosenberg, an « outspoken pagan », held among offices the title of « the “ Führer's ” Delegate for the Entire Intellectual and Philosophical Education and Instruction for the National-Socialist Party ». He also saw Nazism and Christianity as incompatible. In his « Myth of the 20th Century » (1930), Rosenberg wrote that the main enemies of the Germans were the « Russian Tartars » and « Semites » - with « Semites » including Christians, especially the Catholic Church.

Josef Goebbels, the Nazi Minister for Propaganda, was among the most aggressive anti-Church Nazi radicals. Goebbels led the Nazi persecution of the German clergy and, as the War progressed, on the « Church Question », he wrote :

« After the War, it has to be generally solved. There is, namely, an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view. »

Worried about the dissension caused by the « Kirchenkampf », Hitler told Goebbels in the summer of 1935 he sought « peace with the Churches » - « at least for a period of time ». As with the « Jewish Question », the radicals nonetheless pushed the « Church Struggle » forward, especially in Catholic areas, so that by the winter of 1935-1936 there was growing dissatisfaction with the Nazis in those areas. Kershaw noted that, in early 1937, Hitler again told his inner-circle that he « did not want a “ Church struggle ” at this juncture », he expected « the great world struggle in a few years' time ». Nevertheless, Hitler's impatience with the churches « prompted frequent outbursts of hostility ». In early 1937, he was declaring that « Christianity was ripe for destruction », and that the Churches must yield to the « primacy of the State », railing against any compromise with « the most horrible institution imaginable ».

Martin Bormann became Hitler's private secretary and, « de facto », « deputy “ Führer ” » in April 1941. He was a leading advocate of the « Kirchenkampf ». Bormann was a rigid guardian of National-Socialist orthodoxy and saw Christianity and Nazism as « incompatible » (mainly because of its Jewish origins). He said publicly in 1941 that « National-Socialism and Christianity are irreconcilable ». Bormann's view of Christianity was epitomized in a confidential memo to « Gauleiters » in 1942 ; it reignited the fight against Christianity which had been in a « détente » , stating that the power of the churches « must absolutely and finally be broken » as Nazism « was completely incompatible with Christianity » .

William Shirer wrote that the German people were not greatly aroused by the persecution of the churches by the Nazi Government. The great majority were not moved to face death or imprisonment for the sake of freedom of worship, being too impressed by Hitler's early foreign policy successes and the restoration of the German economy. Few paused to reflect « that under the leadership of Rosenberg, Bormann and Himmler, who were backed by Hitler, the Nazi regime intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, if it could, and substitute the old paganism of the early tribal Germanic gods and the new paganism of the Nazi extremists » .

Because the Nazi « Gleichschaltung » policy of forced coordination encountered such forceful opposition from the churches, Hitler decided to postpone the struggle until after the War. During the War, Rosenberg, the Party's official ideologist outlined the future envisioned for religion in Germany, with a « 30 point » program for the future of the German churches.

Among its articles :

(1) The National « Reich » Church of Germany was to claim exclusive control over all churches in the « Reich » .

(5) Foreign faiths imported to Germany in 800 AD were to be exterminated.

(7) Priests and pastors were to be replaced with National « Reich » Orators.

(13) Publication of the Bible was to cease.

(14) « Mein Kampf » was to be considered the foremost source of ethics.

(18) Crucifixes, Bibles and Saints to be removed from altars.

(19) « Mein Kampf » was to be placed on altars « to the German nation and, therefore, to God the most sacred book » .

(30) The Christian Cross to be removed from all churches and replaced with the swastika.

A threatening, though initially mainly sporadic persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany followed the Nazi take-over. Hitler moved quickly to eliminate Political Catholicism. 2,000 functionaries of the Bavarian People's Party were rounded-up by police in late-June 1933, and it, along with the national Catholic Centre Party, ceased to exist in early July. Vice-Chancellor Franz von Papen meanwhile negotiated the « Reichskonkordat » Treaty with the Vatican, which prohibited clergy from participating in politics. Kershaw wrote that the Vatican was anxious to reach agreement with the new government, despite « continuing molestation of Catholic clergy, and other outrages committed by Nazi radicals against the Church and its organisations » .

The Concordat was signed at the Vatican on 20 July 1933, by Germany's Deputy « Reich » Chancellor Franz von Papen, and Cardinal Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli (later, Pope Pius XII) . In his 1937 anti-Nazi Encyclical, Pope Pius XI said that the Holy-See had signed the Concordat « In spite of many serious misgivings » and in the hope it might « safeguard the liberty of the church in her mission of salvation in Germany » . The treaty consisted of 34 articles and a supplementary protocol. Article 1 guaranteed « freedom of profession and public practice of the Catholic religion » and acknowledged the right of the Church to regulate its own affairs. Within 3 months of the signing of the document, Cardinal Bertram, head of the German Catholic Bishops Conference, was writing in a Pastoral Letter of « grievous and gnawing anxiety » with regard to the government's actions towards Catholic organisations, charitable institutions, youth groups, press, Catholic Action and the mistreatment of Catholics for their political beliefs. According to Paul O'Shea, Hitler had a « blatant disregard » for the Concordat, and its signing was to him merely a 1st step in the « gradual suppression of the Catholic Church in Germany » .

Anton Gill wrote that « with his usual irresistible, bullying technique, Hitler then proceeded to take a mile where he had been given an inch » and closed all Catholic institutions whose functions weren't strictly religious :

« It quickly became clear that Hitler intended to imprison the Catholics, as it were, in their own churches. They could celebrate mass and retain their rituals as much as they liked, but they could have nothing at all to do with German society otherwise. Catholic schools and newspapers were closed, and a propaganda campaign against the Catholics was launched. »

(Extract from « An Honourable Defeat » by Anton Gill.)

William Shirer wrote :

« The Concordat was hardly put to paper before it was being broken by the Nazi Government. »

On 25 July, the Nazis promulgated their sterilization law, an offensive policy in the eyes of the Catholic Church. 5 days later, moves began to dissolve the Catholic Youth League. Clergy, nuns and lay leaders began to be targeted, leading to thousands of arrests over the ensuing years, often on trumped-up charges of currency smuggling or « immorality » .

In Adolf Hitler's bloody « Night of the Long Knives » purge of 1934, Erich Klausener, the head of Catholic Action, was assassinated by the « Gestapo » . Catholic publications were shut-down. The « Gestapo » began to violate the sanctity of the confessional.

In January 1934, Hitler appointed Alfred Rosenberg as the cultural and educational leader of the « Reich » . Rosenberg was a neo-Pagan and notoriously anti-Catholic. In his « Myth of the 20th Century » (1930) , Rosenberg had described the Catholic Church as one of the main enemies of Nazism. The Church responded on 16 February 1934 with the banning of Rosenberg's book. The « Sanctum Officium » recommended that Rosenberg's book be put on the « Index

Librorum Prohibitorum » (forbidden books list of the Catholic Church) for scorning and rejecting « all dogmas of the Catholic Church, indeed, the very fundamentals of the Christian religion » . Clemens August Graf von Galen, the Bishop of Münster, derided the neo-Pagan theories of Rosenberg as perhaps no more than « an occasion for laughter in the educated world » , but warned that « his immense importance lies in the acceptance of his basic notions as the authentic philosophy of National-Socialism and in his almost unlimited power in the field of German education. “ Herr » Rosenberg must be taken seriously if the German situation is to be understood. »

Under Nazi Youth leader Baldur von Schirach, Catholic youth organizations were disbanded and Catholic children corralled into the Hitler Youth. Pope Pius XI issued a message to the youth of Germany on 2 April 1934, noting propaganda and pressure being exerted to point German youth « away from Christ and back to paganism » . The Pope again condemned the new paganism to 5,000 German pilgrims in Rome in May, and in other addresses later that year.

In January 1935, Nazi interior minister Wilhelm Frick urged « putting an end to Church influence over public life » . In April, the daily publication of religious papers was banned and, soon after, censorship of weekly periodicals was introduced. The American National Catholic Welfare Conference complained that anti-Church songs were chanted by Hitler Youth and « anti-Christian slogans were chanted from trucks, which bore on their sides scurrilous cartoons of priests and nuns » while Catholic Youth organisations were « accused of the palpable absurdity of communist plotting » . On 12 May, members of the Hitler Youth attacked Caspar Klein, the Archbishop of Paderborn.

Hermann Göring issued a decree against Political Catholicism in July. In August, Nazi storm-troopers held anti-Clerical protests in Munich and Freiberg-im-Breisgau. Nazi propagandist Julius Streicher accused clergy and nuns of sexual perversion. The « morality trials » of Catholic clergy and nuns began in the summer of 1935 and the « threat of criminal prosecution on charges designed by the Propaganda Ministry as a goad to drive the clergy to accept the subversion of Christian teachings in the “ Reich ” » . In the 1936 campaign against the monasteries and convents, the authorities charged 276 members of religious orders with the offence of « homosexuality » .

Under Reinhard Heydrich and Heinrich Himmler, the Security Police and the SD were responsible for suppressing internal and external enemies of the Nazi State. Among those enemies were « political churches » - such as Lutheran and Catholic clergy who opposed the Hitler regime. Such dissidents were arrested and sent to concentration camps. According to Himmler biographer Peter Longerich, Himmler was vehemently opposed to Christian sexual morality and the « principle of Christian mercy » , both of which he saw as a dangerous obstacle to his plans battle with « sub-humans » .

In 1937, he wrote :

« We live in an era of the ultimate conflict with Christianity. It is part of the mission of the SS to give the German people in the next half Century the non-Christian ideological foundations on which to lead and shape their lives. This task does not consist solely in overcoming an ideological opponent but must be accompanied at every step by a positive impetus : in this case, that means the reconstruction of the German heritage in the widest and most comprehensive sense. »

(Heinrich Himmler, 1937.)

Himmler saw the main-task of his « Schutzstaffel » (SS) organisation to be that of « acting as the vanguard in overcoming Christianity and restoring a “ Germanic ” way of living » in order to prepare for the coming conflict between « humans and sub-humans » : Longerich wrote that, while the Nazi movement as a whole launched itself against Jews and Communists, « by linking de-Christianisation with re-Germanization, Himmler had provided the SS with a goal and purpose all of its own » . He set about making his SS the focus of a « cult of the Teutons » .

Josef Gœbbels noted the mood of Hitler in his diary, on 25 October 1936 :

« Trials against the Catholic Church temporarily stopped. Possibly wants peace, at least temporarily. Now, a battle with Bolshevism. Wants to speak with Faulhaber. »

On 4 November 1936, Hitler met Faulhaber. Hitler spoke for the 1st hour, then, Faulhaber told him that the Nazi government had been waging War on the Church for 3 years (600 religious teachers had lost their jobs in Bavaria alone) and the number was set to rise to 1,700 and the government had instituted laws the Church could not accept - like the sterilization of criminals and the handicapped. While the Catholic Church respected the notion of authority, nevertheless, « when your officials or your laws offend Church dogma or the laws of morality, and, in so doing, offend our conscience, then, we must be able to articulate this as responsible defenders of moral laws » . Hitler told Faulhaber that the radical Nazis could not be contained until there was peace with the Church and that, either the Nazis and the Church would fight Bolshevism together, or there would be war against the Church. Kershaw cites the meeting as an example of Hitler's ability to « pull the wool over the eyes even of hardened critics » for « Faulhaber (a man of sharp acumen, who had often courageously criticized the Nazi attacks on the Catholic Church) went away convinced that Hitler was deeply religious » .

By early 1937, the Church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, had become highly-disillusioned. In March, Pope Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » (With burning concern) Encyclical. The Pope asserted the inviolability of human rights and expressed deep concern at the Nazi regime's flouting of the 1933 Concordat, its treatment of Catholics and abuse of Christian values. It accused the government of « systematic hostility leveled at the Church » and of sowing the « tares of suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » and Pius noted on the horizon the « threatening storm clouds » of religious Wars of extermination over Germany.

The Vatican had the text smuggled into Germany and printed and distributed in secret. Written in German, not the usual Latin, it was read from the pulpits of all German Catholic churches on one of the Church's busiest Sundays, Palm Sunday.

According to Gill :

« Hitler was beside himself with rage. 12 presses were seized, and hundreds of people sent either to prison or the camps. »

This despite Article 4 of the Concordat giving a guarantee of freedom of correspondence between the Vatican and the German clergy.

The Nazis responded with, an intensification of the « Church Struggle » , beginning around April. Josef Goebbels noted heightened verbal attacks on the clergy from Hitler in his diary and wrote that Hitler had approved the start of trumped-up « immorality trials » against clergy and anti-Church propaganda campaign. Goebbels' orchestrated attack included a staged « morality trial » of 37 Franciscans.

In his Christmas Eve 1937 address, Pope Pius XI told the College of Cardinals, that despite what « some people » had been saying :

« In Germany, in fact, there is religious persecution indeed rarely has there been a persecution so grave, so terrible, so painful, so sad in its deep effects. Our protest, therefore, could not be more explicit or more resolute before the whole world. »

In March 1938, Nazi Minister of State Adolf Wagner spoke of the need to continue the fight against Political Catholicism and Alfred Rosenberg said that the churches of Germany « as they exist at present, must vanish from the life of our people » . In the space of a few months, Bishop Sproll of Rothenberg, Cardinal von Faulhaber of Munich and Cardinal Innitzer of Vienna were physically attacked by Nazis.

After initially offering support to the « Anschluß » , Austria's Cardinal Innitzer became a critic of the Nazis and was subject to violent intimidation from them. With power secured in Austria, the Nazis repeated their persecution of the Church and, in October, a Nazi mob ransacked Innitzer's residence, after he had denounced Nazi persecution of the Church. « L'Osservatore Romano » reported on 15 October that Hitler Youth and the SA had gathered at Innitzer's Cathedral during a service Catholic Youth and started « counter-shouts and whistlings » :

« Down with Innitzer ! Our faith is Germany. »

The mob later gathered at the Cardinal's residence and, the following day, stoned the building, broke in and ransacked it - bashing a secretary unconscious, and storming another house of the cathedral curia and throwing its curate out the window. The American National Catholic Welfare Conference wrote that Pope Pius, « again protested against the violence of the Nazis, in language recalling Nero and Judas the Betrayer, comparing Hitler with Julian the Apostate » .

On 10 February 1939, Pope Pius XI died. Eugenio Pacelli was elected his successor 3 weeks later and became Pius XII.

« Summi Pontificatus » (On the Limitations of the Authority of the State) , issued 20 October 1939, was the 1st papal Encyclical issued by Pope Pius XII, and established some of the themes of his papacy. During the drafting of the letter, the Second World War commenced with the Nazi-Soviet invasion of Catholic Poland. Couched in diplomatic language, Pius endorses Catholic resistance, and states his disapproval of the War, racism, anti-Semitism, the Nazi-Soviet invasion of Poland and the persecutions of the Church.

In March 1941, Vatican Radio decried the War-time position of the Catholic Church in Germany :

« The religious situation in Germany is pathetic. All young men that feel their vocation is to take Holy Orders must forego this desire. The number of monasteries and convents which have been dissolved has become even larger. The development and maintenance of the Christian life has been rendered difficult. All that remains of the once great Catholic press in Germany are a few Parish magazines. The threat of a national religion is looming increasingly over all religious life. This national religion is based solely on the “ Führer's ” will. »

On 26 July 1941, Bishop von Galen wrote to the government to complain :

« The Secret Police has continued to rob the property of highly-respected German men and women merely because they belonged to Catholic orders. »

Often Galen directly protested to Hitler over violations of the Concordat. When, in 1936, Nazis removed crucifixes in school, protest by Galen led to public demonstration. Like Konrad von Preysing, he assisted with the drafting of the 1937 papal Encyclical. His 3 powerful sermons of July and August 1941 earned him the nickname of the « Lion of Münster » . The sermons were printed and distributed illegally. He denounced the lawlessness of the « Gestapo » , the confiscations of Church properties and the cruel program of Nazi euthanasia. He attacked the « Gestapo » for seizing Church properties and converting them to their own purposes - including use as cinemas and brothels.

On 26 June 1941, the German Bishops drafted a pastoral letter from their Fulda Conference, to be read from all pulpits on 6 July :

« Again and again have the Bishops brought their justified claims and complaints before the proper authorities. Through this pastoral declaration, the Bishops want you to see the real situation of the Church. »

The Bishops wrote that the Church faced « restrictions and limitations put on the teaching of their religion and on church life » and of great obstacles in the fields of Catholic education, freedom of service and religious festivals, the practice of charity by religious orders and the role of preaching morals. Catholic presses had been silenced and kindergartens closed and religious instruction in schools nearly stamped-out :

« Dear Members of the dioceses : We, Bishops, feel an ever great sorrow about the existence of powers working to dissolve the blessed union between Christ and the German people. The existence of Christianity in Germany is at stake. »

(Pastoral letter of the German Bishops, read on 6 July 1941.)

The following year, on 22 March 1942, the German Bishops issued a pastoral letter on « The Struggle against Christianity and the Church » : The letter launched a defence of human rights and the rule of law and accused the « Reich » Government of « unjust oppression and hated struggle against Christianity and the Church » , despite the loyalty of German Catholics to the Fatherland, and brave service of Catholics soldiers. It accused the regime of seeking to rid Germany of Christianity :

« For years a war has raged in our Fatherland against Christianity and the Church, and has never been conducted with such bitterness. Repeatedly, the German Bishops have asked the “ Reich ” Government to discontinue this fatal struggle ; but, unfortunately, our appeals and our endeavours were without success. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops, dated 22 March 1942.)

The letter outlined serial breaches of the 1933 Concordat, reiterated complaints of the suffocation of Catholic schooling, presses and hospitals and said that the « Catholic faith has been restricted to such a degree that it has disappeared almost entirely from public life » and even worship within churches in Germany « is frequently restricted or oppressed » , while in the conquered territories (and even in the Old « Reich ») , churches had been « closed by force and even used for profane purposes » . The freedom of speech of clergymen had been suppressed and priests were being « watched constantly » and punished for fulfilling « priestly duties » and incarcerated in concentration camps without legal process. Religious orders had been expelled from schools, and their properties seized, while seminaries had been confiscated « to deprive the Catholic priesthood of successors » .

The Bishops denounced the Nazi euthanasia program and declared their support for human rights and personal freedom under God and « just laws » of all people :

« We demand juridical proof of all sentences and release of all fellow citizens who have been deprived of their liberty without proof. We, the German Bishops, shall not cease to protest against the killing of innocent persons. Nobody's life is safe unless the Commandment, “ Thous shalt not kill ” is observed. We, the Bishops, in the name of the Catholic people, demand the return of all unlawfully confiscated and, in some cases, sequestered property for what happens today to Church property may tomorrow happen to any lawful property. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops, dated 22 March 1942.)

(Image) Ludwig Müller, Hitler's choice for « Reich » Bishop of the German Evangelical Church, which sought to subordinate German Protestantism to the Nazi Government.

Kershaw wrote that the subjugation of the Protestant churches proved more difficult than Hitler had envisaged. With 28 separate regional churches, his bid to create a unified « Reich » Church through « Gleichschaltung » ultimately failed, and Hitler became disinterested in supporting the so-called « German Christians » Nazi aligned movement.

Historian Susannah Heschel wrote that the « Kirchenkampf » is « sometimes mistakenly understood as referring to the Protestant churches' resistance to National-Socialism, but the term in fact refers to the internal dispute between members of the “ Bekennende Kirche ” Confessing Church and members of the Nazi-backed “ Deutsche Christen ” (“ German Christians ”) for control of the Protestant church. »

In 1933, the « German Christians » wanted Nazi doctrines on race and leadership to be applied to a « Reich » Church, but had only around 3,000 of Germany's 17,000 pastors. In July, Church leaders submitted a constitution for a « Reich » Church, which the « Reichstag » approved. The Church Federation proposed the well-qualified Pastor Friedrich von Bodelschwingh to be the new « Reich » Bishop, but Hitler endorsed his friend Ludwig Müller, a Nazi and former naval chaplain, to serve as « Reich » Bishop. The Nazis terrorized supporters of Bodelschwingh, and dissolved various church organisations, ensuring the election of Müller as « Reich » Bishop. But Müller's heretical views against Saint-Paul and the Semitic origins of Christ and the Bible quickly alienated sections of the Protestant church. Pastor Martin Neimoller responded with the Pastors Emergency League which re-affirmed the Bible. The movement grew into the Confessing Church, from which some clergymen opposed the Nazi regime.

By 1934, the Confessional Church had declared itself the legitimate Protestant Church of Germany. Despite his closeness to Hitler, Müller had failed to united Protestantism behind the National-Socialist Party. In response to the regime's attempt to establish a State Church, in March 1935, the Confessing Church Synod announced :

« We see our nation threatened with mortal danger ; the danger lies in a new religion. The Church has been ordered by its Master to see that Christ is honoured by our nation in a manner befitting the Judge of the world. The Church knows that it will be called to account if the German nation turns its back on Christ without being forewarned. »

(Confessing Church Synod, 1935.)

The Nazis response to this synod announcement was to arrest 700 Confessing pastors. Müller resigned. To instigate a new effort at coordinating the Protestant churches, Hitler appointed another friend, Hans Kerrl to the position of Minister for Church Affairs. A relative moderate, Kerrl initially had some success in this regard, but amid continuing protests by the Confessing Church against Nazi policies, he accused churchmen of failing to appreciate the Nazi doctrine of « Race, blood and soil » and gave the following explanation of the Nazi conception of « Positive Christianity » , telling a group of submissive clergy :

« The Party stands on the basis of Positive Christianity, and positive Christianity is National-Socialism. National-Socialism is the doing of God's will. God's will reveals itself in German blood. Doctor Zœllner and Catholic Bishop of Münster, Count Galen, have tried to make clear to me that Christianity consists in faith in Christ as the son of God. That makes me laugh. No, Christianity is not dependent upon the Apostle's Creed. True, Christianity is represented by the Party, and the German people are now called by the Party, and especially the “ Führer ”, to a real Christianity. The “ Führer ” is the herald of a new revelation. »

(Hans Kerrl, Nazi Minister for Church Affairs, 1937.)

At the end of 1935, the Nazis arrested 700 of Confessional Church pastors. When, in May 1936, the Confessing Church sent Hitler a memorandum courteously objecting to the « anti-Christian » tendencies of his regime, condemning anti-Semitism and asking for an end to interference in Church affairs.

Paul Berben wrote :

« A Church envoy was sent to Hitler to protest against the religious persecutions, the concentration camps, and the activities of the “ Gestapo ”, and to demand freedom of speech, particularly in the press. »

The Nazi Minister of the Interior, Wilhelm Frick responded harshly. Hundreds of pastors were arrested, Doctor Weissler, a signatory to the memorandum, was killed at Sachsenhausen concentration camp and the funds of the Church were confiscated and collections forbidden. Church resistance stiffened and, by early 1937, Hitler had abandoned his hope of uniting the Protestant churches.

The Confessing Church was banned on 1 July 1937. Neimoller was arrested by the « Gestapo » , and sent to the Concentration Camps. He remained mainly at Dachau until the fall of the regime. Theological universities were closed, and other pastors and theologians arrested.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer, another leading spokesman for the Confessing Church, was from the outset a critic of the Hitler regime's racism and became active in the German Resistance - calling for Christians to speak-out against Nazi atrocities. Arrested in 1943, he was implicated in the 1944 « July Plot » to assassinate Hitler and executed.

The Nazi policy of interference in Protestantism did not achieve its aims. A majority of German Protestants sided neither with « Deutsche Christen » , nor with the Confessing Church. Both groups also faced significant internal disagreements and division.

Mary Fulbrook wrote in her history of Germany :

« The Nazis eventually gave-up their attempt to co-opt Christianity, and made little pretence at concealing their contempt for Christian beliefs, ethics and morality. Unable to comprehend that some Germans genuinely wanted to combine commitment to Christianity and Nazism, some members of the SS even came to view “ German Christians ” as almost more of a threat than the Confessing Church. »

(Extract from the « Fontana History of Germany » , 1991.)

Some historians maintain that Hitler's goal in the « Kirchenkampf » entailed not only ideological struggle, but ultimately the eradication of the Church. Other historians maintain no such plan existed.

Alan Bullock wrote that :

« Once the War was over, Hitler promised himself, he would root-out and destroy the influence of the Christian Churches, but until then he would be circumspect. »

According to the Encyclopædia Britannica, Hitler believed Christianity and Nazism were « incompatible » and intended to replace Christianity with a « racist form of warrior paganism » .

...

The « Church Struggle » (« Kirchenkampf ») describes a tumultuous period for the churches in Nazi Germany under Hitler from 1933-1945. This involved the conflict between Hitler's Nazi regime and Protestant churches, as well as the Roman Catholic Church. We can divide the « Kirchenkampf » into 5 major stages that led to its horrific and bloody finale. Hitler initially caused internal qualm within German Protestants camps by his promotion of the pro-Nazi chaplain Ludwig Müller. He made Müller, a Nazi and former naval chaplain, the « Reich » Bishop in 1933. Subsequently, 1 year later, the Nazi regime would inevitably try to suppress churches and place them under their control. At this stage, there was some resistance, and many pious Christians were pressured, and harassed. Stage 3 involved the imprisonment of many pastors, and the crucifix, as a symbol of Christ's death on the cross (which is the heart of Christian theism) , was to be removed from schools. Many Christians protested against this, but ultimately to no avail. From 1937 to 1939, the Church increased its protest against the regime, however such was met with force, and, in retaliation many theological universities were forcefully shut-down, as well as many pastors and theologians arrested. Expectedly, the final stage, from 1939 to 1945, was the bloodiest as clergy camps were erected at Dachau, and churches were seized by the State. Some clergy were forced to join the military, and it was at this time in 1945 that the widely-known priests Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Alfred Delp were martyred for their resistance to Hitler.

Furthermore, it's widely thought, although debated, that the primary goal of « Kirchenkampf » was the intentional obliteration of churches, and their presence in Germany, as well as Christianity as a whole.

Expert on German history Joseph Bendersky tells us that :

« It was Hitler's long range goal to eliminate the churches once he had consolidated control over his European empire. »

It was Hitler's ideological goal to alter the minds of his people, and such would entail a deliberate modifying of the attitudes, values and mentalities. Such was intended to transform the German people into one national community. Disdain by the Nazis was conspicuously present in their intense dislike of universities, and especially of the churches. Around this time, Hitler was very much in control, and total allegiance to the National-Socialist German Workers' Party was set in place. Subsequently, clashes between traditional Christian beliefs and the imposed Nazi ideology became manifest. Hitler's henchmen Martin Bormann and the infamous Josef Goebbels, the Nazi Minister for Propaganda, were explicitly anti-Christianity, and, thus, made the forced eradication of churches in the country a main priority. Goebbels was to lead the violent persecution of the clergy as the War progressed. He would go on to write that « There is, namely, an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view » , thus, making his malicious intentions vivid. Something Hitler was to agree upon as in his view « Christianity was ripe for destruction » .

Hitler's manifest disdain for Christianity became ever more apparent as he « detested its ethics in particular » , as well as declared its teachings « a rebellion » . However, he was shrewdly strategic and hid his contempt due to political tactics. In fact, he was so good at hiding his true intentions towards Christianity that many went away convinced that he was a deeply religious man. Hitler even promised not to meddle in the business of the churches ; however, this was an obvious tactic he implemented to gain favour with this German public. Not soon after, he gained considerable strength did he go-back on this very promise. This was no limited effort on his part as he would go on to persecute many of faith ranging from Catholics, Protestants, and Jehovah Witnesses. Inevitably, this effort would lead to the incarceration of many priests in barracks and concentration camps, as established in stage 5 of the « Kirchenkampf » . At this time, the « Gestapo » , the German secret police, arrested over 700 pastors, as well as over 6,000 Jehovah's Witnesses for their expressed refusal to declare loyalty to the « Reich » , as well as because of their refusal to enter the military.

Martin Bormann, Hitler's private secretary, was another fore-runner of the « Kirchenkampf » , who writes that « National-Socialism and Christianity are irreconcilable » , and that any power the churches had « must absolutely and finally be broken » . The historian William Shirer tells us that « the Nazi regime intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, if it could ... »

The infamous military commander Heinrich Himmler was specifically opposed to Christian sexual morality as well as their belief in mercy.

In 1937, he writes :

« We live in an era of the ultimate conflict with Christianity. It is part of the mission of the SS to give the German people in the next half Century the non-Christian ideological foundations on which to lead and shape their lives. This task does not consist solely in overcoming an ideological opponent but must be accompanied at every step by a positive impetus : in this case, that means the reconstruction of the German heritage in the widest and most comprehensive sense. »

Himmler's « Schutzstaffel » , also known as the SS, were to be the « vanguard in overcoming Christianity » in Germany, as well to provide preparation of the inevitable conflict between the « humans and sub-humans » . This was not met by ignorance by those in the Church. One pastoral letter of the German Bishops voices that the « existence of Christianity in Germany is at stake » , and that the authorities under the regime were soon to « dissolve the blessed union between Christ and the German people » .

Another letter, written in 1942, reveals the intense struggle and upheaval of the Church :

« Repeatedly, the German Bishops have asked the “ Reich ” Government to discontinue this fatal struggle ; but,

unfortunately, our appeals and our endeavours were without success. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops, dated 22 March 1942.)

Ultimately, the Catholic Church had faced intense restriction, and had no say in the public life, almost as if it disappeared altogether from its once formidable position. Churches were being closed, Catholic schools spurned-out of existence, and clergymen were watched and harassed. The Church refused to condone euthanasia under the Nazi regime because of their support for human rights and personal freedom under God.

« The Bishops shall not cease to protest against the killing of innocent persons. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops, 22 March 1942.)

All this was likely to lead to one chilling conclusion :

« Had the Nazis won the War, their ecclesiastical policies would have gone beyond those of the “ German Christians ”, to the utter destruction of both the Protestant and the Catholic Church. »

La « Gleichschaltung »

La « Gleichschaltung » (« mise au pas ») est le processus mis en œuvre par Adolf Hitler et par le Parti nazi pour accéder au pouvoir total en Allemagne et pour mettre la société au pas, afin de concrétiser le mythe de la « communauté populaire » (« Volksgemeinschaft ») . Elle s'est déroulée de mars 1933 à août 1934.

Ce processus vise toutes les sphères de la société, politique, économique, religieuse et culturelle, et concerne l'ensemble de la population. Il a notamment pour objectif d'éliminer toute opposition réelle ou potentielle et comporte un important volet antisémite. La « Gleichschaltung » est mise en œuvre, dès l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir, via le développement d'un appareil répressif, des outils législatifs et réglementaires et la création d'organisations de masse destinées à encadrer tous les secteurs de la société. Les moyens employés étaient la séduction, l'intimidation ou la terreur.

Victor Klemperer souligne que le verbe « gleichschalten » est, au sens propre, surtout employé en électricité, dans le sens de synchroniser ; pour cet auteur, l'utilisation du terme « Gleichschaltung » est la création la plus caractéristique et probablement la plus précoce de la langue du 3e « Reich » (LTI) , dont l'apanage est la mécanisation flagrante de la personne elle-même, « un mot monstrueusement représentatif des convictions fondamentales du Nazisme » . « Dans la LTI, aucun autre terme technique, en empiétant sur un domaine qui n'est pas le sien, ne saurait révéler aussi crûment la tendance à la mécanisation et à l'automatisation. »

Pour Pierre Ayçoberry, l'expression la plus fréquente en français, « mise au pas » , « rend bien compte de la discipline imposée par les nouveaux Maîtres et acceptée plus ou moins volontairement par les divers corps pré-existants, mais elles sacrifie les connotations technologiques du mot allemand » ; « Synchronisation ou normalisation seraient des traductions plus appropriées (plus fidèles à l'aspect technolâtre du régime) , mais mise au pas est devenu d'usage courant, et il vaut mieux s'en tenir là. »

La mise en place des instruments juridiques et réglementaires de la « Gleichschaltung » se base sur 2 textes fondamentaux : le « Reichstagsbrandverordnung » (Décret de l'incendie du « Reichstag ») et la Loi des pleins pouvoirs.

Après l'incendie du « Reichstag » , dans la nuit du 27 au 28 février, Hitler convainc le président Hindenburg de signer un décret d'urgence. Basé sur l'article 48, 2e alinéa de la Constitution, le « Reichstagsbrandverordnung » permet de restreindre en dépassant les normes légales normalement applicables, la liberté individuelle, la liberté d'expression, notamment la liberté de la presse, du droit de réunion et d'association.

Le 23 mars 1933, la Loi des pleins pouvoirs porte le coup de grâce à la Constitution de Weimar :

« Elle décide tout simplement l'abrogation de la séparation des pouvoirs et l'auto-affirmation du gouvernement en matière législative, ce qui infirme “ de facto ” les compétences inchangées du président et du Parlement jusqu'au déni de tout appareil constitutionnel au bénéfice du seul Führer. »

Avec son entrée en vigueur, le « Reichstag » devient inutile et Hitler gouverne par décrets, avec ou sans la caution du président Hindenburg, sans devoir formellement modifier la Constitution : la domination de Hitler est institutionnellement sécurisée. En 1933 et 1934, les lois et décrets destinés à mettre la société allemande au pas se succèdent à un rythme effréné.

Le 1er texte législatif qui se réfère à la notion de « Gleichschaltung » est la loi provisoire sur l'alignement des « Länder » avec le « Reich » , du 31 mars 1933 :

« Celle-ci porte un coup décisif au fédéralisme, en dissolvant les parlement régionaux, qui seront recomposés (sauf en Prusse) proportionnellement aux résultats des dernières élections au Reichstag. »

Elle est suivie, le 7 avril, par une seconde loi d'alignement qui transpose au niveau des « Länder » les dispositions de la Loi des pleins pouvoirs et nomme à la tête de chaque « Land » un « Reichsstatthalter » (gouverneur du « Reich ») , fonction généralement confiée à un « Gauleiter » .

La loi sur la restauration de la fonction publique (« Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums » , ou GWB) , du 7 avril 1933, permet aux dirigeants nazis de destituer les fonctionnaires juifs ou considérés comme politiquement hostiles.

La Confédération générale des syndicats allemands (« Allgemeiner Deutscher Gewerkschaftsbund » , ou ADGB) fut dissoute le 2 mai 1933, le lendemain de la Fête du Travail, quand les unités SA et du NSBO (« Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation ») occupèrent les unions syndicalistes ; les chefs du ADGB furent emprisonnés. De nombreuses associations furent forcées de fusionner avec le « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » (DAF), substitut nazi de l'AGBD, les mois suivants.

La loi contre la formation de Partis politiques (« Gesetz gegen die Neubildung von Parteien ») du 14 juillet 1933 empêcha toute création d'un nouveau Parti politique.

La loi de reconstruction du « Reich » (« Gesetz über den Neuaufbau des Reiches »), du 30 janvier 1934, abandonnait le fédéralisme. Au lieu de cela, les établissements politiques des « Länder » ont été pratiquement entièrement supprimés, transférant tous les pouvoirs au gouvernement central. En conséquence, une autre loi datant du 14 février 1934 dissout le « Reichsrat », la représentation des « Länder » au niveau fédéral.

Le 2 août 1934, à 9 heures du matin, le président du « Reich » (« Reichspräsident ») Paul von Hindenburg meurt à l'âge de 87 ans. 3 heures avant, le gouvernement avait voté une loi qui prendrait effet lors de sa mort : celle-ci prescrivait que les fonctions de président du « Reich » devaient être unies avec celles du chancelier du « Reich » et que les compétences du précédent gouvernement devaient être transférées au « “ Führer ” et chancelier du “ Reich ” » (« Führer und Reichskanzler »), Adolf Hitler, qui demanda l'application de cet article.

De mars à mai 1933, les militants du KPD et du SPD sont les premiers détenus des camps de concentration. Catégorisés comme « opposants politiques », 25,000 sont envoyés dans les premiers camps gardés par des SA (Dachau, Oranienburg-Sachsenhausen, Papenburg). Le 22 juin 1933, il n'y a plus de Parti de gauche en Allemagne. Bien qu'allié au premier gouvernement Hitler, Alfred Hugenberg démissionne le 27 juin 1933 et le Parti conservateur DNVP est dissous ; ses militants rejoignent le NSDAP. Le « Deutsche Staatspartei » est dissous le 28 juin.

Le 5 juillet, le « Zentrum » catholique procède à sa propre dissolution, à la suite de la disparition de sa branche bavaroise.

La loi du 14 juillet 1933 instaure le NSDAP comme Parti unique ; la création de tout nouveau Parti politique est prohibée. Ceci a lieu 6 mois après que Hitler a été nommé chancelier.

Le 22 septembre 1933, Josef Goebbels instaure la « Reichskulturkammer ». Le statut de l'artiste est redéfini ; il doit se charger désormais d'éduquer politiquement la nation.

Par un décret du 22 juin 1933, le Comité national des associations de jeunesse allemande est dissous. Les adhérents des associations dissoutes sont rattachés soit à la « Hitler-Jugend », qui atteint 3,5 millions de membres à la fin de l'année 1934, soit à la « Bund Deutscher Mädel ».

La jeunesse hitlérienne subira une propagande nazie très forte dans un sens de domination, de force et d'exaltation de la nation allemande. L'école ne devait alors avoir que le rôle de complément.

Les fonctionnaires font l'objet d'une épuration idéologique, permettant de s'assurer le concours de l'ensemble des services publics ; à la suite de quoi, tous les secteurs professionnels privés sont encadrés par des membres du Parti nazi.

Les organisations para-militaires non-nazies sont supprimées :

Bannière du « Reich » : 3,5 millions de membres.

Para-militaires du DNVP.

Les membres du « Stahlhelm » rejoignent massivement les SA ; en 1935 le « Stahlhelm » a cessé d'exister.

« Front rouge des combattants » qui était l'armée officieuse du KPD et comptait 150 000 membres.

Dernière organisation para-militaire avec la SS, la SA elle-même est purgée, fin-juin 1934, lors de la « Nuit des Longs Couteaux » .

La « Reichswehr » est ré-organisée en « Wehrmacht » par la loi du 21 mars 1935, qui ré-introduit la conscription.

...

In Nazi terminology, « Gleichschaltung » (bringing into line) was the process by which Nazi Germany successively established a system of totalitarian control and coordination over all aspects of society, « from the economy and trade associations to the media, culture and education » .

The apex of the Nazification of Germany was in the resolutions approved during the Nuremberg Rally of 1935, when the symbols of the Party and the State were fused and the German Jews were deprived of citizenship, paving the way for the Holocaust.

The period from 1933 to 1937 was characterized by the systematic elimination of non-Nazi organizations that could potentially influence people, such as trade-unions and political Parties. Those critical of Adolf Hitler's agenda were suppressed, intimidated or murdered. The regime also assailed the influence of the churches, for example, by instituting the Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs under Hanns Kerrl. Organizations that the administration could not eliminate, such as the education system, came under its direct control.

The « Gleichschaltung » also included the formation of various organizations with compulsory membership for segments of the population, in particular the youth. Boys first served as apprentices in the « Pimpfen » (Cubs) , beginning at the age of 6, and, at age 10, entered the « Deutsches Jungvolk » (Young German Boys) and served there until entering the Hitler Youth proper at age 14. Boys remained there until age 18, at which time they entered into the « Arbeitsdienst » (Labour Service) and the armed forces. Girls became part of the « Jungmädel » (Young Maidens) at age 10 and, at age 14, were enrolled in the « Bund Deutscher Mädel » (League of German Maidens) . At 18, « Bund Deutscher Mädel » members went generally to the eastern territory for their « Pflichtdienst » , or « Landjahr » , 1 year of labour on a farm. In 1936, membership of the Hitler Youth numbered just under 6 million.

For workers, an all-embracing recreational organization called « Kraft durch Freude » (Strength through Joy) was set-up. In Nazi Germany, even hobbies were regimented, all private clubs (whether they be for chess, football, or wood-working) were brought under the control of the « Kraft durch Freude » and the Nazi Party. The « Kraft durch Freude » organization provided vacation trips (skiing, swimming, concerts and ocean cruises) . With some 25 million members, the « Kraft durch Freude » was the largest of the many organizations established by the Nazis. Workers were also brought in line with the Party, through activities such as the « Reichsberufswettkampf » , a national vocational competition.

Koonz writes of how this intense racism came about, despite relatively little attention given to popularizing racial hate. Newsreels, propaganda, films and Hitler's political campaign devoted very little attention to popularizing the racism at the heart of the regime. To be credible, racist propaganda had to emanate from apparently objective sources, with the appearance of knowledge, which had the power to change attitudes.

Josef Gœbbels said :

« The best propaganda is that which, as it were, works invisibly, penetrates the whole of life without the public having any knowledge of the propagandistic initiative. »

Further claiming on another occasion that :

« Good propaganda does not need to lie, indeed, it may not lie. It has no reason to fear the truth. It is a mistake to believe that the people cannot take the truth. They can. It is only a matter of presenting the truth to people in a way that they will be able to understand. »

In a more specific sense, « Gleichschaltung » refers to the legal measures taken by the government during the 20 months following 30 January 1933, when Adolf Hitler became Chancellor of Germany. It was, in this sense, that the term was used by the Nazis themselves.

1 day after the « Reichstag » fire, on 27 February 1933, President of Germany, Paul von Hindenburg, acting at Adolf Hitler's request and on the basis of the emergency powers in article 48 of the Weimar Constitution, issued the « Reichstag » Fire Decree. This decree suspended most citizen rights provided for by the constitution and, thus, allowed for the arrest of political adversaries, mostly Communists, and for terrorizing of other electors by the SA (the Nazi para-military force) before the upcoming election.

In this atmosphere, the « Reichstag » general election of 5 March 1933 took place. The Nazis had hoped to win an outright majority and push aside their coalition partners, the German National People's Party. However, the Nazis won only 43 % of the vote, well short of a majority. The Nazi-DNVP coalition did enjoy a slim majority, just enough to conduct the ordinary business of government.

When the newly-elected « Reichstag » 1st convened on 23 March 1933 (not including the Communist delegates because their Party had been banned on 6 March) , it passed the Enabling Act (« Ermächtigungsgesetz ») . This law gave the government (in practice, Hitler) the right to make laws without the involvement of the « Reichstag » . For all intents and purposes, the entire Weimar constitution was rendered void. Soon afterwards, the government banned the Social-Democratic Party, which had voted against the Act. By midsummer, the other Parties had been intimidated into dissolving themselves rather than face arrests and concentration camp imprisonment.

The « 1st “ Gleichschaltung ” Law » (« Erstes Gleichschaltungsgesetz » , passed on 31 March 1933) , the 1st passed using the Enabling Act, dissolved the diets of all « Länder » , except Prussia, and ordered them reconstituted on the basis of the votes in the last « Reichstag » election (with the exception of Communist seats) . It also gave the State governments the same powers the « Reich » government possessed under the Enabling Act.

A « 2nd “ Gleichschaltung ” Law » (« Zweites Gleichschaltungsgesetz » , passed on 7 April 1933) deployed 1 « Reichsstatthalter » (« Reich » Governor) in each State, apart from Prussia. These officers, responsible to Interior Minister Wilhelm Frick, were supposed to act as local proconsuls in each State, with near-complete control over the State governments. For Prussia, which in any event constituted the bulk of Germany, Hitler reserved these rights for himself and delegated them to Prussian minister-president Hermann Göring. This law effectively de-federalized the « Reich » for the 1st time ever.

The trade-union association ADGB (« Allgemeiner Deutscher Gewerkschaftsbund ») was shattered on 2 May 1933 (the day after Labour Day) , when ADGB leaders were imprisoned and SA and NSBO units occupied union facilities. Other important associations, including trade-unions, were dissolved and replaced by the German Labour Front (« Deutsche Arbeitsfront » , or DAF) , to which all workers had to belong.

The « Gesetz gegen die Neubildung von Parteien » (Law against the establishment of political Parties, passed on 14 July 1933) declared the Nazi Party to be the country's only legal Party. However, for all practical purposes, Germany had been a One Party State since the passage of the Enabling Act.

The « Gesetz über den Neuaufbau des Reiches » (Law concerning the reconstruction of the « Reich » , passed on 30 January 1934) formally did away with the concept of a Federal Republic, converting Germany into a highly-centralized State. The States were reduced to mere provinces, as their institutions were practically abolished altogether. All of their powers passed to the central government. It can be argued that this law violated the Enabling Act, since it effectively neutered the « Reichsrat » , the representation of the « Länder » at the Federal level. Article 2 of the Enabling Act stated that the institutions of both legislative chambers could not be altered. A law passed on 14 February formally abolished the « Reichsrat » . This law indisputably violated the Enabling Act, since Article 2 explicitly protected the existence of both chambers. However, there was no remedy for violations of Article 2, and no challenge was ever mounted in court.

In the summer of 1934, Hitler instructed the SS to kill Ernst Röhm and other leaders of the Nazi Party's SA, former Chancellor Kurt von Schleicher and several aides to former Chancellor Franz von Papen in the so-called « Night of the Long Knives » (between 30 June and 2 July 1934) . These measures received retroactive sanction in a special One Article Law Regarding Measures of State Self-Defense (« Gesetz über Maßnahmen der Staatsnotwehr » , passed on 3 July 1934) .

The Law Concerning the Highest State Office of the « Reich » , passed on 1 August 1934, prescribed that upon the death of the incumbent president, that office would be merged with the office of the chancellor, and that the competencies of the former should be transferred to the « Führer und Reichskanzler Adolf Hitler » , as the law stated. Hindenburg died at 9 o'clock the next morning, making Hitler head of State as well as head of government. Like the law abolishing the « Reichsrat » , this law actually violated the Enabling Act, which specifically forbade Hitler from tampering with the presidency. Additionally, in 1932, the constitution had been amended to make the president of the High Court of Justice, not the chancellor, acting president pending new elections. However, no one raised any objections. This law abolished the last remedy by which Hitler could be legally dismissed - and, with it, the last check on his power. From this point onward, Hitler can be described as the absolute dictator of Germany until his suicide in 1945.

L'Allemagne nazie : de la prise de pouvoir à la dictature

À la faveur de la crise économique de 1929, le NSDAP (Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands) , prend de l'ampleur et progresse au fil des scrutins électoraux. Adolf Hitler à la tête du Parti depuis 1921, tire partie des échecs de la République de Weimar et exploite le nationalisme engendré par le Traité de Versailles signé à l'issue de la Première Guerre mondiale (28 juin 1919) . Orateur d'exception, Hitler développe, sur un terreau où se mêlent conservatisme, nationalisme frustré et ressentiment social, une propagande qui use d'arguments à la fois nouveaux et séculaires. En 1930, aux élections législatives, le Parti obtient 18,37 % des voix devenant le 2e Parti d'Allemagne et, le 30 janvier 1933, Hitler devient Chancelier. Il prend alors la tête d'un gouvernement à majorité national-conservatrice dans lequel les Nazis sont minoritaires face à des conservateurs bien décidés à les utiliser pour liquider la République de Weimar au profit d'un régime autoritaire traditionnel.

Il ne faut pourtant que quelques mois à Hitler pour s'emparer sans partage du pouvoir. L'incendie du « Reichstag » , le 27 février 1933, est le prétexte pour interdire le Parti communiste dont les leaders et 10,000 militants sont internés. Il permet à Hitler d'obtenir du maréchal von Hindenburg, encore président du « Reich » (appellation officielle de la République) , la promulgation « du décret pour la protection du peuple et de l'État » , le 28 février 1933, et d'obtenir également des pouvoirs de police exceptionnels dans les « Länder » . Dans ce climat politique, les Nazis emportent 44 % des suffrages aux élections parlementaires du 5 mars 1933, soit 288 sièges sur 640 au « Reichstag » . Les députés du centre (« Zentrum ») rejoignent les Nazis et les nationaux-allemands pour voter, le 23 mars 1933, la loi d'habilitation (promulguée le 24 mars) qui confère à Hitler les pleins pouvoirs pour 4 ans, renouvelables en cas de besoin.

Nazification de l'Allemagne

Le 14 juillet 1933, toutes les formations politiques sont interdites au profit du Parti nazi, déclaré Parti unique. Les syndicats sont remplacés par un nouvel organisme corporatiste, le « Front du travail », contrôlé par les Nazis. La propagande habile et intensive de Joseph Goebbels, nommé le 11 mars 1933 ministre de la Propagande, se met en œuvre. Le 10 mai 1933, des étudiants et bibliothécaires « nettoient » les bibliothèques des villes universitaires, des ouvrages littéraires et des auteurs « indésirables » - Libéraux, pacifistes socialistes et juifs. Face à cette menace directe de nombreux écrivains et artistes prennent le chemin de l'exil. La presse, la radio et le cinéma sont strictement surveillés et utilisés par la propagande nazie. À partir de 1934, les fonctionnaires sont contraints de prêter serment de loyauté à Hitler. La jeunesse fait l'objet d'un soin particulier : sous l'égide de la Ligue nationale socialiste de l'enseignement, l'école devient un lieu d'endoctrinement. Les mouvements de jeunesse, aux premiers rangs desquels figurent les Jeunesses Hitlériennes, enrôlent et mobilisent les jeunes dès l'adolescence, Heinrich Himmler, chef de la SS (groupe de protection) est investi des pleins pouvoirs de police. Prenant de plus en plus d'importance depuis la « Nuit des longs couteaux » (liquidation de la SA par la SS), la SS pénètre tous les secteurs de la vie publique et privée et s'efforce de mettre en place par tous les moyens, y compris la terreur, un modèle d'homme nouveau conforme aux références biologiques nazies.

Les mesures contre les Juifs entrent en vigueur 2 mois après que le maréchal von Hindenburg eut confié à Adolf Hitler la constitution du gouvernement.

L'exclusion économique

Le 1er avril 1933, un comité officieux organise un immense boycott des commerces, cabinets d'avocats et de médecins juifs. Cette campagne est présentée comme une réponse aux réactions de protestation survenues à l'étranger « à l'initiative des Juifs » contre la politique du gouvernement allemand. Les SA montent la garde devant les magasins, les cabinets de médecins et d'avocats juifs. Cette journée marque symboliquement le début de l'éviction des Juifs de la vie économique. Le 7 avril 1933, 2 lois excluent les Juifs de la fonction publique et du barreau. Les Juifs d'Allemagne sont progressivement chassés des professions libérales, de l'armée, de la justice, des métiers de la culture et de la presse. Un « numerus clausus » est instauré dans les universités et, à partir de 1938, les enfants juifs doivent quitter l'école. Le Parti nazi et ses militants s'investissent dans l'« aryansisation » de biens appartenant à des Juifs en intimidant la population juive : 41,000 des 50,000 commerces de détail sont « volontairement » vendus par leurs propriétaires juifs, entre 1933 et 1938.

Les lois de Nuremberg

Le 15 septembre 1935, la loi civile du « Reich » et la loi « pour la protection du sang et de l'honneur allemand » interdisent les unions et les relations sexuelles entre Juifs et « non-Juifs », « génératrices de souillures ».

Les Juifs sont privés de leur citoyenneté et deviennent des sujets de statut inférieur, auxquels il est même interdit de « pavoiser aux couleurs nationales allemandes ». Parallèlement, le décret d'application du 14 novembre 1935 définit qui est juif : « est juif celui qui est issu d'au moins 3 grands-parents juifs ; est juif celui qui appartient à la communauté religieuse juive » . Le critère racial et l'appartenance religieuse sont donc, l'un et l'autre, pris en compte. Des ordonnances d'application, des dispositions relatives au cas des « Mischlinge » (métis) ou demi-Juifs, suivent quelques semaines plus tard. Ces lois déclenchent une série de dénonciations : dans la seule ville de Hambourg, environ 5,000 personnes sont arrêtées puis interrogées tandis que 1,150 procédures d'instruction sont ouvertes. Après avoir purgé une peine pour infraction à la loi sur la protection du sang, ces personnes sont généralement internées dans des camps de concentration.

Le Concordat du 20 juillet 1933

Le concordat du 20 juillet 1933 est un accord signé entre le Saint-Siège, représenté par le cardinal Eugenio Pacelli (futur pape Pie XII) , secrétaire d'État, et le « Reich » allemand, représenté par le vice-chancelier Franz von Papen. Ayant vu sa validité confirmée en 1957, il est encore en vigueur de nos jours.

Le pape Pie XI mène une politique très active de négociation et de signature de concordats ; 18 seront signés au cours de son pontificat. Il en négocie avec tous types de régimes : autoritaires, démocratiques, socialistes (comme l'URSS) ou fascistes (comme l'Italie) , en parvenant souvent à un accord. Par cette politique, il cherche à protéger les catholiques et préserver les institutions de l'Église (en évitant notamment l'ingérence des États dans les nominations d'évêques) et de la famille chrétienne, dans 2 domaines en particulier : l'éducation et le mariage.

Pie XI a une bonne connaissance de l'Allemagne. Il n'ignore pas les difficultés posées par les séquelles du « Kulturkampf » dans un pays majoritairement protestant : les catholiques ne représentent que 32 % de la population, concentrés en Bavière et en Rhénanie. Néanmoins, cette importante minorité est active, en particulier, s'agissant des mouvements de jeunesse. Elle compte 20,000 prêtres, 100,000 religieux et un Parti politique catholique centriste : le « Zentrum » .

Pie XI demande donc à Monseigneur Eugenio Pacelli, nonce apostolique en Allemagne et futur Pie XII, d'engager des négociations avec la République de Weimar. Celui-ci rencontre Friedrich Ebert. Cependant, le gouvernement fédéral ne souhaite pas entretenir des relations directement avec une religion. L'article 137 de la Constitution de Weimar proscribit ainsi toute « Église d'État » . En revanche, il permet des négociations au niveau des « Länder » . En conséquence, des concordats sont signés avec la Bavière (29 mars 1924) ; la Prusse (24 juin 1929) ; ou encore le pays de Bade (12 décembre 1932) , tous dans des conditions globalement favorables à l'Église catholique romaine.

L'arrivée du Parti nazi au pouvoir, en janvier 1933, change la donne. Le catholique conservateur Franz von Papen est nommé vice-chancelier. Le programme de restauration de la grandeur allemande séduit une partie des catholiques. De son côté, Pie XI est traumatisé par les événements de la Russie soviétique. Il relance les négociations au mois de mars, cette fois au niveau de l'Allemagne tout entière. Il s'appuie sur Monseigneur Pacelli, devenu secrétaire d'État ; Monseigneur Gröber, archevêque de Fribourg ; et Monseigneur Kaas, président du « Zentrum » . Hitler lui-même est peu convaincu par l'idée d'un tel accord, mais von Papen le convainc : il lui fait miroiter le ralliement de l'électorat catholique.

Les négociations se déroulent très rapidement. Le 20 juillet, la convention est signée. Von Papen y voit une grande victoire contre le bolchévisme ; Pie XI un accord « inattendu et inespéré » (M. Agostino) , évitant un nouveau « Kulturkampf » . Si le Parti « Zentrum » disparaît, l'Église catholique romaine est reconnue pour la 1^{re} fois dans l'ensemble du « Reich » ; les associations, les œuvres de jeunesse, l'école confessionnelle se voient accorder des garanties ; les biens confisqués sont restitués.

Les catholiques allemands accueillent le concordat d'un œil plutôt favorable ; ainsi, du cardinal Bertram, qui avait pourtant présidé la conférence de Fulda, en 1932, interdisant aux catholiques d'adhérer au NSDAP. De fait, le gouvernement nazi paraît un interlocuteur plus digne de confiance que la République de Weimar, accusée de tous les maux. Du côté des Nazis, on se satisfait de la disparition du « Zentrum » .

De plus, l'article 14 du concordat stipulait :

« Les nominations d'archevêques, d'évêques et toute autre nomination ne deviendront définitives que lorsque le représentant du Reich aura donné son accord pour ce qui est de savoir si ces nominations ne présentent pas d'inconvénients au point de vue politique générale. »

Adolf Hitler déclarera :

« La conclusion du concordat me paraît apporter la garantie suffisante que les citoyens du “ Reich ”, de confession catholique, se mettront dorénavant sans réserve au service du nouvel État national-socialiste. »

Très vite, l'Église doit perdre ses illusions : comme en Italie, le concordat n'est pas respecté. À la fin du mois de juin, lors de la « Nuit des Longs Couteaux » , les dirigeants des mouvements de jeunesse catholique sont exécutés par les SS. À partir du mois d'octobre, les Nazis persécutent le clergé. Au cours de l'été 1934, le chancelier autrichien Dolfuss, fervent catholique, est assassiné. Toutefois, le concordat permet à l'Église catholique de garder une certaine indépendance de fonctionnement face au régime, tout comme les « Églises libres » protestantes indépendantes, ce qui n'est pas le cas des Églises protestantes principales, subventionnées par l'État, qui se voient dirigées par les Chrétiens allemands, mouvement chrétien lié au National-Socialisme.

Rome réagit en mettant à l'Index « Le Mythe du XX^e siècle » , de l'idéologue nazi Alfred Rosenberg. Pacelli adresse 55 notes de protestations, de 1933 à 1939, au gouvernement allemand. Enfin, le 14 mars 1937, Pie XI publie l'encyclique « Mit brennender Sorge » , condamnant le paganisme et le racisme. Pour autant, le concordat n'est dénoncé par aucune des parties.

En mai 1938, Eugenio Pacelli s'absenta ostensiblement du Vatican lors de la visite d'Hitler. Le 6 septembre 1938, prenant position contre la législation antisémite italienne, il déclara à un groupe de pèlerins belges cette phrase célèbre :

« Nous, chrétiens, sommes spirituellement des sémites. »

Il ordonna également aux universités catholiques d'organiser un enseignement contre l'antisémitisme et le racisme. Juste avant son décès, il avait fait préparer une encyclique contre le Nazisme et un discours dénonçant les écoutes et les déformations des propos de l'église par les Fascistes.

Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, le sort du concordat est suspendu. Le 26 mars 1957, la Cour constitutionnelle allemande reconnaît sa validité.

Dans les années 1950 eurent lieu les discussions sur la validité du concordat. La question se pose alors des conditions dans lesquelles cet accord a pu se réaliser. Il y a de fait une séquence entre le vote de la Loi des pleins pouvoirs, le 24 mars, auquel participe le Parti catholique « Zentrum », la déclaration des évêques allemands à Fulda, le 28 mars, relevant l'interdiction pour les catholiques d'adhérer au Parti national-socialiste et le début des négociations du concordat début avril. Certains historiens allemands, et notamment Karl Dietrich Bracher ou Klaus Scholder, considèrent que ces événements sont intimement liés et qu'il y a donc eu un marchandage entre la Curie romaine et l'Allemagne nazie. D'autres, comme Konrad Repgen, réfutent cette thèse, considérant que les initiatives du Parti et des évêques allemands n'ont pas été téléguidées par la Curie. L'ouverture des archives vaticanes ces dernières années ne permet pas de trancher le débat.

...

The « Reichskonkordat » (Concordat between the Holy-See and the German « Reich ») is a treaty negotiated between the Vatican and the emergent Nazi Germany. It was signed on 20 July 1933 by Cardinal Secretary of State (and later Pope Pius XII) Eugenio Pacelli, on behalf of Pope Pius XI, and Vice-Chancellor Franz von Papen, on behalf of President Paul von Hindenburg and the German government. It was ratified on 10 September 1933 and it has been in force from that date right-up until the current-day. The treaty guarantees the rights of the Roman Catholic Church in Germany. When Bishops take office, Article 16 states they're required to take an oath of loyalty to the Governor or President of the German « Reich » established according to the constitution. The treaty also requires all clergy to abstain from working in and for political Parties. Nazi breaches of the agreement began almost as soon as it had been signed and intensified afterwards leading to protest from the Church including in the 1937 « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical of Pope Pius XI. The Nazis planned to eliminate the Church's influence by restricting its organizations to purely religious activities.

