Philipp Wilhelm Jung war der Sohn des Volksschullehrers Adam Jung und dessen Frau Katharina geborene Weyerhäuser. Er besuchte das Gymnasium in Worms und studierte ab 1906 Rechtswissenschaften in Heidelberg, München und Gießen. Während seines Studiums wurde er 1903 Mitglied der Burschenschaft Frankonia Heidelberg. 1906 legte er das erste und nach dem Referendariat am 9. Dezember 1912 das zweite Staatsexamen ab und arbeitete danach als Rechtsanwalt in Worms. Am 30. September 1911 heiratete er in Heidelberg Stefanie Sofie, geborene Muxel.

Ab August 1914 war Jung Soldat im Deutschen Heer. Zunächst war er als Zugführer im 2. Badischen Feld-Artillerie-Regiment Nr. 30 eingesetzt. Danach war er Adjutant bei einer Feldartillerie-Abteilung und bei einem Artilleriekommandeur an der Westfront. Ende 1916 bis zum Ende des Krieges am 11. November 1918 war er Batterieführer. Er wurde mit beiden Eisernen Kreuzen und der Hessischen Tapferkeitsmedaille ausgezeichnet.

Nach dem Krieg arbeitete er wieder als Rechtsanwalt. 1926 wurde er in den Stadtrat von Worms gewählt. Seit 1927 war er ständiger Verteidiger des NSDAP-Gauleiters der Rheinpfalz, Josef Bürckel und Mitglied der SA, in der er später bis zum Brigadeführer aufstieg. 1930 trat er in die NSDAP ein und wurde 1931 NSDAP-Kreisleiter von Worms.

1931 wurde er in den Landtag des Volksstaates Hessen gewählt, in dem er 1931 bis 1933 die NSDAP-Fraktion führte.

Nach der « Machtergreifung » der Nationalsozialisten wurde er 1933 Präsident des Hessischen Landtages. Nach der Absetzung von Wilhelm Ehrhard durch die Nationalsozialisten, denen dieser kritisch gegenüberstand, wurde Jung zum kommissarischen Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Mainz berufen. Während seiner Zeit als kommissarischer Oberbürgermeister erfolgte die Entfernung des Befreiungsdenkmals vom Schillerplatz.

Bereits im Mai 1933 wurde er in diesem Amt von Robert Barth abgelöst. Jung war ab März 1933 Staatsrat und anschließend ab 20. September 1933 ernannter Ministerpräsident des Volksstaates Hessen. Er löste in dieser Funktion Ferdinand Werner ab, der ebenfalls Mitglied der NSDAP war. Philipp Wilhelm Jung blieb bis zum 1. März 1935 Ministerpräsident, als der « Reichsstatthalter des Volksstaates Hessen » Jakob Sprenger diese Funktion mitübernahm.

Anschließend war er Regierungspräsident der Saarpfalz, ehe er während des Zweiten Weltkrieges am 16. Mai 1940 als Bürgermeister Wiens eingesetzt wurde. Er löste in dieser Funktion am 14. Dezember 1940 Hermann Neubacher ab und wurde selbst am 30. Dezember 1943 durch Hanns Blaschke ersetzt. Vorausgegangen waren Konflikte Jungs mit dem Gauleiter Baldur von Schirach. Jung beantragte eine Versetzung als Offizier an die Front. Dies erfolgte jedoch nicht. Über die Tätigkeit Jungs 1943 bis Kriegsende ist nichts bekannt.

Philipp Wilhelm Jung und seine Frau wurden nach dem Kriegsende im Lager Kornwestheim inhaftiert und ihr Vermögen gesperrt. Seine Frau wurde im Rahmen der Weihnachtsamnestie am 12. November 1947, er selbst am 17. Juni 1948 aus der Haft entlassen. Im Spruchkammerverfahren wurde er als « Minderbelasteter » eingestuft. Nachdem das Land Hessen ihm keine Pension als Regierungsrat hatte zahlen wollen, kam es zu einem Gerichtsverfahren beim Verwaltungsgericht Darmstadt, das mit einem Vergleich beendet wurde, der das Land zur Zahlung verpflichtete. Die Vermögenssperre wurde am 5. Juli 1950 aufgehoben. Mit Entscheidung des Ehrengerichtes der Rechtsanwaltskammer Frankfurt am Main vom 16. Mai 1951 wurde er wieder als Rechtsanwalt und Notar zugelassen und arbeitete in der Folge in diesem Beruf in Wald-Michelbach.

Maire nazi de Vienne : Hanns Blaschke (1943-1945)

The Austrian patent lawyer and politician Hanns (or Johann) Blaschke was born on 1 April 1896 in Vienna and died on 25 October 1971 in Salzburg. Illegal National-Socialist functionary. After 1938 (« Anschluß »), he became town councillor. 1st deputy Mayor of Vienna responsible for cultural affairs. Was Mayor from 30 December 1943 to 6 April 1945. Member of the Nazi Party (NSDAP), he was sentenced to 6 years in prison in 1948.

...

Hanns Blaschke, auch Johann Blaschke (geboren 1. April 1896 in Wien ; gestorben 25. Oktober 1971 in Salzburg) war ein österreichischer Patentanwalt und Politiker der NSDAP.

Hanns Blaschke war der Sohn eines Steuerbeamten. Er absolvierte seine Schullaufbahn an der Volksschule und dem Gymnasium. Er begann 1914 an der Technischen Hochschule Wien ein Studium der Elektrotechnik, das er nach Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkrieges unterbrach. Als Soldat der Kaiserlich und Königlich Armee nahm er durchgehend am Ersten Weltkrieg teil und wurde mehrfach ausgezeichnet als Leutnant der Reserve aus der Armee entlassen. Danach nahm er sein Studium wieder auf, das er 1922 abschloß.

Ab 1926 war er als niedergelassener Patentanwalt tätig. Bereits 1931 war er als illegaler Funktionär in der österreichischen NSDAP (Nummer 614.686) tätig. Nach seiner Beteiligung am Juliputsch 1934 wurde er zu lebenslangem Kerker verurteilt, doch nach zwei Jahren (aufgrund der Bestimmungen des Juliabkommens) wieder begnadigt. 1938 nahm er am Sturm auf das Gebäude der Vaterländischen Front am Platz am Hof teil. Nach dem Anschluß Österreichs trat er der SS bei (Nummer 292.790) . Er wurde Beigeordneter und Ratsherr in Wien, sowie Leiter der Betreuungsstelle für Alte Kämpfer des « Gau Wien » . Zunächst als dritter, dann als erster Vizebürgermeister war er für das Kulturamt verantwortlich. Am 30. Dezember 1943 übernahm er schließlich das Amt des Bürgermeisters von Wien von Philipp Wilhelm Jung, das er bis zum 6. April 1945 behielt. Im April 1944 wurde er zum SS-Brigadeführer befördert.

1948 wurde Blaschke in Wien wegen Hochverrats zu sechs Jahren Haft und Vermögensentzug verurteilt. Er verlor die Staatsbürgerschaft und ihm wurden sämtliche akademische Titel aberkannt. Dieses Urteil wurde jedoch auf sein Betreiben im März 1958 aufgehoben.

Blaschkes Tochter, Gertrud Barna, war Schauspielerin am Deutschen Volkstheater in Wien.

...

Hanns Blaschke, patentanwalt und Politiker (NS) . Illegaler nationalsozialistischer Funktionär, nach 1938 Beigeordneter und Ratsherr in Wien (3. , dann 1. Vizebürgermeister, verantwortlich für das Kulturamt) , 30. Dezember 1943 - 6. April 1945 Bürgermeister von Wien. 1948 zu 6 Jahren Haft verurteilt.

La Bataille de Vienne

L'Autriche avait été annexé par l'Allemagne nazie en mars 1938 (« Anschluß ») et Adolf Hitler s'était fait acclamer au balcon de la « Hofburg » , le célèbre palais impérial de Vienne. Le peuple autrichien s'était lui-même prononcé par référendum à 99 % pour le rattachement au « Reich » .

Réduit à l'état de simple province sous le nom d' « Ostmark » (marche de l'Est) , le pays avait, dès lors, accompagné le cours tragique du Nazisme.

1er avril 1945 : L'intégralité du territoire hongrois se retrouve sous le contrôle des Soviétiques qui poussent leur avantage en direction de Graz et de « Wiener Neustadt ». La défense de l'« Ostmark » (l'Autriche nazi) n'existe que sur le papier et sa mise en œuvre s'avère très tardive. Le 2 avril, c'est au tour de la 2e « SS-Panzer-Armee » de se retrouver en grande difficulté sous la poussée de l'aile gauche du 3e front d'Ukraine (26e, 27e et 57e armées russes, 1re armée bulgare) . La 6e « Armee » reste incapable de rétablir le contact avec elle.

La 6e « SS-Panzer-Armee » essaye avec difficulté d'établir un front homogène dans la région boisée qui s'étend au sud de Vienne. Le général Rudolf von Bünau prend le commandement de la ville dont la garnison est composée des restes de diverses unités de la Heer ou même de l'armée hongroise, soutenus par les bataillons lourds de la 24e « Flak-Division » de la « Luftwaffe » et la 1re « Donau-Flotille » (flottille du Danube) de la « Kriegsmarine » . À partir du 6, le 3e front d'Ukraine se contente de fixer les 2 armées allemandes plus au sud et concentre ses moyens sur Vienne. Le 18e corps blindé russe est re-déployé pour rompre le front toujours tenu par les 1re et 2e « SS-Panzer-Korps » . L'essentiel de la « Führer-Grenadier-Division » (39 trains sur 48) arrive en renfort juste à temps pour les 1ers combats dans les faubourgs de la capitale autrichienne. Ce n'est que le lendemain que le « Generaloberst » Lothar Rendulic prend effectivement le commandement du « Heeresgruppe Süd » . La 6e « SS-Panzer-Armee » est maintenant à bout de souffle malgré la destruction de 197 chars ennemis pendant la 1re semaine d'avril. Il faut y ajouter 45 chars, 18 canons anti-chars et 7 avions détruits par la 24e « Flak-Division » . L'ennemi intensifie sa pression. De violents combats se déroulent pendant la nuit du 8 au 9 avril. Le lendemain, l'ennemi perd 39 chars face à la défense déterminée des hommes de la « Das Reich » dans les rues de Vienne. La plupart sont détruits à bout portant avec des « Panzerfaust » et des « Panzerschrek » . Les pertes sont aussi élevées dans les autres secteurs, mais les assaillants sont déterminés à prendre la ville au plus tôt et avancent vers son centre. Le même jour, les 1ers éléments de la 710e « Infanterie-Division » , de la 261e « Sturmgeschütze-Brigade » et du « SS-Kampfgruppe » de August Wilhelm Trabant arrivent en renforts.

10 avril 1945 : Les unités allemandes commencent cependant à traverser le Danube. Au nord, la 8e « Armee » fait face à une vingtaine de divisions de fusiliers soutenues par 2 corps mécanisés. Dans la nuit du 13 avril, des éléments de la « Das Reich » sont les derniers à évacuer Vienne. Les Soviétiques entrent à Vienne.

11-14 avril 1945 : La poussée russe se poursuit malgré la perte de 80 chars face à la 6e « SS-Panzer-Armee » .

13 avril 1945 : L'armée ukrainienne capture Vienne, la capitale de l'Autriche. 7 ans après l'« Anschluß » de 1938 qui a transformé l'Autriche en satellite du « Reich » allemand, le pays est libéré. Sortant de la clandestinité, le Docteur Karl Renner, ancien président de l'Assemblée nationale autrichienne, forme alors un gouvernement de coalition comprenant des Sociaux-Démocrates, des Communistes et des Socialistes-Chrétiens, de même que des indépendants. Ce gouvernement est créé sous les auspices de l'occupant soviétique et reçoit la faveur du commandant en chef à Vienne, le maréchal Feodor Tolboukhine.

14 avril 1945 : La 4e « Luftflotte » effectue encore 270 sorties avec même le soutien de quelques appareils hongrois.

Pendant toute la durée de l'offensive soviétique, elle a continué à supporter avec efficacité les troupes au sol avec des chasseurs-bombardiers et ses derniers bombardiers, disputant même la supériorité aérienne à un ennemi très largement supérieur en nombre. Mais le manque de carburant et l'arrivée des appareils américains au-dessus de ses bases vont progressivement paralyser son action.

La 6e « Panzer-Division » rejoint le secteur de la 8e « Armée » menacée par plusieurs pénétrations ennemies. Le 509e « Tiger-Abteilung » la rejoint tandis que la 10e « Fallschirmjäger-Division » est attachée au 1er « SS-Panzer-Korps » .

16-18 avril 1945 : Celui-ci détruit 42 chars dont 24 pour le seul « Kampfgruppe » Joachim Peiper.

22 avril 1945 : Adolf Hitler décide de rester dans Berlin pratiquement encerclée et de ne pas rejoindre ses dernières armées dans le sud. La situation se stabilise sur l'ensemble du front tenu par le « Heeresgruppe Süd » qui devient le « Heeresgruppe Ostmark » , le 24. La « Das Reich » est mise en réserve pour prévenir l'arrivée de troupes alliées par l'ouest. Mais elle reçoit l'ordre avec la « Hohenstaufen » de se préparer à un transfert vers le « Heeresgruppe Mitte » pour une contre-attaque en direction de Berlin. Au sud, la 8e armée britannique profite de la capitulation rapide des troupes allemandes en Italie pour menacer les arrières de la 2e « Panzer-Armée » .

Cette colonne de SdKfz 251 de la « Leibstandarte » route vers l'ouest pour se rendre aux Américains.

Seuls des éléments de la « Totenkopf » seront remis aux Russes et connaîtront une longue captivité et une mortalité importante comme tous les prisonniers des camps soviétiques.

27 avril 1945 : La fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale permet à l'Autriche de retrouver son indépendance. Restauration de la République d'Autriche.

S'appuyant sur la Déclaration de Moscou, un document signé en 1943 par le Royaume-Uni, l'Union soviétique (URSS) et les États-Unis, reconnaissant la neutralité de l'Autriche et niant tout pouvoir légal au gouvernement autrichien nazi d'Arthur Seyß-Inquart, le gouvernement provisoire de Renner proclame l'indépendance de l'Autriche. La proclamation a lieu le même jour où l'armée américaine pénètre en Autriche pour capturer les bastions de Gengenbach et de Schwarzenberg. L'activisme de Renner permet à l'État autrichien d'être rapidement restauré, puisque le gouvernement provisoire est vite reconnu comme le seul interlocuteur valable par les 4 armées d'occupation : française, américaine, britannique et soviétique.

7 mai 1945 : Le « Generaloberst » Rendulic ordonne à ses hommes de gagner l'ouest pour se rendre aux Américains. Le « Heeresgruppe Süd » compte encore 450,000 hommes et occupe une ligne de front continue. Il a fallu à l'Armée Rouge une offensive continue de 46 jours pour repousser les troupes allemandes au-delà de Vienne. Pendant presque toute cette période, la 6e « SS-Panzer-Armée » a occupé le secteur du front le plus large en plein centre du dispositif allemand avec des effectifs non seulement insuffisants mais également amputés au profit des armées voisines. La performance catastrophique de l'état-major de la 6e « Armée » s'est ajouté au refus de l'OKH et de Hitler d'autoriser suffisamment tôt les replis nécessaires pour raccourcir la ligne de front tout en conservant les matériels lourds. Aggravée par le manque de carburant et de pièces de rechange pour les matériels endommagés, cette rigidité habituelle a accéléré l'usure de divisions allemandes déjà affaiblies.

L'engagement de la 6e « SS-Panzer-Armee » en Hongrie pour une offensive sans espoir, plutôt qu'en Pologne pour barrer la route de l'Oder et de Berlin aux Russes, est un non-sens stratégique. Mais l'usure de cette unité dans un combat défensif qui ne lui a pas permis d'utiliser des moyens encore importants pour manœuvrer et frapper encore plus durement l'ennemi, démontre le manque de qualité du commandement exercé par le « Heeresgruppe Süd » qui va manquer les rares opportunités qui s'offrent à lui, notamment lors de la percée initiale russe dans les Montagnes vertes. C'est l'abandon trop lent du saillant de la 6e « Armee » à l'Est du lac Balaton, pourtant autorisé par le haut-commandement allemand, qui va déséquilibrer définitivement le dispositif allemand. La 6e « SS-Panzer-Armee », transférée de ce saillant qu'elle vient de conquérir, est engagée trop tard vers le nord. Puis, elle doit tenir le terrain, faute d'obtenir les divisions dont elle a besoin pour se dégager une marge de manœuvre pour une contre-attaque d'envergure. Le 1er « Kavallerie-Korps », la 9e « SS-Panzer-Division Hohenstaufen » et même, pendant de longues journées, une partie de la 1re « SS-Panzer-Division Leibstandarte » restent sous le commandement de la 6e « Armee » qui couvre pourtant un front d'une quinzaine de kilomètres seulement. Le transfert tardif de divisions de la 2e « Panzer-Armee » au sud et le retrait tout aussi tardif des « Infanterie-Divisionen » allemandes de la poche le long du Danube au nord aggravent encore la situation. En face, le haut-commandement soviétique analyse parfaitement la situation et exécute à la perfection son plan.

...

Malgré son implication dans le 3e « Reich », l'Autriche est considérée comme une victime de Adolf Hitler. Les Alliés veulent, ce faisant, couper les liens affectifs entre les Allemands et les Autrichiens. Ils craignent qu'un commun ressentiment ne les rapproche une nouvelle fois. Dès l'entrée des Soviétiques à Vienne, le pays retrouve son indépendance et le leader socialiste Karl Renner restaure la démocratie.

2 semaines après la libération de Vienne par l'armée soviétique, le gouvernement intérimaire du Docteur Karl Renner, s'appuyant sur la Déclaration de Moscou, proclame l'indépendance de l'Autriche et la tenue d'élections libres dès que possible.

Les troupes d'occupation se retireront 10 ans après la fin de la Guerre, après que les Soviétiques auront obtenu une solide garantie de neutralité pour ce pays mitoyen de leur zone d'influence.

...

The city of Vienna was bombed 52 times during World War II, and 87,000 houses of the city were lost (20 % of the entire city) . Only 41 civilian vehicles survived the raids, more than 3,000 bomb craters were counted. And the Schwarzenberg Palace was bombed but later rebuilt.

After a lone Soviet air-raid, conducted on 4 September 1942, Vienna was finally reached by western Allied bombers in 1944, when the Allied invasion of Italy allowed them to establish an air-base at Foggia. Following the Normandy Invasion, the greater part of the German Air Force (« Luftwaffe ») was transferred to the West. The remaining « Luftwaffe » shot-down 10 % of the 550 bombers, in June 1944.

The air-defenses of Vienna were aided by a ring of anti-aircraft batteries set-up around the city and 3 pairs of Flak towers. These were large anti-aircraft gun block-houses built in the city. Due to the increasing lack of fuel, by autumn 1944, artillery on the ground was the only defence against air-raids. It typically took some 5,000 small-calibre and 3,400 large-calibre shells to bring-down 1 bomber. During the day, one out of 125 planes was shot-down on average. During the night, this dropped to only one out of 145. However, roughly 1/3 of the bombers and escorts suffered heavy damage. Some Vienna factories were moved to bomb-proof sites such as caves (like the « Seegrotte » near Hinterbrühl) or hidden in other ways. The military industry even boosted its production, also by use of forced labour of concentration camp inmates and POWs. By-passes for traffic junctions had been established before the bombings and traffic did not come to a halt until the very last days of the War.

By early 1945, Vienna had already faced 1,800 bombs. In February and March 1945, 80,000 tons of bombs were dropped by U.S. and British aircraft, destroying more than 12,000 buildings, and 270,000 people were left homeless.

« Offensive Vienne »

L'« Offensive Vienne » est une opération militaire lancée par le 3e front ukrainien afin de capturer la ville de Vienne. L'offensive a duré du 2 au 13 avril 1945, lors de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. La ville de Vienne a été encerclée et assiégée.

Joseph Staline conclut un accord avec les Alliés occidentaux en février 1945 concernant l'influence politique relative de chaque partie après-Guerre, en Europe de l'Est et en Europe centrale. Il avait été ainsi conclu que la Tchécoslovaquie et la Hongrie seraient sous la botte soviétique. Ces accords ne déclaraient cependant rien sur l'Autriche, étant alors une partie intégrante annexée au 3e « Reich » après l'« Anschluß » de 1938. Staline a donc décidé de reporter son offensive en direction de Berlin (l'Armée Rouge était prête dès février 1945) pour se garantir à la fois les flancs nécessaires pour cette offensive et le territoire autrichien, un atout précieux pour la suite des négociations d'après-Guerre avec les Alliés occidentaux.

Après l'échec de l'opération « Frühlingserwachen » (réveil du printemps) , qui visait à mener une contre-offensive contre les troupes soviétiques stationnées en Hongrie, en mars 1945, la 6e « SS Panzer Armee » du général Josef Dietrich bat alors en retraite sur le territoire autrichien. Les Allemands ont alors tenté de préparer des positions défensives dans l'espoir de conserver la ville entre leurs mains. Ces positions ont été préparées en partie avec le travail forcé de Juifs de rafles à Budapest : partis 50,000, abattus lors d'une marche de la mort, les survivants érigent des fortifications destinées à soutenir un siège.

Le 2 avril 1945, l'Armée Rouge, divisée en 85 divisions et 3 brigades (formant un total de 745,600 hommes) , lance l'offensive sur la ville alors déclarée « ville ouverte » . La défense de la capitale autrichienne était assurée par le général Rudolf von Bünau avec des unités du 2e « SS-Panzerkorps » sous les ordres du général Wilhelm Bittrich.

Vienne est le théâtre d'intenses combats urbains et voit la participation active de la résistance autrichienne dans des actes de sabotages contre les défenses et la logistique allemandes.

Le 13 avril 1945, les garnisons allemandes, à court de munitions et dépassées numériquement, se rendent à l'Armée rouge.

L'ensemble du territoire autrichien est libéré dans les jours suivants, Karl Renner proclame un gouvernement provisoire autrichien avec l'autorisation des Soviétiques et déclare alors la sécession de l'Autriche du 3e « Reich » .

Après leurs victoires en Autriche, ces derniers peuvent dès lors se concentrer sur leur objectif final : la prise de Berlin et la chute du régime nazi, dont le point culminant est la capitulation du 8 mai 1945, qui marque la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale en Europe.

...

The « Vienna Offensive » was launched by the Soviet 3rd Ukrainian Front in order to capture the city of Vienna. The offensive lasted from 2 to 13 April 1945. The city of Vienna was surrounded and under siege for most of the offensive until its capture.

Joseph Stalin reached an agreement with the Western Allies prior to April 1945 concerning the relative post-War political influence of each party in much of Eastern and Central Europe ; however, these agreements said virtually nothing about the fate of Austria, then, officially considered to be merely the « Ostmark » area of Greater Germany after the « Anschluß » . As a result, the victory of a Soviet offensive toward Austria and the liberation by the Red Army of a large part of this country would have been very beneficial for subsequent post-War negotiations with the Western Allies.

After the failure of Operation Spring Awakening (« Unternehmen Frühlingserwachen ») , Sepp Dietrich's 6th SS-Panzer Army retreated in stages to the Vienna area. The Germans desperately prepared defensive positions in an attempt to guard the city against the rapidly arriving Soviets.

In spring 1945, the advance of Soviet General Fyodor Tolbukhin's 3rd Ukrainian Front through western Hungary gathered momentum on both sides of the Danube.

On 30 March, the advancing Soviets crossed the Hron and Nitra Rivers and, after they took Sopron and Nagykanizsa, crossed the border between Hungary and Austria. Tolbukhin was now ready to advance into Austria and take Vienna.

On 2 April, Vienna Radio denied that the Austrian capital had been declared an open city. On the same day, Soviet troops approached Vienna from the south after they overran Wiener Neustadt, Eisenstadt, Neunkirchen and Gloggnitz. Baden and Bratislava were overrun on 4 April.

After arriving in the Vienna area, the armies of the Soviet 3rd Ukrainian Front surrounded, besieged, and attacked the city. Involved in this action were the Soviet 4th Guards Army, the Soviet 6th Guards Tank Army, the Soviet 9th Guards Army, and the Soviet 46th Army. The « O-5 Resistance Group », Austrians led by Carl Szokoll wanting to spare Vienna destruction, actively attempted to sabotage the German defenses and to aid the entry of the Red Army.

The only major German force facing the Soviet attackers was the German II SS-Panzer Corps of the 6th SS-Panzer Army, along with « ad hoc » forces made-up of garrison and anti-aircraft units. Declared a defensive region, Vienna's defense was commanded by General Rudolf von Bünau, with the 2nd SS-Panzer Corps units under the command of SS General Wilhelm Bittrich.

The battle for the Austrian capital was characterized in some cases by fierce urban combat, but there were also parts of the city the Soviets advanced into with little opposition. Defending in the « Prater » Park was the 6th Panzer Division, along the south-side of the city were the 2nd and 3rd SS-Panzer Divisions and, in the north, was the « Führer-Grenadier » Division. The Soviets assaulted Vienna's eastern and southern suburbs with the 4th Guards Army and part of the 9th Guards Army. The German defenders kept the Soviets out of the city's southern suburbs until 7 April. However, after successfully achieving several footholds in the southern suburbs, the Soviets then moved into the western suburbs of the city, on 8 April, with the 6th Guards Tank Army and the bulk of the 9th Guards Army. The western suburbs were especially important to the Soviets because they included Vienna's main railway station. The Soviet success in the western suburbs was followed quickly by infiltration of the eastern and northern suburbs later the same day. North of the Danube River, the 46th Army pushed westward through Vienna's northern suburbs. Central Vienna was now cut-off from the rest of Austria.

By the 9th of April, the Soviet troops began to infiltrate the center of the city, but the street-fighting continued for several days more. On the night of 11 April, the 4th Guards Army stormed the Danube canals, with the 20th Guards Rifle Corps and 1st Mechanized Corps moving on the « Reichsbrücke » Bridge. In a « coup de main », on 13 April, the Danube Flotilla landed troops of the 80th Guards Rifle Division and 7th Guards Airborne Division on both sides of the bridge, cutting demolition cables and securing the bridge. However, other important bridges were destroyed. Vienna finally fell when the last defenders in the city surrendered on the same day. Bittrich's 2nd SS-Panzer Corps, however, pulled-out to the west on the evening of 13 April to avoid encirclement. The same day, the 46th Army took Essling and the Danube Flotilla landed naval infantry up the river by Klosterneuburg.

While the street-fighting was still intensifying in the southern and western suburbs of Vienna, on 8 April, other troops of the 3rd Ukrainian Front by-passed Vienna altogether and advanced on Linz and Graz.

On the 10th, all but 2 of the bridges in the city had been destroyed. The Floridsdorf bridge had been left intact by a « Führer » Order dictating that the bridge be held at all costs. The 2nd SS-Panzer, « Das Reich » left a dozen artillery pieces including 37 mm anti-aircraft guns to hold-off enemy attacks. That night, the « Das Reich », including their last remaining 3 dozen armored vehicles, pulled-out of the city for the last time. Vienna had fallen, and the Germans now moved northwest to hold a next defensive line.

By 15 April, armies of the Soviet 3rd Ukrainian Front pushed even further into Austria. The completely exhausted remnants of what had been the 6th SS-Panzer Army were forced to flee to the area between Vienna and Linz. Just behind the retreating Germans were elements of the Soviet 9th Guards Army and the Soviet 46th Army. The 26th Army and 27th Armies advanced towards the area north of Graz just behind the retreating 6th Army. The 57th Army and the Bulgarian 1st Army advanced towards the area south of Graz (near Maribor) just behind the retreating 2nd Panzer Army. None of these German armies was in any shape to do more than temporarily stall the advancing Soviet forces.

Some of Vienna's finest buildings lay in ruins after the battle. There was no water, electricity, or gas - and bands of people, both foreigners and Austrians, plundered and assaulted the helpless residents in the absence of a police force. While the Soviet assault forces generally behaved well, the 2nd wave of Soviet troops to arrive in the city were badly disciplined, looting and raping in a several week orgy of violence that has been compared to the worst aspects of the Thirty Years War.

Like Bittrich, General von Bünau left Vienna before it fell to avoid capture by the Soviets. From 16 April until the War's end, he led « Generalkommando » von Bünau, surrendering to the Americans on VE-Day, von Bünau was held as a POW until April 1947. Bittrich also surrendered to U.S. forces and was held as a prisoner by the Allies until 1954. Fyodor Tolbukhin went on to command the Soviet Southern Group of Forces and the Trans-caucasian Military District prior to his untimely death in 1949, reportedly from heart problems.

Austrian politician Karl Renner astutely set-up a Provisional Government in Vienna, sometime in April, with the tacit approval of the victorious Soviet forces, and declared Austria's secession from the 3rd « Reich » .

On 30 April, the following order of battle was recorded by the German Army High-Command (« Oberkommando der Wehrmacht » , or OKW) . From 20 April to 2 May, OKW moved from Zossen (near Berlin) to Mürwik (part of Flensburg in north Germany, near Denmark) . This order of battle shows what remained « on paper » of the German armies that fought in Hungary and Austria.

Occupation de Vienne à partir de 1945

Although French and American troops had been in Austria since April, and British since early May, it took until June 3rd before an advance Party of the Western Allies went to Vienna to meet the Russians. Their vehicles were spotted by Viennese who gave them a jubilant reception. In July, the borders of the occupation zones in the country as a whole were agreed. Vienna would be in the middle of the Russian zone.

The British, it seems, were responsible for some of the subsequent delay by the Western Allies in taking-up the occupation of Vienna. They were annoyed that the Russians had appointed Karl Renner as head of State, along with others who were felt to be too much under the thumb of the Communists, and so they played hard to get.

Towards the end of July, American occupation troops began arriving in Vienna and, in September, after the Russians had issued an ultimatum that they would be withdrawing from the Western sectors from the 1st of the month leaving the population to fend for themselves, the Western Allies took-up their positions, with the British arriving in numbers. The 1st formal meeting of the 4 powers who would govern Vienna was on September 12th, 5 months after the Russians had taken the city.

During those 5 months, conditions for the civilian population were very hard. Aside from Viennese, the city contained half a million foreign workers, refugees and « Reich » Germans. Battalions of Austrians were formed in Yugoslavia from 1944 to fight alongside Josip Broz Tito against the Germans. These opponents of the Nazis came to Vienna after the fall of the city and were allowed by the Russians to carry arms and to police the city, the regular police having all been disarmed. Some of the men who joined this police force had been in concentration camps and they took it out on any Nazis they found by beating them up.

An eye witness reports on conditions in early July 1945 :

« “ American technical accomplishments, Persian culture and Russian lack of taste ” is the description given to the many Russian-driven jeeps covered with the most expensive Persian rugs and lavish drapes.

The looting and raping in Vienna itself has ceased completely, according to [my anonymous] informant. Punishment for looting and raping is death, and while there was no enforcement up to recently, a number of Russian soldiers and even officers have been shot for these crimes.

The food shortage in Vienna is serious and acute. The bread situation is getting worse. There is no gas or coal in the city, and to get the existing wood from the Wienerwald, the city lacks the necessary vehicles.

The black market is flourishing, although every attempt is now being made to eliminate it. Thus, the trading on the “ Karlsplatz ”, in the Resselpark, is subject to frequent joint raids by Russian MPs and the Austrian police, (who are armed) . A watch brings about 4 to 6 pounds of fat ; the Austrians are anxiously waiting the Americans. »

(Paul Sweet, in a report dated 10 July 1945, in : Oliver Rathkolb, 1985 ; pages 281-283.)

Because Russians would often requisition trucks going to get supplies from the country-side the city authorities only had 12 trucks at their disposal and supplies of basic necessities (food and fuel) were chaotic and inadequate to feed the city. Although banned at 1st, people therefore went-out into the country-side to forage, the so-called « Rucksackverkehr » (rucksack traffic) .

An eyewitness describes this :

« The lack of transport is so acute that some people hike 20 miles into the country to buy potatoes and vegetables from farmers. Every day, in the beautiful Vienna woods, thousands of aged people are collecting wood for stoves and painfully trudging the miles back home with towering loads on their backs. People also may be seen rummaging through rubbish piles in the streets for useful junk. »

(Ira Freeman, in : « This is Vienna » , Yank magazine, 5 October 1945.)

Martin Herz described a family of 3 (a mother and 2 children under 5) who he visited on September 14th, 1945, living in the Russian zone. The father was missing in action since January 1945. Their rations include bread, sugar, peas, salt and coffee surrogate. There are no potatoes, fat, butter, vegetables or milk. The mother has lost 20 kilos since April. Their apartment consists of a single room with kitchen. The window panes were broken by concussion so are patched-up with cardboard. A wire strung across the court-yard from a friendly neighbour means they now have electric light to burn one bulb. Health of children is « good, except that children frequently get diarrhea » . She has nothing to trade on the black market.

(Martin F. Herz in : Reinhold Wagnleiter, 1985 ; page 42.)

Another visitor describes Vienna in October 1945 :

« The shivering misery of the people on the streets, the burnt-out filigree of Saint Stephen's Cathedral, the shattered Baroque façades, the boarded-up shops, the grassgrown ruins. The parks and squares have been dug-up for air-raid shelters. Wherever there is a patch of grass, you see a scattering of the white crosses of the graves of the Russians who died in their assault on the city.

[Yet,] the life that is starting-up again in the ruins takes on the semblance of the old pattern. Though many of the auditoriums are ruined, all the theaters are open. Concert programs offer more good music in a week than you could hear in a month in New York. In " cafés ", uncleaned and unheated, people sit reading the newspapers over cups of the moldy tasting dark gruel called coffee that has become truly the national drink of the European Continent.

" What do you eat ? ", you ask people.

" Bread and dried peas. ", they answer.

" How do you get the money to buy the rations ? "

By selling furniture or extra clothes or themselves, they answer. »

(John Dos Passos, 1946.)

As in Germany, the Russians were keen to ship industrial equipment back to Russia to rebuild their own devastated economy. They also wanted the oil that Austria at that time produced, particularly from oil wells in the Soviet zone.

These things led to tensions between the Russians and the Western Allies, whose priorities were to restore order, seek-out Nazis, and feed the population, all of which were made more difficult if the transport and production infrastructure was being stripped bare by the Russians.

These early tensions were precursors of a much deeper-seated hostility and suspicion, being early harbingers of what was to become known as the Cold War.

...

Within days of the end of the fighting (in April 1945 still) , the provisional city government was constituted and the political parties re-emerged. The situation of the city was far from encouraging. More than 20 % of the housing stock was partly or completely destroyed, almost 87,000 flats had become uninhabitable. In the urban area, more than 3,000 bomb craters were counted, many bridges were in shambles, sewers, gas and water pipes had suffered severe damage. The imperative of the immediate after-War period was to solve the most basic problems and get the city back to some degree of working order. The political context was no less complicated. The Allied Occupation Forces refused to accept the Nazis' territorial expansion. The bottom line was that those districts which had existed until 1938 were divided into 4 Allied zones. The inner-city district was administered by all 4 powers, as the so-called « Inter-allied Zone » . Districts 22-26, namely the 97 Lower-Austrian communities which had been merged with Vienna, in October 1938, were considered to form part of Lower-Austria and came under Soviet control.

In November 1945, the 1st City Council elections were held in Vienna, and the city was restored to democracy. The 100 seats of the Vienna City Council were divided among the Socialists (58 seats) , the People's Party, or Conservatives (36 seats) , and the Communists (6 seats) . The 1st and foremost priorities of the new city government were to ensure welfare programmes for the young and the elderly, to repair the city-owned utilities and rebuild the city - altogether, a programme that continued essentially until the early 1960's.

As early as 1946, the so-called « Territorial Review Act » (« Gebietsänderungsgesetz ») was passed, aimed at more or less repealing the 1938 expansion of the city. Approval by the Allied Occupation Forces was withheld for 8 years, since the Soviet forces in particular balked, so that it did not come into effect until 1954. Since then, the urban area has comprised 23 districts. Compared to the pre-1938 situation, the territory that now forms the 22nd district north of the Danube and the 23rd district at the southern extremity of the urban area has been part of Vienna. 1 year later, in May 1955, the country was restored to freedom through the conclusion of the « Austrian State Treaty » (« Staatsvertrag ») . In Vienna, the economy took a decisive turn for the better, not least as a result of assistance granted under the Marshall Plan but also because confiscations of industrial property by the Soviets ceased.

Occupation de l'Autriche après la Seconde Guerre mondiale

L'occupation de l'Autriche après la Seconde Guerre mondiale commença dès avril 1945, juste avant la capitulation du 3e « Reich » , et se termina officiellement avec le traité d'État autrichien en 1955.

2 types de monnaies étaient en circulation à la fin de la Guerre, le « Reichsmark » et le Schilling des forces alliées jusqu'au rétablissement du Schilling autrichien en novembre 1945.

Après l'intégration de l'Autriche au 3e « Reich » en 1938, la déclaration de Moscou proclamait en 1943 que l' « Anschluß » était nul et non avenu. Elle affirmait le rétablissement d'un État autrichien indépendant après la Guerre comme étant le but commun des Alliés.

Après la prise de Vienne, le 13 avril 1945, à la suite de l'offensive soviétique sur la ville, les forces alliées occidentales pénètrent en Autriche environ 2 semaines plus tard. Le 27 avril 1945 (presque 2 semaines avant la reddition nazie du 8 mai) , le gouvernement provisoire autrichien constitué le même jour par Karl Renner proclama l'indépendance de l'Autriche vis-à-vis du 3e « Reich » et instaura la 2e République autrichienne.

Après la capitulation et d'après les termes de la conférence de Potsdam, l'Autriche fut quand même divisée en 4 zones d'occupation alliées et Vienne, incluse dans la zone soviétique, était tout comme Berlin, elle-même divisée en 4 secteurs d'occupation, avec une « zone internationale » supplémentaire en son centre.

Cette situation perdura jusqu'à la signature du traité d'État autrichien en 1955.

Les 4 zones d'occupation alliées de Autriche entre 1945 et 1955.

La zone soviétique est constituée par : le « Burgenland » , la Basse-Autriche et la Haute-Autriche au nord du Danube (« Mühlviertel ») et à l'est de l'Enns ; son quartier-général étant à Baden.

La zone américaine est constituée par : la Haute-Autriche au sud du Danube et à l'ouest de l'Enns, ainsi que la région de Salzbourg ; son quartier-général étant à Salzkammergut.

La zone britannique est constituée par : la Carinthie, le Tyrol oriental et la Styrie ; son quartier-général étant également à Salzkammergut.

La zone française est constituée par : le Tyrol du nord et le Vorarlberg ; son quartier-général étant à Innsbruck.

Le passage des lignes de démarcation entre les zones d'occupation, nécessitait la détention d'une carte d'identité alliée qui était traduite dans 4 langues (allemand, anglais, russe, français) et portait des avis de confirmation de chacune des 4 forces d'occupation (soit en tout 11 cachets) . Cependant, les forces occidentales libéralisèrent très rapidement les procédures : ainsi, le fait de dépasser la ligne de démarcation à destination de la zone russe ou en provenance de celle-ci s'apparentait alors à un voyage à l'étranger. Les Soviétiques supprimèrent ces contrôles seulement en juin 1954.

Les 4 secteurs d'occupation à Vienne. Les zones en rouge clair, bleu clair et vert clair désignent les secteurs annexés à Vienne depuis 1954, mais placés à l'époque respectivement sous occupation soviétique, américaine, britannique et française.

Comme Berlin, Vienne fut occupée uniquement dans un 1er temps par les soldats soviétiques. En application de la convention de Potsdam, les autres Alliés installèrent leurs troupes dans la capitale autrichienne à partir d'août 1945. La répartition des secteurs d'occupation se fit par districts, dans les limites administratives que la ville connaissait avant 1937.

Un régime administration commune aux 4 forces d'occupation était appliqué pour le 1er district (« Innere Stadt », soit la ville-centre) : la gestion de la zone était ainsi confiée tous les mois par roulement à chacune des forces occupantes :

Secteur américain constitué par les : 7e, 8e, 9e, 17e, 18e et 19e districts.

Secteur britannique constitué par les : 3e, 5e, 11e, 12e et 13e districts.

Secteur français constitué par les : 6e, 14e, 15e et 16e districts.

Secteur soviétique constitué par les : 2e, 4e, 10e, 20e, 21e et 22e districts.

Les districts viennois créés postérieurement à 1938 (à partir du 23e district) se trouvaient donc en dehors des limites de la ville et dépendaient ainsi de la zone d'occupation soviétique.

Les quartiers-généraux de chacune de ces forces étaient :

Pour les Américains : siège de la « Österreichische Nationalbank », sur la « Otto-Wagner-Platz » .

Pour les Britanniques : château de Schönbrunn.

Pour les Français : hôtel Kummer à Mariahilf.

Pour les Soviétiques : palais Epstein, annexe du Parlement autrichien.

Le 11 septembre 1945 se constituait le Conseil allié composé des 4 commandants en chef qui, plus tard, devinrent haut-commissaires. Les 1ers membres de ce conseil furent :

Le général de corps d'armée américain Mark Wayne Clark.

Le maréchal soviétique Ivan Koniev.

Le lieutenant-général britannique Richard McCreery.

Le général de corps d'armée français Antoine Béthouart.

Toutes les lois votées par le Parlement autrichien et présentées par le gouvernement fédéral au conseil allié nécessitaient l'aval de celui-ci pour leurs publications. Si le consentement n'était pas donné, la loi ne pouvait entrer en vigueur. Ainsi, en 1946, il arriva par exemple qu'une loi sur le changement des limites administratives de Vienne au profit de la Basse-Autriche (en fait, un retour à la situation antérieure à 1938) ne fut pas appliquée, par le simple refus des représentants soviétiques qui usèrent de leur veto sur ce sujet jusqu'en 1954.

Ainsi, le veto apposé par 1 seul des 4 représentants suffisait au début pour bloquer l'application d'une loi. Plus tard, le veto devint collectif : l'ensemble des représentants alliés devaient tous se mettre d'accord pour bloquer la procédure. En conséquence, les objections alliées devinrent alors très rares.

Les effectifs des armées d'occupation étaient initialement de 700,000 hommes, en 1955, les puissances occidentales ont réduites à environ leurs forces à 20,000 hommes et les forces soviétiques à 40,000. Les coûts d'occupation devaient être couverts par l'Autriche (initialement jusqu'à 35 % de son budget ; au 3 décembre 1946, le quota est descendu à 15 %) . En 1947, les États-Unis ont déclaré qu'il paierait ses propres coûts d'occupation ; les 3 autres puissances ont fait de même en 1953.

Le Conseil allié fut également chargé de la dénazification. Toutefois, dès 1946, les priorités se modifièrent, celle-ci étant transférée au gouvernement autrichien en février 1946, le « Counter Intelligence Corps » (CIC) américain ne conservant qu'un rôle général de supervision, qui s'acheva en mai 1947. Le 430e détachement du CIC américain, auparavant consacré à la dénazification, mit au rang de priorité la surveillance des organisations communistes. Celui-ci devait employer, à cette fin, le SS flamand Robert Jan Verbelen.

Après la mort de Joseph Staline, le 5 mars 1953, Ivan Ilyitchev, conseiller politique adjoint de la Commission de Contrôle de la Zone d'occupation soviétique en Allemagne et maître-espion du GRU rejoint Vienne et remplace le Haut-Commissaire Vladimir Petrovich Sviridov.

Son arrivée est interprétée à l'Ouest comme un pas vers la pleine indépendance de l'Autriche, d'autant que le contrôle des personnes aux frontières du secteur soviétique est abrogé le 8 juin 1953.

Ilyitchev mène ensuite, pendant l'été 1953, les négociations avec les représentants de l'Autriche (le chancelier Julius Raab, le ministre des Affaires étrangères Leopold Figl et le secrétaire Bruno Kreisky) . Un des points de désaccord : le versement annuel de 151 millions de Shillings autrichiens à l'URSS (coût de l'entretien des troupes d'occupation soviétiques) et le statut de neutralité de l'Autriche. Comme le souligne Julius Raab : ou bien l'Autriche est neutre, et elle ne peut pas payer ; ou bien l'Autriche peut commercer librement avec l'Occident, et alors elle peut payer.

Le 1er août 1953, l'Union soviétique renonce à percevoir en Autriche le prix de son occupation. Cette mesure est assimilée par beaucoup à une autorisation donnée à l'Autriche de s'allier à nouveau à l'Allemagne, de reformer l' «

Anschluß » , et les protestations s'élèvent en URSS, et même en France. Le 17 mai 1954, lors d'une réunion à l'ambassade soviétique de Vienne, l'ambassadeur Ilitchev obtient du chancelier Raab et du ministre des Affaires étrangères autrichien Figl des garanties formelles quant à leur absence d'arrière-pensées, et un télégramme du secrétaire d'État John Foster Dulles appuie les négociations.

Le 15 mai 1955, l'ambassadeur plénipotentiaire d'URSS en Autriche Ilitchev, en poste jusqu'en mars 1956, appose sa signature, sous celle de Molotov, au bas du Traité d'État autrichien avalisant l'indépendance de l'Autriche.

Le 5 juillet 1945, le 15e groupe d'armées qui a effectué l'offensive de printemps 1945 en Italie est réorganisé et désigné comme « United States Occupational Forces Austria » (forces d'occupation des États-Unis en Autriche) , puis comme « United States Forces in Austria » (USFA) ; la compagnie de quartier-général du IIe corps d'armée, la 11e division blindée (dissoute le 31 août 1945) , la 42e division d'infanterie et la 65e division d'infanterie sont affectées à cette formation à sa création.

Il y avait 70,000 militaires américains stationnés en Autriche à l'automne 1945, mais dès janvier 1946, la force d'occupation a été réduite à 41,000 puis à mi-1946 à 29 000 personnes, principalement du personnel de soutien et administratif. La seule grande unité de combat étant la 42e division d'infanterie.

En 1948, le « 16th Infantry Regiment » restant la principale unité de combat américaine en Autriche est relevé par le « 350th Infantry Regiment » qui forme l'ossature d'un commandement tactique (« Tactical Command, U.S. Forces Austria ») de taille divisionnaire créé le 31 octobre 1950 à partir de la 88e division d'infanterie.

Les forces britanniques entrent en Autriche à partir du col du Monte Croce Carnico, le 7 mai 1945, devançant tout juste les forces yougoslaves. Les forces partisans yougoslaves ont défilé en Carinthie, la déclarant sous leur contrôle, mais une présence accrue britannique met un terme à cela. La Yougoslavie a continué de plaider cette revendication jusqu'en 1949.

Les « British Troops Austria » (BTA) , indépendantes de la « British Army of the Rhine » comptent à l'origine 2 divisions. La 78e division d'infanterie en Carinthie, son quartier-général à Klagenfurt étant couplée à celui de la « British Army of the Rhine » , et la 46e division d'infanterie dans la état de Styrie avec son quartier-général à Graz. Le contingent à Vienne est une unité indépendante.

Antoine Béthouart nommé au commandement en chef des forces françaises en Autriche avant de devenir haut-commissaire de 1946 à 1950, avec 5 étoiles à partir de 1948. La zone d'occupation française en Autriche comprenait une partie du Tyrol et le « Land » de Vorarlberg. Dans le secteur français de Vienne, il fonde le lycée français de Vienne. Afin de résider dans la capitale, il réquisitionne à Hütteldorf la villa de la princesse de Windischgrätz (1883-1963) , dite l' « archiduchesse rouge » , petite-fille de l'Empereur François-Joseph.

Le traité d'État autrichien est signé le 15 mai 1955 au palais du Belvédère à Vienne, en Autriche, entre les forces occupantes alliées (les États-Unis, l'URSS, la France et la Grande-Bretagne) et le gouvernement autrichien, et est entré en vigueur le 27 juillet 1955. Les forces d'occupation quittent l'Autriche le 25 octobre 1955. Le 26 octobre, le conseil national de l'Autriche signe la Neutralité autrichienne, faisant du pays un État indépendant.

...

The Allied occupation of Austria lasted from 1945 to 1955. Austria had been regarded by Nazi Germany as a constituent part of the German State but, in 1943, during World War II, the Allied powers agreed in the Declaration of Moscow that it would be regarded as the 1st victim of Nazi aggression, and treated as a liberated and independent country after the War.

In the immediate aftermath of the War, Austria, like Germany, was divided into 4 occupation zones and jointly occupied by the United States, Soviet Union, United Kingdom and France. Vienna, like Berlin, was similarly subdivided but the central district was administered jointly by the Allied Control Council.

Whereas Germany was divided into East and West Germany in 1949, Austria remained under joint occupation of the Soviet Union until 1955 ; its status became a controversial subject in the Cold War until the warming of relations known as the Khrushchev Thaw. After Austrian promises of perpetual neutrality, Austria was accorded full independence on 12 May 1955 and the last occupation troops left on 25 October that year.

At the 1943 Moscow Conference, the allies had jointly decided that the German annexation of Austria in 1938 would be considered « null and void » . As well, all administrative and legal measures since 1938 would be ignored. The conference declared the intent to create a free and independent Austria after the War, but also stated that Austria had a responsibility for « participation in the War at the side of Hitlerite Germany » which could not be evaded.

On 29 March 1945, the Soviet commander Fyodor Tolbukhin's troops crossed the former Austrian border at Klostermarienberg, in Burgenland. On 3 April, at the beginning of the Vienna Offensive, the Austrian politician Karl Renner, then living in southern Lower-Austria, established contact with the Soviets. Joseph Stalin had already established a would-be future Austrian cabinet from the country's communists in exile, but Tolbukhin's telegram changed Stalin's mind in favour of Renner.

On 20 April 1945, the Soviets, without asking their Western allies, instructed Renner to form the provisional government. 7 days later, Renner's cabinet took office, declared the independence of Austria from Nazi Germany and called for the creation of a democratic State along the lines of the 1st Austrian Republic. Soviet acceptance of Renner was not an isolated episode ; their officers re-established district administrations and appointed local mayors, frequently following the advice of the locals, even before the battle was over.

Renner and his ministers were guarded and watched by NKVD body-guards. 1/3 of State Chancellor Renner's cabinet, including crucial seats of the Secretary of State of the Interior and the Secretary of State for Education, was staffed by Austrian Communists. The Western allies suspected the usual Soviet pattern of setting-up puppet States and did not recognize Renner. The British were particularly hostile ; even Harry Truman, who believed that Renner was a trustworthy politician rather than a token front for the Kremlin, denied him recognition. But Renner had secured inter-Party control by designating 2 Under-Secretaries of State in each of the ministries, appointed by the 2 Parties not placing the Secretary of State.

As soon as Adolf Hitler's armies were pushed-back into Germany, the Red Army and the NKVD began to comb the captured territories. By 23 May, they reported arrests of 268 former Red Army men, 1,208 « Wehrmacht » men and 1,655 civilians. In the following weeks, the British surrendered over 40,000 Cossacks who had fled to Western Austria to the Soviet authorities and certain death. In July and August, the Soviets brought in 4 regiments of NKVD troops to « mop-up » Vienna and seal the Czechoslovak border.

The Red Army lost 17,000 lives in the Battle of Vienna. But the reputation of the Soviet soldiers was immediately ruined by the vast amount of sexual violence against women, which occurred in the 1st days and weeks after the Soviet victory. Repressions against civilians harmed Red Army reputation to such an extent that, on 28 September 1945, Moscow issued an order forbidding violent interrogations. Red Army morale fell as soldiers prepared to be sent home ; replacement of combat units with Ivan Konev's permanent occupation force only marginally reduced the Austrians' suffering. Throughout 1945 and 1946, all levels of Soviet command tried, in vain, to contain desertion and plunder by rank and file. According to Austrian police records for 1946, « men in Soviet uniform », usually drunk, accounted for more than 90 % of registered crime (American soldiers : 5 to 7 %) . At the same time, the Soviet governors resisted the expansion and arming of the Austrian police force.

French troops crossed the Austrian border on 29 April, followed by the Americans and finally the British on 8 May. Until the end of July 1945, none of the Western allies had 1st hand intelligence from Eastern Austria (likewise, Renner's cabinet knew practically nothing about conditions in the West) .

On 9 July 1945, the Allies agreed on the borders of their occupation zones. Vorarlberg and North Tyrol were assigned to the French Zone ; Salzburg and Upper-Austria south of the Danube to the American Zone ; East Tyrol, Carinthia and Styria to the British Zone ; and Burgenland, Lower-Austria, and the Mühlviertel area of Upper-Austria, north of the Danube, to the Soviet Zone. The French and American zones bordered those countries' zones in Germany, and the Soviet zone bordered future Warsaw Pact States. Vienna was divided among all 4 Allies. The historical center of Vienna was declared an international zone, in which occupation forces changed every month. Movement of occupation troops (« zone swap ») continued until the end of July.

The 1st Americans arrived in Vienna in the end of July 1945, when the Soviets were pressing Renner to surrender Austrian oil fields. Americans objected and blocked the deal but, ultimately, the Soviets assumed control over Austrian oil in their zone. The British arrived only in September. The Allied Council of 4 military governors convened for its 1st meeting in Vienna, on 12 September 1945. It refused to recognize Renner's claim of a national government but did not prevent him from extending influence into the Western zones. Renner appointed vocal anti-Communist Karl Gruber as Foreign Minister and tried to reduce Communist influence. On 20 October 1945, Renner's reformed cabinet was recognized by the Western allies and received a go-ahead for the 1st legislative election.

The election held on 25 November 1945 was a blow for the Communist Party of Austria which received less than 5 % of the vote. The coalition of Christian Democrats (ÖVP) and Social Democrats (SPÖ) , backed by 90 % of the votes, assumed control over the cabinet and offered the position of Federal Chancellor to Christian Democrat Julius Raab. The Soviets vetoed Raab, due to his political role in the 1930's. Instead, President Karl Renner, with the consent of parliament, appointed Leopold Figl, who was just barely acceptable to the Soviets. They responded with massive and coordinated expropriation of Austrian economic potential.

The Potsdam Agreement allowed confiscation of « German external assets » in Austria, and the Soviets used the vagueness of this definition to the full. In less than 1 year, they dismantled and shipped to the East industrial equipment valued at around $ 500 U.S. million. American High-Commissioner Mark W. Clark vocally resisted Soviet expansionist intentions, and his reports to Washington, along with George F. Kennan's « The Long Telegram » , supported Truman's tough stance against the Soviets. Thus, according to Bischof, the Cold War in Austria began in the spring of 1946, 1 year before the outbreak of the global Cold War.

On 28 June 1946, the Allies signed the Second Control Agreement, that loosened their dominance over the Austrian government. The Parliament was « de facto » relieved of Allied control. From now on, its decision could be overturned only by unanimous vote by all 4 Allies. Soviet vetoes were routinely voided by the Western opposition. For the next 9 years, the country was gradually emancipated from foreign control, and evolved from a « nation under tutelage » to full independence. The government possessed its own independent vision of the future, reacting to adverse circumstances and, at times, turning them to their own benefit. 1st allied talks on Austrian independence were held in January 1947, and dead-locked over the issue of « German assets » in Soviet possession.

In late-1945 and early-1946, the Allied occupation force peaked at around 150,000 Soviet, 55,000 British, 40,000 American and 15,000 French troops. The costs of keeping these troops were levied on the Austrian government. At 1st, Austria had to pay the whole occupation bill ; in 1946, occupation costs were capped at 35 % of Austrian State expenditures, equally split between the Soviets and the Western allies.

Coincidentally, with the Second Control Agreement, the Soviets changed their economic policy from outright plunder to running expropriated Austrian businesses for a profit. Austrian communists advised Stalin to nationalize the whole economy, but he deemed the proposal to be too radical. Between February and June 1946, the Soviets expropriated hundreds of businesses left in their zone. On 27 June 1946, they amalgamated these assets into the USIA, a conglomerate of over 400 enterprises. It controlled not more than 5 % of Austrian economic output but possessed a substantial, or even monopolistic, share in glass, steel, oil and transportation industries. The USIA was weakly integrated with the rest of Austrian economy : its products were primarily shipped to the East, its profits « de facto » confiscated and its taxes left unpaid by the Soviets. The Austrian government refused to recognize USIA legal title over its possessions ; in retaliation, the USIA refused to pay Austrian taxes and tariffs. This competitive advantage helped to keep USIA enterprises afloat despite their mounting obsolescence. The Soviets had no intention to reinvest their profits, and USIA assets gradually decayed and lost their competitive edge. The Austrian government feared para-military communist gangs sheltered by the USIA and scorned it for being « an economy of exploitation in colonial style » . The economy of the Soviet zone eventually reunited with the rest of the country.

South Tyrol, a disputed territory in the Alps, was returned to Italy. The « 30 second decision » of the Council of Foreign Ministers to grant South Tyrol to Italy (4 September 1945) disregarded popular opinion in Austria and the possible effects of a forced repatriation of 200,000 German-speaking Tyroleans. The decision was motivated largely by the British desire to reward Italy, a country far more important for the containment of world communism. Renner's objections came in too late and carried too little weight to have effect. Popular and official protests continued through 1946. The signatures of 150,000 South Tyroleans did not alter the decision. South Tyrol is today an Italian autonomous province (Bolzano/Bozen) with a German-speaking majority.

In 1947, the Austrian economy, including USIA enterprises, reached 61 % of pre-War level, but it was disproportionately weak in consumer goods production (42 % of pre-War level) . Food remained the worst problem. The country, according to American reports, survived 1945 and 1946 on « a near-starvation diet » with daily rations remaining below 2,000 calories until the end of 1947. 65 % of Austrian agricultural output and nearly all oil was concentrated in the Soviet zone, complicating the Western Allies' task of feeding the population in their own zones.

From March 1946 to June 1947, 64 % of these rations were provided by the UNRRA. Heating depended on supplies of German coal shipped by the U.S. on lax credit terms. Drought of 1946 further depressed farm output and hydro-electric power generation. Figl's government, the Chambers of Labour, Trade and Agriculture, and the Austrian Trade Union Federation (ÖGB) temporarily resolved the crisis in favour of tight regulation of food and labour markets. Wage increases were limited and locked to commodity prices through annual price-wage agreements. The negotiations set a model of building consensus between elected and non-elected political elites that became the basis of post-War Austrian democracy, known as Austrian Social Partnership and Austro-corporatism.

The severe winter of 1946-1947 was followed by the disastrous summer of 1947, when the potato harvest barely made 30 % of pre-War output. Food shortages of 1947 were aggravated by the withdrawal of UNRRA aid, spiraling inflation and the demoralizing failure of State Treaty talks. In April 1947, the government was unable to distribute any rations and, on 5 May, Vienna was shaken by a violent food riot. Unlike earlier popular protests, the demonstrators, led by the Communists, called to curb the westernization of Austrian politics. In August, a food riot in Bad Ischl turned into a pogrom of local Jews. In November, food shortage sparked workers' strikes in British-occupied Styria. Figl's government declared that the food riots were a failed communist putsch, although later historians said this was an exaggeration.

In June 1947, the month when the UNRRA stopped shipments of food to Austria, the extent of the food crisis compelled the U.S. government to issue $ 300 million in food aid. In the same month, Austria was invited to discuss its participation in the Marshall Plan. Direct aid and subsidies helped Austria to survive the hunger of 1947. On the other hand, they depressed food prices and, thus, discouraged local farmers, delaying the rebirth of Austrian agriculture.

Austria finalized its Marshall Plan program in the end of 1947 and received the 1st « tranche » of Marshall Plan aid in March 1948. Heavy industry (or what was left of it) was concentrated around Linz, in the American zone, and in British-occupied Styria. Their products were in high-demand in post-War Europe. Naturally, the administrators of the Marshall Plan channeled available financial aid into heavy industry controlled by the American and British forces. American military and political leaders made no secret of their intentions : Geoffrey Keyes said that « we cannot afford to let this key-area (Austria) fall under exclusive influence of the Soviet Union » . The Marshall Plan was deployed primarily against the Soviet zone but it was not completely excluded : it received 8 % of Marshall plan investments (compared to 25 % of food and other physical commodities) . The Austrian government regarded financial aid to the Soviet zone as a lifeline holding the country together. This was the only case when Marshall Plan funds were distributed in Soviet-occupied territories.

The Marshall Plan was not universally popular, especially in its initial phase. It benefited some trades such as metallurgy but depressed others such as agriculture. Heavy industries quickly recovered, from 74.7 % of pre-War output in 1948 to 150.7 % in 1951. American planners deliberately neglected consumer goods industries, construction trades and small business. Their workers, almost half of the industrial work-force, suffered from rising unemployment. In 1948-1949, a substantial share of Marshall Plan funds was used to subsidize imports of food. American money effectively raised real wages : the grain price was about 1/3 of the world price, while agriculture remained in ruins. Marshall Plan aid gradually removed many of the causes of popular unrest that shook the country in 1947, but Austria remained dependent on food imports.

The 2nd stage of the Marshall Plan, which began in 1950, concentrated on productivity of the economy.

According to Michæl J. Hogan :

« In the most profound sense, it involved the transfer of attitudes, habits and values as well, indeed a whole way of life that Marshall planners associated with progress in the market-place of politics and social relationships as much as they did with industry and agriculture. »

The program, as instructed by American law-makers, targeted improvement in factory-level productivity, labour-management relations, free-trade-unions and introduction of modern business practices. The Economic Cooperation Administration, which operated until December 1951, distributed around $ 300 million in technical assistance and attempted steering the Austrian social partnership (political Parties, labour unions, business associations and executive government) in favour of productivity and growth instead of redistribution and consumption.

Their efforts were thwarted by the Austrian practice of making decisions behind closed doors. The Americans struggled to change it in favour of open, public discussion. They took a strong anti-cartel stance, appreciated by the Socialists, and pressed the government to remove anti-competition legislation. But, ultimately, they were responsible for the creation of the vast monopolistic public sector of the economy (and, thus, politically benefiting the Socialists) .

According to Bischof, « no European nation benefited more from Marshall Plan than Austria » . Austria received nearly a $ 1 billion through Marshall Plan, and half a billion in humanitarian aid. The Americans also refunded all occupation costs charged in 1945-1946, around $ 300 million. In 1948-1949, Marshall Plan aid contributed 14 % of national income, the highest ratio of all involved countries. Per capita, aid amounted to $ 132 compared to $ 19 for the Germans. But Austria also paid more War reparations per capita than any other Axis State or territory. « Total War » reparations taken by the Soviet Union including withdrawn USIA profits, looted property and the final settlement agreed in 1955, are estimated between $ 1.54 billion and $ 2.65 billion (Eisterer : 2 to 2.5 billion) .

The British had been quietly arming gendarmes since 1945 and discussed the creation of a proper Austrian military in 1947. The Americans feared that Vienna could be the scene of another Berlin Blockade. They set-up and filled emergency food dumps, and prepared to airlift supplies to Vienna while the government created a back-up base in Salzburg. The American command secretly trained the soldiers of an underground Austrian military at a rate of 200 men a week. The « Gendarmerie » knowingly hired « Wehrmacht » veterans and VdU members ; the denazification of Austria's 537,000 registered Nazis had largely ended in 1948.

Austrian communists appealed to Stalin to partition their country along the German model but, in February 1948, Andrei Zhdanov vetoed the idea : Austria had more value as a bargaining chip than as another unstable client state. The continuing talks on Austrian independence stalled in 1948 but progressed to a « near breakthrough » in 1949 : the Soviets lifted most of their objections, and the Americans suspected foul-play. The Pentagon was convinced that the withdrawal of Western troops would leave the country open to Soviet invasion of the Czechoslovak model. Clark insisted that, before their departure, the United States must secretly train and arm the core of a future military. Serious secret training of the B-Gendarmerie began in 1950 but soon stalled due to U.S. defense budget cuts in 1951. « Gendarmes » were trained primarily as an anti-coup police force, but they also studied Soviet combat practice and counted on cooperation with the Yugoslavs in case of a Soviet invasion.

Although, in the fall of 1950, the Western powers replaced their military representatives with civilian diplomats, strategically, the situation became gloomier than ever. The Korean War experience persuaded Washington that Austria might become « Europe's Korea » and speed-up re-armament of the « secret ally » . International tension was coincident with a severe internal economic and social crisis. The planned withdrawal of American food subsidies spelled a sharp drop in real wages. The government and the unions dead-locked in negotiations, and gave the communists the opportunity to organize the 1950 Austrian general strikes which became the gravest threat since the 1947 food riots. The communists stormed and took-over ÖGB offices and disrupted railroad traffic but failed to recruit sufficient public support and had to admit defeat. The Soviets and the Western allies did not dare to actively intervene in the strikes. The strike intensified the militarization of Western Austria, with active input from France and the CIA. Despite the strain of the Korean War, by the end of 1952, the American « Stockpile A » (A for Austria) in France and Germany amassed 227 thousand tons of materiel ear-marked for Austrian armed forces.

The end of the Korean War and the death of Joseph Stalin defused the standoff, and the country was rapidly, but not completely, demilitarized. After the Soviet Union had relieved Austria of the need to pay for the cost of their reduced army of 40,000 men, the British and French followed suit and reduced their forces to a token presence. Finally, the Soviets replaced their military governor with a civilian ambassador. The former border between Eastern and Western Austria became a demarcation line.

Chancellor Julius Raab, elected in April 1953, removed pro-Western foreign minister Karl Gruber and steered Austria to a more neutral policy. Raab carefully probed the Soviets about resuming the talks on independence but, until February 1955, it remained contingent on a solution to the larger German problem. The Western strategy of re-arming West Germany, formulated in the Paris Agreement, was unacceptable to the Soviets. They responded with a counter-proposal for a pan-European security system that, they said, could speed-up reunification of Germany and, again, the West suspected foul-play. Dwight D. Eisenhower, in particular, had « an utter lack of confidence in the reliability and integrity of the men in the Kremlin ... the Kremlin is pre-empting the right to speak for the small nations of the world » .

In January 1955, Soviet diplomats Andrey Gromyko, Vladimir Semenov and Georgy Pushkin secretly advised Vyacheslav Molotov to unlink the Austrian and German issues, expecting that the new talks on Austria would delay ratification of the Paris Agreement. Molotov publicly announced the new Soviet initiative on 8 February. He put forward 3 conditions for Austrian independence : neutrality, no foreign military bases, and guarantees against a new « Anschluß » .

In March, Molotov clarified his plan through a series of consultations with ambassador Norbert Bischoff : Austria was no longer a hostage of the German issue. Molotov invited Raab to Moscow for bilateral negotiations that, if successful, had to be followed by a 4 Powers conference. By this time, the Paris Agreements were ratified by France and Germany, although the British and Americans suspected a trap of the same sort that Adolf Hitler had set for Kurt Schuschnigg in 1938. Anthony Eden and others wrote that the Moscow initiative was merely a cover-up for another incursion into German matters. The West erroneously thought that the Soviets valued Austria primarily as a military asset when, in reality, it was a purely political issue. Austria's military significance has been largely devalued by the end of the Soviet-Yugoslav conflict and the upcoming signing of the Warsaw Pact.

These fears did not materialize, and Raab's visit to Moscow (12 to 15 April) was a breakthrough. Moscow agreed that Austria would be free no later than 31 December. Austrians agreed to pay for the « German assets » and oil fields left by the Soviets, mostly in kind ; « the real prize was to be neutrality on the Swiss model » . Molotov also promised release and repatriation of Austrians imprisoned in the Soviet Union.

Western powers were stunned ; Frank Wallinger reported to London that the deal « was far too good to be true, to be honest » . But it proceeded as had been agreed in Moscow and, on 15 May 1955, Antoine Pinay, Harold MacMillan, Molotov, John Foster Dulles and Figl signed the Austrian State Treaty. It came into force on 27 July and, on 25 October, the country was free of occupying troops. The Soviets left in Vienna the large Soviet War Memorial and to the new government a symbolic cache of small arms, artillery and T-34 tanks ; the Americans left a far greater gift of « Stockpile A » assets. The only political spokesman who has been publicly upset about the outcome was Konrad Adenauer, who called the affair « die ganze österreichische Schweinerei » (the whole Austrian scandal) and threatened the Austrians with « sending Hitler's remains home to Austria » .

Dénazification

La dénazification (« Entnazifizierung ») est un processus dirigé par les Alliés au sortir de la Seconde Guerre mondiale et destiné à éradiquer le Nazisme dans les institutions et la vie publique allemandes. Il avait aussi pour objectif de permettre la reconstruction de la vie politique allemande sur une base démocratique. Ainsi, il faut voir dans ce processus 2 volets : un volet punitif et un volet préventif.

Proclamée à Londres en janvier 1942, renforcée par l'accord de Potsdam en août 1945, la dénazification désigne une « épuration » de la société, de la culture, de la presse, de l'économie, du pouvoir judiciaire et de la politique allemandes et autrichiennes de toute influence nazie. Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, une grande partie de l'Europe, surtout l'Allemagne, était en ruines. Ceci était particulièrement vrai pour l'administration de l'État. Les Alliés ont entrepris une politique de démocratisation, de démilitarisation, de décartellisation (rapidement arrêtée à l'Ouest à cause de l'influence communiste, car créant du chômage) et de dénazification.

Il était notamment prévu dans les zones d'occupations occidentales des questionnaires auxquels chaque Allemand ayant détenu une petite fonction civile ou militaire devait répondre. Les réponses furent fréquemment peu sincères, frauduleuses ou fantaisistes. Le romancier Ernst von Salomon publia en 1951 un texte célèbre intitulé « Le Questionnaire » (« Der Fragebogen ») .

À partir du 20 septembre 1945, le Conseil de contrôle allié siégeant à Berlin adopta la Loi n° 1 du Conseil de contrôle allié portant abrogation du droit nazi, première d'un grand nombre de directives de dénazification qui seront appliquées plus ou moins scrupuleusement selon les zones d'occupation (les Soviétiques étant les plus radicaux) . Ces directives allaient permettre de désigner certains groupes de personnes pour lesquelles une enquête judiciaire a été entamée. Le corps professoral est profondément et rapidement renouvelé, ainsi que la majeure partie des professions juridiques, journalistiques et sportives.

La « loi d'élimination du National-Socialisme et du militarisme » du 5 mars 1946 définit dans son article 4 les niveaux de responsabilité : « Hauptschuldige » (principaux coupables) ; « Belastete » (charges importantes) ; « Minderbelastete » (charges mineures) ; « Mitläufer » (suiivistes) ; « Entlastete » (libérés, les procès en dénazification pouvant déclarer les prévenus « nicht betroffen », « non concernés » par cette loi) .

Le 23 juin 1950, sous l'influence d'Otto Küster, une loi de « reconnaissance des unions libres des (personnes) persécutées (pour raisons) raciales et politiques » est promulguée afin de mettre un terme aux errements de la politique raciale du « Reich » nazi en termes de mariages.

Cependant, derrière l'apparente univocité du terme, la dénazification connut des déploiements différents selon les zones d'occupation :

« Une fois admis qu'on châtierait les grands chefs, les conceptions des vainqueurs divergeaient déjà sur la nature du phénomène national-socialiste, donc nécessairement sur les meilleurs moyens d'en éliminer jusqu'aux ferments. Pour les dirigeants britanniques, il s'agissait d'une sorte de maladie. L'élimination des porteurs de germes suffirait à rendre au corps sa santé. Pour les Français, il y avait une sorte de ligne continue de Bismarck à Hitler. Le Nazisme était lié au « prussianisme dont Hitler a été la plus dangereuse incarnation » . L'État unitaire allemand et l'État totalitaire étaient liés. La punition resterait sans effet si, par ailleurs, on n'assurait pas la destruction de la Prusse et celle de l'unité

allemande. Du côté américain, on était partagé entre la vision anglaise et la vision française. Les Soviétiques, eux, attribuaient la victoire du Nazisme en Allemagne aux structures de la société allemande, en particulier à la répartition du pouvoir économique au sein de la société : la punition était donc accessoire, la révolution sociale prioritaire. »

(Alfred Großer, L'Allemagne de notre temps ; page 80.)

Le conseil de contrôle allié n'édicte la directive 24 qu'en janvier 1946, et, dès lors, la dénazification se déroule différemment dans chaque zone d'occupation. 186,000 suspects sont détenus dans les 3 zones d'occupation occidentales, dont 86,000 sont libérés au 1er janvier 1947.

Sont ainsi détenus jusqu'en 1947 :

En zone britannique : 64,500 personnes (dont 34,000 sont libérées ; soit 53 %) .

En zone américaine : 95,250 personnes (dont 44,244 libérées ; soit 46 %) .

En zone française : 18,963 personnes (dont 8,040 libérées ; soit 42 %) .

En zone soviétique : 67,179 personnes (dont 8,214 libérées ; soit 12 %) .

5,025 condamnations sont prononcées dans les zones occidentales, dont 806 condamnations à mort.

D'autres historiens relèvent, eux aussi, la disparité de traitement selon la zone d'occupation :

« De plus, leur armée (celle des Américains) de Texans, de Noirs, de “ Middle-Westerners ” abonde aussi de réfugiés allemands qui savent la langue et expliquent tout. Le rôle de ceux-là sera important pendant la Ire phase de l'occupation. L'ignorance et la bonne conscience des uns, les sentiments de retrouvailles mêlés de désir de vengeance des autres feront de la dénazification américaine un chef-d'œuvre de précision, de bureaucratie et d'incohérence. Mais s'il faut choisir sa zone, c'est chez les Américains que cela fera le moins mal d'être allemand. »

(Joseph Rován, Histoire de l'Allemagne ; page 768.)

La description que Rován donne de l'administration du secteur français est également très critique :

« Quant aux Français, à qui les Américains ont cédé une partie de leur zone, les régions sud des futurs “ Länder ” de Bade et de Wurtemberg, et les Anglais le sud de la Rhénanie, ils sont placés sous le règne du tripartisme qui, de Gaulle parti, sera surtout celui de l'impuissance, chaque parti bandant ses forces pour anéantir les efforts des autres. En « zone », la divergence profonde et sans cesse plus approfondie entre occupants communistes, socialistes et démocrates-chrétiens a pour conséquence un haut-niveau d'autonomie pour les responsables de tout genre qui peuvent toujours court-circuiter leurs supérieurs hiérarchiques en cherchant l'appui de leur soutien politique à Paris. La zone

française ressemble au Saint-Empire des derniers siècles de son existence, c'est une justification de territoires et de secteurs administratifs semi-autonomes. L'ordre y est maintenu par une sorte d'armée des Indes, une armée de type colonial métissée de FTP et de FFI. Comme partout, on retrouve chez les Français des idéalistes de la réconciliation avec une Allemagne démocratique et des profiteurs, mais ceux-là aussi ont dans notre petite zone, assez pauvre et restée relativement à l'abri de la Guerre et de ses mouvements de population, un degré d'indépendance bien plus grand qu'ailleurs. »

(Joseph Rovin, Histoire de l'Allemagne ; page 768.)

Après le 5 mars 1946, la responsabilité de la dénazification en zone américaine est confiée aux autorités allemandes, qui mettent en place des chambres d'épuration composées de juges intérimaires. Après la fondation de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, le « Bundestag » met officiellement fin à la dénazification par le vote de la loi du 1er juillet 1951. Dans la zone soviétique, en revanche, les camps d'internement restent jusqu'en janvier 1950 administrés par les Soviétiques. Les conditions de vie y sont très difficiles, et 42,800 prisonniers y décèdent, selon les autorités soviétiques, plus de 80,000 selon d'autres sources.

Le procès de Nuremberg (du 20 novembre 1945 au 1er octobre 1946) déclare criminelles 4 organisations nazies : le NSDAP, la SS, la SD et la « Gestapo ». Cela implique que le simple fait d'en avoir fait partie est un crime. En ce qui concerne le NSDAP, seul le corps de chefs nazis est déclaré criminel à savoir, le « Führer », la « Reichsleitung », les « Gauleiter » et leurs principaux collaborateurs, les « Kreisleiter » et leurs collaborateurs, les « Ortsgruppenleiter », les « Zellenleiter » et les « Blockleiter ». Les simples membres ne sont pas inquiétés s'ils se sont bornés à avoir une carte du NSDAP.

Dans l'immédiat d'après-Guerre, beaucoup de Nazis, et en particulier de SS, furent ainsi détenus dans des camps de prisonniers ou/et exécutés, soit par la Résistance, soit après procès. Une partie, cependant, échappa à toute condamnation. Si, dès 1943, les Alliés avaient mis en place la Commission des crimes de guerre des Nations unies (UNWCS) chargée de dresser une liste des criminels de guerre nazis, celle-ci, ainsi que d'autres organismes nationaux, durent faire face à d'importants problèmes pratiques d'organisation, en particulier après 1947 et le déclenchement officiel de la Guerre Froide. L'échec du CROWCASS (Registre central des criminels de guerre et des suspects pour la sécurité), créé en mars 1945, est symptomatique de ce changement de priorité politique. De leur côté, certains d'entre eux s'organisaient, par exemple dans l'association d'entre-aide des ex-membres de la « Waffen-SS », la « Hilfsgemeinschaft auf Gegenseitigkeit der ehemaligen Angehörigen der Waffen-SS », créée en 1951 et dissoute en 1992.

Les Nazis qui échappèrent à la justice dans l'immédiat après-Guerre peuvent ainsi être classés en plusieurs catégories :

Ceux qui se sont suicidés.

Ceux qui ont été condamnés à mort mais ont réussi à ne pas être exécutés d'une manière ou d'une autre.

Ceux qui n'ont pas fait l'objet de procès ni de condamnation, pour une raison ou une autre (non-inscrit au CROWCASS, non arrêté, etc.) . Ceux-ci ont pu parfois continuer à vivre dans leur pays, soit sous la même identité, soit sous une fausse-identité, étant parfois employés par les services de renseignements de l'Ouest comme de l'Est (par exemple, Horst Kopkow, qui travailla pour le MI5 ; le chef du contre-espionnage Wilhelm Hötzl, qui travailla pour le « Counter Intelligence Corps » (CIC) américain ; nombre de membres de l'Organisation Gehlen, ancêtre du BND allemand, etc.) . D'autres, comme le SS letton Viktors Arājs, chef du tristement célèbre « Sonderkommando » Arājs, fut mystérieusement libéré par les Britanniques en 1946, pour n'être condamné à perpétuité qu'en 1979. Walter Rauff, un des inventeurs de la chambre à gaz mobile qui a tué des milliers de handicapés mentaux et de Juifs, fut employé par les services secrets de la RFA et protégé contre les poursuites en justice.

D'autres, parmi ceux-ci, se sont enfuis, en s'appuyant parfois sur des réseaux d'exfiltration des criminels de guerre. Ces réseaux ont fait l'objet d'une intense spéculation historique depuis la publication du roman ODESSA par Frederick Forsyth, en 1972, qui tenait la plupart de ses sources du chasseur de nazis controversé Simon Wiesenthal. Au-delà d'ODESSA, l'un des réseaux avérés fut celui de l'évêque catholique Alois Hudal, qui était proche du prêtre croate Krunoslav Draganović. Ces 2 prêtres firent beaucoup pour aider des fugitifs, dont Adolf Eichmann ou Klaus Barbie, à s'enfuir, souvent pour l'Amérique latine (en premier lieu, l'Argentine) .

Parmi ces fugitifs nazis, on peut citer, parmi les plus connus, Josef Mengele (mort en 1979) , Klaus Barbie (qui travailla pour la dictature bolivienne avant d'être rattrapé par la justice française) , Adolf Eichmann (jugé à Jérusalem) , Alois Brunner, Aribert Heim (recherché jusqu'à sa mort en 1992 au Caire, en Égypte) , le commandant de Treblinka Franz Stangl, l'aviateur letton Herberts Cukurs (exécuté par le Mossad) , le botaniste SS Heinz Brücher (devenu professeur en Argentine) , etc. Seule une partie de ces fugitifs ont été rattrapés par la justice.

Enfin, une partie, certes marginale, des anciens nazis, réussit à dissimuler son passé et à obtenir des postes politiques plus ou moins importants après la Guerre. Ceci a souvent suscité des scandales et leur démission quand leur fonction pendant le Nazisme fut révélée. On peut ainsi citer :

Kurt Georg Kiesinger, membre du NSDAP depuis 1933, qui travaillait au service de propagande de l'Office des Affaires étrangères, chargé de faire le lien avec le Ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande, et qui fut Chancelier fédéral de la RFA de 1966 à 1969.

Heinz Reinefarth, lieutenant-général (« Gruppenführer ») de la « Waffen-SS » et chef des SS et de la police (« Höherer der SS und Polizeiführer ») en Pologne, officier nazi important donc, qui échappa toutefois à toute inculpation et devint maire de Westerland (1951-1964) et député du Bloc des réfugiés au « Landtag » de Schleswig-Holstein à partir de 1958.

L'ex- « Gruppenführer » Wilhelm Harster, officiel important du ministère bavarois de l'Intérieur, qui dut démissionner après avoir pris la défense du criminel de guerre Erich Rajakowitsch, jugé à Vienne en 1965, puis fut lui-même à nouveau jugé et condamné en 1967.

Kurt Waldheim, secrétaire-général des Nations unies et président fédéral de l'Autriche de 1986 à 1992, est sans doute l'ex-nazi ayant eu les fonctions les plus importantes après-Guerre. Waldheim, qui avait été inscrit comme suspect sur la liste de l'UNWCS, était membre de la SA et fut « Oberleutnant » de la « Wehrmacht » sur le front de l'Est, et on s'intéressa beaucoup à son rôle lors de la bataille de Kozara en Bosnie, dans la 714e division d'infanterie dirigée par le général Friedrich Stahl. Bien que l'unité militaire dont il fit partie se fût rendue coupable d'exactions nombreuses, aucune preuve ne l'impliquant directement dans des crimes de guerre n'a pu cependant être fournie. Le Département de la Justice des États-Unis refusa toutefois, en 1987, de le laisser entrer sur le territoire national, en affirmant qu'il avait pris part à la déportation, au mauvais traitement et à l'exécution de civils et de soldats alliés durant la Guerre.

Le cas d'Hanns Martin Schleyer, « Untersturmführer-SS » puis représentant du patronat allemand est à part, dans la mesure où il fut assassiné par la RAF en 1977.

En 1953, le « Sozialistische Reichspartei », qui se présente comme successeur du NSDAP, est interdit. En 1964, le NPD (« Nationaldemokratische Partei Deutschlands ») est créé. Malgré des propos racistes et d'extrême-droite, le Parti n'est toujours pas interdit, même si cette question occupe régulièrement la classe politique allemande.

Dans les années 1980, l'affaire Klaus Barbie a suscité, aux États-Unis, l'« amendement Holtzman », voté entre autres par Ted Kennedy, et qui ajoutait la question sur le formulaire d'exemption de visa :

« Le visiteur étranger a-t-il été impliqué dans les persécutions nazies ? »

La justice américaine n'avait, en effet, aucune compétence juridictionnelle, au pénal, sur les étrangers. Aussi, dans le sillage de l'affaire Barbie, un service spécial fut créé à l'ICS (« Immigration and Custom Service ») chargé d'enquêter sur les suspects de crimes de guerre. Le cas échéant, et après procès, ceux-ci étaient expulsés du territoire. Des années plus tard, le président démocrate Bill Clinton signa, en 1998, le « Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act » qui a permis l'ouverture d'archives concernant les anciens membres du NSDAP, en particulier ceux employés ou contactés par la CIA (Opération « Paper-clip », etc.) ou d'autres agences de renseignement (notamment le « Counter Intelligence Corps »).

Le Royaume-Uni, également, vota, après un long débat, le « War Crimes Act 1991 », qui accordait à ses tribunaux une compétence juridictionnelle sur les personnes soupçonnées de crimes de guerre commis lors de la Guerre et ayant par la suite acquis la citoyenneté britannique. La seule personne jugée (et condamnée) en vertu de cette loi fut l'ex-SS Anthony Sawoniuk d'origine polonaise ou biélorusse.

Les Européens ne parviennent pas à s'entendre sur une loi commune à propos du Nazisme. En janvier 2007, le projet d'interdiction des symboles nazis par tous les pays membres de l'Union européenne a été rejeté. En effet, pour la communauté hindoue britannique, le svastika est avant tout un symbole de paix, et ceci depuis 5,000 ans.

L'incitation à la haine raciale et à la xénophobie sont passibles des délits punis de la même manière dans les 27 États membres, par des peines de 1 à 3 ans de prison. Mais le négationnisme n'est délictueux qu'en France, en Allemagne et en Autriche.

Pour l'historien spécialiste de la Shoah, Georges Bensoussan, la dénazification est une « farce » et une « illusion ». La grande majorité des Nazis coupables de crimes de guerre n'ont pas été jugés, seule une poignée de dignitaires ont comparu sous les pressions entre autres des autorités françaises. La dénazification s'est arrêtée très vite à cause de la Guerre Froide et de l'anti-communisme. Il donne l'exemple de criminels comme Adolf Eichmann jamais inquiété par l'Allemagne fédérale (qui savait où il était en 1951) et finalement arrêté par le Mossad, ou les 200 responsables du ghetto de Łódź dont seuls 4 ont été jugés. Bensoussan ne remet pas en cause la sincérité du mea-culpa officiel de l'Allemagne ; mais, pour lui, une partie importante des Allemands, difficile à quantifier, comprenant les « corps intermédiaires » et « une grande partie des élites », le plus souvent très éduqués, tels les membres de la « Gestapo » et les SS, est restée hitlérienne (mais pas forcément nazie) jusqu'au bout. C'est cependant méconnaître l'action du procureur général du « Land » de HeBe, Fritz Bauer, dans la poursuite des anciens Nazis et son rôle dans l'arrestation d'Eichmann.

...

Le projet de dénazification, destiné à éradiquer toute influence nazi des institutions, de la société, de l'économie et de la politique allemande, s'amorce dès 1943 avec la constitution d'une liste de criminels de guerre nazis susceptibles d'être jugés après-guerre.

La haine à l'égard des Allemands se focalise sur les soldats de la « Waffen-SS », « soldats politiques » fanatisés par des années d'endoctrinement. Le choc moral provoqué par la découverte des camps de concentrations et des camps d'exterminations renforce alors la détermination à punir les Nazis. À l'Ouest de l'Allemagne, les armées alliées capturent des centaines de milliers de prisonniers et appliquent la convention de Genève qui leur reconnaît des droits.

À l'Est, les armées soviétiques vouent une haine idéologique viscérale à la doctrine nazie et veulent se venger des massacres commis par les armées nazies sur leur territoire. N'appliquant pas la convention de Genève, ils déportent beaucoup de Nazis dans les Goulags de Sibérie, d'où très peu reviendront après la Guerre.

La conférence de Potsdam (juillet-août 1945) réunit les pays vainqueurs de l'Allemagne nazie. Ils décident alors d'appliquer les « 4 D » : Démocratiser ; Démilitariser ; Décartelliser l'économie ; et Dénazifier l'Allemagne. Il s'agit d'interdire le Parti nazi (8,5 millions de membres) et de punir les principaux cadres du régime hitlérien sans provoquer d'épuration massive. Le procès de Nuremberg juge 24 responsables du 3e « Reich », accusés de crimes contre l'humanité (terme créé spécialement pour la situation), de crimes contre la paix et de crimes de guerre.

Presque toutes les élites allemandes ont plus ou moins collaboré avec le régime hitlérien. Les résistants allemands anti-nazis, minoritaires, sont trop peu nombreux pour pouvoir gérer le pays. Français et Britanniques, après avoir épuré les principaux responsables, vont donc utiliser industriels et ingénieurs, même anciennement associés au Parti nazi, pour relancer la machine économique allemande. Dans la zone d'occupation américaine, les autorités veulent procéder à une dénazification administrative à l'aide d'un questionnaire, rapidement abandonné à cause de sa complexité.

Dans la zone soviétique, outre une traque féroce contre les Nazis, la dénazification est un prétexte pour arrêter les personnes jugées hostiles aux Communistes ; mais, rapidement, Staline ralentit la traque pour ménager les masses populaires qu'il espère faire adhérer au Communisme.

La dénazification est vécue en Allemagne comme une « punition injuste ». La loi de décembre 1949 prévoit une amnistie. La plupart sont innocentés et réhabilités. Parmi les 2,5 millions de Nazis jugés, seul 1,4 % sont reconnus coupables. Un tiers des dossiers n'aboutissent pas. De plus, beaucoup d'anciens Nazis échappent à la justice. Certains fuient vers l'Amérique latine, d'autres entrent en clandestinité. Seuls les « chasseurs de Nazis » ou le Mossad (Services secrets israéliens) traquent sans relâche les anciens responsables nazis.

La Guerre Froide met fin à la dénazification : la menace soviétique et la crise de Berlin provoquent la création de 2 États allemands et les alliés occidentaux redoutent une invasion soviétique. Ils autorisent donc la création d'associations d'anciens combattants allemands, qui pourraient, en cas d'invasion, constituer des réseaux de résistance. De ce fait, quelques Nazis sortent de prison.

Finalement, en 1968, le code pénal allemand provoque l'arrêt des enquêtes judiciaires. La société allemande tente alors de tourner la page sans pour autant oublier cette période douloureuse.

L'idée de juger les principaux responsables nazis s'impose pendant la Guerre. Cette idée, sans précédent dans l'histoire, s'explique par le caractère total du conflit. Le procès commence officiellement le 20 novembre 1945 et se termine le 1er octobre 1946. Il est alors suivi par le monde entier.

En juin 1945, à San Francisco pour la fondation de l'ONU, les pays vainqueurs décident de traduire les grands criminels de guerre devant un tribunal international avec des juges américains, français, anglais et soviétiques. Le choix de la ville est symbolique : en 1935, elle avait été le lieu du triomphe du Parti nazi et de la proclamation des lois qui avaient déchu les Juifs de la citoyenneté allemande et les avaient exclus de la communauté nationale. Les États-Unis sont les initiateurs des chefs d'accusation de complot et de crime contre la paix. Les Français et les Soviétiques, encore traumatisés par les massacres commis par les Nazis sur les populations civiles, ajoutent le crime de guerre et le crime contre l'humanité. Le terme génocide est employé pour définir l'extermination de 6 millions de Juifs, de Tsiganes, d'homosexuels et d'handicapés mentaux.

Le procès concerne 24 responsables politiques (dont le numéro 2 du régime hitlérien, Hermann Göring, chef de la « Luftwaffe »), militaires et économiques. Il concerne aussi 4 organisations : les SS et le SD (service de sécurité de la SS). À l'annonce des accusations, tous plaident non-coupables, invoquant soit leur absence de responsabilité personnelle, soit leur devoir d'obéissance aux ordres. La « solution finale » est alors évoquée, appuyée sur des témoignages des victimes qui avaient réussi à survivre à l'Holocauste. Au cours du procès, d'innombrables atrocités sont présentées devant un public choqué. Un nombre considérable de documents incontestables signés par les accusés prouve leur responsabilité.

La plupart des Nazis nient l'évidence et la réalité des faits. À propos de la Shoah, certains Nazis « ne savaient pas qu'il existait une politique visant à l'extermination des Juifs » et se contentent de reconnaître les « abus » de cette période. Les Soviétiques cherchent à faire porter la responsabilité du massacre de Katyn aux responsables nazis (22,000 officiers polonais y furent exécutés au printemps de 1940 par le NKVD) . Ce n'est qu'en novembre 2010 que la Russie en reconnaît la responsabilité.

Les sentences sont rendues le 1er octobre 1946 : 12 condamnations à mort par pendaison (Göring échappe à l'exécution en se suicidant la veille) ; des peines de prison variant de 10 ans à la perpétuité pour la plupart ; 3 acquittements. Le NSDAP, la « Gestapo », les SS et le SD sont jugés « organisations criminelles » la réalité incontestable du génocide est remise en cause par les révisionnistes qui s'efforcent de décrédibiliser la valeur des témoignages des survivants ou encore par les négationnistes qui nient l'existence même du génocide.

Malgré tout, l'« esprit » de Nuremberg a survécu : impossible à mettre en place pendant la Guerre Froide, 2 tribunaux internationaux ont été créés depuis la fin de cette période. Ils ont jugés les criminels de guerre de l'ex-Yougoslavie en 1993, et du génocide rwandais en 1994. La Cour pénale internationale a été créée en 2002 à la Haye.

Politique culturelle et dénazification dans la zone d'occupation française en Autriche (Tyrol et Vorarlberg) et à Vienne de 1945 à 1955 (1)

Extirper toute trace de ferveur et de soutien à l'idéologie nationale-socialiste, tel était le grand objectif de la France dans sa zone d'occupation en Autriche entre 1945 et 1955. Étant donné que les Français considéraient les Autrichiens comme des victimes du Nazisme, et non les promoteurs de cette idéologie, leur politique culturelle et leur tentative de dénazification n'ont obtenu qu'un succès limité. En condamnant trop vivement ceux qui avaient collaboré avec les Nazis, les Français risquaient de provoquer une grave crise sociale en Autriche, qui risquait de déstabiliser toute l'Europe centrale. Quant à la politique culturelle française, elle n'a pas permis de rattraper le terrain perdu par la langue française après 7 ans d'occupation nazie.

...

Lors de l'arrivée d'Adolf Hitler en Autriche, le 13 avril 1938, à Linz comme à Vienne, la foule criait :

« Un seul peuple, un seul " Reich ", un seul " Führer ". » (2)

L'idéologie nationale-socialiste a rencontré une très large audience en Autriche avec, pour résultat, que les 7 années d'occupation nazie ont profondément marqué les cœurs et les esprits. Extirper toute trace de ferveur et de soutien à cette idéologie extrémiste, tel était le mandat des troupes d'occupation françaises entre 1945 et 1955. Mais pour y parvenir, le général Antoine Béthouart (le commandant en chef des troupes françaises d'occupation en Autriche, de 1945 à 1950) et ses subalternes ont choisi d'agir avant tout dans le secteur culturel, afin de ne pas imposer la démocratie aux Autrichiens, mais de les convaincre de ses bienfaits. Une tâche de cette ampleur relevait plus de l'utopie que de la conviction profonde qu'une fois les troupes d'occupation de retour chez elles, plus aucune trace du national-socialisme n'allait subsister :

« Il est certainement plus aisé de rétablir une frontière que d'exorciser un peuple. La dénazification devait apparaître comme l'œuvre du gouvernement autrichien lui-même. Si les Nazis avaient été châtiés directement par les Alliés, ils seraient apparus comme des martyrs de l'occupation étrangère. Le résultat aurait été contraire au but recherché. » (3)

Les Autrichiens étaient considérés par les autorités françaises comme des victimes du Nazisme, et non les promoteurs de cette idéologie. C'est le désir de s'assurer la reconnaissance et la faveur des Autrichiens qui a prévalu sur une réelle prise en compte de la participation autrichienne dans le second conflit mondial. En se présentant comme des amis sincères, les Français voulaient s'assurer d'une meilleure pénétration de leur influence en Autriche. Convaincre et persuader plutôt qu'imposer, c'était le mot d'ordre de la France en Autriche.

UNE DÉNAZIFICATION RATÉE DANS L'ENSEIGNEMENT ET LES ARTS

Une fois que les Alliés sont arrivés en Autriche, ils se sont attaqués à l'épuration du personnel enseignant ayant soutenu ou appartenu au Parti nazi. Le Service Éducation a suivi 3 étapes distinctes dans cette opération d'épuration : une période empirique, une période intermédiaire et une période finale. (4)

La 1re période consistait à examiner l'ensemble des dossiers du personnel en fonction avant la rentrée scolaire d'octobre 1945. Le travail était effectué par une commission autrichienne, supervisée par un officier français n'ayant que le simple statut d'observateur. Ceux dont on étudiait le dossier étaient classés en 3 catégories : ceux qui n'avaient jamais été inscrits sur les listes du Parti nazi ou qui étaient publiquement hostiles aux Nazis (liste blanche) ; ceux qui avaient demandé leur adhésion au Parti mais qui étaient suspectés d'avoir agi sous la contrainte ou par crainte de perdre « leur situation » (liste grise) ; enfin, ceux qui étaient connus pour leur attachement au Parti nazi (liste noire). Les membres de la 1re catégorie conservaient leurs fonctions ; ceux de la seconde étaient provisoirement maintenus en poste, le temps qu'une autre commission procède à une enquête plus poussée devant déterminer leurs liens réels avec le Parti nazi. Les plus compromis, ceux de la dernière catégorie, étaient immédiatement licenciés. (5)

La période intermédiaire s'est appuyée sur la loi d'interdiction du Parti nazi, adoptée en 1945, et l'épuration a duré jusqu'au mois de février 1947. Les commissions d'épuration étaient composées d'un juriste président, d'un représentant du « Landeschulrat » et de 2 membres du personnel de la même catégorie que la personne qui était jugée. Les décisions de ces commissions devaient être approuvées par une commission supérieure qui siégeait auprès du chancelier fédéral. Le ministre de l'Instruction publique avait, dans un délai de 15 jours, le droit d'appel si les décisions ne lui apparaissaient pas tout à fait justifiées. (6)

La dernière période d'épuration a débuté avec l'adoption de la loi de dénazification de 1947 qui tenait désormais compte des fonctions qu'avait exercées le personnel enseignant au sein du Parti nazi, peu importe le moment, jusqu'à l'arrivée des Alliés en Autriche. (7)

Le ministre de France à Vienne, Louis de Monicault, a constaté que l'effet immédiat de cette loi a été de mettre un frein presque total aux travaux des commissions d'épuration administrative : (8)

« On peut se demander si les autorités autrichiennes sont, en réalité, aussi pressées qu'elles le prétendent d'utiliser l'instrument législatif qu'elles ont élaboré. D'autre part, certaines décisions judiciaires scandaleuses ont montré que les magistrats et les jurés sont de plus en plus enclins à l'indulgence, sinon à la faiblesse, en matière de dénazification. L'évasion de plusieurs Nazis " lourdement chargés " incarcérés à la prison centrale de Vienne, et parmi lesquels figurait au moins un criminel de guerre, a mis en lumière, non seulement le traitement bienveillant réservé aux plus fidèles partisans du régime hitlérien, mais également les complicités que ceux-ci sont toujours assurés de trouver dans la police et dans l'administration pénitentiaire. Diverses manifestations ont enfin dévoilé les multiples sympathies que le National-Socialisme conserve encore en Autriche. À Vienne comme dans plusieurs agglomérations de province, des inscriptions nazies ont été peintes sur les murs et des croix gammées répandues dans les rues. » (9)

Selon Louis de Monicault, le président Karl Renner aurait affirmé à la radio que sa fonction lui donnait le droit de gracier les Autrichiens les plus coupables, étant donné que la nouvelle loi de dénazification ne reposait sur aucun fondement juridique. (10)

La population autrichienne, quant à elle, considérait que, puisqu'il y avait 536,000 Nazis enregistrés après la Guerre, et qu'avec les membres de leur famille, ils représentaient le quart de la population, on ne pouvait pas tenir tous ces gens à l'écart de la vie politique et économique sans courir de grands risques. (11)

Même le Comité central du Parti communiste avait adopté une résolution en faveur des candidatures des petits Nazis. (12)

Louis de Monicault disait craindre que l'Élément soviétique tente de convaincre les autres Éléments du Conseil allié de mettre la loi en veilleuse. (13)

L'épuration a officiellement été complétée en 1948. (14)

Mais les organes de presse d'allégeance communiste étaient très critiques à l'égard de la dénazification en zone française d'occupation et accusaient l'Université d'Innsbruck d'être « un repaire de fascistes étrangers », puisque plusieurs anciens membres du Parti nazi continuaient d'y enseigner. Les autorités françaises se défendaient d'être responsables de la lenteur dans l'exécution des sanctions infligées aux membres du Parti nazi. Ils affirmaient qu'à plusieurs reprises, les décisions du Comité français d'épuration avaient été ajournées à la suite de l'intervention du ministère fédéral de l'Éducation. C'est ainsi que les 11 professeurs de l'Université d'Innsbruck, qui avaient été suspendus de façon immédiate ou conditionnelle, ont pu demeurer en poste, le temps que leur dossier soit envoyé à Vienne « pour complément d'information ». (15)

L'épuration du personnel de l'Université d'Innsbruck était effectuée par 3 organismes : le Conseil rectoral, qui était composé de professeurs autrichiens et d'un observateur français ; le Comité supérieur d'épuration, présidé par un représentant du gouvernement militaire français et qui devait statuer en cas de désaccord au sein du Conseil rectoral ; enfin, le Comité d'épuration du ministère fédéral de l'Éducation prenait des décisions qui étaient indépendantes des 2

autres organismes. (16)

C'était justement le mode de décision de ce dernier comité qui expliquait les dérapages évoqués par Louis de Monicault :

« Cet exemple, pris entre d'autres, traduit la faiblesse des autorités autrichiennes, dont l'attitude entrave souvent l'exécution normale de l'épuration et risque même de prêter à des soupçons de duplicité. » (17)

Préoccupation que partageait le ministre français des Affaires étrangères :

« J'ai l'honneur d'attirer votre attention sur les conséquences fâcheuses que pourrait avoir la prolongation d'un tel état des choses. C'est, en effet, une des tâches essentielles de la Mission française de contrôle de veiller à l'application des mesures de dénazification dans la zone française d'occupation. » (18)

Le cas du professeur du lycée de Fulpmes, monsieur Descotes, illustre très bien le fait que les autorités françaises étaient très susceptibles sur la question de la dénazification des Autrichiens. Monsieur Descotes a publié un petit livre intitulé « Le Nazisme et l'enseignement secondaire en Autriche ». Les autorités françaises étaient outrées de ne pas avoir été informées de la réalisation de cette étude, ni d'avoir été consultées durant sa réalisation. On reprochait aussi à monsieur Descotes de ne pas avoir respecté son devoir de fonctionnaire, celui d'informer ses supérieurs qu'il réalisait une étude, avant la publication des résultats obtenus. Nous n'avons trouvé aucune trace de cette étude dans les archives. Nous croyons toutefois que même si l'étude avait des lacunes, comme le prétendaient les autorités françaises, les constatations qu'elle contenait étaient révélatrices. C'est du moins la conclusion à laquelle nous arrivons après avoir consulté une quantité importante d'archives. Conclusion qu'a confirmée André Malavoy, ancien attaché culturel et professeur à Innsbruck, dans l'entretien qu'il nous a accordé en 2003 :

« J'ai profité de plusieurs séjours à la campagne, et là, je sentais un certain regret, une certaine nostalgie. Cela m'a moins marqué qu'à Berlin, chose curieuse, j'y ai trouvé moins de traces, de rémanences du Nazisme, que j'en ai trouvées au Tyrol. Cela, j'en ai l'expérience directe. Peut-être parce que Berlin était cosmopolite. Le Tyrol, pour sa part, était un peu renfermé sur lui-même. La dénazification a existé, mais on ne peut extirper par la force ce qu'il y a dans la tête de quelqu'un. Le plan de dénazification devait être appliqué par la persuasion, non par la force. » (19)

Dans le secteur culturel, la dénazification n'a pas été plus facile. Étant donné que la dénazification de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne était incomplète, les Services français d'action culturelle ont annulé une grande manifestation culturelle franco-autrichienne. Lorsque le temps est venu d'accorder les passeports aux musiciens autrichiens, le ministre de l'Intérieur s'est aperçu que 30 des 91 musiciens de l'Orchestre avaient été membres du Parti nazi et que l'un d'eux avait adhéré aux « Hitler-Jugend ». (20)

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne avait aussi refusé de participer aux cérémonies d'inauguration de l'exposition anti-fasciste « Niemals vergessen », ce qui n'a pas aidé sa cause auprès de la Commission quadripartite de dénazification. Le général Chérière, l'adjoint du général Béthouart, a néanmoins donné des instructions à son personnel pour « porter remède au préjudice financier ainsi causé à l'Orchestre par ce fâcheux incident » . (21)

Ce qui suppose que le général Chérière n'était pas tout à fait d'accord avec la décision d'annuler l'événement culturel franco-autrichien ci-dessus mentionné, parce qu'elle risquait de compromettre les relations diplomatiques franco-autrichiennes.

Le général Béthouart écrit dans ses mémoires que les Nazis les plus compromis ont été sanctionnés par des saisies pouvant atteindre 40 % de leurs biens. On leur imposait aussi une majoration d'impôts de 10 % pendant un certain nombre d'années. Ces mesures auraient été imposées à 42,000 Autrichiens dont 6,000 qui se trouvaient en zone française d'occupation. Les moins compromis (481,000 dans l'ensemble du pays et 80,000 en zone française d'occupation) étaient beaucoup moins sévèrement sanctionnés, et dans certains cas pas du tout. Un total de 72,000 agents de l'administration et des services publics aurait été révoqué par le gouvernement autrichien. (22)

Mais comme le général Béthouart craignait que ces condamnations sèment les germes de la révolte et renforce l'hitlérisme, lors du Conseil allié du 25 septembre 1947, il a proposé et obtenu que le Conseil prescrive au gouvernement autrichien d'adopter une loi d'amnistie pour gracier les plus jeunes des moins compromis. (23)

Le 21 avril 1948, 487,000 anciens nazis sur 524,000 ont été amnistiés. (24)

QUELQUES ELÉMENTS DE LA POLITIQUE CULTURELLE FRANÇAISE

Les troupes d'occupation françaises ont fait leur entrée dans le Vorarlberg le 29 avril 1945 et, le 10 juillet, dans le Tyrol à la suite des Américains. Le général Béthouart a fait part de ses objectifs le 7 décembre 1945 et ils sont demeurés les mêmes durant les 5 années de son commandement en Autriche et après son départ. Les troupes d'occupation françaises devaient contribuer à l'établissement d'une Autriche libre et indépendante, faire disparaître les idéologies pan-germaniste et national-socialiste, en mettant en valeur tout ce qui était spécifiquement autrichien par opposition à ce qui était allemand, renforcer la dénazification par une action sur les esprits, orienter la jeunesse vers une formation plus humaine et atteindre les masses directement ou à travers leurs élites, afin de donner un caractère durable à l'action de la France en Autriche, enfin, ne pas limiter la propagande française aux secteurs culturel et artistique, mais aussi aux questions sociales et économiques. (25)

Les Instituts français de Vienne et d'Innsbruck étaient au centre de l'action culturelle française en Autriche. S'ajoutaient les différentes Sociétés France-Autriche que l'on retrouvait dans toutes les provinces autrichiennes, ainsi que l'Union des amis de l'Autriche. Les subventions du ministère des Affaires étrangères étaient principalement destinées aux échanges culturels, à l'enseignement et aux œuvres, à la propagande et aux services de presse et de documentation. Les principales dépenses étaient consacrées à l'enseignement du français et aux œuvres, aux échanges culturels, à la documentation, à l'information et à l'édition. Le ministère des Affaires étrangères accordait aussi de l'importance aux bourses, aux rencontres internationales, aux camps de jeunesse et aux échanges d'étudiants et de professeurs. (26)

Le 15 mars 1947, un accord culturel franco-autrichien a été signé. Il visait 2 grands objectifs officiels : développer la collaboration entre la France et l'Autriche dans le domaine éducatif, pédagogique, universitaire, littéraire, scientifique et artistique. En second lieu, il devait compléter celui signé entre les 2 pays le 2 avril 1936, en tenant compte des nouvelles circonstances. (27)

Une des clauses les plus importantes de cet accord était l'article 9 stipulant que le gouvernement autrichien s'engageait, à tous les niveaux, à réserver une place de 1er rang à l'étude de la langue et de la civilisation françaises, de manière à ce que cette étude ne soit placée en aucun cas dans une situation d'infériorité par rapport à aucune autre langue vivante. (28)

Même si cette clause représentait en théorie un très grand succès diplomatique des négociateurs français, dans les faits, cet article a constamment été violé. Sans contraintes juridiques, il ne s'agissait que de bonnes intentions.

Un rapport daté du 7 avril 1955 sur l'enseignement du français en Autriche est d'ailleurs accablant : la plupart des établissements scolaires primaires enseignaient seulement l'anglais, alors que, dans l'enseignement secondaire, la place de l'anglais demeurait prédominante et le français y était enseigné à titre facultatif. Pourtant, cette situation n'a pas empêché le français de gagner un peu de terrain. Quant à l'enseignement supérieur, des cours de français étaient offerts dans toutes les institutions, alors que, dans l'enseignement technique, le français était facultatif dans presque tous les cas. C'est dans l'enseignement commercial (dans 12 établissements sur 14, soit quelque 8,000 élèves) que le français avait le plus de succès. Enfin, dans le secteur de l'enseignement populaire, qui était très développé en Autriche, les adultes habitant la Styrie, Vienne, le Tyrol et le Vorarlberg bénéficiaient de cours de français, alors que ceux des autres régions se heurtaient à des difficultés locales. En 1955, 436 professeurs enseignaient le français en Autriche. (29)

Un professeur de français dans les lycées autrichiens d'Innsbruck, Otto Maleczek, était très pessimiste sur l'avenir du français dans son allocution prononcée au Congrès international des professeurs de langues vivantes à Paris :

« Tout d'abord, je tiens à exprimer un regret. Personne n'est venu dire un mot sur la situation précaire où se trouve le français - au moins dans certains pays. Le français est nettement en régression chez nous en Autriche et en Allemagne. Je n'y comprends plus rien. Les Français choisissent l'allemand ou l'anglais, les Anglais, le français et nous autres, Autrichiens et Allemands, pourquoi hésitons-nous à faire le choix qui s'impose ? » (30)

Voilà qui démontre bien la difficulté rencontrée par la France pour faire de nouveau du français une langue influente en Autriche. Les Français étaient en constante concurrence avec leurs Alliés occidentaux, notamment américains, qui, eux, étaient dotés de fonds et de moyens beaucoup plus importants pour promouvoir leur langue.

LES SECRETS DE LA POLITIQUE CULTURELLE FRANÇAISE

Notre recherche a permis de découvrir que le gouvernement français détenait des participations financières secrètes dans le secteur culturel par le biais de personnes qui étaient à la solde des troupes d'occupation françaises. La librairie Kosmos avait le mandat de vendre des livres français aux Autrichiens ; le trio « Abendland Verlag », Service d'édition et « Golf Verlag » devaient éditer et diffuser des ouvrages susceptibles de favoriser directement ou indirectement l'influence française ; la Librairie Hirn d'Innsbruck vendait des livres français fournis par la Direction de l'Information. Enfin, les Français détenaient une participation dans la « Wagnerische Universitäts Buchdruckerei » (WUB), une des plus importantes imprimeries de l'ouest de l'Autriche. (31)

Le cas de la radiodiffusion est particulièrement intéressant à analyser, en raison du caractère secret de certaines de ses activités. Les stations de Dornbirn et d'Innsbruck appartenaient aux provinces du Tyrol et du Vorarlberg, mais elles avaient été remises en service par les autorités françaises d'occupation, qui assuraient la direction des programmes, de même que le contrôle administratif et financier des émetteurs, du moins jusqu'à la signature de l'accord de contrôle de 1946. Par la suite, le contrôle administratif a été remis aux Autrichiens et les Français n'ont conservé que le contrôle sur les émissions et les participations au programme. (32)

Étant donné que les 2 radios ne pouvaient fonctionner que grâce à l'équipement prêté par les autorités françaises (d'une valeur de 668,000 Francs), ces dernières voulaient négocier la cession du matériel en échange de contrats de publicité d'assez longue durée avec les 2 stations, afin de conserver leur influence dans leurs 2 provinces d'occupation. (33)

Finalement, un accord de principe est intervenu, entre le délégué de la Radiodiffusion française et le directeur de Radio-Vorarlberg, pour une somme de 400,000 Francs. En ce qui concerne Radio-Dornbirn, le chef de l'Information, monsieur Gallifet, était d'avis que la Radiodiffusion française devait renoncer à ses droits sur le matériel (400,000 Francs), à condition que Radio-Dornbirn s'engage à consacrer 1 heure par semaine à une émission culturelle française après l'Occupation. (34)

D'autre part, le général Béthouart a pris la décision secrète d'augmenter la puissance des stations de radio d'Aldrans et de Dornbirn, en collaboration avec les PTT autrichiens. Aucune information concernant ce projet ne devait être communiquée aux milieux autrichiens extra-gouvernementaux et étrangers. En cas de brouillages, la puissance des stations d'Aldrans et de Dornbirn devait être immédiatement diminuée. (35)

En agissant ainsi, les Services de l'Information voulaient résoudre les problèmes liés au caractère montagneux du Tyrol, qui empêchait la population des 4/5 du pays d'obtenir une bonne réception. Les émissions françaises étaient, par ailleurs, difficilement captées à Vienne à cause de l'insuffisance des récepteurs que possédaient les Viennois. Il a donc fallu compléter le système de radiodiffusion par l'installation d'émetteurs relais synchronisés à Mayerhofen, Kufstein et Landeck. (36)

Conclusion

L'histoire de l'occupation française en Autriche se termine avec la signature du traité d'État le 15 mai 1955 et l'adoption de la loi constitutionnelle relative à la neutralité de l'Autriche, adoptée à l'unanimité le 26 octobre, ce qui a permis aux autorités du pays de récupérer le plein contrôle de leurs affaires intérieures et extérieures. Nous croyons avoir démontré que la dénazification totale des Autrichiens fut un échec. L'Est et l'Ouest étaient en pleine Guerre Froide, la France connaissait de graves crises gouvernementales, la Légion étrangère avait besoin de soldats pour la guerre d'Indochine et pour défendre les acquis coloniaux. Les Français ne pouvaient donc se passer du soutien des Autrichiens et de leur contribution directe dans les combats qu'ils menaient contre le Communisme et le mouvement de décolonisation. L'occupant français ne pouvait donc pas se permettre d'être trop dur avec les Nazis autrichiens : les Français avaient besoin d'eux, autant économiquement que militairement. En condamnant trop vivement ceux qui avaient collaboré avec les Nazis, les Français risquaient de provoquer une grave crise sociale en Autriche, ce qui n'aurait pas manqué de déstabiliser toute l'Europe centrale.

Quant à la politique culturelle française, elle n'a pas permis de rattraper le terrain perdu par la langue française après 7 ans d'occupation nazie. Le faible attrait des Autrichiens pour la langue française a grandement limité l'influence française dans ce pays. Par contre, les Instituts français existent toujours et continuent de faire rayonner la culture française. Celui d'Innsbruck a fêté son 50e anniversaire en 1996 et a publié ses actes de colloque la même année. On ne doit donc pas parler d'échec complet.

Par ailleurs, l'occupant français souhaitait contribuer à l'établissement d'une Autriche libre et indépendante, ce qui était chose faite avec la signature du traité d'État et l'adoption de la loi constitutionnelle relative à la neutralité de l'Autriche. Les Français voulaient aussi faire disparaître les idéologies pan-germaniste et nationale-socialiste en valorisant ce qui était spécifiquement autrichien par rapport à ce qui était allemand dans la culture autrichienne. En 1955, l'Autriche et l'Allemagne étaient bel et bien 2 pays distincts.

N'ayant obtenu sa zone d'occupation que le 10 avril 1945, la France n'a visiblement pas eu le temps de concevoir une politique culturelle à la hauteur de ses ambitions et a souvent été appelée à improviser. Le fait qu'elle ne s'attendait pas à rester si longtemps en Autriche, a aussi contribué à donner un caractère éphémère à son action culturelle, puisqu'elle ne savait pas de combien de temps elle disposait. Le général Béthouart en fait d'ailleurs mention dans ses mémoires. Il faut tout de même reconnaître le pragmatisme du haut-commissariat dans le secteur de la radiodiffusion, puisqu'il a secrètement et considérablement augmenté la puissance d'émission des radios francophiles du Tyrol et du Vorarlberg afin que les Viennois puissent eux aussi bénéficier des émissions françaises. De même, il faut reconnaître l'audace et le risque qu'il a couru en utilisant des Autrichiens à son service pour se porter acquéreur de participations dans un certain nombre d'organes de presse ou d'entreprises chargées de faire la promotion du « génie français » .

Notes

(1) Cet article est tiré d'un mémoire de maîtrise, dirigé par le Professeur Paul Létourneau et soutenu à l'Université de Montréal, sur La politique culturelle de la France dans sa zone d'occupation en Autriche (Tyrol et Vorarlberg) et à Vienne entre 1945 et 1955, qui sera publié par les Presses de l'Université Laval (Québec) à l'automne 2005 au Canada et, en Europe, avec une préface de Corine Defrance et une postface d'André Malavoy.

(2) Ian Kershaw. « Hitler 1936-1945 : Némésis », Flammarion, Paris (2000) ; pages 129-130.

(3) Général Antoine Béthouart. « Où va l'Autriche ? », Cahiers de politique étrangère du journal des nations américaines, nouvelle série, cahier XXV (février-mars 1948) ; page 213.

(4) Ministère des Relations extérieures, Archives diplomatiques, Paris, ci-après MAE, AOFAA, Autriche, zone d'occupation française en Autriche, éducation, 1945-1954, AUT 3111 d.10B, Rapport sur l'œuvre accomplie par le Service Éducation depuis septembre 1945, daté du 11 juillet 1950 ; pages 9-11.

(5) Ibid. ; pages 9-10.

(6) Ibid. ; page 10.

(7) Ibid. ; page 11.

(8) MAE, AOFAA, Autriche, Vienne, Bilan de l'occupation française en Autriche, etc. , 1945-1947, AUT 329/6, note de Louis de Monicault, ministre de France à Vienne au ministre des Affaires étrangères Georges Bidault, le 23 mai 1947 ; page 1.

(9) Ibid. ; pages 1-2.

(10) Ibid. ; page 4.

(11) Ibid. ; page 5.

(12) La récupération des petits Nazis a aussi été effectuée en Allemagne par tous les occupants, en zones occidentales d'occupation, comme en zone soviétique.

(13) Ibid. ; page 5.

(14) AUT 3111 d.10B, loco Citato ; page 11.

(15) MAE, série Z Europe, Autriche 1944-1949, août 1945 à juin 1949, n° 127, note de Louis de Monicault, représentant politique en Autriche, datée du 17 septembre 1946.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Ibid. , note du ministre des Affaires étrangères au commissaire général pour les Affaires allemandes et autrichiennes, le 30 septembre 1946.

(19) Entretien avec André Malavoy, attaché culturel français en Allemagne (1947-1948) et en Autriche (1948-1949) , réalisé le 16 décembre 2003.

(20) L'adhésion aux « Hitler-Jugend » était obligatoire pour tous les jeunes à partir du mois de mars 1939. Les Alliés et le gouvernement autrichien ne pouvaient donc pas reprocher aux jeunes Autrichiens d'avoir rejoint les rangs de l'organisation.

(21) Archives rapatriées de l'ambassade de France à Vienne, questions culturelles autrichiennes, musique : concerts, chorales, philharmonique, etc. , 1945-1956, Vienne 199/2, le général Chèrière adjoint du haut-commissaire de la République française en Autriche au ministre fédéral de l'Instruction publique, le 25 septembre 1946.

(22) Général Antoine Béthouart. « La bataille pour l'Autriche » , Presses de la Cité, Paris (1966) ; page 119.

(23) Une amnistie des plus jeunes a aussi été prononcée dans les zones occidentales d'occupation en Allemagne.

(24) Ibid. ; pages 120-121.

(25) MAE, AOFAA, Archives rapatriées de l'ambassade de France à Vienne, questions culturelles, expansion culturelle, organisation générale, 1945-1955, 189/1, Béthouart, le 7 décembre 1945.

(26) Selon les chiffres et les priorités identifiées dans les budgets des Instituts français de Vienne et d'Innsbruck, de l'Association française d'action artistique, du ministère des Affaires étrangères, du haut-commissariat aux Affaires allemandes et autrichiennes, entre 1945-1955. Ces archives proviennent des fonds suivants : Occupation française en Allemagne et en Autriche, Direction générale des relations culturelles et artistiques et enfin des archives diplomatiques.

(27) MAE, série Z Europe, Autriche 1944-1949, août 1945 à juin 1949, n° 127, 15 mars 1947, « Accord culturel entre la République française et la République d'Autriche » ; pages 248-250.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Dossiers rapatriés, ambassade de France à Vienne, Culturel, Diffusion et enseignement du français en Autriche, émissions éducatives de la radiodiffusion française, 1946-1955, Vienne, 176/4, 7 avril 1955, Rapport concernant l'enseignement du français en Autriche, signé E. Chastel.

(30) Ibid. , 16 avril 1953, texte de l'allocation du Docteur Otto Maleczek.

(31) MAE, AOFAA, État des travaux de la Commission inter-ministérielle chargée de la liquidation des gestions d'intérêt français d'occupation en Allemagne et en Autriche à la date du 1er mars 1953, 2e partie, Autriche, 8 avril 1953, de l'ambassadeur de France et haut-commissaire de la République en Autriche à l'attention de monsieur Haulpetit-Fourichon.

(32) Vienne, Carton 113, radiodiffusion autrichienne, 1945-1955, fiche radio Tyrol et Vorarlberg, 1947-1949, note non signée adressée au ministre de France à Vienne, le 11 février 1948.

(33) Ibid. , et note non signée pour le haut-commissaire adjoint, le 19 février 1948.

(34) MAE, AOFAA, Autriche, Direction de la Mission pour les provinces du Tyrol et du Vorarlberg, Information, 1945-1955, AUT 3129, d.35, note de monsieur Gallifet au haut-commissaire Béthouart, le 25 mai 1949.

(35) Ibid. , décision confidentielle du haut-commissaire de la République française en Autriche relative à l'augmentation de la puissance des postes d'Aldrans et de Dornbirn situés dans la zone française d'occupation, le 23 avril 1948.

(36) MAE, AOFAA, Autriche, Direction de la Mission pour les provinces du Tyrol et du Vorarlberg, radio et télévision, revue de presse tyrolienne, 1945-1955, AUT 3129, d.35/1, note de Gallifet au chef de la Mission pour les provinces du Tyrol et du Vorarlberg, le 11 décembre 1950. Aussi Vienne, carton 113, radiodiffusion autrichienne, 1945-1955, fiche radio, émissions françaises, note rédigée par le ministre plénipotentiaire représentant politique de la République française en Autriche au ministre des Affaires étrangères Bidault datant probablement du 31 mai 1946.

...

Denazification (« Entnazifizierung ») was an Allied initiative to rid German and Austrian society, culture, press, economy, judiciary, and politics of any remnants of the National-Socialist ideology (Nazism) . It was carried-out specifically by removing from positions of power and influence those who had been Nazi Party members and by disbanding or rendering impotent the organizations associated with Nazism. The program of denazification was launched after the end of the Second World War and was solidified by the Potsdam Agreement.

The term denazification was first coined as a legal term in 1943, in the Pentagon, intended to be applied in a narrow sense with reference to the post-War German legal system. Soon afterward, it took on the more general meaning.

Denazification in Germany was attempted through a series of directives issued by the Allied Control Council, seated in Berlin, beginning in January 1946. « Denazification directives » identified specific people and groups and outlined judicial procedures and guide-lines for handling them. Though all the occupying forces had agreed on the initiative, the methods used for denazification and the intensity with which they were applied differed between the occupation zones.

Denazification also refers to the removal of the physical symbols of the Nazi regime. For example, in 1957, the West German government re-issued World War II Iron Cross medals, among other decorations, without the swastika in the center.

About 8.5 million Germans, or 10 % of the population, had been members of the Nazi Party. Nazi-related organizations also had huge memberships, such as the German Labour Front (25 million) ; the National-Socialists People's Welfare organization (17 million) ; the League of German Women ; Hitler Youth ; the Doctors' League ; and others. It was through the Party and these organizations that the Nazi State was run, involving as many as 45 million Germans in total. In addition, Nazism found significant support among industrialists, who produced weapons or used slave labour, and large landowners, especially the « Junkers » in Prussia. Denazification after the surrender of Germany was, thus, an enormous undertaking, fraught with many difficulties.

The 1st difficulty was the enormous number of Germans who might have to be 1st investigated, then, penalized if found to have supported the Nazi State to an unacceptable degree. In the early months of denazification, there was a great will to be utterly thorough, to investigate everyone and hold every supporter of Nazism to account ; however, it turned-out that the numbers simply made that goal impractical. It soon became evident, too, that pursuing denazification too scrupulously would make it impossible to create a functioning, democratic society in Germany, one that would be able to support itself economically and not become a burden on the victorious nations. Enforcing the strictest sanctions against lesser offenders would prevent too many talented people from participating in the reconstruction process. The Morgenthau Plan had recommended that the Allies create a post-War Germany with all its industrial capacity destroyed, reduced to a level of subsistence farming ; however, that plan was soon abandoned as unrealistic and too likely, because of its punitiveness, to give rise to German anger and aggressiveness. As time went on, another consideration that moderated the denazification effort in the West was the concern to keep enough good will of the German population to prevent the growth of Communism.

The denazification process was often completely disregarded by both the Soviets and the Western powers for German rocket scientists and other technical experts, who were taken-out of Germany to work on projects in the victor's own country or simply seized in order to prevent the other side from taking them. The U.S. sent 785 scientists and engineers from Germany to the United States, some of whom formed the back-bone of the U.S. space program.

In the case of the top-ranking Nazis, such as Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß, Joachim von Ribbentrop, Julius Streicher, and Albert Speer, the initial proposal by the British was to simply arrest them and shoot them, but that course of action was replaced by putting them on trial for War crimes at the Nuremberg Trials in order to publicize their crimes while demonstrating that the trials and the sentences were just, especially to the German people. However, the legal foundations of the trials were questioned, and the German people were not convinced that the trials were anything more than « victors' justice » .

Many refugees from Nazism were Germans and Austrians, and some had fought for Britain in the Second World War. Some were transferred into the Intelligence Corps and sent-back to Germany and Austria in British uniform. However, German-speakers were small in number in the British zone, which was hampered by the language deficit. The Americans were able to bring a larger number of German-speakers to the task of working in the Allied Military Government, although many were poorly trained. They were assigned to all aspects of military administration, the interrogation of POWs, collecting evidence for the War Crimes Investigation Unit and the search for war criminals.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff Directive 1067 directed U.S. Army General Dwight D. Eisenhower's policy of denazification.

A report of the Institute on Re-education of the Axis Countries in June 1945 recommended :

« Only an inflexible long-term occupation authority will be able to lead the Germans to a fundamental revision of their recent political philosophy. »

The United States military pursued denazification in a zealous, albeit bureaucratic, fashion, especially during the 1st months of the occupation. It had been agreed among the Allies that denazification would begin by requiring Germans to fill-out a questionnaire (« Fragebogen ») about their activities and memberships during the 3rd « Reich ». 5 categories were established : Major Offenders, Offenders, Lesser Offenders, Followers, and Exonerated Persons. The Americans, unlike the British, French, and Soviets, interpreted this to apply to every German over the age of 18 in their zone. Eisenhower initially estimated that the denazification process would take 50 years.

When the nearly complete list of Nazi Party memberships was turned-over to the Allies (by a German anti-Nazi who had rescued it from destruction in April 1945, as American troops advanced on Munich) , it became possible to verify claims about participation or non-participation in the Party. The 1.5 million Germans who had joined before Adolf Hitler came to power were deemed to be hard-core Nazis.

Progress was slowed by the overwhelming numbers of Germans to be processed, but also by difficulties such as incompatible power systems and power outages, with the Hollerith IBM data machine that held the American vetting list in Paris. As many as 40,000 forms could arrive in a single-day to await processing. By December 1945, even though a full 500,000 forms had been processed, there remained a back-log of 4,000,000 forms from POWs and a potential case load of 7,000,000. The « Fragebogen » were, of course, filled-out in German. The number of Americans working on denazification was inadequate to handle the work-load, partly as a result of the demand in the U.S. by families to have soldiers returned home. Replacements were mostly unskilled and poorly trained. In addition, there was too much work to be done to complete the process of denazification by 1947, the year American troops were expected to be completely withdrawn from Europe.

Pressure also came from the need to find Germans to run their own country. In January 1946, a directive came from the Control Council entitled « Removal from Office and from Positions of Responsibility of Nazis and Persons Hostile to Allied Purposes ». One of the punishments for Nazi involvement was to be barred from public office and/or restricted to manual labour or « simple work ». At the end of 1945, 3.5 million former Nazis awaited classification, many of them barred from work in the meantime. By the end of the winter of 1945-1946, 42 % of public officials had been dismissed. Malnutrition was wide-spread, and the economy needed leaders and workers to help clear away debris, rebuild infrastructure, and get foreign exchange to buy food and other essential resources.

Another concern leading to the Americans relinquishing responsibility for denazification and handing it over to the Germans arose from the fact that many of the American denazifiers were German Jews, former refugees returning to administer justice against the tormentors and killers of their relatives. It was felt, both among Germans and top-American officials, that their objectivity might be contaminated by a desire for revenge.

As a result of these various pressures, and following a 15 January 1946 a report of the Military Government decrying the efficiency of denazification, saying, « The present procedure fails in practice to reach a substantial number of persons who supported or assisted the Nazis », it was decided to involve Germans in the process. In March 1946, The Law for Liberation from National-Socialism and Militarism (« Befreiungsgesetz ») came into effect, turning-over responsibility for denazification to the Germans. Each zone had a Minister of Denazification. On 1 April 1946, a special law established 545 civilian tribunals under German administration (« Spruchkammern ») , with a staff of 22,000 of mostly lay judges, enough, perhaps, to start to work but too many for all the staff themselves to be thoroughly investigated and cleared. They had a case load of 900,000. Several new regulations came into effect in the setting-up of the German-run tribunals, including the idea that the aim of denazification was now rehabilitation rather than merely punishment, and that someone whose guilt might meet the formal criteria could also have their specific actions taken into consideration for mitigation. Efficiency thus improved, while rigour declined.

Many people had to fill in a new background form, called a « Meldebogen » (replacing the widely-disliked « Fragebogen ») , and were given over to justice under a « Spruchkammer » , which assigned them to one of 5 categories :

V. Persons Exonerated (« Entlastete ») . No sanctions.

IV. Followers (« Mitläufer ») . Possible restrictions on travel, employment, political rights, plus fines.

III. Lesser Offenders (« Minderbelastete ») . Placed on probation for 2 or 3 years with a list of restrictions. No internment.

II. Offenders : Activists, Militants, and Profiteers, or Incriminated Persons (« Belastete ») . Subject to immediate arrest and imprisonment up to 10 years performing reparation or reconstruction work plus a list of other restrictions.

I. Major Offenders (« Hauptschuldige ») . Subject to immediate arrest, death, imprisonment with or without hard labour, plus a list of lesser sanctions.

Again, because the caseload was impossibly large, the German tribunals began to look for ways to speed-up the process. Unless their crimes were serious, members of the Nazi Party, born after 1919, were exempted on the grounds that they had been brain-washed. Disabled veterans were also exempted. To avoid the necessity of a slow trial in open court, which was required for those belonging to the most serious categories, more than 90 % of cases were judged not to belong to the serious categories and, therefore, were dealt with more quickly. More « efficiencies » followed. The tribunals accepted statements from other people regarding the accused's involvement in National-Socialism. These statements earned the nickname of « Persilscheine » , after advertisements for the laundry and whitening detergent « Persil » . There was corruption in the system, with Nazis buying and selling denazification certificates on the black-market. Nazis who were found guilty were often punished with fines assessed in « Deutsche Marks » , which had become nearly worthless. In Bavaria, the Denazification Minister, Anton Pfeiffer, bridled under the « victor's justice » , and presided over a system that re-instated 75 % of officials the Americans had dismissed, and re-classified 60 % of senior Nazis. The denazification process lost a great deal of credibility, and there was often local hostility against Germans who helped administer the tribunals.

By early 1947, the Allies held 90,000 Nazis in detention ; another 1,900,000 were forbidden to work as anything but manual labourers.

By 1948, the Cold War was clearly in progress and the United States began to worry more about a threat from the Eastern Bloc rather than the latent Nazism within occupied Germany. The remaining cases were tried through summary proceedings that left insufficient time to thoroughly investigate the accused, so that many of the judgments of this period have questionable judicial value. For example, by 1952, members of the SS like Otto Skorzeny could be declared formally denazified (« entnazifiziert ») « in absentia » by a German government arbitration board and without any proof that this was true.

The delicate task of distinguishing those truly complicit in or responsible for Nazi activities from mere « followers » made the work of the courts, yet, more difficult.

U.S. President Harry S. Truman alluded to this problem :

« Though all Germans might not be guilty for the War, it would be too difficult to try to single-out for better treatment those who had nothing to do with the Nazi regime and its crimes. »

Denazification was, from then on, supervised by special German ministers, like the Social-Democrat Gottlob Kamm in Baden-Württemberg, with the support of the U.S. occupation forces.

Contemporary American critics of denazification denounced it as a « counter-productive witch-hunt » and a failure ; in 1951, the provisional West German government granted amnesties to lesser offenders and ended the program.

While judicial efforts were handed-over to German authorities, the U.S. Army continued its efforts to denazify Germany through control of German media. The Information Control Division of the U.S. Army had, by July 1946, taken control of 37 German newspapers, 6 radio stations, 314 theaters, 642 cinemas, 101 magazines, 237 book-publishers, and 7,384 book-dealers and printers. Its main mission was democratization but part of the agenda was also the prohibition of any criticism of the Allied occupation forces. In addition, on May 13, 1946, the Allied Control Council issued a directive for the confiscation of all media that could contribute to Nazism or militarism. As a consequence, a list was drawn-up of over 30,000 book-titles, ranging from school text-books to poetry, which were then banned. All copies of books on the list were confiscated and destroyed ; the possession of a book on the list was made a punishable offense. All the millions of copies of these books were to be confiscated and destroyed. The representative of the Military Directorate admitted that the order was in principle no different from the Nazi book-burnings.

The censorship in the U.S. zone was regulated by the occupation directive JCS 1067 (valid until July 1947) and, in the May 1946 order valid for all zones (re-scinded in 1950) , Allied Control Authority Order No. 4, « No. 4 - Confiscation of Literature and Material of a Nazi and Militarist Nature » . All confiscated literature was reduced to pulp instead of burning. It was also directed by Directive No. 30, « Liquidation of German Military and Nazi Memorials and Museums » . An exception was made for tombstones « erected at the places where members of regular formations died on the field of battle » .

Artworks were under the same censorship as other media ; all collections of works of art related or dedicated to the perpetuation of German militarism or Nazism will be closed permanently and taken into custody.

The directives were very broadly interpreted, leading to the destruction of thousands of paintings and thousands more were shipped to deposits in the United States. Those confiscated paintings still surviving in U.S. custody include for example a painting « depicting a couple of middle-aged women talking in a sunlit street in a small town » . Artists were also restricted in which new art they were allowed to create ; « Office of the Military Government, United States was setting explicit political limits on art and representation » .

The publication « Der Ruf » (The Call) was a popular literary magazine 1st published in 1945 by Alfred Andersch and edited by Hans Werner Richter. « Der Ruf » , also called Independent Pages of the New Generation, claimed to have the aim of educating the German people about democracy. In 1947, its publication was blocked by the American forces for being overly critical of occupational government. Richter attempted to print many of the controversial pieces in a volume entitled « Der Skorpion » . The occupational government blocked publication of « Der Skorpion » before it began, saying that the volume was too « nihilistic » .

Publication of « Der Ruf » resumed in 1948 under a new publisher, but « Der Skorpion » was blocked and not widely distributed. Unable to publish his works, Richter founded « Group 47 » .

The Allied costs for occupation were charged to the German people. A newspaper which revealed the charges (including, among other things, 30,000 bras) was banned by the occupation authorities for revealing this information.

From the beginning, denazification in the Soviet zone took-on the political tone of class-warfare. As they moved into Prussia, amid the invasion, the Soviets expelled, arrested, or put in internment camps the « Junkers » and other large landowners, not only for their reputation of being supporters of militarism and Nazism but also in order to seize their lands and re-distribute it to small farmers. Many industries were expropriated, with entire factories moved to the Soviet Union as reparations, or nationalized.

In July 1945, the Soviets were the 1st of the Allies to install State (« Länder ») governments and the 1st to allow political Parties. These were later either disbanded, or absorbed into the Communist Party, which was then renamed the Socialist Unity Party.

The Soviet secret service, NKVD, set-up a number of « special camps » where (among others) alleged Nazis were interned. People were sometimes arrested arbitrarily and did not receive a fair trial, with some not even receiving any trial. At least 43,000 died in the camps. Doing special tasks for the Soviet government could protect Nazi members from prosecution, enabling them to continue working. Having special connections with the occupiers, in order to have someone vouch for them, could also shield a person from the denazification laws.

The abandonment of stringent denazification in the West became a major theme of East German government propaganda, which claimed that the West German government was an extension of the old Nazi regime. Such allegations appeared frequently in the official Socialist Unity Party of Germany newspaper, the « Neues Deutschland ». The 1953 « June 17 » riots in Berlin were officially blamed on Nazi agents provocateurs from West-Berlin, who the « Neues Deutschland » alleged were, then, working in collaboration with the Western government with the ultimate aim of restoring Nazi rule throughout Germany. The Berlin Wall was officially called the Anti-Fascist Security Wall (« Antifaschistischer Schutzwall ») by the East German government.

The British prepared a plan from 1942 onwards, assigning a number of quite junior civil servants to head the administration of liberated territory in the rear of the Armies, with draconian powers to remove from their post, in both public and private domains, anyone suspected, usually on behavioural grounds, of harbouring Nazi sympathies. For the British government, the rebuilding of German economic power was more important than the imprisonment of Nazi criminals. Economically hard pressed at home after the War, they did not want the burden of feeding and otherwise administering Germany.

In October 1945, in order to constitute a working legal system, and given that 90 % of German lawyers had been members of the Nazi Party, the British decided that 50 % of the German Legal Civil Service could be staffed by « nominal » Nazis. Similar pressures caused them to relax the restriction even further in April 1946. In industry, especially in the economically crucial Ruhr area, the British began by being lenient about who owned or operated businesses, turning stricter by autumn of 1945. In order to reduce the power of industrialists, the British expanded the role of trade-unions, giving them some decision-making powers.

They were, however, especially zealous during the early months of occupation in bringing to justice anyone, soldiers or civilians, who committed war crimes against POWs or captured Allied air-crew. In June 1945, an interrogation centre at Bad Nenndorf was opened, where ex-Nazis and suspected Communist agents were tortured with beatings, whippings, thumb-screws, cold, starvation, etc. A public scandal ensued but only one person was found guilty of neglect.

The British, to some extent, avoided being overwhelmed by the potential numbers of denazification investigations by requiring that no one need fill-out the « Fragebogen » unless they were applying for an official or responsible position. This difference between American and British policy was decried by the Americans and caused some Nazis to seek shelter in the British zone.

In January 1946, the British handed-over their denazification panels to the Germans.

The French were less vigorous, for a number of reasons, than the Americans, not even using the term « denazification », instead calling it « épuration » (purification) . They did not view it as critical to distinguish Nazis from non-Nazis, since in their eyes all Germans were to blame. At the same time, some French occupational commanders had served in the collaborationist Vichy regime during the War where they had formed friendly relationships with Germans. As a result, in the French zone mere membership in the Nazi Party was much less important than in the other zones.

Because teachers had been strongly Nazified, the French began by removing 3/4 of all teachers from their jobs. However, finding that the schools could not be run without them, they were soon rehired, although subject to easy dismissal. A similar process governed technical experts. The French were the 1st to turn-over the vetting process to Germans, while maintaining French power to reverse any German decision. Overall, the business of denazification in the French zone was considered a « golden mean between an excessive degree of severity and an inadequate standard of leniency », laying the ground-work for an enduring reconciliation between France and Germany. In the French zone, only 13 Germans were categorized as « major offenders » .

In 1965, the National Front of the German Democratic Republic published what became known as the « Brown Book : War and Nazi Criminals in West Germany : State, Economy, Administration, Army, Justice, Science » . As the title would indicate, the presence of former « Gestapo » members in the « Volkspolizei » and ex-Nazis at all levels of the Socialist Unity Party was not covered. The book, among other things, mentioned 1,800 names of former Nazis who held positions of authority in West Germany. These included 15 ministers and deputy ministers ; 100 generals and admirals of the armed forces ; 828 senior judges and prosecutors ; 245 leading members of the Foreign Ministry, embassies and consulates officials ; and 297 senior police officers and Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution officials. The listing was inaccurate ; many of the military names had not been Party members, as the armed forces did not permit its officers to join, while many low level Party members in other groups were over-looked altogether. As revealed by BKA official Dieter Senk, in 1989, « today, we know that the Brown Book didn't contain, even approximately, all the relevant names. For example, it mentions only 3 names from the BKA » . The book had a controversial impact in West Germany. Reflecting this, a judge ordered the seizure of the volume from the Frankfurt Book Fair, in 1967.

The culture of denazification strongly influenced the parliamentary council charged with drawing-up a constitution for those occupation zones that would become West Germany.

This Constitution (« Grundgesetz », meaning Basic Law) , was completed on May 8, 1949, ratified on May 23, and came into effect the next-day. This date effectively marks the foundation of the Federal Republic of Germany.

The end of denazification saw the « ad hoc » creation initially of the Western Union (not to be confused with the commercial operation of that name) which would be institutionalised as the Western European Union, in 1947 and 1955, with a broad socio-economic remit actually implemented in the strict domain of arms control.

After the defeat of Nazi Germany, German civilians were sometimes forced to tour concentration camps and, in some cases, to exhume mass graves of Nazi victims.

The ideas of collective guilt and collective punishment originated not with the American and British people, but on higher policy levels. Not until late in the War did the U.S. public assign collective responsibility to the German people. The most notable policy document containing elements of collective guilt and collective punishment is JCS 1067, from early 1945. Eventually, horrific footage from the concentration camps would serve to harden public opinion and bring it more in line with that of policy-makers.

Already in 1944, prominent U.S. opinion-makers had initiated a domestic propaganda campaign (which was to continue until 1948) arguing for a harsh peace for Germany, with a particular aim to end the apparent habit in the United States of viewing the Nazis and the German people as separate entities.

Statements made by the British and U.S. governments, both before and immediately after Germany's surrender, indicate that the German nation, as a whole, was to be held responsible for the actions of the Nazi regime, often using the terms « collective guilt » and « collective responsibility » .

To that end, as the Allies began their post-War denazification efforts, the Psychological Warfare Division (PWD) of Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force undertook a psychological propaganda campaign for the purpose of developing a German sense of collective responsibility.

The Public Relations and Information Services Control Group of the British Element (CCG/BE) of the Allied Control Commission for Germany began in 1945 to issue directives to officers in charge of producing newspapers and radio broadcasts for the German population to emphasize « the moral responsibility of all Germans for Nazi crimes » . Similarly, among U.S. authorities, such a sense of collective guilt was « considered a prerequisite to any long-term education of the German people » .

Using the German press, which was under Allied control, as well as posters and pamphlets, a program was conducted to acquaint ordinary Germans with what had taken place in the concentration camps. For example, using posters with images of concentration camp victims coupled to text such as « YOU ARE GUILTY OF THIS ! » or « These atrocities : Your Fault ! » .

A number of films showing the concentration camps were made and screened to the German public, such as « Die Todesmühlen » , released in the U.S. zone, in January 1946, and « Welt im Film No. 5 » in June 1945. A film that was never finished due partly to delays and the existence of the other films was « Memory of the Camps » . According to Sidney Bernstein, chief of PWD, the object of the film was to :

« Shake and humiliate the Germans and prove to them, beyond any possible challenge, that these German crimes against humanity were committed and that the German people (and not just the Nazis and SS) bore responsibility. »

English writer James Stern recounted an example in a German town, soon after the German surrender :

« A crowd is gathered around a series of photographs which though initially seeming to depict garbage instead reveal dead human bodies. Each photograph has a heading “ WHO IS GUILTY ? ”. The spectators are silent, appearing hypnotised and eventually retreat one by one. The placards are later replaced with clearer photographs and placards proclaiming “ THIS TOWN IS GUILTY ! YOU ARE GUILTY ! ”. »

Immediately upon the liberation of the concentration camps, many German civilians were forced to see the conditions in the camps, bury rotting corpses and exhume mass graves. In some instances, civilians were also made to provide items for former concentration camp inmates.

The United States conducted opinion surveys in occupied Germany. Tony Judt in his book « Postwar : a History of Europe since 1945 » extracted and used some of them.

A majority, in the years 1945-1949, stated National-Socialism to have been a good idea but badly applied.

In 1946, 6 % of Germans said the Nuremberg trials had been unfair.

In 1946, 37 % in the U.S. occupation zone said about the Holocaust that « the extermination of the Jews and Poles and other non-Aryans was necessary for the security of Germans » .

In 1946, 1 in 3 in the U.S. occupation zone said that Jews should not have the same rights as those belonging to the Aryan race.

In 1950, 1 in 3 said the Nuremberg trials had been unfair.

In 1952, 37 % said Germany was better-off without the Jews.

In 1952, 25 % had a good opinion of Adolf Hitler.

However, in « Hitler, Germans, and the “ Jewish Question ” » , Sarah Ann Gordon notes the difficulty of drawing conclusions from the surveys. For example, respondents were given 3 alternatives from which to choose, as in question No. 1 :

Hitler was right in his treatment of the Jews : 0 %

Hitler went too far in his treatment of the Jews, but something had to be done to keep them in bounds : 19 %

The actions against the Jews were in no way justified : 77 %

To the question of whether an Aryan who marries a Jew should be condemned, 91 % responded « No » . To the question of whether « All those who ordered the murder of civilians or participated in the murdering should be made to stand trial » , 94 % responded « Yes » .

Gordon singles-out the question « Extermination of the Jews and Poles and other non-Aryans was not necessary for the security of the Germans » , which included an implicit double negative to which the response was either yes or no. She concludes that this question was confusingly phrased (given that in the German language the affirmative answer to a question containing a negative statement is « no ») :

Some interviewees may have responded « no » they did not agree with the statement, when they actually did agree that the extermination was not necessary.

She further highlights the discrepancy between the anti-Semitic implications of the survey results (such as those later identified by Judd) with the 77 % of interviewees who responded that actions against Jews were in no way justified.

Gordon states that if the 77 % result is to be believed then an « overwhelming majority » of Germans disapproved of extermination, and if the 37 % result is believed to be correct, then, over 1/3 of Germans were willing to exterminate Poles and Jews and others for German security. She concludes that the phrasing of the question on German security lowers the confidence in the later interpretation.

Gordon follows this with another survey where interviewees were asked if Nazism was good or bad (53 % chose bad) and reasons for their answer. Among the 9 possible choices on why it was bad, 21 % chose the effects on the German people before the War, while 3 to 4 % chose the answer « race policy, atrocities, pogroms ». However, Gordon highlights the issue that it is difficult to pin-down at which point in time respondents became aware of the exterminations, before or after they were interviewed : questionnaire reports indicate that a significant minority had no knowledge until the Nuremberg trials.

She also notes that when confronted with the exterminations there was an element of denial, disbelief, and confusion. Asked about concentration camps, very few Germans associated them with the Jews, leading to the conclusion that they did not understand how they had been used against the Jews during the War and, instead, continued to think of them as they were before the War, the place where political opponents to the Nazis were kept :

« This “ naïveté ” is only understandable if large numbers of Germans were truly ignorant of the existence of these camps. »

A British study on the same attitudes concluded that :

« Those who said National-Socialism was a good idea pointed to social welfare plans, the lack of unemployment, the great construction plans of the Nazis. Nearly all those who thought it a good idea nevertheless rejected Nazi racial theories and disagreed with the inhumanity of the concentration camps and the “ SS ”. »

Sarah Gordon writes that a majority of Germans appeared to approve of non-violent removal of Jews from civil service and professions and German life. The German public also accepted the Nuremberg laws because they thought they would act as stabilizers and end violence against Jews. The German public had, as a result of the Nazi anti-Semitic propaganda, hardened their attitudes between 1935 and 1938 from the originally favorable stance. By 1938, the propaganda had taken effect and anti-Semitic policies were accepted, provided no violence was involved. « Kristallnacht » caused German opposition to anti-Semitism to peak, with the vast majority of Germans rejecting the violence and destruction, and many Germans aiding the Jews.

The Nazis responded by intimidation in order to discourage opposition, those aiding Jews being victims of large-scale arrests and intimidation. With the start of the War, the anti-Semitic minority that approved of restrictions on Jewish domestic activities was growing, but there is no evidence that the general public had any acceptance for labour camps or extermination. As the number of anti-Semites grew, so too did the number of Germans opposed to racial persecution, and rumours of deportations and shootings in the east led to snow-balling criticism of the Nazis.

Gordon states that :

« One can probably conclude that labour camps, concentration camps, and extermination were opposed by a majority of Germans. »

Gordon concludes in her analysis on German public opinion based German SD-reports during the War and the Allied questionnaires during the occupation :

« It would appear that a majority of Germans supported elimination of Jews from the civil service ; quotas on Jews in professions, academic institutions, and commercial fields ; restrictions on inter-marriage ; and voluntary emigration of Jews. However, the rabid anti-Semites' demands for violent boycotts, illegal expropriation, destruction of Jewish property, pogroms, deportation, and extermination were probably rejected by a majority of Germans. They apparently wanted to restrict Jewish rights substantially, but not to annihilate Jews. »

The West German political system, as it emerged from the occupation, was increasingly opposed to the Allied denazification policy. As denazification was deemed ineffective and counter-productive by the Americans, they did not oppose the plans of the German chancellor Konrad Adenauer to end the denazification efforts. Adenauer's intention was to switch government policy to reparations and compensation for the victims of Nazi rule (« Wiedergutmachung ») , stating that the main culprits had been persecuted. In 1951, several laws were passed, ending the denazification. Officials were allowed to retake jobs in the civil service, with the exception of people assigned to Group I (Major Offenders) and II (Offenders) during the denazification review process.

Several amnesty laws were also passed which affected about 792,176 people. Those pardoned included people with 6 month sentences, 35,000 people with sentences of up to 1 year and include more than 3,000 functionaries of the SA, the SS, and the Nazi Party who participated in dragging victims to jails and camps ; 20,000 other Nazis sentenced for « deeds against life » (presumably murder) ; 30,000 sentenced for causing bodily injury, and 5,200 who committed « crimes and misdemeanors in office » . As a result, several people with a former Nazi past ended-up again in the political apparatus of Western Germany.

Because the Cold War had curtailed the process of denazification in the West, certain radical Leftist groups such as the Red Army Faction tried to justify their use of violence against the West German government based on the notion that the West German establishment had benefited from the Nazi period, and that, while having officially renounced the Holocaust and the War crimes of the « Wehrmacht », it was still supposedly Fascist in outlook in all other aspects. They pointed-out that many former Nazis held government posts, while the German Communist Party was illegal. They argued that « What did you do in the War, daddy ? » was not a question that many of the leaders of the generation who fought World War II and prospered in the post-War « Wirtschaftswunder » (German Economic Miracle) encouraged their children to ask.

One of the major justifications that the Red Army Faction gave in 1977 for murdering Hanns-Martin Schleyer, President of the Confederation of German Employers' Associations (BDA) and perceived as one of the most powerful industrialists in West Germany, was that, as a former member of the SS, he was part of an informal network of ex-Nazis who still had great economic power and political influence in West Germany.

Even today, membership in Nazi organizations is still not an open topic of discussion among most Germans. It was not until 2006 that famous German writer Günter Grass, often viewed as a spokesman of « the nation's moral conscience », spoke publicly about the fact that he had been a member of the « Waffen-SS » (even though his involvement appears to have been less than criminal ; he was conscripted into the « Waffen-SS » while barely 17 years old and his duties were strictly military in nature) . Joseph Ratzinger (later, Pope Benedict XVI) , on the other hand, has been open about his membership at the age of 14 in Hitler Youth, when his church youth group was forced to merge with them. Statistically, it is likely that there are many more Germans of Grass's generation (also called the « Flakhelfer-Generation ») with biographies similar to his.

In practice, denazification was not limited to Germany and Austria ; in every European country with a vigorous Nazi or Fascist Party, measures of denazification were carried-out. In France, the process was called « épuration légale » (legal cleansing) . Prisoners of War held in detention in Allied countries were also subject to denazification qualifications before their repatriation.

Denazification was also practised in many countries which came under German occupation, including Belgium, Norway, Greece and Yugoslavia, because satellite regimes had been established in these countries with the support of local collaborators.

In Greece, for instance, Special Courts of Collaborators were created after 1945 to try former collaborators. The 3 Greek « quisling » prime ministers were convicted and sentenced to death or life imprisonment. Other Greek collaborators after German withdrawal underwent repression and public humiliation, besides being tried (mostly on treason charges) . In the context of the emerging Greek Civil War however, most War-time figures from the civil service, the Greek Gendarmerie and the notorious Security Battalions were quickly integrated into the strongly anti-Communist post-War establishment.

...

Denazification is a term used to describe the efforts made by the Allies to remove active members of the former National-Socialist (Nazi) Party from official public office and influential positions in Germany after World War II.

At the Yalta Conference, U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt, British Prime Minister Winston Churchill and Soviet Premier Joseph Stalin proclaimed their desire to wipe-out the Nazi Party, institutions, organizations, laws and cultural influences from German public and cultural life once they secured the surrender of Germany. This pledge was re-affirmed in the Potsdam Declaration, which stated that :

« All members of the Nazi Party who have been more than nominal participants are to be removed from public or semi-public office and from positions of responsibility in important private undertakings. »

No guide-lines were issued and the procedures and criteria were not clearly enunciated.

Denazification was carried-out on the basis of questionnaires about activities during the period of Nazi rule that the suspects had to fill-out. The 4 Powers occupying Germany (the United States, Soviet Union, Britain and France) determined varied proceedings in each area of occupation, and the results were accordingly inconsistent and served national purposes. The French used this policy to weaken their traditional enemy Germany. The British were more pragmatic and, thus, more lenient in their enforcement of denazification. The Americans had 2 conflicting tendencies. First, they had a general suspicion of all Germans and because of a sense of collective guilt, they could not easily distinguish between Nazis and others. Second, they sought to re-educate Germans for democracy, which took on added importance as the Cold War began. In the Soviet zone, the goal was to consolidate Communist rule and to eliminate capitalists and even take the property of the middle-class.

The results were diverse policies serving divergent goals. At 1st, denazification had important consequences as those who were not « rehabilitated » were not appointed to important offices or granted specific licenses (for example, to publish newspapers) . To consolidate the policies 5 categories were established in 1946 : (1) major offenders ; (2) offenders ; (3) lesser offenders ; (4) followers ; (5) persons exonerated. As political conditions and political needs changed the commitment to denazification diminished, amnesties were declared, and enforcement was transferred to the Germans themselves.

The extent of denazification was criticized in view of the multitude of cases of people who were « rehabilitated » in spite of their Nazi past. Among them were many who were active in the War against the Jews in a variety of ways, e.g. , professors : Doctor P. H. Seraphim (active in the « Final Solution ») ; Hans Friedrich Karl Günther (the outstanding racial scholar of the Nazi period) , who published anti-Semitic literature, and Doctor Hans Globke, co-author of the leading commentary on the Nuremberg Laws.

Still, despite the criticism, in the aftermath of the collapse of a totalitarian regime, occupying powers or successor governments look for ways to preserve the social, economic, cultural, and governmental structures of the given society while condemning the deeds and actors of a previous regime, and denazification is looked upon as an inviting precedent. It just could be that a fig leaf of procedural decontamination, however inadequate, is needed for a society to be rebuilt.

Dénazification des musiciens

All 4 War-time Allies occupied Germany with a commitment to getting rid of Nazi, militarist, and pan-German music from the repertoire. To a greater or lesser extent, they were also all committed to the exclusion of former Nazis from musical activities in the public sphere. Both goals were fraught with complications, which, more than half a Century later, are still unresolved. The recent academic interest in the relationship between music, musicians, and Nazism has served more to heighten awareness of the complexity of these relationships and of the moral issues which arise from them, than to produce any consensus on some of the most contested cases. The debate on whether Carl Orff's « Carmina Burana », by far, the most significant single musical work composed during the 3rd « Reich », is « Nazi music » (or, in more recent terms, has « Fascistoid traits ») continues, as do popular performances of the work itself, in and outside Germany. Arguments about whether Wilhelm Furtwängler and Richard Strauß were collaborators or resisters are still highly-polarized. Attitudes towards the nature and role of Richard Wagner's anti-Semitism, and the extent to which it is embodied in his music are still very divided. When we try to analyze the multi-faceted processes in Germany that are subsumed under the heading of « denazification », we encounter further difficulties.

The documentary record on denazification is scattered in many different archives and, unlike most of the material relating to the occupation of Germany, much of the material relating to the denazification of musicians is still classified. Many professional musicians in Germany after 1945 had practical reasons to deny, conceal, or mis-represent aspects of their behaviour before and during the 3rd « Reich » and, frequently, it suited one or other of the occupiers to collude with this. After 1948, when denazification petered-out, there was a general sense of dissatisfaction and embarrassment about the whole process, and it appears to have suited all involved to draw a veil over it. The analysis here will focus 1st on the Allied effort to pursue a collective policy on denazification in music and, then, proceed to consider in greater depth the policies pursued separately in individual Zones of occupation. As we shall see, this was an area where none of the Allies was prepared to renounce its jurisdiction within the area of Germany it controlled.

In accordance with War-time plans, the Allies in 1945 established an « Allied Control Council » in Berlin, which took-over executive authority in Germany from the government of the 3rd « Reich ». For the next 3 years, this council provided a forum in which the Soviets, Americans, British, and French were represented, and in which, with growing difficulty, they attempted to create a common legal framework for all Zones of occupation. Laws passed by the Control Council were published from October 1945, and were intended to have binding authority in all Zones. During late-1945 and early-1946, the Control Council grew, spawning committees and sub-committees dealing with individual issues. As far as the media (or « information services » as they were called by all the occupiers) and the arts were concerned, it was the Americans who showed the greatest commitment to 4-Power coordination, and it was largely at the instigation of Brigadier General Robert A. McClure that an Information Services Directorate was set-up within the Control Council, in April 1946, following which, a Theatre and Music sub-committee was also created. In the process, McClure brought to Germany a figure who would play a number of different roles in later years, the « émigré » Russian composer Nicolas Nabokov. Nabokov was brought to Berlin in 1945 specifically to coordinate Allied approaches to music control. It was felt that he would be helped in this by his command of English, French, Russian, and German.

McClure's most pressing concern in music control was with the denazification of musicians, and with securing a common Allied approach to this. He was a dedicated anti-Nazi, and he viewed the purging of Nazis from German cultural life as a mission, believing that a higher-standard should prevail there than in other areas of public life. McClure, and others in the American ICD, viewed the public performance of music as an act of great ritual significance, and they did not want to see former Nazis, regardless of the music they played, being applauded by German audiences. They went further than the other Allies in wishing, also, to exclude many who had been professionally successful under Adolf Hitler, arguing that they were compromised solely because of this. The other occupiers balanced their fierce hostility to former Nazis with a pragmatic desire to employ gifted and popular musicians in their own Zones, and all were sensitive to the enormous benefits that might accrue from allowing them to perform in public. The Americans also realized one implication of this, the opprobrium that would fall on them if they were perceived to be harsher than other occupiers, particularly when intervening in the hallowed area of « German music ». Very soon after the cessation of hostilities, the Americans started what was to be a long experience with major musical figures, excluded from work in the American Zone, who then went to other Zones to take-up prestigious appointments. The 1st high-profile case of this sort was that of Eugen Jochum, who was in Munich, in May and June 1945.

Jochum had conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra during the War, with great success, earning ever-larger sums in the process. He was profiled in a War-time documentary film, and conducted in occupied France as a representative of the 3rd « Reich ». In July 1945, Jochum was invited by the British, who had no sense that he might be compromised, to return to his former post in Hamburg. Jack Bomoff, the « Music Controller » of the NWDR, travelled to Munich, where he met Jochum ; together, they went on to Linz, where Bomoff also recruited a number of musicians from the now disbanded « Reich » Bruckner Orchestra, previously conducted by Jochum's brother, Georg Ludwig. Eugen Jochum, and the musicians from Linz returned to Hamburg to help in the British-sponsored musical reconstruction there. The subsequent dispute over Jochum between the British and the Americans was a difference of perception. The Americans felt that Jochum had been a beneficiary of Nazism. The British regarded him 1st and foremost as a very talented conductor inspired by a deep Roman Catholicism.

The debates about music in the 4-Power Information Directorate followed a consistent pattern. The agenda was set by the Americans, who could usually count on support from the British, reluctant acquiescence from the French, and, after much quibbling, some kind of formal Soviet agreement. All sides jealously guarded their exclusive jurisdiction in their own Zones, and were often unwilling to reveal too clearly what policies they were pursuing there. There are points in the minutes of the Directorate's meetings where individual « Allies » misrepresented what was going on in their Zones, or represented the situation in such an obscure way that their statements were misleading or even contradictory. Under a veneer of diplomatic courtesy, each occupier went its own way, following 1st and foremost its own interests in the area of Germany it controlled. At a lower-level, there was, between 1945 and 1949, considerable cooperation between the Americans and the British, rather less between these 2 and the French, and very little between these 3 and the Soviets.

The Control Council did concern itself with the prohibition and destruction of Nazi and militarist music. Its Order No. 4, « Confiscation of Literature and Material of a Nazi and Militarist Nature », specifically referred to « song and music books », held by « circulating libraries, book-shops, book-stores and publishing houses » ; it ordered directors of all educational institutions to remove « from libraries in their charge » all « Nazi and military literature » , and deliver this to « specially allocated places » . It seems that, by 1946, this order was hardly necessary. All over Germany, as the hostilities drew to an end, Nazi literature of all kinds, including music, was thrown away and destroyed by Germans themselves. Typically, for whatever reasons, libraries, schools, universities, publishers, and bookshops collected all the most obviously incriminating material they could find on their premises, and put it out to be pulped or destroyed. Most of those who had been involved in producing this material, if they survived the War, were keen to cooperate in this act of self-censorship, and to get rid of potentially compromising evidence. The cantatas glorifying Hitler, the « heroic festive music » of the 3rd « Reich » , and the hundreds of Nazi songs written before 1945, all largely disappeared. What remained was a larger spectrum of material with less obvious Nazi connotations and connections, much of which proved harder to judge.

There was virtually no problem created by the continued performance of Nazi music. There is no known example of professional musicians gathering publicly, or even privately, with the intention of performing Nazi music as some kind of gesture. Doubtless, individuals hummed to themselves the tunes they had learnt and sung before 1945. Groups may, in maudlin reflection, have sung together the « Horst-Wessel-Lied » , or the Hitler Youth's favourite song, « Es zittern die morschen Knochen » (The Brittle Bones are Shaking) , while they remembered torch lit parades, camp-fires, and evenings of alcoholic comradeship, but there are only isolated instances of this being done in a consciously oppositional manner. Music was not used, as Van Cutsem had feared, to rally resistance, or to mobilise a resurgent Nazism.

Just as with printed material, there remained a problem with the censorship of live music that had potential Nazi, militarist, or nationalist connotations, but this was not something that the Control Council or its Information Directorate attempted to rule on. It did, repeatedly and on American insistence, debate the denazification of musicians. The legal framework for the Allied denazification of civil society in post-War Germany was provided by Control Council Directive No. 24, « Removal from Office and from Positions of Responsibility of Nazis and of Persons Hostile to Allied Purposes » , which was not ready until January 1946 and was only published in March 1946. Had this Directive been rigorously and consistently implemented, many of those who ended-up playing a significant role in post-War German musical life would have been prevented from doing so. Paragraph 10 of the Directive specified several « Compulsory removal and exclusion categories » from positions of responsibility in public life. Amongst those to be removed and excluded, it specified all NSDAP members who joined before 1937, « all officials at any time » of the « “ Reichskulturkammer ” and subsidiary bodies » , and « persons who have denounced or contributed to the seizure of opponents of the Nazi regime » . The Directive also allowed for « discretionary removals or exclusions » . Paragraph 12, which gave advice on how to judge whether an individual was more than a « nominal » Nazi, had several sections that might relate to musicians. Membership of the German Christian Movement (« Deutsche Christenbewegung ») or the German Faith Movement (« Deutsche Glaubensbewegung ») , for example, raised « strong presumption of Nazi sympathy » . Paragraph 12 also identified « Persons who have received financial favoritism from the Nazis » , and stated that this might constitute grounds for exclusion.

The Directive, thus, left the Allies with wide discretion. It also raised several other problems, which were left to individual tribunals and investigators to resolve. The requirement that all who had joined the NSDAP before 1937 be excluded, however, was clear and unequivocal. Given that the Americans, in 1945, had captured virtually intact the NSDAP membership card index, it was even, in theory, enforceable. We know now, though, that the circumstances in which individuals joined the Nazi Party, and their motivations for so doing, before and after 1937, were enormously varied, and that Party membership alone was not necessarily proof of any particular commitment to Nazism. Nor did the Directive define what was meant by a « position of responsibility ». Did this include conductors or choir Masters ? What of other professional musicians and singers, or teachers of music, many of whom worked privately ? Additionally, the Allies in 1945 and 1946 did not state precisely for how long any exclusions were to last.

...

« Herr Generalmusikdirektor » , Otto Klemperer replied :

« I am not in command of an army, nor am I the director of a bank. My name is Klemperer. »

The American commitment to denazification in music brought them frustration, and the profound hostility of the German population in their Zone. Those canying-out the purges were criticized by their own press, and faced constant obstruction from the newly-created German authorities. That procedures in other Zones were « so much more superficial, disorganized, and haphazard » was small consolation to U.S. music officers, who had to live with the spectacle of musicians they were trying to punish basking in public acclaim there. The Americans arrived in Germany with a sense of righteous anger, greatly intensified by the discovery of concentration camps at Ohrdruf, Nordhausen, Buchenwald, Dachau, and elsewhere, in April 1945. They were determined to reform all aspects of civilian life in Germany, and were not disposed to argue the finer points of individual cases.

Young and completely inexperienced officers had responsibility for immediately vetting the personnel of probably the most highly-developed musical culture in the world, and censoring its repertoire. These men knew that music had been inextricably linked with Nazism, and that it played a significant role in public life in Germany. They objected particularly to the appearance in public of musicians who had been popular under the Nazis, even if there was no clear proof that they had been Nazi sympathisers. Unfortunately, this became confused with the punishment of ex-Nazis, and often fostered the impression that American policy was driven by vindictiveness and a lack of cultural understanding.

This confusion was particularly apparent in the « discouragement » of certain kinds of music. Richard Wagner was singled-out, not because the Americans thought it was Nazi music, but because the Nazis had liked it so much. By the same token, Ludwig van Beethoven or Anton Bruckner might have been « crowded-out » , but were not. No performances of Wagner were permitted in the American Zone once the early confusion at Bayreuth had been sorted-out ; the Festival there did not resume until 1951. The situation at Bayreuth, in May 1945, was particularly ironic, since the manager of the Festival Hall, Raymond Lutz, was actually an American citizen. Through the summer, performances by un-licensed German orchestras to U.S. troops in Bayreuth vexed the Music Control Section in Munich. Not until September did denazification begin in earnest. The Bayreuth Symphony Orchestra had to close-down temporarily because so many of its members were excluded. Lutz himself was dismissed because of his War-time work in Posen and Gablonz. Symbolically, the 1st official performance of Wagner was given by an American singer, Marjorie Lawrence, in Berlin in December 1946, and this served as a clear signal of a relaxation of the existing policy. In quick succession, « Tannhäuser » was performed in Coburg ; « Die Walküre » in Munich ; and « Parsifal » in Regensburg. The audience in Munich made its feelings clear by continuing its applause after « Die Walküre » for a full 30 minutes.

There was equal confusion in the censorship of music by living composers. The Bavarian State Opera was told, in December 1945, that performance of Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari's Opera « The Secret of Suzanne » was « not desirable at this time » , although it was « itself quite innocent » . Apparently, it was « too early to produce an Opera of someone as prominently involved with the Nazis as this composer » . Wolf-Ferrari had been named as a popular composer in the 3rd « Reich » in the Germany-Basic-Handbook, produced by the Americans during the War, as had Hans Pfitzner. Ironically, pieces by Pfitzner were included in the 1st concerts allowed by the Americans in Frankfurt and in Bremen but, by May 1946, they were concerned about Soviet plans to broadcast a Pfitzner series, and by an invitation for him to appear in Düsseldorf, in the British Zone. After 2 concerts in Munich, that Pfitzner attended in person, turned into a public display of support for the black-listed local composer, performance of his music there was banned. In a gesture certain to provoke comment, Joseph Haas, Director of the Music Academy, was « advised » not to include any pieces by Pfitzner in a commemorative Centenary concert of the Academy in Munich, in October 1946. The Americans had moved a long way from their earlier position of not wanting to be seen « to regiment culture » .

The exclusion of performers from professional life by the Americans was taken much further than their censorship of music, and challenges any assumption that denazification of musicians was lenient or superficial. We can distinguish here 4 phases before the Americans reluctantly abandoned their effort in 1948. In the early weeks of the occupation, they were concerned to restart concerts in major cities. This meant finding local officials who could be licensed to produce concerts, and then, carrying-out a quick purge of selected ensembles before they could perform in public and on radio. All over the American Zone, music officers were instructed to draw-up black-lists of musicians, and to send these to Brigadier General McClure's headquarters at Bad Homburg. The Americans relied, at this stage, on locally captured documents, or on information received from Germans, which might or might not be reliable. This explains why they initially employed a number of musicians, such as Eugen Jochum and Hans Knappertsbusch, who were subsequently black-listed, and, by November 1945, described as « Nazi parade horses » . Inevitably, the early purges appeared arbitrary and unfair. Already, tensions between different branches of the Military Government were apparent. The Intelligence Branch of ICD, headed by Colonel Alfred Toombs, demanded that all NSDAP members be excluded. Music officers were aware that were this to be enforced, few orchestras would be able to play.

In July 1945, Arthur Vogel in Munich protested :

« The recent wholesale dismissal of Nazi Party members from the State Opera, and the paralysing effects this policy will have on musical life if pursued throughout Bavaria, force me to state my opinion of this policy. »

3 days later, he wrote :

« Schmitt and Altmann of the Philharmonic dropped-in, visibly trembling, unless we should fall on the 19 Nazis in their Orchestra. I sent a note over to Captain Busey telling him this office favours retention of all musicians save the outright stinkers and trouble-makers. »

From papers drawn-up by the Orchestra, it would appear that 16 of its musicians were dismissed. Vogel subsequently reported that if all who had been NSDAP members prior to 1 May 1937 were excluded, there would be no Orchestras left in Nuremberg, Bayreuth, Augsburg, or Regensburg, and that in Munich, the Orchestra of the Bavarian State Opera would have to merge with the Philharmonic.

This situation was mirrored in cities all over the American Zone. In Karlsruhe, provisional screening of the Symphony Orchestra resulted in « several severe musical losses » . In Stuttgart, the Americans began a long struggle with the municipal authorities to denazify the Opera and the Philharmonic. In Bremen, which the Americans took-over from the British, in June 1945, a preliminary survey noted :

« Music and Theatre activities, in Bremen and the Enclave, are less advanced than in any other of the key-cities selected as initial targets. This is a very critical area, since the adjoining areas, under British control, are extremely active, and the contrast results in comparisons highly-unfavourable to the American occupation and control agencies. The report went on to state that if Party members in the Bremen Philharmonic were excluded, the Orchestra would be temporarily crippled, and argued that they should be retained, particularly as in surrounding areas (under British control) nominal Nazis were permitted to work “ in subordinate positions ”. »

Surviving black-lists drawn-up by American officers, in southern and central Germany, in this 1st phase of occupation give a vivid picture of the chaotic situation prevailing then. They are hastily typed, and whole pages are now illegible. This 1st phase of American denazification was draconian, inevitably arbitrary, and partial. It left hundreds of professional musicians out of work, and facing an uncertain future.

A 2nd, intensified phase began in October 1945 with the completion of the 1st post-War « Black, Grey, and White lists » for the whole of the American Zone. Alongside hundreds of lesser musicians, the leading lights of German musical life, including Furtwängler, Knappertsbusch, and Walter Gieseking, were named as Nazi collaborators, causing wide-spread comment. The Americans were now using the « Reich » Chamber of Culture files held by the British, and, in the next few months, were thus able to extend their purges. Analysis of these lists is complicated by changes in the way they were drawn-up between 1944 and 1947. As well as 3 categories defined by colour, there were further sub-divisions. On the 1st post-War lists, there were distinctions between white « A » and « B » , and black « O » and « E » . Later lists dropped these distinctions, but introduced a new one, between grey « acceptable » and « unacceptable » . As Ulrich Bausch has pointed-out, there were many discrepancies between lists drawn-up by ICD centrally, and by detachments in individual areas. Changing directives from McClure's headquarters further undermined any hope music officers might have had of achieving consistency.

The new climate, in the autumn of 1945, was heralded in Munich by the dismissal of Hans Knappertsbusch. Behind the scenes, his case also revealed difficulties with communication. Knappertsbusch, after « exhaustive investigation » by the Intelligence Branch, had been appointed temporary « Intendant » at the Bavarian State Opera, and allowed to direct the Munich Philharmonic. He even conducted a Beethoven Piano Concerto in September, in which Edward Kilenyi, an American music officer, played the solo part. Evidently, Toombs, the head of the ICD's Intelligence Branch, had heard that Knappertsbusch was conducting in public again, and he angrily demanded that the Munich detachment should carry-out its responsibilities with more urgency. Knappertsbusch was « summarily dismissed ». Vogel and Kilenyi, in Munich, were apparently unaware at the time that he had been black-listed, claiming to have learnt this only later from the magazine « Stars and Stripes ». The case was widely-reported, and discussed all over Germany. The effect was calamitous, and not just in Munich. Fragile relationships between music officers and German musicians were undermined, and the exodus of musicians from the American Zone gathered pace.

Settling Scores : German Music, Denazification, and The Americans (1945-1953)

By David Monod, University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill (2005) .

Given its title, historian David Monod's book « Settling Scores » runs the unfortunate danger of being confused with « Settling the Score » (Ned Rorem, 1988) , or « Settling the Score » (Kathryn Kalinak, 1992) , or « Settling New Scores » (Felix Meyer, editor, 1998) and, perhaps also, « Settling the Score » (Michæl Oliver, editor, 1999) . But Monod's subtitle, « German Music, Denazification, and the Americans, 1945-1953 » , places it firmly in the company of works like Michæl H. Kater's « The Twisted Muse : Musicians and Their Music in the 3rd “ Reich ” » (1997) , and Pamela Potter's « Most German of the Arts : Musicology and Society from the Weimar Republic to the End of Hitler's “ Reich ” » (1998) , or alongside recent work that overlaps Monod's, like Toby Thacker's « Music After Hitler, 1945-1955 » (2007) , or Amy C. Beal's « New Music, New Allies » (2006) .

The nature of the book's rich thesis is multifold : addressing the day-to-day reality of military government's staggering bureaucracy ; the seriously confused procedures of « denazification » and « re-education » ; the ineffectiveness of promoting American music ; the dangerous temptation of censorship in a post-dictatorship situation ; the tension between American and European values regarding culture versus entertainment ; and much more. Monod's story adds to the politicized biographies of its prominent protagonists (in particular, well-known figures like : Wilhelm Furtwängler, Richard Strauß, Herbert von Karajan, Carl Orff, Georg Solti, Paul Hindemith, Leonard Bernstein, Walter Gieseking, Karl Böhm, Winifred and Wieland Wagner) as well as lesser-known but equally important players like John Bitter, Edward Kilenyi, Robert McClure, John Evarts, Hans Rosbaud, Leo Borchard, Sergiù Celibidache, Harrison Kerr, Everett Helm, and Carlos Moseley.

In writing on music politics during the post-War American occupation of West Germany, the author operates convincingly from the premise that ours is a time of the politicization of the arts, and explains that his « interests lie in exploring the debate over what should have been done with Germany's tainted generation of musicians and its debased culture » . In turn, he asks his readers « to confront the question of the culpability of the artist » and, at the same time, to re-examine what the Americans actually achieved in the 1st few years after World War II in cities under their control like Munich, Stuttgart, Wiesbaden, Frankfurt, and West-Berlin.

Monod gives somewhat scant treatment to the contemporary music culture that experienced such a remarkable rebirth in the years following the « Zero Hour » , and his insistence on connecting the idea of « revolution » with re-education leaves this reader only marginally convinced. Several misspellings and minor mechanical errors should have been caught during final proof-reading but, overall, the book is expertly designed and beautifully produced. Most significantly, the quality of this book's scholarship is impeccable. Monod's research is based on myriad materials in 10 German and 6 American archives, over a dozen sets of additional private papers, eyewitness interviews, and the citation of nearly 200 published sources. Furthermore, despite the complexity of the topic and the tangled web of tales, the author is simultaneously trying to unravel and explain, this insightful book is clearly organized and elegantly written. Monod's engaging, authoritative « Settling Scores » is poised to become required reading for all historians and musicologists interested in cultural rebirth amidst the post-War ruins of occupied Germany.

Re-educating the Public

(From Chapter 3 : « Reforming Music Culture, 1945-1946 »)

Information Control Division's Music Branch did not limit its reformist efforts to containing the influence of the State but also sought to change attitudes among the public. « The basic objective of the occupation requires the democratization of the German government and people » , declared one directive, an approach that involved « teaching democracy to the individual German » . Where denazification would force each person to « renounce the doctrines of Nazism and militarism by making him aware of the moral issues involved in German aggression and of his personal share in the collective German responsibility for the acts of the Nazis and militarists » , cultural products might be employed to « strip away German misconceptions about Germany and its relationship to the world » . Initially, « music, opera and ballet will be given preference over other forms of entertainment » in this public re-education program, as these forms provided few « opportunities for subversive propaganda » and might be « designed to restore the exchange of ideas between Germany and the world outside it » . (30) Just as Information Control Division directives suggested that there was a salvageable core to German music culture and that State-subsidized institutions could be democratized through reform rather than revolution, they also implied the existence of a receptive public that could be made to appreciate new and foreign music. Effort had to be made to humanize and demote the country's cultural titans and show the local population that central Europe was not the repository of all that was best in music history. In particular, concert-goers had to be taught that, during the preceding 12 years, far more interesting music was composed outside Germany's borders than within.

The branch declared :

« Adolf Hitler had succeeded in transforming the lush field of musical creativity into a barren waste. »

During the 3rd « Reich » , the occupiers believed, most of Germany's best artists were abroad, the country was « completely isolated from international development » and its own composers were « producing nothing but works psychologically effective to the Nazi cause » . Under these circumstances, pressing a new and internationalized musical repertoire on German audiences was considered good therapy. « There is still a strong feeling of arrogance and superiority among Germans in regard to their own music » , the Americans concluded, which a broader repertoire would help to destroy. Listening to the modern music of different countries « will introduce breadth of outlook, international understanding and non-political attitudes » . Music Branch officers were fairly broad-minded in the repertoire they suggested, as promoting the music of all of the Allied nations (and they included in this group the works of « émigrés » such as Ernst Toch, Bohuslav Martinů, Gian Carlo Menotti and Béla Bartók) was seen as important in « helping to stress the significance of an unpolitical art in Germany » . (31)

But before this could be done, a functioning agency for the collection of royalties had to be established. The American League of Composers and the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, which policed copyrights in the United States, made very clear that they would not allow unauthorized or unrecompensed performances of works, no matter what their presumed educational value. The institution that handled copyright in Germany, « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » (STAGMA) , had been a Nazi organization attached to the « Reichskulturkammer » (RKK) and under the direct control of the Propaganda Ministry. The Party paid a lump sum each year for rights to perform any music it wanted in propaganda films or at official functions, and the « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » , in turn, was required to use the Party's contribution to subsidize musicians and organizations specially selected for it by the Propaganda Ministry. Although a servant of Nazi racial policy, the agency was such a cash cow that, when the War ended, everyone from the city of Berlin to the GDB to the « Kammer für Kunstschaffenden » lobbied to take it over. While the Allies decided what to do, 2 senior executives of the Nazi period, Erich Schulze and Pierre Cretin, maintained « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » 's operations, though they were generally unsuccessful in their effort to convince artists and theater directors to pay them for performed material. The actions of Schulze and Cretin did, however, help ensure that « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » rather than a new agency would continue to collect fees, and the Americans temporarily backed them as alternatives to State control. The whole process of negotiating a structure for the new agency lasted months, in large measure because the Soviets had little use for a private collection agency and were unsure whether to support it. So, it was not until late-summer 1946 that all 4 powers agreed to recognize the private organization's exclusive right to administer royalties. In the meantime, the Information Control Division needed another solution if it were to launch Germany's cultural re-education. In December 1945, therefore, the division opted to act alone : it appointed a director of the « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » for the American zone, established branch agencies in different cities, and ordered all performers and theaters to pay royalties only to that agency. By Christmas, the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers had negotiated terms of payment with the American zone « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » (renamed, in 1949 : « Gesellschaft für musikalische Aufführungs- und mechanische Vervielfältigungsrechte » or GEMA) , clearing the way to performances of U.S.-copyrighted works. In addition to this function, the German agency was charged with collecting all royalties for the performances of works by black-listed composers and holding them in a closed account until such time as the individuals were cleared. (32)

With copyright now protected, musical material began to flow into Germany in January 1946, but it came in strange packages. OWI's former overseas offices, now being liquidated or absorbed by the Department of State's IIA, contributed a large number of scores and recordings, but this arrangement changed when the army took control and the Information Control Division was placed under the operational control of the Civil Affairs Division. Unfortunately, the Civil Affairs Division, which stood at the head of the Office of the Military Government, United States' supply line, did not appoint a music administrator until March 1946, further delaying the Information Control Division's field operations. When the scores and parts did arrive, they came as microfilm, requiring enlargement and photo-duplication at the headquarters of the Information Control Division's Film Branch, in Munich. The process proved time-consuming and some of the material was unreadable, requiring new photographing. All of this served to slow the dissemination of American music in Germany, and, by July 1946, the Information Control Division had only about 100 compositions, as compared with 600 made available by the Russians and 300 by the British. One important advance in facilitating the use of Military Government's supply of scores came with the creation of an Inter-allied Music Lending Library in Berlin, in September 1946. Located in the State library in the Russian sector, it provided a central lending point for music supplied by the occupation powers. (33)

As most of the 1st generation of music officers had studied in Europe and lived in the northeastern United States, they included in Germany's cultural tonic works by Igor Stravinsky and Darius Milhaud, Dmitri Shostakovich, Paul Hindemith, and Béla Bartók. This was the modern music the officers heard in Boston and Philadelphia and New York performed by such European conductors as Serge Koussevitsky and Artur Rodziński, Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowski. A few, like John Evarts and John Bitter, were knowledgeable about American composers, but to others, like Newell Jenkins and Edward Kilenyi, it was unfamiliar terrain. Still, the music officers were all fairly catholic in their tastes and through their supplier in IIA, they secured scores by Sergei Prokofiev, Béla Bartók, Arthur Honegger, and a host of others for their German licensees.

American music, in the eyes of senior planning officials was, however, always thought to have a special role to play in Germany. This was especially true for State Department authorities, who saw American culture as the vanguard of democratization. According to an influential report on re-education activities :

« Germans, weak in their political tradition, tend to judge American political democracy by the kind of cultural life they imagine it to produce, and as they are convinced that it produces nothing of value, their minds are for the most part closed to the suggestion that they adopt it for themselves. If Germans are once convinced that America does have a culture of its own, and moreover one that has progressed beyond theirs in certain fields in which they have prided themselves, they will begin to listen with more interest to talk of political democracy. » (34)

Breaking down the Germans' sense of cultural superiority would, therefore, be more effectively achieved through American music than through the works of other nations.

The music officers agreed with this and promoted works by Walter Piston and Aaron Copland and Roy Harris and William Schuman, without abandoning their more internationalist goals. But, by the summer of 1946, their effort to supply modern music, as opposed to narrowly American works, had run into a major obstacle. When the War Department finally assumed full-responsibility for Information Control Division, it appointed Harrison Kerr as its music administrator in its New York field office and the job of supplying scores was transferred from IIA to the Civil Affairs Division. Kerr was a composer and former administrator of the American Music Library, and he had a far narrower concept of the Military Government's mission in Germany than the field officers or his predecessors in IIA. His job was to purchase the supplies needed for re-education purposes and he, not the music officers, controlled the budget and exercised final decision-making authority. Kern refused to authorize the dispatch of music by non-Americans or even of « émigrés » such as Paul Hindemith, Bohuslav Martinů, and Ernst Křenek, even when asked to do so by the field officers. In Kerr's opinion, works by these composers were not sufficiently representative of America and would have no re-educational value. The branch officers did not agree with Kerr, but they had no official alternative to the New York office. Whenever they could, they ordered scores from Switzerland and England, and one of them, who had previously been in charge of IIA's music program, continued to use the old channel and had material shipped through the Music Division of the Library of Congress. But the American officers had to pay for much of this material themselves or make use of friends and donors in the United States. (35)

Information Control Division's officers worked hard to provide German performers with music from Europe and the United States, but they were not always so selfless in their actions. On a number of occasions, they took advantage of their positions to showcase their own work or ability. John Bitter led the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 3 times and his 3rd String Quartet premiered in the city while he was still a music officer ; Jerome Pastene conducted frequently in Heidelberg ; and John Evarts started writing a chamber piece for a Munich ensemble until ordered to stop by Kilenyi, his fastidious superior. Harrison Kerr shipped a disproportionate number of his own works to Germany, including big ones like his forgettable 1st Symphony. William Castello, who worked with Jenkins in Stuttgart, was reportedly heavily involved in the black market. Activities like these do not reflect well on the Information Control Division's officers, though the urge of musicians to make music and of composers to promote their wares is not unusual. Still, like so many others, they were hoping to lay the foundations of their post-MG careers by enhancing their resumes with some European credits. A great number of Americans did exactly the same thing, including army officers who used their authority to conduct leading orchestras ; amateurs who ordered Europe's top-musicians to give them lessons ; musicians with stalled or stillborn careers who moved to Switzerland in the hopes of descending on Germany or Austria the moment travel restrictions were lifted. Not all of these were artistically unworthy ; Erich Leinsdorf, for example, a gifted if hard-driving Opera conductor, whose career in America had been derailed by military service, slipped into Vienna in the hopes of landing a top-job. On the scale of things, the abuse of power shown by those Information Control Division officers who conducted or pushed their compositions was relatively inconsequential, if nonetheless inexcusable. (36)

Directing an orchestra oneself did have the advantage of allowing a music officer to choose his repertoire, and it is noteworthy that Jerome Pastene, for one, performed American pieces whenever conducting in Heidelberg. The 1st American works performed in Germany were played before Allied service personnel : in early September 1945, the black activist, composer, and clarinetist Rudolph Dunbar led the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on invitation of Leo Borchard, and conducted William Grant Still's « Afro-American » Symphony in an Armed Forces concert. In a subsequent concert, early in December, John Bitter and the same Orchestra performed Samuel Barber's « Adagio » . But convincing German licensees to try-out an American composition was never easy, even when the musician was as cooperative a person as Hans Rosbaud or Sergiù Celibidache. American music was, at the time, virtually unknown in Germany, and most artists shared the national bias that it could not be very good. Even friendly musicians complained that the style of American music was too unfamiliar or that they could not induce their Orchestras to give it a try. Consequently, it was not until spring 1947 that Georg Solti performed his 1st American works, Barber's « Essays for Orchestra » , and Rosbaud only directed his 1st (Copland's « An Outdoor » Overture) , in September 1946, 5 months after Celibidache conducted Barber's « Adagio » in Berlin. The less prominent Orchestras proved more forthcoming : what appears to have been the 1st orchestral work presented to a German audience was Walter Piston's « Incredible Flutist Suite » , offered in Heidelberg, on 8 March 1946 ; a few days later, the 1st American Symphony, Howard Hanson's Third, was heard by concert-goers in Wiesbaden ; and, shortly thereafter, the 1st ballet danced to an American score was staged before a local audience in Karlsruhe. Chamber works were also easier to get performed and the 1st American work presented to Germans during the occupation was Quincy Porter's « Music for Strings » . By June 1946, there had been 47 performances of 25 American works in the occupation zone and, 9 months later, the total had reached 173 performances of 57 pieces. Many of these works had, however, been played by orchestras under direct Information Control Division control, such as Radio Frankfurt's. (37)

Although some of the music the Information Control Division promoted might rest comfortably among the finest of the Century (Virgil Thompson's 2nd and William Schuman's 3rd Symphonies, for example, or Aaron Copland's « Quiet City ») and some stood, like Samuel Barber's « School for Scandal » Overture or George Gershwin's « Rhapsody in Blue » , among the most fun, much of what they had to offer was not very memorable. When Otto Matzerath presented Robert McBride's « Strawberry Jam » Overture, the greater part of the audience was « completely horrified by what some Germans referred to as “ Eine amerikanische Schweinerei ” » . This hostile reaction should not be entirely taken as a sign of anti-Americanism, for when Paul Hindemith, 4 years before, had been asked to review the work, he described it as a « sloppy, tossed-off piece of crap » . Piston's « Incredible Flutist » was also received with « puzzlement » by a Mannheim audience, while his « Concertino for Piano and Orchestra » was greeted in Heidelberg with « energetic whistling » (a sign of disapproval) . Some of this negativity was due to the problems German Orchestras had with the American musical idiom and with poor preparation and a lack of enthusiasm among artists who only mounted the work in order « to keep in good graces with the Americans » . But the results could be horrific. A performance of Gershwin's « Rhapsody » in Karlsruhe was mangled so badly that intelligence officers took it as criticism of the occupation and suggested the military police close down the theater. A few months earlier, « confused » choreography meant to seem broadly American, together with dancers dressed-up like cowboys and scenery that looked as though the whole thing were « laid-out in New Mexico » , badly distorted a production of Copland's ballet « Appalachian Spring » . (38)

The Information Control Division did score some real hits in Germany. Barber's « Adagio » was everywhere well-received, as was Menotti's « The Old Maid and the Thief » . But the problem of overcoming German apathy toward American Classical music remained.

As Newell Jenkins conceded :

« The trouble involved in placing an American work is tremendous. »

In an attempt to overcome some of that resistance, in March 1947, Jenkins established a series of chamber concerts of American works preceded by lectures and followed by group discussions. He borrowed the idea from the American composer Virgil Thomson and called the gatherings « The Friends and Enemies of Modern Music Society Concerts » .

The concerts « worked amazingly well » attendance was good, and « precious few enemies » showed-up. This inspired John Evarts, who founded similar Societies in Karlsruhe in April, and in Munich in May. By the end of 1947, « Friends and Enemies » were meeting in all the major cities where American cultural officials were stationed. Attendance at these concerts remained strong and positive because the Information Control Division passed-out free tickets to music students and local artists, and it managed to press such pro-American notables as Hans Rosbaud, Karl Amadeus Hartmann, and the music-critic Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt into service as lecturers. The concerts did much to familiarize the next generation of German musicians with American Classical music and helped remove some of the prejudices with which they had been raised. (39)

When it came to indigenous, as opposed to American or other European music, politics strongly influenced official tastes. The Americans in Bavaria regarded Carl Orff with considerable disdain because they saw him as overly « bayerisch » ; he was much more popular among the authorities in Stuttgart, where his regionalism carried fewer political implications. In Munich, the control officers favoured Hartmann, a composer of solid political credentials who seemed delighted by the American presence in his city. Hartmann's « Musica Viva » series got the Office of the Military Government, United States' support, through block ticket purchase, a subsidy for concerts featuring American works, and free performance space in the « Amerika Haus » . In Berlin, the Americans' darling was Boris Blacher, for whom John Bitter managed to secure extra-food rations and who became acquainted with a number of wealthy American patrons and influential musicians. In Heidelberg, Jerome Pastene befriended and pushed a young Wolfgang Fortner student, Hans Werner Henze. No one gave Werner Egk or Ernst Pepping much thought ; Richard Strauß and Hans Pfitzner, rightly or wrongly, were regarded as tainted relics from the past. By and large, local governments echoed American preferences so long as the occupiers were watching. Carl Orff was offered a job in Stuttgart, but Munich officials only talked to him in secret ; Hartmann's « Musica Viva » organization received strong backing from the Bavarian and Munich governments, but Strauß and Pfitzner were snubbed. Blacher was the best connected and one of the most performed composers living in the American sector of Berlin. But the man everyone talked about, the dominant composer in both American and German eyes, Paul Hindemith, remained the absent hero in these years. Although politicians and artists begged for his return and his Operas and works were performed in his absence as events (as a kind of ritual act of invocation and contrition) , Hindemith did not visit until 1947 and, then, quietly and on private business.

For 2 years, Hindemith maintained that he would only return if the Military Government sent him on tour as a visiting expert, something the War Department refused to allow as it considered his « connections with the Nazi Party closer than had been supposed in the early days » . Unaware of the blemishes on his record, the field officers continued to promote Hindemith as a symbol of resistance. The Americans urged local musicians to perform his works, especially those composed in America, but the position the composer adopted was that if musicians wanted them, they knew where they could get them : from Schott, his publisher (something they had been able to do throughout the Nazi period) . (40) At one and the same time a symbol of Weimar and of America, of resistance to Nazism and of the « émigrés' » abandonment of their homeland, of new music and old, Hindemith was, in his public image and private dealings, the most complex of composers. And yet, like the others, only more so, he was celebrated by the occupation and the State as a contemporary composer conservative music-lovers might appreciate.

Interestingly, although a great many of the American and modern European composers the Information Control Division promoted were Jewish, the division never specifically advertised the fact. Nor did it ever insist that musicians perform works by Felix Mendelssohn or Gustav Mahler simply because they had previously been banned on « racial » grounds. No one in the Information Control Division ever explained why this was, but one can easily imagine. How would the division have singled-out the works of Jewish composers without re-inforcing Nazi assertions that « race » mattered ? A German population that thought of Jews as different and foreign, and which was now being made to feel guilty for those feelings, would only find re-assurance in an Allied program that racially identified its subjects. Moreover, since many of the American and contemporary European works performed were received unfavorably, one risked re-inforcing stereotypes by drawing attention to the fact that their composers were Jews. And so, even though a number of the regional branch officers and both deputy chiefs Benno Frank and Walter Hinrichsen were Jews, the Information Control Division policy pointedly overlooked the issue. Apparently, the music officers believed the case for tolerance was more powerfully made by presenting Ernst Toch and Boris Blacher as equally German and Aaron Copland, Charles Ives, Igor Stravinsky, and Gian Carlo Menotti as equally American.

As John Evarts maintained in one of his lectures to German audiences :

« America has opened its doors to every type of music from all over the world, and many powerful works have emerged. »

Pointedly, he added, U.S. music was charting « a new direction, one absolutely American, one that draws as much from African rhythms as from the dissonant chords of Claude Debussy, as much from Negro Spirituals as from Jewish liturgical chants ? » (41)

What did tend to unite the composers whom the Music Branch advanced was that they were among the more accessible modernists. Although dissonance was part of their 20th Century musical language, these composers tended to express it without casting away from the traditional tonal moorings ; Darius Milhaud and Paul Hindemith and Roy Harris all shared an interest in polytonal, polymodal, and polyrhythmic effects together with an adherence to the tonic. It is notable that the Americans did little until 1949 to promote the more avant-garde music of their time, whether Henry Cowell's or Arnold Schœnberg's or Olivier Messiaen's. Consequently, the avenues of the avant-garde remained unexplored in the concert-halls in 1945-1946, and it was not only German conservatism that was to blame. American officials were no more fond of 12 tone or politically engaged music than were most Germans. Furthermore, neither Americans nor Germans believed popular music belonged in the concert-hall, and the only Broadway work the Information Control Division reproduced for German use was Kurt Weill's hit « Knickerbocker Holiday » . Some groups, like Hartmann's « Musica Viva » or Wolfgang Steinecke's « Darmstadt Ferienkurse » , did present some of the more adventurous contemporary works, and they did receive the Information Control Division's financial patronage, but the Americans also bemoaned their repertoire. The fact is that the field officers were interested in pushing the boundaries of public taste, not alienating musical conservatives. Although they advanced music they believed would be challenging for audiences, they remained reformers in the concert-hall and not revolutionaries.

Without question, however, the Americans seriously misunderstood the recent history of modern music in Germany. Although it is never a bad thing to attack cultural prejudices, and many people must have profited from their exposure to the new music being composed in the United States and other European countries, the principles on which the field officers based their initiatives were flawed. The Americans were convinced that Nazi Germany had been a cultural desert and that the public needed and appreciated them for supplying the refreshing waters of hitherto unavailable music. What they failed to realize was that much good contemporary music was performed in Hitler's Germany and that, until the War, the country was not closed to the works of British or French or other European composers. Although modern composers like Honegger and Stravinsky were periodically denounced in the Nazi Party press, their compositions continued to be sporadically performed in the 1930's, and some, like Bartók's, never suffered any type of official proscription.

As Jenkins remarked a half-Century later :

« It was ridiculous thinking that we could teach the Germans anything about contemporary music, because they were very good in that themselves. They were very aware of what goes on. Because I remember, even in the early Nazi days, when I was a student in Germany, that the contemporary music festivals used to take place in Baden-Baden and they still had a very powerful bunch of people associated with them and performances from international artists. »

(42)

Unfortunately, not only did the Americans fail to realize that that portion of the concert-going public that was most likely to react favourably to their efforts (students, musicians, and those already interested in contemporary music) was more knowledgeable than they had imagined, but they also made an error in believing that they could force-feed the rest of the audience a diet of contemporary, albeit tonal, music. Ironically, they were attempting to build in Germany what had not developed anywhere : a mass audience for modern music. The field officers were sensible enough to favour in their work composers like Shostakovich and Britten and Copland who were on the more conservative side of the compositional spectrum, but that decision also carried a cost. What the Americans ultimately did was to alienate both the more conservative music-lovers, who avoided concerts featuring American and modern works, and many of the new music cognoscenti, who thought the pieces being offered were too old-fashioned. As a result, although commendable in myriad ways, the branch's efforts on the part of new music were pre-destined to enjoy only modest popularity.

Notes

(30) « Working program for Democratization in Bavaria » , 6 May 1947, file : Bavaria, box 201, Records of the Cultural Exchange Programme, Civil Affairs Division, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Headquarters U.S. Forces, European Theater, « Priority of Information Control Activities » , 28 August 1945, Speech by Brigadier General Robert A. McClure, 27 August 1945, and Information Control Division Standing Directive No. 1, 20 July 1945, entry 172, box 330, War Department, Registry 165, National Archives.

(31) « Re-orientation Activities of ODIC, Theater and Music » , 15 April 1947, and « Reconstruction of Musical Activity in U.S. Zone of Germany since June 1945 » , box 248, General Records, Cultural Relations Branch, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government, United States.

(32) J.F. Edney to Hans Aldenhoff, 18 February 1947, 4/12-2/23, B Rep 36, Landesarchiv Berlin ; G.K. Schueller, « Staatlich genehmigte Gesellschaft zur Verwertung musikalischer Aufführungsrechte » , 24 October 1945, 4/8-3/12, B Rep 36, Landesarchiv Berlin ; Control Officer, « History : Information Services Division, 8 May 1945 - 30 June 1946 » , file : History, box 454, Executive Office, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Film, Theatre and Music Report, April 1946, file : Film, Theatre and Music, box 77, Historical Office, Divisional Headquarters, Information Control Division, Office of the Military Government, United States.

(33) Thacker, « Playing Beethoven Like an Indian » , pages 370-371 ; « Minutes of Preliminary Meeting of Theater and Music Officers » , 20 October 1946, file : Meetings, box 3100, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government Württemberg-Baden, Office of the Military Government, United States ; « History : Information Services Division, 8 May 1945 - 30 June 1946 » , file : History, box 454, Executive Office, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Minutes, ICSG, 7 January 1946, and Minutes of Quadripartite Meeting, 10 May 1946, file : Quadripartite, box 77, Historical Office, Divisional Headquarters, Information Control Division, Office of the Military Government, United States.

(34) « Report to the Department of State of the USIE Survey Mission on the Office of the Military Government, United States Re-orientation Program in Germany » , 21 July 1949, box 205, LOT 53D311, Department of State, Registry 59, National Archives.

(35) For the assistance the officers provided orchestras, see : John Bitter to Virgil Thomson, 2 October 1946, 25/35, Virgil Thomson Papers, Yale University Archives ; Carlos Moseley to Harrison Kerr, 26 February 1948, and Carlos Moseley to Arthur Vogel, 2 March 1948, file : American Personnel, box 18, Cultural Relations Branch, Education and Cultural Relations, OMGB, Office of the Military Government, United States ; interview with Carlos Moseley, 18 March 1996.

(36) John Bitter Scrapbooks, 1945-1948, Private Archive John Bitter, Miami Heidelberg Detachment, Semi-Monthly Report, 10 December 1947, file : Württemberg-Baden, box 240, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government, United States ; John Evarts's Diary, 28 November 1945, Jeremiah Evarts Private Archive, Cornish, New Hampshire ; Weekly report, 15 April 1946, file, Theater and Music, box 20, Administrative Records, Director's Office, Education and Cultural Relations, OMGB, Office of the Military Government, United States ; interview with Newell Jenkins, 6 July 1996 ; Peter Heyworth, Otto Klemperer, Volume 2 : pages 146-147 and 158 ; Ernst Legal to Otto Klemperer, 29 July 1946, C Rep 167/16, Landesarchiv Berlin ; Frederic Mellinger, Weekly Report, 26 June, 3 July, and 5 February 1946, file : Berlin Reports, box 238, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government, United States ; interview with Virginia Pleasants, 19 May 1996 ; Erich Leinsdorf to Harold Spivacke, 25 February 1944, box 9, Joint Army and Navy Committee on Welfare and Recreation : Sub-Committee on Music, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. ; Semi-Monthly Report, 31 December 1947, box 20, General Records, Executive Office, ISB, United States Allied Command Austria.

(37) Rudolph Dunbar was born in British Guyana and grew-up in London. Trained as a band musician, he played in music hall and jazz orchestras and, in the late-1930's, briefly lived in the United States, in Harlem ; see interview with Rudolph Dunbar, 29 November 1938, Federal Writers' Project, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. ; Bi-Weekly Report, 5 September 1945, file : Berlin reports, box 75, Historical Office, Divisional Headquarters, Information Control Division, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Dody Bitter to Virgil Thomson, 12 December 1945, 25/35, Thomson Papers, Yale University Archives ; for Georg Solti : Evarts's Diary, spring-summer 1947, 6, Jeremiah Evarts Private Archive, Cornish, New Hampshire ; I am grateful to Doctor Joan Evarts for providing the date of Hans Rosbaud's 1st performance of an American work ; Württemberg-Baden Theater and Music Weekly Situation Report, 9 March 1946, file ; Weekly Reports, box 239, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government HeBe, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Film, Theater & Music Consolidated Report, March 1946, file : Reports Historical Office, Divisional Headquarters, Information Control Division, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Holger Hagen to William Dubensky, 11 November 1946, file : American Plays and Music, box 727, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government HeBe, Office of the Military Government, United States ; « Re-orientation Activities of ODIC, Theater and Music » , 15 April 1947, file : Re-orientation, box 248, General Records, Cultural Relations Branch, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government, United States.

(38) Weekly Report, 23 November 1946, file : Württemberg-Baden, box 240, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Paul Hindemith to Ernst Schleich, 19 July 1942, 16/296, Paul Hindemith Papers, Yale University Archives ; Weekly Report, 25 January 1947, file : Karlsruhe Outpost, box 599, Theater and Music, Field Relations Division, Office of the Military Government Württemberg-Baden, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Weekly Report, 2 April 1946, file : Bavaria: Weekly Reports, box 239, and Weekly Report, 16 November 1946, file : Württemberg-Baden, box 240, Theater and Music, Education and Cultural Relations, Office of the Military Government, United States.

(39) Interview with Newell Jenkins, 6 July 1996 ; « History of Information Control Division, Württemberg-Baden, to 1 July 1946 » , 29, file : Historical, box 309, Correspondence and General Records, Information Services Division, Office of the Military Government, United States ; Evarts's Diary, spring-summer 1947, 2, Jeremiah Evarts Private Archive, Cornish, New Hampshire.

(40) I am grateful to Toby Thacker for providing the quote regarding Paul Hindemith's dubious past ; on his interest in making sales, see : Paul Hindemith to Willy Strecker, 15 July 1946, in Skelton, Selected Letters, pages 196-200 ; on the availability of his works in the 3rd « Reich » , Kowalke, « Music Publishing and the Nazis » , pages 181-182 ; for a balanced treatment of Hindemith, see : Michæl H. Kater, « Composers of the Nazi Era » , chapter 2.

(41) Evarts, « Von Musikleben in Amerika » , pages 84-85.

(42) Interview with Newell Jenkins, 6 July 1996 ; for new music in Nazi Germany, see : Evans, « International with National Emphasis » and « Die Rezeption der Musik Igor Stravinskys » .

Dénazification du Philharmonique de Berlin

« It was never a Nazi Orchestra » : The American Re-education of the Berlin Philharmonic (I)

(Abby Anderton)

By the conclusion of World War II, Germany had been reduced to a pre-modern society. The brutality of the Nazi Regime, in conjunction with the aerial bombing of the Allies, exacted an inconceivable material and human toll. (2) Berlin, the former « Hauptstadt » of the 3rd « Reich », was little more than a crater whose ruins provided an eerie, phantasmagorical landscape through which survivors could wander. But while rubble could be cleared away and cities rebuilt, how would the Allies monitor German cultural reconstruction to ensure there would not be a revival of Nazism ?

American occupation authorities firmly believed that the Nazis had manipulated German high-culture, and especially music, to serve as a propaganda tool. Consequently, the American Military Government made special provisions for the treatment of culture in the post-War era by creating the Information Control Division (ICD), an organization with branches designed to monitor German radio, literature, film, theater, and music. The Americans, more than any other ally, considered the German musical establishment's relationship to Fascism a dangerous problem and designed their cultural re-education programs with this in mind. As Chief of the Theater and Music section, Benno Frank, contended even 2 years after Germany's surrender :

« Only a few people outside of Germany were familiar with political leaders like Rudolf Heß, Robert Ley, Joachim von Ribbentrop, etc., but artists like Richard Strauß, Gerhard Hauptmann, and Wilhelm Furtwängler were internationally known and recognized. Today, it may be said that Hitler's success in using these prominent cultural figures has decisively contributed to the prestige of the Nazi Regime. » (3)

The American occupiers were well-aware of the regime's former « prestige ». By using Classical music as a re-education tool, American authorities hoped to prove that American high-culture was as refined as Germany's and set about constructing fairly elaborate guide-lines for Classical rather than popular music. (4)

Ultimately, how would the American occupiers perceive their role as re-educators in Berlin, a city whose Classical music culture had been the most highly-politicized in all of the 3rd « Reich » ? At the center of American cultural reconstruction efforts was the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, the most illustrious ensemble residing in the American sector. Beginning in July of 1945, military government authorities regulated the ensemble's repertoire, musicians, and management in accordance with denazification procedures, as the Philharmonic's former role as the « Reich's » chosen Orchestra (« Reichsorchester ») made the Orchestra particularly symbolic for American efforts in post-War Germany.

Still, American authorities would use the Philharmonic in much the same way the National-Socialists had : as an Orchestra for the re-education of audiences. Just as the Philharmonic had once concertized in support of the Nazi War effort, giving lengthy tours throughout occupied Europe, the ensemble was also the sound of the Allied occupation. Of the 70 concerts the Philharmonic played from May until December of 1945, more than 1/3 (28 concerts) were performed especially for Allied soldiers. (5) Whereas the National-Socialists had controlled the Philharmonic's personnel on the basis of race, dismissing the Orchestra's 4 Jewish members in 1935, by 1945, the Americans had black-listed 6 players who were former Nazi Party members. (6) The Berlin Philharmonic's music was as highly-politicized during the War as after, as musicians were subjected to the restrictions of the reigning regime in order to maintain their positions.

In order to investigate why American occupation authorities were so invested in the Philharmonic's rehabilitation, it is essential to understand the Orchestra's cultural context in pre-World War II Germany. The ensemble was created in 1882 as a private corporation, with each musician buying into the Orchestra at 600 « Reichsmarks », giving the Philharmonic complete autonomy. Unfortunately, the Orchestra's business model was unsustainable and the Philharmonic began to have financial difficulties as early as 1912. The Orchestra's dire economic hardships continued throughout the 1920's as conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler and the ensemble's management fiercely campaigned to have the Prussian, « Reich », and Berlin city governments become the Philharmonic's primary shareholders to save the Orchestra from financial ruin. The proposed re-organization ultimately fell through, however, and the Philharmonic's finances remained precarious. (7)

By 1933, as the National-Socialists rose to power, the Philharmonic was 74,000 « Reichsmarks » in debt. But with the creation of the Propaganda Ministry, in 1933, the Philharmonic had found a valuable financial ally, albeit at the price of the Orchestra's artistic autonomy. In January of 1934, Furtwängler made a Faustian bargain with Propaganda Minister Josef Goebbels, agreeing to turn the ownership of the Philharmonic solely over to the « Reich ». (8) Philharmonic members were subsequently required to join the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Chamber of Music), the organization that coordinated the 3rd « Reich's » musical culture, then headed by President Richard Strauß and Vice-President Wilhelm Furtwängler. (9)

But with governmental funding came an increasingly politicized framework in which the Philharmonic had to perform. The National-Socialists wanted to exploit the Orchestra's reputation to lend a patina of respectability to the regime. Between 1934 and 1945, the Orchestra played at « Reichsparteitage » (Nazi Party rallies), Adolf Hitler's birthday celebrations, the « Reichsmusiktage », and Hitler Youth gatherings. During the War, when it was nearly impossible to obtain travel papers to leave Germany, the musicians toured throughout Nazi-occupied Europe, including Belgium, Bulgaria, Croatia, Denmark, France, Holland, Italy, Poland, Romania, Serbia, and Spain. (10) At the close of each concert tour, Orchestra members could bring back food and other materials that had grown scarce in Germany. (11) Not only were they the highest-paid musicians in Germany, Philharmonic musicians were also exempt from military service because Goebbels considered concert tours just as vital as armed combat. (12)

But there were, of course, more sinister undercurrents within the Philharmonic during the 1930's and 1940's. (13) The 4 Jewish members of the Orchestra (Concert-Master Szymon Goldberg, 1st violinist Gilbert Back, and cellists Nicolai Graudan and Joseph Schuster) left Germany by 1935 under mounting pressure from Nazi authorities. (14) 3 more Philharmonic players with Jewish wives immigrated to ensure their safety. (15) By the close of 1935, « Aryanization cards » were required of all Philharmonic players, in order to keep their positions. (16) Furtwängler's long-time secretary, Berta Gießmar, also Jewish, left Germany to work with Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (17)

Apart from an increasingly hostile political environment, the remaining Philharmonic musicians also witnessed the destruction of their city. From 1943 until 1945, Berlin became the most heavily bombarded city in all of World War II, enduring 363 aerial attacks. (18) To avoid American and British night-time bombing raids, Philharmonic evening concerts were rescheduled for 3:00 pm. As attacks became more frequent, all programs were printed with instructions on how to proceed in the event of an air-raid, urging audience members to take shelter in the coat-rooms and hallways of the 1st floor. Lastly, as a special privilege, members of the Philharmonic and their families received Bunker Identification Cards that ensured them a place below ground. (19)

Precautions aside, however, the Philharmonic's hall was hit by British phosphorus bombs on January 29th, 1944, and burned to the ground within a few hours. (21) Even without a home to concertize in, the Orchestra kept performing throughout Germany. The image of Nero fiddling while Rome burned seemed remarkably apt ; even as military defeat became imminent, the Philharmonic's resilience made German cultural achievement appear unflagging. (22) The Philharmonic's final concerts under the 3rd « Reich » took place on April 15th and 16th, 1945, in the « Beethovensaal », next to the ruins of the « Alte Philharmonie ». (23) Robert Heger and George Schumann conducted the ensemble ; Wilhelm Furtwängler had already left for refuge in Switzerland, several months earlier. (24) The Orchestra performed Carl Maria von Weber's « Oberon » Overture, Johannes Brahms's Double Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra, and appropriately enough, Richard Strauß's Tone-Poem « Tod und Verklärung » (Death and Transfiguration) . (25) The last work was an apt choice ; Strauß had written the tone poem to depict an artist on his deathbed contemplating his impending demise.

The 1st post-War Philharmonic concert was given on May 26th, 1945, less than 1 month after Germany's surrender. Hardly any concert venues remained intact, and the Philharmonic's performance was given at the « Titania-Palast » movie theater, in Steglitz, a western suburb of Berlin. Leo Borchard, an extremely capable musician whom the Soviets had found hiding in a cellar during the Battle of Berlin, conducted the ensemble. (In the eyes of the Russians, it did not hurt that Borchard spoke fluent Russian from his childhood spent in Moscow, nor that he had been marginally active in Onkel Emil, a small, underground Communist resistance group that hid Jews and provided them with falsified documents.) (26) At the inaugural post-War performance, Soviet officers entered with pistols brandished in the middle of Felix Mendelssohn's « Midsummer Night's Dream » Overture, conversed loudly during Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major, and left during the final movement of Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony. The German audience was powerless to protest. (27) The repertoire was undoubtedly chosen to reflect the Orchestra's and the nation's break with National-Socialism ; Mendelssohn to re-introduce a work by a formerly « entartete » (degenerate) Jewish composer, and Tchaikovsky to please the Russians. While the German nation may have been defeated militarily, as one post-War music-critic noted :

« In the midst of such shambles, only the Germans could produce a magnificent full-orchestra and a crowded house of music-lovers. » (28)

For just over 2 months, the Philharmonic was under Russian jurisdiction before the Americans arrived in Berlin, on July 7th. (29) The Philharmonic's temporary concert-hall was then taken-over by the American 2nd Panzer Division, which intended to use the « Titania-Palast » for troop variety shows. (30) The American Military's Information Control

Division (ICD) was staffed with civilian experts tasked with re-educating the German people through music, theater, film, radio, and literature. Although the pairing of « Kultur » and military rule would seem to be an odd one, at the height of the re-education project, the ICD employed 35 cultural officers and 150 German employees to monitor culture in Berlin. (31) Although massively understaffed, the « klein, aber fein » (small but fine) music officers were entrusted with an ambitious plan : to re-educate and re-orient the local population by altering the performative context around German Classical music. Effectively, this meant that there would no longer be musical performances to commemorate former Nazi holidays and that no marches or songs with patriotic themes would be performed at any time. « Horst-Wessel-Lied » , the Nazi Party anthem, would no longer open concerts ; and music that had been particularly favoured by the regime would be carefully monitored to ensure it was not misappropriated.

The officer most instrumental in the city's cultural « Wiederaufbau » was John Bitter, head of Berlin's Theater and Music section from 1945 to 1948. After graduating from the Curtis Institute in the 1930's with a degree in conducting, he lived for 1 year in Vienna, free-lancing as a saxophonist and learning German. He led various Florida Orchestras before becoming an Intelligence Officer with the 9th Army in 1942, (32) and at the War's conclusion, he decided to remain in post-War Germany as a music officer. His 1st and last assignment was in Berlin. Music officers took music control seriously because the ICD's perception, in 1945, was that musical life in Germany from 1933 to 1945 had been culturally barren, its very essence tainted and manipulated by Nazism. (33)

On July 31st, British and American cultural officers met to discuss an 8 week plan for the Berlin Philharmonic with Leo Borchard and the Orchestra's business managers. The Americans and British decided that Philharmonic concerts would take place every week-end, at the very least, and would alternate between the American sector's « Titania-Palast » and the British's « Theater des Westens » . The Philharmonic would also be expected to give separate concerts for British and American troops and, as late as January 6th, 1947, fortnightly Monday night concerts were open only to Allied soldiers. (34) Now that the Philharmonic was the resident ensemble of the American sector, it concertized in an exhausting number of venues (including « Zinnwald Saal » in Zehlendorf, « Cosmos-Kino » in Tegel, « Quick Theater » in Neukölln, « Theatre des Westens » , « Titania-Palast » , and the « Deutsches Opernhaus » on « Kantstraße ») while rehearsing primarily in Dahlem's « Jesus-Christus-Gemeinde » church.

Having the most prestigious ensemble in all of Hitler's « Reich » under American control was a boon to cultural and intelligence officers ; what the cultural re-education program lacked in terms of numbers of ensembles could be tempered by the Philharmonic's world-wide renown. (35) According to regulations set forth by the ICD, each West-Berlin ensemble was required to have a license supervised by an American cultural officer. The license was jointly issued in the name of the officer and principal conductor, who were also responsible for the ensemble's artistic integrity. All musicians had to be registered with the ICD in order to ensure they had passed the denazification screening, and repertoire had to be approved 10 days in advance by cultural officers, a policy stringently enforced from September 6th, 1945, until May 31st, 1947. (36)

John Bitter, as the supervisor and military license holder for the Berlin Philharmonic, was involved in everything from locating scores and practice venues to conducting the Orchestra himself on more than 30 occasions, blurring his professional relationship to the ensemble even as he worked tirelessly to ensure the Philharmonic's survival. (37) Bitter understood that the Orchestra was a valuable asset in the game of cultural diplomacy, not only between the Americans and the Germans but also in relation to the other Allies. By mid-August, with the help of Bitter and cultural officer Frederic Mellinger, the Philharmonic had already amassed 100 musicians, and was short by only 10 members. (38)

Apart from shortages of musicians, however, musical scores were also difficult to find. Not only had countless scores been destroyed in the city's fire bombing, but it was nearly impossible to print new music due to a paper shortage that persisted until 1947. (The American Military Government even resorted to reusing certain Nazi Party office supplies for inter-office communication.) (39) Although some of the Philharmonic's music had been moved from Berlin to a basement in Bayreuth, it would take American cultural officers over 1 year to arrange for its return. Significantly, American Military documents make note only of the music's weight (250 pounds), rather than what scores were actually in the cache. According to one music officer, the re-acquisition was especially fortunate for the Philharmonic, as their programs were « increasingly cramped » (40) due to the absence of the scores. Furthermore, many of the Berlin Philharmonic's instruments were gone, having either been stolen from their hiding place in the Plaßenburg, a Renaissance fortress outside Bayreuth, or looted from the Philharmonic's basement and bunker.

Erich Hartmann writes :

« Likewise, the instruments that had survived the fire bombing in the basement of the “ Alte Philharmonie ” fell into the enemies' hands as booty, and were taken East. » (41)

Note that Hartmann makes certain to use « Feinden » or enemies, when referring to the Russians.

Although the Americans may have been victorious militarily, cultural re-education was still an arena in which they were at a decided disadvantage. Especially when compared to the Soviet occupiers, who well understood the value of music, art, and theater in promoting a political agenda, the Americans had difficulty implementing consistent policies in regard to denazification and re-education. While cultural officers were generally specialists in their respective fields, their superiors, like Military Governor Lucius Clay, were career military men who had difficulty grasping that high-culture could provide anything more than mere entertainment. Consequently, the denazification and re-education agendas often pitted cultural officers against their military superiors.

Bitter did not appreciate his inferiors' lax attitudes toward the Philharmonic ; he was fully aware that the Orchestra could choose to move to the British, or worse yet, Russian zone. Infuriated that other military branches could not see the benefits of the ICD's German re-education program, Bitter complained that military personnel would use the « Titania-Palast » for mere variety shows, as he felt these trivial offerings had « a disastrous effect » on the re-orientation program.

He explained :

« It is of the utmost importance, that we get the ear of a high-authority in this matter so that the “ Titania ”, our best U.S. sector theatre, is not used for 2nd rate variety shows. » (42)

Bitter was not the only person annoyed by the variety shows ; when violinist Yehudi Menuhin came to Berlin to perform with the Philharmonic, in 1947, he had to plead with the military police on duty to allow the rehearsal to continue a few minutes past 5 o'clock. In the photographs, Furtwängler, leaning on the podium railing, is silently and uneasily observing the exchange. (43)

But the gravest error made by the American Military, in terms of cultural re-education, was the accidental shooting of the Philharmonic's conductor. Around midnight, on August 23rd, 1945, Leo Borchard was killed immediately when a young American soldier opened fire on the car in which Borchard was traveling after the vehicle's driver had failed to stop at a mandatory check-point. According to eyewitness testimony, Borchard's final words, uttered moments before the accident, were simply :

« Next time, I will play Bach for you. » (44)

As one might imagine, Borchard's death, only 6 weeks after the American arrival, did little to endear the occupiers to German musicians. An untimely 4 days after his death, « Newsweek » ran an article on Borchard that made no mention of his death. Instead of his shooting, the magazine cheerily reported :

« The problem of German music involves not only what to play - but who can be trusted to play it. Leo Borchard, 46 year old conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic is the only man, according to many critics, around whom the Orchestra can hope to rebuild. » (45)

The story continued that Borchard couldn't leave Berlin because the Nazis had prevented his wife from fleeing ; the entire article was a fabrication - doubly so, now that the article's protagonist was dead. It was not until 1955, 10 years after the shooting, that the American military government declared Borchard's death a « Besatzungsschaden » (occupation casualty) , placing the blame on the British. (46)

For the 1st time in its history, the Philharmonic was now without a clear successor for its conductorship. On August 25th, 2 days after Borchard's death, Robert Heger led the Philharmonic in a performance that opened with the Funeral March of Beethoven's « Eroica » Symphony, dedicated to Borchard. (47) Only 3 months earlier, the same movement had been used to mourn Adolf Hitler's death. But American authorities refused to consider Heger, who had been an active Nazi Party member, to be a legitimate replacement for Borchard. (48) Cultural officers wanted desperately to find a new director who was free from the political trappings of Nazi Party membership when an unexpected solution appeared in the form of a 28 year old Romanian musician with dapper good looks and excellent timing.

In May of 1945, Sergiu Celibidache turned-down the chance to flee Berlin as it fell to the Russians. When a group of fellow Romanians offered him a spot in their car heading West, Celibidache declined, reluctant to leave his composition manuscripts behind in Berlin. (49) His fortuitous decision to remain in the city would shape his future career path as a conductor, rather than as a composer. On August 29th, the very day of Borchard's funeral, Celibidache conducted the Philharmonic for the 1st time. While Bitter is usually credited with finding Celibidache to lead the Philharmonic, it was actually violinist Hermann Bethmann, who had studied with Celibidache at the « Berlin Hochschule für Musik », who recommended « Celi » (as he would quickly be nicknamed) to lead the Orchestra. (50) To the Americans, Celibidache appeared to be the perfect fit for the Philharmonic : he had lived in Berlin since 1936, but had not been a Nazi Party member nor had he served in the « Wehrmacht ». Apart from these qualifications, he was young, energetic, and non-German. By installing a foreigner as principal conductor of the Philharmonic, American authorities hoped to dispel any lingering Nazi claims of German cultural superiority, once and for all. (51)

Ultimately, one might wonder why Philharmonic musicians and management accepted American occupation policies within Germany's cultural sphere. Undoubtedly, the lengthy denazification process that lasted from 1945 until 1947 was one indisputable reason why German musicians acquiesced to American restrictions. Although Nazi Party membership had not been rampant within the Berlin Philharmonic, each musician still needed to obtain American approval to continuing working in or obtain ration cards for the American sector. It is estimated that around 10 of the 110 musicians in the Berlin Philharmonic were members of the Nazi Party. By comparison, 45 of the Vienna Philharmonic's 117 musicians had been Party members. (52) This disparity did not go un-noticed, as Bitter admitted in an April 1947 report :

« In contrast to the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic has always gotten away with murder in its prodigal use of Nazi members. » (53)

Party members in the Vienna Philharmonic faced few consequences as Austria had already been declared the « 1st victim » of National-Socialism.

The ICD did fire 6 Berlin Philharmonic musicians for their Nazi Party membership, most notably violinist Joseph Stöhr and violist Lorenz Höber, in December of 1945. Höber had been responsible for many of the Philharmonic's administrative tasks and was particularly reluctant to relinquish his position.

As Music and Theater officer, Edward Hogan wrote in May of 1946 :

« We are told that Höber, the former business manager whom we fired on order of Public Safety, still can't get it through his head that the Americans can get rid of him even though he was hired by the city of Berlin. » (54)

Both Höber and Stöhr were hired by the Russian-controlled « Staatsoper » in the Spring of 1946. (55) Höber, however, remained devastated over his dismissal from the Philharmonic, an ensemble to which he had dedicated half of his life ; he died shortly thereafter, on December 1st, 1947. (56) Several other musicians fired by the Americans for their Party membership found work elsewhere : cellist Wolfram Kleber moved to the British-controlled « Städtisches Oper » Orchestra, and horn player George Hedler joined the « RIAS » Orchestra in 1947. (This is particularly surprising as the « RIAS » Orchestra was founded and funded by the Americans.) (57) Violinist Alfred Graupner and double bassist Arno Burkhardt were also fired by American authorities for their Nazi Party memberships, but were rehired in 1947 when denazification was halted. (58)

The sub-text of the American denazification efforts revolved around one question : When would the Philharmonic's former conductor, Wilhelm Furtwängler, be allowed to return ? Since February of 1945, Furtwängler had been living in self-imposed exile in Clarens, Switzerland. As the conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic since 1922, he led the Orchestra at countless Nazi Party functions throughout the 1930's and 1940's, although he was not a Nazi Party member. Despite Furtwängler's insistence that his music could be separate from Nazi politics, his post-War reputation was severely compromised and, in February of 1946, ICD Chief Robert McClure announced Furtwängler's black-listing to be enforced across all zones and sectors of Germany :

« It is an indisputable fact that through his activities, Furtwängler was prominently identified with Nazi Germany. By allowing himself to become a tool of the Party, he lent an aura of respectability to the circle of men who are now on trial at Nuremberg for crimes against humanity. He not only held office under the Nazis, but also was an advisor to the Propaganda Ministry and lent his name to tours abroad sponsored by Gœbbels. It is inconceivable that he should be allowed to occupy a leading position in Germany, at a time when we are attempting to wipe-out every trace of Nazism. » (59)

The conductor had, indeed, served as Vice-President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , although he resigned the position in 1934, in support of Paul Hindemith, whose Opera « Mathis der Maler » was deemed unfit by the National-Socialists. (Apart from his « Reichsmusikkammer » Vice-Presidency, he also temporarily gave-up his conductorship of the Berlin Philharmonic and musical directorship of the « Staatsoper » .) (60) But his resistance to the Nazis only lasted so long and, in the spring of 1935, Furtwängler issued a letter of apology to the regime. Although he did not resume his position as Vice-President, he returned to conducting the Philharmonic at the close of April. (61) Still, contrary to McClure's claim that Furtwängler had « lent his name to tours abroad » , it was Hans Knappertsbusch who led most of the Philharmonic's concert tours in occupied countries, (62) although Furtwängler had toured with the Vienna Philharmonic in occupied Hungary and Czechoslovakia. He also conducted in neutral Switzerland at a concert sponsored by the National-Socialists. (63)

Furtwängler's denazification process dragged on for nearly 2 years, as American authorities vacillated between wanting to punish National-Socialism's most decorated conductor and still retaining his services in West-Berlin. Meanwhile, the Soviets openly campaigned for Furtwängler's return, tempting him with offers to conduct at the « Staatsoper » rather than waiting for American clearance to return to the Philharmonic. (64) The Russians were more than willing to overlook Furtwängler's recent past for a chance to have him working in their sector. But Furtwängler remained steadfast ; he only wanted to be re-instated to conduct his beloved Philharmonic. He knew it would be a symbolic victory if he could resume his former post rather than accepting the Soviets' offer. So, he decided to wait.

His denazification trial date was finally arranged for December of 1946.

As Bitter wrote in an October 1946 report :

« Furtwängler will be permitted the use of a lawyer, but for advice only. He must do all the talking himself. » (65)

The conductor's trial took place on December 11th and 17th, 1946, in front of a packed hall and was led by intelligence officer Alex Vogel. Various witnesses were called, including Philharmonic clarinetist Ernst Fischer, who claimed the conductor saved his Jewish wife from deportation. (66) After 4 months of deliberation, on April 29th, 1947, the American Military Government classified Furtwängler as a « Mitläufer » (follower) and placed him in Category IV, which meant he could still hold a leadership position and return to the Philharmonic. (67)

Ultimately, Furtwängler's crime was not that he was a Fascist, but rather that he failed to or did not want to recognize the dangerously politicized role the Philharmonic had taken on during the 3rd « Reich ». Although Furtwängler claimed to have found the Nazis' cultural politics distasteful, they still provided a platform from which he could conduct in front of packed concert-halls. And he was duly compensated for his work under the 3rd « Reich » ; in 1939 alone, he made 200,000 « Reichsmarks ». (68)

Furtwängler was, of course, not the only famous musician to undergo post-War scrutiny ; Herbert von Karajan, Eugen Jochum, Hans Knappertsbusch, Richard Strauß, Heinz Tietjen, and countless others faced denazification proceedings conducted by the Allies. Conductor Herbert von Karajan had joined the Nazi Party in 1933 while living in Salzburg, where he quickly became a rising star. (Just to make sure, he joined the Party again, in 1935, when he relocated to Ulm.) Karajan, like Furtwängler, had been black-listed by the ICD in 1945, but was re-instated in October of 1947. (69) Music officer Henry Alter, stationed in Vienna after his initial months in Berlin, admitted of the denazification of both Karajan and Furtwängler :

« It was an unsolvable problem. Every person who had heard Karajan once make music knew that if one did not allow such a person to make music, one would be punishing oneself and not him. Under these conditions, it was really not possible to handle Karajan in any way fairly or justly. Actually, it was similar with Furtwängler. » (70)

Alter's comments underscore the seemingly contradictory manner in which the ICD handled these denazification proceedings, as both men returned to the stage within 2 years of the War's end. Ultimately, the Americans did not want to lose Karajan or Furtwängler from their zone. The ICD recognized that 2 of the most famous musicians in Germany would make better allies than enemies.

Despite Furtwängler's re-instatement, the Philharmonic's working conditions were still dire. As Bitter wrote in an August 1947 report :

« The Philharmonic is in a bad way. 5 of its best 1st violinists have left the Orchestra. In fact, it is about 20 players shy of full-strength. The morale is low and because of low-wage scale, the coming winter, the political situation, etc. , the prospects for the future are poor. However, the plans for the next season are ambitious and energetic steps are being taken to right the situation. » (71)

But the situation in 1948 would prove to be even more difficult, as the Americans barred the Philharmonic from concertizing in the Soviet sector. Residing in the American sector not only required that the Orchestra would be at the disposal of American and British authorities ; it also meant that as the Cold War became increasingly hot, the ensemble could not openly support the Soviet's « Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands » (Socialist Unity Party of Germany) . (72)

In a later interview, Bitter recalled his impetus to work in post-War Germany :

« I said to myself, now the War is over ; now, I would like to help rebuild the good Germany ; that of Beethoven, Schiller, Gœthe, and Brahms. One cannot always continue to conduct War. » (73)

So, instead, he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic some 30 times during his tenure (1945-1948) . Bitter's statement was somewhat disingenuous : rather than simply working with the ensemble, he was also interested in using his military connections to further his musical career by gaining valuable experience for his return to civilian life. For his 1st performance for American troops, on December 10th, 1945, he opened with John Phillip Sousa's « The Stars and Stripes Forever » in a program that also included the German premiere of Samuel Barber's « Adagio for Strings » . (74)

Note that a waltz from Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » is penciled in at the bottom of the program, serving as the encore. Strauß, of course, was one of the very composers the ICD had planned to downplay in post-War Germany. (76)

Ultimately, the Philharmonic's music in German post-War society was re-politicized, with the primary difference being the regime for whom they performed. Near the end of his memoir about the Berlin Philharmonic, in the early post-War years, double-bassist Erich Hartmann contends that the ensemble « belonged to the privileged in the Nazi era, though it was never a Nazi Orchestra. » (77) Hartmann's observations raise far more questions than they answer, highlighting the contradictory and uncomfortable cultural politics of the post-War period. Although American authorities viewed the Philharmonic's survival a success for American re-education efforts, the Orchestra's own role during National-Socialism went un-mentioned. After all, the ensemble was already in the service of another patron.

Notes

(1) The quotation is taken from Erich Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker in der Stunde Null : Erinnerungen an die Zeit des Untergangs der alten Philharmonie vor 50 Jahren » , Werner Feja, Berlin (1996) ; pages 49-50.

(2) For more on the destruction wrought by Allied bombing, see : Paul Steege, Black Market, Cold War : Everyday Life in Berlin, 1946-1949, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge (2007) , page 20 ; Tony Judt, Postwar : A History of Europe since 1945, Penguin Books, New York (2005) , pages 13-40 ; Eric Rentschler, « The Place of Rubble in the Trümmerfilm » , in : The Ruins of Modernity, edited by Julia Hell and Andreas Schönle, Duke University Press, Durham (2010) , pages 418-438, <http://dx.doi.org/10.1215/9780822390749-024> ; Brewster Chamberlain, « Kultur auf Trümmern : Berliner Berichte der amerikanischen Information Control Section, Juli-Dezember 1945 » , Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart (1979) , pages 1-20, <http://dx.doi.org/10.1524/9783486703412.fm> ; and Wolfgang Schivelbusch, In a Cold Crater : Cultural and Intellectual Life in Berlin 1945-1948, translated by Kelly Barry, University of California Press, Berkeley (1998) , pages 20-48.

(3) Benno Frank, « Theater and Music as a Principle Part of Re-orientation in Germany » , September 16, 1947, RG 260, Box 241, Records of the Education and Cultural Affairs Division (E&CR) : Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(4) Early military government documents outlining cultural re-education plans made no secret of the fact that American authorities hoped to wage a kind of cultural warfare by promoting American cultural achievements. Music and theater officer John Bitter admitted, « The re-orientation of German cultural life is an important part of the War Department's policy towards present-day Germany. No factor can be healthier or more stabilizing than a vital re-adjustment of the theatre and music world enabling new plays and music, particularly American, to be presented freely and according to the finest tradition. » , in : « Travel Orders for Prominent Artists » , April 8, 1947, RG 260, Box 238, Records of the Education and Cultural Affairs Division : Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(5) I am grateful to Berlin Philharmonic archivists Franziska Gulde-Druet and Claudia Mohr for sharing this unpublished list of concerts.

(6) Gerhard Forck, editor, « Variationen mit Orchester : 125 Jahre Berliner Philharmoniker » , Henschel, Berlin (2007) ; 2:20, page 43.

(7) In 1931, the city even merged the Berlin Symphony Orchestra with the Philharmonic in order to re-allocate additional funds. Unfortunately, the additional funds were not enough to sustain the Philharmonic. Pamela Potter, « The Nazi ' Seizure ' of the Berlin Philharmonic » , in : National-Socialist Cultural Policy, edited by Glenn Cuomo, Saint-Martin's Press, New York (2005) ; pages 42-47.

(8) Ibid. , pages 50-51.

(9) Although Richard Strauß's relationship to the Nazi Regime has long been maligned, he was also greatly concerned with protecting his Jewish daughter-in-law and his 2 grandsons. Josef Goebbels eventually fired him in 1935 when the « Gestapo » intercepted Strauß's letter to his librettist Stephan Zweig, in which Strauß wrote he was merely « play-acting » as « Reichsmusikkammer » president. For more, see : Michæl H. Kater, The Twisted Muse : Musicians and Their Music in the 3rd « Reich » , Oxford University Press, New York (1997) ; pages 18-21, <http://dx.doi.org/10.1093/acprof:oso/9780195096200.001.0001> ; Erik Levi, Music in the 3rd « Reich » , Saint-Martin's Press, Basingstoke (1994) , pages 30-31 ; and Pamela Potter, « Strauß and the National-Socialists : The Debate and Its Relevance » , in : Richard Strauß : New Perspectives on the Composer and His Work, edited by Bryan Gilliam, Duke University Press, Durham (1992) , pages 93-113.

(10) See : Potter, « Nazi ' Seizure ' » , page 58 ; and Misha Aster, « Das Reichsorchester : Die Berliner Philharmoniker und der Nationalsozialismus » , Siedler, Munich (2007) , pages 181-234. Aster writes that, at the August 1936 «

Parteitage » in Nuremberg, in 1 day alone, the Philharmonic managed to play for a larger audience than had comprised their entire previous season.

(11) Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker » ; pages 16-24.

(12) Wolf Lepenies, « Eine (fast) alltägliche deutsche Geschichte » , foreword to « Das Reichsorchester : Die Berliner Philharmoniker und der Nationalsozialismus » , by Misha Aster, Siedler, Munich (2007) ; page 19. Philharmonic members earned 10 % more than any other musicians in Germany. See, also : Potter, « Nazi ‘ Seizure ’ » ; page 58.

(13) Approximately 10 Philharmonic musicians were casualties of the War, killed either by bombing raids or during voluntary military service. Aster, « Das Reichsorchester » ; page 327.

(14) Although the musicians were not openly dismissed, the Propaganda Ministry placed increasing pressure on the Philharmonic management and Furtwängler to « aryanize » the Orchestra. In a 1985 interview, Elizabeth Furtwängler, the conductor's 2nd wife, vehemently denied that it was the Orchestra's decision to force-out its Jewish members. Ultimately, none of the Jewish musicians who had left the Berlin Philharmonic would resume their positions in the post-War period, although Joseph Schuster did return as a guest-artist for Antonín Dvořák's Cello Concerto, in 1963. For more information, see : Aster, « Das Reichsorchester » , pages 95, 99-104 ; Klaus Lang, « Celibidache und Furtwängler : Der große philharmonische Konflikt in der Berliner Nachkriegszeit » , Wissner, Augsburg (2010) , page 53 ; Enrique Sánchez Lansch, « Das Reichsorchester » , DVD, Arthaus Musik, Leipzig (2008) ; and Boris Schwarz, « Szymon Goldberg » , in : Grove Music Online. Oxford Music Online, accessed August 1, 2011, <http://www.oxfordmusiconline.com> .

(15) Potter, « Nazi ‘ Seizure ’ » ; page 53.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Berta Gießmar, 2 Worlds of Music, Da Capo Press, New York (1975) ; and Gießmar, « The Baton and the Jackboot » , H. Hamilton, London (1946) .

(18) Steege, Black Market, Cold War ; page 20.

(19) Forck, « Variationen mit Orchester » ; 2:166.

(20) « In an air-raid, all listeners must adjourn to the coat-rooms and breezeways located on the ground-floor. » Concert Program from June 27, 1943, B 30 1942-1943, Courtesy of the Berlin Philharmonic Archive.

(21) Prior to the hall's destruction, the ensemble concertized in a converted roller-skating rink located at No. 21 « Bernburger-Straße » , not far from the Philharmonic's home today, at Potsdamer Platz. Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker » ; pages 16-17.

(22) German concert life continued even as Opera Houses in Berlin, Munich, Dresden, Leipzig, Frankfurt, and Hamburg were destroyed ; the frequency of performances began to slow only with Josef Gœbbels' August 1944 declaration of « Total War » . See : Kater, Twisted Muse, pages 1-42, 200 ; Levi, Music in the 3rd « Reich » , pages 130-182 ; and Alan Steinweis, Art, Ideology, and Economics : The « Reich » Chambers of Music, Theater and the Visual Arts, University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill (1993) ; pages 32-69.

(23) Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker » , pages 27-28, and Aster, « Das Reichsorchester » , page 326. There are some discrepancies concerning when the last concert before the « Zusammenbruch » (Collapse) took place ; a 1956 pamphlet produced by the Philharmonic, « Das Berliner Philharmonische Orchester nach dem zweiten Weltkrieg » gives April 8, 1945 as the date of the final concert. The Philharmonic Online Archive does not list the concert at all, and shows only a concert on March 19 as the final performance (<http://www.berliner-philharmoniker.de/konzerte/kalender/von/1944-08/>) . Potter (« Nazi ' Seizure ' » , page 58) lists the final performance, « a concert for Mister Speer » , as occurring on April 11.

(24) David Monod, Settling Scores : German Music, Denazification, and the Americans 1945-1954, University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill (2005) ; page 128.

(25) The soloists that evening were violinist Siegfried Borries and cellist Tibor de Machula.

(26) Thomas Eickhoff, « Politischen Dimensionen einer Komponisten-Biographie im 20.Jahrhundert-Gottfried von Einem » , Steiner, Stuttgart (1998) ; page 76. See, also : Matthias Sträßner, « Der Dirigent Leo Borchard : Eine unvollendete Karriere » , Transit Buchverlag, Berlin (1999) ; page 213. Although the Philharmonic would become an American-licensed ensemble, the Soviets had control of the entire city until early July.

(27) For an eyewitness account of the 1st post-War concert, see : Peter Muck, « Einhundert Jahre Berliner Philharmonisches Orchester, Zweiter Band : 1922-1982 » , Hans Schneider, Tutzing (1982) ; page 190.

(28) Solly Zuckermann, From Apes to Warlords : The Autobiography (1904-1946) of Solly Zuckerman, Hamish Hamilton, London (1978) ; page 192.

(29) Berlin was divided according to the agreement made at the Yalta Conference in February 1945, and once the other Allies arrived, the Soviets receded to their own sector of the city.

(30) It was standard practice for the Americans to seize theaters throughout occupied Germany ; according to Circular 120, Headquarters, U.S. Forces, European Theater, « In localities where only one such facility exists in useful condition, a sharing of time between troops and civilians will be arranged. » Quoted in : J.H. Hills, « Use of Deutsches Theater, Wiesbaden » , January 4, 1946, RG 260, Box 134, Records of the Information Control Division : Central Decimal File of the Executive Office, 1944-1949, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(31) « Application for Employment, John Bitter » , June 25, 1949, RG 260, Box 18, Records of the Education and Cultural Relations Division, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(32) Monod, Settling Scores ; pages 13, 38. In the 1930's, Bitter conducted the Jacksonville Orchestra, the Florida Federal Orchestra, and the Miami Symphony Orchestra.

(33) For more on this misconception, see : Pamela Potter, « What is ' Nazi Music ' ? » , The Musical Quarterly, Volume 88, No. 3 (2005) ; pages 428-455, <http://dx.doi.org/10.1093/musqtl/gdi019>.

(34) John Bitter, « Theater and Music Weekly Report » , RG 260, Box 239, Records of the Education and Cultural Resources Branch, Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(35) The matter of where the Philharmonic would reside was not decided until 1946 ; the British also hoped to woo the Orchestra into making Charlottenburg's « Theater des Westens » their home. Sträßner, « Der Dirigent Leo Borchard » ; page 230.

(36) « Discontinuance of Information Control Registration of Actors, Performers, Musicians, and Certain Other Persons » , May 27, 1947, RG 260, Box 238, Records of the Education and Cultural Affairs Division : Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(37) Jan-Holger Hanke, « Doch Nikolai schaut weg. » Interview with John Bitter, « Junge Welt » , December 17, 1990.

(38) Sträßner, « Der Dirigent Leo Borchard » ; page 230.

(39) Toby Thacker, « Playing Beethoven like an Indian » , in : The Post-War Challenge : Cultural, Social, and Political Change in Western Europe, 1945-1958, edited by Dominick Geppert, Oxford University Press, Oxford (2003) , pages 369-371 ; and Alex Ross, The Rest is Noise : Listening to the 20th Century, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, New York (2007) , page 349.

(40) « Weekly Reports » , Records of the Education and Cultural Resources Branch. Records Relating to Music and Theater. RG 260, Box 239, and « Music Material of the Berlin Philharmonic » , April 10, 1946, Records of the Education and Cultural Relations Division. Bavaria : The Music Section, 1945-1949. RG 260, Box 19. In his May 23, 1946, report, Berlin music officer Edward Hogan remarks of the Philharmonic's busy schedule, not without a touch of sarcasm : « It was a particularly strenuous week-end for the band. »

(41) « Ebenso fielen die Instrumente, die in den Kellern der alten Philharmonie das Bombenfeuer überstanden hatten, den Feinden als Beute in die Hände und wurden nach Osten mitgenommen. » Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker » ; page 34.

(42) John Bitter, « 16-30 November 1947 » , National Archives Records : Shipment 4, Box 8-1, Folder 2, May 1946 to November 1948, B Rep. 036 Nummer 4/8-1/2, Landesarchiv, Berlin.

(43) « Tumult um Karten » , « Der Spiegel » , October 4, 1947.

(44) Ruth Andreas-Friedrich, « Der Schattenmann : Tagebuchaufzeichnungen von Ruth Andreas-Friedrich » , Suhrkamp, Berlin (2000) ; page 291.

(45) « Leo Borchard » , Newsweek, August 27, 1945.

(46) Lang, « Celibidache und Furtwängler » ; page 19.

(47) Sträßner, « Der Dirigent Leo Borchard » ; page 235.

(48) According to initial American denazification policies, Berlin's orchestral conductors, soloists, and managers were not considered « ordinary labour » , and were, therefore, held to a higher-denazification standard. In practice, however, the Americans would soon realize that it was precisely the leaders of these organizations who were the most compromised. Eric Clarke, « Military Government Regulation 23.331-Section 2-d, Ordinary Labour » , May 21, 1946, RG 260, Box 237, Records of the Education and Cultural Affairs Division : Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II. See, also : Toby Thacker, Music after Hitler, 1945-1955, Ashgate Publishing, Hampshire (2007) ; pages 51-63.

(49) Quoted in Lang, « Celibidache und Furtwängler » ; page 26.

(50) See : Monod, Settling Scores, page 38 ; and Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker » , pages 42-45.

(51) One of the primary goals of the re-orientation program in Germany was to broaden the range of musical activity, and « to increase respect for cultural attainments of other nations » , in : « Directive on United States Objectives and Basic Policy in Germany » , July 15, 1947, RG 260, Box 133, Records of the Information Control Division, Central Decimal File of the Executive Office, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(52) Fritz Trümpi, « Politisierte Orchester : Die Wiener Philharmoniker und das Berliner Philharmonische Orchester im Nationalsozialismus » , Böhlau Verlag, Vienna (2011) , page 113 ; Judt, Post-War, page 52 ; and Lepenies, « Eine (fast) alltägliche deutsche Geschichte » , page 18.

(53) John Bitter, « Weekly Theater and Music Report, 30 April 1947 » , RG 260, Box 241, Records of the Education and Cultural Affairs Division : Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(54) Edward Hogan, « Weekly Report » , May 23, 1946, RG 260, Box 239, Records of the Education and Cultural Resources Branch, Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(55) Walter Hinrichsen, « Members of the Philharmonic Orchestra Berlin being discharged in Accordance with Denazification Policy in the U.S. Zone » , June 25, 1946, RG 260, Box 237, Records of the Education and Cultural Affairs Division : Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(56) Forck, « Variationen mit Orchester » , 2:54. The Americans then appointed Paul Schrör and Ernst Fuhr as the new managers (« Geschäftsführung ») of the Philharmonic. The following year, the Philharmonic decided to replace Schrör with Richard Wolff, as Wolff was a senior Orchestra member. John Bitter, « Theater and Music Weekly Report » , November 20, 1946, RG 260, Box 239, Records of the Education and Cultural Resources Branch, Records Relating to Music and Theater, National Archives and Records Administration II. See, also : Lang, « Celibidache und Furtwängler » , page 77 ; and Muck, « Einhundert Jahre » , page 205.

(57) Ibid. , pages 48, 67-108.

(58) Forck, « Variationen mit Orchester » ; 2:20, page 43.

(59) Robert McClure, « For Release February 21, 1946 » , RG 260, Box 43, Records of the Information Control Division : Records of Division Headquarters, 1945-1949, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(60) Susanne Stähr, « Die Ära Furtwängler, das Dritte Reich und der Krieg » , in : Forck, « Variationen mit Orchester » , 1:156. Stähr claims Hitler forbade Furtwängler to travel outside of Germany (« Ausreiseverbot ») shortly before Christmas in 1934.

(61) Karen Painter, Symphonic Aspirations : German Music and Politics, 1900-1945, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts (2007) , pages 209-220 ; Levi, Music in the 3rd « Reich » , pages 112-113 ; Stähr, « Die Ära Furtwängler » , 1:159.

(62) Stähr, « Die Ära Furtwängler » , 1:160.

(63) Kater, Twisted Muse ; page 201.

(64) Elizabeth Janik, Recomposing German Music : Political and Musical Tradition in Cold War Berlin, Brill, Leiden (2005) ; pages 134-139.

(65) John Bitter, « Theater and Munich Report » , October 24, 1946, RG 260, Box 239, Records of the Education and Cultural Resources Branch, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(66) Aster, « Das Reichsorchester » ; page 106.

(67) Stähr, « Die Ära Furtwängler » ; 1:195-196.

(68) Kater, Twisted Muse ; pages 8-11.

(69) Ibid. , 209.

(70) Interview with Henry Alter conducted by Brewster Chamberlain and Jürgen Wetzel, May 11, 1981. B Rep. 037, Nummer 79-82, Landesarchiv, Berlin.

(71) John Bitter, « August 15-31, 1947 Report » , National Archives Records : Shipment 4, Box 8-1, Folder 2, May 1946 to November 1948, B Rep. 036, Nummer 4/8-1/2, Landesarchiv, Berlin.

(72) Ibid.

(73) John Bitter, interview by Brewster Chamberlain and Jürgen Wetzel, November 6, 1981, B Rep. 037, Nummer 79-82, Landesarchiv, Berlin.

(74) Henry Alter, interview by Brewster Chamberlain and Jürgen Wetzel, May 11, 1981, B Rep. 037, Nummer 79-82, Landesarchiv, Berlin. I am grateful to Professor Steven Whiting for pointing-out the elegiac connotations of Samuel Barber's « Adagio » in relation to Arturo Toscanini's radio broadcast marking Franklin Delano Roosevelt's death. Whether Bitter had this performance in mind when he selected the « Adagio » is unknown.

(75) P 1945 XII 10, Berlin Philharmonic Archive. The Tchaikovsky and Sibelius selections were broadcast by Soviet-controlled Berlin Radio, as indicated by the marginal annotations « Funk » (Radio) .

(76) In the earliest American music control document from June of 1945, the Information Control Division admitted, « We cannot ban performances containing works by Richard Strauß or Hans Pfitzner. We should, however, not allow such composers to be “ built-up ” by special concerts devoted entirely to their works or conducted by them. » In « Draft Guidance on the Control of Music » , June 8, 1945, RG 260, Box 134, Records of the Information Control Division : Central Decimal File of the Executive Office, 1944-1949, National Archives and Records Administration II.

(77) Hartmann, « Die Berliner Philharmoniker » ; pages 49-50.

Le Philharmonique de Vienne sous le « Reich »

À la suite de la demande par l'historien Harald Walser, député autrichien du parti des Verts, de l'examen, par une commission indépendante, de l'histoire de l'Orchestre entre 1938 (« Anschluß ») et 1945 (effondrement du 3e « Reich ») , l'Orchestre, après un 1er refus, ouvre finalement ses archives en janvier 2013 à 3 historiens.

À l'origine de cette décision se trouve la révélation par Harald Walser et Oliver Rathkolb de l'attribution à Arthur Seyß-Inquart, en 1942, et Baldur von Schirach, en 1966, de l' « Anneau d'honneur » , la plus haute distinction décernée par l'Orchestre. Harald Walser considère en outre que le « Concert du Nouvel An » de 1939 était non un « hommage sublime à l'Autriche » , ainsi que le présente le site internet de l'Orchestre, mais l'une des « facettes de la politique culturelle Nazie » et regrette que la mémoire des musiciens de l'Orchestre d'origine juive « déportés et assassinés par les Nazis » ne soit pas honorée.

Selon Clemens Hellsberg, 1er violon et président du Conseil d'administration des « Wiener Philharmoniker », la remise de l'anneau au « Gauleiter » de Vienne von Schirach est une initiative individuelle et il n'en existe « aucune trace dans les archives » dont il rappelle qu'elles sont totalement et librement accessibles aux historiens. Il précise que l'ouvrage de l'historien Fritz Trümpi, publié en 2011, témoigne de la transparence à ce sujet.

Oliver Rathkolb, professeur à l'Université de Vienne, à l'origine de la découverte récente d'informations relatives à la proximité d'Herbert von Karajan avec le régime Nazi, est responsable de l'étude. Il est associé à Fritz Trümpi (orchestres politisés : l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Vienne et l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin sous le National-Socialisme) et Bernadette Mayrhofer, historienne dont la recherche porte sur l'exclusion et la déportation des musiciens juifs.

Les 3 historiens sont chargés de rendre un rapport sur « la politisation de l'Orchestre sous le Nazisme », « les biographies des musiciens exclus, persécutés et, éventuellement, assassinés pour des raisons racistes et politiques » et « les archives disponibles sur la Nazification et la dénazification » .

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, au « Musikverein », constituait bien entendu un autre haut lieu de la culture viennoise sinon autrichienne. Là aussi, l'anti-sémitisme se développait rapidement. En 1938, avec l'« Anschluss », l'aryanisation de l'orchestre est totale : 12 musiciens sont exclus pour des raisons « raciales » ou « politiques ». Dès le 22 avril 1938, le Philharmonique de Vienne joue à Berlin devant les plus hauts dignitaires Nazis. Partant avec un taux exceptionnel, par rapport à d'autres formations, de 36 % de membres du NSDAP au moment de l'« Anschluss », l'Orchestre parvient à 42 % en 1945 (contre 7 % pour le Philharmonique de Berlin). Wilhelm Jerger (1902-1978) est nommé dès 1938 à la tête du Wiener Philharmoniker. L'homme était membre du NSDAP depuis 1932, de la SS depuis 1938. En 1942, il publie « Erbe und Sendung » (Héritage et mission - divine, Wien : Wiener Verlag Ernst Sopper & Karl Bauer), ouvrage dans lequel il donne libre cours à un anti-sémitisme virulent, accablant notamment Gustav Mahler. Dans la description de l'école des violonistes du Philharmonique, Jerger place des étoiles sur quelques noms et explique en note (page 108), « Pour les noms avec des geboren il s'agit de violonistes non-aryens. » (« Bei den mit geboren versehenen Namen handelt es sich um Nichtarier »). Après guerre, il poursuit sa formation en Suisse (à Lucerne en 1948 puis à Fribourg où il soutient une thèse, en 1952). En 1958, il rentre en Autriche pour prendre la direction de l'Université privée Anton Bruckner de Linz, alors appelée « Bruckner-Konservatorium » (et ce, jusqu'à sa retraite, en 1973). Sur le site de l'Orchestre, on ne trouve aujourd'hui aucune trace des musiciens assassinés, qu'il s'agisse du hautboïste Armin Tyroler ou des 4 violonistes Moritz Glattauer, mort à Theresienstadt ; Viktor Robitsek, mort dans le ghetto de Łódź ; ou Max Starkmann, déporté à Minsk puis exécuté. Si le 1er violon Julius Stwertka est mentionné, ce n'est pas pour rappeler qu'il est mort lui aussi à Theresienstadt. En 1947, lors de répétitions de l'Orchestre à Londres, l'un des anciens membres du philharmonique, Friedrich Buxbaum, lui-même persécuté et exilé, pouvait dire à ses collègues non sans une pointe d'ironie mordante : « Je vous ai entendu vous accorder, cela sonnait très bien, complètement sans juiverie (« judenrein ») ». Enfin, mauvaise nouvelle pour les historiens intéressés, les archives du « Staatsorchester » ne sont pas encore ouvertes et restent déposées aux archives nationales.

Concernant la famille Strauß qui est à l'honneur depuis 1939 pour ces concerts, il apparaît que les origines juives du fils Johann (1825-1899) ont été complètement occultées. Le maire anti-sémite de Vienne, Karl Lueger (1844-1910), connu pour l'influence qu'il a exercée sur Hitler pendant sa période viennoise (1907-1913), avait su s'accommoder de cette ascendance et déclarait : « C'est moi qui décide qui est juif ou pas. ». Pendant la guerre, Josef Goebbels a été jusqu'à envoyer des hommes de main pour subtiliser les registres de baptêmes de la cathédrale Saint-Étienne et les remplacer par des faux, faisant disparaître le fait que l'arrière grand-père de Strauß était un Juif converti au catholicisme.

Adèle Strauß, la 3e femme de Strauß, était juive. Sa fille, Alice Strauß-Meyszner, vécut à Vienne jusqu'en 1939, régulièrement traînée dans la boue par la presse antisémite (elle meurt en Suisse en avril 1945). Légataires de Strauß, son beau-frère et sa nièce ne purent récupérer que quelques biens en 1952 et c'est en 1998 que des procédures de restitution débutèrent (parallèlement à « l'affaire Schiele »).

La célèbre statue dorée de Johann Strauß, au Stadtpark, mériterait sans doute une petite pancarte sur l'héritage de Strauß. Après tout, l'un des biographes de Strauß, Robert Dachs, a pu retrouver des lettres dans lesquelles Strauß se disait avant tout Juif (« Dans mon cœur, je suis plus juif que protestant. »). De la même façon, l'histoire du Wiener Philharmoniker mériterait elle aussi quelques précisions, au sujet de ce concert du Nouvel an, encore bien silencieux sur son passé.

Wilhelm Jerger

Le compositeur autrichien, chef d'orchestre et historien de la musique Wilhelm Jerger est né le 27 septembre 1902 à Vienne et est mort le 24 avril 1978 à Linz. En 1916, il étudie la contrebasse à l'Académie de musique et d'art dramatique avec Edward Madensky. Il étudie aussi la théorie musicale avec Eusèbe Mandyczewski et la direction d'orchestre avec Franz Schalk. En 1922, il termine ses études par l'examen du baccalauréat. La même année, il est engagé comme contrebassiste à l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne. Dans les années 1922-1923 et 1925-1927, Jerger étudie la musicologie à l'Université de Vienne auprès de Guido Adler. Outre son travail à l'Orchestre de l'Opéra, Jerger enseigne, à partir de 1936, au Conservatoire de Vienne et, en 1938, à l'Académie Impériale de Musique de Vienne.

Jerger était, depuis le 1er mai 1932, un membre du Parti Nazi (n° de membre : 1207001) et, depuis 1938, un membre des SS. En 1938, Jerger est également le responsable culturel pour l'Autriche du NSDAP à Vienne, aux côtés d'Hermann Stuppäck qui agit comme secrétaire. Il devient chef par intérim de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Le 22 décembre 1939, il est nommé par Josef Goebbels, en accord avec le « Gauleiter » Baldur von Schirach, au conseil d'administration de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Le 20 avril 1938, il est nommé (par Adolf Hitler) musicien de chambre. En 1939, il devient « conseiller de la Ville de Vienne » et, en 1942, il est nommé professeur.

Après la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, Wilhelm Jerger doit passer par la dénazification. Il est démis de ses fonctions et se rend à Salzbourg. En 1948, il s'installe à Lucerne (Suisse) et fréquente l'Université de Fribourg où il entreprind des études. En 1952, il obtient un Doctorat en philosophie. En 1958, il retourne en Autriche et reprend le 15 août de la même année, la direction du Conservatoire Bruckner qu'il va occuper jusqu'en 1973.

...

Quoi de plus emblématique pour Vienne que la grande roue du parc du « Prater », les « Mozartkugeln », l'école espagnole d'équitation et le Concert du Nouvel An donné par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne ? Voilà sans doute 4 caractéristiques majeures de la capitale autrichienne, du moins d'un point de vue purement touristique. Ce Concert du Nouvel An (« Neujahrskonzert »), généralement consacré à l'œuvre de la famille Strauß, est devenu l'événement le plus diffusé au monde dans le domaine de la musique Classique, retransmis dans plus de 70 pays.

Dans la présentation des origines de ce concert, on trouve souvent mention du fait que le 1er concert eut lieu le 31 décembre 1939, sans pour autant que les auteurs s'attardent sur le contexte de la période.

Extrait de journal, paru la veille du 1er concert, permet de se replonger dans l'atmosphère de l'époque (« Das Kleine Blatt », 30.12.1939). Le titre : « Les faux documents du spectateur juif ».

« Le Juif Friedrich Israel Wenger se rendait le 23 octobre à une pièce qui se jouait à la " Rolandbühne ". Il savait bien que les représentations théâtrales étaient interdites aux Juifs, mais il est entré la tête haute et la démarche assurée dans les allées du théâtre. Il déclara être aryen et pour " preuve " présenta un certificat de naissance et un acte de baptême. Le policier ne tomba pas dans le panneau. L'accusé fut reconnu coupable et condamné pour fraude à 2 mois de cachot. »

Au sujet du « Neujahrskonzert », 2 points au moins méritent d'être soulignés : d'une part, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne faisait l'objet, dès les années 1920, d'une politique explicitement antisémite et, d'autre part, les origines juives d'une partie de la famille Strauß ont été cachées suite à des décisions prises au plus haut niveau de l'appareil nazi.

Pendant l'hiver 2009-2010, dans une exposition intitulée « Un combat pour la ville » portant sur la culture viennoise de l'entre-2-guerres, on pouvait voir une affiche. Elle était placardée, il y a exactement 83 ans, début janvier 1928 (!). Les Nazis s'en prenaient à l'Opéra de Ernst Křenek, « Jonny spielt auf », programmé au « Staatsoper ». Ce symbole de la « fierté de tous les Viennois » était, selon eux, « victime d'une profanation négro-juive »

(« Unsere Staatsoper, die erste Kunst- und Bildungsstätte der Welt, der Stolz aller Wiener, ist einer frechen jüdisch-negerischen Besudelung zum Opfer gefallen. Das Schundwerk eines tschechischen Halbjuden, " Jonny spielt auf ", in welchem Volk und Heimat, Sitte, Moral und Kultur brutal zertreten werden soll, wurde der Staatsoper aufgezwungen. »)

L'Orchestre philharmonique, au « Musikverein », constituait bien entendu un autre haut-lieu de la culture viennoise, sinon autrichienne. Là aussi, l'antisémitisme se développait rapidement. En 1938, avec l'« Anschluß », l'aryanisation de l'Orchestre est totale : 12 musiciens sont exclus pour des raisons « raciales » ou « politiques ». Dès le 22 avril 1938, le Philharmonique de Vienne joue à Berlin devant les plus hauts dignitaires nazis. Partant avec un taux exceptionnel, par rapport à d'autres formations, de 36 % de membres du NSDAP au moment de l'« Anschluß », l'Orchestre parvient à 42 %, en 1945, (contre 7 % pour le Philharmonique de Berlin). Wilhelm Jerger (1902-1978) est nommé, dès 1938, à la tête du « Wiener Philharmoniker ». L'homme était membre du NSDAP, depuis 1932 ; de la SS, depuis 1938. En 1942, il publie « Erbe und Sendung » (Héritage et mission - divine), « Wien : Wiener Verlag Ernst Sopper & Karl Bauer », ouvrage dans lequel il donne libre cours à un antisémitisme virulent, accablant notamment Gustav Mahler. Dans la description de l'école des violonistes du Philharmonique, Jerger place des étoiles sur quelques noms et explique en note (page 108), « Pour les noms avec des *, il s'agit de violonistes non-aryens » (« Bei den mit * versehenen Namen handelt es sich um Nichtarier »). Après la guerre, il poursuit sa formation en Suisse (à Lucerne, en 1948, puis à Fribourg où il soutient une thèse en 1952). En 1958, Jerger rentre en Autriche pour prendre la direction de l'Université privée Anton Bruckner de Linz, alors appelée « Bruckner-Konservatorium » (et ce, jusqu'à sa retraite en 1973). Sur le site de l'Orchestre, on ne trouve aujourd'hui aucune trace des musiciens assassinés, qu'il s'agisse du hautboïste Armin Tyroler ou des 3 violonistes : Moritz Glattauer, mort à Theresienstadt ; Viktor Robitsek, mort dans le ghetto de Łódź ; ou Max Starkmann, déporté à Minsk puis exécuté. Si le 1er violon Julius Stwertka est mentionné, ce n'est pas pour rappeler qu'il est mort, lui aussi à Theresienstadt. En 1947, lors de répétitions de l'Orchestre à Londres, l'un des anciens membres du Philharmonique, Friedrich Buxbaum, lui-même persécuté et exilé, pouvait dire à ses collègues, non sans une pointe d'ironie mordante :

« Je vous ai entendu vous accorder, cela sonnait très bien, complètement sans juiverie (" judenrein ") . »

Enfin, mauvaise nouvelle pour les historiens intéressés, les archives du « Staatsorchester » ne sont pas encore ouvertes et restent déposées aux archives nationales.

