Following the outbreak of War, Pius followed Vatican precedent and pursued a policy of « impartiality » and sought to act as an intermediary peace-broker. Despite this official policy, Pius passed intelligence to the Allies and made a series of condemnations of racism and genocide through the course of the War. Germany regarded Pius as an Allied sympathizer who had violated his own policy of neutrality.

With Poland overrun but France and the Low-Countries yet to be attacked, Colonel Hans Oster of the « Abwehr » sent Munich lawyer and devout Catholic, Josef Müller, on a clandestine trip to Rome to seek Papal assistance in the developing plot by the German military opposition to oust Hitler. The Pope's Private Secretary, Robert Leiber acted as the intermediary between Pius and the Resistance. He met with Müller, who visited Rome in 1939 and 1940. Later in the War, Leiber remained the point of contact for communications from Colonel-General Ludwig Beck in the lead up to the 1944 « July Plot ». The Vatican considered Müller to be a representative of Colonel-General von Beck and agreed to offer the machinery for mediation. The British agreed to negotiate, provided the Vatican could vouch for the opposition's representative. Pius, communicating with Britain's Francis d'Arcy Osborne, channelled communications back and forth in secrecy. The Vatican agreed to send a letter outlining the bases for peace with England and the participation of the Pope was used to try to persuade senior German Generals Halder and Brauchitsch to act against Hitler.

Hoffmann wrote that, when the Venlo Incident stalled the talks, the British agreed to resume discussions primarily because of the « efforts of the Pope and the respect in which he was held. Chamberlain and Halifax set great store by the Pope's readiness to mediate. » The British government had doubts as to the capacity of the conspirators and was non-committal. Nevertheless, the resistance were encouraged by the talks, and Müller told Leiber that a « coup » would occur in February. The negotiations ultimately proved fruitless. Hitler's swift victories over France and the Low-Countries deflated the will of the German military to resist Hitler. Müller was arrested during the Nazis 1st raid on Military Intelligence in 1943. He spent the rest of the War in concentration camps, ending-up at Dachau. Général Charles de Gaulle, leader of the Free French, and admirer of Pope Pius XII, met with the pontiff following the Liberation of Rome.

At a special mass at Saint-Peters for the victims of the War, held in November 1940, soon after the commencement of the London Blitz bombing by the « Luftwaffe », Pius preached in his homily :

« May the whirlwinds, that in the light of day or the dark of night, scatter terror, fire, destruction, and slaughter on helpless folk cease. May justice and charity on one side and on the other be in perfect balance, so that all injustice be repaired, the reign of right restored. »

Later, he appealed to the Allies to spare Rome from aerial bombing, and visited wounded victims of the Allied bombing of 19 July 1943.

Through the early stages of the War, Pius continued to hope for a negotiated peace to prevent the spread of the conflict. The similarly minded U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt re-established American diplomatic relations with the Vatican after a 70 year hiatus and dispatched Myron C. Taylor as his personal representative. Pius warmly welcomed Roosevelt's envoy and peace initiative, calling it « an exemplary act of fraternal and hearty solidarity in defence against the chilling breath of aggressive and deadly godless anti-Christian tendencies » .

On 4 May 1940, the Vatican advised the Netherlands envoy to the Vatican that the Germans planned to invade France through the Netherlands and Belgium on 10 May. In Rome, in 1942, U.S. envoy Myron C. Taylor, thanked the Holy-See for the « forthright and heroic expressions of indignation made by Pope Pius XII when Germany invaded the Low-Countries » .

When, in 1940, the Nazi Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop led the only senior Nazi delegation permitted an audience with Pius XII and asked why the Pope had sided with the Allies, Pius replied with a list of recent Nazi atrocities and religious persecutions committed against Christians and Jews, in Germany, and in Poland, leading « The New York Times » to headline its report « Jews Rights Defended » and write of « burning words he spoke to “ Herr ” Ribbentrop about religious persecution » .

Unsuccessfully, Pius attempted to dissuade the Italian Dictator Benito Mussolini from joining Nazi Germany in the War. Following the Fall of France, Pius XII wrote confidentially to Hitler, Churchill and Mussolini proposing to offer to mediate a « just and honourable peace, but asking to receive confidential advice in advance of how such an offer would be received » . When, by 1943, the War had turned against the Axis Powers, and Mussolini's Foreign Minister Count Ciano was relieved of his post and sent to the Vatican as ambassador, Hitler suspected that he had been sent to arrange a separate peace with the Allies. On 25 July, the Italian King dismissed Mussolini. Hitler's told Alfred Jodl to organise for a German force to go to Rome and arrest the Government and restore Mussolini.

Asked about the Vatican, Hitler said :

« I'll go right into the Vatican. Do you think the Vatican embarrasses me ? We'll take that over right away later we can make apologies. »

His Generals urged caution, and the plot was not carried-out.

Pius had met President Roosevelt before the War. Despite profound fears of Stalinist Totalitarianism, Pius assured American Catholics working in armaments factories that it was acceptable to assist Russia with armaments, as the Russian people had been attacked. Pius feared the consequences of the Yalta Agreement which secured a sphere of Soviet influence in Europe and his Church became the target of Communist repression in Eastern Europe, following the War. When Italy surrendered to the Allies in 1943, German troops occupied Rome. Thousands of anti-Fascists and Jews took refuge in Church buildings during the occupation. Pius declared Rome an « open city » , coming to be known as « defensor civitatis » (defender of the city) .

Following the Liberation of Rome and prior to the collapse of Vichy France, Pius met Général Charles de Gaulle, leader of the Free French. At this time, he also held an audience with the British Prime Minister, Winston Churchill. Despite his long career in Germany, and as a Vatican diplomat, he never once met Adolf Hitler. Following the 4 June 1944, Liberation of Rome by the Allies, Cardinal Tisserant delivered a letter from De Gaulle, assuring the Pontiff of the filial respect and attachment of the French people, and noting that their long War-time suffering had been attenuated by the Pope's « testimonies of paternal affection » . Pius thanked De Gaulle for his recognition of the charity works of the papacy for the victims of the War, and offered an Apostolic blessing upon De Gaulle and his nation. De Gaulle himself came to meet the Pope on 30 June, following which, the French leader wrote of great admiration for Pius, and assessed him to be a pious, compassionate and thoughtful figure, upon whom the problems of world situation weighed heavily. De Gaulle's visit was reported by the Vatican Press in the manner of a head of State, though the Vichy Regime had not yet been toppled.

Austria was overwhelmingly Catholic. At the direction of Cardinal Theodor Innitzer, the churches of Vienna pealed their bells and flew swastikas for Hitler's arrival in the city on 14 March. Cardinal Innitzer was called to Rome, where the Pope rebuked him for his show of enthusiasm. Austrian Bishop Alois Hudal published a book in 1937 praising the German ideal of racial unity. With power secured in Austria, the Nazis repeated their persecution of the Church and, in October, a Nazi mob ransacked Innitzer's residence, after he had denounced Nazi persecution of the Church. In Britain, the « Catholic Herald » provided the following contemporary account on 14 October 1938 :

« The Blessed Maria Restituta was among the church dissidents arrested in Austria and executed by the Nazi regime. Friedrich Hoffman, a Czech priest, testifies at the trial of former camp personnel from Dachau, where over a thousand clergy died. 122 Czechoslovak priests were imprisoned there, but Poles constituted the largest proportion of those imprisoned in the dedicated Clergy Barracks.

The invasion was a reply to a courageous sermon the Cardinal had preached in the Cathedral earlier in the evening, in which the Cardinal told his packed congregation that “ in the last few months you have lost everything ! ” This sermon marked the end of Cardinal Innitzer's attempt to establish a religious peace with the Nazis. The attempt has failed. Cardinal Innitzer is now in line with his German brothers openly urging Catholics to resist anti-Catholic measures. »

(Extract from Britain's « Catholic Herald » , October 1938.)

In a « Table Talk » of July 1942, discussing his problems with the Catholic Church, Hitler singles-out Innitzer's early gestures of cordiality as evidence of the extreme caution with which Church diplomats must be treated :

« There appeared a man who addressed me with such self-assurance and beaming countenance, just as if, throughout the whole of the Austrian Republic he had never even touched a hair of the head of any National Socialist ! »

Following the Nazi annexation of Austria, many priests were arrested. The Austrian priests Jakob Gapp and Otto Neururer, both executed during the 3rd « Reich » were beatified in the 1996. Neururer was tortured and hanged at Buchenwald and Jakob Gapp was guillotined in Berlin.

The Blessed Maria Restituta, a Franciscan nun working as a nurse at the Mödling hospital was outspoken in her opposition to the new Nazi regime, and refused to remove crucifixes from her hospital walls. Arrested by the « Gestapo » in 1942, she was beheaded in March 1943 in Vienna.

Catholicism had had a strong institutional presence in the region under the Habsburg Dynasty, but Bohemian Czechs in particular had had a troubled relationship with the Church of their Habsburg rulers.

Despite this, according to Schnitker :

« The Church managed to gain a deep-seated appreciation for the role it played in resisting the common Nazi enemy. »

On 30 January 1933, Adolf Hitler, leader of the National-Socialist German Workers' Party, came to power in Germany. His aim was to mould Germany's political and community life to fit in with his own ideas. This totalitarian approach left no room for deviant views or independent organizations and institutions ; the whole of public life was to be controlled or, as the fashionable term put it, « co-ordinated » by the Nazi Party. The 2 major Churches (Lutheran and Catholic) to which almost every German belonged, were no exception to this general control.

But National-Socialism also had a particular interest in the churches, and it was inevitable that conflict would arise. Nazism saw itself not just as a political Party, but as a philosophy - based on extreme-racism. Only the Aryan race was acceptable, and the Aryans' worst enemy was the Jewish people - hence, they must be exterminated. This racism led to the infamous death camps of Auschwitz, Buchenwald, Ravensbruck.

Closely linked with Nazi racism was Imperialism. Among Aryans, the Germans were the superior people and were, therefore, called to rule the world. The German people, German blood and the German fatherland were held-up by the Nazis as the highest-good. Known as « der Führer » (the Leader) , Adolf Hitler himself was the incarnation of the Nazi philosophy. People greeted each other with and in his name - a practice to which Christians could not conform.

Nazism was a challenge as well as a threat to the churches : it disturbed their security and forced them to ask fundamental questions : What is the Church ? What does it mean to be a Christian ? What is so basic to the nature of the Church and to being a Christian that it cannot under any circumstances be surrendered ?

The process of discussion and exploration which gradually evolved during the 3rd « Reich » centred on 3 areas :

The Church began to establish itself as a separate entity, independent of the State, and to criticize the State and even actively oppose it.

The German Church became more open to the international Church community, from which it received help and support.

The Church began to combat racism by involving the whole Christian community in a united struggle for human rights.

Stand-up and be counted

For the anti-Nazi cause, people in Germany not only risked their lives but lost them. 2 men were of particular importance in urging the Church forward on its way through the 3rd « Reich » : Martin Niemoller and Dietrich Bonhoeffer.

Martin Niemoller played a major part in gathering clergy and congregations of the Lutheran Church into what came to be known as the « Confessing Church ». He was born in 1892, in Westphalia, the son of a minister whose ancestors had been farmers. In the First World War, he became a U-boat commander. When the War was over, he planned to emigrate to South America, as a reaction to the Treaty of Versailles which placed the whole blame for the War on Germany's shoulders. To Niemoller, Germany seemed to be so humiliated by this that he felt he could no longer love his country or its people. However, while he was making his emigration plans, he served an apprenticeship on a farm. Here, he experienced a change of heart : he resolved to stay in Germany and serve his fellow-countrymen by going into the ministry of the Church.

The establishment of the Weimar Republic in 1919 was greeted by Niemoller with extreme suspicion. In this, he was typical of the great majority of German Protestants. He was loyal to the « Kaiser » and nostalgic for the close relationship between Church and State which had existed under the Imperial government. When the National-Socialists came to power in 1933, with the slogan « Wipe-out the shame of Versailles » , Niemoller was wholly in agreement. Nazi foreign policy was greeted with great enthusiasm by the overwhelming majority of the German nation.

The Nazis also set about « co-ordinating » the churches. As early as 1932, an organization known as the « German Christians » had been established. This was a religious movement led by Nazi clergy whose goal was to bring the Lutheran Church into line with the political and ideological goals of National-Socialism. In the summer of 1933, the « German Christians » seized power in the Lutheran Church, aided by massive support from Hitler and the Nazi Party. They elected a Federal Bishop and began to govern the Church on the « Führer's Principles » . First, the 28 provincial churches, which had been largely autonomous, were to be amalgamated into a single Federal Church under the jurisdiction of the Federal Bishop. Then, all non-Aryans (first the clergy and, then, Church members) were to be excluded from the German Lutheran Federal Church.

This raised a storm of indignation, and fierce opposition sprang-up. Such measures were a betrayal of the gospel of Jesus-Christ ! The imperturbable and pragmatic Niemoller, who was a minister in the Dahlem area of Berlin, promptly organized the « Pastors' Emergency League » . By the end of 1933, this had recruited 1/3 of the German Clergy. Congregations joined their Clergy in protesting against the dictatorship of the « German Christians » and their betrayal of Bible and creed.

Through independent « confessing synods » , Christians in Germany attempted to establish what were the basic, inviolable principles of the Church and the Christian faith. In a famous theological declaration which took its name from the meeting-place of the 1st « confessing synod » in Barmen, Wuppertal, the Swiss theologian, Karl Barth helped to draw-up a statement of fundamental principles.

A fierce battle flared-up - primarily, a battle between 2 opposing groups in the Lutheran Church. The Confessing Church set its face against the « German Christians » and their planned « co-ordination » of the Church. The Church must remain the church ! « was the battle-cry of the Confessing Church, while the “ German Christians ” saw themselves as the “ Storm-Troopers of Jesus-Christ ” » .

The provincial churches who had been brought under the rule of the « German Christians » were referred to by the Confessing Church as « liquidated churches » ; those led by Bishops who were not associated with the « German Christians » such as Hanover, Württemberg and Bavaria, were « intact » churches. Even in the « liquidated » churches, pastors belonged to the Confessing Church and confessing congregations were formed.

But the Party and the State saw the Confessing Church as a resistance organization. They attempted to destroy it by keeping its members under surveillance, imprisoning them or sending them to concentration camps. In spite of this direct persecution, many people had the courage to launch-out into a relatively independent church life by applying for the « red card » which signified membership of the Confessing Church. The official German Christian authorities stopped the salaries of ministers who joined the Confessing Church, and from then on, they had to live on funds provided by the Confessing Church itself. Various methods of resistance were developed : censorship was flouted by a flood of underground pamphlets ; laws against public assembly resulted in private meetings ; censorship of the post and telephone service was made unworkable by word-of-mouth communication and a system of messengers.

This day-to-day subversion strengthened the solidarity of the members of the Confessing Church. In the novel circumstances of an underground church, outdated and traditional structures collapsed. Commitment, willingness to help and heroism were needed equally from men and women, clergy and laypeople. Important tasks often had to be taken over by women or the laity, since the activities of officials and clergy were closely watched by the police.

To begin with, the Confessing Church intended to criticize only the « German Christians » , not the Nazi Party or the State. It wanted to stay loyal to the State, to be recognized by the State as the true church. But, gradually, the members of the Confessing Church were forced to recognize that National-Socialism was deeply anti-Christian.

The trial of Martin Niemöller played a significant part in this realization. In 1932, a trumped-up charge of treason was pinned on Niemöller in his role as a leader of the Confessing Church, but he escaped with only a light sentence. However, immediately after the announcement of this lenient judgement, Niemöller was made a « personal prisoner of Adolf Hitler » and spent the whole duration of the 3rd « Reich » in various concentration camps. During this period, living with people who were persecuted by the Nazis on religious, political or racial grounds, Niemöller came to abandon many traditional prejudices.

The insights he gained led to personal convictions which he declared in the public discussions on Church and State after the War. For a Christian, he believed, the command « Thou shalt not kill » is unequivocal. There is no such thing as the « just War » , especially in the age of nuclear weapons. Every human being is my brother ; and an « anti » mentality, even « anti-Communism » , has no part in Christian thinking.

Resistance, suffering and unity

As it became clearer that National-Socialism and Christianity were irreconcilable, the Confessing Church was ever more ready to see itself as independent of the State. It based its life on the essential foundation of the Bible, dissociated itself as far as possible from government measures and opposed the policies of the State.

These attitudes grew directly out of the Church's own experience of persecution, and indirectly out of the responses to its situation of churches in other countries. It was the Confessing Church to which other churches sought to relate in ecumenical ventures, and to which the English Church (particularly, Bishop George Bell of Chichester) , other European and American Churches offered solidarity and help.

A central figure in the Confessing Church's ecumenical involvement was Dietrich Bonhoeffer, who became a symbol of Christian resistance to the Nazis. Bonhoeffer was born in Breslau, in 1906, the son of a professor of psychiatry. After university, he embarked on his career as a lecturer in theology in Berlin. In 1930-1931, he spent 1 year studying and teaching in New York, then continued his teaching career in Germany. At the same time, he became a student pastor in Berlin and youth secretary of an international Church friendship organization.

In the autumn of 1933, Bonhoeffer went to London as a visiting pastor, and became closely associated with Bishop Bell. In 1935, he returned to Germany and became the director of the « illegal » seminary for ministers set-up by the Confessing Church in Pommerania. Berlin University revoked his teaching permit in 1936 ; in 1937, the seminary was temporarily closed, and, in 1938, Bonhoeffer was expelled from Berlin, his parental home. When the seminary was permanently closed in 1940, Bonhoeffer was forbidden to speak in public, and, the following year, was forbidden to write.

Bonhoeffer, however, continued his academic work ; he kept-up his links with the Confessing Church and also joined the political resistance movement. In 1942, through Bishop Bell, he unsuccessfully attempted to pass information to the British government about the German resistance movement. He was arrested in April 1943 for his involvement in smuggling Jews into Switzerland and was hanged by the Nazis in the last days of the War.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer collected his experiences as a Christian in Nazi Germany and reflected on them in the light of the Christian gospel. His thought and example continue to exert a wide influence in both Christian and secular circles through his writings. His prison letters, written during the last 2 years of his life, are perhaps the best-known of his works. He called for mature, credible Christian faith to be lived-out in an increasingly secular, irreligious world. He struggled with the problem of how the biblical message of liberation and redemption can be announced to a world which has « come of age » . The Church does not live for itself - it is the Church of Jesus-Christ for others. He firmly believed that the good news of Jesus-Christ breaks through denominational and national barriers.

Bonhoeffer himself was a pioneer of the ecumenical movement and experienced it at 1st hand. He deserves much of the credit for the fact that, after 1945, in spite of all that the nations of Europe had suffered at the hands of the Germans, churches in other countries sought fellowship with the German churches and showed a renewed desire to cooperate with them.

The « Jewish Question »

Bonhoeffer was one of the 1st Christians in the Confessing Church to recognize clearly the significance of the « Jewish Question » in Nazi Germany. As early as spring 1933, he pointed-out that the Jews were becoming victims of the State's policies - but his was a lone voice. He saw that the age-old policy of confrontation, which Christians had practised towards the Jews from the Church Fathers through to Martin Luther, and later, had made Christians in Germany passive, blind and indifferent to the fate of the Jews.

Bonhoeffer wanted to awaken the Church to the fact that a monstrous injustice was being done to the Jews, and that the place of Christians was alongside their persecuted Jewish brothers. He challenged Christians to regard the Jews as the « neighbour fallen among thieves » , as in Jesus' parable of the Good Samaritan. He saw that the Jewish Bible, the Old Testament, is part of the Christian Bible too ; that Christians and Jews believe in the same God ; that the Bible concept of « the people of God » refers to both. But he could not persuade the Confessing Church to make a public statement on behalf of the Jews. As the Second World War progressed, the growing persecution of the Confessing Church by the Nazi authorities crippled the Church's ability to help others.

Many church agencies engaged in vigorous protest against the so-called « euthanasia measures » by which those considered « unfit to live » were exterminated. In 1939-1940, after the outbreak of War, hundreds of thousands of mentally ill, old, mentally and physically handicapped people were murdered by the Nazis. On this issue, the Church spoke-out clearly. But, on the « Jewish Question » , only a few shared Bonhoeffer's insights and opinions. Only a few were able to put behind them the institutionalized anti-Semitism of the Christian Church. Only a few spoke-up for the Jews who were deprived of their rights, humiliated, stripped of human dignity, driven-out of Germany and eventually killed in their millions in the holocaust of the gas chambers.

Among these few was Bishop Wurm of Württemberg. He wrote to the government and Party officials at the highest-level to protest against the extermination of Jews, Poles and Russians. Against the racist ideas of National-Socialism, he held-up the vision of a community of faith in which the command « Thou shalt not kill » would be absolute. Against the Nazi policies of « Total War » and genocide he held-up the will of God that not one of his children should perish. So, a prophetic witness, a « call to conversion » , rang-out even in these dark days of Nazi Germany.

The population of Germany in 1933 was around 60 million. Almost all Germans were Christian, belonging either to the Roman Catholic (around 20 million members) or the Protestant (around 40 million members) churches. The Jewish community in Germany, in 1933, was less than 1 % of the total population of the country.

How did Christians and their churches in Germany respond to the Nazi regime and its laws, particularly to the persecution of the Jews ? The racialized anti-Jewish Nazi ideology converged with anti-Semitism that was historically wide-spread throughout Europe at the time and had deep roots in Christian history. For all too many Christians, traditional interpretations of religious scriptures seemed to support these prejudices.

The attitudes and actions of German Catholics and Protestants during the Nazi era were shaped not only by their religious beliefs, but by other factors as well, including :

Back-lash against the Weimar Republic and the political, economic, and social changes in Germany that occurred during the 1920's.

Anti-Communism

Nationalism.

Resentment toward the international community in the wake of World War I, which Germany lost and for which it was forced to pay heavy reparations.

These were some of the reasons why most Christians in Germany welcomed the rise of Nazism in 1933. They were also persuaded by the statement on « positive Christianity » in Article 24 of the 1920 Nazi Party Platform, which read :

« We demand the freedom of all religious confessions in the State, insofar as they do not jeopardize the State's existence or conflict with the manners and moral sentiments of the Germanic race. The Party, as such, upholds the point of view of a positive Christianity without tying itself confessionally to any one confession. It combats the Jewish-materialistic spirit, at home and abroad, and is convinced that a permanent recovery of our people can only be achieved from within on the basis of the common good before individual good. »

Despite the open anti-Semitism of this statement and its linkage between confessional « freedom » and a nationalistic, racialized understanding of morality, many Christians in Germany, at the time, read this as an affirmation of Christian values.

Protestant Churches in Nazi Germany

The largest Protestant Church in Germany in the 1930's was the German Evangelical Church, comprised of 28 regional churches (« Landeskirchen ») that included the 3 major theological traditions that had emerged from the Reformation : Lutheran, Reformed, and United. Most of Germany's 40 million Protestants were members of this Church, although there were smaller so-called « free » Protestant Churches, such as Methodist and Baptist Churches.

Historically, the German Evangelical Church viewed itself as one of the pillars of German culture and society, with a theologically grounded tradition of loyalty to the State. During the 1920's, a movement emerged within the German Evangelical Church called the « Deutsche Christen » (« German Christians ») . The « German Christians » embraced many of the nationalistic and racial aspects of Nazi ideology. Once the Nazis came to power, this group sought the creation of a national « “ Reich ” Church » and supported a « nazified » version of Christianity.

The « Bekennende Kirche » (Confessing Church) emerged in opposition to the « German Christians » . Its founding document, the Barmen Confession of Faith, declared that the Church's allegiance was to God and scripture, not a worldly « Führer » . Both the Confessing Church and the « German Christians » remained part of the German Evangelical Church, and the result was a « Kirchenkampf » (« Church Struggle ») within German Protestantism - an on-going debate and struggle for control between those who sought a « nazified » Church, those who opposed it, and the so-called « neutral » Church leaders whose priority was the avoidance both of Church schism and any kind of conflict with the Nazi State.

The most famous members of the Confessing Church were the theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer, executed for his role in the conspiracy to overthrow the regime, and Pastor Martin Niemöller, who spent 7 years in concentration camps for his criticisms of Adolf Hitler. Yet, these clergymen were not typical of the Confessing Church ; despite their examples, the Protestant « Kirchenkampf » was mostly an internal Church matter, not a fight against National-Socialism. Even in the Confessing Church, most Church leaders were primarily concerned with blocking State and ideological interference in Church affairs. Yet, there were certainly members of the clergy and laity who opposed and resisted the regime, including some who aided and hid Jews.

The Roman Catholic Church in Nazi Germany

The Catholic Church was not as sharply divided by different ideological factions as the Protestant Church, and it never underwent an internal « Kirchenkampf » between these different factions. Catholic leaders were initially more suspicious of National-Socialism than their Protestant counter-parts. Nationalism was not as deeply embedded in the German Catholic Church, and the rabid anti-Catholicism of figures such as Alfred Rosenberg, a leading Nazi ideologue during the Nazi rise to power, raised early concerns among Catholic leaders in Germany and at the Vatican. In addition, the Catholic Centre (« Zentrum ») Party had been a key-coalition governmental partner in the Weimar Republic during the 1920's and was aligned with both the Social-Democrats and Leftist German Democratic Party, pitting it politically against Right-wing Parties like the Nazis.

Before 1933, in fact, some Bishops prohibited Catholics in their dioceses from joining the Nazi Party. This ban was dropped after Hitler's March 23, 1933, speech to the « Reichstag » in which he described Christianity as the « foundation » for German values. The Centre Party was dissolved as part of the signing of a 1933 Concordat between the Vatican and Nazi governmental representatives, and several of its leaders were murdered in the Ernst Röhm purge (the « Night of the Long Knives ») in June-July of 1934.

Summary

In both German Churches, there were members, including clergy and leading theologians, who openly supported the Nazi regime. With time, anti-Nazi sentiment grew in both Protestant and Catholic Church circles, as the Nazi regime exerted greater pressure on them. In turn, the Nazi regime saw a potential for dissent in Church criticism of State measures. When a protest statement was read from the pulpits of Confessing Churches in March 1935, for example, Nazi authorities reacted forcefully by briefly arresting over 700 pastors. After the 1937 Papal Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » (With burning concern) was read from Catholic pulpits, the « Gestapo » confiscated copies from diocesan offices throughout the country.