The « Reichskonkordat » is the most controversial of several concordats that the Vatican negotiated during the pontificate of Pius XI. It is frequently discussed in works that deal with the rise of Adolf Hitler in the early-1930's and the Holocaust. The concordat has been described by some as giving moral legitimacy to the Nazi regime soon after Hitler had acquired quasi-dictatorial powers through the Enabling Act of 1933, though « Reichskanzler » Hitler himself is not a signatory to the treaty and the treaty does not make mention of Hitler, or the Nazi Party.

The treaty places constraints on the political activity of German clergy of the Catholic Church. This contributed to a decrease in the previously vocal criticism of Nazism by the hierarchy of the Catholic Church in Germany, after September 1933 when the treaty was ratified. From a Roman Catholic church perspective, it has been argued that the concordat prevented even greater evils being unleashed against the Church, although critics like Gregory Paul call it a « Classic political kick-back scheme » . Though some German Bishops were un-enthusiastic, and the Allies, at the end of World War II, felt it inappropriate, Pope Pius XII successfully argued to keep the concordat in force. It is still in force today.

The « Reichskonkordat » between Germany and the Holy-See was signed on 20 July 1933, and ratified in September of that year. The treaty was an extension of existing concordats already signed with Prussia and Bavaria. A « concordat » is the equivalent of a treaty when the agreement is between the Catholic Church and a State. « Treaty » is a general term applied to any agreement between subjects of international law. Concordats have been used to create binding agreements to safe-guard church interests and its freedom to act, particularly in countries that do not have strong jurisprudence guaranteeing government non-interference in religious matters or in countries where the church seeks a privileged position under government patronage.

Accounts of 20th Century diplomatic relations between Germany and the Vatican commonly take as their starting-point the political scene in the late-19th Century. German Chancellor Bismarck's « Kulturkampf » (Battle for Culture) of 1871-1878 saw an attempt to assert a Protestant vision of nationalism over the new German Empire, and fused anti-Clericalism with suspicion of the Catholic population, whose loyalty was presumed to lie with Austria and France. The Catholic Centre Party had formed in 1870, initially to represent the religious interests of Catholics and Protestants, but was transformed by the « Kulturkampf » into the « political voice of Catholics » . Bismarck's Culture Struggle was largely a failure.

Bismarck sought to restrict the power of the Catholic Church in Germany. He regarded the Roman Church as « the enemy within » . His « Kulturkampf » included the disbanding of Catholic organizations, confiscation of church property, banishment or imprisonment of clergy and an ongoing feud with the Vatican.

According to novelist James Carroll, the end of « Kulturkampf » signaled that :

« The Church had successfully resisted to his face the man (Bismarck) who, according to an admiring Henry Kissinger, was “ out-maneuvered ” by nobody. »

The Catholic Church's firm resistance to Bismarck and « Kulturkampf » , including passive resistance by the Church in general and the excommunication of collaborating priests, has been used as benchmark for assessing the Church's response to the Nazis, from the early-1930's through World War II.

A formal re-alignment of Church and State relationships was considered desirable in the aftermath of the political instability of 1918 and the adoption of the Weimar constitution for the « Reich » along with the new constitutions in the German States, in 1919. Key-issues that the Church hoped to resolve related to State subsidies to the Church, support for Catholic schools, the appointment of Bishops and the legal position of the clergy. The « Reich » government, in turn, wished for reasons of foreign policy to have friendly relations with the Holy-See. Also, Germany wanted to prevent new diocesan boundaries being established which would dilute Germany's ties to ceded German territories in the east such as Danzig and Upper Silesia.

Negotiations relating to specific points, rather than a general concordat, took place between 1919 and 1922. But, even after subsequent feelers were put-out between the 2 Parties, the negotiations failed, primarily because both the « Reichstag » and « Reichsrat » were dominated by non-Catholic majorities who, for a variety of reasons, did not want a formal pact with the Vatican. In the absence of an agreement relating to particular areas of concern with the « Reich » , the Holy-See concluded more wide-ranging concordats with 3 German States where Catholics were concentrated : Bavaria (1924) ; Prussia (1929) ; Baden (1932) .

Pius XI was elected Pope in 1922. His pontificate coincided with the early aftermath of the First World War. The old European monarchies had been largely swept away and a new and precarious order formed across the continent. In the East, the Soviet Union arose. In Italy, the Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini took power, while in Germany, the fragile Weimar Republic collapsed with the Nazi seizure of power. Pope Pius's major diplomatic approach was to make concordats. However, wrote Hebblethwaite, these concordats did not prove « durable or creditable » and « wholly failed in their aim of safe-guarding the institutional rights of the Church » for « Europe was entering a period in which such agreements were regarded as mere scraps of paper » .

In 1929, Pius signed the Lateran Treaty and a concordat with Italy, confirming the existence of an independent Vatican City state, in return for recognition of the Kingdom of Italy and an undertaking for the papacy to be neutral in world conflicts. In Article 24 of the Concordat, the papacy undertook « to remain outside temporal conflicts unless the Parties concerned jointly appealed for the pacifying mission of the Holy-See » . Other major concordats included those signed with Germany (1933) ; Austria (1935) ; Yugoslavia (1935) ; and Latvia (1938) . The concordats were generally observed by the countries involved, with the exception of Germany.

In October 1929, General Grøener pushed the German Foreign Ministry to resolve an issue with the Vatican regarding military chaplains who lacked the ability to administer the sacraments of baptism or matrimony without first obtaining the permission of the local priest or Bishop. Grøener wanted the military to have their own Bishop rather than rely on local ordinaries and it was this particular issue that was to mark an important step in the discussions that would ultimately be realized in the concordat with the Vatican. In March 1930, the new Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, gave indications that the Vatican would be interested in a concordat with the « Reich » in the event of any reforms of the « Reich's » constitution having an adverse effect on the validity of the concordats already agreed between the German States and the Vatican.

Discussions between the 2 Parties took place between 1931 and 1932 and, at one point, representatives of the « Reich » pointed-out that Italy had an army Archbishop with Cardinal Pacelli indicating that was because Italy had signed a comprehensive concordat with the Vatican. The German negotiators continued to discuss solely on the basis of particular points rather than a general concordat during 1931 but even these were felt to be unlikely to be passed by the « Reichstag » or the « Reichsrat » , no matter their political or theological leanings.

In January 1933, Adolf Hitler became Chancellor. The passing of the Enabling Act, on 23 March, in part, removed the « Reichstag » as an obstacle to concluding a concordat with the Vatican. Hitler offered the possibility of friendly co-operation, promising not to threaten the « Reichstag », the President, the States or the Churches if granted the emergency powers.

With Nazi para-military encircling the building, he said :

« It is for you, gentlemen of the “ Reichstag ” to decide between War and Peace. »

The Act, allowed Hitler and his Cabinet to rule by emergency decree for 4 years, though Hindenberg remained President. German Catholics were wary of the new government :

« The Catholic Church had generally viewed the Nazi Party with fear and suspicion. It had felt threatened by a radical ultra-nationalist ideology that regarded the papacy as a sinister, alien institution, that opposed denominational separatism in education and culture, and that at times appeared to promote a return to Nordic paganism. The establishment of the 3rd “ Reich ” seemed to portend the coming of a bitter conflict between Church and State. »

(Extract from Theodore S. Hamerow's « On the Road to the Wolf's Lair : German Resistance to Hitler » .

In early 1933, Hitler told Hermann Rauschning that Bismarck had been stupid in starting a « Kulturkampf » and outlined his own strategy for dealing with the clergy which would be based initially on a policy of toleration :

« We should trap the priests by their notorious greed and self-indulgence. We shall, thus, be able to settle everything with them in perfect peace and harmony. I shall give them a few years reprieve. Why should we quarrel ? They will swallow anything in order to keep their material advantages. Matters will never come to a head. They will recognize a firm will, and we need only show them once or twice who is the master. They will know which way the wind blows. »

An initially mainly sporadic persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany followed the Nazi take-over. Hitler was hostile to the Catholic Church, but for political reasons, was prepared to restrain his anti-Clericalism and did not allow himself to be drawn into attacking the Church publicly as other Nazis would have liked him to do. Kershaw wrote that, following the appointment of Hitler as Chancellor by President von Hindenberg, the Vatican was anxious to reach agreement with the new government, despite « continuing molestation of Catholic clergy, and other outrages committed by Nazi radicals against the Church and its organisations » .

In March 1933, the British Roman Catholic periodical « The Tablet » in an article titled « The Ides of March » asserted :

« Hitler's Dictatorship is a usurpation and his enforcement of it is a brutality. While we write these lines, with news of more arrests and repressions coming to us every hour, we remember that we have reached the “ Ides of March ” and the anniversary of a never forgotten assassination. But Nazism's daggers cannot slay what is noblest and best in Germany. The Church, now that the Centre is no longer the key-group in German politics, may be persecuted ; but HITLER will not succeed where BISMARCK failed. »

Robert Ventresca wrote that because of increasing harassment of Catholics and Catholic clergy, Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli sought a quick ratification of a treaty with the government, seeking in this way to protect the German Church. When Vice-Chancellor von Papen and Ambassador Diego von Bergen met Pacelli in late-June 1933, they found him « visibly influenced » by reports of actions being taken against German Catholic interests.

There were some thoughts that the Church was keen on coming to terms with Hitler as he represented a strong resistance against Communism : the Papal Nuncio in Berlin (Cesare Osenigo) is reported to have been « jubilant » about Hitler's rise to power and that the new government would soon be offering the same concessions to the Church that Mussolini thought necessary to do previously in Italy. Historian, Michæl Phayer, balances Günter Lewy and author journalist, John Cornwell stating :

« John Cornwell in “ Hitler's Pope ” argues that the Concordat was the result of a deal that delivered the parliamentary votes to Hitler, thereby, giving him dictatorial power (Enabling Act of 1933) . This is historically inaccurate. But there is no question about Pius XII's tenacious insistence on the Concordat retention before, during and after the Second World War. »

(Michæl Phayer)

The Catholic Bishops in Germany had generally shown opposition to Hitler from the beginning of his rise to power. When the Nazi Party polled 6 million votes during the 14 September 1930 election, the Catholic hierarchy called on its people to examine their consciences. During the next 2 years, though there had been softening by some, the Bishops continued to pronounce against unacceptable policies of the Nazi Party. When Hindenburg appointed Hitler as Chancellor on 30 January 1933, the Bishops maintained support for the Catholic Centre Party (« Zentrum ») which, in turn, refused to assent to a proposal that would allow Hitler to assume full-power. On 12 March 1933, Pope Pius XI received the German Cardinal Faulhaber in Rome.

On his return, Faulhaber reported :

« After my recent experience in Rome in the highest-circles, which I cannot reveal here, I must say that I found, despite everything, a greater tolerance with regard to the new government. Let us meditate on the words of the Holy Father, who in a consistory, without mentioning his name, indicated before the whole world in Adolf Hitler the statesman who Ist, after the Pope himself, has raised his voice against Bolshevism. »

At a cabinet meeting, on 20 March 1933, Hitler « confidently reported » that the Centre Party had now seen the necessity of the Enabling Act and that « the acceptance of the Enabling Act also by the “ Zentrum ” would signify a strengthening prestige with regard to foreign countries » . Early, in March 1933, the Bishops recommended that Catholics vote for the Centre Party in the elections scheduled for 5 March 1933. However, 2 weeks later, the Catholic hierarchy reversed its previous policy - the Bishops now allowed the Centre Party and the Bavarian Catholic Party to vote for the Enabling Act which gave Hitler dictatorial powers on 23 March. German Catholic theologian Robert Grosche described the Enabling Act in terms of the 1870 decree on the infallibility of the Pope, and stated that the Church had « anticipated on a higher-level, that historical decision which is made today on the political level : for the Pope and against the sovereignty of the Council ; for the “ Führer ” and against the Parliament » . On 29 March 1933, Cardinal Pacelli sent word to the German Bishops to the effect that they must now change their position with regard to National-Socialism. On 28 March 1933, the Bishops themselves took-up a position favourable to Hitler. According to Falconi (1966) , the about-turn came through the influence and instructions of the Vatican. Pope Pius XI indicated in « Mit brennender Sorge » (1937) that the Germans had asked for the Concordat, and Pope Pius XII affirmed this in 1945.

Falconi viewed the Church's re-alignment as motivated by the desire to avoid being left alone in opposition and to avert reprisals. After the leader of the Centre Party, Monsignor Kaas, had persuaded the Party members to vote for Hitler and the Enabling Act, he left immediately for Rome and, on his return on 31 March, he was received by Hitler. He returned to Rome accompanied by the Catholic Vice-chancellor von Papen on 7 April with a mandate from Hitler to sound out a concordat with the Vatican. On the day they set-out for Rome to prepare the way for the Concordat, the 1st 2 anti-Semitic laws (excluding non-Aryans from public office and from the legal profession) were issued in Germany, but this did not impede the discussions. Von Papen recorded in his memoirs that, on his arrival in Rome, the Pope « greeted me with paternal affection, expressing his pleasure that at the head of the German State was a man like Hitler, on whose banner the un-compromising struggle against Communism and Nihilism was inscribed » . In Falconi's opinion, the Concordat was the price paid by Hitler in order to obtain the support of the German episcopate and the Catholic Parties. Ian Kershaw viewed the loss of political Catholicism as the sacrifice needed to protect the position of the Catholic Church in Germany.

According to historian Michael Phayer :

« The view that the Concordat was the result of a deal that delivered the parliamentary vote of the Catholic Center Party to Hitler, thereby, giving him dictatorial power (the Enabling Act of March 1933) is historically inaccurate. »

Cardinal Faulhaber wrote to Cardinal Pacelli on 10 April 1933 advising that defending the Jews would be wrong « because that would transform the attack on the Jews into an attack on the Church ; and because the Jews are able to look after themselves. »

The latter assertion based on the outcome of the April boycott, which was seen as a defeat for the Nazis.

On 22 April 1933, the British Minister to the Vatican recounted what the Vatican Under-Secretary of State had told him :

« The Holy-See is not interested in the Centre Party. We are more concerned with the mass of Catholic voters in Germany than in the Catholic deputies who represent them in the Reichstag. »

Previously, as part of the agreement surrounding the 1929 Lateran Treaty with the Fascist government in Italy, the Vatican had consented to the dissolution of the Catholic political « Partito Popolare » Party which dissolved in 1926.

At a 26 April meeting with Bishop Wilhelm Berning of Osnabrück, representative of the German Bishops' Conference, Adolf Hitler declared :

« I have been attacked because of my handling of the “ Jewish Question ”. The Catholic Church considered the Jews pestilent for 1,500 years, put them in ghettos, etc. , because it recognized the Jews for what they were. In the epoch of Liberalism, the danger was no longer recognized. I am moving back toward the time in which a 1,500 long tradition was implemented. I do not set race over religion, but I recognize the representatives of this race as pestilent for the State and for the Church, and, perhaps, I am thereby doing Christianity a great service by pushing them out of schools and public functions. »

The notes of the meeting do not record any response by Bishop Berning.

In the opinion of Martin Rhonheimer, who cites the above transcript :

« This is hardly surprising : for a Catholic Bishop, in 1933, there was really nothing terribly objectionable in this historically correct reminder. And, on this occasion, as always, Hitler was concealing his true intentions. »

Saul Friedländer interpreted Hitler's comments as an attempt to « blunt possible Catholic criticism of his anti-Jewish policies and to shift the burden of the arguments onto the Church itself » .

Edith Stein wrote to Pius XI in April 1933 asking if he would issue an anti- anti-Semitism Encyclical in view of « the indifference of Catholics to the growing vexations against the Jews » . Pinchas Lapide thought that this wasn't actioned as the letter arrived when the Concordat negotiations were taking place.

(Edith Stein died in the gas chamber at Auschwitz, in 1942.)

The issue of the Concordat prolonged Kaas's stay in Rome, leaving the Centre Party without a chairman, and, on 5 May, Kaas finally resigned from his post. The Party then elected Heinrich Brüning as its chairman. At that time, the Centre Party was subject to increasing pressure in the wake of the process of « Gleichschaltung » and after all the other Parties had dissolved (or were banned, like the SPD) . The Centre Party dissolved itself on 5 July 1933, as the Concordat between the Vatican and the Nazis had dealt it a decisive blow by exchanging a ban on the political activities of priests for the continuation of Catholic education. Cardinal Pacelli and Franz von Papen initialled the Concordat in Rome 3 days later, with signing taking place on 20 July. On 2 July, the Vatican daily newspaper « L'Osservatore Romano » insisted that the concordat wasn't an endorsement of Nazi teachings.

On 13 July, a British Minister had an interview with Cardinal Pacelli and reported :

« His Eminence said that the Vatican really viewed with indifference the dissolution of the Centre Party. »

At the 14 July, cabinet meeting Hitler brushed aside any debate on the details of the Concordat, expressing the view « that one should only consider it as a great achievement. The concordat gave Germany an opportunity and created an area of trust which was particularly significant in the developing struggle against international Jewry » . Saul Friedländer speculates that Hitler may have countenanced in this « area of trust » what he perceived as the Christian Church's traditional theological antipathy towards Jews, (see Hitler's comments above to Berning on 26 April) , converging with Nazi aims. Hitler « underlined the triumph » that the Concordat meant for the Nazi regime. Only a short time earlier, he had expressed doubts that « the church would be ready to commit the Bishops to this State. That this has happened, was without doubt an unreserved recognition of the present regime. »

On 22 July 1933, von Papen attended a meeting of the Catholic Academic Union, during which he first made the connection between the dissolution of the Centre Party and the Concordat. He said the Pope was particularly pleased at the promised destruction of Bolshevism and that Pius XI had agreed to the treaty « in the recognition that the new Germany had fought a decisive battle against Bolshevism and the atheist movement » . Papen noted that there was « an undeniable inner-connection between the dissolution of the German Center Party that has just taken place and the conclusion of the Concordat » and ended his speech with a call for German Catholicism to put away former resentments and to help build the 3rd « Reich » .

Abbot Herwegen told the meeting :

« What the liturgical movement is to the religious realm, Fascism is to the political realm. The German stands and acts under authority, under leadership - whoever does not follow endangers society. Let us say “ yes ” wholeheartedly to the new form of the total State, which is analogous throughout to the incarnation of the Church. The Church stands in the world as Germany stands in politics today. »

On 23 July, a British Minister met Cardinal Pacelli, who appeared « very satisfied » with the signing of the Concordat. The Cardinal expressed the view that, with the guarantees given relating to Catholic education, this Concordat was an improvement over the 1929 agreement with Prussia. Cardinal Pacelli did sound a note of caution in that his satisfaction was based on the assumption that the German Government « remained true to its undertaking » , but noted also that Hitler « was becoming increasingly moderate » .

On 24 July, Cardinal Faulhaber sent a hand-written letter to Hitler, noting that :

« For Germany's prestige in the East and the West and before the whole world, this hand-shake with the papacy, the greatest moral power in the history of the world, is a feat of immeasurable importance. »

On 4 August 1933, the British Minister reported « in conversations I have had with Cardinal Pacelli and Monsignor Pizzardo, neither gave me the feeling of the slightest regret at the eclipse of the Centre Party, and its consequent loss of influence in German politics » . On 19 August, Kirkpatrick had a further discussion with Cardinal Pacelli in which he expressed his « disgust and abhorrence » at Hitler's reign of terror to the diplomat.

Pacelli said :

« I had to choose between an agreement on their lines and the virtual elimination of the Catholic Church in the “ Reich ”. »

Pacelli also told Kirkpatrick that he deplored the persecution of the Jews, but a pistol had been held to his head and that he had no alternative, being given only 1 week to decide. Pinchas Lapide notes that whilst negotiations for Concordat were taking place, pressure had been put on the Vatican by the arrest of 92 priests, the searching of Catholic youth-club premises, and the closing-down of 9 Catholic publications.

The Nazi newspaper « Völkischer Beobachter » wrote :

« By her signature the Catholic Church has recognized National-Socialism in the most solemn manner. This fact constitutes an enormous moral strengthening of our government and its prestige. »

The Concordat was ratified on 10 September 1933 and Cardinal Pacelli took the opportunity to send a note to the Germans raising the topic of the social and economic condition of Jews who had converted to Catholicism but of not Jews in general.

Meanwhile, although the Protestant churches, being local congregations, remained unaffected by restrictions on foreign support, Hitler's government negotiated other agreements with them which in essence put Nazi officials, most of whom were Catholics, into positions of influence or outright authority over Protestant churches. Foreseeing the potential for outright State control of their churches which these agreements portended, many Protestant church leaders simply re-organized their congregations out of the agreements, causing a schism within the Protestant Churches. These Protestant resisters attempted to rally Catholic prelates to the dangers portended by these agreements but were simply rebuffed when the « Reichskonkordat » was ratified. Many of the Protestant clergy who opposed the Nazi religious program (« Bekennende Kirche » : Confessing Church) , later suffered imprisonment or execution.

Church leaders were realistic about the Concordat's supposed protections.

Cardinal Faulhaber is reported to have said :

« With the concordat we are hanged, without the concordat we are hanged, drawn and quartered. »

After the signing of the Concordat, the Papal Nuncio exhorted the German Bishops to support Hitler's regime. The Bishops told their flocks to try to get along with the Nazi regime. According to Michael Phayer, the Concordat prevented Pius XI from speaking-out against the Nazi Nuremberg Laws in 1935, and though he did intend to speak out after the nation-wide pogrom of 1938, Cardinal Pacelli dissuaded him from doing so.

On 20 August 1935, the Catholic Bishops conference at Fulda reminded Hitler that Pius XI had :

« ... exchanged the hand-shake of trust with you through the concordat - the 1st foreign sovereign to do so. Pope Pius spoke high praise of you. Millions in foreign countries, Catholics and non-Catholics alike, have overcome their original mistrust because of this expression of papal trust, and have placed their trust in your regime. »

In a sermon given in Munich during 1937, Cardinal Faulhaber declared :

« At a time when the heads of the major nations in the world faced the new Germany with reserve and considerable suspicion, the Catholic Church, the greatest moral power on earth, through the Concordat, expressed its confidence in the new German government. This was a deed of immeasurable significance for the reputation of the new government abroad. »

The « Treaty with Additional Protocol » was signed July 20th, 1933. It was ratified and in force starting on 10 September 1933 and remains in force today. The text of the Concordat was released 22 July 1933 and began with a preamble that set-out the common desire of both parties for friendly relations set-out in a solemn agreement.

His Holiness Pope Pius XI and the President of the German « Reich » (Paul von Hindenburg) , led by their common desire to consolidate and enhance the existing friendly relations between the Catholic Church and the State in the whole territory of the German « Reich » in a stable and satisfactory manner for both parties, have decided to conclude a solemn agreement which will supplement the concordats already concluded with some particular German States (« Länder ») and secure for the others the principles of a uniform treatment of the questions involved.

His Holiness Pope Pius XI has appointed as his pleni-potentiary (a diplomat granted full-power to represent) His Eminence the Most Revered Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, His Holiness' Secretary of State ; and the President of the German « Reich » (Paul von Hindenburg) has appointed as pleni-potentiary the Vice-Chairman of the German « Reich » , « Herr » Franz von Papen ; who, having exchanged their proper form have agreed to the following articles.

« Additional Protocol »

When the signing of the concordat concluded today between the Holy-See and the German « Reich » , the undersigned, being duly empowered to do so, have formulated the following explanations which form an integral part of the concordat itself.

Article I : The German « Reich » guarantees freedom of profession and public practice of the Catholic religion. It recognizes the right of the Catholic Church to regulate and manage her own affairs independently within the limits of the law applicable to all and to issue (within the framework of her own competence) laws and ordinances binding on her members.

The vagueness of the article would later lead to contradictory interpretations.

Article 2 : The concordats concluded with Bavaria (1924) , Prussia (1929) , and Baden (1932) and the rights and privileges of the Catholic Church recognized therein remain unchanged within the territory of the States (« Länder ») concerned. For the rest of the States, provisions of the present concordat shall be fully applicable. These provisions shall also be binding for the said 3 States in so far as they are relative to matters not regulated by the concordats concluded with those States, or in so far as they complete the arrangements already made.

Affirms the State concordats, « Länderkonkordate » , with Bavaria (1924) , Prussia (1929) , and Baden (1932) remain valid.

Article 3 : In order to foster good relations between the Holy-See and the German « Reich » , an apostolic Nuncio will continue to reside, as hitherto, in the capital of the German « Reich » and an ambassador of the German « Reich » will reside with the Holy-See.

(With regard to Article 3 : In accordance to the exchange between the apostolic nunciature and the « Reich » foreign office on the 11 and 12 March respectively, the apostolic Nuncio to the German « Reich » shall be the dean of the diplomatic corps accredited in Berlin.)

Confirms the Vatican having a Papal Nuncio (diplomat) in Berlin and the German government having an ambassador in Rome.

Article 4 : The Holy-See shall enjoy full freedom in its contact and correspondence with the Bishops, clergy and all other members of the Catholic Church in Germany. The same applies to the Bishops and other diocesan authorities in their contact with the faithful in all matters of their pastoral office. Instructions, ordinances, pastoral letters, official diocesan gazettes and other enactments concerning the spiritual guidance of the faithful, issued by the ecclesiastical authorities within the framework of their competence, may be published without hindrance and made known to the faithful in the ways heretofore usual.

Article 4 assures the Holy-See of full freedom to communicate with the German clergy and for the German Bishops to communicate with the laity « in all matters of their pastoral office » . The words of qualification in this clause would later be interpreted by the Nazis in its most narrow meaning to limit the Church communications to worship and ritual only.

Article 5 : The clergy enjoy in the discharge of their spiritual activities the same protection of the State as State officials. The State will proceed according to general provisions of its law in case of any outrage directed against any clergy personally or against their ecclesiastical character or in case of any interference with duties of their office and, if necessary, will provide official protection.

Article 6 : Clerics and religious are exempt from the obligation to undertake public offices and such obligations as are incompatible with their clerical or religious status. This applies particularly to the office of magistrate, member of a jury in law courts, membership of taxation committees or membership of the fiscal tribunal.

Article 7 : A member of the clergy can accept an official function or appointment in the State or in any publicly constituted corporation dependent on the State only after having received the « Nihil obstat » of his diocesan ordinary (Bishop) , as well as that of the ordinary competent for the place where the seat of the corporation is situated. For important reasons in which the interests of the Church are involved, the « Nihil obstat » can be withdrawn at any time.

Article 8 : The official income of the clergy is exempt from distraint to the same extent as the official salary of the civil servants of the « Reich » and of the States.

Article 9 : The judicial and other authorities cannot ask the clergy to give information about matters which have been entrusted to them while exercising the care of souls and which are consequently covered by the obligation of pastoral secrecy.

Article 10 : The wearing of clerical dress or of a religious habit by lay persons or by clerics or religious who have been forbidden to wear it on the strength of a final and valid decision of the competent Church authority (officially communicated to the State authorities) shall be punished by the State with the same penalties as the misuse of a military uniform.

Articles 5 to 10 dealt with the status of the clergy under German law. Priests were given protection against any interference in their spiritual activities as well as protection against malicious slander or misuse of clerical dress. Exemption from jury service, and like obligations, was guaranteed and the secrecy of the confessional guaranteed. Members of the clergy could only accept a State appointment so long as the Bishop approved and this permission could be withdrawn at any time for important reasons.

Article 11 : The present organization and delimitation (boundaries) of the Roman Catholic dioceses in the German « Reich » remains at it is. If, however, the re-arrangement of a bishopric or of an ecclesiastical province, or any other changes in the delimitation of diocese appear necessary in the future, they will be subject to agreement with the government of the State concerned in case that they involve changes only with boundaries of one German State (« Land ») . In case of re-arrangement of changes which exceed the boundaries of one German State, the agreement is to be made with the « Reich » government, to whose care it shall be left secure the consent of the State governments in question. The same applies to the establishment of new ecclesiastical provinces or alterations therein if these involve several German States. The foregoing provisions are not applicable to the shifting of boundaries which is made only with regard to the local care of souls. In case of a wider re-organization within the German « Reich » , the « Reich » government shall consult with the Holy-See with a view to such regrouping of dioceses and to their delimitation.

Article 12 : Without prejudice to the provisions of Article 11, ecclesiastical offices can be freely established and altered if no subsidy is asked for from the State funds. The co-operation of the State in establishing and changing the parish communities shall proceed according to the rules which have been arranged with the diocesan Bishops ; the « Reich » government will endeavor to achieve a uniform formulation by the State governments of their rules as far as possible.

Articles 11-12 specified that diocesan boundaries had to be made subject to government approval and that ecclesiastical offices could be established if no State funding was involved.

Article 13 : Catholic parishes and diocesan associations, episcopal sees, bishoprics and chapters, religious orders and congregations, as well as institutions, foundations and property of the Catholic Church administered by ecclesiastical authorities, shall retain or acquire respectively juridical personality, recognized by the State according to the general provisions of civil law. They shall remain publicly recognized corporations as far as they have been such hitherto ; the same rights may be granted to the others in accordance with the general law applicable to all.

(With regard to Article 13 : It is understood that the right of the Church to levy taxes is guaranteed.)

Article 13 gave to parishes, Episcopal sees, religious orders etc. juridical personality and granted the same rights as any other publicly recognised body « in accordance with the general law as applicable to all » which subjected the church's prerogatives' to legal regulation under civil law. Günter Lewy viewed this qualification as establishing « a Pandora's box of troubles » when the law was effectively in the hands of a regime who wanted to control the church.

Article 14 : As a rule, the Church has the right to appoint freely to all the Church dignities and benefices without any co-operation on the part of the State or of the civil corporations, unless any other arrangement has been made in previous concordats mentioned in Article 2. As far as the appointment to the metropolitan see of Freiburg, in the diocese of the Upper-Rhine, shall be applicable to the 2 suffragan (subordinate) bishoprics of Rottenburg and Mainz, as well as to the bishoprics of Meissen. The same applies in the said 2 suffragan bishoprics as regards the appointments to the cathedral chapters and the settlement of the rights of patronage. Furthermore, agreement has been reached on the following points.

(i) Catholic clerics who enjoy a spiritual office in Germany or exercise there a pastoral or educational activity, must :

(a) be German citizens,

(b) have obtained a school certificate (certificate of maturity) entitling them to study at a higher-German school,

(c) have studied philosophy and theology for at least 3 years at a German State university, an academic ecclesiastical college in Germany or a papal high-school in Rome.

(ii) The Bulls containing appointments of archbishops, Bishops, co-adjutors « cum iure successionis » (right of succession) or of a « prelati nullis » (a Bishop who has jurisdiction independent of a diocese) will not be issued before the name of the selected has been communicated to the « Reichsstatthalter » in the State (« Land ») in question, and before it has been ascertained that there are no objections of a general political nature against such a person. The conditions laid down above (i) par (a) , (b) , (c) , can be discarded by mutual agreement between Church and State.

(With regard to Article 14, paragraph 2, section 2 : It is understood that if objection of a general political nature exist, they shall be presented as soon as possible. Should they not be presented within 20 days, the Holy-See will be entitled to believe there are no objections against the candidate in question. Before an official announcement of the appointment is made, secrecy shall be kept about the candidates concerned. This article does not establish for the State a right to veto.)

Article 14 specified appointments of a Bishop by the Pope was subject to mutual agreement and communication with the regime that no general political impediment existed, while affirming appointments are free to make without any co-operation on the part of the State or civil corporations.

Article 15 : Religious orders and congregations are not subject, on the part of the State, to any particular restrictions as far as their foundation, their various establishments, the number of their members and their qualifications (save, however, for the provisions of Article 15, paragraph 2) , their pastoral or educational activity, their care of the sick and charitable work, the management of their affairs and the administration of their property are concerned. Superiors of religious orders who have their official residence, within the German « Reich » must have German citizenship. Provincials and superiors whose official residence is situated outside the German territory have the right of visitation of their establishments in Germany, even if they have a foreign citizenship. The Holy-See will see to it that the organization of the provinces of various religious orders, as regards their establishments in Germany, should be such as to avoid (so far as it can be done) the subordination of German establishments to foreign provincials. Exceptions therefrom may be admitted by mutual agreement with the « Reich » government, particularly in cases where the small number of establishments in Germany makes the formation of German province impracticable or where special reasons exist for the maintenance of a provincial organization rooted in history and working well in practice.

Article 15 guaranteed religious orders freedom for pastoral, charitable and educational work.

Article 16 : Before taking possession of their diocese, the Bishops shall take an oath of loyalty either between the hands of the « Reichsstatthalter » in the State (« Land ») in question or between those of the president of the « Reich » , the formula of which shall be the following :

« Before God and on the Holy Gospel, I swear and promise, as becomes a Bishop, loyalty to the German « Reich » and to the « Land » of ... I swear and promise to respect the government established according to the constitution and to cause the clergy of my diocese to respect it. In the due solicitude for the welfare and the interests of the German « Reich » , I will endeavor, while performing the spiritual office bestowed upon me, to prevent anything which might threaten to be detrimental to it. »

Article 16 specified Bishops must take an oath of loyalty and respect to either the « Reich » governor of the State concerned or to the President of the « Reich » , as established by the constitution. When the treaty was signed and ratified, the word « Reich » , or the phrase, « German “ Reich ” » , is not in reference to the 3rd « Reich » , but rather, as it applies to the period of the Weimar Republic which did not officially and fully collapse until the death of President Paul von Hindenburg on 2 August 1934 with the passing of a national referendum vote on 19 August 1934 consolidating the Office of Chancellor and President, thereby, declaring Adolf Hitler « Führer » of Germany.

Article 17 : The property and all other proprietary rights of the publicly recognized corporations, institutions, foundations and associations of the Catholic Church will be guaranteed according to the common law of the State. No building used for public worship can be demolished under any pretext or for any reason whatsoever, except if a mutual agreement has been reached beforehand with the competent ecclesiastical authority.

(With regard to Article 17 : In so far as building or land belonging to the State have been devoted to ecclesiastical purposes, they will continue to be devoted to them, with due regard, however, to the contracts which might have been concluded about them.)

Article 17 guaranteed, according to the common law, the properties of the church.

Article 18 : Should the State payments in kind or money, which are made to the Catholic Church, whether based on law, contract, or any other special legal title, be discontinued, the Holy-See and the « Reich » will proceed in due time beforehand to set-up amicable agreement the principles according to which the discontinuation is to be carried-out. In this connection, a right derived from a legitimate traditional custom is to be considered as a special legal title. Such discontinuation, implying the cessation of a State payment or obligation, must be adequately compensated in favor of the claimant.

Article 18 assured the Church that it would be consulted should the Nazi regime (or existing government) try to discontinue its subsidies to the German Catholic church, or other legal title without compensation as specified in Article 138 of the Weimar Constitution for all religious organizations.

Article 19 : Catholic theological faculties in State universities shall be maintained. Their relationship to the Church authorities will be regulated by the provisions of the respective concordats and by the protocols annexed to them, with due regard to the ecclesiastical laws relative to these faculties. The « Reich » will endeavor to secure for all German Catholic faculties in question a uniform regime in accordance with the general spirit of the regulations concerned.

(With regard to Article 19, sentence 2 : The basis referred to consists, at the time when this concordat is being concluded, especially of the Apostolic Constitution « Deus scienitarum dominus » of 24 May 1931, and the Instruction of 7 May-July 1932.)

Article 20 : The Church has the right unless there is some other agreement, to establish theological and philosophical colleges for the training of clergy ; if no State subsidies are claimed for these institutions, they will be dependent solely on the ecclesiastical authorities. The establishment, management and administration of seminaries and hostels for clerical students pertains exclusively, within the limits of the law applicable to all, to ecclesiastical authorities.

(With regard to Article 20 : Hostels connected with high and secondary schools and administered by the Church will be recognized, from the taxation stand-point, as being in practice ecclesiastical institutions in the proper sense of the word, and as of diocesan origin.)

Article 21 : Catholic religious instruction in primary, vocational, secondary and higher-schools is a regular subject of tuition and is to be taught in accordance with the principles of the Catholic Church. In religious instruction the patriotic, civic and social consciousness and sense of duty will be particularly stressed and cultivated, as this is generally done in the school training. The teaching program of religious education and the selection of text-books will be settled with by agreement with the higher-ecclesiastical authorities. These authorities will be given the opportunity to control, in harmony with the school authorities, whether pupils are receiving religious instruction in accordance with the teaching and requirements of the Church.

Article 22 : Mutual agreements shall be arrived at between the Bishops and the governments of German States (« Länder ») with regard to the appointment of the teachers of religion. Teachers who have been declared by the Bishop unfit for the further exercise of their teaching function, either for pedagogical reasons or on account of their moral behaviour, must not be employed as teachers of religion as long as the obstacle remains.

Article 23 : The maintenance of the existing Catholic confessional schools and the establishment of new ones is hereby guaranteed. In all localities where parents or guardians request it, Catholic primary schools will be established if the number of their prospective pupils, considered from the point of view of the local school conditions, appears to be sufficient for the establishment of a school corresponding to the standards prescribed by the State legislation.

Article 24 : Only members of the Catholic Church who can be trusted that they will correspond to the special requirements of a Catholic confessional school, can be employed as teachers in all Catholic primary schools. Within the framework of the professional training of teachers, arrangements will be made to guarantee the education and training of Catholic teachers capable of fulfilling the special requirements of Catholic confessional schools.

(With regard to Article 24 : In so far, private institutions are able to satisfy, after the new regulations regarding the education of teachers, the general applicable requirements of the State, the existing establishments of religious orders and congregations will be given due consideration in the accordance of recognition.)

Article 25 : Religious orders and congregations have the right to establish and run private schools within the limits of the general legislation and conditions laid down by the law. The same qualifications as in State schools can be acquired in these private schools if they follow the teaching program prescribed for State schools. Members of religious orders and congregations are subject, with regard to their employment in private schools, to the general conditions applicable to all.

Articles 19 to 25 gave protection to the Catholic educational system (Hitler, in due course, would disregard them) .

Article 26 : Pending a later and more detail settlement of matters regarding matrimonial law, it is understood that a church wedding may proceed the civil marriage ceremony not only in the case of a grave illness of one of the finances which does not permit any delay, but in the case of great moral emergency (which, however, must be confirmed by the competent episcopal authority) . In such cases, the parish priest is bound to report the matter at once to the registrar's office.

(With regard to Article 26 : A great moral emergency is considered existing if the procuring of time of documents necessary for the wedding meets with obstacles which are either insuperable or whose removal would be disproportionately costly.)

Article 26 allowed that a church wedding could precede a civil marriage ceremony.

Article 27 : A special and exempt pastoral ministry is conceded to the officers, employees and men of the Germany army and to their families. An army Bishop will be in charge of this pastoral care. His ecclesiastical appointment will be effected by the Holy-See after contact has been made with the « Reich » government in order to select, by mutual agreement, a suitable candidate. The ecclesiastical appointment of the military chaplains and other military clergy will be made by the military Bishop after previous consultation with the competent authorities of the « Reich » . The army Bishop can, however, appoint as military chaplains only such priest who have obtained, from their ordinary, permission to engage in military pastoral work and who have obtained an appropriate certificate of fitness. Military chaplains have the rights of parish priests with regard to the troops and other army personnel assigned to their care. An apostolic brief will be issued to regulate in detail the Catholic care of souls in the army. Regulations about the position of army chaplains as State officials will be issued by the « Reich » government.

(With regard to Article 27, sentence 2 : Catholic army officers, personnel and men, as well as their families, do not belong to the local parish communities and are not to contribute to their maintenance. With regard to sentence 4 : The apostolic brief will be issued in agreement of the « Reich » government.)

Article 27 regulated the appointment of military chaplains.

Article 28 : The Church will be admitted to pastoral visits and to the holding of divine service in hospitals, prisons, and similar public institutions. If a regular care of souls, requiring appointment of clergy as State or public officials, is introduced in such institutions, this will be made by agreement with the higher-Church authorities.

Article 28 assured the Church the right to pastoral care in hospitals, prisons and like institutions, which would be violated later by the Nazi regime when it refused the Church's request to carry-out services in concentration camps.

Article 29 : Catholic members of non-German national minorities living within the « Reich » will not be placed in a worse status with regard to the use of their mother tongue in divine service, religious instruction and Church societies, than is the corresponding legal and practical position of the population of German origin and speech living in the territory of the corresponding foreign State.

(With regard to Article 29 : Since the « Reich » government has shown itself ready to make concessions with regard to non-German minorities, the Holy-See declares - confirming hereby the principles which it has constantly maintained regarding the right of using the vernacular in the pastoral ministry, religious instruction and in the activities of Catholic associations - that it will keep in mind, when concluding future concordats with other countries, the inclusion in them of provisions of a similar value for the rights of German minorities there.)

Article 29 granted the same rights to national minorities, with respect to the use of the mother tongue in divine services, as were enjoyed by the German population in the corresponding foreign State.

Article 30 : On Sundays and Holy Days, a prayer will be said for the welfare of the German « Reich » and its people in episcopal, parish, affiliated and conventional churches in the German « Reich » , immediately after the High-Mass and according to the rules of the Church liturgy.

Article 31 : Catholic organizations and associations whose activity is devoted exclusively to religious, purely cultural and charitable purposes and which are, as such, subordinated to Church authorities, are protected as to their institution and activities. Catholic organizations which, apart from religious cultural or charitable purposes, have other tasks such as social or professional aims, shall also enjoy the protection of this Article 31, paragraph 1, even though their organization may be disposed in associations corresponding to States (« Länder ») , provided they guarantee to develop their activities outside political Parties. It is reserved to the « Reich » government and the German episcopate (Bishops) to determine by mutual agreement, the organizations and associations which fall within the provisions of this article.

(With regard to Article 31, paragraph 4 : The principles laid down in paragraph 4 of this article are equally valid for the labour service.)

Article 32 : With regard to the special conditions existing in Germany and with regard to the provisions of the present concordat guaranteeing legislation to protect the rights and privileges of the Catholic Church in the « Reich » and its States (« Länder ») , the Holy-See will issue ordinances by which the clergy and the religious will be forbidden to be members of political Parties or to be active on their behalf.

(With regard to Article 32 : It is understood that the same provisions, regarding activity in political Parties, will be enacted by the « Reich » for the non-Catholic confessions. The conduct which has been stipulated as a duty for the German clergy and members of religious in Article 32 does not mean any restriction on their preaching and exposition of the dogmatic and moral teachings and principles of the Church, as it is their duty to do.)

Articles 31 and 32 relate to the issue of Catholic organizations « devoted exclusively to religious, cultural and charitable purposes » and empowered the « Reich » government and German episcopate to « determine, by mutual agreement, the organizations and associations which fall within the provisions of this article » . Organizations (sponsored by the Catholic Church) that had any political aims no longer had any place in the new Germany ; this went without saying and not even mentioned. Article 32 gave to Hitler one of his principal objectives : the exclusion of the clergy from politics such that « the Holy-See will issue ordinances by which the clergy and the religious will be forbidden to be members of political Parties or to be active on their behalf » . Catholic laity, however, were free to form, engage and propagate political Parties and seek political office. The « Additional Protocol » provisions make clear this prohibition of clergy from political activism does not mean they can not preach on moral teachings and principles of the Church « as it is their duty to do » .

Article 33 : All matters regarding clerical persons or Church affairs which have not been mentioned in the preceding articles will be settled, for the sphere of the Church, according to canon law in force. Should a divergence arise, in the future, as to the interpretation or application of any provisions of this concordat, the Holy-See and the German « Reich » will arrive at an amicable solution by mutual agreement.

Article 34 : This Concordat, whose German and Italian texts shall have equal binding force, shall be ratified and the certificates of ratification shall be exchanged as soon as possible. It will be enforced from the day of exchange. In witness hereof the plenipotentiaries (representatives) have signed this Concordat. Signed in the 2 original exemplars, in the Vatican City, on 30 July 1933. Signed : Eugenio, Cardinal Pacelli. Signed : Franz von Papen.

Article 33 makes provision for settling any difficulties in interpretation of the concordat through « amicable solution by mutual agreement » . Article 34 calls for the speedy ratification of the concordat. As the document states : It was not in force until its ratification on 10 September 1933.

Additional protocol was added at its signing. When the concordat was ratified on 10 September 1933, it granted Catholic clergy certain exemptions from any future universal army conscription call-ups.

As Article 27 states :

« A special and exempt ministry is conceded ... »

As the Treaty of Versailles had forbidden Germany from raising a large army. This provision may have been seen by Hitler as the Vatican giving its tacit approval to German re-armament.

Von Papen wrote to Hitler regarding this secret provision and concluded his brief with « I hope this agreement will therefore be pleasing to you » . The provisions of the annexe were inserted at the request of the German Bishops' Fulda Conference and the contents were kept so secret that Ernst von Weizsacker, State Secretary in the Foreign Ministry from 1938, did not know of it until informed by the Papal Nuncio Orsenigo in 1939.

The British Roman Catholic periodical « The Tablet » reported the signing of the Concordat :

« Already, it is being said that THE POPE OF ROME thinks of nobody save his own adherents and that he does not care how Lutherans are dragooned and how Jews are harried so long as Popish Bishops, monastic orders, confessional schools, and Catholic associations are allowed full-freedom. We beg our Protestant and Jewish friends to put away such suspicions. As we suggested at the outset of this brief article, the Catholic Church could have done little for other denominations in Germany if she had begun thrusting-out wild hands to help them while her own feet were slipping under her. By patience and reasonableness, she has succeeded in re-establishing herself, more firmly than before, on a Concordat which does not surrender one feather's weight of essential Catholic principle. She will straightway set about her sacred task, an important part of which will be the casting-out of those devils which have been raging (and are raging still) in the " Reich ". But " this sort " of devil is not cast-out save by prayer. Political action (from which the German clergy are debarred under the Concordat) by the Church would drive matters from bad to worse. We are confident, however, that Catholics will abhor the idea of enjoying complete toleration while Protestants and Jews are under the harrow, and that, quietly but strongly, the Catholic influence will be exerted in the right direction. 1 German out of 3 is a Catholic ; and Catholic prestige is high in Germany's public life. »

Criticism of the Concordat was initially from those countries who viewed Germany as a potential threat.

« Le Temps » wrote :

« This is a triumph for the National-Socialist government. It took Mussolini 5 years to achieve this ; Germany has done it in a week. »

« L'Ère Nouvelle » wrote :

« The contradiction of a system preaching universalism making an agreement with a highly-nationalistic State has been repeated throughout Vatican history. The Church never attacks existing institutions, even if they are bad. It prefers to wait for their collapse, hoping for the emergence of a higher-morality. »

The Polish newspaper « Kurjer Poranny » wrote on 19 July 1933 :

« Once again, we see the methods of the Vatican - intransigent with the passive and amenable, but accommodating with the high-handed and ruthless. In the last Century, it rewarded its persecutor, Bismarck, with the highest Papal decoration, the Order of Christ. The Centre Party, which most courageously resisted the Nazis, has been disowned by the Vatican. Ex-Chancellor Heinrich Brüning reported that 300 Protestant pastors who had been on the verge of joining the Catholic Church on account of the stand it had taken against the Nazis abandoned the plan after the signing of the Concordat. »

On 24 July, the Nazi newspaper « Völkischer Beobachter » commented :

« The provocative agitation which for years was conducted against the NSDAP because of its alleged hostility to religion has now been refuted by the Church itself. This fact signifies a tremendous moral strengthening of the National-Socialist government of the “ Reich ” and its reputation. »

On 26 and 27 July 1933, the Vatican daily newspaper « L'Osservatore Romano » stressed the advantages gained by the Church through the Concordat but also insisted that the Church had not given-up her traditional neutrality towards different forms of political government nor did it endorse a « specific trend of political doctrines or ideas » . The Nazis replied through the German press on 30 July by correcting perceived false interpretations of the Concordat and « reminding the Vatican » that the Concordat had been signed with the German « Reich » which « as Rome should know, is completely dominated by the National-Socialist trend » and, therefore, « the “ de facto ” and “ de jure ” recognition of the National-Socialist government » was signaled by the Concordat. The Vatican demanded that the German government dissociate itself from these remarks but agreed eventually to forget its complaints so long as the German press refrained from any further « harping on the great victory » achieved by Nazi Germany.

Nazi violations of the Concordat commenced almost immediately after it was signed. The Nazis claimed jurisdiction over all collective and social activity, interfering with Catholic schooling, youth groups, workers' clubs and cultural societies. Hitler had a « blatant disregard » for the Concordat, wrote Paul O'Shea, and its signing was to him merely a 1st step in the « gradual suppression of the Catholic Church in Germany » . Anton Gill wrote that « with his usual irresistible, bullying technique, Hitler then proceeded to take a mile where he had been given an inch » and closed all Catholic institutions whose functions weren't strictly religious :

« It quickly became clear that Hitler intended to imprison the Catholics, as it were, in their own churches. They could celebrate mass and retain their rituals as much as they liked, but they could have nothing at all to do with German society otherwise. Catholic schools and newspapers were closed, and a propaganda campaign against the Catholics was launched. »

(Extract from « An Honourable Defeat » by Anton Gill.)

According to Paul O'Shea, Hitler had a « blatant disregard » for the Concordat, and its signing was to him merely a 1st step in the « gradual suppression of the Catholic Church in Germany » . Almost immediately after signing the Concordat, the Nazis promulgated their sterilization law (the Law for the Prevention of Hereditarily Diseased Off-spring) an offensive policy in the eyes of the Catholic Church. Days later, moves began to dissolve the Catholic Youth League. Clergy, nuns and lay leaders began to be targeted, leading to thousands of arrests over the ensuing years, often on trumped-up charges of currency smuggling or « immorality » . Priests were watched closely and frequently denounced, arrested and sent to concentration camps. From 1940, a dedicated Clergy Barracks had been established at Dachau concentration camp. Intimidation of clergy was wide-spread. Cardinal Faulhaber was shot at. Cardinal Innitzer had his Vienna residence ransacked in October 1938 and Bishop Sproll of Rottenburg was jostled and his home vandalised.

William Shirer wrote that :

« The German people were not greatly aroused by the persecution of the churches by the Nazi Government. The great majority were not moved to face death or imprisonment for the sake of freedom of worship, being too impressed by

Hitler's early foreign policy successes and the restoration of the German economy. Few, he said, paused to reflect that the Nazi regime intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, if it could, and substitute the old paganism of the early tribal Germanic gods and the new paganism of the Nazi extremists. »

Anti-Nazi sentiment grew in Catholic circles as the Nazi government increased its repressive measures against their activities.

In his history of the German Resistance, Hoffmann writes that, from the beginning :

« The Catholic Church could not silently accept the general persecution, regimentation or oppression, nor in particular the sterilization law of summer 1933. Over the years, until the outbreak of War, Catholic resistance stiffened until finally its most eminent spokesman was the Pope himself with his Encyclical “ Mit brennender Sorge ” of 14 March 1937, read from all German Catholic pulpits. »

(Extract from « The History of the German Resistance 1933-1945 » by Peter Hoffmann.)

After constant confrontations, by late-1935, Bishop August von Galen of Munich was urging a joint pastoral letter protesting an « underground War » against the church. By early 1937, the church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, had become highly-disillusioned. In March, Pope Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical - accusing the Nazi Government of violations of the 1933 Concordat, and further that it was sowing the « tares of suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » . The Nazis responded with, an intensification of the « Church Struggle » , beginning around April.

When the Nazi government violated the concordat (in particular, Article 31) , the Bishops and the Papacy protested against these violations. Pius XI considered terminating the concordat, but his Secretary of State and members of the curia, who feared the impact upon German Catholics, dissuaded him, as they believed it would result in the loss of a protective shield. Cardinal Pacelli acknowledged his role in its retention after the War.

The flourishing Catholic press of Germany faced censorship and closure. Finally, in March 1941, Josef Gœbbels banned all Church press, on the pretext of a « paper shortage » . Catholic schools were a major battle-ground in the « Kirchenkampf » campaign against the Church. When, in 1933, the Nazi school superintendent of Münster issued a decree that religious instruction be combined with discussion of the « demoralising power » of the « people of Israel » , Bishop August von Galen of Munich refused, writing that such interference « in curriculum » was a breach of the Concordat and that he feared children would be confused as to their « obligation to act with charity to all men » and as to the historical mission of the people of Israel. Often, Galen protested directly to Hitler over violations of the Concordat. When, in 1936, Nazis removed crucifixes in school, protest by Galen led to public demonstration. Church kindergartens were closed, crucifixes were removed from schools and Catholic welfare programs were restricted on the basis they assisted the « racially unfit » . Parents were coerced into removing their children from Catholic schools. In Bavaria, teaching positions formerly allotted to nuns were awarded to secular teachers and denominational schools transformed into « Community schools ». When, in 1937, the authorities in Upper-Bavaria attempted to replace Catholic schools with « common schools », Cardinal Faulhaber offered fierce resistance. By 1939, all Catholic denominational schools had been disbanded or converted to public facilities.

From 1940, the « Gestapo » launched an intense persecution of the monasteries ; invading, searching and appropriating them. The Provincial of the Dominican Province of Teutonia, Laurentius Siemer, a spiritual leader of the German Resistance was influential in the Committee for Matters Relating to the Orders, which formed in response to Nazi attacks against Catholic monasteries and aimed to encourage the Bishops to intercede on behalf of the Orders and oppose the Nazi State more emphatically.

With the expansion of the War in the East from 1941, there came also an expansion of the regime's attack on the churches. Monasteries and convents were targeted and expropriation of Church properties surged. The Nazi authorities claimed that the properties were needed for War-time necessities such as hospitals, or accommodation for refugees or children, but, in fact, used them for their own purposes. « Hostility to the State » was another common cause give for the confiscations, and the action of a single member of a monastery could result in seizure of the whole. The Jesuits were especially targeted. The Papal Nuncio Cesare Orsenigo and Cardinal Bertram complained constantly to the authorities but were told to expect more requisitions owing to War-time needs.

Figures like Bishops August von Galen and Konrad von Preysing attempted to protect German priests from arrest. In Galen's famous 1941 anti-euthanasia sermons, he denounced the confiscations of church properties. He attacked the « Gestapo » for converting church properties to their own purposes - including use as cinemas and brothels. He protested the mistreatment of Catholics in Germany : the arrests and imprisonment without legal process, the suppression of the monasteries and the expulsion of religious orders.

On 22 March 1942, the German Bishops issued a pastoral letter on « The Struggle against Christianity and the Church ». The letter launched a defence of human rights and the rule of law and accused the « Reich » Government of « unjust oppression and hated struggle against Christianity and the Church », despite the loyalty of German Catholics to the Fatherland, and brave service of Catholic soldiers :

« For years, a War has raged in our Fatherland against Christianity and the Church, and has never been conducted with such bitterness. Repeatedly the German Bishops have asked the “ Reich ” Government to discontinue this fatal struggle ; but, unfortunately, our appeals and our endeavours were without success. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops, dated 22 March 1942.)

In July 1942, Hitler said he viewed the Concordat as obsolete, and intended to abolish it after the War, and only hesitated to withdraw Germany's representative from the Vatican out of « military reasons connected with the War » :

« Once the War is over, we will put a swift end to the Concordat. It will give me the greatest personal pleasure to point out to the Church all those occasions on which it has broken the terms of it. One need only recall the close cooperation between the Church and the murderers of Heydrich. Catholic priests not only allowed them to hide in a church on the outskirts of Prague, but even allowed them to entrench themselves in the sanctuary of the altar. »

(Adolf Hitler, from a transcript in « Hitler's Table Talk » , dated 4 July 1942.)

(This accusation by Hitler is unjustified, as the protectors of Heydrich's killers were actually Orthodox.)

Pius XII put a high-priority on preserving the Concordat from the Nazi era, although the Bishops were un-enthusiastic about it and the Allies considered the request inappropriate. After the War, the Concordat remained in place and the Church was restored to its previous position.

When Lower-Saxony adopted a new school law, the Holy-See complained that it violated the terms of the concordat. The federal government called upon the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany (« Bundesverfassungsgericht ») for clarification. In its ruling on 26 March 1957, the Court decided that the circumstances surrounding the conclusion of the concordat did not invalidate it.

Declaring itself incompetent in matters of public international law and considering the fact that the Basic Law grants authority in school matters to the States of Germany, it ruled that the federal government had no authority to intervene. So, while the federal government was obligated by the concordat, it could not enforce its application in all areas as it lacks legal authority to do so.

Critics also allege that the concordat undermined the separation of Church and State. The Weimar constitution (some of whose regulations, namely Articles 136 to 139 and 141, have been included into today's Basic Law by Article 140) does not speak of a « separation » , but rather rules-out any State religion while protecting religious freedom, religious holidays and leaving open the possibility of cooperation. However, there is an on-going conflict between Article 18 of the concordat and Article 138 of the Weimar constitution.

L'Église catholique d'Allemagne face au Nazisme

L'Église catholique d'Allemagne et le Nazisme traite des relations entre l'Église catholique allemande (notamment le clergé) et le pouvoir nazi depuis la période qui précède l'arrivée au pouvoir du Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands, en janvier 1933, jusqu'à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, en mai 1945.

Jusqu'en 1930, la hiérarchie épiscopale s'exprime peu sur le mouvement nazi en expansion. Peu à peu, la contagion des esprits par le néo-paganisme nazi et les succès électoraux du NSDAP, à partir de 1930, font apparaître l'urgence du danger aux yeux des catholiques.

Les évêques, par la voix de la Conférence Épiscopale de Fulda, sont alors amenés à prendre officiellement position en déclarant qu'on ne peut être à la fois catholique et nazi (1931) .

Arrivé au pouvoir en janvier 1933, Adolf Hitler signe dès le 20 juillet un concordat définissant les relations de l'État allemand avec l'Église catholique ce que l'ancien nonce apostolique à Berlin et futur Pie XII n'avait pu obtenir de la part de la République de Weimar, entraînant l'illusion chez beaucoup de catholiques d'un respect des Nazis pour les institutions catholiques.

Dès lors, l'attitude de l'Église catholique sera un mélange d'accommodement, de tentatives d'intégration à l'intérieur du système nazi d'une part (levée de l'interdiction faite en 1931 aux catholiques d'appartenir au Parti nazi en 1934) , et de résistances aux empiétements du pouvoir qui violaient le concordat, d'autre part.

En effet, pour le chancelier Hitler, le concordat doit être un moyen de neutraliser l'Église catholique.

Le concordat, signé « en dépit de nombreuses et graves considérations » afin d' « épargner à Nos fidèles fils et filles d'Allemagne, dans la mesure des possibilités humaines, les angoisses et les souffrances que dans l'autre hypothèse les circonstances du temps faisaient prévoir avec pleine certitude » et afin de ne pas refuser de « tendre la main pacifique et maternelle de l'Église à quiconque ne la repousse pas » (introduction de l'encyclique « Mit brennender Sorge » condamnant l'attitude du gouvernement nazi et son idéologie) , devient vite une pomme de discorde entre le 3^e « Reich » , le Vatican et la hiérarchie ecclésiastique allemande.

En moins de 4 ans, les évêques allemands enverront 55 protestations au chancelier (devenu président en 1935) .

L'incompatibilité de la doctrine nazie avec celle de l'Église est au cœur de l'encyclique « Mit brennender Sorge » rédigée pour le pape Pie XI en 1937 par Eugenio Pacelli, futur Pie XII et ancien nonce en Bavière. Il s'agit du 1^{er} texte condamnant officiellement l'idéologie nationale-socialiste écrit par un chef religieux.

Écrite en allemand (et non en latin comme le veut l'usage) , introduite clandestinement en Allemagne, elle est lue en chaire par tous les curés d'Allemagne le 21 mars à l'occasion du Dimanche des rameaux.