Concernant la famille Strauß, qui est à l'honneur depuis 1939 pour ces concerts, il apparaît que les origines juives du fils Johann (1825-1899) ont été complètement occultées. Le maire antisémite de Vienne, Karl Lueger (1844-1910), connu pour l'influence qu'il a exercée sur Adolf Hitler pendant sa période viennoise (1907-1913), avait su s'accommoder de cette ascendance et déclarait : « C'est moi qui décide qui est juif ou pas. ». Pendant la guerre, Josef Göbbels a été jusqu'à envoyer des hommes de main pour subtiliser les registres de baptêmes de la cathédrale Saint-Étienne et les remplacer par des faux, faisant disparaître le fait que l'arrière-grand-père de Strauß était un Juif converti au catholicisme.

Adèle Strauß, la 3e femme de Strauß, était juive. Sa fille, Alice Strauß-Meyszner, vécut à Vienne jusqu'en 1939, régulièrement traînée dans la boue par la presse antisémite (elle meurt en Suisse, en avril 1945). Légataires de Strauß, son beau-frère et sa nièce ne purent récupérer que quelques biens, en 1952, et c'est en 1998 que des procédures de restitution débutèrent.

La célèbre statue dorée de Johann Strauß, au « Stadtpark », mériterait sans doute une petite pancarte sur l'héritage de Strauß. Après tout, l'un des biographes de Strauß, Robert Dachs, a pu retrouver des lettres dans lesquelles Strauß se disait avant tout Juif (« Dans mon cœur, je suis plus juif que protestant. »). De la même façon, l'histoire du « Wiener Philharmoniker » mériterait, elle aussi, quelques précisions, au sujet de ce Concert du Nouvel An ... encore bien silencieux sur son passé.

...

The arrest in Vienna of discredited British historian David Irving for lying about the Holocaust got us to thinking : Is good news finally breaking out somewhere ? Austrian authorities are holding him without bail, pending trial, for breaking a 1947 law that criminalizes Holocaust denial. His lawyer now says he's changed his views - that gas chambers were, in fact, used in Auschwitz, contrary to a 1989 speech he gave in Austria 16 years ago, and that the Holocaust did indeed happen.

This also got us to thinking about our recent item on the hidebound circle jerks of the Vienna Philharmonic, whose long-buried historical relationship with the Holocaust still has contemporary echoes. For instance, at Anton Bruckner Private University (formerly the « Bruckner-Konservatorium ») in Linz (Adolf Hitler's home-town) , not far from Vienna, the big concert-hall is named for Wilhelm Jerger, who was director of the Conservatory, until 1973.

(Photo) Jerger, on the right (a contrabassist in the Vienna Philharmonic, and a Lieutenant in the « Schutzstaffel » , or SS) became the chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1938, when a program was set in motion to « Aryanize » Austrian culture after Austria was made part of Germany through the « Anschluß » . Musicologist William Osborne tells us :

During Jerger's leadership, 6 Jewish members of the Vienna Philharmonic died in the concentration camps. 11 were able to save their lives by timely migration. 9 additional members were found to be of « mixed race » or « contaminated by kinship » (« Versippte ») and reduced to secondary status within the Orchestra. 26 « non-Aryans » were thus either murdered, exiled or reduced in status while SS Lieutenant Jerger led the Orchestra.

See : Doktor Clemens Hellsberg. « Demokratie der Koenige : Die Geschichte der Wiener Philharmoniker, Zürich : Schweizer Verlagshaus, Wien : Kremayr & Scheriau, Mainz : Musikverlag Schott » (1992) , page 505.

Hellsberg, who has a Ph.D. in musicology, is the current chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic. His book contains numerous discussions of Jerger's activities.

In 1942, Wilhelm Jerger wrote a book celebrating the Vienna Philharmonic's centennial which illustrates his devotion to Nazi ideologies : « Erbe und Sendung, Wien : Wiener Verlag Ernst Sopper & Karl Bauer » (1942) . Jerger's book illustrates his devotion to Nazi ideologies. He includes the genealogies of several prominent father-to-son generations that formed a historical continuum within the ranks of the Philharmonic. Jerger places an asterisk by the name of every « non-Aryan » listed in the tables. Jerger explains that the Aryan stock of these Philharmonic families was so « tough » that the purity of their « blood » was never notably damaged by what racists refer to as « dysgenic influences » :

« And here, it is demonstrated that, in spite of manifold influences of blood from elsewhere, this Mind (" Geist ") continues to implant itself with great toughness through the ancestral lineage, and that it is often very sharply imprinted. It is understandable, that such an inheritance must beget outstanding musicians, who in their stylistic education and in their experience of orchestral playing are already extraordinarily schooled. This is Mind from Old

Mind, which helps tradition and inheritance, a dominant trait (" überkommene Anlage ") to a special development and fulfillment. » (Page 87, translated from the German.)

Schooling is acknowledged as important, but only in the context of a special « blood » inheritance that transmits « Mind ». This follows National-Socialism's ideology of « Ahnenerbe », which asserts that cultural traits are genetically inherited. Jerger also presents a racist portrayal of Gustav Mahler, who became the General Music Director of the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1898, replacing Hans Richter, who had led the Orchestra for the previous 23 years. (The Vienna Philharmonic refers to the Richter years as its « golden age ».) Mahler's tenure was troubled, in part, by a continual pattern of anti-Semitic harassment and he left the Orchestra after 3 years. Using his own words and quoting those of Max Kalbeck (a famous critic at the time), Jerger draws a comparison of Richter and Mahler that reveals the anti-Semitic attitudes Mahler confronted :

« A completely different type of personality entered with Mahler, " as there " (to speak with Max Kalbeck's vivid words) " instead of the tall blond bearded Hun, who placed himself wide and calm before the Orchestra like an unshakable, solidly walled tower, there was a gifted shape (" begabte Gestalt ") balancing over the podium, thin, nervous, and with extraordinarily gangly limbs ". In fact, a greater contrast was really not possible. There the patriarchal Hans Richter in his stolidity and goodness, and his extremely hearty and collegial solidarity with the Orchestra, and here Gustav Mahler, oriented to the new objectivity (" neue Sachlichkeit ") - nervous, hasty, scatty, intellectualish - the music a pure matter of his overbred intellect. » (Page 57, translated from the German.)

Racist views are apparent in the language (« intellectualish », « overbred », « new objectivity » (a new aesthetic associated with Jews), « gangly limbs », « scatty » vs. « blond », « stolid », and so on). They reflect anti-Semitism and National-Socialist aesthetics. The transparent sub-text is one of chauvinistic masculinity and genetic superiority. It illustrates that Jerger was not an innocent by-stander caught-up in historical events. He was an active and avid cultural leader of the Nazi movement.

Osborne adds :

« Linz is, by no means, the only " Musikhochschule " with this problem. In Munich, Germany, the " Musik Hochschule " is housed in Hitler's personal office building. It was called the " Fuehrerbau ", and was designed by Paul Ludwig Troost, the same architect who designed Munich's " Haus der Kunst ". »

Osborne continues :

The « Fuehrerbau » is considered to be one of the most perfect stylizations of Nazi architecture still in existence. A lot of people get the creeps just walking into the place. There are stories still in circulation that people were tortured in the basement where the student cafeteria now is. Across the street is a sister building that looks identical and was a Nazi administration building. Much of Munich was destroyed by Allied bombing, but, ironically, these 2 buildings survived almost unscratched.

Yes, we know, much has changed in both Austria and Germany. But so much apparently has not.

...

The Vienna Philharmonic's official website was using quotations by an SS Officer, Wilhelm Jerger, to substantiate the ensemble's claim of cultural authenticity. Jerger, a former chairman of the Philharmonic and a Lieutenant in the SS, published a highly-racist book, in 1942, including the father-to-son genealogies that comprise the Orchestra's history. The tables contain asterisks (*) by the names of all non-Aryan members. Jerger goes on to explain that the Aryan stock of these Philharmonic families was so « tough » that the purity of their « blood » was never notably damaged by what racists refer to as « dysgenic influences » .

...

In late December 1999, the Vienna Philharmonic added quotes to its website by Wilhelm Jerger to substantiate the Orchestra's claims about its unique style. Jerger was the Chairman of the Orchestra during the 3rd « Reich » and a Lieutenant in the SS. In 1942, he wrote a book about the Orchestra which contained long father / son genealogical tables of some of the major String players. Jerger placed asterisks (*) by the names of all individuals who were « non-Aryan » and explained that the genetic stock of the Philharmonic was so « tough » that the purity of their « blood » and style was not notably damaged by such dysgenic influences. On January 1st, 2000, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra quickly removed all references to him, from their website. The Orchestra, of course, had no illusions about who Jerger was.

...

To document the Orchestra's unusual String sound, Schuster quotes former orchestra Chairman, Wilhelm Jerger, who wrote a book about the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1942, and who was also a Lieutenant in the SS.

...

It is astounding that the Vienna Philharmonic would quote Jerger, an SS Lieutenant, on its website. His racist views are so uncomfortably close to the Vienna Philharmonic's recent comments about the special qualities of the « central European soul » , their attitude toward Asians, and music-making revolving exclusively around white males.

...

The Vienna Philharmonic revealed that almost half of its musicians were Nazis in World War II, after it fired Jewish members.

The Orchestra published research uncovered by a panel of historians who mined its archives.

A total of 60 out of 123 Orchestra members were members of the Nazi Party, in 1942, according to the report, released as Austria marks the 75th anniversary of the « Anschluß » , the country's annexation by Adolf Hitler's Germany. Only 10 Vienna Philharmonic players had to leave as a result of their Nazi affiliations after 1945. 2 returned.

The Orchestra has kept silent about its past for decades. Its chairman, Clemens Hellsberg, wrote a 1992 history titled « Democracy of Kings » which was later criticized for not chronicling many misdeeds. The report published yesterday, supported by the Orchestra, was the work of a panel led by Oliver Rathkolb, a history professor at the University of Vienna.

All the Orchestra's Jewish musicians were dismissed in 1938. 5 died in concentration camps ; 1 died after being thrown out of his apartment, and another before being deported. Some Jewish Orchestra members managed to escape. The panel's research also revealed that Wilhelm Jerger, a member of the Nazi Party and the SS and the executive director of the Orchestra, rescued the Jewish 1st violinist Josef Geringer from Dachau concentration camp. Jerger failed to protect 5 more Orchestra members from deportation.

Another case analyzed by the historians is the one of trumpet player Helmut Wobisch, who joined the Nazi Party, in 1933, and the SS, in 1934. During World War II, he produced reports on people in the music scene for the Nazi intelligence service. He was fired in 1945, only to return 2 years later as 1st trumpeter, becoming director of the Orchestra, in 1953.

Wobisch successfully hid his Nazi past during the process of denazification, « even making use of Jewish musicians such as the well-known conductor Leonard Bernstein », the report says. Eyewitnesses reported the conductor once calling Wobusch : « my dearest Nazi » .

It was also Wobisch who gave the Philharmonic's ring of honour to Baldur von Schirach, an indicted war criminal, as recently as 1966 or 1967, Rathkolb found. The Orchestra had awarded the ring to von Schirach, who was responsible for deporting Vienna's Jews, in 1942. It was allegedly taken by an American soldier, 3 years later.

Shortly after his release from prison on war crime charges, for which he was sentenced during the Nuremberg Trials, von Schirach was given a replacement. The identity of the donor was previously unknown and revealed by a witness named Wilhelm Bettelheim, who wrote a letter to Rathkolb, in January, and is interviewed in a movie about the historian's work being aired today by Austrian television channel « ORF » .

Philharmonic director Hellsberg was recently criticized by Harald Walser, a member of the Austrian Green Party, for suppressing this part of the Orchestra's history. Dominique Meyer, the director of Vienna's State Opera, defended Hellsberg at the presentation of the findings :

« He was the 1st to write about the Nazi past, in 1988, and in his book, in 1992. Of course, there were unsettling things that surfaced after that and there probably will be more. »

The Orchestra also allowed itself to be used for propaganda purposes, according to archive material. Pictures show the Vienna Philharmonic, under Wilhelm Furtwängler, playing in a Berlin armaments factory. 2 swastika banners hang behind. Much of the Orchestra's music has also been used in propaganda films produced in the Nazi era.

Some of the Jewish musicians that were fired, in 1938, and were able to emigrate were invited back after the War, according to the film, which was shown to journalists. None of the musicians returned.

...

Wilhelm Jerger (geboren 27. September 1902 in Wien ; gestorben 24. April 1978 in Linz) war ein österreichischer Komponist, Dirigent und Musikhistoriker.

Wilhelm Jerger begann 1916 ein Musikstudium an der Kaiserlich-Königlich Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst mit Hauptfach Kontrabass bei Eduard Madensky, zusätzlich studierte er bei Eusebius Mandyczewski Musiktheorie und bei Franz Schalk Dirigieren. 1922 beendete er das Studium mit der Reifeprüfung und wurde im gleichen Jahr als Kontrabassist vom Wiener Staatsopernorchester engagiert. In den Jahren 1922-1923 und von 1925 bis 1927 studierte Jerger Musikwissenschaft an der Universität Wien bei Guido Adler. Neben seiner Tätigkeit beim Staatsopernorchester unterrichtete Jerger ab 1936 am Wiener Volkskonservatorium und erhielt 1938 einen Lehrauftrag für Instrumentenkunde an der Reichshochschule für Musik in Wien.

Jerger war seit 1. Mai 1932 NSDAP-Mitglied (Mitgliedsnummer : 1.207.001) und seit 1938 Angehöriger der SS. 1938 wurde Jerger auch vom Landeskulturverwalter der NSDAP in Wien, Staatssekretär Hermann Stuppäck, zum kommissarischen Leiter der Wiener Philharmoniker bestellt. Am 22. Dezember 1939 ernannte ihn Goebbels im Einvernehmen mit dem Gauleiter Schirach zum Vorstand des Vereins Wiener Philharmoniker. Am 20. April 1938 wurde er von Adolf Hitler zum Kammermusiker ernannt ; 1939 wurde er « Ratsherr der Stadt Wien » und 1942 folgte die Ernennung zum Professor.

Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges wurde er im Rahmen der Entnazifizierung seines Postens enthoben und ging nach Salzburg. 1948 übersiedelte er nach Luzern und nahm an der Universität Freiburg (Schweiz) das Studium wieder auf ; 1952 beendete er es mit der Erlangung des Doktorates der Philosophie. 1958 kehrte er nach Österreich zurück und übernahm am 15. August desselben Jahres die Direktion des Bruckner-Konservatoriums, die er bis 1973 innehatte. Jergers bekannteste Komposition ist die « Salzburger Hof- und Barockmusik », ein kammermusikalisches Werk in vier Sätzen im Stil des Barock.

Ehrenring der Wiener Philharmoniker.

Franz-Schalk-Medaille der Wiener Philharmoniker in Silber.

Werkliste

Concerto grosso, für Streichorchester, Klavier und Orgel ad lib.

Hymnen an den Herrn, Volksoratorium, für Solostimmen, Knabenchor, gemischten Chor, Orchester und Orgel.

Theresianische Feste, für Orchester.

I. Symphonie, Klassische Symphonie, für Orchester.

Symphonische Variationen über ein Choralthema, für Orchester.

Österreichische Bauernlieder, für Orchester.

« Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität »

L'Université privée Anton Bruckner, ouverte en 2004, est dédiée à la musique, au théâtre et à la danse. Elle accueille plus de 850 étudiants pour près de 200 professeurs venant du monde entier.

...

Anton Bruckner Private University for Music, Drama, and Dance is one of 4 Universities in Linz, the capital of Upper-Austria. The University opens to approximately 800 students and was granted accredited private university status in 2004 (its name from 1932 to 2004 was Bruckner Conservatory Linz, but the roots of the institution go back to 1823 or even to 1799) .

...

Die Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität für Musik, Schauspiel und Tanz (Bruckneruni) ist eine Privatuniversität in Linz. Sie befindet sich im Stadtteil Urfahr nördlich der Donau.

Die Bruckneruni ging aus dem Anton Bruckner Konservatorium des Landes Oberösterreich hervor und wurde im Februar 2004 vom österreichischen Akkreditierungsrat als Privatuniversität akkreditiert und im Jahre 2009 reakkreditiert.

Bereits im Jahre 1799 wurde in Linz eine Musikschule gegründet, von Franz Xaver Glöggel (1764-1839) , dem damaligen Direktor der Stadtmusikschule, einem Freund Mozarts und Beethovens. Anton Bruckner, der Namensgeber der heutigen Universität, war nie Direktor der Vorgängereinrichtung.

1896 studierten an der Musikschule bereits 500 Studenten, unter dem damaligen Direktor August Göllerich sowie dessen Nachfolger Wilhelm Jerger. Ab 1995 war Reinhart von Gutzeit Rektor der Universität. Im Sommer 2006 hat von Gutzeit die Universität allerdings Richtung Salzburg verlassen, wo er Rektor der Musikuniversität Mozarteum wurde. Seit September 2007 leitet Marianne Betz die Privatuniversität. Im Juni 2012 wurde Ursula Brandstätter als neue Rektorin gewählt und sollte ihr Amt zum 1. September 2012 antreten. Das ist inzwischen geschehen.

Am 4. Dezember 2006 fiel die Entscheidung, ein neues Universitätsgebäude auf dem Grundstück des ehemaligen Schloß Hagen am Fuße des Pöstlingbergs zu errichten.

Es besteht die Möglichkeit, die Studienrichtungen (die sowohl als Konzertfach als auch pädagogische Studienrichtungen angeboten werden) als Bachelor oder Master abzuschließen. Es werden aber auch Vorbereitungslehrgänge angeboten - Künstlerisches Basis-Studium (KBS) , Konzertfach light.

Anfänge : Gründung der « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Linz » (1821)

Zwei Jahre vor dem Wiener Kongress wurde 1812 in der musikliebenden Metropole des alten Österreich jene « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » gegründet, die für das Musikleben des Habsburgerreiches bis an dessen Ende die führende Initiatorin für das entstehende bürgerliche Musikleben blieb. Dem Vorbilde Wiens konnten sich die Provinzen des Reiches nicht entziehen, und als 1820 eine Aufführung von Beethovens Oratorium « Christus am Ölberg » dem Linzer Schullehrer-Fond beträchtliche Einnahmen erbrachte, entschloss man sich auch im Lande ob der Enns zur Gründung einer « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Linz » . In den Statuten dieses 1821, nach Kaiser Franz I. « allerhöchster Genehmigung » , ins Leben gerufenen Vereins aller « bisher getrennten Musikliebhaber » wurde neben der « Aufführung größerer Musikstücke » vor allem die Absicht zur Gründung und Führung einer Musikschule an erster Stelle genannt. Und mit der am 1. März 1823 eröffneten « Gesangsschule für Knaben und Mädchen » für eine « systemisierte Anzahl von 12 Schülern und 6 Lehrstunden pro Woche » wurde der Grundstein für das hundert Jahre später daraus hervorgehende Bruckner-Konservatorium gelegt. Die verschiedenen Versuche, in Linz ein überregional wirksames Musikleben zu begründen, denen sich vor allem der Linzer Dom- und Stadtkapellmeister Franz Xaver Glögg gewidmet hatte, konnten nun erfolgversprechend fortgeführt werden.

Aufschwung des Linzer Musiklebens zur Jahrhundertwende

1863 versuchte der Musik-Verein Anton Bruckner, der als Domorganist und Chorleiter des Sängerbundes « Frohsinn » lokalen Ruhm erlangt hatte, als Direktor der Musikschule zu gewinnen.

Die von Anton Bruckner selbstbewusst eingeforderten Reformen verhinderten dies jedoch. Unter dem Dirigenten, Pianisten, Liszt-Schüler und Bruckner-Biographen August Göllerich, der 1896 zum Leiter berufen worden war, nahm die Musikschule einen beträchtlichen Aufschwung im bereits florierenden Musikleben Oberösterreichs. Linz wurde zu einem Zentrum der Liszt- und Brucknerpflege. Die Musikschule erhielt erstmals Statuten für Lehrpläne, Prüfungsordnungen und Schulverwaltung. Im Schuljahr 1913-1914 zählte der Lehrkörper 21 Personen, die 445 Studierende zu betreuen hatten.

Das Bruckner-Konservatorium erhält seinen Namen

Unter der Leitung von Robert Keldorfer wurde der ehemaligen « Kaiser-Franz-Josef-Jubiläums-Musikschule des Linzer Musikvereins » 1932 der Titel « Bruckner-Konservatorium » verliehen. 1935 erhielt das Konservatorium auch das Öffentlichkeitsrecht (bis Ende des Schuljahres 1938-1939) . Die Reifeprüfungen des neuen Konservatoriums wurden bereits seit 1934 staatlich anerkannt und damit den Reifeprüfungen der Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst in Wien gleichgestellt. Den Gesangsklassen war eine Klasse für den dramatischen Unterricht angegliedert worden, eine Orgelklasse wurde eingerichtet und der Fächerkanon wurde mit den Theoriefächern Harmonielehre, Formenlehre, Instrumentenkunde und Musikgeschichte ergänzt.

Im 2. Weltkrieg

Die politische Entwicklung, die in Europa den 1930er-Jahren das Leben zunehmend verdüsterte und im Zweiten Weltkrieg mündete, blieb auch für das Bruckner-Konservatorium nicht folgenlos. Bereits 1939 wurde das Konservatorium in die Verwaltungsmacht des « Landes Oberdonau » übergeben, neuer Leiter wurde der Stiftsorganist von Sankt Florian, Adolf Trittinger. Gegen Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges mußte der Schulbetrieb im Gebäude in der Waltherstraße, von dem bereits etliche Räume für anstaltsfremde Zwecke beschlagnahmt worden waren, nach schwerwiegenden Einwirkungen durch Bombentreffer eingestellt werden.

Schwierige Aufbauarbeit und kulturpolitische Einbindung

1945 wurde Carl Steiner von der oberösterreichischen Landesregierung zum Leiter des Konservatoriums bestellt. In seiner Ära (1945 bis 1957) war die schwierige Aufbauarbeit der Nachkriegsjahre zu bewältigen, das Schulgebäude in der Waltherstraße wurde erneuert und der Status einer Ausbildungsstätte für Musikliebhaber überwunden. Die Oberösterreichische Landesregierung als Eigentümer und die Stadt Linz als Unterstützerin, repräsentiert durch Landeshauptmann Heinrich Gleißner und Bürgermeister Ernst Koref, förderten nun das Bruckner-Konservatorium im Namen einer musikinteressierten Öffentlichkeit und Gesellschaft. Dadurch wurde eine Tradition der kulturpolitischen Einbindung des oberösterreichischen Musiklebens eingeleitet, die bis heute anhält und mit der Gründung des « Landesmusikschulwerkes für Oberösterreich » (Kultureinrichtungen des Landes Oberösterreich) 1977 ihren vorläufigen Höhepunkt erlangte. 1948 hatte das Bundesministerium für Unterricht das bis heute bestehende Öffentlichkeitsrecht erteilt, und 1951 wurde auch das Statut des Bruckner-Konservatoriums durch die Landesregierung behördlich genehmigt.

Reformen, Umstrukturierungen und Bezug des Gebäudes in der Wildbergstraße

Unter der Leitung von Wilhelm Jerger wurden von 1958-1973 umfassende Reformen eingeleitet, die seitens des Amtes der Oberösterreichische Landesregierung großzügige Unterstützung erfuhren. Umstrukturierungen des Lehrplanes, die Betonung der musica practica, die Einführung neuer Ergänzungsfächer erfolgten ebenso wie die Institutionalisierung eines (Kammer)Orchesters des Bruckner-Konservatoriums und der Veranstaltungsreihe « Wochen des Bruckner-Konservatoriums ». Als zukunftsbestimmend erwies sich auch die Einführung einer Vielzahl von Musiziergemeinschaften, die Berufung von Fachgruppenvorständen und die Fixierung obligater Kontrollprüfungen. Da das solcherart gewachsene Konservatorium in den alten Räumen in der Waltherstraße nicht mehr das Auslangen finden konnte, wurde ein Neubau beschlossen - 1970 bezog das Bruckner-Konservatorium das nach zweijähriger Bauzeit errichtete Gebäude an der Wildbergstraße, in dem es noch heute residiert.

Studienrichtung für Instrumental- und Gesangspädagogik und Initiierung des Musikgymnasiums

Unter Gerhard Dallinger, der das Konservatorium von 1973 bis 1990 leitete, wurde die Zahl der Musiziergemeinschaften (Symphonisches Blasorchester, Doppelrohrblattensemble, Salonorchester und andere) erweitert und ein neues Statut erarbeitet. Wichtig waren auch grundlegende Neuerungen im Bereich des Dienstrechts. Eine besondere Initiative führte zur Einrichtung des « Musikgymnasiums ». Neue Studienfächer wurden eingeführt : « Elementare Musikerziehung », « Tanzpädagogik » und Jazz (auch für IGP) . Die « Wochen des Bruckner-Konservatoriums », alljährlich mit einem Konzert und Rahmenprogramm im Stift Sankt Florian eröffnet, erfuhren eine Ausweitung zusammen mit Hörerziehungen und Konzerttourneen in ganz Oberösterreich. Auch die Einführung einer Studierenden-Vertretung geht auf die Ära Dallinger zurück. Das Seminar B, die Vorgängereinrichtung des IGP (Studienrichtung für Instrumental- und Gesangspädagogik), konnte 1973 den Unterricht aufnehmen; im Schuljahr 1988-1989, nach einer Einigung mit den damaligen Musikhochschulen, wurde es durch das Fach IGP (Instrumental- und Gesangspädagogik) ersetzt. Helmut Schiff, Schüler Johann Nepomuk Davids, dessen Nachlaß die Bibliothek des Bruckner-Konservatoriums verwaltet, leitete das Seminar B bis 1981; das Fach erlebte danach unter der Leitung von Johannes Mastnak einen Aufschwung, der bis heute anhält.

Aufstockung des Lehrkörpers, neue Studieneinrichtungen und verstärkte Öffentlichkeitsarbeit

Unter Hans Maria Kneihls, Leiter des Bruckner-Konservatoriums von 1990 bis 1995, erfolgte eine bedeutende Aufstockung des Lehrkörpers infolge neuer Studieneinrichtungen wie Elementarerziehung, Modern Dance, Ausbau der Abteilung für Jazz- und Populärmusik und des Studio SAMT (Studio for Advanced Music and Media Technology). Ein eigenes Veranstaltungsreferat ist nun für eine professionelle Öffentlichkeitsarbeit verantwortlich. Moderne computergestützte Systeme wurden zunehmend in den Dienst der Verwaltung gestellt. Die « Ständige Studienkonferenz », betraut mit der Erarbeitung von Konzepten für das Organigramm des Konservatoriums sowie der permanent zu aktualisierenden Studienpläne und ihrer Abstimmung mit anderen musikalischen Ausbildungsstätten, wurde zur ständigen Einrichtung. Erstmals wurden Workshops veranstaltet und prominente Dirigenten und Musiker zu Produktionen und Workshops an das Bruckner-Konservatorium eingeladen.

Akute Raumprobleme und Einrichtung eines künstlerischen Basisstudiums

Unter dem seit 1995 amtierenden Direktor Reinhart von Gutzeit werden die Anforderungen der musikalischen Berufsausbildung und das Profil des Bruckner-Konservatoriums im Musikleben von Linz und Oberösterreich den rasch sich ändernden gesellschaftlichen Bedingungen angepasst. Die akuten Raumprobleme an der Wildbergstraße führten zur Dislozierung einiger Abteilungen in ein Gebäude in der Sandgasse und in das Petrinum. Zum gegenwärtigen Zeitpunkt verfügt das Bruckner-Konservatorium über drei Standorte: Wildbergstraße (Haupthaus); Sandgasse (Jazz, Gesang, Oper, Schauspiel, Elementarerziehung); und Petrinum (Allgemeiner Tanz und Kindertanz).

Die Einrichtung eines « Künstlerischen Basisstudiums » (KBS) ermöglicht besonders talentierten Studierenden bereits ab dem 12. Lebensjahr beste Einstiegsmöglichkeiten in das ordentliche Studium und in eine spätere berufliche Karriere. Die Vernetzung des Konservatoriums mit den Institutionen des Musiklebens in Linz und Oberösterreich schreitet voran (Bruckner-Orchester, LIVA, Kultureinrichtungen des Landes Oberösterreich, Landesmusikdirektion) und auch die internationale Vernetzung wird durch Austauschkonzerttourneen, etwa mit dem Glinka-Konservatorium in Nischninowgorod (Russland) und Orchestern in Finnland (Tampere) erfolgreich vertieft. Intern wurden Beiräte für Direktion, Orchester und andere Abteilungen eingerichtet, um die stets dichter und vielfältiger werdenden Organisationsaufgaben am Bruckner-Konservatorium bewältigen zu können.

Die Bibliothek verfügt nun über akzeptable Lese- und Phonoräume. Eine Kantine im Haupthaus sorgt für Speise und Trank.

Zukunftsweisend ist auch die Gründung eines « Vereins der Freunde des Bruckner-Konservatoriums » - KONSpirito (seit 2004 UNIso) - , dem Frau Landtagspräsidentin im Ruhestand Angela Ortner als Ehrenpräsidentin vorsteht. Seit März 2000 beteiligt sich das Bruckner-Konservatorium auch mit einer eigenen Sendeleiste - KONSradio (seit 2004 UNIsounds) - am Angebot des freien Senders Radio FRO.

Das Bruckner-Konservatorium wird zur Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität (ABPU)

Am Beginn des 21. Jahrhunderts sah sich das Bruckner-Konservatorium zunehmend mit drängenden kulturellen und gesellschaftlichen Veränderungen konfrontiert. Das Modell des herkömmlichen Konservatoriums wurde zunehmend in Frage gestellt, - nicht zuletzt durch die Vereinigung Europas, die auch im Gebiet der Musikausbildung die Beachtung gesamteuropäischer Strukturen erfordert. Unter Reinhart von Gutzeit wurden daher intensive Anstrengungen unternommen, das Bruckner-Konservatorium in eine Privatuniversität zu erheben. In zwei Jahren intensivster Arbeit mußten die Voraussetzungen geschaffen werden, um den Anforderungen einer Privatuniversität zu entsprechen. Im Zentrum stand neben der Angleichung der Studienpläne die Ausgliederung aus dem Anstaltenbereich des Landes Oberösterreich ; die Erstellung eines eigenen Statuts sowie die entsprechenden akademischen Erfordernisse wie Habilitationsfähigkeit, Aufbau von Forschung etc.

Bereits im Dezember 2003 erfolgte die Zustimmung des Universitäts-Akkreditierungsrates in Wien, und im Februar 2004 genehmigte ein offizielles Dekret des Bundesministeriums für Bildung, Wissenschaft und Kultur die Umwandlung des Bruckner-Konservatoriums in eine Musikuniversität. Als « Privatuniversität » ist die Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität eine Körperschaft öffentlichen Rechts, mit allen Möglichkeiten, wie sie die Universitäten des Bundes bieten. Dies ermöglicht den Studierenden Abschlüsse als Bachelor of Arts oder Master of Arts, die den Abschlüssen an europäischen Kunsthochschulen und -universitäten gleichgestellt sind. Der universitäre Lehr- und Forschungsbetrieb wurde 2004 mit zwölf verschiedenen Studienrichtungen sowie drei Universitätslehrgängen in den Bereichen Musik, Jazz, Schauspiel und Zeitgenössischer Tanz aufgenommen. Die ersten 39 Bachelor-AbsolventInnen und 5 Master-AbsolventInnen schlossen ihr Studium bereits im Sommersemester 2004 erfolgreich ab.

Die Entscheidung zum Neubau fällt

Das Land Oberösterreich unterstützt das Projekt Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität von Beginn an sehr großzügig ; Landeshauptmann Doktor Josef Pühringer, der dem Universitätsrat als Vorsitzender vorsteht, nahm sich zügig der Agenda eines An- oder Neubaus der neuen (vierten) Universität in Linz an. Nach gründlicher Prüfung zahlreicher Alternativen durch das Land Oberösterreich fiel der Universitätsrat Dezember 2006 die Entscheidung zum Neubau des Universitätsgebäudes auf dem Areal der Hagengründe am Fuße des Linzer Pöstlingbergs. Das neue Gebäude wird ermöglichen, alle drei Sparten der ABPU (Musik, Schauspiel und Tanz) an einem einzigen Standort anzubieten.

Im Juli 2008 wurde ein EU-weiter einstufiger Architektenwettbewerb für den Neubau ausgeschrieben, aus dem der Entwurf des Linzer Architektenteams Matthias Seyfert, Dietmar Moser, Susanne Seyfert und Jörn Besser als Sieger hervorging.

Im April 2010 beschlossen die Oberösterreich Landesregierung und der Oberösterreich Landtag die Errichtung und Finanzierung des Neubaus mit einem Gesamtkostenrahmen von 42,9 Mio. Euro (inklusive Mehrkosten für die Passivbauweise und Bühnen-, Licht- und Tontechnischer Spezialausstattung). Der Spatenstich erfolgte im Mai 2011.

Erfolgreiche Re-Akkreditierungen 2009 und 2014

Unter Professor Doktor Marianne Betz, die von 2008 bis 2012 als Rektorin wirkte, wurde ein neues Corporate Design für die ABPU erarbeitet und verstärkt in die Öffentlichkeitsarbeit investiert. Im Jahre 2009 wurde die ABPU durch den Österreichischen Akkreditierungsrat (ÖAR) als Privatuniversität re-akkreditiert. Im November 2012 trat Universität-Professor Doktor Ursula Brandstätter ihren Dienst als Rektorin an der ABPU an. Unter ihrer Leitung erfolgte 2014 die zweite Reakkreditierung durch die Agentur für Qualitätssicherung und Akkreditierung Austria (AQ Austria).

Die ersten 10 Universitätsjahre brachten einen deutlichen Zuwachs an ausländischen Studierenden, laufende Veränderungen in den Studienplänen (zum Beispiel Einführung der ECTS-Punkte) und positive Entwicklungen im Bereich der internationalen Beziehungen, wo durch entsprechende Vorgaben (Bologna) und Partnerschaften (Erasmus) laufend Anpassungsmaßnahmen erforderlich wurden.

Nach ihrer nunmehr zweiten Re-Akkreditierung spielt die Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität als anerkannte Ausbildungsstätte im künstlerischen und künstlerisch-pädagogischen Bereich in der akademischen Landschaft Österreichs eine wichtige Rolle, sie tritt aber auch als Veranstalter und Kooperationspartner entsprechend in Erscheinung.

Rund 970 AbsolventInnen schlossen bisher ihre Bachelor- und Masterstudien erfolgreich ab. Derzeit unterrichten circa 200 Lehrende 850 Studierende.

Zeittafel

1812 : Gründung der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien.

1817 : Errichtung der Singschule der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.

1821 : Gründung des Musikvereines in Linz auf Initiative von Kapellmeister Anton Mayer.

1823 : Errichtung einer Gesangsschule des Linzer Musikvereines, Leitung: Stadtorganist Johann B. Schiedermayr.

1825 : Angliederung einer Violinschule.

1836 : Schulleiter : Johann Klepsch und Karl Zappe.

1856 : August M. Storch, (Chormeister des Wiener Männergesangvereines) Leiter der Musikschule.

1860 : Violinschule geschlossen bis 1863.

- 1863 : Erfolgreiche Verhandlungen mit Anton Bruckner über eine Übernahme der Musikschulleitung.
- 1868 : Übernahme von Unterrichtsräumen im Nordico.
- 1869 : Erste Schulordnung unter Rudolf Prohaska.
- 1874 : Max Brava, Musikdirektor und Musikschulleiter.
- 1883 : Adalbert Schreyer, Musikdirektor und Musikschulleiter.
- 1892 : Einrichtung von Klassen für Kontrabass, Flöte, Klarinette und Horn.
- 1893 : Einrichtung von Klassen für Oboe, Fagott und Trompete.
- 1893 : Gründung einer Klasse für Streichorchester.
- 1896 : August Göllerich Nachfolger Adalbert Schreyers.
- 1897 : Erster Klassenabend im Redoutensaal.
- 1900 : Übersiedlung der meisten Klassen in das Gebäude der Herrenstraße 39.
- 1900 : Weniger als zwanzig Lehrkräfte unterrichten rund fünfhundert Studierende.
- 1908 : Überraschende Kündigung der Vereins- und Schulräume in der Herrenstraße.
- 1908 : Der Großindustrielle Karl Frank widmet aus Anlass des 60jährigen Regierungsjubiläums Kaiser Franz I. dem Musikverein das Spiegelfeld'sche Haus Waltherstraße 24.
- 1909 : Das Kaiserlich-Königlich Ministerium für Kultur und Unterricht genehmigt den Titel : « Kaiser-Franz-Josef-Jubiläums - Musikschule des Linzer Musikvereins » .
- 1914 : 21 Lehrkräfte unterrichten 445 Schüler.
- 1923 : Alfred Klietmann Nachfolger August Göllerichs.
- 1930 : Robert Keldorfer, Schul- und Musikdirektor.
- 1932 : Die Musikvereinsschule wird Bruckner-Konservatorium.
- 1934 : Anerkennung der Abschlussprüfungen.
- 1935 : Erteilung des Öffentlichkeitsrechtes für ein Jahr.

1936 : Erneuerung des Öffentlichkeitsrechtes bis 1939.

1939 : Robert Keldorfer wird « beurlaubt » .

1939 : Der Musikverein beschließt seine Auflösung, Adolf Trittinger Leiter des Bruckner-Konservatoriums.

1940 : In der Folge drastische Einschränkungen des Unterrichtsbetriebes.

1943 : Adolf Trittinger wird « beurlaubt » ; Ablösung durch Anton Schulz, später abgelöst durch A. Schön.

1945 : Carl Steiner, Direktor des Bruckner-Konservatoriums.

1945 : Eingliederung der Städtischen Musikschule bis 1950.

1951 : Genehmigung des Statuts des Bruckner-Konservatoriums.

1952 : Umbau und Adaptierung des Schulgebäudes in der Waltherstraße.

1953 : Genehmigung der neuen Schul- und Unterrichtsordnung durch das Land Oberösterreich.

1958 : Hans Winterberger, interimistischer Leiter. Wilhelm Jerger, Direktor, Umorganisation des Schulbetriebes.

1970 : Umzug des Konservatoriums von der Waltherstraße in das Gebäude an der Wildbergstraße 18.

1973 : Seminar B institutionalisiert.

1973 : Gerhard Dallinger, Direktor.

1977 : Musikschulwerk für Oberösterreich gegründet.

1988 : IGP (Instrumental-und Gesangspädagogik) institutionalisiert.

1990 : Hans Maria Kneih, Direktor.

1990 : Dislozierung : Sandgasse.

1995 : Reinhart von Gutzeit, Direktor.

1999 : Dislozierung : Petrinum.

2000 : 170 Lehrkräfte unterrichten etwa 1.000 Studierende.

2000 : Gründung des Fördervereins KONspirito (heute UNIsono) .

2004 : Einrichtung eines « Künstlerischen Basisstudiums » KBS/ Akademie für Begabtenförderung.

2004 : Umwandlung des Bruckner-Konservatoriums in die Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität (ABPU) .

2004 : Die ersten 39 Bachelor-AbsolventInnen und 5 Master-AbsolventInnen feiern im Sommersemester Sponion.

2004 : Umbenennung des Vereins KONspirito in UNIsono.

2006 : Anton Voigt, kommissarischer Rektor.

2007 : Marianne Betz, Rektorin.

2009 : Erste Re-Akkreditierung als Privatuniversität durch den Österreichischen Akkreditierungsrat (ÖAR) .

2011 : Spatenstich für den Neubau der ABPU am Fuße des Linzer Pöstlingbergs.

2012 : Ursula Brandstätter, Rektorin.

2012 : Dachgleiche beim Neubau.

2014 : Zweite Re-Akkreditierung als Privatuniversität durch die Agentur für Qualitätssicherung und Akkreditierung Austria (AQ Austria) .

2014 : Rund 200 Lehrende unterrichten 850 Studierende, 970 AbsolventInnen schlossen bisher ihre Bachelor- und Masterstudien erfolgreich ab.

2014 : Festakt anlässlich 10 Jahre Universitätswerdung.

The Annexion of Anton Bruckner : Nazi Revisionism and the Politics of Appropriation

(By Bryan Gilliam.)

The infamous photograph of 1937 in Regensburg is difficult to forget : Adolf Hitler, in full Nazi military dress, stands gazing reverently at a marble bust of the Austrian composer, Anton Bruckner. This likeness created by Adolf Rothenberger, in a style consonant with National-Socialist realism, is placed on a dark pedestal bordered in gold and topped with the Nazi seal, an eagle clutching the swastika. Bruckner had, at long last, joined the other luminaries of German culture in Regensburg's « Walhalla » , a marble replica of the Parthenon, completed in 1841, under the direction of King Ludwig I of Bavaria and filled with images of German cultural heroes of the past. A central goal of the Bruckner occasion was the Austrian composer's « elevation » to the status of a full-fledged German composer brought into the embrace of the 3rd « Reich » , a step that no doubt foreshadowed (and helped prepare for) the « Anschluß » of Austria, 8 months later.

The Regensburg ceremony which included speeches and remarks by Peter Raabe (President of the « Reichsmusikkammer ») ; Max Auer (President of the « Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») ; Josef Gœbbels, and others served as a centerpiece for various musical political events, including a series of concerts, a convention of the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , and a meeting of the Bavarian District Nazi Party Congress. Through the narrow lens of « Bruckneriana » , this celebration could be interpreted merely as an event capping the festivities of the previous year commemorating the 40th anniversary of Bruckner's death. But, from the wider perspective of Nazi political strategies of the late- 1930's, this event should, more correctly, be recognized as a launching point.

Beyond the Bruckner anniversary, the year 1936 marked a time when, according to Gœbbels, the « chains » of Versailles had finally been « stripped-off » ; Germany had, once again, become a formidable military power, and it was time to expand toward Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. Though it may seem far-fetched to mention Nazi military strategy within the context of a Bruckner essay, we shall see how the image of the composer was manipulated in a complex domestic propaganda campaign synchronized with the post-1936 era, a period of mobilization that Gœbbels himself characterized as the « danger zone » .

Bruckner's importance as a cultural icon for National-Socialism goes far beyond marble statuary, banners, swastikas, or even Teutonic cultural chauvinism. 40 years after his death, he had become an integral part of a re-invigorated « Gleichschaltung » for post-1936 German culture, a campaign launched in the press and sustained through concerts, music festivals, and even political rallies. The threads that connect Bruckner to the cultural-political aims of the 3rd « Reich » are manifold, ranging from the openly banal to the artfully subtle, where words sounding innocent enough to present-day ears were encoded with different meanings to audiences of the 1930's and 1940's.

Hitler's personal interest

The Nazi propaganda campaign glorifying Bruckner would never have taken place were it not for Hitler's personal interest in and identification with Bruckner as a man, a composer, and a fellow Upper-Austrian. Indeed, the future dictator had been infatuated with Bruckner's music from the days of his youth. Hitler's early struggles as an artist are well-known : the young, mediocre artist from Braunau had tried and failed to enter the Viennese artistic establishment, and he doubtless identified with Bruckner who, decades earlier, found himself outside the Viennese « bourgeois » musical mainstream.

Hitler twice tried to enter the Academy of Fine-Arts in Vienna (1907-1908) . He also sought admission to the Vienna Architectural School but did not have sufficient credentials. He would remain in the Austrian capital for another 5 years, years that Hitler himself discussed in « Mein Kampf » (« Hitler and the Artists » , Holmes and Meier, New York, 1983) . Henry Grobßhans surveys this Viennese period as an important context for his later artistic opinions and political policies (« The Viennese Experience » ; pages 31-46) .

An excerpt from Gœbbels's diary, from 13 March 1941, suggests both the longevity of Hitler's wounded feelings with regard to Vienna and the direct connection with Bruckner :

« Drive to Saint-Florian. To the monastery where Bruckner used to compose. What a beautiful Baroque building. We intend to turn the priests out of here and found a music college and a home for the Bruckner Society. A marvelous plan. A farm boy who conquered the world with his music. How rich this district is in culture, history, and artistic power even today. Hitler intends to establish a center of culture here. As a counter-weight to Vienna, which will have to be gradually phased-out of the picture. He does not like Vienna. Linz is his darling. He intends to make alterations to Saint-Florian at his own expense. »

An illuminating monograph by Hanns Kreczi chronicles Hitler's preoccupation with Bruckner up to the end of the War - specifically, the plan (dating from around 1941) to convert Saint-Florian into a « Bruckner-Stiftung » under the personal protection of the « Führer ». This so-called « Brucknerian Bayreuth » would serve a threefold purpose : Saint-Florian would become a « sacred shrine for the immortal works of Bruckner » (to promote and to maintain a « Bruckner tradition ») ; it would be the site of an annual Bruckner Festival not unlike Bayreuth ; and it would become the site of a music institute.

But beyond the « Bruckner-Stiftung » project, the composer's music was exploited ceremonially, both in live-concert and on the radio. Albert Speer recalled how a movement from a Bruckner Symphony preceded « each of his “ cultural speeches ” at the Nuremberg Party Rallies ». The infamous 30 June 1937 « Tag der deutschen Kunst », a massive Nazi-organized parade celebrating « healthy » German art, opened with a fanfare from Bruckner's 3rd Symphony. Granted, the Bruckner melody displays a certain solemn, ceremonial quality ; more importantly, it was the very theme cited by Richard Wagner himself in connection with the dedication of the 3rd Symphony to the Bayreuth Master. Wagner and Bayreuth had been politicized by the new regime within the 1st year of Hitler's take-over, and the Nazis saw much to gain by re-enforcing the « cliché » of Bruckner as « Wagner-Symphonist ». Such a view is exemplified by a critique of an SS concert that appeared in « Die Musik », in 1934 ; the commentator even managed to include Beethoven as a precursor to the 3rd « Reich » :

« The Bayreuth Master, one of the most important pioneers of the German transformation and one of the boldest oracles of the 3rd “ Reich ”, was represented by the Overture to the “ Flying Dutchman ”, the “ Grail Monologue ”, and “ Am stillen Herd ”. And Bruckner's monumental 7th, which could be called his “ Eroica ”, is heroically related to Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, not only in the tone of the entire work but also in the “ Trauermusik ” of the slow movement. It (Bruckner's slow movement) also has as its subject the lament over the death of a hero - in this case, it relates to Richard Wagner. »

In April 1945, Bruckner's music would be used to commemorate the death of another « hero » when the Adagio of the 7th Symphony followed the news of Adolf Hitler's death on German radio.

Bruckner, Wagner, and the International Bruckner Society

The early, close relationship between Bayreuth and the 3rd « Reich » drew minor friction between the International Bruckner Society (IBS) and the National-Socialists, despite their friendly ties. Before Hitler's take-over, the aims of the Society were simple enough : to promote the works of Anton Bruckner and to argue for authentic editions of those works. But there was an un-official two-fold agenda as well : to present Bruckner as a rational, logical composer along the lines of the prevailing Brahmsian paradigm and to counter the stereotype of Bruckner as a « Wagner-Symphonist » . The International Bruckner Society was delighted with promises of financial support by the Nazis (Josef Gœbbels openly pledged money for authentic Bruckner editions in his Regensburg speech) , yet, beneath this surface of mutual satisfaction, lay an un-resolved element of tension with regard to Bruckner and Wagner.

This tension would surface in the May 1937 issue of the « Zeitschrift für Musik » , just 1 month before the Regensburg ceremony, when Max Auer published an article drawing clear stylistic distinctions between the 2 composers. Auer's goal was to contrast Wagner's roots in the world of the theater from Bruckner's as a church organist.

« It is unthinkable to ponder Bach's entire output excluding his experience as an organist, Haydn's and Mozart's music without their courtly collaborations. Beethoven's work without his Liberal ideals, and Wagner's creations without the role of the theater in his formative years. Bruckner's earliest musical experience was that of the organ at Saint-Florian. »

(Max Auer. « Anton Bruckner, die Orgel und Richard Wagner » , in : « Zeitschrift für Musik » , Nr. 104 (1937) ; pages 477-481.)

The fundamental difference concerned orchestration ; the « Bruckner-Klang » grew-out of his experience as an organist - a sound far removed from Wagner, notwithstanding the Wagner tubas in Bruckner's late Symphonies. Most curious in Auer's article is a odd footnote that asserts (in letters double-spaced for emphasis) that neither he nor the International Bruckner Society « had or have » anti-Wagnerian aims. The political overtones to this disclaimer are obvious, for music commentators who criticized Wagner during the 3rd « Reich » risked running afoul of the regime itself. Auer was admittedly swimming against the stream in his effort to separate Bruckner and Wagner, an effort undercut by a report in the very same issue in which a contributor suggested that the Bayreuth Festival might well incorporate a Bruckner Festival by performing his Symphonies on the days when Operas were not being staged.

Auer replied to Lemacher's suggestion in the next issue (« Zeitschrift für Musik » Nr. 104, 1937 ; page 675) . The diplomacy of the reply still reflects Auer's desire not to be confused with anti-Wagnerians. Without getting bogged down in the substance and meaning of such a suggestion, Auer merely pointed to practical problems : the sunken orchestra-pit and the excessive fatigue it would cause musicians who might need a break on those days when an Opera was not being performed. (Heinrich Lemacher. « Bruckner in Bayreuth » , in : « Zeitschrift für Musik » , Nr. 104, 1937 ; pages 530-531.)

Gœbbels straddled the fence in his Regensburg address, for he neither wanted to insult the International Bruckner Society, who cosponsored the event, nor did he want to undermine prevailing National-Socialist cultural views which sought to link the 2 composers. He twice alluded to Wagner in his address. Early in his speech, he criticized those who viewed Bruckner's music as a « Symphonic distortion of Wagner's art » - a remark that few could gainsay. But Auer, promoter of the Bruckner organist-orchestrator paradigm, must have swallowed hard when Gœbbels continued :

« Bruckner's Wagner experience had an almost revolutionary effect on the sanctity of his musical language (" die klangliche Gestalt seiner Tonsprache ") , which only then assumed " that " character that we recognize as the true Brucknerian style. From that moment onwards, the church musician, at once, retreats almost entirely and, out of him, emerges the distinctive Symphonist. »

What Gœbbels suggests is a metamorphosis (galvanized by Wagner) from church musician to Symphonist, from « Kantor » to « Symphoniker » . This image of Bruckner's elevation to the loftier « secular » realm was integral to Gœbbels's post-1936 domestic propaganda campaign.

Bruckner's music and National-Socialist « æsthetics »

Beyond Hitler's personal interest and the Wagner connection, what was Bruckner's musical attraction for the Nazis ? Was there anything inherently German about his works ? The question of « Germanness » in music preoccupied music commentators throughout the 3rd « Reich » . It is a question with a significant history in German culture, an issue inseparable from its racial sub-text, and with roots in the anti-Mendelssohn campaign around the mid- 19th Century and the Brahms-Bruckner controversy, later on in the Century. The issue re-surfaced in a slightly different form at the end of the First World War, when wounded national pride catalyzed a search among scholars and journalists alike for cultural identity. And though some of this early post-War nationalism was benign and unreflective, most of it had become strongly ideological and openly racial by the 1930's. By then, the conclusions were fairly easy to summarize : Aryan music was heroic, lofty, organic, up-lifting, philosophical, and spiritual ; non-Aryan music (foreign or domestic) was viewed as trivial, superficial, epigonic (considered a particularly Jewish trait) , ornamental without substance, eclectic, and rootless.

Friedrich W. Herzog (in : « Was ist deutsche Musik ? ») offers specific examples for the Teutonic paradigm : Bach's « Well-Tempered Clavier » and « Art of Fugue » ; Beethoven's 9th Symphony and 3rd « Leonore » Overture ; Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » ; and Bruckner's 5th and 9th Symphonies. He specifically cites the fugal Finale of the 5th and the slow movement of the 9th. Herzog's essay lays particular emphasis on fugue, which had had such a noble German history and which, after the First World War, had allegedly lost its « heroic character » . Fugue and chorale, the twin-towers of Holy German Art, had been degraded during the « Golden 1920's » ; they had even been parodied in such works as Kurt Weill's « Die Dreigroschenoper » . Against this perceived back-drop of Weimar pessimism, even cynicism, where cultural values of the metropolis seemed to prevail over those of the village, where the Chamber Symphony became the new orchestral paradigm, Bruckner's music must have appeared as an enormous anachronism. Bruckner, the school teacher from Upper-Austria, served as an ideal symbol for « Blut and Boden » ; fugue and chorale were essential to his musical expression, and his epic Symphonic designs were conceived on a scale unprecedented even for their ...

The victim of Jewish criticism

The 2nd part of Gœbbels's speech, the image of Bruckner as a victim of vicious Viennese criticism, served broader cultural ends. Lashing-out at Eduard Hanslick and others, allowed Gœbbels to address a recently formulated ideological tenet, namely the intolerability of music-criticism (or, more generally, art-criticism) . In fall of 1936, the Propaganda Minister made a public proclamation against « Kunstkritik » , a decree widely circulated in journals on music, art, and film. Art-criticism would be appropriate only along ideological grounds ; otherwise, art commentary (« Kunstbetrachtung ») would be the only permissible form of journalism. Gœbbels acknowledges Bruckner with regard to the formation of this new decree :

« If the public practice of “ Kunstbetrachtung ” has been restricted by law to official channels in the new Germany, then, we believe we have also resolved a debt of gratitude to Bruckner who has struggled in solitude, tortured-up to his death by his tormentors. »

The anti-Semitic flavour of these remarks, though less resonant today, was not lost on his audience : such remarks were fully in line with National-Socialist ideology condemning Jews as unproductive, even parasitic. Eduard Hanslick and Max Kalbeck could not compose, they could only write about, and possibly destroy, the honest, creative artists who did. And if Gœbbels’s speech is vague about the connection between Bruckner, criticism, and international Jewry, Fritz Skorzeny leaves nothing to the imagination :

« As Bruckner began his artistic career, international Jewry, in the guise of European Liberalism, had already taken-up the fight against the German spirit which, in the arts, had begun to stir. »

This ugly stereotype of the Jew as carpet-bagger appeared in sharpest profile shortly thereafter in the 1941 propaganda film by Fritz Hippler, « Der ewige Jude » (The Eternal Jew) , a project personally supervised by Gœbbels. The film juxtaposes carefully crafted shots of muscular Aryan workers toiling in factories with thin, bearded ghetto Jews haggling-over merchandise no doubt wrought by the sweat of the Aryan brow.

Bruckner and « Gottgläubigkeit »

The Propaganda Minister, however, saved the most important element of Bruckner revisionism for last - a clever biographical sleight of hand whereby Bruckner, after becoming acquainted with the work of Richard Wagner, « retreats » from the role of church musician and « out of him emerges the distinctive Symphonist » . After Bruckner’s engagement with the realm of Wagner, he is elevated to the absolute Symphonic sphere, a realm beyond liturgical obligation :

« Here, his creative genius frees itself of all ties to the church. He is filled with the victorious intoxication of form-giving, and a boundless feeling of freedom roars through his soul. »

Intentionally ignored, of course, were later sacred works such as the « Te Deum » and the « 150th Psalm » , an omission unchallenged both by German music scholars and by critics no doubt practicing « Musikbetrachtung » .

That Bruckner was a devout Roman Catholic, or even a Christian, is omitted entirely from the Regensburg address. His religious faith is described simply as « God-believing » (« Gottgläubig ») , a Nazi political construction with unmistakable pagan overtones. To understand the context of « Gottgläubigkeit » , we need to focus briefly on church-related events from 1933 to 1936. For 1936, not only marked a Bruckner anniversary and a ban on art-criticism but also signaled a significant souring of relations between the National-Socialists and the Catholic Church, exemplified by the July 1936 Papal Encyclical « Mir brennender Sorge » (With Burning Concern) and the establishment of the term « Gottgläubig » as an official alternative religious confession, only 4 months later.

The relationship between the Nazis and the Church is a vast, complex topic further complicated by Hitler's personal desire publicly to avoid the problem ; even « Mein Kampf » skirts the issue. But Hitler's anti-clerical beliefs were no secret to those in the inner-circle, and the subject of religion came-up, now and again, during the Führer's table talks. Herrmann Rauschnig reports Hitler's private remark that :

« German Christianity is a distortion ; one is either a German or a Christian. You cannot be both. We need free men who feel and know God in themselves. »

Implicit in this statement is the perception that a belief in a doubtful hereafter is not only futile but a sign of weakness. This antagonism toward organized religion, particularly Christianity, was rooted in the view that ancient Greece served as an important model for modern Germany, a conviction held by German artists and intellectuals of the mid- to late- 19th Century, particularly Friedrich Nietzsche and Richard Wagner.

Hitler chose appeasement as his initial strategy with regard to organized religion, and he succeeded early-on with the Protestants who, after the downfall of the « Kaiser » , were without political direction. For these German Protestants, anti-Semitism was no real obstacle. Nor did it largely disturb the Catholic Church for whom it was the Nazi's putative « socialist » orientation that presented a more serious road-block to formal relations. The Vatican, moreover, perceived Bolshevism as a far graver international threat than Fascism, as exemplified by their 1929 Lateran Treaty with Benito Mussolini, which served as a model for Hitler's « Reichskoncordat » of 1933.

After the German November Revolution, the Holy-See tried and failed to ratify a formal treaty with the Weimar Republic, but they were able to succeed with Hitler, who saw much to gain. This national agreement of 1933 clarified a number of issues for Rome : financial subsidies to the church, legal status for the clergy, and a Nazi pledge to interfere neither with the work of the Catholic Church nor with its direct link to the Vatican. But a high-price would be paid, for the church would have to stay-out of national politics at every level. Moreover, it soon became clear that the Nazis would not stay-out of Catholic affairs. They mounted a skillful strategy of un-official intimidation whereby sermons were monitored, priests were harassed, and, of course, a propaganda effort designed to undermine the authority of the Catholic Church was launched by Nazi Youth organizations.

By 1936, ties between Germany and the Vatican became irreparably frayed ; the culmination was « Mir brennender Sorge » , a papal document that criticized Nazi anti-Semitism, anti-Christian political indoctrination in youth organizations, the erosion of civil liberties, and the deification of the « Führer » . The National-Socialists immediately realized that their church policy, especially with regard to the Vatican, had failed. There was no choice but to recognize Nazism (or, more specifically, « German-nature ») . This non-Christian, if not pagan, designation thus allowed those who had left the church to consider themselves still religious, yet, it also insured that Jews who left their faith could not be included. The importance of retaining one's spirituality outside of the church was essential given that opposition to Bolshevism (materialistic and atheistic) was an immutable component of Nazi dogma.

In short, the 3rd « Reich » made official something that it had believed all along : that the National-Socialist « revolution » was as much spiritual as it was political. German art became a Holy Art, and music its most sacred manifestation. The view of music as a sacred art was hardly a Nazi construct ; the notion prevailed throughout late-19th Century Germany and was held by composers and philosophers alike. Major voices of the Weimar era may have called this philosophy into question, but music, as a « Heilige Kunst » , was soon resurrected in the 1930's with a disturbing political spin. The 1937 Regensburg ceremony placed Bruckner as a God in the Holy-Temple of « Walhalla » . His music would be the sacred language and Nazism the mystical religion. The link between the Sunday-morning Bruckner ceremony and the « Reich » 's new religious strategy was made concrete by a mass-rally that very afternoon. Speaking to some 200,000 people gathered in Regensburg, Hitler (with heated pre- « Anschluß » rhetoric) used the term « Gottgläubigkeit » in public, for the 1st time :

« I will never allow anyone to ever again tear this “ Volk ” asunder, to reduce it to a heap of warring religious camps. Generation after generation of our “ Volk ” will march on thus in our history, with this banner always in mind, this banner that places us under an obligation to our “ Volk ”, its honour, its freedom, and our community. We, therefore, go our way into the future with the deepest belief in God (“ Gottgläubigkeit ”) . Would all that we have achieved been possible had Providence not helped us ? »

The pious Bruckner would be the messenger of that « divine Providence » . His Symphonies, especially in those spiritual slow movements that surpassed even Franz Schubert's « heavenly lengths » , were deemed a religious experience, and only those who shared the same blood and soil could fully-comprehend the message.

A German review of non-Aryan Eugene Ormandy's interpretation of Bruckner's 5th Symphony in Linz, in 1937, dismissed the performance in 3 sentences :

« His art of conducting, which focuses on superficiality, is naturally foreign to Bruckner's Aryan form of art. Technically, the “ 5th ” was realized with great verve but, inwardly, he glossed over Bruckner's greatness. »

Nowhere is this phenomenon better exemplified than in the Viennese « Dunkelkonzerte » of the early 1940's, in which the darkened « Wiener Konzerthaus » was transformed into a sacred space where listening to Bruckner became tantamount to attending church.

(It is perhaps futile to find one specific model for the « dark-concert » ; beyond the obvious Bayreuth - « Parsifal » parallel, one should remember the force of darkness for various Nazi ceremonies, where focused light cut through the night : evening book-burnings ; torch processions ; night-time political rallies with a spotlight on the « Führer » , and the like.)

Other composers might be featured on the program, but the highlight was always a Symphony by Bruckner.

(The 1st « Dunkelkonzert » was staged on November 17th, 1939. It offered the Prelude to the Opera « Parsifal » by Richard Wagner ; an organ work by Max Reger, and the 7th Symphony by Anton Bruckner.)

A fac-simile of one such program (the concert celebrating the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra) suggests these strong religious overtones : before intermission (in a partially-darkened hall) , Mozart's « Regina cœli » ; after intermission (in a fully-darkened hall) , Bruckner's 9th, the only Symphony that Bruckner dedicated to God himself.

(These « Dunkelkonzert » by the Vienna Symphony Orchestra were all under the direction of Hans Weisbach.)

But the composer would have to be separated from Christianity, in order for the National-Socialists to make him « God's messenger » ; Bruckner, the church composer, had to be ignored. No doubt in synchrony with Regensburg, a host of articles appeared in 1937 attempting to downplay Bruckner's Catholicism. Peter Raabe stressed Bruckner's « deafness » to the material world.

He declared :

« Blessed are the pure of heart, for they shall see God ! »

Raabe described a Symphonist who « talks to God » , yet, who writes church music of little importance. This paradox cannot be appreciated outside the context of « Gottgläubigkeit » .

Werner Korte acknowledged Bruckner's Catholic roots, citing them as a reason for Hanslick's vehement criticism, but rejected the notion of Bruckner as a « martyr of the Catholic idea » or the perception of his music as an « apology for Christianity » .

Walter Schilling, likewise, uses Eduard Hanslick as a foil to downplay Bruckner's Catholicism :

« Bruckner's music smacks neither of the Jesuit (jesuitisch) nor of the heretical as the poor scribes Eduard Hanslick and Gustav Dömpke have complained. It is religious in the broadest sense ; it is not a manifestation of a religious formula or dogma. Rather, it is solemn (" weihvoll ") and elevated as is any true art. »

Reinhold Zimmermann got to the real issue, namely that « Catholic » and « Aryan » are contradictory terms :

« It would be fundamentally wrong to view Bruckner, solely or even primarily, as a Catholic. Rather, it is the racially-oriented consideration of his life and works that claims incontestable prerogative in the assessment of Bruckner's personality and achievement. »

Zimmermann's notion is reminiscent of Hitler's private comment to Herrmann Rauschning that one is either German or Christian.

At face value, Goebbels's Regensburg speech commemorated a solemn, ceremonial moment, with obvious connections to the ultimate annexation of Austria but, as we have seen, his strategy served far wider purposes, fueling a domestic propaganda mechanism for years to come. Hitler's well-documented plans for Saint-Florian, in the 1940's, further ...

...

In 1948, the Bruckner Society of America relaunched its journal, « Chord and Discord » . The journal ran, albeit with gaps in publication, through 1969, and, by then, Bruckner performances were no longer novelties. Eugen Jochum, and later-on, Bernard Haitink, Daniel Barenboim, Herbert von Karajan, Klaus Tennstedt, and others would undertake ambitious Bruckner recording projects. More recently, with the advent of compact discs, projects have included such rarities as the original versions of the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 8th Symphonies.

Articles on Bruckner continued to appear in German and Austrian journals immediately after the War, though not nearly as many as had appeared during the heyday of the Nazi campaign. Post-War studies took on a more positivistic tone ; references to race and soil gave way to editorial issues and analytical problems. German scholars felt unobliged to apologize for Bruckner, the man, given the fact that he was neither an ardent German nationalist nor anti-Semitic. But neither did they nor their editors feel compelled to repudiate fabrications concerning Bruckner, race, and religion in Nazi-era issues of those very journals. The National-Socialist problem remained largely unaddressed, a policy ultimately in dialogue with the broader « Nullpunkt » strategy of rebuilding rather than reflecting. But this code of silence has itself extended well beyond the post-War, as is exemplified by Leopold Nowak's Bruckner bibliography for the « New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » . The abundant ideological, propagandistic articles of the Nazi period are excluded from his list of sources. Those relatively few Nazi-vintage writings, that managed to make the list, are mostly ones devoid of any overt political content (a catalogue, published letters, memoirs, and the like) .

The year after the end of the Second World War marked the 50th anniversary of Bruckner's death, an event celebrated by a meeting of the International Bruckner Society, in Linz. There, on 27 July 1946, Max Auer, president of the re-organized Society, gave an address noteworthy for its silence about the previous dozen years. His speech opens with the lines :

« We have gathered here to pay tribute to Anton Bruckner on the 50th anniversary of his death. But we do not observe his death in mourning, rather, we celebrate life and resurrection ! And with joy, we unite in the call : The king is dead, long live the king ! And Bruckner is a king ! A king of absolute music. »

Though unmentioned, the apparitions of Hitler and Wagner haunt Auer's words. On the surface, Auer celebrates Bruckner's death (« the king is dead ») , and he looks to a new era of Bruckner research and reception. But, beneath that surface, lurk other ghosts : another king has died, and, in the wake of the « Führer » 's death, Bruckner the Austrian composer has been resurrected from the ashes of Nazi propaganda ; the « king of absolute music » has been freed from the fetters of his musico-political association with Richard Wagner.

How different Auer's un-recorded remarks must have been in 1937, as he awarded the Bruckner medal to the « Führer », in Regensburg. Might they have echoed comments he published only a year earlier ? Then, in a preface to the final volume of the August Göllerich / Max Auer biography, he mounted a thinly veiled attack against Weimar-era « materialism », when « artistic Bolshevism was carried-out to extremes », and where Bruckner's « God-consecrated art » served as a guide (« Führer ») to a better world - the world of 1936. A decade later, Auer's Linz address stressed both Bruckner's Austrian roots and his international appeal, assertions that admittedly contradicted Nazi doctrine ; but did this later speech successfully offset Auer's own earlier remarks ? Is it enough that he vaguely alluded to a new era, saying nothing about the old ? Clearly not, but as someone trying to launch a reformulated Bruckner Society, to encourage more performances, and to win over larger audiences, who would want to re-open old wounds ?

It could be argued that Bruckner and German politics were never discussed in « Chord and Discord » either before, during, or after the War years. Of course, in the United States, Bruckner was not a domestic political issue. He was marginalized not because of National-Socialist activities but because his compositional style was alien to the Brahmsian paradigm of logic, balance, and economy so prevalent in the American academy at that time. His music may be better represented in current concert repertoires and record catalogues, but the man and his work still remain at the fringe of the American musicological discourse, albeit a discourse in transition. And though important issues (editorial, historical, cultural, and analytical) are discussed for the 1st time or in fresh contexts, it is equally clear that much remains to be explored with respect to how our present image of Bruckner has been consciously or unconsciously affected by the Nazi appropriation of the composer. Could one argue, for example, that important post-War Bruckner interpretations (exemplified by slow tempi and lush harmonies) have unwittingly carried over this phenomenon of Bruckner as Nazi religious icon to the contemporary Symphony-hall or recording studio ? Can we edit or analyze Bruckner today ignoring the fact that such words as « authenticity », « purity », and « organicism » were encoded with distinct political meanings in Nazi-era Bruckner discourse ? Admittedly, such questions suggest broader issues well beyond the scope of this essay, yet, they must ultimately be addressed, for Bruckner research cannot move forward without confronting its past, especially the dark chapter of Bruckner reception during the 3rd « Reich » .

La musique de Bruckner après 1945

What were the post-War consequences, if any, of the Nazi appropriation of Anton Bruckner's music ? Or, is this properly a misappropriation ? One could conceivably argue that music, especially if untexted and non-programmatic, resists misappropriation, regardless of its time. But music was merely one strand in a complex network of biographical revisionism wherein Bruckner's life was re-written in order to sustain racial policies, to validate an attack on « Kunstkritik », and to create a religious icon for a political mythology. Whether or not contemporary German audiences believed the Nazi propaganda, whether or not they sensed their common soil upon hearing a rustic Scherzo, communed with God during an Adagio, or even perceived Teutonic heroism in a fugal Finale is another large, complex issue yet to be sorted out.

Whatever the case, immediate post-War domestic consequences of the Nazi Bruckner campaign seem to have been short-lived. True, the « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » was re-named the Philharmonica Broadcasting Orchestra in May 1945, during Allied occupation. But it regained its « Bruckner » designation (as the Bruckner Philharmonica Orchestra) just 1 month later without raising eyebrows. This admittedly small, isolated event sheds light on post-War Bruckner reception in general ; unlike Richard Wagner, Bruckner remained generally untainted by the immediate Nazi past. His works continued to thrive in Austrian and German repertoires without external opposition, and his music was never boycotted in Israel.

Yet, Bruckner reception beyond the Axis orbit was not monolithic : for much of Europe, especially occupied Europe, Bruckner's music would inevitably recall German occupation, especially throughout the late 1940's and 1950's. In post-War America, Bruckner's music did not resonate in quite the same way ; his music was largely unknown to concert audiences, no doubt equally ignorant of any Nazi cultural campaign. Indeed, the late 1940's saw something of a Bruckner renaissance in the United States when, in 1948, the Bruckner Society of America relaunched its journal, « Chord and Discord » . The journal ran, albeit with gaps in publication, through 1969, and, by then, Bruckner performances were no longer novelties. Eugen Jochum, and, later on, Bernard Haitink, Daniel Barenboim, Herbert von Karajan, Klaus Tennstedt, and others would undertake ambitious Bruckner recording projects. More recently, with the advent of compact discs, projects have included such rarities as the original versions of the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 8th Symphonies.

Articles on Bruckner continued to appear in German and Austrian journals immediately after the War, though not nearly as many as had appeared during the heyday of the Nazi campaign. Post-War studies took on a more positivistic tone ; references to race and soil gave way to editorial issues and analytical problems. German scholars felt unobliged to apologize for Bruckner the man, given the fact that he was neither an ardent German nationalist nor anti-Semitic. But neither did they nor their editors feel compelled to repudiate fabrications concerning Bruckner, race, and religion in Nazi-era issues of those very journals. The National-Socialist problem remained largely unaddressed, a policy ultimately in dialogue with the broader « Nullpunkt » strategy of rebuilding rather than reflecting. But this code of silence has itself extended well beyond the post-War, as is exemplified by Leopold Nowak's Bruckner bibliography for the « New Grove Dictionary » . The abundant ideological, propagandistic articles of the Nazi period are excluded from his list of sources. Those relatively few Nazi-vintage writings that managed to make the list are mostly ones devoid of any overt political content (a catalogue, published letters, memoirs, and the like) .

The year after the end of the Second World War marked the 50th anniversary of Bruckner's death, an event celebrated by a meeting of the International Bruckner Society in Linz. There, on 27 July 1946, Max Auer, president of the re-organized Society, gave an address noteworthy for its silence about the previous dozen years. His speech opens with the lines :

« We have gathered here to pay tribute to Anton Bruckner on the 50th anniversary of his death. But we do not observe his death in mourning, rather we celebrate life and resurrection ! And with joy, we unite in the call : The King is dead, long live the King ! And Bruckner is a King ! A King of absolute music. »

Though unmentioned, the apparitions of Adolf Hitler and Richard Wagner haunt Auer's words. On the surface, Auer celebrates Bruckner's death (« the King is dead ») , and he looks to a new era of Bruckner research and reception. But, beneath that surface, lurk other ghosts : another King has died, and, in the wake of the « Führer's » death, Bruckner the Austrian composer has been resurrected from the ashes of Nazi propaganda ; the « King of absolute music » has been freed from the fetters of his musico-political association with Wagner.

How different Auer's unrecorded remarks must have been in 1937, as he awarded the Bruckner medal to the « Führer » in Regensburg. Might they have echoed comments he published only 1 year earlier ? Then, in a preface to the final volume of the Göllicherich-Auer biography, he mounted a thinly veiled attack against Weimar-era « materialism » , when « artistic Bolshevism was carried-out to extremes » , and where Bruckner's « God-consecrated art » served as a guide (« Führer ») to a better world : the world of 1936. A decade later, Auer's Linz address stressed both Bruckner's Austrian roots and his international appeal, assertions that admittedly contradicted Nazi doctrine ; but did this later speech successfully offset Auer's own earlier remarks ? Is it enough that he vaguely alluded to a new era, saying nothing about the old ? Clearly not, but as someone trying to launch a reformulated Bruckner Society, to encourage more performances, and to win over larger audiences, who would want to re-open old wounds ?

It could be argued that Bruckner and German politics were never discussed in « Chord and Discord » either before, during, or after the War years. Of course, in the United States, Bruckner was not a domestic political issue. He was marginalized not because of National-Socialist activities but because his compositional style was alien to the Brahmsian paradigm of logic, balance, and economy so prevalent in the American academy at that time. His music may be better represented in current concert repertoires and record catalogues, but the man and his work still remain at the fringe of the American musicological discourse, albeit a discourse in transition. Indeed, this present volume on Bruckner suggests just such a shift in direction. And though important issues (editorial, historical, cultural, and analytical) are discussed here for the 1st time or in fresh contexts, it is equally clear that much remains to be explored with respect to how our present image of Bruckner has been consciously or unconsciously affected by the Nazi appropriation of the composer. Could one argue, for example, that important post-War Bruckner interpretations (exemplified by slow tempi and lush harmonies) have unwittingly carried over this phenomenon of Bruckner as Nazi religious icon to the contemporary Symphony hall or recording studio ? Can we edit or analyze Bruckner today ignoring the fact that such words as « authenticity » , « purity » , and « organicism » were encoded with distinct political ...

For Anton Bruckner, a vague Nazi aura persists

100 years after his death, Anton Bruckner is still positioned on the fringe of the American Symphonic canon, despite having a loyal core of enthusiasts. When Gustav Mahler's time came in the 1960's, many believed that Bruckner's would soon follow, but that moment never quite arrived. Beyond the concert-hall, Bruckner was shunned by musicologists and theorists. Mere mention of his name at an academic conference inevitably produced a curled lip or a condescending smile.

Musicology has relaxed a bit, in recent years, and so, it seems, has the curled lip. One result has been a burst of scholarly interest in Bruckner, with 2 international conferences in the last 2 years. Still, public opinion remains heavily influenced by an image of Bruckner fostered by the Nazis, who appropriated him as one of their own in the 1930's. Scholars have only recently begun to explore this dark chapter in Bruckner's posthumous career, and how it has affected the way we view his personality and interpret his music.

Like it or not, the popular perception of Bruckner and his music is inescapably connected to this legacy. The National-Socialists made a conscious effort to link Bruckner's music with the religious aura of Wagner's Bayreuth, thus deifying both Opera House and Symphony Hall as Sacred settings for German music.

By exploiting the old « cliché » of Bruckner as Wagner-Symphonist, though with an unprecedented political spin, they gave the Symphonies a heightened sense of monumentality, a metaphysical meaning. The opening of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony consecrated a massive parade celebrating German art in Munich. Vienna audiences communed with Bruckner Symphonies in total darkness during the early 1940's.

Old habits die hard, and a residue of the « German » Bruckner may linger in performances today, in the form of solemn, ponderous tempos and a monumental sonic weight and solidity. What tends to be lost in the juxtaposition of Bruckner's music with Wagner's is the close relationship it actually bears to the lighter, fleeter style of Franz Schubert, a fellow Austrian.

The official Nazi campaign, which downplayed Bruckner's Austrian heritage, began in 1937, when National-Socialists and members of the International Bruckner Society gathered in Regensburg to consecrate a Bruckner bust installed in the « Walhalla », an 1841 replica of the Parthenon, filled with statues commemorating Teutonic cultural heroes. Photographs of the highly-publicized event show Adolf Hitler, Josef Gœbbels, Heinrich Himmler and others in full military regalia, gazing reverently at the Bruckner likeness. Hitler was awarded the Bruckner Society's 1st medal of honour, and Gœbbels delivered a keynote address on the meaning of Bruckner to the new Nazi order.

The message of the event was clear. The Austrian Bruckner had been « elevated » to the status of German composer brought into the embrace of the 3rd « Reich », a move that foreshadowed Germany's annexation of Austria, just 8 months later.

Germany always played a significant role in determining how Bruckner's music was received, even during his lifetime. Germany, not Austria, gave him the crucial early recognition that galvanized his career in Vienna, in the 1880's. Paradoxically, it was the musical economy and contrapuntal sophistication of the German Brahms that was synonymous with the values of the Viennese musical establishment. Bruckner's Symphonies were deemed lavish, even incoherent, and their counterpoint was hardly subtle. Curiously, the Austrian Catholic Bruckner remained foreign to his own cultural realm, little more than « a Symphonist living in Vienna », as the English musicologist Paul Banks once observed. But with the premiere of his 7th Symphony (in Leipzig, in 1884), the tide turned for Bruckner, and he gained his long-awaited fame, 1st in Germany, then in Austria.

The Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra undertook a complete cycle of Bruckner's Symphonies, in 1919 ; 23 years after his death. But in the wake of German and Austrian military defeat in World War I, this was a time of political and economic instability, of uneasiness with the immediate cultural past. The Bruckner Cycle was a painful reminder of the ill-fated era of Emperor Wilhelm II. Younger composers, performers and audiences of the new age of the Weimar Republic rejected the old guard, embracing modern technology (radio, film, recordings) , exploring more remote periods of music and celebrating popular music. Bruckner's monumental Symphonic designs seemed especially anachronistic to Weimar modernists, who had adopted the Chamber Symphony as the the new orchestral ideal.

Yet, this sense of anachronism only enhanced Bruckner's value for certain anti-liberal voices. The composer, though deemed a progressive force at the turn of the Century, became an emblem for conservatism during the 1920's. Max Auer, President of the International Bruckner Society, which was founded in Leipzig, in 1927, and moved to Vienna in 1929, decried the false « prophets » of a new age in which materialism and Bolshevism threatened German art. Bruckner's « divinely consecrated art » , he suggested, could serve as a guide to a better world.

During his lifetime, the apolitical Bruckner allowed himself to be supported in part by a dubious pan-Germanic fringe element. It would, however, be a distortion to link him or his music directly with the political goals of that group. Such reactionary views were voiced with greater stridency, in the 1920's, when, after the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Austria was experiencing a painful crisis of identity.

Indeed, during the 20's, Hitler's devotion to Bruckner the man, composer and fellow Upper-Austrian intensified significantly. Hitler's involvement with Bruckner's music dated back to his youth, when, as a young, mediocre painter from Braunau, he tried and failed to enter the Viennese artistic establishment.

Hitler made no secret of the solidarity he felt with the rural Bruckner, who, decades earlier, had also found himself outside the Viennese cultural mainstream. In 1941, Hitler planned to phase Vienna out of the cultural picture and promote Linz, the seat of Upper-Austria. Saint-Florian, the monastery near Linz that had been Bruckner's spiritual sanctuary, was to be converted into a Bruckner Foundation. This so-called « Brucknerian Bayreuth » would promote and maintain a Bruckner tradition for the 3rd « Reich » .

Years before the Saint-Florian project, which was never fully implemented, the National-Socialists sought to exploit the image of Bruckner as part of a propaganda campaign linked with a new military mobilization. 1936, the 40th anniversary of Bruckner's death, was also the year the Rhineland was remilitarized. The Nazis devised a 3 part propaganda strategy that was woven into Goebbels's address at the Regensburg Bruckner ceremony in 1937. 1st, Bruckner's Upper-Austrian peasant roots were sentimentalized with the familiar naive, « rustic genius » portrayal that persists today. By coupling his « love for his native soil and for the German fatherland » with strong « blood and soil » imagery, Goebbels set forth a cultural rationale for the Austrian « Anschluß » .

2nd, the « cliché » of Bruckner as the small-town « outsider » victimized by a conspiracy of Viennese critics would be exploited in conjunction with Goebbels's official policy banning art criticism, a field that had allegedly been dominated by cynical, liberal Jews for decades.

3rd, the image of the devout Bruckner as a « visionary mystic » was exploited after the breakdown of relations between Berlin and the Vatican, in 1936. The National-Socialists formulated a new religious confession, called « God Believing » (« Gottglaubig ») , which recognized German nationalist identity as a religion in itself. Bruckner's Symphonies were to be its Sacred language, though his important religious works and, indeed, the very identity of Bruckner as Catholic had to be ignored. The Symphonies, especially the slow movements, which surpassed even Schubert's heavenly lengths, were deemed a religious experience, and only those who shared the same blood and soil could fully comprehend the message.

So, it is no coincidence that only hours after the Regensburg ceremony Hitler used the word « Gottglaubig » , for the 1st time at a large political rally, cleverly connecting a National-Socialist religion with German expansionism.

The strong role music played in Nazi politics may strike some as unusual ; contemporary political and cultural wars have more to do with sex and violence than with atonality and dissonance. But, in the Germany of the 1930's, music was seen as the most Sacred manifestation of what Hans Sachs, in Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » , calls « holy German art » , and the stakes were high.

A remarkable line from Josef Gœbbels's speech promised a « considerable annual contribution to the International Bruckner Society for editions of the original versions of his Symphonies, until the Master's complete works are available in the form he envisioned » . Gœbbels, the politician, sounds strangely like a musicologist. But if Bruckner was to assume an oracle-like status for the new Nazi religion, the scores to his Symphonies were the Sacred texts, and the clear implication was that these texts had been corrupted by outside Jewish influences.

Max Auer, the Society's President, who had decried the cultural corruption of the Weimar Republic, described Bruckner's music as a « return to the pure sources » , and the search for purity formed the ideological basis for the 1st Bruckner Edition, edited by Robert Haas. That purist legacy, which rejected early printed editions of Bruckner's works as inauthentic and deemed manuscript sources the only authentic texts for the composer's music, lingers even today. Only recently, have young American and German scholars, like Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt and Christa Brüstle, begun to challenge this simplistic principle.

The Nazi propaganda campaign was also fought in German music journals, where a vast body of ideological literature on Bruckner was generated. This literature was all but ignored after World War II, and the code of silence extended even into the Bruckner bibliography in « The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » , of 1980. During the years just after the War, articles in German-language journals changed drastically in tone. References to race and soil gave way to editorial problems, documentary studies and analytical issues. Such positivistic concerns offered a refuge for scholars who wished to forget the recent past, but this neglect only extended the Nazi shadow, beyond the 12 years of actual dictatorship.

Can we, now, a half Century later, edit, analyze, perform or listen to Bruckner ignoring the fact that terms like « authenticity » , « purity » and « organicism » were encoded with distinct political meanings ? Could one argue that the Nazi-deified « German » Bruckner, removed from his Austrian heritage and placed alongside Wagner, became the model for a modern Bruckner performing tradition ? Have post-War Bruckner interpretations, exemplified by slow tempos and lush sonorities, unwittingly carried over the phenomenon of Bruckner as Nazi religious icon into the contemporary concert-hall and recording studio ?

Moreover, given this legacy, shouldn't we re-evaluate the tired notions of Bruckner as « peasant genius » , « visionary mystic » , « Wagner-Symphonist » , « insecure neurotic » prone to manipulation by zealous colleagues ? Although each of these labels predated the 1930's, the political spin imparted by the Nazis continues to resonate.

A new generation of scholars has made significant strides in addressing these issues. Decades from now, we may look back to this Centennial Year as a major turning-point toward a proper understanding and just appreciation of a composer who has, for too long, borne an ideological burden not of his own choosing.

Bruckner : coupable ou non coupable ?

100 years after his death, the reputation of the composer Anton Bruckner remains tarnished by his appropriation by Adolf Hitler.

Beyond the 40th anniversary of the death of Anton Bruckner, the year 1936 marked a time when according to Doctor Josef Gœbbels :

« The chains of Versailles had finally been stripped-off. »

Germany had, once again, become a formidable military machine.

(Audio) June 6, 1937 - Speech by Josef Gœbbels at Regensburg upon the installation of Bruckner's bust at « Walhalla » .

A bust Anton Bruckner was placed in the « Walhalla » Shrine, in Regensburg, Germany. Adolf Hitler was present at the ceremony since Bruckner was one of his favourite composers, and one with whom he shared an Upper-Austrian heritage. Josef Gœbbels used this occasion to present a speech which skillfully linked Bruckner's life and work to the National-Socialist agenda of creating German Art.

(Photo) « Walhalla » , Regensburg, Germany ; June 7, 1937 - The President of the Bruckner Society, Professor Max Auer, presented Adolf Hitler (during an act of State, on the occasion of the revelation of an Anton Bruckner bust) the Bruckner medal.

Anlaëblich der Enthuellung einer Anton Bruckner Bueste wurde Adolf Hitler vom Praesidenten der Bruckner-Gesellschaft Professor Max Auer bei einem Staatsakt die Bruckner-Medaille ueberreicht. « Walhalla » , Regensburg, Deutschland.

(Photo) Adolf Hitler admires a newly installed bust of Anton Bruckner at « Walhalla » , near Regensburg, in 1937.

Oddly, Bruckner's bust was the only one added at « Walhalla » , an 1842 shrine to distinguished figures from 2,000 years of Germanic history, during the a period of National-Socialism.

...

One Sunday morning in 1937, a bizarre ceremony took place in the medieval Bavarian city of Regensburg. Within the Regensburg « Walhalla » , a replica of the Parthenon built by King Ludwig I to house images of his German cultural heroes, a marble bust of the Austrian composer Anton Bruckner (who died in 1896) was placed on a pedestal adorned with the Nazi insignia of an eagle gripping a swastika. Hitler himself was photographed standing to one side, bareheaded, hands folded, gazing with solemn reverence at his great compatriot.

The image is, at once, comical and chilling. But why should it concern us now, in the composer's Centenary Year ? In fact, that ceremony, or rather what it represents, may have a profound bearing on questions about performing Bruckner today, questions that have already begun to be asked in very different musical quarters. For one thing, there's the lingering question of the relation of Bruckner's music to Hitler's musical and ideological hero, Wagner. Bruckner's reverence for Wagner is legendary, the theme of many colourful anecdotes. But Bruckner's interest in Wagner seems to have been exclusively musical : he didn't discover Wagner until he was 38. Up till then, his musical diet had centred on the Rococo Masses of Mozart, Franz-Joseph and Johann Michael Haydn, Franz Schubert's songs, short concert works by Rossini, Mendelssohn, Beethoven and Weber, and the keyboard works of Johann Sebastian Bach ; to say nothing of the village dance bands he played in to supplement his meagre income as a teacher. The 2 supposedly « seminal » artistic experiences (Richard Wagner's revolutionary « Tristan und Isolde » and Beethoven's huge, world embracing « Choral Symphony ») came when Bruckner was in his 40's, his transition from church composer to Symphonist already begun.

Conductor Daniel Barenboim has boldly steered the Bruckner performance question into much deeper water. Could there be a darker, political dimension ? He told an interviewer :

« There's the whole tradition not only with Bruckner but with Wagner too, a tradition which, curiously enough, was taken over by the Nazis as the artistic expression of a particular ideology. What I'm saying is that, each time you get a great climax, it has to be taken slower, more “ feierlich ”, more majestic, to the glory of the 3rd “ Reich ”. »

So, was the Bruckner performing tradition hijacked by the Nazis ? The answers are not so simple. But there can be no doubting Adolf Hitler's veneration for Bruckner, amounting almost to identification. Both grew-up in or near the Upper-Austrian capital, Linz. Both loved the landscapes of the Danube valley ; for many Austrians, Bruckner's music is powerfully associated with his countryside. Hitler also drew comfort from Bruckner's rejection by the Viennese intelligentsia of his day ; close parallels with his own experience in Vienna, he felt. In his last years, when his health was declining, Bruckner was taken-up as a special cause by the newly emergent Austrian Christian-Social Party (« Christlichsoziale Partei ») , whose Right-wing, nationalist views, championship of « the little man » , anti-Semitism, and its leader, Karl Lueger, Hitler strongly admired. The unworldly Bruckner is unlikely to have felt any special sympathy with Lueger's views, but that doesn't seem to have bothered Hitler overmuch.

A high-point (perhaps, « the » high-point) in Hitler's ideological appropriation of Bruckner came at that Regensburg ceremony, in June 1937. The festivities also included speeches by Max Auer, President of the International Bruckner Society, and Josef Goebbels. The full-text of Goebbels's speech is included at the end of an article by Bryan Gilliam (« The Annexation of Anton Bruckner : Nazi Revisionism and the Politics of Appropriation ») , in a recent edition of « The Musical Quarterly » . Goebbels stresses the « Wagnerian » element in Bruckner. Bruckner's discovery of Wagner's music-dramas, he asserts, caused a total personal and artistic revolution. « From that moment onwards » , says Goebbels, « the church musician, at once, retreats almost entirely, and out of him emerges the distinctive Symphonist. » Max Auer is known to have disagreed passionately : for him, the gulf that separated the Theatre centred Wagner and the church trained Bruckner was more important than superficial resemblances. As Gilliam says, Auer must have « swallowed hard » when he heard what Goebbels had to say at Regensburg, but, on this occasion at least, he kept his counsel.

It is difficult to say who, aesthetically speaking, was in the right. There may be an element of truth on both sides. Bruckner's understanding of Wagner was certainly narrow and selective. On the other hand, the Wagnerian influence can't be ignored ; it is the nature of Bruckner's Wagnerianism that remains a matter for dispute. What really matters is that at a key point in the history of Bruckner performance, the « Wagnerian » argument was asserted, if not actually enforced, by a totalitarian regime. As Max Auer found, dissension became increasingly difficult, even perilous. Conductors whose view of Bruckner accorded with the Nazis' ideas (the still controversial Wilhelm Furtwängler, for instance) were encouraged, and their influence remains strong today. Furtwängler's example, in particular, cannot be ignored ; to dismiss it outright for political reasons would be simply crass. But it may well represent a one sided view of Bruckner, one which, for a whole complex of reasons, has been given an unfair advantage.

The problems caused by the Nazi's annexation of Bruckner extend to the notoriously vexed question of Bruckner editions. The 1st set of « original » editions of the Symphonies appeared in the 1930's, under the editorship of Robert Haas. In its later stages, this project was directly supported by the Nazis. After the War, that association was inevitably an uncomfortable one, especially after Haas was officially condemned for complicity with Adolf Hitler's regime (the justice of that allegation remains debatable) . Another editor, Leopold Nowak (a rival of Haas) , was appointed, and the whole project was begun again.

Nowak's prefaces to his new editions are full of criticism of Haas's musicological methods, and these criticisms have been generally accepted as factual ; even by those who (like many Brucknerians today) still find Haas's results more musically satisfying. Thus, in the 8th Symphony, just about every English language commentary reasserts Nowak's allegation that Haas arbitrarily added passages from the earlier (1887) version of the Symphony to the later (1890) score. Unacceptable, says Nowak :

« You must not mix your sources. » But, on examining the newly published microfilm of the manuscript of the 8th, I was astonished to find that what Haas did was quite different. The passages he allegedly added are virtually all there, in the 1890 manuscript score. What Haas actually did was to restore certain passages that Bruckner had crossed-out. Why ? He must have seen a letter Bruckner wrote to the conductor Felix Weingartner, in which the composer mentions the cut passages, and expresses the hope that they will prove « valid for posterity, and for a circle of friends and connoisseurs » .

Did Nowak take advantage of the political blackening of Robert Haas to further his own ends ? Were his reasons for attacking Haas's methods more personal than musicological ? The issues are still cloudy, and even now, 3 years after Nowak's death, there is a strange reluctance on the part of musical Vienna to talk about them. What is certain is that, as regards performance and textual fidelity, and maybe much else, Bruckner's music stands in urgent need of reassessment. This, his Centenary Year, provides the ideal opportunity. Let's hope that this time it can be done with something like impartiality.

Bruckner : A Non-Nazi Perspective

A picture of Adolf Hitler in an uncharacteristically reverential pose was posted outside the Dana Concert Hall at Connecticut College here recently. Dressed in full Nazi regalia, with hat in hands, Hitler was standing a respectful distance from a giant white bust of Anton Bruckner.

The photograph was taken in 1937 during meetings of the International Bruckner Society and the Bavarian Nazi Party Congress. The Austrian composer was being posthumously inducted into the Nazi equivalent of the Hall of Fame, a marble replica of the Parthenon that was called : « Walhalla » .

There were times when it seemed peculiar that this photograph was associated with a 4 day scholarly conference in which 80 attendees (27 of them giving papers) gathered to share the latest research in Bruckneriana. It was often business as usual, with references to " thematic chromatic 3rd relationships " and the " tremendous holistic motivic cohesion " in Bruckner's Symphonies.

But gradually, the importance of that photograph became clear : one hypothesis of the conference, which ended on February 24th, was that assumptions about the grandeur and mysticism of Bruckner's music, knowledge about his life and even the condition of Bruckner scholarship have been drastically affected by Nazi worship of Bruckner. We still listen to Bruckner as if we were in « Walhalla » , peering over Hitler's shoulder.

The Nazi connection was profound, as Bryan Gilliam, a professor at Duke University, pointed out. Hitler saw Bruckner as his musical counterpart, a fellow Austrian from peasant stock. Bruckner was " a farm boy who conquered the world with his music ", Goebbels said ; he had a " mystical affinity with nature " that tapped the " elemental forces of blood and race ". Hitler planned to establish a Brucknerian Bayreuth at a monastery where Bruckner had taught. Movements from Bruckner Symphonies were heard at the Nuremberg rallies. German radio even honoured Hitler's death with the Adagio from the 7th Symphony.

This adoration of Bruckner helped inspire the 1st critical edition of Bruckner's music, edited by Robert Haas and partly financed by the Nazi government. Bruckner's scores are notorious for their textual problems ; he revised them until his death in 1896, with many changes urged by colleagues and students.

But Nazi scholarship, described in papers by Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt of the University of Pennsylvania and Christa Brüstle of the Free University of Berlin, had a strong ideological component. It attempted to invalidate all of Bruckner's published scores, suggesting that they had been distorted by "alien elements" and "overly refined city-dwellers" (as 2 writers referred to the Jews who had influenced Bruckner).

The new editions often made things worse, sometimes conflated various sources and tended to serve the grandiose sonic world the Nazis preferred. After the 2nd World War, Leopold Nowak took-over the critical project. But Nazi-era judgments about the invalidity of early published scores have long been accepted, even by the New Grove Dictionary; at this conference, they were not.

The symposium, entitled "Perspectives on Anton Bruckner", was partly meant, in fact, to be a declaration of independence from the Nazi esthetic and scholarly tradition. The gathering was organized by Timothy L. Jackson, an assistant professor of music at Connecticut College who has already made distinguished contributions to understandings of both Bruckner and Richard Strauss, and Paul Hawkshaw, the associate dean of the Yale School of Music, who has worked closely with Bruckner manuscripts.

A Catholic Composer in the Age of Bismarck

Psychology and environment

Within the last 2 decades, the study of Bruckner and his music has begun to change radically. For long, a generalized picture was current that depicted a simple religious man, ill at ease in society, an anachronism in his age who suffered neglect, misunderstanding, and the malice of critics. The martyrdom of the life bred the mysticism of the artist; the social anachronism became the timeless prophet. Much of this rested on flimsy evidence and critical misunderstanding. When the Bruckner number of « Musik-Konzepte » appeared in 1982, Norbert Nagler could still bemoan the tendency of anecdotes to swamp analysis. The evidence of recent Bruckner scholarship suggests that criticism and analysis of his music is now flourishing as never before, and with the full arsenal of modern techniques. Anecdotes have also, to some extent, given way to more complex questions in the area of biographical study. As a result, interpretation has acquired new directions that are not simply to be traced in specialized Bruckner scholarship.

That Bruckner's life and times impinged upon his music is now a given of scholarship, and is reflected in the attention devoted specifically to his personality in recent conferences. At least one distinguished scholar has noted that this was not always the case. It is arguable that what has changed is the need to subscribe to one or other of the myths about Bruckner that enrolled him either as a mystic or as a simpleton. Such constructs lead to value judgements about the work; embarrassment at their inadequacy was just as likely to lead to an exclusion of the life from critical accounts.

A decisive moment came when modern psychological and sociological criticism began to suggest that, beneath the standard picture, there lay a deeply fractured personality, torn by neuroses that were different from, but hardly less striking than, those of Gustav Mahler, with whom for long Bruckner seemed to stand in a musico-biographical comparison. Constantin Floros documents a moment at a symposium, in 1977, when a speaker raised the possibility of mental illness in Bruckner, as indicative of a change in the way that he was regarded. Within 5 years, more sophisticated analysis began to appear that related Bruckner's mental life to the world of his music.

Norbert Nagler's essay of 1982 sparked-off a re-interpretation that extended to the writings of Peter Gülke and Martin Geck. While it would be inaccurate to say that they share a consistent point of view, they do form a kind of unity, in which biographical, ideological, and critical factors have come together to consider what kind of Bruckner picture should be dominant, at least in the German-speaking world. Factors of historical and sociological provenance shaped Bruckner's personality towards a decisive moment marked by his nervous breakdown of 1867. The transition to psychological analysis does not entirely throw-off the world of the Bruckner anecdote, since the new interpretative tradition could hardly exist without the stories that emphasise his « tendency to necrophilia, counting mania and compulsion to control, and fanatical observation of religion » . Even within this tradition, there are misgivings, a fear of « greedy demands from the psychological or sociological viewpoints » . There is little doubt, however, that Bruckner interpretation has to account for such phenomena, which have passed into general knowledge through the increasing emphasis on late- 19th Century Vienna as city of « nervous splendour » . Equally, it has to consider how far the old picture served an agenda that had much to do with « German-ness » in the decades after Bismarck excluded Austria from the new « Reich » .

The circumstances of Bruckner's upbringing, Catholic education, and attitude to Vienna underline the necessity of seeing that his upbringing in the period of the « Vormärz » (before the Revolution of 1848) , his exposure to patriarchal « despotic-feudal » interaction, the resulting « subservient mentality » , and the « codified asceticism » of his Catholic education have their place in the new picture of the neurotically driven Bruckner. If these generated a compulsion to over-achieve, coupled with fantasies of power, then the effect on his artistic personality must have been considerable. In its most remarkable expression, there is the idea that Bruckner « strangled » his personality, in order to realize his inner life in music.

Born into the world of Mettemich and Biedermeier, Bruckner passed through the years of Revolution, and arrived in Vienna at the point when Liberalism approached its climax. By his death, however, Liberalism had collapsed in Vienna before the forces of what is often regarded as « irrationalism » in the all too real forms of anti-Semitic Christian-Socialism and German Nationalism. This journey from a quasi-feudal world to the verge of the 20th Century is illuminated retrospectively by the widely influential interpretation of Carl Schorske, the representative of a view of the Viennese « fin-de-siècle » as revolt of the sons against the fathers : crudely expressed, the deflection of failed political Liberalism into an artistic avant-garde. In recent years, this picture from the history of ideas has been increasingly adjusted in the light of research by students of sociology and politics.

Such changing perspectives were not really available to Nagler or Gülke when they began their seismic shift in perspectives on Bruckner. For Nagler, there is a clear break between the world of the 1st compositions, with their emphasis on choral Society and church, and the works that followed 1867. In the light of recent research into the phenomenon of « voluntary association » , it may be that Bruckner research has too unthinkingly accepted the Biedermeier image of Bruckner's earliest creative phase. Although social organizations (including choral Societies) were nationally apolitical (but nevertheless « patriotic ») before the « Ausgleich » of 1867, it has been suggested that « voluntary association » in the form of social Societies formed the basis for discussions that contained implicitly « moral and political goals ». Since, it was a dogma of Nagler's interpretation that the composer's complete lack of political involvement was a relic of his upbringing in the « Vormärz » and determined his later subservience and social repression, a more sophisticated picture of the social circumstances in Austria, after 1849, would have considerable impact on our estimate of Bruckner's personality. Here is one area where the fluidity of current research into Austrian circumstances may inflect our picture of Bruckner.

The moment of Nagler's break, around 1867, is more likely to require interpretation. Andrea Harrantd show clearly the hesitations and personal ambitions which warred within Bruckner at this fateful point in his career. The Nagler-Gülke interpretation, however, has seen this as also an inner artistic crisis that may reflect the assimilation of Richard Wagner (and of Hector Berlioz and Franz Liszt) . When Martin Geck refers in disparagement to a « Wagner irritation » , he may be attempting to create a purely artistic crisis out of what, in reality, was a combination of personal and artistic factors. More interesting is the idea of a crisis after the 1st Symphony's composition that arose from an « unresolved conflict between creativity and the compulsion to conform » .

At this junction, the student of Bruckner is confronted with 3 strands to interpret the change that came over Bruckner's compositions. The psychological strand, that the later Symphonies arose from a brilliant compromise between creative genius and the ritualizing of formal and technical procedures, goes alongside the socio-historical strand of Bruckner's « gründerzeitliche Monumentale Symphonie » : Bruckner's type of Symphony after the « Nullte » was formed in the heady days of the Liberal upswing, shared characteristics with Vienna's rebuilding, and represented a kind of compromise of the « new » Vienna with older monarchical impulses that still continued and were fundamental to Bruckner's world-view. Slightly apart from this is the brilliantly provocative view of Gülke : if we are to accept any truth in the interpretation of Bruckner as mystic (and each of the 3 interpreters has misgivings here) , then we must recognize the plebeian insurrectionary element in all mysticism and acknowledge its essentially heretical character : « Bruckner's heresy lay in his composing Symphonies » .

Conflation of these ideas is really an attempt to answer why Bruckner emerged from his crisis with a radically new style of Symphony. The psychological and sociological nexus that scholars sought to explain, in the 1980's and 1990's, revolved round the perception that such personality traits as Bruckner's counting mania corresponded to features of his music. The compromise between creativity and ritualizing was a matter of replacing « endless melody » with « metrical pre-determination » (the equation of counting mania with quadratic phrasing is a theme that constantly recurs in more recent Bruckner studies) . Bruckner, thus, was disturbed at a deeply personal level by the experience of Wagner but did not emerge from his crisis as a Wagnerian Symphonist. In place of the seamless rhetoric of music-drama came the juxtaposition of contrasts, for which literary and architectural comparisons quickly suggested themselves, and an element of violence that stood opposed to the religious elements in Bruckner's Symphonies ; for the creators of the new Bruckner picture did not reject the religious interpretation of Bruckner (represented by Derek Scott's re-interpretation) but placed it in neurotic tension with socio-psychological factors. In the face of such an interpretation, the old certainties of the Bruckner anecdotes crumbled. Even Bruckner's notorious gaucheness amidst the Liberal « bourgeoisie » of Vienna began to look like a strategy ; moral cowardice and servility became peasant cunning. In short, Bruckner ceased to seem like an anachronism in pre-Freudian Vienna.

Political implications of a non-political life

If Bruckner became a man of his time, however, there is now considerable debate as to what kind of time he represented. Scholars have revalued the picture of late- 19th Century Vienna from two angles that impinge on Bruckner studies. The school that sees a strong interpenetration of artistic factors with social and political history, the descendants of Schorske, has begun a process of self-criticism that may yet trickle into ideas of Bruckner. At the same time, the study of the circumstances of Viennese musical life has advanced to the point that Bruckner studies must start to take account of it. This point of view, more directly related to Bruckner the musician, has remained in the background by comparison with the historico-political complexities of the 1st.

The picture painted by Nagler of a « monarchist » Bruckner in a Liberal age had the advantage of fitting the little that was known about Bruckner's political views. It also rendered Bruckner relatively easy to locate in Vienna's intellectual map, defined as a gradual substitution of « an aristocratically based "Gefühlkultur" for the Liberal culture of reason and law » which « was a decisive symptom of Austrian society's sickness unto death ». The Bruckner whose upbringing took place in the « Vormärz » instinctively and without need of revolution anticipated Carl Schorske's elevation of art and culture over rationality ; it was hardly surprising that in the half-Century after his death, Bruckner interpretation should have been overgrown by the irrationality documented by Christa Brüstle.

Some of the most striking research into aspects of Bruckner, in recent years, has concerned this irrationalism in the form of the use made of his music in the 3rd « Reich ». Various scholars have considered a number of ways in which Bruckner's life and works were coordinated with the cultural policy of the Nazis. Inevitably, this has led to some consideration of the extent to which Bruckner's career had prepared this nemesis. The degree to which he was infected with anti-Semitism is central to this, and follows naturally from the Nagler-Gülke interpretation. Already in their writings, it was noted that he was no stranger to religious anti-Semitism, though it is surprising how grudgingly this has trickled into general accounts. In practice, it would have been surprising, given Bruckner's connections, if he had not been anti-Semitic. This is less a matter of his Wagnerian associations and visits to Bayreuth than of specifically Austrian circumstances.

The question of the origins and nature of Viennese anti-Semitism is peculiarly complex. Although it found a characteristic home in Karl Lueger's Christian-Socialism, it was also present within the Liberal movement. The traditional view of Austria's socio-political development has been to stress the manner in which the question of the Habsburg Empire's various nationalities destroyed the Liberal dominance. More recent research has tended to show that Liberalism was compatible with Nationalism, which could and intermittently did advocate a Liberal agenda. Since Nationalism in this form stressed inclusiveness, both anti-Semites and Jews could find places within movements that promoted Liberal ideas and programmes. The unfortunate effect was to legitimize anti-Semitism even within Liberalism. To place Bruckner within a kind of aristocratic-monarchical « Gefühlkultur » or to emphasize his connections to German Nationalism does not really differentiate him sufficiently from his Liberal contemporaries, in such a shifting political landscape. An additional problem is that, under close examination, Schorske's thesis of a revolt by Vienna's artists, at the turn of the 20th Century, began to appear implausible. The constitutional monarchy mostly contained the strains, largely because of the extent to which it was involved in artistic life and decision-making. Bruckner may be said to have anticipated this without any particular effort on his part. His recognition in Vienna extended to rewards from official circles.

Yet, the sense of Bruckner's marginality within Vienna has always been strong, whatever the point of view of the writer. Marginality in the wider sense has been defined in terms of « different social backgrounds and positions, different religions and political affiliations » ; at its most extreme, this could become « multiple marginality » , a growing alienation from the threatening reality of Vienna. Bruckner's admirers laid particular weight on the degree to which he, the authentic German, had been rejected by the Liberal (with more than undertones of Jewish) opinion makers. Even without this extreme formulation, there is a sense in which Bruckner represented something marginal to the more intellectual classes of the capital city. This lay in his Catholicism.

The most authoritative look at the rise of Liberalism's nemesis, the Christian-Socialist movement, has revealed the degree to which anti-Semitism grew-out of the mixture of « racial hatred » and « economic protest » of the artisan class, but has also noted the manner in which a radicalized clergy gave it a helping hand. In Bruckner studies, there is little need to place excessive weight on the « sub-culture of crackpot journalists and district political leaders » that underlay movements such as Georg Ritter von Schönerer's Pan-Germanism. The church provided him with a model closer to hand.

That Liberalism of an anti-clerical kind and anti-Semitism were at logger-heads within Vienna was part of the peculiarly poisonous circumstances of Bruckner's society. Among Liberal voices, the charge that the church was anti-Semitic was virtually a topos and inspired much animus within the world of Vienna's press. This was a particularly critical issue in the light of the restored position of Catholicism and its hierarchy within society and education as a result of the Concordat of 1855 ; Catholicism and the role of the clergy were of critical importance in Austria (in contrast to the situation in Germany, where the « Catholic " bourgeoisie " was slowly driven to a sort of internal exile, out of disappointment with the conservative attitude of the clergy » .) . The suggestion that this became a canker within the Liberal outlook and contributed substantially to its eventual downfall is a central part of the argument put forward by John Boyer. In one of the most striking, yet, « ineffective and degrading » episodes of the conflict between State and Bishops, Bruckner's patron Bishop Franz-Josef Rüdiger of Linz was sentenced to 14 days imprisonment (subsequently commuted by Emperor Franz-Joseph) for his contribution to a « wave of Episcopal anarchism » .

This dramatic confrontation between Church and State on the question of (« inter alia ») the supervision of schools took place in the year that Bruckner moved to Vienna. It is hard to imagine that Bruckner, however unpolitical, had no opinion on this matter. Unfortunately, even in the most recent treatment of the Rüdiger episode, it is difficult to find substantial evidence that bears directly on Bruckner's life ; a strong element of supposition, therefore, marks the conclusion that to speak of his religious anti-Semitism is to overlook that it carried a distinct political charge. In the German « Reich » , anti-Semitism became a means for Catholics to prove their national credentials in the face of a Protestant ascendancy. The Austrian way was less « political » , in a modern sense, but no less destructive. From Rüdiger at the mercy of the Liberals to the radicalized Clergy of a generation later was a short step once the Church entered the political arena. It was also to shape the political mainstream far more than the Pan-Germans whose anti-Semitism was combined with, rather than opposed to, anti-clericalism.

Bruckner's Catholic background was augmented by the German-National activities of his various admirers referred to by Andrea Harrandt and dealt with by her more fully elsewhere. How this made the leap from specifically Viennese circumstances through such channels as the « mystic » and the « German » Bruckner to the era of the 3rd « Reich » is explained by Christa Brüstle. The full extent of the taking over of Bruckner in a full Party- and State-promoted ritual, in 1937, was made clear to an English readership by Bryan Gilliam in a twice-published essay. In an unexpected way, this also made an impact on Bruckner's music.

Ethics, editions, and performing styles

Since the 1960's, the issue of which versions of Bruckner's Symphonies to sanction had tended to run in favour of the 1st « Gesamtausgabe » of Robert Haas, for reasons that are reviewed by Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt. Although few Bruckner specialists were unaware of individual oddities in that « Gesamtausgabe » from the purely musicological point of view, Gilliam stressed to a greater extent than before its entanglement with the cultural politics of Germany, Austria, and the approaching « Anschluß ». Whereas an earlier Bruckner biographer like Erwin Doernberg had noted regretfully that Robert Haas' achievements had been threatened by « the political events of the last 25 years », it quickly became apparent that Haas' reputation had more than musicological sins to expiate. The unity of Bruckner's life and works was once more revealed in an all too startling manner.

The 1st publication of Gilliam's essay prompted a controversy in the pages of « The Musical Quarterly » that was side-tracked, to some degree, by allegations of lack of communication between German- and English-speaking Bruckner specialists, which may have been true of earlier generations but could hardly apply to the highly-impressive work done by American scholars, in the last 10 years. Manfred Wagner raised an objection that the speech by Josef Gœbbels marking the State ceremony of 1937 was of minor significance because it had merely reassembled a ragbag of « clichés » already present in Bruckner's own time and stated particularly forcefully in obituaries. That the continuity or revival of this « intellectual tradition » in the 1930's was of some interest to Bruckner scholars seemed to be bypassed by Richard Wagner.

In his introduction to the controversy, Leon Botstein acknowledged this by accusing Wagner of pushing to the margin the question of the continuity of an Austro-German tradition in the origins and development of National-Socialism, and it is precisely in this area that one important « Bruckner problem » lies : why Bruckner's career attracted a German-National mentality that, in the larger historical framework, proved ruinous for Austria. Austrian treatment of the problem seems, as yet, not to have made-up its mind about this. In a recent essay by Monika Glettler, we meet again Bruckner as friend of Franz-Josef Rüdiger, as composer of choral works oriented towards a German-National standpoint, and as, perhaps, more deeply implicated in cultural politics through his relationship to the « Wiener Akademischer Gesangverein ». She draws to a close, however, by noting that « open politicization » did not make significant advances before 1914, and by repeating Wagner's objection against the « American » thesis that seemed to claim that Josef Gœbbels had some priority in assimilating Bruckner to a « German » image : again, the « clichés » of the obituaries stood against consideration of issues that Gilliam had only implicitly raised (as his reply to Wagner noted, continuity had not been his primary concern ; nor was he in any sense describing Gœbbels as a pioneer in the politicization of Bruckner) .

Gilliam's article, as he pointed-out, had as underlying issues the myths of martyrdom and religion that underlay the old Bruckner picture ; by religion, he was thinking specifically of the Nazi concept of « Gottgläubigkeit » , but there is a more general sense of this issue, in that religion in Bruckner studies is an extensible concept. Far from leading to Biblical hermeneutics and sophisticated deconstruction, earlier concepts had a flavour compounded of German Romantic mysticism and nationalism of which the banalities of « Gottgläubigkeit » are only one dimension. Perhaps, the non-comprehension which Wagner and Glettler displayed towards Gilliam came from the belated manner in which German musicology had addressed these. Underlying the controversy, however, was not the degree to which Bruckner could be considered a « Nationalist » or a « forerunner » . There was also the problem of how to perform Bruckner.

In this context, it is hardly surprising that there is both an ethical and an æsthetic dimension. In the course of the « Musical Quarterly » controversy, Leon Botstein referred to his fears that to perform Bruckner in the « original versions » was to risk « perpetuating a set of aural signifiers closely linked with radical evil » . In itself, this is worrying both as a possibility and for what it implies about musical texts. It would be easy to dismiss it for purely « common sense » reasons (one instinctively, perhaps mistakenly, recoils from the idea that musical texts can be implicated of themselves in the kind of evil to which Botstein refers) , but, if it is to be refuted, it really has to be done on solid theoretical grounds. I suspect that musicology, sooner rather than later, will make such an attempt. For the moment, however, Botstein has presented a problem that would be rich in comic potential were it not so serious. Calling for « a new scholarly methodology » , he advocated the resurrection of the versions in which « the contemporaries of Mahler, and later Schœnberg and Hartmann, got to know Bruckner in the 1st place » with the object of « re-inventing » a « new but oddly traditional pre-Nazi Bruckner » .

Most major Orchestras, nowadays, hold copies of both Robert Haas and Leopold Nowak editions. Whichever is performed, audiences or buyers are assured that they are hearing « original » Bruckner. For musicology to step in and say that, on reflection, it should have thought a little longer and harder about endorsing these « originals » risks the wrath of too many interested parties. But a re-consideration of the supposedly discredited and now seldom performed versions associated with Bruckner's friends and disciples is precisely what musicology is currently doing, both in Austria, through Thomas Leibnitz's careful re-evaluation of the relationship of Bruckner and his disciples, and in America. A by-product has been to muddy the pool even further by revealing that some of the disciples, notably Josef Schalk, had made their own contribution to « evil » by spreading the image of the « German Bruckner » in the composer's lifetime. That Bruckner's image can be re-invented in quite the way that Botstein advocates seems doubtful ; nonetheless, true to his word, Botstein subsequently recorded the now rarely heard Schalk score of the 5th Symphony.

If the ethical issue is, as yet unresolved, the æsthetic argument (which is, by no means, independent) is also open and goes beyond the question of which versions should be played. Here, it is a matter of how the versions are to be played. An argument against the disciples' scores had always been that they represented « Wagnerized » versions that distorted the block sonorities and contrasts of the originals. American scholarship, in particular, has pointed-out that this is a simplification, perhaps even a misconception. Their implication is that a « Wagnerized » way of performing Bruckner now exists, even among conductors who have used the « original' scores » . Has the legacy of the Nazi reading of Bruckner been the recordings and performances of the post-War era ? Oddly enough, some of those German conductors who lived through the Nazi period have left recorded evidence of a more « mercurial » style. In such a subjective area, it is only to be expected that inconsistencies in argument occasionally arise. Wilhelm Furtwängler appears among the « Wagnerized » in Botstein's list (though he does not use the term) , but represents the « mercurial » tradition for Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt (which may reflect how complex an interpreter he was) . The demand for a new, lighter style of Bruckner performance is already being met, though whether this should be attributed to specific features of Bruckner reception or to trends in 20th Century performance practice is, as yet, an open question.

The problems of Bruckner's relationship to his own time and of its dangerous legacy will not go away. In the case of performance, however, their status is more than usually metaphorical. All of the contributors to the controversy raise it in some way, though it would be possible to relate it to aspects that are already present in the literature and which return to the « Gründerzeit » to which Nagler referred. Manfred Wagner compared the relationship of Wagner reception in Vienna to the architectural « megalomania » of the « Ringstraße » . The environment and musical culture in which Bruckner was first performed are moving towards the centre of music historiography of the late- 19th Century. It would be easy to forget, in considering the religious in Bruckner, that, at least, a few of his major works were designed for church performance in liturgical context. The manner in which Bruckner's musical language sought to make the leap from church to concert-hall was another likely factor in the crisis of the 1860's. It bears on how contemporaries viewed the Symphony and what audiences expected of Bruckner's music.

Historicism

At the heart of the question of Bruckner and his relationship to his own time is the degree to which he can be said to have departed from the mainstream of musical modernism, usually defined in largely harmonic-contrapuntal terms from Richard Wagner to Arnold Schönberg. That he did depart is a theme common to interpreters of quite different approaches. Thus, what is considered anachronistic in one theory is defined as « ossification » in another ; where one writer tended to see an irreconcilable gulf between « composing with symbols » and modern « absolute » theories of art, another felt that it was more of a tangential relationship ; essentially, they are talking about similar things, the elevation of æsthetic categories to thematic material (the « sublime ») , the ritualized use of Choral, Song, and March, simplified metre and rhythm, stereotyped successions, pre-Classical cadences. These seem to be the characteristics of a style with a strong historicizing tendency analogous to the dominant style in the architecture of the time.

That this is not a random comparison is suggested by the widespread prevalence of the idea of the Gothic cathedral as metaphor for Bruckner's Symphonic music. A recent essay has drawn attention to the degree to which the 19th Century accepted equations (raised by no less a figure than Goethe) between Gothic and German and between Gothic and the organic reflection of nature. The impetus for the Gothic revival in Germany and (to a lesser extent) in Austria in part came from that identification. The romanticized picture of the mediaeval cathedral became a baffling æsthetic touchstone for the appearance of buildings in « a Century of mechanization, industrialization, and technical progress » . Yet, without the appearance of an industrialized society in the aftermath of Bismarck's Wars, the great religious buildings of the 2nd half of the 19th Century would hardly have come into being with such impressive speed. The anachronistic, « pre-fabricated » aspects of Bruckner's music were essentially an aspect of this historicizing tendency transformed by the increasingly large-scale Symphony Orchestra in the concert-hall, as temple of art. Even in his religious music, a strain developed between its external material splendour and claims to mystic insight ; of Psalm 150, it has been noted that the « reality of the music changes to irrational statements » .

It has been claimed that the modernist direction taken by Viennese religious art, after 1900, was towards the cultic. The religious note detected in Bruckner's music, the priestly devotion of his « disciples » , stand together in this field of tension between historicism and cult. The cult, however, saw the universal in Bruckner's Symphonies, as Margaret Notley has demonstrated : a heady compound of popular oration, monumentality, and the religious sublime. This aspect was intensified by the manner in which certain institutions in Vienna seemed to his admirers to be closed to his music. There appeared to be a strong contrast between the praise bestowed upon him in Germany from the mid-1880's onwards and the « carping and narrow-minded » reviews that sometimes appeared in the Viennese press. As Andrea Harrandt shows, this was a one-sided picture of Bruckner's Viennese reception, but such is the nature of artistic cults. The tendencies in Bruckner interpretation towards the monumental, solemn, « Wagnerized » , and priestly grew-out of this desire for his music to embrace a universality that was, in reality, a passing aspect of a fashion of his time towards historicism and neo-Romanticism. That it did not die finally after 1945 may be a reflection of a rather different and no less questionable cult, that of the great conductor. But no cult should inhibit us from playing Bruckner's well-defined repertory in styles which seem appropriate to our age. Essays can only be a snapshot of how Bruckner was received at a specific point, in the history of his reception. If they do not completely answer the « Bruckner problems » , it is because the solutions involve a deeper understanding of the man and his time, and the evolution of performance style in an age that has rediscovered historicism without overcoming the need for « authenticity » of experience. Bruckner problems are persistently alive.

Bruckner et une Vienne politiquement divisée

(By Leon Botstein.)

Written for the concert entitled « Bruckner's Divided Vienna » , performed on 1 December 1999 at Avery Fisher Hall, at Lincoln Center, NYC.

Rarely have politics and music engaged each other with such tenacious consistency as in the case of late- 19th Century and 20th Century Vienna and German-speaking Austria. The recent elections in Austria that have enlarged the power of Jorg Haider and his People's Party may seem, at 1st glance, to have little to do with tonight's concert. But as the politics of the Salzburg Festival in recent months have shown (in large measure through the insightful commentary by Cornell historical Michaël Steinberg) culture, particularly surrounding music, has long been political in Austrian life. The president of Austria, Thomas Klestil, and Haider have all attacked the current leadership of Salzburg in terms strikingly similar to the critical vocabulary used at the turn of the Century against Gustav Mahler and his innovations at the Vienna Opera.

The consistent politicization of music stems from the divisions that occurred in the rapidly growing metropolis which Vienna was after 1867, when constitutional reform made migration to the city from within the Empire much freer. The 1860's and early 1870's had been a time of rapid economic expansion and massive physical reconstruction in the city. But the stock market crash of May 1873 ushered in a long era of disillusionment and decline. By the time, the Ferdinand Löwe version of Bruckner's 4th Symphony was first heard, a new radical politics was in the ascendancy, marked by a nostalgia for pre-industrial artisan economy, anti-Semitism, and the aggressive assertion of the superiority of Germanic culture and people. Despite the fact that Vienna was a multi-ethnic and polyglot capital, by the end of the 19th Century, it had become a place that mixed an open and creative cosmopolitanism with a narrow-minded provincial rigidity most often expressed in rabid anti-Semitism. Jews were the city's most visible and significant minority. Their visible and extraordinary contribution to cultural life was widely understood.

The political divisions between Liberal traditions and a new radical political conservatism which was nativist and reactionary had their musical mirror. Johannes Brahms who settled in the city in the early 1860's was identified with the Liberal tradition. He was north German and Protestant, and his friends were predominantly Liberals and included many Jews. Ignaz Brüll was one of Brahms's closest friends. What linked them was not only Brahms's admiration for Brüll's spectacular pianism and Brüll's allegiance to an anti-Wagnerian compositional tradition, but a shared outlook which was open to progress and to tolerance. It should be noted that Brüll's music was more successful and is more compelling than recent scholarship suggests. More of his music deserves a hearing. Even though Karl Goldmark absorbed many Wagnerian habits and was an enthusiastic admirer of Wagner's, in the politics of Vienna, Goldmark and Brahms were allies and friends, despite differences in compositional and aesthetic outlook. Goldmark, a Hungarian Jew, was an outsider in the terrible racial politics which engulfed the city.

The career of Anton Bruckner denotes the other side of the story. Brought to Vienna from Linz as an organist and teacher of counterpoint and legendary as an improviser, Bruckner was anything but cosmopolitan. Unlike Brahms, Brüll, or Goldmark, he remained true to his local roots, resisted the pleasures and blandishments of elegant urban life, proudly displayed his regional dialect and remained devoutly Catholic. His rise to fame among a younger generation of students and musicians in the 1870's and 1880's was only in part due to his embrace of the Wagnerian. Bruckner seemed the true heir to Schubert - a genuinely local genius whose strength appeared to derive from things decidedly Austrian and Catholic. Although Ferdinand Löwe was himself of Jewish birth, an important source of support for Bruckner as an antipode to Brahms and, later, even to Mahler (who deeply admired Bruckner and performed his Symphonies, albeit with cuts) came from Bruckner's willingness to be used as a cultural symbol against what was perceived to be the growing influence of foreign elements in Viennese culture. In this debate, cosmopolitanism took on the negative connotation which it has retained to this day as a code word for « Jewish » and the influence of the « other ». Bruckner permitted himself to be the honorary head of a new academic Wagner society in Vienna, distinct from the one Goldmark helped create, which had as one of its bylaws the explicit provision that no Jew could be a member. The Right-wing press and politicians lauded Bruckner, and he developed the aura of a local Wagnerian Master whose genius was underestimated and unrecognized as the result of a conspiracy of Jews and cosmopolitans who controlled public opinion and who failed to understand the spiritual essence and greatness of Bruckner's music. Bruckner became the embattled, marginalized Master, struggling against people like Eduard Hanslick, institutions such as the « Neue Freie Presse » and an apparent cabal of influence peddlers and 2nd rate foreign artists including Brüll and Goldmark, who were supported behind the scenes by Brahms. Brahms did not think much of Bruckner's music, and there was little fondness between the 2 men, who ended-up dominating the musical life of the 1880's and 1890's.

This was the ugly world into which Gustav Mahler stepped, in 1897, and in which the young Arnold Schönberg struggled to make a career. This was the environment in which psychoanalysis was branded as a Jewish science and alliances on behalf of new art, literature, and music, were constantly threatened by provincial politics, anti-Semitism and intolerance. As Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt makes clear in his essay, Bruckner, who was genuinely a spiritual and harmless figure surrounded by intense and loyal admirers, was deeply uncertain about the final form his Symphonies should take. It is true that this insecurity may have derived from the difficulties he encountered among Viennese critics and with Viennese audiences.

But some of Bruckner's uncertainties were compositional in nature and not political. He had relatively little experience with orchestration. As a result, Bruckner, like any other composer, shared his work with loyal admirers and, often, took their advice. He was grateful for the support he received, given that he was, by no means, an unqualified public success. Among his 1st supporters was the Viennese publisher Albert J. Gutmann and Ferdinand Löwe, both of whom were of Jewish origin. In the case of the 4th Symphony, he clearly agreed to and endorsed the 1st publication and the changes it contains from earlier versions. But the contemporary suspicion that foreigners had meddled with the true Aryan and Austrian Master who was helpless against the « evil whisperings » of people really incapable of understanding his true essence, survived in Brucknerian circles and among Wagnerians well into the 1920's. It should therefore come as no surprise that when a new critical edition of Bruckner came into being under the aegis of the Nazis, that Löwe's version of the 4th would be discredited. Bruckner was probably Adolf Hitler's favourite composer, and his music was, as Bryan Gilliam has convincingly argued, considered a source for an alternative to both Christian and cosmopolitan spirituality. Bruckner's music provided the sounds of a new Aryan religion.

The restoration of the original versions in the critical edition had the effect of bringing back to the stage an often more austere Orchestral sound and less concise forms of many of the Symphonies. Only a few conductors, out of instinct, championed the versions published in Bruckner's lifetime, the versions which had helped make many of the Symphonies including the 4th world famous. These included Eugene Ormandy and Hans Knappertsbusch. A new generation of scholars including Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt (whose pathbreaking scholarly work on the 4th Symphony) and Christa Brüstle, have pierced the veneer of objectivity and scholarly care associated with the work of Robert Haas and Leopold Nowak, the editors of the critical edition. The fingerprints of Nazi cultural politics have now been exposed. The irony is that, in this case, the Nazis did not invent history ; they simply extended and augmented an attitude spawned during Bruckner's lifetime.

With Ignaz Brüll, we see the irony of an alliance between musical conservatism and progressive Liberal politics. And Karl Goldmark managed a synthesis between Johannes Brahms and Richard Wagner. The modern, represented by the figure of Wagner, was linked to reactionary nationalist politics. In Goldmark's career, art and politics become separate. Aesthetically, he was more inclined to Wagner but, socially and politically, he kept his distance from Wagner's political implications. In Anton Bruckner, we hear a profound religious conviction, a brilliant and inspired appropriation of Wagnerian techniques and new impulses within Symphonic form. Although he seemed a naïve individual, « grandeur », profundity and subtlety have legitimately become the hallmarks of Bruckner's music. For most of the 20th Century, outside of Austria and Germany, the tensions between Brucknerians and Brahmsians which seemed sharp and unbridgeable to their contemporaries in the 1880's disappeared long ago. Conductors, from Mahler on, have performed the works of both composers with equal conviction and allegiance. It is tragic, however, that as the memory of World War II and the Holocaust recede, the Viennese political discourse is still relevant and continues to wreak its havoc.

Bruckner et la politique

(By Paul Hawkshaw, Yale School of Music.)

Written for the concert entitled « Bruckner and 20th Century Politics », performed on January 13, 1995, in Avery Fisher Hall at Lincoln Center, NYC.

No composer has suffered more at the hands of special interest groups than Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) . Generations of supporters and adversaries have involved his name in furthering their own political or personal agendas, often coloring and negatively impacting the perception of Bruckner as a person and composer and hindering the dissemination of his music. As early as 1867, when Kapellmeister Johann Herbeck and the powerful critic, Eduard Hanslick, fought in the face of heavy odds to bring Bruckner from the provincial capital of Linz to Imperial Vienna, they thought they had found the contemporary Austrian Symphonist who could serve as a suitable counterweight to the pernicious modernist influence of Richard Wagner. The composer's unabashed admiration for Wagner's music soon turned Hanslick into Bruckner's most powerful adversary. For the next 30 years, the critic and his followers, in a segment of the Viennese press representing a strange combination of political Liberalism and musical conservatism, vituperatively condemned what they described as the uncontrolled Wagnerism and decadence of Bruckner's « music of the future » .

Eduard Hanslick's reaction played perfectly into the hands of Viennese Wagnerites. The Academic Wagner Society of Vienna propped Bruckner up on a pedestal, and he became the darling of the local anti-Brahms, politically conservative, and often anti-semitic press. Young Wagnerites including Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, August Göllerich, Ferdinand Löwe, and the brothers Franz and Josef Schalk were among his staunchest supporters and were often responsible for the publication and performance of his music. Bruckner received much of his contemporary critical acclaim from Wagnerian fundamentalists, many of whom belonged to what Margaret Notely has described as « the most extreme part of the " völkisch " fringe » of Vienna.

Wagnerian ideology and contemporary politics controlled Bruckner's legacy well into the 20th Century. Realizing that his young editors were not always scrupulous and sometimes even tried to make his music sound more like that of Wagner, he left the autograph manuscripts of most of his major works to the Imperial Library. His wish was to have accurate scores available for posterity. If he had expected these to appear in public soon after he passed away, he was mistaken. Powerful Viennese families with vested interests in the early editions (not to mention a few skeletons in the closet) intervened and, for 40 years, most of the manuscript versions remained relegated to the library shelf.

One of the great ironies of the history of the Bruckner legacy is that a major impetus for the 1st officially sanctioned attempt to address the « edition problem » came as a result of a far greater political evil. In 1937, Adolf Hitler consecrated a bust of the composer in Regensburg's palace of « Walhalla » . Bruckner had become a paragon of Wagnerian virtue and prototypical German composer. As Bryan Gilliam observed in a recent essay, this native son of Hitler's own province of Upper-Austria and hero of the Viennese conservative press (which Germany needed to support the « Anschluß ») had become a cultural icon of the Nazi Party. An Austrian peasant genius victimized by Jewish (i.e. Eduard Hanslick's) criticism admirably served the National Socialists' agenda ; it didn't matter that Bruckner was a devout Roman Catholic : a fact very much down-played by the Nazis. In any event, by now, it was propitious to publish the pure « Original Versions » of this German Master in a new musically and politically correct Collected Works Edition prepared by Robert Haas and Alfred Orel.

Any benefits which accrued as a result of the appearance of the new scores were more than offset in many parts of the world by the negative implications of Bruckner's adoption by the 3rd « Reich » . After the Second World War, public sentiment demanded the expurgation of Nazi influences on the preparation of the Collected Edition. Leopold Nowak began a new one with his own agenda. His policy for more than 30 years as Director of the Music Collection of the Austrian National Library was to shield the primary sources from outside scrutiny even more rigorously and effectively than his predecessors at the beginning of the 20th Century. Only in the past 15 years have performers and scholars from the International community been allowed consistent access to surviving materials and begun to participate in a systematic investigation of the sources for Bruckner's major works.

As a result of their work, a major reassessment of Bruckner, his music, and its editions is taking place. For example, Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt and William Carragan have pointed out that questionable editorial practices, sometimes inspired by political ideologies, caused editors of the 1st Collected Edition to mislead performers and scholars by rejecting out of hand valuable evidence provided by some of the earliest printed scores. On a broader scale, that Bruckner remains cloaked in an almost exclusively Wagnerian mantle is no longer justifiable. There is no question he admired Richard Wagner and often made references to his music ; the « Meister aller Meister » certainly influenced his harmonic language and orchestration. Yet, aesthetically, politically, and philosophically, the 2 men could not have been further apart. Wagnerism has clouded the more pervasive traditional roots of Bruckner's Symphonic and choral styles. As Timothy L. Jackson has demonstrated in his study of the Mass in F minor, Bruckner knew his Bach ; he was well-versed in the Viennese Classics : Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert ; and spent considerable time with the music of more contemporary figures such as Hector Berlioz and Robert Schumann. All surviving evidence indicates that, during periods of self-analysis, he turned to these composers ; not to Wagner.

All of the factors which played a role in the vagaries of the dissemination of Bruckner's music are in evidence on this evening's program, beginning with the two works for male chorus. The men's Choral Society was an important musical and social institution in German speaking lands during the 19th Century. Any number of composers including Franz Schubert, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, as well as Anton Bruckner wrote for it. Texts varied from rustic, often nostalgic, poems such as « Abendzauber » , to drinking songs, to fervent patriotic expressions like « Germanenzug » . Their sentiments served to fan the rising flames of German nationalism to such an extent that the great Austrian statesman, Klemens von Metternich (1773-1859) , banned male Choral Societies, referring to them as the « German poison ». Their attraction for the National-Socialists of the 1930's and 1940's is self-explanatory.

Anton Bruckner composed « Germanenzug » during the winter of 1863-1864, in Linz. He regarded it as his 1st work as a professional composer. He had just completed his studies with Simon Sechter and Otto Kitzler and wrote it for a composition competition held in conjunction with the inaugural Upper-Austrian Male Chorus Festival scheduled to take place in Linz, in July, 1864. Bruckner's piece was one of the winners (only 2nd place, much to his chagrin) and received its premiere at the Festival. The prize included publication by the local firm of Josef Kränzl (Ried, 1865) that same year. « Germanenzug » achieved considerable popularity during the composer's lifetime, so much so that, of all his works, the middle-section was chosen for performance at his funeral. It is another of the many ironies of the Bruckner legacy that this piece, at the height of its popularity and since almost forgotten, was selected to honour the death of its composer who's fame was only beginning to rise.

To the best of our knowledge, « Abendzauber » was never performed during Bruckner's lifetime, perhaps because of the difficulty of co-ordinating the Alpine yodelers with the traditional male chorus. It was composed in Vienna, in 1878. Special vocal effects were not uncommon in the 19th Century male-chorus literature, particularly in the nature songs. Nevertheless, the use of yodelers is somewhat of a curiosity.

« Psalm 146 » is an enigma. When it was written, why, and for whom are all unanswered questions. It survives in 2 manuscript scores : an incomplete autograph and a complete copy with autograph entrances. Neither could have been used for a performance ; there are too many mistakes. The hand-writing in the autograph suggests it is a relatively early work, probably from the 1850's. Perhaps, because it has never served the needs of any of the special interest groups promoting Bruckner's music, to date « Psalm 146 » remains unpublished. The score was printed in Vienna, as part of the Bruckner Collected Works Edition. Evident throughout are many formal and stylistic influences of the Bach cantata.

If « Psalm 146 » suffered neglect as a result of its lack of value as grist for some social, political, or musical propaganda mill, Bruckner's 5th Symphony has paid a very different price for other reasons. He composed the work between 1875 and 1878. During this period, in the face of stern opposition from Eduard Hanslick, he was dying for and eventually appointed to a post as lecturer in harmony and counterpoint at the University of Vienna. It has been speculated that his particular concern with these learned musical matters at this time explains the often extreme contrapuntal textures in the Symphony ; especially the massive double fugue of the Finale.

Anton Bruckner only heard his 5th Symphony performed on 2 pianos. He was too sick to attend the orchestral premiere under the baton of his student, Franz Schalk, in Graz, on 8 April, 1894. For the performance, Schalk had prepared a much-abbreviated new score with a massive re-orchestration including the addition of an extra brass ensemble to accompany the chorale in the Coda of the last movement. This score was printed by Ludwig Döblinger, in 1896, and remained in use until 1935 when Robert Haas published the « Original Version » as it is preserved in the autograph manuscript. Because the editors of the new score were able to demonstrate that Bruckner was not involved in preparations for 1896 edition, the 5th Symphony was held-up as conclusive evidence that the manuscript versions more accurately represented Bruckner's intentions and were, therefore, far superior to the 1st prints. Even though, as research has since shown, the evidence is not nearly so conclusive for many of his other works, the new edition of the 5th Symphony served as a prototype of the « pure » Bruckner score. By extension, according to Christa Brüstle, it became a musical symbol of uncontaminated « innate (German) artistic genius » perfectly suited for National-Socialist propaganda of the 1930's. The new score was performed after the consecration ceremony in Regensburg, in June 1937, and again, that same year, at the closing of the Nazi Party convention. Schalk's version has all but disappeared.

At least 1 major conductor, Hans Knappertsbusch, refused to learn the work any other way, continuing to perform the Franz Schalk version until his death in 1965. Referring to the Finale which he heard only in this version, the critic Theodor Helm wrote : « Not Bach, not Beethoven, not Wagner had such an inspiration. It is as though the genius of these 3 Masters has been remolded into a new artistic personality which could be none other than Anton Bruckner. » .

Bruckner et la vision du 20e siècle

During the 2nd half of the 20th Century, the authenticity process has been accomplished most dramatically for Baroque and Classical music. Efforts to utilize the instruments and performance styles, in use at the time the composers were alive, have altered the surface of what was once seemingly unchanging and familiar music. The Mozart we accept today just is not quite the same as the Mozart Bruno Walter was accustomed to thinking about and performing. We rarely, if ever, will hear Bach, Händel, Mozart, or Haydn performed in a manner resembling the approach Mendelssohn, Wagner, Brahms, or Bartók took in performing the works of these composers.

The balance between what remains the same and what is different can be exaggerated, of course. There is possibly more sameness than difference, but the differences are constant and play a decisive role. Perhaps, the fetish of so-called « authentic » performances has run its course. The obsession with « historical authenticity » has a tendency to obscure the competing and equally valid questions regarding the range of possible meanings and interpretations that can be associated with any text, irrespective of what the composer may have « intended » (if one could ever really establish what that was in terms of a musical performance) .

The case of Bruckner, as Paul Hawkshaw has so elegantly argued, is even more daunting. The texts themselves have been, from the beginning, in disarray. The kind of certainty about what the 5th Symphony of Bruckner « is » (by comparison with the Beethoven 5th, the Mahler 5th, or the Shostakovich 5th) simply eludes us. There are, no doubt, passionate and close-minded advocates of this or that version, but an inflexible claim to certainty and expertise in Bruckner must always remain suspect. Richard Osborne wrote in « Gramophone » , in August 1991, that, in the case of the Bruckner 5th, the matter is « simple » ; and that « once we have scotched the validity of Franz Schalk's 1893 version, it is relatively plain sailing » .

Unfortunately, the Schalk version, which dates from 1896, not 1893 (the 1st orchestral premiere was in 1894) has, as the work of Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt and other scholars suggests, more claims to authenticity, respectability, and to reflecting Bruckner's wishes than heretofore suspected. Bruckner actually may have approved of the version of the Symphony whose printing took place in 1896, the year of his death. Not only was the 5th known for the 1st 3rd of the 20th Century in the Schalk version, but that version may have reflected the composer's own revisions, even though some of the suggestions may have come from a loyal disciple.

Bruckner was not the only composer to reconsider aspects of a work after the 1st performance and at the urging of trusted colleagues and students. Korstvedt has shown that the revisions of Symphony Nos. 2 and 4 and of the String Quintet did reflect Bruckner's wishes. We do not know what version he heard in the 1st 4 hand piano performance of the 5th. Schalk maintained that Bruckner explicitly approved of the additional brass (the famous « 11 Disciples »), at the end of the work. The 1896 edition may be a perfectly valid representation of the 5th.

We are so accustomed to respecting « true » painstaking scholarship that we fail to retain a healthy skepticism. Every music student has had the experience of looking for the « Urtext » edition - the uncorrupted « real » unedited and distorted text. In Bruckner's case, the motivation and the procedures behind the creation of the « Urtext » (the meticulous scholarship begun in the 1930's, particularly on the 5th Symphony) was National-Socialist ideology, masquerading as « neutral » scholarship. « Facts » simply did not speak for themselves. Even anti-fascists and Jews of that era were unwittingly influenced by a view of Bruckner encouraged by the Nazis. After all, the tainted « Critical Edition » of the 5th was published in 1935, deceptively, as a « neutral » scholarly achievement.

For the listener, however, there is a larger question at stake. We have fallen into the habit, in the United States, of thinking about Bruckner too much in terms of the Nazi appropriation of him and his music. No doubt, in his lifetime and afterwards, Bruckner was the darling of those who championed the worst form of reactionary and intolerant politics, particularly anti-Semitism. But the popularity of Bruckner during the Nazi era was not an obvious legacy for the composer or the music.

Most important, the Nazi embrace took its toll on the way the music was played. The spirit, tempos, and timbres of practically all Bruckner performances (especially, those praised by critics and Bruckner enthusiasts) are based on models that date from before 1945. Contemporary conductors thoughtlessly turn to Herbert von Karajan or Wilhelm Furtwängler or examples set by other German and Austrian contemporaries, between 1930 and 1945, to find the true approach to Bruckner. But Karajan and Furtwängler (and too many of their colleagues) were more a part of the world of Nazism and its ambitions to present Bruckner as essential and true Aryan culture than should make us comfortable. The easy disclaimers (interpretation is just a matter of looking at the « same » music, and doing what somehow is « objectively » in it) won't work. Given the importance of Bruckner to the Nazis, why do we assume that the « German » performance tradition of the mid- 20th Century is the place to begin ? After all, Bruckner's music has never quite achieved the popularity it deserves. In the United States, the 5th (perhaps, because it was Adolf Hitler's favourite Bruckner Symphony) is one of the lesser-known Symphonies. Perhaps, a fresh approach to the texts and a distancing from received performance traditions will help.

The early and strikingly patriotic song « Germanenzug » - Bruckner's sympathies were perhaps more congruent with his unattractive reactionary pan-German patrons in Vienna than many scholars are willing to admit. But the distance between mid- 19th Century patriotism and Nazism should not be passed over lightly. We move to some lighter material, the « Abendzauber » , written for the same male chorus for which Johann Strauß's « Blue Danube » was written a decade earlier, in 1867 ; an organization that, as Paul Hawkshaw correctly points-out, was feared in the 1840's by Metternich because its leaders were in the forefront of Liberalism and the movement to democratize the Habsburg Monarchy.

Among those who lost their lives in the 1848 Vienna Revolution were organizers of the Vienna Men's Choral Society. We then turn, in « Psalm 146 » , to the most powerful aspect of Bruckner's personality : his devout Catholicism. Bruckner was an unassuming, provincial Austrian genius with few pretensions. He was loved by his students. His use of dialect, his simple mode of dress, and his manners were the source of much humor and may have offended some of his more cosmopolitan colleagues. But, above all, he was truly a man of God.

The 5th Symphony may not be the stirring, War-like work that was performed, in 1937, to illustrate Aryan masculinity, spirituality, power, and « grandeur » . The cruelest fate has been the extent to which Bruckner, the devout and brilliant organist, counterpoint teacher, and composer was tarnished posthumously by the Nazis. Unlike Richard Wagner, Bruckner was not a rabble-rousing anti-Semitic polemicist. What in his works can be interpreted plausibly as politically nefarious, as might be done in the case of Wagner ? The 5th may be about theology and faith as music, as are other works.

The question posed, therefore, is : Can we listen to and appreciate Bruckner in a way that puts the Nazi era behind us ? To do so, not only requires that we play repertoire and use editions that are less laden with the Nazi legacy. It also demands that we perform Bruckner differently : independently of the suspect traditions that have come down to us.

Spirituality in the Concert Hall : Reflections on the Music of Anton Bruckner

If the spirit of Protestantism finds superlative musical expression in the works of Johann Sebastian Bach then, perhaps, the same claim could be made for the spirit of Catholicism in the music of Josef Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) . Though, not as popularly celebrated as his German predecessor, the music of Bruckner is equally sincere and just as moving in its evocation of Christian spirituality. And just as Johann Sebastian Bach's music is able to transcend its historical context, so too the music of Bruckner, though located in a particular time and reflective of the æsthetic trends of its moment, continues to speak in a relevant and inspiring manner.

This impression of Bruckner's music was recently confirmed in a concert, given in January of 2003, by the New York based American Symphony Orchestra. In a program entitled « Bruckner's Journey » , artistic director Leon Botstein led the Orchestra in a fine execution of 2 of Bruckner's early works (although, Bruckner was already in his 40's, at the time of their composition) , namely the Mass in F minor and the 1st Symphony. From a retrospective point of view, both works reveal a man in progress, confident but still developing his own voice, desperately aware of an imposing musical tradition behind him that he seeks to both emulate and take to a new level.

The performance of the Mass and the Symphony exposed listeners to the 2 main aspects of Bruckner's œuvre, the generally religious choral works and the 9 Symphonies. In this way, the program provided a helpful insight into the craft of Bruckner's music, and a wonderful reminder of why he is still worth listening to today.

In the Mass, key features of Bruckner's spirituality are found that characterize his music in general. One is his expression of the human condition. Bruckner was deeply aware of the precariousness of human existence, how humanity finds itself bound in by both the finitude of secular existence, and by its unworthiness before the Sacred reality. This is beautifully expressed, for example, in his treatment of the words « Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us » , in the « Gloria » . The choir sings nearly unaccompanied, bereft, as it were, of all support. With faint, pleading lines in the high-strings, the choir repeats imploringly for grace and assurance. « Miserere nobis » ! In a day when North American Christian spirituality eschews perhaps too great a degree of presumption and self-assurance, Bruckner's music reminds us, in the old words of the great Protestant divine Jonathan Edwards, that « if God should let you go, you would immediately sink and swiftly descend and plunge into the bottomless Gulf, and your healthy Constitution, and your own Care and Prudence, and best Contrivance, and all your Righteousness, would have no more Influence to uphold you and keep you out of Hell, than a Spider's Web would have to stop a falling Rock » . Bruckner was aware of this condition, and his music captures this spider's web of human existence.

2ndly, there is expressed within Bruckner's music a deep note of Marian piety. The lyrical highlight of the entire Mass occurs at the « Et incarnates est » of the « Credo » . Here, Bruckner, if one may so put it, romances the Virgin as the tenor soloist, accompanied with solo viola and violin obbligato, relate the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the Blessed Mother. It is a moment of poignant tenderness in an otherwise muscular exposition of the Creed. Bruckner will continue with this sense of devotion with a Motet setting of the « Ave Maria » and his treatment of similar texts.

But if Bruckner is so aware of the abyss around which self-confident Man treads, and of the motherly warmth provided in the image of the Virgin, he is finally aware of the truthfulness of the Gospel, and of its triumph in the world. This is expressed in his strong, forthright presentation of the Mass text. The utter transparency, the complete lack of any trace of irony, characterize not only this but all of Bruckner's works. This alone makes listening to Bruckner's music a refreshing and edifying experience.

The Mass, along with his other choral works, including 2 other Mass settings, a « Requiem » , as well as Motets and other choral pieces, most notably the magnificent « Te Deum » for chorus and large orchestra, express the obviously Catholic aspect of Bruckner's music. Many of these works are still in the active repertoire, and some of them are simply among the best settings of these texts that exist.

It is with his mid-life turn to the Symphony, which became his almost exclusive artistic medium, that Bruckner produced the works for which he is most popularly associated. In Bruckner's hands, the Symphony as a musical convention takes on new depth of meaning. While clearly taking musical cues from Haydn, Beethoven and Schubert, Bruckner instills a uniquely religious significance into the Symphonic format. With Bruckner, the Symphony is transformed into an ascent narrative, beginning in mystery and uncertainty, moving through considerations of both the beauty and suffering of the world, conversely smiling and weeping with it, but always concluding with a victorious arrival, a conquering of a challenging mountain peak.

A few comments about his musical technique may help explain how Bruckner achieves this effect for the listener. We could begin by considering the element of form. In terms of both his religious choral works and, in particular, the orchestral music with which he is most identified, Bruckner adopted and basically remained true to received musical forms. To the Sonata - Allegro form of the Symphonic tradition, however, Bruckner added new episodes, introduced daring harmonic relationships, and stretched the form through feats of thematic development. In doing so, Bruckner nearly doubled the length of the concert performance of the Symphony, and thus heightened the demands upon the listener. To listen appreciatively to Bruckner is to enter into an arduous journey with him.

Bruckner's development of the Symphonic form is particularly captured in his Adagios, or slow movements. From the Romance-like interludes of the earlier Symphonic tradition, Bruckner constructed miracles of contemplative and worshipful magnificence. Here, the suspension of hurried modernity is most completely achieved, and Bruckner's melodic and improvisational gifts are fully displayed. The spirit of the « Kyrie » is transformed into pure orchestral expression.

Bruckner's musical language is characterized by both short, pregnant motifs and long, lyrical lines, by signature octave leaps and broad, sustained chorale like passages. Bruckner's was the art of juxtaposition and improvisation, placing opposites in direct contact, taking ideas and inverting them. Bruckner saw the Symphony as the vehicle in which he could best express his perception of the world, a world where both the Sacred and secular were drawn together and drawn toward Heaven. As one commentator observes :

« It is just as natural for him to employ the cadence of his Motet " Ave Maria " in the Adagio movement of his Symphony as it is to confront a merry Polka melody in the Finale with a chorale in the background. »

Bruckner also enlarged the scope of the concert Orchestra, with woodwind doubling and augmentation of the brass section, especially in his last 3 Symphonies. Bruckner wields these forces to impressive effect, characteristically alternating between shimmering pianissimo string passages with shattering brass entrances, or combing the 2 sonorities into some of the greatest orchestral crescendos in the literature.

The outcome of these stylistic techniques is the communication of a religious sensitivity and a personal self effacement that are the hallmarks of all of Bruckner's music. Absent is the theatricality of Richard Wagner, from whom Bruckner learned much but with whom there could not be greater personal contrast. Absent also is the strained self assertion that characterizes Romanticism in any age. Rather than « I have to be me » , it is « I want to love Thee » that is expressed in Bruckner's works. And it is this aspect of Bruckner's music, this attitude, couched though it is in the musical idioms of the late-Romantic Period, that transcends the historical moment and expresses Christian spirituality across time, perhaps more so now than before.

Many people are put-off, even intimidated, in their initial contact with Bruckner's music, in much the same way as some are put-off by their initial contact with Roman Catholicism. Like certain aspects of Catholic liturgy and theology, Bruckner's music is complex, densely textured, and lengthy. It does not yield itself to casual encounters. Bruckner's music is usually an acquired taste, almost requiring a kind of æsthetic conversion, especially for those accustomed to more familiar, « listener-friendly » fare. Appreciating Bruckner requires attention, repeated listening, respect for slow development, and above all, patience. For many, a satisfying introduction to Bruckner is found in the rustic exuberance of the 4th Symphony, or in the exquisite lyricism of the 7th. For those oriented toward vocal-music, the Mass in F minor, or the plainsong inspired « Te Deum » , are great places to begin.

It is often said that Anton Bruckner's Symphonies are like « cathedrals of sound » . There is truth in this analogy. Like the architectural foundations of a great cathedral, the Symphonies rely on certain structural patterns that support the whole edifice, giving rise to elaborate and ornate development. Cathedrals are the creation of Sacred space, wherein humans assume their proper significance before the reality of God. Bruckner's music can have a similar effect upon the listener. In cathedrals, common elements of light and sound are captured and reconfigured through the interaction with the structure and content of the building. The same effect is true in Bruckner's handling of musical elements. In a great cathedral, the worshipful are drawn toward something beyond the structure and beauty of the building. This too is true in Bruckner's case. Like a great cathedral, Bruckner's music irresistibly eventuates in only one direction : « up » .

AB 116 : Linz, capitale culturelle d'Hitler

Women in Linz (1938-1945)

The success of National-Socialism can be only partly explained by economic improvements and social promises. The addition of the now familiar main features of authoritarian regimes and of an model to identify with, communicated to women using all forms of propaganda, contributed at least as much to finding acceptance as did marriage loans, child support and employment prospects.

Although with very few exceptions women were kept from leading positions within the regime, the importance of women as « part of society » was continually emphasized. Not a few women gained a previously unknown self-confidence from this. They were empty words, however, for those who fell short of « racial » , moral or political requirements. Empty words also, for those women who starved on the « Home Front » , who lost loved ones, or died in the nightly air-raids.

The article describes the living conditions of women in Linz during under the NS-regime - based on newspaper articles from the daily papers in Linz, court judgments, interviews and memoirs of women who spent the years between 1938 and 1945 as school girls, employees or foreign workers in Linz.

The 3 Mayors of Linz under the Nazi regime

Following the Nazi take-over and the annexation of Austria into the German « Reich » (« Anschluß ») German local government practice was introduced, bound solely to Nazi ideology. Linz became a city with county status, headed by a National-Socialist head-mayor. Below him was a mayor (as his deputy mayor) , 6 deputies (councillors) as well as council members in place of a city council. The head-mayor was solely responsible and the final decision-maker, according to the « Führer » model, although he was subordinate to the governor and « Gauleiter » of Oberdonau. The National-Socialist head-mayors' actions contributed considerably to Nazi persecution of political opponents as well as of social and ethnic minorities.

1938-1939 : Josef Wolkerstorfer (NSDAP) .

1940-1943 : Leo Sturma (NSDAP) .

1944-1945 : Franz Langoth (NSDAP) .

Josef Wolkerstorfer

Josef Wolkerstorfer (1 September 1905 - 20 May 1990) : Temporary mayor and head-mayor of Linz from 12 March 1938 to 7 December 1939.

...

Josef Wolkerstorfer, též Sepp Wolkerstorfer (1. září 1905 Linec - 20. května 1990 Linec) , byl rakouský politik a nacistický funkcionář z Horních Rakous, za nacistického režimu starosta Lince.

Vystudoval národní a měšťanskou školu v Linci. Působil jako kloboučník. Složil učňovské zkoušky ve Welsu a Štýrském Hradci. V Linci si zřídil živnost a od roku 1930 zde měl obchod s pánskou módou na Landstraße.

Byl politicky aktivní. Od 1. května 1933 byl členem organizace NSDAP v Linci. Byl organizátorem nacistických akcí. Podílel se na distribuci ilegálního nacistického listu Österreichischer Beobachter. V letech 1935-1938 byl krajským vedoucím tehdy stále ještě ilegální nacistické strany v Linci. V roce 1938 se stal členem jednotek SS, v nichž v srpnu 1939 dosáhl hodnosti Obersturmbannführera.

Po anšlusu Rakouska zaznamenal kariérní postup. Od roku 1938 zastával významné posty v NSDAP. Zasedal v představenstvu Volkskreditbank Oberösterreich, v letech 1941-1945 byl prokuristou a náměstkem ředitele velkého průmyslového podniku Reichswerke Hermann Göring v Linci. Starostou města Linec byl od počátku německé anexe Rakouska, tedy od 12. března 1938 (bylo mu tehdy necelých 33 let) . Funkci zastával do 7. prosince 1939. Podle jiného zdroje byl starostou až do 15. června 1940. Do funkce ho jmenoval Arthur Seyß-Inquart coby starostu-komisaře. S účinností od 27. května 1938 byl vrchním starostou města (Oberbürgermeister) . Poté, co ve funkci v červnu 1940 skončil, působil ještě do 31. prosince 1940 na městské radnici pod starostenstvím Leopolda Sturmy.

Po válce byl zadržen a souzen ve čtyřech kauzách. V kauze vraždy byl v dubnu 1948 zproštěn viny. V další kauze byl 30. července 1948 soudem Wolkerstorfer uznán vinným z velezrady a odsouzen na 36 měsíců. Později působil jako obchodník s vínem.

Leo Sturma

Doctor Leo Sturma (13 June 1896 - 18 February 1965) : Head-mayor of Linz from 15 June 1940 to 31 December 1943.

...

Leo Sturma wurde am 13. Juni 1894 in Wels als Sohn eines Finanzwachebeamten geboren. Er besuchte die Gymnasien in Linz und Wels und legte 1913 seine Matura ab. Er diente 1913/1914 als Einjährig-Freiwilliger beim Feldhauptzenregiment 14 und nahm bis 1918 am Ersten Weltkrieg teil. Mehrfach ausgezeichnet kam er 1918 in italienische Gefangenschaft. 1919 wurde er entlassen und kehrte nach Österreich zurück.

Sturma studierte in Innsbruck Rechtswissenschaften und promovierte 1923 zum Doktor juris. Sein Gerichtspraktikum absolvierte er in Wels. Als Rechtsanwaltsanwärter war er in der Kanzlei von Doktor Schmotzer tätig. Ab 1925 arbeitete Sturma als selbständiger Rechtsanwalt.

Sturmas Eintritt in die NSDAP, Ortsgruppe Wels, erfolgte im Herbst 1934. Seine Mitgliedsnummer lautete 6.372.061. Zwischen 1934 und 1938 nahm er die Funktion eines Rechtsverwahrers der Kreise Hausruck und Salzkammergut ein. Weiters hatte er die Kreisleiterstellvertretung der NSBO inne. Sturma verfasste Schulungsbriefe der NSDAP und war Mitarbeiter beim Arbeitersturm und beim Österreichischen Beobachter. Er übernahm bei fast allen beim Kreisgericht Wels anhängigen Strafprozessen gegen Nationalsozialisten die Verteidigung.

Seit 1. Mai 1938 war Sturma unter der Nummer 309.485 Angehöriger der SS. Ende des Krieges bekleidete er den Rang eines SS-Standartenführers. Von 1938 bis Mitte 1943 gehörte Sturma auch der SA an.

Weitere von Sturma ausgeübte Funktionen waren :

Kreiswarter des NSRB von Juni 1938 bis 1940.

Gauführer des NSRB von Februar 1944 bis Kriegsende.

Kreisamtsleiter für Rechts- und Kommunalpolitik von Mitte 1938 bis Mitte 1940.

Gauhauptstellenleiter (Rechtsbetreuer) von Februar 1944 bis Kriegsende.

Aufsichtsrat der Oberbank (Bestellung 1941) .

Zwischen März 1938 und Februar 1939 hatte er das Amt des Bürgermeisters von Wels inne. Danach arbeitete er wieder als Rechtsanwalt. Seit 1940 betätigte sich Sturma als ehrenamtlicher Mitarbeiter des SD.

Am 8. März 1940 wurde Sturma zum Oberbürgermeister von Linz ernannt. Ende 1943 trat er wegen politischen Spannungen aus diesem Amt zurück. Nach seinem Rücktritt als Oberbürgermeister erfolgte am 30. Januar 1944 die Ernennung Sturmas zum Präsidenten des Oberlandesgerichts Linz. In dieser Funktion blieb er bis 1945.

Nach Kriegsende wurde das Verfahren gegen ihn wegen §§ 10 und 11 VG und §§ 2 und 8 KVG eingeleitet. Später wurde das Verfahren unter einer neuen Gerichtszahl auch auf die §§ 4 und 6 KVG ausgedehnt. Am 10. Dezember 1949 wurde Sturma schließlich wegen §§ 10 und 11 VG und § 58 Strafgesetzes (StG) vor dem Volksgericht Linz angeklagt. Ein Jahr später, am 19. Dezember 1950, kam es zur Niederschlagung des Prozesses nach Entschließung durch den Bundespräsidenten.

1951 nahm Sturma wieder seine Tätigkeit als Rechtsanwalt in Wels auf. Leo Sturma starb 1965.

...

Leopold Sturma, též Leo Sturma (13. června 1896 Wels - 18. února 1965 Wels) , byl rakouský právník, politik a nacistický funkcionář z Horních Rakous, za nacistického režimu starosta Lince.

Studoval na gymnáziu ve Welsu a Linci. Maturoval roku 1913. Od roku 1920 studoval práva na Univerzitě v Innsbrucku, kde byl roku 1923 promován na doktora práv. Působil na soudní praxi u okresního a krajského soudu ve Welsu, od roku 1922 pracoval v advokátní kanceláři Schmutzer-Slama. Od roku 1925 byl samostatným advokátem ve Welsu. K advokátní činnosti ve Welsu se ještě vrátil v roce 1951.

Byl politicky aktivní. Od roku 1934 byl členem organizace NSDAP ve Welsu. Ve 30. letech byl stranickým právním zmocněncem pro kraje Hausruck a Salzkammergut. Po anšlusu vykonával od poloviny roku 1938 do poloviny roku 1940 funkci vedoucího krajského úřadu pro právo a komunální politiku. Zastával vysoké posty v Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation (NSRB) jako zástupce jejího krajského předsedy. V letech 1944-1945 byl župním vedoucím NSRB. V letech 1938-1943 byl členem SA. 1. května 1938 se rovněž stal členem jednotek SS jako Standartenführer.

Od března 1938 do března 1939 zastával úřad starosty rodného Welsu. Starostou města Linec byl od 15. června 1940 do 31. prosince 1943. Od ledna 1944 do května 1945 byl prezidentem vrchního zemského soudu v Linci.

Franz Langoth

Franz Langoth (20 August 1877 - 17 April 1953) : Head-mayor of Linz from 1 January 1944 to 7 May 1945.

...

The Austrian nationalist politician Franz Langoth was born on 20 August 1877 in Linz and died on 17 April 1953 in Linz. He later became a leading figure in the country's Nazi movement.

A native of Linz, Langoth was the son of a miller and a flour merchant and qualified as a teacher in 1896. He began his political career as a nationalist member of the « Landtag » of Upper-Austria in 1909. He served in the Austro-Hungarian Army as a lieutenant during the First World War and, subsequently, with the « Landsturm » .

In the immediate aftermath of the World War I, Langoth became head of the provincial security committee in Linz and, although he became noted for his hard-line « völkisch » beliefs and his strong support for the « Anschluß » , he also worked closely with Johann Nepomuk Hauser, the governor of Upper-Austria who was noted for his Christian-Socialist beliefs. As deputy « Laundeshauptmann » , Langoth gained a reputation as a strong, albeit even-handed, upholder of law and order in the province. In particular, Langoth clashed regularly with Emil Fey, particularly as he had banned marches by the « Heimwehr » in Upper-Austria. Langoth's reputation as law enforcer even saw Engelbert Dollfuss offer him the post of Federal Minister of Public Security in May 1932 but the offer was rejected.

He became leader of the Greater German People's Party after the First World War, leading the Party on a strongly anti-Semitic and racist course. However, whilst the Party initially enjoyed a following, it soon lost-out to the Nazi Party and Langoth joined this group in 1933. He also joined the « Schutzstaffel » at the same time. Under the « Ständestaat » , Langoth established the « Hilfswerk Langoth » which provided welfare payments to Nazi activists and played an important role in ensuring the continuation of the Nazi movement. Although the Nazi Party was banned in Austria after the attempted Putsch of 1934, Kurt Schuschnigg allowed Langoth's group to be active due to his high-standing. Langoth, along with Ernst Kaltenbrunner and Anton Reinthaller, even met with Schuschnigg in 1935 in an attempt to get the ban on the Nazis lifted in return for a guarantee of co-operation with the regime.

Langoth was a strong supporter of the « Anschluß » and he argued that :

« The election on 10 April 1938 in Austria had been an example of a true, democratic plebiscite and would be recorded as a pure and clean vote in future history. »

Following the « Anschluß » , Langoth became head of the « Nationalsozialistische Volkswohlfahrt » for Austria and the Upper-Danube. He also served as a judge in the « Volksgerichtshof » where he passed 41 death sentences and obtained the rank of « Brigadeführer » in the « Schutzstaffel » . Towards the end of the Second World War, he also served as Mayor of Linz and as the Allies advanced Langoth sought-out the Austrian resistance and negotiated with them the transfer of Linz to their administration.

Langoth was arrested by the United States forces and interned at Glasenbach until 1947, although he surprisingly faced no charges under the Denazification process and was amnestied in 1950. He became an advisor to the founders of the Federation of Independents and was an honorary member of the Party. His 1951 autobiography, « Kampf um Österreich » , was characterized by its continuing support for Nazism.

In the post-War era, Langoth was, for some time, considered a « good » Nazi who bore no responsibility for the excesses of the regime, to the extent that, in 1972, a street in Linz was renamed « Langothstraße » . The name continued in use until 1986 when the street was restored to its original name of « Kaisergasse » .

...

Franz Langoth (geboren 20. August 1877 in Linz ; gestorben 17. April 1953 ebenda) war ein österreichischer Lehrer, Unteroffizier und Politiker. Er war vom 1. Jänner 1944 bis zum 7. Mai 1945 Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Linz.

Franz Langoth wurde als Sohn eines Mehlhändlers und Müllers in Linz geboren und hatte sechs Brüder. In seiner Heimatstadt besuchte er die Volks- und Hauptschule und absolvierte nach dem Ende seiner Schullaufbahn eine Lehrerausbildung. Nach dem Besuch der Linzer Lehrerbildungsanstalt und der 1898 bestandenen Volksschullehrerprüfung wurde er Volksschullehrer in Windischgarsten, Hinterstoder und Kirchdorf an der Krems. Nach der Fachlehrerprüfung 1903 in Linz wurde er Bürgerschullehrer. Zuletzt war er Hauptschuldirektor.

Er wurde 1896 Mitglied im Oberösterreichischen Lehrerverein. Von 1909 bis 1934 war Langoth deutschnationaler Abgeordneter im oberösterreichischen Landtag. Von 1911 bis 1938 war er Obmann des Deutschen Volksbundes für Oberösterreich. Unterbrochen wurden diese Tätigkeiten von 1914 bis 1918, als er als Soldat der Kaiserlich und Königlich Armee im Ersten Weltkrieg diente. Nach dem Krieg war er bis 1934 Mitglied der oberösterreichischen Landesregierung (1918-1931 Landeshauptmannstellvertreter, 1931-1934 Landesrat) und bis 1933 Sicherheitsreferent in der oberösterreichischen Landesregierung. Daneben war er von 1919 bis 1934 Mitglied des Landesschulrates und 1920 bis 1934 Landesparteiobmann der Großdeutschen Volkspartei in Oberösterreich. Bereits 1933 (die NSDAP war in Österreich zu dieser Zeit verboten worden) war er Mitinitiator des « Kampfbündnisses » zwischen Großdeutscher Volkspartei und NSDAP.

Von 1934 bis 1938 war er Leiter des « Hilfswerkes Langoth » für NS-Parteigänger. Nach dem Anschluß Österreichs wurde er im Rang eines SS-Oberführers in die SS übernommen und am 1. Mai 1938 förmlich in die NSDAP aufgenommen. Von 1938 bis 1939 war er Leiter der Nationalsozialistischen Volkswohlfahrt (NSV) in Österreich, die unter dem Deckmantel der Wohlfahrtspflege nur die Menschen unterstützte, die die « richtige » politische Meinung vertraten und der richtigen « Rasse » angehörten. Von 1938 bis 1943 leitete er den NSV in Oberdonau. Von 1938 bis 1945 war er außerdem Mitglied des « Großdeutschen Reichstags » . Durch Hermann Göring bürgerte sich sein Spitzname « Vater Langgoth » ein. Langoth war von 1940 bis 1944 Richter beim Volksgerichtshof und fällte in 51 Verfahren mit insgesamt 125 Angeklagten, 118 Schuldsprüche, davon 41 Todesurteile. Ende Januar 1944 wurde er zum SS-Brigadeführer befördert und war bereits seit November 1943 Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Linz.

Bei Kriegsende wurde er am 7. Mai 1945 als Bürgermeister abgesetzt und war bis zu seiner krankheitsbedingten Entlassung im Mai 1947 durch die US-Besatzungsmacht in Glasenbach interniert. Obwohl Erhebungen nach dem Kriegsverbrecher- und Verbotsgesetz stattfanden, kam es zu keiner Anklage. 1950 wurde er vom Bundespräsidenten amnestiert. Seiner Gesinnung treu, initiierte er 1949 das « Soziale Friedenswerk » für belastete Nationalsozialisten. 1951 erschienen seinen Memoiren Kampf um Österreich, Erinnerungen eines Politikers. Er wurde im Dezember 1951 erstes Ehrenmitglied des Verbandes der Unabhängigen.

Nach seinem Tod hielt am 20. April 1954 Bürgermeister Ernst Koref eine Gedenkrede im Linzer Gemeinderat. Er galt als « guter Nazi » - 1973 wurde gar eine Straße in Linz nach ihm benannt. Erst in den 1980er Jahren wurde begonnen dieses Bild zu revidieren. 1986 wurde die Langothstraße in Kaisergasse umbenannt.

Langoth war seit 1910 verheiratet und hatte zwei Kinder.

...

Als am 5. Mai 1945 Einheiten der dritten US-Armee mit Jeeps und Panzern am Linzer Hauptplatz einfuhren und von den Passanten freundlich empfangen wurden, machte sich nach Jahren der Angst, des Mangels und der Bombardements Erleichterung breit.

Schnell wurde damals ein Gerücht gestreut, das über Jahrzehnte zur Legende wurde. Der Linzer Oberbürgermeister Franz Langoth (seit Ende 1944), so wurde erzählt, habe mit seiner Initiative die kampflose Übergabe der Stadt erreicht und vielen Bewohnern das Leben gerettet.

Das war, wie der Chef des Linzer Stadtarchivs, der Historiker Walter Schuster, erforscht hat, nicht so. Nachträgliche Eintragungen in den Notizen von Langoths Sekretär sollten den Eindruck einer Rettung erwecken - und taten das auch erfolgreich für den Nationalsozialisten.

Langoth war ob seiner väterlichen Art (er war zu Kriegsende schon 68) und seiner angenehmen Umgangsformen beliebt. Und er hatte sich in Kriegszeiten für seinen späteren Nachfolger, den langjährigen sozialdemokratischen Bürgermeister Ernst Koref, eingesetzt, als dieser im Konzentrationslager Dachau interniert werden sollte. Die US-Besatzer verhafteten den NS-Amtsinhaber vorerst dennoch und brachten ihn nach Glöcknerbach in der Stadt Salzburg, wo ein Großteil der österreichischen NS-Funktionäre festgehalten wurde.

Zwei Jahre später kam Langoth frei, und es wurde trotz seiner hohen Funktionen im NS-Regime nie Anklage gegen ihn erhoben. Für heutige Historiker wie Walter Schuster ist das nur mit Langoths aus langjährigem Politikerleben rührenden Verbindungen und der Haltung der demokratischen Nachfolger zu verstehen :

« Selbst integre Männer wie Ernst Koref wollten sich als NS-Täter eher SA-Schläger und KZ-Bewacher als den Bildungsbürger vom Typus des Franz Langoth vorstellen. »

Der Hauptschullehrer, langjährige Landesobmann der Großdeutschen Volkspartei und Landtagsabgeordnete war schon fünf Jahre vor dem Anschluß an Deutschland Verbindungsmann zur illegalen NSDAP und hatte über ein Hilfswerk, geduldet von der autoritären Regierung Kurt Schuschnigg, illegale Nazis in Österreich unterstützt. Mit dem Anschluß wurde Langoth SS-Oberführer (am Schluß Brigadeführer), leitete die Nationalsozialistische Volkswohlfahrt (NSV) und saß bis zum Ende des Regimes im Reichstag in Berlin. Von 1940 bis 1944 war er Richter beim Volksgerichtshof und fällte in 51 Verfahren 118 Schuldsprüche, in 41 Fällen waren das Todesurteile. Ein Fall war jener der Linzer Ordensschwester Camilla Estermann, die Zwangsarbeitern Lebensmittel und Kleider geschenkt hatte.

Bis Mitte der 1980er Jahre wirkte die Legende vom « guten Nazi » , unter Bürgermeister Franz Hillinger wurde sogar eine Straße nach ihm benannt. Dann begannen Forschungsergebnisse das Bild zu revidieren, und seither hat Linz wieder eine Kaisergasse.

...

Franz Langoth wurde am 20. August 1877 als Sohn eines Müllers und Mehlhändlers in Linz geboren. Er besuchte von 1892-1896 die Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Linz. Seit 1896 war er Mitglied des Oberösterreichischen Lehrervereins. Nach seiner Reifeprüfung wurde er als Aushilfslehrer in Windischgarsten angestellt. Danach folgten Verpflichtungen als Lehrer in Innerstoder und Kirchdorf an der Krems. 1898 wirkte er an der Kaiser-Franz-Josef-Knabenschule (heute Goetheschule) in Linz.

Nachdem Langoth 1898 die Lehrbefähigungsprüfung für Volksschulen abgelegt hatte, unterrichtete er von 1899-1903 in der Knabenvolksschule Baumbachstraße Nummer 10 in Linz. 1903 (Langoth machte in diesem Jahr die Prüfung für Bürgerschullehrer) begann er als provisorischer Fachlehrer an der Linzer Kaiser-Franz-Josefs-Knabenbürgerschule in der Schützenstraße Nummer 13 in Linz zu arbeiten. Ab 1908 war Langoth definitiver Fachlehrer der Knabenbürgerschule in der Figulystraße in Linz. 1909 kareziert, wurde er 1934 Direktor der Knaben-Hauptschule I an der Spittelwiese in Linz. 1935 erfolgte die Versetzung Langoths in den Ruhestand. Langoth nahm von 1914 bis 1918 am Ersten Weltkrieg teil (ab 1915 Rechnungsführer-Leutnant beim II. Reservebataillon des Kaiserlich und Königlich Infanterieregiments Nummer 29 an der italienischen Front) .

Langoths politische Karriere begann 1909. Er wurde deutschnationaler Abgeordneter im oberösterreichischen Landtag. 1918-1919 gehörte er der provisorischen Landesversammlung an und war anschließend Abgeordneter der nachfolgenden drei Legislaturperioden (XII. , XIII. und XIV.) . Bereits 1918 als Mitglied der provisorischen Landesregierung vereidigt, blieb Langoth bis 1934 Abgeordneter und Regierungsmitglied im Oberösterreich Landtag. Von 1918-1931 hatte er die Funktion des Landeshauptmannstellvertreters, von 1931-1934 die Funktion eines Landesrats inne. Als Landesparteiobmann der Großdeutschen Volkspartei (1920-1934) kann Langoth als der maßgebliche Vertreter des nationalen Lagers in Oberösterreich angesehen werden.

Weiters war Langoth Obmann des Deutschen Volksbundes für Oberösterreich (1911-1938) und Mitglied des Landeschulrates (1919-1934) . Er nahm außerdem Einfluß auf folgende Bereiche der Öffentlichkeit, da er Obmann des Linzer Mietvereins, Verwaltungsrat der Bank für Oberösterreich und Salzburg, Mitglied des Verwaltungsrates der Wolfsegg-Traunthaler Kohlenwerks-AG, Mitglied des Verwaltungsrates der Oberösterreichischen Wasserkraft- und Elektrizitäts-AG und stellvertretender Vorsitzender beziehungsweise Mitglied des Landeseisenbahnrates (1919-1925) war.

Von 1918 bis 1933 hatte Langoth das Aufgabengebiet eines Sicherheitsreferenten in der Oberösterreich Landesregierung inne. Langoth wandte sich 1933 der nationalsozialistischen Ideologie zu. Da er Mitinitiator des « Kampfbündnisses » zwischen Großdeutscher Volkspartei und NSDAP (15. Mai 1933) gewesen war, wurde er in der Sitzung der Landesregierung vom 13. Juni 1933 als Sicherheitsreferent ersetzt. Am 1. März 1934 nahm Langoth zum letzten Mal an einer Landtagsitzung teil. Er stimmte der Wahl Gleißners als Landeshauptmann zu. Der neue Landtag (ab 28. November 1934) sah ihn nicht mehr als Vertreter der Großdeutschen Volkspartei.

Er schuf 1934 das « Hilfswerk Langoth » , dessen Leiter er bis 1938 blieb. Dieses Hilfswerk unterstützte NS-Aktivisten in Österreich, wurde aber von der Regierung Schuschnigg geduldet. 1938 erhielt Langoth den Rang eines SS-Oberführers. Seine SS-Nummer lautete 292.795. Am 1. Mai desselben Jahres kam es zu seiner förmlichen Aufnahme in die NSDAP (Mitgliedsnummer 6.250.313) . Langoth gelang nach dem Anschluß (er war bereits 60 Jahre alt) eine erstaunliche Karriere. Von 1938 bis 1943 wurde ihm die Leitung der NSV in Oberdonau übertragen. 1938-1939 leitete er die NSV in Österreich. Er gehörte von 1938 bis 1945 dem « Großdeutschen Reichstag » an und war von 1940-1944 Richter beim NS-Volksgeschichtshof. In dieser Funktion fällte er in 51 Verfahren mit insgesamt 125 Angeklagten 41 Todesurteile. 77 weitere Regimegegner wurden von ihm zu Zuchthausstrafen verurteilt. Am 8. Januar 1944 kam es zur Bestellung Langoths zum Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Linz. In diesem Jahr erhielt er den Rang eines SS-Brigadeführers.

Nach der Verhaftung Langoths durch die US-Besatzungsmacht wurde er in Glasenbach interniert. Er kam am 15. Mai 1947 in Gewahrsam der Polizeidirektion Linz. Von dort wurde er in das Spital der Strafanstalt Garsten überstellt, kurz darauf aber in häusliche Pflege nach Goisern entlassen. Die Staatsanwaltschaft Linz erhob nie Anklage gegen Langoth. Im Dezember 1950 erfolgte seine Amnestierung durch den Bundespräsidenten.

1949 initiierte Langoth die Stiftung « Soziales Friedenswerk » für belastete Nationalsozialisten. 1951 erhielt er die Ehrenmitgliedschaft des VDU. Er schrieb seine Memoiren « Kampf um Österreich, Erinnerungen eines Politikers » , die 1951 publiziert wurden. Langoth galt lange Zeit als « guter Nationalsozialist » . 1973 kam es in Linz zur Benennung einer Straßennach ihm. 1986 wurde diese Straße in Kaisergasse umbenannt.

Franz Langoth starb am 17. April 1953 in Linz.

Der Fall Langoth

In Österreich glaubte man nach 1945 die Souveränität rascher wieder zu erlangen, indem man das Land zum ersten Opfer Adolf Hitlers stilisierte, den Jubel im März 1938 negierte und die Mitverantwortung von ÖsterreicherInnen an den nationalsozialistischen Verbrechen in den Hintergrund rückte. Im beginnenden Kalten Krieg folgten die Großmächte ihren eigenen Interessen, Österreich gewann dadurch mit seiner Position Spielraum. Ehemalige NationalsozialistInnen wurden in diesem Zusammenhang mitunter rasch pardonierte, insbesondere, wenn sie freundlich waren oder über Beziehungen verfügten. In diese Kategorie gehörte Franz Langoth (1877 bis 1953) , illegales NSDAP-Mitglied vor 1938, SS-Brigadeführer und Mitglied des Großdeutschen Reichstages. Der Jurist war Richter beim Volksgeschichtshof gewesen und hatte 118 Schuldsprüche gefällt, davon 41 Todesurteile. Zu nennen ist in diesem Zusammenhang die damals 63 Jahre alte, in Linz geborene Ordensschwester Camilla Estermann. In einer Linzer Bekleidungsfirma hatte sie an französische Zwangsarbeiter Lebensmittel und Kleidungsstücke verschenkt und war deshalb von der Gestapo verhaftet worden. Von einem Richtersenat des Volksgeschichtshofes, dem Oberbürgermeister Franz Langoth angehörte, wurden sie und der 74-jährige Franz Heger zum Tode verurteilt. Der pensionierte Gendarmerie-Inspektor Heger wurde letztlich wegen der Verbreitung von Weissagungen verurteilt, die den Zusammenbruch des nationalsozialistischen Regimes prophezeiten. Beide wurden am 21. November 1944 in Wien enthauptet.

(Vergleiche Schuster, 1999 ; Seiten 154-156.)

Franz Langoth war vom 1. Jänner 1944 bis Kriegsende Oberbürgermeister von Linz. In seinen Memoiren hielt Langoth dazu fest :

« Natürlich galt auch in der Stadtverwaltung das Führerprinzip [...] die Entscheidung stand schließlich bei mir allein. »

(Vergleiche Langoth, 1951 ; Seite 267.)

Im Stadtbereich wurden damals viele ZwangsarbeiterInnen und KZ-Häftlinge festgehalten, misshandelt oder getötet. Vom US-Militär wurde Langoth festgenommen und in ein Internierungslager verbracht. Für Aufregung hatte gesorgt, daß der von den Amerikanern eingesetzte Bürgermeister Ernst Koref sich vom NS-Bürgermeister mit Handschlag verabschiedete. Langoth hatte eingegriffen, als Koref in das KZ-Dachau verschickt werden sollte und ihm damit möglicherweise das Leben gerettet. Im Gegenzug übernahm Koref Langoths Sekretär der Jahre 1944-1945, Hans Kreczi, und setzte ihn in hohen Funktionen, und andere als Kulturverwaltungsdirektor ein. Obwohl gegen Langoth Erhebungen nach dem Kriegsverbrecher- und Verbotsgesetz stattfanden, kam es zu keiner Anklage. Er galt aufgrund seiner väterlichen Art als Prototyp des « guten Nazi » . Langoth blieb bei seiner politischen Haltung. In seinen Memoiren präsentierte er sich noch 1951 als überzeugter Nationalsozialist. Langoth war kein Einzelfall. In der Stadt Linz ebenso wie im Land Oberösterreich waren nach 1945 viele ehemalige NationalsozialistInnen in Verwaltung, Jurisdiktion und Politik tätig.

(Vergleiche dazu und A. Schuster, 1996 ; Seite 87ff.)

Langoth war als ehemaliger Linzer Oberbürgermeister allerdings ein sehr prominentes Beispiel.

Walter Schuster, der nunmehriger Leiter des Archivs der Stadt Linz, hat die Fallgeschichte des Franz Langoth sehr detailliert dokumentiert und analysiert. In seiner Biografie des letzten nationalsozialistischen Oberbürgermeisters von Linz heißt es abschließend :

« In Österreich hatte man eine besondere “ Gabe ” entwickelt : Man verstand es, zwischen “ guten ” und “ schlechten ” Nationalsozialisten zu unterscheiden und war rasch zu glauben bereit, jemand sei zwar NSDAP-Mitglied, aber kein Nazi gewesen. In diese Kategorie ehemaliger Nationalsozialisten, die man allzu schnell zu exkulpien bereit war, gehörte auch Franz Langoth. Politiker und Behörden taten sich schwer, eine allseits respektierte Persönlichkeit wie ihn zu verurteilen. Selbst integre Männer wie Ernst Koref wollten sich als NS-Täter eher SA-Schläger und KZ-Bewacher als den Bildungsbürger vom Typus eines Franz Langoth vorstellen. Jemandem (!) wie ihm (!) , dem stetig und bereitwillig attestiert wurde, auch in der NS-Zeit persönlich “ anständig ” geblieben zu sein, wollte man nicht für die Verbrechen des NS-Regimes mitverantwortlich machen. »

(Schuster, 1999 ; Seite 291.)

...

Adolf Hitler projette de faire de Linz une métropole et, à cette fin, il envisage la construction de nouveaux édifices :

Une série d'immeubles d'apparat sur les 2 rives du Danube ; un pont suspendu devant relier les 2 rives de celle-ci ; une maison du « NSDAP », énorme bâtiment avec une salle de réunion gigantesque et un campanile comprenant une crypte dans laquelle il voulait avoir sa sépulture ; un nouvel hôtel de ville ; un grand hôtel de luxe ; une série d'édifices culturels : un grand théâtre, une bibliothèque, un musée des armes, une galerie de tableaux (le « Führermuseum » consacré à l'art germanique) , un bâtiment d'exposition ; et de 2 monuments : l'un à la gloire de l'« Anschluß », l'autre d'Anton Bruckner.

Non loin de là, sur les hauteurs, devait s'élever la résidence où Hitler souhaitait se retirer dans sa vieillesse. Hitler rêvait de reproduire à Linz le panorama qu'à Budapest les siècles avaient modelé sur les 2 rives du Danube (Vienne était mal orientée selon lui, car tournant le dos au Danube) .

...

La spoliation d'œuvres d'art sous le 3e « Reich », désignée aussi en allemand par le terme « Raubkunst », est la dépossession massive et planifiée d'œuvres d'art par des agents du Parti nazi sous le 3e « Reich », en Allemagne et à travers l'Europe de 1933 à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Des services nazis de confiscation spécialement institués (telles les agences « Einsatzstab », « Reichsleiter », « Rosenberg ») , entreprennent, à partir de listes établies bien avant le déclenchement de la guerre, le pillage et la confiscation de collections publiques et privées dans tous les pays qu'ils occupent ainsi que la spoliation des Juifs qui commence en Allemagne, dès 1933. Des petites équipes en France, en Belgique et aux Pays-Bas vident entièrement tous les appartements juifs (au total 70,000 logements dont 38,000 à Paris) dans le cadre de la « Möbelaktion » : leurs objets sans valeur sont brûlés, leurs livres servant à alimenter la bibliothèque de la Haute-École de la « NSDAP » .

Organisée par le théoricien nazi Alfred Rosenberg, cette spoliation concerne les Juifs (la 1re collection visée en France est celle des Rothschild) mais aussi des musées et des collections privées dans tous les pays occupés. Les Nazis justifient ce pillage par le « Kunstschutz », principe de préservation du patrimoine artistique qui va de pair avec un projet de musée allemand gigantesque, le « Führermuseum » . Adolf Hitler souhaite le faire construire à Linz, ville qu'il considère comme la capitale de l'Empire. En fin de compte, ce projet ne verra pas le jour.

Certains États ou particuliers prennent des mesures pour évacuer leurs chefs-d'œuvre avant l'invasion des forces de l'Axe, tel le musée du Louvre, dont les collections sont en partie transférées au château de Valençay. Les Nazis utilisent le musée du « Jeu de Paume » comme dépôt central avant d'orienter les œuvres vers différentes destinations en Allemagne. Une grande partie de ce butin est transférée à la fin de la guerre dans 3 mines près de Salzbourg, la plus connue étant la mine de sel d'Altaussee avec plus de 2,000 pièces.

Rose Valland, attachée de conservation du musée du « Jeu de Paume », dresse un inventaire précis des œuvres qui transitent par le musée et essaye de connaître leurs destinations (en tête de liste, Hitler et son « Führermuseum », ainsi que la collection personnelle d'Hermann Göring), le nom des responsables des transferts, ainsi que le numéro des convois et des transporteurs. Le conservateur d'art, George L. Stout, persuade le commandement militaire allié de créer le « Monuments, Fine Arts, and Archives program », organisme américain qui est fondé en 1943. Ses membres, les « Monuments men », hommes ayant une formation de conservateur de musée, d'historien de l'art, d'architecte ou d'archiviste, sont initialement chargés de préserver des combats, les églises, musées et monuments nationaux au cours de la progression des Alliés puis, à la fin de la guerre, de retrouver les biens pillés par les Nazis et de les expertiser. La spoliation par le 3^e « Reich » est évaluée à plus de 5 millions de tableaux et de sculptures.

La destruction totale de l'art polonais est estimée à 20 milliards de dollars, ou 43 % de l'héritage culturel polonais.

La chute de Berlin se traduit par le pillage systématique de l'Allemagne occupée et des anciens territoires orientaux du « Reich » allemand par les Soviétiques, en guise d'indemnité de guerre.

En 1945, le capitaine Walter Farmer considéra que 20 % de l'art en Europe fut pillé par les Nazis et que 100,000 pièces ne furent pas retournées à leur propriétaire.

Les nombreuses destructions de patrimoine au cours de ce conflit sont à l'origine de la Convention pour la protection des biens culturels en cas de conflit armé, en 1954.

...

One of the last photographs of Adolf Hitler depicts him shortly before his suicide as he sits in the bunker of his Chancellery. While the Red Army advanced into the ruins of Berlin outside, he pondered a pompous architectural model of the Upper-Austrian provincial capital of Linz, the gigantic buildings illuminated by a sophisticated arrangement of spotlights : Linz in the morning sun, at midday, at sunset glow, and at night.

« No matter at what time, whether during the day or at night, whenever he had the opportunity during those weeks, he was sitting in front of this model », the architect Hermann Giesler reported, saying that Hitler stared at it as if at « a promised land into which we would gain entrance » .

Visitors to whom he showed the model, often at the most unusual hours of the night, were confused and horrified : the man who had reduced Europe to ashes and ruins had clearly lost his sense of reality and hardly noticed how many people were still dying in these last weeks, in his name, and according to his will, as he continued to refuse to capitulate and end the horror.

Hitler dreamed of Linz, his hometown, which he had appointed « the “ Führer's ” sister city » and had wanted to make the Greater German « Reich » 's cultural capital, the « most beautiful city on the Danube », the « metropolis », the petrified glorification of his person and his policies :

« Linz owes everything it has, and is yet to obtain to the “ Reich ”. Therefore, this city must become the carrier of the idea of the “ Reich ”. Every building in Linz should have the inscription : “ Gift from the German ' Reich ' ” » .

On the left-bank of the Danube, in Urfahr, opposite the old-part of town, a Party and administration center had been planned with an assembly area for 100,000 and grounds for celebrations accommodating 30,000 people, an exposition area with a Bismarck monument, and a Technical University. According to the plan, a « District center » (with a new City Hall ; the « Reich » Governor’s House ; the District and Party center ; and the Linz Community center) was to be built around a national commemorative site : Hitler’s parents’ tomb, with its steeple, visible from far away, whose chimes were to play (albeit not every day) a motif from Anton Bruckner’s « Romantic » Symphony (Symphony No. 4) . This steeple was planned to be higher than that of Vienna’s Saint-Stephen’s Cathedral. Thus, Hitler said, he was making-up for an old injustice ; for, to the Linzers’ vexation, during the construction of the neo-Gothic Linz cathedral, Vienna had reduced the height of the steeple « so that the Stephen’s Tower would remain the highest steeple in the country » . A monument « to the foundation of the Greater German Empire » was to be built too, along with a large stadium. Hitler told the Upper-Danube District director, August Eigruber :

« The stones for this will be shipped by the Mauthausen concentration camp. »

On the opposite side of the Danube, in « Alt-Linz » (the old-part of town) , a boulevard was to be built under arcades, « wider than the “ Ring ” Boulevard, in Vienna » . A hotel was to be constructed for more than 2,000 guests, with a direct subway connection to the train station ; there were also to be built the most modern hospitals and schools, among them an « Adolf Hitler School » , a District Music School, and a « Reich » Motor Flying School for the « Luftwaffe » . There were projects for model settlements for workers and artists, 2 homes for SS and SA invalids, new streets, and an access road to the « autobahn » . In order to make Linz rich, Hitler advanced industrialization, bringing steel and chemical factories to Linz. Transforming the farm-town into an industrial city was almost the only thing that was actually realized. The « Hermann Göring Factory » still exists as the Vöest factory.

The planned cultural center was to have metropolitan proportions, in particular the Linz Art Museum, which Hitler mentioned in his last will the day before his death :

« I collected the paintings in the collections I have bought over the years, never for private purposes, but always exclusively for enlarging a gallery in my hometown of Linz on the Danube. It would be my most fervent wish for this legacy to be realized. »

In fact, money for this project was always available, even when there was a shortage of foreign currency during the War. From April 1943 to March 1944 alone, Hitler purchased 881 works of art, among them 395 Dutch pieces from the 17th and 18th Centuries. By the end of June 1944, the Museum had cost 92.6 million « Reichsmark » .

Josef Gœbbels wrote in his diary :

« Linz costs us a lot of money. But it means so much to the “ Führer ”. And it probably is good too to support Linz as a cultural competitor to Vienna. »

For, as Hitler remarked emphatically :

« I won't give Vienna a pfennig, and the “ Reich ” won't give it anything either. »

The most distinguished pieces for the Linz Museum were requisitioned from private galleries, museums, and churches in the parts of Europe Hitler's army had occupied - for example, the « Veit Stoß Altar » in Cracow, or the « Van Eyck Altar » in the cathedral of Ghent. Hitler derived particular satisfaction from transferring holdings from Vienna, for example from such « un-German » Viennese collections as those of Baron Nathaniel Rothschild. The formerly Imperial Art History Museum also gave pieces to Linz, which, as Hitler remarked in 1942 :

« His dear Viennese didn't like at all ; his dear Viennese, whom he knows so well after all, were so stodgy that when he was looking at some of the requisitioned Rembrandts, they tried to let him know in their genial way that all genuine paintings should really remain in Vienna, but that they would be glad to let galleries in Linz or Innsbruck have paintings by anonymous Masters. When he decided differently, it hit the Viennese between the eyes. »

Hitler planned to spend his retirement on Mount Frein above the old-part of town in a building modeled after an Upper-Austrian farm :

« I climbed these rocks when I was young. On this hill-top, looking over the Danube, I day-dreamed. This is where I want to live when I'm old. And : I won't take anyone along except Miss Braun ; Miss Braun and my dog. »

Albert Speer (after 1945, to be sure) ironically characterized Hitler's exaggerated love for Vienna as a « provincial mentality » , adding that :

« Hitler always remained one of the small-town people, an insecure stranger in the large metropolises. While he was almost obsessively thinking and planning in huge proportions, it was in a town like Linz, where he had gone to school and where everything was on a manageable scale, that he felt at home socially. »

The nature of this love, Speer claimed, was « one of escape » .

Yet, the point here is a lot more than the contrast between province and capital : it is the nationally homogenous, « German » Linz on the one side, and multi-national Vienna on the other. Furthermore, Hitler experienced the rural character of the provincial town as honest and rooted in the soil compared to the sophisticated, intellectual, and self-confident metropolis. Thus, Gœbbels, functioning as his Master's mouth-piece, tee marked after a visit to Linz :

« Genuine German men. Not Viennese scoundrels. »

From a biographical perspective, Linz represented for Hitler the back-drop for an orderly, clean, « petit bourgeois » time of his youth, which he spent with his beloved mother, whereas Vienna was witness to lonely, unsuccessful, and wretched years. However, most important from a political angle was Hitler's goal to dethrone the Hapsburg Empire's old capital and to subjugate it to the German capital of Berlin. Vienna, he said, « exuded a huge, even gigantic fluidum ». Therefore, it was « a tremendous task to break Vienna's cultural preponderance in the Alpine and Danube districts » .

...

Nazi plunder refers to art theft and other items stolen as a result of the organized looting of European countries during the time of the 3rd « Reich » by agents acting on behalf of the ruling Nazi Party of Germany. Plundering occurred from 1933 until the end of World War II, particularly by military units known as the « Kunstschutz » , although most plunder was acquired during the War. In addition to gold, silver and currency, cultural items of great significance were stolen, including paintings, ceramics, books, and religious treasures. Although most of these items were recovered by agents of the « Monuments, Fine Arts, and Archives program » (MFAA) , affectionately referred to as the « Monuments Men » , on behalf of the Allies immediately following the War, many are still missing. There is an international effort under way to identify Nazi plunder that still remains unaccounted for, with the aim of ultimately returning the items to the rightful owners, their families or their respective countries.

Adolf Hitler was an unsuccessful artist who was denied admission to the Vienna Academy of Fine-Arts. Nonetheless, he thought of himself as a connoisseur of the arts and, in « Mein Kampf » , he ferociously attacked modern art as degenerate, including : Cubism ; Futurism ; and Dadaism ; all of which he considered the product of a decadent 20th Century society. When, in 1933, Hitler became Chancellor of Germany, he enforced his æsthetic ideal on the nation. The types of art that were favored amongst the Nazi Party were Classical portraits and landscapes by Old Masters, particularly those of Germanic origin. Modern art that did not match this was dubbed degenerate art by the 3rd « Reich » , and all that was found in Germany's State museums was to be sold or destroyed. With the sums raised, the « Führer » 's objective was to establish the European Art Museum, in Linz. Other Nazi dignitaries, like « Reichsmarschall » Hermann Göring and Foreign Affairs minister von Ribbentrop, were also intent on taking advantage of German military conquests to increase their private art collections.

The art dealers Hildebrand Gurlitt, Karl Buchholz, Ferdinand Moeller and Bernhard Boehmer set-up shop in « Schloß Niederschonhausen » , just outside Berlin, to sell the near 16,000 cache of paintings and sculptures which Hitler and Göring removed from the walls of German museums, in 1937-1938. They were 1st put on display in the « Haus der Kunst » , in Munich, on 19 July 1937, with the Nazi leaders inviting public mockery by 2 million visitors who came to view the condemned modern art in the Degenerate art exhibition. Propagandist Josef Göbbels in a radio broadcast called Germany's degenerate artists « garbage » . Hitler opened the « Haus der Kunst » exhibition with a speech. In it, he described German art as suffering « a great and fatal illness » .

Hildebrand Gurlitt and his colleagues did not have much success with their sales, mainly because art labelled « rubbish » had small appeal. So, on 20 March 1939, they set fire to 1,004 paintings and sculptures and 3,825 watercolours, drawings and prints in the courtyard of the Berlin Fire Department, an act of infamy similar to their earlier well-known book burnings. The propaganda act raised the attention they hoped. The Basel Museum, in Switzerland, arrived with 50,000 Swiss francs to spend. Shocked art-lovers came to buy. What is unknown after these sales is how many paintings were kept by Gurlitt, Buchholz, Moeller and Boehmer and sold by them to Switzerland and America (ships crossed the Atlantic from Lisbon) for personal gain.

While the Nazis were in power, they plundered cultural property from every territory they occupied. This was conducted in a systematic manner with organizations specifically created to determine which public and private collections were most valuable to the Nazi Regime. Some of the objects were ear-marked for Hitler's never realized the « Führermuseum », some objects went to other high-ranking officials such as Hermann Göring, while other objects were traded to fund Nazi activities.

In 1940, an organization known as the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg für die Besetzten Gebiete » (The « Reichsleiter » Rosenberg Institute for the Occupied Territories) , or ERR, was formed, headed for Alfred Rosenberg by Gerhard Utikal. The 1st operating unit, the western branch for France, Belgium and the Netherlands, called the « Dienststelle Westen » (Western Agency) , was located in Paris. The chief of this « Dienststelle » was Kurt von Behr. Its original purpose was to collect Jewish and Free-masonic books and documents, either for destruction, or for removal to Germany for further « study » . However, late in 1940, Hermann Göring, who in fact controlled the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , issued an order that effectively changed the mission of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , mandating it to seize « Jewish » art collections and other objects. The War loot had to be collected in a central place in Paris, the Museum « Jeu de Paume » . At this collection point worked art historians and other personnel who inventoried the loot before sending it to Germany. Göring also commanded that the loot would 1st be divided between Hitler and himself. Hitler later ordered that all confiscated works of art were to be made directly available to him. From the end of 1940 to the end of 1942, Göring traveled 20 times to Paris. In the Museum « Jeu de Paume » , art dealer Bruno Lohse staged 20 expositions of the newly looted art objects, especially for Göring, from which Göring selected at least 594 pieces for his own collection. Göring made Lohse his liaison-officer and installed him in the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , in March 1941, as the deputy leader of this unit. Items which Hitler and Göring did not want were made available to other Nazi leaders. Under Rosenberg and Göring's leadership, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » seized 21,903 art objects from German-occupied countries.

Other Nazi looting organizations included the « Sonderauftrag Linz » , the organization run by the art historian Hans Posse, which was particularly in charge of assembling the works for the « Führermuseum » , the « Dienststelle Mühlmann » , operated by Kajetan Mühlmann, which Göring also controlled and operated primarily in the Netherlands, Belgium, and a « Sonderkommando » Kuensberg connected to the minister of foreign affairs Joachim von Ribbentrop, which operated 1st in France, then in Russia and North-Africa. In Western Europe, with the advancing German troops, were elements of the « von Ribbentrop Battalion » , named after Joachim von Ribbentrop. These men were responsible for entering private and institutional libraries in the occupied countries and removing any materials of interest to the Germans, especially items of scientific, technical or other informational value.

Art collections from prominent Jewish families, including the Rothschilds, the Rosenbergs, the Wildensteins and the Schloß Family were the targets of confiscations because of their significant value. Also, Jewish art dealers sold art to German organizations - often under duress, e.g. the art dealerships of Jacques Goudstikker, Benjamin and Nathan Katz and Kurt Walter Bachstiz. Also, non-Jewish art dealers sold art to the Germans, e.g. the art dealers De Boer and Hoogendijk, in the Netherlands.

By the end of the war, the 3rd « Reich » amassed hundreds of thousands of cultural objects.

To investigate and estimate Nazi plunder in the USSR, during 1941 through 1945, the « Soviet State Extraordinary Commission for Ascertaining and Investigating the Crimes Committed by the German-Fascist Invaders and Their Accomplices » was formed on 2 November 1942.

Alfred Rosenberg commanded the so-called « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg (ERR) für die Besetzten Gebiete », which was responsible for collecting art, books, and cultural objects from invaded countries, and also transferred their captured library collections back to Berlin during the retreat from Russia. « In their search for “ research materials ” « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » teams and the “ Wehrmacht ” visited 375 archival institutions, 402 museums, 531 institutes, and 957 libraries in Eastern Europe alone. » The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » also operated in the early days of the « blitzkrieg » of the Low-Countries. This caused some confusion about authority, priority, and the chain of command among the German Army, the von Rippentropp Battalion and the « Gestapo », and as a result of personal looting among the Army officers and troops. These « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » teams were, however, very effective. One account estimates that, from the Soviet Union alone, « 100,000 geographical maps were taken on ideological grounds, for academic research, as means for political, geographical and economic information on Soviet cities and regions, or as collector's items ».

After the occupation of Poland by German forces, in September 1939, the Nazi regime attempted to exterminate its upper-classes as well as its culture. Thousands of art objects were looted, as the Nazis systematically carried-out a plan of looting prepared even before the start of hostilities. 25 museums and many other facilities were destroyed. The total cost of German Nazi theft and destruction of Polish art is estimated at 20 billion dollars, or an estimated 43 % of Polish cultural heritage ; over 516,000 individual art pieces were looted, including 2,800 paintings by European painters ; 11,000 paintings by Polish painters ; 1,400 sculptures ; 75,000 manuscripts ; 25,000 maps ; 90,000 books, including over 20,000 printed before 1800 ; and hundreds of thousands of other items of artistic and historical value. Germany still has much Polish material looted during World War II. For decades, there have been mostly futile negotiations between Poland and Germany concerning the return of the looted property.

After Hitler became Chancellor, he made plans to transform his home city of Linz, Austria into the 3rd « Reich » 's capital city for the arts. Hitler hired architects to work from his own designs to build several galleries and museums, which would collectively be known as the « Führermuseum ». Hitler wanted to fill his museum with the greatest art treasures in the world, and believed that most of the world's finest art belonged to Germany after having been looted during the Napoleonic and 1st World wars.

The Hermann Göring collection, a personal collection of « Reichsmarschall » Hermann Göring, was another large collection including confiscated property, consisted of approximately 50 % of works of art confiscated from the enemies of the « Reich » . Assembled in large measure by art dealer Bruno Lohse, Göring's adviser and « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » representative in Paris, in 1945, the collection included over 2,000 individual pieces including more than 300 paintings. The U.S. National Archives and Records Administration's Consolidated Interrogation Report No. 2 states that Göring never crudely looted, instead he always managed « to find a way of giving at least the appearance of honesty, by a token payment or promise thereof to the confiscation authorities. Although he and his agents never had an official connection with the German confiscation organizations, they nevertheless used them to the fullest extent possible. »

The 3rd « Reich » amassed hundreds of thousands of objects from occupied nations and stored them in several key locations, such as the « Musée du Jeu de Paume » , in Paris, and the Nazi headquarters in Munich. As the Allied forces gained advantage in the War and bombed Germany's cities and historic institutions, Germany « began storing the artworks in salt mines and caves for protection from Allied bombing raids. These mines and caves offered the appropriate humidity and temperature conditions for artworks. » Well-known repositories of this kind were mines in Merkers, Altaussee and Siegen. These mines were not only used for the storage of looted art but also of art that had been in Germany and Austria before the beginning of the Nazi rule. Degenerate art was legally banned by the Nazis from entering Germany, and so, ones designated were held in what was called the « Martyr's Room » at the « Jeu de Paume » . Much of Paul Rosenberg's professional dealership and personal collection were so subsequently designated by the Nazis. Following Josef Goebels earlier private decree to sell these degenerate works for foreign currency to fund the building of the « Führermuseum » and the wider War effort, Hermann Göring personally appointed a series of « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » approved dealers to liquidate these assets and, then, pass the funds to swell his personal art collection, including Hildebrand Gurlitt. With the looted degenerate art sold onwards via Switzerland, Rosenberg's collection was scattered across Europe. Today, some 70 of his paintings are missing.

The Allies created special commissions, such as the « Monuments, Fine-Arts and Archives » (MFAA) organization to help protect famous European monuments from destruction and, after the War, to travel to once-Nazi-occupied territories to find Nazi art repositories. In 1944 and 1945, one of the greatest challenges for the « Monuments Men » was to keep Allied forces from plundering and « taking artworks and sending them home to friends and family » . When « off-limits » warning signs failed to protect the artworks, the « Monuments Men » started to mark the storage places with white tape, which was used by Allied troops as a warning sign for unexploded mines. They recovered thousands of objects, many of which were pillaged by the Nazis.

The Allies found these artworks in over 1,050 repositories, in Germany and Austria, at the end of World War II. In summer 1945, Captain Walter Farmer became the collecting point's 1st director. The 1st shipment of artworks arriving at Wiesbaden Collection Point included cases of antiquities, Egyptian art, Islamic artefacts, and paintings from the « Kaiser Friedrich Museum » . The collecting point also received materials from the « Reichsbank » and Nazi-looted, Polish, liturgical collections. At its height, Wiesbaden stored, identified, and restituted approximately 700,000 individual objects including paintings and sculptures, mainly to keep them away from the Soviet Army and War-time reparations.

The Allies collected the artworks and stored them in collecting points, in particular, the Central Collection Point in Munich, until they could be returned. The identifiable works of art, that had been acquired by the Germans during the Nazi rule, were returned to the countries from which they were taken. It was up to the governments of each nation if and under which circumstances they would return the objects to the original owners.

The Linz File : Hitler's Plunder of Europe's Art

The story of the looting and recovery of thousands of works of art from European galleries and private collections, all to fulfill Adolf Hitler's dream of building a great art gallery in his home-town of Linz, Austria.

Author : Charles De Jaeger.

Hard-cover : 240 pages, photos.

Publisher : John Wiley & Sons Canada, Limited (1 January 1981) .

ISBN-10 : 0471799408

ISBN-13 : 978-0471799405

ASIN : B00A2MVJRY

Publisher : Webb & Bower, Exeter, England (1981) .

Description : 24 cm ; 192 pages ; illustrations.

Bibliography : pages 181-185.

ISBN : 9780906671306, 9780906671302

Publisher : Magnolia (5 October 1981) .

ISBN-10 : 0906671302

ISBN-13 : 978-0906671306

Product Dimensions : 23.4 x 16.2 x 2.6 cm.

Shipping Weight : 540 g

...

Albert Speer :

« Now that he was giving the orders, Hitler said, he would help his native city win its proper place. His program for the transformation of Linz into a “ metropolis ” envisioned a number of impressive public buildings, on both sides of the Danube. A suspension bridge was to connect the 2 banks. The apex of his plan was a large “ Gau-Haus ” (District Headquarters) for the National-Socialist Party, with a huge meeting-hall and a bell tower (playing Bruckner’s 4th) . There would be a crypt in this tower for his own burial place. Other impressive monuments along the shore were to be a town-hall, 1 large theater, 3 military headquarters, 1 stadium, 1 picture gallery, 1 library, 1 museum of armaments, and 1 exhibition building, as well as a monument celebrating the liberation of Austria, in 1938, and another glorifying Anton Bruckner. The design for the picture gallery and the stadium was to be assigned to me. The stadium would be situated on a hill overlooking the city. Hitler’s residence for his old age would be located nearby, also on a height.

Hitler sometimes went into raptures over the shorelines in Budapest which had grown-up on both sides of the Danube, in the course of Centuries. It was his ambition to transform Linz into a German Budapest. Vienna was oriented all wrong, he would comment in this connection, since it merely turned its back to the Danube. The planners had neglected to incorporate the river in their design. Thanks to what he would be doing with the river in Linz, the city might, some day, rival Vienna. No doubt, he was not altogether serious in making such remarks ; he would be tempted into them by his dislike for Vienna, which would spontaneously break-out from time to time. But there were many other times when he would exclaim over the brilliant stroke of city planning accomplished in Vienna, by the use of the former fortifications. »

...

Adolf Hitler had ambitious plans for Linz, the city where he grew-up.

He wanted to make the town on the Danube into one of the 5 « Führer » cities of the 3rd « Reich » , along with Berlin, Hamburg, Nuremberg and Munich.

Linz is now examining this page of its past in an exhibition called the « “ Führer ” 's Capital of Culture » . Martin Heller, the artistic director of « Linz 2009 » , says there was an obligation to tackle the city's Nazi history.

« We want to reflect back and show how cultural and political ambitions went together in the Nazi time. » , he says. « Talking about culture always means talking about politics. »

During the Nazi era, Linz was transformed from a small-town into an industrial city, but Hitler's ambitions for his home-town went far beyond that.

Exhibits at the Castle Museum (« Linzer Schloß Museum ») show some of the detailed designs commissioned by Hitler :

A series of grandiose buildings, including a monumental Theatre, an Opera House and an Adolf Hitler Hotel, all surrounded by huge boulevards and a parade ground.

Few of these extravagant plans were realized, but the fantasy stayed with Hitler, right-up to his final days in the Berlin « Bunker » , in 1945.

Photographs in the exhibition show Hitler poring over intricate models of the city.

On display are plans and diagrams, but the organisers (who are concerned not to encourage nostalgia for the Nazi regime) have not recreated the models, which are believed to have been burnt in 1945.

However, there are some items that are not often on display, including some Nazi propaganda material and portraits of Hitler.

The director of the Upper-Austrian State Museums, Peter Assmann, acknowledges the exhibit treads a fine line, but he rejects charges of glorifying Hitler's memory.

« I don't see any glorification of Hitler in the exhibition. Hitler is fact, so we just face this fact and we face it with many arguments, with a lot of information about that time. »

« People walk through the exhibition and they get impulses for discussion. » , Mr Assmann says.

The high-point of Hitler's Linz was to be a huge Art Museum to rival galleries like the « Louvre » or the « Uffizi » .

The organisers say they want to spark a debate about Linz's Nazi past.

It was to be filled with artworks looted across Europe by the Nazis from museums and private collections, many of them Jewish.

Historian Tina Walzer is concerned that the exhibition has not tackled this subject in enough detail :

« The Nazis looted art from all over Europe, from France, from the Netherlands, from Poland, from Italy, from Austria, from Hungary, gathering this huge mass of very valuable paintings, but you don't see any of this in the exhibition and I think that is a pity. »

« This is a missed chance. » , Ms. Walzer says.

While the 1st part of the exhibition focuses on Hitler's cultural and political planning for Linz, the 2nd part looks at the impact of National-Socialism on art, music and literature in the region.

It explores the cult of Anton Bruckner and shows costumes from productions of Operas by Richard Wagner and Operettas by Franz Lehár - favourites with Hitler.

For some local visitors, confronting the past can be unsettling :

« I am upset by the delusional madness of these plans. It would have been a catastrophe. The culture that is encouraged now is free - the culture back then was dictatorship » , says Heinz, after visiting the exhibition with his wife.

Ingrid, who was a child in Linz during the 3rd « Reich » , says the exhibition reflects her own memories of the period :

« I found the exhibition to be very informative and correct. It objectively shows the period as it was back then, because, up to now, many inaccuracies have been put about. »

The organizers say they want to spark debate, but more than 60 years on, Hitler's legacy is still a very difficult and sensitive topic.

...

Linz is the 3rd largest city of Austria and capital of the State of Upper-Austria (« Oberösterreich ») . Adolf Hitler was born in the border town of « Braunau am Inn » but moved to Linz in his childhood. Hitler spent most of his youth in the Linz area, from 1898 until 1907, when he left for Vienna. The family lived 1st in the village of Leonding on the outskirts of town, and then on the « Humboldtstraße » , in Linz. After elementary education in Leonding, Hitler was enrolled in the « Realschule » (High-School) in Linz with the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein. To the end of his life, Hitler considered Linz to be his « Home Town » , and envisioned extensive architectural schemes for it, wanting it to become the main cultural centre of the 3rd « Reich » .

...

Adolf Hitler va esquisser un monument (une espèce de colonne de Trajan) en l'honneur de Bruckner à Linz, sa future capitale culturelle. Il rêvait aussi d'y construire un carillon (clocher) qui ne jouerait qu'un thème de la 4e Symphonie. Il va créer le « Bruckner Orchester » du « Reich » , déterminé à en faire l'un des meilleurs du monde.

Adolf Hitler projette de faire de Linz une métropole et, à cette fin, il envisage la construction de nouveaux édifices : une série d'immeubles d'apparat sur les 2 rives du Danube (un pont suspendu devant relier les 2 rives de celle-ci) , d'une maison du NSDAP : un énorme bâtiment avec une salle de réunion gigantesque et un campanile comprenant une crypte dans laquelle il voulait avoir sa sépulture, un nouvel Hôtel de ville, un grand hôtel de luxe, un grand théâtre, une bibliothèque, un musée des armes, une galerie de tableaux (le « Führermuseum ») , un gigantesque musée consacré à l'art germanique) , un bâtiment d'exposition et de 2 monuments, l'un à la gloire de l' « Anschluß » , l'autre d'Anton Bruckner ; non loin de là, sur les hauteurs, devait s'élever la résidence où Hitler souhaitait se retirer dans sa vieillesse. Hitler rêvait de reproduire à Linz le panorama qu'à Budapest les siècles avaient modelé sur les 2 rives du Danube (Vienne était mal orientée selon lui car tournait le dos au Danube) .

Pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, Linz était un centre industriel majeur, qui produisait des composés chimiques et de l'acier pour la machine de guerre nazie. Plusieurs usines avaient été démontées et transférées depuis la Tchécoslovaquie récemment occupée et ré-assemblées à Linz. Le complexe de camps de Mauthausen-Gusen, le dernier camp de concentration nazi à être libéré, est localisé autour de Linz, avec pour principal camp Mauthausen à peine à 30 kilomètres.

Après la guerre, le Danube, qui traverse l'est de la ville, séparant le district Urfahr du nord du reste de Linz, sert de frontière entre les zones d'occupation soviétique et américaine.

Linz : la Cité parrainée par le « Führer »

(Linz - « Patenstadt des Führers »)

Warum hat Linz im Nationalsozialismus eine besondere Bedeutung ?

Adolf Hitler ist in Oberösterreich geboren und aufgewachsen. Deshalb spielt Oberdonau als « Heimatgau des Führers » in der nationalsozialistischen Ideologie, Propaganda und Politik eine wichtige Rolle. Besonders viel liegt Hitler an den Plänen, die Landeshauptstadt Linz sowohl wirtschaftlich als auch kulturell zu einer der bedeutendsten Städte des Deutschen Reiches auszubauen.

« Heimatgau des Führers »

Nach dem « Anschluß » 1938 wird die oberösterreichische Volkskunde-Zeitschrift « Heimatgaue » in « Heimatgau » umgetauft, aus Stolz darüber, daß der « Führer » in diesem Gau « dem deutschen Volk geschenkt wurde » . « Eine wahrhaft weltgeschichtliche Stunde für Heimat und Welt schlug, als Adolf Hitler auf unserem Boden ins Leben trat » , schreibt Rudolf Lenk, der oberösterreichische Landesrat für Erziehung, 1940 in einem Band über Oberdonau. Hinter dem Kult um die « Heimat des Führers » stehen politische Absichten :

Das Land erhofft sich mehr Fördermittel, und die oberösterreichische Bevölkerung soll sich ganz besonders mit dem Nationalsozialismus identifizieren. Im Kunst- und Literaturgeschichtsbuch « Unser Oberdonau » wird die innige Verbundenheit der Oberösterreicher und Oberösterreicherinnen mit ihrem Boden und dem deutschen Volk beschworen ; sie folgen, so wird behauptet, dem « Geheimnis ihres Blutes » und spüren, daß ein Leben « außerhalb der Volksgemeinschaft » « nicht denkbar und nicht möglich » ist. Adalbert Stifter, Franz Stelzhamer und Anton Bruckner erscheinen im Buch als die großen, heimatverbundenen « Söhne » des Landes, bevor die Lebensstationen des bewunderten « Führers » nachgezeichnet werden : Braunau, Fischlham, Lambach, Leonding, Linz und Steyr. Insbesondere die Geburtsstadt Braunau und Leonding, wo sich das Grab von Hitlers Eltern befindet, gelten als Pilgerstätten. « Das Geburtshaus des „ Führers „ : ein Heiligtum wie Mariazell und so. Sie glauben gar net, wie verrückt das war » , erinnert sich der Braunauer Stadtpfarrer Johann Ludwig nach 1945.

Provinzstadt - « Patenstadt » - « Führerstadt »

Viel mehr jedoch als seiner Geburtsstadt Braunau fühlt sich Adolf Hitler der Landeshauptstadt Linz nahe, in der er einen wichtigen Abschnitt seiner Jugend verbracht hat. Die Stadt beeinflusst um die Wende vom 19. zum 20. Jahrhundert die politische Einstellung des heranwachsenden Hitler. In Linz ist der Deutschnationalismus stark vertreten, und der Realschüler begeistert sich, wie viele seiner Mitschüler, für die Alldeutschen. Sie verlangen den Zusammenschluß der deutschsprachigen Gebiete der Monarchie mit dem Deutschen Reich. Angeheizt wird die deutschnationale Stimmung in Linz durch die geschürte Angst vor dem Zustrom tschechischer Saisonarbeiter. Linz, eine « fast einheitlich deutschsprachige Stadt » , führt in diesen Jahren einen propagandistischen « Kampf gegen die Slawisierung » . Beim jungen Adolf Hitler setzt sich das positive Bild von Linz als « deutscher » und bodenständiger Provinzstadt fest - im Gegensatz zur multinationalen und intellektuellen Hauptstadt Wien, die er später verabscheut. In Linz nehmen auch die Lebensträume des Jugendlichen ihren Anfang. Nach dem gescheiterten Besuch der Realschule lebt er in Linz zwei Jahre lang nur für seine künstlerischen Neigungen. Im Linzer Landestheater erfasst ihn die Faszination für die Opern Richard Wagners, in denen er deutsches Nationalbewußtsein mit musikalischer Wucht ausgedrückt findet. Sich selbst sieht der junge Adolf Hitler als bildenden Künstler, dem eine große Zukunft bevorsteht.

Nach dem « Anschluß » hegt Hitler den persönlichen Ehrgeiz, die Stadt seines politischen Erwachens und seiner Jugendträume zu einer nationalsozialistischen Musterstadt umzugestalten. Bereits am 13. März 1938 übernimmt er die Patenschaft für Linz. Sofort beginnen die Planungen für einen gigantischen Ausbau der Stadt. 1940 wird Linz, neben Berlin, München, Nürnberg und Hamburg, als « Jugendstadt des Führers » zu einer der fünf bevorzugten « Führerstädte » des Deutschen Reiches ernannt.

Welche Pläne verfolgt Adolf Hitler mit Linz ?

Durch die Gründung von Großindustrie, die Schaffung eines Verkehrsknotenpunktes und die Errichtung von Wohnbauten soll die Stadt florieren und wachsen. Doch das Herzstück von Adolf Hitlers Linz-Phantasien ist der Wunsch, aus Linz « die schönste Stadt an der Donau » zu machen, wie Propagandaminister Josef Goebbels 1941 in seinem Tagebuch festhält. Linz soll zu einer kulturellen Metropole im Großdeutschen Reich aufsteigen, die mit ihren Kunstschätzen und ihrer monumentalen nationalsozialistischen Architektur Wien in den Schatten stellt.

Architektonische Träume und Alpträume

Die Planungen zur Neugestaltung von Linz konzentrieren sich auf die Donauufer und auf den Süden der Stadt. Auf vorhandene Gebäude wird dabei kaum Rücksicht genommen. Adolf Hitler selbst gibt die Ideen vor, prüft die Pläne in allen Details und trifft die Entscheidungen. Er bedient sich vieler berühmter Architekten des Deutschen Reiches. Führende Rollen, oft in Konkurrenz zueinander, spielen Albert Speer, der als Hitlers Lieblingsarchitekt gilt und mächtige Ämter bekleidet, Roderich Fick, der 1939 Reichsbaurat für Linz wird, und Hermann Giesler, dem Hitler ab 1943 den Großteil der Planungen überträgt. Im Streit um Flächenwidmung, Baustoffe und architektonische Gestaltung mischt sich immer stärker Gauleiter August Eigruber ein. Die Stadt Linz hingegen bleibt in ihrem Mitspracherecht sehr beschränkt.

Hitler möchte, daß Linz beiderseits des Flusses eine überwältigende Kulisse in nationalsozialistischer Monumental- und Blockbauweise bietet, mit der « die Macht des Staates in all seinen Belangen wie Partei, Militär, Wissenschaft, Freizeit und nationalem Geschichtsbewusstsein demonstriert » wird. Die einzelnen Menschen sollen sich angesichts dieser Bauten wie kleine und unbedeutende Ameisen vorkommen.

An Stelle des Schlosses erhebt sich nach den Plänen Hitlers Alterssitz in Form eines mächtigen Vierkanthofes. Von dort bietet sich ein freier Blick hinunter auf die Donau, auf die Nibelungenbrücke und die Brückenkopfgebäude, die bis Anfang der 1940er Jahre tatsächlich errichtet werden. Am Linzer Flußufer sind weiter ein vornehmes Donauhotel, ein langgestrecktes Einkaufszentrum und ein KdF-Hotelurm vorgesehen, um den Fremdenverkehr anzukurbeln. Bei diesem Hotel soll eine Hängebrücke die Donau überspannen. Das Ufer flußabwärts zwischen der Hängebrücke und der dritten geplanten Donaubrücke, der Bismarckbrücke, ist den riesigen Vierkantern für die Verwaltung der Hermann-Göring-Werke und der Technischen Universität vorbehalten. Weiter donauabwärts entsteht nach der Flußbiegung der neue Donauhafen. Überquert man bei der Universität (so die Planung) die Bismarckbrücke Richtung Urfahr, gelangt man zu einem gewaltigen runden Kuppelbau, der Otto von Bismarck, dem Gründer des Deutschen Kaiserreiches, gewidmet ist. Auf der Urfahrer Seite flußaufwärts reihen sich die eintönigen Blöcke eines Heereskommandos und eines Militärmuseums aneinander, ehe man, an einer großen Veranstaltungshalle vorbei, eine terrassierte Parkanlage mit Ausstellungspavillons betritt. Nach der Hängebrücke folgt am Urfahrer Ufer das politische Zentrum von Linz und Oberdonau : die gigantische Gauanlage. Die Gauhalle, « eine Art nationalsozialistische Basilika » , soll 30.000 Menschen fassen. An ihrer Seite ragt direkt am Fluß ein 160 meters hoher Glockenturm in den Himmel, das neue Wahrzeichen von Linz. Im Sockel soll er das Grab von Hitlers Eltern beherbergen. Daneben öffnet sich zur Donau hin ein Platz, auf dem sich 100.000 Menschen versammeln können. Begrenzt wird der Platz vom Herrschaftssitz des Reichstatthalters nahe der Nibelungenbrücke. Ein turmartiges NSDAP-Gebäude und das Rathaus ergänzen den Urfahrer Brückenkopf. Flußaufwärts ziehen sich Wohnblöcke bis zu den Urfahrer Höhen, wo hoch über der Donau der ausgedehnte Komplex einer Adolf-Hitler-Schule, einer Internatsschule für künftige Parteifunktionäre, thront.

Am südlichen Ende der Landstraße, auf der Blumau, befindet sich der zweite Brennpunkt der Planung. Dort sollen ein Opernhaus, ein Kunstmuseum, eine Bibliothek und eine Konzerthalle entstehen. Von diesem Kulturzentrum führt nach den Entwürfen die etwa einen Kilometer lange und 60 meters breite Prachtstraße « Zu den Lauben » Richtung Süden zum Verkehrszentrum, wo der neue Personenbahnhof und die Einmündung des Autobahnzubringers geplant sind. Für den Bahnhof verlangt Hitler eine Anlage mit 16 Gleisen und mit einer Station für die Breitspurbahn, die die Atlantikküste mit dem Ural verbinden soll. Auch entlang dieser neuen Achse von Linz sehen die Pläne mächtige Baublöcke vor. Durch breite Gehsteige unter Arkaden gelangt man zu Restaurants, Museen, Geschäften und Büros. Flankiert wird die Prunkstraße von einem Schauspielhaus und einem weitläufigen Park bis zum Froschberg.

Eine Untergrundbahn soll vom Bahnhof zum KdF-Hotel an der Donau verkehren. Ungelöst bleibt jedoch die Straßenverbindung zwischen beiden monumentalen Anlagen am Donauufer und im Süden. Erwogen wird neben Ringstraßen beiderseits des Zentrums auch der direkte Durchbruch von der Nibelungenbrücke zur Blumau, der die Zerstörung der historischen Landstraße nach sich ziehen würde.

Auswirkungen auf das Linzer Umland

Wegen der überdimensionalen Planungen für Industrie, Verkehr, Wohnbau, Verwaltung und Kultur und der beabsichtigten Verdreifachung der Stadtbevölkerung auf 350.000 Menschen ist eine Vergrößerung des Stadtgebietes notwendig. Sankt Magdalena im Norden und Ebelsberg im Süden werden eingemeindet, doch die weitere Ausdehnung der Stadt nach Westen und nach Süden kommt nicht zustande. Persönliche Bezüge Adolf Hitlers zu Nachbargemeinden bilden Hindernisse. Leonding soll als Hitler-Gedenkstätte erhalten bleiben, und Hitler stoppt die Planungen für einen Industriegürtel von Linz bis Asten, weil er das idyllische Hügelland um Sankt Florian, wo der von ihm verehrte Komponist Anton Bruckner gewirkt hat, nicht verbauen will. 1941 wird das Stift Sankt Florian beschlagnahmt. Heinrich Glasmeier, der Reichsintendant des Deutschen Rundfunks, übernimmt das Stift, um dort im Sinne Hitlers eine « Bruckner-Weihestätte » als « Mittelpunkt ernster musikalischer Kultur nicht nur für Oberdonau, sondern für das Großdeutsche Reich, ja für ganz Europa » einzurichten. Sankt Florian ist für die Zeit nach dem Krieg als Reichssender für ernste Musik vorgesehen. Zu diesem Zweck wird 1943 unter der Aufsicht Glasmeiers ein Bruckner-Orchester mit hervorragenden deutschen Musikern gegründet. Trotz der kriegsbedingten Engpässe stellt Hitler viel Geld dafür zur Verfügung, da er dieses Orchester als zukünftigen Bestandteil der Linzer Hochkultur betrachtet. 1944 tritt das Bruckner-Orchester erstmals in Wien auf. Der Rundfunk überträgt, das Publikum ist begeistert und Hitler läßt daraufhin den Namen in « Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester des Großdeutschen Rundfunks » ändern. Das Orchester aus Sankt Florian konzertiert, teilweise unter der Leitung Wilhelm Furtwänglers und Herbert von Karajans, bis Anfang April 1945 in Wien, Graz, Salzburg, Sankt Florian und Linz und nimmt insgesamt fast 100 Werke auf Band auf. Einige Monate nach Kriegsende wird das Orchester aufgelöst.

« Sonderauftrag Linz »

Während sich das bereits bestehende oberösterreichische Landesmuseum der regionalen Kunst und der Volkskunde widmen soll, ist für das geplante neue Kunstmuseum, auch Linzer « Führermuseum » genannt, eine Gemäldesammlung von Weltgeltung vorgesehen. 1939 erteilt Adolf Hitler dem Dresdner Museumsdirektor Hans Posse den « Sonderauftrag Linz » zur Sammlung auserlesener Kunstwerke. « Während einer Dreiviertelstunde entwickelt er seinen Plan für das neue Linzer Museum. Das Museum seiner Heimatstadt, das er als Gegengewicht zu den großen industriellen Plänen von Linz neben anderen kulturellen Einrichtungen schaffen will », notiert Posse nach dem Gespräch mit Hitler in sein Tagebuch. Posse und sein Nachfolger Hermann Voß bauen die Sammlung vor allem mittels Kunstraub auf. Sie bedienen sich bei den 1938 in Wien enteigneten Kunstsammlungen aus jüdischem Besitz und bei geraubten Kunstwerken in Frankreich. Für den Erwerb von Gemälden im Kunsthandel stehen enorme Summen zur Verfügung, noch 1944 mehrere Millionen Reichsmark im Monat. Tausende Bilder werden gesammelt. Da jedoch das Museumsgebäude nie gebaut wird, lagern die Gemälde in Depots, unter anderem im Stift Kremsmünster. Schließlich werden sie zum Schutz vor dem Bombenkrieg ins Salzbergwerk von Altaussee gebracht. Dort stoßen die US-Amerikaner bei Kriegsende auf die ungeheuren Kunstschatze.

Wahn und Wirklichkeit

Die Errichtung von Großindustrie, der Wohnbau und die wegen des Bevölkerungswachstums steigende Wohnungsnot, die im Bombenkrieg zerstörte Stadt und die unzureichenden Luftschutzbauten, das Elend der Zwangsarbeiter und Zwangsarbeiterinnen sowie der KZ-Häftlinge prägen das tatsächliche Antlitz der Stadt Linz im Nationalsozialismus. Der zunehmende Mangel an Arbeitskräften und Baustoffen während des Krieges verhindert eine Umsetzung der großen Pläne für Linz. Nur die Nibelungenbrücke und die Brückenkopfgebäude entstehen. Doch unbeirrt von den fehlenden Voraussetzungen arbeiten Architekten, Fachleute und Politiker weiter eifrig an den größtenwahnsinnigen Plänen von der Kulturmetropole Linz. Hitler ist die treibende Kraft. Noch im Februar 1945 läßt er sich vom Architekten Hermann Giesler ein neues Modell der Gebäude am Linzer Donauufer in den Keller der Reichskanzlei in Berlin bringen. Mit Scheinwerfern wird die Wirkung der Bauten zu verschiedenen Tageszeiten simuliert. Stundenlang erklärt Hitler Besuchern die Einzelheiten. Bei der Betrachtung des Modells von Linz entspannt er sich im näherrollenden Kriegstosen und flüchtet in Machtphantasien - und er kann sich an dem Gedanken festhalten, daß auch unausgeführte Baupläne « ihr Eigenleben in der Welt der Architektur » entwickeln und die Nachwelt beschäftigen werden.

Lebensgeschichten

Adolf Hitler : Jugendjahre eines Diktators

Bereits als Heranwachsender identifiziert sich Adolf Hitler mit dem Deutschnationalismus. Künstlerische und architektonische Vorlieben bilden sich aus. Obwohl er mit dem tyrannischen Vater im Konflikt liegt, ahmt er dessen Verhalten nach und entwickelt sich zu einem unduldsamen, herrschsüchtigen Menschen. Als Mittel, mit dem er andere beherrschen kann, entdeckt er die Sprache.

Von Braunau nach Leonding

Adolf Hitler kommt 1889 in Braunau am Inn zur Welt. Sein Vater Alois Hitler, der wie seine Mutter Klara aus dem niederösterreichischen Waldviertel stammt, arbeitet dort als Zollinspektor. Adolf ist das vierte Kind seiner Eltern, die ersten drei sind im Kindesalter gestorben. Zwei Kinder hat der Vater in die Ehe mitgebracht. Adolfs jüngerer Bruder Edmund stirbt mit sechs Jahren. Das jüngste Kind ist die Schwester Paula. Nach drei Jahren in Passau lebt die Familie Hitler ab 1895 zwei Jahre auf einem Bauernhof in Fischlham bei Lambach. In Fischlham und Lambach besucht Adolf die ersten Volksschulklassen. 1898 übersiedelt die Familie nach Leonding bei Linz. Der neunjährige Volksschüler findet größten Gefallen am Kriegsspielen mit den Freunden. Er begeistert sich für den deutsch-französischen Krieg und den deutschen Reichsgründer Bismarck, besonders aber für den gerade stattfindenden Kampf der südafrikanischen Buren gegen die englischen Eroberer.

Der Konflikt mit dem Vater

Ab Herbst 1900 schickt Alois Hitler seinen Sohn, für den er die Beamtenlaufbahn vorsieht, an die Realschule in Linz. Der elfjährige Landbub kommt dort nicht zurecht. Gleich das erste Schuljahr muß er wiederholen. In Adolf Hitler wächst die Abneigung gegen die Schule ebenso wie gegen den Vater. Er verachtet die Beamtenkarriere des Vaters, verweigert Fleiß und Strebsamkeit und beschäftigt sich lieber mit Zeichnen und Träumen. Gerne läßt er sich von seinem Lieblingsautor Karl May in exotische Abenteuerwelten entführen. Auch politisch ist er mit dem Vater uneins : Während der Vater ein Habsburg-treuer Deutschnationaler ist, wünscht sich der Sohn mit den Alldeutschen die Auflösung der Habsburgermonarchie und den Anschluß der deutschsprachigen Gebiete an das Deutsche Kaiserreich.

1903 setzt der Tod des tyrannischen Vaters dem Konflikt ein Ende. « Meinen Vater habe ich nicht geliebt » , erzählt Hitler später seiner Sekretärin, « dafür aber um so mehr gefürchtet. Er war jähzornig und schlug sofort zu. Meine arme Mutter hatte dann immer Angst um mich. » Wegen seines Misserfolges muß Adolf die Linzer Realschule verlassen. Nach einem Schuljahr in Steyr schafft er 1905 mit Mühe den Abschluß der niederen Realschule. Dann beendet er seine Schullaufbahn.

Müßiggänger in Linz

1905 übersiedelt Klara Hitler mit den Kindern und mit ihrer Schwester von Leonding in eine Wohnung in der Linzer Humboldtstraße. Dank Witwenpension und Rücklagen hält die Mutter die Familie über Wasser. Ihren geliebten Sohn Adolf, der nun weder eine Schule besucht noch einer Arbeit nachgeht, verwöhnt sie nach Kräften. Zwei Jahre lang führt er in Linz das ziellose Leben eines Müßiggängers mit künstlerischen Neigungen. Der Jugendliche zeichnet, malt, liest, schreibt, geht ins Theater, in Opern und Konzerte. Oft wird er dabei von seinem einzigen Freund August Kubizek begleitet. Die beiden ergänzen sich : Der dominante Hitler spricht, Kubizek hört beeindruckt zu. Auf langen abendlichen Spaziergängen legt Hitler dem Freund seine Ansichten über Politik und Kunst dar. Beide träumen von einer Zukunft als große Künstler, Hitler als Maler, Kubizek als Musiker. Hitler ist ein leidenschaftlicher Bewunderer Richard Wagners, dessen Opern « Lohengrin » und « Rienzi » er im Linzer Landestheater sieht. Außerdem fasziniert ihn Architektur. Er zeigt Kubizek Skizzen zur Neugestaltung von Linz.

In « Mein Kampf » heißt es über diese Zeit :

« Es waren die glücklichsten Tage, die mir nahezu als ein schöner Traum erschienen ; und ein Traum sollte es ja auch nur sein. Zwei Jahre später machte der Tod der Mutter all den schönen Plänen ein jähes Ende. »

Der Tod der Mutter und der Umzug nach Wien

Klara Hitler erkrankt an Brustkrebs. Ihr Zustand verschlechtert sich 1907. Im selben Jahr nimmt sich Adolf Hitler vor, an der Akademie für Bildende Künste in Wien zu studieren. Doch er scheitert, für ihn völlig überraschend, an der Aufnahmeprüfung. Niedergeschlagen kehrt er nach Linz zurück, wo er erfährt, daß für die Mutter keine Aussicht auf Heilung besteht. Der Sohn ist tief betroffen. Er kümmert sich in der Urfahrer Wohnung, in welche die Familie umgezogen ist, hingebungsvoll um die Mutter. Sie stirbt Ende 1907. « Ich habe noch nie einen vom Schmerz so gebrochenen Menschen gesehen wie Adolf Hitler » , berichtet Eduard Bloch, der jüdische Hausarzt der Familie Hitler. Adolf Hitler bleibt dem Arzt für die Betreuung der Mutter immer dankbar und schützt ihn 1938 vor antisemitischer Verfolgung.

Wenige Wochen nach dem Tod der Mutter übersiedelt der knapp 19-Jährige nach Wien, um seine künstlerischen Pläne zu verwirklichen. Doch alle Versuche misslingen. Hitler führt eine kümmerliche Existenz als Postkartenmaler und Bewohner von Obdachlosenheimen. In Wien saugt er rassistische und antisemitische Ideologien in sich auf. Besonders den Antisemitismus der Alldeutschen, den er in Linz schon kennen gelernt hat, nimmt er sich zum Vorbild. Die mächtige Arbeiterbewegung erfährt er in Wien als Bedrohung.

1913 verläßt Adolf Hitler den verhassten Vielvölkerstaat und geht nach München. Im Ersten Weltkrieg kämpft er für das Deutsche Kaiserreich.

Der ersehnte « Führer »

Drei Jahrzehnte lang verläuft Adolf Hitlers Leben unscheinbar. Doch nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg erkennt er, daß er mit seiner faschistischen und rassistischen Weltanschauung einen politischen Nerv der Zeit trifft. Viele Menschen sehnen sich nach einem Anführer, auf den sie nach der Niederlage alle Hoffnung setzen können, und nach Sündenböcken, die an allem Elend schuld sind. Hitler kann reden, er preist sich mit der NSDAP als Erlöser der erniedrigten Deutschen an und stellt « die Juden » als die Verursacher aller Probleme hin. So erfüllt er, was die Menschenmassen von ihm erwarten. Sie machen die NSDAP bei den Wahlen zur stärksten Partei, und Hitler wird Reichskanzler. Ein großer Teil der deutschen und österreichischen Bevölkerung gibt ihm bereitwillig die Rolle des verherrlichten « Führers » - in die weltgeschichtliche Katastrophe.

Franz Kinzl : Vom Nationalsozialisten zum Kommunisten

Franz Kinzl ist bis heute ein klingender Name in der oberösterreichischen Blasmusikkultur. Bei genauerem Hinsehen übertönt sein bisher weniger beachtetes politisches Wirken jedoch sein künstlerisches Talent.

Illegale Tätigkeit für NSDAP

Franz Kinzl wird am 2. Juli 1895 in Mettmach geboren. So wie sein älterer Bruder entscheidet er sich für den Lehrberuf - und begeistert sich wie er schon bald nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg für die Ideen der National sozialisten. Als Komponist und Kapellmeister macht er sich einen Namen. Im April 1933 tritt er der NSDAP, bald darauf dem NS-Lehrerbund, den sein Bruder gründet, bei. Franz Kinzl ist als Nationalsozialist höchst aktiv, wegen seiner illegalen Tätigkeiten verhängt der Landesschulrat mehrere Disziplinarverfahren gegen ihn, schließlich erfolgt seine Strafversetzung. Er muß von Atzbach bei Schwanenstadt nach Hirschbach bei Freistadt wechseln ; und gründet an seiner neuen Wirkstätte sogleich eine illegale Ortsgruppe der NSDAP.

Reichsmusikkammer und Wehrmacht

Nach dem « Anschluß » wächst seine Macht als neu ernannter Ortsgruppenleiter. Kinzl setzt den Bürgermeister ab, veranlasst seine Verhaftung und übernimmt selbst für kurze Zeit das Amt. Im Juni 1938 wird er an eine Schule nach Linz versetzt - als « Wiedergutmachung » , wie er es selbst bezeichnet. Oberbürgermeister Sepp Wolkerstorfer schlägt den bekannten Komponisten Kinzl für einen Posten in der Reichsmusikkammer vor. Zwar steigt er zum Musikbeauftragten der Reichsmusikkammer auf, doch interne Rivalitäten veranlassen Kinzl dazu, sich freiwillig zur Wehrmacht zu melden. Doch schon im August 1940 wird er bis zum 1. September 1941 « uk » (unabkömmlich) gestellt und zum Landesleiter der Reichsmusikkammer ernannt. Er beteiligt sich maßgeblich an den Verfolgungsmaßnahmen gegen jüdische Musiker und verantwortet das Erscheinen des Heftes « Judentum und Musik (Liste der jüdischen Komponisten als Unterlage für die Säuberungsaktionen auf dem Gebiete der Musik) » . Mehrfach kommt es zu Konflikten mit Kollegen, weil er gegen sie intrigiert oder sich in Bereiche einmischt, die über seinen Tätigkeitsbereich hinausgehen. Im Herbst 1941 rückt Kinzl erneut zur Wehrmacht ein. Ob freiwillig oder nicht, ist unbekannt.

Gefangenschaft und Kehrtwendung

Am 3. Mai 1945 kommt Kinzl in Haft, bis 6. März 1946 bleibt er in Glasenbach in US-amerikanischer Gefangenschaft. Danach zieht er mit seiner Frau und seinem Bruder Fritz nach Stadl-Paura. Kurz darauf, im Juli 1946, verhaften ihn die österreichischen Justizbehörden und klagen ihn wegen seiner illegalen Tätigkeit für die NSDAP und des Tatbestandes der Denunziation an. Kinzl bestreitet alles. Im Mai 1947 wird er entlassen und « außer Verfolgung gesetzt » , weil die gegen ihn erhobenen Vorwürfe weder bewiesen noch entkräftet werden können.

In Freiheit arbeitet Kinzl als Maler und Komponist, seine Werke sind bei den Blasmusikkapellen sehr beliebt. Er betätigt sich aber auch weiterhin politisch - und vollzieht eine kaum zu glaubende Kehrtwendung. Er tritt der Kommunistische Partei Österreichs (KPÖ) bei und sitzt für sie von 1949 bis 1953 im Gemeinderat von Stadl-Paura. In der kommunistischen « Neuen Zeit » verfaßt Kinzl zahlreiche Beiträge.

Preise und Auszeichnungen

Sein musikalisches Engagement bringen Kinzl eine Reihe von Preisen und Auszeichnungen ein, 1965 wird ihm der Professorentitel verliehen. Franz Kinzl stirbt 1978 im 80. Lebensjahr. 2008 huldigt die « Landeschronik Oberösterreich » dem allseits « beliebten » Musiker, « Original » und « begnadeten Künstler » Franz Kinzl in einer biographischen Skizze. Seine politischen und ideologischen Anschauungen und Aktivitäten werden mit keinem Wort erwähnt. Auch die vom oberösterreichischen Blasmusikverband und der Landesregierung verliehene « Professor-Franz-Kinzl-Medaille » gilt bis heute als besondere Ehrung in Blasmusikkreisen, auf welche die ausgezeichneten Vereine stolz verweisen.

Franz Langoth : Der Mythos vom « guten Nazi »

In seiner langen politischen Laufbahn prägt Franz Langoth die Geschichte seiner Heimatstadt Linz über Jahrzehnte hinweg. Diese feiert und würdigt den « guten Nazi » Langoth bis lange nach seinem Tod hinaus.

Deutschnational und nationalsozialistisch

Franz Langoth wird 1877 in Linz geboren. Er besucht die Lehrerbildungsanstalt und arbeitet ab 1896 als Volksschullehrer. Schon als junger Mensch betätigt er sich politisch. Er ist deutschnational eingestellt und von den radikalen antisemitischen und rassistischen Anschauungen Georg von Schönerers angetan. Nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg wird Langoth Mitglied der oberösterreichischen Landesregierung und sogar Landeshauptmannstellvertreter. Ab den 1920er Jahren engagiert er sich in der Großdeutschen Volkspartei. Diese Bewegung schwört auf die deutsche « Volksgemeinschaft », von der alle « volksfremden » und « schädlichen » Einflüsse entfernt werden müssen. Auch die Nationalsozialisten, denen sich Langoth mehr und mehr zuwendet, stellen die « Volksgemeinschaft » ins Zentrum ihrer Ideologie.

1934 gründet er das « legale Hilfswerk Langoth ». Nationalsozialisten, die durch die Illegalität in Bedrängnis geraten, wenden sich an Langoth und dürfen auf Unterstützung hoffen. Diese umfangreiche Tätigkeit, die sich über ganz Österreich erstreckt, bringt ihm den Beinamen « Vater Langoth » ein. Nach dem « Anschluß » wird Langoth für diesen Einsatz belohnt und mit Angeboten überhäuft.

Karriere im Nationalsozialismus

Am 13. März 1938 lädt Hitler die « Treuesten der Treuen » zum Mittagessen ins Linzer Hotel Weininger. Dort verkündet Hitler zunächst den « Anschluß » im kleinen Kreis.

Langoth ruft euphorisch :

« Mein Führer, das ist die größte Stunde der deutschen Geschichte. »

Seine Gesinnungstreue wird belohnt. Hermann Göring ernennt ihn kurzerhand zum SS-Oberführer. Mit dem Totenkopfring und dem Ehrendegen werden ihm die höchsten SSAuszeichnungen verliehen. Franz Langoth wird außerdem Mitglied des Volksgerichtshofes und verantwortet in dieser Funktion die Verkündung und Vollstreckung von Todesurteilen für Gegner und Gegnerinnen des Regimes.

Er sei von dieser Bestellung zum Richter « unangenehm überrascht » gewesen, behauptet Langoth in seiner Rechtfertigungsschrift nach 1945 :

« Ich konnte aber nicht ablehnen. »

Tatsächlich steht der ehrgeizige Politiker unter keinerlei Druck, möchte aber seiner Karriere nicht schaden. Denn immerhin hat er es unter anderem zum Leiter der Nationalsozialistischen Volkswohlfahrt (NSV) in der Ostmark gebracht. Die NSV ist vor allem in der Familien- und Jugendfürsorge tätig. Sie unterstützt viele Menschen - aber nur jene, die zur nationalsozialistischen « Volksgemeinschaft » gehören. In den von der NSV geführten « fremdvölkischen Kinderheimen » werden zahllose Babys und Kleinkinder dem Sterben überlassen.

Oberbürgermeister von Linz

Gegen Ende 1943 ist Gauleiter Eigruber auf der Suche nach einem neuen Oberbürgermeister für Linz und bietet diesen Posten dem allseits geschätzten Franz Langoth an. Der sagt zu und übernimmt sein nächstes prestigeträchtiges Amt. In seiner neuen Funktion verantwortet er unter anderem die Tätigkeiten des Jugend- und Fürsorgeamtes, das « Asoziale » verfolgt, oder des Gesundheitsamtes, das Zwangssterilisierungen anordnet. Anfang Mai 1945 muß Langoth den US-amerikanischen Streitkräften weichen - seine Rolle bei der kampflosen Übergabe der Stadt Linz überhöht er, indem er den zeitgenössischen Bericht seines Sekretärs im Nachhinein fälscht.

Unverbesserlicher Nationalsozialist

Nach Kriegsende wird Franz Langoth verhaftet und kommt in das Lager Glasenbach bei Salzburg. Die Tatsache, daß sein Name auf der Kriegsverbrecherliste steht, empfindet er als große Ungerechtigkeit. Auch sonst erweist er sich in den Nachkriegsjahren als unverbesserlicher Nationalsozialist. In seinen Memoiren stellt sich Langoth als sozialer Wohltäter dar. Er beklagt die fehlende Anerkennung seiner Arbeit und der « gewaltigen Leistung, die die NSV vollbrachte » . 1949 gründet er gemeinsam mit dem Salzburger Erzbischof Andreas Rohrer die Stiftung « Soziales Friedenswerk » , das nationalsozialistisch schwer Belastete (vor allem ehemalige « Glasenbacher ») finanziell, politisch und rechtlich unterstützt. So fordern ihre Mitglieder eine Amnestie der Verbrecher der « Mühlviertler Hasenjagd » , der unzählige Häftlinge des KZ-Mauthausen zum Opfer gefallen waren. Franz Langoth betätigt sich bald wieder politisch und wird das erste Ehrenmitglied des Verbandes der Unabhängigen (VdU) , der Vorgängerpartei der Freiheitliche Partei Österreichs (FPÖ) .

In der Linzer Nachkriegsgeschichte gilt er lange als der « gute Nazi » , der vielen Menschen geholfen hat. 1950 wird Franz Langoth vom Bundespräsidenten amnestiert. Nach seinem Tod 1953 erscheinen eine Reihe verherrlichender Nachrufe. In den 1970er Jahren benennt die Stadt Linz eine Straße nach ihm. Erst nach jahrelangen Protesten (vor allem von kommunistischer Seite) wird 1986 die Benennung wieder rückgängig gemacht. Rolle und Bedeutung des Nationalsozialisten Franz Langoth werden seitdem kritischer beleuchtet.

La collection d'art de Linz

Parmi les nombreux projets fous d'Hitler, le dictateur caressait celui d'accueillir à Linz, sa ville natale, la plus grande collection d'art germanique ainsi que des chefs-d'œuvre étrangers. Si le projet n'a jamais abouti, la liste des pièces amassées, connue sous le nom de « Lintersammlung » (collection de Linz) a, elle, été rendue publique et mise en ligne par le Musée de l'Histoire allemande (« Deutsches Historische Museum ») en collaboration avec le bureau fédéral pour les services centraux et les questions de propriété non résolues. Pour la Ire fois, un document exhaustif répertoriant les pièces du Dictateur ainsi que toute l'information connue à leur propos est rendu publique.

La collection de Linz comprend 4,731 toiles, tapisseries, sculptures, porcelaines et meubles. Tous ces objets étaient destinés à un musée qui devait être terminé avant 1950 afin de faire rayonner le « Reich » . Que découvre-t-on dans cette collection ? Des œuvres de Rembrandt, de Watteau et de Canaletto, un goût prononcé pour les scènes bucoliques et le Romantisme allemand. Les artistes contemporains et « dégénérés' » tels que Emil Nolde, qu'Hitler a censuré pendant son pouvoir, sont absents.

La collection officielle s'est construite sur les acquisitions qu'Hitler avait fait à titre privé. Le chef du Parti Nazi avait mis sur pied une force spéciale chargée de rassembler les œuvres, la « Sonderauftrag Linz », ou « Projet spécial Linz », en 1939. Cette unité a bâti la collection jusqu'en 1945.

Afin de protéger les œuvres des bombardements alliés, elles avaient été cachés dans des mines de sel à proximité de la ville du nord de l'Autriche. C'est là qu'ils ont été retrouvés par les Américains à la fin de la guerre. Elles figurent depuis dans le « Central Collecting Point Archive », une base de données concernant toutes les œuvres des Nazis retrouvées après leur défaite.

La coordinatrice du projet du « Deutsche Historische Museum », Monika Flake, révèle au Spiegel que le catalogue de 1945 comprend environ 50,000 photos de la « Linzersammlung » mais que certaines informations telles que le nom de l'artiste ou la provenance de l'œuvre ont dû être déterminés par son équipe. Un travail d'identification avait déjà été entamé par l'historien Christian Lohr, dans un livre publié en 2005, « La Maison brune de l'Art », en référence à la tristement célèbre « Maison brune » des SA à Munich.

Les éléments pillés ont été restitués à leurs propriétaires quand cela était possible. Ceux dont on ne pouvait pas identifier l'origine ont été remis en état et sont éparpillés dans divers musées nationaux. D'autres auraient été vendus illégalement.

Depuis leur découverte, l'origine des œuvres de la « Linzersammlung » occupe les historiens. Combien d'œuvres ont été volées par la « Gestapo » ? Parmi les pièces que possède aujourd'hui le gouvernement, combien devraient être rendues à des familles encore vivantes ? Aucune réponse définitive pour l'instant, mais Flake estime que « la proportion de pièces volées ou confisquées est relativement peu importante » .

En rendant accessible la liste, les chercheurs allemands espèrent recueillir de nouvelles indications sur les œuvres dont la source est incertaine.

...

21 juin 1939 : Adolf Hitler met en place le projet spécial Linz (« Sonderauftrag Linz ») , à Dresde, et nomme le docteur Hans Posse directeur de la « Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister » (Galerie de peintures de Dresde) , en tant qu'envoyé spécial. Le « Sonderauftrag » est chargé de collecter des œuvres d'art pour le futur « Führermuseum » . Basé à Dresde, il se compose d'historiens de l'art travaillant normalement pour la galerie de peintures, par exemple Robert Oertel and Gottfried Reimer. Posse décède d'un cancer en décembre 1942 ; en mars 1943, Hermann Voß, un historien de l'art et directeur de la galerie de Wiesbaden, reprend la direction du « Sonderauftrag » .

Les méthodes d'acquisition vont de la confiscation à l'achat et comprennent aussi de nombreux cas de vente forcée, par l'utilisation des fonds provenant des ventes de « Mein Kampf » et de timbres à l'effigie d'Hitler. Les achats sont principalement enregistrés depuis le « Führerbau » (bureaux d'Hitler) à Munich ; les œuvres d'art acquises sont stockées dans des dépôts en Haute-Autriche. L'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiters Rosenberg » (E.R.R.), créé en 1940 et dirigé par Alfred Rosenberg, qui « lutte contre le judaïsme et la franc-maçonnerie » et se charge également de confisquer les œuvres d'arts appartenant aux familles incriminées, dans toute l'Europe ; dès le 17 septembre 1940, Hitler somme la « Wehrmacht » d'aider ce nouveau service à « transférer en Allemagne les biens culturels qui lui paraissent précieux et à les sauvegarder dans ce pays » .

L'Agneau mystique de Hubert et Jan Van Eyck aurait été une pièce centrale du musée : cachée au Vatican puis à Pau, le régime de Vichy l'offre aux Allemands avec regret pendant l'été 1942.

En novembre 2013 sont retrouvées à Munich 1,406 œuvres d'arts appartenant au descendant du marchand d'art Hildebrand Gurlitt. Parmi celles-ci, de nombreuses toiles avaient été considérées comme de l'« Art dégénéré » par Adolf Hitler et donc retirées des collections officielles, d'autres de propriétaires juifs spoliés par le 3e « Reich » et enfin d'œuvres réunis pour le projet du « Führermuseum » . Dans ce dernier cas, il s'agit de tableaux de Maîtres provenant de collections privées et publiques, françaises, néerlandaises, belges et suisses.

Exemples d'œuvres :

Intérieur avec femme et piano, d'Emanuel de Witte.

Portrait de Jacoba Bicker, de Caspar Netscher.

Vue du sud de l'Oude Kerk d'Amsterdam, de Jan van der Heyden.

L'Astronome, de Johannes Vermeer.

À la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les Américains retrouvent les œuvres entreposées dans des mines de sels aménagées, non loin de la ville : elles y avaient été cachées pour les protéger des bombardements. La récupération des œuvres d'arts et leur restitution par le gouvernement américain était prévu depuis 1943 et la création de la Roberts Commission (American Commission for the Protection and Salvage of Artistic and Historic Monuments in War Areas) et de leur agents sur place, les M.F.A.A. Officers (Monuments, Fine Arts and Archives Officers) . Une unité de l'OSS, Art Looting Investigation Unit (Unité d'enquête sur les spoliations d'œuvres d'art) est également chargée de récupérer des œuvres en France volées. Des interrogatoires seront menés et des dépôts seront créés le 20 mai 1945 par un ordre du S.H.A.E.F. (Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force) .

Devant l'avancée des Alliés, August Eigruber, « Gauleiter » de Haute-Autriche, donne l'ordre de faire sauter les mines ; Hitler annule l'ordre, confirmé le 3 mai, par le gradé SS Kaltenbrunner. Hermann Göring de son côté transfère vers la Bavière les œuvres d'arts de sa résidence de Carinhall, qu'il a fait faire détruire. Certaines œuvres de l'E.R.R. stockées au château de Neuschwanstein sont récupérées par les Américains, le 28 avril 1945, ainsi que les archives complètes de l'organisation ; plus tard, on saisira également des œuvres auparavant déposées dans l'abbaye de Buxheim et dans des dépôts à Chiemsee ainsi que les œuvres d'arts cachées par Göring à Berchtesgaden. Les œuvres furent listées dans le Central Collecting Point Archive, une base de données sur les œuvres d'arts récupérées aux Nazis après la guerre, mais ce n'est qu'en 2008 que le musée de l'histoire allemande (« Deutsche historische Museum ») a communiqué le détail de la « Linzersammlung » (collection de Linz) . Certaines œuvres n'ont néanmoins pas été retrouvées et se trouveraient dans certains musées ou collections privées dans le monde entier. Cette question est abordée dans le documentaire « The Rape of Europa » .

Il y a débat quant à savoir la proportion d'œuvres achetées ou volées pour le musée. Hanns Christian Lohr affirme dans « La Maison brune de l'Art » que seule une petite partie de la collection (peut-être 12 %) est issue de pillage. Un autre historien réduit même ce chiffre à 2,5 % . Toutefois, Jonathan Petropoulos, un historien au collège Loyola, à Baltimore et un expert dans le pillage en temps de guerre, ont fait valoir que la plupart des achats n'avaient pas été forcément réalisés dans des conditions normales. Aalders Gerard, un historien néerlandais, a déclaré que ces ventes étaient somme toute un pillage : par exemple, aux Pays-Bas ou dans d'autres pays occupés qui ont été contraints d'accepter des Reichsmarks qui se sont finalement avérés inutile. Aalders fait valoir que : « Si l'agent d'art d'Hitler ou de Göring était à votre porte et vous offrait 10,000 dollars pour une toile qui en valait 100,000, il était assez difficile de refuser. » . Aalders ajoute que les Nazis n'ont pas hésité à menacer de confisquer malgré tous les œuvres d'art ou d'en arrêter le propriétaire. Birgit Schwarz, une experte sur le « Führermuseum » , dans une critique du livre de Lohr, a fait remarquer que l'auteur s'est axé sur les achats depuis le « Führerbau » à Munich et a ignoré les dépôts d'art pillées en Haute-Autriche (Thürntal, Kremsmünster et Hohenfurt / Vyssi Brod) .

Pour l'Autriche, la Seconde Guerre mondiale prend fin le 27 avril 1945. Dans les années qui suivront, la nation entière devra faire un bilan des conséquences de leur alliance avec le 3e « Reich » , notamment en matière de culture. Même si beaucoup de jeunes Autrichiens envisageaient des jours meilleurs, plusieurs devront vivre dans un climat de grande morosité.

Le « Führermuseum »

Entre autres délires, Adolf Hitler entendait prouver au monde la supériorité de l'art aryen. Dès 1939, il avait conçu le projet de construire un immense musée à Linz et chargé l'historien de l'art Hans Posse de dresser la liste des œuvres qui devaient idéalement y être montrées. Un peu partout en Europe, les musées s'organisaient pour mettre leurs chefs d'œuvre à l'abri. Fuyant un peu tard devant l'avancée Nazie dans l'espoir de mettre sous la protection du pape au Vatican, l'Agneau Mystique, un polyptyque des frères van Eyck dont la valeur est inestimable, ceux qui en avaient la charge parvinrent jusqu'à Pau, dans les Pyrénées, où le régime de Vichy abandonna l'œuvre aux Allemands.

...

Le « Führermuseum » est un projet de musée allemand gigantesque situé à Linz et imaginé par Adolf Hitler pour accueillir les plus grandes œuvres dites de l'« Art véritable » , par opposition à l'« Art dégénéré » de la modernité.

Adolf Hitler mûrit pendant plusieurs l'année l'idée de créer un grand musée. Il choisit pour site la ville de Linz, située non loin de sa ville natale et où il avait lui-même étudié. Le projet comprenait une maison d'Opéra, dont Hitler dressa lui-même les plans. La construction devait s'échelonner jusque vers 1950. Le site choisi est alors occupé par la gare de Linz, qui aurait été déplacée 4 kilomètres au sud.

La majorité des plans sont dessinés par Albert Speer. Le complexe comprend un Théâtre monumental, un Opéra et un Hôtel, le tout entouré par des boulevards et une esplanade pour les parades. Une bibliothèque devait accueillir 250,000 livres. Le musée devait avoir une face de 150 mètres de long et correspondre plus ou moins à la « Haus der Kunst » érigée à Munich.

...

Le « Führermuseum » est un projet de musée allemand gigantesque situé à Linz, en Autriche, imaginé par Adolf Hitler pour accueillir les plus grandes œuvres dites de l'« art véritable », par opposition à l'« art dégénéré » de la modernité.