The general tactic by the leadership of both Protestant and Catholic Churches in Germany was caution with respect to protest and compromise with the Nazi State leadership where possible. There was criticism within both Churches of Nazi racialized ideology and notions of « Aryanism », and movements emerged in both Churches to defend Church members who were considered « non-Aryan » under Nazi racial laws (meaning Jews who had converted) . Yet, throughout this period, there was virtually no public opposition to anti-Semitism or any readiness by Church leaders to publicly oppose the regime on the issues of anti-Semitism and State-sanctioned violence against the Jews. There were individual Catholics and Protestants who spoke-out on behalf of Jews, and small groups within both Churches that became involved in rescue and resistance activities (for example, the « White Rose » and Herman Maas) .

After 1945, the silence of the Church leadership and the wide-spread complicity of « ordinary Christians » compelled leaders of both Churches to address issues of guilt and complicity during the Holocaust - a process that continues internationally to this day.

Religions sous le 3e « Reich »

In 1933, prior to the annexation of Austria into Germany, the population of Germany was approximately 67 % Protestant and 33 % Catholic ; Jews made-up less than 1 % of the population. A census in May 1939, 6 years into the Nazi era and incorporating the annexation of mostly Catholic Austria into Germany, indicates that 54 % considered themselves Protestant, 40 % Catholic, 3.5 % self-identified as « gottgläubig » (« believers in god ») , often described as predominately creationist and deistic) , and 1.5 % as non-religious.

There was some diversity of personal views among the Nazi leadership as to the future of religion in Germany. Anti-Church radicals included Adolf Hitler's Personal Secretary Martin Bormann ; Minister for Propaganda Josef Goebbels ; Neo-Pagan Nazi Philosopher Alfred Rosenberg ; and Neo-Pagan Occultist « Reichsführer-SS » Heinrich Himmler. Some Nazis, such as Hans Kerrl, who served as Hitler's Minister for Church Affairs, believed Christianity could be Nazified into « Positive Christianity » , by renouncing its Jewish origins, the Old Testament and Apostle's Creed, and holding Hitler as a new « Messiah » .

Nazism wanted to transform the subjective consciousness of the German people (their attitudes, values and mentalities) into a single-minded, obedient « national community » . The Nazis believed they would, therefore, have to replace class, religious and regional allegiances. Under the « Gleichschaltung » process, Hitler attempted to create a unified Protestant « Reich » Church from Germany's 28 existing Protestant Churches. The plan failed, and was resisted by the Confessing Church. Persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany followed the Nazi take-over. Hitler moved quickly to eliminate Political Catholicism. Amid harassment of the Church, the « Reich » Concordat treaty with the Vatican was signed in 1933, and promised to respect Church autonomy. Hitler routinely disregarded the Concordat, closing all Catholic institutions whose functions were not strictly religious. Clergy, nuns, and lay leaders were targeted, with thousands of arrests over the ensuing years. The Church accused the regime of « fundamental hostility to Christ and his Church » . Smaller religious minorities such as the Jehovah's Witnesses and Bahá'í Faith were banned in Germany, while the eradication of Judaism by the genocide of its adherents was attempted. The Salvation Army, Christian Saints and Seventh Day Adventist Church all disappeared from Germany, while astrologers, healers and fortune tellers were banned. The small pagan « German Faith Movement » , which worshipped the sun and seasons, supported the Nazis. Many historians believed that Hitler and the Nazis intended to eradicate Christianity in Germany after winning victory in the War.

Christianity has ancient roots among Germanic peoples dating to the missionary work of Columbanus and Saint-Boniface in the 6th to 8th Centuries. The Reformation, initiated by Martin Luther in 1517, divided German Christians between a majority of Protestants and a minority of Roman Catholics. The south and west remained mainly Catholic, while north and east became mainly Protestant. The Catholic Church enjoyed a degree of privilege in the Bavarian region, the Rhineland and Westphalia as well as parts in south-west Germany, while in the Protestant North, Catholics suffered some discrimination.

Chancellor Otto von Bismarck's « Kulturkampf » (Battle for Culture) of 1871-1878 had seen an attempt to assert a Protestant vision of German nationalism over Germany, and fused anti-Clericalism and suspicion of the Catholic population, whose loyalty was presumed to lie with Austria and France, rather than the new German Empire. The Centre (« Zentrum ») Party had formed in 1870, initially to represent the religious interests of Catholics and Protestants, but was transformed by the « Kulturkampf » into the « political voice of Catholics » . Bismarck's « Culture Struggle » failed in its attempt to eliminate Catholic institutions in Germany, or their strong connections outside of Germany, particularly various international missions and Rome.

Christianity in Germany has, since the Protestant Reformation, been divided into Catholicism and Protestantism. As a specific outcome of the Reformation in Germany, the large Protestant denominations are organized into « Landeskirchen » (Provincial Churches) . The German word for denomination is « Konfession » . For the large churches in Germany (Catholic ; « Evangelisch » , meaning Protestant) the German government collects the Church tax, which is then given to the Churches. For this reason, membership in the Catholic or Protestant (« Evangelische ») Church is officially registered. It is apparent they were politically motivated.

For this reason, Historian Richard Steigmann-Gall argues that :

« Nominal Church membership is a very unreliable gauge of actual piety in this context. » , and determining someone's actual religious convictions should be based on other criteria.

It is important to keep this « official aspect » in mind when turning to such questions as the religious beliefs of Adolf Hitler or Josef Goebbels. Both men had ceased to attend Catholic mass or to go to Confession long before 1933, but neither had officially left the Church and neither of them refused to pay his Church taxes.

Historians have taken a look at the numbers of people who left their church in Germany during the 1933-1945 period. The option to be taken-off the Church rolls (« Kirchenaustritt ») has existed in Germany since 1873, when Otto von Bismarck had introduced it as part of the « Kulturkampf » aimed against Catholicism. For parity, this was made possible for Protestants too, and, for the next 40 years, it was mostly they who took advantage of it. Statistics exist since 1884 for the Protestant Churches, and since 1917 for the Catholic Church.

An analysis of this data for the time of the Nazis' rule is available in a paper by Sven Granzow and al. , published in a collection edited by Götz Aly. Altogether, more Protestants than Catholics left their church, however, overall Protestants and Catholics decided similarly. The spike in the numbers from 1937-1938 is the result of the Annexation of Austria in 1938, and other territories. The number of « Kirchenaustritte » reached its « historical high » in 1939 when it peaked at 480,000. Granzow and al. see the numbers not only in relation to the Nazi policy towards the churches (which changed drastically from 1935 onwards) but also as indicator of the trust in the « Führer » and the Nazi leadership. The decline in the number of people who left the Church after 1942 is explained as resulting from a loss of confidence in the future of Nazi Germany. People tended to keep their ties to the Church, because they feared an uncertain future.

The historian Richard J Evans wrote that, by 1939, 95 % of Germans still called themselves Protestant or Catholic, while 3.5 % identified as « gottgläubig » (« believers in god » : a non-denominational nazified outlook on god beliefs, often described as predominately based on creationist and deistic views) and 1.5 % atheist. According to Evans, those members of the affiliation « gottgläubig » « were convinced Nazis who had left their Church at the behest of the Party, which had been trying since the mid-1930's to reduce the influence of Christianity in society » . Heinrich Himmler, who himself was fascinated with Germanic paganism, was a strong promoter of the « gottgläubig » movement and didn't allow atheists into the SS, arguing that their « refusal to acknowledge higher powers » would be a « potential source of indiscipline » . The majority of the 3 million Nazi Party members continued to pay their Church taxes and register as either Roman Catholic or Evangelical Protestant Christians. According to the BBC, the Salvation Army, Christian Saints and Seventh Day Adventist Church all disappeared from Germany during the Nazi era.

« Sicherheitsdienst des Reichsführers-SS » (SD members) withdrew from their Christian denominations, changing their religious affiliation to « gottgläubig » , while nearly 70 % of the officers of the « Schutzstaffel » SS did the same.

Nazi ideology could not accept an autonomous establishment whose legitimacy did not spring from the government. It desired the subordination of the Church to the State. Although the broader membership of the Nazi Party after 1933 came to include many Catholics and Protestants, aggressive anti-Church radicals like Josef Goebbels, Martin Bormann and Heinrich Himmler saw the « Kirchenkampf » campaign against the Churches as a priority concern, and anti-Church and anti-Clerical sentiments were strong among grass-roots Party activists.

The Nazi propaganda minister, Josef Goebbels, among the most aggressive anti-Church Nazis, wrote that :

« There was an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view. »

The « Führer » angered the churches by appointing Alfred Rosenberg, an outspoken pagan, as official Nazi ideologist in 1934. Heinrich Himmler, saw the main-task of his « Schutzstaffel SS » organisation to be that of acting as the vanguard in overcoming Christianity and restoring a « Germanic » way of living.

Hitler's chosen Deputy, Martin Bormann, advised Nazi officials in 1941 that :

« National-Socialism and Christianity are irreconcilable. »

Hitler himself possessed radical instincts in relation to the conflict with the Churches in Germany. Though he occasionally spoke of wanting to delay the « Church Struggle » and was prepared to restrain his anti-Clericalism out of political considerations, according to Kershaw, his « own inflammatory comments gave his immediate underlings all the license they needed to turn-up the heat in the “ Church Struggle ”, confident that they were “ working towards the ' Führer ' ” » . In public speeches, he did not portray himself and the Nazi movement to the German people as outspoken proponents of atheism, but rather as faithful Christians.

In 1928, Hitler said in a speech :

« We tolerate no one in our ranks who attacks the ideas of Christianity. In fact, our movement is Christian. »

As a measure in the struggle for power against the influence of the churches (« Kirchenkampf ») , the Nazis tried to establish a « 3rd denomination » called « Positive Christianity » , aiming to replace the established churches to reduce their influence. Historians have suspected this was an attempt to start a cult worshipping Hitler as the new « Messiah » .

However, in a diary entry of 28 December 1939, Josef Gœbbels wrote that :

« The “ Führer ” passionately rejects any thought of founding a religion. He has no intention of becoming a priest. His sole exclusive role is that of a politician. »

In Hitler's political relations dealing with religion he readily adopted a strategy « that suited his immediate political purposes » .

Christianity remained the dominant religion in Germany through the Nazi period, and its influence over Germans displeased the Nazi hierarchy. Evans wrote that Hitler believed that in the long run National-Socialism and religion would not be able to co-exist, and stressed repeatedly that Nazism was a secular ideology, founded on modern science .

He declared :

« Science would easily destroy the last remaining vestiges of superstition. »

Germany could not tolerate the intervention of foreign influences such as the Pope. He said :

During Hitler's dictatorship, more than 6,000 clergymen, on the charge of treasonable activity, were imprisoned or executed. The same measures were taken in the occupied territories ; in French Lorraine, the Nazis forbade religious youth movements, parish meetings, and scout meetings. Church assets were taken, Church schools were closed, and teachers in religious institutes were dismissed. The episcopal seminary was closed, and the SA and SS desecrated churches, religious statues and pictures. 300 clergy were expelled from the Lorraine region, monks and nuns were deported or forced to renounce their vows.

Hanns Kerrl was a relative moderate, as « Reichsminister » of Church Affairs. He described Hitler as :

« The herald of a new revelation. »

And said that :

« Nazi-backed “ Positive Christianity ” was not dependent on the Apostle's Creed or belief in Christ as the son of God. »

The Nazi leadership made use of indigenous Germanic pagan imagery and ancient Roman symbolism in their propaganda. However, the use of pagan symbolism worried some Protestants. Many Nazi leaders, including Adolf Hitler, subscribed either to a mixture of pseudo-scientific theories, particularly Social-Darwinism, or to mysticism and occultism, which was especially strong in the SS. Central to both groupings was the belief in Germanic (white Nordic) racial superiority. The existence of a Ministry of Church Affairs, instituted in 1935 and headed by Hanns Kerrl, was hardly recognized by ideologists such as Alfred Rosenberg or by other political decision-makers. A relative moderate, Kerrl accused dissident church-men of failing to appreciate the Nazi doctrine of « Race, Blood and Soil » and gave the following explanation of the Nazi conception of « Positive Christianity », telling a group of submissive clergy in 1937 :

« Doctor Wilhelm Zöllner and the Catholic Bishop of Münster, Count Galen, have tried to make clear to me that Christianity consists in faith in Christ as the son of God. That makes me laugh. No, Christianity is not dependent upon the Apostle's Creed. True Christianity is represented by the Party, and the German people are now called by the Party, and especially the “ Führer ”, to a real Christianity : the “ Führer ” is the herald of a new revelation. »

(Hans Kerrl, Nazi Minister for Church Affairs, 1937.)

During the War, Alfred Rosenberg formulated a 30 Point Program for the National « Reich » Church, which included :

The National « Reich » Church claims exclusive right and control over all Churches.

The National « Reich » Church is determined to exterminate foreign Christian faiths imported into Germany in the ill-omened year 800.

The National « Reich » Church demands immediate cessation of the publishing and dissemination of the Bible.

The National « Reich » Church will clear away from its altars all Crucifixes, Bibles and pictures of Saints.

On the altars, there must be nothing but « Mein Kampf » and, to the left of the altar, a sword.

When exploring the Nazi Party's public speeches and writings, Steigmann-Gall notes that they can provide insight into their « untempered » ideas :

« We are no theologians, no representatives of the teaching profession in this sense, put forth no theology. But we claim one thing for ourselves : that we place the great fundamental idea of Christianity in the center of our ideology (“ Ideenwelt ”) - the hero and sufferer Christ himself stands in the center. »

(Hans Schemm, Nazi « Gauleiter » .)

Prior to the « Reichstag » vote for the Enabling Act under which Hitler gained the « temporary » dictatorial powers with which he went on to permanently dismantle the Weimar Republic, Hitler promised the « Reichstag » , on 23 March 1933, that he would not interfere with the rights of the Churches. However, with power secured in Germany, Hitler quickly broke this promise. Various historians have written that the goal of the Nazi « Kirchenkampf » (« Church Struggle ») entailed not only ideological struggle, but ultimately the eradication of the Churches. However, leading Nazis varied in the importance they attached to the « Church Struggle » .

William Shirer wrote that :

« Under the leadership of Rosenberg, Bormann and Himmler, who were backed by Hitler, the Nazi regime intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, if it could, and substitute the old paganism of the early tribal Germanic gods and the new paganism of the Nazi extremists. »

But, according to Steigman-Gall, some Nazis, like Dietrich Eckart (died in 1923) and Walter Buch, saw Nazism and Christianity as part of the same movement. Aggressive anti-Church radicals like Josef Goebbels and Martin Bormann saw the conflict with the Churches as a priority concern, and anti-Church and anti-Clerical sentiments were strong among grass-roots Party activists.

Hitler himself possessed radical instincts in relation to the continuing conflict with the Catholic and Protestant Churches in Germany. Though he occasionally spoke of wanting to delay the « Church Struggle » and was prepared to restrain his anti-Clericalism out of political considerations, his « own inflammatory comments gave his immediate underlings all the license they needed to turn-up the heat in the “ Church Struggle ”, confident that they were “ working towards the ' Führer ' ” » . According to the « Gœbbels Diaries » , Hitler hated Christianity.

In an 8 April 1941 entry, Gœbbels wrote :

« He hates Christianity, because it has crippled all that is noble in humanity. »

In Bullock's assessment, though raised a Catholic, Hitler « believed neither in God nor in conscience » , retained some regard for the organisational power of Catholicism, but had contempt for its central teachings, which he said, if taken to their conclusion, « would mean the systematic cultivation of the human failure » .

Bullock wrote :

« In Hitler's eyes, Christianity was a religion fit only for slaves; he detested its ethics in particular. Its teaching, he declared, was a rebellion against the natural law of selection by struggle and the survival of the fittest.

(Extract from « Hitler : A Study in Tyranny » , by Alan Bullock.)

Writing for Yad Vashem, the historian Michæl Phayer wrote that by the latter-1930's, Church officials knew that the long-term aim of Hitler was the « total elimination of Catholicism and of the Christian religion » , but that given the prominence of Christianity in Germany, this was necessarily a long-term goal. According to Bullock, Hitler intended to destroy the influence of the Christian churches in Germany after the War. In his memoirs, Hitler's chief-architect Albert Speer recalled that when drafting his plans for the « new Berlin » , he consulted Protestant and Catholic authorities, but was « curtly informed » by Hitler's private secretary Martin Bormann that Churches were not to receive building sites. Kershaw wrote that, in Hitler's scheme for the Germanization of Eastern Europe, he made clear that there would be « no place in this utopia for the Christian Churches » .

Geoffrey Blainey wrote that Hitler and his Fascist ally Benito Mussolini were atheists, but that Hitler courted and benefited from fear among « German Christians » of militant Communist atheism. (Other historians have characterized Hitler's mature religious position as a form of deism.)

Blainey wrote :

« The aggressive spread of atheism in the Soviet Union alarmed many “ German Christians ”. »

With the National-Socialists becoming the main-opponent of Communism in Germany :

« Hitler himself saw Christianity as a temporary ally, for in his opinion “ one is either a Christian or a German ”. To be both was impossible. Nazism itself was a religion, a pagan religion, and Hitler was its high-priest. Its high-altar was Germany itself and the German people, their soil and forests and language and traditions. »

According to Kershaw, following the Nazi take-over, Race policy and the « Church Struggle » were among the most important ideological spheres :

« In both areas, the Party had no difficulty in mobilizing its activists, whose radicalism in turn forced the government into legislative action. In fact, the Party leadership often found itself compelled to respond to pressures from below, stirred-up by the “ Gauleiter ” playing their own game, or emanating sometimes from radical activists at a local level. »

As time went on, anti-Clericalism and anti-Church sentiment among grass-roots Party activists « simply couldn't be eradicated », wrote Kershaw, and they could « draw on the verbal violence of Party leaders towards the Churches for their encouragement. Unlike some other Fascist movements of the era, Nazi ideology was essentially hostile to Christianity and clashed with Christian beliefs in many respects. Nazism saw the Christian ideals of meekness and conscience as obstacles to the violent instincts required to defeat other races. From the mid-1930's, anti-Christian elements within the Nazi Party became more prominent ; however, they were restrained by Hitler because of the negative press their actions were receiving, and, by 1934, the Nazi Party pretended a neutral position in regard to the Protestant Churches.

The official Nazi philosopher Alfred Rosenberg, a proponent of « Positive Christianity » , planned the « extermination of the foreign Christian faiths imported into Germany » , and for the Bible and Christian cross to be replaced with « Mein Kampf » and the swastika.

Alfred Rosenberg, an « outspoken pagan » , held among offices the title of « the “ Führer's ” Delegate for the Entire Intellectual and Philosophical Education and Instruction for the National-Socialist Party » . In his « Myth of the 20th Century » (1930) , Rosenberg wrote that the main-enemies of the Germans were the « Russian Tartars » and « Semites » - with « Semites » including Christians, especially the Catholic Church : Josef Gœbbels, the Nazi Minister for Propaganda, was among the most aggressive anti-Church Nazi radicals.

Gœbbels led the Nazi persecution of the German clergy and, as the War progressed, he wrote on the « Church Question » :

« After the War, it has to be generally solved. There is, namely, an insoluble opposition between the Christian and a heroic-German world-view. »

Martin Bormann became Hitler's private secretary and, « de facto » , Deputy « Führer » from 1941. He was a leading advocate of the « Kirchenkampf » , a project which Hitler for the most part wished to keep until after the War.

Bormann was a rigid guardian of National-Socialist orthodoxy and saw Christianity and Nazism as « incompatible » .

In a confidential message to the « Gauleiter » , on 9 June 1941, Martin Bormann, had declared :

« National-Socialism and Christianity are irreconcilable. »

He also declared that the Churches' influence in the leadership of the people « must absolutely and finally be broken » . Bormann believed Nazism was based on a « scientific » world-view, and was completely incompatible with Christianity.

Bormann stated :

« When we National-Socialists speak of belief in God, we do not mean, like the naive Christians and their spiritual exploiters, a man-like being sitting around somewhere in the universe. The force governed by natural law by which all these countless planets move in the universe, we call omnipotence or God. The assertion that this universal force can trouble itself about the destiny of each individual being, every smallest earthly bacillus, can be influenced by so-called prayers or other surprising things, depends upon a requisite dose of naivety or else upon shameless professional self-interest. »

As the Nazi Party began its take-over of power in Germany in 1933, the struggling, but still nominally functioning Weimar government, led by its President, Paul von Hindenburg, and represented by his appointed Vice-Chancellor, Franz von Papen, initiated talks with the Holy-See concerning the establishment of a concordat. The talks lasted 3 and half months while Hitler consolidated his hold on power. This attempt achieved the signing of the « Reichskonkordat » , on 20 July 1933, which protected the freedom of the Catholic Church and restricted priests and Bishops from political activity.

Like the idea of the « Reichskonkordat » , the notion of a Protestant « Reich » Church, which would unify the Protestant Churches, also had been considered previously. Hitler had discussed the matter as early as 1927 with Ludwig Müller, who was at that time the military chaplain of Königsberg.

The Catholic Church was particularly suppressed in Poland : between 1939 and 1945, an estimated 3,000 members (18 %) of the Polish clergy, were murdered ; of these, 1,992 died in concentration camps. In the annexed territory of Reichsgau Wartheland, it was even more harsh : churches were systematically closed and most priests were either killed, imprisoned, or deported to the General Government. 80 % of the Catholic clergy and 5 Bishops of Warthegau were sent to concentration camps in 1939 ; 108 of them are regarded as blessed martyrs. Religious persecution was not confined to Poland : in Dachau concentration camp alone, 2,600 Catholic priests from 24 different countries were killed.

A number of historians maintain that the Nazis had a general covert plan, which some argue existed before the Nazis' rose to power, to destroy Christianity within the « Reich » . To what extent a plan to subordinate the Churches and limit their role in the country's life existed before the Nazi rise to power, and exactly who among the Nazi leadership supported such a move remains contested. However, a minority of historians maintain, against consensus, no such plan existed. Summarizing a 1945 Office of Strategic Services report, « The New York Times » columnist Joe Sharkey stated that the Nazis had a plan to « subvert and destroy German Christianity », which was to be accomplished through control and subversion of the Churches and to be completed after the War. However, the report stated this goal was limited to a « sector of the National-Socialist Party », namely Alfred Rosenberg and Baldur von Schirach.

Historian Roger Griffin maintains :

« There is no doubt that, in the long run, Nazi leaders such as Hitler and Himmler intended to eradicate Christianity just as ruthlessly as any other rival ideology, even if in the short term they had to be content to make compromises with it. »

In his study « The Holy “ Reich ” », the historian Richard Steigmann-Gall comes to the opposite conclusion :

« Totally absent, besides Hitler's vague ranting, is any firm evidence that Hitler or the Nazis were going to “ destroy ” or “ eliminate ” the Churches once the War was over. »

Regarding his wider thesis that, « leading Nazis in fact considered themselves Christian » or at least understood their movement « within a Christian frame of reference », Steigmann-Gall admits he « argues against the consensus that Nazism, as a whole, was either unrelated to Christianity or actively opposed to it » .

Although there are high-profile cases of individual Lutherans and Catholics who died in prison or in concentration camps, the largest number of Christians who died would have been Jewish Christians or « Mischlinge » who were sent to death camps for their race rather than their religion. In 1999, Kahane cites an estimate that there were approximately 200,000 Christians of Jewish descent in Nazi Germany. Among the Gentile Christians, 11,300 Jehovah's Witnesses were placed in camps, and about 1,490 died, of whom 270 were executed as conscientious objectors. Dachau had a special « priest block » . Of the 2,720 priests (among them, 2,579 Catholic) held in Dachau, 1,034 did not survive the camp. The majority of these priests were Polish (1,780) , of whom 868 died in Dachau.

During the First and Second World War, German Protestant leaders used the writings of Martin Luther to support the cause of German nationalism. At the 450th anniversary of Luther's birth, which took place only a few months after the Nazi Party began its seizure of power in 1933, there were celebrations conducted on a large scale both by the Protestant Churches and the Nazi Party. At a celebration at Königsberg, Erich Koch, at that time « Gauleiter » of East Prussia, made a speech which, among other things, compared Adolf Hitler and Martin Luther and claimed that the Nazis fought with Luther's spirit.

Such a speech might be dismissed as mere propaganda, but, as Steigmann-Gall points-out :

« Contemporaries regarded Koch as a “ bona fide ” Christian who had attained his position of the elected president of a provincial Church synod through a genuine commitment to Protestantism and its institutions. »

Even so, Steigmann-Gail states that the Nazis were not a Christian movement.

The prominent Protestant theologian Karl Barth, of the Swiss Reformed, opposed this appropriation of Luther in the German Empire and Nazi Germany, when he stated in 1939 that the writings of Martin Luther were used by the Nazis to glorify the State and state absolutism :

« The German people suffer under his error of the relation between Law and Bible, between secular and spiritual power » , in which Luther divided the temporal State from the inward focusing spiritual, thus, limiting the ability of the individual or the Church to question the actions of the State, which was seen as a God ordained instrument.

In February 1940, Barth accused German Lutherans specifically of separating Biblical teachings from its teachings of the State and, thus, legitimizing the Nazi State ideology. He was not alone with his view. A few years earlier, on 5 October 1933, Pastor Wilhelm Rehm from Reutlingen declared publicly that « Hitler would not have been possible without Martin Luther » , though many have also made this same statement about other influences in Hitler's rise to power.

Anti-Communist historian Paul Johnson has said :

« Without Lenin, Hitler would not have been possible. »

Different German States possessed regional social variations as to class densities and religious denomination. Richard Steigmann-Gall alleges a linkage between several Protestant Churches and Nazism. The « German Christians » (« Deutsche Christen ») were a movement within the Protestant Church of Germany with the aim of changing traditional Christian teachings to align with the ideology of National-Socialism and its anti-Jewish policies. The « Deutsche Christen » factions were united in the goal of establishing a National-Socialist Protestantism and abolishing what they considered to be Jewish traditions in Christianity, and some but not all rejected the Old Testament and the teaching of the Apostle Paul. In November 1933, A Protestant mass rally of the « Deutsche Christen » , which brought together a record 20,000 people, passed 3 resolutions :

Adolf Hitler is the completion of the Reformation.