À la suite de sa lecture publique dans les églises, 1,100 prêtres sont arrêtés.

Face aux persécutions puis à la déportation et à l'extermination des Juifs, l'Église d'Allemagne intervient en faveur des Juifs convertis au christianisme ou mariés à des catholiques, mais reste pratiquement silencieuse publiquement concernant les Juifs non catholiques.

Pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les catholiques allemands se montrent de bons patriotes.

Finalement, ce n'est qu'au sujet de l'eugénisme que l'Église catholique d'Allemagne parvient à faire reculer le pouvoir nazi. En tout, on dénombre 3 à 4 fois plus de prêtres catholiques envoyés en camp de concentration que de pasteurs protestants, alors que ces derniers étaient, à l'époque, 3 fois plus nombreux que les prêtres.

Dans le courant des années 1870, un conflit, le « Kulturkampf » , avait opposé les catholiques au chancelier Otto von

Bismarck qui présentait les catholiques comme un corps étranger à la nation allemande. À partir de 1880, le conflit s'était apaisé, mais les catholiques allemands, minoritaires dans un pays à majorité protestante, en ont gardé une sorte de complexe d'infériorité qui les pousse à prouver sans cesse qu'ils sont de bons et loyaux patriotes allemands.

Dans l'Allemagne de l'après-guerre, vaincue et humiliée, les catholiques et, en particulier, les mouvements de jeunesse participent à la montée du nationalisme et se plaisent à rêver d'un Empire allemand (« Reich ») dans lequel les principes chrétiens occuperaient une place importante.

Les catholiques sont 20 millions, concentrés en Bavière et en Rhénanie, minoritaires vis-à-vis des 40 millions de protestants. C'est une minorité que l'on peut qualifier d'active et de vigoureuse si l'on prend en compte ses 20,000 prêtres et ses 100,000 religieux (qui se comparent aux 16,000 pasteurs protestants), ainsi que ses organisations de masse comme la Ligue populaire des catholiques allemands (« Volksverein für das Katholische Deutschland ») qui regroupe 500,000 membres et 4,500 associations affiliées, ou encore ses mouvements de jeunesse (« Jugend Deutschland ») qui compte 1,500,000 adhérents en 1933.

À cela, il faut ajouter une presse, des écoles confessionnelles, et un Parti, le « Zentrum », qui recueillait plus de 80 % des suffrages catholiques au moment du « Kulturkampf », mais qui, sous la République de Weimar, n'en recueille plus que 60 %. Cependant, une disposition héritée du « Kulturkampf » interdit aux ecclésiastiques, sous peine d'un emprisonnement pouvant aller jusqu'à 2 ans, de prendre des positions politiques dans le cadre de leurs fonctions (donc notamment lors des sermons) : c'est le « Kanzelparagraph » , en vigueur depuis 1871.

Au début des années 1920, les évêques allemands sont majoritairement conservateurs et monarchistes. En 1922, lors de l'ouverture d'un Congrès national de catholiques, le cardinal von Faulhaber, archevêque de Munich qualifie la révolution de novembre 1918 qui avait renversé la monarchie d'« acte de haute trahison ».

Tout au long des années 1920, une minorité de catholiques fait corps avec le Parti national-socialiste (NSDAP) naissant. Ils sont attirés par l'anti-communisme, l'anti-libéralisme, l'anti-parlementarisme et l'anti-pacifisme du nouveau Parti.

Aux prêtres engagés dans l'aventure hitlérienne, la hiérarchie conseille de se montrer prudents. La hiérarchie épiscopale s'exprime peu sur le mouvement nazi en expansion. L'article 24 du programme du NSDAP demande « la liberté pour toutes les religions constituées dans la mesure où elles ne représentent pas un danger pour l'État ; le Parti soutient le christianisme positif » .

Interrogé par les journalistes catalans Eugenio Xammar et Josep Pla dans la journée du 8 novembre 1923 précédant le « Putsch de la brasserie », Adolf Hitler fait grief à Gustav von Kahr d'être trop timide dans le domaine des mesures anti-juives et attribue cette attitude au catholicisme de Gustav von Kahr, à la position du Vatican et à la « conspiration catholico-juive » .

En 1930, dans « le Mythe du XXe siècle », le théoricien nazi Alfred Rosenberg explique ce qu'il faut entendre par Christianisme positif : Il s'agit de créer une Église allemande, ancrée dans les forces issues du sang, de la race et du sol, fondée sur un Nouveau Testament expurgé de superstitions, et libérée de l'Ancien Testament. Les écrits et les discours d'Adolf Hitler lui-même se montrent modérés vis-à-vis du catholicisme, entretenant ainsi aux yeux des catholiques une vision du « bon Führer » entouré de mauvais conseillers.

Aux élections de 1930, le NSDAP obtient, avec 18,5 % des voix, son 1^{er} succès électoral important. Le succès des Nazis est plus faible dans les régions à majorité catholique. Il n'empêche, le Parti nazi apparaît maintenant aux yeux des catholiques comme un rival du « Zentrum » et les évêques sont amenés à prendre position contre le Nazisme.

En novembre 1930, l'évêque de Mayence Monseigneur Ludwig Maria Hugo apporte son soutien à l'un de ses prêtres qui avait expliqué à ses paroissiens qu'il était interdit d'appartenir au Parti nazi, mais le même mois, Monseigneur Schreiber, évêque de Berlin, soutient la proposition inverse.

Le 5 mars 1931, une déclaration signée des 6 évêques de la province de Cologne assimile les erreurs du National-Socialisme à celles de l'Action française. Les évêques de Cologne ne soulèvent pas la question des conséquences pour un catholique d'adhérer au NSDAP. Toujours en mars 1931, les 3 évêques de la province de Paderborn déclarent inadmissible pour un catholique l'adhésion au Parti nazi et les évêques de Haute-Rhénanie adoptent une position similaire.

Les évêques allemands avaient l'habitude de se réunir régulièrement dans la petite ville de Fulda. La conférence de Fulda d'août 1931 n'adopte pas un amendement qui propose d'étendre au Parti nazi une directive de 1921 qui interdisait au catholique l'adhésion à des organisations qui poursuivaient des objectifs hostiles au christianisme : socialisme, franc-maçonnerie ou tout autre mouvement. La conférence de Fulda d'août 1931 adopte le texte suivant qui prend position contre le Nazisme :

« La lutte contre l'extrémisme, c'est-à-dire aussi bien contre l'extrémisme nationaliste que contre le socialisme et le communisme, doit être menée avec les données de la foi. »

Parallèlement à la prise de position des évêques, les représentants de toutes les grandes organisations catholiques se réunissent sous les auspices du VKD pour discuter des moyens d'endiguer la marée brune.

Les résultats des délibérations, publiés en 1931, reflètent une sorte de surenchère au nationalisme : le souhait est émis de créer un vaste mouvement populaire qui appuierait la campagne menée pour libérer le pays des chaînes du traité de Versailles, qui placerait les valeurs éducatives et nationales au centre des activités éducatives, qui accorderait plus d'attention aux minorités allemandes d'Europe centrale. Il est également noté que le peuple allemand doit se libérer de son assouvissement « à la ploutocratie et au capitalisme financier » .

Günter Lewy note :

« Il semble que ces dirigeants catholiques n'aient pas songé un seul instant qu'ils essayaient d'exorciser le démon avec l'aide de Belzébuth. »

Le monde catholique allemand n'est pas uniforme, et il a existé en son sein des critiques totales du Nazisme, mais la majorité des polémistes catholiques dirigent leurs coups contre le communisme. La plupart des critiques catholiques voient dans le Nazisme un fond sain, celui du nationalisme et de l'anti-bolchévisme, perverti par des éléments anti-chrétiens. Ils regrettent qu'il ait pris le caractère d'une philosophie de la vie, d'une « Weltanschauung » au lieu de rester un mouvement patriotique. La menace contre la démocratie n'inquiète pas vraiment les prélats catholiques qui sont souvent restés hostiles à la République de Weimar. L'opposition du Parti nazi aux écoles confessionnelles inquiète davantage l'Église que la menace dictatoriale.

En dehors des prises de position plus ou moins philosophiques, la participation des SA en uniforme est un motif de conflit entre l'Église catholique et les Nazis.

Les évêques bavarois, réunis à Freising le 12 février 1931, interdisent aux prêtres de prendre part au mouvement nazi, interdisent la présence de formations national-socialistes en uniforme dans les offices et mettent en garde les fidèles contre le National-Socialisme « aussi longtemps qu'il adhérera à un programme religieux et culturel incompatible avec la doctrine catholique » .

Entre 1928 et 1931, le Parti du centre catholique qui est la charnière des majorités parlementaires de la République de Weimar bascule du côté de son aile droite. Ludwig Kaas, un ecclésiastique, est élu à la tête du Parti. Avec son aide, Heinrich Brüning devient chef du groupe parlementaire et sa nomination comme chancelier en 1930 signifie la dislocation de la grande coalition qui en réunissant avec le Parti du Centre, les Sociaux-Démocrates, et le Parti du Peuple qui avait formé l'ossature de la République de Weimar. Brüning qui déclare être responsable devant la Nation davantage que devant le Parlement gouverne souvent par décret et conformément à la stratégie catholique, mène une politique étrangère nationaliste pour ne pas laisser ce terrain aux seuls Nazis. Aux élections de juillet 1932, ces derniers obtiennent 37,4 % des voix. Le Parti du Centre et son allié bavarois en obtiennent 15 % , soit 13 millions de voix, ce qui n'est pas un mauvais résultat, mais on estime que 2 millions de catholiques ont quand même voté pour les Nazis. La conférence des évêques de Fulda confirme quand même qu'il est « inexcusable que beaucoup de catholiques rejoignent le Parti national-socialiste » .

Le 30 mai 1932, le président Hindenburg renvoie Heinrich Brüning et le remplace par Franz von Papen, un catholique intrigant, membre du Parti du Centre et immédiatement exclu du Parti, mais des négociations se poursuivent entre Adolf Hitler et Brüning en vue de former un gouvernement d'union nationale. Ces contacts aboutissent dans un lers temps à l'élection du Nazi Hermann Göring à la présidence du « Reichstag » .

Ces négociations sèment la consternation parmi beaucoup de catholiques, notamment les membres du clergé qui voient de plus en plus de Nazis assister ostensiblement, en uniforme, aux offices catholiques.

Le 30 janvier 1933, appelé par Hindenburg et soutenu par von Papen, Hitler devient le dernier chancelier de la République de Weimar. En quelques mois, tous les éléments de la vie démocratique allemande sont démontés. Le processus par lequel le Nazisme s'attache à éradiquer toutes les formes d'expression indépendantes de la société s'appelle la « Gleichschaltung » . Les diverses institutions catholiques seront naturellement concernées. Aux élections de mars 1933, le NSDAP, avec 44 % des voix, n'a pas encore la majorité absolue. Pour s'opposer à Hitler, une alliance entre tous les autres Partis, incluant, entre autres, le Centre et les communistes du KPD est, à cette époque, complètement inenvisageable. Le 23 mars, les députés du Centre votent les pleins pouvoirs à Hitler.

Un courant dans le Nazisme représenté par exemple par Alfred Rosenberg, nourrit des projets de fonder un « christianisme allemand » , projets qui sont condamnés en 1937 dans le chapitre « Vraie Foi en Dieu » de l'encyclique « Mit brennender Sorge » :

« Prenez garde, Vénérables Frères, qu'avant toute autre chose la foi en Dieu, premier et irremplaçable fondement de toute religion, soit conservée en Allemagne, pure et sans falsification. Ne croit pas en Dieu celui qui se contente de faire usage du mot Dieu dans ses discours, mais celui-là seulement qui à ce mot sacré unit le vrai et digne concept de la Divinité. Quiconque identifie, dans une confusion panthéistique, Dieu et l'univers, abaissant Dieu aux dimensions du monde ou élevant le monde à celles de Dieu, n'est pas de ceux qui croient en Dieu. » , écrit le pape condamnant ainsi l'idée d'un dieu « national » avant de brocarder « une prétendue conception des anciens Germains » .

Personnellement, Hitler se moque du christianisme plus encore que Rosenberg. Il préférera encourager l'établissement d'une mythologie encore assez vague de la « germanité. »

Hitler déclare au financier Hjalmar Schacht :

« J'ai toujours dit à Rosenberg qu'on ne s'attaque ni aux soutanes, ni aux jupons. »

Le pape Pie XI mène une politique très active de négociation et de signature de concordats ; 18 seront signés au cours de son pontificat. Il en négocie avec tous types de régimes : autoritaires, démocratiques, socialistes (comme l'URSS) ou fascistes (comme l'Italie) , en parvenant souvent à un accord. Par cette politique, il cherche à protéger les catholiques et préserver les institutions de l'Église et de la famille chrétienne, dans 2 domaines en particulier : l'éducation et le mariage.

La recherche d'un concordat avec l'Allemagne s'inscrit dans la continuité de concordats signés avec plusieurs « Länder » : la Bavière (29 mars 1924) ; la Prusse (24 juin 1929) ; et le pays de Bade (12 décembre 1932) , tous dans des conditions globalement favorables à l'Église catholique. Le nonce apostolique en Allemagne, Monseigneur Pacelli, acteur des concordats précédents, avait engagé des négociations avec la République de Weimar dès le début des années 1920 pour obtenir un accord au niveau fédéral, mais les différents projets n'ont jamais pu faire l'objet d'un consensus parmi les Partis non catholiques du « Reichstag » .

L'arrivée du Parti nazi au pouvoir, en janvier 1933, change la donne. Aux côtés d'Hitler, Franz von Papen est nommé vice-chancelier. Pie XI relance les négociations au mois de mars, pour un accord au niveau fédéral. Il s'appuie sur Monseigneur Pacelli, devenu secrétaire d'État du Vatican ; Monseigneur Gröber, archevêque de Fribourg ; et Monseigneur Kaas, président du « Zentrum » . Les négociations se déroulent très rapidement. Le 20 juillet, la convention est signée.

Von Papen y voit une grande victoire contre le bolchévisme ; Pie XI un accord « inattendu et inespéré » évitant un nouveau « Kulturkampf » .

Si le « Zentrum » disparaît, l'Église catholique romaine est reconnue pour la 1re fois dans l'ensemble du « Reich » ; les associations, les œuvres de jeunesse, l'école confessionnelle se voient accorder des garanties ; les biens confisqués sont restitués.

Autour du concordat s'articule ce que Günter Lewy a appelé la « grande réconciliation » des catholiques et des Nazis. Après une période qui avait vu l'Église se positionner contre le NSDAP, par exemple, en interdisant l'adhésion à ses fidèles, les années 1933-1934 sont celles de la levée des interdits. En juin 1933, juste avant la signature officielle du concordat, une nouvelle conférence épiscopale se tient à Fulda et aboutit à une lettre pastorale signée de 3 cardinaux (Bertram, Faulhaber, Schulte) , d'un archevêque (Gröber) et de 2 évêques (Ehrenfried et Preysing) .

Cette lettre situe la gravité du contexte, de vieilles institutions qui disparaissent et un nouvel État qui prend forme, rappelle l'amour que les catholiques allemands ont toujours porté à leur patrie, font une analyse plutôt positive du nouveau régime :

« Notre Sainte Église catholique attache une valeur et une signification particulière au principe d'autorité. Nous autres, catholiques, nous n'éprouvons aucune difficulté à rendre hommage à la manière nouvelle et vigoureuse dont on insiste sur le principe d'autorité dans l'État allemand. »

La lettre émet bien une petite réserve en forme de souhait que l'État, prenant exemple sur l'Église, « ne limiterait la liberté humaine que dans la mesure où l'exigerait le bien commun » , mais finalement, les évêques se réjouissent des efforts des nouvelles autorités pour libérer le peuple allemand :

« Après des années de servitude, la nation allemande doit de nouveau avoir, dans la famille des nations la liberté et la place d'honneur qui lui sont dues, à cause de son importance numérique, de ces capacités et de ses réalisations culturelles. »

Ainsi, les évêques catholiques, pris en corps constitué, ne réagissent pas à l'instauration d'un régime à Parti unique, ils parlent d'un renouveau moral au moment où se déchaîne la terreur brune. À cette époque, il est vrai, les églises protestantes, la plupart des intellectuels, et bien des gens à l'étranger ne montrent pas plus de flair politique.

C'est cet aveuglement (parallèle à de nombreuses résistances, il est vrai) que dénonce le pape en 1937 lorsqu'il écrit :

« Mais la franchise qui convient à Notre charge apostolique, si pleine de responsabilités, et la décision de mettre sous vos yeux et sous les yeux de tout l'univers chrétien la réalité dans toute sa gravité Nous obligent d'ajouter :

“ Il n'est pas de plus grand chagrin, ni de douleur plus amère à Notre cœur de Pasteur, que d'apprendre que beaucoup abandonnent le chemin de la vérité. ” »

(Encyclique « Mit brennender Sorge » ; page 17.)

Dans les années 1933-1938, l'établissement de l'État totalitaire nazi va nécessairement aller à l'encontre de l'indépendance des Églises et des dispositions prévues par le concordat. Face à cette situation, l'attitude de l'Église catholique sera un mélange d'accommodement, de tentatives d'intégration à l'intérieur du système nazi, d'une part ; et de résistances aux empiètements du pouvoir qui violaient le concordat, d'autre part.

Les motifs de conflits apparaissent dès l'année 1933 où la terreur à laquelle sont soumis tous les ennemis des Nazis et opposants potentiels n'épargnent pas les prêtres, nombreux à être arrêtés. À Munich, pour stopper l'arrestation de prêtres, le délégué spécial SA exige à la fois la réhabilitation d'un prêtre suspendu pour avoir publié un article pro-nazi et la destitution du Docteur Emil Mulher, un anti-Nazi qui est à la tête de l'action catholique. Le cardinal Faulhaber cède sur les 2 points. Mulher sera finalement arrêté le 29 novembre 1933 pour avoir répandu des récits sur les atrocités commises dans les nouveaux camps de concentration de Dachau.

Le 28 juin 1933, une vague d'arrestations déferle sur la Bavière, 1,900 personnes sont arrêtées parmi lesquelles beaucoup de notabilités catholiques. Ce n'est qu'après que le Parti du Peuple (Parti catholique bavarois) proclame sa dissolution, le 4 juillet, que les prisonniers sont relâchés.

La signature du concordat et sa ratification le 10 septembre marque une détente dans les relations entre l'Église et le nouveau pouvoir, mais le démantèlement d'une grande partie des organisations catholiques va créer une situation de contentieux permanent. Les « Jeunesses hitlériennes » (« Hitler-Jugend »), créées en 1933, ont vocation à accueillir tous les jeunes Allemands. Leur chef Baldur von Schirach avait interdit la double appartenance aux « Jeunesses hitlériennes » et aux Jeunesses catholiques. Des négociations se déroulent jusqu'au mois de juin 1934 pour parvenir à un accord sur l'application de l'article 31 du concordat : toutes les associations sportives et ouvrières gravitant autour de l'Église sont incorporées à l'Action catholique qui est censée limiter ses actions au domaine purement religieux, culturels ou charitables. Les dirigeants possédant un passé politique doivent être remplacés. Pendant tout le temps des négociations, les « Jeunesses hitlériennes » avaient entrepris une vaste campagne de recrutement en appelant les jeunes catholiques à abandonner leurs dirigeants.

Au lendemain de cet accord surviennent les événements du 30 juin connus sous le nom de « Nuit des Longs Couteaux » et qui ne sont pas seulement un règlement de comptes contre le chef des SA, Ernst Röhm. Des personnalités catholiques sont assassinées : Erich Klausener, chef de l'Action Catholique de Berlin ; Adalbert Probst, chef de l'organisation sportive catholique ; Kuno Kamphausen, ancien membre du « Zentrum » ; Edgar J. Jung, avocat munichois qui œuvrait à la destitution du nouveau chancelier et voulait rétablir un « Reich » chrétien et fédéral ; Fritz Gerlich, calviniste converti au catholicisme, dont le journal était en possession de documents compromettants pour les Nazis.

Le 27 avril 1934, le chef de la « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » (Front allemand du travail, sorte de syndicat officiel) interdit la double appartenance à la « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » et aux organisations catholiques ouvrières. Comme il est indispensable d'appartenir à la « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » pour trouver un emploi, cette décision implique la mort de toutes les associations ouvrières catholiques.

En juillet 1935, le ministre de l'intérieur Wilhelm Frick lance une nouvelle campagne contre les organisations catholiques. Les évêques envoient une lettre à Adolf Hitler, menacent de recommander aux fidèles de ne plus envoyer leurs enfants aux « Jeunesses hitlériennes », ce qui s'avère impossible, car les pressions exercées sur les parents sont bien trop fortes. La dissolution des associations d'étudiants catholiques devra attendre 1938.

Tout au long des incessantes négociations entre l'Église allemande et le pouvoir, la position de l'Église peut se formuler ainsi :

« Les dirigeants des associations catholiques servent le peuple allemand et la patrie avec courage, abnégation et fidélité, ils refusent toute conduite subversive, s'abstiennent de toute activité politique, se montrent résolu à repousser les avances que pourraient tenter les communistes. Les catholiques ne fomentent pas de révoltes et n'offrent pas de résistance violente. »

Toutes les restrictions imposées par les Nazis aux associations catholiques et les violations du concordat étaient un motif de conflit entre les autorités du 3e « Reich » et l'Église, et d'une façon générale, les évêques auraient été plus enclins au compromis que Monseigneur Pacelli, secrétaire d'État, c'est-à-dire chef de la diplomatie du Vatican et signataire du concordat de 1933. Pour ce dernier, le concordat est un traité entre l'Allemagne et l'Église catholique qu'il convient de faire respecter avec fermeté. Une autre source de conflit entre l'Église et les Nazis est de nature doctrinale : des évêques allemands s'étaient plu à voir dans le chancelier Hitler un homme de dialogue, et dans Rosenberg un idéologue que l'on pouvait espérer marginaliser. Rosenberg avait publié en 1930 « le Mythe du XXe siècle » qui donnait des bases théoriques à l'idéologie raciste nazie et développait des idées néo-paganistes et ne concevait la religion que comme devant être fondée sur le sang et la race.

Le 20 janvier 1934, Rosenberg est nommé représentant du « Führer », chargé de superviser la vie spirituelle et idéologique du Parti national-socialiste. Tout en prétendant ne pas critiquer l'État, mais simplement le néo-paganisme de certains dirigeants du Parti, les évêques allemands répliquent aux thèses de Rosenberg, d'abord dans une lettre pastorale de juin 1934, mais la « Gestapo » confisque les invendus et en interdit la publication dans la presse sous prétexte qu'elle est de nature à troubler l'ordre public, ensuite, dans un supplément de la Gazette diocésaine d'octobre de Münster, le diocèse de Monseigneur von Galen qui, dans la préface, recommande explicitement cet ouvrage au clergé. Les auteurs de ce supplément intitulé « Studien zum Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts » restent dans l'anonymat, mais soumettent le livre de Rosenberg à une critique érudite et sévère. Des extraits des « Studien » sont également publiés dans la Gazette diocésaine du cardinal Schulte, à Cologne. La brochure, en tirant à 100,000 exemplaires peut toucher un vaste public. Dans les mois qui suivent, le débat se poursuit de diverses façons : lettres pastorales, lettre à Hitler, mise à l'index des ouvrages de Rosenberg.

En guise de compromis, pour enrayer une possible défection des catholiques, la « Gestapo » interdit des réunions du mouvement néo-païen de Ludendorf, marginal vis-à-vis du NSDAP, mais les doctrines de Rosenberg continuent d'être propagées à une grande échelle et, en outre, le régime intensifie ses attaques contre les ordres religieux en ordonnant des poursuites pour perversions sexuelles. Simultanément, les parents catholiques font l'objet de pressions considérables pour ne plus envoyer leurs enfants dans les écoles confessionnelles, ce qui entraîne la liquidation de la plupart d'entre elles.

En 1935, le théologien Erik Peterson, récemment converti au catholicisme, publie l'étude « Le monothéisme comme problème politique », dans laquelle il s'oppose à la théologie politique de Carl Schmitt, devenu à cette époque le principal porte-parole d'une sorte de Nazisme théologique.

C'est dans ce contexte qu'est élaborée par le cardinal Pacelli et plusieurs évêques allemands l'encyclique, « Mit brennender Sorge ». Au printemps 1937, elle est signée par le pape Pie XI, introduite clandestinement en Allemagne, imprimée secrètement, distribuée par messagers, et finalement lue en chaire le 21 mars, dimanche des Rameaux, dans toutes les églises du « Reich ».

La croyance en un Dieu national, le rejet de l'Ancien Testament et l'établissement d'une église nationale sont désignés comme des erreurs, le Dieu chrétien ne peut pas être emprisonné « dans les frontières d'un peuple particulier, dans les origines d'une race particulière ». Le texte condamne essentiellement le néo-paganisme, le mythe du « Sang et de la Race », le culte du chef et le déni de liberté religieuse. Écrire que les lois humaines contraires à la loi naturelle ne sont pas « obligatoires en conscience » a évidemment été considéré comme une attaque contre le régime, mais le totalitarisme politique et social n'est pas explicitement condamné.

Monseigneur Pacelli s'en expliquera plus tard avec le gouvernement allemand :

« Le Saint-Siège entretient des rapports amicaux, corrects ou au moins passables avec des États possédant diverses formes et orientations constitutionnelles. En ce qui concerne l'Allemagne, il est constamment demeuré fidèle à ce principe et entend continuer à l'être. »

Pie XI souligne que :

« Nous ne souhaitons, ni Nous rendre coupable, par un silence inopportun, de n'avoir point clarifié la situation, ni endurcir par une excessive sévérité le cœur de ceux qui sont placés sous Notre responsabilité pastorale, bien qu'actuellement, ils s'éloignent de nous. »

C'est qu'effectivement, la propagande anti-catholique menée par les Nazis obtient des résultats. Les défections, si elles ne sont pas catastrophiques sont quand même substantielles.

En avril 1938, La Sacrée congrégation des séminaires et universités publie à la demande de Pie XI un Syllabus condamnant les théories racistes qui est adressé aux établissements catholiques du monde entier. Philippe Chenaux qui fait référence au syllabus ne précise pas comment il a été diffusé en Allemagne.

Relativement fermes sur le plan doctrinal, et soutenus en cela par le pape, les catholiques allemands prennent le risque d'un affrontement avec le pouvoir, mais d'un autre côté, ils revendiquent un patriotisme sans faille, et en tant qu'Allemands, se montrent vis-à-vis du même pouvoir comme les plus loyaux des sujets. Les évêques approuvent pratiquement toutes les actions d'Hitler en matière de politique étrangère : non seulement les évêques applaudissent la remilitarisation de la Rhénanie, mais dans une lettre pastorale collective le 19 août 1936, ils approuvent l'intervention de l'Allemagne dans la guerre d'Espagne :

« Puisse notre “ Führer ”, avec l'aide de Dieu, mener à bien cette entreprise terriblement ardue. »

Ils acceptent, et certains, joyeusement, de faire sonner les cloches le 10 avril 1938 pour célébrer l' « Anschluß » qui regroupe à l'intérieur du « Reich » les Autrichiens en majorité catholiques. L'évêque autrichien Theodor Innitzer est allé tellement loin dans son soutien à l' « Anschluß », qu'il est convoqué à Rome pour y être réprimandé et signer une mise au point.

Le 1er octobre 1938, conformément aux accords de Munich, les troupes allemandes pénètrent en Tchécoslovaquie et occupent le territoire des Sudètes. Ce même jour, sur proposition du Cardinal Faulhaber, au nom de tous les cardinaux allemands, le Cardinal Bertram envoie un télégramme de félicitations à Hitler :

« Le haut-fait d'avoir sauvé la paix internationale incite l'épiscopat allemand à offrir respectueusement ses félicitations et ses remerciements, et à ordonner un carillon de fête pour ce dimanche. »

Le patriotisme des catholiques allemands ne faiblit pas tout au long de la Guerre de 1939-1945. Juste après le début des hostilités, en septembre 1939, une lettre pastorale invite les catholiques allemands à faire leur devoir de soldats :

« Nous exhortons les catholiques à faire leur devoir de soldats et à tout sacrifier d'eux-mêmes, en obéissance au “ Führer ”. Nous faisons appel aux fidèles pour qu'ils prient ardemment la divine Providence afin qu'elle conduise la patrie et le peuple à un bienheureux succès et à la paix. »

Le 30 septembre, les évêques obéissent à l'injonction du ministre des Affaires Ecclésiastiques de faire sonner les cloches pendant 7 jours pour célébrer la victoire sur la Pologne. Au même moment, Radio Vatican et l' « Osservatore Romano » diffusent dans le monde entier des informations sur les atrocités commises par les Allemands en Pologne. Quelques mois plus tard, en juin 1940, les cloches carillonnent à nouveau pendant une semaine pour fêter la victoire sur la France.

À la fin de l'année, le ministère de la Propagande fait savoir à l'épiscopat allemand que l'État compte sur un soutien plus enthousiaste de la part des ecclésiastiques. Pendant les mois qui suivent, certains évêques ne se contentent plus de demander à prier « pour une victoire profitable à l'Allemagne », mais « pour la victoire de l'Allemagne » .

Après l'invasion de l'URSS, en juin 1941, l'épiscopat se fait de nouveau rappeler à l'ordre par Kerrle, ministre de Affaires ecclésiastiques, qui s'attendait un soutien plus énergique à la « lutte contre le bolchévisme ». La lettre pastorale collective des évêques allemands réunis à Fulda, lue dans toutes les églises du « Reich », le 26 juin 1941, qui prône la désobéissance civile provoque la fureur des autorités :

« Jamais, en aucune circonstance, un homme ne peut, sauf en cas de guerre ou de légitime défense, mettre à mort une personne innocente. »

Cette lettre est suivie des 2 sermons de l'évêque de Münster Monseigneur von Galen (du 6 juillet et du 3 août) contre la politique eugéniste du pouvoir. Cependant le même Monseigneur Galen exprime à plusieurs reprises son espoir en une victoire allemande.

En 1942, Adolf Hitler déclare :

« Si, à Poitiers, Charles Martel avait été battu, le monde aurait changé de face. Puisque le monde était déjà condamné à l'influence judaïque (et à son sous-produit le christianisme, une chose si insipide) , il aurait mieux valu que l'islam triomphe. Cette religion récompense l'héroïsme, promet au guerrier les joies du 7e Ciel. Animé d'un esprit semblable, les Germains auraient conquis le monde. Ils en ont été empêchés par le christianisme. »

À partir de 1943, de nombreux fonctionnaires allemands consignent dans leurs rapports la tiédeur de l'Église et se plaignent que l'Église ne prie plus pour la victoire, mais seulement pour une paix prochaine. La tiédeur de l'Église allemande vis-à-vis de l'effort de guerre nazi n'empêche pas Monseigneur Jäger, évêque de Paderborn, de demander à ses fidèles de contribuer à la lutte engagée contre les 2 grands ennemis de l'Allemagne : le Libéralisme et l'individualisme, d'une part ; le collectivisme, d'autre part.

La question des aumôniers militaires avait été une pierre d'achoppement au moment de la signature du concordat de 1933. Les Nazis étaient, a priori, peu favorables à la présence de l'Église dans l'armée, et l'Église entendait bien que les aumôniers conservent une indépendance vis-à-vis de la hiérarchie militaire. À l'approche de la Guerre, les Nazis se montrent plus conciliants.

En novembre 1936, au cours d'un entretien, Adolf Hitler avait déclaré au Cardinal von Faulhaber :

« Un homme n'existe pas s'il ne croit pas en Dieu. Un soldat qui subit un bombardement intense pendant 4 jours a besoin de croire en Dieu. »

Ce n'est qu'en février 1938 qu'intervient la nomination d'un aumônier général de l'armée qui doit, selon le concordat, faire l'objet d'un accord mutuel. À leur corps défendant, les évêques ont dû accepter le nom de Franz Josef Rarkowski et lui donner rang d'évêque. Rarkowski faisait déjà fonction de chef de l'aumônerie militaire depuis 1929 et il affichait des opinions très proches de celles des Nazis. Les évêques le considéraient comme un arriviste d'un niveau intellectuel inférieur au leur. Pendant toute la durée de la Guerre, la loyauté de Rarkowski au « Führer » sera sans faille.

Lors de son incorporation, tout soldat doit prononcer un serment d'allégeance à Hitler :

« Je jure solennellement devant Dieu d'obéir inconditionnellement au " Führer " du " Reich " et du peuple allemand, Adolf Hitler. »

Selon la doctrine catholique, que soutenaient les évêques, un serment ne peut pas justifier ce qui est par ailleurs moralement condamnable, et un chrétien se trouve délié de son serment si ce dernier entre en conflit avec ce qui est dû à Dieu. Dans ses lettres pastorales, Rarkowski maintient une position toute différente selon laquelle le soldat catholique est tenu par son serment. Dans une de ces lettres, Rarkowski admet que la lutte contre l' « Untermenschen » (sous-homme) bolchévique soumet l'âme du soldat allemand à de sévères épreuves, et demande aux combattants de se préserver de toute perversion et de toute dégradation. Ces restrictions mentales n'ont pas cours lors des offices divins célébrés dans les camps militaires où la soumission au « Führer » est considérée comme un devoir sacré.

Dans tout le « Reich » allemand, seuls 7 catholiques refusent de servir militairement leur pays. 6 sont exécutés et le 7e est déclaré fou. Parmi les 6 exécutés, il y a un prêtre, Franz Reinisch. L'aumônier de la prison lui refuse la communion sous le prétexte qu'il a violé son devoir de chrétien en refusant de prêter le serment d'allégeance à Hitler.

Une politique eugénique a été prônée par les nazis dès les années 1920 :

« Si chaque année, l'Allemagne avait 1 million d'enfants et en éliminait 7 ou 8 cent mille parmi les plus faibles, le résultat final serait probablement un accroissement de notre force nationale. »

L'eugénisme mis en œuvre par les Nazis est un sujet d'affrontement permanent avec l'Église catholique allemande qui la déclare contraire à l'encyclique « Casti Conubii » publiée par Pie XI, le 31 décembre 1930. La promulgation de la Ire loi eugénique ordonnant la stérilisation obligatoire de toutes les personnes affligées de certaines maladies ou infirmités est différée après la signature du concordat, mais elle entre en vigueur dès le 1er janvier 1934. 32,268 stérilisations sont effectuées en 1934 ; 73,174 en 1935 ; et 63,547 en 1936. Des négociations menées entre l'épiscopat et le ministère de l'Intérieur aboutissent à exempter les directeurs d'établissements catholiques de solliciter la stérilisation de malades confiés à leurs soins. Le Cardinal Bertram, représentant naturel de l'épiscopat allemand en tant que président de la conférence de Fulda, renonce à un projet de lettre pastorale sous la pression du vice-chancelier Franz von Papen. Finalement, en janvier 1934, une lettre est lue dans les églises d'Allemagne, expliquant, sans toutefois faire allusion à la nouvelle loi, qu'il était défendu de se faire stériliser volontairement ou de provoquer la stérilisation d'autrui. Dans sa lettre pastorale de janvier 1934, Monseigneur von Galen, évêque de Münster, attaque plus explicitement et plus violemment la loi nazie. Face au ministre de l'Intérieur Frick, rendu furieux contre cette incitation pour les citoyens à pratiquer la désobéissance, le Cardinal Faulhaber assume l'attitude contestatrice de l'Église.

Dans la pratique, cette attitude relativement claire soulève un certain nombre de problèmes : par exemple, quelle doit être l'attitude des confesseurs face à des fonctionnaires ayant participé à l'application de la loi ? Les évêques apportent à ces questions une réponse moins claire que ne l'aurait souhaité le Vatican. Une laborieuse casuistique octroie le droit de signaler aux autorités les malades devant être stérilisés aux médecins catholiques et aux employés des services sociaux qui peuvent ainsi garder leur emploi. Par contre, établir un dossier demandant la stérilisation de quelqu'un est un acte de « collaboration formelle », réprouvé. En 1940, le Saint-Office tolère la participation d'infirmiers à des opérations de stérilisation s'ils sont menacés de perdre leur emploi et si un autre infirmier le ferait s'ils ne le faisaient pas.

Le 1er septembre 1939, Adolf Hitler franchit la limite qui sépare l'eugénisme de l'euthanasie en donnant l'ordre de tuer toutes les personnes atteintes de maladies incurables. De septembre 1939 à août 1941, environ 70,000 malades, souvent des déficients mentaux ou des déments incurables, seront gazés.

Le programme d'euthanasie est classé ultra-secret, mais des informations filtrent assez rapidement, entraînant des protestations du Cardinal Bertram auprès des autorités en août 1940, et du Cardinal Faulhaber quelques mois plus tard. Des ecclésiastiques protestants élèvent également des protestations, mais le gouvernement poursuit son programme de massacre.

Une nouvelle fois, c'est de Monseigneur von Galen que vient la réaction la plus ferme. Dans un sermon prononcé à l'église Saint-Lambert de Münster, le 3 août 1941, il explique en détail comment on tue les malades innocents et comment on trompe les familles par des avis de décès falsifiés. Des copies du sermon sont distribuées dans toutes l'Allemagne et sur le front, parmi les soldats. Des officiels reçoivent l'accord de Martin Bormann, secrétaire particulier de Hitler, pour que l'on pend Galen, mais finalement, aucune action n'est intentée contre lui pour ne pas le transformer en martyr.

Le ministre de la Propagande Josef Gœbbels s'y était opposé en ces termes :

« Si quoi que ce soit était tenté contre l'évêque, il serait à craindre que la population de Münster ne doive être perdue pour toute la durée de la Guerre, et il serait à craindre que soit perdue, à coup sûr, la Westphalie tout entière. »

Peu après le sermon du 3 août, Hitler donne l'ordre d'arrêter le programme d'euthanasie.

Au début du XXe siècle, les Juifs représentent 1,04 % de la population allemande, ce qui est moins que la Pologne (16 %) ou des pays d'Europe centrale comme l'Autriche ou la Hongrie (4 %) , mais beaucoup plus que la France (0,22 %) . Après des mesures d'exclusion qui évoquent le Moyen-âge de l'Europe chrétienne, les Juifs d'Allemagne connaissent l'émancipation au cours du XIXe siècle, c'est-à-dire qu'ils obtiennent les mêmes droits que les autres Allemands. Cette régularisation est effective en Prusse, dans le Hanovre et le Nassau, en 1848 ; dans le Holstein en 1863 ; en Saxe en 1868.

À la différence de l'antisémitisme racial nazi qui catégorise les êtres humains en peuples supérieurs et en peuples inférieurs, l'anti-judaïsme catholique traditionnel repose sur certaines conceptions théologiques élaborées dans les 3 Iers siècles du christianisme. Les églises chrétiennes ont généralement toujours accepté des Juifs convertis sans tenir compte de leur origine raciale. Dans les années 1870, aiguillonnée par le fait que nombre de Juifs connus participaient au mouvement anti-catholique du « Kulturkampf » , le Parti du Centre, catholique, avait lancé une vigoureuse campagne antisémite au cours de l'été 1875. De cette époque, les catholiques allemands conservent une hostilité vis-à-vis du Libéralisme juif mais ils ne cultivent pas l'antisémitisme racial, tel qu'il a pu se développer chez des catholiques autrichiens comme Karl Lueger et qui sera l'un des fondements de l'idéologie nazie. Karl Marx étant d'ascendance juive tout comme le révolutionnaire communiste Karl Liebknecht, l'hostilité viscérale de l'Église vis-à-vis du communisme a pu rejaillir également sur les Juifs. Ainsi, dans le « Handbuch » de Monseigneur Gröber, publié en 1937, le marxisme est-il défini comme « le socialisme matérialiste fondé, à l'origine, par le Juif Karl Marx », et le bolchévisme comme « un despotisme d'État, asiatique, en réalité au service d'un groupe de terroristes menés par les Juifs ».

L'antisémitisme raciste est un élément de la doctrine nazie qui ne cesse de s'affirmer entre 1920 et 1945. Selon Raul Hilberg, une fois que les Nazis sont au pouvoir, à partir de 1933, ils vont mener de 1933 à 1940 une politique de persécution des Juifs visant plus ou moins à les inciter à l'émigration, et une politique d'annihilation, de 1941 à 1945.

De 1920 à 1933, les catholiques, clercs ou laïcs qui luttent contre la montée de l'antisémitisme sont très peu nombreux. Une association comme le « Verein für die Abwehr der Antisemitismus » qui regroupe chrétiens et Juifs pour lutter contre l'antisémitisme ne compte que 2 prêtres catholiques dans son comité de patronage. Si les évêques allemands dénoncent dans la doctrine nazie la glorification de la race et du sang, ils ne s'expriment pratiquement pas sur la propagande antisémite et les violences qu'elle engendre.

Le 2 avril 1928, le Saint-Office publie un décret dans lequel il condamne l'antisémitisme, défini comme « haine contre le peuple de Dieu », et renouvelle la volonté du Saint-Siège de protéger le peuple juif contre l'« oppression injuste » :

« Comme il réproche toutes les haines et les animosités entre les peuples, le Saint-Siège condamne résolument la haine contre un peuple déjà élu par Dieu, haine qu'aujourd'hui on désigne communément sous le nom d'« antisémitisme ».

À partir de 1933, les violences physiques auxquelles les SA se livraient sur les Juifs cèdent peu à peu le pas à des mesures plus bureaucratiques : des lois d'exclusion interdisent aux Juifs d'exercer un emploi dans la fonction publique et dans un certain nombre de professions para-publiques et culturelles. En septembre 1935, les lois de Nuremberg interdisent les mariages entre Juifs et Aryens. Dans les années qui suivent, une série de mesures visent à exproprier les Juifs et à les spolier de plus en plus durement. Le 9 novembre 1938, la « Nuit de Cristal » marque une reprise des agressions physiques et le commencement de la déportation : 20,000 Juifs sont internés dans des camps de concentration comme Dachau.

Pendant cette période, de 1933 à 1939, certains évêques catholiques se montrent complaisants vis-à-vis des valeurs de la race.

On peut ainsi lire dans le « Handbuch » de Monseigneur Gröber :

« Chaque peuple est en lui-même responsable de la réussite de son existence, et l'apport d'un sang totalement étranger représentera toujours un risque pour la nation qui a prouvé sa valeur historique. C'est pourquoi, on ne peut refuser à aucun peuple le droit de maintenir la pureté de son origine raciale et de prendre des garanties dans ce but. La religion chrétienne demande simplement que les moyens utilisés ne pêchent pas contre la loi morale et la justice naturelle. »

Au cours de l'été 1934, un journal social-démocrate de Prague publie le texte d'un sermon contre la haine raciale attribué au Cardinal Faulhaber qui ne l'avait en fait jamais prononcé.

Dans une mise au point, le secrétaire du Cardinal expliquait que, dans ses sermons prononcés à l'occasion de l'Avent :

« Le Cardinal avait défendu l'Ancien Testament des Enfants d'Israël, mais n'avait pas pris position en ce qui concerne l'actuelle Question juive. »

C'est qu'en effet l'Église prend des positions relativement ferme concernant la fidélité à l'Ancien Testament, c'est-à-dire la Bible des Juifs, que des Nazis comme Alfred Rosenberg attaquent violemment. Elle est ferme également sur la « non-aryanité » du Christ, mais elle ne fait pas de la défense des Juifs opprimés un cheval de bataille.

La question des Juifs convertis et des « Mischlinge » catholiques sera la source de conflits récurrents entre l'Église catholique et le pouvoir. « Mischlinge » est le nom donné à ceux que les Nazis considèrent d'un point de vue racial comme des « demi-Juifs » ou « quart-Juifs ». D'après un recensement de 1939, il y a environ 72,000 « Mischlinge » au 1er degré (2 grands-parents juifs) et quelque 39,000 « Mischlinge » au second degré (un seul grand-parent juif). Ces personnes sont souvent des catholiques : dans le courant du XIXe siècle, un nombre appréciable de Juifs s'étaient convertis au christianisme, et dans pratiquement tous les cas, il s'agissait du catholicisme. Il y a donc beaucoup de catholiques ayant un Juif parmi leurs ancêtres. Les évêques cherchent à protéger ces catholiques avec des origines juives. En 1937, l'Église oppose ainsi un refus à la demande du ministère des Affaires ecclésiastiques de consulter les dossiers diocésains concernant les conversions et les mariages mixtes. 2 associations catholiques s'occupent spécifiquement des convertis et des catholiques non aryens : le « Sankt Raphaelsverein » et le « Paulus Bund ». En 1938, le « Sankt Raphaelsverein » permet l'émigration de 1,850 d'entre eux.

Des catholiques soutiennent les Juifs sans lien avec le catholicisme. Ce sont des exceptions. Après la « Nuit de Cristal », le doyen de la cathédrale de Berlin, Bernhard Lichtenberg, décide de prier publiquement pour les Juifs à chaque prière du soir. En 1941, il proteste également contre l'euthanasie. Il est condamné à 2 ans de prison et, à sa sortie, la « Gestapo » le dirige vers Dachau. Il meurt pendant le voyage.

Le 1er septembre 1941, le port de l'étoile juive, qui était déjà en vigueur en Pologne, devient obligatoire en Allemagne. Cette mesure concerne aussi les Juifs convertis au catholicisme après 1935. Les non-Aryens mariés à un conjoint aryen sont dispensés du port de l'étoile. Faut-il prévoir dans les églises des bancs spéciaux pour les Juifs ? Dans une lettre à ses confrères, datée du 17 septembre, le Cardinal Bertram conseille d'éviter les « mesures précipitées qui pourraient blesser les Juifs ». Les évêques de Berlin interviennent, en vain, auprès de la « Gestapo » pour dispenser les Juifs catholiques de porter l'étoile.

Les déportations massives de Juifs allemands vers l'est commencent le 15 octobre 1941. Les catholiques non-aryens ne sont pas épargnés, contrairement à de vagues promesses qui avaient été faites. Les évêques interviennent encore pour que des prêtres et des religieuses non-aryens puissent se porter volontaires pour accompagner les déportés pour célébrer des offices et faire le catéchisme aux enfants. Mais bien vite, des informations sur le sort qui attend les Juifs déportés remontent jusqu'aux évêques en même temps que les soldats qui reviennent du front russe racontent les atrocités dont ils ont été témoins : des civils juifs sont tués par milliers à la mitrailleuse. En août 1942, un officier nazi, Kurt Gerstein, tente d'alerter le nonce apostolique, Monseigneur Orsenigo sur les faits dont il a été témoin dans les Iers camps d'extermination. Comme le nonce refuse de le recevoir, il raconte son histoire au conseiller juridique de Monseigneur Preysing, évêque de Berlin. Les évêques ont d'autres informateurs issus de l'armée ou de l'administration.

En 1942, on trouve encore dans le « Reich » plus de 150,000 « Mischlinge » ou non-Aryens mariés à des Aryens, qui ne sont pas tenus de porter l'étoile jaune, mais en mars, il est décidé que les mariages inter-raciaux doivent être dissous. Au nom des évêques allemands, Monseigneur Bertram proteste auprès du ministère des Affaires ecclésiastiques. En février 1943, la « Gestapo » s'empare à Berlin de plusieurs milliers de Juifs catholiques mariés à des Aryennes. Les épouses aryennes suivent leurs maris jusqu'à leur lieu de détention et les réclament en hurlant pendant des heures. La « Gestapo » cède. En cas de promulgation du décret cassant les mariages inter-raciaux, les évêques avaient prévu de faire lire une déclaration dans toutes les églises pour rappeler l'indissolubilité du mariage. Le décret est finalement ajourné. Au cours de toutes les interventions qu'ils font auprès des autorités pour protéger les Juifs chrétiens et les « Mischlinge », les évêques n'abordent pas le sujet des Juifs non-chrétiens. Ils font bien quelques déclarations contestant les injustices dont sont victimes les races étrangères, mais ces déclarations sont conçues dans un langage très général. De même, il n'y a en Allemagne qu'une poignée de Juifs cachés par le clergé.

Pendant toute la période nazie, l'Église catholique d'Allemagne a pu subsister en tant qu'institution indépendante, avec des évêques qui pouvaient communiquer librement entre eux et avec les échelons inférieurs du clergé, et des fidèles qui pouvaient se rendre à peu près librement dans les églises. Les interventions et les lettres pastorales des évêques ont, de ce fait, été archivées de façon tout à fait correcte et forment un corpus d'où l'on peut dégager de grandes lignes : depuis le début de la prise du pouvoir par les Nazis et le concordat qui a suivi, l'Église est en négociation permanente avec les autorités pour défendre le concordat, c'est-à-dire l'indépendance de l'Église dans le domaine religieux, en échange de quoi, elle ne conteste pas le gouvernement en place et soutient, par patriotisme, ses orientations nationalistes jusque dans la folie de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Concernant les aspects moraux, elle a su s'opposer vigoureusement dans l'affaire de l'eugénisme. Elle est restée presque muette vis-à-vis la persécution et l'extermination des Juifs, tout en défendant avec quelque succès les « non-Aryens » catholiques (comme le succès de Monseigneur von Galen, évêque de Münster, et Monseigneur von Preysing, évêque de Berlin contre le Programme « Aktion T4 ») .

Cet accommodement a pu être taxé de « capitulation ». Aucun élément ne permet d'imputer cette attitude aux seuls évêques : comme le note Lewy, aucun dirigeant, qu'il soit laïc ou ecclésiastique, ne peut à la fois s'opposer longtemps aux valeurs, aux modes de pensée adoptés par le groupe qu'il dirige et s'attendre à conserver son poste de direction et son influence et il cite à ce propos Carl Amery :

« La capitulation fut non pas le fait de évêques, des prélats du Parti du Centre ou des Monsignori, mais le fait du juste milieu du catholicisme allemand. »

L'épiscopat allemand a fait au cours de la Guerre des déclarations critiquant les injustices dont les races étrangères sont victimes. Ainsi, en décembre 1942, Joseph Frings, nouvel archevêque de Cologne, rappelle dans une lettre pastorale que tous les hommes ont droit à la vie, à la liberté, à la propriété et au mariage et il souligne que ces droits ne peuvent être refusés « à ceux qui ne sont pas de notre sang » . D'autres déclarations similaires sont faites mais ces déclarations conçues en termes très généraux n'ont guère d'impact sur le programme d'extermination des Juifs perpétré par un « Reich » de la Grande Allemagne qui, avec l'annexion de l'Autriche et de la Bohême-Moravie, est constitué d'une population dont 43,1 % est de confession catholique. Au sein même des SS, le pourcentage des catholiques est de 22,7 % .

Malgré la répression féroce qui s'exerçait sur les opposants, il y a eu une Résistance allemande au Nazisme, au sein de laquelle on compte beaucoup de catholiques. Günter Lewy note que non seulement les évêques n'ont jamais encouragé la Résistance, mais ils l'ont toujours condamnée. Jusqu'à la chute du Nazisme, ils clament que le gouvernement du « Führer » Adolf Hitler est l'autorité légitime auquel chacun doit obéissance.

Dans leur système concentrationnaire, les Nazis rassemblèrent peu à peu, à Dachau, tous les prêtres arrêtés. Ils étaient emprisonnés dans un certain nombre de baraquements connus sous le nom de « baraque des prêtres » . 447 prêtres allemands transitèrent par Dachau ; 94 y moururent. Sans doute tous n'étaient-ils pas des Résistants et avaient pu être arrêtés pour de simples propos imprudents, comme par exemple Karl Leisner. Ce nombre montre quand même que, pour un certain nombre de catholiques courageux, l'accommodement avait des limites.

...

Popes Pius XI (1922-1939) and Pius XII (1939-1958) led the Roman Catholic Church through the rise and fall of Nazi Germany. Around 1/3 of Germans were Catholic in the 1930's. The Church in Germany had spoken against the rise of Nazism, but the Catholic aligned Centre Party capitulated in 1933 and was banned. Several key-Nazis, including Adolf Hitler, had been raised Catholic, but became hostile to the Church in adulthood. While Article 24 of the NSDAP Party platform called for conditional toleration of Christian denominations and the 1933 « Reichskonkordat » treaty with the Vatican purported to guarantee religious freedom for Catholics, the Nazis were essentially hostile to Christianity and the Catholic Church faced persecution in Nazi Germany. Its press, schools and youth organisations were closed, much property confiscated and around 1/3 of its clergy faced reprisals from authorities. Catholic lay leaders were targeted during the « Night of the Long Knives » purge. The Church hierarchy attempted to co-operate with the new government but, in 1937, the Papal Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » accused the government of « fundamental hostility » to the church.

Among the most courageous demonstrations of opposition inside Germany were the 1941 sermons of Bishop August von Galen of Münster.

Nevertheless, wrote Alan Bullock :

« Neither the Catholic Church nor the Evangelical Church, as institutions, felt it possible to take-up an attitude of open opposition to the regime. »

In every country under German occupation, priests played a major part in rescuing Jews, but Catholic resistance to mistreatment of Jews in Germany was generally limited to fragmented and largely individual efforts. Mary Fulbrook wrote that when politics encroached on the church, Catholics were prepared to resist, but that the record was otherwise patchy and uneven, and that, with notable exceptions :

« It seems that, for many Germans, adherence to the Christian faith proved compatible with at least passive acquiescence in, if not active support for, the Nazi dictatorship. »

Catholics fought on both sides in the Second World War. Adolf Hitler's invasion of predominantly Catholic Poland ignited the conflict in 1939. Here, especially in the areas of Poland annexed to the « Reich » (as in other annexed regions of Slovenia and Austria) , Nazi persecution of the church was intense. Many clergy were targeted for extermination. Elsewhere, the Nazi aligned Independent State of Croatia gave privileges to the church. Through his links to the German Resistance, Pope Pius XII warned the Allies of the planned Nazi invasion of the Low-Countries in 1940. From that year, the Nazis gathered priest-dissidents in a dedicated clergy barracks at Dachau, where (95 %) of its 2,720 inmates were Catholic (mostly Poles, and 411 Germans) and 1,034 priests died there. Expropriation of church properties surged from 1941.

The Vatican, surrounded by Fascist Italy, was officially neutral during the War, but used diplomacy to aid victims and lobby for peace. Vatican Radio and other media spoke-out against atrocities. While Nazi anti-Semitism embraced modern pseudo-scientific racial principles, ancient antipathies between Christianity and Judaism contributed to European anti-Semitism. During the Nazi era, the church rescued many thousands of Jews by issuing false documents, lobbying Axis officials, hiding them in monasteries, convents, schools and elsewhere ; including in the Vatican and papal residence at Castel Gandolfo. The Pope's role during this period is contested. The « Reich » Security Main Office called Pius XII a « mouthpiece » of the Jews. His 1st Encyclical, « Summi Pontificatus » , called the invasion of Poland an « hour of darkness » , his 1942 Christmas address denounced race murders and his « Mystici corporis Christi » Encyclical (1943) denounced the murder of the handicapped.

In the 1930's, Catholics constituted 1/3 of the population of Germany and « Political Catholicism » was a major force in the inter-War Weimar Republic. Prior to 1933, Catholic leaders denounced Nazi doctrines while Catholic regions generally did not vote Nazi. Though hostility between the Nazi Party and the Catholic Church was real, the Nazi Party 1st developed in largely Catholic Munich, where many Catholics, lay and clerical, offered enthusiastic support. This early (minority) affinity lessened after 1923. By 1925, Nazism had embarked on a different path following its reconstitution in 1920 taking a decidedly anti-Catholic / anti-Christian identity. In early 1931, the German Bishops issued an edict excommunicating all Nazi leadership and banned Catholics from membership. The ban was conditionally modified in the Spring of 1933 under pressure to address State law requiring all Civil Servants and Trade Union workers be members of the Nazi Party, while retaining condemnation of core Nazi ideology. In early 1933, following Nazi successes in the 1932 elections, lay Catholic monarchist Franz von Papen, and acting Chancellor and Presidential advisor, General Kurt von Schleicher, assisted Adolf Hitler's appointment as « Reich » Chancellor by President Paul von Hindenburg. In March, amidst the intimidating atmosphere of Nazi terror tactics and negotiation following the « Reichstag » Fire Decree, the lay Catholic Centre Party (led by prelate Ludwig Kaas), on condition demand of a written commitment the President's veto power be retained, the allied BNVP and the monarchists DNVP voted for the Enabling Act. The Center Party's attitude had become crucial since the act could not be passed by the Nazi and DNVP coalition alone. It marked the transition in Adolf Hitler's reign from democratic to dictatorial power. By June 1933, the only institutions not under Nazi domination were the military and the churches. The « Reichskonkordat » treaty of July 1933, signed between Germany and the Holy-See, pledged to respect the autonomy of the Catholic Church, but required clerics to refrain from politics. Hitler welcomed the treaty, though he routinely violated it in the Nazi struggle with the churches. When president Hindenburg died in August 1934, the Nazis claimed jurisdiction over all levels of government and a referendum confirmed Hitler as sole « Führer » (leader) of Germany. A Nazi program known as « Gleichschaltung » sought control of all collective and social activity and interfered with Catholic schooling, youth groups, workers and cultural groups. The church insisted on its loyalty to the nation, but resisted regimentation and oppression of church organizations and contraventions of doctrine such as the sterilization law of 1933.

Hitler's ideologues Josef Gœbbels, Heinrich Himmler, Alfred Rosenberg and Martin Bormann hoped to de-Christianize Germany or, at least, distort its theology to their point of view. The government moved to close all Catholic institutions which were not strictly religious. Catholic schools were shut by 1939; the Catholic press by 1941. Clergy, women and men religious, and lay leaders were targeted. During the course of Hitler's rule, thousands were arrested, often on trumped-up charges of currency smuggling or « immorality ». Germany's senior cleric, Cardinal Bertram, developed an ineffectual protest system, leaving broader Catholic resistance to individual conscience. By 1937, the church hierarchy, which initially sought « détente », was highly-disillusioned. Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical. It condemned racism, accused the Nazis of violations of the Concordat and « fundamental hostility » to the church. The State responded by renewing its crackdown and propaganda against Catholics. Despite violence against Catholic Poland, some German priests offered prayers for the German cause at the outbreak of War. Nevertheless, security chief Reinhard Heydrich soon orchestrated an intensification of restrictions on church activities. Expropriation of monasteries, convents and church properties surged from 1941. Bishop August von Galen's ensuing 1941 denunciation of Nazi euthanasia and defence of human rights roused rare popular dissent. The German bishops denounced Nazi policy towards the church in pastoral letters, calling it « unjust oppression ».

Pius XII, former Nuncio to Germany, became Pope on the eve of War. His legacy is contested. As Vatican Secretary of State, he advocated « détente » via the « Reich » Concordat, hoping it would build trust and respect within Hitler's government, and assisted in drafting the anti-Nazi « Mit brennender Sorge ». His 1st Encyclical, « Summi Pontificatus », called the invasion of Poland an « hour of darkness ». He affirmed the policy of Vatican neutrality, but maintained links to the German Resistance. Controversy surrounding his reluctance to speak publicly in explicit terms about Nazi crimes continues. He used diplomacy to aid War victims, lobbied for peace, shared intelligence with the Allies, and employed Vatican Radio and other media to speak-out against atrocities like race murders. In « Mystici corporis Christi » (1943) , he denounced the murder of the handicapped. A denunciation from German Bishops of the murder of the « innocent and defenceless » , including « people of a foreign race or descent » , followed. While Nazi anti-Semitism embraced modern pseudo-scientific racial principles, ancient antipathies between Christianity and Judaism contributed to European anti-Semitism. Under Pius XII, the church rescued many thousands of Jews by issuing false documents, lobbying Axis officials, hiding them in monasteries, convents, schools and elsewhere ; including the Vatican and Castel Gandolfo.