Adolf Hitler mûrit pendant plusieurs années l'idée de créer un grand musée. Il choisit pour site la ville de Linz, située non loin de sa ville natale et où il avait lui-même étudié. Le projet comprenait une maison d'Opéra, dont Hitler dressa lui-même les plans. La construction devait s'échelonner jusque vers 1950. Le site choisi est alors occupé par la gare de Linz, qui aurait été déplacée 4 kilomètres au sud.

La majorité des plans sont dessinés par Albert Speer. Le complexe comprend un théâtre monumental, une maison d'Opéra et un hôtel ; le tout entouré par des boulevards et une esplanade pour les parades. Une bibliothèque devait accueillir 250,000 livres. Le musée devait avoir une face de 150 mètres de long et correspondre plus ou moins à la « Haus der Kunst » érigée à Munich.

Le 21 juin 1939, Hitler met en place le projet spécial Linz (« Sonderauftrag Linz »), à Dresde, et nomme le docteur Hans Posse directeur de la « Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister » (Galerie de peintures de Dresde), en tant qu'envoyé spécial. Le « Sonderauftrag » est chargé de collecter des œuvres d'art pour le futur « Führermuseum ». Basé à Dresde, il se compose d'historiens de l'art travaillant normalement pour la galerie de peintures, par exemple Robert Örtel et Gottfried Reimer. Posse décède d'un cancer en décembre 1942 ; en mars 1943, Hermann Voß, un historien de l'art et directeur de la galerie de Wiesbaden, reprend la direction du « Sonderauftrag ».

Les méthodes d'acquisition vont de la confiscation à l'achat et comprennent aussi de nombreux cas de vente forcée, par l'utilisation des fonds provenant des ventes du « Mein Kampf » et de timbres à l'effigie d'Hitler. Les achats sont principalement enregistrés depuis le « Führerbau » (bureaux d'Hitler) à Munich ; les œuvres d'art acquises sont stockées dans des dépôts en Haute-Autriche. L'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (E.R.R.), créé en 1940 et dirigé par Alfred Rosenberg, qui « lutte contre le judaïsme et la franc-maçonnerie » et se charge également de confisquer les œuvres d'arts appartenant aux familles incriminées, dans toute l'Europe ; dès le 17 septembre 1940, Hitler somme la « Wehrmacht » d'aider ce nouveau service à « transférer en Allemagne les biens culturels qui lui paraissent précieux et à les sauvegarder dans ce pays ».

« L'Agneau mystique » de Hubert et Jan Van Eyck aurait été une pièce centrale du musée : cachée au Vatican puis à Pau, le régime de Vichy l'offre aux Allemands, avec regret, pendant l'été 1942.

...

The « Führermuseum » (Leader's Museum) , also referred to as the Linz Art Gallery, was an un-realized Art Museum within a cultural complex planned by Adolf Hitler for his hometown, the Austrian city of Linz, near his birthplace of Braunau. Its purpose was to display a selection of the art bought, confiscated or stolen by the Nazis from throughout Europe during World War II. The cultural district was to be part of an overall plan to recreate Linz, turning it into a cultural capital of the 3rd « Reich » and one of the greatest Art Centers of Europe, over-shadowing Vienna, for which Hitler had a personal distaste. He wanted to make the city more beautiful than Budapest, so it would be the most beautiful on the Danube River, as well as an industrial power-house and a hub of trade ; the Museum was planned to be one of the greatest in Europe.

The expected completion date for the project was 1950, but neither the « Führermuseum » nor the cultural center it was to be the anchor of were ever built. The only part of the elaborate plan which was constructed was the Nibelungen Bridge, which is still extant.

As early as 1925, Hitler had conceived of a « German National Gallery » to be built in Berlin with himself as director. His plan, drawn-out in a sketch-book, may have been influenced by the « Kaiser-Friedrich-Museum » (now, the Bode Museum) , and consisted of a building with 2 sections : one with 28 rooms, and the other with 32. Hitler denoted which of his favourite 19th Century German artists were to be collected, and in what rooms their work would hang. Among his favourite painters were Hans Makart, Franz Defregger, Eduard Grützner, Franz von Stuck, Franz von Lenbach, Anselm Feuerbach, Heinrich Zügel and Carl Spitzweg, and he had extolled « Aryan art » by Moritz von Schwind and Arnold Böcklin in « Mein Kampf » . At one time in his planning, he dedicated 5 of the rooms in the Museum to the work of Adolph von Menzel, and 3 rooms to both Schwind and Böcklin. Carl Rottmann, Edouard von Engerth, and Anton von Werner were to share a single room, as were Makart and Karl von Piloty ; Wilhelm Trübner and Fritz von Uhde ; Grützner and Defregger ; and the artists of the Nazarene movement. Other painters who would enjoy their own room in Hitler's original plans were Peter von Cornelius, Hans von Marées, Bonaventura Genelli, Anselm Feuerbach and Wilhelm Leibl. These choices reflected Hitler's taste at the time, which was a preference for sentimental 19th Century Germanic Romantic painters, including « both “ schmaltzy ” genre pictures and heroic, idyllic, allegorical. historical-patriotic themes, the visual equivalent of Wagner, without the genius » .

It was after the « Anschluß » with Austria, with the House of German Art in Munich already completed, that Hitler conceived of having his dream Museum not in any of the premiere cities in Germany, where it could be over-shadowed, but in his « hometown » of Linz in Austria, and discussed his plans with the director of the local Provincial Museum, Theodor Kerschner, while visiting there.

Additionally, after a State trip to Rome, Florence and Naples in 1938 (between the « Anschluß » with Austria and the taking of the Sudetenland from Czechoslovakia) , Hitler (« overwhelmed and challenged by the riches of the Italian museums ») expanded the conception of his planned gallery. It would now be the un-surpassed Art Gallery in all of Europe, indeed « the greatest Museum in the world » , featuring the finest of all European Art.

The idea and overall design concept for a new cultural district in Linz anchored by the « Führermuseum » was Hitler's own. He intended Linz to be one of the future cultural capitals of the « Reich » , to have its own University, and to overshadow Vienna, a city in which he had spent some years as a struggling artist, and about which he felt considerable distaste, not only because of the Jewish influence on the city, but because of his own failure to gain admission to the Vienna Academy of Fine-Arts.

« Hitler envisaged Linz as the future seat of the new German “ Kultur ”, and lavished all his limited pictorial talent and architectural training on a vast project which would realize this ambition. He devoted a disproportionate amount of time and energy, for a Chief of State, to the plans for Linz, personally creating the architectural scheme for an imposing array of public buildings, and setting the formula for an art-collection which was to specialize heavily in his beloved, mawkish German School of the 19th Century. His private library, discovered by the American Army deep in Austria, contained scores of completed architectural renderings for the Linz project. »

According to one of Hitler's secretaries, he never tired of talking about his planned Museum, and it was often the subject at his regular afternoon teas. He would expound on how the paintings were to be hung : with plenty of space between them, in rooms decorated with furniture and furnishings appropriate to the period, and how they were to be lit. No detail of the presentation of the artworks was too small for his consideration. He said of the Museum, in 1942 :

« Anyone who wants to study 19th Century painting will, sooner or later, find it necessary to go to the Linz Gallery, because only there will it be possible to find complete collections. »

In Autumn 1940, Hitler commissioned architect Hermann Giesler, a devout Nazi, to be in overall charge of the re-building of Linz, one of the 5 designated « Führerstädte » (« Führer » cities) , along with Berlin, Hamburg, Nuremberg and Munich, which were to be redeveloped drastically. Linz was to become a major cultural center, an art capital of Europe, a hub of trade and commerce, and the most beautiful city on the Danube, surpassing Budapest. It would have a new City Hall, new Nazi Party headquarters and a new railway station, a stadium, a community hall, a Technical University, an institute of metallurgy, a planetarium, a suspension bridge, and 2 new towers, one of them with a carillon and a mausoleum for Hitler's parents. The city would also have Hitler's own retirement residence, designed by Giesler. In addition to all this, the Vienna facilities of the « Hermann-Göring-Werks » steel-plant were to be moved to Linz as well, over the objections of officials of the city, the architects, and Fritz Todt, who thought the industrial facilities were incompatible with a city of art, architecture and culture. Hitler, though, wanted to provide the city with an ongoing means of income after he was dead and could no longer subsidize it.

The cultural center at the heart of the re-development, the buildings for which were based on Hitler's ideas and rough designs, came to be referred to as the « European Culture Center » . It included a monumental Theatre, a Concert -Hall, a library with over 250,000 volumes, an Opera House as well as an Operetta House, a cinema, a collection of armor and an « Adolf Hitler Hotel » , all surrounded by huge boulevards and a parade ground. Located south of the historic section of Linz, the main-buildings, including the « Führermuseum » , were to be aligned along one main-avenue, « In den Lauben » which, after the War, was called : « a typical National-Socialist axis street » . It would be anchored at the other end by the new railway station.

The design of the many buildings of the cultural center were assigned to various architects Hitler favoured. The Museum itself was designed by Roderich Fick based closely on Hitler's sketches and specifications, modeled somewhat after Paul Ludwig Troost's « Haus der Deutschen Kunst » (House of German Art) in Munich (itself strongly influenced by Hitler's participation in the design process) and would feature a colonnaded facade about 500 feet (150 meters) long. It would stand on the site of the Linz railroad station, which was to be moved 4 kilometers to the south. Should the volume of German art bought, confiscated and plundered for the Museum be such that expansion was needed, an additional building could easily be integrated into the planned district.

By January 1945, Hitler became obsessed with seeing a model of the planned cultural complex ; he had his adjutants and Martin Bormann, his personal secretary and head of the Nazi Party, call Giesler's office repeatedly, to ask when the « Führer » could view the model. Giesler's office worked around the clock to finish it. The model was finally set-up in the cellar of the new « Reich » Chancellery, and was ready for viewing on 9 February. Hitler was apparently entranced by what he saw :

« Bent over the model, he viewed it from all angles, and in different kinds of lighting. He asked for a seat. He checked the proportions of the different buildings. He asked about the details of the bridges. He studied the model for a long time, apparently lost in thought. While Geisler stayed in Berlin, Hitler accompanied him twice daily to view the model, in the afternoon and again during the night. Others in his entourage were taken-down to have his building plans explained to them as they pored over the model. Looking down on the model of a city which, he knew, would never be built, Hitler could fall in « rêverie » , revisiting the fantasies of his youth, when he would dream with his friend August Kubizek about re-building Linz. »

Hitler visited the model frequently during his time living in the « bunker » under the « Reich » Chancellery. The closer Germany came to military defeat, the more viewing the model became Hitler's only relief ; being invited to view it with him was an indication of the « Führer » 's esteem.

Near the end of the War, when American forces over-ran Hitler's private library, which was hidden deep in Austria, it contained « scores » of plans and renderings for the Museum and the complex as a whole. They also found « The Future Economic Status of the City of Linz » : a 78 page bound volume prepared for Hitler by the Economic and Research Section of the Oberdonau Department of the Interior, which outlined in detail how the revitalization of Linz would take place. The entire Linz project was treated as a State secret on Hitler's order.

The collection for the planned Museum in Linz was accumulated through several methods. Hitler himself sent Heinrich Heim, one of Martin Bormann's adjutants who had expertise in paintings and graphics, on trips to Italy and France to buy artworks, which Hitler paid for with his own money, which came from sales of his « Mein Kampf » , real estate speculation on land in the area of the « Berghof » , Hitler's mountain retreat on the Obersalzberg, and royalties from Hitler's image used on postage stamps. The latter, which was divided with his official photographer Heinrich Hoffmann, amounted to at least 75 million « Reichsmarks » over the course of Hitler's reign.

This, however, was not the primary method used to build up the collection.

In Nazi Germany, Adolf Hitler's birthday was celebrated nationally on April 20 beginning in 1933 (the year Hitler became Chancellor) through 1944. For his 50th birthday, in 1939, the day was declared a National Holiday. As part of these celebrations, Hitler would receive numerous presents, among which were paintings and other art objects. These were set aside for use in the planned « Führermuseum » in Linz.

Adolf Hitler's 56th birthday, in 1945, was a private celebration held in the « bunker » under the « Reich » Chancellery, in Berlin, as the Red Army battled to take the city ; even under those circumstances, Hitler would frequently spend hours in the basement of the Chancellery looking at the scale-model of the proposed rebuilding of Linz, which centered on the cultural district around the « Führermuseum » . 9 days after his birthday, Hitler married Eva Braun, and they committed suicide together the next day.

In the 1st weeks after the « Anschluß » , in March 1938, which brought Austria into the German « Reich » , both the « Gestapo » and the Nazi Party confiscated numerous artworks for themselves. In response, on 18 June 1938, Hitler issued a decree placing all artwork that had been seized in Austria under the personal prerogative of the « Führer » :

« As part of the seizure of assets hostile to the State (especially, Jewish assets) in Austria, paintings and other artwork of great value, among other things, have been confiscated. The “ Führer ” requests that this artwork, for the most part from Jewish hands, be neither used as furnishings of administration offices or senior bureaucrats' official residences nor purchased by leading State and Party leaders. The “ Führer ” plans to personally decide on the use of the property after its seizure. He is considering putting artwork 1st and foremost at the disposal of small Austrian towns for their collections. »

The intent of the order was to guarantee that Hitler would have 1st choice of the plundered art for his planned « Führermuseum » and for other Museums in the « Reich » . This later became a standard procedure for all purloined or confiscated art, and was known as the « Führer-Reserve » .

On 21 June 1939, Hitler set-up the « Sonderauftrag Linz » (Linz Special Commission) , in Dresden, and appointed Doctor Hans Posse, director of the « Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister » (the Dresden Picture Gallery) , as special envoy. A few days later, on 26 June, Hitler signed a letter intended to give Posse the authority he would need to do this job.

He wrote :

« I commission Doctor Hans Posse, Director of Dresden Gallery, to build-up the new Art Museum for “ Linz an der Donau ”. All Party and State services are ordered to assist Doctor Posse in fulfillment of his mission. »

Posse had a checkered relationship with the National-Socialists. His wife had joined the Nazi Party in 1932, but when Posse himself tried to join in 1933, his application was rejected 1 year later. He was later accused of having promoted so-called « Degenerate art » , and of having Jewish ancestry. In 1938, he was asked to resign as director (a position he had held since 1910, from the age of 31) but refused, taking a leave of absence instead. He was nevertheless fired, only to be restored to the position on Hitler's orders, possibly through the influence of art-dealer Karl Haberstock.

Although Hitler had favoured German and Austrian paintings from the 19th Century, Posse's focus was on early-German, Dutch, French, and Italian paintings. Posse wrote in his diary that Hitler intended the Museum to hold « only the best of all periods from the pre-historic beginnings of art to the 19th Century, and recent times » . Hitler told Posse that he was only to answer to him.

The « Sonderauftrag » not only collected art for the « Führermuseum » , but also for other Museums in the German « Reich » , especially in the Eastern territories. The artworks would have been distributed to these Museums after the War. The « Sonderauftrag » , located in Dresden, had approximately 20 specialists attached to it :

« Curators of paintings, prints, coins, and armor, a librarian, an architect, an administrator, photographers, and restorers. »

The staff included : Robert Örtel and Gottfried Reimer (of the Dresden Gallery) , and SS officer Friedrich Wolffhardt, as curator of books and autographs ; Leopold Rupprecht of the « Kunsthistorisches Museum » as curator for armour ; and Fritz Dworschak, also of that Museum, as curator for coins.

In the late-summer and autumn of 1939, Posse traveled a number of times to Vienna to the Central Depot for confiscated art in the « Neue Burg » to pick-out art pieces for the Linz Museum and, in October, he gave to Martin Bormann, for Hitler's approval, the list of artworks confiscated from the Vienna Rothschilds which Posse had selected for the Museum. These included works by Hans Holbein the Elder, van Dyck, Rembrandt, Frans Hals, Tintoretto, Gerard ter Borch and Francesco Guardi, among others. These 182 pieces were also included in Posse's July 1940 list of 324 paintings he had chosen for the Museum's collection. Posse also went to Poland to examine confiscated artworks there, selecting works by Leonardo, Raphael, and Rembrandt for the Museum in Linz, although these pieces never actually left the control of the General Government, the rump of Poland left after Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union took the territory they wanted.

On 10 June 1940, Posse wrote to Bormann :

« The special delegate for the safe-guarding of art and cultural properties has just returned from Holland. He notified me today that there exists at the moment a particularly favourable opportunity to purchase valuable works of art from Dutch dealers and private owners in German currency. Even though a large number of important works have doubtless been removed recently from Holland, I believe that the trade still contains many objects which are desirable for the " Führer " 's collection, and which may be acquired without foreign exchange. »

As a result of this, accounts of about 500,000 « Reichsmarks » were opened in Paris and Rome for Posse's personal use, and, around July 1940, he expanded the scope of the « Sonderauftrag Linz » into Belgium and the Netherlands when he established an office in The Hague, as « Referent für Sonderfragen » (Adviser on « Special Questions ») . Posse was able to report to Bormann that, as of March 1941, he had spent 8,522,348 « Reichsmarks » on artworks for the « Führermuseum » . He later bought most of the Mannheimer Collection, in 1944, including Rembrandt's « Jewish Doctor » (assisted by the threat of confiscation from the Nazi government of Arthur Seyß-Inquart) with the remainder of the collection being purchased in the same manner in France, later on. The collecting of the « Sonderauftrag Linz » includes many such cases of forced sale, using funds from sales of Hitler's book, « Mein Kampf » , and stamps showing his portrait. Members of the « Sonderauftrag Linz » made a considerable number of purchasing trips throughout Europe, acquiring a significant number of artworks, and also arranged purchases through art-dealers.

Hitler was pleased with Posse's work and, in 1940, awarded him the honorific of « Professor » , something the « Führer » did for many of his favourites in the arts, such as Leni Riefenstahl, the actress and film director ; architects Albert Speer and Hermann Giesler ; sculptors Arno Breker and Josef Thorak ; Wilhelm Furtwängler, conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra ; actor Emil Jannings ; and photographer Heinrich Hoffmann, among others.

In October 1939, Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini had made an agreement that any Germanic artworks in public museums in the South Tyrol (a traditionally German-speaking area which had been given to Italy after the First World War, in return for entering the War on the side of the « Triple Entente ») could be removed and returned to Germany, but when Posse attempted to do so, with the assistance of Heinrich Himmler's « Ahnenerbe » , the Italians managed to keep putting things off, and no repatriations ever took place.

Posse died in December 1942 of cancer. His funeral was a high State event to which Hitler invited the directors of all Art Museums in the « Reich » ; Propaganda Minister Josef Goebbels delivered the eulogy, although there was no mention made of the Linz Museum project, since it was a State secret Posse had gathered more than 2,500 artworks for the Linz Museum in the 3 years he was head of the « Sonderauftrag Linz » .

In March 1943, Hermann Voß, an art-historian, director of the Wiesbaden Gallery and former Deputy director of the « Kaiser-Friedrich-Museum » , in Berlin, took-over the Special Commission. His appointment was considered odd by some, since he was known to be an anti-Nazi with a considerable number of Jewish friends and colleagues, but Hitler was known to overlook political factors when dealing with matters of art, and Voß's knowledge of southern German artwork, as well as French and Italian painting, may have decided the matter for him. Voß was not nearly as active or energetic as Posse had been, and was prone to send-out agents rather than to travel himself to make purchases, or to make dealers bring works to him.

Hitler's relationship with Voß was not as warm as with Posse. The 2 men met only on several occasions, and Voß was not given authority over books, armour and coins, as Posse had been.

Voß is said to have remarked after one meeting with the « Führer » :

« He's even worse than I thought. »

Voß attempted to mend his fences with Hitler with an elaborate gift for his birthday in 1944, accompanied by a list of his acquisitions in which he claimed to have bought 881 items, compared to 122 paintings that Posse had collected the year before. Voß did, indeed, spend money more profligately than Posse had, and his budget was later reduced near the end of the War. Under interrogation after the War, he claimed to have acquired 3,000 paintings for the « Führermuseum » , between 1943 and 1944, although the records do not support this figure, and many of the artworks were of distinctly secondary importance.

In April 1943, the German public first heard about the Linz project in a special edition of Heinrich Hoffmann's art-magazine, « Kunst dem Volk » (Art to the People) . It revealed both the intention to build a great art-gallery in Linz and the existence of the collection which had been amassed for it, although, of course, nothing was said about the methods used to acquire many of the pieces. The magazine featured coloured plates of works in the collection by Rembrandt, Leonardo da Vinci, Breughel and Vermeer, among others. Up to that time, only 2 works which had been collected for the Linz Museum had been seen by the public (but without disclosure of where they were eventually designated to go) . The first was Myron's sculpture « Discobolus » (The Discus Thrower) , which Hitler obtained surreptitiously in 1938 through the Berlin State Museum, but ordered to be displayed at the Glyptothek in Munich, where he proudly told his invited guests at the unveiling :

« May you all then realize how glorious man already was back then in his physical beauty. »

The other work was Makart's triptych, « The Plague in Florence » , which Hitler acquired as a gift from Benito Mussolini, who, when the owners refused to sell it, seized their villa and confiscated the painting, which he presented to the « Führer » at the train station in Florence.

The legal authority for the collection of artworks for the « Führermuseum » began with Hitler himself, who, after the Enabling Act of 1933, had the power to enact laws without involving the « Reichstag » . In effect, whatever Hitler directed to be done had the force of law. It was his personal desire for the creation of a Museum and the revitalization of Linz which began the collection program. Martin Bormann, the head of the Nazi Party and, later, also Hitler's private secretary, was also closely connected to the program from the beginning, in particular as a conduit through which to access Hitler. He acted as the Chief of Staff for the « Sonderauftrag Linz » .

On the next level of hierarchy, « Reichsminister » Hans Lammers, who was President of the « Reich » Chancellery, and Doctor Helmut von Hummel, Bormann's « Special Assistant » and « a particularly vicious Nazi » , actually drew-up the directives which set-out the policies and procedures which governed the collecting process, both for confiscations and purchases. The financing and administration of the Linz program was their responsibility. Von Hummel had replaced Kurt Hanssen.

Other Nazi officials involved in the confiscation of art, but not specifically with collection for the Linz Museum, included the « Reich » Minister for Science, Education, and Culture, Bernhard Rust ; the Governor General for Poland, Hans Frank ; and Heinrich Himmler, the Head of the SS.

In 2004, Birgit Schwarz published 19 photograph-albums as documents of the intended gallery holdings. These « “ Führer ” albums » , which were created between autumn 1940 and autumn 1944, were presented to Hitler every Christmas and on his birthday, 20 April. Originally, 31 volumes existed, but only 19 have been preserved in Germany, and 11 are considered to be lost. The albums are documents of the intended gallery holdings and are the most important historical and visual sources relating to the gallery of the « Führermuseum » . Notably, the collection included : 3 Rembrandts ; « la Danse » by Watteau ; the « Memling portrait » by Corsini ; Rubens' « Ganymede » ; and Vermeer's « The Artist in His Studio » , a forced sale at a knock-down price.

In the « authoritarian anarchy » and « administrative chaos » that was typical of the way the 3rd « Reich » operated, the « Sonderauftrag Linz » was not the only Nazi agency collecting artworks. In France, as in many other countries in Europe, the office of « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (Special Purposes « Reich » Leader, Rosenberg) , or ERR, was the primary agency. On 5 November 1940, a directive from « Reichsmarchall » Hermann Göring to Alfred Rosenberg, the head of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , and to the Chief of Military Administration in Paris outlines the several categories of « ownerless » art confiscated from Jews for « safe-guarding » . One of the categories were « Those art objects for the further disposition of which the “ Führer ” has reserved for himself the right of decision. » , while other categories were those works desired by Göring himself, those destined for German Museums other than the « Führermuseum » . Although the directive was intended to be effective immediately, Göring indicates that he had, yet, to clear it with Hitler, but intended to do so.

Hitler, then, issued on 18 November his own directive, a « Führerbefehl » similar to the ones he had issued for Poland and Austria, announcing his prerogative over all confiscated art in the occupied Western territories. Rosenberg, thus, became a formal procurement agent for the « Führermuseum » , except when Göring intervened. This apparently brought about some internecine squabbling, as Doctor Posse had been given the authority to act on Hitler's behalf, and the German commanders of occupied countries were required to keep him regularly informed about their confiscations of artwork. Probably because of Göring's interference, Posse formally requested that the « Reich » Chancellery reiterate his power to act for the « Führer » . The result was a « general high-level directive » confirming Hitler's primacy through Posse, and a direction to Posse to review the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » 's inventory, in regard to the needs of the planned Museum in Linz.

On 20 March 1941, Rosenberg reported that his unit had proceeded to follow the directive, having « collected » over 4,000 items ; those personally selected by Göring had already been shipped by train to the air-raid shelters of the « Führer » Building, in Munich. Several years later, on 16 April 1943, Rosenberg sent Hitler photographs of some of the more valuable paintings confiscated from the Western Occupied Territories, to add to the 53 photographs he had sent earlier. Rosenberg asked for permission to see Hitler personally, to present a catalog of works seized, as well as 20 additional folders of photographs.

By one conservative estimate, about 21,903 objects were confiscated from France. Of these, about 700 went to Göring. 53 were ear-marked for the « Führermuseum » in Linz. Rosenberg kept the rest under his own control until 1945. In 2008, the German Historic Museum of Berlin published a data-base with paintings collected for the « Führermuseum » and for other Museums in the German « Reich » .

The German occupation of Paris began on 14 June 1940 and, on 30 June, Hitler ordered that artworks in the French national collection be « safe-guarded » and, in particular, « ownerless » art and historical documents (meaning works which were the property of Jews and could, therefore, be confiscated from them) be « protected » as well. 3 days later, the German ambassador in France, Otto Abetz, ordered the confiscation of the collections of the 15 most important art-dealers in the city, most of whom were Jewish. These pieces were, then, brought to the German Embassy. Through the actions of Count Franz von Wolff-Metternich, the head of the « Kunstschutz » (Art Protection) (an agency which dated from World War I, and which had a mission which was superficially similar to that of the Allied Monuments, Fine-Arts, and Archives program - MFAA) , Nazi military authorities intervened and stopped Abetz from making any more confiscations. Most of the artwork in the Embassy was, then, transferred for storage to the Louvre, at the suggestion of Jacques Jaujard, the Director of French National Museums.

Wolff-Metternich continued in his efforts to protect the artworks, which what he saw as the proper role of his agency. In particular, he was able to fend-off Josef Gœbbels' demand that almost a thousand pieces of « Germanic » art, held in the collection of confiscated pieces, be shipped immediately to Germany. Wolff-Metternich did not disagree that the artworks properly belonged in the « Reich » , but did not think that sending them at the time was the correct course of action, and held-off Gœbbels with bureaucratic maneuvers and strict interpretation of Hitler's directive, which specified that artwork in France should not be moved until a peace treaty between France and German had been signed, which had not as yet occurred.

The collection of artwork in the Louvre was destined to survive the War, and was not subjected to predation from the various Nazi entities confiscating and collecting artwork for shipment back to Germany, including those doing so for Hitler's planned Museum in Linz. Wolff-Metternich was eventually removed from his office, as he was not pliable enough to provide the veneer of legality that was wanted by the Nazi authorities. Jaujard was fired as well after his vehement protest over the German theft of the Ghent Altarpiece in 1942, but when the staffs of every French Museum resigned, in protest over his dismissal, the Nazis were forced to restore him to his office, where he was able to continue to safe-guard the French national collection, and provide assistance to the « Résistance » .

Jaujard, however, could do very little to protect the private art-collections of Paris and France from the predations of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » . These collections (those of the French Rothschilds ; Paul Rosenberg, the art-dealer ; Georges and Daniel Wildenstein ; the investment banker Pierre David-Weill ; Germain Seligman, the art-historian and dealer ; Alphonse Kann ; and the other great collectors of the time) were systematically subjected to confiscations under various bureaucratically outlined pretenses of « protection » , and were then brought to the « Jeu de Paume » Museum, where they were cataloged and divided-up for Adolf Hitler's collection, for Hermann Göring's, for the use of Alfred Rosenberg's « scholarly » institutions which were attempting to prove the inferiority of Jews, as well as for other purposes. Fortunately, Rose Valland (at the time, an un-paid museum employee, later the Museum's « attaché » and « assistante ») was a member of the French « Résistance », and had remained working at the Museum on Jaujard's orders. Valland kept lists of all the works which came in, the secret storehouses where they were stock-piled when they left the Museum, and the numbers of the train cars when the last of the paintings were shipped to Germany just before the Allied recapturing of Paris. Using Valland's information, the « Résistance » was able to delay the train sufficiently so that it never reached Germany.

Although the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg », in theory, was part of Alfred Rosenberg's Nazi Empire, Rosenberg was an ideologue who had no interest in art, and did not appreciate the value to Germany of looting the patrimony of the occupied countries. « Reichsmarschall » Hermann Göring, on the other hand, Hitler's anointed successor and the head of the « Luftwaffe », was an avid collector of confiscated artworks, with an unquenchable appetite for jewels and finery as well. As a result, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » in France became, in large part, « Göring's personal looting organization ». During the course of the War, Göring paid 20 visits to the « Jeu de Paume », in Paris, to view the results of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg »'s confiscations.

On occasion, Göring's desires conflicted with those of Hitler and Hitler's agents. When this occurred, Göring gave way, not wanting to provoke trouble with the « Führer ». Several times, he also made « gifts » to the collection of the « Führermuseum ». He sent 53 pieces from the French Rothschild Collection, which had been confiscated in Paris for him by the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg », to Munich to be held for the Linz Museum, including Vermeer's « The Astronomer », sent in November 1940, and which became Hitler's most cherished painting in his collection. Later on, in 1945, Göring gave Hitler 17 paintings and 4 bronzes from the Naples Museum. These had been confiscated by the Hermann Göring « Panzer » Division while they were being shipped to safety from Monte Cassino to the Vatican, and were later presented to the « Reichsmarschall » at Carinhall, his « Hunting Lodge / Art Gallery / Imperial Palace ».

At its peak, Göring's art-collection included 1,375 paintings, 250 sculptures and 168 tapestries. Its value has been estimated at several 100 million « Marks ».

When the Russian Army was about to cross the Oder River into Germany, in February 1945, threatening Carinhall, Göring began to evacuate his art-collection by train, sending it to his other residences in the south of Germany. A 2nd train-load went-out in March, and a 3rd in April. The contents of the shipments were personally chosen by Göring, who, at 1st, was inclined not to take the artwork he had acquired through the confiscations of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg », in case there might be questions of provenance in the future, but he was dissuaded from this course by Walter Andreas Hoffer, who was in charge of Göring's collection. Even after the contents of 3 long trains had left, Carinhall still had a considerable amount of art left in it, statues buried around the grounds, and looted furniture still in the rooms. Göring had « Luftwaffe » demolition experts wire the estate for destruction, so the treasures he had left behind would not fall into the hands of the Russians.

A number of art-dealers and private individuals profited greatly from Hitler's campaign to stock his planned Museum. Primary among them was Karl Haberstock, who operated a wide network of German agents in Paris, the south of France, the Netherlands and Switzerland, but also at least 75 French collaborators. Haberstock declined to take a commission on the major purchases for the Museum, but took his regular fee otherwise, amassing a fortune. Thanks to his relationships with Hans Posse and with Hitler, he sold over 100 paintings designated for the Linz collection. When Posse went to France under Hitler's orders, he took the unscrupulous Haberstock with him, and the dealer, working through 82 local agents, purchased 62 pieces for the Linz collection, including works by Rembrandt, Brueghel, Watteau and Rubens.

Maria Almas Dietrich was another art-dealer who did well by the Nazi obsession with obtaining art. An acquaintance of Hitler through his official photographer, Heinrich Hoffmann, Dietrich sold 80 paintings to the Linz Museum collection, and a further 270 for Hitler's personal collection, as well as over 300 for other German Museums and Nazi Party functionaries. Prolific rather than knowledgeable, Dietrich still managed to make a considerable amount of money from the Linz program. She also managed to avoid being sent to a concentration camp, despite having a Jewish father, bearing a child with her Jewish lover, and marrying a Jew from Turkey, although she renounced Judaism after divorcing him. Hitler, despite his rabid anti-Semitism, was frequently, but not consistently, an un-conventional Nazi when it came to Jews involved in the arts. It may also have helped that Hitler's mistress Eva Braun was a friend of Dietrich's daughter.

Unlike Dietrich, « S.A. Gruppenführer » Prince Philipp of Hessen was a connoisseur of the arts and architecture and acted as Posse's principal agent in Italy, where he lived with his wife, a daughter of King Victor Emmanuel. A grandson of the German Emperor Frederick III, and a great-grandson of Queen Victoria, Philipp provided « a veneer of aristocratic elegance which facilitated important purchases from the Italian nobility » . Philipp assisted Posse in purchasing 90 paintings from Italy, and bought several more for the Linz collection on his own account.

Another dealer used by Hans Posse was Hildebrand Gurlitt, through whom he made expensive purchases of tapestries, paintings and drawings.

Other Nazi agents in the Linz program included Kajetan Mühlmann, a high SS official whose territories were Poland and the Netherlands ; Baron Kurt von Behr, the head of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » in France ; and Hitler's photographer Heinrich Hoffmann, an early art-adviser who fell from Hitler's favour after 1941, due to Martin Bormann's dislike of him, but who had acted as an intermediary between some German art-dealers and the Linz program, and possibly did the same in the Netherlands as well.

There is some debate about whether art for the « Führermuseum » was primarily stolen or purchased. Hanns Christian Löhr argues in « Das Braune Haus der Kunst : Hitler und der “ Sonderauftrag Linz ” » (The Brown House of Art : Hitler and the « Sonderauftrag Linz ») that only a small portion of the collection (possibly, 12 %) came from seizures or expropriation. Moreover, another 2.5 % was derived from forced sales. However, Jonathan Petropoulos, a historian at Loyola College in Baltimore and an expert in War-time looting, argues that most of the purchases were not « arm's length » in nature. Gerard Aalders, a Dutch historian, said those sales amounted to « technical looting » , since the Netherlands and other occupied countries were forced to accept German « Reichsmarks » that ultimately proved worthless.

Aalders argues that :

« If Hitler's or Göring's art-agent stood on your doorstep and offered $ 10,000 for the painting instead of the $ 100,000 it was really worth, it was pretty hard to refuse. »

He adds that Nazis who encountered reluctant sellers threatened to confiscate the art, or arrest the owner. Birgit Schwarz, an expert on the « Führermuseum », in her review of Löhr's book, pointed-out that the author focused on the purchases which were held in the « Führerbau », in Munich, and ignored the deposits of looted art in Upper-Austria : in Thürntal, Kremsmünster and Hohenfurth (Vyšší Brod) .

On the subject of purchases versus confiscations, Doctor Cris Whetton, the author of « Hitler's Fortune » , commented :

« I had expected to find that Hitler was directly responsible for looting and stealing of paintings that he wanted for himself, and I couldn't find any evidence of it, I found evidence that he paid for them ; sometimes at knock-down prices, but not direct theft in any way. I was quite surprised by this, and I have to say in all honesty that's what I found. »

The Dutch Advisory Committee on the Assessment of Restitution Applications for Items of Cultural Value and the Second World War assesses sales by Dutch Jews to the « Sonderauftrag Linz » . At least 2 restitution claims were rejected because the Committee argued that there were not enough indications showing coercion as the cause of the sale. For example, in 2009, the Restitution Committee rejected the application for the restitution of 12 works sold by the Jewish art-dealer Kurt Walter Bachstitz to the « Sonderauftrag Linz » , between 1940 and 1941. The Committee argued that Bachstitz had been « undisturbed » in the 1st years of the occupation and said it had not found signs of coercion. In 2012, the Commission rejected a claim of the heirs of Benjamin and Nathan Katz, former Jewish art-dealers in the Netherlands. The claim related inter alia to 64 works that the art-dealership Katz sold to the « Sonderauftrag Linz » . The Commission came to the conclusion that there were not enough indications demonstrating that the sales were made under duress.

Works which Hans Posse purchased in Vienna for the Linz collection included : Vermeer's « The Artist in his Studio » ; Titian's « The Toilet of Venus » ; Antonio Canova's « Polyhymnia » ; and several works by Rembrandt. Among the many painting, Karl Haberstock sold to the collection were 2 Rembrandts, one of which, « Portrait of Hendrickje Stoffels » is now thought to be from the Rembrandt work-shop and not a work of the Master. Oddly, Hitler purchased these for an inflated price, despite the fact that seller was a partly Jewish woman and the paintings could have been confiscated. Posse also purchased over 200 pieces which Jewish owners had managed to get into Switzerland, where they were safe from confiscation. On the other hand, Posse did not shy away from confiscation either, particular in the former Czechoslovakia and Poland, where all property was subject to it, but also in the Netherlands.

It is not possible to determine with any accuracy the size of the collection which had been amassed for Hitler's planned Museum in Linz, but Frederick Spotts suggests that something around 7,000 pieces had been confiscated, bought or purloined specifically for the « Führermuseum » , and that others from the many other art repositories scattered around Germany would most probably have been added had Hitler won the War and he and his art-experts had the opportunity to sort through the artworks and assign them to various museums. According to Spotts, the figure of 7,000 accords well with the data released by the Art Looting Investigation Unit. Other experts quote higher-figures of up to 8,500 for the ultimate size of the collection.

Despite its size, and the unprecedented access Hitler' agents had to artworks throughout Occupied Europe, the Linz collection had noticeable flaws. According to Spotts, its « gaps » included English art, Spanish art and art of the Northern Renaissance ; major artists were missing from the Italian part of the collection as well.

Whatever its size and quality, near the end of the War, Hitler wanted (it is understood) that he meant the collection to be for the public - even though there were hundreds of artworks that were specifically marked for use in the « Berghof » , his mountain retreat, and for a castle in Posen which Hitler intended as another residence. Still, in the « Private Testament » , he drew-up the day before his death, he specified that the collection should go to the Museum when it was built, writing that they were « never collected for private purposes, but always only for the expansion of a gallery in my hometown of Linz on the Danube » .

The artworks collected for the « Führermuseum » were originally stored in a number of places. The purchases were mostly kept in the air-raid shelters of the « Führerbau » in Munich (one of a number of large buildings Hitler had built in the birthplace of the Nazi Party) where they were under the control of the Nazi Party Chancellery ; Hitler would often come to visit them and indulge in long discussions on art as one of his tasks when coming to Munich, even during the War. Confiscated artworks were stored in deposits in the area of Upper-Austria, located in the middle of forests or in the mountains. The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » alone requisitioned 6 estates for storage, including Neuschwanstein Castle, in the Bavarian Alps, in which items from France were stored ; the Benedictine monastery on the island of Frauenchiemsee, in the Chiemsee lake, halfway between Munich and Salzburg ; an estate in the Salzkammergut hills, which had been a summer residence for the Austrian royal family ; and the Grand Duke of Luxembourg's hunting lodge.

Rose Valland eventually shared the trove of information she had gathered at the « Jeu de Paume » Museum, while the Nazis were using it as a way-station for confiscated art, with 1st Lieutenant James Rorimer, one of the « Monuments Men » of the MFAA, who would be attached to the U.S. 7th Army. It would overrun the places in southern Germany (Heilbronn, Baxheim, Hohenschwangau and Neuschwanstein Castle) which Valland was certain were the locations of the repositories of much of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » -looted art which had been shipped back to Germany. Captain Walker Hancock, the Monuments officer for the U.S. 1st Army, learned the locations of 109 art-repositories in Germany, east of the Rhine, from the former assistant of Count Wolff-Metternich of the « Kunstschutz » , thereby, doubling the number of repositories known at that time. Additional information came to « Monuments Men » Captain Robert Posey and Private Lincoln Kirstein, who were attached to the U.S. 3rd Army, from Hermann Bunjes, a corrupted art-scholar and former SS Captain who had been deeply involved in the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » 's « Jeu de Paume » operation on behalf of Hermann Göring. From Bunjes came the information that Hermann Göring had moved his collection out of Carinhall, and, most importantly, the revelation of the existence of a massive repository in the Altaussee salt mines, which included much of Hitler's collection intended for the « Führermuseum » in Linz.

Despite the fact that the original storage locations, which had no military purpose and were culturally important in any case, would have been extremely unlikely to have been the subject of an Allied air-attack, in 1943, Hitler ordered that these collections be moved. Beginning in February 1944, the artworks were relocated to the 14th Century Steinberg salt mines above the village of Altaussee, code-named « Dora » , in which the holdings of various Viennese museums had earlier been transferred. The transfer of Hitler's Linz collection from the repositories to the salt mine took 13 months to complete, and utilized both tanks and oxen when the trucks could not navigate the steep, narrow and winding roads because of the winter weather. The final convoy of purloined art arrived at the mine, in April 1945, just weeks before V-E Day.

The labyrinthine salt mine has a single entrance, and a small gasoline-powered narrow-gauge engine pulling a flat car was utilized to navigate to the various caverns created by Centuries of salt mining. Into these spaces, workmen built storage-rooms which boasted wooden floors, racks specifically designed to hold the paintings and other artworks, up-to-date lighting, and dehumidification equipment. Despite the fact that the salt was mined using pipes and sluices through which flowed gravity-fed water from the mountain, which carried dissolved salt 17 miles away to Bad Ischl, where the water was evaporated, leaving behind the salt, the mine was not naturally humid, as the salt in the mine's walls absorbed excess moisture, keeping the chambers at a constant 65 % humidity, while the temperature only varied from a low of 40 degrees Fahrenheit in the winter to 47 degrees in the summer. Mining operations continued as the artwork was loaded into the mines, with the miners occasionally dragooned into helping to unload.

According to James S. Plaut, who from November 1944 to April 1946 was Director of the Art Looting Investigation Unit of the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) , the salt mines held :

6,755 Old Master paintings, of which 5,350 were destined for Linz, 230 drawings, 1,039 prints, 95 tapestries, 68 sculptures, 43 cases of « objets d'art » , and innumerable pieces of furniture ; in addition, 119 cases of books from Hitler's library in Berlin, and 237 cases of books for the Linz library.

The noted Ghent Altarpiece (the stealing of which had caused Jacques Jaujard to protest vehemently and temporarily lose his job) arrived in the salt mine from Neuschwanstein, in the autumn of 1944 ; and Michelangelo's « Bruges Madonna » , in October of that year. Detailed records were kept at Dresden and moved to « Schloß Weißenstein » at the end of the War, where they were confiscated by the Russians, but these were primarily of the paintings stored in Munich in the « Führerbau » .

Also in the Altaussee repository was « The Plague in Florence » by Hans Makart, a favourite of Hitler's. It had been given to him by Benito Mussolini after Hitler had asked for it numerous times.

In April 1945, Supreme Allied Commander Dwight D. Eisenhower gave-up Berlin as a « prestige objective » that would not be worth the troops killed in order to take it (the death toll was estimated at 100,000) and ordered the 3rd and 7th Armies to turn south, towards what the Allies feared might be an « Alpine Redoubt » from which Hitler or fanatical Nazis could operate a harassing guerilla campaign. The area was known to have hidden caches of arms and supplies, and intelligence reports had told of SS units moving from Berlin into that area. This new strategy meant that Neuschwanstein and Altausee would be overrun, and the « Monuments Men » would be able to verify and recover the important art-repositories that their information said were located in those places.

As the Allied troops approached the salt mines, August Eigruber, the « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria, gave orders to blow it up and destroy the artwork using the 8 crates of 500 kilogram bombs he had stored in the mine, on 10 and 13 April 1945. Hitler, through Martin Bormann, counter-manded this order, and Albert Speer, the Minister of Armaments and War Production, had « clarified » Hitler's scorched earth « Nero Decree », but Eigruber felt he knew what Hitler's actual intent was. He ignored the pleas from the managers of the mine that it be saved as a vital resource - in Heilbronn, another salt mine which was used to store art had been ordered to be blown-up, but the miners refused to do so, as the mine was vital to their lives and livelihoods. After the « Führer » 's suicide, Eigruber ignored the conflicting and confusing orders coming from Berlin and again ordered the destruction of the mine and all the artwork in it. The managers of the mine attempted to remove the crates of bombs, but were headed-off by Eigruber's adjutant, who placed armed guards loyal to the « Gauleiter » at the entrance. The bombs were, then, wired for detonation by a demolition team.

Eigruber fled with an elite SS body-guard, fully expecting his order of destruction to be carried-out. Nevertheless, this did not happen. Instead, between 1 and 7 May 1945, before the arrival of U.S. Army troops, on 8 May, the 8 500 kilogram bombs were removed from the mine, and the tunnels near the mine entrance were blown-up, blocking the mine and protecting it from intrusion without doing damage to the irreplaceable and priceless art-collection inside.

Who, exactly, was responsible for saving the artwork took many years to determine, and was finally unravelled in the 1980's by Austrian historian Ernst Kubin. The plan was devised by Doctor Emmerich Pöchmüller, the general director of the mine, Eberhard Mayerhoffer, the technical director, and Otto Högler, the mine's foreman. It was sanctioned by Ernst Kaltenbrunner, an SS officer of high-rank in the « Gestapo » who had grown-up in the area, and was later convicted of mass-murder and hanged. The plan was carried-out by the miners, with the tacit approval of Eigruber's guards, several of whom had been persuaded by Karl Sieber, an art-restorer who had worked on paintings stored in the mine, that destroying the artwork and the mine was not a good idea. The entire operation took 3 weeks to implement. On 5 May, the signal was given, and 6 tons of explosives with 386 detonators and 502 timing switches were activated, causing 66 blasts which closed-off 137 tunnels. The blockages took about 1 month to clear away totally, although a hole big enough for a man to sidle through was completed by the miners overnight after the Americans arrived.

Due to geo-political considerations, U.S. forces were ordered to pull-back from the territory which included Altausee, as it had been determined that it would be part of the Russian zone of occupation. Because of this, the paintings and artworks in the mine were removed and transferred elsewhere in about 2 weeks, rather than the year which had originally been planned.

Most of the approximately 12,000 pieces of art in the mine were recovered. The Altausee trove included both works meant specifically for the « Führermuseum » and other looted artwork as well. Other caches of art not intended for Linz were recovered in places throughout the « Reich » ; there were over 1,000 repositories in southern Germany alone, although some of the artworks in them came from the collections of German Museums - these were eventually returned. Much of Hermann Göring's collection from his estate at Carinhall was discovered in a cave at Berchtesgaden, where he had a summer home near Hitler's « Berghof » retreat, part of it was also left in his private train, which was found in Unterstein, and had been looted by the local residents.

Part of the collection designated for the Linz Museum was stored in the air-raid shelters of the « Führer » Building in Munich, part of the Nazi complex there. The building was broken into by a mob before American troops arrived in the city, and most of the 723 paintings still there were looted, with others were taken by American soldiers. Only 148 paintings were eventually recovered.

...

Before World War II's start, Adolf Hitler was driven to create his dream museum containing all his favourite Aryan-approved art. Noah Charney on how the « Monuments Men » had to unravel the thousands of objects plundered by the « Führer » 's minions and what they learned from Napoleon.

When « Monuments Men » Robert Posey and Lincoln Kirstein walked into the white-washed cottage in the German forest that housed Hermann Bunjes, the Harvard-educated one-time SS officer and art advisor to Hermann Göring, they learned of an elaborate plan involving the wholesale looting of Europe's art treasures. Bunjes, hiding in fear of reprisals against SS officers by angry German citizens, told these fellow art historians about the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (the Nazi art theft unit) and about Hitler's plan to create a city-wide museum in his boyhood town of Linz, in Austria : a « super museum » that would contain every important artwork in the world, including a wing of « degenerate art » , a sort of chamber of horrors to demonstrate from what monstrosities the Nazis had saved the world. It was news to Posey and Kirstein, who had to restrain their shock. The « Monuments Men » had heard rumors of art theft and looting throughout the War, but had no idea of the scale (some estimate that around 5 million cultural objects were looted, lost, or mis-handled during the War) , the advanced level of organization (scores of Nazi officers and hundreds of soldiers were assigned exclusively to the confiscation, transport, and maintenance of looted art and archival material) , and the ultimate destination of the choicest pieces : the « Führermuseum » . It was years into the War, when this encounter took place, and only then did the « Monuments Men » finally realized what they were up against. Bunjes further detailed a number of hiding places for looted art, including the famous salt mine at Altaussee, in the Austrian Alps, which contained some 12,000 stolen artworks, the mother-load destined for the Linz museum. Posey and Kirstein were on the hunt for « The Ghent Altarpiece » by Jan van Eyck, the most influential painting ever made and the most-frequently stolen, but could hardly believe what they were hearing. Yes, « The Ghent Altarpiece » was the number one target that Hitler wanted as the centerpiece for his museum, both because of its beauty, fame, and importance but also because it had been forcibly repatriated to Belgium from Germany by the Treaty of Versailles, and seizing it back would right this perceived wrong against the German people. But here was the chance to save not just this painting, but tens of thousands of artworks.

Course contre la montre

Adolf Hitler's plan for his museum been on his mind for more than a decade, at least since 1934 ; for Hitler had long stewed upon the idea of capturing « The Ghent Altarpiece » for Germany, and had even dispatched a Nazi art detective (and Hitler look-alike) , Heinrich Köhn, to find the « Righteous Judges » panel, one of the 12 that comprises « The Ghent Altarpiece » , which was stolen from Saint-Bavo Cathedral in Ghent, in 1934, and has never been recovered. Köhn was sent to Ghent to find it before the Nazis stole the rest of the altarpiece. The only reason why they would bother hunting for the one missing panel is if they intended to capture the rest of it as soon as the opportunity arose.

The museum was to have occupied the majority of the city center of Linz, turning the working-class town into Vienna's cultural superior, a concept that Hitler had relished ever since his failed attempt to become an art student in Vienna, a city that made him feel like a rejected, 2nd class citizen, prior to his political career. A joke went that while Munich was the city of the Nazi « Bewegung » (the Nazi movement) , Linz would be the city of the Nazi « Bodenbewegung » (the Nazi earthquake) , by the time the contractors got underway. Designed by architect Albert Speer, the museum complex was to include an Opera House, a hotel, a parade ground, a theatre, a library with a quarter-million volumes, and a museum with a 500 feet colonnaded façade in the terrifyingly grand Fascist Neo-Classical style. An estimated 36 kilometers of galleries were included in the plan ; to put that in perspective, the enormous and labyrinthine Victoria and Albert Museum, in London, has about 8 kilometers of galleries, to display some 27,000 objects. On 21 June 1939, Adolf Hitler set-up a special Commission to oversee the Linz project ; long before he had managed to annex, loot, and steal the art to fill it. From the fall of 1940 on, Hitler regularly received (often as a Christmas present) annotated photo albums full of confiscated art that could be featured in the « Führermuseum » . A total of 31 albums were prepared, of which 19 survive today. Hitler found great pleasure and comfort in poring over these albums, as well as the blueprints for the Linz project. He had the blueprints with him in his Berlin « bunker » when he killed himself, and was said to have studied them even near his end.

The German Historical Museum began a project, in 2008, to create a virtual version of the « Führermuseum » collection, an online database of art looted between 1930 and 1945, which gives a sense of what was taken. Though the methods were abominable, as a professor of art history, I admit to a dark and curious appeal to the concept that Hitler tried to bring about : a single « super museum » containing all of the world's most important art.

Adolf Hitler was, by no means, the 1st person to try to create such a museum. Jean-Dominique Vivant Denon, the 1st director of the Louvre Museum, had the same plan. He was Napoleon's chief art advisor, and made a wish-list of art that he would quite like to have for the Louvre, should it fall into the path of Napoleon's forces. Napoleon was the 1st general to have a dedicated art theft unit in his army, and to require the forfeit of artworks as a term of armistice ; if you wanted him to stop shooting at you, you had to give him your art. His art theft unit was responsible for the capture of thousands of works, particularly from Italy. Adding insult to injury, Napoleon obliged those he defeated to pay for the shipping of the art he stole from them back to Paris. The Vatican had to fork-out the equivalent of 2.3 million dollars in today's currency to cover shipping for the 100 plus artworks that Napoleon's team had chosen, after the Treaty of Tolentine, for removal to the Louvre. Hitler's plan for Linz was merely a more elaborate attempt to create what Denon had envisioned for the Louvre, a 150 years prior.

Imagine walking through Hitler's museum. What would we have seen ? The Nazis strongly favored artists and subject matter that they considered Teutonic or Scandinavian ; the artists of choice were the likes of Dürer, Cranach, Friedrich, and van Eyck (Rembrandt shifted in popularity ; some Nazis deemed him « too Jewish » , while others felt that he was the ultimate Aryan artist) , but the scope of the collection was to have been universal, across eras and nations, but with the Northern Renaissance, Teutonic tradition clearly understood to be the « best » . Naturalism was dramatically favored over abstraction. The « degenerate wing » would have housed abstract, Minimalist, Cubist, Impressionist, and Post-Impressionist works ; even by German artists, a number of whom were considered as « bad » as their foreign, often Jewish, counterparts. The scale of the collection would have been tremendous, and it would have been curated in a moralistic, pedantic manner, indicating what one should, or even must, like.

At its center « The Ghent Altarpiece » would have stood, proof that Adolf Hitler had saved Germany after the humiliation of the 1st World War, and the ideal expression of naturalistic, Northern Renaissance painting by an artist of Teutonic lineage.

A stroll through the « Führermuseum » would be harrowing, terrifying, and fascinating. We have the Allied heroes (« Monuments Men » , soldiers, officers, and countless under-sung citizens) to thank for saving Europe's art, and the world. But the haunting concept of a « super museum » remains.

Nazis looted priceless violins

Rare musical instruments were among the loot confiscated by Nazis during World War II, recently unearthed documents reveal.

Violins including dozens of Stradivari, Guarneri and Amati (now worth hundreds of thousands of pounds each) were taken from the homes of musicians who fled or were sent to concentration camps.

The instruments, confiscated by a special team who followed German troops, were to be used in a proposed University in Hitler's home-town of Linz, Austria, after the War.

The lootings have been uncovered by recently released American military documents.

The instruments could join works of art as the focus of compensation claims for stolen artefacts, the « Chicago Tribune » reported.

« This is right now in the earliest phase of our work, but it may be one of the most fascinating areas of exploration. », said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress.

The Congress has been at the forefront of compensation claims for Holocaust-era lootings.

Adolf Hitler ordered a music « action team » (« M-Aktion ») to confiscate and catalogue any instruments of importance, which were then sent to Berlin.

The team followed German troops around Europe, moving in on the homes of those who had fled the Nazis' advance or who were taken to concentration camps.

Experts say looted instruments could be harder to track down than works of art, which are more easy to identify and are more likely to have associated documents.

Many survivors and families of those whose art was looted or sold under the duress during the War have pressed for compensation or the return of their works, with some success.

AB 117 : Cultural Death - Music under Tyranny

Lost artifacts by 3 musicians have resurfaced out of Adolf Hitler's Germany and Joseph Stalin's Soviet Union, each of whom arrived at a horrid end. The Nazis had implemented a program of bringing forcible-coordination to all their ideas and goals, known as « gleichschaltung », an electrical term that involves the « switching » of elements to be compatible within a circuit, or power system : this concept is an apt description of Nazification. It fueled conductor Oswald Kabasta's success whereas Alfred Hœhn and Oskar Fried were unadaptable outsiders whose artistic and personal integrity remain with us, living on in the deep spirituality evident in their recorded performances. The Nazis' broad rise on the cultural front began in 1920 when they relaunched the failed « Völkischer Beobachter » newspaper. A respectable pseudo-intellectual facade lured the German public into accepting an ideology that viewed the past through a pathologically distorted lens, while imposing their National-Socialist revisionism onto a millennial chain of disparate historic events and personages. Their articles progressively manipulated every well-known protagonist, past or present, German or otherwise. The paper's pompous and elevated language instilled in its credulous readers the perception that the illustrious icons of their common past had actually sacrificed their individuality for a greater common good. Of course, their readers were expected to adopt these same values. The Nazi method of parsing history, science, art, and religious investigation before a historic fun-house mirror was to prove their claim of having uncovered hidden patterns in their subjects' unconscious chronology, finally setting aright, so they believed, an enormous historical misperception. In their hands, Rembrandt's deeply expressive art was put forth as « visionary fanaticism », the painter warped from being a creator of contemplative self-portraits into an artist who harbored no patience for any « stagnation of the soul ». One by one, Shakespeare, Bach, Mozart, Schiller, Goethe, Byron, Beethoven, culminating in Richard Wagner, were recast as purveyors of revisionist correctness and early prophets of the Nazi political philosophy. This variety of propagandistic noise replaced a disappearing free press, a crucial step in their relentless and all-encompassing manipulation of society.

Oswald Kabasta

In this new environment, the Austrian conductor Oswald Kabasta was perfectly suited to abet Nazi cultural projects while thriving on the smug satisfaction he gained from their approval. Oswald Kabasta's name denotes ancestors who originated in German-speaking Prague after that language forcibly supplanted the native Czech tongue and culture, relegating Czech-speaking citizens to a minority status. This writer experienced a fleeting account of an evolving Kabasta when meeting Hermann Broch de Rothermann at the home of his relative, the writer Gregor von Rezzori, in 1985. « Pitz », as he was known, asked if I had ever heard of his 1st Viennese piano teacher - Kabasta : « He was a monster ! » (In 2013, Pitz's widow Sachiko Broch de Rothermann stated that Kabasta would beat the boy.) Their contact took place in 1921 when his father, the writer Hermann Broch, engaged Kabasta to teach his 11 year old son while, at the same time, securing a teaching position for Kabasta at the « Traiskirchen School », where he led the orchestra.

In 1926, on Karl Muck's recommendation, Oswald Kabasta became conductor of the Graz State Opera Orchestra. A review from November of that year points out that :

« Herr Kabasta is a man of the phrase. He doesn't seem to stretch the tempos but neither does he exaggerate them. Streams of revolutionary blood roll in his veins. The music that he makes resounds in his heart and therefore sounds good to the ear. »

4 years later, he secured the « RAVAG » (Austrian Radio) Orchestra and, in 1933, he added the Vienna Symphony to his duties. Kabasta was a foil to the conservative conventions of the Vienna Philharmonic, as he championed new and daring works at every possibility. His « Wiener Symphoniker » toured Europe, in 1936, to much acclaim. A London stopover included a live « BBC » broadcast on 19 January, playing Strauß's « Die Schweigsame Frau », Schubert's Symphony No. 3, Enescu's 1st Romanian Rhapsody, Beethoven's « Leonore 2 » Overture, and Stravinsky's « Petrushka » Suite, the latter a work recently banned in Germany. Following Kabasta's return engagement in London that autumn, Benjamin Britten noted in his diary for 28 October 1936 :

« After (Franz) Schmidt's, we go to Vienna Symphony Concert at Queens Hall under Kabasta. This is a really great Orchestra, and it is a miracle to hear real orchestral playing. Perfect ensemble and intonation in the " Leonore 2 " and " Haffner " Mozart Symphony. A most thrilling virtuoso show of " Til Eulenspiegel " - a wonderful show. Bruckner's 7th does not convert me. »

A 1936 Prague review describes how « the voicing and the sound of the orchestra are equally excellent, with a bit more bite in the strings than in our local orchestras. The woodwinds also seem to have a different tone color over all, extremely bright and sonorous » .

During a visit to Munich, in the 1935-1936 season, Oswald Kabasta took part in an evening of contemporary music which so impressed the Munich Philharmonic's directors that he was considered to be a worthy replacement for their old-fashioned Sigmund von Hausegger, an earlier Brucknerian who did not follow Kabasta's forward-looking custom of keeping-up with and Mastering new music, a direction the management sought to develop, with the object of making the Munich orchestra a rival to the Berliners.

The orchestra also attained a greater role in Germany by representing the city where the Nazi Party originated. In « Music in the 3rd " Reich " : National-Socialist Æsthetic Theory as Government Policy » , Donald Wesley Ellis writes :

« Reviews of von Hausegger's concerts were uniformly favourable if reserved. He seemed even to inspire respect in the music editors of the " Völkischer Beobachter " , who said of him that he kept Munich from being a hot-bed of international atonality. »

Oswald Kabasta's candidacy initially posed a problem due to his lack of concern for Nazi cultural priorities by his seeking to include composers such as Igor Stravinsky, who was proscribed by the regime. Nonetheless, his appointment was confirmed. During Kabasta's 1st season with the orchestra, in 1938, he gained the backing of a certain functionary who allowed him to smuggle into his programs the French composers Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel, the decadent Alexander Scriabin, and even Béla Bartók's « Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta » . The latter work amazed Willi Graf (1918-1943) , a member of the anti-Nazi « White Rose » resistance group who was tortured and executed for not informing on his colleagues, noting in his diary that amidst standard offerings such as Beethoven's 8th Symphony and the 2nd « Leonore » Overture came a composer not yet officially banned but hardly tolerated. Bartók's final appearance in Germany came early in 1933 when Frankfurt Radio's conductor Hans Rosbaud featured the composer as soloist in his 2nd Piano Concerto. Rosbaud was denounced for « spreading the Jewish spirit » . Graf pointed-out that as someone who generally avoided risks, Kabasta's inclusion of the Bartók later kept many listeners awake as they wondered about his defiance. In light of such actions, another functionary, one « Herr Mayerhofer » , reported to the Munich Philharmonic's board on Kabasta's proposals for their upcoming season :

« At the end of March 1939, Kabasta presented the customary list of works which he wished to perform in the winter season of that year. The suggestion included Prokofiev's " Classical Symphony " , Igor Stravinsky's " Petrushka " , Bartók's " Music for String, Percussion and Celesta " , Ravel's " Boléro " and Debussy's " 3 Nocturnes " , the traditional artillery of Beethoven, Bruckner, Brahms, Haydn and Mozart. This will, I am sure, put Munich in the center of the international limelight. He could certainly have gotten some advice from the Foreign Office. Prokofiev, who traces his lineage to Stravinsky, is himself international and Western and of no concern at all for German culture. We could certainly do without Ravel, that stylish composer of countless radio broadcast works. In short, we must ask ourselves a basic question : Would it not be well advised to present a group of no less popular recent German works in the stead of this foreign offering ? At least before, we include recent foreign composers, we ought to get the opinion of the Foreign Office concerning the presentation of the right foreign composers in order to advance the purposes of German foreign policy and to maintain good relations with the " Reich " authorities. »

As Kabasta became indispensable due to a dearth of visiting musicians and the availability of a restricted pool of lesser locals, his intransigence is recounted in another briefing :

« In connection with my recent judgment of the Philharmonic season, let me add this not un-important post-script. Gottfried Ruedinger has had his compositions published by the firm of Anton Böhm, in Augsburg. When Böhm recently contacted Kabasta for his judgment of Ruedinger's works, Kabasta refused even to look at the work in question. As far as I can see, Kabasta has busied himself with the old war horses and foreign musicians that are contrary to the precepts of National-Socialist " musikpolitik ". It is of utmost concern to the board of the Philharmonic Society that incidents like the above will circulate in the " Reich " and give the Munich Philharmonic a bad reputation. »

Kabasta, on learning of his criticism, formally responded :

« I don't understand why the Society presented my suggestions for the 1939-1940 season to Mayerhofer in the 1st place. I can only assume that this criticism was extended in his capacity as music librarian. In my 1st year as conductor of the Munich Philharmonic, I have proved that I'm trustworthy and loyal to both the Cultural Office and to Mayor Fiehler. But I insist that I will not allow any meddling in artistic matters nor will I accept anyone's tutelage. »

An indignant Mayerhofer stated that Kabasta was apparently unaware of the membership of the board and the powers vested in Mayerhofer's position, and left it to « Oberbürgermeister » Fiehler to decide « whose position is correct in the era of National-Socialism » in so far as Kabasta « thinks himself that he is some sort of sovereign in his post » . After the « Tonhalle » (« Kaim-Saal ») , Munich's main concert-hall, fell victim to Allied bombs in 1944, Kabasta held on but, 1 year later, was hospitalized with a heart condition. While convalescing, he learned that he had been stripped of his duties as a conductor after being categorized as a « borderline » case by the victorious Allies, initially as someone who was not a « bona fide » Party member but one who had been an applicant. It was deemed inappropriate for Kabasta to retain a position under American control as he had under the Nazis ; return could only come about if an « extensive investigation » would clear him.

According to David Monod in « Settling Scores » :

« The city of Munich continued to pay Kabasta's salary and to negotiate with the Americans for his re-instatement. But this became a virtual impossibility when Kabasta admitted to having applied to join the Nazi Party as a pre-condition for getting his job, even though he added that he had never been issued a membership number and had always been " inwardly " anti-Nazi. (The conductor neglected to tell the American that, 6 years before, in 1939, he had also applied for membership in the Austrian Nazi Party.) . And so, despite his appeals in October 1945, the conductor's name appeared on the Intelligence Section's black-list, and Edward Kilenyi (a Hungarian-American pianist serving in the military) ordered the city to discontinue his pay. An impulsive musician with a bad heart and an unsteady temperament, Kabasta's dismissal left him devastated : " From his hospital room, he issued mournful appeals to Americans and the city for rehabilitation ; but the officials remained firm." »

Holed-up in a hotel room for several months in Kufstein (Austria) , Kabasta sat down and penned a vainglorious farewell note to his former Orchestra :

« As it is known, my career is finished ; I, who in all my life never engaged in politics, have now fallen under the wheel of politics. I thank Destiny for having led me to Munich, where I was able to live for years in marvelous artistic work. I thank the people of Munich for their ability to excite themselves and for their loyalty. I thank with my heart the Orchestra for its artistic contribution and collaboration. Oh, how up-lifting were those experiences with them ! I wish, I beg of you, that you watch over the Philharmonic, for whom I wish the most happy future, crowned with success. The next time, they will play (my !) Bruckner 8th, that they would think of me and my wife in silence. »

2 days later, the 50 year old Kabasta and his wife ingested lethal doses of veronal, a barbiturate, the very same method used by German Jews when wishing to quickly die before possible capture by the Nazis. His wife survived for some months and, when the day of their 25th wedding anniversary arrived, she succeeded in taking her life.

Kabasta, the musician, had an irrepressible urge to perform contemporary Masterpieces, taking great risks to smuggle them in. Alban Berg had been annoyed when he learned that Kabasta was to premier his « Lulu Suite », as he, Erich Kleiber, and Ernst Křenek regarded him with contempt for both musical and personal reasons.

Kabasta's performance of Beethoven's « Leonore 2 » Overture, a work frequently appearing on his programs, displays a high-strung level of musicality. Our discovery of surviving test discs made in Wartime Munich around 1942-1944, provides riveting and fascinating listening. A critic who heard Kabasta conduct the work in London noted :

« A fine performance of Beethoven's " Leonora II " Overture, clear-cut in every detail, yet filled with the warm romance of the drama, began the concert. No doubt the pundits are right in saying that Beethoven refined away the dross from this Overture to make the perfect version of it in " Leonora III ", but what a lot of lovely dross he had to sacrifice ! The playing made us glad to have it restored. »

Alfred Hœhn

Alfred Hœhn's concert reviews often refer to him as a poetic musician. Schumann's Piano Concerto led by Hans Weisbach featured « brilliant piano technique, always supported by a very attractive, warm singing melody in the foreground that is in harmony with this passionate soulful music. The same impression was confirmed in his solo piano recital. » A Beethoven 4th Concerto in Dortmund was « outstanding, as was a recital that showed him to be a craftsman of the finest stature in memory ». Hœhn's Amsterdam recital (24 XI 1921) came at a time when Bach was primarily offered in transcriptions. He played the Prelude, Fugue, and Allegro, along with Couperin, Scarlatti, Beethoven's last Sonata, Chopin, Liszt, Debussy, and Reger :

« Hœhn himself is so subtle ; the conviction and understanding he demonstrated in Debussy were greater than I had ever experienced. »

Debussy's « Hommage à Rameau » evinces genius in a « special precise clarity and elegance of conception, so pure and richly multi-colored, so intimate and reverently played as I have yet to hear from a German pianist ». Hœhn's Liszt indicated « a great virtuoso who reached the highest of spiritual realms, particularly in the Mephisto Waltz and Feux Follets. Such pieces, in my opinion, had something of a demonic Mastery ; the bravado sounded firm with a rare magic, through its variety of rhythms and tones, all masterfully calibrated. His varied tempos have a boundless energy, increased by the freedom of life it sows. »

Claude Debussy resounds in a preface that Hœhn contributed to a pupil's book, published in the Germany of 1938, one that slights the regime's agenda through its focus on a French musical practice that fails to acknowledge the Nazis' æsthetic or aims :

(Preface)

« In May 1907, I heard for the 1st time the magical sounds of the Opera " Pelleas et Mélisande ". Deeply impressed by a then newly appearing creative form of a somewhat revolutionary style which seemed to break with tradition, I tried bit by bit to fathom the nature of what its music-historical precedents could be. Already, in Mussorgsky, we experience directly great moments of impressionistic manifestations of sound, as, for example, in " Boris Godunov " (Coronation Scene, Forest Clearing at Kromy, Clock Scene with Glockenspiel) . Here, we quickly discover the roots of such a compositional manner (Debussy's) : the rendering on stage of musically illustrative programmatic passages.

Even French impressionism by no means discredits the primary origin of pictorial expression, which certainly illustrates the " titles " of each work such that we can be led experientially through the domain of " impressionism ". It is clear that in these musical expressions, the intellect, in a spiritually rich form, brings one closer to the composer's intended effect. Naturally, to the creator, interpreter and listener, this indicates a withdrawal from the true center of the musical soul.

It is a credit to my former student " Herr Doktor H.-G. Schulz that, in a completely unorthodox manner, he has reported the problem of impressionism in a clearer light. Ignorance of the style is far greater than one might admit ; even a Busoni is under the mistaken impression that the A minor Prelude No. 20 of Book 2 of The Well-Tempered Clavier bears " impressionistic " traits ; Bach's linear art and figurative style reveals such an interpretation anachronistic. Accordingly, the study of the present book, in which I grapple especially with the impressionistic keyboard style, is meant not only as a welcome stimulus for knowledgeable and interested music circles, but also for pianists and keyboard teachers. »

Alfred Høehn, Preface, in « Doktor Heinz-Günther Schulz. Musikalischer Impressionismus und Impressionistischer Klavierstil » , Konrad Tritsch Verlag, Würzburg (1938) . Translated by Doctor Kenneth Cooper (2013) .

When Høehn appeared in London, a critic writes :

« He commands a full tone, never pressed to the point of hardness, and singularly beautiful in sustained and lyrical passages. Herr Høehn's principal works in this programme were Brahms's early Piano Sonata in F minor, Schumann's " Carnaval " , both of which, particularly the Scherzo and Finale of the former, amply displayed the brilliance of his execution. »

A rare musical nugget is embedded in an otherwise pro-forma account that inadvertently reveals a critic's displeasure when confronted by a bygone Brahmsian practice that survived in Høehn's playing :

« The very wayward rubato used in Brahms's slow movement suggested that the moonlight Romance of Sternau's verse attracted him more than the shapeliness of Brahms's melody. »

Hans Rosbaud, one of Høehn's star piano pupils who became an eminent conductor, partnered his teacher on several occasions. A 1930 Stuttgart program finds Høehn as his soloist in the Brahms 2nd Piano Concerto and, several years later, they gave Rachmaninoff's 2nd Concerto in Frankfurt. Høehn also appeared with Hermann Abendroth, Wilhelm Fürtwängler, and Ernst von Dohnányi. Felix-Eberhard von Cube's letter to the music theorist Heinrich Schenker, on 2 June 1934, after his Hamburg lecture on Schenkerian analysis mentions Høehn's interest in an approach out of favor with the regime :

« I have also enclosed for you the review of a lecture that I gave recently, with the courage of despair. It seemed to me the only possible way of giving voice to the truth, without meeting an a priori objection. The success exceeded my expectation, and even the review (lightly drawing inspiration from me) shows that there are still people who are prepared to bear intellectual responsibility. Strangely enough, the lecture received an echo from, of all places, Frankfurt ! From there, a Professor Alfred Høehn (do you know him ?) wrote to me, saying that he wanted to learn more about these things. I shall send him a few related notices and a " self-drawn Ursatz ". »

Alfred Høehn suffered a paralytic stroke while on stage in Leipzig, in 1940, during the 2nd movement of Brahms's 2nd Piano Concerto : our published excerpt came months earlier, an allusion to the last music-making of his life. He died in 1945, from a heart attack, possibly after witnessing his piano hurled down a stairway by an American soldier billeted in his home.

Oskar Fried

Try as one can to follow a wandering conductor who boasted of lacking ties with any one orchestra, Oskar Fried's activities and life pose a thorny puzzle. His shadowy footsteps land one into a labyrinth of countries, stumbling across gaps of lost years. Aside from sporadic interviews, we lack access to his inner world, as much was concealed by both temperament and by choice, unlike his many colleagues who did their all to leave behind their legacies. A casual note in Count Harry Kessler's diary, on 14 December 1905, describes the chatting when Kessler and Fried dropped by to visit their close friend, the decadent Hamburg writer Richard Dehmel and his wife :

« About (Richard) Strauß and Fried. Where Strauß intends to be sensitive, he regularly becomes banal. His strength is in the witty, in the subtle. Mrs. Dehmel said that Fried was superior to him because he naturally commanded a hot passion. Dehmel contradicted quickly ; even though perhaps the race agrees with you that " Frau " Dehmel feels drawn to peace, he, Dehmel, joined in with the totally opposite reaction, I daresay, the dissimilarity of the race from his wife. Furthermore, one must admit, " Thank God ", for the cool art arising in the world is due to Strauß. We had played on the nerves much too much. »

Oskar Fried's uncanny knack for turning-up at crucial moments presents a succession of close-ups at historic balances in transition and their consequences. 1 year after Fried's debut as a conductor, in 1905, he toured Russia, visiting Moscow, Kiev, and Odessa. Fried introduced Saint-Petersburg audiences to the Mahler 2nd Symphony. On 10 November 1906, he conducted the private orchestra of Count Cheremetyev along with members of the Opera chorus and the alto Otilie Metzger-Froitzheim. Fried had not seen Saint-Petersburg since his youthful vagabondage as an itinerant horn player. Along with the Mahler premiere came « Verklärte Nacht » - Fried's own Cantata. In private, Rimsky-Korsakov and his camp rated Mahler's Symphony as « very bad », one that « contained absolutely nothing of genius, far worse than Richard Strauß ». Fried recorded a revelatory « Scheherazade » with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1928.

One Saint-Petersburg critic appraised Fried's performance as being perfect whereas another spelled-out a large number of the Symphony's serious faults :

« In the 1st place, the lack of style, and despite the originality of the design and procedures, the lack of musical personality. The remarkable technical procedures become an end in themselves. The orchestration is really exceptional, but, at the same time, its monstrous musical content, this sonorous column of pure delirium, this alternation of exaltation and absurd platitude, the absence of artistic logic, consistency, and perhaps even sincerity, all this pretentiousness, this affectation, useless emphasis and crushing power of the sonority, without a defined musical physiognomy, all this simply exhausts and overwhelms without offering one single genuinely artistic moment. Of course, this Symphony is, in every sense of the word, an exceptional work, but is everything exceptional good ? »

Oskar Fried is termed « an artist full of temperament, guilty of mannerisms and agitation ». A 1907 performance of excerpts from Rimsky Korsakov's « Christmas Eve », sung by Antonina Nezhdanova, was held with the composer in attendance. In 1909, Fried returned for a triumphant performance of Alexander Scriabin's Symphony No. 3 that coincided with the composer's long-awaited return to Russia, after several years abroad. In a successive Berlin reading, the painter Max Beckmann described « a dreadfully boring piece by Scriabin, " le Poème divin " », followed by « a beautiful Aria by Mozart sung by a magnificent soprano, and the evening ended with the " Meistersinger " Overture played at the worst possible tempo. I had to sit aside " Frau " Kolbe. She was very strongly perfumed. »

Soon after giving the 1st German performance of Modest Mussorgsky's « Night on Bald Mountain » with the world-premiere of Frederick Delius' « Dance of Life » with the Berlin Philharmonic, Fried left for Paris to attend the « Ballets Russes », in December of 1912, for Igor Stravinsky's « Petrushka ». He joined Harry Kessler, who later dined-out with Vaslav Nijinsky, Sergei Diaghilev, and Hugo Hofmannsthal. Some months later, Fried returned to Paris just after conducting 2 evenings at La Scala in Milan that included Hector Berlioz's « Symphonie fantastique », a work he kept close at hand, one with which he identified with throughout his life, along with works by Weber, Liszt, and Busoni. On the night of Wednesday, 28 May 1913, Fried and Kessler met at Larue's to eat and chat with Diaghilev, Nijinsky, Stravinsky, Ravel, Joseph Werth, Misia Edwards (later, Sert), André Gide, Léon Bakst, and others, where, Kessler noted, « the common opinion was that tomorrow evening, the premiere would be a scandal ».

Count Harry Kessler's diary entry on the « Rite of Spring »'s debut :

« A completely new choreography and music. Nijinsky's dancing style as different from Fokine's as Gauguin's from ... A thoroughly new vision, something never before seen, enthralling, persuasive, is suddenly there, a new kind of wildness, both un-art and art, at the same time. All forms laid waste and new ones emerging suddenly from the chaos. The public, the most elegant house I have ever seen in Paris (aristocracy, diplomats, the demi-monde) , was from the beginning restless, laughing, whistling, making jokes. Here and there, some stood up. Stravinsky, who sat with his wife behind us, raced outside like one possessed after scarcely 5 minutes. Suddenly, a stentorian voice cried-out from the gallery, " Okay, whores of the 16th (the " 16e arrondissement ", that of the elegant world) , are you going to shut up soon ! " The reply came from a loge : " Voilà, those who are ripe to be annexed. " At the same moment, D'Annunzio and Debussy in Gabriel Astruc's both got into a quarrel with a neighboring loge, screaming into their faces, " What a bunch of imbeciles ! " Now, the commotion became general. Astruc was heard crying, " Wait for the end, you can whistle afterward ! " and, as a reply from the orchestra : " How long ? " , whereupon Diaghilev replied, " In 5 minutes." Pautrier behind me shouted, " Play a tango for them " ; Marie Murat had a loud argument with her brother Gide, Ghéon, the entire " Nouvelle Revue Française " stood like a phalanx at the entrance to the loges, bottling-up with shouts, the orchestra and loges of the Polignacs, Rohans, Murtas, etc. And above this crazy din, there continued the storm of salvos of laughter and scornful clapping while the music raged and on the stage the dancers, without flinching, danced fervently in a prehistoric fashion. At the end of the performance, the " monde and demi-monde " went at it until a frenetic applause triumphed so that Stravinsky and Nijinsky had to come on stage and take repeated bows. »

« We went to Larue's and had a late supper, the usual crowd, and in addition, Diaghilev, Nijinsky, Bakst, Cocteau, and I took a taxi and did a wild tour through the city at night, looking almost dead under the moonlight, Bakst waving his handkerchief on a walking stick like a flag, Nijinsky in tails and a top hat, silently and happily smiling to himself. The dawn was breaking as the wild, merry party set me down at my " Tour d'Argent ". »

Oskar Fried, an ardent Bolshevik, spent part of World War I in Switzerland where he may have met Lenin in Zürich. Harry Kessler was engaged as a diplomat by the Germans and he briefed Fried to carry-out political missions under the guise of cultural activities. Kessler notes the mingling of his conductor-friend with the writer Fritz Unruh and René Schickele, an Alsatian poet who would document the conflict between France and Germany, in 1918, at a lunch in Bern on January 6 of that year :

« Schickle said that it was time that a great offensive be undertaken in all countries against the military. What he chiefly accuses them of is their misuse of spiritual values (that is, artists, writers, luminaries) for their ends and thereby devaluing them, by throwing dust in their eyes, somehow bribing them, and directing them into false paths. He, Schickele, does not want to be misused in this fashion because he believes that he could offer something more worthwhile precisely because he has a firm confidence in Germany's future leading role intellectually speaking. »

Lenin invited Fried to be the 1st visiting artist to appear in the new Soviet Union. Upon Fried's arrival on a Berlin-Moscow express, in 1922, he was met at the train station by the leader himself. Fried's only documented trip to the United States, in February 1928, coincided with Maurice Ravel's. Both Fried and Ravel were engaged to conduct the New York Symphony. At Eva Gauthier's, they gathered to celebrate Ravel's birthday ; an eager George Gershwin had also been invited. A curious reporter with the « Christian Science Monitor » got more than he expected from Fried, as his story is among the most informal glimpses we find in the media, displaying Fried's off-hand spontaneity and barbed wit, while he casually larded his patter with insightful observations.

(Photo) Ann Gautier's birthday party for Maurice Ravel at her New York apartment, in 1928 (seated) ; Oskar Fried with monocle and cigar (on the left) ; George Gershwin (on far right) .

Oskar Fried is confessedly temperamental, being susceptible to all sorts of things of the actual now, even to the temperature. From the passing instant, he tackles instances, and from the immediate moment catches momentum. « This is fine weather. » , he remarked to me the day after his arrival here, and he had more ways of expressing the idea (attitude, gesture, laughter, sparkle of eye and ring of voice) than I could count. « Beautiful » , I admitted, « the best time of the year in this part of the world » .

« Brilliant sun » , he added : « invigorating air » .

« Glorious » , I conceded ; « but I'm not interested in the weather. I want you to talk to me about conducting. » .

« But I'm not interested in conducting. »

« As you like. Down it goes. »

« When I sailed into New York harbor yesterday morning, the scene, as I looked toward town from the deck of the ship was a perfect " Fata Morgana " . The city, hidden in mist, was a fairy picture. After a time, the contours of the shore and the outlines of the buildings began to emerge in fantastic forms. It was like a drawing by Gustave Doré. I never would have believed that what I saw was reality there, and I would not have been surprised if it had all disappeared from before my eyes. And now, let me tell you what happened. The moment I stepped upon the pier, the illusion was gone. »

« What » , interrupted I, « are you talking about, if not music ? Go right on, please ! » .

« Yes ; romance and fact ; and lately, I illustrated the contrast by presenting the 9th Symphony of Beethoven and the " Sacre du Printemps " of Stravinsky on the same program. In Paris, they shook their heads. The 9th Symphony has an epic quality ; it has idealism and it has passion. The " Sacre " , on the contrary, makes no epic discourse and it conveys no epic disclosure and it conveys no notion of idealism or of passion. And still, the 2 works, though opposite in what they express, are together in what they accomplish. The 9th Symphony is a preparation for all the music that has followed until today, and the " Sacre " is a preparation for what will come until we cannot tell when. Beethoven opens the door for Wagner and Strauß ; Stravinsky for the next composers. I should like an opportunity to make this Beethoven-Stravinsky illustration before an American audience, and I may yet have it. »

« What will you offer, when you direct the New York Symphony ? »

« An all-Romantic program. I have just arranged it in consultation with Walter Damrosch (the Symphony's conductor) . A great chance Mister Damrosch gives visiting conductors ; an orchestra perfectly trained, audiences alert and hospitable. »

« And your all-Romantic program comprises what ? »

« Weber's " Euryanthe " Overture, nature seen ecstatically ; Brahms's Symphony No.1 - nature comprehended by effort ; Stravinsky's " Firebird " - nature in eccentric, exaggerated, distorted view : and Ravel's " Daphnis et Chloé " - nature serenely contemplated. All the different manifestations of Romanticism. Weber, born to it ; Brahms, fighting to subdue it ; Stravinsky, picturing Russian life and thought by means of it ; Ravel, refining it and getting at its essence. »

« You have almost made a definition of Romanticism. »

« Then, let me stop. I don't like to define the Romantic ; nor could I if I tried. For Romanticism is universal. It is sun, air, light. It is felt, not explained ; and the same is true of the Classic, if we were to go into that subject. »

« All right, thanks, for what the composers say, from Beethoven to Stravinsky. Would you mind giving me a word or 2 on their means of saying it ? To think of the matter from the quantitative standpoint does the expanded orchestra belong, in your opinion, to the past, and will a reduced scheme of instruments be the rule hereafter ? »

« The orchestra in recent years has been developing backward ; that is growing smaller. But that was for economic reasons chiefly. Nevertheless, I think the necessity has proved beneficial. We have seen that an amateur at composing may write with some success for a big aggregation of sonorities, and that only a great composer can write with effect for a little group. »

« Thanks again, Mister Fried ; but now, the brass tacks of your profession. Does conducting progress ? Has it a technique that improves ? »

« If you look at conducting on the average, the answer to that would be " Yes ". Look at it, however, in its higher aspects, and the question hardly arises at all. Every conductor of extraordinary gifts forms his own technique. So you ought not, really, to call this man's conducting good and that man's better ; rather, you should make distinction between good and not good. You would never think, in that case, of describing the conducting of a Mahler, as better or worse, than that of a Nikisch ; you would only remark that the conducting of the one type was different from that of the other. Nor would you speak of the Mahler school or the Nikisch school of conducting. »

« Can conducting be taught ? »

« It both can and should be. I have long hoped to take part in the establishment of conducting as a craft. »

« Masters and apprentices ? »

« By class methods ; 20 or 30 students, the teacher and an orchestra to work with. Show them directly how to do things. Under present conditions, those who want to learn seldom have a chance to do so except by hearing and observing from a distance. »

(Winthrop P. Tryon, 10 March 1928.)

Oskar Fried spoke to « The New York Times » about Igor Stravinsky's recent « Œdipus Rex » as the most significant and important composition of recent years :

It opens-up tremendous new possibilities in Opera, for in it, Stravinsky has utilized modern technique and orchestration to revivify the old Opera forms. He has breathed a new spirit into an old body, creating something that is refreshingly different without being eccentric. I feel it cannot help but influence future Operatic composition. »

Fried then insisted on the importance of Alban Berg's new « Wozzeck » .

« The new conductor has for many years appeared exclusively in Europe as a guest, a position which he points-out, prevents any given public of ' tiring of him ' . »

« The Times » covered Fried's debut :

« When a German conductor of long reputation in his native land comes to America and opens a program with the Brahms C minor Symphony, the common supposition is that he will prove a tried and true interpreter of the Classics. Last night, at the concert given by the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Oskar Fried, guest-conductor for a pair of concerts of that body, proved to be nearly everything which is the reverse of the characteristics just mentioned. By the testimony of a single concert, he had all the qualities of the virtuoso or, it might be better to say, " prima donna " conductor, who has showmanship of a personal kind, experience and authority over the players, the passion for effects at any cost to more substantial musical qualities, and the unquestionable ability to make an orchestra " sound " .

It is due Mister Fried to say that he made the New York Symphony sound as no one of a half dozen predecessors has done this season. For all that, and in spite of the remarkable demonstration of the audience at the end of the Brahms Symphony (an ovation that lasted for minutes and brought conductor and orchestra to their feet) , the interpretation of that familiar work was as a whole mannered and superficial. The 1st movement, from the interpretive standpoint, was the strongest. When Mister Fried treated details in ways of his own they had logic and, above all, saliency. In the slow movement, he fell short, not only of its mood, but its musical breath, its sustained lyricism, and its inherent Classic balance. The movement became episodic and lost in significance. The 3rd movement was not better. The Finale, with the wondrous introduction and the victorious conclusion, told, and roused the audience to one of the greatest ovations that has been witnessed this season. Not to detract from the conductor's accomplishment, it is a movement that tells anyway, even when played less precipitately and at a pace more just to its form and content than the prevailing tempi of the conductor.

Perhaps, the cloven hoof of tendencies not wholly Classic and sacrosanct might have been suspected in advance from the fact that Mister Fried followed Brahms' epic Symphony with a suite from Stravinsky's " l'Oiseau de feu " and another orchestral suite from Ravel's " Daphnis et Chloé ", which seems to have become the popular orchestral show piece of the season. Some may have predicted, also, that the restlessness of much of the Brahms interpretation would find its outlet in the modern spirit and scoring of a Stravinsky. But Stravinsky, on the whole, was worse than Brahms. There is poetry and Romantic feeling, as well as color, in the Russians core. It was distorted in tempi and its phrases and " jazzed-up " to make a virtuoso's holiday. Most of the music rushed by at a pace so breathless that it was all but unintelligible, and, as in the Brahms Symphony, the lyrical passages were mainly conspicuous for the unlyrical and unpoetic manner in which they were played.

If this reading was not intentionally impertinent to the composer, it was one which failed in comprehension of his mood, to say nothing of nice adjustment of details. The sunrise music of Ravel's Suite, which is all color, and so instrumentated as to yield the richest returns to the conductor of picturesque inclinations, was considerably better, and fascinating to the ear. The impression of this concert was of a conductor whose musical conception is of a highly-debatable nature, who can, however, gain brilliant and striking effects, at short notice, with a band as competent as the New York Symphony. »

(Olin Downes, 17 March 1928.)

Not one to stay put even in good times, Fried's hurried escape from Berlin came immediately after the Nazis assumed power in 1933. Where would this itinerant soul land ? To throw people off his trail, he announced that the Tbilisi Opera, in Georgia, had engaged him to conduct there ; most references offer this unverified tale as fact.

An eyewitness account of Fried's plight comes from Verdina Shlomsky (1905-1990) , Israel's 1st woman composer, in Shlosa Profilm's « 3 Profiles » :

What shall I do ? I'll go to the Chagalls', the house that's the nest of the " émigrés ". Near the " Bois de Boulogne ", there is Chagall's beautiful Villa with an enormous garden. Birds are singing, and Mrs. Chagall, may she rest in peace, is covering a table in the garden with a lot of flowers while Chagall walks there, in the garden, feeding his beloved cats. Upstairs, in the atelier, are canvasses waiting to be painted.

To Mrs. Chagall :

« It's very pleasant here and my thoughts are uneasy, about what will be, what started before I came there. I hope you're not waiting for someone, some important guests and that I'm not in your way. »

Often, when his wife and I sit with him, Chagall talks about his life :

« We're not waiting for anybody ! Don't worry ! Only for Oskar Fried. »

The garden door opens again and, slowly, the conductor Oskar Fried approaches. « Are you here ? » , he whispers into my ear. « It's good that you're here ! Your presence is very reassuring to me because I feel that you are someone I can rely on. » All of us were thinking in those times about a plan : We have to arrange to get an invitation to Palestine for Oskar Fried. The question is « How ? » .

Paying attention to details, Chagall brought over the meal that he served in a diligent, precise fashion and Oskar Fried systematically wolfed down his portion. I looked at him all the time, only at him, as if by some electrical current I sensed in him, like a telepathy, his feelings of worry and anxiety. Oskar Fried ! The great Mæstro, the very famous man, the name who's known in all the music world yesterday and the day before, when they would hold special receptions for him in the most elegant salons and arrange his concerts at the " Salle Pleyel ", to which many of the Parisian elite came and it was impossible to even approach him, to even talk to him, he was like a Duke in his Court. One time, when I came to meet him at the house of the Princess de Polignac, where he was staying, I had to wait a number of hours, because the house barber was laboring all that time to give him a head massage. And now, here he is, frightened and fidgeting, full of anxieties, and in complete confidence he tells me about his ongoing problems, and I felt the horror of homelessness in his heart and the fear of poverty in his eyes.

As the sun set into the horizon's pink hue, stars began to appear in a secretive way over the dusk, growing into a darkness that covered the garden. In confidence, Oskar Fried suggested that we should walk through the « Champs-Élysées » . Paris was shining, bestowing something special on all her people walking along her streets, the feeling of a desire to float in this special atmosphere. « Paris Soir ! Paris Soir ! » , shouted the paperboys, but there was no desire to stop this great feeling in walking there by looking into the future through the newspapers while Paris dresses herself for the evening. So Oskar Fried and I slowly walked along the « Boulevards » and we continued to speak and our conversation went on endlessly and we talked, almost whispering, especially he, as if trying to be careful not to disturb the noise of the « Champs-Élysées » and the « Boulevards » . He told me it's now a bargain market - dirt cheap :

« Today, you can buy for half-price in an end-of-season sale. That's the way we are. That's what we've become. It's a great season in History that's coming, most probably, to an end. And do you know what's my wish now ? I would like to go to the land of Israel, to get-up and go, but right away. I'll agree in advance to the most minimal conditions. I want to form an Orchestra and settle-down there and I'll find a way in Palestine, I'm sure I will find a way and I will also conduct the Orchestra. »

And with a sudden movement, he took-out his wallet and quickly pulled-out a few bank notes and in an irritated voice, demanded of me :

« Please, break them into small coins but all the coins should be new, shiny, not soiled in any way. Do me a favor : I am collecting new coins. »

Oskar Fried loved to visit my studio at which there were always friends present. They all came from the music world but never talked about music. This was a thing that got on his nerves : he didn't like it when people talked about music. What they did was they ate and this gave him real pleasure. One day he said :

« I will not move from here. I will stay here only until I'm able to move to Palestine. »

Then, he sat down and decided to write a letter to my brother (the prominent poet Avraham Shlonksky) in Palestine and among other things he wrote :

« Ich war immer ein Jude, ohne darauf Wort zu wegen. » (« I was always a Jew, without giving it any importance. »)

The cramped atmosphere in Paris pushed, even drove people and made them run away. Where to ? It was difficult to focus. The view in Paris was soothing, making it easier to bear unpleasant thoughts and I was walking along the " Boulevards " and the little streets until I got tired and arrived at the feet of the Eiffel Tower and suddenly, what do I see under the tower but a Parisian policeman with a palette, busily painting, and when he saw that I was uneasy he covered the picture, but was very nice in his tone and he started a pleasant conversation :

« Where are you from ? » , and when I told him and he said :

« Ah, the Jews. The Jews have to stop being Jews and mix, to stop existing (apart from others) . It will put an end to their horrible suffering. It's something terrible that's going on, it's unbelievable, everything that's happening, and the Rule of the Money. I don't want to talk about Money : " Salauds ! ", " Argent ? ". »

I asked him with a smile :

« " Argent " (Silver) is a part of Nature. " Argent " is inside the earth. »

And from one thing to another, suddenly the man said :

« I wish that all people would understand that the health of the world is metaphysics, that religion is the daughter of Fear, and due to that, we have to educate ourselves to change fear into courage and the hope that people have in religion will have to be transformed into the security of being sure. Perhaps, only then, will the bright light of Justice shine through the darkness in which the esprit sank. »

With a great deal of conviction, he took-off his painting from the easel and showed it to me, saying :

« Look how beautiful this is. »

Along wide boulevards with buildings on the sides and in good spirit, my heart slowly came to my working place. She wonders about this Greek philosopher standing there, reviewing his life, then continues :

« How lucky it was for me that I could think about the possibility of coming home, to Palestine, to the heat (" khamsin ") , to be useful there. Others didn't have it. »

And then, I remembered Oskar Fried, I don't know why he appeared suddenly. We are in Tel Aviv, in 1934, and there is a Symphony concert at the " Ohel Shem " (God's Tent) Theatre and who is among the personnel ? In the days before Bronisław Huberman and Arturo Toscanini, a few people who knew how to play, a few mediocrities, and a few amateurs playing a Beethoven Symphony and all the defects, not a small number of them, were accepted and forgiven. And suddenly, a very mistuned chord shook me and I turned back to the left and a few chairs away, I see Oskar Fried sitting among the public. Oskar Fried ! And he says :

« Didn't I tell you that I was going to conduct an Orchestra in Palestine and here is the Orchestra that I will conduct ! »

And I remember that it looked like a mirage to me when shortly afterwards the Beethoven 5th was played in the same place by the same group of people with him conducting. Who could have predicted that such a thing is possible ? I was soon meeting him very frequently. His presence alone elevated a high-spirit in the music world but Tel Aviv didn't reciprocate, but he visited Jerusalem and was enchanted, he would caress all kinds of donkeys, camels, and he always said :

« Don't you dare desecrate the ancient ! Don't bring over Europe's leprosy. Leave it the way it is now. Don't add anything ! Stop reading papers - there's nothing left there (in Europe) , nothing except headlines, lies, destruction ! »

After that, he went to Moscow. Why didn't we keep him, Oskar Fried, so that he will sit here among us ? Not a long time passed and he died there, may his memory be blessed. So, whenever I am walking in an Autumn garden and step on the last season's wet leaves, I am sending my old fishing boat to the great sea of the past that will live forever in our selves in the continuing future.

(Al Hamishmar, 1945. Translated by Oded Regev.)

Chagall wrote Tel Aviv's mayor Dizengoff about « the 1st rate German musical artists that have been hurled into France and could find an application for their talents in Palestine » . On learning that Dizengoff was close to the Philharmonic Society, he mentions it is ... « headed by a young conductor. We don't know him, perhaps he is a talented man, but surely, even for his youth, is not as experienced as Oskar Fried. The latter wants to go to Palestine anyway. We are trying hard to convince him to do so. Though he is 60 years old, he is in full possession of his strength, which he is eager to give to Palestine. »

Oskar Fried stayed for a month of concerts in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem with a local Orchestra, one soon to be expanded by Huberman's creation of the Palestine Symphony. In Russia, some 75 concerts were reported and by the 24 year old Kurt Sanderling arrived in Moscow from Berlin (in 1936) he met Fried, whom he termed kaput. Fried's new Russian wife was a descendant of Mikhail Glinka. He became irate about the interest in Gustav Mahler that snubbed him. Concerts became fewer due to Fried's declining health : he died in 1941 during the week when the « Molotov -

Ribbentrop Pact » was abrogated and Stalin began murdering all nearby Germans. One report claims that he passed away in a hospital during a bombing, his last words were curses hurled at the overhead German warplanes. Fried's passing remains unsubstantiated as the deathbed defiance betrays the style of a Soviet cover-up. Fried acquired Russian citizenship in 1939, yet, his Finale and place of burial still remain obscure.

AB 118 : Vienne

Capitale de l'Autriche (que ce pays ait été Duché, Empire ou République) depuis le XIIe siècle, siège du gouvernement des Habsbourg de 1278 à 1918, Vienne jouit sur le plan musical d'un prestige qu'elle doit essentiellement, pour ce qui est de la création, à la période allant de la fin du XVIIIe au début du XXe siècle, c'est-à-dire de Haydn à Webern. Durant cette période, la ville abrita ou vit naître beaucoup des plus grands compositeurs européens, et développa une tradition d'interprétation qui ne s'est pas perdue.

Son histoire musicale, qui est celle d'une cité-carrefour faisant la jonction à la fois entre le Nord et le Sud et entre l'Est et l'Ouest, ne s'en étend pas moins sur 8 siècles. La cour des 4 derniers ducs Babenberg (1177-1246) fut un important foyer du « Minnesang », et la Maîtrise de la cathédrale Saint-Étienne, dont devait faire partie Haydn, est mentionnée pour la 1re fois dans un document de 1237. L'Université fut fondée en 1365, et la musique, selon les usages du temps, y faisait partie du « Quadrivium ». Mais les périodes fastes ne débutèrent qu'avec le règne de Maximilien Ier (1459-1519), qui, en 1496, installa officiellement à Vienne la chapelle qu'il possédait en Allemagne du Sud (sans doute à Augsbourg), jetant ainsi les bases de la Chapelle Impériale. Le chef de cette chapelle s'appelait alors Hans Kerner, et elle comptait parmi ses membres Heinrich Isaac. Elle fut ré-organisée en 1498, avec à sa tête Georg Slatkonja. Mais ses membres, parmi lesquels Ludwig Senfl, Heinrich Finck ou encore l'organiste Paul Hofhaimer, étaient loin de passer tout leur temps à Vienne. Pendant le XVIe siècle et les toutes premières années du XVIIe, les Maîtres de chapelle Impériaux furent essentiellement des Franco-Flamands : Arnold von Bruck (1527-1545), Petrus Massenus ou Pieter Maessens (1546-1562), natif de Gand, Jean Guyot, appelé aussi Castileti, Jakob Vaet, Philippe de Monte (de 1568 à sa mort en 1603). Œuvrèrent également à la chapelle le ténor Alard du Gaucquier, originaire de Lille et jusqu'en 1576 adjoint de Philippe de Monte, Jakob Regnart ou Charles Luyton, originaire d'Anvers.

Avec Ferdinand II, Empereur de 1619 à 1637, commencèrent à Vienne l'époque Baroque et le règne de la musique et des musiciens italiens. Les Maîtres de chapelle Impériaux eurent comme noms Giovanni Priolo (1619-1629) et Giovanni Valentini (1629-1649) : élèves de Giovanni Gabrieli, ils furent les 1ers d'une longue lignée d'Italiens, dont le dernier devait être Antonio Salieri (1788-1824). Vienne entendit alors ses 1ers Opéras et ses 1ers Oratorios italiens. Sous les 3 Empereurs-compositeurs : Ferdinand III (1637-1657), Léopold Ier (1657-1705) et Joseph Ier (1705-1711), l'Opéra italien fut un élément déterminant de la vie musicale, ce que symbolisèrent les noms d'Antonio Draghi (1635-1700), pendant 30 ans Maître absolu de la musique à la Cour, puis de Francesco Conti (1682-1732). Une école instrumentale se développa cependant, représentée par des compositeurs d'abord italiens (Valentini, Bertali, Buonamente), puis allemands ou autrichiens (Ebner, Schmelzer, Pachelbel, Kerll, auxquels on peut ajouter Muffat). Le Baroque atteignit son apogée avec le règne de Charles VI (1711-1740), non seulement en musique, mais aussi en architecture : reconstruction des abbayes de Saint-Florian, Melk ou Kremsmünster sous la direction de Jakob Prandtauer, achèvement à Vienne de la « Karlskirche », œuvre de Johann Bernhard Fischer von Erlach poursuivie par son fils Joseph Emanuel, en 1737. Johann Joseph Fux (1660-1741) , la plus grande personnalité du Baroque autrichien en musique, fut Maître de chapelle Impérial de 1715 à sa mort, avec comme vice- Maître de chapelle l'Italien Antonio Caldara (1670-1736) .

La mort de Charles VI (auquel succéda sa fille Marie-Thérèse) et celle de Johann Joseph Fux, survenue l an plus tard, furent suivies de profonds changements. Occupèrent le devant de la scène, comme compositeurs, les prédécesseurs de Haydn, puis (à partir de 1760 environ) Haydn lui-même. Parallèlement, la Cour perdit de son importance dans la vie musicale viennoise (les Maîtres de chapelle Impériaux furent : Antonio Predieri jusqu'en 1769 ; Georg Reutter jusqu'en 1772 ; Florian Gassmann de 1772 à 1774 ; Giuseppe Bonno de 1774 à 1788 ; et Antonio Salieri de 1788 à 1824) . Jouèrent un rôle de plus en plus important, d'une part, les grandes familles nobles ou princières (les Lichnowsky, Lobkowitz, Schwarzenberg, Esterházy) et, d'autre part, les théâtres (« Burgtheater » , théâtre de la Porte-de-Carinthie, théâtre du château de Schönbrunn, « Theater auf der Wieden » , « Theater an der Wien ») et lieux de concerts (« Augarten » , Grande Salle de la Redoute, « Mehlgrube ») ouverts au public, ainsi que de nouvelles institutions musicales (« Tonkünstler Sozietät » fondée en 1772 par Gassmann et où fut créé, en 1775, « le Retour de Tobie » de Haydn ; Société des associés de Gottfried Van Swieten ; « Liebhaber Konzerte » de 1807-1808, qui prirent fin le 27 mars 1808 avec une célèbre exécution de « la Création » de Haydn) . À noter également le développement à Vienne, durant cette période, de l'édition musicale, avec pour commencer la maison Artaria. Ces nouveautés intervinrent tandis que la ville devenait, aux yeux de l'Europe, celle de Haydn et de Mozart, puis aussi de Beethoven.

Après 1815, alors que débutait la vie créatrice de Schubert et la dernière partie de celle de Beethoven, les familles nobles et princières, ruinées par les guerres napoléoniennes, cessèrent de jouer leurs rôles de mécènes. Ce fut une des raisons de la fondation de la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Société des Amis de la Musique) en 1812, puis, surtout, de la Philharmonie par Otto Nicolai en 1842. La Philharmonie de Vienne ne donna des saisons régulières qu'à partir de 1860 : depuis 1870, elles ont lieu dans la « Grosser Musikvereinsaal » . Ses chefs permanents ont été jusqu'en 1945 Otto Dessooff (1860-1875) , Hans Richter (1875-1898) , Gustav Mahler (1898-1901) , Josef Hellmesberger (1901-1908) , Felix Weingartner (1908-1927) , Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1927-1928) , Clemens Krauß (1928-1933) , Wilhelm Fürtwängler et Bruno Walter (1933-1938) et, enfin, Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1938-1945) . L'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne, fondé en 1900 comme « Wiener Concert-Vereinorchester » , porte son nom actuel depuis 1933. Outre la « Grosser Musikvereinsaal » (1,654 places assises et 300 debout) , construite en 1870 avec comme salle adjacente la « Brahmsaal » (679 places assises et 95 debout) , Vienne possède depuis 1913, comme autre lieu important de concerts, les 3 auditoriums du « Konzerthaus » : la « Grosser Konzerthausaal » , la « Mozartsaal » et la « Schubertsaal » (1,840, 700 et 340 places, respectivement) .

À la fin du XVIIIe siècle, l'Opéra se donnait notamment dans les 2 théâtres de la Cour, c'est-à-dire au « Burgtheater » (ouvert jusqu'en 1888) et de plus en plus au théâtre de la Porte-de-Carinthie, et également au « Theater auf der Wieden » (ensuite au « Theater an der Wien ») . En 1857, l'Opéra Impérial (« Hofoper ») eut pour la 1re fois comme directeur, en la personne de Karl Eckert, un musicien de profession. Il eut comme successeurs d'abord un Italien, Matteo Salvi (1861-1867) , puis Franz von Dingelstedt (1867-1870) . De 1861 à 1869, dans le cadre du percement du « Ring » consécutif à la destruction des anciennes fortifications, un nouvel Opéra fut édifié, tout près de l'ancien théâtre de la Porte-de-Carinthie (qui n'existe plus) . Inauguré le 25 mai 1869 avec le « Don Giovanni » de Mozart chanté en allemand, il eut, après Dingelstedt, comme directeurs, jusqu'en 1945, Johann Herbeck (1870-1875) , Franz Jauner (1875-1880) , Wilhelm Jahn (1881-1897) , Gustav Mahler (1897-1907) , Felix Weingartner (1908-1911) , Hans Gregor (1911-1918) , Franz Schalk et Richard Strauß (1919-1924) , Franz Schalk (1924-1929) , Clemens Krauß (1929-1934) , Felix Weingartner (1935-1936) , Erwin Kerber (1936-1940) , H. K. Strohm (1940-1941) , E. A. Schneider (1941-1943) et, enfin, Karl Böhm (1943-1945) . Le 12 mars 1945, un bombardement détruit l'édifice à l'exception de la façade, de la loggia et du grand escalier. Le « Volksoper » , inauguré en 1898, est propriété municipale (« Städtische Volksoper ») depuis 1938.

De 1945 à 1955, l'Opéra sur le « Ring » étant hors d'usage, les représentations eurent lieu au « Volksoper » et au « Theater an der Wien » sous la direction artistique de Egon Hilbert : ces 10 années, sur le plan artistique, furent une période faste, avec notamment des chanteurs et chanteuses comme Anton Dermota, Erich Kunz, Paul Schöffler, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Irmgard Seefried, Wilma Lipp. L'Opéra reconstruit fut inauguré le 5 novembre 1955 avec « Fidelio » sous la direction de Karl Böhm. Ce dernier, nommé directeur, démissionna l'année suivante. Il eut comme successeur Herbert von Karajan, seul jusqu'en 1962, avec des directeurs associés jusqu'en 1964. Les directeurs furent ensuite des administratifs : Egon Hilbert (jusqu'en 1967) , Heinrich Reiff-Gintl, Rudolf Gamsjäger, Egon Seefehlner. La nomination de Lorin Maazel comme chef d'orchestre, annoncée en 1979, a pris effet de 1982 à 1984. Ses successeurs ont été notamment Claudio Abbado, directeur général de la musique de 1986 à 1991, Eberhard Waechter, intendant en 1991-1992, et Joan Holender, intendant depuis 1992.

L'Orchestre de l'Opéra n'est autre que le Philharmonique. Les concerts de cette dernière ont donc lieu non pas en soirée, mais le samedi après-midi et le dimanche matin. L'Orchestre symphonique, qui ne se consacre qu'au concert, est le véritable orchestre de la ville. Citons encore le « Niederösterreichisches Tonkünstlerorchester » (fondé en 1947, il couvre la province de Basse-Autriche, dont Vienne est la capitale) et l'Orchestre de la radio, fondé en 1945 et qui, beaucoup plus que les autres, se consacre à la musique contemporaine. Sur ce dernier plan, l'ensemble « Die Reihe » , fondé en 1958 par Friedrich Cerha, a joué à Vienne à peu près le même rôle que le Domaine musical à Paris. Existe aussi pour la musique contemporaine l'ensemble « Kontrapunkte » fondé en 1967 par Peter Keuschnig. Les Petits Chanteurs de Vienne (« Wiener Sängerknaben ») font partie de la « Hofmusikkapelle » , cette dernière étant le principal ensemble de musique sacrée de la ville. Les quatuors Schneiderhan, du « Wiener Konzerthaus » , Barylli, Weller, de la Philharmonie, Alban-Berg, ont poursuivi depuis la dernière guerre la tradition établie par les quatuors Schuppanzigh, Hellmesberger, Rosé ou Kolisch, et, depuis 1950 environ, Vienne a été un centre de recherches important pour la musique ancienne, grâce, notamment, à la fondation du « Concentus musicus » par Nikolaus Harnoncourt en 1952, de la « Capella academica » par Eduard Melkus en 1965 et du « Clemencic Consort » par René Clemencic en 1968. Des maisons d'édition actives à Vienne, les plus importantes sont Universal-Edition et Ludwig Döblinger. Le Festival de Vienne (« Wiener Festwochen ») a lieu tous les ans en mai et juin depuis 1951.

...

Vienne est la capitale de l'Autriche. Elle est aussi « Land » (État fédéré) , en allemand « Bundesland Wien » . Elle est située dans l'est du pays, et traversée par le Danube (« Donau ») . Elle fut la capitale du Saint-Empire Romain germanique ainsi que de l'Archiduché d'Autriche, de l'Empire d'Autriche (1804-1866) et, plus tard, de la double monarchie, communément appelée Autriche-Hongrie (1867-1918) , en ayant été le centre du « krach » mondial de 1873.

La ville est située dans le bassin de Vienne, au cœur de l'Europe centrale. Traversée par la Vienne qui a donné son nom à la ville et surtout par le Danube, des collines (qui marquent les contreforts des Alpes) bordent la ville à l'ouest. La vallée du Danube et le relief plus plat de l'est offrent un accès à la Grande plaine hongroise. Le massif des Carpates commence également à proximité au nord et à l'est. À l'échelle des capitales européennes, Vienne est située à 1,243 kilomètres de Paris, à 651 kilomètres de Berlin et à 1,112 kilomètres de Bruxelles. Vienne est un carrefour de communications, à 70 kilomètres de Bratislava, à 250 kilomètres de Budapest, à 400 kilomètres de Prague et de Munich.

Le climat de la ville est continental, du même type que dans la plaine hongroise. Les hivers sont froids (-1°C), avec de faibles chutes de neige contribuant au charme des monuments de la ville vêtus de blanc. Les étés ont une moyenne de 20°C , mais peuvent être très chauds et orageux.

La pluviométrie est de 620 millimètres par an, avec un maximum en été et un minimum en hiver. Enfin, à la croisée de plusieurs ensembles géographiques (Alpes, Carpates, Plaine hongroise), la ville est bien exposée aux vents.

L'origine de Vienne remonte au VI^e siècle avant l'ère chrétienne, lorsque des Celtes y fondent une cité sous le nom « Vindobona » (ville blanche). En l'an 15 avant Jésus-Christ, Vindobona devient un important fort Romain de la province de Pannonie, défendant le limes, la frontière de l'Empire Romain, qui fait face aux peuples germaniques situés plus au nord. Les vestiges archéologiques de la période Romaine de Vienne sont néanmoins extrêmement modestes.

Au cours du Moyen-âge, Vienne devient successivement le siège des Babenberg (comtes puis ducs d'Autriche), puis des Habsbourg. Lorsque ces derniers accèdent au statut d'Empereur, la ville devient la capitale du Saint-Empire Romain germanique. Elle est cependant rapidement confrontée à la montée en puissance de l'Empire Ottoman dont les troupes l'assiègent à 2 reprises :

En 1529, lors du 1^{er} siège de Vienne par les troupes du sultan Soliman le Magnifique, la résistance des Viennois et des 20,000 soldats permit de sauver la ville.

En 1683, lors du second siège, Vienne dut son salut à Charles V de Lorraine et à l'intervention des troupes polonaises de Jean III Sobieski lors de la bataille de Vienne. Pour avoir échoué, le grand vizir Kara Mustafa, commandant les troupes turques, fut décapité par le sultan Mehmed IV.

En 1815, grâce au talent de Metternich, la ville est le siège du Congrès de Vienne, qui définit la géopolitique pour un demi-siècle d'une Europe juste sortie des guerres napoléoniennes. Vienne est alors capitale d'un Empire d'Autriche qui s'étend de Milan à Lwow et de Prague à Raguse, incluant Venise, Zagreb, Cracovie et Budapest. En 1873, la ville accueille une Exposition universelle au cours de laquelle démarre la crise bancaire de mai 1873, appelé aussi « Krach de Vienne », le plus grand de l'histoire boursière.

La Première Guerre mondiale met fin à l'Empire d'Autriche-Hongrie, dont Vienne était la capitale depuis 1867. De 1918 à 1934, Vienne est surnommée Vienne la rouge, en raison de l'arrivée au pouvoir d'une coalition de sociaux-démocrates et de chrétiens-sociaux.

En 1938, Vienne et toute l'Autriche sont rattachées à l'Allemagne Nazie lors de l' « Anschluss » . Après la défaite du régime Nazi, Vienne est découpée en 4 secteurs d'occupation répartis entre les vainqueurs, de la même façon que Berlin.

En 1955, en pleine Guerre froide, l'Autriche obtient son indépendance par le traité d'État autrichien et devient neutre sur le plan international. Vienne se modernise alors et devient, grâce notamment à la neutralité autrichienne, le siège d'organisations internationales comme l'ONU (Vienna International Centre) ou encore l'OPEP.

Plusieurs fois ville frontière du monde de la chrétienté, Vienne est longtemps restée enserrée au sein de fortifications qui expliquent la densité de son tissu urbain central. Sa dernière enceinte, démantelée au milieu du XIXe siècle, fut remplacée par un boulevard circulaire connu sous le nom de « Ring » (anneau, en allemand) .

Établie à quelques kilomètres du Danube sur la rive droite du fleuve, Vienne en est longtemps restée éloignée, notamment pour se protéger des crues. La canalisation du fleuve aux XVIIIe et XIXe siècles a permis à la ville de se rapprocher, puis de s'étendre sur la rive gauche du Danube. Mais une importante dissymétrie subsiste, puisque la rive gauche n'accueille environ que 200,000 habitants.

Vienne (le « Land » comme la ville) est subdivisée en 23 arrondissements, les « Gemeindebezirke » , désignés par un n° et par un nom. Les codes postaux attribués à la ville de Vienne vont de 1010 à 1230, le 1er chiffre 1 désignant la ville et les 2 chiffres centraux mentionnant l'arrondissement. Ainsi, l'adresse du château de Schönbrunn, par exemple, comporte le code 1130.

Le centre proprement dit (« Innere Stadt ») est le 1er arrondissement, c'est l'emplacement de la Vienne historique, sur la rive droite du Danube. Il est entouré du « Ring » , 1er et 2e boulevards circulaires, un dans chaque sens de circulation. Il comprend en son sein, entre autres, le Palais Impérial de la « Hofburg » qui, avec ses dépendances, occupe une grande partie de la superficie de l'arrondissement. On circule peu en voiture dans le 1er arrondissement, la progression dans les rues étroites et le stationnement étant difficiles.

Les arrondissements 2 à 9 entourent le 1er dans le sens des aiguilles d'une montre et lui sont adjacents (sauf le 5e) . Ces arrondissements, tous densément peuplés, sont considérés comme le centre de la ville (avec le 1er) . Ils sont à l'extérieur du « Ring » mais entourés à l'ouest et au sud par la « Gürtel » (ceinture, en allemand) , autre boulevard circulaire ouvert à la circulation dans les 2 sens et surmonté sur une grande partie par la ligne de métro aérien U6.

Les arrondissements 10 à 20 ainsi que le 23e, qui bordent Vienne à l'ouest et au sud, sont moins densément peuplés. Certains sont davantage des zones de bureaux, d'autres (comme les arrondissements 16 à 19) des zones résidentielles assez vertes. Le château de Schönbrunn occupe une grande partie du 13e arrondissement.

Les arrondissements 21 et 22, plus récents, plus populaires historiquement et beaucoup moins denses, sont sur l'autre rive du Danube. La tendance actuelle (surtout depuis 2004) est au développement de ces zones ; de nombreuses habitations plus aérées, notamment de « standing » sur les rives du fleuve, sont en construction dans ces arrondissements.

Contrairement à la plupart des autres métropoles européennes et mondiales, la population de Vienne a longtemps diminué au XXe siècle, le nombre maximum d'habitants ayant été atteint en 1916. À l'époque, Vienne rivalisait avec Paris et Londres. Cela s'explique par la disparition de l'Autriche-Hongrie en 1918, la ville n'exerçant plus son attraction que sur une portion congrue de sa zone d'influence originelle, et cette situation s'est renforcée avec la Guerre froide. Mais la chute du « rideau de fer » a permis à la ville de retrouver son attraction depuis 1990. Aujourd'hui encore, Vienne reste une capitale surdimensionnée pour l'Autriche, dont elle abrite plus de 20 % de la population totale et 30 % en comptant l'agglomération.

La mixité sociale et ethnique est réelle, même s'il existe de grandes disparités selon les quartiers. Le caractère populaire ou bourgeois d'un quartier est indépendant de sa distance du centre historique. De plus, certains quartiers regroupent plus d'habitants de même origine ou culture, Serbes principalement, plus de 180,000 en 2001, la « Diaspora » serbe envisage d'ailleurs demander le statut de minorité étant donné que sa présence sur le territoire autrichien remonte à plus de 150 ans, on trouve aussi des diasporas italienne, asiatique, juive, hongroise, mais en plus petit nombre, on compte aussi une importante population turque mais elle n'est présente dans le pays que depuis une période plus récente. Indépendamment du niveau social des habitants, on n'observe pas de réel découpage par communautés, comme dans d'autres capitales européennes comme Londres ou Berlin.

Vienne est une ville culturelle majeure dans un grand nombre de domaines. Par son histoire très riche, sa situation géographique et politique, elle est un carrefour majeur en Europe.

Dès le Moyen-âge, parallèlement au chant religieux diffusé par la cathédrale Saint-Étienne et la Chapelle Impériale, se développe l'art profane des « Minnesänger », dont le plus célèbre représentant au XVIIIe siècle se nomme Walther von der Vogelweide. Des musiciens étrangers s'attachent à la chapelle de la Cour, réorganisée en 1495 par Maximilien Ier : le Flamand Heinrich Isaac (vers 1450-1517), compositeur de Maximilien Ier ; le Suisse Ludwig Senfl (vers 1490-1543) ; son élève et successeur l'Allemand Heinrich Finck (vers 1444-1527) ; des Autrichiens comme l'organiste Paul von Hofhaimer (1459-1537) ou Arnold von Bruck. En 1568, le Flamand Philippus de Monte, après un long séjour en Italie, devient Maître de chapelle de la Cour. Leurs œuvres font la synthèse d'éléments franco-flamands et italiens.

Au XVIIe siècle, l'influence personnelle des Empereurs Ferdinand III, Léopold Ier et Joseph Ier, compositeurs à leurs heures, amateurs d'art lyrique, permet le développement de celui-ci. Ils attirent des Italiens à la Cour : Pier Francesco Cavalli y donne son « Egisto » en 1643 ; Antonio Cesti (1623-1669), au service de Léopold Ier, fait représenter ses œuvres (dont « Il Pomo d'oro », 1666 ou 1667) ; Antonio Bertali (1605-1669) transmet à Vienne, où il est musicien de la Cour, la tradition vénitienne d'un Claudio Monteverdi et d'un Cavalli ; Antonio Draghi (1635-1700) fournit des livrets d'Opéras à Léopold Ier et écrit Oratorios et Opéras destinés à la musique Impériale. L'Autrichien Johann Heinrich Schmelzer (vers 1623-1680) fonde avec Heinrich Biber (1644-1704) une école de violonistes, tandis que l'Allemand Johann Jacob Froberger un temps organiste de la Cour, apporte les techniques de Girolamo Frescobaldi son Maître, et celles des musiciens français, connues lors de son voyage à Paris en 1652. À la même époque, Vienne devient un centre réputé pour l'enseignement musical : Johann Kaspar von Kerll (1627-1693) , Allemand qui a pris à Rome des leçons de Giacomo Carissimi, professe l'orgue et la composition ; Johann Joseph Fux (1660-1741) , Maître d'une renommée internationale, forme Georg Christoph Wagenseil (1715-1777) , Georg Muffat (1653-1704) , Ignaz Holzbauer (1711-1783) . En 1725, il publie un traité de contrepoint célèbre jusqu'à nos jours, le « Gradus ad Parnassum » .

Le XVIIIe siècle consacre Vienne comme capitale européenne du Classicisme. Une école pré-Classique contribue au développement formel de la Symphonie, parallèlement aux écoles étrangères (Italie, Allemagne, France) . Ses principaux représentants, Georg Matthias Monn (1717-1750) , Georg Christoph Wagenseil, Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf (1739-1799) , annoncent les Maîtres de la Symphonie Classique, tandis qu'Ignaz Umlauff (1746-1796) crée le « singspiel » avec « Die Bergknappen » (1778) . La même année, un nouveau théâtre ouvre, le « Schikanedertheater » , sur la scène duquel seront joués les Opéras mozartiens. Christoph Willibald Gluck entreprend sa réforme de l'Opéra italien à Vienne avec « Orfeo ed Euridice » (1762) et « Alceste » (1767) . Franz-Joseph Haydn y termine sa vie dans la gloire. La majorité des ouvrages dramatiques des dernières années de la vie de Mozart, installé à Vienne en 1781, seront créés dans cette ville (l'Enlèvement au sérail, 1782 ; les Noces de Figaro, 1786 ; Così fan tutte, 1790 ; la Flûte enchantée, 1791) . Beethoven se fixe également dans la capitale autrichienne, aidé financièrement par la haute société. C'est là que ses œuvres seront conçues, exécutées, publiées. Franz Schubert, né près de Vienne, vivra une existence difficile dans cette ville, sans y rencontrer beaucoup de compréhension pour ses œuvres. À la même époque, l'enseignement pianistique de Karl Czerny (1791-1857) conduit à Vienne de nombreux pianistes (Sigismund Thalberg, 1812-1871, et Franz Liszt) .

En 1842, Otto Nicolai (1810-1849) , Maître de chapelle de la Cour, fonde l'Orchestre philharmonique, qui, avec l'Opéra, acquiert une renommée mondiale.

Ce climat, créé tant par la présence de compositeurs célèbres que par des institutions musicales de 1er ordre, continue d'attirer à Vienne l'élite du monde musical dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle. Richard Wagner donne « Tannhäuser » (1857) , « Lohengrin » (1858) , le « Vaisseau fantôme » (1860) et travaille aux « Maîtres-chanteurs » pendant son séjour viennois. Les 3 noms du post-Romantisme se retrouvent à Vienne, où ils s'établissent définitivement : Johannes Brahms dirige la « Singakademie » (1862) , puis la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (1872) ; Anton Bruckner mène une carrière de professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne (fondé en 1817) , où il enseigne l'harmonie, le contrepoint et la fugue en 1868 ; Gustav Mahler dirige l'Opéra de la Cour (1897-1907) , où il se révèle comme un très grand chef. C'est également à Vienne que vit Hugo Wolf, le plus grand représentant du lied à la fin du XIXe siècle.

Dans le domaine de la musique légère, Vienne connut un rayonnement tout aussi grand. Franz von Suppé (1819-1895) , Josef Lanner (1801-1843) , Karl Ziehrer (1843-1922) et, surtout, la dynastie des Strauß brillèrent dans la composition de valses et d'opérettes.

L'apogée de la culture viennoise correspond au début du XXe siècle : c'est l'époque de certaines avancées majeures dans le domaine scientifique (invention de la psychanalyse par Sigmund Freud) , mais également d'un renouveau important dans le domaine des arts (Sécession viennoise, peinture de Gustav Klimt, d'Oskar Kokoschka et d'Egon Schiele) ou encore dans le domaine de la littérature (œuvres d'Arthur Schnitzler, Joseph Roth, Hermann Broch, Stefan Zweig et Robert Musil) .

La renommée culturelle internationale de Vienne repose surtout sur sa vie musicale. Il existe peu d'autres villes dans lesquelles autant de compositeurs célèbres ont vécu. Les valse de Vienne, son chœur d'enfants (« Wiener Sängerknaben ») , d'importants événements musicaux tels que le « Concert du Nouvel an » ou le bal de l'Opéra de Vienne, de même que les bâtiments dédiés à l'Opéra et au Théâtre sont mondialement connus. Vienne est également réputée pour sa cuisine et sa culture des cafés.

Vienne a longtemps été considérée comme la capitale mondiale de la musique. De nombreux compositeurs de renommée mondiale s'y sont succédé pendant des siècles, les plus connus étant les Classiques Franz-Joseph Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Ludwig van Beethoven, suivis par Franz Schubert, Franz Liszt, Johannes Brahms, Johann Strauß I, Johann Strauß II, Franz Lehár, Joseph Lanner, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, ainsi qu'au début du XXe siècle les membres de la Seconde école de Vienne (Arnold Schönberg, Anton von Webern, Alban Berg) et Ernst Krěenek.

Le Lied est, par exemple, un genre musical qui doit beaucoup à l'influence viennoise, au point qu'il en existe même une variante locale, le « Wienerlied » , un « Volkslied » chanté dans le dialecte viennois.

Les frontières de la musique autrichienne ont été très variables au fil de l'histoire. Malgré l'exiguïté de son territoire aujourd'hui, l'Autriche a laissé une forte empreinte dans l'histoire de la musique, notamment du temps du Saint-Empire Romain germanique, de l'Empire d'Autriche et de l'Autriche-Hongrie. Elle a naturellement des liens très forts avec ses voisines germanophones, les musiques allemande et suisse, mais aussi avec la musique hongroise ou slovène. Vienne semble avoir été, bien plus que Salzbourg, le pôle d'attraction de bien des musiciens et le lieu de bien des créations musicales, en rivalité avec Berlin ou Munich.

La musique vocale profane fait de timides débuts à la période de la musique médiévale avec le « Minnesang » , art courtois dont Oswald von Wolkenstein est le digne représentant auprès des cours d'Europe orientale.

Il faut attendre la musique Baroque avec Heinrich Ignaz Franz Biber et surtout la Ire école de Vienne pour voir le véritable éveil de la musique Classique en Autriche (Johann Joseph Fux, Florian Leopold Gassmann, Gottlieb Muffat) .

C'est avec les nouvelles formes de compositions mises en place par Franz-Joseph Haydn, que les cercles viennois initient le « Classique » . À la rigueur mathématique du Baroque succède une musique plus vivante, aux mélodies prononcées, plus à même de divertir. La Symphonie et la musique de chambre (pour piano notamment) prennent un essor majeur. Plusieurs des compositeurs qui s'y sont illustrés ne sont pas Viennois ou « Autrichiens » d'origine, mais se sont installés plus moins durablement dans la ville :

Ludwig van Beethoven, Carl Czerny, Anton Diabelli, Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf, Christoph Willibald Gluck, Franz-Joseph

Haydn, Johann Michaël Haydn, Franz Xaver Wolfgang Mozart, Leopold Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Sigismond von Neukomm, Ignace Joseph Pleyel, Franz Schubert, Gustav Mahler, Antonio Salieri, Franz Xaver Süßmayr.

Après le foisonnement de compositeurs importants au début du siècle, la période Biedermeier ouvre la voie à une musique plus « facile ». Joseph Lanner, Johann Strauß père et fils ou Hugo Wolf enrichissent le répertoire de leurs compositions : des Lieder, des valse ou des opérettes pour l'essentiel.

Isolé et méconnu malgré une œuvre dense et abondante, Anton Bruckner offre au Romantisme autrichien des Symphonies majeures, mais il est déjà, de par ses audaces tonales, proche des modernes à qui il ouvre la voie.

Comme à la fin du siècle précédent, une révolution musicale se prépare avec la Seconde école de Vienne qui clôture des siècles de musique tonale. Gustav Mahler en est l'ultime représentant avec ses Symphonies extrêmes. Il invite le folklore d'Europe centrale au cœur de son œuvre qui renvoie ainsi des accents grinçants entre 2 mélodées. On sent chez lui dans son hésitation et son balancement entre des formes magistrales et d'autres plus minimalistes, les prémisses des créations atonales aux dimensions réduites. C'est Arnold Schönberg qui devait donner le coup de grâce à la musique passée en inventant le dodécaphonisme, soit une musique « hasardeuse » n'étant plus ni mathématique ni dramatique.

Quelques compositeurs : Alban Berg, Gustav Mahler, Franz Schmidt, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker, Anton von Webern, Alexander von Zemlinsky.

Il faut attendre le XXe siècle pour voir à nouveau les compositeurs autrichiens s'intéresser à l'Opéra, abandonné depuis Mozart. Toutefois, malgré l'abondance des œuvres, peut-être parce qu'elles ont encore des traces tonales, la renommée n'a guère touché les compositeurs contemporains :

Gottfried von Einem, Ernst Křenek, Schrammel quartet, Egon Wellesz.

L'Autriche a non seulement un passé riche de compositeurs de renom, mais elle a abrité aussi des orchestres et des chefs d'orchestre illustres tels Herbert von Karajan, Karl Böhm, Erich Kleiber, Bruno Walter, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, René Clemencic.

En marge de son important patrimoine Classique, l'Autriche fait aussi partie des pays couverts par la musique pastorale alpine. Des régions comme le Tyrol ou la Styrie (« Blossmusik ») ont ainsi su conserver un folklore très riche.

Le Tyrol est une région alpine où l'activité paysanne est encore importante. Nombre de traditions y ont été préservées. On trouve essentiellement 2 types de musique :

La musique vocale d'alpage inclut les « Weihnachtslieder » (chants de Noël) , les « Almlieder » (chants de pâturage) , les « Liebeslieder » (chants d'amour) , les « Vierzeiler » (quatrains) et les « Jodl » (tyrolienne) .

La musique instrumentale : à danser ou « tanzmusik », incluant boarischer et « Ländler » en plus des valse ou mazurkas ; elle est jouée sur des cuivres d'où le nom aussi de « blossmusik », à écouter ou « stubenmusik », initiée par Tobi Reiser comme un prolongement folk de la musique de chambre.

La musique folklorique (« Volksmusik » ; musique populaire) se retrouve tout autant dans les milieux campagnards qu'urbains.

« Schrammel » : la « schrammelmusik » est née dans les bas quartiers de Vienne à la fin du XIXe siècle, lors de réunions d'immigrés hongrois, slovènes, tchèques, et d'Autrichiens. Les frères Joann et Josef Schrammel inventèrent une nouvelle guitare (« Contraguitar ») et un nouveau concept de musique populaire en fondant un petit quartet avec guitare, violon et clarinette (et accordéon), et en y interprétant des valse.

« Gstanzl » : il s'agit de courts chants satyriques réservés aux hommes et parfois dansés sur des « Ländler ».

« Anklopfelweise » : c'est un chant de quête de l'Avent.

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, qui recrute ses membres parmi ceux de l'Orchestre de l'Opéra national, est également une référence mondiale. De nombreux concerts de musique Classique sont organisés au « Musikverein » (avec la célèbre salle dorée) et au « Konzerthaus ».

Le « Konzerthaus » de Vienne fut construit entre 1911 et 1913 d'après les plans des architectes Ferdinand Fellner et Hermann Helmer, avec la collaboration de Ludwig Baumann. Il sera inauguré le 19 octobre 1913 par le compositeur Richard Strauß.

Le « Konzerthaus » possède 4 salles :

La « Großer Saal » de 1,840 places. Dès sa création, elle va accueillir un orgue du facteur Rieger Orgelbau.

La « Mozartsaal » de 704 places.

La « Schubertsaal » de 336 places.

La « Beriosaal » construite lors des dernières rénovations (de 1997 à 2000) pouvant accueillir 400 personnes.

Chaque soir, 10,000 personnes en moyenne assistent à des concerts de musique Classique.

Tant l'art que la culture disposent à Vienne d'une très longue tradition dans les domaines du Théâtre et de l'Opéra.

Le « Burgtheater », ainsi que sa 2e scène (le Théâtre académique), passent pour figurer parmi les Théâtres les plus importants au monde. Vienne dispose également du Théâtre populaire (« Volkstheater ») et du Théâtre de Josefstadt. Une multitude de plus petites scènes renforce l'offre de Théâtre de la capitale, petites scènes qui n'ont guère à envier aux plus grandes du point de vue qualité. Celles-ci sont souvent consacrées à des pièces modernes et expérimentales, ainsi qu'au cabaret ou à l'art mineur.

Les amateurs d'Opéra bénéficient également une offre très riche : l'Opéra national (« Staatsoper ») et l'Opéra populaire (« Volksoper ») proposent une offre variée, ce dernier, en plus des représentations d'Opéras (souvent transcrits en langue allemande), donnant aussi à voir des opérettes et des comédies musicales.

Le Théâtre sur la Vienne (« Theater an der Wien ») s'est distingué ces dernières années par de très belles représentations de comédies musicales. La plus appréciée d'entre elles fut « Elisabeth », qui fut ensuite traduite en plusieurs langues et jouée dans le monde entier. La maison dans laquelle Beethoven présenta son « Fidelio » pour la 1^{re} fois est depuis 2006 de nouveau consacrée uniquement à l'Opéra.

La maison de la musique (« Haus der Musik ») de Vienne propose aux enfants et adultes depuis l'an 2000 un musée du son (« Klangmuseum »).

Le Théâtre de marionnettes du château de Schönbrunn (« Marionettentheater Schloß Schönbrunn ») propose à tous un spectacle de marionnettes sous forme de pièces et d'Opéras.

La « Hofburg » abrite le musée de « Sissi », les appartements de l'Empereur (« Kaiserappartements ») et la chambre du trésor d'argent de la Cour (« Hofsilber und Tafelkammer ») où la couronne du Saint-Empire est exposée avec d'autres regalia. Directement à côté de la « Hofburg » se trouvent 2 bâtiments identiques qui se font face : le musée de l'histoire de l'art (« Kunsthistorisches Museum »), qui abrite de nombreuses peintures de Maîtres, ainsi que le musée de Vienne (« Naturhistorisches Museum Wien »), aussi appelé musée de l'histoire naturelle de Vienne.

De là, on accède directement au « Museumsquartier » (le quartier des musées), un complexe de musées érigé dans les années 1990 dans les anciennes écuries Impériales. Ce quartier abrite le musée d'art moderne de la Fondation Ludwig (« Museum moderner Kunst - Stiftung Ludwig »), le musée Léopold (« Leopold-Museum »), où se trouve la plus grande collection du monde des peintures de Egon Schiele et qui propose principalement des œuvres du style de la Sécession viennoise, des œuvres modernes viennoises et de l'expressionnisme autrichien, plusieurs salles servant à des expositions temporaires, la « Kunsthalle de Vienne » (« Kunsthalle Wien »), le « AzW » (« Architekturzentrum Wien »), le musée d'architecture moderne et contemporaine, ainsi que le quartier de la danse (« Tanzquartier Wien »). Le « Liechtenstein Museum », le musée de l'art Baroque, abrite l'une des collections d'art privées les plus importantes au monde.

Le Musée des Beaux-arts de Vienne (« Kunsthistorisches Museum ») possède une exceptionnelle collection de peinture européenne, notamment des écoles flamandes (avec notamment le plus grand ensemble d'œuvres de Pieter Bruegel au monde), italiennes et allemandes. Il présente aussi d'importantes collections de sculptures, d'arts décoratifs et d'antiquités grecques, Romaines et égyptiennes.

Un autre musée majeur est l' « Albertina », dédié principalement aux arts graphiques (dessins et gravures), et qui possède une collection unique dans ce domaine, avec par exemple un ensemble remarquable de dessins et aquarelles d'Albrecht Dürer.

La capitale autrichienne propose également d'autres curiosités atypiques comme le Palais de la Sécession, bâtiment emblématique du style de la Sécession viennoise, le Palais Impérial du Haut-Belvédère, le Forum d'art de la Banque autrichienne (« BA-CA Kunstforum ») au centre-ville sur la place Freyung ou encore la célèbre « Hundertwasserhaus » de l'architecte Friedensreich Hundertwasser.

Viennent encore s'ajouter de nombreux autres musées, du Musée d'histoire de l'armée (« Heeresgeschichtliches Museum ») au Musée des techniques de Vienne (« Technisches Museum Wien ») en passant par le Musée de l'horlogerie (« Wiener Uhrenmuseum ») ou le musée des pompes funèbres (« Bestattungsmuseum Wien »), sans oublier les musées d'arrondissements, qui se concentrent sur l'histoire propre à chaque arrondissement.

...

Centre administratif, culturel (Université) et commercial, Vienne est de loin la plus grande ville d'Autriche. Elle possède de nombreux bâtiments remarquables : cathédrale reconstruite aux XIVe-XVIe siècles ; nombreux édifices Baroques, dus notamment à Johann Bernhard Fischer von Erlach et à Johann Lukas von Hildebrandt ; œuvres de Otto Wagner et de Josef Hoffmann, nombreux musées, dont le « Kunsthistorisches Museum », l'Albertina, le « Leopold Museum » (importante collection d'œuvres d'Egon Schiele) et le MUMOK (musée d'Art moderne de la Fondation Ludwig) dans le « Museums Quartier », et le musée du Baroque et la galerie d'Art autrichien des XIXe-XXe siècles (œuvres de Klimt, Kokoschka et autres artistes de l'école de Vienne) dans les 2 palais du Belvédère.

Forteresse romaine à la frontière de la Pannonie, Vienne se développa au Moyen-âge grâce aux Babenberg, puis aux Habsbourg, qui l'acquirent en 1276. Résidence des Empereurs du Saint-Empire (partiellement après 1438, définitivement à partir de 1611), elle fut assiégée par les Turcs (1529, 1683). De nombreux traités y furent signés, celui de 1738 qui mit fin à la guerre de la Succession de Pologne. Vienne fut au XIXe siècle l'un des principaux foyers culturels de l'Europe. Après l'effondrement de l'Empire austro-hongrois (1918), elle devint la capitale de la République autrichienne.

Situation et site

Vienne s'est développée à un carrefour de voies naturelles qui correspond également à un carrefour géologique. En effet, c'est sur les derniers (ou les Iers) contreforts alpins que s'est installée la ville. Toutefois, les Romains, qui marquèrent de leur empreinte les pays au sud du Danube, avaient d'abord donné la préférence à « Carnuntum », un peu plus à l'est de la capitale actuelle. Mais, les Barbares ayant facilement emporté la place, ils préférèrent un site plus facile à défendre. Située sur une petite rivière, la « Wien », « Vindobona » a été implantée sur le dernier bourrelet alpin, avant l'actuel bassin de Vienne. La situation de carrefour était sauvegardée. Les Alpes favorisent, le long du Danube, la circulation longitudinale ; grâce au bassin géologique de Vienne, à la Morava et au couloir de Moravie, Vienne se situe sur la grande route Venise - République tchèque - Allemagne - Scandinavie. L'histoire et la politique, sans doute, expliquent qu'un des plus remarquables carrefours de l'Europe centrale n'ait connu qu'un essor relativement tardif.

Le site n'est pas comparable à celui de Linz ou de Passau, où le passage du fleuve a donné naissance à une ville-pont. À la hauteur de Vienne, le Danube est violent et, jadis, il divaguait au milieu de prairies parsemées d'aulnes. Aussi a-t-on pu dire que Vienne n'est pas située sur le Danube.

Les relations de Vienne avec le Danube, selon les Viennois, sont nonchalantes, un « schlampertes Verhältnis ». La ville cache le Danube à l'étranger, si bien que celui-ci peut se promener des heures durant à travers l'organisme urbain sans jamais voir le fleuve : rien de comparable à Paris et à Londres, où Seine et Tamise ont été intégrées dans le paysage urbain en donnant naissance à des fronts de fleuve accompagnant le cours d'eau. Le touriste débarquant d'un paquebot danubien sera accueilli par des gazomètres, des installations industrielles, des « casernes d'habitations », des gares de marchandises et les espaces verts destinés à recevoir les eaux du fleuve lors des crues. Avec quelque chance, il apercevra le toit de la cathédrale Saint-Étienne ; les charmes de la ville sont ailleurs. Ce n'est qu'à une date récente que des efforts, gigantesques, ont été faits pour intégrer le fleuve dans l'organisme urbain. La branche principale du fleuve coulait immédiatement aux pieds de l'enceinte urbaine jusqu'au XVIIIe siècle. Inondations, difficultés de navigation, marécages, foyers d'infection étaient autant d'obstacles à l'utilisation du fleuve.

Les grandes phases du développement urbain

Du XVIe au XIXe siècle

Au cours du XVIe siècle, les Habsbourg choisissent Vienne, en raison de sa remarquable situation géographique, comme résidence principale de leurs possessions ; l'urbanisation de la noblesse, gagnant alors l'Europe centrale, accentuera l'essor de la ville. Cet événement se place 4 ans après une 1re alerte : Soliman le Magnifique, avec une armée de 250,000 hommes, avait essayé, en 1529, de prendre la ville.

La Vienne du XVIe siècle est encore peu développée ; pendant tout le Moyen-âge, elle dépendait, sur le plan religieux, de l'évêché de Passau. Ce n'est qu'en 1469 qu'un évêché y a été créé. La « Klosteroffensive » (offensive des cloîtres), en relation avec la Contre-Réforme, entraîne l'essor des couvents, des abbayes et des autres édifices religieux. De ce fait, la classe bourgeoise, notamment les marchands, voit son importance décliner. Cela se répercutera sur le cadre architectural de la ville : la propriété foncière changera de nature.

La victoire sur les Turcs devant les portes de Vienne, en 1683, est un tournant capital dans le développement de la ville. À partir de cette date, l'expansion des Habsbourg dans le sud de l'Europe centrale fait disparaître la crainte d'une occupation turque qui pesait sur Vienne depuis 1529.

La période Baroque (1683-1770) est une ère de construction active qui voit doubler la population de la ville. Les maisons Gothiques, aux façades étroites, sont démolies par rues entières. Sur les parcelles remembrées, on construit des palais, des églises, des couvents ou des maisons de rapport. La rénovation du centre entraîne l'expulsion de l'artisanat vers la périphérie. Les faubourgs se développent rapidement, alors que, pendant toute la période des menaces turques, ils ont connu une stagnation permanente. Une nouvelle enceinte, correspondant à l'actuel Gürtel, est édifée en 1706. Très rapidement, la ville franchit l'enceinte, en direction de l'ouest, avec les faubourgs de Fünfhaus et de Neulerchenfeld.

Vers 1770 débute une autre période d'expansion : l' « ère des manufactures » (« Manufakturzeitalter ») . Elle se terminera vers 1840. De nouvelles couches sociales font leur apparition : entrepreneurs, directeurs de manufactures, banquiers, commerçants en gros et fonctionnaires supérieurs. L'époque des grands palais nobiliaires approche de sa fin. Cette période est caractérisée par des aspects architecturaux plus bourgeois. La crise financière, qui atteint la noblesse, fait que, dans le paysage urbain, les grands édifices administratifs, aux allures sobres, les habitations bourgeoises et les immeubles locatifs se côtoient de plus en plus.

La période décisive : la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle

La seconde moitié du XIXe siècle voit l'ascension progressive mais rapide de Vienne au niveau d'une métropole mondiale. En 1840, toute l'agglomération viennoise comptait 440,000 habitants ; en 1910, le chiffre de 2 millions est dépassé. De nouveaux faubourgs se développent à l'extérieur de l'enceinte. Mais près des 3/4 des maisons d'habitation d'avant 1840 sont démolies dans la vieille ville et la 1re ceinture des faubourgs. Un nouvel exode de population vers la périphérie en est la conséquence directe. À partir de 1857, les autorités font procéder à la démolition des fortifications, ce qui permet d'accroître la circulation par l'intermédiaire du « Ring » . Une partie des terrains récupérés est occupée par de grandioses bâtiments publics, faisant renaître les splendeurs de l'époque des palais Baroques.

Le chemin de fer est amené par des gares terminales à proximité de ce qui a été l'enceinte du XVIIIe siècle. La gare du Sud (« Südbahnhof ») est ouverte en 1841. La gare François-Joseph (« Franz-Josef-Bahnhof ») , à proximité du canal du Danube, est commencée à partir de 1867. Toutefois, c'est la gare du Nord (« Nordbahnhof ») , construite en 1837, qui a été la 1re gare viennoise. La ligne qui la dessert, la « Nordbahn » , reliant « Deutsch-Wagram » à Vienne, en passant par « Floridsdorf » , qui devait en être le principal bénéficiaire sur le plan du démarrage industriel, est une des principales voies menant à Vienne.

L'implantation des voies ferrées et des gares ne s'est pas faite au hasard : l'intention était de faciliter le ravitaillement des casernes et de faire venir rapidement de province des troupes en cas de révolution. En effet, les principales gares étaient couplées avec des complexes militaires (casernes, entrepôts) , si bien que la stratégie militaire ne perdait pas ses droits dans l'urbanisme du XIXe siècle. Le développement de l'arsenal, à proximité des gares du Sud et de l'Est, s'explique de la même façon. Pendant longtemps, l'État fut souverain dans le domaine architectural et urbanistique. La municipalité exerça pour la 1re fois son influence en 1890, lorsqu'il fallut remplacer le « Linienwall » par une nouvelle ceinture. Jusque-là, ses compétences se limitèrent essentiellement à l'assurance du ravitaillement et au développement du système d'enseignement primaire. Lors des élections de 1895, le Parti petit-bourgeois «

Christlichsoziale Partei » conquist la majorité au conseil municipal. Le maire Karl Lueger fut à l'origine du « socialisme municipal », tant admiré en Europe. Il réussit à municipaliser les sociétés, souvent étrangères, qui contrôlaient la production de gaz et d'électricité. En 1903, les entreprises de transports urbains sont municipalisées ; 70 écoles furent édifiées en 15 ans. Des hôpitaux municipaux furent construits dans la partie ouest de la ville (« Lainzer Krankenhaus ») . La municipalité créa et développa les caisses d'épargne, des sociétés d'assurance municipales.

La régularisation du Danube (1869-1875) fut une des grandes réalisations de l'époque. Les crues répétées nécessitèrent de grands travaux. Le fleuve fut installé dans un lit rectiligne qui recoupait la « Auenlandschaft », c'est-à-dire toute une zone amphibie de bras et d'îles occupés par l'eau, les prés, les marécages et de petits bois. Le Danube fut accompagné sur la rive gauche d'un ruban de près de 500 mètres de large servant à recueillir les eaux de crue. En période normale, cette zone donne l'aspect d'espaces verts, mais introduit néanmoins une coupure dans l'espace urbain. La « Alte Donau » et quelques autres plans d'eau dans la zone du « Prater » sont les témoins du passage désordonné du fleuve à travers Vienne. La régularisation n'entraîna de construction de quais que sur la rive droite. La construction de la « Donauferbahn » permit de relier les bords du fleuve avec les gares urbaines. Ce n'est qu'en 1902 qu'on entreprit, en utilisant un bras abandonné du Danube, de construire un port « d'hiver » à Freudenau (extrémité sud-est du « Prater ») . Le port d'Albern, situé au sud-est du précédent, n'a connu qu'un début de réalisation. La reprise de l'extension est en relation avec la réalisation du canal Main-Danube, qui laisse de grands espoirs à la navigation danubienne. Le port de Lobau a été spécialisé dans le trafic pétrolier. Le développement de la raffinerie de Schwechat est en relation avec ce dernier.

Le XXe siècle

La 3e grande époque de l'expansion de Vienne fut marquée en 1904 par la traversée du Danube en direction de « Floridsdorf » . Le passage de la voie ferrée, l'existence d'un pont avaient fait de cette localité la « tête de pont industrielle » . Les projets grandioses d'un canal Danube - Oder formaient l'arrière-plan de la politique d'extension sur la rive gauche. La décennie précédant la Première Guerre mondiale ne suffit pas pour donner aux responsables le temps de réaliser les plans ambitieux. La guerre et le démembrement de l'Empire, consécutif à sa défaite, laissèrent la rive gauche dans une situation d'inachèvement. Des maisons de rapport de plusieurs étages, implantées aux carrefours, contrastèrent avec l'énormité des surfaces agricoles du « Marchfeld » .

L'année 1918 marque pour Vienne une coupure beaucoup plus importante que pour les autres capitales européennes. Ancienne métropole d'un Empire de plus de 50 millions d'habitants, Vienne ne fut plus, dès lors, que la capitale d'un territoire de 6,5 millions d'habitants. Les bases de l'existence urbaine étaient atteintes dans leur profondeur. D'une position centrale, au sein de l'Empire, la ville se vit repoussée dans une situation périphérique, dans le cadre purement autrichien. En plus, Vienne « la rouge », la socialiste, ne fut pas totalement reconnue par le reste de l'Autriche, plus conservateur. Les problèmes étaient graves, car l'industrie lourde avait été, dans le cadre de l'Empire austro-hongrois, établie en Bohême-Silésie. L'industrie textile viennoise vivait en partie en symbiose avec celle des pays sudètes. La disparition de l'Empire amena celle d'une clientèle de luxe qui avait suscité le développement de nombre d'industries à Vienne.

La chute de la monarchie entraîna une émigration importante. Au moins 340,000 non-Autrichiens, surtout des Tchèques, quittèrent Vienne après 1918. La population tomba de 2,275,000 habitants, en 1915, à 1,842,000, en 1919. Le repli sur les territoires purement allemands, après 1918, amena une restriction de la zone de recrutement de la population de la ville.

La conception urbanistique changea complètement après 1918. L'administration social-démocrate n'avait plus à affronter le pouvoir Impérial. La construction de logements devint le 1er problème de la municipalité. C'est uniquement à travers les options socialistes qu'on peut comprendre le développement de Vienne après 1918. La municipalité acheta des terrains afin de limiter la spéculation foncière. De 5,504 hectares, en 1914, les propriétés foncières municipales passèrent à 6,689 hectares, en 1926. L'innovation anglaise de cité-jardin fut introduite. Mais on fit appel également à l'idée allemande de coopératives de construction (système « Raiffeisen »).

L'urbanisme évoluant, on construisit entre les 2 guerres, des ensembles collectifs comportant des équipements sociaux. Ce fut le type des « Hof », où les jardins intérieurs devaient constituer des aires de calme : « Karl-Marx-Hof », « Karl-Seitz-Hof » et « Reumannhof » symbolisent l'urbanisme de la Ire République d'Autriche.

La Seconde Guerre mondiale entraîna des destructions importantes. Sur 706,000 logements, 87,000 furent totalement ou partiellement détruits. La reconstruction amena une nouvelle phase dans l'urbanisme viennois. Entre les 2 guerres, la municipalité avait fait construire près de 60,000 logements, ce qui avait amené l'élargissement de la ceinture d'habitations pavillonnaires et des immeubles collectifs. Cette tendance a continué après 1945. À côté de la construction de logements, l'aménagement de « sub-centres », avec équipements commerciaux et collectifs, intéresse surtout les zones périphériques, les quartiers du XIXe siècle ayant souvent leurs rues commerçantes. Le sous-développement commercial était plus aigu sur la rive gauche dans la « Donaustadt » ; mais l'étendue des espaces non bâtis a permis d'y aménager, selon les normes urbanistiques, les équipements nécessaires et souhaitables. Vienne a retrouvé un rayonnement nouveau : elle est le siège de nombreux organismes internationaux. Depuis 1960, la ville remplit des fonctions internationales importantes. L'ONU-city, complexe achevé en 1979, est le siège de l'Agence internationale de l'énergie atomique et de l'Organisation des Nations unies pour le développement industriel. Sur le plan de l'architecture, de l'urbanisme, Vienne est le résultat d'un héritage complexe et de plusieurs idéologies. C'est dans cet esprit qu'il faut comprendre le caractère de chaque quartier.

Les activités

L'industrie ne fournit qu'une faible partie du produit intérieur brut de la ville. Parmi les branches les plus importantes, on trouve : l'électro-technique, la construction de machines, l'alimentation, la métallurgie, la confection, la chimie, la construction de véhicules, le textile, le papier, le bois. Grâce à la raffinerie de Schwechat, l'industrie pétrolière joue un rôle important pour l'approvisionnement de tout le pays. L'aéroport international a un trafic supérieur à 3 millions de passagers.

Les différents quartiers de Vienne

Si Vienne, politiquement, correspond à une province autonome, elle est, administrativement, divisée en 23 arrondissements, ou « Bezirke ». La taille de ces derniers varie considérablement ; elle est fonction des périodes de croissance, c'est-à-dire d'annexion.

L'arrondissement le plus peuplé est le 10e, au sud (« Favoriten », « Oberlaa », « Rothneusiedl », « Unterlaa »), qui a aussi la plus forte population active industrielle. Suit le 3e arrondissement, au sud-est du centre-ville, correspondant au quartier de la « Landstraße ». Sa situation stratégique sur la route menant vers la Hongrie lui a valu, très tôt, un rôle décisif. Plus de la moitié des actifs sont employés dans l'industrie, mais le commerce et les services administratifs y sont bien représentés.

Le 16e arrondissement, ou « Ottakring », déborde déjà sur les collines de l'ouest. Il est encore à majorité industrielle. Il est suivi par le 2e arrondissement (« Leopoldstadt »), à l'est, entre la vieille ville et le Danube. Les grandes gares sont proches, et cela explique la prédominance des actifs industriels. Toutefois, proportionnellement à la population des autres arrondissements, cet arrondissement est un de ceux qui comptent le plus fort pourcentage de travailleurs dans la distribution (commerce de gros, entrepôts).

Sur le plan des densités, les différences sont considérables d'un arrondissement à l'autre. Ainsi, le 1er arrondissement (le centre) totalise encore plus de 100 habitants à l'hectare. Il est pourtant dépassé, et de loin, par le 4e (« Wieden »), avec environ 250 habitants, le 5e (« Margareten »), avec environ 350, le 6e (« Mariahilf ») et le 7e (« Neubau »), approchant tous les 2 le chiffre de 3,000 habitants, le 8e (« Josefstadt »), dépassant légèrement ce chiffre. Il s'agit essentiellement des quartiers entourant immédiatement le noyau historique. Le 15e (« Rudolfsheim-Fünfhaus ») fait partie de cette ceinture de fortes densités. Par contre, dans les quartiers de l'ouest, les densités sont généralement moins élevées. Les 2 arrondissements de la rive gauche du Danube ont une densité moyenne faible. Ces chiffres laissent entrevoir les possibilités d'expansion de la ville.

Sur le plan typologique et fonctionnel, on peut dégager une demi-douzaine de types de quartiers.

Le centre

Il conserve un maximum de bâtiments anciens. Les bâtiments administratifs sont nombreux, surtout à proximité du « Ring ». Les palais aristocratiques sont fréquents. La fonction culturelle est importante : on compte au moins une dizaine de théâtres, et les musées sont nombreux. Le centre est le cœur de Vienne avec ses vieilles rues et ses petites places. Le commerce de détail occupe une place de choix.

Les quartiers à l'ouest du centre

Leur aménagement a été largement déterminé par les vallées parallèles, issues de la « Wienerwald » et dont la vallée de la « Wien » est l'élément le plus important. Il existe donc comme un système de grandes voies radiales se branchant d'abord sur le « Gürtel » et ensuite sur le « Ring ». À l'époque Baroque, certaines de ces voies furent transformées en allées plantées d'arbres. La route de Linz est la voie radiale la plus importante. À l'approche du « Ring » , les quartiers sont mixtes, unissant les fonctions résidentielles et administratives, voire commerciales. L'allure géométrique prédomine encore plus dans la forme des blocs de maisons en hauteur des quartiers situés plus à l'ouest.

Les anciens villages du rebord de la « Wienerwald »

Ceux de la partie nord (« Nussdorf » , « Grinzing » , « Sievering ») sont profondément marqués par la viticulture, qui, ici, remonte au Moyen-âge. Ce sont souvent des marchés aux vins, établis en bordure de la forêt viennoise. L'urbanisation est ancienne. On y trouve beaucoup de propriétés religieuses, bourgeoises et nobiliaires. Nombre de vignes sont clôturées d'un mur de pierre. Les demeures sont pittoresques, et la topographie ajoute aux charmes d'un habitat bien conservé. Les villas ont tendance à envahir ces coteaux, qui passent pour fournir les plus beaux sites de Vienne.

Les quartiers du sud-ouest

Il s'agit souvent de quartiers issus d'agglomérations villageoises établies le long des routes menant vers le sud. Le long de la « Blätterstraße » , l'ancienne route du vin, s'étaient développés des villages viticoles ; à l'époque de la « Gründerzeit » , la « Triesterstraße » avait vu se développer des tuileries (vers 1870) , en partie abandonnées de nos jours. Entre les 2 s'enchevêtrent les habitations modestes, les zones maraîchères, les friches et les établissements industriels. L'ensemble n'est pas encore très bien intégré dans le corps urbain.

Les quartiers du sud

La partie méridionale de la ville présente des possibilités presque idéales pour un développement de celle-ci, en forme d'éventail. La zone entièrement bâtie va du « Ring » au « Gürtel » . La « Favoritenstraße » , plus au sud, est l'axe principal d'une 2e zone densément occupée. Les gares du Sud et de l'Est introduisent une barrière entre le quartier de « Wieden » , qui présente encore des caractères des quartiers résidentiels coûteux, et « Favoriten » , où les types d'habitations sont plus variés. Les constructions récentes sont aussi plus nombreuses dans « Favoriten » . Au début du XIXe siècle, cette zone était encore consacrée à l'agriculture ; l'immigration tchèque et slovaque y avait donné des caractères originaux.

Le quartier de « Wienerberg » abritait, à la fin du XIXe siècle, la plus grande briqueterie d'Europe. Les façades monotones, en brique, des maisons ouvrières sont l'héritage d'une activité quasi disparue. Quant à la colline du « Laaerberg » , peut-être à cause de la proximité des briqueteries, les essais d'y implanter des résidences secondaires ont échoué constamment. Les surfaces agricoles ont mieux résisté à l'urbanisation qu'ailleurs.

Les quartiers du sud-est

Ils présentent quelques caractères communs. Avant l'apparition du chemin de fer, ils étaient axés sur une voie de communication unique. Le développement urbanistique y a été plus hésitant. Enfin, la région du sud-est a connu un développement par stades successifs.

La construction des ponts sur le Danube, plus au nord, a donné à l'ensemble de ces quartiers une impulsion considérable, permettant des liaisons ferroviaires entre les pays tchèques et slovaques, d'une part, et la Hongrie, d'autre part.

La « Ungarische Landstraße », l'axe routier principal, avait pour objet fondamental, jusqu'à l'avènement de la voie ferrée, de ravitailler la ville en produits alimentaires. La construction des chemins de fer et des gares amena dans cette région de la ville un cloisonnement qui fractionne et isole un certain nombre de quartiers. « Simmering » a été longtemps une aire purement agricole, avant de recueillir les maraîchers chassés par l'expansion urbaine. Puis la commune a utilisé une partie des terrains pour y implanter des abattoirs ainsi que des usines à gaz et à électricité ; s'y ajoutent l'arsenal et d'autres entreprises, qui font de la partie extérieure du sud-est de la ville une zone essentiellement industrielle. La proximité de « Schwechat », le centre autrichien du raffinage du pétrole, ne fait qu'accroître cette orientation.

Les quartiers de la rive gauche ; l'exemple de Floridsdorf

Au nord du Danube, les quartiers ne sont pas homogènes, mais celui de « Floridsdorf », véritable ville, est le plus expressif. La localité a été créée en 1786. Sa fonction de passage dominait, mais les prés servaient d'embouche aux marchands de bestiaux de Vienne. L'industrie s'y installa d'abord sous la forme d'ateliers de constructions ferroviaires. Puis ce fut l'époque de l'industrie mécanique et chimique. La population ouvrière domine. Les demeures luxueuses sont rares. Aussi, « Floridsdorf » a-t-elle des aspects plus prolétaires que d'autres quartiers. Il s'y ajoute un certain caractère d'inachevé du fait de l'avortement des plans d'expansion en 1918. Ce caractère est encore assez visible dans la « Brünner » et la « Pragerstraße ». Un effort d'adaptation est cependant fait. Depuis 1945, « Floridsdorf » est un des quartiers où la construction est la plus active.

Espaces verts et héritage historique

Le charme de Vienne tient moins au Danube qu'à la ville proprement dite. Les espaces verts représentent en partie les restes des parcs des propriétés féodales. Certains gardent leur style historique, tel le Belvédère, qui allie les aspects de la Renaissance italienne et du Baroque français. Le parc de « Schönbrunn » est d'inspiration française. C'est sous Joseph II, le despote éclairé, que nombre de parcs furent rendus accessibles à la population. Le début d'une politique des espaces verts est indiscutablement lié à cet Empereur : ce dernier non seulement ouvrit au public (en 1766) les immenses espaces verts du « Prater », mais encore transforma le glacis de fortifications en une ceinture d'espaces verts ouverte au peuple. En mettant en place une administration communale, il préparait l'avenir. En effet, la municipalité acquit nombre de parcs aristocratiques (« Esterházy », « Schönborn », « Arenberg »), qui, autrement, eussent été victimes des promoteurs immobiliers. Cette politique fut imitée par des communes alors encore autonomes, comme « Döbling » et « Währing », au nord-ouest de la ville (« Türkenschanzpark »). Les autorités communales laissèrent en parc certaines parcelles rectangulaires au milieu des blocs construits au XIXe siècle.

Après la Première Guerre mondiale, la commune, dans le cadre des « constructions sociales », envisagea également des « espaces verts sociaux » . La politique municipale visait à introduire dans le noyau urbain ancien des espaces verts en nombre suffisant, en fonction des possibilités d'achats de terrains ou d'immeubles.

La mise en place de terrains de sport s'est opérée selon la même politique. Le quartier du « Prater » a servi, dès le XIXe siècle, au sport noble par excellence : l'équitation. Depuis, il est devenu le quartier des loisirs pour Vienne, voire pour l'Autriche entière : terrains de sport (dont le grand stade) , zones de loisirs, expositions, etc. Avec l'aménagement tardif du « Prater » , les rives du Danube sont intégrées dans l'espace fonctionnel de la ville.

Il y a une grande différence entre les 2 rives du Danube. Si la ville de rive droite est l'expression historique de l'Autriche, la rive gauche est d'aménagement récent. Les espaces verts sont, ici, plus liés à la politique de construction récente et à l'utilisation de terrains adéquats (méandre recoupé de la « Alte Donau ») qu'à la mise en valeur et à la conservation d'héritages historiques.

Le 1er centre intellectuel des pays allemands du Danube

Pendant longtemps, la capitale culturelle et intellectuelle de la civilisation germanique se trouvait sur les bords du Danube et non pas sur la Sprée. Ce n'est qu'à la veille de la Première Guerre mondiale que Berlin a éclipsé Vienne. L'Université de Vienne, fondée en 1365, a longtemps été la plus importante de l'Empire. L'Université technique (« Technische Hochschule ») , fondée en 1872, a des effectifs moins importants que l'Université Classique, mais elle joue un rôle de 1er ordre pour l'économie urbaine et nationale.

Une des originalités est l'École supérieure pour le commerce mondial (« Hochschule für Welthandel ») , créée en 1898, qui marque la tradition commerciale de la ville. Parmi les autres écoles supérieures, on peut citer l'Institut d'agronomie (« Hochschule für Bodenkultur ») , l'École vétérinaire (« Tierärztliche Hochschule ») , l'Académie des Beaux-arts, l'Académie des arts appliqués et l'Académie de musique. Il y a une étroite imbrication entre la vie intellectuelle et la vie économique. En y ajoutant le cosmopolitisme viennois, on a peut-être là le fond de l'âme viennoise, qui baigne dans un environnement culturel que très peu de grandes métropoles possèdent. Quant au « Wiener Witz » (l' « humour viennois ») , il en est l'expression parlée de l'homme de la rue.

Le 1er centre touristique autrichien

Vienne reste une ville cosmopolite, au passé d'une extraordinaire richesse. Les contacts avec les civilisations allemande, tchèque, slovaque, magyare, slave du Sud, pour ne parler que des contacts essentiels, ont laissé des traces profondes dans l'histoire, l'architecture, la culture, en un mot dans la civilisation viennoise. C'est ce dépaysement, agrémenté des charmes d'un milieu urbain différencié, qui attire le touriste. Le tourisme culturel se traduit par la visite des innombrables palais et constructions des 3 derniers siècles. Les églises de la vieille ville sont les plus anciennes. Le château de « Schönbrunn » (le « Versailles viennois ») , avec ses salles d'apparat, sa collection de carrosses historiques, son parc et son jardin zoologique, est une attraction majeure. Englobés dans la ville actuelle, ses parcs servent aussi d'aire de détente pour les Viennois. Le Belvédère, flanqué de parcs, n'est pas loin du centre historique. Il renferme les musées d'art autrichien, du Moyen-âge à nos jours. L'ancienne et la nouvelle « Hofburg » possèdent des salles d'apparat, des musées, mais aussi la célèbre École d'équitation espagnole. Les musées sont nombreux dans la vieille ville. Une certaine homogénéité de l'architecture donne l'impression de puissance, qui fut celle de l'Empire autrichien. Le principal problème est d'« actualiser » ou de « fonctionnaliser » l'énorme héritage monarchique et Impérial : d'où l'organisation de manifestations de niveau international. La Foire internationale de Vienne se tient en mars et en septembre. Le parc d'attractions du « Prater » ouvre ses portes chaque 1er mai. Le Festival de Vienne, consacré à la musique et au théâtre, se tient en mai-juin. D'autres spectacles de valeur sont organisés en juillet et en août, en utilisant un cadre architectural approprié. L'automne voit l'ouverture de la saison de l'Opéra. Mais on reste loin des splendeurs Impériales, lorsque Empereur et Cour constituaient autant d'attractions que les artistes sur scène. Vienne, à la tradition si riche, reste une des capitales mondiales de la musique. Le cosmopolitisme culturel a subi un rude coup avec le démembrement de l'Empire, mais il faut souligner les efforts faits pour maintenir l'ouverture sur le monde extérieur.

Les environs de Vienne ne sont pas moins attrayants. Le « Weinviertel », au nord du Danube, s'orne de villages viticoles, où les viticulteurs offrent le « Heuriger » (vin nouveau) . Les caves creusées dans le lœss ajoutent au pittoresque. La « Wienerwald » pourrait raconter des pages entières de la civilisation viennoise. Fuyant les chaleurs de l'été viennois, les membres de la Cour, les nobles et les bourgeois ont cherché la « Sommerfrische » dans la forêt, dernière expression qui devait être plus tard synonyme de vacances d'été.

L'histoire de Vienne

Les origines, le Moyen-âge

Le noyau de la cité (1er arrondissement, die « Innere Stadt ») occupe une terrasse surplombant de peu un bras de fleuve, l'actuel « canal du Danube » (« Donaukanal ») . Cette terrasse, à l'abri des inondations, fut sans doute déjà occupée par les Celtes et même par les Illyriens. En tout cas, les Romains y établirent, au 1er siècle de notre ère, un camp de légionnaires. Détruite par les Quades et les Marcomans, en 166, « Vindobona » (nom d'origine celtique) est reconstruite en l'an 170 par l'Empereur Marc-Aurèle et élevée en 213 au rang de « municipium » . Le site semble avoir été abandonné en 395, après la rupture du limes.

La fondation des Ires églises Saint-Rupert (« Ruprechtskirche ») et Saint-Pierre (« Peterskirche ») remonte sans doute au VIIIe siècle. Au XIIe siècle, la ville devient résidence des ducs d'Autriche de la maison de Babenberg et connaît une Ire période de prospérité ; elle est un centre commercial important grâce à sa situation sur la voie fluviale, d'une part, et sur la route de l'ambre, qui relie la Méditerranée à la Baltique, de l'autre. Cette prospérité se maintient sous la domination du roi de Bohême, Otakar II Přemysl, héritier des Babenberg. En 1276, l'Empereur Rodolphe de Hasbourg, vainqueur d'Otakar, s'empare de la ville, qui, économiquement, souffre de ces guerres successorales. De l'essor économique de la ville, au XIVe siècle, témoignent un certain nombre d'édifices Gothiques conservés malgré les guerres et les sièges dont la ville aura à souffrir : cathédrale Saint-Étienne (« Stephansdom ») , église « Maria am Gestade » , noyau du « château » (« Burg ») . Au XVe siècle et au début du XVIe siècle (en particulier sous la domination du roi de Hongrie, Mathias 1er Corvin) , Vienne continue de prospérer.

Les temps modernes

Au début du XVI^e siècle, la poussée turque interrompt les voies de communication de l'Est : Vienne, qui ne peut plus jouer son rôle de relais économique, devient le centre administratif de l'Empire des Habsbourg, qui héritent des couronnes de Hongrie et de Bohême. En 1529, un 1^{er} assaut turc est repoussé. La ville, passée à la Réforme, est ramenée au catholicisme avec l'aide des Jésuites. L'influence culturelle espagnole et italienne devient prépondérante et marque d'une façon indélébile le « Baroque » autrichien. En 1683, l'armée turque assiège de nouveau la ville ; elle est repoussée après la victoire (sur les pentes du « Kahlenberg ») des troupes alliées commandées par le roi de Pologne, Jean Sobieski. La ville, en grande partie démolie, est reconstruite dans le nouveau style Baroque à la mode. En 1704-1708, devant la menace d'incursions des insurgés kuruc, est édifée une nouvelle enceinte, protégeant cette fois-ci les faubourgs : les actuels arrondissements 2 à 9. Au XVIII^e siècle, la ville profite de la consolidation de l'État autrichien, réorganisé et modernisé sous Marie-Thérèse et Joseph II. Pendant les guerres napoléoniennes, elle est assiégée et occupée à 2 reprises : en 1805 et en 1809. Après la défaite de Napoléon, le « Congrès » de paix se tient à Vienne, qui, malgré une crise financière aiguë, connaît alors un de ses moments les plus glorieux. Sous le régime du prince-chancelier Metternich (qui gouverne l'Empire, de 1809 à 1848), la ville et le pays commencent à s'industrialiser.

Révolutions européennes de 1848

En 1848, Vienne est le théâtre de sévères combats de rues, jusqu'à l'entrée des troupes d'Alfred Windischgrätz (1787-1862). Après les journées de 1848, on décide de raser l'enceinte fortifiée. Les terrains ainsi dégagés permettent de tracer un boulevard circulaire (l'actuel « Ring ») que bordent de pompeux édifices et monuments officiels ou privés. Sous le règne de l'Empereur François-Joseph (1848-1916), la ville se modernise : intégration administrative des faubourgs proches (c'est-à-dire des actuels arrondissements 2 à 9), canalisation du Danube, adduction d'eau potable depuis le massif alpin. Une brillante Exposition universelle est organisée en 1873.

L'industrialisation accélérée provoque une augmentation rapide de la population ouvrière, surtout dans les faubourgs : en 1891, les actuels arrondissements 11 à 19 sont, à leur tour, inclus dans la cité (le 10^e arrondissement ayant été incorporé en 1874). Le même développement de l'industrialisation, l'appauvrissement de l'ancien artisanat et la constitution d'un prolétariat, en partie tchèque, entraînent l'apparition de nouveaux Partis politiques : le Parti Social-Démocrate et le Parti Chrétien-Social (de tendance xénophobe et antisémite). Le chef de ce dernier Parti, Karl Lueger (1844-1910), l'emporte lors des élections de 1895. Confirmé dans ses fonctions de bourgmestre par l'Empereur, en 1897, Lueger se révèle un administrateur efficace. En 1904, de nouveaux quartiers, les 20^e et 21^e arrondissements, qui se sont développés sur l'autre rive du Danube, sont à leur tour rattachés à la ville, dont la population dépasse alors les 2 millions d'habitants.

Une capitale culturelle

Capitale, jusqu'au début de ce siècle, d'un des grands États européens, Vienne devient très tôt un centre culturel important. La cour des Babenberg attire les grands Minnesänger, dont Reinmar et Walther von der Vogelweide. De nombreux monuments dans la ville ou dans le proche voisinage (abbaye de Klosterneuburg, où l'on conserve les panneaux d'autel, datant de 1181, de Nicolas de Verdun ; abbaye de Heiligenkreuz, fondée en 1135) témoignent de ce 1er apogée. Au service successivement des Empereurs Frédéric III et Maximilien Ier, l'humaniste Konrad Celtis (1459-1508) organise à Vienne une sodalité savante (« Sodalitas Danubiana ») . Après la victoire sur les Turcs, Vienne se couvre d'édifices luxueux.

La réforme jésuite de l'État entraîne la constitution d'un fonctionariat bourgeois, éclairé et Libéral : cette classe sociale devient le support de la culture autrichienne. Sous Marie-Thérèse, l'Université est soustraite à l'autorité des Jésuites ; la faculté de médecine est réorganisée sur le modèle de celle de Leyde et devient rapidement l'une des plus célèbres d'Europe. En 1776 est fondé le « Burgtheater », à la fois théâtre de Cour (du « château ») et théâtre « national » allemand. Dans les faubourgs prospèrent des théâtres populaires réputés. La musique, que les grandes maisons nobles continuent à favoriser, atteint un public de plus en plus vaste et connaît un essor remarquable. Il en est de même de la littérature et de l'art, en particulier dans la bourgeoisie juive.

À la fin du XIXe siècle, Vienne devient le carrefour de la modernité : la Sécession architecturale est fondée en 1897, Arnold Schönberg, Alban Berg et Anton von Webern constituent la « trinité viennoise » et Sigmund Freud invente la psychanalyse.

Vienne après 1918

L'effondrement de l'Empire austro-hongrois, en 1918, entraîne une crise majeure : la capitale d'un des grands États européens doit s'adapter à son nouveau rôle de métropole d'une petite république comptant un peu plus de 6 millions d'habitants. La municipalité socialiste (1919-1934) fait construire de vastes complexes d'habitations à bon marché et procède à une réforme scolaire et hospitalière.

Le conflit, d'abord latent, entre les Partis de gauche, avec leurs formations para-militaires, et le gouvernement fédéral, qui s'appuie sur la province, paysanne et conservatrice, éclate une 1re fois, en 1927 (démonstrations de rue, incendie du Palais de Justice, le 15 juillet) , puis en 1934 (combats de février, au cours desquels est bombardé le « Karl-Marx-Hof ») . Un nouveau réseau routier réalisé à cette époque assure un accès facile du « Wienerwald » . Après l' « Anschluß » de 1938, de nouveaux faubourgs et quelques communes adjacentes sont à leur tour rattachés administrativement à la cité.

Les bombardements alliés et les combats qui précèdent la prise de la ville par les troupes russes, en avril 1945, entraînent la ruine d'à peu près 13 % des maisons d'habitation et 25 % des installations industrielles. De 1945 à 1955, Vienne, enclavée dans la zone d'occupation soviétique, est placée sous contrôle inter-allié.

En 1954, une partie des territoires englobés après 1938 sont de nouveau rattachés au « Land » de Basse-Autriche, la ville comptant désormais 23 arrondissements. Les ruines réparées, dont celles de la cathédrale, de l'Opéra, du « Burgtheater », on met en œuvre un vaste programme de constructions : nouveaux ensembles d'habitations « municipaux », notamment sur l' « autre » rive du Danube, nouvelles voies de communication.

Vienne, ville d'art

Introduction

L'aspect que présente Vienne au visiteur hâtif est celui d'une grande ville avenante, sur laquelle un XIX^e siècle quelque peu pompeux (celui de l'Empereur François-Joseph) a imprimé sa marque en aménageant, à partir de 1857, sa ceinture verdoyante de boulevards, le « Ring », appuyé par ses 2 extrémités au canal du Danube et bordé par des monuments plus recommandables par leur majesté que par leur style, qui assurent les fonctions essentielles d'une capitale : Opéra (si important dans la ville de la musique) , musée d'Histoire de l'art, musée d'Histoire naturelle, Parlement (auquel l'architecte Theophil von Hansen a su donner de la grandeur) , Hôtel-de-ville, « Burgtheater » , Université, voire église Votive (« Votivkirche ») .

Le musée d'Histoire de l'art (« Kunsthistorisches Museum ») , construit selon des normes généreuses, de 1872 à 1881, a reçu les anciennes collections Impériales. À l'entresol, un des plus riches ensembles de tapisseries du monde, les camées, l'illustre trésor de métaux précieux provenant des fouilles de Hongrie ainsi que la remarquable série des portraits funéraires égyptiens du Fayoum. Au 1^{er} étage, la richesse de la Galerie de peinture a permis de consacrer des salles entières à tel artiste ou à telle école (Rubens, les Vénitiens) . L'école espagnole abonde en portraits princiers de la famille Impériale. Entre les œuvres les plus réputées de ce musée brillent celles de Dürer, dont l'Empereur Rodolphe II était un amateur passionné, et celles de Bruegel l'Ancien, dont il n'existe nulle part ailleurs un ensemble pareil.

Vienne médiévale

Alors que la cathédrale (« Stephansdom ») , située au cœur de la ville ancienne, n'a gardé que peu de souvenirs de son passé Roman (édifices des XII^e et XIII^e siècles) , c'est en 1340 que fut consacré son chœur Gothique, suivi de la tour sud, magnifique clocher de 137 mètres, et de la nef. Dans le fond du chœur s'élève le tombeau monumental de l'Empereur Frédéric III et de sa femme, entrepris en 1467 par le sculpteur Nikolaus Gerhaert de Leyde (vers 1430-1473) . Au début du XVI^e siècle s'illustre Anton Pilgram (vers 1460 - vers 1515) , qui s'est représenté 2 fois sur ses œuvres avec une verve toute populaire : à la chaire et à la base de l'orgue.

Tout aussi aimée des Viennois, l'église « Maria am Gestade » (XIV^e siècle - début du XV^e siècle) , dont le chœur conserve une riche vitrerie Gothique, est située plus au nord, dans un quartier qui a gardé son aspect ancien et familial.

Vienne Baroque

Sans doute est-ce en qualité de métropole du Baroque que Vienne a conquis sa célébrité, presque exclusivement à partir de la mémorable victoire du Kahlenberg, en 1683.

2 très grands architectes surtout ont été les artisans de la mutation Baroque : Johann Bernhard Fischer von Erlach

(1656-1723) , aidé de son fils Joseph Emanuel (1693-1742) , et Johann Lukas von Hildebrandt (1668-1745) , ingénieur militaire de naissance italienne. L'un et l'autre travaillent aux édifices religieux et profanes de la 1re moitié du XVIIIe siècle à Vienne. On les trouve tous 2 au Palais Impérial, à la « Hofburg » , où Fischer le fils construit le chef-d'œuvre qu'est la Bibliothèque nationale, dont les beaux volumes architecturaux surmontés d'un dôme sont décorés par les trompe-l'œil du peintre Daniel Gran (1694-1757) . C'est encore Fischer, le fils, qui est l'auteur du manège où des écuyers impeccables présentent toujours la célèbre parade de leurs chevaux de race espagnole. Dans l'église toute voisine des Augustins, Antonio Casanova a sculpté l'un de ses plus beaux tombeaux, celui de l'archiduchesse Marie-Christine, femme de l'archiduc Albert de Saxe-Teschen (1738-1822) , le fondateur de l' « Albertina » - la plus belle au monde, peut-être, des collections de dessins, d'aquarelles et de gravures (célèbre, notamment, pour ses Dürer, ses Rubens, ses Rembrandt) .

Dans la vieille ville, dès le XVIIe siècle, la vénérable église des Neuf-Chœurs-des-Anges (« Am Hof ») Gothique d'origine, avait reçu une façade Baroque. Non loin de la cathédrale, c'est probablement à Hildebrandt qu'est attribuable la reconstruction de la « Peterskirche » , de forme ovale et dont le grand axe est perpendiculaire à la longue place du « Graben » , ponctuée par la colonne tarabiscotée de la Sainte-Trinité.

Au sud du « Ring » se trouvent les monuments majeurs de l'architecture Baroque de Vienne, et d'abord la « Karlskirche » (église Saint-Charles-Borromée) , que le grand Fischer von Erlach éleva avec sa colonnade antique précédant une coupole et accostée de 2 ailes qui sont comme creusées pour recevoir 2 colonnes du type de la colonne Trajane. Une autre église, des plus originales, est la « Piaristenkirche » , qui a reçu une très belle décoration à fresque du peintre Franz Anton Maulbertsch (1724-1796) .

Beaucoup de palais de la noblesse viennoise sont ornés d'atlantes grandioses adossés aux colonnes des escaliers, supportant à grand effort des balcons, encadrant des portails. Le plus exemplaire de ces palais est probablement le Belvédère, construit par Hildebrandt pour le prince Eugène de Savoie sur 2 niveaux comprenant chacun un édifice. Le Belvédère supérieur est séparé du Belvédère inférieur par un long parterre aux eaux jaillissantes. Les atlantes du 1er sont parmi les plus tumultueux de Vienne. Le second a été transformé en musée d'Art Baroque autrichien sous la tutelle d'un groupe sculpté aux singulières torsions, l' « Apo théose du Prince Eugène » (1721) , par Balthasar Permoser (1651-1732) ; la génération suivante des sculpteurs, d'une pureté presque Classique, est représentée par Georg Raphael Donner (1693-1741) , dont les statues des affluents du Danube (remplacées par des copies à la belle fontaine du « Neuer Markt ») ont été transportées ici, faisant contraste avec les bustes grimaçants par lesquels l'étrange Franz Xaver Messerschmidt (1736-1783) a prétendu représenter les divers caractères humains. Institution unique que ce musée du Baroque, où ne manque point non plus la peinture avec l'étrincelant décorateur Maulbertsch.

Les palais à atlantes sont nombreux : palais Trautson, de la Chancellerie de Bohême, palais d'hiver du Prince Eugène, palais Daun-Kinsky, Liechtenstein. Le palais Schwarzenberg est célèbre par ses jardins. Mais le plus vaste et le plus connu de ces ensembles civils est le château Impérial de Schönbrunn, construit sur les plans de Johann Bernhard Fischer von Erlach, de 1695 à 1713, à l'emplacement d'un pavillon de chasse, et remanié ensuite par Nikolaus Pacassi (1716 - après 1796) .

Vienne, ville de musées

Outre les appartements et collections de la « Hofburg » (trésor Impérial, musée d'Éphèse, armes et armures, instruments de musique, etc.) et de Schönbrunn, l'« Albertina » et le « Kunsthistorisches Museum », la capitale possède de nombreux autres musées importants. La galerie de l'Académie des Beaux-arts conserve un millier de tableaux des écoles européennes. Le musée d'Art Baroque autrichien, le musée d'Art médiéval autrichien et la galerie d'art autrichien du XIXe et du XXe siècles sont abrités dans l'ensemble du Belvédère. Le musée archiépiscopal d'art sacré renferme, notamment, une partie du trésor de la cathédrale Saint-Étienne. Le musée des Arts appliqués, fondé dès 1864, possède des tapis d'Orient, des tapisseries, des meubles, des porcelaines, de la verrerie, etc. Le Musée historique de la ville illustre l'histoire et les arts à Vienne des origines à nos jours. Un musée d'Art moderne a été créé en 1979, dans l'ancien palais Liechtenstein. Depuis 1999, un musée d'Art contemporain abrite la collection Karlheinz et Agnes Essl à Klosterneuburg, dans la banlieue de Vienne. L'important musée des Techniques jouxte le parc de Schönbrunn. Les maisons de Franz Schubert et de Sigmund Freud, enfin, constituent des musées consacrés à ces illustres Viennois. Inauguré en 2001, le Quartier des musées (« MuseumsQuartier ») constitue le plus grand centre culturel européen consacré à l'art moderne et à l'art contemporain ; il réunit notamment le « Leopold Museum » (collection de Ludwig Leopold ; peintures d'Egon Schiele, de Gustav Klimt, d'Oskar Kokoschka, de Richard Gertsl, d'Albin Egger-Lienz, etc.) , et le « Mumok » (musée d'art moderne de la Fondation Ludwig) , qui rassemble les collections, jusque-là conservées au Musée du XXe siècle ainsi qu'au palais Liechtenstein.

L'école architecturale de Vienne

Capitale internationale d'un Empire cosmopolite, Vienne est, à l'extrême fin du XIXe siècle, l'un des carrefours de la pensée européenne : le conflit permanent qui existe entre le pouvoir dictatorial de l'administration Impériale et le réveil des nationalités dans l'Europe centrale crée cette fermentation favorable à l'éclosion d'une pensée nouvelle qu'on ne trouve nulle part ailleurs sur le continent, sinon en Russie. L'explosion démographique de ce centre industriel en plein essor n'est pas moins considérable, puisque la ville passe de 632,000 habitants en 1869 à plus de 2 millions en 1910 : la fièvre des affaires surchauffe des esprits en pleine révolution.

L'explosion urbaine de Vienne est marquée dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle par la démolition des fortifications et l'aménagement du « Ring », qui prend leur place. La forte personnalité de l'architecte Theophil von Hansen (1813-1891) et celle de l'Allemand Gottfried Semper expriment, dans cette période, les opinions vigoureusement contradictoires des tenants de l'académisme et du rationalisme - face à l'éclectisme florissant de Karl von Hasenauer (1833-1894) , de Heinrich von Ferstel (1828-1883) , d'August Siccard von Siccardsburg (1813-1868) et d'Eduard Van der Nüll (1812-1868) , les 2 derniers auteurs de l'Opéra de Vienne, dont le mauvais accueil par le public et par la presse provoqua le double suicide.

Élève de Hansen, puis de Siccardsburg et de Van der Nüll, Otto Wagner (1841-1918) , fondateur de cette école architecturale de Vienne, en reste la plus forte personnalité par sa foudroyante progression. La Ire moitié de sa carrière est celle d'un architecte académique qui verse dans l'éclectisme. En 1893, Wagner dessine un plan général d'aménagement de la ville de Vienne, qui comprend la création du chemin de fer urbain et la régulation des cours du Danube et de la Vienne - travaux considérables qui seront aussitôt entrepris sous sa direction. En 1894, il succède à Hasenauer comme professeur à l'Académie des Beaux-arts : sa leçon inaugurale pose les fondements d'une pensée fonctionnaliste inspirée par Semper. Ces théories architecturales et urbanistiques aboutiront à la publication de « Moderne Architektur » (1895) , puis de « Die Grossstadt » (1911) . Chef de file des modernistes, Wagner évolue alors de façon spectaculaire : la « Majolika Haus » (1898-1899) , couverte d'un magnifique décor de faïence polychrome, est l'un des monuments de l'Art nouveau européen. Mais Wagner saura dépasser cette expérience : la caisse d'épargne (1904-1906) , puis l'église « Am Steinhof » (1904-1907) acquièrent dans leur monumentalisme une retenue toute moderne, dont les dernières œuvres du Maître (projet de l'hôtel « Wien » , 1910 ; seconde villa Wagner, 1912-1913) exaspèrent l'élégance.

Autour de Wagner, c'est le mouvement de la « Sécession » viennoise qui est d'abord florissant : Josef Maria Olbrich (1867-1908) et Joseph Hoffmann (1870-1956) , les 2 assistants de Wagner, fondent le mouvement en 1897 avec d'autres artistes, notamment le peintre Gustav Klimt (1862-1918) et le graphiste Koloman Moser (1868-1918) . La Sécession publie jusqu'en 1904 une revue littéraire et artistique, « Ver Sacrum » , et organise de multiples expositions dans le bâtiment qu'Olbrich lui a construit, en 1898. Se réclamant dès l'origine de Charles Rennie Mackintosh et de l'Art nouveau bruxellois, c'est autour de ces expositions que le mouvement définit l'originalité du « Jugendstil » viennois, qui cède moins au symbolisme et à l'exaspération lyrique de la courbe qu'à une forme de modernisme, orienté comme il est vers une géométrie hiératique et précieuse, riche en matériaux raffinés et en élégance de couleurs.

Josef Maria Olbrich, co-fondateur en 1899 de la « colonie » artistique de la « Mathildenhöhe » à Darmstadt, y laissera l'essentiel de son œuvre, trop tôt interrompue. Quant à Josef Hoffmann, il sera surtout l'auteur de l'admirable palais Stoclet de Bruxelles (1905-1911) ; mais, dès 1903, il avait fondé avec Koloman Moser les « Wiener Werkstätte » , ateliers d'artisanat d'art qui fonctionneront jusqu'en 1933. À partir de 1905, Hoffmann est à la tête du mouvement dissident de la Sécession (fondation du « Kunstschau » avec Gustav Klimt) , qui accuse celle-ci de rester d'esprit trop ornemental et de ne pas acquérir le dépouillement indispensable à un art moderne. Après la Première Guerre mondiale, il sera l'architecte en chef de la ville de Vienne : il construira, en 1924-1925, des ensembles d'habitat populaire et, en 1932, une partie du quartier pour l'Exposition du « Werkbund » , tardive manifestation d'esthétique puriste chez l'un des grands précurseurs de l'art moderne.

La personnalité la plus en marge de l'école de Vienne est Adolf Loos (1870-1933) , ennemi juré de l'ornement. Après un séjour aux États-Unis, de 1893 à 1896 (il y fait la découverte de la pensée et des œuvres de Louis Henri Sullivan) , il rentre à Vienne et, pendant 3 ans, dans une série d'articles pour la « Neue Freie Presse » (rassemblés en 1921 sous le titre d' « Ins Leere gesprochen » , « prononcé dans le vide ») , lance des attaques acerbes contre la Sécession. Son activité de théoricien se complétera par la publication, en 1908, d' « Ornament und Verbrechen » (« Ornement et crime ») et par la création d'une école libre d'architecture. Son œuvre, qui a été d'abord celle d'un décorateur au purisme élégant (« Kärtner Bar » , Vienne, 1907) , devient peu à peu celle d'un architecte : villa Karma à Montreux, Suisse (1904-1906) ; maison Steiner, Vienne (1910) ; maison Tristan Tzara, Paris (1926-1927) ; etc. Dans toutes ces œuvres, le luxe des matières, la simplicité de leur traitement et l'élégance des proportions forcent l'admiration, mais il n'est pas sûr que le langage spatial puisse être considéré comme aussi riche et aussi novateur que celui de l'école moderne de l'époque : le radicalisme anti-ornemental de Loos se ressent quelquefois d'une certaine sécheresse d'intentions, qui n'existait pas dans les débordements généreux d'un Otto Wagner.

La musique à Vienne

Introduction

La situation géographique de Vienne, à mi-chemin entre les pays germaniques et l'Italie, devait faire de cette ville le lieu de rencontre idéal pour les musiciens venus de ces régions. De plus, l'activité musicale qui s'y manifesta très tôt, puis l'intérêt des Habsbourg et de la noblesse pour la musique attirèrent à Vienne, à chaque époque, nombre de compositeurs célèbres, qui s'y fixèrent.

Du Moyen-âge à la fin du XIXe siècle

Dès le Moyen-âge, parallèlement au chant religieux diffusé par la cathédrale Saint-Étienne et la chapelle Impériale, se développe l'art profane des « Minnesänger », dont le plus célèbre représentant au XIIIe siècle se nomme Walther von der Vogelweide. Des musiciens étrangers s'attachent à la Chapelle de la Cour, ré-organisée en 1495 par Maximilien Ier : le Flamand Heinrich Isaac (vers 1450-1517), compositeur de Maximilien Ier ; le Suisse Ludwig Senfl (vers 1490-1543) ; son élève et successeur l'Allemand Heinrich Finck (vers 1444-1527) ; des Autrichiens comme l'organiste Paul von Hofhaimer (1459-1537) ou Arnold von Bruck. En 1568, le Flamand Philippus de Monte, après un long séjour en Italie, devient Maître de chapelle de la Cour. Leurs œuvres font la synthèse d'éléments franco-flamands et italiens.

Au XVIIe siècle, l'influence personnelle des Empereurs Ferdinand III, Léopold Ier et Joseph Ier, compositeurs à leurs heures, amateurs d'art lyrique, permet le développement de celui-ci. Ils attirent des Italiens à la Cour : Pietro Francesco Cavalli y donne son « Egisto », en 1643 ; Antonio Cesti (1623-1669), au service de Léopold Ier, fait représenter ses œuvres (dont « Il Pomo d'oro », 1666 ou 1667) ; Antonio Bertali (1605-1669) transmet à Vienne, où il est musicien de la Cour, la tradition vénitienne d'un Claudio Monteverdi et d'un Cavalli ; Antonio Draghi (1635-1700) fournit des livrets d'Opéras à Léopold Ier et écrit Oratorios et Opéras destinés à la musique Impériale. L'Autrichien Johann Heinrich Schmelzer (vers 1623-1680) fonde avec Heinrich Biber (1644-1704) une école de violonistes, tandis que l'Allemand Johann Jacob Froberger un temps organiste de la Cour, apporte les techniques de Girolamo Frescobaldi son Maître, et celles des musiciens français, connues lors de son voyage à Paris, en 1652. À la même époque, Vienne devient un centre réputé pour l'enseignement musical : Johann Kaspar von Kerll (1627-1693), Allemand qui a pris à Rome des leçons de Giacomo Carissimi, professe l'orgue et la composition ; Johann Joseph Fux (1660-1741), Maître d'une renommée internationale, forme Georg Christoph Wagenseil (1715-1777), Georg Muffat (1653-1704), Ignaz Holzbauer (1711-1783). En 1725, il publie un traité de contrepoint célèbre jusqu'à nos jours, le « Gradus ad Parnassum ».

Le XVIIIe siècle consacre Vienne capitale européenne du Classicisme. Une école pré-Classique contribue au développement formel de la Symphonie, parallèlement aux écoles étrangères (Italie, Allemagne, France). Ses principaux représentants, Georg Matthias Monn (1717-1750), Georg Christoph Wagenseil, Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf (1739-1799), annoncent les Maîtres de la Symphonie Classique, tandis qu'Ignaz Umlauff (1746-1796) crée le « singspiel » avec « Die Bergknappen » (1778) . La même année, un nouveau théâtre ouvre, le « Schikanedertheater » , sur la scène duquel seront joués les Opéras mozartiens. Christoph Willibald Gluck entreprend sa réforme de l'Opéra italien à Vienne avec « Orfeo ed Euridice » (1762) et « Alceste » (1767) . Franz-Joseph Haydn y termine sa vie dans la gloire. La majorité des ouvrages dramatiques des dernières années de la vie de Mozart, installé à Vienne en 1781, seront créés dans cette ville (« l'Enlèvement au sérail » , 1782 ; « les Noces de Figaro » , 1786 ; « Così fan tutte » , 1790 ; « la Flûte enchantée » , 1791) . Ludwig van Beethoven se fixe également dans la capitale autrichienne, aidé financièrement par la haute société. C'est là que ses œuvres seront conçues, exécutées, publiées. Franz Schubert, né près de Vienne, vivra une existence difficile dans cette ville, sans y rencontrer beaucoup de compréhension pour ses œuvres. À la même époque, l'enseignement pianistique de Karl Czerny (1791-1857) conduit à Vienne de nombreux pianistes (Sigismund Thalberg, 1812-1871 ; Franz Liszt) .

En 1842, Otto Nicolai (1810-1849) , Maître de chapelle de la Cour, fonde l'Orchestre philharmonique, qui, avec l'Opéra, acquiert une renommée mondiale.

Ce climat, créé tant par la présence de compositeurs célèbres que par des institutions musicales de 1er ordre, continue d'attirer à Vienne l'élite du monde musical dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle. Richard Wagner donne « Tannhäuser » (1857) , « Lohengrin » (1858) , « le Vaisseau fantôme » (1860) et travaille aux « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » pendant son séjour viennois. Les 3 noms du post-Romantisme se retrouvent à Vienne, où ils s'établissent définitivement : Johannes Brahms dirige la « Singakademie » (1862) , puis la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (1872) ; Anton Bruckner mène une carrière de professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne (fondé en 1817) , où il enseigne l'harmonie, le contrepoint et la fugue, en 1868 ; Gustav Mahler dirige l'Opéra de la Cour (1897-1907) , où il se révèle comme un très grand chef. C'est également à Vienne que vit Hugo Wolf, le plus grand représentant du lied, à la fin du XIXe siècle.

Dans le domaine de la musique légère, Vienne connut un rayonnement tout aussi grand. Franz von Suppé (1819-1895) , Josef Lanner (1801-1843) , Karl Ziehrer (1843-1922) et, surtout, la dynastie des Strauß brillèrent dans la composition de valses et d'Opérettes.

L'école de Vienne

La Vienne du début du XXe siècle fut certainement, sur le plan des arts et de la pensée, l'une des métropoles les plus actives de notre civilisation. Les noms de Sigmund Freud, de Stefan George, de Hugo von Hofmannsthal, de Otto Wagner, de Peter Altenberg, de Oskar Kokoschka et, un peu plus tard, ceux de Robert von Musil et de Hermann Broch l'attestent. Mais cette Vienne si créatrice, en éveil aux frémissements encore imperceptibles d'une sensibilité nouvelle, était aussi celle d'une des sociétés les plus réactionnaires d'Europe ; et la société viennoise constituait un public et s'exprimait en une critique fort peu préparée à la hardiesse de conception des artistes qui vivaient en marge d'elle.

Aussi l'histoire de la « trinité viennoise » (Arnold Schœnberg - Alban Berg - Anton von Webern) est-elle, sur le plan social, celle de l'indignation que suscitérent les œuvres de ces artistes. La 1re audition des Lieder, Opus 1, 2 et 3 d'Arnold Schönberg, en 1898, choqua le public ; « et, dès lors, commentait plaisamment Schönberg, le scandale n'a jamais cessé ». Quelques semaines avant celui du « Sacre du printemps », un autre scandale, presque aussi célèbre, marqua la création des « Cartes postales », Opus 4 (mars 1913) d'Alban Berg. Rétrospectivement, nous nous demandons aujourd'hui comment il se fait que Schönberg, poussé par la nécessité, ait participé à des concours de composition sans en obtenir le prix, que, 5 ans avant l'« Anschluß », il ait dû s'expatrier (ce qui en dit long sur l'ambiance de sa ville natale), que Berg soit mort pauvre et Webern inconnu. La faute en incombe à une critique aussi aveugle que celle qui avait formulé, un siècle plus tôt, sur Beethoven et Schubert, d'étranges jugements.

À travers l'œuvre de ces 3 Maîtres, l'École de Vienne fut le berceau de la musique atonale et du dodécaphonisme sériel ; elle a également remis en honneur l'esprit d'analyse, que les préoccupations littéraires post-Romantiques avaient laissées se perdre. La polémique qui opposa Hans Pfitzner (1869-1949) à Berg en est un exemple. Le 1er, commentant la « Rêverie » de Robert Schumann, concluait qu'une telle page décourageait l'analyste et que celui-ci en était réduit à s'écrier : « Que c'est beau ! ». Dans sa réponse, restée fameuse, Berg démontre que le fait musical a une existence concrète et que la beauté dont il est porteur peut être éclairée par l'analyse. Cet esprit d'investigation et de réflexion est dû à la rigueur de l'enseignement de Schönberg, que l'aîné des Viennois prodigua dès le début du XXe siècle, et particulièrement, de 1917 à 1920, lorsque son séminaire de composition musicale réunissait de nombreux élèves, qu'il entourait d'une vigilance despotique.

À la même époque fut fondé le « Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen » (Association d'exécutions privées d'œuvres musicales), dont le règlement prévoyait qu'une même œuvre « serait entendue plusieurs fois » et que le programme des concerts, « afin d'assurer l'assiduité des auditeurs, ne serait pas annoncé ». Rédigé par Berg, en 1919, le manifeste de l'Association proclamait la nécessité de « soustraire les concerts à l'influence corruptrice de la musique officielle » et exigeait de la part du créateur « l'indifférence envers toute forme d'échec ou de succès ». Il a souvent été comparé au « Coq et l'Arlequin », qui lui est légèrement antérieur. Il n'en a pas la verve insolente ; mais une vision plus noble de l'art musical s'y exprime. On ne s'étonne pas que l'importance historique des œuvres que ce manifeste recouvre ait été capitale. Après une période d'effacement, qui a coïncidé avec les succès du Nazisme (les thuriféraires de l'ordre nouveau considéraient la musique non tonale comme une manifestation de dégénérescence culturelle due à l'influence juive), un très vif courant d'intérêt s'est manifesté dans tout l'Occident, immédiatement après la guerre, envers l'École de Vienne. En France, notamment, les écrits théoriques de René Leibowitz et de Pierre Boulez ont étudié l'apport des Maîtres viennois ; les œuvres de Pierre Boulez, de Jean Barraqué, de Michel Philippot ont prolongé leurs acquisitions.

AB 119 : Le Philharmonique de Vienne

Historique

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne (« Wiener Philharmoniker ») est considéré comme l'un des plus prestigieux au monde. Il est un symbole de la culture et de l'histoire viennoises. Le « son » de l'Orchestre est raffiné, soyeux et coloré avec une tendance à la prédominance des sonorités graves, une sonorité unique et facilement discernable.

Il est fondé en 1842 et, après des débuts difficiles, devient l'un des meilleurs orchestres de Vienne. Les chefs les plus illustres vont en perfectionner l'excellence. L'Orchestre a compté dans son effectif des membres prestigieux comme Hans Richter, Arthur Nikisch, Franz Schmidt, Willi Boskovsky. Ses membres sont recrutés exclusivement parmi ceux de l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne.

La résidence principale de l'Orchestre est le « Musikverein », une salle de concert rectangulaire magnifique, aux tons ivoires et dorés et à l'acoustique exceptionnelle. Il se produit chaque été au Festival de Salzbourg. Depuis 1941, l'Orchestre donne chaque 1er janvier un concert consacré à la musique de la famille Strauß : le célèbre « Concert du Nouvel An » .

L'origine de l'Orchestre remonte à 1842, lorsque Otto Nicolai forme ce qui s'appelait alors l'Académie philharmonique. C'était un Orchestre totalement indépendant qui prenait ses décisions à partir d'un vote démocratique de tous ses membres : ce sont ces mêmes principes qui régissent l'Orchestre encore aujourd'hui.

Quand Nicolai quitte Vienne en 1847, l'Orchestre est quasiment démantelé et peu actif jusqu'en 1860, quand Carl Eckert prend la direction. Il donne une série de 4 concerts d'abonnement et, depuis lors, l'Orchestre n'a cessé de jouer. Suivront Felix Otto Dessoff, de 1860 à 1875, et Wilhelm Jahn, en 1882 et 1883. Le Philharmonique de Vienne va alors attirer nombre de chefs célèbres et acclamés.

Le Philharmonique de Vienne n'a pas de chef permanent. Tous les ans, un artiste est choisi pour diriger tous les concerts de la saison au « Musikverein » de Vienne. Ces chefs sont nommés « Abonnementdirigenten » tout simplement parce que les concerts qu'ils doivent diriger sont inclus dans l'abonnement au « Musikverein » . Certains de ces engagements sont renouvelés pendant de nombreuses années, d'autres se terminent au bout de peu de temps.

De 1875 à 1898 (excepté lors de la saison 1882-1883 où il était en conflit avec le comité orchestral) , Hans Richter est chef principal.

Sous sa direction l'Orchestre va être reconnu, jouer les grands compositeurs contemporains, Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, Giuseppe Verdi, créer des œuvres importantes comme les Variations sur un thème de Haydn (1873) , les 2e et 3e Symphonies (1877-1883) et l'Ouverture tragique (1880) de Johannes Brahms, les 3e (1877) , 4e (1888) , 6e (1899) et 8e (1892) Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner.

Gustav Mahler occupe le poste de 1898 à 1901 et c'est avec lui que l'Orchestre joue pour la 1re fois à l'étranger lors de l'Exposition universelle de 1900, à Paris.

Les chefs suivants seront Josef Hellmesberger, de 1901 à 1903, Felix Weingartner, de 1908 à 1927, Wilhelm Fürtwängler, de 1927 à 1930, Clemens Krauß de, 1929 à 1933.

Avec l' « Anschluß » de 1938, les autorités allemandes voulurent supprimer définitivement l'Orchestre et évidemment exclure les instrumentistes juifs de l'orchestre : il faudra l'intervention de Wilhelm Fürtwängler pour sauver l'existence de l'Orchestre et pour que les demi-Juifs puissent continuer à jouer dans l'Orchestre.

Dans le même temps, le Philharmonique travaille avec d'autres chefs, au Festival de Salzbourg, pour des enregistrements ou des occasions particulières. Avec l'élargissement de ses activités, l'Orchestre décide d'abandonner ce système en 1933. Depuis, seuls des chefs invités sont engagés pour chaque concert, tant à Vienne que dans les autres lieux.

Depuis 1933, l'Orchestre n'a donc plus de chef permanent mais des chefs invités, parmi les plus grands et les plus réputés :

Bruno Walter, de 1933 à 1938.

Karl Böhm, de 1954 à 1956 et de 1971 à 1981.

Herbert von Karajan, de 1956 à 1964.

Claudio Abbado, de 1971 à 1982.

Lorin Maazel, de 1982 à 1987.

La liste des chefs invités est longue et prestigieuse : Richard Strauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, John Barbirolli, Josef Krips, Willi Boskovsky, Hermann Scherchen, Georg Solti, Erich Kleiber, James Levine, Leonard Bernstein, Pierre Boulez, Carlos Kleiber, Bernard Haitink, Zubin Mehta, Simon Rattle, Mariss Jansons, Valery Gergiev, Seiji Ozawa, Riccardo Muti, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Georges Prêtre, Charles Mackerras, Daniele Gatti, Christian Thielemann, Ingo Metzmacher, Philippe Jordan, Franz Welser-Möst, Daniel Barenboim, Markus Stenz, Daniel Harding, Paavo Järvi.

Parmi les chefs illustres qui l'ont dirigé à d'autres titres, se détachent Arturo Toscanini, de 1933 à 1937, et à nouveau Wilhelm Furtwängler, de 1933 à 1945, puis, après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, de 1947 à sa mort en 1954.

Les noms de 3 de ces chefs sont plus particulièrement associés à la période d'après-guerre : Herbert von Karajan et Karl Böhm, qui furent nommés chefs honoraires, et Leonard Bernstein, distingué en qualité de membre honoraire de l'Orchestre .

La personnalité de Wilhelm Furtwängler marqua aussi beaucoup l'Orchestre. Les musiciens se plaignirent toujours que Furtwängler donnait la priorité à l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et pas au leur. Néanmoins, Furtwängler enregistra certains de ses concerts les plus extraordinaires avec l'Orchestre de Vienne comme l' « Eroica » (la 3e Symphonie de Beethoven) , daté de décembre 1944, qualifié de « la plus grande interprétation de tous les temps de la plus grande Symphonie de tous les temps » dans le « Guide de la Musique Classique, Diapason » (éditions Robert Laffont) ; la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner de 1944 qui impressionna fortement le chef Arturo Toscanini ; les 2 légendaires concerts de janvier 1945 soit la Symphonie en ré mineur de César Franck et la 2e Symphonie de Johannes Brahms juste avant que Furtwängler ne s'enfuit en Suisse, les Nazis voulant l'arrêter pour le tuer. Après la guerre, il dirigea souvent l'Orchestre à Vienne ; entre autres, le 5e des Concertos Brandebourgeois de Jean-Sébastien Bach, en 1950, dans le cadre des célébrations pour le 200e anniversaire de la mort du compositeur. Il dirigea aussi l'Orchestre au Festival de Salzbourg : en 1950, l'Opéra « Fidelio » de Beethoven avec, entre autres, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf et Kirsten Flagstad ; en 1951, l' « Otello » de Giuseppe Verdi qui fut considéré comme le principal événement du Festival cette année-là ; et, en 1953 et 1954, des « Don Giovanni » de Mozart légendaires (dont une version filmée) avec, entre autres, les solistes Cesare Siepi, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Anton Dermota, Otto Edelmann et Elisabeth Grümmer.

Ses membres sont recrutés exclusivement parmi ceux de l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne, ce qui permet non seulement d'assurer la qualité artistique de l'ensemble, mais aussi de garantir l'équilibre financier de la formation (puisque c'est l'Opéra qui prend, par exemple, en charge les retraites) et d'augmenter les revenus des musiciens concernés, qui se partagent les recettes des concerts et des enregistrements.

Le processus d'intégration est très long : les musiciens doivent d'abord prouver leurs capacités en jouant pour l'Opéra et le Ballet durant un minimum de 3 ans. Ce n'est qu'ensuite qu'ils peuvent présenter leur candidature auprès du Conseil d'administration du « Wiener Philharmoniker » .

L'Orchestre a un fonctionnement autogéré qui n'exclut cependant pas une tendance au conservatisme (il n'a accepté des femmes dans ses rangs qu'en 1997) et une tendance à rechigner à s'ouvrir aux instrumentistes étrangers, particulièrement les non-continentaux.

Auprès des chefs d'orchestre, il est réputé pour son caractère rétif mais aussi son excellence technique et artistique.

Le son caractéristique de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne peut être attribué d'une part à l'utilisation d'instruments et d'un style de jeu fondamentalement différents de ceux des autres grands orchestres.

La clarinette a un système de doigté spécial.

Le basson a une anche et un doigté spécial.

La trompette a un système de valves rotatives et une dimension moindre.

Le trombone et le tuba ont un doigté et un système de valves différents.

Les timbales utilisent des peaux de chèvre naturelles au lieu de peaux synthétiques.

Les contrebasses retrouvent le placement traditionnel en ligne derrière les cuivres.

Le hautbois viennois a une perce, une taille, une anche et un système de doigté spéciaux. Il est très différent du « hautbois français » utilisé généralement.

Le cor viennois est une variante du cor naturel avec plusieurs « tons » (tubes de différentes longueurs) reliés afin de pouvoir jouer l'échelle chromatique. De perce plus fine mais plus longue, il est doté d'un système à palettes qui a l'avantage de produire des attaques plus souples et des notes liées plus coulées. En outre, le cor viennois est fabriqué dans un alliage plus résistant que le cor d'harmonie traditionnel (double cor en fa / si bémol) .

Ces instruments et leur couleur sonore caractéristique ont fait l'objet d'une vaste étude scientifique menée par le Professeur Gregor Widholm de l'Institut pour la culture du son viennois à l'Académie de musique et des arts de la scène.

Bien que l'Orchestre soit largement reconnu comme l'un des meilleurs au monde, depuis les années 1990, il fait l'objet de critiques de la part de groupes féministes parce que, jusqu'en 1997, il n'admettait pas de femmes dans ses rangs en qualité de membre à part entière. Seules quelques femmes avaient pu jouer en supplémentaires.

En 1997, une Ire femme, Anna Lelkes, harpiste, devient membre après avoir joué avec l'Orchestre hors statut pendant quelque 20 ans. Après le départ à la retraite de mademoiselle Lelke, une autre harpiste Charlotte Balzereit devient à son tour la seule femme membre de l'Orchestre.

Aucune femme n'avait, non plus, jamais dirigé l'Orchestre. En janvier 2005, la chef d'orchestre australienne Simone Young devient la Ire femme de l'histoire à diriger le Philharmonique de Vienne.

Par ailleurs, historiquement, l'Orchestre n'acceptait pas non plus de membres d'ethnies visiblement différentes. Un violoniste demi-asiatique n'en devient membre qu'en 2001. Des responsables de l'Orchestre font l'objet de critiques pour avoir soutenu que le maintien de son uniformité ethnique, blanche, européenne, était nécessaire pour préserver la haute qualité d'exécution.

En 1970, Otto Straßer, ancien président de la Philharmonie de Vienne, écrit dans ses mémoires :

« Je tiens pour incorrect qu'aujourd'hui les candidats jouent derrière paravent, un arrangement apporté après la Seconde Guerre mondiale pour assurer des jugements objectifs. J'ai continuellement combattu cette mesure, en particulier à partir de ma nomination à la fonction de président du Philharmonique, parce que je suis convaincu que l'artiste fait aussi partie de la personne, que l'on doit non seulement entendre mais également voir, afin de juger sa personnalité entière. Une situation grotesque que même mon départ n'a pas été en mesure de faire changer. Après qu'un candidat se fut qualifié comme étant le meilleur, lorsque le paravent fut retiré, se tenait là un Japonais, devant le jury médusé. Il ne fut par conséquent pas engagé, sa physionomie n'étant pas adaptée à la Pizzicato Polka du Concert du Nouvel An. »

La Ire flûte du Philharmonique de Vienne déclarait lors d'une interview pour une station de radio en 1996 :

« Depuis le début, nous avons parlé des qualités viennoises particulières, de la manière dont la musique se fait ici. La façon dont nous faisons de la musique ici n'est pas liée seulement à une capacité technique, mais aussi avec quelque chose qui a beaucoup à voir avec l'âme. L'âme ne se sépare pas des racines culturelles que nous avons ici en Europe centrale. Elle n'admet pas non plus d'être séparée du genre. Ainsi, si l'on pense que le monde devrait fonctionner avec des quotas, il est naturel d'être irrité par le fait que nous soyons un groupe de musiciens mâles blancs, qui joue exclusivement de la musique de compositeurs mâles blancs. C'est une irritation d'ordre raciste et sexiste. Je crois que cela peut se poser ainsi. Si l'on établit un égalitarisme superficiel, on perdra quelque chose d'essentiel. Toutefois, je suis convaincu que cela vaut la peine d'accepter cette irritation raciste et sexiste, parce que quelque chose produit par une compréhension superficielle des droits de l'homme ne pourrait avoir les mêmes standards. »

En 2003, un membre de l'Orchestre déclarait dans une interview pour un magazine :

« 3 femmes c'est déjà trop. Lorsque nous en aurons 20 % , l'Orchestre sera ruiné. Nous avons fait une grosse erreur, et nous le regretterons amèrement. »

En 2007, l'Orchestre compte dans ses rangs 4 femmes, soit 2 % de l'effectif : une harpiste, une violoniste, une altiste et une violoncelliste. Un conflit subsiste concernant la non titularisation d'une violoniste.

Helene Kenyeri et Konstanze Brosch, qui avaient intégré le pupitre de hautbois de l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne en janvier 2007, avaient de fortes chances d'être admises rapidement aux 2 postes vacants ou en passe de l'être de Walter Lehmayr et Günter Lorenz au Philharmonique dans la mesure où la classe de hautbois du Conservatoire ne comptait que 3 garçons pour 17 filles et que le hautbois viennois n'est enseigné nulle part ailleurs. Tel ne fut pas le cas pour Helene Kenyeri qui fut licenciée en mars 2008.

...

The Vienna Philharmonic (VPO) (« Wiener Philharmoniker ») , founded in 1842, is an orchestra, regularly considered one of the finest in the world.

The Vienna Philharmonic is based in the « Musikverein » , in Vienna. The members of the Orchestra are chosen from the Orchestra of the Vienna State Opera. This process is a long one, with each musician having to prove his or her capability for a minimum of 3 years' playing for the Opera and ballet. Once this is achieved, the musician can then ask the board of the Vienna Philharmonic to consider an application for a position in the Orchestra.

Until the 1830's, orchestral performance in Vienna was done by « ad hoc » Orchestras, consisting of professional and (often) amateur musicians brought together for specific performances. In 1833, Franz Lachner formed the forerunner of the Vienna Philharmonic, the « Künstlerverein » - an Orchestra of professional musicians from the Vienna Court Opera (« Wiener Hofoper » , now, the Vienna State Opera) ; it gave 4 concerts, each including a Beethoven Symphony. The Vienna Philharmonic, itself, arose 9 years later, in 1842, hatched by « a group who met regularly at the inn “ Zum Amor ” including the poet Nikolaus Lenau ; newspaper editor August Schmidt ; critic Alfred Becker ; violinist Karl Holz ; Count Laurencin ; and Otto Nicolai » (the composer, also the principal conductor of a standing Orchestra at a Viennese theatre) . Mosco Carner wrote in « The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » that « Nicolai was the least enthusiastic about the idea, and had to be persuaded by the others ; he conducted the 1st concert, on 28 March 1842 » . The Orchestra was fully independent, consisted of members of the « Hofoper » Orchestra, and made all of its decisions by a democratic vote of its members ; it had its day-to-day management handled by a democratically elected body, the administrative committee. The Orchestra still follows these principles, today.

Nicolai and the Orchestra gave only 11 concerts in the ensuing 5 years, and when Nicolai left Vienna in 1847, the Orchestra nearly folded (« New Grove » notes the disruption caused by the Revolution of 1848 as a hindrance) .

Between 1854 and 1857, Karl Eckert, the 1st permanent conductor of the Vienna Court Opera (« Wiener Hofoper », now, the Vienna State Opera), led the associated Vienna Philharmonic in a few concerts. In 1857, Eckert was made Director of the « Hofoper » (the 1st musician to have been given the post); in 1860, he conducted 4 subscription concerts of the Vienna Philharmonic. Since that time, writes Vienna Philharmonic violinist and president Clemens Hellsberg, « the “ Philharmonic Concerts ” have been staged without interruption » .

In 1860, the Orchestra elected Otto Dessoff to be permanent conductor. According to Max Kalbeck, the Vienna-based music-critic, newspaper-editor, and biographer, the fame and excellence of the Vienna Philharmonic resulted from Dessoff's « energy and sense of purpose ». Clemens Hellsberg gives specifics, writing that during the Dessoff years, the Vienna Philharmonic's « repertoire was consistently enlarged, important organizational principles (music archives, rules of procedure) were introduced and the Orchestra moved to its 3rd new home (in 1870), the newly built “ Goldener Saal ” in the “ Musikvereinhaus ” in Vienna (in which it still performs), which has proved to be the ideal venue, with its acoustical characteristics influencing the Orchestra's style and sound ». After 15 years, in 1875, Dessoff was « pushed-out of his position in Vienna through intrigue », and he left Vienna to become conductor (« Hofkapellmeister ») of the « Badische Staatskapelle » in Karlsruhe, Germany. In Karlsruhe, the next year, he fulfilled the request of his friend Johannes Brahms to conduct the 1st performance of his 1st Symphony; in 1873, Brahms had conducted the premiere of his « Variations on a Theme by Haydn » with Dessoff's Vienna Philharmonic.

In 1875, the Orchestra chose Hans Richter to take Dessoff's place as subscription conductor. He remained until 1898, except for the season 1882-1883 when he was in dispute with the orchestral committee (during this hiatus, Wilhelm Jahn of the Vienna Court Opera served as subscription conductor). Richter led the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in the world-premieres of Brahms's 2nd Symphony, in 1877; « Tragic » Overture, in 1880; and 3rd Symphony, in 1883; the Violin Concerto of Tchaïkovsky, in 1881; and the 8th Symphony of Anton Bruckner, in 1892. It was Richter who, in 1881, appointed Arnold Rosé as Concert Master, who was to become Gustav Mahler's brother-in-law and was Concert Master until the « Anschluß », in 1938. In order to be eligible for a pension, Richter intended to remain in his position for 25 years (until 1900), and might have done so, given that the Orchestra unanimously re-elected him in May 1898. But he resigned on September 22, citing health reasons, although biographer Christopher Fifield argues that the real reasons were that he wanted to tour, and that « he was uneasy as claque in the audience formed in favour of Gustav Mahler » (who was triumphing as director of the « Hofoper »). Richter recommended Mahler or Ferdinand Löwe to the Orchestra as his replacement.

In 1898, on September 24, the Orchestra elected Gustav Mahler. (On 30 May 1899, pro-Mahler and pro-Richter factions had a « heated committee meeting »; matters were finally resolved in August when Richter wrote to his supporters « gently refusing their offer ».) Under Mahler's baton, the Vienna Philharmonic played abroad for the 1st time at the 1900 Paris World Exposition. While Mahler had strong supporters in the Orchestra, he faced dissension from other orchestral members (an unreconstructed pro-Richter faction plus an anti-Semitic one, according to Jens Malte Fischer), criticism of his re-touchings of Beethoven, and arguments with the Orchestra and over new policies he imposed; ultimately, « his working relationship with the Vienna Philharmonic continued to be fueled by resentment and broke down completely in November 1900 ». He resigned on 1 April 1901, like Richter, citing health concerns as a pretext, but continuing to conduct actively elsewhere (he remained director of the associated « Hofoper », until 1907).

In 1901, Joseph Hellmesberger, Junior briefly took his place ; he remained only until 1903.

In 1908, after an interval with no official subscription conductor, the Orchestra elected Felix Weingartner to the post ; he was to remain in it until 1927, and conducted at least 432 concerts with them in total, including the Vienna Orchestra's 1st tour of South America, in 1922. Weingartner's interpretive stance was opposite to Mahler's (Mahler employed marked tempo fluctuations in Beethoven, whereas Weingartner decried « tempo rubato conductors ») ; but, like Mahler, he considered himself primarily a composer and, between 1910 and 1923, led the Orchestra in, at least, 1 piece of his own music per season. He was most renowned for his Beethoven : he programmed, at least, 2 Symphonies per season, and complete cycles in 1916-1917 and 1926-1927. It was Weingartner who led the Orchestra's 1st concert devoted to entirely to the music of Johann Strauß, Junior (for the composer's Centennial) , on October 25, 1925.

In 1927, when Weingartner resigned, the Orchestra elected Wilhelm Furtwängler. He resigned at the end of the 1929-1930 season because of increased professional demands in Berlin.

In 1930, the Orchestra chose Clemens Krauß, for the position. At the Salzburg Festival, in the summers of 1929-1933, he led the Orchestra in an annual Strauß, waltz concert, the forerunners of the New Year's Day concerts he was later to institute. Krauß, left in 1933 to become director of the Berlin State Opera (after Erich Kleiber resigned that position to protest Nazi rule) .

Since 1933, the Orchestra has had no single subscription conductor but, according to « New Grove » (volume 19, page 723) , « between 1933 and 1938, Bruno Walter and Wilhelm Furtwängler shared the Philharmonic concerts between them and, during the Nazi period, Furtwängler was the permanent conductor » ; by contrast, the Vienna Philharmonic's website history says, « Furtwängler was in actuality the main conductor of the Orchestra, from 1933 to 1945, and, again, from 1947 to 1954 » . In support of « New Grove » 's assertion of Walter's role, it might be noted that he made Vienna his home, from 1933 until 1938 (after being driven from Germany by the 3rd « Reich ») , was Artistic Director of the Vienna State Opera, from 1936 until 1938, and conducted the Vienna Philharmonic frequently, making a number of major recordings with the Orchestra (including Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » Act I and parts of Act 2, the 1st recordings of Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » and of his 9th Symphony, and numerous Symphonic recordings) and taking the Orchestra on tour to England and France, in 1935. In support of the Vienna Philharmonic website, Otto Straßer (who played in the Orchestra, from 1922 until 1967, and was the VPO chairman who procured Furtwängler's War-time services) said, Furtwängler « influenced us so much that we became the true “ Furtwängler Orchestra ” » .

Among other conductors to work with the Orchestra in the mid- 1930's before the « Anschluß » were Arturo Toscanini, Felix Weingartner, Hans Knappertsbusch, Otto Klemperer, Adrian Boult, Victor de Sabata and George Szell. Bruno Walter conducted the last concert before the « Anschluß » , on February 20, 1938, featuring the world-premiere of Egon Wellesz's « Prosperos Beschwörungen » and Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony (« Romantic ») .

After the « Anschluß » and during World War II, the roster included Wilhelm Furtwängler, Clemens Krauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Willem Mengelberg, and Karl Böhm. The Orchestra's history, during this period, has been a topic of ongoing discussion and research, including a large amount commissioned by the Orchestra.

In 1946, when these conductors were undergoing denazification (successfully in the case of Furtwängler, unsuccessfully in the case of Mengelberg) , the Orchestra was led primarily by conductors untainted by Nazi association, including Josef Krips, Erich Leinsdorf, Volkmar Andreae, Paul Paray, and Charles Munch. An exception was Herbert von Karajan, who made his debut with the Orchestra with 2 concerts in January, but was unable to conduct a 3rd scheduled concert when occupying authorities required him to undergo denazification (his tribunal in Vienna was in February, 1947) . After clearance, he resumed conducting in late 1947 and developed a significant association with the Orchestra.

In 1947, Bruno Walter re-united with the Orchestra to conduct it when it appeared at the 1st Edinburgh Festival ; one work they performed was Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » .

In the post-War era, scores of the world's best-known conductors have led the Orchestra. Among them, were not only Walter, Furtwängler, Knappertsbusch, Krauß, Szell, Klemperer, and Krips, but also John Barbirolli, Carlo Maria Giulini, Erich Kleiber, James Levine, Zubin Mehta, Fritz Reiner, Georg Solti, Claudio Abbado, Riccardo Muti, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Lorin Maazel, Daniel Barenboim, and Franz Welser-Möst. The Orchestra made their first U.S. tour in 1956, under the batons of Carl Schuricht and André Cluytens. 3 conductors were given honorific titles by the Orchestra, in the later-20th century : Herbert von Karajan and Karl Böhm, who were made Honorary Conductors, and Leonard Bernstein, who was made an Honorary Member of the Orchestra. Pierre Boulez, who has conducted the Orchestra often, was made an Honorary Member in 2007. Another significant relationship was with the famously reclusive conductor Carlos Kleiber, who appeared with the Orchestra, 1st in 1974 and last in 1994, his longest association with any ensemble, even if it included only 30 appearances ; Clemens Hellsberg wrote of the « contrast between those dry numbers and the defining experience which each encounter with this brilliant interpreter represented » . Finally, István Kertész' Gramophone recordings with the Vienna Philharmonic, during the 1960's and the 1970's, represent a highlight in the Orchestra's history.

On May 7, 2000, the Orchestra performed Beethoven's 9th Symphony at the site of the concentration camp at Mauthausen, Austria, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of its liberation. Simon Rattle conducted, and soloists were Ruth Ziesak, Angelika Kirchschrager, Vinson Cole, and Thomas Quasthoff ; all artists and the Orchestra performed without fee and without applause at the end. The Symphony was preceded by recitation of the Kaddish, the prayer of mourning, by Paul Chaim Eisenberg, the Chief Rabbi of Austria, and the funeral prayer « El male rachamim » sung by Shmuel Barzilai, the chief cantor of the « Israelitische Kulturgemeinde Wien » (Viennese Israelite Community) , accompanied by members of the Orchestra and the « Wiener Singverein » ; the orchestral arrangement was by Erich Schagerl, a violinist in the Orchestra.

In 2005, the Orchestra was named Goodwill Ambassador of the World Health Organisation. In 2013, Clemens Hellsberg received the Marietta and Friedrich Torberg Medal from the « Israelitische Kulturgemeinde Wien » (Viennese Israelite Community) .

Each New Year's Day, since 1 January 1941, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra has sponsored the Vienna New Year's Concerts, dedicated to the music of the Strauß family composers and, particularly, that of Johann Strauß II ; the 1st such concert was given on December 31, 1939, by Clemens Krauß, and led subsequent concerts on New Year's Day, from 1941 until 1945. The post-War series of concerts was inaugurated in 1946 by Josef Krips. They were led by Krauß, then, by Concert Master Willi Boskovsky, from 1955-1979, and, since 1980, have been led by a variety of leading conductors invited by the Orchestra.

In 2006, the Vienna Philharmonic was chosen as Europe's finest in a survey of 7 leading trade publications, 2 radio stations and a daily newspaper. In 2008, an international jury of music-critics polled by « Gramophone » magazine ranked it 3rd in the world (after the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic) .

Subscription ticket demand for the Vienna Philharmonic at their home, the « Musikverein » , is currently listed on the Orchestra's website as being on a waiting-list. The waiting-list for weekday concert subscriptions is 6 years, and 13 years for week-end subscriptions. Casual tickets, however, are available in small numbers and can be bought via links from the official website, to various ticket resellers. It is also possible to book package deals which include transport, hotel accommodation and meals and tickets to concerts.

The Orchestra has been the motive of one of the world's most famous bullion coins : the Vienna Philharmonic coin. The coin is struck in pure gold, 999.9 fine (24 carats) . It is issued every year, in 4 different face values, sizes and weights. It is used as an investment product, although it finishes almost always in the hands of collectors. According to the World Gold Council, this coin was the best-selling gold coin in 1992, 1995 and 1996 world-wide.

In 2006, Austrian Airlines was outfitted with a livery featuring the gold coin and logo of the « Wiener Philharmoniker » . The long-range Airbus A340 aircraft was flown primarily between Vienna and Tokyo for approximately 1 year serving as promotional tool for the Orchestra and the « Philharmoniker » , 24 karat gold coin issued by the Austrian Mint.

The Vienna Philharmonic was already observed to have a characteristic sound by the turn of the last Century. David Hurwitz notes that Bruno Walter told an interviewer on Austrian Radio, in 1960, that hearing the Vienna Philharmonic for the 1st time, in 1897, was for Walter :

« A life-altering impression, because it was this sound of the Orchestra that I have experienced ever since. I have the feeling : this is the way an Orchestra should sound ; the way it should play. I had never heard the beauty, this calmness of the sound, that sort of glissando, the manner of vibrato, the string sound, the blend of woodwinds with the strings, with the brass, the balance of the brass in combination with the percussion contributing together to the overall sonority of the Orchestra. For me, this impression was definitive and, now, I would like to anticipate a point and tell you this : this sound, 1897, is the same today. »

The Vienna Philharmonic's sound has been attributed, in part, to the VPO's instruments and, in part, to its playing styles.

Instruments : At least, a part of the characteristic sound of the Vienna Philharmonic has been attributed to the use of instruments that differ from those used by other major Orchestras :

The Orchestra's standard tuning pitch is $A4 = 443 \text{ Hz}$; the tuning standard for $A4$ is generally considered at a frequency of 440 Hz.

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra uses the German-system (Öhler system) clarinet. By comparison, the Böhm-system clarinet is favored in non-German speaking countries.

Likewise, while the Heckel bassoon is now the norm for most Orchestras around the world, in the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the Heckel bassoon is played almost completely without vibrato.

The rotary-valve trumpet is used but, unlike most other Germanic Orchestras, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra prefers smaller bore rotary trumpets from makers such as Heckel and Lechner.

Like its counterparts elsewhere in Austria, Germany and Russia, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra favors the F bass and B-flat contrabass rotary-valve tuba, whereas the CC piston-valve tuba is preferred in most American and some British Orchestras.

The trombone has a somewhat smaller bore, but this is also true of the trombone used in many German Orchestras.

The timpani have the Schnellar System in which the kettle pushed-up, as opposed to the head being pulled-down. Hans Schnellar was the timpanist in the early- 20th Century, and personally made these drums. They also use goat skin heads as opposed to calf skin or plastic heads.

The double bass retains the traditional theatre-placement in a row behind the brass. The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra uses 4 as well as 5 string double basses, with the bow always being held underhand (German bow) .

The « Wiener » oboe is, along with the Vienna horn, perhaps, the most distinctive member of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra « instrumentarium » . It has a special bore, reed and fingering-system and is very different from the, otherwise, internationally used Conservatoire (French) oboe.

The Vienna horn in F uses a « Pumpenventil » . Unlike the rotary valves used on most other orchestral horns, the « Pumpenventil » contributes to the liquid legato that is one of the trademarks of the Viennese school. The bore of the Vienna horn is also smaller than more modern horns - actually, very close to that of the valveless natural horn. The Vienna horn has remained virtually unchanged since the mid- 19th Century - as a result, it is arguably well-suited to the Classical and Romantic repertoire at the core of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra's programming.

On the other hand, at least 2 instruments or instrument families are like those in other Orchestras. According to the Vienna Philharmonic's website, « the flute is largely the same as the conventional Böhm flute, which is widely-used all over the world. However, it did not replace the wooden flute in Vienna until the 1920's » . Also, the Viennese string sound should not be attributed to unique attributes of the instruments, according to the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, which writes on its website, « There can be no doubt that the Viennese string instruments themselves, unlike the winds, are not of prime importance in producing the Orchestra's unique sound. With a few exceptions, the quality of the instruments of the string section is not particularly outstanding » . To be sure, the instruments are of high-quality ; the National Bank of Austria currently loans 4 violins made by Antonio Stradivari to the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra's instruments and their characteristic tone-colors have been the subject of extensive scientific studies by Gregor Widholm and others at the Institute of Music Acoustics (« Wiener Klangstil » : Viennese Tone Style) at the University of Music and Performing Arts, Vienna. The Vienna Philharmonic's website generalizes about its wind and brass instruments in terms of overtones :

« With the exception of the flute and, to some extent, the bassoon, the typical differences in tone of Viennese wind and brass instruments can be described as follows : they are richer in overtones, i.e. , the sound tone is brighter. »

Playing Styles : the Orchestra, in 2004, began offering a summer institute, the International Orchestra Institute Attergau for « Wiener Klangstil » , to instruct other musicians in the Viennese playing style.

Hurwitz notes that the 1960 Bruno Walter interview indicates that the strings's vibrato (as of 1960) was audibly like that of 1897, and also quotes music critic Richard Specht, in 1919, writing of « something inimitable in the vibrato and the passionate virtuosity of the violins » of the Vienna Philharmonic.

As for other instruments, using early recordings, the musicologist Robert Philip has documented some changes in how Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra players used vibrato during the mid- 20th Century, although he also notes differences between the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and other Orchestras of the era. As was typical of the era, the pre- 1945 flutes show « very little vibrato » in recordings « until after World War II, even in the long solo in Mahler's “ Das Lied von der Erde ”, the flautist (under Bruno Walter, in 1936) plays almost without vibrato » , except on « a few long notes with a delicate medium-speed vibrato » ; but, « by the late- 1940's, the flautists had adopted a gentle medium-speed vibrato » . The oboes, before the 1940's, show « little or no vibrato » but, by the late- 1940's, « the principal oboist had adopted a very delicate fast vibrato but he uses it very sparingly » . (The « cor anglais » is, he notes, even in the late- 1940's, still played « without any vibrato ») . The bassoonists « show virtually no bassoon vibrato, up to the 1950's » .

The Vienna Philharmonic website states that, today, with the flute, « as in all wind and brass instruments in the Viennese Classics, vibrato is used very sparingly » .

Philipps notes that, by 1931, the Vienna Philharmonic strings were reported to use uniform bowing, which was still unusual in Britain. As for portamento (sliding audibly from one note to another, a prominent effect among pre-War string players) , the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra strings' sliding, in the early 1930's, « sounds more deliberately expressive, and less a matter of routine, than that of British Orchestras. This is partly because of the firmer dynamic shaping of the melodic line, partly because of the warmer and fuller string tone. » Further, he hears « strong evidence of a free approach to portamento » - that is, of « different players shifting at different points » within the same phrase (which, he shows, was standard internationally in pre-War orchestral playing) . He notices a reduced use of portamento in recordings, from 1931 to 1936, but, in 1936, also notes that the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra strings still make « conspicuous » use of portamento in Mozart, where British Orchestras, by this time, were using less of it in Classical-era composers. Finally, he hears a « trend towards greater subtlety in the use of portamento » post-War, with « only discreet portamento » , in a recording under Herbert von Karajan, in 1949.

The Vienna Philharmonic did not accept women to permanent membership until 1997, far later than comparable Orchestras (of the other Orchestras ranked among the world's Top 5 by « Gramophone » magazine, in 2008, the last to appoint a woman to a permanent position was the Berlin Philharmonic, which did so in 1982) . As late as February 1996, 1st flautist Dieter Flury told « Westdeutscher Rundfunk » that accepting women would be « gambling with the emotional unity (“ emotionelle Geschlossenheit ”) that this organism currently has » . In April 1996, the Orchestra's press secretary wrote that « compensating for the expected leaves of absence » of maternity leave was a problem that they « do not yet see how to get a grip on » in ongoing consultations with the Women's Ministry of the Austrian Republic about women in the Orchestra.

In February, 1997, Austrian Chancellor Viktor Klima told the Orchestra « , at an awards ceremony, that there was “ creative potential in the other-half of humanity and this should be used ” » . The Orchestra, wrote « The New York Times » , was « facing protests during a U.S. Tour » by the National Organization for Women and International Association of Women in Music. Finally, « after being held-up to increasing ridicule even in socially conservative Austria, members of the Orchestra gathered (on February 28, 1997) in an extraordinary meeting on the eve of their departure and agreed to admit a woman, Anna Lelkes, as harpist » . According to Lelkes, who had played as an adjunct with the Orchestra, since 1974, the Orchestra was « terribly frightened by the possibility of demonstrations by American women's rights activists. I believe that this pressure was decisive » ; she adds that the Orchestra voted to accept her not unanimously but « by a large majority » , and that the vote showed generational differences, with retired members voting against her but « quite a few (younger players) got together and even got organized and said this can't go on any longer. The younger generation stood-up for me » .

As of 2013, the Orchestra has 6 female members ; one of them, violinist Albena Danailova became one of the Orchestra's Concert Masters, in 2008, the 1st woman to hold that position. In January 2005, Australian conductor Simone Young became the 1st woman to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. In late December, 2012, the issue of gender balance remained a concern in Austria : Austrian Radio « ORF » (broadcaster) noted that women still made-up just 6 % of the Orchestra's membership, compared to 14 % in the Berlin Philharmonic, 30 % in the London Symphony Orchestra, and 36 % in the New York Philharmonic ; it acknowledged progress but raised concerns that it was too slow. On the other hand, it quoted Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra president Clemens Hellsberg as saying that the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra now uses completely blind auditions, simply chooses « the best we get » , implying that full-gender equity would take time as older members retire and new ones audition under gender-neutral conditions. (The Vienna Philharmonic will hire no musician over 35 years of age, and has a mandatory retirement age of 65 ; 30 years of service are required to receive a full-pension.)

There have also been claims that the Orchestra has not always accepted members who are visibly members of ethnic minorities. In 1970, Otto Straßer, the former chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, wrote in his memoirs :

« I hold it incorrect that, today, the applicants play behind a screen ; an arrangement that was brought in after the Second World War in order to assure objective judgments. I continuously fought against it because I am convinced that to the artist also belongs the person, that one must not only hear, but also see, in order to judge him in his entire personality. Even a grotesque situation that played itself out after my retirement was not able to change the situation. An applicant qualified himself as the best, and as the screen was raised, there stood a Japanese before the stunned jury. He was, however, not engaged, because his face did not fit with the “ Pizzicato-Polka ” of the New Year's Concert.

»

In 1996, flautist Flury still expressed the view that :

« The soul does not let itself be separated from the cultural roots that we have here, in central Europe. »

In 2001, a violinist who was half-Asian became a member. The full-list of musicians, men and women, including those playing with the Vienna Philharmonic but are not members of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra association, is accessible on the website of the Vienna Philharmonic.

Subscription conductors (1842-1933)

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra has never had principal conductors. Each year, they chose an artist to conduct all concerts of the respective season at Vienna's « Musikverein » . These conductors were called « Abonnementdirigenten » (subscription conductors) as they were to conduct all the concerts included in the Philharmonic's subscription at the « Musikverein » . Some of these annual hirings were renewed for many years, others lasted only for a few years. At the same time, the Vienna Philharmonic also worked with other conductors, e.g. , at the Salzburg Festival, for recordings or special occasions. With the widening of the Philharmonic's activities, the Orchestra decided to abandon this system in 1933. From then on, there were only guest-conductors hired for each concert, both in Vienna and elsewhere.

Otto Nicolai (1842-1848) .

Karl Anton Eckert (1854-1857) .

Otto Dessoff (1860-1875) .

Hans Richter (1875-1882) .

Wilhelm Jahn (1882-1883) .

Hans Richter (1883-1898)

Gustav Mahler (1898-1901) .

Joseph Hellmesberger, Junior (1901-1903) .

Felix Weingartner (1908-1927) .

Wilhelm Furtwängler (1927-1930) .

Clemens Krauß (1930-1933) .

The « Golden Era » of Hans Richter

There has been no other conductor in the history of the Vienna Philharmonic who left such a long-lasting impression on the Orchestra as Hans Richter (1843-1916) , the legendary conductor of the premiere of Wagner's tetralogy « The Ring of the Nibelungen » , in Bayreuth. This is not only an appraisal in hindsight, but was also the predominant opinion of the musicians of that time. Richter conducted at least 243 concerts and presided over the organization with a 1 year interruption from 1875-1898.

The artistic partnership between Richter and the Philharmonic was characterized by the fervor of individuals of flesh and blood. The era of Hans Richter, which is referred to as the « Golden Era » was not a time of static complacency, but rather the constant give-and-take between a head-strong group of musicians and an outstanding conductor, who was, in fact, a member of the ensemble as the 1st among equals.

Under Hans Richter, the ensemble attained the status of a world-class Orchestra with an incomparable tradition. Also contributing to this aura were encounters with Wagner, Verdi, Bruckner, Brahms, Liszt and others who performed with the Orchestra as conductors and soloists. During the « Golden Era » of Hans Richter, Brahms' 2nd and 3rd Symphonies ; Anton Bruckner's 4th and 8th Symphonies, as well as the Tchaïkovsky Violin Concerto were premiered.

The Early 20th Century

The Vienna Philharmonic performed abroad for the 1st time at the World Exhibition in Paris, in 1900, with Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) conducting. The Orchestra, officially recognized by the Austrian government as an association in 1908, did not start touring with any regularity until 1922 under Felix von Weingartner, who led the Orchestra as far afield as South America.

The Philharmonic's close relationship to Richard Strauß, of course, is of great historical importance, and represents one of the many high-points in the rich history of the Orchestra.

Further musical highlights were artistic collaborations with Arturo Toscanini, from 1933 to 1937, and Wilhelm Furtwängler (1886-1954) who, despite the departure from the one subscription concert conductor system, was in actuality the main conductor of the Orchestra, from 1933 to 1945, and, again, from 1947 to 1954.

The Modern Era

After World War II, the Orchestra continued the policy it began, in 1933, of working with every conductor of repute. Especially important in the history of the Orchestra, after 1945, were the artistic collaborations with its 2 honorary conductors, Karl Böhm and Herbert von Karajan, and with its honorary member, Leonard Bernstein.

Through its busy concert schedule, recordings on film and record, tours all over the world, and regular appearances at major international Festivals, the Vienna Philharmonic meets all the requirements of the modern multi-media music business while still managing to emphasize its unique individuality, perhaps, best exemplified in the annual New Year's Concert, and in the pivotal role it plays each summer at the Salzburg Festival. Although the Orchestra has moved with the times, it remains faithful to traditional principles by retaining its autonomy and the subscription concert series as the artistic, organizational and financial basis of its work.

The Vienna Philharmonic is not only Austria's most highly-coveted « cultural export », it is also an ambassador of peace, humanity and reconciliation, concepts which are inseparably linked to the message of music itself. In 2005, the Vienna Philharmonic was named Goodwill Ambassador of the World Health Organisation (WHO) . For its artistic achievements, the Orchestra has received numerous awards, gold and platinum disks, national honours, and honorary membership in many cultural institutions.

Le Philharmonique de Vienne sous le National-Socialisme

10 years is a long time, in which a lot can happen. It has been 10 years ago to the month since I 1st tried to embark on research into the National-Socialist history of the Vienna Philharmonic, which culminated this week in revelations about the famous Orchestra's darker secrets.

At the time, I was rebuffed by the management of the Orchestra with a firm « no ». In its defence, the Vienna Philharmonic had made sure that a previous official history by the archivist Clemens Hellberg, from the early 1990's contained a chapter about the Nazi period. But the idea that external researchers could come and root around in their archive was long considered taboo.

In many ways, this attitude was symptomatic of Austrian society at large. For decades, the Austrian public struggled to get its head around the importance of historical research that focused explicitly on the country's National-Socialist past. When allied forces liberated Austria from National-Socialism at the end of the War, the decision had already been taken to remember the « Anschluß » with Nazi Germany, in March 1938, as an occupation rather than a voluntary annexation.

The 2nd Republic successfully fashioned itself in the image of a victim : Austria was to be remembered as the 1st victim of Adolf Hitler's expansion plans. According to the historian Oliver Rathkolb, this had been only one possible interpretation of events in 1945. But the victim thesis was politically and diplomatically useful and soon dominated Austrians' image of themselves. A process of consciously engaging with the past (as it was practised in Germany, at least, on the surface) never really happened in Austria.

The same veil of deliberate ignorance was drawn over the history of the Vienna Philharmonic. This is hardly surprising, you might say, considering that the Orchestra contained an extremely high-percentage of Nazi Party members in 1945 : almost 50 % of the musicians were card-carrying members of the NSDAP, compared with barely 20 % in the Berlin Philharmonic. That most of them were allowed to stay in the Orchestra helps to explain why the fervent Nazi Helmut Wobisch (a member of the SS who had taken part in the 1934 Nazi « Putsch » against the Dollfuss regime) was voted in as the director and remained in that position until the end of the 1960's. At the very least, it explains the long-lasting resistance to letting people from outside into the archives.

Only during the course of the 1980's did Austria develop a sense of itself as a historical culprit. One by one, the archives opened-up. In 2007, I managed to convince the management of the Orchestra how important it was to become more transparent and, eventually, they took the unprecedented step of commissioning me and 2 other historians to write a detailed history of the Orchestra. Critics of the Orchestra have accused this of being a mere public relation job, rather than a full-on facing-up to the facts. But, in a way, this doesn't make a difference : for the Vienna Philharmonic, and Austrian history, it heralds a new direction.

What moved me most during our research was the story of the 16 musicians who were expelled from the Orchestra because of the Nazis' racist doctrine : 6 of them were murdered in concentration camps, and 2 musicians died in Vienna even before they were deported. Their stories make it clear that there was an anti-Semitic climate in the Orchestra even before the « Anschluß » .

Roger Salander, the grandchild of one of those musicians who emigrated, told my colleague Bernadette Mayrhofer :

« The consensus was that the Jews were somehow always cut-off from the rest. So, it was always “ them ” and “ the others ”. And, then, there were a few who stood somewhere in between, who didn't quite count as anti-Semites. »

After the War, only 2 of the 9 who had emigrated returned to Vienna. But they never rejoined the Philharmonic. Only recently, once the story of the Jewish members of the Orchestra began to be told, did their relatives start to get in touch again - this too is a new chapter for the Orchestra. What practical consequences it will draw from these lessons remains to be seen.

...

The Vienna Philharmonic was, for decades, accused of withholding or suppressing information about its connections in the mid- 20th Century to the Nazi Party. The 1st orchestral representative to discuss the issue was Clemens Hellsberg (also trained as a musicologist) , when he wrote the Orchestra's official sesquicentennial history, « Demokratie der Könige » (Democracy of Kings) . In it, he determined that, at the end of World War II, 47 % of Orchestra members belong to the Nazi Party or affiliates (the total number is now known to be 49 %) that, upon the « Anschluß » , 13 Jewish players were fired, that 6 of them were murdered (the number is now known to be 7) , and « that the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra once gave a concert in an SS barracks » . But more remained to be investigated and made public, and access to relevant material in the Orchestra's archives was highly-restricted. Hellsberg, who became the Orchestra's president in 1997, did not have full-access to the archives until 2000-2001, and the historian Fritz Trümpi reports that, when he began researching the orchestra's 3rd « Reich » activities, in 2003, and requested access, he « was rebuffed by the management of the Orchestra with a firm “ no ”. The idea that external researchers could come and root around in their archive was long considered taboo » . Trümpi was granted access in 2007, but other researchers reported continued exclusion, such as Bernadette Mayrhofer, in 2008 ; the Austrian newspaper « Die Presse » reported in 2008 (in Sebastian Huebel's summary) that « scholars have had difficulties investigating the Vienna

Philharmonic as they were not allowed access to the archives, or sources were delivered reluctantly and with timely delays » .

The 2013 New Year's Day concert evoked critical discussion of the issue in the Austrian press and from Austrian parliamentarian, Harald Walser. Shortly thereafter, Hellsberg commissioned an independent panel of 3 historians (Trümpi, his dissertation adviser Oliver Rathkolb (a professor at the University of Vienna) , and Bernadette Mayrhofer) to fully investigate the Orchestra's 3rd « Reich » activities and (to quote the Orchestra's Facebook feed) , « in the spirit of transparency » , publish the results on the Orchestra's website. The panel was given unrestricted access to the archives. Rathkolb told an interviewer :

« We were able to find new documents in a cellar, which normally contained archived music. It was an Orchestra member who directed us to it. »

On March 10, 2013 (a date chosen to precede March 12, the 75th anniversary of the 3rd « Reich » 's union with Austria, the « Anschluß ») , the panel published its findings in a set of reports posted on the Orchestra's website. Among the panel's findings are :

Before the « Anschluß » , in the mid- 1930's, Rathkolb writes in the introduction to the main webpage :

« 20 % of the members of the Orchestra belonged to the Nazi Party. »

Former Vienna State Opera Secretary-General, Ioan Holender, notes that these members joined-out of conviction, rather than for professional advancement, as Party membership was illegal in Austria, at the time.

By the Orchestra's Centennial, in 1942, Rathkolb writes :

« 60 of the 123 active Vienna Philharmonic orchestral musicians had become members of the Nazi Party. » , that is, 48.8 % .

2 were members of the SS. By contrast, in the other major German-speaking Orchestra, the Berlin Philharmonic, Trümpi found that :

« Barely 20 % » were Party members. For further comparison, Party membership in Austria as a whole was 10 % .

The 13 Jewish members of the Orchestra were expelled upon the « Anschluß » . 6 of them escaped into exile ; the other 7 were killed : 5 in concentration camps, and 2 while still in Vienna, writes Rathkolb, « as a direct result of attempted deportation and persecution » .

Rathkolb writes :

« A total of 9 Orchestra members were driven into exile (including the 6 Jewish members noted above) . The 11 remaining Orchestra members who were married to Jewish women or stigmatized as “ half-Jewish ” lived under the constant threat of revocation of their “ special permission ”. It was only the intervention of Wilhelm Furtwängler and other individuals which, with 2 exceptions, saved these 11 remaining “ half-Jews ” and “ closely-related ” from dismissal from the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. »

Of the musicians hired to replace the 13 dismissed Jewish members, about half were Nazi Party members, Rathkolb says.

The panel revealed in new detail how the New Year's concerts began during the Nazi era. The 1st concert, given on New Year's Eve, in 1939, was proposed by conductor Clemens Krauß and enthusiastically approved by Nazi Propaganda Minister, Josef Goebbels, because it served the « Reich » 's purposes of « propaganda through entertainment » . (The concert was moved to New Year's Day for the concerts held from 1941 to 1945 ; it was revived in 1947 when it was conducted by Josef Krips, who had not been able to conduct during the War years because he was half-Jewish.) Further, the profits from the 1939 concert were « donated entirely to the National-Socialistic fund-raising campaign “ Kriegswinterhilfswerk ” » . The reports also note that Goebbels privately decided to ignore information about the partial Jewish ancestry of the Strauß family (Johann Strauß I's grandfather was Jewish by birth) partly because « it was not proven » , and partly because he did « not want to undermine the entire German cultural heritage » .

At the War's end, in 1945, the Orchestra expelled 10 of its members for Nazi activity ; 2 were re-hired in ensuing years. One of them, trumpeter Helmut Wobisch, had joined the Nazi Party in 1933 and the SS in 1934, and, during the War, served as a spy for the « Gestapo » . He was re-hired to the Orchestra in 1950, and appointed executive director of the Orchestra, in 1953, remaining in the position until 1967.

The panel determined that it was Wobisch who, in 1966, privately gave a replacement copy of the Orchestra's « Ring of Honour » to Baldur von Schirach after the latter's release from Spandau Prison. As a result of the panel's reports, the Carinthian Summer Festival in Klagenfurt, Austria, cancelled its annual concert in honour of Wobisch (who was co-founder of the Festival) .

The panel details how the Orchestra gave « a great number of honorific awards to Nazi potentates, including Arthur Seyß-Inquart (who was sentenced to death for his crimes against humanity, in 1946) and Baldur von Schirach (who was sentenced to 20 years in Spandau Prison for his) » . The Orchestra also planned internally to give its highest-award (the Nicolai Gold Medal) to Adolf Hitler, in 1942, but there is no evidence that this award was ever given.. (Rathkolb has told the press that Hellsberg « has asked the Orchestra to revoke the Rings of Honour to these people » .)

At its annual meeting on 23 October 2013, the Orchestra voted to revoke all the honours bestowed to Nazi officials ; it took the vote after hearing a presentation by Rathkolb of the panel's findings. Clemens Helmsberg is quoted in « The New York Times » as saying that after Rathkolb's presentation, the Orchestra needed no further discussion before revoking the honours, since « it was such an obvious thing » .

...

In 1938, politics encroached upon the Vienna Philharmonic in the most brutal manner. The National-Socialists dismissed all Jewish artists from the Vienna State Opera and disbanded the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic. It was only the intervention of Wilhelm Furtwängler and other individuals which achieved the nullification of the disbandment order and, with 2 exceptions, saved the « half-Jews » and « closely-related » from dismissal from the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. However, 5 members of the Orchestra perished in concentration camps, despite the intervention of the new Nazi chairman of the Orchestra, who attempted to rescue them from deportation. Another 2 members died in Vienna, as a direct result of attempted deportation and persecution.

A total of 9 Orchestra members were driven into exile. The 11 remaining Orchestra members who were married to Jewish women or stigmatized as « half-Jewish » lived under the constant threat of revocation of their « special permission » .

Yet, also within the Orchestra, as part of the National-Socialist Personnel Organization State Opera (NSBO) , there was an active illegal cell, so that, even before 1938, when the ban of the NSDAP was in effect, 20 % of the members of the Orchestra belonged to the Nazi Party. In 1942, 60 of the 123 active orchestral musicians had become members of the NSDAP.

The Project « Vienna Philharmonic - A Historical Overview of the NS Era »

Since April 2011, Professor Doctor Oliver Rathkolb has collected new material on members of the Vienna Philharmonic who fell victim to the Nazis and / or were forced into exile. This material now appears here on the Orchestra's website. Much of it is derived from primary sources regarding the lives of the 2 murdered members of the Orchestra, of the 5 who died following persecution and / or imprisonment in concentration camps and of the 9 who were driven into exile. The stories of the 11 members of the Orchestra who had Jewish wives or were branded « half-Jews » also receive close study and analysis.

In January 2013, the former chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, Professor Doctor Clemens Hellsberg, commissioned an independent group of historians (Professor Doctor Oliver Rathkolb, Director ; Magistera Bernadette Mayrhofer ; Doctor Fritz Trümpi) to integrate the results of their research and publications, including newly-found documents in the Vienna Philharmonic archives, into the Orchestra's website.

Magistera Bernadette Mayrhofer has written biographical sketches of those members of the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic who were either forced into exile by the Nazis or lost their lives as a result of Nazi persecution. As far as the sources so far available have allowed this, these sketches highlight a great number of biographical « facettes » in their quest to do justice to the diversity and complexity of the biographies of the exiled or murdered members of the Philharmonic. Her sketches address both the traumas and the achievements of the 9 exiles.

Doctor Fritz Trümpi provides an overview of the Orchestra's politicization during and after WWI and of how this process developed in the 1st Republic and in the era of Austro-Fascism. Doctor Trümpi deals in detail with the relationship between the Nazi regime and the Vienna Philharmonic's newly-appointed governing body. Newly discovered sources form the basis for a study of the history of the Orchestra as an association. He interprets the Philharmonic repertoire in political terms and studies the Orchestra's media presence in the Nazi era.

New sources play a similar part in Professor Doctor Oliver Rathkolb's analysis of the marginalization and exclusion of Jewish sponsors and sections of the audience. The 2nd focus in his contribution is on the great number of honorary awards made to Nazi potentates, including Arthur Seyß-Inquart and Baldur von Schirach. The re-awarding, in 1966-1967, of the Vienna Philharmonic's Honorary Ring to Baldur von Schirach shortly after his release from Spandau (the 1st award had been made in 1942) will be discussed in this context and the veil of mystery that surrounds this incident will be, at least, partly lifted. Another focus of Rathkolb's work is the genesis of the New Year's Concerts. A chapter on the goals and the implementation of denazification focuses on continuities, both in regard to personnel and content. In both cases, these continuities stretch-back to before the Nazi era. Out of the 123 members of the association of the Vienna Philharmonic, 60 were either members of the NSDAP or candidates for membership, 2 were members of the SS. After 1945, 4 musicians were dismissed immediately and 6 were pensioned-off. Of this group, 2 were later re-admitted to the State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic.

Fritz Trümpi and Bernadette Mayrhofer. « Orchestrierte Vertreibung. Unerwünschte Wiener Philharmoniker - Verfolgung, Ermordung und Exil »

The presentation of the book « Orchestrierte Vertreibung - Unerwünschte Wiener Philharmoniker - Verfolgung, Ermordung und Exil » (Orchestrated Displacement - Unwanted Members of the Vienna Philharmonic - Persecution, Murder and Exile) , which took place on November 6, 2014, in the Jewish Museum of Vienna was accompanied by a memorial concert in which compositions by displaced members of the Vienna Philharmonic were played. Among these, members of the Vienna Philharmonic performed the premiere of the Serenade by the violinist Josef Geringer.

Chairman Andreas Großbauer declared at the presentation that :

With this volume, Mrs. Mayrhofer and Mr. Trümpi have made an important contribution to the ongoing documentation of the darkest chapter of the Orchestra's history. I take a great personal interest in this issue and we are grateful for the work which has been done. We deeply regret the manner in which our colleagues, at that time, were persecuted. In the future, the Vienna Philharmonic will continue to take steps to further document its past. We place high-value on transparency of the historical and scholarly documentation. »

The Politicization Process of the Vienna Philharmonic from World War I until 1945

Surge in Politicization during World War I

(Fritz Trümpi)

During the First World War, the Orchestra saw itself confronted for the 1st time with diverse politically motivated attempts at exploitation, some of which it tried to resist, others which it supported and promoted.

...

The First World War represented a turning-point in the politicization process of the Vienna Philharmonic. The term « politicization » will be used for the reason that the systematic inscription of the Orchestra within a political context should not be understood as a passive « political instrumentalization » , but rather the result of a virulent interchange between political authorities and the Orchestra, which led to the active acceptance of a politically-oriented operational thinking on the part of the Vienna Philharmonic.

During the First World War, the Orchestra saw itself confronted for the 1st time with diverse, politically motivated attempts at exploitation, some of which it tried to resist, others which it supported and promoted. At 1st, the Orchestra Concert Program, from October 3, 1914, attempted to avoid any concrete political appropriation. This was not motivated by political or ideological opposition however, as without a doubt the majority of the Orchestra members belonged to the political spectrum of pro-War German nationalism. The attitude of opposition toward individual measures of governmental and military authorities was due to economic restrictions and personnel cuts affecting the organization of concerts. In general, the First World War contributed to an expansion of the Orchestra's concert activities.

Not even 2 months after the German-Austrian War mobilization had passed, the War Relief Office of the Imperial Ministry of War presented a concert « for the benefit of soldiers on the battlefield and the widows and orphans of the fallen » , for which the Vienna Philharmonic assented to « perform without compensation » . (1) This was followed by approximately 30 such concerts motivated by the politics of War, in the course of the next 4 years. (2) This fact alone places the concert practice of the Vienna Philharmonic in an explicitly political context.

The Orchestra reacted to the call of governmental and military authorities to perform « charity » events with skepticism and, in some cases, emphatic refusal. In April 1915, one Orchestra member suggested that :

« In the event of further invitations for charity events, the committee should deny such requests. » (3)

In January 1916, the committee followed this advice and answered requests for political and War-related events, as far as possible in the negative. Affected by this decision were, among others, the celebration of homage on the occasion of the birthday of the German Emperor and Philharmonic participation in a performance of Franz-Josef Haydn's « Creation » for the benefit of the Bulgarian Red Cross. In both cases, the Orchestra decided not to participate, apparently without suffering any consequences. The Orchestra cited the administration of the Opera House, which refused to give permission because of the daily Opera performances. (4)

The negative attitude regarding such new types of concerts was apparently due primarily to the considerable increase in time and effort, on the part of active orchestra members - and this on top of the fact that the Orchestra was already operating with fewer personnel, since a significant number of musicians had been drafted into military service. In September 1914, soon after the beginning of the War, « 26 members of the association were activated at the same time » , (5) almost a quarter of the entire membership. At 1st, the committee appeared to be unperturbed. There were « no qualms about being able to find enough musicians through the use of substitutes » . (6) 1 year later, disillusionment had begun to set in. It was noted in a meeting of the administrative committee that :

« 37 members of the Orchestra have entered military service and positions are at the current time unfilled. » (7)

The financial pressure upon the Orchestra increased, due to the benefit concerts performed without compensation and, also, the signing of War bonds and charitable contributions. The question was soon raised if the Orchestra could continue to pay compensation to the members in the military for concerts, in which they had not participated. At the business meeting of September 4, 1915, a decision was made against the musicians in the military. Last year's practice « regarding the colleagues in the military is, at the current time, no longer possible. The share of earnings can only be allotted to those who are in a position to play the concerts » . This stipulation was moderated by the annotation that « a final decision cannot be made at the present time, and the shares for those not performing will be suspended » . (8) Economic considerations clashed with a sense of responsibility towards colleagues and, until the end of the War, disagreement about how earnings should be dispersed persisted within the Orchestra.

Yet, despite the Orchestra's antagonistic attitude towards the forced participation in such charity and War concerts, which was primarily a reaction to the profound changes within the music business and, as such, a turning-point in Philharmonic concert practice, the interlacing of culture and politics served as a catalyst for the Vienna Philharmonic by causing an abrupt increase in concert activity. Even in the 1st season of the War, between October 1914 and May 1915, the Vienna Philharmonic participated in 11 War-related concerts and, thus, performed in this capacity more often than in their own subscription concerts. Despite the increased number of concerts, due to the War-related concerts, the Orchestra decided to expand its concert activity even more during the course of the War. The committee introduced the practice of holding a public dress rehearsal of the subscription concerts effective December 1, 1917, (9) which effectively doubled the number of these concerts. With this decision, the Orchestra departed somewhat from the previous concept of the exclusivity of the Philharmonic concerts. The double performances of the subscription concerts enhanced the status of the traditional concert activities « vis-à-vis » the benefit concerts, which had dominated the concert calendar for the 3 previous years.