Baptized Jews are to be dismissed from the Church.

The Old Testament is to be excluded from Sacred Scriptures.

The « German Christians » selected Ludwig Müller (1883-1945) as their candidate for « Reich » Bishop in 1933. In response to Hitler's campaigning, 2/3 of those Protestants who voted elected Ludwig Müller, a neo-Pagan candidate, to govern the Protestant Churches. Müller was convinced that he had a divine responsibility to promote Hitler and his ideals, and, together with Hitler, he favoured a unified « Reichskirche » of Protestants and Catholics. This « Reichskirche » was to be a loose federation in the form of a council, but subordinated to the National-Socialist State.

The level of ties between Nazism and the Protestant Churches has been a contentious issue for decades. One difficulty is that Protestantism includes a number of religious bodies many of whom had little relation to each other. Added to that, Protestantism tends to allow more variation among individual congregations than Catholicism or Eastern Orthodox Christianity, which makes statements about « official positions » of denominations problematic. The « German Christians » were a minority within the Protestant population, numbering 1/3 to 1/4 of the 40 million Protestants in Germany. With Bishop Müller's efforts and Hitler's support « The German Evangelical Church » was formed and recognized by the State as a legal entity on 14 July 1933, with the aim of melting State, People and Church into one single body. Dissenters were silenced by expulsion or violence.

The support of the « German Christian » movement within the churches was opposed by many adherents of traditional Christian teachings. Other groups within the Protestant Church included members of the Confessing Church, prominent members of the « Bekennende Kirche » (« Confessing Church »), included Martin Niemöller and Dietrich Bonhoeffer; both rejected the Nazi efforts to meld « völkisch » principles with traditional Lutheran doctrine. Martin Niemöller organized the Pastors' Emergency League which was supported by nearly 40 % of the Evangelical pastors. They were, however (as of 1932), in the minority within the Protestant Church bodies in Germany. But, in 1933, a number of « Deutsche Christen » left the movement after a November speech by Reinhold Krause that urged, among other things, the rejection of the Old Testament as Jewish superstition. So, when Ludwig Müller could not deliver on conforming all Christians to National-Socialism, and after some of the « German Christian » rallies and more radical ideas generated a back-lash, Hitler's condescending attitudes toward Protestants increased and he lost all interest in Protestant church affairs.

The resistance within the Churches to Nazi ideology was the longest lasting and most bitter of any German institution. The Nazis weakened the Churches' resistance from within but the Nazis had not yet succeeded in taking full-control of the Churches, evidenced by the thousands of clergy sent to concentration camps. Reverend Martin Niemöller was imprisoned in 1937, charged with « misuse of the pulpit to vilify the State and the Party and attack the authority of the Government ». After a failed assassination on Hitler's life, in 1943, by members of the military and members of the German Resistance movement, of which Dietrich Bonhoeffer and others in the « Confessing Church » movement belonged to, Hitler ordered the arrest of Protestant, mainly Lutheran clergy. However, even the « “ Confessing Church ” made frequent declarations of loyalty to Hitler ». But later, many Protestants were solidly opposed to Nazism after the nature of the movement was better understood but a number also maintained until the end of the War that Nazism was compatible with the Church.

The small Methodist population at times was deemed foreign; this stemmed from the fact that Methodism began in England, while it did not develop in Germany until the 19th Century with Christoph Gottlob Müller and Louis Jacoby. Because of this history, they felt the urge to be « more German than the Germans » to avoid suspicion. Methodist Bishop John L. Nelsen toured the U.S. on Hitler's behalf to protect his Church, but in private letters indicated that he feared and hated Nazism, and so, retired by flying to Switzerland. Methodist Bishop F. H. Otto Melle took a far more collaborationist position that included apparently sincere support for Nazism. He was also committed to an asylum near the War's end. To show his gratitude to the latter Bishop, Hitler made a gift of 10,000 « Reichsmarks » in 1939 to a Methodist congregation to purchase an organ. The money was never used. Outside of Germany, Melle's views were overwhelmingly rejected by most Methodists. The leader of pro-Nazi segment of Baptists was Paul Schmidt. The idea of a « national church » was possible in the history of main-stream German Protestantism, but National Churches devoted primarily to the State were generally forbidden among the Anabaptists, Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Catholic Church. The forms or off-shoots of Protestantism that advocated pacifism, anti-nationalism, or racial equality tended to oppose the Nazi State in the strongest terms. Prominent Protestant, or Protestant off-shoot, groups known for their efforts against Nazism include the Jehovah's Witnesses.

The nature of the Nazi Party's relations with the Catholic Church was also complicated. As Hitler rose to power, many Catholic Bishops, priests, religious and lay leaders vociferously opposed Nazism on the grounds of its incompatibility with Christian morals. In early 1931, the German Bishops issued an edict excommunicating all leaders of the Nazi Party and banned Catholics from membership. The ban was conditionally modified in 1933 when State law mandated all Trade-Union workers and Civil Servants must be members of the Nazi Party. In July 1933, a « Reichskonkordat » was signed with the Vatican which prevented political activity by the Church in Germany ; however, the Vatican continued to speak-out on issues of faith and morals opposing Nazi philosophy. In 1937, Pope Pius XI issued the Encyclical « Mit brennender Sorge » condemning Nazi ideology, notably the « Gleichschaltung » policy directed against religious influence upon education, as well as Nazi racism and anti-Semitism. His death prevented the issuing of a planned Encyclical « Humani generis unitas » , but the similar « Summi Pontificatus » was the 1st Encyclical released by his successor (Pius XII) , in October 1939. This Encyclical strongly condemned both racism and totalitarianism, without the anti-Judaism present in the draft presented to Pope Pius XI for « Humani generis unitas » . The massive Catholic opposition to the euthanasia programs led them to be quieted on 28 August 1941 (according to Spielvogel, on pages 257-258) . Catholics, on occasion, actively and openly protested Nazi anti-Semitism through several Bishops and priests such as Bishop Clemens von Galen of Münster. In Nazi Germany, political dissenters were imprisoned, and some German priests were sent to the concentration camps for their opposition, including the pastor of Berlin's Catholic Cathedral Bernhard Lichtenberg and the seminarian Karl Leisner.

Criticism arose that the Vatican headed by Pope Pius XI and Pope Pius XII had remained circumspect about the national-scale race hatred before 1937 (« Mit brennender Sorge ») . In 1937, just before the publishing of the anti-Nazi Encyclical, Eugenio Cardinal Pacelli in Lourdes (France) condemned discrimination against Jews and the neo-Paganism of the Nazi regime. A statement by Pius XI, on 8 September 1938, spoke of the « inadmissibility » of anti-Semitism, but Pius XII is criticized by people like John Cornwell for being unspecific.

In 1941 the Nazi authorities decreed the dissolution of all monasteries and abbeys in the German « Reich » , many of them effectively being occupied and secularized by the « Allgemeine SS » under Heinrich Himmler. However, on 30

July 1941, the « Aktion Klostersturm » (Operation Monastery) was put to an end by a decree of Hitler, who feared the increasing protests by the Catholic part of German population might result in passive rebellions and, thereby, harm the Nazi War effort at the eastern front.

Historian Heinz Hürten (professor « emeritus » at the Catholic University of Eichstätt) noted that the Nazi Party had plans for the Roman Catholic Church, according to which the Church was supposed to « eat from the hands of the government » . The sequence of these plans, he states, follow this sequence : an abolition of the priestly celibacy and a nationalisation of all Church property, the dissolution of monastic religious institutes, and an end to the influence of the Catholic Church upon education. Hütten states that Hitler proposed to reduce vocations to the priesthood by forbidding seminaries from receiving applicants before their 25th birthdays, and, thus, had hoped that these men would marry beforehand, during the time (18-25 years) in which they were obliged to work in military or labour service. Also, along with this process, the Church's sacraments would be revised and changed to so-called « Lebensfeiern » , the non-Christian celebrations of different periods of life.

There existed some considerable differences among officials within the Nazi Party on the question of Christianity. Josef Goebbels is purported to have feared the creation of a 3rd front of Catholics against their regime in Germany itself. In his diary, Goebbels wrote about the « traitors of the Black International who again stabbed our glorious government in the back by their criticism » , by which Hütten states meant the indirectly or actively resisting Catholic clergymen « who wore black cassocks » .

Hitler called a truce in the Church conflict with the outbreak of War, wanting to back-away from policies likely to cause internal friction in Germany. He decreed at the outset of War that « no further action should be taken against the Evangelical and Catholic Churches for the duration of the War » .

According to John Conway :

« The Nazis had to reckon with the fact that, despite all Rosenberg's efforts, only 5 % of the population registered themselves at the 1930 census as no longer connected with Christian Churches. »

The support of millions of « German Christians » was needed in order for Hitler's plans to come to fruition. It was Hitler's belief that if religion is a help, « it can only be an advantage » . Most of the 3 million Nazi Party members « still paid the Church taxes » and considered themselves Christians. Regardless, a number of Nazi radicals in the hierarchy determined that the « Church Struggle » should be continued. Following victory in Poland, the repression of the Churches was extended, despite their early protestations of loyalty to the cause.

Goebbels' Ministry of Propaganda issued threats and applied intense pressure on the Churches to voice support for the War, and the « Gestapo » banned Church meetings for a few weeks. In the 1st few months of the War, the German Churches complied. No denunciations of the invasion of Poland, nor the « Blitzkrieg » were issued. On the contrary, Bishop Marahrens gave thanks to God that the Polish conflict was over, and « that He has granted our armies a quick victory » . The Ministry for Church Affairs suggested Church bells across Germany ring for a week in celebration, and pastors and priests « flocked to volunteer as chaplains » for the German forces.

The Catholic Bishops asked their followers to support the War effort :

« We appeal to the faithful to join in ardent prayer that God's providence may lead this War to blessed success for Fatherland and people. »

Likewise, the Evangelicals proclaimed :

« We unite in this hour with our people in intercession for our “ Führer ” and “ Reich ”, for all the armed forces, and for all who do their duty for the fatherland. »

Even in the face of evidence of Nazi atrocities against Catholic priests and lay people in Poland, which were broadcast on Vatican Radio, German Catholic religious leaders continued their support of the Nazi War effort. They urged their Catholic followers to « fulfill their duty to the “ Führer ” ». Nazi War actions, in 1940 and 1941, similarly prompted the Church to voice its support. The Bishops declared that the Church « assents to the just War, especially one designed for the safe-guarding to the State and the People » and wanted a « peace beneficial to Germany and Europe » and called the faithful to « fulfill their civil and military virtues ». But the Nazis strongly disapproved of the sentiments against War expressed by the Pope through his 1st Encyclical, « Summi Pontificatus » and his 1939 Christmas message, and were angry at his support for Poland and the « provocative » use of Vatican Radio by Cardinal Hlond of Poland. Distribution of the Encyclical was banned.

Conway wrote that anti-Church radical Reinhard Heydrich estimated in a report to Hitler of October 1939, that the majority of Church people were supporting the War effort - though a few « well-known agitators among the pastors needed to be dealt with ». Heydrich determined that support from Church leaders could not be expected because of the nature of their doctrines and internationalism, so, he devised measures to restrict the operation of the Churches under cover of War-time exigencies, such as reducing resources available to Church presses on the basis of rationing, and prohibiting pilgrimages and large church gatherings on the basis of transportation difficulties. Churches were closed for being « too far from bomb shelters ». Bells were melted-down. Presses were closed.

With the expansion of the War in the East from 1941, there came also an expansion of the regime's attack on the Churches. Monasteries and convents were targeted and expropriation of Church properties surged. The Nazi authorities claimed that the properties were needed for War-time necessities such as hospitals, or accommodation for refugees or children, but, in fact, used them for their own purposes. « Hostility to the State » was another common-cause give for the confiscations, and the action of a single member of a monastery could result in seizure of the whole. The Jesuits were especially targeted. The Papal Nuncio Cesare Orsenigo and Cardinal Bertram complained constantly to the authorities but were told to expect more requisitions owing to War-time needs.

Rather than focusing on religious differentiation, Hitler maintained it was important to promote « an anti-Semitism of reason », one that acknowledged the racial basis of Jewry. Interviews with Nazis by other historians show that the Nazis thought that their views were rooted in biology, not historical prejudices.

For example :

« S. became a missionary for this bio-medical vision. As for anti-Semitic attitudes and actions, he insisted that “ the racial question and resentment of the Jewish race had nothing to do with medieval anti-Semitism.” That is, it was all a matter of scientific biology and of community. »

In his history of Christianity, Geoffrey Blainey wrote :

« Christianity could not escape some indirect blame for the terrible Holocaust. The Jews and Christians had been rivals and sometimes enemies for a long period of history. Furthermore, it was traditional for Christians to blame Jewish leaders for the crucifixion of Christ. »

But Blainey noted :

« At the same time, Christians showed devotion and respect. They were conscious of their debt to the Jews. Jesus and all the disciples and all the authors of his Gospels were of the Jewish race. Christians viewed the Old Testament, the Holy Book of the synagogues as equally a Holy Book for them. »

Laurence Rees noted that « emphasis on Christianity » was absent from the vision expressed by Hitler in « Mein Kampf » and his « bleak and violent vision » and visceral hatred of the Jews had been influenced by quite different sources : the notion of life as struggle he drew from Social Darwinism, the notion of the superiority of the « Aryan race » he drew from Arthur de Gobineau's « The Inequality of the Human Races » ; and, from Alfred Rosenberg, he took the idea of a link between Judaism and Bolshevism. Hitler espoused a ruthless policy of « negative eugenic selection » , believing that world history consisted of a struggle for survival between races, in which the Jews plotted to undermine the Germans, and inferior groups like Slavs and defective individuals in the German gene pool, threatened the Aryan « Master race » . Richard J. Evans wrote that his views on these subjects have often been called « Social Darwinist » , but that there is little agreement among historians as to what the term may mean.

According to Evans :

« Hitler used his own version of the language of Social Darwinism as a central element in the discursive practice of extermination. »

The language of Social Darwinism, in its Nazi variant, helped to remove all restraint from the directors of the « terroristic and exterminatory » policies of the regime, by « persuading them that what they were doing was justified by history, science and nature » .

In the « Appendix of The Nazi Persecution of the Churches » , Conway has included a document : « List of sects prohibited by the “ Gestapo ” up to December 1938 » . It mentions the « International Jehovah's Witness » under No. 1, but also includes a so-called « Study group for Psychic Research » and even the « Bahai Sect » .

Astrologers, healers and fortune-tellers were banned under the Nazis, while the small pagan « German Faith Movement » , which worshipped the sun and seasons, supported the Nazis.

On 13 October 1933, Deputy « Führer » Rudolf Heß issued a decree stating :

« No National-Socialist may suffer any detriment on the ground that he does not profess any particular faith or confession, or on the ground that he does not make any religious profession at all. »

However, the regime strongly opposed « godless Communism » and all of Germany's free-thinking (« freigeist ») , atheist, and largely Left-wing organizations were banned the same year.

In a speech made during the negotiations for the Nazi-Vatican Concordant of 1933, Hitler argued against secular schools, stating :

« Secular schools can never be tolerated because such schools have no religious instruction, and a general moral instruction without a religious foundation is built on air ; consequently, all character training and religion must be derived from faith. »

One of the groups closed-down by the Nazi regime was the German Free-thinkers League. Christians appealed to Hitler to end anti-religious and anti-Church propaganda promulgated by Free-Thinkers, and within Hitler's Nazi Party, some atheists were quite vocal in their anti-Christian views, especially Martin Bormann. Heinrich Himmler, who himself was fascinated with Germanic paganism, was a strong promoter of the « gottgläubig » movement and didn't allow atheists into the SS, arguing that their « refusal to acknowledge higher-powers » would be a « potential source of indiscipline » .

In the 1930's, there already existed an esoteric scene in Germany and Austria. The organisations of this spectrum were suppressed, but, unlike Free-Masonry in Nazi Germany, not persecuted. The only secure case in which an occultist might have been sent to a concentration camp for his beliefs is that of Friedrich Bernhard Marby.

Also, some Nazi leaders had an interest in esotericism. Rudolf Heß had an interest in Anthroposophy. Heinrich Himmler showed a strong interest in esoteric matters.

The esoteric Thule Society lent support to the German Workers' Party, which was eventually transformed into the Nazi Party in 1920. Dietrich Eckart, a remote associate of the Thule Society, actually coached Hitler on his public speaking skills, and while Hitler has not been shown to have been a member of Thule, he received support from the group. Hitler later-on dedicated the 2nd volume of « Mein Kampf » to Eckart. The racist-occult doctrines of Ariosophy contributed to the atmosphere of the « völkisch » movement in the Weimar Republic that eventually led to rise of Nazism.

Several elements of Nazism were quasi-religious in nature. The cult around Hitler as the « Führer », the « huge congregations, banners, sacred flames, processions, a style of popular and radical preachings, prayers-and-responses, memorials and funeral marches » have been described by historian of Esotericism, Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, as « essential props for the cult of race and nation, the mission of Aryan Germany and victory over her enemies ». These kinds of religious aspects of Nazism have led some scholars to consider Nazism, like Communism, a kind of political religion.

Hitler's plans, for example, to erect a magnificent new capital at Berlin (« Welthauptstadt Germania »), has been described as attempting to build a version of the New Jerusalem. Since Fritz Stern's Classical study « The Politics of Cultural Despair », most historians have viewed the relation of Nazism and religion in this way. Some historians see the Nazi movement and Adolf Hitler as fundamentally hostile to Christianity, though not irreligious. In the 1st Chapter of « The Nazi Persecution of the Churches », historian John S. Conway elaborates that Christian Churches in Germany had lost their appeal in the time of the Weimar Republic, and that Hitler offered « what appeared to be a vital secular faith in place of the discredited creeds of Christianity ».

Hitler's chief-architect, Albert Speer, wrote in his memoirs that Hitler himself had a negative view toward the mystical notions pushed by Heinrich Himmler and Alfred Rosenberg.

Speer quotes Hitler as having said of Himmler's attempt to mythologize the SS :

« What non-sense ! Here we have at last reached an age that has left all mysticism behind it, and now, Himmler wants to start that all over again. We might just as well have stayed with the Church. At least, it had tradition. To think that I may some day be turned into an SS saint ! Can you imagine it ? I would turn over in my grave. »

(Adolf Hitler quoted in Albert Speer's « Inside the 3rd Reich » .)

Scholar of Fascism, Stanley Payne, notes that fundamental to Fascism was the foundation of a purely materialistic « civic religion » that would « displace preceding structures of belief and relegate super-natural religion to a secondary role, or to none at all », and that « though there were specific examples of religious or would-be “ Christian Fascists ”, Fascism pre-supposed a post-Christian, post-religious, secular, and immanent frame of reference ». One theory is that religion and Fascism could never have a lasting connection because both are a « holistic “ weltanschauung ” » claiming the whole of the person. Along these lines, Yale political scientist Juan Linz and others have noted that secularization had created a void which could be filled by another total ideology, making secular totalitarianism possible, and Roger Griffin has characterized Fascism as a type of anti-religious political religion.

However, Robert Paxton finds that « Fascists often cursed materialist secularism » and adds that the circumstances of past Fascism does not mean that future Fascisms can not « build upon a religion in place of a nation, or as the expression of national identity. Even in Europe, religion-based Fascisms were not unknown : the Falange Española, Belgian Rexism, the Finnish Lapua Movement, and the Romanian Legion of the Archangel Michael are all good examples » . Separately, Richard L. Rubenstein maintains that the religious dimensions of the Holocaust and Nazi Fascism were decidedly unique.

There has been significant literature on the potential religious aspects of Nazism. Wilfried Daim suggests Hitler and the Nazi leadership planned to replace Christianity in Germany with a new religion in which Hitler would be considered a « Messiah » . In his book on the connection between Lanz von Liebenfels and Hitler, Daim published a reprint of an alleged document of a session on « the unconditional abolishment of all religious commitments (“ Religionsbekenntnisse ”) after the final victory (“ Endsieg ”) with a simultaneous proclamation of Adolf Hitler as the new “ Messiah ” » . This session report came from a private collection.

Alban Schachleiter

The Roman Catholic Benedictine monk and musicologist Alban Schachleiter was born on 20 January 1861 in Mainz and died on 20 June 1937 in Feilnbach, Upper-Bavaria. He was closely associated with the Nazis, and with Adolf Hitler personally.

Schachleiter Ist became closely associated with the NSDAP, and with Hitler, in late-1922. Originally from Mainz, he served as the long-time abbot of the Emmaus monastery in Prague before being forced-out of that position in late-1918 following the establishment of the new Czechoslovak State. After brief stays at several Austrian monasteries, including Saint-Florian near Linz, by early 1920, he was at Munich's Saint-Boniface's Abbey. By September 1922, he was noticed for the radicalism of his anti-Semitic agitation and his involvement with groups like the « völkisch » « Bund Bayern und Reich » . He cultivated connections with members of Munich's Catholic elite, including Karl Alexander von Müller, professor of history at the University of Munich and Helene Raff, whose father was the composer Joachim Raff. With Müller, he discussed politics and Gregorian chant. Through these connections, he first met Hitler in late-1922 ; the pair were observed by both Müller and Ernst Hanfstängl engaging in lively and lengthy conversation. It was the beginning of a relationship that ended only with Schachleiter's death, in 1937. The meeting opened the way for Schachleiter to play an important propagandist role on behalf of the NSDAP in the summer of 1923.

Following the commemorative activities of 10 June 1923, which included a massive rally in honour of Albert Leo Schlageter, staged on Munich's « Königplatz » and attended by 20,000 to 30,000 activists - a Catholic memorial mass was held immediately after the rally in Saint-Boniface Abbey, organized exclusively by the NSDAP which was presided over by Schachleiter. Hanfstängl had sketched-out for Hitler the symbolic impact a related Catholic-Nazi mass for Schlageter would have on Munich's Catholic population - Schachleiter could also consecrate the standards of the SA. Hitler quickly agreed. Schachleiter delivered a eulogistic sermon that was remembered as having a powerful impact - a young and devoutly pious Heinrich Himmler joined the NSDAP in the wake of Schachleiter's eulogy.

1 year later however, Schachleiter was writing to Oswald Spengler lamenting the impact of Erich Ludendorff and his anti-Catholic followers on the movement - following the refounding of the NSDAP in early-1925, the stronghold of the Nazi movement in Bavaria would no longer be Munich but rather the Protestant regions of Mittel- and Oberfranken. Schachleiter increasingly distanced himself from the NSDAP in the mid-1920's, although he maintained an idealized image of Hitler personally.

Schachleiter continued for years to be angry at Ludendorff's anti-Catholic crusade following the « Putsch » of November 1923 - after maintaining his weekly « Schola Gregoriana » at the « Allerheiligen-Hofkirche » in Munich until 1930, he then moved to a newly-built country-house in Bad Feilnbach where he was still living when Hitler came to power in 1933.

In late-spring, Schachleiter wrote to Cardinal Faulhaber :

« It seems to me to be a catastrophe that the Holy Church stands aloof from the new freedom movement, whose triumph I foresaw, and that the massive uprising of the “ volk ”, which is now lifting our poor fatherland out of its misery and shame, may well go down in history as a triumph of Protestantism. »

Faulhaber forbade Schachleiter from performing masses within the archdiocese, and Schachleiter reluctantly refused Hitler's request for him to come to Berlin, on 20 March 1933, to perform a personal mass for the « Führer » . Hitler visited in mid-May to personally congratulate Schachleiter on his 50th anniversary as a Benedictine. His invitation to sit among the Nazi dignitaries at the Nuremberg Party rally, in 1934, which he accepted, (and an enduring image through Leni Riefenstahl's « Triumph of the Will ») , showed him « on the sidelines as the Nazis' striking, yet, thoroughly secularized, performative æsthetic played-out before him » .

From 1933 to 1936, Schachleiter spent much energy campaigning against what he saw as peripheral Nazi personalities directing the Nazis in an anti-Catholic and anti-Christian direction - and, particularly, the ideology advanced by Alfred Rosenberg. Schachleiter regarded this as a restraint on a renewal of wide-ranging Catholic support for the NSDAP. Schachleiter eventually wrote more than 2 dozen appeals to a variety of Nazi officials, including Hans Lammers, but was ignored. In September 1936, he admitted privately to a friend that, « a believing Christian can no longer participate in the NSDAP ; they do not want believing Christians in the Party » . Publicly, he continued to profess loyalty to the « Führer » and to the church.

Following his death, in June 1937 the Nazis ordered a State funeral arranged by Bavarian minister-president Ludwig Siebert. 1 year later, the editorial leadership of the « Völkischen Beobachter » refused attempts to publish official commemorations. According to historian Derek Hastings, by 1937, Schachleiter's vision of a renewed Catholic-Nazi synthesis had become increasingly marginal.

Albanus Schachleiter OSB (auch Alban Schachleiter ; eigentlicher Name Jakob Schachleiter ; geboren 20. Januar 1861 in Mainz ; gestorben 20. Juni 1937 in Feilnbach, Oberbayern) war ein deutscher Abt des Prager Emausklosters. Er war einer der wenigen katholischen Geistlichen, die schon vor Hitlers Machtantritt 1933 Kontakte zur nationalsozialistischen Bewegung unterhielten.

Nach dem Studium der Philosophie, Kunstgeschichte und Musik an der Universität Leipzig trat Schachleiter 1881 in die Benediktiner-Abtei Emaus in Prag ein, die von der Beuronener Kongregation besiedelt war. 1883 legte er die Ordensgelübde ab, 1886 wurde er zum Priester geweiht. Von Anfang an war er ein Förderer des klösterlichen Musiklebens. Auf seine Initiative wurde eine große Orgel gebaut und Konzerte mit namhaften Musikern veranstaltet. Seine wichtigste Aktivität war jedoch der Kampf gegen die antikatholische Los-von-Rom-Bewegung. Deshalb initiierte er die Gründung des Bonifatius-Vereins, mit dem die religiöse Bildung breiter Bevölkerungsschichten gefördert werden sollte. Als Verteidiger des katholischen Glaubens trat er, zusammen mit dem späteren Leitmeritzer Bischof Josef Groß, vor allem gegen Freidenker und Freimaurer auf. 1906 verlieh ihm Papst Pius X. eine silberne Medaille.