In regions of Poland, Slovenia and Austria annexed by Nazi Germany, Nazi persecution of the Church was at its harshest. In Germany and its conquests, Catholic responses to Nazism varied. The Papal Nuncio in Berlin, Cesare Orsenigo, was timid in protesting Nazi crimes and had sympathies with Italian Fascism. German priests, in general, were closely watched and often denounced, imprisoned or executed, such as German priest-philosopher, Alfred Delp. From 1940, the Nazis gathered priest-dissidents in dedicated clergy barracks at Dachau, where 95 % of its 2,720 inmates were Catholic (mostly Poles, and 411 Germans) ; 1034 died there. In Polish areas annexed by Nazi Germany, the Nazis attempted to eradicate the church and over 1,800 Polish Catholic clergy died in concentration camps ; most notably, Saint-Maximilian Kolbe. Influential members of the German Resistance included Jesuits of the « Kreisau Circle » and laymen such as July plotters Klaus von Stauffenberg, Jakob Kaiser and Bernhard Letterhaus, whose faith inspired resistance. Elsewhere, vigorous resistance from Bishops such as Johannes de Jong and Jules-Géraud Saliège, papal diplomats such as Angelo Rotta, and nuns such as Margit Slachta, can be contrasted with the apathy of others and the outright collaboration of Catholic politicians such as Slovakia's Monsignor Jozef Tiso and fanatical Croat nationalists. From within the Vatican, Monsignor Hugh O'Flaherty coordinated the rescue of thousands of Allied POWs, and civilians, including Jews. A rogue Austrian Bishop, Alois Hudal, of the College for German priests in Rome, was an informant for Nazi intelligence. After the War, he and Monsignor Krunoslav Draganovic of the Croatian College assisted the so-called « ratlines » facilitating fugitive Nazis to flee Europe.

Roman Catholicism in Germany dates back to the missionary work of Columbanus and Saint-Boniface in the 6th to 8th Centuries but, by the 20th Century, Catholics were a minority. The Reformation, initiated by Martin Luther in 1517, divided « German Christians » between Protestantism and Catholicism. The south and west remained mainly Catholic, while north and east became mainly Protestant. Bismarck's « Kulturkampf » (Battle for Culture) of 1871-1878 saw an attempt to assert a Protestant vision of nationalism over the new German Empire, and fused anti-Clericalism and suspicion of the Catholic population, whose loyalty was presumed to lie with Austria and France. The Catholic Centre Party had formed in 1870, initially to represent the religious interests of Catholics and Protestants, but was transformed by the « Kulturkampf » into the « political voice of Catholics » . By the late-1870's, it was clear that the « Kulturkampf » was largely a failure, and many of its edicts were undone.

The Catholic Church enjoyed a degree of privilege in the Bavarian region, the Rhineland and Westphalia as well as parts of the south-west, while in the Protestant North, Catholics suffered some discrimination. In the 1930's, the episcopate of the Catholic Church of Germany comprised 6 archbishops and 19 bishops while German Catholics comprised around 1/3 of the population, served by 20,000 priests. The Revolution of 1918 and the Weimar constitution of 1919 had thoroughly reformed the former relationship between State and churches. By law, Germany's Protestant and Catholic churches received tax-supported subsidies based on church census data, therefore, were dependent on State support, causing them to be vulnerable to government influence and the political atmosphere of Germany.

The Catholic Centre Party (« Zentrum ») was a social and political force in predominantly Protestant Germany. It assisted the framing of the Weimar constitution at the end of World War I and participated in various Coalition governments of the Weimar Republic (1919 to 1933-1934). It aligned with both Social-Democrats and the Leftist German Democratic Party, while maintaining the centre ground against the rise of extremist Parties both Left and Right. Historically, the Centre Party had the strength to defy Bismarck's « Kulturkampf » and was a bulwark of the Republic. Yet, according to Bullock, from summer 1932, the Party became « notoriously a Party whose 1st concern was to make accommodation with any government in power in order to secure the protection of its particular interests ». It remained relatively moderate during the radicalisation of German politics with the onset of the Great Depression, but Party deputies voted (with most other Parties) for the Enabling Act of March 1933, offering Hitler plenary powers.

In the 1920's and 1930's, Catholic leaders made a number of forthright attacks on Nazi ideology, and the main Christian opposition to Nazism in Germany arose from the Catholic Church. Prior to Hitler's rise, German Bishops warned Catholics against Nazi racism. Some dioceses banned membership in the Nazi Party and Catholic press condemned Nazism.

John Cornwell wrote of the early Nazi period that :

« Into the early 1930's, the German Centre Party, the German Catholic Bishops, and the Catholic media had been mainly solid in their rejection of National-Socialism. They denied Nazis the sacraments and church burials, and Catholic journalists excoriated National-Socialism daily in Germany's 400 Catholic newspapers. The hierarchy instructed priests to combat National-Socialism at a local level whenever it attacked Christianity. »

Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber was appalled by the totalitarianism, neo-Paganism, and racism of the Nazi movement and, as Archbishop of Munich and Freising, contributed to the failure of the Nazi Munich « Putsch » of 1923. In early 1931, the Cologne Bishops Conference condemned National-Socialism. Followed by the Bishops of Paderborn and Freiburg. With ongoing hostility toward the Nazis by Catholic press and Centre Party, few Catholics voted Nazi in elections preceding the Nazi take-over in 1933. As in other German churches, there were some clergy and lay people who openly supported the Nazi administration.

5 Centre Party politicians served as Chancellor of Weimar Germany : Konstantin Fehrenbach, Joseph Wirth, Wilhelm Marx, Heinrich Brüning, and Franz von Papen. With Germany facing the Great Depression, Brüning was appointed chancellor by Hindenburg and was Foreign minister shortly before Hitler came to power. Brüning was appointed to form a new, more conservative ministry on 28 March 1930, but did not have a « Reichstag » majority. On July 16, unable to have key-points of his agenda pass parliament, Brüning used Article 48 of the Constitution governing by presidential emergency decree and dissolving the « Reichstag » on 18 July. New elections were set for September, in which, the Communist and Nazi representation greatly increased, hastening Germany's drift toward Rightist dictatorship. Brüning backed Hindenburg over Hitler in the 1932 presidential election, but lost Hindenburg's support as Chancellor.

He resigned in May of that year. According to Ventresca, Vatican Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli was always nervous of Brüning's reliance on Social-Democrats for political survival. A sentiment shared by Ludwig Kaas and many German Catholics. Ventresca wrote that Brüning never forgave Pacelli for what he saw as betrayal of Catholic political tradition and his leadership.

Karl Marx writings against religion pitted Communist movements against the Catholic Church. The church denounced Communism in May 1891 with Leo XIII's Encyclical « Rerum novarum ». The church feared Communist conquest or revolution in Europe. « German Christians » were alarmed by the spread of militant Marxist-Leninist atheism, which took hold in Russia following the 1917 Revolution and involved a systematic effort to eradicate Christianity. Seminaries were closed and teaching the faith to the young was criminalized. In 1922, the Bolsheviks arrested the Patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church.

In 1919, Communists, initially led by the moderate Kurt Eisner, briefly attained power in Bavaria. The revolt was seized by the radical Eugen Leviné by force to establish the Bavarian Socialist Republic. This drew reaction across Germany to Bavaria from the Right ; ranging, moderate to radical. This brief but violent Soviet experiment in Munich radicalized anti-Marxist and anti-Semitic sentiment among some in Munich's largely Catholic population. In this atmosphere, the Nazi movement 1st emerged. Hitler and the Nazis were able to garner some modicum of support. Some « German Christians » thought he would be a bulwark against Communism. While serving as Apostolic Nuncio to Bavaria, Eugenio Pacelli (later, Pius XII) was in Munich during the Spartacist Uprising of 1919, which saw Communists burst into his residence brandishing guns. An experience which contributed to Pacelli's lifelong distrust of Communism. According to historian Derek Hastings many Catholics felt threatened by the possibilities of radical socialism driven, they perceived, by a cabal of Jews and atheists.

Robert Ventresca wrote :

« After witnessing the turmoil in Munich, Pacelli reserved his harshest criticism for Kurt Eisner. »

Pacelli saw Eisner as an atheist, radical Socialist, with ties to Russian nihilists as embodying the revolution in Bavaria.

Pacelli told his superiors :

« What is more, Eisner was a Galician Jew. A threat to Bavaria's religious, political, and social life. »

The Catholic priest Anton Braun, in a well-publicized sermon in December 1918, called Eisner a sleazy Jew and his administration a pack of unbelieving Jews. Pius XI saw the rising tide of Totalitarianism in Europe with alarm. He delivered papal encyclicals challenging the new creeds, including « Divini redemptoris » (Divine Redeemer) against atheistic Communism in 1937.

Nazi ideology could not accept an autonomous establishment whose legitimacy did not spring from the government. It desired the subordination of the church to the State. While the Article 24 of the NSDAP Party platform called for conditional toleration of Christian denominations and a « Reichskonkordat » (« Reich » Concordat) treaty with the Vatican was signed in 1933, purporting to guarantee religious freedom for Catholics, Hitler believed religion was fundamentally incompatible with National-Socialism. Out of political expediency, the dictator intended to postpone the elimination of the Christian churches until after the War. However, his repeated hostile statements against the church indicated to his subordinates that continuation of the « Kirchenkampf » (Church Struggle) would be tolerated and even encouraged.

Many Nazis suspected Catholics of insufficient patriotism, or even of disloyalty to the Fatherland, and of serving the interests of « sinister alien forces » .

Shirer wrote that :

« Under the leadership of Rosenberg, Bormann and Himmler (backed by Hitler) , the Nazi regime intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, if it could, and substitute the old paganism of the early tribal Germanic gods and the new paganism of the Nazi extremists. »

Anti-Church and anti-Clerical sentiments were strong among grassroots Party activists.

Raised a Catholic, Hitler retained some regard for the organisational power of the Catholic church, but had utter contempt for its central teachings which, he said, if taken to their conclusion « would mean the systematic cultivation of the human failure » . Hitler was aware Bismarck's « Kulturkampf » of the 1870's was defeated by the unity of Catholics behind the Centre Party and was convinced Nazism could only succeed if Political Catholicism, and its democratic networks, were eliminated. Important conservative elements, such as the officer corps, opposed Nazi persecution of the churches.

Because of such political considerations, Hitler occasionally spoke of wanting to delay the « Church Struggle » and was prepared to restrain his anti-Clericalism. But, his own inflammatory remarks to his inner-circle encouraged underlings to continue their battle with the churches. He declared that science would destroy the last vestiges of superstition and that, in the long run, Nazism and religion could not co-exist. Germany couldn't tolerate intervention of foreign influences like the Vatican ; and priests, he said, were « black bugs » and « abortions in black cassocks » . The Nazi Propaganda Minister, Josef Gœbbels, led persecution of Catholic clergy in Germany.

« In Hitler's eyes, Christianity was a religion fit only for slaves; he detested its ethics in particular. Its teaching, he declared, was a rebellion against the natural law of selection by struggle and the survival of the fittest. »

(Extract from « Hitler : a Study in Tyranny » , by Alan Bullock.)

Josef Gœbbels, the Minister of Propaganda, was among the most aggressive anti-Church radicals and saw the conflict with the churches as a priority concern. Born to a Catholic family, he became one of the government's most relentless Jew-baiters.

On the « Church Question », he wrote :

« After the War, it has to be generally solved. There is, namely, an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view. »

He led the persecution of Catholic clergy.

Heinrich Himmler and Reinhard Heydrich headed the Nazi security forces and were key-architects of the « Final Solution ». Both believed Christian values were among the enemies of Nazism : the enemies were « eternally the same », wrote Heydrich : « The Jew, the Freemason, and the politically-oriented cleric. » Modes of thinking like Christian and Liberal individualism he considered residue of inherited racial characteristics, biologically sourced to Jewry - who must, therefore, be exterminated. According to Himmler biographer Peter Longerich, Himmler was vehemently opposed to Christian sexual morality and the « principle of Christian mercy », both of which he saw as a dangerous obstacle to his plans battle with « sub-humans » .

In 1937, he wrote :

« We live in an era of the ultimate conflict with Christianity. It is part of the mission of the SS to give the German people in the next half Century the non-Christian ideological foundations on which to lead and shape their lives. This task does not consist solely in overcoming an ideological opponent but must be accompanied at every step by a positive impetus : in this case, that means the reconstruction of the German heritage in the widest and most comprehensive sense. »

(Heinrich Himmler, 1937.)

Himmler saw the main task of his « Schutzstaffel » (SS) organisation to be that of « acting as the vanguard in overcoming Christianity and restoring a “ Germanic ” way of living » in order to prepare for the coming conflict between « humans and sub-humans » : Longerich wrote that, while the Nazi movement as a whole launched itself against Jews and Communists, « by linking de-Christianisation with re-Germanization, Himmler had provided the SS with a goal and purpose all of its own ». He set about making his SS the focus of a « cult of the Teutons » .

Martin Bormann, Hitler's « deputy » from 1941, saw Nazism and Christianity as « incompatible » and was a leading proponent of the anti- « Church Struggle » .

Hitler's chosen deputy and private secretary from 1941, Martin Bormann, was a militant anti-Church radical. He had a particular loathing for the Semitic origins of Christianity. He was one of the leading proponents of the ongoing persecution of the Christian churches. When the Bishop of Münster lead public protest against Nazi euthanasia, Bormann called for him to be hanged. Strongly anti-Christian, he stated publicly in 1941 that « National-Socialism and Christianity are irreconcilable » .

Alfred Rosenberg, the official Nazi philosopher, wanted the extermination of the Christian faiths imported into Germany. His influence on the Nazi Party's course was limited.

In January 1934, Hitler appointed Alfred Rosenberg the cultural and educational leader of the « Reich ». Rosenberg was a neo-Pagan and notoriously anti-Catholic. Rosenberg was initially the editor of the young Nazi Party's newspaper, the « Völkischer Beobachter ». In 1924, Hitler chose Rosenberg to oversee the Nazi movement while he was in prison (this may have been because he was unsuitable for the task and unlikely to emerge a rival) . In « Myth of the 20th Century » (1930) , Rosenberg described the Catholic Church as one of the main enemies of Nazism. Rosenberg proposed to replace traditional Christianity with the neo-Pagan « myth of the blood » .

He wrote in « The Myth of the 20th Century » in 1930 :

« We now realize that the central supreme values of the Roman and the Protestant Churches hinder the organic powers of the peoples determined by their Nordic race. They will have to be remodeled " »

Church officials were perturbed by Hitler's appointment of Rosenberg as the State's official philosopher. The indication being, Hitler was endorsing his anti-Jewish, anti-Christian, and neo-Pagan philosophy. The Vatican directed the Holy Office to place Rosenberg's « Myth of the 20th Century » on the « Index of Forbidden Books » on February 7, 1934. Joachim Fest wrote of Rosenberg having little, or no, political influence in making government decisions, and thoroughly marginalized. Hitler called his book « derivative, pastiche, illogical rubbish ! »

Following the failure of the pro-Nazi Ludwig Müller to unite Protestants behind the Nazi Party in 1933, Hitler appointed his friend Hans Kerrl Minister for Church Affairs in 1935. A relative moderate among Nazis, Kerrl confirmed Nazi hostility to the Catholic and Protestant creeds in a 1937 address during an intense phase of the Nazi « Kirchenkampf » :

« The Party stands on the basis of Positive Christianity, and positive Christianity is National-Socialism. National-Socialism is the doing of God's will. God's will reveals itself in German blood. Doctor Zœllner and Count Galen have tried to make clear to me that Christianity consists in faith in Christ as the son of God. That makes me laugh. No, Christianity is not dependent upon the Apostle's Creed. True Christianity is represented by the Party, and the German people are now called by the Party and especially the “ Führer ” to a real Christianity. The “ Führer ” is the herald of a new revelation. »

(Hans Kerrl, Nazi Minister for Church Affairs, 1937.)

After World War I, Hitler became involved with the fledgling Nazi Party. He set the violent tone of the movement early, forming the « Sturmabteilung » (SA) para-military. Catholic Bavaria resented rule from Protestant Berlin, and Hitler initially saw the revolution in Bavaria as a means to power, but an early attempt proved fruitless. He was imprisoned after the 1923 Munich « Beer-Hall Putsch » . He used the time to produce « Mein Kampf » , in which he claimed that an effeminate Jewish-Christian ethic was enfeebling Europe, and Germany needed a man of iron to restore itself to build an Empire. He decided on the tactic of pursuing power through « legal » means.

Following the Wall Street Crash of 1929, the Nazis and Communists made great gains at the 1930 Election. Greatest gains for the Nazis came in the Protestant, rural towns of the North, while Catholic areas remained loyal to the Centre Party (« Zentrum ») . Both Nazis and Communists pledged to eliminate democracy ; between them, they secured over 50 % of « Reichstag » seats . Germany's political system made it difficult for chancellors to govern with a stable parliamentary majority. Successive chancellors, instead, relied on the president's emergency powers to govern. From 1931 to 1933, Nazis combined terror tactics with conventional campaigning. Hitler criss-crossed the nation by air, while SA troops paraded in the streets, beat-up opponents, and broke-up their meetings. A middle-class Liberal Party strong enough to block the Nazis did not exist : the Social-Democrats were essentially a conservative trade-union Party, with ineffectual leadership ; the Centre Party maintained its voting block, but was preoccupied defending its own particular interests ; and the Communists, meanwhile, were engaging in violent clashes with Nazis on the streets. Moscow had directed the Communist Party to prioritise destruction of the Social-Democrats, seeing more danger in them as a rival. But it was the German Right who made Hitler their partner in a coalition government.

This coalition did not come about immediately : the Centre Party's Heinrich Brüning, Chancellor from 1930 to 1932, was unable to reach terms with Hitler, and increasingly governed with the support of the President and Army over that of the parliament. With the backing of Kurt von Schleicher and Hitler's stated approval, the 84 year old President von Hindenburg, a conservative monarchist, appointed the Catholic monarchist Franz von Papen to replace Brüning as Chancellor in June 1932. Von Papen was active in the resurgence of the Harzburg Front, and had fallen-out with the Centre Party. He hoped, ultimately, to outmaneuver Hitler.

At the July 1932 elections, the Nazis became the largest Party in the « Reichstag » . Hitler withdrew his support for von Papen and demanded the chancellorship. Hindenburg refused. In return, the Nazis approached the Centre Party to sound-out a coalition but no agreement was reached. Von Papen dissolved Parliament, and the Nazi vote declined in the November Election. Hindenburg appointed Schleicher as chancellor, whereupon the aggrieved von Papen opened negotiations with Hitler, and came to an agreement. Hindenburg appointed Hitler as Chancellor on 30 January 1933, in a coalition arrangement between the Nazis and the Nationalist-Conservatives. Von Papen was to serve as Vice-Chancellor in a majority conservative Cabinets, falsely believing he could « tame » Hitler. Initially, Papen did speak-out against some Nazi excesses and only narrowly escaped death in the « Night of the Long Knives » , whereafter he ceased to openly criticize the Hitler government. German Catholics met the Nazi take-over with apprehension, as leading clergy had been warning against Nazism for years. A threatening though at 1st sporadic persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany commenced.

Following the « Reichstag » fire, the Nazis began to suspend civil liberties and eliminate political opposition, excluding the Communists from the « Reichstag » . At the March 1933 elections, again no single Party secured a majority. Hitler required the « Reichstag » votes of the Centre Party and Conservatives. He told the « Reichstag » on March 23rd that Positive Christianity was the « unshakeable foundation of the moral and ethical life of our people » , and promised not to threaten the churches or the institutions of the Republic if granted plenary powers. Employing a characteristic mix of negotiation and intimidation, the Nazis called on the Centre Party, led by Ludwig Kaas, and all other Parties in the « Reichstag », to vote for the Enabling Act on 24 March 1933. The law was to give Hitler the freedom to act without parliamentary consent or constitutional limitations.

Hitler offered the possibility of friendly co-operation, promising not to threaten the « Reichstag », the President, the States, or the churches if granted emergency powers.

With Nazi para-military encircling the building, he said :

« It is for you, gentlemen of the “ Reichstag ” to decide between War and Peace. »

Hitler offered Kaas oral guarantees of the Centre Party's continued existence, autonomy of the Church, her educational and cultural institutions. Kaas was aware of the doubtful nature of such guarantees, but told members to support the bill, given the « precarious state of the Party ». A number opposed the chairman's course, among them former Chancellors Brüning and Joseph Wirth and former minister Adam Stegerwald. Brüning called the Act « the most monstrous resolution ever demanded of a parliament », and was sceptical about Kaas' efforts. The Centre Party, having obtained promises of non-interference in religion, joined with conservatives in voting for the Act (only the Social-Democrats voted against) . Hoffman wrote that the Centre Party and Bavarian People's Party, along with other groups between the Nazis and the Social-Democrats « voted for their own emasculation in the paradoxical hope of saving their existence thereby » . Hitler immediately set about abolishing the powers of the States, the existence of non-Nazi political Parties and organisations. The Act, allowed Hitler and his Cabinet to rule by emergency decree for 4 years, though Hindenberg remained President. The Act did not infringe upon the powers of the President, and Hitler would not fully achieve full dictatorial power until after the death of Hindenberg, in August 1934. Hindenberg remained Commander and Chief of the military and retained the power to negotiate foreign treaties. On 28 March, the German Bishops' Conference conditionally revised prohibition of Nazi Party membership.

Through the winter-spring of 1933, Hitler ordered the wholesale dismissal of Catholic civil servants. The leader of the Catholic Trade Unions was beaten by Brownshirts and a Catholic politician sought protection after SA troopers wounded a number of followers at a rally. In this threatening atmosphere, Hitler called for a re-organization of Church and State relations of both Catholic and Protestant churches. By June, thousands of Centre Party members were incarcerated in concentration camps. 2,000 functionaries of the Bavarian People's Party were rounded-up by police in late-June 1933 ; along with the Centre Party, it ceased to exist by early-July. Lacking public ecclesial support, the Center Party voluntary dissolved on July 5. Non-Nazi Parties were formally outlawed on 14 July, and the « Reichstag » abdicated its democratic responsibilities.

Diplomatic policy under Pius XI saw the Catholic Church conclude 18 concordats, starting in the 1920's. The aim of the church was to safeguard its institutional rights. Historians note the treaties were unsuccessful since, « Europe was entering a period in which such agreements were regarded as mere scraps of paper » . The « Reich » concordat (« Reichskonkordat ») was signed on July 20, 1933, and ratified in September of that year. The treaty remains in force to the present-day. It was an extension of existing concordats with Prussia and Bavaria, Ist realized via the diplomacy of Nuncio Eugenio Pacelli with a State level concordat with Bavaria (1924) .

Peter Hebblethwaite wrote :

« It was more like a surrender than anything else : it involved the suicide of the Centre Party. »

Signed by President Hindenburg and Vice-Chancellor von Papen, it was a realization of a long-standing program of the Catholic Church to secure a nation-wide Concordat, dating back to the 1st year of the Weimar Republic. Breaches of the treaty by the State commenced almost immediately. The church continually protested throughout the Nazi era and preserved diplomatic ties with the German Government through the 3rd « Reich » .

Between 1930 and 1933, the church initiated negotiations with successive German governments with limited success while a federal treaty proved elusive. Catholic politicians of the Centre Party repeatedly pushed for a concordat with the German Republic. In February 1930, Pacelli became the Vatican's Secretary of State responsible for the Church's global foreign policy. In this position, he continued to work towards the « great goal » of securing a treaty with Germany. Kershaw wrote that the Vatican was anxious to reach agreement with the new government, despite « continuing molestation of Catholic clergy, and other outrages committed by Nazis against the Church and its organisations » .

Biographer of Pius XII, Robert Ventresca, wrote :

« Because of increasing harassment of Catholics and Catholic clergy, Pacelli sought a quick ratification of a treaty, seeking, in this way, to protect the German Church. »

When Vice-Chancellor von Papen and Ambassador Diego von Bergen met Pacelli in late-June 1933, they found him « visibly influenced » by reports of actions being taken against German Catholic interests. Hitler wanted to end all Catholic political life. The church wanted protection of its schools and organisations, recognition of canon law regarding marriage and the right of the Pope to select Bishops. The non-Nazi Vice-Chancellor von Papen was chosen by the new government to negotiate with the Vatican. The Bishops announced on April 6 negotiations toward a concordat would begin in Rome.

On April 10, Francis Stratmann O.P. , a chaplain to students in Berlin, wrote to Cardinal Faulhaber :

« The souls of the well-intentioned are deflated by the National-Socialist seizure of power - the Bishops' authority is weakened among countless Catholics and non-Catholics because of their quasi-approbation of the National-Socialist movement. »

Some Catholic critics of the Nazis soon chose to emigrate. Among them, Waldemar Gurian, Dietrich von Hildebrand, and Hans A. Reinhold. Hitler began enacting laws restricting movement of funds (making it impossible for German Catholics to send money to missionaries) , restricting religious institutions, education, and mandating attendance at Hitler Youth functions (held on Sunday mornings) .

On 8 April, Vice-Chancellor von Papen, went to Rome. On behalf of Cardinal Pacelli, Ludwig Kaas, the out-going chairman of the Centre Party, negotiated a draft with Papen. Kaas arrived in Rome shortly before Papen because of his expertise in Church-State relations. He was authorized by Cardinal Pacelli to negotiate terms with von Papen, but pressure by the German government forced him to withdraw from visibly participating. The concordat prolonged Kaas' stay in Rome, leaving the Party without a chairman. On 5 May, Kaas resigned his post. In his place, the Party elected Heinrich Brüning. Congruently, the Centre Party was subjected to increasing pressure under the Nazi campaign of « Gleichschaltung » . The Bishops saw a draft on 30 May 1933 as they assembled for a joint-meeting of the Fulda Bishops conference, led by Breslau's Cardinal Bertram. And, the Bavarian Bishops' conference, led by its president, Munich's Michæl von Faulhaber) . Bishop's Wilhelm Berning of Osnabruck, and Archbishop Conrad Gröber of Freiburg presented the document to the Bishops. Weeks of escalating anti-Catholic violence preceded the conference. Many Catholic Bishops feared for the safety of the church if Hitler's demands were not met. The strongest critics of the concordat were Cologne's Cardinal Karl Schulte and Eichstatt's Bishop Konrad von Preysing. They pointed-out the Enabling Act established a quasi-dictatorship, while the church lacked legal recourse if Hitler decided to disregard the concordat. The Bishops approved the draft and delegated Gröber, a friend of Cardinal Pacelli and Monsignor Kaas, to present the episcopacy's concerns to Pacelli and Kaas. On 3 June, the Bishops issued a statement, drafted by Gröber, that announced their support for the concordat. After all, the other Parties had dissolved, or banned by the NSDAP, the Centre Party dissolved itself on 6 July.

On 14 July 1933, the Weimar government accepted the « Reichskonkordat » . It was signed by Pacelli for the Vatican and von Papen for Germany, on 20 July ; subsequently, President Hindenburg signed, and it was ratified in September. Article 16 required Bishops to make an oath of loyalty to the State. Article 31 acknowledged while the church would continue to sponsor charitable organisations, it would not support political organisations or political causes. Article 31 was supposed to be supplemented by a list of protected catholic agencies, but this list was never agreed upon. Article 32 gave Hitler what he was seeking : exclusion of clergy and members of religious orders from politics. Yet, it was a gratuitous, according to Günter Lewy's interpretation. In theory, Lewy reasons, members of the clergy could join or remain in the NSDAP without transgressing church discipline.

Lewy states :

« An ordinance of the Holy-See forbidding priests to be members of a political Party was never issued. »

The Nazis State allowed such membership reasoning, « the movement sustaining the State cannot be equated with the political Parties of the parliamentary multi-Party State in the sense of Article 32 » . The day after, the government issued a law banning the founding of new political Parties, thus, turning Germany into a One Party State.

Most historians state it offered international acceptance of Adolf Hitler's government. Günter Lewy, political scientist and author of « The Catholic Church » and Nazi Germany, wrote :

« There is general agreement that the Concordat increased substantially the prestige of Hitler's regime around the world. As Cardinal Faulhaber put it in a sermon delivered in 1937 :

“ At a time when the heads of the major nations in the world faced the new Germany with cool reserve and considerable suspicion, the Catholic Church, the greatest moral power on earth, through the Concordat expressed its confidence in the new German government. This was a deed of immeasurable significance for the reputation of the new government abroad. ” »

The Catholic Church was not alone in signing treaties with the Nazi government at this point. The concordat was preceded by the 4 Power Pact Hitler had signed in June 1933. After the signing of the treaty, on 14 July, the Cabinet minutes record Hitler as saying that the concordat had created an atmosphere of confidence that would be « especially significant in the struggle against international Jewry » .

« John Cornwell in “ Hitler's Pope ” argues that the Concordat was the result of a deal that delivered the parliamentary votes of the Catholic Center Party to Hitler, thereby, giving him dictatorial power (the Enabling Act of March 1933) . This is historically inaccurate. But there is no doubt Pius XII's tenacious insistence on the Concordat retention before, during and after the Second World War. »

(Michaël Phayer)

Historian Robert Ventresca wrote that the « Reichskonkordat » left German Catholics with no « meaningful electoral opposition to the Nazis » , while the « benefits and vaunted diplomatic entente of the “ Reichskonkordat ” with the German State were neither clear nor certain » . In the « Reichskonkordat » , the German government achieved a complete proscription of all clerical interference in the political field (Articles 16 and 32) . It also ensured the Bishops' loyalty to the State by an oath of fidelity. Restrictions were also placed on the Catholic organizations.

In a 2 page article in the « L'Osservatore Romano » , on 26 July and 27 July, Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli said that the purpose of the « Reichskonkordat » was :

« Not only the official recognition (by the “ Reich ”) of the legislation of the Church (its Code of Canon Law) , but the adoption of many provisions of this legislation and the protection of all Church legislation. »

Pacelli told an English representative that the Holy-See had only made the agreement to preserve the Catholic Church in Germany ; he also expressed his aversion to anti-Semitism. According to John Jay Hughes, church leaders were realistic about the Concordat's supposed protections.

Cardinal Faulhaber is reported to have said :

« With the concordat we are hanged, without the concordat we are hanged, drawn and quartered. »

In Rome, the Vatican Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli (later Pius XII) , told the British minister to the Holy-See that he had signed the treaty with a pistol at his head. Hitler was sure to violate the agreement, Pacelli said - adding with gallows humour he would probably not violate all its provisions at once. According to Paul O'Shea, Hitler had a « blatant disregard » for the Concordat, and its signing was to him merely a 1st step in the « gradual suppression of the Catholic Church in Germany » . In 1942, Hitler stated he viewed the Concordat as obsolete, and intended to abolish it after the War, and only hesitated to withdraw Germany's representative from the Vatican for « military reasons connected with the War » : At the Wars end, we will put a swift end to the Concordat. When the Nazi government violated the concordat (in particular Article 31) , German Bishops and the Holy-See protested against these violations. Between September 1933 and March 1937, Pacelli issued over 70 notes and memoranda protesting such violations. When Nazi violations of the « Reichskonkordat » escalated to include physical violence, Pope Pius XI issued the 1937 Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » .

A threatening, initially sporadic, persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany followed the Nazi take-over. The Nazis claimed jurisdiction over all collective and social activity, interfering with Catholic schooling, youth groups, workers' clubs and cultural societies.

Phayer wrote :

« By the latter part of the decade of the 30's, church officials were well-aware that the ultimate aim of Hitler and other Nazis was the total elimination of Catholicism and of the Christian religion. Since the vast majority of Germans were either Catholic or Protestant, this goal was a long-term rather than short-term Nazi objective. »

Hitler moved quickly to eliminate Political Catholicism. The Nazis arrested thousands of members of the German Centre Party. The Catholic Bavarian People's Party government had been overthrown in Bavaria by a Nazi « coup » on 9 March 1933. 2,000 functionaries of the Party were rounded-up by police in late-June. The national Centre Party, dissolved themselves in early-July. The dissolution of the Centre Party left modern Germany without a Catholic Party for the 1st time and the « Reich » Concordat prohibited clergy from participating in politics. Kershaw wrote that the Vatican was anxious to reach agreement with the new government, despite « continuing molestation of Catholic clergy, and other outrages committed by Nazi radicals against the Church and its organisations » . Hitler had a « blatant disregard » for the Concordat, wrote Paul O'Shea, and its signing was to him merely a 1st step in the « gradual suppression of the Catholic Church in Germany » . Anton Gill wrote that « with his usual irresistible, bullying technique, Hitler proceeded to “ take a mile where he had been given an inch ” and closed all Catholic institutions whose functions weren't strictly religious » :

Adalbert Probst, the national director of the Catholic Youth Sports Association, was murdered in the « Night of the Long Knives » purge. The Nazis interfered with Catholic schooling, youth groups, workers' clubs and cultural societies.

« It quickly became clear that Hitler intended to imprison the Catholics, as it were, in their own churches. They could celebrate mass and retain their rituals as much as they liked, but they could have nothing at all to do with German society otherwise. Catholic schools and newspapers were closed, and a propaganda campaign against the Catholics was launched. »

(Extract from « An Honourable Defeat by Anton Gill.)

Almost immediately after signing the Concordat, the Nazis promulgated the sterilization law (the Law for the Prevention of Hereditarily Diseased Off-spring) , an offensive policy in the eyes of the Catholic Church. Days later, moves began to dissolve the Catholic Youth League. Political Catholicism was also among the targets of Hitler's 1934 « Long Knives » purge : the head of Catholic Action, Erich Klausener, Papen's speech writer and advisor Edgar Jung (also a Catholic Action worker) ; and the national director of the Catholic Youth Sports Association, Adalbert Probst. Former Centre Party Chancellor, Heinrich Brüning narrowly escaped execution. William Shirer wrote that the German people were not greatly aroused by the persecution of the churches by the Nazi Government. The majority were not moved to face death or imprisonment for the sake of freedom of worship, being too impressed by Hitler's early foreign policy successes and the restoration of the German economy. Few, he said, paused to reflect that the Nazis intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, and substitute old paganism of tribal Germanic gods and the new paganism of the Nazi extremists. Anti-Nazi sentiment grew in Catholic circles as the Nazi government increased its repressive measures against their activities.

Clergy as well as members of male and female religious orders and lay leaders began to be targeted, leading to thousands of arrests over the ensuing years, often on trumped-up charges of currency smuggling or « immorality » . Priests were watched closely and frequently denounced, arrested and sent to concentration camps. From 1940, a dedicated Clergy Barracks had been established at Dachau concentration camp. Intimidation of clergy was wide-spread and Cardinal Faulhaber was shot at. Cardinal Innitzer had his Vienna residence ransacked in October 1938 and Bishop Sproll of Rottenburg was jostled and his home vandalised. In 1937, « The New York Times » reported that Christmas would see « several thousand Catholic clergymen in prison » . Propaganda satirized the clergy, including Anderl Kern's play « The Last Peasant » . Under Reinhard Heydrich and Heinrich Himmler, the Security Police and the SD were responsible for suppressing internal and external enemies of the Nazi State. Among those enemies were « political churches » - such as Lutheran and Catholic clergy who opposed Hitler. Such dissidents were arrested and sent to concentration camps. In the 1936 campaign against the monasteries and convents, the authorities charged 276 members of religious orders with the offence of « homosexuality » . 1935-1936 was the height of the « immorality » trials against priests, monks, lay-brothers and nuns. In the United States, protests were organized in response to the sham trials, including a June 1936 petition signed by 48 clergymen, including rabbis and Protestant pastors :

« We lodge a solemn protest against the almost unique brutality of the attacks launched by the German government charging Catholic clergy with gross immorality ... in the hope that the ultimate suppression of all Jewish and Christian beliefs by the totalitarian State can be effected. »

Winston Churchill wrote disapprovingly in the British press of Germany's treatment of « the Jews, Protestants and Catholics of Germany » .

Since senior clerics could rely on a degree of popular support from the faithful the German government had to consider the possibility of nation-wide protests. While hundreds of ordinary priests and members of monastic orders were sent to concentration camps throughout the Nazi period, only one German Catholic Bishop was briefly imprisoned in a concentration camp and another expelled from his diocese. From 1940, the « Gestapo » launched an intense persecution of the monasteries invading, searching and seizing them. The Provincial of the Dominican Province of Teutonia, Laurentius Siemer, a spiritual leader of the German Resistance was influential in the Committee for Matters Relating to the Orders, which formed in response to Nazi attacks against Catholic monasteries and aimed to encourage the Bishops to intercede on behalf of the Orders and oppose the Nazi State more emphatically. Figures like Galen and Preysing attempted to protect German priests from arrest.

Fritz Gerlich, editor of Munich's Catholic weekly, was murdered in the « Night of the Long Knives » . The Catholic press was muzzled in Nazi Germany.

The flourishing Catholic press of Germany faced censorship and closure. In March 1941, Josef Gœbbels banned all church press, on the pretext of a « paper shortage » . In 1933, the Nazis established a « Reich » Chamber of Authorship and « Reich » Press Chamber under the « Reich » Cultural Chamber of the Ministry for Propaganda. Dissident writers were terrorised. The June-July 1934 « Night of the Long Knives » purge was the culmination of this early campaign. Fritz Gerlich, the editor of Munich's Catholic weekly, « Der Gerade Weg » , was killed in the purge for his strident criticism of the Nazis. Writer and theologian Dietrich von Hildebrand was forced to flee Germany. The poet Ernst Wiechert protested the government's attitudes to the arts, calling them « spiritual murder » . He was arrested and taken to Dachau Concentration Camp. Hundreds of arrests and closure of Catholic presses followed the issuing of Pope Pius XI's « Mit brennender Sorge » anti-Nazi Encyclical. Nikolaus Groß, a Christian Trade-Unionist, and director of the West German Workers' Newspaper « Westdeutschen Arbeiterzeitung » , was declared a martyr and beatified by Pope John Paul II, in 2001. Declared an enemy of the State in 1938, his a newspaper was shut-down. He was arrested in the « July Plot » round-up, and executed on 23 January 1945.

Catholic schools were a major battle-ground in the « Church Struggle » . In 1933, the Nazi school superintendent of Münster issued a decree religious instruction be combined with discussion of the « demoralising power » of the « people of Israel » , Bishop August von Galen of Munich refused, writing that such interference in curriculum was a breach of the Concordat and he feared children would be confused as to their « obligation to act with charity to all men » and as to the historical mission of the people of Israel. Often Galen directly protested to Hitler over violations of the Concordat. In 1936, Nazis removed crucifixes in school. Protest by Galen led to public demonstration. Hitler sometimes allowed pressure to be placed on German parents to remove children from religious classes to be given ideological instruction in its place, while in elite Nazi schools, Christian prayers were replaced with Teutonic rituals and sun-worship. Church kindergartens were closed and Catholic welfare programs were restricted on the basis they assisted the « racially unfit » . Parents were coerced into removing their children from Catholic schools. In Bavaria, teaching positions formerly allotted to nuns were awarded to secular teachers and denominational schools transformed into « Community schools » . In 1937, authorities in Upper-Bavaria attempted to replace Catholic schools with « common schools » . Cardinal Faulhaber offered fierce resistance. By 1939, all Catholic denominational schools had been disbanded or converted to public facilities.

After constant confrontations, by late-1935, Bishop August von Galen of Munich was urging a joint pastoral letter protesting an « underground War » against the church. By early 1937, the church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, became highly-disillusioned. In March, Pope Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical - accusing the Nazi Government of violations of the 1933 Concordat, and it was sowing the « tares of suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » . The Nazis responded with an intensification of the « Church Struggle » beginning around April. Goebbels noted heightened verbal attacks on the clergy from Hitler in his diary and wrote that Hitler had approved the trumped-up « immorality trials » against clergy and anti-Church propaganda campaign. Goebbels' orchestrated attack included a staged « morality trial » of 37 Franciscans. At the outbreak of World War II, Goebbels' Ministry of Propaganda issued threats and applied intense pressure on the Churches to voice support for the War, and the « Gestapo » banned church meetings for a few weeks. In the 1st few months of the War, the German churches complied. No denunciations of the invasion of Poland, nor the « Blitzkrieg » were issued.

The Catholic Bishops stated :

« We appeal to the faithful to join in ardent prayer that God's providence may lead this War to blessed success for Fatherland and people. »

Despite such protestation of loyalty to the Fatherland, the anti-Church radical Reinhard Heydrich determined that support from church leaders could not be expected because of the nature of their doctrines and internationalism, and wanted to cripple the political activities of clergy. He devised measures to restrict the operation of the churches under cover of War-time exigencies, such as reducing resources available to church presses on the basis of rationing, prohibiting pilgrimages and large church gatherings on the basis of transportation difficulties. Churches were closed for being « too far from bomb shelters » . Bells were melted-down and presses were closed.

With the expansion of the War in the East from 1941 came an expansion of Germany's attack on the churches. Monasteries and convents were targeted and expropriation of church properties surged. Nazi authorities claimed the properties were needed for War-time necessities such as hospitals, or accommodation for refugees or children, but, in fact, used them for their own purposes. « Hostility to the State » was a common cause given for the confiscations, and the action of a single member of a monastery could result in seizure. The Jesuits were especially targeted. The Papal Nuncio Cesare Orsenigo and Cardinal Bertram complained constantly to the authorities but were told to expect more requisitions owing to War-time needs. Nazi authorities decreed the dissolution of all monasteries and abbeys, many of them effectively being occupied and secularized by the Allgemeine SS under Heinrich Himmler. However, on 30 July 1941, the « Aktion Klostersturm » (Operation Monastery) was ended by a decree of Hitler, who feared the increasing protests by the Catholic population might result in passive rebellions, harming the Nazi War effort at the Eastern front. Over 300 monasteries and other institutions were expropriated by the SS. On 22 March 1942, the German Bishops issued a pastoral letter on « The Struggle against Christianity and the Church » . The letter launched a defence of human rights, the rule of law and accused the « Reich » Government of « unjust oppression and hated struggle against Christianity and the Church » , despite the loyalty of German Catholics to the Fatherland, and brave service of Catholics soldiers.

In January 1934, Hitler had appointed neo-Pagan and anti-Catholic Alfred Rosenberg as the cultural and educational leader of the « Reich ». In 1934, the « Sanctum Officium » in Rome recommended that Rosenberg's book be put on the « Index Librorum Prohibitorum » for scorning and rejecting « all dogmas of the Catholic Church, indeed, the very fundamentals of the Christian religion ». During the War, Rosenberg outlined the future envisioned by the Hitler government for religion in Germany, with a 30 point program for the future of the German churches. Among its articles : the National « Reich » Church of Germany was to claim exclusive control over all churches ; publication of the Bible was to cease ; crucifixes, Bibles and Saints were to be removed from altars ; and « Mein Kampf » was to be placed on altars as « to the German nation and, therefore, to God the most sacred book » ; and the Christian Cross was to be removed from all churches and replaced with the swastika.

The Spanish Civil War (1936-1939) saw Nationalists (aided by Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany) and Republicans (aided by the Soviet Union, Mexico as well as International Brigades of volunteers, most of whom were under the command of the Comintern) . The Republican president, Manuel Azaña, was anti-Clerical, while the Nationalist « Generalissimo » Francisco Franco, established a long-standing Fascist dictatorship which restored some privileges to the Church.

In a « Table Talk » of 7 June 1942, Hitler said he believed that Franco's accommodation of the Church was an error :

« One makes a great mistake if one thinks that one can make a collaborator of the Church by accepting a compromise. The whole international outlook and political interest of the Catholic Church in Spain render inevitable conflict between the Church and Franco regime. »

The Nazis portrayed the War as a contest between civilization and Bolshevism. According to historian, Beth Griech-Polelle, many church leaders « implicitly embraced the idea that behind the Republican forces stood a vast Judeo-Bolshevik conspiracy intent on destroying Christian civilization » .

Josef Gœbbels' Ministry of Propaganda served as the main-source of German domestic coverage of the War. Gœbbels, like Hitler, frequently mentioned the so-called link between Jewishness and Communism. Gœbbels instructed the press to call the Republican side simply Bolsheviks - and not to mention German military involvement. Against this backdrop, in August 1936, the German Bishops met for their annual conference at Fulda.

The Bishops produced a joint pastoral letter regarding the Spanish Civil War :

« Therefore, German unity should not be sacrificed to religious antagonism, quarrels, contempt, and struggles. Rather our national power of resistance must be increased and strengthened so that not only may Europe be freed from Bolshevism by us, but also that the whole civilized world may be indebted to us. »

Gœbbels noted the mood of Hitler in his diary on 25 October :

« Trials against the Catholic Church temporarily stopped. Possibly wants peace, at least temporarily. Now, a battle with

Bolshevism. Wants to speak with Faulhaber. »

As Nuncio, Cesare Orsenigo arranged for Cardinal Faulhaber to have a private meeting with Hitler. On November 4, 1936, Hitler met Faulhaber. Hitler spoke for the 1st hour, then, Faulhaber told him the Nazi government had been waging War on the church for 3 years (600 religious teachers had lost their jobs in Bavaria alone) and the number rose to 1,700. The government instituted laws the Church could not accept - like the sterilization of criminals and the handicapped.

Faulhaber stated :

« When your officials or your laws offend Church dogma or the laws of morality, and, in so doing, offend our conscience, then, we must be able to articulate this as responsible defenders of moral laws. »

Hitler told Faulhaber religion was critical for the State, his goal was to protect the German people from congenitally afflicted criminals such as now wreak havoc in Spain.

Faulhaber replied :

« The Church would not refuse the State the right to keep these pests away from the national community within the framework of moral law. »

Hitler argued the radical Nazis could not be contained until there was peace with the Church and that either the Nazis and the Church would fight Bolshevism together, or there would be War against the Church. Kershaw cites the meeting as an example of Hitler's ability to « pull the wool over the eyes even of hardened critics » .

« Faulhaber - a man of sharp acumen, who often courageously criticized the Nazi attacks on the Catholic Church, went away convinced Hitler was deeply religious. »

On 18 November, Faulhaber met with leading members of the German hierarchy to ask them to remind parishioners of the errors of Communism outlined in Leo XIII's 1891 Encyclical « Rerum novarum » . On 19 November, Pius XI announced Communism had moved to the head of the list of « errors » and a clear statement was needed.

On 25 November, Faulhaber told the Bavarian Bishops that he promised Hitler the Bishops would issue pastoral letter to condemn ...

« Bolshevism which represents the greatest danger for the peace of Europe and the Christian civilization of our country. »

He stated :

« The letter will, once again, affirm our loyalty and positive attitude, demanded by the 4th Commandment, toward today's form of government and the “ Führer ”. »

On 24 December 1936, the hierarchy ordered its priests to read the pastoral letter, « On the Defense against Bolshevism » , from all the pulpits on 7 January 1937.

The letter included the statement :

« The fateful hour has come for our nation and for the Christian culture of the western world. The “ Führer ” saw the march of Bolshevism from afar and turned his mind and energies towards averting this enormous danger from the German people and the whole western world. The German Bishops consider it their duty to do their utmost to support the leader of the “ Reich ” with every available means in this defense. »

Hitler's promise to Faulhaber, to clear-up small problems between the Catholic Church and the Nazi State, never materialized. Faulhaber, Galen, and Pius XI, continued to oppose Communism throughout their tenure as anxieties reached a high-point in the 1930's with what the Vatican termed the « Red triangle » , formed by the USSR, the Republican Spain and the revolutionary Mexico. A series of Encyclicals followed : « Bona Sana » (1920) ; « Miserentissimus Redemptor » (1928) ; « Caritate Christi Compusli » (1932) ; and, most importantly, « Divini redemptoris » (1937) . All of which condemned Communism.

The 1933 Concordat between Germany and the Vatican prohibited clergy from participating in politics, weakening the opposition offered by German Catholic leaders. Still, the clergy were among the first major components of the German Resistance.

Hamerow wrote :

« From the very beginning, some churchmen expressed, quite directly at times, their reservations about the new order. In fact, those reservations gradually came to form a coherent, systematic critique of many of the teachings of National-Socialism. »

Later, the most trenchant public criticism of the 3rd « Reich » came from some of Germany's religious leaders. The government was reluctant to move against them since they could claim to merely attend the spiritual welfare of their flocks, « what they had to say was, at times, so critical of the central doctrines of National-Socialism that to say it required great boldness » , and became resisters. Their resistance was directed not only against intrusions by the government into church governance, arrests of clergy, and expropriation of church property, but also, matters like euthanasia and eugenics, the fundamentals of human rights and justice as the foundation of a political system.

Neither the Catholic or Protestant churches were prepared to openly oppose the Nazi State. While offering, in the words of Kershaw, « something less than fundamental resistance to Nazism » , the churches « engaged in a bitter War of attrition with the regime, receiving the demonstrative backing of millions of church-goers. Applause for Church leaders whenever they appeared in public, swollen attendances at events such as “ Corpus Christi ” Day processions, and packed church services were outward signs of the struggle especially of the Catholic Church against Nazi oppression ». While the Church ultimately failed to protect its youth organisations and schools, it did have some successes in mobilizing public opinion to alter government policies. As in the case of the attempt to remove crucifixes from class-rooms. The churches did provide the earliest and most enduring centres of systematic opposition to Nazi policies. Christian morality and the anti-Church policies of the Nazis motivated many German resisters and provided impetus for the « moral revolt » of individuals in their efforts to overthrow Hitler. Institutionally, the Catholic Church in Germany offered organized, systematic and consistent resistance to government policies which infringed on ecclesiastical autonomy.

In his « History of the German Resistance », Hoffmann writes, from the beginning :

« The Catholic Church could not silently accept the general persecution, regimentation or oppression, nor in particular the sterilization law of summer 1933. Over the years until the outbreak of War, Catholic resistance stiffened until finally its most eminent spokesman was the Pope himself with his Encyclical “ Mit brennender Sorge ” of 14 March 1937, read from all German Catholic pulpits. Clemens August Graf von Galen, Bishop of Münster, was typical of the many fearless Catholic speakers. In general terms, therefore, the churches were the only major organisations to offer comparatively early and open resistance : they remained so in later years. »

(Extract from « The History of the German Resistance 1933-1945 » by Peter Hoffmann.)

Erich Klausener, the head of Catholic Action, was assassinated in Hitler's bloody « Night of the Long Knives » purge of 1934.

Political Catholicism was a target of the Hitler government. The formerly influential Centre Party and Bavarian People's Party were dissolved under terrorisation. Following « Hitler's seizure of power », opposition politicians began planning how he might be overthrown. Old political opponents faced a final opportunity to halt the Nazification of Germany, however non-Nazi Parties were prohibited under the proclamation of the « Unity of Party and State ». Former Centre Party leader and « Reich » Chancellor, Heinrich Brüning, looked to oust Hitler, along with military chiefs Kurt von Schleicher and Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord. Erich Klausener, an influential civil servant and president of Berlin's Catholic Action group organized Catholic conventions in Berlin in 1933-1934. At the 1934 rally, he spoke against political oppression to a crowd of 60,000 following mass ; just 6 nights before Hitler struck in a bloody purge. The Conservative Catholic nobleman Franz von Papen, who had helped Hitler to power and was serving as the Deputy « Reich » Chancellor, delivered an indictment of the Nazi government in his Marburg speech of 17 June 1934. Papen's speech writer and advisor, Edgar Jung, a Catholic Action worker, seized the opportunity to re-assert the Christian foundation of the State and the need to avoid agitation and propaganda. Jung's speech pleaded for religious freedom, and rejected totalitarian aspirations in the field of religion. It was hoped the speech might spur a rising, centred on Hindenberg, Papen and the army.

Edgar Jung of Catholic Action, was an advisor to Vice-Chancellor von Papen. He drafted the Marburg speech of 17 June 1934, which rejected Nazi totalitarianism. He was murdered a few days later in the « Night of the Long Knives » purge.

Hitler decided to kill his chief political opponents in the « Night of the Long Knives » purge. It lasted 2 days over 30 June - 1 July 1934. His leading rivals in the Nazi movement were murdered, along with over 100 opposition figures, including high-profile Catholics. Klausener became the 1st Catholic martyr, while Hitler personally ordered the arrest of Jung and his transfer to « Gestapo » headquarters in Berlin where he too was killed. The Church had resisted attempts by the new Government to close its youth organisations and Adalbert Probst, the national director of the Catholic Youth Sports Association, was also killed. The Catholic press was targeted too, with anti-Nazi journalist Fritz Gerlich among those murdered. On 2 August 1934, the aged President von Hindenberg died. The offices of President and Chancellor were combined, and Hitler ordered the Army to swear an oath directly to him. Hitler declared his « revolution » complete.

Historian of the German Resistance, Joachim Fest wrote that, at 1st, the Church had been quite hostile to Nazism and « its Bishops energetically denounced the “ false doctrines ” of the Nazis » , however, its opposition weakened considerably after the Concordat. Cardinal Bertram « developed an ineffectual protest system » to satisfy the demands of other Bishops, without annoying the authorities. Firmer resistance by Catholic leaders gradually re-asserted itself by the individual actions of leading churchmen like Joseph Frings, Konrad von Preysing, August von Galen, Conrad Gröber and Michæl von Faulhaber. According to Fest, the government responded with « occasional arrests, the withdrawal of teaching privileges, and the seizure of church publishing houses and printing facilities » and « Resistance remained largely a matter of individual conscience. In general, they (both churches) attempted merely to assert their own rights and only rarely issued pastoral letters or declarations indicating any fundamental objection to Nazi ideology. » Nevertheless, wrote Fest, the churches, more than any other institutions, « provided a forum in which individuals could distance themselves from the regime » .

The Nazis never felt strong enough to arrest or execute senior office holders of the Catholic Church in Germany. Thus, Bishops were able to criticise aspects of Nazi totalitarianism. Lesser senior figures faced imprisonment or execution. An estimated 1/3 of German priests faced some form of reprisal from the Nazi Government and 400 German priests were sent the dedicated Priest Barracks of Dachau Concentration Camp alone. Among the best-known German priest martyrs were the Jesuit Alfred Delp and Friar Bernhard Lichtenberg. Friar Max Josef Metzger, founder of the German Catholics' Peace Association, was arrested for the last time in June 1943 after being denounced by a mail courier for attempting to send a memorandum on the re-organization of the German State and its integration into a future system of world peace. He was executed on 17 April 1944. Laurentius Siemer, provincial of the Provincial of the Dominican Province of Teutonia, and Augustin Rösch, Jesuit Provincial of Bavaria, were among the high-ranking members of orders who became active in the Resistance - both only narrowly survived the War, following discovery of their knowledge of the « July Plot » . Bernhard Lichtenberg, and the Jesuit Rupert Mayer are among the priest resisters posthumously honoured with beatification. While hundreds of ordinary priests and members of monastic orders were sent to concentration camps, just one German Catholic Bishop was briefly imprisoned in a concentration camp, and just one other expelled from his diocese. This reflected also the cautious approach adopted by the hierarchy, who felt secure only in commenting on matters which transgressed on the ecclesiastical sphere. Albert Speer wrote that when Hitler was read passages from a defiant sermon or pastoral letter, he would become furious, and the fact that he « could not immediately retaliate raised him to a white heat » .

Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber gained an early reputation as a critic of the Nazi movement. Soon after, the Nazi take-over, his 3 Advent sermons of 1933, entitled Judaism, Christianity, and Germany, affirmed the Jewish origins of Christ and the Bible. Though cautiously framed as a discussion of historical Judaism, his sermons denounced the Nazi extremists who were calling for the Bible to be purged of the « Jewish » Old Testament, which he saw as undermining « the basis of Catholicism » . Hamerow wrote that Faulhaber would look to avoid conflict with the State over issues not strictly pertaining to the Church, but on issues involving the defence of Catholics he « refused to compromise or retreat » . On 4 November 1936, Hitler and Faulhaber met. Faulhaber told Hitler that the Nazi government had been waging War on the Church for 3 years and had instituted laws the Church could not accept - like the sterilization of criminals and the handicapped. While the Catholic Church respected the notion of authority, he told the Dictator, « when your officials or your laws offend Church dogma or the laws of morality, and in so doing offend our conscience, then, we must be able to articulate this as responsible defenders of moral laws » . Attempts on his life were made in 1934 and in 1938. He worked with American occupation forces after the War, and received the West German Republic's highest-award, the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit. Among the most firm and consistent of senior Catholics to oppose the Nazis was Konrad von Preysing. Preysing was appointed as Bishop of Berlin in 1935. He was loathed by Hitler. He opposed the appeasing attitudes of Bertram towards the Nazis and worked with leading members of the resistance Carl Gørdeler and Helmuth James Graf von Moltke. He was part of the 5 member commission that prepared the 1937 « Mit brennender Sorge » anti-Nazi Encyclical of Pius XI, and sought to block the Nazi closure of Catholic schools and arrests of church officials. In 1938, he became one of the co-founders of the « Hilfswerk beim Bischöflichen Ordinariat Berlin » (Welfare Office of the Berlin Diocese Office) . He extended care to Jews and protested the Nazi euthanasia programme. His Advent Pastoral Letters of 1942-1943 on the nature of human rights reflected the anti-Nazi theology of the Barmen Declaration of the Confessing Church, leading one to be broadcast in German by the BBC. In 1944, Preysing met with and gave a blessing to Claus von Stauffenberg, in the lead-up to the « July Plot » to assassinate Hitler, and spoke with the resistance leader on whether the need for radical change could justify tyrannicide. Despite Preysing's open opposition, the Nazis did not dare arrest him and, several months after the War, he was named a cardinal by Pope Pius XII.

The Bishop of Münster, August von Galen was Preysing's cousin - conservative nationalist. In January 1934, he criticized Nazi racial policy in a sermon and subsequent homilies. He equated unquestioning loyalty to the « Reich » with « slavery » and spoke against Hitler's theory of the purity of German blood. Often, Galen directly protested to Hitler over violations of the Concordat. When, in 1936, Nazis removed crucifixes in school, protest by Galen led to public demonstration. Like Preysing, he assisted with the drafting of the 1937 papal Encyclical. In 1941, with the « Wehrmacht » marching on Moscow, denounced the lawlessness of the « Gestapo » , the confiscations of church properties and the cruel program of Nazi euthanasia. He protested the mistreatment of Catholics in Germany : the arrests and imprisonment without legal process, the suppression of the monasteries and the expulsion of religious orders. But, his sermons went further than defending the church.

He spoke of a moral danger to Germany from the government's violations of basic human rights :

« The right to life, to inviolability, and to freedom is an indispensable parts of any moral social order. »

He said any government that punishes without court proceedings « undermines its own authority and respect for its sovereignty within the conscience of its citizens » . His 3 powerful sermons of July and August 1941 earned him the nickname of the « Lion of Münster » . The sermons were printed and distributed illegally. Hitler wanted to have Galen removed, but Josef Goebbels told him this would result in the loss of the loyalty of Westphalia. Documents suggest the Nazis intended to hang von Galen at the end of the War. Von Galen was among the German conservatives who had criticized Weimar Germany, and initially hoped the Nazi government might restore German prestige, but quickly became disenchanted with the anti-Catholicism and racism of the Hitler administration. According to Griech-Poelle, he believed the « Dolchstoßlegende » explained the German army's defeat in 1918. Hamerow characterized the resistance approach of senior Catholic clergy like Galen as « trying to influence the 3rd “ Reich ” from within » . While some clergymen refused ever to feign support for the Hitler government, in the Church's conflict with the State over ecclesiastical autonomy, the Catholic hierarchy adopted a strategy of « seeming acceptance of the 3rd “ Reich ” » , by couching their criticisms as motivated merely by a desire to « point-out mistakes that some of its over-zealous followers committed » in order to strengthen the government. Josef Frings became Archbishop of Cologne in 1942. His consecration was used as a demonstration of Catholic self-assertion. In his sermons, he repeatedly spoke in support of persecuted peoples and against State repression. In March 1944, Frings attacked arbitrary arrests, racial persecution and forced divorces. That autumn, he protested to the « Gestapo » against the deportations of Jews from Cologne and surrounds. In 1943, the German Bishops had debated whether to directly confront Hitler collectively over what they knew of the murdering of Jews. Frings wrote a pastoral letter cautioning his diocese not to violate the inherent rights of others to life, even those « not of our blood » and, even during War, and preached in a sermon that « no one may take the property or life of an innocent person just because he is a member of a foreign race » . Following War's end, Frings succeeded Bertram as chairman of the Fulda Bishops' Conference in July 1945 and, in 1946, he was appointed a cardinal by Pius XII.