Returning to the resistance of the Orchestra toward the War-related charity concerts, it should be noted that this should, in no way, be interpreted as opposition to German-Austrian War policies. With few exceptions, the enthusiasm for the War was specifically among Austrian (and German) artists and intellectuals very pronounced. (10) The majority of the Vienna Philharmonic also belonged to the political spectrum of pro-War German nationalism.

An incident which took place shortly before the outbreak of the War is exemplary of this position. In an Orchestra meeting, on June 12, 1914, an Orchestra member of Czech heritage, Karl Jeraj, expressed his displeasure over the mention in the orchestral report of the participation of some members in a German nationalistic event. (11) Consequently, a solid majority of 81 members requested the removal of Jeraj from the Orchestra. (12) An adept mediation, on the part of the chairman, enabled this expulsion to be rescinded, (13) but the incident demonstrates clearly the German nationalistic climate within the Orchestra. This was evident not only in an anti-Czech, but especially in an anti-French attitude :

« Heinrich (a committee member) alluded to the spiteful behavior of the French composer Camille Saint-Saëns who, in Germany, has aroused wide-spread resentment and demonstrations. Under these circumstances, the Golden Oak Leaf Crown, which was awarded to the Vienna Philharmonic by the Commission of Performances at the Paris Exhibition, in 1900, under the chairmanship of President Camille Saint-Saëns, has lost its value as an award, and assuming the approval of the Orchestra, should be donated to the Austrian Red Cross to be melted-down. The proposal was approved with applause. » (14)

The fact that concert activity was also strongly infused with nationalistic overtones is best demonstrated by a propaganda tour which the Orchestra made to Switzerland, in 1917. Immediately noticeable is the close connection of the tour with the interests of Austrian and German foreign policy. (15) The establishment of amicable relationships with neutral countries played an increasingly important role in this stage of the War, and cultural propaganda was directed toward these countries accordingly. It is hardly coincidental that, both the Vienna and the Berlin Philharmonic, made major tours to neutral States at nearly the same time. Whereas the Vienna Philharmonic traveled to Switzerland, in May 1917, the Berlin Philharmonic embarked on a « Northern Country Tour » to the neutral Scandinavian countries, in May 1917. (16)

Martina Nußbaumer has demonstrated convincingly that this Vienna Philharmonic tour to Switzerland had as its basis a broadly conceived Austro-Hungarian publicity campaign which attempted to cast music and Austria's intermediary role therein as a way of peace-making and bringing peoples together. (17) Also recognizable in the nearly simultaneous tours of the 2 Orchestras is a type of coordinated communication initiative of the Central Powers toward neutral foreign countries. (18)

In the Vienna Philharmonic tour to Switzerland, the foreign policy postulation of « nations coming together » is enmeshed with the « symbolic politics » which the Orchestra carried-out in its concert programming. (19) For the concert in Lausanne, in French-speaking Switzerland, the Vienna Philharmonic performed only compositions of Beethoven, whereas, in other cities, also Berlioz and Tchaïkovsky were played. According to Felix Weingartner, who conducted the Orchestra on this tour, the impression was to be avoided that tribute was being made to nearby France. (20) The fact that this tactic aroused numerous protests from audiences in western Switzerland demonstrates clearly that the concerts were perceived in foreign countries as intended - as governmental propaganda events in the context of the War.

Thus, by the end of the War, the Vienna Philharmonic was more politically involved than ever before. This was due primarily to its participation in charity concerts and tours which stood in close connection with State-run War propaganda intended for both domestic and foreign consumption. Furthermore, however, although reluctantly at first, the Orchestra increasingly shaped its general concert programming in a political context and, in so doing, began to incorporate such factors into its own self-image.

Notes

(1) Protokolle AHV (11 September 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018.

(2) See the concert listings, in : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » ; page 388 f.

- (3) Protokolle AHV (24 April 1915) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-019, page 10.
- (4) Protokolle KS (13 January 1916) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-019, page 24.
- (5) Protokolle KS (5 September 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018, page 42.
- (6) Protokolle KS (5 September 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018, page 42.
- (7) Protokolle KS (30 August 1915) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-019, page 15.
- (8) Protokolle AHV (4 September 1915) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-019, page 17.
- (9) Protokolle KS (3 November 1917) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-019, page 64.
- (10) For a representative discussion of the question of the behavior of intellectuals and artists during World War I, which has been thoroughly researched in the meanwhile, see the anthology (although pertaining only to Germany) of : « Kultur und Krieg. Die Rolle der Intellektuellen, Künstler und Schriftsteller im Ersten Weltkrieg » , edited by Wolfgang J. Mommsen, Munich (1996) .
- (11) Protokolle HV (12 June 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018, page 39. A detailed account of this incident can be found, in : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » ; page 386 f.
- (12) Protokolle KS (15 June 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018, page 40.
- (13) Protokolle AHV (11 August 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018, page 43.
- (14) Protokolle KS (24 October 1914) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-018, page 47.
- (15) On the purpose of these tours, see also : Nußbaumer. « Musik » ; pages 299-317.
- (16) Cities visited : Copenhagen (9-11 May 1917) ; Malmö (14-15 May 1917) ; Stockholm (16 May 1917) ; Gothenburg (18 May 1917) . The conductor was Arthur Nikisch.
- (17) Nußbaumer. « Musik » ; page 310.
- (18) This unity of « comrades in arms » was emphasized by the guest appearances of the Berlin Philharmonic and the Imperial Ottoman Palace Orchestra, in the 1st half of 1918 in Vienna, as well as the concert tour of the Vienna Philharmonic to Berlin, in June 1918. See, also : Nußbaumer. « Musik » ; page 309.
- (19) Nußbaumer. « Musik » ; page 310.
- (20) Felix Weingartner. « Die Wiener Philharmoniker in der Schweiz » , in : « Neue Freie Presse » (20. Juli 1917) , «

Morgenblatt » , Seite 4. Quoted in : Nußbaumer. « Musik » ; page 310.

The 1st Republic and Austro-Fascism : Enhancing References to Vienna as the « City of Music » and Strengthening Internal Authoritarian Structures

(Fritz Trümpi)

Unlike the time before World War I, when musical events were primarily initiated by private committees, there was a considerable degree of politicization after 1919.

...

During the period of the 1st Republic and Austro-Fascism, the « politicization » of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra did not imply unilateral exploitation for national political purposes, but rather the establishment of inter-dependencies between political authorities and the Orchestra. (1) This interdependent relationship demonstrates a close link to the term « Musikstadt Wien » (« City of Music ») as an expression of the increased efforts to impregnate Vienna with a certain « city branding ». Unlike the time before World War I, when musical events were primarily initiated by private committees, there was a considerable degree of politicization after 1919. (2) This reflected a general development in music life - not only in Austria but also in Germany. The renowned contemporary music-critic Paul Bekker described the state of musical life in the early 1920's, as follows :

« Es kommt lediglich darauf an, festzustellen, daß die öffentliche Kunstpflege durch den Krieg und seine Folgeerscheinungen in den letzten Jahren in eine Abhängigkeit von politischen Gesichtspunkten geraten ist, die jeder Ernstmeinende, gleichviel welcher Parteirichtung er angehören mag, tief bedauern muß. » (3)

« It is worth noting that, due to the War and its consequences, the world of public art has become dependent on political aspects - a fact that anyone in their right minds, regardless of their political orientation, cannot but deeply regret. »

The Vienna Philharmonic's activities were also largely influenced by that trend, with an increasing number of regional and national policy interfaces. And Vienna's enhanced image as a « City of Music » provided the Orchestra with an excellent basis for operation for that purpose. Furthermore, immediately upon the establishment of the authoritarian Dollfuß regime, in 1933, it radically changed its internal structures, gearing them to the authoritarian rule and adapting itself to the dominant political doctrine.

The number of concerts performed by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra increased continuously after World War I : whereas there were reportedly 31 concerts in the season of 1919-1920, 5 years later, there were 65. (4) And with regard to the range of events, there too was a significant increase in the 1920's. The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra frequently played before ever wider audiences, with explicitly political events as well as international concerts forming an increasingly significant part of the Orchestra's daily business. There was a time when the Vienna Philharmonic barely turned-down any requests - in the early 1920's, inviting the Orchestra to perform was not a question of artistic quality but, rather, an indication of the financial circumstances of the organizer. (5) Furthermore, it is noteworthy that the Philharmonic did not appear to have any serious reservations when agreeing to hold concerts in the framework of the « Organisation geistiger Arbeiter und öffentlich Angestellter ». (6) By engaging in this practice (even if only for a few seasons) , the Orchestra began to sell its services to official and municipal bodies, for the 1st time ; a fact that can only be interpreted as a political concession to a radically changed society. From the early 1920's, the Vienna Philharmonic also participated in the Salzburg Festival, gradually increasing the number of their international concerts : unlike the period between the Orchestra's foundation, in 1842, and the end of World War I during which it only toured 6 times, the Orchestra toured 9 times in the short period, between 1919 and 1933. In 2 of those instances, in 1922 and 1923, the Philharmonic even travelled to South America where it held as many as 40 concerts each time. (7) It is that international travel activity that particularly reflects the growing political importance of the Orchestra - both nationally and internationally . According to the minutes of a committee meeting, in 1924, the Philharmonic Orchestra was welcomed by the provincial governor and the mayor of Graz upon arriving in the city. It is said that both of them stressed in their speeches :

« ... daß unsere Reisen zum politischen Verständnis beitragen, indem sie nicht nur die Bundesländer, sondern auch das Ausland uns näher bringen, was besonders unsere Erfolge in Südamerika und Paris bewiesen haben. » (8)

« ... that our tours contribute to strengthening political understanding by developing closer ties to both the provinces and foreign countries ; this has been particularly proven by the success we had in South America and Paris. »

Moreover, the minutes of the meeting also clearly record the fact that the Orchestra was encouraged by public authorities to undertake such tours. For example :

« Wunderer und Weiß berichten über einen Besuch bei Unterrichtsminister Schneider, der eine Konzertreise nach Vorarlberg im Juli. »

« Wunderer and Weiß mentioned a conversation with Schneider, Minister of Education, who suggested that a concert tour to Vorarlberg be organized in July. »

With regards to foreign policy interests, the Vienna Philharmonic provided its services in that respect too. The Orchestra's 1925 tour of Germany, for instance, displayed Austria's annexation efforts to the, then, democratically constituted Germany. That tour of the Philharmonic undoubtedly had a diplomatic function, which is also reflected in the reporting of the daily newspaper « Neues Wiener Abendblatt ». The Orchestra was received in Munich's City Hall, in the presence of the city's mayor, town councillors, the Austrian Consul General as well as several political and cultural representatives. In his address, the mayor pointed-out that he welcomed the Orchestra ...

« als Sendboten der Zusammengehörigkeit aller deutschfühlenden und deutschgesinnten Volksteile ; ob sie nun diesseits oder jenseits dieser unnatürlichen Grenzen wohnen, ob auch die Vereinigung, die unausbleiblich ist, früher oder später kommt, nichts wird die Kulturzusammengehörigkeit trennen können, zu der wir uns bekennen. »

« as a messenger reflecting the unity of all people who feel German and are Germanophile ; whether they live within or beyond these unnatural borders, whether unification will take place sooner or later, which is inevitable - nothing whatsoever will be able to break the bond of the common culture we share. »

The director of the Munich Music Academy stated just as clearly :

« Diese Konzertreise ist nicht eine Frage der Musik, sondern eine Frage des ganzen deutschen Geisteslebens und der ganzen deutschen Zukunft. »

« This concert tour is not a question of music, but a question of the whole German intellectual life and of the German future. »

In his response, the Orchestra's chairman spoke of his intention to take home his impressions of Germany and tell people about them, saying :

« mit nach Österreich nehmen und davon erzählen » , which, according to him, was the only thing poor musicians could do. Indeed, it was not unusual at all for the Vienna Philharmonic's management to refrain from casting too political a light on the Orchestra in public. Instead of making any direct references to politics, during the 1st Republic, the Orchestra preferred to underline its role as a representative of the « City of Music » with all that that implied. On the occasion of the Vienna Philharmonic's 85th anniversary, Wilhelm Jerger, then simply a member of the Orchestra until appointed « kommissarischer Leiter » by the National-Socialists, illustrated this in an unpretentious but nevertheless very self-confident way :

« So sind die Philharmoniker im Ausland die geschätztesten Vertreter des kostbarsten Wiener Kunstbesitzes, der Wiener vorschlägt (9) (10) (11) (12) : Musik, geworden. » (13)

« The Philharmonic has become the most valued international representative of Vienna's most precious piece of art : its music. »

In the course of the 1920's, the Orchestra increasingly represented an integral part of the « City of Music » . Likewise, it made sure to have this connection rhetorically highlighted in the media. However, the Orchestra also invented another way of enhancing that image by introducing the « Philharmonikerball » (Vienna Philharmonic Ball) , in 1925, for instance. By choosing the « Musikverein » as its venue, the Orchestra, once again, emphasized its claim of representing the « City of Music » - not only when giving concerts. In addition, the Ball received protection at the highest-political level : in 1925, for example, the Austrian Federal President, Michaël Hainisch, from the Christian-Social Party, and the mayor of Vienna, Karl Seitz, from the Social-Democrats, were members of the « Honorary Committee » . The fact that the Committee was represented by more than one political Party clearly shows that it was not so much a Party political orientation that guided the Vienna Philharmonic but, rather, the national cross-political context.

Through the organization of such a festive event, the Vienna Philharmonic managed to create a more tangible reflection of its attachment to Vienna which, before then, had been primarily achieved through media coverage. Furthermore, it was able to project its status as a private association : balls were a private matter and, therefore, organized by associations, political groups, clubs, etc. (14) Being such an association (and certainly no institution subjected to political control or administration), the Vienna Philharmonic contributed to the strengthening of the concept of Vienna as a « City of Music » - and not only by means of its musical performance. Conversely, it was that concept that provided the base for its legitimacy as an autonomous Orchestra. In this way, the Orchestra's activities did, indeed, fulfill political functions without the need of even the slightest intervention on the part of political authorities that would affect its organizational structure. (15)

Even after the establishment of the authoritarian Dollfuß regime, this kind of indirect politicization did not seem to change : political interference in the Orchestra's institutional structures proved non-existent. However, the general rise of authoritarianism started to affect its internal organization, in the early 1930's. At its general meeting on July 9, 1933, and only a few months after Federal Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuß had dissolved parliament, the Vienna Philharmonic decided « mit allen gegen 2 Stimmen » (approved by all but 2 votes) to strengthen the Board's position which, consequently, entailed enhancing the association's authoritarian structures :

« Dem Vorstande steht das Recht zu im Einvernehmen mit dem Dirigenten, diejenigen Mitglieder, welche solistisch hervortreten, für alle philharmonischen Veranstaltungen zu bestimmen und es darf sich kein Mitglied weigern eine ihm zugeteilte Stimme zu übernehmen. » (16)

« The Board is, in agreement with the conductor, entitled to appoint those members for all the events of the Philharmonic who are outstanding soloists, and not a single member may object to take on their allocated part. »

In fact, the present practice of hiring guest conductors, which remains controversial even today, can be traced back to the early days of « Austro-Fascism » : the transition from a system of subscription conductors to one of guest-conductors was a consequence of said decision, which entailed a growth in power for the Orchestra's board. Furthermore, it is striking that Gustav Hawranek, who was elected director in 1932, resigned only 1 year later, in 1933, and was replaced by Hugo Burghauser as the Vienna Philharmonic's new leader. Of course, Burghauser's appointment was no coincidence at all. He maintained close contacts with prominent political leaders of the « Austro-fascist » movement as well as with the « Vaterländische Front » (Fatherland Front), founded by Dollfuß, in May 1933. Moreover, he was appointed « Erster Vorsitzender des Ringes der österreichischen Musiker » by the Ministry of Education, for the period between 1934 and 1938, and, in 1935, by decision of the « Wiener Landesgericht » (Regional Court of Vienna), he became « Sachverständiger für Musik » (musical consultant) . (17)

Burghauser's political stance and his close links to the regime did, in fact, have an impact on both the association's and the assembly's management, despite the fact that the general meeting, being the sovereign institution of the association, prevented the Board's Executive Office from becoming too powerful. Nevertheless, Burghauser knew very-well how to influence the political course of the Philharmonic's meetings by using the leverage of his political arguments, for instance. (18) This is exactly what Heinrich Kralik praised in his « Orchestermonographie » (monograph for Orchestra) on the Vienna Philharmonic that was published shortly before the « Anschluß », in 1938 ; he underlined the chairman's growing power, saying :

« Die Machtbefugnisse, die der Vorstand erhält, sind nicht gering. Und wenn er Talent und Temperament dazu hat, kann

er ein wirklicher Führer sein. Etwa wie heutigen Tags Professor Hugo Burghauser, der auf diesem Posten eine außerordentliche philharmonische Vitalität entfaltet, idealistisch und realpolitisch. » (19)

« The powers that the chairman is endowed with are significant indeed ; and if he has both the talent and temperament, he could be a real leader such as Professor Hugo Burghauser is today, displaying an extraordinary Philharmonic vigor in this post - being both, idealistic and politically pragmatic. »

Hence, the regime had no reason to urge the Orchestra towards closer cooperation between its institutions and the State as this was (as regards political content, at least) warranted anyway. It must not be forgotten either that the importance of music for shaping the political base of the Austrian image had increased considerably over the years, since the 1920's, (20) being frequently used as a reference that helped Austria assert itself as an independent German State alongside National-Socialist Germany. (21) As one of the most effective musical institutions in Austria, the Vienna Philharmonic pursued its political ambition through a number of concerts, at home and abroad. Finally, one of the 1st large-scale propaganda campaigns promoting the Dollfuß regime was the Philharmonic's journey to Italy, in May 1933, where it visited Benito Mussolini's « Mostra della Rivoluzione Fascista » and was the 1st Orchestra to play secular music before the Holy-See. That journey, however, not only reflects Austria's efforts of annexation to Fascist Italy, which were officially recorded in the « Rome Protocols » , shortly afterwards, but also served as a testimony of the clerical and Catholic aspect firmly promoted by the regime. (22) Still, the Vienna Philharmonic's sphere of action during the period of « Austro-Fascism » was much wider than that : it participated in the World Exposition of Paris, in 1937, (23) and was involved in concerts aimed at strengthening domestic support for the regime, such as the « Geistliche Festkonzert im Rahmen des Deutschen Katholikentages zugunsten der Dr.-Ignaz-Seipel-Gedächtnisstiftung » , in September 1933, or the « Festversammlung anlässlich der 400-Jahr-Feier des Ordens der “ Barmherzigen Brüder ” » of October 1937, among other things.

Through the strengthened power of the Board's position and the Orchestra's multi-faceted representation of Austria that effectively promoted national policy, its configuration in 1938 only facilitated the National-Socialists' political encroachment on the Vienna Philharmonic in the aftermath of the « Anschluß » . Furthermore, the fact that the Orchestra had, since 1933, already consisted of numerous illegal Party members even further facilitated its integration into Nazi cultural policy.

Notes

(1) See, also : the introduction of the text, « Die Wiener Philharmoniker im Ersten Weltkrieg » .

(2) See : Nußbaumer. « Musikstadt » , page 358 ; Eder. « Musikfeste » , page 20 ; Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 96-97.

(3) Paul Bekker. « Zeitwende » , in : « Die Musik » , Volume XV, No. 1 (1 October 1922) , pages 1-9.

(4) Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 66.

(5) Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 408.

(6) Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 67.

(7) For further details, see : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , pages 396-398 ; Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 68.

(8) Protokolle KS, 6/17 (1924) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-024, page 13.

(9) Protokolle KS, 5/22 (1924) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-024, page 11.

(10) « Neues Wiener Abendblatt » , Volume 7, No. 4 (1925) , page 2.

(11) « Neues Wiener Abendblatt » , Volume 7, No. 4 (1925) , page 2.

(12) « Neues Wiener Abendblatt » , Volume 7, No. 4 (1925) , page 2. With regard to the Orchestra's point of view on this tour, see : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 418 ; Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 101-102.

(13) Wilhelm Jerger. « Aus der Geschichte einer Wiener Musikervereinigung. 85 Jahre Wiener Philharmonisches Orchester. » in : « Reichspost » , Volume 11, No. 5 (1927) , pages 1-2.

(14) Monika Kus. « Das Wiener Ballwesen aus geschichtlicher, sozialer und wirtschaftlicher Sicht. » , Thesis at the Vienna University of Economics and Business (1987) , page 1.

(15) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 99-100.

(16) « Neufassung des § 35 der Geschäftsordnung. » , Protokolle OHV, 7/9 (1933) ; HAWPh, A-Pr-029, page 2a.

(17) See : Mayrhofer. « Angelegenheit » , pages 73-74 ; Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 118-120.

(18) For more details, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 120-122.

(19) Heinrich von Kralik. « Die Wiener Philharmoniker. Monographie eines Orchesters. » , Vienna (1938) , page 108.

(20) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 123.

(21) For further details, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 123-125.

(22) For further details, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 126.

(23) With regard to the political importance of music for Austria's representation at World Expositions, see : Mayer-Hirzberger. « Voting for Shifts in Austria : How the " Ständestaat " (1934-1938) Used Musical Clichés to Improve the Country's Image Abroad » , in : Ports of Call. « Central European and Hertz American Cultures in Motion. » , edited by Ingram Susan et al. , Frankfurt am Main (2003) , pages 199-209 - here, page 202.

An Association Based on National-Socialist Principles

(Fritz Trümpi)

Having been spared disbandment, the Association was charged with implementing far-reaching changes in its statutes : important personnel decisions now required the consent of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry and, later, that of the « Reichsstatthalter » in Vienna.

...

After a brief period of uncertainty whether the « Verein der Wiener Philharmoniker » , the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic, would be dissolved and the Orchestra administered henceforth by the « Verwaltung der Staatstheater » (Administration of the State Theatres) , the so-called « Stillhaltekommissar » (a term variously rendered in English as Commissioner for Suspensions, Liquidation Commissar or Repression Officer) , acting in accordance with Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels, decided against dissolution. Having been spared disbandment, the Association was charged with implementing far-reaching changes in its statutes : important personnel decisions now required the consent of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry and, later, that of the « Reichsstatthalter » in Vienna. The statutes had to include the « Aryan » and « Führer » principles. In its negotiations with the « Dienststelle Stillhaltekommissar für Vereine, Organisationen und Verbände » , the Office of the Repression Officer for Associations, Organisations and Clubs, the governing body of the Orchestra showed itself extremely cooperative. In 1940, they even agreed to co-opt a functionary of the Vienna « Reichspropagandaamt » into the governing body of the Orchestra. This meant that, on the institutional level, the Orchestra's connections to the State and to the Party were re-inforced several times over. Despite their status as an association, the Vienna Philharmonic assumed in the Nazi era distinctive characteristics of a « Reich » organisation close to the regime.

From 1908 onward, the Vienna Philharmonic had been a registered association. (1) Associations had to meet stringent political criteria after the « Anschluß » . (2) In March 1938, the Vienna Philharmonic fell within the remit of the « Repression Officer for Associations, Organisations and Clubs » , (3) whose task it was to « suppress » all kinds of associations through to the referendum, on 10 April 1938, and to make sure they were incapable of taking any kind of initiative in the intervening time. (4) At the same time, the « Stillhaltekommissar » was entitled to implement measures resulting in the « gleichschaltung » of associations and organizations in Austria. (5) The vast majority of Austria's associations and organizations fell victim to « total liquidation » : of the country's 115,000 associations and clubs, only some 5,000 escaped that fate. (6) The standard reasons given for the associations' liquidation were either their political and / or religious orientation or their allegedly « utterly superfluous character » . (7)

It appears, however, that the processing of high-profile cultural institutions caused a certain irritation. In a letter, dated 17 March 1938, from the « Office of the “ Landeskulturleiter der N.S.D.A.P. / Hitlerbewegung / Österreich ” » to « Gauleiter » Bürckel, the Vienna Philharmonic is already referred to as a « National-Socialist cultural association » . The letter raises the question whether Bürckel's repression directive (« “ Stillhalte ” -Weisung ») applied to « events of a cultural character » . (8) The « Landeskulturleiter » requests permission for several concerts to take place and, in particular, for a « Philharmonic concert, on 21 March, under Knappertsbusch in the “ Großer Musikvereinsaal ” » .

Designed presumably to pre-empt possible reservations on the part of « Gauleiter » Bürckel against these concerts, a remark at the end of the letter presents the Vienna Philharmonic in the guise of indirect National-Socialist election campaign aides :

« We guarantee that the realization of the planned events will not result in the National-Socialist cultural associations referred to in our submission losing any of the fire-power that you, “ Herr Gauleiter ”, may yet demand from them in the course of the election campaign. » (9)

The dealings of the « Stillhaltekommissar » with the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic are, nevertheless, full of contradictions. A 1st decision, of which the Philharmonic was notified on 16 September 1938, provided for the « liquidation » and « integration » of the Association into the « Staatstheater und Bühnenakademie » (State Theatre and Stage Academy) . (10) Even if the Association had, in fact, been dissolved, the decision would have been administrative rather than political in nature. However, only 3 months later, on 12 December, the preliminary decision was « repealed by a telephone call » after the Ministry for Propaganda and the « Stillhaltekommissar » had agreed not to interfere with the existence of the Association. This was confirmed in writing, on 19 December, (11) without it being made clear at that stage what organizational form the Vienna Philharmonic were to assume, henceforth. The « Stillhaltekommissariat » initially submitted 2 proposals to the minister of propaganda :

« 1. The Association retains its independence and is placed under the supervision of the “ Reich ” Ministry for Propaganda. This means that the Association is dependent in practical terms on the Ministry’s directives in personnel questions and in all other matters. »

« 2. The Association is liquidated and a limited liability company is simultaneously formed as in Berlin, whose shares are the sole property of the “ Reich ” as represented by the Ministry. In this case, the Vienna Philharmonic would be stripped to being no more than an Orchestra and the musicians would have to be regarded as employees of the company. Management would be in the hands of representatives appointed by the Reich. » (12)

Tellingly, the 1st scenario was chosen, which meant that the « Reich » or, to be more precise, the Ministry for Propaganda was spared having to pay for the Vienna Philharmonic. Gœbbels opted for the opposite of what he had done with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1934 : he had made them a « Reich » Orchestra financed from the national budget ; now, he refrained from formally interfering with the Vienna Philharmonic’s status as an association. It is conceivable that the decision was based on financial considerations. Gœbbels had presumably realized, in the meantime, how cost intensive an Orchestra of this kind was - he was repeatedly reprimanded by the « Reich » finance minister for the expenditure the Berlin Philharmonic continued to cause. (13) Gœbbels told the « Stillhaltekommissar » in Vienna, on 13 June 1939, that he had no objections against the « continued independence under association law of the “ Vienna Philharmonic ”, provided the statutes are changed in accordance with National-Socialist principles and the association is placed under my direct supervision » . (14) In the « Stillhaltekommissar » ’s final report, dated 20 July 1939, the Orchestra’s definitive status is defined as follows :

« 1. The organization retains its independence and is placed under the supervision of the “ Reichs-minister für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda ” (the “ Reich ” Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda) , Berlin. »

« 2. The assets are released.

The following changes in the statutes have to be made : “ Arierprinzip ” , “ Führerprinzip ” .

The head of the Association is nominated by the “ Reich ” Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, Berlin, in accordance with the “ Gauleiter ” of the NSDAP in Vienna ; the general assembly is entitled only to a right of proposal. Resolutions passed by the members require the consent of the “ Reich ” Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda to enter into force. The statutes, which are about to be newly-promulgated, require the consent of the “ Reich ” Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda and will ensure the rights of Aryan members. » (15)

Despite the enforced changes, the statutes differed in one key-respect from those of the Berlin Philharmonic : even though the Vienna Philharmonic were placed under Gœbbels’s supervision, they were not collectively integrated into his ministry. And, shortly after Gœbbels had officially appointed Wilhelm Jerger « for the duration of 3 years » as « head of the Association and chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic » , (16) the relevant competencies were re-shuffled in the statutes approved on 7 March 1940 : the right to nominate the « head of the Association » now moved from the Ministry for Propaganda to the « Reichsstatthalter » in Vienna. (17) The statutes also enshrined the « Reichsstatthalter » ’s right to « dismiss the head of the Association and / or his deputy without prior notice » . « Alterations of the statutes and the dissolution of the Association after the passing of a pertinent resolution by the general assembly » were contingent on the « Reichsstatthalter » ’s consent ; the agenda, likewise, required the approval of the « Reichsstatthalter » . (18) § IX of the revised statutes contains the provision that the award of honorary memberships requires « the written approval of the competent N.S.D.A.P. representative » - an explicit reference to the function of the « Gauleiter » rather than to that of the « Reichsstatthalter » . (19) Similarly, it was, functionally speaking, the representative of the Party rather than the « Reich » representative who decided questions of the revocation of membership in the Orchestra. (20) Membership in the Orchestra was tied to « racial » criteria, in any case :

« Only Aryans of German or of closely related blood are eligible for membership according to the legal provisions. » (21)

The new statutes seem on the whole to have been to the liking of the Vienna Philharmonic - the mandated introduction of the « Aryan » and the « Führer » principles into the statutes does not seem to have irked the Philharmonic negotiators : on 28 October 1938, Committee member Otto Straßer appealed to Kajetan Mühlmann, who had been appointed Undersecretary (« Staatssekretär ») for the Arts, in 1938, to « exempt » from control the Association Vienna Philharmonic and, by the same token, to convert the Vienna State Opera Orchestra into a « Reich » Orchestra. (22) What is especially remarkable is the offer of collaboration Straßer extends in his letter :

« And we beg you, “ Herr Staatssekretär ”, to implement re-organization in the sense we have indicated and to give us an opportunity in this way to contribute with all our strength to the construction of the pan-German “ Reich ” (“ Großdeutsches Reich ”) and, notably, of Vienna as a “ City of Music ”. » (23)

In a Vienna Philharmonic position paper entitled, « Proposals regarding the re-organization of the Vienna Philharmonic and the Orchestra of the “ Wiener Staatsoper ” » , Straßer, speaking on behalf of the Orchestra, announced the intention to implement the « re-organization of the Association's governing body, in accordance with the demands of the National-Socialist State » and proposed that the Orchestra's power of decision, regarding its musical activities, the choice of conductors, its welfare institutions and the assets of the Association should be exempt from outside interference. He also proposed that the Orchestra voluntarily forego subsidies :

« As it may be assumed that the Philharmonic concerts, once the present audience crisis has blown-over, will revert to being exceedingly profitable as always used to be the case, subsidies will not be needed. » (24)

During the remainder of its War-time existence, the Orchestra continued to decline, according to the minutes of its general assemblies, subsidies from Berlin even if the treatment of the matter showed a certain ambivalence. On one occasion, Jerger argued for the « necessity to manage without subsidies from Berlin » and for the Orchestra « to get-back on its feet under its own power » , (25) on another, the Philharmonic eschewed any large-scale subsidization by the Ministry for Propaganda and the office of the « Reich » governor on the occasion of the Orchestra's Centenary, with a view to avoiding « any form of the Propaganda Ministry's tutelage » and to ensuring « the independence of the Association » ; (26) at the same time, however, they made sure potential losses were underwritten by the « Reich » governor in Vienna. (27) During the preparatory stage of a tour of Sweden, in 1943, a new situation arose whose remedy, as was clear to everyone concerned, could not be a return to the options presented to the Orchestra, in 1938, of « discretionary subsidies » or a guaranteed annual grant to subsidize tours. (28) What was at issue was Wilhelm Furtwängler's fee, which Gœbbels's ministry refused to pay : (29)

« The tour is to be regarded as a done deal. What is unclear, at this stage, is who is going to pay Doctor Furtwängler's fee (if it had been the Berlin Philharmonic's turn to go to Sweden, the Ministry for Propaganda would have paid ; as it is, we're supposed to pay the fee out of our own pocket) . » (30) (31)

(Furtwängler is said, elsewhere, to have waived fees of 12,000 RM for subscription concerts when he was told that the Philharmonic was not eligible for subsidies. In its subsidization policy, the Orchestra seems to have tacked and veered as the situation demanded.)

In the context of the postulate of « independence » , which (in view of the changes in the Statutes discussed above) was a gross misrepresentation anyway, attention is to be paid to the composition of the Committee, the governing body of the Association. While the Committee outwardly continued to be manned in the traditional way after the « Anschluß » , a representative of the « Reich » Propaganda Office took part, from May 1940, in the meetings of the Executive Council (« Vorstandsrat ») - as the Committee was now called for a time. Aurel Wolfram was installed immediately after the « Anschluß » as an advisor in the Cultural Department of the « Reich » Propaganda Office, explicitly charged with the « special task » of « establishing a connection with Berlin » . (32) Wolfram had been cultivating contacts with the Vienna Philharmonic, for some time in the past ; these were now intensified considerably through his participation in the committee meetings (between May 1940 and his dismissal from the Propaganda Office [33] in October of the same year) ; shortly after his dismissal, Wolfram opted, in December 1940, for joining the ranks of the « founders » of the Vienna Philharmonic, which involved an annual fee of 333 RM (« Reichsmark ») . (34)

Wolfram's entry into the Executive Committee (« Vorstandsrat ») of the Vienna Philharmonic was not, on the evidence of the minutes, ordained from above ; on the contrary, the National-Socialist propaganda functionary was unanimously co-opted by that body :

« Doctor Aurel Wolfram is Viennese and a sincere and faithful friend of the Vienna Philharmonic, who has always been prepared to stand-up for the Vienna Philharmonic. His co-optation into the Executive Committee would consolidate this valuable friendship and would create a favourable impression in the outside world for the Vienna Philharmonic by virtue of the position that Doctor Wolfram occupies as the 1st cultural advisor at the “ Reich ” Propaganda Office in Vienna. Straßer and Kainz are also in favour of co-opting Doctor Wolfram to the Executive Committee. His admittance was unanimously passed. » (35)

This act meant that the Vienna Philharmonic were strengthening, yet again (and in an unprecedented manner) , their ties to the State and to the NSDAP. (36) Their status as an association would have left them a certain latitude in their choice of emphasis. The changes in the Statutes and the composition of the Executive Committee based on Party political criteria made the Vienna Philharmonic assume distinct characteristics of a « Reich » organisation close to the regime.

Notes

(1) Statutes of the association « Wiener Philharmoniker » (1908) . Vereinsakt, WSL, Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : Gelöschte Vereine (Liquidated associations) , pages 4602-4621, 4629. For the story of the association's foundation, see : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 368 ff. ; and Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 48-49.

(2) See : Gertrude Rothkappl. « Die Zerschlagung österreichischer Vereine, Organisationen, Verbände, Stiftungen und Fonds » , Ph.D. thesis, University of Vienna (1996) ; and : « Vereine im Nationalsozialismus. Vermögensentzug durch den Stillhaltekommissar für Vereine, Organisationen und Verbände und Aspekte der Restitution in Österreich nach 1945. » , edited by Verena Pawlowsky / Edith Leisch-Prost / Christian Klösch, Vienna and Munich (2004) .

(3) For more details, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 133-138.

(4) Rothkappl. « Zerschlagung » , page 28.

(5) Rothkappl. « Zerschlagung » , page 1.

(6) Rothkappl. « Zerschlagung » , page 52.

(7) Rothkappl. « Zerschlagung » , page 52.

(8) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, 04, « Bürckel » / Materie, 2420 Katalog 160, Nr. 56. (The « Stillhaltekommissar » reported directly to Bürckel and was obviously less concerned with deciding vital matters than with executing decisions that were made elsewhere.)

(9) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, 04, « Bürckel » / Materie, 2420 Katalog 160, Nr. 56. All 4 concerts were approved. ÖStA, AdR, 04, « Bürckel » / Materie, 2420, Katalog 160, Nr. 55.

(10) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, Reichsstatthalterei III, Box 7683, Zl. 202.816/38.

(11) See : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 468.

(12) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, Reichsstatthalterei III, Box 7681, Zl. 201.666/38.

(13) For a detailed discussion of the financial debates concerning the Berlin Philharmonic, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 147-163.

(14) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR / Gruppe 04, « Bürckel » / Materie, 161/2425-5.

(15) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR / Gruppe 04, « Bürckel » / Materie, 161/2425-5.

(16) Letter from Gæbbels to Jerger (22 December 1939) . « Österreichisches Staatsarchiv » , AVA / Unterricht / Sign. 15 : Katalog 161, 2425/5 (Wiener Philharmoniker) .

(17) Statutes of the Association « Wiener Philharmoniker » (1940) , § V. « Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv » , Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : « Gelöschte Vereine » (Liquidated associations) , 4602/21.

(18) Statutes of the Association « Wiener Philharmoniker » (1940) , § VI. e) « Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv » , Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : « Gelöschte Vereine » (Liquidated associations) , 4602/21.

(19) Statutes of the Association « Wiener Philharmoniker » (1940) , § IX. « Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv » , Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : « Gelöschte Vereine » (Liquidated associations) , 4602/21.

(20) Statutes of the Association « Wiener Philharmoniker » (1940) , § XI. « Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv » , Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : « Gelöschte Vereine » (Liquidated associations) , 4602/21.

(21) Statutes of the Association « Wiener Philharmoniker » (1940) , § III. « Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv » , Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : « Gelöschte Vereine » (Liquidated associations) , 4602/21.

(22) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, BKA / RStiÖ III, Katalog 7681, Zl. 201.666/38.

(23) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, BKA / RStiÖ III, Katalog 7681, Zl. 201.666/38.

(24) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, BKA / RStiÖ III, Box 7681, Zl. 202.666/1938.

(25) Protokolle KS (21 October 1939) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030 : Protokolle 1938-1944, page 7.

(26) Protokolle KS (6 September 1941) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030 : Protokolle 1938-1944, page 26.

(27) Protokolle KS (26 March 1941) and Protokolle KS (6 September 1941) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030 : Protokolle 1938-1944, pages 24 and 26.

(28) ÖStA (Austrian State Archive) , AdR, BKA / RStiÖ III, Box 7681, Zl. 202.666/1938.

(29) For the background, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 305-306.

(30) Protokolle KS (3 April 1943) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030 : Protokolle 1938-1944, page 41.

(31) Protokolle OHV (14 January 1943) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030 : Protokolle 1938-1944, page 37.

(32) Short-hand minutes, meeting of the Advisory Board of the « Kulturamt der Stadt Wien » (17 June 1939) . WSL, Ratsherren, B4, Sitzungsniederschriften ; Tagesordnungen, Verhandlungsschriften aus dem Bereich des Kulturamts 1939-1945.

(33) Zu den Hintergründen der Entlassung vergleiche : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 169 ff.

(34) Buch « Vereinsmitglieder » , G Nr. 162. HAWPh, Depot Staatsoper. Der Kontakt Wolframs zu den Wiener Philharmonikern dürfte über rein berufliche Beziehungen deutlich hinausgegangen sein. In einer politischen Beurteilung der « Gestapo » zuhanden der Gauleitung Vienna vom 21. Februar 1941 heißt es : « Besonders engen Kontakt hat Wolfram. Mit den Vienna ern Philharmonikern (sic) . » ÖStA, Gauakt Wolfram, Nr. 312.291.

(35) Protokolle KS, 6. Mai 1940. HAWPh, A-Pr-30.

(36) Zu Wolframs NSDAP-Biographie vergleiche : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 169-170.

Increased References to Vienna in the Vienna Philharmonic's Media Presence under the National-Socialist Regime

(Fritz Trümpi)

The Vienna Philharmonic has always had a multi-faceted media presence. It remained at a steady high under the National-Socialist regime. Media attention for the Vienna Philharmonic peaked around the « Centennial Celebrations » , in 1942. For that occasion, Baldur von Schirach granted the Orchestra a monopolist position in the Viennese music scene, which he achieved by simply banning all other Orchestra and major soloist performances during the Philharmonic's anniversary celebrations (1) : the Orchestra was the subject of many articles in newspapers, magazines and books, and was widely referenced in speeches and commemorative publications, even in novels. In addition, the Vienna Philharmonic's anniversary also inspired a film project : in early 1943, Willi Seibert, the former « advertising director » of the Berlin Philharmonic, approached the Vienna Philharmonic with a science-fiction themed movie project about the Orchestra. However, this project never came to fruition, while a feature film about the Berlin Philharmonic was produced at the same time and was shown at German movie theatres, before the War even ended. (2)

The main attributes that authors from widely different backgrounds ascribed to the Vienna Philharmonic were usually inspired by « national » sentiments and notions of « blood and land » . References to Vienna, the « City of Music » , were ubiquitous, but the Orchestra was rarely characterized as being directly linked to the German « Reich » .

The main attributes that different media outlets used to describe the Vienna Philharmonic on the occasion of the Orchestra's « Centennial Celebrations » , in 1942, (3) often relied on an unequivocal language inspired by notions of « blood and land » . (4) This paper will present an exemplary analysis of said attributes. For instance, the conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, during his speech on the occasion of the Orchestra's anniversary, described the Philharmonic as « representatives of the entire German territory » and addressed its « uniform national composition » , which made « the Vienna Philharmonic the model of a true “ People's Orchestra ” in every sense of the word » . (5)

Aurel Wolfram, a National-Socialist official and journalist who was one of the most devoted Philharmonic propagandists, between 1938 and 1945, was also partial to this line of thinking. In his article for the Philharmonic's commemorative publication dedicated to the Philharmonic's anniversary, he used a « race-oriented » approach to describe the Orchestra's special features, stating that he wanted to « analyze the prerequisites that allowed this one-of-a-kind Orchestra to exist and to flourish, all the more because the powers of blood and land have such decisive relevance, especially in our time » . (6) However, Aurel Wolfram subsequently abandoned his « race-oriented » line of thinking in favour of attributes associated with the ethereal and the sacred. In this sense, he highlighted that the Vienna Philharmonic were « not fighters, conquerors, pioneers on uncharted musical territory, but priests and hierophants, preservers of the best-kept secrets of great music-making » . According to Wolfram, the Vienna Philharmonic reached this status by « preserving a unique sound, which is equivalent to the spiritual substratum of music » , which they considered to be superior to « the Mastery of technique » . (7)

Considering that Furtwängler was one of the Philharmonic's main conductors, it is quite striking that his anniversary remarks clearly echo Aurel Wolfram's analysis regarding the Orchestra's relationship to « technique » . Wilhelm Furtwängler also interpreted the Philharmonic's sound as a « natural product » that could certainly not be created « by way of technical drills » . According to him, neither « the instruments » nor « the instruction » or « the skills » set the Vienna Philharmonic apart from other Orchestras. (8) He postulated that it was not primarily its musical expertise that earned the Philharmonic its « extraordinary position » , but rather the fact that it was a « purely Viennese Orchestra » , a « group of high-profile virtuosos » , all of them « sons of one land, of one city » . (9) With this description, Wilhelm Furtwängler acknowledged the Vienna Philharmonic not as representatives of the « Reich » (this position was reserved for the Berlin Philharmonic) , but as representatives of a part of Germany's territory : Vienna.

The Vienna Philharmonic used strikingly similar language to the one used by Aurel Wolfram and Wilhelm Furtwängler when describing itself to the public at large. This is evidenced by a brief Orchestra monograph published by Wilhelm Jerger, the Orchestra's executive director, on the occasion of the 1942 Anniversary. (10) He too views the Philharmonic as a unit and emphasizes the « intimate connection » that « grew from this gifted soil » . (11) Wilhelm Jerger takes the Vienna references one step further than Aurel Wolfram and Wilhelm Furtwängler. He went so far as to define the connection to « German art » as inherently Viennese :

« The Philharmonic will remain and will have to remain the most extraordinary ambassador of this city's world standing. Its liveliness and determination makes it both keeper and preserver of the major heritage of the truest German art. » (12)

He postulates that the Philharmonic played an important part in Vienna's ascent to « world capital of music ». Also, he believes that « the city of Vienna was always loyal and devoted to its Philharmonic - and it still is ». (13) Even in the 1st sentence of the commemorative publication, Wilhelm Jerger writes :

« In its artistic relevance, the Vienna Philharmonic, along with other local musical institutions, embodies the essence of Vienna, the “ City of Music ” ». (14)

Even though the aforementioned Orchestra descriptions come from a wide variety of sources, their most striking common denominator is the unmistakably strong connection between the Orchestra and the city of Vienna. As a matter of fact, the topos of the Philharmonic and the « City of Music » intensified after 1938. The reasons behind this intensification are multi-faceted and will be addressed elsewhere. (15)

Strikingly enough, it was Baldur von Schirach, the Viennese « Gauleiter » and « Reich » governor, who, in his speech on the occasion of the Orchestra's anniversary, clearly diverged from the traditional interpretation of the Vienna Philharmonic. Unlike the descriptions provided by Furtwängler, Wolfram and Jerger, Baldur von Schirach makes few or no references to Vienna or the « City of Music ». It seems that he used the occasion to express his general views on music and music policy by lecturing about the practice of music of the « German people », the relationship between « light » and « serious » music and the opportunities and risks of the technical reproduction of music. He only mentioned the Orchestra itself towards the end of his speech and praised the Philharmonic with a few words. His references to Vienna were few and far between. However, Baldur von Schirach explicitly established a direct connection between the Orchestra and the « Reich », which is a highly-unusual event in the Philharmonic's media presence, between 1938 and 1945 :

« In the Great German “ Reich ” of music, there were no eternal names that were not related to its history. They served the “ Reich ” wherever they played. » (16)

It is safe to assume that Baldur von Schirach deliberately used the occasion of the Philharmonic's anniversary to modify his usual politico-cultural approach, at least verbally. As a matter of fact, his previous speeches that addressed the Philharmonic included the usual patterns of interpretation that were inherently intertwined with the « City of Music ». (17)

However, beginning in 1941, Josef Gœbbels, the Minister of Propaganda, became increasingly critical of Baldur von Schirach's cultural policy, even though he was torn between suspicion and envious acknowledgment. (18) A mere 2 weeks before Baldur von Schirach's above-mentioned Philharmonic speech, on March 15, 1942, Josef Gœbbels wrote in his diary that Baldur von Schirach would « now show greater restraint and do his very best to create the highest-possible maximum consistency between Viennese cultural policy and the “ Reich ” 's cultural policy ». (19) It was probably against this background that Baldur von Schirach decided to focus his Philharmonic speech on the « Reich » as much as possible. However, that did not help matters much. Josef Gœbbels was irritated that Baldur von Schirach had, in his speech, once again interfered with the direction of German cultural policy. He, Josef Goebbels, would make sure that such remarks would come to an end. (20) This example vividly illustrates that the Vienna Philharmonic's image, as presented by the media, had underpinnings in actual politics. Sometimes, high-ranking decision-makers of the National-Socialist propaganda apparatus made modification attempts on short notice.

An unambiguous memo written by Walter Thomas, Baldur von Schirach's cultural advisor, proves that the Philharmonic was aware of the persisting conflict between Josef Goebbels and Baldur von Schirach. (21)

In « Eine Schicksalssymphonie » (A Symphony of Fate) , an epic Viennese family novel by Friedrich Schreyvogel published in 1941, the Vienna Philharmonic is presented as deeply intertwined with Vienna. (22) Fictional Philharmonic-related episodes abound in this chronologically narrated story that starts in the late- 19th Century and ends after World War I. These episodes re-inforce the « City of Music » ambience, presented against the background of a technology and progress-averse and anticapitalist « old Vienna » scenery. Especially, the passages about the relationship between music and War are worth mentioning, for they are clearly related to War-specific cultural propaganda. Even though Friedrich Schreyvogel had set his story during World War I, it is apparent that he also had World War II in mind. His thoughts about the heroic relationship between music and War legitimize the entertainment program targeted at soldiers and workers implemented by the « Wehrmacht » via the « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF) organizations.

One of the novel's characters, Kronawetter, is a cellist with the Philharmonic and does not oppose the Orchestra's participation in the War:

« If they will have us, we will go all the way to the front. » (23)

Author Schreyvogel creates a connection between the activities of musicians and soldiers :

« Musicians are fearless. Those who have understood the simplest of counterpoints will know that nothing in this world is achieved without a fight. » (24)

The author lets his Philharmonic cellist describe the relevance of music for War as follows :

« Those who grasp the meaning of a Beethoven Symphony will eventually be better soldiers, I swear ! » (25)

In this sentence, the author's intention of exploiting music for War through the Philharmonic becomes apparent. Baldur von Schirach, in his speech on the occasion of the « Mozart week of the German “ Reich ” » , in 1941, (26) claimed that Mozart is an inherent part of the strength that allows Germans to fight wars in the 1st place. (27) This idea is consistent with Friedrich Schreyvogel's statement that those who understand Beethoven are better soldiers. Against that background, it can be said that, by weaving the Vienna Philharmonic into his story, the author successfully re-activated the « City of Music » topos hitherto focused on the past. His novel (which was republished in 1944 and 1952) also contributed to the National-Socialist War propaganda via the Vienna Philharmonic. (28)

Notes

- (1) This regulation was issued upon request of the Orchestra. On April 3, 1941, Walter Thomas, who was Baldur von Schirach's « cultural advisor », addressed Franz Schütz, the president of « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde », to confirm that « no other large music performances may take place as they could interfere with the Centennial celebrations and, adversely, affect the Philharmonic ». Archive of « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde », documents of association 1940-1941, Exhibit No. 34. Quoted in : Trümpi. « Orchester », page 198.
- (2) See : Trümpi. « Orchester », pages 225-231 about the Vienna Philharmonic film project and the « Philharmonic » feature film.
- (3) See : Trümpi. « Orchester », pages 192-200, for a detailed analysis of the Centennial celebrations.
- (4) See : Cornelia Schmitz-Berning. « Vokabular des Nationalsozialismus », Berlin / New York (2000) [1998], page 110 ff, for the general relevance of the « blood and land » figure of speech under the National-Socialist regime.
- (5) Wilhelm Furtwängler. « Die Wiener Philharmoniker. Rede anlässlich ihrer Hundertjahrfeier 1942 », in : Wilhelm Furtwängler. « Ton und Wort. Aufsätze und Vorträge 1918 bis 1954 », Wiesbaden (1982), page 175-183 - quote on page 179.
- (6) Aurel Wolfram. « Wien und die Philharmoniker », in : « Wiener Philharmoniker 1842-1942 », edited by the « Wiener Philharmoniker », Wien-Leipzig (1942), page 28.
- (7) Wolfram. « Wien », page 44 f ; see : Trümpi. « Orchester », page 201ff, for a detailed analysis of these attributes and references to major differences in the media presentation of the Berlin Philharmonic.
- (8) Furtwängler. « Philharmoniker », page 178.
- (9) Furtwängler. « Philharmoniker », page 178.
- (10) Wilhelm Jerger. « Die Wiener Philharmoniker. Erbe und Sendung. », Vienna (1942) .
- (11) Jerger. « Philharmoniker », page 9.
- (12) Jerger. « Philharmoniker », page 12.
- (13) Jerger. « Philharmoniker », page 45.
- (14) Jerger. « Philharmoniker », page 9.
- (15) See : Fritz Trümpi. « Programmpolitik im Nationalsozialismus » .
- (16) « Rede des Reichsleiters von Schirach am 28. März 1942 anlässlich der Hundertjahrfeier der Wiener Philharmoniker. » Unpublished manuscript. ÖStA (Austrian State Archive), 04 AdR, Katalog 49a, No. 258, page 8.

(17) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 221 f.

(18) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 163-179, for information about the pronounced rivalry between Gæbbels and Schirach regarding cultural policy.

(19) « Die Tagebücher von Josef Gæbbels. Teil II, Diktate 1941-1945 » , Volume 3, edited by Elke Fröhlich, Munich / New Providence / London / Paris (1996) , page 474.

(20) « Die Tagebücher von Josef Gæbbels. Teil II, Diktate 1941-1945 » , Volume 3, edited by Elke Fröhlich, Munich / New Providence / London / Paris (1995) , page 65 - entry dated April 8, 1942.

(21) Memo by Walther Thomas, cultural advisor, for his superior Müller (15 March 1943) , unregistered document.

(22) Friedrich Schreyvogel. « Eine Schicksalssymphonie. Roman der Wiener Jahrhundertwende. » , Berlin (1941) .

(23) Schreyvogel. « Schicksalssymphonie » , page 443.

(24) Schreyvogel. « Schicksalssymphonie » , page 443.

(25) Schreyvogel. « Schicksalssymphonie » , page 443.

(26) Baldur von Schirach. « Rede zur Eröffnung der Mozartwoche 1941 » , Weimar (1943) .

(27) Baldur von Schirach. « Rede zur Eröffnung der Mozartwoche 1941 » , Weimar (1943) , page 8.

(28) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 223 ff.

The Repertoire of the Vienna Philharmonic in the Nazi Era

(Fritz Trümpi)

The Vienna Philharmonic's concert performance during National-Socialism was marked by a high-degree of continuity in terms of its repertoire - but only concerning the subscription concerts.

...

The programming of the Vienna Philharmonic was traditionally oriented less towards unknown novelties and more towards already established and canonized works and composers - also, according to their self-definition. Already, the « founding decree » of the « Philharmonic concerts » , in 1842, records that the concerts would « only bring Classical and interesting works » . (1) And Clemens Hellberg notes the « most careful selection of the works to be performed » as an essential element of the « Philharmonic idea » . (2) In plain terms, this meant since the end of the 19th Century : little contemporary music and only exceptionally works of low-profile. In 1939, the Vienna Philharmonic, furthermore, officially set this out in writing in their new association rules :

« The purpose of the association is to foster orchestral music in highest-perfection. Classical music is to be especially considered. » (3) (See, also : « An Association Based on National-Socialist Principles » .) The Vienna Philharmonic's concert performance during National-Socialism, thus, is marked by a high-degree of continuity in terms of its repertoire - but only concerning the subscription concerts. This distinction between subscription concerts and other concert and performance forms is central with a view to National-Socialist cultural policy, because a multitude of concert forms was introduced in National-Socialism with which the Vienna Philharmonic were only slightly familiar, if not at all unfamiliar, before 1938 : « KdF » -events (« Kraft durch Freude » : i.e. , Strength through joy) , for example, but also « Wehrmacht » and factory concerts as well as radio broadcasting concerts or sound film recordings, which occasionally entailed significant deviations from the traditional repertoire.

Concerning 1st of all the subscription concerts, the previously mentioned standing rule of 1939 (the purpose of the association being to foster orchestral music in its highest-perfection, under special consideration of Classical music) can, on an empirical level, be largely verified : a significant change after 1938 in the general repertoire of this form of concert is not ascertained. (4) Already before 1938, the Vienna Philharmonic would, in their evening concerts, only sporadically perform music of composers extensively prohibited in National-Socialism, such as Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy or Gustav Mahler. (5)

Also, the variously mentioned medial consolidation of the Orchestra's relationship to Vienna is not reflected in the repertoire : an increased « Austrification » of the repertoire is not found in the Vienna Philharmonic's traditional subscription concerts - just as little, by the way, as an increase of the rate of « Reich » German composers after the « annexation » . The traditionally minor presence of Robert Schumann Symphonies did not change even after 1938, (6) even though Schumann was increasingly received in National-Socialism on the whole. (7) Nevertheless, there selectively are some noticeable changes in the repertoire, also concerning the subscription concerts. One item on the programme that underwent considerable extension was the works of Bruckner. In this manifests not primarily a relationship to Vienna or Austria, rather this fact may be read as the consequence of a generally forced reception of the composer in National-Socialism (a similar increase in Bruckner's works can be observed in the repertoire of the Berlin Philharmonic since 1933) . (8) It may also be supposed that the Catholic-National attitude of the Nazi chairman Wilhelm Jerger was jointly responsible for this increase in the Vienna Philharmonic's reception of Bruckner. Additionally remarkable is the considerably increased presence of Richard Wagner's music since the « annexation » . This is due to the great and politically connoted popularity of the composer in the Nazi State (9) and starts immediately following the « annexation » : the rate of Wagner works on the programme in the subscription programme after 1938 doubles from barely 5 % before 1938. (10) In this respect, the concert repertoire of the Vienna Philharmonic is in conflict with the presence of Wagner's works on German Opera stages. (11)

Much more severe, as in the case of the subscription concerts, was the change in repertoire in the other concerts of the Orchestra ; these constituted the main part of its activity outside of the performance of Operas and often stood in close relation to the Nazi propaganda, in direct or indirect ways. (12) Especially to be emphasized here are those concerts which the Philharmonic recorded for the broadcasting corporation or, at least, those that were broadcast : the formation of the Orchestra as a decidedly Viennese one is for the main part associated with this broadcasting presence in National-Socialism. (13) The Vienna Philharmonic were quasi-contractually obliged to broadcast a « Viennese note » . One of the main protagonists of this Richard Strauß renaissance would have likely been the conductor Clemens Krauß. (14) He informed the Vienna Philharmonic, in January 1940, that the Broadcasting Corporation Administration had, for the coming season, given the green light for a broadcast of « 4 evening concerts of the Vienna Philharmonic under Clemens Krauß » and, at the same time, he stressed :

« In order to give the events a pronounced Viennese character, the soloists should preferably be selected from the circle of the Orchestra or, at least, from the circle of artists emerging from the Vienna school. » (15)

Building on Krauß' academies, the Orchestra was presented with, yet, another chance for broadcasting production. A report, from October 1940, records the plan « to produce “ Schwarzplatten ” recordings of Viennese music for the Greater German Broadcasting, predominantly of course the works of Johann Strauß, with a conductor especially mastered in the Viennese note. The conductor Wacek could be won as conductor for the recording of these gramophone records who, despite his age, is still very agile and, without a doubt, the best conductor for this kind of music. » (16)

The resonance of this « Viennese note » can be assessed from the « situation reports of the Security Service of the SS » , writings of an informant enterprise that, with dubious methods, attempted to identify different moods in the population. According to these reports, the Berlin Philharmonic were ahead by more than a nose in the reception of symphonic works, (17) whereas only the Vienna Philharmonic came into question for works of the Strauß dynasty :

« Especially, the broadcast of the concert of the Vienna Philharmonic, on August 6, was received with special appreciation by all in the audience. The music-experts were delighted about the exceptional rendering of the played works (especially, the “ Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald ”) which, otherwise, were run through rather like pop-songs, and the general audience approved of the selection of simple melodies (such as Kiel) . » (18)

With music of the Strauß family, the Broadcasting Corporation reached the « experts » as well as the general audience. This audience was fond of melodies as such, the experts however especially of its precise rendering by one of Germany's finest Orchestras, which allegedly emancipated Strauß' works of their entertaining nature and brought them in proximity of « Viennese Classical Music » . « Popular Music » , thus, through the Vienna Philharmonic became socially acceptable also with the « experts » . (19)

The fact that, during National-Socialism, the works of Johann and Josef Strauß found increased entrance into the concert programme of the Vienna Philharmonic is not only attested in reference to the broadcasting concerts, but also on the whole : in the last year of War, 1944-1945, the works of the Strauß dynasty amounted to about 50 % of the entire repertoire outside of the subscription concerts. (20) This was part of the political calculations of the National-Socialists. After all, even Josef Gœbbels was convinced that Vienna had to, again, become « a city of culture, of optimism, of music and sociability » . (21) In this context is also to be located the establishment and the sustained success of the New Year's concert. (See also : « From the Johann Strauß Concert in 1939 to the New Year's Concert in 1946 » .) The fact that explicit resentment was repeatedly voiced against this development of the repertoire from within the Orchestra (22) indicates that this truly represented a radical change in the programming of the Orchestra, but the conservative line of the subscription concerts could only be politically and financially sustained by an opening of the Vienna Philharmonic to the musical entertainment sector - and this was a clearly changed situation for the Orchestra. The Strauß waltzes were especially qualified for this task, because they allowed to be as easily linked to the topos of the « music city » as to the myth of « Old Vienna », which was likewise forced by National-Socialism of Viennese character ; thereby, the dominating position of the Orchestra in the municipal enterprise of « high-culture » was, in no way, compromised.

The same is true for the Vienna Philharmonic's intense participation in sound film recordings, which, just like the waltz-renaissance, was in service of the past-oriented image campaign of the city. (23) These sound film recordings, which had already been maintained by the Orchestra during « Austrofascism », again meant a repeated opening of the Orchestra to the entertainment sector, which did not remain unopposed - and this resistance was put-up even by the orchestral chairman :

« Straßer advocates a rejection by all means of all sound film recordings and insignificant concerts on the basis of artistic reasons and due to work overload. Chairman Jerger aligns himself with Straßer's view. » (24)

Encouragement for the sound film recordings, however, came from the committee. General Manager Jelinek disagreed with Straßer's opinion and pointed-out « that also church music, trumpet choir events or the like very often are inartistic, and the works of private assemblies such as string quartets and wind player assemblies also contribute to work overload. The only difference is that, with sound film work and smaller concert events, the whole Orchestra has a financial profit, whereas with string quartets and similar assemblies only a selected few are financially involved. After all (to be honest with you) , we did not only choose to become musicians to be artists exclusively, but also to be able to make money with it, such as all the other men also do. We know from experience that the greatest artists are also the greatest users. » (25) The discussion about the continuation of sound film recordings was postponed.

While the Orchestra frequently declined requests for waltzes and sound film recordings, but then most often reluctantly executed these orders, it was wilfully obstructive towards requests for a more frequent performance of contemporary music. Schirach's general cultural adviser, Walter Thomas, requested the Orchestra, in 1942, to incorporate contemporary works into the subscription concerts, but the committee promptly refused. The task of the subscription concerts would not consist in « promoting contemporaries, but to perform the greatest and most beautiful complete orchestral literature in its most accomplished form. It would amount to a breach in the Philharmonic tradition and a decline in class if contemporaries would have their say in the Philharmonic subscription concerts. » (26) At the same time, probably due to political reasons, some accommodation was signalled :

« In order not to be completely unapproachable to Gen. Ref. [Thomas] , it has been decided to conduct 3 extraordinary concerts with mainly contemporary works in the programme. » (27)

Beginning in 1943, then, single items with contemporary works are found on the programme for extraordinary concerts, like a dance suite of Paul Constantinescu, or Maurice Ravel's « Boléro », but also Hans Pfitzner's « Palestrina » prelude, or orchestral variations by Zoltán Kodály. The demand for more contemporary music in the programmes of the Vienna Philharmonic obviously proceeded directly from Schirach : in May 1942, he acted as the organizer of a « Week of Contemporary Music » , to which also the Vienna Philharmonic was obliged. Wilhelm Jerger, the chairman of the Orchestra, made use of Schirach's open-minded attitude towards contemporary music and, occasionally, made the Philharmonic perform his own works, which the Orchestra had partly also recorded for the Broadcast Corporation. (28) In the subscription concerts, however, the Vienna Philharmonic continued to largely keep away from contemporary music.

This example of the dealings with requests for more contemporary music shows the considerable scope of action that the Vienna Philharmonic managed to retain even during National-Socialism. In politically sensitive cases, however, the Orchestra in its programming made efforts at accommodation towards the Nazi regime. For example, the committee, on January 4, 1943, decided « due to considerations of the State Police » to decline a requested composition evening with works of Raimund Weissensteiner : Weissensteiner was chaplain and professor at the Vienna College of Music and, in 1938, received a warning « because of utterances hostile to the “ Reich ” » . He was arrested and sentenced to 3 years of prison only a short while after the committee had decided to decline a performance of his works. (29) In another example, the repertoire decision of the committee is directed against a member of the Philharmonic themselves : Richard Krotschak. Krotschak, solo cellist of the Orchestra since 1934, was married to a Jewish woman and could remain in the Orchestra only on basis of a « special permit » . Despite his numerous activities also during National-Socialism as a soloist in and with the Orchestra, Jerger went back on him with an anti-Semitic tirade :

« At this point, the chairman Jerger opposes the performance of Brahms's Double Concerto because of Krotschak's kin-relation (“ Versippung ”) . » (30)

About 1 year later though, the committee, at short notice, resorted to his skills as a soloist for Brahms's Double Concerto, as evident from a request of the committee as well as a « thank you » letter - the designated soloist in a Piano Concerto, Alfred Cortot, had cancelled due to illness. (31)

The maintenance of these privileges certainly had its price, especially in the case of the so-called « UK-Stellung » , which saved the Philharmonic from being called into the « Wehrmacht » , and which Schirach had secured for the Orchestra since his assumption of office as regional leader and « Reich » governor in Vienna, in August 1940. (32) On the one side, the Orchestra (with more or less enthusiasm) , at irregular intervals, complimentary played music in Schirach's villa, in Döbling, at the « Hohe Warte » and in the « Hofburg » ; (33) on the other side, the maintenance of the diverse privileges was also connected to performing « Wehrmacht » and factory concerts (« Werkskonzert ») . Sense and purpose of these « Wehrmacht » concerts was to offer amusement to the soldiers and to brand them with « German cultural assets » , whereby the aspect of national representation in these concerts becomes clearly manifest. (34) The Vienna Philharmonic performed about 20 concerts for members of the « Wehrmacht » and, in one case, « in the context of troop entertainment of the “ Waffen-SS ” » . (35) With reference to the programme, a clear dominance of works of the Strauß dynasty is confirmed also in these concerts and, in addition Mozart, Schubert and Wagner were played (proportionally, in this order) . (36) Most of these concerts were held in Vienna, only rarely did the Orchestra travel to the soldiers - still, in March 1945 for example, there was a « soldier concert » in the « SS-barracks Glasenbach » . (37) While major general Paul Winter, in a heroic article on « The cultivation of music in the Wehrmacht » , (38) comments upon the musical « troop entertainment » and holds that the Vienna Philharmonic « spare no effort and danger to provide the whole wealth of music to our soldiers, from Murmansk to Africa, from the Atlantic Coast to deep into the East, in hours of relaxation and concentration » , this statement cannot be confirmed in face of their obvious avoidance of War zones. Less numerous were the factory concerts of the Vienna Philharmonic : 1st in 1943, they performed 3 and, from September 1944 to the end of War, 9 more - in total, they thus performed a dozen factory concerts during National-Socialism. (39) Next to aspects of entertainment and the representation of « German music creation » , their aim must have been not least the sublimation of defence production as such : the presence of the elite of « German » representational arts in the factory hall meant for the German War production, as it were, a consecration by the « German Arts » , which took place in front of the eyes and ears of the « German people's community » . (40)

Travel concerts abroad were also relatively rare for the Vienna Philharmonic during National-Socialism : after 1938, these were in sharp decline, (41) while orchestral trips to Germany were still relatively numerous. This decline in concerts abroad is due to the fact that the external musical representation was provided mainly by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. (42) The relatively frequent performances in Germany, however, manifest as the urge to represent the newly-created « Ostmark » respectively Vienna within the new State structure and, in addition, to secure a most favourable position in the German music enterprise. (43) There were, however, still a few trips abroad which exhibited a highly-propagandistic nature and which were received in coverage, less in a Viennese and much more in a Reich-context. For example, in the case of both concerts in Kraków, in December 1939, on occasion of the « re-opening » of the « German Theatre » and, in April 1940, on occasion of the « Birthday of the “ Führer ” » . On the occasion of the « re-opening » of the « German Theatre » , the « Governor General » , Hans Frank, personally invited the Orchestra. His speech, at the opening of the « German Theatre » , was, at the same time, a Nazi laudation on the Vienna Philharmonic. Frank stressed that they were « the representatives of this glorious, indestructible, 1,000 year old cultural asset of German artistic production, artistic work and German artistic reproduction » . (44) It should not have been a coincidence that it was the Vienna Philharmonic who were selected to represent German « high-culture » in the occupied Kraków - Vienna was the former central authority of the « Kingdom Galicia and Lodomeria » , to which belonged also the « Duchy Kraków » . Frank proclaimed in his speech that « the Polish here was but a historical attempt of forgery » . He also directly stated what the Polish and Jewish population had to expect of this « German town » :

« We will strive, for justice of effort, to again raise the German character of this town. Soldiers live here who carry still their wounds from the battles in Poland, and these will be your guests tonight. Men live here, who strive to bring German order into this area, placed alone in their position, facing thousands of difficulties in life and office, dependent on their vigour ; these will today be delighted by you ; and here, in and around us, also live the spirits of the Germans who had here formerly worked. » (45)

The opening concert, thus, must be viewed as a musical prelude to the persecution and murder of thousands and thousands of people, the key-word of which is delivered in the head-line to the opening ceremony in the « Krakauer Nachrichten » :

« Kraków, again, German cultural centre. » (46)

During National-Socialism, the Vienna Philharmonic, in all, also strengthened their already close relationship to Vienna, in terms of the programme - but this is not to be read as an act of resistance against the German supremacy, as long-term attempts at representation on behalf of the Orchestra itself would have wanted to make us believe. The repeatedly increased enrolment of the Philharmonic in the top of the « Music city Vienna », since 1938, served to establish the consolidation of Nazi rule in Vienna. According to the situation's demand, the Orchestra, as well as political entities, were readily willing to temporarily drop the Vienna reference in favour of a « Reich » context, as has been exemplarily demonstrated by the Philharmonic's Kraków concerts. In light of the highly-diverse concert practice and the flexible programming during National-Socialism, multiple connections between the Philharmonic and political entities may be recognized which, never before in the history of the Orchestra, were as numerous as during the time between 1938 and 1945.

Notes

(1) Cited in : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 22.

(2) Cited in : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 24.

(3) « Der Zweck des Vereines ist die Pflege der Orchestermusik in höchster Vollendung. Die klassische Musik soll besonders berücksichtigt werden. » Satzung des Vereins Wiener Philharmoniker. Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv, Vereinsakt, Musik Abteilung 119, A 32 : Gelöschte Vereine, Seiten 4602-4621.

(4) For details, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 233-249. Concerning the entire repertoire of the Vienna Philharmonicists, see the electronic database of the Orchestra itself, in the historical archives of the Vienna Philharmonicists.

(5) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 242 f.

(6) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 319 f.

(7) See, for example : Helmut Loos. « Schumann-Rezeption im “ Dritten Reich ” » , in : « Musik in Diktaturen des 20. Jahrhunderts. Tagungsband zum Internationalen Symposium an der Bergischen Universität Wuppertal. (28. - 29. Februar 2004) » , edited by Michæla G. Grochulski, Oliver Kautny, Helmke Jan Keden, Wiesbaden (2006) , pages 57-70.

(8) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 235. Concerning the Bruckner reception in the Nazi era, see, for example : Albrecht Dümling. « Der deutsche Michel erwacht. Zur Bruckner-Rezeption im NS-Staat » , in : « Bruckner-Probleme. Beiheft zum Archiv für Musikwissenschaft » , Volume XLV, same editors, Stuttgart (1999) , pages 20-214.

(9) A statistical survey of the American cultural scientist David B. Dennis revealed that, in National-Socialism, Richard Wagner was not only widely received in expert circles, but was also, by far, the composer mostly addressed in the media. Albrecht Dümling. « “ Honour Your German Masters. ” The Use and Abuse of “ Classical ” Composers in Nazi Propaganda. » , in : « Journal of Political & Military Sociology, 202 » , Volume 30, No. 2, pages 273-295 - here : page 276. Cited in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 235 f.

(10) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 321.

(11) Concerning the performance of the Operas of Wagner in National-Socialism, see, for example : Jens Malte Fischer. « Richard Wagner und seine Wirkung » , Wien (2013) , page 261 ff.

(12) An overview of the concerts with obvious propagandistic nature is found in : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 476 ff.

(13) Details in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 263-275.

(14) This may be assumed on the basis of the different grades of the presence of Strauß' works in the programme of the Vienna Philharmonists, since the years of the 1920's : these were tendentially higher in those years Krauß conducted the Orchestra, than in those phases in which Krauß did not conduct in Vienna. See, also : the chart on the Strauß repertoire of the Orchestra, between 1920 and 1945, in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 256.

(15) Krauß to Vienna Philharmonists (12 January 12 1940) . HAWPh, Korrespondenzmappen, K/51 - Clemens Krauß, page 6.

(16) « Protocol Vorstandsrat-Sitzung » (7 October 1940) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030 : Protokolle 1938-1944, page 17.

(17) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 274.

(18) « Meldungen aus dem Reich 1938-1945. Die geheimen Lageberichte des Sicherheitsdienstes der SS. » , Volume 5, No. 102 (4 July 1940) to No. 141 (14 November 1940) , edited by Heinz Boberach, Hesching (1984) - here : No. 115 (15 August 1940) , page 1472/II.

(19) Concerning the problem of the classification of the music of the Strauß dynasty, see : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 255 f.

(20) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 256.

(21) « Eine Stadt der Kultur, des Optimismus, der Musik und der Geselligkeit. » , « Die Tagebücher von Josef Goebbels » , Teil I, Aufzeichnungen 1924-1941, Band 4, München / New York / London / Paris (1987) , page 471 - entry of 19 January 1941.

(22) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 257 f.

(23) A selection of the film music recorded by the Vienna Philharmonists can be found in : Franz Bartolomey. « Was zählt, ist der Augenblick. » , in : « Die Bartolomeys. 120 Jahre an der Wiener Staatsoper. » , Wien (2012) , page 117.

(24) « Straßer tritt für unbedingte Ablehnung aller Tonfilmmusikaufnahmen und unbedeutender Konzerte aus künstlerischen Gründen und Arbeitsüberlastung ein. Vorstand Jerger schliesst sich der Anschauung Strassers an. » Protocol KS (2 September 1940) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030, page 16.

(25) « Daß auch Kirchenmusiken, Trompeterchorveranstaltungen und Ähnliches sehr oft unkünstlerisch sind und die Arbeiten der privaten Vereinigungen wie Streichquartette, Bläservereinigung, ebenso zur Arbeitsüberlastung beitragen und der Unterschied nur darin besteht, daß bei der Tonfilmarbeit und kleineren Konzertveranstaltungen das ganze Orchester einen finanziellen Nutzen hat, während bei den Streichquartetten und ähnlichen Vereinigungen nur ganz wenige finanziell beteiligt sind. Schliesslich sind wir (um ganz ehrlich zu sein) nicht nur Musiker geworden, um ausschließlich Künstler zu sein, sondern um damit auch Geld verdienen zu können, wie das ja alle anderen Herren auch tun. Wir wissen aus Erfahrung, daß gerade die grössten Künstler auch die grössten Geldwucherer sind. » Protocol KS (2 September 1940) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030, page 16.

(26) « Zeitgenossen zu fördern, sondern das Beste und Schönste der Gesamtorchesterliteratur in vollendetster Form zur Aufführung zu bringen. Es würde einen Bruch der philharmonischen Tradition und zugleich einen Niveauabstieg bedeuten, wenn in den philharmonischen Abonnement-Konzerten in erster Linie Zeitgenossen zu Worte kämen. » Protocol KS (10 September 1942) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030, page 33.

(27) « Um aber dem Gen. Ref. (Thomas) gegenüber nicht ganz abweisend zu sein, wird beschlossen, drei außerordentliche Konzerte mit hauptsächlich zeitgenössischen Werken im Programm zur Durchführung zu bringen. » Protocol KS (10 September 1942) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030, page 33.

(28) See : the programme-database in the historical archive of the Vienna Philharmonists.

(29) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 244.

(30) « Bei dieser Gelegenheit wird vom Vorstand Jerger gegen die Aufführung von Brahms' Doppelkonzert wegen Krottschaks Versippung Stellung genommen. » Protocol KS (11 July 1942) . HAWPh, A-Pr-030, page 32.

(31) Letter of the committee (Kainz) to Krottschak, from 8 October and 20 October 1943. Historical archive of the Vienna Philharmonists, « Depot Staatsoper » (Ordner 1) .

(32) Details in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 189-192.

(33) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 192 f.

(34) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 275 ff.

(35) « Im Rahmen der Truppenbetreuung der Waffen-SS » , see : Hellsberg. « Demokratie » , page 476 ff.

(36) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 279 f.

(37) An overview of the « Wehrmacht » concerts of the Vienna Philharmonicists, during National-Socialism, can be found in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 276.

(38) See, for example : Paul Winter. « Musikpflege in der Wehrmacht » , in : « Jahrbuch der deutschen Musik 1943. Im Auftrage der Abteilung Musik des Reichsministeriums für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda herausgegeben von Hellmuth von Hase. » , Leipzig / Berlin (undated) , pages 54-57 - here : page 57. Cited in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 276.

(39) According to the catalogue of the concert programme of the Vienna Philharmonicists. Cited in : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 283.

(40) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 283 f.

(41) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 298 f.

(42) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , pages 287-298.

(43) See : Trümpi. « Orchester » , page 298 f.

(44) « Die Repräsentanten dieses herrlichen unzerstörbaren 1.000jährigen Kulturgutes deutschen Kunstschaffens, deutschen Kunstwaltens und deutscher Kunstwiedergabe. » , in : « Krakauer Zeitung » (17-18 December 1939) , page 1.

(45) « Wir werden uns bemühen, um der Gerechtigkeit der Leistung willen den deutschen Charakter dieses Ortes wieder emporzusteigern. Hier leben Soldaten, die aus den Kämpfen in Polen noch ihre Wunden tragen, sie werden heute Ihre Gäste sein, hier leben die Männer, die sich bemühen, deutsche Ordnung in dieses Gebiet zu bringen, einsam auf ihre Positionen gestellt, tausend Schwierigkeiten des Lebens und Amtes gegenüber, nur auf ihre Tatkraft angewiesen ; sie werden heute durch Sie beglückt werden ; und hier leben in uns und um uns die Geister der Deutschen, die hier gewirkt haben. » , in : « Krakauer Zeitung » (17-18 December 1939) , page 1.

(46) « Krakau wieder deutsches Kulturzentrum » , in : « Krakauer Zeitung » (17-18 December 1939) , page 1.

From the Johann Strauß Concert in 1939 to the New Year's Concert in 1946

(Oliver Rathkolb)

One thing needs to be made quite clear from the outset : the tradition of New Year's concerts given by the Vienna Philharmonic with works by Johann Strauß, broadcast on the radio and later on television, dates back to the National-Socialist era. Such concerts were held on 31 December 1939 (a Johann Strauß Concert) , and on 1 January 1941 (the 2nd « Philharmonische Akademie ») . Both were jointly organized by the Vienna Philharmonic and the « Reich » Broadcasting Company, a cooperation that was to become the norm.

It is also obvious that concerts devoted to the works of the Straußes were already part of the repertoire of the Vienna Philharmonic, though they had not previously been given over the New Year period. A brief glance at the performance data bank in the Archive of the Vienna Philharmonic is enough to see that such concerts were already a firmly embedded tradition, promoted with particular vigour by the conductor Clemens Krauß. A check of the works performed at the « Johann Strauß Concert » and / or the New Year « Philharmonische Akademie », on 31 December 1939 and 1 January 1941, respectively, yields the following previous performances under the conductor Clemens Krauß. (1) The result is highly-significant, which is the reason why it is, here, reprinted in full :

« Annen-Polka » , Opus 117

26 June 1927 : Frankfurt am Main.

11 August 1929 : Salzburg.

3 August 1930 : Bad Gastein.

16 February 1931 : Vienna.

16 August 1931 : Salzburg.

« Egyptischer Marsch » , Opus 335

5 August 1932 : Salzburg.

« Geschichten aus dem Wienerwald » , Waltz, Opus 325

11 August 1929 : Salzburg.

3 August 1930 : Bad Gastein.

4 December 1930 : Brno.

5 December 1930 : Prague.

16 August 1931 : Salzburg.

7 May 1933 : Rome.

« Kaiser-Walzer » , Opus 437

5 August 1932 : Salzburg.

13 August 1933 : Salzburg.

« Leichtes Blut, Polka schnell » , Opus 319

11 August 1929 : Salzburg.

10 August 1930 : Salzburg.

16 February 1931 : Vienna.

16 August 1931 : Salzburg.

13 August 1933 : Salzburg.

« Morgenblätter » Waltz, Opus 279

11 August 1929 : Salzburg.

11 November 1929 : Vienna.

3 August 1931 : Salzburg.

16 February 1931 : Vienna.

5 August 1932 : Vienna.

Overture « Die Fledermaus »

27 June 1927 : Frankfurt am Main.

11 August 1929 : Salzburg.

3 August 1930 : Bad Gastein.

10 August 1930 : Salzburg.

4 December 1930 : Brno.

5 December 1930 : Prague.

16 February 1931 : Vienna.

16 August 1931 : Salzburg.

5 August 1932 : Salzburg.

6 May 1933 : Bologna.

7 May 1933 : Rome.

13 August 1933 : Salzburg.

« Perpetuum mobile, musikalischer Scherzo », Opus 257

27 June 1927 : Frankfurt am Main.

11 August 1929 : Salzburg.

3 August 1930 : Bad Gastein.

10 August 1930 : Salzburg.

4 December 1930 : Brno.

5 December 1930 : Prague.

16 February 1931 : Vienna.

16 August 1931 : Salzburg.

5 August 1932 : Salzburg.

7 May 1933 : Rome.

« Pizzicato-Polka »

10 August 1930 : Salzburg.

16 February 1931 : Vienna.

16 August 1931 : Salzburg.

5 August 1932 : Salzburg.

7 May 1933 : Rome.

13 August 1933 : Salzburg.

« Ritter Pázmán Csárdás », Opus 441

5 August 1932 : Salzburg.

13 August 1933 : Salzburg.

What is remarkable, here, is the clear rupture in the repertoire, between 1934 and 1938. It is to be accounted for by reference to the conflict between Clemens Krauß and the Vienna Philharmonic and Krauß's exodus as Opera director, from Vienna to Berlin. He was the driving force behind the Strauß concerts, before 1934 and after 1938.

In 2011, Fritz Trümpi (2) (and Clemens Hellsberg, in 1992) (3) expressed their belief that the conductor Clemens Krauß was the driving force behind the Johann Strauß concerts, from 1939-1941.

Trümpi :

« It is conceivable that the paternity of the idea lay with Clemens Krauß, who had been performing concerts consisting solely of works by Johann Strauß with the Vienna Philharmonic, since 1929. » (4)

This was the case, above all, at the Salzburg Festival. Contracts and correspondence with the « Reich » Broadcasting Company have recently discovered in a file, found in a basement-room housing the Vienna Philharmonic archive of sheet-music. These give substance both to this thesis and to 2 claims, for which only insufficient evidence had previously been identified : the initiative for the concerts and the negotiations came from Clemens Krauß and it was he who paved the way for the 1st talks with the « Reich » Broadcasting Company, in Berlin.

The unique position that the New Year's Concert may claim today as a global « music brand » was still a thing of the distant future during WWII. Clemens Krauß (and Wilhelm Jerger, after him) were primarily interested in a special cycle of a total of « 4 Philharmonische Akademien », as is evident from the contract dated 2 November 1940 (5) :

« 4 “ Philharmonische Akademien ” in the “ Großer Saal ” of the “ Musikverein ”, in Vienna, performed for the pan-German Broadcasting Company : 13 December ; 1 January (Johann Strauß Concert) ; 25 January and 15 March 1941 - conducted by “ Professor Clemens Krauß ”. »

The entertainment effect of « waltz-music », which detracted from the increasingly dispiriting effects of WWII, made it of course perfectly suited to be one of the many jigsaw pieces needed to bolster Nazi propaganda and, above all, to instantiate the Nazi broadcasting policy, which Berlin saw encompassing Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart as much as Franz Léhar and Johann Strauß. The review by the « Neuigkeits-Welt-Blatt » (3 January 1940) of the 1st Johann Strauß Concert illustrates this reception very clearly.

On top of this, Trümpi has described in detail, in his analysis of the Philharmonic repertoire, the resistance put-up by the Orchestra against this specific form of « Unterhaltungsmusik » (easy listening) , even though the Johann Strauß pieces provide a challenge to any Orchestra.

These concerts were, by no means, professions of allegiance to Austria - even though several contemporary witnesses, such as the late historian Fritz Fellner (6) and, most recently, former Ambassador Wolfgang Schallenberg have testified that they seemed that way to certain individual concert-goers, particularly towards the end of the War. The programme booklet for the 1st 4 broadcasts in this series from Vienna extols both the intended reach of the broadcasts and Strauß's contribution to « German music ». Much ideology was pinned to the music that, over time, evolved into the waltz, which was performed in « pubs on the outskirts of the city » and, as the Nazis claimed, had been an integral part of the « self-expression of the East Bavarian people standing guard in exposed advance posts at the border » .

It cannot be denied that music associated with the Straußes was harnessed to the Nazi ideology, despite Johann Strauß's partly Jewish descent - an inconvenient truth that Josef Gœbbels sought to conceal by falsifying the baptismal register in Vienna. The evidence for this is an entry in his diary that reveals the absurdity of his anti-Semitic racism :

« Some smart alec has found-out that Johann Strauß is 1/8 Jewish. This must not be made public. 1st, there is as yet no definitive proof and, 2nd, I do not want to see the German cultural legacy being gradually undermined. Otherwise, all we will have left of our history, at the end of the day, is Widukind, Heinrich der Löwe and Rosenberg. That is not really very much. Mussolini sets about the whole matter much more circumspectly. He arrogates all Roman history for himself, starting from the 1st stirrings of Antiquity. Compared with him, we are mere upstarts. I am doing everything in my power to counter this. This is also the will of the " Führer ". » (7)

The Johann Strauß Concert is part of the Nazi regime's propaganda-by-entertainment strategy. All programme items were subjected to a detailed analysis to determine their possible psychological and political effects. Even if an analysis of the minutes of the weekly meetings dealing with the « Radio Programme, 1940-1941 » (8) under the supervision of Hans Hinkel, a key-Nazi functionary in the « Reich » Ministry for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda and the « Reich » Chamber of Culture, has proved negative with regard to specific debates on the Johann Strauß Concert, there are, at least, general references to the concert cycle of the Vienna Philharmonic. No evidence has been found in this source of actual outside political interference in the programming of the Johann Strauß Concerts. The term « Viennese music » (« Wiener Musik ») is used for comparable programmes with works by Johann Strauß, such as that performed in August 1940. (9)

In 1946, the former Johann Strauß Concert was already credited with a long « tradition », and Professor Josef Krips, the conductor of the Philharmonic Concert of 1 January 1946, which was now dubbed « New Year's Concert » for the 1st time, noted succinctly :

« I began 1946 with the 1st New Year's Concert, in the time of peace. » (10)

Krips, who had been branded a half-Jew and banned from conducting in the Nazi era, obviously had no problem with the continuation of a series of concerts whose latest performance, on 1 January 1945, took place in an apocalyptic atmosphere - as is vividly suggested by its austere programme sheet. In 1946, the print-media, such as the Social-Democratic « Arbeiter-Zeitung », in an article by one Doctor Ruff, (11) saw the New Year's Concert as a Strauß Concert and « as a hopeful musical salute to the New Year, which was welcomed with enthusiastic applause by the audience ». In 1947, the New Year's Concert which was, of course, still a long way away from the globally syndicated phenomenon we know today, had already morphed into « a fixture we have grown fond of » in the « Österreichische Volkspartei » daily, « Das Kleine Volksblatt ». (12)

It was only in recent years that a critical reflection on the part played in National-Socialism by the functionalization of light-music, in general, and of the Johann Strauß Concerts, in particular, has been attempted. Claims like the one advanced by journalist and senior-editor Jacob Heilbrunn, on 1 March 2013, in « National Interest » that :

« The New Year's Concert was originally devised to celebrate the 1938 union with the 3rd Reich, a fact that the Orchestra apparently disguises on its website. » (13)

This affirmation may be devoid of any documented basis in the sources but they do highlight how important it is to be as accurate and comprehensive as possible when analyzing the Johann Strauß Concerts, from 1939 to 1945, and to augment such analysis with a study of what went before and what came after this period.

Notes

(1) E-mail from Silvia Kargl to Oliver Rathkolb (5 February 2013) .

(2) Fritz Trümpi. « Politisierte Orchester. Die Wiener Philharmoniker und das Berliner Philharmonische Orchester », Vienna (2011) ; page 257.

(3) Clemens Hellsberg. « Demokratie der Könige », Zürich (1992) ; page 570.

(4) Trümpi. « Politisierte Orchester » ; page 257.

(5) Archive of the Vienna Philharmonic : « Depot Staatsoper », « Rundfunk » file.

(6) Letter from Fritz Fellner to the author (2011) , and letter to the Editor from Ambassador Wolfgang Schallenberg to « Der Standard » (January 2013) .

(7) Josef Gœbbels. Diary entry of 5 June 1938 , in : « Nationalsozialismus, Holocaust, Widerstand und Exil 1933-1945 » .

Online-Datenbank, De Gruyter (10 March 2013) :

<http://db.saur.de/DGO/basicFullCitationView.jsf?documentId=TJG-3954>

See, also :

http://www.musikverein.at/monatszeitung/show_artikel.php?artikel_id=1197 (retrieved on 10 March 2013) .

(8) « Bundesarchiv Berlin, R55/695, Abteilung Rundfunk, Protokolle wöchentlicher Sitzungen über das Rundfunkprogramm » (Minutes of the weekly meetings to discuss the radio programme) , Volume 1 (October 1941 to May 1942) ; and R55/696, « Abteilung Rundfunk », Volume 2 (June 1942 to August 1943) .

(9) « Bundesarchiv Berlin », R 78, 2340 : Pictures, pages 1190-1193.

(10) Josef Krips. « Ohne Liebe kann man keine Musik machen. Erinnerungen », edited and documented by Harrietta Krips, Vienna (1994) ; page 170.

(11) « Arbeiter-Zeitung » (3 January 1946) ; page 4.

(12) « Das Kleine Volksblatt » (8 January 1947) .

(13) <http://nationalinterest.org/blog/jacob-heilbrunn/nazism-the-vienna-philharmonic-8174>

Expulsion and Murder of Vienna Philharmonic Musicians after 1938

(Bernadette Mayrhofer)

« Why can I not play music with them ? I belong ! I'm the Concert Master ! » (1)

(Arnold Rosé upon his expulsion from the orchestra immediately after the « Anschluß » .)

13 active musicians were expelled from the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1938. 3 additional musicians who were already in retirement also became victims of the holocaust. A total of 7 musicians were not able to escape in time into exile. Of these, 5 were deported and murdered in concentration camps, while 1 musician died as a result of the eviction from his apartment, and another died in Vienna while awaiting his impending deportation.

Expulsion from the Orchestra

As in all musical ensembles, immediately after the « Anschluß » key positions within the Vienna Philharmonic were immediately re-staffed with National-Socialist sympathizers. Most cultural institutions implemented the anti-Semitic Nazi dogma within Austria even before the adoption of the Nuremberg racial laws of May 20, 1938, and the « Reichskulturkammergesetz » of May 31, 1938, which went into effect on June 11, 1938. Whether or not a member of the Orchestra had Jewish ancestors, or was married to a woman of Jewish heritage, was known before 1938. Even before the « Anschluß », this racial factor affected the social boundaries within the Orchestra. The grandson of one of the exiled musicians described this phenomenon as follows :

« The gist of it was that the Jews were always somehow marginalized. So there were “ us ” and “ them ”. And, then, there were those somewhere in between who did not consider themselves anti-Semites. » (2)

The 1st large wave of expulsion of musicians from the State Opera, in the days after March 11th, affected primarily prominent artists who, according to the National-Socialistic racial doctrine, were considered Jewish, as was the case with the Concert Master and soloist Arnold Rosé and his colleague, principal cellist and soloist Siegfried Friedrich Buxbaum. (3)

This was followed, only a few days later, by the next stage of expulsions of those orchestral members who were designated as Jewish according to Nazi terminology. Philharmonic musicians Paul Fischer, Max Starkmann, Josef Geringer, Berthold Salander, Doctor Daniel Falk, Viktor Robitsek and Ludwig Wittels were barred from further service in the Orchestra, and were informed of their compulsory suspension in writing by the administration of the State Opera, on March 23, 1938. (4)

Another consequence of the implementation of the Nuremberg racial laws in Austria as of May 20, 1938, and particularly by means of the « Regulations for the Re-Organization of Austrian Professional Civil Servants of May 31, 1938 », which were used as a « legal » justification for the expulsion of civil servants of Jewish heritage, was a 3rd wave of expulsions which threatened those Orchestra members of « mixed heritage » or who were « related by marriage » (« jüdisch Versippte »), according to Nazi terminology. The administration of the State (SThV) attempted to stem the further loss of artistic personnel by way of a special arrangement which consisted of submitting Applications for Exemption, the so-called « Belassungsanträge ». Paragraph 3, Section 3 of the Civil Service Decree of May 31, 1938, according to which employees « can, in exceptional cases, remain in their positions with the special approval of a representative of the “ Führer ” or an office appointed by him provided the legal basis for these exceptions ». (5) The individual directors were prompted to submit such exemption requests. (6) The administration of the State Opera, with the support of the prominent conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, 1st submitted requests for « special permission » for 9 orchestra musicians. (7) Specifically excluded from this privilege were the musicians Leopold Föderl and Arthur Schurig who, according to Nazi terminology, were « related by marriage ». (8) Hugo Burghauser, who had been removed from his position as Philharmonic chairman, was included in the list for special permission. For political considerations, however, he chose to go into exile. Burghauser's wife, the well-known choreographer, ballet mistress and director Margarethe Wallmann, who was of Jewish heritage, was already at this time in Buenos Aires. (9) The Argentine Concert Master and soloist Ricardo Odnoposoff also escaped, 1st to Brussels, then (after the outbreak of War, in 1939) to Buenos Aires, when he was unable to satisfactorily document his ancestry.

Persecution, Deportation and Murder of Philharmonic Musicians

13 active musicians were expelled from the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1938. 3 additional musicians, who were already retired, fell victim to the holocaust. A total of 7 Philharmonic musicians were not able to escape into exile in time, with 5 of them (Moriz Glattauer, Viktor Robitsek, Max Starkmann, Julius Stwertka und Armin Tyroler) being deported and murdered in concentration camps. 2 additional Philharmonic musicians died under dramatic circumstances while still in Vienna : Anton Weiß died on December 1, 1940, as the result of a stroke suffered while being evicted from his apartment. The violinist Paul Fischer died on November 4, 1942, at the age of 66 years in the Jewish Hospital in Vienna - after having suffered dismissal from his position, forced eviction and relocation, financial hardship, illness, miserable living conditions, etc. (10)

The arduous living conditions in Vienna for the musicians expelled from the Philharmonic until their escape into exile or forced deportation and murder in the concentration camps were characterized by large-scale waves of arrest beginning in March 1938, pogrom-style demonstrations against the Jewish populace, brutal disappropriation, forced relocation into Jewish living areas, plundering and intimidation in many shapes and forms.

Escape into Exile

9 Philharmonic musicians were able to escape into exile in time. Arnold Rosé and Friedrich Buxbaum escaped to London, England. They were already advanced in years and, despite having many advantageous contacts, it was difficult for them to gain a foothold in the British musical scene. Hugo Burghauser escaped 1st to Toronto, Canada, moving later to New York, in the United States. Daniel Falk, Josef Geringer, Berthold Salander and Ludwig Wittels successfully escaped to New York. The violonist Leopold Föderl escaped to Chicago, in the United States, while Ricardo Odnoposoff emigrated by way of Brussels, Belgium, to Buenos Aires, Argentina and, later, to New York. (11)

Failed Opportunity to Re-integrate Expelled Musicians into Austrian Cultural Life

Only 2 of these musicians returned to Austria. After several delays, Leopold Föderl re-emigrated to Austria in 1953. After numerous international concert tours, Ricardo Odnoposoff returned to Vienna in 1956. Neither Föderl nor Odnoposoff ever rejoined the Vienna Philharmonic after their return to Austria. (12)

Research in Progress

In the course of this research work, numerous historical sources have been utilized. Nevertheless, these sources manifest, both qualitatively and quantitatively, a high-degree of disparity. The amount of data on the lives of the musicians Leopold Föderl and Arnold Rosé is quite good, whereas the amount of information available on the violinist Ludwig Wittels is, at this time, very modest. Accordingly, varied in length and detail are the texts concerning the individual Philharmonic musicians who were driven-out of the Orchestra. The project's research, consolidation and augmentation of the biographical portraits of the victims will be continued until August 2013.

Notes

(1) Richard Newman. « Alma Rosé. Wien 1906 / Auschwitz 1944. Eine Biographie » , Bonn (2003) ; page 105.

(2) « Interview Bernadette Mayrhofer mit Roger Salander » , Vienna (30 May 2005) .

(3) Letter from Kerber / Vienna State Opera administration to the BthV (18 March 1938) - AdR, SThV 886 (1938) .

(4) Letter from Kerber / Vienna State Opera administration to the SthV (24 March 1938) , AdR, SThV 886 (1938) , writing by SthV (25 March 1938) - AdR, SThV 886 (1938) .

(5) Report by Kosak (21 June 1938) - AdR, SThV 2312 (1938) ; page 11.

(6) Report by Kosak (21 June 1938) - AdR, SThV 2312 (1938) ; page 12f.

(7) Letter of the « Reich » Propaganda Ministry in Berlin to Opera director Erwin Kerber (20 July 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte 1939-1940 » , « Bundestheater Administrationsakten » , page 958 (1938) .

(8) Report by Kerber to the SthV (21 October 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte 1939-1940 » .

(9) « Wiener Staatsoper, 70 Jahre danach. Die Wiener Staatsoper und der “ Anschluß ” 1938, Opfer, Täter, Zuschauer, Katalog zur Ausstellung im Gustav Mahler-Saal der Wiener Staatsoper » (10 March - 30 June 2008) ; page 46.

(10) Sources from the Historical Archives of the Vienna Philharmonic (HadWPh) ; Clemens Hellsberg. « Demokratie der Könige. Die Geschichte der Wiener Philharmoniker » , Zürich (1992) ; page 504.

(11) Bernadette Mayrhofer. « Die Angelegenheit des Judenabbaus geht jetzt ganz ruhig vor sich. » , in : « Vertreibung von Wiener Philharmonikern nach 1938 und ihr Leben im Exil » , Thesis, Vienna (2005) .

(12) Ibid.

Deportation and Murder

Persecution and Murder of Members of the Vienna Philharmonic

A total of 5 members of the Philharmonic were killed in the course of racist cleansings. One member of the Philharmonic died as a result of the eviction from his apartment, and another died in Vienna before his impending deportation.

Moriz Glattauer (Violin I)

On July 14, 1942, Moriz Glattauer, a retired 1st violinist with the Vienna Philharmonic, was deported to Theresienstadt along with his wife, Anna Schidlof Glattauer.

Viktor Robitsek (Violin II)

After 35 years of service in the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and Vienna Philharmonic, Viktor Robitsek received notice from the management of the State Opera informing him of his compulsory suspension.

Max Starkmann (Violin I, Viola)

On October 5, 1942, Max und Elsa Starkmann were forced under the most demeaning of conditions to board a train as part of a mass-transport to Maly Trostinec (about 18 kilometers from Minsk) .

Julius Stwertka (Concertmaster, Solo Violinist)

Julius Stwertka was recruited from Hamburg as Concert Master by Gustav Mahler and was engaged for this position with the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and Vienna Philharmonic from 1902-1936.

Armin Tyroler (Oboe II)

« It has always been my aim to lighten the struggle for existence faced by my less fortunate colleagues and to make their lives more bearable. There is no more to it than that. »

« Died in Vienna »

Paul Fischer (Violin I, Section Leader)

Paul Fischer had played 1st violin for 39 years with the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic. Additionally, he was a long-time member of the internationally renowned Rosé Quartet.

Anton Weiß (Violin I, Section Leader)

Anton Weiß was a victim of the brutal expulsion policies of the National-Socialists ; and this, even before the systematic mass-murder of the Jewish population had begun.

Vienna Philharmonic Musicians in Exile

9 members of the Vienna Philharmonic managed to flee into exile.

Hugo Burghauser (Bassoon I, Chairman)

And of your former students no one apart from Hugo Burghauser, the poor man, who is so utterly lost on the asphalt of Manhattan.

Friedrich Siegfried Buxbaum (Principal Cellist)

Friedrich Buxbaum, who had held the exposed position of principal cellist, was expelled from the orchestral association immediately after Austria's annexation to Nazi Germany.

Daniel Falk (Violin II)

« Since leaving Vienna, I have experienced years of wandering and the tragic fate of losing my entire family (mother, brothers and all other relatives) in the concentration camps and gas-chambers, as well as years of becoming acquainted with a highly-interesting new country. »

Leopold Othmar Förderl (Violin II)

However, Förderl's expectations were soon to be shattered : in the summer of 1948, he received a 2nd letter from Salmhofer feigning false kindness that affronted him.

Josef Geringer (Violin I)

Josef Geringer was among the most impressive musicians of the Vienna Philharmonic in terms of his artistic qualities.

Ricardo Odnoposoff (Violin I, Concertmaster)

« He established himself as one of the outstanding violinists of the day. The Argentine artist, who came here virtually unknown to the general public, took his audience by storm by the virtuosity, power and fire of his performance. »

Arnold Rosé (Concert Master, Violin I, Viola soloist)

« As you correctly assume, after 57 years in the Opera, 56 years with the Quartet and 44 years in the “ Hofmusikkapelle ”, I have now disappeared into retirement without further ado. »

Berthold Salander (Violin II)

For Berthold Salander, it was like the end of the world when he was, virtually by force, driven from the Orchestra. At 51 years of age, he was suddenly excluded from his familiar and very successful professional life.

Ludwig Wittels (Violin I)

Wittels was able to save himself physically, but he was permanently traumatized by his experience of persecution and the murder of his mother :

« He spoke about it, over and over again. It ate him up inside all these years. He took it with him to bed at night and got-up with it in the morning. »

Impending Expulsion of Those Declared in Nazi Terminology as « Closely Related » (Versippte) , « Half-breeds » (Mischlinge) and Foreigners Lacking a « Certificate of Aryan Descent » (Ariernachweis)

(Bernadette Mayrhofer)

Gottfried Freiberg, Josef Hadraba, Theodor Heß, Rudolf Jettel, Richard Krotschak, Karl Maurer, Ernst Moravec, Otto Rieger, Arthur Schurig, Erich Weis, Otto Fieck.

...

1. Hugo Burghauser (« Fagott, Vorstand ») .

2. Leopold Förderl (« Violine II ») .

3. Gottfried Freiberg (« Horn I ») .

4. Josef Hadraba (« Posaune ») .

5. Theodor Heß (« Violine I ») .
6. Rudolf Jettel (« Klarinette ») .
7. Richard Krotschak (« Solocellist ») .
8. Karl Maurer (« Cellist ») .
9. Ernst Moravec (« Solobratschist ») .
10. Ricardo Odnoposoff (« Violine I, Konzertmeister ») .
11. Otto Rieger (« Solobratschist ») .
12. Arthur Schurig (« Pauke ») .
13. Erich Weis (« Viola ») .
14. Otto Fieck (« Trompete II und III ») (I) .

After those musicians who, according to the racist Nazi elocution, were classified as « full Jews » (« Volljude ») were expelled from the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and, therefore, also automatically from the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic (« Verein Wiener Philharmoniker ») , there still remained a set of artists in the Orchestra who now became the primary targets of political and anti-Semitic attacks. Those orchestral members who, according to Nazi terminology, were considered « half-breeds » (« Mischlinge ») and « closely Jewish related » (« jüdisch Versippte ») were now threatened by a harsh expulsion from the Orchestra. The danger of removal was also highly-acute for those who were politically unacceptable, foreigners without « proof of ancestry » (« Ahnenpass ») or those undesired for other reasons.

On June 21, 1938, a 22 page report was put together by Ernst Kosak, the Deputy Director (« stellvertretender Leiter ») of the State Theatre Administration (« Staatstheaterverwaltung » , SThV) , which had attached several black-lists of the SThV2 and included detailed recommendations on the further administrative procedure towards the practical implementation of the new and cruel provisions. This report reflects the (un)lawful zigzag policy that prevailed after the « Anschluß » . The range of measures included decommissioning, leave of absence, retirement, dismissal and retroactive termination. This reflects, on one side, the utterly inconsistent juridical and bureaucratic strategies of action and argumentation on behalf of the SThV, on the other side, it allowed for humane gestures. By pursuing immediate retirement instead of termination, Kosak made use of the legal chaos to, at least financially, provide for those displaced. However, his judicial efforts ultimately proved ineffective and, by the end of December 1938, those forced into retirement had to be subsequently dismissed by order of the « Reich » Governor (« Reichsstatthalter ») . (3)

« Special Permission » to Remain in the Orchestra

A key-section of Kosak's report of June 21 defined the procedures of the SThV in light of a 3rd, acutely imminent round of dismissals which affected mainly those who according to Nazi elocution were considered « closely Jewish related » (« jüdisch Versippte ») and « half or quarter Jews » (« Halb- oder Vierteljuden ») . The objective was to avert the disastrous artistic consequences of further expulsions through the use of so-called « retention requests » (« Belassungsanträge ») . The SThV spotted a legal possibility in § 3, section 3 of the Legal Ordinance of Officials (« Beamtenverordnung ») of May 31, 1938, in which employees and labourers « could, in exceptional cases, be allowed to remain in service with the approval of the deputy of the “ Führer ” or of an office designated by him » . (4) Requests were especially considered of those who in Nazi elocution were classified as « closely Jewish related » - i.e. , those musicians who were married to women of Jewish descent. A further group of orchestral members with « merit for request » were the so-called « Jewish half-breeds » (« jüdische Mischlinge ») who had been employed since August 1, 1914, or who had fought in the First World War. Special exceptions could, then, only be made by the « “ Reich ” Minister of the Interior (“ Reichsminister des Inneren ”) , in agreement with the Deputy of the “ Führer ” (“ Stellvertreter des Führers ”) » . Divorce was recognized only as long as it had been carried-out legally valid before June 1, 1938. (5)

It further proceeds from the report that the individual directorates were prompted to issue retention requests. (6) 2 weeks later, on July 5, 1938, the State Opera Directorate (« Staatsoperndirektion ») forwarded the SThV a list of those members designated for continued retention at the Opera House. On this 1st list of requests for continued retention in the Orchestra, the name of Leopold Förderl, whose 2nd wife in Nazi elocution was a « full Jew » (« Volljüdin ») , and who, therefore, was considered « fully Jewish related » (« volljüdisch versippt ») , was missing. Hugo Burghauser was included on the list. (7) By order of the Ministry of Information (« Propagandaministerium ») , on July 13, 1938, Burghauser, along with the other « retention candidates » , was requested by the State Opera Directorate (« Staatsoperndirektion ») to « immediately provide a birth certificate, birth certificates of your parents and 4 grandparents, the same documents on your wife's side, and furthermore a “ résumé ” and photograph » . (8) On July 23, State Opera Director, Erwin Kerber, settled verbally and in writing with Robert Valberg, the Provisional Leader (« kommissarische Leiter ») of the « Ring of Austrian Stage Artists » (« Ring der österreichischen Bühnenkünstler ») , for an extension of the submission deadline for the documents necessary for the retention to the beginning of September. (9) Valberg had distinguished himself as an exemplary Nazi and « Aryaniser » (« Ariseur ») in his close collaboration with the Ministry of Information concerning the inspection of « closely related » Philharmonic musicians and the examination of their « political soundness » (« politische Zuverlässigkeit ») .

In the meantime, Kerber had received a communication from the « “ Reich ” Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda » (« Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda ») , which had been drafted by Doctor Heinz Drewes (10) , in Salzburg :

« The minister has decided that the assembly of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra will remain unchanged in its present form and that the final assembly will be arranged in accordance with Doctor Furtwängler and Doctor Kerber, after the Festivals. » (11)

The result of this discussion was a written request addressed to director Kerber and signed by Doctor Wilhelm

Furtwängler in the name of the Vienna Philharmonic (dated August 20, 1938) « to request and enforce at the appropriate authority the special permit for the 9 members of our Orchestra recorded in the attached list » . (12) The request for an exception regulation was justified by a pragmatic argument : the continued retention of the listed musicians in the Orchestra should serve to :

« Maintain the artistic performance capability and, therefore, of the distinction of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. » (13)

Explicitly excluded from the privilege of this « special permission » were Leopold Föderl and Arthur Schurig who, according to Nazi racial ideology, were « closely related » (« versippt ») musicians. (14) A total of 9 musicians were on Furtwängler's list :

Theodor Heß (1st violin) ; Otto Rieger (solo viola player) ; Ernst Moravec (solo viola player) ; Richard Krotschak (solo cellist) ; Karl Maurer (cellist) ; Rudolf Jettel (clarinet) ; Hugo Burghauser (bassoon) ; Gottfried Freiberg (horn) ; and Josef Hadraba (trombone) .

The « retention procedure » obviously was deferred considerably, because it was only on December 27, 1939, more than 1 year later, that the « “ Reich ” Governor's Office » (« Reichsstatthaltereie ») « finally, also on its part, grants approval of these retentions » . (15) The State Opera Directorate forwarded the « retention requests » (« Belassungsgesuche ») to the « “ Reich ” Chamber of Music » (« Reichsmusikkammer ») , Berlin SW 11. , « Bernburgerstraße 19 » , with the plead to « officially issue a respective order » . (16) The list had been reduced by 1 person, because Hugo Burghauser had, at that time, already made his escape. About 1 month later, on January 30, 1940, the requested set of musicians again had changed. Rudolf Jettel was missing on this new list and, instead, he was replaced by Erich Weis (« viola, presumably half-breed of the 1st degree ») . (17)

There are few sources regarding the procedure of the « Reich » Chamber of Music, in Berlin, in respect to these requests for special permits. The principal violist, Otto Rieger, was considered, in racist Nazi terminology, a « half-Jew » , nevertheless, he was allowed to become a member of the « “ Reich ” Chamber of Culture » (« Reichskulturkammer ») . In the summer of 1942, the « Reich » Chamber of Music, in Berlin, suddenly denied his request for a special permit - despite his membership in the « Reich » Chamber of Culture. In a written response of November 19, 1942, to the « Reich » Chamber of Music, in Berlin, the SThV notes that the denial was not « connected to a professional prohibition » . (18)

The SThV additionally appealed to the « Reich » Chamber of Music : the « State Theatre Administration supports the request for Rieger's continued retention, because his withdraw would lead to a serious gap which would cause great damage to the Orchestra » . (19) The special permit of Rieger's colleague, the cellist Richard Krotschak who, according to the Nazi jargon, was considered « closely Jewish related » was « revoked » , in 1942. (20)

There is also the possibility that, up to 1942, his request was never authorized and that his continued retention in the Orchestra (as with other colleagues) was simply silently accepted. Allegedly, only an intervention of Karl Böhm, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Wilhelm Jerger could avert the renewed danger of Krotschak's exclusion from the Vienna Philharmonic and the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. This danger could be sustainably contained only after Krotschak and his wife could supply evidence that Mister Krotschak was « Half-breed in the 1st degree » (« Mischling I. Grades ») . Now, Richard Krotschak could even apply for membership in the « Reich » Chamber of Culture as a pre-condition for « free » exercise of his artistic profession. (21) In this context, questions arise about the « Jewish » wives and the remaining family members of the retention candidates. To this day, outstanding questions concern their exemption of persecution and murder by the Nazis, in the case of a special permit, or if, for example, they needed to wear Jewish badges (22) or were allowed to take-up a profession. From April 1942, « Non-Jews » (« Nichtjuden ») married to « Jews » (« Juden ») were forced to move to Jewish residential areas. Except for the case of the cellist Richard Krotschak (his wife was classified as : « 1st degree half-breed » , and managed to survive the Nazi era) (23) , it remains unclear in how far a special permit would have had an effect on the protection of the (private) life of the families or the Jewish wives.

Excluded from the Saving List for Continued Retention in the Orchestra : Arthur Schurig and Leopold Förderl

The anti-Semitic motivated expulsion also served as an instrument to cast-off undesired members.

« This number was further reduced to 9 candidates for continued retention in the Orchestra, because the directorate adhered to its request to retire Arthur SCHURIG. SCHURIG is not on Furtwängler's list. » (24)

The question why the musicians Arthur Schurig and Leopold Förderl, who both were classified as « fully-Jewish related » , (25) were consequently factored-out of the retention lists is not be fully-clarified by the documents available to the author. It proceeds from the correspondence that, in Förderl's case, the initiative lay on the side of the State Opera Directorate, (26) in Schurig's case, it was the resistance of the « Reich » Chamber of Music. It also becomes clear that both musicians struggled against this discrimination with great effort.

The answer to the question of possible political reasons for Schurig's exclusion from the Orchestra increases the mystery. The 2 political assessments requested by the « Gestapo » , on August 1, 1939, and January 23, 1940, establish Schurig's « political soundness » (« politische Zuverlässigkeit ») . (27) Just as little clarification of facts and circumstances is offered by the request for a special permit written personally by the disgraced Schurig to the « laudable “ Reich ” Chamber of Theatre, in Berlin » , (28) dated November 13, 1939. The content of this letter concerns mainly biographic information, his career in the « old “ Reich ” » (« Altreich ») , and his « impeccable » (« tadellos ») service at the State Opera. Schurig's request proved ineffective, and a corresponding note on Schurig's letter leaves no doubt that his retirement (December 31, 1939) was adhered to because of a telephone consultation with Valberg. (29) Another communication of the « Reich » Music Chamber, in Berlin, from October 2, 1942, addressed to the State Opera in Vienna, illustrates that Schurig was definitely not admitted to the « Reich » Music Chamber :

« The request for admission into the “ Reich ” Music Chamber of this Jewish related, previous member of your Orchestra had already been declined by binding ruling, on July 8, 1940. On the occasion of an inspection in the Vienna State Opera, on September 29, 1942, it was ascertained that, in spite of that, he was employed in your Orchestra. » (30)

Although he was banned from his profession, Schurig continued to be called-on by the « Wiener Philharmoniker » for substitution services in accord with the SThV and the « Reich » Governor's Office of Vienna. In his appeal against the subsequently imposed fine of 500 RM (« Reichsmark ») , Schurig was supported by the SThV. It does not proceed from the sources whether he eventually paid the fine. What is clear though is that the « Wiener Philharmoniker » - especially, in the person of Leopold Kainz, player's representative (« Betriebsobmann ») of the Orchestra and member of the NSDAP, since 1931 - supported Schurig's further involvement as timpanist and argued for this with artistic shortages, amongst others. As the pressure from Berlin became too strong, the State Opera gave in. On October 19, 1942, the State Opera Director, Ernst August Schneider, confirmed towards the « Reich » Music Chamber, in Berlin, « that Mister Schurig is no longer employed in the State Opera Orchestra » . (31)

On June 21, 1938, Leopold Förderl was still treated as a possible candidate for « continued retention » on the level of the SThV, but on July 5, 1938, he was missing from the list of the Opera Directorate addressed to the SThV which, for the 1st time, definitely determined the candidates for « special permits » . (32) Förderl, likewise, does not appear on Wilhelm Furtwängler's list of August 20, 1938. It proceeds from a document of August 17, 1938, that Förderl « currently carries-out his duty, in Salzburg » . (33) He may, therefore, have performed regularly in the Orchestra, up to his « retirement » (expulsion) .

This, obviously, deliberate exclusion of Förderl on the part of the directorate and, presumably also, on the part of the Orchestra might well have been a case of intrigue and mobbing. Förderl's directness in not being afraid to speak his mind and his Liberal attitude obviously provoked great aversion towards him, as a person. In fall-winter of 1937, a massive conflict occurred between Förderl and the chairman (« Vorstand ») of the Vienna Philharmonic, Hugo Burghauser, in which were involved also the Orchestra and even the conductor, Wilhelm Furtwängler. The quarrel escalated, in the beginning of December 1937, and, as a result, Förderl was expelled from the Vienna Philharmonic for 4 months. (34)

Little information on the issue is gained from Förderl's official letters to the State Theatre Administration, in which he takes a stand on the inconsistencies involved in his dismissal and in which he opposes his compulsory retirement or later subsequent dismissal :

« According to the letter of the State Theatre Administration, from September 16, 1938, (Zl.2782) , I was transferred to lasting retirement in September 1, 1938. Since, at that time and even today, a significant number of Jewish half-breeds and Jewish related are active as members of the Orchestra, it likely follows that artistic reasons were decisive in my transfer to lasting retirement. Now, as warrantor for my artistic qualification, I am able to name none other than University Professor Doctor Victor Junk, Vienna 3rd District, on “ Hainburgerstraße ” (!) 19, who is the responsible referent in public position of the NSDAP. » (35)

In his official, written statement, Förderl makes no mention, not even a word, of the previous conflict with Burghauser and the other people in the Orchestra but, presumably, it is exactly here where the motives for Förderl's final expulsion from the Orchestra are to be found. Thus, a deeply inhuman legal order is made use of for the ability to dispose of a (politically) inconvenient colleague. (36)

« Politically Unacceptable » : the Christian-Social (« christsozial ») Hugo Burghauser

With respect to Hugo Burghauser, there were concrete political reasons that (beside his immediate removal from his office as chairman - « Vorstand ») also endangered his stay in the Orchestra. Burghauser, who was married to the (according to Nazi elocution) « fully Jewish » ballet mistress of the Opera, Margarethe Wallmann, stood on the often-quoted list of continued retention for the time being and (as he himself notes in his memoirs, in 1979) could for a limited time count on the protection by the Opera director (« Operndirektor ») Kerber. His disapproval of National-Socialism, his political affinity to Austro-facism, and his associated career in the « Fatherland's Front » (« Vaterländische Front ») (37) are indicative of the fact that political reasons had brought Burghauser into a serious situation. Burghauser's assessment that his situation became increasingly threatening, that the atmosphere in the Orchestra towards him was (subliminally) aggressive, and that his « immunity » (« Immunität ») in the Orchestra was of limited duration, is confirmed by another document. In mid-July 1938, director Kerber received a written complaint composed by Doctor Albert Reitter, the « Deputy State Governor » (« Landesstatthalter ») of Salzburg, which leaves no doubt about the fact that Burghauser stood on the Nazi's « hit list » and had to be seriously concerned about his safety :

« To my surprise, I see Mister Burghauser performing with the Philharmonic Orchestra as part of the Festival. This person is politically unacceptable and, thus, I request to arrange the necessary steps. “ Heil ” Hitler ! » (38)

Burghauser struggled against this threat and, from April 1938 onward, tried to fight a case for divorce of his « Jewish » spouse who had already escaped to Buenos Aires by resorting to anti-Semitic « reasoning » . He accused his wife and her family of deception concerning her « ancestral relations » (« Abstammungsverhältnis ») . (39) In this respect, it has to be added that adapting to the « language » of the Nazis was an essential survival strategy for victims of the regime, be it as a diversion (which might have been the case with Burghauser, namely Burghauser as « political person ») , be it to render more bearable the discriminations and prevent a deterioration of the situation, or be it not to jeopardize the already precarious escape plans by risking an arrest.

« Concerns : Proof of Aryan Ancestry » : Ricardo Odnoposoff

« Consider it as a developmental step to assist those in your organization to acquire the necessary “ Proof of Aryan Descent ”. Make sure that the attention of every “ compatriot ” (“ Volksgenosse ”) who turns to you for advice is directed towards our office, because not everyone is aware of the fact that there has been an office for “ Foreign Genealogy Research ” (“ Auslandssippenforschung ”) , ever since the “ upheaval ” (“ Umbruch ”) . » (40)

Starting with early summer 1938, foreign artists also were affected by « racial-biological cleansings » (« rassenbiologischen Säuberungen ») , as was the case with the Concert Master and violin virtuoso, Ricardo Odnoposoff. Odnoposoff, a descendant of Argentina, was a member of the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and Vienna Philharmonic, from 1934 to 1938. His father's family originally stemmed from Russia, which meant additional harassment for Odnoposoff, in the already tedious and degrading procedure of the acquisition of the « Proof of Aryan Descent » . Odnoposoff's status as foreigner is only a peripheral issue in the extensive correspondence of the SThV and the Opera Directorate. Intense pressure was primarily put on him for providing « Proof of Aryan Descent » . In an interview, in 1996, Odnoposoff recounts that he was summoned by the « Gestapo » who made it clear to him that his security was of limited duration. In this interview, Odnoposoff does not comment on his efforts to procure the documents necessary for « Proof of Ancestry » (« Ahnenpass ») from Russia, which could have practically been viewed as a strategic attempt at diversion, in order to gain time and self-protection. (41)

Intimidation and Hostility towards Those with « Continued Retention » in the Orchestra

The « privilege » of « continued retention » in the Orchestra neither granted the declassified members an existence in the Orchestra with equal rights, nor did it guarantee security and stability. The threatening pattern of everyday life, in the professional surroundings of these ostracized musicians, is expressed by the grandson of the expelled musician Berthold Salander, in an interview with the author : his orchestral colleague Rudolf Jettel, who was in possession of a special permit, « did not speak much about this time », but « what he had to say was very negative, what he said about his colleagues should not be put in print. Jettel, himself, told me that it was suggested to him to divorce the “ Jewish pig ” (“ Saujüdin ”), otherwise, he would be sent to the concentration camp with her ». (42)

The Nazi monitoring bodies had in their sights those orchestral musicians placed on the list of « special permits ». Thus, the « overall assessment of the district leader » (« Gesamturteil des Kreisleiter »), from July 1, 1939, concerning Josef Hadraba, states :

« The person inquired about is married to a Jew and currently rated indifferent. The very same person, therefore, seems sustainable only with greatest caution. » (43)

There are different « assessments » also, in the case of the principal cellist Richard Krotschak. (44) Particularly, in connection with his « Jewish » wife, Krotschak was under political surveillance, again and again ; a remark of his wife critical of the regime uttered in a grocery store, for example, was cited word for word in the « regional files » (« Gauakten ») and, again and again, great mistrust was expressed toward the married couple Krotschak. Their files were requested by various agencies (« Sicherheitsdienst des Reichsführers-SS ; NSDAP-Gauleitung Wien ; Rassenpolitisches Amt ; Gauamt für Sippenforschung »). The regional files ascribed « political unreliability » (« politische Unzuverlässigkeit »), as well as a lack of political interest to the musician, Gottfried von Freiberg. (45) A similar case was the political assessment of the violin player, Theodor Heß. According to the « Leader of the District Office » (« Kreisamtsleiter »), Alois Barnet, Freiberg was « indifferent towards political issues. Politically, and, in terms of character, not free from faults. » (46) The leader of the « Regional Group » (« Ortsgruppenleiter »), Laimgrube, attested him disinterested « for the movement », « no dedication and sacrifice » and political unreliability. (47) These, above cited, political assessments of those musicians designated for special permits illustrate how real the threat and how intense the political pressure was under which they permanently stood.

Notes

(1) The Philharmonic member, Otto Fieck, was, according to the racist Nazi terminology, considered as « fully Jewish related » (« volljüdisch versippt »). He had already been retired, since September 1, 1937, and, therefore, does not appear on the lists of special permits. Fieck and his wife died in Vienna, on July 14, 1945. Letter to the « Office of the Reich Governor » (« Reichsstatthalterei ») , composed on March 20, 1942, membership list with reference to the « racial origin » (« rassische Herkunft ») of the wives. Vienna Philharmonic Depot State Opera, folder I ; membership book of the « Wiener Philharmoniker » ; page I. « Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofoper » , HadWPh ; historical Viennese registration records concerning Otto Fieck, « Vienna City and “ Land ” Archives » (« Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv »)

(2) Kosak's report (21 June 1938) , including attachments (mostly, « black-lists ») - AdR, SThV, page 2312 (1938) .

(3) « Holiday correspondence » (« Urlaubskorrespondenz ») , Kosak to director Kerber (30 July 1938) - AdR, SThV 2980 (1938) ; ibid. , director Kerber to Kosak (4 August 1938) ; ibid. , Kosak to Eckmann (19 August 1938) ; Report of Eckmann (12 December 1938) - AdR, SThV, page 4219 (1938) .

(4) « Ausnahmsweise mit Zustimmung des Stellvertreters des Führers oder der von ihm bestimmten Stelle im Dienste belassen werden können. » Kosak's report (21 June 1938) ; page 11 - AdR, SThV, page 2312 (1938) .

(5) (21 June 1938) - AdR, SThV, page 2367 (1938) .

(6) Kosak's report (21 June 1938) ; page 12f. - AdR, SThV, page 2312 (1938) .

(7) (5 July 1938) - AdR, « State Opera Directorate » (« Staatsoperndirektion ») ; pages 844-845 (1938) .

(8) « Umgehend die eigene Geburtsurkunde, die Geburtsurkunden Ihrer Eltern und Ihrer 4 Großeltern (sic) , die selben Dokumente von Ihrer Gattin, ferner einen Lebenslauf und ein Lichtbild. »

(9) (13 July 1938) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, pages 844-845 (1938) ; Director Kerber to Robert Valberg, Vienna (23 July 23 1938) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 2664 (1938) . Robert Valberg was a member of the NSDAP since 1932 and, in 1938, was appointed provisional leader of the « Josefstadt » . He was the provisional leader of the « Ring of Austrian Stagecraft Artist and the Association of Directors » (« kommissarischer Leiter des Ringes österreichischer Bühnenkünstler und des Direktorenverbandes ») and distinguished himself, especially, in his role of investigator of « Proofs of Aryan Descent » (« Ariernachweise ») and political soundness (« politischen Zuverlässigkeit ») . Oliver Rathkolb. « Führertreu und gottbegnadet. Künstlereliten im Dritten Reich » , Vienna (1991) ; pages 55, 58, 60.

(10) Doctor Heinz Drewes, « Music Referent » (« Musikreferent ») of the « “ Reich ” Ministry of Information » (« Reichsministerium für Propaganda ») , acted as an important contact person for the « Reich » Ministry of Information, in Berlin, for the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

(11) « Der Herr Minister hat entschieden, daß die Zusammenstellung des Wiener Philharmonischen Orchesters in der augenblicklichen Form unverändert bleibt, und daß die endgültige Zusammensetzung nach den Festspielen im Einvernehmen mit Doktor Furtwängler und Doktor Kerber geregelt wird. » Writing of the « Reich » Ministry of Information, in Berlin, to Opera Director Kerber (20 July 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte 1939-1940 » , «

Administrative files of the State Theater » (« Bundestheater Administrationsakten ») ; page 958 (1938) .

(12) « Die Sonderbewilligung für die in beiliegender Liste verzeichneten neun Mitglieder unseres Orchesters an zuständiger Stelle beantragen und durchsetzen zu wollen. »

(13) « ... zur Aufrechterhaltung der künstlerischen Leistungsfähigkeit und damit des Ranges und Namens der Wiener Philharmoniker » . Director Kerber to the SThV (21 October 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte » , 3399 (1938) ; Oliver Rathkolb. « Dokumentensammlung “ Wiener Philharmoniker ”, 1938-1947 » (unpublished) page 7 ; Kerber's report to the SThV (21 October 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte 1939-1940 » .

(14) Kerber's report to the SThV (21 October 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte 1939-1940 » .

(15) « Nun endlich auch ihrerseits die Zustimmung zu diesen Belassungen erteilte. »

(16) « Eine bezügliche Verfügung offiziell erlassen. » Writing of the directorate to the « “ Reich ” Music Chamber » (« Reichsmusikkammer ») , in Berlin (27 December 1939) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 1263 (1939) .

(17) « Viola, vermutlich Mischling I. Grades. » Letter of the directorate to the « Reich » Music Chamber, in Berlin, (Vienna, 30 January 1940) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 1263 (1939) .

(18) « Verbot der Berufsausübung verbunden (war) . »

(19) « Staatstheaterverwaltung befürwortet das Ansuchen um weiterverbleiben (sic) Riegers, da sein Ausscheiden eine empfindliche Lücke hervorbringen würde, die dem Orchester grossen Schaden bringen würde. » Letter of the SThV to the « Reich » Music Chamber, in Berlin (composed on 19 November 1942) . Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra Depot State Opera.

(20) « Wieder entzogen. » « Wolfram Ziegler, Richard Krotschak (1904-1989) - Cellist und Pädagoge » , in : « Verein für Geschichte der Stadt Wien » , « Wiener Geschichtsblätter » , Volume 63, No. 3 (2008) ; page 14.

(21) Letter of Doctor Vollguth, from the « Department of Racial Policies » (« Rassepolitisches Amt ») to the « Reich » Governor in Vienna (from 30 April 1942) - AdR, GA 97.704. Richard Krotschak. Opus citatum ibid. ; page 18.

(22) On September 1, 1941, the police released an order concerning the « identification » of « Jewish » people by means of a « Star of David » (« Judenstern ») , and this order attained validity with October 19, 1941. Only very few exceptions to the duty of « wearing the star » (« Sterntragen ») were declared :

« Those “ privileged ” by marriage are not subject to the duty of identification. Exceptions are made for :

a) Jewish husbands living in an mixed marriage, insofar as there are descendants from the marriage and these are not considered Jews, and also if the marriage no longer persists or the only son has died in the current War.

b) For the Jewish wife in childless mixed marriage for the period of the marriage. » (« Der Kennzeichnungspflicht unterlagen nicht die über die Ehe “ Privilegierten ”. Ausgenommen seien :

a) In einer Mischehe lebende jüdische Ehegatten, sofern Abkömmlinge aus der Ehe vorhanden sind und diese nicht als Juden gelten, und zwar auch dann, wenn die Ehe nicht mehr besteht oder der einzige Sohn im gegenwärtigen Krieg gefallen ist.

b) Auf die jüdische Ehefrau bei kinderloser Mischehe während der Dauer der Ehe. »)

Cornelia Essner. « Die “ Nürnberger Gesetze ” oder die Verwaltung des Rassenwahns 1933-1945 » , Paderborn (2002) ; pages 270-274.

(23) Mrs. Krottschak managed to be saved by the classification as « 1st degree half-breed » , which was effected, in April 1942, by the « Department of Racial Policies » at the « District Leader » (« Gauleiter ») . Richard Krottschak was able to remain professionally active. Writing of Doctor Vollguth of the Department of Racial Policies to the « Reich » Governor, in Vienna (from 30 April 1942) - AdR, GA 97.704. Richard Krottschak. Opus citatum based on : « Wolfram Ziegler, Richard Krottschak (1904-1989) » (as in note 16) ; page 18.

(24) « Diese Zahl reduziert sich weiter auf 9 [Kandidaten für die “ Weiterbelassung ” im Orchester, Anm. d. Verf.] , da die Direktion an ihrem Antrag, den Philharmoniker Arthur SCHURIG zu pensionieren festhält. SCHURIG ist nicht auf der Liste Furtwänglers. » (21 October 1938) . Emphasis in the original - AdR, Karton « Judenakte » , 3.399 (1938) .

(25) Report of Eckmann (21 June 1938) , attachment - AdR, SThV ; page 2312 (1938) .

(26) (13 February 1939) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 278 (1939) ; (4 July 1939) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 881 (1939) ; (8 February 1940) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 254 (1940) .

(27) Artur Schurig - AdR, GA 97.520.

(28) « Löblichen Reichstheaterkammer in Berlin. »

(29) Request of Artur Schurig for a special permit (13 November 1939) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 1263 (1939) .

(30) « Der Aufnahmeantrag in die Reichsmusikkammer dieses jüdisch versippten früheren Mitgliedes Ihres Orchesters ist durch rechtskräftige Entscheidung bereits am 8. Juli 1940 abgelehnt worden. Anlässlich einer Kontrolle in der Wiener Staatsoper am 29. September 1942 wurde festgestellt, daß er trotzdem in Ihrem Orchester beschäftigt worden ist. »

The President of the « Reich » Music Chamber (substitute) to the « General Manager » (« Generalintendanten ») of the Vienna State Opera (Berlin, 2 October 1942) . Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra Depot State Opera, personnel file : Schurig.

(31) « Daß Herr Schurog (sic) nicht mehr im Verbands des Staatsopernorchesters beschäftigt wird. »

Letter of Doctor Jarosch, « Head Dramaturg » (« Chefdramaturg ») of the State Opera to State Opera Director, Ernst August Schneider (Vienna, 9 October 1942) ; letter of Doctor Jarosch to the « Chief Advisor » (« Generalreferent ») Walter Thomas (Vienna, 30 November 1942) ; « Reich » Music Chamber, in Berlin, to Arthur Schurig (Berlin, 2 October 1942) ; Arthur Schurig to the « Reich » Music Chamber, in Berlin (Vienna, 9 October 1942) . All mentioned sources, in : Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra Depot State Opera, personnel file : Schurig.

(32) « Regarding the assignment of those Jewish related » ; « Betreff Verwendung der jüdischen Versippten » (5 July 1938) - AdR, State Opera Directorate ; pages 844-845 (1938) .

(33) « Zur Zeit in Salzburg seinen Dienst versieht. » Report of 17 August 1938 - AdR, SThV ; page 2782 (1938) .

(34) Letter of Leopold Förderl to Burghauser (dated : 14 December 1937) , No. 13 - HAdWPh, correspondence Burghauser, Briefe 40. In response to Förderl's threat, « to put forward, as a supplement to the fine Philharmonic book by Heinrich Kralik, a small “ chronique scandaleuse ” » , the plenum and the committee reacted by excluding Förderl from the association for a period of 5 months. « Wiener Philharmoniker » . ibid. ; Clemens Hellsberg. « Demokratie der Könige » , in : « Die Geschichte der Wiener Philharmoniker » , Zürich (1992) ; page 458.

(35) « Ich wurde laut Schreiben der Staatstheaterverwaltung vom 16. September 1938, Zl. 2782 mit 1. September 1938 in den dauernden Ruhestand versetzt. Nachdem sowohl zu diesem Zeitpunkt als auch heute noch eine bedeutende Anzahl jüdischer Mischlinge und jüdisch Versippter als Orchestermmitglieder aktiv im Dienst sind, ergibt sich der logische Schluß, daß für meine Versetzung in den dauernden Ruhestand wohl künstlerische Gründe maßgebend waren. Nun : als Bürgen für meine künstlerischen Befähigungen kann ich Ihnen keinen Geringeren als den in öffentlicher Stellung der NSDAP verantwortlichen Referenten, Herrn Universitätsprofessor Doktor Victor Junk, Wien III. , Hainburgerstraße (!) 19, namhaft machen. »

Letter of Förderl to the SThV (Vienna, 2 December 1938) - AdR, SThV ; page 4093 (1938) .

(36) For details on the conflicts between Förderl and Burghauser, in fall-winter 1937, see the available portrait of Leopold Förderl, on the homepage of the « Wiener Philharmoniker » .

(37) Burghauser was « appointed Chairman of the “ Musicians Ring ” within the Corporate Union » (« Vorsitzenden des “ Musiker-Rings ” innerhalb der ständischen Gewerkschaft ernannt ») by the « Ministry of Education » (« Unterrichtsministerium ») , from 1934 to 1938. In 1935, he was additionally appointed « Expert Witness » (« Sachverständiger ») for Music at the « Vienna State Court » (« Wiener Landesgericht ») . Hugo Burghauser. « Philharmonische Begegnungen. Erinnerungen eines Wiener Philharmonikers » , Zürich (1997) , pages 101 and 121 ; Otto Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt. Mein Leben mit den Wiener Philharmonikern » , Vienna (1974) ; page 154. See also Burghauser's « résumé » , attachment to Burghauser's letter to the State Opera on 20 June 1938 - AdR, State Opera Directorate ; page 498 (1939) .

(38) « Zu meinem Erstaunen sehe ich, daß Herr Burghauser im Rahmen der Festspiele bei den Philharmonikern mitwirkt. Der Genannte ist politisch untragbar, ich bitte daher, das Erforderliche zu veranlassen. Heil Hitler ! »

The « Deputy State Governor » (« Landesstatthalter ») , in Salzburg, to Salzburg « Festspielhausgemeinde » , at the attention of « Herrn » Doctor Erwin Kerber (Salzburg, 14 July 1938) - AdR, Karton « Judenakte 1939-1940 » , « Bundestheater Administrationsakten » .

(39) (Vienna, 9 August 1938) - AdR, State Opera Directorate, page 498 (1939) ; (22 September 1938) , ÖBThV, page 3322 (1938) .

(40) « Betrachten Sie es als ein Stück Aufbauarbeit, wenn Sie Ihrer Gefolgschaft dazu verhelfen, daß jeder in den Besitze des so notwendigen “ Ariernachweise ” gelangt. Tragen Sie dazu bei, daß jeder Volksgenosse auf unsere Stelle aufmerksam gemacht wird, der sich um Rat an Sie wendet, denn nicht jeder weiss, daß es schon seit dem Umbruch eine Stelle für Auslandssippenforschung gibt. »

AdR, ÖSThV, page 3141 (1938) . « Foreign Genealogy Research » (« Auslandssippenforschung ») (Leader Pg. Ludwig Adamus) to the « Betriebsführer » , received by the SThV (14 September 1938) .

(41) Because of his Jewish roots, Ricardo Odnoposoff had good reasons to flee from « Austria » . Gdal Saleski. « Famous Musicians of Jewish Origin » , New York (1949) , pages 384-385 ; Stengel/Gerigk. « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » (1940-1941) ; Burhard Laugwitz. « Ein sehr starker Geiger in Wien » . Ricardo Odnoposoff. « Interview » , in : « Das Orchester. Zeitschrift für Orchesterkultur und Rundfunk-Chorwesen » , Band 9 (1996) , page 21 ; ÖBThV (27 September 1938) , page 3322 (1938) .

(42) « Nicht viel über diese Zeit gesprochen » , allerdings « was er gesagt hat, war sehr negativ, was er von seinen Kollegen gesagt hat, kann man nicht drucken. Jettel hat mir selber gesagt, man hat ihm nahegelegt, er soll sich von der “ Saujüdin ” scheiden lassen, sonst würde man ihn mit ihr zusammen in KZ schicken. » Interview of Bernadette Mayrhofer with Roger Salander (30 May 2005) .

(43) « Der Angefragte ist mit einer Jüdin verheiratet und dzt. indifferent eingestellt. Derselbe erscheint daher nur mit allergrösster (sic) Vorsicht tragbar. » Josef Hadraba - AdR, Regional Personal Department of the District of Vienna, GA 97.564.

(44) Richard Krottschak - AdR, GA 97.704.

(45) Gottfried von Freiberg - AdR, GA 97.620.

(46) Theodor Heß - AdR, GA 97.603.

(47) « An der Bewegung » , « keinen Opferwillen » . Theodor Heß - AdR, GA 97.603.

The Vienna Philharmonic's « Cancelled » Subscription Audience (Founders, Supporters and Contributors)

In the course of his research, the author of this article, together with the Vienna Philharmonic's archivist, found a hand-written register of accounts in a basement store-room of the Vienna State Opera which is used today as a sheet-music archive.

Observations on Nazification and Denazification

From the Organization Cell-Group (« Betriebszelle ») State Opera to the Managing Committee (« Vereinsführung »)

(Oliver Rathkolb)

The core-group of NSDAP sympathisers in the Vienna Philharmonic had, in 1931-1932, already organized themselves in the framework of the NSBO - the NS Organization Cell-Group State Opera.

To this day, there has been no successful assessment of the exact percentage of « Nazification » of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Clemens Hellsberg has, in 1992, addressed the fact that, at the end of the War, 42 % were NSDAP-members, and he also pointed-out that this rate rises to 47 % if affiliated organizations are included. (1) He has further calculated the « group differences » of the formal Nazification, at the time of 1938 - and found differences between string players with 30 % NSDAP members ; woodwind players with 45 % ; as well as brass players and percussion with 43 % . I, myself, on the basis of Austrian and U.S. American documents, arrived in 1991 at a rate of 40 % former NSDAP-members in the Orchestra - about 20 % of these were « illegal » members (2) , i.e. , those who, during the prohibition of the NSDAP, between « July 1, 1933 and March 13, 1938, after attaining the age of 18, have, at one point, belonged to the NSDAP or one of its para-military forces (« Wehrverbände, SA, SS, NSKK, NSFK ») » - so the wording in § 10 of the Prohibitive Law (« Verbotsgesetz ») of May 8, 1945.

The core-group of NSDAP sympathisers in the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra had, in 1931-1932, already organized themselves in the framework of the NSBO - the National-Socialist Organization Cell-Group State Opera. The NSBO did not do the Classic work of a labour union, but rather as a political organization caused agitation for the NSDAP in the labour force of an enterprise. Its driving forces, in this case, were Leopold Kainz (horn) , Karl Swoboda (oboe) , and Wilhelm Jerger (contrabass) , among others. Wilhelm Jerger subsequently served as the organization cell chairman (« Betriebszellenobmann ») and Leopold Kainz was his deputy - also, during the time of the prohibition of the NSDAP (which included the NSBO) . Kainz had become a member of the Philharmonic, only on September 1, 1932 ; Swoboda, 1 year earlier. Jerger, however, had been a member of the State Opera Orchestra since October 1, 1922, and member of the Vienna Philharmonic since 1924.

These men very skilfully motivated other colleagues to make monetary contributions and marketed prohibited National-Socialist propagandistic publications such as the « Österreichischer Beobachter » . With the great economical problems of the time as a back-drop and, while really only being a pseudo labour union, the success of the « cell-work » (« Zellenarbeit ») is attested by the high-number of « illegals » . After the suppression of independent labour unions by the authoritarian Dollfuß regime, the influence of the National-Socialist Organization Cell-Group increased notably, even though they had been outlawed since July 1, 1933. (3)

The group outwardly acted very « loyal to the government » (« regierungstreu ») , which is indicated, for example, by Kainz' participation in the chamber music evenings attended by « Federal Chancellor » (« Bundeskanzler ») , Kurt Schuschnigg, the successor to Chancellor Dollfuß, who had been murdered by the National-Socialists. (4) This illegal NS cell-group had perfectly prepared the take-over of power after the « Anschluß » and had, on March 12, 1938, brought Jerger into the position of provisional leader of the Orchestra. Jerger was formally commissioned, on March 12, 1938, by the « State Secretary of National Culture Leader » (« Landeskultur-Leiter Staatssekretär ») , Hermann Stuppäck, with the provisional leadership of the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic, Vienna, 1st District, « Canovagasse 4 » . (5) On the basis also of newer sources - such as the registration records of former NSDAP members in the « Vienna City and State Archives » (« Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv ») , the records of the former Berlin Document Center in the « Federal Archives Berlin » (« Bundesarchiv Berlin ») , NSDAP membership records, SS records) , as well as « Regional Files » (« Gauakte ») , in the « Austrian Federal Archives » (« Österreichisches Staatsarchiv ») - I have, once again, verified all available names.

On the basis of a list of Vienna Philharmonic members, released on the occasion of the 100 year anniversary celebrations, in 1942, I could ascertain an initial number of 123 active members and 27 retirees.

Up to this point, 60 NSDAP memberships (including their respective identification numbers and accession dates) could be documented - that is to say, in 1942, about 49 % of active Vienna Philharmonic musicians were members of the NSDAP. Up to the end of the War, only 1 more musician who was not a member of the NSDAP was admitted. In Mai 1945, the Austrian authorities at 1st classified 24 memberships as « illegal » , whereby not only membership in the NSDAP, but also active membership in the NSBO was an issue. On average, the « illegals » are born after 1900 (Kainz and Jerger, for example, born in 1902, and Swoboda are of one generation) which is atypical considering the usual age pattern of the NSDAP but, collectively, there is a broad distribution of age. The average age for the base-year 1938, however, (around 37 years) corresponds well with the approximate age of the core-group of the basic cell, Jerger and Kainz. Both lacked being shaped by the First World War and, thus, « frontline experience » (« Fronterlebnis ») is not a general element in the explanation of motives for joining the NSDAP.

In the following, I will give a brief profile of the 2 dominating activists of the NSBO cell-group and try to analyze their character with regard to their socialization and their role, from 1938 to 1945, while also illustrating differences in their actual conduct towards persecuted orchestral members and the NS regime.

Wilhelm Jerger's actual name was Jerabek, (6) and he was born in Vienna, in 1902. It could not be determined when the name change (obviously to delete the Czech traces) was effected. His father, a hair-dresser, had come from Komotau (Chomutov) in Bohemia to Vienna, but had kept his name. Jerger studied music theory and conducting at the « Academy of Music and Performing Arts » (« Akademie für Musik und Darstellende Kunst ») . It was here, where he studied with the renowned musicologist Guido Adler, who, as a Jew, after 1938, was persecuted and whose daughter, Melanie, was murdered in Maly Trostinec, in 1942. Adler, himself, died in Vienna in 1941.

According to his son, Veit, Jerger was evidently deeply-influenced by his Catholic upbringing in the « Schottengymnasium » , in Vienna. (7) In his enrolment volume at the University of Vienna, he lists « German » as his « ethnicity » and not « German-Aryan » , as did the radical German nationalists. Politically, he fits well into the so-called « Catholic-

National interlayer » (« Katholisch-nationale Zwischenschicht ») of the NSDAP - from which came also Arthur Seyß-Inquart, for example. (8)

He was engaged as contrabassist in the State Opera Orchestra, in 1922, and, 2 years later, he became a member of the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic. Jerger was also active as a composer and, after 1938, he repeatedly took a stand for Jewish colleagues and orchestral members with Jewish wives, as illustrated in the contributions of Bernadette Mayrhofer. After he had already intervened for Robitsek, Tyroler, Starkmann, Glattauer and Stwertka, on October 23, 1941, he continued to make efforts to avert the deportation of Viktor Robitsek until the day before, October 27, 1941. (9) He emphatically called the attention of Walter Thomas, « chief advisor » (« Generalreferent ») to « Reich Gauleiter » Schirach, to the poor state of health of Robitsek and his wife, Elsa. She died on May 20, 1942, and her husband, on June 10, 1942, in the ghetto of « Litzmannstadt », as a result of the inhumane living conditions. In both cases, his intervention failed because of Baldur von Schirach, despite having been successful in 1938, in the case of Geringer, who was released from the concentration camp of Dachau, after Jerger's repeated interventions at the request of Mrs. Geringer.

Surrounding Baldur von Schirach to this day is the nimbus of the « different type » of National-Socialist top-official with good middle-class roots, an interest in culture, whose father was the artistic director of the National Theatre of Weimar, from 1909 to 1918, and his mother a U.S. American. In actual fact though, in a closed meeting of « councilmen » (« Ratsherr »), on June 6, 1942, in which Jerger's participation as councilman is highly-likely, Baldur von Schirach « prided himself » « that, by late- autumn or autumn of this year, all Jews will be removed from the city and the removal of the Czechs will be commenced, since this is the necessary and proper response to the criminal act committed upon the deputy « “ Reich ” Protectorate » (« Stellvertretender Reichsprotector »), in Bohemia and Moravia. (10) Just weeks after that, the 4 remaining Philharmonic musicians of Jewish descent were deported and murdered, or died as a result of the extreme conditions of imprisonment.

The horn player, Leopold Kainz, had arrived at the Vienna State Opera Orchestra at about the same time as Jerger (1921) and joined the NSDAP in the 1st district, already in February 1931. Subsequently, during the time of the ban on the Party, he acted as « Deputy Cell-Group Chairman » (« Zellenobmannstellvertreter ») of the Organization Cell-Group State Opera. (11) As his special merits for the NSDAP before 1938, Kainz lists « house searches, interrogations of the State Police and, for some time, was under surveillance by the State Police ». It is noteworthy, by the way, that « Police High-Commissioner » (« Polizeioberkommissar »), Doctor Roman Loos, (12) who was a sponsor of the Vienna Philharmonic, prevented his arrest by the timely disposal of incriminating evidence. In addition, it was confirmed to Kainz, in May 1938, that he had established the Organization Cell-Group State Opera, already in 1931.

In his memoirs, Burghauser describes (without mentioning any names) one of the « most uncontrolled defiers of the old regime, the same horn player, who, in most recently bygone times, used to play along in the chamber music evenings that were arranged by Austrian aristocrats in their apartments, and that were regularly attended by Doctor Kurt Schuschnigg. The fresh-baked spokesman for greater Germany later prided himself with the appropriate authorities by reporting and denouncing the notable personages in attendance ». (13)

Another former member of the Orchestra who was forced to emigrate to the United States also vividly describes the political atmosphere of the days following the « Anschluß » :

He could « well-remember these men, as they ran around Vienna with Swastika arm-bands and treated the remaining members of the Orchestra with the arrogance and brashness typical of Nazis. » (14)

Towards the end of the War, however, his enthusiasm vanished, and, in February 1945, the NSDAP Party offices negatively noted his refusal to participate in the « local group » (« Ortsgruppe ») . In further consequence, Kainz, as chairman of the State Opera Orchestra, vigorously pursued the financial betterment of the orchestral members - also, towards the « Reich » offices in the « Ministry of Information » (« Propagandaministerium ») .

The new leadership of the Vienna Philharmonic, under « general manager » (« Geschäftsführer ») Otto Straßer (candidate for NSDAP membership since July 1, 1938 ; member since April 1, 1940) and « provisional leader » (« kommissarischer Leiter ») Wilhelm Jerger (NSDAP-member since 1932, and member of the SS) , had already, since June 2, 1938, tried to achieve an improvement in the payments to the State Opera, in terms of « Reich » legal provisions. The intended raise to the status of « “ Reich ” Orchestra » (« Reichsorchester ») was, for the time being, denied by the « “ Reich ” Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda » (« Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda ») , because the tariff regulation of cultural Orchestras « for the country of Austria » should only subsequently come into effect.

It is impossible, at this point, to determine with certainty how far membership in the NSDAP could have facilitated an admission to the Orchestra, especially in the days after « March 1938 » . There is 1 documented case, that of viola player Adolf Löffler. In 1935, he was punished with a 3 month detention for the collection of NSDAP membership dues. (15) Löffler was, at that time, engaged in the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. A total of 13 out of 26 musicians who were hired after the « Anschluß » joined the NSDAP or were already members. There was political intervention only in the case of Löffler.

In many aspects, a special case is that of trumpet player Helmut Wobisch, who was admitted in 1939. He had already joined the NSDAP, in 1933, participated in the unsuccessful « July “ Putsch ” » , in 1934, and was a member of the SS since November 1934, (16) where he attained the rank of « Sergeant » (« Unterscharführer ») , in 1944. Since 1940, he also acted as member of the « “ Reich ” Security Head Office » 's (« Reichssicherheitshauptamt ») Security Service (« Sicherheitsdienst » , or SD) , but also as teacher at the « College of Music » (« Musikhochschule ») , in Vienna, as well as leader of the education of wind players in the « Hitler Youth » (« Hitlerjugend ») . As a member of the SD, he also authored political informant reports concerning other musicians, which have partly survived. (17)

Especially unusual is the case of the trumpet player Franz Dengler. He joined the NSDAP 1 month before the « Anschluß » , but for 16 years had been in a long-term relationship with a Jewish woman. In October 1945, she confirmed that he had supported her, in 1942-1943, when she went underground and hid from deportation. He had been in the NSDAP to protect her. (18)

Another case is Franz Bartolomey (the 2nd) , who was the only Party member of the Vienna Philharmonic who was expelled from the NSDAP, in 1942, for hiring a painter who was married to a Jewish woman. (19) At the end of the War, he stayed after a short holiday with his family in western Austria and was immediately expelled as a « renegade Nazi », even though, in contrast to his 55 remaining colleagues, he no longer belonged to the NSDAP. Obviously, there was, here, a strong group within the Vienna Philharmonic that « de facto » accused him of treason for not returning to Vienna at the end of the War.

These examples indicate how manifold the concrete modes of behaviour could be and that, only today, an individual assessment of specific actions during National-Socialism is actually possible. Exactly such an assessment, however, did not take place after 1945, because (with 4 exceptions) the Orchestra was collectively denazified as quickly as possible, against allied resistance, without considering concrete, individual behaviour.

Notes

(1) Clemens Hellsberg. « Demokratie der Könige », Zürich (1992) ; page 464.

(2) Oliver Rathkolb. « Führertreu und Gottbegnadet. Künstlereliten im Dritten Reich », Vienna (1991) .

(3) This is indicated by the numerous questionnaires for admission to the NSDAP in the « Vienna City and State Archives » (« Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv ») that have survived in the « Archives of the Republic » (« Archiv der Republik ») , in Vienna, or the « Federal Archive Berlin » (« Bundesarchiv Berlin ») .

(4) Hugo Burghauser. « Philharmonische Begegnungen », Zürich (1979) ; page 120.

(5) Archive of the Republic, Vienna, « Stillhaltekommissar », 37-C2/8 (1) , questionnaire of March 31, 1938.

(6) Ist discovered by Maren Seliger. « Scheinparlamentarismus im Führerstaat “ Gemeindevertretung ” im Austrofaschismus und Nationalsozialismus. Funktionen und politische Profile Wiener Räte und Ratsherren 1934-1945 im Vergleich », in : « Politik und Zeitgeschichte », Volume 6, Münster (2012) ; page 576.

(7) Veit Jerger. « Journal » (written before 2006) ; page 9. I thank Ms. Saskia Kuhlmann for providing me with extracts of the journal.

(8) Brigitte Behal. « Kontinuitäten und Diskontinuitäten deutsch-nationaler katholischer Eliten im Zeitraum 1930-1965 : ihr Weg und Wandel in diesen Jahren am Beispiel Doktor Anton Böhm, Doktor Theodor Veiters und ihrer katholischen und politischen Netzwerke », dissertation, Vienna (2009) .

(9) AdWPh, folder : Wilhelm Jerger. Letter to Walter Thomas (27 October 1941) .

(10) Vienna City and State Archives, « Bürgermeisterakten » ; page 349 (1946) .

(11) Archive of the Republic, Vienna, « regional file » (« Gauakt ») . Josef Kainz, personnel questionnaire, filled in in hand-writing (24 May 1938) .

(12) <http://www.towson.edu/nurembergpapers/Volume%20X/366Volume%20X%20Document142.htm>

Interrogation Summary, Nürnberg (10 February 1947) . Loos joined the NSDAP in 1933 and was promoted to « Lieutenant Colonel » (« Oberstleutnant ») of the « Military Police » (« Feldpolizei ») in the Balkans, in 1943.

(13) Hugo Burghauser. « Philharmonische Begegnungen. Erinnerungen eines Wiener Philharmonikers » , Zürich / Freiburg (1979) ; page 120.

(14) « Wiener Kurier » (13 September 1946) ; page 4.

(15) Archives of the Republic, « regional file » (« Gauakt ») . Adolf Löffler (19 March 1903) .

(16) Federal Archives Berlin, « SS-Personalakte » Helmut Wobisch, hand-written « résumé » .

(17) Oliver Rathkolb. « Führertreu und Gotbegnadet. Künstlereliten im Dritten reich » , Vienna (1991) ; page 19.

(18) Vienna City and State Archive, « NS-Registrierungsakten » , Franz Dengler.

(19) See : Franz Bartolomey. « Was zählt, ist der Augenblick. Die Bartolomeys. 120 Jahre an der Wiener Staatsoper » , Vienna (2012) .

Honours and Awards (Honorary Members, Rings of Honour, the Nicolai Medal and the « Yellow » List)

(Oliver Rathkolb)

A compilation of the bearers of rings of honour was produced in preparation for the Vienna Philharmonic's Centennial celebrations. (1) It can not currently be reconstructed when exactly the 1st rings were awarded. In the archive of the Vienna Philharmonic, there are clues to a ring from 1928, (2) and it follows from an undated index « Ehrenmitglieder, Träger des Ehrenrings, Nicolai Medaillen » (3) that the 2nd ring bearer, the « Kammersänger » Richard Mayr, had received the ring in 1929.

Below, the list of the 1st ring bearers (dates of the bestowal are not explicitly noted in the original) :

Doctor Felix von Weingartner (honorary member) .

Richard Mayr (« Kammersänger » , honorary member) .

« Staatsrat » Doctor Wilhelm Furtwängler (honorary member) .

« Medizinalrat » Doctor Josef Neubauer (honorary member) .

Lotte Lehmann (« Kammersängerin ») .

Elisabeth Schumann (« Kammersängerin ») .

« Generalmusikdirektor » Professor Hans Knappertsbusch (March 12, 1938, on the occasion of his 50th birthday) .

In the Nazi era, for the 1st time (apart from « Medizinalrat » Doctor Josef Neubauer) , not only artists were distinguished, but also « General Feldmarschall » Wilhelm List (unclear when the ring was presented) ; Baldur von Schirach (30 March 1942) ; Doctor Arthur Seyß-Inquart (30 March 1942) .

Especially, the presentation of the ring to Schirach, in the context of the Centennial celebration, was openly propagated in the newspapers. On March 27, 1942, the chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, Wilhelm Jerger, presented the ring of honour to the « Reichsleiter » , in his bureau at the « Ballhausplatz » :

« Your concern always was that the Orchestra remains in place also during the War. » (4)

Furthermore, Schirach received the Nicolai Medal which, in this case, was awarded for the very 1st time. In return, he decreed the renaming of a part of the « Augustinerstraße » in « Philharmonikerstraße » . Jerger had already meticulously coordinated the overall design of the Centennial celebration in detail with Schirach's general commissioner, Walter Thomas, (5) who himself, on March 27, 1942, received the silver Nicolai Medal. Fritz Trümpi, in his contribution on the association of the Vienna Philharmonic in this project, also referred to the super-intendence of the regional leader (« Gauleiter ») over the association of the Vienna Philharmonic which, by the way, was obviously effective also in the case of the State Opera.

Arthur Seyß-Inquart received the ring on the occasion of a later visit of a delegation of the Vienna Philharmonic, in the occupied Netherlands, and he was distinguished for his merits as regional leader of Vienna and his « active support » for the Vienna Philharmonic, at that time, but also for the funding of a concert of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, Amsterdam, in the context of the Centennial celebration.

In 1950, these clearly political bestowals are no longer brought-up, and also Professor Wilhelm Jerger who had received the ring of honour on March 30, 1942, is not mentioned any longer - « Generalintendant » Professor Clemens Krauß (March 31, 1943) however, as well as Doctor Hans Pfitzner (March 5, 1949) are still mentioned. (6)

Below, some additional ring bearers of the early Second Republic : (7)

Doctor Volkmar Andreæ (19 November 1949) .

Doctor Karl Renner (1950, on the occasion of his 80th birthday) .

Bruno Walter (16 September 1951, on the occasion of his 75th birthday) .

Doctor Karl Böhm (24 August 1954, on the occasion of his 60th birthday) .

« Ministerialrat Diplom-Ingenieur » Ernst Marboe (8 October 1955) .

« Präsident Doktor honoris causa Ingenieur » Manfred Mautner-Markhof (October 1959) .

« Botschafter » Doctor Franz Helmut Leitner (October 1959) .

Wilhelm Backhaus (1961) .

Josef Geringer (25 November 1961) .

Professor Hugo Burghauser (25 November 1961) .

« Ministerialrat » Doctor Alfred Weikert (February 1963) .

Doctor Daniel Falk (May 1963) .

Doctor Otto Mayr (September 1963) .

Professor Doctor Wilhelm Peter (April 1964) .

Franz Bartolomey II (1964) .

Among the honoured persons was I politician, but there were several officials, artists, the lawyer Otto Mayr who had represented many Philharmonic members in the denazification procedures, and the expelled emigrants Burghauser, Geringer and Falk.

A search in this index, however, for the 2nd presentation of the Vienna Philharmonic's ring of honour to Baldur von Schirach, a convicted War criminal released from detention at Spandau, is in vain. One of Schirach's sons, Richard von Schirach, published already, in 2004, a passage on the 2nd presentation of the ring of honour in his book, « Der Schatten meines Vaters » (Munich 2005) , because the 1st ring had, in 1945, supposedly been stolen by a U.S. soldier :

« A professor from Vienna » , according to the now 70 year old, should have conveyed the musicians' highest-honour to his father, after he was, in 1966, discharged from the prison for War criminals in Spandau :

« He came as secret emissary of the Vienna Philharmonic, in order to present the Vienna Philharmonic's ring of honour. » (8)

I have via e-mail attempted to motivate Richard von Schirach to announce the deliverer but have failed, just like the journalist Doctor Marianne Enigl from the « Profil » , or the chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, Professor Clemens Hellsberg. Schirach meant that he, himself, as well as his brother, had back then promised absolute confidentiality to the emissary and that the political debate triggered by member of parliament Harald Walser had only re-inforced his decision. He did also not respond to my proposal of a one-on-one conversation.

While I was still intensively searching for the « Nachlaß » of Wilhelm Jerger, I received a surprising letter from Wilhelm Bettelheim. Without being asked, he informed me in a hand-written letter from January 19, 2013 :

« The man who had presented the Vienna Philharmonic's ring of honour to Baldur von Schirach was “ Tromptengruppe der Wiener Philharmoniker ” Helmut Wobisch. Professor Wobisch was a “ SS-Mann ” and manager of the Vienna Philharmonic, in the year 1966. Professor Krips, an old friend of the family, had related this fact to me, in 1968, on the grounds of the Vienna AKH, on the “ Alserstraße ” at that time. » (9)

I have passed this information on only to the film director Robert Neumüller and have asked him to interview Mister Bettelheim for his TV documentary, « Im Schatten der Vergangenheit - Die Wiener Philharmoniker im Nationalsozialismus » :

Wilhelm Bettelheim seems to me to be a very trustworthy witness. He was born in Vienna, in the last year of War, into a Jewish family which lived in concealment, and he personally knew the conductor Josef Krips.

I have, in further consequence, established contact with the widow of Josef Krips, Harrietta Krips, who lives in Montreux. She could not find any further confirmation in the « Nachlaß » of her husband, but she did however find a correspondence between Wobisch and Krips, in the period in question. After an argument with Krips, Wobisch is also supposed to have given him (quasi as reconciliation) , as manager of the Vienna Philharmonic, a leading-role in the film, « Die Unvollendete. Franz Schubert, Symphonie Nr. 8, D 759, in H-Moll » , produced by Hugo Käch, in April 1969. (10) Krip's 1st wife, Mitzi Krips, was already sick in 1968 ; she returned to Vienna with her husband, in March 1969, and was brought to the hospital on April 3, 1969, where she passed-away 5 days later. (11) Despite numerous investigations into the protocols of the Vienna Philharmonic, as well as at the jeweller who traditionally manufactures the ring, it was not possible to find additional hints to the deliverer. Investigations in the Spandau Prison Records, in the National Archives, College Park, did likewise not bring any results.

Therefore, Wobisch could have indeed been the deliverer. As demonstrated by his SS-file, in the State Archive in Berlin, he was an ardent National-Socialist already prior to 1938 who, after 1945, was a very skilful manager and successful musician. At the same time, he had a great tendency toward conspiracy and, after 1945, skilfully denied his participation in the attempted « July “ Putsch ” » of the National-Socialists. After he was in a tumultuous general assembly, in 1953, elected provisory manager, he requested Federal President Theodor Körner for « hindsight of the atonement consequences according to the prohibitive law of 1947 » . (12) In his request, he claims « to have contributed to the retention during the Nazi era of the Jewish kin and half breeds in the Association of the State Opera Orchestra and, thereby, also as part of the Vienna Philharmonic » . On the basis of the ... , in the meantime, extensive insights into this issue, which have also been analyzed in Bernadette Mayrhofer's contribution, there is no evidence for such a support. Wobisch also did not, in the Nazi era, have the capacity such as Jerger or Kainz to prepare the special permits that were ultimately decided upon in the « Reich » Ministry of Information in Berlin. The highly-energetic Wobisch was, however, known as manager for his authoritarian decisions.

Furthermore, there are no clues of a decision of the chairman - as revealed by inquiries of contemporary witnesses such as Walter Barylli and other retired Philharmonic members, from the time of the presentation of the ring around 1966-1967.

While the private and individual action, in 1966-1967, to present Baldur von Schirach with a duplicate of the ring of honour is about to be clarified, another honour of the Nazi era has to be left open. A recently rediscovered internal plan on the Centennial celebration (13) mentions a Nicolai Medal in gold, engraved with « Dem Führer ». This golden Nicolai Medal, then, is also mentioned in the already quoted index :

« Adolf Hitler with the dedication “ Dem Führer ”. »

This golden medal also appears on the balance sheet to the Centennial celebration. (14) The media then, however, only report on the presentation of the silver Nicolai Medal to Schirach and Thomas, as well as on the ring of honour to Schirach. In the digitized press- and speech- documents of Baldur von Schirach, which were gathered in the context of a project on the digitalization of the Regional Press Archive, there are also no clues on this originally intended presentation.

Unfortunately, there is a lack in the protocols of the extraordinary general assembly from March 25, 1942, in which these honours were decided. Arthus Seyß-Inquart, then « Reich » commissioner for the occupied Netherlands, thus, also received the ring of honour. Furthermore, the Nicolai Medal was awarded to numerous other persons :

With name engraving in silver :

Baldur von Schirach.

Doctor Artur Seyß-Inquart.

Doctor Friedrich Rainer.

Doctor Albert Reitter.

Doctor Erwin Kerber.

« Stadtrat Diplom-Ingenieur » Hanns Blaschke.

Schirach, Seyß-Inquart, Reitter and Blaschke were high-ranking representatives of the Nazi State who, after 1945, were in most cases also classified as War criminals. Reitter had, by the way, at the Salzburg Festival in 1938, denounced Hugo Burghauser while he was still performing with the Orchestra.

Further Nicolai Medals were received in 1942 by amongst others :

Contributors to the Festschrift

Professor Joseph Marx.

Doctor Gerhard Hauptmann.

Erwin Guido Kolbenheyer.

Doctor Josef Weinheber.

Max Mell.

Heinrich Ritter von Srbik.

Doctor Aurel Wolfram.

In the media were mentioned also :

« Diplom-Ingenieur » Rudolf Töpfer (« Reichsbahnpräsident ») .

Doctor Willem Mengelberg.

Conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic

Doctor Richard Strauß.

« Staatsrat » Doctor Wilhelm Furtwängler.

« Generalmusikdirektor » Hans Knappertsbusch.

Clemens Krauß, « Intendant München » .

Doctor Karl Böhm, « Generalmusikdirektor Dresden » .

« Generalmusikdirektor » Leopold Reichwein.

Doctor Ernst von Dohnányi.

« Staatskapellmeister » Rudolf Moralt.

Franz Léhar.

Wilhelm Wacek.

Added in a different writing

Bruno Walter (presented in 1947) .

On January 14, 1943, additional Nicolai Medals in silver, and without a date, were awarded to : Heinrich Damisch (Vienna) , Wilhelm Altmann and Georg Richard Kruse (both in Berlin) , as well as Gustav Bosse (Regensburg) .

The Vienna Philharmonic kept their distance from the Nazi regime only in the case of honorary memberships, which were defined as follows :

« The honorary membership for all those founders, sponsors, subscribers, friends and members, who by their quite extraordinary achievements have contributed an essential part to the great artistic, economic or social success of the Orchestra. » (15)

Honorary membership awarded to Doctor Hans Richter.

« Fürstin » Pauline Metternich-Sándor.

Doctor Arthur von Krupp.

Maria von Thielen.

« Diplom-Ingenieur » Magnus Taeklind.

Doctor Jerome Stoneborough.

Doctor Felix von Weingartner.

Richard Mayr, « Kammersänger » .

Professor Robert Fuchs.

« Gräfin » Johanna Hartenau-Battenberg.

Ritter von Aichried Emil Sauer.

Doctor Josef Neubauer.

Doctor Richard Strauß.

« Staatsrat » Doctor Wilhelm Furtwängler.

« Gesandter » Doctor Emil Junkar.

« Hofrat » Professor Arnold Rosé.

« Hofrat » Doctor Franz Schmidt.

Mæstro Arturo Toscanini.

Professor Wilhelm Backhaus.

Envoy Baron Georg Frankenstein (in retrospect, delayed by the War events, 1939-1945 ; presented by Professor Fritz Sedlak, in December 1945 - thus, the note in the index) .

« Generalmusikdirektor » Professor Bruno Walter.

Professor Rudolf Jettmar.

Vera de Villiers.

Professor Franz Schütz, « Präsident der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » .

Doctor Friedrich Werner, « Vizepräsident der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » .

Doctor Hedwig Kraus, « Archivarin der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » .

Professor Doctor Nikolaus Jagic.

Hermine Kittel, « Kammersängerin » .

Anny Konetzny, « Kammersängerin » .

Georg Maikl, « Kammersänger » .

Hans Pernter, « Minister außer Dienst » ; due to political events presented upon the libarion of Austria by Professor Fritz Sedlak, in January 1946.

1942 : « Generalmusikdirektor » Professor Hans Knappertsbusch.

1949 : Doctor Hans Pfitzner.

1951 : Professor Clemens Krauß.

1955 : Doctor Karl Böhm.

1960 : Maria Mautner-Markhof.

1960 : Karl Schuricht.

1962 : Doctor Heinrich Drimmel.

1962 : Doctor Josef Klaus.

1963 : « Präsident-Ingenieur » Manfred Mautner-Markhof.

1967 : Fritz Sedlak.

1967 : Hugo Burghauser.

In summary, it can be noted that the bestowal of rings of honour and Nicolai Medals to high-ranking NSDAP-functionaries and the unresolved Nicolai Medal in gold for Adolf Hitler constitutes a highly-inglorious ingratiating to the totalitarian and inhuman Nazi regime. These honours, to my knowledge, have hitherto never been officially nullified.

The « Yellow List »

In stark contrast stands the racial stigmatisation of Jewish artists in the comprehensive statistics, on the occasion of the Centennial anniversary in 1942. On a « yellow leaflet », a list of « Jews or half breeds » is given, which was prepared on the basis of the « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » of Theo Stengel and Herbert Gerigk (Berlin, 1940) . According to oral tradition, the publication was otherwise in danger of being withdrawn. (16) A just recently discovered work list shows (17) that this « labelling » ultimately remained incomplete - Daniel Falk, Paul Fischer, Josef Geringer, Moriz Glattauer, Viktor Robitsek, Berthold Salander, Max Starkmann and Ludwig Wittels were « forgotten » . Friedrich Buxbaum, Armin Tyroler, Anton Weiß, on the other hand, are listed as well as Alma and Arnold Rosé.

What is peculiar, however, is that the internal anti-Semitic work list is, in fact, complete but, in the case of individual former Vienna Philharmonic as well as for more than 50 « Non-Aryans » , these additions do not appear on the printed list - the « work list » thus contains also non-Philharmonic, artists that have performed together with the Philharmonic. The stigmatization is, in the end, limited for the most part to those who were quoted in the « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » . No clear reply may be given to the question why the stigmatization was at first omitted, as in other publications but, then still, the leaflet (albeit incomplete) was produced. Also, the concerned people's very correct form of address at first as « personalities » (« Persönlichkeiten ») in order to, then, clearly exclude them racially as « Non-Aryans » , raises more questions than answers. The editors of this volume obviously felt uncomfortable with the per se mandatory stigmatization of Jews in books. At the same time, it becomes evident how strongly the attribution of Jewish descent had become burnt into the minds of people far beyond the official Nazi lexica.

Judged on the whole, this « yellow list » of exclusion remains the extreme opposite to the flood of honours of Nazi potentates and supports of the Nazi regime in the cultural sphere, in the year 1942.

Notes

(1) Archive of the Vienna Philharmonic, Depot State Opera. Folder on the Centennial celebrations 1942, list of the honorary members.

(2) Information from Doctor Silvia Kargl, AdWPh.

(3) This undated booklet was discovered in the Archive of the Vienna Philharmonic during its investigation by Doctor Silvia Kargl for possibly new documents for this project, in February 2013.

(4) « Neues Wiener Tagblatt » (28 March 1942) .

(5) Archive Vienna Philharmonic, Depot State Opera. Folder I, file memo (15 January 1942) .

(6) « Schweizerische Musikzeitung » : « Revue musicale suisse » , volume 90 (1950) ; page 28.

(7) Unpaginated index « Ehrenmitglieder, Träger des Ehrenrings, Nicolai Medaillen » , heading « Träger des Ehrenrings » .

(8) Marianne Engil. « Götterdämmerung, profil » (19 January 2013) :
http://www.profil.at/articles/1303/560/353783_s3/goetterdaemmerung-wiener-philharmonikern

(9) « Der Mensch, der Baldur von Schirach den Ehrenring der Philharmoniker überreichte, war Helmut Wobisch. Professor Wobisch war SS-Mann und im Jahre 1966 Geschäftsführer der Wiener Philharmoniker. Professor Krips, ein alter Freund der Familie, hat mir diese Tatsache 1968 auf dem Gelände des damaligen Wiener AKHs in der Alserstraße erzählt. »

(10) Telephone conversation of the author with Harrietta Krips (2 March 2013) . In this respect, see also : Josef Krips. « Ohne Liebe kann man keine Musik machen. » , « Erinnerungen, herausgegeben und kommentiert von Harrietta Krips » , Vienna (1994) ; page 548.

(11) Krips. « Ohne Liebe » ; page 419.

(12) « Archiv der Republik, Wien, Bestand Präsidentschaftskanzlei, Zl. 8022 (1953) . »

(13) Archive of the Vienna Philharmonic, Depot State Opera. Folder I, internal plan.

(14) Archive of the Vienna Philharmonic, Depot State Opera. Folder I, balance sheet, Centennial celebration.

(15) « Die Ehrenmitgliedschaft für all jene Gründer, Förderer, Abonnenten, Freunde und Mitglieder, die durch ihre ganz außerordentlichen Leistungen einen wesentlichen Teil zu großen künstlerischen, wirtschaftlichen oder sozialen Erfolgen des Orchesters beigetragen haben. »

Denazification and the Long Shadow of the Past in the 1950's and 1960's

(Oliver Rathkolb) (1)

The most distinctive example of the insurmountable conflict of priorities in cultural denazification (namely, the demand of artistic performance while simultaneously eliminating National-Socialist thought by rigorous personnel cleansing) was represented by the political classification of a collective Orchestra such as the Vienna Philharmonic.

While especially British and U.S.-American cultural affairs officers initially had clear instructions and various « black lists » for individual cultural performers to prevent all artists charged with National-Socialism from public appearance (in order to completely eliminate National-Socialist ideology by means of a kind of « cool down » period and an eventual « exchange of elites ») , they could not assert themselves with this Orchestra. The Vienna Philharmonic formed a unified Orchestra that was well-known internationally and especially in Europe but, at the same time, had the « technical » drawback of a disproportionately high-rate of former National-Socialist Party members - amongst them, numerous « illegals » (« Illegale » : i.e. , Party members during the Party ban, from 1933 to 1938) . Such a difficulty was not presented to the Americans in the former « Reich » capital, Berlin : there, only 20 of around 110 musicians had belonged to the NSDAP. (2) By comparison, in the beginning of 1943, out of 123 Philharmonic in Vienna, 60 or about 50 % had belonged to the NSDAP ; (3) at least 22 of these, in turn, were « illegals » , and 2 were members of the « Schutzstaffel » (SS) . (4)

1st tangible contact with U.S. cultural affairs officers was made in September 1945, when contact talks about the Philharmonic were held with the provisional leader of the Philharmonic, Fritz Sedlak, and the director of the Vienna State Opera. (5) There had originally been rumours that 70 to 85 % of the orchestral members were supposed to have been NSDAP members, but Sedlak claimed that, out of 135 members of the State Opera orchestra (not all orchestral musicians of the State Opera are automatically also members of the Vienna Philharmonic) , only 34 had been Party members. (6) Also, in their struggle against a further denazification of the Orchestra, the musicians attempted to win the Americans over with the help of the Opera's administrative director, Matthäus Flitsch. (7)

A special characteristic in the negotiations with the Concert Master of the Philharmonic was that the U.S. cultural affairs officer, Otte de Pasetti, who as the life partner of Lotte Lenya-Weill had, for private reasons, gone to the USA already before 1938, was faced with a « fait accompli » and had to adapt to the present circumstances. It was still in the last days of the War that the former chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, the contrabassist Wilhelm Jerger, who also was a member of the SS and the « Ahnenerbe » , (8) made his position available. (9) According to Philharmonic member Otto Straßer who, already in 1938, had played a central part in the transition of power, there were secret talks with Wilhelm Furtwängler, 10 months before the end of the War, in order to quickly conduct the imminent internal « transition of power » . Jerger had, in 1938, assumed the leading position from Hugo Burghauser who, after the « annexation » , as sympathizer of the Fatherland's Front and as « Jewish kin » (« jüdisch versippt ») was declared politically unsustainable and, later, had to withdraw from the State Opera Orchestra. (11)

The successor to Jerger, Fritz Sedlak, was successful in holding the Orchestra together and bringing it safely through the final turmoil of War. Due to his knowledge of Russian, which he had acquired as prisoner during the First World War, he could lead the talks with Soviet occupation officers himself. (12)

The Soviet cultural policy was entirely oriented towards an immediate resumption of cultural life and, therefore, it was not difficult for him to win many a help for his Orchestra which, under Clemens Krauß and Robert Fanta and without extensive denazification, again gave its 1st concerts. (13)

The denazification measures, themselves, were kept within limits, because Sedlak (a politically integer man) successfully intervened at the State Secretary for National Edification, Schooling and Education as well as Religious Affairs in the provisional State government Renner, Ernst Fischer, a communist official who had returned from Moscow ; he unreservedly took a stand for the conservation of this unique Orchestra. (14) Formal NSDAP Party membership alone should not be reason for a discharge. An internal « denazification commission » , next to ministry officials, was staffed also by a Philharmonic, (15) and this orchestral member was one of those « rescued half breeds and Jewish kin » who, in 1938, was spared discharge after Furtwängler's intervention. (16) During a press conference, in April 1946, Sedlak attempted to justify the fact that discharges or retirements of Party members in the Orchestra were only handled reservedly. (17) After the end of War, 4 heavily charged musicians were immediately discharged - 2 men of the SS, an illegal, and allegedly a former Blockwart-helper. (18) 14 further orchestral members were retired - in which were included also some not National-Socialist.

Rudolf Kalmar, local head of the all-Party newspaper « Neues Österreich » , who had survived the concentration camps of Dachau and Flossenbürg, took Sedlak's press conference as an occasion to plead for a milder persecution of former National-Socialists, using the example of the Philharmonic. (19) In an editorial article, he reckoned that the Orchestra has to be conceded a higher-degree of « world-otherness » (« Weltfremdheit ») and that an example has to be set, which should constitute an « open and resolute confession of one's own error of yesterday » and could also amount to a justification of a sort in front of the abroad countries. At this press conference, Fritz Sedlak had given the legality declaration to federal president Renner, (20) condemned the past with harsh words, and announced concerts, the net yield of which should flow-back to the relatives of those earlier orchestral colleagues who, after 1938, had fallen victim to National-Socialism.

Up to this point, the 2 great occupying powers deliberately practiced restraint in this issue. The chief-editor of the « Wiener Kurier » , Hendric J. Burns, (21) as well as the « Austriacus » in the « Österreichische Zeitung » (22) reckoned that a temporarily less well-equipped Orchestra would be much more in line with the tradition of the Vienna Philharmonic. Protest from within the ranks of the Philharmonic reached to the address of the U.S. theatre officer, Henry C. Alters, a Viennese emigrant who, at that time, was solely responsible for theatre and music in Vienna, because the pianist and music-officer Margot Pinter had left the Information Services Branch (ISB) . (23) Mrs. Pinter had been completely in line with Sedlak, because she herself as pianist placed the issue of the performative quality far above the issue of the political responsibility of the musicians. (24) Moreover, she did not attach great importance to the formal Party membership or candidature, with the rational that musicians were deeply apolitical people. She was, furthermore, incapable of compensating an additional emotional handicap : she had already performed with the Philharmonic, in Vienna, and suddenly saw herself being pressed into the role of a judge of denazification, who (at least, according to the views of general McChrystal) was supposed to discharge as many Party members as possible and maintain but a rudimentary orchestration with only the most important instruments. (25)

The 6 musicians who had complained towards « Alter » revealed a certain weakness in the numeral reasoning of Sedlak, because out of the total of 14 retired colleagues, 4 were permanently retired not due to their Party membership, but due to their age ; another group of 6 artists should have been retired years ago, but precisely because of their membership in the NSDAP could retain their position in the Orchestra. (26) Doubts were raised also towards the claim of the provisional chairman that insufficient other musicians of suitable artistic skills were available. (27)

The discussion concerning the Philharmonic fell silent during the following months due to the Salzburg Festival and because the denazification of Herbert von Karajan and Wilhelm Furtwängler was prioritized. The Philharmonic did, indeed, perform at the Salzburg Festival, but 3 charged orchestral members were denied solo performance by U.S. cultural affairs officer, Ernst Lothar, who had returned from exile. (28) A repeated review of this music ensemble on the level of the Allied Denazification Bureau of the Allied Commission started in September. The American representative of this council, Maximilian Wallach, put forward the publicly voiced concerns about the Nazi members in the Orchestra and demanded a meeting with the responsible Austrians, because it had so far been impossible to receive detailed documents from them. (29)

Occasion for this investigation was a planned abroad trip of the Philharmonic ; in the issuance of « travel permits » , the attention of French offices was, again, called to the political past of individual Philharmonic members. At the conference of members of the Allied Denazification Bureau and representatives of the Federal Ministry of Education as well as the Federal Theatre Administration, it was especially the head of the Federal Theatre Administration, Egon Hilbert, detained as political prisoner in the « KZ-Dachau » , from 1938 to 1945, who wanted to substantiate the view of the former State secretary Fischer that artists are to be judged by different criteria in terms of politics. (30) Furthermore, efforts would have shown that it was impossible to find appropriate substitutions. In response to the specific question about the exact number of former National-Socialists in the Orchestra, Hilbert responded :

« Out of 133 members of the State Opera, 45 are former Party members, and 13 former Party members had been excluded from the Philharmonic Orchestra, including the ones who resigned, and the ones who had been pensioned with a reduction of pay. » (31)

Towards the end of the briefing, the representative of the Ministry of Education admitted that the Philharmonic Orchestra was the only institution in his ministry's responsibility in which « illegals » were employed. (32) In further consequence, the Allied Denazification Bureau demanded a more intense cooperation and further information in the form of questionnaires.

The charged members of the Orchestra could not be taken on a tour to France and Switzerland, because they had not received travel permits. Substitutes took their place and, despite these improvisations, the guest performances were conducted without any damage to the Orchestra's image. (33) In this case, as in other cultural denazification measures, the Information Services Branch had lost its decisive function and was only approached as a consultant. Concerning the stage ban of « illegal » ensemble members, there was principally no discussion between the Special Branch and the Information Services Branch. (34) It was especially in the United States that the high-rate of former National-Socialists, in the ranks of the Vienna Philharmonic, was criticized. (35) Also, the world-famous solo violinist, Bronisław Huberman, declared not to come to Vienna « before the last Nazi has disappeared from Viennese musical life » . (36)

Illegal musicians (i.e. , those who were NSDAP-members during the Party ban, from 1933 to 1938) should originally be immediately discharged, according to the beliefs of all members in the Allied Denazification Bureau - without regard of their artistic irreplaceability in view of the entire Orchestra. (37) To this group of « illegals » were counted also those Nazi Party members who had faked allied questionnaires and concealed their political past. For this reason, the U.S. representative in the Allied Denazification Bureau prompted the ISB Information Service Branch to, at 1st, submit their « technical opinion » on only 23 « less incriminated » (« minder belastet ») orchestral members. (38) For the time being, he did not want to discuss the case of the 28 musicians who were to be immediately discharged. This stance, however, was opposed by the British cultural officer and Austrian political emigrant, Peter Schnabel. (39) He requested that the Vienna Philharmonic should be preserved in their entirety and that only 2 to 3 politically unacceptable artists should be discharged (40) - thereby, he was fully in line with the official Austrian standpoint. Moreover, he pointed to the new National-Socialist law (« Nationalsozialistengesetz ») which would come into effect 2 months later and provide new guide-lines and legal possibilities to the Austrians.

A further delay was declined in the joint meeting of the Denazification Bureau and the Quadripartite Press and Entertainment Sub-Committee primarily by the Soviet representative Aristowa, but also by the French and Americans. A total number of 23 cases came-up for discussion, and the ISB-representative Albert van Eerden began with an extensive statement about Concert Master Wolfgang Scheiderhan, whom he described as a « never more than lukewarm member of the Nazi Party » ; (41) an unanimous positive decision was subsequently achieved. In 13 further cases, all cultural and denazification officers voted for a stage permission. (42) Only twice was a discharge decided upon unanimously, whereas the Austrians had in their documents denied political acceptability only in the case of a violinist. The U.S. denazification officer abided closely by the recommendations of van Eerden, who had taken-over the responsibility of the denazification of the Philharmonic from Ernst Lothar ; only in 2 cases, the Americans voted for the removal of charged musicians and, in 2 further ones, no judgement could be delivered concerning the « substitutability » for a lack of documents. In the case of 6 musicians, the Soviet representatives, lieutenant Shour for the Denazification Department and Miss Aristowa for the Soviet Information Service, demanded a discharge without immediate discharge, and, only once, the French and the Soviets agreed on a veto.

In this debate, the alteration in the Soviet denazification policy in cultural issues is clearly illustrated. Shortly after the end of the Second World War, conductor Josef Krips, who for racial reasons was imposed with a stage ban during the Nazi era, (43) was ultimately prompted by the cultural officers of the Red Army to perform with the entire Orchestra of the Vienna Philharmonic - including those members charged with National-Socialism. (44)

While the Western Allies agreed that only a gradual denazification of the Orchestra was possible (a point on which most emphasis was placed by the Americans) , the Soviet representative in the Sub-Committee for Press and Entertainment meant that an immediate discharge should follow also in the case of those unacceptable and « less incriminated » . (45)

Already a month later, however, the Allied Denazification Bureau was forced to ask for an expert opinion from the ISB Information Service Branch also on those illegals immediately to be discharged. (46) 19 were denoted as artistically irreplaceable while, in the case of the remaining 9 musicians, a replacement could be found on short notice. (47) In the view of the State Theatre Administration and the Representation of the State Opera Orchestra, however, all 28 were irreplaceable. Even though the Allied Denazification Office of the department 2N in the Office of the Federal Chancellor had, in June 1947, conveyed a definite list of the 28 members of the State Opera and Philharmonic Orchestra to be immediately discharged, (48) a corresponding reaction on the side of the Austrians remained absent.

Characteristic, although possibly not deliberately planned, was the Philharmonic's 1st big post-War tour to Great Britain, (49) whose representatives in the Cultural Department as well as in the Foreign Office had already very early on argued in support of an omission of the denazification, in order to preserve the homogeneity of the Orchestra. (50)

The U.S. experts could not assert themselves in any stage, because the Soviets themselves who, until the involvement of the Western Allies in the administration of Vienna, were completely in line with their idea of cultural reconciliation, had taken almost no denazification measures and, in the suspension of legal regulations, showed great leniency towards the relevant Austrian authorities. The Americans did attempt to revise this « fait accompli » on the level of the Allied Commission, but the Austrians had already established their position to such an extent that even a joint decision of the Allies to discharge the « illegal » Philharmonic could not have change the situation.

According to the views of the author, it is inaccurate to denote the factual sacrifice of the Vienna Philharmonic's denazification as an unintended failure of the U.S. cultural denazification policy which, in 1945-1946, was oriented solely towards individual cases. On the one hand, it was only in 1946-1947 that the discussion of the political assessment of the Orchestra was held in specific terms on an Allied level, on the other hand, in the eyes of the U.S. cultural officers the Philharmonic represented a primarily cultural instrument of international importance. Within the Information Services Branch and in the United States, there had however also been discussions about whether the retention of such a high-number of Party members would not damage the Orchestra. In the end, a formal Allied Resolution was passed in 1947 to discharge a majority of the illegals, in practice though enforcement against Austrian resistance was eschewed.

The priorities were redefined after, in January 1947, 52 % of the respondents in an American opinion survey in Vienna spoke-out in favour for the retention of the Orchestra in its « nazified » form. The Americans and the Allies obviously wanted to avoid a scandal in this issue which, by no means, was any longer amongst the main concerns of the occupation administration - not least because the Austrians, despite not knowing the Philharmonic personally, perceived the denazification of the Orchestra as an allied intervention and violation of national pride. (51)

How inaccurate the specific « denazification » could ultimately be (initially also due to a lack of appropriate NSDAP-documents, such as the SS-records of Wilhelm Jerger and Helmut Wobisch, for example) is exemplified by the special case of Franz Bartolomey. (52) Was he a « top-Nazi », like Wilhelm Jerger, the chairman of the Orchestra, Helmut Wobisch and Adolf Löffler, since he was discharged together with these colleagues immediately after the liberation in 1945 ? In recent years, a new source in the Vienna City and State Archive on the denazification procedures has become available, i.e. , those procedures which decided whether an illegal membership existed during the Party ban of the NSDAP, from 1933 to 1938. Furthermore, the various denazification commissions decided upon active and passive voting rights as well as in the professional domain in the case of officials upon discharge and retirement or suspension and atonement payments. Advanced and enhanced by means of documents from Bartolomey's correspondence provided to me by his son, suddenly a completely different picture emerged.

Even though Bartolomey (and this is an important difference to all of the other re-integrated former NSDAP-members) had been excluded from the NSDAP in 1942, some colleagues in the Orchestra made use of his absence towards the end of the War to talk him up as « top-Nazi », which surely was not the case. He was indeed German-nationally socialized in the context of the « Gymnastics Club » (« Turnverein ») and the « Youth League » (« Jugendbund »), but, as compared to 36 % of the orchestral members, he was not active for the NSDAP already before the « annexation », in 1938. He was engaged as a substitute, already in 1937, and, in 1938, profited from the racially motivated discharges - amongst them, 11 string players who as Jews were excluded and discharged. As early as May-June 1938, he should succeed in an audition in which, out of 97 applicants, 7 string players were engaged for the State Opera and, already in July, he requested the NSDAP-membership. On November 4, 1939, he was with retroactive effect of November 1, 1938, accepted in the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic. This contract of 1938 also meant for Bartolomey an end to his great existential anxiety, which had haunted him since the death of his father, in 1920. He joined the NSDAP already in 1938 but, for the time being, was accepted only as Party candidate and, on June 1, 1940, received the membership number 7.676.908. In 1942, however, he was excluded due to being denounced for having engaged a painter who was married to a Jewish woman.

What was lacking in the case of Franz Bartolomey II though was the « air-raid shelter experience » of the last days of War because, after an approved holiday, he stayed on with his family and was suddenly branded a quitter and outsider. Obviously, some decision-makers, in 1945, were quite happy to find former NSDAP-members who (without a chance to react) could quickly be excluded in order to signalize a symbolic denazification. In the end, it also turned out to be a group of former hardcore-Nazis who almost managed to prevent his return. The « case Bartolomey » demonstrates how complex group-dynamic processes affected the denazification policy, especially in the case of the State Opera Orchestra or the Vienna Philharmonic, and how great Nazis could be created from followers (« Mitläufer »), and vice-versa.

At least, Helmut Wobisch was, in 1953, appointed manager of the Vienna Philharmonic and kept this position until 1969. I have described Wobisch's case in detail in my contribution on the honours. In his (tumultuous) election, as manager in 1953, he was actually not entitled to actively vote, because he had still not been amnestied by the federal president from the « atonement consequences » of his participation in the attempted « coup d'État », in July 1934. In an express procedure, this amnesty was, then, made-up for, whereby in contortion of the facts, Wobisch's past was interpreted completely on the contrary.

Wilhelm Jerger, on the other hand, escaped a trial for illegality (53) in front of the People's Court (« Volksgericht »), because he was in U.S. custody, in Glasenbach. His intended denazification procedure (54) for a possible return to the State Opera Orchestra and, thereby also, to the Vienna Philharmonic is especially interesting and, not yet, extensively evaluated, but this will first have to be analyzed on the basis of other source materials. While Jerger's role was rudimentarily addressed by Clemens Hellsberg in his book, « Demokratie der Könige » (1992) - the account of which was taken note of with partial displeasure (55) by his son, Veit Jerger - the Anton Bruckner Private University, the former Bruckner-Conservatory, needed until the year 2009 to attend to the question of Jerger's past, even though he had acted as its director, from 1958 to 1973. (56) And yet, as can be seen by the contributions to this project of Bernadette Mayrhofer and myself, such a pursuit would have yielded quite an ambivalent picture.

Jerger was appointed director of the Bruckner-Conservatory, on August 15, 1958, after he had gone to Switzerland, in 1948, and started to establish himself a 2nd life as musicologist. According to Jerger's son, there had supposedly also been accusations about his father's Nazi-past at the time of his appointment which, however, were invalidated by Simon Wiesenthal. (57) Incidentally, Wilhelm Jerger later received the « Franz-Schalk-Medal » in silver from the Vienna Philharmonic. Also, in this case, it would be important to investigate the circumstances of this bestowal.

Taken as a whole, the single cases that, here, were only briefly outlined document the fact that it is absolutely necessary to consult a wide-range of sources in an assessment of the behaviour of single orchestral members. A 1st evaluation of the initially mentioned documents from the Nazi era in various Viennese archives, corresponding denazification documents, and files from the State Archive in Berlin allow for a clearer appraisal which, however, includes all the possibilities of political behaviour and which can ultimately only be achieved with academic accuracy by case studies such as the ones on Franz Bartolomey or Wilhelm Jerger, as well as Helmut Wobisch.

Notes

(1) This follows a partially updated and revised version of a chapter of my unpublished dissertation, « Politische Propaganda der amerikanischen Besatzungsmacht in Österreich 1945 bis 1950 : Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Kalten Krieges in der Presse-, Kultur- und Rundfunkpolitik », Vienna (1981) ; pages 395-406.

(2) Fritz Trümpi. « Politisierte Orchester. Die Wiener Philharmoniker und das Berliner Philharmonische Orchester », Vienna (2011) ; page 189.

(3) Rudolf Kalmar. « Die Philharmoniker », in : « Neues Österreich » (7 March 1946) . Egon Hilbert, in his draft for a lecture in the cabinet by the minister of education, Felix Hurdes, mentions a slightly higher number : 48 (BW Zl. 1265/1946) .

(4) « Archiv der Republik, Bestand Bundeskanzleramt (BKA) -Verbindungsstelle », Zl. 2153/XXXIII, page 2 ; and Rudolf Kalmar. « Die Philharmoniker », in : « Neues Österreich » (7 March 1946) ; page 2.

(5) National Archives (NA) , College Park, Maryland, Record Group (RG) 260/35/Folder : Theatre & Music Section, Otto de Pasetti - Vienna activities report (13-14 September 1945) ; page 2.

(6) Ibid.

(7) In this respect, see most recently : Tamara Ehs. « Innerlich stets austrophil », in : « Die Presse » (18 January 2013 - <http://diepresse.com/home/spectrum/zeichenderzeit/1334505/Innerlich-stets-austrophil>, accessed on 10 March 2013) .

(8) « Bundesarchiv Berlin », formerly : Berlin Document Center, personal file : Wilhelm Jerger.

(9) Otto Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt. Mein Leben mit den Wiener Philharmonikern », Vienna (1974) ; page 218.

(10) « Wiener Stadt- und Landesarchiv », National-Socialist registration, Otto Straßer ; the original writing of Wilhelm Furtwängler, which confirms this information by Straßer, is unfortunately no longer enclosed, but it is however quoted in the file.

(11) Hugo Burghauser. « Philharmonische Begegnungen. Erinnerungen eines Wiener Philharmonikers », Zürich (1997) ; page 111ff.

(12) Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt » ; page 218.

(13) Erwin Mittag. « Aus der Geschichte der Wiener Philharmoniker », Vienna (1950) ; page 96 ff.

(14) Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt » , page 222 ; Ernst Fischer. « Das Ende einer Illusion. Erinnerungen 1945-1955 » ; page 138.

(15) Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt » ; page 222.

(16) This would have probably been the trombone player Professor Josef Hadraba (Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt » ; page 222 - in connection with : National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/95/Folder : Music & Theatre, Furtwängler to Kerber, 20 August 1938, and BW Zl. 2647/1945, supplement) .

(17) « Wiener Kurier » (9 March 1946) , page 2 ; « Österreichische Zeitung » (12 March 1946) , page 6.

(18) Rudolf Kalmar. « Die Philharmoniker » , in : « Neues Österreich » (7 March 1946) ; page 2.

(19) Ibid. The later executive editor of the « Neuen Österreich » could convincingly communicate such serious and conciliatory statements, because he had been incarcerated in the concentration camps of Dachau and Flossenbürg, from 1938 to 1945 (in this respect, see : Rudolf Kalmar. « Zeit ohne Gnade » , Vienna 1946) .

(20) Rudolf Kalmar. « Die Philharmoniker » , in : « Neues Österreich » (7 March 1946) ; page 2. The legality declaration read :

« All members wholeheartedly confess themselves to the new Austria, utterly disaffirm the past, and also are at any time willing to confirm this confession in deeds. » (BWV Zl. 1246/1946) .

(21) « Wiener Kurier » (9 March 1946) ; page 2.

(22) « Österreichische Zeitung » (12 March 1946) ; page 6.

(23) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/892/Folder : Music & Theatre Reports 1945-1947, « Alter an Theater » and Music Officer - Semi-Monthly Report No. 9 (15 April 1946) ; page 2ff.

(24) Communication of Professor Margot Voigt-Pinter to the author (28 July 1979) . Anton Voigt. « Nicht Richter, sondern Helfer. Die Pianistin Margot Pinter als Cultural Officer der amerikanischen Militärverwaltung. Zur “ Entnazifizierung von Musik ” » , in : « “ Kulturhauptstadt des Führers ”. Kunst und Nationalsozialismus in Linz und Oberösterreich. Ein Projekt der Oberösterreichischen Landesmuseen in Kooperation mit Linz 2009 Kulturhauptstadt Europas » . [« Zur Ausstellung im Schloßmuseum, Linz 17. September 2008 bis 22. März 2009] (« Kataloge der Oberösterreichischen Landesmuseen Neue Serie, Nr. 78) ; pages 261-268.

(25) Ibid.

(26) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/892/Folder : Music & Theatre Reports 1945-1947, « Alter an Theater » and Music Officer - Semi-Monthly Report, No. 9 (15 April 1946) ; page 2.

(27) Ibid. ; page 3. While already in the summer of 1945, in the course of a temporary consolidation of the orchestras of the State Opera and the « Volksoper » , also other musicians had successfully performed together with the Philharmonicists, these were then, again, discharged as soon as a sufficient number of « old » Philharmonicists were available, who partially were politically charged.

(28) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/892/Folder : Music & Theatre Reports 1945-1947, Lothar to Chief, ISB Semi-Monthly Report (15 August 1946) ; page 3.

(29) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/547/7, Hefti - Record of Work (27 September 1946) .

(30) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/44/29, Wallach - Record of Work (3 October 1945) ; page 1.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Ibid. ; page 3.

(33) Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt » ; page 234.

(34) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/547/7, Joint Minutes of the Denazification Bureau and Quadripartite Press and Entertainment Sub-Committee (19 December 1946) .

(35) « Wiener Kurier » (13 September 1946) ; page 4.

(36) « Österreichische Zeitung » (12 March 1946) ; page 6.

(37) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/547/7 Joint Minutes of the Denazification Bureau and Quadripartite Press and Entertainment Sub-Committee (19 December 1946) ; page 1.

(38) Ibid. ; page 3ff. In connection with National Archives, Washington, D.C. 260/44/29, Allen an van Eerden - Philharmonic Orchestra (27 November 1946) .

(39) Peter Schnabel fled to Great Britain, in 1938, because, as former battalion commander in the « Heimwehr » , he feared political restrictions by the National-Socialists. After the outbreak of the Second World War, he joined the British army and was, in 1945, deployed as information officer in Hannover and Düsseldorf. In 1946, he returned to Austria on his own terms. (Communication by Major a. D. Peter Schnabel to the author, 20 May 1981.)

(40) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/54/7, Joint Minutes of the Denazification Bureau and Quadripartite Press and Entertainment Sub-Committee (19 December 1946) ; page 1f.

(41) Ibid. ; page 3.

(42) Ibid. ; page 3ff.

(43) Krips was initially discharged as general musical director at the « Landestheater Karlsruhe » , in 1933. Concerning his stage ban, in 1938, see : « Arbeiter-Zeitung » (21 July 1950) ; page 3. Extensive coverage in : Josef Krips. « Ohne Liebe kann man keine Musik machen. Erinnerungen » , edited by Harrietta Krips, Vienna and others (1994) .

(44) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/54/7, Joint Minutes of the Denazification Bureau and Quadripartite Press and Entertainment Sub-Committee (19 December 1946) ; page 6.

(45) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/44/29, Sub-Committee for Press and Entertainment an Political Directorate - Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra (28 January 1947) ; page 1.

(46) National Archives, Washington, D.C.-RG 260/550/Folder : Letters, Hefti to Chairman, Internal Affairs Directorate - State Opera Orchestra (25 January 1947) .

(47) Ibid. ; Annex A.

(48) « Österreichisches Staatsarchiv, Archiv der Republik, BKA-Verbindungsstelle, Zl. 2153/XXXIII. »

(49) Straßer. « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt » ; page 236.

(50) Dieter Stiefel. « Entnazifizierung » ; page 275.

(51) Public Opinion in Occupied Germany, edited by Anna J. and Richard L. Merritt. The OMGUS Surveys, 1945-1949. With a Foreword by Frederick W. Williams, University of Illinois Press, Urbana / Chicago / London (1970) ; page 129f. It is especially interesting that the musical connoisseurs of the Vienna Philharmonists took a much stronger stance for a denazification of the Orchestra.

(52) This partially follows my contribution in the book of Franz Bartolomey. « “ Was zählt, ist der Augenblick. ” Die Bartolomeys. 120 Jahre an der Wiener Staatsoper », Vienna (2012) ; pages 129-136 : « Der Fall Bartolomey : Ein Philharmoniker zwischen Politik und Intrigen 1938 bis 1950. »

(53) Telephone information by Doctor Winfried Garscha, DÖW, on the basis of his research files (5 March 2013) .

(54) In this respect, see the corresponding clues in the Archive of the Vienna Philharmonists, Depot State Opera, folder Jerger. Statements concerning his conduct during the Nazi era were also accessed.

(55) Diary. « Veit Jerger » (written before 2006) ; page 9. I am thankful to Miss Saskia Kuhlmann for providing me with excerpts of the diary.

(56) Regina Thumser. « Musikpolitik in Oberösterreich 1938-1955 », in : « Klänge der Macht. Nationalsozialistische Musikpolitik in Oberösterreich », edited by Regina Thumser and Klaus Petermayr, « Oberösterreichische Schriften zur Volksmusik », Band 9, Linz (2010) ; pages 11-28 - on Jerger, see : pages 20-21.

(57) Diary. « Veit Jerger » ; page 10.

The Historical Archives of the Vienna Philharmonic

An extensive collection of programmes and a concert database are at the heart of the historical archives.

...

The most distinctive example of the insurmountable conflict of priorities in cultural denazification (namely, the demand of artistic performance while simultaneously eliminating National-Socialist thought by rigorous personnel cleansing) was represented by the political classification of a collective Orchestra such as the Vienna Philharmonic. While especially British and U.S. American cultural affairs officers initially had clear instructions and various « black lists » for individual cultural performers to prevent all artists charged with National-Socialism from public appearance (in order to completely eliminate National-Socialist ideology by means of a kind of « cool down » period and an eventual « exchange of elites ») they could not assert themselves with this Orchestra. The Vienna Philharmonic formed a unified Orchestra that was well-known internationally and, especially, in Europe, but, at the same time, had the « technical » drawback of a disproportionately high-rate of former National-Socialist Party members - amongst them, numerous « illegals » (« Illegale », i.e., Party members during the Party ban, from 1933 to 1938) . Such a difficulty was not presented to the Americans in the former « Reich » capital, Berlin. There, only 20 of around 110 musicians had belonged to the NSDAP. By comparison, in the beginning of 1943, out of 123 Philharmonic in Vienna, 60 or about 50 % had belonged to the NSDAP ; at least 22 of these, in turn, were « illegals », and 2 were members of the « Schutzstaffel » (SS) .

Ist tangible contact with U.S. cultural affairs officers was made in September 1945, when contact talks about the Philharmonic were held with the provisional leader of the Philharmonic, Fritz Sedlak, and the director of the Vienna

State Opera. There had originally been rumours that 70 to 85 % of the Orchestral members were supposed to have been NSDAP members, but Sedlak claimed that out of 135 members of the State Opera Orchestra (not all Orchestral musicians of the State Opera are automatically also members of the Vienna Philharmonic) only 34 had been Party members. Also, in their struggle against a further denazification of the Orchestra, the musicians attempted to win the Americans over with the help of the Opera's administrative director, Matthäus Flitsch.

A special characteristic in the negotiations with the concert Master of the Philharmonic was that the U.S. cultural affairs officer, Otte de Pasetti, who, as the life partner of Lotte Lenya-Weill, had for private reasons gone to the United States already before 1938, was faced with a « fait accompli » and had to adapt to the present circumstances. It was still, in the last days of War, that the former chairman of the Vienna Philharmonic, the contrabassist Wilhelm Jerger, who also was a member of the SS and the « Ahnenerbe », made his position available. According to Philharmonic member, Otto Straßer, who already in 1938 had played a central part in the transition of power, there were secret talks with Wilhelm Furtwängler, months before the end of the War, in order to quickly conduct the imminent internal « transition of power ». Jerger had, in 1938, assumed the leading position from Hugo Burghauser, who, after the « annexation » as sympathizer of the Fatherland's Front and as « Jewish kin » (« jüdisch versippt »), was declared politically unsustainable and, later, had to withdraw from the State Opera Orchestra.

The successor to Jerger, Fritz Sedlak, was successful in holding the Orchestra together and bringing it safely through the final turmoil of War. Due to his knowledge of Russian, which he had acquired as prisoner during the First World War, he could lead the talks with Soviet occupation officers himself.

The Soviet cultural policy was entirely oriented towards an immediate resumption of cultural life, and, therefore, it was not difficult for him to win many a help for his Orchestra, which, under Clemens Krauß and Robert Fanta and without extensive denazification, again gave its 1st concerts.

The denazification measures themselves were kept within limits, because Sedlak (a politically integer man) successfully intervened at the State Secretary for National Edification, Schooling and Education as well as Religious Affairs in the provisional State government of Karl Renner, Ernst Fischer, a communist official who had returned from Moscow ; he unreservedly took a stand for the conservation of this unique Orchestra. Formal NSDAP Party membership alone should not be reason for a discharge. An internal « denazification commission », next to ministry officials, was staffed also by a Philharmonic, and this Orchestral member was one of those « rescued half breeds and Jewish kin » who, in 1938, was spared discharge after Furtwängler's intervention. During a press conference, in April 1946, Sedlak attempted to justify the fact that discharges or retirements of Party members in the Orchestra were only handled reservedly. After the end of War, 4 heavily charged musicians were immediately discharged : 2 men of the SS, an illegal, and allegedly a former Blockwart helper. Further Orchestral members were retired - in which were included also some not National-Socialist.

Rudolf Kalmar, local head of the all Party newspaper « Neues Österreich », who had survived the concentration camps in Dachau and in Flossenbürg, took Sedlak's press conference as an occasion to plead for a milder persecution of former National-Socialists, using the example of the Philharmonic. In an editorial article, he reckoned that the Orchestra has to be conceded a higher degree of « world-otherness » (« Weltfremdheit ») and that an example has to be set, which should constitute an « open and resolute confession of one's own error of yesterday » and could also amount to a justification of a sort in front of the abroad countries. At this press conference, Fritz Sedlak had given the legality declaration to federal president Renner, condemned the past with harsh words, and announced concerts, the net yield of which should flow back to the relatives of those earlier Orchestral colleagues who, after 1938, had fallen victim to National-Socialism.

Up to this point, the 2 great occupying powers deliberately practiced restraint in this issue. The chief editor of the « Wiener Kurier », Hendric J. Burns, as well as the « Austriacus » in the « Österreichische Zeitung » reckoned that a temporarily less well-equipped Orchestra would be much more in line with the tradition of the Vienna Philharmonic. Protest from within the ranks of the Philharmonic reached to the address of the U.S. theatre officer, Henry C. Alters, a Viennese emigrant who, at that time, was solely responsible for theatre and music in Vienna, because the pianist and music officer Margot Pinter had left the Information Services Branch (ISB). Mrs. Pinter had been completely in line with Sedlak, because she, herself as pianist, placed the issue of the performative quality far above the issue of the political responsibility of the musicians. Moreover, she did not attach great importance to the formal Party membership or candidature, with the rationale that musicians were deeply apolitical people. She was furthermore incapable of compensating an additional emotional handicap. She had already performed with the Philharmonic in Vienna and, suddenly, saw herself being pressed into the role of a judge of denazification, who (at least, according to the views of general McChrystal) was supposed to discharge as many Party members as possible and maintain but a rudimentary orchestration with only the most important instruments.

The 6 musicians who had complained towards Alter revealed a certain weakness in the numeral reasoning of Sedlak, because out of the total of 14 retired colleagues, 4 were permanently retired not due to their Party membership, but due to their age ; another group of 6 artists should have been retired years ago, but precisely because of their membership in the NSDAP could retain their position in the Orchestra. Doubts were raised also towards the claim of the provisional chairman that insufficient other musicians of suitable artistic skills were available.

The discussion concerning the Philharmonic fell silent during the following months due to the Salzburg Festival and because the denazification of Herbert von Karajan and Wilhelm Furtwängler was prioritised. The Philharmonic did indeed perform at the Salzburg Festival, but 3 charged Orchestral members were denied solo performance by U.S. cultural affairs officer, Ernst Lothar, who had returned from exile. A repeated review of this music ensemble, on the level of the Allied Denazification Bureau of the Allied Commission, started in September. The American representative of this council, Maximilian Wallach, put forward the publicly voiced concerns about the Nazi members in the Orchestra and demanded a meeting with the responsible Austrians, because it had so far been impossible to receive detailed documents from them.

Occasion for this investigation was a planned abroad trip of the Philharmonic ; in the issuance of « travel permits », the attention of French offices was again called to the political past of individual Philharmonic members. At the conference of members of the Allied Denazification Bureau and representatives of the Federal Ministry of Education as well as the Federal Theatre Administration, it was especially the head of the Federal Theatre Administration, Egon

Hilbert, detained as political prisoner in the KZ-Dachau, from 1938 to 1945, who wanted to substantiate the view of the former State secretary Fischer that artists are to be judged by different criteria in terms of politics. Furthermore, efforts would have shown that it was impossible to find appropriate substitutions. In response to the specific question about the exact number of former National-Socialists in the Orchestra, Hilbert responded :

« Out of 133 members of the State Opera, 45 are former Party members, and 13 former Party members had been excluded from the Philharmonic Orchestra, including the ones who resigned, and the ones who had been pensioned with a reduction of pay. »

Towards the end of the briefing, the representative of the Ministry of Education admitted that the Philharmonic Orchestra was the only institution in his ministry's responsibility in which « illegals » were employed. In further consequence, the Allied Denazification Bureau demanded a more intense cooperation and further information in the form of questionnaires.

The charged members of the Orchestra could not be taken on a tour to France and Switzerland, because they had not received travel permits. Substitutes took their place, and, despite these improvisations, the guest performances were conducted without any damage to the Orchestra's image. In this case, as in other cultural denazification measures, the Information Services Branch had lost its decisive function and was only approached as a consultant. Concerning the stage ban of « illegal » ensemble members, there was principally no discussion between the Special Branch and the Information Services Branch. It was especially in the United States that the high-rate of former National-Socialists in the ranks of the Vienna Philharmonic was criticised. Also the world-famous solo violinist, Bronisław Hubermann, declared not to come to Vienna « before the last Nazi has disappeared from Viennese musical life » .

Illegal musicians (i.e. , those who were NSDAP members during the Party ban, from 1933 to 1938) should originally be immediately discharged, according to the beliefs of all members in the Allied Denazification Bureau - without regard of their artistic irreplaceability in view of the entire Orchestra. To this group of « illegals » were counted also those Nazi Party members who had faked allied questionnaires and concealed their political past. For this reason, the U.S. representative in the Allied Denazification Bureau prompted the ISB Information Service Branch to, at 1st, submit their « technical opinion » on only 23 « less incriminated » (« minder belastet ») Orchestral members. For the time being, he did not want to discuss the case of the 28 musicians who were to be immediately discharged. This stance, however, was opposed by the British cultural officer and Austrian political emigrant, Peter Schnabel. He requested that the Vienna Philharmonic should be preserved in their entirety and that only 2 to 3 politically unacceptable artists should be discharged - thereby, he was fully in line with the official Austrian standpoint. Moreover, he pointed to the new National-Socialist law (« Nationalsozialistengesetz ») which would come into effect 2 months later and provide new guidelines and legal possibilities to the Austrians.

A further delay was declined in the joint meeting of the Denazification Bureau and the Quadripartite Press and Entertainment Sub-Committee primarily by the Soviet representative Aristowa, but also by the French and Americans. A total number of 23 cases came-up for discussion, and the ISB representative, Albert van Eerden, began with an extensive statement about concert Master Wolfgang Scheiderhan, whom he described as a « never more than lukewarm member of the Nazi Party » ; an unanimous positive decision was subsequently achieved. In 13 further cases, all cultural and denazification officers voted for a stage permission. Only twice was a discharge decided upon unanimously, whereas the Austrians had in their documents denied political acceptability only in the case of a violinist. The U.S. denazification officer abided closely by the recommendations of van Eerden, who had taken-over the responsibility of the denazification of the Philharmonic from Ernst Lothar ; only in 2 cases, the Americans voted for the removal of charged musicians, and, in 2 further ones, no judgement could be delivered concerning the « substitutability » for a lack of documents. In the case of 6 musicians, the Soviet representatives, lieutenant Shour for the Denazification Department and Miss Aristowa for the Soviet Information Service, demanded a discharge without immediate discharge, and only once the French and the Soviets agreed on a veto.

In this debate, the alteration in the Soviet denazification policy in cultural issues is clearly illustrated. Shortly after the end of the Second World War, conductor Josef Krips, who, for racial reasons, was imposed with a stage ban during the Nazi era, was ultimately prompted by the cultural officers of the Red Army to perform with the entire Orchestra of the Vienna Philharmonic - including those members charged with National-Socialism.

While the Western Allies agreed that only a gradual denazification of the Orchestra was possible (a point on which most emphasis was placed by the Americans) the Soviet representative in the Sub-Committee for Press and Entertainment meant that an immediate discharge should follow also in the case of those unacceptable and « less incriminated » .

Already a month later however, the Allied Denazification Bureau was forced to ask for an expert opinion from the ISB Information Service Branch also on those illegals immediately to be discharged. 19 were denoted as artistically irreplaceable, while, in the case of the remaining 9 musicians, a replacement could be found on short notice. In the view of the State Theatre Administration and the Representation of the State Opera Orchestra however, all 28 were irreplaceable. Even though the Allied Denazification Office of the department 2N in the Office of the Federal Chancellor had, in June 1947, conveyed a definite list of the 28 members of the State Opera and Philharmonic Orchestra to be immediately discharged, a corresponding reaction on the side of the Austrians remained absent.

Characteristic, although possibly not deliberately planned, was the Philharmonic's 1st big post-War tour to Great Britain, whose representatives in the Cultural Department as well as in the Foreign Office had already very early on argued in support of an omission of the denazification in order to preserve the homogeneity of the Orchestra.

The U.S. experts could not assert themselves in any stage, because the Soviets themselves, who until the involvement of the Western Allies in the administration of Vienna were completely in line with their idea of cultural reconciliation, had taken almost no denazification measures and in the suspension of legal regulations showed great leniency towards the relevant Austrian authorities. The Americans did attempt to revise this « fait accompli » on the level of the Allied Commission, but the Austrians had already established their position to such an extent that even a joint decision of the Allies to discharge the « illegal » Philharmonic could not have change the situation.

According to the views of the author, it is inaccurate to denote the factual sacrifice of the Vienna Philharmonic's denazification as an unintended failure of the U.S. cultural denazification policy, which, in 1945-1946, was oriented solely towards individual cases. On the one hand, it was only in 1946-1947 that the discussion of the political assessment of the Orchestra was held in specific terms on an Allied level, on the other hand, in the eyes of the U.S. cultural officers the Philharmonic represented a primarily cultural instrument of international importance. Within the Information Services Branch and in the United States, there had however also been discussions about whether the retention of such a high number of Party members would not damage the Orchestra. In the end, a formal Allied Resolution was passed in 1947 to discharge a majority of the illegals, in practice though enforcement against Austrian resistance was eschewed.

The priorities were redefined after, in January 1947, 52 % of the respondents in an American opinion survey in Vienna spoke-out in favour for the retention of the Orchestra in its « nazified » form. The Americans and the Allies obviously wanted to avoid a scandal in this issue, which, by no means, was any longer amongst the main concerns of the occupation administration - not least because the Austrians, despite not knowing the Philharmonic personally, perceived the denazification of the Orchestra as an allied intervention and violation of national pride.

How inaccurate the specific « denazification » could ultimately be (initially, also due to a lack of appropriate NSDAP documents, such as the SS records of Wilhelm Jerger and Helmut Wobisch, for example) is exemplified by the special case of Franz Bartolomey. Was he a « top-Nazi », like Wilhelm Jerger, the chairman of the Orchestra, Helmut Wobisch and Adolf Löffler, since he was discharged together with these colleagues immediately after the liberation in 1945 ? In recent years, a new source in the Vienna City and State Archive on the denazification procedures has become available, i.e. , those procedures which decided whether an illegal membership existed during the Party ban of the NSDAP, from 1933 to 1938. Furthermore, the various denazification commissions decided upon active and passive voting rights as well as in the professional domain in the case of officials upon discharge and retirement or suspension and atonement payments. Advanced and enhanced by means of documents from Bartolomey's correspondence provided to me by his son, suddenly, a completely different picture emerged.

Even though Bartolomey (and this is an important difference to all of the other re-integrated former NSDAP members) had been excluded from the NSDAP, in 1942, some colleagues in the Orchestra made use of his absence, towards the end of the War, to talk him up as « top-Nazi », which surely was not the case. He was indeed German-nationally socialized in the context of the Gymnastics Club (« Turnverein ») and the Youth League (« Jugendbund ») , but, as compared to 36 % of the Orchestral members, he was not active for the NSDAP already before the « annexation » , in 1938. He was engaged as a substitute, already in 1937, and, in 1938, profited from the racially motivated discharges - amongst them, 11 string players who as Jews were excluded and discharged. As early as May / June 1938, he should succeed in an audition in which, out of 97 applicants, 7 string players were engaged for the State Opera, and, already in July, he requested the NSDAP membership. On November 4, 1939, he was with retroactive effect of November 1, 1938, accepted in the Association of the Vienna Philharmonic. This contract of 1938 also meant for Bartolomey an end to his great existential anxiety, which had haunted him, since the death of his father in 1920. He joined the NSDAP already in 1938, but, for the time being, was accepted only as Party candidate and, on June 1, 1940, received the membership number 7.676.908. In 1942, however, he was excluded due to being denounced for having engaged a painter who was married to a Jewish woman.

What was lacking in the case of Franz Bartolomey II. though was the « air-raided shelter experience » of the last days of War because, after an approved holiday, he stayed on with his family and was suddenly branded a quitter and outsider. Obviously, some decision makers, in 1945, were quite happy to find former NSDAP members who (without a chance to react) could quickly be excluded in order to signalize a symbolic denazification. In the end, it also turned-out to be a group of former hardcore Nazis who almost managed to prevent his return. The « case Bartolomey » demonstrates how complex group dynamic processes affected the denazification policy, especially in the case of the State Opera Orchestra or the Vienna Philharmonic, and how great Nazis could be created from followers (« Mitläufer »), and vice-versa.

At least, Helmut Wobisch was, in 1953, appointed manager of the Vienna Philharmonic and kept this position until 1969. I have described Wobisch's case in detail in my contribution on the honours. In his (tumultuous) election as manager, in 1953, he was actually not entitled to actively vote, because he had still not been amnestied by the federal president from the « atonement consequences » of his participation in the attempted « coup d'État », in July 1934. In an express procedure, this amnesty was then made-up for, whereby in contortion of the facts Wobisch's past was interpreted completely on the contrary.

Wilhelm Jerger, on the other hand, escaped a trial for illegality in front of the People's Court (« Volksgericht »), because he was in U.S. Custody, in Glasenbach. His intended denazification procedure for a possible return to the State Opera Orchestra and, thereby also, to the Vienna Philharmonic, is especially interesting and not yet extensively evaluated, but this will first have to be analyzed on the basis of other source materials. While Jerger's role was rudimentarily addressed by Clemens Hellsberg in his book, « Demokratie der Könige » (1992) (the account of which was taken note of with partial displeasure by his son, Veit Jerger), the Anton Bruckner Private University, the former Bruckner-Conservatory, needed until the year 2009 to attend to the question of Jerger's past, even though he had acted as its director, from 1958 to 1973. And yet, as can be seen by the contributions to this project of Bernadette Mayrhofer and myself, such a pursuit would have yielded quite an ambivalent picture.

Jerger was appointed director of the Bruckner-Conservatory, on August 15, 1958, after he had gone to Switzerland, in 1948, and started to establish himself a 2nd life as musicologist. According to Jerger's son, there had supposedly also been accusations about his father's Nazi past at the time of his appointment, which, however, were invalidated by Simon Wiesenthal. Incidentally, Wilhelm Jerger later received the « Franz-Schalk-Medal » in silver from the Vienna Philharmonic. Also, in this case, it would be important to investigate the circumstances of this bestowal.

Taken as a whole, the single cases that here were only briefly outlined document the fact that it is absolutely necessary to consult a wide-range of sources in an assessment of the behaviour of single Orchestral members. A first evaluation of the initially mentioned documents from the Nazi era in various Viennese archives, corresponding denazification documents, and files from the State Archive in Berlin allow for a clearer appraisal, which, however, includes all the possibilities of political behaviour and which can ultimately only be achieved with academic accuracy by case studies such as the ones on Franz Bartolomey or Wilhelm Jerger as well as Helmut Wobisch.

Historique

L'Orchestre est fondé en 1882 par Joachim Andersen, Ludwig von Brenner et 52 autres musiciens transfuges de l'Orchestre dirigé par Benjamin Bilse. Les Ires années sont difficiles et l'Orchestre manque plusieurs fois de disparaître. En 1887, Hermann Wolff en devient l'agent et engage le chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow, qui est considéré par la plupart des musicologues comme le 1er chef d'orchestre de métier. Hans von Bülow fut un ami de Franz Liszt, Johannes Brahms et Richard Wagner et dirigea la première mondiale de nombreuses œuvres majeures de la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle, souvent en présence des compositeurs. Brahms lui dit que ses interprétations correspondaient exactement à ce qu'il avait composé. Dès lors, l'Orchestre devient rapidement célèbre. Il est dirigé, au cours des années suivantes, par nombre de chefs invités prestigieux, parmi lesquels Hans Richter, Felix Weingartner, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, Johannes Brahms et Edvard Grieg.

En 1895, sur le conseil de Liszt, Arthur Nikisch en devient le chef permanent et domina la vie musicale en Allemagne pendant une longue période, faisant de l'Orchestre le plus prestigieux au monde. Wilhelm Furtwängler lui succède en 1922. La conjonction entre l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et Wilhelm Furtwängler est très souvent considérée comme le sommet de l'histoire de l'Orchestre, et même de toute l'histoire de la direction orchestrale. Klaus Geitel raconte dans son histoire de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin :

« L'autorité musicale de Furtwängler, la conscience qu'il avait de son propre charisme, son art expressif parvenu à un niveau extrêmement élevé firent de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin le vicaire terrestre de la musique symphonique occidentale. L'idéalisme allemand y trouva, ainsi, son compte puisqu'il cultivait continuellement une telle préoccupation de grandeur. Les membres du Philharmonique de Berlin semblaient faire plus que de la musique ; ils donnaient l'impression de jouer pour exprimer une conception du monde, la "Weltanschauung" des philosophes. »

Pendant cette période, l'Orchestre réalisa de nombreux enregistrements parmi les plus importants du XXe siècle, souvent considérés par la critique comme des sommets encore inégalés. Par exemple, le Concerto pour violon n° 2 de Béla Bartók avec Yehudi Menuhin (en 1953) ; la 5e Symphonie (1943), la 7e Symphonie (1943), la 9e Symphonie (1942) de Beethoven ; la 4e Symphonie et le Concerto pour piano n° 2 de Brahms avec Edwin Fischer (les 2, en 1942) ; la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner (en 1944) ; la 9e Symphonie de Schubert (en 1942) ; la 4e Symphonie de Schumann (en 1953) ; les « Metamorphosen » de Strauß (en 1947) ; la 6e Symphonie (« Pathétique ») de Tchaïkovsky (en 1938). La portée symbolique de ces enregistrements était telle que les soviétiques s'en emparèrent en 1945 comme « réparation de guerre » avec des originaux de la Grèce antique, des œuvres de la Renaissance italienne, des tableaux impressionnistes français. Ces enregistrements ne seront rendus officiellement par l'Union soviétique qu'à la fin des années 1980. Depuis cette époque, la position de directeur musical de cet Orchestre exerça une forte fascination sur le monde de la direction musicale. Cette fascination ne diminua pas avec le chef Herbert von Karajan à cause de son immense poids médiatique et du fait qu'il inonda littéralement le monde de ses enregistrements avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

L'Orchestre continue de se produire durant la Seconde Guerre mondiale et, après la fin des hostilités, est dirigé durant

3 mois par Leo Borchard. À la suite de sa disparition brutale, en août 1945, Sergiù Celibidache le remplace. Furtwängler revient diriger l'ensemble en 1947, en co-direction avec Celibidache jusqu'en 1952, puis comme 1er chef, jusqu'à son décès en 1954. Son successeur est le charismatique Herbert von Karajan, nommé chef à vie, en 1955, et qui restera à la tête de l'Orchestre durant 34 ans. Durant cette période, l'Orchestre effectue de nombreux enregistrements et tournées et acquiert une renommée médiatique considérable. En 1963, il s'installe à la nouvelle « Philharmonie » de Berlin, conçue pour lui par l'architecte Hans Scharoun. Le grand auditorium est considéré comme un modèle de perfection acoustique. Karajan quitte son poste quelques mois seulement avant sa mort, en 1989.

C'est par un vote que les musiciens du Philharmonique de Berlin choisissent leur chef d'orchestre à l'exception notable de Herbert von Karajan nommé à vie, en 1955.

...

The Berlin Philharmonic was founded in Berlin, in 1882, by 54 musicians under the name « Frühere Bilsesche Kapelle » (literally, Former Bilses's Band) ; the group broke-away from their previous conductor Benjamin Bilses after he announced his intention of taking the band on a 4th class train to Warsaw for a concert. The Orchestra was renamed and re-organized under the financial management of Hermann Wolff, in 1882. Their new conductor was Ludwig von Brenner ; in 1887, Hans von Bülow, one of the most esteemed conductors in the world, took-over the post. This helped to establish the Orchestra's international reputation, and guests Hans Richter, Felix von Weingartner, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, Johannes Brahms and Edvard Grieg conducted the Orchestra, over the next few years. Programmes of this period show that the Orchestra possessed only 46 strings, much less than the Wagnerian ideal of 64.

In 1895, Arthur Nikisch became chief conductor, and was succeeded in 1923 by Wilhelm Furtwängler. Despite several changes in leadership, the Orchestra continued to perform throughout World War II. After Furtwängler fled to Switzerland, in 1945, Leo Borchard became chief conductor. This arrangement lasted only a few months, as Borchard was accidentally shot and killed by the American forces occupying Berlin. Sergiù Celibidache, then, took-over as chief conductor for 7 years, from 1945 to 1952. Furtwängler returned in 1952 and conducted the Orchestra until his death, in 1954.

His successor was Herbert von Karajan, who led the Orchestra from 1955 until his resignation in April 1989, only months before his death. Under him, the Orchestra made a vast number of recordings and toured widely, growing and gaining fame. When Karajan stepped-down, the post was offered to Carlos Kleiber, but he declined.

...

The Orchestra's 1st concert-hall, the « Alte Philharmonie » situated on the « Bernburger Straße » in Berlin Kreuzberg, was inaugurated in 1882 in a building previously used as an ice-rink and converted by the architect Franz Schwechten. In 1898, a smaller concert-hall, the « Beethovensaal » on « Köthener Straße » , was also inaugurated for chamber music and chamber ensembles. The « Alte Philharmonie » was used until British bombers destroyed it, on 30 January 1944, the anniversary of Hitler becoming Chancellor. The Orchestra played until the end of the War at the « Staatsoper, Unter den Linden » . The « Staatsoper » was also destroyed, on 3 February 1945. In need of a venue, the Berlin Philharmonic played during the years following the War in the « Titania-Palast », an old movie theatre converted in a concert-hall, and still used the « Beethovensaal » for smaller concerts. During the 1950's, the Orchestra moved its concerts at the « Musikhochschule » (today, part of the Berlin University of the Arts) , in the « Joseph-Joachim-Konzertsaal » . However, most of the recordings were done at the « Jesus-Christus-Kirche » , in Berlin-Dahlem, celebrated for its acoustics.

The need for a new « Philharmonie » was expressed since 1949, when the « Gesellschaft der Freunde der Berliner Philharmonie eingetragener Verein » (Friends of the Berliner Philharmonie Society) was created to gather funds. The building of the new « Philharmonie » started in 1961, following the design of architect Hans Scharoun, and it was inaugurated on 15 October 1963, with a performance of Beethoven's 9th Symphony, conducted by Herbert von Karajan. Its location made it part of the « Kulturforum » , and the « Großer Saal » (2,440 seats) was, then, complemented by a chamber-music hall, the « Kammermusiksaal » (1,180 seats) , built in 1987, following the design of architect Edgar Wisniewski, after a project by Hans Scharoun.

The initial phase

An Orchestra becomes independent

It started with an act of rebellion : in March 1882, 50 members of the ensemble run by the popular musical director Benjamin Bilde refused to sign their new contracts - they found the working conditions too unfavourable : they were to earn hardly more than day labourers. The musicians decided to set-up on their own and, from then on, to work at their own risk. The new Orchestra 1st called itself (referring to their origin) « The Former Bilde's Ensemble » and they pursued programming concepts similar to those of their former employer : at so-called « Popular Concerts » , they usually relied more on entertaining works, while presenting more challenging works and « novelties » , i.e. , new pieces by contemporary composers, in their « Symphony Concerts » .

Musical rebels

Back then, Berlin was, by no means, a prominent European musical capital. Other cities, namely Leipzig and Vienna, set the tone. They had a highly-sophisticated concert scene and, thus, correspondingly imposing concert halls. In contrast, the 1st performances of the « Philharmonisches Orchester » (as the ensemble was soon called) took place in an open-air restaurant. Starting in the summer of 1882, the Orchestra played in the hall of a former roller-skating rink, on « Bernburger Straße » , with 2,000 seats. After renovations and improvements, this developed into Berlin's most important concert-hall : the « Philharmonie » .

Struggle for existence

The ambitious young Orchestra had high-aspirations. The Philharmonic musicians enjoyed their 1st major successes under conductors like Ludwig von Brenner, Ernst Rudorff and, particularly, Franz Wüllner. However, their independence harboured financial risks : to be sure, the musicians received administrative support from the start from the enterprising concert agent Hermann Wolff, who organized a subscription series for them and provided them with professional advice. But, very soon after their founding, the Orchestra was buffeted by a difficult crisis that threatened their existence.

To secure their existence in the long term, they entered into a co-operation with the Royal Music Conservatory, run by the famous violinist Joseph Joachim. The members of the Philharmonic Orchestra committed to making themselves available to the Conservatory for a certain number of concerts. But Joseph Joachim and Hermann Wolff were personages with different musical world-views. Rivalry and competition arose between the 2 of them. Hermann Wolff succeeded in more strongly expanding his influence on the Orchestra and in winning-over one of the most significant conductors of his time as the principal conductor of his subscription concerts : Hans von Bülow.

The era of Hans von Bülow

In his day, Hans von Bülow, who conducted the premiere of « Tristan und Isolde » and was known as a brilliant Beethoven and Brahms interpreter, embodied the modern type of conductor : eccentric in his gestures, uncompromising, analytical in his musical work, expressive in his musical results. Not outwardly attractive but possessed of a consummate elegance (he always conducted wearing white kid gloves) , he had a compelling, magical charisma. His lordly attitudes and extravagancies were known - and forgiven, because he was one thing above all : an orchestral educator to the « nth » degree.

Beyond uninspired mediocrity

Bülow had already made a 1st class Orchestra out of the provincial Meiningen Court Orchestra. Now, he hoisted the Berlin Philharmonic, to whom he attested a great artistic intelligence, out of their « uninspired mediocrity » (« Allgemeine Musikzeitung ») and established standards that formed the basis for the Orchestra's later international fame. Despite his severity and his unrelenting passion for rehearsing, the « Philharmoniker » felt deeply attached to him as a person. Their collaboration lasted 5 years, before Bülow, who had suffered from nervous disorders since his childhood, retired from the concert business for health reasons. He died on 12 February 1894.

Intermezzo with Richard Strauß

His departure left a grievous void in Berlin's musical life. The concert agent Hermann Wolff tried, in vain, to engage great conductors like Hans Richter and Felix Mottl ; finally, he handed-over the musical direction of his subscription concerts to the young Richard Strauß, one of Bülow's pupils. Strauß, still at the beginning of his career and hoping to succeed Bülow, was not able to attract the Berlin audience into the « Philharmonie » with his progressive programmes. And Hermann Wolff soon had his eye on another conductor : Arthur Nikisch.

The era of Arthur Nikisch

When Hans von Bülow took-over the direction of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1887, he was considered among the most important conductors of his time. In contrast, his successor's name was hardly-known : Arthur Nikisch. Born in Hungary, he had just returned from America, where he had conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 4 years.

Nikisch, who began his musical career as a violinist in the Viennese Court Opera Orchestra, and was also head of the « Leipziger Gewandhausorchester », was possessed of a great sensitivity and intuition and he captured the musicians' hearts. They let themselves be led by him unquestioningly ; they gave their all for him. « It can be asserted unhesitatingly that, in a 1st class Orchestra, every single member deserves the designation “ artist ”. » , Nikisch once wrote. With this credo, he made an essential contribution to the Berlin musicians' « soloistic » self-image. Through the present day, it has remained one of the distinct qualities of the Philharmonic musicians.

Specialized in the æsthetics of sound

The contrast to Bülow could not have been greater : while the former's interpretations were characterized by intellectual depth and Classical rigour, Nikisch, who conducted with quiet and sparing gestures, banked on Romantic, sensual colouring and a rhapsodic breadth which felt improvised. He shifted the programmatic emphasis, not only launching German repertoire, but also conducting compositions by Tchaïkovsky, Berlioz, Liszt, Strauß, Mahler - and, particularly, Bruckner. He was, however, unsympathetic about new compositional ideas from Arnold Schœnberg, Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Igor Stravinsky and Maurice Ravel. Unlike Bülow, he was not fanatical about rehearsals ; instead, he relied on the intuition of the moment and considered himself re-creator of the works at concerts.

Under his direction, the Orchestra became increasingly prominent on the international scene ; any and all soloists of distinction came to Berlin to perform with the « Philharmoniker » . But that was not all. Nikisch took many trips with the Orchestra and, in this way, enhanced their international reputation. At the request of « Kaiser » Wilhelm II, he travelled to Moscow to the coronation of Tsar Nicholas II, in 1896, and, in the following year, captured the hearts of the French audience at a legendary guest concert in Paris - the French had, at 1st, harboured a certain resentment towards the Berlin ensemble after losing the Franco-Prussian War. Nikisch conducted the Philharmonic for 27 years. In this time period, he conducted more than 600 concerts before dying of influenza in 1922, at the age of 67 - surprising many.

The era of Wilhelm Furtwängler

When Arthur Nikisch (principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, starting in 1895) died in 1922, 36 year old Wilhelm Furtwängler applied to become his successor, convincing both the members of the Orchestra and the management. He was a musical personality who built on the accomplishments of his predecessors Hans von Bülow and Nikisch and helped the Orchestra continue to expand its renown. Like Nikisch, Furtwängler also considered himself the re-creator of works. His unconventional conducting technique was fabled : it required great personal responsibility and sensitivity from the musicians. Furtwängler formed the « Berliner Philharmoniker » into his very own instrument, one that ingeniously realized his interpretation ideas. Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner were the corner-stones of his repertoire, but he also championed contemporary composers like Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Bartók, Schœnberg and Hindemith - not always to the liking of the audience. And, starting in 1933, even less in accordance with the wishes of the National-Socialist leaders. In 1934, things came to a head : after the Nazi government forbade the world-premiere of Paul Hindemith's Opera « Mathis der Maler » , Furtwängler stepped-down from his position as principal conductor. 1 year later, he returned to the « Philharmoniker » (he who called himself an apolitical artist, who never belonged to the NSDAP and who spoke-up for many Jewish musicians) , only as conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts, however, without assuming an official position. Nonetheless, he continued to consider the Philharmonic musicians « his » Orchestra. Unlike his predecessors, he exerted a strong influence on artistic and organisational matters. After 1945, Furtwängler was banned from working. He was cleared in 1947, in a denazification process, and conducted the Philharmonic, again, in May of that year. However, he officially regained the position of principal conductor only in 1952, 2 years before he died.

The « Reich's » Orchestra

Even triumphant successes with Wilhelm Furtwängler could not improve the « Berliner Philharmoniker »'s precarious financial situation. In 1933, the Orchestra was in a particularly difficult existential crisis and saw only one way out : transforming into a national Orchestra. The National-Socialist leadership willingly took-over financing the famous Orchestra so as to adorn their events with them. For the Orchestra, the years of the 3rd « Reich » were a balancing act between complying with cultural-political and ideological guide-lines and preserving artistic autonomy. While they enjoyed a privileged position (the musicians were exempted from military service) , they, nonetheless, repeatedly defied artistic and political pressures from the National-Socialist ruling powers. The concert agency Wolff, a company run by Jews and an important partner of the Berlin Philharmonic from the onset, was not able to withstand the regime's repressive measures and dissolved in 1935. On 30 January 1944, the « Alte Philharmonie » was destroyed during a bombing raid. The Orchestra, now without a home, continued to play : particularly, in the State Opera, at the « Admiralspalast » , in the Berlin Cathedral. When Germany surrendered, in May 1945, a new era began for the « Berliner Philharmoniker » as well.

« Zero hour » and a new beginning

Concert life was quickly resumed after the War ended, despite difficult conditions : the traditional hall destroyed, Furtwängler banned at Ist from performing and with an insecure material future. But, in Leo Borchard, who had conducted them many times since 1933, the « Philharmoniker » quickly found a conductor for the difficult new beginning. The « Orchester » played in various temporary quarters : in cinemas and community centres, in the « Titaniapalast » and the « Admiralspalast » , as well as at the City Opera. The fruitful cooperation between Borchard and the « Philharmoniker » ended suddenly and tragically when the conductor was accidentally shot and killed, one August evening, by an American soldier. That was the moment for the young, unknown and still inexperienced Rumanian conductor Sergiu Celibidache. He was entrusted with conducting the Orchestra, and proved to be a « genius with the baton » who conducted the « Philharmoniker » in a calm artistic manner through the turbulent post-War years - at Ist, hoping to succeed Furtwängler. Besides this, a new young generation of conductors became frequent guests of the Orchestra : Georg Solti, Ferenc Fricsay and André Cluytens. Over the years, the material situation was also remedied. At Ist supported by the Magistrate of the American sector, the « Berliner Philharmoniker » became a municipal institution in 1949. In the same year, committed Berlin citizens founded the « Society of the Friends of the “ Philharmonie ” » (now, « Friends of the “ Berliner Philharmoniker ” ») with the goal of helping the Orchestra have its own concert-hall, once again.

The era of Herbert von Karajan

Herbert von Karajan's 1st performance with the « Berliner Philharmoniker », in April 1938, was a sensation - and aroused the jealousy of principal conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler who, from then on, considered the young star his rival. Furtwängler died in 1954, and the direction of an America tour, the year thereafter, that had already been planned devolved to Karajan. After successful completion of the tour, Karajan was appointed principal conductor in 1956. It was the beginning of a new era. Karajan embodied the 20th Century type of conductor : energetic, charismatic, visionary, dedicated not only to music but to the other finer things of life. He was an enthusiastic pilot, sports car-driver, skier and sailor. He admired and revered Arturo Toscanini and Wilhelm Furtwängler, 2 musical personalities who could not have been more different, and made it his ambition to merge the best of both to his own style.

AB 121 : Wilhelm Fürtwängler (I)

Few other musicians are more intertwined in debates around collaboration, passive resistance, and the relationship between art and politics as the German conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler. 47 years old when the Nazis came to power, Furtwängler was at the peak of his career, perceiving himself (and perceived by others) as a representative and defender of Germany's glorious musical heritage. The son of a renowned archæologist, he was born to a conservative bourgeois Berlin family, in 1886. He was raised to believe in the supremacy of « German-ness », a supremacy not linked to race but rather to spiritual and artistic creativity. Like many elites of his time, he saw the « Jewish Question » as one of culture rather than of race. Having studied music in Munich, the young Furtwängler acquired increasingly illustrious positions through the early part of the 20th Century. In 1922, he was named music-director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and during the inter-War years, he conducted regularly at the top Opera Houses in Europe. By the time of Adolf Hitler's ascent to power, he was perceived by many to be Germany's greatest conductor.

The initial rise to power of the Nazis was welcomed by Furtwängler, as by many other conservatives in Germany. Opposed to the perceived radicalism and immorality of the Weimar Republic, and drawn to the order and « German values » that the Nazis promised to provide, the conductor hoped that the Nazi Party would increase pay and job security for the nation's musicians, and focus on developing the prestige and pre-eminence of the German musical tradition. As the director of the bankrupt Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, he welcomed the Nazis' sense of urgency over the State of the nation's arts.

Furtwängler was, by no means, an ideal or self-evident puppet for the Nazis ; throughout his career, he made it clear that it was his desire for beautiful music, not the desire to gain political favour, that motivated his decisions. On the one hand, he was in many ways a conservative man, something that found favour with the Party. In the midst of the experimental and avant-garde 1920's, he publicly avowed his distaste for modern music such as swing, jazz, and atonal music. On the other hand, he did not ignore musical talent for the sake of these convictions. Thus, he agreed to premiere Arnold Schœnberg's modernist « Variations for Orchestra », Opus 31, in Berlin in 1928. He employed many Jewish musicians in his Orchestra, and maintained friendships with members of the Jewish German elite. In 1933, however, an era began in which the separation of art and politics became simply impossible.

It was only months after Hitler was made Chancellor of Germany that Furtwängler 1st came into conflict with the new totalitarian State. He wrote a bold letter on 7 April 1933 to Josef Gœbbels in response to rumours that Jews were to be banned from all performances. This letter exchange, printed in the major Nazi newspapers at Gœbbels' request, epitomised Furtwängler's attempts to negotiate with Nazi anti-Semitism for the protection of his musical realm. While openly supporting a policy of eliminating « degeneration » and « uprootedness », he nonetheless asserted that :

« I only recognize one line of separation : between good and bad art. At present, the division is drawn between Jew and non-Jew, while the separation between good and bad music is neglected. The question of the quality of music is a question of life and death. »

Gœbbels countered that :

« Art must be good : but beyond that, it must be responsible, professional, popular and aggressive. »

This exchange (from which Gœbbels emerged the clear winner, yet, which also allowed Furtwängler his pride) tied the composer to the regime. It also, ironically, improved Furtwängler's international reputation : he was one of the few major public figures to have made any sort of complaint.

Furtwängler's belief, however, that he had successfully established a working relationship with the Party was challenged almost immediately. That same year, 1933, while on a tour with his Orchestra, local Nazis threatened to protest if several Jews in the Orchestra were not replaced with Nazi-sympathetic musicians. Furtwängler threatened to cancel the performance if this happened. When the Orchestra arrived in Paris, anti-Nazi activists condemned the conductor and demanded the cancellation of the performances. The activists were finally persuaded to limit their activities to distributing flyers, but this was Furtwängler's first glimpse of the new ascendancy of politics over art. Toward the end of the year, he invited several Jewish and anti-Fascist artists to perform as soloists in his 1933-1934 season. Not only did the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » rebuke him, but all of those whom he had invited turned him down. Despite these tensions with the Party, Hitler and other leading officials realised early on the value for the « Reich » of Furtwängler as an internationally respected artist.

In November 1933, Josef Gœbbels announced the formation of the « Reich » Music Chamber (« Reichsmusikkammer » , or RMK) ; the composer Richard Strauß was to serve as president, with Furtwängler directly beneath him as vice-president. Soon afterwards, Furtwängler signed a contract for a directorship of the National Opera in Berlin. Furtwängler accepted the position on the (false) understanding that Jewish performers would be retained. Nonetheless, this gesture of accommodation with the Nazis led to an increased negative response by « émigrés » and anti-Nazis abroad.

Perhaps, his most famous conflict was the so-called « Hindemith affair » . He had planned to premiere the modernist composer Paul Hindemith's Opera « Mathis der Maler » (Mathis the Painter) for the 1934-1935 season. However, Nazi official Hermann Göring prohibited the performance. Furtwängler threatened to resign unless the boycott of Hindemith was lifted, and wrote open-letters to the press defending the composer. However, he sought to avoid conflict with the Nazi Party by avoiding all but the most mild critique, and was ultimately pressured to resign from his position at the « Reichsmusikkammer » .

The Nazi Alfred Rosenberg said of this conflict :

« It is regrettable that an artist of Furtwängler's stature had to enter the dispute, believing himself to be compelled to identify himself with Hindemith in as much as " Herr " Furtwängler maintained the 19th Century mentality and shows no appreciation of the great people's struggle of our time, he drew the proper consequences. »

In his post as leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra until early in 1945, Furtwängler participated frequently in festivals and concerts in Nazi Germany. From the perspective of the Nazi leadership, as Germany's military situation grew more and more threatening, Furtwängler became increasingly valuable as a cultural ambassador who could promote German music throughout the Axis and occupied lands. Furtwängler toured throughout Europe, despite being boycotted in The Hague and Belgium and protested in many other cities, trying to preserve the reputation of his homeland. In 1936, he was offered a position with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, but Nazi pressure along with U.S. protests discouraged him.

At the same time, Furtwängler never completely bowed to Nazi authority. He consistently protested the presence of flags and the Hitler salute in concert-halls. After the annexation of Austria, at the request of the members of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, he took-over leadership in an attempt to use his influence to protect its Jewish and Leftist members (he managed to assist several of them) . He frequently tried to avoid playing for Hitler's birthday, although he was eventually forced to. In 1944, he was the only prominent German artist not to sign the brochure « We Stand and Fall with Adolf Hitler » . However, it was not until the War grew close to an end, and German defeat was certain, that he finally left the 3rd « Reich » , fleeing to safety in Switzerland.

After the War, like most artists who had continued their work with Nazi support, he was initially subject to a performance ban. However, in one of the most controversial denazification trials, he successfully claimed to have remained in Germany in order to resist totalitarianism, to preserve German music and to affect Nazi policy to the interests of individual Jews, anti-Nazis and artists. Firm in the belief that he had done the right thing, the elderly conductor asserted that he had ...

« tried to test myself carefully. I am no better than others, although I did attempt to remain loyal to my basic inclination which motivated me : the love for my homeland and my people, a physical and spiritual concept, and the feeling of responsibility toward the prevention of injustice. Only here, could I struggle for the soul of the German people. Outside, people can only protest ; anyone can do that. »

Ultimately, his allegiance lay with his art, not with the people involved in that art-making. By claiming that he remained in Nazi Germany not as a Nazi, but as a German, Furtwängler managed to convince denazification experts of his « conviction that art has nothing to do with politics, with political power, with the hatred of others or with that which arises from a hatred of others » . His success and popularity during the 3rd « Reich » should, he claimed, be seen as a sort of resistance or defiance.

Moral judgment on the conductor remains divided. Many musicians, both German and Jewish, have forgiven him, but many could not. Berthold Goldschmidt publicly condemned him, calling him ...

« a great conductor with a weak character, a man who should have left, and who had to have been aware of how much prestige his work gave the Nazis. »

For Goldschmidt and others, his performances for Nazi audiences did not protect German culture - they defaced German culture. Fully-cleared of all collaboration by the Allied Courts, Furtwängler resumed a successful international career after the end of the War. He died on 30 November 1954, but the debates surrounding his name continue to this day.

The Furtwängler Case

(Harvey Sachs)

The conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler (1886-1954) was one of Germany's most celebrated performing musicians, and his reputation has grown to almost mythical proportions in the 5 and a half decades since his death. But the controversy surrounding his political behaviour during the 1930's and 1940's has never let-up. There are those who declare that Furtwängler (who was principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and State Opera when Adolf Hitler's National-Socialists came to power in 1933, and who continued to work in Germany until 3 months before the end of the Second World War) approved of the Nazis ; according to others, he merely used them to further his career ; and many claim that he actively opposed them.

Furtwängler came from an intellectually distinguished family and was educated by private tutors. He began to play the piano at the age of 4 and to compose at the age of 7. In 1922, after having served a long apprenticeship at major and minor German Opera Houses, he persuaded Louise Wolff, Germany's most powerful concert agent, to support his candidacy for the conductorship of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which had just been orphaned by the death of its great conductor, Arthur Nikisch. Other contenders for the job included such celebrities as Felix von Weingartner, Richard Strauß, Willem Mengelberg and Bruno Walter (all significantly older than Furtwängler) and such gifted members of his own generation as Carl Schuricht, Otto Klemperer, Fritz Busch and Erich Kleiber. « Frau » Wolff, nicknamed « Queen Louise » , obtained for Furtwängler not only the Berlin job but also another much sought-after position that Nikisch's death had left vacant : the conductorship of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra of Leipzig. At the age of 36, Furtwängler had become Germany's most successful Symphonic conductor. By the end of the 1920's, he had made much-praised debuts with the Vienna Philharmonic, the Orchestra of La Scala, the New York Philharmonic, and other major ensembles. In 1927, he accepted an invitation from the self-governing Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra to be its principal conductor (he gave-up his position in Leipzig, the following year) but, after 3 years, he left Vienna and began to concentrate on further consolidating his position in Germany. He obtained an appointment as music-director of the Bayreuth Festival, effective from the summer of 1931, but conflicts with the Festival's other administrators caused him to resign after only 1 season. In January 1933, however, he won a major victory by becoming principal conductor of Berlin's main Opera House, the « Staatsoper » . Combined with his Philharmonic position, the new job made him the most powerful figure in Germany's musical life.

Someone else won a major victory in Berlin, in January 1933 : shortly after Furtwängler signed his « Staatsoper » contract, Adolf Hitler became Chancellor of Germany. Furtwängler seems to have been exceptionally ignorant of politics (party politics, that is, as distinguished from musical politics) , even by the appallingly low-standards set by most of his fellow performing artists throughout history. He believed in music as a force for the spiritual redemption of humanity ; although he must have understood that the survival of modern society (including musical institutions) depended upon the existence of some sort of political superstructure, he did not much care about the details. But Germany's new leaders, Furtwängler quickly discovered, were not garden-variety politicians. They planned to re-create their fellow citizens along the lines established in « Mein Kampf » , and they regarded Furtwängler as a valuable commodity. Thus, for the following 12 years, he found himself contending not only with the « 3 B's » , but also with the « 2 G's » : Hermann Göring, who controlled the Prussian State Theaters, including the « Staatsoper » , and Josef Goebbels, who, as Minister of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, would have liked to administer the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra by decree. Both ensembles depended on government subsidies for their economic survival.

Had Furtwängler been merely a national celebrity, and not an international one, his political case would not have remained controversial for so many decades. For more than 60 years, anyone who has cared to know has indeed known that Furtwängler was never a member of the Nazi Party, or fond of the Nazis, or inclined to be anti-Semitic or authoritarian. But Furtwängler was an international celebrity, and this fact led and continues to lead people to ask why he did not make a stronger protest by exiling himself from Germany, as did his « Aryan » colleagues Fritz Busch and Erich Kleiber, and other « Aryan » cultural celebrities like Thomas Mann and Lotte Lehmann.

The issue is not only the nature of Furtwängler's relationship with Hitler's regime, but also how what happened was perceived, outside as well as within Germany. From the outside, there appeared to be an ambiguous phase that lasted through the regime's 1st year, a heroic phase that began early in 1934, another ambiguous phase that began early in 1935 and a disastrously negative phase that lasted from March 1936 until Furtwängler's denazification trial in December 1946. A final phase (from 1947 to the present) defies summary characterization, for different observers have reached different conclusions about the pro- and anti-Furtwängler testimony that surfaced at the trial and afterward. Some have admired him, others have had ambivalent feelings on the matter, and still others have viewed his case with disgust and hostility. But within Germany, there were no such phases : the majority of persecuted Jews and other opponents of the Nazis who were aware of or directly affected by Furtwängler's relationship with the regime regarded his conduct as selfless and at times heroic, albeit camouflaged by ambiguous public deeds and statements ; a minority viewed him as a waverer or even an opportunist.

There is plenty of evidence to support all points of view. Less than 2 months after the Nazis came to power, Thomas Mann, who was already in exile, wrote in his diary :

« Indignant that Richard Strauß has taken-over the concert from which Bruno Walter was barred. Furtwängler conducted the government's command performance of “ Die Meistersinger ” on this day of jubilation. Lacks. »

(The « command performance » in question was considered the inaugural event of the 3rd « Reich » .)

But, in another diary entry, written less than a month later, Mann noted :

« Yesterday, in the “ Frankfurter Zeitung ”, Furtwängler's highly-discreet but nevertheless admonitory letter to Goebbels on cultural policy, and the idiot's lengthy reply. »

Parts of Furtwängler's admonition seem « discreet » to the point of ambiguity. The conductor was forthright in telling Goebbels that « the quality of music is not a matter of ideology » , a notion that went against the Nazi grain. But he seemed to support the theory, held by some lukewarm Nazis and even by many non-Nazis, that one had to distinguish between good Jews and bad Jews - in this case, between Jewish artists who were likely to make a « positive » contribution to art and those who were not. Furtwängler also distinguished, in his letter, between Jews and Germans, as if he accepted the Nazis' theory that German-born Jews could not be authentic Germans.

« If the fight against Jewry is focused upon those artists who are rootless and destructive, if it is waged against those who would profit through rubbish and empty virtuosity, the fight is justified. The struggle against such individuals and the spirit they personify (and the spirit has its German adherents too) cannot be waged vigorously and thoroughly enough. But if this attack is directed against real artists, too, it is not in the best interests of our culture.

Plainly, it must be said that men like Walter, Klemperer, Reinhardt and others must be enabled in the future to practice their art in Germany. »

The last sentence I have quoted was futile but courageous, under the circumstances. But who was to determine what constituted « rubbish and empty virtuosity » and what constituted « the best interests of our culture » ? Furtwängler himself ? Goebbels ? And what was to happen to the practitioners, Jewish or otherwise, of « empty virtuosity » ? Obviously, Furtwängler was not suggesting that they be imprisoned, let alone sent to extermination camps, which, in 1933, were a mere gleam in the « Führer » 's eye. But just how was Germany to be made « virtuosenrein » - cleansed of virtuosos ? Would there be a government-enforced prohibition of the production and consumption of those types of art deemed insufficiently profound for the German people ? And if « good » Jewish artists were to be kept in the country and allowed to work while « bad » ones were to be exiled or herded into ghettos and left to face unindemnified un-employment, was the same principle to be applied to « good » and « bad » Jewish merchants and shoe-makers and street-sweepers ?

The Nazis, we know, were not interested in making such fine distinctions. Nevertheless, the weakness in Furtwängler's logic grew-out of his unshakeable beliefs in the superiority of artistic and intellectual pursuits to other areas of endeavor and in the superiority of Germanic musical culture to other musical cultures - beliefs held by some of the persecuted, too, including Arnold Schönberg. Crude Nazi dogma was one thing ; the fundamental rightness of German aspirations to cultural hegemony (benevolent, of course) was something else.

Even among Germanic musicians, however, there were people to whom it seemed, early in the Hitler era, that Furtwängler had been contaminated by Nazi doctrine.

Alban Berg (as « pure Aryan » an Austrian as the « Führer ») wrote to his wife, on May 17, 1933, about a ceremony that had been held that day in Vienna to commemorate the Centenary of Johannes Brahms's birth :

« Furtwängler actually delivered the great address, which made me very depressed all day. It was a Nazi-inspired speech on German music, which, he implied, had found its last representative in Brahms. Without mentioning any names, he betrayed the whole of post-Brahmsian music, especially Mahler and the younger generation (like Hindemith) . There was no reference at all to the Schönberg circle as even existing.

It was horrible having to put-up with all this and witness the frenzied enthusiasm of an idiotic audience. Idiotic not to realize how the Brahms a cappella choral songs which followed made nonsense of Furtwängler's tendentious twaddle. »

Touché ? The fact is that Berg, in characterizing Furtwängler's speech as « Nazi-inspired » , was off the mark. The conductor's æsthetics were merely nationalistic and conservative, thus, they corresponded to some aspects of National-Socialist cultural policy. Inevitably, however, outsiders (even those who, like Berg, were Furtwängler's ethnic next-of-kin and geographic neighbours) interpreted the similarity as evidence of collusion. Not many weeks after the incident reported by Berg, Furtwängler did stick his neck out, futilely, on behalf of Schönberg, whose « Variations for Orchestra » he had premiered in 1928. « Arnold Schönberg is considered by the Jewish International as the most significant musician of the present » , he wrote to Bernhard Rust, the Minister of Culture, on July 4, 1933, when the composer was about to be relieved, officially, of the teaching position he had already been forced to abandon at the Prussian Academy of Arts in Berlin.

« It must be recommended that he not be made a martyr. And if he is suspended now (I would not indeed consider this right) to [sic] treat the question of indemnity with generosity. »

When Furtwängler was questioned, at his denazification trial, about his use of the term « Jewish International » (possibly a mistranslation ; « International Jewry » may have been meant) in this letter, he replied that he had had to fight the Nazis using their weapons (their terminology, in this case) « otherwise, I could not have achieved anything » . And indeed, Georg Gerullis, Under-secretary of Culture, had written, disgustedly, to another functionary :

« Can you give me the name of a Jew who is not backed by Furtwängler ? »

In 1933, Furtwängler attempted to persuade government officials to continue to allow celebrated Jewish performing artists to appear in Germany and to persuade the artists not to boycott Germany ; both attempts failed, but Furtwängler had openly demonstrated his opposition to the regime's policies. Later that year, however, Hermann Göring, without consulting him, conferred on him the title of State counselor, and Furtwängler was made vice-president of Goebbels' « Reichsmusikkammer » - a sort of national music council. Many observers wondered whether he was making his peace with the Nazis.

Early in 1934, Furtwängler decided to put Paul Hindemith's Opera « Mathis der Maler » , which was still unfinished, on the « Staatsoper » 's 1934-1935 production schedule. Hindemith was no anti-Nazi firebrand, but his wife and many of his associates were Jews, and the Nazis did not approve of his music. Göring struck « Mathis » from the « Staatsoper » 's program ; Furtwängler protested, and while awaiting an answer to his protest he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the Symphony that Hindemith had created from some of the Opera's completed scenes. The performances were enthusiastically received by the public but condemned by the Nazi press. In the autumn, the Nazi « Kulturgemeinde » (Culture Corporation) announced a boycott of Hindemith's music. Furtwängler's letter of protest, published in the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , won him even more public approval. Attacks against Hindemith and Furtwängler appeared in the Nazi press ; in the end, the composer immigrated to the United States, and the conductor resigned from the « Staatsoper » and the Philharmonic and gave-up all his official titles except that of State counselor. The episode received considerable international attention and made Furtwängler, for a time, a symbol of internal opposition to the regime. « News that Wilhelm Furtwängler has been relieved of all his posts - very significant, since it demonstrates that no person of any superiority can work with these people. » , wrote Thomas Mann in his diary, on December 5th.

But then, in February 1935, Furtwängler signed a statement, prepared for him by Goebbels, in which he recognized Hitler and his ministers as « entirely and solely responsible for cultural policy » in Germany. In a post-War conversation with his biographer, Curt Rieß, Furtwängler offered the remarkable explanation that he had simply been admitting a « fait accompli » , and that, in so doing, he had been absolving himself of any responsibility for what was happening to musical life in Germany ! What had already happened by then included the black-listing of Jewish and other « degenerate » composers and solo artists, the removal of Jewish and other un-approved singers and musicians from the rosters of Opera companies and Orchestras, the ex-propriation of Jewish-owned music publishing houses and concert agencies (including that of Louise Wolff, who had brought Furtwängler's career to its apex) , and the use of intimidation, ghettoization, imprisonment, violence and compulsory exile against the racially « impure » . In exchange for his show of submission, Furtwängler was allowed to work as a free-lance, « non-political » musician in Germany.

The tale of this particular deal is hard to stomach. And the deal marked the beginning of another ambiguous, tug-of-war phase in Furtwängler's relations with the regime. Hitler attended a Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra concert conducted by Furtwängler in the spring of 1935 ; Furtwängler refused to greet the « Führer » with the Nazi salute. Hitler attended another Philharmonic concert, in October 1935 ; this time, he went-up to the stage at the end of the performance and extended his hand to Furtwängler, who shook it. Furtwängler agreed to take the Philharmonic on tour to England, but cancelled when he learned that the tour was to be State-sponsored. The Nazis put pressure on him to drop his long-time secretary and personal manager, Berta Geißmar, who was Jewish, and he gave in. He tried to protect the few remaining Jewish and part-Jewish members in the Philharmonic, and he couldn't understand why most of them left Germany at the 1st opportunity.

He wrote to Carl Flesch, a celebrated violinist, to complain that :

« All his best musicians were Jewish and they were abandoning him ! » , recalled Flesch's son.

« The man was like a child who can only see his own way. The Jews' departure was not only hurting his work but somehow a betrayal of art ! But while he was many things one might never like, he was never in any sense a Nazi. »

A letter of recommendation from Furtwängler prevented Flesch, Senior, and his wife from being sent to a concentration camp in 1940.