Nach dem Tod des Abtes Benedikt Sauter 1908 wurde Alban Schachleiter zu dessen Nachfolger gewählt. Nachfolgend entwickelte sich das Kloster sowohl zu einem geistlichen als auch zu einem politischen Zentrum. Zum Thronfolger Franz Ferdinand d'Este, der ebenfalls scharf gegen die Los-von-Rom-Bewegung auftrat, hatte Schachleiter ein vertrauensvolles Verhältnis. Beide bemühten sich um mehr Einfluß für den Katholizismus und hielten das Deutschtum für ein verbindendes Element Österreichs. Nach Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkriegs 1914 richtete Schachleiter eine Suppen- und Armenküche sowie ein Lazarett in den Klosterräumen ein. Zudem wurden jüngere Ordensangehörige als Sanitätshelfer des Kaiserlich und Königlich Krankenzuges PK 45 eingesetzt, der aus sechzehn Krankenwagen bestand, die zu allen Kriegsschauplätzen führten.

Nach dem Auseinanderbrechen der Kaiserlich und Königlich Monarchie und der Gründung der Tschechoslowakei 1918 mußten die deutschen Beuroner Benediktiner 1919 Prag verlassen. Alban Schachleiter wurde wegen seiner deutschnationalen Gesinnung ausgewiesen. Danach hielt er sich im Stift Sankt Florian in Oberösterreich und in Sankt Bonifaz in München auf, wo er Leiter der Schola Gregoriana für katholische Kirchenmusik wurde. Erst 1924 resignierte er auf das Amt des Abtes des Emmausklosters, erhielt jedoch die Würde eines Titularabts von Spanheim.

Bereits im Jahre 1923 begegnete Schachleiter in der Wohnung des Historikers Karl Alexander von Müller Adolf Hitler. Die Kirchenleitung belegte Schachleiters militant nationalistische Haltung und sein Bekenntnis zum Nationalsozialismus 1926 mit einem Verbot öffentlicher politischer Äußerungen und der Weisung, eine klösterliche Wohnung zu beziehen. Beides ignorierte er. Als er im Völkischen Beobachter vom 1. Februar 1933 schließlich Adolf Hitlers Machtergreifung begrüßte, wurde er im März 1933 suspendiert sowie aus allen diözesanen Ehrenämtern ausgeschlossen. Die NSDAP unterstützte ihn daraufhin mit einer monatlichen Rente ; Hitler selbst besuchte ihn am 13. Mai 1933. Nach Schachleiters scheinbarer Unterwerfung hob der Vatikan die Suspension im September 1933 auf. Dennoch war er 1934 und 1935 Ehrengast bei den Nürnberger NSDAP-Parteitag - trotz römischer Proteste gegen seine politische Stellungnahme. Zu seinem 75. Geburtstag 1936 erhielt er vom Führer ein Glückwunschtelegramm, und die Universität München verlieh ihm die Ehrendoktorwürde für « Choralpflege und Deutschtum » .

Schachleiter starb am 20. Juni 1937 in Feilnbach. Er wurde am Waldfriedhof in München mit einem Staatsakt beigesetzt, an dem Hitlers Stellvertreter Rudolf Heß teilnahm. Auf dem Sarg lag eine Nazi-Flagge mit dem Hakenkreuz. Die Anwesenden wurden zum Nazigruß gezwungen. Obwohl acht Benediktineräbte anwesend waren, wurden keine Reden gehalten. Sein Nachfolger Arnošt Vykoukal ließ im Prager Emauskloster ein Requiem zelebrieren. Das Grab auf dem Münchner Waldfriedhof wurde nach einer Kontroverse 1987 eingeebnet.

Heinrich Himmler et la religion

Pour Heinrich Himmler, les membres de la SS doivent être des croyants : pour lui, comme il le déclare en 1943, il croit en l'existence d'une force infinie au-dessus de l'humanité, force à laquelle il donne le nom de « Waralda » , désignant l'Ancien dans la mythologie germanique, qu'il souhaite honorer. Cependant, les croyances que doivent avoir ses subordonnés restent vagues, centrées autour du culte des ancêtres, garant de la fécondité du peuple.

Fasciné par le panthéon germanique et viking, sous l'influence de Karl Wiligut dans ce domaine (ce dernier se montrait partisan de la mise en place d'une religion germanique destinée à se substituer au christianisme) , il s'intéresse cependant aux représentations d'Odin et de certains de ses attributs, comme les éclairs, qu'il analyse comme la preuve matérielle d'une maîtrise importante de l'électricité et d'une technologie militaire avancée : pour étayer cette croyance, il ordonne des recherches dans les représentations germaniques à sa disposition.

Mais il sait se montrer pragmatique au gré des circonstances. Ainsi, lors de la création d'une unité SS composée de soldats musulmans, non seulement il accepte la présence d'un imam, mais il salue en l'Islam une « religion sympathique et pratique pour les soldats », car elle promet le paradis aux soldats qui se sont vaillamment comportés.

Pour les populations soumises au joug du « Reich », il a aussi des idées sur les religions dont il considère qu'il faut encourager le développement : en juillet 1944, dans une lettre à Ernst Kaltenbrunner, il ordonne inutilement du fait de la perte des territoires sur lesquels ces mesures étaient censées s'appliquer) à ce dernier de développer l'enseignement du Bouddhisme chez les peuples turcs et la religiosité des témoins de Jéhovah chez les peuples slaves. Cependant, à l'égard de ces derniers, Himmler développe des sentiments ambivalents : il les fait pourchasser, déporter, mais ne peut s'empêcher de les admirer : en effet, pour ce dernier, ils ont des convictions pacifistes très ancrées, qui s'incarnent dans une farouche volonté de résistance aux idéaux nazis et aux mesures que le « Reich » a pris à leur encontre, volonté de résistance, certes taxée de fanatisme, mais qu'il aimerait bien voir étendue au peuple allemand.

Bien qu'issu d'une famille catholique, Himmler devient, au fil de sa conversion au National-Socialisme, un adversaire acharné du christianisme. Peter Longerich, dans sa biographie du chef des SS, décrit en détail les multiples raisons de cette haine que Himmler théorisa dans de nombreux discours et écrits. D'un point de vue personnel, Himmler rejette avec violence la morale sexuelle de l'Église catholique dans laquelle il perçoit l'origine de plusieurs de ses incapacités, notamment son développement sexuel tardif et ses difficultés matrimoniales. Il l'accuse également d'engendrer des tentations homosexuelles auxquelles il aurait été lui-même soumis dans sa jeunesse.

À ses yeux, le christianisme est paré de nombreux inconvénients pour la race aryenne : tout d'abord, il a été prêché par un Juif. Ensuite, il est issu du monde méditerranéen, sorte de magma racial antique, opposé à la pureté nordique. Par tous ces défauts, le christianisme n'est pas compatible avec l'héritage germanique qu'il entend magnifier.

Ainsi, à partir du milieu des années 1930, il analyse le 3e « Reich » comme un moment de confrontation ultime entre le christianisme et la germanité. Dans cette optique, il définit les modalités de cette confrontation : la SS est appelée à y jouer un rôle prépondérant, et, fidèle à lui-même, il organise les étapes de cette lutte, qui doit être menée par 2 générations : tout d'abord, il ordonne la publication d'une collection d'une cinquantaine de volumes, qui rassemblerait les sources du « patrimoine germanique », puis il serait nécessaire de rechercher les formes spécifiquement germaniques du Moyen-âge ; au terme de cette lutte, les habitants du « Reich » disposeraient de vertus de substitution aux vertus chrétiennes.

Une autre raison pour Himmler d'éradiquer le christianisme est son projet racial aryen et de défense de la germanité. Aux yeux de Himmler, la race germanique a été pervertie par sa conversion au christianisme : ainsi, il voue Boniface, le missionnaire chrétien, aux gémonies, et reproche à Charlemagne, Charles le Franc dans ses discours, d'avoir massacré les Saxons païens. Le combat mortel contre les « sous-hommes » (Juifs et Slaves) nécessite de libérer les Allemands des principes chrétiens comme la charité ou l'amour du prochain pour mieux faire émerger les « vertus » germaniques.

Germanisation et déchristianisation appartiennent, pour Himmler, au même processus.

Selon Peter Longerich, ce combat antichrétien est la « mission de sa vie » et la « vocation première » de la SS :

« L'anticommunisme et l'antisémitisme d'Himmler ne font aucun doute, et il extermina sans pitié ces 2 groupes d'opposants. Mais fondamentalement, il s'intéressait beaucoup plus au christianisme. »

Himmler vilipendait l'action néfaste de Charlemagne et de Saint-Boniface qu'il rendait responsables de la christianisation des Germains. Il espérait remplacer les références chrétiennes de la société allemande par des références au culte païen ancestral qui seul pouvait régénérer le monde allemand. Par exemple, il souhaite débaptiser Noël en fête du solstice d'hiver ou de « luz » , et faire du solstice d'été une fête de l'accouplement. Dans la SS, le baptême des enfants est déjà remplacé par une simple bénédiction du nom.

Selon Albert Speer, Adolf Hitler, tout autant hostile au christianisme qu'Himmler, était par contre peu favorable à la recréation d'un culte païen et se félicitait de vivre à une époque de libération de toute mystique ; Hitler regrettait la conversion des Germains au christianisme et préférait l'Islam, religion qu'il percevait comme fanatique et guerrière, mais il voulait attendre la fin de la Guerre pour régler leurs comptes aux églises chrétiennes, ce qui le conduisit à refréner certaines ardeurs antichrétiennes et mystiques du chef des SS.

Pour contrebalancer le christianisme au sein de la SS, Himmler entend proposer un mode de vie germanique et païen à la SS. Ainsi, il est influencé par Karl Maria Wiligut, dont il assure la promotion dans la SS, et avec lequel il conserve des rapports malgré la disgrâce de ce dernier, en 1939.

Il propose aux membres de la SS un rituel de substitution au christianisme, rituel rythmé par des fêtes païennes, autant d'occasions de distribuer des cadeaux à forte charge symbolique : la fête solsticiale constitue la plus importante des fêtes à célébrer dans la SS. Ainsi, la fête de Noël est remplacée par la célébration du solstice d'hiver, occasion non seulement de compétitions intellectuelles, mais aussi de commémoration des ancêtres et du passé germanique. Durant cette fête, le « Reichsführer » donne aux participants des chandeliers de « luz » , chandelier à 3 branches - symbole de renouveau lié au début de l'année. Le rituel de cette fête est très précisément défini et doit inculquer au participant l'idée qu'il ne peut rien s'il ne s'insère pas dans la « chaîne sans fin de sa race » . À partir de 1937, il ordonne aux SS de se faire accompagner de leur épouse ou de leur fiancée, les jeunes couples se voyant offrir de la part du « Reichsführer SS » un chandelier de « luz » .

Mais le solstice d'été constitue la grande fête de la SS, qu'il suit avec ferveur, exigeant des rapports sur leur déroulement dans l'ensemble du « Reich » à partir de 1938. Défendant l'idée que, dans certaines tribus germaniques, les enfants ne sont conçus que durant cette fête, il fait de cette fête une fête de l'accouplement. Non seulement, il se fait un devoir d'assister chaque année aux fêtes solsticiales (sauf à celles de 1937, les obsèques de Ludendorff se tenant à la même date) , mais il intervient régulièrement dans l'organisation du rituel qui doit se tenir durant cette fête, qui doit aussi prendre la forme de compétitions sportives.

Il met aussi en place des cérémonies de passage sur le modèle des cérémonies chrétiennes : le baptême devient la « bénédiction du nom » , dont nous avons une idée précise du déroulement grâce à des textes. Dans une salle de bénédiction, devant un autel recouvert d'un drapeau à croix gammée, la cérémonie est organisée autour de la personne de Hitler, présent par un portait et par la lecture psalmodiée d'extraits choisis de « Mein Kampf » et est présidée par un « consécrateur ». L'enfant se voit doté d'un parrain : quand le parrain est Himmler, il offre un gobelet en argent, une cuillère, et à partir de 1936, un « ruban de vie de soie bleue » .

Il souhaite aussi intervenir dans l'organisation d'un culte des morts spécifique à la SS. Dans un 1er temps, il intervient dans le protocole qui doit présider aux funérailles des membres de la SS ; citant l'exemple des funérailles de son père, il souhaite alors simplement une cérémonie distincte de la Messe des morts chrétienne. De même, en 1936, il demande à ses services de lui soumettre des modèles de cercueils, et définit les végétaux qui doivent être déposés sur le cercueil, l'été comme l'hiver.

Pour toutes ces cérémonies, il tente de remplacer les chants chrétiens : il ordonne à la SS de commander à de jeunes auteurs allemands de nouveaux chants pour les fêtes de la SS, du Parti et de l'ensemble des organisations nazies.

De même, il souhaite matérialiser la camaraderie liant entre eux les plus anciens membres de la SS : ainsi, il distribue des anneaux à tête de mort aux SS les plus anciens dans l'organisation, et oblige ces derniers, souvent responsables au sein de la SS, à le porter constamment. Aux officiers généraux de la SS, il octroie à vie une épée d'apparat, qui doit retourner à la SS à la mort du porteur, ou lorsqu'elle lui est retirée.

Cependant, s'il propose pour la SS un modèle à base religieuse, il demeure farouchement opposé à la mise en place d'une hiérarchie de prêtres ; pour tenter d'éviter ce qu'il voit comme une dérive, il souhaite confier les responsabilités des cérémonies aux commandants de la SS, souvent les « Gruppenführer », au sein de leur domaine de compétence. De plus, à partir de 1936, il souhaite que ces cérémonies prennent le caractère d'une fête privée, qui doit se tenir au domicile du soldat concerné, à la fois pour éviter un retentissement dans la presse, mais aussi pour éviter les commentaires ironiques de Hitler et de certains de ses proches.

1939-1945 : L'Abbaye d'Admont est expropriée par le régime national-socialiste.

Le monastère bénédictin d'Admont fut, dès sa fondation, un centre intellectuel important : au XIVe siècle, sa bibliothèque comptait autant de manuscrits que celle des papes, un siècle plus tard. L'incendie qui détruisit le couvent en 1865 épargna miraculeusement ce trésor ; le Nazisme faillit lui être fatal. L'abbaye avait été totalement expropriée en novembre 1939 au profit de l'État allemand ; les richesses de la bibliothèque furent transférées à Graz, capitale de la Styrie, et, en 1941, les SS emportèrent plus de 3,000 volumes de médecine et de botanique destinés à la « station allemande d'essais alimentaires » du camp de concentration de Dachau. Diabolique inversion des travaux et des efforts des religieux ! À la fin de la Guerre, les salles mêmes de la bibliothèque servirent d'infirmerie militaire et ne souffrirent pas peu de cette nouvelle affectation. Tout est heureusement rentré dans l'ordre aujourd'hui. La bibliothèque compte environ 130,000 volumes, 1,400 manuscrits et 600 incunables.

Les autorités nationales-socialistes expulsent les moines de l'Abbaye de Lambach en 1941 pour y installer une NAPOLA (internat du Parti) . Les moines reviennent après la Guerre.

En 1939, l'an après l' « Anschluß » , les Nazis ferment l'Abbaye de Stams, qui ne rouvre qu'en 1945.

Wilhering

En 1940, les Nazis prennent possession de l'Abbaye de Wilhering. L'abbé Bernhard Burgstaller meurt en prison l'année suivante. Les moines reviennent après la Guerre.

The Nazis saw themselves as a replacement of Catholicism that would coopt its cohesion and respect for hierarchy. In 1941, the Nazi authorities began to dissolve all monasteries and abbeys through occupation and secularization by the « Allgemeine SS » . In 1941, this « Aktion Klostersturm » (Operation « Storm the Monasteries ») was stopped because Adolf Hitler feared the increasing protests by the Catholic part of the German population. If these were to result in passive rebellions, the Nazi War effort at the eastern front would be harmed.

The Nazi Party had plans for the Roman Catholic Church, according to which the Church was supposed to « eat from the hands of the government » . The sequence of these plans follow this sequence : an abolition of the priestly celibacy and a nationalisation of all church property, the dissolution of monastic religious institutes, and an end to the influence of the Catholic Church upon education.

Nazi authorities decreed the dissolution of all monasteries and abbeys, many of them effectively being occupied and secularized by the « Allgemeine SS » under Heinrich Himmler. However, on 30 July 1941, the « Aktion Klostersturm » (Operation Monastery) was ended by a decree of Hitler, who feared the increasing protests by the Catholic population might result in passive rebellions, harming the Nazi War effort at the Eastern front.

Admont

The economic crises of the 1930's forced the Admont Abbey (a Benedictine monastery) to sell-off many of its art treasures, and, during the period of the National-Socialist government, the monastery was dissolved and the monks evicted. They were able to return in 1946.

Altenburg

During the Second World War, the building of the Altenburg monastery was seized by the Nazis and, later, by the Soviet troops. In 1942, the Skat Fountain was melted down by the Nazis for War use.

Klosterneuburg

The « Anschluß » of 1938 brought devastation to the Klosterneuburg community. In 1941, the Nazis suppressed the canonry and confiscated the buildings and properties. Only a few canons were permitted to remain and continue ministering to the faithful. Some canons went-out into the parishes, others were drafted into the army, and many lost their lives because of their involvement in the resistance movement. Immediately after the War, some canons were murdered for standing-up against the Russian soldiers who preyed on Austrian women and girls. Provost Alipius Linda, elected in 1937, guided the community wisely through both the Nazi period and the subsequent Communist occupation.

During the post-War period, Provost Gebhard Koberger presided over the rebuilding of the abbey's financial condition, as well as the reconstruction of several of the monastery's churches which had been damaged or destroyed by the bombing.

The advent of National-Socialism in Austria was devastating for the Klosterneuburg monastery. The Nazis suppressed the canonry in 1941 and confiscated the buildings and properties. This process had already begun with the « Anschluß » . Only a few canons were permitted to remain in the house and continue ministering to the faithful of the city. Many went out into the « Stift's » parishes, while some were drafted into the army. One member of the community, Roman Scholz, was hanged in 1944 for being involved in the resistance movement. Moreover, the pastor of Tattendorf, one of the most remote of the « Stift's » parishes south of Vienna, was murdered by the Russians in 1945. Alois Kremar was killed because he stood-up against the Russian soldiers desired to prey on Austrian women and girls, a terrifying and frequent enough occurrence after the War.

It was Provost Alipius Linda, elected in 1937, who guided the community wisely through both the Nazi period as well as the subsequent Communist occupation. After his death followed the « interregnum » of the interdict, which was largely resolved through the ministrations of Canon Gebhard Koberger, who was elected Linda's successor in 1954.

Provost Gebhard presided over the rebuilding of the abbey's economic situation in the post-War period, as well as the reconstruction of several rectories and churches belonging to the « Stift » which had been damaged or destroyed by the bombing.

Kremsmünster

The Kremsmünster Abbey played a role in the end of World War II, as it was here that on May 8th, 1945, the exiled Slovak government capitulated to General Walton Walker leading the XX Corps of the 3rd U.S. Army.

Lambach

Lambach escaped the dissolution of the monasteries of Emperor Joseph II in the 1780's. It was however dissolved by the National-Socialists in 1941, in the « Operation Klostersturm » , and the premises were used for the accommodation of a Nazi school and training institution.

Maria Laach

The Maria Laach Abbey has been at the center of a controversy over its relations with the Nazi regime between 1933 and 1945. In particular Heinrich Böll, depicting in « Billiards at Half-past Nine » , a Benedictine monastery whose monks actively and voluntarily collaborated with the Nazis, is generally considered to have had Maria Laach in mind.

In 2004, researcher Marcel Albert published « Die Benediktinerabtei Maria Laach und der Nationalsozialismus » (The Maria Laach Benedictine Abbey and National-Socialism) .

In reviewing the book, Doctor Mark Edward Ruff of Saint-Louis University wrote :

« The Benedictine abbey, Maria Laach, poses a number of interpretative challenges for historians writing on Roman Catholicism during the 3rd “ Reich ”. This influential monastery in the Eifel became known as a center for Right-wing Catholicism already during the Weimar Republic. Its leaders enthusiastically greeted the Nazi seizure of power in 1933.

It was the only Benedictine monastery in the Rhineland not to be confiscated by the Nazi regime, even if part of the facility was converted into a hospital for wounded soldiers. Yet, at the same time, it provided a sanctuary for Konrad Adenauer in 1934, who had been unceremoniously removed from his position as mayor of Cologne. In addition, its leaders became the target of numerous “ Gestapo ” interrogations, even as rumors spread that the monastery was to be appropriated by the State. »

Marcel Albert's book relies heavily on the unpublished memoirs of Ildefons Herwegen, a conservative monarchist who served as abbot of Maria Laach until his death, in 1946. At times self-serving, these memoirs provide the narrative thread for this book.

Albert quotes extensively from these, all the while commenting on the accuracy and reliability of Herwegen's account. He also makes extensive use of the archival holdings of the monastery itself, supplementing these with official State and police reports.

Maria Laach became a focal-point in the Weimar Republic for those Right-wing Catholics disillusioned by the collapse of the Hohenzollern monarchy and outraged at the Catholic Centre Party's coalitions with the Social-Democrats (SPD) .

The monks, politicians, businessmen, theologians and students who gathered there were strongly influenced by the idea of a coming « Reich », hoping to build a 3rd Holy Roman Empire.

Such prominent conservatives as Emil Ritter, Carl Schmitt (later to gain notoriety as the « Crown Jurist of the 3rd “ Reich ” ») and Charles Edward, Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, renegade member of the British aristocracy, all participated in events sponsored by the monastery. The Benedictines here attracted members of the Catholic aristocracy, those who were more receptive to the Right-wing nationalist movements of the time.

Not surprisingly, both Herwegen and many others at Maria Laach embraced Adolf Hitler's regime and even chided other Catholics for failing to work with the new State.

Herwegen avowed :

« Blood, soil and fate are the appropriate expressions for the fundamental powers of the time. The rise of the 3rd “ Reich ” was part of the workings and designs of God. Hitler's promise to build Germany on a Christian foundation on March 21st, 1933, led several monks to hang a picture of Hitler in the abbey and to unfurl the black-white-red flag of the bygone “ Kaiserreich ”. »

As late as 1939, one of the members of the abbey, an artist who had converted to Catholicism, P. Theodor Bogler, published a « Briefe an einen jungen Soldaten » (Letters to a young soldier) in which he let loose a virulently anti-Jewish polemic.

This openness to National-Socialism by many at Maria Laach did not go un-noticed by the Nazi press.

Robert Ley's « Westdeutsche Beobachter » reported that :

« One knows that the spiritual-religious educational work of the Benedictines of Maria-Laach, for years, has increasingly viewed itself responsible for all of the duties to renew the national conscience. »

Yet, the Nazis did not always reciprocate the embrace of the monks. Instead, the « Gestapo » began to interrogate the monks, arresting one monk on charges of homosexuality. The printing of Alfred Rosenberg's « Myth of the 20th Century » (advocating Positive Christianity, which was actually based on pantheistic pagan nature worship and Teutonic Gods) , as well as the political demotion of Franz von Papen, forced Herwegen, already in 1934, to temper his hopes of exerting a Christian influence on the new State.

Although the monastery was not closed-down, as were all other Benedictine abbeys in the area, its members had become a regular target of State attacks. Albert makes it clear, however, that it was only the Nazi persecution of the churches, and not the attacks on the Jews or Nazi military aggression, that forced Herwegen to see the regime in a new light.

Similarly, Herwegen housed Adenauer for almost a year in his abbey not necessarily because he agreed with the Center Party politician's « Weltanschauung », but because Adenauer was a childhood friend from his days at school.

In its closing chapters, the book shows that the abbey cultivated a positive relationship to Adenauer and the CDU after 1945, but retained its monarchist beliefs. However, the post-War parts of the book are less extensive, and this part of the monastery's history seems to await further research.

Melk

The Melk abbey survived a threat during the Napoleonic Wars when Napoleon made Melk his headquarters in his campaign against Austria and probably used the abbey for a look-out. It survived the period following the Nazi « Anschluß », in 1938, when the school and a large part of the abbey were confiscated by the State.

Sankt Lambrecht

After the Austrian « Anschluß » of 1938, the Benedictine abbey of Sankt Lambrecht was seized by the National-Socialist authorities. From 1942 to 1945, it was used as an external storage facility, housing 2 sub-camps of the infamous Mauthausen-Gusen concentration camp : one for male inmates and one for females. The monks were able to return in 1946.

Wilhering

In 1940, Wilhering Abbey was expropriated by the Nazis, and the monks were expelled ; some were arrested and sent to concentration camps, while others were forced into military service. The abbot, Doctor Bernhard Burgstaller, was imprisoned and died of starvation in 1941. The buildings were used at Ist to accommodate the seminary from Linz, and, then, from 1944, for displaced Germans from Bessarabia and as a military hospital. In 1945, American troops took over the premises. The monks returned in the same year to resume monastic life and to re-open the school.

Die Weltwirtschaftskrise 1930 zwang das Stift zum Verkauf von Kunstschätzen, darunter die berühmte Admonter Madonna (entstanden um 1310) . Während der NS-Zeit wurde das Kloster aufgehoben und der Besitz beschlagnahmt. Nach Kriegsende kehrte der Konvent zurück.

Göttweig

1939 wurde das Stift zugunsten der kreisfreien Stadt Krems enteignet und der Konvent nach kurzer Inhaftierung in Unternalb konfiniert. Das Stiftsgebäude diente nun als Umsiedlungslager, Kriegsgefangenenlager und von 1943 bis 1945

als Nationalpolitische Erziehungsanstalt, bevor es zu Kriegsende verwüstet und Kaserne der sowjetischen Besatzungstruppen wurde. Nach der Rückkehr des Konvents im August 1945 und dem Tod von Abt Hartmann Strohsacker (1930-1946) drohte dem Kloster die Aufhebung, weil es mangels Eintritt und nach den zahlreichen Todesfällen in und nach den Kriegsjahren als nicht mehr lebensfähig angesehen wurde.