The « Final Solution » murdering of the Jews took place primarily on Polish territory. Murder of invalids took place on German soil. It involved interference in Catholic (and Protestant) welfare institutions. Awareness of the murderous programme became wide-spread and the Church leaders who opposed it (chiefly, the Catholic Bishop of Münster, August von Galen and Doctor Theophil Wurm, the Protestant Bishop of Wurttemberg) were able to rouse wide-spread public opposition. From 1939, Germany began its program of « euthanasia » , under which those deemed « racially unfit » were to be « euthanised » . The senile, the mentally handicapped and mentally ill, epileptics, cripples, children with Down's Syndrome and people with similar afflictions were to be killed. The program involved the systematic murder of more than 70,000 people. The program deeply offended Catholic morality. Protests were issued by Pope Pius XII, and were led in Germany by Bishop von Galen of Münster, whose 1941 intervention, according to Richard J. Evans, led to « the strongest, most explicit and most wide-spread protest movement against any policy since the beginning of the 3rd “ Reich ” » .

The Papacy and German Bishops previously protested against the Eugenics inspired Nazi sterilization of the « racially unfit » . Catholic protests against the escalation of this policy into « euthanasia » began in the summer of 1940.

Despite Nazi efforts to transfer hospitals to State control, large numbers of handicapped people were still under the care of the Churches. After Protestant welfare activists took a stand at the Bethel Hospital in August von Galen's diocese, Galen wrote to Bertram in July 1940 urging the Church to take up a moral position. Bertram urged caution. Archbishop Conrad Gröber of Freiburg wrote to the head of the « Reich » Chancellery, and offered to pay all costs being incurred by the State for the « care of mentally people intended for death » . The Fulda Bishops' Conference sent a protest letter to the « Reich » Chancellery on 11 August, then, sent Bishop Heinrich Wienken of « Caritas » to discuss the matter. Wienken cited the commandment « thou shalt not kill » and warned officials to halt the program or face public protest from the Church. Wienken subsequently wavered, fearing this might jeopardize his efforts to have Catholic priests released from Dachau, but was urged to stand firm by Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber. The government refused to give a written undertaking to halt the program, and the Vatican declared on 2 December that the policy was contrary to natural and positive Divine law :

« The direct killing of an innocent person because of mental or physical defects is not allowed. »

Subsequent arrests of priests and seizure of Jesuit properties by the « Gestapo » in his home city of Münster, convinced Galen that the caution advised by his superior had become pointless. On 6, 13 and 20 July 1941, Galen spoke against the seizure of properties, and expulsions of nuns, monks and religious and criticized the euthanasia programme. The police raided his sister's convent, and detained her in the cellar. She escaped, and Galen launched his most audacious challenge on the government in a 3 August sermon. He declared the murders to be illegal, and said he formally accused those responsible in a letter to the public prosecutor. The policy opened the way to the murder of all « unproductive people » , like old horses or cows, including invalid war veterans : « Who can trust his doctor anymore ? » , he asked. Galen said it was the duty of all Christians to oppose the taking of human life. Even it meant losing their own. Galen spoke of a moral danger to Germany from the government's violations of basic human rights.

Evans wrote :

« The sensation created by the sermons was enormous. »

Kershaw called the sermons a « vigorous denunciation of Nazi inhumanity and barbarism » .

Gill wrote :

« Galen used his condemnation of this appalling policy to draw wider conclusions about the nature of the Nazi State. »

The sermons were printed and distributed illegally. Galen had the sermons read in parish churches. The British broadcast excerpts over the BBC German service, dropped leaflets over Germany, and distributed the sermons in occupied countries.

Bishop Antonius Hilfrich of Limburg wrote to the Justice Minister, denouncing the murders. Bishop Albert Stohr of Mainz condemned the taking of life from the pulpit. Some of the priests who distributed the sermons were among those arrested and sent to the concentration camps amid the public reaction to the sermons. Bishop von Preysing's Cathedral Administrator, Friar Bernhard Lichtenberg met his demise for protesting by letter directly to Doctor Conti, the Nazi State Medical Director. He was arrested soon after and later died en route to Dachau. Griech-Polelle wrote that Galen's protest came after he had been provided with the physical, verifiable proof of killings, that he demanded before he would issue a public statement and that Galen advised his listeners that passive disobedience to specific Nazi laws was all he expected of them. He never endorsed active resistance against the government, wrote Griech-Polelle, and was himself not interrogated or arrested by State authorities after delivering the 1941 sermons. The speeches angered Hitler.

In a 1942 « Table Talk », he said :

« The fact that I remain silent in public over Church affairs is not in the least misunderstood by the sly foxes of the Catholic Church, and I am quite sure that a man like Bishop von Galen knows full well that, after the War, I shall extract retribution to the last farthing. »

Hitler wanted to have Galen removed, but Josef Gœbbels told him this would result in the loss of the loyalty of Westphalia. The regional Nazi leader, and Hitler's deputy Martin Bormann called for Galen to be hanged, but Hitler and Gœbbels urged a delay in retribution till War's end. With the programme now public knowledge, nurses and staff (particularly in Catholics institutions) , increasingly sought to obstruct implementation of the policy. Under pressure from growing protests, Hitler halted the main euthanasia program on 24 August 1941, though less systematic murder of the handicapped continued. The techniques learnt on the Nazi euthanasia program were later transferred for use in the genocide of the Holocaust. In 1943, Pius XII issued the « Mystici corporis Christi » Encyclical, in which he condemned the practice of killing the disabled. He stated his « profound grief » at the murder of the deformed, the insane, and those suffering from hereditary disease as though they were a useless burden to Society, in condemnation of the ongoing Nazi euthanasia program. The Encyclical was followed, on 26 September 1943, by an open condemnation by the German Bishops which, from every German pulpit, denounced the killing of « innocent and defenceless mentally handicapped, incurably infirm and fatally wounded, innocent hostages, and disarmed prisoners of war and criminal offenders, people of a foreign race or descent » .

In his 1937 Encyclical, « Mit brennender Sorge » , Pope Pius XI accused the Nazi administration of sowing « fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » and noted on the horizon the « threatening storm clouds » of religious wars of extermination over Germany.

By early 1937, the Church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, became highly-disillusioned. In March, Pius XI issued the Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » (With burning concern) . Smuggled into Germany to avoid censorship, it was read from the pulpits of all German Catholic churches on Palm Sunday 1937. It condemned Nazi ideology and accused the Nazi government of violating the 1933 Concordat and promoting « suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and

His Church » . Although there is some difference of opinion as to its impact, it is generally recognized as the « 1st official public document to criticize Nazism » . Bokenkotter describes it as « one of the greatest such condemnations ever issued by the Vatican » . Despite the efforts of the « Gestapo » to block its distribution, the Church distributed thousands to the parishes of Germany. Hundreds were arrested for handing-out copies, and Goebbels increased anti-Catholic propaganda, including a show trial of 170 Franciscans at Koblenz. The « infuriated » Nazis increased their persecution of Catholics and the Church.

Gerald Fogarty asserts :

« In the end, the Encyclical had little positive effect, and if anything only exacerbated the crisis. »

According to Frank J. Coppa, the Nazis saw the Encyclical as « a call to battle against the “ Reich ” » . Hitler was furious and « vowed revenge against the Church » .

Thomas Bokenkotter writes :

« The Nazis were infuriated. In retaliation, they closed and sealed all the presses that printed it. They took numerous vindictive measures against the Church, including staging a long series of immorality trials of the Catholic clergy. »

The German police confiscated as many copies as they could, and the « Gestapo » confiscated 12 printing presses. According to Owen Chadwick, John Vidmar, and other scholars, Nazi reprisals against the Church in Germany followed thereafter, including « staged prosecutions of monks for homosexuality, with the maximum of publicity » .

Shirer reports that :

« During the next years, thousands of Catholic priests, nuns and lay leaders were arrested, many of them on trumped-up charges of “ immorality ” or “ smuggling foreign currency ”. »

In an effort to counter the influence of spiritual resistance, Nazi security services monitored Catholic clergy closely. They instructed agents be placed in every diocese, the Bishops' reports to the Vatican obtained and the Bishops' areas of activity be found-out. A « vast network » was established to monitor the activities of ordinary clergy.

Nazi security agents wrote that :

« The importance of this enemy is such that inspectors of security police and of the security service will make this group of people and the questions discussed by them their special concern. »

Priests were watched closely, frequently denounced, arrested and sent to concentration camps. Often, simply on the basis of being « suspected of activities hostile to the State » . Or, there was reason to « suppose that his dealings might harm society » . Dachau was established in March 1933 as the 1st Nazi Concentration Camp. Chiefly a political camp, it was here that the Nazis established dedicated Clergy Barracks. Of a total of 2,720 clergy recorded as imprisoned at Dachau, some 2,579 (or 94.88 %) were Catholic. A total of 1,034 clergy were recorded as dying in the camp, with 132 « transferred or liquidated » during that time - although R. Schnabel's 1966 investigation found an alternative total of 2,771, with 692 noted as deceased, 336 sent-out on « invalid trainloads » and, therefore, presumed dead. By far, the greatest number of priest prisoners came from Poland. In all, some 1,748 Polish Catholic clerics. Of whom, some 868 died in the camp. Germans constituted the next largest group. 411 German Catholic priests, of whom, 94 died in the camp. 100 were « transferred or liquidated ». The French accounted for 153 Catholic clerics. Among who, 10 died at the camp. Other Catholic priests were sent from Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands, Yugoslavia, Belgium, Italy, Luxembourg, Lithuania, Hungary and Rumania. From outside the Nazi Empire, 2 British and 1 Spaniard were incarcerated at Dachau, as well as one « stateless » priest.

In December 1935, Wilhelm Braun, a Catholic theologian from Munich, became the 1st churchman imprisoned at Dachau. The annexation of Austria saw an increase in clerical inmates.

Berben wrote :

« The commandant at the time, Loritz, persecuted them with ferocious hatred, and, unfortunately, he found some prisoners to help the guards in their sinister work. »

Despite SS hostility to religious observance, the Vatican and German Bishops successfully lobbied the government to concentrate clergy at one camp and obtained permission to build a chapel, for the priests to live communally and for time to be allotted to them for the religious and intellectual activity. From December 1940, priests were gathered in Blocks 26, 28 and 30, though only temporarily. 26 became the international Block and 28 was reserved for Poles - the most numerous group. Conditions varied for prisoners in the camp. The Nazis introduced a racial hierarchy - keeping Poles in harsh conditions, while favouring German priests. Many Polish priests simply died of the cold, not given sufficient clothing. A large number were chosen for Nazi medical experiments. In November 1942, 20 were given phlegmons. 120 were used by Doctor Schilling for malaria experiments between July 1942 and May 1944. Several Poles met their deaths via the « invalid trains » sent-out from the camp, others were liquidated in the camp and given bogus death certificates. Some died of cruel punishment for misdemeanor, beaten to death or worked to exhaustion. Religious activity outside the chapel was totally forbidden, and priests would secretly take confessions and distribute the Eucharist among other prisoners.

Amid the Nazi persecution of the Tirolian Catholics, the Blessed Otto Neururer, a parish priest was sent to Dachau for « slander to the detriment of German marriage », after he advised a girl against marrying the friend of a senior Nazi. He was cruelly executed at Buchenwald, in 1940, for conducting a baptism there. He was the 1st priest killed in the concentration camps. The Blessed Bernhard Lichtenberg died en route to Dachau, in 1943. In December 1944, the Blessed Karl Leisner, a deacon from Münster who was dying of tuberculosis received his ordination at Dachau. His fellow prisoner Gabriel Piguët, the Bishop of Clermont-Ferrand presided at the secret ceremony. Leisner died soon after the liberation of the camp. Among other notable Catholic clerics sent to Dachau were : Father Jean Bernard of Luxembourg ; the Dutch Carmelite Titus Brandsma (died in 1942) ; Friars Stefan Wincenty Frelichowski (died in 1945) ;

Hilary Paweł Januszewski (died in 1945) ; Lawrence Wnuk, Ignacy Jeż and Adam Kozłowiecki of Poland ; Friars Josef Lenzel, and August Frœhlich of Germany. Following the War, the Mortal Agony of Christ Chapel and a Carmelite Convent were built at Dachau in commemoration.

The German Resistance to Adolf Hitler comprised various small opposition groups and individuals, at different stages, to plot, or attempted, the overthrow of the « Führer » . They were motivated by such factors as the mistreatment of Jews, harassment of the churches, and the harsh actions of Heinrich Himmler and the « Gestapo » . Christian morality and the anti-Church policies of the Nazis were a motivating factor driving many German resisters providing impetus for the « moral revolt » of individuals. Neither the Catholic nor Protestant Churches, as institutions, were prepared to shift themselves to open opposition to the State. Yet, Wolf cites events such as the « July Plot » of 1944 having been « inconceivable without the spiritual support of Church resistance » . For many of the committed Catholics in the German Resistance - including the Jesuit Provincial of Bavaria, Augustin Rösch, the Catholic trade-unionists Jakob Kaiser, Bernhard Letterhaus and the « July Plot » leader Klaus von Stauffenberg, « religious motives and the determination to resist would seem to have developed hand in hand » . In the winter of 1939-1940, with Poland overrun, but France and Low-Countries yet to be attacked, early German military Resistance sought the Pope's assistance in preparations for a « coup » . Colonel Hans Oster of the Abwehr sent lawyer and devout Catholic, Josef Müller, on a clandestine trip to Rome to seek Papal assistance in the plot. The Vatican considered Müller to be a representative of Colonel-General Ludwig Beck and agreed to offer the machinery for mediation. Pius, communicating with Britain's Francis d'Arcy Osborne, channelled communications in secrecy. The British government was non-committal. Hitler's swift victories over France Low-Countries deflated the will of the German military to resist. Müller was arrested in 1st raid on Military Intelligence, in 1943. He spent the rest of the War in concentration camps, ending-up at Dachau. Pius retained his contact with the German Resistance and continued to lobby for peace.

Old guard national-conservatives aligned to Carl Friedrich Gœrdeler broke with Hitler in the mid-1930's.

According to Kershaw :

« They despised the barbarism of the Nazi regime. But, were keen to re-establish Germany's status as a major power. Essentially authoritarian, they favoured monarchy and limited electoral rights resting on Christian family values. »

Laurentius Siemer, Provincial of the Dominican Province of Teutonia, spoke to resistance circles on the subject of Catholic social teaching as the starting-point for the reconstruction of Germany, and worked with Carl Gœrdeler and others in planning for a post-coup Germany. Following the failure of the 1944 « July Plot » to assassinate Hitler, Siemer evaded capture by the « Gestapo » at his Oldenberg monastery, and hid-out until the end of the War, thus, remaining one of the few conspirators to survive the purge. A younger group, dubbed the « Kreisau Circle » by the « Gestapo » , did not look to German Imperialism for inspiration. Though multi-denominational, it had a strongly Christian orientation, and looked for a general Christian revival, and re-awakening of awareness of the transcendental. Its outlook was rooted both in German Romantic and idealist tradition and in the Catholic doctrine of natural law. It had around 20 core members. Among the central membership of the Circle were the Jesuit Fathers Augustin Rösch, Alfred Delp and Lothar König. Bishop von Preysing also had contact with the group.

According to Gill :

« Delp's role was to sound-out for Moltke the possibilities in the Catholic Community of support for a new, post-War Germany. »

Rösch and Delp also explored the possibilities for common-ground between Christian and Socialist trade-unions. Lothar König became an important intermediary between the Circle and Bishops Conrad Gröber of Freiberg and Presying of Berlin. The « Kreisau Circle » combined conservative notions of reform with socialist strains of thought. A symbiosis expressed by Delp's notion of « personal Socialism » . The group rejected Western models, but wanted to « associate conservative and socialist values, aristocracy and workers, in a new democratic synthesis which would include the churches. In « Die dritte Idee » (The 3rd Idea) , Delp expounded on the notion of a 3rd way, which, as opposed to Communism and Capitalism, might restore the unity of the person and society. The Circle pressed for a « coup » against Adolf Hitler, but being un-armed, was dependent on persuading military figures to take action.

Christian worker's activist and Centre Party politician Friar Otto Müller was among those who argued for a firm line from the German Bishops against legal violations of the Nazis. In contact with the German military opposition before the outbreak of War, he later allowed individual opposition figures the use of the « Ketteler-Haus » in Cologne for their discussions and was involved with « July Plotters » Jakob Kaiser, Nikolaus Groß and Bernhard Letterhaus in planning a post Nazi-Germany. After the failure of the « July Plot » , the « Gestapo » arrested Müller, who was imprisoned in the Berlin Police Hospital, where he died.

Smaller groups were heavily influenced by Christian morality. The « White Rose » student resistance group were partly inspired by August von Galen's anti-euthanasia homilies, as were the Lübeck martyrs. From 1942, « White Rose » published leaflets to influence people against Nazism and militarism. They criticized the « anti-Christian » and « anti-social » nature of the War. The leaders of the group were caught and executed in 1943. Parish priests such as the Lübeck martyrs - Johannes Prassek, Eduard Müller and Hermann Lange, and the Lutheran Pastor Karl Friedrich Stellbrink also participated in localised resistance. They shared disapproval of the Nazis, and the 4 priests spoke publicly against the Nazis ; initially, discreetly distributing pamphlets to friends and congregants. They distributed information from British radio and from leaflets with the sermons of Bishop von Galen. They were arrested in 1942 and executed. The so-called « Frau Solf Tea Party » group included another Jesuit, Friar Friedrich Erxleben. The purpose of the Solf Circle was to seek-out humanitarian ways of countering the Nazis. It met at either Frau Solf or Elizabeth von Thadden's home. They were all arrested in 1944, and some executed.

Catholic politician Eugen Bolz at the People's Court. « Staatspräsident » of Württemberg in 1933, he was overthrown by the Nazis. Later arrested for his role in the « 20th July Plot » to overthrow Hitler, he was beheaded in January 1945.

On 20 July 1944, an attempt was made to assassinate Adolf Hitler, inside his Wolf's Lair field headquarters in East Prussia. The « July Plot » was the culmination of the efforts of several groups in the German Resistance to overthrow the Nazi-led German government. During interrogations, or their show trials, a number of the conspirators cited the Nazi assault on the churches as one of the motivating factors for their involvement. The Protestant clergyman Eugen Gerstenmaier said the key to the entire resistance flowed from Hitler's evil and the « Christian duty » to combat it. The leader of the plot, Catholic nobleman Claus von Stauffenberg, initially looked favourably on the arrival of the Nazis in power, but came to oppose them because of their persecution of the Jews and oppression of the church. He led the « 20th July Plot » (« Operation Valkyrie ») to assassinate Hitler. In 1943, he joined the resistance and commenced planning the unsuccessful Valkyrie assassination and « coup », in which he personally placed a time bomb under Hitler's conference table. Killing Hitler would absolve the German military of the moral conundrum of breaking their oath to the « Führer ». Faced with the moral and theological question of tyrannicide, Stauffenberg conferred with Bishop Konrad von Preysing and found affirmation in early Catholicism, and through Martin Luther. The planned Cabinet which was to replace the Nazi government included Catholic politicians Eugen Bolz, Bernhard Letterhaus, Andreas Hermes and Josef Wirmer. Wirmer was a member of the Left of the Centre Party, had worked to forge ties between the civilian resistance and the trade-unions and was a confidant of Jakob Kaiser - a leader of the Christian trade-union movement, which Hitler had banned after taking office. Letterhaus was also trade-union leader. As a captain in the « Oberkommando der Wehrmacht » (Supreme Command), he had gathered information and become a leading member of the resistance. The « Declaration of Government » that was to be broadcast following the « coup » on 20 July 1944 appealed unambiguously to Christian sensibilities : following the failure of the plot, Stauffenberg was shot, the « Kreisau Circle » dissolved and Moltke, Yorck and Delp, among others, were executed.

« The shattered freedom of spirit, conscience, faith and opinion will be restored. The churches will, once again, be given the right to work for their confessions. In future, they will exist quite separately from the State. The working of the State is to be inspired, both in word and deed by the Christian outlook. »

(Intended « Broadcast of Government » of the 1944 « July Plot » conspirators.)

Cardinal Adolf Bertram, « ex-officio » head of the German Church from 1920 to 1945. He generally favoured a non-confrontational policy by the Church towards the Nazi government.

Kershaw wrote that : while « detestation of Nazism was overwhelming within the Catholic Church », it did not preclude Church leaders approving of areas of government policy, particularly, where Nazism « blended into “ mainstream ” national aspirations » - like support for « patriotic » foreign policy, or War aims, obedience to State authority (where this did not contravene divine law) ; and destruction of atheistic Marxism and Soviet Bolshevism. Traditional Christian anti-Judaism was « no bulwark » against Nazi biological anti-Semitism. On these issues, « the churches as institutions fell on uncertain grounds », and opposition was generally left to fragmented and largely individual efforts. According to Shirer, the Catholic hierarchy in Germany first tried to co-operate with the Nazi Government, but, by 1937, had become highly-disillusioned. The Vatican, therefore, issued « Mit brennender Sorge » outlining Nazi transgressions. Few ordinary Germans, wrote Shirer, paused to reflect on the Nazis' intention to destroy Christianity in Germany.

According to Doctor Harry Schnitker, Kevin Spicer's « Hitler's Priests » found around 0.5 % of German priests (138 of 42,000 - including Austrians) might be considered Nazis. One such priest was Karl Eschweiler, an opponent of the Weimar Republic, was suspended from priestly duties by Cardinal Pacelli (the future Pius XII) for writing Nazi pamphlets in support of eugenics. Cardinal Bertram, « ex-officio » head of the German episcopate, sent Hitler birthday greetings in 1939 in the name of all German Catholic Bishops, an act that angered Bishop Konrad von Preysing. Bertram was the leading advocate of accommodation as well as the leader of the German Church, a combination that reined in other would-be opponents of Nazism.

In 1943, Gröber expressed the opinion Bishops should remain loyal to the « beloved folk and Fatherland » , despite abuses of the « Reichskonkordat » . Yet, Gröber was among those in the hierarchy in Germany who came to articulate and support resistance to the Nazis. He protested the religious persecution of Catholics in Germany. He supported German resistance worker Gertrud Luckner's « Office for Religious War Relief » (« Kirchliche Kriegshilfsstelle ») under the auspices of the Catholic aid agency, « Caritas » . The office became the instrument through which Freiburg Catholics helped racially persecuted « non-Aryans » (both Jews and Christians) . Luckner used funds received from the Archbishop to help Jews. After the War, Gröber said he was such an opponent of the Nazis they planned to crucify him on the door for the Freiburg Cathedral. Mary Fulbrook wrote that when politics encroached on the Church, Catholics were prepared to resist, but the record was otherwise patchy and uneven with notable exceptions, « it seems that, for many Germans, adherence to the Christian faith proved compatible with at least passive acquiescence in, if not active support for, the Nazi dictatorship » .

Hamerow characterized the resistance approach of senior Catholic clergy like August von Galen of Munich as « trying to influence the 3rd “ Reich ” from within » . While some clergymen refused ever to feign support for the government in the Church's conflict with the State over ecclesiastical autonomy, the Catholic hierarchy adopted a strategy of « seeming acceptance of the 3rd “ Reich ” » , by couching their criticisms as motivated merely by a desire to « point-out mistakes that some of its over-zealous followers committed » in order to strengthen the government. Griech-Poelle wrote Galen had argued that good Catholics could support a government whose aim was to destroy a « Judeo-Bolshevik conspiracy » . When Galen delivered his famous 1941 denunciations of Nazi euthanasia and the lawlessness of the « Gestapo » , he also said that the Church had never sought the overthrow of the government.

The pontificate of Pius XI coincided with the early aftermath of the First World War. The old European monarchies had been largely swept away and a new and precarious order formed across the continent. In the East, the Soviet Union arose. In Italy, the Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini took power, while in Germany, the fragile Weimar Republic collapsed with the Nazi seizure of power.

Pius's major diplomatic approach was to make Concordats. He concluded 18 such treaties during the course of his pontificate. However, wrote Hebblethwaite, these Concordats did not prove « durable or creditable » and « wholly failed in their aim of safe-guarding the institutional rights of the Church » for « Europe was entering a period in which such agreements were regarded as mere scraps of paper » . In 1929, Pius signed the Lateran Treaty and a concordat with Italy, confirming the existence of an independent Vatican City State, in return for recognition of the Kingdom of Italy and an undertaking for the papacy to be neutral in world conflicts. In Article 24 of the Concordat, the papacy undertook « to remain outside temporal conflicts unless the parties concerned jointly appealed for the pacifying mission of the Holy-See » .

In 1933, Pius signed the « Reich » concordat with Germany - hoping to protect the rights of Catholics under the Nazi government. The treaty was an extension of existing concordats already signed with Prussia and Bavaria, but wrote Hebblethwaite, it seemed « more like a surrender than anything else : it involved the suicide of the Centre Party » . A persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany had followed the Nazi take-over. The Vatican was anxious to conclude the concordat with the new government, despite the ongoing attacks. Nazi breaches of the agreement began almost as soon as it had been signed. From 1933 to 1936, Pius wrote several protests against the Nazis, while his attitude to Mussolini's Italy changed dramatically in 1938, after Nazi racial policies were adopted in Italy. Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli (future Pius XII) served as Pius XI's Secretary of State, in which capacity he made some 55 protests against Nazi policies, including its « ideology of race » . In England over the period, there was a revival of interest in the notion of « Christendom » , which it was hoped, would serve as a counter to Fascism and Communism. Gilbert Keith Chesterton had written and spoken on the subject and was appointed a Knight of Saint-Gregory by the Holy-See in 1934.

Pius XI watched the rising tide of Totalitarianism with alarm and delivered 3 papal Encyclicals challenging the new creeds : against Italian Fascism « Non abbiamo bisogno » (1931 ; « We do not need (to acquaint you) ») ; against Nazism « Mit brennender Sorge » (1937 ; « With deep concern ») and against atheist Communist « Divini redemptoris » (1937 ; « Divine Redeemer ») . He also challenged the extremist nationalism of the « Action Française » movement and anti-Semitism in the United States. 1931's « Non abbiamo bisogno » condemned Italian Fascism's « pagan worship of the State » and « revolution which snatches the young from the Church and from Jesus-Christ, and which inculcates in its own young people hatred, violence and irreverence » . In 1936, with the Church in Germany facing clear persecution, Italy and Germany agreed the Berlin-Rome Axis. By early 1937, the Church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, had become highly-disillusioned. Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber drafted the Holy-See's response in January 1937, and, in March, Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical. It accused the Nazi Government of violations of the 1933 Concordat, and further that it was sowing the « tares of suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » . The Pope noted on the horizon the « threatening storm clouds » of religious Wars of extermination over Germany. Pius XI commissioned the American Jesuit John Lafarge to prepare a draft for an Encyclical, « Humani generis unitas » (The Unity of the Human Race) , demonstrating the incompatibility of Catholicism and racism. However, Pius XI did not issue the proposed Encyclical before his death, nor did his successor Pius XII, partly fearing it might antagonize Italy and Germany at a time where he hoped to act as an impartial peace broker.

From the earliest days of the Nazi take-over in Germany, the Vatican was taking diplomatic action to attempt to defend the Jews of Germany. In the spring of 1933, Pope Pius XI urged Mussolini to ask Hitler to restrain the anti-Semitic actions taking place in Germany. Pius XI asserted to a group of pilgrims that anti-Semitism is incompatible with Christianity :

« Mark well that in the Catholic Mass, Abraham is our Patriarch and forefather. Anti-Semitism is incompatible with the lofty thought which that fact expresses. It is a movement with which we Christians can have nothing to do. No, no, I say to you it is impossible for a Christian to take part in anti-Semitism. It is inadmissible. Through Christ and, in Christ, we are the spiritual progeny of Abraham. Spiritually, we are all Semites. »

(Pope Pius XI, 1933.)

As the newly-installed Nazi Government began to instigate its program of anti-Semitism, Pope Pius XI, through Pacelli, ordered the Papal Nuncio in Berlin, Cesare Orsenigo, to « look into whether and how it may be possible to become involved » in their aid. Orsenigo proved a poor instrument in this regard, concerned more with the anti-Church policies of the Nazis and how these might effect German Catholics, than with taking action to help German Jews. Cardinal Innitzer called him timid and ineffectual with respect to the worsening situation for German Jewry. Appearing before 250,000 pilgrims at Lourdes, in April 1935, Cardinal Pacelli said :

« The Nazis are, in reality, only miserable plagiarists who dress-up old errors with new tinsel. It does not make any difference whether they flock to the banners of the social revolution, whether they are guided by a false conception of the world and of life, or whether they are possessed by the superstition of a race and blood cult. »

(Cardinal Secretary of State Eugenio Pacelli, Lourdes, April 1935.)

In 1936, Nuncio Orsenigo asked Cardinal Secretary of State Pacelli for instructions regarding an invitation from Hitler to attend a Nazi Party meeting in Nuremberg, along with the entire diplomatic corps.

Pacelli replied :

« The Holy Father thinks it is preferable that your Excellency abstain, taking a few days' vacation. »

In 1937, Orsenigo was invited along with the diplomatic corps to a reception for Hitler's birthday. Orsenigo, again, asked the Vatican if he should attend.

Pacelli's reply was :

« The Holy Father thinks not. Also because of the position of this Embassy, the Holy Father believes it is preferable in the present situation if your Excellency abstains from taking part in manifestations of homage toward the Lord Chancellor. »

During Hitler's visit to Rome in 1938, Pius XI and Pacelli avoided meeting with him by leaving Rome a month early for the papal summer residence of Castel Gandolfo. The Vatican was closed, and the priests and religious brothers and sisters left in Rome were told not to participate in the festivities and celebrations surrounding Hitler's Visit.

On the Feast of the Holy Cross, Pius XI said from Castel Gandolfo :

« It saddens me to think that today in Rome the cross that is worshipped is not the Cross of our Saviour. »

Eugenio Pacelli was elected to succeed Pope Pius XI at the papal conclave of March 1939. Taking the name of his predecessor as a sign of continuity, he became Pius XII. In the lead-up to War, he sought to act as a peace broker. As the Holy-See had done during the pontificate of Benedict XV (1914-1922) during World War I, the Vatican under, Pius XII (February 1939 - September 1958), pursued a policy of diplomatic neutrality through World War II - Pius XII, like Benedict XV, described the position as « impartiality », rather than « neutrality ». A cautious diplomat, he did not name the Nazis in his War-time condemnations of racism and genocide, but intervened to save the lives of thousands of Jews through sheltering them in Church institutions and ordering his Church to offer discreet aid. Upon his death in 1958, he was praised by world-leaders and Jewish groups for his actions during World War II, but his not specifically condemning what was later termed the « Nazi Holocaust », has become a matter of controversy.

Pius XII's relations with the Axis and Allied forces may have been impartial, and his policies tinged with uncompromising anti-Communism, but, early in the War, he shared intelligence with the Allies about the German Resistance and planned invasion of the Low-Countries and lobbied Mussolini to stay neutral.

With Poland overrun, but France and the Low-Countries yet to be attacked, Pius continued to hope for a negotiated peace to prevent the spread of the conflict. The similarly minded U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt re-established American diplomatic relations with the Vatican after a 70 year hiatus by dispatching Myron C. Taylor as his personal representative. Pius warmly welcomed Roosevelt's envoy. Taylor urged Pius XII to explicitly condemn Nazi atrocities. Instead, Pius XII spoke against the « evils of modern warfare », but did not go further. This may have been so for fear of Nazi retaliation experienced previously with the issuance of the Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » in 1937.

Pius allowed national hierarchies to assess and respond to their local situations and utilized Vatican Radio to promote aid to thousands of War refugees, and saved further thousands of lives by instructing the Church to provide discreet aid to Jews. To confidantes, Hitler scorned Pius XII as a black-mailer on his back, who constricted his ally Mussolini and leaked confidential German correspondence to the world. For opposition from the Church, he vowed « retribution to the last farthing » after the conclusion of the War.

The Nazi authorities disapproved of Pacelli's election as Pope. Historian of the Holocaust Martin Gilbert wrote :

« So outspoken were Pacelli's criticisms that Hitler's government lobbied against him, trying to prevent his becoming the successor to Pius XI. When he did become Pope, as Pius XII, in March 1939, Nazi Germany was the only government not to send a representative to his coronation. »

Göebbels noted in his diary, on 4 March 1939, that Hitler was considering whether to abrogate the Concordat with Rome in light of Pacelli's election as Pope, adding :

« This will surely happen when Pacelli undertakes his 1st hostile act. »

Joseph Lichten wrote :

Pacelli had obviously established his position clearly, for the Fascist governments of both Italy and Germany spoke-out vigorously against the possibility of his election to succeed Pius XI, in March 1939, though the Cardinal Secretary of State had served as Papal Nuncio in Germany, from 1917 to 1929.

The day after Pacelli's election, the « Berlin Morgenpost » said :

« The election of Cardinal Pacelli is not accepted with favour in Germany because he was always opposed to Nazism and practically determined the policies of the Vatican under his predecessor. »

« Der Angriff » , the Nazi Party organ, warned that Pius' policies would lead to a « crusade against the totalitarian States » . According to Karol Jozef Gajewski, Heinrich Himmler's « Das Schwarze Korps » (The Black Corps) , house newspaper of the SS, had formerly labelled Pacelli a « co-conspirator with Jews and Communists against Nazism » and decried his election as « the Chief Rabbi of the Christians, boss of the firm of Judah-Rome » .

Pius selected Cardinal Luigi Maglione as his Secretary of State, and retained Domenico Tardini and Giovanni Montini (future Pope Paul VI) as Under-Secretaries of State. According to Hebblethwaite, Maglione was pro-democracy and anti-dictatorship, « detested Hitler and thought Mussolini a clown » , but the career-diplomat Pope largely reserved diplomatic matters for himself. The new Pope hoped to stop Hitler's War, and inaugurated his reign with a message of peace to Germany, and, the day after Hitler and Stalin signed their secret pact, sealing the fate of Poland, Pius delivered a 24 August appeal for peace :

« I speak to all of you, leaders of nations, in the name of God ... lay aside threats and accusations ... It is by force of reason and not by force of arms that justice makes progress. Empires not founded on justice are not blessed by God. Immoral policy is not successful policy. »

(Pope Pius XII, 24 August 1939.)

Some historians have argued that Pacelli, as Cardinal Secretary of State, dissuaded Pope Pius XI (who was nearing death at the time) from condemning « Kristallnacht » in November 1938, when he was informed of it by the Papal Nuncio in Berlin. Likewise, the draft for the preposed Encyclical « Humani generis unitas » (On the Unity of Human Society) , which was ready in September 1938, was, according to the 2 publishers of the draft text and other sources, not forwarded to the Vatican by the Jesuit General Wlodimir Ledochowski. On 28 January 1939, 11 days before the death of Pope Pius XI, a disappointed Gundlach informed author LaFarge :

« It cannot continue like this. The text has not been forwarded to the Vatican. »

He had talked to the American assistant to Father General, who promised to look into the matter in December 1938, but did not report back. It contained an open and clear condemnation of colonialism, racism and anti-Semitism. Some historians have argued that Pacelli learned about its existence only after the death of Pius XI and did not promulgate it as Pope. He did however use parts of it in his inaugural Encyclical « Summi Pontificatus », which he titled « On the Unity of Human Society. »

Pope Pius XII lobbied world-leaders to prevent the outbreak of World War II, up to the very last day of peace. On 24 August 1939, he made a public broadcast appealing for peace, and, on 31 August, the last day before the War, the Pope wrote to the German, Polish, Italian, British and French governments saying that he was unwilling to abandon hope that pending negotiations might lead to « a just pacific solution » and beseeching the Germans and Polish « in the name of God » to avoid « any incident » and for the British, French and Italians to support his appeal. The « pending negotiations » turned-out to be a mere Nazi propaganda trick. The following day, Hitler invaded Poland.

« Summi Pontificatus » (On the Limitations of the Authority of the State) , issued 20 October 1939, was the 1st papal Encyclical issued by Pius, and established some of the themes of his papacy. Couched in diplomatic language, Pius endorses Catholic resistance and states his disapproval of the War, racism, anti-Semitism, the invasion of Poland, and the persecutions of the Church. With Italy not yet an ally of Hitler in the War, Italians were called upon to remain faithful to the Church. Pius avoided accusing Hitler and Stalin, establishing the « impartial » public tone which critics have used against him in later assessments of his pontificate :

« A full statement of the doctrinal stand to be taken in face of the errors of today, if necessary, can be put-off to another time unless there is disturbance by calamitous external events ; for the moment We limit Ourselves to some fundamental observations. »

Pius wrote of « anti-Christian movements » bringing forth a crop « poignant disasters » and called for love, mercy and compassion against the « deluge of discord » . Following themes addressed in « Non abbiamo bisogno » (1931) ; « Mit brennender Sorge » (1937) and « Divini redemptoris » (1937) , Pius wrote of a need to bring back to the Church those who were following « a false standard misled by error, passion, temptation and prejudice, who have strayed away from faith in the true God » . He wrote of « Christians unfortunately more in name than in fact » showing « cowardice » in the face of persecution by these creeds, and endorsed resistance.

In a further rejection of Nazi ideology, Pius reiterated Catholic opposition to racism and anti-Semitism, saying that man « is neither Gentile nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free. But Christ is all and in all » .

Pius commented on the invasion of Poland as well :

« The blood of countless human beings, even non-combatants, raises a piteous dirge over a nation such as Our dear Poland, which, for its fidelity to the Church, for its services in the defense of Christian civilization, written in indelible characters in the annals of history, has a right to the generous and brotherly sympathy of the whole world. In Poland, the Nazis murdered over 2,500 monks and priests and even more were imprisoned. »

With War underway, the focus of Holy-See policy became the prevention of Mussolini from bringing Italy into the War. In April 1940, the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, officially complained to Cardinal Secretary of State Maglione, that so many churches were offering « sermons about peace and peace demonstrations, perhaps inspired by the Vatican » , and the Italian Ambassador to the Holy-See complained that « L'Osservatore Romano » was too favourable to the democracies.

With Poland overrun but France and the Low-Countries yet to be attacked, the German Resistance sought the Pope's assistance in preparations for a « coup » to oust Hitler. Pius advised the British in 1940 of the readiness of certain German generals to overthrow Hitler if they could be assured of an honourable peace, offered assistance to the German resistance in the event of a « coup » and warned the Allies of the planned German invasion of the Low-Countries in 1940.

Colonel Hans Oster of the « Abwehr » sent Munich lawyer and devout Catholic, Josef Müller, on a clandestine trip to Rome to seek Papal assistance in the developing plot. The Pope's Private Secretary, Robert Leiber acted at the intermediary between Pius and the Resistance. He met with Müller, who visited Rome in 1939 and 1940. The Vatican considered Müller to be a representative of Colonel-General Ludwig Beck and agreed to assist mediation. Pius, communicating with Britain's Francis d'Arcy Osborne, channelled communications back and forth in secrecy. The Vatican agreed to send a letter outlining the bases for peace with England and the participation of the Pope was used to try to persuade senior German Generals Halder and Brauchitsch to act against Hitler. Hoffmann wrote that, when the Venlo Incident stalled the talks, the British agreed to resume discussions primarily because of the « efforts of the Pope and the respect in which he was held. Chamberlain and Halifax set great store by the Pope's readiness to mediate. » Pius, advised Osbourne that a German offensive was planned for February, but that this could be averted if the German generals could be assured of peace with Britain, and not on punitive terms. The British government was non-committal, nevertheless, the resistance were encouraged by the talks, and Müller told Leiber that a « coup » would occur in February. Pius appeared to continue to hope for a « coup » in Germany into March 1940.

On 4 May 1940, the Vatican advised the Netherlands envoy to the Vatican that the Germans planned to invade France through the Netherlands and Belgium on 10 May. On 7 May, Alfred Jodl noted in his diary that the Germans knew the Belgian envoy to the Vatican had been tipped-off, and the « Führer » was greatly agitated by the danger of treachery. Following the Fall of France, peace overtures continued to emanate from the Vatican as well as Sweden and the United States, to which Churchill responded resolutely that Germany would have to free its conquered territories. In Rome in 1942, U.S. envoy Myron C. Taylor, thanked the Holy-See for the « forthright and heroic expressions of indignation made by Pope Pius XII when Germany invaded the Low-Countries » . Müller was arrested in a 1943 raid on the « Abwehr » and spent the rest of the War in concentration camps, ending-up at Dachau. The raid marked a serious blow to the Resistance. Following the arrests, Beck's 1st order was for an account of the incidents to be sent to the Pope. Hans Bernd Gisevius was sent in place of Müller to advise of the developments and met with Friar Leiber.

Unsuccessfully, Pius attempted to dissuade the Italian Dictator Benito Mussolini from joining Nazi Germany in the War. Following the Fall of France, Pius XII wrote confidentially to Hitler, Churchill and Mussolini proposing to offer to mediate a « just and honourable peace » , but asking to receive confidential advice in advance of how such an offer would be received. When, by 1943, the War had turned against the Axis Powers, and Mussolini's Foreign Minister Count Ciano was relieved of his post and sent to the Vatican as ambassador, Hitler suspected that he had been sent to arrange a separate peace with the Allies. On July 25, the Italian King dismissed Mussolini. Hitler's told Alfred Jodl to organize for a German force to go to Rome and arrest the Government and restore Mussolini.

Asked about the Vatican, Hitler said :

« I'll go right into the Vatican. Do you think the Vatican embarrasses me ? We'll take that over right away ... later we can make apologies. »

His generals urged caution.

After Mussolini was rescued by the Nazis and installed as leader in Northern Italy, the Vatican feared a Communist take-over, but refused to recognize Mussolini's new State. As Italy lurched towards civil war, the Vatican urged moderation. At Easter 1944, Italian Bishops were directed to « stigmatise every form of hatred, of vendetta, reprisal and violence, from wherever it comes » . 191 priests were killed by Fascists and 125 by the Germans, while 109 were killed by partisans. Though some joined pro-Fascist bands, the Vatican backed the so-called anti-Fascist « partisan chaplains » and « red priests » , hoping that they would provide religious guidance to partisans being exposed to Communist propaganda.

At the close of his predecessor's pontificate, Pacelli received word from nuncios of increasing persecution of the Jews in the 3rd « Reich » . According to Gordon Thomas, he already conceived of a strategy to work behind the scenes to help the Jews, because he believed « any form of denunciation in the name of the Vatican would inevitably provoke further reprisals against the Jews » . During his pontificate Pius XII, Catholic institutions across Europe were opened as shelter for Jews, and the institutions of the Vatican itself were employed in this purpose. Pius allowed the national hierarchies of the Church to assess and respond to their local situation under Nazi rule, but himself established the Vatican Information Service to provide aid to, and information about, war refugees and saved thousands of Jewish by directing the church to discreetly provide aid. According to the Encyclopædia Britannica, Pius chose to « use diplomacy to aid the persecuted » . Upon his death he was « praised effusively by world-leaders especially by Jewish groups for his actions during World War II on behalf of the persecuted » . The Israeli historian Pinchas Lapide interviewed war survivors concluded that Pius XII « was instrumental in saving at least 700,000, but probably as many as 860,000 Jews from certain death at Nazi hands » . Deák writes that most historians dispute this estimate while Rabbi David Dalin called Pinchas Lapide's work « the definitive work by a Jewish scholar » on the holocaust.

According to Thomas, of the 44 speeches Pacelli gave as Nuncio, 40 denounced aspects of Nazi ideology. In an open letter to the Bishop of Cologne, Pacelli described Hitler as a « false prophet of Lucifer » , while Hitler ordered the Nazi press to refer to Pacelli as a « Jew lover in the Vatican » . Following the « Kristalnacht » pogrom of 1938, the Vatican took steps to find refuge for Jews. « L'Osservatore Romano » (the Holy-See's newspaper) reported that Pacelli (as Vatican Secretary of State) condemned the pogrom. On 30 November, Pacelli issued an encoded message to Archbishops around the world, instructing them to apply for visas for « non-Aryan Catholics » for departure from Germany. The Concordat of 1933 had expressly provided for protection of converts to Christianity, but Pacelli intended the visas to be extended to all Jews. According to Thomas, some 200,000 Jews escaped the 3rd « Reich » under the scheme.

From 1939-1944, Pius XII supplied passports, money, tickets and letters of recommendation to foreign governments so Jewish refugees could receive visas. Through these actions, another 4,000 to 6,000 Jews reached safety. On 2 January 1940, the United Jewish Appeal for Refugees and Overseas Needs in Chicago sent the Pope a contribution of $ 125,000 toward the Vatican's efforts to save « all those persecuted because of religion or race ». The papal emigration program helped Jews gain admittance to Brazil. From 1939 to 1941, 3,000 Jews reached safety in South America. Giovanni Ferrofino is credited with saving 10,000 Jews. Acting on secret orders from Pius XII, Ferrofino obtained visas from the Portuguese Government and the Dominican Republic to secure their escape from Europe and sanctuary in the Americas. In response to Mussolini's anti-Jewish legislation, Pacelli arranged for Jewish friends and eminent Jewish doctors, scholars and scientists to emigrate safely to Palestine and the Americas. 23 were appointed to positions in Vatican educational institutions. At the outbreak of the War, local Bishops were instructed to assist those in need. In his first Encyclical, « Summi Pontificatus », Pius XII rejected anti-Semitism, stating that in the Catholic Church there is « neither Gentile nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision » .

In 1940, the Nazi Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop led the only senior Nazi delegation permitted an audience with Pius XII asked why the Pope had sided with the Allies, Pius replied with a list of recent Nazi atrocities and religious persecutions committed against Christians and Jews, in Germany, and in Poland, leading « The New York Times » to headline its report « Jews Rights Defended » and write of « burning words he spoke to “ Herr ” Ribbentrop about religious persecution » . Cardinal Secretary of State Luigi Maglione received a request from Chief Rabbi of Palestine Isaac Herzog, in the Spring of 1940, to intercede on behalf of Lithuanian Jews about to be deported to Germany. Pius called Ribbentrop on 11 March, repeatedly protesting against the treatment of Jews.

In 1942, Pius XII delivered a Christmas message over Vatican Radio which expressed sympathy for the victims of the Nazis' genocidal policies. From May 1942, the Nazis had commenced their industrialized slaughter of the Jews of Europe - the « Final Solution » . Gypsies and others were also marked for extermination.

The Pope addressed the racial persecutions in the following terms :

« Humanity owes this vow to those hundreds of thousands who, without any fault on their part, sometimes only because of their nationality or race, have been consigned to death or to a slow decline. » [also translated : « marked down for death or gradual extinction »]

« The New York Times » called Pius « a lonely voice crying-out of the silence of a continent » . The speech was made in the context of the near total domination of Europe by the armies of Nazi Germany at a time were the War had not yet turned in favour of the Allies.

According to the Encyclopædia Britannica, Pius refused to say more « fearing that public papal denunciations might provoke the Hitler regime to brutalize further those subject to Nazi terror (as it had when Dutch Bishops publicly protested earlier in the year) while jeopardizing the future of the church » .

Holocaust historian, Sir Martin Gilbert, assesses the response of the Reich Security Main Office calling Pius a « mouthpiece » of the Jews in response to his Christmas address, as clear evidence that all sides knew that Pius was one who was raising his voice for the victims of Nazi terror. Pius protested the deportations of Slovakian Jews to the Bratislava government from 1942.

In 1943, he protested that :

« The Holy-See would fail in its Divine Mandate if it did not deplore these measures, which gravely damage man in his natural right, mainly for the reason that these people belong to a certain race. »

Following the capitulation of Italy in September 1943, the Nazis occupied Rome. Pius held a secret meeting to plan how to save the Jews of the city and the many Allied PoWs, then, taking refuge in Rome. Monsignor Angelo Dell'Acqua acted as liaison with relief groups. When news of the 15 October 1943 round-up of Roman Jews reached the Pope, he instructed the Holy-See's Secretary of State, Cardinal Maglione to protest to the German Ambassador to « save these innocent people » . The Pope then ordered Rome's Catholic institutions to open themselves to the Jews, sheltering 4,715 of the 5,715 listed for deportation by the Nazis were sheltered in 150 institutions - 477 in the Vatican itself. As German round-ups continued in Northern Italy, the Pope opened his summer residence, Castel Gandolfo, to take in thousands of Jews and authorised institutions across the north to do the same.

Assessing Pius' role as a protector of Jews during the War, David Klinghoffer wrote for the « Jewish Journal » in 2005 that :

« I'm not sure it's true, as Dalin argues, that Pius saved more Jews than any other Righteous Gentile in World War II. But it seems fairly certain that he was, overall, a strenuous defender of Jews who saved tens of thousands, maybe hundreds of thousands. While 80 % of European Jews were murdered in the Holocaust, 85 % of Italian Jews survived, thanks in large part to the Vatican's efforts. »

In August 1944, Pius met British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, who was visiting Rome. During the meeting, and with the War ongoing, the Pope acknowledged the justice of punishing War criminals, but expressed a hope that the people of Italy would not be punished, preferring that they be made « full allies » .

In Croatia, the Vatican used a Benedictine abbot, Giuseppe Marcone, as its Apostolic Visitor (together with Archbishop Aloysius Stepinac of Zagreb) to pressure its leader Pavelić to cease its facilitation of race murders.

In the newly-formed Slovak Republic, the Apostolic Delegate to Bratislava Giuseppe Burzio protested the anti-Semitism and totalitarianism of the pro-nazi State. From 1942 onwards, the Vatican protested the deportations of Jews by the Nazi allied Slovakian government.

From 1943, Pius instructed his Bulgarian representative to take « all necessary steps » to support Bulgarian Jews facing deportation and his Turkish Nuncio, Angelo Roncalli (later, Pope John XXIII) arranged for the transfer of thousands of children out of Bulgaria to Palestine. Roncalli also advised the Pope of Jewish concentration camps in Romanian occupied Transnistria. The Pope protested to the Romanian government and authorized for funds to be sent to the camps. Roncalli saved a number of Croatian, Bulgarian and Hungarian Jews by assisting their migration to Palestine. He succeeded Pius XII as Pope John XXIII, and always said that he had been acting on the orders of Pius XII in his actions to rescue Jews. In 1944, Pius appealed directly to the Hungarian government to halt the deportation of the Jews of Hungary and his Nuncio, Angelo Rotta, led a city-wide rescue scheme in Budapest. Rotta been recognized as Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority. Andrea Cassulo, the Papal Nuncio to Bucharest and the Ion Antonescu government had also been honoured as Righteous among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

In 1944, the Chief Rabbi of Bucharest praised the work of Cassulo on behalf of Romania's Jews :

« The generous assistance of the Holy-See was decisive and salutary. It is not easy for us to find the right words to express the warmth and consolation we experienced because of the concern of the supreme Pontiff, who offered a large sum to relieve the sufferings of deported Jews - sufferings which had been pointed-out to him by you after your visit to Transnistria. The Jews of Romania will never forget these facts of historic importance. »

In public, Pius XII spoke cautiously in relation to Nazi crimes, though under his leadership, thousands of Jews were offered refuge in monasteries, convents and the Vatican itself. According to Hitler biographer John Toland, the church saved more Jews than all other churches and rescue organizations combined. When Myron C. Taylor, U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt's personal representative to the Vatican, urged him to condemn Nazi atrocities - Pius « obliquely referred to the evils of modern warfare » , fearing that to go further would provoke Hitler into brutal action, as occurred following the 1942 protest by Dutch Bishops against the deportation of Jews.

In a conversation with Archbishop Giovanni Battista Montini (later, Pope Paul VI) , Pius said :

« We would like to utter words of fire against such actions ; and the only thing restraining Us from speaking is the fear of making the plight of the victims worse. »

In June 1943, Pope Pius XII told the Sacred College of Cardinals in a secret address that :

« Every word We address to the competent authority on this subject, and all Our public utterances have to be carefully weighed and measured by Us in the interests of the victims themselves, lest, contrary to Our intentions, We make their situation worse and harder to bear. »

Catholic clergy, religious and laity, especially converted Jews, all suffered persecution under the Nazis. Such Nazi brutality made an enormous impression on Pius XII.

Doctor Peter Gumpel writes :

« The action of the Dutch Bishops had important repercussions. Pius XII had already prepared the text of a public protest against the persecution of the Jews. Shortly before this text was sent to “ L'Osservatore Romano ”, news reached him of the disastrous consequences of the Dutch Bishops' initiative. He concluded that public protests, far from alleviating the fate of the Jews, aggravated their persecution and he decided that he could not take the responsibility of his own intervention having similar and probably even much more serious consequences. Therefore, he burnt the text he had prepared. The International Red Cross, the nascent World Council of Churches and other Christian Churches were fully aware of such consequences of vehement public protests and, like Pius XII, they wisely avoided them. »

In Poland, the Nazis murdered over 2,500 monks and priests and even more were imprisoned. In an 30 April 1943 letter to Bishop von Preysing of Berlin, Pius referred to the Nazi retribution in the Netherlands as one reason for muted criticism in his public statements :

« If the Pope had protested publicly, what then ? Hitler did as he liked. »

Leiber (speaking in 1966) concluded Pius XII clung to this « firm conviction : that it was better to keep silent » .

« We give to the pastors who are working on the local level the duty of determining if and to what degree the danger of reprisals and of various forms of oppression occasioned by episcopal declarations ... “ ad maiora mala vitanda ” (to avoid worse) ... seem to advise caution. Here lies one of the reasons, why We impose self-restraint on Ourselves in our speeches ; the experience, that we made in 1942 with papal addresses, which We authorized to be forwarded to the Believers, justifies our opinion, as far as We see ... The Holy-See has done whatever was in its power, with charitable, financial and moral assistance. To say nothing of the substantial sums which we spent in American money for the fares of immigrants. »

(Pius XII, letter to Bishop von Preysing of Berlin, 1943.)

Furthermore, without being even-handed and condemning Stalin's atrocities against Soviet and Polish citizens, the Pope would be vulnerable to accusations of bias ; which could have seriously undermined the influence the Vatican might have with Germany. The Allies were exceedingly anxious to prevent a Papal condemnation of Stalin, which would have hurt the Allied effort. According to Piotrowski, Pius XII also never publicly condemned the Nazi massacre of 1.8 to 1.9 million mainly Catholic Poles (including 2,935 members of the Catholic Clergy) , nor did he ever publicly condemn the Soviet Union for the deaths of 1,000,000 mainly Catholic Polish citizens including an untold number of clergy. In December 1942, when Tittman asked Cardinal Secretary of State Maglione if Pius would issue a proclamation similar to the Allied declaration « German Policy of Extermination of the Jewish Race » , Maglione replied that the Vatican was « unable to denounce publicly particular atrocities » . However, in his 1942 Christmas address, the Pope proceeded to voice concerns for the « hundreds of thousands who, through no fault of their own, and solely because of their nation or race, have been condemned to death or progressive extinction » .

I month later, Joachim von Ribbentrop wrote to Germany's Vatican ambassador :

« There are signs that the Vatican is likely to renounce its traditional neutral attitude and take-up a political position against Germany. You are to inform him (the Pope) that in that event Germany does not lack physical means of retaliation. »

The Ambassador reported that Pius indicated that :

« He did not care what happened to himself, but that a struggle between Church and State could have only one outcome - the defeat of the State. I replied that I was of the contrary opinion ... an open battle could bring some very unpleasant surprises for the Church ... Pacelli (Pius XII) is no more sensible to threats than we are. In event of an open breach with us, he now calculates that some German Catholics will leave the Church but he is convinced that the majority will remain true to their Faith. And that the German Catholic clergy will screw-up its courage, prepared for the greatest sacrifices. »

Assessments of Pius's role during World War II were initially positive ; however, following his death, some have been more critical. Early on the Soviets were keen to discredit Pius in the eyes of Catholics in the Eastern Bloc. Some historians argue the Pope did not « do enough » to prevent the Holocaust. Commentators said he was « silent » in the face of the Holocaust. Others have accused the Church and Pius of anti-Semitism. These accusations are strongly contested. According to historian William Doyno (author of « The Pius War : Responses to the Critics of Pius XII ») , Pius XII was « emphatically not “ silent ”, and did condemn the Nazis' horrific crimes through Vatican Radio, his 1st Encyclical, “ Summi Pontificatus ”, major addresses (especially, his Christmas allocutions) , the “ L'Osservatore Romano ” » and he « intervened, time and time again, for persecuted Jews, particularly, during the German occupation of Rome. He was cited and hailed by the Catholic rescuers as their leader and director. »

David Kertzer accuses the Church of « encouraging Centuries of anti-Semitism » , and Pius XII of not doing enough to stop Nazi atrocities. Many scholars dispute Kertzer. Jose Sanchez, of Saint-Louis University criticized Kertzer's work as polemical exaggerating the papacy's role in anti-Semitism. Scholar of Jewish-Christian relations Rabbi David G. Dalin criticized Kertzer for using evidence selectively to support his thesis. Ronald J. Rychlak, lawyer and author of « Hitler, the War, and the Pope » decried Kertzer's work for omitting strong evidence the Church was not anti-Semitic. Others, including prominent members of the Jewish community, have refuted criticisms and written highly of Pius' efforts to protect Jews. Among the prominent Jews to praise Pius after the War was Rabbi Isaac Herzog. Other prominent members of the Jewish community have also defended Pius. Lichten, Lapide, and other Jewish historians report that the Catholic Church provided funds totalling in the millions of dollars to assist Jews during World War II. In the summer of 1942, Pius explained to his college of Cardinals the reasons for the great gulf that existed between Jews and Christians at the theological level :

« Jerusalem has responded to His call and to His grace with the same rigid blindness and stubborn ingratitude that has led it along the path of guilt to the murder of God. »

Historian Guido Knopp describes these comments of Pius as being « incomprehensible » at a time when « Jerusalem was being murdered by the million » .

In 1999, British writer John Cornwell published the highly-controversial Hitler's Pope, which charged Pius assisted the legitimization of the Nazis by agreeing to the 1933 « Reichskonkordat » . The book is critical of Pius, arguing, he did not « do enough » , or « speak-out enough » , against the Holocaust. Cornwell wrote that Pius' entire career was characterized by a desire to increase and centralize the power of the Papacy, and subordinated opposition to the Nazis to that goal. He further argued Pius was anti-Semitic and this stance prevented him from caring about the European Jews. The Encyclopædia Britannica assesses Cornwell's depiction of Pius as anti-Semitic and indifferent to the Holocaust as lacking « credible substantiation » . Various commentators have subsequently characterized his book as having been « debunked » .