In February 1936, Arturo Toscanini retired from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and recommended that the Orchestra's board of directors invite Furtwängler to succeed him. Furtwängler accepted the board's invitation, which included the condition that he would take on no concurrent permanent position in Germany. When news of the appointment was published, an infuriated Hermann Göring leaked false information that appeared on the front-page of « The New York Times » :

The complete professional rehabilitation of Wilhelm Furtwängler was forecast today in an official announcement that he would shortly resume his activities as « guest-conductor of the Berlin State Operas » . Göring's tactic worked. Musicians, critics, and members of the public in New York protested the hiring of a man who was compromising himself with the Nazis, and Furtwängler (who was vacationing in Egypt and did not, yet, know that Göring was responsible for the leak) assumed that the scandal had been orchestrated in America.

He sent an angry cable to the Philharmonic :

« I am not a politician, but an exponent of German music, which belongs to all mankind and is independent of politics. I suggest, in the interests of the Philharmonic Company, that I postpone my appearances in the U.S.A. until the public realizes that music and politics have nothing to do with each other. »

That summer, Furtwängler returned to Bayreuth for the 1st time in 5 years, to conduct at a fully-nazified Wagner Festival. During the Festival, however, at a reception given by the Wagner family, Furtwängler was « cornered » by Goebbels, Göring, and Hitler, who attempted « to threaten him into again accepting an official position, to no avail » , re-called Friedelind Wagner, the composer's anti-Nazi granddaughter, who would flee Germany in 1939. The attempt ended with « Hitler's shrill threat that he would send him to a concentration camp - and Furtwängler's calm answer :

« “ Herr Reichskanzler ”, I will find myself there only in the very best company ! »

This so surprised Hitler that he couldn't answer, but vanished from the room.

But internal protests of this sort were no longer audible outside Germany. In an open letter to German intellectuals (a letter printed in the « Manchester Guardian » , on March 7, 1936) , the great violinist Bronisław Huberman, a Polish Jew, referred to Furtwängler as « one of the most representative leaders of spiritual Germany » , and went on :

« It will be recalled that Doctor Furtwängler endeavoured to prevent me from publishing my refusal of his invitation (in 1933) to play with his Orchestra in Germany. His astonishing argument was that such a publication would close Germany to me, for many years, and, perhaps, for ever.

Doctor Furtwängler was profoundly revolted not only at the Nuremberg incidents (violent physical attacks on Jews, and on non-Jews who associated with Jews) , which he assured me he and all “ real Germans ” condemned as indignantly as I, but also against me because of my reference to the brutalisation of large sections of the German population. He felt himself compelled to regard this as a “ monstrous generalization which had nothing to do with reality ”.

In the meantime, 2 and a half years have passed. Countless people have been thrown into gaols and concentration camps, exiled, killed, and driven to suicide. Catholic and Pro-testant ministers, Jews, Democrats, Socialists, Communists, army generals became the victims of a like fate. I am not familiar with Doctor Furtwängler's attitude to these happenings, but he expressed clearly enough his own opinion of all “ real Germans ” concerning the shamefulness of the so-called race-ravishing pillories ; and I have not the slightest doubt of the genuineness of his consternation, and believe firmly that many, perhaps the majority of Germans, share his feelings.

Well then, what have you, the “ real Germans ”, done to rid conscience and Germany and humanity of this ignominy ?

Before the whole world I accuse you, German intellectuals, you non-Nazis, as those truly guilty of all these Nazi crimes.
»

At Salzburg, in the summer of 1937, Toscanini, who had previously defended Furtwängler, broke with him over what he saw as Furtwängler's political wishy-washiness, and he told the Festival's administrators that he would no longer return to Salzburg if Furtwängler were invited back. But the crunch never came : in February 1938, Austrian Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg made his Ist compromises with Hitler, and Toscanini immediately announced his withdrawal from the Salzburg Festival. The following month, Austria voted to annex itself to Germany, and at the nazified 1938 Salzburg Festival Furtwängler conducted what had been Toscanini's production of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » . On the other hand, as long as Hitler's regime lasted, Furtwängler fought a rear-guard action against Nazi barbarity. There are approximately 80 traceable cases of Jews and others, musicians and non-musicians, whom Furtwängler tried (often successfully) to assist, in a variety of ways ; there must have been many more such cases of which traces have been lost. At the same time, Furtwängler was trying to maintain his position as Germany's leading conductor, despite Göring's partially successful attempts to provide the public with an alternative in the person of young Herbert von Karajan. « Der Wunder Karajan » , as the press began to call the new idol, had joined the Nazi Party early on, both in his native Austria and in Germany, and was busy creating a new dimension for the term « opportunism » . Furtwängler took advantage of Gœbbels' rivalry with Göring in order to strike back at his own new rival.

On December 14, 1940, while the War raged, Gœbbels noted in his diary :

« Furtwängler has objections about Karajan, who is getting too much coverage in the press. I put a stop to this. In other respects, Furtwängler is behaving very decently. And when all is said, he is our greatest conductor. »

One of Furtwängler's « decent » acts was to play a pre-Christmas piano recital for Hitler at the Chancellery. (So much for the conductor's principle of separating art from politics !) Furtwängler was also decent enough to conduct a birthday concert for Hitler - only once, in 1942, according to some sources. But Sir Ernst Gombrich, the eminent art-historian who was a refugee from Nazi Austria, maintained that the event was annual.

In 1987, Gombrich wrote in a letter to this writer :

« My War work in England was that of a Radio Monitor, and so, I heard him conduct Beethoven's 9th on every eve of Hitler's birthday, April 19th. The oration was 1st held by Gœbbels, who regularly ended with the words : “ Er soll uns bleiben, was er immer war, unser Hitler ! ” (May he remain what he has always been, our Hitler !) after which the strains of the 9th began, most incongruously. »

Gombrich, who had met Furtwängler before the War, described him as « a man of devouring ambition ; I know he was not really a Nazi, but he certainly was a committed German nationalist and assured friends that he could not possibly leave his fatherland » .

The conflicting evidence seems endless. There is, for instance, the November 16th, 1943, entry in Marie Vassiltchikov's « Berlin Diaries (1940-1945) » , which were published in 1987 :

« Dined tonight at Gottfried Bismarck's in Potsdam with Adam Trott, the Hassells and Furtwängler. The latter [sic] , who is terrified of the possible arrival of the Russians, disappointed me. From a musical genius, I had somehow expected more “ class ”. »

The interesting bit is not the passage that reveals the diarist's « naïveté » with regard to the behaviour of geniuses, but the revelation about the company Furtwängler was keeping. Count Gottfried von Bismarck, Doctor Adam von Trott zu Solz, Ambassador Ulrich von Hassell, and young Princess Vassiltchikov herself were all profoundly involved in the secret anti-Nazi movement and in the ultimately unsuccessful plans to assassinate Hitler. Was Furtwängler merely odd man out at a dinner party, or was he aware of the others' doings ? His widow maintained that he knew very well what sort of company he was keeping.

On the other hand, in reflecting on Igor Stravinsky in one of his private note-books, Furtwängler wrote :

« The Russian revolutionary devotion to the machine finds a voice in him. Germany has got beyond this. Germany is struggling from the machine to life, and, therefore, it much prefers Bruckner's “ stupid ” music to the “ clever ” music of Stravinsky. »

One may ignore the absurdity of Furtwängler's view of the politically ultra-conservative Stravinsky as a representative of the Bolshevik revolution, and one may ignore the conductor's incomprehension of Stravinsky's music ; but one can hardly ignore the wrong-headedness and the nearly incredible level of self-delusion implicit in Furtwängler's belief that the Germans, as a nation, were spiritually superior to anyone or anything, in 1944, when this comment was written.

In January 1945, Albert Speer, Hitler's Minister of Armaments, managed to let Furtwängler know that the « Gestapo » was going to try to do him in before the quickly approaching end of the War. The conductor's wife and family were already living in Switzerland, and he succeeded in joining them there. No sooner did he attempt to conduct, however, than he found himself the object of Swiss anti-Nazi protests. He was acquitted at his denazification trial in December 1946 (the testimony of Jewish colleagues and other witnesses was overwhelmingly in his favour) and he was soon conducting all over Europe, including Britain. But his nomination to the principal conductorship of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra for the 1949-1950 season was vociferously opposed by Arthur Rubinstein, Vladimir Horowitz and other Jewish and/or anti-Fascist artists who had previously been forced to abandon Europe.

The conductor and teacher Felix Lederer to the Orchestra's board wrote :

« It is incomprehensible to me that Furtwängler should be tainted with an anti-Semitic attitude.

I am Jewish and was associated with Furtwängler in Mannheim (1915-1920) and in Berlin during the Nazi period. He always wholeheartedly supported Jewish artists with his whole being. He remained loyal to me in spite of being watched by the “ Gestapo ”, and always addressed me as “ my very dear friend ” in his letters even at a time when such familiarity (with a Jew) could have cost him his head. Only those artists who are falsely informed could refuse to play under his leadership. Anybody who endured the terrible Nazi period knows how bravely and selflessly Furtwängler intervened in behalf of Jewish artists. »

It may have been unfortunate, for Chicago and for Furtwängler, that the anti-Furtwängler boycott worked ; and yet, given the enormity of what had just happened in Europe, the protest was only to be expected. Rubinstein, Horowitz and all the others knew, after all, that they would have been murdered, not merely boycotted, if Germany had won the War.

Through recordings, Furtwängler's music-making continues to fascinate generations of listeners, and his behaviour under the Nazis continues to divide those familiar with the story into camps of admirers and detractors. But the plain fact is that Furtwängler's political history is a disconcerting mixture of noble generosity, childish opportunism and nearly imbecilic short-sightedness, and there's no sense in trying to cast him as either a defender of virtue or the devil incarnate. His principle of keeping art separate from politics may be a good one under democratic regimes and in peace time, but it cannot function in a reign of terror, brutality and war.

This is a condensed and updated version of an article, « Furtwängler and the “ Führer ” », that was published in « The Yale Review » , Volume 81 No. 3, July 1993.

...

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur allemand Wilhelm (Gustav Heinrich Ernst Martin) Fürtwängler est né le 25 janvier 1886 à Berlin et est mort le 30 novembre 1954 à Baden-Baden.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler fut l'un des plus importants chefs d'orchestre de l'histoire de la musique Classique occidentale, notamment grâce à ses interprétations de la musique Symphonique allemande et autrichienne qui font encore référence pour les musicologues et les interprètes actuels.

Il mena à son apogée l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin auquel il s'identifia toute sa vie. Fürtwängler synthétisa la tradition d'interprétation germanique initiée par Richard Wagner et poursuivie par les 2 premiers chefs d'orchestre permanents de l'Orchestre philharmonique : Hans von Bülow et Arthur Nikisch.

Son style « subjectif » d'interprétation, profondément influencé par les théories du musicologue juif viennois Heinrich Schenker, a souvent été comparé et opposé à celui plus « objectif » du chef Arturo Toscanini, son rival de toujours. Il a eu une influence considérable sur tous les chefs d'orchestre de l'après-guerre.

Son rôle, son image et certains de ses choix dans le contexte de l'Allemagne Nazie lui valurent de nombreuses critiques. Toutefois, il n'apparaît pas qu'il ait jamais eu la moindre sympathie pour l'idéologie nazie.

(Photo) Plaque commémorative sur la Nollendorfplatz, à Berlin-Schöneberg où est né Fürtwängler.

Le père de Wilhelm, Adolf Fürtwängler (cousin du mathématicien Philipp Fürtwängler), était un éminent archéologue qui dirigea les fouilles allemandes à Égine, Mycènes et à Olympie (une salle porte son nom au musée d'Olympie) et dont certains des ouvrages sur la céramique grecque antique font encore autorité. Sa mère, Adelheid (née Wendt), dont le père avait été un ami de Johannes Brahms, était peintre. Son oncle maternel était le zoologue Anton Dohrn qui avait fondé l'institut de zoologie de Naples. Wilhelm était l'aîné de 4 enfants, ses frères et sœurs se prénommant Walternote, Märit et Annele. Il passa la plus grande partie de son enfance proche de Munich, où son père enseignait à l'université. Il reçut une éducation musicale dès son plus jeune âge, développant très tôt une prédilection pour Ludwig van Beethoven, compositeur qui l'accompagna artistiquement toute sa vie.

(Photo) Statue du Temple d'Aphaïa (fin du VIe ou du début du Ve siècle avant Jésus-Christ) d'Égine. Fürtwängler, adolescent, se rendit sur le site d'Égine où son père dirigeait les fouilles archéologiques. Cette statue est conservée actuellement à la Glyptothèque de Munich dont le père de Fürtwängler était le conservateur.

Elisabeth Fürtwängler, son épouse, témoigne ainsi de cette proximité intellectuelle entre Beethoven et le jeune Fürtwängler : « Wilhelm m'a raconté qu'adolescent il avait accompagné son père à Égine (en 1901), où ce dernier dirigeait des fouilles archéologiques. Là, le jeune Fürtwängler montait dès le matin dans les forêts de pins et les collines, et lisait les Quatuors de Beethoven dans l'immensité solitaire de la nature. »

Il décida à 7 ans de devenir compositeur, vocation qui ne le quitta jamais. Il commença à composer dès cet âge, mais la composition lui déclenchait des crises de nervosité et de nombreuses insomnies. Bien que très brillant, le jeune homme s'ennuyait à l'école et fut donc retiré du système scolaire tôt. Il eut les archéologues Ludwig Curtius, Walter Riezler, les compositeurs Anton Beer-Walbrunn et Josef Rheinberger comme précepteurs. En 1902-1903, Fürtwängler étudia la composition avec le chef d'orchestre et compositeur Max von Schillings.

Ludwig Curtius amena le jeune Fürtwängler en Toscane, en 1902. La découverte de l'art de la Renaissance italienne eut sur lui un impact dont l'importance ne peut être exagérée : dans la chapelle des Médicis, entouré des statues de Michel-Ange, l'adolescent demeura assis des heures refusant d'être dérangé par les adultes, composant le début de son « Te Deum » .

Début de carrière

À l'époque où Fürtwängler fit ses débuts comme chef d'orchestre, à l'âge de 20 ans, il avait déjà écrit diverses œuvres, notamment sa 1re Symphonie en ré majeur 3 ans plus tôt, créée par la « Schlesische Philharmonie » de Breslau en 1903. Toutefois, elles avaient reçu un accueil très mitigé. Craignant l'insécurité matérielle liée à une carrière de compositeur, il préféra se consacrer à la direction d'orchestre. Lors de son 1er concert à Munich, le 19 février 1906, il dirigea la « Consécration de la maison » de Beethoven, un poème symphonique en si mineur de sa composition et la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Les musiciens de l'Orchestre furent irrités qu'un si jeune débutant choisisse une œuvre aussi difficile que la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner pour son 1er concert. Lors de la 1re répétition, sa technique de direction était tellement catastrophique qu'ils furent persuadés que le concert n'aurait jamais lieu. Mais, curieusement, Fürtwängler sut leur transmettre, par delà ses gestes incontrôlés, sa conception de cette Symphonie. Après le concert, les musiciens furent enthousiastes et la réaction du public et des critiques encourageante. Il fut répétiteur et assura des directions d'orchestres temporaires à Breslau, en 1905, Zürich, durant la saison 1906-1907, Munich, de 1907 à 1909, et à Strasbourg, de 1910 à 1911, où il travailla sous la direction du compositeur Hans Pfitzner. Ce dernier eut une grande influence sur Fürtwängler : il dirigea et loua les compositions de Pfitzner jusqu'à la fin de sa vie.

En 1911, le chef Hermann Abendroth démissionna de son poste de directeur musical de l'Orchestre municipal de Lübeck. En avril 1911, la ville organisa un concours pour trouver son remplaçant. En fait, l'Orchestre avait déjà choisi officieusement le successeur mais devait organiser un concours pour la forme et Fürtwängler se présenta. Ce dernier ne fut pas pris au sérieux par le jury : il n'avait presque aucune expérience et sa technique de direction était dramatique, il bougeait les mains dans tous les sens sans raison. Cependant, pendant les répétitions et durant l'audition, les musiciens de l'Orchestre furent bouleversés par ce jeune candidat qui semblait possédé par la musique et qui leur transmettait sa passion à travers un « 6e sens » : ils exigèrent Fürtwängler. Ce dernier devint donc le chef d'orchestre de la ville hanséatique où la vie culturelle jouait un rôle très important. C'est à Lübeck, le 28 avril 1913, qu'il dirigea pour la 1re fois de sa vie la 9e. Cette 9e n'a évidemment pas été enregistrée mais ceux qui l'entendirent déclarèrent n'en avoir jamais entendue d'aussi extraordinaire et allèrent jusqu'à prétendre que l'on ne pourrait jamais en entendre de meilleures. Des commentaires similaires furent rapportés lorsqu'il dirigea l' « Eroica » (2 janvier 1915) ainsi que pour l'Adagio de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner (28 mars 1914) . Cependant, conscient de la nécessité d'améliorer sa technique de direction, Fürtwängler se rendit à Hambourg, en février 1912, pour assister à un concert sous la direction d'Arthur Nikisch le directeur de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, considéré à l'époque comme le plus grand chef d'orchestre d'Allemagne, voire du monde. Alors que Fürtwängler fut toujours très critique vis-à-vis de ses confrères, il fut ce soir-là bouleversé. Après le concert, une amie le présenta à Nikisch mais le jeune homme fut tellement ému qu'il ne put dire un mot. Néanmoins, Fürtwängler continua à aller assister à de nombreux concerts dirigés par Nikisch à Hambourg pour essayer de découvrir ce qu'il considérait comme le « secret » du vieux Maître et qui correspondait exactement à ce qui lui manquait : la capacité qu'avait Nikisch à obtenir des sons magnifiques en utilisant un nombre très réduit de gestes simples. Ce dernier invitait systématiquement Fürtwängler aux dîners qu'il organisait après ses concerts. Un convive demanda un soir à Nikisch qui était ce jeune homme mal habillé et qui était si timide qu'il ne parlait presque pas. Il lui répondit simplement : « Il est sûr qu'il est destiné à de grandes choses » et prophétisa « ce sera probablement mon successeur ». Fürtwängler considéra toujours Nikisch comme son unique modèle pour la direction orchestrale.

Il fut ensuite nommé à l'Opéra de Mannheim en 1915. C'était son 1er poste important et le début de sa fulgurante carrière : le 7 septembre 1915, pour son 1er concert à Mannheim il dirigea « Fidelio » qui demeura toujours son opéra favori. Les critiques ne tarissaient plus d'éloges : on parla dans toute l'Allemagne du « miracle Fürtwängler ». Le poste à Mannheim a aussi une forte valeur symbolique : c'est là, en effet, qu'un groupe de musiciens du milieu du XVIIIe siècle, que l'on dénomme l'École de Mannheim, développa la forme sonate dans sa confection Classique, laquelle devint ensuite celle de la Symphonie. Son épouse Elisabeth rapporte que sa nomination à Mannheim fut la plus grande joie de sa carrière, plus encore que celle à Berlin, qui intervint plus tard.

Fürtwängler a raconté à de nombreuses reprises comment s'était déroulée l'audition. Friedrich Schnapp, qui était chargé des enregistrements de Fürtwängler pendant une longue période, en fit également le récit : il fallait remplacer le chef d'orchestre Arthur Bodansky, lequel devait décider, avec un jury de 3 personnes, qui allait être son successeur. Fürtwängler dirigea « Fidelio » mais commit de nombreuses erreurs techniques alors que ses concurrents dirigèrent sans le moindre accroc. Schnapp raconta que Fürtwängler était totalement déprimé et absolument sûr qu'il ne serait pas retenu. Mais, contre toute attente, Bodansky l'invita à dîner et, pendant le repas, il lui demanda quand il voulait commencer. Fürtwängler fut très surpris et lui fit remarquer qu'il avait fait de nombreuses erreurs et pas les autres candidats. Schnapp raconta : « Bodansky (dit) : « Cela ne m'intéresse pas du tout. Vous étiez de loin le meilleur ! Les autres ne font pas le poids, c'est certain. » Et Fürtwängler me dit alors : « Voyez-vous, et c'était un Juif, et il faut ... je devrais écrire un jour tout ce que je dois aux Juifs ! Ils avaient effectivement un sens de la qualité qui est unique » Et ce fut le début de l'ascension de Fürtwängler. » .

Le plus grand chef d'orchestre d'Allemagne

En 1920-1922, Fürtwängler travailla tour à tour à Francfort-sur-le-Main, à Vienne, à la Staatskapelle de Berlin, à l'Orchestre du Gewandhaus de Leipzig en 1922, où il succéda à Arthur Nikisch et, simultanément, au prestigieux Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. En 1922, à 36 ans seulement, il devint le principal chef d'orchestre en Allemagne. George Schneider raconta : « Au mois d'octobre 1922, dans la vieille salle de la Philharmonie, un jeune homme de 36 ans dirige l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Il vient d'être choisi pour prendre la tête du plus prestigieux orchestre du monde. Dans une loge, Marie von Bülow, seconde femme du grand chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow, ami de Liszt, Brahms et Wagner, remarqua : « C'est la Ire fois que, depuis Bülow, j'ai retrouvé cette impression de chair de poule dans le dos » . » .

Fürtwängler naquit 11 ans avant la mort de Johannes Brahms. Fürtwängler eut toute sa vie une forte affinité pour la musique de Brahms. Son grand-père maternel fut l'ami du compositeur.

Ultérieurement, il participa régulièrement au Festival de Salzbourg et au Festival de Bayreuth. Plus précisément, il dirigea à Bayreuth à partir de 1931 et à Salzbourg à partir de 1937. Il travailla très souvent avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne qui avait été celui de Gustav Mahler. Fürtwängler succéda à Felix Weingartner à la direction de cet Orchestre en 1927. En 1930, il abandonna ce poste sous la pression du Sénat allemand qui voulait le conserver par tous les moyens en Allemagne. Clemens Krauß lui succéda et, à partir de 1933, l'Orchestre n'eut que des chefs invités. Cependant, Clemens Hellsberg expliqua « qu'entre 1927 et 1954, le véritable chef principal de l'Orchestre de Vienne fut Wilhelm Fürtwängler qui s'est produit plus de 500 fois à la tête de l'orchestre. » Mais Fürtwängler déclara toujours que l'Orchestre de Berlin avait la priorité par rapport à celui de Vienne. Il s'identifia toute sa vie à l'Orchestre de Berlin, ce qui est une des raisons principales pour lesquelles il ne quitta jamais l'Allemagne. Les musiciens de l'Orchestre de Vienne se plaignirent toujours que leur Orchestre n'était que la « maîtresse » de l'illustre chef d'orchestre alors que celui de Berlin était sa « femme » . Fürtwängler considérait que tous les musiciens de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin étaient sa famille, les traitant toujours avec grande affection, voire les protégeant durant la période Nazie.

S'intéressant au plus haut point au travail de création des œuvres, pendant la 1re partie de sa carrière, Fürtwängler programma régulièrement des œuvres de compositeurs qui lui étaient contemporains. Parmi beaucoup d'autres, il joua régulièrement Arthur Honegger, Hans Pfitzner, Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schönberg, Béla Bartók, Gustav Mahler, Sergueï Prokofiev, Carl Nielsen, Maurice Ravel et Richard Strauß. Son compositeur préféré de cette période était Béla Bartók. En outre, il dirigea la création mondiale de plusieurs œuvres importantes du répertoire contemporain. À partir de 1920, Fürtwängler travailla avec le musicologue Heinrich Schenker dont les théories font souvent encore aujourd'hui autorité pour l'interprétation de la musique tonale. Jusqu'à la mort de Schenker, en 1935, ils étudièrent ensemble en profondeur les partitions des œuvres que Fürtwängler dirigeait ensuite et Schenker venait assister à ses concerts, commentant et corrigeant ses interprétations.

La République de Weimar

(Photo de 1930) Stravinsky et Fürtwängler. Sous la République de Weimar, Fürtwängler joua un rôle important dans la mise en valeur de la musique contemporaine, en particulier celle de Stravinsky.

À la suite des accords de Locarno, Fürtwängler joua un rôle de 1er plan dans le rapprochement culturel avec la France, où il dirigea souvent. Il continua d'ailleurs à diriger de la musique française durant la Première Guerre mondiale : ainsi, le « Carmen » de Bizet apparaît à de nombreuses reprises dans les programmes des concerts de Fürtwängler pendant cette période, malgré le contexte peu favorable.

Tous les éléments biographiques concordent pour indiquer que Fürtwängler ne tomba jamais dans la haine des Français et l'utilisation des Juifs comme boucs-émissaires, idées qui traversèrent toute la société allemande pendant son existence. Il reçut la Légion d'honneur, le 20 février 1939. Ce geste du gouvernement français tend à prouver que les chancelleries des démocraties occidentales savaient parfaitement que Fürtwängler ne soutenait pas politiquement le régime Nazi. Adolf Hitler fit d'ailleurs interdire la publication de cette nouvelle en Allemagne. D'autre part, comme Fürtwängler refusa de mettre les pieds sur le territoire français durant l'Occupation, sa relation privilégiée avec la France reprit vite après la guerre : c'est la France qui fut le 1er pays étranger à l'inviter après qu'il eut repris ses fonctions au Philharmonique de Berlin en 1947 (les 24 et 25 janvier 1948, à Paris) .

Durant la République de Weimar, l'Allemagne connut une grande effervescence culturelle, non seulement dans le domaine de la musique Classique, mais aussi en architecture (le « Bauhaus ») , dans le cinéma, la peinture (l'expressionnisme allemand) . Fürtwängler, qui était devenu un symbole vivant de la grande tradition musicale germanique, joua un rôle important dans cet univers artistique. Que ce soit pour sa carrière ou pour les influences musicales qui façonnèrent son style de direction, Fürtwängler ne devait donc rien à la période Nazie.

1933-1945 : Un chef d'orchestre apolitique ?

Article détaillé : Wilhelm Fürtwängler et ses relations avec le régime Nazi.

Les rapports de Fürtwängler avec Adolf Hitler, et son attitude envers les Nazis, ont occasionné de nombreuses polémiques. Lors de leur arrivée au pouvoir en 1933, le chef d'orchestre était très critique à leur rencontre (voir la section « Relations tendues avec le pouvoir Nazi ») . Après s'être opposé publiquement aux mesures raciales d'Hitler, Fürtwängler se retrouva en situation d'affrontement direct avec les dirigeants Nazis, en particulier lorsqu'il prit la défense de l'œuvre de Paul Hindemith (voir la section sur « le cas Hindemith ») .

Les dirigeants Nazis cherchaient, par tous les moyens, à le garder en Allemagne car ils souhaitaient l'utiliser comme symbole de la culture allemande (voir la section « La volonté de récupération ») . D'autre part, comme Fürtwängler pensait que son rôle était de rester en Allemagne pour protéger cette même culture et pour aider les Allemands menacés par le régime, il décida de rester dans son pays comme artiste « apolitique » (voir la section sur l' « accord » de 1935) . Toutefois, rester en Allemagne sans aucun lien avec les dirigeants Nazis se révéla très vite impossible, comme en témoigne le concert consacré à Beethoven, le 2 mai 1935, où Hitler et tous les dirigeants Nazis vinrent sans prévenir Fürtwängler. Le fait de rester en Allemagne permit au chef d'orchestre de protéger certaines formations musicales (l'existence de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne) et d'aider de nombreuses personnes juives ou non juives (voir la section « La résistance à la volonté des Nazis ») .

Josef Gœbbels en avait conscience, il écrivit à plusieurs reprises dans son journal personnel que Fürtwängler aidait sans arrêt des Juifs, « demi-Juifs » et « son petit Hindemith » mais il ferma volontairement les yeux. En effet, il réussit à obtenir en échange sa participation à quelques manifestations importantes : un concert des « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » en 1938 à Nuremberg, la veille des journées du parti Nazi (voir la section « Les chocs de l'année 1938 ») , et plusieurs concerts de Beethoven pour l'anniversaire d'Hitler, comme celui de 1942 à Berlin (voir la section « Le grand concert de 1942 ») . Ces concerts furent vivement reprochés à Fürtwängler après la guerre. Pendant la guerre, Fürtwängler essaya systématiquement d'éviter de jouer dans les pays occupés. En particulier, il refusa catégoriquement de mettre les pieds en France sous l'Occupation. Il se rendit cependant, en 1940 et 1944, à Prague, où il joua de la musique slave, et à Oslo, en 1943, où il aida le chef d'orchestre d'origine juive Issay Dobrowen à s'enfuir en Suède (voir la section « Attitude face aux exigences du pouvoir ») .

Les dirigeants Nazis fermèrent les yeux sur de nombreux faits concernant Fürtwängler : entre autres, il refusa toujours de faire le salut Nazi, de diriger les hymnes Nazis et refusa de participer au grand film de propagande « les Philharmoniker » où il devait jouer le rôle principal. Mais la situation changea après l'attentat manqué du 20 juillet 1944 contre Hitler, quand il devint évident que Fürtwängler avait des liens avec les membres de la résistance allemande au Nazisme qui avait organisé l'attentat (voir la section « La condamnation à mort et la fuite ») . Ayant appris que la « Gestapo » était sur le point de l'arrêter, il s'enfuit précipitamment en Suisse au début du mois de février 1945.

Iers grands enregistrements

Les discographies de Wilhelm Fürtwängler sont légion, en particulier celles de John Hunt qui en publia pas moins de 6, entre 1982 et 1999 (soit une tous les 3 ans) . En 1997, la maison TAHRA publia un document chronologique, inspiré de la discographie de H. Schmidt Olsen, parue en 1973, et qui, selon de nombreux spécialistes, reste une référence à plus d'un titre malgré ses lacunes, compréhensibles pour l'époque.

Les labels autorisés ont eu accès légalement aux bandes originales : avant tout, les 2 éditeurs du chef allemand, « Deutsche Grammophon » et « EMI » , mais aussi les indépendants « Orfeo » , « Tahra » et les Sociétés Fürtwängler, principalement française et allemande.

...

La discographie de Wilhelm Fürtwängler est très importante et ses enregistrements légendaires sont régulièrement ré-édités par les maisons de disques. Tous les enregistrements sont en son monophonique. Comme les techniques d'enregistrement étaient encore expérimentales, la qualité du « remastering » est extrêmement importante. Certaines maisons de disque cherchent à filtrer les bruits du public ou les bruits provenant de la bande originale : le résultat peut être catastrophique. Cela peut écraser le « relief » du son obtenu par la battue « fluide » de Fürtwängler et donner une impression de lourdeur. Il faut aussi faire attention car Fürtwängler est probablement le seul interprète de musique classique avec Maria Callas dont tous les enregistrements, sans exception, sont ré-édités en permanence même ceux dont la bande sonore est dans un état catastrophique. Il y a aussi de nombreux « faux » Fürtwängler (Gérard Gefen dans son livre sur le chef d'orchestre en donne une liste) .

Quelques observations sur la philosophie musicale de Fürtwängler et son impact à un moment tragique de notre histoire : l'esquisse d'une pensée artistique aussi riche que celle d'un tel artiste nous est apparue comme terriblement actuelle. À l'heure où les formations orchestrales manquent de grands esprits pour les guider, le legs de Wilhelm Fürtwängler est un vivant espoir pour la prochaine génération musicale.

Homme d'une extrême sensibilité et d'un tempérament incandescent, âme fragile et tourmentée, il a été un de ces esprits magnifiques qui passent parfois au milieu des masses. Mais son art, ne l'a pas pour autant préservé des difficultés de son époque. Fürtwängler avait pour habitude de noter ses réflexions sur la musique ainsi que des observations diverses sur le monde qui l'entourait. De ce fait, pénétrer la vision artistique du chef sans connaître l'homme est plus délicat. Mais il suffit d'en être conscient et de laisser de côté, pour le moment, l'aspect essentiellement politique et inhérent (bien malgré lui d'ailleurs) à sa personnalité. C'est assez que d'examiner sa position quant au rôle presque religieux qu'il accorde à la performance musicale.

À travers ses écrits personnels, ses carnets ou bien encore sa correspondance, Fürtwängler n'a cessé d'exposer et de défendre l'idée de la création musicale comme un tout organique. Pour lui, le Concerto doit en quelque sorte incarner son étymologie en rendant possible l'accord des âmes à travers l'expérience collective. Le contact entre le public et l'artiste est le relais pour atteindre cet état de conscience partagée qui renseigne l'Homme sur lui-même. Voilà pourquoi il est, à nos yeux du moins, si important d'écouter les enregistrements publics réalisés par Fürtwängler. Certes, il n'aimait pas le disque qui entraverait selon lui la communion entre l'auditeur et l'interprète et détruirait le message artistique par excellence. Mais, il n'en demeure pas moins qu'à l'écoute d'un document sonore pris sur le vif, l'amateur de musique achète de nos jours (avec tous les bruits parasites de l'assistance) une petite part du miracle. La question reste invariable dans la bouche du grand homme durant toute sa vie : « le public marche-t-il ou non ? » .

En définitive, par-delà les raisons techniques, l'enregistrement est pour lui un cas de conscience face à l'aspect vivant qu'incarne la musique. Selon lui, le micro enferme l'interprète dans son désir de perfection. À cela s'ajoute la peur des tempos (sic) extrêmement lents, des grands contrastes, des pauses, l'angoisse de tout ce qui est poussé à l'extrême, mais aussi de tout ce qui articule, façonne, produit la forme au sens le plus profond du terme. Cela implique une modification décisive dans notre façon de jouer. La musique risque de se retrouver de plus en plus dépouillée de son caractère immédiat de vie, le rythme, la pulsation vivante du cœur de se rapprocher de la cadence mécanique et impersonnelle de la machine, la constitution organique d'être privée d'une partie de sa chaleur, de sa vie, de son opulence et de son tempérament, jusque dans le moindre accent de son chant.

On comprend le souci permanent de Fürtwängler de conserver la force vive de la musique en préservant l'aspect naturel de sa création. En effet, cette « pulsation vivante » est le propre même de la création artistique, ce que l'on peut appeler l'interprétation. Car pour le chef allemand, la musique (bien qu'elle contienne en elle-même toute sa force artistique) se présente sous une forme abstraite qui libère toute son expression à travers l'artiste. Celui-ci a donc la responsabilité de transmettre ce « caractère immédiat de vie » que le micro détruit. Ainsi, interpréter n'est pas fixer avec minutie une multitude de détails (techniques ou musicaux) mais libérer l'inspiration du moment comme le veut la loi de l'improvisation. C'est sans doute là que réside le génie de Fürtwängler - dans la volonté de faire primer l'instant sur l'habitude. Lorsque l'on écoute ses lers enregistrements de 1926, et plus généralement ceux des années 1930, on sent déjà combien son expression musicale contient de variables : rythme, tempo, crescendo, sforzando, rupture. Autant de modes d'expression qui ont attendu le moment adéquat pour s'exprimer à un niveau paroxystique et révéler toute la violence d'une époque.

...

Fürtwängler attachait beaucoup d'importance à la sonorité d'ensemble, à ce qu'on appelle la couleur orchestrale. De plus, sa conception très architecturale de l'interprétation l'amena à jouer au maximum de la dynamique sonore - son grand Crescendo dans la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven, enregistrée en 1943, en est un exemple typique. Pour apprécier pleinement les qualités de ses enregistrements, il faut donc rechercher les disques dont les sources sonores ont été traitées avec soin.

Les meilleurs CD sont édités par les Associations ; les grandes labels, « EMI » et « DGG » , produisent généralement des disques peu satisfaisants, du fait d'une filtration des bruits souvent excessive. On leur préférera « Naxos » , « Testament » et « Orfeo » , qui font appel aux meilleurs ingénieurs du son pour leurs enregistrements historiques. Parmi les petites marques, « Tahra » , « Audite » , « Opus Kura » , « Andante » et « Biddulph » font un très bon travail de restauration. En revanche, la qualité est le plus souvent médiocre chez les autres éditeurs tels que « Andromède » , « Archipel » , « Arkadia » , « Gebhardt » , « Nuova Era » , « Rodolphe » , habitués à recopier des sources non originales et de mauvaise qualité. « Music & Arts » a édité un grand nombre d'enregistrements de Fürtwängler, le plus souvent d'une qualité sonore médiocre, avec un registre médium agressif, résultant d'un filtrage excessif des graves et des aigus. Il faut toutefois noter une amélioration de leurs productions depuis qu'ils font un travail de restauration.

Les enregistrements édités par la Société Wilhelm Fürtwängler (SWF) , la « Wilhelm Fürtwängler Gesellschaft » (WFG) , le « Wilhelm Fürtwängler Centre of Japan » (WFCJ) et la « Wilhelm Fürtwängler Society of Japan » (WFSJ) sont fort recommandés.

...

(Photo) Kirsten Flagstad. Elle fut une des plus grandes sopranos wagnériennes du siècle dernier. Elle enregistra sous étiquette « EMI » « Tristan und Isolde » en 1952, avec Fürtwängler.

En 1937, Fürtwängler réalisa une grande tournée en Angleterre pendant laquelle fut enregistrée sa le interprétation importante de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven ainsi que de nombreux extraits d'Opéras de Richard Wagner avec notamment Kirsten Flagstad et Lauritz Melchior. Il existe même quelques enregistrements dans lesquels ils jouent tous les 3 ensemble : ces enregistrements sont particulièrement importants car ils réunissent ceux qui furent probablement les 3 plus grands interprètes wagnériens du XXe siècle.

En 1938, Fürtwängler fut très affecté par les exactions systématiques contre les Juifs qui s'organisèrent et qui menèrent à la « nuit de Cristal » . Le témoignage le plus poignant de l'état dans lequel il était durant cette période est l'enregistrement qu'il fit de la 6e Symphonie de Tchaïkovski, cette année là. La critique unanime estime que jamais le pathétique et le tragique n'ont été poussés aussi profondément. Fürtwängler était alors dans un état de pleine dépression et proche du suicide. Dans les enregistrements de « Parsifal » de 1938, on ressent la même impression de profonde dépression. Sami Habra déclara à propos de l'enregistrement de la 6e Symphonie de Tchaïkovski : « Le dernier mouvement aurait probablement contenu quelque lueur d'espoir, n'eût été les événements tragiques qui allaient plonger le monde dans ses heures les plus noires. Nombre d'observateurs ont fait observer que Fürtwängler avait prévu ce qui allait se passer. »

L' « émigration intérieure »

À partir de 1938, Adolf Hitler mit en place en Allemagne un régime qui devait amener la Seconde Guerre mondiale et des crimes contre l'humanité à très grande échelle. Mais Fürtwängler ne tomba pas dans le désespoir. Dans son interprétation de 1938 de la « Pathétique » de Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski, il parut toucher le fond, mais il semble que quelque chose se transforma complètement dans son esprit au tournant de la guerre. En témoigne un enregistrement de 1940 d'une version orchestrée de la « Cavatina » du 13e quatuor de Ludwig van Beethoven qui, au lieu d'exprimer un désespoir absolu, semble totalement hors du temps. Il n'est pas possible, en écoutant cet enregistrement, de ne pas se rappeler que Fürtwängler apprenait par cœur, très jeune, les Quatuors de Beethoven en Grèce, alors que son père dirigeait les fouilles dans les plus grands sanctuaires de la Grèce antique. Fürtwängler sembla, à partir de ce moment, atteindre une dimension spirituelle qui prenait racine dans la plus haute tradition idéaliste grecque et dont la musique Symphonique germanique se voulait l'héritière, dimension qui lui servit de « refuge intérieur ». Josef Goebbels se rendit compte que Fürtwängler s'était enfermé dans une émigration intérieure, utilisant ce terme bien avant que les intellectuels allemands ne le définissent après la guerre. Il écrivit, en avril 1944 :

« Fürtwängler n'a jamais été National-Socialiste. Et il n'a jamais fait de mystère là-dessus. Et les Juifs et les émigrés ont trouvé cela suffisant pour le considérer comme un des leurs, lui qui était dans une sorte d' « émigration intérieure » ; il n'a jamais changé d'avis sur nous. »

Les enregistrements de la suite de la guerre, s'ils sont toujours en 1942 et 1943 marqués par le sceau du tragique, ne finissent pas dans le désespoir comme la 6e Symphonie de Tchaïkovski de 1938. Au contraire, ils semblent s'ouvrir sur une dimension transcendante. Cette tendance va en s'accroissant alors que le monde s'effondre de plus en plus autour de lui pour culminer dans les versions de 1944-1945, dans lesquelles le tragique disparaît définitivement.

(Photo) Rembrandt, « Philosophe en méditation ». Tout comme dans les œuvres principales du peintre, il se dégage des interprétations de guerre de Fürtwängler une forte présence spirituelle qui a été soulignée par de nombreux critiques comme André Tubeuf, Sami Habra ou Harry Halbreich. Fürtwängler a comparé explicitement sa direction « floue » avec l'art de Rembrandt.

Cette transformation apparaît si l'on compare le dernier mouvement de la 6e Symphonie de Tchaïkovski de 1938, l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner de 1942 et l'Adagio de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner de 1944. Alors que l'enregistrement de 1938 se finit sur un vide immense, celui de 1942 est tragique mais la grandeur du discours est telle qu'en arrière-plan, une présence surnaturelle transparait. Dans l'Adagio de 1944, le processus d'anéantissement et de mort semble pleinement accepté par le chef d'orchestre et, à la fin du mouvement, « au bout du tunnel », cette présence surnaturelle, qui n'était qu'en arrière plan en 1942, se révèle clairement porteuse d'un espoir infini. Cette dimension spirituelle est encore plus claire dans le célèbre enregistrement de l' « Eroica », la 3e Symphonie de

Beethoven, daté de décembre 1944, qualifié de « la plus grande interprétation de tous les temps de la plus grande Symphonie de tous les temps ». Fürtwängler réalisa la plus grande « Marcia funebre », le 2e mouvement de la Symphonie, jamais enregistrée. Mais, s'il s'agit toujours d'un dialogue avec la mort, cela n'a plus rien à voir avec l'expressionnisme allemand. On est beaucoup plus proche des plus grands chefs-d'œuvre de Rembrandt où la peinture semble « habitée » par une présence surnaturelle et où les décors semblent sortir du cadre du tableau pour occuper un espace sans limite. André Tubeuf écrivit dans son commentaire sur cet enregistrement de 1944 : « Un fabuleux Classicisme, figures que l'on dirait de pierre par leur noblesse, de feu par leur urgence : mais qui libèrent soudain, sur l'aile d'un Scherzo, dans le pas d'une Marche, « donné en acte », l'Infini. »

Les enregistrements de 1942-1943

En 1942, les techniques d'enregistrement s'étant améliorées, Fürtwängler commença à accepter d'être enregistré un peu plus souvent. S'ensuivirent des enregistrements qui comptent parmi les documents sonores les plus importants du XXe siècle : par exemple, le mythique Adagio de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner, le 2e Concerto pour piano de Brahms avec Edwin Fischer, la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner, une 9e Symphonie de Schubert (intitulée « la Grande »), Till l'Espiegle de Richard Strauß et, surtout, la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven. À propos de cette version Dantesque, Harry Halbreich déclara concernant le 1er mouvement : « Nul n'a jamais approché Fürtwängler dans l'évocation de ce terrifiant déchaînement de forces cosmiques. »

(Photo) « Le Jugement dernier » de Michel Ange, dans la chapelle Sixtine. La 9e de Beethoven de 1942 par Fürtwängler a été comparée, par la critique, à la chapelle Sixtine de Michel Ange.

L'Adagio a toujours été considéré par la critique comme un « sommet » de l'art de Fürtwängler. René Trémine déclara en effet : « Quant à l'Adagio, ne serait-il pas, en sa surhumaine ampleur, le plus haut sommet atteint par Fürtwängler - avec la Marche funèbre de l'Eroica (à Vienne, en 1944) ? ». En ce qui concerne le fortissimo de la mesure 330 du Finale, suivi d'un point d'orgue démesuré, Harry Halbreich ajouta : « Il s'agit d'une vision de Dieu où Beethoven, grâce à un interprète digne de lui, rejoint et égale en puissance le Michel-Ange de la chapelle Sixtine. »

En 1943, il enregistra l'ouverture de « Coriolan », une 4e Symphonie de Brahms, les Variations sur un thème de Haydn de Johannes Brahms et, surtout, la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven. En ce qui concerne cette dernière, la transition du 3e au 4e mouvement est probablement l'un des plus grands moments de l'histoire de la musique.

4 mois après cette 5e de Beethoven, il enregistra la 7e Symphonie de Beethoven. Harry Halbreich écrivit à propos du second mouvement de cet enregistrement : « Dès les Ires mesures, la perfection nous subjuge par son évidence : comment en douter, c'est là le tempo juste, humainement, organiquement juste, de cette musique. Qui décrira la beauté incroyable du phrasé de la sonorité du chant des altos et violoncelles ? L'expression sublime des violons dans l'aigu ? Quant au second thème, à son retour, il apparaît encore plus émouvant et plus expressif (plus Brahmsien aussi !) que la Ire fois ». Pour le Finale : « Ce finale fut toujours l'un des grands chevaux de bataille de Fürtwängler. Fürtwängler, rééditant l'incroyable performance de la conclusion de la « 5e » de juin 1943, se lance dans une gradation finale défiant toute description, un « maelström » d'enfer qui coupe le souffle sans que ce déchaînement échappe un seul instant à la poigne de fer du génial meneur d'hommes. « Je suis le Bacchus qui broie le délicieux nectar pour l'humanité. C'est moi qui donne aux hommes la divine frénésie de l'esprit » : ainsi s'exprimait Beethoven. Il fallait un géant, comme le Fürtwängler de ce jour d'automne 1943, pour faire vivre la réalité sonore de cette divine frénésie ! » En 1943, Fürtwängler dirigea aussi, au Festival de Bayreuth, « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » avec Max Lorenz.

L'année 1944

Fin 1944, Berlin et Vienne étaient sous les bombardements alliés. Les salles de concert étaient détruites les unes après les autres. Fürtwängler réalisa une dernière série de concerts souvent « sans public », pour être ensuite retransmis à la radio. Il est difficile de se représenter ce qu'il se passe dans son esprit, dirigeant ses derniers musiciens dans des salles vides, dans un univers complètement apocalyptique. Toujours est-il que Fürtwängler, particulièrement inspiré par l'effondrement du 3e « Reich », enregistra une série d'œuvres de tout 1er plan : une 3e Symphonie de Beethoven, l'« Eroica », le 1er mouvement de la 8e Symphonie de Schubert, l'ouverture de Léonore III et la 6e Symphonie de Beethoven, une 8e Symphonie Bruckner, une 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, elle aussi considérée par certains critiques comme le « plus extraordinaire enregistrement Symphonique du XXe siècle » et, in extremis, début 1945 à Vienne alors qu'il s'enfuyait en Suisse, poursuivi par la « Gestapo », la Symphonie en ré mineur de César Franck et une ultime 2e Symphonie de Brahms.

Les Soviétiques occupèrent Berlin dès 1945 et s'emparèrent des enregistrements de Fürtwängler avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Ces derniers ne furent rendus officiellement par l'Union soviétique qu'à la fin des années 1980.

Histoire de la vie musicale à Berlin

L'année 1570 est l'année où l'Orchestre de Berlin est apparu pour la 1re fois sur les registres : la « Kurfürstliche Hofkapelle », qui fait ainsi partie des plus anciens Orchestres du monde. Il a fallu cependant attendre encore un peu pour que la musique berlinoise connaisse son apogée.

Au début du XVIIe siècle, Berlin entra dans l'histoire de la musique avec des musiciens tels Johannes Eccard et Nikolaus Zangius, Maîtres de chapelle à la Cour du prince électeur. La musique protestante fut représentée dans la 1re moitié du XVIIe siècle par Johann Crüger. Pendant la guerre de Trente Ans, l'activité musicale connut un ralentissement comme dans le reste de l'Allemagne. En 1701, Berlin prit rang de résidence royale. C'est sous le règne de Frédéric II (1740-1786) que la ville devint un foyer musical important, les artistes se partageant entre la capitale de la Prusse et le séjour royal de Potsdam. On y rencontre Johann Joachim Quantz, Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, les Benda, Carl Heinrich et Johann Gottlieb Graun, Johann Friedrich Reichardt, Christoph Nichelmann, Johann Philipp Kirnberger, Friedrich Wilhelm Marpurg et Carl Friedrich Zelter. Les compositeurs de l'école de Berlin se sont illustrés dans les domaines de la Symphonie, de la musique instrumentale, du lied et de l'Opéra.

En 1742, Frédéric le Grand créa le « Königliche Hofoper » (l'Opéra de la Cour royale « Unter den Linden »), pour que Berlin ait aussi un Opéra à la mesure de l'Opéra « Semper » de Dresde. C'est Frédéric II, qui jouait lui-même de la flûte et composa d'innombrables sonates pour flûte et clavecin, qui a formé l'Orchestre et l'Opéra de la Cour. C'est ainsi qu'est né le nouvel Orchestre composé d'environ 50 musiciens, un nombre honorable, et qui fut bientôt admiré et apprécié dans toute l'Europe. Berlin était également réputé à cette époque comme centre de théorie musicale.

Au XIXe siècle et dans la 1re moitié du XXe régna une activité intense : les Orchestres, les Sociétés chorales, les Académies de musique religieuse, les Opéras et les Écoles de musique se multiplièrent, en particulier, de 1800 à 1832, sous l'impulsion de Carl Friedrich Zelter. La musique orchestrale se développa particulièrement dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle. De nombreuses formations furent créées : la « Musikausübende Gesellschaft », fondée par Johann Philipp Sack, en 1752, l'« Orchestervereinigung Berliner Musikfreunde », devenue ensuite le « Berliner Orchesterverein », le « Königliches Hoforchester », devenu ensuite la « Staatskapelle », qui compta parmi ses chefs Felix Weingartner et Richard Strauß, et, enfin, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin qui, fondé en 1882, est alors considéré depuis plusieurs dizaines d'années comme l'un des meilleurs Orchestres du monde ; il a eu notamment pour chefs Hans von Bülow (1887-1892), Arthur Nikisch (1897-1922), Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1922-1945 ; 1947-1954), Sergiù Celibidache (1945-1947) et Herbert von Karajan (depuis 1954). Au XXe siècle, sont venus s'ajouter les Orchestres de la Radio : « Berliner Rundfunk » pour Berlin-Est, « Nordwestdeutscher Rundfunk » et « RIAS » pour Berlin-Ouest. L'Orchestre RIAS a connu une période de grande notoriété lorsque Ferenc Fricsay en était le directeur (1948-1954).

Parmi les Sociétés chorales figurent le Chœur philharmonique, le Chœur de la cathédrale Sainte-Hedwige et la célèbre « Singakademie », fondée, en 1791, par Christian Fasch et dirigée ensuite par Zelter ; c'est avec le concours de cette formation que Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy dirigea, en 1828, la « Passion selon saint Matthieu » de Jean-Sébastien Bach, tombée dans l'oubli depuis près d'un siècle. Les Académies de musique religieuse les plus importantes sont l'« Akademie für Kirchenmusik », fondée en 1822, la « Gesellschaft zur Förderung der kirchlichen Tonkunst » et le « Caecilienverein ».

Plusieurs grandes scènes d'Opéra ont valu à Berlin sa renommée dans le domaine lyrique. Inaugurée en 1742, la « Hofoper » a vu la création du « Freischütz » de Carl Maria von Weber, en 1821, et l'opposition entre les partisans de cette œuvre de style nouveau et ceux du style de Gaspare Spontini, qui était alors directeur musical du Théâtre. « Les Joyeuses Commères de Windsor » d'Otto Nicolai y furent créées en 1849. Baptisée, après 1918, « Staatsoper » (Opéra d'État), cette scène a eu pour intendants ou directeurs de la musique Richard Strauß, Felix Weingartner, Karl Muck, Max von Schillings, Heinz Tietjen. Les créations de « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg (1925), « Christophe Colomb » de Darius Milhaud (1930), « Das Herz » de Hans Pfitzner (1931) et « Peer Gynt » de Werner Egek (1938) s'y sont, entre autres, déroulées. Située dans l'ancien secteur Est, la « Staatsoper » a eu pour directeurs musicaux, après la guerre, Franz Konwitschny (1955-1961) et Otmar Suitner, de 1964 à 1975.

Le « Deutsches Opernhaus », inauguré en 1912 et appelé après 1918 « Städtische Oper » (Opéra municipal), a compté parmi ses intendants Carl Ebert et parmi ses directeurs musicaux Bruno Walter et Ferenc Fricsay. Détruit en 1944, lors d'un bombardement aérien, il a repris en 1961 le nom de « Deutsche Oper ».

Inaugurée en 1924, le « Kroll Oper » devint rapidement célèbre par son orientation très particulière ; notamment sous la direction d'Otto Klemperer (1927-1931) , ce fut un Théâtre de créations (Opéras de Paul Hindemith, etc.) et une scène d'avant-garde en ce qui concerne les décors et la mise-en-scène du répertoire. Une position comparable, dans le domaine de l'interprétation scénique, a été occupée après la dernière guerre par le « Komische Oper » , qui, ouverte en 1947, a appuyé sa célébrité sur les mises-en-scène de son intendant Walter Felsenstein.

Dans le domaine de l'enseignement de la musique, les institutions les plus importantes sont l'Université, où ont professé Philipp Spitta et Arnold Schering, la « Hochschule für Musik » , fondée en 1869, le Conservatoire municipal (autrefois, « Stern'sches Konservatorium ») , le Conservatoire « Klindworth-Scharwenka » , l' « Institut für Musikforschung » et la « Berliner Kirchenmusikschule » .

L' « Alte Philharmonie » de Berlin (1898-1944)

In spring 1882, Benjamin Bilse announced plans to take his already underpaid orchestra to Warsaw travelling in 4th class. 50 of his musicians reached breaking point. Calling themselves the « former Bilse Kapelle » , they declared their independence. Right from the start, the young ensemble received administrative support from the Berlin concert agent Hermann Wolff. On his advice, the group changed its name to « Berliner Philharmonisches Orchester » . In search of a suitable concert-hall, Wolff turned a renovated roller-skating rink into the 1st « Philharmonie » ; he organized subscription concerts and sought-out the best conductor at the time for his musicians.

Hans von Bülow had already turned the Meiningen Court Orchestra into a 1st class ensemble when he took-over the « Berliner Philharmoniker » . In only 5 years at the helm, he laid the foundation of the special musical qualities that were to become inseparably linked with the Orchestra's name. Bülow's successors, on the other hand, came to stay. Arthur Nikisch, who took-up his post in 1895, went on to influence the Orchestra's style decisively for the next 27 years. Nikisch once claimed that, « each and every member of a 1st class Orchestra has earned the title of " artist " » , and, with this credo, he gave the « Berliner Philharmoniker » the virtuosity and self-confidence that have become the Orchestra's hallmark.

If Bülow's interpretations tended towards a somewhat analytical brilliance, Nikisch's performances were full of sustained splendour and rich, warm sonorities, which he achieved with the most economical gestures, and by a rhapsodic, almost improvisatory breadth. So, it is unsurprising that the corner stones of his repertoire were Tchaïkovsky, Berlioz, Liszt, Strauß, and Mahler along with a special devotion to Bruckner. Under his leadership, the Orchestra attained its international stature, and major soloists flocked to Berlin to appear with the « Philharmoniker » .

When Arthur Nikisch died in 1922, Wilhelm Fürtwängler became his successor. The young conductor built on Nikisch's achievements. His idiosyncratic beat and impassioned music-making demanded an extremely high-level of autonomy and sensitivity from the musicians. He and his Berlin Orchestra became legendary interpreters of Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner. At the same time, Fürtwängler expanded the repertoire to include contemporary pieces by Schœnberg, Hindemith, Prokofiev and Stravinsky. Through tours abroad, the « Philharmoniker » established their international reputation as one of the finest Orchestras in the world.

The National-Socialist dictatorship and the war did irreparable damage to the German cultural landscape ; and, with it, the « Berliner Philharmoniker » . The regime's maniacal racial policy led to the loss of valuable musicians, and the Orchestra was isolated from the international exchange of soloists and conductors. At the same time, the National-Socialists turned Germany's representative ensemble into an instrument of official cultural politics. Nevertheless, Fürtwängler and the Orchestra managed to carry the ensemble's artistic substance through the war.

On 26 May 1945, the « Philharmoniker » gave their 1st post-War concert under Leo Borchard. The performance took place at the « Titania Palast » , a converted cinema. In August, Borchard was mistakenly shot by an occupying soldier, and an unknown young conductor, the Rumanian Sergiu Celibidache, was appointed ; more or less fresh from the music Academy. The orchestra's choice proved prescient. Celibidache's passionate temperament and wide-ranging programming were inspirational. Wilhelm Fürtwängler was not allowed to direct the « Philharmoniker » again until after his denazification, in 1947. He resumed leadership of the Orchestra in 1952.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler died in November 1954. In the following year, Herbert von Karajan took-over as principal conductor. He would remain with the ensemble longer than any other conductor to date. He worked with the Orchestra to cultivate a specific sound, an unprecedented perfection and virtuosity which laid the groundwork for its national and international successes : both in the concert-hall and on countless recordings. Moreover, Karajan expanded the ensemble's activities in a number of new directions. With the founding of the Salzburg Easter Festival, in 1967, the Orchestra gained its own major international Festival and an opportunity to make its mark in Operatic circles. The founding of the « Orchester-Akademie der Berliner Philharmoniker » , in which young and talented instrumentalists are prepared to meet the stringent demands of a top-flight Orchestra through practical experience, provided yet more room for development. The new « Philharmonie » was also constructed during the Karajan era ; the Orchestra has made its home in the concert-hall designed by Hans Scharoun since October 1963.

...

Chief recorder Fred Gaisberg 1st heard Arthur Nikisch in concert with the London Symphony Orchestra, in 1912. Gaisberg had master-minded the Caruso sessions in Milan, in 1902, which had been the making of the gramophone artistically and commercially. Undeterred by the need to huddle a reduced 40 piece band in front of an acoustic horn, he recorded Beethoven's « Egmont » Overture with Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra in Hayes, in June 1913. He must have been pleased with the results. That November, in collaboration with the company's German cousin « Deutsche Grammophon » , he oversaw the 1st ever complete recording of a Symphony, Beethoven's 5th, with Nikisch and the Berlin Philharmonic.

The Berlin Philharmonic had been founded in 1882 by a band of disaffected musicians from the city's « Bilsch'schen Kapelle » . They were an odd mix of expert instrumentalists (the strings were especially fine) and lesser talents reportedly of dubious repute. The rebels formed a self-governing cooperative, though in reality, it was Berlin concert agent Hermann Wolff who secured them work, provided a bespoke concert venue, and after 5 difficult years engaged the revered Hans von Bülow to drill the ensemble into shape.

It was Bülow, it is said, who gave the Orchestra its discipline, Nikisch who gave it its sound. consistently emotive in Western musical culture. The mindset of rebel musicians hell-bent on doing their own thing is one possibility, though Nikisch himself is the more probable source. Tchaïkovsky, who fell in love with Nikisch's music-making and, possibly, with Nikisch himself, wrote after a concert in Leipzig in 1887 : « This chief, a small, very pale man of about 30, with beautiful radiant eyes, must indeed have some sort of magic power, making the Orchestra thunder like a 1,000 trumpets of Jericho, now coo like a dove, and now die away with breathtaking mystery. » .

Sustaining such a tradition was not easy, which explains why after Nikisch's death, in 1922, Wolff's widow, Louise, recommended the 36 year old Wilhelm Fürtwängler to lead the Orchestra's prestigious annual season of « Philharmonischen Konzerte » . As one musician observed, « With Fürtwängler, ecstasy was the norm of feeling. » . When the Berliners visited England, in 1927, « The Times » attributed the quality of their music-making to « a concentration on the art of Symphonic playing which the conditions of the great continental Orchestras make possible and which conditions of orchestral engagement in this country render unattainable » . Some criticised the Orchestra for an over-reliance on « its » German repertoire. Neville Cardus disagreed. « For my part, I hope that Fürtwängler will go through the whole gallery of the Classics. The fact is, we have not half-heard most of them. »

It would have helped if Berlin music-making had been more widely disseminated but, curiously for an Orchestra that, by the late- 1920's, was virtually bankrupt, recordings were not seen as a useful source of income or publicity. Nor were they after 1934, when live concerts and radio were the preferred platforms for Josef Goebbels as he went about preserving the Orchestra's « elite » status while, at the same time, pursuing his government's new « accessibility » targets. Fürtwängler concerts and Fürtwängler-led foreign tours had long been the Orchestra's trump card, which is why, during the financial meltdown of 1929, in defiance of the Orchestra's constitution, he was named « Dirigent » and given unprecedented new powers over its artistic direction.

That said, some important repertoire was preserved on record. A 1928 recording of Bruckner's 7th Symphony under the young Jascha Horenstein gives us a marvellous sense of what it must have been like to hear the Berliners playing Bruckner under Nikisch, who had conducted the premiere of the Symphony in Leipzig, in 1884. And though only 3 of Beethoven's 9 Symphonies were allocated to the « Berliners » as part of Polydor's 1927 Beethoven Centenary cycle, the performances of the 1st, 3rd and 8th Symphonies under Hans Pfitzner were in a class of their own. For the rest, it was mainly bits and pieces : the Orchestra dripping « schmaltz » under Bruno Walter in Waltzes from « Der Rosenkavalier » sight-reading their way (badly) through Igor Stravinsky's « Firebird » Suite with Oskar Fried, or jumping through the hoops of Erich Kleiber's humourless reading of Stauß's « Till Eulenspiegel » . In the end, it was indefatigable who, after years of patient negotiation, persuaded Fürtwängler to record what proved to be the 2 great mementos of this era : a fine 1937 account of Beethoven's 5th Symphony and the unforgettable Tchaïkovsky « Pathétique » , the following year.

During the British air-raid of the « Alte Philharmonie » (they used phosphorus bombs) , on January 30th 1944, the Orchestra lost its hall, its archive, most of its instruments and much of its music library. Most players survived the war but their situation was parlous. Many orchestral musicians in Austro-Germany worked-out of Opera houses ; it was their « day job » . Unlike their colleagues in Vienna (the city to which « EMI » 's Walter Legge would travel in 1946 to recruit musicians - the 37 year old Herbert von Karajan, his principal quarry - and resume recording with the Vienna Philharmonic) , the « Berliners » had no such Opera house employment.

A potential saviour was Leo Borchard, the Russian-born anti-Fascist who as a young man had worked with Otto Klemperer at Berlin's « Kroll Oper » . On May 28, 1945, he led a concert of Mendelssohn, Mozart and Tchaïkovsky. 3 months later, he was dead, shot by a jittery soldier at a U.S. checkpoint in occupied Berlin. Desperate to find a replacement, the Orchestra turned to a musician with connections to the city, if not to the Orchestra or its culture, the 33 year old Romanian Sergiu Celibidache. The Americans liked the look of him and on December 1, 1945, Celibidache became the Berlin Philharmonic's official « licensee » . Fürtwängler himself returned to the beleaguered city, in May 1947. His programme began with a performance of the « Egmont » Overture which spoke, and still speaks, volumes. However, it was not until the early 1950's that he resumed regular work with the Orchestra.

With the advent of the long-playing record, in 1948, there began a recording activity « that came upon us like an intoxication : it was the 2nd, the great period of the gramophone » . The words are Karajan's but, by now, even Fürtwängler was beginning to think better of the medium. He died in 1954, but his late « Deutsche Grammophon » studio recordings (Haydn No. 88, Schubert No. 9, Schumann No. 4, his own 2nd Symphony) tell us why, for more than 30 years, he and his Orchestra had bestrode the central European musical stage.

The transition to the Karajan era was fairly seamless. « When Karajan came there was no breach » , recalls cellist Eberhard Finke. « He listened to the Orchestra from within and knew what it had to offer. » A naturally gifted musician who had observed at 1st hand the work of most of the Century's great conductors, Karajan was also extraordinarily patient. Nowadays, few people think of a job for life ; back then, it was different. Over the next 27 years, until the traumas of the winter of 1982-1983, the Orchestra an unprecedented period of stability which old values were preserved even as the Orchestra's was developed.

...

Le Philharmonique de Berlin fut fondé, en 1882, comme communauté autonome puis, à partir de 1903, comme Société à responsabilité limitée, une GmbH dont chaque musicien en activité était actionnaire, dirigée par un Comité élu de 3 membres, le « Vorstand » (titre du président de ce Comité) . Les difficultés financières croissantes de l'Orchestre après 1918, malgré sa réputation internationale, le poussèrent à accepter en 1929, en échange d'un financement régulier eu égard à « son importance pour toute l'Allemagne » , le principe d'une participation majoritaire de la Ville de Berlin, du « Land » et du « Reich » .

La rue « Bernauerstraße » existait déjà depuis longtemps. Elle était une voie commerciale et militaire entre Berlin et les localités de la Marche de Brandebourg, un ancien État du Saint-Empire Romain germanique. Elle se voit attribuer ce nom le 29 mai 1862. Lors de la planification pour la ré-organisation de Berlin par James Hobrecht (le « Hobrecht-Plan ») , elle est désignée sous les noms « Straße 50 » et « Straße 80 » , « Abteilung IX » (rue 50 et rue 80, division 9) . Sa partie nord-est reliait alors la « Bergstraße » au croisement « Schwedter / Oderberger Straße » . Le 4 juillet 1904, la prolongation vers le sud-ouest entre la « Bergstraße » et la « Gartenstraße » est intégrée à la « Bernauerstraße » .

L'« Alte Philharmonie » était située sur la « Bernauerstraße » entre la « Köthenerstraße » et la « Dessauerstraße » , dans le secteur délimité par la gare de Potsdam (« Potsdamer Bahnhof ») et celle d'Anhalter (« Anhalter Bahnhof » , où se trouvait l'immense « Askanischer Platz ») . Il s'agissait à l'origine d'une ancienne patinoire intérieure (pour la pratique du patin à roulettes) construite en 1876 par l'architecte Franz Schwechten qui (grâce au flair du nouvel agent de l'Orchestre, Hermann Wolff) sera transformée, en 1898, en salle pouvant accueillir des concerts, du théâtre et des bals (ne possédant pas de sièges fixes, on utilisera donc des chaises droites) . Cette enceinte pourvue d'une acoustique exceptionnelle devient la « maison » de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin : ensemble de renommée mondiale, fondée en 1882 par Joachim Andersen, Ludwig von Brenner et 52 autres musiciens transfuges de l'Orchestre dirigé par le chef Johann Ernst Benjamin Bilse (après que ce dernier eut annoncé son intention de prendre un train de 4e classe pour un concert prévue à Varsovie) . Nom original alors donné au nouvel orchestre : « Frühere Bilsesche Kapelle » (l'ancienne bande de Bilse) .

En mars 1882, 54 musiciens de l'Orchestre Bilse de Berlin (Benjamin Bilse, 1816-1902) , outrés des lamentables conditions dans lesquelles leur chef entendait les emmener en tournée à Varsovie, firent sécession et fondèrent un nouvel ensemble : « l'Ancien Orchestre Bilse » , à la tête duquel ils élurent Ludwig von Brenner (1833-1902) . Ce nouvel « Ancien Orchestre » trouva rapidement sa place dans la vie musicale berlinoise, en particulier grâce à l'impresario Hermann Wolff (1845-1902) qui sut trouver un grand nombre d'engagements prestigieux à cet excellent ensemble. Benjamin Bilse tenta bien de leur mettre des bâtons dans les roues, en laissant sous-entendre que l'Ancien Orchestre Bilse se produisait sous le nom d'Orchestre Bilse mais d'article fielleux en droit de réponse, les musiciens eurent gain de cause.

...

À Berlin, en 1882, et malgré sa réelle renommée, la formation orchestrale de Benjamin Bilse se dispersa. Violoniste, chef d'orchestre et compositeur allemand (1816-1902) , élève du Conservatoire de Vienne, Bilse avait joué jadis dans l'Orchestre de Johann Strauß, père, avant de fonder cette formation en 1867. Plusieurs tournées avaient conduit l'Orchestre à Saint-Petersbourg, Riga, Varsovie, Amsterdam, Vienne et à l'Exposition Universelle de Paris en 1867. Là, Johann Strauß II avait interprété le fameux « Danube Bleu » , tandis que Richard Wagner le conduisit en 1873 en présence de l'Empereur Wilhelm I.

À la suite d'un profond différend, 54 musiciens de la formation font dissidence et fondent, en 1882, « les anciens de l'Orchestre Bilse » . Les sécessionnistes dirigés par un des leurs, Ludwig von Brenner, renomment leur Orchestre : le Philharmonique de Berlin, qui allait devenir l'un des meilleurs orchestres du monde.

Après des débuts difficiles menant la phalange à plusieurs reprises au bord de la disparition, les destinées de l'Orchestre sont confiées, en 1887, à Hermann Wolff qui, génialement, engage le 1er grand chef de métier, Hans von Bülow, personnage exceptionnel, ami de Franz Liszt, Johannes Brahms et Richard Wagner dont il dirigera, souvent en leur présence, nombre de leurs chefs-d'œuvre. Ses dons remarquables hissent cet Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin à une célébrité unique, plus tard entretenue voire amplifiée par des talents comme Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Fürtwängler et Herbert von Karajan. Des chefs invités prestigieux tels que Felix Weingartner, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, sans oublier Johannes Brahms et Edvard Grieg, contribuèrent aussi à sa réputation.

Un des acteurs principaux de la création du « Berliner Philharmoniker », bien qu'injustement oublié par la postérité, joua un rôle qui s'avéra majeur. Il se nomme Joachim Andersen (1847-1909), un Danois alors très célèbre et célébré comme un des Iers flûtistes virtuoses de son temps (il fut surnommé : « le Chopin de la flûte »), un très honorable chef d'orchestre et un compositeur fécond essentiellement dévoué à son instrument. Après avoir été membre de l'Orchestre royal de Copenhague (1869-1877), il s'installe à Berlin en 1881 et co-fonde le futur fameux Orchestre de Berlin où, pendant plus d'une dizaine d'années, il tient les postes de flûte solo et de chef assistant ménageant une place confortable à la musique de son temps. Il reviendra à Copenhague, en 1893, et prendra la direction de l'Orchestre du Palais royal, une maladie de la langue l'obligeant à abandonner son instrument.

Tant au Danemark qu'en Allemagne, il jouissait d'une notoriété remarquable mais la dure loi de l'oubli opéra également à son encontre tant et si bien qu'il ne reste rien ou pas grand-chose de ses activités dans la mémoire collective du monde musical.

Benjamin Bilse

Le Maître de chapelle, directeur musical et compositeur allemand Johann Ernst Benjamin Bilse est né le 17 août 1816 à Liegnitz, en Silésie (aujourd'hui Legnica, en Pologne), et est mort dans la même ville le 13 juillet 1902.

Benjamin Bilse apprend son métier à l'École de musique municipale au sein de laquelle il se forme à la pratique de tous les instruments de l'orchestre. À Vienne, il prend des leçons auprès du célèbre violoniste Josef Böhm et joue dans l'Orchestre de Johann Strauß, père. En 1842, il est nommé Maître de chapelle de la ville de Liegnitz. En 1867, il crée l'Orchestre Bilse au « Berliner Konzerthaus » de la « Leipzigerstraße » de Berlin. C'est là que sont donnés les légendaires « Bilse-Konzerte » (il y en aura plus de 3,000) immortalisés par Adolph Menzel dans un tableau datant de 1871. Des tournées de concerts entraînent les musiciens dans toute l'Europe : Saint-Pétersbourg, Riga, Varsovie, Amsterdam et Vienne et, en 1867, Paris, à l'occasion de l'Exposition universelle où Johann Strauß, fils, dirige la valse du « Beau Danube bleu ». Parmi les grands virtuoses qui composent l'Orchestre, on trouve notamment César Thomson, en 1879, et le 1er violon Eugène Ysaÿe, en 1880.

En 1882, un différend avec les musiciens conduit Joachim Andersen, Ludwig von Brenner et 52 autres, parmi les meilleurs, à se séparer de Bilse. Ils fondent l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Bilse ne reste pas inactif et crée immédiatement un nouvel orchestre.

Benjamin Bilse a composé de nombreuses Valses, Polkas, Quadrilles et Marches dont 42 ont été publiées.

...

The German conductor and composer Benjamin Bilse was born on 17 August 1816 in Liegnitz (present-day Legnica), in the Prussian Silesia Province, and died on 13 July 1902. He obtained a rich musical education, as at the Vienna Conservatory under violinist Joseph Böhm, and played in the orchestra of Johann Strauß I. He returned to Liegnitz where he became municipal « Kapellmeister » in 1842.

From 1867, he regularly performed with the « Bilse'sche Kapelle » (Bilse's Band) at the « Konzerthaus » on « Leipzigerstraße », in Berlin. The Orchestra became increasingly popular, Bilse toured Europe and gave guest concerts in Saint-Petersburg, Riga, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Vienna, as well as at the 1867 Exposition universelle in Paris, where his band performed « the Blue Danube » together with Johann Strauß II. In 1873, Richard Wagner conducted the Orchestra in the presence of Emperor Wilhelm I.

After a fierce quarrel with Bilse about another 4th class concert trip to Warsaw, 54 musicians split, in 1882, to found the « Former Bilse's Band » under conductorship of Ludwig von Brenner, shortly afterwards renamed Berlin Philharmonic, today one of the world's leading Orchestras. Bilse retired a few years later and returned to Liegnitz, where he also died.

...

Benjamin Bilse learned his craft from the bottom up. Born in 1816, in the Silesian town of Liegnitz, received his training as a town musician at the age of 14, during the course of which he learned « the practical handling of almost all orchestral instruments ». He then set-out into the world, including to Vienna, where he played violin in the orchestra of Johann Strauß, the elder. In 1842, he returned to his home-town, where he conducted the town band. Bilse proved to be a good conductor and marketing strategist. He improved his ensemble's artistic standard, ensured that young people were qualified to play with them by giving gifted young people without means music lessons free of charge, and toured extensively with his orchestra.

When he left Liegnitz, in 1865, because the town council intended to reduce the musicians' fees, the orchestra had already borne his name for a long time : « Bilsesche Kapelle ». In 1867, Benjamin Bilse and his musicians took-up residence in Berlin and became both an artistic and a society institution with the concerts they held daily in the « Konzerthaus » at « Leipzigerstraße » during the winter season. People went to Bilse to hear good music, but also to initiate marriages. Bilse made use of various programme structures, catering to both intellectual and popular taste. Besides works of great Masters and popular pieces, he enjoyed presenting the creations of young, unknown composers.

The secession of the 54 founding members of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 1882 was a major professional setback for him. Though he did put together a new orchestra, he left Berlin 3 years later, returning to his native town of Liegnitz, where he died in 1902.

Hermann Wolff

Hermann Wolff, who was born in Cologne, in 1845, and lived in Berlin from the age of 10, combined various talents in one : entrepreneurial spirit, business acumen and musicality. He had excellent contacts, knew many artists and had a sure feeling for promising composers. In short, he possessed all the prerequisites to become one of the most important and influential concert agents of his day. In 1880, he opened his own « Concert Bureau » in Berlin ; from then on, he dominated the music market of the time. No one else in his line of work had so many innovative ideas and such entrepreneurial spirit.

The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra also profited from his business acumen. Not just that Hermann Wolff procured the most famous soloists and best conductors of his day for them, as well as engaging the services of Hans von Bülow and Arthur Nikisch as musical heads of the subscription concerts he mounted, he was constantly showing the Orchestra new ways out of existential crises. His « Philharmonic dinners » were legendary : Sunday meals to which he and his wife Luise, who had been an actress, invited the most important musical personages to their home. When Hermann Wolff, who had been so restless and driven, died surprisingly at the age of 56, on 3 February 1902, Luise Wolff took-over the concert agency and managed it as he would have done.

Erich Sachs joined the business as a partner during the First World War. The agency continued to dominate the market. The end came for the Jewish company when the National-Socialists seized power. Luise Wolff initiated the liquidation process in 1934, in order not to be subject to the repressive measures of the new rulers. She died in 1935 at the age of 80.

...

The German concert agent, journalist, and impresario Hermann Wolff was born on 4 September 1845 in Cologne and died on 3 February 1902 in Berlin.

The Wolff family was of Jewish ancestry and had lived in the Rhineland for many generations. In 1855, Hermann's father, a businessman, decided to move with his whole family to Berlin. Hermann was trained to follow his father into business, but his real passion had always been music and he was allowed to study the piano and music theory in his spare time. In order to supplement his income as a trader at the Berlin Stock Exchange, he began writing newspaper articles. When the Franco-Prussian War broke-out in 1870, Wolff was called-up and, because he was fluent in French, he was detailed as an interpreter for an army doctor treating wounded prisoners of war.

An early admirer of Richard Wagner's music, Wolff travelled to Bayreuth in 1872 to attend the laying of the foundation stone of the new Festival Theatre. While still continuing to do business on the Berlin Stock Exchange in the mornings, Wolff began to work for the music publishing firm of Bote & Bock. His new job involved gathering musical news from English, German, French, and Italian newspapers and condensing these into brief summaries. In 1875, he met the young Austrian-born actress Louise Schwarz (1855-1935) , and they were married 3 years later. They had 2 daughters, Edith and Lili ; and a son, Werner, who became a conductor.

During one of his visits to Berlin, in 1880, Anton Rubinstein happened to tell Hugo Bock (the head of Bote & Bock, who were the publishers of his works in Germany) that he was looking for a reliable assistant to organize his forthcoming concert tour to Spain and Portugal. Bock recommended Wolff, and the latter travelled to Spain in December to familiarize himself with the local conditions. Rubinstein's tour of Spain began in January 1881 and took him and Wolff, who acted as his manager and press secretary, to the following cities : Madrid, Barcelona, Valencia, Toledo, Seville, Cordoba, Granada, Jerez, and Cadiz. Spanish audiences were not well-versed in the Classical repertoire, but they welcomed the great pianist with open arms and styled him « Don Antonio » . Rubinstein was greatly impressed by Wolff's efforts and invited him to accompany him on his tour of Great Britain that summer.

Already before travelling to Spain with Rubinstein, Wolff had started to offer his services to other musicians (such as Sophie Menter) , carrying-out negotiations on their behalf with concert-hall managers in various countries. Then, in 1880, he set-up his own agency in Berlin, the « Concert Direction Hermann Wolff » . Its activities included organizing concerts on behalf of musicians, or on Wolff's own initiative, as well as securing engagements for them. Very soon, such venerable societies as the « Leipzig Gewandhaus » and the « Frankfurt Museums-gesellschaft » were enlisting the services of Wolff's agency to engage guest soloists and conductors, attracted by his wide-ranging international contacts. Because the firm's telegraphic address was MUSIKWOLFF-BERLIN, its founder was given the nickname of « Musikwolff » . There was nothing rapacious about his business dealings, though, as he generously supported both established and upcoming artists and was willing to take risks for them.

In 1882, when the members of Benjamin Bille's orchestra in Berlin (an ensemble whose concerts were very popular and had often featured Tchaïkovsky's works) fell-out with their conductor, Wolff stepped in and re-organized the players under the new name of « Philharmonic Orchestra » . The Orchestra's 1st conductors, among them Karl Klindworth, were unable to attract sufficiently large audiences, however, and the Berlin Philharmonic Society decided to dissolve itself in 1887. Wolff again intervened to save the Orchestra, taking over its financial management. Most importantly, he got in touch with Hans von Bülow (whom he had known since 1880, when he organized his recital tour to Scandinavia) and persuaded him to accept the post of principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic. Bülow's 1st concert with the Orchestra, on 21 October 1887, heralded the swift rise of Berlin to become the most important music centre in Germany (surpassing Leipzig) . Wolff played a vital role in this, thanks to his association with Bülow and his enterprising spirit. Thus, he had a new concert venue built in Berlin : the Bechstein Hall, which was designed for chamber music concerts and solo recitals. The Hall was inaugurated in October 1892 with a series of recitals given in the course of that month by Bülow, Johannes Brahms with the Joachim Quartet, and Anton Rubinstein.

Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky met Hermann and Louise Wolff in Berlin, in January 1888, during his 1st concert tour to Western Europe. He enjoyed their warm hospitality on this and subsequent visits to the German capital. Wolff's daughter, Edith, later recalled that meeting Tchaïkovsky was for her father « one of the most interesting encounters of his life, which was so rich in acquaintances with individuals of genius. My mother said of Tchaïkovsky, when he visited her in Berlin soon afterwards, that he was the most delightful and charming guest she had ever welcomed to her house » . Wolff and his associate, Hermann Fernow, organized Tchaïkovsky's concert tours of Germany, Switzerland and America during the late- 1880's and early 1890's.

Hans von Bülow's death in 1894 was a bitter blow for Wolff, but he rallied his spirits and set about looking for someone worthy of succeeding Bülow at the helm of the Berlin Philharmonic. This was to be Arthur Nikisch, whose 1st concert with the Orchestra, on 14 October 1895, featured Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5, a work that Nikisch was championing across Europe. Wolff organized the Berlin Philharmonic's tours under Nikisch to Russia, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Switzerland, and France. In 1896, Emperor Wilhelm II appointed Wolff to head the delegation of German musicians who attended the Coronation festivities in Moscow for Nicholas II, the new Tsar of Russia.

Many renowned composers and musicians visited Hermann and Louise Wolff's house in Berlin, especially in conjunction with the so-called « Philharmonic dinners » given there on Sunday afternoons after rehearsals with the Philharmonic Orchestra. In some cases, these musicians became close friends of the family. Apart from Anton Rubinstein and Tchaïkovsky, another notable guest was Brahms, who once sang his « Wiegenlied » for little Edith.

Hermann Wolff died on 3 February 1902, aged just 56. All the leading German newspapers hastened to pay tribute to his untiring efforts in turning Berlin into one of the music capitals of the world. Nikisch conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra at a concert held in his memory.

After Hermann Wolff's death, his widow Louise took charge of the concert agency, and she was soon popularly known as « Königin Louise » (in allusion to the beloved Queen of Prussia during the Napoleonic Wars) because of the way she dominated music life in Berlin. She continued her husband's close collaboration with Arthur Nikisch and the Philharmonic Orchestra, as well as inviting many foreign artists, including Serguei Rachmaninoff and Fedor Chaliapin, to perform in Berlin. When her loyal assistant Hermann Fernow died in 1917, Louise had to look for a new associate and eventually chose Erich Sachs, the owner of a smaller concert agency. A merger took place, and the firm was now known as the « Concert Direction Wolff & Sachs », although Louise continued to exercise sole responsibility for the Berlin Philharmonic's concerts. After Nikisch's death, in 1923, she established a good relationship with his young successor, Wilhelm Fürtwängler, with whom she jointly drew-up the Orchestra's programmes. One highlight of Louise's last years was her organization of Yehudi Menuhin's triumphant début in Berlin on 12 April 1929, a few days before the boy's 13th birthday.

Very soon after Adolf Hitler came to power in January 1933, it became clear that the days of the concert agency founded by Hermann Wolff were numbered. Thus, the Nazi government prohibited Bruno Walter from conducting a scheduled concert with the Berlin Philharmonic. Shortly afterwards, Louise's associate Erich Sachs emigrated from Germany, and the firm again came to be known by the old name of « Concert Direction Hermann Wolff ». But already, by the end of 1934, Louise had decided to dissolve the agency, since she realized that her daughters, Edith and Lili, on account of their Jewish ancestry, would not be allowed to carry on their work for the family firm undisturbed. When she announced her decision, in April 1935, many famous musicians wrote to Louise to express their sadness over the loss of this institution. A few weeks later, on 25 June 1935, Louise herself died.

Edith and Lili still remained proprietors of the Bechstein Hall built by their father, but the Nazis forced them to remove the busts of Anton Rubinstein and Josef Joachim from the foyer (they had been erected there by Hermann Wolff alongside those of Bülow and Brahms, to commemorate the 4 great musicians who inaugurated the Concert Hall, in 1892) . Detectives sent by the « Reichsmusikkammer » ransacked the offices of Edith and Lili in 1936 and carried away many valuable documents (letters, autographs, programme notes) in which the whole fruitful history of the « Concert Direction Hermann Wolff » was reflected. In 1942, Edith was interned in the concentration camp of Theresienstadt (« Terezín ») , but, unlike some of her friends who were later deported to Auschwitz, she survived the war.

In 1954, Edith published a very interesting book : « Wegbereiter großer Musiker » (Path-breakers for Great Musicians) , in which she gave an account of the activities of her father's concert agency, replete with lively anecdotes about the composers and musicians whom her parents had worked with.

...

Mais pourquoi, demanderez-vous fort judicieusement, vous entretenir de cet « Ancien Orchestre Bilsé » ? Le 4 juin de cette même année 1882, l'Orchestre (qui jouait jusque-là dans des salles avec tables et chaises, comme un « juke-box » géant) s'installa dans une ancienne patinoire transformée en salle de concerts, avec fauteuils sans table ; la patinoire s'appellerait dorénavant : la « Philharmonie » .

Article du 4 juin 1882 dans le « Berliner Tageblatt » : « La patinoire surnommée " Skating Rink ", qui, dès l'automne, ne doit plus servir qu'à un usage artistique et qui sera dûment remaniée à cet effet, perd son ancien nom assez peu musical et sera rebaptisée " Philharmonie ". Les " Philharmoniker ", comme s'appellera désormais l' " Ancien Orchestre Bilsé ", y seront rattachés. » . C'est là l'acte de baptême de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin, les « Berliner Philharmoniker » .

Programme du 1er concert de l' « Ancien Orchestre Bilsé » après sa sécession, le 5 mai 1882, dans la salle de la « Sing-Akademie » :

Beethoven, « les Ruines d'Athènes » et la création de « Schwestertreue » (Fidélité sororale) d'Arno Kleffel. Suit une courte tournée de l'Orchestre à travers l'Allemagne du Nord (Magdebourg, le 6 mai ; Braunschweig, le 7 en matinée ; Schöningen, le 7 au soir ; Brême, du 8 au 12) , avant qu'il ne prenne ses quartiers d'été provisoires au Flora de Charlottenbourg, à Berlin, un gigantesque établissement d'attractions avec palmeraie, zoo humain, tableaux vivants, et une salle de spectacles.

Le concert du 5 août 1882, sous la direction de Ludwig von Brenner, comporte : l'Ouverture de Phèdre (1876) de Jules Massenet ; une Marche de Franz Schubert, orchestrée par Franz Liszt ; un extrait d'un Quatuor à cordes de Ludwig van Beethoven, joué par toutes les cordes ; une Polonaise de Liszt (à la demande du public !) , orchestrée par Franz Müller ; entracte ; la Ire Symphonie de Beethoven ; entracte ; Ouverture Coriolan de Beethoven ; 4e Concerto de d'Henri Vieuxtemps et l'interlude de l'Opéra « Lohengrin » de Richard Wagner. Ce programme est redonné tous les soirs jusqu'au 4 septembre.

Le 12 août, il sera couronné d'un brillant feu d'artifice tiré par célèbre funambule Blondin, celui-là même qui traversa plusieurs fois sur un fil les Chutes du Niagara : les yeux bandés, poussant une brouette, et même en transportant un réchaud sur lequel il se fit cuire une omelette à mi-chemin. L'affiche insiste bien sur cette attraction, tout aussi importante, semble-t-il, que le concert lui-même !

1er programme du Philharmonique de Berlin sous ce nom, le 17 octobre 1882 :

Ludwig van Beethoven : Ouverture « Leonore III » ; Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski : Andante d'un Quatuor (joué par toutes les cordes) ; « Non più mesta » : variations pour violon de Niccolò Paganini ; Ouverture des « Maîtres-chanteurs » de Richard Wagner ; entracte ; Ouverture du « Roi Manfred » de Carl Reinecke ; « Carnaval russe » : fantaisie pour flûte et orchestre de Cesare Ciardi ; Nocturne de Frédéric Chopin pour violoncelle et harpe ; Antonín Dvořák : Rapsodie slave n° 2 ; entracte ; Gioachino Rossini : Ouverture de « Guillaume Tell » ; création de la « Danse suédoise » de Louis Théodore Gouvy ; Polonaise en mi de Franz Liszt, orchestrée par Franz Müller.

Un programme très éclectique, destiné à accompagner le repas de Ire qualité à 1,50 Mark : soupe, poisson ou légumes (!), rôti, compote, fromage ou entremets, bière locale pour 20 Pfennig. Pour son concert de baptême, le Philharmonique de Berlin a donc servi d'orchestre d'accompagnement à des agapes. Il était quand même interdit de se servir des tables comme garde-robe, et les portes devaient rester fermées pendant l'exécution des morceaux. Pour ne pas déranger la musique, ou les dîneurs.

Les Ires années seront difficiles et l'Orchestre manque plusieurs fois de disparaître.

En 1887, Hermann Wolff devient le gestionnaire financier de la Philharmonie de Berlin. Il engage le très estimé chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow pour succéder au chef fondateur, Ludwig von Brenner. Bülow est considéré par la plupart des musicologues comme le 1er chef d'orchestre de métier, poste qu'il conservera jusqu'en 1895. Hans von Bülow fut un ami de Franz Liszt, Johannes Brahms et Richard Wagner. Il dirigea la première mondiale de nombreuses œuvres majeures de la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle, souvent en présence des compositeurs. Brahms lui dit que ses interprétations correspondaient exactement à ce qu'il avait composé. Dès lors, l'Orchestre devient rapidement célèbre.

Les programmes de cette période nous montrent que l'Orchestre n'était constitué que de 46 musiciens (en deçà de l'idéal wagnérien de 64) .

17 octobre 1882 : La Philharmonie de Berlin donne son 1er concert.

4 décembre 1882 : Le soliste (violoniste) Pablo de Sarasate est invité par la Philharmonie de Berlin.

4 janvier 1884 : La Philharmonie de Berlin crée la 3e Symphonie de Johannes Brahms.

28 janvier 1884 : Brahms joue son 1er Concerto pour piano avec la Philharmonie de Berlin.

1er février 1886 : La Philharmonie de Berlin crée la 4e Symphonie de Brahms.

8 février 1888 : Tchaïkovski dirige un concert de la Société philharmonique de Berlin.

14 octobre 1895 : Sur le conseil de Franz Liszt, Arthur Nikisch prend la relève comme chef permanent. Il va dominer la vie musicale en Allemagne jusqu'à sa mort en 1922, faisant de l'Orchestre le plus prestigieux au monde un ensemble de très haute qualité artistique. (Au moment de sa nomination, Nikisch sera aussi appelé à conduire la destinée de l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig.)

En 1898, on greffera à l' « Alte Philharmonie » la « Beethovensaal » conçue selon les plans du Commissaire royal de l'urbanisme, Ludwig Heim. Cette 2e salle de concert sera érigée sur le terrain de la grande cour intérieure, jusqu'alors occupée par un jardin que fréquentent assidûment les résidents des maisons de la « Bernauerstraße » et de la rue voisine, la « Köthenerstraße » .

L' « Alte Philharmonie » se trouvait cachée derrière des bâtiments résidentiels à plusieurs étages. La « Bernauerstraße » ne jouissait d'aucune place publique d'envergure. D'ailleurs, le site n'était pas le résultat d'une planification urbaine comme ce sera le cas, en 1911, pour le nouveau théâtre de divertissement de l' « Admiralspalast » , érigé sur la « Friedrichstraße » . (Ce qui explique probablement pourquoi aucune photo extérieure de l'ensemble n'existe.)

La Philharmonie de Berlin sera ensuite dirigée successivement par Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1922-1944) , Leo Borchard (1945) , Sergiù Celibidache (1945-1952) et, de nouveau (de retour du purgatoire de dénazification) , Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1952-1954) . Parmi les chefs invités prestigieux, citons : Hans Richter, Felix Weingartner, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, Johannes Brahms et Edvard Grieg.

14 décembre 1917 : Wilhelm Fürtwängler se trouve, pour la 1re fois, à la tête de la Philharmonie de Berlin pour un concert dédié à la musique de Richard Strauß et Richard Wagner.

25 mars 1922 : Fürtwängler dirige pour la 1re fois la Philharmonie de Vienne dans un concert célébrant le 25e anniversaire de la mort de Brahms.

29 mars 1922 : Fürtwängler aboutit à la conclusion de son contrat avec la Philharmonie de Berlin.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler succède au chef Hans von Bülow en 1922. La conjonction entre l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et Wilhelm Fürtwängler est très souvent considérée comme le sommet de l'histoire de l'Orchestre et même de toute l'histoire de la direction orchestrale. Klaus Geitel raconte, à ce propos, dans son histoire de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin :

« L'autorité musicale de Fürtwängler, la conscience qu'il avait de son propre charisme, son art expressif parvenu à un niveau extrêmement élevé firent de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin le vicaire terrestre de la musique symphonique occidentale. L'idéalisme allemand y trouva, ainsi, son compte puisqu'il cultivait continuellement une telle préoccupation de grandeur. Les membres du Philharmonique de Berlin semblaient faire plus que de la musique ; ils donnaient l'impression de jouer pour exprimer une conception du monde, la " Weltanschauung " des philosophes. »

9 octobre 1922 : Fürtwängler donne son 1er concert à titre de chef titulaire de la Philharmonie de Berlin avec au programme la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner.

La crise de 1929 fit échouer le principe de Société à responsabilité limitée et aggrava la situation financière de l'Orchestre. En 1933, l'Orchestre joua une nouvelle fois la carte du nationalisme, faisant ainsi le jeu du nouveau ministre de l'Instruction populaire et de la Propagande, Josef Gœbbels, dans sa lutte contre le ministère de l'Intérieur.

Il est enfin un dernier domaine où l'exigence idéologique et politique d'une exaltation de certaines valeurs musicales joua : le choix des chefs d'orchestre et des solistes. En mars 1933, avant la transformation en « Reichsorchester », les Nazis n'interdirent pas un concert de Bruno Walter mais mirent en gardent contre de possibles perturbations et l'impossibilité pour l'État d'assurer le service d'ordre, et proposèrent de remplacer Walter par un chef moins « controversé ». Walter annula lui-même le concert et fut remplacé par Richard Strauß paré dès lors de l'image du « sauveur » .

La même méthode fut utilisée contre Otto Klemperer (autre chef d'orchestre juif) , remplacé par Carl Schuricht, l'un des représentants de cette génération de brillants chefs d'orchestre qui se firent un nom durant la période nazie : Eugen Jochum, Hermann Abendroth, Karl Böhm, Clemens Krauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Herbert von Karajan. Très peu de chefs mineurs dirigèrent l'Orchestre à la suite d'un « lobbying » personnel acharné ou d'intrigues politiques.

Reste le cas Wilhelm Fürtwängler, la véritable « star » de l'Orchestre, dont la figure domine le livre de Misha Aster. Il n'y apparaît pas comme quelqu'un qui était idéologiquement proche des Nazis mais comme un homme « qui croyait vraiment au pouvoir transcendant de la musique » et estimait que « la véritable mission de l'art » était « d'élever l'humanité au-dessus d'une réalité morcelée ». Néanmoins, il sous-estimait gravement la portée de la rupture instaurée par Adolf Hitler. Confronté aux empiètements de l'idéologie, Fürtwängler réagit en luttant pour préserver les acquis, pour défendre sa liberté artistique et donc l'autonomie de son Orchestre. Cependant, les Nazis ne lui concédaient ces avantages qu'en échange de la légitimation de leurs conceptions pernicieuses ». (pages 258-259) Dans cette partie d'échecs avec les Nazis, Fürtwängler joua habilement de son prestige. En 1934, il devait diriger la création de « Mathis le peintre », Opéra de Paul Hindemith, à l'Opéra d'État de Berlin. Considéré comme une œuvre dissidente, l'Opéra fut interdit. Fürtwängler démissionna de ses fonctions. Il ne fut plus jamais le chef principal officiel du Philharmonique de Berlin, mais il s'était rendu indispensable, de nombreux mélomanes ayant exigé le remboursement de leurs abonnements aux séries de concerts philharmoniques qu'il dirigeait. Les Nazis lui demandèrent de revenir, mais il dirigea dorénavant de l'extérieur, avec les honoraires d'un chef invité. Ce geste facilita sa posture visant à s'abstenir autant que possible de diriger des concerts liés de trop près au « NSDAP », même s'il y eut des exceptions. Fürtwängler utilisa souvent ses relations personnelles avec Josef Gœbbels au profit de l'Orchestre (en défendant des artistes juifs, par exemple, ou en négociant des contrats) et à son profit, dans un contexte de favoritisme généralisé et de rivalités entre Gœbbels et Hermann Göring.

En janvier 1934, le « Reich » obtint le monopole au sein de la GmbH, rachetant les parts des musiciens qui devinrent des fonctionnaires, l'Orchestre devenant un « Reichsorchester » protégé par Goebbels (y compris contre les formations concurrentes protégées par Hermann Göring). Ainsi, par exemple, les efforts financiers (salaires, primes, retraites) et matériels (logements) furent faits pour engager et garder les meilleurs musiciens allemands, pour fournir à l'Orchestre les meilleurs instruments (beaucoup de pièces historiques venant de pillages), et, surtout, les musiciens obtinrent un statut les rendant non disponibles pour les obligations militaires, qui fut respecté jusqu'à la fin de la guerre. Le « Reich » versa des sommes colossales pour soutenir l'Orchestre ou, au moins, minimiser ses pertes, et l'Orchestre joua constamment la défense de son statut exceptionnel.

25 avril 1934 : Lors d'une tournée de la Philharmonie, Fürtwängler fait la rencontre de Benito Mussolini à Rome.

4 décembre 1934 : Fürtwängler se démet de toutes ses fonctions officielles (au « Berliner Philharmoniker », à la « Staatsoper » et à la « Reichsmusikkammer ») pour se retirer dans les Alpes bavaroises.

Le Philharmonique joua régulièrement devant la quasi-totalité de l'élite nazie, y compris Adolf Hitler, Josef Goebbels et Hermann Göring, ainsi que lors du congrès du NSDAP à Nuremberg en 1936, 1938 et 1939 et pour d'autres cérémonies officielles (Jeux Olympiques de Berlin de 1936 ; anniversaires d'Adolf Hitler à partir de 1937 ; Journées de l'art allemand ; concerts pour la « Hitlerjugend » ; concerts prônant « l'amitié entre les nations » avec des partenaires étrangers pour montrer en fait la supériorité des musiciens allemands), et enfin collaboration avec « Kraft durch Freude » (qui élargit le succès croissant de l'Orchestre, lui offrant, au-delà de son traditionnel public bourgeois, un public plus populaire) ou concerts dans des usines, pour la « Wehrmacht », pour la Croix-Rouge allemande et des organisations de charité (« Wintershilfewerk », par exemple), ainsi que des concerts radiodiffusés (émissions régulières contribuant à l'effort de guerre) à partir de 1939.

Sur la centaine de membres de l'Orchestre, Misha Aster estime à une vingtaine le nombre d'inscrits au « NSDAP » et à moins le nombre de Nazis convaincus, dont les tentatives pour réorganiser l'Orchestre selon les principes idéologiques nazis furent diversement couronnés de succès. Ainsi, la fusion avec le « Berliner Sinfonie-Orchester » fut-elle annulée en 1933, sous la pression de Wilhelm Fürtwängler, aboutissant au départ de membres du « NSDAP » et de vétérans de la guerre, alors que, selon un exclu « des étrangers et des Juifs restent dans l'Orchestre ». Fürtwängler fit tout pour garder les 4 membres juifs de l'Orchestre, qui partirent après que la formation devint un Orchestre d'État, et pour protéger les épouses juives de musiciens. La communauté des musiciens resta très silencieuse sur ces sujets. Entre 1933 et 1935, la direction annula les abonnements des mélomanes juifs. À partir de 1938, le Philharmonique fut représenté par Lorenz Höber, un « Vorstand » non nazi, principal responsable des activités de l'Orchestre, mais aussi par un conseil élu composé de musiciens membres du « NSDAP ». Pour Misha Aster, « dès sa création, la culture de l'Orchestre philharmonique avait privilégié la recherche d'un consensus réaliste. En un sens, c'est là l'essence même d'une communauté démocratique ; y compris quand elle cède à des extrémistes. L'essentiel restait de pouvoir faire de la musique à un niveau exceptionnel et dans un environnement à la fois protégé et créatif. Comme quelques années plus tôt face au destin de leurs collègues juifs, les musiciens de l'Orchestre, en 1937-1938, avaient encore une certaine liberté de choix, même limitée. En se pliant extérieurement aux exigences du Nazisme, ils pouvaient espérer s'attirer les bonnes grâces du régime et conserver leurs privilèges tout en sauvegardant ce qui subsistait des valeurs du " Gemeinschaftsgeist ". » (pages 98-99). À partir de la fin 1938, les musiciens durent prêter serment au « Führer », et, en 1939, sortit un nouveau règlement de service très autoritaire, conçu par l'Orchestre.

8 avril 1938 : Grâce au soutien de Hermann Göring, le jeune Herbert von Karajan est invité à diriger l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

21 octobre 1941 : Le chef Herbert von Karajan dirige un concert symphonique avec l'Orchestre de la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » .

14-16 décembre 1941 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner et les 3 lers mouvements de la 7e avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Ce concert est enregistré.

Février 1942 : Fürtwängler effectue une tournée en Suède avec la Philharmonie de Berlin.

22-24 mars 1942 : Fürtwängler dirige la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven avec le Philharmonique de Berlin,, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Ce concert fut enregistré. (CD : Archipel, Classica d'Oro, Music & Arts, Opus Kura, Tahra, SWF.)

25-26-28 octobre 1942 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie et la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner (version de 1875-1876 et 1878, éditée par Robert Haas) avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Le concert est enregistré par la « Sender Freies » .

8-9 novembre 1942 : Fürtwängler dirige le 2e Concerto pour piano de Brahms avec Edwin Fischer et le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Ce concert fut enregistré. (CD : Testament.)

7-8 février 1943 : Fürtwängler dirige le poème symphonique « En saga » (Opus 9) de Sibelius avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Ce concert fut enregistré. (CD : SWF.)

27-30 juin 1943 : Fürtwängler dirige l'Ouverture de « Coriolan » et les 4e et 5e Symphonies de Beethoven avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Ce concert fut enregistré. (CD de la 5e seulement : Classica d'Oro, DG, Music & Arts, Opus Kura, Tahra) .

31 octobre et 3 novembre 1943 : Fürtwängler dirige la 7e Symphonie de Beethoven avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » . Ce concert fut enregistré. (CD : Classica d'Oro, DG, Music & Arts, Opus Kura, SWF.)

Dans les dernières années de la guerre, se rendre à l' « Alte Philharmonie » n'était pas chose facile et, aux dires des musiciens eux-mêmes, les gens se demandaient s'ils n'allaient pas assister à leur dernier concert. Ces craintes étaient du reste tout à fait justifiées, puisque cette salle (tout comme le « Staatsoper » et l' « Admiralspalast ») a fini sous les bombes. Les concerts se déroulaient avec des interruptions fréquentes dues aux alertes nocturnes et contraignaient public et musiciens à attendre pour voir si la soirée pouvait continuer. On imagine certainement avec peine combien venir au concert, en ces instants, était un acte de foi, excluant toute autre motivation en dehors de l'art. Cette très forte tension a imprégné les performances artistiques du chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler, au point qu'il est aujourd'hui difficile de les comprendre avec une grille interprétative habituelle. Sans doute est-ce là une marque de la puissance de l'art véritable, capable de soulever l'homme pour le libérer (ne fût-ce qu'un instant) de son ordinaire. Un idéal que le grand chef allemand a recherché toute sa vie.

Bombardement de l' « Alte Philharmonie »

30 janvier 1944 : L' « Alte Philharmonie » de Berlin, située sur la « Bernburgerstraße », est complètement détruite par un raid aérien (on utilise des bombes incendiaires au phosphore) dirigé par les forces Britanniques, coïncidant ainsi avec le 11^e anniversaire de l'accession d'Adolf Hitler comme Chancelier du « Reich ». L'Orchestre perd donc sa salle, ses archives, la plupart de ses instruments et presque toute sa bibliothèque musicale.

Les concerts, qui ont lieu l'après-midi, en raison des bombardements nocturnes, sont transférés à l' « Admiralspalast » ou à la « Beethoven-Saal » de la « Köthenerstraße » (juste à côté de l' « Alte Philharmonie ») qui, heureusement, n'aura pas été touchée.

Aujourd'hui, des immeubles résidentiels modernes (aux numéros 21, 22 et 23a de la « Bernauerstraße ») dans l'arrondissement de Kreuzberg, occupent le site de la mythique « Alte Philharmonie ». Une allée pour piétons entre 2 immeubles, pourvue d'une entrée stylisée en forme d'arche nous mène directement à un espace vert qui représente le point exact, comme en témoigne une plaque commémorative en fer, de forme carrée (environ 60 centimètres par 60 centimètres), qui orne le pavé uni. L'édifice de la « Berliner Technische Kunsthochschule » se trouve tout prêt, au 24 - 25 (10963), entre la « Dessauerstraße » et la « Köthenerstraße ».

Suite à la destruction de l' « Alte Philharmonie », les concerts symphoniques sont transférés au « Staatsoper » de Berlin jusqu'en 1945.

7-8 février 1944 : Fürtwängler dirige la 6^e Symphonie de Beethoven avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Staatsoper ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : SWF, Tahra.)

20-22 mars 1944 : Fürtwängler dirige l'Ouverture « Der Freischütz » de Weber, le Concerto Grosso n° 10 de Händel et les 2 Suites tirées du « Daphnis et Chloé » de Ravel avec la Philharmonie de Berlin au « Staatsoper ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : Melodiya pour Händel et Ravel ; SWF pour Weber.)

28 mars 1945 : Dernier concert de la Philharmonie de Berlin (avant la capitulation du 3^e « Reich ») dirigé par le chef Robert Heger. Au programme : la scène finale du « Götterdämmerung » de Richard Wagner. L'histoire de cet événement est raconté dans « The Philharmonic's darkest hour ».

Les concerts de la période de guerre sont relatés dans « Fürtwängler and the forgotten new music ».

Après la guerre, la Philharmonie de Berlin sera obligé d'investir des salles de moindre importance :

Le « Titania Palast »

Tour à tour, salle de cinéma (les Iers films présentés étaient muets mais accompagnés par un orchestre de 60 musiciens) ; salle de concert symphonique ; salle de « music-hall » ; et finalement centre commercial, le « Titania Palast » (sis au 5 de la « Schloßstraße ») aura traversé le XXe siècle berlinois et partagé sa gloire et ses vicissitudes.

25 mai 1947 : Fürtwängler dirige un programme tout Beethoven (dont la 5e Symphonie) avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Titania Palast ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD de la 5e : Tahra.)

27 octobre 1947 : Fürtwängler dirige les « Metamorphosen » de Richard Strauß avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Titania Palast ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : SWF.)

24 octobre 1948 : Fürtwängler dirige la 3e Suite pour orchestre de Jean-Sébastien Bach avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Titania Palast ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : Tahra.)

14-15 mars 1949 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner (version établie par Fürtwängler sur le texte de Robert Haas et les anciennes versions dont celle de 1892, éditée par Robert Lienau - coupure mesures 209 à 218 qui étaient ré-introduites par Haas dans l'Adagio et légères ré-orchestrations) avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, au « Titania Palast » (« Gemeindehaus Berlin-Dalhem ») . Le concert radio est enregistré par la « RIAS » ; sans public, le 15 mars.

18 octobre 1949 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner (version de 1885 avec des modifications du compositeur, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann) avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, au « Titania Palast » (« Gemeindehaus Berlin-Dalhem ») . Le concert est enregistré par la « RIAS » .

18 décembre 1949 : Fürtwängler dirige la 3e Symphonie de Brahms avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Titania Palast ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : « EMI » .)

10 février 1952 : Fürtwängler dirige la 1re Symphonie de Brahms avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Titania Palast ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : SWF, DG.)

23 mai 1954 : Fürtwängler dirige la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, au « Titania Palast ». Le concert fut enregistré. (CD : Audite, Tahra.)

Le « Titania », une salle encore utilisable pouvant accueillir 2,000 personnes deviendra officiellement le « Centre Culturel » de Berlin. Elle accueillera le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler et son Philharmonique. Le 1er Festival international du film de Berlin (« Berlinale ») va s'y dérouler en 1951.

Malgré plusieurs changements de chef, l'Orchestre réussira à poursuivre ses activités tout au long de la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Sur les conseils pressants d'Albert Speer, Wilhelm Fürtwängler (dont la vie est maintenant en danger) décide, en février 1945, de s'exiler vers la Suisse en attendant d'être jugé pour son attitude sous le régime nazi puisque toute apparition publique lui était alors interdite.

Un quasi-inconnu, le russe Lew Ljewitsch (Leo) Borchard va lui succéder au podium.

L' « Admiralspalast »

Le théâtre « Admiralspalast » est situé au 101-102 de la « Friedrichstraße » à Berlin (« Mitte ») . Ouvert en 1911, il va accueillir les représentations d'Opéra après le bombardement du « Staatsoper » , le 3 février 1945.

31 octobre 1879 : Création au « Theater an der Wien » de « Gräfin Dubarry » , opéra comique en 3 Actes de Carl Millöcker sur un livret de F. Zell et Richard Genée. L'Opérette sera remaniée par Theo Mackeben, pour la musique, et Paul Knepler et Ignaz Michaël Welleminsky, pour le livret. La re-création se fera sous le titre « Die Dubarry » , le 14 août 1931, à l' « Admiralspalast » . C'est cette version qui est la plus jouée de nos jours.

Octobre 1947 : 3 représentations de « Tristan und Isolde » de Richard Wagner dirigées par Wilhelm Fürtwängler à la tête de l'Orchestre du « Staatsoper » .

Ludwig Suthaus (Tristan) .

Gottlob Frick (King Marke) .

Ema Schlüter (Isolde) .

Jaro Prohaska (Kurwenal) .

Kurt Rehm (Melot) .

Margarete Klose (Brangäne) .

Gerhard Witting (Shepherd) .

Hasso Eschert (Steersman) .

Paul Schmidtman (Sailor) .

Acts 2 and 3 complete, with a cut in the performance of Scene 2 of Act 2 of the lines from « Dem Tage ! Dem Tage ! Dem ttikischen Tage » (Tristan) to « daß nachtsichtig mein Auge wahres zu sehen tauge » (Tristan) .

L'Opéra fut enregistré au complet. Rien du 1er Acte n'a survécu. Aujourd'hui, de larges extraits sont disponibles sur CD (Radio Years RY 103.04) .

Who would not have liked to be at the « Admiralspalast » in Berlin, temporary home of the « Berlin Staatsoper » , on 3 October 1947, whatever conditions in the city might have been ? Fürtwängler returned to his Operatic base to conduct « Tristan und Isolde » , with Frida Leider, no less, as producer. Maddeningly, only sections of the performance survive on tape (nothing of Act 1) , but enough to confirm what a great occasion it must have been. In the theatre Fürtwängler, as ever, gives a more dramatic reading than he did 5 years later in the studio, where his reading for the « EMI » label is a noble philosophical tract, while in the Opera House it is living theatre.

Nobody since has had the pulse of this work so firmly in his bones as Fürtwängler ; I defy anyone to listen to Act 2 from King Mark's monologue to the end without being deeply moved. However, many magnificent interpreters you may have heard, I urge you to hear Gottlob Frick, unrivalled in vocal terms and indescribably searing in his uncomprehending grief ; the passage from « Die kein Himmel erl Ost » to the end of Mark's outpouring is sung with an inward emotion that calls for the equally searing response given by the Tristan of Ludwig Suthaus, a favourite with this conductor and no wonder, since he must surely be the most complete interpreter of the part ever, here (like his conductor) even more involved than on the « EMI » studio performance. Fürtwängler himself never makes the present-day mistake of prolonging Mark's agony : the whole passage proceeds on a single line, the « Hauptstimme » to the fore.

Most of the opening scene of Act 2 survives, minus (sadly) the dousing of the light, as does the whole of the love duet apart from the traditional cut. Act 3, lacking the 1st scene after the Prelude between Tristan and Kurwenal, finds Suthaus's Tristan even more unsettling, more agonized than on « EMI » . As Isolde, Erna Schlüter is not, vocally speaking, in the Flagstad or Nilsson class, but she knows about words and in what is left of her part conveys all Isolde's elation, desire and eventually heartbreak. Listen to her soft-grained accent on the word « chele » at the start of what proves to be an elevated « Liebestod » . Margarete Klose is a generous-voiced, concerned Brangäne, Jaro Prohaska an aging Kurwenal. The sound is a shade restricted, distorts momentarily, and is disfigured by intrusive coughs, but it is good enough to enjoy (if that's the word in this context) an unforgettable experience.

Des concerts symphoniques par Fürtwängler et ses « Philharmoniker » seront également présentés à l' « Admiralspalast » :

After Fürtwängler's enthusiastic championing of Kurt Hessenberg's Concerto for Orchestra, the great Mæstro kept in close contact with the young composer, offering him advice and encouragement and being watchful of his artistic development. When Fürtwängler saw the score of the composer's 2nd Symphony, 4 years later, he became even more impressed than before, and expressed an overwhelming interest not only in presenting the World premiere of this work, but also in conducting it « everywhere I have an opportunity of doing so - primarily, that is, in Berlin and Vienna » . The bulk of the composition for this work was completed in 1943.

Fürtwängler's missive to Hessenberg on the 2d Symphony (English translation by Miriam Schmitthenner) :

21. V. 44

Dear Mr. Hessenberg,

The great expectations I was entertaining for your further career on the strength of the Concerto for Orchestra have not merely been completely fulfilled but, in fact, far exceeded by your Symphony, which I have now got to know. I shall be writing to you about it again at greater length shortly. Now, I just want to tell you it will give me particular pleasure to perform the work everywhere I have an opportunity of doing so - primarily, that is, in Berlin and Vienna. As I am committed to performing at the 1st Berlin concert a new work by Westermann which was cancelled in the spring owing to destruction of the « Philharmonie », your work will be put on at the 2nd concert - still early enough, I hope. I suppose that will be the premiere, won't it ? By then, will the material be ready ?

I really must congratulate you. You have left far behind you the modish non-descript semi-tonal style that is of interest to nobody but those who happen to be critics or publishers or have to do with such people.

Have you not written some chamber music, too, lately ? Could I get to know that as well ?

With best regards for today,
in haste, yours

Wilhelm Fürtwängler

Achleiten, Post Rohr an der Krems
Oberdonau (12b)

The premiere by Fürtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra took place, in spite of War-time difficulties, on December 10, 1944. The program was repeated the next day, at the « Admiralspalast » in Berlin.

11 décembre 1944 : Fürtwängler dirige la 2e Symphonie en la majeur, Opus 29 (1943) de Kurt Hessenberg (1908-1994) avec la Philharmonie de Berlin à l' « Admiralspalast » .

The critical reception was overwhelming in praise of the new work. The performance was recorded for broadcast, but the tape has never surfaced over the years and is presumed lost. Sadly, Fürtwängler's intention of further performances of the Symphony never came to fruition. The work received a 2nd interpretation by Otto Winkler, in 1947, in Koblenz. Besides these, the work's publisher Schott has no record of other performances, although it notes that its records from that period are far from being complete. Therefore, this Masterpiece may have lain dormant for more than half a Century.

12 décembre 1944 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Schubert et la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Admiralspalast » (« Gemeindehaus Berlin-Dalhem ») . Le concert est enregistré par la « Sender Freies » . (CD du 1er mouvement du Schubert : SWF.)

22-23 janvier 1945 : Fürtwängler dirige la Philharmonie de Berlin à l' « Admiralspalast » , au programme :

Mozart : Overture zu « Die Zauberflöte » .

Mozart : Symphonie Nr. 40 in G-Moll, KV 550.

Brahms : Symphonie Nr. I in C-Moll, Opus 68.

23 janvier 1945 : Dernier concert de Fürtwängler à Berlin avant son départ pour Vienne et sa fuite pour la Suisse. Il dirige l'Ouverture de « la Flûte enchantée » , la 40e Symphonie de Mozart, KV 550 (seulement les 2 1ers mouvements, sans doute à cause d'un raid aérien au même moment) , et la 1re Symphonie de Brahms avec la Philharmonie de Berlin à l' « Admiralspalast » . Le concert fut enregistré. (CD du 4e mouvement : SWF.)

It appears that the near miss in the Mozart Symphony was the final straw for Wilhelm Fürtwängler, because this concert was the last that he conducted in Wartime Berlin before fleeing to Switzerland via Vienna.

It is impossible to imagine what concert going was like for the audience and musicians at the time. On a 1944 British intelligence map used by Allied bomber airmen for their night raids, we can see that the « Admiralspalast » is in a vulnerable position : directly across the « Friedrichstraße » is a major railway terminus, to the East, the complex marked 14B is the Berlin military garrison's headquarters, while 53 to the West, on « Unter den Linden » , is the « Reich » Ministry of the Interior.

21 et 22 avril 1946 : L' « Admiralspalast » tient le Congrès fondateur du Parti socialiste unifié d'Allemagne, parti du pouvoir en Allemagne de l'Est jusqu'à la réunification.

...

Le légendaire lieu de spectacles des années '20 attire encore aujourd'hui les spectateurs grâce à son programme varié, proposant théâtre et concerts, comédies musicales et soirées : l' « Admiralspalast » fut ré-ouvert en 2006, après une importante rénovation, et propose dans plusieurs lieux de manifestation des divertissements variés sous un même toit.

Dans la grande salle du théâtre, de grandes productions de comédies musicales célèbrent régulièrement des succès honorables. « L'opéra de quat' sous » de Bertolt Brecht mis-en-scène par Klaus Maria Brandauer, avec Campino, le chanteur des « Toten Hosen » dans le rôle de « Mackie, le Surineur » , a ouvert la nouvelle saison de ce théâtre traditionnel. Ont suivi des temps forts tels que « My Fair Lady » , « The Rocky Horror Show » et, à l'été 2009, la comédie-culte controversée de Mel Brooks, « The Producers » .

Les concerts et les comédies ont aussi une place bien méritée dans la grande salle. Des artistes tels que Max Raabe (et son « Palast Orchester ») ou Helge Schneider reviennent régulièrement sur la scène de l' « Admiralspalast » pour captiver le public berlinois avec leurs nouveaux programmes.

La musique prend aussi de plus en plus d'importance à l' « Admiralspalast ». On peut y entendre tout un éventail musical, de la légende de la « soul Solomon Burke » en passant par Jan Delay jusqu'aux nouvelles découvertes de la scène locale. De temps à autre, on rabat les chaises de la grande salle du théâtre - on y danse et on y fait la fête jusqu'au petit matin.

...

(Friedrichstraße 101, 10117 Berlin, + 49 30 47997499.)

The « Admiralspalast » Theatre, in the Mitte district of Berlin, is located on « Friedrichstraße Nr. 101 ». Opened in 1910, it is one of the few preserved variety venues of the pre-World War II era in the city.

As a place of amusement, the « Admiralspalast » originally included a skating rink, a public bath, bowling alleys, a café and a cinema, open day and night. After World War I, it turned to a revue theatre, starting with the show « Drunter und drüber » by Walter Kollo, later continued by the performance of Operettas.

As the building suffered little damage from World War II bombing, it was home to the « Berlin Staatsoper » until the reconstruction of the Opera House, in 1955. On 21-22 April 1946, the Social-Democratic Party of Germany and the Communist Party of Germany, in the Soviet occupation zone, held a convention at the « Admiralspalast » where they merged to become the Socialist Unity Party of Germany.

...

The « Admiralspalast » can look back on a more than 100 years old moving history, coined by different cultural influences and historical developments.

Whether an « Eisarena » (Ice arena) , a « Revuetheater » (Revue theatre) or an « Operettenhaus » (Operetta house) , the « Admiralspalast » stood and stands always synonym for the cultural and amusement frenzy of Berlin.

In 1873, an artesian salt water spring is uncovered by chance in the middle of downtown Berlin during construction work at « Friedrichstraße Nr. 101-102 », the grounds of the former « Admiral's Quarters ». With its opening, the « Admiralsgartenbad » becomes one of Berlin's 1st public baths. It is built by the architects Walter Kyllmann and Adolf Heyden, who found a company specifically for the purpose, the « Admiralsgartenbad Aktiengesellschaft » .

1889-1890 : The « Admiralsgartenbad » is expanded into a 3 story bath facility designed by the government architect

Carl Gause. With its remodeling, the bath boasts being « Europe's most modern » and one of the 1st in Berlin.

1911 : After the « Admiralsgartenbad » is pulled down and a new building raised on the « Friedrichstraße Nr. 101 » property, the « Admiralspalast » opens on April 20 as a « new, cosmopolitan etablissement » . Beneath the roof of the « Admiralspalast » (one of the very 1st amusement palaces) are now an ice skating rink, the 2,600 square meter exclusive Russian-Roman luxury thermal baths, opened day and night, a Roman café, 4 bowling alleys, and a plush cinema. Ice hockey games and boxing matches are also held in the great hall.

1913 : The « Admiralspalast » is the world's only ice palace.

1922 : Conversion to « world vaudeville » in « Art Déco » style, designed by Oskar Kaufmann and Richard Wolfenstein.

1923 : The Operetta director Herrmann Haller is named the new director. The theatre is remodeled as a revue theatre and is given the name « Theater im Admiralspalast » .

1939 : Fusion with the « Metropoltheater » in Behrenstraße (today, the home of the « Komische Oper ») under Heinz Hentschke.

1939 : By order of « Reichsminister » Josef Gæbbels, remodeling of the theatre into a « festively appealing recreation center » begins on December 20.

1941 : A « “ Führer ” ’s loge » is built into the center of the 1st balcony.

1944 : On September 1, all Berlin theatres are closed by order of the NSDAP Party due to the declaration of (« Total War - Shortest War » (« Totaler Krieg - Kürzester Krieg ») on August.

1945 : The « Berlin Deutsche Staatsoper » moves into the « Admiralspalast » and uses it as an interim location until 1955. On August 23, the 1st season is opened with a gala concert.

21-22 April 1946 : During the « Party Union Congress » at the « Admiralspalast » , the German Communist Party and the Socialist Democratic Party are forcibly merged to make the « Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands » (SED) . The hand-shake between Otto Grotewohl and Wilhelm Pieck takes place in the Grand Hall.

3 October 1947 : The Jewish virtuoso violinist Yehudi Menuhin plays Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » in the Grand Hall of the the « Admiralspalast » .

1948 : Bertolt Brecht participates with Helene Weigel in a peace rally in the « Admiralspalast » sponsored by the Cultural Association of the German Democratic Republic (« GDR ») .

24 March 1950 : With a formal ceremony in the « Admiralspalast », the « GDR » founds the German Academy of Arts (« DAK ») in East-Berlin.

1953 : The cabaret « Die Distel » is opened in the former « casino / cinema », in the front house of the « Admiralspalast » .

1955 : On December 21, the « METROPOL-Theater im Admiralspalast » is opened with Johann Strauß' Operetta « Die Fledermaus » . Besides Classic Operettas, the Operetta and musical theatre presents Broadway musicals.

The « GDR Presse-Café » is installed in the « Admiralspalast » 's front building. It becomes the place for the « GDR » 's bohemia to meet.

...

Die Admiralspalast Aktien-Gesellschaft wurde im Jahre 1909 gegründet. Gegenstand des Unternehmens war die Nutzung und Verwertung der eigenen Grundstücke Friedrichstraße 101 und 102 und Prinz Louis-Ferdinand-Straße 10. Die Geschichte der auf dem Grundstück errichteten Gebäude war und ist ein Stück Kulturgeschichte Berlins. Auf den Grundstücken wurde bereits im Jahre 1873-1874 nach den Plänen der Baumeister Kylmann & Heyden das Admiralsgartenbad errichtet, das im Jahre 1887 umgebaut und erweitert wurde, weil an dieser Stelle eine starke Solequelle entdeckt wurde. Im Gebäude befanden sich nach diesem Umbau eine Schwimmhalle, ein Salonbad, 62 Wannenbäder erster und zweiter Klasse, 2 elektrische Bäder, ein russisch-römisches Bad, eine Naturheilstätte sowie 41 Solebäder.

Der Admiralspalast - das Theater Im Jahre 1910 wurde das Admiralsgartenbad nochmals erweitert, es entstanden ein Cafe, Kino, Eisarena und Luxusbad. Nach Plänen der Architekten Cremer und Wolfenstein wurde im Jahre 1922 die Eisarena in ein Theater umgebaut.

Wie durch ein Wunder wurde das Gebäude des Admiralspalastes im 2. Weltkrieg nur wenig beschädigt, so daß auch heute noch die architektonisch reich geschmückte Fassade zur Friedrichstraße, aber auch die rückwärtige Fassade zur Planckstraße bewundert werden können. Der sich im Gebäude befindende intakte und repräsentative Saal wurde nach 1945 sowohl von der sowjetischen Besatzungsmacht als auch von den deutschen Behörden für politische und kulturelle Veranstaltungen genutzt. Auf Initiative des sowjetischen Militärkommandanten Bersarin diente gleich nach Beendigung des Krieges der Admiralspalast als Spielstätte für die Staatsoper, deren Gebäude durch Bombentreffer nicht mehr benutzbar waren. Am 23.08.1945 fand das große Eröffnungskonzert statt, zwei Wochen später wurde Glucks « Orpheus und Eurydike » aufgeführt. Zehn Jahre spielte die Staatsoper im Admiralspalast und brachte insgesamt 59 Inszenierungen heraus. Am 29.01.1946 fand im Admiralspalast der Festakt aus Anlass der Wiedereröffnung der Berliner Universität statt, allerdings auch am 21. - 22. 04.1946 der Vereinigungsparteitag zwischen KPD und SPD. Es war demzufolge nur folgerichtig, daß es dem Verständnis des damaligen Ostberliner Magistrats entsprach, den Admiralspalast als « volkseigen » zu betrachten. Die Grundstücke der Admiralspalast AG wurden auf Enteignungslisten gesetzt, obwohl die Aktien der Admiralspalast AG zu über 90 % Auslandsvermögen darstellten, das unter dem besonderen Schutz der Alliierten und somit auch der sowjetischen Besatzungsmacht stand, die die Gesellschaft in einer ihrer Schutzlisten aufführte. Der Vorstand der Admiralspalast AG, Herr Breitkopf, legte zwar Beschwerde gegen die Listenenteignung im Jahre 1949 ein, aber ohne Abschluß des Beschwerdeverfahrens wurde im Jahre 1952 im Grundbuch Volkseigentum eingetragen.

Der AdmiralspalastIm Admiralspalast spielte im Vorderhaus im ehemaligen Admiralskino seit 1953 das Ostberliner Kabarett « Die Distel » . Auch in den 20er Jahren befand sich hier schon ein Kabarett « Roland von Berlin » , ab 1951 das Kabarett « Frischer Wind » .

Ab 1955 wurde der Admiralspalast Heimat des Metropol-Theatres, das vorher im heutigen Filmtheater « Colosseum » in der Schönhauser Allee spielen mußte. Mit dem Motto « Wieder mal ins Metropol » war es nicht nur in Berlin bekannt, es lockte viele Besucher in die Inszenierungen klassischer und auch zeitgenössischer Operetten und moderner Musicals. Nach der Wende kämpfte das Ensemble gegen eine Abwicklung des Theatres. Im Jahre 1996 vergab es der Senat von Berlin an den Tenor René Kollo als Alleingesellschafter und Intendant. Ein Jahr später beantragte der Senat für das Metropol-Theater die Liquidation und schrieb das Haus erneut zum Verkauf aus. Derzeit ist ein Bieterkonsortium um die Betreiber der Kulturhalle « Arena » in Treptow « am Ball » .

Die Admiralspalast AG, seit ihrer Gründung und bis heute im Handelsregister eingetragen, hat nach 1990 für ihre enteigneten Grundstücke vermögensrechtliche Ansprüche angemeldet, da sie die Enteignung für rechtsunwirksam hält. Das Verfahren ist beim Europäischen Gerichtshof für Menschenrechte anhängig.

Der Admiralspalast - Innenansicht Der Aufsichtsrat und der Vorstand der Admiralspalast AG möchten, daß die schönen Gebäude im Herzen von Berlin wieder so vielfältig genutzt werden wie in früheren Zeiten und als architektonisches Kleinod erhalten werden. Sie möchten zugleich die Geschichte des Admiralspalastes anhand von historischen Bildern und Dokumenten sowie durch Berichte aufarbeiten und bitten deshalb um Kontaktaufnahme mit Zeitzeugen auf ihrer Homepage. Diese Homepage soll ein Forum für alle an der Geschichte und weiteren Entwicklung des Admiralspalastes Interessierten werden.

...

Erbaut als Admiralsgartenbad zwischen 1873 und 1875. Nach Entdeckung einer heißen Quelle unter dem Gebäude im Jahr 1890 von Carl Gause (er war auch der Architekt des Hotel Adlon) zu einem Spaßbad erweitert : In den Vergnügungs-Tempel am Bahnhof Friedrichstraße sollten Gäste nicht allein mit Hallen- und Dampfbad und 62 Planschwannen ins Haus gelockt werden : 1910 kamen noch eine Eisbahn, ein Café und ein Kino dazu. Das ehrgeizige Freizeitobjekt war am Markt vorbeikonzipiert und ging pleite. Seit 1922 wurde das Hinterhaus als Theater genutzt. Nach der Zerstörung von Knobelsdorffs Opernhaus Unter den Linden am 3. Februar 1945 diente der Admiralspalast seit dem 6. September 1945 mit der Premiere von Glucks Orpheus und Eurydike bis zum 14. Juni 1955 als Ausweichquartier für die Berliner Staatsoper.

Ostern 1946, am 21. und 22. April, wurde der Palast Schauplatz deutscher Geschichte. Hier fand der Vereinigungsparteitag von SPD und KPD statt. Nach den Klängen der Fidelio-Ouvertüre gaben sich unter den Augen von 548 SPD-Delegierten und 507 KPD-Delegierten deren Vorsitzende Otto Grotewohl (1894 bis 1964) und Wilhelm Pieck (1876 bis 1960) feierlich die Hand. Im Parkett klatschte Jugendfunktionär Erich Honecker, einst Dachdecker in Wiebelskirchen, begeistert Beifall. In den Jahren danach quartierten sich Institutionen wie der Journalistenverband der DDR in dem Komplex ein. Im Vorderhaus, dem alten Admiralskino, spielt seit 1953 das Kabarett Distel. Im Hofgebäude agierten seit Weihnachten 1955 die Tenöre und Soubretten des Metropol-Theatres mit diversen Operetten und Musicals. Solange, bis die wiedervereinten Kultur-Oberen des Senats Intendant René Kollo am 18. Februar 1997 den Subventionshahn zudrehten. Dessen Großvater, der Komponist Walter Kollo (1878 bis 1940), hatte dort 1913 in der Posse Filmzauber das Lied Solang noch Untern Linden ... uraufgeführt, Berlins inoffizielle Hymne.

...

1860 bestand an der Stelle des heutigen Gebäudekomplexes Friedrichstraße Nr. 101-102 bereits ein Kaffee- und Biergarten - der « Admiralsgarten ». 1873 wurde an der Stelle des Biergartens das « Admirals-Gartenbad » nach Plänen von Kyllmann & Heyden errichtet. Das Bad war eine der ersten öffentlichen Badeanstalten und wurde wegen seiner vornehmen Einrichtung viel gelobt. Die 1887 entdeckte Solquelle ließ fortan sogar eine Nutzung als Heilbad zu. 1910 wurde das Bad abgebrochen und der Admiralspalast nach Plänen von Heinrich Schweitzer errichtet. Hier gab es eine Eislaufarena, russisch-römische Luxus-Thermen, die Tag und Nacht geöffnet waren, ein Römisches Café, vier Kegelbahnen und ein Lichtbild-Theater. In der Halle der Eisarena wurde nicht nur Eisballett aufgeführt sondern auch Boxkämpfe und Eishockeyspiele ausgetragen. Zur Friedrichstraße präsentierte sich das neue Gebäude mit einer prächtigen Fassade, reich geschmückt mit dorische Säulen und Reliefs von namhaften Bildhauern, zum Beispiel Franz Naager und Ernst Westphal. Die rückwärtige Fassade zur heutigen Planckstraße war nicht minder aufwändig gestaltet worden und wurde in der Presse wegen ihrer exotischen Ornamente als « Märchenschlossfassade » bezeichnet.

1922 wurde der Admiralspalast durch die Architekten Erich Kaufmann und Albert Wolffenstein zu einem Theater im Art-deco-Stil umgebaut und als « Welt-Variété » eröffnet.

Nach einer längeren Zeit des Leerstandes übernahm der Kultur-Unternehmer Falk Walter 2005 den Gebäudekomplex mit der Absicht den Unterhaltungsbetrieb mit Theater, Bad und Gastronomie wieder zu beleben. Nach kurzer Umbauzeit wurde 2006 das Theater mit der Dreigroschenoper unter der Regie von Klaus Maria Brandauer wiedereröffnet. In der Folgezeit gab es zahlreiche Theatergastspiele und Konzerte und andere mit Max Raabe und seinem Palast-Orchester oder mit dem damals 104-jährigen Johannes Heesters.

Das seit 1979 unter Denkmalschutz stehende Gebäude ist heute wieder ein lebendiger Kulturort am Bahnhof Friedrichstraße.

...

Das Metropol-Theater im Berliner Ortsteil Mitte war ein bekanntes Revue- und Operettentheater, das von 1898 bis 1998 existierte.

Das Metropoltheater wurde 1898 von Richard Schultz in der Behrenstraße 55-57 eröffnet (dem heutigen Haus der Komischen Oper) und diente dem gut verdienenden Berliner Bürgertum sowie dem Adel als musikalisches Unterhaltungsetablisement. Auf dem Spielplan standen Revuen und andere Werke der « leichten Muse » mit bekannten Sängern und Sängerinnen wie Lizzi Waldmüller, Richard Tauber und Fritzi Massary. Für das Metropol lieferten in jener Zeit vor allem Komponisten wie Paul Lincke, Jean Gilbert, Rudolf Nelson und Victor Hollaender die Musik. Eine erste wirtschaftliche Krise erlebte das Metropol während der Inflation Anfang der 1920er Jahre.

In den « Goldenen Zwanziger Jahren » entwickelte sich das Metropol zu einer weltbekannten Operettenbühne, die auch neuartige Musik aus den USA mit gastierenden Ensembles spielte. Doch eine nächste Pleite kam infolge des Schwarzen Freitags von 1929, als die erste Weltwirtschaftskrise ihren Anfang nahm. Die Direktoren wechselten sehr oft ; zuletzt leitete seit 1928 Fritz Friedmann-Frederich das Theater, der bereits 1919 künstlerischer Leiter und Oberregisseur des Theatres geworden war. Er setzte auf leichte Muse und große Namen wie Käthe Dorsch und Richard Tauber. Ein weiterer Konkurs erfolgte 1932, als der Theaterkonzern der Gebrüder Fritz und Alfred Rotter zusammenbrach.

In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus lief der Betrieb des Metropols wie gewohnt weiter, außer daß jüdische Ensemblemitglieder, wie an allen deutschen Bühnen, nicht mehr auftreten durften. Das Programm des Theatres war durch das gespielte Genre unpolitisch, sodaß es keine nennenswerten Repressalien durch die Staatsmacht gab, die braunen Machthaber erkannten diese Unterhaltungskultur als nützlich für ihre Zwecke. Seit 1934 fungierte hier Werner Schmidt-Boelcke als I. Kapellmeister. Eine neue, heute vergessene Generation junger Komponisten trat an die Stelle der alten, wie beispielsweise Fred Raymond mit den Operetten Ball der Nationen und Maske in Blau sowie Ludwig Schmidseher mit den Operetten Die oder keine ! und Frauen im Metropol. Das Metropoltheater büßte aber langsam seinen alten, fast feudalen Glanz ein, der drohende Zweite Weltkrieg drückte, anders als 1914, auf die Stimmung der Vergnügungswilligen. Ende 1944 wurde der Betrieb des Theatres nach der Premiere von Will Meisels Revue Wiederseh'n macht Freude eingestellt. Im März 1945 zerstörten Bomben das Theater in der Behrenstraße bis auf den Zuschauerraum, der erhalten blieb und seit 1947 der Komischen Oper dient.

In der gerade gegründeten DDR entstand das Metropol-Theater, jetzt in einem Kinosaal in der Schönhauser Allee untergebracht, neu. Franz Léhars Operette Paganini war die erste Nachkriegspremiere. 1955 gab es einen Umzug in den Admiralspalast, der dann bis zum Ende 1997 das Domizil blieb. In der damals einsetzenden Zeit des Aufbaus und des Aufbruchs gab es im Programm auch bekannte Broadway-Musicals wie My Fair Lady, Annie Get Your Gun, Kiss Me, Kate, Hello, Dolly ! (mit Gisela May) , Cabaret, aber auch DDR-spezifische Werke, wie beispielsweise Messeschlager Gisela. Das Metropol-Theater war die führende Unterhaltungsmusikbühne der DDR, was insbesondere seinem langjährigen Intendanten Hans Pitra zu verdanken ist. Nach dessen Tod übernahm der Komponist Gerd Natschinski die Leitung des Hauses. Der 1984 neu eröffnete modernere Friedrichstadtpalast machte dem Metropol zunächst keine Konkurrenz, er diente in erster Linie dazu, aufwändig inszenierte personalintensive Musikrevuen, Shows und Gastspiele zu zeigen.

Nach der Wende geriet das Metropol in finanzielle Schwierigkeiten, verursacht durch die Subventionspolitik des Berliner Senats, die im Kulturbereich andere Prioritäten zugunsten der drei Opernhäuser setzte.

Auch mehrere Investoren, die das Haus übernehmen wollten (und andere eine Gruppe um den damaligen Leiter des Deutschen Theatres München, Heiko Plapperer) wurden abgelehnt, da der Senat grundsätzlich nicht bereit war, das Metropol-Theater weiterhin zu subventionieren und das denkmalgeschützte historische Gebäude des Admiralspalastes zu renovieren. Die letzte Intendanz unter dem Sänger René Kollo scheiterte 1998, das Ensemble wurde aufgelöst.

Seit 2005 wird das Haus unter der Leitung von Falk Walter (Arena, Badeschiff, Hoppetosse, etc.) und anderen Teilhabern unter dem Namen Admiralspalast betrieben und eröffnete nach einer Renovierungsphase 2006 mit einer Inszenierung der Dreigroschenoper in der Regie von Klaus Maria Brandauer mit Campino in der Rolle des Mackie Messer. Neben dem großen Saal, der überwiegend durch Musical- und Showacts auf Tournee bespielt wird, werden auch zwei weitere Spielstätten unter dem Dach regelmäßig, aber nicht täglich bespielt.

...

Metropol-Theater, Friedrichstraße (ehemals Theater im Admiralspalast) .

Die originelle Fassade des ehemaligen Admiralspalastes, seit 1955 Metropol-Theater, beherrscht die Straßenfront an der Nordseite des Bahnhofs Friedrichstraße. Heinrich Schweitzer entwarf den mehrflügeligen Gebäudekomplex 1910-1911 auf dem weitläufigen Grundstück des früheren « Admiralsgartenbades » als Vergnügungspalast mit luxuriösen Bädern, Eislaufbahn und Restaurants. Im Sinne antiker Thermenanlagen wollte man Sport- und Freizeiteinrichtungen mit dem Badebetrieb verbinden und dem Vergnügungsviertel rund um den Bahnhof Friedrichstraße eine neue Attraktion hinzufügen. Die Eisbahn im hinteren Gebäudeteil an der Planckstraße, zu dem man durch das Vorderhaus über einen repräsentativ in neobarocken Formen gestalteten Hof gelangte, wurde 1922 von den Architekten Kaufmann und Wolfenstein zu einem Variété-Theater umgebaut, die darüber liegenden Bäder blieben zunächst unangetastet. Nach mehreren Umgestaltungen des Theaterraumes in den 1930er Jahren erfolgte 1939-1940 ein durchgreifender Umbau nach Plänen von Paul Baumgarten zu einem Operettentheater, einer « festlich schönen Erholungsstätte » . Dieser Umbau prägt trotz späterer Veränderungen das Theater bis heute.

Die der ursprünglichen Nutzung entsprechende Gestaltung der Straßenfassaden an Friedrichstraße und Planckstraße mit verspielt pompösem Schmuck in freier Adaption antiker Formen ist weitgehend erhalten. Für die Front an der Friedrichstraße, die zugleich ganz plakativ Werbung für das Etablissement machen sollte, schuf Schweitzer eine Gliederung mit kolossalen dorischen Halbsäulen aus Granit und Relieftafeln von Franz Naager aus istrischem Kalkstein. Die Tafeln füllen die Wandflächen zwischen Fenstern und Säulen und wirken wie eine Sammlung klassisch-antiker Fundstücke. Die Fassade an der Planckstraße mit ihrem eigenwilligen Klinkerdekor unter Verwendung von römischen und maurischen Motiven stammt von dem Bildhauer Ernst Westphal.

Am 21. und 22. April 1946 fand im Theatersaal der sogenannte Vereinigungsparteitag statt. Unter dem Druck der sowjetischen Besatzungsmacht wurden SPD und KPD zur SED (Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands) zusammengeführt, ein Symptom der beginnenden Spaltung Deutschlands.

La « Guerre totale » de Josef Goebbels

The « Sportpalast » speech (« Sportpalastrede speech ») or « Total War speech » was a speech delivered by Propaganda Minister Josef Goebbels at the « Berlin Sportpalast » to a large but « carefully selected » audience on 18 February 1943 calling for a total war, as the tide of World War II had turned against Nazi Germany and its Axis allies.

It is considered the most famous of Josef Goebbels's speeches. The speech was the 1st public admission by the Nazi leadership that Germany faced serious dangers. Goebbels exhorted the German people to continue the war even though it would be long and difficult because (as he asserted) both Germany's survival and the survival of a non-Bolshevist Europe were at stake.

Compared to the previous year, 1943 started inauspiciously for Germany, with major military problems on all fronts. On 2 February, the Battle of Stalingrad ended with the surrender of Field Marshal Paulus and the German 6th Army to the Soviets. At the Casablanca Conference, Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill demanded Germany's unconditional surrender, and the Soviets, spurred by their victory, were beginning to retake territory, including « Kursk » (8 February) , « Rostov » (14 February) , and « Kharkiv » (16 February) . In North Africa, the « Afrika Korps » under Field Marshal Erwin Rommel was being brought close to defeat, when German supply ships sailing to Tripoli were sunk by the Allies during January. The « Western Desert Campaign » had ended with British victory at El Alamein and the Axis were in Tunisia between 2 Allied forces - one advancing from Algeria and one from Libya. The fortunes of Germany's Axis allies were turning as well. Italy's military collapse had made the war in Africa a largely German operation, and in the Pacific, the Americans had just completed their months-long reconquest of Guadalcanal after their victories against Japanese forces at Midway and the Coral Sea.

Adolf Hitler responded with the 1st measures that would lead to the all-out mobilization of Germany. On 2 February, 100,000 restaurants and clubs were closed throughout the country so that the civilian population could contribute more to the war.

The setting of the speech in the « Sportpalast » placed the audience behind and under a big banner bearing the all-capitals words « TOTALER KRIEG - KÜRZESTER KRIEG » (Total War - Briefest War) along with Nazi banners and Nazi swastikas.

Although Goebbels claimed that the audience included people from « all classes and occupations » (including « soldiers, doctors, scientists, artists, engineers and architects, teachers, white collars ») it was evident to outsiders that the propagandist had carefully selected his listeners. After the speech, Goebbels said to Albert Speer that it was the best-trained audience one could find in Germany.

Goebbels cited 3 theses in the speech :

If the « Wehrmacht » was not in a position to break the danger from the Eastern front, then the German « Reich » would fall to Bolshevism, and all of Europe shortly afterwards.

The « Wehrmacht », the German people, and the Axis Powers alone had the strength to save Europe from this threat ; danger was at hand. Germany had to act quickly and decisively, or it would be too late.

Göebbels concluded that « 2,000 years of Western history are in danger », and blamed Germany's failures on the Jews. While Göebbels referred to Soviet mobilization nationwide as « devilish », he explained that « We cannot overcome the Bolshevik danger unless we use equivalent, though not identical, methods in a total war. ». He then justified the austerity measures enacted, explaining them as temporary measures.

Historically, the speech is important in that it marks the 1st admission by the Party leadership that they were facing problems, and launched the mobilization campaign that, arguably, prolonged the war, under the slogan :

« Und Sturm, brich los ! » (« And storm, break loose ! »)

Göebbels claimed that no German was thinking of any compromise and instead that « the entire nation is only thinking about a hard war » .

Göebbels attempted to counter reports in the Allied press that German civilians had lost faith in victory by asking the audience a number of questions at the end, such as :

« Do you believe with the " Führer " and us in the final total victory of the German people ? Are you and the German people willing to work, if the " Führer " orders, 10, 12 and if necessary 14 hours a day and to give everything for victory ? Do you want total war ? If necessary, do you want a war more total and radical than anything that we can even imagine today ? »

(The recorded oral version of the speech differed in some ways from the written record. The enthusiastic and unified crowd response recorded in the written version is, at times, less than fully supported by the recording.)

Especially significant is that in the oral (vs. written) record of the speech, Göebbels actually begins to mention the « extermination » of the Jews, rather than the less harsh terms used in the written version to describe the « solution », but catches himself in the middle of the word.

Quotes :

« Ich frage euch: Wollt ihr den totalen Krieg ? Wollt ihr ihn, wenn nötig, totaler und radikaler, als wir ihn uns heute überhaupt erst vorstellen können ? »

(« I ask you : Do you want total war ? If necessary, do you want a war more total and radical than anything that we can even yet imagine ? »)

« Nun, Volk, steh auf und Sturm brich los ! »

« Now, people, rise-up, and let the storm break loose ! »)

The last line originated in the poem « Männer und Buben » (Men and Boys) by Carl Theodor Körner during the Napoleonic Wars. Körner's words had been quoted by Adolf Hitler in his 1920 speech « What We Want » delivered at Munich's « Hofbräuhaus », but also by Goebbels himself in older speeches, including his 6 July 1932 campaign speech before the Nazis took power in Germany.

Millions of Germans listened to Josef Goebbels on the radio as he delivered this speech about the « misfortune of the past weeks » and an « unvarnished picture of the situation ». The audience reacted fanatically, causing an even bigger impact ; they were selected by Goebbels to perform appropriately, showing one of his many skills as Propaganda minister. Goebbels also wanted, by amassing such popular enthusiasm, to convince Adolf Hitler to give him greater powers in running the war economy.

...

On February 18, 1943, as the tide of World War II was turning against Germany, Josef Goebbels gave his « Total War » speech at the « Berlin Sportpalast » to a carefully selected audience of 14,000 Party officials, war veterans, workers, and women. While millions more Germans listened on the radio, Goebbels spoke about the « misfortune of the past weeks » and offered an « unvarnished picture of the situation » amid so-called spontaneous cheers from the audience.

The Nazis faced a grim reality. They had lost Stalingrad to the Soviets who, spurred by the victory, were beginning to retake territory. In North Africa, the Allies had sunk supply ships and dealt General Erwin Rommel another set-back. In Italy, Benito Mussolini had fired his administration and assumed personal responsibility for the war. At an Allies' conference in Casablanca, United States President Franklin Roosevelt and British Prime Minister Winston Churchill had demanded Germany's unconditional surrender. But Adolf Hitler and Josef Goebbels, perhaps knowing that the war could not be won, promoted a different idea : a homefront mobilization campaign that prolonged the war for another 2 and a half years under the slogan : « Let the storm break loose ! » .

Even as Goebbels acknowledged recent losses, he was crafting a new myth of national strength, assuring his audience that, « The German people, educated, indoctrinated, and disciplined by National-Socialism, can stand the full truth. » . He argued that only the Germany army stood between Europe and the onslaught of Bolshevism and that Germany alone could save Europe from this threat. He then explained that Germany could not « overcome the Bolshevist danger unless we use equivalent ... methods in a total war » . His argument justified austerity measures Hitler had enacted, including the conscription of civilians for war work and the closing of 100,000 restaurants and clubs throughout the country. Goebbels led the audience through a series of 10 questions that whipped them into a frenzy of fanatic applause. Reaching his final question, he demanded, « I ask you : Do you want total war ? If necessary, do you want a war more total and radical than anything that we can even imagine today ? » . After the speech, Nazi leader Albert Speer reported : « Except for Hitler's most successful public meetings, I had never seen an audience so effectively roused to fanaticism. » . Gœbbels had succeeded in re-invigorating the German war effort - at least temporarily.

...

On February 18, 1943, Doctor Josef Gœbbels gave his famous « Total War » speech at the « Berlin Sportpalast » . Meant to shore-up popular support at home in World War II as Germany's military situation deteriorated, the speech was perhaps the most successful of Gœbbels' career.

A leg slightly crippled from birth prevented the diminutive (Paul) Josef Gœbbels from fighting in the trenches of World War I. After the war, he had been an early supporter of the Nazi Party in Germany and, as a part of the northern branch of the Party, had challenged the dominance of the Bavarian wing, led by Adolf Hitler, in 1926. The 2 soon reconciled and Gœbbels quickly became one of Hitler's most trusted lieutenants and was awarded with the post of Nazi Party leader for Berlin.

Not long after Hitler came to power, in 1933, Gœbbels was appointed to the post of Minister of Propaganda and Public Enlightenment. From this position, Gœbbels manipulated the German media and arts and ensured that the radical Nazi messages of German racial superiority and anti-Semitic conspiracy theory became commonplace and accepted. Gœbbels was also the foremost Nazi leader responsible for the 1938 « Kristallnacht » (the Night of Broken Glass) , which saw devastating anti-Semitic programs launched throughout Germany.

Josef Gœbbels' propaganda was not limited to attacks on the Jews, however. Socialists, communists, Free Masons, Christian churches and foreigners all felt the sting of Gœbbels' vitriol, all meeting with the general approval and support of the « Führer » . When World War II broke-out, Gœbbels turned his persuasive powers toward the war effort, constantly trumpeting German success in the early years of the war.

The 1st years of the war made Gœbbels' job easy, as the « Wehrmacht » did indeed meet with victory after victory. In 1939, Poland fell, followed by Norway, Denmark and Low-Countries the following year. It was the fall of France, in June 1940, that provided Gœbbels with his biggest propaganda boon of all, however. Paris, the city that had held-out for 4 years against the Imperial German army in World War I, had fallen to the armies of Adolf Hitler. Gœbbels sent his own army of photographers and writers to accompany Hitler to the « City of Lights » during his victory tour, and public support for the Nazi leadership soared to new heights.

German popular feelings were mixed with the June 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union, so Gœbbels worked hard to paint the conflict as one between Germanic civilization and Bolshevik destruction. Again, Gœbbels' propaganda reaped the benefit of initial « Wehrmacht » victories over the Soviets until Hitler's army was ground to a halt before Moscow, in November and December of 1941. Re-equipped and refreshed, the summer 1942 offensive against the Soviets had every appearance of succeeding, and Gœbbels once again trumpeted initial victories that year.

However, 1942 ended in disaster for Germany. The August 1942 - February 1943 Battle of Stalingrad was a gamechanger for the « Reich » . The battle saw the destruction and capture of the 6th Army, the « Wehrmacht » 's largest fighting formation. During the battle, the trickster Gœbbels had produced a radio broadcast, reportedly from the front lines of Stalingrad, of German soldiers singing Christmas carols. In fact, the chorus came from a studio in Berlin. By Christmas 1942, the German soldiers defending the Stalingrad pocket were scarecrows who could barely fight for lack of food, let alone sing joyfully.

The fall of the 6th Army was a disaster of such magnitude that even the skilled Gœbbels could not ignore it or play down its significance. Suddenly, Gœbbels had to adopt a new tactic in order to maintain popular support for the war effort, which was slipping every day.

On February 18, 1943, only a few weeks after the German surrender at Stalingrad, Gœbbels staged a massive rally at the « Berlin Sportpalast » with an audience carefully chosen from among the Nazi Party's die-hard supporters. In his book « Landmark Speeches of National-Socialism » , historian Randall L. Bytwerk wrote :

« Gœbbels, for months, had been trying to increase his control over the war effort, and the defeat at Stalingrad was his opportunity. He prepared a vivid speech to rouse the German resistance and persuade Hitler to give him more power. He chose the Berlin Sport Palace, the site of many previous Nazi rallies. It held about 14,000 people. Gœbbels selected them carefully, securing the most fanatic audience he could find. It was a media event. »

In the speech, Gœbbels stated :

« We currently face a military challenge in the East. There is no point in disputing the seriousness of the situation. I refuse to give you a false impression of the situation that could lead to false conclusions, perhaps giving the German people a false sense of security that is altogether inappropriate for the present situation. It is understandable that, as a result of wide-ranging deceptions and bluffs by the Bolshevik government, we did not properly evaluate the Soviet Union's war potential. Only now, do we see its true scale. That is why the battle our soldiers face in the East exceeds in its hardness, dangers and difficulties all human imagining. It demands our full national strength. »

This was an unprecedented admission by the Nazi government that it had failed to correctly judge its enemy's ability. It is also the 1st time that such horrible news was not sugar-coated for the German people. Gœbbels' usually rose-tinted prognostications were nowhere to be found. Gœbbels went on to paint Germany as the only thing standing between the Soviet Union and a Bolshevised Europe, perhaps intimating that Britain should come to terms in the West, lest it face a powerful Soviet threat to replace its Nazi enemy.

The speech further details Gœbbels' and the Nazi leadership's obsession with the supposed Jewish-Bolshevik conspiracy. Gœbbels stated :

« We see Jewry as a direct threat to every nation. Jewry is a contagious infection. Germany, in any event, has no intention of bowing before this Jewish threat, but rather intends to act at the right moment, using if necessary the most total and radical measures to deal with Jewry. Terrorist Jewry had 200 million people to serve it in Russia. »

Göebbels concluded the speech by asking his audience if they would support the most radical means to win the war, to which the audience shouted in the affirmative. He asked several specific questions to the audience, including whether or not war shirkers and black marketeers should be executed, women be fully mobilized for the war effort, and workers put in up to 16 hours a day to support the war effort.

One of the most important questions Göebbels asked, one which encompassed all of the other ideas of the speech and more, was this :

« Do you want total war ? If necessary, do you want a war more total and radical than anything that we can even imagine today ? »

To this, as to the questions posed before and after it, the audience cheered wildly. The idea of « Total War » , completely mobilizing everything in the nation for the war effort, was nothing new, going back as far as the French Revolution. In World War I, the German government talked constantly of « Total War » as well. Göebbels' passionate appeal, however, promised that Nazi radicalism would be taken even further. And now, with a carefully staged mandate from the « people » , Göebbels was going to push the limits in of power in the 3rd « Reich » as never before.

The last line of the speech was a call to arms :

« People, rise-up, and storm, break loose ! »

Albert Speer, Hitler's Minister for Armaments and War Production, noted later in his memoirs « Inside the 3rd “ Reich ” » , that Göebbels had many motivations for the speech beyond addressing the obvious military defeat and calling for more government control. Göebbels saw in this event a way to push through his own radical agenda against entrenched Nazi bureaucrats who enjoyed Hitler's favor. Also, Speer noted, Göebbels had longed to replace Joachim von Ribbentrop as Hitler's foreign minister. By addressing the international situation and appealing to the West to wake-up to the Bolshevik threat, Göebbels was trying to sell himself to Hitler himself as a man with a foreign policy plan. In large part, the « Total War » speech was Göebbels' personal power play.

Albert Speer wrote :

« Except for Hitler's most successful public meetings, I had never seen an audience so effectively roused to fanaticism. Back in his home, Göebbels astonished me by analyzing what had seemed to be a purely emotional outburst in terms of its psychological effects - much as an experienced actor might have done. He was also satisfied with his audience that evening. »

Speer also noted that Göebbels said to him that « it was the politically best-trained audience you can find in Germany » .

Bytwerk noted that, after the initial radio broadcast of the speech, it was aired a 2nd time in its entirety, and the text was soon published in newspapers and pamphlets. Newsreels of the speech appeared before movies. « No one in the 3rd “ Reich ” escaped this speech » , Bytwerk noted.

In his biography of the Propaganda minister, « Josef Gœbbels : Life and Death » , Toby Thacker wrote :

« Gœbbels had ordered his propaganda departments around Germany to report back urgently to him on reaction to the speech, and in the preliminary response which reached him the next day his " handling of the Jewish question " was signaled out for praise. »

By the end of the month, renewed actions to deport Jews still working in Germany began. Just under 11,000 were sent to death camps in Poland in an operation launched on February 27.

After the speech, Hitler did award Gœbbels new powers over the economy and German public life, though he retained the inept Ribbentrop as foreign minister, to Gœbbels' chagrin. Whatever success Gœbbels had with his speech, the die was already cast, however, and Germany's days were numbered.

With the Red Army invested in Berlin and closing in on the « Reich » Chancellery building, in April 1945, Adolf Hitler committed suicide. On May 1, Gœbbels and his wife shot themselves after poisoning their 6 children.

...

The battle of Stalingrad had ended, and the true seriousness of the war was evident to everyone. Josef Gœbbels wanted this speech to build popular enthusiasm for the war, and also to convince Adolf Hitler to give him greater powers in running the war economy.

Gœbbels had used the concluding quotation of the speech (« Now, people rise-up, and let the storm break loose ! ») in earlier speeches, for example a campaign speech before the Nazi takeover of power on 6 July 1932.

There are significant differences between the oral et the written version of the speech. The most striking is that in the oral version, Gœbbels begins to mention the extermination of the Jews, then catches himself in the middle of the word. It's also interesting to note that the audience reactions reported in the text below are sometimes stronger than the recording justifies.

The source : « Nun, Volk steh auf, und Sturm brich los ! Rede im Berliner Sportpalast » , « Der steile Aufstieg » , « Zentralverlag der NSDAP, München » (1944) , pages 167-204.

Nation, Rise-Up, and Let the Storm Break Loose !

Only 3 weeks ago, I stood in this place to read the « Führer » 's proclamation on the 10th anniversary of the seizure of power, and to speak to you and to the German people. The crisis we now face on the Eastern Front was at its height. In the midst of the hard misfortunes the nation faced in the battle on the Volga, we gathered together in a mass meeting on the 30th of January to display our unity, our unanimity and our strong will to overcome the difficulties we faced in the 4th year of the war.

It was a moving experience for me, and probably also for all of you, to be bound by radio with the last heroic fighters in Stalingrad during our powerful meeting here in the Sport Palace. They radioed to us that they had heard the « Führer » 's proclamation and, perhaps for the last time in their lives, joined us in raising their hands to sing the national anthems. What an example German soldiers have set in this great age ! And what an obligation it puts on us all, particularly the entire German homeland ! Stalingrad was and is fate's great alarm call to the German nation ! A nation that has the strength to survive and overcome such a disaster, even to draw from it additional strength, is unbeatable. In my speech to you and the German people, I shall remember the heroes of Stalingrad, who put me and all of us under a deep obligation.

I do not know how many millions of people are listening to me over the radio tonight, at home and at the front. I want to speak to all of you from the depths of my heart to the depths of yours. I believe that the entire German people has a passionate interest in what I have to say tonight. I will therefore speak with holy seriousness and openness, as the hour demands. The German people, raised, educated and disciplined by National-Socialism, can bear the whole truth. It knows the gravity of the situation, and its leadership can therefore demand the necessary hard measures, yes even the hardest measures. We Germans are armed against weakness and uncertainty. The blows and misfortunes of the war only give us additional strength, firm resolve, and a spiritual and fighting will to overcome all difficulties and obstacles with revolutionary élan.

Now is not the time to ask how it all happened. That can wait until later, when the German people and the whole world will learn the full truth about the misfortune of the past weeks, and its deep and fateful significance. The heroic sacrifices of heroism of our soldiers in Stalingrad has had vast historical significance for the whole Eastern Front. It was not in vain. The future will make clear why.

When I jump over the past to look ahead, I do it intentionally. The time is short ! There is no time for fruitless debates. We must act, immediately, thoroughly, and decisively, as has always been the National-Socialist way.

The movement has from its beginning acted in that way to master the many crises it faced and overcame. The National-Socialist State also acted decisively when faced by a threat. We are not like the ostrich that sticks its head in the sand so as not to see danger. We are brave enough to look danger in the face, to coolly and ruthlessly take its measure, then act decisively with our heads held high. Both as a movement and as a nation, we have always been at our best when we needed fanatic, determined wills to overcome and eliminate danger, or a strength of character sufficient to overcome every obstacle, or bitter determination to reach our goal, or an iron heart capable of withstanding every internal and external battle. So it will be today. My task is to give you an unvarnished picture of the situation, and to draw the hard conclusions that will guide the actions of the German government, but also of the German people.

We face a serious military challenge in the East. The crisis is at the moment a broad one, similar but not identical in many ways to that of the previous winter. Later, we will discuss the causes. Now, we must accept things as they are and discover and apply the ways and means to turn things again in our favor. There is no point in disputing the seriousness of the situation. I do not want to give you a false impression of the situation that could lead to false conclusions, perhaps giving the German people a false sense of security that is altogether inappropriate in the present situation.

The storm raging against our venerable continent from the steppes this winter overshadows all previous human and historical experience. The German army and its allies are the only possible defense. In his proclamation, on 30 January, the « Führer » asked in a grave and compelling way what would have become of Germany and Europe if, on 30 January 1933, a bourgeois or democratic government had taken power instead of the National-Socialists ! What dangers would have followed, faster than we could then have suspected, and what powers of defense would we have had to meet them ? 10 years of National-Socialism have been enough to make plain to the German people the seriousness of the danger posed by Bolshevism from the East. Now, one can understand why we spoke so often of the fight against Bolshevism at our Nuremberg Party rallies. We raised our voices in warning to our German people and the world, hoping to awaken Western humanity from the paralysis of will and spirit into which it had fallen. We tried to open their eyes to the horrible danger from Eastern Bolshevism, which had subjected a nation of nearly 200 million people to the terror of the Jews and was preparing an aggressive war against Europe.

When the « Führer » ordered the army to attack the East, on 22 June 1941, we all knew that this would be the decisive battle of this great struggle. We knew the dangers and difficulties. But we also knew that dangers and difficulties always grow over time, they never diminish. It was 2 minutes before midnight. Waiting any longer could easily have led to the destruction of the « Reich » and a total Bolshevization of the European continent.

It is understandable that, as a result of broad concealment and misleading actions by the Bolshevist government, we did not properly evaluate the Soviet Union's war potential. Only now do we see its true scale. That is why the battle our soldiers face in the East exceeds in its hardness, dangers and difficulties all human imagining. It demands our full national strength. This is a threat to the « Reich » and to the European continent that casts all previous dangers into the shadows. If we fail, we will have failed our historic mission. Everything we have built and done in the past pales in the face of this gigantic task that the German army directly and the German people less directly face.

I speak 1st to the world, and proclaim three theses regarding our fight against the Bolshevist danger in the East.

This 1st thesis : Were the German army not in a position to break the danger from the East, the « Reich » would fall to Bolshevism, and all Europe shortly afterwards.

2nd : The German army, the German people and their allies alone have the strength to save Europe from this threat.

3rd : Danger faces us. We must act quickly and decisively, or it will be too late.

I turn to the 1st thesis.

Bolshevism has always proclaimed its goal openly : to bring revolution not only to Europe, but to the entire world, and plunge it into Bolshevik chaos. This goal has been evident from the beginning of the Bolshevik Soviet Union, and has been the ideological and practical goal of the Kremlin's policies. Clearly, the nearer Stalin and the other Soviet leaders believe they are to realizing their world-destroying objectives, the more they attempt to hide and conceal them. We cannot be fooled. We are not like those timid souls who wait like the hypnotized rabbit until the serpent devours them. We prefer to recognize the danger in good time and take effective action. We see through not only the ideology of Bolshevism, but also its practice, for we had great success with that in our domestic struggles. The Kremlin cannot deceive us. We had 14 years of our struggle for power, and 10 years thereafter, to unmask its intentions and its infamous deceptions.

The goal of Bolshevism is Jewish world revolution. They want to bring chaos to the « Reich » and Europe, using the resulting hopelessness and desperation to establish their international, Bolshevik-concealed capitalist tyranny.

I do not need to say what that would mean for the German people. A Bolshevization of the « Reich » would mean the liquidation of our entire intelligentsia and leadership, and the descent of our workers into Bolshevik-Jewish slavery. In Moscow, they find workers for forced labor battalions in the Siberian tundra, as the « Führer » said in his proclamation on 30 January. The revolt of the steppes is readying itself at the front, and the storm from the East that breaks against our lines daily in increasing strength is nothing other than a repetition of the historical devastation that has so often in the past endangered our part of the world.

That is a direct threat to the existence of every European power. No one should believe that Bolshevism would stop at the borders of the « Reich » , were it to be victorious. The goal of its aggressive policies and wars is the Bolshevization of every land and people in the world. In the face of such undeniable intentions, we are not impressed by paper declarations from the Kremlin or guarantees from London or Washington. We know that we are dealing in the East with an infernal political devilishness that does not recognize the norms governing relations between people and nations. When, for example, the English Lord Beaverbrook says that Europe must be given over to the Soviets or when the leading American Jewish journalist Brown cynically adds that a Bolshevization of Europe might solve all of the continent's problems, we know what they have in mind. The European powers are facing the most critical question. The West is in danger. It makes no difference whether or not their governments and intellectuals realize it or not.

The German people, in any event, is unwilling to bow to this danger. Behind the oncoming Soviet divisions, we see the Jewish liquidation commandos, and behind them terror, the specter of mass starvation and complete anarchy. International Jewry is the devilish ferment of decomposition that finds cynical satisfaction in plunging the world into the deepest chaos and destroying ancient cultures that it played no role in building.

We also know our historic responsibility. 2,000 years of Western civilization are in danger. One cannot overestimate the danger. It is indicative that when one names it as it is, International Jewry throughout the world protests loudly.

Things have gone so far in Europe that one cannot call a danger a danger when it is caused by the Jews.

That does not stop us from drawing the necessary conclusions. That is what we did in our earlier domestic battles. The democratic Jewry of the « Berliner Tageblatt » and the « Vossischen Zeitung » served communist Jewry by minimizing and downplaying a growing danger, and by lulling our threatened people to sleep and reducing their ability to resist. We could see, if the danger were not overcome, the specter of hunger, misery, and forced labor by millions of Germans. We could see our venerable part of the world collapse, and bury in its ruins the ancient inheritance of the West. That is the danger we face today.

My 2nd thesis :

Only the German « Reich » and its allies are in the position to resist this danger. The European nations, including England, believe that they are strong enough to resist effectively the Bolshevization of Europe, should it come to that. This belief is childish and not even worth refuting. If the strongest military force in the world is not able to break the threat of Bolshevism, who else could do it ? (The crowd in the « Sportpalast » shouts « No one ! ») . The neutral European nations have neither the potential nor the military means nor the spiritual strength to provide even the least resistance to Bolshevism. Bolshevism's robotic divisions would roll over them within a few days. In the capitals of the mid-sized and smaller European States, they console themselves with the idea that one must be spiritually armed against Bolshevism (laughter) . That reminds us of the statements by bourgeois Parties in 1932, who thought they could fight and win the battle against communism with spiritual weapons. That was too stupid even then to be worth refuting. Eastern Bolshevism is not only a doctrine of terrorism, it is also the practice of terrorism. It strives for its goals with an infernal thoroughness, using every resource at its disposal, regardless of the welfare, prosperity or peace of the peoples it ruthlessly oppresses. What would England and America do if, in the worst case, Europe fell into Bolshevism's arms ? Will London perhaps persuade Bolshevism to stop at the English Channel ? I have already said that Bolshevism has its foreign legions in the form of Communist Parties in every democratic nation. None of these States can think it is immune to domestic Bolshevism. In a recent by-election for the House of Commons, the independent, that is communist candidate got 10,741 of the 22,371 votes cast. This was in a district that had formerly been a conservative stronghold. Within a short time, 10,000 voters, nearly half, had been lost to the communists.

That is proof that the Bolshevik danger exists in England too, and that it will not go away simply because it is ignored. We place no faith in any territorial promises that the Soviet Union may make. Bolshevism set ideological as well as military boundaries, which poses a danger to every nation. The world no longer has the choice between falling back into its old fragmentation or accepting a new order for Europe under Axis leadership. The only choice now is between living under Axis protection or in a Bolshevik Europe.

I am firmly convinced that the lamenting Lords and archbishops in London have not the slightest intention of resisting the Bolshevik danger that would result were the Soviet army to enter Europe. Jewry has so deeply infected the Anglo-Saxon States, both spiritually and politically, that they are no longer have the ability to see the danger. It conceals itself as Bolshevism in the Soviet Union, and plutocratic-capitalism in the Anglo-Saxon States. The Jewish race is an expert at mimicry. They put their host peoples to sleep, paralyzing their defensive abilities. (Shouts from the crowd : « We have experienced it ! ») . Our insight into the matter led us to the early realization that cooperation between international plutocracy and international Bolshevism was not a contradiction, but rather a sign of deep commonalities. The hand of the pseudo-civilized Jewry of Western Europe shakes the hand of the Jewry of the Eastern ghettos over Germany. Europe is in deadly danger.

I do not flatter myself into believing that my remarks will influence public opinion in the neutral, much less the enemy, states. That is also not my goal or intention. I know that, given our problems on the Eastern Front, the English press tomorrow will furiously attack me with the accusation that I have made the 1st peace feelers (loud laughter) . That is certainly not so. No one in Germany thinks any longer of a cowardly compromise. The entire people thinks only of a hard war. As a spokesman for the leading nation of the continent, however, I claim the right to call a danger a danger if it threatens not only our own land, but our entire continent. We, National-Socialists, have the duty to sound the alarm against International Jewry's attempt to plunge the European continent into chaos, and to warn that Jewry has in Bolshevism a terroristic military power whose danger cannot be overestimated.

My 3rd thesis is that the danger is immediate. The paralysis of the Western European democracies before their deadliest threat is frightening. International Jewry is doing all it can to encourage such paralysis. During our struggle for power in Germany, Jewish newspapers tried to conceal the danger, until National-Socialism awakened the people. It is just the same today in other nations. Jewry once again reveals itself as the incarnation of evil, as the plastic demon of decay and the bearer of an international culture-destroying chaos.

This explains, by the way, our consistent Jewish policies. We see Jewry as a direct threat to every nation. We do not care what other peoples do about the danger. What we do to defend ourselves is our own business, however, and we will not tolerate objections from others. Jewry is a contagious infection. Enemy nations may raise hypocritical protests against our measures against Jewry and cry crocodile tears, but that will not stop us from doing that which is necessary. Germany, in any event, has no intention of bowing before this threat, but rather intends to take the most radical measures, if necessary, in good time (After this sentence, the chants of the audience prevent the Minister from going on for several minutes) .

The military challenges of the « Reich » in the East are at the center of everything. The war of mechanized robots against Germany and Europe has reached its high-point. In resisting the grave and direct threat with its weapons, the German people and its Axis allies are fulfilling in the truest sense of the word a European mission. Our courageous and just battle against this world-wide plague will not be hindered by the world-wide outcry of International Jewry. It can and must end only with victory (Here, there are loud shouts : « German men, to arms ! German women, to work ! ») .

The tragic battle of Stalingrad is a symbol of heroic, manly resistance to the revolt of the steppes. It has not only a military, but also an intellectual and spiritual significance for the German people. Here, for the 1st time, our eyes have been opened to the true nature of the war. We want no more false hopes and illusions. We want bravely to look the facts in the face, however hard and dreadful they may be. The history of our Party and our State has proven that a danger recognized is a danger defeated. Our coming hard battles in the East will be under the sign of this heroic resistance. It will require previously undreamed of efforts by our soldiers and our weapons. A merciless war is raging in the East. The « Führer » was right when he said that in the end there will not be winners and losers, but the living and the dead.

The German nation knows that. Its healthy instincts have led it through the daily confusion of intellectual and spiritual difficulties. We know today that the « Blitzkrieg » in Poland and the campaign in the West have only limited significance to the battle in the East. The German nation is fighting for everything it has. We know that the German people are defending their holiest possessions : their families, women and children, the beautiful and untouched countryside, their cities and villages, their 2,000 year old culture, everything indeed that makes life worth living.

Bolshevism, of course, has not the slightest appreciation for our nation's treasures, and would take no heed of them whatsoever if it came to that. It did not do so even for its own people. The Soviet Union over the last 25 years built-up Bolshevism's military potential to an unimaginable degree, and one we falsely evaluated. Terrorist Jewry had 200 million people to serve it in Russia. It cynically used its methods on to create out of the stolid toughness of the Russian people a grave danger for the civilized nations of Europe. A whole nation in the East was driven to battle. Men, women, and even children are employed not only in armaments factories, but in the war itself. 200 million live under the terror of the GPU, partially captives of a devilish viewpoint, partially of absolute stupidity. The masses of tanks we have faced on the Eastern Front are the result of 25 years of social misfortune and misery of the Bolshevik people. We have to respond with similar measures if we do not want to give-up the game as lost.

My firm conviction is that we cannot overcome the Bolshevik danger unless we use equivalent, though not identical, methods. The German people face the gravest demand of the war, namely of finding the determination to use all our resources to protect everything we have and everything we will need in the future.

Total war is the demand of the hour. We must put an end to the bourgeois attitude that we have also seen in this war : « Wash my back, but don't get me wet ! » (Every sentence is met with growing applause and agreement.) The danger facing us is enormous. The efforts we take to meet it must be just as enormous. The time has come to remove the kid gloves and use our fists. (A cry of elemental agreement rises. Chants from the galleries and seats testify to the full approval of the crowd.) We can no longer make only partial and careless use of the war potential at home and in the significant parts of Europe that we control. We must use our full resources, as quickly and thoroughly as it is organizationally and practically possible. Unnecessary concern is wholly out of place. The future of Europe hangs on our success in the East. We are ready to defend it. The German people are shedding their most valuable national blood in this battle. The rest of Europe should at least work to support us. There are many serious voices in Europe that have already realized this. Others still resist. That cannot influence us. If danger faced them alone, we could view their reluctance as literary non-sense of no significance. But the danger faces us all, and we must all do our share. Those who today do not understand that will thank us tomorrow on bended knees that we courageously and firmly took on the task.

It bothers us not in the least that our enemies abroad claim that our total war measures resemble those of Bolshevism. They claim hypocritically that that means there is no need to fight Bolshevism. The question here is not one of method, but of the goal, namely eliminating the danger. (Applause for several minutes.) The question is not whether the methods are good or bad, but whether they are successful. The National-Socialist government is ready to use every means. We do not care if anyone objects. We are not willing to weaken Germany's war potential by measures that maintain a high, almost peace-time standard of living for a certain class, thereby endangering our war effort. We are voluntarily giving-up a significant part of our living standard to increase our war effort as quickly and completely as possible. This is not an end in itself, but rather a means to an end. Our social standard of living will be even higher after the war. We do not need to imitate Bolshevik methods, because we have better people and leaders, which gives us a great advantage. But things have shown that we must do much more than we have done so far to turn the war in the East decisively in our favor.

As countless letters from the homeland and the front have shown, by the way, the entire German people agrees. Everyone knows that if we lose, all will be destroyed. The people and leadership are determined to take the most radical measures. The broad working masses of our people are not unhappy because the government is too ruthless. If anything, they are unhappy because it is too considerate. Ask anyone in Germany, and he will say : The most radical is just radical enough, and the most total is just total enough to gain victory.

The total war effort has become a matter of the entire German people. No one has any excuse for ignoring its demands. A storm of applause greeted my call on 30 January for total war. I can therefore assure you that the leadership's measures are in full agreement with the desires of the German people at home and at the front. The people are willing to bear any burden, even the heaviest, to make any sacrifice, if it leads to the great goal of victory. (Lively applause.)

This naturally assumes that the burdens are shared equally. (Loud approval.) We cannot tolerate a situation in which most people carry the burden of the war, while a small, passive portion attempts to escape its burdens and responsibilities. The measures we have taken, and the ones we will yet take, will be characterized by the spirit of National-Socialist justice. We pay no heed to class or standing. Rich and poor, high and low must share the burdens equally. Everyone must do his duty in this grave hour, whether by choice or otherwise. We know this has the full support of the people. We would rather do too much rather than too little to achieve victory. No war in history has ever been lost because of too many soldiers or weapons. Many, however, have been lost because the opposite was true.

It is time to get the slackers moving. (Stormy agreement.) They must be shaken out of their comfortable ease. We cannot wait until they come to their senses. That might be too late. The alarm must sound throughout the nation. Millions of hands must get to work throughout the country. The measures we have taken, and the ones we will now take, and which I shall discuss later in this speech, are critical for our whole public and private life. The individual may have to make great sacrifices, but they are tiny when compared to the sacrifices he would have to make if his refusal brought down on us the greatest national disaster. It is better to operate at the right time than to wait until the disease has taken root. One may not complain to the doctor or sue him for bodily injury. He cuts not to kill, but to save the patient's life.

Again let me say that the heavier the sacrifices the German people must make, the more urgent it is that they be fairly shared. The people want it that way. No one resists even the heaviest burdens of war. But it angers people when a few always try to escape the burdens. The National-Socialist government has both the moral and political duty to oppose such attempts, if necessary with draconian penalties. (Agreement.) Leniency here would be completely out of place, leading in time to a confusion in the people's emotions and attitudes that would be a grave danger to our public morale.

We are, therefore, compelled to adopt a series of measures that are not essential for the war effort in themselves, but seem necessary to maintain moral at home and at the front. The optics of the war, that is, how things outwardly appear, is of decisive importance in this 4th year of war. In view of the super-human sacrifices that the front makes each day, it has a basic right to expect that no one at home claims the right to ignore the war and its demands. And not only the front demands this, but the overwhelming part of the homeland. The industrious have a right to expect that if they work 10 or 12 or 14 hours a day, a lazy person does not stand next to them who thinks them foolish. The homeland must stay pure and intact in its entirety. Nothing may disturb the picture.

There are therefore a series of measures that take account of the war's optics. We have ordered, for example, the closing of bars and night-clubs. I cannot imagine that people who are doing their duty for the war effort still have the energy to stay-out late into the night in such places. I can only conclude that they are not taking their responsibilities seriously. We have closed these establishments because they began to offend us, and because they disturb the image of the war. We have nothing against amusements as such. After the war, we will happily go by the rule « Live and let live » . But during a war, the slogan must be « Fight and let fight ! » .

We have also closed luxury restaurants that demand far more resources than is reasonable. It may be that an occasional person thinks that, even during war, his stomach is the most important thing. We cannot pay him any heed. At the front, everyone, from the simple soldier to the general field marshal, eats from the field kitchen. I do not believe that it is asking too much to insist that we in the homeland pay heed to at least the basic laws of community thinking. We can become gourmets once again when the war is over. Right now, we have more important things to do than worry about our stomachs.

Countless luxury stores have also been closed. They often offended the buying public. There was generally nothing to buy, unless perhaps, one paid here and there with butter or eggs instead of money. What good do shops do that no longer have anything to sell, but only use electricity, heating, and human labor that is lacking everywhere else, particularly in the armaments industry.

It is no excuse to say that keeping some of these shops open gives a lovely impression to foreigners. Foreigners will be impressed only by a German victory ! (Stormy applause.) . Everyone will want to be our friend if we win the war. But if we lose, we will be able to count our friends on the fingers of one hand. We have put an end to such illusions. We want to put these people standing in empty shops to useful work in the war economy. This process is already in motion, and will be completed by 15 March. It is, of course, a major transformation in our entire economic life. We are following a plan. We do not want to accuse anyone unjustly or open them to complaints and accusations from every side. We are only doing what is necessary. But we are doing it quickly and thoroughly.

We would rather wear worn clothing for a few years than have our people wear rags for a few Centuries. What good are fashion salons today ? They only use light, heat and workers. They will reappear when the war is over. What good are beauty shops that encourage a cult of beauty and take enormous time and energy ? In peace, they are wonderful, but a waste of time during war. Our women and girls will be able to greet our victorious returning soldiers without their peacetime finery. (Applause.)

Government offices will work faster and less bureaucratically. It does not leave a good impression when the office closes on the dot after 8 hours. The people are not there for the offices, the offices are there for the people. One has to work until the work is done. That is a requirement of the war. If the « Führer » can do that, so can his paid employees. If there is not enough work to fill the extended hours, 10 or 20 or 30 % of the workers can be transferred to war production and replace other men for service at the front. That applies to all offices in the homeland. That, by itself, may make the work in some offices go more quickly and easily. We must learn from the war to operate quickly, not only thoroughly. The soldier at the front does not have weeks to think things over, to pass his thoughts up the line or let them sit in dusty files. He must act immediately or lose his life. In the homeland, we do not lose our lives if we work slowly, but we do endanger the life of our people.

Everyone must learn to pay heed to war morale, and pay attention to the just demands of working and fighting people. We are not spoilsports, but neither will we tolerate those who hinder our efforts.

It is, for example, intolerable that certain men and women stay for weeks in spas and trade rumors, taking places away from soldiers on leave or from workers who are entitled to a vacation after a year of hard work. That is intolerable, and we have put an end to it. The war is not a time for amusement. Until it is over, we take our deepest satisfaction in work and battle. Those who do not understand that by themselves must be taught to understand it, and forced if need be. The harshest measures may be needed.

It does not look good, for example, when we devote enormous propaganda to the theme : « Wheels must roll for victory ! » , with the result that people avoid unnecessary travel only to see unemployed pleasure-seekers find more room for themselves in the trains. The railroad serves to transport war goods and travelers on war business. Only those who need a rest from hard work deserve a vacation. The « Führer » has not had a day of vacation since the war began. Since the 1st man of the country takes his duty so seriously and responsibly, it must be expected that every citizen will follow his example.

On the other hand, the government is doing all it can to give working people the relaxation they need in these trying times. Theatres, movie houses, and music-halls remain in full operation. The radio is working to expand and improve its programming. We have no intention of inflicting a gray winter mood on our people. That which serves the people and keeps up its fighting and working strength is good and essential to the war effort. We want to eliminate the opposite. To balance the measures, I have already discussed, I have therefore ordered that cultural and spiritual establishments that serve the people not be decreased, but increased. As long as they aid rather than harm the war effort, they must be supported by the government. That applies to sports as well. Sports are not only for particular circles today, but a matter for the entire people. Military exemptions for athletes are out of place. The purpose of sports is to steel the body, certainly with the goal of using it appropriately in time of the people's greatest need.

The front shares our desires. The entire German people agrees passionately. It is no longer willing to put-up with efforts that only waste time and resources. It will not put-up with complicated questionnaires on every possible issue. It does not want to worry about a 1,000 minor matters that may have been important in peace, but are entirely unimportant during war. It also does not need to be constantly reminded of its duty by references to the great sacrifices of our soldiers at Stalingrad. It knows what it has to do. It wants everyone, high and low, rich and poor, to share a spartan life style. The « Führer » gives us all an example, one that must be followed by everyone. He knows only work and care. We do not want to leave it all to him, but rather we want to take that part of it from him which we are able to bear.

The present day has a remarkable resemblance for every genuine National-Socialist to the period of struggle. We have always acted in the same way. We were with the people through thick and thin, and that is why the people followed us. We have always carried our burdens together with the people and, therefore, they did not seem heavy to us, but rather light. The people want to be led. Never in history has the people failed a brave and determined leadership a critical hour.

Let me say a few words in this regard about practical measures in our total war effort that we have already taken.

The problem is freeing soldiers for the front, and freeing workers for the armaments industry. These are the primary goals, even at the cost of our standard of social life. This does not mean a permanent decline in our standard of living. It is only a means to reaching an end, that of total war.

As part of this campaign, hundreds of thousands of military exemptions have been canceled. These exemptions were given because we did not have enough skilled labor to fill the positions that would have been left open by revoking them. The reason for our current measures is to mobilize the necessary workers. That is why we have appealed to men not working in the war economy, and to women who were not working at all. They will not and cannot ignore our call. The duty for women to work is broad. That does not however mean that only those included in the law have to work. Anyone is welcome. The more who join the war effort, the more soldiers we can free for the front.

Our enemies maintain that German women are not able to replace men in the war economy. That may be true for certain fields of heavy labor. But I am convinced that the German woman is determined to fill the spot left by the man leaving for the front, and to do so as soon as possible. We do not need to point-out Bolshevism's example. For years, millions of the best German women have been working successfully in war production, and they wait impatiently to be joined and assisted by others. All those who join in the work are only giving the proper thanks to those at the front. Hundreds of thousands have already joined, and hundreds of thousands more will join. We hope soon to free-up armies of workers who will in turn free-up armies of fighting front soldiers.

I would think little of German women if I believed that they do not want to listen to my appeal. They will not seek to follow the letter of the law, or to slip through its loopholes. They few who may try will not succeed. We will not accept a doctor's excuse. Nor will we accept the alibi that one must help one's husband or relative or good friend as a way of avoiding work. We will respond appropriately. The few who may attempt it will only lose the respect of those around them. The people will despise them. No one expects a woman lacking the requisite physical strength to go to work in a tank factory. There are however numerous jobs in war production that do not demand great physical strength, and which a woman can do even if she comes from the better circles. No one is too good to work, and we all have the choice to give-up what we have, or to lose everything.

It is also time to ask women with household help if they really need it. One can take care of the house and children oneself, freeing the servant for other tasks, or leave the house and children in care of the servant or the « NSV » (Party Welfare Organization) , and go to work oneself. Life may not be as pleasant as it is during peace. But we are not at peace, we are at war. We can be comfortable after we have won the war. Now, we must sacrifice our comforts to gain victory.

Soldiers' wives surely understand this. They know it is their duty to their husbands to support them by doing work that is important to the war effort. That is true above all in agriculture. The wives of farmers must set a good example. Both men and women must be sure that no one does less during war than they did in peace ; more work must instead be done in every area.

One may not, by the way, make the mistake of leaving everything to the government. The government can only set the broad guidelines. To give life to those guidelines is the job of working people, under the inspiring leadership of the Party. Fast action is essential.

One must go beyond the legal requirements. « Volunteer ! » is the slogan. As « Gauleiter » of Berlin, I appeal here above all to my fellow Berliners. They have given enough good examples of noble behavior and bravery during the war such that they will not fail here. Their practical behavior and good cheer even during war have earned them a good name throughout the world. This good name must be maintained and strengthened ! If I appeal to my fellow Berliners to do some important work quickly, thoroughly, and without complaint, I know they will all obey. We do not want to complain about the difficulties of the day or grump to one another. Rather, we want to behave not only like Berliners, but like Germans, by getting to work, acting, seizing the initiative and doing something, not leaving it to someone else.

What German woman would want to ignore my appeal on behalf of those fighting at the front ? Who would want to put personal comfort above national duty ? Who, in view of the serious threat we face, would want to consider his private needs instead of the requirements of the war ?

I reject with contempt the enemy's claim that we are imitating Bolshevism. We do not want to imitate Bolshevism, we want to defeat it, with whatever means are necessary. The German woman will best understand what I mean, for she has long known that the war our men are fighting today above all is a war to protect her children. Her holiest possession is guarded by our people's most valuable blood. The German woman must spontaneously proclaim her solidarity with her fighting men. She had better join the ranks of millions of workers in the homeland's army, and do it tomorrow rather than the day after tomorrow. A river of readiness must flow through the German people. I expect that countless women and above all men who are not doing essential war work will report to the authorities. He who gives quickly gives twice as much.

Our general economy is consolidating. That particularly affects the insurance and banking systems, the tax system, newspapers and magazines that are not essential for the war effort, and non-essential Party and government activities, and also requires a further simplification of our life style.

I know that many of our people are making great sacrifices. I understand their sacrifices, and the government is trying to keep them to the necessary minimum. But some must remain, and must be borne. When the war is over, we will build-up that which we now are eliminating, more generously and more beautifully, and the State will lend its hand.

I energetically reject the charge that our measures will eliminate the middle-class or result in a monopoly economy. The middle-class will regain its economic and social position after the war. The current measures are necessary for the war effort. They aim not at a structural transformation of the economy, but merely at winning the war as quickly as possible.

I do not dispute the fact that these measures will cause worry in the coming weeks. They will give us breathing room. We are laying the groundwork for the coming summer, without paying heed to the threats and boasting of the enemy. I am happy to reveal this plan for victory (Stormy applause.) to the German people. They not only accept these measures, they have demanded them, demanded them more strongly than ever before during the war. The people want action ! It is time for it ! We must use our time to prepare for coming surprises.

I turn now to the entire German people, and particularly to the Party, as the leader of the totalization of our domestic war effort. This is not the 1st major task you have faced. You will bring the usual revolutionary élan to bear on it. You will deal with the laziness and indolence that may occasionally show-up. The government has issued general regulations, and will issue further ones in coming weeks. The minor issues not dealt with in these regulations must be taken care of by the people, under the Party's leadership. One moral law stands above everything for each of us : to do nothing that harms the war effort, and to do everything that brings victory nearer.

In past years, we have often recalled the example of Frederick the Great in newspapers and on the radio. We did not have the right to do so. For a while during the 3rd Silesian War, Frederick II had 5 million Prussians, according to Schlieffen, standing against 90 million enemies. In the 2nd of 7 hellish years, he suffered a defeat that shook Prussia's foundations. He never had enough soldiers and weapons to fight without risking everything. His strategy was always one of improvisation. But his principle was to attack the enemy whenever it was possible. He suffered defeats, but that was not decisive. What was decisive is that the Great King remained unbroken, that he was unshaken by the changing fortunes of war, that his strong heart overcame every danger. At the end of 7 years of war, he was 51 years old, he had no teeth, he suffered from gout, and was tortured by a thousand pains, but he stood above the devastated battlefield as the victor. How does our situation compare with his ?! Let us show the same will and decisiveness as he, and when the time comes do as he did, remaining unshakable through all the twists of fate, and like him win the battle even under the most unfavorable circumstances. Let us never doubt our great cause.

I am firmly convinced that the German people have been deeply moved by the blow of fate at Stalingrad. It has looked into the face of hard and pitiless war. It knows now the awful truth, and is resolved to follow the « Führer » through thick and thin. (The crowd rises and like the roaring ocean chants : « “ Führer ” command, we follow ! Heil our “ Führer ” ! » . The Minister is unable to continue for several minutes.)

The English and American press, in recent days, has been writing at length about the attitude of the German people during this crisis. The English seem to think that they know the German people much better than we do, its own leadership. They give hypocritical advice on what we should do and not do. They believe that the German people today is the same as the German people of November 1918 that fell victim to their persuasive wiles. I do not need to disprove their assertions. That will come from the fighting and working German people.

To make the truth plain, however, my German comrades, I want to ask you a series of questions. I want you to answer them to the best of your knowledge, according to your conscience. When my audience cheered on 30 January, the English press reported the next day that it was all a propaganda show that did not represent the true opinion of the German people. (Spontaneous shouts of « Pfui ! » , « Lies ! » , « Let them come here ! They will learn differently ! » .) I have invited to today's meeting a cross-section of the German people in the best sense of the word. (The Minister's words were accompanied by stormy applause that increased in intensity as he came to the representatives of the army present at the meeting.) In front of me are rows of wounded German soldiers from the Eastern Front, missing legs and arms, with wounded bodies, those who have lost their sight, those who have come with nurses, men in the blush of youth who stand with crutches. Among them are 50 who bear the Knight's Cross with Oak Leaves, shining examples of our fighting front. Behind them are armaments workers from Berlin tank factories. Behind them are Party officials, soldiers from the fighting army, doctors, scientists, artists, engineers and architects, teachers, officials and employees from offices, proud representatives of every area of our intellectual life that even in the midst of war produce miracles of human genius. Throughout the « Sportpalast » , I see thousands of German women. The youth is here, as are the aged. No class, no occupation, no age remained uninvited. I can rightly say that before me is gathered a representative sample of the German population, both from the homeland and the front. Is that true ? Yes or no ? (The « Sportpalast » experiences something seen only rarely even in this old fighting locale of National-Socialism. The masses spring to their feet. A hurricane of thousands of voices shouts « yes » . The participants experience a spontaneous popular referendum and expression of will.) You, my hearers, at this moment, represent the whole nation. I wish to ask you 10 questions that you will answer for the German people throughout the world, but especially for our enemies, who are listening to us on the radio. (Only with difficulty can the Minister be heard. The crowd is at the peak of excitement. The individual questions are razor sharp. Each individual feels as if he is being spoken to personally. With full participation and enthusiasm, the crowd answers each question. The « Sportpalast » rings with a single shout of agreement.)

Ist, the English maintain that the German people has lost faith in victory.

I ask you : Do you believe with the « Führer » and us in the final total victory of the German people ?

I ask you : Are you resolved to follow the « Führer » through thick and thin to victory, and are you willing to accept the heaviest personal burdens ?

2nd, The English say that the German people are tired of fighting.

I ask you : Are you ready to follow the « Führer » as the phalanx of the homeland, standing behind the fighting army and to wage war with wild determination through all the turns of fate until victory is ours ?

3rd, the English maintain that the German people have no desire any longer to accept the government's growing demands for war work.

I ask you : Are you and the German people willing to work, if the « Führer » orders, 10, 12 and, if necessary, 14 hours a day and to give everything for victory ?

4th, the English maintain that the German people is resisting the government's total war measures. It does not want total war, but capitulation ! (Shouts : « Never ! Never ! Never ! » .)

I ask you : Do you want total war ? If necessary, do you want a war more total and radical than anything that we can even imagine today ?

5th, the English maintain that the German people have lost faith in the « Führer » .

I ask you : Is your confidence in the « Führer » greater, more faithful and more unshakable than ever before ? Are you absolutely and completely ready to follow him wherever he goes and do all that is necessary to bring the war to a victorious end ? (The crowd rises as one man. It displays unprecedented enthusiasm. Thousands of voices join in shouting : « “ Führer ” command, we follow ! » . A wave of shouts of « Heil » flows through the hall. As if by command, the flags and standards are raised as the highest expression of the sacred moment in which the crowd honours the « Führer » .)

6th, I ask you : Are you ready, from now on, to give your full strength to provide the Eastern Front with the men and munitions it needs to give Bolshevism the death blow ?

7th, I ask you : Do you take a holy oath to the front that the homeland stands firm behind them, and that you will give them everything they need to win the victory ?

8th, I ask you : Do you, especially you women, want the government to do all it can to encourage German women to put their full strength at work to support the war effort, and to release men for the front whenever possible, thereby helping the men at the front ?

9th, I ask you : Do you approve, if necessary, the most radical measures against a small group of shirkers and black marketers who pretend there is peace in the middle of war and use the need of the nation for their own selfish purposes ? Do you agree that those who harm the war effort should lose their heads ?

10th and lastly, I ask you : Do you agree that above all in war, according to the National-Socialist Party platform, the same rights and duties should apply to all, that the homeland should bear the heavy burdens of the war together, and that the burdens should be shared equally between high and low and rich and poor ?

I have asked ; you have given me your answers. You are part of the people, and your answers are those of the German people. You have told our enemies what they needed to hear so that they will have no illusions or false ideas.

Now, just as in the 1st hours of our rule and through the 10 years that followed, we are bound firmly in brotherhood with the German people. The most powerful ally on earth, the people itself, stands behind us and is determined to follow the « Führer » , come what may. They will accept the heaviest burdens to gain victory. What power on earth can hinder us from reaching our goal. Now we must and will succeed ! I stand before you, not only as the spokesman of the government, but as the spokesman of the people. My old Party friends are here around me, clothed with the high offices of the people and the government. Party comrade Speer sits next to me. The « Führer » has given him the great task of mobilizing the German armaments industry and supplying the front with all the weapons it needs. Party comrade Doctor Ley sits next to me. The « Führer » has charged him with the leadership of the German work force, with schooling and training them in untiring work for the war effort. We feel deeply indebted to our Party comrade Sauckel, who has been charged by the « Führer » to bring hundreds of thousands of workers to the « Reich » to support our national economy, something the enemy cannot do. All the leaders of the Party, the army, and government join with us as well.

We are all children of our people, forged together by this most critical hour of our national history. We promise you, we promise the front, we promise the « Führer » , that we will mold together the homeland into a force on which the « Führer » and his fighting soldiers can rely on absolutely and blindly. We pledge to do all in our life and work that is necessary for victory. We will fill our hearts with the political passion, with the ever-burning fire that blazed during the great struggles of the Party and the State. Never, during this war, will we fall prey to the false and hypocritical objectivism that has brought the German nation so much misfortune over its history.

When the war began, we turned our eyes to the nation alone. That which serves its struggle for life is good and must be encouraged. What harms its struggle for life is bad and must be eliminated and cut-out. With burning hearts and cool heads, we will overcome the major problems of this phase of the war. We are on the way to final victory. That victory rests on our faith in the « Führer » .

This evening, I once again remind the whole nation of its duty. The « Führer » expects us to do that which will throw all we have done in the past into the shadows. We do not want to fail him. As we are proud of him, he should be proud of us.

The great crises and upsets of national life show who the true men and women are. We have no right any longer to speak of the weaker sex, for both sexes are displaying the same determination and spiritual strength. The nation is ready for anything. The « Führer » has commanded, and we will follow him. In this hour of national reflection and contemplation, we believe firmly and unshakably in victory. We see it before us, we need only reach for it. We must resolve to subordinate everything to it. That is the duty of the hour. Let the slogan be :

« Now, people rise-up and let the storm break loose ! »

(The Minister's final words were lost in unending stormy applause.)

Nun, Volk, steh auf, und Sturm brich los !

Rede im Berliner Sportpalast 18. Februar 1943 von Doktor Josef Goebbels :

Es ist jetzt knapp drei Wochen her, daß ich das letzte Mal bei Gelegenheit der Verlesung der Proklamation des Führers zum Zehnjahrestag der Machtergreifung von dieser Stelle aus zu Ihnen und zum deutschen Volke gesprochen habe. Die Krise, in der sich unsere Ostfront augenblicklich befindet, stand damals auf dem Höhepunkt. Wir hatten uns im Zeichen des harten Unglücksschlages, von dem die Nation im Kampf um die Wolga betroffen wurde, am 30. Januar dieses Jahres zusammengefunden zu einer Kundgebung der Einheit, der Geschlossenheit, aber auch der festen Willenskraft, mit den Schwierigkeiten, die dieser Krieg in seinem vierten Jahre vor uns aufbürdet, fertig zu werden.

Es war für mich und wohl auch für Sie alle erschütternd, einige Tage später zu vernehmen, daß die letzten heldenhaften Kämpfer von Stalingrad, in dieser Stunde durch die Ätherwellen mit uns verbunden, an unserer erhebenden Sportpalastkundgebung teilgenommen haben. Sie funkten in ihrem Schlußbericht, daß sie die Proklamation des Führers vernommen und vielleicht zum letzten Male in ihrem Leben mit uns zusammen mit erhobenen Händen die Nationalhymnen gesungen hätten. Welch eine Haltung deutschen Soldatentums in dieser großen Zeit ! Welche Verpflichtung aber schließt diese Haltung auch für uns alle, insbesondere für die ganze deutsche Heimat in sich ein ! Stalingrad war und ist der große Alarmruf des Schicksals an die deutsche Nation. Ein Volk, das die Stärke besitzt, ein solches Unglück zu ertragen und auch zu überwinden, ja, daraus noch zusätzliche Kraft zu schöpfen, ist unbesiegbar. Das Gedächtnis an die Helden von Stalingrad soll also auch heute bei meiner Rede vor Ihnen und vor dem deutschen Volke eine tiefe Verpflichtung mich und für uns alle sein.

Ich weiß nicht, wie viele Millionen Menschen, über die Ätherwellen mit uns verbunden, heute Abend an der Front und in der Heimat an dieser Kundgebung teilnehmen und meine Zuhörer sind. Ich möchte zu Ihnen allen aus tiefstem Herzen zum tiefsten Herzen sprechen. Ich glaube, das gesamte deutsche Volk ist mit heißer Leidenschaft bei der Sache, die ich Ihnen heute Abend vorzutragen habe. Ich will deshalb meine Ausführungen auch mit dem ganzen heiligen Ernst und dem offenen Freimut, den die Stunde von uns erfordert, ausstatten. Das im Nationalsozialismus erzogene, geschulte und disziplinierte deutsche Volk kann die volle Wahrheit vertragen. Es weiß, wie schwierig es um die Lage des Reiches bestellt ist, und seine Führung kann es deshalb gerade auch auffordern, aus der Bedrängtheit der Situation die nötigen harten, ja auch härtesten Folgerungen zu ziehen. Wir Deutschen sind gewappnet gegen Schwäche und Anfälligkeit, und Schläge und Unglücksfälle des Krieges verleihen uns nur zusätzliche Kraft, feste Entschlossenheit und eine seelische und kämpferische Aktivität, die bereit ist, alle Schwierigkeiten und Hindernisse mit revolutionärem Elan zu überwinden.

Es ist jetzt nicht der Augenblick, danach zu fragen, wie alles gekommen ist. Das wird einer späteren Rechenschaftslegung überlassen bleiben, die in voller Offenheit erfolgen soll und dem deutschen Volke und der Weltöffentlichkeit zeigen wird, daß das Unglück, das uns in den letzten Wochen betroffen hat, seine tiefe, schicksalhafte Bedeutung besitzt. Das große Heldenopfer, das unsere Soldaten in Stalingrad brachten, ist für die ganze Ostfront von einer auschlaggebenden geschichtlichen Bedeutung gewesen. Es war nicht umsonst. Warum, das wird die Zukunft beweisen.

Wenn ich nunmehr über die jüngste Vergangenheit hinaus den Blick wieder nach vorne lenke, so tue ich das mit voller Absicht. Die Stunde drängt ! Sie läßt keine Zeit mehr offen für fruchtlose Debatten. Wir müssen handeln, und zwar unverzüglich, schnell und gründlich, so wie es seit jeher nationalsozialistische Art gewesen ist.

Von ihrem Anfang an ist die Bewegung in den vielen Krisen, die sie durchzustehen und durchzukämpfen hatte, so verfahren. Und auch der nationalsozialistische Staat hat sich, wenn eine Bedrohung vor ihm auftauchte, ihr mit entschlossener Willenskraft entgegen geworfen. Wir gleichen nicht dem Vogel Strauß, der den Kopf in den Sand steckt, um die Gefahr nicht zu sehen. Wir sind mutig genug, sie unmittelbar ins Auge zu nehmen, sie kühl und rücksichtslos abzumessen und ihr dann erhobenen Hauptes und mit fester Entschlusskraft entgegenzutreten. Erst dann entwickelten wir als Bewegung und als Volk immer auch unsere höchsten Tugenden, nämlich einen wilden und entschloßenen Willen, die Gefahr zu brechen und zu bannen, eine Stärke des Charakters, die alle Hindernisse überwindet, zähe Verbissenheit in der Verfolgung des einmal erkannten Zieles und ein ehernes Herz, das gegen alle inneren und äußeren Anfechtungen gewappnet ist. So soll es auch heute sein. Ich habe die Aufgabe, Ihnen ein ungeschminktes Bild der Lage zu entwerfen und daraus die harten Konsequenzen für das Handeln der deutschen Führung, aber auch für das Handeln des deutschen Volkes zu ziehen.

Wir durchleben im Osten augenblicklich eine schwere militärische Belastung. Diese Belastung hat zeitweilig größere Ausmaße angenommen und gleicht, wenn nicht in der Art der Anlage, so doch in ihrem Umfang der des vergangenen Winters. Über ihre Ursachen wird später einmal zu sprechen sein. Heute bleibt uns nichts anderes übrig, als ihr Vorhandensein festzustellen und die Mittel und Wege zu überprüfen und anzuwenden beziehungsweise einzuschlagen, die zu ihrer Behebung führen. Es hat deshalb auch gar keinen Zweck, diese Belastung selbst zu bestreiten. Ich bin mir zu gut dazu, Ihnen ein täuschendes Bild der Lage zu geben, das nur zu falschen Folgerungen führen könnte und geeignet wäre, das deutsche Volk in eine Sicherheit seiner Lebensführung und seines Handelns einzuwiegen, die der gegenwärtigen Situation durchaus unangepasst wäre.

Der Ansturm der Steppe gegen unseren ehrwürdigen Kontinent ist in diesem Winter mit einer Wucht losgebrochen, die alle menschlichen und geschichtlichen Vorstellungen in den Schatten stellt. Die deutsche Wehrmacht bildet dagegen mit ihren Verbündeten den einzigen überhaupt in Frage kommenden Schutzwall. Der « Führer » hat schon in seiner Proklamation zum 30. Januar mit ernsten und eindringlichen Worten die Frage aufgeworfen, was aus Deutschland und aus Europa geworden wäre, wenn am 30. Januar 1933 statt der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung ein bürgerliches oder ein demokratisches Regime die Macht übernommen hätte ! Welche Gefahren wären dann, schneller als wir es damals ahnen konnten, über das Reich hereingebrochen, und welche Abwehrkräfte hätten uns noch zur Verfügung gestanden, um ihnen zu begegnen ?

Zehn Jahre Nationalsozialismus haben genügt, das deutsche Volk über den Ernst der schicksalhaften Problematik, die aus dem östlichen Bolschewismus entspringt, vollkommen aufzuklären. Man wird jetzt auch verstehen, warum wir unsere Nürnberger Parteitage so oft unter das Signum des Kampfes gegen den Bolschewismus gestellt haben. Wir erhoben damals unsere warnende Stimme vor dem deutschen Volk und vor der Weltöffentlichkeit, um die von einer Willens- und Geisteslähmung ohnegleichen befallene abendländische Menschheit zum Erwachen zu bringen und ihr die Augen zu öffnen für die grauenerregenden geschichtlichen Gefahren, die aus dem Vorhandensein des östlichen Bolschewismus erwachsen, der ein Volk von fast 200 Millionen dem jüdischen Terror dienstbar gemacht hatte und es zum Angriffskrieg gegen Europa vorbereitete. Als der « Führer » die deutsche Wehrmacht am 22. Juni 1941 im Osten zum Angriff antreten ließ, waren wir uns alle im Klaren darüber, daß damit überhaupt der entscheidende Kampf dieses gigantischen Weltringens anbrach. Wir wussten, welche Gefahren und Schwierigkeiten er für uns mit sich bringen würde. Wir waren uns aber auch klar darüber, daß die Gefahren und Schwierigkeiten bei längerem Zuwarten nur wachsen, niemals aber abnehmen könnten. Es war zwei Minuten vor zwölf. Ein weiteres Zögern hätte leicht zur Vernichtung des Reiches und zur vollkommenen Bolschewisierung des europäischen Kontinents geführt.

Es ist verständlich, daß wir bei den groß angelegten Tarnungs- und Bluffmanövern des bolschewistischen Regimes das Kriegspotential der Sowjetunion nicht richtig eingeschätzt haben. Erst jetzt offenbart es sich uns in seiner ganzen wilden Größe. Dementsprechend ist auch der Kampf, den unsere Soldaten im Osten zu bestehen haben, über alle menschlichen Vorstellungen hinaus hart, schwer und gefährlich. Er erfordert die Aufbietung unserer ganzen nationalen Kraft. Hier ist eine Bedrohung des Reiches und des europäischen Kontinents gegeben, die alle bisherigen Gefahren des Abendlandes weit in den Schatten stellt. Würden wir in diesem Kampf versagen, so verspielten wir damit überhaupt unsere geschichtliche Mission. Alles, was wir bisher aufgebaut und geleistet haben, verblasst angesichts der gigantischen Aufgabe, die hier der deutschen Wehrmacht unmittelbar und dem deutschen Volke mittelbar gestellt ist.

Ich wende mich in meinen Ausführungen zuerst an die Weltöffentlichkeit und proklamiere ihr gegenüber drei Thesen unseres Kampfes gegen die bolschewistische Gefahr im Osten. Die erste dieser drei Thesen lautet : Wäre die deutsche Wehrmacht nicht in der Lage, die Gefahr aus dem Osten zu brechen, so wäre damit das Reich und in kurzer Folge ganz Europa dem Bolschewismus verfallen.

Die zweite dieser Thesen lautet : Die deutsche Wehrmacht und das deutsche Volk allein besitzen mit ihren Verbündeten die Kraft, eine grundlegende Rettung Europas aus dieser Bedrohung durchzuführen.

Die dritte dieser Thesen lautet : Gefahr ist im Verzuge. Es muß schnell und gründlich gehandelt werden, sonst ist es zu spät.

Zur ersten These habe ich im Einzelnen zu bemerken : Der Bolschewismus hat seit jeher ganz offen das Ziel proklamiert, nicht nur Europa, sondern die ganze Welt zu revolutionieren und sie in ein bolschewistisches Chaos zu stürzen. Dieses Ziel ist seit Beginn der bolschewistischen Sowjetunion seitens des Kremls ideologisch vertreten und praktisch verfochten worden. Es ist klar, daß Stalin und die anderen Sowjetgrößen, je mehr sie glauben, sich der Verwirklichung ihrer weltzerstörerischen Absichten zu nähern, umso mehr auch bestrebt sind, diese zu tarnen und zu verschleiern. Das kann uns nicht beirren. Wir gehören nicht zu jenen furchtsamen Gemütern, die wie das hypnotisierte Kaninchen auf die Schlange schauen, bis sie es verschlingt. Wir wollen die Gefahr rechtzeitig erkennen und ihr auch rechtzeitig mit wirksamen Mitteln entgegentreten. Wir durchschauen nicht nur die Ideologie, sondern auch die Praktiken des Bolschewismus, denn wir haben uns schon einmal mit ihnen, und zwar mit denkbar größtem Erfolg, auf innerpolitischem Felde auseinandergesetzt. Uns kann der Kreml nichts vormachen. Wir haben in einem vierzehnjährigen Kampf vor der Machtübernahme und in einem zehnjährigen Kampf nach der Machtübernahme seine Absichten und infamen Weltbetrugsmanöver demaskiert.

Das Ziel des Bolschewismus ist die Weltrevolution der Juden. Sie wollen das Chaos über das Reich und über Europa hereinführen, um in der daraus entstehenden Hoffnungslosigkeit und Verzweiflung der Völker ihre internationale, bolschewistisch verschleierte kapitalistische Tyrannei aufzurichten.

Was das für das deutsche Volk bedeuten würde, braucht nicht näher erläutert zu werden. Es würde mit der Bolschewisierung des Reiches eine Liquidierung unserer gesamten Intelligenz- und Führungsschicht und als Folge davon die Überführung der arbeitenden Massen in die bolschewistisch-jüdische Sklaverei nach sich ziehen. Man sucht in Moskau Zwangsarbeitsbataillone, wie der « Führer » in seiner Proklamation zum 30. Januar schon sagte, für die sibirischen Tundren. Der Aufstand der Steppe macht sich vor unseren Fronten bereit, und der Ansturm des Ostens, der in täglich sich steigender Stärke gegen unsere Linien anbrandet, ist nichts anderes als die versuchte Wiederholung der geschichtlichen Verheerungen, die früher schon so oft unseren Erdteil gefährdet haben.

Damit aber ist auch eine unmittelbare akute Lebensbedrohung für alle europäischen Mächte gegeben. Man soll nicht glauben, daß der Bolschewismus, hätte er die Gelegenheit, seinen Siegeszug über das Reich anzutreten, irgendwo an unseren Grenzen Halt machen würde. Er treibt eine Aggressionspolitik und Aggressionskriegführung, die ausgesprochen auf die Bolschewisierung aller Länder und Völker ausgeht. Papierene Erklärungen, die von Seiten des Kremls oder als Garantieverpflichtungen von Seiten Londons oder Washingtons gegen diese nicht zu bestreitenden Absichten abgegeben werden, imponieren uns nicht. Wir wissen, daß wir es im Osten mit einer infernalischen politischen Teufelei zu tun haben, die die sonst unter Menschen und Staaten üblichen Beziehungen nicht anerkennt. Wenn beispielsweise der englische Lord Beaverbrook erklärt, daß Europa dem Sowjetismus zur Führung überantwortet werden müße, wenn ein maßgeblicher amerikanisch-jüdischer Journalist Brown diese These durch die zynische Verlautbarung ergänzt, daß eine Bolschewisierung Europas vielleicht überhaupt die Lösung unseres kontinentalen Problems darstellte, so wissen wir genau, was damit gemeint ist. Die europäischen Mächte stehen hier vor ihrer entscheidenden Lebensfrage. Das Abendland ist in Gefahr. Ob ihre Regierungen und ihre Intelligenzschichten das einsehen wollen oder nicht, ist dabei gänzlich unerheblich.

Das deutsche Volk jedenfalls ist nicht gewillt, sich dieser Gefahr auch nur versuchsweise preiszugeben. Hinter den anstürmenden Sowjetdivisionen sehen wir schon die jüdischen Liquidationskommandos, hinter diesen aber erhebt sich der Terror, das Gespenst des Millionenhungers und einer vollkommenen Anarchie. Hier erweist sich wiederum das internationale Judentum als das teuflische Ferment der Dekomposition, das eine geradezu zynische Genugtuung dabei empfindet, die Welt in ihre tiefste Unordnung zu stürzen und damit den Untergang jahrtausendealter Kulturen, an denen es niemals einen inneren Anteil hatte, herbeizuführen. Wir wissen damit also, vor welcher geschichtlichen Aufgabe wir stehen. Eine zweitausendjährige Aufbauarbeit der abendländischen Menschheit ist in Gefahr. Man kann diese Gefahr gar nicht ernst genug schildern, aber es ist auch bezeichnend, daß wenn man sie nur beim Namen nennt, das internationale Judentum in allen Ländern dagegen mit lärmenden Ausführungen Protest erhebt. So weit also ist es in Europa schon gekommen, daß man eine Gefahr nicht mehr eine Gefahr nennen darf, wenn sie eben vom Judentum ausgeht.

Das aber hindert uns nicht daran, die dazu notwendigen Feststellungen zu treffen. Wir haben das auch früher in unserem innerpolitischen Kampfe getan, als das kommunistische Judentum sich des demokratischen Judentums im « Berliner Tageblatt » und in der « Vossischen Zeitung » bediente, um eine Gefahr, die von Tag zu Tag drohender wurde, zu verniedlichen und zu bagatellisieren, um damit die von ihr bedrohten Teile unseres Volkes in Sicherheit einzuwiegen und ihre Abwehrkräfte einzuschläfern. Wir sähen, wenn wir dieser Gefahr nicht Herr würden, im Geiste schon das Gespenst des Hungers, des Elends und einer Millionenzwangsarbeit für das deutsche Volk heraufziehen, sähen den ehrwürdigsten Erdteil in seinen Grundfesten wanken und unter seinen Trümmern das geschichtliche Erbe der abendländischen Menschheit begraben. Das ist das Problem, vor dem wir stehen.

Meine zweite These lautet : Allein das Deutsche Reich mit seinen Verbündeten ist in der Lage, die eben geschilderte Gefahr zu bannen. Die europäischen Staaten einschließlich Englands behaupten, stark genug zu sein, einer Bolschewisierung des europäischen Kontinents, sollte sie einmal praktisch gegeben sein, rechtzeitig und wirksam entgegenzutreten. Diese Erklärung ist kindisch und verdient überhaupt keine Widerlegung. Sollte die stärkste Militärmacht der Welt nicht in der Lage sein, die Drohung des Bolschewismus zu brechen, wer brächte dann noch die Kraft dazu auf ? (Hier antworten stürmische Rufe aus der im Sportpalast versammelten Menge : « Niemand ! ») Die neutralen europäischen Staaten besitzen weder das Potential noch die militärischen Machtmittel noch die geistige Einstellung ihrer Völker, um dem Bolschewismus auch nur den geringsten Widerstand entgegenzusetzen. Sie würden im Bedarfsfall von seinen motorisierten Roboterdivisionen in wenigen Tagen überfahren werden. In den Hauptstädten der mittleren und kleinen europäischen Staaten tröstet man sich mit der Absicht, man müße sich gegen die bolschewistische Gefahr seelisch rüsten. (Heiterkeit.) Das erinnert verzweifelt an die Erklärungen der bürgerlichen Mittelparteien aus dem Jahre 1932, daß der Kampf gegen den Kommunismus nur mit geistigen Waffen ausgefochten und gewonnen werden könne. Diese Behauptung war uns auch damals zu albern, als daß wir uns damit auseinandergesetzt hätten. Der östliche Bolschewismus ist nicht nur eine terroristische Lehre, sondern auch eine terroristische Praxis. Er verfolgt seine Ziele und Zwecke mit einer infernalischen Gründlichkeit, unter restloser Ausschöpfung seines inneren Potentials und ohne jede Rücksichtnahme auf Glück, Wohlstand und Frieden der von ihm unterjochten Völkerschaften. Was wollten England und Amerika tun, wenn der europäische Kontinent im größten Unglücksfall dem Bolschewismus in die Arme fiel ? Will man Europa von London aus vielleicht einreden, daß eine solche Entwicklung an der Kanalgrenze Halt machen würde ?

Ich habe schon einmal darauf hingewiesen, daß der Bolschewismus seine Fremdenlegionen auf dem Boden aller demokratischen Staaten bereits in den kommunistischen Parteien stehen hat. Keiner dieser Staaten kann von sich behaupten, gegen eine innere Bolschewisierung immun zu sein. Eine jüngst vorgenommene Nachwahl zum englischen Unterhaus ergab, daß der unabhängige, das heißt kommunistische Kandidat in einem Wahlkreis, der bisher unumschränkte Domäne der Konservativen war, von insgesamt 22371 Stimmen 10741 erhielt, das heißt, daß die Rechtsparteien allein in diesem einen Kreise im Verlaufe von nur kurzer Zeit rund 10000, also die Hälfte aller Wählerstimmen an die Kommunisten verloren, ein Beweis mehr dafür, daß die bolschewistische Gefahr auch in England gegeben ist und daß sie nicht dadurch gebannt wird, daß man sie nicht sehen will. Alle territorialen Verpflichtungen, die die Sowjetunion auf sich nimmt, besitzen in unseren Augen keinen effektiven Wert. Der Bolschewismus pflegt seine Grenzen auch ideologisch und nicht nur militärisch zu ziehen, und darin ist eben seine über die Grenzen der Völker hinwegspringende Gefahr gegeben. Die Welt hat also nicht die Wahl zwischen einem in seine alte Zersplitterung zurückfallenden und einem unter der Achsenführung sich neu ordnenden Europa, sondern nur die zwischen einem unter dem militärischen Schutz der Achse stehenden und einem bolschewistischen Europa.

Darüber hinaus bin ich der festen Überzeugung, daß die lamentierenden Lords und Erzbischöfe in London überhaupt nicht einmal die Absicht haben, der bolschewistischen Gefahr, die bei einem weiteren Vordringen der Sowjetarmeen für die europäischen Staaten gegeben wäre, praktisch entgegenzutreten. Das Judentum hat die angelsächsischen Staaten geistig und politisch schon so tief durchdrungen, daß sie diese Gefahr überhaupt nicht mehr sehen und wahr haben wollen. Wie es sich in der Sowjetunion bolschewistisch tarnt, so tarnt es sich in den angelsächsischen Staaten plutokratisch-kapitalistisch. Die Methoden der Mimikry sind bei der jüdischen Rasse bekannt. Sie geht seit jeher darauf aus, ihre Gastvölker einzuschläfern und damit ihre Abwehrkräfte gegen von ihr stammende akute und lebensgefährdende Bedrohungen zu lähmen. (Zurufe aus der Menge : « Wir haben sie erlebt ! ») Unsere Einsicht in diese Problematik hat uns schon früh die Erkenntnis vermittelt, daß das Zusammengehen zwischen internationaler Plutokratie und internationalem Bolschewismus durchaus keinen Widersinn, sondern einen tiefen und ursächlichen Sinn darstellt. Über unser Land hinweg reichen sich bereits das westeuropäische scheinzivilisierte Judentum und das Judentum des östlichen Ghettos die Hände. Damit ist Europa in Todesgefahr.

Ich schmeichle mir nicht, mit diesen Ausführungen die öffentliche Meinung in den neutralen oder gar in den feindlichen Staaten alarmieren zu können. Das ist auch nicht ihr Zweck und ihre Absicht. Ich weiß, daß die englische Presse morgen mit einem wütenden Gekläff über mich herfallen wird, ich hätte angesichts unserer Belastung an der Ostfront die ersten Friedensfühler ausgestreckt. (Stürmisches Gelächter.) Davon kann überhaupt keine Rede sein. In Deutschland denkt heute kein Mensch an einen faulen Kompromiss, das ganze Volk denkt nur an einen harten Krieg. Ich beanspruche aber als ein verantwortlicher Sprecher des führenden Landes dieses Kontinents für mich das souveräne Recht, eine Gefahr eine Gefahr zu nennen, wenn sie nicht nur unser eigenes Land, sondern unseren ganzen Erdteil bedroht. Als Nationalsozialisten haben wir die Pflicht, Alarm zu schlagen gegen die versuchte Chaotisierung des europäischen Kontinents durch das internationale Judentum, das sich im Bolschewismus eine terroristische Militärmacht aufgebaut hat, deren Bedrohlichkeit überhaupt nicht überschätzt werden kann.

Die dritte These, die ich hier näher erläutern will, ist die, daß Gefahr unmittelbar im Verzuge ist. Die Lähmungserscheinungen der westeuropäischen Demokratien gegen ihre tödlichste Bedrohung sind herzbeklemmend. Das internationale Judentum fördert sie mit allen Kräften. Genau so, wie der Widerstand gegen den Kommunismus in unserem Kampf um die Macht in unserem eigenen Lande von den jüdischen Zeitungen künstlich eingeschlafert und nur durch den Nationalsozialismus wieder erweckt wurde, genau so ist das heute bei den anderen Völkern der Fall. Das Judentum erweist sich hier wieder einmal als die Inkarnation des Bösen, als plastischer Dämon des Verfalls und als Träger eines internationalen kulturzerstörerischen Chaos.

Man wird, um das hier nur zu erwähnen, in diesem Zusammenhang auch unsere konsequente Judenpolitik verstehen können. Wir sehen im Judentum für jedes Land eine unmittelbare Gefahr gegeben. Wie andere Völker sich gegen diese Gefahr zur Wehr setzen, ist uns gleichgültig. Wie wir uns aber dagegen zur Wehr setzen, das ist unsere eigene Sache, in die wir keinerlei Einsprüche dulden. Das Judentum stellt eine infektiöse Erscheinung dar, die ansteckend wirkt. Wenn das feindliche Ausland gegen unsere antijüdische Politik scheinheilig Protest einlegt und über unsere Maßnahmen gegen das Judentum heuchlerische Krokodilstränen vergießt, so kann uns das nicht daran hindern, das Notwendige zu tun. Deutschland jedenfalls hat nicht die Absicht, sich dieser Bedrohung zu beugen, sondern vielmehr die, ihr rechtzeitig und wenn nötig mit den radikalsten Gegenmaßnahmen entgegenzutreten. (Minutenlang hindern nach diesen Sätzen zustimmende Sprechchöre den Minister am Weiterreden.)

Im Zeichen all dieser Überlegungen steht die militärische Belastung des Reiches im Osten. Der Krieg der mechanisierten Roboter gegen Deutschland und gegen Europa ist auf seinen Höhepunkt gestiegen. Das deutsche Volk erfüllt mit seinen Achsenpartnern im wahrsten Sinne des Wortes eine europäische Mission, wenn es dieser unmittelbaren und ersten Lebensbedrohung mit den Waffen entgegentritt. Wir laßen uns nicht durch das Geschrei des internationalen Judentums in aller Welt in der mutigen und aufrechten Fortführung des gigantischen Kampfes gegen diese Weltpest beirren. Er kann und darf nur mit Sieg enden. (Hier ertönen laute Zwischenrufe : « Deutsche Männer, ans Gewehr ! Deutsche Frauen, an die Arbeit ! »)

Das Ringen um Stalingrad wurde in seiner tragischen Verwicklung geradezu zu einem Symbol dieses heroischen, männlichen Widerstandes gegen den Aufruhr der Steppe. Es hatte deshalb nicht nur eine militärische, sondern auch eine geistige und seelische Bedeutung für das deutsche Volk von tiefstgreifender Wirkung. Erst hier sind uns unsere Augen für die aus diesem Kriege erwachsende Problematik vollkommen geöffnet worden. Wir wollen jetzt gar nichts mehr von falschen Hoffnungen und Illusionen hören. Wir wollen den Tatsachen, und wenn sie noch so hart und grausam sind, mutig in die Augen schauen. Denn jedes Mal noch hat es sich in der Geschichte unserer Partei und unseres Staates erwiesen, daß eine erkannte Gefahr bald schon auch eine gebannte Gefahr ist. Im Zeichen dieses heroischen Widerstandes stehen unsere weiteren schwersten Abwehrkämpfe im Osten. Sie beanspruchen unsere Soldaten und ihre Waffen in einem Umfange, der uns bei allen bisherigen Feldzügen vollkommen unbekannt gewesen ist. Im Osten tobt ein Krieg ohne Gnade. Der « Führer » hat ihn richtig charakterisiert, als er erklärte, es werden aus ihm nicht Sieger und Besiegte, sondern nur noch Überlebende und Vernichtete hervorgehen.

Das deutsche Volk hat das ganz klar erkannt. Mit seinem gesunden Instinkt hat es sich auf eigene Weise einen Weg durch das Gestrüpp der tagesaktuell bedingten geistigen und seelischen Schwierigkeiten dieses Krieges gebahnt. Wir wissen heute genau, daß der Blitzkrieg des Polen- und Wesfeldzuges für den Osten nur noch eine bedingte Gültigkeit hat. Hier kämpft die deutsche Nation um ihr alles. Wir sind in diesem Kampf zu der Erkenntnis gekommen, daß das deutsche Volk hier seine heiligsten Güter, seine Familien, seine Frauen und seine Kinder, die Schönheit und Unberührtheit seiner Landschaft, seine Städte und Dörfer, das zweitausendjährige Erbe seiner Kultur und alles, was uns das Leben lebenswert macht, zu verteidigen hat.

Für diese Schätze unseres reichen Volkstums hat der Bolschewismus natürlich nicht das geringste Verständnis, und er würde auch im Bedarfsfalle darauf nicht die geringste Rücksicht nehmen. Er tut das ja nicht einmal seinem eigenen Volke gegenüber. Die Sowjetunion hat das bolschewistische Kriegspotential seit 25 Jahren in einem Umfange ausgeschöpft, der für uns gänzlich unvorstellbar war und deshalb von uns auch falsch eingeschätzt wurde. Das terroristische Judentum hat sich in Russland 200 Millionen Menschen dienstbar gemacht, dabei seine zynischen Methoden und Praktiken mit der stumpfen Zähigkeit der russischen Rasse vermählt, die deshalb eine um so größere Gefahr für die europäischen Kulturvölker darstellt. Im Osten wird ein ganzes Volk zum Kampf gezwungen. Hier werden Männer, Frauen, ja Kinder nicht nur in die Rüstungsfabriken, sondern auch in den Krieg getrieben. 200 Millionen stehen uns hier teils unter dem Terror der GPU, teils befangen in einer teuflischen Anschauung, mit wilder Stumpfheit gegenüber. Die Massen von Panzern, die in diesem Winter unsere östliche Front berennen, sind das Ergebnis eines 25jährigen sozialen Unglücks und Elends des bolschewistischen Volkes. Dagegen müßen wir mit entsprechenden Gegenmaßnahmen antreten, wenn wir nicht das Spiel als verloren aufgeben wollen.

Ich gebe meiner festen Überzeugung Ausdruck, daß wir die bolschewistische Gefahr auf die Dauer nur niederringen können, wenn wir ihr, wenn auch nicht mit gleichen, so doch mit gleichwertigen Methoden entgegentreten. Die deutsche Nation steht damit vor der ernstesten Frage dieses Krieges, nämlich der, die Entschloßenheit aufzubringen, alles einzusetzen, um alles, was sie besitzt, zu erhalten, und alles, was sie zum späteren Leben nötig hat, dazu zu gewinnen. Der totale Krieg also ist das Gebot der Stunde. Es muß jetzt zu Ende sein mit den bürgerlichen Zimperlichkeiten, die auch in diesem Schicksalskampf nach dem Grundsatz verfahren wollen : Wasch mir den Pelz, aber mach mich nicht nass ! (Jeder Satz des Ministers wird von wachsendem Beifall und stärkster Zustimmung begleitet.) Die Gefahr, vor der wir stehen, ist riesengroß.

Riesengroß müßen deshalb auch die Anstrengungen sein, mit denen wir ihr entgegentreten. Es ist also jetzt die Stunde gekommen, die Glacehandschuhe auszuziehen und die Faust zu bandagieren. (Wie ein einziger Schrei erbebt sich ein orkanartiger Beifall. Sprechchöre von den Galerien und Rängen bestätigen die volle Zustimmung der Menge.) Es geht nicht mehr an, das reiche Kriegspotential nicht nur unseres eigenen Landes, sondern der uns zur Verfügung stehenden bedeutenden Teile Europas nur flüchtig und an der Oberfläche auszuschöpfen. Es muß ganz zur Ausschöpfung gelangen, und zwar so schnell und so gründlich, als das organisatorisch und sachlich überhaupt nur denkbar ist. Hier wäre eine falsche Rücksichtnahme vollkommen fehl am Orte. Europas Zukunft hängt von unserem Kampf im Osten ab. Wir stehen zu seinem Schutze bereit. Das deutsche Volk stellt sein kostbarstes nationales Blut für diesen Kampf zur Verfügung. Der übrige Teil Europas sollte hierfür wenigstens seine Arbeit zur Verfügung stellen. Es gibt viele ernsthafte Kritiker auch in anderen Ländern, die diese zwingende Pflicht bereits einsehen. Andere wieder bestreiten sie noch. Das aber kann für uns nicht ausschlaggebend sein. Wenn die Gefahr für sie allein gegeben wäre, so könnte man ihre Auslassungen als literarischen Unsinn bewerten, der keinerlei Bedeutung besitzt. Aber die Gefahr ist für uns alle gegeben, und deshalb müßen wir uns auch alle dagegen zur Wehr setzen. Wer diesen Kampf im übrigen Europa heute noch nicht versteht, wird uns morgen auf den Knien danken, daß wir ihn mutig und unbeirrt auf uns genommen haben.

Es ärgert uns nicht einmal, wenn unsere Feinde im Ausland behaupten, die Maßnahmen, die wir jetzt zur Totalisierung des Krieges durchführten, kämen denen des Bolschewismus ziemlich nahe. Scheinheilig erklären sie, daraus müße man also folgern, daß sich unter diesen Umständen der Kampf gegen den Bolschewismus überhaupt erübrige. Es geht hier nicht um die Methode, mit der man den Bolschewismus zu Boden schlägt sondern um das Ziel, nämlich um die Beseitigung der Gefahr. (Minutenlanger Beifall.) Die Frage ist also nicht die, ob die Methoden, die wir anwenden, gut oder schlecht sind, sondern ob sie zum Erfolge führen. Jedenfalls sind wir als nationalsozialistische Volksführung jetzt zu allem entschlossen. Wir packen zu, ohne Rücksicht auf die Einsprüche des einen oder des anderen. Wir wollen nicht mehr im Interesse der Aufrechterhaltung eines hohen, manchmal fast friedensmäßigen inneren Lebensstandards für eine bestimmte Volksschicht das deutsche Kriegspotential schwächen und damit unsere Kriegführung gefährden. Im Gegenteil, wir verzichten freiwillig auf einen bedeutenden Teil dieses Lebensstandards, um das Kriegspotential so schnell und so gründlich wie möglich zu erhöhen. Diese Aktion stellt keinen Selbstzweck, sondern nur ein Mittel zum Zweck dar. Umso höher wird nach dem Siege wieder der soziale Lebensstandard unseres Volkes steigen. Wir brauchen die bolschewistischen Methoden schon deshalb nicht nachzuahmen, weil wir über das bessere Menschen- und Führungsmaterial verfügen und damit einen großen Vorsprung besitzen. Aber wir müssen, wie die Entwicklung zeigt, viel mehr tun, als wir bisher getan haben, um dem Krieg im Osten eine entscheidende Wendung zum Besseren zu geben.

Im Übrigen herrscht darüber, wie mir aus ungezählten Briefen aus der Heimat und Zustimmungskundgebungen von der Front mitgeteilt wird, im ganzen deutschen Volke überhaupt nur eine Meinung. Jedermann weiß, daß dieser Krieg, wenn wir ihn verlieren, uns aber vernichten würde. Und darum ist das Volk mit seiner Führung entschlossen, nunmehr zur radikalsten Selbsthilfe zu greifen. Die breiten arbeitenden Massen unseres Volkes machen der Regierung nicht zum Vorwurf, daß sie zu rücksichtslos, sondern höchstens, daß sie zu rücksichtsvoll vorgeht. Man frage landauf, landab das deutsche Volk ; nun wird überall nur die eine Antwort erhalten : Das Radikalste ist heute eben radikal, und das Totalste ist heute eben total genug, um den Sieg zu erringen.

Darum ist die totale Kriegführung eine Sache des ganzen deutschen Volkes. Niemand kann sich auch nur mit einem Schein von Berechtigung an ihren Forderungen vorbeidrücken. Als ich in meiner Rede vom 30. Januar von dieser Stelle aus den totalen Krieg proklamierte, schollen mir aus den um reich versammelten Menschenmassen Orkane der Zustimmung zu. Ich kann also feststellen, daß die Führung sich in ihren Maßnahmen in vollkommener Übereinstimmung mit dem ganzen deutschen Volk in der Heimat und an der Front befindet. Das Volk will alle, auch die schwersten Belastungen auf sich nehmen und ist bereit, jedes Opfer zu bringen, wenn damit dem großen Ziel des Sieges gedient wird. (Lebhafte Zurufe.)

Die Voraussetzung dazu aber ist selbstverständlich die, daß die Lasten gerecht verteilt werden. (Lauteste Zustimmung.) Es darf nicht geduldet werden, daß der weitaus größte Teil des Volkes die ganze Bürde des Krieges trägt, und ein kleiner passiver Teil sich an den Lasten und an der Verantwortung des Krieges vorbeizudrücken versucht. Die Maßnahmen, die wir getroffen haben und noch treffen müssen, werden deshalb vom Geiste einer nationalsozialistischen Gerechtigkeit erfüllt sein. Wir nehmen keine Rücksicht auf Stand und Beruf. Arm und Reich und Hoch und Niedrig müssen in gleicher Weise beansprucht werden. Jedermann wird in dieser ernstesten Phase unseres Schicksalskampfes zur Erfüllung seiner Pflicht der Nation gegenüber angehalten, wenn nötig, gezwungen werden. Wir wissen uns auch dabei in voller Übereinstimmung mit dem nationalen Willen unseres Volkes. Wir wollen lieber zuviel als zu wenig Kraft zur Erringung des Sieges anwenden. Noch niemals ist ein Krieg in der Geschichte der Völker verloren gegangen, weil die Führung zuviel Soldaten und Waffen hatte. Sehr viele aber gingen verloren, weil das Umgekehrte der Fall war.

Es ist also an der Zeit, den Säumigen Beine zu machen. (Stürmische Bravorufe.) Sie müßen aus ihrer bequemen Ruhe aufgerüttelt werden. Wir können nicht warten, bis sie von selbst zur Besinnung kommen und es dann vielleicht zu spät ist. Es muß wie ein Alarmruf durch das ganze Volk gehen. Eine Arbeit von Millionen Händen hat einzusetzen, und zwar landauf, landab. Die Maßnahmen, die wir bereits getroffen haben und noch treffen müßen und die ich im weiteren Teil meiner Ausführungen des näheren erläutern werde, sind einschneidend für das gesamte private und öffentliche Leben. Die Opfer, die der einzelne Bürger dabei zu bringen hat, sind manchmal schwer ; aber sie bedeuten nur wenig den Opfern gegenüber, die er bringen müßte, wenn er sich zu diesen Opfern weigerte und damit das größte nationale Unglück über unser Volk heraufbeschwörte. Es ist besser, zur rechten Zeit einen Schnitt zu tun, als zuzuwarten und die Krankheit sich erst richtig festsetzen zu lassen. Man darf aber dem Operateur, der den Schnitt tut, nicht in den Arm fallen oder ihn gar wegen Körperverletzung anklagen. Er schneidet nicht, um zu töten, sondern um das Leben des Patienten zu retten.

Wiederum muß ich hier betonen, daß, je schwerer die Opfer sind, die das deutsche Volk zu bringen hat, umso dringender die Forderung erhoben werden muß, daß sie gerecht verteilt werden. Das will auch das Volk. Niemand sträubt sich heute gegen die Übernahme von auch schwersten Kriegslasten. Aber es muß natürlich auf jeden aufreizend wirken, wenn gewisse Leute immer wieder versuchen, sich an den Lasten überhaupt vorbeizudrücken. Die nationalsozialistische Staatsführung hat die moralische, aber auch staatspolitische Pflicht, solchen Versuchen mannhaft, wenn nötig mit drakonischen Strafen entgegenzutreten. (Zustimmung.) Schonung wäre hier vollkommen fehl am Platze und würde allmählich zu einer Verwirrung der Gefühle und Ansichten unseres Volkes führen, die eine schwere Gefährdung unserer öffentlichen Kriegsmoral nach sich ziehen müßte.

Wir sind somit auch gezwungen, eine Reihe von Maßnahmen zu treffen, die zwar für die Kriegführung an sich nicht von lebenswichtiger Bedeutung sind, die aber für die Aufrechterhaltung der Kriegsmoral in der Heimat und an der Front erforderlich erscheinen. Auch die Optik des Krieges, das heißt das äußere Bild der Kriegführung ist im vierten Kriegsjahr von ausschlaggebender Wichtigkeit. Die Front hat angesichts der übermenschlichen Opfer, die sie täglich zu bringen hat, ein elementares Anrecht darauf, daß auch nicht ein Einziger in der Heimat das Recht für sich in Anspruch nimmt, am Kriege und seinen Pflichten vorbeizuleben. Aber nicht nur die Front fordert das, sondern auch der weitaus überwiegende anständige Teil der Heimat. (Stürmischer Beifall.) Die Fleißigen besitzen einen Anspruch darauf, daß, wenn sie zehn und zwölf und manchmal vierzehn Stunden täglich arbeiten, sich direkt neben ihnen nicht die Faulenzer räkeln und gar noch die anderen für dumm und nicht raffiniert genug halten. Die Heimat muß in ihrer Gesamtheit sauber und intakt bleiben. Nichts darf ihr kriegsgemäßes Bild trüben.

Es sind deshalb eine Reihe von Maßnahmen getroffen worden, die dieser neuen Optik des Krieges Rechnung tragen. Wir haben beispielsweise die Schließung der Bars und Nachtlokale angeordnet. Ich kann mir nicht vorstellen, daß es heute noch Menschen gibt, die ihre Kriegspflichten voll erfüllen und gleichzeitig bis tief in die Nacht in Amüsierlokalen herumsitzen. Ich muß daraus nur folgern, daß sie es mit ihren Kriegspflichten nicht allzu genau nehmen. Wir haben diese Amüsierlokale geschlossen, weil sie anfangen, uns lästig zu fallen, und das Bild des Krieges trübten. Wir verfolgen damit durchaus keine muckerischen Ziele. Nach dem Kriege wollen wir gern wieder nach dem Grundsatz verfahren: Leben und leben lassen. Während des Krieges aber gilt der Grundsatz : Kämpfen und kämpfen lassen !

Auch Luxusrestaurants, deren Aufwand in keinem Verhältnis zum erzielten Effekt steht, sind der Schließung verfallen. Es mag sein, daß der eine oder der andere auch während des Krieges noch in der Pflege des Magens eine Hauptaufgabe sieht. Auf ihn können wir dabei keine Rücksicht nehmen. Wenn an der Front unsere kämpfenden Truppen vom Grenadier bis zum Generalfeldmarschall aus der Feldküche essen, so glaube ich, ist es nicht zu viel verlangt, wenn wir in der Heimat jeden zwingen, wenigstens auf die elementarsten Gebote des Gemeinschaftsdenkens Rücksicht zu nehmen. Feinschmecker wollen wir wieder nach dem Kriege werden. Heute haben wir Wichtigeres zu tun, als den Magen zu pflegen.

Auch ungezählte Luxus- und Repräsentationsgeschäfte sind mittlerweile zur Auflösung gekommen. Sie waren für das kaufende Publikum vielfach ein ständiger Stein des Anstoßes. Zu kaufen gab es dort praktisch kaum noch etwas, höchstens einmal, wenn man hier und da statt mit Geld, mit Butter oder mit Eiern bezahlte. Was haben Geschäfte für einen Zweck, die keine Waren mehr verkaufen und nur elektrisches Licht, Heizung und menschliche Arbeitskraft verbrauchen, die uns anderswo, vor allem in der Rüstungsproduktion, an allen Ecken und Enden fehlen.

Man wende hier nicht ein, die Aufrechterhaltung eines holden Friedensscheines imponiere dem Ausland. Dem Ausland imponiert nur ein deutscher Sieg ! (Stürmische Zustimmung.) Wenn wir gesiegt haben, wird jedermann unser Freund sein wollen. Würden wir aber einmal unterliegen, so könnten wir unsere Freunde an den Fingern einer Hand abzählen. Wir haben deshalb mit diesen falschen Illusionen, die das Kriegsbild verwischen, Schluss gemacht. Wir werden die Menschen, die dort untätig in den leeren Geschäften herumstanden, einer nutzbringenderen Tätigkeit in der öffentlichen Kriegswirtschaft zuführen. Dieser Prozess ist eben im Gange und wird bis zum 15. März abgeschlossen sein. Er stellt natürlich eine riesige Umorganisation unseres ganzen wirtschaftlichen Lebens dar. Wir gehen dabei nicht planlos vor. Wir wollen auch niemanden zu Unrecht anklagen oder Tadel und Vorwurf nach allen Seiten verteilen. Wir tun lediglich das, was notwendig ist. Das aber tun wir schnell und gründlich.

Wir wollen lieber ein paar Jahre geflickte Kleider tragen, als einen Zustand heraufbeschwören, in dem unser Volk ein paar Jahrhunderte in Lumpen herumlaufen müßte. Was sollen heute noch Modesalons, die Licht, Heizung und menschliche Arbeitskraft verbrauchen. Sie werden nach dem Kriege, wenn wir wieder Zeit und Lust dazu haben, neu erstehen. Was sollen Frisiersalons, in denen ein Schönheitskult gepflegt wird, der ungeheuer viel Zeit und Arbeitskraft beansprucht, der für den Frieden zwar sehr schön und angenehm, für den Krieg aber überflüssig ist. Unsere Frauen und Mädchen werden einmal unseren siegreich heimkehrenden Soldaten auch ohne friedensmäßige Aufmachung gefallen. (Beifall.)

In den öffentlichen Ämtern wird in Zukunft etwas schneller und unbürokratischer gearbeitet werden. Es ergibt durchaus kein gutes Bild, wenn dort nach achtstündiger Arbeitszeit auf die Minute genau Schluss gemacht wird. Nicht das Volk ist für die Ämter, sondern die Ämter sind für das Volk da. Man arbeite also so lange, bis die Arbeit erledigt ist. Das ist das Gebot des Krieges. Wenn der « Führer » das kann, so werden auch die Diener des Staates das können. Ist für eine längere Arbeitszeit nicht genügend Arbeit da, so gibt man 10 oder 20 oder 30 Prozent der Mitarbeiter an die kriegswichtige Wirtschaft ab und stellt damit wieder eine entsprechende Anzahl Männer für die Front frei. Das gilt für alle Dienststellen in der Heimat. Vielleicht wird geradedadurch auch die Arbeit in den Ämtern etwas schneller und etwas weniger schwerfällig vor sich gehen. Wir müßen im Kriege lernen, nicht nur gründlich, sondern auch prompt zu arbeiten. Der Soldat an der Front hat auch nicht wochenlang Zeit, sich eine Maßnahme zu überlegen, sie von Hand zu Hand weiterzugeben oder in den Akten verstauben zu lassen. Er muß sofort handeln, weil er sonst sein Leben verliert. Wir in der Heimat verlieren zwar durch schwerfälliges Arbeiten nicht unser eigenes Leben, aber wir gefährden damit auf die Dauer das Leben unseres Volkes. Überhaupt muß jeder es sich zu einem selbstverständlichen Gebot der Kriegsmoral machen, auf die berechtigten Forderungen des arbeitenden und kämpfenden Volkes die größte Rücksicht zu nehmen. Wir sind keine Spielverderber, aber wir lassen uns auch nicht das Spiel verderben.

Wenn beispielsweise gewisse Männer und Frauen sich wochenlang in den Kurorten herumräkeln, sich dort Gerüchte zutratschen und schwer Kriegsversehrten und Arbeitern and Arbeiterinnen, die nach einjährigem, hartem Einsatz Anspruch auf Urlaub haben, den Platz wegnehmen, so ist das unerträglich und deshalb abgestellt worden. Der Krieg ist nicht die richtige Zeit für einen gewissen Amüsierpöbel. Unsere Freude ist bis zu seinem Ende die Arbeit und der Kampf, darin finden wir unsere tiefe innere Genugtuung. Wer das nicht aus eigenem Pflichtgefühl versteht, der muß zu diesem Pflichtgefühl erzogen, wenn nötig auch gezwungen werden. Hier hilft nur hartes Durchgreifen.

Es macht zum Beispiel auf das Volk keinen guten Eindruck, wenn wir mit einer Riesenpropaganda die Parole ausgeben : « Räder müßen rollen für den Sieg ! » , das ganze Volk daraus die Folgerung zieht und keine unnützen Reisen antritt, dagegen arbeitslose Vergnügungsreisende dadurch nur mehr Platz in der Eisenbahn bekommen. Die Eisenbahn dient heute kriegswichtigen Transporten und kriegsnotwendigen Geschäftsreisen. Urlaub hat nur der zu beanspruchen, der sonst in seiner Arbeits- oder Kampfkraft schwer gefährdet würde. Der « Führer » hat seit Beginn des Krieges und lange vorher nicht einen Tag Urlaub gehabt. Wenn also der erste Mann im Staate seine Pflicht so ernst und so verantwortungsvoll auffasst, dann muß das für jeden Bürger und jede Bürgerin des Staates eine stumme, aber doch unüberhörbare Aufforderung sein, sich auch danach zu richten. Die Regierung tut andererseits alles, um dem arbeitenden Volke in dieser schweren Zeit die nötigen Entspannungsmöglichkeiten zu erhalten. Theater, Kinos, Musiksäle bleiben voll im Betrieb. Der Rundfunk wird bestrebt sein, sein Programm noch zu erweitern und zu vervollkommen. Wir haben durchaus nicht die Absicht, über unser Volk eine graue Winterstimmung heraufzubeschwören. Was dem Volke dient, was seine Kampf- und Arbeitskraft erhält, stählt und vermehrt, das ist gut und kriegswichtig. Das Gegenteil ist abzuschaffen. Ich habe deshalb als Ausgleich gegen die eben geschilderten Maßnahmen angeordnet, daß die geistigen und seelischen Erholungsstätten des Volkes nicht vermindert, sondern vermehrt werden. Soweit sie unseren Kriegsanstrengungen nicht schaden, sondern sie fördern, müßen sie auch von Seiten der Staats- und Volksführung eine entsprechende Förderung erfahren. Das gilt auch für den Sport. Der Sport ist heute keine Angelegenheit bevorzugter Kreise, sondern eine Angelegenheit des ganzen Volkes. U.K-Stellungen sind auf dem Sportgebiet gänzlich sinnlos. Der Sport hat ja die Aufgabe, die Körperkraft zu stählen, doch wohl in der Hauptsache zu dem Zweck, sie wenigstens in der schlimmsten Notzeit des Volkes zum Einsatz zu bringen.

Das alles will auch die Front. Das fordert mit stürmischer Zustimmung das ganze deutsche Volk. Es will jetzt nichts mehr hören von kriegsunwichtiger Betriebsamkeit und ähnlichen Wichtigtuereien, die nur Zeit und Aufwand erfordern. Es will nichts mehr hören von einem überspannten umständlichen Fragebogenunwesen für jeden Unsinn. Es will sich nicht in tausend Kleinigkeiten verzetteln, die für den Frieden vielleicht wichtig waren, für den Krieg aber keine Bedeutung besitzen. Es braucht auch nicht unter dauernder Erinnerung an das schwere Opfer unserer Soldaten in Stalingrad an seine Pflicht gemahnt zu werden. Es weiß, was es zu tun und was es zu lassen hat. Es will eine spartanische Lebensführung für alle, für Hoch und Niedrig, und Arm und Reich. So wie der « Führer » dem ganzen Volke ein Beispiel gibt, so muß das ganze Volk in allen seinen Schichten sich dieses Beispiel auch zum Vorbild nehmen. Wenn er nur Arbeit und Sorgen kennt, so wollen wir ihm Arbeit und Sorgen nicht allein überlassen, sondern den Teil, den wir ihm abnehmen können, auch auf uns nehmen.

Die Zeit, die wir heute durchleben, hat in ihrer ganzen Anlage für jeden echten Nationalsozialisten eine verblüffende Ähnlichkeit mit der Kampfzeit. Da und immer haben wir so gehandelt. Wir sind immer mit dem Volke durch dick und dünn gegangen, und darum ist das Volk uns auch auf allen Wegen gefolgt. Wir haben immer mit dem Volke gemeinsam alle Lasten getragen, und deshalb schienen uns die Lasten nicht schwer, sondern leicht zu sein. Das Volk will geführt werden. Noch niemals gab es in der Geschichte ein Beispiel dafür, daß in einer kritischen Stunde des nationalen Lebens das Volk einer tapferen und entschlossenen Führung die Gefolgschaft versagt hätte. Ich möchte in diesem Zusammenhang auch über einige praktische Maßnahmen des totalen Krieges, die wir bereits getroffen haben, ein paar Worte verlieren.

Das Problem, um das es sich dabei handelt, heißt: Freimachung von Soldaten für die Front, Freimachung von Arbeitern und Arbeiterinnen für die Rüstungswirtschaft. Diesen beiden Zielen müssen alle anderen Bedürfnisse untergeordnet werden, selbst auf Kosten unseres sozialen Lebensniveaus während des Krieges. Das soll nicht eine endgültige Stabilisierung unseres Lebensstandards darstellen, sondern gilt nur als Mittel zur Erreichung des Zweckes, nämlich des eines totalen Sieges.

Es müssen im Rahmen dieser Aktion hunderttausende von U.K-Stellungen in der Heimat aufgehoben werden. Diese U.K-Stellungen waren bisher notwendig, weil wir nicht ausreichend Fach- und Schlüsselkräfte zur Verfügung hatten, die die durch Aufhebung der U.K-Stellungen leer werdenden Plätze besetzen konnten. Es ist der Sinn der getroffenen und noch zu treffenden Maßnahmen, die dafür benötigten Arbeitskräfte zu mobilisieren. Darum geht unser Appell an die noch außerhalb der Kriegswirtschaft stehenden Männer und die bisher noch außerhalb des Arbeitsprozesses stehenden Frauen. Sie werden sich diesem Appell nicht versagen wollen und auch nicht versagen können. Die Arbeitspflicht für Frauen ist sehr weitschichtig gefasst worden. Das heißt aber nicht, daß nur diejenigen, die im Gesetz genannt worden sind, arbeiten dürfen. Jeder ist uns willkommen, und je mehr sich für den großen Umschichtungsprozess in der inneren Wirtschaft zur Verfügung stellen, umso mehr Soldaten können wir für die Front freimachen. Unsere Feinde behaupten, die deutschen Frauen seien nicht in der Lage, den Mann in der Kriegswirtschaft zu ersetzen. Das mag für bestimmte schwere körperliche Arbeiten unserer Kriegsfertigung zutreffen. Darüber hinaus aber bin ich der Überzeugung, daß die deutsche Frau fest entschlossen ist, den Platz, den der Mann, der an die Front geht, freimacht, in kürzester Frist voll auszufüllen. Wir brauchen uns da gar nicht auf bolschewistische Beispiele zu berufen. Auch in der deutschen Kriegswirtschaft sind seit Jahren schon Millionen bester deutscher Frauen mit größtem Erfolg tätig, und sie warten mit Ungeduld darauf, daß ihre Reihen baldigst durch neuen Zuzug vermehrt und ergänzt werden. Alle die, die sich für diese Arbeit zur Verfügung stellen, erfüllen damit nur eine Dankespflicht der Front gegenüber. Hunderttausende sind schon gekommen, hunderttausende werden noch kommen. In kürzester Zeit hoffen wir damit Armeen von Arbeitskräften freizumachen, die ihrerseits wieder Armeen von kämpfenden Frontsoldaten freistellen werden.

Ich müßte mich sehr in den deutschen Frauen täuschen, wenn ich annehmen sollte, daß sie den hiermit an sie ergehenden Appell überhören wollten. Sie werden sich nicht in engherzigster Weise an das Gesetz anklammern oder gar noch versuchen, durch seine Maschen zu entschlüpfen. ImÜbrigen würden die wenigen, die solche Absichten verfolgen, damit bei uns nicht landen. Ärztliche Atteste werden statt der aufgerufenen Arbeitskraft nicht als vollwertig angenommen. Auch eine etwaige Alibi-Arbeit, die man sich beim Mann oder beim Schwager oder bei einem guten Bekannten verschafft, um sich unbeaufsichtigt weiter an der Arbeit vorbeidrücken zu können, wird von uns mit entsprechenden Gegenmaßnahmen beantwortet werden. Die wenigen, die solche Pläne verfolgen, können sich damit in der öffentlichen Wertung nur selbst erledigen. Das Volk wird ihnen die größte Verachtung zollen. Niemand verlangt, daß eine Frau, die dazu nicht die nötigen körperlichen Voraussetzungen mitbringt, in die schwere Fertigung einer Panzerfabrik geht. Es gibt aber eine Unmenge von Fertigungen auch in der Kriegsindustrie, die ohne allzu starke körperliche Anstrengung geleistet werden können und für die sich eine Frau, auch wenn sie aus bevorzugten Kreisen stammt, ruhig zur Verfügung stellen kann. Niemand ist dafür zu gut, und wir haben ja nur die Wahl, hier etwas Ganzes zu tun oder das Ganze zu verlieren.

Es wäre auch angebracht, daß Frauen, die Dienstpersonal beschäftigen, jetzt schon diese Frage einer Überprüfung unterzögen. Man kann sehr wohl sich selbst dem Haushalt und den Kindern widmen und sein Dienstmädchen freigeben oder den Haushalt und die Kinder dem Dienstmädchen oder der NSV. überantworten und sich selbst zur Arbeit melden. Allerdings ist dann das Leben nicht mehr so gemütlich wie im Frieden. Aber wir leben ja auch nicht im Frieden, sondern im Kriege. Gemütlich werden wir es uns wieder machen, wenn wir den Sieg in Händen halten. Jetzt aber müßen wir für den Sieg unter weitestgehender Aufopferung unserer Bequemlichkeit kämpfen.

Auch und gerade die Kriegerfrauen werden das verstehen. Sie werden es für ihre höchste Verpflichtung halten, ihren Männern draußen an der Front dadurch zur Seite zu treten, daß sie sich einer kriegswichtigen Arbeit zur Verfügung stellen. Das betrifft vor allem die Landwirtschaft. Die Frauen der Landarbeiter haben hier ein gutes Beispiel zu geben. Es gilt für alle Männer und Frauen der Grundsatz, daß es für niemanden angebracht ist, im Kriege sogar noch weniger zu tun als im Frieden ; die Arbeit muß auf allen Gebieten vermehrt werden.

Man darf übrigens nicht den Fehler machen, alles, was jetzt nötig ist, auf die Regierung zu schieben. Die Regierung kann nur die großen Rahmengesetze schaffen. Den Rahmengesetzen Leben und Inhalt zu geben, ist Aufgabe des arbeitenden Volkes ; und zwar soll das unter der befeuernden Führung der Partei geschehen. Schnelles Handeln ist hier erstes Gebot.

Über die gesetzliche Verpflichtung hinaus also gilt jetzt die Parole : Freiwillige vor ! Hier appelliere ich vor allem als Berliner Gauleiter an meine Berliner Mitbürgerinnen. Sie haben im Verlaufe dieses Krieges schon so viele edle Beispiele einer tapferen Lebensgesinnung gegeben, daß sie sich gewiss auch dieser Forderung gegenüber nicht beschämen lassen wollen. Sie haben sich durch ihre praktische Lebensart, sowie durch die Frische ihrer Lebensauffassung auch im Kriege in der ganzen Welt einen guten Namen erworben. Diesen guten Namen gilt es jetzt durch eine großzügige Handlungsweise zu erhalten und zu verstärken. Wenn ich also meine Berliner Mitbürgerinnen aufrufe, sich schnell, prompt und ohne viel Einwendungen einer kriegswichtigen Arbeit zur Verfügung zu stellen, so weiß ich, daß alle diesem Appell Folge leisten werden. Wir wollen jetzt nicht über die Schwere der Zeit klagen oder uns einander etwas vorrätsonnieren, wir wollen, wie das nicht nur Berliner, sondern deutsche Art ist, zupacken, handeln, die Initiative ergreifen, selbst etwas tun und nicht alles den anderen zu tun überlassen.

Welche deutsche Frau wollte es übers Herz bringen, sich einem solchen Appell, den ich vor allem für die kämpfende Front an die deutsche Frauenwelt richte, zu entziehen? Wer wollte jetzt eine spießige Bequemlichkeit über das nationale Pflichtgebot stellen? Wer wollte jetzt noch angesichts der schweren Bedrohung, der wir alle ausgesetzt sind, an seine egoistischen privaten Bedürfnisse denken und nicht an die über alledem stehenden Notwendigkeiten des Krieges?

Ich weise mit Verachtung den Vorwurf, den uns unsere Feinde machen, zurück, daß das eine Nachahmung des Bolschewismus sei. Wir wollen den Bolschewismus nicht nachahmen, wir wollen ihn besiegen, und zwar mit Mitteln und Methoden, die ihm gewachsen sind. Die deutsche Frau wird das am ehesten verstehen, denn sie hat längst erkannt, daß der Krieg, den heute unsere Männer führen, ein Krieg vor allem zum Schutze ihrer Kinder ist. Ihr heiligstes Gut wird also in diesem Kriege durch den Einsatz des kostbarsten Blutes unseres Volkes beschirmt. Mit diesem Kampf der Männer muß die deutsche Frau auch nach außen hin spontan ihre Solidarität bekunden. Sie muß sich lieber morgen als übermorgen in die Reihen der Millionen schaffender Angestellten und Arbeiterinnen einreihen und das Heer der arbeitenden Heimat auch durch ihre eigene Person vermehren. Es muß wie ein Strom der Bereitschaft durch das deutsche Volk gehen. Ich erwarte, daß sich nun ungezählte Frauen und vor allem auch Männer, die bisher noch keine kriegswichtige Arbeit taten, bei den Meldestellen melden. Wer sich schnell gibt, der gibt sich doppelt.

Daneben vollziehen sich großzügige Zusammenlegungen in unserer allgemeinen Wirtschaft. Das betrifft vor allem unser Versicherungs- und Bankenwesen, das Steuerwesen, unser nicht kriegs- und lebensnotwendiges Zeitschriften und Zeitungswesen, das betrifft für den Krieg entbehrliche Partei- und Verwaltungsbetriebe, aber auch eine weitere Vereinfachung der Lebensführung unseres Volkes.

Ich weiß, daß große Teile unseres Volkes dabei schwere Opfer bringen müßen. Ich habe Verständnis für diese Opfer, und die Volksführung ist bemüht, diese auf ein Mindestmaß zu beschränken. Aber ein gewisser Rest wird übrig bleiben, der getragen werden muß. Nach dem Kriege werden wir das, was wir heute auflösen, größer und schöner denn je wieder neu aufbauen, und der Staat wird dazu seine helfende Hand leihen.

Ich wende mich in diesem Zusammenhang eindringlich gegen die Behauptung, daß mit unseren Maßnahmen eine Stilllegung des Mittelstandes oder eine Monopolisierung unserer Wirtschaft bezweckt würde. Nach dem Kriege wird der Mittelstand sofort wieder in größtem Umfange wirtschaftlich and sozial wiederhergestellt. Die augenblicklichen Maßnahmen sind ausschließlich Notmaßnahmen für die Kriegszwecke und Kriegsbedürfnisse. Sie streben nicht eine strukturelle Veränderung der Wirtschaft an, sondern sind lediglich auf das Ziel ausgerichtet, den Sieg so schnell und so gründlich wie möglich erkämpfen zu helfen.

Ich streite nicht ab, daß uns auch angesichts der Durchführung der eben geschilderten Maßnahmen noch sorgenvolle Wochen bevorstehen. Aber damit schaffen wir jetzt endgültig Luft. Wir stellen diese Maßnahmen auf die Aktionen des kommenden Sommers ein und begeben uns heute, ohne den Drohungen und Großsprechereien des Feindes irgendeine Beachtung zu schenken, an die Arbeit. Ich bin glücklich, dieses Programm des Sieges (Stürmischer Beifall) einem deutschen Volke vortragen zu dürfen, das diese Maßnahmen nicht nur willig auf sich nimmt, sondern sie fordert, und zwar dringender, als das je im Verlaufe dieses Krieges der Fall gewesen ist. Das Volk will, daß durchgreifend und schnell gehandelt wird. Es ist Zeit ! Wir müssen den Augenblick und die Stunde nützen, damit wir vor kommenden Überraschungen gesichert sind.

Ich wende mich bei diesem Appell an das ganze deutsche Volk, besonders aber an die Partei als die berufene Führerin der Totalisierung unserer inneren Kriegführung. Sie steht nicht zum ersten Male vor einer derartig gigantischen Aufgabe. Sie wird diese Aufgabe mit dem an ihr gewohnten revolutionären Elan zur Lösung bringen. Sie wird am ehesten mit Trägheit und Indolenz, die sich hier oder da zeigen mögen, fertig werden. Der Staat hat seine Rahmengesetze erlassen und wird deren in den nächsten Tagen und Wochen weitere erlassen. Die Nebensächlichkeiten, die in diesen Rahmengesetzen unbeachtet bleiben, müssen vom Volke selbst unter der Führung der Partei durchgeführt werden. Über allem aber, was wir jetzt unternehmen und lassen, steht für jeden gültig das moralische Gesetz, nichts zu tun, was dem Kriege schadet, und alles zu tun, was dem Siege nützt.