Kremsmünster

« Das Stift wurde durch eine Verfügung der Gestapo vom 3. April 1941 beschlagnahmt. Am Freitag, den 4. April 1941, wurde dem Abt die Verfügung mitgeteilt, daß er vom Gau Oberdonau verwiesen und das Stift beschlagnahmt sei. In der Haustradition der Mönchsgemeinschaft benannte man diesen Tag (Anmerkung : der Tag wird nicht am 4. April begangen, sondern ist immer der Freitag vor dem Palmsonntag) daher als den schmerzhaften Freitag. »

Aus : Rudolf Hundstorfer. Das Stift unterm Hakenkreuz. Sonderabdruck aus dem 104. Jahresbericht des Öffentl. Gymnasiums der Benediktiner zu Kremsmünster (1961) ; Seite 40f.

Abt Oddo berichtet in der äußerst interessanten Publikation « Kremsmünster um 1945 » :

Im Jahre 1933 fand der von den Nationalsozialisten seines Amtes als Kölner Oberbürgermeister enthobene, spätere deutsche Bundeskanzler Konrad Adenauer für ein Jahr Zuflucht im Kloster, das damals von seinem Schulfreund Ildefons Herwegen geleitet wurde, und lebte dort als « Bruder Konrad » . Am 12. April 1933 legte der mit Ildefons Herwegen befreundete Theologe Johannes Pinski die Profess als Benediktineroblate der Abtei ab. Dieser baute nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg seine durch einen Bombenangriff zerstörte Pfarrkirche Mater Dolorosa in Berlin-Lankwitz nach dem Vorbild der Klosterkirche Maria Laach wieder auf, indem er das ursprüngliche Hauptschiff der Kirche als Vorhof zum neu überdachten Querschiff gestaltete.

Die größte Mitgliederzahl von 182 (1934) und auch die Gründung des Klosterverlages « ars liturgica » fällt in diese Zeit. Unter Abt Ildefons Herwegen begann sich die Klostersgemeinschaft intensiv mit der Liturgieforschung auseinanderzusetzen. 1948 wurde ein eigenes Institut für diese theologische Disziplin eingerichtet.

Nach dem Anschluß Österreichs 1938 wurde das Stiftsgymnasium von den Nationalsozialisten geschlossen und der größere Teil des Stiftsgebäudes für eine staatliche Oberschule beschlagnahmt. Eine vollständige Schließung durch die Nationalsozialisten wurde befürchtet, blieb dem Kloster aber erspart. Das Kloster überstand den Krieg und die nachfolgende Besatzungszeit, abgesehen von Weinplünderungen, fast unversehrt.

Nach dem Anschluß im Mai 1938 wurde das Kloster durch die Nationalsozialisten beschlagnahmt und von SS-Obersturmbannführer Hubert Erhart verwaltet. Die Abtei verlegte ihren Sitz nach Mariazell. Der gesamte Inkunabelbestand der Bibliothek sowie Drucke des 16., 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts und eine Reihe älterer Styriaca, insgesamt 2.100 Titel, kamen an die Steiermärkische Landesbibliothek in Graz. Der Rest hat an Ort und Stelle die Aufhebung und den Krieg überstanden. Nach Rückstellung der beschlagnahmten Bestände im Jahre 1946 wurde der Gesamtbestand von rund 30.000 Bänden in der systematischen Ordnung des 19. Jahrhunderts wiederaufgestellt.

Am 13. Mai 1942 traf ein erster Transport von circa 90 KZ-Häftlingen aus Dachau ein, das Stift wurde zum Außenlager des KZ-Dachau. Ungefähr ein Jahr später trafen dann 30 Bibelforscherinnen (Zeugen Jehovas) aus Ravensbrück ein, für die ein zweites Außenlager eingerichtet wurde, da Frauen und Männer nach den Richtlinien der SS zu trennen waren. Ab dem 20. November 1942 bis zur Befreiung im Mai 1945 unterstand das Männerlager dem KZ-Mauthausen und wurde somit ein Außenlager des KZ-Mauthausen. Dies bedeutete eine Verschlechterung der Haftbedingungen, da der Rücktransport ins Stammlager (Mauthausen war ein Lager der Stufe III-« Rückkehr unerwünscht ») den sicheren Tod bedeutete. Das Frauenlager blieb bis zur Gründung des Frauenlagers in Mauthausen am 15. September 1944 unter der Verwaltung des KZ-Ravensbrück. Die inhaftierten Männer mußten hier neben Arbeiten in der Forst- und Landwirtschaft eine Siedlung in Sankt Lambrecht errichten, deren Häuser heute noch vom Kloster vermietet werden. Der Bau einer Villa nordwestlich des Stifts für Erharts Familie wurde begonnen, aber nicht mehr fertiggestellt. Die weiblichen Häftlinge wurden hauptsächlich für Haushaltsdienste herangezogen. Der Stiftshof diente als Apellplatz und war somit für die Bevölkerung einsehbar, die Stiftskirche behielt dagegen ihre Funktion als Pfarrkirche.

Von den Nazis beschlagnahmtes Stift Sankt Lambrecht fungierte jahrelang als Konzentrationslager (Geschichte nun rekonstruiert Graz) Das von den Nationalsozialisten beschlagnahmte obersteirische Stift Sankt Lambrecht fungierte jahrelang als Konzentrationslager - auch für Frauen. Neben bis zu 115 Häftlingen gab es bis zu 30 weibliche Internierte, die wegen ihre Zugehörigkeit zu den Zeugen Jehovas Zwangsarbeit leisten mußten. Für sie war es die letzte Station einer oft jahrelangen Odyssee durch die Lager des Dritten Reichs. Die steirische Psychologin Anita Farkas hat die Geschichte des KZ Sankt Lambrecht und die Biografien der Insassinnen rekonstruiert. Daß es in der Steiermark neben sechs Außenlagern von Mauthausen für Männer auch ein KZ für Frauen gegeben hat, das als Nebenlager von Ravensbrück gegründet worden war, ist nahezu unbekannt, so Farkas. Tatsächlich wurde das Benediktinerstift Sankt Lambrecht zu einem « Ort des Traumas » : Im Mai 1938 wurde es aufgehoben und als « SS-Wirtschaftsgut » beschlagnahmt. 1942 wurde dort ein Außenlager für Männer des KZ-Dachau (später auch des KZ-Mauthausen) mit bis zu 115 Häftlingen errichtet. Sie wurden in der Land- und Forstwirtschaft ebenso eingesetzt wie zum Bau einer Siedlung. Im Südflügel, dem heutigen Pfarrtrakt, kam im Frühjahr 1943 ein Frauen-KZ hinzu. Die Opfer Die Häftlinge gehören einer Opfergruppe an, die lange zu den « vergessenen Opfern » des Nationalsozialismus zählte : den « Bibelforschern » , wie die Zeugen Jehovas von den Nationalsozialisten genannt wurden. Die religiöse Überzeugung gebot ihnen strikte Gewaltlosigkeit mit einem Fokus, der sich auf die einer einzigen Autorität, ihres Gottes Jehova, richtete. « Damit gerieten sie mit dem Regime in Konflikt » , so Farkas. Sie sieht vor allem im « gestiegenen Arbeitsbedarf » den Grund für die Einrichtung des weiblichen Häftlingkommandos. Die Frauen übernahmen Arbeiten in der Küche, im Reinigungsdienst, in der Gärtnerei und in der Land- und Forstwirtschaft. Man habe sie ausgewählt, weil sie bei der SS als « überaus fleißiges, williges und verlässliches Arbeitspotenzial » galten. In ihrer Publikation, die aus ihrer Dissertation an der Uni Klagenfurt hervorgegangen ist, schildert Farkas die Geschichte des Stiftes seit 1938 und bringt sie mit den Biografien von 23 ehemaligen Insassinnen in Einklang. Sie stellt aber auch die Geschichte der Verfolgung der Religionsgemeinschaft dar und rekonstruiert den speziellen Mikrokosmos der KZ-Situation.

Stams

1938-1939 wurde das Stift von den nationalsozialistischen Machthabern aufgelöst und beschlagnahmt und diente als Umsiedlungsheim für Auswanderer aus Südtirol. Nach Kriegsende 1945 wurde es von Zisterziensermönchen wieder übernommen. Sie brachten Bildungseinrichtungen in den Klostergebäuden unter und übereigneten Pachtgründe an die Siedler.

Klostersturm

Unter Klostersturm versteht man die planmäßige Aufhebung von Klöstern durch die weltliche Macht aus politischen oder wirtschaftlichen Gründen.

Einen Klostersturm gab es zum Beispiel in der französischen Revolution, in der Säkularisation des frühen 19. Jahrhunderts, im Kulturkampf des späten 19. Jahrhunderts und 1941 durch die nationalsozialistischen Machthaber. Klostersturm während des nationalsozialistischen Regimes.

In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus beschlagnahmten staatliche Stellen sowie die nationalsozialistische Partei weit über 200 Klöster. Der nationalsozialistische Raubzug gegen die katholischen Ordensgemeinschaften in Deutschland startete aufgrund eines Geheimerlasses des NSDAP-Reichsleiters Martin Bormann vom 13. Januar 1941.

Bereits seit Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs betrieben die SS unter Heinrich Himmler und die Wehrmacht (zunächst in den « angeschlossenen » , annektierten und militärisch besetzten Nachbarländern Deutschlands) eigene Beschlagnahmen von Einrichtungen und Gebäuden. Während die Wehrmacht die beschlagnahmten Klöster und Einrichtungen vorwiegend als Lazarette, Erholungsheime, Schuleinrichtungen für Soldaten nutzte, beanspruchte die SS diese vor allem als Erstunterkünfte für « Volksdeutsche », die unter der Devise Heim ins Reich durch die Volksdeutsche Mittelstelle der SS in das nationalsozialistische Deutschland umgesiedelt werden sollten.

Anfangs wurden auch evangelische und nicht kirchliche Sozialeinrichtungen (und andere Psychiatrische Kliniken, Pflegeheime für Behinderte) beschlagnahmt und zwangsgeräumt. Später verschob sich das Gleichgewicht zuungunsten der katholischen Klöster und Einrichtungen. Die bisherigen Bewohner wurden meist nicht nur aus ihren Unterkünften, von ihren Arbeitsplätzen und Wirkungsstätten vertrieben, sondern häufig erhielten die Ordensleute zusätzlich ein Aufenthaltsverbot in der örtlichen Umgebung ihrer Ordenshäuser. Ordensangehörige, die sich den Zwangsmaßnahmen widersetzen, wurden beschuldigt, Straftaten begangen zu haben und von der Gestapo in Schutzhaft genommen.

Für viele psychisch kranke und/oder körperlich behinderte, schwer pflegebedürftige Betreute aus den beschlagnahmten kirchlichen und weltlichen Hospitälern und Pflegeheimen führten die Zwangsräumungen unmittelbar zum Abtransport in NS-Tötungsanstalten.

Nicht immer wurden die Klöster in die ihre Beschlagnahme begründende Bestimmung überführt. Oft übernahm die NSDAP die Klöster, Ordenshäuser und kirchlichen Einrichtungen für ihre eigenen Zwecke. Auch fanden häufig die vorher für den Verlust der Gebäude in Aussicht gestellten Entschädigungszahlungen nicht statt. Die katholischen Bischöfe Deutschlands verfassten mehrere Hirtenbriefe und erhoben öffentlich Einspruch. Hitler verbot am 30. Juli 1941 weitere Beschlagnahmen, da diese Aktion bei der kirchlich gebundenen Bevölkerung große Unruhe ausgelöst hatte.

Einleitung

Mehr als 300 katholische Klöster und andere kirchliche Einrichtungen wurden in den Jahren 1940 bis 1942 von der nationalsozialistischen Regierung beschlagnahmt und enteignet. Die Bewohner wurden zumeist vertrieben, der Klosterbetrieb mußte eingestellt werden. Dieser Raubzug des NS-Regimes, den die Betroffenen selbst als « Klostersturm » bezeichneten, bildete einen Höhepunkt der Kirchenverfolgung durch die Nationalsozialisten. Besonders stark betroffen war das Rheinland : Allein im Erzbistum Köln fielen 20 Klöster und ähnliche Einrichtungen dem Klostersturm zum Opfer.

Die katholischen Klöster im Feindbild der Nationalsozialisten

Die katholische Kirche stellte für die Nationalsozialisten eine Gegnerin dar, die es zu bekämpfen galt. Der christliche Glaube widersprach der nationalsozialistischen Weltanschauung, und die Kirche übte durch ihre zahlreichen Kindergärten und Schulen, Vereine und Verbände einen so starken gesellschaftlichen Einfluss aus, daß sie der Regierung ein Dorn im Auge sein mußte.

In diesem Feindbild von der katholischen Kirche spielten die Ordensgemeinschaften eine besondere Rolle : An kaum einen Ort konnte die NS-Weltanschauung so schwer vordringen wie hinter dicke Klostermauern. Alles, was die katholische Lehre ausmachte, schien in den Klöstern besonders stark ausgeprägt zu sein. Sie galten den Nationalsozialisten deshalb als der « Lebensnerv der katholischen Kirche » . « Wer die Klöster angreift, greift immer auch die Gesamtkirche an, heißt es in einer Ausarbeitung der SS aus dem Jahr 1935. »

Dabei spielten jahrhundertealte ordensfeindliche Klischees eine Rolle: Völlerei, sexuelle Ausschweifungen und das Anhäufen immenser Reichtümer hinter der Fassade der Armut gehörten zu den traditionellen Vorwürfen, derer sich auch die Nationalsozialisten gern bedienten. Zudem galt die zölibatäre (ehelose) Lebensweise als undeutsch, da sie die Ordensleute zu « biologischen Blindgängern » mache. Den kontemplativ (beschaulich) lebenden Ordensgemeinschaften wurde vorgeworfen, daß sie « nur beten und nichts arbeiten » . Noch gefährlicher schienen dem NS-Regime jedoch jene Orden, die durch Unterricht, Exerzitien und Predigten öffentlich tätig waren und dadurch die Möglichkeit zu regierungsfeindlicher Propaganda hatten. Aus diesem Grund gehörte die Bekämpfung der Orden, die als « beste und gefährlichste Kampftruppe » und als der « militante Arm der katholischen Kirche » galten, von Anfang an zu den zentralen Zielen der NS-Kirchenpolitik.

Hass und Faszination

Doch die Orden lösten bei den Nationalsozialisten nicht nur Haß, sondern zugleich auch eine starke Faszination aus : So orientierte sich nicht zuletzt die SS in ihrem Aufbau am Vorbild des Jesuitenordens, und NS-Eliteschulen wurden als « Ordensschulen » bezeichnet. Das Bild, das sich die Regierungsstellen von den Orden zeichneten, war also ein zwiespältiges, und ebenso zwiespältig war die Betrachtungsweise der Nationalsozialisten : Einerseits investierten die Überwachungsorgane wie der SD (Sicherheitsdienst) viel Zeit und Energie in die sorgfältige Beobachtung des Ordenswesens und erstellten detaillierte Berichte ; andererseits wurden Klischees und Vorurteile gepflegt und immer weiter verbreitet.

Erste Verfolgungsmaßnahmen

Schon in den ersten Jahren ihrer Herrschaft machte die NS-Regierung verschiedene Ansätze, um das Ordenswesen zu bekämpfen. Ein möglicher Ansatzpunkt wurde dabei in wirtschaftlichen Maßnahmen gesehen. Schon 1934 machte das Schatzamt der NSDAP den ersten Versuch, sich einen Überblick über die tatsächlichen wirtschaftlichen Verhältnisse der Klöster zu verschaffen. Die Aufstellung blieb allerdings bruchstückhaft, und zur Umsetzung der Ergebnisse in politische Maßnahmen kam es vorerst nicht.

Devisenprozesse

Stattdessen wurde ab Mitte der 1930er Jahre eine andere Strategie verfolgt, um die Orden zu bekämpfen : Durch Diffamierung sollte ihr Ansehen in der katholischen Bevölkerung geschädigt werden. Diesem Zweck dienten die Devisen- und Sittlichkeitsprozesse.

1935 wurden mehrere Ordensleute an der deutsch-niederländischen Grenze des Devisenschmuggels überführt, der gegen die verschärfte Devisengesetzgebung des « Dritten Reiches » verstieß. Die Entdeckung lieferte den Anlaß für eine ganze Welle von Prozessen gegen Priester und Ordensangehörige, denen Devisenschleberei vorgeworfen wurde. Beinahe 100 Personen wurden verurteilt, darunter der Kölner Dominikaner-Provinzial Laurentius Siemer (1888-1956) . Sein Urteil lautete zunächst auf 15 Monate Haft, in der Berufungsverhandlung wurde er dann aber frei gesprochen.

Zu einer Verfolgungsmaßnahme wurden die Devisenprozesse nicht durch die Verurteilung überführter Straftäter, sondern dadurch, daß sie den Charakter politischer Schauprozesse annahmen. Dafür sorgte die gezielte Einflussnahme der Partei auf die Ermittlungen der Staatsanwaltschaft und vor allem die intensive Propaganda in der NS-Presse, mit der die Prozesse einhergingen.

Sittlichkeitsprozesse

Die Devisenverfahren waren noch nicht ganz abgeschlossen, als bereits eine neue Prozesswelle gegen die Klöster anrollte : Die Sittlichkeitsprozesse, die mit Anzeigen gegen Mitglieder der Laienkongregation der Franziskanerbrüder in Waldbreitbach begannen. Dort war es wiederholt zu homosexuellen Handlungen gekommen. 31 Brüder wurden aus der Kongregation ausgeschlossen, und der zuständige Bischof von Trier, Franz Rudolf Bornwasser, sah sich veranlaßt, in Rom die Auflösung der Kongregation zu beantragen, die 1937 tatsächlich erfolgte. Ähnlich wie bei den Devisenprozessen kam es nach den Vorfällen in Waldbreitbach zu einer ganzen Serie von Ermittlungsverfahren gegen Priester und Ordensleute wegen Sittlichkeitsvergehen. Gemessen an der Zahl der Verurteilungen, fiel die Bilanz der Prozesse wiederum weit weniger spektakulär aus als die damit einhergehende NS-Propaganda. So gelang es den katholischen Bischöfen, durch gezielte Gegeninformation zu verhindern, daß die Diffamierungskampagne die Katholiken insgesamt von den Orden entfremdete. Ausdrücklich distanzierten sie sich von den nachgewiesenen Vergehen einzelner Ordensleute, betrieben aber gleichzeitig Vorwärtsverteidigung gegen das Regime, indem sie die Zahlenverhältnisse zurechtrückten : Von allen katholischen Geistlichen in Deutschland (innerhalb und außerhalb der Klöster) seien gerade 0,23 % von den Sittlichkeitsprozessen betroffen, von denen wiederum rund drei Viertel freigesprochen werden mußten : Von einem flächendeckenden moralischen Sumpf im katholischen Klerus konnte also keine Rede sein.

Die Devisen- und Sittlichkeitsprozesse wirkten als Nadelstiche, konnten das Ordenswesen insgesamt aber nicht erschüttern. Zu einer systematischen Bekämpfung der Klöster kam es in den Jahren vor dem Zweiten Weltkrieg noch nicht. Dies lag zum einen daran, daß es der Regierung an geeigneten Konzepten hierzu mangelte. Zum anderen lenkten die Nationalsozialisten ihre Hauptaufmerksamkeit zunächst noch auf andere Gegner innerhalb der katholischen Kirche : Die wichtigsten Angriffsziele waren vor 1939 das Schulwesen sowie die katholischen Verbände und Vereine. Dadurch wurde die Kirche mehr und mehr aus ihren gesellschaftlichen Positionen verdrängt und auf eine rein religiöse Betätigung reduziert.

Zudem spielten taktische Erwägungen in der Kirchenpolitik eine wichtige Rolle. Adolf Hitler (1889-1945) verfolgte zwar langfristig das Ziel der Vernichtung der Kirche, wollte dies jedoch erst nach dem erhofften « Endsieg » verwirklichen. Um die Stimmung in der Bevölkerung nicht zu gefährden, mahnte er in kirchenpolitischen Angelegenheiten wiederholt zur Zurückhaltung. So wurden zum Beispiel die Sittlichkeitsprozesse im Sommer 1936 vorübergehend ausgesetzt, um während der Olympischen Spiele in Berlin das Bild vom Deutschen Reich im Ausland nicht zu beeinträchtigen.

Kirchenkampf im Zweiten Weltkrieg

Kirchenpolitische Akteure

Nach dem Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs änderten sich die Rahmenbedingungen der nationalsozialistischen Kirchenpolitik grundlegend. Der gemeinsame Kampf gegen die äußeren Kriegsgegner schien zwar einen « Burgfrieden » im Innern nach dem Vorbild des Ersten Weltkriegs nahe zu legen, doch stattdessen zeigte der Nationalsozialismus erst unter den Bedingungen des Krieges sein wahres Gesicht : Der Terror gegen die inneren Gegner verschärfte sich und gipfelte in dem millionenfachen Mord an den europäischen Juden. Auch die Kirchenverfolgung erreichte im Krieg einen neuen Höhepunkt.

Der « Führer » konzentrierte seine Aufmerksamkeit zunehmend auf das äußere Kriegsgeschehen und schritt nur noch selten gegen die von ihm so bezeichneten « Parteiheißsporne » ein, die eine radikalere Kirchenpolitik betrieben. Formal war in erster Linie Reichskirchenminister Hanns Kerrl (1887-1941) für die Kirchenpolitik zuständig. Er gehörte zu den gemäßigten kirchenpolitischen Kräften, doch seine Stellung innerhalb der NS-Führungsriege war so schwach, daß er sich kaum gegen politische Rivalen durchsetzen oder eigenständige Politik betreiben konnte. Hinzu kamen gesundheitliche Gründe, die ihn dazu bewogen, sich nach dem Beginn des Krieges mehr und mehr aus der aktiven Politik zurückzuziehen. Als Hanns Kerrl Ende 1941 starb, wurde kein neuer Reichskirchenminister ernannt.

Davon profitierte vor allem der Leiter der Parteikanzlei, Martin Bormann (1900-1945) , der schon seit 1938 die Expansion des Reiches ausnutzte, um kirchenpolitische Kompetenzen in den neuen Reichsteilen an sich zu reißen. Jetzt konnte er auch im « Altreich » zunehmend Einfluß auf die Kirchenpolitik nehmen. Bormann war einer der radikalsten Kirchengegner in der NS-Führungsriege. Seine Macht beruhte vor allem auf seinem engen Kontakt zum « Führer » . Es war häufig Bormann, der Äußerungen und Anordnungen Hitlers an die unteren Behörden weitergab und dabei häufig durch seine eigene Interpretation beeinflusste.

Bormanns stärkster Rivale um die Position des zweitstärksten Mannes im Reich war der Reichsführer-SS und Chef der deutschen Polizei Heinrich Himmler (1900-1945) . Er verfügte über den Oberbefehl über SS und Gestapo und damit auch über das Reichssicherheitshauptamt (RSHA) , das 1939 eingerichtet wurde. Es ging aus dem Hauptamt Sicherheitspolizei, dem Geheimen Staatspolizeiamt und dem SD-Hauptamt (Sicherheitsdienst-Hauptamt) hervor. Nach und nach baute Himmler sich ein ganzes Imperium auf, das von der SS beherrscht wurde und Einfluß auf immer größere Machtbereiche ausübte. Dazu zählten sowohl die Beobachtung von Gegnern durch den Sicherheitsdienst der SS als auch deren Bekämpfung durch die Polizeiorgane.

Deutsche Katholiken im Zweiten Weltkrieg

Die Beteiligung am Zweiten Weltkrieg war für die Katholiken ebenso selbstverständlich wie für fast alle anderen Deutschen : Als die deutschen Bischöfe sich im Herbst 1939 zum Kriegsbeginn äußerten, taten sie dies zwar ohne Kriegsbegeisterung wie noch 1918, erhoben aber auch keinerlei Zweifel an der Legitimität des Krieges. Die Beteiligung daran galt als selbstverständliche vaterländische Pflicht. In der damals herrschenden Theologie wurde Krieg nicht grundsätzlich als etwas Schlechtes betrachtet, sondern konnte unter bestimmten Bedingungen auch von Gott gewollt sein. Der Einsatz katholischer Soldaten in einem solchen Krieg wurde demnach als gottgewollte Bewährungsprobe interpretiert. Der Krieg, der 1939 begann, erschien der katholischen Kirche als nationale Herausforderung, nicht als nationalsozialistisches Verbrechen. Auch als im Verlauf des Krieges dessen verbrecherischer Charakter immer deutlicher wurde, kam es nicht zu einer grundsätzlichen Revision der Haltung der Bischöfe.

Das Reichsleistungsgesetz

Den Nationalsozialisten lieferte das Kriegsgeschehen willkommene Vorwände, um lang gehegte Pläne zur Bekämpfung der Kirche in die Realität umzusetzen. Das Druckmittel lag im Begriff der « Reichsaufgaben ». Die nationalen Pflichten, die der Krieg auch für die Katholiken mit sich brachte, bestanden nicht nur im Militärdienst an der Front, sondern auch im Dienst an der « Heimatfront ». Dazu gehörten für katholische Ordenseinrichtungen traditionell die Betreuung verwundeter Soldaten in ordenseigenen Lazaretten und auch die Aufnahme von Flüchtlingen in ihren Häusern. Diese « Reichsaufgaben » wurden für das nationalsozialistische Regime zum Schlüssel für den Angriff auf die Klöster.

Die Beanspruchung von Gebäuden für kriegswichtige Aufgaben war im Reichsleistungsgesetz vom 1. September 1939 geregelt. Es erlaubte bestimmten « Bedarfsstellen » (in erster Linie der Wehrmacht) Räume und Gebäude für militärische Zwecke zu beschlagnahmen. Das Gesetz sah Entschädigungszahlungen für die Eigentümer der betroffenen Gebäude vor und schützte außerdem deren Eigenbedarf. Nur Räume, die vom Eigentümer nicht unbedingt benötigt wurden, durften laut Gesetz beschlagnahmt werden. Die Buchstaben des Gesetzes und dessen tatsächliche Anwendung klafften jedoch weit auseinander. Es gab kein Gericht und keine Aufsichtsbehörde, die über die Einhaltung der gesetzlichen Bestimmungen gewacht hätte. So konnten NS-Stellen das Gesetz als Blankovollmacht zum Übergriff auf fremdes, insbesondere kirchliches Eigentum nutzen. Dies machte sich vor allem Himmlers SS zunutze.