Cornwell, himself, has since retracted his accusations in substantial part, saying that it is « impossible to judge the motives » of the Pope but that :

« Nevertheless, due to his ineffectual and diplomatic language in respect of the Nazis and the Jews, I still believe that it was incumbent on him to explain his failure to speak-out after the War. This he never did. »

Historian John Toland noted :

« The Church, under the Pope's guidance ... saved the lives of more Jews than all other churches, religious institutions and rescue organizations combined ... hiding thousands of Jews in its monasteries, convents and the Vatican itself. The record of the Allies was far more shameful. »

In 1963, The Deputy, a fictional play by German playwright Rolf Hochhuth contained an unhistorical depiction of the Pope as indifferent to the Nazi genocide. John Cornwell, depicted the Pope as an anti-Semite. In an assessment by the Encyclopædia Britannica :

« Both depictions, however, lack credible substantiation » and « though Pius's War-time public condemnations of racism and genocide were cloaked in generalities, he did not turn a blind eye to the suffering but chose to use diplomacy to aid the persecuted. It is impossible to know if a more forthright condemnation of the Holocaust would have proved more effective in saving lives, though it probably would have better assured his reputation. »

The conversion of Jews to Catholicism during the Holocaust is one of the most controversial aspects of the record of Pius XII.

According to Roth and Ritner :

« This is a key-point because, in debates about Pius XII, his defenders regularly point to denunciations of racism and defense of Jewish converts as evidence of opposition to anti-Semitism of all sorts. The Holocaust is one of the most acute examples of the “ recurrent and acutely painful issue in the Catholic-Jewish dialogue ”, namely “ Christian efforts to convert Jews ”. »

In his study of the rescuers of the Jews, Martin Gilbert noted the heavy involvement of the Christian Churches, and wrote that many of the rescued eventually converted to Christianity, and were absorbed into the faith and a « sense of belonging to the religion of the rescuers. It was the price (the penalty, from a strictly Orthodox Jewish perspective) that was paid hundreds, even thousands, of times for the gift of life. »

After the War, clandestine networks smuggled fugitive Axis officials out of Europe. The U.S. code named the activity the « Ratline » . In Rome, pro-Nazi Austrian Bishop, Alois Hudal, was linked to the chain, and the Croatian College offered refuge to Croatian fugitives, guided by Monsignor Krunoslav Draganovic. Catholics and non-Nazi Catholic leaders were being arrested as potential sources of dissent in the new Communist Republics being formed across Eastern Europe and sought to emigrate. This migration was exploited by some Axis fugitives. Potential anti-Communist leaders were being framed by anti-Catholic governments, as with the anti-Nazi Archbishop József Mindszenty in Hungary, the Żegota Jewish aid council in Poland, and the Croatian Archbishop of Zagreb, Aloysius Stepinac.

Bishop Alois Hudal, the former rector of the pan-Germanic college in Rome training German priests, was secretly a member of the Nazi Party and informant for German Intelligence. Gerald Steinacher wrote that Hudal enjoyed close personal relations with Pius XII for many years prior and was an influential figure in the process of escape. The Vatican Refugee Committees for Croats, Slovenes, Ukrainians and Hungarians aided former Fascists and Nazi collaborators to escape those countries.

Rome had been advised the new Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was threatening to destroy Catholicism within its territory. In this climate, wrote Hebblethwaite, the Church faced the prospect that the risk of handing over the innocent could be « greater than the danger that some of the guilty should escape » . Croatian priest Krunoslav Draganovic aided Croatian Fascists to escape through Rome. Ventresca wrote that there is evidence to suggest that Pius XII gave tacit approval to his work and that, according to reports from the CIC (Counter Intelligence Corps) agent, Robert Mudd, some 100 Ustasa were in hiding at the Saint-Jerome seminary hoping to reach Argentina in due course through Vatican channels, and with the full-knowledge of the Vatican. Within days of Pius XII's death (1958) , Vatican officials asked Draganovic to leave the College of Saint-Jerome from where he operated since the latter part of the War. According to Hebblethwaite however, Draganovic « was a law unto himself and ran his own show » . In 1948, Draganovic brought the Nazi collaborator, and wanted war criminal, Ante Pavelić, to the Collegio Pio Latino Americano disguised as a priest until Argentine President Juan Perón invited him to the country.

Since the end of the Second World War, the Catholic Church has moved to honour Catholic resisters, victims of Nazism, canonisation of Saints, beatification of the virtuous and recognition of martyrs. The Church has also issued statements of repentance for its failings and that of its membership during the Nazi Era. Pius XII elevated a number of high-profile resisters of Nazism to the College of Cardinals, in 1946. Among them, Bishop Joseph Frings of Cologne who succeeded the more passive Cardinal Bertram as chairman of the Fulda Bishops' Conference, in July 1945. August von Galen of Munich and Konrad von Preysing of Berlin. Elsewhere in the liberated Nazi Empire, Pius selected other resisters : Dutch Archbishop Johannes de Jong ; Hungarian Bishop József Mindszenty ; Polish Archbishop Adam Stefan Sapieha ; and French Archbishop Jules-Géraud Saliège. Italian Papal diplomat Angelo Roncalli (later, Pope John XXIII) and Polish Archbishop Stefan Wyszyński were among those elevated in 1953.

Of the post-War popes, the Italians John XXIII and Pope Paul VI were actively involved in the protection of Jews during the War. Pope Benedict XVI had 1st hand experience of life in Nazi Germany. As a boy, he was forced to join the Hitler Youth, drafted into the anti-aircraft corps and trained as a child soldier. At the end of the War, he deserted, was briefly held as a POW and released.

...

The Church in Nazi Germany was subjected to as much pressure as any other organisation in Germany. Any perceived threat to Hitler could not be tolerated - and the churches of Germany potentially presented the Nazis with numerous threats.

In 1933, the Catholic Church had viewed the Nazis as a barrier to the spread of Communism from Russia. In this year, Hitler and the Catholic Church signed an agreement that he would not interfere with the Catholic Church while the Church would not comment on politics. However, this only lasted until 1937, when Hitler started a concerted attack on the Catholic Church arresting priests, etc. In 1937, the pope, Pius XI, issued his « Mit brennender Sorge » statement (With burning anxiety) over what was going on in Germany. However, there was never a total clamp-down on the Catholic Church in Germany. It was a world-wide movement with much international support.

The Protestant Church was really a collection of a number of churches - hence, they were easier to deal with. The Protestants themselves were split. The « German Christians » were lead by Ludwig Müller who believed that any member of the church who had Jewish ancestry should be sacked from the church. Müller supported Hitler and, in 1933, he was given the title of « Reich Bishop » .

Those who opposed the views of Müller were called the « Confessing Church » . This was led by Martin Niemöller. He was famous in Germany as he had been a World War I U-Boat captain. Therefore, he was potentially an embarrassing foe to the Nazis. Regardless of this, he was not safe from the « Gestapo » who arrested him for opposing Hitler. Niemöller was sent to a concentration camp for 7 years where he was kept in solitary confinement. Many other Confessional Church members suffered the same fate.

In 1936, the « Reich » Church was created. This did not have the Christian cross as its symbol but the swastika. The Bible was replaced by « Mein Kampf » which was placed on the altar. By it was a sword. Only invited Nazis were allowed to give sermons in a « Reich » Church.

In 1941, a secret report compiled by Protestants stated that children in Germany were being brought-up minus a Christian education. It stated that the Nazis confiscated vast areas of church property and that the Catholic Church in Germany was suffering from the same fate.

Christianity in Nazi Germany

It is estimated that at the beginning of the 20th Century about 67 % of the population in Germany were Protestants. However, the Catholics were strong in some areas such as in Bavaria. The Jews formed just under 1 % of the total population of Germany.

In the original programme of the Nazi Party drawn-up by Adolf Hitler, Anton Drexler and Gottfried Feder, in February 1920, promised religious freedom for all those religions except those which endangered the German race.

However, it soon became clear that Hitler had a deep hatred of Jews and appeared to believe they controlled all aspects of German life.

Konrad Heiden, who worked as a journalist in Germany, reported on a speech he made in 1922 :

« Jewry took a step which showed political genius. This capitalist people, which had brought the most unscrupulous exploitation into the world, found a way to lay hands on the leadership of the 4th estate (news media) . The Jew founded the Social-Democratic Party and the Communist movement. And with extraordinary dexterity, he gathered the leadership little by little into his own hands. »

The Christian Church and Adolf Hitler

These views were often shared by Christian leaders in Germany. In 1928, Bishop Otto Dibelius wrote about the « solution » to the « Jewish Problem » . He argued that all Jewish immigration from eastern Europe should be prohibited. As soon as this prohibition takes effect, the decline of Jewry would set in.

« The number of children of the Jewish families is small. The process of dying-out occurs surprisingly rapidly. »

It has been claimed by one historian that Bishop Dibelius' anti-Semitic sentiments were « well nigh representative of German Christendom » at the time.

The Protestant Church had a long history of anti-Semitism that dated back to Martin Luther. In 1543, Luther published « On the Jews and Their Lies » . In the final section of the book, Luther addressed himself to the question of how Christian rulers should treat their Jewish subjects.

« What shall we, Christians, do with this rejected and condemned people, the Jews ? Since they live among us, we dare not tolerate their conduct, now that we are aware of their lying and reviling and blaspheming. If we do, we become sharers in their lies, cursing and blasphemy. Ist to set fire to their synagogues or schools and to bury and cover with dirt whatever will not burn, so that no man will ever again see a stone or cinder of them. 2nd, I advise that their houses also be razed and destroyed. 3rd, I advise that all their prayer books and Talmudic writings, in which such idolatry, lies, cursing and blasphemy are taught, be taken from them. 4th, I advise that their rabbis be forbidden to teach, henceforth, on pain of loss of life and limb. »

As Derek Wilson pointed-out :

« Attitudes to his harsh and uncompromising advice have inevitably been coloured by the appalling events of later Centuries and predominately by the Holocaust. »

Ludwig Müller was an early supporter of the Nazi Party and openly expressed anti-Semitic views. In 1931, he helped establish the German Christian movement.

The following year, the group issued the statement :

« We stand on the ground of positive Christianity. We profess an affirmative faith in Christ, fitting our race and being in accordance with the German Lutheran mind and heroic piety. Mere compassion is charity and leads to presumption, paired with bad conscience, and effeminates a nation. We know something about Christian obligation and charity towards the helpless, but we also demand the protection of the nation from the unfit and inferior. We see a great danger to our nationality in the Jewish Mission. It promises to allow foreign blood into our nation. Marriages between Jews and Germans must be prohibited. »

As Adolf Hitler was brought-up as a Catholic, some Protestants were reluctant to vote for him. Otto Dibelius, the Bishop of Kurmark, had emerged as one of his strongest supporters. Before the 1932 Presidential election, Bishop Dibelius stated that in the past he had always encouraged people to vote for Protestant candidates.

However, this time he urged the people to vote for Adolf Hitler :

« Among the candidates there is once again a Catholic, namely Hitler. But he is not a candidate of the Roman Catholic Church, rather the leader of the great national movement, to which millions of the Protestants belong. »

Anti-Semitism in Nazi Germany

Once in power, Hitler began to openly express anti-Semitic ideas. Based on his readings of how blacks were denied civil rights in the southern States in America, Hitler attempted to make life so unpleasant for Jews in Germany that they would emigrate. The day after the March 1933 election, storm-troopers hunted-down Jews in Berlin and gave them savage beatings. Synagogues were trashed and all over Germany gangs of brownshirts attacked Jews. In the 1st 3 months of Hitler rule, over 40 Jews were murdered.

August von Galen, the Bishop of Münster and a supporter of Hitler because of his anti-Communism, criticized those religious figures who were quick to attack the new government. Von Galen spoke against those scholars who had criticized the Nazi government and called for « a just and objective evaluation of Hitler's new political movement » .

The campaign started on 1st April, 1933, when a one-day boycott of Jewish-owned shops took place. Members of the Sturm Abteilung (SA) picketed the shops to ensure the boycott was successful. Bishop Otto Dibelius, stated that he had always been « an anti-Semite » and that « one cannot fail to appreciate that in all of the corrosive manifestations of modern civilization Jewry plays a leading role » . It has been claimed that Dibelius' anti-Semitic sentiments were « well nigh representative of German Christendom in the beginning of 1933 » .

Michael von Faulhaber, the Archbishop of Munich and the author of « Judenum, Christentum, Germanentum » , that defended the principles of racial tolerance and humanity and called for the people of Germany to respect the Jewish religion. On 12 March 1933, Faulhaber went to see Pope Pius XI.

On his return, he made the following statement :

« After my recent experience in Rome in the highest-circles, which I cannot reveal here, I must say that I found, despite everything, a greater tolerance with regard to the new government. Let us meditate on the words of the Holy Father, who in a consistory, without mentioning his name, indicated before the whole world in Adolf Hitler the statesmen who 1st, after the Pope himself, has raised his voice against Bolshevism. »

On 24 April 1933, it was reported that :

« Cardinal Faulhaber had issued an order to the clergy to support the new regime in which he (Faulhaber) had confidence. »

In the 1st few months of the new government, no Church leaders spoke against the persecution of the Jews. The Concordat between the Nazis and the Catholic Church was signed in July 1933. It gave them the right to hold Catholic services and provided protection for its other organisations such as schools, youth groups and newspapers.

However, there was a clause in the agreement that said :

« Catholic clerics who hold an ecclesiastical office in Germany or who exercise pastoral or educational functions must be a German citizen. »

The reason for this is that with the rapid rise in anti-Semitism in Germany, some Jews had joined the Catholic Church for protection. When the Nuremberg Laws were passed, Jews lost the rights of citizenship and could no longer seek protection from the Catholic Church.

The lack of protests led to the claims that the church was unconcerned about anything except its own welfare. However, this was not true of all Catholics. Erich Klausener, the leader of the Berlin's Catholic Action movement, was an outspoken critic of Hitler's racial policies. A meeting held at Hoppegarten race-course, on 24 June 1934, where he spoke-out against political oppression, attracted 60,000 people. 6 days later, he was shot dead in his office by SS officer Kurt Gildisch. Not one German Cardinal or Bishop protested about this savage act.

Ludwig Müller the Bishop of the Reich

In July 1933, Pastor Ludwig Müller, a long-term supporter of Hitler was elected as « Reich » Bishop. His work was supported by Professor Ernst Bergmann who, in 1934, issued the 25 Points of the German Religion. This included the following :

The Jewish Old Testament as well as parts of the New Testament are not suitable for the new Germany.

Christ was not Jewish but a Nordic martyr put to death by the Jews, a warrior whose death rescued the world from Jewish influence.

Adolf Hitler is the new Messiah sent to earth to save the world from the Jews.

Susan Ottaway has argued that many Protestants saw Bergmann's theories as « utter drivel » .

She points out :

« The 2nd point alone high-lights the inconsistency of the doctrine. If Christ's death rescued the world from Jewish influence, why did the Nazis find it necessary to persecute them ? The entire document was complete non-sense and utterly at odds with any conventional view of Christianity. In spite of this it had its supporters. »

The « German Christians » became a pressure group and movement within German Protestantism. Bergmann became the most important academic involved in the movement. The « German Christians » ardently supported the Nazi doctrines of race and the leadership principle. By the time Hitler came to power, the movement had some 3,000 out of a total of 17,000 pastors, though their lay followers probably represented a larger percentage of church-goers.

The movement was popular with young pastors from lower middle-class backgrounds or non-academic families :

« Such men desired a Church whose members were soldiers from Jesus and the Fatherland, tough, hard and uncompromising. Muscular Christianity of this kind appealed particularly to young men who despised the feminization of religion through the involvement in charity, welfare and acts of compassion. »

Martin Niemöller was the pastor of the Church of Jesus-Christ at Dahlem. He was a long-term supporter of Hitler and he made speeches where he argued that Germany needed a « Führer » . In his sermons, he also espoused Hitler's views on race and nationality. During the 1933 General Election, he described the programme of the Nazi Party as a « renewal movement based on a Christian moral foundation » . However, he objected to the election of Müller and, on 21 September, he wrote to all German pastors inviting them to join him in his newly-formed Pastors' Emergency League. An estimated 7,000 pastors joined him including Dietrich Bonhoeffer in what was later called the Confessing Church.

Niemöller established himself as the leader of the Protestant resistance to Hitler. However, as he admitted later, he remained a committed member of the Nazi Party. Niemöller pointed-out that his group « acted as if we had only to sustain the church » and did not accept that they had a « responsibility for the whole nation » . Niemöller, therefore, did not criticize the Nazi Party for putting its political opponents into concentration camps.

Niemöller wrote after the War :

« Ist they came for the Communists, and I did not speak-out - because I was not a Communist. Then, they came for the Socialists, and I did not speak-out - because I was not a Socialist. Then, they came for the trade-unionists, and I did not speak-out - because I was not a trade-unionist. Then, they came for the Jews, and I did not speak-out - because I was not a Jew. Then, they came for me - and there was no one left to speak-out for me. »

Although religious leaders did little to resist Hitler, that is not true of the general population. Between 1933 and 1939, the ordinary courts sentenced 225,000 people to a total of 600,000 years' imprisonment for political and religious offences. During the Nazi period of power, 3 million Germans were held at one time or another in prison or in the concentration camps on political and religious grounds.

Bishop August von Galen became more critical of the Nazi government in 1934 and attacked the writings of Alfred Rosenberg. In his book, « The Myth of the 20th Century » , Rosenberg had claimed that Catholicism was the « creation of Jewish clericalism » .

Von Galen responded by claiming that Rosenberg's book illustrated that :

« There are heathens again in Germany. »

Josef Gœbbels and his Ministry of Propaganda, tried to influence the debate by « releasing a flood of accusations against Catholic organizations for financial corruption » .

Despite this, he retained his nationalistic views and, in 1936, he blessed the troops before they marched into the Rhineland. In 1937, Bishop August von Galen, Michæl von Faulhaber, the Archbishop of Munich and Konrad von Preysing, Bishop of Eichstätt, helped draft the Pope's anti-Nazi Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » (With Burning Concern) . The Encyclical addressed the problems being experienced by German Catholics and detailed the Pope's grave concerns about the way the Nazi government had ignored the terms of the Concordat of 1933.

Bishop Otto Dibelius was one of those who refused to accept the leadership of Bishop Ludwig Müller that was described as « Nazified Christianity » . He made it clear that he would not submit to control by the government in the exercise of his spiritual and pastoral functions. Over the next few years, he became associated with what became known as the Confessing Church. Leaders of this movement included Martin Niemöller and Dietrich Bonhoeffer. During this period, he also met Kurt Gerstein, who later claimed that he worked as a spy within the SS for the movement.

In March 1937, Bishop Dibelius wrote an open letter to Hans Kerrl, the Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs :

« The Church must be a church and not a state within the State. But the doctrine which you proclaim would have the effect of making the State into the Church in so far as the State, supported by its coercive powers, comes to decision with regard to the sermons that are preached and the faith that is confessed. Here lies the root of the whole struggle between the State and the Evangelical Church. As soon as the State endeavors to become Church and assumes power over the souls of men, then, we are bound by Luther's word to offer resistance in God's name. And that is what we shall do. »

Bishop Dibelius was brought before a special court, on a charge of treasonable attacks on the government. His acquittal upset the leaders of the German Christian movement. Adolf Hitler asked the court for a copy of its reasons for the judgment, but decided not to take action against his former ally.

The Church and « Kristallnacht »

Ernst vom Rath was murdered by Herschel Grynszpan, a young Jewish refugee in Paris on 9 November 1938. At a meeting of Nazi Party leaders that evening, Josef Goebbels suggested that there should be « spontaneous » anti-Jewish riots. Reinhard Heydrich sent urgent guide-lines to all police headquarters suggesting how they could start these disturbances. He ordered the destruction of all Jewish places of worship in Germany. Heydrich also gave instructions that the police should not interfere with demonstrations and surrounding buildings must not be damaged when burning synagogues.

Heinrich Müller, head of the Secret Political Police, sent-out an order to all regional and local commanders of the State police :

« Operations against Jews, in particular against their synagogues will commence very soon throughout Germany. There must be no interference. However, arrangements should be made, in consultation with the General Police, to prevent looting and other excesses.

Any vital archival material that might be in the synagogues must be secured by the fastest possible means.

Preparations must be made for the arrest of from 20,000 to 30,000 Jews within the “ Reich ”. In particular, affluent Jews are to be selected. Further directives will be forthcoming during the course of the night.

Should Jews be found in the possession of weapons during the impending operations the most severe measures must be taken. “ SS Verfügungstruppen ” and general SS may be called in for the overall operations. The State Police must under all circumstances maintain control of the operations by taking appropriate measures. »

Reinhard Heydrich ordered members of the « Gestapo » to make arrests following « Kristallnacht » :

As soon as the course of events during the night permits the release of the officials required, as many Jews in all districts, especially the rich, as can be accommodated in existing prisons are to be arrested. For the time being, only healthy male Jews, who are not too old, are to be detained. After the detentions have been carried-out the appropriate concentration camps are to be contracted immediately for the prompt accommodation of the Jews in the camps.

Josef Gœbbels wrote an article for the « Völkischer Beobachter » where he claimed that « Kristallnacht » was a spontaneous outbreak of feeling :

« The outbreak of fury by the people on the night of 9-10 November shows the patience of the German people has now been exhausted. It was neither organized nor prepared but it broke-out spontaneously. »

« Kristallnacht » (Crystal Night)

On 11 November 1938, Reinhard Heydrich reported to Hermann Göring, details of the night of terror :

« 74 Jews killed or seriously injured ; 20,000 arrested ; 815 shops and 171 homes destroyed ; 191 synagogues set on fire ; total damage costing 25 million marks, of which over 5 million was for broken glass. »

It was decided that :

« The Jews would have to pay for the damage they had provoked. A fine of 1 billion marks was levied for the slaying of vom Rath. »

Lucy S. Dawidowicz, the author of « The War Against the Jews » (1975) has pointed-out that a representative of the German insurance companies was invited to report on compensation for damages caused by the demonstrations :

« After a lengthy discussion, it was decided that the insurance companies had to pay the damages to retain their credibility. Where compensation was paid to Jews, the German government would arrange to confiscate those payments. »

The leaders of the Protestant and Catholic religions decided to stay silent and did not protest about the events of « Kristallnacht » . Even the breakaway Confessing Church took no stand on the issue. Richard Evans has pointed-out that much had changed since, when in 1933, Cardinal Michæl von Faulhaber had spoken-out « openly against pride in one's own race degenerating into hatred of another seemed to be long gone » .

Bishop Martin Sasse, head of the Protestant church of Thuringia, responded to « Kristallnacht » by publishing on 15 November, a pamphlet entitled « Martin Luther on the Jews : Away with Them ! » , in which he reprinted excerpts from Luther's notorious 1,543 pamphlet, « Against the Jews and Their Lies » , urging the destruction of Jewish property. Sasse claimed that the persecution of the Jews were fulfilling the goals of Luther.

Sasse stated this his objective was remove the church of Jewishness :

« Not only were baptized Jewish pastors, religion teachers and organists to be fired and baptized Jews excluded from church congregations ; not only were pastors forbidden to minister to baptized Jews ; not only was the Old Testament no longer to be presented in church to couples celebrating their 50th wedding anniversary ; not only was knowledge of biblical Hebrew, henceforth, eliminated as a requirement for ordination ; now, any traces of Jewishness in the New Testament, liturgy, music and theology of the church were to be hunted-down, exposed and eradicated. »

The Quakers had the best record for standing-up for the Jews following « Kristallnacht » and printed leaflets advocating « Decency over Patriotism » . According to Henning Mielke :

« The Berlin office of the Society of Friends worked on behalf of Jewish people who were not affiliated with a Jewish congregation, and also some of the political refugees. They were able at the last minute to evacuate 10,000 Jewish children to England in the so-called “ Kindertransporte ”. Quaker families in England and the United States took in the children. »

The Catholic Church and Euthanasia

Adolf Hitler made several speeches in favour of a euthanasia programme that would help to improve the quality of the German « race » .

He stated that if War came, he would implement the idea of euthanasia :

« Because I am of the opinion that such a program could be put into effect more smoothly and readily in time of War, that in the general upheaval of War the open resistance to be anticipated on the part of the Church would not play the part that might be expected. »

On 18 August 1939, the « Reich » Committee for the Scientific Registration of Serious Hereditary and Congenitally Based Diseases was set-up. Registration of all malformed children was now compulsory. In September, a circular was sent-out to all asylums and clinics in the « Reich » calling for registration of those suffering from illnesses which prevented their employment. Known as T-4, the euthanasia programme was run from the « Tiergarten » area of Berlin.

October 1939 : Adolf Hitler signed a « euthanasia decree » that authorized « Reichsleiter » Philipp Bouhler, the chief of his Chancellery, and Doctor Karl Brandt, Hitler's personal physician, to carry-out the programme of involuntary euthanasia :

« “ Reich ” Leader Bouhler and Doctor Brandt are entrusted with the responsibility of extending the authority of physicians, designated by name, so that patients who, on the basis of human judgment, are considered incurable, can be granted mercy death after a definitive diagnosis. »

Attempts were made to keep the T-4 programme a secret. It is estimated that about 70,000 patients died over the next 12 months. News of the sudden deaths of handicapped children began to spread in 1940.

Pope Pius XI issued a statement that :

« The direct killing of an innocent person because of mental or physical defects is not allowed. »

In 1941, Kurt Gerstein, an active opponent of Hitler, discovered that his sister-in-law, Bertha Ebeling, was a victim of the euthanasia program directed at the mentally ill. Gerstein was able to pass this information to several church leaders.

On 3 August, 1941, August von Galen, the Archbishop of Münster, spoke-out in a sermon against the Nazi practice of euthanasia :

« If the principle that man is entitled to kill his unproductive fellow man is established and applied, then, woe to all of us when we become aged and infirm ! Then, no man will be safe : some committee or other will be able to put him on the list of “ unproductive ” persons, who in their judgment have become “ unworthy to live ”. And there will be no police to protect him, no court to avenge his murder and bring his murderers to justice. Who could then have any confidence in a doctor ? He might report a patient as unproductive and, then, be given instructions to kill him ! It does not bear thinking of, the moral depravity, the universal mistrust, which will spread even in the bosom of the family, if this terrible doctrine is tolerated, accepted and put into practice. Woe to mankind ! Woe to our German people, if the divine commandment “ Thou shalt not kill ”, which the Lord proclaimed on Sinai amid thunder and lightning, which God our Creator wrote into man's conscience from the beginning, if this commandment is not merely violated but the violation is tolerated and remains unpunished ! »

It was reported that one woman who had attended the sermon hurried home to guard her elderly mother in case the « Gestapo » took her away to be murdered. Other people refused to undergo X-rays because they feared it was connected to the euthanasia programme. Details of the sermon were sent-out of the country. The BBC made broadcasts concerning it and the Royal Air Force dropped copies of it over Germany.

Brishop Galen also attacked the « Gestapo » habit of seizing Church buildings and converting them to their own uses - which included cinemas and even brothels. The contents of these sermons were printed and distributed throughout the country. Adolf Hitler wanted Galen arrested but Josef Gœbbels warned against this as Galen was a popular religious leader.

Hitler accepted that it was not a good idea to make martyrs of well-known Church leaders. However, people who were caught with copies of the sermon, or who discussed it with colleagues, were arrested and sent to concentration camps.

Richard Grunberger, the author of « A Social History of the 3rd “ Reich ” » (1971) has pointed-out :

« The regime took no action against Galen, but significantly, executed 3 Catholic priests at Lübeck who had distributed the text of Galen's sermon among soldiers. »

Bishop August von Galen did not give anymore sermons against the Nazi government.

In September 1941, he stated publicly that :

« We, Christians, do not make revolution. »

Hitler did not bring a halt to the programme. Instead, he changed his strategy :

« Thenceforth, patients would be killed by starvation and lethal medication in a larger number of extermination centres located within several asylums. This would be easier to conceal than the sudden removal and simultaneous disappearance of big groups of people. »

Although he had decided not to play any part in the resistance to Hitler his sermons did inspire others. A copy arrived at the home of Robert Scholl. 2 of his children, Hans Scholl and Sophie Scholl, organized the « White Rose » group. They joined forces with Christoph Probst, Alexander Schmorell, Willi Graf and Jugen Wittenstein and began distributing anti-nazi leaflets in Munich. They were caught and executed in April 1943.

The Holocaust

During the Second World War, a member of the Confessing Church, Kurt Gerstein, joined the Waffen SS in order « to see things from the inside » , to try to change the direction of policies, and to publicize the crimes being committed. In a letter to his wife, he told her that he had joined the SS as an « agent of the Confessing Church » . Gerstein later claimed he was working for Martin Niemöller.

Gerstein was sent to Belzec Extermination Camp to meet with Christian Wirth.

While there, he witnessed the killing of an entire trainload of Jews :

« When the train arrived, many were already dead, having been packed into the train with no room to move or lie down. The survivors were told that they were being sent to the bathhouse to be disinfected. They were assured that they would come to no harm and that they should breathe deeply to ensure that infectious diseases were prevented. The people were herded naked into the gas chamber. Families still clung together, children holding their parents' hands, husbands putting protective arms around their wives. The doors were slammed shut and the diesel pumping engine was started. Almost immediately, it broke-down. The minutes passed while engineers were brought in to mend the faulty engine. From inside, the gas chamber the sound of crying could be heard. Periodically, an SS officer peered through the glass-window in the door of the chamber to see what was happening inside. He reported that they were wailing like they did in the synagogue. This officer seemed to feel no sorrow or pity for the wretched souls squashed inside the small chamber, bodies pressed so tightly together that there was no room to turn or shift their weight from one leg to the other ; no room for a mother to bend to comfort the small child clinging to her legs. Eventually, after being trapped for more than 2 hours, the diesel engine croaked into life, but it took another 30 minutes of pumping the deadly carbon monoxide into the chamber before everyone inside was dead. »

Gerstein also told his contacts in the Confessional Church. This included Bishop Otto Dibelius and Martin Niemöller. He also passed the information to Diego Cesare Orsenigo, the representative of the Vatican in Berlin. However, he was a supporter of Adolf Hitler and refused to take any action. He told Pope Pius XI that he advocated conciliation out of a fear that if the Church came into conflict with the Nazi government it would lead to « lapsed religiosity among German Catholics » .

He argued that :

« Unless the clergy appeased the regime and relieved members of the church of a conflict of conscience. »

Gerstein later reported :

« My attempt to report all this to the head of the Legation of the Holy-See had no great success. I was asked if I was a soldier. Then, I was denied any kind of interview and was requested to leave the legation forthwith. I relate this to show how difficult it was, even for a German who was a bitter enemy of the Nazis, to succeed in discrediting this criminal government. I continued to inform hundreds of people of these horrible massacres. Among them, were the Niemöller family ; Doctor Hochstraßer, the press “ attaché ” at the Swiss legation in Berlin ; Doctor Winter, the co-adjutor of the Catholic Bishop of Berlin - so that he could transmit my information to the Bishop and to the Pope ; Doctor Dibelius, and many others. In this way, thousands of people were informed by me. »

Bishop Dibelius did nothing with this information. After the War, he claimed that he was not aware of the « full-implications » of the « final solution » :

« There was no evidence which would have stood-up in a court of law ; no Cardinal or Bishop was ever permitted to visit Auschwitz, Sobibor or Treblinka. Their knowledge was based on hearsay, but it is unlikely that they had any doubts as to the authoritative character of this information. »

Martin Niemöller spent the Second World War in Dachau Concentration Camp. As he was a First World War hero, Adolf Hitler gave orders for him to be left alive. His colleague, Dietrich Bonhoffer, was arrested in April 1943 and was charged with planning the « July Plot » . He was held in Buchenwald Concentration Camp until being executed in April 1945.

The Role of the Churches : Compliance and Confrontation

Churches throughout Europe were mostly silent while Jews were persecuted, deported and murdered by the Nazis. Churches, especially those in Nazi Germany, sought to act, as institutions tend to do, in their own best interests - narrowly defined, short-sighted interests.

The list of « by-standers » (those who declined to challenge the 3rd “ Reich ” in any way) that emerges from any study of the Holocaust is long and depressing. Few organizations, in or outside Nazi Germany, did much to resist Nazism or aid its victims.

« It has become abundantly clear that the Churches' failure to respond to the horrid events was not due to ignorance ; they knew what was happening. Ultimately, the Churches' lapses during the Nazi era were lapses of vision and determination. »

Assisting European Jews was not a high-priority of the Allied governments as they sought to defeat Hitler militarily. The courageous acts of individual rescuers and resistance members proved to be the exception, not the norm.

To a great extent, this inertia defined the organized Christian community as well. Churches throughout Europe were mostly silent while Jews were persecuted, deported and murdered. In Nazi Germany, in September 1935, there were a few Christians in the Protestant Confessing Church who demanded that their Church take a public stand in defense of the Jews. Their efforts, however, were over-ruled by Church leaders who wanted to avoid any conflict with the Nazi regime. Internationally, some Church leaders in Europe and North America did condemn the Nazis' measures against the Jews, and there were many debates about how Christians outside Nazi Germany and Nazi-occupied territory should best respond to Adolf Hitler's brutal policies. These discussions, however, tended to become focused more on secondary strategic considerations (like maintaining good relations with colleagues in the German Churches) than on the central humanitarian issues that were really at stake.

Churches throughout the world began to address their failures after 1945. Confessions of guilt have been issued by Catholic Churches in France and Germany, and most major Protestant denominations, beginning with the German Evangelical Church's Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt, in August 1945 (3 months after the War in Europe ended) . The early statements were vague, often referring only to the Churches' general lack of decisiveness in opposing Nazism. More recently, however, the Christian Churches have been far more specific - recognizing that they not only failed to resist Nazism, but actually helped prepare the way for the mass destruction of Europe's Jews through Centuries of proselytization, attacks on Judaism, and tacit or overt support for pogroms and other anti-Jewish violence.

These admissions of guilt are part of a difficult process, which still continues, in which Christians try to grasp exactly what happened to their Churches during the Holocaust. The examinations raise a number of questions :

Were the Churches, by and large, passive while millions of innocent people were murdered ?

To what extent can we say they resisted ?

To what extent were they guilty of active complicity ?

Most importantly : Why did the Churches respond as they did ?

These are, obviously, complex questions, historically and theologically.

Factors Shaping Behavior of Christian Churches

3 main factors shaped the behavior of the Christian Churches during the Nazi reign of terror in Germany and abroad. The 1st was the theological and doctrinal anti-Judaism that existed in parts of the Christian tradition. Long before 1933, the anti-Judaism that existed within the Churches (ranging from latent prejudice to the virulent diatribes of people like Martin Luther) lent legitimacy to the racial anti-Semitism that emerged in the late-19th Century. The 2nd factor was the Churches' historical role in creating « Christendom » - the Western European culture that, since the era of the Roman Emperor Constantine, had been explicitly and deliberately « Christian ». The Churches' advocacy of a « Christian culture » led to a « sacralization of cultural identity » (as the theologian Miroslav Volf puts it), in which dominant, positive values were seen as « Christian » ones, while developments viewed negatively (such as secularism and Marxism) were attributed to « Jewish » influences. Moreover, particularly in the German Evangelical Church (the largest Protestant Church in Germany), the allegiance to the concept of « Christendom » was linked to a strong nationalism, symbolized by German Protestantism's « Throne and Altar » alliance with State authority. The 3rd factor was the Churches' understanding of their institutional role. While most Christian religious leaders in Germany welcomed the end of the Weimar Republic and the resurgence of nationalism, they became increasingly uneasy about their institutions' future in what was clearly becoming a totalitarian State. (Moreover, many of the leading Nazis were overtly anti-Christian.) The Churches in Nazi Germany, while wanting to retain their prominent place in society, opposed any State control of their affairs. The Catholic Church and the Protestant Churches sought to maintain some degree of independence by entering into certain arrangements with the Nazi regime. The 1933 concordat, signed by representatives of the Nazi regime and the Vatican, ostensibly secured independence for Catholic schools and other Catholic institutions in Nazi Germany. The Protestant Churches, which were divided regionally, behaved cautiously (avoiding public confrontation and negotiating privately with Nazi authorities) in the hope that this would ensure institutional independence from direct Nazi control. Throughout Hitler's Germany, Bishops and other Christian religious leaders deliberately avoided antagonizing Nazi officials. When Christian clergymen and Christian women deplored Nazi policies, they often felt constrained to oppose those policies in a muted fashion. Even in the Protestant Confessing Church (the Church group in Germany that was most critical of Nazism), there was little support for official public criticism of the Nazi regime, particularly when it came to such central and risky issues as the persecution of Jews.

Anti-Judaism in Germany's Churches

The role of anti-Judaism in Germany's Churches during the Nazi era was a complicated one. Throughout the 1930's, there was ample evidence of anti-Semitism in many of the sermons and articles that appeared in the German Churches' publications. Some German Church leaders proudly announced that they were anti-Semites. Others, who weren't anti-Semitic, nevertheless warned their colleagues against any public show of support for the Jewish victims of the Nazi regime. Christian anti-Semitism often complemented other factors - notably, the strong nationalism in the German Protestant Churches. The most extreme example of this combination of anti-Semitism and nationalism was the so-called German Christian Movement, a Protestant group that embraced Nazism and tried to « Nazify » Christianity by suppressing the Old Testament, revising liturgies and hymns, and promoting Jesus as an Aryan hero who embodied the ideals of the new Germany.

It must be said that the Churches' theological attitudes about Jews did not always take the form of anti-Jewish diatribes, or other kinds of explicit anti-Semitism. Often they manifested themselves in their determination to convert Jews, and so Nazi policies confronted the Christian Churches with an unresolvable theological problem : in a society that was determined to eradicate the Jews, the Christian Gospel claimed that the Jews were God's chosen people and should be the special objects of Christian proselytizing. This led to deep divisions among German clergy about what they really believed and what they were supposed to do in their new situation.

For the most part, the influences that motivated and guided the German Churches in the 1930's and 1940's essentially paralyzed these institutions' potential challenges to Nazism, or led them to implicitly (though reluctantly) support Hitler's regime. The German Churches stumbled, and they stumbled badly. The leaders of the Churches spent a great deal of time delineating a « viable » position : one that would conform to Christian doctrine, prevent their Church from dividing into opposing factions, and avoid antagonizing the Nazi authorities. In any examination of the German Churches' statements from this era, what is most striking is their painstaking attempt to say, publicly, neither too much nor too little about what is happening around them. Needless to say, this ruled-out any consistent or emphatic response to the Nazis' persecution of Jews and others. And institutional inaction gave individual Christians throughout Germany an alibi for passivity. More tragically, individual Christians who did express solidarity with the persecuted Jews (such as the Catholic priest Bernhard Lichtenberg and the Protestant deaconess Marga Meusel) received no public (and little private) support from their respective Churches.

Christian Opposition to the Hitler Regime Outside of Germany

The story recounted in this article up to this point has been, for the most part, a dismal one, but some Christian Churches and organizations outside of Germany did evince vigorous opposition to the Nazi State in the 1930's and 1940's. From the beginning of Hitler's regime, the ecumenical Christian movement (its central offices were located in Geneva, London and New York) strongly condemned developments in Nazi Germany that threatened the independence of Christian Churches and the safety of Jews. On May 26 and 29, 1933, 1,200 American clergymen from 26 different Christian denominations sponsored an advertisement in « The New York Times » condemning anti-Jewish activities in Nazi Germany. Leaders of the Federal Council of Churches (a Protestant group) , located in the United States, sent angry letters in 1933 to their colleagues in the German Churches, demanding public statements denouncing Nazi policies. Between 1933 and 1945, there were six major statements from the leaders of Churches in this country and in Europe (outside the 3rd « Reich ») that specifically condemned anti-Semitism and the Nazi persecution of Jews. (Among the officials involved were the Archbishop of Canterbury and Samuel Cavert and Henry Smith Leiper of the Federal Council of Churches in New York.) In November 1938, the 3 leading Protestant ecumenical organizations in Geneva, Switzerland, issued a statement castigating « anti-Semitism in all its forms » and urging governments to permit more Jewish refugees to enter their countries. In the United States, in December 1938, the Federal Council of Churches and the U.S. Catholic Bishops issued a joint condemnation of « Kristallnacht », which had occurred a month earlier. (It was the 1st Protestant-Catholic joint statement on a social issue in this country.) In December 1942, after reports of genocide began to reach the Allied countries, the Federal Council of Churches passed a resolution protesting the « virtual massacre » of Europe's Jews. This was followed by similar protests from the Anglican Church in England and a joint statement by Protestant ecumenical leaders and the World Jewish Congress in Geneva. In Great Britain, the Archbishop of Canterbury, William Temple, gave an impassioned speech in March 1943 in the House of Lords, demanding an immediate end to immigration quotas and an increase in Allied aid to countries that offered refuge to Jews. In a 1983 speech delivered at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, Gerhardt Riegner, the director of the World Jewish Congress in Geneva during the War (and a man who had participated in efforts to rescue Jews from the Nazis), said that, during the Holocaust, « the human understanding, friendship, and the helping hand » of his Protestant ecumenical colleagues « were the only signs of light in the darkness that surrounded us » .

These aspects of the Christian Churches' opposition to the 3rd « Reich » did not, of course, impede the workings of the Holocaust, or even lead to the rescue of significant numbers of endangered Jews. The actions and pronouncements described here were not part of any long-term, comprehensive and coordinated program. The Christian leaders outside of Germany who spoke-out against the persecution of the Jews and against genocide were a minority in the Christian world. They failed to win significant support from their own Church members. There were early attempts (in 1933 and 1934, in the United States and Britain) to establish an interfaith Catholic, Jewish and Protestant network to help refugees from Nazi Germany. These efforts failed, in part, because of the lack of wide-spread support in the Christian Churches. Throughout the 1930's and 1940's, the major Christian refugee offices in Europe and the U.S. received far more financial support from Jewish organizations like the United Jewish Appeal than from their own member Churches.

German Churches Actions Based on Institutional Interests

Throughout the Nazi era, ardent debates took place within the German Churches about where to stand firm against Hitler's regime and where to compromise, when to speak-out and when to remain silent. Ecumenical documents show that, from 1933 to 1945, there were Christian leaders inside and outside Germany who agonized about what they could do to stop Nazism and help its victims. The historical complexities suggested by these factors should never lead us to condone the Churches' failures during the 1930's and 1940's ; they can, however, help us to understand the specific nature of those failures so that we may learn from them.

Perhaps, at the heart of those failures was the fact that the Churches, especially in Nazi Germany, sought to act, as institutions tend to do, in their own best interests - narrowly defined, short-sighted interests. There was little desire on the part of the Churches for self-sacrifice or heroism, and much emphasis on « pragmatic » and « strategic » measures that would supposedly protect these institutions' autonomy in the 3rd « Reich » . Public institutional circumspection carried to the point of near numbness ; an acute lack of insight : these are the aspects of the Churches' behaviour during the Nazi era that are so damning in retrospect. The minutes of German Protestant synodal meetings, in 1942, reveal how oblivious the participants were to what was happening in the world around them. While innocent victims throughout Europe were being brutally murdered, Christian leaders were debating what points of doctrine and policy were tenable. This is especially haunting, of course, because the Christian clergy and laity never thought of their respective Churches as a mere institution, but as a religious body witnessing in the world to certain values, including love of neighbours, the sanctity of life and the power of moral conscience.

Reflecting on the failure of the Churches to challenge the Nazis should prompt us to ponder all the others (individuals, governments and institutions) that passively acquiesced to the 3rd « Reich's » tyranny. Even the wisest and most perceptive of them, it seems, failed to develop adequate moral and political responses to Nazi genocide, failed to recognize that something new was demanded of them by the barbarism of Hitler's regime. Moreover, it has become abundantly clear that their failure to respond to the horrid events in Europe in the 1930's and 1940's was not due to ignorance ; they knew what was happening.

Ultimately, the Churches' lapses during the Nazi era were lapses of vision and determination. Protestant and Catholic religious leaders loyal to creeds professing that love can withstand and conquer evil, were unable or unwilling to defy one of the great evils in human history. And so, the Holocaust will continue to haunt the Christian Churches for a very, very long time to come.

The Great Scandal : Christianity's Role in the Rise of the Nazis

Together with interior minister Wilhelm Frick and propaganda minister Josef Goebbels, Catholic Bishops Franz Rudolf Bornewasser (Bishop of Trier) and Ludwig Sebastian (Bishop of Speyer) raise their hands in the Nazi salute at an official ceremony in Saarbrücken City Hall marking the re-incorporation of the Saarland into the German « Reich » .

« You know what happens when atheists take-over - remember Nazi Germany ? »

Many Christians point to Nazism, alongside Stalinism, to illustrate the perils of atheism in power. (1) At the other extreme, some authors paint the Vatican as Hitler's eager ally. Meanwhile, the Nazis are generally portrayed as using terror to bend a modern civilization to their agenda ; yet, we recognize that Hitler was initially popular. Amid these contradictions, where is the truth ?

A growing body of scholarly research, some based on careful analysis of Nazi records, is clarifying this complex history. (2) It reveals a convoluted pattern of religious and moral failure in which atheism and the non-religious played little role, except as victims of the Nazis and their allies. In contrast, Christianity had the capacity to stop Nazism before it came to power, and to reduce or moderate its practices afterwards, but repeatedly failed to do so because the principal churches were complicit with (indeed, in the pay of) the Nazis.

Most « German Christians » supported the « Reich » ; many continued to do so in the face of mounting evidence that the dictatorship was depraved and murderously cruel. Elsewhere in Europe the story was often the same. Only with Christianity's forbearance and frequent cooperation could fascist movements gain majority support in Christian nations. European Fascism was the fruit of a Christian culture. Millions of Christians actively supported these notorious regimes. Thousands participated in their atrocities.

What, in God's name, were they thinking ?

Before we can consider the Nazis, we need to examine the historical and cultural religious context that would give rise to them.

Christian Foundations

Early Christian sects promoted loyalty to authoritarian rulers so long they were not intolerably anti-Christian or, worse, atheistic. Christian anti-Semitism sprang from one of the Church's 1st efforts to forge an accommodation with power. Re-interpreting the Gospels to shift blame for the Crucifixion from the Romans to the Jews (the « Christ killer » story) courted favour with Rome, an early example of Christian complicity for political purposes. Added energy came from Christians' anger over most Jews' refusal to convert. (3)

Christian anti-Semitism was only intermittently violent, but when violence occurred it was devastating. The 1st outright extermination of Jews occurred in 414 c.e. It would have innumerable successors, the worst nearly genocidal in scope. At standard rates of population growth, Diaspora Jewry should now number in the hundreds of millions. That there are only an estimated 13 million Jews in the world (4) is largely the result of Christian violence and forced conversion. (5)

Anti-Semitic practices pioneered by Catholics included the forced wearing of yellow identification, ghettoization, confiscation of Jews' property, and bans on inter-marriage with Christians. European Protestantism bore the fierce impress of Martin Luther, whose 1543 tract « On the Jews and Their Lies » was a principal inspiration for « Mein Kampf ». (6) In addition to his anti-Semitism, Luther was also a fervent authoritarian. Against the « Robbing and Murdering Peasants », his vituperative commentary on a contemporary rebellion, contributed to the deaths of perhaps 100,000 Christians and helped to lay the ground-work for an increasingly severe Germono-Christian autocracy. (7)

With the Enlightenment, deistic and secular thinkers seeded Western culture with Greco-Roman notions of democracy and free expression. The feudal aristocracies and the churches counter-attacked, couching their reactionary defense of privilege in self-consciously biblical language. This controversy would shape centuries of European history. As late as 1870, the Roman Catholic Church reaffirmed a reactionary program at the 1st Vatican Council. Convened by the ultra-conservative Pope Pius IX (reigned 1846-1878), Vatican I stridently condemned modernism, democracy, capitalism, usury, and Marxism. (8) Anti-Semitism was also part of the mix ; well into the 20th Century, mainstream Catholic publications set an intolerant tone that later Nazi propaganda would imitate. Anti-Semitism remained conspicuous in main-stream Catholic literature even after Pope Pius XI (reigned 1922-1939) officially condemned it.

Protestantism, too, was largely hostile toward modernism and democracy during this period (with a few exceptions in northern Europe) . Because Jews were seen as materialists who promoted and benefited from Enlightenment modernism, most Protestant denominations remained anti-Semitic.

With the 19th Century came a European movement that viewed Judaism as a racial curse. Attracting both Protestant and Catholic dissidents within Germanic populations, Aryan Christianity differed from traditional Christianity in denying both that Christ was a Jew and that Christianity had grown-out of Judaism. (9) Adherents viewed Christ as a divine Aryan warrior who brought the sword to cleanse the earth of Jews. (10) Aryans were held to be the only true humans, specially created by God through Adam and Eve ; all other peoples were soulless sub-humans, descended from apes or created by Satan with no hope of salvation. (11) Most non-Aryans were considered suitable for subservient roles including slavery, but not the Jews. Spiritless yet clever and devious, Jews were seen as a satanic disease to be quarantined or eliminated.

During the same years, neo-Pagan and occult movements gained adherents and incubated their own form of Aryanism. Unlike Aryan Christians, neo-Pagan Aryans acknowledged that Christ was a Jew - and, for that reason, rejected Christianity. They believed themselves descended from demi-gods whose divinity had degraded through Centuries of inter-breeding with lesser races. The Norse gods and even the Atlantis myth sometimes decorated Aryan mythology.

Attempting to deny that Nazi anti-Semitism had a Christian component, Christian apologists exaggerate the influence of Aryan neo-Paganism. Actually, neo-Paganism never had a large following.

German Aryanism, whether Christian or pagan, became known as « Volkism » . « Volkism » prophesied the emergence of a great God-chosen Aryan who would lead the people (« Volk ») to their grand destiny through the conquest of « Lebensraum » (living space) . A common motto was « God and Volk » . Disregarding obvious theological contradictions, growing numbers of German nationalists managed to work Aryanism into their Protestant or Catholic confessions, much as contemporary adherents of Voudoun or Santería blend the occult with their Christian beliefs. Darwinian theory sometimes entered « Volkism » as a belief in the divinely intended survival of the fittest peoples. Democracy had no place, but Nietzschean philosophy had some influence - a point Christian apologists make much of. Yet, Nietzsche's influence was modest, as « Volkists » found his skepticism toward religion unacceptable. (12)

Though traceable to the ancient world, atheism 1st emerged as a major social movement in the mid-1800's. (13) It would be associated with both pro- and anti-democratic world-views. Strongly influenced by science, atheists tended to view all humans as descended in common from apes. There was no inherent anti-Semitic tradition. Some atheists accepted then-popular pseudoscientific racist views that the races exhibited varying levels of intellect due to differing genetic heritages. Some went further, embracing various forms of eugenics as a means of improving the human condition. But neither of these positions was uniquely or characteristically atheistic. « Scientific » racism is actually better understood as a tool by which Christians could perpetuate their own cultural prejudices - it was no accident that the races deemed inferior by Western Christian societies and « science » were the same !

When we seek precursors of Nazi anti-Semitism and authoritarianism, it is among European Christians, not among the atheists, that we must search.

Following World War I, the religious situation in Europe was complex. Scientific findings about the age of the Earth, Darwin's theory of evolution, and biblical criticism had fueled the 1st major expansion of nontheism at Christianity's expense among ordinary Europeans. The churches' support for the catastrophic Great War further fueled public disaffection, as did (in Germany) the flight of the « Kaiser », in whom both Protestant and Catholic clergy had vested heavily. (14) But religion was not everywhere in retreat : post-War Germany experienced a Christian spiritual renaissance outside the traditional churches. (15) Religious freedom was unprecedented, but the established churches enjoyed wide-spread State support and controlled their own education systems. They were far more influential than today.

Roughly 2/3 of Germans were Protestant, almost all of the rest Catholic. The pagan minority claimed at most 5 % . Explicit nontheism was limited to an intellectual elite and to committed socialists. Just 1.5 % of Germans identified themselves as unbelievers in a 1939 census, which means either that very few Nazis and National-Socialist German Worker's Party supporters were atheists, or that atheists feared to identify themselves to the pro-theistic regime.

Most religious Germans detested the impiety, secularism, and hedonistic decadence that they associated with such modernist ideas as democracy and free speech. If they feared democracy, they were terrified by Communism, to the point of being willing to accept extreme counter-methods.

Thus, it was a largely Christian, deeply racist, often anti-democratic, and, in many respects, dangerously primitive Western culture into which Nazism would arise. It was a theistic powder keg ready to explode.

Nazi Leaders, Theism, and Family Values

According to standard biographies, the principal Nazi leaders were all born, baptized, and raised Christian. Most grew-up in strict, pious households where tolerance and democratic values were disparaged. Nazi leaders of Catholic background included Adolf Hitler, Heinrich Himmler, Reinhard Heydrich, and Josef Gœbbels.

Hitler did well in monastery school. He sang in the choir, found High-Mass and other ceremonies intoxicating, and idolized priests. Impressed by their power, he, at one time, considered entering the priesthood.

Rudolf Höss, who as commandant at Auschwitz-Birkinau pioneered the use of the « Zyklon-B » gas that killed half of all Holocaust victims, had strict Catholic parents. Hermann Gœring had mixed Catholic-Protestant parentage, while Rudolf Heß, Martin Bormann, Albert Speer, and Adolf Eichmann had Protestant backgrounds. Not one of the top Nazi leaders was raised in a Liberal or atheistic family - no doubt, the parents of any of them would have found such views scandalous. Traditionalists would never think to deprive their off-spring of the faith-based moral foundations that they would need to grow into ethical adults.

So much for the Nazi leaders' religious backgrounds. Assessing their religious views as adults is more difficult. On ancillary issues such as religion, Party doctrine was a deliberate tangle of contradictions. (16) For Hitler consistency mattered less than having a statement at hand for any situation that might arise. History records many things that Hitler wrote or said about religion, but they too are sometimes contradictory. Many were crafted for a particular audience or moment and have limited value for illuminating Hitler's true opinion ; in any case, neither Hitler nor any other key Nazi leader was a trained theologian with carefully thought-out views.

Accuracy of transcription is another concern. Hitler's public speeches were recorded reliably, but were often propagandistic. His private statements seem more likely to reflect his actual views, but their reliability varies widely. (17) The passages Christian apologists cite most often to prove Hitler's atheism are of questionable accuracy. Apologists often brandish them without noting historians' reservations. Hitler's personal library has been partly preserved, and a good deal is known about his reading habits, another possible window onto Hitler's beliefs. (18) Also important, and often ignored by apologists, are statements made by religious figures of the time, who generally (at least for public consumption) viewed Hitler as a Christian and a Catholic in good standing. Meanwhile, the silent testimony of photographs is irrefutable, much as apologists struggle to evade this damning visual evidence.

Despite these difficulties, enough is known to build a reasonable picture of what Hitler and other top Nazis believed.

Hitler was a Christian, but his Christ was no Jew. In his youth, he dabbled with occult thinking but never became a devotee. As a young man, he grew increasingly bohemian and stopped attending church. Initially, no more anti-Semitic than the norm, in the years before the Great War, he fell under the anti-Semitic influence of the « Völkish » Christian Social Party and other Aryan movements. After Germany's stunning defeat and the ruinous terms of peace, Hitler became a full-blown Aryanist and anti-Semite. He grew obsessed with racial issues, which he unfailingly embedded in a religious context.

Apologists often suggest that Hitler did not hold a traditional belief in God because he believed that he was God. True, Hitler thought himself God's chosen leader for the Aryan race. But he never claimed to be divine, and never presented himself in that manner to his followers.

Members of the « Wehrmacht » swore this loyalty oath :

« I swear by God this holy oath to the “ Führer ” of the German “ Reich ” and the German people, Adolf Hitler. »

For « Schutzstaffel » (SS) members it was :

« I pledge to you, Adolf Hitler, my obedience unto death, so help me God. »

Hitler repeatedly thanked God or Providence for his survival on the western front during the Great War, his safe escape from multiple assassination attempts, his seemingly miraculous rise from homelessness to influence and power, and his amazing international successes. He never tired of proclaiming that all of this was beyond the power of any mere mortal. Later, in the War, Hitler portrayed German defeats as part of an epic test : God would reward his true chosen people with the final victory they deserved so long as they never gave-up the struggle.

Hitler openly admired Martin Luther, whom he considered a brilliant reformer. (19) Yet, he said in several private conversations that he considered himself a Catholic. He said publicly on several occasions that Christ was his saviour. As late as 1944, planning the last-ditch offensive the world would know as the Battle of the Bulge, he code-named it « Operation Christrose » .

Among his Nazi cronies, Hitler criticized the established churches harshly and often. Some of these alleged statements must be treated with skepticism, (20) but clearly he viewed the traditional Christian faiths as weak and contaminated by Judaism. Still, there is no warrant for the claim that he became anti-Christian or anti-religious after coming to power. No reliably attributed quote reveals Hitler to be an atheist or in any way sympathetic to atheism. On the contrary, he often condemned atheism, as he did Christians who collaborated with such atheistic forces as Bolshevism. He consistently denied that the State could replace faith and instructed Albert Speer to include churches in his beloved plans for a rebuilt Berlin. The Nazi-era constitution explicitly evoked God. Calculating that his victories over Europe and Bolshevism would make him so popular that people would be willing to abandon their traditional faiths, Hitler entertained plans to replace Protestantism and Catholicism with a reformed Christian church that would include all Aryans while removing foreign (Rome-based) influence. German Protestants had already rejected a more modest effort along these lines, as will be seen below. How Germans as a whole would have received this reform after a Nazi victory is open to question. In any case, Hitler saw himself as Christianity's ultimate reformer, not its dedicated enemy.

Hitler was a complex figure, but based on the available evidence we can conclude our inquiry into his personal religious convictions by describing him as an Aryan « Völkist » Christian who had deep Catholic roots, strongly influenced by Protestantism, touched by strands of neo-Paganism and Darwinism, and minimally influenced by the occult. Though Hitler pontificated about God and religion at great length, he considered politics more important than religion as the means to achieve his agenda.

None of the leaders immediately beneath Hitler was a pious traditional Christian. But there is no compelling evidence that any top-Nazi was non-theistic. Any so accused denied the charge with vehemence.

« Reich-Führer » Heinrich Himmler regularly attended Catholic services until he lurched into an increasingly bizarre Aryanism. He authorized searches for the Holy Grail and other supposedly powerful Christian and Cathar relics. A believer in reincarnation, he sent expeditions to Tibet and the American tropics in search of the original Aryans and even Atlantians. He and Reinhard Heydrich modeled the SS after the disciplined and secretive Jesuits ; it would not accept atheists as members. (21) Hermann Göring, least ideological among top-Nazis, sometimes endorsed both Protestant and Catholic traditions. On other occasions, he criticized them. Josef Goebbels turned against Catholicism in favour of a reformed Aryan faith ; both his and Göring's children were baptized. Martin Bormann was stridently opposed to contemporary organized Christianity ; he was a leader of the « Church Struggle » , the inconsistently applied Nazi campaign to oppose the influence of established churches. (22)

The Nazis championed traditional family values : their ideology was conservative, bourgeois, patriarchal, and strongly anti-feminist. Discipline and conformity were emphasized, marriage promoted, abortion and homosexuality despised. (23)

Traditionalism also dominated Nazi philosophy, such as it was. Though science and technology were lauded, the overall thrust opposed the Enlightenment, modernism, intellectualism, and rationality. It is hard to imagine how a movement with that agenda could have been friendly toward atheism, and the Nazis were not. « Völkism » was inherently hostile toward atheism : free-thinkers clashed frequently with Nazis in the late 1920's and early 1930's. On taking power, Hitler banned free-thought organizations and launched an « anti-godless » movement.

In a 1933 speech, he declared :

« We have undertaken the fight against the atheistic movement, and that not merely with a few theoretical declarations : we have stamped it out. »

This forthright hostility was far more straightforward than the Nazis' complex, often contradictory stance toward traditional Christian faith.

Destroying Democracy : a Political-Religious Collaboration

As detailed by historian Ian Kershaw, Hitler made no secret of his intent to destroy democracy. Yet, he came to power largely legally ; in no sense was he a tyrant imposed upon the German people.