Wir haben uns in den vergangenen Jahren oft in unseren Zeitungen und Reden auf das friderizianische Beispiel berufen. Wir hatten gar keine Berechtigung dazu. Friedrich II. stand im 3. Schlesischen Krieg zeitweilig mit fünf Millionen Preußen, wie Schlieffen berechnet, 90 Millionen Europäern gegenüber. Und schon im zweiten der sieben höllischen Jahre erlitt er eine Niederlage, die den ganzen preußischen Staat ins Wanken brachte. Er hat niemals genug Soldaten und Waffen gehabt, um seine Schlachten ohne größtes Risiko zu schlagen. Er betrieb seine Strategie immer als ein System der Aushilfen. Aber er verfolgte dabei den Grundsatz, den Feind anzugreifen, wo sich ihm eine Gelegenheit dazu bot, und ihn zu schlagen, wo er sich ihm stellte. Daß er Niederlagen erlitt, ist nicht das Entscheidende. Entscheidend ist vielmehr, daß der große König in allen Schicksalsschlägen ungebrochen blieb, daß er unerschütterlich das schwankende Kriegsglück auf sich nahm und sein ehernes Herz jede Gefahr überwand. Am Ende der sieben Jahre stand er, 51jährig, ein zahnloser, gichtkranker und von tausend Schmerzen gepeinigter Greis, doch als Sieger auf dem verwüsteten Schlachtfeld. Was haben wir denn dem entgegenzusetzen ?! Höchstens nur den Willen und die Entschlußkraft, es ihm, wenn die Stunde das gebietet, gleichzutun, wie er unerschütterlich zu bleiben in allen Fügungen des Schicksals, wie er den Sieg auch unter den ungünstigsten Umständen herbeizuzwingen und niemals an der großen Sache, die wir verfechten, zu verzweifeln.

Ich gebe meiner tiefen Überzeugung Ausdruck, daß das deutsche Volk durch den tragischen Schicksalsschlag von Stalingrad innerlich auf das tiefste geläutert worden ist. Es hat dem Krieg in sein hartes und erbarmungsloses Antlitz hineingeschaut. Es weiß nun die grausame Wahrheit und ist entschlossen, mit dem « Führer » durch dick und dünn zu gehen. (Begeistert erhebt sich die Menge bei diesen Worten, und wie des Branden eines Meeres klingen nicht enden wollende Sprechchöre : « “ Führer ” befehl, wir folgen ! » , « Heil unserem “ Führer ” ! » . Minutenlang ist der Minister am Weiterreden gehindert.)

In diesen Tagen hat sich die englische und amerikanische Presse sehr ausgiebig mit der Haltung des deutschen Volkes in der gegenwärtigen Krise befaßt. Die Engländer kennen das deutsche Volk nach Ihren Angebereien bekanntlich viel besser, als wir, seine eigene Führung. Sie geben uns scheinheilig Ratschläge, was wir zu tun und zu lassen hätten, immer in der irrigen Ansicht, das deutsche Volk von heute gleiche dem deutschen Volk vom November 1918, das auf ihre Verführungskünste hereinflie. Ich habe es nicht nötig, gegen diese Annahme den Gegenbeweis zu führen. Der Gegenbeweis wird vom kämpfenden und arbeitenden deutschen Volke jeden Tag aufs Neue erhärtet.

Ich möchte aber zur Steuer der Wahrheit an Euch, meine deutschen Volksgenossen und Volksgenossinnen, eine Reihe von Fragen richten, die Ihr mir nach bestem Wissen und Gewissen beantworten müßt. Als mir meine Zuhörer auf meine Forderungen vom 30. Januar spontan ihre Zustimmung bekundeten, behauptete die englische Presse am anderen Tag, das sei ein Propagandatheater gewesen und entspreche in keiner Weise der wahren Stimmung des deutschen Volkes. (Spontane Rufe : « Pfui ! » , « Lüge ! » , « Sie sollen nur herkommen ! Die werden uns kennen lernen ! » .) Ich habe heute zu dieser Versammlung nun einen Ausschnitt des deutschen Volkes im besten Sinne des Wortes eingeladen. (Die Aufzählung des Ministers wird von stürmischen Kundgebungen begleitet, die sich in einem nicht enden wollenden Beifall und stärkster Zustimmung für die im Sportpalast anwesenden Vertreter der Wehrmacht kundtun.) Vor mir sitzen reihenweise deutsche Verwundete von der Ostfront, Bein- und Armamputierte, mit zerschossenen Gliedern, Kriegsblinde, die mit ihren Rotkreuzschwestern gekommen sind, Männer in der Blüte ihrer Jahre, die vor sich ihre Krücken stehen haben. Dazwischen zähle ich an die fünfzig Träger des Eichenlaubes und des Ritterkreuzes, eine glänzende Abordnung unserer kämpfenden Front.

Hinter ihnen erhebt sich ein Block von Rüstungsarbeitern und -arbeiterinnen aus den Berliner Panzerwerken. Wieder hinter ihnen sitzen Männer aus der Parteiorganisation, Soldaten aus der kämpfenden Wehrmacht, Ärzte, Wissenschaftler, Künstler, Ingenieure und Architekten, Lehrer, Beamte and Angestellte aus den Ämtern und Büros, eine stolze Vertreterschaft unseres geistigen Lebens in all seinen Schichtungen, dem das Reich gerade jetzt im Kriege Wunder der Erfindung und des menschlichen Genies verdankt. Über das ganze Rund des Sportpalastes verteilt sehe ich Tausende von deutschen Frauen Die Jugend ist hier vertreten und das Greisenalter. Kein Stand, kein Beruf und kein Lebensjahr blieb bei der Einladung unberücksichtigt. Ich kann also mit Fug und Recht sagen : Was hier vor mir sitzt, ist ein Ausschnitt aus dem ganzen deutschen Volk an der Front und in der Heimat. Stimmt das ? Ja oder Nein ! (Der Sportpalast erlebt im Augenblick dieser Fragenstellung eine Kundgebung, wie sie selbst diese alte Kampfstätte des Nationalsozialismus nur an besonderen Höhepunkten nationalen Geschehens erlebt hat. Die Masse springt wie elektrisiert von ihren Plätzen. Wie ein Orkan braust ein vieltausendstimmiges Ja durch das weite Rund. Was die Teilnehmer dieser Kundgebung erleben, ist eine Volksabstimmung und Willensäußerung, wie sie spontaner keinen Ausdruck finden kann.) Ihr also, meine Zuhörer, repräsentiert in diesem Augenblick die Nation. Und an Euch möchte ich zehn Fragen richten, die Ihr mir mit dem deutschen Volke vor der ganzen Welt, insbesondere aber vor unseren Feinden, die uns auch an ihrem Rundfunk zuhören, beantworten sollt. (Nur mit Mühe kann sich der Minister für die nun folgenden Fragen Gehör verschaffen. Die Masse befindet sich in einem Zustand äußerster Hochstimmung. Messerscharf fallen die einzelnen Fragen. Jeder einzelne fühlt sich persönlich angesprochen. Mit letzter Anteilnahme und Begeisterung gibt die Masse auf jede einzelne Frage die Antwort. Der Sportpalast hallt wider von einem einzigen Schrei der Zustimmung.)

Die Engländer behaupten, das deutsche Volk habe den Glauben an den Sieg verloren. Ich frage Euch : Glaubt Ihr mit dem « Führer » und mit uns an den endgültigen totalen Sieg des deutschen Volkes ?

Ich frage Euch : Seid Ihr entschloßen, dem « Führer » in der Erkämpfung des Sieges durch dick und dünn und unter Aufnahme auch der schwersten persönlichen Belastungen zu folgen ?

Zweitens : Die Engländer behaupten, das deutsche Volk ist des Kampfes müde.

Ich frage Euch : Seid Ihr bereit, mit dem « Führer » als Phalanx der Heimat hinter der kämpfenden Wehrmacht stehend diesen Kampf mit wilder Entschloßenheit und unbeirrt durch alle Schicksalsfügungen fortzusetzen, bis der Sieg in unseren Händen ist ?

Drittens : Die Engländer behaupten, das deutsche Volk hat keine Lust mehr, sich der überhand nehmenden Kriegsarbeit, die die Regierung von ihm fordert, zu unterziehen.

Ich frage Euch : Seid Ihr und ist das deutsche Volk entschloßen, wenn der « Führer » es befiehlt, zehn, zwölf, und wenn nötig vierzehn und sechzehn Stunden täglich zu arbeiten und das Letzte herzugeben für den Sieg ?

Viertens : Die Engländer behaupten, das deutsche Volk wehrt sich gegen die totalen Kriegsmaßnahmen der Regierung. Es will nicht den totalen Krieg, sondern die Kapitulation. (Zurufe : Niemals ! Niemals ! Niemals ! .)

Ich frage Euch : Wollt Ihr den totalen Krieg ? Wollt Ihr ihn wenn nötig totaler und radikaler, als wir ihn uns heute überhaupt noch vorstellen können ?

Fünftens : Die Engländer behaupten, das deutsche Volk hat sein Vertrauen zum « Führer » verloren.

Ich frage Euch : Ist Euer Vertrauen zum « Führer » heute größer, gläubiger und unerschütterlicher denn je ?

Ist Eure Bereitschaft, ihm auf allen seinen Wegen zu folgen und alles zu tun, was nötig ist, um den Krieg zum siegreichen Ende zu führen, eine absolute und uneingeschränkte ? (Die Menge erhebt sich wie ein Mann. Die Begeisterung der Masse entlädt sich in einer Kundgebung nicht dagewesenen Ausmaßes. Vieltausendstimmige Sprechchöre brausen durch die Halle : « “ Führer ” befiehl, wir folgen ! » . Eine nicht abebbende Woge von Heilrufen auf den « Führer » braust auf. Wie auf ein Kommando erheben sich nun die Fahnen und Standarten, höchster Ausdruck des weihevollen Augenblicks, in dem die Masse dem « Führer » huldigt.)

Ich frage Euch als sechstes : Seid Ihr bereit, von nun ab Eure ganze Kraft einzusetzen und der Ostfront die Menschen und Waffen zur Verfügung zu stellen, die sie braucht, um dem Bolschewismus den tödlichen Schlag zu versetzen ?

Ich frage Euch siebentens : Gelobt Ihr mit heiligem Eid der Front, daß die Heimat mit starker Moral hinter ihr steht und ihr alles geben wird, was sie nötig hat, um den Sieg zu erkämpfen ?

Ich frage Euch achtens : Wollt Ihr, insbesondere Ihr Frauen selbst, daß die Regierung dafür sorgt, daß auch die deutsche Frau ihre ganze Kraft der Kriegführung zur Verfügung stellt und überall da, wo es nur möglich ist, einspringt, um Männer für die Front frei zu machen und damit ihren Männern an der Front zu helfen ?

Ich frage Euch neuntens : Billigt Ihr wenn nötig die radikalsten Maßnahmen gegen einen kleinen Kreis von Drückebergern und Schiebern, die mitten im Kriege Frieden spielen und die Not des Volkes zu eigensüchtigen Zwecken ausnutzen wollen ? Seid Ihr damit einverstanden, daß, wer sich am Krieg vergeht, den Kopf verliert ?

Ich frage Euch zehntens und zuletzt : Wollt Ihr, daß, wie das nationalsozialistische Parteiprogramm es gebietet, gerade im Kriege gleiche Rechte und gleiche Pflichten vorherrschen, daß die Heimat die schweren Belastungen des Krieges solidarisch auf ihre Schultern nimmt und daß sie für Hoch und Niedrig und Arm und Reich in gleicher Weise verteilt werden ?

Ich habe Euch gefragt ; Ihr habt mir Eure Antwort gegeben. Ihr seid ein Stück Volk, durch Euren Mund hat sich damit die Stellungnahme des deutschen Volkes manifestiert. Ihr habt unseren Feinden das zugerufen, was sie wissen müssen, damit sie sich keinen Illusionen und falschen Vorstellungen hingeben. Somit sind wir, wie von der ersten Stunde unserer Macht an und durch all die zehn Jahre hindurch, fest und brüderlich mit dem deutschen Volk vereint. Der mächtigste Bundesgenosse, den es auf dieser Welt gibt, das Volk selbst, steht hinter uns und ist entschlossen, mit dem « Führer » , koste es, was es wolle, und unter Aufnahme auch der schwersten Opfer den Sieg kämpfend zu erstreben. Welche Macht der Welt könnte uns jetzt noch hindern, alles das durchzusetzen und zu erfüllen, was wir uns als Ziel gesteckt haben. Jetzt wird und muß es uns gelingen !

Ich stehe hier vor Euch nicht nur als Sprecher der Regierung, sondern auch als Sprecher des Volkes. Um mich herum sitzen meine alten Freunde aus der Partei, die hohe Ämter in der Führung von Volk und Staat bekleiden. Neben mir sitzt Parteigenosse Speer, der vom « Führer » den geschichtlichen Auftrag erhalten hat, die deutsche Rüstungswirtschaft zu mobilisieren und der Front Waffen in Hülle und Fülle zu liefern. Neben mir sitzt Parteigenosse Doktor Ley, der vom « Führer » den Auftrag erhalten hat, die Führung der deutschen Arbeiterschaft durchzuführen und sie in unermüdlichem Einsatz für ihre Kriegspflichten zu schulen und zu erziehen. Wir fühlen uns verbunden mit unserem Parteigenossen Sauckel, der vom « Führer » den Auftrag erhalten hat, ungezählte Hunderttausende von Arbeitskräften ins Reich zu bringen, die einen Zuschuß an die nationale Wirtschaft darstellen, der vom Feind überhaupt nicht eingeholt werden kann. Darüber hinaus sind mit uns vereinigt alle « Führer » der Partei, der Wehrmacht und des Staates.

Wir alle, Kinder unseres Volkes, zusammengeschweißt mit dem Volke in der größten Schicksalsstunde unserer nationalen Geschichte, wir geloben Euch, wir geloben der Front, und wir geloben dem « Führer » , daß wir die Heimat zu einem Willensblock zusammenschweißen wollen, auf den sich der « Führer » und seine kämpfenden Soldaten unbedingt und blindlings verlassen können.

Wir verpflichten uns, in unserem Leben und Arbeiten alles zu tun, was zum Siege nötig ist. Unsere Herzen wollen wir erfüllen mit jener politischen Leidenschaft, die uns immer in den großen Kampfzeiten der Partei und des Staates wie ein ewig brennendes Feuer verzehrte. Nie wollen wir in diesem Kriege jener falschen und scheinheiligen Objektivitätsdusselei verfallen, der die deutsche Nation in ihrer Geschichte schon so viel Unglück zu verdanken hat.

Als dieser Krieg begann, haben wir unsere Augen einzig und allein auf die Nation gerichtet. Was ihr und ihrem Lebenskampf dient, das ist gut und muß erhalten und gefördert werden. Was ihr und ihrem Lebenskampfe schadet, das ist schlecht und muß beseitigt und abgeschnitten werden. Mit heißem Herzen und kühlem Kopf wollen wir an die Bewältigung der großen Probleme dieses Zeitabschnittes des Krieges herantreten. Wir beschreiten damit den Weg zum endgültigen Sieg. Er liegt begründet im Glauben an den « Führer » .

So stelle ich denn an diesem Abend der ganzen Nation noch einmal ihre große Pflicht vor Augen. Der « Führer » erwartet von uns eine Leistung, die alles bisher Dagewesene in den Schatten stellt. Wir wollen uns seiner Forderung nicht versagen. Wie wir stolz auf ihn sind, so soll er stolz auf uns sein können.

In den größten Krisen und Erschütterungen des nationalen Lebens erst bewähren sich die wahren Männer, aber auch die wahren Frauen. Da hat man nicht mehr das Recht, vom schwachen Geschlecht zu sprechen, da beweisen beide Geschlechter die gleiche Kampfeentschlossenheit und Seelenstärke. Die Nation ist zu allem bereit. Der « Führer » hat befohlen, wir werden ihm folgen. Wenn wir je treu und unverbrüchlich an den Sieg geglaubt haben, dann in dieser Stunde der nationalen Besinnung und der inneren Aufrichtung. Wir sehen ihn greifbar nahe vor uns liegen ; wir müssen nur zufassen. Wir müssen nur die Entschlusskraft aufbringen, alles andere seinem Dienst unterzuordnen. Das ist das Gebot der Stunde. Und darum lautet die Parole :

Nun, Volk, steh auf und Sturm brich los !

(Die letzten Worte des Ministers gehen in nicht enden wollenden stürmischen Beifallskundgebungen unter.)

Leo Borchard

Né le 31 mars 1899 à Moscou, de parents russes d'origine allemande, Leo Borchard passe son enfance à Saint-Pétersbourg où il reçoit une solide formation musicale en plus d'être un assidu du Théâtre Stanislavski.

En 1920, après la Révolution russe, il émigre définitivement en Allemagne où il étudie auprès de Hermann Scherchen et de Eduard Erdmann. À Berlin, Il devient co-répétiteur pour Bruno Walter et gagne l'amitié de Gottfried von Einem et de Boris Blacher. À Berlin, il devient l'assistant d'Otto Klemperer à l'Opéra « Kroll » . Ce dernier critiquera la technique de direction de Borchard qui semble manquer de confiance en ses propres moyens. En janvier 1933, il dirige la Philharmonie pour une Ire fois.

Leo Borchard fait la promotion de la musique de jeunes compositeurs. Il protège les musiciens juifs de la discrimination systématique (il donnera des leçons de conduite privées à un étudiant juif) . Pour ces raisons, il est interdit d'activité par le régime nazi, en 1935, pour « manque de fiabilité politique » . Il continue de donner des leçons de musique privées à son appartement et reçoit Blacher et von Einem.

En 1938, Borchard choisit de demeurer à Berlin pour entrer, à son tour, dans la clandestinité (utilisant le nom de code : Andrik Krassnow) . Il participe activement à la Résistance allemande en se joignant au « Cercle de Kreisau » qui transmettra des informations aux Alliés. Il collabore avec Ludwig Lichtwitz, un faussaire spécialisé dans les papiers d'identité dans le but d'émettre de faux certificats médicaux assurant à ses propriétaires d'éviter le service militaire.

En compagnie de sa jolie partenaire, l'auteur Ruth Andreas-Friedrich, Leo Borchard va former un groupe humanitaire sous le nom de code « Onkel Emil » : un réseau secret spécialisé dans le sabotage qui réussira à détruire du matériel de propagande nazi et, en retour, à diffuser leurs propres tracts de même que ceux de la tragique « Rose blanche » . Ils vont sauver des résistants, des ennemis politiques du régime et, surtout, les Juifs à qui ils trouveront des cachettes, procureront de la nourriture, fourniront de fausses cartes d'identité, et soutiendront les familles qui, autrement, seraient sans ressources ni protection.

12 avril 1945 : L'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin donne un concert.

Malgré les risques considérables, Leo Borchard ne quitte pas Berlin, même aux derniers jours de la guerre. Le 26 mai 1945, 2 semaines et demi après la capitulation sans conditions de l'Allemagne et la signature de l'armistice, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et son chef se produisent au cinéma du « Titania Palast » . Au programme : l'Ouverture du « Songe d'une nuit d'été » de Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, le Concerto pour violon en la majeur de Mozart et la 4e Symphonie de Tchaïkovsky. Le concert aura un grand succès auprès du public ; la population traumatisée de Berlin lui vouera une très grande affection. Une semaine plus tard, Borchard est nommé directeur musical du Philharmonique par le fonctionnaire soviétique Nikolai Berzarin, pour succéder à Wilhelm Fürtwängler, en exil en Suisse. Son engagement anti-nazi et son statut de russophone lui ont permis d'engager une relation étroite avec les Occupants. Mais son règne sera de courte durée donnant au total 22 concerts en tant que chef de la phalange berlinoise.

Après la libération de Berlin (pour comble de malheur ou de hasard) , le chef Leo Borchard sera atteint par erreur, le 23 août 1945, d'une balle provenant d'une sentinelle montant la garde à un poste de contrôle des forces américaines d'occupation lors du retour à la maison en automobile, après le concert du Philharmonique. Le chauffeur britannique a mal interprété le signal de la main de la sentinelle qui lui ordonnait d'immobiliser son véhicule. Le chauffeur et la conjointe de Borchard, Ruth Andreas-Friedrich, survivront à l'accident. À partir de ce moment, les signes de la main seront exclus des points de contrôle militaires.

Ruth Andreas-Friedrich, l'épouse de Borchard, rédigera 2 ouvrages sur ses mémoires : l'un relate la période de la guerre et l'autre, le Berlin de l'après-guerre. Borchard ne fut pas la seule victime des forces de sécurité américaines en Europe, cette année-là. 3 semaines plus tard à Mittersill, près de Salzbourg, soit le 15 septembre 1945, le compositeur autrichien Anton von Webern va sortir en fin de soirée sur la terrasse de la résidence de sa sœur (sa maison d'accueil) pour fumer tranquillement un cigare, oubliant les restrictions du couvre-feu militaire. Il est abattu par méprise par une sentinelle américaine nerveuse et en état d'ébriété (il s'agit de Raymond Norwood Bell) qui vit, au loin, un point lumineux suspect.

La discographie de Leo Borchard se résume à très peu. Si bien que l'on a longtemps cru que l'enregistrement du Poème symphonique « Stenka Razin » en si mineur, Opus 13, d'Alexander Glazunov avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne était sous la direction du chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler. La liberté, la puissance, la souplesse, l'élasticité mélodique et le sens dramatique laissaient penser au grand chef. Mais il s'agissait plutôt de Leo Borchard. Son « Roméo et Juliette » de Sergueï Prokofiev, sombre et sans exubérance, atteint un sommet d'introspection et de drame. Dès 1934, il avait déjà montré son talent en enregistrant pour la firme « Telefunken », le « Casse-Noisette » de Tchaïkovsky : seul témoignage commercial sur disque. Nous pouvons raisonnablement affirmer que, malgré une fin cruelle, Leo Borchard réussit à prendre sa place dans le paysage musical allemand de l'après-guerre.

Les 5 et 6 septembre 1995, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et son chef attitré, Claudio Abbado, ont marqué l'anniversaire de la mort de Leo Borchard en programmant la 6e Symphonie, dite « Tragique », de Gustav Mahler.

Les derniers concerts du Philharmonique furent donnés en mars-avril de 1945 pour des soldats puis, de façon privée, pour le ministre de l'Armement, Albert Speer. Dans ses tournées internationales, l'Orchestre fut utilisé comme un instrument de propagande, jouant pour les publics locaux mais aussi pendant la guerre pour la « Wehrmacht ». Les concerts à l'étranger donnèrent parfois lieu à des protestations anti-fascistes qui n'assimilaient pas l'Orchestre au Nazisme avant guerre, mais avec la guerre l'Orchestre (transporté par des moyens militaires souvent) fut surnommé « l'avant-garde des parachutistes » et ses concerts donnèrent lieu à des manifestations qui restaient cependant minoritaires. Quant au répertoire interprété, l'influence nazie fut réduite (même si d'emblée certains compositeurs étaient exclus d'office pour des raisons raciales ou politiques, comme Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg ou Erich Wolfgang Korngold, mais Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy fut joué jusqu'en 1936 et Igor Stravinsky jusqu'en 1939), selon Misha Aster : « Le " canon " des musiciens allemands resta la source principale du répertoire. Même après que l'État eut pris le contrôle de l'Orchestre, le ministère n'eut donc guère besoin de se mêler de la programmation : les choix musicaux des Nazis et le noyau du répertoire de l'Orchestre philharmonique s'harmonisaient dès le départ. » (page 225), soit par goût du public, soit par goût des chefs d'orchestre, et ce dès avant l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir. Plus de 70 % de toute la musique interprétée par l'Orchestre sous le 3e « Reich » étaient constitués d'œuvres de Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Franz-Joseph Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Richard Strauß, puis d'œuvres de Jean-Sébastien Bach, Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann et Carl Maria von Weber, les étrangers les plus joués étant Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski et Hector Berlioz.

Que devint l'Orchestre à la fin de la guerre ? Les musiciens firent une fois de plus preuve de leur sens politique. Le « Vorstand Lorenz Höber » (suspendu par les autorités américaines en 1946, bien que non nazi, pour avoir été le « Vorstand » de l'ère nazie, et réhabilité longuement par Misha Aster) négocia les autorisations de réunion puis la garantie financière de la Ville de Berlin (jusqu'en 2002). Les musiciens demandèrent à Gerhart von Westerman, leur administrateur membre du NSDAP nommé par Josef Goebbels, de négocier avec les Russes dans leur propre langue (il devint intendant officiellement en 1952). Ils choisirent comme chef d'orchestre un autre russophone, Leo Borchard, qui était entré dans la résistance allemande après avoir été mis à l'index par les Nazis en 1943, puis, Borchard ayant été tué par un G.I., un jeune chef roumain, Sergiu Celibidache (avant le retour de Fürtwängler en 1947, et, après sa mort en 1954, le choix de Karajan). Certains musiciens trop liés aux Nazis partirent, d'autres furent suspendus lors de la dénazification. Le dernier concert de l'ère nazie, en avril 1945, s'était terminé par le poème symphonique « Mort et transfiguration » de Richard Strauß. Le 1er concert de l'ère nouvelle, le 26 mai 1945, donna à entendre des œuvres de Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy et Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski.

Leo Borchard, le chaînon manquant entre Furtwängler, Celibidache et Karajan

Quelle étrange et triste destin que celui de Leo Borchard : né le 21 mars 1899 à Moscou de parents allemands, il acquiert une solide formation musicale à Saint-Petersbourg, ville de son enfance. Mais la Révolution Russe contraint la famille Borchard à revenir définitivement en Allemagne, dès 1920. C'est là que le jeune musicien parfait sa formation de chef-d'orchestre avec Hermann Scherchen, Bruno Walter et Otto Klemperer, se liant parallèlement à de jeunes compositeurs allemands tels que Boris Blacher ou Gottfried von Einem. Les années '30 voient Leo Borchard dans les studios d'enregistrement où il grave environ 35 faces de 78 tours pour la firme « Telefunken », essentiellement avec l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin. Mais le régime nazi l'interdit bien vite de direction sous prétexte « d'absence de fiabilité politique », ce qui l'amène, dès 1938, à faire partie du groupe de résistants anti-nazi « Onkel Emil », sous le nom de résistance d'Andrik Krassnow. Après la chute du Nazisme, Borchard dirigera les 1ers concerts de la Philharmonie de Berlin pendant que Wilhelm Furtwängler était inquiété dans les procès de dénazification. C'est au retour de l'un de ces concerts, le 23 août 1945, que Leo Borchard sera absurdement tué par une sentinelle américaine, lui qui avait toujours été farouche adversaire du Nazisme, en actes comme en propos .

On peut toujours imaginer quel aurait été le futur musical si cet acte stupide n'avait pas eu lieu : sans doute Sergiù Celibidache ne lui aurait-il pas succédé à la Philharmonie de Berlin, mais, surtout, la carrière d'Herbert von Karajan aurait-elle été sensiblement différente de celle que l'on connaît. Il n'en est pas moins vrai que le nombre de documents sonores légués par Leo Borchard est assez restreint, ce qui est fort déplorable si l'on envisage leurs qualités artistiques : l'essentiel du CD « Tahra » est constitué d'interprétations remarquablement nuancées et convaincantes de l'Ouverture d' « Obéron » de Weber, de Roméo et Juliette de Tchaïkovsky et du poème symphonique « Stenka Razin » de Glazounov, captées par la Radio berlinoise, en juin 1945 - le Glazounov ayant longtemps été attribué par erreur à Wilhelm Furtwängler (qui ne l'a jamais dirigé) , ce qui démontre à suffisance les qualités interprétatives : grandeur, noblesse et sens de l'architecture musicale. La présence en complément de la Suite de ballet « Casse-Noisette » dans un enregistrement commercial « Telefunken » de 1934-1935, est vraiment adéquate car, non seulement, elle confirme les affinités de Leo Borchard avec la musique russe, mais de plus, sa version est d'une délicatesse et d'une subtilité rares, et l'on comprend vraiment à l'audition pourquoi Mozart était le compositeur favori de Tchaïkovsky.

Au total, les interprétations proposées sur le disque nous révèlent un musicien sympathique et remarquablement doué, trop tôt arraché à notre monde par l'absurdité humaine. Nous ne savons si d'autres bandes-radio du chef ont survécu, mais en tout cas, « Tahra » serait bien inspiré en publiant un « Leo Borchard, volume 2 » contenant d'autres gravures commerciales « Telefunken » : l'Ouverture « Banditenstreich » (Les joyeux bandits) de Franz von Suppé, une Symphonie de Franz-Josef Haydn, la musique de « Peer » Gynt d'Edvard Grieg, le Concertino pour piano de Jean Françaix (avec le compositeur en soliste) , sans compter les divers accompagnements à l'orchestre de chanteurs tels que le baryton viennois Hans Reinmar (1895-1961) - dans « les Adieux de Wotan » ; le ténor allemand Marcel Wittrisch (1901-1955) ; et la soprano finlandaise Aulikki Rautawaara (1906-1990) .

Signalons que les textes de la plaquette ont été rédigés par Karin Friedrich, fille de la compagne de Leo Borchard, et que les transferts sont les meilleurs possible pour ce genre de documents sonores, tout en prévenant que la bande originale de « Roméo et Juliette » était légèrement mais irrémédiablement détériorée en plusieurs endroits de son début.

Sergiu Celibidache

Août 1945 : Après avoir étudié la philosophie et les mathématiques à Bucarest, le jeune Sergiu Celibidache étudiait tranquillement la musique à Berlin auprès de Fritz Gmeind et Heinz Tiessen (lesquels exercent une profonde influence sur lui) . La suite de coïncidences fortuites l'amènent à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique. Il semble qu'aucun autre chef expérimenté n'était disponible à cette époque ou en mesure d'être accepté par les autorités des 4 puissances qui occupaient désormais le territoire de Berlin.

Fin août 1945 : Celibidache dirige à Berlin un retentissant concert. Le succès est tel que l'Orchestre le prend immédiatement comme chef principal (attitré) .

Celibidache dirige 108 concerts à la tête de la Philharmonie de Berlin au cours de la seule saison 1945-1946.

Février 1946 : Sergiu Celibidache prend officiellement le relais du défunt chef Leo Borchard. Il dirige un total de 128 concerts en 1946-1947 !

Wilhelm Fürtwängler écrit 22 lettres à Celibidache, entre avril 1946 et octobre 1952. Fürtwängler est toujours là, au moins dans le cœur des musiciens, qui y voient le seul garant de la tradition du grand Orchestre allemand. Bien qu'adulé par le public et très cher au cœur de l'Orchestre, il doit néanmoins attendre d'être passé devant la Commission de dénazification avant d'être de nouveau autorisé à diriger. Pendant ce temps, Sergiu Celibidache est donc le chef le plus souvent requis par les musiciens mais c'est en vérité une solution d'attente. Comme l'illustrent les échanges de lettres entre les 2 hommes, leurs rapports sont alors cordiaux et pleins de respect l'un pour l'autre : tandis que Fürtwängler se replie sur la composition (principalement, la difficile gestation de sa 2e Symphonie) , Celibidache profite à plein de son statut de « directeur artistique et chef autorisé depuis le 1er décembre 1945 » .

La volonté de Celibidache de faire du Philharmonique un orchestre « moderne » , au sens américain du terme, ne convient ni au public, ni aux critiques, ni même aux musiciens. (Il présente beaucoup d'œuvres nouvelles de compositeurs tels que Boris Blacher, Heinz Tiessen, Paul Hindemith et Egon Wellesz.) Même si le chef Roumain donne 414 concerts à la tête de l'Orchestre, entre 1945 et 1954, il n'en dirige que 40 au cours de la saison 1948-1949. Il faut dire, qu'entre-temps, le contexte a évolué. En avril 1947, Fürtwängler dirige pour la 1re fois depuis la guerre, à Rome, l'Orchestre de l'Académie Sainte-Cécile et, après son acquittement définitif, reprend le dessus aussi bien en Allemagne qu'en Autriche.

25 mai 1947 : Fürtwängler donne son 1er concert avec la Philharmonie de Berlin depuis la fin de la guerre ; le programme étant tout entier consacré à Beethoven. Celibidache doit alors partager la direction de l'Orchestre jusqu'à la mort de ce dernier en 1954. Il multipliera les tournées avec d'autres Orchestres, notamment en Amérique latine.

Les 2 hommes se retrouvent néanmoins sur un accord commun : empêcher l'ascension de Herbert von Karajan. Ainsi, en juillet 1947, Fürtwängler exige du directeur du Festival de Salzbourg que « monsieur K » (comme l'un et l'autre le surnomment) n'y dirige jamais de son vivant, faute de quoi lui-même n'y viendrait pas. L'interdiction de diriger qui pesait sur Karajan est levée en octobre 1947 et, dès cette époque, ses engagements se multiplient aussi bien à Londres qu'à Vienne. Assistant à certains de ses concerts, Celibidache tient Fürtwängler informé de ses impressions le concernant mais leur « ennemi commun » ne suffit pas à les réunir de nouveau.

1948 : Celibidache fait ses débuts londoniens pour ensuite enregistrer quelques disques pour la firme « Decca » .

Avril 1951 : Fürtwängler emmène la Philharmonie de Berlin pour une tournée égyptienne de 10 concerts, au Caire et à Alexandrie.

7 décembre 1951 : Fürtwängler renoue avec la Philharmonie à Berlin.

Janvier 1952 : Fürtwängler redevient le chef attitré de la Philharmonie de Berlin.

Les critiques de Celibidache à l'égard de la Philharmonie de Berlin, les atermoiements de Fürtwängler, les transactions administratives marquent alors une période compliquée pour l'Orchestre. Les rapports avec Celibidache sont alors très tendus (Fürtwängler qualifiant même, dans une lettre, son attitude de « caprice de Prima Donna ») , au point que celui-ci jette définitivement l'éponge.

Celibidache entame alors une carrière de chef itinérant au Danemark, notamment, en Suède, en Amérique du Sud et maintes fois en France, mais surtout en Italie où il dirigera les Orchestres de La Scala à Milan, l'Orchestre de l'Académie nationale de Sainte-Cécile à Rome et, entre autres, les Orchestres de la radio italienne (RAI) à Rome, Milan, Naples et Turin. Ses exigences pour de longues séances intensives de répétition seront enfin plus facilement satisfaites à la radio qu'aux concerts présentés dans les grandes salles de concerts symphoniques.

Sergiu Celibidache ne redirigera la Philharmonie de Berlin qu'une seule fois, en 1994, sur l'intervention du Président de la République Fédérale d'Allemagne pour un ultime concert consacré à la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner.

« Pour l'homme normal, le temps c'est ce qui vient après le début ; le temps de Bruckner, c'est ce qui vient après la fin. Je suis heureux de pouvoir encore aujourd'hui lire les lignes qu'il nous a laissées. » (Sergiu Celibidache)

Contrairement à ce que l'on peut voir souvent écrit, Celibidache n'a jamais été l' « assistant » de Fürtwängler, mais le chef « associé » de l'Orchestre. Cette méprise est due à Karajan qui fit purement et simplement effacer son nom de la liste des chefs titulaires et il faut donc rendre hommage au chef actuel de la Philharmonie, sir Simon Rattle, pour avoir rétabli le nom de Celibidache sur cette liste lors de son entrée en fonction.

8 septembre 1953 : Karajan dirige l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin pour la 1re fois depuis 1945.

20 septembre 1954 : Furtwängler donne son dernier concert à une époque où son jeune rival autrichien dirige le Philharmonique pour la 2e fois seulement depuis la guerre. Alors que certains pressentent Karl Münchinger pour lui succéder, c'est Herbert von Karajan qui l'emporte finalement à l'unanimité. La candidature de Celibidache sera rejetée. Ce dernier quittera prestement Berlin.

...

Le chef d'orchestre roumain Sergiu Celibidache est né le 28 juin 1912 à Roman, près de Jassy (capitale de la Moldavie), au nord-est de la Roumanie ; et est mort le 14 août 1996 à La Neuville-sur-Essonne, dans l'arrondissement de Pithiviers, près de Paris.

Il étudiera la philosophie et les mathématiques à Bucarest, puis la musique à Berlin auprès de Fritz Gmeind et Heinz Tiessen lesquels exerceront une profonde influence sur lui.

En août 1945, alors qu'il était tout jeune chef d'orchestre, une suite de coïncidences fortuites l'amèneront à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Wilhelm Furtwängler, le chef titulaire qu'il admirait beaucoup avait préféré s'exiler en Suisse en attendant d'être « dénazifié » puisque toute apparition publique lui était alors interdite. Pour comble de malheur ou de hasard, le chef Leo Borchard qui devait alors le remplacer fut accidentellement tué par une sentinelle américaine. Or, il semble qu'aucun autre chef expérimenté n'était disponible à cette époque ou en mesure d'être accepté par les autorités des 4 puissances qui occupaient désormais le territoire de Berlin.

Celibidache fut ainsi nommé chef du Philharmonique de Berlin, en février 1946. Mais, au retour de Furtwängler, en 1947, il dut partager la direction de l'Orchestre jusqu'à la mort de ce dernier, en 1954. Jusqu'alors, le jeune chef roumain avait dirigé l'Orchestre 414 fois, présentant beaucoup d'œuvres nouvelles de compositeurs tels que Boris Blacher, Heinz Tiessen, Paul Hindemith et Egon Wellesz. À la mort de Furtwängler, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin choisira Herbert von Karajan pour lui succéder et rejettera la candidature de Celibidache qui quittera prestement Berlin. Il ne redirigera le Philharmonique de Berlin qu'une seule fois, en 1992, sur l'intervention du Président de la République Fédérale d'Allemagne. Contrairement à ce que l'on peut voir souvent écrit, Celibidache n'a jamais été l'assistant de Furtwängler, mais le chef associé du Philharmonique de Berlin. Cette méprise est due à Karajan qui fit purement et simplement effacer son nom de la liste des chefs titulaires et il faut donc rendre hommage au chef actuel de la Philharmonie, Simon Rattle, pour avoir rétabli le nom de Celibidache sur cette liste lors de son entrée en fonction.

En 1948, Celibidache fera ses débuts londoniens pour ensuite enregistrer quelques disques sous étiquette « Decca ». Après son départ de Berlin, il entamera une carrière de chef itinérant au Danemark, notamment, en Suède, en Amérique du Sud et maintes fois en France, mais surtout en Italie où il dirigera les Orchestres de La Scala, à Milan, l'Orchestre de l'Académie nationale de Sainte-Cécile, à Rome et, entre autres, les Orchestres de la radio italienne (« RAI ») à Rome, Milan, Naples et Turin. Ses exigences pour de longues séances intensives de répétition seront enfin plus facilement satisfaites à la radio qu'aux concerts présentés dans les grandes salles de concerts symphoniques.

À partir de 1959, il travaillera avec l'Orchestre symphonique de la radio de Stuttgart et, en 1960, commencera à donner des classes de Maître en direction d'orchestre à l'Académie musicale Chigiana de Sienne qui lui valurent un statut légendaire.

Entre 1960 et 1963, Celibidache travaille intensément et assidûment avec l'Orchestre royal du Danemark et, de 1962 à 1971, deviendra directeur en chef de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio suédoise qu'il rebâtit totalement. De 1972 à 1977, il sera ensuite nommé chef titulaire de l'Orchestre symphonique de la radio de Stuttgart et, de 1973 à 1975, celui de l'Orchestre national de France, période qui restera gravée dans la mémoire de plus d'un mélomane français. Malheureusement, son désir de réformer cet Orchestre et certaines dissensions syndicales l'amèneront à renoncer au travail amorcé en France.

Ainsi, de 1979 jusqu'à sa mort, il sera nommé chef titulaire de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich dont il fera l'un des meilleurs ensembles au monde. Il y tiendra des classes de Maître en direction d'orchestre et ne cessera plus de diriger et d'enseigner, particulièrement la phénoménologie de la musique à l'Université de Mayence (1978-1992) et au « Curtis Institute » de Philadelphie. Il mettra alors à profit ce qu'il avait découvert et étudié dans sa jeunesse : la phénoménologie (philosophie) d'Edmund Husserl. Il donnera bénévolement, aussi, des classes de direction d'orchestre en France à la « Schola Cantorum » et dans sa propriété de La Neuville-sur-Essonne.

Disciple du Maître spirituel Sathya Sai Baba, Sergiù Celibidache appartenait à une école de pensée qui contestait que les mots ou le raisonnement fussent vraiment capables de rendre la réalité accessible. Ainsi, il affirmait qu'un concert enregistré sur disque ne pourrait jamais rendre la totalité de l'expérience et des « épiphénomènes » vécus lors d'un concert donné en salle, allant jusqu'à assimiler un concert enregistré à une nuit d'amour passée avec une photographie de Brigitte Bardot !

Heureusement, toutefois, pour ceux qui n'auront pu assister à ses concerts, les diffusions de ses concerts radiophoniques furent souvent enregistrées car la radio permettait de plus longues séances de répétitions, en particulier en Italie, en Suède et en Allemagne. Hélas, de son vivant, plusieurs de ces enregistrements seront édités et paraîtront sous des étiquettes non officielles et de qualité sonore médiocre. Après sa mort, son fils Serge Ioan Celebidachi, réalisateur de cinéma, autorisera la « Deutsche Grammophon » à publier et distribuer les enregistrements de Stuttgart (1971-1977, de même qu'à « EMI Classics », ceux de Munich (1979-1996) enregistrés par la Radiodiffusion Bavaroise. Ce qui mettra définitivement un terme à la diffusion de plus en plus importante de bandes pirates de qualité exécrationnelle.

Les copies CD éditées mettront particulièrement en valeur ces interprétations des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner, la musique française de Debussy, Ravel, Roussel et Milhaud, des Symphonies n° 1 et n° 9 de Chostakovitch de même que des extraits wagnériens proprement stupéfiants. Les revenus de la vente de ces disques sont intégralement reversés à 2 fondations créées par Serge Ioan Celebidachi : l'une pour la musique (« Sergiù Celibidache Stiftung »), l'autre humanitaire (« SC Help »).

Plusieurs enregistrements vidéos de Celibidache sont également disponibles, dont ceux avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich et Daniel Barenboim au piano. Celibidache avait alors accepté de se laisser filmer à condition que tous les bénéfices de la vente fussent toutefois ultérieurement remis à l'UNICEF.

Avec le recul, Sergiù Celibidache, qui était membre de l'Académie roumaine, aura fait partie des musiciens qui auront beaucoup réfléchi sur la musique et la phénoménologie de la musique ; réflexions qu'il transmettait volontiers mais uniquement oralement et lesquelles furent tenues pour importantes et considérables. Sa conception de la technique de direction d'orchestre aura aussi eu une très grande portée et l'on se rappellera, qu'à ce propos, il répétait et dirigeait presque toujours de mémoire et sans partition aucune.

Il appréciait tout particulièrement les musiques allemande, russe et française, n'ayant pas ou très peu dirigé d'Opéras. Il aura dirigé, par contre, plusieurs œuvres de musique vocale non mises-en-scène : les « Passions » de Bach, le « Requiem » de Mozart, celui de Fauré, de Verdi. Pour ce qui est de la musique allemande, il vouait un culte tout à fait particulier à la musique symphonique du compositeur autrichien Anton Bruckner. Au chapitre de la musique française, il se révéla être un interprète de 1er ordre de Claude Debussy et de Maurice Ravel. Son soliste préféré fut le pianiste italien Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli avec lequel il aura notamment interprété le 5e Concerto pour piano (« Empereur ») de Ludwig van Beethoven et le Concerto en sol de Maurice Ravel dont il existe un enregistrement public filmé à Londres, en 1982.

La dépouille de Sergiù Celibidache repose désormais en paix dans le très petit cimetière de La Neuville-sur-Essonne. Sa tombe est toujours régulièrement visitée par sa famille et des admirateurs de passage.

Sur le tempo :

« Mon Dieu, que je serais heureux si Furtwängler était parmi nous aujourd'hui et montrait au monde ce qu'est un tempo large ! »

Sur la direction d'Opéra :

« Vous savez combien de difficultés les chefs doivent affronter lorsqu'ils travaillent avec simplement l'Orchestre. Alors imaginez la somme de soucis supplémentaires qui vous tomberaient dessus s'il s'agissait d'Opéra : chanteurs arrogants, metteurs en scène ayant peu de connaissances musicales mais jamais à court d'idées à faire trembler la terre, corps de ballet gambadant tout autour de la scène. Sans parler des choristes qui ne vous suivent pas parce qu'on leur a imposé de regarder du mauvais côté. Que devient la musique dans tout cela ? »

Sur le compositeur Tchaïkovski :

« Dès qu'il pose la main sur l'Orchestre, cela sonne ! »

Sur Anton Bruckner et la profondeur de sa musique :

« Pour l'homme normal, le temps c'est ce qui vient après le début ; le temps de Bruckner, c'est ce qui vient après la fin. Je suis heureux de pouvoir encore aujourd'hui lire les lignes qu'il nous a laissées. »

...

À une époque où les personnalités artistiques tendent à se couler dans des moules identiques, Sergiù Celibidache avait systématiquement refusé une évolution dictée par les moyens de reproduction et de communication. À sa façon, il était resté un homme d'une autre époque en refusant d'enregistrer le moindre disque en studio, la musique exigeant un renouvellement permanent et ne pouvant s'entendre qu'une seule fois, dans un cadre précis. Elle ne pouvait donc être reproduite. D'ailleurs, le commerce de la musique, entravé à sa quête de l'absolu, ne l'intéressait pas. Le cérémonial du concert, événement sacré, avait beaucoup plus d'importance. Il était considéré comme un mythe de la direction d'orchestre.

Il naît à Roman, près de Jassy, en Roumanie, le 28 juin 1912. Après avoir fait des études de philosophie et de mathématiques à l'université de Bucarest, il se fixe à Berlin en 1936 et parfait sa formation en se spécialisant dans la mécanique ondulatoire. Il étudie la musicologie à l'Université Friedrich-Wilhelm avec Arnold Schering et Georg Schünemann et soutient une thèse de doctorat consacrée à Josquin des Prés. Parallèlement, il s'inscrit à la « Musikhochschule », où il est l'élève de Fritz Stein, de Heinz Gmeindl et de Kurt Thomas (1939-1945). Il est toujours à Berlin, en 1945, lorsque Wilhelm Furtwängler se trouve interdit de direction en attendant de passer devant la commission de dénazification. L'Orchestre philharmonique, qui venait de trouver un chef intérimaire en la personne de Leo Borchard, se trouve de nouveau orphelin à la mort de celui-ci. Celibidache est alors nommé, malgré son inexpérience. On sait peu de chose sur lui à cette époque. La légende commence à se forger : exigence, mémoire fabuleuse, volonté intraitable. Mais certains prétendent qu'il maîtrise mal les grandes œuvres du répertoire. Néanmoins, ses lers pas dans la carrière se déroulent dans des conditions exceptionnelles car il semble évident qu'il apprend beaucoup au contact d'un tel Orchestre.

Sergiù Celibidache : « La musique n'est rien »

C'est le titre d'un livre qui vient d'être publié par les éditions Actes Sud : textes et entretiens pour une phénoménologie de la musique - avec un seul texte écrit en fait, et de circonstance, puisqu'il était destiné à soutenir une conférence prononcée à Munich, en 1985. Celibidache, né en 1912, disparu en 1996, d'origine roumaine mais suivant ses propres déclarations « berlinois » de cœur, était d'abord et avant tout musicien et chef d'orchestre. Toute sa vie, il s'est déclaré partisan d'un style de communication directe, vivante, de l'instant unique, qui ne peut ni se reproduire ni se transmettre par les moyens techniques de l'enregistrement, de la conservation ou de la reproduction. Vers la fin de sa vie, il a consenti à quelques enregistrements (cd et dvd) de quelques concerts, destinés sans doute à une demande de plus en plus pressante au fil des années, à conserver sûrement la mémoire de ses interprétations, particulièrement celles des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner. Mais il a maintenu en le répétant maintes fois qu'il se désolidarisait complètement de telles techniques. Pour preuve, il a stipulé finalement que le bénéfice des ventes de tels enregistrements reviendraient tous et entièrement à ses fondations qui sont actuellement gérées par ses héritiers. Alors, si « la musique n'est rien », qu'est-ce donc ? J'avais terminé un 1er article, il y a 2 jours, que j'avais soigneusement sauvegardé comme à l'habitude, et une panne d'ordinateur me l'a sabré dans la nuit, inexplicablement. J'avais pris la peine de citer longuement Celibidache, en ajoutant peu de commentaires. Cette fois, contraint de reprendre mon ouvrage, je citerai moins Celibidache et je m'exprimerai davantage à titre personnel, non pour le critiquer mais pour livrer des réflexions nées d'un certain recul provoqué par l'empêchement de ma 1re publication.

Mon interprétation d'abord, je la dirai d'emblée. « La musique n'est rien » : il faut comprendre « la musique n'est rien de matériel ; la musique n'est pas quelque chose » et Celibidache le dit lui-même mot pour mot. Dans sa conférence sur la Phénoménologie musicale, il distingue entre le son matériel (l'équivalent d'un simple bruit) qu'il appelle en allemand « Klang », et le son musical, en allemand « Ton ». Celui-ci a été produit par l'homme, il y a fort longtemps : c'est l'homme préhistorique même, dont j'ai déjà écrit qu'il avait inventé l'art pictural, pariétaire à cette époque, qui invente ce son particulier qu'il tire d'un simple tuyau taillé dans un roseau, voire d'un tibia préalablement évidé.

« Qu'est-ce que le son (“ Klang ”) ? Le son est mouvement. Le son est vibration. Qu'est-ce qui se meut ? La matière brute : une corde, une masse d'air ou de métal. Nous savons que tout est mouvement. Si le son est mouvement, qu'est-ce qui distingue le son pouvant devenir musique des autres formes de mouvement ? C'est la structure spécifique et à nulle autre semblable qui est à sa base : les vibrations égales et qui demeurent égales. Pour une unité temporelle déterminée, le même nombre de vibrations : voilà l'essence du son (“ Ton ”) musical. » (page 38)

Ce son régulier a ceci de particulier qu'il se prolonge d'harmoniques si nombreuses et si riches qu'elles parviennent ainsi à créer littéralement ce qu'il convient alors d'appeler « musique », celle-ci ayant, quant à elle, la particularité d'entrer en consonance avec les affects humains, la propriété même de révéler à l'homme ce qu'il est lui-même, si subtilement dissimulé par la vulgarité d'une condition naturelle soumise aux aléas d'une existence bien périlleuse : un être spirituel au fond de lui-même. La phénoménologie exposée par Celibidache (il le précise également) est bien loin de la phénoménologie husserlienne. Elle en garde les 2 principaux concepts. L'intention, qui est devenue ici l'intention d'advenir à cette part plus intime de soi-même, à un inconnu qui nous porte et qui s'appelle Vie ou Dieu même, intention donc de créer d'autres « conditions ». Mieux encore : ce concept de réduction qui cette fois désigne un mouvement d'unification, de réduction à l'Un comme Dieu est Un. L'homme, conçu à l'image de Dieu, va créer ce geste qui n'est plus de nature mais de culture, de réduire en unité ce qui se trouve donné en l'état de multiplicité d'expériences par la nature. Mais en musique, c'est tout à fait exceptionnel, ce produit de culture ne trouve sa réalité, son accomplissement, que dans un phénomène, un « épiphénomène » même à peine perceptible. En musique, ce sera l'octave, la quinte, et autant de subdivisions du son principal, originaire (Celibidache en a même fait une démonstration durant sa conférence, avec son piano, et en même temps sur un tableau !) et c'est bien ce qui fait que la « musique n'est rien », ni la partition, c'est bien évident, ni même le « beau son » qui nous caresse les oreilles comme s'appliquent à le cultiver les musiciens contemporains. La musique naît plus haut, à l'instant de cet évanouissement du son matériellement perceptible, chant si subtil et si spécifiquement humain qui s'adresse à l'âme humaine, qui la révèle à elle-même, la renforce et la nourrit. Il faut lire ce livre pour apprécier tous les exemples donnés par son auteur, et aussi les contre-exemples : « ce que la musique n'est pas » ! Je reviendrai un peu plus loin sur cette notion de tempo au cœur de toutes les polémiques qui l'ont opposé à la plupart des critiques musicaux.

Mais je lui laisse la parole maintenant pour nous dire à sa façon, avec l'exemple pris de Beethoven et Bruckner, pourquoi il estime que la « musique n'est rien ». Il y a un accent polémique qui donne toute sa force au témoignage. De même, comment il peut dire que « la musique n'est pas (que) belle » - et encore, c'est moi qui ajoute « que » entre parenthèses ! « La musique n'est pas quelque chose qui, dans une définition, se laisserait saisir par des symboles intellectuels et des conventions du langage. Elle ne correspond à aucune forme d'existence perceptible. La musique n'est pas quelque chose ..." (page 36) « La musique n'est pas belle, elle est vraie. » (page 71) et ceci plus précis :

« La musique n'est pas belle. Si elle reste à l'état de " belle ", vous n'avez encore rien fait. La musique est vraie. Toute beauté qui se détache de l'être humain est permanente. C'est cette soif de permanence qui nous anime pour être derrière le son. Pourquoi le son m'attache-t-il ? Pourquoi me touche-t-il à ce point ? Celui qui arrive à savoir que la musique est vraie a dépassé la beauté. Cette dernière beauté est, au fond, la vérité. Rien n'est plus beau que la vérité. » (page 83)

Je retrouve bien ici, explicitement, un thème qui me rappelle les intentions du peintre soufi que j'évoquais dernièrement, Behzâd de Herât. Ce n'est pas non plus la belle image qui me ravissait, qui me bouleversait : c'est la vérité morale et spirituelle qu'elle désignait, en direction de laquelle elle faisait signe. En musique, qui plus est, il n'y a aucune trace, aucune matérialité de la composition qui désigne directement cette beauté qui s'appelle vérité.

« Il y a un système pour apprendre une partition, comme on apprend à conduire un avion. Mais la musique n'a rien à faire avec la mémoire. Un musicien qui joue tout de mémoire peut être totalement privé de musicalité ... Qu'est-ce que la partition ? La 5e Symphonie de Beethoven, où est-elle ? Sur la partition ? Pas du tout. La partition n'est qu'une paire de béquilles pour éliminer ce qui l'empêche d'être. Rien d'autre. C'est un mode d'emploi que l'on utilise pour arriver à une réalité dont on n'a aucune idée. » (page 88)

Nous allons voir maintenant comment ces idées se lient à l'interprétation, à la compréhension de la musique de Bruckner.

« Anton Bruckner est le plus grand Symphoniste de tous les temps ... Bruckner a créé de nouvelles formes symphoniques. Au lieu de l'opposition entre 2 thèmes, comme dans la Sonate, il a conçu la triangulation. Pour aborder cette triangulation, il nous faut d'abord découvrir d'où vient l'opposition quand on se trouve en présence de 2 thèmes. Qui crée cette opposition ? C'est cette force intérieure, la vitalité du monde affectif de l'homme qui se met en mouvement. L'opposition ne se situe pas dans l'attachement de l'homme au son, qui n'est d'ailleurs pas de nature symbolique comme le langage. La liaison entre l'intervalle et le monde affectif est directe ... Il (Bruckner) n'est pas aussi immédiat, aussi clair, aussi présent que Ravel. Les réalités qui animent ses textes musicaux sont presque inaccessibles. Dans quel sens est-il le plus grand ? Le langage ne peut pas accéder aux réalités esthétiques musicales. La musique est absolument la dernière réalité. Il n'y a pas d'alternative à la musique ... C'est une méditation. Il n'existe pas de moyen plus court pour arriver à la transcendance que le son ... La musique peut être belle, ça ne dérange pas. Mais elle n'est pas que la sensation de beauté. La beauté qui se matérialise dans la musique est le résultat, la conséquence d'une vérité : la nature divine de l'homme. » (page 95)

Cette profession de foi s'inspire de la philosophie (je devrais dire la spiritualité) orientale, c'est évident. Bouddhiste en particulier, et Celibidache n'en fait pas mystère, bien au contraire. J'en trouve une preuve supplémentaire quelques pages plus loin, cet abandon de soi qui délivre la transcendance et son chant propre :

« Lorsque je dirige, je ne fais rien. Si vous pensez pendant l'acte musical, vous êtes foutu, perdu. Votre savoir n'a un rôle que dans la phase où vous vous appropriez les éléments ... Je crée seulement les conditions pour que les musiciens puissent faire de la musique. La musique n'est pas le son, le son peut devenir musique, et lorsqu'il deviendra musique, il ne sera pas musique ... La musique est un devenir qui n'arrive jamais à l'objectivation ... En transcendant le son, je n'arrive nulle part. Je ne suis plus dans le monde physique, et je ne pourrais pas répondre à la question : “ et si vous n'êtes pas là, où êtes-vous ? ” . En disant : “ Je suis nulle part ”, j'hypostasie. La logique et la pensée s'arrêtent là. » (page 98)

Parlant de Furtwängler, Celibidache nous dit qu'il lui avait révélé en quelques mots que le tempo se trouve lui-même lorsqu'on sent cette vérité enfouie derrière les notes : « ça dépend comment ça sonne » - pas de règles, pas de recommandations, cela vient, juste ou pas ! Beaucoup d'objections peuvent être émises lorsque ces catégories « orientales » sont affirmées aussi abruptement. Certes, Celibidache reconnaît son travail préparatoire, cette « voie négative » qui opère en musique comme en toute catharsis :

« La phénoménologie musicale est un énorme “ non ” devant le “ oui ” de la musique ... » Mais n'y-a-t-il vraiment pas d'interprétation, et je l'écrirai ainsi : « d'interprétations également bonnes ? révélatrices de la même vérité ? »

L'interprète, le musicien doit-il à ce point s'absenter pour délivrer cette « vérité de musique » qui ne lui appartient pas ? Lorsque j'ai longtemps et longuement parler de mes peintres, était-ce pour dire ou prouver qu'il n'y en avait qu'un seul, ou qu'une seule école ? Poussin ou Chardin ? Courbet ou Cézanne ? Et ces portraits que je reproduisais dernièrement : Renoir ou Soutine ? Manet ou Derain ? Tous si différents et capables également de pointer vers cette unique « vérité de peinture » révélatrice d'humanité. Y-a-t-il une seule « version » comme on dit, de la 5e Symphonie - des centaines d'enregistrements, et un seul bon ? Il a été plus facile au Maître de dénoncer les plus mauvais et, notamment, cette manie d'aller de plus en plus vite, d'exécuter des versions éclatantes qui passent bien au microphone ! Je me rappelle avoir entendu une interprétation par des étudiants, dans la rue, du Quatuor « La jeune fille et la mort » de Schubert : c'était maladroit, presque un massacre, et j'ai pourtant été bouleversé. Pourquoi ? Parce que j'avais reconnu le thème, ressenti une nouvelle fois (mais par l'intermédiaire du souvenir) ce sommet d'émotion sans pareille ? Ou alors y aurait-il une vérité plus profonde encore, plus inaccessible ou indicible, de Vie à laquelle l'art nous entraîne, nous fait approcher pour s'éprouver soi-même dans l'absoluité de son être irréductible, ce que j'ai appelé la « splendeur de notre condition » ? Mais il y a quelqu'un pour cela. Et, heureusement, les mots le disent :

« Un comme Dieu est Un » , nous confiait Maître Eckhart. Mais Celibidache aurait été d'accord sur ce point.

Je veux attirer l'attention des lecteurs sur la réussite exceptionnelle d'un enregistrement (je l'ai d'ailleurs déjà signalé) celui de la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner (daté de 1989) avec les « Münchener ». Vous entendez, à la fin, cette battue d'archets qui accompagne la plus longue Coda de toute l'histoire de la Symphonie. C'est inouï : on l'appelle aussi une « échelle céleste », une référence qui nous vient du Haut Moyen-âge chrétien pour symboliser une extase. Mais puisque nous sommes sous influence d'une philosophie orientale (influence reconnue, je le répète, par Celibidache), je voudrais citer une autre 4e, celle de Sibelius, plus courte, plus incisive, une succession de tableaux à peine esquissés comme en peinture chinoise - quelques traits jamais achevés, un art de suggestion. Bruckner, Celibidache le dit lui-même, ne cherchait pas Dieu, il l'avait trouvé et ne pensait qu'à Lui, mais en mystique chrétien. Et la créature, dans cet élan ou cet échange, ne disparaît pas, jamais, elle demeure témoin de lumière et de perfection, témoin conjoint du Seul en co-naissance. C'est, à mon avis, la réalisation la plus haute. Bruckner y est tout le temps. Et s'il n'achève pas sa 9e Symphonie dédiée au « Bon Dieu », c'est que Celui-ci n'a pas voulu. Tout était dit néanmoins. Et les cors, à la fin du mouvement lent, de moduler la fin d'un monde : un exceptionnel accomplissement - mais au scénario de la création ! Bruckner avouait ne pas savoir « à quoi il pensait » en composant cette Coda. Moi-même, je ne sais pas ce que j'ai voulu dire par cette conclusion.

Sergiu Celibidache et l'héritage de Furtwängler

Karl Schumann has observed that Furtwängler had no direct successors, since his personality, experiences and subjective outlook were truly unique. Thus, while the specific approach of a Toscanini could be copied (and was, quite extensively), the highly-personal vision of a Furtwängler could only be caricatured. And, yet, Toscanini's vast former popularity has waned, while Furtwängler has become the inspiration of a host of performers willing to trust their vision and artistic instincts above tradition and the written score.

Foremost among these is Sergiu Celibidache, who was as close as Furtwängler ever came to having a « protégé ». His career, like Furtwängler's, has been seeped in mystique and controversy. Fans laud his eccentricities as the hallmarks of genius ; others condemn them as the signs of a charlatan.

During the long wait for Furtwängler's trial and rehabilitation, the leadership of the Berlin Philharmonic fell to this unknown Rumanian music student who had won a contest and apparently was one of the very few conductors whose politics and War-time activities were above suspicion. Upon his return, Furtwängler retained Celibidache as his assistant. Several of Celibidache's Berlin Philharmonic concerts, from 1948 to 1953, are preserved on « Hunt » 734 (3 CDs) and are quite similar in style to Furtwängler.

Celibidache's recording career is surely the shortest in modern history, having both begun and ended in 1948, when he cut records of Tchaïkovsky's 5th Symphony and the « Nutcracker » Suite (now, on « London » 425 958-2). Their passion, impulse and freshness already mark Celibidache daring to take his Master's qualities to the extreme. Among the conductors' other shared values was their aversion toward recordings. But Celibidache magnified his mentor's mere distaste into abject hatred, proclaiming recordings to be obscene, like a photograph of love-making (with Brigitte Bardot). Lacking Furtwängler's practical willingness to accommodate, following his early venture, Celibidache has steadfastly refused to set foot ever again in a recording studio.

Another quirk which Celibidache refused to compromise was his insistence upon a dozen or more rehearsals for every concert, many times the number any commercially responsible Orchestra could possibly afford. Consequently, Celibidache's activities were effectively limited to occasional projects with heavily subsidized European radio ensembles. His immense talent is preserved on tapes of some of those broadcasts. The results are truly awesome and prove the value of his unorthodox approach : under his baton and attention, even the most provincial group plays with the assurance and subtlety of the Vienna Philharmonic.

A further benefit of Celibidache's rehearsal mania was that, by solving performance problems beforehand, he was free to explore unconventional interpretations that enthralled audiences bored with safe and indifferent run-throughs of familiar repertoire. Like Furtwängler, Celibidache prefers slow tempos, but unlike his mentor, rarely opts for extreme speed as well. He also eschews Furtwängler's sense of melodrama in favor of blending dynamics and sonority into a continuous emotional flow.

Fortunately, many of Celibidache's concerts, through the years, were recorded and have emerged on import CDs. Of those from his years as a musical nomad, the most fascinating were taped, in 1959 and 1960, with various Italian radio Orchestras : a solid Brahms cycle on « Arkadia » (CDGI 764.3) , a glorious Ravel program on « Arkadia » (CDGI 741) , an exquisitely subtle Wagner « Siegfried Idyll » on Arkadia (CDGI 750.1) , a gloriously profound Tchaïkovsky « Romeo and Juliet » Overture on Arkadia (CDM 402) or « Fonit Cetra » (CDAR 2013) , a reverential Mozart « Requiem » on « Arkadia » (CDMP 425.1) , a heartfelt Mozart Mass in C minor on « Fonit Cetra » (CDAR 2007) , and a magnificent Brahms « German Requiem » on « Hunt » (CD : 546) .

In the late- 1970's, Celibidache began to settle down, gravitating first toward the Stuttgart Radio Orchestra and, then, the Munich Philharmonic, of which he has now become the permanent conductor. The « Exclusive » , « Artists Live » and « Originals » labels have all released concerts that evidence even a finer sheen than Celibidache was able to achieve with the earlier Italian ensembles. His artistic temperament is ideally suited to Bruckner, and concerts of the Mass No. 3 (on « Exclusive » 37/38) , the Symphony No. 3 (on « Exclusive » 59) , the Symphonies Nos. 4 and 9 (on « Exclusive » 23/24) , the Symphonies Nos. 5 and 8 (on « Exclusive » 44/46) and the Symphony No. 6 (on « Artists Live » , FED 063) shine a uniquely mesmerizing light on their sprawling structures.

Among Celibidache's other superb concerts released so far are a deeply felt but surprisingly stylish Bach Mass in B minor on « Exclusive » (33/34) and Mozart « Requiem » on « Artists Live » (FED 039) , a languorous Debussy program on « Artists Live » (FED 031) , profoundly meditative accounts of the Franck Symphony in D on « Artists Live » (FED 034) and Moussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition » on « Artists Live » (FED 017) , a swooningly sensual Rimsky-Korsakov « Scheherazade » on « Exclusive » (CD : 85) , seething and passionate Tchaïkovsky Symphonies Nos. 4 and 5 on « Artists Live » (FED 022/023) and ravishing Wagner Overtures on « Artists Live » (FED 026) .

If you want only a single example of Celibidache's magic, grab his Ravel « Daphnis et Chloé » Suites on « Originals » (SH 803) . With absolutely breathtaking dynamics, balances, ensemble and overall polish, this is quite simply one of the most gorgeous examples of orchestral playing ever recorded.

1999 Update - Although little has changed and so I felt comfortable leaving the rest of this 1996 article intact, it should be noted that (a) Celibidache died late that year and (b) « EMI » launched a posthumous CD series featuring his late Munich Philharmonic concerts. Of the bootlegs mentioned above, all the Bruckner works, as well as the Debussy program, Tchaïkovsky 5th, « Romeo and Juliet » and « Pictures at an Exhibition » , are superseded, both sonically and artistically, by the new CDs. For a review of the new « EMI » series, see : « Life After Death » .

For having scorned the expected role of the congenial, cosmopolitan, well-recorded modern Mæstro, Celibidache is often dismissed by the musical establishment as an insignificant kook. But his work is utterly unique and, in our days of boring perfunctory standardization, that, in itself, makes him invaluable.

Celibidache apparently refuses to discuss his feelings toward Furtwängler. But he doesn't have to. Furtwängler's artistic soul and spirit clearly infuse his work and endure through his talent.

...

The Romanian conductor, composer, and teacher Sergiù Celibidache was born on 28 June or 11 July 1912 in Roman, near Iași, a small-town in North-East Romania ; and died on 14 August 1996 in La Neuville-sur-Essonne, near Pithiviers (Paris) .

Educated in his native Romania, and later in Paris and Berlin, Celibidache's career in music spanned over 5 decades, including tenures as principal conductor for the Munich Philharmonic, Berlin Philharmonic and several European Orchestras. Later in life, he taught at Mainz University in Germany and the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Celibidache frequently refused to release his performances on commercial recordings during his lifetime claiming that a listener could not obtain a « transcendental experience » outside of the concert-hall. Many of the recordings of his performances were released posthumously. Nonetheless, he earned international acclaim for celebrated interpretations of Classical music repertoire and was known for a spirited performance style informed by his study and experiences in « Zen » Buddhism. His later career was marred by controversy and accusations of sexism and discrimination that came to light during a 12 year legal battle that dominated his tenure at the Munich Philharmonic.

Sergiù Celibidache was born in Roman, where his father was a government official. Early in his youth, he began studying piano and, after traditional schooling in Romania, he was sent by his father to Bucharest and, then, to Paris where he studied music, philosophy and mathematics. His father had expected him to pursue a political career in Romania. However, Celibidache chose to enroll in the « Hochschule für Musik » (Academy of Music) in Berlin, in 1936, where he studied composition under Heinz Thiessen and, later, conducting under Kurt Thomas, Walter Gmeindl and Fritz Stein. He continued with doctoral studies at the Friedrich Wilhelm University (« Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität ») , in Berlin, where he studied philosophy with Nicolai Hartmann and Eduard Spranger and musicology with Arnold Schering and Georg Schünemann. He submitted a dissertation on Franco-Flemish composer Josquin des Prez (circa 1450-1521) and his work during the Renaissance. He received his degree in 1944. During his studies in Berlin, Celibidache was introduced to « Zen » Buddhism through the influence of his teacher, Martin Steinke, and the tenets of Buddhism informed Celibidache's world-view and work for the rest of his life.

Sergiu Celibidache studied in Berlin and, from 1945 to 1952, he was principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic. He later worked with Radio Orchestras in Stockholm, Stuttgart and Paris. He also worked in Britain, in the late- 1940's and 1950's, due partly to the promotional efforts of the pianist Eileen Joyce and her partner, an artists' agent. Joyce said that Celibidache was the greatest conductor she had ever worked with :

« He was the only one who got inside my soul. »

In 1970, he was awarded Denmark's Sonning Award. From 1979 until his death, he was music director of the Munich Philharmonic. He regularly taught at Mainz University, in Germany, and, in 1984, taught at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Teaching was a major focus throughout his life and his courses were frequently open to all without fee. Among his notable students are François Bernier, Jordi Mora, Peter Perret, Markand Thakar, Konrad von Abel, and Nils-Göran Areskoug, as well as the « Danish Wind Quintet » .

He appeared in the film « Botschafter der Musik » where he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic in a complete performance of Ludwig van Beethoven's « Egmont » Overture.

One controversial incident during his tenure with the Munich Philharmonic was a protracted legal battle to oust principal trombonist Abbie Conant that lasted 12 years, with Conant ultimately prevailing. Judge Angela Mack ruled that the City of Munich through the Orchestra had broken the law concerning the equal treatment of employees. A detailed description of the case and the sexism Ms. Conant had to endure can be found in an internet article published by her husband, William Osbourne. Her audition and controversy is discussed in Malcolm Gladwell's book entitled, « Blink » .

Celibidache died at the age of 84 on 14 August 1996 at La Neuville-sur-Essonne, in the « arrondissement de » Pithiviers, near Paris. He was buried in the Cimetière de Neuville-sur-Essone.

In 1965, Celibidache married Ioana Procopie Dimitrescu. They had 1 son, Sergiu Ioan Celibidache (« Serge ») , born on 19 June 1968.

Celibidache's approach to music-making is often described more by what he did not do instead of what he did. For example, much has been made of Celibidache's « refusal » to make recordings even though almost all of his concert activity actually was recorded with many released posthumously by major labels such as « EMI » and « Deutsche Grammophon » with consent of his family. Nevertheless, Celibidache did pay little attention to making these recordings, which he viewed merely as by-products of his orchestral concerts.

Celibidache's focus was instead on creating, during each concert, the optimal conditions for what he called a « transcendent experience » . Aspects of « Zen » Buddhism, such as ichi-go ichi-e, were strongly influential on him. He believed that musical experiences were extremely unlikely to ensue when listening to recorded music, so he eschewed them. As a result, some of his concerts did provide audiences with exceptional and sometimes life-altering experiences, including, for example, a 1984 concert in Carnegie Hall by the Orchestra of the Curtis Institute that « The New York Times » critic, John Rockwell, touted as the best of his 25 years of concert-going.

Celibidache was well-known for his demands for extensive rehearsal time with Orchestras. An oft-mentioned feature of many of his concerts, captured in the live recordings of them, is a slower tempo than what is considered the norm, while, in fast passages, his tempos often exceeded expectations. In Celibidache's own view, however, criticism of a recording's tempo is irrelevant, as it is not (and cannot be) a critique of the performance but rather of a transcription of it, without the ambience of the moment - for him, a key factor in any musical performance. As Celibidache explained, the acoustic space in which one hears a concert directly affects the likelihood of the emergence of his sought-after transcendent experience. The acoustic space within which one hears a recording of one of his performances, on the other hand, has no impact on the performance, as it is impossible for the acoustic features of that space to stimulate musicians to play slower or faster.

That his recorded performances differ so widely from the majority of other recordings has led them to be seen by some as collectors' items rather than mainstream releases, « one-offs » rather than reference recordings.

Honours and awards :

1970 : Léonie Sonning Music Prize (Denmark) .

1992 : Honorary Citizen of the City of Munich (« Ehrenbürgerrecht von München ») .

1992 : Grand Officers Cross with star, Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany (« Großes Verdienstkreuz mit Stern, Verdienstorden der Bundesrepublik Deutschland ») .

1992 : Honorary Member of the Romanian Academy.

1992 : Doctor honoris causa, Iași Academy of Art and University of Iași.

1993 : Member of the Bavarian Maximilian Order for Science and Art (« Bayerische Maximiliansorden für Wissenschaft und Kunst ») .

Bavarian Order of Merit (« Bayerischer Verdienstorden ») .

Honorary Citizen (« Cetățean de Onoare ») of Iași, Romania.

...

Romanian-born conductor Sergiu Celibidache spent his early life in Roman, a small-town in North-East Romania, near Iași (capital of Moldavia) , and, in 1936, commenced music studies at the « Hochschule für Musik » , in Berlin. At age 33, after winning a conducting competition organized by the Berlin Radio, he became conductor of the reconstituted post-War Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and toured with it to the British and American sectors of occupied Germany. In 1952, he shared the podium with the exiled Furtwängler, the Berlin Philharmonic's general music director, on a tour of the United States. Later that year, when Furtwängler was cleared of allegations of being a Nazi sympathizer and he returned to Germany, Celibidache's appointment with the Berlin Philharmonic was terminated.

Thereafter, the larger part of his career was with the Radio Orchestras of Stockholm (1964-1971) , Stuttgart (1971-1977) , and Paris (1973-1975) . From 1979 until his death, he was music director of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra and general music director of the City of Munich. Between 1983 and 1984, he conducted the student Orchestra at the Curtis Institute, in Philadelphia.

When a music student in Berlin, Celibidache also attended Berlin University where he studied philosophy and formed the Buddhist beliefs he retained throughout his life. He preferred the immediacy of a live performance rather than recordings and, according to his son, felt that recordings prevented the listener's spontaneous involvement with the music and gave a distorted representation of reality. Thus, though widely admired as an outstanding conductor, many of Celibidache's recordings were unauthorized, and some were of poor sound quality. It was not until after his death that, with the cooperation of his family, « EMI Classics » and « Deutsche Grammophon » released a substantial number of recordings, mainly of broadcast performances with the Stuttgart and Munich Orchestras, but also with the Mannheim Philharmonic and London Philharmonic Orchestra. The repertoire is almost entirely Romantic and post-Romantic, including Beethoven, Bruckner, Brahms, Richard Strauß, Debussy, Ravel, Tchaikowsky, Respighi, and Berlioz.

It is perhaps ironic that Celibidache should have received his widest exposure through a medium he did not approve. Yet, his intense, finely balanced and deeply felt interpretations made him one of the greatest names in 20th Century orchestral conducting. Above all, he was a superb technician. Celibidache could not have asked for a better memorial than the current library of recordings, especially those in « The Celibidache Edition » , which includes lengthy rehearsal recordings (one lasts for 45 minutes, complete with English translations) . « Deutsche Grammophon » 's selection is mainly from earlier recordings made with the Stuttgart Radio Orchestra. Proceeds from both labels are given to the Celibidache Foundation for the encouragement of young musicians and a humanitarian organization he set-up to assist needy people in Tibet, Romania, and other parts of the world. His own compositions include 4 Symphonies, I Piano Concerto, and an orchestral suite which he recorded for UNICEF with the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra.

...

Sergiu Celibidache grew-up in the capital of Moldavia, Iași, where his father held an official position. He was already improvising at the piano by the age of 4 and, after a traditional schooling, he studied music, philosophy and mathematics in Bucharest and Paris. His father wished him to pursue a political career in Romania but, instead, Celibidache left for Berlin, in 1936, motivated to study composition at the Berlin Academy of Music with Heinz Thiessen by having heard a String Quartet of his on Romanian radio. 2 years later, he enrolled to study conducting with Kurt Thomas and Walter Gmeindl, while simultaneously attending the Friedrich Wilhelm University to study musicology with Arnold Schering and Georg Schünemann, and philosophy with Nicolai Hartmann and Eduard Spranger. During this period, he became increasingly attracted to Buddhism and « Zen » Buddhism : through his teacher Martin Steinke, he was exposed to Buddhist ideas as to the limits of thought, including what was translatable into music and what was not. Celibidache completed his education, in 1944, with a doctorate on Josquin Desprez. During this period, he was also active as a conductor of student ensembles, attended Furtwängler's rehearsals with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and composed. His works included Concertos, Masses and 4 Symphonies, all of which remained unheard.

With the end of World War II, Celibidache won a conducting competition and began to conduct professionally with the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra, based in the Russian sector of occupied Berlin. He went on to make his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in August 1945, as a result of several related coincidences : the Orchestra's War-time conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler was awaiting de-Nazification procedures in Switzerland ; the Orchestra's 1st post-War conductor, Leo Borchard, had been accidentally killed by an American sentry ; and no other well-known conductors were either available or acceptable to the 4 Great Powers occupying Berlin. In February 1946, he was appointed as chief conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Furtwängler returned to the Orchestra, in 1947, and, henceforth, shared the direction of the Orchestra with Celibidache, up until his death in 1954. By this time, Celibidache had led the Orchestra in 414 concerts, presenting many new works by composers such as Blacher, Tiessen, Hindemith and Wellesz. With the selection of Herbert von Karajan, as the new chief conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic, Celibidache left Berlin, conducting the Orchestra only once again, in 1992.

Celibidache had made his London debut, in 1948, followed by some recording sessions for « Decca » , and after his departure from Berlin, he began a nomadic period, conducting in Italy, in particular. He worked with the Orchestras of La Scala, Milan and the « Accademia di Santa Cecilia » , in Rome, as well as with the Radio Orchestras of Rome, Milan, Naples and Turin, amongst others. His extreme demands for extensive rehearsal time made radio conducting more feasible than with normal concert-giving Symphony Orchestras. From 1959, he began to work with the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra and, from 1960, he held Master-classes in conducting at the « Accademia Chigiana » , in Siena, that soon achieved legendary status.

Between 1960 and 1963, Celibidache worked intensively with the Royal Danish Orchestra and, from 1962 until 1971, he was chief conductor of the Stockholm Radio Symphony Orchestra, which he completely rebuilt. This was followed by a period as chief conductor of the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra, from 1972 to 1977, and 2 seasons as the chief conductor of the « Orchestre National de Radio France » , from 1973 to 1975, which remain a potent memory for many in France. In 1979, he accepted the post of chief conductor of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, which he made into one of the best Orchestras in the world. In Munich, he held Master-classes in orchestral conducting, continuing to conduct and to teach, including the subject of phenomenology at the University of Mainz (1978-1992) , right up until his death.

Sergiu Celibidache was a follower of the religious mystic Sai Baba, and he belonged to a school of thought which denied that the spoken or written word or reasoning may make reality accessible. He believed that, when conducting, it was necessary to let the complexity of sounds from a passage develop and be heard in a concert-hall (an occurrence known as « epiphenomena ») . He went on to maintain that the « epiphenomena » , which added to the total experience of a « live » performance in a concert-hall, could never be captured on record. Hence, the particular magic and uniqueness of a « live » performance would be lost in a recording, the artificiality of which he went so far as likening to going to bed with a photograph of Brigitte Bardot !

Fortunately, his preference for working with Radio Orchestras, because of the extensive rehearsal time permitted, also resulted in many of his performances being committed to tape in Italy, Sweden and Germany, in particular. During his lifetime, many of these recordings were circulated in un-official editions. Since his death, numerous radio recordings have been authorised for commercial release by his family, to ensure the highest possible standards of reproduction. Several video recordings of Celibidache conducting, especially with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, have also been released. Strangely, Celibidache did not object to these in the way that he did to sound recordings.

Whatever their provenance, recordings of Celibidache conducting demonstrate a complete Master at work. His pursuit of the idea of « epiphenomena » suggested that the richer the music, the slower the tempo required ; and, especially in his later years, his generous tempi helped to broaden the vision of the works that he performed. With the music of certain composers, this approach was extremely successful : Celibidache's interpretations of Anton Bruckner, for instance, possessed a transcendental quality that was very powerful. Performances of Brahms, although very different, were equally as successful. His Mastery of orchestral balance, intonation and dynamics, when combined with his deliberate tempi, gave his readings of French music, and of composers such as Ravel and Debussy, in particular, a refinement that was exceptional. By contrast, his interpretations of Russian music such as Mussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition » and Tchaïkovsky's « Romeo and Juliet » possessed an unusual weight and « grandeur » . Celibidache may have been described as one of the last of the « mad genius » conductors (David Hurwitz) but, in truth, little that he conducted was without the greatest musical interest.

...

Sergiu Celibidache (geboren 28. Juni / 11. Juli 1912 greg. in Roman, Region Moldau, Rumänien ; gestorben 14. August 1996 in La Neuville-sur-Essonne bei Paris) war ein rumänischer Dirigent und Musiklehrer mit deutschem Pass.

Celibidache war der Sohn eines Kavallerieoffiziers griechischer Herkunft, sein Geburtsname lautete Celebidachi. Jedoch waren irrtümlicherweise von den deutschen Behörden zwei Buchstaben ausgetauscht worden, und er führte fortan den « falschen » Namen sein Leben lang weiter.

Celibidache studierte zunächst in Bukarest, dann in Berlin Philosophie, Mathematik und Musik (Komposition bei Heinz Tiessen, Kontrapunkt bei Hugo Distler, Dirigieren bei Walter Gmeindl an der Staatlichen Hochschule für Musik Berlin und Philosophie bei Eduard Spranger) , wo er schließlich eine Dissertation über Josquin Desprez vorlegte, aber kriegsbedingt nicht promoviert wurde.

Von 1945 bis 1952 leitete er als Nachfolger Wilhelm Furtwänglers ad interim die Berliner Philharmoniker. Als es um die offizielle Nachfolge des Chefdirigenten ging, entschieden sich die Berliner Philharmoniker für Herbert von Karajan. Es kam zum Bruch mit Celibidache. Erst nach 40 Jahren, am 31. März 1992, dirigierte er (auf bittende Einladung des damaligen Bundespräsidenten Richard von Weizsäcker) mit Anton Bruckners 7. Sinfonie wieder die Berliner Philharmoniker. Auch danach blieb sein Verhältnis zu diesem Orchester schwierig, er hatte auf sechs Proben bestanden und zeigte sich danach enttäuscht.

Nach seinem Bruch mit den Berliner Philharmonikern arbeitete Celibidache mit einer ganzen Reihe von Orchestern in Südamerika, in Stockholm, Kopenhagen, Italien und Paris. Von 1972 bis 1977 übernahm er die Leitung des Radio-Sinfonieorchesters Stuttgart. Von 1979 bis zu seinem Tod war Celibidache Generalmusikdirektor der Münchner Philharmoniker, mit denen er international große Erfolge erzielte, insbesondere mit Werken Anton Bruckners, die er auch in der Stiftskirche Sankt Florian (Bruckners Grab) bei Linz spielte. In München eröffnete er 1985 den neuen Konzertsaal am Gasteig und wurde dort liebevoll « Celi » genannt.

Anders als Herbert von Karajan lehnte er die Musik-Vermarktung per Schallplatte oder CD ab und fühlte sich als Antipode zu Karajan. Seine Erklärung für diese Einstellung war philosophisch : Musik sei keine Konserve, die man festhalten könne, sie lebe im Augenblick der Entstehung, quasi « in statu nascendi » . Musik sei auch an den speziellen Raum ihrer Aufführung (etwa an einen speziellen Konzertsaal) gebunden, der Reichtum der Musik, der sich nur im Raum entfalten könne, werde durch jegliche Aufnahme und Lautsprecher-Wiedergabe beschnitten. Er lehnte daher Aufnahmen ab, so daß die ersten CDs (Konzertmitschnitte) erst nach seinem Tod veröffentlicht wurden. Der Penguin Guide schreibt zu Celibidaches Bruckner-Mitschnitten aus dieser Zeit :

« Für andere stellen (seine) Exzentritäten ein unüberwindliches Hindernis zwischen dem Komponisten und dem Hörer dar. Diese Einspielungen sind schwierig einzuschätzen : für Celibidache-Anhänger sind sie drei Sterne wert, andere, verärgert über seine begräbnishaften Tempi, würden nicht einen einzigen vergeben ! »

Celibidache entwickelte im Kielwasser des Buches Die Grundlagen der Musik im menschlichen Bewusstsein von Ernest Ansermet eine Phänomenologie der Musik.

In den letzten Jahren war Celibidache bekannt für seine langsamen Tempi. Nach seiner Auffassung ließ die Interpretation der von ihm dirigierten Werke keine selbtherrlichen, harten und unbegründeten Effekte in der Musik zu. Er hatte ein großes Publikum weltweit, die Reaktionen auf seinen Dirigierstil waren jedoch zwiespältig und reichten von enthusiastischen Jubelstürmen bis hin zu verständnisloser Kritik. Einer seiner schärfsten Kritiker war der bekannte Münchner Musikkritiker Joachim Kaiser. Dieser warf ihm mangelnde Innenspannung in seinen Interpretationen vor. Celibidache war für seine vielen Proben berüchtigt. Deshalb konnte es auch vorkommen, daß die Interpretation schon bei den Proben ihren Höhepunkt und Transzendenz erreichte und während des Konzerts (aufgrund der starren vorherigen Festlegung der Orchesterstimmen und Phrasierungen durch Celibidache mit wenig Spontanität) eher spannungsarm erklang.

Auf die Frage, was ein Dirigent eigentlich sei, antwortete er einmal :

« Jeder Dirigent ist ein verkappter Diktator, der sich glücklicherweise mit der Musik begnügt. »

Außer der Arbeit von Ernest Ansermet und von Edmund Husserl spielte der Unterricht von Heinz Tiessen und fernöstliche Weisheitslehren wie Zen-Buddhismus eine große Rolle für Celibidache. Er war Anhänger des indischen Gurus Sathya Sai Baba und versuchte, seine daraus gewonnene Erkenntnis und sein spirituelles Bewusstsein direkt in das Musizieren einzubringen und an seine Schüler zu vermitteln. Er hatte die Absicht, jegliches Ego des Interpreten aus den Werken zu verbannen und allein die Musik klingen zu lassen. Er wehrte sich auch gegen den Begriff « Interpretation », da dieser Begriff ja wieder die Individualität und somit das Ego des Dirigenten impliziere, und das hatte seiner Meinung nach im organischen Werdepzess des Werkes nichts verloren. Somit erklangen unter seiner Stabführung vielgespielte Werke, allen voran die Sinfonien von Johannes Brahms und Anton Bruckner, auf eine völlig neue und transzendente Weise.

Celibidache war ein begnadeter Lehrer und unterrichtete in Seminaren und Kursen an den Universitäten Trier, Mainz, München und Paris, sowie in seinem Domizil. Er arbeitete mit Studentenorchestern und der Orchesterakademie Schleswig-Holstein. Sein Unterricht war kostenlos. Bereits zur Zeit seiner Berliner Tätigkeit war er von 1946 bis 1949 Dozent am Internationalen Musikinstitut Berlin, einem der Vorgänger der Universität der Künste Berlin, und unterrichtete etwa fünf Studenten. Ein bekannter Schüler aus dieser Zeit ist Carl August Bunte. Ein weiterer bekannter Schüler von Sergiù ist der rumänische Musiker Cristian Mandeal.

1953 und noch einmal 1988 wurde Celibidache mit dem Deutschen Kritikerpreis ausgezeichnet, 1970 mit dem internationalen Léonie-Sonning-Musikpreis. Am 28. November 1954 erhielt er das Bundesverdienstkreuz für seine « Verdienste beim Wiederaufbau des Berliner Philharmonischen Orchesters nach dem Krieg », 1992 folgte das Große Verdienstkreuz mit Stern. Im gleichen Jahr wurde Sergiù Celibidache mit der Ehrenbürgerschaft der Stadt München ausgezeichnet. Oft wird behauptet, daß er diese Ehre als erster Ausländer erhielt - tatsächlich besaß Celibidache zu dieser Zeit schon die deutsche Staatsbürgerschaft. Allerdings besaß er aus Verbundenheit zu Berlin, wo er von 1936 bis 1954 lebte, bis zur Wiedervereinigung lediglich den « behelfsmäßigen West-Berliner Personalausweis » .

Celibidache starb in seiner alten Mühle in der Gemeinde La Neuville-sur-Essonne in der Nähe von Paris, wo er mit seiner Frau Ioana, einer rumänischen Malerin, lebte. Er ist auf dem kleinen Friedhof des Dorfes begraben. Er hinterließ einen Sohn, Serge Ioan Celibidachi (geboren 1968) .

Am 23. Dezember 1999 wurde die Sergiù-Celibidache-Stiftung gegründet, die sich dem Aufbau eines musikalischen Archivs, insbesondere der Kompositionen von Sergiù Celibidache, widmet. Im Oktober 2002 fand in München das 1. Sergiù Celibidache Festival statt, im Jahre 2004, ebenfalls in München, das 2. Festival. Veranstaltungsort für das 3. Sergiù Celibidache Festival 2006 war Iași in Rumänien.

Im November 2011 wurde das Celibidache Center anlässlich des 100. Geburtstags von Sergiù Celibidache in München gegründet. Der Verein trägt dazu bei, das musikalische Erbe des Mæstro zu pflegen und weiter in die Welt zu tragen und feierte Celibidache im Oktober 2012 mit dem Festival « 100 Jahre Celibidache - Das Fest » .

Une autre étape dans l'histoire de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin va commencer ...

27 février 1955 : Karajan prend la relève lors de la tournée annoncée de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin aux États-Unis et au Canada (avec un arrêt prévu au « vieux Forum » de Montréal dans la tourmente de l' « émeute Maurice Richard ») .

1er avril 1955 : Karajan achève sa tournée nord-américaine de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

La situation de l'Orchestre demeure précaire, et l'idée s'impose qu'une nouvelle salle doit être construite pour accueillir la phalange la plus prestigieuse d'Allemagne. En attendant, les enregistrements des firmes « EMI » et « DGG » sur disque se déroulent régulièrement dans l'église à l'architecture moderne et dépouillée (tapissée de vitraux multicolores) de la « Jesus-Christus-Kirche », située sur la « Hittorfstraße », dans l'arrondissement de Dahlem à Berlin.

5 avril 1955 : Le Sénat de Berlin confirme l' « élection à vie » de Karajan à la tête de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

25 mai 1955 : Karajan signe un « contrat à vie » comme directeur artistique et chef principal de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

5 juin 1956 : Karajan dirige le Philharmonique de Berlin à Vienne.

7 octobre 1956 : Karajan débute une seconde tournée de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin aux États-Unis.

19 novembre 1956 : Karajan achève sa 2e tournée américaine de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

3 novembre 1957 : Karajan débute sa 1re tournée au Japon avec l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

22 novembre 1957 : Karajan achève sa 1re tournée nipponne avec l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

27 octobre 1961 : Karajan entreprend une 3e tournée de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin en sol américain.

8 novembre 1961 : Karajan achève sa 3 tournée étatsunienne de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin recevra une nouvelle résidence près du « Tiergarten », en 1963. La construction asymétrique de l'architecte Hans Scharoun, rappelant une grande tente, reçut le surnom populaire de « Cirque Karajani », en référence au cirque Sarasani. La Philharmonie de Berlin est devenue un emblème de Berlin-Ouest et fait aujourd'hui partie du Forum culturel de Berlin.

15 octobre 1963 : Karajan dirige le concert inaugural du nouveau bâtiment de la Philharmonie in Berlin avec l'exécution de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven.

Capacité de la nouvelle « Philharmonie » : 2,440 places ; celle de la salle de musique de chambre : 1,180 places.

La « Bernauerstraße » et le Mur de Berlin

Le 13 août 1961, la fermeture brutale de la frontière, au niveau de la « Bernauerstraße », entre les secteurs d'occupation a connu des conséquences particulièrement dramatiques pour les citoyens.

Ces derniers se sont vus refuser l'accès à leur proche voisinage du jour au lendemain. Familles, amis et voisins furent séparés. Soudain, la maison d'en face faisait partie d'un autre système politique. C'est ainsi que les habitants de la « Bernauerstraße » sont devenus malgré eux témoins et acteurs de l'histoire d'après-guerre à Berlin. Gagnés par la panique et le désespoir, certains n'hésitèrent pas à sauter de leurs fenêtres pour essayer de gagner Berlin-Ouest et payèrent ce geste de leur vie. Certaines tentatives de fuite des riverains de la « Bernauerstraße » réussirent, sous les objectifs et caméras des médias du monde entier. La violente séparation de la « Bernauerstraße » a laissé derrière elle de profondes cicatrices, encore visibles aujourd'hui. L'ancien « No Man's Land » n'a toujours pas complètement disparu. Une portion du dispositif de démarcation a été conservée entre l'« Ackerstraße » et la « Gartenstraße ». Ce lieu donne une idée précise de l'ampleur et de la largeur du dispositif.

Situé au cœur de la capitale, le « mémorial » du mur de Berlin est le centre principal de commémoration de la division de l'Allemagne. Sur le lieu historique qu'est la « Bernauerstraße », il a été aménagé sur l'ancienne zone frontalière et devrait bientôt s'étendre sur 1,4 kilomètres de long. Sur le site se dresse le dernier tronçon du Mur de Berlin encore conservé dans son intégralité, c'est-à-dire dans sa largeur, avec le mur intérieur, le chemin de ronde, les pylônes d'éclairage, le « No Man's Land », la clôture de signalisation et le mur extérieur. L'ensemble permet de donner une idée de la configuration des installations frontalières à la fin des années 1980. Les vestiges et les traces des dispositifs frontaliers ainsi que des événements dramatiques survenus à cet endroit permettent de mieux appréhender l'histoire de la partition de l'Allemagne.

Le « mémorial » du mur de Berlin fut érigé à l'initiative de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, en 1998, et porte l'inscription suivante : « À la mémoire de la division de Berlin, du 13 août 1961 au 9 novembre 1989, et aux victimes du règne par la violence de la dictature communiste ». Le mémorial comprend un tronçon du dispositif frontalier long de 60 mètres, conservé dans sa configuration originelle, mais avec une interprétation artistique. Le projet a été conçu et réalisé par le cabinet d'architectes de Stuttgart Kohlhoff & Kohlhoff. Avec le centre de documentation du mur de Berlin, la « Kapelle der Versöhnung » (la chapelle de la réconciliation) et les segments de mur conservés sur le cimetière « Sophien-Friedhof » et sur le terrain de la gare du nord, le mémorial du mur de Berlin constitue un ensemble de témoignages historiques qui sera transformé en un vaste lieu de mémoire au cours de ces prochaines années.

Durant la partition, le mur de Berlin longeait le côté sud de la rue sur toute sa longueur. Les portes d'entrée et fenêtres des maisons orientées vers le nord-ouest furent successivement condamnées et murées, et les toits obstrués. À l'automne 1961, les dernières maisons longeant la frontière furent évacuées de force. Après 1963, les bâtiments furent détruits à l'exception des façades du rez-de-chaussée, afin d'offrir une vue dégagée aux militaires à la frontière. Les ruines des maisons furent par la suite dissimulées derrière le mur de béton agrémenté de fil barbelé qui fut érigé.

Les images qui rendirent la « Bernauerstraße » célèbre sont notamment celles de personnes fuyant Berlin-Est en sautant par les fenêtres des maisons pour atterrir sur le trottoir, qui était déjà le territoire de Berlin-Ouest. Une autre photo extrêmement connue est celle du jeune soldat volontaire est-allemand Conrad Schumann, qui saute par-dessus des fils barbelés, le 15 août 1961, pour rejoindre le secteur français de Berlin-Ouest, en jetant au loin son arme. Cette scène se déroula au croisement entre la « Bernauerstraße » et la « Ruppinerstraße ». En raison de la configuration propice de la rue pendant les 1res années d'existence du mur de Berlin, la « Bernauerstraße » était un lieu d'échanges entre les soldats surveillant la frontière côté RDA, les policiers de Berlin-Ouest, et les douaniers ; on a ainsi vu des soldats discuter par-dessus le tracé du mur ou s'échanger des cigarettes.

À partir de cave de certaines maisons de la « Bernauerstraße », des tunnels furent creusés dans le sol argileux pour faire passer des fuyards vers l'Ouest. En 1962, le tunnel n° 29 se terminait au n° 7 de la « Schönholzerstraße ». Des Berlinois de l'Est, du petit enfant à la grand-mère, ont emprunté ce tunnel en rampant pour rejoindre Berlin-Ouest, sans être vus par les garde-frontières. En 1964, un drame se joua lors de la traversée d'un autre tunnel, le tunnel n° 57, dont l'entrée se trouvait au n° 55 de la « Strelitzerstraße » à l'Est. En 2 nuits, 57 Berlinois de l'Est purent s'enfuir en l'empruntant. Cependant, il y eut des échanges de tirs avec les garde-frontières, durant lesquels le soldat Egon Schultz fut mortellement touché.

Entre les intersections avec la « Schwedterstraße » et la « Strelitzerstraße », la « Bernauerstraße » est jalonnée de 4 panneaux, qui font partie du parcours historique du mur de Berlin. Chaque plaque indique l'endroit d'une tentative de fuite, comme celle qui est consacrée à Ida Siekmann, qui fut abattue le 22 août 1961. Ou encore celle dédiée à la tentative de passage en force spectaculaire du garde-frontière de la « RDA », Conrad Schumann. La 3e plaque commémorative rend hommage à une tentative de fuite à l'Ouest réussie, au cours de laquelle 57 personnes traversèrent la frontière en sous-sol, en empruntant un tunnel long de 140 mètres pour gagner Berlin-Ouest.

Sites

Bernauer Straße, n° 48.

Bernauer Straße, n° 78.

Angle Ruppiner Straße / Bernauer Straße.

Angle Strelitzer Straße / Bernauer Straße.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CsqACUvNSgY>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=eYWx-DSXSq4>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gAme6EcOAf4>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rvtGhhnDBzw>

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=w8Gds92-L34>

Sous la baguette du « Reich »

Il a fallu attendre 62 ans pour que les fonds de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin concernant la période entre 1933-1945 soient enfin ouverts aux historiens. Misha Aster, un très jeune historien et musicologue canadien, a relevé le redoutable défi posé par ces nouvelles archives en publiant un ouvrage particulièrement méticuleux intitulé :

« Sous la baguette du “ Reich ”. Le Philharmonique de Berlin et le National-Socialisme » : traduction française de « Das Reichsorchester » aux Éditions Héloïse d'Ormesson, Paris (2009) , 414 pages.

Né en 1978 au Canada, installé à Berlin, le jeune musicologue, scénographe et historien Misha Aster a eu accès aux archives du ministère de l'Instruction populaire et de la propagande de Josef Goebbels, au peu qu'il subsiste des archives de l'Orchestre philharmonique, et à des archives privées venant d'anciens membres de l'Orchestre pour écrire cette étude d'ensemble, la Ire jamais écrite sur les rapports entre le Philharmonique de Berlin et l'État national-socialiste. L'Orchestre fut couvert de lauriers et protégé par les Nazis, et son chef, Wilhelm Fürtwängler, fut accusé de l'avoir dirigé lors de manifestations nazies comme les anniversaires d'Adolf Hitler. Misha Aster s'interroge sur la transformation de l'Orchestre en instrument de propagande « sous la baguette du “ Reich ” » ou sur ses éventuelles marges d'autonomie de l'Orchestre en se plaçant, dans le débat entre les interprétations « intentionalistes » et « fonctionnalistes » des activités de l'État nazi, plutôt du côté des « fonctionnalistes ». L'ouvrage est organisé en 6 chapitres. Misha Aster retrace d'abord l'histoire administrative de l'Orchestre. Les 5 autres chapitres sont thématiques, qui traitent de ses membres, des aléas de sa situation financière, de ses concerts et des publics qui les fréquentèrent, de sa programmation musicale et de ses tournées internationales. Le Philharmonique de Berlin fut fondé en 1882 comme communauté autonome puis, à partir de 1903, comme Société à responsabilité limitée, une « GmbH » dont chaque musicien en activité était actionnaire, dirigée par un comité élu de 3 membres, le « Vorstand » (titre du président de ce comité) . Les difficultés financières croissantes de l'Orchestre après 1918, malgré sa réputation internationale, le poussèrent à accepter en 1929, en échange d'un financement régulier eu égard à « son importance pour toute l'Allemagne » , le principe d'une participation majoritaire de la Ville de Berlin, du « Land » et du « Reich » .

Le jeu du nationalisme

La crise de 1929 fit échouer cet accord et aggrava la situation financière de l'Orchestre. En 1933, l'Orchestre joua une nouvelle fois la carte du nationalisme, faisant ainsi le jeu du nouveau ministre de l'Instruction populaire et de la

Propagande, Josef Goebbels, dans sa lutte contre le ministère de l'Intérieur. En janvier 1934, le « Reich » obtint le monopole au sein de la « GmbH », rachetant les parts des musiciens qui devinrent des fonctionnaires, l'Orchestre devenant un « Reichsorchester » protégé par Goebbels (y compris contre les formations concurrentes protégées par Hermann Göring). Ainsi, par exemple, les efforts financiers (salaires, primes, retraites) et matériels (logements) furent faits pour engager et garder les meilleurs musiciens allemands, pour fournir à l'Orchestre les meilleurs instruments (beaucoup de pièces historiques venant de pillages) et, surtout, les musiciens obtinrent un statut les rendant non disponibles pour les obligations militaires, qui fut respecté jusqu'à la fin de la guerre. Le « Reich » versa des sommes colossales pour soutenir l'Orchestre ou, au moins, minimiser ses pertes, et l'Orchestre joua constamment la défense de son statut exceptionnel. En échange, le Philharmonique joua régulièrement devant la quasi-totalité de l'élite nazie, y compris Hitler, Goebbels et Göring, ainsi que lors du congrès du NSDAP à Nuremberg en 1936, 1938 et 1939 et pour d'autres cérémonies officielles (Jeux Olympiques de Berlin en 1936, anniversaires d'Hitler à partir de 1937, Journées de l'art allemand, concerts pour la « Hitlerjugend », concerts prônant « l'amitié entre les nations » avec des partenaires étrangers pour montrer en fait la supériorité des musiciens allemands) et, enfin, collaboration avec le « KdF » (« Kraft durch Freude » ; qui élargit le succès croissant de l'Orchestre, lui offrant, au-delà de son traditionnel public bourgeois, un public plus populaire) ou concerts dans des usines, pour la « Wehrmacht », pour la Croix-Rouge allemande et des organisations de charité (« Wintershilfswerk », par exemple), ainsi que des concerts radiodiffusés (émissions régulières contribuant à l'effort de guerre) à partir de 1939.

Des choix de compositeurs sur critères raciaux

Les derniers concerts furent donnés en mars-avril 1945 pour des soldats puis, de façon privée, pour le ministre de l'Armement, Albert Speer. Dans ses tournées internationales, l'Orchestre fut utilisé comme un instrument de propagande, jouant pour les publics locaux mais aussi pendant la guerre pour la « Wehrmacht ». Les concerts à l'étranger donnèrent parfois lieu à des protestations anti-fascistes qui n'assimilaient pas l'Orchestre au Nazisme avant-guerre, mais avec la guerre l'Orchestre (transporté par des moyens militaires souvent) fut surnommé « l'avant-garde des parachutistes » et ses concerts donnèrent lieu à des manifestations qui restaient cependant minoritaires. Quant au répertoire interprété, l'influence nazie fut réduite (même si, d'emblée, certains compositeurs étaient exclus d'office pour des raisons raciales ou politiques, comme Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg ou Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, mais Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy fut joué jusqu'en 1936 et Igor Stravinsky jusqu'en 1939).

Selon Misha Aster :

« Le " canon " des musiciens allemands resta la source principale du répertoire. Même après que l'État eut pris le contrôle de l'Orchestre, le ministère n'eut donc guère besoin de se mêler de la programmation : les choix musicaux des Nazis et le noyau du répertoire de l'Orchestre philharmonique s'harmonisaient dès le départ. » (page 225),

... soit par goût du public, soit par goût des chefs d'orchestre, et ce dès avant l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir. Plus de 70 % de toute la musique interprétée par l'Orchestre sous le 3e « Reich » étaient constitués d'œuvres de Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner, Haydn, Mozart, Richard Strauss, puis d'œuvres de Bach, Schubert, Schumann et Weber, les étrangers les plus joués étant Tchaïkovski et Berlioz. Sur la centaine de membres de l'Orchestre, Misha Aster estime à une vingtaine le nombre d'inscrits au NSDAP et à moins le nombre de Nazis convaincus, dont les tentatives pour réorganiser l'Orchestre selon les principes idéologiques nazis furent diversement couronnés de succès. Ainsi, la fusion avec le « Berliner Sinfonie-Orchester » fut-elle annulée en 1933, sous la pression de Wilhelm Fürtwängler, aboutissant au départ de membres du NSDAP et de vétérans de la guerre, alors que, selon un exclu « des étrangers et des Juifs restent dans l'orchestre ». Fürtwängler fit tout pour garder les 4 membres juifs de l'Orchestre, qui partirent après que la formation devint un Orchestre d'État, et pour protéger les épouses juives de musiciens. La communauté des musiciens resta très silencieuse sur ces sujets. Entre 1933 et 1935, la direction annula les abonnements des mélomanes juifs. À partir de 1938, le Philharmonique fut représenté par un « Vorstand » (Lorenz Höber) non nazi, principal responsable des activités de l'Orchestre, mais aussi par un conseil élu composé de musiciens membres du NSDAP.

Pour Misha Aster : « Dès sa création, la culture de l'Orchestre philharmonique avait privilégié la recherche d'un consensus réaliste. En un sens, c'est là l'essence même d'une communauté démocratique - y compris quand elle cède à des extrémistes. L'essentiel restait de pouvoir faire de la musique à un niveau exceptionnel et dans un environnement à la fois protégé et créatif. Comme quelques années plus tôt face au destin de leurs collègues juifs, en 1937-1938, les musiciens de l'Orchestre avaient encore une certaine liberté de choix, même limitée. En se pliant extérieurement aux exigences du Nazisme, ils pouvaient espérer s'attirer les bonnes grâces du régime et conserver leurs privilèges tout en sauvegardant ce qui subsistait des valeurs du " Gemeinschaftsgeist ". » (pages 98-99)

À partir de la fin de 1938, les musiciens durent prêter serment au « Führer » et, en 1939, sortit un nouveau règlement de service très autoritaire, conçu par l'Orchestre. Il est enfin un dernier domaine où l'exigence idéologique et politique d'une exaltation de certaines valeurs musicales joua : le choix des chefs d'orchestre et des solistes. En mars 1933, avant la transformation en « Reichsorchester », les Nazis n'interdirent pas un concert de Bruno Walter mais mirent en gardent contre de possibles perturbations et l'impossibilité pour l'État d'assurer le service d'ordre, et proposèrent de remplacer Walter par un chef moins « controversé ». Walter annula lui-même le concert et fut remplacé par Richard Strauß paré dès lors de l'image du « sauveur » .

Wilhelm Fürtwängler, la « star » de l'Orchestre

La même méthode fut utilisée contre Otto Klemperer (autre chef d'orchestre juif) , remplacé par Carl Schuricht, l'un des représentants de cette génération de brillants chefs d'orchestre qui se firent un nom durant la période nazie : Eugen Jochum, Hermann Abendroth, Karl Böhm, Clemens Krauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Herbert von Karajan. Très peu de chefs mineurs dirigèrent l'Orchestre à la suite d'un « lobbying » personnel acharné ou d'intrigues politiques. Reste le cas Wilhelm Fürtwängler, la véritable « star » de l'Orchestre, dont la figure domine le livre de Misha Aster.

Il n'y apparaît pas comme quelqu'un qui était idéologiquement proche des Nazis mais comme un homme « qui croyait vraiment au pouvoir transcendant de la musique » et estimait que « la véritable mission de l'art » était « d'élever l'humanité au-dessus d'une réalité morcelée ». Néanmoins, il sous-estimait gravement la portée de la rupture instaurée par Hitler. Confronté aux empiètements de l'idéologie, Fürtwängler réagit en luttant pour préserver les acquis, pour défendre sa liberté artistique et donc l'autonomie de son Orchestre. Cependant, les Nazis ne lui concédaient ces avantages qu'en échange de la légitimation de leurs conceptions pernicieuses. (pages 258-259)

Dans cette partie d'échecs avec les Nazis, Fürtwängler joua habilement de son prestige. En 1934, il devait diriger la création de « Mathis le peintre », Opéra de Paul Hindemith, à l'Opéra d'État de Berlin. Considéré comme une œuvre dissidente, l'Opéra fut interdit. Fürtwängler démissionna de ses fonctions. Il ne fut plus jamais le chef principal officiel du Philharmonique de Berlin, mais il s'était rendu indispensable, de nombreux mélomanes ayant exigé le remboursement de leurs abonnements aux séries de concerts philharmoniques qu'il dirigeait. Les Nazis lui demandèrent de revenir, mais il dirigea dorénavant de l'extérieur, avec les honoraires d'un chef invité. Ce geste facilita sa posture visant à s'abstenir autant que possible de diriger des concerts liés de trop près au NSDAP, même s'il y eut des exceptions. Fürtwängler utilisa souvent ses relations personnelles avec Josef Gœbbels au profit de l'Orchestre (en défendant des artistes juifs par exemple, ou en négociant des contrats) et, à son profit, dans un contexte de favoritisme généralisé et de rivalités entre Gœbbels et Göring.

Que devint l'Orchestre à la fin de la guerre ?

Les musiciens firent une fois de plus preuve de leur sens politique. Le « Vorstand » Lorenz Höber (suspendu par les autorités américaines en 1946, bien que non nazi, pour avoir été le « Vorstand » de l'ère nazie, et réhabilité longuement par Misha Aster) négocia les autorisations de réunion puis la garantie financière de la Ville de Berlin (jusqu'en 2002). Les musiciens demandèrent à Gerhart von Westerman, leur administrateur membre du NSDAP nommé par Gœbbels, de négocier avec les Russes dans leur propre langue (il devint intendant officiellement en 1952). Ils choisirent comme chef d'orchestre un autre russophone, Leo Borchard, qui était entré dans la résistance allemande après avoir été mis à l'index par les Nazis en 1943, puis, Borchard ayant été tué par un « G. I. », un jeune chef roumain, Sergiu Celibidache (avant le retour de Fürtwängler en 1947, et, après sa mort en 1954, le choix de Karajan). Certains musiciens trop liés aux Nazis partirent, d'autres furent suspendus lors de la dénazification. Le dernier concert de l'ère nazie, en avril 1945, s'était terminé par « Mort et transfiguration » de Richard Strauß. Le 1er concert de l'ère nouvelle, le 26 mai 1945, donna à entendre des œuvres de Mendelssohn et Tchaïkovski.

...

Il était temps que le Philharmonique de Berlin, l'une des formations les plus réputées au monde, fasse le point sur son rôle sous le 3e « Reich ». Question tabou pendant le « règne » de Herbert von Karajan (1955-1989), les fonds ont pu être enfin confiés à un historien, maintenant que la formation est dirigée par le Britannique sir Simon Rattle et que le 1er violon est l'Israélien Guy Braunstein. L'ouvrage d'Aster, dont la parution a coïncidé avec le 125e anniversaire de la fondation du Philharmonique, s'appuie presque exclusivement sur des archives et des collections privées, puisqu'il n'y a jamais eu d'étude consacrée à l'Orchestre. En 6 chapitres, Aster étudie la naissance du Philharmonique et sa mise-au-pas par les Nazis ; puis, les relations entre l'Orchestre et le ministère de la Propagande ; la question financière ; la contribution de l'Orchestre à la vie musicale dans l'Allemagne nazie ; la programmation musicale et le choix des chefs d'orchestre et des solistes ; et, enfin, les tournées de l'Orchestre dans les pays alliés ou occupés ainsi que les réactions des publics de ces pays.

Entre idéologie, principes et pragmatisme

Bien avant l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir, en pleine crise économique, le Philharmonique de Berlin se présentait, afin de réclamer des subsides, comme « un outil de propagande efficace capable de rassembler les Allemands et d'offrir au monde le meilleur de l'Allemagne » (page 264) . Au bord de la faillite, l'Orchestre est sauvé par le ministère de la Propagande en la personne de Josef Gœbbels, qui en fit l' « Orchestre du " Reich " » , en novembre 1933. L'Orchestre ayant été racheté par l'État, les musiciens devinrent des simples fonctionnaires. « Lorsque l'Orchestre tomba sous le joug du ministère de Gœbbels, ce qui n'était qu'une affaire de fierté et de nécessité se transforma en devoir. » (page 264) Le reste du livre est l'histoire d'une extraordinaire « exploitation mutuelle » (page 307) et celle, pas toujours glorieuse, de l'instinct de survie d'un Orchestre.

Conscients de la réputation internationale du Philharmonique, les Nazis choisirent de ne pas trop bousculer le Mæstro Wilhelm Fürtwängler, le « Führer » de l'Orchestre. (page 37) « L'essentiel n'était d'ailleurs pas d'avoir des convictions politiques, mais de répondre à des critères indispensables de talent, d'ambition et de nationalité. Ces hommes représentaient " le meilleur de l'Allemagne ". » (page 246) Il convient de noter que les goûts musicaux de Fürtwängler, les soucis commerciaux de la direction de l'Orchestre et la tendance à l'auto-censure permirent à l'Orchestre de ne pas subir l'ingérence des Nazis dans la programmation musicale ou le choix des solistes. Le Philharmonique sut s'adapter à merveille à l'interdiction des compositeurs juifs et au licenciement de ses quelques musiciens juifs. En de rares occasions, Fürtwängler défia Gœbbels. Mais il le fit pour protéger sa liberté artistique et non pour protester contre la ligne idéologique nazie. De son côté, Gœbbels le laissa faire, ou plutôt, fit semblant de le laisser faire en échange des services si précieux qu'il rendait à l'image du 3e « Reich » en Allemagne (les Congrès de Nuremberg, l'anniversaire de Hitler, l'ouverture des Jeux olympiques de 1936) et à l'étranger (les tournées, l'Exposition universelle de Paris de 1937) . « En acceptant de participer à des manifestations servant ouvertement la propagande nazie, l'Orchestre philharmonique par son excellence même fournissait pour ainsi dire une garantie de qualité au régime. » (page 181) En effet, l'approvisionnement du Philharmonique de Berlin fut l'un des meilleurs coups de « propagande indirecte » de Gœbbels. Tout le monde était content : « L'Orchestre philharmonique était ravi de l'attention des dignitaires, lesquels de leur côté se plaisaient à jouer avec cette " boîte à musique " exceptionnelle. » (page 174)

Membres de l'Orchestre du « Reich » , les musiciens jouirent de la sécurité financière mais aussi d'un prestige sans précédent. (page 108) En outre, le Philharmonique bénéficia d'innombrables privilèges, entre autres, l'acquisition des instruments de musique par le biais du ministère de la Propagande. « Certains instruments furent achetés, d'autres probablement volés » à leurs propriétaires juifs. (pages 109-110) Cela dit, le suprême privilège fut l' « Uk-Stellung » : dès 1939, les musiciens du Philharmonique furent déclarés non disponibles pour les obligations militaires. Grâce à Gœbbels, ce statut particulier fut maintenu jusqu'à la fin du conflit mondial. Celui-ci paracheva l'identification du Philharmonique au 3e « Reich » , au point d'être surnommé « l'avant-garde des parachutistes » . (page 295) Pendant les tournées dans la France de Vichy et en Suisse neutre, ses concerts furent perturbés par des manifestations. (pages 296-298) Malheureusement, le récit de Misha Aster ne donne aucun éclaircissement sur les réactions de Wilhelm Fürtwängler ou des musiciens face à cette méfiance, voire à cette hostilité grandissante.

Des détails musicaux négligés

« J'ai tenté d'éviter autant que possible de prendre position sur le comportement éthique de Fürtwängler et de me concentrer plutôt sur son rôle à l'égard de l'Orchestre », précise Aster dès l'introduction. (page 15) Cette phrase décevra surtout les lecteurs curieux du « cas Fürtwängler », tout comme ceux qui connaissent le film d'István Szabó, « Taking Sides » (2001), mettant-en-scène le Mæstro mythique (joué par Stellan Skarsgård) et l'enquêteur américain chargé d'étudier son cas, le commandant Steve Arnold (joué par Harvey Keitel), inculte et moralisateur. Mais la déception devrait être de courte durée, car, après tout, le titre même de son livre justifie la démarche d'Aster : il s'agit d'étudier les relations entre le Philharmonique de Berlin et le Nazisme, et non entre Fürtwängler et le Nazisme. Fürtwängler ayant été le chef d'orchestre emblématique du Philharmonique de 1922 à 1944, puis de 1952 à 1954, il n'est pas surprenant qu'il soit au cœur du livre. On ne saurait cependant pardonner à Aster d'en faire le seul personnage vivant et nuancé de son récit et de congédier tous les autres après de très brèves esquisses biographiques. Ainsi, à côté de Fürtwängler, Aster évoque d'autres Maestros très connus tels que Karl Böhm, Hans Knappertsbusch et Hermann Abendroth.

Karl Böhm, l'illustre interprète des œuvres de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart et de Richard Wagner, fut un National-Socialiste convaincu.

Hans Knappertsbusch, peut-être le meilleur interprète de « Parsifal », refusa d'adhérer au « Nationalsozialistische Deutsch Arbeiterpartei » (NSDAP : Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands), se brouilla avec Josef Goebbels à cause d'une plaisanterie déplacée aux Pays-Bas, et choisit finalement de diriger le « Wiener Staatsoper » pour s'éloigner de l'Allemagne. (Knappertsbusch refusa catégoriquement de jouer le « Horst-Wessel-Lied » avant chaque concert comme cela était stipulé par le régime nazi. D'après les rapports, Knappertsbusch était « politiquement non fiable » (« politisch unzuverlässig »).

Hermann Abendroth fut arrêté par la police à cause de ses convictions libérales d'avant 1933. Il finit par adhérer au NSDAP pour pouvoir exercer son métier. Comble de l'ironie, Abendroth devint l'un des Maestros les plus appréciés de la République démocratique allemande (RDA) après la guerre.

Ces éléments ayant été totalement omis dans le livre d'Aster, tous ces personnages hauts en couleur sont réduits au rôle de simples figurants derrière Fürtwängler.

Par ailleurs, il est regrettable qu'Aster ne développe pas certains détails pourtant susceptibles d'intéresser ses lecteurs, tant profanes qu'initiés. Même s'il éclaircit quelque peu le « cas Mendelssohn » (pages 238-239), il ne prend pas la peine d'expliquer comment les œuvres de Franz Schubert et de Max Bruch purent être exécutées sous le 3^e « Reich », malgré les rumeurs sur l'homosexualité supposée du premier et sur les origines juives du second. Examinant l'affaire « Mathis le peintre », l'Opéra de Paul Hindemith, Aster n'explique pas comment les dignitaires nazis se débrouillèrent avec les Opéras dont les livrets avaient été écrits par des écrivains juifs tels que Lorenzo Da Ponte, librettiste de 3 Opéras de Mozart, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, librettiste de 6 Opéras de Richard Strauß, et Stefan Zweig, librettiste de 2 opéras du même compositeur. Aster qui, à maintes reprises, souligne la place spéciale accordée aux œuvres de Beethoven par les Nazis, aurait pu au moins expliquer dans une note en bas de page comment l'appropriation, à partir de 1941, des 2 Ires mesures emblématiques de la 5e Symphonie par la « BBC » comme indicatif musical des bulletins d'informations devint un problème politique pour Gœbbels. (Parallèlement à la campagne de « V » pour victoire, les 2 Ires mesures de la 5e Symphonie devinrent un symbole de résistance dans les pays occupés par les Nazis. En effet, certains enseignants appelaient leurs élèves en battant des mains d'après le tempo de ces 2 mesures.

Un récit focalisé exclusivement sur l'aspect administratif

S'il est possible de rétorquer que le livre s'intéresse aux relations entre le Philharmonique et le Nazisme, et non pas à la politique musicale des Nazis, une petite mise-au-point n'aurait pas été complètement hors sujet. Rédigé pourtant par un musicologue et metteur-en-scène, le récit d'Aster est étonnement pauvre en détails musicaux. Ce qui donne à l'ouvrage l'aspect d'une thèse de doctorat : vigoureux, austère et soporifique.

Aster a bénéficié d'une aide financière de la part de la Société des amis de la Philharmonie de Berlin. Après la publication du livre, il affirma que ce soutien financier n'avait eu aucune conséquence sur ses conclusions. Une telle déclaration parle d'elle-même. En effet, certains critiques lui ont reproché d'être complaisant avec le Philharmonique. Aster donne un compte rendu presque idyllique de la renaissance du Philharmonique après 1945 : « Malgré toutes les pressions, l'Orchestre fit une nouvelle fois un choix moralement discutable (l'élection de Herbert von Karajan, en 1954, comme chef d'orchestre principal par les membres de l'Orchestre) mais remarquable d'intelligence politique, commerciale et musicale. Sur les décombres de " l'ambassadeur de la culture allemande " de Josef Gœbbels, l'Orchestre avait su se reconstruire en assimilant son passé et en se réformant si vite et avec tant d'habileté qu'il avait réussi à préserver son prestige incomparable. En tant qu'institution, il avait acquis une telle maturité qu'il lui était possible de choisir impunément même un ancien membre du NSDAP comme chef d'orchestre principal. Avec son sens de la solidarité et son habileté politique, il était resté fidèle malgré tout à la coopération musicale de ses débuts et à sa glorieuse tradition artistique. » . (pages 328-329) Les éloges d'Aster sont déplacés puisque que le Philharmonique se laissa manipuler en connaissance de cause comme instrument de propagande et que la plupart de ses membres préférèrent se réfugier dans une sorte de tour d'ivoire, prétendument apolitique, alors que d'autres musiciens allemands (juifs ou non juifs) eurent le courage de résister. Pour donner quelques exemples, le Mæstro Fritz Busch quitta l'Allemagne en 1933 tandis que son frère Adolf, violoniste et compositeur, fermement opposé aux Nazis, s'installa en Suisse dès 1927. Le pianiste Helmut Roloff fut membre de l'Orchestre rouge (« Rote Kapelle ») , réseau d'informateurs opérant sous contrôle et pour l'URSS. Karlrobert Kreiten, l'élève de Claudio Arrau et l'un des meilleurs pianistes de l'Allemagne à l'époque, fut exécuté pour des propos défaitistes en 1943, à l'âge de 27 ans. Autre exemple, les violonistes Fritz Kreisler et Bronisław Huberman rejetèrent tous les 2 l'invitation de Fürtwängler à se produire avec le Philharmonique de Berlin. Huberman signala dans sa lettre à Fürtwängler qu'il s'agissait de bien plus que d'une simple « interprétation plus ou moins compétente d'un Concerto pour violon » . (page 258) En se contentant ainsi de mettre en lumière le rôle de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin sous le 3e « Reich » , le livre d'Aster évite soigneusement d'analyser son objet à travers le prisme de l'éthique et de la responsabilité artistique. Un tel débat n'aurait pas forcément débouché sur une condamnation pure et simple du Philharmonique pour complicité avec les Nazis, comme Aster semble le redouter, mais plutôt sur des conclusions davantage réfléchies et nuancées. Il aurait alors participé à ce qui s'apparente à un véritable travail d'exorcisme.

Les années de silence (1945-1946)

Article détaillé : Wilhelm Fürtwängler et ses relations avec le régime Nazi.

Ayant appris qu'il allait être arrêté par la « Gestapo », Fürtwängler s'était enfui en Suisse au début de l'année 1945. Après l'effondrement du 3^e « Reich » et la découverte des crimes contre l'humanité d'une échelle sans précédent commis par les Nazis, une partie de la presse helvétique se déchaîna contre Fürtwängler lui reprochant d'être resté en Allemagne (voir la section « La solitude et le soutien de grands musiciens juifs ») . En dépit du fait qu'il n'avait jamais été membre d'une organisation Nazie et que des musiciens juifs de haut niveau comme Yehudi Menuhin, Nathan Milstein et Arnold Schönberg prirent publiquement sa défense, Fürtwängler dut passer par une commission de dénazification sur fond de Guerre froide. En effet, les Soviétiques souhaitaient le récupérer pour Berlin-Est, mais Fürtwängler souhaitait reprendre la direction de l'Orchestre de la ville, situé en zone américaine. Sa défense fut préparée en grande partie par 2 Juifs allemands qui avaient fui le régime Nazi (voir la section « Curt Rieß, Berta Geißmar, le procès et l'acquittement ») . La 1^{re} de ces 2 personnes était Berta Geißmar, qui avait été son assistante jusqu'en 1935. Elle avait préparé un grand nombre de documents prouvant l'aide apportée par Fürtwängler à de nombreuses personnes. Ces documents disparurent mystérieusement lors de leur transfert à la Commission de dénazification. La 2^e était Curt Rieß, écrivain et journaliste qui croyait au départ que Fürtwängler avait été un collaborateur Nazi. Après l'avoir rencontré, Curt Rieß passa l'année 1946 à aider Fürtwängler.

Lors du procès, on reprocha à Fürtwängler 2 concerts officiels pendant la période 1933-1945, son titre honorifique de « Staatsrat » de Prusse (il avait démissionné de ce titre en 1934 mais sa démission avait été refusée) et une réflexion antisémite contre le « demi-Juif » Victor de Sabata. Des musiciens vinrent pour témoigner en sa faveur, comme Hugo Strelitzer qui déclara à la fin du procès : « Si je suis vivant aujourd'hui, c'est grâce à ce grand homme. Fürtwängler a aidé et protégé de nombreux musiciens juifs et cette attitude prouve un grand courage car il le faisait sous les yeux des Nazis, en Allemagne même. L'histoire jugera cet homme. » . La Commission blanchit Fürtwängler. En dépit de cela, certains reprochèrent toujours à Fürtwängler d'être resté en Allemagne et d'avoir dirigé de la musique en présence d'Hitler, comme en témoigne le « boycott » de l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago, organisé en 1948, par des musiciens américains pour empêcher sa venue aux États-Unis.

Interdit de diriger tant que la Commission de dénazification ne s'était pas prononcée, Fürtwängler passa les années 1945-1946 à composer : il termina sa 2^e symphonie et commença sa 3^e.

L'apogée

(Photo) En 1947, Maria Callas venait régulièrement aux concerts de Fürtwängler, en Italie.

En 1947, Fürtwängler reprit sa carrière tout d'abord en Italie. Maria Callas raconta en août 1968 qu'elle assistait régulièrement à ses concerts à cette époque et, après s'être plainte de la baisse du niveau des chefs d'orchestre depuis la mort de Fürtwängler, elle conclut : « Pour moi, il était Beethoven. » . Fürtwängler enchaîna les concerts avec beaucoup de succès.

Le 25 mai 1947, il revint au Philharmonique de Berlin où il dirigea les 5e et 6e Symphonies de Ludwig van Beethoven. La presse parla d'un triomphe, de 16 rappels et surtout d'un public « international ». En effet, de nombreuses personnes que Fürtwängler avait aidées pendant la période Nazie étaient venues pour le remercier. La même chose se reproduisit durant sa tournée à Londres, en 1948, où de nombreuses personnes d'origine juive que Fürtwängler avait aidées vinrent lui faire un triomphe. Le fait que de « nombreux Juifs » étaient allés aux concerts de Fürtwängler à Londres, en 1948, fut rapporté même dans la presse américaine.

Yehudi Menuhin et le message d'amour

En septembre 1947, Yehudi Menuhin, qui considérait que le comportement de Fürtwängler pendant la période Nazie avait été irréprochable, vint à Berlin pour jouer le Concerto pour violon de Beethoven avec lui. La photographie prise à la fin du concert où le chef allemand et le violoniste juif se tiennent chaleureusement la main et font face au public fit le tour du monde et eut une grande portée symbolique. Le visage de Fürtwängler, rayonnant de bonheur, contrastait fortement avec celui, extrêmement crispé, des photographies de la période Nazie. Il s'ensuivit une longue amitié entre les 2 musiciens et des enregistrements de 1er plan, comme celui du Concerto de Beethoven à Lucerne en 1947 et à Londres en 1953, ou encore le Concerto pour violon de Brahms de 1949, de Béla Bartók (le 2e) enregistré en 1953, et celui, tout particulièrement symbolique, de Felix Mendelssohn enregistré en 1952. Cette série de Concertos fut vite considérée comme l'un des sommets de la carrière du violoniste. Yehudi Menuhin écrivit en juillet 1989 :

« À une époque où chacun était entouré de dangers, il a su offrir son aide à beaucoup de musiciens et compositeurs. Hindemith disait qu'il était devenu l'exemple du monde musical. J'ai eu le bonheur, peu après la guerre, de rencontrer en lui un homme qui semblait incarner ce que la tradition allemande a de plus grand et de plus noble. Il était formidable de découvrir avec lui, dans la musique, les prémisses d'une nouvelle Allemagne au milieu des ruines de Berlin. Il a vraiment « racheté » le temps au sens Biblique du terme ; pour lui, le temps signifiait faire de la musique. À travers son interprétation, une œuvre devenait vivante et libre, et il en était de même pour les musiciens auxquels il insufflait une nouvelle inspiration. »

Yehudi Menuhin fut scandalisé par le « boycott » de l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago de 1948 contre la venue de Fürtwängler aux États-Unis car certains de ses principaux organisateurs lui avouèrent avoir eu pour seul but d'éliminer la concurrence de Fürtwängler en Amérique du Nord.

Richard Strauß et les années 1947-1949

Fürtwängler avait souvent dirigé Richard Strauß mais avait toujours émis certaines réserves sur ses compositions. Strauß était, en 1947, proche de la mort et avait vécu une situation similaire à celle de Fürtwängler : il était resté en Allemagne malgré son aversion pour le Nazisme. Fürtwängler apprécia sans réserves les 2 dernières œuvres qu'il composa. La Ire, les Métamorphoses (« Metamorphosen »), est certainement l'œuvre Symphonique la plus aboutie de Strauß : Fürtwängler en dirigea une version prodigieuse en 1947 à Berlin qui montre à quel point les 2 musiciens étaient unis désormais. La même année, il enregistra aussi un « Don Juan » du même niveau. Peu de temps après la mort du compositeur, survenue en septembre 1949, c'est Fürtwängler qui eut l'honneur de diriger la première mondiale de la dernière composition de Richard Strauß : les Quatre derniers lieder (« Vier letzte Lieder ») . Cette première eut lieu à Londres, le 22 mai 1950, avec Kirsten Flagstad et l'Orchestre du Philharmonia.

En 1948, il fit une tournée en Angleterre où fut filmée une répétition de la fin de la 4e Symphonie de Brahms. Une vidéo de l'enregistrement est toujours disponible. Il enregistra à Hambourg sa 2e Symphonie : cet enregistrement prouve que Fürtwängler sut être un grand compositeur. L'influence d'Anton Bruckner est évidente mais sa façon de structurer sa Symphonie relève de la pure tradition allemande plutôt que de celle autrichienne. Le compositeur Arthur Honegger déclara à propos de cette composition : « Il n'y a pas à discuter d'un homme qui peut écrire une partition aussi riche. Il est de la race des grands musiciens. » .

Cette même année, il enregistra 2 fois la 3e des Suites pour orchestre de Jean-Sébastien Bach : dans le célèbre « air » (le 2e mouvement de cette Suite) , Fürtwängler adopta un tempo incroyablement lent. En 1949, il enregistra une ouverture de Leonore II qui est un monument de l'interprétation beethovénienne et une 3e Symphonie de Brahms du même niveau.

La Scala et le Festival de Salzbourg

En 1950, Fürtwängler dirigea un « Ring » de Richard Wagner à la Scala de Milan avec Kirsten Flagstad, qui fut un triomphe. Fürtwängler montra clairement que Wagner avait su articuler à la perfection la musique avec ses innombrables inventions scéniques. Dans son texte sur la Tétralogie daté de 1919 et publié dans « Musique et Verbe » , Fürtwängler expliqua qu'il y avait une grande différence entre « Tristan und Isolde » et le « Ring » : du 1er Opéra se dégageait une grande unité, que Fürtwängler révéla de façon exemplaire dans son enregistrement de 1952, mais non dans le « Ring » où, déclara-t-il, « La musique est entièrement liée au détail et au moment. Tout est assujéti à la tâche d'expliquer. » . Il conclut qu' « il n'existe pas de plus fidèle musique de théâtre » . Ses enregistrements du « Ring » sont, à ce sujet, une véritable mine d'informations pour les interprètes wagnériens tant le chef d'orchestre a compris les moindres subtilités musicales qu'avait inventées Wagner pour colorer cet univers mythologique. Lors des concerts de 1950, sa vision de la musique wagnérienne impressionna 2 jeunes musiciens qui étaient présents : Carlos Kleiber et Claudio Abbado.

Pendant le Festival de Salzbourg de 1950, on demanda à Fürtwängler d'auditioner un jeune baryton de 25 ans du nom de Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Fürtwängler fut subjugué et le prit sous son aile. Ils jouèrent ensemble, durant le Festival de Salzbourg de 1951, les « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » (Chants d'un compagnon errant) de Gustav Mahler qui lança sa carrière internationale. Il le fit ensuite chanter dans le Requiem allemand de Brahms en 1951, dans « Tristan und Isolde » en 1952 et dans la Passion selon Saint-Matthieu de Jean-Sébastien Bach, en 1954. Elisabeth Fürtwängler, la femme du chef d'orchestre, rapporta qu' « après la mort de Fürtwängler, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau m'écrivit qu'il s'était senti un peu comme son fils. » . Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau déclara beaucoup plus tard que Fürtwängler était le chef d'orchestre qui avait eu sur lui la plus grande influence.

C'est durant le même Festival de Salzbourg de 1950 que Fürtwängler enregistra son meilleur « Fidelio » avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne en compagnie, entre autres, de Kirsten Flagstad et Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. Peu de temps après, il dirigea, à Vienne, toujours avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de la ville, un concert pour célébrer le 200^e anniversaire de la mort de Jean-Sébastien Bach. Le point d'orgue du concert fut le 5^e des Concertos Brandebourgeois où Fürtwängler joua, lui-même, au piano. Le musicologue Joachim Kaiser, qui a toujours considéré Fürtwängler comme « le plus grand interprète qui ait jamais », fut tellement impressionné qu'il écrivit immédiatement un article pour le « Süddeutsche Zeitung » : « Lorsque Fürtwängler joue c'est d'une telle monumentalité qu'il se pare de traits mystiques. Rien ne demeure inhabité. Chaque détail respandit et sonne extraordinairement beau, libre et Romantique. Là où d'autres ne voient que des notes les unes à côté des autres, autant d'étoiles isolées, le regard de Fürtwängler découvre des constellations. » . La même année, il enregistra un Concerto grosso n° 10 de Händel. Il se rendit aussi cette année-là à Buenos Aires. Ce voyage eut un impact important sur 2 futurs chefs d'orchestre. Le 1^{er} était Carlos Kleiber qui vint à tous les concerts et répétitions du Maître ce qui l'impressionna profondément. Le second était Daniel Barenboim : il fut tellement bouleversé par la Passion selon Saint-Matthieu que dirigea Fürtwängler qu'il décida de devenir chef d'orchestre durant le concert.

L'accomplissement à Bayreuth

Le 29 juillet 1951, Fürtwängler inaugura le 1^{er} Festival de Bayreuth d'après-guerre avec la 9^e Symphonie de Beethoven avec Elisabeth Schwarzkopf comme soliste dans le Finale. Ce concert symbolisa la renaissance de la culture allemande et un grand nombre de personnalités du monde artistique et de la politique étaient présentes. La direction du Festival fut confiée à Wieland et Wolfgang Wagner qui modernisèrent la mise-en-scène. Herbert von Karajan dirigea « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » et Hans Knappertsbusch un « Parsifal » exemplaire. Mais, comme le dit André Tubeuf :

« L'acte solennel, l'accomplissement sublime, c'est Fürtwängler qui l'assuma : comme Wagner, en 1876, avant d'inaugurer son Palais des Festivals, qui serait voué à sa propre musique, avait sollicité l'auguste parrainage de Beethoven, dirigeant lui-même la 9^e Symphonie au théâtre de la Margravine, ainsi, la veille du grand jour (et 3 quarts de siècle tout juste après Wagner) , Fürtwängler bénissait Bayreuth renaissant en dirigeant la 9^e Symphonie. De l'œuvre immense, il a donné des lectures plus incandescentes et plus furieusement sublimées. Mais aucune fois la circonstance n'avait été si vénérablement solennelle. Le disque était là. Ce qu'il a fixé, c'est un instant mystique de l'histoire de l'Occident. »

Contrairement à 1942, la « joie » fut plus présente que jamais. Dans l'hymne, Fürtwängler commença par un pianissimo quasiment inaudible semblant surgir du lointain. Il réalisa ensuite un gigantesque crescendo où le rubato (c'est-à-dire les variations du tempo) accompagna à la perfection le déploiement de l'émotion de bonheur qui se dégage de la musique de Beethoven. Pour le Finale, il demanda aux chœurs de s'approcher le plus possible du public : il voulait que le texte de Friedrich von Schiller retentisse comme un immense message d'espoir pour l'humanité qui venait de sortir de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Ce concert avait une portée symbolique importante pour Fürtwängler. Il déclara explicitement, à la fin de son procès en dénazification, qu'il était resté en Allemagne pour « assurer la pérennité de la musique allemande » et Arnold Schönberg lui avait quasiment donné l'ordre de rester en Allemagne pour « sauver l'honneur de la musique allemande » . Fürtwängler devait prouver au monde entier, par ce concert de réouverture du Festival de Bayreuth, que l'Allemagne de Beethoven, Goethe et Schiller n'avait été détruite ni par les Nazis ni par les Alliés.

Les derniers grands enregistrements

(Photo) Elisabeth Schwarzkopf fut très proche de Fürtwängler après la guerre.

Durant les 4 dernières années de sa vie, les interprétations majeures de Fürtwängler se succédèrent : en 1951, la Ire Symphonie de Brahms à Hambourg et le 5e Concerto pour piano de Beethoven (intitulé « l'Empereur ») avec Edwin Fischer. La même année, il participa au Festival de Salzbourg où il joua, avec Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, les « Lieder eines Farhenden Gesellen » qui lança la carrière du baryton. Mais Fürtwängler décida de programmer, au Festival, contre toute attente, l' « Otello » de Giuseppe Verdi. La décision était périlleuse : il se lançait en effet « sur le terrain » d'Arturo Toscanini. L'affaire fit grand bruit et tous les experts de Verdi attendaient le chef allemand au tournant. Alexander Witeschnik était l'un deux ; il écrivit juste après avoir assisté à tout le Festival :

« On connaissait l'insurpassable 9e de Fürtwängler, on connaissait son « Fidelio » et son « Tristan », mais Fürtwängler et Verdi ? Le 1er Verdi de Fürtwängler constitua le sommet du Festival de Salzbourg de 1951. Fürtwängler vint, dirigea et vainquit. L'Orchestre Verdi de Fürtwängler est d'une éloquence capable d'exprimer l'inouï et de dire l'ineffable. »

Gottfried Kraus, qui assista lui aussi au Festival, écrivit en 1995 : « Nul n'a été en mesure de rendre aussi nettement saisissable que le fit Wilhelm Fürtwängler toutes les caractéristiques musicales du génial chef-d'œuvre de la dernière phase créatrice de Verdi. » . Fürtwängler prouva, comme lorsqu'il dirigea des œuvres du répertoire slave ou français, que, pour lui, la musique n'avait pas de frontières.

En 1952, Fürtwängler enregistra un « Tristan und Isolde » légendaire avec Ludwig Suthaus et Kirsten Flagstad. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau était Kurnewal, alors qu'Elisabeth Schwarzkopf était présente pour aider Kirsten Flagstad dans les aigus si nécessaire. Kirsten Flagstad fut vexée que l'information ait été diffusée. La diva le reprocha au chef d'orchestre, le tenant pour responsable de la « fuite » . Kirsten Flagstad fut, peut-être, la plus grande soprano wagnérienne de tous les temps mais, en 1952, sa carrière, comme celle de Fürtwängler, touchait à sa fin. Ce dernier sut donner une unité exceptionnelle à l'œuvre et la mort d'Isolde par Kirsten Flagstad, accompagnée par l'Orchestre du Philharmonia dirigé par Fürtwängler, resta comme l'un des plus grands moments de l'histoire de la musique.

Aux Festivals de Salzbourg de 1953 et 1954, Fürtwängler enregistra plusieurs « Don Giovanni » (dont une version filmée) avec une distribution idéale comprenant, entre autres, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Cesare Siepi et Elisabeth Grümmer. Fürtwängler structura tout l'Opéra de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart autour de sa fin tragique : la scène du Commandeur atteignit une grandeur dramatique exceptionnelle. En 1953, il accompagna au piano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf dans les Lieder d'Hugo Wolf.

Le 14 mai 1953, il enregistra en studio la 4e Symphonie de Robert Schumann avec son orchestre, celui de Berlin. Sami

Habra écrit en février 2005 :

« Cette 4e de Schumann fut longtemps considérée comme l'enregistrement du siècle. Avant le joyeux Finale, il y a la célèbre transition durant laquelle Fürtwängler réalise le crescendo le plus impressionnant jamais entendu. Cette manière de faire du grand chef est citée en référence par les professeurs de Conservatoire et les chefs d'orchestre comme étant la perfection même, et ce en dépit de son apparente impossibilité. Celibidache et Karajan ont bien tenté, à plusieurs occasions, d'imiter Fürtwängler dans ce passage, mais tous les 2 se sont retrouvés à bout de souffle vers le milieu du crescendo. Cette interprétation de Fürtwängler n'est pas encore égalee. »

À la fin de sa vie, Fürtwängler devint souvent malade et commença à perdre l'ouïe, comme son père à la fin de sa vie et comme Beethoven, le musicien auquel il s'identifiait depuis toujours. Cette découverte de cette surdité déclencha en lui de grandes inquiétudes et des états semi-dépressifs. Le 23 janvier 1953, il s'effondra en dirigeant l'Adagio de la 9e de Beethoven.

Le chant du cygne et la mort dans la sérénité

En 1954, Fürtwängler enregistra un « Freischütz » de Carl Maria von Weber, une ouverture de l' « Alceste » de Christoph Willibald Gluck et, surtout, il dirigea son ultime 9e à Lucerne avec l'Orchestre du Philharmonia, de nouveau avec Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. Cette version sublimement équilibrée est pleine de retenue et d'acceptation face à la mort qu'il sent venir. L'Adagio, le 3e mouvement, atteignit une beauté ineffable du même niveau que celui de la version de 1942. Il est certain que le Maître de Fürtwängler, Heinrich Schenker, aurait été fier de lui tant cette version atteint la perfection sur le plan musicologique. Bradshaw, le timbalier de l'orchestre, confia à Sami Habra que jouer le 1er mouvement de cette Symphonie avec Fürtwängler fut l'expérience la plus éprouvante et la plus enrichissante de toute sa carrière. Denis Vaughan, qui était l'un des contrebassistes de l'Orchestre du Philharmonia, ajouta : « La manière dont Fürtwängler employait les notes de Beethoven pour nous décrire la vérité a été pour moi une expérience indélébile. » .

Cette année-là, Fürtwängler et l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin furent invités de nouveau aux États-Unis. Fürtwängler, qui avait été très échaudé en 1936 et 1948, ne souhaitait pas y aller. Le gouvernement américain finit par envoyer une invitation officielle et le chancelier Konrad Adenauer déclara qu'il engageait sa « responsabilité personnelle » dans cette affaire. La tournée du plus grand chef d'orchestre allemand devenait une affaire politique, au plus haut niveau, qui devait symboliser la réconciliation entre l'Allemagne de l'Ouest et les États-Unis. Fürtwängler accepta et la tournée fut prévue pour 1955.

En septembre, juste après une ultime « Walkyrie » , lors d'une répétition de sa 2e Symphonie, Fürtwängler se rendit compte qu'il n'entendait plus du tout la ligne de basson initiale. Il semble que le chef d'orchestre, qui n'avait vécu que pour la musique, n'avait plus tellement goût à la vie. Les événements se déroulèrent alors très vite : il attrapa une pneumonie qui se guérissait bien à l'époque comme les médecins le déclarèrent à sa femme. Mais il déclara à cette dernière, avant d'entrer dans l'hôpital à Baden-Baden : « De cette maladie, je vais mourir et ce sera une mort facile. Ne me quitte pas un seul instant. Tu sais, ils croient tous que je suis venu ici pour guérir. Moi, je sais que je suis venu pour mourir. » . Le médecin de l'hôpital déclara à sa femme après l'avoir vu : « Je dois reconnaître que, quand je suis entré dans sa chambre, il n'avait plus envie de vivre. Il avait compris qu'il perdait l'ouïe, et il avait certainement peur de connaître le destin de Beethoven. Je suis certain qu'aucun médecin ne peut guérir un malade qui a perdu la volonté de vivre. »

Wilhelm Fürtwängler mourut le 30 novembre 1954 de cette pneumonie, à Baden-Baden, dans la sérénité la plus profonde. Il fut enterré au cimetière de Heidelberg, le « Bergfriedhof », dans le caveau de sa mère. Un grand nombre de personnalités du monde artistique et de la politique étaient présentes dont le chancelier Konrad Adenauer.

Après sa mort, l'écrivain et metteur-en-scène Ernst Lothar déclara :

« Il était allemand totalement et il l'est resté, en dépit des attaques. C'est pour cela qu'il n'a pas quitté son pays souillé, ce qui par la suite lui a été compté comme une souillure par ceux qui ne le connaissaient pas assez. Mais il n'est pas resté auprès de Hitler et de Himmler, mais auprès de Beethoven et de Brahms. »

Personnalité

« La musique n'est ni intellectuelle, ni abstraite, mais organique, immédiate et comme jaillie des mains de la nature. »

Le « cas » Fürtwängler

(Photo) Richard Wagner. Malgré ses réserves sur la personnalité du compositeur allemand, Fürtwängler prit de plus en plus la défense de ce dernier contre Nietzsche dans son journal personnel.

Fürtwängler était connu pour ses grandes difficultés à s'exprimer. Sergiù Celibidache se rappelait que son argument favori était : « Bien, contentez-vous d'écouter la musique. » . Durant les répétitions avec un orchestre, Fürtwängler parlait peu, parfois fredonnait seulement. Fürtwängler a laissé de nombreux textes qui révèlent une grande profondeur mais qui ne s'expriment pas sous la forme d'un discours philosophique structuré. Les difficultés d'expression de Fürtwängler sont même soulignées par les traducteurs de « Musique et Verbe » . Ils déclarent, en effet, que le chef d'orchestre utilise souvent des structures extrêmement compliquées pour exprimer des truismes voire des choses qui n'ont pas un sens rationnel très clair. Ils écrivent : « Il faut bien en effet se rendre à l'évidence que Fürtwängler n'est pas un « penseur » . Il ne le prétendait d'ailleurs pas. Son discours ici comme ailleurs est plutôt répétitif, voire tautologique. » .

Non seulement il ne le prétendait pas, mais il se méfiait de la spéculation intellectuelle, préférant l'action à travers la créativité artistique. Cela explique que la relation entre Richard Wagner et Friedrich Nietzsche semble l'avoir beaucoup préoccupé, et que la critique du philosophe allemand à l'encontre du musicien, que Nietzsche formula dans son livre « le Cas Wagner » l'ait beaucoup tourmenté. Il écrivit, en effet, un long texte sur ce livre publié dans « Musique et Verbe » . Il était d'autant plus touché par ces critiques qu'il percevait les faiblesses humaines du compositeur (au début de sa vie, Fürtwängler n'aimait pas du tout Wagner même en tant que compositeur) . Mais, progressivement, Fürtwängler, dans ses carnets personnels, défendit de plus en plus le musicien. Il écrivit en 1951 : « La lutte de Friedrich Nietzsche contre Richard Wagner, dans sa volonté de puissance, est la lutte de l'intellect contre l'homme de l'imaginaire. » . La sentence tombe à la fin du texte sur « le Cas Wagner » dans « Musique et Verbe » : « Richard Wagner est un homme d'imagination. C'est-à-dire un être bien plus « profond » que le penseur Nietzsche. » .

Il déclara que la valeur artistique de Wagner est finalement plus importante que ses faiblesses humaines. On comprend que Fürtwängler se soit senti directement concerné par les critiques de Nietzsche contre Richard Wagner. L'intérêt qu'il portait à cette relation révèle que la créativité artistique jouait un rôle, dans l'esprit de Fürtwängler, bien plus important que la spéculation intellectuelle et le langage, mais aussi que Fürtwängler se sentait dans la même situation que Wagner. Ce dernier fut un musicien génial mais à la personnalité très contestée. Or, Fürtwängler fut un interprète exceptionnel mais il savait que sa décision de rester en Allemagne était aussi violemment critiquée par les intellectuels. Il y a même un parallèle direct entre les critiques de Nietzsche vis-à-vis de Richard Wagner et celles de Thomas Mann vis-à-vis de Fürtwängler. L'écrivain allemand, qui considérait Fürtwängler comme le plus grand chef d'orchestre du monde, s'était en effet érigé en « inquisiteur » du chef d'orchestre et ce depuis 1933, en particulier juste après la guerre. Fürtwängler essaya de lui expliquer sa décision de rester en Allemagne et de retrouver un lien d'amitié à travers une relation épistolaire en 1946 et 1947. Mais ces lettres ne menèrent à rien : Thomas Mann ne pardonna jamais à Fürtwängler de ne pas s'être engagé activement politiquement dans la lutte contre le Nazisme. Thomas Mann écrivit à Fürtwängler cette phrase restée célèbre : « Il n'est pas permis de jouer Beethoven dans l'Allemagne de Himmler. » . En fait, Fürtwängler avait répondu clairement, par avance, aux critiques de Thomas Mann dans son texte sur « le cas Wagner » : « L'attitude de Richard Wagner ce en quoi il se différencie le plus de Nietzsche est celle de l'homme qui agit, comme tous les hommes qui ont une action à accomplir, il est lié à son milieu immédiat. Il doit tenir compte des « données » du monde réel. C'est qu'il sait que son travail artistique est étroitement lié à l'action, qu'il est un artiste véritable. Pour Nietzsche, au contraire, aucune possibilité d'agir ainsi : simplement ; directement. Le penseur ne peut fabriquer quelque chose avec un matériau de son choix ni surtout avec lui-même, mais seulement réfléchir sur d'autres êtres ; sur un monde où des hommes s'affirment par des actes. » .

Ce texte, écrit en 1941, concerne non seulement la créativité artistique mais aussi, directement, l'attitude de Fürtwängler durant le 3e « Reich » . Fürtwängler n'a cessé de répéter que c'est dans l'action, dans les gestes concrets, et pas dans une posture intellectuelle, qu'il a combattu le régime hitlérien.

Ses textes sur Wagner et Nietzsche en disent encore plus long sur sa personnalité et sur son rapport à l'art et, en particulier, sur son immense différence par rapport aux Nazis. En effet, Fürtwängler remarqua, toujours dans le texte de 1941, que Nietzsche finit par dire que Wagner n'est qu'un « comédien » . Ce qu'il lui reproche le plus c'est d'être retourné au christianisme avec son « Parsifal » . Il n'est qu'un « comédien » puisqu'il peut passer sans complexe des mythes germaniques au christianisme. Nietzsche aimait les Opéras de Wagner, justement à cause de son intérêt pour ce qui était pré-chrétien (de même qu'il s'intéressait aux pré-socratiques) . Fürtwängler répondit clairement : « Où est (dirait le philosophe) le « vrai » Wagner ? Eh bien justement, l'artiste et le poète est toujours « vrai » . Toujours et partout : dans « Parsifal » comme dans « Siegfried » . Il n'y a d'une œuvre à l'autre, aucune contradiction. » .

Fürtwängler était résolument du côté de l'artiste, pour lequel le contenu intellectuel de l'œuvre n'est pas important mais uniquement la dimension artistique de celle-ci. Adolf Hitler avait une immense fascination pour Wagner. Outre l'antisémitisme du compositeur, c'était surtout pour son retour aux mythes germaniques pré-chrétiens. Les Nazis voulaient retourner au paganisme germanique (en particulier Alfred Rosenberg, le théoricien du Parti Nazi) et considéraient certains Opéras de Wagner comme de vraies cérémonies païennes. Il semble qu'Hitler n'aimait pas Jean-Sébastien Bach probablement en raison de la dimension chrétienne de son œuvre alors que Fürtwängler le considérait comme le plus grand des musiciens. Les Nazis limitèrent même les représentations de certaines œuvres de Bach en raison de leurs nombreuses références à l'Ancien Testament et, donc, au peuple juif ainsi que pour les nombreux mots hébraïques que l'on y trouvait. Pour Fürtwängler, tout cela n'avait aucun sens. C'est, précisément, pour cela qu'il s'était toujours identifié à Ludwig van Beethoven. Il a toujours dit que ce dernier était le compositeur par excellence, de la « musique pure », c'est-à-dire d'une musique qui exprime des choses d'une force extrême mais indépendamment du langage et de tout contenu rationnel explicite.

La musique au centre de tout

Si Fürtwängler eut toujours du mal à s'exprimer, la musique semblait accaparer l'essentiel de son esprit. Le musicien Werner Thärichen expliqua la différence de personnalité entre Herbert von Karajan et Fürtwängler : alors que le 1er passait tous ses temps libres à essayer de battre ses records sportifs, Fürtwängler les passait à jouer de la musique et à composer. Fürtwängler avait, en effet, 2 grands regrets dans sa vie : le 1er, le plus important, était celui de ne pas avoir été compositeur à plein temps ; le 2e, de ne pas avoir été pianiste à plein temps. Il jouait de nombreuses œuvres au piano, en particulier, les Sonates de Beethoven et Frédéric Chopin qu'il adorait. À ce propos, Fürtwängler déclara un jour à Karla Höcker, que « Jean-Sébastien Bach est l'Ancien Testament de la musique, Beethoven le Nouveau Testament ; sinon, il ne reste que Chopin. ». Elisabeth Fürtwängler raconta que son mari était constamment en train de chanter et de diriger avec les bras un orchestre invisible. Cela en était même gênant : les observateurs extérieurs croyaient que le Maître avait un sérieux tic professionnel. Fürtwängler ne cessa de diriger cet orchestre imaginaire que très peu de temps avant sa mort alors qu'il était dans un hôpital à Baden-Baden. Sa femme comprit immédiatement que cela annonçait sa mort imminente.

Cette psychologie particulière explique pourquoi Fürtwängler réussit à rester en Allemagne malgré la forte aversion que lui inspirait le Nazisme : il avait une forte capacité à s'abstraire du monde extérieur et à se réfugier dans son monde musical. Fürtwängler n'a pas quitté l'Allemagne mais a « émigré intérieurement » : c'est exactement ce que Josef Gœbbels reconnut en avril 1944 quand il dit : « Il était dans une sorte d'émigration intérieure. » .

La gestique de la direction

La gestique de direction de Fürtwängler était très inhabituelle. Le bras gauche jouait un rôle anormalement important, semblant exprimer les émotions du chef d'orchestre. Le bras droit, qui est le plus important pour la direction d'orchestre puisque c'est lui qui doit battre la mesure, faisait des gestes flous : c'est la célèbre battue « fluide » de Fürtwängler. Le caractère flou de cette battue est à mettre en relation avec le caractère souvent difficilement compréhensible du langage et de la pensée intellectuelle du chef d'orchestre. Osso Straßer raconta : « Sa gestique était totalement différente de celle des autres chefs. Sa main gauche et l'expression de son visage nous indiquaient avec quelle émotion il fallait jouer. Le plus souvent sa main droite ne battait pas la mesure mais façonnait la phrase musicale et notre concentration aidant, la précision venait le plus souvent d'elle-même. » .

Yehudi Menuhin s'est prononcé sur la battue fluide de Fürtwängler expliquant qu'elle était plus difficile mais plus profonde que celle de Toscanini. Cette battue fluide donnait, en effet, un son d'une très grande richesse. La 1re raison est la suivante : comme Fürtwängler ne donnait pas d'indications précises ni par la battue ni par le langage (lors des répétitions) , la communication devait passer par un canal plus profond et exigeait une concentration extrême des musiciens. Il existe un grand nombre de témoignages de musiciens d'orchestre, dont certains ne jouèrent qu'une seule fois avec Fürtwängler et parfois dans les pupitres les plus éloignés du chef d'orchestre, qui rapportèrent l'effet « hypnotique » et « télépathique » de la direction du chef allemand. Ils se retrouvaient, en concert, avec lui, sachant exactement quand et comment ils devaient jouer sans pouvoir donner d'explications puisque les gestes n'étaient pas plus clairs que les explications en répétitions. Une anecdote célèbre, qui révèle que la simple présence de Fürtwängler pouvait suffire, a été rapportée par Werner Thärichen, l'un des musiciens de l'orchestre de Berlin : un jour qu'ils répétaient seuls sans leur chef, ils se mirent brusquement à jouer de façon « extraordinaire » sans comprendre pourquoi. Puis ils virent qu'une seule chose s'était produite : Fürtwängler venait juste de rentrer, sans rien dire, ni rien faire, sauf les écouter. Yehudi Menuhin rapporta que Fürtwängler lui avait dit la chose suivante : « Les gens se moquent de ma manière de battre la musique, ils disent qu'elle est difficile et embrouillée. Peut-être, c'est ainsi mais elle a un grand avantage : c'est qu'elle retient tout le monde collé sur son siège, réagissant par un 6e sens, de manière instinctive, intuitive, et en tant qu'unité. » .

La 2e explication est la suivante : la battue fluide de Fürtwängler pouvait parfois donner une impression d'amateurisme car les musiciens pouvaient ne pas jouer ensemble. Un exemple bien connu est le 1er mouvement de la 3e Symphonie de Johannes Brahms en 1949 : si certains critiques considèrent que cette interprétation de cette Symphonie est un monument de la direction Symphonique, d'autres considèrent que cet enregistrement a un fort caractère expérimental. C'est le 1er mouvement qui pose problème. En effet, les variations du tempo sont tellement grandes que les musiciens de l'Orchestre de Berlin ont du mal à suivre et ne jouent pas vraiment ensemble. Cependant, en général, les musiciens jouaient ensemble mais toujours avec un petit décalage à cause de la battue fluide de Fürtwängler. C'est ce petit décalage qui permet au cerveau de l'auditeur de bien distinguer tous les timbres de l'Orchestre, donnant ainsi une richesse sonore inouïe même dans les tutti. 2 enregistrements, particulièrement significatifs, révèlent ce « relief » sonore : les 1ers accords gigantesques dans la 1re Symphonie de Brahms à Hambourg, en 1951, ou tous les tutti dans le 1er mouvement de la 7e Symphonie de Beethoven de 1943, à Berlin. Fürtwängler ne voulait, de toute façon, pas battre la mesure. Il écrivit dans son journal personnel en 1936 : « Faut-il battre la mesure ? La battue détruit le sentiment du flux mélodique. » .

Une anecdote montre, qu'avec Fürtwängler, la battue était inutile. En 1927, durant les 1ers jours où il remplaça Felix Weingartner à l'Orchestre de Vienne, les musiciens les plus âgés se plainquirent qu'ils n'arrivaient pas à le suivre. Fürtwängler s'arrêta et s'installa au clavecin pour diriger le 5e des Concertos Brandebourgeois de Jean-Sébastien Bach en jouant de cet instrument. Les musiciens furent tellement subjugués que plus jamais une seule critique ne fut émise sur la battue fluide du chef d'orchestre jusqu'à sa mort en 1954.

L' « au-delà des notes »

Lorsqu'il dirigeait, Fürtwängler semblait littéralement « possédé » par la musique. Son style de direction était comparé à celui d'un « pantin » dont les gestes étaient guidés par des fils invisibles. Tout se passait comme si quelque chose de transcendant était présent : Fürtwängler n'était plus que la marionnette de cette présence transcendante et n'était là que pour transmettre à l'orchestre ses indications. Alexandre Pham expliqua en 2004 : « Stature de commandeur, géant visionnaire, « Jupiter chauve » descendu de l'Olympe : l'évidence crève l'écran. Fürtwängler n'avait rien de commun avec ses semblables. Le voir diriger, à pleines mains, s'agitant comme possédé par une vision intérieure, le regard fixe et pénétrant, nous laisse encore déconcertés. » .

Contrairement à un chef d'orchestre comme Carlos Kleiber, Fürtwängler répétait peu et ne cherchait pas la perfection dans les moindres détails. Un exemple bien connu est le fait qu'il ne donnait même pas d'indication précise pour démarrer ce qui fait que le début de ses concerts était vécu comme un cauchemar par les musiciens. Même dans la célèbre 5e de Beethoven de Berlin de 1943, on entend que, dans l' « attaque » du 1er mouvement, les musiciens ne sont pas ensemble. Il semble que les musiciens de l'orchestre de Berlin, à la fin de la carrière du chef d'orchestre, s'étaient donnés le mot d'ordre suivant : ils avaient désigné l'un des contrebassistes de l'orchestre (son nom était Goedecke) pour donner l'indication de départ. Lorsque ce dernier croyait détecter la volonté du chef d'orchestre de démarrer dans ses gestes bizarres, il osait se lancer et tous les autres musiciens le suivaient. La raison du comportement de Fürtwängler est la suivante. Il ne dirigeait pas pour remplir son contrat et délivrer un produit bien fini mais pour créer quelque chose d'extraordinaire et pour unir tous les musiciens et le public. Au départ, il cherchait à créer une tension nerveuse et émotionnelle palpable par tous indiquant que quelque chose d'exceptionnel allait se produire.

À ce propos, le chef d'orchestre Bernard Haitink raconta qu'il s'était rendu à Salzbourg lorsqu'il était jeune pour assister à des concerts de Fürtwängler. Lors du 1er concert, il vit arriver un personnage à l'allure « bizarre » et les musiciens ne jouaient même pas en même temps. Il pensa : « Mais c'est ça le grand Fürtwängler ? » . Puis, il rapporta que, durant le concert, il sentit une espèce de « courant électrique » traversant tout son corps et tout son esprit. Le même phénomène se reproduisit durant tous les concerts : il se sentit, pendant tout son séjour à Salzbourg, complètement bouleversé émotionnellement. Le fait que Fürtwängler ne cherchait pas la perfection des détails mais plutôt l' « extraordinaire » semble être au cœur de sa personnalité. C'est pourquoi il improvisait souvent. Pour Fürtwängler, faire des erreurs n'était pas grave, du moment qu'il arrivait, parfois, à atteindre quelque chose de tout à fait hors norme : ce qu'il appelait l' « au-delà des notes » . Ce trait de caractère se retrouve chez de nombreux artistes. On a reproché toute sa vie à Claude Monet d'être incapable de finir un seul tableau. La plupart des œuvres de Michel-Ange ou de Léonard de Vinci sont considérées comme inachevées. Parfois, il semble qu'ils le faisaient exprès pour laisser une part d'imaginaire ouvrant sur ce qui est au-delà du sensible, sur le « spirituel » . On peut multiplier les exemples : le clair-obscur de Rembrandt, la touche impressionniste de Diego Vélasquez. À ce propos, Fürtwängler adorait l'Italie où les œuvres d'art sont partout. Or, il avait, justement, une fascination prononcée pour les statues inachevées de Michel-Ange, comme la « Pietà Rondanini » , « les esclaves » de la Galleria dell'Accademia de Florence. Il déclara, en effet :

« J'entends dire que, plus on fait de répétitions, mieux on joue. C'est une erreur. Il faut seulement réduire l'imprévu à sa juste mesure, c'est-à-dire à l'impulsion soudaine qui échappe au contrôle de la volonté mais qui répond à un désir obscur. Gardons à l'improvisation sa place et son rôle. Il me semble que le vrai interprète est celui qui improvise. On a terriblement mécanisé l'art de diriger en cherchant la perfection plus que le rêve. Dès que le rubato est scientifiquement calculé, il cesse d'être vrai : l'exercice de la musique est autre chose que la recherche d'une réussite. Ce qui est bien, c'est d'essayer. Voyez les sculptures de Michel-Ange, il en est de parfaites, d'autres sont seulement ébauchées. Ces dernières me touchent plus que les autres car j'y sens la marque du désir, le rêve en marche. C'est cela qui me passionne : fixer sans figer, jouer le jeu en respectant le hasard, concevoir une musique dans sa cohérence suprême, c'est-à-dire accorder les mouvements de l'âme à l'équilibre architectural. »

La musique comme un acte de « communion »

Fürtwängler plaçait la relation à l'autre au centre de son art. Comme il avait du mal à communiquer par le langage, c'est par la musique qu'il échangeait avec les autres. Il conçut toujours la composition ainsi que le partage de la musique en concert comme, avant tout, un acte de communication, plus précisément comme un acte de « communion ». Fürtwängler utilisa souvent ce terme en référence directe à sa signification chrétienne. Sa femme écrivit : « Son désir de vivre en communauté était grand. Aucune note de musique n'aurait jamais été écrite, me disait-il, s'il n'y avait eu derrière le désir de s'adresser à autrui. Tout ce verbiage sur le fait que l'on compose avant tout pour soi-même est faux, ajoutait-il. » .

C'est pourquoi Fürtwängler attachait une importance considérable au concert et à la relation directe avec le public. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau déclara : « Il a dit une fois que la chose la plus importante pour un artiste de scène était de constituer avec le public une communauté d'amour pour la musique, de créer un sentiment commun entre des personnes venues de tellement d'endroits différents et avec des sentiments aussi divers. En tant qu'interprète, j'ai vécu toute ma vie avec cet idéal. » .

C'est pourquoi il ne s'intéressa jamais aux enregistrements alors que ces derniers permettaient de le faire connaître à un public beaucoup plus large. Il ne se mit aux enregistrements en studio, qu'il appelait des « conserves musicales », qu'à l'extrême fin de sa vie. Ce fut uniquement parce que le producteur musical Walter Legge le harcelait sans arrêt pour enregistrer avec lui. Mais, même pour ces enregistrements en studio, il dirigeait parfois, comme pour la 4^e Symphonie de Robert Schumann de 1953, « d'une traite », refusant toute interruption des techniciens ou de recommencer des parties du morceau.

Cette importance qu'il attachait à la communication par la musique explique qu'alors qu'il avait été dans la 1^{re} partie de sa carrière un grand promoteur de la musique contemporaine il finit par refuser la musique atonale à la fin de sa vie. Il écrivit, en effet, dans son journal personnel en 1945 : « Le passage de Wagner à Schönberg n'est pas un progrès mais une catastrophe. » .

(Photo) Tombe de Fürtwängler à Heidelberg.

Il soupçonnait fortement que ce qui est à l'origine de la musique atonale est un refus de communiquer pleinement. En témoigne un texte important qu'il écrivit sur Artur Schnabel en 1954. Il y nota que Schnabel est un très grand interprète du répertoire Classique. Mais, alors que son répertoire ne dépasse pas l'époque de Johannes Brahms, il ne compose que de la musique atonale et refuse même de la jouer lui-même pour les autres. La musique tonale, et particulièrement la forme sonate, demeurait au cœur de l'univers mental de Fürtwängler, que ce soit dans le domaine de la composition que dans celui de l'interprétation. À ce sujet, il faut se rappeler qu'il débuta sa carrière à Mannheim où un groupe de musiciens du milieu du 18e siècle, l'« École de Mannheim », développa la sonate dans sa forme Classique. D'autre part, il déclara à de nombreuses reprises que Beethoven, son musicien préféré, était le compositeur qui revenait toujours à cette forme sonate et la porta à son apogée. Comme le dit le musicologue Walter Riezler : « C'est en l'idée de forme sonate, et seulement en elle, que croit Fürtwängler au plus profond de lui-même. »

Plus qu'un acte de communication, Fürtwängler considérait que faire de la musique est, avant tout, un acte d'amour. Un DVD mettant en scène Elisabeth Fürtwängler est entièrement consacré à cette thématique. On y entend de nombreuses citations de Fürtwängler comparant le fait de partager la musique avec d'autres avec l'amour qui unit 2 êtres. À ce propos, il est important de noter qu'il fit graver sur sa plaque tombale toujours visible au cimetière de Heidelberg : « Nun aber bleibt Glaube Hoffnung Liebe diese drei aber die Liebe ist die grösste unter ihnen », c'est-à-dire : « Et maintenant demeurent la foi, l'espoir et l'amour. Mais parmi les 3 c'est l'amour qui est le plus grand. » . D'autre part, Elisabeth Fürtwängler rapporta que son ultime conversation avec son mari, juste avant sa mort, porta sur le message d'amour du Christ. Il écrivit dans son carnet personnel en 1937 : « À l'égard d'une œuvre d'art, il faut une approche particulière. C'est un monde clos, un monde en soi. Cette approche a pour nom amour. Elle est le contraire des évaluations des comparaisons. Elle voit l'incomparable, l'unique. Le monde du visible, le monde de la raison qui raisonne, ne rendra jamais justice à une seule œuvre d'art. » . Et dans son texte sur Anton Bruckner de 1939 : « L'art est de la même famille que l'amour. » .

Interprétation, répertoire

« L'art au sens habituel est expression de la vie. Le « grand art » est orientation de la vie. »

Impact Wilhelm Fürtwängler

Fürtwängler est considéré par de nombreux critiques musicaux comme le plus grand interprète du répertoire Symphonique allemand et autrichien. Les musiciens qui ont exprimé la plus haute opinion concernant Fürtwängler comptent parmi les plus importants du 20e siècle comme Arnold Schœnberg, Paul Hindemith, Arthur Honegger, Richard Strauß, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf (qui a déclaré durant une interview que Fürtwängler était le plus grand chef d'orchestre avec qui elle avait chanté) , Kirsten Flagstad, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Yehudi Menuhin, Edwin Fischer, Ernest Ansermet, Walter Gieseking et même Maria Callas.

Paul Hindemith a raconté : « Ce qui le démarquait de tous les autres, ce n'était pas seulement sa musicalité ; il y eut de nombreux chefs talentueux depuis Bülow, et dans l'art de la musique jouée dans sa simplicité même, l'inoubliable

Arthur Nikisch était sans doute sans égal. Ce que notre ami avait de bien particulier, c'était une droiture indicible, avec laquelle il faisait de la musique, une droiture du type de Bruckner. Même ceux qui le critiquaient ou l'enviaient, savaient, qu'à l'instant où il prenait la baguette, rien ne comptait plus alors que l'âme de la musique qui nous envahissait, par lui, son médiateur, lui qui, par un tempo, un mouvement d'expression, un développement structurel, avait le pouvoir de la présenter différemment à chaque fois. Il possédait le grand secret de la proportion. La manière dont il comprenait les phrases, les thèmes, les mouvements, les parties, les Symphonies dans leur entier, et même l'ensemble des programmes, la manière dont il les traitait dans leur unité artistique, toute son existence de musicien était marquée par ce sens de la proportion, ce sens de l'harmonie. » .

Plusieurs anecdotes rapportent que même ses principaux concurrents ont été impressionnés par certaines interprétations de Furtwängler : Arturo Toscanini (la 6e Symphonie de Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski de 1938) , Herbert von Karajan (la 4e de Robert Schumann) , ou Otto Klemperer (« J'avais découvert le musicien idéal. ») .

Ses interprétations en concert comme au disque de Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner et de Richard Wagner ou d'œuvres comme, par exemple, la 4e Symphonie de Robert Schumann ou la 9e de Franz Schubert, sont considérées par de nombreux critiques comme des références incontournables, voire inégalées.

Lorsque Furtwängler mourut, la qualité de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin était telle que Karajan, qui prit sa place en 1955, confia à ses nouveaux musiciens qu'« il avait l'impression de s'appuyer contre un mur épais lorsqu'il les dirigeait. » .

L'impact de l'art de Furtwängler sur les générations suivantes de chefs d'orchestre fut immense. Une anecdote suffit à montrer le respect qu'inspirait le nom de Furtwängler. En 1954, Furtwängler écrivit une lettre de recommandation à Daniel Barenboim. Ce dernier raconta qu'il utilisa la lettre portant la signature de Furtwängler pendant 20 ans et qu'elle lui ouvrit immédiatement toutes les portes en Israël où il vivait alors avec sa famille. D'autre part, Carlos Kleiber considérait que « nul ne pouvait égaler Furtwängler » . Simon Rattle, l'actuel chef d'orchestre de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, résuma : « À mes yeux, Furtwängler est de tous les chefs celui dont l'influence reste la plus déterminante. » et expliqua, en 2003 : « Il n'existe aucun grand chef qui n'ait été inspiré par le chef allemand. » . Patrick Szersnovicz écrivit en introduction de son article du « Monde de la musique » sur Furtwängler de décembre 2004 :

« Il y a 50 ans disparaissait celui qui fut peut-être le plus grand chef d'orchestre de l'histoire. Aucun autre interprète n'aura marqué la musique d'une telle présence. »

Outre Sergiù Celibidache, Furtwängler eut, parmi ses protégés, le pianiste Karlrobert Kreiten qui fut assassiné par les Nazis pendant la guerre. Il eut également une grande influence sur le pianiste et chef d'orchestre Daniel Barenboim, à propos duquel la veuve de Furtwängler, Elisabeth Furtwängler, disait qu'il « furtwänglisait » (« Er furtwänglert ») . Barenboim a enregistré la 2e Symphonie de Furtwängler avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago. Sergiù Celibidache remplaça Furtwängler durant la période 1945-1947. Durant la période 1947-1952, ils assurèrent ensemble la co-direction de l'Orchestre. Il a été tellement impressionné par Furtwängler qu'il vécut dans le culte du chef d'orchestre allemand toute sa vie. Néanmoins, leur relation s'était dégradée à la fin. Ce n'était ni un problème personnel ni musical c'est simplement que Sergiu Celibidache avait critiqué les musiciens de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, ce qui était un sacrilège pour Furtwängler.

L'art de Furtwängler

Furtwängler a synthétisé et mené à l'apogée la tradition d'interprétation germanique initiée par Richard Wagner, qui concevait les œuvres comme des « tout » organiques et modifiait continuellement le tempo, tradition qui fut poursuivie par les 2 Iers chefs d'orchestre permanents de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin : Hans von Bülow, qui tendait à mettre en lumière la structure de l'œuvre, et Arthur Nikisch qui privilégiait l'expression et plaçait au 1er plan la splendeur des sonorités.

Les variations du tempo et l'importance de Richard Wagner

En ce qui concerne Richard Wagner et les variations de tempo si caractéristiques de la direction de Furtwängler, Elisabeth Furtwängler déclara : « Furtwängler a toujours regretté de n'avoir pas pu voir diriger Wagner. À en juger par ses écrits sur la direction et les témoignages de ses contemporains sur le chef d'orchestre, il estimait que Wagner avait dû être un chef unique. En 1918, dans un essai sur Beethoven, Furtwängler écrit que Wagner avait été le 1er « à préconiser cette modification infime mais constante du tempo, seule capable de faire d'un morceau unique figé, Classique, joué pour ainsi dire d'après le modèle imprimé, ce qu'il est à proprement parler : une origine et un développement, un processus vivant » . » .

Contrairement à Arturo Toscanini, Furtwängler ne considérait pas le tempo indiqué sur la partition comme sacré. En cela, il suivait les recommandations de Ludwig van Beethoven, lui-même, qui a écrit dans ses lettres : « Mes tempi ne sont valables que pour les Ires mesures, car n'oublions pas que le sentiment et l'expression doivent avoir leurs propres tempi » ou encore : « Pourquoi m'ennuient-ils en me demandant mes tempi ? S'ils sont bons musiciens, ils devraient savoir comment jouer ma musique. S'ils ne sont pas bons musiciens, aucune indication ne saurait être utile. » . Plusieurs disciples de Beethoven, dont Anton Felix Schindler, ont témoigné que Beethoven faisait de légères variations constamment lorsqu'il dirigeait ses œuvres.

Cette tendance fut fortement accentuée par Richard Wagner, initiant ce que les spécialistes appellent « la tradition germanique de direction orchestrale » . Cette tradition s'opposait à celle initiée par Felix Mendelssohn, à la même époque. Alors que ce dernier utilisait des tempi stables, rapides et faisait jouer un rôle central à la mesure et à la précision de la direction orchestrale, Richard Wagner faisait varier continuellement le tempo, qui était souvent plus lent sauf à certains moments où il pouvait devenir très rapide et accordait une importance beaucoup plus grande à l'expressivité et à la construction d'ensemble de l'œuvre qu'à la mesure. Pour Wagner, l'interprétation d'une œuvre était conçue comme une re-création et laissait de la place à l'improvisation.

Wilhelm Furtwängler fut attiré par l'approche de Wagner. D'autre part, il fut l'élève du chef d'orchestre Felix Mottl, un disciple direct du compositeur allemand, durant la période 1907-1909 où il travailla à Munich. John Ardoin alla même plus loin : il déclara que si le style de direction de Fürtwängler est bien hérité de Richard Wagner, il précisa, en plus, que celui d'Arturo Toscanini prendrait racine dans celui de Mendelssohn. Il expliqua ainsi l'origine des styles qualifiés, par la suite, de « subjectif » et d' « objectif » de Fürtwängler et Toscanini, respectivement, qui serviront de modèles à tous les chefs d'orchestre par la suite.

En fait, Fürtwängler pouvait aussi diriger et mener un mouvement de bout en bout sur une pulsation ne variant pas (pour les épisodes dits « masculins ») ou au contraire laisser le tempo beaucoup plus libre (pour les épisodes dits « féminins ») . Harry Halbreich expliqua : « Pour Fürtwängler, tout morceau possède 2 tempi fondamentaux, un tempo métrique s'appliquant aux épisodes rythmiques, aux épisodes dits masculins, et un tempo mélodique réservé aux périodes chantantes, lyriques, féminines. Ces 2 tempi peuvent être en réalité très voisins du point de vue strictement métronomique mais le phrasé veillera à ce que la diversité règne dans l'unité. C'est ainsi que l'on réalise une architecture musicale, par l'équilibre complémentaire et harmonieux des contrastes biologiques. » .

David Cairns expliqua à propos des variations de tempo de Fürtwängler : « L'unité d'un mouvement Symphonique, loin d'être affaiblie par des fluctuations de tempo, pouvait au contraire en exiger l'application, de sorte que chaque moment expressif pût pleinement s'épanouir, et que tout fût porté au maximum d'intensité. » .

On avait reproché à Richard Wagner que ses variations de tempo avaient un aspect fortement arbitraire qui pouvaient mener à un résultat différent de ce que le compositeur avait voulu.

L'unité de l'œuvre et les théories de Heinrich Schenker

(Photo) Le chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow. Il fut le 1er chef permanent de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et l'ami personnel de Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner et Johannes Brahms. Richard Wagner, Hans von Bülow et Arthur Nikisch sont les 3 principaux chefs d'orchestre de la « tradition allemande de direction orchestrale » dont Fürtwängler allait hériter.

Mais la mise en valeur de la structure des œuvres musicales telle que le compositeur l'avait souhaitée était au centre de l'art de Fürtwängler. En cela, il était l'héritier de Hans von Bülow qui travaillait en profondeur les partitions des musiciens contemporains dont il dirigeait les œuvres. Hans von Bülow entretenait une relation personnelle avec des compositeurs majeurs comme Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt ou Johannes Brahms, ce qui lui donnait un accès direct au travail de composition. On sait, par ailleurs, que von Bülow faisait souvent des variations de tempo comme Richard Wagner. De la même façon, Fürtwängler avait passé toute sa jeunesse à étudier la composition car jusqu'à la fin de sa vie il se considéra, avant tout, comme un compositeur. D'autre part, la femme d'Arnold Schœnberg rapporta que Fürtwängler voulait absolument respecter ce que son mari avait voulu dire avant de diriger l'une de ses œuvres, le harcelant sans arrêt de questions : « Son souci était de respecter absolument l'intention du compositeur, Schœnberg en l'occurrence. » .

En 1902-1903, Fürtwängler étudia la composition avec le chef d'orchestre et compositeur Max von Schillings. Comme le remarqua Pierre Brunel, pour Fürtwängler : « Création et interprétation vont de pair. » . Günther Birkner ajouta : «

Dès le début, Fürtwängler est un créateur et se définit comme tel. Cet aspect de sa personnalité déborde le cadre de la composition et inspire l'activité du chef, comme le montrent ses interprétations, véritablement marquées par une volonté de recréation de l'œuvre. Même si le destin lui réserve un rôle exceptionnel d'exécutant, son aspiration la plus profonde tend à la création. » .

En plus de sa formation solide en composition, sa compréhension de la structure des œuvres du répertoire Symphonique austro-allemand a été très fortement enrichie et élargie par les théories du musicologue juif viennois Heinrich Schenker. On doit à Heinrich Schenker une théorie de la musique tonale fondée sur une lecture extrêmement attentive des partitions appelée « Analyse schenkérienne » . Il est considéré comme le fondateur de l'analyse musicale moderne. Fürtwängler lut pour la 1^{re} fois la monographie d'Heinrich Schenker sur la 9^e Symphonie de Beethoven, en 1911, qui l'impressionna au plus haut point. Dès cette époque, il chercha à acquérir tous les ouvrages du musicologue. Avant même sa rencontre avec Fürtwängler, Schenker avait perçu le caractère exceptionnel de Fürtwängler comme chef d'orchestre. Schenker écrit, en effet, dans son journal personnel après avoir assisté à un concert de la 5^e de Beethoven par Fürtwängler : « Aucun doute que ce jeune chef l'emporte sur Felix Weingartner, Arthur Nikisch et Richard Strauß ; il faut simplement regretter qu'il n'ait pas encore exploré davantage le domaine de la composition. » .

Fürtwängler eut tout le temps d'étudier la composition avec Schenker qu'il rencontra enfin en mai 1919. Ils entretenirent une longue relation jusqu'à la disparition du musicologue en 1935 ce qui permit à Fürtwängler d'étudier auprès de lui régulièrement et de travailler ensemble les partitions que Fürtwängler dirigeait peu après. Il semble que leur relation eut des hauts et des bas mais ne s'arrêta jamais même après l'arrivée d' Adolf Hitler au pouvoir (Schenker était juif et vivait à Vienne) . Fürtwängler resta longtemps en contact avec la femme de Schenker et certains de ses disciples après la mort du musicologue, en 1935. En raison de ses idées musicologiques très novatrices pour l'époque, Schenker ne réussit jamais à obtenir un poste académique malgré les efforts de Fürtwängler dans ce sens. Schenker vécut surtout grâce à des mécènes dont Fürtwängler faisait partie. Elisabeth Fürtwängler témoigna de l'importance de la pensée de Schenker sur son mari même bien après la guerre : « Fürtwängler se passionnait pour le concept d' « écoute structurelle » (« Fernhörennote ») que Heinrich Schenker, comme l'écrivit Fürtwängler en 1947, situe au centre de toutes ses considérations. L' « écoute structurelle » , c'est-à-dire le fait d'entendre ou de percevoir sur une longue distance une grande continuité dont les éléments partent souvent dans de nombreuses directions est, pour Schenker, le signe distinctif de la grande musique Classique allemande. » .

Fürtwängler était, en effet, l' « héritier d'une tradition philosophique cherchant avant tout à retrouver l'idée (ce que Schenker appelle l'« écoute structurelle » d'un point de vue musicologique) dans la multitude des phénomènes, l'œuvre n'est pas qu'une succession d'éléments (le tempo, les variations d'intensité) dont le rendu suppose la résolution de problèmes techniques. » .

C'est en raison de l'importance que Fürtwängler attachait à la mise en valeur de la cohérence des œuvres, qu'il faisait jouer un rôle central aux « transitions » car c'est elles qui permettaient d'articuler clairement les différentes parties du morceau. Daniel Barenboïm, qui assista à de nombreuses répétitions avec Fürtwängler, déclara qu'il avait l'impression qu'il ne travaillait que les transitions. Fürtwängler excellait à conserver la ligne mélodique et la cohérence de la Symphonie (l' « écoute structurelle ») même si le nombre d'instruments était très important et que la ligne mélodique pouvait passer d'un pupitre à l'autre très rapidement, c'est-à-dire « dans de nombreuses directions » pour reprendre l'expression de Heinrich Schenker à propos de la musique allemande. Sami Habra déclara en effet : « La beauté de Fürtwängler des fortissimo dans le discours musical, la continuité dans le discours mélodique qui part d'un bout à l'autre de l'orchestre, qui séjourne dans un pupitre, passe dans les autres et revient à la source, c'est admirable. On ne la perd jamais. » .

L'expressivité et l'importance d'Arthur Nikisch

En outre, les interprétations de Fürtwängler se caractérisent par une richesse sonore exceptionnelle : tous les instruments et tous les timbres de l'orchestre sont parfaitement audibles. Patrick Szersnovicz expliqua : « Mais on ne parle jamais de ce qui semble le plus évident (à propos de la musique de Fürtwängler) : l'incroyable intensité sonore, la luminosité des couleurs, une sonorité orchestrale inouïe, fondées sur des basses puissantes, notamment un pupitre de violoncelles sans égal dans le monde entier. » .

David Cairns ajouta : « On reconnaît un trait typique de Fürtwängler dans la manière dont se distingue si clairement la section des bois, comme par exemple dans la « grande » Symphonie en ut majeur de Schubert. Écoutez comment, à la fin du développement du 1er mouvement de cette même œuvre, le léger motif du cor, d'importance capitale, vient rappeler le rythme pointé omniprésent jusque-là mais absent des 20 mesures précédentes, et indiquer l'imminence de la ré-exposition. Les chefs d'orchestre sont bien souvent incapables de faire en sorte que ce motif soit parfaitement audible. Aux mains de Fürtwängler, aucun danger qu'il ne le soit pas. » .

D'autre part, contrairement à un chef d'orchestre comme Otto Klemperer qui se déclarait « pas du tout Romantique » , Fürtwängler ne refoulait pas les émotions dans ses interprétations. Au contraire, l'intensité émotionnelle qui se dégage de ses enregistrements est tellement forte qu'elle devient presque insoutenable dans les interprétations entre 1938 et 1945, période durant laquelle Fürtwängler vit une crise émotionnelle extrême. Mais, chose tout à fait exceptionnelle, même lorsque l'intensité émotionnelle atteint son paroxysme, Fürtwängler gardait toujours un contrôle parfait de la structure de l'œuvre qu'il dirigeait. Comme le dit Patrick Szersnovicz : « C'est ce potentiel dramatique qui lui permettait de prendre d'extravagantes libertés avec une partition tout en lui donnant une unité qu'aucun autre chef n'a obtenu. » .

La mise en valeur des sonorités fut héritée en partie d'Arthur Nikisch. Elisabeth Fürtwängler raconta : « Fürtwängler affirmait qu'il n'avait appris que d'Arthur Nikisch. Bien sûr, l'immense personnalité de Hans Pfitzner, son Maître à Strasbourg, avait beaucoup compté, mais sur un autre plan. À ses yeux, parmi les chefs d'orchestre, nul autre qu'Arthur Nikisch n'était digne de considération. « De lui j'ai appris le son, la façon d'obtenir le son. » . » .

Chez Fürtwängler, qui, « mieux que quiconque, sait conjuguer les dimensions apollinienne et dionysiaque » de la musique (au sens Nietzscheen) , l'aspect émotif et la compréhension intellectuelle de la structure des œuvres sont toujours complètement liés. Daniel Barenboim déclara : « Je ne sais pas précisément jusqu'à quel point il réfléchissait aux choses de façon rationnelle, ni quelle dose de sentiments il investissait. Ces 2 éléments sont parfois si étroitement liés chez lui qu'on a l'impression qu'il avait établi un équilibre idéal : penser avec le cœur et sentir avec l'esprit. » .

La dimension « hyper Romantique » de l'art de Fürtwängler était pleinement assumée par le chef d'orchestre qui écrivit en 1951 : « Je prends le risque de m'attirer la pire injure que l'on puisse lancer à un musicien de l'Allemagne d'aujourd'hui. Je prends le risque d'être « Romantique » . » . Mais s'il exaltait les émotions à l'extrême ce n'était pas pour suivre les humeurs de l'ego. Comme le dit Pierre Brunel, Fürtwängler était « Romantique, oui, mais dans la tradition la plus haute du Romantisme allemand ; de Goethe déjà, de Höderlin, de Novalis. Fürtwängler ne cherche pas à se prendre pour sujet (il le déteste, et il le refuse) , il ne veut pas parler de soi (mais de faits et de travaux) . » . « Wilhelm Fürtwängler, pèlerin de l'absolu, à la fois dans son temps et hors du temps » ne cherchait pas à suivre la subjectivité de l'ego mais au contraire à la dépasser.

La dimension spirituelle

Une conception idéaliste de l'art

Tous les éléments précédents : la construction rationnelle de l'œuvre, ses aspects émotifs, la richesse des sonorités qui en découlent participent tous à cette « écoute structurelle » (« Fernhören ») dont parlait Heinrich Schenker, qui peut se traduire, d'un point de vue philosophique, par l'« idée » au sens platonicien que se fit l'artiste de son œuvre. Cette « idée » dépasse nécessairement les plans rationnels, émotifs ou liés aux perceptions de l'ouïe puisque justement elle leur donne naissance. Elle les « transcende » et cela amène à l'aspect le plus élevé de l'art d'interprétation de Fürtwängler : sa recherche de la transcendance et de la spiritualité qui a été soulignée par de nombreux commentateurs.

Paul Hindemith disait, en effet : « Il savait transformer les expériences musicales en quasi-connaissances religieuses. » . André Tubeuf déclara : « Un mysticisme inné en Wilhelm Fürtwängler lui faisait trouver dans la musique le souffle même dont vit l'Univers ; Dieu qui se fait sensible. » . Et Yehudi Menuhin : « Lorsqu'on interprétait la grande musique allemande avec Fürtwängler, on éprouvait un sentiment d'une intensité quasi religieuse. » . Le chef d'orchestre Paul Kletzki déclara quant à lui : « Le plus important pour lui était la valeur spirituelle de la musique et, par dessus tout, il accordait la plus grande importance à ce qui est derrière la note écrite. Il était toujours en quête de la grande structure, de l'idée. Dans les transitions d'un passage à l'autre, c'était précisément cela qui comptait, bien plus que le flux continu et consistant de la musique. » .

De même, Sergiù Celibidache expliqua que le vrai but de Fürtwängler était d'atteindre des dimensions spirituelles transcendantes et que ceux qui étaient hermétiques à ces dimensions ne pouvaient pas comprendre son art. Il déclara, en effet : « Tout le monde était influencé par Arturo Toscanini. Ce qu'il faisait était perceptible immédiatement, sans aucune référence aux dimensions spirituelles. Il y avait un certain ordre dans la matière musicale. Mais chez Arturo Toscanini, je n'ai rien perçu de spirituel. Chez Fürtwängler, par contre, j'ai compris qu'il s'agissait de tout autre chose : de la métaphysique, de la transcendance, des rapports entre les sons et les sonorités. Un jour, je lui ai demandé : « Cher Monsieur, à quelle vitesse se fait ce passage, cette transition ? » . Fürtwängler me répondit : « Cela dépend de la manière dont ça sonne. » . Donc, j'ai compris qu'il ne s'agissait pas d'une discipline extérieure comme le temps physique, qui n'a rien à voir avec la musique. Le tempo est une condition afin que ce qui doit résonner, puisse résonner. Mais qu'est-ce qu'il se passe si vous n'entendez pas ces résonances ? Alors chaque tempo est trop lent pour vous. Car la lenteur ou la rapidité sont déterminées par la complexité de ces manifestations. Fürtwängler avait cette oreille-là : mais l'oreille en soi n'est même pas essentielle, il s'agit d'une oreille spirituelle capable de percevoir ces apparitions parallèles. » .

Fürtwängler essayait d'atteindre cette dimension transcendante dans laquelle l'artiste avait puisé l' « idée » qui avait donné naissance à son œuvre et à toutes ses manifestations (rationnelles, émotives) . Il s'agissait de la retrouver par un acte de recréation lors du concert et de la partager avec le public dans un acte de « communion » . Tout cela était conçu de façon dynamique et non pas statique : l'œuvre apparaissant comme un tout organique, un être vivant. Si avec certains chefs d'orchestre, les musiciens semblent jouer de façon géniale, il se passe quelque chose de tout à fait différent avec Fürtwängler : les musiciens et le chef d'orchestre disparaissent complètement et la musique semble vivre par elle-même. Elle semble même respirer. Sergiù Celibidache et Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau ont fait référence de nombreuses fois à cette « respiration » de la musique chez Fürtwängler. Cette impression de vie est liée aux continues variations du tempo bien sûr, mais aussi, et surtout, au fait que Fürtwängler garde une parfaite Maîtrise de l' « écoute structurelle » , c'est-à-dire de sa cohérence qui en fait un tout. Un être vivant ne peut pas vivre sans cette unité, cette cohérence permanente, son « essence » d'un point de vue philosophique.

On comprend que si Fürtwängler a été admiré par les chefs d'orchestre des générations suivantes, ces derniers se sont réclamés beaucoup plus souvent d'Arturo Toscanini qui gardait le tempo indiqué au début de la partition. Car, si on commence à faire varier le tempo mais que l'on n'a pas une compréhension très profonde de l' « écoute structurelle » de l'œuvre, on ne peut faire que n'importe quoi. D'ailleurs, Fürtwängler lui-même se trompait souvent et Celibidache disait qu'il était souvent déçu par ses propres interprétations.

Un sacerdoce

Dans sa conception de l'art, Fürtwängler pouvait être considéré comme l'héritier de la tradition philosophique idéaliste de la Grèce antique, dans la lignée de laquelle la philosophie allemande et la musique Symphonique germanique se situaient. Dans ce contexte, il faut se rappeler que Fürtwängler était le fils aîné du plus grand spécialiste de la Grèce antique de son époque, l'archéologue Adolf Fürtwängler. Klaus Geitel le dit explicitement dans son histoire de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin :

« L'autorité musicale de Fürtwängler, la conscience qu'il avait de son propre charisme, son art expressif parvenu à un niveau extrêmement élevé firent de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin le vicaire terrestre de la musique Symphonique occidentale. L'idéalisme allemand y trouva, ainsi, son compte puisqu'il cultivait continuellement une telle préoccupation de grandeur. Les membres du Philharmonique de Berlin semblaient faire plus que de la musique ; ils donnaient l'impression de jouer pour exprimer une conception du monde, la « Weltanschauung » des philosophes. »

Si Fürtwängler fut considéré par certains comme le « vicaire » de la musique Symphonique germanique, il est absolument certain qu'il ne s'est jamais considéré comme tel. Fürtwängler s'est toujours considéré, avant tout, comme un compositeur contrarié et raté. Il écrivit à son ancien précepteur, Ludwig Curtius, en 1946 : « En fait, la direction d'orchestre a été le refuge qui m'a sauvé la vie, car j'étais sur le point de périr compositeur. ». Son père et sa femme notèrent qu'il était constamment en proie à l'auto-critique.

Plusieurs anecdotes célèbres illustrent la modestie du chef d'orchestre. On lui proposa un jour de jouer au piano de Ludwig van Beethoven, il refusa se considérant indigne d'utiliser l'instrument. D'autre part, jeune, il refusa de diriger la « Missa solemnis » de Beethoven qu'il considérait, pourtant, comme le sommet de l'œuvre du compositeur. Il déclara qu'il ne l'avait pas assez bien comprise et donc qu'il n'était pas digne de la jouer bien qu'il rajouta qu'il la connaissait. Cette humilité était, probablement, nécessaire pour que son ego n'interfère pas avec l'« idée » que le compositeur s'était faite de son œuvre : Fürtwängler se considérait comme le « serviteur » de musiciens qu'il savait infiniment supérieurs à lui. Tous les musiciens qui ont connu Fürtwängler, même ceux qui comme Gregor Piatigorsky lui ont reproché d'être resté en Allemagne, sont unanimes pour dire que Fürtwängler ne fut jamais un carriériste. Il n'est pas resté en Allemagne pour sa carrière. Comme il l'a dit lui-même, s'il était allé à New York en 1936, sa carrière aurait été bien plus facile. En effet, le poste de New York était un vrai pont d'or : il aurait régné en Maître sur la vie musicale américaine et aurait été considéré jusqu'à sa mort comme un héros. Plus important, tous les musiciens qui l'ont approché déclarèrent qu'il ne vivait que pour servir la musique et que jamais il n'utilisa la musique pour le servir. C'est ce qui ressort de l'autobiographie de Gregor Piatigorsky, même si ce dernier critique les faiblesses psychologiques de Fürtwängler.

Cette recherche du spirituel est à mettre en relation directe avec l'importance considérable que Fürtwängler attachait au Finale des œuvres qu'il dirigeait, importance soulignée par de nombreux critiques surtout pour les principales Symphonies de Beethoven (la 3e, la 5e, la 7e et surtout la 9e) ainsi que pour la Passion selon Saint-Matthieu de Jean-Sébastien Bach. Toute l'interprétation devait tendre vers ce point ultime : le silence qui s'en suivait devait, lui, ouvrir sur une dimension réellement illimitée. Cela est particulièrement évident dans le Finale de la 9e de 1942 où Fürtwängler semble donner la clef de la plus grande de toutes les Symphonies. On a souvent dit, en effet, que Beethoven n'avait pas su comment finir cette Symphonie. Dans la version de 1942, l'impression de transcendance est telle, au moment où la musique s'arrête, que Fürtwängler nous montre que si cette Symphonie semble ne pas avoir été finie c'est que, justement, elle s'ouvre sur l'« Infini ». Elisabeth Fürtwängler rapporta, à ce propos, qu'à la fin de la « Marcia funebre » (le 2e mouvement de la 3e Symphonie de Beethoven), Fürtwängler s'arrêtait et faisait une longue pause. Elle regrette que l'on ne puisse plus revivre l'impression que produisait ce silence. Le son ne semblait avoir été là que pour « souligner l'infinité du silence », pour reprendre une expression commune à de nombreux mystiques.

L'importance de la dimension spirituelle chez Fürtwängler explique aussi pourquoi Anton Bruckner joua un rôle très important dans sa vie : il dirigea la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner, même durant son tout 1er concert, en 1906. Dans son texte sur Bruckner, daté de 1939, Fürtwängler compara la vie du compositeur à celle des plus grands mystiques comme Maître Eckhart ou Jakob Böhme. Fürtwängler déclara : « Il ne travaillait pas pour le présent ; dans sa créativité artistique, il ne pensait qu'à l'éternité et il œuvrait pour l'éternité. ». Fürtwängler fut l'interprète privilégié de l'Adagio des Symphonies de Bruckner où la dimension spirituelle est particulièrement marquée.

La musique comme « catharsis »

Si Furtwängler fut un chef d'orchestre « Romantique » en raison de l'importance considérable qu'il accordait à l'émotivité et à l'expressivité, il fut tout autant un chef d'orchestre « Classique » par sa compréhension profonde de la structure formelle des œuvres. S'il sait conjuguer les dimensions dionysiaques et apolliniennes de l'art, il dépasse ces plans par sa capacité à atteindre le spirituel. Beethoven est le musicien par excellence qui synthétise tous ces aspects. Furtwängler déclara, en effet, en 1951 : « Dans la musique, derrière les rythmes non-rationnels, il y a l'« ivresse » primitive définitivement rebelle à toute articulation ; derrière l'articulation rationnelle, il y a la « forme » qui, de son côté, a la volonté et la force d'absorber et d'ordonner toute vie, et donc finalement l'ivresse elle-même ! C'est Nietzsche qui a, pour la 1^{re} fois, formulé de façon grandiose cette dualité grâce aux concepts de Dionysiaque et d'Apollinien. Mais pour nous, aujourd'hui, qui considérons la musique de Beethoven, il s'agit de nous rendre compte que ces 2 éléments ne sont pas contradictoires ; ou, plutôt, qu'ils ne doivent pas l'être nécessairement. Cela semble être la tâche de l'art, de l'art au sens de Beethoven de les concilier. » .

Tous les aspects du psychisme humain (pensée rationnelle, sensations, émotions) qui sont normalement désunis et en conflit les uns avec les autres sont unifiés dans une dimension transcendante par Beethoven. Furtwängler écrivit, en effet, en 1942 : « Beethoven renferme en lui-même toute la nature de l'homme. Il n'est pas essentiellement chantant comme Mozart, il n'a pas l'élan architectural de Bach, ni le sensualisme dramatique de Wagner. Il unit tout cela en lui, chaque chose étant à sa place : là est l'essence de son originalité. Jamais un musicien n'a mieux ressenti et exprimé l'harmonie des sphères, le chant de la Nature Divine. » .

Cela explique pourquoi la musique et surtout celle de Beethoven a pu lui servir de refuge intérieur pendant la période Nazie. L'âme anxieuse de l'homme moderne, perdue dans un monde hostile, peut, grâce à la musique, rentrer en contact avec une réalité supérieure qui lui permet de sortir de son isolement et de son fractionnement. Furtwängler déclara, en effet, en 1951 : « Ainsi la musique de Beethoven reste pour nous un grand exemple d'accord unanime où se rejoignent toutes les tendances, un exemple d'harmonie entre la langue de l'âme, entre l'architecture musicale et le déroulement d'un drame enraciné dans la vie psychique, mais surtout entre le Moi et l'Humanité, entre l'âme anxieuse de l'individu isolé, et la communauté dans son universalité. Les paroles de Schiller : « Frères, au-dessus de la voûte des étoiles doit régner un père aimant. » , que Beethoven a proclamées avec une clarté divinatoire dans le message de sa dernière Symphonie n'étaient pas dans sa bouche paroles de prédicateur ou de démagogue ; c'est ce que lui-même a vécu concrètement tout au long de sa vie, depuis le début de son activité artistique. » .

Dans les « Entretiens sur la musique » réalisés avec Walter Abendroth, Furtwängler souligna longuement la dimension spirituelle de l'art de Beethoven. Ce dernier détruit, dans un 1^{er} temps, le psychisme de l'auditeur mais c'est dans le sens d'une catharsis au sens aristotélicien du terme. C'est-à-dire, qu'au lieu de laisser l'individu déstructuré, Beethoven « rassemble ce qui est éparé » pour réunir le psychisme sur un plan supérieur « non-duel » où les oppositions sont surmontées : « C'est à partir de Beethoven que la musique sera à même d'exprimer, dans l'ordre de l'art, ce qui, dans l'ordre de la nature, prend la forme de la catastrophe qui n'est qu'une autre forme de la nature. La musique accède maintenant au dramatique car la catastrophe, destruction des forces qui s'entrechoquent, exalte l'âme, donnant le sens de la catharsis et après la catastrophe l'harmonie est reconquise sur un plan supérieur. Beethoven possède, au plus haut degré, le sens des contrastes qui, par leur synthèse, amènent l'unité supérieure et c'est cette hantise de la synthèse qui engendre la diversité inouïe de Beethoven qui recherche délibérément des contrastes semblant inconciliables, en déchaînant dans toute leur véhémence Beethovénienne, les forces tragiques et dionysiaques de la musique. » .

La 9e Symphonie de Beethoven et la culture européenne

Fürtwängler s'identifia toujours à la 9e Symphonie. La plupart des critiques considèrent, encore aujourd'hui, qu'il est le plus grand interprète de cette œuvre. Fürtwängler ne dirigeait cette Symphonie que dans certaines circonstances jugées importantes et l'interprétation de cette œuvre devenait, sous ses mains, un acte quasi-religieux. Il déclara : « La 9e Symphonie est assurément l'aboutissement et le couronnement des Symphonies de Beethoven. Contrairement à ce que pensait Wagner, elle n'est aucunement la fin de la production Symphonique, comme le développement ultérieur de la Symphonie l'a montré. » . Fürtwängler s'opposait à l'idée de Wagner selon laquelle cette Symphonie aurait été la fin de la production Symphonique. De plus, par sa profonde compréhension de l'œuvre qu'il avait acquise grâce à Schenker, il montrait clairement dans ses interprétations le « lien de filiation » de la 9e avec les grandes compositions Symphoniques ultérieures. Le musicologue Harry Halbreich écrivit, en effet, à propos de l'interprétation de cette Symphonie, que « Fürtwängler a toujours marqué le fossé séparant la 9e des autres Symphonies et n'hésitait pas à la projeter dans l'avenir de la Musique. Les morceaux les plus lourds d'avenir de l'œuvre sont le 1er mouvement et surtout l'Adagio. Cet avenir s'appelle Anton Bruckner, dans le 1er cas (9e Symphonie de Bruckner) , et Gustav Mahler, dans le second (3e et 4e Symphonies de Mahler) . » .

Pour Fürtwängler, Beethoven était le compositeur de la musique pure par excellence. De la musique pure dans le sens d'une musique qui s'exprime indépendamment de tout contenu explicite. Même dans l' « Hymne à la Joie » , Beethoven ne cherche pas à accompagner l'idée de joie comme on le ferait dans une musique à programme mais de la traduire directement sous forme de son. Fürtwängler déclara, en effet : « Beethoven n'a jamais songé à écrire une œuvre d'inspiration populaire. S'il était quelqu'un qui avait une véritable personnalité, c'était bien Beethoven. Mais il était conscient de la valeur que prenait pour lui, dans son isolement, son interprétation dans la grande confraternité humaine et c'est précisément pour se délivrer de cet isolement qu'il eut recours à l'union spirituelle qui le liait aux autres hommes. C'est dans la recherche de l'humain que se révèle le véritable Beethoven que nous vénérons comme un Saint. Comme le montre l'analyse de l'œuvre, la 9e Symphonie est constamment une œuvre de musique pure. » . Plus précisément, il dit : « Si Beethoven fut amené à utiliser la voix humaine, il le fut par des considérations purement musicales, parce que les 3 1ers mouvements avaient en quelque sorte préparé le terrain. La voix humaine n'est que le timbre qui vient fournir son instrumentation à cette mélodie parfaite. Dans toute l'histoire de la Musique, je ne vois guère d'exemple montrant plus clairement jusqu'où peut aller l'autonomie formelle de la musique pure. Ce qui informe ce Finale, ce n'est pas l'idée de célébrer la joie, mais la puissante imagination musicale de Beethoven capable de métamorphoser cette idée en musique. » .

Le chef d'orchestre voyait en cette Symphonie le sommet le plus élevé de la civilisation européenne, le symbole de cette culture. Il écrivit, semblant même anticiper son utilisation comme hymne de l'Union européenne : « Autant que je sache, la 9e ne fut exécutée qu'une seule fois du vivant de Beethoven et ce n'est qu'avec un certain recul du temps qu'on a pu saisir quels problèmes cette œuvre nouvelle posait aux exécutants. Son exécution par Richard Wagner fut un évènement décisif et il ne faut pas oublier que la tradition n'a de sens que si elle reste vivante et se renouvelle. On ne peut conserver en vase clos des œuvres telles que les Symphonies de Beethoven car, comme toute œuvre d'art, celles-ci deviennent lettre morte là où la confraternité humaine à laquelle elles s'adressent, aurait cessé d'exister. Une musique représentative du génie européen n'existera qu'autant que l'Europe elle-même sera réalité. » .

Comme le souligne Pierre Brunel dans sa post-face de « Carnets 1924-1954 » , Fürtwängler n'était pas seulement un porte-parole de la culture germanique, il était aussi un homme profondément européen comme Gœthe et Beethoven. Européen, il l'était par sa culture : il adorait l'Italie, son attachement à la France était sincère, il se passionnait depuis l'enfance pour la littérature anglaise, la Grèce antique dont son père fut le plus grand spécialiste de son temps demeura toujours sa référence. Mais, plus important, Fürtwängler était européen dans sa conception de l'art occidental comme un moyen de dépasser les conflits entre les peuples du vieux continent, dont il fut le témoin tragique. Comme son ami de toujours, Yehudi Menuhin, il concevait l'art avant tout comme un acte de réconciliation, de paix et de communion. Son attachement à la culture européenne était tel que Pierre Brunel conclut « Carnets 1924-1954 » par ces mots : « Se souvenant de ce que le Maître a dit de Wagner, de Beethoven et de Michel-Ange, il ne peut s'empêcher de se demander et de demander au lecteur de ces pages si Wilhelm Fürtwängler n'a pas été un de ces hommes « qui appartiennent au destin de l'Occident » . » .

Fürtwängler et Jean-Sébastien Bach

Contrairement à ce que l'on pourrait facilement penser, Fürtwängler ne considérait pas que Ludwig van Beethoven était le plus grand compositeur du monde occidental. Il plaçait Jean-Sébastien Bach encore plus haut. Il écrivit en 1951 : « Aujourd'hui comme autrefois, Bach est le Saint qui trône, inaccessible, au-dessus des nuages. » . Il expliqua également : « Bach fut le plus grand des musiciens, l'Homère de la musique, dont la lumière resplendit au ciel de l'Europe musicale et, qu'en un sens, nous n'avons toujours pas dépassé. » .

Fürtwängler déclara, à plusieurs reprises, que la Passion selon Saint-Matthieu de Bach était, de très loin, la plus grande œuvre jamais composée. Il fut bouleversé en l'entendant pour la 1^{re} fois alors qu'il n'avait que 12 ans. Il n'existe que peu d'enregistrements de Bach par Fürtwängler et souvent dans un très mauvais état. Pourtant, Fürtwängler l'a souvent dirigé. Il semble qu'Adolf Hitler n'aimait pas ce compositeur et que, durant la période Nazie, les concerts de Bach n'ont pas été enregistrés pour cette raison.

3 enregistrements de la Passion selon Saint-Matthieu nous sont cependant parvenus. Le 1^{er}, celui de 1950, à Buenos Aires est dans un état catastrophique, ce qui est d'autant plus regrettable que l'interprétation semble du plus haut niveau. On y entend de façon à peu près audible tous les airs de la 2^e partie et le Finale. Le 2^e est le plus important : c'est l'enregistrement de Vienne en 1952. Malgré quelques accidents de concert et quelques saturations dans les chœurs, la bande sonore est bien meilleure que dans l'enregistrement de 1950. La valeur intrinsèque de l'œuvre et la qualité de l'interprétation particulièrement élevée rendent absolument catastrophique que seule la 1^{re} moitié du concert ait été conservée. Le dernier enregistrement, celui de 1954 avec l'Orchestre de Vienne, est le seul à être en parfait état. Malheureusement, la qualité de l'interprétation (à l'exception du Finale et des interventions de Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau) est bien inférieure aux 2 Ires. Toujours est-il que le Finale des versions de 1954 et 1950 et la version de 1952 sont du même niveau que les plus grands enregistrements de Beethoven par Fürtwängler.

Critique

Après la guerre, et pendant une assez longue période, une partie de la critique britannique et américaine n'apprécia pas le style de direction de Fürtwängler. Ils prétendaient que Fürtwängler, par sa « subjectivité », déformait les œuvres et brisait leur unité formelle, mettant en avant des chefs d'orchestre de 1er plan comme Arturo Toscanini ou Otto Klemperer jugés plus « objectifs ». Ce qu'ils appelaient la « subjectivité » de Fürtwängler était, en fait, l'apogée et la synthèse de la plus grande tradition allemande de direction orchestrale (Richard Wagner, Hans von Bülow et Arthur Nikisch), le tout couronné par les théories du grand musicologue Heinrich Schenker qui portaient précisément sur une compréhension très profonde de l'unité des œuvres Symphoniques. Ce « malentendu » a plusieurs explications.

Premièrement, les relations de Fürtwängler avec les États-Unis ont toujours posé problème : elles ont été étudiées en détail par D. Gillis. Fürtwängler a réalisé une série de tournées en Amérique du Nord durant les années 1925-1927 qui furent un grand succès auprès du public mais pas du tout auprès de la critique. En fait, une vraie cabale avait été organisée par une partie du monde musical contre Fürtwängler : de nombreux critiques s'étaient donné le mot d'ordre d'attaquer, sans concession, le chef d'orchestre allemand. Les raisons de cette cabale n'avaient rien de politique et ne concernaient pas le contenu réel de l'art de Fürtwängler. Cette cabale provenait de la peur de la concurrence gigantesque que représentait la personnalité de Fürtwängler. Ce dernier aurait dû essayer d'être accepté par ce monde musical très fermé mais, comme l'expliqua sa femme, Fürtwängler n'avait aucun goût pour les mondanités et les intrigues. Comme souvent, il préféra se dérober et ce qui explique probablement pourquoi il ne retourna pas aux États-Unis entre 1927 et 1933. En 1936, il accepta le poste à New York que lui proposait Arturo Toscanini mais la fausse annonce d'Hermann Göring déclencha un immense tollé qui l'en dissuada. Les historiens ont montré que ce sont les mêmes milieux musicaux qui, en 1925-1927, amplifièrent le « tollé » en question, toujours pour empêcher la venue du chef d'orchestre allemand, surtout à un poste aussi prestigieux que celui de directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York. Fürtwängler faillit revenir en 1949 mais un « boycott » fut organisé contre sa venue (en 1948). En 1949, l'aspect politique était plus important : la guerre n'était finie que depuis 4 ans et Fürtwängler n'avait retrouvé son poste que depuis 1947. Mais, comme l'a dit à de nombreuses reprises Yehudi Menuhin, la vraie raison était toujours la volonté d'empêcher la venue du chef allemand en raison de son poids artistique écrasant. La tournée prévue pour 1955 bénéficiait d'un fort soutien politique des gouvernements allemand et américain ce qui aurait certainement empêché toute nouvelle cabale. Cette tournée aurait, certainement, profondément changé la perception des Américains à propos de Fürtwängler, l'homme mais surtout l'interprète. Mais Fürtwängler mourut juste avant.

Deuxièmement, les théories d'Heinrich Schenker étaient probablement peu connues. Elles font souvent aujourd'hui autorité dans les universités américaines pour l'interprétation des Symphonies. Mais il fallut probablement beaucoup de temps aux critiques pour les assimiler et surtout pour réaliser que l'art de Fürtwängler se basait en grande partie sur les théories de Schenker. Comme l'a expliqué Elisabeth Fürtwängler, Schenker était extrêmement critique et détectait les moindres petites erreurs dans l'interprétation des Symphonies. Or, Heinrich Schenker disait que Fürtwängler était « le seul chef d'orchestre à avoir compris Beethoven » (ce point est d'autant plus remarquable que Schenker avait dû forcément assister à de nombreux concerts d'Arturo Toscanini, d'Arthur Nikisch et de Gustav Mahler) et il fit dans son journal personnel des compliments de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven par Fürtwängler après avoir assisté à ses concerts. Ces compliments, venant d'un musicologue de ce niveau et aussi exigeant, prouvent que la « subjectivité » de Fürtwängler ne détruisait en aucune façon l'unité formelle des œuvres.

Troisièmement, Fürtwängler était l'héritier de la grande tradition allemande de direction orchestrale. Mais, après la guerre, les Nazis avaient rendu tout ce qui était allemand suspect. Le fait de mettre en avant des chefs d'orchestre comme Arturo Toscanini ou Otto Klemperer avait, outre leurs qualités musicales indiscutables, aussi un caractère clairement « politique ». Toscanini avait été un modèle parfait d'anti-fascisme. En particulier, il avait dirigé la première américaine de la 7e Symphonie de Dmitri Chostakovitch diffusée pendant le siège de Leningrad sur toutes les radios alliées. Ce concert eut une forte portée symbolique. Sur bien des aspects, Toscanini apparaissait comme un musicien « porte-drapeau » des forces alliées dans leur lutte contre les forces de l'axe. Or, du point de vue américain, Fürtwängler pouvait sembler jouer un rôle symétrique mais du mauvais côté, Josef Gœbbels diffusant ses enregistrements sur les radios du « Reich ». En fait, cette symétrie n'a jamais existé car Fürtwängler n'a jamais soutenu politiquement le régime hitlérien alors que Toscanini joua un rôle volontaire et actif dans la lutte politique contre le fascisme. En ce qui concerne Otto Klemperer, ce dernier avait commencé une carrière brillante jouant un rôle décisif dans la mise en valeur de la musique contemporaine mais sa carrière avait été brusquement brisée par l'arrivée des Nazis et en raison de ses origines juives. Après la guerre, il prit la direction de l'Orchestre du Philharmonia de Londres, cet Orchestre jouant, à partir de cette époque, un rôle central dans la vie musicale anglo-saxonne. De fait, certains spécialistes considèrent, qu'après la mort de Fürtwängler, c'est Otto Klemperer avec son Orchestre du Philharmonia qui devint le plus grand interprète au monde de la musique Symphonique germanique.

Mais la tradition dans laquelle s'enracinait Fürtwängler était beaucoup trop profonde et ces critiques finirent par disparaître complètement. Ainsi, la « BBC » a consacré une série d'émissions à Fürtwängler, en 2004, où les critiques parlaient « du plus grand chef d'orchestre de tous les temps » (« The greatest conductor of all time. ») .

On parle aujourd'hui encore de tradition « subjective » pour l'art de Fürtwängler, non plus dans un sens péjoratif mais dans le sens d'une interprétation qui se place dans la longue tradition germanique et qui tient compte de l'exégèse des œuvres par les musicologues, par opposition à la tradition « objective » de Toscanini qui préconisait une relation directe avec la partition. L'enracinement de l'art de Fürtwängler au cœur même de la tradition qui a donné naissance à la musique Symphonique explique qu'Alain Pâris ait pu écrire dans l' « Encyclopædia Universalis » :

« Dans le monde de la direction d'orchestre, Wilhelm Fürtwängler fait figure d'exception : plus d'un siècle après sa naissance, il est le seul chef dont les témoignages sonores n'ont connu aucune éclipse, continuant à susciter l'admiration ou à provoquer la discussion. Il reste celui dont Fred Goldbeck a dit qu'il était « l'art de diriger fait homme » . » .

« Musik ist nicht ein Ablaufen von Tonfolgen sondern ein Ringen von Kräften. » : La musique n'est pas une suite de sons mais une lutte entre des forces. (Wilhelm Fürtwängler)

« Fürtwängler avait une nature contradictoire. Il était ambitieux et jaloux, généreux et vaniteux, un lâche et un héros, fort et faible, un enfant et un sage, très allemand et homme du monde. En musique, il était unique et sans partage. » (Gregor Piatigorsky, violoncelliste. Doubleday & Company, Inc. 1965.)

Le 23 janvier 1886, au 25 de la Maassenstraße de Berlin naquit, de Adolf Fürtwängler (1851-1907), archéologue réputé et de sa femme Adelheid, née Wendt, un fils prénommé Gustav Heinrich Ernst Martin Wilhelm et qui fut baptisé dans la foi luthérienne. 3 autres enfants naquirent de cette union : Walter, Märit et Annele. La famille Fürtwängler était originaire du cœur de la Forêt noire alors que les Wendt étaient des allemands du Nord (Adelheid était une grande amie d'une fille de Johannes Brahms). Les 2 familles étaient musiciennes et la mère de Fürtwängler était aussi un peintre de talent qui fit de nombreux portraits de ses enfants.

Le père détestait l'atmosphère des grandes villes et chercha toujours à se rapprocher de la nature. C'est ainsi qu'en 1894, la famille habita Schwabing (banlieue de Munich) et plus tard, acquit une maison, baptisée « Tanneck » (au coin du sapin), située sur une péninsule du lac Tegernsee, près de Bad Wiessee. Là, les enfants pouvaient se consacrer à la natation et à toutes sortes de jeux et de sports. Dans sa prime jeunesse, Fürtwängler fut un solitaire et un introverti dont toutes les pensées étaient concentrées sur la musique et les valeurs artistiques, la littérature et la philosophie. Durant toute sa vie, il resta un ardent sportif, aimant pratiquer le cheval, la natation, le tennis, le patinage et les escalades en montagne.

À l'âge de 6 ans, Fürtwängler commença des études à Munich mais il fut un mauvais élève, non pas en raison d'une incapacité intellectuelle mais parce qu'il trouvait qu'il perdait son temps et qu'il avait mieux à faire avec ses choix artistiques. L'année suivante, il demanda à sa mère de lui apprendre le piano et les principes de l'écriture musicale. Le 30 juin 1893, il composa sa 1^{re} œuvre, « Ein Stückchen von den Tieren ». Le père qui avait un dédain prononcé pour le système éducatif et ses professeurs, sortit son fils de la routine scolaire et se mit à la recherche d'un précepteur : ce furent Ludwig Curtius et Walter Riezler, remarquables tous les 2 mais très opposés dans leurs mentalités. À l'âge de 7 ans, Fürtwängler décida de devenir compositeur (il restera toute sa vie un auteur frustré) et, à 12 ans, entendit pour la 1^{re} fois la « Passion selon Saint Matthieu » de Bach qui l'émut profondément. Peu après eut lieu le choc de la découverte de Beethoven : la rencontre Fürtwängler - Beethoven restera pour longtemps l'exemple d'une convergence d'esprit rare entre un compositeur et un interprète et l'œuvre de Beethoven aura été pour Fürtwängler la consécration de toute une vie. Son approche de l'univers beethovénien dépasse les limites esthétiques de l'époque : le Beethoven de Fürtwängler est intemporel.

En septembre 1901, le père emmena son fils à Egine, en Grèce. Wilhelm avait dans ses poches les poèmes de Goethe et les Quatuors de Beethoven. Fürtwängler ne fut jamais élève d'un quelconque Conservatoire et c'est sa mère qui lui donna ses 1^{res} leçons de piano, bientôt suivies par la tante Minna, excellente professeur de piano. Son 1^{er} véritable précepteur en matière musicale fut l'organiste et compositeur Anton Beer-Walbrunn (1864-1929) (dont Fürtwängler dirigea sa « Sinfonia » le 24 février 1912, à Lübeck) qui reconnut rapidement les talents extraordinairement précoces de son élève et qui le recommanda à son propre professeur, Joseph Rheinberger (1839-1901), à l'époque directeur du Conservatoire de Munich. Rheinberger étant un réactionnaire pour qui toute la musique s'arrêtait à Beethoven, Fürtwängler chercha un autre précepteur qui serait à même de lui faire découvrir le chemin menant à Wagner et au Romantisme allemand au tournant du siècle : ce fut Max von Schillings (1868-1933), compositeur et chef d'orchestre avec qui Fürtwängler étudia en 1902-1903.

1905 est certainement l'année charnière de la vie de Fürtwängler. Il avait 19 ans et savait comment il voulait façonner son avenir. D'un autre côté, il avait une claire vision de ce qui lui restait à apprendre et ressentait le besoin de pratique dans les domaines de l'Opéra et des concerts, choses qu'il ignorait totalement. Grâce à un cousin de sa mère, le chef d'orchestre Georg Dohrn qui avait en charge toute l'activité musicale de Breslau, il devint répétiteur au Théâtre municipal pour la saison 1905-1906. Ce travail n'était pas vraiment enthousiasmant car il devait seulement faire répéter le chœur et les chanteurs mais chacun remarqua sa capacité impressionnante à déchiffrer à vue les plus difficiles réductions pour piano des partitions d'Opéra. C'est à Breslau que sa 1^{re} composition pour orchestre (une Symphonie) fut jouée. Le concert ressembla à un désastre car public et critiques condamnèrent cette œuvre, ce qui affecta profondément le père et son fils. Fürtwängler décida que le meilleur moyen de tirer profit du désastre était de diriger lui-même un concert.

Si Adolphe était un archéologue célèbre, il n'était pas riche, mais dans ses relations se trouvait Franz Kaim qui avait créé son propre orchestre qui portait son nom. C'est ainsi que, le 19 février 1906, Fürtwängler dirigea à Munich son 1^{er} concert dont le programme comportait : la « Consécration de la maison » de Beethoven, un Poème symphonique en si mineur de sa composition et, en seconde partie, rien moins que la 9^e Symphonie de Bruckner. Le « Bayerische Kurier » du 23 janvier écrivit :

« Naturellement, on peut penser que ce programme a été adapté au public actuel après avoir entendu le concert de ce très jeune chef, Wilhelm Fürtwängler, qui choisit comme 1^{re} victime la 9^e de Bruckner. Talentueux ? Assurément, mais il n'y a aucune raison à débiter au top niveau si l'on est toujours en lutte avec sa propre gestique de débutant. Si l'introduction de l'Ouverture de Beethoven fut acceptable malgré l'énorme énergie déployée, le Bruckner donna une impression grise et froide. Le Scherzo en souffrit le plus et il sonna comme un voyage au milieu de dangereux récifs après des jours de pluie incessante. Heureusement, son propre Poème symphonique sembla prometteur mais, très vite, il se transforma en quelque chose de vide et d'informe où on pouvait constater comment de petits thèmes étaient soumis à des tortures harmoniques. Le public surprit totalement par ses applaudissements répétés. »

Fürtwängler écrivit à son mentor Curtius :

« La direction d'orchestre a été le refuge qui m'a sauvé la vie car j'étais sur le point de périr compositeur. Toute ma vie, je me suis considéré comme un compositeur qui dirige mais jamais comme un chef qui compose. »

Wilhelm Fürtwängler souffrit d'un mal commun à de nombreux post-Romantiques : l'enflure, la démesure, mais chez lui la nécessité musicale était totalement sincère. Si certaines œuvres de jeunesse ne dépassent pas une honnête moyenne, certains voient dans le « Te Deum », un chef-d'œuvre méconnu. Quoi qu'il en soit, Fürtwängler n'est pas passé à la postérité par ses compositions mais il aura au moins été un créateur sincère d'où le talent, à défaut de génie, n'est pas absent.

Après ce 1er concert, Wilhelm Fürtwängler entra au Théâtre de Zürich pour la saison 1906-1907. Le directeur l'autorisa à diriger quelques opérettes, en particulier « la Veuve joyeuse » qui était à l'affiche cette saison-là. Il en dirigera 9 représentations, entre le 3 février et le 21 avril 1907. Il avait dirigé comme 1re œuvre, le 10 octobre, le ballet « Tanzbilder » et, le 31 du mois, « das Fest auf Sollhaug » de Hans Pfitzner, puis 10 représentations de « Rübezahl » sur une musique de Bertrand Sängler. L'étape suivante se situa à Munich où il devint répétiteur à l'Opéra sous la direction de Felix Mottl, durant 2 saisons (1907-1909) . Puis, il fut engagé comme 3e chef à l'Opéra de Strasbourg. Le 8 septembre 1910, il quitta Munich et séjourna à Strasbourg jusqu'au 1er avril 1911. L'activité musicale de la ville (allemande à cette époque) était entièrement sous la coupe du compositeur-chef d'orchestre Hans Pfitzner et de ses 2 assistants, Richard Fried et Hermann Büchel. Fürtwängler dirigea 16 fois, jouant 6 œuvres qu'il n'inscrira plus à ses programmes par la suite : « Martha » de Friedrich von Flotow, « l'Élixir d'Amour » de Gaetano Donizetti, « les Dragons » de Villars de Maillart, « les P'tites Michus » d'André Messager, « Flotte Bursche » de Franz von Suppé et une unique représentation de « Rigoletto » de Giuseppe Verdi (11 mars 1911) . Les critiques de la presse furent très controversées : l'une parla de sa direction des « P'tites Michus » comme étant d'une « légèreté éléphantinesque » , l'autre affirma que son interprétation de « Martha » laissa beaucoup à désirer ... Il lui fallut aussi se déguiser en tzigane avec une barbe noire collée sur le visage pour jouer du piano dans la « Chauve Souris » de Johann Strauß, lors de la fête chez le prince Orłowsky, ce qui l'amusa beaucoup. Ceci se passa les 27 et 28 février 1911.

C'est durant son séjour à Strasbourg qu'il fit la connaissance de Bruno Walter qui, le 22 février 1911, dirigea la création d'une Symphonie de sa composition. Fürtwängler reviendra à Strasbourg, le 6 décembre de la même année, pour diriger son « Te Deum » qui avait été créé à Breslau en novembre 1910 par Georg Dohrn et qu'il avait commencé à écrire lors de son séjour à Florence. La critique du « Allgemeine Musik Zeitung » avait été très négative, affirmant que : « Fürtwängler avait fait preuve de bonne volonté et uniquement de cela. » . De son côté, le « Schlesische Zeitung » écrivit : « Il se peut que des motivations personnelles aient été à l'origine de la création du « Te Deum » de Fürtwängler ; quant aux motivations musicales, il n'en existe aucune. » .

Une amie de la mère de Fürtwängler, Ida Boy-Ed, informa le jeune musicien que le poste de chef d'orchestre à Lübeck était devenu vacant depuis le départ de Hermann Abendroth pour Essen. Cependant, cette information atteignit trop tard Fürtwängler car la Société des Amis de la Musique (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») avait déjà choisi 4 candidats (Paul Scheinpflug, Karl Mennicke, Walter Unger et Rudolf Siegel) parmi les 97 postulants et chacun d'entre eux avait déjà dirigé son concert à titre de test. Tout semblait indiquer que le vainqueur de la compétition était Rudolf Siegel. Néanmoins, après le retrait de Paul Scheinpflug, la Société décida de choisir un 4e candidat et Madame Boy-Ed demanda à Fürtwängler de poser d'urgence sa candidature qui fut acceptée par les autorités musicales et par Abendroth. C'est ainsi qu'il dirigea, le 5 avril 1911, son concert probatoire (devant plus de 4,000 personnes !) . Il fallut peu de temps au public et aux membres de la Société pour être captivés par la passion qui émanait du jeune candidat, en dépit de sa grande différence avec Abendroth dont la virilité, l'assurance et l'économie de moyens avaient été appréciées. Fürtwängler, avec ses gestes nerveux et parfois excités, était à l'opposé et, sur le podium, il semblait combattre un ennemi invisible mais le public reconnut très vite en lui d'exceptionnelles capacités. Le 13 avril, il fut choisi à l'unanimité comme successeur d'Abendroth.

Le chef de la Société des Amis de la Musique ne dirigeait que les concerts, c'est-à-dire les 8 concerts symphoniques de chaque saison, plus 2 concerts avec le chœur philharmonique dédiés principalement aux Oratorios. Il y avait également les concerts populaires, au nombre d'environ 30 par saison (celle de 1905-1906 en compta exceptionnellement 56) . Les répétitions avaient lieu le mercredi soir et les membres de la Société y venaient avec leur famille et leurs amis. Fürtwängler n'était pas très enchanté par ces concerts qui se tenaient dans la salle du « Kolosseum » et qui étaient structurés de la manière suivante : une 1re partie symphonique où il était interdit de fumer mais où les gens buvaient de la bière, une seconde partie dédiée à des œuvres légères (fantaisies pour orchestre, etc.) et une 3e consacrée à des œuvres populaires (marches, etc.) . On peut affirmer que les 32 concerts symphoniques, les 104 concerts populaires et les 9 exécutions chorales représentent l'apprentissage de Fürtwängler. En tant que chef invité, il dirigea également 3 opéras : « Fidelio » (23.03.1915) , « les Joyeuses commères de Windsor » (16.04.1915) et les « Meistersinger von Nürnberg » (20.11.1913) . Les critiques musicaux de la capitale hanséatique saisirent rapidement la personnalité de Fürtwängler On put ainsi lire dans le « Eisenbahnzeitung » : « Fürtwängler est un talent musical qui, si les circonstances sont favorables, deviendra sans aucun doute un génie. » . Quant à Ida Boy-Ed, elle couvrit d'éloges son protégé.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler alla souvent à Hambourg en compagnie de son amie Lilly Dieckmann pour assister aux concerts de Arthur Nikisch qui était pour lui le « roi » des chefs d'orchestre (il fera officiellement sa connaissance en février 1912) . Au cours de son séjour à Lübeck, il donna son 1er concert en dehors de l'Allemagne, le 26 janvier 1913, à Vienne. Il donna également, avec le 1er violon de l'Orchestre Szanto, des soirées de musique de chambre dont un cycle de Sonates de Beethoven. Durant la dernière saison, il joua la partie de piano du Triple Concerto de Beethoven (3 février 1915) et celle du 5e Concerto brandebourgeois de Bach (2 janvier 1915) . Son successeur à Lübeck sera Georg Göhler.

Pour ce qui concerne la « montée en pression » de son répertoire, Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirigea à Lübeck toutes les Symphonies de Beethoven (sauf la seconde) , les 4e, 5e et 6e de Tchaïkovski, les 39e et 40e de Mozart, les 1re, 2e et 4e de Brahms, les 7e et 9e de Franz Schubert, le Concerto pour violon de Brahms, les 4e, 7e et 8e de Anton Bruckner, les « Kindertotenlieder » de Gustav Mahler, la Suite romantique de Max Reger, « l'Apprenti sorcier » de Paul Dukas, la « Sinfonia domestica » de Richard Strauß, la « Faust-Symphonie » de Franz Liszt, le 2e Concerto pour piano de Brahms, la 1re de Robert Schumann. Quant au programme des concerts populaires, on y trouve des œuvres de Jacques Offenbach (« les Contes d'Hoffmann ») Gilbert and Sullivan (« le Mikado ») , Georges Bizet (« l'Arlésienne » , « Carmen ») , Léo Delibes (« Sylvia » , « Coppelia ») , Charles Gounod (ballet de « Faust ») , Jean Sibelius (« Valse triste ») , Edvard Grieg (« Peer Gynt ») des valse de Johann Strauß et Émile Waldteufel et quantité de pots-pourris.

Au début de 1915, le « Kapellmeister » de Mannheim, Artur Bodanzky, décida de partir pour l'Amérique. Le choix de son successeur s'avéra des plus difficiles et les plus fameux chefs de l'époque posèrent leur candidature. Le public de Mannheim aurait aimé avoir Arthur Nikisch. A l'opposé de Lübeck, la principale activité musicale de Mannheim concernait l'Opéra, le 1er chef ayant en charge les représentations d'Opéra et seulement 8 concerts annuels de l'Académie de musique. Un comité de 5 membres se rendit à Lübeck, le 23 mars 1915, pour assister à la représentation de « Fidelio » dirigée par Fürtwängler. Ils furent tellement impressionnés qu'ils décidèrent de l'appeler au poste de « Kapellmeister » à Mannheim qui hérita ainsi d'un chef jeune et quasiment inconnu. La ville accueillit Fürtwängler avec enthousiasme et sa future secrétaire Bertha Geißmar écrivit dans ses Mémoires :

« Les citoyens de Mannheim avaient l'habitude de considérer leur " Kapellmeister " comme un demi-dieu dont les faits et gestes étaient le sujet de conversation du jour. Fürtwängler qui était timide, trouvait cette popularité très pénible et avait l'habitude de se cacher dans le dos de Oskar Grohé, qui avait pris le jeune débutant sous son aile protectrice. »

Wilhelm Fürtwängler était assisté par Felix Lederer qui dirigeait les premières des Opéras italiens et du « Rosenkavalier » (à la différence de Karl Böhm, Clemens Krauß et Hans Knappertsbusch, il ne trouvait pas cette œuvre à son goût et ne la dirigea jamais) . Il joua des Opéras depuis longtemps écartés du répertoire, tels « Violanta » d'Erich Korngold, « Monna Lisa » de Max von Schillings, « Shéhérazade » de Bernhard Sekles, « Klein Idas Blumen » de Paul von Klenau. « Fidelio » de Beethoven fut le 1er Opéra qu'il dirigea à Mannheim, le 7 septembre 1915, dans une interprétation très appréciée, en particulier l'Ouverture Leonore III. Il dirigea 232 représentations de 39 Opéras. Dans le répertoire symphonique, il joua pour la 1re fois la Symphonie fantastique de Berlioz (1 février 1916) , le 1er Concerto pour piano de Brahms avec Artur Schnabel, la « Symphonie alpestre » de Richard Strauß, « le Chant de la terre » de Gustav Mahler (21 novembre 1916) , la 4e de Schumann, la 4e de Mahler (28 janvier 1919) , « la Nuit transfigurée » d'Arnold Schœnberg (18 février 1919) , la 5e d'Anton Bruckner (9 décembre 1919) , « Pelléas et Mélisande » de Schœnberg (2 mars 1921) .

Durant son séjour à Mannheim commença véritablement sa carrière de chef-invité et de chef-itinérant. Ainsi, en septembre 1917, il fut invité au « Kurhaus » de Baden-Baden pour diriger le « Ring » puis, le 14 décembre, il se trouva pour la 1re fois à la tête du Philharmonique de Berlin : les critiques furent stupéfiés et l'un d'entre eux évoqua même le « miracle Fürtwängler » (« das Wunder Fürtwängler ») . Le 15 novembre 1918, il dirigea pour la 1re fois les concerts de la « Frankfurter Museumsgesellschaft » et, le 30 novembre, il était à Vienne avec le « Wiener Tonkünstler Orchester » à la suite du retrait du chef Ferdinand Löwe. Toujours à Vienne, le 29 novembre 1919, il dirigea la 3e de Mahler ; le 2 avril 1920, il dirigea pour la 1re fois la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, prenant la succession de Richard Strauß. Le 30 juin 1920, il donna son dernier concert en tant que « Kapellmeister » de Mannheim et fit ses adieux avec une représentation de « l'Enlèvement au sérail » de Mozart.

À partir de la saison 1920-1921, il fut de plus en plus sollicité à l'étranger tout en poursuivant ses concerts à Frankfurt, comme successeur de Wilhelm Mengelberg et à la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin. Ainsi, en octobre 1920, il alla à Stockholm, jouant la « Symphonie sérieuse » de Franz Berwald. Le 19 novembre, il dirigea la 2e Symphonie de Mahler au « Staatsoper » puis, en décembre, ce furent 7 concerts à Stockholm et, à la fin de la saison, il participa aux 4es « Fêtes Brahms de Wiesbaden. La saison 1921-1922 débuta par son 1er concert avec le « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig. Son activité était alors partagée entre Vienne, Frankfurt et Berlin. Le 30 novembre 1920, il dirigea sa 1re « Missa solemnis » de Beethoven, à Vienne. Arthur Nikisch mourut le 23 janvier 1922. La prédiction de Fürtwängler à Hambourg (« Je deviendrai le successeur de Nikisch. ») se trouva vérifiée : il hérita du Philharmonique de Berlin et du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig.

Les 6 saisons passées avec le « Gewandhaus » ne compteront pas parmi les plus heureuses de sa carrière. D'abord, l'orchestre voulait Hermann Abendroth comme « Gewandhauskapellmeister » et Fürtwängler sera nommé sur intervention de Max Brockhaus. Ensuite, ses programmes faisant la part trop belle à la musique du temps, déplaisaient au public conservateur de Leipzig qui aurait voulu, en outre, que son « Kapellmeister » demeure en permanence à Leipzig.

Le 25 mars 1922, il dirigea pour la 1re fois le Philharmonique de Vienne dans un concert célébrant le 25e anniversaire de la mort de Johannes Brahms. En avril, il fut invité par l'« Accademia Santa Cecilia » de Rome et, en mai, participa aux 5es « Fêtes Brahms » de Hambourg. Le 22 du même mois, il épousa la danoise Zitla Lund, élégante jeune femme de 3 ans son aînée : le mariage restera sans descendance et sera une erreur. En avril 1923, il partit avec le « Gewandhaus » pour une tournée en Suisse et acheva la saison par 2 concerts à la Scala de Milan. Durant l'hiver 1923, il fit l'acquisition d'un chalet à Saint-Moritz (qui est toujours la propriété de sa famille) . En janvier 1924, il se rendit en Angleterre et en avril-mai 1924 partit pour la 1re fois en tournée avec le Philharmonique de Berlin. Depuis son départ de Mannheim, il continua néanmoins à y diriger régulièrement des Opéras. En juillet 1924, il participa au Festival de Munich, dirigeant les « Noces de Figaro », « Tristan und Isolde », les « Meistersinger von Nürnberg » et « l'Enlèvement au sérail ». En janvier 1925, il franchit l'Atlantique pour sa 1re tournée américaine (10 concerts avec le New York Philharmonic) . Son activité était désormais circonscrite entre Leipzig, Berlin et Vienne. En février 1926 eut lieu la seconde tournée américaine (32 concerts) et, de retour en Europe, il entama une tournée européenne de 20 concerts avec le Philharmonique de Berlin et termina la saison par les « Fêtes Brahms » de Heidelberg. En octobre, il réalisa, à l'âge de 40 ans, ses 1ers enregistrements discographiques pour la firme Polydor (l'Ouverture du « Freischütz » de Weber et la 5e de Beethoven) .

Février 1927 : 3e et ultime tournée américaine (33 concerts) qui s'acheva par le « Requiem allemand » de Brahms, le 4 avril. Fürtwängler quitta l'Amérique, quelque peu exaspéré par la politique musicale américaine. Il fut jalouxé par ses confrères, mal reçu par la critique (surtout par Olin Downes, le critique du New York Times) mais acclamé par le public. Le 19 novembre, il dirigea le Philharmonique de Vienne en tant que directeur musical de l'Orchestre et successeur de Felix Weingartner (poste qu'il abandonna en mai 1930) . Le 29 mars 1928, il dirigea son dernier concert en tant que « Gewandhauskapellmeister » par l'exécution de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven et la saison prit fin, après une tournée européenne du Philharmonique de Berlin, aux Festivals de Heidelberg et Görlitz.

La saison 1928-1929 fut celle où son activité de chef d'Opéra prit un nouvel essor : en effet, le 17 octobre, il dirigea pour la 1re fois à l'Opéra de Vienne (le « Rheingold ») et après les Festivals de Heidelberg et de Jena, dirigea pour la 1re fois un Opéra à Berlin, non pas au « Staatsoper unter den Linden » mais au « Schauspielhaus am Gendarmenmarkt » (« les Noces de Figaro ») . En automne, on le nomma « Directeur général de la Musique » et, en mai 1929, il fut décoré de l'ordre « pour le Mérite » .

Les tournées succédèrent aux tournées et, en avril 1930, c'est avec le Philharmonique de Vienne qu'il partit pour la 1re fois. Le 2 juin, il dirigea sa 7e et dernière « Missa solemnis » de Beethoven. (Fürtwängler en jouait la partition au piano et considérait l'œuvre comme la plus grande création de Beethoven. Il reconnaissait néanmoins qu'il n'avait jamais réussi à exprimer totalement ce qu'elle portait en elle. Selon lui, il aurait fallu ré-instrumenter la partition et c'est pourquoi il se résolut, à regret, à ne plus la jouer.) . En juillet-août 1931, il participa pour la 1re fois au Festival de Bayreuth (avec « Tristan ») et au Mémorial Siegfried-Wagner. En 1932 tombait le 50e anniversaire du Philharmonique de Berlin : cet événement fut marqué par 4 concerts exceptionnels en avril, suivis par une grande tournée européenne de 26 concerts. À cette occasion, Paul von Hindenburg lui remit la Médaille Goethe en raison des services rendus à la musique allemande.

Les 7 et 9 juin 1932, il dirigea pour la 1re fois à l'Opéra de Paris (« Tristan » avec une distribution de rêve : Frida Leider, Lauritz Melchior, Igor Kipnis.) . Le 30 janvier 1933, Adolf Hitler arriva au pouvoir et avec lui, le harcèlement contre tout ce qui était juif. Le 11 avril, Wilhelm Fürtwängler publia dans le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » une lettre ouverte au Ministre de la propagande, Josef Goebbels, reconnaissant uniquement une distinction entre l'art jugé « bon » et celui jugé « mauvais » . Cette lettre qui fut publiée dans la presse mondiale, eut un énorme écho et Goebbels répliqua à Fürtwängler que la politique était aussi un Art (« peut-être le plus élevé ») , que la musique ne pouvait être séparée de la politique et qu'il était nécessaire de chasser tous les éléments étrangers (sous-entendu : juifs) .

Peu après, l'exode de grands artistes allemands juifs commença : Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, Artur Schnabel, Bronisław Huberman. Fürtwängler continua de diriger au « Staatsoper » (dont Hermann Göring était le Maître absolu) des Opéras tels que « Arabella » ou « Elektra » de Richard Strauß. Lors d'une tournée du Philharmonique de Berlin, un concert « monstre » eut lieu à Mannheim, réunissant sur le podium la Philharmonie et l'Orchestre de Mannheim, soit 170 musiciens. Un « clash » se produisit, les Nazis ayant demandé à Fürtwängler qu'il se sépare de son 1er violon juif, Szymon Goldberg. Ayant refusé, il décida de ne plus revenir dans la ville. (Il n'y reviendra que 21 ans plus tard.) Il termina la saison 1932-1933 à l'Opéra de Paris (« Tristan » et « Walkyrie ») et fut nommé en juin par Göring, chef principal du « Staatsoper » de Berlin. Le même Göring le nomma « Staatsrat » (Conseiller d'État) , le 8 juillet 1933, et, le 15 septembre, Erich Kleiber dirigea une représentation de gala de « Lohengrin » en l'honneur de Fürtwängler. Il fut également nommé au poste honorifique de vice-Président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » . En août 1933, il rencontra Adolf Hitler dans son repaire de l'Obersalzberg, à Berchtesgaden, et affirma à ses proches, à son retour : « Jamais ce camelot chuintant ne jouera le moindre rôle en Allemagne. » . L'avenir allait, hélas, lui prouver le contraire.

Le 11 mars 1934, il dirigea la première de l'œuvre de Paul Hindemith, « Mathis der Maler » , et publia dans le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , du 25 novembre, le célèbre article « der Fall Hindemith » en réponse aux attaques nazies contre le compositeur accusé d'écrire de la musique « dégénérée » . Le 25 avril, lors d'une tournée du Philharmonique de Berlin, il rencontra à Rome Benito Mussolini, ce qui mit le chef Arturo Toscanini en fureur. (« Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » du 25 novembre 1934.)

La saison 1934-1935 sera brève : après 2 « Ring » au « Staatsoper » , en octobre et novembre, et l'article sur Paul Hindemith, Fürtwängler se démit de toutes ses fonctions officielles le 4 décembre et se retira dans les Alpes bavaroises où il commença à écrire son Concerto symphonique pour piano. Son passeport lui fut retiré. Le chef Erich Kleiber soutint son action en démissionnant lui aussi de son poste à l'Opéra d'État de Berlin (« Städtische Oper ») et prit le chemin de l'exil.

La nouvelle du départ de Wilhelm Fürtwängler fit sensation mais eut comme conséquence que les frontières de l'Allemagne lui furent fermées. Pour compliquer la situation, le Philharmonique de Berlin devait effectuer une tournée en Grande Bretagne, en janvier 1935, et Fürtwängler déclara qu'il était hors de question qu'il la dirige. On proposa à Thomas Beecham de l'assurer mais celui-ci ayant refusé, la tournée fut purement et simplement annulée. La situation devint de plus en plus pénible pour Fürtwängler qui décida de se séparer de sa secrétaire juive, Bertha Geißmar. Finalement, après une entrevue avec Josef Gœbbels, le 28 février 1935, un compromis fut trouvé et on autorisa Fürtwängler à poursuivre son activité musicale, à diriger en Allemagne sans aucun titre ni poste officiel et à laisser les questions politiques à Adolf Hitler et à ses sbires. Le « Führer » donna son accord et Fürtwängler put à nouveau voyager à sa guise. Il retrouva son orchestre, le 25 avril 1935 à Berlin, dans un programme entièrement consacré à son cher Beethoven : Adolf Hitler, Josef Gœbbels et Hermann Göring assistèrent au concert et, à la fin de celui-ci, Hitler lui serra chaleureusement la main. Fürtwängler acheva la saison par des représentations d'Opéra au Covent Garden de Londres (« Tristan ») , à l'Opéra de Paris (« Tristan » et la « Walkyrie ») , au National Theatre de Munich (« Tristan ») , à l'Opéra de Vienne (« Tristan ») et à l'Opéra de Hambourg (« Die Meistersinger ») . Hitler, Gœbbels et Joachim von Ribbentrop assistèrent à la représentation de Hambourg, le 23 juin 1935.

La saison 1935-1936 débuta à Nuremberg par les « Meistersinger » et par « Tannhäuser » , à l'Opéra de Vienne. Le 7 novembre, il dirigea « Egmont » de Beethoven au « Schauspielhaus » de Berlin, dans une mise-en-scène du célèbre acteur Gustav Gründgens (personnage controversé et opportuniste notoire) . Hitler, Göring, Gœbbels et Rudolph Heß étaient encore présents. Après une tournée du Philharmonique en novembre-décembre, il finit l'année au National Theatre de Munich (« Die Meistersinger » , le 25 décembre, et « Tristan » , le 1 janvier) . Le 27 février, il partit pour l'Égypte avec son ami John Knittel. Arrivé à Alexandrie, le 5 mars, il était de retour à Naples, le 31 mars. La saison s'acheva par des représentations d'Opéra à Paris (« Die Meistersinger ») , à Zürich (« Tristan ») , à Vienne (« Tannhäuser ») et au Festival de Bayreuth où il dirigea « Lohengrin » , « Parsifal » et le « Ring » .

En novembre 1936, le chef Thomas Beecham fit une tournée allemande avec son Orchestre londonien et demanda à Fürtwängler de partager avec lui les prochaines festivités prévues à Covent Garden, à l'occasion du couronnement du roi Georges VI. Auparavant, Fürtwängler, en accord avec Hitler, avait décidé d'annuler toute activité publique durant l'hiver 1936-1937, souhaitant passer cette période dans une paix absolue afin de se consacrer à la composition. Il retrouva son Orchestre, le 10 février 1937, à Berlin, lors d'un concert où, une fois encore, Hitler, Göring et Gœbbels étaient présents. En mars, il effectua une tournée de musique de chambre avec le violoniste Hugo Kolberg, tournée autour de laquelle il créa à Leipzig, le 4 mars, sa Sonate en ré mineur.

Après une magnifique performance de la 9e de Beethoven à Londres (25 mars) , il dirigea le « Ring » au « Staatsoper » de Berlin, effectua une courte tournée avec le Philharmonique et partit pour Londres afin de commencer les répétitions du « Ring » qui sera donné en 2 cycles. La sensation du second cycle fut la 1re apparition de Kirsten Flagstad en Brunnhilde. Puis, la saison s'acheva aux Festivals de Bayreuth (« Parsifal » , « Ring ») et Salzbourg (9e de Beethoven) . La saison 1937-1938 débuta à Paris, le 7 septembre, par la 9e de Beethoven, suivie par

2 représentations de « la Walkyrie » avec la troupe du « Staatsoper » de Berlin. Lors de la tournée du Philharmonique, il créa avec le pianiste Edwin Fischer (à qui l'œuvre est dédiée) son Concerto symphonique, le 26 octobre, à Munich. À la même époque, il enregistra pour « His Master's Voice » (HMV) quelques-uns de ses disques qui seront acclamés dans le monde entier (la 5e de Beethoven et, en 1938, la « Symphonie Pathétique » et des extraits wagnériens) . Les 22 et 23 avril 1938, Fürtwängler dirigea à Berlin le Philharmonique de Vienne (la « Symphonie inachevée » de Schubert et la 7e de Bruckner) , concerts auxquels assistèrent les inévitables Adolf Hitler et Josef Gœbbels. Il se rendit à nouveau à Covent Garden, en mai-juin, pour 2 nouveaux cycles du « Ring » et la saison s'acheva à Munich avec « Fidelio » , à l'Opéra de Paris avec « Tristan » et au Festival de Salzbourg avec « Die Meistersinger » .

Le 5 septembre, il était à Nuremberg avec le Philharmonique de Vienne (« Die Meistersinger ») . Le 20 février 1939, il fut nommé Commandeur de la Légion d'Honneur par le gouvernement français mais Adolf Hitler interdit la diffusion de cette nouvelle en Allemagne. En mai, il dirigea 2 représentations de la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de Bach à Munich et Florence et acheva sa saison à l'Opéra de Zürich (« Die Meistersinger » , la « Walkyrie » et un concert à la Villa Wesendonck avec Kirsten Flagstad remplaçant Germaine Lubin) . Les représentations de « la Walkyrie » , prévues à l'Opéra de Paris en juin, furent annulées par le gouvernement français pour des raisons politiques. Après l'invasion de la Pologne par l'Allemagne, l'activité de Fürtwängler se limita à l'Autriche (annexée depuis le 13 mars 1938) et l'Allemagne. En avril 1940, il était néanmoins en Scandinavie mais le concert prévu à Copenhague, le 10 avril, fut annulé en raison de l'occupation du Danemark par les Nazis. En mai, il rencontra à Berlin celle qui deviendra sa seconde femme, Elisabeth Ackermann, mariée à un avocat qui sera tué peu de temps après en France.

Si Wilhelm Fürtwängler ne donna aucun concert en France durant la guerre et refusa de jouer dans les pays occupés par les Nazis, il dirigea pourtant dans des villes « annexées » (par exemple, Prague) . En décembre 1940, il fit une seconde tournée de concerts de musique de chambre, cette fois avec Georg Kulenkampff. Au début de mars 1941, skiant dans le « Vorarlberg » (« Sankt Anton » , en Autriche) , il fut victime d'un grave accident qui lui occasionna de nombreuses lésions et l'obligea à suspendre toute activité durant 9 mois. En février 1942, il effectua une tournée scandinave avec Berlin et, fin mars, était à Vienne pour les festivités du centenaire du Philharmonique : à cette occasion, le 28 mars, il dirigea pour l'unique fois de sa vie la 3e Symphonie de Franz Schubert. De retour à Berlin, il dirigea le 19 avril un concert pour l'anniversaire de Adolf Hitler, au cours duquel Josef Gœbbels fit un discours fleuve sur « l'œuvre gigantesque » du « Führer » .

En novembre-décembre, il se rendit de nouveau en Scandinavie où il dirigea 2 représentations de « la Walkyrie » à l'Opéra de Stockholm et un concert avec l'orchestre de Göteborg. Le 12 décembre, il dirigea « Die Meistersinger » pour la ré-ouverture du « Staatsoper » de Berlin et, en janvier 1943, donna des concerts en Suisse avec les orchestres de Winterthur, de la « Tonhalle » et de Berne. Le 2 janvier 1943, il dirigea « Tristan » au « Staatsoper » de Vienne : c'est la seule mise-en-scène qu'il réalisa pendant sa carrière. Après la tournée scandinave du Philharmonique de Vienne en mai, il épousa civilement à Potsdam Elisabeth Ackermann, le 26 juin : il avait 57 ans et sa femme 25 de moins. (Fürtwängler vivait à la Fasanerie dans le parc de Sans-Souci, à Potsdam. Ils se marièrent religieusement à la fin de 1945, dans l'église de Montreux, en Suisse.) . En juillet, il participa au Festival de Bayreuth, dirigeant « Die Meistersinger » , en alternance avec Hermann Abendroth.

Le 7 septembre 1943, à la suite d'une dénonciation, les Nazis pendirent le pianiste prodige Karl Robert Kreiten, élève de Claudio Arrau. Ce drame est à l'origine d'une pièce de théâtre écrite par Heinrich Riemenschneider, « Requiem pour K. R. Kreiten », qui fut représentée pour la 1^{re} fois en Allemagne, en 1987. Les principaux personnages en sont Kreiten et sa mère, Fürtwängler, Gøebels et 2 dénonciateurs. En décembre, il était à nouveau en Scandinavie (Stockholm et Göteborg) et, en janvier, la Suisse l'accueillit (Orchestres de la Suisse Romande et de Berne) .

Le 30 janvier, la vieille salle de la Philharmonie de Berlin située sur la « Bernburgerstraße » fut réduite en cendres par les bombardements. La saison se termina à Bayreuth avec « Die Meistersinger » et aux Festivals de Salzbourg et de Lucerne. Le 11 octobre 1944, Fürtwängler dirigea pour la seule et unique fois de sa vie le « Bruckner Orchester » de Linz, également appelé « Orchestre du “ Führer ” » dont le chef attitré était Georg-Ludwig Jochum, l'un des 3 frères Jochum. Le 7 novembre, sa mère mourut à Heidelberg et, 4 jours plus tard, sa femme, établie en Suisse, donna naissance à un fils, Andreas, qu'il ne verra qu'en février 1945.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler était devenu un traître aux yeux des Nazis en raison de ses incessantes critiques contre la politique menée par Adolf Hitler. Il avait même été accusé d'avoir participé au complot du 20 juillet 1944, destiné à éliminer physiquement Hitler. La situation était devenue intolérable et les Nazis ne souhaitaient pas que Fürtwängler survive à la guerre. Selon la transcription sténographique de son procès en dénazification, qui eut lieu à Berlin le 17 décembre 1946, Fürtwängler déclara :

« En octobre 1944, je reçus la visite du médecin personnel de Madame Himmler qui m'informa de l'état d'esprit de Himmler et des SS. Depuis le début, Himmler était un ennemi personnel, cette dame me le confirma. Elle revint en novembre. En janvier 1945, alors que j'étais à Berlin pour la dernière fois, elle vint tôt le matin à l'improviste, resta quelques minutes et me dit : " Monsieur Fürtwängler, personne ne doit apprendre ma visite ici. Je dois vous aviser que les SS parlent d'une mise en quarantaine à votre sujet. Aucun Nazi ne doit plus vous adresser la parole. Chacun de vos gestes, ainsi que votre téléphone vont être surveillés. Vous êtes accusé d'avoir été un complice de l'attentat contre Hitler. Tirez-en les conséquences." . Elle partit. La conséquence que j'en ai tirée, c'est de ne plus revenir à Berlin après mes concerts à Vienne mais de me cacher durant 3 jours près de la frontière suisse. La veille et le jour où j'ai franchi la frontière, des agents de la Gestapo étaient venus voir ma secrétaire, Mademoiselle von Tiedemann et lui dirent à son grand étonnement que j'étais parti. J'ai alors fait tout ce qu'il fallait pour clarifier ma situation en Suisse. »

Lors du concert du 11 décembre 1944, à Berlin, Albert Speer avait également avisé Fürtwängler qu'il courait un danger mortel de la part de Gestapo de Himmler et conseillé de ne pas revenir de sa prochaine tournée en Suisse. En effet, après avoir fêté le 25 janvier son 59 anniversaire à l'Hôtel Impérial de Vienne, en compagnie de son ami l'ingénieur du son Friedrich Schnapp, il adressa le 30 un message au Philharmonique de Berlin par lequel il avisait son Orchestre qu'il ne pouvait diriger les concerts prévus les 4 et 5 février, « en raison d'une chute sur le verglas » . À partir du 1 février, il organisa sa fuite en Suisse à l'occasion des concerts qu'il devait diriger à Lausanne, Genève et Winterthur. Du 1 au 6 février, il se cacha dans la petite localité de Dornbirn, proche de Bregenz et de la frontière suisse. De Dornbirn précisément, il écrivit à Irme Schwab :

« Je suis en route pour la Suisse. Je ne sais pas encore si, en raison de la situation politique, on me laissera passer. Dans la négative, j'irai à Tanneck. »

Le 6, il écrivit à Hélène Matschenz : « Si on m'en laisse la possibilité, je franchis demain la frontière. » .

Le 7, il franchit effectivement la frontière et rejoignit sa femme et son fils. Le 23 février, il dirigea son dernier concert à Winterthur (la 8e de Bruckner) et fut empêché de diriger 2 concerts de la « Tonhalle » qui furent annulés par le Conseil municipal. À cette occasion, un énorme scandale qui dura tout le mois, éclata dans la presse suisse d'extrême-gauche (il fut accusé d'être un suppôt du Nazisme) , dans des journaux tels « Volksrecht » , etc.

Le Journal de Genève résuma fort bien ce qu'on appela « l'Affaire Fürtwängler » :

« L'interdiction, par le Conseil d'État, des 2 concerts que Wilhelm Fürtwängler devait donner cette semaine à la " Tonhalle ", a soulevé une vive émotion. Il semble que, d'une manière générale, on regrette cette mesure suggérée au gouvernement par le Conseil exécutif de la ville et arrachée à ces 2 autorités par les menaces indirectes du Parti des Travailleurs. Le Département cantonal de la Police avait en effet commencé par autoriser les concerts et n'est revenu sur sa décision que sous la pression du " Stadtrat ", poussé lui-même par l'extrême-gauche. Aussi les protestations n'ont-elles pas tardé. " La Nouvelle Gazette de Zürich " et " die Tat " , organe des indépendants, se sont immédiatement insurgés contre cette immixtion des passions partisans dans la vie de l'esprit, déplorant que Zürich donne un si fâcheux exemple d'intolérance. »

« Comme l'a fort bien dit le Comité central du Parti radical de Zürich, dans une protestation rendue publique, il est regrettable que les autorités suisses aient paru céder aux entreprises de démagogues désireux d'exploiter, dans un but évident de surenchère, l'aversion générale et justifiée de la population pour un régime politique étranger. " L'Affaire Fürtwängler " a connu un 1er épilogue mercredi au Conseil municipal, la discussion ayant été aussi instructive que mouvementée. 2 groupes d'orateurs se sont affrontés : d'un côté, les radicaux et les indépendants qui ont pris la défense de Fürtwängler auquel, estiment-ils, il est un peu tard de reprocher sa qualité de " Staatsrat " (Conseiller d'État) prussien et la décoration qu'il a acceptée du " Führer "; de l'autre, les communistes, les socialistes et un membre de la fraction de la Monnaie franche qui reprochent au musicien allemand de se laisser ravalé au rang d'agent d'une propagande camouflée. »

Quant au concert de Winterthur (8e de Bruckner) , il sera son dernier avant la chute du « Reich » nazi et donna lieu à des manifestations à l'appel de l'Union ouvrière et du Parti des travailleurs. Des manifestants essayèrent d'empêcher le public de se rendre au concert et un détachement de gendarmes, utilisant des lances à incendie, dut intervenir mais le concert se déroula sans incident devant une salle comble. (Manifeste anti-Fürtwängler, paru dans les journaux suisses le 5 juin 1948.)

Au cours de février, Wilhelm Fürtwängler s'établit à Clarens, à la « Clinique la Prairie » , propriété du Docteur Niehans et qui sera sa résidence jusqu'en juin 1947.