Der Beginn des Klostersturms

Unter der Parole « Heim ins Reich » begann die nationalsozialistische Regierung 1939 damit, deutsche Minderheiten aus ost- und südosteuropäischen Ländern ins Deutsche Reich umzusiedeln. Bis 1942 wurden mehr als eine halbe Million « Volksdeutsche » umgesiedelt und nach ihrer Ankunft im Reich zunächst in Lagern untergebracht. Die vermeintlichen Übergangslager blieben oftmals jahrelang die Heimat der Volksdeutschen. Mit der Durchführung der Umsiedlungsaktion war die « Volksdeutsche Mittelstelle » beauftragt. Sie war zwar offiziell eine Parteidienststelle, kam faktisch aber einer staatlichen Behörde nahe und war personell eng mit der SS verflochten war. Den Oberbefehl über die Umsiedlungsaktion hatte Heinrich Himmler in seiner Funktion als « Reichskommissar für die Festigung deutschen Volkstums », die ihm im Oktober 1939 verliehen worden war.

Zur Einrichtung der Umsiedlerlager (insgesamt wurden 1.500 bis 1.800 Lager eingerichtet) benötigte die Volksdeutsche Mittelstelle eine Vielzahl an Gebäuden. Mit deren Beschaffung waren die Gaeinsatzführer der Volksdeutschen Mittelstelle betraut. Sie hatten dafür die klare Vorgabe « vor allem die Klöster und anderweitigen konfessionellen Gebäude (zum Beispiel Exerzitenhäuser) heranzuziehen » . So formulierte es die Gauleitung München-Oberbayern in einem Rundschreiben an die Kreisleiter des Gaus vom 31. August 1940 ; ähnliche Anweisungen galten auch in den anderen Gauen. Die Unterbringung der Umsiedler in den Ordenshäusern sollte der erste Schritt zur dauerhaften Beschlagnahme der Gebäude sein. Die Rückgabe der Häuser nach Abschluß der Umsiedlungsaktion war ausdrücklich nicht geplant. Die « Reichsaufgabe » der Unterbringung der Umsiedler diente lediglich als willkommener Vorwand für die Enteignung der kirchlichen Eigentümer.

Für die betroffenen Ordenseinrichtungen bedeutete die Einrichtung der Lager in vielen Fällen die Beschlagnahme der kompletten Gebäude und die Vertreibung der Bewohner. Pflege- und Erziehungsheime, Kindergärten und ähnliche Einrichtungen, die in den Ordenshäusern betrieben wurden, mussten aufgelöst, der Klosterbetrieb konnte nicht weitergeführt werden. Als scheinbare Rechtsgrundlage diente das Reichsleistungsgesetz. Mehr als 100 Klöster und andere katholische Einrichtungen fielen seit 1940 dieser ersten Welle zum Opfer.

Verschärfung des Klostersturms 1940-1941

Die Beschlagnahmen durch die Volksdeutsche Mittelstelle waren jedoch nur der Auftakt zum Kampf gegen die Klöster. Es scheint, als habe der « Erfolg » der ersten Beschlagnahmewelle die Raublust des Regimes erst richtig angefacht. Hitler hatte die « Parteilichkeit » gewähren lassen. Die betroffenen Ordensleute und die katholischen Bischöfe versuchten zwar angestrengt, sich gegen die Übergriffe zu wehren, doch sie taten das lediglich in Form schriftlicher Proteste, in denen sie auf die Einhaltung der gesetzlichen Bestimmungen pochten. Damit konnten sie gegen die Gewalt des Regimes nichts ausrichten. So ging der Klostersturm gegen Ende des Jahres 1940 in eine zweite, noch radikalere Phase über.

Statt der Volksdeutschen Mittelstelle war nunmehr die Gestapo der Hauptakteur, und als Vorwand für den Raub der Klöster dienten nicht länger vermeintliche « Reichsaufgaben » , sondern die angeblich « volks- und staatsfeindliche » Betätigung der Ordensleute. An Stelle des Reichsleistungsgesetzes diente nun die « Reichstagsbrandverordnung » vom 28. Februar 1933 als scheinbare Rechtsgrundlage. Gestapo-Beamte beschlagnahmten reihenweise Klöster, auch ohne daß den Bewohnern Gesetzesverstöße nachgewiesen werden konnten. In den meisten Fällen wurde dies gar nicht erst versucht. Der Einfluß der Gestapo hatte sich inzwischen so verselbständigt, daß sie fast uneingeschränkte Macht ausüben konnte.

Beschlagnahme von Klöstern im Erzbistum Köln

Diese zweite, radikalere Phase des Klostersturms traf insbesondere den Westen des Reiches. Im Erzbistum Köln fielen innerhalb von rund vier Monaten (von April bis Juli 1941) 18 Ordenshäuser, das Erzbischöfliche Priesterseminar in Bensberg und das Exerzitenheim des Erzbischöflichen Stuhls in Altenberg zum Opfer. Betroffen waren insbesondere große, bekannte Klöster, was in der Bevölkerung den Eindruck erweckte, das gesamte Ordenswesen stehe kurz vor der Vernichtung. Das Benediktinerkloster auf dem Siegburger Michaelsberg, das Kloster und Studienhaus der Steyler Patres in Sankt Augustin, die Dominikanerklöster in Köln und Walberberg (heute Stadt Bornheim) , die Redemptoristenklöster in Hennef und Bonn, das Kloster der Väter vom Heiligen Geist in Knechtsteden und mehrere Niederlassungen der Jesuiten wurden zu Opfern des Klostersturms. Auch Frauenklöster blieben nicht verschont : Es traf die Benediktinerinnen von Bonn-Endenich ebenso wie die Karmeliterinnen von Pützchen (heute Stadt Bonn) .

Für die betroffenen Ordensleute bedeutete die Beschlagnahme der Häuser, daß eines Tages unangemeldet zwei bis sechs Gestapo-Beamte vor der Tür standen und das Haus für beschlagnahmt erklärten. In den meisten Fällen mußten die Bewohner die Gebäude innerhalb weniger Stunden oder Tage verlassen, in der Regel wurden sie auch aus dem Rheinland ausgewiesen. Die Beschlagnahmen erfolgten als reiner Gewaltakt : Die Beamten konnten weder schriftliche Verfügungen vorlegen noch Gründe für die Maßnahme nennen. Wenn überhaupt, beriefen sie sich auf « Wunsch und Willen des Führers » (so der Bericht eines Siegburger Benediktinerpaters) oder pauschal auf die angeblich staatsabträgliche Tätigkeit der Ordensleute.

Die Bewohner der Klöster fühlten sich der Gestapo gegenüber ohnmächtig. Gerade für die kontemplativ lebenden Ordensgemeinschaften war die Ausweisung ein schockierendes Erlebnis. « So standen wir, die wir bei unserer strengen Klausur 20, 30, ja 40 Jahre die Straße nicht betreten hatten, nun wieder mitten im Getriebe der Welt » , schrieb die Priorin der Endenicher Benediktinerinnen dazu in ihren Erinnerungen. Immerhin kam die Aufhebung ihres Klosters für sie nicht völlig überraschend, denn die Schwestern hatten natürlich von der Beschlagnahme anderer Klöster gehört. Sie hatten sich zivile, « weltliche » Kleidung besorgen und für die Unterbringung der rund 150 Schwestern Vorbereitungen treffen können. Dies erwies sich mitten im Krieg als sehr schwieriges Unterfangen, doch es gelang, die Schwestern auf mehrere Krankenhäuser, Altersheime und andere Benediktinerinnenklöster aufzuteilen. Drei Monate nach der Beschlagnahme erfolgte die Ausweisung der Schwestern aus der Stadt und dem Kreis Bonn, so daß sich das Unterkunftsproblem ein zweites Mal stellte.

Besonders gründlich hatten sich die Steyler Patres von Sankt Augustin auf die drohende Beschlagnahme ihres Klosters vorbereitet : Auf ihren täglichen Gängen nahmen die Patres regelmäßig Bücher, liturgisches Gerät, andere Wertgegenstände und auch Bargeld aus dem Kloster mit und verschickten es per Post oder Bahn, um es so vor dem Zugriff der Gestapo zu schützen. Das Missionshaus gehörte schließlich zu den letzten Ordenshäusern, die der Beschlagnahme zum Opfer fielen. Trotz der gründlichen Vorbereitung konnte allerdings nur ein kleiner Teil des Klosterinventars vor der Gestapo gerettet werden, nicht zuletzt verblieb das gesamte Mobiliar im Kloster.

Nach der Vertreibung der Ordensleute wurden die Gebäude zu sehr unterschiedlichen Zwecken genutzt. In vielen Fällen rivalisierten verschiedene Wehrmacht- und Parteidienststellen um das Nutzungsrecht. In mehreren beschlagnahmten Klöstern wurden Bombenflüchtlinge untergebracht, in anderen Militärdienststellen. So diente das Missionspriesterseminar in Sankt Augustin (das im offiziellen NS-Sprachgebrauch nur noch « Augustin » heißen durfte) zunächst einer Unteroffiziersschule der Marine, später einer Dolmetscherschule der Luftwaffe als Unterkunft. Zeitweise lebten bis zu 1.500 Personen in dem Gebäude. Auch zivile Behörden profitierten vom Klostersturm : So zogen in das Bonner Paulushaus der Jesuiten das Fliegerschadenamt der Stadt Bonn und das Prüfungsamt der Universität ein.

Zu besonders trauriger Berühmtheit brachte es das Kloster der Endenicher Benediktinerinnen, das von Juni 1941 bis Juli 1942 als Internierungslager für die Bonner Juden diente. Mindestens 479 Menschen wurden dort gefangen gehalten, zu schwerer Arbeit zwangsverpflichtet und schließlich nach Theresienstadt deportiert und dort ermordet.

In anderen Klöstern änderte sich die Nutzung der Gebäude durch die Beschlagnahme nur unwesentlich, denn schon vor dem Klostersturm waren in vielen Klöstern Lazarette eingerichtet worden. Dies geschah durchaus nicht nur unter Zwang, sondern für viele Orden war es eine selbstverständliche Pflicht, auf diese Weise ihren Beitrag zum Krieg zu leisten. « Wir haben in diesen Kriegszeiten unsere Gemeinschaft als solche in den besonderen Dienst des Vaterlandes zu stellen, auch unter großen Opfern », schrieb zum Beispiel der Dominikanerprovinzial Laurentius Siemer im September 1939 an seine Mitbrüder. Um so zynischer mußte es auf die Ordensleute daher wirken, wenn die spätere Enteignung ihrer Gebäude mit ihrer « volks- und staatsfeindlichen Tätigkeit » begründet wurde.

Im weiteren Verlauf des Krieges, als die ordensfeindlichen Absichten des Regimes immer deutlicher wurden, wurde die Bereitstellung von Klöstern als Lazarette deshalb immer mehr zu einem Mittel der Vorwärtsverteidigung : Durch die Kooperation mit der als « anständig » geltenden Wehrmacht hofften die Ordensleute, sich vor Übergriffen durch die Gestapo schützen zu können. In einigen, aber nicht in allen Fällen bewahrheitete sich diese Hoffnung : So konnte zum Beispiel Pater Siemer die Gestapo davon überzeugen, daß der Betrieb des in Walberberg eingerichteten Lazaretts nur weitergeführt werden könne, wenn die Dominikaner dort blieben. Ähnlich erging es den Herz-Jesu-Schwestern in Pützchen. Doch auch in diesen Fällen schützten die Lazarette schließlich nicht vor der Enteignung der Gebäude.

Diese Beobachtungen verdeutlichen, daß der Klostersturm unsystematische, auch irrationale Züge trug : Der Angriff richtete sich nicht gezielt gegen solche Klöster, die sich etwa durch besondere Aktivitäten im Widerstand hervorgetan hätten. Es wurden auch nicht konsequent alle Niederlassungen bestimmter Orden aufgelöst - wenn auch im Rheinland ein Schwerpunkt des Angriffs auf den Niederlassungen der Priesterorden, insbesondere der Jesuiten, lag. Der Angriff richtete sich weniger gegen einzelne Ordensniederlassungen als gegen das Ordenswesen im Allgemeinen.

Die oftmals unsystematische Vorgehensweise der Gestapo-Beamten hat zur Folge, daß oft kaum nachzuweisen ist, warum ein bestimmtes Kloster vom Klostersturm verschont blieb. In Einzelfällen trugen sicherlich gute Kontakte der Ordensangehörigen zu einflußreichen Persönlichkeiten aus der Wehrmacht dazu bei, ein Kloster zu schützen. Dies trifft zum Beispiel auf die Benediktinerabtei Maria Laach im Bistum Trier zu, die von dem General Friedrich von Rabenau (1884-1945) , protegiert wurde. Aufgrund seiner Fürsprache blieb den Laacher Patres die Beschlagnahme ihrer Abtei erspart.

Vermögenseinziehungen

Auf die Beschlagnahme der Gebäude folgte jeweils einige Monate später deren Einziehung zugunsten des Staates, der im Grundbuch als neuer Eigentümer eingetragen wurde. Unter die Enteignung fiel in der Regel auch das gesamte Inventar der Gebäude. Als formale Grundlage für die Vermögenseinziehungen diente das « Gesetz über die Einziehung kommunistischen Vermögens » vom 26. Mai 1933 beziehungsweise dessen Erweiterung im « Gesetz über die Einziehung volks- und staatsfeindlichen Vermögens » vom 14. Juli 1933. Anders als die Beschlagnahmen, die sich vor den Augen der benachbarten Bevölkerung abspielten und nicht selten erhebliches Aufsehen erregten, war die Enteignung ein reiner Schreibtischakt, von dem die Öffentlichkeit nichts erfuhr. Daran beteiligt waren neben der Gestapo auch das Reichsministerium des Innern, das jeweils den Tatbestand der « Volks- und Staatsfeindlichkeit » zu bestätigen hatte, und der jeweils zuständige Regierungspräsident, der die Vermögenseinziehung schließlich vornahm. Die verschiedenen Behörden arbeiteten weitgehend reibungslos zusammen.

Öffentliche Proteste und das Ende der Beschlagnahmen

Der Klostersturm der Nationalsozialisten ist oft als « Nacht- und Nebel-Aktion » bezeichnet worden. Tatsächlich fanden die Beschlagnahmen und die Vertreibung der Ordensleute aber nicht bei Nacht und Nebel, sondern am helllichten Tag in aller Öffentlichkeit statt. Im Januar 1941 konnte Martin Bormann noch triumphierend verkünden, « daß die Bevölkerung keinerlei Unwillen zeige, wenn Klöster einer allgemein geeignet erscheinenden Verwendung zugeführt werden » . In den folgenden Monaten kam es jedoch an verschiedenen Orten zu öffentlichen Protesten gegen die Beschlagnahmen. Laut einem Bericht der Sicherheitspolizei bildete der Klostersturm « zum Teil sogar das Hauptgesprächsthema » in der katholischen Bevölkerung.

Josef Flesch (1899-1962) , der Provinzial der Kölner Provinz der Redemptoristen, berichtete über die Beschlagnahme des Klosters in Hennef-Geistingen :

Für das diktatorische NS-Regime, das die Stimmung in der Bevölkerung gerade im Krieg sehr intensiv beobachtete, konnte diese öffentliche Anteilnahme gefährlich werden.

Die größte Wirkung erzielte schließlich der Protest des Bischofs von Münster, Clemens August Graf von Galen (Episkopat 1943-1946) . An drei Sonntagen im Juli und August 1941 hielt er in Münsteraner Kirchen Predigten, in denen er die nationalsozialistischen Verbrechen in deutlichen Worten benannte und anprangerte. Sein Protest richtete sich vor allem gegen den Klostersturm und gegen den Mord an Behinderten und psychisch Kranken unter dem Decknamen der « Euthanasie » . Diese berühmt gewordenen Predigten wurden weit über Münster hinaus bekannt. Galen selbst hatte für ihre Verbreitung gesorgt. Als Flugblätter und in vielen Abschriften kursierten sie in ganz Deutschland.

Aus Sorge um die Stimmung in der Bevölkerung setzte Hitler schließlich den Beschlagnahmen ein Ende. Am 30. Juli 1941 ordnete er an :

« Ab sofort haben Beschlagnahmen von kirchlichem und klösterlichem Vermögen bis auf weiteres zu unterbleiben. »

In der Folgezeit kam es nur noch vereinzelt zu Beschlagnahmen. Fortgesetzt wurde jedoch die Einziehung des Vermögens der bereits betroffenen Klöster, die als reiner Verwaltungsakt unter Ausschluß der Öffentlichkeit stattfand.

Bis zu Hitlers « Stopp-Erlass » vom 30. Juli 1941 waren dem Klostersturm mehr als 300 Ordenshäuser und kirchliche Einrichtungen zum Opfer gefallen. Zweifellos wäre die Ausbeute von Gestapo und SS noch reicher ausgefallen, wenn Hitler nicht die Einstellung der Aktion befohlen hätte.

Wer gab den Befehl zum Klostersturm ?

Das Ende der Beschlagnahmewelle wurde von Hitler in einem unmissverständlichen Befehl angeordnet. Dagegen gab es keinen Befehl des « Führers », der die Raubaktion ausgelöst hätte. Es stellt sich daher die Frage, auf wessen Anordnung die staatspolizeiliche Beschlagnahme der Klöster erfolgte. In seiner zweiten Phase scheint sich der Raubzug gegen die Klöster mehr und mehr verselbständigt zu haben.

Die beteiligten Beamten äußerten sich nach dem Krieg nur unpräzise zur Frage der Befehlslage. Von einem « Befehl des RSHA » sprach der Leiter der Bonner Gestapo, Walter Proll (1879-1969), in seinem Spruchgerichtsverfahren 1949, konnte den Befehl aber nicht genauer benennen. Ein anderer Kölner Gestapo-Beamter sagte aus, er habe gewußt, « daß der allgemeine Kurs dahin ging, namentlich die katholische Kirche zu bekämpfen ». An diesem « allgemeinen Kurs » konnte freilich im Frühjahr 1941 kein Zweifel mehr bestehen.

Das Beispiel des Klostersturms zeigt eindrucksvoll, wie die Verfolgungsmaßnahmen des NS-Regimes auch ohne einen ausdrücklichen Befehl funktionieren konnten. Es genügten der « allgemeine Kurs » und das Pflichtbewußtsein der beteiligten Beamten. Dabei mußten es nicht einmal besonders Regime nahe oder ideologisch überzeugte Beamte sein, die für die Radikalisierung des Klostersturms sorgten. Dies zeigt das Beispiel der Beschlagnahmen im Rheinland.

Bei den Kölner und Bonner Gestapo-Beamten, die die Beschlagnahmen durchführten, handelte es sich weder um « alte Kämpfer » der NSDAP, noch um jene radikalen, meist jüngeren Polizeimitarbeiter, die vor allem in den späteren Jahren des « Dritten Reiches » zu den Polizeidienststellen stießen. Vielmehr waren es Mitarbeiter, die aus der Zeit vor 1933 übernommen worden, teilweise sogar schon vor 1918 bei der Polizei tätig gewesen waren. Sie waren weder überzeugt nationalsozialistisch (der Leiter der Bonner Gestapo hatte sich vor 1939 für die demokratische DDP engagiert) noch entschieden kirchenfeindlich, sondern gehörten vielmehr zu den « ganz normalen Männern » (Christopher Browning). In vielen Fällen stellte die Kirche ihnen nach dem Krieg sogar ausdrücklich positive Beurteilungen aus. Obwohl diese Beamten keine persönliche oder politische Motivation hatten, gegen die Klöster vorzugehen, wurden sie im Klostersturm in vorausgehendem Gehorsam tätig, auch ohne daß der Befehl zur Aufhebung eines Klosters vorlag. Die Kölner Gestapo korrespondierte in der Angelegenheit der Klöster mit dem Reichssicherheitshauptamt in Berlin, ihrer vorgesetzten Behörde. Oftmals ordnete das Reichssicherheitshauptamt aber zunächst lediglich die Beobachtung eines Klosters an oder forderte einen Bericht über dessen Tätigkeit. Die Kölner Beamten meldeten daraufhin jedoch häufig schon wenig später die Beschlagnahme des betreffenden Gebäudes und gingen damit einen entscheidenden Schritt weiter, als das Reichssicherheitshauptamt gefordert hatte.

Der Klostersturm wurde also nicht allein vom Reichssicherheitshauptamt gesteuert und kontrolliert, vielmehr hatte auch die Eigeninitiative der regionalen Polizeidienststellen einen erheblichen Anteil an seinem Verlauf. Ohne den vorausgehenden Gehorsam der örtlichen Polizeidienststellen hätte der Klostersturm vermutlich gar nicht in derselben Radikalität stattfinden können, denn die Handlungsfähigkeit des Reichssicherheitshauptamts war begrenzt : Zwar war die

Absicht, das katholische Ordenswesen zu zerschlagen, zweifellos vorhanden, doch die Realisierung dieses Ziels war mit großen Schwierigkeiten verbunden. Seit den 1930er Jahren wurde mit großem Aufwand umfangreiches Material über das Ordenswesen in Deutschland gesammelt, doch die systematische Auswertung dieser Informationen und ihre Umsetzung in politische Maßnahmen warfen große Probleme auf. Dies lag nicht zuletzt am mangelnden Fachwissen der Bearbeiter. In der Führungsriege des Reichssicherheitshauptamts war zwar eine Reihe ehemaliger Priester und Ordensangehöriger als « Überläufer » tätig, doch in den unteren Hierarchiestufen mangelte es häufig am grundlegenden Wissen über Orden und Klöster.

Sand im Getriebe : Die Rolle des Oberpräsidiums Koblenz

Daß es auch möglich war, dem « allgemeinen Kurs » der NS-Kirchenpolitik nicht zu folgen, zeigt das Beispiel von Oberregierungsrat Alois Becker (1898-1982) , der beim Oberpräsidium Koblenz für die Verwertung des eingezogenen kirchlichen und klösterlichen Vermögens zuständig war. Der Katholik und promovierte Jurist war seit 1936 als Referent unter anderem für « Geistige Angelegenheiten der Rheinprovinz » tätig. Nach seiner Rückkehr von der Front 1942 übernahm er zusätzlich das Referat für Kommunale Angelegenheiten. Becker war seit 1937 Mitglied der NSDAP, unterhielt aber zugleich Kontakte zu Katholiken im politischen Widerstand wie Josef Wirmer (1901-1944) , Josef Müller (1889-1979) , Augustin Rösch (1893-1961) und Laurentius Siemer.

Die Verwaltung und Verwertung des von den Regierungspräsidenten eingezogenen « volks- und staatsfeindlichen » kirchlichen und klösterlichen Vermögens oblag dem Oberpräsidium der Rheinprovinz in Koblenz und fiel dort in den Aufgabenbereich des Referats für Kommunale Angelegenheiten. Becker war dafür zuständig, die Anträge der Gemeinden und Kommunen zu bearbeiten, die an der Übertragung der Grundstücke interessiert waren, und auf der Grundlage der Anträge dem Reichsinnenminister Vorschläge zur Verwertung des Vermögens zu unterbreiten. Anstatt aber die Verwertung voranzutreiben, verzögerte Becker sie absichtlich, um zu verhindern, daß kirchliches Eigentum verschleudert wurde oder in den Besitz von Parteidienststellen übergang. Er hoffte, daß das Ende des Krieges die Rückgabe der Grundstücke an ihre Eigentümer ermöglichen werde, setzte daher auf Zeitgewinn und schob die Entscheidung über die Übertragung der eingezogenen Vermögenswerte so lange wie möglich auf. Beckers Vorgesetzter, der stellvertretende Oberpräsident und SS-Oberführer Karl Eugen Dellenbusch (1901-1959) , beließ Becker in den kirchenpolitischen Angelegenheiten weitestgehende Handlungsfreiheit. Becker kooperierte mit verschiedenen anderen staatlichen Behörden und auch mit den Leitungen der Klöster.

Seine Verzögerungstaktik hatte Erfolg : In den meisten Fällen konnte er verhindern, daß das Vermögen der enteigneten Klöster und kirchlichen Einrichtungen in der Erzdiözese Köln « verwertet » wurde. Die Anträge von verschiedenen Städten und Gemeinden, von Landwirtschaftsverbänden, der Deutschen Arbeitsfront und der Universität Bonn blieben unberücksichtigt. Lediglich in Altenberg und Knechtsteden konnte Becker die Verwertung des Vermögens nicht verhindern.

Becker bemühte sich nicht nur um die Verzögerung der Vermögensverwertung, sondern setzte sich auch für die akuten Belange der Ordensangehörigen ein. So veranlaßte er den Leiter der Bonner Gestapo dazu, den Ordensleuten in den von ihm verwalteten Klöstern Pützchen, Siegburg und Walberberg größere Handlungsfreiheit einzuräumen, und sorgte dafür, daß die Mitgiften der Endericher Benediktinerinnen von der Einziehung ausgenommen wurden. Die Gestapo hatte sie zunächst für das Reich eingefordert. Mehrfach stellte Becker den Vertretern der Klöster beziehungsweise der Erzdiözese Akten zur Verfügung, die ihnen bei der Formulierung von Protestschreiben hilfreich waren, und setzte sich außerdem für die Rettung der Klosterbibliotheken ein.

Durch sein Engagement brachte Becker sich allmählich selbst in Gefahr. Zweimal wurde er bei der Gestapo angezeigt, konnte sich aber beide Male aus der Affäre ziehen, weil als politisch zuverlässig geltende Personen zu seinen Gunsten aussagten. Als das Reichsinnenministerium jedoch wenig später mit Nachdruck die Verwertung der Klöster in der Rheinprovinz forderte, konnte Dellenbusch Becker nicht länger decken. Während die Verwertung in den übrigen preußischen Provinzen bereits abgeschlossen war, hatte sie in der Rheinprovinz kaum begonnen. Becker entschloß sich zur Flucht : Er ließ sich ein ärztliches Gutachten ausstellen, das es ihm erlaubte, einen Erholungsurlaub anzutreten, und meldete sich anschließend freiwillig zu Schanzarbeiten am Westwall. Bis zum Ende des Krieges kehrte er nicht auf seinen Posten zurück und erhielt auch keinen Nachfolger.