The Nazi take-over climaxed a lengthy, ironic rejection of democracy at the hands of a majority of German voters. By the early 1930's, ordinary Germans had lost patience with democracy ; growing numbers hoped an authoritarian strongman would restore order and prosperity and return Germany to great-power status. Roughly 2/3 of « German Christians » repeatedly voted for candidates who promised to overthrow democracy. Authoritarianism was all but inevitable ; at issue was merely who the new strongman would be.

What made democracy so fragile ? Historian Klaus Scholder explains that Germany lacked a deep democratic tradition, and would have had difficulty in forming one because German society was so thoroughly divided into opposing Protestant and Catholic blocs. This division created a climate of competition, fear and prejudice between the confessions, which burdened all German domestic and foreign policies with an ideological element of incalculable weight and extent. This climate erected an almost insurmountable barrier to the formation of broad democratic center. And it favoured the rise of Hitler, since ultimately both churches courted his favour - each fearing that the other would complete the Reformation or the Counter-Reformation through Hitler. (24)

Carefully plotting his strategy, Hitler purged some of the « Völkish » Nazi radicals most belligerent toward the traditional Christian churches. In this way, he lessened the risk of ecclesiastical opposition. At the same time, he knew that the presence of both Catholics and Protestants among the Nazi leadership would ease churchmen's fears that the Party might engage in sectarianism.

Though it had many Catholic leaders (including Hitler) , the Nazi Party relied heavily on Protestant support. Protestants had given the Party its principal backing during the years leading-up to 1933 at a level disproportionate to their national majority. (25) Evangelical youth was especially pro-Nazi. It has been estimated that as many as 90 % of Protestant university theologians supported the Party. Indeed, the participation of so many respected Protestants gave an early, comforting air of legitimacy to the often-thuggish Party. So did the frequent sight of « Sturmabteilung » (SA) units marching in uniform to church.

As German life between the Wars grew more desperate, some Protestant pastors explicitly defended Nazi murders of « traitors to the “ Volk ” » from the pulpit. Anti-Fascist Protestants found themselves marginalized. The once-unlikely topic of « Völkist » Protestant compatibility became the leading theological subject of the day. (26) This is less surprising when we consider that « Völkism » and German Protestantism were both strongly nationalistic ; Lutheranism, in particular, had German roots.

This mirage of harmony enticed Hitler into a naïve attempt to unite the German Protestant churches into a single « Völkish » body under Nazi control. Launched shortly after the Nazis came to power, this project failed immediately. The evangelical sects proved as unwilling as ever to get along with one another, though much of their clergy eventually Nazified.

Catholicism and the Nazi Take-over

Ironically (but, as we shall see, for obvious reasons) , Chancellor Hitler had greater initial success reaching accommodation with Roman Catholic leaders than with the Protestants. The irony lay in the fact that the Catholic « Zentrum » (Center) Party had been principally responsible for denying majorities to the Nazis in early elections. Although Teutonic in outlook, German Catholics had close emotional ties to Rome. As a group, they were somewhat less nationalistic than most Protestants. Catholics were correspondingly more likely than Protestants to view Hitler (incorrectly) as godless, or as a neo-heathen anti-Christian. Catholic clergy consistently denounced Nazism, though they often undercut themselves by preaching traditional anti-Semitism at the same time.

Even so, and despite Catholicism's minority status, it would be German Catholics and the Roman Catholic Church whose actions would at last put total power within the Nazis' reach.

Though it was not without anti-modernists, the Catholic « Zentrum » Party had antagonized the Vatican during the 1920's by forming governing coalitions with the secularized, moderate Left-oriented Social-Democrats. This changed in 1928, when the priest Ludwig Kaas became the 1st cleric to head the Party. To the dismay of some Catholics, Kaas and other Catholic politicians participated both actively and passively in destroying democratic rule, and, in particular, the « Zentrum » .

The devoutly Catholic chancellor Franz von Papen, not a Fascist but stoutly Right-wing, engineered the key electoral victory that brought Hitler to power. Disastrously, Papen dissolved the « Reichstag » in 1932, then, formed a « Zentrum-Nazi » coalition in violation of all previous principles. It was Papen who, in 1933, made Hitler chancellor, Papen stepping-down to the vice-chancellorship.

The common claim that Papen acted in the hope that the Nazis could be controlled and ultimately discredited may be true, partly true, or false ; but without Papen's reckless aid, Hitler would not have become Germany's leader.

The church congratulated Hitler on his assumption of power. German Bishops released a statement that wiped-out past criticism of Nazism by proclaiming the new regime acceptable, then, followed doctrine by ordering the laity to be loyal to this regime just as they had commanded loyalty to previous regimes. Since Catholics had been instrumental in bringing Hitler to power and served in his cabinet, the Bishops had little choice but to collaborate.

German Catholics were stunned by the magnitude and suddenness of this realignment. The rigidly conformist Church had flipped from ordering its flock to oppose the Nazis to commanding cooperation. A minority among German Catholics was appalled and disheartened. But most « received the statement with relief (indeed, with rejoicing) because it finally also cleared the way into the 3rd " Reich " for Catholic Christians » alongside millions of Protestants, who joined in exulting that the dream of a Nazi-Catholic-Protestant nationalist alliance had been achieved. (27) The Catholic vote for the Nazis increased in the last multi-Party elections after Hitler assumed control, doubling in some areas, inspiring a mass Catholic exodus from the « Zentrum » to the Fascists. After the « Reichstag » fire, the « Zentrum » voted « en masse » to support the infamous Enabling Act, which would give the Hitler-Papen cabinet executive and legislative authority independent of the German Parliament. « Zentrum's » bloc-vote cemented the 2/3 majority needed to pass the Act.

Why did the Church direct its Party to provide the critical swing-vote ? It had its agenda, as we shall see below.

Deal Making with the Devil

Even after the Enabling Act, Hitler's position remained tenuous. The Nazis needed to deepen majority popular support and cement relations with a skeptical German military. Hitler needed to ally all Aryans under the swastika while he undermined and demoralized regime opponents. What would solidify Hitler's position ? A foreign policy « coup » : the Concordat of 1933 between Nazi Germany and the Vatican.

The national and international legitimacy Hitler would gain through this treaty was incalculable. Failure to secure it after intense and openly promoted effort could have been a crushing humiliation. Hitler put exceptional effort into the project. He courted the Holy-See, emphasizing his own Christianity, simultaneously striving to intimidate the Vatican with demonstrations of his swelling power.

Catholic apologists describe the Concordat of 1933 as a necessary move by a Church desperate to protect itself against a violent regime which forced the accord upon it - passing over the contradiction at the heart of this argument. Actually, having failed in repeated attempts to negotiate the ardently desired concordat with a skeptical Weimar democracy, Kaas, Papen, the future Pius XII (who reigned from 1939 to 1958) , the sitting Pius XI, and other leading Catholics saw their chance to get what they had been seeking from an agreeable member of the Church (that is, Adolf Hitler) at an historical moment when he and Fascism in general were regarded as a natural ally by many Catholic leaders. (28) Negotiations were initiated by both sides, modeled on the mutually advantageous 1929 concordat between Benito Mussolini and the Vatican.

Now, « Zentrum's » pivotal role in assuring passage of the Enabling Act can be seen in context. It was part of the tacit Nazi-Vatican deal for a future concordat. (29) The Enabling Act vote hollowed « Zentrum » , leaving little more than a shell. Thus, a clergy far more interested in church power than democratic politics could take control on both sides of the negotiating table. In a flagrant conflict of interest, the devout Papen helped to represent the German State. Concordat negotiations were largely held in Rome, so that Kaas could leave his vanishing Party, yet, more rudderless. Papen, Kaas, and the future Pius XII worked overtime to finalize a treaty that would, among other things, put an end to the « Zentrum » . In negotiating away the Party he led, Kaas eliminated the last political entity that might have opposed the new « Führer » . (30) Nor did the Vatican protect Germany's Catholic Party. Contrary to the contention of some, evidence indicates that the Vatican was pleased to negotiate away all traces of the « Zentrum » , for which it had no more use save as a bargaining chip. In this, the Holy-See treated « Zentrum » no differently than it had the Italian Catholic Party, which it negotiated away in the Concordat with Mussolini.

Hitler sought to eliminate Catholic opposition in favour of obligatory loyalty to his regime. For its part, the Church was obsessed with its educational privileges, (31) and especially with securing fresh sources of income. It would willingly sacrifice political power to protect them. As both sides worked in haste to produce a treaty that would normally have required years to complete, Hitler took masterful advantage of Vatican over eagerness. Filled with « certainty that Rome neither could nor would turn back, Hitler was now able to steer the negotiations almost as he wanted. The records prove he exploited the situation to the full. » (32) Indeed, Hitler was so confident that he had the Church in his lap that he went ahead and promulgated his notorious sterilization decree before the Concordat's final signing. Hitler's project for involuntary sterilization of minorities and the mentally ill was an direct affront to Catholic teaching. But, as Hitler surmised, not even this provocation could deflect the Holy-See in its rush toward the Concordat. Because ordinary Catholics largely supported the Nazis, the Party even felt free to use violence against the remaining politically active Catholics, frequently disrupting their rallies.

Signed on 20 July 1933, the Concordat was a « fait accompli » , the negotiations having been conducted largely in secret. Most German Bishops gave their loyal, though impotent, approval to the pact that would strip away their power. A few Bishops objected, criticizing the Nazi regime's lack of morality (but never its lack of democracy) .

The Concordat was a Classic political kick-back scheme. The Church supported the new dictatorship by endorsing the end of democracy and free-speech. In addition, it bound its Bishops to Hitler's « Reich » by means of a loyalty oath. In exchange, the Church received enormous tax-income and protection for Church privileges. Religious instruction and prayer in school were re-instated. Criticism of the Church was forbidden. Of course, nothing in the Concordat protected the rights of non-Catholics.

If Catholic officials were disappointed with the Concordat's terms, they did not show it, sending messages of congratulation to the dictator. In Rome, a celebratory mass followed the treaty's signing by Papen and the future Pius XII amid great pomp and circumstance. In Germany, the Church and the Berlin government held a joint service of thanksgiving that featured a mix of Catholic, « Reich » , and swastika banners and flags. The musical program mixed hymns with a rousing performance of the repugnant Nazi anthem « Horst Wessel » - which was set, by the way, to the traditional hymn « How Great Thou Art » . All of this was projected by loudspeaker to the enthusiastic crowd outside ; as most German Catholics welcomed the Concordat, the thanksgiving service drew far more than Berlin's cathedral could hold.

Scholder comments that « anyone who saw things from the Roman perspective could come to the conclusion that the treaty was an indescribable success for Catholicism. Even 1 year before, the Holy-See had only been able to dream of the concessions which the concordat contained. On the Catholic side, the concordat was accordingly described as “ something very great ”, indeed as nothing short of a “ Masterpiece ”. » (33) Catholic response was so exuberant that Hitler felt it necessary to defend himself to Protestant clerics and Nazi radicals who viewed this sudden amity with Rome as a betrayal.

The practical results of the collaboration were clear enough. Most Catholics « soon adjusted to the dictatorship » (34) ; indeed, they flocked to the Party. Post-Concordat voting patterns suggest that Catholics, on average, even outdid Protestants in supporting the regime, further undermining any efforts by the clergy to challenge Nazi policies. In any case, much of the Catholic clergy was Nazifying. Even the idiosyncratic SS welcomed Catholics, who would ultimately compose a quarter of its membership.

The Concordat's disastrous consequences cannot be exaggerated. It bound all devout German Catholics to the State - the clergy through an oath and income, the laity through the authority of the Church. If at any time, the regime chose not to honour the agreement, Catholics had no open legal right to oppose it or its policies. Opponents of Nazism, Catholic and non-Catholic, were further discouraged and marginalized because the church had shown such want of moral fiber and consistency.

Apologists have insisted that the Church had no choice but to accept the Concordat for the modest protections it provided. But those provisions were never needed. Major Protestant denominations suffered no more than Catholicism, though the Protestant churches lacked protective agreements and had snubbed Hitler's early attempt to unite them. Apologists make much of Vatican « resistance » to Nazism, but the net-effect of Vatican policy toward Hitler was collaborative.

Indeed, the 1933 Concordat stands as one of the most unethical, corrupt, duplicitous, and dangerous agreements ever forged between 2 authoritarian powers. Perhaps, the Catholic strategy was to outlast the Nazi's frankly popular tyranny rather than try to bring it down. But the Catholic Church made no attempt to revoke the Concordat and its loyalty clause during the Nazi regime. Indeed, the 1933 Concordat is the only diplomatic accord negotiated with the Nazi regime that remains in force anywhere in the world.

Germany's Protestant sects were too decentralized to be coopted by a single document. To this extent, Protestants who disputed Nazi policies could be said to enjoy a more favourable position than Catholics. But opposition was rare among Protestants too. Hitler cynically courted the major denominations even as they cynically courted him. Most smaller traditional Christian sects did little better. For example, Germany's Mormons and 7th-Day Adventists bent-over backwards to accommodate National-Socialism. (35)

Christian Comfort with the Rising Regime

Catholics and Protestants at 1st embraced the new German order. Germany was regaining international prestige, the economy improving thanks to growing overseas support. (36) Industrialists like Henry Ford invested heavily in the new « Reich ». « German Christians » also looked to the Nazis for a revival of « Christian » values to help counter the rise of non-theism. Most welcomed the Nazis' elimination of chronic public strife by terrorizing, imprisoning, and killing the fast-shrinking German Left. The Leftists had long been despised by traditionalists, who composed 4/5 of the population. The State purged a far higher-proportion of atheists than traditional Christians. In newspapers and newsreels, the Nazis proudly publicized their new concentration camps. Reports sanitized the camps' true nature, but no one could mistake that they were part of a new police State - to which most German followers of Jesus raised no objection. The very high-rate of « legal » executions reported in the press also met with mass indifference or positive approval.

Far from being hapless victims, the great bulk of « German Christians » joined, eagerly supported, collaborated with, or accommodated to a greater or lesser degree, the new tyranny.

Hitler : the Popular Oppressor

Apologists for Christian conduct during the Nazi era imagine that the regime suppressed dissent ruthlessly, no matter whom (or how many) it needed to slaughter to achieve its ends. Hitler's regime is portrayed as Stalinesque in its response to dissent. This simplistic view reveals a failure to understand the complicated actuality of a popular terror State. The key-word is « popular » : Hitler was Europe's most popular leader, and his goal was universal Aryan support. The Party obsessively tracked public opinion, something never seen in the USSR. (37) Before the War, foreign tourism was encouraged ; Hitler knew most Germans would speak well of the « Reich » to visitors, in sharp contrast to the USSR, whose leaders prudently feared inter-action between foreigners and a citizenry of dubious loyalty. During most of the « Reich » , any unprovoked attempt to liberate Germany would have met fierce majority resistance.

Though there were assassination attempts, the top-Nazis had little to fear from ordinary Germans. (38) Hitler's personal security was shockingly lax ; Hermann Gøering regularly drove his open convertible around Berlin.

If the apologists were right, we should expect the « Gestapo » to have been a massive organization, relentlessly searching-out and crushing wide-spread dissent. Analysis of surviving « Gestapo » records reveals that, in fact, it was surprisingly small. (39) Germany's Christian population being largely satisfied, there was little resistance to suppress. Most cases the « Gestapo » handled were initiated by ordinary citizens looking to settle petty disputes and had no ideological content.

The « Führer » had been successful in buying-off his Aryans with false egalitarian prosperity, stolen Jewish wealth, and his refusal to put « Deutschland » on a full-War footing until well into the War. During the early War years, civilians were under much tighter control in submarine-blockaded England than in Germany. Since nearly all Aryans were Protestant and Catholic, Hitler had to keep both sects reasonably happy, and he did. After all, the main-focus of Nationalist-Socialism was to make the divinely favoured Aryan « Volk » , both Protestant and Catholic, thrive in order to transform the German population into a unified machine of domination over the lesser peoples. Contrary to Catholic apologists, the nominally Catholic Hitler had not the slightest desire to slaughter masses of the very Aryan people to whom he belonged, and whom he wanted to elevate to supreme power. Leaving aside the fact that doing so would have been ideological and racial suicide, the record makes clear that Hitler's intention was to reform and standardize Aryans' political, social, and ultimately their religious beliefs, not to purge them or to kill-off groups of Aryans. Doing that would have grossly violated Nazi doctrine, undermined the myth of Aryan solidarity, grievously weakened the State, and risked religious civil war. Disloyalty of the Catholic 3rd of the population would have been disastrous to a modest-sized nation trying to expand its resources in preparation for epic Wars of conquest ; it was this fact, not the Concordat, that would be the main-constraint on Nazi actions. For that reason, apologist claims that thousands or millions of Catholics and Protestants would have joined the Jews had they protested Nazis policies are false. The proof is found in the historical record.

« Rosenstraße » : the Power of Resistance

Far from exercising absolute power at home, Hitler often discontinued, modified, or concealed initiatives that threatened his regime's precious popular approval. Stout public objection could and repeatedly did alter Nazi behaviour. Flummoxed when the Protestant churches refused to unite, Hitler deferred his grand effort to reform German Christianity to a dream-like utopian future. Later attempts by Nazi authorities to hamper church activities were often frustrated by sizeable demonstrations. (40) When Party elements stripped Bavarian schools of their crucifixes without Hitler's approval, vigorous protests by, among others, the mothers of school children quickly brought about their replacement. (41) When Hitler denounced Protestant opposition, Bishops Hans Meiser and Theophil Wurm and ordered their ouster, public anger boiled-over. One protest drew 7,000 demonstrators. Hitler reversed course and re-instated « Meiser and Wurm » with fulsome praise. Strong opposition to the mass-killing of the mentally disabled, around 1941, drove it further underground, saving many lives, even though this program too enjoyed the « Führer's » approval.

This is not to say that protesters courted no danger. Opposition figures were frequently harassed, sometimes killed. But the top-Nazis knew how limited their power was.

When regime officials contemplated forcing the removal of Münster's Catholic Bishop, Clemens Galen, Josef Gøebbels warned that :

« The population of Münster could be regarded as lost during the War if anything were done against the Bishop. Indeed, the whole of the State of Westphalia. » (42)

Though Galen suffered harassment, he remained active throughout the War and held his office.

In occupied countries from Norway to Italy, residents successfully opposed Nazi racial policies and saved hundreds of thousands of Jews. In Denmark, political and ecclesiastical leaders forcefully protested Nazi policies ; the whole nation worked under the noses of the « Gestapo » to save almost all of Denmark's Jews. Neither leaders or citizens suffered severe retaliation. French Bishops who opposed Nazi actions against Jews likewise survived the War.

Most extraordinary and telling is the « Rosenstraße » incident. (43) Some 30,000 Jews lived openly in Germany as the spouses of Christians. 9 in 10 such marriages remained intact despite ceaseless harassment. Oriented toward family values as they were, the Nazis could not decide how to handle these Jews without violating the sanctity of marriage. Early in 1943, Goebbels, then in charge of Berlin, decided it was time to cleanse the capital by rounding-up these last Jews. Hitler agreed. Some 2,000 Jewish men from mixed-marriages were seized and taken to a large downtown building on the « Rosenstraße » , from which they would be deported to the camps.

For a week, their Gentile wives stood in the winter cold, chanting « We want our husbands back ! » . Ordinary Germans sometimes joined them. All told, the protests involved about 6,000 people. They continued in the face of SS and « Gestapo » threats, even threats to use machine guns. They continued though British bombers pounded the city by night. But the Nazis dared not fire upon these defenseless, un-organized Aryan women. Berliners saw the protests directly. Foreign diplomats spread word of it to the world press. The British Broadcasting Company broadcast the story back into Germany.

What was the outcome of Nazi Germany's only mass-demonstration to save Jews ? The 2,000 Jewish husbands were released with Hitler's approval. 2 dozen who had already been sent to Auschwitz were returned. Jewish-Christian couples continued to live openly and survived the War. They would comprise the great majority of German Jewish survivors.

Goebbels later commented to an associate that the regime relented « in order to eliminate the protest from the world, so that others didn't begin to do the same » . Sadly, this strategy was successful : during the rest of the War, no similar action would ever be taken in defense of Jews in general.

Nor does this exhaust the catalogue of successful opposition. When Goebbels called for mass-employment of housewives in War industries, also early in 1943, refusal was wide-spread. Again, reprisals were rare, partly because of the regime's established emphasis on traditional roles for women. On a broader scale, Germans who refused to participate in atrocities (even if they were soldiers, Party members, or SS men) almost never suffered retaliation. This was so well-known that, after the War, Nazis accused of War crimes were forbidden to claim fear of retaliation as a defense.

These incidents suggest that the Nazi regime was at root cowardly, happy to pick on the weak and disorganized but intimidated by public demonstrations. When it came to the « Volk » , Nazi leaders preferred propaganda, education, persuasion, and social pressure to terror. They knew that terror worked best when its objective was supported by many and opposed by few. Only toward the end of the War was wide-spread domestic terror resorted to in Germany, and it was often ineffective.

Clearly ordinary citizens could oppose and alter State policy, all the more so if powerful non-governmental institutions supported them. (44)

As Sarah Gordon comments :

« The failure of German churches to speak-out against racial persecution is a disgrace because the Nazis feared the propaganda or political power of the churches, it is almost certain that Church leaders could have spoken-out more vehemently against racial persecution. » (45)

The apologist claim that Germany's traditional Christians were impotent in the face of Nazi terror is an exaggeration on a scale that Goebbels might have appreciated. As the wives of Berlin discovered, Christians had the power to protect the lives and well-being of others and the potential to confound Hitler and his minions. Had they wished to, they need only have applied it.

Notes

(1) Nazism and Fascism are considered secular, atheistic, or both, in, among other sources, David Barrett, George Kurian, and Todd Johnson, editors, World Christian Encyclopædia : A Comparative Study of Churches and Religions in the Modern World, Oxford University Press (2001) .

(2) Seminal studies by main-stream, non-polemical researchers include Robert Gellately, Backing Hitler : Consent and Coercion in Nazi Germany, Oxford University Press (2001) ; Ian Kershaw, Hitler : 1889-1936 : Hubris, W.W. Norton, New York (1998) and Hitler : 1936-1945 : Nemesis, Allen Lane, London (2000) ; Klaus Scholder, The Churches and the 3rd « Reich » , volumes 1 and 2, Fortress Press, Philadelphia (1979) , English version (1988) ; Nathan Stoltzfus, Resistance of the Heart : The Rosenstraße Protest and Inter-marriage in Nazi Germany, W.W. Norton, New York (1997) ; Beth Griech-Polelle, Bishop von Galen : German Catholicism and National-Socialism, Yale University Press, New Haven (2002) ; and Sarah Gordon, Hitler, Germans, and the « Jewish Question » , Princeton University Press (1984) . Also see : John Patrick Michael Murphy, « Hitler Was Not an Atheist » , Free Inquiry, Volume 19, No. 2 (Spring 1999) .

(3) See James Carroll, Constantine's Sword : The Church and the Jews, Houghton Mifflin, New York (2001) and David Kertzer, The Pope Against the Jews : The Vatican's Role in the Rise of Modern Anti-Semitism, Alfred A. Knopf, New York (2001) .

(4) <http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/jewpop.html>.

(5) Viewed in the context of more than 1,500 years of Christian violence against Jews, the enormity of the Holocaust may as much reflect the large populations and relatively advanced technologies of the time as it does the virulence of Nazi anti-Semitism. Other Christian groups might have done the same thing earlier, had the technical means and a large enough pool of potential victims been available.

(6) Nowadays, Islamic anti-Semites reprint Martin Luther's work.

(7) Prior to World War I, many religious Germans viewed dying for the Fatherland as being on a par with Christian martyrdom ; reluctance to die in battle was considered blasphemous.

(8) After Vatican I, the Roman Catholic clergy was required to take an oath against modernity.

(9) Aryan Christianity continues to exist ; contemporary US examples include : Christian Identity, Aryan Nation, and other extremist racist sects.

(10) In Aryan Christian doctrine, Christ was non-Semitic because he did not have a Jewish father. His assault on the Temple was taken as evidence of his anti-Semitism. Christianity's false association with Judaism was blamed on Saint-Paul.

(11) Thus, the extremist Christian term mud people. Jews' lack of a soul was held to explain their supposed lack of interest in spirituality and the after-life and their focus on material gain.

(12) For example, the Catholic « Völkist » Dietrich Eckart, later a friend and mentor to Hitler, wrote in 1917 that :

« To be an Aryan and to sense transcendence is one and the same thing. »

Yet, he described Nietzsche as the « crazy despiser of our religious foundations » .

(13) Gregory Paul, « The Secular Revolution of the West : It's Passed America By - So Far » , Free Inquiry, Volume 22, No. 3 (Summer 2002) .

(14) Ibid.

(15) See : Scholder, Volume 1. ; page 12.

(16) Richard Steigmann-Gall, The Holy « Reich » : Nazi Conceptions of Christianity 1919-1945, Cambridge University Press, United Kingdom (2003) is the 1st attempt to detail the religious beliefs of the Nazis.

(17) Christian defenders frequently cite « Table Talk » , which presents some of Hitler's most vehement anti-Christian statements. But main-stream historians find « Table Talk » unreliable. It consists of private conversations recorded in the 1940's by 2 secretaries, one of whom later said that « no confidence » should be placed in the final volume because the compiler (Martin Bormann, even by Nazi standards a deceptive opportunist and much more anti-Christian than Hitler) destroyed the original transcripts. Still, even as presented in « Table Talk » , Hitler usually attacks Judeo-Christianity, not Christ. Hitler lauds Christ as a divine Aryan.

(18) Timothy Ryback, « Hitler's Forgotten Library » , Atlantic Monthly, Volume 29, No. 4 (May 2003) , expresses naïve surprise at how interested Hitler was in reading about religion. Oddly, Ryback's conclusion, that Hitler saw himself as God, is contrary to the quote Ryback cites in support of his hypothesis.

(19) The regime put an original edition of « On the Jews and Their Lies » on display and celebrated Martin Luther's 450th birthday, in 1933, on massive scale.

(20) See : Steigman-Gall.

(21) Neo-Paganism was far more prevalent in the SS than in German society as a whole ; even according to Party statistics, Paganism never claimed more than 5 % of the general population.

(22) See : Steigman-Gall.

(23) Contrary to common belief, the Nazis never operated State sex-for-procreation facilities. On the other hand, Nazi « culture » was not exceptionally prudish ; home movies of the era show young women lying topless on the beach, and « kitsch » nudity was common in Nazi art.

(24) Scholder, Volume I ; page 130.

(25) See : Scholder, Volumes I and 2 ; Kershaw pages 488-490 and 324 ; and Gellately page 14, whose « Backing Hitler » is a precedent-setting historical examination based in part on examination of surviving « Gestapo » records. Religion was not a primary focus of the study, but what Gellately includes on this topic is damning. See also Gordon, who gives a balanced account of church collaboration and resistance.

(26) See : Scholder, Volume I ; pages 37-51 and 74-87.

(27) Ibid. ; page 253.

(28) Ronald Rychlak, « Goldhagen von Pius XII » , First Things (June-July 2002) , pages 37-54, offers a typically convoluted example of pro-Vatican spin when he asserts that the concordat « was a Nazi proposition. The Nazis accepted terms that the Church had previously proposed to Weimar, but which Weimar had rejected. »

(29) See : Scholder, Volume I ; page 241.

(30) Ibid. ; pages 241-243.

(31) A concordat already negotiated with Bavaria gave the Church control of the schools.

(32) See : Scholder, Volume I ; page 386.

(33) Ibid. ; page 405.

(34) Gellately, page 14.

(35) See : Christine Elizabeth King, The Nazi State and the New Religions, Edwin Mellen Press, New York (1982) .

(36) Hitler and his fellow thugs had no idea how to run a modern economy. The Nazi economic « miracle » was a Potemkin-village scheme kept going, prior to the take-overs of other nations, by selling-off Germany's gold reserves and taking-out international loans that could never be paid back.

(37) See : Gellately.

(38) Hitler missed by minutes being killed by a bomb a few months after invading Poland. Pope Pius XII sent the « Führer » his « special personal congratulations » .

(39) See : Gellately ; page 39.

(40) See : Griech-Poelle ; pages 36-37.

(41) Nazi politics were as peculiar as its theology. Hitler avoided committing himself on tangential issues to protect his popularity and keep his options open. This, coupled with Hitler's harsh survival-of-the-fittest view of power, fueled chronic, often vicious intra-Party battles that contributed to the chaos of the regime. In « working towards the Führer » , Party functionaries often went beyond what Hitler wanted done, at least in the short term ; the Bavarian crucifix « débâcle » is a good example of this tendency.

(42) Cited in : Gellately, Kershaw, page 429 ; and Gordon.

(43) See : Stoltzfus ; pages 209-257.

(44) Hitler fared little better in international affairs ; even when he was Master of continental Europe, his power had limits. His supposed ally, Franco, politely told the vexed « Führer » to take a hike when he pressed for Spain to enter the War against the Allies. Hitler found himself forced to negotiate with the Vichy French government he had helped to install over the same matter, and it too refused to budge.

(45) Gordon, page 261.

La résistance du catholicisme face à l'Allemagne nazi

Catholic resistance to Nazism was a component of German resistance to Nazism and of Resistance during World War II. The Church in Germany had spoken against the rise of Nazism, but the Catholic aligned Centre Party capitulated and was banned in 1933. After the Nazi seizure of power, the Church attempted to cooperate with the new government, but Catholics soon faced persecution under Hitler, and were offended by moves such as the sterilization law of 1933.

The Church challenged efforts to undermine various Christian institutions, practices and beliefs and though it ultimately failed to protect its youth organizations and schools, it did have some successes in mobilizing public opinion to alter some government policies. Among the most courageous demonstrations of opposition were the 1941 sermons of Bishop August von Galen of Münster.

Nevertheless, wrote Alan Bullock :

« Neither the Catholic Church nor the Evangelical Church, as institutions, felt it possible to take-up an attitude of open opposition to the regime. »

An estimated 1/3 of German priests faced some form of reprisal from the authorities. Thousands of Catholic dissidents of all hierarchical ranks were sent to concentration camps. 400 Germans were among the 2,579 Catholic priests imprisoned in the dedicated clergy barracks at Dachau. Many ordinary German Catholics offered at least passive acquiescence in, if not active support for, the Nazi dictatorship. Head of the German Bishops' Conference, Adolf Bertram, generally sought to avoid confrontation, but the activities of Bishops such as Preysing, Frings and von Galen came to form a coherent, systematic critique of aspects of Nazism. Bishop von Galen led protests against « euthanasia » . Catholic notions of natural law heavily influenced the outlook of the German Resistance and religious motives inspired the actions of lay leaders of the movement, including the « July Plot » leader Claus von Stauffenberg, « Caritas » activists Gertrud Luckner and Margarete Sommer, Catholic Action leader Erich Klausener and Catholic Youth leader Adalbert Probst, who were among the Catholic leaders who died for challenging the regime.

Papal protest against Nazism included the 1937 Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » . The Church faced severe persecution in Poland, where Catholicism was integral to much Polish resistance. The Church was similarly persecuted in the annexed Czech, Austrian and Slovene regions, yet, in the small Nazi puppet States of Slovakia and Croatia, nationalist churchmen collaborated with the Fascists, though here too there was Catholic resistance. Catholic resistance was « armed » in the case of partisans like the Italian Fiamme Verdi guerrilla campaigns. Catholic resistance to mistreatment of Jews in Germany was generally limited to fragmented and largely individual efforts.

Anti-Judaism on religious grounds had a long history in Catholicism, but where Nazi ideology preached of a « Master race » , Catholicism preached instead the « unity of the human race » . Jewish historian Sir Martin Gilbert wrote that, in every country under German occupation, priests played a major part in rescuing Jews.

Michaël Phayer estimates that :

« Rescuers and perpetrators were but a slight minority of Europe's Catholic population » during the Holocaust.

Among the notable Catholic networks to rescue Jews and others from Nazi death camps were Hugh O'Flaherty's « Rome Escape Line » , the Assisi Network and Poland's Żegota. Bishops such as the Netherlands' Johannes de Jong, Belgium's Jozef-Ernest van Roey and France's Jules-Géraud Saliège issued major denunciations of Nazi treatment of the Jews. Papal diplomats such as Angelo Roncalli, Andrea Cassulo, Filippo Bernardini and Angelo Rotta engaged in vigorous diplomatic lobbying and clandestine activities. Convents also played a significant role under the leadership of nuns like Margit Slachta and Matylda Getter.

The Nazis disliked universities, intellectuals and the Catholic and Protestant churches. According to historian of the German Resistance, Theodore S. Hamerow, many Nazis suspected Catholics of insufficient patriotism, or even of disloyalty to the Fatherland, and of serving the interests of « sinister alien forces ». Various historians surmise that the long term plan of the Nazis was to de-Christianise Germany after final victory in the War. Their ideology could not accept an autonomous establishment, whose legitimacy did not spring from the government, and they desired the subordination of the Church to the State.

Aggressive anti-Church radicals like Josef Goebbels and Martin Bormann saw the conflict with the Churches as a priority concern, and anti-Church and anti-Clerical sentiments were strong among grass-roots Party activists. But Catholics constituted about 1/3 of the population, and in the short term, and from political considerations, Hitler was prepared to restrain his anti-Clericalism, seeing danger in strengthening the Church by persecution, though he intended a show-down after the War: In his semi-autobiographical « Mein Kampf », Hitler presented a nihilistic vision, in which the universe is ordered around principles of struggle between weak and strong, rather than on conventional Christian notions long prominent in Germany.

In the 1920's and 1930's, Catholic leaders made a number of forthright attacks on Nazi ideology and the main Christian opposition to Nazism had come from the Catholic Church. German Bishops were hostile to the emerging movement and energetically denounced its « false doctrines ». They warned Catholics against Nazi racism and some dioceses banned membership of the Nazi Party, while the Catholic press criticized the Nazi movement. Figures like Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber, appalled by the totalitarianism, neo-Paganism, and racism of the Nazi movement, had contributed to the failure of the Nazi Munich « Putsch » of 1923.

With ongoing hostility to the Nazis from the Catholic press and the Catholic Center Party, few German Catholics voted Nazi in the elections preceding the Nazi take-over. Catholic regions stayed largely loyal to the Centre Party. In his history of the German Resistance, Hamerow wrote :

« The Catholic Church had generally viewed the Nazi Party with fear and suspicion. It had felt threatened by a radical ultra-nationalist ideology that regarded the papacy as a sinister, alien institution, that opposed denominational separatism in education and culture, and that at times appeared to promote a return to Nordic paganism. The establishment of the 3rd " Reich " seemed to portend the coming of a bitter conflict between Church and State. »

(Extract from Theodore S. Hamerow's « On the Road to the Wolf's Lair - German Resistance to Hitler »)

Following the Wall Street Crash of 1929, the Nazis and Communists made great gains at the 1930 Election. Greatest gains for the Nazis came in the Protestant, rural towns of the North, while Catholic areas remained loyal to the Catholic Centre Party. Both Nazis and Communists pledged to eliminate democracy ; and between them, they secured over 50 % of « Reichstag » seats. At the March 1933 elections, no single Party secured a majority. A middle-class

Liberal Party strong enough to block the Nazis did not exist : the Centre Party maintained its voting block, but was preoccupied defending its own particular interests.

Requiring the votes of the Centre Party and Conservatives, Hitler told the « Reichstag » on March 23 that Positive Christianity was the « unshakeable foundation of the moral and ethical life of our people » , and promised not to threaten the churches or the institutions of the Republic if granted plenary powers. Employing a characteristic mix of negotiation and intimidation, the Nazis called on the « Reichstag » to vote for the Enabling Act on 24 March 1933. The law was to give Hitler the freedom to act without parliamentary consent. The Centre Party, having obtained promises of non-interference in religion, joined with Conservatives in voting for the Act (only the Social-Democrats voted against) .

When the Nazis came to power in Coalition with the Conservatives in early 1933, German Catholics were apprehensive. Parliamentary opposition by Parties like the Catholic aligned Centre Party and Bavarian People's Party was rendered impossible by the abolition of all non Nazi Parties and proclamation of the « Unity of Party and State » . But the new regime treated the churches with circumspection in its 1st months, having no wish to open an ideological battle with them that precarious moment. The Fulda Bishops Conference expressed a degree of confidence in the new government, though still noting certain « religious and moral lapses » . Clerical opposition to Nazism diminished following the 1933 « Reich » concordat between Germany and the Holy-See, amid a cautious rapprochement.

The Nazi propaganda minister, Josef Goebbels, among the most aggressive anti-Church Nazis, wrote that :

« There was an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view. »

Josef Goebbels, the Minister for Propaganda, became one of the leaders of the Nazi persecution of the clergy and wrote that there was « an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view » . Hitler's chosen deputy and private secretary, Martin Bormann, was a rigid guardian of National-Socialist orthodoxy and saw Christianity and Nazism as « incompatible » , as did the official Nazi philosopher, Alfred Rosenberg. In his « Myth of the 20th Century » , published in 1930, Rosenberg wrote that Germans were entitled to dominate Europe and that their enemies were Russian Tartars and Semites. Semites included Jews, Latins, and Christianity - especially, the Catholic Church. In 1934, the « Sanctum Officium » in Rome recommended that Rosenberg's book be put on the « Index Librorum Prohibitorum » (forbidden books list of the Catholic Church) for scorning and rejecting « all dogmas of the Catholic Church, indeed the very fundamentals of the Christian religion » .

A threatening, though initially mainly sporadic persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany followed the Nazi take-over. The Nazis claimed jurisdiction over all collective and social activity, interfering with Catholic schooling, youth groups, workers' clubs and cultural societies. Hitler moved quickly to eliminate Political Catholicism. 2,000 functionaries of the Bavarian People's Party were rounded-up by police in late-June 1933, and it, along with the national Catholic Centre Party, ceased to exist in early July. Vice-Chancellor Papen meanwhile negotiated a « Reich » concordat with the Holy-See, which prohibited clergy from participating in politics. Kershaw wrote that the Vatican was anxious to reach agreement with the new government, despite « continuing molestation of Catholic clergy, and other outrages committed by Nazi radicals against the Church and its organisations » . Hitler had a « blatant disregard » for the Concordat, wrote Paul O'Shea, and its signing was to him merely a 1st step in the « gradual suppression of the Catholic Church in Germany » .

Anton Gill wrote that :

« With his usual irresistible, bullying technique, Hitler then proceeded to take a mile where he had been given an inch. » , and closed all Catholic institutions whose functions weren't strictly religious :

« It quickly became clear that Hitler intended to imprison the Catholics, as it were, in their own churches. They could celebrate mass and retain their rituals as much as they liked, but they could have nothing at all to do with German society otherwise. Catholic schools and newspapers were closed, and a propaganda campaign against the Catholics was launched. »

(Extract from « An Honourable Defeat » by Anton Gill.)

William Shirer wrote :

« The agreement was hardly put to paper before it was being broken by the Nazi Government. »

On 25 July, the Nazis promulgated their sterilization law, an offensive policy in the eyes of the Catholic Church. 5 days later, moves began to dissolve the Catholic Youth League. Clergy, nuns and lay leaders began to be targeted, leading to thousands of arrests over the ensuing years, often on trumped-up charges of currency smuggling or « immorality » . In Hitler's bloody « Night of the Long Knives » purge of 1934, Erich Klausener, the head of Catholic Action, was assassinated by the « Gestapo » . Adalbert Probst, national director of the Catholic Youth Sports Association, Fritz Gerlich, editor of Munich's Catholic weekly and Edgar Jung, one of the authors of the Marburg speech, were among the other high-profile Catholic opposition figures targeted for assassination in the purge. Catholic publications were shut-down. The « Gestapo » began to violate the sanctity of the confessional.

Under Reinhard Heydrich and Heinrich Himmler, the Security Police and the SD were responsible for suppressing internal and external enemies of the Nazi State. Among those enemies were « political churches » - such as Lutheran and Catholic clergy who opposed the Hitler regime. Such dissidents were arrested and sent to concentration camps. In the 1936 campaign against the monasteries and convents, the authorities charged 276 members of religious orders with the offence of « homosexuality » .

Rosenberg and Bormann actively collaborated in the Nazi program to eliminate Church influence - a program which included the abolition of religious services in schools ; the confiscation of religious property ; circulating anti-religious material to soldiers ; and the closing of theological faculties. As the War wore on, Hitler feared the idealism of Christians and said that while « bourgeois and Marxists » would not risk their lives, the truly dangerous people were « assassins whipped-up by the black crows in confessionals (i.e. : priests) or patriots from other countries now occupied » . These « dunderheads » , as Hitler called them, numbered a few hundred thousand in Germany and included « all leaders of opposition tendencies and particularly those of political Catholicism » , and could be rounded-up and shot within 3 days in the event of a mutiny.

Though neither the Catholic nor Protestant churches as institutions were prepared to openly oppose the Nazi State, the churches provided the earliest and most enduring centres of systematic opposition to Nazi policies, and Christian morality and the anti-Church policies of the Nazis motivated many German resistors and provided impetus for the « moral revolt » of individuals in their efforts to overthrow Hitler. From the outset of Nazi rule in 1933, issues emerged which brought the Catholic church into conflict with the regime, and the historian Wolf cites events such as the « July Plot » of 1944 as having been « inconceivable without the spiritual support of church resistance » . The German Opposition saw National-Socialism as standing in « radical opposition to the Western, Christian tradition » .

Hoffmann writes that, from the beginning :

« The Catholic Church could not silently accept the general persecution, regimentation or oppression, nor in particular the sterilization law of summer 1933. Over the years until the outbreak of War, Catholic resistance stiffened until finally its most eminent spokesman was the Pope himself with his Encyclical “ Mit brennender Sorge ” of 14 March 1937, read from all German Catholic pulpits. Clemens August Graf von Galen, Bishop of Münster, was typical of the many fearless Catholic speakers. In general terms, therefore, the churches were the only major organisations to offer comparatively early and open resistance : they remained so in later years. »

(Extract from « The History of the German Resistance 1933-1945 » by Peter Hoffmann.)

Ernst Wolf wrote that some credit must be given to the resistance of the churches, for providing « moral stimulus and guidance for the political Resistance » . Virtually all of the military conspirators in the « July Plot » were religious men. Among the Social-Democrat political conspirators, the Christian influence was also strong, though humanism also played a significant foundational role - and among the wider-circle there were other political, military and nationalist motivations at play. The « Kreisau Circle » leader Helmuth James Graf von Moltke declared in one of his final letters before execution that the essence of the July revolt was « outrage of the Christian conscience » . The « Declaration of Government » that was to be broadcast following the « coup » on 20 July 1944 appealed unambiguously to Christian sensibility :

« The shattered freedom of spirit, conscience, faith and opinion will be restored. The churches will, once again, be given the right to work for their confessions. In future, they will exist quite separately from the State. The working of the State is to be inspired, both in word and deed by the Christian outlook. »

(Intended « Broadcast of Government » of the 1944 « July Plot » conspirators.)

The German Episcopate had various disagreements with the Nazi government, but it never declared an official sanction of the various attempts to overthrow the Hitler regime. The German Bishops hoped for a « quid pro quo » that would protect Catholic schools, organisations, publications and religious observance. The Vatican too persisted in seeking to maintain a « legal modus vivendi » with the regime.

Clergy in the German Resistance had some independence from the State apparatus, and could thus criticize it, while not being close enough to the centre of power to take steps to overthrow it.

Theodore S. Hamerow wrote :

« Clerical resisters could indirectly at least, articulate political dissent in the guise of pastoral stricture. »

But the problem for them lay in determining how far they should go in their criticism :

« Should they confine themselves to religious and moral issues or should they deal with political and racial issues as well. »

Faced with such questions, the German clergy generally determined that their 1st duty lay in the protection of their own church and its members, remaining within the limits of formal legality. Thus, during the early years of Nazi Germany, clerical dissenters usually spoke-out not against the established system, but « only against specific policies that it had mistakenly adopted and that it should, therefore, properly correct » .

Before moving toward resistance, German Catholics and Protestants were also faced with overcoming nationalist sentiment, and an instinct to respect authority which was the inheritance of their religious and national outlooks. In predominantly Protestant Germany, many Catholics were determined to prove that they were « good Germans » too, and avoid the trauma of another « Kulturkampf » . Thus, when Bishop August von Galen of Munich delivered his famous 1941 denunciations of Nazi euthanasia and the lawlessness of the « Gestapo » , he also said that the church had never sought the « overthrow » of the regime. Yet, from the early stages of Nazism, the Nazis moved early against the church's organisational interests - attacking Catholic schools and the Catholic press.

Hastings wrote that the early Nazi movement founded in Munich was essentially Catholic in religious orientation with Catholic student groups being influential in the founding of the movement and Catholic priests providing spiritual guidance. The events surrounding the « Beer-Hall Putsch » in 1923 caused a rift between Catholic and Protestant members and, thereafter, the movement became predominantly Protestant. Archbishop Betram sought to join the Nazi Party in 1932 with Archbishop Conrad Gröber joining the SS as a promotive member in 1933 and Bishop Hudal helping Nazi war criminals to escape after the War.

According to Kershaw, the German church leadership expended considerable energies in opposing government interference in the churches and « attempts to ride roughshod over Christian doctrine and values » , but this vigour, was not matched against all areas of « Nazi barbarism » . Thus, for example, what protests the Bishops did make regarding anti-Jewish policies, tended to be by way of private letters to government ministers. Kershaw wrote that, while the « detestation of Nazism was overwhelming within the Catholic Church » , it did not preclude church leaders approving of areas of the regime's policies, particularly where Nazism « blended into “ main-stream ” national aspirations » - like support for « patriotic » foreign policy or War aims, obedience to State authority (where this did not contravene divine law) ; and destruction of atheistic Marxism and Soviet Bolshevism. Traditional Christian anti-Judaism was « no bulwark » against Nazi biological anti-Semitism, wrote Kershaw, and on these issues « the churches as institutions felt on uncertain grounds » . Opposition was generally left to fragmented and largely individual efforts.

Historian Karl Dietrich Bracher has called « the idea that the Catholic Church almost universally opposed Nazism, “ as questionable as the contrary thesis of a Communist mass movement against Hitler ”, and attributed the Centre Party's paralysis to Catholicism's “ flirtation with the new regime ”. »

Mary Fulbrook wrote that when politics encroached on the church, Catholics were prepared to resist, but that the record was otherwise patchy and uneven, and that, with notable exceptions, « it seems that, for many Germans, adherence to the Christian faith proved compatible with at least passive acquiescence in, if not active support for, the Nazi dictatorship » .

Pinchas Lapidé wrote that, in 1939, close to half the population of the Greater German « Reich » was Catholic and despite pressure to leave 22.7 % of the SS were Catholics.

By early 1937, the church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, had become highly-disillusioned. In March, Pope Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical - accusing the Nazi Government of violations of the 1933 Concordat, and further that it was sowing the « tares of suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » . The Pope noted on the horizon the « threatening storm clouds » of religious wars of extermination over Germany. The Nazis responded with, an intensification of the « Church Struggle » , beginning around April. There were mass arrests of clergy and church presses were expropriated. Goebbels noted heightened verbal attacks on the clergy from Hitler in his diary and wrote that Hitler had approved the start of trumped-up « immorality trials » against clergy and anti-Church propaganda campaign. Goebbels' orchestrated attack included a staged « morality trial » of 37 Franciscans.

Institutionally, the Catholic Church in Germany offered organised, systematic and consistent resistance to the policies of the 3rd « Reich » which infringed on ecclesiastical autonomy. As one of the few German institutions to retain some independence from the State, it was able to continue to co-ordinate a level of opposition to Government, and the churches, more than any other institutions, continued to provide a « forum in which individuals could distance themselves from the regime » .

In the words of Kershaw :

« The churches engaged in a bitter war of attrition with the regime, receiving the demonstrative backing of millions of church-goers. Applause for Church leaders whenever they appeared in public, swollen attendances at events such as “ Corpus Christi ” Day processions, and packed church services were outward signs of the struggle of ... especially of the Catholic Church - against Nazi oppression. »

While the Church ultimately failed to protect its youth organisations and schools, it did have some successes in mobilizing public opinion to alter government policies. The churches challenged Nazi efforts to undermine various Christian institutions, practices and beliefs.

Bullock wrote that :

« Among the most courageous demonstrations of opposition during the War were the sermons preached by the Catholic Bishop of Münster and the Protestant Pastor, Doctor Niemoller ... »

But that nevertheless :

« Neither the Catholic Church nor the Evangelical Church as institutions, felt it possible to take-up an attitude of open opposition to the regime. »

The 1933 « Reich » concordat between Germany and the Vatican prohibited clergy from participating in politics and in the aftermath of the Nazi take-over and signing of the Concordat, the outspoken nature of opposition by German Catholic leaders towards the Nazi movement weakened considerably. But it was from the clergy that the 1st major component of the German Resistance to the policies of the 3rd « Reich » emerged.

Hamerow wrote :

« From the very beginning, some churchmen expressed, quite directly at times, their reservations about the new order. In fact, those reservations gradually came to form a coherent, systematic critique of many of the teachings of National-Socialism. »

Later, the most trenchant public criticism of the 3rd « Reich » came from some of Germany's religious leaders, as the government was reluctant to move against them, and though they could claim to be merely attending to the spiritual welfare of their flocks, « what they had to say was at times so critical of the central doctrines of National-Socialism that to say it required great boldness » , and they became resisters. Their resistance was directed not only against intrusions by the government into church governance and to arrests of clergy and expropriation of church property, but also to matters like Nazi euthanasia and eugenics and to the fundamentals of human rights and justice as the foundation of a political system.

A senior cleric could rely on a degree of popular support from the faithful, and thus the regime had to consider the possibility of nation-wide protests if such figures were arrested. While hundreds of ordinary priests and members of monastic orders were sent to concentration camps throughout the Nazi period, just one German Catholic Bishop was briefly imprisoned in a concentration camp, and just one other expelled from his diocese. This reflected also the cautious approach adopted by the hierarchy, who felt secure only in commenting on matters which transgressed on the ecclesiastical sphere.

While some clergymen refused ever to feign support for the regime, in the Church's conflict with the State over ecclesiastical autonomy, the Catholic hierarchy adopted a strategy of « seeming acceptance of the 3rd “ Reich ” » , by couching their criticisms as motivated merely by a desire to « point-out mistakes that some of its over-zealous followers committed » in order to strengthen the government. Cardinal Bertram of Breslau, the chairman of the German Conference of Bishops, developed a protest system which « satisfied the demands of the other Bishops without annoying the regime » . Firmer resistance by Catholic leaders gradually reasserted itself by the individual actions of leading churchmen like Joseph Frings, Konrad von Preysing, August von Galen and Michæl von Faulhaber. But the German Episcopate was divided over relations with the Nazi regime - figures like Cardinal Bertram, favoured a policy of concessions, while figures like Bishop Preysing called for more concerted opposition. According to Michæl Phayer, in relation to the mistreatment of Jews, « no other German Bishops spoke as pointedly as Preysing and Frings » . Fest nominates Preysing and Galen, but also Archbishop Conrad Gröber among the individual clerics who led broader Catholic resistance.

On 22 March 1942, the German Bishops issued a pastoral letter on « The Struggle against Christianity and the Church » . The letter launched a defence of human rights and the rule of law and accused the « Reich » Government of « unjust oppression and hated struggle against Christianity and the Church » , despite the loyalty of German Catholics to the Fatherland, and brave service of Catholics soldiers. It accused the regime of seeking to rid Germany of Christianity :

« For years, a War has raged in our Fatherland against Christianity and the Church, and has never been conducted with such bitterness. Repeatedly, the German Bishops have asked the “ Reich ” Government to discontinue this fatal struggle ; but unfortunately our appeals and our endeavours were without success. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops dated 22 March 1942.)

The letter outlined serial breaches of the 1933 Concordat, reiterated complaints of the suffocation of Catholic schooling, presses and hospitals and said that the « Catholic faith has been restricted to such a degree that it has disappeared almost entirely from public life » and even worship within churches in Germany « is frequently restricted or oppressed » , while in the conquered territories (and even in the « Old “ Reich ” ») , churches had been « closed by force and even used for profane purposes » . The freedom of speech of clergymen had been suppressed and priests were being « watched constantly » and punished for fulfilling « priestly duties » and incarcerated in concentration camps without legal process. Religious orders had been expelled from schools, and their properties seized, while seminaries had been confiscated « to deprive the Catholic priesthood of successors » . The Bishops denounced the Nazi euthanasia program and declared their support for human rights and personal freedom under God and « just laws » of all people :

« We demand juridical proof of all sentences and release of all fellow citizens who have been deprived of their liberty without proof. We the German Bishops shall not cease to protest against the killing of innocent persons. Nobody's life is safe unless the Commandment, “ Thous shalt not kill ” is observed. We, the Bishops, in the name of the Catholic people demand the return of all unlawfully confiscated and, in some cases, sequestered property for what happens today to church property may tomorrow happen to any lawful property. »

(Pastoral Letter of the German Bishops dated 22 March 1942.)

Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber gained an early reputation as a critic of the Nazi movement. Soon after the Nazi take-over, his 3 Advent sermons of 1933, entitled « Judaism, Christianity, and Germany » , affirmed the Jewish origins of the Christian religion, the continuity of the Old and New Testaments of the Bible, and the importance of the Christian tradition to Germany. Though Faulhaber's words were cautiously framed as a discussion of historical Judaism, his sermons denounced the Nazi extremists who were calling for the Bible to be purged of the « Jewish » Old Testament as a grave threat to Christianity : in seeking to adhere to the central tenet of Nazism, « The anti-Semitic zealots ... » wrote Hamerow, were also undermining « the basis of Catholicism. Neither accommodation, nor acquiescence was possible any longer ; the Cardinal had to face the enemy head on. » Hamerow wrote that Faulhaber would look to avoid conflict with the State over issues not strictly pertaining to the church, but on issues involving the defence of Catholics he « refused to compromise or retreat » . On 4 November 1936, Hitler and Faulhaber met. Faulhaber told Hitler that the Nazi government had been waging War on the church for 3 years and had instituted laws the Church could not accept - like the sterilization of criminals and the handicapped.

While the Catholic Church respected the notion of authority, he told the Dictator :

« When your officials or your laws offend Church dogma or the laws of morality, and, in so doing, offend our conscience, then we must be able to articulate this as responsible defenders of moral laws. »

When, in 1937, the authorities in Upper-Bavaria attempted to replace Catholic schools with « common schools » , he offered fierce resistance.

During the 1938 « Kristallnacht » , Faulhaber supplied a truck to rabbi of the Ohel Yaakov Synagogue, to rescue sacred objects before the building was torn down. Following mass-demonstrations against Jews and Catholics, a Nazi mob attacked Faulhaber's palace, and smashed its windows. While Hamerow viewed Faulhaber as essentially a defender of « Catholic interests » , other sources credit him with greater defiance.

According to the Encyclopædia Britannica :

« Throughout his sermons until the collapse of the 3rd “ Reich ” (1945) , Faulhaber vigorously criticized Nazism, despite governmental opposition. Attempts on his life were made in 1934 and in 1938. He worked with American occupation forces after the War, and received the West German Republic's highest-award : the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit. »

Among the most firm and consistent of senior Catholics to oppose the Nazis was Konrad von Preysing. Preysing served as Bishop of Eichstatt from 1932 to 1935 and, in 1935, was appointed as Bishop of Berlin : the capital of Nazi Germany.

Preysing was loathed by Hitler, who said :

« The foulest of carrion are those who come clothed in the cloak of humility and the foulest of these Count Presying ! What a beast ! »

Von Preysing opposed the appeasing attitudes of Bertram towards the Nazis and was one of the most firm and consistent church opponents of Hitler. He spoke-out in public sermons and argued the case for firm opposition at Bishops' conferences. He also worked with leading members of the resistance Carl Gærdeler and Helmuth James Graf von Moltke. He was part of the 5 member commission that prepared the anti-Nazi Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » of March 1937 and sought to block the Nazi closure of Catholic schools and arrests of church officials. In 1938, he became one of the co-founders of the « Hilfswerk beim Bischöflichen Ordinariat Berlin » (Welfare Office of the Berlin Diocese Office) . He extended care to both baptised and un-baptised Jews and protested the Nazi euthanasia programme. His Advent Pastoral Letters of 1942 and 1943, on the nature of human rights, reflected the anti-Nazi theology of the Barmen Declaration of the Confessing Church, leading one to be broadcast in German by the BBC. In 1944, Preysing met with and gave a blessing to Claus von Stauffenberg, in the lead-up to the « July Plot » to assassinate Hitler, and spoke with the resistance leader on whether the need for radical change could justify tyrannicide. Despite Preysing's open opposition, the Nazis did not dare arrest him and, several months after the end of the War, he was named a Cardinal by Pope Pius XII.

The Bishop of Münster, August von Galen, was Preysing's cousin. Himself a German conservative and nationalist, in January 1934, he criticized Nazi racial policy in a sermon and in subsequent homilies, equated unquestioning loyalty to the « Reich » with « slavery » and spoke against Hitler's theory of the purity of German blood. Galen derided the neo-Pagan theories of Rosenberg as, perhaps, no more than « an occasion for laughter in the educated world » , but warned that « his immense importance lies in the acceptance of his basic notions as the authentic philosophy of National-Socialism and in his almost unlimited power in the field of German education. “ Herr ” Rosenberg must be taken seriously if the German situation is to be understood. »

When, in 1933, the Nazi school superintendent of Münster issued a decree that religious instruction be combined with discussion of the « demoralising power » of the « people of Israel » , Galen refused, writing that such interference in curriculum was a breach of the Concordat and that he feared children would be confused as to their « obligation to act with charity to all men » and as to the historical mission of the people of Israel. Often, Galen directly protested to Hitler over violations of the Concordat. After constant confrontations, by late-1935, Bishop August von Galen of Munich was urging a joint pastoral letter protesting an « underground war » against the Church. Hamerow characterized the resistance approach of senior Catholic clergy like August von Galen of Munich as « trying to influence the 3rd “ Reich ” from within » . When, in 1936, Nazis removed crucifixes in school, protest by Galen led to public demonstration. Like Presying, he assisted with the drafting of the 1937 papal Encyclical.

In 1941, with the « Wehrmacht » still marching on Moscow, Galen, the old nationalist, denounced the lawlessness of the « Gestapo » , and the confiscations of Church properties. He attacked the « Gestapo » for converting Church properties to their own purposes - including use as cinemas and brothels. Galen protested the mistreatment of Catholics in Germany : the arrests and imprisonment without legal process, the suppression of the monasteries, the expulsion of religious orders. But his sermons went further than defending the Church, he spoke of a moral danger to Germany from the regime's violations of basic human rights.

He said :

« The right to life , to inviolability, and to freedom is an indispensable part of any moral social order. »

And any government that punishes without court proceedings « undermines its own authority and respect for its sovereignty within the conscience of its citizens » . Bishop von Galen led denunciation of Nazi euthanasia and the most wide-spread public protests against any Nazi policy up to that time.

« There are sacred obligations of conscience from which no one has the power to release us and which we must fulfil even if it costs us our lives. »

(Extract from 1941 sermon by August von Galen, Bishop of Munich.)

His 3 powerful sermons of July and August 1941 earned him the nickname of the « Lion of Münster » . Galen's sermons appealed to Christian conscience as the well for opposition. The sermons were printed and distributed illegally. Hitler wanted to have Galen removed, but Josef Gœbbels told him this would result in the loss of the loyalty of Westphalia. Documents suggest the Nazis intended to hang von Galen at the end of the War.