Mais qui était ce Docteur Niehans que l'on surnomma « Docteur Miracle » ? Certains voyaient en lui un charlatan - abusant de la crédulité publique et faisant payer à des prix astronomiques des traitements qui ne servaient à rien ; d'autres, un véritable pionnier des thérapies de rajeunissement. Père de la « cellulothérapie », Paul Niehans, né en 1882, avait de prestigieux « clients » : Konrad Adenauer, Somerset Maugham, Gloria Swanson, Charles Chaplin, la duchesse de Windsor. Après avoir été un chirurgien de réputation internationale, il allait devenir pour les uns, un génie, pour les autres, un illuminé, un faux démiurge guidé uniquement par l'appât du gain.

Une fois en sécurité en Suisse, Fürtwängler et sa famille attendirent la fin de la guerre. Finalement, l'annonce de la mort d'Adolf Hitler, le 30 avril 1945, marqua la fin des hostilités et ceci signifiait surtout pour lui qu'il devait être « dénazifié » par les Alliés. Cette « purification » se résuma dans son cas, à savoir pourquoi il était resté en Allemagne sous la dictature hitlérienne et à étudier son comportement durant cette période, principalement par rapport à l'antisémitisme officiel. Les procès eurent lieu à Vienne, en janvier 1946, et à Berlin, les 11 et 17 décembre de la même année. Fürtwängler fut blanchi et autorisé à diriger de nouveau. Contrairement à d'autres chefs allemands (Herbert von Karajan, Oswald Kabasta, Hermann Abendroth), Fürtwängler n'adhéra jamais au Parti nazi, ne fit jamais le salut hitlérien, ne signa jamais son courrier « Heil Hitler » et aida autant qu'il put les musiciens juifs. Pour être resté en Allemagne, Fürtwängler donna la raison suivante :

« Je ne suis pas resté parce que j'étais nazi, je suis resté parce que je suis allemand ! »

Il fut aidé dans sa défense par son ami le metteur-en-scène de théâtre, Boleslav Barlog, par le chef par intérim du Philharmonique de Berlin, le roumain Sergiu Celibidache, et par des musiciens comme Hugo Strelitzer qui déclara :

« Si je suis vivant aujourd'hui c'est grâce à ce grand homme. Fürtwängler a aidé et protégé de nombreux musiciens juifs et cette attitude prouve un grand courage car il le faisait sous les yeux des Nazis, en Allemagne même. L'histoire jugera cet homme. »

À la fin du procès, Fürtwängler fit la déclaration suivante :

« L'Art n'a rien à voir avec la politique et avec la guerre. Je me sentais responsable de la musique allemande et il était de mon devoir d'aider à surmonter cette crise autant que je le pouvais. Je ne regrette pas d'être resté parmi les allemands qui devaient vivre sous la terreur de Himmler. »

Dans ses « Cahiers » de 1946, il nota :

« J'ai essayé de juger mon attitude. Je ne suis pas meilleur que d'autres mais je dois exprimer ce que me dictait mon instinct. Il y a 2 choses : l'amour pour ma patrie et mon peuple, et le sentiment d'avoir ici la tâche de réparer un tort. Le souci d'être abusivement utilisé par la propagande nazie a dû, pour moi, s'effacer devant une préoccupation plus grande, c'est-à-dire savoir conserver la musique allemande autant que possible dans sa permanence et continuer à faire de la musique avec des musiciens allemands pour des auditeurs allemands. »

Wilhelm Fürtwängler fut acquitté le 17 décembre 1946 mais ne put diriger le Philharmonique de Berlin que le 25 mai 1947 dans un programme tout Beethoven. Très rapidement, son activité s'intensifia et il reprit le chemin des tournées et des Festivals (Salzbourg, Lucerne) . Les 24 et 25 janvier 1948, il donna 2 concerts à Paris avec l'Orchestre de la société des Concerts du Conservatoire. En février, ce furent 10 concerts à Londres et, le 22, il dirigea à Berlin la création de sa 2e Symphonie, écrite à la fin de la guerre. En avril, il partit pour l'Argentine où il dirigea 8 concerts au « Teatro Colon » de Buenos Aires ; puis, l'Italie l'accueillit pour 6 concerts et il emmena le Philharmonique de Vienne dans une tournée en Suisse et la saison s'acheva aux Festivals de Salzbourg (« Fidelio ») et Lucerne.

En août, un triste événement perturba les relations de Wilhelm Fürtwängler avec l'Amérique : il avait été contacté par les dirigeants du « Chicago Symphony » afin qu'il dirige 22 des 28 concerts de la saison à venir. En décembre, il donna son accord pour 8 concerts et, le 6 janvier 1949, un article de Howard Taubmann parut dans le « Times » , article qui faisait mention d'un veto « des musiciens » afin de mettre un terme au contrat de Fürtwängler. Ces fameux « musiciens » se nommaient Vladimir Horowitz, Arthur Rubinstein, Alexandre Brailowsky, Isaac Stern, Lily Pons et André Kostelanetz qui déclarèrent qu'ils ne joueraient plus à Chicago si Fürtwängler devenait le chef principal de l'Orchestre. Face à cette campagne de dénigrement, soigneusement organisée et orchestrée par certains milieux juifs, Fürtwängler préféra renoncer au poste. L'un des plus acharnés fut Rubinstein qui avait perdu une grande partie de sa famille dans l'Holocauste et qui déclara :

« Je refuse d'être associé avec quiconque sympathise avec Hitler, Göring et Gœbbels. Si Fürtwängler avait été un vrai démocrate, il aurait tourné le dos à l'Allemagne comme fit Thomas Mann. Fürtwängler est resté parce qu'il pensait que l'Allemagne gagnerait la guerre et maintenant, il est en quête de dollars et de prestige en Amérique. »

Des artistes comme le chef Bruno Walter, les violonistes Yehudi Menuhin ou Nathan Milstein ne s'associèrent pas à cette campagne hystérique. Menuhin fit d'ailleurs paraître dans la presse la mise au point suivante :

« Je n'ai jamais rencontré d'attitude plus insolente que celle de ces 3 ou 4 meneurs qui déploient des efforts frénétiques pour exclure de leur terrain de chasse de prédilection un illustre collègue. Leur comportement m'inspire plus que du mépris. »

Nathan Milstein déclara de son côté :

« Fürtwängler est un grand musicien et absolument pas un Nazi et si la campagne de protestations réussit, le grand perdant sera le " Chicago Symphony ". »

C'est exactement ce qui se passa.

Dans ses « Cahiers » de 1949, Wilhelm Fürtwängler évoqua cette pénible affaire :

« Nombre d'artistes américains renommés ont protesté contre ma venue en Amérique. Cette protestation est une hérésie dans l'histoire de la musique. Quelle est la raison de cette machination ? Il s'agit d'un " boycott " préparé dans un but précis et on se demande quelles sont les vraies raisons de cette manière d'agir, de cet ostracisme, de cette diffamation envers un artiste estimé. Serait-ce parce que je suis allemand ? »

En 1948, Wilhelm Fürtwängler avait 62 ans. Il était partout réclamé comme chef-invité, assurait les tournées des Philharmoniques de Berlin et de Vienne et se retrouvait fréquemment dans les studios de « His Master's Voice » (HMV) pour des séances d'enregistrement à Vienne ou à Londres. En septembre-octobre, il donna à Londres un cycle complet des Symphonies de Beethoven avec le Philharmonique de Vienne, cycle qui fut retransmis en direct à la télévision mais dont malheureusement plus aucune image ne subsiste. Chaque année, il honora de sa présence les Festivals et, en août 1949, rendit visite à Richard Strauß hospitalisé dans une clinique de Montreux. L'année suivante, le 22 mai 1950 à Londres, il créait avec Kirsten Flagstad « les Quatre derniers Lieder » .

En septembre 1949, Fürtwängler participa au Festival de Besançon et, en mars-avril 1950, dirigea 3 cycles du « Ring » à la Scala de Milan. Flagstad faisait partie de la distribution. Une nouvelle série de concerts au « Teatro Colon » fut programmée en avril-mai 1950 et en mars-avril 1951 ; il était à nouveau à la Scala pour 5 représentations de « Parsifal » de Wagner et 4 de « Orphée et Eurydice » de Gluck. En avril, il emmena le Philharmonique de Berlin pour une tournée de 10 concerts en Égypte (le Caire, Alexandrie) , et, le 29 juillet, il fut choisi pour la ré-ouverture officielle du Festival de Bayreuth, dirigeant une 9e de Beethoven restée mythique.

Le 18 octobre, Rudolph Bing, directeur du « MET » de New York, écrit à Fürtwängler, lui demandant d'ouvrir la saison 1952 avec une nouvelle production de « Lohengrin » et un autre Opéra de son choix. Fürtwängler apprit que Arturo Toscanini s'opposait à sa venue de toutes les manières possibles. Une fois de plus, ce projet américain fut réduit à néant, ainsi qu'une tournée du Philharmonique de Vienne outre-atlantique. En mars 1952, il retrouva la Scala pour 6 représentations de « Die Meistersinger » et, après une longue tournée avec Berlin, il réalisa en juin, à Londres, un magnifique et célèbre enregistrement de « Tristan und Isolde » avec Kirsten Flagstad et le « Philharmonia Orchestra » de Londres.

Après une représentation de « la Walkyrie' à Zürich, le 29 juin, il partit pour les répétitions du Festival de Salzbourg au cours desquelles il contracta une double pneumonie. Il dut interrompre ses activités et se soigner durant plusieurs mois dans un sanatorium des Alpes bavaroises. S'étant peu reposé depuis 1947, il dormait peu et ce manque de sommeil affecta sa santé. En outre, il prenait de fortes doses d'antibiotiques et, en particulier, de Tétracycline qui avait des effets secondaires, notamment sur l'ouïe. Fürtwängler se rétablit, retrouva le Philharmonique le 7 décembre, à Berlin, mais le 23 janvier 1953, à Vienne, il s'évanouit durant l'Adagio de la 9e de Beethoven. Une nouvelle fois et malgré son opposition, les médecins lui prescrivirent de grandes quantités d'antibiotiques et son ouïe, en particulier l'oreille droite, commença à se détériorer. Cette perte de l'audition lui causa des sentiments dépressifs et, malgré ce handicap, il continua sa tâche, reprit ses tournées et revint à Salzbourg et Lucerne.

La saison 1953-1954 débuta par 4 concerts au Festival d'Edimbourg avec le Philharmonique de Vienne puis, en octobre-novembre, il donna le « Ring » à la « RAI » de Rome, à raison d'un acte par jour. Durant ce séjour dans la capitale romaine, il donnera même 2 concerts privés pour le Pape Pie XII, au Vatican et à Castel Gandolfo, résidence d'été du Souverain Pontife. En décembre, il attrapa la grippe qui l'immobilisa durant plus de 2 mois, et, en mars, partit pour Caracas donner 2 concerts avec l'Orchestre symphonique du Venezuela. De retour en Suisse, il acheta une propriété sur les hauteurs de Montreux, à Clarens, baptisée le Basset Coulon où malheureusement, il ne passera que peu de temps.

La saison 1954-1955 sera la plus courte et la dernière. Après 2 ultimes interprétations de la 9e de Beethoven au Festival de Lucerne (21 et 22 août) , un concert au Festival de Besançon, le 6 septembre, et 2 concerts à Berlin, les 19 et 20, où il joua sa 2e Symphonie, il partit pour Vienne où il enregistra « la Walkyrie » , du 28 septembre au 6 octobre. Les disques témoignent du jeu radieux du Philharmonique de Vienne. Ce sera la dernière fois où il dirigera un orchestre.

De Vienne, il se rendit à Gastein pour soigner son ouïe. Sur le chemin de retour à Clarens, il ne se sentit pas très bien et prit froid. Sa femme essaya de le persuader de garder le lit mais il préféra effectuer des marches en montagne au grand air. Dans la nuit du 6 novembre, il avoua à sa femme : « De cette maladie, je vais mourir et ce sera une mort facile. Ne me quitte pas un seul instant. » . Il lut la copie de sa 3e Symphonie et écouta les épreuves de son enregistrement de « Fidelio » qui venaient d'arriver. Les médecins ayant diagnostiqué une broncho-pneumonie, sa femme décida de l'hospitaliser à Ebersteinburg, près de Baden-Baden, dans la clinique de son médecin, le Docteur von Löwenstein. Le voyage eut lieu le 12 novembre par un radieux soleil de fin d'automne. À la clinique, Fürtwängler fit cette confession à sa femme : « Tu sais, ils croient tous que je suis venu ici pour guérir. Moi, je sais que je suis venu pour mourir. » . Ce qui frappa le plus sa femme, c'est qu'il ne dirigeait plus pour soi. Il s'était complètement concentré sur la mort, sur sa mort. Il fit venir l'intendant du Philharmonique de Berlin, Gerhardt von Westermann et prit congé de lui : « Saluez aussi mon Orchestre pour moi, je vous prie. » . Son état de santé s'aggrava et, le matin du 30 novembre, on lui fit une transfusion sanguine. Il mourut le jour même dans une absolue sérénité et fut inhumé au cimetière de Heidelberg auprès de sa mère, le 4 décembre. Au cours du service funèbre, le chef Karl Böhm rendit hommage à son collègue :

« Bouleversé comme jamais auparavant, je me trouve aujourd'hui devant le cercueil de l'homme qui était mon ami depuis 20 ans. Pour moi et pour tous ceux qui vous aimaient, cher Fürtwängler, on ne peut pas encore évaluer les conséquences de votre mort parce qu'elle laisse un vide qui ne pourra jamais plus être comblé. Que Dieu vous accueille dans un monde meilleur et qu'il vous paye en retour pour toute la Beauté inoubliable que vous nous avez donnée en cadeau dans le domaine de l'Art le plus divin. »

Le Philharmonique de Berlin sous la direction du chef Eugen Jochum interpréta la « Maurerische Trauermusik » de Mozart et l'Aria de la Suite en ré de Bach.

De retour à Clarens, sa veuve confia à l'ami Ernest Ansermet :

« Le départ de Fürtwängler m'a appris qu'une mort acceptée était un but vers lequel on doit tendre. Fürtwängler l'a pu. »

Pourquoi n'y a-t-il plus de Fürtwängler aujourd'hui ? Était-il unique ? Doit-on répondre en invoquant le rôle actuel des médias et la culture de masse ? N'est-on pas en pleine décadence de la direction d'orchestre où les chefs ne sont plus que des techniciens sans âme ? Qu'en est-il réellement de tous ces chefs médiatiques créés et portés à bout de bras par leurs maisons de disques toutes puissantes ? Il est certain que le « show business » d'aujourd'hui et son corollaire, le « star system » à outrance mènent tout droit à un phénomène de réification. Mais l'imagination n'est-elle pas aussi la manière dont nous déformons les images ? Fürtwängler était une légende de son vivant et le mythe n'a fait que s'amplifier.

Le violoniste Yehudi Menuhin déclara :

« Il existe beaucoup de chefs d'orchestre mais très peu d'entre eux laissent entrevoir la chapelle secrète qui réside au cœur même de tout chef d'œuvre. Au-delà des notes s'étalent des visions et au-delà des visions, cette chapelle invisible et silencieuse car c'est une musique intérieure qui se répand là, la musique de notre âme dont les échos ne sont que des ombres pâles. Tel fut le génie de Fürtwängler car il s'approcha de toute œuvre en pèlerin afin de revivre cet état d'existence qui rappelle la Création, le mystère qui est au cœur de toute cellule. Avec ses gestes fluides et évocateurs, il transportait ses orchestres et ses solistes dans cet endroit sacré. »

La juste réponse fut peut-être donnée par le chef Eliahu Inbal quand il affirma :

« Pourquoi n'y a-t-il pas de Fürtwängler aujourd'hui ? Je ne pense pas que cela s'explique par l'absence de talents mais personne ne peut se métamorphoser en Fürtwängler alors qu'on vit au rythme des mécanismes actuels de l'organisation des concerts et des enregistrements qui suivent les mêmes schémas que ceux utilisés pour produire des savons ou des automobiles. La manière dont sont réalisés les enregistrements, en plaçant une foule de micros, suffirait à détruire tout le mystère et le climat que savait si bien créer Fürtwängler. Nous, musiciens de la jeune génération, devrions tenter de suivre l'exemple de Fürtwängler : cela n'a rien à voir avec le tempo mais plutôt avec l'imagination, dans une totale soumission à la musique. »

Se situant aux antipodes de la vision d'un Arturo Toscanini pour qui il n'y avait aucune part de « création » dans l'interprétation, Fürtwängler avait écrit en 1927 :

« La véritable éthique du chef d'orchestre ne réside pas dans la perfection technique mais dans l'attitude spirituelle. »

Cherchant « l'au-delà des notes », Fürtwängler aura sans cesse été en quête d' « Absolu ». Qu'importe les modes, et même s'il est vrai que le Romantisme exacerbé de Fürtwängler et l'idée quasi-religieuse qu'il se faisait de la musique et du rôle de médium qu'il attribuait au chef d'orchestre dans la communion mystique entre le compositeur et le public, peuvent irriter, « l'Art de Fürtwängler » est éternel.

AB 123 : Wilhelm Fürtwängler et ses relations avec le régime nazi

Une grande partie de la vie personnelle et professionnelle du compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1886-1954) fut marquée par le contexte historique de la montée puis de l'apogée du Nazisme. Sa renommée lui permit de bénéficier d'une réelle protection de la part des dignitaires nazis, mais cela lui valut également de faire face à des accusations de compromissions avec le régime. Il fut toutefois lavé de ces accusations en 1946 après avoir démontré qu'il n'avait jamais approuvé la politique nazie et qu'il avait soutenu de nombreuses personnes d'origine juive.

La montée du pouvoir nazi

La volonté de récupération

Wilhelm Fürtwängler était devenu, bien avant l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir, le plus grand chef d'orchestre d'Allemagne et le principal symbole de la grande tradition musicale allemande. Bien que Fürtwängler ne s'intéressât que très peu à la politique, il participa, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, à certains concerts officiels de la République de Weimar, par exemple en juillet 1927 et 1928 pour l'anniversaire de la constitution organisé surtout par les socio-démocrates. Il refusa néanmoins de participer à l'anniversaire de la fondation du « Reich » prussien dans la galerie des glaces à Versailles organisée par les conservateurs le 18 janvier 1928. De façon générale, il répétait, en privé, sans arrêt, que politique et art n'ont rien à voir ensemble, formule qu'il reprendra souvent lorsqu'il s'opposera aux mesures prises par les Nazis dans le domaine culturel.

Bien qu'il s'opposât très rapidement à la politique raciale des Nazis, Fürtwängler fut relativement bien traité et occupa une position enviable dans les milieux culturels du 3e « Reich » . Il était, en effet, le chef d'orchestre préféré d'Adolf Hitler et de Josef Gœbbels et ce, bien avant leur arrivée au pouvoir. Fürtwängler était, comme Richard Strauß, considéré par les Nazis comme un « trésor national » et à ce titre devait absolument être protégé et utilisé pour glorifier le peuple allemand. Comme Strauß, il bénéficiait d'un statut très particulier : Gœbbels choisit de fermer les yeux sur certaines positions qu'il n'aurait jamais acceptées venant d'autres personnes. Ainsi en 1938, peu de temps après l' « Anschluss » , lorsque Fürtwängler arriva dans le hall d'entrée du « Musikverein » de Vienne, il vit qu'un drapeau avec une énorme croix gammée avait été ajouté. Il refusa de diriger tant qu'il n'avait pas été enlevé, ce qui fut fait. Les actes de ce genre étaient normalement passibles de la peine de mort, mais il ne fut pas inquiété. Ce statut particulier provient également du fait qu'au-delà des qualités artistiques de Fürtwängler ou Strauß, les Nazis les considéraient suivant leurs critères raciaux comme de « purs aryens » .

Parmi les idées circulant chez les Nazis, on trouve le culte de la grande musique allemande accompagné de la théorie selon laquelle il y avait une incompatibilité absolue entre cette musique et les Juifs : d'après eux, les Juifs ne pourraient jamais comprendre la musique allemande et ne pouvaient que la « polluer » . Cette théorie avait déjà été formulée par Richard Wagner dans ses écrits antisémites. Sa belle-fille, Winifred Wagner, qui reprit la direction du Festival de Bayreuth en 1930, y croyait sérieusement et se fâcha avec Fürtwängler à ce propos durant le Festival de 1931. Elle déclara en 1933 : « Le fait que Monsieur Fürtwängler ait des sympathies pour les juifs est clairement prouvé par la lettre qu'il a écrite au Docteur Gœbbels (en 1933) . De plus, il collabore depuis 16 ans avec Berta Geißmar, qui est juive, et nos lers désaccords à Bayreuth en 1931 eurent comme trame de fond la presse contrôlée par la Juiverie. » . Or, si Hitler et les dirigeants nazis voyaient en Fürtwängler le Maître de la musique allemande dans la pure tradition aryenne, ils ne savaient pas qu'une grande part de la compréhension que Fürtwängler avait acquise de cette musique allemande provenait de sa collaboration avec le musicologue Juif viennois Heinrich Schenker.

Fürtwängler travaillait directement avec des musiciens juifs comme Arnold Schönberg, Yehudi Menuhin, Artur Schnabel ou encore Gregor Piatigorsky et plusieurs musiciens de son orchestre dont son lier violon. Fred Prieberg a retrouvé le carnet d'adresses que Fürtwängler utilisait constamment durant la période 1922-1933 révélant ainsi toutes les relations du chef d'orchestre. Le carnet contenait la liste de tous les magasins, médecins, centres de sport, tailleurs, etc. fréquentés par Fürtwängler ainsi qu'une très longue liste de personnes du monde de la musique, du théâtre, de l'université, de la politique et même les banquiers de Fürtwängler. Fred Prieberg a remarqué que, curieusement, le chef d'orchestre arrêta brutalement l'utilisation de son carnet en 1933 ne rajoutant plus que les références des principaux dirigeants nazis par la suite. L'historien a décortiqué en détail tout le carnet trouvant un très grand nombre de noms d'origine juive, non seulement dans le domaine des arts mais aussi dans la vie quotidienne. Il semble même avoir bien connu plusieurs membres de la famille Warburg (dont Paul, Erich et Felix), les banquiers juifs les plus haïs des Nazis avec les Rothschild. Fred Prieberg en a déduit que Fürtwängler a cessé d'utiliser et de porter constamment ce carnet en 1933 tant il prouvait clairement ce que les Nazis prétendaient dès cette époque, à savoir que « Fürtwängler était un ami des Juifs ». Les formules telles que « Fürtwängler est bien disposé vis-à-vis des Juifs », « Fürtwängler est anti-national » ou « Fürtwängler n'est pas fiable politiquement » se retrouvent dans plusieurs rapports réalisés par les Nazis vers 1933 et retrouvés par Prieberg.

La secrétaire de Fürtwängler pendant la période 1915-1935, Berta Geißmar, était d'origine juive. Elle était tellement proche de Fürtwängler qu'elle raconta que les Nazis menèrent une enquête en 1933 pour savoir si elle était sa maîtresse. Berta Geißmar n'était pas qu'une secrétaire au sens ordinaire du terme. Elle venait d'une famille très cultivée qui avait eu des liens avec les familles Brahms et Strauß. Après une thèse en philosophie, elle était devenue l'assistante de Fürtwängler. C'est elle qui organisait toute la vie de l'Orchestre de Berlin traitant d'égal à égal avec les ambassadeurs et les plus grands chefs d'orchestre. En particulier, c'est elle qui organisa l'entretien entre Mussolini et Fürtwängler en 1934, lors de la tournée de ce dernier en Italie ce qui déclencha la fureur des dirigeants nazis. D'après Berta Geißmar, Mussolini et Fürtwängler passèrent leur temps à dire tout le mal qu'ils pensaient d'Hitler. Fürtwängler réussit à la protéger jusqu'en 1935. Il l'aida ensuite à partir d'Allemagne et la recommanda à Thomas Beecham dont elle devint la secrétaire. Berta Geißmar écrivit en 1943 à Londres dans son livre sur Fürtwängler : « Bien qu'il ait décidé de rester en Allemagne, il est certain que Fürtwängler n'était pas un Nazi. Nous avions une ligne privée pour nous téléphoner. Il m'appelait souvent avant de se coucher et je lui racontais des histoires pour le détendre ou nous parlions parfois de politique. L'une des principales charges utilisées plus tard par les Nazis contre Fürtwängler et moi-même est le fait qu'ils prétendaient avoir enregistré ces conversations. Je n'aurais jamais pensé une telle chose possible. Si ils ont fait ça, leurs oreilles ont dû exploser et ce n'est pas surprenant qu'ils l'aient mis sur la liste noire et l'aient séparé de moi. »

Dès l'arrivée au pouvoir des nazis en 1933, Fürtwängler se montra très critique à leur encontre.

Fürtwängler rencontra pour la Ire fois Adolf Hitler à l'hôtel Kaiserhof en 1932. Hitler, comme Josef Goebbels, avait une très haute opinion de Fürtwängler en tant que chef d'orchestre et souhaitait discuter avec lui du Festival de Bayreuth. En effet, Hitler voulait absolument le convaincre d'être le principal chef d'orchestre au Festival de Bayreuth de 1932 comme il l'avait été en 1931. Fürtwängler ne voulait pas car il s'était fâché avec Winifred Wagner. La dispute avec elle provenait entre autres de ses positions antisémites et ultra-nationalistes. Fürtwängler finira par rejouer à Bayreuth par la suite mais sera toujours en termes exécrables avec elle.

Après cette rencontre, Fürtwängler déclara à propos d'Hitler :

« Cet homme a une multitude d'idées marginales et fort conventionnelles sur l'art. Sa médiocrité m'aurait effrayé, si je n'avais pas été persuadé que jamais (il) ne parviendrait au pouvoir. »

André François-Poncet, l'ambassadeur de France à Berlin le rencontra peu de temps après et lui demanda : « Vous lui avez parlé ? ». Fürtwängler lui répondit d'un air surpris : « Vous le connaissez ? ». François-Poncet sourit et lui répondit : « Oui, je l'ai rencontré. Un homme étrange. Il m'a donné l'impression d'un croisement entre Jeanne d'Arc et Charlie Chaplin ! Et vous, quelle impression vous a fait Hitler ? ». Fürtwängler répondit : « Lui ? En fait, il ne m'a fait aucune impression du tout. ». Fürtwängler ajouta, début 1933, toujours à propos d'Hitler : « Jamais ce camelot chuintant ne jouera un quelconque rôle important en Allemagne. » Pourtant Hitler venait déjà d'être nommé Chancelier.

Fred Prieberg décrivit longuement Fürtwängler comme un « idéaliste » vivant en grande partie déconnecté de la réalité. Ceci est confirmé par Berta Geißmar qui écrivit qu'elle et lui ne vivaient que pour l'art et n'avaient jamais pris au sérieux Hitler. Lorsque ce dernier arriva au pouvoir, elle raconta que jamais Fürtwängler n'aurait pensé qu'Hitler allait se mêler de son travail d'artiste et que pendant longtemps Fürtwängler était persuadé que le régime nazi allait disparaître et ne serait qu'un épisode de courte durée dans l'histoire de l'Allemagne.

Fürtwängler assista à l'arrivée au pouvoir d'Hitler sans changer quoi que ce soit à ses concerts. En particulier, il continua à programmer de la musique de compositeurs juifs comme Mendelssohn et à faire jouer des solistes juifs allemands comme si de rien n'était. Il dirigea « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg », le 21 mars 1933, devant le « Führer » et le maréchal Hindenburg le lendemain de l'annonce de la fondation du nouveau « Reich » par Hitler. À la fin du concert, Fürtwängler, « pâle comme un mort », serra la main du nouveau Chancelier. Le concert eut lieu en présence de représentants de nombreux partis et, comme l'expliqua Fred Prieberg, n'avait pas plus de dimension politique que les concerts officiels sous la République de Weimar. Pour souligner la totale inconscience dans laquelle se trouvaient Fürtwängler et Berta Geißmar à ce moment, cette dernière a expliqué qu'elle s'était assise comme d'habitude aux Ires loges très proche d'Hitler alors qu'elle était juive.

Le 7 août, Hitler organisa une très grande cérémonie à Tannenberg pour y enterrer Hindenburg, ce qui lui permit aussi de faire un coup d'état en refusant de lui trouver un successeur. Hitler voulait absolument que Fürtwängler vienne pour y diriger l'« Eroica » ce qui aurait été le clou de l'événement. Mais les dirigeants nazis s'aperçurent que Fürtwängler avait complètement disparu. La presse fit courir le bruit que Fürtwängler vivait une aventure avec une aristocrate polonaise mais la vérité était qu'il s'était caché pour ne pas revivre la situation du 21 mars.

Fred Prieberg a expliqué qu'en 1933, l'Orchestre de Berlin était en faillite complète avec d'énormes déficits qui n'étaient acceptés par l'État allemand que parce qu'il s'agissait du plus grand orchestre d'Allemagne. Cela donnait une marge de manœuvre très faible pour Fürtwängler car il avait besoin de l'argent du pouvoir en place pour son orchestre et donc des Nazis désormais.

Les Nazis se mirent très rapidement à intervenir dans le domaine de la musique. Ils annulèrent une tournée importante de l'Orchestre de Berlin avec Bruno Walter en raison de ses origines juives. Il leur fallait trouver un remplaçant qui devait prouver que l'Allemagne n'avait pas besoin d'artistes juifs comme Walter. Les Nazis demandèrent donc à Fürtwängler de le remplacer pour cette tournée ce qu'il refusa catégoriquement en dépit des graves problèmes financiers de l'Orchestre. C'est Richard Strauß qui finalement accepta de prendre la place de Walter et profita de la tournée pour mettre en valeur sa « Sinfonia Domestica » .

Comme les Nazis prirent des mesures contre ses collègues comme Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer et Max Reinhardt, Fürtwängler prit publiquement leur défense. Il écrivit une lettre ouverte à Goebbels pour s'opposer aux mesures raciales dans le domaine des arts :

« Je ne reconnais, au fond, qu'une seule ligne de séparation : celle qui existe entre l'art de qualité et l'art sans qualité ! Mais, tandis que l'on trace maintenant des lignes de séparation entre juifs et non-juifs, même là où l'attitude politique des intéressés ne donne lieu à aucune objection, que ces traits sont tirés de façon théorique et implacable, on finit par oublier l'autre ligne de séparation, décisive, celle-là, entre la qualité et l'absence de qualité. »

Il insista, en conclusion, sur le fait que des musiciens Juifs Josef Joachim ou Mendelssohn faisaient pleinement partie de la grande tradition musicale allemande. Mais la distinction qu'il sembla établir entre « bons Juifs et mauvais Juifs » a parfois été perçue comme un signe d'antisémitisme chez Fürtwängler, même s'il dit ne parler qu'en tant qu'artiste et qu'il dit explicitement que la même distinction est valable pour les non-Juifs. Il expliqua précisément que si le départ d'Allemagne des « artistes (Juifs) déracinés et destructeurs qui ne cherchent à se faire valoir que par le kitsch ou la virtuosité » (formulation qui lui sera reprochée après la guerre) est souhaitable pour l'Allemagne (il rajoute juste après « comme malheureusement, le font de nombreux non-Juifs ») , celui des musiciens Juifs de qualité sera une catastrophe pour le pays. Fürtwängler reçut un très grand nombre de lettres de soutien, beaucoup d'Allemands espérant qu'il allait pouvoir stopper la politique antisémite dans le domaine musical.

Fürtwängler pensait pouvoir agir concrètement pour infléchir la politique culturelle allemande et cherchait à protéger des musiciens Juifs, comme ses collègues qu'il cita explicitement dans la lettre ou les musiciens Juifs de son orchestre. En ce qui concerne les musiciens Juifs en général son point de vue fut clairement exprimé dans un autre texte de la même année : « La vie des concerts ne peut se faire sans les gens d'origine juive, dans tous les cas. (Les faire partir d'Allemagne) serait comme opérer un patient et le faire mourir. » . La lettre de Fürtwängler fut d'ailleurs interprétée par les Nazis comme le plaçant du côté des Juifs (voir, entre autres, la citation de Winifred Wagner ci-dessus qui fait explicitement référence à la lettre de 1933) . Goebbels fut embarrassé par la prise de position de Fürtwängler et y répondit publiquement.

En 1933, Fürtwängler invita des musiciens juifs de très haut niveau, comme Artur Schnabel, Gregor Piatigorsky ou

Yehudi Menuhin, pour jouer avec lui en Allemagne. Ils refusèrent tous. Ces invitations n'avaient pas qu'un caractère symbolique pour Fürtwängler : il pensait pouvoir ainsi infléchir la politique culturelle du nouveau régime. C'est pour cette raison qu'il accepta de nombreux postes en 1933 : par exemple, « Staasrat » (conseiller d'état) de Prusse, conseil créé par Göring et vice-président du « Reichsmusikkammer » (Chambre de la musique du « Reich ») créé par Goebbels et dont Richard Strauß était le président. Berta Geißmar confirma que Fürtwängler accepta ces postes uniquement pour essayer d'infléchir la politique culturelle et de protéger les musiciens juifs et elle déclara que cela aurait été une grave erreur de les refuser. Il nota, cette année-là, dans son carnet personnel : « Hitler. Comme il y a des postes à pourvoir à nouveau maintenant, l'afflux des fâcheux est très grand. C'est dangereux pour la musique. L'appartenance politique introduit une fausse relation dans le jugement artistique. La beauté doit rester le seul critère ! Je ne puis être efficace que dans l'action. Les Juifs ont tout de suite compris la raison de mon attitude. »

En effet, à partir de la période 1933-1934, Fürtwängler offrit son soutien à de nombreuses personnes menacées, comme son épouse raconta par la suite :

« À partir de 1933, sa loge commença à s'emplir de gens qui ne venaient pas seulement pour le congratuler, mais aussi pour lui demander des conseils, de l'aide, et cela constamment. Parmi eux, nombre d'étrangers dont il ignorait tout. Son aide profitait essentiellement aux petites gens, aux obscurs frappés par les persécutions raciales ou politiques, et qui ne peuvent bénéficier d'aucun autre appui. »

Les Nazis en avaient parfaitement conscience. Un courrier du ministre-directeur Georg Gerullis envoyé à Goebbels en 1934 contenait cette phrase : « Pouvez-vous me citer un seul Juif pour lequel Fürtwängler n'intervienne pas ? » . Un des membres de la direction du département de musique de la « BBC » confirma avoir vu arriver en Angleterre un très grand nombre de musiciens juifs, quel que soit leur niveau, avec tous des lettres de recommandation de Fürtwängler. Mais les dirigeants nazis avaient peur que Fürtwängler ne parte ce qui aurait été une perte considérable pour la vie musicale allemande. Hitler et Goebbels donnèrent des ordres précis pour « ménager » le chef d'orchestre et pour écouter poliment toutes ses requêtes en faveur de personnes juives. Les clauses d' « aryanisation » de la vie culturelle ne furent pas appliquées à l'Orchestre de Fürtwängler ni à son entourage dans un 1er temps. Cela eut pour effet que Fürtwängler eut l'illusion durant la période 1933-1934 qu'il pouvait encore réorienter la politique culturelle allemande.

Fürtwängler demanda donc une audience à Hitler en 1933. Il prépara un « plan » avec Berta Geißmar pour essayer de convaincre Hitler de changer sa politique culturelle. Ils préparèrent un texte ensemble qui devait servir de base de discussion avec Hitler et qui fut envoyé au dictateur. Le titre du texte, « comment combattre les Juifs dans le domaine de la musique » , avait pour seul but d'appâter Hitler. Comme le dit Fred Prieberg, le texte était tout sauf une lutte contre les Juifs mais au contraire un plaidoyer pour les garder dans le monde de la musique allemande. Fürtwängler développait le raisonnement suivant : si les Juifs avaient pu dénigrer la grandeur du peuple allemand par le passé, il fallait par tous les moyens leur montrer, ainsi qu'au monde entier, que dans le domaine des Arts, ils n'avaient rien à envier aux autres. En conséquence, ils devaient reconnaître la qualité des artistes juifs et les conserver en Allemagne pour mener une grande politique culturelle. Il s'ensuivit une longue liste de musiciens juifs incluant le violoniste Carl Flesch, le compositeur Arnold Schönberg, l'historien de l'art Curt Sachs, les musiciens juifs de l'Orchestre de Berlin (6 Juifs et 2 « demi-Juifs ») etc. qu'il fallait absolument garder en Allemagne. Fürtwängler ne cessera d'utiliser l'argument de l'image de l'Allemagne à l'étranger pour essayer de faire changer d'avis les dirigeants nazis par la suite. Bien que les Nazis savaient, en plus, que Fürtwängler soutenait de nombreuses personnes juives qui n'étaient pas de grands artistes, l'entretien eut bien lieu le 9 août 1933. Hitler n'écouta rien du raisonnement de Fürtwängler et se lança dans un interminable monologue expliquant qu'il n'avait plus le pouvoir d'arrêter le « train de l'antisémitisme » qui s'était emparé du parti nazi. Fürtwängler perdant patience, le volume augmenta rapidement. Berta Geißmar déclara, dans son livre, que Fürtwängler et Hitler « s'hurlèrent dessus pendant plus de 2 heures », Fürtwängler oubliant complètement son stratagème. Elle écrivit, qu'après l'entretien, « Fürtwängler m'a dit qu'il savait maintenant ce qu'il se trouvait derrière les mesures bornées d'Hitler : ce n'était pas seulement l'antisémitisme, mais le rejet de toute forme de pensée artistique, philosophique, le rejet de toute forme de culture libre. »

Le « cas » Hindemith

La défense publique de Fürtwängler de l'art d'Hindemith considéré comme un dégénéré par les Nazis prit une tournure très politique. Josef Goebbels note à de nombreuses reprises dans son journal personnel que Fürtwängler aide « toujours et toujours » les Juifs, les demi-Juifs et « son petit Hindemith » .

En 1934, Fürtwängler déclara publiquement que Hitler était un « ennemi du genre humain » et qualifia de « Schweinerei » (littéralement « porcherie » , mot courant en allemand désignant une situation abjecte) la situation politique en Allemagne. Durant cette période, Fürtwängler fut néanmoins invité à Mannheim avec l'Orchestre de Berlin. Les autorités musicales de la ville lui firent remarquer que Szymon Goldberg, son 1er violon, était juif et qu'il devait le renvoyer. Fürtwängler ne céda pas et le 1er concert se déroula avec son 1er violon. Mais après le 1er concert, un banquet était organisé et des Nazis lui reprochèrent son manque de « sentiment national » . Fürtwängler se mit en grande colère et déclara qu'il ne remettrait plus jamais les pieds à Mannheim alors que cette ville avait joué un rôle très important dans sa carrière ce qu'il confirma le lendemain par courrier. Il alla rejoindre sa secrétaire Berta Geißmar et la mère de sa secrétaire qui vivait à Mannheim au lieu d'assister au banquet. D'après Berta Geißmar, la décision de Fürtwängler et le fait qu'il avait préféré passer la soirée avec « ses amis juifs » (Berta Geißmar et sa mère) plutôt que d'assister au banquet avec les autorités de la ville fit grand bruit dans toute l'Allemagne. Fürtwängler ne retourna dans cette ville qu'après la guerre après que le monde musical eut été « dénazifié » le 20 mai 1954.

Dès cette époque, Heinrich Himmler souhaita éliminer Fürtwängler et jusqu'en 1945 réclama sans arrêt qu'on envoie le chef d'orchestre dans les camps. D'autre part, Fürtwängler continua à diriger de la musique de Mendelssohn comme les 12 et 13 février 1934 à Berlin alors que la musique du compositeur était totalement interdite par les Nazis. La tension atteignit son point critique lorsqu'il dirigea le 11 mars 1934 l'œuvre « Mathis Sinfonie » de Paul Hindemith, alors qu'Hitler, qui considérait Hindemith comme un artiste « dégénéré » , voulait interdire ses œuvres. En outre, Fürtwängler soutint publiquement l'art d'Hindemith dans un article du 25 novembre du « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » : « Le cas Hindemith » . Le 2 décembre, Fürtwängler dirigea un concert : à son entrée et en présence de Goebbels et Hermann Göring, il fut applaudi pendant 25 minutes. L'affaire devint politique. Les Nazis, qui comprirent que Fürtwängler devenait un symbole pour leurs opposants politiques, se déchaînèrent contre lui et exigèrent qu'il se rétracte. La personne la plus remontée contre Fürtwängler était Alfred Rosenberg, l'idéologue du parti nazi qui était bien décidé à remettre à sa place ce chef d'orchestre qui refusait de se plier au nouvel ordre allemand. Fürtwängler ne se rétracta pas et démissionna de toutes ses fonctions officielles. Göring refusa toutefois sa démission de « Staatsrat » de Prusse, arguant qu'il ne s'agissait pas d'un poste mais d'un titre et que ce titre n'était enlevé qu'aux criminels et aux voleurs. Gœbbels obligea Fürtwängler à démissionner de tous ses postes musicaux. Ainsi, Fürtwängler ne fut plus le chef d'orchestre permanent de l'Orchestre de Berlin durant la période 1934-1945 même si, après l'« accord » de 1935, il se remit à diriger l'Orchestre. Fürtwängler étant sur le point de quitter l'Allemagne pour la Suisse, mais les dirigeants nazis souhaitant toujours qu'il reste en Allemagne, il se vit interdire de quitter son pays.

Il avait toujours son passeport, contrairement à ce qui a été souvent dit, mais il n'était plus valable et il lui en fallait un nouveau avec l'autorisation des dirigeants nazis pour quitter son pays. D'après Berta Geißmar, Fürtwängler se sentit presque soulagé et envisageait de travailler en Autriche et aux États-Unis. Mais, outre le fait que les Nazis l'empêchaient de partir d'Allemagne, un très grand nombre d'Allemands lui envoyèrent des lettres de soutien et le suppliaient de ne pas les laisser seuls avec les Nazis. Une partie du public boycotta les concerts de l'Orchestre de Berlin en signe de protestation. La comtesse Marion von Dönhoff qui fut une résistante anti-nazie confirma après la guerre que la décision de rester en Allemagne fut une grande consolation pour tous ceux qui s'opposaient au régime nazi.

...

A grim portrait of modern American music was presented in issue No. 120 of « The New Order ». How could it have been otherwise, given the Jews' domination of our culture ? It was no coincidence that fine-art in the United States was trashed at the same moment National-Socialism triumphed in Germany. The kosher corrupters who scurried away from Europe, beginning in 1933, were the same alleged artists who poisoned our musical life. We need only look around at the laughably deplorable state of modern American composition and performance to appreciate the magnitude of their disastrous impact.

Elsewhere, Aryan culture was suddenly freed from Jewish domination and blossomed into a late- 2nd Millennium Renaissance. Naturally, the source of that Western revival was Adolf Hitler's Germany. It is nothing short of miraculous that during the brief 12 year period of peace allowed the 3rd « Reich », such an incredible burst of dynamically creative musical achievement took place. The spirit of Aryan genius could at last express its genuine instinct, un-coloured by the alien agendas of Jews hostile to everything German.

Generally regarded as the greatest Symphonic composer of the 20th Century, Richard Strauß was urged by « émigré » Jew impresarios to join them at New York's Metropolitan Opera. They dangled lucrative performance fees to entice him, but he answered them indirectly by writing a public statement in support of the National-Socialist Revolution, signing it in his own hand, « Heil Hitler ! ». With the invention of the 1st sound tape recorder by 3rd « Reich » scientists, Strauß conducted performances of all his major symphonic works, recordings still prized as the best of their kind. During World War II, he composed a concert Overture dedicated to the Japanese Royal House on the occasion of its 500th anniversary and to simultaneously commemorate the signing in 1940 of the Axis pact between Germany and Japan. His « Metamorphosen » , a tone-poem lament for the devastation wrought by the duped Allies on Germany, will forever serve as a deeply moving memorial to the worst tragedy in human history.

Strauß's contemporary, Hans Pfitzner, although not well-known outside of his homeland, was among the most important figures in neo-Romantic music, and composed what many listeners consider his greatest works, a pair of Symphonies in 1939 and 1940, respectively. 4 years earlier, Pfitzner became the 1st « " Reich " Cultural Senator » . The reputations of these 2 musical titans were so established in the world of art that not even the hysterical hatred of the Jews could destroy them, and their compositions are presently available to a larger audience than ever before, thanks to Aryan man's technological advances in audio reproduction.

But what the Jews cannot destroy they poison. A case in point is, perhaps, the greatest orchestral director ever to take up the conductor's baton, Wilhelm Furtwängler.

It would be untrue to suggest that he was a dedicated National-Socialist. His life was music. Furtwängler was favourably inclined to our « Idea » , but he was too busy with his art for much of the outside world. As a musician who profoundly cherished traditional compositional values and no less deeply despised the cultural rot of the Weimar Republic, he often expressed his gratitude, both publicly and privately, to Adolf Hitler for kicking-out the Schœnbergs, Shapiros, et al. , of the 1920's. Less than 1 year after the National-Socialist seizure of power, however, Furtwängler found himself embroiled in an extra-musical controversy. He agreed to stage « Matthias the Painter » by Paul Hindemith. Oblivious to and totally disinterested in both the story of the Opera and the political identity of its composer, the innocent music-director found his rehearsals being picketed by battalions of angry « Stormtroopers » .

It seems Hindemith, although Aryan, was a loud-mouthed Communist and his « Matthias the Painter » , a blatant propaganda piece urging its audience to take-up arms against the government « even if it had been elected » - a transparent reference to the recent National-Socialist electoral victories.

Furtwängler dismissed the work's proletarian politics as so much out-dated flummery, especially in view of National-Socialism's on-going popularity, but insisted the music was good. Performances would proceed as planned, he announced. In a short time, whatever artistic merits or demerits Hindemith's piece might have had were utterly eclipsed by a violent ideological storm gathering over the Berlin Opera House.

Assuming that the last of such Marxist drivel had been cleaned out after January 30th, 1933, the public in general and National-Socialists in particular were outraged at news of the up-coming Red Opera. Meanwhile, scattered remnants of the country's enfeebled, dwindling Communists suddenly began to suck a reviving breath of life into their moribund movement and vowed to pack the Opera House on opening night, just as they used to in the 1920's. Even more than the Communists, the « Stormtroopers » wanted « Matthias the Painter » to be staged, because they relished the opportunity of busting-up the performance and exterminating the last of the Red vermin. Not without cause, the city police feared a serious ideological confrontation of the kind so common up until only a few years before. Indeed, it was to bring peace and order to public life that the voters had put Adolf Hitler in power. Even so, the National-Socialist authorities were inclined to allow the performance, no matter what came to pass, if only out of respect for Furtwängler, who was, by then, an icon throughout the whole cultural world.

Doubtless, Hindemith's music would have been heard, the old Reds would have had their last hurrah and the controversy passed as a foot-note in the history of the 3rd « Reich ». Instead, America's and England's Jew-dominated newspapers turned the premiere into a « cause célèbre » of international proportions. With that, Doctor Josef Gœbbels, as « Reich » Cultural Minister, decided to act. He addressed a long, polite letter to Furtwängler. The situation, he explained, had gotten-out of hand, so much so that the enemies of National-Socialism, to whom music was only as good as it was politically expedient, were using the impending performance for obvious, non-artistic purposes : namely, to incite hatred and violence against the new regime. Doctor Gœbbels added that Hindemith belonged to a by-gone era when national greatness had been despised. The German people, after 14 long years of difficult struggle, had overcome that shame « now » was the time for art to extol the folk-genius of our Race, not down-grade it. He asked that the troublesome Opera be shelved for the sake of present peace and future cultural development. But, if the conductor considered its music worthwhile, performance of an orchestral suite from « Matthias the Painter » could take place.

To the great disappointment of all, save the general Opera-going public, Furtwängler responded with his own public letter, in which he heartily subscribed to each of Doctor Gœbbels' objections, including his own observation :

« There are moments when even art must make room for the good of something greater. »

Coming from such a fanatic musician, it was a deeply generous statement. With the cancellation of Hindemith's 1st and last chance at fame, the defunct Reds were disappointed because their own last chance for a big political demonstration evaporated, and the « Stormtroopers » were disappointed because they missed their chance to whip Germany's last Communists.

In all the hateful hullabaloo turned-up by the Jews ever since, and whenever Hindemith's name is mentioned today, conveniently forgotten was the concert performance of « Matthias the Painter », which did indeed take place in 1934, as Doctor Gœbbels promised. The piece was even recorded in a 3rd « Reich » sound studio under Furtwängler's direction in 1934 ! That this concert version of musical highlights was not much performed thereafter only means that it failed to generate any lasting hold on concert-goers' imaginations, a failure which persists to this day, since it is not often heard, even though it is still touted as some kind of anti-Nazi Masterpiece. Indeed, the Opera which was supposed to have been too wonderful for the Nazis to appreciate or tolerate, was a huge flop when ostentatiously performed in New York. Since then, it has never again seen the light of day.

It turns-out that Hindemith was not such an interesting composer after all, and the controversy surrounding his name had more to do with his obnoxious politics than his own music. Overlooked, too, is the fact that, despite his Red identity, he was allowed to compose, perform and even record in the 3rd « Reich », hardly the tyrannical system the Jews would lead us to believe existed. Hindemith grabbed the United States Jews' offer of cash and fled with sheaves of his useless scores. Apparently, New York's kosher environment was less inspiring than that of evil old Nazi Germany, and his artificial reputation withered away into virtual oblivion. Happily, he lived long enough to see his life's work savaged by Jew music-critics in the 1950's, when they ridiculed him as « hopelessly obsolete ». True to character, his one-time kosher benefactors eventually turned on their « righteous Gentile » .

Only the newspaper Jews overseas manipulated by the « Matthias the Painter » situation to their advantage, portraying it to gullible goy readers as proof positive that great music was being suppressed by the Nazis, to whom Furtwängler had weakly capitulated. However, they, too, were soon disappointed when, sure he would defect following the Hindemith affair, they offered him (as they had offered Richard Strauß) large performance fees with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

He turned them down and, after War came, was personally active in donating a great deal of concert time to soldiers and factory workers. Audiophiles for decades considered his greatest recorded achievement to have been a performance of Beethoven's 9th Symphony, the « Choral » , given in the presence of Adolf Hitler on the occasion of the « Führer » 's 55th birthday, on April 20th, 1944. Until the very end, Furtwängler was still giving public concerts in Berlin. His last « Reich » recording (the César Franck Symphony in D minor) is the best performance ever made of that work. It took place in the cataclysmic days of January, 1945.

The Jews castigated Germany's « Nazi dictatorship » for censorship, a lie, as cited above, when Hindemith was allowed to perform. But immediately after the War, German artists were prevented by the occupation forces from working. Only those who could suck-up to the Allies by loudly proclaiming their anti-Nazi sentiments stood a chance of employing their craft. The very censorship the Jewized Allies falsely condemned in National-Socialism they practised themselves when the chance came along. Among the proscribed was Wilhelm Furtwängler, even though he never held any post in the « Reich » government. He was not a Party member, and had never even voted for a National-Socialist candidate.

The occupation authorities promised he could resume his conducting career if he agreed to sign a public statement begging them for forgiveness for his past participation « in the criminal Hitler regime » . He refused, declaring his life then, as always, had been entirely musical, not political, and he objected to the accusation that he had ever been part of anything « criminal » . The ban against him was upheld and he had to subsist on the charity of friends.

The Jews and their Gentile dupes in uniform tried to show the Germans that their culture was better off under Allied occupation than with their own, elected, National-Socialist government. Trouble was, with all the country's real artists dead, jailed or censored, there wasn't much culture to go around. Desperate to maintain their facade of democratic civilisation, they returned to Furtwängler with a watered-down version of the statement presented for his endorsement 2 years earlier. This time, it read something to the effect that he publicly condemned « totalitarianism » in all its forms, without mentioning National-Socialism. He unhesitatingly signed the document and was allowed to resume his musical duties.

Although Furtwängler's return to the podium was greeted with universal acclaim, his performances mostly lacked the greatness of his War-time and pre-War conducting. Many concerts he held were surprisingly disappointing. The old fire seemed to have died-out in him. Only occasionally, was it seen to flare to life. While a few appearances, such as his performance of the Choral Symphony by Beethoven, at the re-opening of the Bayreuth Festival, exemplified the full-scope of his genius, more typical were his lack-lustre renditions of Beethoven's and Bruckner's works, his long-time favourites. He had been a Wagner specialist, too, but his post-War recordings of « Tristan und Isolde » and the « Ring » are indistinguishable from any average interpretations. Clearly, the man was not inspired by post-War democracy. Yet, he was no different than artists of all kinds who reached heights of their greatness from 1933 to 1945. Immediately thereafter, Germany and the West fell into their steep decline toward cultural sterility and extinction from which they still have not pulled-out.

Artists depend for their supreme achievement on high-inspiration. The 3rd « Reich » was the most inspiring epoch in all of history, and its artists thereby felt their talents lifted by the greatness of the times. In the dismal, hypocritical world of the Allies sham « victory » , there was only despair, not inspiration. This is no idle speculation. Proof may be found in the very audio legacy left by Furtwängler himself. His 3rd « Reich » recordings are today widely prized for their universal excellence. It is well-known among collectors that any Furtwängler performance dated before 1946 will be guaranteed for its high-value, even if the technical quality is inferior by later standards, while his post-War recordings are largely shunned for their reputation as mediocre. Recording companies make sure that the date of a Furtwängler appearance is displayed prominently on the disc-cover - if the performance occurred during the « Reich » . The dates of his post-War performances are virtually never printed, a sure sign to knowledgeable collectors that the concert was made under a democracy and consequently of relatively slight artistic merit.

Furtwängler's death in 1954 was followed by decades of common-place conductors who consistently rendered the great music of the past in uniformly colourless renditions. Almost by chance, after decades of middling music-directors, audiophiles rediscovered Furtwängler's old recordings. For a generation oblivious to his art, his preserved performances came as nothing less than a revelation. Sharply contrasting with the common-place output of Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Dean Dixon and other non-White non-entities from the 1960's to the present, his concerts were regarded as, by far, the best interpretations of great music on record. The international Furtwängler resurgence which began some 20 years ago not only continues today, but has broadened and intensified. Whenever another lost recording of his is discovered, it instantly shoots to die top of the best-seller lists.

It was only a matter of time, of course, before the Jews were alerted to the popular renaissance of this recalcitrant « Nazi musician » . Banning his recordings or even making them quietly disappear by pressuring CD companies into discontinuing them would have lost the shrewd shysters new revenues generated by such sales. Instinctually unable to forego a financial profit, they took-over the Furtwängler revival themselves.

In an irony typical only of unscrupulous Jews, the same clique who fulminated against him in the 1930's and banned him in the 1940's are peddling his recordings today. As the most politicised creatures on the planet, however, they are not content with the vast revenues his CD's net them. They must distort his memory to conform with their own perverse notions of political correctness. In justifying sales of his music and using their twisted image of him to propagandise their Gentile customers, the Great Masters of the Lie are now depicting Furtwängler as an anti-Nazi who secretly hated Hitler and stayed in Germany only to help save Jews from being gassed ! While such a bald-faced misrepresentation would have flabbergasted the Allied Occupation authorities who banned him from performing, it is just one more piece of the deceitful chutzpah for which the Jews have long been infamous.

No one should then be surprised that the loudest spokesman on behalf of a de-Nazified Furtwängler is Hebrew Henry Fogel. He laments that this « righteous goy, oops, Gentile » was mistaken for a Fascist. The conductor actually loved Jews and risked his life to save them from Hitler, before whom Furtwängler gave his best performance on the « Führer » 's birthday ! Such demented « logic » could only come from the profit-fevered brain of a crazed Jew. Now that his reputation has been sanitized in the mikvah of political correctness, we no longer need trouble our conscience when buying a Furtwängler recording. The past has been re-arranged to make things work for the Jews in the present. Such insidious duplicity recalls one of the brain-washing slogans concocted by Big Brother in George Orwell's prophetic novel, « 1984 » :

« Who controls the present, controls the past ; who controls the past, controls the future. »

But the revival of Aryan music under National-Socialism spread through the 1930's and early 1940's beyond the borders of the 3rd « Reich » . Helga Rosswänge, Askel Schlotz and Thorsten Raif, who made their careers in Hitler's Germany, were, bar none, the greatest tenors Denmark ever produced, before and especially since the end of World War II. Years before the War, Belgium's greatest tenor, Marcel Wittrich, cut a recording of the concert aria « God Bless our " Führer " ! » , which topped the best-seller charts for most of the 1930's. Kirstin Flagstad, among the most important Wagnerian sopranos of the 20th Century, left the Metropolitan Opera, where her success in « Die Walküre » had been nothing short of stupendous, to join her husband in Norway. He was not only the country's leading conductor, but a high-ranking officer in the « Nasional Samlung » , the Norwegian National-Socialist Movement. When a post-War return engagement at the MET was scheduled for her, Flagstad was prevented from performing by hysterical mobs of incensed New York Jews. They openly and successfully prevented a world-class artist from publicly performing for ideological reasons, the very thing for which they had so long falsely condemned the Nazis.

...

Not only during his lifetime, but also in the decades since his death in 1954, Wilhelm Furtwängler has been globally recognized as one of the greatest musicians of the 20th Century, above all as the brilliant primary conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which he led from 1922 to 1945, and again after 1950.

On his death, the Encyclopædia Britannica commented :

« By temperament a Wagnerian, his restrained dynamism, superb control of his Orchestra and Mastery of sweeping rhythms also made him an outstanding exponent of Beethoven. »

Furtwängler was also a composer of merit.

Following the National-Socialist seizure of power in 1933, some prominent musicians (most notably such Jewish artists as Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer and Arnold Schönberg) left Germany. Most of the nation's musicians, however, including the great majority of its most gifted musical talents, remained - and even flourished. With the possible exception of the composer Richard Strauß, Furtwängler was the most prominent musician to stay and « collaborate » .

Consequently, discussion of his life (even today) still provokes heated debate about the role of art and artists under Hitler and, on a more fundamental level, about the relationship of art and politics.

Wilhelm Furtwängler drew great inspiration from his homeland's rich cultural heritage, and his world revolved around music, especially German music. Although essentially non-political, he was an ardent patriot, and leaving his fatherland was simply out of the question.

Ideologically, he may perhaps be best characterized as a man of the « old » Germany - a Wilhelmine conservative and an authoritarian elitist. Along with the great majority of his countrymen, he welcomed the demise of the ineffectual democratic regime of Germany's « Weimar Republic » (1918-1933) . Indeed, he was the conductor chosen to direct the gala-performance of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » for the « Day of Potsdam » , a solemn State ceremony on March 21, 1933, at which President von Hindenburg, the youthful new Chancellor Adolf Hitler and the newly-elected « Reichstag » formally ushered in the new government of « national awakening » . All the same, Furtwängler never joined the National-Socialist Party (unlike his chief musical rival, fellow conductor Herbert von Karajan) .

It wasn't long before Furtwängler came into conflict with the new authorities. In a public dispute in late-1934 with Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels over artistic direction and independence, he resigned his positions as director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and as head of the Berlin State Opera. Soon, however, a compromise agreement was reached whereby he resumed his posts, along with a measure of artistic independence. He was also able to exploit both his prestigious position and the artistic and jurisdictional rivalries between Gœbbels and Hermann Göring to play a greater and more independent role in the cultural life of 3rd « Reich » Germany.

From then on, until the « Reich » 's defeat in the spring of 1945, he continued to conduct to much acclaim both at home and abroad (including, for example, a highly-successful concert tour of Britain in 1935) . He was also a guest-conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, 1939-1940, and at the Bayreuth Festival. On several occasions, he led concerts in support of the German War effort. He also nominally served as a member of the Prussian State Council and as vice-president of the « Reich » Music Chamber, the State-sponsored professional musicians' association.

...

Throughout the 3rd « Reich » era, Furtwängler's eminent influence on Europe's musical life never diminished.

For Americans conditioned to believe that nothing of real cultural or artistic merit was produced in Germany during the Hitler era, the phrase « Nazi art » is an oxymoron : a contradiction in terms. The reality, though, is not so simple, and it is gratifying to note that some progress is being made to set straight the historical record.

This is manifest, for example, in the publication of 2 studies that deal extensively with Furtwängler, and which generally defend his conduct during the 3rd « Reich » : « The Devil's Music Master » by Sam Shirakawa and « Trial of Strength » by Fred K. Prieberg. These revisionist works not only contest the widely accepted perception of the place of artists and arts in the 3rd « Reich » , they express a healthy striving for a more factual and objective understanding of the reality of National-Socialist Germany.

Prieberg's « Trial of Strength » concentrates almost entirely on Furtwängler's intricate dealings with Josef Goebbels, Hermann Göring, Adolf Hitler and various other figures in the cultural life of the 3rd « Reich » . In so doing, he demonstrates that in spite of official measures to « coordinate » the arts, the regime also permitted a surprising degree of artistic freedom. Even the anti-Jewish racial laws and regulations were not always applied with rigour, and exceptions were frequent. (Among many instances that could be cited, Leo Blech retained his conducting post until 1937, in spite of his Jewish ancestry.) Furtwängler exploited this situation to intervene successfully in a number of cases on behalf of artists, including Jews, who were out of favour with the regime. He also championed Paul Hindemith, a « modern » composer whose music was regarded as degenerate.

The artists and musicians who left the country (especially the Jewish ones) contended that without them, Germany's cultural life would collapse. High-culture, they and other critics of Hitler and his regime arrogantly believed, would wither in an ardently nationalist and authoritarian state.

As Prieberg notes :

« The musicians who emigrated or were thrown-out of Germany from 1933 onwards indeed felt they were irreplaceable and in consequence believed firmly that Hitler's Germany would, following their departure, become a dreary and empty cultural wasteland. This would inevitably cause the rapid collapse of the regime. »

Time would prove the critics wrong. While it is true that the departure of such artists as Fritz Busch and Bruno Walter did hurt initially (and dealt a blow to German prestige) , the nation's most renowned musicians -(including Richard Strauß, Carl Orff, Karl Böhm, Hans Pfitzner, Wilhelm Kempff, Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, Herbert von Karajan, Anton von Webern, as well as Wilhelm Furtwängler) remained to produce musical art of the highest-standards. Regardless of the emigration of a number of Jewish and a few non-Jewish artists, as well as the promulgation of sweeping anti-Jewish restrictions, Germany's cultural life not only continued at a high-level, it flourished.

The National-Socialists regarded art, and especially music, as an expression of a society's soul, character and ideals. A wide-spread appreciation of Germany's cultural achievements, they believed, encouraged a joyful national pride and fostered a healthy sense of national unity and mission. Because they regarded themselves as guardians of their nation's cultural heritage, they opposed Liberal, modernistic trends in music and the other arts, as degenerate assaults against the cultural-spiritual traditions of Germany and the West.

Acting swiftly to promote a broad revival of the nation's cultural life, the new National-Socialist government made prodigious efforts to further the arts and, in particular, music. As detailed in 2 recent studies (Michæl H. Kater's « The Twisted Muse » and Erik Levi's « Music in the 3rd “ Reich ” »), not only did the new leadership greatly increase state funding for such important cultural institutions as the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the Bayreuth Wagner Festival, it used radio, recordings and other means to make Germany's musical heritage as accessible as possible to all its citizens.

As part of its efforts to bring art to the people, it strove to erase Classical music's snobbish and « class » image, and to make it widely familiar and enjoyable, especially to the working-class. At the same time, the new regime's leaders were mindful of popular musical tastes. Thus, by far most of the music heard during the 3rd « Reich » era on the radio or in films was neither Classical nor even traditional. Light-music with catchy tunes (similar to those popular with listeners elsewhere in Europe and in the United States) predominated on radio and in motion pictures, especially during the War years.

The person primarily responsible for implementing the new cultural policies was Josef Gœbbels. In his positions as Propaganda Minister and head of the « Reich » Culture Chamber, the umbrella association for professionals in cultural life, he promoted music, literature, painting and film in keeping with German values and traditions while, at the same time, consistent with popular tastes.

No political leader had a keener interest in art, or was a more enthusiastic booster of his nation's musical heritage than Adolf Hitler, who regarded the compositions of Ludwig van Beethoven, Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and the other German Masters as sublime expressions of the Germanic « soul » .

Hitler's reputation as a bitter, 2nd rate « failed artist » is undeserved. As John Lukacs acknowledges in his recently published work, « The Hitler of History » , the German leader was a man of real artistic talent and considerable artistic discernment.

We perhaps can never fully understand Hitler and the spirit behind his political movement without knowing that he drew great inspiration from, and identified with, the heroic figures of European legend who fought to liberate their peoples from tyranny, and whose stories are immortalized in the great musical dramas of Wagner and others.

This was vividly brought out by August Kubizek, Hitler's closest friend as a teenager and young man, in his post-War memoir (published in the United States under the title « The Young Hitler I Knew ») . Kubizek describes how, after the 2 young men together attended for the 1st time a performance in Linz of Wagner's Opera « Rienzi » , Hitler spoke passionately and at length about how this work's inspiring story of a popular Roman tribune had so deeply moved him. Years later, after he had become Chancellor, he related to Kubizek how that performance of « Rienzi » had radically changed his life. « In that hour it began » , he confided.

Hitler, of course, recognized Furtwängler's greatness and understood his significance for Germany and German music. Thus, when other officials (including Heinrich Himmler) complained of the conductor's non-conformity, Hitler overrode their objections. Until the end, Furtwängler remained his favourite conductor. He was similarly indulgent toward his favourite « Heldentenor » , Max Lorenz, and Wagnerian soprano Frida Leider, each of whom was married to a Jew.

Their cultural importance trumped racial or political considerations.

A year and a half after the end of the War in Europe, Furtwängler was brought before a humiliating « denazification » tribunal. Staged by American occupation authorities and headed by a Communist, it was a farce. So much vital information was withheld from both the tribunal and the defendant that, Shirakawa suggests, the occupation authorities may well have been determined to « get » the conductor.

In his closing remarks at the hearing, Furtwängler defiantly defended his record :

« The fear of being misused for propaganda purposes was wiped-out by the greater concern for preserving German music as far as was possible. I could not leave Germany in her deepest misery. To get-out would have been a shameful flight. After all, I am a German, whatever may be thought of that abroad, and I do not regret having done it for the German people. »

Even with a prejudiced judge and serious gaps in the record, the tribunal was still unable to establish a credible case against the conductor, and he was, in effect, cleared.

A short time later, Furtwängler was invited to assume direction of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. (He was no stranger to the United States : in 1927-1929, he had served as visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.)

On learning of the invitation, America's Jewish cultural establishment launched an intense campaign (spear-headed by « The New York Times » , musicians Arthur Rubinstein and Vladimir Horowitz, and New York critic Ira Hirschmann) to scuttle Furtwängler's appointment. As described in detail by Shirakawa and writer Daniel Gillis (in « Furtwängler and America ») , the campaigners used falsehoods, innuendos and even death threats.

Typical of its emotionally charged rhetoric was the bitter reproach of Chicago Rabbi Morton Berman :

« Furtwängler preferred to swear fealty to Hitler. He accepted at Hitler's hands his re-appointment as director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He was unflinching in his service to Goebbels' Ministry of Culture and Propaganda. The token saving of a few Jewish lives does not excuse Mister Furtwängler from official, active participation in a regime which murdered 6 million Jews and millions of non-Jews. Furtwängler is a symbol of all those hateful things for the defeat of which the youth of our city and nation paid an ineffable price. »

Among prominent Jews in Classical music, only the famous violinist Yehudi Menuhin defended the German artist. After Furtwängler was finally obliged to withdraw his name from consideration for the Chicago post, a disillusioned Moshe Menuhin, Yehudi's father, scathingly denounced his co-religionists. Furtwängler, he declared :

« ... was a victim of envious and jealous rivals who had to resort to publicity, to smear, to calumny, in order to keep him out of America so it could remain their private bailiwick. He was the victim of the small fry and puny souls among concert artists, who, in order to get a bit of national publicity, joined the band-wagon of professional idealists, the professional Jews and hired hands who irresponsibly assaulted an innocent and humane and broad-minded man. »

3rd « Reich » Germany is so routinely demonized in our society that any acknowledgment of its cultural achievements is regarded as tantamount to defending « Fascism » and that most unpardonable of sins, anti-Semitism. But as Professor John London suggests (in an essay in « The Jewish Quarterly » : « Why Bother about Fascist Culture ? » , Autumn 1995) , this simplistic attitude can present awkward problems :

« Far from being a totally ugly, unpopular, destructive entity, culture under Fascism was sometimes accomplished, indeed beautiful. If you admit the presence and, in some instances, the richness, of a culture produced under fascist regimes, then you are not defending their ethos. On the other hand, once you start dismissing elements, where do you stop ? »

In this regard, is it worth comparing the way that many media and cultural leaders treat artists of National-Socialist Germany with their treatment of the artists of Soviet Russia. Whereas Furtwängler and other artists who performed in Germany during the Hitler era are castigated for their cooperation with the regime, Soviet-era musicians, such as composers Aram Khachaturian and Sergei Prokofiev, and conductors Evgeny Svetlanov and Evgeny Mravinsky (all of whom toadied to the Communist regime in varying degrees) are rarely, if ever, chastised for their « collaboration » . The double standard that is clearly at work here is, of course, a reflection of our society's obligatory concern for Jewish sensitivities.

The artist and his work occupy a unique place in society and history. Although great art can never be entirely divorced from its political or social environment, it must be considered apart from that. In short, art transcends politics.

No reasonable person would denigrate the artists and sculptors of ancient Greece because they glorified a society that, by today's standards, was hardly democratic. Similarly, no one belittles the builders of medieval Europe's great cathedrals on the grounds that the social order of the Middle-Ages was dogmatic and hierarchical. No cultured person would disparage William Shakespeare because he flourished during England's fervently nationalistic and anti-Jewish Elizabethan age. Nor does anyone chastise the magnificent composers of Russia's Tsarist era because they prospered under an autocratic regime. In truth, mankind's greatest cultural achievements have most often been the products not of Liberal or egalitarian societies, but rather of quite un-democratic ones.

A close look at the life and career of Wilhelm Furtwängler reveals « politically incorrect » facts about the role of art and artists in 3rd « Reich » Germany, and reminds us that great artistic creativity and achievement are by no means the exclusive products of democratic societies.

L' « accord » de 1935

Les dirigeants nazis laissèrent volontairement Fürtwängler un bon moment dans une situation incertaine, refusant de le

voir et de l'autoriser à quitter l'Allemagne. Goebbels profita de l'absence de Fürtwängler à la tête de l'Orchestre de Berlin pour éliminer tous les « non-aryens » qui y travaillaient encore et que Fürtwängler avait pu préserver jusqu'à là. En particulier, il réussit à faire partir Berta Geißmar d'Allemagne après un harcèlement moral continu depuis deux ans. Les dirigeants nazis avaient tout fait pour les séparer car ils avaient compris que sa fidèle assistante avait une très grande influence sur lui prenant souvent les décisions matérielles à sa place. Comme Winifred Wagner l'avait explicitement prévu, Fürtwängler se sentait perdu sans elle et avait énormément de mal à prendre une quelconque décision.

Le 28 février 1935, Fürtwängler obtint enfin de Goebbels une entrevue. Fürtwängler était viscéralement attaché à son pays. À ce propos, sa femme rapporta plus tard que Fürtwängler fut extrêmement choqué lorsqu'il apprit le suicide de Stefan Zweig en exil au Brésil en 1942 : il dit qu'« il le comprenait et qu'il aurait fait pareil ». D'autre part, les musiciens de son Orchestre et son public ne cessaient de le supplier de rester. De son côté, Goebbels savait parfaitement que Fürtwängler était opposé à la politique d'Hitler mais, comme le dictateur, il considérait que Fürtwängler, au même titre que Hans Pfitzner et Richard Strauß, était un « trésor national » qu'il fallait conserver absolument en Allemagne (les 3 musiciens apparaîtront dans la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste » en 1944 au plus haut niveau). Durant l'entretien, Goebbels exigea que Fürtwängler fasse publiquement acte d'allégeance à la politique culturelle d'Hitler, ce qu'il refusa catégoriquement, ce qui est prouvé par plusieurs documents écrits de cette période retrouvés par Fred Prieberg. Goebbels accepta finalement un compromis : Fürtwängler resterait en Allemagne comme musicien apolitique, n'occupant aucun poste officiel. Précisément, au moment où Fürtwängler, furieux, allait partir, Goebbels le retint et lui demanda s'il était prêt à reconnaître publiquement que c'était Hitler qui dirigeait la politique culturelle en Allemagne et que cela lui suffirait. Fürtwängler lui dit qu'oui car c'était une évidence puisqu'Hitler était le dictateur qui dirigeait l'Allemagne. Mais comprenant que cela pouvait être dangereux, Fürtwängler exigea que le communiqué soit clair sur le fait qu'il ne voulait avoir affaire en aucune façon à cette politique culturelle. L'accord oral fut conclu. Le plus grand chef d'orchestre allemand allait donc rester en Allemagne : Goebbels fut très satisfait de cet accord, et se gaussa de l'incroyable naïveté politique des artistes. Ce dernier fit publier une annonce dans laquelle Fürtwängler déclarait n'avoir eu aucune intention politique dans son article sur Hindemith. Fürtwängler, inconscient de l'importance symbolique, n'insista pas pour qu'un autre communiqué public soit publié indiquant explicitement que Goebbels lui garantissait qu'il n'aurait pas à participer aux concerts officiels. L'« accord » fut cependant bien respecté car la cours en dénazification de Fürtwängler ne compta en 1946 que 2 concerts « officiels » sur toute la période nazie. Comme Berta Geißmar le déclara l'annonce de Goebbels pouvait paraître, vis-à-vis de l'extérieur, comme une ré-édition du chef d'orchestre mais, en fait, correspondait à la volonté de Fürtwängler de séparer art et politique et de rester en Allemagne pour aider les nombreuses personnes qui le lui demandaient. Alfred Rosenberg fut, d'ailleurs, furieux du communiqué. Il écrivit une lettre où il déclara qu'il s'agissait d'une provocation directe contre le National-Socialisme car Fürtwängler ne s'était pas du tout excusé pour ses nombreuses critiques contre la politique nazie. Rosenberg chercha, en vain, à obtenir des excuses publiques du chef d'orchestre.

Fürtwängler, qui pensait dès lors être dégagé de toute relation avec le régime, déchantait très rapidement. Le 25 avril 1935, il donna un concert à Berlin consacré à Beethoven. Le 3 mai, il dirigea le même concert. Goebbels lui fit annoncer très peu de temps avant le début du concert, et alors qu'il était déjà dans sa loge, qu'Hitler allait y assister. Un témoin rapporta qu'en apprenant la nouvelle, Fürtwängler jeta le radiateur de sa loge contre un mur en hurlant.

On lui transmit l'ordre qu'il devait faire le salut nazi. La discussion porta ensuite sur la façon de l'éviter à tout prix, Franz Jastrau l'intendant de l'Orchestre lui conseillant de garder en permanence sa baguette dans la main droite. Hitler entra dans la salle et Fürtwängler juste après sous un tonnerre d'applaudissement la baguette dans sa main droite. Alors que quelques allemands faisaient bruyamment le salut nazi, Fürtwängler commença le concert comme si de rien n'était. Hitler n'aurait jamais pu penser un tel affront possible mais fit bonne figure. Les quelques photos qui ont été conservées montrent Fürtwängler, à la fin du concert, dans un état de confusion complète et ne sachant pas quoi faire de sa main droite qui gardait toujours sa baguette. Hitler, comprenant la situation, se jeta sur le podium la main tendue. La photo de la « poignée de main », qui lui permettait de ne pas faire le salut nazi, fut largement diffusée par Goebbels. Ce dernier atteignit son objectif de laisser entendre que Fürtwängler était un allié du pouvoir nazi.

En septembre 1935, Oskar Jölli, un baryton membre du Parti Nazi envoya une lettre à la « Gestapo » dénonçant les propos suivants de Fürtwängler : « Ceux qui sont au pouvoir doivent tous être fusillés, les choses ne changeront pas en Allemagne tant que cela ne sera pas fait. » . Ces propos de Fürtwängler furent rapportés à Goebbels et Hitler. Ce dernier supprima pour cette raison les engagements du chef d'orchestre jusqu'en janvier 1936 lors de l'anniversaire des 50 ans du chef d'orchestre. Pour se « réconcilier » avec le chef d'orchestre, Goebbels et Hitler voulurent lui offrir une baguette d'ivoire et d'or ainsi qu'une rente annuelle à vie de 40,000 Reichsmarks pour son anniversaire ce qu'il refusa.

Début 1936, Fürtwängler réussit à récupérer un passeport en règle. Les Nazis, cherchant par tous les moyens à garder Fürtwängler en Allemagne, ne le lui rendirent qu'au dernier moment en dépit de son insistance. Goebbels lui remit en mains propres le document, en lui disant explicitement qu'il pouvait partir mais que, dans ce cas, il ne remettrait plus jamais les pieds en Allemagne. Cela joua un rôle très important dans sa décision de rester, car cela signifiait qu'il ne pourrait plus jamais revoir les siens. Sa famille, surtout sa mère, qui mourut le 7 novembre 1944, ont été très souvent évoquées pour expliquer le fait qu'il soit resté en Allemagne. D'autre part, Fürtwängler avait déjà 5 enfants, tous hors mariage, en 1935.

Le poste à New York et le piège de Hermann Göring

L'occasion de s'exiler se présenta toutefois, mais il fut piégé une seconde fois. En effet, on lui proposa de devenir chef principal de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York, fonction à laquelle il aurait succédé à Arturo Toscanini à la condition qu'il ne joue plus en Allemagne que comme chef invité. C'est Toscanini qui proposa Fürtwängler pour lui succéder à la tête du prestigieux Orchestre, montrant ainsi toute l'estime qu'il avait pour Fürtwängler en tant que chef d'orchestre. Fürtwängler accepta d'abord mais il était mis sous écoute par la « Gestapo » et Göring fut mis au courant. Alors que Fürtwängler avait pris un bateau pour partir en vacances en Égypte, Göring fit paraître une dépêche annonçant que Fürtwängler avait repris le poste de directeur musical à la « Staatsoper » . L'annonce déclencha un tollé aux États-Unis. La presse américaine se déchaîna contre lui, estimant que le chef d'orchestre allemand avait fait semblant d'accepter le poste à New York pour faire « monter les enchères » et obtenir une meilleure situation en Allemagne. Fürtwängler, qui n'était au courant de rien et qui découvrit la presse américaine déchaînée contre lui, préféra rompre son contrat avec New York à son arrivée au Caire. Il n'accepta aucun nouveau poste, contrairement à ce qu'avait annoncé Göring.

Pour beaucoup, à l'extérieur de l'Allemagne, Fürtwängler était devenu un partisan des Nazis. En fait, comme il le répéta tout le reste de sa vie, Fürtwängler n'avait en rien changé. Il était, alors, plutôt au bord du suicide : il écrivit, en effet, cette année-là dans son journal personnel : « La vie est aujourd'hui plus que jamais une question de courage. » .

Il participa, en 1936, pour la Ire fois depuis 1931 au Festival de Bayreuth. Il rencontra à nouveau Goebbels et Hitler qui vinrent assister aux concerts et voulaient le convaincre de jouer un rôle officiel en Allemagne. Friedelind Wagner était présente et raconta plus tard :

« Je me souviens qu'Hitler avait demandé à voir Fürtwängler, et qu'il lui a dit sèchement qu'il devait dorénavant obéir au Parti et servir la propagande, et Fürtwängler refusa très explicitement. Hitler devint fou de rage et fit savoir à Fürtwängler que, dans ce cas, il y aurait une place pour lui dans un camp de concentration. Fürtwängler dit : « Herr Reichskanzler, au moins là-bas je serai en bonne compagnie. » . Le « Führer » se mit hors de lui et quitta la pièce. »

Il s'échappa ensuite dans les montagnes pour composer, alors que les Jeux olympiques d'été de 1936 se déroulaient à Munich. Pendant l'hiver 1936-1937, il cessa toute activité publique et se concentra à nouveau sur la composition, souhaitant demeurer dans un repos absolu. Il ne retrouva son Orchestre que le 10 février 1937.

Les prémisses de la guerre

La résistance à la volonté des Nazis

Josef Goebbels chercha par tous les moyens à conserver Fürtwängler en Allemagne et à l'utiliser pour glorifier le peuple allemand.

Hitler et Goebbels savaient qu'il n'était pas fidèle à leur ligne politique : on trouve ainsi dans 2 entrées du journal personnel de Goebbels datées de 1937, parmi d'autres :

« Fürtwängler prend toujours parti pour les Juifs, et pour Hindemith. J'en ai assez. Ça m'agace vraiment et je m'énerve face à lui. Mais ça ne change rien. Encore avec ces Juifs de demi-sang. Il en a toujours et toujours sous sa protection. »

De plus, Fürtwängler incluait des musiciens juifs ou d'autres « non-aryens » durant ses tournées à l'étranger dans les années 1930. Ce fut le cas en France en avril 1934 où il dirigea des Opéras de Wagner. Hans Mayer, un professeur en littérature, juif communiste exilé d'Allemagne, rapporta après la guerre que Fürtwängler avait volontairement choisi une distribution constituée presque entièrement de Juifs ou de personnes chassées d'Allemagne durant ces concerts. De la même façon, durant l'Exposition universelle de Paris de 1937, Fürtwängler réalisa une série de concerts wagnériens qui furent un triomphe. Goebbels fit annoncer dans la presse allemande que Fürtwängler et Wagner avaient été plébiscités à Paris. En fait, ceux qui firent un triomphe à Fürtwängler étaient précisément des exilés allemands, dont de nombreux Juifs, qui vivaient à Paris et qui considéraient Fürtwängler comme un symbole de l'Allemagne anti-nazie. D'autre part, Fürtwängler y refusa de diriger l'Hymne allemand des Nazis et exigea que tous les « swastikas » soient enlevés de ses salles de concert. D'autre part, une délégation allemande se rendit sous l'Arc de triomphe pour rendre hommage au soldat inconnu. Sur la photo prise pour l'occasion, on peut voir que Fürtwängler est le seul allemand à ne pas faire le salut nazi (il a la main posée sur l'épaule) . La photo fut d'ailleurs soigneusement conservée par la « Gestapo » apportant une nouvelle preuve que Fürtwängler s'opposait à la politique nazie. D'autre part, les Nazis se rendirent compte et se plaignirent que Fürtwängler ne rapportait de ses tournées à l'étranger pas d'argent ; ils crurent d'abord que Fürtwängler dépensait tout pour lui puis réalisèrent qu'il donnait tout l'argent aux émigrés allemands. Ces derniers confirmèrent après la guerre que le chef d'orchestre leur donnait tout ce qu'il avait « jusqu'au dernier centime » lorsqu'il les rencontrait.

Fürtwängler se refusa toujours à pratiquer le salut nazi et à diriger les Hymnes nazis. Lorsque l'Orchestre de Berlin jouait à l'étranger, il devait commencer le concert par l'Hymne nazi « Horst-Wessel-Lied » . Comme purent le constater les Anglais et les Français durant la période 1935-1939, Fürtwängler se faisait remplacer par l'intendant Hans von Benda et n'entrait qu'après dans la salle. Il refusa aussi systématiquement de signer ses lettres par « Heil Hitler » même lorsqu'il s'adressait directement à Hitler. Fred Prieberg a retrouvé toutes les lettres du chef d'orchestre au dictateur : il s'agit toujours de demandes d'audience pour défendre des musiciens juifs ou considérés comme « dégénérés » . Le fait qu'il refusait de signer par « Heil Hitler » fut considéré comme un affront majeur par les dirigeants nazis et explique que beaucoup de ces demandes d'audience ont été refusées. Il aida de nombreuses personnes d'origine juive à échapper aux persécutions du régime : certaines ont d'ailleurs déclaré que Fürtwängler leur avait sauvé la vie. Fürtwängler parvint aussi à protéger partiellement son Orchestre de l'influence du National-Socialisme : on y comptait relativement peu de membres du Parti et il fut beaucoup moins utilisé à des fins idéologiques que d'autres formations.

Depuis l'arrivée d'Hitler, le Festival de Salzbourg avait beaucoup de succès et devenait le centre des musiciens anti-nazis par opposition à celui de Bayreuth. Arturo Toscanini et Bruno Walter s'y produisaient très souvent. Hitler ne voulait pas que les musiciens allemands s'y rendent. Cependant, Fürtwängler fut invité en 1937 pour diriger la 9e de Beethoven. Fürtwängler accepta malgré l'opposition très ferme d'Hitler et de Goebbels. Arturo Toscanini, que Fürtwängler rencontra au Festival de Salzbourg de 1937 et qui ne lui avait pas pardonné de ne pas être allé à New-York en 1936, lui reprocha le contraire de ce que lui reprochaient les Nazis en disant : « Quiconque dirige dans le 3e “ Reich ” est un Nazi. » . Fürtwängler lui répondit : « Je suis le même qu'avant. La musique va dans des contrées où la « Gestapo » ne peut pas espérer un seul instant se trouver. Vous supposez que l'Art n'est rien d'autre que de la propagande pour le régime qui est déjà au pouvoir. Si je vous comprends bien, le régime nazi étant au pouvoir, je suis donc un chef nazi, sous un régime communiste, je serais un chef communiste, sous un régime démocrate, un chef démocrate. Non, mille fois non ! L'Art appartient au monde entier. » .

Fürtwängler jouait au Festival de Bayreuth depuis 1936 mais était encore en termes excécrables avec Winifred Wagner qui était très proche d'Hitler. Le 17 novembre 1937, il écrivit à Winifred Wagner une lettre très virulente l'accusant d'avoir trahi l'idéal artistique de Wagner en ayant appliqué des considérations raciales plutôt qu'artistiques dans le choix des musiciens du Festival et en ayant « placé toute sa confiance dans les pouvoirs d'un régime dictatorial ». Il envoya une copie à Hitler, Goebbels et Göring de cette lettre. L'accusation était extrêmement grave pour celle qui se considérait comme l'héritière spirituelle de Wagner et attaquait aussi directement Hitler. Goebbels écrivit dans son journal qu'Hitler se mit dans une fureur considérable contre Fürtwängler et qu'il voulait l'éliminer définitivement du Festival de Bayreuth. Goebbels ajouta que ce serait une perte considérable pour Bayreuth. Comme Fred Prieberg le dit, fin 1937, Fürtwängler n'avait en aucune façon cédé sur le fond face au nouveau régime et seules des personnes très mal informées pouvaient l'accuser de travailler pour les Nazis. Pour les dirigeants nazis, dont la présence culturelle de Fürtwängler semblait indispensable à l'époque, le seul moyen de trouver une parade contre lui était de lui trouver un « remplaçant » .

L'apparition de « monsieur K » : Herbert von Karajan

(Photo) Herbert von Karajan en 1938. Il fut utilisé et lancé par Göring pour contrebalancer le poids culturel de Fürtwängler.

Son 1er combat en 1938 fut donc celui l'opposant à Herbert von Karajan. Les dirigeants nazis voyant que Fürtwängler refusait de se plier à la nouvelle politique du régime, Göring chercha à cette époque à trouver un chef d'orchestre « idéal » qui aurait pu lui faire contrepoids : ce fut Karajan. Ce dernier, extrêmement brillant, était prêt à beaucoup plus de compromis que son aîné, même s'il faut garder à l'esprit que Fürtwängler avait plus de marge de manœuvres que Karajan en raison de son immense prestige et de l'admiration que Goebbels et Hitler lui vouaient. Göring organisa une grande campagne pour Karajan et contre Fürtwängler. Un journaliste, Edwin van der Nüll, fut chargé d'écrire des articles pour glorifier le jeune chef d'orchestre. Il intitula l'un d'eux « le miracle Karajan » (« das Wunder Karajan ») en référence directe à l'article qui avait fait connaître Fürtwängler lorsqu'il était jeune chef d'orchestre à Mannheim. D'autre part, la presse nazie reprochait à Fürtwängler de ne pas adhérer aux nouvelles orientations politiques de l'Allemagne. Cette affaire faisait aussi partie d'une rivalité entre Göring et Goebbels, le 1er souhaitant utiliser Karajan pour reprendre la main sur la vie culturelle allemande. Cependant comme Fred Prieberg l'expliqua, le point principal n'était pas l'opposition entre Göring et Goebbels mais la nécessité pour les dirigeants nazis, Hitler compris, de trouver un contrepoids à ce vieux chef d'orchestre qui s'opposait obstinément à la politique du nouveau régime. Fürtwängler finit par se plaindre directement à Goebbels qui parvint à arrêter la campagne de dénigrement dont il faisait l'objet. 1938 marqua le début de l'apparition de Karajan au tout 1er plan de la scène musicale allemande et le début de la haine et du mépris obsessionnels que Fürtwängler lui voua jusqu'à sa mort (il refusait souvent de l'appeler de son vrai nom, l'appelant « Herr K ») .

Le choc de l'année 1938

L'année 1938 fut un tournant majeur dans l'histoire du 3e « Reich » avec la succession des Accords de Munich, de l'« Anschluss », et la radicalisation des lois raciales. Hitler mit en place un régime criminel à grande échelle qui allait mener à la Seconde Guerre mondiale et à des crimes contre l'humanité d'une ampleur sans précédent.

Fürtwängler comme l'immense majorité des Allemands et des Autrichiens approuva l'union de l'Allemagne et de l'Autriche mais il fut très affecté par les exactions qui s'organisèrent contre les Juifs et menèrent à la sinistre « nuit de Cristal ». Audrey Roncigli rapporte que l'agent Andrew Schulhof le rencontra alors à Budapest :

« Il n'avait plus un sou en poche, il était perdu, j'ai même dû payer son billet de train. On aurait dit, après la nuit de pogrom et des synagogues réduites en cendres, qu'il avait le sentiment d'avoir perdu tout ce qu'il avait fait pour ses amis juifs jusqu'alors. »

Berta Geißmar le rencontra à Paris cette année et écrit qu'il était « grandement déprimé ». Friedelind Wagner le rencontra en décembre de la même année toujours à Paris : ils discutèrent de savoir s'il devait rester ou quitter l'Allemagne, elle décrit Fürtwängler comme « un homme très malheureux ». La brutalité du comportement des Nazis cette année-là explique l'état de confusion dans lequel se trouvait le chef d'orchestre et le fait qu'il accepta quelques concerts ayant un caractère plus politique pour essayer de sauver ce qui était encore possible. Alors que durant la période 1935-1937, ses concerts n'avaient aucun caractère politique suivant l'« accord » conclu avec Goebbels en 1935, il accepta un peu plus de concerts que lui demandait Goebbels à partir de 1938. Fred Prieberg a prouvé en détail que Fürtwängler accepta ces rares concerts avec pour objectif d'obtenir en compensation la protection de personnes ou de formations musicales. Il obtint, par exemple, la sauvegarde de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne et parvint à garder les musiciens « demi-juifs » de cet Orchestre. Le Philharmonique de Vienne disposait d'un statut particulier qui lui garantissait une très grande indépendance politique. Les Nazis ne le supportaient pas et souhaitaient l'éliminer : ils voulaient que les musiciens de l'Orchestre devinssent tous des soldats. L'Orchestre appela à l'aide Fürtwängler. Ce dernier essaya de trouver des appuis politiques et organisa 2 grands concerts du Philharmonique de Vienne avec un programme purement autrichien devant Hitler à Berlin, les 22 et 23 avril. Fürtwängler réussit à faire changer d'avis Hitler et l'Orchestre fut préservé : ce dernier en conserva toujours une reconnaissance infinie vis-à-vis du chef d'orchestre. En revanche, il ne réussit pas à sauver les musiciens considérés comme « purs juifs » par les Nazis qui moururent tous plus tard dans des camps d'extermination.

Goebbels voyait parfaitement le double jeu de Fürtwängler : il en parle à plusieurs reprises dans son journal personnel. Mais il fermait les yeux car il considérait que le fait que Fürtwängler joue à Vienne en 1938, à Prague ou Oslo plus tard, donnait une « légitimité culturelle » à l'annexion de ces villes. Hitler s'en rendait compte également : il déclara que même si Fürtwängler était infiniment supérieur à Karajan comme chef d'orchestre, il fallait garder ce dernier « en réserve » car Fürtwängler n'était pas sûr politiquement. De son côté, non seulement Fürtwängler ne dirigeait ces concerts que pour préserver certaines personnes ou formations musicales, mais ses programmes de concert avaient souvent un caractère « militant ». De même que pendant les années 1930, il faisait exprès de faire jouer des musiciens juifs dans ses tournées à l'étranger, il programma systématiquement de la musique autrichienne à Vienne alors qu'Hitler voulait précisément éliminer la spécificité culturelle de l'Autriche, prétendant qu'elle n'avait toujours été qu'une partie de l'Allemagne. À Prague, il joua systématiquement de la musique slave : « Má Vlast » en 1939 et 1940 et la 9^e Symphonie de Dvořák en 1944.

Le « Musikverein », la résidence de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne

Fürtwängler dirigea « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne à Nuremberg, le 5 septembre, la veille de l'ouverture des journées du Parti Nazi et ne fit donc pas parti du Congrès Nazi comme cela a souvent été écrit. En effet, Fürtwängler a exigé que le concert n'ait aucun caractère officiel ce qui a été accepté. Le concert a eu lieu et c'est seulement le lendemain matin que le Congrès a été ouvert. D'un point de vue historique, Fürtwängler n'a donc jamais dirigé un seul concert pour le Parti Nazi. Ce concert est l'un des 2 (avec celui de l'anniversaire d'Hitler en 1942) qui lui seront reprochés le plus vivement après la guerre. En fait, Fürtwängler dirigea ce concert uniquement dans le but de préserver ce qui pouvait l'être de la culture autrichienne. Outre l'existence de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne (qui joua précisément à Nuremberg), Fürtwängler cherchait des appuis politiques pour préserver le Festival de Salzbourg et en faire un contrepoids à celui de Bayreuth qui devenait un sanctuaire du Nazisme. En ce qui concerne ce dernier point, Goebbels s'y opposa et le projet de Fürtwängler n'aboutit pas.

Fürtwängler réussit à préserver l'indépendance de l'Opéra de Vienne et à y faire placer Karl Böhm comme directeur, les Nazis voulant subordonner complètement l'Opéra de Vienne à celui de Berlin. Il intervint pour préserver la très prestigieuse collection d'instruments de la Société philharmonique de Vienne que Goebbels voulait faire transporter à Berlin. Pendant l'année 1938, Fürtwängler sauva plusieurs musiciens juifs durant les nombreuses rafles qui eurent lieu comme Carl Fleisch et sa femme ou Heinrich Wollheim, un musicien de l'Opéra de Berlin.

La légion d'honneur

Le 20 février 1939, Fürtwängler reçut la Légion d'honneur en France. Ce geste du gouvernement français tend à prouver que les Chancelleries des démocraties occidentales savaient parfaitement que Fürtwängler ne soutenait pas politiquement le régime nazi. Hitler fit d'ailleurs interdire la publication de cette nouvelle en Allemagne.

Au cœur de la guerre

Le « Reich » qui devait durer 1,000 ans se retrouve, en 1943, dangereusement chancelant. Le 2 février, la reddition de la 6e armée du maréchal Paulus à Stalingrad met fin à la bataille la plus meurtrière de toute l'histoire militaire. Elle a coûté la vie à près de 1,000,000 de personnes (soldats et civiles) et considérablement affecté les troupes allemandes. Préoccupé par sa crédibilité et conscient que l'Allemagne est en train de perdre la guerre, Adolf Hitler envoie son ministre de la Propagande pour galvaniser le peuple allemand. Le 18 février 1943, à Berlin, Josef Goebbels lance ces paroles apocalyptiques de la tribune nazie du « Sportpalast » et déchaîne la foule :

« Ich frage euch : Wollt ihr den totalen Krieg ? Wollt ihr ihn, wenn nötig, totaler und radikaler, als wir ihn uns heute überhaupt erst vorstellen können ? Nun, Volk, steh auf und Sturm brich los ! »

(« Je vous demande, voulez-vous la guerre totale ? La voulez-vous, une guerre encore plus totale et radicale que tout ce que nous pouvons imaginer ? Peuple, lève toi ! Tempête déchaîne-toi ! »)

Les conséquences ne se font pas attendre et le pays subit de plus en plus régulièrement les bombardements alliés. Plus touchée que la plupart des autres villes allemandes, la capitale paye le prix de sa valeur symbolique aux yeux du

National-Socialisme. L'inversion du rapport de forces au cœur du conflit oblige les dirigeants allemands à privilégier l'effort de guerre aux affaires culturelles. L'année 1943 marque donc la fin de la politique culturelle du « Reich », diminuant brutalement le nombre de concerts. Beaucoup de musiciens perdent leur statut privilégié qui les dispensait du service militaire, et sont envoyés au combat sur les différents fronts d'Europe. Goebbels établit à ce moment-là une liste de 36 pages contenant les noms des « Gottbegnadet » (les protégés de Dieu) que la nation a comme rôle de protéger. Parmi les plus célèbres, on y trouve Carl Orff, Clemens Krauß, Max Lorenz et Karl Böhm. 3 noms font l'objet d'une liste spéciale : Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner et Wilhelm Fürtwängler qui, selon les termes mêmes du document, représentent un « capital immense pour la nation ». Mais la suite est connue, les mois qui suivent plongent le pays dans le chaos jusqu'à la chute du 3^e « Reich », le 8 mai 1945.

Bien que la quasi-totalité de Berlin ait été détruite, les bandes d'enregistrement de la « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (Radio du « Reich ») sont trouvées par l'Armée Rouge après la prise de Berlin et emmenées en Russie. Par la suite, ces enregistrements sont édités peu à peu et dans des proportions très restreintes en URSS. Commence alors un véritable marché noir avec les documents sonores de l'époque de guerre, dont certains passent le mur sous le manteau et restent, pour cette raison, longtemps méconnus des mélomanes. Finalement, lors de l'explosion du bloc de l'Est (soit 50 ans après avoir été gravées), la « Deutsche Grammophon » publie enfin ces bandes par l'intermédiaire de la « Radio Libre » de Berlin. Ce que l'on peut appeler aujourd'hui, à juste titre, le « style de guerre » de Fürtwängler a été, au moment de la découverte des enregistrements de cette période, un choc terrible. Il suffit d'écouter un des concerts peut-être le plus significatif pour en mesurer l'impact : celui du 30 juin 1943 avec la Philharmonie de Berlin. Ce soir-là précisément, avec la « Coriolan » et les Symphonies n° 4 et 5, Beethoven et Fürtwängler donnent un « Requiem » pour une Allemagne dénaturée par la barbarie nazie. Ce qui est remarquable à l'écoute de ce concert, c'est qu'il réussit à « communiquer un peu de l'atmosphère qui régnait à l'époque », comme le dit sa femme Elisabeth Fürtwängler. Effectivement, dans les dernières années de la guerre, se rendre à la vieille « Philharmonie » n'était pas chose facile et aux dires des musiciens eux-mêmes, les gens se demandaient s'ils n'allaient pas assister à leur dernier concert. Ces craintes étaient du reste tout à fait justifiées, puisque l'« Alte Philharmonie » (tout comme le « Staatsoper » et l'« Admiralspalast ») a fini sous les bombes. Les concerts se déroulaient avec des interruptions fréquentes dues aux alertes nocturnes et contraignaient public et musiciens à attendre pour voir si la soirée pouvait continuer. On imagine certainement avec peine combien venir au concert en ces instants était un acte de foi, excluant toute autre motivation en dehors de l'art. Cette très forte tension a imprégné les performances artistiques de Fürtwängler, au point qu'il est aujourd'hui difficile de les comprendre avec une grille interprétative habituelle. Sans doute est-ce là une marque de la puissance de l'art véritable, capable de soulever l'homme pour le libérer (ne fût-ce qu'un instant) de son ordinaire. Un idéal que le grand chef allemand a recherché toute sa vie.

Attitude face aux exigences du pouvoir

En 1939, la Seconde Guerre mondiale commença et l'Allemagne envahit différents pays. Fürtwängler n'a dirigé aucun concert aux Pays-Bas, en Belgique, en Pologne ni en France durant l'occupation. Il déclara après la capitulation française :

« Je ne jouerai jamais dans un pays comme la France, auquel je suis tant attaché, en me considérant comme un »

vainqueur ". Je dirigerai à nouveau là-bas uniquement quand le pays sera libéré. »

Gœbbels essaya, à de nombreuses reprises, de faire jouer Fürtwängler dans les territoires occupés. Comme Fürtwängler avait déclaré qu'il ne dirigerait que s'il était invité et jamais pour des raisons de propagande, les Nazis obligèrent le chef d'orchestre français Charles Munch à lui envoyer une lettre d'invitation. Mais, ce dernier glissa en bas de la lettre « en accord avec les autorités d'occupation » qui permit à Fürtwängler de comprendre la situation et qui refusa poliment l'invitation de Munch.

Il dirigea néanmoins dans d'autres pays occupés, comme à Prague le 7 novembre 1940 et le 26 mars 1944, à Oslo et à Copenhague en mai 1943. Il choisit toutefois de commencer son concert à Prague du 7 novembre 1940 par « Má Vlast » de Bedřich Smetana. Audrey Roncigli commente :

« Cette œuvre, composée au cours de la 2e moitié du XIXe siècle, était destinée à célébrer la résistance du peuple tchèque face aux Autrichiens. En 1940, l'envahisseur se nomme Hitler. Que Fürtwängler programme cette œuvre en début de concert est considéré par Fred Prieberg, comme " une réelle prise de position pour les Tchèques opprimés ". »

À Prague, le 26 mars 1944, il dirigea la 9e Symphonie de Dvořák. Ce chef-d'œuvre absolu de la musique slave contient des airs inspirés des « negro spirituals » afro-américains. Jouer des musiques afro-américaines était interdit sous peine de mort à l'époque. Enfin, Fürtwängler profita de son séjour à Oslo en mai 1943 pour écrire une lettre de recommandation adressée à Luschek, chef de la Sécurité de la ville d'Oslo qui permit à Issay Dobrowen, chef d'orchestre russe d'origine juive travaillant à Oslo, d'émigrer en Suède.

Pendant la période 1940-1941, Fürtwängler dirigea peu. Une des raisons tient au fait qu'il eut un accident en février 1941 en allant skier comme tous les ans. Fürtwängler fut toute sa vie un grand sportif et un grand skieur. Mais en 1941, pour la seule fois de sa vie, il eut un grave accident de ski. Pendant 8 mois, il ne parvint plus à lever le bras droit. Hitler lui-même se plaignit que Fürtwängler ne pouvait plus rien diriger. Cet accident arrangea bien le musicien qui put reprendre de la distance par rapport au régime nazi.

La tension augmentant de plus en plus (la Guerre mondiale, l'invasion de l'Union soviétique, la « guerre totale »), Fürtwängler fut même contraint de participer à quelques concerts ayant clairement un caractère de propagande. Par exemple, il dirigea 2 concerts dans 2 usines dont l'un a été filmé. On y voit Fürtwängler, entouré de gigantesques croix gammées, dirigeant l'ouverture « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » devant des ouvriers semblant admiratifs. Il faut cependant fortement relativiser la participation de Fürtwängler à la propagande nazie. Le 3e « Reich » a produit des films de propagande dans des proportions gigantesques. Or Fürtwängler n'apparaît que dans 2 bandes de moins de 5 et 10 minutes, respectivement. En particulier, Josef Gœbbels avait pour projet, dès 1941, de réaliser un film gigantesque de propagande et il voulait absolument que Fürtwängler y joue le rôle principal, estimant qu'il était le seul à pouvoir donner une dimension artistique transcendante. Fürtwängler s'y opposa catégoriquement. Le film parut en 1944 sous le titre de « Philharmoniker » avec Richard Strauß, Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm, et Hans Knappertsbusch mais sans Fürtwängler. Le refus de Fürtwängler contraria, une nouvelle fois, fortement Hitler. Gœbbels avait un autre projet de film sur Beethoven où le chef d'orchestre devait jouer une nouvelle fois un rôle central mais comme Fürtwängler lui répondit violemment : « Vous avez tort, Monsieur le Ministre, si vous croyez pouvoir exploiter Beethoven pour faire un film de propagande. » , Goebbels abandonna définitivement le projet. D'autre part, Fürtwängler avait parfaitement conscience d'être utilisé, parfois, contre son gré, à des fins de propagande. Il écrit dans son carnet personnel en 1945 :

« C'est dans le concret (c'est-à-dire dans les cas particuliers) que j'œuvrais constamment contre la terreur National-Socialiste et la politique de racisme. Ce que j'ai pu faire là justifie seul, à mes yeux, que je sois resté en Allemagne. Il y a une chose dont j'ai dû m'accommoder, et que j'ai dû accepter de subir, c'est la propagande National-Socialiste. Plus que d'autres, j'y étais exposé. Car malgré toute son arrogance, le National-Socialisme avait peu confiance en lui : il aimait utiliser pour son compte la grandeur d'autrui ou d'autres temps. On a fait de la propagande en mon nom parce que j'étais célèbre auparavant, de même que Wagner et Beethoven ont été récupérés. »

Il écrit dès 1940, à propos de la propagande de Goebbels : « Goebbels diffuse une propagande culturelle ouvertement et uniquement adaptée aux besoins du Parti. Elle déchaîne une médiocrité sans bornes. Par là, une lutte contre toute tradition saine. » . En ce qui concerne les doctrines raciales des Nazis, Fürtwängler ne changera pas d'un iota toute sa vie comme en témoigne, parmi bien d'autres, cette phrase qu'il écrit dans son journal personnel sur le cas Wagner, en 1941 : « Avons-nous le droit de mettre dans nos balances des qualités données par Dieu, telles que les différences de peuples et de races ? » .

Dans un texte de son carnet personnel daté de 1941, Fürtwängler dépeint certains des allemands de l'époque de façon terrifiante : « Dans l'un de ses écrits, Paul Ernst parle de ce phénomène singulier que la scolastique du Moyen-âge appelait " mort spirituelle " , à savoir que dans un corps parfaitement sain l'âme peut mourir. Paul Ernst prend pour exemple le destin d'un peuple, l'ascension, l'apogée et le déclin de la civilisation. Or une telle évolution se rencontre aussi chez l'homme. Nous avons autour de nous des êtres qui nous regardent, mais dont les yeux sont vides ; leur âme est morte sans qu'ils le sachent. Seuls s'aperçoivent de ce manque ceux qui ont conservé la leur, qui ont gardé la faculté de sentir si, dans les multiples occasions de la vie, dans les événements de l'histoire, dans les actions privées ou publiques de chacun, l'âme, c'est-à-dire l'homme dans sa globalité, est présente ou non. » .

Winifred Wagner se rendit en Suisse au début de la guerre pour persuader sa fille Friedelind de revenir en Allemagne. Cette dernière était comme son père : elle détestait Hitler. Elle avait quitté l'Allemagne depuis longtemps. Elle rapporta que sa mère lui déclara qu'Hitler n'avait aucune confiance en Fürtwängler et continuait depuis des années à ne pas l'aimer. Elle déclara que Goering et Goebbels étaient exaspérés à cause de ses efforts continuels pour aider « ses amis indésirables » .

D'une façon générale, malgré les pressions très fortes du régime pour faire jouer les musiciens préférés d'Hitler, Fürtwängler a volontairement diversifié les compositeurs qu'il a dirigés en Allemagne comme durant ses tournées à l'étranger pour contrecarrer la politique culturelle nazie. Audrey Roncigli a réalisé une étude statistique des compositeurs choisis par Fürtwängler : ce dernier a clairement diminué la proportion de concerts de Beethoven, Brahms, Strauß, Bruckner, Weber, Schubert durant la période nazie par rapport à la période de Weimar ou l'aprèsguerre pour introduire une proportion plus importante des compositeurs comme Ravel, Debussy, ou Stravinsky. Audrey Roncigli conclut :

« L'image de Furtwängler vu après-guerre comme le chantre des compositeurs favoris du " Reich " est, dans l'ensemble, une erreur. »

Furtwängler et la musique contemporaine oubliée

When, in November 1943, Wilhelm Furtwängler returned to Berlin from a concert tour abroad, he was informed that the « Alte Philharmonie » concert-hall had been bombed during an attack on the night of November 22-23. The facade had been badly damaged, and so, had the front rooms in which the irreplaceable music library had been kept. Important letters, files, documents, original scores - everything had been destroyed.

The concert-hall itself remained intact, but the windows had been blown-out, and glass, at the time, was not available. Besides, concerts could no longer be given there because high-piles of rubble cut-off the hall from the outside world. And, before it could be cleared away, more bombs fell on the « Philharmonie », on January 30, 1944, when the « Anhalter » train station, near the hall, was the target. This time, the « Philharmonie » was completely wrecked.

(From : « Wilhelm Furtwängler, a biography » , by Curt Riess, 1955.)

Following the destruction of the « Philharmonie » , Wilhelm Furtwängler conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 9 more concerts before the Nazi forces surrendered. 6 were in the « Staatsoper » , and when this was damaged by bombing the last 3 were held in the « Admiralpalast » . The last concerts under Nazi rule were held on 22nd and 23rd January with a programme of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » Overture, Mozart's Symphony No. 40 (1st 2 movements only for reasons not given) , and Johannes Brahms' 1st Symphony.

Those final 2 concerts took place just 4 months before the collapse of Berlin. Allied forces were closing in on the stricken city, and air-raids continued night and day. Remember that Adolf Hitler was not a democratically elected leader, and many of those, musicians and others, trapped in the beleaguered city were not rabid Nazis. Like those in the London Underground history dictated that many were simply in the wrong place at the wrong time. The predicament faced by the performing arts in the 21st Century palls into insignificance compared with the conditions that the inhabitants, and musicians, of Berlin faced in the final months of the War.

Yet, not only did the music continue, but quite remarkably the final 9 concerts in those last torrid months included the 1st performance of one new work (by Gerhart von Westerman, and played in 2 successive concerts) , and one Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance (Kurt Hessenberg's 2nd Symphony) .

Today, Wilhelm Furtwängler's name is irrevocably linked to the Nazis. It is not the purpose of this article to cover that ground again, too many apologies have already been written. The fact is he remained in Germany as Director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra through the darkest hours of the Nazis. But a lot of great music was performed in the years between 1922 and 1954 when Furtwängler led the Orchestra. Although his political compromises were deplorable, they should not prevent study of the music that was an integral part of the culture during those turbulent years.

Furtwängler is remembered today as an important interpreter of the Austro-Germanic repertoire, from Mozart through Beethoven to Bruckner. He is also known as a composer ; the very last work he conducted with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in concert was his own 2nd Symphony, on 20th September 1954. He died just 3 months later in December 1954.

During his 32 years as Director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, a surprising amount of 20th Century music was performed under his baton. (Don't forget his tenure at the Orchestra only covered the 1st half of the Century) . Some the new music has endured. There was much Arnold Schönberg (including the 1st performance of the Variations for Orchestra, Opus 31, 2nd version in 1928) , much Hans Pfitzner and Paul Hindemith (the Nazi banning of his Opera « Mathis der Maler » provoked Furtwängler's resignation from the Berlin Opera, in 1934) , plus Béla Bartók, Sergei Prokofiev and more.

But he also performed a large amount of 20th Century music that has not stood the test of time. For research purposes, I have taken a subjective definition of a « forgotten composer » as one whose work is not performed with any regularity today. Using this definition, I researched every one of the four 473 concerts Furtwängler conducted with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. This identified 45 « 20th Century » works, from 30 composers who have subsequently slipped into varying degrees of obscurity.

The results of my research are given below (more details of the research are given as a foot-note) . The history of these composers varies. Many remained in Germany through the Nazi period and beyond. Some such as Ernst Toch fled to the United States when the Nazis came to power. There are very few non-Germans, but these include the Italian Alfredo Casella, who was a known Fascist sympathiser. Interestingly, one fellow conductor-composer is included, the Polish-born Paul Kletzki. Some works remain in print, if not in performance. These include the 2 works performed in 1944 after the destruction of the old « Philharmonie » ; Gerhart von Westerman's « Divertimento » and Kurt Hessenberg's 2nd Symphony, Opus 29.

Looking at frequency of performance, the name that jumps-out is Max Trapp. 6 of his compositions were given over a 28 year period, 3 of these in 1st performances. His works were performed both during the Nazi period (1935 and 1939) , and after the War in 1951. Trapp lived from 1887 to 1971, and taught in various positions in Berlin throughout his life. His works included 7 Symphonies, and chamber music. The only one known at all today is his Piano Concerto, and he is largely forgotten. Why ?

There is no suggestion that a body of 45 neglected Masterpieces awaits discovery in Berlin archives. (But how many perished in the fall of Berlin ?) But what was this music like ? Furtwängler was a brilliant conductor and accomplished composer - does his programming of these composers bestow some merit on them ? Or, were many of them politically convenient commissions ? (This argument falls on the fact that many of the performances were pre-1933) . Is the comparative obscurity (I can find no information at all on 2) of these composers simply typical of the casualty rate among new works ? Have I misrepresented these artists who lived through such difficult times ? Do any readers know more about these 30 forgotten composers ?

More questions than answers, but an over-grown path that is well worth exploring. Please add further information and views using the comments (or e-mail) feature at the foot of the article.

Furtwängler's performances of forgotten modern music :

Max Trapp

28-29 January 1923 : Symphony No. 2 in B minor, Opus 15 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

14-15 December 1930 : Symphony No. 4 in B-flat minor, Opus 24 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

3-4 December 1933 : Symphonic Suite, Opus 30 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

29-30 September 1935 : Concert for orchestra, Opus 32 (world-premiere) .

3-5 December 1939 : Concert No. 2 for orchestra, Opus 36 (world-premiere) .

25-26 February 1951 : Symphony No. 6, Opus 45 (world-premiere) .

Walter Braunfels

16-17 November 1924 : « “ Don Juan ”, eine klassisch-romantische Phantasmagorie » , Opus 34 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

20-21 December 1925 : Prelude and Prologue from « Die Vogel » .

Georg Schumann

22-23 February 1925 : Variations and Gigue on a theme by Georg Friedrich Händel, Opus 72 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

2-3 February 1930 : Variations on « Gerstern abend war Vetter Michel » , Opus 74 (world-premiere) .

Philipp Jarnach

7-8 November 1926 : « Morgenklangspiel » , Opus 19 (world-premiere) .

15-17 February 1942 : Symphonic Variations for orchestra on music by Mozart, Opus 25 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Ernst Toch

13-14 November 1927 : Comedy for orchestra, Opus 42 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

8-9 February 1931 : Small Theater Suite, Opus 54 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Karl Marx

30 November - 1 December 1930 : Concert for 2 violins and orchestra, Opus 5 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

18-19 December 1932 : Passacaglia (world-premiere) .

Heinrich Kaminsky

25-26 November 1934 : Doric Music.

28-29 November 1937 : Concert for piano and orchestra (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance with the composer conducting ; Furtwängler conducted the balance of the programme) .

Gottfried Müller

5-6 February 1933 : Variations and Fugue on a German folk-song (« Morgenrot Morgenrot ») , Opus 2 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

17-19 December 1939 : Concert for large orchestra, Opus 5 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Theodor Berger

15-17 December 1940 : « Rondino giocoso » (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

2-4 November 1941 : Ballad for orchestra, Opus 10 (world-premiere) .

Karl Holler

16-21 October 1949 : Concerto for violincello and orchestra, Opus 26 (world-premiere) .

Heinz Schubert

5-7 February 1939 : Prelude and Toccata for string orchestra (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

6-8 December 1942 : Hymnic Concert for organ, soprano and tenor (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Bernhard Sekles

11-12 November 1923 : « Gesichte » , Fantastic miniature for small orchestra, Opus 29 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Alfredo Casella

19-20 December 1926 : Partita for piano and orchestra (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Karol Rathaus

4-5 March 1928 : Overture for large orchestra, Opus 22 (world-premiere) .

Gunther Raphael

24-25 March 1929 : Theme, Variations and Rondo for orchestra, Opus 19 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Paul Kletzki

19-20 January 1930 : Variations for orchestra (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Botho Sigwart

2-3 February 1930 : « Hektors Bestattung » , Melodrama, Opus 15.

Wladimir Vogel

25-26 October 1931 : 2 Etudes for orchestra (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Paul Græner

20-21 December 1931 : « Die Flöte von Sans-souci » , Suite for chamber orchestra, Opus 88 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Max Ettinger

3-4 April 1932 : Old English Suite, Opus 30 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Hugo Reichenberger

18-19 December 1932 : 2 « Mariensbilder » .

Max von Schillings

15-16 October 1933 : Symphonic Prologue for large orchestra from « König Œdipus » , Opus 11.

Siegfried Walter Müller

14-15 January 1934 : Happy Music for orchestra, Opus 43 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Hans Brehme

26-28 November 1938 : « Triptychon » (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Heinrich Zilcher (Hermann Zilcher, 1881-1948 ?)

2-4 February 1941 : Concerto in A major for violin and orchestra, Opus 92 (world-premiere) .

Paul Höffer

1-3 March 1942 : Symphonic Variations on a bass-theme by Johann Sebastian Bach, Opus 47 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Gerhard Frommel

8-10 November 1942 : Symphony in E major, Opus 13 (world-premiere) .

Ernst Pepping

31 October - 3 November 1943 : Symphony No. 2 in F minor for orchestra (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

Gerhart von Westerman

22-23 October 1944 : « Divertimento » for large orchestra, Opus 16 (world-premiere) .

Kurt Hessenberg

11 December 1944 : Symphony No. 2 in A major, Opus 29 (Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra 1st performance) .

The analysis was carried-out specifically for this article using « Wilhelm Furtwängler. Die Programme. Der Konzert Mit Dem Berliner Philharmonischen Orchester (1922-1954) » , published in 1965 by Friedrich Arnold Brockhaus, Wiesbaden.

Le grand concert de 1942

En 1942, Furtwängler apparut dans le 2e concert qui lui fut le plus reproché après la guerre, le 1er étant celui de Nuremberg en 1938 : la 9e de Beethoven dans le cadre des festivités pour l'anniversaire d'Adolf Hitler (le concert a eu lieu le 19 avril) . Il existe 2 documents de cet événement : un film de la fin du concert ainsi qu'un enregistrement complet de la Symphonie. En avril 1942, à l'apogée du pouvoir nazi, Goebbels voulut organiser des festivités gigantesques pour fêter l'œuvre d'Hitler. Il appela par téléphone Furtwängler, peu de temps avant, lui demandant de jouer la 9e avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Furtwängler prétextait qu'il n'avait pas assez de temps pour répéter. L'Orchestre de Berlin connaissant très bien l'œuvre, l'argument n'était pas valable et la proposition de Goebbels se transforma en ordre. Furtwängler était alors à Vienne car il avait planifié des concerts tout le mois d'avril en Autriche pour éviter l'anniversaire d'Hitler. Mais Goebbels fit annuler de force les concerts de Vienne autour du 19 et revenir à Berlin le chef d'orchestre. La vision de Goebbels était très claire : il allait faire un discours gigantesque sur l'œuvre d'Hitler annonçant un avenir extraordinaire au peuple allemand, le tout se finirait par la « Neuvième » qui symboliserait la « joie » du peuple allemand devant cet horizon. Seul Furtwängler pouvait diriger une 9e extraordinaire, ce qu'il fit, mais dans un sens totalement opposé à ce que Goebbels avait imaginé et sans que ce dernier semble s'en rendre compte. En effet, si on a pu comparer cette « Neuvième » à la Chapelle Sixtine de Michel-Ange, c'est à la fresque appelée « Le Jugement dernier » qu'il faut penser. Comme le dit Sami Habra dans l'analyse qu'il fit de cette interprétation :

« Ce concert est l'une des preuves flagrantes de la révolte de Furtwängler pendant les heures tragiques de l'Allemagne, quand les Nazis essayaient d'enterrer le grand héritage musical allemand en tentant de l'utiliser pour leurs sinistres desseins. »

Comme l'ont souligné les critiques, cette version de la « Neuvième » loin de célébrer la Joie du peuple allemande prit une dimension apocalyptique où le chef d'orchestre annonça aux dirigeants nazis le « Jugement dernier » . Que le message de Friedrich von Schiller et Beethoven soit à l'opposé absolu de l'idéologie nazie, non seulement Furtwängler en avait parfaitement conscience, mais il l'écrivit explicitement dans son carnet personnel en 1935 :

« Quand on refuse le " Brüder, über'm Sternenzelt " (Frères au plus haut des cieux) ou " Seid umschlungen, Millionen

" (Soyez unis par millions) de Schiller et de Beethoven pour une raison raciste, on refuse le meilleur de la germanité.
»

Josef Goebbels, que la haine raciale avait rendu sourd au message explicite de fraternité entre les peuples du texte de Schiller, ne comprit rien. Dans le film, il semble très content de lui et de Fürtwängler, applaudissant à tout rompre et allant ensuite serrer chaleureusement la main du chef d'orchestre. Il était devenu en effet traditionnel, depuis le concert avec Hitler de 1935, que le plus haut dignitaire nazi présent dans un concert de Fürtwängler lui serre la main, ce qui permettait à ce dernier de ne pas faire le salut nazi obligatoire pour tous les musiciens. À la fin, Fürtwängler semble s'essuyer discrètement la main droite avec un mouchoir. Ce geste, qui a fait couler beaucoup d'encre, était-il conscient, Fürtwängler se sachant filmé ? Il existe peut-être un lien inconscient entre ce geste qui a été diffusé dans le monde entier et le fait que Yehudi Menuhin répéta toute sa vie que Fürtwängler « avait les mains propres » . Toujours est-il que Fürtwängler fut tellement traumatisé par sa participation à cet événement qu'il multiplia les certificats médicaux le mois d'avril de l'année suivante pour disparaître ; c'est le Docteur Johannes Ludwig Schmitt, un résistant membre du « Cercle de Kreisau » qui lui écrivit un faux certificat médical. Cela lui permit d'éviter infiniment pire : non seulement l'anniversaire d'Hitler de 1943 mais un gigantesque « Congrès » organisé par Goebbels en Turquie pour organiser une « force culturelle antijuive » où tous les artistes allemands furent mobilisés de force. Il semble que l'absence de Fürtwängler à ce Congrès scandalisa Heinrich Himmler et Hermann Göring au plus haut point. Fürtwängler recommença en 1944 : il déclara dès le mois de mars à Goebbels qu'il était « mal portant » . Goebbels comprit qu'il se moquait de lui. Il accepta qu'il ne joue pas pour l'anniversaire du dictateur mais lui demanda de jouer à Prague en échange, pour le 5e « anniversaire » de l'annexion de la ville. Fürtwängler accepta mais Goebbels n'avait pas prévu qu'il y jouerait la 9e Symphonie de Dvořák.

La condamnation à mort et la fuite

Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg. Il fut l'organisateur de l'attentat contre Hitler du 20 juillet 1944 et l'un des symboles de la résistance allemande au Nazisme.

En 1944, la pression nazie devint insupportable et Fürtwängler était en danger de mort. Il avait en effet des liens personnels avec des membres de la résistance allemande au Nazisme : il connaissait bien Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg et son médecin, le Docteur Johannes Ludwig Schmitt, qui lui avait fourni de nombreux faux certificats médicaux pour éviter le plus possible les représentations officielles durant le 3e « Reich » , était membre du « Cercle de Kreisau » . Rudolf Pechel, qui fut l'un des rares survivants des camps de concentration de la résistance allemande au Nazisme, déclara que les résistants allemands étaient nombreux à se réunir pendant les concerts de Fürtwängler durant la guerre. Graf Kaunitz, un autre résistant, le confirma après la guerre et déclara que « durant les concerts de Fürtwängler, nous nous sentions comme la grande famille unie de la résistance » . Fürtwängler fut soupçonné par les Nazis d'avoir participé à l'attentat du 20 juillet 1944 contre Hitler. Fürtwängler était en effet au courant de l'organisation de cet attentat mais n'y participa pas, comme il le déclara lors de son procès en dénazification. Goebbels, qui l'avait utilisé et protégé jusqu'à ce moment, reconnut la vérité sur Fürtwängler en avril 1944 :

« Fürtwängler n'a jamais été National-Socialiste. Et il n'a jamais fait de mystère là-dessus. Et les Juifs et les émigrés ont trouvé cela suffisant pour le considérer comme un des leurs, lui qui était dans une sorte d' " émigration intérieure " ; il n'a jamais changé d'avis sur nous. »

Fürtwängler refusa catégoriquement de signer la pétition envoyée à tous les artistes allemands par Hans Hinkel sous les ordres de Goebbels pour soutenir sans condition Hitler après l'attentat manqué de juillet. Après la mort sur le front de Richard Geyer, un jeune compositeur extrêmement doué, il écrivit une lettre très violente à Goebbels l'accusant de détruire la véritable culture allemande à cause de ses doctrines raciales. L'accusation était très grave mais le chef d'orchestre s'était exprimé plusieurs fois en ce sens par le passé (en particulier dans la lettre de 1937 à Winifred Wagner) . La lettre confirme une nouvelle fois que Fürtwängler a toujours considéré depuis l'arrivée d'Hitler sur la scène politique jusqu'à la fin de la guerre qu'il y avait incompatibilité complète entre les doctrines nazies et ce qu'il considérait être la vraie culture allemande. Son comportement fut compris d'ailleurs dans ce sens par les Nazis car il fut rayé de la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste » le 7 décembre 1944.

Il fut donc décidé qu'il ne survivrait pas à la fin du « Reich » . Fin janvier 1945, on laissa carte blanche à Himmler pour qu'il fasse arrêter le chef d'orchestre par ses Waffen-SS, ce qu'il attendait avec impatience depuis 1933. Himmler et la « Gestapo » avaient, d'ailleurs, constitué un très long dossier sur Fürtwängler listant toutes ses actions prouvant qu'il avait aidé des Juifs et s'était opposé à la politique nazie. Le dossier a, en grande partie, été perdu mais certains éléments ont pu être retrouvés comme le fait que Fürtwängler transmettait de l'argent à ses amis Juifs émigrés avant la guerre ou le fait que Fürtwängler posait souvent les questions qu'il ne fallait pas poser comme « que pensez vous de la bataille de Stalingrad ? » et, surtout, « que deviennent les Juifs qui sont transportés ? » , « que se passe-t-il dans les camps de concentration ? » .

Mais Albert Speer prévint Fürtwängler le 11 décembre 1944 que sa vie était en danger et lui conseilla de quitter l'Allemagne. La seule réaction de Fürtwängler à Speer fut de dire : « Mais comment le pourrais-je ? Que vont devenir mes Philharmoniker ? Je suis responsable d'eux. » . Speer lui déclara que l'Orchestre de Berlin n'était pas en danger. Toutefois, ce n'est pas Speer qui a « sauvé » Fürtwängler. Il lui a donné le conseil de partir et lui a expliqué qu'Hitler avait l'intention de tout détruire en Allemagne (palais, églises, châteaux et toutes les usines que Speer avait fait enterrer pour les protéger des bombardements) ce qui horrifia Fürtwängler au plus haut point. C'est la doctoresse de la femme d'Himmler (Docteur Richter) qui vint voir Fürtwängler dans la plus grande discrétion et le prévint, fin janvier 1945, qu'Himmler allait le faire arrêter par ses SS. C'est à ce moment qu'il décida de partir pour Vienne et ensuite d'aller rejoindre sa femme en Suisse. Il déclara à son entourage à Vienne (précisément à Friedrich Schnapp, qui était chargé des enregistrements de Fürtwängler pendant la guerre) qu'il reviendrait prochainement, en insistant si lourdement sur le fait qu'il allait revenir très bientôt que ses amis comprirent qu'il n'avait pas l'intention de revenir. Fürtwängler se réfugia donc en Suisse, mais à l'arrivée à la frontière le 7 février 1945, ses papiers n'étaient évidemment pas en règle, les Nazis ne souhaitant pas qu'il s'échappe : le douanier sembla s'en rendre compte mais laissa passer le chef d'orchestre. Fürtwängler considéra toute sa vie que ce douanier lui avait sauvé la vie.

Le 30 avril 1945, Hitler se suicida. Les derniers Nazis présents à Berlin cherchèrent, dans les archives de la ville, la musique la plus extraordinaire possible pour accompagner à la radio l'annonce de la mort du dictateur : ce fut l'adagio de la 7e de Bruckner enregistré par Fürtwängler en 1942, ainsi qu'un extrait du « Götterdämmerung » de

Richard Wagner lui aussi enregistré en 1942 par Fürtwängler.

L'après-guerre et l'acquittement

Grâce à la presse de l'époque, en particulier le « New York Times », il est possible de suivre quasiment au jour le jour les péripéties des 2 procès en dénazification de Wilhelm Furtwängler qui eurent lieu en 1946 à Vienne et Berlin. Les extraits que nous publions permettent de suivre les débats de ce véritable feuilleton judiciaire et de se faire une idée de la personnalité des différents protagonistes, en 1er lieu Furtwängler et le Général américain McClure.

I. Dénazification à Vienne

4 décembre 1945

Le violoniste virtuose Yehudi Menuhin qui vient d'achever une tournée de concerts sur le continent (y compris à Moscou) a demandé hier que les Alliés reconsidèrent le cas de Furtwängler, ancien chef d'orchestre de la Philharmonie de Berlin. En 1936, il déclina une offre de devenir le chef de la Philharmonie de New York après avoir été accusé de relations avec les Nazis par des organisations et des journaux new-yorkais. Il vit actuellement en Suisse.

« S'il existe un musicien qui mérite d'être réhabilité, affirma Menuhin à l'Hôtel Plaza, c'est Furtwängler. Durant tout le temps où il dirigea à Berlin, il refusa de faire le salut nazi aux concerts et il est bien connu qu'il aida les musiciens juifs de son orchestre autant qu'il le put. Il n'a jamais permis d'être utilisé comme un moyen de propagande dans les pays occupés. Il n'a pas accompagné la Philharmonie de Berlin lors de ses tournées. Quand vous êtes citoyen d'un pays comme il le fut, son opposition fut celle qu'on était en droit d'attendre de lui. »

11 décembre 1945

Une déclaration du violoniste Yehudi Menuhin soutenant que Wilhelm Furtwängler n'était pas un collabo, a donné lieu à une violente protestation de Ira Hirschmann, fondateur et directeur des « New Friends of Music » :

« Au moment même où les patrons de Monsieur Furtwängler sont confrontés à un procès international pour massacres de masse, vouloir donner une patente à l'un de leurs conspirateurs paraît incroyable. La mémoire des américains n'est pas si courte, en particulier celle de ceux qui ont donné leur fils en Allemagne pour détruire les patrons de Furtwängler. »

Monsieur Hirschmann fit remarquer que, lorsque Hitler et Göring prirent la vie musicale allemande, ils éliminèrent tous les musiciens non nazis et qu'un certain nombre d'artistes célèbres qui refusèrent de se plier, quittèrent le pays.

Monsieur Hirschmann poursuivit :

« En tant qu'attaché du Département d'État durant la Guerre, j'étais en possession d'éléments prouvant sans aucun

doute possible le lien de Furtwängler avec les leaders nazis. Furtwängler faisait partie des officiels du 3e " Reich ", cette information m'était connue mais était trop connue par tous pour qu'on s'étende sur le sujet. Monsieur Menuhin choisit un moment crucial dans l'Histoire pour suggérer le retour de l'un des satellites nazis. Le peuple américain dans sa totalité ne tolérera pas la pollution de notre air par un musicien qui a servi avec dévotion les leaders nazis. Si des tentatives sont faites pour amener le nazi Furtwängler en Amérique, celui-ci devra faire face à une résistance et à une opposition des organismes. La vie musicale américaine peut prospérer sans Furtwängler. Nous sommes outragés à l'idée de ce Nazi envahissant l'Amérique. »

En réponse à la protestation de Monsieur Hirschmann, Monsieur Menuhin a affirmé hier soir qu'il n'avait jamais dit que Furtwängler viendrait dans ce pays. Du moins pas encore, ajouta-t-il. Il critiqua également Hirschmann de parler au nom du peuple américain.

8 février 1946

Wilhelm Furtwängler, ancien chef de la Philharmonie de Berlin dont les relations avec les Nazis ont fait l'objet d'une controverse internationale, a été arrêté par la Police française en Autriche, a-t-on appris aujourd'hui. Un journal russe affirma que Furtwängler a été mis en état d'arrestation alors qu'il traversait la frontière autrichienne, venant de Suisse et se rendant à Vienne.

9 février 1946

Une commission autrichienne de 7 membres commencera la semaine prochaine à examiner le cas Furtwängler, à propos de ses rapports avec le Nazisme et Hitler. Egon Hilbert (*), directeur des Théâtres viennois, a exprimé aujourd'hui le souhait que le dossier décharge Furtwängler et qu'il soit possible de lui demander d'accepter un poste à Vienne où il fut par le passé chef invité à l'Opéra. Monsieur Hilbert qui a invité le Docteur Furtwängler à quitter la Suisse et à venir ici, a passé 7 années au camp de concentration de Dachau comme ennemi du régime. Il affirma qu'il ne prenait pas au sérieux la politique des musiciens. Sauf dans le cas de musiciens qui étaient des Nazis actifs, dit-il, il était d'avis que Furtwängler soit traité comme « politiquement irresponsable » .

Le Docteur Furtwängler qui se trouve actuellement à Salzbourg, doit venir demain à Vienne en voiture. Son arrestation provisoire par la Police française quand il est entré en Autriche mercredi dernier était due au fait qu'il n'avait pas de laissez-passer pour entrer en zone française, dit-on ici.

* Egon Hilbert fut pour un temps bref Secrétaire Général de la « Bundestheater Verwaltung » qui regroupait le « Staatsoper », le « Volksoper », le « Burgtheater » et l' « Akademie-Theater » . Il était également le Président des « Wiener Festwochen », puis devint le Directeur de l' « Österreichisches Kultur-Institut » de Rome. Il fut appelé par Erbert von Karajan en tant que co-Directeur du « Staatsoper » de Vienne et devint Directeur de l'Opéra après le départ de celui-ci pour Berlin, durant l saison.

11 février 1946

Le Docteur Furtwängler a eu une conversation ce midi avec un groupe d'officiers russes représentant les forces d'occupation russes, à propos de l'éventualité d'être accepté comme chef de la Philharmonie de Vienne malgré sa longue collaboration avec la Philharmonie de Berlin sous le régime hitlérien. Le Docteur Furtwängler est arrivé hier soir à Vienne en provenance de Salzbourg. Ce matin, Furtwängler a visité les bureaux de la Philharmonie et l'administration de l'Opéra où il fut accueilli par Egon Hilbert. Il affirma ne pas pouvoir faire de déclaration publique sur son cas tant qu'il n'aura pas pris connaissance des charges contre lui. Des représentants des 4 puissances occupantes attendent de parler avec Furtwängler avant que les investigations de la commission autrichienne ne soient achevées.

Les socialistes et les communistes autrichiens sont opposés à ce que Furtwängler reste à Vienne. Les amis de Furtwängler insistent sur le fait qu'il ne fut jamais nazi et que, jusqu'à la chute du régime nazi, il protégea les Juifs contre les Nazis et tout particulièrement ceux de son Orchestre. Ils affirment également que, en une occasion, il insista pour que les drapeaux nazis soient retirés des murs de la salle où son Orchestre jouait.

13 février 1946

Un éditorial dans le numéro de ce midi du « Neues Österreich » dont le Président était encore récemment Karl Renner (*), demande que Wilhelm Furtwängler avoue publiquement ses fautes et avoir travaillé pour Hitler, avant d'être accepté comme Directeur de la Philharmonie de Vienne. L'éditorial ajoutait que le Docteur Furtwängler devrait déclarer qu'il ne voulait plus travailler sous les nazis. L'examen du cas Furtwängler par une commission autrichienne spéciale n'est pas encore achevé. On sait que l'administration des Théâtres est impatiente de voir Furtwängler disculpé politiquement.

* Renner fut Chancelier de l'Autriche et était membre du Parti socialiste (SPÖ).

14 février 1946

Le Docteur Furtwängler a dit à des amis viennois qui attendaient l'issue de sa déposition devant le comité d'investigation politique, qu'il s'était enfui de l'Allemagne nazie en 1945 parce que le docteur qui soignait l'épouse de Heinrich Himmler l'avait informé que les Nazis allaient le tuer. Cette doctoresse, selon ce qu'en raconte Furtwängler, vint le voir secrètement en janvier 1945 et l'informa qu'il était sur la liste noire des Nazis et qu'il avait été épargné jusqu'à maintenant, uniquement parce que son prestige était utile mais que, lorsque le régime nazi s'écroulerait, il serait assassiné.

Les 7 membres de la commission autrichienne interrogeront demain le Docteur Furtwängler. Celui-ci a refusé de faire des déclarations publiques avant que l'examen ne soit achevé. Des personnes liées à la Philharmonie de Vienne indiquent que sa défense sera basée sur la preuve qu'il n'a jamais eu de position officielle après qu'il ait démissionné en 1934 de la direction du « Staatsoper » et de la Philharmonie de Berlin, lors de l'affaire de l'antisémitisme en musique.

20 février 1946

Le Général Robert McClure assimila aujourd'hui le Docteur Furtwängler à un « instrument du Parti nazi » et dit que le célèbre chef allemand ne sera pas autorisé à retourner à son ancien poste de directeur de la Philharmonie de Berlin. Le Général McClure affirma que le Docteur Furtwängler était interdit, d'un commun accord avec les Alliés et rejeta les appels publics de nombreux Berlinoises importants demandant que le chef soit autorisé à retourner dans sa ville natale et à ses succès inoubliables.

En annonçant cette décision, McClure dit :

« Il est indiscutable que le Docteur Furtwängler était identifié de manière importante avec l'Allemagne nazie. En s'autorisant lui-même à devenir un instrument du Parti, il donnait une aura de respectabilité au cercle de ceux qui sont actuellement en procès à Nuremberg pour crimes contre l'humanité. Il est inconcevable qu'il lui soit permis d'occuper un poste en Allemagne à un moment où nous essayons d'effacer toute trace de Nazisme. »

McClure ajouta que Furtwängler fut nommé Conseiller d'État (« Staatsrat ») par Göring en 1933 et qu'il ne renonça jamais à ce titre. L'accord des Alliés met au ban quiconque a été membre du Conseil d'État après le 1 janvier 1934. McClure ajouta que « Furtwängler était vice-président de la “ Chambre de Musique du ' Reich ' ”, autre organisation sur la liste noire, jusqu'à sa dispute avec le Parti nazi en décembre 1934. »

Les relations de Furtwängler avec les Nazis ont précipité la controverse internationale. Ses supporters affirment qu'il était anti-nazi, rappelant sa lettre à Goebbels en 1933 par laquelle il protestait contre le boycott des artistes juifs. Ils citent également la correspondance de Furtwängler avec Göring où le chef d'orchestre demande à être soulagé de diriger des représentations d'Opéra à Berlin en raison de divergences avec Heinz Tietjen alors en charge du « Staatsoper » .

En décembre dernier, Yehudi Menuhin tenta en vain de faire lever le boycott. À Vienne, la commission spéciale fait des investigations pour déterminer si Furtwängler est responsable de collaboration avec les Nazis. Un poste est prévu pour lui dans la capitale s'il est blanchi.

Commentaire

Après avoir pris connaissance de cette interdiction, Yehudi Menuhin (qui ne connaissait pas Furtwängler) envoya immédiatement le message suivant au Général McClure :

« À moins d'avoir des preuves secrètes venant confirmer vos accusations selon lesquelles Furtwängler fut un instrument du Parti nazi, je m'élève violemment contre votre décision de le mettre au ban. Cet homme n'adhéra jamais au Parti ; en de nombreuses occasions, il risqua sa vie et sa réputation pour aider et protéger amis et collègues. Ne croyez pas que le fait de rester dans son propre pays soit suffisant pour condamner un homme. Au contraire, en tant que militaire, vous devriez savoir que rester à son poste nécessite plus de courage que le fait de fuir. Il sauva la part la meilleure de sa propre culture allemande, et de cela, nous lui sommes reconnaissants. Quant à “ donner une part de respectabilité au Parti ”, nous les Alliés, ne sommes-nous pas infiniment plus coupables et de notre plein gré, d'avoir pactisé avec ces monstres jusqu'à la dernière minute quand, presque malgré nous, nous fûmes littéralement entraînés de force et de manière peu courtoise, dans cette bataille, sauf l'Angleterre qui déclara la Guerre avant d'être directement attaquée ? Souvenez-vous de Munich et de Berchtesgaden, quand nous abandonnions de façon dévergondée à leur destin cruel tous ces cœurs courageux et toutes ces nations vaillantes. Je considère comme manifestement injuste et éminemment lâche de faire de Furtwängler le bouc-émissaire de nos propres crimes. Si cet homme est coupable de crimes précis, accusez-le et déclarez-le coupable. D'après ce que je peux voir, ce n'est pas une punition d'être banni de ce Berlin sordide et sale, et si l'homme vieux et malade veut y retourner maintenant et attend de reprendre sa tâche si exigeante et ses responsabilités, on devrait l'encourager car c'est là où il doit être : à Berlin. Si cette nation malade doit pouvoir mûrir pour devenir un membre de la communauté des nations qui se respecte, ce sera grâce aux efforts d'hommes tels que Furtwängler, d'hommes qui ont démontré qu'ils sont capables de sauver de la Guerre au moins une partie de leur âme. La Philharmonie de Berlin en est un témoignage. Seuls ces hommes sont capables de bâtir sur cette base saine une société meilleure. Ce n'est pas en réprimant de tels hommes que vous atteindrez votre but. Bien au contraire, vous ne réveillerez qu'un ressentiment justifié contre un vandalisme aussi vrai que l'autre vandalisme plus évident qui détruit les églises et les tableaux, un ressentiment auquel s'uniront les voix outragées de musiciens, de collègues, d'écrivains et d'hommes intègres dans le monde entier, indépendamment de leur nationalité ou de leur foi, y compris votre soussigné, Yehudi Menuhin. »

21 février 1946

Le Général américain dit que Furtwängler a offert ses services à Goebbels après sa démission

Le fondement de l'interdiction du retour de Furtwängler comme chef de la Philharmonie de Berlin, a-t-on expliqué aujourd'hui, fut sa capitulation devant la domination nazie après son opposition énergique. McClure affirma que, tout de suite après s'être retiré dans sa maison de campagne, Furtwängler avait commencé à négocier par l'entremise du Ministre de la Propagande, Josef Goebbels, ce qui modifia complètement sa position.

L'un de ses concerts marquants pour le compte du Parti nazi se situa en 1937 (*) lors d'un rassemblement à Nuremberg. En 1942, il dirigea un concert en Tchécoslovaquie pour l'anniversaire de Hitler () et fit de nombreuses tournées approuvées par Goebbels, à l'étranger dans des pays à la fois neutres et occupés. Il resta dans les bonnes grâces de la hiérarchie nazie jusqu'à la chute du régime.

* Le concert en question eut lieu le 8 septembre 1937. Il s'agissait d'une représentation des « Meistersinger » avec la Philharmonie de Vienne.

 Cette affirmation est fautive : le jour de l'anniversaire du « Führer », c'est-à-dire le 19 avril, Furtwängler donnait un concert à Berlin, interprétant la 9e de Beethoven.

La descendante de Wagner le soutient : Friedelind Wagner, petite fille du compositeur Richard Wagner, est entrée hier dans la controverse sur Furtwängler, en affirmant qu'elle l'avait entendu en 1936, défier la menace de Hitler d'être enfermé dans un camp de concentration. Madame Wagner qui s'est installée en Angleterre avant la Guerre après avoir fait part de ses sentiments anti-nazis, fut questionnée sur Furtwängler. « Le chef d'orchestre était un être faible, dit-elle, mais il s'est toujours opposé au Nazisme. » Elle parla de la réunion, il y a 12 ans à Bayreuth, entre Hitler et Furtwängler, dans la maison de sa mère. Madame Wagner avait 16 ans à l'époque :

« Je me souviens de Hitler se tournant vers Furtwängler et lui disant qu'il devrait s'autoriser lui-même à être utilisé par le Parti à des fins de propagande. Je me souviens du refus de Furtwängler. Hitler se fâcha et dit à Furtwängler que, dans ce cas, il y aurait un camp de concentration pour lui. Furtwängler resta silencieux durant un moment et répondit : “ Dans ce cas, Monsieur le Chancelier, je serai en bonne compagnie. ” »

22 février 1946

L'autorisation donnée à Furtwängler retirée par les Autrichiens

La commission autrichienne de 7 membres qui statuait sur le fait de savoir s'il fallait autoriser Furtwängler à diriger la Philharmonie de Vienne, est arrivée à une décision affirmative mais on a appris aujourd'hui que toute l'affaire était à nouveau venue devant la commission berlinoise en vue de la décision des Alliés selon laquelle Furtwängler ne pouvait pas diriger la Philharmonie là-bas. Cette annonce prématurée faite par la Commission autrichienne a provoqué une crise. La décision finale doit être prise par le comité inter-Allié.

23 février 1946

L'affaire Furtwängler en Autriche en pleine pagaille

Les chances pour Furtwängler d'avoir la possibilité immédiate de diriger la Philharmonie de Vienne ont probablement été anéanties par la déclaration du commandement américain en Allemagne, selon laquelle il ne peut pas diriger à Berlin. Les américains refuseront d'aller à l'encontre de la décision prise en Allemagne acceptant toute décision des Alliés qui pourrait permettre à Furtwängler de travailler à Vienne. La situation est ici terriblement confuse. Selon la décision en faveur de Furtwängler prise par le comité de 7 membres, l'affaire était supposée aller la semaine prochaine devant un comité spécial des 4 Alliés. Un tel comité n'a pas encore été mis sur pied. Entre temps, les autrichiens ne sont pas sûrs de vouloir que leur décision vienne prochainement devant un comité allié. Les autrichiens et les américains indiquèrent qu'ils préféreraient mettre cette affaire en sommeil pour un temps si une solution en ce sens pouvait être trouvée.

25 février 1946

Furtwängler mis « au rancart »

La commission autrichienne qui examinait le dossier politique de Furtwängler comme une base pour l'inviter à diriger la Philharmonie de Vienne, a protesté aujourd'hui contre des rumeurs selon lesquelles sa décision favorable avait été définitivement cassée et que Furtwängler avait été interdit de diriger en Autriche.

Toute l'affaire a été reconsidérée, disent les autrichiens, et aucun rapport sur Furtwängler ne sera envoyé au Conseil allié. Les autrichiens vont probablement essayer de laisser traîner l'affaire pour éviter un litige avec les américains, à la suite du refus des autorités militaires américaines de laisser Furtwängler diriger à Berlin.

7 mars 1946

Furtwängler proteste

Le Docteur Furtwängler affirma aujourd'hui dans une lettre au Maire de Berlin, Arthur Werner, que les Alliés ne lui avaient pas donné la possibilité de se défendre contre la radiation dans le cadre des statuts de la dénazification.

Furtwängler fut récemment interdit par les Alliés de retrouver son poste de directeur de la Philharmonie de Berlin. Les Alliés ont agi après que le Docteur Werner et des responsables de divers groupes d'artistes aient écrit une lettre ouverte au musicien pour « revenir à Berlin et aider à la restauration de la musique allemande ». La lettre publiée aujourd'hui était une réponse et apparut en 1re page du « Berliner Zeitung », qui est sous contrôle de la censure russe. Furtwängler affirma que, durant les 12 années de l'ère Hitler, il avait travaillé pour l'art et la culture allemands et non pas pour les Nazis.

10 mars 1946

Le comité allié des affaires culturelles en Autriche commencera à délibérer cette semaine, sur le vote secret de la commission permettant à Furtwängler de diriger la Philharmonie de Vienne. La commission autrichienne a usé de faux-fuyants depuis plus de 2 semaines depuis le 1er vote en faveur de Furtwängler qui fut connu au même moment comme étant la décision des autorités américaines stipulant qu'il ne pouvait être autorisé à diriger la Philharmonie de Berlin. Les membres de la commission veulent de la part des Alliés la permission que Furtwängler soit considéré comme chef-invité n'ayant aucun lien officiel avec l'Orchestre.

11 mars 1946

Berlin : Wilhelm Furtwängler, le chef allemand accusé d'activités nazies, est arrivé dimanche de Vienne par avion mais les officiels américains ont réitéré leur déclaration selon laquelle il figure sur la liste noire dans les 4 zones de l'Allemagne.

16 mars 1946

Furtwängler fait appel de son interdiction

Wilhelm Furtwängler a affirmé aujourd'hui qu'il avait soumis aux autorités alliées et à la Cour d'appel les preuves de son innocence de sympathies et d'activités nazies, afin qu'elles soient examinées. La preuve a été apportée aux 2 instances, a-t-il dit aux reporters, qu'il a agi sous le régime hitlérien comme un dissident et qu'il réussit, malgré de fortes pressions, à maintenir son statut en dehors de l'organisation nazie. Il insista pour être considéré seulement comme chef-invité chaque fois qu'il dirigeait un concert en Allemagne après 1935, et évita avec succès d'être utilisé pour les concerts de la propagande nazie, en particulier ceux à l'occasion de l'anniversaire de Hitler. En une seule occasion, au moment où son nom était si exploité, il fut piégé par les circonstances. Les Nazis lui avaient donné un délai de 2 jours pour diriger à l'occasion de l'anniversaire de Hitler en 1942 et, compte tenu du fait qu'on savait qu'il répétait à Vienne avant l'ouverture de la nouvelle saison, il fut impossible d'éluder le problème et il fut obligé d'apparaître comme obéissant aux ordres. Les documents originaux qu'il a préservés et transmis à la Cour, affirme-t-il, convaincront le monde entier que sa cause n'a pas bénéficié du juste éclairage et qu'une décision favorable l'innocentera.

26 mai 1946

Furtwängler approuvé par la commission autrichienne

La commission autrichienne d'investigation a déclaré qu'il serait « politiquement correct » pour Furtwängler et Herbert von Karajan, de diriger en Autriche, a-t-on annoncé aujourd'hui. La décision de la commission qui, en effet, exonère Furtwängler des charges de collaboration avec les Nazis, doit maintenant être approuvée par un sous-comité allié en charge de l'activité des artistes. L'affaire est à l'examen depuis de nombreux mois. Le 20 février, le Docteur Furtwängler avait été interdit de direction à Berlin par le Général Robert McClure en fonction des charges selon lesquelles il s'était autorisé lui-même à être un instrument des Nazis.

14 juin 1946

L'Affaire Furtwängler a embarrassé Berlin

Sans avertissement préliminaire, la Radio de Berlin a annoncé hier soir que Wilhelm Furtwängler dirigerait le concert de la Philharmonie. Le programme de ce soir fut précédé par une re-diffusion des nouvelles figurant dans le « Berliner Zeitung » de ce jour, selon lesquelles le Docteur Furtwängler avait été blanchi par une commission quadri-partite et qu'il reviendrait diriger à Berlin la saison prochaine au « Staatsoper » où il avait régné si longtemps. « Tristan und Isolde » (*) était cité comme étant le 1er Opéra qu'il dirigerait.

À la suite des nouvelles, un démenti fut publié par une « source alliée » selon laquelle Furtwängler n'était jamais apparu pour un examen de son cas par la commission de dénazification quadri-partite. Depuis que la permission de revenir à Berlin dépendait de son blanchiment, les faits rapportés dans le journal étaient incorrects, indiquait le démenti. La situation se trouva encore plus confuse du fait de la récente résidence de Furtwängler en Suisse. Un américain de Berlin qui est une ancienne connaissance, affirma avoir parlé au téléphone avec le chef d'orchestre qui se trouve en Suisse. Le musicien dit qu'il irait probablement à Vienne prochainement mais ne mentionna aucun projet de voyage en Allemagne. Cependant, il est établi qu'il a occupé à plusieurs reprises son ancienne résidence de Potsdam.

Les tentatives pour atteindre la radio berlinoise afin de confirmer que Furtwängler avait participé en personne au programme de ce soir, s'avèrent vaines en raison du vent et des orages qui ont « brouillé » le service téléphonique. (!!!!)

* « Tristan » est effectivement le 1er Opéra qu'il dirigera après la Guerre, les 3, 24 et 30 octobre 1947.

15 juin 1946

l'Affaire Furtwängler « off »

Les officiels militaires américains ont affirmé aujourd'hui que Furtwängler n'apparaîtrait probablement pas devant le comité de dénazification à Berlin avant plusieurs mois. Ils démentirent une nouvelle parue dans les journaux allemands sous contrôle russe selon laquelle il avait été blanchi des charges de sympathie envers les Nazis. Le Colonel F.N. Leonard, représentant des États-Unis pour les affaires culturelles alliées, dit que le comité de dénazification a trop de dossiers en cours pour examiner celui de Furtwängler. Malgré des rumeurs que Furtwängler est arrivé à Berlin hier, des sources sérieuses affirment qu'il se trouve toujours en Suisse.

16 juin 1946

À Berlin, la confusion touche à sa fin

Comme conséquence du tumulte créé à Berlin ces derniers jours par des informations parues dans la presse russe et contredites par les journaux paraissant dans les secteurs anglais et américains et selon lesquelles la commission inter-alliée de dénazification avait acquitté Wilhelm Furtwängler des charges de collaboration avec le régime hitlérien, on indiquait aujourd'hui que Furtwängler apparaîtra ici dans un jour ou deux, pour clarification de son cas. Il vit actuellement en Suisse.

La semaine dernière, une annonce qui a jeté la confusion donna l'impression que le Docteur Furtwängler dirigeait en personne la Philharmonie de Berlin, alors que la musique provenait d'un enregistrement.

2. Dénazification à Berlin

10 décembre 1946

Furtwängler en procès

Wilhelm Furtwängler doit comparaître demain devant une cour de dénazification de 9 membres pour être blanchi afin de reprendre son activité à Berlin. L'affaire contre l'ancien directeur de la Philharmonie de Berlin, âgé de 61 ans, a été très fortement discutée par les officiels du Gouvernement militaire américain qui ont fait remarquer qu'il avait exercé la fonction de Conseiller d'État prussien, nommé par Hermann Göring pour l'informer des affaires musicales, qu'il reçut un salaire pour ce travail et qu'il dirigea à l'étranger des tournées que les Nazis organisèrent à des fins de propagande. Les autorités russes d'occupation ont donné leur accord tacite à des campagnes organisées par des groupes culturels allemands afin de « faire revenir » Furtwängler.

11 décembre 1946

Les liens avec les Nazis niés par Furtwängler

(Delbert Clark)

Wilhelm Furtwängler comparait aujourd'hui devant un tribunal allemand. Dans une petite pièce bondée et surchauffée située en secteur britannique de Berlin, 150 personnes ont écouté le chef d'orchestre allemand essayer de prouver l'inexactitude des jugements de ses pairs.

Les charges contre lui sont nombreuses. Il avait accepté le poste de Conseiller d'État proposé par Hermann Göring, avait été Président de la Chambre de Musique du « Reich » et directeur de la Philharmonie de Berlin sous le régime nazi. Il avait aussi obtenu la démission et le retrait d'un critique qui avait osé dire du bien d'un chef d'orchestre plus jeune. À toutes les charges sauf la dernière, Furtwängler répondit par des excuses ou des éclaircissements. En ce qui concerne la dernière, il fit un démenti général sans justifier l'évidence. À la fin de la séance de ce jour, le procès fut suspendu afin de trouver un témoin oculaire qui pourrait éclairer la dernière accusation. Tout au long de son audition, Furtwängler parut nerveux et peu sûr de lui. Au fur et à mesure que le procès avançait, ses réponses devenaient de moins en moins rapides, comme s'il cherchait ses mots et parfois, il bégaya presque. À l'opposé, l'attitude du Président du Tribunal parut correcte.

L'accusé expliqua qu'il lui était impossible de se démettre de son poste de Conseiller, Hermann Göring l'ayant nommé et étant seul apte à l'écartier. Il affirma qu'il s'était démis des postes de Président de la Chambre de Musique et de directeur de la Philharmonie après une discussion avec Josef Goebbels à propos des musiciens juifs. Quelques minutes plus tard cependant, Hans von Bendar (sic), ancien administrateur de la Philharmonie et témoin de la défense, lâcha une affirmation selon laquelle Furtwängler s'était démis car ses nombreuses absences comme chef-invité dans d'autres pays l'avaient mis dans l'impossibilité de poursuivre comme chef-permanent de la Philharmonie.

Le procès atteignit son paroxysme lorsque Monsieur von Bendar (sic), soutenu par l'intendant du « Staatsoper », fit une déposition selon laquelle, lorsque le critique von der Müll (sic) avait loué exagérément Herbert von Karajan comme chef de cette maison d'Opéra, le Docteur Furtwängler avait demandé que l'Opéra et la direction de l'Orchestre punissent Monsieur von der Müll. Après qu'ils aient refusé d'agir ainsi, il fut témoigné sous serment que le Docteur Furtwängler intervint personnellement, avec comme conséquence que le critique fut enrôlé dans l'armée.

L'accusé nia que le critique ait été incorporé. Il insista sur le fait que l'incident n'était pas grave et accusa l'article en question d'avoir fait partie d'une campagne officielle organisée pour le discréditer. D'autres témoins furent en désaccord sur ce point.

17 décembre 1946

Furtwängler est blanchi de l'accusation de corruption nazie

Le Docteur Furtwängler a été acquitté ce soir de l'accusation de Nazisme par un tribunal d'artistes de son propre pays. Le verdict du tribunal de dénazification doit être confirmé par les autorités alliées avant que Furtwängler puisse reprendre sa carrière de chef de la Philharmonie de Berlin.

Mettant en évidence le fait que Furtwängler avait aidé des artistes juifs pour ne pas aller en camp de concentration, le tribunal affirma que Furtwängler avait volontairement renoncé au titre honorifique de Conseiller d'État prussien en 1934 et avait plus tard évité de prêter sa notoriété aux fonctions nazies.

L'audition débuta la semaine dernière par une déclaration du tribunal selon laquelle Furtwängler n'avait jamais été membre du Part nazi mais qu'il ferait des investigations pour savoir s'il avait permis à la propagande nazie d'abuser de sa notoriété. En refusant de permettre au chef d'orchestre de reprendre sa carrière sans procès en dénazification, les autorités culturelles américaines affirmèrent que les Nazis avaient utilisé ses tournées à l'étranger comme un moyen de propagande. D'un autre côté, les Russes avaient montré de la partialité envers Furtwängler et avaient soutenu les organismes culturels locaux demandant qu'il soit autorisé à reprendre son travail.

3 Juifs ont certifié aujourd'hui que Furtwängler avait risqué sa vie pour les protéger. L'un d'eux était Paul Heizberg, ancien directeur d'Opéra. Les 2 autres étaient des membres de la Philharmonie. Furtwängler certifia qu'il avait fui Berlin en janvier 1945, après avoir été averti qu'il était suspecté de complicité dans l'attentat à la bombe contre Adolf Hitler.

Dans une défense passionnée, il déclara :

« L'Art doit se placer au-dessus de la politique. »

29 décembre 1946

Bien qu'acquitté, la position morale du chef d'orchestre laisse des doutes sur son dossier

(Delbert Clark)

Le mardi 17 décembre 1946, Wilhelm Furtwängler fut acquitté d'activités nazies par le tribunal de dénazification de Berlin. Ce fut un grand jour pour le Docteur Furtwängler, si l'on n'est pas trop précis dans l'appréciation des valeurs morales. Le tribunal l'a acquitté sur la base de preuves insuffisantes mais, peut-être inconsciemment, le déclara coupable d'une autre faute qui n'est pas punissable par la Loi.

Cette faute se situait dans la même catégorie que celle commise par Beniamino Gigli en Italie et Richard Strauß en Allemagne : une infraction aux valeurs morales et aux principes établis qu'il voulait utiliser un régime qu'il prétendait lui être odieux pour le maintenir dans un état de confort et de sécurité et pour éloigner tout concurrent potentiel pour ce poste. Une authentique activité nazie est passible des lois de ces tribunaux mais un manque de sens moral n'est pas encore un crime.

Dans ce procès qui dura 2 jours, les charges avec preuves étaient les suivantes : le Docteur Furtwängler qui avait coutume d'être acclamé comme le plus grand chef d'orchestre allemand, avait été nommé Conseiller d'État honorifique par Hermann Göring et avait continué son activité comme Président de la Chambre de Musique de Berlin durant une partie du régime hitlérien. Dans les charges sans preuves, il avait été intime avec le Ministère de la Propagande, si ce n'est avec Goebbels lui-même, et avait utilisé cette intimité pour punir un critique berlinois qui avait osé encenser le jeune chef d'orchestre Herbert von Karajan.

Pour ce qui concerne les charges avec preuve, Furtwängler affirma qu'il lui était manifestement impossible de démissionner de son poste de Conseiller puisque Göring l'avait nommé et que lui seul pouvait le relever de ses fonctions.

Il prétendit qu'il avait abandonné cette fonction à la suite d'une discussion avec Goebbels à propos du maintien des musiciens juifs. Mais l'ancien administrateur de la Philharmonie qui avait témoigné comme témoin de la défense et qui n'avait pas entendu la déposition de Furtwängler, lui rendit un bien mauvais service en affirmant que le chef d'orchestre était dans l'impossibilité de poursuivre son activité administrative à cause de la pression de ses engagements en dehors de l'Allemagne comme chef-invité.

Il n'est pas clair s'il a protégé quelques musiciens pour des raisons d'amitié personnelle ou d'opposition au régime nazi. Cependant, le fait de dire d'un allemand : « Quelques-uns de ses meilleurs amis étaient juifs » est souvent considéré comme une preuve formelle qu'il n'était pas nazi.

Pour ce qui concerne la charge sans preuve, le fond était que von der Nüll, critique musical du « Berliner Zeitung », avait en 1938 porté Karajan aux nues et suggéré que les chefs d'orchestre de 50 ans devraient apprendre de lui. La référence à Furtwängler était inévitable. Parce qu'elle était extravagante et évoquait « le miracle Karajan », cette critique fut connue dans les cercles musicaux berlinois sous le sobriquet de « Wunderkritik » et devint une cause célèbre.

Il fut définitivement établi que Furtwängler demanda à la direction de l'Orchestre et du « Staatsoper » de faire quelque chose pour punir von der Nüll mais les 2 refusèrent. Après une journée de dénégations, Furtwängler admit en fin de compte avoir demandé au Ministère de la Propagande de mettre un frein à l'activité de von der Nüll. Furtwängler prétendit avoir agi ainsi parce que la critique de von der Nüll faisait partie de la campagne de persécution machinée par Hermann Göring qui voulait se débarrasser de lui. Il fut clairement établi que von der Nüll, qui n'était pas blanc comme neige, était un ami personnel de Göring. Le procès tourna alors autour d'un débat sur 2 questions :

1) Furtwängler a-t-il réussi à ce que von der Nüll soit puni ?

2) Est-ce que son comportement avait été celui d'un artiste hypersensible qui s'était senti insulté ou bien celui d'une homme très puissant qui désirait annihiler toute rivalité, cependant légitime ?

Il apparut très vite que le seul témoin qui pouvait répondre à ces questions était von der Nüll en personne mais il était prisonnier de guerre en Belgique, prétendument parce que Furtwängler l'avait fait enrôler dans l'armée. Cependant, l'un des derniers témoins fut une grassouillette et attendrissante femme de ménage, l'épouse de von der Nüll, qui n'avait pas eu de nouvelles de son mari depuis la fin de la Guerre et qui ne savait pas s'il était vivant ou mort. De manière timide, presque inaudible, elle affirma avoir entendu parler du « Wunderkritik » mais ceci ayant été écrit avant son mariage, elle ne connaissait aucun détail de l'affaire. Non, elle ne voyait aucun lien entre la colère olympienne de Furtwängler et l'enrôlement de son mari car un délai de 2 ans s'était écoulé entre les 2 incidents et entre temps, le « Berliner Zeitung » avait cessé de paraître.

C'est ainsi que le volet principal du procès contre Furtwängler s'effondra parce qu'un homme, vivant ou mort, qui aurait pu défendre la dénazification était introuvable et que personne d'autre ne connaissait les faits. Vers la fin du procès, il sembla que le tribunal accepta la thèse selon laquelle Furtwängler fut infructueux dans ses tentatives pour punir le critique, par conséquent, il était innocent, et que si Karajan n'était pas un aussi grand chef que le critique l'affirma, les tentatives n'étaient donc pas justifiées. Il devint manifeste que ce grand et vieil homme chauve, aux rares cheveux blancs, serait acquitté. Selon les stricts critères de preuve d'une Cour des États-Unis, il est plus que probable qu'il aurait été acquitté. Pourtant, d'un bout à l'autre du procès, son attitude fut rarement celle d'un opposant au régime, en dépit de ses déclarations. Il mentionnait le « Führer » et utilisait l'épithète officiel nazi en référence, la République de Weimar. Le terme de « République de Weimar » était interdit par Hitler et remplacé par le mot « Systemzeit » . (*)

Et c'est ce mot que Furtwängler utilisait jusqu'à ce qu'un membre de la Cour ne lance vertement :

« Pourriez-vous arrêter d'utiliser ce mot ? C'est quelque chose que nous voulons tous oublier. »

Furtwängler répondit :

« Oh. Était-ce une phrase nazie ? Je n'en étais pas informé. »

Une autre fois, sur un ton presque sarcastique, il cita les mots « République de Weimar » , ce qui parut amuser le public qui remplissait la salle d'audience.

Un autre membre de la Cour chercha à savoir avec emportement la raison de sa gaieté :

« Quelle est la raison de ce rire idiot ? »

Les témoins de moralité fournirent de nombreuses dépositions sur le refus de Furtwängler de figurer dans un film de propagande. Un critique, Werner Fiedler, ayant écrit un article défavorable au film en question où Richard Strauß remplaçait Furtwängler, immédiatement, il affirma qu'il fut appelé par le chef d'orchestre pour discuter de la nécessité de la critique en général. Cependant, dit-il, Furtwängler, en fin de compte, reconnut que la critique est nécessaire si l'art veut survivre.

À la fin du procès, Furtwängler se leva, de grande taille, mince, sûr de lui, avec l'air d'un Jésus gothique et s'adressa à ses admirateurs :

« Je ne regrette pas d'avoir agi ainsi pour les allemands et l'Allemagne. Je savais que cela valait la peine d'agir ainsi. »

Ce discours final donna lieu à des applaudissements enthousiastes pour lesquels il manifesta sa gratitude en saluant comme au bon vieux temps.

Il est parti en Suisse pour attendre la décision de la « Kommandantur » alliée. Auparavant, il avait dit que son désir était de voir son nom blanchi et non pas de diriger. Selon des collègues, cela signifiait qu'il ne souhaitait pas être le chef permanent de la Philharmonie de Berlin, seulement de diriger 10 concerts par an comme chef-invité.

* « Systemzeit » : terme négatif utilisé par les Nazis pour désigner la République de Weimar dont ils combattaient la jeune démocratie allemande.

Commentaire

Clark se trompe quand il affirme que Hans von Benda était un témoin de la défense ; au contraire, il était un témoin de l'accusation en sa qualité de membre du Parti nazi !

En ce qui concerne l'assistance de Furtwängler aux musiciens juifs, plusieurs d'entre eux et des membres de leurs familles étaient présents le second jour du procès et tous témoignèrent en sa faveur. Un membre du tribunal avait essayé d'établir que Furtwängler n'était intervenu qu'en faveur de musiciens fameux, tels Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter, Arnold Schönberg, etc. Cette affirmation fut contredite par des membres du personnel de la Philharmonie de Berlin et de leurs familles et, plus particulièrement, par le violoniste Mark Leuschner qui déclara :

« Furtwängler est intervenu à ma demande bien avant d'avoir eu des informations sur moi comme artiste. Il a continué à me protéger durant 4 années ; en fait, il m'a protégé sans répit. Après chaque répétition et chaque concert, il était assailli par des gens dans ma situation. C'était très dangereux pour lui mais il nous a aidés malgré cela. »

Dans l'affaire du critique von der Nüll, il ne fut nullement prouvé qu'il était prisonnier de guerre en Belgique. Il fut prouvé, par contre, qu'il n'y avait aucune relation entre la protestation de Furtwängler en mai 1939 et l'incorporation du critique dans l'armée. C'est l'attaché de presse du « Staatsoper », le Docteur Julius Kapp, qui donna la véritable raison de la campagne anti-Furtwängler. Il affirma qu'un ami personnel de von der Nüll, le Docteur Westphal, lui avait dit que c'était le ministre Göring qui était à l'origine de cette campagne, ce qui fut confirmé par un fameux critique de théâtre berlinois, Werner Fiedler. Mais le témoignage le plus important et le plus détaillé vint d'une collègue du critique, Madame Anneliese Wiener (qui n'était pas « aryenne »).

Elle déclara :

« Von der Nüll souhaitait non seulement écrire des articles mais influencer la vie musicale par ses opinions controversées. Dans le 3e « Reich », cela était quasiment impossible si l'on n'était pas protégé « d'en haut ». Il me parlait sans cesse de Furtwängler comme d'un chef « appartenant à la génération passée », « que son temps était fini » et que c'était au tour de gens comme Karajan de le remplacer. Von der Nüll me dit souvent que « ses combats pour Karajan et contre Furtwängler » étaient inséparables et avaient le soutien des milieux proches de Göring. Ce qui signifie que lui, von der Nüll, était encouragé par ces milieux et que le projet de Göring consistait à « jouer Karajan contre Furtwängler ». Dans une telle situation, il est compréhensible que Furtwängler fut obligé d'interpréter comme un affront personnel les attaques dirigées contre lui. Faire taire un critique local était éloigné de ses pensées et en raison de sa réputation internationale, il n'avait pas besoin d'agir ainsi. Tout ceci n'était pas le fait d'un critique isolé mais d'un groupe agissant contre lui de manière dictatoriale. »

Madame Wiener ajoute :

« Von der Nüll n'est pas allé au front mais a pris la direction d'un service de la « Luftwaffe ». Son travail consistait à organiser des spectacles pour les troupes. Il a occupé ce poste à Berlin durant pratiquement toute la durée de la Guerre et est allé volontairement au front en 1945. »

Elle cita également l'agent de concerts Körtling qui avait découvert von der Nüll mort à la suite des combats de Potsdam. Quant au terme « Systemzeit », Madame Wiener affirma :

« Ce mot est beaucoup plus ancien que l'ère nazie. Je me souviens très bien avoir entendu ce mot prononcé par des gens âgés après la Première Guerre mondiale. C'était un terme populaire et automatique. »

Enfin, le film de Verhøven, réalisé sous le patronage de Goebbels, est une histoire falsifiée de la Philharmonie de Berlin. Werner Fiedler avait fait une critique négative de ce film, à tel point que Verhøven demanda que Fiedler soit arrêté. Furtwängler fut tellement enchanté par cet article qu'il souhaita rencontrer son auteur : la rencontre eut lieu à la fin de décembre 1944, à une époque où la vie des 2 hommes était en danger.

20 avril 1947

Les Allemands absolvent Furtwängler

(Kathleen McLaughlin)

Seules les signatures officielles manquent à l'heure actuelle en vue du retour sur le podium du célèbre chef d'orchestre, le Docteur Wilhelm Furtwängler, à la suite de son acquittement comme collaborateur nazi. Son acquittement par une commission allemande a été ratifié il y a 2 jours par une « Kommandantur » alliée, a-t-on appris ce soir. Le 1er concert de Furtwängler en tant qu'ancien chef de la Philharmonie de Berlin aura lieu sous les auspices des Nations Unies, plus avant dans la saison, probablement en juillet. Yehudi Menuhin donnera le 1er d'une série de concerts sous la direction de Furtwängler. Selon des sources de bonne foi, Monsieur Menuhin en a fait la condition de son accord. (*)

Aucune personnalité publique plus controversée que le Docteur Furtwängler n'a encore été impliquée dans le programme chargé de dénazification en Allemagne. Ses adversaires des 2 côtés de l'Atlantique ont été nombreux et agressifs. Des protestations se sont élevées contre sa future venue aux États-Unis.

Tandis qu'une considérable amertume s'est faite jour en Allemagne comme issue de son procès devant un tribunal allemand de dénazification, la majorité des allemands préconisait son retour à son ancien poste. Son éminente position dans les milieux musicaux allemands et son importante réputation internationale le rendirent cher aux yeux du public qui répugnait à perdre son leadership, sans se soucier de son association reconnue avec le régime nazi.

Ses adversaires étaient principalement des éléments anti-nazis. Ils prétendent que son retour à la vie publique en tant que chef d'orchestre aura un résultat opposé sur le tout le programme de poursuites judiciaires contre les activistes nazis et créera une atmosphère faite d'un manque de sincérité qui ne peut être justifiée. Le Docteur Furtwängler a déjà été avisé en privé de son acquittement futur et a admis qu'il n'attendait que ce mot avant d'accepter de juteux contrats avec la BBC de Londres et l'Amérique.

* Yehudi Menuhin jouera le Concerto de Beethoven sous la direction de Furtwängler, d'abord au Festival de Lucerne (30 août 1947) , puis à Berlin (28 et 29 septembre 1947) .

29 avril 1947

Furtwängler blanchi

La « Kommandantur » alliée quadri-partite a déclaré aujourd'hui que Wilhelm Furtwängler pouvait reprendre immédiatement ses activités musicales. Le comité de dénazification a approuvé le verdict d'une Cour allemande qui, en décembre dernier, a blanchi le chef de 61 ans, de l'accusation de coopération avec les Nazis. Monsieur Furtwängler a déclaré vivre en Suisse où il a passé la majeure partie de son temps depuis la fin de la Guerre. La décision mit un terme à 18 mois de chahut autour du droit de Furtwängler à reprendre les concerts. Les autorités russes ont annoncé sa relaxe à plusieurs reprises, simplement pour que le gouvernement militaire des États-Unis fasse en sorte que son procès se déroule sans irrégularité. Le veto des États-Unis prit fin quand un tribunal de dénazification de Berlin le déclara innocent, il y a 4 mois de cela.

Conclusion

S'il fallait brièvement résumer les péripéties des 2 procès en dénazification que Furtwängler dut endurer, nous pourrions dire ceci : à Vienne, le Gouvernement autrichien recommanda sa réhabilitation en mars 1946, ce qui fut totalement ignoré par le Gouvernement militaire américain. La promesse de McClure selon laquelle l'affaire Furtwängler serait réglée « en quelques semaines », ne fut jamais tenue : l'affaire s'éternisa et dura 18 mois, c'est-à-dire bien après que la majorité de ses collègues aient repris leur carrière (*). En juin 1946, une seconde commission fut créée par les Alliés à Berlin afin de faire des investigations sur le cas Furtwängler. Cette seconde commission demanda également la réhabilitation immédiate du chef allemand qui fut rejetée par les services du Général McClure et transformée en une commission de dénazification, pour laquelle il n'y avait aucun fondement légal. En effet, cette procédure ne concernait que les membres du Parti nazi cherchant un emploi. Furtwängler n'aurait jamais dû être appelé devant une telle juridiction. Les mois passèrent. En Suisse où il résidait, la presse de gauche continua ses attaques contre lui malgré la défense publique de l'ami Ernest Ansermet. Furtwängler écrivit à son ancien collègue Fritz Zweig qui vivait à Los Angeles :

« En raison de pressions venues de New York, les décisions de la commission d'investigation ne seront pas rendues publiques. Je suis empêché de diriger en Allemagne et à l'étranger. Qui a réellement intérêt à cette situation ? C'est la question que je suis obligé de me poser. »

Comme dans le cas de Willem Mengelberg qui, après la Guerre, fut banni et exilé dans son chalet en Suisse, Furtwängler dut faire face à une justice « 2 poids, 2 mesures ». Il ne pourra de nouveau diriger qu'en avril 1947 (c'est-à-dire après plus de 2 ans d'inactivité), non pas en Allemagne mais en Italie. Son retour à Berlin aura lieu le 25 mai, dans un programme entièrement dédié à son « cher » Beethoven, et sera triomphal.

* Ainsi, Herbert von Karajan, qui avait possédé 2 cartes de membre du Parti nazi, dirigea de nouveau en septembre-octobre 1945 à Trieste, et en janvier 1946 à Vienne.

La solitude et le soutien de grands musiciens juifs

Arrivé en Suisse, la situation de Furtwängler était très difficile. Tout d'abord, lui et sa famille étaient totalement dépendants matériellement d'amis qui les accueillirent durant les mois suivants. En effet, contrairement à une rumeur qui fut propagée dès cette époque par une partie de la presse helvétique, Furtwängler ne s'était pas du tout enrichi « colossalement » grâce aux Nazis. Bien au contraire, comme il n'avait plus de poste officiel, il touchait peu d'honoraires. D'autre part, Furtwängler refusa systématiquement les « cadeaux » qu'Adolf Hitler et Josef Goebbels voulurent faire à « leur Dirigent ». Entre autres, Goebbels voulut lui offrir une bague d'ivoire et d'or ainsi qu'une rente annuelle à vie de 40,000 Reichsmarks en 1936 pour ses 50 ans et Hitler voulut offrir une maison à Furtwängler en 1943 pour son second mariage avec Elisabeth, le 26 juin 1943 à Potsdam. Les problèmes financiers sont évoqués dans le livre de cette dernière sur son mari. Ces amis semblèrent toutefois très heureux de subvenir aux besoins matériels d'un si illustre invité. Il se rendit d'abord dans la clinique du controversé docteur Paul Niehans. D'autre part, alors que Fürtwängler avait dû lutter depuis 1933 contre le régime hitlérien et que les Nazis souhaitaient à l'époque le tuer comme traître, une partie de la presse helvétique se déchaîna immédiatement contre la venue de Fürtwängler qui était considéré par eux désormais, et alors qu'il était très souvent venu en Suisse les années précédentes, comme un collaborateur nazi indésirable. Comme sa femme Elisabeth le raconta, le 2e combat de sa vie débuta, interminable, celui pour sa réhabilitation. Les autorités helvétiques acceptèrent qu'il reste en Suisse mais à la condition expresse qu'il ne s'exprime pas publiquement. Cela l'empêcha de répondre aux attaques très violentes, et souvent calomnieuses, dont il faisait l'objet désormais dans le monde entier surtout depuis que l'horreur absolue des camps d'extermination avait été révélée. Cette annonce rendait tout ce qui touchait de près ou de loin au régime nazi désormais insupportable. Elisabeth Fürtwängler raconta le choc que représenta la découverte de ces camps par Fürtwängler en 1945 : il en comprit d'autant plus l'extrême gravité qu'ils avaient clairement été organisés « au nom de l'Allemagne » comme il le dit et, donc, que cela touchait le cœur de son univers spirituel. Fürtwängler se retrouva alors dans une situation dramatique car il se rendit compte que les Nazis, après avoir voulu usurper l'héritage de la « vraie Allemagne », celle de Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Friedrich von Schiller et Ludwig van Beethoven, avaient commis de tels crimes que les « vrais Allemands » auxquels il s'était toujours identifié, qui n'étaient pas nazis et étaient les héritiers de la « vraie Allemagne », allaient devoir porter eux aussi la responsabilité de ces actes. Cette question l'obséda en 1945 comme on le voit dans plusieurs pages de ses carnets personnels datées de cette année :

« L'Allemagne n'était pas une Allemagne nazie, mais une Allemagne dominée par les Nazis. Rendre un peuple tout entier responsable des crimes commis dans les camps de concentration, c'est utiliser le schéma de pensée des Nazis. Eux qui, pour la 1re fois, ont défini et appliqué la notion de responsabilité collective dans la question juive. Je n'ai jamais compris la responsabilité collective. L'antisémitisme m'est aussi incompréhensible que le Nazisme. À l'extérieur de notre pays, on n'a pas idée de l'aversion que ce système politique provoquait chez les hommes droits, en Allemagne depuis longtemps déjà. Je connais le National-Socialisme réellement. Je sais ce dont ce système de violence et de terreur était capable. Et je sais combien le peuple allemand était en réalité loin de ce phénomène horrible, sorti de ses propres entrailles. Sinon je ne serais pas resté en Allemagne. Le fait que je sois resté est la meilleure preuve qu'il y a une autre Allemagne. »

Comme dans toutes les périodes de désespoir, Fürtwängler se réfugia dans la composition : il finit sa 2e Symphonie et commença sa 3e. Cependant, plusieurs musiciens du plus haut niveau le comprirent immédiatement et prirent sa défense : en 1945, Yehudi Menuhin envoya un télégramme, resté très célèbre, au général Robert A. McClure qui était représentant du gouvernement américain dans Berlin occupé :

Conscient de l'aide que Fürtwängler avait apporté à de nombreux juifs et de son opposition au Nazisme, Yehudi Menuhin vint dès 1947 à Berlin pour jouer avec Fürtwängler les plus grands Concertos du répertoire pour violon. Arnold Schönberg demanda à Fürtwängler en 1933 de rester en Allemagne « pour sauver l'honneur de la musique allemande » .

« À moins que vous ne déteniez des documents compromettants vous permettant d'étayer vos accusations à l'encontre de Fürtwängler, je me verrai forcé d'exprimer avec véhémence mon désaccord quant à la décision que vous avez prise de lui interdire de diriger. Cet homme n'a jamais été membre du Parti, n'a occupé aucune fonction officielle après avoir démissionné de sa propre initiative de ses fonctions directoriales auprès de son orchestre. En de nombreuses occasions, il a risqué sa vie et sa réputation en intervenant pour protéger amis et musiciens de son orchestre. Je ne crois pas que le fait de rester dans son pays, surtout pour se consacrer au travail qui était le sien et qui ressemblait à une sorte de « croix rouge » spirituelle ou à une mission pastorale, soit de nature à justifier une condamnation. Bien au contraire. En tant que militaire, vous devriez savoir que rester à son poste requiert parfois davantage de courage que prendre la fuite. Il a sauvé la meilleure part qui puisse être de rédemption dans la culture allemande. Ne sommes-nous pas, nous les Alliés, infiniment plus responsables d'avoir consenti, et cela de notre plein gré, à pactiser avec ces monstres jusqu'à la dernière minute, quand finalement nous nous sommes précipités sans grand esprit chevaleresque dans ce combat, sauf bien sûr, la France et l'Angleterre qui ont eu le courage de déclarer la guerre avant d'être elles-mêmes attaquées ? Je suis convaincu qu'il est gravement injuste et lâche de notre part de faire de Fürtwängler la victime expiatoire de nos propres crimes. Si cet homme dorénavant vieux et malade est prêt et impatient de se réatteler à sa tâche et à ses lourdes responsabilités, il devrait y être encouragé, car c'est précisément dans ce Berlin dont il est l'enfant qu'il peut être le plus utile. Si ce pays moribond parvenait à redevenir un membre honorable de la communauté des nations civilisées, ce serait grâce à des hommes, comme Fürtwängler, qui ont prouvé qu'ils étaient capables de sauver au moins une partie de leur âme. Ce n'est pas en les étouffant que vous parviendrez à vos fins. Vous auriez alors commis un acte de vandalisme aussi réel que celui de nature plus évidente qui consiste à lacérer des tableaux ou à massacrer des églises. »

De même, Arnold Schönberg, qui avait lui-même conseillé à Fürtwängler de rester en Allemagne pour « sauver l'honneur de la musique allemande », écrivit dans une lettre du 24 janvier 1946 à Kurt List un résumé de la psychologie de Fürtwängler d'une déconcertante pertinence :

« Je suis d'accord avec vous sur Fürtwängler. Je suis sûr qu'il n'a jamais été Nazi. Il était l'un de ces vieux « Deutsche-nationale » de l'époque de Turvater Jahn, où l'on était nationaliste à cause de ces pays occidentaux qui s'étaient alliés à Napoléon. C'est plutôt une affaire de « Studenten-nationalismus » qui diffère beaucoup de l'époque de Bismarck et des suivantes où l'Allemagne n'était plus sur la défensive, mais un conquérant. Je suis également sûr qu'il n'était pas antisémite, du moins pas plus que tout autre non-Juif. Et c'est certainement un meilleur musicien que tous ces Toscanini, Ormandy, Koussevitzky et tous les autres. Il a un véritable talent et il AIME la musique. »

Curt Rieß, Berta Geißmar, le procès et l'acquittement

Fürtwängler ne relevait pas des « commissions de dénazification ». En effet, il n'avait jamais été membre du Parti Nazi et avait démissionné en 1934 de toute fonction officielle. Le seul titre qui lui restait était celui purement honorifique de « Staatsrat » de Prusse. Herman Göring l'avait nommé à ce titre, le 8 juillet 1933, sans lui demander son avis. Fürtwängler avait démissionné de ce poste en 1934 mais Göring avait refusé sa démission.

Février 1946, Fürtwängler rencontra à Vienne un juif allemand du nom de Curt Rieß qui avait fui l'Allemagne en 1933.

Ce dernier était musicien et écrivain, il écrivit d'ailleurs plus tard un livre sur Fürtwängler. Rieß était alors journaliste et correspondant en Suisse pour des journaux américains. Il pensait que Fürtwängler était un collaborateur nazi et s'était opposé à ce que Fürtwängler dirige en Suisse en 1945. Fürtwängler demanda à le rencontrer et lorsque Rieß eut étudié tous les documents concernant Fürtwängler, il changea totalement d'avis. Comprenant que Fürtwängler n'avait jamais été Nazi et qu'il avait aidé de nombreuses personnes d'origine juive, il devint son « conseiller en dénazification ». Il s'ensuivit une longue amitié et Curt Rieß passa les 2 années suivantes à tout faire pour faire blanchir Fürtwängler. Comme Roger Smithson l'écrit en conclusion de son article « Fürtwängler, Les années de silence (1945-1947) » : « Finalement le retour de Fürtwängler à la direction d'orchestre fut très largement le résultat de l'habileté et de l'obstination de Curt Rieß. Les admirateurs de Fürtwängler ont envers lui une grande dette. » .

Fürtwängler voulait, au départ que Curt Rieß écrive des articles sur lui se fondant sur les nombreux documents qu'il lui avait fournis car Curt Rieß était journaliste. Cependant, Curt Rieß préféra aller lui-même rencontrer le général Robert A. McClure qui était chargé du dossier de Fürtwängler. Le général, après avoir rencontré Rieß et avoir fait traduire en anglais tous les documents reconnut qu'aucune charge sérieuse ne pouvait être retenue contre Fürtwängler et qu'ils avaient fait une erreur concernant le chef d'orchestre qui était quelqu'un de très bien. Il demanda à Rieß de bien dire à Fürtwängler de ne surtout pas parler à la presse pour ne pas donner l'impression qu'il exerçait des pressions sur les forces alliées. Il déclara que l'affaire serait classée en quelques semaines. Rieß envoya un télégramme à Fürtwängler dans ce sens mais le télégramme mit énormément de temps à arriver à destination et arriva trop tard.

En effet, entretemps, Fürtwängler avait réalisé un impair très grave : il s'était rendu à Berlin qui était occupé par les Soviétiques. Ces derniers le reçurent comme un chef d'État car ils souhaitaient récupérer celui qu'Arsenyi Gouliga, le représentant de l'Union soviétique au procès Fürtwängler, appelait le « plus grand chef du monde » pour mener une grande politique culturelle à Berlin-Est sur fond de rivalité avec les États-Unis. Précisément, les Soviétiques proposèrent le poste de direction du « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » qui était en zone soviétique à Fürtwängler. Le général Robert A. McClure fut obligé de faire passer Fürtwängler par la procédure normale de dénazification. Il expliqua, en effet, à Curt Rieß, par téléphone, que sinon cela donnait l'impression que les Américains avaient cédé aux Soviétiques sur le dossier de Fürtwängler. Les autorités américaines savaient que le chef d'orchestre serait forcément blanchi par la cour de dénazification. D'autre part, les autorités soviétiques déclarèrent que ce procès n'avait aucun sens et était « ridicule ». Ainsi, sur fond de Guerre froide, Fürtwängler, qui souhaitait absolument récupérer l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin qui était en zone d'occupation britannique, fut obligé de passer par la cour de dénazification.

Lors de son procès, les charges d'accusations étaient très faibles : on lui reprochait une réflexion antisémite dirigée contre le chef d'orchestre Victor de Sabata. L'accusation lui reprocha, en effet, d'avoir dit lors d'une dispute avec un autre musicien allemand qu' « un Juif comme Sabata ne peut pas jouer de la musique de Brahms ». Cette histoire tourna vite au ridicule : Fürtwängler avait joué de la musique de Brahms avec de nombreux musiciens juifs (en particulier ceux de son orchestre) . Il s'agissait soit d'une erreur soit d'un malentendu : Fürtwängler avait probablement aucun sentiment antisémite vis-à-vis de Sabata. On lui reprochait son titre de « Staatsrat » dont les autorités alliées avaient compris très vite qu'il était vide de contenu pour Fürtwängler.

L'accusation lui reprocha aussi 2 concerts officiels. Fürtwängler déclara que pour 2 concerts qu'on lui avait « extorqués », il en avait évité 60. Le 1er concert est celui de Nuremberg du 5 septembre 1938. En fait, ce concert avait justement eu lieu la veille des journées du Parti Nazi car Fürtwängler avait exigé qu'il ne fasse pas partie officielle de l'évènement politique qui fut ouvert formellement le lendemain. Le 2e concert eut lieu le 3 février 1938 pour la jeunesse hitlérienne. Il s'agissait d'une longue série de concerts présentés à Fürtwängler comme un moyen d'intéresser la jeunesse à la musique Classique. Mais quand Fürtwängler réalisa que le concert prit une tournure officielle et que le public n'était pas formé que d'écoliers en uniforme mais de tous les dirigeants de la jeunesse hitlérienne, il refusa de diriger un second concert. Dans tous les cas, 2 concerts officiels reprochés par la cour de dénazification sur la période 1933-1945 représentaient très peu.

L'accusation avait cru détenir quelque chose de plus consistant car Hans von Benda, un ancien membre du Parti Nazi qui fut le directeur artistique de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin pendant la période nazie et donc fut en contact permanent avec Fürtwängler durant de nombreuses années, voulait absolument témoigner prétendant détenir des preuves irréfutables attestant que le chef d'orchestre avait été antisémite. Il se rétracta durant le procès, avouant avoir tout inventé et finissant par défendre Fürtwängler en disant qu'il n'avait jamais été antisémite. La raison du comportement de Hans von Benda était la suivante : il avait été renvoyé de son poste de directeur artistique de l'Orchestre de Berlin, le 22 décembre 1939, pour de nombreuses graves fautes professionnelles. Il avait souhaité saisir l'occasion du procès pour se venger de Fürtwängler l'estimant responsable de son renvoi car il aurait soutenu Karajan, version très vivement contestée par Fürtwängler et sa femme. De plus, l'historien Fred Prieberg a prouvé, qu'au contraire, Hans von Benda, à la différence de Heinz Tietjen, le directeur du Palais des Festivals de Bayreuth qui soutenait Fürtwängler dans sa lutte contre les Nazis, n'avait cessé d'envoyer des informations aux Nazis (pour le dénoncer) prouvant que Fürtwängler aidait des Juifs et s'opposait à leur politique. Le juge, Alex Vogel, un homme connu pour être un communiste, débuta le procès, le 12 décembre 1946, par ces phrases : « Les investigations ont montré que Fürtwängler n'a été membre d'aucune organisation nazie, qu'il a essayé d'aider les gens persécutés à cause de leur race, et qu'il a évité les formalités telles que le salut à Hitler. » .

L'accusation n'ayant pas beaucoup d'arguments, elle lança le procès sur une question annexe : l'affaire Van der Nüll. Ce dernier était le journaliste téléguidé par Göring qui avait écrit des articles sur Herbert von Karajan en 1938 pour faire de l'ombre à Fürtwängler. L'accusation émit l'hypothèse que Fürtwängler avait demandé à Gœbbels de punir Van der Nüll en l'envoyant sur le front russe où il serait mort. L'affaire épuisa une grande partie du temps des 2 jours du procès, mais ne mena à rien de concluant : Van der Nüll n'était pas mort mais prisonnier en Belgique et comme il s'était écoulé au moins 2 ans entre les articles et son séjour sur le front russe (l'opération « Barbarossa » débuta le 22 juin 1941) , il n'y avait probablement aucun rapport entre les articles sur Karajan de 1938 et le fait que Van der Nüll soit allé sur ce front. En fait, Van der Nüll ne s'était même pas battu sur le front russe : il avait volontairement demandé à aller en Russie où il avait organisé des concerts pour les soldats allemands.

2 des personnes principales qui préparèrent la défense de Fürtwängler pour son procès en dénazification étaient 2 juifs allemands qui avaient dû fuir le régime nazi : sa secrétaire Berta Geißmar et Curt Rieß. Les 2 avaient un parcours très différent. Berta Geißmar connaissait personnellement Fürtwängler et avait assisté à tous ses faits et gestes au début de la période nazie ; elle avait quitté l'Allemagne en 1936 mais était revenue d'exil. Curt Rieß ne connaissait pas du tout Fürtwängler et avait, au départ, un a priori très négatif sur le chef d'orchestre. Geißmar avait rassemblé des centaines de dossiers pour préparer la défense du chef d'orchestre, dossiers qui contenaient une liste de plus de 80 personnes juives ou non-juives qui avaient déclaré avoir été aidées ou sauvées par lui. Cette liste n'était pas exhaustive, mais elle concernait des cas où Geißmar avait réussi à trouver des preuves concrètes indiscutables. Parmi les nombreuses personnes concernées, il y avait des Communistes, des Sociaux-Démocrates, ainsi que d'anciens Nazis contre lesquels le régime s'était retourné. La liste contenait tous les musiciens juifs de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, Max Zweig, le neveu du chef d'orchestre Fritz Zweig, des solistes comme Carl Fleisch, dont le fils déclarera que c'était Fürtwängler qui avait prévenu sa famille des rafles vers les camps de concentration, Josef Krips, Arnold Schönberg, Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter, Max Reinhardt, Hans Knappertsbusch. Berta Geißmar avait transmis les documents au général Robert A. McClure chargé du procès Fürtwängler, mais les pièces ont mystérieusement disparu à Berlin, alors qu'elles devaient être remises au général de la zone d'occupation américaine. Curt Rieß ne retrouva pas non plus ces documents dans les archives de Washington. Fürtwängler se trouva donc sans moyen de prouver l'aide qu'il avait apporté à de nombreuses personnes. Néanmoins, 3 personnes d'origine juive avaient fait le déplacement à Berlin et ont certifié le 17 décembre 1946, 2e jour du procès, que Fürtwängler avait risqué sa vie pour les protéger. L'un d'eux était Paul Heizberg, ancien directeur d'Opéra. Les 2 autres étaient des membres de la Philharmonie.

Il fut aussi aidé dans sa défense par son ami le metteur-en-scène de théâtre Boleslaw Barlog, par le chef d'orchestre roumain Sergiù Celibidache et par des musiciens comme Hugo Strelitzer qui déclara :

« Si je suis vivant aujourd'hui, c'est grâce à ce grand homme. Fürtwängler a aidé et protégé de nombreux musiciens juifs et cette attitude prouve un grand courage car il le faisait sous les yeux des Nazis, en Allemagne même. L'histoire jugera cet homme. »

À la fin du procès, Fürtwängler déclara notamment :

« Ma répugnance d'être utilisé contre mon gré par la propagande National-Socialiste a dû pour moi s'effacer devant une préoccupation plus haute, qui était, dans la mesure de mes moyens, d'assurer la pérennité de la musique allemande et de continuer à faire de la musique avec des musiciens allemands, pour des auditeurs allemands. Ce peuple, celui de Bach et Beethoven, Mozart et Schubert, vivait sous un régime exclusivement voué à la guerre. Nul ne peut se permettre de juger ce qu'il se passait alors en Allemagne qui n'y aurait vécu à cette époque. Thomas Mann (qui était à l'époque très critique à l'encontre de Fürtwängler) pense-t-il réellement que Beethoven n'aurait plus dû être joué dans l'Allemagne de Himmler ? Ne peut-il comprendre que jamais désir et même besoin n'avaient été plus ardents et plus douloureux d'entendre Beethoven et son message de liberté et d'amour fraternel, de le vivre, que celui des Allemands placés sous la terreur de Himmler ? Je ne regrette pas d'être resté avec eux. »

L'accusation elle-même reconnaissant qu'aucune charge d'antisémitisme ou de sympathie pour l'idéologie nazie ne pouvait être retenue contre le chef d'orchestre, Fürtwängler fut acquitté le 17 décembre 1946. Précisément, il fut classé dans la catégorie, c'est-à-dire la catégorie « suivisme » qui ne donnait lieu à aucune poursuite.

Fürtwängler n'a jamais réussi à exprimer clairement les raisons pour lesquelles il resta en Allemagne, même au cours de son procès en dénazification car il eut, toute sa vie, des difficultés insurmontables à exprimer clairement sa pensée et à tenir un discours rationnel très cohérent. Elisabeth Fürtwängler a fourni nombre d'explications à ce sujet dans son livre sur son mari. Outre son attachement viscéral à l'Allemagne et à l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin, elle expliqua que de nombreux Allemands qui s'opposaient au régime nazi le suppliaient de rester en Allemagne. Si tous les grands personnages allemands qui n'étaient pas Nazis partaient, les chances qu'un changement politique se produise de l'intérieur devenaient impossibles. Certes, des personnalités comme Thomas Mann lui reprochèrent de rester sur place. Mais Fürtwängler se sentait totalement lié à ceux qu'il appelait sans arrêt les « vrais Allemands ». Berta Geißmar utilise ces mêmes termes avec la même signification à de nombreuses reprises dans son livre. Le fait qu'il soit resté pour les soutenir et les aider concrètement en sauvant même la vie de certains d'entre eux, juifs ou non-juifs, était infiniment plus important, à ses yeux, que de protester de l'extérieur. Il écrivit dans son journal personnel, en 1946, pour expliquer sa décision de rester dans son pays :

« Il y a 2 choses : l'amour de mon pays et de mon peuple, qui est un élément affectif et viscéral ; et le sentiment d'avoir ici une tâche à accomplir : remédier à l'injustice. C'est ici seulement que l'on combat pour l'âme allemande. Dehors, on ne fait que protester. Ce qui est à la portée de chacun. »

Le « boycott » de Chicago en 1948

Yehudi Menuhin considéra toujours que l'attitude de Fürtwängler pendant la période nazie avait été irréprochable.

L'année 1948 fut assombrie par un événement qui blessa vivement Fürtwängler. Il fut invité pour diriger l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago, la tournée étant prévue pour 1949 : il allait enfin pouvoir retourner pour la 1^{ère} fois aux États-Unis depuis 1927. En fait, Fürtwängler, qui avait été échaudé par les États-Unis en 1925-1927 et 1936 refusait d'y aller : c'est l'Orchestre de Chicago qui insista longuement pour qu'il vienne, promettant que tout se passerait bien. Il finit donc par accepter après de nombreuses hésitations. Mais un groupe de musiciens de 1^{er} plan incluant les principaux chefs d'orchestre actifs en Amérique du Nord comme Arturo Toscanini, George Szell, Eugene Ormandy, ou des musiciens tels que Jascha Heifetz, Isaac Stern, Vladimir Horowitz, Gregor Piatigorsky et Arthur Rubinstein organisèrent une campagne pour empêcher la venue de Fürtwängler et menacèrent de boycotter l'Orchestre de Chicago, car ils reprochaient à Fürtwängler d'être resté en Allemagne durant la période nazie. Arthur Rubinstein, qui avait perdu une grande partie de sa famille dans les camps d'extermination, déclara ainsi : « Si Fürtwängler avait été un vrai démocrate, il aurait tourné le dos à l'Allemagne comme le fit Thomas Mann. Fürtwängler est resté parce qu'il pensait que l'Allemagne gagnerait la guerre et, maintenant, il est en quête de dollars et de prestige en Amérique, et il ne mérite rien de tout cela. » .

Comme le violoniste Nathan Milstein ou d'autres musiciens juifs comme Bruno Walter ou Heinz Unger, Yehudi Menuhin fut scandalisé par cette cabale : « Je n'ai jamais rencontré d'attitude plus insolente que celle de ces 3 ou 4 meneurs qui déploient des efforts frénétiques pour exclure de leur terrain de chasse de prédilection un illustre collègue. Leur comportement m'inspire plus que du mépris. De tous les musiciens allemands, Fürtwängler est celui qui a opposé au Nazisme le plus de résistance. Il a été dénazifié, on n'a pas le droit de le juger encore et encore. » . Menuhin raconta, beaucoup plus tard, que certains des principaux meneurs lui avaient avoué qu'ils savaient parfaitement que Fürtwängler n'avait jamais été Nazi et qu'ils avaient organisé ce boycott par peur de la concurrence que représentait sa venue en Amérique. C'est également ce que pensait Curt Rieß à l'époque, qui écrivit : « On a peur de Fürtwängler, car on sait que, s'il revient aux États-Unis, on lui fera les meilleures offres. Les autres chefs d'orchestre savent qu'ils ont tout à perdre de sa venue ici. » .

Wilhelm Fürtwängler, qui dut annuler son voyage, fut profondément blessé par cette affaire comme en témoigne le texte qu'il écrivit dans ses carnets personnels en 1949 : « Cette protestation d'artistes contre un autre artiste est chose tout à fait nouvelle, une hérésie dans l'histoire de la musique. Elle bafoue la fonction d'un art unissant les peuples et servant la paix. Arthur Rubinstein ne me connaît pas car il saurait que c'est moi l'artiste resté en Allemagne, qui suis intervenu jusqu'à la fin en faveur de Juifs. »

Il fut particulièrement affecté par la participation de Gregor Piatigorsky qui avait fait ses débuts auprès de lui dans l'Orchestre de Berlin et avec qui il avait gardé une relation amicale jusqu'à la fin des années 1930, par courrier ou en le voyant hors d'Allemagne. En fait, c'est Fürtwängler qui avait lancé sa carrière internationale. Il l'avait rencontré dans un café russe de Berlin ; reconnaissant tout de suite son génie, il lui proposa le poste de 1er violoncelle de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, poste qu'il occupa de 1924 à 1929. Piatigorsky revint, en partie, sur sa position sur Fürtwängler dans son autobiographie, reconnaissant que Fürtwängler était un musicien hors norme.

Le « bouc émissaire »

Aucun artiste allemand n'a été autant critiqué que Fürtwängler pour être resté en Allemagne durant la période nazie. Fred Prieberg a analysé les nombreuses attaques contre Fürtwängler expliquant que le phénomène était particulièrement étonnant : Fürtwängler fut infiniment moins compromis avec le régime nazi que des musiciens comme Richard Strauß et surtout Herbert von Karajan. D'autre part, toutes les sources, en particulier celles provenant de Juifs allemands ou des dirigeants nazis, prouvent que Fürtwängler a combattu sans arrêt la politique raciale des Nazis et aidé de nombreuses personnes juives. Fred Prieberg a expliqué que Fürtwängler a fait l'objet d'un phénomène de « bouc émissaire » .

Yehudi Menuhin avait déjà parfaitement pressenti ce qui allait se passer lorsqu'il avait déclaré dans son télégramme en 1945 au général Robert A. McClure qu'il serait « gravement injuste » que Fürtwängler serve de « victime expiatoire de nos propres crimes » . Comme Fred K. Prieberg, Audrey Roncigli et Yehudi Menuhin l'ont remarqué : on a reproché à Fürtwängler d'avoir « pactisé avec le diable » , or c'est exactement ce qu'ont fait les puissances alliées (démocraties occidentales et Union soviétique) avant d'être précipitées de force dans le conflit. Alors que ces dernières avaient le pouvoir d'arrêter Hitler, Fürtwängler a fait ce qui était possible à son échelle c'est-à-dire en protégeant et aidant des musiciens allemands.

Fred Prieberg a analysé de nombreux exemples d'attaques très virulentes contre Fürtwängler dans le 1er chapitre de son livre. Ces attaques révèlent une totale ignorance des faits historiques, les critiques se fixant sur certains détails sortis de leur contexte. On lui a reproché, par exemple, son titre de « Staatsrat » de Prusse faisant de Fürtwängler « le grand ami de Göring » . Or, Göring l'a nommé à ce titre purement honorifique sans lui demander son avis en 1933. Fürtwängler l'a accepté uniquement pour avoir un peu plus de poids en Allemagne justement pour essayer d'infléchir la politique raciale du moment. Comme Berta Geißmar, la secrétaire juive de Fürtwängler elle-même l'a dit, cela aurait été une grave erreur de le refuser. Fürtwängler a démissionné de ce poste en 1934, mais sa démission a été refusée. Ainsi, il a traîné jusqu'à la fin de la guerre ce titre qui était vide de tout contenu. De plus, non seulement Göring n'était pas son ami mais c'est lui qui a précisément monté la campagne contre Fürtwängler en 1938 en mettant au 1er plan Karajan. Un autre exemple est donné par l'historien Ludolf Herbst qui dans son histoire de la Seconde Guerre mondiale écrivit une seule phrase sur Fürtwängler : « Fürtwängler a dirigé des concerts dans des usines pour soutenir l'idéologie National-Socialiste. » . Fred K. Prieberg et Audrey Roncigli déclarèrent que si la phrase est historiquement correcte (il s'agit de 2 concerts ; l'un le 21 décembre 1939 et l'autre le 26 février 1942 dont il existe un petit film) , ils déclarent que mentionner uniquement cette information est une grave falsification historique. Fürtwängler fut aussi présenté comme la figure de proue de la propagande nazie. Or, il n'apparaît que dans 2 films de moins de 5 et 10 minutes alors que l'Allemagne a produit des films de propagande dans des proportions gigantesques et que Fürtwängler a tout fait pour les éviter (avec succès dans le cas du grand film « les Philharmoniker ») .

Un autre exemple trahit la culpabilité de ses critiques et leur volonté de l'utiliser pour l'exorciser : le chef d'orchestre suisse Ernest Ansermet fut très étonné de constater, en 1945, que les attaques contre Fürtwängler vinrent surtout de la Suisse alémanique c'est-à-dire de la partie de la Suisse qui se sentait la plus proche culturellement de l'Allemagne et qui avait toujours fait un triomphe à Fürtwängler jusqu'alors. La presse alémanique lui reprocha de s' « être enrichi colossalement pendant la période nazie » et de ne rien avoir fait pour aider les Juifs, ce qui, d'un point de vue historique, est faux. C'est donc Ernest Ansermet, un Suisse Romand qui, selon les biographes, avait « bouffé du boche » pendant toute sa jeunesse, qui prit publiquement sa défense et qui intervint auprès du gouvernement helvétique pour que le chef d'orchestre allemand puisse rester dans son pays.

Les raisons pour lesquelles, les attaques se sont centrées sur Fürtwängler ont été expliquées en détail par Fred Prieberg. Tout d'abord, Fürtwängler ne contre-attaquait jamais. Il n'a jamais attaqué personne en justice même quand les accusations étaient très grossièrement fausses. D'autre part, il faisait savoir sans arrêt qu'il était profondément blessé par ces attaques. Beaucoup plus important, est le fait que Fürtwängler « était un symbole » . Aucun musicien de symbolisait plus que lui la musique et donc la culture allemande. On le considérait et il se considérait comme l'incarnation, la conscience morale, de la culture allemande de Goethe, Schiller et Beethoven. Il considérait les Nazis comme des usurpateurs et se considérait comme le gardien de la « vraie Allemagne » et des « vrais allemands » . Prieberg expliqua que cela faisait la force et la faiblesse du chef d'orchestre. Il fut, pour cela, le plus grand interprète de la musique allemande mais c'est aussi l'une des raisons principales pour lesquelles, il s'obstina à rester le plus longtemps possible dans son pays.

André Tubeuf le résuma très bien :

« C'est sur Fürtwängler que pesa l'interdit le plus lourdement et douloureusement que sur aucun musicien allemand. Mais c'est justice, au fond : il était plus musicien allemand qu'aucun musicien. Substantif et qualificatif, dans ce cas, étaient indissociables. Il dut expier d'autant plus. »

Outre le fait, qu'à travers Fürtwängler c'est le procès de la culture allemande que l'on faisait et que l'on projetait sur lui et sur son pays toute responsabilité des autres pays, Menuhin a témoigné que certains musiciens, surtout aux États-Unis, amplifièrent les critiques pour éliminer la concurrence de ce chef d'orchestre à la présence artistique écrasante. L'impact de ces campagnes en Amérique joua un rôle très important dans l'image de Fürtwängler dans les pays anglo-saxons jusqu'à présent.

Après la guerre, lors d'une réception à New York, quelqu'un demanda à Toscanini qui était le plus grand chef d'orchestre au monde à part lui-même. Le Mæstro hésita puis essaya de changer de sujet. Mais comme la personne insista, il se mit très en colère et cria : « Fürtwängler » et quitta immédiatement la salle.

À la fin de sa vie, Yehudi Menuhin résuma toutes les critiques contre son ami de la façon suivante :

« Ce fut sa grandeur qui attira la haine. »

Fürtwängler, une illusion face au Nazisme

Qui se souvient, aujourd'hui, que Fürtwängler fut un brillant compositeur qui laissa à la postérité, entre autres, 3 Symphonies, I « Te Deum », et I Concerto symphonique pour piano et orchestre ? Qui se souvient que Fürtwängler, en tant que chef d'orchestre, créa le 1er Concerto pour piano de Béla Bartók à Francfort en 1927, et le 5e de Sergueï Prokofiev à Berlin en 1932 ? Qui se souvient que Fürtwängler participa activement au rapprochement culturel franco-allemand initié après les accords de Locarno, dirigeant des concerts avec le « Berliner Philharmoniker » à Paris, Lyon, Strasbourg et Nice, à tel point que la France le remercia par l'Ordre du Mérite en 1929 et la Légion d'honneur en 1939 ? Personne ne s'en souvient, parce que l'image qui demeure aujourd'hui dans les esprits, c'est celle de Fürtwängler chef d'orchestre sous le 3e « Reich ». Ayant refusé d'émigrer et ayant continué à se produire en Allemagne, il se verra ad vitam lié au Nazisme. Et ce, « à torts et à raisons » (1) .

Si Fürtwängler intéresse encore aujourd'hui les historiens, c'est en grande partie parce qu'il a connu la plénitude de son art durant les années les plus sombres de l'Allemagne, et qu'il s'y voit lié politiquement et culturellement. Il n'aurait en effet jamais soulevé autant de controverses s'il n'avait été ce chef reconnu mondialement dès le milieu des années 1920 et représentant à ce titre, pour les Nazis, une sorte de gloire nationale, comme le relate Albert Speer à Gitta Sereny, dans les années 1970 :

« On considérait les gens comme Fürtwängler, Kempff et Strauß comme des trésors nationaux. S'ils exprimaient leur désapprobation ou des doutes, Goebbels essayait de les convaincre par la discussion. S'il n'y parvenait pas, ils étaient avertis et mis sous surveillance. Ce que l'on n'aurait jamais accepté, dans le Nazisme, quelles que soient les circonstances, c'était de les laisser partir ; jamais on n'aurait permis quelque chose d'aussi préjudiciable à la réputation de l'Allemagne. » (2)

Tous ceux qui s'intéressent à l'« affaire Fürtwängler » savent cependant que le chef n'a jamais été membre du NSDAP, ni n'a eu de sympathies pour les thèses du Parti, comme le prouve cette remarque du ministre de la Propagande, Josef Gœbbels :

« Fürtwängler n'a jamais été National-Socialiste. Et il n'a jamais fait de mystère là-dessus. Et les Juifs et les émigrés ont trouvé cela suffisant pour le considérer comme un des leurs, lui qui était dans une sorte d' " émigration intérieure " ; il n'a jamais changé d'avis sur nous. » (3)

Ce qui est donc reproché à Fürtwängler après-guerre, et qui alimente le « cas Fürtwängler » depuis plus de 50 ans, c'est finalement d'être resté en Allemagne, au contraire de nombre de ses collègues, comme Fritz Busch, Bruno Walter, ou Erich Kleiber, et d'avoir implicitement accepté d'être utilisé comme un « trésor national » par le régime hitlérien, alors qu'il n'était Nazi, ni dans la conviction, ni dans les actes.

Lorsque Hitler arrive au pouvoir le 30 janvier 1933, Wilhelm Fürtwängler a 46 ans et il est le chef titulaire des « Berliner Philharmoniker » et « Staatsopernorchester » . « Generalmusikdirektor » de Berlin depuis 1928, il semble être totalement apolitique, au sens le plus noble du terme ; il croit en la complétude de l'Homme par le pouvoir de la Musique, en « la vérité fondamentale du Beau » , par laquelle, selon Paul Hindemith, « il sait transformer les expériences musicales en quasi-connaissances religieuses » (4) .

Il est certes conscient qu'une société ne peut survivre et se développer sans l'exercice d'un pouvoir politique, mais il ne mesure pas complètement l'enjeu qui se présente à l'Allemagne en 1933. Car le nouveau régime qui s'installe amène au pouvoir non seulement des politiciens quelque peu différents de ceux de la République de Weimar, mais aussi et surtout une pléiade de fonctionnaires zélés, prêts à appliquer à la lettre les idées du « Mein Kampf » de leur « Führer » . Un « Führer » sur lequel Fürtwängler a une opinion très tranchée ; en témoigne cette analyse laissée après leur rencontre à l'Hôtel « Kaiserhof » de Berlin, en 1932 :

« Cet homme a une multitude d'idées marginales et fort conventionnelles sur l'art. Sa médiocrité m'aurait effrayé, si je n'avais pas été persuadé que jamais il ne parviendrait au pouvoir ! » (5)

Cette entrevue est probablement apolitique, puisque le président du NSDAP veut rencontrer le Mæstro au sujet du Festival de Bayreuth, qui deviendra au fil du temps un temple du National-Socialisme, et auquel il avait renoncé l'année précédente en raison d'une mésentente avec Winifred Wagner et avec son grand rival de l'époque, Arturo Toscanini. Mais Fürtwängler se trompe sur Adolf Hitler, et assiste impuissant à l'avènement d'un « " Reich " millénaire » .

Thomas Mann, intellectuel émigré, écrit, 2 mois à peine après l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis :

« Fürtwängler dirige pour ce jour de fête du nouveau régime. Laquais du " Reich " . » (6)

Le 21 mars 1933, en effet, à la demande d'Hermann Göring, responsable de la « Staatsoper unter den Linden » en sa qualité de « Preuischer Ministerpräsident » , Fürtwängler dirige les « Meistersinger » devant Adolf Hitler, le maréchal

Hindenburg, Hermann Göring, Wilhelm Frick et Alfred Hugenberg, entre autres ; à la fin de la représentation, « pâle comme la mort » (7), il serre la main du nouveau Chancelier. Le choix de Fürtwängler et des « Meistersinger » n'était, bien entendu, pas anodin : un Opéra national de Richard Wagner, un chef reconnu à l'étranger et « capable d'exprimer à chaque concert la force de la vraie Allemagne, de rassembler dans ses interprétations tout le meilleur de la musique allemande » (8), ces 2 éléments réunis permettaient à Göring une réussite à coup sûr pour le concert du « Regierungsanordnung ».

Quelques jours plus tard, après la mise en application de la loi « zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums », qui empêche toute personne d'origine juive d'exercer un poste de fonctionnaire dans le nouveau « Reich », Fürtwängler exprime sa Ire opposition à la politique culturelle de Gœbbels, lequel profite du vide institutionnel laissé par Hitler pour prendre progressivement le contrôle de la vie musicale. Le 11 avril 1933, dans la « Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung », est publié un article de Fürtwängler et la réponse du « Reichsminister ». Le Mæstro y affirme qu'il ne peut tolérer « qu'une seule ligne de séparation dans l'Art, celle qui existe entre l'art de qualité et l'art sans qualité » (9), et il regrette que, désormais, soit appliquée une séparation « théorique et implacable » (10) entre Juifs et non-Juifs. Gœbbels répond :

« En tant qu'homme politique allemand, je ne peux pas reconnaître cette unique ligne de séparation qui existerait selon vous. L'art ne doit pas être seulement de qualité, il doit aussi surgir du peuple, ou, plus exactement, seul un art qui puise dans le " Volkstum " tout entier peut être de qualité en fin de compte et signifier quelque chose pour le peuple auquel il est destiné. Les artistes qui peuvent vraiment faire quelque chose, et dont l'action dans les domaines extérieurs à l'art ne va pas à l'encontre des normes élémentaires de l'État, de la politique et de la société, trouveront à l'avenir, comme par le passé, l'aide et les encouragements les plus chaleureux de notre part. » (11)

Le ministre de la Propagande, dans cette même réponse, blâme Fürtwängler qui prend publiquement la défense de Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer et Max Reinhardt, artistes bannis par le régime et forcés à émigrer, et qui devront, selon Fürtwängler, « encore dans l'avenir pouvoir s'exprimer par leur art en Allemagne ». Lors du passage du chef devant la Commission de dénazification de Berlin, en décembre 1946, on ne retiendra de cette lettre ouverte que la distinction plus ou moins ambiguë que Fürtwängler fait entre « bons » et « mauvais Juifs », quand il parle d'une lutte justifiée contre les « artistes déracinés et destructeurs qui ne cherchent à se faire valoir que par le kitsch ou la virtuosité ». Mais peu importe la signification qu'on donne aujourd'hui à ces lignes, car, en 1933, Gœbbels est embarrassé par cette Ire réaction du « Generalmusikdirektor », qui rencontre le « Führer » quelques semaines plus tard, dans son repaire de l'Obersalzberg. Fürtwängler en revient avec ces paroles :

« Jamais ce camelot chuintant ne jouera un quelconque rôle important en Allemagne. » (12)

Berta Geimar, sa secrétaire d'origine juive, note également :

« En revenant de l'entretien, il m'a dit qu'il savait maintenant ce qui se trouvait derrière les mesures bornées d'Hitler : ce n'était pas seulement l'antisémitisme, mais le rejet de toute forme de pensée artistique, philosophique, le rejet de toute forme de culture libre. » (13)

Entre 1933 et 1945, Fürtwängler prendra la défense ou aidera à émigrer de nombreux musiciens considérés par le régime comme « Entartete » (dégénérés) , des amis juifs, ou encore des personnes recherchées pour leurs opinions politiques, comme il l'explique dans son plaidoyer aux Alliés en 1946 :

« Par-dessus tout, je me suis sans relâche opposé aux persécutions subies par des individus, qui étaient personnellement, politiquement, ou racialement, divergents du régime et de son idéologie. Par principe, j'intervins dans chaque cas de persécution contre les Juifs qui fut porté à ma connaissance et pour lequel je pensais pouvoir être utile. Je ne me suis pas laissé détourner de cette position. Je pus être utile dans de nombreux cas. » (14)

Lors de son passage en dénazification, Fürtwängler présente une liste (15) de plus de 80 personnes qui ont déclaré avoir été aidées ou sauvées par lui, au nombre desquelles on compte des musiciens d'orchestre comme Heinrich Wollheim (16) , des chefs célèbres comme Bruno Walter, Arnold Schœnberg, Otto Klemperer, Hans Knappertsbusch, ou encore des solistes comme Carl Flesch, dont le fils déclarera que c'était Fürtwängler qui avait prévenu sa famille des rafles vers les camps de concentration. Berta Geimar avait rassemblé des centaines de dossiers qu'elle avait ensuite, à la demande de Fürtwängler, transmis au général Robert McClure, chargé du « procès » de 1946. Les pièces ont mystérieusement disparu à Berlin, alors qu'elles devaient être remises au général-commandant de la Zone d'occupation américaine. Curt Rieß a affirmé que les pièces ne se trouvaient pas non plus aux Archives fédérales de Washington ; elles ne furent donc pas prises en considération, et la liste établie de mémoire par Fürtwängler n'avait aucune valeur légale aux yeux des Alliés.

Dès 1933, le chef titulaire du « Berliner » s'oppose également à l'épuration au sein de son Orchestre, menaçant le « Staatskommissar » Hafemann, dépêché par Gœbbels, de démissionner de tous ses postes si la politique raciale devait s'appliquer à ses Orchestres. Bruno Stenzel témoignera ainsi, après la guerre :

« C'était Fürtwängler qui arrangeait à sa manière l'application de la politique concernant l'Orchestre. On nous enviait pour être une sorte d'enclave dans le 3e " Reich ". Le pourcentage de membres du NSDAP au sein du " Berliner " était le plus bas de tous les Orchestres d'Allemagne, ce qui rendait son influence quasi nulle. » (17)

Le « Berliner » est en effet le seul orchestre où la politique raciale n'est appliquée qu'en 1934, après la démission de Fürtwängler de ses postes ; dès avril 1933, cependant, cette implication pour les Juifs ne plaît guère à Gœbbels, surtout qu'Hans Hinckel lui fournit une missive du « Kulturstaatssekretär » Georg Gerullis contenant cette phrase devenue célèbre :

« Pouvez-vous me citer un seul Juif pour lequel Fürtwängler ne prenne pas parti ? » (18)

1933 marque aussi une grande déconvenue pour Fürtwängler : en juin, il prend personnellement l'initiative d'inviter des musiciens juifs émigrés, les solistes Bronisław Huberman, Fritz Kreisler, Yehudi Menuhin, ou encore Gregor Piatigorski, en précisant :

« Si vous acceptez ma proposition, vous prouverez au monde que l'Allemagne de la musique ne doit pas être bannie. Nous, artistes, nous devons nous distinguer de la politique, quand bien même les hommes politiques essaient de nous en empêcher. » (19)

Malheureusement, tous les musiciens refusent, et s'expriment par la voix d'Artur Schnabel :

« Nous reviendrons jouer en Allemagne, quand tous les musiciens qui, pour des raisons politiques ou raciales, ont perdu leurs emplois, les recouvreront. » (20)

Fürtwängler est déçu et remplace les solistes par des artistes (re)commandés par Goebbels, parmi lesquels on compte la pianiste nazie Elly Ney, surnommée « die Reichsklaviergromutter », ou encore Wilhelm Backhaus. Le régime profite de cette phase difficile pour lier Fürtwängler plus fortement à sa politique culturelle : de France, où il se produit à l'Opéra de Paris, il apprend sa nomination par Bernhardt Rust à la « Ministerkommission für Programmfrage » (Commission de contrôle des programmes) avec Max von Schillings, Wilhelm Backhaus et Georg Kulenkampff. Parallèlement, Göring le nomme 1er « Staatskapellmeister » à la « Staatsoper unter den Linden » et, 1 an plus tard, il en devient son directeur général. Sans avoir été prévenu, Fürtwängler est nommé par Göring, le 8 juillet 1933, « Staatsrat » de Prusse, aux côtés du « SS-Reichsführer » Himmler, du « SA-Oberführer » le Prince August Wilhelm de Prusse, ou encore du juge Roland Freisler et du chef d'entreprise Fritz Thyssen. Fürtwängler expliquera à ce sujet, en 1946 :

« La fonction de conseiller d'État ne donnait aucune sorte de pouvoir ni la moindre autorité. On me donna ce poste, car je venais d'être approuvé dans ma position de chef de la " Staatsoper ", dont Göring assumait dès lors la direction. Je n'ai participé qu'à une seule réunion de ce Conseil d'État : la réunion d'ouverture. Je ne sais même pas s'il y a eu d'autres réunions par la suite. » (21)

Goebbels, très jaloux de l'influence que prend son rival Göring sur son « Dirigent », nomme Fürtwängler « Reichskultursenator », le 10 juillet, puis vice-président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » (« RMK ») qu'il crée le 1er novembre, et dont il confie la présidence à Richard Strauß. La « RMK », à laquelle l'adhésion était obligatoire pour exercer un emploi dans le domaine musical en Allemagne, avait des prérogatives diverses et assez imprécises : examen des adhésions, publications variées dans les « Amtliche Mitteilungen der Reichsmusikkammer » (tant sur le contenu des programmes que sur l'incorporation d'organisations ou d'associations musicales à la Chambre), ordonnances visant à limiter la liberté des musiciens, soumettant à examen le droit de voyager à l'étranger (7 mai 1934), demandant à ce que les programmes de concert soient présentés à l'avance pour approbation (16 juillet 1934), interdisant l'usage de pseudonymes aux consonances étrangères (29 septembre 1934), ou encore, obligeant à utiliser un piano allemand en concert (2 juillet 1934). (22)

Fürtwängler ne siégera que moins de 1 an à cette Chambre, symbole, selon Erik Levi, des « inconstances et contradictions politiques caractérisant la vie musicale sous le 3e " Reich " » (23)

Au début de l'année 1934, Fürtwängler décide de programmer à la « Staatsoper » l'Opéra de Paul Hindemith

« Mathis der Mahler » . Hindemith n'a pas de sympathies anti-nazies, mais sa femme et nombre de ses amis sont d'origine juive ; de plus, sa musique ne plaît guère à certains dignitaires du régime. En 1929, au « Kroll Oper », Hitler avait été très choqué par la musique et le synopsis de son « Neues von Tage », et, comme la majorité des compositeurs de musique moderne, Hindemith avait été classé comme promoteur de l'« Entartete Musik » et mis au ban des scènes allemandes par Alfred Rosenberg. Göring refuse la programmation envisagée par Fürtwängler ; ce dernier proteste et réussit alors un coup de génie : profitant de la relative liberté dont il jouit au « Berliner Philharmoniker », bien que l'Orchestre soit passé sous contrôle du « ProMi » (ministère de la Propagande) représenté par Rudolf von Schmidtseck, « Orchesterkommissar » chargé de lier l'Orchestre au Parti, et de Walther Funk, nouveau directeur général, il y programme la « Mathis-Symphonie », composée d'extraits de l'Opéra du même nom et arrangés pour Orchestre Symphonique. L'accueil fait par le public à cette œuvre, le 11 mars 1934, est excellent ; Fürtwängler s'attend à une réaction opposée et immédiate du régime, mais elle n'intervient que quelques mois plus tard, après une nouvelle prise de position publique de Fürtwängler contre la politique culturelle nazie.

Hindemith est, encore une fois, le noyau du désaccord. En 1re page de la « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung », le 25 novembre 1934, Fürtwängler fait publier l'article intitulé « Der Fall Hindemith » :

« Hindemith ne s'est jamais engagé en politique. Vers quel avenir allons-nous, si les méthodes de dénonciation politique sont appliquées au domaine de la musique ? Plus encore, et cela doit être très clair : nous ne pouvons pas nous permettre de renoncer à un talent comme Hindemith. »

La presse nazie réplique dès le 27 novembre contre Hindemith et Fürtwängler. Le compositeur choisit d'émigrer, alors que le 2 décembre 1934, lors d'une représentation de « Tristan und Isolde » à la « Staatsoper », Fürtwängler est applaudi pendant 25 minutes à son entrée dans la fosse, puis à chaque salut d'acte, et ce en présence de Goebbels et de Göring ; la portée politique de cette manifestation du public est évidente, et Göring en comprend l'enjeu. Après un entretien sur la « question Fürtwängler » avec le « Führer » le lendemain, il explique au chef que sa démission immédiate est clairement attendue. Fürtwängler s'exécute, renonçant à toutes ses fonctions le 4 décembre 1934, au « Berliner », à la « Staatsoper » et à la « Reichsmusikkammer », mais il ne peut abandonner son titre de « Staatsrat », qui ne peut être retiré que par le « Führer » lui-même en cas de trahison ou de meurtre. Son passeport lui est aussi confisqué. Erich Kleiber soutient son action en démissionnant de son poste à la « Städtische Oper » de Berlin, et prend le chemin de l'exil. Göring écrit au Mæstro déchu, non sans ironie :

« Je voudrais saisir l'occasion, pour vous dire combien cette séparation m'attriste. J'aurais espéré que nous puissions clarifier les problèmes et arriver à une sorte d'accord par lequel nous aurions pu continuer à collaborer. Cela n'a pas pu se faire. Je vous remercie personnellement pour toutes les nombreuses heures merveilleuses de musique que vous m'avez données en tant qu'artiste et chef d'orchestre. Aujourd'hui, je me reconforte en me disant que je vous reverrai encore, probablement en tant que chef invité, diriger dans mon Opéra. Rien dans la vie n'est définitif : tout peut être changé. Tout en espérant que votre carrière artistique sera pleine de réussite, je reste convaincu que votre chemin ne peut qu'être lié à celui de l'Allemagne nazie. » (24)

Fürtwängler se retire alors dans les Alpes bavaroises où il commence à écrire son Concerto symphonique pour piano.

Göring lui substitue Clemens Krauß à la « Staatsoper », et la tournée du Philharmonique de Berlin, prévue en Angleterre en janvier 1935 et proposée à Sir Thomas Beecham, est annulée suite au refus du chef anglais. La nouvelle du départ de Fürtwängler provoque un nombre important de réactions à l'étranger, notamment aux États-Unis ; de plus, il reçoit le soutien de nombreux artistes et de son public, mais le régime nazi continue les attaques contre lui, et notamment contre sa secrétaire Berta Geimar, à qui il conseille d'émigrer en Angleterre et qu'il recommande à Sir Thomas Beecham. Rosenberg écrit, dans le « Völkischer Beobachter » du 6 décembre 1934 :

« Fürtwängler s'obstine à demeurer dans ses pensées du XIXe siècle. Il ne ressent plus rien pour le combat de NOTRE temps, il en assumera donc les conséquences. » (25)

Par sa démission, Fürtwängler retrouve une part de l'estime d'Arturo Toscanini, qui s'est prononcé contre toute forme de fascisme, et tout particulièrement contre celui du « Duce ». Fürtwängler est alors pressenti à sa succession à la tête du « New York Philharmonic », ainsi qu'à celle de Leopold Stokowski à Philadelphie. Arthur Judson, directeur de « Columbia Records », contacte le Mæstro afin de lui faire part de sa proposition. Fürtwängler, qui ne souhaite pas quitter son pays, peut vivre et composer en Allemagne, mais ne diriger qu'à l'étranger. Fürtwängler est enthousiaste, mais encore lui faut-il récupérer son passeport ! À sa demande, il obtient une entrevue avec Gœbbels, le 28 février 1935, rencontre qu'il décrira en 1946 pour son plaidoyer devant la Commission de dénazification : Fürtwängler refuse la Ire condition posée par Gœbbels, sa « subordination publique et explicite à la politique culturelle d'Adolf Hitler ». Considérant qu'en tant qu'artiste il ne peut accepter aucune autorité au-dessus de son art, il rejette, devant Gœbbels, toute l'utilisation faite de l'Art par les Nazis. La discussion se clôt sur un compromis, qu'Herbert Haffner qualifie de « prodige goebbelsien » (26), et que le chef résume ainsi :

« Finalement, Gœbbels me dit : " Vous ne pouvez pas renier que dans l'Allemagne d'aujourd'hui, c'est Hitler qui mène la politique culturelle. " J'ai répondu : " Je ne le contredis pas. C'est un lieu commun ... tout le monde le sait. " Gœbbels : " Si je vous demandais de me le confirmer, je ne vous demanderais pas de trahir vos convictions ? " Ma réponse : " J'en serais vraiment ravi. La responsabilité en termes de politique culturelle dans le " Reich " ressort entièrement et exclusivement d'Adolf Hitler, et je dois m'y résoudre. Personnellement, pour autant que j'y suis concerné, je ne veux rien avoir à faire avec cela. " » (27)

Par cet accord, Fürtwängler n'occupera plus aucun poste de directeur musical jusque 1945 ; il ne dirigera plus non plus le traditionnel cycle de 11 concerts à la Philharmonie, et se contentera d'engagements limités à la « Staatsoper ». Mais le régime a retrouvé son « Dirigent », et Gœbbels jubile :

« Fürtwängler est revenu. Quelle grande réussite pour nous ! Ces artistes sont vraiment les gens les plus bizarres que je connaisse. Sans aucun raisonnement politique. » (28)

Fürtwängler est persuadé, quant à lui, d'avoir obtenu la garantie de pouvoir mener sa carrière comme un musicien libre et hors de la politique. Mais la déconvenue ne tarde pas : le 25 avril, à Berlin, il retrouve son Orchestre, dans un programme entièrement consacré à Beethoven ; Gœbbels, Göring et Hitler sont présents et, à la fin de la représentation, le « Führer », qui lui a rendu son passeport, serre la main de Fürtwängler (29) :

La photo sera publiée dans les journaux du monde entier. Il dirige aussi les « Meistersinger » la veille des « Reichsparteitage » de 1935 à Nuremberg : cet argument sera utilisé à charge contre lui par les représentants américains en 1946, alors qu'il clamera que cette représentation était indépendante de la manifestation du Parti, selon la promesse faite par le ministre de la Propagande.

Fin 1935, il fait savoir à Goebbels qu'il refuse de diriger toute tournée financée par le régime nazi, comme celle prévue en Angleterre pour le « Berliner Philharmoniker ». Fürtwängler expliquera ainsi, en 1946, que « ses tournées étaient uniquement artistiques, sans aucun autre but ». En conséquence, qu'il a refusé, tout naturellement, de jouer dans les pays qui avaient été conquis pendant la guerre, c'est-à-dire la Norvège, la Hollande, la Belgique, et la France. (30)

Arturo Toscanini renonce définitivement à son poste new-yorkais en février 1936 et demande à Fürtwängler de lui succéder, à condition de ne plus diriger en Allemagne. Celui-ci accepte le contrat, et prend quelques semaines de vacances au Caire et en Italie. Il ne se doute pas que Göring, alerté par les écoutes téléphoniques faites par la Gestapo, vient d'apprendre sa nomination américaine, et échafaude une riposte implacable. Le 28 février, il fait publier dans la presse allemande un communiqué annonçant que Fürtwängler a repris tous ses postes et toutes ses fonctions en Allemagne. La nouvelle se propage aux États-Unis, où un tollé général s'élève contre Fürtwängler, qui ne peut que rompre son contrat, par télégramme :

« Controverses politiques tellement désagréables. Ne suis pas un homme politique, juste un représentant de la Musique allemande, qui appartient à l'humanité tout entière. Propose de rompre mon engagement auprès de la " Philharmonic Society ", jusqu'à ce que le public comprenne que musique et politique n'ont rien à voir ensemble. Si publication de ce télégramme, publiez-le avec mes propres mots. Louxor, 13 mai 1936, Fürtwängler. » (31)

C'est au cours de l'été 1936 qu'il retrouve Bayreuth et son Festival Wagner, après plusieurs années d'absence. À cette occasion, Hitler, Göring et Goebbels tentent de le convaincre de reprendre une position officielle dans la vie musicale allemande. Celui-ci refuse, devant Friedelind Wagner, la nièce du compositeur qui émigrera 3 ans plus tard, et qui racontera une anecdote stupéfiante :

« Je me souviens qu'Hitler avait demandé à voir Fürtwängler, et qu'il lui a dit très sèchement qu'il devait dorénavant obéir au Parti et servir la propagande, et Fürtwängler refusa très explicitement. Hitler devint fou de rage et fit savoir à Fürtwängler que, dans ce cas, il y aurait une place pour lui en camp de concentration. Fürtwängler se tut un instant et dit, très calmement : " Herr Reichskanzler, au moins là-bas je serai en bonne compagnie. " Le " Führer " se mit hors de lui et quitta la pièce. » (32)

Excédé par les controverses politiques, Fürtwängler décide d'annuler toute activité publique durant l'hiver 1936-1937, souhaitant passer cette période dans une paix absolue afin de se consacrer à la composition. Alors que les Jeux olympiques battent leur plein à Berlin, Fürtwängler se réfugie dans les montagnes, où il travaille à sa Sonate pour violon et à son Concerto pour piano. En décembre 1936, Goebbels le prie de diriger un concert pour le

« Wintershilfswerk » (œuvre de charité) et il retrouve officiellement son Orchestre, le 10 février 1937 à Berlin, lors d'un concert où, une fois encore, Hitler, Göring et Goebbels, ainsi que de nombreux ambassadeurs, sont présents ; le ministre de la Propagande note :

« Fürtwängler est fêté comme un dieu. Le “ Führer ” et moi sommes ravis. » (33)

Le « Führer », qui, selon les dires d'un soldat américain, aurait reçu un télégramme d'anniversaire le 20 avril 1937, signé Wilhelm Fürtwängler, « Generalmusikdirektor » et « Preuischer Staatsrat » ; cet argument est également utilisé en 1946, à charge contre Fürtwängler, sans que la preuve ou un fac-similé ne soient présentés. Fred K. Prieberg (34) démontre que l'argument avancé par le « GI » Sonnenfeld est pure invention : d'abord, l'original n'est présent dans aucun centre d'archives allemand ; ensuite, 2 éléments techniques amènent à cette conclusion : Fürtwängler n'a jamais signé de son titre « Staatsrat », et celui de « Generalmusikdirektor » n'était pas reconnu officiellement dans la nouvelle hiérarchie nazie, car antérieur à 1933 ; sur son agenda du 19 avril 1937, enfin, figurent 3 noms auxquels il se doit de répondre : Ribbentrop, Goebbels et Madame Hindemith. Mais aucune mention d'Adolf Hitler.

1937 voit également les débuts de Fürtwängler au Festival de Salzbourg, où il rencontre Toscanini, qui lui reproche d'être devenu un Nazi. Curt Rieß rapporte la discussion, dans la version de Fürtwängler :

Fürtwängler : « Quand je dirige de la musique, dans un pays conquis par Hitler, est-ce que cela signifie que je suis son représentant ? Cela ne fait-il pas plutôt de moi son adversaire, car la musique est un parfait démenti à l'abrutissement et à l'anéantissement causé par le Nazisme ? »

Toscanini : « Quiconque dirige dans le 3e “ Reich ” est un Nazi. »

Fürtwängler : « Alors, vous supposez que l'Art n'est rien d'autre que de la propagande pour le régime qui est déjà au pouvoir. Si je vous comprends bien, le régime nazi étant au pouvoir, je suis donc un chef nazi ; sous un régime communiste, je serais un chef communiste ; sous un régime démocrate, un chef démocrate ... Non, 1,000 fois non ! L'Art appartient au monde entier » (35)

Goebbels s'en mêle (« Quelle insolence de Toscanini, d'interdire à un artiste allemand de jouer en Autriche ! ») (36) et l'avocat nazi Arthur Sey-Inquart, devenu ministre de l'Intérieur et de la Sécurité, s'occupe de barrer le chemin à Toscanini. Le chef italien ne reviendra plus jouer à Salzbourg, ville qui deviendra, quelques semaines après cette rencontre, une nouvelle « terre intérieure » pour le 3e « Reich ». Avec l'« Anschluß », Fürtwängler voit le danger de la politique culturelle nazie menacer Vienne ; Otto Straßer, représentant du « Wiener Philharmoniker » dont Fürtwängler avait été chef titulaire, de 1927 à 1930, s'adresse à lui pour faire protéger le statut de l'Orchestre, ainsi que ses musiciens juifs (parmi lesquels Arnold Rosé et Friedrich Buxbaum) ou de demi-sang juif (comme Hugo Burghauser) (37). Fürtwängler décide alors, après l'anniversaire du « Führer » le 20 avril 1938 où il donne les « Meistersinger » au « Wiener Staatsoper », de faire jouer le « Wiener Philharmoniker » à Berlin, dans un programme exclusivement autrichien Franz Schubert, Anton Bruckner et Johann Strauß. Impressionnés, Hitler et Goebbels accordent une indépendance relative à l'Orchestre, ce qui permettra à Fürtwängler certains actes audacieux, comme le mentionne Boheslaw Barlog :

« Lors d'un concert en 1938, à Vienne, la salle était décorée, pour des raisons politiques, de drapeaux à croix gammée. Fürtwängler arriva sur le podium, salua les musiciens, regarda à gauche, à droite, vit les drapeaux, et retourna en coulisses. Après une dizaine de minutes, des gens arrivèrent avec des échelles, enlevèrent les drapeaux à droite et à gauche, sous les applaudissements du public, et le concert reprit. Il fallait être courageux comme un lion pour faire ça en 1938 ! » (38)

En assurant que l'Orchestre continuerait à vivre de sa pleine autorité, Fürtwängler voulait aussi détourner les vues de Goebbels de faire de Vienne « une ville de province du " Reich " » ; il permet aussi au « Gauleiter » de Vienne de conserver une certaine autonomie face au ministre de la Propagande. En décembre 1939, Joseph Bürckel (39) est nommé « Gauleiter » de Vienne et « Reichskommissar für die Wiedervereinigung Österreichs mit dem Deutschen Reich » (Commissaire à la réunification de l'Autriche avec le « Reich ») ; Seyß-Inquart lui confiant également les tâches culturelles, pour lesquelles il n'a que peu d'intérêt, il se tourne vers Fürtwängler. Celui-ci accepte, sans contrat et sans honoraires, de devenir une sorte de conseiller musical de la ville de Vienne, « pour y préserver l'indépendance de la vie musicale » . (40)

Autant que faire se peut, il limitera jusqu'en 1944 l'influence des Nazis sur l'Orchestre, comme en témoigne son discours de mars 1942 pour le centenaire du « Wiener » , devant le « Gauleiter » Baldur von Schirach :

« Comme vous le savez, le " Wiener Philharmoniker " élit toujours son chef : c'est quelque chose d'unique dans le contexte de l'État autoritaire qui est le nôtre. » (41)

Dès 1938, Göring, avide de faire plier Fürtwängler et conseillé par l'opportuniste intendant de la « Staatsoper » , Heinz Tietjen, essaie une nouvelle tactique : si le « chef idéal » ne veut pas se conformer au régime, le régime créera un autre « chef idéal » . Le « Berliner Philharmoniker » a déjà reçu à ce titre quelques jeunes talents, parmi lesquels le « Generalmusikdirektor » d'Aix-la-Chapelle, âgé de 30 ans seulement, Herbert von Karajan. Membre du NSDAP, conseillé par l'agent de concert et « SS-Obersturmführer » Rudolf Vedder, Karajan semble être le parfait candidat pour contrecarrer Fürtwängler ou, du moins, l'abaisser. Le 21 octobre 1938, Karajan dirige sans partition « Tristan und Isolde » à la « Staatsoper » ; le lendemain, un article paraît en page 5 dans la « Berliner Mittagszeitung » , « In der Staatsoper, das Wunder Karajan » , écrit par le critique Edwin von der Nüll. Fürtwängler le perçoit comme une offense envers sa personne, et s'en plaint à Goebbels, qui note :

« Longue conversation avec Fürtwängler. Toujours la même rengaine. Il a des milliers de réclamations. Mais il a raison, quand il s'inquiète de ce que ce Karajan de 30 ans monopolise la presse. Je veillerai à empêcher cela dans le futur. » (42)

Cette rivalité naissante entre Karajan et Fürtwängler, qui ira crescendo jusqu'à la fin de la guerre, est aussi le reflet de la rivalité Göring-Goebbels pour le contrôle de la vie musicale. Oliver Rathkolb, docteur de l'Institut d'histoire contemporaine de l'Université de Vienne, résume assez bien la situation :

« On n'a toujours pas bien établi à quel point Karajan a servi à éliminer, ou tout au moins, à neutraliser, l'assise artistique de Fürtwängler, devenu encombrant politiquement. Karajan servit de contrepoids. » (43)

Karajan lui-même expliquera plus tard à Roger Vaughan (44), un de ses biographes, que c'est Tietjen qui avait organisé en grande partie la rivalité entre lui et Fürtwängler. Il ira même jusqu'à mentionner que « Gœbbels se foutait de ce que Fürtwängler pensait des Nazis. Il l'aimait beaucoup. » (45)

Gœbbels et Hitler lui-même n'apprécient que peu Karajan, et essaieront jusqu'en 1944 de privilégier Fürtwängler sur les scènes allemandes. Mais Fürtwängler se montrera jusqu'à sa mort, et particulièrement avant 1945, obsédé par « Herr K » (il refusera pendant de longues années de prononcer son nom), ce rival plus jeune que lui, et qu'il verra conquérir progressivement toutes les scènes du monde après guerre.

1939, la guerre éclate, et Fürtwängler, qui vient de recevoir la Croix de Commandeur dans l'ordre de la Légion d'honneur (46), en février, des mains de Robert Coulondre, ambassadeur de France à Berlin, voit progressivement se réduire son champ d'activités. Avec le début de la guerre, Fürtwängler se focalise en grande partie sur Vienne et Berlin. Il relatera, en 1946 :

« Ma position concernant la guerre en elle-même peut se résumer par le fait que, dès le début, j'ai catégoriquement refusé de diriger en pays occupé. Dès 1939, je ne me suis plus rendu ni en Hollande, ni en Belgique, ni en Pologne, et encore moins en France. Toute affirmation contraire est pure invention. J'ai refusé, par principe, de venir dans un pays y jouer de la musique après que les tanks y soient passés. » (47)

En avril 1940, Fürtwängler se trouve à Copenhague où il doit diriger le Philharmonique d'Oslo et décide d'annuler son concert du 10 en protestation à l'invasion allemande. Mais il se voit forcé de diriger à Prague, en novembre 1939, pour l'ouverture du « Deutsches Opernhaus ». Gœbbels note :

« Cette soirée musicale fut le couronnement de notre volonté de former des relations de paix avec Hácha ... Une " Moldau indescriptible ", un " Eulenspiegel " intéressant. La 7e, œuvre grandiose. Public exalté. » (48)

L'année 1941 amène une nouvelle opposition entre le Mæstro et le ministre de la Propagande, qui, envieux du film « Fantasia » de Walt Disney avec Leopold Stokowski, décide d'utiliser Fürtwängler en commandant à Paul Verhœven un film sur le « Berliner », intitulé « Philharmoniker » :

« Ça va être un chef-d'œuvre, Fürtwängler doit y participer, j'ai tout le scénario en tête. » (49)

Mais Fürtwängler refuse catégoriquement d'apparaître dans le film de propagande, et « Philharmoniker » sortira finalement en décembre 1944 au « Tauentzien-Palast », sans Fürtwängler mais avec Richard Strauß, Karl Böhm, Hans Knappertsbusch et Eugen Jochum. En avril, alors que la « Staatsoper » est détruite par un bombardement, Fürtwängler chute à ski dans le Vorarlberg, près de Sankt-Anton, en Suisse, ce qui lui occasionne de nombreuses lésions (on craint même une paralysie du bras droit) et l'oblige à cesser toute activité pendant 9 mois. Il revient sur le podium en octobre 1941, avec cette pointe :

« Vous allez rire, mais je ne peux plus lever mon bras droit. »

Il termine l'année, invité par Baldur von Schirach, en dirigeant le Requiem pour le 150^e anniversaire de la mort de Mozart, à Vienne.

Au début de l'année 1942, il est dans la capitale autrichienne pour « Tristan » et « Fidelio », puis effectue une courte tournée scandinave avec le « Berliner ». Fin février, il dirige un concert dans l'usine « AEG » avec la « Symphonie Inachevée », « Till Eulenspiegel » et l'Ouverture des « Meistersinger », concert filmé pour la « Wochenschau ». Ces concerts sont considérés par le gouvernement nazi comme une « offrande au peuple combattant des musiciens au statut privilégié ». Mais c'est au printemps qu'intervient un événement important : en avril, il reçoit un coup de téléphone de Goebbels l'invitant à venir diriger, à la demande du « Führer », le concert de célébration de son anniversaire, à Berlin. Furtwängler, cherchant à éviter cette manifestation, prétexte un manque de répétitions, puis devoir rester en poste à Vienne, mais Goebbels clôt la discussion en transformant l'invitation en ordre catégorique. Le concert a lieu le 19 avril 1942, Goebbels en profitant pour faire un discours fleuve :

« Nous avons tous conscience de la force éternelle qui nous guide, celle qu'on l'appelle le Tout-Puissant, Dieu, notre Destin ou Notre Père, celle qui, comme dans le Finale de la 9^e Symphonie, vit au plus haut des cieux. Nous prions le Tout-Puissant de nous laisser notre " Führer ", de lui donner la force et la joie de poursuivre son œuvre ... et de mener notre Peuple, après la lutte et les souffrances, vers la Victoire ! » (50)

Ce concert, filmé pour la propagande nazie, a engendré une archive devenue très célèbre, tant par le cortège de dignitaires nazis présents au concert que par l'attitude de Furtwängler lui-même. Ce dernier, serrant la main à un Goebbels enchanté, ne lui offre qu'un sourire crispé, avant d'essuyer très discrètement sa main droite avec un mouchoir.

Le 2 janvier 1943, Furtwängler est à Vienne où il dirige « Tristan » dans sa propre mise-en-scène : après les 5 heures de représentation, il obtient 32 minutes de rappel ! Mais la situation de l'armée allemande se dégrade et, après l'échec de l'« Opération Braunschweig » et la capitulation de la 6^e Armée à Stalingrad, Goebbels déclare la « guerre totale » : les concerts se feront de plus en plus rares après 1943, le « Reich » privilégiant la lutte contre les ennemis et n'ayant plus que peu d'intérêt pour les affaires culturelles. De ce fait, tous les musiciens sont priés de participer à l'effort de guerre ; certains font cependant exception, et une liste de 36 pages contenant le nom des « Gottbegnadet » (protégés de Dieu) est publiée, les dispensant de service militaire. On y trouve les compositeurs Carl Orff et Werner Egek, les chefs Karl Böhm et Clemens Krauß, le ténor favori d'Hitler Max Lorenz (bien qu'homosexuel et marié à une femme juive), mais aussi la majorité des musiciens du « Berliner », du « Wiener », du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig et du « Prager Deutsche Orchester », l'Orchestre allemand fondé par Goebbels dans la capitale tchécoslovaque. Une liste « spéciale » est établie pour 3 noms : Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner et Wilhelm Furtwängler. Ils sont, dans cet ordre, à protéger à tout prix, car ils représentent un « capital immense pour la nation

» . (51)

De retour de sa tournée scandinave avec le « Berliner » , Fürtwängler cherche un moyen de se faire « dispenser » du concert d'anniversaire du « Führer » : le Docteur Johannes Ludwig Schmitt, un Résistant au régime, lui fournit un certificat attestant une spondylarthrite ankylosante, ce qui ne lui permet pas de diriger - pas même le 20 avril ... Gæbbels rend visite au « malade Fürtwängler » , et le trouve très affaibli :

« Il est très malade et fait peine à voir. Mais il ne peut pas s'empêcher de penser à ce jeune Karajan. Je vais essayer de trouver un moyen de les faire cohabiter. Je veux quand même garder ce Karajan à Berlin, au cas où ... même s'il n'est pas comparable à Fürtwängler. » (52)

Mais le 6 mai, déjà, Fürtwängler est totalement « rétabli » , et dirige le « Wiener » dans une tournée en Europe du Nord, puis le « Berliner » pour un concert dans les usines « Siemens » , et, enfin, un programme Beethoven avec Elly Ney. Les bombardements sur Berlin se faisant de plus en plus dangereux, Fürtwängler, qui vient de se marier en 2es noces avec Élisabeth Ackermann, cherche à protéger sa famille et s'installe avec sa femme et ses enfants dans le Kremstal, à Achleiten : Hitler est mis au courant, et propose à Fürtwängler la maison de son choix. Celui-ci répond :

« En ces temps où de nombreux Allemands perdent leurs demeures et leurs foyers sous les bombardements, je ne peux accepter de me voir offrir une maison. » (53)

Hitler tient tête et décide alors de construire un « bunker » pour ces musiciens protégés, Hans Pfitzner, Richard Strauß et Wilhelm Fürtwängler, qui s'oppose à cette proposition :

« Bien entendu, je serais ravi, si je me trouvais face à une attaque aérienne, de pouvoir utiliser un abri anti-bombes dans une ville dangereuse comme Berlin. Mais cependant, au jour d'aujourd'hui, où tout Allemand doit supporter le fardeau de la guerre, et je n'y fais pas exception, je ne peux pas et je ne veux pas engager une telle inégalité pour ma famille et moi. Ce serait hors de propos, surtout dans cette petite ville hors de danger. » (54)

Mais la réalisation des travaux, confiés à Albert Speer et à l'organisation « Todt » , ira bel et bien jusqu'à son terme, dans la demeure de Fürtwängler à Potsdam : pour un total de « 52,092 " Reichsmark " au titre des bâtiments du " Führer ", 1,000 briques et 215 mètres (55) de poutres » (56) sont installés, rendant ce « bunker » , découvert en avril 1945 par l'Armée rouge, quasi indestructible.

Le 30 janvier 1944, la salle de la Philharmonie de Berlin, située sur la « Bernburgerstrasse » , est réduite en cendres, et les concerts, qui ont lieu l'après-midi en raison des bombardements nocturnes, sont transférés à l' « Admiralspalast » ou à la « Beethoven-Saal » de la « Köthener-Strasse » . Durant la saison, Fürtwängler dirige à Berlin, à Potsdam (57) , à Prague, en Espagne, au Portugal, mais tombe « malade » , début avril. Il obtient un certificat médical, et échappe au concert d'anniversaire d'Hitler, mais aussi à une tournée prévue en Turquie et, chose exceptionnelle, au Congrès Rosenberg sur la « construction d'une force culturelle anti-juive » , où 400 délégués sont conviés, dont Fürtwängler et les « Berliner » (57) . Himmler et Göring sont exaspérés par l'attitude de Fürtwängler ; mais Goebbels soutient son « Dirigeant » qui, dès le 4 mai, est de nouveau en pleine forme et reprend les enregistrements.

Brutalement cependant, après le 20 juillet 1944, Fürtwängler passe du statut de protégé à celui d'indésirable du régime. Au moment où l'Opération « Tristan und Isolde » aurait pu tuer le « Führer », Fürtwängler dirige à Bayreuth, et il ignore que son nom est cité dans la liste des conspirateurs. Fürtwängler a, en effet, des liens avec la Résistance : il a bien connu Claus Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg, car ils ont fréquenté les mêmes cercles munichois, dont le « Wolfskehl ». Son médecin, le Docteur Schmitt, qui lui a fourni de nombreux faux-certificats médicaux, appartient au « Cercle de Kreisau ». Fürtwängler apportera, en 1946, un élément supplémentaire dans l'explication de sa brutale disgrâce liée au complot du 20 juillet :

« J'avais été informé qu'un plan était envisagé, mais je n'étais au courant d'aucun point de détail. À une manifestation du Parti, à Potsdam, peu avant l'attentat, j'avais discuté avec des personnes que je connaissais bien, et qui s'avèrent impliquées dans le plan. » (58)

Si, aujourd'hui, la participation active de Fürtwängler à une conspiration est hors de propos, l'avis du régime nazi en 1944 est tout autre, et Fürtwängler ne se doute pas un instant du danger qui pèse sur ses épaules. Dès le 11 août 1944, Goebbels ferme tous les Festivals de musique et de théâtre en Allemagne, privant Fürtwängler d'un rôle de 1er plan dans la vie musicale du pays ; en septembre, la « Gestapo » ouvre une enquête sur son rôle dans la conspiration du 20 juillet et, 1 mois plus tard, il est prévenu de ces investigations. Maria Daelen, sa belle-sœur et interne en médecine, raconte que quelques semaines après l'attentat contre le « Führer », la « Gestapo » vient fouiller aussi bien son cabinet que sa maison de campagne. En janvier 1945, elle est soumise à de nombreux interrogatoires, où elle doit répondre du rôle présumé de Fürtwängler dans l'attentat contre Hitler (59), et particulièrement des liens du chef avec Otto Hübener, Hans Oster, Ulrich von Hassel, Erwin Blank, Adam von Trott zu Solz et Hans Bernd Giesevisu, tous liés à la conspiration. (60)

Une découverte récente tend à confirmer la présence de Fürtwängler dans les Cercles d'opposition à Hitler : dans une entrée du journal berlinois de Marie « Missie » Wassiltschikow, du 16 novembre 1943, l'auteur raconte avoir dîné chez Gottfried von Bismarck à Potsdam, avec Adam von Trott zu Solz, Monsieur et Madame Hassel, et Fürtwängler. À de nombreuses reprises, Elisabeth Fürtwängler, la veuve du chef, a confirmé l'information, qui donne un aperçu de la société que fréquentait Fürtwängler durant les années 1930 et 1940. Il n'est donc pas étonnant, compte tenu des preuves multiples de liens entre Fürtwängler et la Résistance allemande à Hitler, que le régime, et particulièrement Goebbels, fasse déchoir le Mæstro de son auréole de gloire et de son statut privilégié. Himmler, l'ennemi de toujours, en profite simplement pour faire appliquer une décision radicale, l'arrestation par la « Gestapo », en février 1945.

Ainsi, le 7 décembre 1944, Fürtwängler est déchu de son statut de « Gottbegnadet » et incorporé à la réserve militaire de Berlin, déclaré « Dienstpflichtiger ». Quelques jours plus tard, Adolf Hitler confie à son « ami » Albert Speer que les « SS » ont à charge de surveiller Fürtwängler et que la « Gestapo » va l'arrêter et l'emprisonner. Dans les derniers temps de la guerre, ce même Speer est le seul dignitaire nazi qui côtoie Fürtwängler. Lors d'un concert commandé par le ministre de l'Armement pour ses ouvriers, le 11 décembre 1944, Speer entre dans la loge du chef. Il relate cette rencontre :

« Il me dit : " Quelle est la situation ? " En décembre 1944, poser cette question était très risqué, je dois l'avouer, parce que la ligne officielle était que vous deviez croire en la victoire et montrer que vous en étiez convaincu. Sa question montrait qu'il avait plus que des doutes sur l'issue finale de la guerre. Fürtwängler, par son attitude, plaçait donc son destin entre mes mains, ce qui me poussa à lui dire clairement et franchement qu'il n'y avait plus d'espoir, que la fin était proche. Je lui ai conseillé de partir en Suisse et de ne pas revenir. Il m'a alors dit : " Mais comment le pourrais-je ? Que vont devenir mes Philharmoniker ? Je suis responsable d'eux. " » (61)

Speer déclare alors prendre l'Orchestre sous sa responsabilité jusqu'à la fin de la guerre, rôle qu'il assumera pleinement, en protégeant les musiciens jusqu'au 12 avril 1945, date du dernier concert du « Berliner » avant la reddition sans condition de l'Allemagne nazie. Fürtwängler, averti des risques qui pèsent sur lui, organise alors sa fuite en Suisse, où se trouve déjà sa famille.

Le 23 janvier 1945, après avoir donné son dernier concert à Berlin, interrompu par un bombardement, le chef voyage en train jusque Vienne avec l'ingénieur du son Friedrich Schnapp, « voyage de nuit durant lequel il est suivi par 2 jeunes hommes en noir » . (62)

Les 2 hommes stationnent nuit et jour devant l'Hôtel Imperial où il réside. Le 5 février 1945, après son dernier concert à Vienne, il travaille avec sa secrétaire Agathe von Thiedemann jusque 2 heures du matin, sans l'informer de ses plans de fuite. À 5 heures, il quitte sans encombre l'Hôtel et se rend à la gare, direction Bregenz. À 6 heures, la « Gestapo » entre dans la chambre d'Agathe von Thiedemann et demande à voir Fürtwängler.

Ayant échappé au régime nazi, de nouvelles batailles s'ouvrent après guerre pour Fürtwängler : alors qu'il tente de reprendre ses activités, une opposition anti-nazie s'élève en Suisse contre lui. Puis, vient le temps de la dénazification, à Vienne puis à Berlin : grâce aux témoignages de nombreux amis juifs ou bannis du régime, Fürtwängler est classé en « Kategorie 4, Mitläufer » , et autorisé à reprendre ses activités. Il dirige alors à nouveau sur les plus grandes scènes du monde, et ce dans toute l'Europe. Cependant, nommé à Chicago, il doit faire face à un lobby de musiciens contre lui, dont Arthur Rubinstein et Wladimir Horowitz, ainsi qu'au comité « Israël Stern » ; malgré le soutien de Yehudi Menuhin, Fürtwängler doit renoncer à tout nouvel engagement aux États-Unis. Déjà profondément affaibli moralement par la dénazification et par la montée en puissance de son grand rival Karajan, Fürtwängler perd progressivement l'ouïe dès 1952. Souffrant d'infection pulmonaire, il renonce à toute volonté de vivre, comme il le dit à sa femme, le 12 novembre 1954, à la clinique d'Ebersteinburg :

« Tu sais, ils croient tous que je suis venu ici pour guérir. Moi, je sais que je suis venu ici pour mourir. » (63)

Pour certains, Fürtwängler doit encore aujourd'hui demeurer au purgatoire, mais que peut-on réellement lui reprocher ? D'être resté en Allemagne, d'avoir joué pour Hitler et ses sbires ? Ce serait oublier qu'il y a sauvé des musiciens juifs ou bannis par le régime. D'avoir participé à l'idée nazie d'une « supériorité culturelle allemande » , en jouant Wagner, Bruckner et Beethoven ? C'est pourtant ce même Beethoven qui clame, avec Schiller : « Alle Menschen werden Brüder » , comme le plus cinglant démenti à l'antisémitisme nazi. Dans ses Mémoires, le cardinal de Retz écrit :

« Il est des temps où il est impossible de bien faire. »

Passer des compromis avec le Mal pour éviter le pire, cela nous semble bien vain, mais qu'il nous est aujourd'hui facile de juger ... Peut-être est-il finalement et simplement vain de vouloir absolument faire de Fürtwängler un Ange ou un Démon, car il me semble que sa seule véritable erreur date de 1933 : c'est celle d'avoir cru à sa propre illusion, cette illusion d'un Art totalement distant de la Politique, et d'un Artiste totalement apolitique. Déjà limitée, quand bien même techniquement réalisable, en temps de paix et de démocratie, elle n'était qu'une utopie sous le régime de la terreur, de la barbarie et de la guerre instauré par Hitler.

Notes

(1) « À torts et à raisons » est le titre de l'adaptation française de la pièce de Ronald Harwood, consacrée à la dénazification berlinoise de Fürtwängler : « Taking Sides » , Londres, Faber & Faber, 1995. L'adaptation cinématographique d'István Szabo date de 2002.

(2) Gitta Sereny - « Albert Speer : son combat avec la vérité » , Paris, Le Seuil (1997) , page 180.

(3) Wilfried von Oven - « Finale furioso. Mit Gœbbels bis zum Ende, Tübingen » , Grabert Verlag (1974) , page 268.

(4) Paul Hindemith - « Wilhelm Fürtwängler, in Diener der Musik » , herausgeber von Martin Müller und Wolfgang Mertz, Rainer Wunderlich Verlag, Tübingen (1965) , page 180-187.

Ire traduction française : Audrey Roncigli, Société Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Paris (2007) .

http://www.furtwangler.net/doc/Paul_Hindemith.pdf

(5) Curt RieB - « Fürtwängler, Musik und Politik » , Scherz, Berne (1953) , page 129.