Unter den Behörden, die mit der Beschlagnahme und Enteignung der rheinischen Klöster befaßt waren, spielte das Oberpräsidium Koblenz eine zu geringe Rolle, als daß Becker die Klöster vor dem Klostersturm hätte bewahren können. Dennoch rettete er, was noch zu retten war, konnte in vielen einzelnen Belangen Abhilfe schaffen und vor allem das eingezogene Vermögen vor der Zerstückelung schützen. Für die Rückerstattungsprozesse nach dem Krieg bedeutete dies eine entscheidende Erleichterung.

Für die betroffenen Ordensleute war der Klostersturm mit Adolf Hitlers « Stopp-Erlass » vom 30. Juli 1941 nicht zu Ende. Bis zum Ende des Krieges blieben sie vertrieben und konnten erst 1945 einen Neuanfang machen. Vielerorts fanden die zurückkehrenden Ordensleute völlig zerstörte Gebäude vor. Dafür hatten nicht nur die alliierten Bombenangriffe gesorgt, sondern auch mutwillige Zerstörungsaktionen wie in Sankt Augustin, wo ein Wehrmachtangehöriger ein Munitionsdepot zur Explosion gebracht hatte. Hinzu kamen immense Schäden durch die jahrelange Überbelegung der Häuser. Viele beschlagnahmte Klostergebäude waren auch bei Kriegsende noch von Flüchtlingen oder Umsiedlern bewohnt oder wurden weiterhin als Lazarette genutzt. Der Klosterbetrieb konnte deshalb nur nach und nach wieder aufgenommen werden.

Einige Klöster hatten zudem den Verlust großer Teile ihrer Bibliotheken zu beklagen, darunter auch wertvoller mittelalterlicher Bände. Die Nationalsozialisten hatten das Ziel verfolgt, eine zentrale Bibliothek zur Gegnerforschung einzurichten und zu diesem Zweck die Klosterbibliotheken ausgeräumt. Der Aufbau der Zentralbibliothek ging jedoch nur schleppend voran. Die Bestände der rheinischen Klosterbibliotheken wurden auseinander gerissen und fanden sich nach dem Krieg teilweise in Kellern, Stadtbibliotheken oder Antiquariaten wieder.

Die Wiedergutmachungsprozesse um die Rückerstattung des geraubten Eigentums und die Entschädigung der Eigentümer gestalteten sich kompliziert und langwierig. Sie zogen sich bis in die 1970er Jahre hin. Unter den zahllosen Verfolgten des NS-Regimes machten die Klöster nur einen verschwindend geringen Anteil aus und wurden folglich bei den Wiedergutmachungsprozessen nicht vorrangig behandelt.

Gravierender als die materiellen Schäden wirkte sich in den Nachkriegsjahrzehnten jedoch der Einbruch der Nachwuchszahlen aus, die der Nationalsozialismus mit sich gebracht hatte. Durch verschiedene Gesetze und Verordnungen hatte die NS-Regierung den Ordensnachwuchs schon vor dem Klostersturm stark beschnitten, und nach den Beschlagnahmen konnte so gut wie gar kein Nachwuchs mehr aufgenommen und ausgebildet werden. Die Orden und Kongregationen haben sich von diesem Rückschlag nie wieder ganz erholt. Die Folgen der NS-Herrschaft wirkten nach dem Krieg mit allgemeinen Tendenzen der Säkularisierung und Entkirchlichung in der deutschen Gesellschaft zusammen. Von den 18 Klöstern, die im Erzbistum Köln dem Klostersturm zum Opfer fielen, mussten sieben inzwischen geschlossen werden, auch die übrigen haben sich stark verkleinert. So bildete Himmlers Klostersturm eine tiefe Zäsur in der Ordensgeschichte, deren Folgen bis heute spürbar sind.

Les Nazis au couvent

Nazis in the nunnery

On 2 July 1936, an impressive ceremony was held in a small city in Saxony. Heinrich Himmler, the leader of the SS, led a procession of Nazi officials through the streets, past ranks of SS troopers and « Hitler Youth », winding their way-up to the 10th Century monastery that sat on a hill in the middle of the city. There, in the crypt of the monastery, Himmler and his other guests took part in a solemn ritual.

The reason for their gathering in this monastery was one which is very familiar to medieval historians - they were there to commemorate a dead king on the anniversary of his death. The king in question was Henry I (aka : Henry the Fowler) , who had died 1,000 years earlier, on 2 July 936. Henry was a member of the Liudolfings, a family of Saxon aristocrats who had been steadily gaining power in the years after the collapse of the Carolingian Empire, in 888. After the death of Conrad I in 918, Henry was able to take the throne himself. With his rise to the throne, Henry founded a new dynasty of Kings and Emperors : the Ottonians. Under his descendants, the eastern regions of the former Carolingian Empire would be reformed into a new Empire : the 1st German « Reich » .

Henry, believed to be the 1st king of the medieval German State, was unsurprisingly an evocative figure in Nazi Germany. Himmler, who already was keenly interested in the origins of the German people, was particularly fascinated by this dead King. To Himmler, Henry was the founder of the 1st « Reich » , the inspiration for the 3rd « Reich » , and a heroic ancestral figure who embodied German potential.

This meant he, and his body, was of great symbolic significance. Henry's tomb was housed in the female monastery of Quedlinburg. Henry was buried in a stone sarcophagus alongside his wife, Queen Mathilda, and their granddaughter, Abbess Mathilda of Quedlinburg. Their tombs sat in the east end of the church, perched on a knuckle of rock which looked-out over the plains stretching to the eastern border of the Empire and the lands of the Hungarians beyond it.

Quedlinburg was not just a monastery, it was a powerful political centre in the 10th Century. It was a former fortress which looked-out towards the border of the Empire, and it was a monastery filled with women dedicated to serving

God. It was a place where a dead ruler was buried and where other rulers came to hold political meetings and to celebrate Christian Festivals. Quedlinburg was full of contradictions and it was those contradictions which made it such a powerful symbolic place for the Ottonians.

The symbolism of this wasn't just important in the 10th Century - Himmler tried to capitalize on it in the 20th Century too. He provided funding for a new sarcophagus for Henry, resplendent in Nazi imagery. He financed research into the grave inscription on Abbess Mathilda's tomb (which handily concluded that Poland was definitively brought into the German Empire under Otto III) . And, to top all this off, he turned Quedlinburg itself into a new cult centre for the SS.

Rather than continue as a Christian church, Himmler wanted Quedlinburg, one of the spiritual hearts of the 1st German Empire, to be the spiritual heart for the SS, the elite of the new « Reich » . From 1936 onwards, the anniversary of Henry I's death saw new commemorations for the King at in the crypt at Quedlinburg, decorated with massive banners featuring the SS symbol.

In the 10th Century, Quedlinburg was a place whose symbolic nature meant it could stand for a whole host of different ideas about power, legitimacy and Imperial rule. It was this wealth of symbolic meaning which made Quedlinburg particularly valuable to the Ottonian Emperors. It was also these meanings which, a millennium later, drew the attention of those looking to gain legitimacy and Imperial rule in Germany for themselves - even if it was under very different circumstances.

Évian, Munich et leurs conséquences

La conférence d'Évian

Le 23 mars 1938, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, président des États-Unis, prend l'initiative de convoquer une conférence internationale sur la question des réfugiés en provenance du « Reich » . Avant la conférence, Roosevelt prend ses précautions à l'égard des 32 États convoqués affirmant qu'il ne s'agit pas d'augmenter les quotas d'immigration ou de financer l'accueil des réfugiés. L'Allemagne n'est pas invitée, la présence du Portugal n'est pas jugée utile. L'URSS et la Tchécoslovaquie ne dépêchent pas de représentants, l'Italie, solidaire de l'Allemagne, refuse l'invitation. La Hongrie, la Roumanie, la Pologne et l'Afrique du Sud envoient des observateurs. Le Royaume-Uni accepte l'invitation non sans s'être assuré auparavant que les États-Unis ne tenteraient pas d'obtenir de sa part une augmentation des immigrants juifs dans les territoires sous mandat britannique.

Les représentants des 32 États qui siègent finalement du 6 au 15 juillet à l'hôtel Royal à Évian (France) expriment leur sympathie aux victimes des persécutions tout en affirmant que la situation économique et sociale de leur pays ne leur permet pas d'accroître les contingents d'immigration. Une sous-commission auditionne en une après-midi, les représentants de 40 organisations de réfugiés et les organisations juives, dont celles du « Reich » . La conférence n'aboutit à aucun résultat concret, sinon à créer un Comité intergouvernemental pour les réfugiés siégeant à Londres et destiné à donner une suite à cette rencontre.

Les Juifs allemands et autrichiens voient tous leurs espoirs s'effondrer. Les dirigeants nazis, assurés que les gouvernements occidentaux ne viendront pas faire obstacle à leur politique, intensifient les mesures forçant les Juifs à émigrer. Mais l'absence de pays d'accueil empêche ces derniers de quitter l'Allemagne.

Les Accords de Munich

Signés dans la nuit du 29 au 30 septembre 1938 par l'Allemagne, la France, le Royaume-Uni et l'Italie, ces accords conviennent des dispositions et conditions réglementant la cession des territoires des Sudètes où résident des populations allemandes, à l'Allemagne.

L'expulsion des Juifs des Sudètes

Moins d'un mois après la signature des Accords de Munich, en septembre 1938, Hitler expulse vers la Tchécoslovaquie plusieurs milliers de Juifs qui vivent dans la région des Sudètes. Les Tchécoslovaques refusant de les laisser entrer, ceux-ci tentent de se réfugier en Hongrie. Mais ils sont renvoyés en Allemagne par les autorités hongroises puis à nouveau dirigés vers la Tchécoslovaquie par les autorités nazies. Ils sont finalement conduits de force vers des camps de toile improvisés installés dans un « no man's land » séparant la Hongrie et la Tchécoslovaquie, comme à Mischdorf, à une vingtaine de kilomètres de Bratislava.

L'expulsion des Juifs polonais

Le 31 mars 1938, le Parlement polonais vote une loi définissant toute une série de cas dans lesquels un ressortissant polonais vivant à l'étranger peut être privé de sa nationalité. En octobre 1938, un nouveau décret annonce l'annulation des passeports des Polonais résidant à l'étranger qui n'auront pas obtenu une autorisation spéciale d'entrer en Pologne avant la fin du mois. Or, plus de 40 % des Juifs vivant dans le « Reich » sont nés en Pologne. Le 27 et 28 octobre 1938, la police et les SS arrêtent et regroupent tous les Juifs polonais de sexe masculin, les transportent aux environs de Zbaszyn, ville polonaise, où ils leur font franchir la rivière qui sépare les 2 pays. Les femmes et les enfants privés de tout moyen de subsistance sont obligés de suivre les hommes. La majorité d'entre eux arrive en train, munie seulement de quelques affaires et d'une somme d'argent limitée à 10 Marks par personnes. Les Grynszpan, une famille juive originaire de Hanovre fait partie des 16,000 juifs polonais reconduits à la frontière, leur fils Herschel se trouve à Paris dans la clandestinité. Dès leur arrivée en Pologne, conformément aux instructions reçues les gardes frontières polonais les refoulent.

La « Nuit de Cristal »

Après 5 années de national-socialisme, les chefs du régime constatent que, malgré les menaces et les brimades, les 3/4 de la population juive du « Reich » ont choisi de rester. Situation d'autant plus préoccupante que presque 200,000 Juifs résidants en Autriche tombent sous l'autorité du « Reich » après l'« Anschluß ». 1938 sera l'année d'une radicalisation et d'une accélération des mesures antisémites visant à éliminer toute présence juive, en particulier dans l'économie, et à encourager une émigration massive. Ces mesures législatives s'accompagnent d'actes de violence dont le point culminant sera la « Nuit de Cristal » .

L'assassinat de Ernst vom Rath par Herschel Grynszpan

Le 7 novembre 1938, Herschel Grynszpan, Juif polonais d'origine allemande qui habite Paris et veut protester contre la récente expulsion des Juifs polonais vivant en Allemagne par-delà la frontière polonaise, se présente à l'ambassade d'Allemagne et blesse mortellement Ernst vom Rath, secrétaire d'ambassade.

En France, Grynszpan est inculpé par le juge Tesnière de tentative d'assassinat et de meurtre avec préméditation. Transféré à Berlin, Grynszpan est interrogé puis incarcéré à Sachsenhausen, le 18 janvier 1941, et fait plusieurs séjours à la prison de la « Gestapo » . Personne n'a jamais su avec certitude ce qu'il advint de Grynszpan. Si, en février 1936, le meurtre de Wilhelm Gustloff, chef d'une branche suisse du Parti nazi, par David Frankfurter, étudiant juif d'origine yougoslave était passé inaperçu en raison des Jeux olympiques de Berlin celui de vom Rath est, pour les Nazis, le prétexte au déclenchement de la « Nuit de Cristal » .

Le pogrom anti-juifs

À l'annonce de l'attentat contre vom Rath, la presse allemande développe à l'envi le thème de la conspiration juive mondiale et menace de sévères représailles. C'est le prétexte idéal pour faire la chasse aux Juifs et les contraindre à quitter massivement l'Allemagne. Le 9 novembre au soir à Munich, Josef Goebbels prononce un discours violent d'incitation aux représailles devant les chefs nazis réunis à l'ancien Hôtel de Ville de Munich pour la commémoration du « Putsch » de 1923 et annonce que des pogroms anti-juifs ont éclaté dans les districts de Kurhessen (Heße-Cassel) et de Magdeburg-Anhalt. Il ajoute que, sur sa suggestion, Hitler a décidé de ne rien faire pour empêcher un mouvement qui s'étendrait spontanément à l'ensemble du « Reich » .

À l'annonce du décès de vom Rath, l'émeute se propage avec une rapidité foudroyante. La SA donne ordre à ses troupes d'incendier systématiquement toutes les synagogues du pays. Informé des événements dans la nuit, Heinrich Himmler a une réaction relativement modérée, ordonnant à ses troupes d'entrer en action pour empêcher un pillage généralisé et pour interner une vingtaine de milliers de Juifs dans les camps de concentration. Les agresseurs se ruent à l'assaut des symboles de la vie juive.

Près d'une centaine de Juifs sont assassinés, plusieurs sont gravement blessés, des femmes sont violées. En Autriche, le pogrom est plus violent encore : 42 synagogues sont détruites, 27 Juifs tués, une centaine est gravement blessée. 6 500 personnes sont arrêtées et transférées principalement aux camps de concentration de Dachau et Buchenwald. La grande majorité des internés Juifs allemands et Juifs autrichiens, lors de la « Nuit de Cristal » , est progressivement libérée entre le 18 novembre 1938 et le printemps 1939 s'ils s'engagent à émigrer sans tarder et à abandonner la majeure partie de leurs biens. Parmi eux, les vieillards, les grands malades, ceux qui peuvent prouver qu'ils vont émigrer ou accepter de céder leurs entreprises à un Aryen pour un prix dérisoire, sont les lers libérés. Le froid, les mauvais traitements et les maladies provoquent la mort de plusieurs centaines « de Juifs de novembre » . La communauté juive est condamnée à payer une amende de un milliard de Marks pour avoir causé ces dommages « en provoquant la juste colère du peuple allemand ». Elle sera prélevée sur les 7 milliards d'avoirs juifs bloqués depuis avril 1938.

Le déchaînement de violence donne à tort l'impression d'une émeute spontanée. En fait, à l'exception d'une minorité, la population est restée spectatrice. Peu de voix s'élèvent pour protester officiellement. Les Églises restent silencieuses.

Dans la journée du 10, les violences cessent. Le bilan est très lourd : destruction de 267 synagogues en Allemagne, de nombreuses maisons communautaires, de milliers de lieux privés (maisons, appartements et commerces) . À ces destructions matérielles s'est ajouté l'assassinat de 91 Juifs, l'arrestation et la déportation de 30,000 hommes à Dachau et Buchenwald. Dans les semaines qui suivent, la communauté juive est secouée par une vague de suicides sans précédents (680 dans la seule ville de Vienne) , et la vague d'émigration vers l'Europe occidentale et la Palestine s'accélère.

Conscient du retentissement à l'échelle nationale et internationale de cet événement (condamnation de l'opinion publique et politique au Royaume-Uni et aux États-Unis, boycott des entreprises en France, Canada, Pays-Bas) , le régime nazi décide de ne pas renouveler d'actions similaires au grand jour.

L'indifférence des Nations

Des réfugiés pris au piège

La « Nuit de Cristal » suscite l'indignation et de vives protestations dans un grand nombre de pays occidentaux, sans pour autant provoquer de modifications de la politique d'immigration de ces États.

En France

Si les critiques de la « Nuit de Cristal » sont vives dans la presse, le gouvernement Daladier reste muet afin de ne pas compromettre le rapprochement en cours avec l'Allemagne nazie (les accords Ribbentrop-Bonnet) . De 1933 à 1937, la France a accueilli plusieurs dizaines de milliers de réfugiés provenant essentiellement d'Allemagne et d'Autriche. Cependant, le gouvernement du Front populaire crée un sous-secrétariat d'état à l'immigration en 1937 et le droit d'asile est restreint en 1938. En février 1939, le pays est submergé par l'arrivée de 500,000 réfugiés espagnols.

En Allemagne

La terreur vécue pendant la « Nuit de Cristal », les arrestations massives et la vague de nouvelles lois, transforment le flot migratoire en exode massif. Le 24 janvier 1939, Hermann Göring charge Wilhelm Frick, ministre de l'intérieur, de « réaliser par tous les moyens l'émigration des Juifs hors d'Allemagne ». Ce même mois de janvier, l'Office central pour l'émigration juive est fondé à Berlin sous la direction de Reinhard Heydrich. Sur le plan intérieur, Göring prend la relève de Josef Goebbels pour l'organisation des suites du pogrom. La réunion des principaux responsables nazis du 12 novembre 1938, décide de la multiplication des mesures anti-juives : dissolution des organisations juives (à l'exception du « Reichsvertretung », organe représentatif des Juifs d'Allemagne, du « Kulturbund », organisation culturelle et de l'office palestinien de l'organisation sioniste), suppression de la presse juive, restriction des déplacements des Juifs dans les lieux publics, expulsion des Juifs de leurs logements et concentration dans des « maisons juives ».

La Palestine fermée par le « Livre Blanc »

En mai 1939, le Royaume-Uni décide de limiter strictement l'immigration en Palestine en annonçant la mise en place d'un « Livre blanc » réduisant l'accueil des réfugiés à 75,000 Juifs pour 5 ans.

Soucieux de préserver leurs intérêts dans la région, les Anglais préférèrent maintenir le statu quo. Les forces navales britanniques n'hésitent pas à intercepter et à renvoyer à leurs ports de départ, généralement Constanza en Roumanie, les bateaux chargés de Juifs pour lesquels la Palestine est le dernier espoir : le 25 mars 1939, le Sandru avec 269 réfugiés ; le 6 avril 1939, l'Astir avec 698 réfugiés ; le 23 avril 1939, l'Assimi avec 250 réfugiés.

AB 106 : La propagande nazie

La propagande nazie faisait partie des attributions du Ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande, dirigé par Josef Goebbels. Le Parti nazi avait lui aussi son officine de promotion : la « Reichspropagandaleitung der NSDAP », également dirigé par Goebbels.

La propagande nazie commença dès les années 1920. Mais avec l'accession au pouvoir d'Adolf Hitler, elle pouvait faire appel à tous les moyens possibles, attachant une importance particulière au sport et au cinéma. Celle-ci devint ainsi un élément fondamental de la « Gleichschaltung » (mise-au-pas) de la société allemande, et devint un élément central du caractère totalitaire du régime.

L'efficacité de cette prise de pouvoir sur les consciences du peuple est plus ambiguë que ce que les images ont pu suggérer, une distanciation s'opérant : l'auteur anonyme du récit « Une femme à Berlin » évoque les réflexions des Berlinoises aux dernières heures de la guerre, coincés dans les caves alors que l'Armée rouge envahit la ville, se remémorant les ultimes appels des leaders du régime à la radio.

Cinéma

Dès le 12 septembre 1933, Adolf Hitler crée un Département du Film au sein du Bureau central de la propagande du parti du NSDAP dirigé par Josef Goebbels. Le Département, mené par le « Reichsamtsleiter » Karl Neumann, aurait participé à la production d'entre 1,150 et 1,350 films de propagande, tels que « le Juif éternel » (1939) de Fritz Hippler, réalisateur également responsable du cinéma au Ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande. Dès 1933, et avant même la création du « Reichsfilmkammer » (Chambre du film « Reich »), corporation à laquelle l'adhésion est obligatoire pour pouvoir réaliser un film, le Ministère de la Propagande exclut tout Juif et/ou étranger de la production cinématographique allemande. Une censure préventive était organisée par le « Reichsfilm dramaturg » .

L'ensemble de la production cinématographique est progressivement nationalisée. Le « holding » Cautio Treuhand, instrument du ministère de Goebbels et dirigé par Max Winkler, achète en 1937 Universum Film AG, qui tourne en 1943 « les Aventures fantastiques du baron Münchhausen » afin de fêter, conformément aux souhaits de Goebbels, les 25 ans d'existence de la Société. Ce film fut évoqué comme exemple de propagande nazie par Joseph Joffo dans « un Sac de billes » (1973) . En 1942, après plusieurs fusions importantes (dont celle avec la firme autrichienne Wien-Film, qui avait donné son nom au genre apolitique, souvent proche de la comédie, dit Wiener Film) , ce « holding » créa l'Ufi-Group, lequel monopolisait la production cinématographique.

Les actualités hebdomadaires des Nazis sont projetées dans toutes les salles de cinéma. Outre les films de Leni Riefenstahl (dont « le Triomphe de la volonté » , qui dépeint le congrès de Nuremberg du NSDAP de 1934) qui encensent le régime nazi, certains documentaires poursuivent des objectifs de propagande adressée à l'ennemi davantage encore qu'aux Allemands. C'est le cas du documentaire non achevé « Theresienstadt » , tourné à l'été 1944 au camp de concentration de Theresienstadt et qui visait à faire croire à la Croix-Rouge danoise que les détenus juifs y étaient bien traités. Son réalisateur, Kurt Gerron, fut ensuite gazé à Auschwitz, comme la plupart des membres de l'équipe de tournage, enrôlés contre leur gré.

La plupart des films produits sous le Nazisme visent cependant à divertir les masses : seul 1/6 de la production cinématographique traitent explicitement de la politique. Ainsi, sur les 1,350 longs-métrages produits entre 1933 et 1945, on compte 1,200 divertissements.

Affiche

Comme tous les mouvements politiques de l'époque, la propagande nazie a abondamment recouru aux affiches. Theo Matejko fut l'un des illustrateurs les plus réputés enrôlés dans cette production d'art militant.

Le 2 février 1933, les journaux d'avis contraires au régime sont interdits de parution.

En 1940, le magazine couleur « Signal » est introduit par le régime comme vecteur de propagande à l'échelle européenne.

Le Mouvement « Völkisch »

Le Mouvement « Völkisch » est un courant intellectuel et politique de la Révolution conservatrice apparu en Allemagne à la fin du XIXe siècle et au début du XXe siècle, héritée des « Teutomanes », pour désigner un entrelacs de personnalités, et de conglomérat d'associations, dont l'élément commun est le projet de donner à l'ensemble des Allemands une spiritualité païenne ; en général, le paganisme germanique.

Ce courant d'idées puise ses sources dans le Romantisme allemand des années 1840 et dans les désillusions de la période 1849-1862, entre l'écrasement du printemps des peuples et l'arrivée de Bismarck au pouvoir en Prusse.

Important par le nombre de groupuscules, mais peu par celui de ses adhérents, et de par les évolutions sociétales, le mouvement idéologique s'est trouvé face à de nouveaux problèmes lui imposant une nouvelle définition.

Pour les uns, le courant « völkisch » découle d'une vocation raciste permanente, lié aux apports de la biologie et du « darwinisme social ». Pour d'autres, il représente un courant foncièrement antisémite, ou ravivant un passé germanique largement mythique soit occultiste et luttant contre le christianisme, plus généralement les monothéismes.

Au XIXe siècle, le terme « völkisch » met l'accent (entre autres, par le Mouvement « Völkisch ») sur le caractère spécifique, exceptionnel, mystique du peuple allemand et le maintien de ses traditions. C'est ensuite l'affirmation de l'idée et du concept de race, de la supériorité des germaniques, unis par des liens de sang, de langue et de culture.

Les termes « völkisch » et « Volk » partagent en commun une racine : le terme « Volk », qui renvoie au terme français de « Peuple ». Le « Volk » ne renvoie pas uniquement à une population donnée, mais aussi, pour les théoriciens de la nation allemande au XIXe siècle, à quelque chose de plus abstrait, un intermédiaire entre les individus et une entité supérieure. Pour certains, la nature (perçue comme spécifique à un espace donnée, vivante et spontanée) ; pour d'autres, l'univers.

Le « Volk » est non seulement inscrit dans un cadre précis, la nature et ses manifestations, mais aussi dans une histoire longue et mythifiée. Ainsi, le « Volk » est une entité historique oubliée, qui resurgit à la faveur de la Révolution française : est ainsi idéalisé le « Volk » médiéval, tel que le perçoivent les Romantiques allemands. Pour tous les penseurs du « Volk », l'enracinement de celui-ci à un paysage, à un pays, constitue l'un des piliers du « Volksgeist », notion difficilement traduisible, mais qui rend indissociable l'histoire, le territoire, l'architecture et le paysage (ou la nature) dans une totalité indivisible.

De plus, le « Volk » est un tout unique, une communauté immuable que les évolutions de la société dans les années 1860 désorganisent et disloquent. Ainsi, pour Paul de Lagarde, les agents de division de la nation allemande sont les Libéraux et les Juifs : les uns, car ils sont favorables à la liberté de circulation ; les autres, car ils forment précisément un « Volk » uni, qui tend à diriger les autres nations et sont les propagateurs du Libéralisme, mais des Juifs peuvent individuellement être détachés de ce « Volk » et intégrés dans la communauté germanique. Au fil des réflexions sur le « Volk », les penseurs « völkisch » développent un antisémitisme de plus en plus virulent. Lagarde, par exemple, voit dans le peuple juif un autre « Volk » ; puis, à partir de 1873, souhaite exterminer les Juifs comme on extermine de la vermine et des bacilles contagieux.