In a « Table Talk » from 1942, Hitler is quoted as having said :

« The fact that I remain silent in public over Church affairs is not in the least misunderstood by the sly foxes of the Catholic Church, and I am quite sure that a man like Bishop von Galen knows full well that, after the War, I shall extract retribution to the last farthing. »

Josef Frings became Archbishop of Cologne in 1942 and his consecration was used as a demonstration of Catholic self-assertion. In his sermons, he repeatedly spoke in support of persecuted peoples and against State repression. In March 1944, Frings attacked arbitrary arrests, racial persecution and forced divorces. That autumn, he protested to the « Gestapo » against the deportations of Jews from Cologne and surrounds. In 1943, the German Bishops had debated whether to directly confront Hitler collectively over what they knew of the murdering of Jews. Frings wrote a pastoral letter cautioning his diocese not to violate the inherent rights of others to life, even those « not of our blood » and even during War, and preached in a sermon that « no one may take the property or life of an innocent person just because he is a member of a foreign race » . Following War's end, Frings succeeded Bertram as chairman of the Fulda

Bishops' Conference in July 1945 and, in 1946, he was appointed a cardinal by Pius XII.

The Blessed Clemens August Graf von Galen, Bishop of Münster spoke-out against euthanasia in Nazi Germany.

From 1934, forced sterilisation of the hereditarily diseased had commenced in Germany. Based on eugenic theories, it proposed to cleanse the German nation of « unhealthy breeding stock » and was taken a step further in 1939, when the regime commenced its « euthanasia ». This was the 1st of the regime's infamous series of mass-extermination programs, which saw the Nazis attempt to eliminate « life unworthy of life » from Europe : 1st the handicapped ; then, Jews, Gypsies, homosexuals, Jehovah's Witnesses ; and others deemed « sub-normal ». Ultimately, the Jews suffered most in numerical terms, while Gypsies suffered the greatest proportional loss.

While the Nazi « Final Solution » liquidation of the Jews took place primarily on Polish territory, the murder of invalids took place on German soil, and involved interference in Catholic (and Protestant) welfare institutions. Awareness of the murderous programme therefore became wide-spread, and the Church leaders who opposed it (chiefly, the Catholic Bishop of Münster, August von Galen and Doctor Theophil Wurm, the Protestant Bishop of Wurttemberg) were, therefore, able to rouse wide-spread public opposition.

The intervention led to, in the words of Evans :

« The strongest, most explicit and most wide-spread protest movement against any policy since the beginning of the 3rd “ Reich ”. »

From 1939, the regime began its program of euthanasia, under which those deemed « racially unfit » were to be « euthanased ». Hitler's order for the « Aktion T4 » Euthanasia Program was dated 1 September, the day Germany invaded Poland. The senile, the mentally handicapped and mentally ill, epileptics, cripples, children with Down's Syndrome and people with similar afflictions were all were to be killed. The program ultimately involved the systematic murder of more than 70,000 people.

The Papacy and German Bishops had already protested against the Nazi sterilization of the « racially unfit ». Catholic protests against the escalation of this policy into « euthanasia » began in the summer of 1940. Despite Nazi efforts to transfer hospitals to State control, large numbers of handicapped people were still under the care of the Churches. « Caritas » was the chief organisation running such care services for the Catholic Church. After Protestant welfare activists took a stand at the Bethel Hospital in August von Galen's diocese, Galen wrote to Bertram, in July 1940, urging the Church to take-up a moral position. Bertram urged caution. Archbishop Conrad Gröber of Freiburg wrote to the head of the « Reich » Chancellery, and offered to pay all costs being incurred by the State for the « care of mentally people intended for death ». « Caritas » directors sought urgent direction from the Bishops, and the Fulda Bishops Conference sent a protest letter to the « Reich » Chancellery, on 11 August, then, sent Bishop Heinrich Wienken of « Caritas » to discuss the matter. Wienken cited the commandment « thou shalt not kill » to officials and warned them to halt the program or face public protest from the Church. Wienken subsequently wavered, fearing a firm line might jeopardize his efforts to have Catholic priests released from Dachau, but was urged to stand firm by Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber. The government refused to give a written undertaking to halt the program, and the Vatican declared on 2 December that the policy was contrary to natural and positive Divine law :

« The direct killing of an innocent person because of mental or physical defects is not allowed. »

Bishop von Galen had the decree printed in his newspaper on 9 March 1941. Subsequent arrests of priests and seizure of Jesuit properties by the « Gestapo » , in his home city of Münster, convinced Galen that the caution advised by his superior had become pointless. On 6, 13 and 20 July 1941, Galen spoke against the seizure of properties, and expulsions of nuns, monks and religious and criticized the euthanasia programme. In an attempt to cow Galen, the police raided his sister's convent, and detained her in the cellar. She escaped the confinement, and Galen, who had also received news of the imminent removal of further patients, launched his most audacious challenge on the regime in a 3 August sermon. As word of the program spread, protest grew, until finally, Bishop August von Galen delivered his famous 1941 sermons denouncing the program as « murder » . He declared the murders to be illegal, and said that he had formally accused those responsible for murders in his diocese in a letter to the public prosecutor. The policy opened the way to the murder of all « unproductive people » , like old horses or cows, including invalid war veterans.

He asked :

« Who can trust his doctor anymore ? »

On 3 August 1941, in one of his series of denunciations, Galen declared :

« Thou shalt not kill.

God engraved this commandment on the souls of men long before any penal code. God has engraved these commandments in our hearts. They are the unchangeable and fundamental truths of our social life. Where in Germany and where, here, is obedience to the precepts of God ? As for the 1st commandment, “ Thou shalt not have strange gods before me ”, instead of the “ One, True, Eternal God ”, men have created at the dictates of their whim, their own gods to adore : Nature, the State, the Nation, or the Race. »

Evans wrote :

« He declared that Catholics must “ avoid those who blasphemed, attacked their religion, or brought about the death of innocent men and women. Otherwise, they would become involved in their guilt. ” »

Galen said that it was the duty of Christians to resist the taking of human life, even if it meant losing their own lives. Thousands of copies of the sermons were circulated across Germany.

Evans wrote :

« The sensation created by the sermons was enormous. »

Kershaw characterized von Galen's 1941 « open attack » on the government's euthanasia program as a « vigorous denunciation of Nazi inhumanity and barbarism » .

According to Gill :

« Galen used his condemnation of this appalling policy to draw wider conclusions about the nature of the Nazi State. Galen had the sermons read in parish churches. The British broadcast excerpts over the BBC German service, dropped leaflets over Germany, and distributed the sermons in occupied countries. »

There were demonstrations across Catholic Germany - Hitler himself faced angry demonstrators at Nuremberg, the only time he was confronted with such resistance by ordinary Germans. The regime did not halt the murders, but took the program underground. Bishop Antonius Hilfrich of Limburg wrote to the Justice Minister, denouncing the murders. Bishop Albert Stohr of Mainz condemned the taking of life from the pulpit. Some of the priests who distributed the sermons were among those arrested and sent to the concentration camps amid the public reaction to the sermons. The regional Nazi leader, and Hitler's deputy, Martin Bormann, called for Galen to be hanged, but Hitler and Goebbels urged a delay in retribution till War's end. With the programme now public knowledge, nurses and staff (particularly in Catholic institutions) , now increasingly seeking to obstruct implementation of the policy, Hitler ordered a halt to the killing of adults (though maintained the easier to conceal murder of children) . Following the War, Pope Pius XII hailed von Galen a hero and promoted him to Cardinal.

In 1943, Pius issued the « Mystici corporis Christi » Encyclical, in which he condemned the practice of killing the disabled. He stated his « profound grief » at the murder of the deformed, the insane, and those suffering from hereditary disease as though they were a useless burden to Society » , in condemnation of the ongoing Nazi euthanasia program. The Encyclical was followed, on 26 September 1943, by an open condemnation by the German Bishops which, from every German pulpit, denounced the killing of « innocent and defenceless mentally handicapped, incurably infirm and fatally wounded, innocent hostages, and disarmed prisoners of War and criminal offenders, people of a foreign race or descent » .

While Hitler did not feel powerful enough to arrest senior clergy before the end of the War, an estimated 1/3 of German priests faced some form of reprisal from the Nazi government. Bishop von Preysing was protected from Nazi retaliation by his position, his cathedral administrator and confidant, Provost Blessed Bernard Lichtenberg, was not. A strong opponent of Nazism, Lichtenberg had been active with the Catholic Centre Party. Lichtenberg served at Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral from 1932, and was under the watch of the « Gestapo » by 1933, for his courageous support of prisoners and Jews. He became a confidante of Bishop von Preysing from 1935. He ran Preysing's aid unit (the « Hilfswerke beim Bischöflichen Ordinariat Berlin ») which secretly gave assistance to those who were being persecuted by the regime. From the « Kristallnacht » pogrom of November 1938 onward, Lichtenberg closed each nightly service with a prayer for « the Jews, and the poor prisoners in the concentration camps » , including « my fellow priests there » . Lichtenberg met his demise for protesting the Nazi policy regarding euthanasia directly to Doctor Conti, the Nazi State Medical Director. On 28 August 1941, he endorsed Galen's sermons in a letter to Conti, pointing to the German constitution which defined euthanasia as an act of murder. On 23 October 1942, he offered a prayer for the Jews being deported to the East, telling his congregation to extend to the Jews the commandment of Christ to « Love thy neighbour » . For preaching against Nazi propaganda and writing a letter of protest concerning Nazi euthanasia, he was arrested in 1941, sentenced to 2 years' penal servitude, and died en route to Dachau Concentration Camp in 1943. He was subsequently honoured by Yad Vashem as Righteous among the Nations.

The Blessed Rupert Mayer, a Bavarian Jesuit and World War I army chaplain, had clashed with the National-Socialists as early as 1923. Continuing his critique following Hitler's rise to power, Mayer was imprisoned in 1939 and sent to Sachsenhausen concentration camp. As his health declined, the Nazis feared the creation of a martyr and sent him to the Abbey of Ettal, but Myer died in 1945.

Laurentius Siemer, Provincial of the Dominican Province of Teutonia, became a steadfast opponent of the Nazi regime and had contacts with the Resistance. The « Gestapo » arrested Siemer in Cologne, in 1935, as part of the « Currency Fraud Cases » targeting Catholic clergy, and held him in custody for several months. He was influential in the Committee for Matters Relating to the Orders, which formed in response to Nazi attacks against Catholic monasteries and aimed to encourage the Bishops to intercede on behalf of the Orders and oppose the Nazi State more emphatically. He spoke to resistance circles on the subject of Catholic social teaching as the starting-point for the reconstruction of Germany, and worked with Carl Gørdeler and others in planning for a post-coup Germany. Following the failure of the « July Plot » , Siemer evaded capture and hid-out until the end of the War.

Also involved in the German Resistance was Christian workers' movement activist and Centre Party politician Friar Otto Müller. Müller was among those who argued for a firm line from the German Bishops against legal violations of the Nazis. In contact with the German military opposition before the outbreak of War, he later allowed individual opposition figures the use of the « Ketteler-Haus » in Cologne for their discussions and was involved with Catholic politicians and « July Plotters » Jakob Kaiser, Nikolaus Groß and Bernhard Letterhaus in planning a post Nazi-Germany. After the failure of the « July Plot » , the « Gestapo » arrested Müller, who was imprisoned in the Berlin Police Hospital, where he died.

Parish priests such as the Lübeck martyrs, Johannes Prassek, Eduard Müller and Hermann Lange, and the Lutheran pastor Karl Friedrich Stellbrink were partly inspired by August von Galen's anti-euthanasia homilies. They shared disapproval of the Nazi regime, and the 4 priests spoke publicly against the Nazis (initially discreetly) distributing pamphlets to friends and congregants. Although Church federation work with young people was banned, Müller worked with youth groups and led a discussion circle whose topics included National-Socialism, political events and the military situation - using information from British radio and from leaflets including the sermons of Bishop Clemens August von Galen, which he duplicated with Lange and Prassek. Then, following a March 1942 Royal Air Force raid, after which Stellbrink tended wounded, he delivered a Palm Sunday sermon which attributed the bombing to divine punishment. Stellbrink was arrested, followed by the 3 Catholic priests, and each was sentenced to death. Resigned to martyrdom, Prassek wrote to his family : « Who can oppress one who dies. » The mingling of the blood of the 4 guillotined martyrs has become a symbol of German Ecumenism.

Friar Max Josef Metzger, a World War I military chaplain and holder of the Iron Cross, had founded the German Catholics' Peace Association in 1919 and sought links to the international pacifist movement. As a leading German pacifist, he was targeted by the Nazi authorities and arrested on several occasions by the « Gestapo ». He was arrested for the last time, in June 1943, after being denounced by a mail-courier for attempting to send a memorandum on the re-organisation of the German State and its integration into a future system of world peace to Erling Eidem, the Swedish Archbishop of Uppsala. Sentenced to death, he was executed on 17 April 1944.

An old guard of national-conservatives aligned to Carl Friedrich Gørdeler broke with Hitler in the mid-1930's.

According to Kershaw :

« They despised the barbarism of the Nazi regime. But were keen to re-establish Germany's status as a major power. »

Essentially authoritarian, they favoured monarchy and limited electoral rights « resting on Christian family values » .

Gørdeler wrote :

« Hitlerism is poison for the German soul. Hitler is determined to destroy Christianity. »

A younger group, dubbed the « Kreisau Circle » by the « Gestapo », did not look to German Imperialism for inspiration. Religious motivations were particularly strong in the « Kreisau Circle » of the Resistance. Formed in 1937, though multi-denominational, it had a strongly Christian orientation, and looked for a general Christian revival, and re-awakening of awareness of the transcendental. Its outlook was rooted both in German Romantic and idealist tradition and in the Catholic doctrine of natural law. The « Circle » looked to a federalized Europe along the lines of the United States as the desirable « new order », resting heavily on German Christian and social ideals, with self-governing communities rooted in social justice. The « Circle » pressed for a « coup » against Hitler, but being unarmed was dependent on persuading military figures to take action.

Among the central membership of the « Circle » were the Jesuit Fathers Augustin Rösch, Alfred Delp and Lothar König. Bishop von Preysing had contact with the group. The Catholic conservative Karl Ludwig von Guttenberg brought the Jesuit Provincial of Southern Germany Augustin Rösch into the « Kreisau Circle », along with Alfred Delp. For figures like Rösch, the Catholic trade-unionists Jakob Kaiser and Bernhard Letterhaus and the « July Plot » leader Klaus von Stauffenberg, « religious motives and the determination to resist would seem to have developed hand in hand ». The Jesuit Alfred Delp was an influential member of the « Kreisau Circle » - one of the few clandestine German Resistance groups operating inside Nazi Germany. He was executed in February 1945.

According to Gill :

« Delp's role was to sound out for Moltke the possibilities in the Catholic Community of support for a new, post-War Germany. »

Rösch and Delp also explored the possibilities for common ground between Christian and Socialist trade-unions. Lothar König SJ became an important intermediary between the « Circle » and Bishops Gröber of Freiberg and Presying of Berlin.

The « Kreisau Circle » combined conservative notions of reform with socialist strains of thought - a symbiosis expressed by Delp's notion of « personal socialism ». The group rejected Western models, but wanted to « associate conservative and socialist values, aristocracy and workers, in a new democratic synthesis which would include the churches » .

Delp wrote :

« It is time the 20th Century revolution was given a definitive theme, and the opportunity to create new and lasting horizons for humanity. » , by which he meant, social security and the basics for individual intellectual and religious development. So long as people lacked dignity, they would be incapable of prayer or thought. In « Die dritte Idee » (The 3rd Idea) , Delp expounded on the notion of a 3rd way, which, as opposed to Communism and Capitalism, might restore the unity of the person and society.

Another non-military German Resistance group, dubbed the « “ Frau ” Solf Tea Party » by « Gestapo » , included the Jesuit Friar Friedrich Erxleben. The purpose of the « Solf Circle » was to seek-out humanitarian ways of countering the Nazi regime. It met at either « Frau » Solf or Elizabeth von Thadden's home. Von Thadden was a Christian educational reformer and Red Cross worker. Otto Kiep and most of the group were arrested in 1941 and executed.

In effort to counter the strength and influence of spiritual resistance, Nazi security services monitored Catholic clergy very closely - instructing that agents be set-up in every diocese, that the Bishops' reports to the Vatican should be obtained and that the Bishops' areas of activity must be found-out. A « vast network » was established to monitor the activities of ordinary clergy.

Nazi security agents wrote :

« The importance of this enemy is such that inspectors of security police and of the security service will make this group of people and the questions discussed by them their special concern. »

Priests were frequently denounced, arrested and sent to concentration camps, often simply on the basis of being « suspected of activities hostile to the State » or that there was reason to « suppose that his dealings might harm society » .

Dachau was established in March 1933 as the 1st Nazi Concentration Camp. Chiefly a political camp, it was here that the Nazis established in 1940 a dedicated Clergy Barracks. Of a total of 2,720 clergy recorded as imprisoned at Dachau, some 2,579 (or 94.88 %) were Catholic and a total of 1,034 clergy were recorded overall as dying in the camp, with 132 « transferred or liquidated » during that time - although Reimund Schnabel's 1966 investigation found an alternative total of 2,771, with 692 noted as deceased and 336 sent-out on « invalid trainloads » and, therefore, presumed dead.

By far, the greatest number of priest prisoners came from Poland - in all some 1,748 Polish Catholic clerics, of whom some 868 died in the camp. Germans constituted the next largest group - 411 German Catholic priests were sent to Dachau, of whom 94 died in the camp and 100 were « transferred or liquidated » . France contributed the next main group, with 153 Catholic clerics, among whom 10 died at the camp. Other Catholic priests were sent from Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands, Yugoslavia, Belgium, Italy, Luxembourg, Lithuania, Hungary and Rumania, while from outside the Nazi Empire - 2 British and 1 Spaniard were incarcerated at Dachau, as well as 1 « stateless » priest.

In December 1935, Wilhelm Braun, a Catholic theologian from Munich, became the 1st churchman imprisoned at Dachau. The annexation of Austria saw an increase in clerical inmates.

Berben wrote :

« The commandant at the time, Lortz, persecuted them with ferocious hatred, and, unfortunately, he found some prisoners to help the guards in their sinister work. »

Despite SS hostility to religious observance, the Vatican and German Bishops successfully lobbied the regime to concentrate clergy at 1 camp and obtained permission to build a chapel, for the priests to live communally and, for time, to be allotted to them for the religious and intellectual activity. From December 1940, priests were gathered in Blocks 26, 28 - and 30, though only temporarily. 26 became the international Block and 28 was reserved for Poles - the most numerous group.

Conditions varied for prisoners in the camp. The Nazis introduced a racial hierarchy - keeping Poles in harsh conditions, while favouring German priests. Many Polish priests simply died of the cold, not given sufficient clothing. A large number died in horrific Nazi medical experiments. Several Poles met their deaths via the « invalid trains » sent out from the camp, others were liquidated in the camp and given bogus death certificates. Some died of cruel punishment for misdemeanors - beaten to death or worked to exhaustion.

Religious activity outside the chapel was totally forbidden. Priests would secretly take confessions and distribute the Eucharist among other prisoners.

Amid the Nazi persecution of the Tirolian Catholics, the Blessed Otto Neururer, a parish priest was sent to Dachau for « slander to the detriment of German marriage » , after he advised a girl against marrying the friend of a senior Nazi. After agreeing to perform a forbidden baptism at Buchenwald, Neururer was sent to the punishment block, where he was hanged upside down until he died on 30 May 1940. This was reportedly conducted at the orders of the sadistic « SS Hauptscharführer » Martin Sommer : the « Hangman of Buchenwald » . He was the 1st priest killed in the concentration camps.

Among the priest-martyrs who died at Dachau were many of the 108 Polish Martyrs of World War II. The Blessed Gerhard Hirschfelder died of hunger and illness in 1942. The Blessed Titus Brandsma, a Dutch Carmelite, died of a lethal injection in 1942. Blessed Alois Andritzki, a German priest, was given a lethal injection in 1943. The Venerable Engelmar Unzeitig, a Czech priest died of typhoid in 1945. The Venerable Giuseppe Girotti died at the camp in April 1945.

In December 1944, the Blessed Karl Leisner, a deacon from Münster who was dying of tuberculosis received his ordination at Dachau. Leisner had been active in the Christian Youth Movement under Bishop von Galen, bringing him to the attention of the « Gestapo » . His fellow prisoner Gabriel Piguet, the Bishop of Clermont-Ferrand presided at the secret ceremony. Leisner died soon after the liberation of the camp.

Among other notable Catholic clerics sent to Dachau were : Father Jean Bernard of Luxembourg, Hilary Paweł Januszewski (died in 1945) , Lawrence Wnuk, Ignacy Jeż and Adam Kozłowiecki of Poland ; Friars Josef Lenzel, August Fröhlich, Blessed Georg Häfner and Bernhard Heinzmann of Germany. Following the War, the Mortal Agony of Christ Chapel and a Carmelite Convent were built at Dachau in commemoration.

In his history of the German Resistance to Hitler, Anton Gill wrote that « more than anyone else, the Catholics showed their disapproval of the regime by huge gatherings » but that « this was the only collective resistance Catholics showed » . In 1935, in Hagen, Catholics gathered to protest against a performance of the Nazi playwright Edmund Kiss's anti-Christian play « Wittekind » . Police crushed the riot. In November 1936, the Oldenburg Nazis removed crucifixes from schools. Bishop Galen protested, which led to a public demonstration, and the cancellation of the order. In 1937, amidst harassment of the Church and following the hundreds of arrests and closure of Catholic presses that followed the issuing of Pope Pius XI's « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical, at least 800,000 people attended a pilgrimage centred on Aachen (a massive demonstration by the standards of the day) and some 60,000 attended the 700th anniversary of the bishopric of Franconia - about equal to the city's entire population.

In the year following Hitler's « seizure of power » , political players in Germany began wondering how the regime might be overthrown. The old political opponents of Nazism faced their final opportunity to halt the Nazification of Germany. The formerly influential Catholic aligned Centre Party and Bavarian People's Party were dissolved under terrorisation, and non-Nazi Parties were prohibited under the proclamation of the « Unity of Party and State » . The former Centre Party leader and « Reich » Chancellor, Heinrich Brüning, looked for a way to oust Hitler, along with military chiefs Kurt von Schleicher and Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord. Erich Klausener, an influential civil servant and president of Berlin's Catholic Action group organized Catholic conventions in Berlin, in 1933 and 1934. At the 1934 rally, he spoke against political oppression to a crowd of 60,000 following mass - just 6 nights before Hitler struck in a bloody purge.

The political temperature was also raised when the Conservative Catholic nobleman Franz von Papen, who had helped Hitler to power and was serving as the Deputy « Reich » Chancellor, delivered an indictment of the Nazi government in his Marburg speech of 17 June 1934. Papen's speech writer and advisor Edgar Jung, a Catholic Action worker, seized the opportunity to re-assert the Christian foundation of the State and the need to avoid agitation and propaganda.

The speech declared :

« It is time to join together in fraternal friendship and respect for all our fellow countrymen, to avoid disturbing the labours of serious men and to silence fanatics. »

The speech was banned from the press. Jung had been a tireless opponent of the Nazis, and took every opportunity to undermine them. His speech pleaded for religious freedom, and rejected totalitarian aspirations in the field of religion. It was hoped the speech might spur a rising, centred on Hindenberg, Papen and the army.

Hitler decided to strike at his chief political opponents, both within and without the Nazi movement in a bloody purge : « The Night of the Long Knives » . The purge lasted 2 days, over 30 June and 1 July 1934. Leading rivals of Hitler in the Nazi movement were murdered, along with over 100 opposition figures, including high-profile Catholic resisters. Erich Klausener became the 1st Catholic martyr. Hitler personally ordered the arrest of Jung and his transfer to « Gestapo » headquarters in Berlin. Like Klausener, he was murdered in « The Long Knives » purge. Papen, who was probably also listed for execution, protested, but fell-back in line and did not challenge Hitler again.

The Church had resisted attempts by the new Nazi Government to close its youth organisations and Adalbert Probst, the national director of the Catholic Youth Sports Association, was also eliminated in the purge - abducted and later found dead, allegedly « shot while trying to escape » .

On 2 August 1934, the aged President von Hindenberg died. The offices of President and Chancellor were combined, and Hitler ordered the Army to swear an oath directly to him. Hitler declared his « revolution » complete.

The flourishing Catholic press of Germany faced censorship and closure under the Nazis. In 1933, the Nazis established a « Reich » Chamber of Authorship and « Reich » Press Chamber under the « Reich » Cultural Chamber of the Ministry for Propaganda. Writers had to be registered with the relevant chamber. On 10 May, « degenerate literary works » were burned by the thousand at the public squares of Berlin and other cities. As the Nazis asserted themselves, non-conformist writers were terrorised, their works burned, and fear pervaded. The June-July 1934 « Night of the Long Knives » purge was the culmination of this early campaign. Fritz Gerlich, the editor of Munich's Catholic weekly, « Der Gerade Weg » , was killed in the purge for his strident criticism of the Nazi movement.

The poet Ernst Wiechert delivered a speech at Munich University, calling for love, compassion, truth, freedom and the law. He protested the government's attitudes to the arts, calling them « spiritual murder » . He was arrested and taken to Dachau Concentration Camp.

The Blessed Nikolaus Groß was a Christian trade-unionist, member of the Centre Party and director of the West German Workers' Newspaper « Westdeutschen Arbeiterzeitung » , the newspaper of the Catholic Workers' movement. From early days an opponent of Nazism, he was declared an enemy of the State in 1938, and his newspaper was shut-down. He continued to publish an underground edition and worked to rouse resistance among Catholic workers. Arrested in the « July Plot » round-up, he was executed on 23 January 1945. He was declared a martyr.

Writer and theologian Dietrich von Hildebrand was a vocal opponent of Hitler and Nazism. Black-listed by the Nazi movement in the 1920's, he ran religious discussions in his Munich home from 1924 to 1930, which were attended by distinguished theologians such as Erich Przywara, S.J. , Monsignors Martin Grabmann and Konrad von Preysing. Following Hitler's seizure of power, he fled from Germany, 1st to Italy, and then to Vienna, Austria, where, with the support of Austrian Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss, he founded and edited an anti-Nazi weekly paper, « Der Christliche Ständestaat » (The Christian Corporative State) . For this, he was sentenced to death in absentia by the Nazis. When Hitler annexed Austria in 1938, von Hildebrand was once again forced to flee, spending time in Switzerland, France (where he taught at the Catholic University of Toulouse until the Nazis invaded France in 1940) , then, to Portugal and finally to New York in 1940. There, he taught philosophy at the Jesuit Fordham University.

Members of Catholic aid agencies such as « Caritas » provided relief to victims of the Nazis and gathered intelligence on the fate of prisoners of the regime. Among the German laity, Gertrud Luckner, was among the 1st to sense the genocidal inclinations of the Hitler regime and to take national action. A pacifist and member of the German Catholics' Peace Association, she had been supporting victims of political persecution since 1933 and, from 1938, worked at the head-office of the German Association of Catholic Charitable Organizations, « Caritas » . Using international contacts, she secured safe passage abroad for many refugees. She organized aid circles for Jews, assisted many to escape. She cooperated with the priests Bernhard Lichtenberg and Alfred Delp. Following the outbreak of the War, she continued her work for the Jews through « Caritas' » Rar relief office - attempting to establish a national underground network through « Caritas » cells. She personally investigated the fate of the Jews being transported to the East and managed to obtain information on prisoners in concentration camps, and obtain clothing, food and money for forced labourers and prisoners of War. « Caritas » secured safe emigration for hundreds of converted Jews, but Luckner was unable to organize an effective national underground network. She was arrested in 1943 and only narrowly escaped death in the concentration camps.

Social worker Margarete Sommer had been sacked from her welfare institute for refusing to teach the Nazi line on sterilization. In 1935, she took-up a position at the Episcopal Diocesan Authority in Berlin, counselling victims of racial persecution for « Caritas » Emergency Relief. In 1941, she became director of the Welfare Office of the Berlin Diocesan Authority, under Bernhard Lichtenberg. Following Lichtenberg's arrest, Sommer reported to Bishop Konrad von Preysing. While working for the Welfare Office, Sommer coordinated Catholic aid for victims of racial persecution - giving spiritual comfort, food, clothing, and money. She gathered intelligence on the deportations of the Jews, and living conditions in concentration camps, as well as on SS firing squads, writing several reports on these topics from 1942, including an August 1942 report which reached Rome under the title « Report on the Exodus of the Jews » .

The « White Rose » group was formed by Munich University students and advocated non-violent resistance against the Hitler regime. From 1942, « White Rose » published leaflets to influence people against Nazism and militarism. They criticized the « anti-Christian » and « anti-social » nature of the War. Among the leaders of the group, Willi Graf had been involved with the banned Catholic Youth movement and Christoph Probst was baptised into the church on the day of his execution. The Lutheran Hans Scholl had read Bishop von Galen's 1941 sermons and had worked for Professor Carl Muth, editor of the Catholic Magazine « High-Land », which had been banned in 1941. His sister Sophie Scholl had been influenced by Theodor Haecker to read John Henry Newman's writings on conscience, sentiments echoed by Galen. The Scholl siblings, Kurt Huber, Willi Graf and Alexander Schmorell were caught and executed in 1943.

Though Catholics were prominent in the German Resistance, according to Fest, it essentially consisted of a « motley collection of individuals who differed greatly in their social origins, habits of thought, political attitudes and methods of action » and was by and large slow to accept the need for violence to displace Hitler. A few civilian resistance groups developed, but the Army was the only organisation with the capacity to overthrow the government, and, from within, it a small number of officers came to present the most serious threat posed to the Nazi regime. The Foreign Office and the « Abwehr » (Military Intelligence) also provided vital support to the movement. But many of those in the military who ultimately chose to seek to overthrow Hitler had initially supported the regime, if not all of its methods. Hitler's 1938 purge of the military was accompanied by increased militancy in the Nazification of Germany, a sharp intensification of the persecution of Jews, and daring foreign policy exploits, bringing Germany to the brink of War and it was at this time that the German Resistance emerged.

The Resistance members were motivated by such factors as the mistreatment of Jews, harassment of the churches, and the harsh actions of Heinrich Himmler and the « Gestapo » .

In his history of the German Resistance, Peter Hoffmann wrote that :

« National-Socialism was not simply a Party like any other ; with its total acceptance of criminality, it was an incarnation of evil, so that all those whose minds were attuned to democracy, Christianity, freedom, humanity or even mere legality found themselves forced into alliance. »

The Nazi policy of « Gleichschaltung » (forced conformity to the Nazi Party) met with such forceful opposition from the German churches, that Hitler decided to delay confrontation until the end of the War. The truce constituted a rare win of sorts for an opposition movement in Nazi Germany. The stand-off fed the will of many German resisters, but the Churches as institutions stopped short of ever offering a general resistance to Nazi rule.

During the summer of 1938, wrote Hamerow, small groups of dissidents from the armed forces and civil service began to meet informally, the most prominent figure in these early days being Ludwig Beck, the Army Chief of Staff, who began to contemplate a palace « coup » against Hitler. He wanted, among other Liberal aims, to avoid War and bring-back « peace with the Church » . The back-down of the Western Powers over the Sudeten crisis was a diplomatic triumph for Hitler, and the conspiracy did not progress. Carl Gørdeler wondered if anything could now oppose « the growing dangers to our Christian world » , and the dispirited would-be conspirators were muted when Hitler marched into the remainder of Czechoslovakia in 1939. The early course of War stirred some of the conspirators back into action. But many resisters rallied to the cause of Germany when Hitler invaded Poland, Bishop Galen among them, who offered a patriotic benediction. But with the defeat of Poland, and undoing of the last « injustices » of Versailles, many Opposition members could no longer see a need to continue the War, and looked to ways to negotiate a peace, and to oust Hitler. Hamerow wrote that the « decline of the anti-Nazi movement during the period of German military successes from 1939 to 1941, and its revival during the period of German military reverses from 1942 to 1944 reflected the primary concern of most of the resisters for the security of their nation » .

In Rome, the Pope had continued to lobby world-leaders for the avoidance of a conflict up until the very eve of War, and expressed his dismay that War had come in his October 1939 « Summi Pontificatus » Encyclical. With Poland overrun but France and the Low-Countries, yet, to be attacked, Colonel Hans Oster of the « Abwehr » sent Munich lawyer and devout Catholic, Josef Müller, on a clandestine trip to Rome to seek Papal assistance in the developing plot by the German military opposition to oust Hitler. The Pope's Private Secretary, Robert Leiber acted as the intermediary between Pius and the Resistance. He met with Müller, who visited Rome in 1939 and 1940. Later in the War, Leiber remained the point of contact for communications from Colonel-General Ludwig Beck in the lead-up to the 1944 « July Plot » .

The Vatican considered Müller to be a representative of Colonel-General von Beck and agreed to offer the machinery for mediation. Oster, Wilhelm Canaris and Hans von Dohnányi, backed by Beck, told Müller to ask Pius to ascertain whether the British would enter negotiations with the German opposition which wanted to overthrow Hitler. The British agreed to negotiate, provided the Vatican could vouch for the opposition's representative. Pius, communicating with Britain's Francis d'Arcy Osborne, channelled communications back and forth in secrecy. The Vatican agreed to send a letter outlining the bases for peace with England and the participation of the Pope was used to try to persuade senior German Generals Halder and Brauchitsch to act against Hitler.

Negotiations were tense, with a Western offensive expected, and on the basis that substantive negotiations could only follow the replacement of the Hitler regime. Hoffmann wrote that, when the Venlo Incident stalled the talks, the British agreed to resume discussions primarily because of the « efforts of the Pope and the respect in which he was held. Chamberlain and Halifax set great store by the Pope's readiness to mediate. » Pius, without offering endorsement, advised Osbourne on 11 January 1940 that the German opposition had said that a German offensive was planned for February, but that this could be averted if the German generals could be assured of peace with Britain, and not on punitive terms. If this could be assured, then, they were willing to move to replace Hitler. The Pope admitted to « discomfort » at his role as mediator, but advised that the Germans involved were not Nazis. The British government had doubts as to the capacity of the conspirators. On 7 February, the Pope updated Osbourne that the opposition wanted to replace the Nazi regime with a democratic federation, but hoped to retain Austria and the Sudetenland. The British government was non-committal, and said that while the federal model was of interest, the promises and sources of the opposition were too vague. Nevertheless, the resistance was encouraged by the talks, and Müller told Leiber that a coup would occur in February. Pius appeared to continue to hope for a « coup » in Germany into March 1940.

The negotiations ultimately proved fruitless. Hitler's swift victories over France and the Low-Countries deflated the will of the German military to resist Hitler. Müller was arrested during the Nazis 1st raid on Military Intelligence, in 1943.

He spent the rest of the War in concentration camps, ending-up at Dachau.

On 20 July 1944, an attempt was made to assassinate Adolf Hitler, inside his Wolf's Lair field headquarters in East Prussia. The plot was the culmination of the efforts of several groups in the German Resistance to overthrow the Nazi-led German government. The failure of both the assassination and the military « coup d'état » which was planned to follow it led to the arrest of at least 7,000 people by the « Gestapo ». According to records of the « Führer » Conferences on Naval Affairs, 4,980 of these were executed. During interrogations or their show trials a number of the conspirators cited the Nazi assault on the churches as one of the motivating factors for their involvement. The Protestant clergyman Eugen Gerstenmaier said that the key to the entire resistance flowed from Hitler's evil and the « Christian duty » to combat it.

The Bavarian Catholic Count Claus von Stauffenberg, had initially looked favourably on the arrival of the Nazis in power, but came to oppose the regime because of its persecution of the Jews and oppression of the Church. In 1944, he led the 20th « July Plot » (Operation Valkyrie) to assassinate Hitler. He had joined the resistance in 1943, and commenced planning « coup » , in which he personally placed a time bomb under Hitler's conference table. Killing Hitler would absolve the German military of the moral conundrum of breaking their oath to the « Führer » . Faced with the moral and theological question of tyrannicide, Stauffenberg conferred with Bishop Konrad von Preysing and found affirmation in early Catholicism, and through Martin Luther. In the lead-up to the assassination, Stauffenberg had taken to reciting Stefan George's poem « The Antichrist » , which, wrote Fest, suggested he had elevated « resistance into a sacred deed » .

The planned Cabinet which was to replace the Nazi regime included Catholic politicians Eugen Bolz, Bernhard Letterhaus, Andreas Hermes and Josef Wirmer. Wirmer was a member of the Left of the Centre Party, had worked to forge ties between the civilian resistance and the trade-unions and was a confidant of Jakob Kaiser - a leader of the Christian trade-union movement, which Hitler had banned after taking office. Letterhaus was also trade-union leader. As a captain in the « Oberkommando der Wehrmacht » (Supreme Command) , he had gathered information and become a leading member of the resistance. The proposed radio announcement of the failed « July Putsch » of 1944 revealed the Godly outlook of the leading conspirators :

« Let us once again tread the path of justice, decency and mutual respect ! In this spirit each of us will do his duty. Let us follow the commands of God which are engraved on our conscience, even when they seem hard to us : let us do everything to heal wounded souls and alleviate suffering. »

(Proposed radio broadcast to follow the « July Plot » against Hitler of 1944.)

Following the failure of the plot, Stauffenberg was shot and Moltke, Yorck and Delp, among others, were executed. Philipp von Boeselager, the last surviving member of the conspiracy, wrote that Catholicism influenced anti-Nazi feeling in the German army - to such an extent that Christmas celebrations in the army were banned in 1943. Author Nigel Jones believed that Catholicism and Christian conscience were central to Stauffenberg's decision to move against Hitler. 5,000 people were tortured and killed over the plot - and the « Gestapo » linked a number of Bishops to knowledge of the German Resistance : von Galen, von Faulhaber, Frings, and Johannes Dietz of Fulda - though did not arrest the men.

The Catholic Church resisted the Holocaust by rejecting the racial ideology underpinning the mass exterminations ; making public pronouncements against racial persecutions ; and, by lobbying officials, providing false documents, and hiding people in monasteries, convents, schools, among families and the institutions of the Vatican itself, leading many leading Jews to offer thanks to the Roman Church at the completion of the War. In every country under German occupation, priests played a major part in rescuing Jews.

Catholic historian Michæl Phayer wrote that :

« Rescuers and perpetrators were but a slight minority of Europe's Catholic population. »

On 11 November 1938, following « Kristallnacht » , Pope Pius XI joined Western leaders in condemning the pogrom. In response, the Nazis organized mass demonstrations against Catholics and Jews in Munich, and the Bavarian « Gauleiter » Adolf Wagner declared before 5,000 protesters :

« Every utterance the Pope makes in Rome is an incitement of the Jews throughout the world to agitate against Germany. »

On 21 November, in an address to the world's Catholics, the Pope rejected the Nazi claim of racial superiority, and insisted instead that there was only a single human race.

Robert Ley, the Nazi Minister of Labour declared the following day in Vienna :

« No compassion will be tolerated for the Jews. We deny the Pope's statement that there is but one human race. The Jews are parasites. »

Catholic leaders including Cardinal Schuster of Milan, Cardinal van Roey in Belgium and Cardinal Verdier in Paris backed the Pope's strong condemnation of « Kristallnacht » .

Unlike the Nazi euthanasia murder of invalids, which the Church led protests against, the « Final Solution » liquidation of the Jews did not primarily take place on German soil, but rather in Polish territory. Awareness of the murderous campaign was, therefore, less wide-spread. Such protests as were made by the Catholic Bishops in Germany regarding anti-Semitic policies of the regime, tended to be by way of private letters to government ministers. But the Church had already rejected the racial ideology underpinning the Nazi Holocaust.

The Nazi Concentration Camps had been established in 1933, as political prisons, but it was not until the invasion of Russia that the death camps opened, and techniques learned in the aborted euthanasia program were transported to the East for the racial exterminations. The process of gassing commenced in December 1941.

« Theories began to appear which denied the unity of the human race, affirming an original diversity of races. In the 20th Century, National-Socialism in Germany used these ideas as a pseudo-scientific basis for a distinction between so called Nordic-Aryan races and supposedly inferior races. Furthermore, an extremist form of nationalism was heightened in Germany by the defeat of 1918 and the demanding conditions imposed by the victors, with the consequence that many saw in National-Socialism a solution to their country's problems and cooperated politically with this movement. The Church in Germany replied by condemning racism. »

(From « We Remember : A Reflection on the Shoah » , 1998.)

In the 1930's, Pope Pius XI urged Benito Mussolini to ask Adolf Hitler to restrain the anti-Semitic actions taking place in Germany. In 1937, he issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » (With burning concern) Encyclical, in which he asserted the inviolability of human rights. It was written partly in response to the Nuremberg Laws, and condemned racial theories and the mistreatment of people based on race. It repudiated Nazi racial theory and the « so-called myth of race and blood » .

It denounced :

« Whom ever exalts race, or the people, or the State above their standard value and divinizes them to an idolatrous level. » , spoke of divine values independent of « space country and race » and a Church for « all races » .

And said :

« None but superficial minds could stumble into concepts of a national God, of a national religion ; or attempt to lock within the frontiers of a single people, within the narrow limits of a single race, God, the Creator of the universe. »

Following the « Anschluß » and the extension of anti-Semitic laws in Germany, Jewish refugees sought sanctuary outside the « Reich » .

In Rome, Pius XI told a group of Belgian pilgrims on 6 September 1938 :

« It is not possible for Christians to participate in anti-Semitism. Spiritually we are Semites. »

Following the November « Kristallnacht » of that year, Pius XI condemned the pogrom, sparking mass demonstrations against Catholics and Jews in Munich, where the Bavarian « Gauleiter » Adolf Wagner declared :

« Every utterance the Pope makes in Rome is an incitement of the Jews throughout the world to agitate against Germany. »

The Vatican took steps to find refuge for Jews. On 21 November, in an address to the world's Catholics, Pius XI rejected the Nazi claim of racial superiority, and insisted instead that there was only a single human race.

Pius XI's Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, made some 55 protests against Nazi policies, including its « ideology of race » . Pacelli succeeded Pius XI on the eve of War in 1939. Taking the name Pius XII, he also employed diplomacy to aid the victims of Nazi persecution, and directed his Church to provide discreet aid to Jews. His Encyclicals such as « Summi Pontificatus » and « Mystici corporis » spoke against racism - with specific reference to Jews :

« There is neither Gentile nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision. »

His « Summi Pontificatus » 1st papal Encyclical followed the Nazi-Soviet invasion of Poland, and reiterated Catholic teaching against racism and anti-Semitism and affirmed the ethical principles of the « Revelation on Sinai » . Pius reiterated Church teaching on the « principle of equality » - with specific reference to Jews :

« There is neither Gentile nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision. »

The forgetting of solidarity « imposed by our common origin and by the equality of rational nature in all men » was called « pernicious error » . Catholics everywhere were called upon to offer « compassion and help » to the victims of the War. The letter also decried the deaths of non-combatants. Local Bishops were instructed to assist those in need. Pius went on to make a series of general condemnations of racism and genocide through the course of the War.

After the invasion of the Soviet Union, Nazi Germany commenced its industrialized mass-murder of the Jews, around late-1941 / early-1942. At Christmas 1942, once evidence of the mass-slaughter of the Jews had emerged, Pius XII voiced concern at the murder of « hundreds of thousands » of « faultless » people because of their « nationality or race » and intervened to attempt to block Nazi deportations of Jews in various countries. According to the Encyclopædia Britannica, he refused to say more « fearing that public papal denunciations might provoke the Hitler regime to brutalize further those subject to Nazi terror (as it had when Dutch Bishops publicly protested earlier in the year) while jeopardizing the future of the church » .

Regardless, the Nazi authorities were distressed by the papal intervention. The « Reich » Security Main Office, responsible for the deportation of Jews, noted :

« In a manner never known before, the Pope has repudiated the National-Socialist New European Order. Here, he is virtually accusing the German people of injustice towards the Jews and makes himself the mouthpiece of the Jewish War criminals. »

(« Reich » Security Main Office, following Pope Pius XII's 1942 Christmas address.)

Eugenio Pacelli (later, Pope Pius XII) served as Pius XI's diplomatic representative in Germany (1917-1929) and, then, as Vatican Secretary of State (1929-1939) , during which period he delivered multiple denunciations of Nazi racial ideology. As the newly-installed Nazi Government began to instigate its program of anti- anti-Semitism, Pope Pius XI, through Cardinal Pacelli, who was by then serving as Vatican Secretary of State, ordered the successor Papal Nuncio in Berlin, Cesare Orsenigo, to « look into whether and how it may be possible to become involved » in their aid. Orsenigo generally proved a poor instrument in this regard, concerned more with the anti-Church policies of the Nazis and how these might effect German Catholics, than with taking action to help German Jews. In the assessment of historian Michæl Phayer, Orsenigo did intervene on behalf of the Jews, but only seldom, and apart from his attempt to halt a plan to « resettle » Jews married to Christians, when directed by the Holy-See to protest against mistreatment of Jews, he did so « timidly » .

Pacelli was among those who helped draft the 1937 Papal anti-Nazi Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » , repudiating Nazi racial theory and the « so-called myth of race and blood » . Pacelli became Pope in 1939, and told Vatican officials that he intended to reserve the all important handling of diplomacy with Germany for himself. He issued « Summi Pontificatus » with spoke of the equality of races, and of Jew and Gentile. Following a 21 June 1943 Vatican Radio broadcast to Germany which spoke in defence of Yugoslav Jews, Pius XII instructed the Papal Nuncio to Germany, Cesare Orsenigo to speak directly with Hitler about the persecution of the Jews. Orsenigo later met with Hitler at Berchtesgaden, but when the subject of the Jews was raised, Hitler reportedly turned his back, and smashed a glass on the floor.

In Italy, where the Pope's direct influence was strongest, the Pope ordered Catholic institutions to open themselves to the Jews, when the Nazi round-ups finally came to the country, following Fascist Italy's capitulation. Anti-Semitism had not been a founding principle of Italian Fascism, although Benito Mussolini's regime moved closer to Hitler with time.

On 27 June 1943, Vatican Radio is reported to have broadcast a papal injunction :

« He who makes a distinction between Jews and other men is being unfaithful to God and is in conflict with God's commands. »

In July 1943, with the Allies advancing from the south, Mussolini was overthrown, and, on 1 September, the new government agreed an armistice with the Allies. The Germans occupied much of the country, commencing an effort to deport the nation's Jews. The Pope had helped the Jews of Rome in September, by offering whatever amounts of gold might be needed towards the 50 kilograms ransom demanded by the Nazis.

According to Martin Gilbert, when the Nazis commenced the round-up of Roman Jews of 16 October, Pius had already ...

« A few days earlier personally ordered the Vatican clergy to open the sanctuaries of the Vatican City to all “ non-Aryans ” in need of refuge. By morning of October 16, a total of 477 Jews had been given shelter in the Vatican and its enclaves, while another 4,238 had been given sanctuary in the many monasteries and convents of in Rome. Only 1,015 of Rome's 6,730 Jews were seized that morning. »

Upon receiving news of the round-ups on the morning of 16 October, the Pope immediately instructed Cardinal Secretary of State, Cardinal Maglione, to make a protest to the German Ambassador to the Vatican, Ernst von Weizsacker.

« Maglione did so that morning, making it clear to the ambassador that the deportation of Jews was offensive to the Pope. In urging Weizsacker “ to try to save these innocent people ”, Maglione added :

“ It is sad for the Holy Father, sad beyond imagination, that here in Rome, under the very eyes of the Common Father, that so many people should suffer only because they belong to a specific race. ” »

...

2 Popes served through the Nazi period: Pope Pius XI (1922-1939) and Pope Pius XII (1939-1958) . The Holy-See strongly condemned Nazism through the late-1920's and throughout the 1930's, with Cardinal Pacelli (later, Pope Pius XII) being a particularly outspoken critic. However, following the outbreak of War, Vatican pronouncements became more guarded and Rome pursued its ancient policy of neutrality and openness to the role of peace-broker. During the War, Pius XII was praised by Western media as a « lonely voice » against tyranny in Europe and scorned by Hitler as a « Jew lover » and a black-mailer on his back, whom he believed constricted his ally Mussolini and leaked confidential German correspondence to the world.

The pontificate of Pius XI coincided with the early aftermath of the First World War. The old European monarchies had been largely swept away and a new and precarious order formed across the continent. In the East, the Soviet Union arose. In Italy, the Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini took power, while in Germany, the fragile Weimar Republic collapsed with the Nazi seizure of power.

In 1929, Pius signed the Lateran Treaty and a concordat with Italy, confirming the existence of an independent Vatican City State, in return for recognition of the Kingdom of Italy and an undertaking for the papacy to be neutral in world conflicts. In 1933, Pius signed a Concordat with the Germany - hoping to protect the rights of Catholics under the Nazi government. The terms of the Treaty were not kept by Hitler.

According to the Encyclopædia Britannica :

« From 1933 to 1936, Pius XI wrote several protests against the 3rd “ Reich ”, and his attitude toward Fascist Italy changed dramatically after Nazi racial policies were introduced into Italy in 1938. »

Pius XI saw the rising tide of Totalitarianism with alarm and delivered 3 Papal Encyclicals challenging the new creeds : against Italian Fascism « Non abbiamo bisogno » (We Do Not Need to Acquaint You, 1931) ; against Nazism « Mit brennender Sorge » (With Deep Anxiety, 1937) and against atheist Communist « Divini redemptoris » (Divine Redeemer, 1937) . He also challenged the extremist nationalism of the « Action Française » movement and anti-Semitism in the United States.

« Non abbiamo bisogno » condemned Italian Fascism's « pagan worship of the State » and « revolution which snatches the young from the Church and from Jesus-Christ, and which inculcates in its own young people hatred, violence and irreverence » .

Pius XI's Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli (future Pius XII) , made some 55 protests against Nazi policies, including its « ideology of race » . As Cardinal Pacelli, Pope Pius XII had assisted Pius XI, draft the « Mit brennender Sorge » Encyclical powerful critique of Nazi ideology. Pius XI commissioned the American Jesuit John La Farge to draft an Encyclical demonstrating the incompatibility of Catholicism and racism : « Humani generis unitas » (The Unity of the Human Race) . Following the death of Pius XI however, the less confrontational Pius XII did not issue the Encyclical. He feared it would antagonize Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany at a time where he hoped to act as an impartial peace broker.

By early 1937, the Church hierarchy in Germany, which had initially attempted to co-operate with the new government, had become highly-disillusioned. In March, Pope Pius XI issued the « Mit brennender Sorge » (With burning concern) Encyclical. The Pope asserted the inviolability of human rights and expressed deep concern at the Nazi regime's flouting of the 1933 Concordat, its treatment of Catholics and abuse of Christian values. It accused the government of « systematic hostility leveled at the Church » and of sowing the « tares of suspicion, discord, hatred, calumny, of secret and open fundamental hostility to Christ and His Church » and Pius noted on the horizon the « threatening storm clouds » of religious wars of extermination over Germany.

The Vatican had the text smuggled into Germany and printed and distributed in secret. Bishop Konrad von Preysing was an advisor in the drafting of the document. Cardinal Pacelli (later, Pope Pius XII) also helped draft the Encyclical, which was written partly in response to the Nuremberg Laws. The document does not refer to Hitler or the Nazis by name, but condemned racial theories and the mistreatment of people based on race.

Written in German, not the usual Latin, it was read from the pulpits of all German Catholic churches on one of the Church's busiest Sundays, Palm Sunday.

According to Gill :

« Hitler was beside himself with rage. 12 presses were seized, and hundreds of people sent either to prison or the camps. »

With Europe on the brink of War, Pius XI died on 10 February 1939, and Cardinal Pacelli was elected to succeed him as Pope Pius XII. As Vatican Secretary of State, Pacelli had been a critic of Nazism and the Nazi Government was the only government not to send a representative to his coronation. Pius, a cautious diplomat, pursued the course of diplomacy to attempt to convince European leaders to avoid War. In his 1st Encyclical, « Summi Pontificatus » , which came only 1 month into the War, Pius condemned the War against Poland and looked to its « resurrection » .

« Summi Pontificatus » was the 1st papal Encyclical issued by Pope Pius XII, in October 1939, and established some of the themes of his pontificate. During the drafting of the letter, the Second World War commenced with the Nazi-Soviet invasion of Catholic Poland : the « dread tempest of War is already raging despite all Our efforts to avert it » . In a challenge to Nazism, the papal letter denounced racism, anti-Semitism, War, totalitarianism, the attack on Poland and the persecution of the Church. Pius reiterated Church teaching on the « principle of equality » - with specific reference to Jews :

« There is neither Gentile nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision. »

The forgetting of solidarity « imposed by our common origin and by the equality of rational nature in all men » was called « pernicious error » . Catholics everywhere were called upon to offer « compassion and help » to the victims of the War. The Pope declared determination to work to hasten the return of peace and trust in prayers for justice, love and mercy, to prevail against the scourge of War. The letter also decried the deaths of non-combatants.

Following themes addressed in « Non abbiamo bisogno » (1931) ; « Mit brennender Sorge » (1937) ; and « Divini Redemptoris » (1937) , Pius wrote of a need to bring-back to the Church those who were following « a false standard misled by error, passion, temptation and prejudice, who have strayed away from faith in the true God » . Pius wrote of « Christians unfortunately more in name than in fact » showing « cowardice » in the face of persecution by these creeds, and called for resistance :

« Who among “ the Soldiers of Christ ” (ecclesiastic or layman) does not feel himself incited and spurred on to a greater vigilance, to a more determined resistance, by the sight of the ever-increasing host of Christ's enemies who wantonly break the Tables of God's Commandments to substitute other tables and other standards stripped of the ethical content of the Revelation on Sinai, standards in which the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and of the Cross has no place ? »

(« Summi Pontificatus » , Pope Pius XII, October 1939.)

Pius wrote of a persecuted Church and a time requiring « charity » for victims who had a « right » to compassion. Against the invasion of Poland and killing of civilians he wrote :

« This is an “ Hour of Darkness ” in which the spirit of violence and of discord brings indescribable suffering on mankind. The nations swept into the tragic whirlpool of war are, perhaps, as yet only at the “ beginnings of sorrows ” but even now there reigns in thousands of families death and desolation, lamentation and misery. The blood of countless human beings, even non-combatants, raises a piteous dirge over a nation such as Our dear Poland, which, for its fidelity to the Church, for its services in the defense of Christian civilization, written in indelible characters in the annals of history, has a right to the generous and brotherly sympathy of the whole world, while it awaits, relying on the powerful intercession of Mary, Help of Christians, the hour of a resurrection in harmony with the principles of justice and true peace. »

(« Summi Pontificatus » , Pope Pius XII, October 1939.)

With Italy not yet an ally of Hitler in the War, Italians were called upon to remain faithful to the Church. Pius avoided explicit denunciations of Hitlerism or Stalinism, establishing the « impartial » public tone which would become controversial in later assessment of his pontificate :

« A full statement of the doctrinal stand to be taken in face of the errors of today, if necessary, can be put-off to another time unless there is disturbance by calamitous external events ; for the moment, We limit Ourselves to some fundamental observations. »

Later in the War, Pius issued « Mystici corporis Christi » (29 June 1943) on the subject of the Church as the Mystical Body of Christ. It followed the commencement of Nazi Germany's programs of « euthanasia » of the handicapped, and race-based murders of Jews and other minorities, and is therefore significant for its reiteration of Church teachings against racism and the killings of people with disabilities.

Pius' statement of « profound grief » at the murder of the deformed, the insane, and those suffering from hereditary disease as though they were a « useless burden to Society » was a condemnation of the ongoing Nazi euthanasia program, under which disabled Germans were being removed from care facilities and murdered by the State as « life unworthy of life » . It built upon the high-profile condemnations offered by the Archbishop of Münster, August von Galen and others. It was followed, on 26 September 1943, by an open condemnation by the German Bishops which, from every German pulpit, denounced the killing of « innocent and defenceless mentally handicapped, incurably infirm and fatally wounded, innocent hostages, and disarmed prisoners of War and criminal offenders, people of a foreign race or descent » .

Pope Pius used the Vatican newspaper, « L'Osservatore Romano » and the new medium of radio to preach peace, and infuriated the Axis Powers. He established the Vatican Information Service to provide aid to, and information about, War refugees. He used radio to preach against selfish nationalism and the evils of modern warfare. The Nazis considered Vatican Radio to be anti-German, and Germans were forbidden to listen to it. At the outbreak of the War, Guido Gonella, the chief-columnist of the Vatican newspaper, « L'Osservatore Romano » , was arrested. Following strenuous protests by the Vatican Secretary of State, he was released and given Vatican citizenship, but spent the rest of the War under close surveillance.

Vatican Radio was the mouthpiece of the Vatican, but was officially run by the Jesuits, who were in turn commanded by the Polish count Wladimir Ledóchowski. Hebblethwaite wrote that the Nazis « regarded the German Jesuits to be their main-enemy within, as Pius's Secretary, the German Jesuit Robert Leiber, as a traitor » . In January 1940, the Pope authorized for details of the Polish situation to be broadcast on Vatican Radio's German service. The German ambassador protested the German language broadcasts, and the Pope directed a pause. Other language services were still more explicit, leading the British press to hail Vatican Radio as « tortured Poland's » powerful advocate.

Following the Pope's 1st War time Christmas address of 1939, Josef Gæbbels noted in his diary :

« The Pope has made a Christmas speech. Full of bitter, covert attacks against us, against the “ Reich ”, and against National-Socialism. All the forces of internationalism are against us. We must break them. »

The Nazis considered Vatican Radio to be anti-German, and Germans were forbidden to listen to it. In broadcasts to Spain and France, it denounced the « wickedness of Hitler » and Nazi racial theories and lies. In his Easter 1941 radio address, the Pope denounced « atrocious forms of fighting and mistreatment of prisoners and civilians » . Following the Pope's 1941 Christmas address, « The New York Times » editorial wrote that Pius had placed himself squarely against Hitlerism :

« The voice of Pius XII is a lonely voice in the silence and darkness enveloping Europe this Christmas. »

By 1942, the Nazis had commenced their industrialized slaughter of the Jews of Europe : the « Final Solution » . Gypsies and others were also marked for extermination. In his Christmas address of that year, Pius acknowledged the genocide. He again warned against the evils of worshipping the State, and forced labour and addressed the racial persecutions in the following terms :

« Humanity owes this vow to those hundreds of thousands who, without any fault on their part, sometimes only because of their nationality or race, have been consigned to death or to a slow decline. »

« The New York Times » called Pius « a lonely voice crying-out of the silence of a continent » . The speech was made in the context of the near total domination of Europe by the armies of Nazi Germany at a time when the War had not yet turned in favour of the Allies. Holocaust historian, Sir Martin Gilbert, assesses the response of the « Reich » Security Main Office calling Pius a « mouthpiece » of the Jews in response to his Christmas address, as clear evidence that all sides knew that Pius was one who was raising his voice for the victims of Nazi terror. Colonel General Ludwig Beck, a key-figure in the German Resistance, secretly advised the Pope of plots against Hitler through emissaries.

Following Archbishop Jules-Géraud Saliège's pastoral letter condemning Nazi anti-Semitism, « L'Osservatore Romano » praised Saliège, and Vatican Radio broadcast the letter. Bishop Pierre-Marie Théas's expression of outrage at « The present anti-Semitic measures » and the French Bishops' joint protest against Jewish deportations received full-coverage in « L'Osservatore Romano » and on Vatican Radio.

In June 1943, Vatican Radio broadcast to France :

« He who distinguishes between Jews and other men is unfaithful to God and is in conflict with God's command. » , and to Germany on the rights of Jews under natural law and a defence of Yugoslav Jews.