(6) Thomas Mann - « Tagebücher » , volume 2, Fischer Verlag, Francfort (1977) , page 15.

(7) Herbert Haffner - « Fürtwängler » , Parthas Verlag, Berlin (2006) , page 150.

(8) Josef Gœbbels - « Reden 1932-1939 » , herausgeber von Helmut Heiber, Droste Verlag, Düsseldorf (1972) , page 282.

(9) Les lettres sont citées dans leur intégralité dans l'ouvrage d'Hildegard Brenner : « La politique artistique du National-Socialisme » , Maspero, Paris (1980) , annexes.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Wilhelm Fürtwängler - « Aufzeichnungen, 1924-1954 » , herausgeber von Elisabeth Fürtwängler und Günter Birkner, Wiesbaden, Friedrich Arnold Brockhaus, 1980, page 119.

(13) Berta Geimar - « Musik im Schatten der Politik » , Atlantis Verlag, Zürich (1985) , page 96.

(14) Wilhelm Fürtwängler - « Über meine Beziehungen zum Nationalsozialismus. Undatierte Denkschrift für das Spruchkammerverfahren 1946 » , Bundesarchiv « Reichskulturkammer » , Berlin (2301/00003/01) , pages 10 à 26 (Beziehungen) .

Ire traduction française : Audrey Roncigli, Société Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Paris (2006) .

http://www.furtwangler.net/doc/Furtwaengler_face_au_national_socialisme.pdf

(15) Fred K. Prieberg - « Trial of Strength : Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the 3rd “ Reich ” » , Quartet Books, Londres (1991) , page 344.

(16) Le cas d'Heinrich Wollheim est particulièrement intéressant : de demi-sang juif, musicien à la « Staatskapelle » , il aide des amis recherchés par les Nazis à rejoindre la Suisse. Arrêté par la « Gestapo » , il clame être le copiste personnel de Fürtwängler, qui le connaît de nom mais, bien entendu, pas personnellement. Ce dernier vient cependant le chercher alors que Wollheim est sur le point d'être mené à « Dachau » , et confirme sa version ; libéré sur ordre d'Heinrich Himmler, il devient le copiste à vie de Fürtwängler.

(17) Peter Muck - « Einhundert Jahre Berliner Philharmoniker Orchester » , volume 2, Hans Schneider, Tutzing (1982) , page 202.

(18) Fred K. Prieberg - « Kraftprobe. Wilhelm Fürtwängler im Dritten Reich » , Friedrich Arnold Brockhaus, Wiesbaden (1986) , page 133.

(19) Mosche Menuhin - « Die Menuhins » , Schweizer Verlaghaus, Zürich (1984) , page 212.

(20) Artur Schnabel - « Aus dir wird nie ein Pianist » , Wolke Verlag, Hofheim (1991) , page 141.

(21) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(22) Audrey Roncigli - « Musicien sous le 3e “ Reich ” » , mémoire de Maîtrise I, Université de Nancy 2 (2006) , pages 35-37.

(23) Erik Levi - « Musik in the 3rd “ Reich ” », MacMillan Press, Londres (1984) , page 38.

(24) Fred K. Prieberg - « Trial of Strength : Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the 3rd “ Reich ” », Quartet Books, Londres (1991) , page 144.

(25) Alfred Rosenberg - « Ästhetik oder Volkskampf » , Völkischer Beobachter, 6 décembre 1934.

(26) Herbert Haffner, opus cité, page 206.

(27) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(28) Josef Gœbbels - « Tagebücher 1924-1945 » , volume 3, herausgeber von Georg Reuth, Reinhard Piper Verlag, Munich (1992) , page 857.

(29) Wilhelm Fürtwängler a exploité le ressort de cette photographie, lors de son passage devant la Commission de dénazification, en expliquant qu'il n'a jamais effectué le salut hitlérien alors que celui-ci était exigé en public.

(30) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(31) Wilhelm Fürtwängler - « Briefe » , herausgeber von Franck Thiess, Friedrich Arnold Brockhaus, Wiesbaden (1965) , page 87.

(32) Friedelind Wagner - « Nacht über Bayreuth. Die Geschichte der Enkelin Richard Wagners » , Dittrich Verlag, Cologne (1994) , page 84.

(33) Josef Gœbbels - « Die Tagebücher » , volume 3, herausgeber von Elke Fröhlich, De Gruyter Saur, Munich (1993-2000) , page 369.

(34) Fred K. Prieberg - « Trial of Strength : Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the 3rd “ Reich ” », Quartet Books, Londres (1991) , page 211.

(35) Curt Rieß, opus cité, page 226.

(36) Josef Gœbbels - « Tagebücher » , volume 4, page 356.

(37) Otto Straßer - « Und dafür wird man noch bezahlt. Mein Leben mit den Wiener Philharmonikern » , Paul Neff Verlag, Munich (1978) , page 135.

(38) Transcription du témoignage de Boheslaw Barlog dans le documentaire de Lothar Seehaus : « Wilhelm Fürtwängler - ein Künstler zwischen den Mahlsteinen der Politik » , Zweite Deutsche Fernsehse (1979) .

(39) Ayant un fort penchant pour l'alcool, il était connu sous le nom de Bierleiter Gauckel parmi les Nazis.

(40) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(41) Wilhelm Fürtwängler - « Ton und Wort. Aufsätze und Vorträge 1918 bis 1954 » , Friedrich Arnold Brockhaus, Wiesbaden (1966) , page 176.

Ire traduction française du discours de 1942 : Audrey Roncigli, Société Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Paris (2007) .

http://www.furtwangler.net/doc/Centenaire_Wiener.pdf

(42) Josef Gœbbels - « Tagebücher » , volume 6, page 344.

(43) Olivier Rathkolb in Roger Vaughan - « Karajan » , Belfond, Paris (1988) , page 122.

(44) Roger Vaughan, opus cité, page 125.

(45) Ibid. , page 126.

(46) See : René Tremine - « La Légion d'honneur de Fürtwängler » , Société Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Paris (1986) .

<http://www.furtwangler.net/doc/honneur.rtf>

(47) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(48) Josef Gœbbels - « Tagebücher » , volume 8, page 410.

(49) Ibid. , volume 9, page 296.

(50) Josef Gœbbels - « Reden » , page 118.

(51) Oliver Rathkolb - « Führertreu und Gottbegnadet, Künstlereliten im Dritten Reich » , Österreichischer Bundesverlag, Vienne (1991) , page 166.

(52) Josef Gœbbels - « Tagebücher » , volume 8, page 386.

(53) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(54) Lettre de Wilhelm Fürtwängler à Adolf Hitler (Achleiten, le 21 mai 1944) , Bundesarchiv R 3/1578, Coblenz, page 242-243 ; dans Fred K. Prieberg - « Trial of Strength : Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the 3rd “ Reich ” » , Quartet Books, Londres (1991) , page 308.

(55) Fred K. Prieberg - « Trial of Strength : Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the 3rd “ Reich ” » , Quartet Books, Londres (1991) , page 309.

(56) Dans un programme Ravel, alors que Goebbels avait interdit la musique française le 3 novembre 1943 !

(57) Joseph Wulf, Martin Bormann - « Hitlers Schatten » , Sigbert Mohn Verlag, Gütersloh (1962) , page 92.

(58) Wilhelm Fürtwängler (Beziehungen) .

(59) Herbert Haffner, opus cité, page 316.

(60) Fred K. Prieberg - « Trial of Strength : Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the 3rd “ Reich ” » , Quartet Books, Londres (1991) , page 323.

(61) Transcription du témoignage d'Albert Speer dans l'interview de Lothar Seehaus : Zweite Deutsche Fernseh, 27 février 1979.

(62) Herbert Haffner, opus cité, page 318.

(63) Ibid.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1886-1954) , le chef d'orchestre mythique du « Berliner Philharmoniker » dans les années 1920 et 1930, choisit de ne pas quitter l'Allemagne à l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis. Pour certains, il fut l'ambassadeur musical du 3e « Reich » . Pour d'autres, le choix de rester dans son pays se justifia par le fait qu'il essaya, autant que faire se peut, de protéger certains musiciens et la vie musicale allemande et autrichienne en général. Dès 1933, cependant, ce choix marquait la naissance du « cas Fürtwängler » .

AB 124 : Philosophie musicale de Fürtwängler

30 juin 1943 : Enregistrement historique réalisé à l' « Alte Philharmonie » de Berlin. Ce jour-là, le grand chef d'orchestre allemand Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirigeait la célèbre phalange, dans un programme comprenant l'Ouverture de Coriolan et les Symphonies nos. 4 et 5 de Beethoven.

Homme d'une extrême sensibilité et d'un tempérament incandescent, âme fragile et tourmentée, Wilhelm Fürtwängler a été un de ces esprits magnifiques qui passent parfois au milieu des masses. Mais son art, ne l'a pas pour autant préservé des difficultés de son époque. Fürtwängler avait pour habitude de noter ses réflexions sur la musique ainsi que des observations diverses sur le monde qui l'entourait. De ce fait, pénétrer la vision artistique du chef sans connaître l'homme est plus délicat. Mais il suffit d'en être conscient et de laisser de côté, pour le moment, l'aspect essentiellement politique et inhérent (bien malgré lui d'ailleurs) à sa personnalité. C'est assez que d'examiner sa position quant au rôle presque religieux qu'il accorde à la performance musicale.

À travers ses écrits personnels, ses carnets ou bien encore sa correspondance, Fürtwängler n'a cessé d'exposer et de défendre l'idée de la création musicale comme un tout organique. Pour lui, le Concerto doit, en quelque sorte, incarner son étymologie en rendant possible l'accord des âmes à travers l'expérience collective. Le contact entre le public et l'artiste est le relais pour atteindre cet état de conscience partagée qui renseigne l'Homme sur lui-même. Voilà pourquoi il est, à nos yeux du moins, si important d'écouter les enregistrements publics réalisés par Fürtwängler. Certes, il n'aimait pas le disque qui entraverait selon lui la communion entre l'auditeur et l'interprète et détruirait le message artistique par excellence. Mais, il n'en demeure pas moins qu'à l'écoute d'un document sonore pris sur le vif, l'amateur de musique achète de nos jours (avec tous les bruits parasites de l'assistance) une petite part du miracle. La question reste invariable dans la bouche du grand homme durant toute sa vie : « le public marche-t-il ou non ? » .

En définitive, par-delà les raisons techniques, l'enregistrement est pour lui un cas de conscience face à l'aspect vivant qu'incarne la musique. Selon lui, le micro enferme l'interprète dans son désir de perfection. À cela s'ajoute la peur des tempos extrêmement lents, des grands contrastes, des pauses, l'angoisse de tout ce qui est poussé à l'extrême, mais aussi de tout ce qui articule, façonne, produit la forme au sens le plus profond du terme. Cela implique une modification décisive dans notre façon de jouer. La musique risque de se retrouver de plus en plus dépouillée de son caractère immédiat de vie, le rythme, la pulsation vivante du cœur de se rapprocher de la cadence mécanique et impersonnelle de la machine, la constitution organique d'être privée d'une partie de sa chaleur, de sa vie, de son opulence et de son tempérament, jusque dans le moindre accent de son chant.

On comprend le souci permanent de Fürtwängler de conserver la force vive de la musique en préservant l'aspect naturel de sa création. En effet, cette « pulsation vivante » est le propre même de la création artistique, ce que l'on peut appeler : l'interprétation. Car pour le chef allemand, la musique (bien qu'elle contienne en elle-même toute sa force artistique) se présente sous une forme abstraite qui libère toute son expression à travers l'artiste. Celui-ci a donc la responsabilité de transmettre ce « caractère immédiat de vie » que le micro détruit. Ainsi, interpréter n'est pas fixer avec minutie une multitude de détails (techniques ou musicaux) mais libérer l'inspiration du moment comme le veut la loi de l'improvisation. C'est sans doute là que réside le génie de Fürtwängler : dans la volonté de faire primer l'instant sur l'habitude. Lorsque l'on écoute ses lers enregistrements de 1926, et, plus généralement, ceux des années 1930, on sent déjà combien son expression musicale contient de variables : rythme, tempo, crescendo, sforzando, rupture. Autant de modes d'expression qui ont attendu le moment adéquat pour s'exprimer à un niveau paroxystique et révéler toute la violence d'une époque.

Un « style de guerre »

Le « Reich » qui devait durer 1,000 ans se retrouve, en 1943, dangereusement chancelant. Le 2 février, la reddition de la 6e armée du maréchal Paulus, à Stalingrad, met fin à la bataille la plus meurtrière de toute l'histoire militaire. Elle a coûté la vie à près de 1,000,000 de personnes (soldats et civiles) et considérablement affecté les troupes allemandes. Préoccupé par sa crédibilité et conscient que l'Allemagne est en train de perdre la guerre, Adolf Hitler envoie son ministre de la Propagande pour galvaniser le peuple allemand. Le 18 février 1943, à Berlin, Josef Goebbels lance ces paroles apocalyptiques de la tribune nazie du « Sportpalast » et déchaîne la foule : « Ich frage euch : Wollt ihr den totalen Krieg ? Wollt ihr ihn, wenn nötig, totaler und radikaler, als wir ihn uns heute überhaupt erst vorstellen können ? Nun, Volk, steh auf und Sturm brich los ! » (Je vous demande, voulez-vous la guerre totale ? La voulez-vous, une guerre encore plus totale et radicale que tout ce que nous pouvons imaginer ? Peuple, lève toi ! Tempête déchaîne-toi !) .

Les conséquences ne se font pas attendre et le pays subit, de plus en plus régulièrement, les bombardements alliés. Plus touchée que la plupart des autres villes allemandes, la capitale paye le prix de sa valeur symbolique aux yeux du National-Socialisme. L'inversion du rapport de forces au cœur du conflit oblige les dirigeants allemands à privilégier l'effort de guerre aux affaires culturelles. L'année 1943 marque donc la fin de la politique culturelle du « Reich », diminuant brutalement le nombre de concerts. Beaucoup de musiciens perdent leur statut privilégié qui les dispensait du service militaire, et sont envoyés au combat sur les différents fronts d'Europe. Josef Goebbels établit à ce moment-là une liste de 36 pages contenant les noms des « Gottbegnadet » (les protégés de Dieu) que la nation a comme rôle de protéger. Parmi les plus célèbres, on y trouve Carl Orff, Clemens Krauß, Max Lorenz et Karl Böhm. 3 noms font l'objet d'une liste spéciale : Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner et Wilhelm Fürtwängler qui, selon les termes mêmes du document, représentent un « capital immense pour la nation ». Mais la suite est connue, les mois qui suivent plongent le pays dans le chaos jusqu'à la chute du 3e « Reich », le 8 mai 1945.

Bien que la quasi-totalité de Berlin ait été détruite, les bandes d'enregistrement de la « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (Radio du « Reich ») sont trouvées par l'Armée Rouge après la prise de Berlin et emmenées en Russie. Par la suite, ces enregistrements sont édités peu à peu et dans des proportions très restreintes en URSS. Commence alors un véritable marché noir avec les documents sonores de l'époque de guerre, dont certains passent le mur sous le manteau et restent, pour cette raison, longtemps méconnus des mélomanes. Finalement, lors de l'explosion du bloc de l'Est (soit 50 ans après avoir été gravées), la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » publie enfin ces bandes par l'intermédiaire de la Radio Libre de Berlin. Ce que l'on peut appeler aujourd'hui, à juste titre, le « style de guerre » de Fürtwängler a été, au moment de la découverte des enregistrements de cette période, un choc terrible. Il suffit d'écouter un des concerts peut-être le plus significatif pour en mesurer l'impact : celui du 30 juin 1943 avec la Philharmonie de Berlin. Ce soir-là précisément, avec l'Ouverture Coriolan et les Symphonies nos. 4 et 5, Beethoven et Fürtwängler donnent un « Requiem » pour une Allemagne dénaturée par la barbarie nazie. Ce qui est remarquable à l'écoute de ce concert, c'est qu'il réussit à « communiquer un peu de l'atmosphère qui régnait à l'époque », comme le dit sa femme Elisabeth Fürtwängler. Effectivement, dans les dernières années de la guerre, se rendre à l'« Alte Philharmonie » n'était pas chose facile et, aux dires des musiciens eux-mêmes, les gens se demandaient s'ils n'allaient pas assister à leur dernier concert. Ces craintes étaient du reste tout à fait justifiées, puisque cette salle (tout comme le « Staatsoper » et l'« Admiralspalast ») a fini sous les bombes. Les concerts se déroulaient avec des interruptions fréquentes dues aux alertes nocturnes et contraignaient public et musiciens à attendre pour voir si la soirée pouvait continuer. On imagine certainement avec peine venir au concert, en ces instants, était un acte de foi, excluant toute autre motivation en dehors de l'art. Cette très forte tension a imprégné les performances artistiques du chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler, au point qu'il est aujourd'hui difficile de les comprendre avec une grille interprétative habituelle. Sans doute est-ce là une marque de la puissance de l'art véritable, capable de soulever l'homme pour le libérer (ne fût-ce qu'un instant) de son ordinaire. Un idéal que le grand chef allemand a recherché toute sa vie.

AB 125 : Principe créateur dans la musique

Introduction

« Est-ce qu'on sait bien ce qu'est l'âme humaine ? Elle n'est pas un modèle en carton sur lequel le musicien viendrait broder des points d'or ; elle n'est même pas explorée tout entière. Et dans tous les cas, il se produit souvent en elle, pour nous servir du langage musical, des changements de clef qui transforment les sentiments et les états les plus connus. Or, cette vie flottante de l'âme n'est pas d'un côté et la musique de l'autre. La musique ne la traduit pas seulement, elle la crée. » (Jean Jaurès : De la réalité du monde sensible.)

Cette citation de Jean Jaurès, qui fut confronté en son temps à la nécessité d'un sursaut collectif (malheureusement sans succès, comme l'a confirmé l'arrivée de la Première Guerre mondiale) montre qu'il avait, si ce n'est compris, du moins senti, le rôle fondamental que doit revêtir la musique, ou plutôt un certain type de musique. Selon lui, l'art en question ne doit en aucun cas se suffire à refléter un état d'âme, qu'il soit nostalgique, rageur, cynique ou même gai : car ce serait réduire l'âme, qui « s'ignore elle-même plus qu'à moitié ». Ajoutons que l'âme humaine (et c'est ce qui fait sa singularité) est en devenir, et qu'elle doit se nourrir de tout ce qui peut l'aider à imaginer ce qui n'existe pas encore, afin de s'assurer, en le créant, un futur.

Pénétrons dans l'univers de Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1886-1954), grand chef d'orchestre allemand du XXe siècle, grâce aux écrits qu'il a laissés et aux nombreux entretiens (notamment retransmis dans l'ouvrage « Musique et verbe »). À travers son combat devenu « politique » et sa conception de ce qu'est véritablement l'art qu'il dirige, musique et préoccupation pour l'âme humaine (et son sort) ne font qu'un.

Le principe de Fürtwängler : défier l'esclavage de la certitude des sens

Wilhelm Fürtwängler est un chef d'orchestre de la première moitié du XXe siècle, et il faut préciser que son approche n'a rien à voir avec la façon dont nous concevons la musique Classique aujourd'hui, c'est-à-dire comme un simple divertissement. Son approche est rigoureusement scientifique, chose qui a malheureusement disparu dans notre culture. Après 2 ou 3 générations d'une véritable dé-génération, la plupart des gens ne comprennent plus et n'ont plus un sens vivant de ce qu'on peut appeler le principe de Fürtwängler.

Ce principe, qu'il a constamment exprimé, non seulement dans ses interprétations mais également dans ses écrits, ne se borne pas à nous informer de la manière dont la musique devrait être interprétée et comprise ; c'est un principe physique universel, qui doit nous amener à repenser et redéfinir notre conception ontologique de l'univers physique.

Entre les notes

Qu'est-ce qui rend les interprétations de Fürtwängler aussi uniques ? Prenons comme exemple une œuvre dirigée par Fürtwängler, en l'occurrence une Symphonie de Tchaïkovski. C'était à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, alors qu'il se trouvait dans une base militaire près de Calcutta : ce fut pour lui un véritable choc, quelque chose qui ne ressemblait en rien à tout ce qu'il avait expérimenté jusqu'alors. Il décrit un sentiment de suspense, maintenu sans relâche du début à la fin, qui le fit presque littéralement tomber de sa chaise : une cohérence remarquable du tout, en tant qu'unité, du début jusqu'à la fin. C'est ce qu'un autre chef d'orchestre a décrit, ayant eu l'occasion d'assister à des répétitions de Fürtwängler à Milan, comme une « tension électrique » imprégnant tout l'orchestre, dès le moment où Fürtwängler entrait dans la salle. Omniprésente, cette tension imprégnait non seulement les notes en tant que telles, mais également les silences entre les notes audibles, là où il n'y a aucun son. Décrivons cela comme « la pré-note » et « l'après-note » que l'on entend dans notre esprit, tandis que les notes audibles sont entendues par l'oreille.

C'est surtout grâce à son Maître Arthur Nikisch (1895-1922) que Fürtwängler a compris comment faire vivre la musique.

Le prédécesseur et mentor de Fürtwängler fut le chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch. C'est principalement grâce à lui, en l'entendant diriger, qu'il a développé un sens vivant de ce principe. On disait de Nikisch qu'il était capable de donner un sentiment ineffable, indéfinissable, de quelque chose « entre les notes ». Cette idée de ce qui se passe « entre les notes » est exactement le genre de phénomène qui a lieu quand on écoute la musique de Fürtwängler. Toute personne sensible, pourvu qu'elle ne soit pas devenue mentalement sourde et que son âme n'ait pas été asséchée par la musique populaire et la culture généralement cynique dans laquelle nous baignons aujourd'hui, serait immédiatement saisie en écoutant un enregistrement d'une interprétation de Wilhelm Fürtwängler ; et vous le seriez aussi !

C'est ce « mystère » qui nous rend capables de jeter un œil sur ce monde au-delà des murs de la prison où nous enferme notre expérience sensorielle.

Voici ce qu'était le secret de Fürtwängler : si l'esprit peut expérimenter quelque chose de différent et d'indépendant des sensations en tant que telles, quelque chose qui les précède, alors cela signifie qu'il ne dépend pas de l'expérience sensorielle. L'esprit n'est pas la somme de toutes les expériences sensorielles qu'il a connues jusqu'à ce moment. Au contraire, du fait qu'elle appartient à un domaine chimique ou physique inférieur, l'expérience sensorielle devient subordonnée à la nature plus substantielle de l'esprit, dont elle dépend. Cette idée nous permet d'inverser cette conception de l'univers partant du bas vers le haut, et d'établir une hiérarchie ontologique d'un univers créateur engendrant de haut en bas tout ce qui est.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler comprenait cette idée, avec toutes ses implications universelles. Il l'a découverte de l'intérieur du monde de la musique, tout en comprenant qu'il s'agissait d'un principe universel de l'esprit humain créateur, et de l'univers créateur.

Voici un court passage d'un écrit de Fürtwängler où il traite de la façon dont l'interprète doit s'élever des multiples notes d'une partition vers l'unicité initiale de l'œuvre conçue par le compositeur :

« Considérons l'acte de création artistique. Lorsque l'on regarde ce processus de plus près, on remarque que 2 niveaux se distinguent. À un 1er niveau, la combinaison de chaque élément avec ceux qui lui sont proches forme des éléments plus grands. Puis, ces éléments plus grands se combinent avec d'autres, et ainsi de suite, dans une croissance logique en expansion, des parties vers le « Tout ». Mais à un autre niveau, la situation est inversée. L'unité donnée par le « Tout » contrôle le comportement des éléments qu'il contient, jusqu'au moindre petit détail. Le fait essentiel notable est que dans toute œuvre d'art authentique, ces 2 niveaux se complètent l'un l'autre, de telle sorte que l'un ne devient effectif que lorsqu'il est associé à l'autre. »

Musique Classique et science physique

Cette citation constitue l'affirmation ontologique (d'un processus unique ayant donné naissance à ce qui est) la plus précise faite au cours du XXe siècle. Le fait qu'elle fasse écho aux préoccupations de certains des plus grands scientifiques de l'époque n'est pas une coïncidence : plus spécifiquement Albert Einstein et Max Planck. Ce n'est pas non plus un hasard que durant leurs loisirs (moment où, en réalité, ils réalisaient leurs plus grandes découvertes, comme le disait Einstein à sa manière) ces 2 scientifiques aient pratiqué l'interprétation musicale Classique. Planck était un pianiste et organiste très doué, Einstein un violoniste talentueux qui joua dans des Quatuors à cordes.

Ainsi, le musicien Fürtwängler s'avère être un grand scientifique. Car le véritable domaine où l'esprit humain découvre sa propre identité en tant que substance créatrice, et où il en voit le reflet dans l'univers, est la science physique. C'est ce à quoi l'on prend part lorsque l'on interprète et que l'on comprend le grand art Classique.

Il n'est pas étonnant non plus que Fürtwängler, dans le passage « l'unité du " Tout " animant le processus de transformation de chacune de ses parties » fasse écho à celui qui est certainement le plus grand philosophe des 3 derniers siècles :

Gottfried Leibniz, qui a exprimé à plusieurs reprises exactement la même idée dans des écrits tels que le « Discours de métaphysique » (1686) , « La monadologie » (1714) , ou encore son « De l'origine radicale des choses » (1697) : il n'existe nulle part d'entité finie en tant que telle, ou de somme d'entités finies, pour laquelle on ne puisse trouver de raison suffisante à son existence. Au contraire, c'est dans le domaine de la substance supérieure, le « Un » , lequel se situe nécessairement au-delà de l'entité finie ou de la somme d'entités finies, qu'on peut trouver la raison suffisante à l'existence de cette entité finie ou de cette somme d'entités finies.

Ce n'est donc absolument pas un hasard que Fürtwängler ait découvert un principe ne se cantonnant pas au domaine de la musique en soi, un principe physique universel, contenant en son sein l'ontologie de l'univers tout entier. Et ceci renvoie à l'importance de la pensée de Leibniz. C'est en partant de l'existence d'un processus créateur, en tant que substance nécessaire ayant engendré toutes les choses d'ordre fini, et d'un homme créateur à son image, et seulement ainsi, que l'on peut comprendre la puissance de ce que l'on expérimente en découvrant une composition musicale réellement Classique.

AB 126 : Wilhelm Fürtwängler : un combat culturel contre le fascisme

Introduction

Il est des hommes, dans la longue lignée de l'histoire humaine, dont la beauté et la justesse du combat peuvent se mesurer à l'aune de l'opprobre et de la calomnie qu'ils ont subies. Il en est ainsi du grand chef d'orchestre allemand Wilhelm Fürtwängler. Cet homme souffrit d'avoir courageusement tenté de protéger la véritable culture Classique allemande de la destruction orchestrée par les Nazis, puis par l'oligarchie financière.

Pour comprendre son combat, il faut comprendre dans quel milieu il baigna, et ce dès son enfance. Sa famille fut en effet un terrain propice à la réflexion, à l'art et à la philosophie. Sa mère, Adelheid Wendt, dont le père avait été ami de Johannes Brahms, était peintre et son père, Adolf Fürtwängler, cousin du mathématicien Philipp Fürtwängler (professeur de mathématiques de Kurt Gödel), fut un éminent archéologue, qui dirigea les fouilles allemandes à Egine, Mycènes et Olympie, et dont certains ouvrages sur la céramique grecque font encore autorité.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler était des voyages de son père, et Elizabeth Fürtwängler, sa future épouse, témoigne de son intérêt pour Beethoven déjà à cette époque : « Wilhelm m'a raconté qu'adolescent il avait accompagné son père à Egine, en 1901. Là, le jeune Fürtwängler montait dès le matin dans les forêts de pins et les collines, et lisait les Quatuors de Beethoven dans l'immensité solitaire de la nature. » .

Genèse d'un chef d'orchestre d'exception

De fait, la manière dont Fürtwängler concevra sa vocation d'artiste est imprégnée de l'idéalisme de la Grèce antique. Elizabeth Fürtwängler témoignera de l'importance de la pensée de Schenker pour son mari, même bien après la guerre : « Wilhelm se passionnait pour le concept du " fernhören " que le musicologue juif viennois Heinrich Schenker situe au cœur de toutes ses considérations. L'écoute à distance, c'est-à-dire le fait d'entendre ou de percevoir sur une longue distance une grande continuité, est, pour Schenker, le signe distinctif de la grande musique Classique. » . Sa collaboration avec Schenker durera jusqu'en 1935, année de disparition du musicologue.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler fut retiré très tôt du système scolaire. Il eut alors pour précepteurs l'archéologue Ludwig Curtis, les compositeurs Anton Beer-Walbrunn, Josef Rheinberger et Max von Schillings, ainsi que Conrad Ansorge, ami de Franz Liszt, pour le piano. Il devint chef d'orchestre à l'âge de 20 ans. Son 1er concert eut lieu, le 19 février 1906, à Munich lors duquel il dirigea « la Consécration de la maison » de Beethoven, un Poème symphonique en si mineur de sa propre composition et la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. En février 1912, il rencontra le chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch. Elizabeth Fürtwängler dira plus tard : « Fürtwängler affirmait qu'il n'avait appris que d'Arthur Nikisch. À ses yeux, parmi les chefs d'orchestre, nul autre qu'Arthur Nikisch n'était digne de considération. » . En 1922, il prit sa succession à la tête des Orchestres du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig et du Philharmonique de Berlin.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler s'affirmera donc comme le plus grand représentant de l'héritage Classique allemand. Bien que ne refusant pas de jouer des œuvres de musique moderne (atonale) comme celles d'Arnold Schönberg, Béla Bartók ou Igor Stravinsky, il défendra toute sa vie durant, et surtout vers la fin, la musique tonale comme seul moyen d'exprimer des « Idées » en musique.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler milita aussi pour la paix entre les nations à travers les relations artistiques et culturelles. Par exemple, il continua à diriger de la musique française en Allemagne pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, dont « Carmen » de Georges Bizet. Il joua également un rôle de 1er plan dans le rapprochement culturel avec la France, suite aux accords de Locarno.

Or c'est à cette époque que les attaques commencent. Lors de sa 1re représentation à New York, en 1925, il dirige la 5e symphonie de Beethoven, qui fut accueillie par 15 minutes de « standing ovation ». Les membres de l'Orchestre, ainsi que d'autres musiciens, le proposent alors comme chef d'orchestre régulier à New York, ou au Philharmonique de la ville. Or, cette initiative n'est pas du goût d'un certain Olin Downes, correspondant du New York Times, qui, par ses critiques calomnieuses, réussit à saboter l'initiative. Rappelons que c'est le New York « Times » qui louera la politique d'apaisement de Neville Chamberlain vis-à-vis d'Adolf Hitler. C'est donc bel et bien l'« establishment » de la côte Est qui contrôle les institutions musicales de New York, et son but est clair, comme nous le verrons plus tard : remplacer l'héritage Classique de Beethoven par de la « musique moderne ». À la place de Fürtwängler est affecté l'« anti-fasciste » auto-proclamé Arturo Toscanini, pur produit de la culture vénitienne et ancien candidat du Parti fasciste italien à Milan aux élections parlementaires de 1919.

Un humaniste Classique contre le 3e « Reich »

Mais le combat de Wilhelm Fürtwängler prend un tour plus dramatique en 1933. Le régime nazi arrive au pouvoir, et les relations amicales du musicien avec de nombreuses personnalités juives comme Heinrich Schenker et surtout Paul Hindemith, sont sujet de querelle avec le régime. On reprochera plusieurs fois à Fürtwängler d'être resté en Allemagne pendant cette période. Mais c'est précisément durant cette période que son combat en défense de l'héritage Classique allemand s'affirme véritablement. En effet, bien que les Nazis prétendent défendre l'art allemand en interdisant totalement la musique atonale, leur volonté de destruction de tout produit culturel remettant en cause leur hégémonie, les pousse à attaquer la culture Classique allemande elle-même, de par son amour « dérangeant » pour le vrai. Le poète Heinrich Heine subit les autodafés de 1933, le « Guillaume Tell » de Schiller est interdit par Adolf Hitler lui-même, le 3 juin 1941, en tant que « drame de la liberté », et la politique d'aryanisation du répertoire aboutit à l'interdiction des œuvres de Jean-Sébastien Bach à Königsberg, en 1944, à cause de ses soi-disant « textes infestés par les Juifs ».

C'est en 1934 que s'amorce le véritable affrontement entre Fürtwängler et le régime, et il ne cessera de s'intensifier. En effet, le Maître persiste à diriger les œuvres de Félix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, comme le 12 et 13 février 1934 où il présente le « Songe d'une nuit d'été » à Berlin, alors que la musique du compositeur juif a été totalement interdite par le régime. La tension atteint un point critique lorsqu'il dirige « Mathis le peintre » de Paul Hindemith, le 11 mars 1934, alors qu'Hitler veut interdire les compositions de ce dernier. Excédé par les attaques de la presse nazie, Fürtwängler publie un article dans le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » le 25 novembre 1934, intitulé : « Le cas Hindemith » . L'affaire prend alors une tournure politique, et les attaques venant de partout, aussi bien d'Heinrich Himmler que d'Alfred Rosenberg (principal théoricien du Nazisme) , Fürtwängler démissionne le 4 décembre 1934 de ses postes de chef du Philharmonique de Berlin, directeur du « Staatsoper » de Berlin, vice-président de la Chambre de la musique du « Reich » et Conseiller d'État de Prusse.

En 1936, le cours de sa vie est sur le point d'être bouleversé : la direction de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York lui propose en effet de succéder à Arturo Toscanini. Fürtwängler accepte, mais une mystérieuse dépêche de l'agence berlinoise de l' « Associated Press » annonce que le chef d'orchestre est rétabli dans ses fonctions de directeur de l'Opéra de Berlin. Les milieux de l' « establishment » hostiles à Fürtwängler utiliseront plus tard cet événement pour donner de lui l'image d'un Nazi camouflé. Devant l'intense polémique déclenchée outre-Atlantique, il renonce à la proposition new-yorkaise, par un télégramme rendu public le 15 mars 1936.

En 1937, le chef d'orchestre se rend au Festival de Salzbourg, devenu centre des musiciens anti-Nazis, Adolf Hitler ayant interdit aux musiciens allemands de s'y produire, pour diriger la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven. Toscanini, présent à ce Festival, se rachète une virginité en attaquant violemment Fürtwängler en raison de sa présence en Allemagne. Par la suite, les relations avec le régime ne font qu'empirer, pour atteindre un point de non-retour en 1938, quand Hermann Göring sort de son chapeau un chef d'orchestre dont le style « fanfare » n'a d'égal que sa capacité à faire des compromis avec le régime : il s'agit d'Herbert von Karajan, que le Ministre de la propagande Josef Gœbbels fait tout pour placer à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, à la place de Fürtwängler. Cette période devient de fait une source de profond désespoir pour notre chef d'orchestre. Cette année-là, qui voit la sanglante « Nuit de cristal » , il sauve la vie de plusieurs musiciens juifs comme Carl Flesch et son épouse, ou Heinrich Wollheim, musicien de l'Opéra de Berlin.

En 1942, il apparaît dans le concert qui lui sera le plus reproché après-guerre, dirigeant la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven, jouée dans le cadre de l'anniversaire d'Adolf Hitler. Il faut savoir que notre chef d'orchestre avait justement planifié une série de concerts à Vienne pour éviter de se produire lors de cet anniversaire.

Mais Gœbbels annule les concerts pour faire revenir Fürtwängler de force à Berlin. Traumatisé par sa participation à cet événement, il va multiplier les certificats médicaux en avril 1943 pour pouvoir disparaître ; celui qu'il obtient lui vient du docteur Johannes Ludwig Schmitt, résistant membre du « Cercle de Kreisau » . Cela lui permet d'éviter non seulement l'anniversaire d'Adolf Hitler de 1943 mais aussi un congrès gigantesque organisé par Gœbbels en Turquie pour manifester une « force culturelle anti-juive » .

En janvier de cette année-là, Heinrich Himmler obtient ce qu'il cherchait depuis 1933 : l'autorisation de faire arrêter Fürtwängler par ses Waffen SS. Mais Fürtwängler parvient à rejoindre sa femme en Suisse. D'après Elizabeth, c'est là que va débiter le second combat culturel de Wilhelm Fürtwängler, qui se confond avec celui de sa réhabilitation.

Contre l'oligarchie financière !

En 1946, Wilhelm Fürtwängler passe en procès devant le Tribunal de dénazification. 3 personnes d'origine juive viennent témoigner en sa faveur et certifient, le 17 décembre 1946, que le chef d'orchestre a risqué sa vie pour les protéger. L'un d'entre eux est Paul Heitzberg, ancien directeur d'Opéra. Fürtwängler est innocenté le jour même.

Maintenant, pour comprendre la seconde phase du combat politique de Fürtwängler, il faut nous attarder sur le sinistre John McCloy. Né en 1895 à Philadelphie, McCloy est juriste et banquier au service des « Sept Sœurs », compagnies pétrolières les plus puissantes au monde, comptant la Royal Dutch « Shell », la British Petroleum (BP) ou encore la Standard Oil (John D. Rockefeller). McCloy est assistant du secrétaire d'État à la Guerre de 1941 à 1945, et il occupera aussi le poste de Haut-commissaire américain pour l'Allemagne d'après-guerre.

En 1948, les ennuis recommencent. Fürtwängler est invité à diriger l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago, avec une tournée prévue pour 1949. Mais un groupe de musiciens de 1er plan, incluant les principaux chefs d'orchestre actifs en Amérique du Nord comme Arturo Toscanini, George Szell, Eugène Ormandy et les musiciens Jascha Heifetz, Isaac Stern, Vladimir Horowitz, Gregor Piatigorsky et Arthur Rubinstein, organisent une campagne diffamatoire envers Fürtwängler, le faisant passer pour un Nazi. Nous n'apprendrons que bien plus tard, lors d'une entrevue donnée par son épouse à l'« Executive Intelligence Review » (EIR), le 24 janvier 1986, le rôle de John McCloy dans les actions de ce groupe.

John McCloy était-il anti-Nazi ? En 1950, il fera relâcher les industriels nazis Alfried Krupp et Friedrich Flick, qui avaient utilisé la main d'œuvre des camps de concentration pour leurs usines, en vue de doper la production d'acier allemand pour fabriquer les armes de la guerre de Corée.

Et dans le domaine intellectuel, il fera partie, avec Bertrand Russell et Théodore Adorno, entre autres, et via les fondations Ford et Rockefeller, des instigateurs du Congrès pour la liberté de la culture. Contrôlé par la CIA, ce dernier, promouvant l'art contemporain ainsi que la culture « sexe - drogue - rock'n roll », aura, à l'époque de la guerre froide et du MacCarthysme, et sous prétexte de « liberté culturelle », pour but d'exercer sur les peuples un véritable contrôle social.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler ne sera pas cependant la victime expiatoire des crimes nazis. Atteint d'une surdité partielle, il se laissera mourir d'une pneumonie à l'hôpital de Baden-Baden, le 30 novembre 1954, dans une profonde sérénité. Sur sa pierre tombale, toujours visible au cimetière de Heidelberg, il a fait graver une citation de la Ire épître de Saint-Paul aux Corinthiens (Chapitre 13) : « Nun aber bleibt Glaube Hoffnung Liebe diese drei aber die Liebe ist die grösste unter ihnen » : Et maintenant, demeurent la foi, l'espoir et l'amour. Mais parmi les 3, c'est l'amour qui est le plus grand.

Quand Fürtwängler parle de la musique comme étant située entre les notes, quand il exige que la conception de l'ensemble de l'œuvre guide chacun de ses développements, et qu'il demande aux interprètes de remonter du cahier noirci par les notes, à la totalité de l'œuvre telle qu'elle a été conçue par l'intelligence de son auteur, il se situe dans la droite ligne de 2 grands penseurs de la musique, Platon et Saint Augustin qui dans « la République » et « de Musica » respectivement, disent que les sons ne constituent que l'empreinte sonore, tant de l'ordre harmonique de l'univers que de la pensée des compositeurs.

AB 127 : Faire jaillir l'étincelle créatrice de l'homme

1er entretien de Wilhelm Fürtwängler avec Walter Abendroth extrait de « Musique et verbe »

Walter Abendroth : Je vous ai aperçu hier, au concert de l'Orchestre philharmonique, à une place qui ne vous est pas habituelle : dans la salle. Vous étiez venu écouter votre confrère.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : En effet, je m'intéresse à présent à des questions que pendant longtemps, faute de loisirs, il m'a fallu écarter. J'ai grand plaisir à aller au concert, à écouter de la musique. Et j'en tire avantage : cela me permet d'observer objectivement, et comme du dehors, ma propre activité d'interprète, et de me rendre compte de pas mal de choses auxquelles je ne pense guère lorsque j'y suis mêlé comme acteur. Et ne serait-ce que pour apprendre ce qu'il ne faut pas faire.

Walter Abendroth : Comme hier soir, par exemple, car je ne pense pas que vous ayez approuvé l'enthousiasme du public.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Évidemment non. Et pourtant j'ai compris ce succès : le concert d'hier soir faisait indubitablement « de l'effet » ; un effet, il est vrai, sans rapport avec le caractère et la valeur de ce qui fut joué. Effet tout extérieur, d'un genre que j'appelle « illicite » . C'est que le public ne se rend pas compte si un effet est au fond (au niveau de l'art) valable ou non. Tous les publics (même, et surtout, notre public berlinois qui est typiquement un « public de grande ville ») commencent par être des foules passablement amorphes qui réagissent sans discrimination, et comme automatiquement, à tout ce qui les frappe. Leur réaction lre peut être la bonne ; mais elle peut aussi être absolument mal fondée. Ajoutez à cela que telles lres impressions dépendent de circonstances particulières et fortuites ; à tel point que, souvent, ceux-là mêmes qui les ont les plus vivement ressenties ne sont pas longs à ne plus comprendre qu'ils aient pu ainsi réagir. Comment se fait-il, par exemple, que non seulement des musiques de concert, mais même des Opéras comme « Carmen » , « Aïda » ou « la Bohème » , soient « tombés » à leur réaction pour rencontrer, par la suite, le succès le plus complet et le plus durable ?

Walter Abendroth : C'est une question à laquelle on n'a jamais, que je sache, répondu de façon tout à fait satisfaisante.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Je crois bien que non. Mais c'est parce que tout ce qui se passe en public se passe dans un domaine où règnent des forces instinctives, inconscientes et imprévisibles. Dans la vie musicale, ce que l'on nomme « le public » est une entité qui est loin de voir clair en soi-même ; loin de connaître son propre goût. Pour savoir ce qu'il aime et ce qu'il désapprouve, il faut au public (de même qu'à l'auditeur isolé) avant tout une chose : il lui faut un certain temps. Le temps est indispensable pour faire vraiment connaissance avec une œuvre, surtout lorsqu'il s'agit de musiques sans texte ni « programme » . Or, il est difficile de prédire combien de temps il faudra pour connaître, pour comprendre telle musique ou tel musicien. Parfois il y faut des dizaines d'années, voire plusieurs générations : pensez à Jean-Sébastien Bach, aux dernières œuvres de Beethoven, à des cas comme celui de Bruckner.

Cependant (il ne faut pas l'oublier) dans un grand nombre de ces cas, ce sont les mauvaises exécutions qui retardent ou empêchent la compréhension ; car, outre la qualité de la musique et la réceptivité de l'auditoire, il faut toujours compter avec un 3^e facteur (très souvent inconnu) : la qualité de l'exécution. C'est que la musique dépend de ses intermédiaires. Elle ne peut pas, comme les arts plastiques, s'extérioriser elle-même ; il est évident que c'est de l'exécutant (chanteur, chef d'orchestre) que dépend (en 1^{er} lieu et pour une bonne part) le sort d'une musique inconnue de l'auditeur. Si, dans ces cas-là, il arrive rarement qu'un interprète rende un morceau meilleur qu'il n'est, il est au contraire fréquent que de la bonne musique soit mal interprétée. Mais, à l'auditeur qui ne connaît pas, ou pas assez, l'œuvre qui le laisse froid, il est absolument impossible de discerner si c'est à l'ouvrage ou à l'interprète que ce manque d'effet doit être imputé.

Walter Abendroth : La direction de l'Orchestre philharmonique a publié récemment une liste des ouvrages favoris du public de Berlin, un catalogue des morceaux qui « font recette ». On en peut tirer d'intéressantes conclusions sur la psychologie du public.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Je sais ce que vous voulez dire ; c'est la vieille histoire du public « paresseux » qui veut toujours ré-entendre les mêmes « succès » et ne veut (ou même ne peut) affronter les œuvres nouvelles. Mais à mon tour, je demanderai d'où vient que les belles œuvres finissent, à la longue, par percer ; par s'imposer sans réplique, avec une logique tranquille et mystérieusement infaillible. Sur quoi repose le jugement rendu par la « postérité » que nous avons pris l'habitude de considérer comme la dernière instance ?

Walter Abendroth : D'ailleurs, quant aux célèbres « favoris » du public (d'après la statistique de l'Orchestre philharmonique), ce seraient notamment les Symphonies « impaires » de Beethoven, l'« Inachevée » de Schubert, certaines œuvres de Tchaïkovski ; cette préférence pourrait avoir, en partie, des raisons pratiques.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Ces œuvres se distinguent en effet par une grande clarté, par un dessin dont on suit aisément les lignes, par le relief des idées musicales ; ainsi elles résistent même à une exécution faible ou confuse. Elles sont moins dépendantes de la valeur de l'exécution. À être maniées par des interprètes incapables, elles souffrent moins que d'autres œuvres, moins populaires, mais non de moindre valeur. Mais au lieu de nous demander la raison de la popularité actuelle de telle œuvre, il serait bien plus intéressant, me semble-t-il, de savoir comment certaines partitions s'y prennent pour conserver leur place si longtemps et avec tant de continuité ; et pourquoi leur efficacité, pourtant si évidente qu'elle risque de manquer de mystère, s'use si peu avec le temps. Il y a un grand nombre d'œuvres qui ont « fait de l'effet » (peut-être, sur le moment, plus d'effet que celles que j'ai citées), mais qui, par la suite, se sont étioilées, et dont quelques-unes ont même complètement disparu. Et il semble que parmi ces œuvres-là, figurent justement celles qui ont visé à l'effet avec le moins de vergogne.

Telles œuvres du grand virtuose Liszt, une partie de celles de Berlioz, Wagner, Strauß, Tchaïkovski, et autres. C'est que « l'effet immédiat » est une chose et « l'effet à la longue », une autre. On pourrait même dire qu'un effet trop grand, trop voulu, trop pressé de réussir, contrarie l'action profonde et durable ; il l'a souvent même tout à fait empêchée.

Walter Abendroth : N'avez-vous pas remarqué que, dans la vie courante, vous pouvez être « impressionné » par quelque chose et que pourtant, à l'instant même, vous vous rendiez compte que cette impression était peu valable ? La réaction du public, étant inconsciente, sera toujours adéquate, d'une manière ou d'une autre, à l'effet qui la suscite. Aussi y a-t-il des œuvres qui déclenchent des applaudissements en quelque sorte vides et insignifiants, pour bruyants et tumultueux qu'ils soient.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Et c'est là exactement le genre de succès qu'elles méritent. Il en est d'autres qui font réagir le public d'une façon moins éclatante, et dont non seulement la valeur est incomparablement plus grande, mais encore l'effet incomparablement plus profond. C'est une erreur certaine que de conclure de l'action sur le public, c'est-à-dire du succès extérieur, à la qualité véritable de l'effet produit. Il est évidemment encore plus trompeur d'en conclure à la valeur d'une œuvre d'art. Le public lui-même (cet être bizarre) ignore comment et pourquoi il réagit ; il réagit inconsciemment, automatiquement, à peu près comme un baromètre. Il importe de savoir bien lire ce baromètre.

Le public lui-même en est incapable. À tel point que l'individu, fût-il des plus intelligents (j'en ai fait 100 fois l'expérience) , est incapable de voir clair dans son propre jugement. Si on le questionne, sa réponse, c'est-à-dire son jugement conscient, reflète toute sorte de préjugés, toute sorte d'associations d'idées qui encombrant sa conscience, plutôt que l'impression réelle qu'il a reçue. C'est seulement avec celle-ci (et non pas avec les idées et préjugés qui font partie de son individualité limitée) qu'il contribue à former l'authentique « opinion publique » ; laquelle se forme inconsciemment, et selon certaines lois. Aussi Dingelstedt, vieux routier du théâtre, disait-il, à peu près, et non sans raison : « Mille spectateurs, parmi lesquels chacun juge de travers, font, tous ensemble, un public fichtrement intelligent. »

Walter Abendroth : Ne serait-ce pas le devoir de la critique que d'expliquer l'idée que se fait le public, et de soi-même, et de ses propres jugements ?

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Elle ne le peut pas ; quand bien même elle le voudrait et s'imaginerait le pouvoir. Car elle-même fait partie du public.

Si la réaction immédiate du public est souvent injuste, son jugement définitif est pourtant fondé. J'ai donné déjà la raison de ce paradoxe : c'est qu'il faut du temps pour entendre un artiste et répondre à son œuvre. Et il en faut d'autant plus que l'artiste sera plus original et l'œuvre profonde. Il est tout naturel que, de prime abord, le public oppose de la résistance à ce qu'il ignore. Et pourtant, il est absolument certain qu'à la longue, il sera vaincu par la nouveauté ; si toutefois elle est vraiment de qualité.

Tâchons donc de nous rendre compte de ce qui se passe entre l'artiste et le public. D'abord, l'un et l'autre ne deviennent vraiment « eux-mêmes » que dans leur rencontre, et par cette rencontre. Tant que l'artiste n'a pas dompté son public, tant qu'il n'a su en réveiller et aiguiller les inconscientes aspirations vers l'œuvre d'art, ce public (et au lieu de dire : « le public » , on dirait aussi bien « le peuple ») ne prend ni conscience de soi-même, ni de sa qualité de public, mais reste ce qu'il était tout d'abord : une foule quelconque indéfinie.

Walter Abendroth : Qu'en serait-il, par exemple, de toute notre « Vie musicale » si (supposition paradoxale) Beethoven n'avait pas écrit ses symphonies ? Prédécesseurs et successeurs de Beethoven, et surtout Beethoven lui-même, ont, en fait, créé, par l'action de leurs œuvres, ce que nous avons depuis appelé « le public de concert ». Ce public-là est sans doute autre chose qu'une foule amorphe et passive. Depuis que des maîtres l'ont formé, il porte en lui une échelle de valeurs. Il a des exigences ; l'artiste devra y pouvoir. Et l'artiste, à son tour, a des exigences envers le public, exigences auxquelles le public ne demande qu'à répondre : car c'est d'elles qu'il tire sa véritable dignité. C'est qu'il y a public et public : il y a une grande différence selon qu'une foule « devient un public » à l'occasion d'une course de chevaux ou d'un combat de boxe, ou à l'occasion d'une Symphonie de Beethoven. La qualité (qui seule importe) de son « unanimité de public » ne sera pas, dans le cas sportif, la même que dans le cas musical.

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Mais encore : même lorsqu'il s'agit du seul domaine des événements artistiques, nous constatons des différences de cette sorte. Wagner appelle « Effekte » (effets extérieurs) les effets qui ne visent qu'à « frapper » la foule et qui peut-être l'emballeront momentanément, mais n'en feront pas une véritable communauté. L'« Effekt », disait-il, est par définition « effet sans cause », et c'était précisément à l'époque de Wagner, à l'époque de l'avènement des grands virtuoses, que les musiciens se mirent à rechercher ces « effets sans cause » et à s'en servir. Mais ainsi, pour la Ire fois, les rapports du public avec l'artiste devinrent le problème qu'ils sont aujourd'hui : c'est alors que commença, de l'un à l'autre, cette progressive aliénation qui, à présent, met en question toute notre « vie musicale ». Vouloir faire de l'effet à tout prix : ce fut là, dès l'époque de Wagner et de Liszt, le signe que l'on allait vers la désaffection. Et, par la surenchère de l'effet, on cherchait éperdument à garder un contact qui menaçait rupture, et à maintenir entre les musiciens sur l'estrade et les auditeurs la « vraie communauté » .

Mais voilà : transformer un public en « vraie communauté », ne fût-ce que momentanément, il faut pour cela des œuvres qui sachent empoigner l'individu, non pas en tant qu'individu isolé, mais comme faisant partie d'un peuple, comme faisant partie de l'humanité, comme créature habitée par une étincelle divine. C'est seulement grâce à de telles œuvres qu'un public prend pleine conscience des forces latentes qu'il porte en lui ; et ce n'est que de ces œuvres-là qu'au plus profond d'eux-mêmes les hommes ont vraiment besoin, en dépit de leurs réactions superficielles, de leurs arbitraires entraînements et de leurs prédilections momentanées. Ce qui n'empêche pas que, dans la vie musicale de tous les jours, toutes les fois qu'il les rencontre, le public oppose la plus vive résistance à de telles œuvres, et ne s'abandonne que de mauvaise grâce. En quoi le public ressemble à une femme qui ne trouve son bonheur qu'à céder à la contrainte.

Walter Abendroth : Voulez-vous dire par là que l'effet produit sur le public serait plutôt un argument contre une œuvre ?

Wilhelm Fürtwängler : Ce serait raisonner de façon hâtive et simpliste. Qui nierait, par exemple, la valeur des œuvres d'un Beethoven à cause de leur effet sur le public ? Au contraire, c'est précisément « le fait Beethoven » qui nous permet le mieux de comprendre ce qu'est l'effet authentique et « légitime ». C'est que les œuvres de Beethoven produisent leur effet absolument et exclusivement par ce qu'elles sont : par leur essence, non par leur façade. Et encore : si Beethoven a cette efficacité, c'est grâce à la clarté avec laquelle il exprime ce qu'il a à dire. Le maximum de clarté dans l'expression est, pour l'artiste, la manière (la seule bonne manière) de tenir compte de son public. Gœthe l'a bien dit : « Si quelqu'un a quelque chose à dire, qu'il me le dise clair et net. Pour ce qui est des choses problématiques, celles que je porte en moi me suffisent. » .

Mais pour répondre à cette exigence, il faut que tout d'abord on ait vraiment quelque chose à dire ; et que l'on puisse oser se montrer sans apprêt ni voile, tel que l'on est ; et cela n'est évidemment pas donné à tout le monde. Et tous ceux qui dans la vie, et même (et surtout) dans leur art, s'expriment de façon tarabiscotée, j'ai peur qu'ils n'aient, le plus souvent, de bonnes raisons pour éviter la manière simple et directe.

Il y a des œuvres qui font de l'effet parce qu'elles visent à en faire et s'y efforcent. Il en est d'autres qui, pour faire de l'effet, n'ont qu'à exister. Et c'est pourquoi l'action des unes à la longue s'exténue, alors que le temps ne semble point entamer l'efficacité des autres.

AB 128 : L'œuvre musicale de Fürtwängler

Créations

Fürtwängler s'inspira toute sa vie de Bruckner pour ses compositions. Fürtwängler joua un rôle capital dans la mise en valeur de sa musique qui était très peu connue au début du XXe siècle.

La liste qui suit n'est pas exhaustive.

Bartók - Concerto pour piano n° 1, le compositeur comme soliste, Francfort-sur-le-Main, le 1er juillet 1927.

Schœnberg - Variations pour Orchestre, Opus 31, Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, Berlin, 2 décembre 1928.

Prokofiev - Concerto pour piano n° 5, le compositeur comme soliste, Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin, 31 octobre 1932.

Hindemith - Suite tirée de Mathis le peintre, Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin, Berlin, 11 mars 1934.

Richard Strauß - « Vier letzte Lieder » , avec Kirsten Flagstad, Orchestre Philharmonia, Londres, 22 mai 1950.

Compositions

Œuvres orchestrales

Ouverture en mi bémol majeur, Opus 3 (1899) .

Symphonie en ré majeur (1903) .

Symphonie n° 1 en si mineur (1938-1941) .

Symphonie n° 2 en mi mineur (1944-1945) .

Symphonie n° 3 en ut dièse mineur (1947-1954) .

Concerto Symphonique pour piano et orchestre (1924-1936) .

Musique de chambre

Sonate pour violon et piano en fa majeur (1896) .

Petite Sonate pour violoncelle et piano en mi majeur (1886) .

Trio avec piano en fa majeur (1896) .

Quatuor à cordes n° 1 « Quartetto quasi una fantasia » (1896) .

Trio à cordes (2 violons et 1 violoncelle) (1896-1897) .

Variations pour quatuor à cordes (1897) .

Sonate pour violon et piano en la mineur (1898-1899) .

Quintette avec piano en ut majeur (1899) .

Quatuor avec piano en ut mineur (1899) .

Trio avec piano en mi majeur (1900) .

Quatuor à cordes n° 2 en fa dièse mineur (1901) .

Trio avec piano en sol majeur (1902) .

Quintette avec piano en ut majeur (1924-1935) .

Sonate pour violon et piano n° 1 en ré mineur (1935) .

Sonate pour violon et piano n° 2 en ré majeur (1938) .

Musique vocale

« Te Deum » pour chœur et orchestre.

AB 129 : Wilhelm Furtwängler (textes anglais)

The Conqueror (1906-1934)

« Musik ist nicht ein Ablaufen von Tonfolgen sondern ein Ringen von Kräften. » (Wilhelm Furtwängler)

(Music is not a succession of sounds but a struggle between forces.)

« Furtwängler was so full of contradictions. He was both ambitious and jealous, noble and vain, coward and hero, strong and weak, a child yet also a man of wisdom, both very German, and yet, a man of the world. But when it came to music, all these contradictions disappeared : his attention was undivided and focused only on the music. »

(Gregor Piatigorsky, Cellist ; Doubleday and Co. , inc. 1965.)

Gustav Heinrich Ernst Martin Wilhelm Furtwängler was born on 23 January 1886, at Number 25 « Maassenstraße » in Berlin to Adolf Furtwängler (1851-1907) , a well-known archaeologist, and his wife Adelheid, « née » Wendt. Their son was baptized into the Lutheran faith. The couple subsequently had 3 more children : Walter, Märit and Annele. The Furtwängler family originally came from the heart of the Black Forest; the Wendts from North Germany (Adelheid was a great friend of one of Johannes Brahms's daughters) . Both families were musical and Furtwängler's mother was also a talented artist who painted a number of portraits of her children.

The father hated big cities and always wanted to get-back to nature. So, in 1894, the family moved to Schwabing (on the outskirts of Munich) and later bought a house called Tanneck (« at the edge of the pine trees ») , on a peninsula on the Tegernsee, near Bad Wiessee. There, the children learnt to swim and play every conceivable game and sport. In his childhood, Furtwängler was a lonely and introverted child and already his life revolved around music, art, literature and philosophy. Throughout his whole life, he remained an avid sportsman, fond of riding, swimming, playing tennis, ice-skating and mountain climbing.

At the age of 6, Furtwängler went to school in Munich, but he wasn't a very good pupil, not because he wasn't clever but because he thought he was wasting his time and that he had better things to do. At the age of 7, he asked his mother to teach him to play the piano and the basic principles of writing music. On 30 June 1893, still aged 7, he composed his first work, « ein Stückchen von den Tieren » . His father who was openly scornful of public schools and their methods of teaching, withdrew his son and started looking for a tutor : his choice fell on Ludwig Curtius and Walter Riezler, both remarkable in their own ways, but with very different minds. There and then, Furtwängler decided he would be a composer (all his life he remained a frustrated composer) . When he was 12, he heard Johann Sebastian Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » for the 1st time and was deeply moved. Soon afterwards, he discovered the music of Ludwig van Beethoven - a momentous event. Furtwängler and Beethoven was, for a long time, the archetypal meeting of minds between a composer and his interpreter, and interpreting Beethoven became Furtwängler's goal in life. His approach to Beethoven's mind went well beyond the æsthetic boundaries of the early 20th Century.

In September 1901, Furtwängler father took his son to Egina, in Greece. Wilhelm brought along a poem by Goethe and Beethoven's String Quartets. Furtwängler never attended a music school ; it was his mother who gave him his 1st piano lessons, followed by Auntie Minna, an excellent piano teacher. His 1st real music teacher was the organist and composer Anton Beer-Walbrunn (1864-1929) (whose « Sinfonia » Furtwängler conducted on 24 February 1912, in Lübeck) . Beer-Walbrunn quickly recognized the extraordinary gifts of his pupil and recommended him to his own teacher, Joseph Rheinberger (1839-1901) , at the time director of the Academy of Music of Munich. But Rheinberger was a reactionary : music ended at Beethoven ; so, Furtwängler looked for another tutor who would be able to open-up the rest of the 19th Century, especially Richard Wagner and the German Romantics : Anton Bruckner and Johannes Brahms. That man was Max von Schillings (1868-1933) , the composer and conductor with whom Furtwängler studied from 1902 to 1903.

The year 1905 marked a turning-point in Furtwängler's life. He was only 19 years old when he decided he wanted to be a conductor. But, at least, he realized he still had much to learn ; for example, Opera and Symphonic music ; he was totally ignorant of both of them. Thanks to a cousin of his mother's, the conductor Georg Dohrn, who was the driving force of musical life in Breslau, he became repetitor at the Municipal Theatre during the season 1905-1906. This work was not really very exciting : it meant rehearsing with the choir and the singers and his impressive capacity of sight-reading even the most difficult piano accompaniments to Opera scores went largely un-noticed. In Breslau, his 1st orchestral work, a Symphony, was performed. The concert was a disaster ; both the public and the critics rejected this work. Father and son were deeply affected by this « débacle » . So, Furtwängler decided the best way to profit from disaster was to actually conduct a concert.

Although he was a famous archæologist, Adolph wasn't a rich man : however, he had a friend, Franz Kaim, who had founded his own Orchestra which was named after him. So, on 19 February 1906, in Munich, Furtwängler conducted his 1st concert which included Beethoven's « Consecration of the House » , his own Symphonic poem in B minor, and after the interval, Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony.

The « Bayerische Kurier » of January 23 wrote :

« After attending the concert of this very young conductor, Wilhelm Furtwängler, one might assume the program was chosen with the public in mind. He chose as his 1st victim Bruckner's 9th Symphony. Is Furtwängler talented ? Probably, but that's still no reason to present a Masterpiece, especially if one doesn't yet know how to conduct ! The Bruckner left a greyish and cold impression. The Scherzo was particularly dreary and sounded like a voyage through dangerous reefs after days of endless rain. His own Symphonic poem seemed to be promising but, all too quickly, it turned into something empty and without shape or character, in which the shorter themes seemed to be living through harmonic torture. The audience quite surprisingly greeted him with repeated applause. »

Furtwängler wrote to his tutor Curtius :

« Conducting is the lifeline that has saved me. I was about to die as a composer. Until now, I considered myself a composer who also conducts : never a conductor who also composes. »

Furtwängler suffered from a defect shared by many post-Romantics : a lack of discipline that led to elephantine compositions ; but the need to compose was genuine and sincere. Although most of his youthful compositions are just average, for some people, the « Te Deum » is a misunderstood Masterpiece. Of course, today Furtwängler isn't really remembered for his compositions, but he was a sincere composer, who had some talent even if he wasn't really gifted.

After this 1st concert, Furtwängler got a job at the Zürich Theatre for the 1906-1907 season. The director allowed him to conduct some Operettas, for example the « Merry Widow » which was being played that season. He conducted it 9 times between February 3 and April 21 1907. He made his conducting debut on October 10th, conducting the ballet « Tanzbilder » and, on October 31st, Hans Pfitzner's « Fest auf Sollhaug » , and, then, 10 performances of « Rübezahl » set to music by Bertrand Sängler. The next stop was Munich where he became, once again, repetitor at the Opera, under Felix Mottl, for 2 seasons (1907-1909) . Then, he was appointed 3rd conductor at the Opera in Strasburg. On 8 September 1910, he left Munich and remained in Strasburg until April 1911. The musical activity of Strasburg, at the time German, was entirely dominated by the composer and conductor Hans Pfitzner and his 2 assistants Richard Fried and Hermann Büchel. Furtwängler gave 16 concerts, conducting 6 works that he never again conducted : Friedrich von Flotow's « Martha » ; Gaetano Donizetti's « Elisir d'amore » ; Villars de Maillart's « Dragons de Villars » ; André Messager's « P'tites Michus » ; Franz von Suppé's « Flotte Bursche » , and one performance of Giuseppe Verdi's « Rigoletto » (11 March 1911) . The critics' were far from unanimous : one described him as « having the lightness of an elephant » in « P'tites Michus » , another complained that his interpretation of « Martha » was quite unsatisfactory. He also had to dress-up like a gipsy, with a black beard stuck onto his face and play the piano in the « Fledermaus » , in a « soirée » at prince Orlowsky's, which amused him very much (27-28 February 1911) .

During his stay in Strasburg, he met Bruno Walter who, on 22 February 1911, had premiered one of his own Symphonies. Furtwängler returned to Strasburg on 6 December of that same year to conduct his own « Te Deum » , that had been premiered in Breslau in November 1910 by G. Dohrn and that he had started composing during his stay in Florence. The « Allgemeine Musik Zeitung » was very negative about it and wrote that :

« Furtwängler's composition is full of good intentions, and nothing more ! The Schlesische Zeitung wrote :

“ Maybe there were some personal reasons for the premiere of Furtwängler's “ Te Deum ” ; because there were surely no music ones. »

A friend of Furtwängler's mother, Ida Boy-Ed, told the young musician that the post of conductor had become vacant in Lübeck because Hermann Abendroth had left for Essen. However, the news reached Furtwängler too late : the Society of the Friends of Music had already chosen four candidates (Paul Scheinpflug, Karl Mennicke, Walter Unger and Rudolf Siegel) out of 97 competitors and each of these 4 had already conducted a test concert. Everything seemed to indicate that Rudolf Siegel would be the winner. But Paul Scheinpflug withdrew from the competition, so the Society decided to select a 4th candidate and Mrs. Boy-Ed asked Furtwängler to submit his candidacy, which was accepted by the musical authorities and by Abendroth. Thus, he conducted on 5 April 1911 his test concert (in front of over 4,000 people !). It didn't take either audience or the members of the Society long to be entirely won over by the passion that emanated from the young candidate, despite the great difference that existed between him and Abendroth whose virility, assurance and economy of gestures were highly-appreciated. Furtwängler, with his nervous and sometimes excited gestures, was quite the opposite and on the podium he seemed to be battling against an invisible enemy - yet, the public recognized very quickly his extraordinary capacities. On 13 April, he was unanimously chosen to succeed Abendroth.

The conductor of the Society of the Friends of Music (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») conducted only concerts, each season 8 Symphonic concerts plus 2 concerts with the Philharmonic Choir (mainly devoted to oratorios). Then, there were also the popular concerts, about 30 each season (the 1905-1906 season exceptionally had 56 concerts). Rehearsals took place on Wednesday evenings and the members of the Society came with their families and friends. Furtwängler was not very happy about these concerts which took place in the hall of the « Kolosseum » and followed the same pattern : in the 1st part Symphonic music, during which smoking was not allowed but people could drink beer ; a 2nd part devoted to light-orchestra Classics ; and a 3rd part devoted to popular music (such as military marches). During his stay in Lübeck, he conducted 32 Symphonic concerts, 104 Popular concerts and 9 Choral performances : this was Furtwängler's apprenticeship. He also conducted 3 Operas as guest-conductor : « Fidelio » (23 March 1915) ; the « Merry Wives of Windsor » (16 April 1915) ; and the « Meistersinger von Nürnberg » (20 November 1913). The town's critics soon appreciated Furtwängler's personality.

The « Eisenbahnzeitung », for example, wrote :

« Furtwängler is a genius musical talent, who in favourable circumstances, could become a genius. »

Ida Boy-Ed continued to praise her « protégé » to all concerned.

Furtwängler often went down to Hamburg with his friend Lilly Dieckmann to attend the concerts conducted by Arthur Nikisch who, in his eyes, was the « King » of conductors (they didn't officially meet until February 1912). During his stay in Lübeck, he gave his 1st concert outside Germany (in Vienna), on 26 January 1913. Along with the Lübeck Orchestra's 1st violinist Szanto, he gave a series of chamber music evenings, including a cycle of Beethoven Piano Sonatas. In his final season, he played the piano part in Beethoven's Triple Concerto (3 February 1915) and in Bach's 5th Brandenburg Concerto (2 January 1915). His successor in Lübeck was Georg Göhler.

As far as the development of his repertoire is concerned, in Lübeck, Furtwängler conducted all the Beethoven Symphonies (except the 2nd) ; the 4th, 5th and 6th of Tchaikovsky ; Symphonies Nos. 39 and 40 of Mozart ; Symphonies Nos. 1, 3 and 4 of Brahms ; Nos. 8 and 9 of Schubert ; the Brahms Violin Concerto ; Symphonies Nos. 4, 7 and 8 of Bruckner ; Mahler's « Kindertotenlieder » ; Reger's « Romantic Suite » ; Dukas' « Sorcerer's Apprentice » ; Richard Strauß' « Sinfonia Domestica » ; Liszt's « Faust Symphony » ; the 2nd Piano Concerto of Brahms ; Schumann's 1st. The popular concerts included works by Offenbach (Hoffmann's « Erzählungen ») ; Gilbert and Sullivan (« Mikado ») ; Bizet (« Arlésienne » , « Carmen ») ; Delibes (« Sylvia » , « Coppelia ») ; Gounod (« Faust » Ballet) ; Sibelius (« Valse triste ») ; Grieg (« Peer Gynt ») ; and waltzes by Johann Strauß and Waldteufel ; and endless medleys.

At the beginning of 1915, the « Kapellmeister » in Mannheim, Arthur Bodanzky, decided to go America. The choice of a successor turned-out to be a very difficult one and many famous conductors submitted their candidacies. The Mannheim public would have loved to have Nikisch. Contrary to Lübeck, Mannheim's main musical activity centered round the Opera, and the chief-conductor was in charge of all the Opera performances and of only 8 subscription concerts at the Academy of Music. A committee of 5 members went to Lübeck, on 23 March 1915, to attend a performance of « Fidelio » conducted by Furtwängler. They were so impressed that they decided to invite him to take on the post of « Kapellmeister » . So, Mannheim gained a young and almost unknown conductor. The town welcomed Furtwängler enthusiastically and his future secretary Bertha Geißmar wrote in her memoirs :

« The citizens of Mannheim were used to considering their “ Kapellmeister ” as a demi-God whose actions and deeds were the talk of the day. Furtwängler, who was quite timid, found this kind of public attention rather gruesome and sought shelter with Oskar Grohé, who took the young conductor under his wing. »

Furtwängler's assistant was Felix Lederer who conducted the 1st performances of all the Italian Operas and of « Der Rosenkavalier » (unlike Böhm, Clemens Krauß and Knappertsbusch, Furtwängler didn't like this Opera and never conducted it) . He conducted Operas that have since fallen-out of the repertoire, such as « Violanta » (Korngold) ; « Monna Lisa » (Schillings) ; « Shéhérazade » (Sekles) ; « Klein Idas Blumen » (von Klenau) . « Fidelio » was the 1st Opera he conducted in Mannheim, on 7 September 1915, in a greatly appreciated performance, particularly the Overture « Leonore III » . He conducted 232 performances of 39 Operas. In the Symphonic repertoire, he conducted for the 1st time the « Symphonie fantastique » (1 February 1916) ; the 1st Brahms Piano Concerto with Artur Schnabel ; Richard Strauß' « Alpine Symphony » ; Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » (21 November 1916) ; Schumann's 4th ; Mahler's 4th (28 January 1919) ; Schönbergs « Verklärte Nacht » (18 February 1919) ; Bruckner's 5th (9 December 1919) ; and Schönberg's « Pelleas und Melisande » (2 March 1921) .

During his Mannheim period, he also began his lifelong career as a guest-conductor. In September 1917, he was invited to the « Kurhaus » in Baden-Baden to conduct the « Ring » , then, on 14 December, for the 1st time, the Berlin Philharmonic : the critics were thrilled and stunned : for the 1st time, one heard the phrase « the Furtwängler Miracle » (« Das Wunder Furtwängler ») . On 15 November 1918, he conducted for the 1st time the concerts of the « Frankfurter Museumsgesellschaft » and, on 30 November, he was in Vienna with the « Wiener Tonkünstler Orchester » after Ferdinand Löwe's retirement. Still in Vienna, on 29 November 1919, he conducted Mahler's 3rd ; on 2 April 1920, he conducted for the 1st time the « Berlin Staatskapelle » succeeding Richard Strauß. On 30 June 1920, he gave his last concert as « Kapellmeister » of Mannheim and said farewell with a performance of the « Entführung aus dem Serail » .

From the 1920-1921 season onwards, he was invited more and more abroad, but kept on conducting in Frankfurt, where he had succeeded Willem Mengelberg, and at the « Berlin Staatskapelle » . So, in October 1920, he went to Stockholm, where he conducted Franz Berwald's « Symphony serioso » . On 19 November, he conducted Mahler's 2nd Symphony at the « Staatsoper » and, then, in December, he gave 7 concerts in Stockholm and, at the end of the season, he was in Wiesbaden for the Brahms Festival. The season 1921-1922 began with his 1st concert with the « Leipzig Gewandhaus ». He split his time between Vienna, Frankfurt and Berlin. On 30 November 1920, he conducted his 1st « Missa solemnis » in Vienna. Nikisch died on 23 January 1922. Furtwängler's prediction that he'd made in Hamburg became true (« I'll be the successor of Nikisch ») : he inherited both the Berlin Philharmonic and the « Leipzig Gewandhaus » .

The 6 seasons he spent with the « Gewandhaus » are not the happiest ones of his career. 1st, the Orchestra would have liked to have Hermann Abendroth as « Gewandhauskapellmeister » and Furtwängler was appointed only after the intervention of Max Brockhaus. Then, his programs included too much contemporary music, to the dislike of the rather conservative public of Leipzig which would also have preferred to have its « Kapellmeister » live permanently in Leipzig.

On 25 March 1922, he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic for the 1st time, in a concert celebrating the 25th anniversary of Brahms' death. In April, he was invited by the « Accademia Santa Cecilia » of Rome and, in May, he participated in the Brahms Festival in Hamburg. On 22 April, he married Zitla Lund, a young and elegant Danish woman 3 years older than him : they had no children and their marriage was a mistake. In April 1923, he left with the « Gewandhaus » on tour for Switzerland and ended the season giving 2 concerts at la Scala in Milan. In Winter 1923, he bought a « chalet » in Saint-Moritz (which still belongs to the family today) . In January 1924, he went to England, and, in April-May 1924, he left for the 1st time on tour with the Berlin Philharmonic. After he left Mannheim, he continued conducting regularly Operas in Mannheim. In July 1924, he participated in the Munich Festival, conducted « Le nozze di Figaro », « Tristan », « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg », and the « Entführung aus dem Serail » . In January 1925, he crossed the Atlantic for his 1st American tour (10 concerts with the New York Philharmonic) . His activity was now divided between Leipzig, Berlin and Vienna. In February 1926, he made his 2nd American tour (32 concerts) and, back in Europe, he started a European tour giving 20 concerts with the Berlin Philharmonic and ended the season with the Brahms Festival in Heidelberg. In October, aged 40, he made his 1st recordings for the « Polydor » label (« Der Freischütz » Overture and Beethoven's 5th) .

In February 1927, he began his 3rd and final American tour (33 concerts) that ended with the Brahms « Requiem » on 4 April. Furtwängler left America somewhat exasperated by American musical culture. His fellow musicians were jealous of him, the press was negative (above all, Olin Downes, the music-critic of « The New York Times ») but he was adored by the public. On 19 November, he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic as its new musical director in succession to Felix von Weingartner (who had resigned from his post in 1930) . On 29 March 1928, he conducted his last concert as « Gewandhauskapellmeister » with the Beethoven 9th and the season ended with a European tour with the Berlin Philharmonic, at the Heidelberg and Görlitz Festivals.

The 1928-1929 season marked a new beginning for him as an Opera conductor : on 17 October, he conducted for the 1st time at the Vienna Opera (« Das Rheingold ») and after the Festivals of Heidelberg and Jena, he conducted for the 1st time an Opera in Berlin, not at the « Staatsoper unter den Linden » but at the « Schauspielhaus am Gendarmenmarkt » (« Le nozze di Figaro ») . In Autumn, he was nominated « Generalmusikdirektor » and, in May 1929, he was awarded the Order of Merit.

One tour succeeded another, and, in April 1930, he went on tour for the 1st time with the Vienna Philharmonic. On 2 June, he conducted his 7th and last performance of the « Missa solemnis » (Furtwängler played the piano score and thought that the work was Beethoven's greatest work of art. But he also felt he never managed to entirely express all that the music contained. He thought that the score should have been re-orchestrated and that is why he regretfully decided never to play it again) . In July-August 1931, he took part for the 1st time in the Bayreuth Festival (« Tristan und Isolde ») and conducted the « Siegfried Wagner » Memorial concert. In 1932, the Berlin Philharmonic celebrated its 50th anniversary : this event was marked by 4 superb concerts in April, followed by a grand European tour with 26 concerts. On this occasion, Hindenburg awarded him the Gœthe Medal for services rendered to German music.

On 7 and 9 June 1932, he conducted for the 1st time at the Opera in Paris (« Tristan » with a magnificent cast : Frida Leider, Lauritz Melchior, Igor Kipnis, etc.) . On 30 January 1933, Hitler came to power, and, with him, began anti-Jewish activity. On 11 April, Furtwängler published in the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » an open letter to the Minister of propaganda, Josef Gœbbels, in which he declared that there was only one distinction, that between « good » art and « bad » art. This letter reached the world-press and Gœbbels replied that politics was also an Art (« maybe the greatest of all arts ») , and that music could not be separated from politics. So, it was necessary to expel all foreign elements (meaning, of course, the Jews) .

Shortly afterwards, the great exodus of German Jews began : Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, Artur Schnabel, Bronisław Huberman, and many others. Furtwängler carried-on conducting at the « Staatsoper » (this fell under Hermann Göring's absolute control) Operas such as « Arabella » and « Elektra » . During a tour with the Berlin Philharmonic, he gave a mammoth concert in Mannheim, that brought together under one conductor the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the Mannheim Orchestra : 170 musicians in all ! Furtwängler had a confrontation with the Nazis : they asked Furtwängler to dismiss Szymon Goldberg, his Jewish 1st violin. Furtwängler refused and decided never again to come-back to Mannheim (he only returned 21 years later, in 1954) . He ended the season 1932-1933 at the « Opéra de Paris » (« Tristan » and « Die Walküre ») and, in June, was appointed by Göring conductor-in-chief of the « Berlin Staatsoper » . Göring, then, nominated him « Staatsrat » (Council of State) on 8 July 1933 and, on 15 September, Erich Kleiber conducted a gala-performance of « Lohengrin » in honour of Furtwängler. He was also given the honorary title of Vice-President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » . In August 1933, he met Hitler in his house at the Obersalzberg in Berchtesgaden and when he got-back home, told his entourage :

« This hissing chameleon will never get anywhere in Germany. »

However, things turned-out quite differently.

On 11 March 1934, Furtwängler conducted the premiere of Hindemith's « Mathis der Maler » and published his famous article « The Hindemith Case » in the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , November 25th, in answer to Nazi attacks on the composer, whom they accused of writing « degenerate » music. On 25 April, during a tour with the Philharmonic, he met in Rome Benito Mussolini, which infuriated Arturo Toscanini.

(« Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » , 25 November 1934.)

The season 1934-1935 was very short : after 2 « Ring » performances at the « Staatsoper » , in October and November, and his article on Hindemith, Furtwängler resigned from all his official functions and, on 4 December, retired to the Bavarian Alps where he started writing his Symphonic Piano Concerto. His passport was confiscated. Erich Kleiber supported his action, resigning from his position at the « Städtische Oper » of Berlin and going into exile.

The Tragic (1934-1945)

The news of Furtwängler's resignation created a sensation, but it also meant he could no longer leave Germany. The situation got even more complicated because the Berlin Philharmonic was due to tour Great Britain in January 1935 and Furtwängler declared that it was out of question that he should conduct. Thomas Beecham was asked to take-over, but when he refused, the tour was simply cancelled. The situation became increasingly difficult for Furtwängler, who decided to dismiss his Jewish secretary Bertha Geißmar. Finally, Gœbbels and Furtwängler met on 28 February 1935 and hammered-out a compromise : Furtwängler was allowed to continue conducting in Germany, but with no title or official position, provided he stayed-away from all politics. The « Führer » approved and Furtwängler was allowed to travel abroad again. He rejoined his Orchestra on 25 April 1935 in Berlin in an all-Beethoven program : Hitler, Gœbbels and Göring attended the concert and, at the end, Hitler went and warmly shook hands with Furtwängler. Furtwängler ended the season with some performances at Covent Garden in London (« Tristan ») , at the « Opéra de Paris » (« Tristan » and « Walküre ») , at the National Theatre of Munich (« Tristan ») , at the Opera of Vienna (« Tristan ») and at the Hamburg Opera (« Meistersinger ») . Hitler, Gœbbels and Ribbentrop attended the performance in Hamburg, on 23 June 1935.

The 1935-1936 season began in Nuremberg with « Die Meistersinger » , and « Tannhäuser » followed at the Vienna Opera. On 7 November, he conducted « Egmont » at the « Berlin Schauspielhaus » , staged by the famous actor Gustav Gründgens (a controversial personality) . Hitler, Göring, Gœbbels and Rudolph Heß were, again, all present. After touring with the Philharmonic in November-December, he ended the year at the National Theater in Munich (« Meistersinger » on 25 December, and « Tristan » on 1 January) . On 27 February, he left for Egypt with his friend John Knittel. He arrived in Alexandria on March 5th, and got-back to Naples on 31 March. The season ended with a few Operatic performances in Paris (« Die Meistersinger ») , in Zürich (« Tristan ») , in Vienna (« Tannhäuser ») , and at the Bayreuth Festival where he conducted « Lohengrin » , « Parsifal » and the « Ring » .

In November 1936, Thoams Beecham toured Germany with his London Orchestra and invited Furtwängler to share the upcoming Covent Garden Festival planned for the coronation of King Georges VI. But Furtwängler had decided, with Hitler's permission, to cancel all his public engagements during the winter season 1936-1937, because he wanted to spend some time in absolute peace to compose. He returned to his Orchestra on 10 February 1937, in Berlin, for a concert again attended by Hitler, Göring and Gœbbels. In March, he embarked on another tour, but this time of chamber music with the violinist Hugo Kolberg. During it, he gave the premiere of his own Violin Sonata in D minor in Leipzig, on March 4th.

After a magnificent Beethoven 9th in London (25 March) , he conducted the « Ring » at the « Berlin Staatsoper » , made a short tour with the Philharmonic and left for London to start rehearsing the « Ring » that was to be given in 2 cycles. The sensation of the 2nd cycle was the 1st appearance of Kirsten Flagstad as Brunnhilde. The season ended at the Bayreuth Festival (« Parsifal » , « Ring ») and the Salzburg Festival (Beethoven's 9th) . The 1937-1938 season started in Paris on September 7th with Beethoven's 9th, followed by 2 performances of « Die Walküre » with the cast of the « Berlin Staatsoper » . During a tour with the Philharmonic, he conducted the premiere of his Symphonic Piano Concerto with soloist Edwin Fischer (to whom the work is dedicated) on October 26th, in Munich. At the same time, he made a few recordings for « His Master's Voice » that were praised internationally (Beethoven's 5th and, in 1938, Tchaikovsky's « Symphonie Pathétique » and some excerpts of Richard Wagner) . On 22 and 23 April 1938, Furtwängler conducted the Vienna Philharmonic in Berlin (Franz Schubert's « Unfinished Symphony » and Anton Bruckner's 7th Symphony) , concerts attended as always by Hitler and Gœbbels. He went-back again to Covent Garden, in May and June, for 2 more « Ring » cycles and ended the season in Munich (« Fidelio ») , at the « Opéra de Paris » (« Tristan ») , and at the Salzburg Festival (« Die Meistersinger ») .

On 5 September, he was in Nuremberg with the Vienna Philharmonic (« Die Meistersinger ») . On 20 February 1939, the French government awarded him the « Légion d'Honneur » but Hitler made sure news of this never reached the German public. In May, he conducted 2 performances of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » in Munich and Florence, and ended the season at the Zürich Opera (« Meistersinger » , « Walküre ») and a concert at the « Wesendonck-Haus » with Flagstad replacing Germaine Lubin) . The performances of the « Die Walküre » , planned at the « Opéra de Paris » , in June, were eventually cancelled by the French government for political reasons. After the German invasion of Poland, Furtwängler's activity was restricted to Austria (annexed by the « Reich » on 13 March 1938) and Germany. In April 1940 however, he made a trip to Scandinavia but the concert planned in Copenhagen, on April 10th, was cancelled following Denmark's occupation by the Nazis. In May, in Berlin, he met Elisabeth Ackermann, who eventually became his 2nd wife. She was married at the time to a lawyer who was killed in France a few months later.

Although Furtwängler gave no concerts in France during the War and refused to conduct in countries occupied by the Nazis, he did conduct in some « annexed » cities (such as Prague) . In December 1940, he made a 2nd chamber music tour, this time with Georg Kulenkampff. At the beginning of March 1941, while skiing in the Vorarlberg (Sankt Anton, in Austria) , he fell badly and suffered injuries serious enough that he couldn't conduct for 9 months while in convalescence. In February 1942, he toured Scandinavia with the Berlin Philharmonic, and, at the end of March, was in Vienna for the celebration of the Vienna Philharmonic's Centenary : on that occasion, on March 28th, he conducted Schubert's 3rd Symphony for the only time in his life. Back in Berlin, on April 19th, he conducted a concert for Hitler's birthday, that was preceded by an endless speech of Josef Gœbbels about the « Führer's » « stupendous visionary plans » .

In November and December, he returned to Scandinavia and gave 2 performances of « Die Walküre » at the Stockholm Opera and a concert with the Orchestra of Göteborg. On 12 December, he conducted « Die Meistersinger » at the re-opening of the « Berlin Staatsoper » and, in January 1943, he gave some concerts in Switzerland with the Winterthur Orchestra at the « Tonhalle » in Zürich, and in Bern. On 2 January 1943, he conducted « Tristan » at the Vienna « Staatsoper » : that was the only and one time he staged an Opera himself. After a tour of Scandinavia with the Vienna Philharmonic, in May, he married Elisabeth Ackermann in a civil ceremony in Potsdam, on June 26th : he was 57 years old and his wife, 25 years younger (he was living at the Faisanerie in the park of Sans-Souci, in Potsdam) . They had a church wedding at the end of 1945 in Montreux, Switzerland) . In July, he took part in the Bayreuth Festival and conducted « Die Meistersinger » alternately with Hermann Abendroth.

On 7 September 1943, the pianist Karl Robert Kreiten (a child prodigy and pupil of Claudio Arrau) was hung by the Nazis after he had been denounced. This drama became the subject matter of a play written by Heinrich Riemenschneider, « Requiem for K.R. Kreiten » , that was premiered in Germany in 1987. The main-characters are Kreiten and his mother, Furtwängler, Gœbbels and 2 men who denounce Kreiten. In December, Furtwängler was again in Scandinavia (Stockholm and Göteborg) and, in January, he returned to Switzerland (with the « Orchestre de la Suisse Romande » and the Bern Orchestra) .

On 30 January, the old concert-hall (« Alte Philharmonie ») of the Berlin Philharmonic, on « Bernburgerstraße » , was bombed to ashes. The season ended in Bayreuth (« Die Meistersinger ») and at the Festivals of Salzburg and Lucerne. On 11 October 1944, Furtwängler conducted for the only time in his life the « Bruckner Orchester » of Linz, also called the « Orchestra of the “ Führer ” » whose official conductor was one of the 3 Jochum brothers, Georg-Ludwig. On 7 November, his mother died in Heidelberg and, 4 days later, his wife who was already in Switzerland bore him a son, Andreas, that he saw only in February 1945.

Furtwängler had become a traitor in the eyes of the Nazis due to his repeated criticism of Hitler's policies. He was even accused of having taken part in the conspiracy of 20 July 1944 for which Hitler was the target. The situation became quite intolerable and the Nazis made it clear they would be happy if Furtwängler failed to survive the War. According to transcripts at his denazification trial, which took place in Berlin, on 17 December 1946, Furtwängler declared :

« In October 1944, Mrs. Himmler's personal doctor came to see me and told me of Himmler's and the SS' intentions. From the start, Himmler personally considered me an enemy of the State, this lady confirmed to me. She came-back in November. In January 1945, when I was in Berlin for the last time, she came suddenly early one morning, and told me :

“ ' Herr ' Furtwängler, nobody is to know that I have come to see you. Let me inform you that the SS are talking of putting you in quarantine. No Nazi is supposed to talk to you any more. Everything you do, all your telephone calls are under surveillance. You are accused of having participated in the attack against Hitler. It's up to you to draw your own conclusions. ”

Then, she left. I decided I should not go back to Berlin after my concerts in Vienna, and so, I hid-out for 3 days near the Swiss border. The evening before I crossed the border, some “ Gestapo ” agents came to see my secretary, Miss von Tiedemann, and told her to her great surprise that I had left. Thereafter, I did everything necessary to clarify my position in Switzerland. »

During a concert of 11 December 1944, in Berlin, Albert Speer also told Furtwängler that his life was in danger and that Heinrich Himmler's « Gestapo » was after him. Speer advised him not to return after his next tour to Switzerland. So, after having celebrated his 59th birthday at the Hotel Imperial, in Vienna, with his friend the sound-engineer Friedrich Schnapp, on December 30th, he sent a message to the Berlin Philharmonic saying that he could not conduct the concerts of February 4th and 5th, « due to the fact that he had slipped on ice ». From February onwards, he organized his escape to Switzerland to coincide with concerts he was to conduct in Lausanne, Geneva and Winterthur. From February 1 to 6, he hid in the small village of Dornbirn, near Bregenz and the Swiss border.

From Dornbirn, he wrote to Irme Schwab :

« I am heading for Switzerland. I still don't know if, due to the political situation, I will manage to get through, otherwise I will go to Tanneck. »

On 6 February, he wrote to Hélène Matschenz :

« If I am allowed to do so, I will cross the border tomorrow. »

On 7 February, he managed to cross the border and joined his wife and their son. On 23 February, he conducted his last concert in Winterthur (Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony) but the 2 concerts at the « Tonhalle » were cancelled by the Town Hall. An enormous scandal that lasted an entire month broke-out in the Left-wing press, (he was accused of being a Nazi stooge) , in papers like the « Volksrecht » .

The « Journal de Genève » summarized the so-called « Furtwängler Affair » quite accurately :

« The 2 concerts that Furtwängler was due to conduct at the “ Tonhalle ” , this week, were cancelled by the Council of State and created quite a stir. It seems the Zürich Municipal Executive Council had suggested the cancellation to the government, and they also received threats from the Labour Party. But the Cantonal Police Department had already given permission for these concerts, and had to reverse itself under pressure from the Municipal Council. Protests quickly broke-out. “ La Nouvelle Gazette de Zürich ” and “ die Tat ” , an independent paper, immediately reacted negatively to this intrusion of partisan passions into the realm of artistic freedom, and deplored the fact that Zürich had set such a poor example of intolerance.

As the Zürich Radical Party's central Committee rightly said in a public protest, it is regrettable that the Swiss authorities seemed to give in to such demagoguery which sought only to take advantage of the wide-spread and justified dislike by the Swiss public of the Nazis. The “ Furtwängler Affair ” had its 1st epilogue last Wednesday at the Town Hall, and the discussion was both instructive and explosive. 2 groups of speakers faced-off against each other: on one side, the radicals and the independents, who defended Furtwängler saying that it was a bit late to blame him for accepting a post in the “ Staatsrat ” (Prussian State Council) and the decoration that he had accepted from the “ Führer ” ; on the other side, the Communists, the Socialists and one member of the Fraction of the “ Monnaie franche

» accused Furtwängler of becoming a pawn of the Nazi propaganda campaign. »

As for the Winterthur concert (Bruckner's 8th) , it was the last one before the fall of the German « Reich » and a number of demonstrations were organized by the Labour Trade-Union and its political wing. The demonstrators tried to prevent the public from attending the concert and a detachment of the police with water-cannons had to intervene. In the end, the concert took place without any incidents and the house was full.

In February, he settled in Clarens, at the « Clinique la Prairie » run and owned by Doctor Niehans, where he stayed until June 1947.

(Who was this Doctor Niehans, nicknamed « Docteur Miracle » ? Some said he was a charlatan ; someone who profited from the credulity of people and asked astronomical fees for treatments that did absolutely nothing. Others said that he was a true pioneer of rejuvenation therapy. Paul Niehans, who invented « cell-therapy » , was born in 1882 and counted among his clients some famous names including Konrad Adenauer, Somerset Maugham, Gloria Swanson, Charles Chaplin and the Duchess of Windsor. He was internationally famous as a surgeon ; later, he became for some a genius ; for others, a crazy visionary and a false « Messiah » inspired only by a thirst for money.)

Once safely in Switzerland, Furtwängler and his family waited-out the end of the War. When Hitler's death was announced on 30 April 1945, bringing the War to an end, Furtwängler had to undergo denazification by the Allies (not having been a member of the Nazi Party, it actually shouldn't have been necessary) . In his case, this « purification » process revolved around the question why he had remained in Germany under the Hitler dictatorship, and his behaviour during that period, especially in the light of the regime's official anti-Semitism. 2 trials were held : one in Vienna, in January 1946 ; and one in Berlin, on December 11th and 17th of that same year. Furtwängler was exonerated and allowed to take-up conducting again. Contrary to other conductors (Herbert von Karajan, Oswald Kabasta or Hermann Abendroth) , Furtwängler was never a Party member, never made the Hitler salute, never signed his letters « Heil Hitler ! » and, as much as he could, helped Jewish musicians.

Furtwängler explained the reason why he remained in Germany as follows :

« I didn't stay because I was a Nazi, I remained because I am German ! »

He was supported by his friend, the producer Boleslav Barlog, by the Romanian conductor Sergiu Celibidache and by musicians such as Hugo Strelitzer who declared :

« If I am alive today, I owe this to this great man. Furtwängler helped and protected a great number of Jewish musicians and this attitude shows a great deal of courage since he did it under the eyes of the Nazis, in Germany itself. History will be his judge. »

At the end of the trial, Furtwängler declared :

« Art has nothing to do with politics nor with War. I felt responsible of the German music and it was my duty to get through this crisis as best as I could. I have no regrets that I stayed on in Germany alongside fellow-Germans who had to live under Himmler's reign of terror. »

In his « Diary » for 1946, he wrote :

« I try to look at my behaviour objectively. I am no better than any other, but I had to do what my instinct and conscience dictated. I love my country and my people, and I felt it was my duty to right a terrible wrong. Any worry that my presence could be manipulated by the Nazi propaganda machine had to take a back-seat to my major preoccupation, to save the soul of German music as far as possible, and continue to make music with German musicians for a German public. »

Serenity (1947-1954)

Furtwängler was acquitted on 17 December 1946 but wasn't allowed to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic until 25 May 1947 again, in an all-Beethoven program. Very quickly, his career returned to its previous frenetic pace, and he resumed his tours and Festivals (Salzburg, Lucerne) . On 24 and 25 January 1948, he gave 2 concerts in Paris with « l'Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire » . In February, he gave 10 concerts in London and, on 22 February, he premiered his 2nd Symphony (composed at the end of the War) in Berlin. In April, he left for Argentina where he gave 8 concerts at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires ; Italy invited him for 6 concerts and, then, he took the Vienna Philharmonic on a tour to Switzerland and ended the season at the Salzburg (« Fidelio ») and Lucerne Festivals.

In August, a sad incident compromised his relationship with America : the management of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra invited him to conduct 22 of the 28 concerts the following season. In December, he agreed to conduct 8 concerts. But, on 6 January 1949, an article by Henry Taubmann in « The New York Times » said some famous musicians wanted Chicago to back-out of the contract. Among these musicians were Vladimir Horowitz, Arthur Rubinstein, Alexander Brailowsky, Isaac Stern, Lily Pons and André Kostelanetz who declared that they would never again play in Chicago if Furtwängler became the Orchestra's conductor in chief. Faced with this extremely hostile campaign, organized by some Jewish groups, Furtwängler decided to reject the contract.

Arthur Rubinstein, who had lost many of his family in the holocaust, said :

« I don't want to be on the same concert platform with someone associated with Hitler, Göring and Gœbbels. Had Furtwängler been a true democrat, he would have left Germany like Thomas Mann. Furtwängler remained because he thought that Germany would win the War, and now, he is looking for dollars and fame in America. »

Other artists such as Bruno Walter, Yehudi Menuhin and Nathan Milstein refused to turn their backs on Furtwängler.

Yehudi Menuhin issued the following statement to the press :

« I have never met a more insolent attitude than that of 3 or 4 trouble-shooters who do everything they can to prevent a famous colleague coming to make music in this country. I find this behaviour despicable. »

Nathan Milstein declared :

« Furtwängler is a great musician and absolutely not a Nazi and if this campaign succeeds the great loser will be the Chicago Symphony. »

And that's exactly what happened.

In his « Diary » for 1949, Furtwängler wrote the following about this painful episode :

« A number of famous American artists protested against my coming to America. This protest is heresy in musical history. What is the real reason behind this campaign ? It is a boycott that has a very precise aim. The real reason for this slanderous ostracism of a famous musician is simply because he is German. »

In 1948, Furtwängler was 62 years old and was invited to conduct literally everywhere else in the world ; he toured with both the Vienna and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestras and made a number of recordings for « His Master's Voice » , in Vienna and in London. In September and October, he conducted a complete cycle of the Beethoven Symphonies in London with the Vienna Philharmonic, a cycle that was broadcast Live on television, but which unfortunately no longer exists. Every year, he took part in Music Festivals and, in August 1949, went to visit Richard Strauß who was hospitalized in a clinic in Montreux. The following year, on 22 May 1950, he premiered the « 4 Last Songs » with soprano Kirsten Flagstad.

In September 1949, he took part in the « Festival de Besançon » and, in March and April 1950, conducted 3 « Ring » cycles at la Scala in Milan. Flagstad was in the cast. He gave a series of concerts at the « Teatro Colón » and, in April and May 1950 and March and April 1951, he was again at la Scala for 5 performances of « Parsifal » and 4 of « Orfeo ed Euridice » . In April, he took the Berlin Philharmonic on tour for 10 concerts in Egypt (Cairo, Alexandria) , and, on 29 July, he was chosen to conduct the official re-opening of the Bayreuth Festival, with a Beethoven 9th that is still a myth today.

On 18 October, Rudolph Bing, director of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, wrote to Furtwängler asking him to open the 1952 season with a new production of « Lohengrin » and another Opera of his choice. Furtwängler learned that Arturo Toscanini was madly against his coming. Once again, the American project was cancelled along with a tour by the Vienna Philharmonic in the United States. In March 1952, he went back to la Scala for 6 performances of « Die Meistersinger » and, after a long tour with the Berlin Philharmonic, he made the magnificent famous recording of « Tristan und Isolde » with Flagstad and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in London.

After a performance of « Die Walküre » in Zürich, on 29 June, he left to rehearse for the Salzburg Festival : during rehearsals, he caught double pneumonia. He had to give-up his activities and retire for several months to a sanatorium in the Bavarian Alps. Not having taken any time off since 1947, he slept very little and this lack of sleep affected his health. The heavy doses of antibiotics, particularly Tetracycline with its side-effects, affected his hearing. But Furtwängler recovered, and, on 7 December, was on the podium with the Berlin Philharmonic. But, on 23 January 1953, he fainted during the Adagio of Beethoven's 9th in Vienna. Once again, and over his protests, doctors prescribed heavy dose of antibiotics and his hearing, specially in the right ear, began to deteriorate. This loss of hearing made him very depressed but, despite this handicap, he continued working, resumed his concert tours and returned to Salzburg and Lucerne.

The 1953-1954 season began with 4 concerts at the Edinburgh Festival with the Vienna Philharmonic, then, in October and November, he recorded the « Ring » at la « RAI » in Rome, 1 Act per day. During his stay in Rome, he gave 2 private concerts for Pope Pius XII, at the Vatican and at Castel Gandolfo, his Summer residence. In December, he caught the flu, which prevented him traveling 2 months ; by March, he was well enough to leave for Caracas for 2 concerts with the Venezuelan Symphonic Orchestra. Back in Switzerland, he bought a property on the heights of Montreux, in Clarens, called Basset Coulon where sadly he was to live only for a very short time.

The season 1954-1955 was his shortest and final one. After 2 performances of Beethoven's 9th at the Festival of Lucerne (21 and 22 August) , a concert at the « Festival de Besançon » , on 6 September, and 2 concerts in Berlin, on 19 and 20 September, including his 2nd Symphony, he left for Vienna to record « Die Walküre » for « His Master's Voice » , between 28 September and 6 October. The Vienna Philharmonic played radiantly. That was the last time he ever conducted an Orchestra.

He left Vienna for Gastein to get treatment for his hearing. On his journey back to Clarens, he didn't feel well and caught a cold. His wife tried to persuade him to stay in bed but he wanted to take long walks in the open-air and in the mountains.

In the night of 6 November, he told his wife :

« I'll die of this illness, and it will be easy. Don't leave me alone, not even for a moment. »

He read the proofs of his 3rd Symphony and listened to the test pressings of his recording of « Fidelio » , that had just arrived. The doctors diagnosed bronchial pneumonia, and his wife decided to have him hospitalized in Ebersteinburg, near Baden-Baden, in the clinic of his doctor, « Herr » von Löwenstein. They left on a sunny Autumn day on November 12th.

At the clinic, Furtwängler said to his wife :

« You know, they all think that I have come here to recover. I know that I am here to die. »

What hit his wife was the fact that his mind was no longer on conducting, but on death, his own death.

He asked the Intendant Gerhardt von Westermann of the Berlin Philharmonic to come and see him and made his farewells :

« Please say my goodbyes to the Orchestra. »

His state of health worsened and, on the morning of 30 November, he was given a blood transfusion. He died that same day in absolute peace and was buried at the cemetery of Heidelberg next to his mother, on December 4th.

During the funeral service, Karl Böhm said :

« Shattered as I have never been before in my life, I stand today in front of a coffin in which lies a man who was my friend for over 20 years. For all those who love you, dear Furtwängler, it is still not possible to value the consequences of your death because it will leave a void that can never be filled. May God welcome you into a better world and may he give you back all the unforgettable Beauty that you bestowed on the most divine Art. »

Eugen Jochum and the Berlin Philharmonic played Mozart's « Maurerische Trauermusik » and the Aria from Bach's Suite in D.

Back in Clarens, his widow told his friend conductor Ernest Ansermet :

« Furtwängler's departure has taught me that to accept death is something we should all aim for. Furtwängler reached that goal. »

Why are there no more Furtwänglers today ? Was he really unique ? Does an answer lie the role of media and mass-culture today ? Is conducting today decadent ? So many good technicians but with nothing to say ? Look at conductors created by the media, and promoted by huge recording companies ? Show-business and it's corollary, the star-system - lead directly to the phenomenon of deification. But isn't imagination also the way we deform our images ? Furtwängler was a legend in his lifetime and the myth is still growing.

Yehudi Menuhin said :

« There are many conductors but very few of them seem to reveal that secret chapel that lies at the very heart of all Masterpieces. Beyond the notes, there are visions, and beyond those visions, there is this invisible and silent chapel, where an inner-music plays, the music of our soul, whose echoes are but pale shadows. That was the genius of Furtwängler because he approached every work like a pilgrim who strives to experience this state of being that reminds us of Creation, the mystery which is at the heart of every cell. With his fluid hand-movements, so full of meaning, he took his Orchestras and his soloists to this sacred place. »

The conductor Eliahu Inbal gave, perhaps, the best answer :

« Why are there no Furtwänglers today ? I don't think that this can be explained solely by the absence of talent. Nobody can metamorphose himself into a Furtwängler living at today's pace, giving concerts and making records as if they were on a conveyor belt producing soap or cars. The manner in which recordings are made today, with a bevy of microphones, is able to destroy all the mystery and the ambiance that Furtwängler knew how to create so well. We, musicians of the younger generation, should try and follow Furtwängler's example : that has nothing to do with tempo but rather with imagination, and total surrender to music. »

Furtwängler was the complete opposite of Arturo Toscanini who thought there was nothing left to « create » in an interpretation.

Furtwängler wrote in 1927 :

« The conductor's true ethics are not a perfect technique but his spiritual attitude. »

Looking « beyond the notes » , Furtwängler was always looking for the « absolute » . Forget the trends and fashions. And even if Furtwängler's exacerbated Romanticism, his almost religious perception of music and of the role of the medium that he attributed to the conductor in the mystical communion between the composer and his public, may be somewhat irritating, Furtwängler's Art was and remains immortal.

...

Berlin. October 7, 1944. A typical day toward the end of the 3rd « Reich » . Soldiers die. Civilians suffer. Jews are murdered. Nothing special.

In the « Beethovensaal » , a concert is about to begin, Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting but the theatre is empty, relieved of its usual audience studded with Nazi elite seeking a brief cultured respite from the stresses of War. The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra is on stage, awaiting its cue. Conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler stands awkwardly on the podium. The vague meandering of his baton summons the 1st shadowy note of Bruckner's 9th Symphony. A Radio Berlin engineer starts his « Magnetophon » . The most extraordinary orchestral recording of the Century has just begun.

Genuinely transcendent musical events are rare. Their advent is hard to foresee. They often arise in improbable places and at chance times. And so, it was on a grim fall afternoon in War-time Berlin that a lone Nazi technician bore witness to one of the most impassioned performances ever put on record.

Like all truly great artistic achievements, the intensity and conviction of Furtwängler's War-time work was distilled from hard earned experience. In our era of pampered socialite Classical superstars, it seems hard to conceive of a famous conductor genuinely torn by anguish. And yet, Furtwängler endured such extreme torment and pain that he was able to fully identify with the profound suffering from which the greatest composers wrested their most heart-felt and enduring Masterpieces. Under pressure designed to crush any sensitive artist, he transmuted his distress into a vision of unprecedented insight and power.

The saga of how Furtwängler's incomparable artistry arose within the appalling abyss of Nazi Germany forces us to confront the terrible collision of art, society and morality.

Before the War

The 1st 2/3's of Furtwängler's life held few clues of what was to come. He was born in Berlin, in 1886, into an enviably comfortable environment. « Furtwängler - the Early Recordings » (« Koch » CD) . His father was a famed archeologist and his mother a gifted painter. Educated at home, the youngster was nurtured in German culture by tutors and family friends who included philosophers and artists.

Furtwängler's musical talent surfaced early. His deepest love was Beethoven. By age 12, Furtwängler reportedly had memorized most of the Master's works and could play them on the piano. But, above all else, Furtwängler aspired to be a composer and, by age 10, had written Trios, Quartets and 6 Piano Sonatas. Following his father's death, though, he turned to conducting, primarily to support the family but also with the hope of fostering performances of his own works. The gesture was characteristic, and was but the 1st of many instances when Furtwängler would temper his ideals with practicality.

Furtwängler followed the usual route of a musical journeyman by serving as assistant and ultimately conductor in increasingly prestigious German musical posts. His mentors included Felix Mottl, a close associate of Wagner who had led the world-premieres of several of his Operas, Hans Pfitzner, one of Germany's foremost composers, and especially Artur Nikish, the greatest orchestral conductor of the era, known for mesmerizing musicians and audiences alike with his galvanizing fervor, deeply personal inflections and a unique orchestral sound.

Furtwängler's rise was meteoric, conquering Breslau, Zürich, Munich, Strasbourg, Lubeck, Mannheim and Frankfurt. He was touted by the press as « Das Wunder Furtwängler » . In 1922, he succeeded Arthur Nikish both at the helm of the Berlin Philharmonic, the most prestigious Orchestra in Germany, and at the venerable « Leipzig Gewandhaus » , whose unmatched Century long tradition of excellence had begun with Mendelssohn. By 1928, Furtwängler also held the top spot in Vienna, the musical capitol of Europe. In 1930, he became Music Director of the Bayreuth Festival, established by Wagner and regarded as the crown of German culture.

Furtwängler's only set-back had been in America, at the helm of the New York Philharmonic, where he had dazzled audiences for 3 seasons but, then, was edged-out by a furiously jealous Toscanini, who cruelly exploited Furtwängler's solemnity, social awkwardness and refusal to grovel to the society sponsors who controlled the pursestrings. But no matter : oblivious to the political storm that was gathering, by 1932, Furtwängler stood at the pinnacle of artistic success and his future, in Europe at least, seemed limitless.

Furtwängler's recording career began in 1926. Over the following decade, he recorded for « Polydor » mostly German / Austrian fare from Bach to Wagner, but with some uncharacteristic Rossini and Johann Strauß as well. The full series is available on « Koch » 3-7059-2 K2 and 3-7073-2 K2 (2 CDs each) and is highlighted on « Symposium » 1046. While evidencing little of the visionary insight of his later readings, each of the records displays the unified ensemble of a great Orchestra under a leader solidly versed in Germanic musical culture. Thus, the Bach is heavy and committed, the Mozart weighty and severe, the Weber mystical and ecstatic, the Wagner dark and brooding and the Beethoven noble and solid.

Furtwängler's early recordings clearly evidence an artist at the top of his professional world, a self-assured, solid exemplar of the rich German performing tradition. As the entry in the authoritative Grove's « Dictionary of Music » aptly put it at the time :

« Control and balance are prominent characteristics of his conducting ; his interpretations, though full of vitality, are not impulsive and his personal manner at the conductor's desk is usually restrained. »

Then, came Hitler.

The War Years

The prolific German Classical music scene soon became a vacuum. Among conductors alone, Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer and Erich Kleiber (Furtwängler's chief rivals) all left. Some fled as a matter of conscience, but others had no choice ; as Jews, they were barred by the new racial laws from performing, teaching and, ultimately, living. Soon after Hitler's ascent, Furtwängler was the only notable conductor left. He clearly bore no malice toward the horde of emigrants, as he naively invited many to return and appear with him, in future seasons, and seemed genuinely hurt when they all declined. Nearly all Furtwängler's former associates begged him to take a stand and join them ; when he refused to leave, they branded him a traitor to humanity and shunned further contact.

The crucial question which would plague Furtwängler for the rest of his life was why he stayed behind when all the other great artists fled. The standard explanation is that he lacked moral fortitude. But, as so often emerges with ethical issues, the full story is far more complex. If anything, the opposite is true : Furtwängler stayed primarily out of a sincere, albeit naive, conviction.

Out of the depths of his cultural and intellectual roots, Furtwängler regarded Hitler and Nazism as a passing phase in German politics. Indeed, many observers, at the time, found it hard to take seriously the short, dark, brown eyed Austrian's ranting about tall, blond Aryan supremacy. From the very outset, Furtwängler saw 2 Germanies : the permanent, cultural one of which he remained a proud member, and an irrelevant, political one which was a temporary nuisance. To Furtwängler, there was no such thing as Nazi Germany, but rather a Germany raped by Nazis. Furtwängler truly believed that, by maintaining his artistic convictions, he would succeed in resisting Hitler and upholding the everlasting purity of great German culture. All of his War-time activities were bent upon achieving this goal.

Furtwängler believed to the depth of his soul that music was a force for moral good, a route out of chaos that would assist the cause of humanity. In 1943, he wrote :

« The message Beethoven gave mankind in his works seems to me never to have been more urgent than it is today. »

He later told the Chicago Daily Tribune :

« It would have been much easier to emigrate, but there had to be a spiritual center of integrity for all the good and real Germans who had to stay behind. I felt that a really great work of music was a stronger and more essential contradiction of the spirit of Buchenwald and Auschwitz than words could be. »

Richard Wolff, the 1st violinist of the Berlin Philharmonic (whose Jewish wife remained unharmed during the War through Furtwängler's protection) agreed :

« Furtwängler could have enjoyed a secure and comfortable life abroad during the dreadful years of the Nazi regime, but he felt it his responsibility to stay behind and help educate the younger German generation and to keep alive spiritual values in Germany in her darkest hour. »

But all of these noble thoughts can be dismissed as facile rationalization by a gutless pawn and, indeed, there were more practical reasons why Furtwängler remained. The Nazis reportedly threatened to imprison his mother. They harassed and ultimately expelled his Jewish personal secretary. Knowing Furtwängler's attachment to the Berlin Philharmonic, they hinted that they would disband and conscript the group, in favor of a more loyal ensemble. Above all, they exploited Furtwängler's fear that his art would not be understood outside Germany. When Furtwängler was offered conducting posts abroad the government readily agreed, but subject to a new emigration law that would forever bar his return to Germany - a condition they knew Furtwängler could never accept. Thus, Furtwängler found himself effectively imprisoned in his homeland.

And the Nazis intended to keep it that way by poisoning Furtwängler's image abroad. Thus, when Furtwängler refused to join the Nazi Party, he was made a « Staatsrat » (State Councilor) for life, an official sounding but purely honorary title he could not legally refuse and which Nazi news releases often invoked to brand him with a rank outside his choice. When he refused to salute Hitler at a concert, the crafty « Führer » leaped to the stage and warmly grasped Furtwängler's hand, a moment captured by photographers and circulated world-wide as alleged evidence of capitulation. And when faced with Furtwängler's public silence, the Nazis routinely generated false news items proclaiming his support, enhanced by fabricated quotations in praise of Nazi policies and leadership.

The perverse efficiency of the Nazi propaganda machine was displayed in 1935, when Furtwängler was offered the helm of the New York Philharmonic upon Toscanini's retirement. His candidacy came with a seemingly ironclad guarantee of success - the insistence of the Mæstro himself, acknowledged by an adoring American public to be the world's greatest conductor, that only Furtwängler was worthy to succeed him. The timing of the offer was propitious, as Furtwängler was upset with the Nazi regime and this once was sorely tempted. But, as the heir apparent savored his options, Prime Minister Hermann Göring announced that Furtwängler's rehabilitation was complete and that he would resume his duties at the Berlin State Opera. With that, the damage was done : despite Furtwängler's attempts to clarify his position, both the New York press and the Philharmonic subscribers now would have nothing to do with bringing an officially reconfirmed Nazi to their shores. Furtwängler tried to bow-out graciously with a telegram postponing his U.S. appearances until the public realizes that music and politics have nothing to do with each other, but this was hardly a message apt to placate an isolationist America alarmed over reports of Nazi outrages.

As a final measure of insurance, the Nazis seized upon the most terrible and effective weapon of all. Herbert von Karajan was a brilliant and ambitious Austrian conductor who was everything Furtwängler was not : handsome, energetic, charismatic, young and utterly compliant and unprincipled. Throughout the War, the Nazis played the 2 against each other with diabolical brilliance, denying von Karajan the ultimate praise with which the State controlled press kept showering Furtwängler while keeping the older man in perpetual fear that his rival might supplant him even going so far as to tout him as « Das Wunder Karajan » , a cruel echo of Furtwängler's own earlier « moniker »

The fabricated rivalry with von Karajan hit Furtwängler at the very core of his being. Furtwängler lived and breathed music so thoroughly that he constantly conducted imaginary Orchestras as he walked. Furtwängler had dedicated his entire life to perpetuating the traditions of German culture in which he had been immersed from his earliest youth and of which he had become the most visible champion. German music was the sole reason for his existence. Indeed, in 1938, after the annexation of Austria, the already over-worked conductor doubled his duties by taking charge of all musical activity in Vienna, as he felt compelled to preserve that city's proud tradition and, in particular, the independence and excellence of its famed Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, which was threatened with State control.

The Nazis needed Furtwängler as much as he needed Germany. Hitler deeply admired his artistry. The Party itself was keenly aware that Furtwängler was the foremost symbol of the past glory of German culture and that his loss would be a final blow to national prestige which would validate all the foreign criticism.

Throughout the era, Furtwängler took consistent advantage of the respect the Nazis were forced to accord him. When presented with contracts having Aryan only clauses, he refused to sign and went on to tweak the promoters by spotlighting Jewish Orchestra members as soloists. When ordered to replace his Jewish concert Master, he threatened to cancel his concerts. When a ban was imposed on further performances by Jewish artists, Furtwängler demanded a meeting with Propaganda Minister Josef Goebbels to get it rescinded. When the Berlin Philharmonic was to be aryanised, he personally met with Hitler to reverse the decree. (Ultimately, of course, these measures of relief all were to be over-turned, but that hardly diminishes their import, at the time.)

Despite the appearances to the outside world, Furtwängler did not collaborate. Thus, he never gave the Nazi salute, even when Hitler was present at a concert. He generally refused to perform in halls in which swastikas were displayed. He avoided appearing at official government functions. He would not conduct Orchestras in overrun countries. He never began concerts with the Nazi anthem. And he never played the fawning socialist themed patriotic works that flooded other concert programs. That Furtwängler got away with such treasonous conduct attests to the esteem in which he was held by both the Party and the people.

Furtwängler's relationship to the Nazis was defined in 1934 when he programmed Paul Hindemith's new Opera « Mathis der Maler » . The composer's wife was Jewish and, therefore, his music, as yet unheard, was automatically condemned as degenerate. The libretto (also by Hindemith) probably didn't help matters either. The title character is a visionary painter caught-up in a civil War, desperately seeking a way to apply his talents to better mankind. Despite the Opera's medieval setting, its central theme of an artist's duty to constructively embrace social issues was painfully modern, and the Nazis surely grasped its challenging parallels with current history - perhaps, the very reason why Furtwängler resolved to champion a work that spoke so directly to his own gnawing concerns.

When Göring banned the work, Furtwängler scheduled an orchestral suite of the Opera's music instead. The concert received enormous acclaim as a rallying point for anti-Nazi frustrations. Furtwängler then published a lengthy article in defense of Hindemith in which he insisted that ideology was irrelevant and that the only valid æsthetic criterion was the quality of the artistry itself. He was attacked by the State press, led by Goebbels, who insisted with equal vigor that only ardent Nazis could be true artists. Sickened over the regime's repressive ideology, Furtwängler resigned all his positions (except, of course, the permanent « Staatsrat ») , devoted himself to composition and gazed wistfully overseas. (It was at this point that the opportune New York Philharmonic offer was made.)

During the following months, the conductor was miserable, torn from the means of promoting great German music of which he considered himself the guardian. The government was upset as well : substitute concerts were sparsely attended, subscribers demanded refunds, the Orchestra was plunged into deficit and the foreign press exploited the incident to denounce the oppression of a regime that apparently had to silence its foremost artist.

The stand-off finally was resolved when Furtwängler agreed to publicly acknowledge Hitler's dominance of artistic policies (which could hardly be denied) in exchange for being allowed to work freelance and never to have to accept a political position or perform at any State function. True to form, the State press reported the matter as Furtwängler's full capitulation and never mentioned the rest of the deal.

But Furtwängler did not simply retreat into himself or the sanctum of art. Rather, according to numerous testimonials, he displayed enormous moral courage, constantly placing his life and reputation in jeopardy. For the next decade, he spent much of his time intervening with Party officials in nearly impossible tasks of protection and rescue for potential victims who sought his assistance, including strangers and even professional enemies. Although the evidence is often anecdotal, archivist Fred Prieberg claims that his research alone has documented over 80 people at risk who were saved by Furtwängler's efforts.

While Furtwängler's outward passivity (quashed beneath distorted Nazi news reports) was interpreted abroad as collaboration, we now know that his quiet heroism saved far more lives than abrasive ranting or symbolic emigration. As Paul Minchin, Chairman of the English Furtwängler Society, has aptly observed :

« It takes far more courage to oppose a totalitarian regime from within. »

It is clear that Furtwängler had, at least, as much courage as the self-proclaimed champions of humanity who branded him a coward but who lobbed all their verbal grenades from the safe harbor of the free world.

So was Furtwängler a neglected Saint ? Not quite. There is, unfortunately, a less laudable side to his War-time activities.

Notwithstanding his courage, Furtwängler did not act out of pure altruism. Nearly everything he did was intended to preserve the integrity of German music. But since Furtwängler considered himself the foremost exemplar of that art, his activity served to solidify his status and gratify his ego. Furtwängler can hardly be compared to Raoul Wallenberg, Oskar Schindler and other heroes who had nothing to gain and acted purely as a matter of conscience, ultimately sacrificing all they had in order to oppose Nazi genocide. Focussed solely on art, Furtwängler simply did not concern himself with the larger social context.

This narrow focus produced mixed results. Inextricably tied to each of Furtwängler's laudable goals and achievements was an unintended drawback. Despite his valid cultural intentions, he unwittingly bolstered the German War effort.

For example, Furtwängler accepted the vice-Presidency of the mandatory performers' union and served on a commission that approved the programs of all public concerts. He assumed these positions of leadership, in order to maximize his impact upon preserving cultural integrity and assuring exposure to composers and artists of quality. But his constant visibility also served to legitimize and lend credibility to the Nazi regime, not only in the eyes of foreign observers, but to the citizenry as well : after all, how could the Nazis be thoroughly depraved barbarians if someone like Furtwängler could coexist with them ?

Similarly, after the War, many asserted that Furtwängler concerts had served to rally Resistance members. These events succeeded in assembling a core-group of cultural leaders for a post-War Germany who would vaunt humanism over militarism. Even outside Germany, many emigrants were inspired by Furtwängler as a symbol of their dissent. Thus, Furtwängler's War-time activities may have produced lasting humanitarian benefits. In the short run, though, they had the opposite effect.

As biographer Sam Shirakawa aptly notes, Furtwängler may have offered his art for the sake of true Germans, but he had no control over its dissemination. Thus, his concerts were broadcast to bolster troop morale. Worse, Hitler and his top henchmen often attended Furtwängler concerts to bask in his musical balm. That same balm may have lulled the frustrations of intellectuals and artists into indifference and diverted their energies from actively opposing the ongoing War and genocide. Furtwängler only saw music as a force for moral redemption. He once told Toscanini :

« Human beings are free wherever Wagner and Beethoven are played and if they are not free at Ist, they are freed while listening to these works. »

But the hearts of Nazi soldiers did not melt and the souls of their leaders proved impervious to æsthetic redemption. Were those responsible for (or, at best, indifferent toward) the liquidation of innocent millions really entitled to have their consciences set free by the liberating glory of music ?

Nor was Furtwängler's personal outlook free of paradox. Indeed, even his attitude toward Jews was inconsistent. One of the axioms of Nazi social engineering was that Jews were incapable of being true spiritual Germans and, therefore, were less than fully human and a social pollution. Nowhere was the absurdity of this assumption more apparent than in Classical music, as many of Germany's finest performers were Jews. Indeed, the pianist Artur Schnabel, a Jew, was universally hailed as the pre-eminent exponent of Mozart, Schubert and especially Beethoven, the quintessential German musicians. And yet, although he was ideally equipped to reject the Nazi racist view, Furtwängler often drew distinctions between 2 classes of Jews.

On the one hand, he ardently supported Jews who had arrived at the top of their musical, artistic, scientific or academic professions. Furtwängler vehemently opposed Nazi efforts to oust such individuals, as they had become an integral part of, and significant contributors to, German culture. The vast majority of Jews whom Furtwängler assisted were professionals (or their families or acquaintances) .

On the other hand, though, Furtwängler apparently felt that Jews outside these exalted ranks were potentially subversive and, therefore, expendable. He endorsed attacks upon alleged Jewish domination of newspapers because, in his view, this supplanted the development of a truly German press. Similarly, he seemed to indulge boycotts of Jewish commerce, protesting only the resultant adverse foreign publicity and the threat of a spill-over that could deplete the arts.

Even as late as May 1945, Furtwängler did not seem to fully grasp the consequence of Nazi racism. From the geographic and historical perspective of sanctuary in Switzerland, he had ample time to reflect upon the prior decade. His principal concern, though, became a fear that, in the aftermath of defeat, the now publicized atrocities would be blamed upon the entire German people, thus, unfairly ignoring their cultural greatness and inner nobility. Despite all he had witnessed, Furtwängler simply could not accept that the culture which once had produced Gøethe and Beethoven had now rotted into a mire of jackboots and crematoria. Fred Prieberg calls this a protective mythology which Furtwängler created to shield himself from accountability in a real world in which civilizations do fail, in which people are held responsible for their leaders, and in which art cannot be so conveniently isolated from politics. Furtwängler's tragedy was that he had to believe this illusion of permanent German cultural merit, in order to justify his life's work. Concludes Prieberg : « Furtwängler sacrificed himself to his own fiction. »

In recent years, we have been regaled by a pathetic parade of aged German artists claiming dewy eyed ignorance of the Holocaust. Would Furtwängler have been one of these ? Other than a few post-War expressions of shame, there is no evidence that he ever took a stand against the awful culmination of his casual tolerance of anti-Semitism. Indeed, it seems inconceivable that a man who spent so much of his time closely studying political leaders and social trends and successfully manipulating them to his professional benefit could have been genuinely ignorant of this corner-stone of Nazi activity and policy. Or, knowing, did he view the world through artistic blinders and simply not care ?

Speculation as to Furtwängler's state of mind is confusing and inconclusive. Fortunately, though, there is a far more reliable index to his conscience. When we listen to War-time performances by Strauß, Böhm, von Karajan, Krauß, Mengelberg and other Axis amorologists, we hear conductors utterly at peace with themselves, blissfully oblivious to the horrors around them, comfortably nestled in their insular worlds of abstract artistic contentment.

But Furtwängler's output of the time is of a wholly different dimension, ranging far beyond the bounds of accepted Classical tradition, distended by brutally twisted structures, outrageous tempos, jagged phrasing, bizarre balances and violent dynamics. This is simply not the expression of a cold hearted Nazi. Rather, it clearly and irrefutably signifies a sensitive but deeply troubled man torn by inner-conflict and soul wrenching doubt, constantly on the verge of exploding with torment.

Debate over Furtwängler's War-time politics may continue to swirl among academics, historians and social philosophers, but his artistry confers the ultimate proof of his humanity. There is no room for subtlety or doubt. No one sensitive to the interpretation of music can possibly mistake it.

Von Karajan

The degradation of Furtwängler's reputation stands in shameful contrast to the glorious career of Herbert von Karajan, whose authorized biographies tend to make only passing mention of his War years, and with very good reason. While von Karajan's apologists cloak his activities in the heady mantles of artistry and at worst opportunism, the facts decree otherwise.

Von Karajan later insisted he was apolitical, and claimed to have had no enthusiasm for the Nazis. And, yet, while no other musician of note ever bothered to join the National-Socialist Party (not even Richard Strauß, Hitler's favourite living composer), von Karajan joined not just once, but twice ! The dates were of particular significance. Von Karajan 1st registered on April 8, 1933 - 1 day after enactment of a new civil service law that removed Jews from State organizations. He re-enlisted on May 1, 1933 - the very day before a freeze on new Party members. As Norman Lebrecht observed in « The Maestro Myth » :

« For ambitious and unprincipled musicians, Party affiliation in 1933 offered a rapid route to the plum jobs suddenly vacated by Jewish outcasts. »

Von Karajan soon catapulted himself to prominence. He was appointed music director at Aachen and stepped-up to the Berlin State Opera following Furtwängler's resignation over the Hindemith episode. He ingratiated himself with Orchestras in Berlin and Vienna and was trotted-out to conduct in occupied countries when Furtwängler refused to do so. He proudly led Oratorios in praise of Hitler, scheduled special performances for Nazi brass to commemorate military victories and routinely opened his concerts with the « Horst Wessel Nazi » anthem, which included in its rousing lyrics the boast that « Jewish blood spurts from our knives » .

To give his claim of political indifference some credence, though, von Karajan wilfully destroyed his reputation in 1942, by marrying a woman of quarter Jewish ancestry (the Nazis were so precise about such calculations) and was, then, relieved of his posts and relegated to occasional freelance jobs until the end of the War.

But beyond everything else, while claiming to embody the highest ideals of an artist, von Karajan consistently lied about his Nazi Party membership after the War. That worked until 1957, when his membership certificates belatedly surfaced from War-time archives. Even when confronted with this seemingly undeniable evidence, von Karajan insisted that the documents must have been forged, since they lacked his signature. Fatal to that stand, though, was the fact that the cards never required the signature of the member, but only of the registering Party official.

While Furtwängler was vilified as an unrepentant old Nazi to the end of his days, von Karajan successfully buried his far more sensitive past to become the most prosperous musician in history, leaving an Estate estimated at a half billion dollars.

Furtwängler's Artistry

Several critics have explained Furtwängler's art as melding 2 often conflicting principles. Furtwängler conducts : 1st, a structural logic, sense of proportion and intellectual probing, was derived from Furtwängler's upbringing and is clearly evident in his early « Polydors » ; 2nd, unbridled emotion and improvisation was forged in the hideous caldron of Nazi Germany.

Great music never emerges from comfort, well being and privilege. Rather, throughout the history of music, the finest work arises from the most trying of circumstances. All of the great artists (composers and performers) were tortured souls. Even Beethoven was a gifted but largely derivative composer until driven to the brink of suicide by deafness, the cruellest blow of all for a budding musician. Like his idol, Furtwängler's art was fueled by the loss of his own most treasured possession : the stability of an absolute artist, sheltered from sordid social and political reality.

All conductors take their music seriously, but Furtwängler was driven by a deeper urge : he saw music as a moral force which had the power to impel listeners toward the good. He believed that music was a biological index that reinforced the ideals of humanity, its sonic struggles between tension and relaxation moving the listener toward an objective understanding of one's position in the universe. Music to Furtwängler was nothing less than a search for the meaning of existence.

Furtwängler's spirituality lent a deeply religious aura to his concerts. Some reportedly ended in meditative silence, the audience quietly leaving without daring to break the rarified mood with applause. This phenomenon is suggested by a recording of a 1950 Stockholm concert (on « Music & Arts » , CD : 799) in which a smattering of hesitant clapping begins a full 20 seconds after the final sustained note of Sibelius's « En Saga » evaporates.

Furtwängler's method was the antithesis of the typical autocratic conductor who forces himself upon an Orchestra. Henry Holst, who played under both leaders, recalled that Toscanini demanded, whereas Furtwängler persuaded. Rather than imposing a rigid frame on his musicians, Furtwängler wanted to cultivate an organic performance by nurturing his Orchestra's inspiration. Furtwängler explained the conductor's role as the outpouring of spiritual energy into a body of instrumentalists which creates the material quality of the sound produced, together with its rhythmical, harmonic and tonal life.

To achieve this partnership, Furtwängler used the most unconventional baton technique ever known. He refused to give the types of precise cues upon which musicians rely for cohesion and ensemble. Rather, as Holst observed :

« Furtwängler wanted a precision that grew-out of the players' own initiative, as in chamber music. »

Hans Peter Schmitz, a flutist in the Berlin Philharmonic, recalled that Furtwängler never beat time as such, but rather drew melodic shapes in an effort to depict the organic cohesion of a piece. Karl Schumann described Furtwängler's bizarre gestures as agogic, concerned only with flow, continuity and expression.

Music works best as an autonomous form of art. While music occasionally can blend well with certain other art forms such as dance (to produce ballet) and poetry (to create song) , the most affecting musical experiences have no need of such linkage. The greatest music, like all great performing art, rarely translates well into verbiage. The mere fact that Furtwängler's technique was so often described, both by himself and by others, in such vague and abstract terms serves as powerful testimony to the depth of his intrinsically musical quality. And, yet, such obtuse language carries with it an underlying frustration in denying us the ability to envision and to understand just how Furtwängler achieved what he did.

Attempts to crystallize such nebulous accounts into a visual image would be all but impossible were it not for a few precious newsreel clips of Furtwängler rehearsals. Several are contained in a recent video, « The Art of Conducting : Great Conductors of the Past » (« Teldec » 4504-95038-3) . The most intriguing clip shows Furtwängler in the throes of eliciting an emotion drenched account of the last 3 minutes of the Brahms 4th Symphony.

Words can barely convey the bizarre spectacle of Furtwängler's technique, which violinist Hugh Bean once described as « a puppet on a string » (to which, perhaps, should be added : « held by a spastic puppeteer ») . His right-hand and baton roughly keep the beat, his left-hand weaves round, flowing patterns having no apparent connection with the music, and his head and torso constantly jerk convulsively. How any Orchestra could derive meaningful, much less expressive, cues from such seemingly random movements is amazing ; that the Berlin Philharmonic could produce readings of compelling unity and power is simply miraculous.

But despite our natural fascination with seeing the process of artistic creation, of far greater significance is an artist's success in translating his technique into valid musical terms. For that, we have the resource of Furtwängler's recorded legacy.

Furtwängler flatly rejected the modernist notion of a standardized process by which a conductor simply assures the accurate playing of the written score. Legend has it that he once stormed-out of a Toscanini concert, cursing the Mæstro as a mere time beater. Furtwängler felt that a valid performance required him to internalize a score, completely identify with the composer and, then, vicariously repeat the act of creation, transmitting anew the tonal conception he heard inwardly. In the process, Furtwängler sought to master all the unique gestures and details of a work and, then, weave them into an organic whole. His vision, although deeply personal, was never arbitrary, but always sought inspiration in the mind of the composer.

One of the clearest examples of the validity of his unusual approach is found in the opening of Beethoven's 7th Symphony. The work begins with 4 full orchestral chords, separated by increasingly complex wind figures. There is nothing in the score to indicate anything other than a sharp attack ; indeed, every other known recording presents the chords with as much precision as the Orchestra can muster - a rapt call to attention and nothing more. In each Furtwängler recording, though, the chords are blurred and rough, each instrument emerging tentatively and out of synch. The impression is one of great effort, as if the chords had to struggle to overcome the smothering silence.

This is no mere empty rhetorical flourish. Rather, it reflects Furtwängler's re-thinking of the entire work. Most conductors adhere to Berlioz's famous characterization of the 7th Symphony as an apotheosis of the dance and emphasize its abundant grace and rhythmic drive. Furtwängler, though, placed the work in a far deeper region of Beethoven's psyche and performs it as a profound meditation on the elemental struggle between energy and fatigue, lightness and dark, motion and stasis. His opening chords are both the introduction to and the distillation of his vision.

Another extraordinary example of Furtwängler's art can be heard in his very last recording. The 3rd Act of Wagner's « Die Walküre » begins with the famous « Ride of the Valkyries » (often heard as an orchestral excerpt) in which the swirling excitement builds to wave after wave of thrilling climaxes. As 8 warrior sisters arrive at a rocky summit and boast of their exploits, the effect is indeed thrilling, with the sopranos belting out their ecstatic lines over the thrashing full Orchestra. But Furtwängler recognized the inherent problem with playing this scene at full boil, a temptation which no other conductor seems able to resist : the remaining hour of the Act, in which all of the important thematic action occurs, can seem awfully lax by comparison.

To Furtwängler, the « Ride of the Valkyries » , as exciting as it can be, must yield to the far more serious business of Act 3 : the battle of wills between Brunhilde, the errant oldest daughter, and her father Wotan, the head of the gods. In a long, deeply moving scene, she begs forgiveness which he cannot grant without destroying his own authority and, ultimately, is punished with banishment and mortality. Furtwängler deliberately forgoes the initial thrill for a more valid overall dramatic progression.

His recording heralds the drama perfectly, both in tempo and in texture. He begins the Ride at a brisk pace but, then, gradually decelerates so that Brunhilde arrives not on a buoyant note of ecstasy but crushed by impending tragedy. The feeling is re-inforced by the orchestral balances : shimmering and nearly devoid of bass at the outset but, then, gradually deepening so that the climax is mired in a heavy sludge of sound. As with the Beethoven, there is nothing in the score to suggest this ; rather, Furtwängler re-conceives the score in highly-individual terms in order to elicit Wagner's overall meaning.

Furtwängler is often described as a slow conductor, but that reputation is only half true. Furtwängler favored extreme tempos, both slow and fast. The overall feeling of torpor is due far more to the bass heavy sonority and reverberant concert halls Furtwängler favored than to the pulse itself.

Perhaps, the most striking instance of Furtwängler's exaggerated tempos is found at the very end of Beethoven's 9th Symphony (Choral) , which Furtwängler regarded as the greatest of Masterworks. Right before the end, the final words of the chorus are slow and stately. This passage leads abruptly to an orchestral Coda, marked « presto » , which most conductors indeed take at a healthy clip. In each of his recordings, though, Furtwängler brings the pulse to a near halt and, then, plunges into the Coda at a superhuman pace more than twice as fast as any other recording, so fast that the musicians cannot possibly play the notes accurately. The musical sense becomes utterly lost and the work invariably ends in a jumble of confusion.

Why mangle the final sublime moment of the ultimate orchestral work of the greatest composer in this way ? Because Furtwängler reminds us just who Beethoven was - not a gentle genius but the great rebel who constantly pushed music into uncharted territory. Thus, Furtwängler ends the Symphony, not with a refined and satisfying æsthetic touch, but with an uncontrolled explosive outburst, blowing away the bounds of musicianship and culture just as the composer himself had done. In a single gesture, Furtwängler transcends the immediate moment and even the Symphony itself to integrate the Coda into the entire life, personality and outlook of its composer. At the same time, his daring approach empowers the modern listener to relive the shock felt by Beethoven's own audiences.

Furtwängler was a conceptual artist: his why is far more important than his what. Furtwängler's conducting often seems mannered, quixotic and even arbitrary until we discern his reasons and then recognize that his artistry is driven by genius.

Hearing inspired Furtwängler interpretations like these is revelatory, leaving other performances to sound flat and routine. The depth of his thought is simply staggering. Furtwängler's true magic was his ability to convey worlds of new meaning within even the most familiar pieces.

The War-time Recordings

In 1937, Furtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic switched labels to « HMV » and recorded a Beethoven 5th Symphony .Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting aside from richer sound and a 1st movement repeat, the performance is virtually identical to their earlier 1926 « Polydor » reading. The next year, they returned to the studio for a solid Tchaïkovsky 6th Symphony (« Pathétique ») and several Wagner excerpts. All the « HMV » 's are now on « Biddulph » WHL 006-7 (2 CDs) . During the War itself, they recorded only Gluck's « Alceste » Overture, the Adagio from Bruckner's 7th Symphony and an orchestration of the « Cavatina » from Beethoven's Quartet in B-flat, Opus 130. All 3 are collected on « Teldec » , CD 9031-76435-2, and are far more remarkable for the unrelieved somberness of the repertoire than for any particular musical insight.

In purely artistic terms, the War-time studio recordings are barely significant. But, from a psychological perspective, it seems amazing that such a sensitive artist was able to so fully suppress the turmoil and anguish that buffeted his personal and professional life. Perhaps, this was an instinctive aversion to the unnatural mechanics of the recording process in which music was chopped into 4 minute fragments and often recorded out of sequence, a system utterly repugnant to Furtwängler's organic approach to music. Or, perhaps, it was a measure of the extreme will power by which Furtwängler was able to erect a shield of artistic purity against which he refused to allow even the most intense outside political forces to intrude.

Whatever the reason, Furtwängler's emotional dam burst in concert. The 1st documentation of this change is heard in 2 marvelous London performances from May, 1937. Act 3 from Wagner's « Die Walküre » (on « Myto » , MCD 914.43) boasts a magnificent sense of headstrong flow and inevitability, while Beethoven's 9th Symphony (on « Music & Arts » , CD 818) is gripping and highly-inflected. While lacking the ultimate abandon that would emerge during the War itself, these live renditions are far more intense and overtly dramatic than the Wagner and Beethoven pieces Furtwängler was recording in the studio for « HMV » .

Other than his own Symphonic Concerto and some snippets from Wagner Operas, we seem to have no further live Furtwängler recordings until 1942 to 1944, when Radio Berlin taped 20 concerts. By then, Furtwängler's artistry had become completely transformed.

The pick-up consisted of a principal microphone at the podium, mixed at the back of the hall with 3 others ; all were omni-directional and picked-up a lot of audience noise. The sound was relayed by telephone line to Radio Berlin headquarters, where it was recorded on machines, in 20 minute segments, on 14 inch reels of iron oxide tape running at 30 inches per second. Although 49 pieces reportedly were recorded, many of the tapes were lost, damaged or erased for re-use. The survivors were removed by Soviet occupation forces. After generating decades of Russian LP bootlegs, 22 were returned to Berlin in 1987. 19 were issued on 10 « DGG » Cds, in 1989. Now out of print, many have emerged on the American « Music & Arts » label.

Admittedly, it is rather difficult to listen to them today, knowing that the recordings originally were made to boost combat morale and that the highly-audible audience coughs arose from the pampered throats of Nazi military and government elite. But such perverse uses of art aside, perhaps, we can take some comfort in Furtwängler's hope that these broadcasts would also bolster the courage and humanity of civilian listeners. In any event, our ears know little of political correctness ; none of the performances is less than fascinating, and more than a few are among the most intense of all time.

If there is a single common quality to all of these performances, it is the extreme cohesion between conductor and Orchestra, hard enough to find in standard readings but nearly impossible to achieve when the interpretation is impulsive and radically re-conceived. This remarkable quality arose from the symbiosis between Furtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic, whose mutual needs were both artistic and practical. The Orchestra needed Furtwängler, without whose adoration by Adolf Hitler they would have lost their government subsidy and faced disbandment ; indeed, the intensity of their playing has been ascribed to the fear that each performance might have been their last. And Furtwängler equally needed his players, his self-described right arm, whose 20 year association enabled the musicians to understand and respond meaningfully to his bizarre gestures in a way that no other ensemble ever approached.

The magic bond is confirmed by both records and anecdotes. War-time concerts have recently surfaced featuring Furtwängler conducting the Beethoven 9th Symphony with the Stockholm Philharmonic (on « Music & Arts », CD : 2002) and the Bruckner 8th Symphony with the Vienna Philharmonic (on « Music & Arts », CD : 764) . Both works were Furtwängler specialties, but the readings lack even a hint of the gripping tension he regularly achieved with the Berlin Philharmonic. Also indicative of the Berlin players' unique understanding of their leader are the abundant tales from other Orchestras, ranging from the Italian concert Master who mistook Furtwängler's incomprehensible baton motions for nervousness and sought to reassure him, to the quip of a German musician that he knew when to start playing only by sitting down and counting to 10.

Among the highlights of the « DGG » series is a Strauß « Sinfonia Domestica » (on 427 781-2) that actually makes structural and dramatic sense of this diffuse, sprawling drivel ; a frighteningly intense Beethoven 7th Symphony (on 427 775-2) in which the Finale accelerates completely out of control ; a deeply felt Brahms 2nd Piano Concerto (on 427 776-2) with Furtwängler's philosophical soul mate Edwin Fischer as soloist ; a haunting Sibelius « En Saga » (on 421 783-2, the effect of which unfortunately is compromised by extreme audience noise) ; a boldly impassioned Bruckner 5th Symphony (on 427 774-2) ; a deeply mystical Beethoven 4th Symphony (on 421 777-2) ; and, perhaps most surprising, a soaring Ravel « Daphnis et Chloé » Suite (on 427 783-2) . Perhaps, the best « DGG » disc of all is 427 781-2, which combines a powerful Schubert 9th Symphony with a Weber « Freischütz » Overture that ranks as the finest example on record of Furtwängler's acclaimed ability to color and shape each individual phrase with a world of expressive insight.

The very best of the War-time performances, though, are found outside the « DGG » series. A December 1944 Beethoven 3rd Symphony (« Eroica ») (« Music & Arts », CD : 814) is massive but with a sharp nervous undertone unmatched in any other recording. A 1943 performance of the Sibelius Violin Concerto with George Kulenkampf transforms the usual fleet virtuosic display piece into a mournful study of mystery and menace. There is also an emphatic 1942 Prelude and « Leibstod » from Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » (« Music & Arts », CD : 730) and ecstatic Brahms Symphonies Nos. 2 and 4 from January 1945 and November 1943 (« Music & Arts », CD : 804) . An absolutely staggering January 1945 account of the Finale of the Brahms 1st Symphony (« Music & Arts », CD : 805) was recorded at the Berlin concert Furtwängler knew would be his last and fully reflects the unbearable emotions of that occasion.

Even more startling is a March 1942 performance of Beethoven's 9th Symphony on « Music & Arts » (CD : 653) . John Ardoin's fine notes aptly describe it as a reading : « of cyclonic fury, frightening and exhausting, drenched with torment, anger and a sense of struggle » . Ardoin attributes this approach to Furtwängler's « acute awareness that one of the noblest utterances of the human spirit was being voiced in a country engaged in some of the most appalling atrocities to be committed in the 20th Century » , which led Furtwängler to « somehow attempt through the music to alter or reverse the events surrounding him » . Regardless of whether this performance qualifies as idiomatic Beethoven, it is an astounding example of Furtwängler's ability to fully internalize and then regenerate a work as his own.

But even these extraordinary achievements pale beside the miracle of the 1944 Bruckner 9th Symphony which, after mediocre LP transfers, has been restored to remarkably decent sound on « Music & Arts » (CD : 730) . Unlike the other War-time performances, on this particular occasion, there was no audience to intrude upon the intensely private communion between conductor and Orchestra. The sole witnesses were the microphones, to preserve the event for broadcast. But in a deeper sense there was another essential participant : Bruckner himself.

Traditional Classical music is a recreative art : a composer writes down his musical thoughts, which artists of other cultures and generations must revitalize. All musicians struggle to wrest from the cold notation their understanding of what the composer wanted to communicate, but the gulf of years and unique personalities are formidable barriers. Throughout the 19th Century, the performer reigned supreme, and fidelity to creators' intentions was a foreign concept, at best of purely academic interest.

Furtwängler inherited this outlook. Even though he labored to find the inner-meaning of each work, he had such an overwhelming personality that his approach, despite the validity of his musical thought, was not necessarily on the same wavelength as the composers themselves. All the more remarkable, then, that for one critical moment his personal torment coincided so precisely with that of Bruckner that it yielded a performance that is as close as we will ever come to a perfect melding of composer and performer.

The composition of the 9th Symphony consumed the last agonized decade of Bruckner's life. He was a peasant who craved acceptance but was crushed by the snubs of society and the critical establishment. His music was strikingly original, but the cultural gate-keepers of the time insisted on editing and re-orchestrating it to conform to their own artistic norms. He was obsessed with morbidity, and was increasingly terrified by his own imminent end. He was deeply religious and dedicated his final work to God, but could not comprehend how God could refuse him the strength and inspiration to finish it.

The Symphony is incomplete in far more than the immediate sense of lacking a final movement ; Bruckner clearly struggled for something new and far reaching but ultimately died unable to realize it. The 1st movement, in particular, seems fragmentary and rough. Every other conductor tries to smooth the score into a cohesive whole. Furtwängler's approach, though, is far, far different.

Furtwängler once said that « an interpreter can render only what he has 1st lived through » . Of all the conductors who have grappled with the complex challenges of the Bruckner 9th, Furtwängler was best positioned to understand what Bruckner had achieved. Bruno Walter had hinted at this when he observed that he never understood Bruckner until he became mortally ill. The 9th Symphony is not a failed attempt at a cohesive artistic statement. Rather, it is a complete and perfect musical depiction of a tortured mind : a desperate snatch at a vision that grew ever more elusive, a vain quest for understanding and fulfillment in a world that would not provide it, a fevered groping for fragments of life in the lengthening shadow of death. As he wrestled with his 9th Symphony, Bruckner stood at the very edge of that abyss. By late 1944, Furtwängler stood there too.

The climax of the 1st movement heralds his emotion. The Berlin Philharmonic is fully controlled and its ensemble perfectly together and, yet, the tempo is so unstable and dynamically alive that no note falls quite where its predecessors would suggest, as if to reflect the entire Orchestra's heaving, nervous desperation. Furtwängler often spent entire rehearsals polishing crucial transitions, but not here ; he chops the 1st movement into dozens of inconclusive fragments, deliberately wrenching the mood from lilting lyricism to raw savagery, the tempos from standstill to runaway, and dynamics from inaudible to heavily overloaded. The movement ends in screaming trumpets, a primordial burst of sheer abject terror as both Bruckner and Furtwängler confronted the most horrifying fear of all : that, at the very end of their struggles, there would be only a void.

Although nothing could eclipse the unparalleled power of the opening, the wonders of this radical reworking of the Bruckner 9th do not end with the shattering climax of the 1st movement. Furtwängler whips the Scherzo and Trio from a slightly menacing waltz and bucolic « pastorale » into a furiously driven, vertiginous ride to damnation. He then gradually builds the unintended Adagio Finale to a terrifying dissonance, after which the exhausted fragments wither into eternal silence.

None of this is explicit in the score. It took Furtwängler to recognize and recreate an absolutely perfect depiction of a single mind and, by extension, an entire world on the brink of collapse.

After the War

Furtwängler may have been pushed to the very edge by the pressure and ambivalence of his role but, by early 1945, Nazi tolerance of Furtwängler's insolence had reached the breaking point as well. As the 1,000 year « Reich » lurched toward its early end, SS Chief Heinrich Himmler prepared to launch a grim final legacy : improving the world by ridding it of disloyal Germans who had thwarted faultless leadership and betrayed their nation's destiny of global domination.

The « Gestapo » had compiled a huge dossier on Furtwängler, who was near the top of their black-list ; as Himmler so delicately put it :

« There is no Jew, filthy as he may be, for whom Furtwängler does not stretch-out a helping hand. »

Under pretext of complicity in a failed July 1944 plot to assassinate Hitler, Furtwängler was targeted for liquidation. Albert Speer, chief architect of the « Reich » and an ardent admirer, warned Furtwängler that he had to flee for his life.

After conducting in Vienna, Furtwängler claimed to have fallen and suffered a concussion and informed Berlin that his return would have to be delayed until he recuperated. On February 7, 1945, he escaped to Switzerland. There, he reunited with his wife, who had gone earlier to give birth to his only legitimate child. (Furtwängler had fathered at least 4 other children, all of whom he acknowledged and supported.)

In Switzerland, he was in limbo. German sympathizers considered him a traitor, while others deemed him a collaborator. In a sense, Furtwängler's predicament was fundamentally unfair. We rarely condemn doctors or clergymen who stay behind to attend to the medical or spiritual needs of the civilian population in War-time. Why, then, should an artist who tries to preserve the cultural health of the populace be held to a different humanitarian standard ?

In any event, Furtwängler was unable to work pending a denazification investigation, which was delayed until the conclusion of the Nuremberg War crimes trial, a proceeding that ultimately consumed an entire year. The Allied command was not to be rushed, as they considered Furtwängler's celebrity to be a useful symbol of defeated Germany.

During this period, Furtwängler composed his 2nd Symphony, which he intended as his artistic testament. But instead of the seething, emotional catharsis suggested by the circumstances of its composition, or a beleaguered artist's visionary escape into new tonal territory, the sprawling work is a pastiche of older styles, meandering among glimmers of Brahms, Strauß, Sibelius and Bruckner without ever asserting an identity of its own. Admittedly, its virtues are obscured by the blandness of Furtwängler's own indifferent 1951 « DGG » studio run-through with the Berlin Philharmonic. Far more convincing is his blazing 1953 Vienna concert version (on « Orfeo » , CD : 375 941) . Even so, it is clear that Furtwängler sought refuge in the past and that his talent lay in interpretation rather than innovation.

Perhaps, more revealing of Furtwängler's post-War psyche and æsthetic outlook is his last composition, his 3rd Symphony in C-sharp minor. Although lacking Bruckner's assertive themes or wide emotional range, its massive, sprawling, thickly scored sobriety evoke that composer, yet ironically, they share more than fundamental style - like Bruckner's 9th, despite intensive effort Furtwängler died unable to achieve the Finale. Noting that Furtwängler always considered himself primarily a composer for whom conducting was a practicality, Gottfried Kraus felt that the work was a creative means to overcome the crises in his life. In his diary, Furtwängler stated :

« I wanted to make neither a mystical and mathematical construction, nor an ironical and skeptical consideration of the time but nothing more and nothing less than a tragedy. »

The 3 completed movements, marked Largo, Allegro and Adagio, were entitled : « Disaster » , « Under compulsion to life » and « Beyond » . (The Finale was to have been « the conflict continues » .) A fine realization is a 1980 concert (« Orfeo » , CD : 406 961) by the « Bayerisches Staatsorchester » conducted by Wolfgang Sawallich, who sees the 3rd as reflecting strong personal values in an introverted, confessional work that extends the general mourning of the time into deeply spiritual spheres.

Furtwängler's trial began on December 11, 1946. Based on its preliminary investigation, the tribunal conceded that Furtwängler was not part of any National-Socialist organization, that he avoided outward obeisance to the Nazis and that he tried to help persecuted people because of their race. Even so, Furtwängler stood accused of holding one official position (the nettlesome « Staatsrat ») , performing at one Nazi function, uttering one anti Semitic slur, and generally serving the purposes of the Nazi regime. The 1st 3 were readily rebutted or explained, but the last was troublesome. It was, quite simply, guilt by association.

Furtwängler had no attorney and was ill prepared to defend himself. As Yehudi Menuhin observed :

« Furtwängler was the last of an age that did not expect a man to be both a creator and a salesman at the same time. He explained himself badly. »

Even so, Furtwängler tried to convince the tribunal that he had to cooperate with the government to some extent in order to work against it from within the system. This, of course, is the principle of all underground movements. Thus, Furtwängler conceded that he had to couch correspondence in the Nazis' preferred racial language :

« To a certain degree, I had to fight with their weapons ; otherwise, I could not have achieved anything. »

After a week long recess, Furtwängler presented several persuasive character witnesses who swore to his unstinting rescue efforts. Furtwängler's summation proudly defended his record :

« The fear of being misused for propaganda purposes was wiped-out by the greater concern for preserving German music as far as this was possible. I could not leave Germany in her deepest misery. To get out at that moment would have been a shameful flight. I am a German, whatever may be thought of that abroad. I do not regret having done it for the German people. »

Furtwängler was fully acquitted. « The New York Times » , though, published a distorted account of the trial and its outcome, implying that the charges against Furtwängler essentially had been proven. This influential report was picked-up by wire services, spread throughout the free world, and hardened public opinion against Furtwängler.

The persistence of this cruel fiction throughout the rest of Furtwängler's life is preserved in 2 reference books, published in 1954, his final year. David Ewen's « Encyclopædia of Concert Music » refers to Furtwängler's intimate associations with the Nazi regime, and the updated Grove's « Dictionary of Music » noted :

« Under the Nazi regime in Germany, and particularly during the 2nd World War, Furtwängler seems to have enjoyed a privileged position. »

Only in recent times has such innuendo been superseded by a more balanced view. Thus, the current edition of Compton's « Encyclopædia » reports :

« He had difficulties with the Nazi government in the early 1930's but an uneasy truce was made. In Germany, he was generally considered anti Nazi, but elsewhere a conspirator. »

Encarta goes even further :

« Although he remained in Germany through most of World War II, he opposed the Nazi regime and was exonerated of charges of collaboration. »

Even though he had been completely absolved, Furtwängler still could not work until the Allied Command certified to his normalization, a procedure that dragged on for 5 months. At long last, the papers were issued and the final phase of Furtwängler's career was at hand.

Furtwängler's Post-War Career

For his 1st concert in over 2 years, Furtwängler chose an all Beethoven program with the Berlin Philharmonic, « Deutsche Grammophon » U.S. LP release of Furtwängler's 1st post-War concert of the Beethoven 5th which was hurriedly scheduled for May 25, 1947. Fittingly, the program duplicated the 1st concert Furtwängler had led upon resuming activity after the Hindemith affair.

Throughout the War, to minimize friction over his refusal to give the Nazi salute, Furtwängler had briskly strode to the podium, baton in hand, and immediately began conducting. This time, he made a normal entrance. The audience understood the gesture and gave him a 15 minute ovation. Furtwängler then proceeded to pour into Beethoven all of the repressed emotions he had withheld from his own 2nd Symphony. The 5th Symphony progresses from a grimly powerful opening to an ecstatic explosion of triumph. And the transition from the thunderstorm to the pastoral hymn of thanksgiving in the 6th Symphony has never been rendered with such exquisite earnestness. The event is preserved on « Music & Arts » (CD : 789) .

Clearly, Furtwängler seized upon the deep symbolism of these works and through them recreated his own personal odyssey from misery to freedom. The symbolism was extended 2 weeks later, when Furtwängler devoted his 1st post-War concert with the Vienna Philharmonic to an all Mendelssohn program, whose works had been among the 1st to have been banned by the Nazis.

Furtwängler quickly re-established his reputation in most of Europe. Even Arturo Toscanini, who had demonized Furtwängler throughout the War, was quoted in 1948 as considering him the 2nd best conductor in the world (Toscanini, of course, being the 1st) .

But much of the rest of the world did not forget as quickly. Furtwängler concerts outside of German speaking countries were protested, especially in England and Holland. Plagued with guilt over his country's misdeeds, Furtwängler refused to challenge misperceptions over his past and backed away from confrontation. As a sad indication of this extreme post-War sensitivity, Joachim Kaiser recalls how Furtwängler was greatly impressed at a 1950 Leonard Bernstein concert in Amsterdam but resisted any attempt to express his admiration for fear that even a passing contact could damage the young American's career.

America remained especially elusive. In 1949, Furtwängler was offered the helm of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, but the announcement provoked a firestorm of protests, fueled by rumors of collaboration and fanned by jealous rival conductors. The most sought after soloists, including Arthur Rubinstein, Vladimir Horowitz and Jascha Heifetz, all warned that they would boycott any Orchestra that engaged Furtwängler. Yehudi Menuhin, who had heard many testimonials among the displaced people for whom he played in Europe, following the War, and who was the 1st Jew to perform again with Furtwängler, attempted to air the facts, but to little avail. Bruno Walter accurately summed-up the problem as the one which would haunt Furtwängler for the rest of his life : as Germany's most prominent musician, he became an unwitting magnet for anti-German frustrations. The matter was concluded when the Chicago musicians union refused Furtwängler a work permit.

Furtwängler settled in Switzerland and wanted to remain freelance, but his hand was forced by von Karajan, who desperately coveted the helm of the Berlin Philharmonic. Largely as a defensive measure, Furtwängler agreed to become the Orchestra's Music Director for life, in January 1952, on condition that he have full and exclusive control over all its activities.

But rather than settle into the contented life of a tenured Master, Furtwängler remained pursued by demons. His hearing had declined to the point where he wore headphones at rehearsals and feared that the impairment would soon compromise his integrity. He felt mired in a golden culture of the past which history had left behind. He was still tarred by the very politics he had abhorred. And an upcoming Berlin Philharmonic tour of the United States promised a repeat of the bitter Chicago protests of 1949.

In late October 1954, exhausted from completing a Vienna studio version of Wagner's massive Opera « Die Walküre » , Furtwängler was diagnosed with pneumonia. His doctors were confident of his full recovery, but his depression grew. He confided to his wife that he no longer wanted to live. For the 1st time in 2 decades, Furtwängler got what he wanted. But so did von Karajan, who eagerly replaced him, led the Berlin Philharmonic on a triumphant U.S. tour, and in appreciation for his services was made the Orchestra's new permanent conductor, a power base to which he would cling for the remaining 34 years of his life and parlay into the most profitable career in the history of music.

The Post-War Recordings

Furtwängler hated the recording process as freezing an art that should constantly evolve and be recreated anew. And yet, after the War, he succumbed to the studio, waxing dozens of works with the Vienna Philharmonic. Among the best are exquisitely polished accounts of the Beethoven Symphonies No. 3 (« Eroica ») and No. 6 (« Pastorale ») on « EMI » (CDH 7 63033 2 ; CDH 7 63034 2) . Only a handful have been converted to CD, but the loss is not that severe. All display a fine sense of architecture and are well-played but lack the inspiration of his prime work. Perhaps, Furtwängler knew that only the Berlin Philharmonic could respond with instinctive precision to his impulses and, therefore, didn't even attempt spontaneous wonders with other ensembles. Or, perhaps, Furtwängler sensed that he could discharge his distasteful studio assignments most efficiently by avoiding any unusual interpretive features that might produce flaws and require retakes.

Furtwängler also recorded a few works in the studio with the Berlin Philharmonic, including a noble 1951 Schubert 9th Symphony (on « DGG » , CD : 427 405-2) and a powerful 1953 Schumann 4th Symphony (on « DGG » , CD : 427 404-2) . While preferable to the Vienna readings, they still seem somewhat reserved and lack the spontaneity of his live performances. Perhaps, his finest studio recording was a complete Wagner « Tristan und Isolde » (on « EMI », CDS 7 47322 8 - 4 CDs), recorded in London, in 1952, with Kirsten Flagstad, Ludwig Suthaus and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, each LP side registered in a single take to preserve continuity. But Furtwängler's truly great and lasting work was all achieved in the concert-hall.

LP collectors enjoyed a wide choice of Furtwängler concert releases, including an extensive Furtwängler Edition on « Arkadia's Fonit / Cetra » label, a more limited official series on « Unicorn »'s Furtwängler Society imprint, and further choices on « DGG », « Heliodor », « Discocorp » and « Turnabout ». The most comprehensive CD edition is on the Italian « Virtuoso » label, but the selections are all post-War, sound quality is often rough and documentation is non-existent; even so, these are well worth their super budget price, but you may have to search in off-beat outlets, as many music stores shun them. The growing series on the full-price American « Music & Arts » label boasts far better transfers, and their catalogue is selective of Furtwängler's best work. Also worthwhile are CDs on the « DGG », « Arkadia », « Ermitage », « AS Disc » and « Tahra » labels.

Every few months, nowadays, seems to yield a bumper crop of new Furtwängler CDs. But the sheer number of discs and labels is deceptive; despite occasionally improved sources and restoration techniques, most of the new recordings duplicate previous releases.

(Please note: In all candor, I haven't acquired most of the rereleases if I already have an earlier edition and, consequently, I haven't tried to update the labels and CD numbers cited here, in order to take new or superceding transfers into account. To minimize confusion, I've tried to identify each recording by location and / or date to enable readers to distinguish it from other versions in various incarnations.)

Although dozens of tantalizing concerts reportedly hide in private archives, we are fortunate that, with only a few serious gaps, we have fine examples of nearly all of Furtwängler's core repertoire - and most in multiple versions that permit fascinating comparisons, including 5 Beethoven 5th's, 5 Brahms 1st's and 7 Beethoven 9th's.

Furtwängler poured into his concerts an artistic vision that had become transformed through his life experiences. As John Ardoin aptly observes in « The Furtwängler Record », the pre-War recordings found Furtwängler at the height of technical achievement, recreating sound through the combined resources of mind and heart; during the War Years, his technique was tempered by a powerful sense of history and rage; and, finally, all that had gone before was recast through a hard won serenity and sense of perspective. The post-War concerts are monumental, the power of the past now embedded in pride and dignity.

Furtwängler's most famous post-War concert took place on July 29, 1951, at the re-dedication of the Festival Hall at Bayreuth and fully exemplifies his transformed outlook. Inaugurated 75 years earlier by Richard Wagner for the presentation of his Operas, Bayreuth had become the embodiment of German musical culture. Furtwängler, himself, the paradigm of German Classical tradition, was the obvious choice to re-open the Theatre. To Furtwängler, the occasion had deep personal significance, as it symbolized the re-emergence of German culture from the ashes of War-time politics and, thus, reflected and vindicated the very philosophy to which he had adhered during the War and for which he had suffered so greatly.

To Furtwängler, only one work in all of music could possibly suffice for such a momentous event : Beethoven's 9th Symphony. The performance stands in striking contrast to his astounding 1942 Berlin performance. The timings of the movements are virtually identical, but there all similarity ends. Each reading is overwhelmingly passionate, but conceived in utterly divergent terms. The War-time performance is organized around slashing, brutal climaxes, while the Bayreuth concert builds its power subtly into a seething continuum. Fury has yielded to spirituality. Animal ferocity has evolved into human emotion. If the Berlin performance was a cry of desperation, the Bayreuth concert was a valedictory confirmation of the ultimate triumph of the artistic spirit. Furtwängler's achievement, both personal and æsthetic, is absolutely magnificent.

Furtwängler could never bring himself to make a studio recording of this favourite work, and so, after his death his widow arranged for release of the tape of the Bayreuth concert. It became a best-seller when 1st issued in 1955, on « RCA » (LM-6043) , and has remained in print for succeeding generations through reissues on « Angel's Great Recordings of the Century » (COLH 78-79) , « Seraphim » budget LP's (IB-6068) and, now, « EMI » CD : 7 69801 2. It is hard to imagine a more fitting and lasting tribute to the man and to his art.

Furtwängler's other great post-War achievement was in Opera. Furtwängler avoided the silly, contrived fluff that leads to ridicule of the genre, turning instead to works that have something profound to say about the human condition. « Virtuoso » CDs present magnificent Salzburg Festival performances of Verdi's « Otello » (on 2697382) , Mozart's « Magic Flute » (2699192) , Mozart's « Don Giovanni » (2699052) and Weber's « Der Freischütz » (2697222) . These performances are of particular appeal to those who tend to shy away from Opera, since Furtwängler took a Symphonic approach to the music and de-emphasized the libretto.

Furtwängler's closest identification in the public mind was with Richard Wagner, who had transformed German music with an æsthetic that was as revolutionary and brilliant as his racist political writings were reactionary and depraved. The summit of Wagner's art was the « Ring of the Nibelung » , a series of 4 Operas lasting over 15 hours which tell a sweeping mythological tale of mortal and godly creation, evolution, love, greed, betrayal and downfall. Extraordinary vocal and scenic demands render the mounting of even a single « Ring » Opera rare enough, but Furtwängler led 2 complete post-War cycles in Italy. (It is a true testament to the Italians' love of Opera that they would lavish their resources on the revival of this summit of German art !)

The 1st Furtwängler « Ring » was recorded live, in 1950, at the famous La Scala Opera House, in Milan. Originally unlistenable on « Murray Hill » records, which in a gesture of false economy had crammed-up to 45 minutes onto each LP side, the entire set has been successfully restored on « Virtuoso » 2699082 (14 super-budget CDs) , « Fonit Cetra » ECDC 1000 (14 mid-priced CDs) and « Arkadia » CDWFE 351.12 (12 premium priced CDs) . The 2nd « Ring » was broadcast from Rome over Italian radio, in 1953, 1 Act per night. After years of haggling over rights, it emerged on « Seraphim » LP's , in 1972, and is now on « EMI CZS 7 67123 2 (13 budget CDs) or « Arkadia » CDWFE 359.12 (12 premium CDs) . A 1952 Rome sampler of Act 1 of « Die Walküre » and Act 3 of « Gotterdammerung » is on « Music & Arts » 2 CDs (CD : 866) .

Opera fanatics will forever debate the relative merits of the 2 full cycles. The La Scala set is swifter and boasts the spontaneous excitement (as well as the flaws, noise, awkward balances and grueling exhaustion) of a real Opera performance, while the Rome broadcasts are more relaxed and better recorded. For some fans, the choice is dictated by the female lead : the icy beauty of Kirsten Flagstad, in 1950, or the rougher drama of Martha Mödl, in 1953. True Opera buffs would never part with either set and rank both among the finest Wagner ever recorded.

But it was Fidelio to which Furtwängler kept returning. Not only was this the sole Opera of his beloved Beethoven, but its theme of fidelity and love triumphing over political repression struck a deep chord within Furtwängler's own experiences.

The entire Opera takes place in the courtyard and dungeon of a political prison. The admittedly absurd plot premise finds the female title character disguised as a young man trying to ingratiate himself to the jailer guarding her husband Florestan. Opportunity finally arrives when the evil governor asks her to help dispose of Florestan prior to the visit of the benevolent minister. At the crucial moment, she reveals herself and holds the governor at bay until the minister arrives to restore social and moral order by liberating the prisoners, punishing the despot and reuniting the faithful wife and husband.

The final Act, in particular, throbs with heartfelt commitment under Furtwängler's baton, from its opening in the dungeon as Florestan hallucinates hope, through his devoted wife's daring rescue, the thwarting of the murder scheme, the lovers' fervent embrace, a sublime orchestral undertone which blends all of these themes, and the final cathartic choruses in praise of love, devotion and liberty.

Furtwängler viewed « Fidelio » more as a Mass than a mere Opera. As he wrote, in 1950 :

« What Beethoven was trying to express in “ Fidelio ” extends beyond the narrow limits of a musical composition ; it touches the heart of every human being and will always appeal directly to the conscience of Europe. The emotions expressed in the whole of this music are the constituents of a religion of humanity. After all that we have experienced and suffered in recent times, this religious faith has never seemed so essential as it does today. »

Furtwängler led post-War performances of « Fidelio » as a moral imperative. It is no coincidence that the truly great recordings of « Fidelio » by Toscanini (« RCA » 60273) , Furtwängler and Bernstein (« DGG » 419 436) were all crafted by men of deep social and political conscience.

Fortunately, beyond a bland 1953 studio version, we have 3 recordings of Furtwängler « Fidelios » : a 1948 Salzburg performance, incomplete and in rotten sound but the most fleet and overtly dramatic (on « Melodram » , CDM 25009) , a glowing 1950 Salzburg version with a dream cast (on « EMI » , CDM 7 64901 2) and a profound 1953 Vienna performance (on « Virtuoso » 2697272 ; or « EMI » CDHB 64496) .

Furtwängler's post-War orchestral repertoire ranged from Bach and Händel through Hoeller, Blacher, Fortner and other contemporaries. But his most memorable interpretations were of the 19th Century German Symphonic literature (especially Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner) , to which he brought unique insight. As a general rule, though, it's hard to go far wrong with any Furtwängler concert.

In a 1948 « BBC » interview, Furtwängler insisted that

« The conductor has one arch enemy to fight : routine. »

While he may ultimately have succumbed to the wounds of life's other battles, this was the one fight that Furtwängler undeniably won. As « New York Times » critic Harold Schœnberg concluded :

« It is safe to say that, never in his life, did Furtwängler give a routine performance. »

A Final Note

It has been said that the truest measure of a man often lies in the esteem of his enemies. And so it is that the most intriguing pendant to the Furtwängler saga summons once again his younger nemesis.

After taking the helm of the Berlin Philharmonic upon Furtwängler's death, Herbert von Karajan won unprecedented fame and fortune by polishing his performances to a super-human precision, purging the music of any vestige of human emotion, as if to deliberately suppress memories of the approach of his predecessor. And, yet, decades after Furtwängler's tortured demise, toward the end of his own charmed life, the wealthiest and most successful musician of all time seems to have become haunted with a most peculiar concern. Reportedly, even while bathed in constant public adulation by legions of sycophants and forever ecstatic audiences, von Karajan would privately despair and scowl at all the acclaim.

What doubt possibly could have troubled the mind of the world's greatest musician ? That Furtwängler wouldn't have approved !

Further Reading

In view of the geographic focus and international controversy surrounding his career, it is not surprising that much writing on (and by) Furtwängler remains in untranslated German. The most comprehensive English language resource is Sam H. Shirakawa's « The Devil's Music Master » (Oxford University Press, 1992) which dwells upon the War-time period and its aftermath with considerably more sympathy than its title suggests. Even more sympathetic (indeed, outright apologist at times) is Fred Prieberg's « Tower of Strength : Wilhelm Furtwängler in the 3rd “ Reich ” » (Christopher Dolan, translator) (Northeastern University Press, 1994) , which analyzes rare archival and private documents to assess Furtwängler's activities and attitudes during the War.

After contributing fine liner notes for many of the « Music & Arts » CDs, John Ardoin expanded his observations into the excellent « The Furtwängler Record » (Amadeus Press, 1994) , which includes a helpful (although already outdated) discography. Ardoin's analysis of every known shred of Furtwängler's recorded legacy is comprehensive but, perhaps, too detailed for most readers. Worthy but briefer overviews include a chapter in Harold Schœnberg's « The Great Conductors » (Simon & Schuster, 1967) , Karl Schumann's essay « Furtwängler : The Myth and Personality of a Musician » (included in the LP box of « Fidelio » (« Seraphim » IC-6022) , and occasional insights in the « DGG » Furtwängler CD liners.

Testimonials to Furtwängler's life, artistry and War-time courage are collected in David Gillis's « Furtwängler Remembered » (Meredith Press, 1965) . Furtwängler expounded his own philosophy in « Concerning Music » (T. J. Lawrence, translator) (Boosey & Hawkes, 1953) . He can be heard in a brief English language interview on « Music & Arts » (CD : 792) and can be glimpsed, in rehearsal and in performance, on « The Art of Conducting » (« Teldec » video 4504-95038-3) . The rivalry with von Karajan is recounted in Roger Vaughan's « Herbert von Karajan » (Norton & Co. , 1986) and more skeptically in Norman Lebrecht's « The Maestro Myth » (Birch Lane Press, 1991) .

Furtwängler's Greatest Hits

If there is one immutable truth in art it is that taste and fashion do not evolve in a linear, orderly way ; rather, they constantly shift unpredictably. The relics of the past invariably become the inspiration of the future.

When he died 2 generations ago, Wilhelm Furtwängler was considered an ancient curiosity beyond whose egotistical distortions of the score Toscanini and his legions of followers had progressed. Furtwängler's deeply personal, mystical groping for metaphysical insight seemed irrelevant and even ridiculous when compared with the clear objective vision of the new approach, which echoed the emerging modern drive in all the arts toward simplicity, brevity and conformity. But the fickle sands of taste continue to shift and Furtwängler has become meaningful once more.

In the years since Furtwängler's death, we have wandered through a musical desert. Boredom has set in with a vengeance. Record shelves and CD browsers bulge with dozens of nearly identical objective performances of the standard repertoire. The prospect of, yet, another is worth barely a yawn. Who really cares to hear conductor X and Orchestra Y mechanically translate a well-worn score into sound ? What could such an exercise ever add to what we already know ?

Modern electronic convenience, too, has exacted a heavy cultural toll. Furtwängler was part of an era in which Classical music really mattered. It had to. Music could not be taken for granted. Performances were not conjured or dismissed with the push of a button. Listening required a genuine personal commitment of a trip to the concert-hall or actually playing the music yourself. Music was not relegated to the background but was heard in settings which demanded full attention and in return yielded deep insight.

Listening to a Furtwängler performance requires an atmosphere free of distractions. Only then, can the magnitude of his art be understood and appreciated. Furtwängler did not merely produce patterned sound from written directions. He created meaning far beyond the notes. He strove to communicate something ineffably profound about the human condition. Although nominally anchored in the ethos of a specific era, his approach transcends time.

It is, of course, ironic that Furtwängler's posthumous fame rests largely upon the very medium he had so disdained. In selecting Furtwängler recordings, there are 2 cardinal rules. 1st, choose concerts over studio readings. 2nd, choose the Berlin Philharmonic over the Vienna Philharmonic, and those 2 over any other Orchestras.

Of the available Furtwängler performances, none is less than interesting. The best are absolutely compelling and rank among the greatest achievements of the phonographic era. Here is a highly-subjective list of personal favourites :

Beethoven : Symphony No. 7

Furtwängler conducts the Beethoven 7th (« DGG » CD) Berlin Philharmonic (October 3, 1943) , (« DGG » 427 775-2 ; or « Music & Arts » , CD : 823) . Furtwängler's Beethoven output was uniformly excellent. But, while his accustomed brilliance with the other major Beethoven Symphonies has been justly praised, perhaps, his greatest achievement lies here, a radical and deeply personal re-thinking which wrests profound truth from a work in which others are content to find only lyrical grace.

Beethoven : Symphony No. 9 (Choral)

Furtwängler conducts the Beethoven 9th (« EMI » CD) (1) Berlin Philharmonic (March 22, 1942) ; « Music & Arts » (CD : 653) . (2) Bayreuth Festival Orchestra (July 29, 1951) , (« EMI » , CDH 7 69801 2) . Each of these magnificent performances embodied Furtwängler's artistic outlook at the time. That a single conductor could produce such radically different but equally convincing interpretations of the same work speaks not only to the depth of his talent but the enormity of the emotional journey he had traversed. According to his widow, Furtwängler's own favourite performance of the 9th was his last, given August 21, 1954, with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in Lucerne (on « Tahra » 1003) , after which he told her :

« This time, I had one foot in the other world. »

Beethoven : « Fidelio »

Furtwängler conducts « Fidelio » (« EMI » CD) Kirsten Flagstad, Julius Patzak, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Anton Dermota, Joseph Greindl, Paul Schöffler, Vienna Philharmonic (Salzburg Festival, August 5, 1950) , (« EMI » 2 CDs : CDMB 7 64901 2) . In Furtwängler's hands, Beethoven's only Opera transcends its dated libretto to become an urgent contemporary morality play of eternal love and faith defeating the temporary evils of politics and vengeance. Every musical phrase and every word, even the formulaic Romantic distractions and insipid dialogue, pulses with heartfelt meaning, a fervent prayer for humanity rising directly from Furtwängler's very soul.

Beethoven : Violin Concerto

Furtwängler and Menuhin play the Beethoven Violin Concerto (« Music & Arts » CD) Berlin Philharmonic, with Yehudi Menuhin (September 30, 1947) , « Music & Arts » (CD : 708) . This was both a beautiful performance and a magnificent gesture of conscience. Despite Allied findings of non-collaboration, much of the world music community continued to spurn Furtwängler after the War. Having heard 1st hand accounts of Furtwängler's valor from survivors, Yehudi Menuhin, a Jewish American virtuoso, risked his reputation by travelling to Berlin and there, in the proverbial lion's den, effected an artistic reconciliation. The intense bond between the scorned conductor and his ardent young champion produced a performance of consummate feeling. The marvel was repeated at the 1949 Lucerne Festival with an equally fine reading of the Brahms Violin Concerto on « EMI » (CD : 63496) .

Brahms : The 4 Symphonies & Haydn Variations

Furtwängler conducts the Brahms Symphonies (« Virtuoso » CD box) Berlin Philharmonic (1948-1952) . « Virtuoso » 2699072 (3 CDs) . Just as Brahms revitalized traditional musical form through his own resourcefulness, so Furtwängler re-conceived Brahms, in deeply personal terms. Every one of these readings is a knock-out, inspiringly conducted, brilliantly played, well-recorded and at a super-budget price. If you can't find this set, an alternative can be pieced together. « Music & Arts » 804 (4 CDs priced as 3) boasts even finer War-time Symphonies Nos. 2 and 4 but decidedly lesser versions of the others, further hampered by wow and thin sonics. A 1951 Hamburg Symphony No. 1 is on « Memories » 4531 or « Tahra » 1001, abetted by superb sound (albeit in fake stereo on the « Memories » version) . An excellent 1954 Symphony No. 3 is on « DGG » 423592-2. And that astounding Finale of the Symphony No. 1 from January, 1945 is on « Music & Arts » 805.

Brahms : « German Requiem »

Furtwängler conducts the Brahms « German Requiem » (« Music & Arts » CD) Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra and Chorus (November 19, 1948) . « Music & Arts » CD : 289 (2 CDs) . Most of Furtwängler's work away from Berlin or Vienna tends to sound pretty rough, but he achieved a miracle of cohesion in Stockholm ; perhaps, the special rapport stemmed from his War-time visits to the neutral Sweden, which provided his only contact with music and emissaries of the free world. Furtwängler slows the pace to a crawl and blends the sonorities to an exquisite subtlety. The result lends wonder, awe, and a deep reverential feeling to this gorgeous work.

Bruckner : Symphony No. 8 in C minor

Furtwängler conducts the Bruckner 8th (« Music & Arts » CD) Berlin Philharmonic (March 15, 1949) . « Music & Arts » , CD : 624. Any Furtwängler Bruckner performance is a safe bet, but this is a wild, reckless and utterly astounding reading that manages to blend War-time tension with a new found repose and in the process demonstrates what truly committed conducting (and playing) is all about. Unfortunately, the climaxes are severely over-loaded and some quiet sections are plagued by extreme audience noise. Equally ecstatic are a 1943 Symphony No. 6 (of which the 1st movement is missing) on « Music & Arts » , CD : 805 and a 1951 Symphony No. 4 on « Virtuoso » , CD : 2697372.

Bruckner : Symphony No. 9 in D minor

Furtwängler conducts the Bruckner 9th (« Music & Arts » CD) Berlin Philharmonic (October 7, 1944) . « Music & Arts » , CD : 730. The wonder of this concert is described in the main article. The Bruckner 9th was the 1st work Furtwängler ever conducted in public and remained one of his favourites but, after this staggeringly intense performance, he never touched it again ; how could he ? The CD sound is a considerable improvement over previous « DGG » and « Heliodor » LP's.

Furtwängler : Symphonic Concerto for Piano and Orchestra

Edwin Fischer, piano, Berlin Philharmonic (January 19, 1939) . « Pilz » , CD : 78 004. All conductors strive for immortality through composition but, to Furtwängler, composing had a deeper purpose : Furtwängler conducts his Symphonic Concerto (« Pilz » CD) , it was an outlet to which he turned during the most frustrating and tempestuous times of his life. Although both the recording and the CD transfer are mediocre, this sprawling work from the agonizing period of 1936 is as close as he ever got to a self-portrait. Equally revealing, but in a far different way, is his Symphony No. 2 (Vienna Philharmonic, 1953, on « Orfeo » 375 941) . Written while awaiting his rehabilitation in 1946, this serves as a compendium of Furtwängler's musical influences and proclivities. Together, these works document more about Furtwängler's artistic outlook than words can ever convey. They also display the unique nature of Furtwängler's talent since, in other hands, they sound boring and diffuse but here they pulse with commitment and power.

Mendelssohn : « Hebrides » Overture

Vienna Philharmonic (October 29, 1951) . Furtwängler conducts Mendelssohn's « Hebrides » Overture (« Fonit » LP ; « Recital Records » 351 ; or, « Fonit / Cetra » , FE 35. The vast majority of Furtwängler's concerts with the Vienna Philharmonic are polished but dry. In the summer of 1951, though, they briefly caught fire and produced some thrilling results. The menacing atmosphere, seething mysticism and palpable tension of this performance are breathtaking, but as of this writing it is only on LP. Other incendiary Vienna concerts, from the same season, include a Schumann Symphony No. 1 « Spring » (on « Virtuoso » 2697402 or « London » 417 287-2) and Bruckner Symphonies Nos. 4 and 5 (on « Virtuoso » 2697372 and 2697342 ; or, « Music & Arts » 796) .

Schubert : Symphony No. 9 « The Great »

Furtwängler conducts the Schubert « Great Symphony » on « RCA » LP (box CD) . It's impossible to choose a single Furtwängler recording of this favourite work, as each illuminates a different aspect of the same fundamental interpretation. A 1942 Berlin concert (on « DGG » 427 781-2) is impulsive and overtly dramatic, a 1951 Vienna studio reading (on « DGG » 427 405-2) is lyric and gentle, a 1952 Vienna concert (on « Virtuoso » 2697362) boasts breathtakingly smooth transitions, and a 1953 Berlin concert (on « Music & Arts » , CD : 795) is massive and noble. Furtwängler's profound exposition of Schubert's Symphony No. 8 « Unfinished » is on « DGG » 423 572-2.

Tchaïkovsky : Symphony No. 5

Turin Radio Orchestra (June 9, 1952) . Furtwängler conducts Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5 (« Music & Arts » , CD : 712 ; or, « AS Disc » 371. The composer's fiery emotion and the conductor's probing insight were a natural match, but, unfortunately, this is the only available Furtwängler concert of a Tchaïkovsky Symphony. The interpretation is quintessential Furtwängler, deeply impassioned but without the flaming excess of some other Maestros. The ragged playing, though, documents the problems which arose when an unfamiliar ensemble had to decipher Furtwängler's unconventional gestures. A superb 1951 Berlin Philharmonic concert of the Symphony No. 6 in which such lapses are absent has eluded CDs so far and was last on « DGG » , LP 2535 165.

Wagner : « Tristan und Isolde »

Furtwängler conducts « Tristan und Isolde » (« RCA » LP box cover, featuring a specially commissioned painting by Federico Castellon) Kirsten Flagstad, Ludwig Suthaus, Blanche Thebom, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, « Philharmonia » Orchestra (June, 1952) . « EMI » CHS 7 473222 8 (4 CDs) . Elizabeth Furtwängler recalled that this recording first prompted her husband to realize the potential of the medium, whose permanence he had considered improper and whose editing he had condemned as dishonest. Critics agree that this is one of the greatest Opera recordings ever made, in which the vast spaces of Wagner are unified with compelling vision. Furtwängler's only other studio Wagner project, « Die Walküre » , « EMI » CHS 7 63045 2 (3 CDs) was his last endeavor and is nearly as good. Excellent orchestral Wagner concert excerpts are on « Music & Arts » CD : 794 ; and « DGG » 427 406-2.

Weber : Overture to « Der Freischütz »

Furtwängler conducts the Weber's « Der Freischütz » Overture (« Music & Arts » , CD : 784) . Furtwängler's performances of this work span his recording career and document his evolving artistry. The Overture was his debut recording, in 1926 (on « Koch » 3-7059-2) . It and the nearly identical 1935 reading (on « Koch » 3-7073-2) explode with youthful energy, the 1944 Berlin concert (on « DGG » 427 781-2) quivers with tension, and the 1952 Berlin and 1954 Vienna concerts (on « Music & Arts » , CD : 795 ; and « Virtuoso » 2697222, respectively) achieve a rarefied calm of nobility and pride. Furtwängler's affinity for this piece seems especially fitting, as it introduces an Opera that, more than any other, embodies the very essence of German themes, outlook and music. And that, of course, was also the essence of Furtwängler.

Wilhelm Furtwängler and Music in the 3rd « Reich »

(By Antony Charles.)

Not only during his lifetime, but also in the decades since his death, in 1954, Wilhelm Furtwängler has been globally recognized as one of the greatest musicians of the 20th Century, above all as the brilliant primary conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which he led from 1922 to 1945, and again after 1950. On his death, the « Encyclopaedia Britannica » commented :

« By temperament a Wagnerian, his restrained dynamism, superb control of his Orchestra and Mastery of sweeping rhythms also made him an outstanding exponent of Beethoven. »

Furtwängler was also a composer of merit.

Underscoring his enduring greatness have been several recent in depth biographies and a successful 1996 Broadway play, « Taking Sides », that portrays his post-War denazification purgatory, as well as steadily strong sales of CD recordings of his performances (some of them available only in recent years) . Furtwängler Societies are active in the United States, France, Britain, Germany and other countries. His overall reputation, however, especially in America, is still a controversial one.

Following the National-Socialist seizure of power, in 1933, some prominent musicians (most notably, such Jewish artists as Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer and Arnold Schönberg) left Germany. Most of the nation's musicians, however, including the great majority of its most gifted musical talents, remained (and even flourished) . With the possible exception of the composer Richard Strauß, Furtwängler was the most prominent musician to stay and collaborate.

Consequently, discussion of his life (even today) still provokes heated debate about the role of art and artists under Hitler and, on a more fundamental level, about the relationship of art and politics.

A Non-Political Patriot

Wilhelm Furtwängler drew great inspiration from his homeland's rich cultural heritage, and his world revolved around music, especially German music. Although essentially non political, he was an ardent patriot, and leaving his fatherland was simply out of the question.

Ideologically, he may, perhaps, be best characterized as a man of the old Germany (a Wilhelmine conservative and an authoritarian elitist) . Along with the great majority of his countrymen, he welcomed the demise of the ineffectual democratic regime of Germany's Weimar Republic (1918-1933) . Indeed, he was the conductor chosen to direct the gala performance of Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » for the Day of Potsdam, a solemn State ceremony on March 21, 1933, at which President von Hindenburg, the youthful new Chancellor Adolf Hitler and the newly elected « Reichstag » formally ushered in the new government of national awakening. All the same, Furtwängler never joined the National-Socialist Party (unlike his chief musical rival, fellow conductor Herbert von Karajan) .

It wasn't long before Furtwängler came into conflict with the new authorities. In a public dispute, in late 1934, with Propaganda Minister Josef Goebbels over artistic direction and independence, he resigned his positions as director of the Berlin Philharmonic and as head of the Berlin State Opera. Soon, however, a compromise agreement was reached whereby he resumed his posts, along with a measure of artistic independence. He was also able to exploit both his prestigious position and the artistic and jurisdictional rivalries between Goebbels and Göring to play a greater and more independent role in the cultural life of 3rd « Reich » Germany.

From then on, until the « Reich » 's defeat, in the spring of 1945, he continued to conduct, to much acclaim, both at home and abroad (including, for example, a highly-successful concert tour of Britain, in 1935) . He was also a guest-conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1939-1940, and at the Bayreuth Festival. On several occasions, he led concerts in support of the German War effort. He also nominally served as a member of the Prussian State Council and as vice-President of the « Reich » Music Chamber, the State sponsored professional musicians' association.

Throughout the 3rd « Reich » era, Furtwängler's eminent influence on Europe's musical life never diminished.

Cultural Vitality

For Americans conditioned to believe that nothing of real cultural or artistic merit was produced in Germany during the Hitler era, the phrase Nazi art is an oxymoron (a contradiction in terms) . The reality, though, is not so simple, and it is gratifying to note that some progress is being made to set straight the historical record.

This is manifest, for example, in the publication in recent years of 2 studies that deal extensively with Furtwängler, and which generally defend his conduct during the 3rd « Reich » : « The Devil's Music Master » by Sam H. Shirakawa (reviewed in the January - February 1994 « Journal » , pages 41-43) and « Trial of Strength » by Fred K. Prieberg. These revisionist works not only contest the widely accepted perception of the place of artists and arts in the 3rd « Reich » , they express a healthy striving for a more factual and objective understanding of the reality of National-Socialist Germany.

Prieberg's « Trial of Strength » concentrates almost entirely on Furtwängler's intricate dealings with Gœbbels, Göring, Hitler and various other figures in the cultural life of the 3rd « Reich » . In so doing, he demonstrates that, in spite of official measures to coordinate the arts, the regime also permitted a surprising degree of artistic freedom. Even the anti-Jewish racial laws and regulations were not always applied with rigour, and exceptions were frequent. (Among many instances that could be cited, Leo Blech retained his conducting post until 1937, in spite of his Jewish ancestry.) Furtwängler exploited this situation to intervene successfully in a number of cases on behalf of artists, including Jews, who were out of favor with the regime. He also championed Paul Hindemith, a modern composer whose music was regarded as degenerate.

The artists and musicians who left the country (especially, the Jewish ones) contended that without them, Germany's cultural life would collapse. High-culture, they and other critics of Adolf Hitler and his regime arrogantly believed, would wither in an ardently nationalist and authoritarian State. As Prieberg notes :

« The musicians who emigrated or were thrown-out of Germany from 1933 onwards indeed felt they were irreplaceable and in, consequence, believed firmly that Hitler's Germany would, following their departure, become a dreary and empty cultural wasteland. This would inevitably cause the rapid collapse of the regime. »

Time would prove the critics wrong. While it is true that the departure of such artists as Fritz Busch and Bruno Walter did hurt initially (and dealt a blow to German prestige) , the nation's most renowned musicians (including Richard Strauß, Carl Orff, Karl Böhm, Hans Pfitzner, Wilhelm Kempff, Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, Herbert von Karajan, Anton von Webern, as well as Furtwängler) remained to produce musical art of the highest standards. Regardless of the emigration of a number of Jewish and a few non Jewish artists, as well as the promulgation of sweeping anti-Jewish restrictions, Germany's cultural life not only continued at a high-level, it flourished.

The National-Socialists regarded art, and especially music, as an expression of a society's soul, character and ideals. A widespread appreciation of Germany's cultural achievements, they believed, encouraged a joyful national pride and fostered a healthy sense of national unity and mission. Because they regarded themselves as guardians of their nation's cultural heritage, they opposed Liberal, modernistic trends in music and the other arts, as degenerate assaults against the cultural spiritual traditions of Germany and the West.

Acting swiftly to promote a broad revival of the nation's cultural life, the new National-Socialist government made prodigious efforts to further the arts and, in particular, music. As detailed in 2 recent studies (Michaël Kater's « The Twisted Muse » and Erik Levi's « Music in the 3rd “ Reich ” ») , not only did the new leadership greatly increase State funding for such important cultural institutions as the Berlin Philharmonic and the Bayreuth Wagner Festival, it used radio, recordings and other means to make Germany's musical heritage as accessible as possible to all its citizens.

As part of its efforts to bring art to the people, it strove to erase Classical music's snobbish and class image, and to make it widely familiar and enjoyable, especially to the working-class. At the same time, the new regime's leaders were mindful of popular musical tastes. Thus, by far most of the music heard during the 3rd « Reich » era, on the radio or in films, was neither Classical nor even traditional. Light music with catchy tunes (similar to those popular with listeners elsewhere in Europe and in the United States) predominated on radio and in motion pictures, especially during the War years.

The person primarily responsible for implementing the new cultural policies was Josef Gœbbels. In his positions as Propaganda Minister and head of the « Reich » Culture Chamber, the umbrella association for professionals in cultural life, he promoted music, literature, painting and film in keeping with German values and traditions while, at the same time, consistent with popular tastes.

Hitler's Attitude

No political leader had a keener interest in art, or was a more enthusiastic booster of his nation's musical heritage than Adolf Hitler, who regarded the compositions of Beethoven, Wagner, Bruckner and the other German Masters as sublime expressions of the Germanic soul.

Hitler's reputation as a bitter, 2nd rate failed artist is undeserved. As John Lukacs acknowledges in his recently published work, « The Hitler of History » (pages 70-72) , the German leader was a man of real artistic talent and considerable artistic discernment.

We, perhaps, can never fully understand Hitler and the spirit behind his political movement without knowing that he drew great inspiration from, and identified with, the heroic figures of European legend who fought to liberate their peoples from tyranny, and whose stories are immortalized in the great musical dramas of Wagner and others.

This was vividly brought out by August Kubizek, Hitler's closest friend as a teenager and young man, in his post-War memoir (published in the United States under the title « The Young Hitler I Knew ») . Kubizek describes how, after the 2 young men together attended for the 1st time a performance in Linz of Wagner's Opera « Rienzi » , Hitler spoke passionately, and at length, about how this work's inspiring story of a popular Roman tribune had so deeply moved him. Years later, after he had become Chancellor, he related to Kubizek how that performance of « Rienzi » had radically changed his life.

« In that hour, it began. » , he confided.

Hitler, of course, recognized Furtwängler's greatness and understood his significance for Germany and German music. Thus, when other officials (including Heinrich Himmler) complained of the conductor's non conformity, Hitler overrode their objections. Until the end, Furtwängler remained his favourite conductor. He was similarly indulgent toward his favourite « Heldentenor » , Max Lorenz, and Wagnerian soprano Frida Leider, each of whom was married to a Jew. Their cultural importance trumped racial or political considerations.

Post-War Humiliations

A year and a half after the end of the War in Europe, Furtwängler was brought before a humiliating denazification tribunal. Staged by American occupation authorities and headed by a Communist, it was a farce. So much vital information was withheld from both the tribunal and the defendant that, Shirakawa suggests, the occupation authorities may well have been determined to get the conductor.

In his closing remarks at the hearing, Furtwängler defiantly defended his record :

« The fear of being misused for propaganda purposes was wiped-out by the greater concern for preserving German music, as far as was possible. I could not leave Germany in her deepest misery. To get-out would have been a shameful flight. After all, I am a German, whatever may be thought of that abroad, and I do not regret having done it for the German people. »

Even with a prejudiced judge and serious gaps in the record, the tribunal was still unable to establish a credible case against the conductor, and he was, in effect, cleared.

A short time later, Furtwängler was invited to assume direction of the Chicago Symphony. (He was no stranger to the United States : in 1927-1929, he had served as visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic.)

On learning of the invitation, America's Jewish cultural establishment launched an intense campaign (spear-headed by «

The New York Times » , musicians Arthur Rubinstein and Vladimir Horowitz, and New York critic Ira Hirschmann) to scuttle Furtwängler's appointment. As described in detail by Shirakawa and writer Daniel Gillis (in « Furtwängler and America ») the campaigners used falsehoods, innuendos and even death threats.

Typical of its emotionally charged rhetoric was the bitter reproach of Chicago Rabbi, Morton Berman :

« Furtwängler preferred to swear fealty to Hitler. He accepted at Hitler's hands his re-appointment as director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He was unflinching in his service to Goebbels' ministry of culture and propaganda. The token saving of a few Jewish lives does not excuse Mister Furtwängler from official, active participation in a regime which murdered 6 million Jews and millions of non Jews. Furtwängler is a symbol of all those hateful things for the defeat of which the youth of our city and nation paid an ineffable price.

Among prominent Jews in Classical music, only the famous violinist Yehudi Menuhin defended the German artist. After Furtwängler was finally obliged to withdraw his name from consideration for the Chicago post, a disillusioned Moshe Menuhin, Yehudi's father, scathingly denounced his co-religionists. Furtwängler, he declared :

« I was a victim of envious and jealous rivals who had to resort to publicity, to smear, to calumny, in order to keep him out of America so it could remain their private bailiwick. He was the victim of the small fry and puny souls among concert artists, who, in order to get a bit of national publicity, joined the band-wagon of professional idealists, the professional Jews and hired hands who irresponsibly assaulted an innocent and humane and broad-minded man. »

A Double Standard

3rd « Reich » Germany is so routinely demonized in our society that any acknowledgment of its cultural achievements is regarded as tantamount to defending Fascism and that most unpardonable of sins, anti-Semitism. But as Professor John London suggests (in an essay in « The Jewish Quarterly » entitled « Why Bother about Fascist Culture ? » , Autumn 1995) , this simplistic attitude can present awkward problems :

« Far from being a totally ugly, unpopular, destructive entity, culture under Fascism was sometimes accomplished, indeed beautiful. If you admit the presence and, in some instances, the richness of a culture produced under fascist regimes, then, you are not defending their ethos. On the other hand, once you start dismissing elements, where do you stop ? »

In this regard, is it worth comparing the way that many media and cultural leaders treat artists of National-Socialist Germany with their treatment of the artists of Soviet Russia. Whereas Furtwängler and other artists, who performed in Germany during the Hitler era, are castigated for their cooperation with the regime, Soviet era musicians, such as composers Aram Khachaturian and Sergei Prokofiev, and conductors Evgeny Svetlanov and Evgeny Mravinsky (all of whom toadied to the Communist regime in varying degrees) are rarely, if ever, chastised for their collaboration. The double standard that is clearly at work here is, of course, a reflection of our society's obligatory concern for Jewish sensitivities.

The artist and his work occupy a unique place in society and history. Although great art can never be entirely divorced from its political or social environment, it must be considered apart from that. In short, art transcends politics.

No reasonable person would denigrate the artists and sculptors of ancient Greece because they glorified a society that, by today's standards, was hardly democratic. Similarly, no one belittles the builders of medieval Europe's great cathedrals on the grounds that the social order of the Middle-Ages was dogmatic and hierarchical. No cultured person would disparage William Shakespeare because he flourished during England's fervently nationalistic and anti-Jewish Elizabethan age. Nor does anyone chastise the magnificent composers of Russia's Tsarist era because they prospered under an autocratic regime. In truth, mankind's greatest cultural achievements have most often been the products not of liberal or egalitarian societies, but rather of quite un-democratic ones.

A close look at the life and career of Wilhelm Furtwängler reveals politically incorrect facts about the role of art and artists in 3rd « Reich » Germany, and reminds us that great artistic creativity and achievement are, by no means, the exclusive products of democratic societies.

A Note on War-time Recordings

Among the most historically fascinating and sought after recordings of Wilhelm Furtwängler performances are his live War-time concerts with the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras. Many were recorded by the « Reich » Broadcasting Company on magnetophonic tape with comparatively good sound quality. « Music & Arts » (Berkeley, California) and « Tahra » (France) have specialized in releasing good quality CD recordings of these performances. Among the most noteworthy are :

Beethoven, 3rd « Eroica » Symphony (1944) : « Tahra » 1031 ; or, « Music & Arts » , CD : 814.

Beethoven, 5th Symphony (1943) : « Tahra » set 1032 / 33, which also includes Furtwängler's performances of this same Symphony, from 1937 and 1954.

Beethoven, 9th Choral Symphony (1942) : « Music & Arts » , CD : 653 ; or, « Tahra » 1004 / 7.

Brahms, 4 Symphonies : « Music & Arts » set CD : 941 (includes 2 x January 1945 performances, Furtwängler's last during the War) .

Bruckner, 5th Symphony (1942) : « Music & Arts » , CD : 538.

Bruckner, 9th Symphony (1944) : « Music & Arts » , CD : 730 (also available in Europe on « Deutsche Gramophon » CD, and in the United States, as an import item) .

Richard Strauß, « Don Juan » (1942) , and the « 4 Last Songs » , with Peter Anders (1942) : « Music & Arts » , CD : 829.

Wagner, « Die Meistersinger » : Act I, Prelude (1943) , and « Tristan und Isolde » : Prelude and « Liebestod » (1942) : « Music & Arts » , CD : 794.

Wagner, « Der Ring des Nibelungen » , excerpts from « Die Walküre » and « Götterdämmerung » : « Music & Arts » set, CD : 1035 (although not from the War years, these 1937 Covent Garden performances are legendary) .

« Great Conductors of the 3rd “ Reich ” : Art in the Service of Evil » is a worthwhile 53 minute VHS video-cassette produced by the « Bel Canto » Society (New York) . Released in 1997, it is distributed by « Allegro » (Portland, Oregon) . It features footage of Furtwängler conducting Beethoven's 9th Symphony for Hitler's birthday celebration, in April 1942. He is also shown conducting at Bayreuth, and leading a concert for wounded soldiers and workers at an AEG factory during the War. Although the notes are highly-tendentious, the rare film footage is fascinating.

...

The German conductor and composer Wilhelm Furtwängler was born on 25 January 1886 and died on 30 November 1954. He is considered to be one of the greatest Symphonic and Operatic conductors of the 20th Century.

Furtwängler was principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic, between 1922 and 1945, and from 1952 until 1954. He was also principal conductor of the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » (1922-1926) , and was a guest-conductor of other major Orchestras including the Vienna Philharmonic.

He was the leading conductor to remain in Germany during the Second World War, although he was not an adherent to the Nazi regime. This decision caused lasting controversy, and the extent to which his presence lent prestige to the 3rd « Reich » is still debated.

Furtwängler's conducting is well-documented in commercial and broadcast recordings and has contributed to his lasting reputation. He had a major influence on many later conductors, and his name is often mentioned when discussing their interpretive styles.

Gustav Heinrich Ernst Martin Wilhelm Furtwängler was born in Schöneberg (now, a locality of Berlin) into a prominent family. His father Adolf was an archaeologist, his mother a painter. Most of his childhood was spent in Munich, where his father taught at the city's Ludwig Maximilian University. He was given a musical education from an early age, and developed an early love of Ludwig van Beethoven, a composer with whose works he remained closely associated throughout his life.

Although Furtwängler achieved fame chiefly from his conducting, he regarded himself foremost as a composer. He began conducting, in order to perform his own works. By the age of 20, he had composed several works. However, they were not well-received, and that, combined with the financial insecurity of a career as a composer, led him to concentrate on conducting. He made his conducting debut with the Kaim Orchestra (now, the Munich Philharmonic) in Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony. He subsequently held conducting posts at Munich, Strasbourg, Lübeck, Mannheim, Frankfurt, and Vienna.

Furtwängler succeeded Artur Bodanzky as principal conductor of the Mannheim Opera and Music Academy, in 1915, remaining until 1920. As a boy, he had sometimes stayed with his grandmother in Mannheim. Through her family, he met the Geissmars, a Jewish family who were leading lawyers and amateur musicians in the town. Berta Geißmar wrote :

« Furtwängler became so good at skiing as to attain almost professional skill. Almost every sport appealed to him : he loved tennis, sailing and swimming. He was a good horseman. »

She also reports that he was a strong mountain climber and hiker.

Berta Geißmar subsequently became his secretary and business manager, in Mannheim and later in Berlin, until she was forced to leave Germany in 1934. From 1921 onwards, Furtwängler shared holidays in the Engadin with Berta and her mother. In 1924, he bought a house there. After he married, the house was open to a wide circle of friends.

In 1920, he was appointed conductor of the « Berlin Staatskapelle » succeeding Richard Strauß. In January 1922, following the sudden death of Arthur Nikisch, he was appointed to the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » . Shortly afterwards, he was appointed to the prestigious Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, again in succession to Nikisch. Furtwängler made his London debut, in 1924, and continued to appear there as late as 1938, when he conducted Richard Wagner's « Ring » . In 1925, he appeared as guest-conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, making return visits in the following 2 years.

In January 1945, Furtwängler fled to Switzerland. It was during this period that he completed what is considered his most significant composition, the Symphony No. 2 in E minor. It was given its premiere, in 1948, by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Furtwängler's direction and was recorded for « Deutsche Grammophon » .

Following the War, he resumed performing and recording, and remained a popular conductor in Europe, although his actions in the 1930's and 1940's were a subject of ongoing criticism. He died in 1954, in Ebersteinburg, close to Baden-Baden. He is buried in the Heidelberg « Bergfriedhof » .

Furtwängler's relationship with and attitudes towards Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party were a matter of much controversy.

Furtwängler was very critical of Hitler's appointment as Chancellor of Germany, and was convinced that Hitler would not stay in power for long. He had said of Hitler, in 1932 :

« This hissing street pedlar will never get anywhere in Germany. »

As the anti-Semitic policies of the 3rd « Reich » took effect, Jewish musicians were forced-out of work and began to leave Germany. The Nazis were aware that Furtwängler was opposed to the policies and might also decide to go abroad, so the Berlin Philharmonic, which employed many Jews, was exempted from the policies. In 1933, when Bruno Walter was dismissed from his position as principal conductor of the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » , the Nazis asked Furtwängler to replace him for an international tour. Their goal was to show to the world that Germany did not need Jewish musicians. Furtwängler refused, and it was Richard Strauß who replaced Walter.

On April 10, 1933, Furtwängler wrote a public letter to Goebbels to denounce the new rulers' anti-Semitism :

« Ultimately, there is only one dividing line I recognize : that between good and bad art. However, while the dividing line between Jews and non-Jews is being drawn with a downright merciless theoretical precision, that other dividing line, the one which in the long run is so important for our music life, yes, the decisive dividing line between good and bad, seems to have far too little significance attributed to it. If concerts offer nothing, then, people will not attend ; that is why the QUALITY is not just an idea : it is of vital importance. If the fight against Judaism concentrates on those artists who are themselves rootless and destructive and who seek to succeed in kitsch, sterile virtuosity and the like, then it is quite acceptable ; the fight against these people and the attitude they embody (as, unfortunately, do many non-Jews) cannot be pursued thoroughly or systematically enough. If, however, this campaign is also directed at truly great artists, then it ceases to be in the interests of Germany's cultural life. It must, therefore, be stated that men such as Walter, Klemperer, Reinhardt, etc. must be allowed to exercise their talents in Germany, in the future as well, in exactly the same way as Kreisler, Huberman, Schnabel and other great instrumentalists of the Jewish race. It is only just that, we, Germans should bear in mind that, in the past, we had Joseph Joachim, one of the greatest violinists and teachers in the German Classical tradition and, in Mendelssohn, even a great German composer - for Mendelssohn is a part of Germany's musical history. »

In June 1933, for a text which was to be the basis for a discussion with Goebbels, Furtwängler went further, writing :

« The Jewish question in musical spheres : a race of brilliant people ! »

He threatened that if boycotts against Jews were extended to artistic activities, he would resign all his posts immediately, concluding that :

« At any rate, to continue giving concerts would be quite impossible without the Jews. To remove them would be an operation which would result in the death of the patient. »

Because of his high-profile, Furtwängler's public opposition prompted a mixed reaction from the Nazi leadership. Heinrich Himmler wished to send Furtwängler to a concentration camp. Goebbels and Göring ordered their administration to listen to Furtwängler's requests and to give him the impression that they would do what he asked. This led him to believe that he had some positive influence to stop the racial policy. He subsequently invited several Jewish and anti-Fascist artists (such as Yehudi Menuhin, Artur Schnabel, and Pablo Casals) to perform, as soloists, in his 1933-1934 season, but they refused to come to Nazi Germany. Furtwängler subsequently invited Jewish musicians from his Orchestra such as Szymon Goldberg to play as soloists.

The « Gestapo » built a case against Furtwängler, noting that he was providing assistance to Jews. Furtwängler gave all his fees to German emigrants during his concerts outside Germany. The German literary scholar Hans Mayer was one of these emigrants. Mayer later observed that, for performances of Wagner Operas in Paris, prior to the War, Furtwängler cast only German emigrants (Jews or political opponents to the 3rd « Reich ») to sing. Georg Gerullis, a director at the Ministry of Culture, remarked in a letter to Goebbels :

« Can you name me a Jew on whose behalf Furtwängler has not intervened ? »

Furtwängler never joined the Nazi Party. He refused to give the Nazi salute, to conduct the « Horst-Wessel-Lied » , or to sign his letters with « Heil Hitler » , even those he wrote to Hitler. However, Furtwängler was appointed as the first vice-President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » and « Staatsrat » of Prussia, and accepted these honorary positions to try to bend the racial policy of Nazis in music and to support Jewish musicians. For concerts in London and Paris before the War, Furtwängler refused to conduct the Nazi anthems or to play music in halls adorned with swastikas. During the Universal Exposition held in Paris, in 1937, a picture of the German delegation was taken in front of the « Arc de Triomphe » . In the picture, Furtwängler is the only German not giving the Nazi salute. This picture was suppressed at the time.

In 1933, Furtwängler met with Hitler to try to stop the new anti-Semitic policy in the domain of music. He had prepared a list of significant Jewish musicians : these included the composer Arnold Schönberg, the musicologist Curt Sachs, the violinist Carl Flesch, and Jewish members of the Berlin Philharmonic. Hitler did not listen to Furtwängler, who lost patience, and the meeting became a shouting match. Berta Geißmar wrote :

« After the audience, he told me that he knew now what was behind Hitler's narrow-minded measures. This is not only anti-Semitism, but the rejection of any form of artistic, philosophical thought, the rejection of any form of free culture. »

On April 26, 1933, Furtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic performed a joint concert in Mannheim with the local Orchestra to mark the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death and to raise money for the Mannheim Orchestra. The concert had been organized before the Nazis came to power. The Nazified Mannheim Orchestra Committee demanded that the Jewish leader of the Berlin Orchestra, Szymon Goldberg, give way to the leader of the Mannheim Orchestra for the evening. Furtwängler refused, and the concert took place as planned. Before the banquet organized for the evening, members of the Mannheim Orchestra Committee came to remonstrate with Furtwängler, accusing him of « a lack of national sentiment » . Furtwängler furiously left before the banquet to rejoin Berta Geißmar and her mother. The fact that Furtwängler had preferred to spend the evening with his « Jewish friends » rather than with Nazi authorities caused a controversy. He subsequently refused to conduct again in Mannheim, only returning 21 years later, in 1954.

In 1934, Furtwängler publicly described Hitler as an « enemy of the human race » and the political situation in Germany as a « Schweinerei » (pigsty) .

On November 25, 1934, he wrote a letter in the « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung », entitled « Der Fall Hindemith » (The Hindemith Case) , in support of the composer Paul Hindemith. Hindemith had been labelled a degenerate artist by the Nazis. Furtwängler also conducted a piece of Hindemith's, « Mathis der Maler » although the work had been banned by the Nazis. The concert received enormous acclaim and unleashed a political storm. The Nazis (especially, Alfred Rosenberg, the Nazi Party's chief racial theorist) formed a violent conspiracy against the conductor, who resigned from his official positions, including his titles as vice-President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » and of « Staatsrat » of Prussia. His resignation from the latter position was refused by Hermann Göring. He was also forced by Josef Goebbels to give-up all his artistic positions.

Furtwängler decided to leave Germany, but the Nazis prevented him. They seized the opportunity to « aryanize » the Orchestra and its administrative staff. Most of the Jewish musicians of the Orchestra had already left the country and found positions outside Germany, with Furtwängler's assistance.

The main target of the Nazis was Berta Geißmar. She was so close to the conductor that she wrote in her book about Furtwängler that the Nazis had begun an investigation to know if she was his mistress. After having harassed her for a period of 2 years, she moved to London when she became Sir Thomas Beecham's main assistant. In the book, she wrote on Furtwängler in England, in 1943, she said :

« Furtwängler, although he had decided to remain in Germany, was certainly no Nazi. He had a private telephone line to me which was not connected via the exchange. Before going to bed, he used to chat with me over telephone. Sometimes, I told him amusing stories to cheer him up, sometimes we talked about politics. One of the main threats the Nazis used against Furtwängler, and myself later on, was the assertion that they had recorded all these conversations. I should not have thought that it was possible ! Was there enough shellac ? If the Nazis really did this, their ears must certainly have burnt, and it was not surprising that Furtwängler was eventually put on their black-list, let alone myself.

Goebbels refused to meet Furtwängler to clarify his situation for several months. During the same period, many members of the Orchestra and of his public were begging him not to emigrate and desert them. In addition, Goebbels sent him a clear signal that if he left Germany he would never be allowed back, frightening him with the prospect of permanent separation from his mother (to whom he was very close) and his children. Furtwängler considered himself responsible for the Berlin Philharmonic and for his family, and decided to stay.

On February 28, 1935, Furtwängler met Goebbels, who wanted to keep Furtwängler in Germany, since he considered him, like Richard Strauß and Hans Pfitzner, a « national treasure » . Goebbels asked him to pledge allegiance publicly to the new regime. Furtwängler refused. Goebbels then proposed that Furtwängler acknowledge publicly that Hitler was in charge of cultural policy. Furtwängler accepted : Hitler was a dictator and controlled everything in the country. But he added that it must be clear that he wanted nothing to do with the policy and that he would remain as a non-political artist, without any official position. The agreement was reached. Goebbels made an announcement declaring that Furtwängler's article on Hindemith was not political : Furtwängler had spoken only from an artistic point of view, and it was Hitler who was in charge of the cultural policy in Germany.

Goebbels did not reveal the 2nd part of the deal. However, the agreement between was largely respected. At his subsequent denazification trial, Furtwängler was charged with conducting only 2 official concerts for the period 1933-1945. Furtwängler appeared in only 2 short propaganda films.

Other Nazi leaders were not satisfied with the compromise, since they believed that Furtwängler had not capitulated : Rosenberg demanded, in vain, that Furtwängler apologise to the regime. Goebbels, who wanted to keep Furtwängler in Germany, wrote in his diary that he was satisfied with the deal and laughed at « the incredible naïvety of artists » .

Hitler now allowed him to have a new passport. When they met again, in April, Hitler attacked Furtwängler for his support of modern music, and made him withdraw from regular conducting for the time being, save for his scheduled appearance at Bayreuth. However, Hitler confirmed that Furtwängler would not be given any official titles, and would be treated as a private individual. But Hitler refused Furtwängler's request to announce this, saying that it would be harmful for the « prestige of the State » .

Furtwängler resumed conducting. On April 25, 1935, he returned to the Berlin Philharmonic with a program dedicated to Beethoven. The concert was a huge success, since a large part of the public had boycotted the Orchestra during his absence. He was called out 17 times. On May 3, in his dressing-room before conducting the same program, he was informed that Hitler and his entire staff would attend the concert. He was given the order to welcome Hitler with the Nazi salute. Furtwängler was so furious that he ripped the wooden panelling off a radiator. Franz Jastrau, the manager of the Orchestra, suggested that he keep his baton in his right-hand all the time. When he entered the hall, all the Nazi leaders were present making the Hitler salute, but Furtwängler kept hold of his baton and began the concert immediately. Hitler probably could not have imagined that such an affront was possible but decided to put-up a good show : he sat down and the concert went on.

At the end of the concert, Furtwängler continued to keep his baton in his right-hand. Hitler understood the situation and jumped-up and demonstratively held-out his right-hand to him. The same situation occurred during another concert, later on, when a photographer had been mobilized by the Nazis for the occasion : the photo of the famous hand-shake between Furtwängler and Hitler was distributed everywhere by Goebbels. Goebbels had obtained what he desired : to keep Furtwängler in Germany and to give the impression to those who were not well-informed (especially, outside the country) that Furtwängler was now a supporter of the regime.

Furtwängler wrote in his diary, in 1935, that there was a complete contradiction between the racial ideology of the Nazis and the true German culture, the one of Schiller, Goethe and Beethoven. He added in 1936 :

« Living today is more than ever a question of courage. »

On September 1935, the baritone Oskar Jölli, a member of the Nazi Party, reported to the « Gestapo » that Furtwängler had said :

« Those in power should all be shot, and things in Germany would not change until this was done. »

Hitler forbade him to conduct for several months, until Furtwängler's 50th birthday, in January 1936. Hitler and Goebbels allowed him to conduct again and offered him presents : Hitler, an annual pension of 40,000 « Reichsmarks » ; and Goebbels, an ornate baton made of gold and ivory. Furtwängler refused them.

Furtwängler was offered the principal conductor's post at the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, which was then the most desirable and best paid position in international musical life. He was to have followed Arturo Toscanini, who had declared that Furtwängler was the only man to succeed him. Furtwängler accepted the post, but his telephone conversations were recorded by the « Gestapo » .

While Furtwängler was travelling, the Berlin branch of the Associated Press leaked a news story on Hermann Göring's orders. It suggested Furtwängler would probably be re-appointed as director of the Berlin State Opera and of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. This caused the mood in New York to turn against him : it seemed that Furtwängler was now a supporter of the Nazi Party. On reading the American press reaction, Furtwängler chose not to accept the position in New York. Nor did he accept any position at the Berlin Opera.

Furtwängler conducted at the Bayreuth Festival, in 1936, for the 1st time since 1931, in spite of his poor relationship with Winifred Wagner. Hitler and Goebbels attended the Festival and attempted to force him to accept an official position. Friedelind Wagner, the composer's anti-Nazi granddaughter, witnessed a meeting between Hitler and Furtwängler at her mother's Bayreuth home :

« I remember Hitler turning to Furtwängler and telling him that he would now have to allow himself to be used by the Party for propaganda purposes, and I remember that Furtwängler refused categorically. Hitler flew into a fury and told Furtwängler that, in that case, there would be a concentration camp ready for him. Furtwängler quietly replied :“ In that case, ' Herr Reichschancellor ' , at least, I will be in very good company. ” » Hitler couldn't even answer, and vanished from the room.

Furtwängler avoided the 1936 Summer Olympics in Berlin, and cancelled all his public engagements during the following winter season, in order to compose. He returned to the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1937, performing with them in London for the coronation of George VI and, in Paris, for the Universal Exposition, where he, again, refused to conduct the « Horst-Wessel-Lied » , or to attend the political speeches of German officials.

The Salzburg Festival was considered to be a Festival of the « free world » and a centre for anti-Fascist artists. Hitler had forbidden all German musicians from performing there. In 1937, Furtwängler was asked to conduct Beethoven's 9th Symphony, in Salzburg. Despite strong opposition from Hitler and Goebbels, he accepted the invitation.

Arturo Toscanini, a prominent anti-Fascist, was furious to learn that Furtwängler would be at the Festival. He accepted his engagement in Salzburg, on the condition that he would not have to meet Furtwängler. But the 2 did meet, and argued over Furtwängler's actions. Toscanini argued :

« I know quite well that you are not a member of the Party. I am also aware that you have helped your Jewish friends. But everyone who conducts in the 3rd " Reich " is a Nazi ! »

Furtwängler emphatically denied this and said :

« By that, you imply that art and music are merely propaganda, a false front, as it were, for any Government which happens to be in power. If a Nazi Government is in power, then, as a conductor, I am a Nazi ; under the communists, I would be a Communist ; under the democrats, a Democrat. No, a thousand times no ! Music belongs to a different world, and is above chance political events. »

Toscanini disagreed and that ended the discussion.

Furtwängler returned to the Bayreuth Festival, his relationship with Winifred Wagner worse than ever. He did not appear again in Bayreuth, until 1943. He wrote a letter to Winifred Wagner, sending copies to Hitler, Göring and Goebbels, accusing her of having betrayed Wagner's heritage by applying racial and not artistic rules in the choice of the artists, and of putting her « trust in the powers of an authoritarian State » . This clear attack on Hitler caused a sharp reaction : Hitler wanted to drop Furtwängler from Bayreuth after all. In the event, Furtwängler did conduct. Goebbels wrote in 2 entries of his diary, in 1937, that Furtwängler was constantly helping Jews, « half-Jews » and « his small Hindemith » .

According to the historian Fred K. Prieberg, by the end of 1937, nobody who was correctly informed could accuse Furtwängler of working for the Nazis. For the Nazi leadership, especially for Hitler, it became necessary to prove to him that he was not irreplaceable.

The Nazi leaders searched for another conductor to counter-balance Furtwängler. A young, gifted Austrian conductor now appeared in the 3rd « Reich » : Herbert von Karajan. Karajan had joined the Nazi Party early and was much more willing to participate in the propaganda of the new regime than Furtwängler.

Furtwängler had attended several of his concerts, praising his technical gifts but criticizing his conducting style ; he did not consider him a serious competitor. However, when Karajan conducted « Fidelio » and « Tristan und Isolde » in Berlin on the 30th. In late 1938, Göring decided to take the initiative. The music-critic Edwin von der Nüll wrote a review of these concerts with the support of Göring. Its title, « The Karajan Miracle » , was a reference to the famous article « The Furtwängler Miracle » that had made Furtwängler famous as a young conductor in Mannheim. Von der Nüll championed Karajan saying :

« A 30 year old man creates a performance for which our great 50 year olds can justifiably envy him. »

(Furtwängler's photo was printed next to the article, making the reference clear.)

The article was part of a broader attack made against Furtwängler. The Nazi press criticized him of being « a man of the 19th Century » whose political ideas were obsolete and who did not understand and accept the new changes in Germany. The situation became intolerable for Furtwängler. He obtained from Goebbels an undertaking that this bashing would be stopped.

However, Furtwängler's position was weakened : he knew that, if he left Germany, Karajan would immediately become the conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic. It was the beginning of an obsessive hate and contempt for Karajan that never left him until his death. He often refused to call Karajan by his name, calling him simply « Herr K » . Hitler's opinion was that, even if Furtwängler was infinitely better than Karajan as a conductor, it was necessary to keep Karajan « in reserve » since Furtwängler was « not politically trustworthy » .

Furtwängler was very affected by the events of the « Kristallnacht » . Berta Geißmar, who met him in Paris, described him as « greatly depressed » . Friedelind Wagner, who saw him also in Paris, wrote that he was a « very unhappy man » . Andrew Schulhof, who met him in Budapest, said that :

« He had the impression that what he had done before for his Jewish friends had been lost. »

Furtwängler approved of the « Anschluß » that had occurred on 12 March 1938. But he quickly disagreed with the Nazi leaders' decision to « annex Austrian culture » by abolishing independent cultural activity in Austria and subordinating it to Berlin. Just after the « Anschluß » , Furtwängler discovered that a huge Swastika flag was displayed in the hall of the « Musikverein » . He refused to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic « as long as the rag is visible » . The flag was finally removed.

Goebbels wanted to eliminate the Vienna Philharmonic and to convert the Vienna Opera and the Salzburg Festival into branches of the Berlin Opera and the Bayreuth Festival, respectively. In addition, he wished to confiscate the largest musical collection in the world, belonging to the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , in Vienna, and to move it to Berlin. Hitler's goal was to deny that Austria had developed its own culture independently of Germany. Austrian musical circles asked Furtwängler, who was the honorary president of the Vienna « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , to help them.

Furtwängler campaigned to convince Nazi leaders to abandon their plans. According to historian Fred K. Prieberg, he conducted concerts (often with the Vienna Philharmonic) in the presence of German leaders during this period, in exchange for the conservation of the Orchestra. He organized several concerts of Austrian music, in Berlin and Vienna, for Hitler, to highlight Austrian culture. The Nazi leadership, who wanted to take advantage of this situation, invited Furtwängler, in 1938, to conduct « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » with the Vienna Philharmonic, in Nürnberg, for the Nazi Party congress. Furtwängler accepted to conduct, as long as the performance was not during the Party congress. Hitler eventually accepted Furtwängler's conditions : the concert took place on 5 September and the political event was formally opened the following morning. This concert, along with one given in Berlin, in 1942, for Hitler's birthday, led to heavy criticism of Furtwängler after the War. However, Furtwängler had managed not to participate in the Party congress. He had also succeeded in conserving the Vienna Philharmonic, and the musical collections of Vienna and the Vienna Opera, where he persuaded Hitler and Goebbels to agree to the appointment of Karl Böhm as artistic director. At the Vienna Philharmonic, as at the Berlin Philharmonic, Furtwängler succeeded in protecting « half-Jews » or members with « non-Aryan » wives until the end of the War (these were exceptional cases in Germany, during the Nazi period) . However, in contrast to his experience with the Berlin Philharmonic, he could not save the lives of « full-blooded » Jews : they were persecuted, with a number dying in concentration camps.

Goebbels was satisfied that Furtwängler had conducted the concerts in Vienna, Prague and Nürnberg, thinking that these concerts gave a « cultural » justification to the annexation of Austria and Czechoslovakia. During this period, he said that Furtwängler was « willing to place himself at my disposal for any of my activities » , describing him as « an out-and-out chauvinist » . However, he regularly complained that Furtwängler was helping Jews and « half-Jews » , and his complaints continued during the War. Goebbels wrote in his diary that Furtwängler's goal was to by-pass Nazi cultural policy. For instance, Goebbels wrote that Furtwängler supported the Salzburg Festival to counter-balance the Bayreuth Festival, a keystone of the Nazi regime.

Furtwängler was very affected by the events of the 1930's. Fred K. Prieberg describes Furtwängler, in 1939, as a « broken man » . The French government awarded him the Legion of Honour, in 1939, which may support the theory that western diplomatic services knew Furtwängler was not a supporter of the Nazi regime. Hitler forbade news of the award to be spread in Germany.

During the War, Furtwängler tried to avoid conducting in occupied Europe. He said :

« I will never play in a country such as France, which I am so much attached to, considering myself a “ vanquisher ”. I will conduct there, again, only when the country has been liberated. »

He refused to go to France during its occupation, although the Nazis tried to force him to conduct there. Since he had said that he would conduct there, only at the invitation of the French, Goebbels forced the French conductor Charles Munch to send him a personal invitation. But Munch wrote, in small characters, at the bottom of his letter : « in agreement with the German occupation authorities » . Furtwängler declined the invitation.

Furtwängler did conduct in Prague, in November 1940 and March 1944. The 1940 program, chosen by Furtwängler, included Smetana's « Moldau » . According to Prieberg :

« This piece is part of the cycle in which the Czech Master celebrated “ Má vlast ” (My Country) , and was intended to support his compatriots' fight for the independence from Austrian domination. When Furtwängler began with the “ Moldau ” , it was not a deliberate risk, but a statement of his stance towards the oppressed Czechs. »

The 1944 concert marked the 5th anniversary of the German occupation and was the result of a deal between Furtwängler and Gœbbels : Furtwängler did not want to perform, in April, for Hitler's birthday in Berlin. He said to Gœbbels, in March (as he had in April 1943) , that he was sick. Gœbbels asked him to perform in Prague instead, where he conducted the Symphony No. 9 of Antonín Dvořák. He conducted in Oslo, in 1943, where he helped the Jewish conductor Issay Dobrowen to flee to Sweden.

Furtwängler conducted in Denmark and in unoccupied countries such as Sweden and Switzerland. His concerts were often broadcast to German troops to raise morale, though he was limited in what he was allowed to perform. He later said that he had tried to protect German culture from the Nazis. It is now known that he continued to use his influence to help Jewish musicians and non-musicians escape the 3rd « Reich » . He managed to have Max Zweig, a nephew of conductor Fritz Zweig, released from Dachau concentration camp. Others, from an extensive list of Jews he helped, included Carl Flesch, Josef Krips and the composer Arnold Schönberg.

Furtwängler refused to participate in the propaganda film « Philharmoniker » . Gœbbels wanted Furtwängler as to feature in it, but Furtwängler declined to take part. The film was finished in December 1943 showing many conductors connected with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, including Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm, Hans Knappertsbusch, and Richard Strauß, but not Furtwängler. Gœbbels also asked Furtwängler to direct the music in a film about Beethoven, again for propaganda purposes. They quarrelled violently about this project. Furtwängler told him :

« You are wrong, Herr Minister, if you think you can exploit Beethoven in a film. »

Gœbbels gave-up his plans for the film.

In April 1944, Gœbbels wrote :

« Furtwängler has never been a National-Socialist. Nor has he ever made any bones about it. Which Jews and emigrants thought was sufficient to consider him as one of them, a key representative of so-called “ inner emigration ”. Furtwängler stance towards us has not changed in the least. »

Friedelind Wagner (an outspoken opponent of the 3rd « Reich ») reported a conversation with her mother Winifred Wagner during the War, to the effect that Hitler did not trust or like Furtwängler, and that Göring and Gœbbels were upset with Furtwängler's continuous support for his « undesirable friends » . Yet, Hitler, in gratitude for Furtwängler's refusal to leave Berlin even when it was being bombed, ordered Albert Speer to build a special air raid shelter for the conductor and his family. Furtwängler refused it, but the shelter was nevertheless built in the house against his will. Speer related that, in December 1944, Furtwängler asked whether Germany had any chance of winning the War. Speer replied in the negative, and advised him to flee to Switzerland from possible Nazi retribution. In 1944, he was the only prominent German artist who refused to sign the brochure « We Stand and Fall with Adolf Hitler » .

Furtwängler's name was included on the « Gottbegnadeten » list (God-gifted List) of September 1944, but was removed on December 7, 1944, because of his relationships with German Resistance. Furtwängler had strong links to the German resistance which organized the 20th « July Plot » . He stated during his denazification trial that he knew an attack was being organized against Hitler, although he did not participate in its organization. He knew Klaus von Stauffenberg very-well and his doctor, Johannes Ludwig Schmitt, who wrote him many false health prescriptions to by-pass official requirements, was a member of the « Kreisau Circle » . Furtwängler's concerts were sometimes chosen by the members of the German resistance as a meeting point. Rudolf Pechel, a member of the Resistance group which organized the 20th « July Plot » said to Furtwängler, after the War :

« In the Circle of our Resistance movement, it was an accepted fact that you were the only one in the whole of our musical world who really resisted, and you were one of us. »

Graf Kaunitz, also a member of that Circle, stated :

« In Furtwängler's concerts, we were one big family of the Resistance. »

« Grove Online » states that Furtwängler was « within a few hours of being arrested » by the « Gestapo » when he fled to Switzerland, following a concert in Vienna with the Vienna Philharmonic on January 28, 1945. The Nazis had begun to crack-down on German Liberals. At the concert, he conducted Brahms's 2nd Symphony, which was recorded and is considered one of his greatest performances.

Furtwängler was required to submit to a process of denazification. He was charged with having conducted 2 Nazi concerts during the period 1933-1945. The 1st was for the « Hitler Youth » , on 3 February 1938. It was presented to Furtwängler as a way to acquaint younger generations with Classical music. According to Fred K. Prieberg :

« When he looked at the audience, he realized that this was more than just a concert for school kids in uniform ; a whole collection of prominent political figures were sitting there, as well, and it was the last time he raised his baton for this purpose. »

The 2nd concert was the performance of Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » with the Vienna Philharmonic, on 5 September 1938, on the evening before the Nazi Congress, in Nüremberg. Furtwängler had agreed to conduct this concert to help preserve the Vienna Philharmonic and, at his insistence, the concert was not part of the Congress.

He was charged for his honorary title of « Staatsrat » of Prussia (he had resigned from this title, in 1934, but the Nazis had refused his resignation) and with making an anti-Semitic remark against the part-Jewish conductor Victor de Sabata. The chair of the Commission, Alex Vogel, started the trial with the following statement :

« The investigations showed that Furtwängler had not been a member of any Nazi organization, that he tried to help people persecuted because of their race, and that he also avoided formalities such as giving the Hitler salute. »

At the end of the trial, musicians certified that Furtwängler helped many people during Nazi era such as Hugo Strelitzer, who declared :

« If I am alive today, I owe this to this great man. Furtwängler helped and protected a great number of Jewish musicians and this attitude shows a great deal of courage since he did it under the eyes of the Nazis, in Germany itself. History will be his judge. »

As part of his closing remarks at his denazification trial, Furtwängler said :

« I knew Germany was in a terrible crisis ; I felt responsible for German music, and it was my task to survive this crisis, as much as I could. The concern that my art was misused for propaganda had to yield to the greater concern that German music be preserved, that music be given to the German people by its own musicians. These people, the compatriots of Bach and Beethoven, of Mozart and Schubert, still had to go on living under the control of a regime obsessed with Total War. No one who did not live here himself, in those days, can possibly judge what it was like. Does Thomas Mann (who was critical of Furtwängler's actions) really believe that in “ the Germany of Himmler ” one should not be permitted to play Beethoven ? Could he not realize that people never needed more, never yearned more to hear Beethoven and his message of freedom and human love, than precisely these Germans, who had to live under Himmler's terror ? I do not regret having stayed with them. »

He was eventually cleared on all the counts.

The violinist Yehudi Menuhin was, with Arnold Schönberg, Bronisław Huberman and Nathan Milstein, among the Jewish musicians who had a positive view of Furtwängler. In 1933, Menuhin had refused to play with him, but in the late-1940's, after a personal investigation of Furtwängler, he changed his opinion, and performed and recorded alongside him.

Yehudi Menuhin sent a wire to General Robert A. McClure, in February 1946 :

« Unless you have secret incriminating evidence against Furtwängler supporting your accusation that he was a tool of Nazi Party, I beg to take violent issue with your decision to ban him. The man never was a Party member. Upon numerous occasions, he risked his own safety and reputation to protect friends and colleagues. Do not believe that the fact of remaining in one's own country is alone sufficient to condemn a man. On the contrary, as a military man, you would know that remaining at one's post often requires greater courage than running away. He saved, and for that we are deeply his debtors, the best part of his own German culture. I believe it patently unjust and most cowardly for us to make of Furtwängler a scapegoat for our own crimes. If the man is guilty of specific crimes, accuse him and convict him. As far as I can see, it is no punishment to be banned from sordid, filthy Berlin and if the man now old and ill is willing and anxious to return to his exacting task and responsibilities, he should be encouraged for that is where he belongs, right in Berlin. »

In 1949, Furtwängler accepted the position of principal conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. However, the Orchestra was forced to rescind the offer under the threat of a boycott from several prominent musicians including Arturo Toscanini, George Szell, Vladimir Horowitz, Arthur Rubinstein, Isaac Stern and Alexander Brailowsky. According to a « New York Times » report, Horowitz said that he « was prepared to forgive the small fry who had no alternative but to remain and work in Germany » . But Furtwängler « was out of the country on several occasions and could have elected to keep-out » . Rubinstein, likewise, wrote in a telegram :

« Had Furtwängler been firm in his democratic convictions, he would have left Germany. »

Yehudi Menuhin was upset with this boycott, declaring that some of the main organizers had admitted to him that they had organized it only to eliminate Furtwängler's presence in North America.

British playwright Ronald Harwood's play « Taking Sides » (1995) , set in 1946 in the American zone of occupied Berlin, is about U.S. accusations against Furtwängler of having served the Nazi regime. In 2001, the play was made into a motion picture directed by István Szabó and starring Harvey Keitel and featuring Stellan Skarsgård, in the role of Furtwängler.

Furtwängler is most famous for his performances of Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner, and Wagner. He was a champion of modern music, notably the works of Paul Hindemith and Arnold Schönberg, and conducted the world-premiere of Sergei Prokofiev's 5th Piano Concerto (with the composer at the piano) on October 31, 1932, as well as performances of Béla Bartók's « Concerto for Orchestra » .

Furtwängler had a unique philosophy of music. He saw Symphonic music as creations of nature that could only be realized subjectively into sound. Composers such as Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner were central to Furtwängler's repertoire, and he identified them as great forces of nature.

Neville Cardus wrote in the « Manchester Guardian » , in 1954, of Furtwängler's conducting style :

He did not regard the printed notes of the score as a final statement, but rather as so many symbols of an imaginative conception, ever changing and always to be felt and realized subjectively. Not since Nikisch, of whom he was a disciple, has a greater personal interpreter of orchestral and Opera music than Furtwängler been heard. »

And the conductor Henry Lewis :

« I admire Furtwängler for his originality and honesty. He liberated himself from slavery to the score ; he realized that notes printed in the score, are nothing but SYMBOLS. The score is neither the essence nor the spirit of the music. Furtwängler had this very rare and great gift of going beyond the printed score and showing what music really was. »

Many commentators and critics regard him as the greatest conductor in history. In his book on the Symphonies of Johannes Brahms, musicologist Walter Frisch writes that Furtwängler's recordings show him to be « the finest Brahms conductor of his generation, perhaps of all time » , demonstrating « at once, a greater attention to detail and to Brahms' markings than his contemporaries and, at the same time, a larger sense of rhythmic-temporal flow that is never deflected by the individual nuances. He has an ability not only to respect, but to make musical sense of, dynamic markings and the indications of crescendo and diminuendo. What comes through amply is the rare combination of a conductor who understands both sound and structure. » He notes Vladimir Ashkenazy who says that his sound « is never rough. It's very weighty but, at the same time, is never heavy. In his fortissimo, you always feel every voice. I have never heard so beautiful a fortissimo in an Orchestra » , and Daniel Barenboim says he « had a subtlety of tone color that was extremely rare. His sound was always “ rounded ”, and incomparably more interesting than that of the great German conductors of his generation. »

On the other hand, the critic David Hurwitz, a spokesman for modern literalism and precision, sharply criticizes what he terms « the Furtwängler wackos » who « will forgive him virtually any lapse, no matter how severe » , and characterizes the conductor himself as « occasionally incandescent but criminally sloppy » .

Unlike conductors such as Carlos Kleiber or Sergiù Celibidache, Furtwängler did not try to reach the perfection in details, and the number of rehearsals with him was small. He said :

« I am told that the more you rehearse, the better you play. This is wrong. We often try to reduce the unforeseen to a controllable level, to prevent a sudden impulse that escapes our ability to control, yet, also responds to an obscure desire. Let's allow improvisation to have its place and play its role. I think that the true interpreter is the one who improvises. We have mechanized the art of conducting to an awful degree, in the quest of perfection rather than of dream. As soon as rubato is obtained and calculated scientifically, it ceases to be true. Music-making is something else than searching to achieve an accomplishment. But striving to attain it is beautiful. Some of Michelangelo's sculptures are perfect, others are just outlined and the latter ones move me more than the 1st perfect ones because, here, I find the essence of desire, of the wakening dream. That's what really moves me : fixing without freezing in cement, allowing chance its opportunity. »

His style is often contrasted with that of his contemporary Arturo Toscanini. Instead of perfection in details, Furtwängler was looking for the spiritual in art. Sergiù Celibidache explained :

« Everybody was influenced at the time by Arturo Toscanini - it was easy to understand what he was trying to do : you didn't need any reference to spiritual dimension. There was a certain order in the way the music was presented. With Toscanini, I never felt anything spiritual. With Furtwängler, on the other hand, I understood that, there, I was confronted by something completely different : metaphysics, transcendence, the relationship between sounds and sonorities. Furtwängler was not only a musician, he was a creator. What happens to those who don't understand the manifold variety of musical performance ? Who are unable to hear that famous astral octave because they are deaf to music ? Then, their integration is related only to a part of a musical score, to the least important one, the raw material. But that's precisely what music is not about. Then, you find each tempo too slow. Because the slowness or fastness are determined by the complexity of these musical manifestations. Furtwängler had the ear for it : not the physical ear, but the spiritual ear that captures these parallel movements. »

Conductor and pianist Christoph Eschenbach has said of Furtwängler that he was a « formidable magician, a man capable of setting an entire ensemble of musicians on fire, sending them into a state of ecstasy. »

Furtwängler was famous for his exceptional inarticulacy when speaking about music. His pupil Sergiù Celibidache remembered that the best he could say was, « Well, just listen. ». Carl Brinitzer from the German « BBC » service tried to interview him, and thought he had an imbecile before him. A live recording of a rehearsal with a Stockholm Orchestra documents hardly anything intelligible, only hums and mumbling. On the other hand, a collection of his essays, « On Music », reveals deep thought. Furtwängler remained highly-respected amongst musicians. Even Arturo Toscanini, usually regarded as Furtwängler's complete antithesis (and sharply critical of Furtwängler on political grounds), once said, when asked to name the World's greatest conductor apart from himself : « Furtwängler ! » .

Furtwängler's art of conducting is considered as the synthesis and the peak of the so-called « Germanic school of conducting ». This « school » was initiated by Richard Wagner. Unlike Mendelssohn's conducting style, which was « characterized by quick, even tempos and imbued with what many people regarded as model logic and precision, Wagner's way was broad, hyper-Romantic and embraced the idea of tempo modulation ». Wagner considered an interpretation as a re-creation and put more emphasis on the phrase than on the measure. The fact that the tempo was changing was not something new ; Beethoven, himself, interpreted his own music with a lot of freedom. Beethoven wrote :

« My tempi are valid only for the 1st bars, as feeling and expression must have their own tempo »

And :

« Why do they annoy me by asking for my tempi ? Either they are good musicians and ought to know how to play my music, or they are bad musicians and, in that case, my indications would be of no avail. »

Beethoven's disciples, such as Anton Schindler, testified that the composer varied the tempo when he conducted his works. Wagner's tradition was followed by the 1st 2 permanent conductors of the Berlin Philharmonic. Hans von Bülow highlighted more the unitary structure of Symphonic works, while Arthur Nikisch stressed the magnificence of tone. The styles of these 2 conductors were synthesized by Furtwängler.

In Munich (1907-1909), Furtwängler studied with Felix Mottl, a disciple of Wagner. He considered Arthur Nikisch as his model. According to John Ardoin, Wagner's subjective style of conducting led to Furtwängler, and Mendelssohn's objective style of conducting led to Toscanini.

Furtwängler's art was deeply influenced by the great Jewish music theorist Heinrich Schenker with whom he worked between 1920 and Schenker's death, in 1935. Schenker was the founder of musical analysis (called the Schenkerian analysis), emphasizing underlying long-range harmonic tensions and resolutions in a piece of music. Furtwängler read Schenker's famous monograph on Beethoven's 9th Symphony, in 1911, subsequently trying to find and read all his books. Furtwängler met Schenker, in 1920, and they continuously worked together on the repertoire which Furtwängler conducted. Schenker never secured an academic position in Austria and Germany, in spite of Furtwängler's efforts to support him. Schenker depended on several patrons including Furtwängler. Furtwängler's 2nd wife certified much later that Schenker had an immense influence on her husband. Schenker considered Furtwängler as the greatest conductor in the world and as the « only conductor who truly understood Beethoven » .

Furtwängler's recordings are characterized by an « extraordinary sound wealth » , special emphasis being placed on cellos, double basses, percussion and woodwind instruments. According to Furtwängler, he learned how to obtain this kind of sound from Arthur Nikisch. This richness of sound is partly due to his « vague » beat, often called a « fluid beat » . This fluid beat created slight gaps between the sounds made by the musicians, allowing listeners to distinguish all the instruments in the Orchestra, even in tutti sections. Vladimir Ashkenazy once said :

« I never heard such beautiful fortissimi as Furtwängler's. »

According to Yehudi Menuhin, Furtwängler's fluid beat was more difficult but superior than Toscanini's very precise beat. Unlike Otto Klemperer, Furtwängler did not try to suppress emotion in performance, instead giving a hyper-Romantic aspect to his interpretations. The emotional intensity of his World War II recordings is particularly famous. He desired to retain an element of improvisation and of the unexpected in his concerts, each interpretation being conceived as a re-creation. However, melodic line as well as the global unity were never lost with Furtwängler, even in the most dramatic interpretations, partly due to the influence of Heinrich Schenker and to the fact that Furtwängler was a composer and had studied composition during his whole life.

One of Furtwängler's « protégés » was the pianist prodigy Karlrobert Kreiten who was killed by the Nazis, in 1943, because he had criticized Hitler. He was an important influence on the pianist-conductor Daniel Barenboim, of whom Furtwängler's widow, Elisabeth Furtwängler, said : « Er furtwänglert. » (He furtwänglers.) Barenboim has conducted a recording of Furtwängler's 2nd Symphony, with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Other conductors known to speak admiringly of Furtwängler include Valery Gergiev, Claudio Abbado, Carlos Kleiber, Carlo Maria Giulini, Simon Rattle, Sergiu Celibidache, Otto Klemperer, Karl Böhm, Christoph Eschenbach, Alexander Frey, Eugen Jochum, Zubin Mehta, Kurt Masur and Christian Thielemann. For instance, Carlos Kleiber thought that « nobody could equal Furtwängler » . George Szell, whose precise musicianship was in many ways antithetical to Furtwängler's, always kept a picture of Furtwängler in his dressing-room. Herbert von Karajan, who in his early years was Furtwängler's rival, maintained throughout his life that Furtwängler was one of the great influences on his music making, even though his cool, objective, modern style had little in common with Furtwängler's white-hot Romanticism. Karajan said :

« He certainly had an enormous influence on me. I remember that when I was “ Generalmusikdirektor ” in Aachen, a friend invited me to a concert that Furtwängler gave in Cologne. Furtwängler's performance of the Robert Schumann's 4th, which I didn't know at the time, opened-up a new world for me. I was deeply impressed. I didn't want to forget this concert, so I immediately returned to Aachen. »

The conductor who most clearly represented a continuity with Furtwängler's incandescent style was Jascha Horenstein ; he had worked as an assistant to Furtwängler in Berlin, during the 1920's.

Furtwängler's performances of Beethoven, Wagner, Bruckner, and Brahms remain important reference points today, as do his interpretations of other works such as Haydn's 88th Symphony, Schubert's 9th Symphony, and Schumann's 4th Symphony. His performances are grounded in the spontaneous flexibility that Wagner referred to as the « elastic phrase » .

The musicians who have expressed the highest opinion about Furtwängler are some of the most prominent ones of the 20th Century such as Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith, or Arthur Honegger. Soloists such as Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Yehudi Menuhin, Pablo Casals, and Elisabeth Schwarzkopf who have played music with almost all the major conductors of the 20th Century have clearly declared upon several occasions that, for them, Furtwängler was the most important one. John Ardoin has reported the following discussion he has had with Maria Callas, in August 1968, after having listened to Beethoven's 8th with the Cleveland Orchestra conducted by George Szell. She sighed :

« Well, you see what we have been reduced to. We are now in a time when a Szell is considered a Master. How small he was next to Furtwängler. »

Reeling this disbelief (not at her verdict, with which I agreed, but from the unvarnished acuteness of it) , I stammered :

« But how do you know Furtwängler ? You never sang with him. »

« How do you think ? » , she stared at me with equal disbelief.

« He started his career after the War, in Italy (in 1947) . I heard dozens of his concerts there. To me, he was Beethoven. »

There are a huge number of Furtwängler recordings currently available, mostly live. Many of these were made during World War II, using experimental tape technology. After the War, they were confiscated by the Soviet Union for decades, and have only recently become widely available, often on multiple legitimate and illegitimate labels. In spite of their limitations, the recordings from this era are widely admired by Furtwängler devotees.

This is only a small selection of some of Furtwängler's most famed recordings. For more information, see his discography and list of currently available recordings. The French Wilhelm Furtwängler Society also has a list of recommended recordings.

Johann Sebastian Bach : « Saint-Matthew Passion » (1st half only) , live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, 1952 (« SWF ») .

Béla Bartók : Violin Concerto No. 2, studio recording with Yehudi Menuhin and with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, 1953 (« EMI ») .

Ludwig van Beethoven : 3rd Symphony (« Eroica ») , live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, December 1944 (« Music & Arts » , « Preiser Records » , « Tahra ») .

About this recording, often considered as one of the most important ones of the 20th Century, John Ardoin wrote :

« The magnificent 1944 performance with the Vienna Philharmonic is an authenticated performance that is not only Furtwängler's noblest and most compelling “ Eroica ”, but one unrivalled on disc. »

And André Tubeuf :

« A performance of prodigious Classicism, it presents us with figures that seem to us to be made of stone by virtue of their nobility and of fire because of their compelling urgency, but which, on the wings of a Scherzo, at the pace of a March, suddenly releases the infinite - placed on record. »

Beethoven : 3rd Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, December 1952 (« Tahra ») .

Beethoven : 5th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, June 1943 (« Classica d'Oro » , « Deutsche Grammophon » , « Enterprise » , « Music & Arts » , « Opus Kura » , « Tahra ») .

Beethoven : 5th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, Mai 1954 (« Tahra ») .

Beethoven : 6th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, March 1944 (« Tahra ») .

Beethoven : 7th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, October 1943 (« Classica d'Oro » , « Deutsche Grammophon » , « Music & Arts » , « Opus Kura ») .

Harry Halbreich wrote in his analysis of this performance :

« Does the 2nd movement remain an Allegretto under Furtwängler's baton ? Many critics have raised this question, troubled by the spaciousness even more than in Berlin than in Vienna (in 1950) . And, yet, why hesitate ? From the 1st bars, this perfection overrules us - beyond doubt, this is humanely, organically the right tempo and it would be completely insensitive and unmusical to argue otherwise. Who could describe the incredible beauty of phrasing of the song of violas and cellos, the sublime expressiveness of the violins ? The 2nd theme, on its re-appearance, seems still more moving and expressive. This Finale was always one of Furtwängler's great war-horses and, undoubtedly, the summit of this interpretation. Furtwängler relives his unbelievable performance of the end of the 5th Symphony, in June 1943, 4 months before, launching into a break-taking acceleration without the unleashed forces ever escaping the control of the brilliant leader : “ I am the Bacchus who distils the delicious nectar for mankind, and brings them to divine frenzy of the spirit. ” - thus, Beethoven explained himself. But it takes a demiurge like Furtwängler, that autumn day, in 1943, to bring that frenzy to life in sound ! »

Beethoven : 9th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, March 1942 (« Classica d'Oro » , « Music & Arts » , « Opus Kura » , « Tahra » , « SWF ») .

Harry Halbreich wrote in his analysis of this performance that, for the 1st movement :

« Nobody has ever approached Furtwängler in the evocation of this terrifying release of cosmic forces. »

And about the Adagio :

« In its superhuman spaciousness, which seems to seek to renounce human time and to align itself with that of creation, was not this Adagio the highest achievement of Wilhelm Furtwängler's art ? Certainly, no other conductor allowed himself such interpretative scope, and none put himself so much at risk. Yet, on actual hearing, the tempi prove so right, so natural lending themselves so perfectly to the whole presentation of the musical thought that one can hardly imagine anything different. »

For the Finale, he says :

« From bar 321, Furtwängler imperiously asserts his presence with a gradual allargando building-up to the colossal fortissimo of bar 330, followed by a timeless pause, a divine vision in which Beethoven, thanks to an interpreter worthy of him, equals the stature of the Michelangelo of the Sistine Chapel. »

And Sami Habra wrote :

« The 1942 performance, in Berlin, is one of the most convincing proofs of Furtwängler's rebellion during Germany's tragic era, while the Nazis tried, in vain, to bury the great German musical heritage by using it for their sinister ends. Furtwängler fought for it and strived to save it from their clutches. »

Beethoven : 9th Symphony, live performance at the July 29, 1951 re-opening of the « Bayreuther Festspiele » (not to be confused with « EMI » 's release) with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Elisabeth Höngen, Hans Hopf and Otto Edelmann. (« Orfeo d'Or » , 2008) .

Sami Habra wrote regarding this very famous concert :

« Yet, after the War, he had to prove to the world that German musical art had, indeed, survived that fateful period, as well as some attempts by the Allies to ignore or undermine German culture. The whole musical world retained its breath while Beethoven was universally re-born when Furtwängler conducted the 9th for the re-opening of Bayreuth, in 1951. »

Beethoven : 9th Symphony, ostensibly a live performance at the July 29, 1951, re-opening of the « Bayreuther Festspiele » but purported by the President of the Wilhelm Furtwängler Society of America to actually be dress rehearsal takes edited by « EMI » into 1 recording, all performed prior to the actual public performance. (« EMI » , 1955) .

Beethoven : 9th Symphony, live performance at the 1954 Lucerne Festival with the London « Philharmonia » , Lucerne Festival Choir, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Elsa Cavelti, Ernst Häfliger and Otto Edelmann (« Music & Arts » , « Tahra ») .

Sami Habra said :

« The Lucerne 1954 concert, Furtwängler's last performance of the 9th, allowed the listener an even deeper insight into the great conductor's art, the most important impression being that of abyssal depths that permeate this Swan song : no doubt, Furtwängler sensed his end was near. »

Beethoven : Violin Concerto, studio recording with Yehudi Menuhin and with the Lucerne Festival Orchestra, in 1947 (« Testament ») .

Beethoven : Piano Concerto No. 5, studio recording with Edwin Fischer and with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in 1951 (« Naxos ») .

Beethoven : « Fidelio » , live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Kirsten Flagstad, Anton Dermota, Julius Patzak, Paul Schoeffler, Josef Greindl, and Hans Braun, in August 1950 (« Opus Kura ») .

Beethoven : « Fidelio » , both live and studio recordings, with Martha Mödl (his preferred soprano, in the title role) , and Wolfgang Windgassen, Otto Edelmann, Gottlob Frick, Sena Jurinac, Rudolf Schock, Alfred Poell, Alwin Hendriks, Franz Bierbach, and the Vienna Philharmonic.

Brahms : 1st Symphony, live performance with the North German Radio Symphony Orchestra, Hamburg, in October 1951 (« Music & Arts » , « Tahra ») .

Sami Habra wrote :

« This Brahms 1st turned-out to be Furtwängler's best version. More than ever, the broad opening, with the hammering of Friedrich Weber on the timpani and the soaring strings of that magnificent ensemble, impress the listener. The special quality of the string section, miraculously dense and transparent, at the same time, permeates the whole work. The 4 great fortissimi of the 1st movement have an irresistible “ élan ”, the long lyrical phrases of the 2nd movement enchant the listener with their intensity. The 3rd movement is Furtwängler at his most feverish here, and full of serenity is reached only after the repeated trumpet calls. The 4th movement is played with unmistakable “ grandeur ” and solemnity, as indeed, the whole work is. While keeping Brahms' personality in mind, Furtwängler nevertheless brings-out Beethoven's influence on Brahms. No wonder the French critics bestowed upon this recording the “ Diapason d'Or of the Century ”. »

Brahms : 2nd Symphony, live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, in January 1945 (« Deutsche Grammophon » , « Music & Arts ») .

Brahms : 3rd Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in December 1949 (« EMI ») .

Sigurd Schimpf wrote :

« Furtwängler's interpretations of Brahms go beyond the merely “ composed ” notation and realise the vision of the organic form that hovered before Brahms but can no longer be attained. Herein lies the explanation of the flawless formal architecture of his interpretations, as well as the psychical compulsion of their musical performance that never becomes lost in detail but, to the contrary, always keeps the work as a whole in view. In this recording, notwithstanding his traditional interpretative style, Furtwängler, unlike many a younger composer, lays more stress on the characteristics beyond the Classical model Symphony that herald the new trend :“ Spiritual life ” which Furtwängler traces and creates anew in each work. In this Symphony, energetic and vigorous though it is, spiritual life is not concentrated on the dualism of the themes, the dramatic development and the intensity of the Finale, but above all, on the variety of tone-colours which are here formative energy that puts a constantly changing complexion on the scarcely modulated themes and motifs and becomes the favourite means of musical expression. »

Brahms : 4th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in December 1943 (« Tahra » , « SWF ») .

Brahms : 4th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in October 1948 (« EMI ») .

Brahms : Violin Concerto, studio recording with Yehudi Menuhin and with the Lucerne Festival Orchestra, in 1949 (« Tahra » , « Naxos ») .

Brahms : Piano Concerto No. 2, live performance with Edwin Fischer and with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1942 (« Testament ») .

Bruckner : 4th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in October 1941 (« WFCJ ») .

Bruckner : 5th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in October 1942 (« Classica d'Oro » , « Deutsche Grammophon » , « Music & Arts » , « Testament ») .

David Hurwitz wrote of this recording :

« The interpretation is typically manic : very fast, and very slow. It lurches about impulsively and has thrilling moments - but also, some pretty distressing examples of shoddy ensemble, particularly in the Scherzo and Finale. It was all too seldom that Furtwängler managed to keep his band together to allow him to time his climaxes optimally. A classic case of “ overshoot ” occurs at the end of the 1st movement, which sounds terribly rushed. The Adagio, though, is magnificent. »

Bruckner : 6th Symphony (the 1st movement is missing) , live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in November

1943 (« Music & Arts ») .

Bruckner : 7th Symphony (Adagio only) , live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in April 1942 (« Tahra ») .

Sami Habra wrote, in 2005 :

« Furtwängler has always been Bruckner's greatest exponent. Again, the tragic element and grandeur are unequalled here. This is a " desert island " recording, fortunately restored for music-lovers of this world to cherish all their life. »

Bruckner : 8th Symphony, live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, in October 1944 (« Deutsche Grammophon m » , « Music & Arts ») .

Bruckner : 9th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in October 1944 (« Deutsche Grammophon ») .

Franck : Symphony, live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1945 (« SWF ») .

Furtwängler : 2nd Symphony, live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic, in February 1953 (« Orfeo ») .

Gluck : « Alceste » Overture, studio recording with the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1954 (« SWF ») .

Händel : Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 10, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in February 1944 (« Melodiya ») .

Händel : Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 10, live performance with the « Teatro Colón » Orchestra, in 1950 (« Disques Refrain ») .

Haydn : 88th Symphony, studio recording with the Berlin Philharmonic, on 5 December 1951 (« Deutsche Grammophon ») .

Mahler : « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » , live performance with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1951 (« Orfeo ») .

Mahler : « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » , studio recording with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in 1952 (« Naxos » , « EMI ») .

Mendelssohn : Violin Concerto, studio recording with Yehudi Menuhin and with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1952 (« Naxos » , « EMI ») .

Mozart : « Don Giovanni » , the 1950, 1953 and 1954 Salzburg Festival recordings (in live performance) . These have been made available on several labels, but mostly on « EMI » . A videotaped performance of « Don Giovanni » is also available, featuring Cesare Siepi, Otto Edelmann, Lisa Della Casa, Elisabeth Grümmer, and Anton Dermota.

Mozart : « Die Zauberflöte » , a live performance from August 27, 1949, featuring Walther Ludwig, Irmgard Seefried, Wilma Lipp, Gertrude Grob-Prandl, Ernst Häfliger, Hermann Uhde, and Josef Greindl.

Schubert : 8th Symphony (1st movement only) , live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in December 1944 (« SWF ») .

Schubert : 9th Symphony, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1942 (« Deutsche Grammophon » , « Magic Master » , « Music & Arts » , « Opus Kura ») .

Schubert : « Die Zauberharfe » Overture, live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in September 1953 (« Deutsche Grammophon ») .

Schumann : 4th Symphony, studio recording with the Berlin Philharmonic, in May 1953 (« Deutsche Grammophon ») .

Sami Habra wrote, in 2005 :

« Schumann's 4th has long been regarded as the recording of the Century (along with the “ HMV ” “ Tristan und Isolde ”) . Before the boisterous last movement starts, there is the famous transitional passage in which Furtwängler builds-up the most impressive Crescendo ever heard. This Crescendo is referred to, by Conservatoire teachers and conductors, as being the very perfection, in spite of its infeasibility. Celibidache and Karajan have tried to imitate Furtwängler in this part, on some occasions, but both conductors run-out of breath towards the middle of the Crescendo. This Furtwängler performance has, yet, to be equalled. »

Sibelius : « En Saga » , live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in February 1943 (« SWF ») .

Tchaïkovsky : 4th Symphony, studio recording with the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1951 (« Tahra ») .

Tchaïkovsky : 6th Symphony (« Pathétique ») , studio recording with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1938 (« EMI » , « Naxos ») .

Sami Habra wrote, in 2005 :

« According to Friedland Wagner, this 1938 performance of the “ Pathétique ” by Furtwängler was so overwhelming that Toscanini, in his house at Riverdale, played this recording, again and again, to his guests on a memorable day, pointing-out with enthusiasm all its fine points. We can safely say that no one has probed as deeply as Furtwängler into the abyss of the tragic contents and pessimistic forebodings of the “ Pathétique ”. The last movement would probably have contained a glimmer of hope, had it not been for the fateful events that were to plunge the world into its darkest hours. Many observers have asserted that Furtwängler had foreseen what was to happen. »

Wagner : « Tristan und Isolde » , studio recording with Kirsten Flagstad, in June 1952 (« EMI » , « Naxos ») .

Gerhard Brunner said about this recording :

« Produced in 1952, this recording, now re-issued, has long been something of a landmark in recent history - rightly so, for its importance and its uniqueness are unquestionable. Wilhelm Furtwängler's architectural greatness is communicated so directly, so forcefully from the very 1st bar that one immediately forgets the small imperfections of the mono recording. The most striking thing is, certainly, the cogency of this interpretation. Nowhere are there hiatuses, breaks in the music's flow. Furtwängler, though far from being a perfectionist in individual detail, invariably seems to see the entire conception before him, so grippingly does he span the work's long arches, so magnificently does he weld together the various components. His feeling for form is so compelling in its certainty that one does not stop to consider for a moment that it is not the only way of interpreting a particular phrase or sequence. The idea of Furtwängler seeking effect from a series of “ purple passages ” is unthinkable ; and, yet, the great emotional crescendi, the great climaxes, have a dramatic power scarcely matched elsewhere. »

Wagner : « Der Ring des Nibelungen » , live recording from La Scala, in Milan, with Kirsten Flagstad, in 1950.

Wagner : « Der Ring des Nibelungen » with Wolfgang Windgassen, Ludwig Suthaus, and Martha Mödl, recorded live in the « RAI » (« Radiotelevisione Italiana ») studios, in 1953 (« EMI ») .

Wagner : « Die Walküre » , his last recording in 1954. « EMI » planned to record « Der Ring des Nibelungen » in studio under Furtwängler, but he only finished this work shortly before his death. The cast includes Martha Mödl (Brünnhilde) , Leonie Rysanek (Sieglinde) , Ludwig Suthaus (Siegmund) , Gottlob Frick (Hunding) , and Ferdinand Frantz (Wotan) .

Furtwängler walked-out of a Toscanini concert once (it was Beethoven's 9th) , calling him « a mere time-beater ! » . Unlike Toscanini, Furtwängler sought a weighty, less rhythmically strict, more bass-oriented orchestral sound, with a more conspicuous use of tempo changes not indicated in the printed score.