Face aux évolutions politiques et économiques de l'Allemagne du dernier tiers du XIXe siècle, un certain nombre de penseurs se réfugient dans la nostalgie d'un passé mythifié et magnifié. Ces penseurs tentent de ressusciter un moment historique dans lequel le « Volk » était uni et non divisé en multiples catégories sociales. Ainsi, l'Empire allemand ne répond pas à ces attentes, car il n'est pas tourné vers le retour aux espaces ruraux, mais s'oriente vers l'industrialisation et ses corollaires économiques et sociaux.

Mais surtout, les conditions de l'Unité, qui contrairement à 1848, n'a pas été l'occasion de grands élans populaires, déçoivent fondamentalement les précurseurs du « Volk ». Ainsi, dans les débuts de l'Empire, Paul de Lagarde s'en prend constamment aux fondements de l'État nouvellement unifié. Il ne cesse de se proclamer le principal adversaire de Bismarck, qu'il accuse d'avoir mis en place une « petite Allemagne » atrophie, qui ne peut ainsi réaliser son destin, la conquête de la « Mitteleuropa », définie comme l'Empire d'Autriche ; en outre, conservateur, Lagarde s'oppose à la forme institutionnelle prise par le nouveau « Reich », essentiellement la mise en place d'une forme de parlementarisme. De plus, dans son obsession de retour aux origines du « Volk », Lagarde s'oppose aux Libéraux, perçus par les conservateurs dont il fait partie, comme des fauteurs de troubles. Les Libéraux sont, en effet, ceux par lesquels les conflits arrivent, qui remettent en cause l'unité et l'esprit du « Volk » .

Mais les réserves de Lagarde ne sont pas celles de la génération suivante, qui analyse le « Reich », une fois Bismarck parti, comme une république avec une tête couronnée ; il appelle donc de ses vœux la création d'une pompe Impériale, avec la création d'un Empereur secret, doté des attributs à la fois de Martin Luther, qui serait à la fois législateur éclairé et « Führer » du peuple, mais qui ne serait en aucun cas un représentant de la dynastie prussienne.

Le Mouvement « Völkisch » se dote très tôt d'une série d'idées et de penseurs, et forme ainsi une nébuleuse intellectuelle très active dès les années 1860. De ce fourmillement d'idées, certaines lignes de forces se dégagent.

Tout d'abord, un certain intérêt pour la genèse de l'Allemagne et des Allemands, donc pour l'histoire se fait jour. Ainsi, dès la phase finale de l'unification allemande (1867-1871), les anciens Germains décrits par Tacite, puis les Goths par leur activité, sont magnifiés, car ils représentent, les uns, les « Allemands de leur jeunesse », les autres, une valeur absolue, car, par leurs victoires, liées à leur vitalité, ils accélèrent la chute de Rome. Ainsi, le « Volk » allemand se trouve le dépositaire, par ces racines, de toute l'énergie de ces peuples disparus.

Ensuite, les penseurs « völkisch », obsédés par les racines du « Volk » germanique, défendaient l'idée de pureté de la race germanique ; dans un contexte scientifique marqué par le développement de l'anthropologie et de la philologie, certains penseurs « völkisch » déterminent non seulement un certain nombre de traits physiques communs à tous les peuples partageant des racines germaniques, mais aussi insistent sur les liens de parenté entre certaines langues, donc entre certains peuples, plongeant eux aussi leurs racines dans le terreau germanique. Mais cette pureté n'est pas seulement avérée par l'étude de la philologie ou de l'anthropologie, elle est aussi avérée par certains par des critères de pureté de la race : pour Max Müller, les populations européennes de langues germaniques sont les descendants directs des populations aryennes qui ont essaimé depuis l'Inde ; dans la lignée d'Arthur de Gobineau, les penseurs « völkisch » défendent la nécessité de pureté de la race, sous peine de disparition.

Un certain nombre de penseurs « völkisch », dans la lignée du courant Romantique, magnifie le passé médiéval de l'Allemagne, et s'intéresse à l'histoire allemande. Pour Julius Langbehn, le modèle Impérial allemand reste celui incarné par les « Hohenstaufen », dont les « Hohenzollern » ne sont que la triste et pâle copie.

Cette exigence de pureté de la race germanique trouve son prolongement logique dans le développement de différentes formes d'antisémitisme. L'existence de ces différentes formes illustrent les différentes conceptions de la figure du Juif qui sont présentes au sein du Mouvement « Völkisch ». Dès le départ, le Juif, habitant mystérieux d'un ghetto fantasmé, est perçu comme un élément étranger au « Volk » ; il peut être appréhendé comme un déraciné, donc privé des hautes qualités morales permises par l'intimité du lien entre le « Volk » et son territoire, ou bien comme un acteur entreprenant de complots ourdis contre les non-Juifs.

Dans les années 1850, la littérature populaire présente le Juif comme un archétype caractérisé par l'avarice, l'ambition, l'envie, la laideur et l'absence d'humanité : il ne peut donc connaître l'ascension sociale que s'il s'appuie sur des procédés déloyaux, et l'oppose à l'Allemand (ou au chrétien), membre d'un « Volk », droit et honnête, qui finit par triompher du malhonnête par sa droiture et sa grandeur d'âme. Dans le cadre de cette opposition, la question juive n'est plus, pour les membres des courants « völkisch », seulement une question de race ou de religion, mais aussi une question d'éthique.

Pour Julius Langbehn, les Juifs sont des représentants d'un « Volk » étranger, que le « Volk » allemand ne peut assimiler (à l'image d'une « pomme qui ne peut se transformer en prune ») qu'il divise en 2 catégories : les Juifs orthodoxes et les Juifs assimilés. La Ire est acceptée, car elle n'a pas répudié sa spécificité et les traits qui rendent ses membres parties d'un « Volk » spécifique ; la seconde, les Juifs assimilés, doivent par contre être exterminés, comme un poison. Cette approche eschatologique, qui voit dans l'extermination d'éléments étrangers au « Volk » une étape vers la réalisation d'un projet national allemand à l'échelle du continent, se place ainsi dans une perspective de régénération du « Volk » allemand, par la victoire remportée par une conception du monde sur une autre conception du monde.

Pour les penseurs « völkisch », tout ce qui fait référence à la société industrielle, alors en cours de formation, est rejeté ; mais cette opposition touche différents domaines selon les auteurs. Pour Paul de Lagarde, l'incarnation du mal, c'est le Libéralisme. Pour Julius Langbehn, c'est la science. Ce refus de la modernité est, en réalité, le refus d'un monde quantifiable, réductible à des équations mathématiques et à des phénomènes mécaniques, d'un monde physique composé uniquement d'atomes, c'est-à-dire de matière.

La modernité dans son ensemble est rejetée, car elle brise les liens qui unissent les membres du « Volk », elle constitue la cause première du déclin de l'Allemagne ; corollaire de ce rejet, sont rejetés ceux qui apportent cette modernité, les Juifs, « peste et choléra passagers » selon le mot de Langbehn, peuple protéiforme, sans patrie, mais candidat à la domination sur les Allemands.

Ainsi est magnifiée l'image du paysan allemand. En effet, celui-ci n'est pas encore touché par la société moderne, qui est proche des racines du « Volk » germanique. Ces paysans ont leur aire de prédilection, la Basse-Allemagne, l'Allemagne du Nord-Ouest ; cette Allemagne authentique s'oppose à la Prusse, conglomérat de Slaves, de Juifs et de Français, mais fait cependant alliance avec elle pour faire renaître la germanité. C'est dans cette Allemagne du Nord-Ouest, l'ancienne Saxe d'avant la conquête carolingienne, que vivent les Allemands les plus authentiques, selon Langbehn : les paysans « Niederdeutsche », dont le type même constitue l'incarnation du « Volk » germanique, non touché par la modernité, d'ascendance respectable, car enraciné sur un terroir.

Une partie importante de la nébuleuse « Völkisch » souhaite un essor territorial de l'Allemagne bien au-delà des frontières du « Reich ». Les idéologues « Völkisch » ne sont pas forcément favorable à une expansion outre-mer mais, plutôt, à une expansion européenne, avec la création d'un vaste Empire européen à coloniser par l'envoi de populations germaniques qui prendraient la place de populations non allemandes refoulées.

Ainsi, pour Paul de Lagarde, l'avenir de l'Allemagne est à l'Est, sur des territoires enlevés à l'Autriche ou à la Russie ; une fois annexée l'ensemble de l'Autriche, l'Allemagne devrait pouvoir librement coloniser le pourtour russe de la Mer Noire et l'Ukraine.

Julius Langbehn, dans la lignée Paul de Lagarde, préconise la création d'un espace allemand d'Amsterdam à Riga, avec la réunification de tous les peuples du rameau germanique, dans le cadre de ce qu'il nomme une « politique familiale » .

Après la fondation, dans les années 1890, des premières associations « völkisch » comme le « Deutschbund », fondé en 1894, le Mouvement « Völkisch », capable de souplesse en matière d'édition et de propagande, se créa au tournant du siècle en Allemagne sous la forme d'associations libres en étroite relation avec le nationalisme organisé, à savoir essentiellement l'« Alldeutscher Verband ». À côté de contacts soutenus entretenus avec le Mouvement « Alldeutscher » autrichien qui leur était étroitement apparenté sur le plan des idées, des personnes et des institutions, il existait également de nombreux échanges formalisés avec les mouvements réformateurs qui avaient vu le jour en grand nombre depuis les années 1880. Dans le Mouvement « Völkisch » se retrouvaient des groupements qui divergeaient grandement tant sur leurs buts politiques, sociaux et culturels que sur le plan de leur forme organisationnelle et leur représentativité.

Dès ses débuts, les mouvements « Völkisch » accordent une place importante à la jeunesse. En effet, déçus par l'âge des Épigones, comme on désigne le règne de Guillaume II, les intellectuels « Völkisch » se représentent la jeunesse à leur image, déçus par le « Reich » bourgeois et grandiloquent qui a succédé au « Reich » de 1871. Ainsi, les principaux penseurs « Völkisch » développent des corpus pédagogiques, pour former la jeunesse allemande à leurs idées. Paul de Lagarde, précocement, s'en prend au système éducatif du 2e « Reich », qui, à ses yeux, participe à la mise-en-place d'un esprit mercantiliste, dispensant un savoir cloisonné, utilitaire et conformiste.

Langbehn, de son côté, incite la jeunesse à prendre la tête du combat contre les Juifs et les Libéraux, ce qu'elle fait, d'après lui, en excluant d'office les Juifs des associations étudiantes, prenant modèle sur le corps des officiers et la congrégation des Jésuites.

En 1919, Moeller van Den Bruck met en place une structure, le « Front de la Jeunesse ». Ce front, qui regroupe un certain nombre d'intellectuels conservateurs exerce une influence conservatrice sur l'ensemble des acteurs de la Révolution conservatrice de la République de Weimar. Son objectif est de mettre en place des éléments cohérents d'éducation populaire conservatrice, en partie grâce au journal hebdomadaire « Conscience ». « Journal Indépendant pour la culture du peuple » (« Volksbildung ») que ce cercle édite. C'est également à la jeunesse qu'il dédie son ouvrage « Les Allemands », espérant lui donner la « Weltanschauung » qui lui manque.

Selon Louis Dupeux, les idées « völkisch » sont la métamorphose de la révolution conservatrice au nationalisme. Ils se situent entre le « Kulturpessimismus » et la révolution conservatrice.

Le mouvement présentait des caractères protestataires nationalistes-réformistes, corroborés par une vision du monde teintée de fusion entre mysticisme, idée de décadence (Oswald Spengler), restauration de l'idée et du concept de race, notamment du peuple german, du droit « allemand », du calendrier et des fêtes, des mythes et des tendances profondes de la société.

Sa clientèle majoritaire, masculine et d'origine protestante, fait montre d'un profil social essentiellement bourgeois, émanant de l'ancienne comme de la nouvelle classe moyenne.

Partant d'une base idéologique raciste (antisémite, anti-slave et anti-romaine), le mouvement aspirait à une société organisée sur des principes anti-égalitaires (parfois phalocrates, mais aussi « féministes » - influence probable de Johann Jakob Bachofen - d'une certaine façon, et corporatistes) qui devait être fondée sur un christianisme germanique ou sur une religion païenne propre. Il avait pour objectif de créer au centre de l'Europe, sur la base d'un système de valeurs fondé sur des idéologies germaniques, un État racial ou, éventuellement, une fédération d'États pan-germaniques.

Après 1918, le nombre d'organisations et de leurs affiliés allait, dans un 1er temps, clairement s'accroître. Avec le « Deutschvölkischer Schutz- und Trutzbund » (1919-1923), le mouvement disposa même pour une courte période d'un cartel influent d'associations « völkisch » et des personnes adhérant à ces idées furent élues aux parlements des « Länder » comme au « Reichstag ». À partir de 1924-1925, en raison de ses déficiences structurelles, le mouvement allait néanmoins se trouver progressivement mis à l'écart de la politique par l'idéologiquement proche National-Socialisme qui était devenu la nouvelle caisse de résonance de la Droite radicale.

Cependant, son influence sur des pans entiers de la société allemande reste forte. Ainsi, par le biais de son influence dans le monde scolaire, les idées développées par la nébuleuse « völkisch » attirent à elles une part non négligeable de la jeunesse du « Reich », séduite par la perspective du changement révolutionnaire promis par les idéaux « völkisch », par l'identification d'un bouc-émissaire facilement identifiable et soumise aux pressions idéologiques radicales.

En effet, l'idéologie « völkisch » d'après la Grande Guerre, fournit à la jeunesse un archétype idéal, le Juif, rendu responsable de tous les échecs présents, passés en futurs et sur lequel déverser ses frustrations. Cet antisémitisme est inculqué, dès le plus jeune âge, dans le système éducatif, de manière insidieuse : si les manuels ne portent aucune mention directe au Juif, ils développent néanmoins les thèses « völkisch » de l'âge d'or pré-industrie.

Malgré ses succès aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, les succès rencontrés par les idéaux « völkisch » à l'Université s'apparentent à un triomphe. Tout d'abord, la concurrence pour les postes entre universitaires Juifs et non-Juifs exacerbent les tensions ; ensuite, reprenant les pratiques d'avant-guerre, les associations étudiantes excluent systématiquement les étudiants Juifs de leurs rangs, en dépit des pressions exercées par certains gouvernements fédérés ; de plus, en 1931, le « Reich » et l'Autriche connaissent dans leurs campus des émeutes antisémites massivement suivies, et en 1932, les Universités de Breslau et d'Heidelberg excluent les enseignants juifs de leur corps enseignant.

Cependant l'antisémitisme ne constituait pas l'apanage de la totalité des mouvements de jeunesse d'inspiration « völkisch ». Ainsi, le marginal « Mouvement de Jeunesse », organisé en Thuringe sur des bases élitistes autour de Muck Lamberty, développent simplement l'idée que les Juifs constituent un « Volk » différent du « Volk » germanique, tout en affirmant l'idée qu'un autre « Volk » pouvait s'immerger dans le germanisme origine.

Un certain nombre d'autres groupes de jeunesse marginaux membres de la nébuleuse « völkisch » des années 1920 apparaissent, prospèrent, dans une certaine mesure, puis se fondent avec des réserves, plus ou moins affirmées, plus ou moins formulées, dans le mouvement nazi, le plus souvent dans la mouvance Straßer, moins inféodée selon eux aux intérêts industriels. Mais les succès de Hitler et sa prise du pouvoir rendent cette allégeance fragile, car ils finissent par se rallier à la vision adoptée par Hitler et ses proches.

Des mouvements chrétiens proches du paganisme s'enthousiasmèrent également pour le Mouvement « Völkisch ». Ainsi, Artur Dinter, politicien « völkisch », propagandiste et écrivain raciste, créa en 1927 la « Geistchristliche Religionsgemeinschaft », précurseur de l'« organisation pour l'État populaire national-socialiste pour les Chrétiens », renommée en 1934 « Deutsche Volkskirche » (église populaire allemande). Ainsi, le Mouvement « Völkisch » a servi nombreuses de fois de base pour le développement du National-Socialisme.

Le NSDAP essaya, par la suite, de se profiler comme la force agissante du Mouvement « Völkisch » en vue de mettre en avant sa vision du monde. Ainsi, dans « Mein Kampf », Adolf Hitler écrit :

« Le Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands tire les caractères essentiels d'une conception " völkisch " de l'univers. »

Le chef de la Société Thulé, Rudolf Freiherr von Sebotendorff, fils de cheminot et aventurier haut en couleurs, devenu riche en faisant des affaires louches en Turquie et en épousant une riche héritière, offrit au Mouvement « Völkisch » de Munich son journal, le « Münchener Beobachter » , rebaptisé en août 1919 « Völkischer Beobachter » . Le Parti national-socialiste, au départ lui-même groupuscule « völkisch » , le racheta en décembre 1920 pour en faire son organe de presse officiel.

À partir de 1933, les organisations subsistantes (et leurs dirigeants) perdirent rapidement de leur signification : certaines furent absorbées par les organisations national-socialistes ; d'autres furent réprimées (cas du mouvement des époux Ludendorff dans les Ires années du régime) , la plupart finirent par se dissoudre ou vivotèrent dans l'ombre jusqu'à leur interdiction par les Alliés après la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Après 1945, des tentatives isolées de lancer une renaissance organisationnelle ne rencontrèrent aucun succès, si ce n'est marginalement au travers de petits mouvements relevant du néo-paganisme et des mouvements religieux « völkisch » comme la « Deutschgläubige Gemeinschaft » ou la « Germanische Glaubensgemeinschaft » . Certains aspects du mouvement se retrouvent également dans l'extrémisme de Droite international auprès d'associations comme l' « Allgermanische Heidnische Front » et aussi, partiellement, dans différents mouvements et sous-cultures alternatifs, comme la branche « völkisch » de la religion Asatru. Toutefois, de nombreuses communautés Asatru nient catégoriquement toute relation avec le National-Socialisme et la scène néo-nazie (« le paganisme contre la haine ») . En France, l'association « Terre et Peuple » est parfois considérée comme héritière du courant « völkisch » .

Au sein du genre musical « neo-folk » les décorations « völkisch » sont également utilisées massivement. La question de savoir si des idées « völkisch » y sont liées fait l'objet de discussion tant à l'intérieur qu'à l'extérieur du mouvement.

The « völkisch » movement (« völkische Bewegung ») is the German interpretation of the populist movement, with a Romantic focus on folklore and the « organic » . The term « völkisch » derives from the German word « Volk » (cognate with the English « folk ») , corresponding to « people » , with connotations in German of « people-powered » , « folksy » and « folkloric » . According to the historian James Webb, the word also has « overtones of " nation " , " race " and " tribe " » . A direct translation would somehow be « ethnic » with, however, very different connotations in English. Therefore, this term cannot be used for translation. Strictly speaking, the term « völkisch » has no direct translation in English, as no existing term corresponds to its exact meaning, but it could be rendered as « ethno-nationalistic » , « racial-nationalistic » , « ethno-racialist » or similar, which comes close to the actual meaning and use of the word.

The defining idea that the « völkisch » movement revolved around was that of a « Volkstum » (literary : « folkdom »)

, with a meaning similar to a combination of the terms « folklore » and « ethnicity »), not to be confused with the « Volkssturm » . « Populist », or « popular », in this context would be « volkstümlich » .

The « völkisch » « movement » was not a unified movement but « a cauldron of beliefs, fears and hopes that found expression in various movements and were often articulated in an emotional tone », Petteri Pietikäinen observed in tracing « völkisch » influences on Carl Gustav Jung. The « völkisch » movement was « arguably the largest group » in the Conservative Revolutionary movement in Germany. However, like « conservative-revolutionary » or « fascist », « völkisch » is a complex term (« schillernder Begriff ») . In a narrow definition, it can be used to designate only groups that consider human beings essentially pre-formed by blood ; i.e. , by inherited characteristics.

The « völkisch » movement had its origins in Romantic nationalism, as it was expressed by early Romantics such as Johann Gottlieb Fichte in his « Addresses to the German Nation » published during the Napoleonic Wars, from 1808 onwards, especially the 8th address, « What is a “ Volk ”, in the higher sense of the term, and what is love of the fatherland ? » , where he answered his question of what could warrant the noble individual's striving « and his belief in the eternity and the immortality of his work » , by replying that it could only be that « particular spiritual nature of the human environment out of which he himself, with all of his thought and action has arisen, namely the people from which he is descended and among which he has been formed and grown into that which he is » .

The movement combined sentimental patriotic interest in German folklore, local history and a « back to the land » anti-urban populism with many parallels in the writings of William Morris. « In part, this ideology was a revolt against modernity » , A. J. Nicholls remarked. The dream was for a self-sufficient life lived with a mystical relation to the land ; it was a reaction to the cultural alienation of the Industrial revolution and the « progressive » Liberalism of the later 19th Century and its urbane materialist banality. Similar feelings were expressed in the United States, during the 1930's, by the populist writers grouped as the Southern Agrarians.

In addition, the « völkisch » movement, as it evolved, sometimes combined the arcane and esoteric aspects of folkloric occultism alongside « racial adoration » and, in some circles, a type of anti-Semitism linked to exclusionary ethnic nationalism. The ideas of « völkisch » movements also included anti-communist, anti-immigration, anti-capitalist and anti-Parliamentarian principles. The « völkisch » ideas of « national community » (« Volksgemeinschaft ») came more and more to exclude Jews.

A number of the « völkisch » populist movements that had developed during the late- 19th Century, in the German Empire, under the impress of National Romanticism, were re-organized along propagandistic lines after the German defeat in World War I, as the word « the People » (« Volk ») became increasingly politicized as a flag for new forms of ethnic nationalism.

Yet, at the same time, « Volk » was also used by the international socialist Parties, in the German lands, as a synonym for the proletariat. The « Völkisch » movement was a force as well in Austria. From the Left, elements of the folk-culture spread to the Parties of the middle-classes. But whereas « Volk » could mean « proletariat » among the Left, it meant more particularly « race » among the Center and Right. Although the primary interest of the Germanic mystical movement was the revival of native pagan traditions and customs (often set in the context of a quasi-theosophical esotericism) , a marked preoccupation with purity of race came to motivate its more politically oriented off-shoots such as the « Germanenorden » : the Germanic or Teutonic Order. This latter was a secret Society (founded in Berlin, in 1912) which required its candidates to prove that they had no « non-Aryan » bloodlines and required from each a promise to maintain purity of his stock in marriage. Local groups of the sect met to celebrate the summer solstice, an important neo-pagan festivity in « völkisch » Circles and, later, in Nazi Germany, and more regularly to read the Eddas, as well as some of the German mystics. This branch of the « völkisch » movement quickly developed a hyper-nationalist sentiment and allied itself with anti-Semitism, then rising throughout the Western world.

George Mosse identified some of the more « respectable » and centrist channels through which these sensibilities flowed : school texts that transmitted a Romantic view of a « pure » Germanic past, the nature-oriented German Youth Movement, and novels with an ideally ruthless « völkisch » hero, such as Hermann Löns' « Der Wehrwolf » (1910) . Another « völkisch » movement of the same time was the « Tatkreis » .

Not all folkloric Societies with connections to Romantic nationalism were located in Germany. The community of « Monte Verità » (« Mount Truth ») which emerged in 1900 at Ascona, Switzerland, is described by the Swiss art critic Harald Szeemann as « the Southern-most outpost of a far-reaching Nordic lifestyle reform, that is, alternative movement » . It embraced a mix of anarchism, libertarian communism and various forms of artistic bohemianism and neo-paganism.

The « völkisch » ideologies were influential in the development of Nazism. Indeed, Josef Goebbels publicly asserted, in the 1927 Nuremberg rally, that if the populist (« völkisch ») movement had understood power and how to bring thousands out in the streets, it would have gained political power on 9 November 1918 (the outbreak of the SPD-led German Revolution of 1918-1919, end of the German monarchy) . Adolf Hitler wrote in « Mein Kampf » (« My Struggle ») :

« The basic ideas of the National-Socialist movement are populist (“ völkisch ”) and the populist (“ völkisch ”) ideas are National-Socialist. »

Nazi racial understanding was couched in « Völkisch » terms, as when Eugen Fischer delivered his inaugural address as Nazi rector, « The Conception of the Völkisch State in the view of biology » (29 July 1933) .

This connection can be overstated, however. According to Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, an imaginative mythology has grown up around the supposed influence within the Nazi Party of a « völkisch » group, the « Thule-Gesellschaft » (Thule Society) , which was founded on August 17, 1918, by Rudolf von Sebottendorff. Its original name was « Studiengruppe für Germanisches Altertum » (Study Group for Germanic Antiquity) , but it soon started to disseminate anti-Republican and anti-Semitic propaganda. In January 1919, the Thule Society was instrumental in the foundation of the « Deutsche Arbeiter-Partei » (German Workers' Party, or DAP) which later became the NSDAP (Nazi Party) . Thule members or visiting guests that would later join the Nazi Party included Rudolf Heß, Alfred Rosenberg, Hans Frank, Gottfried Feder, Dietrich Eckart and Karl Harrer, but notably not Adolf Hitler who never was a member of the Thule Society. Furthermore, the « Münchener Beobachter » (Munich Observer) , owned by Sebottendorff, was the press organ of another small nationalist Party and later became the « Völkischer Beobachter » (People's Observer) .

On the other hand, it can be noted that Karl Harrer, the Thule member most directly involved in the creation of the DAP, in 1919, was sidelined at the end of the year when Hitler drafted regulations against conspiratorial Circles, and the Thule Society was dissolved a few years later (Goodrick-Clarke, 1985 : pages 150, 221) . It had no members from the top echelons of the Party and Nazi officials were forbidden any involvement in Secret Societies. Adolf Hitler was never a member, while Rudolf Heß and Alfred Rosenberg were only visiting guests of the Thule Society, in the early years before they came to prominence in the Nazi movement (Goodrick-Clarke, 1985 : pages 149, 201) . However, the « völkisch » Circles did hand-down one significant legacy : Friedrich Krohn, a Thule member, designed the original version of the Nazi swastika, in 1919.

While the newspaper implied its support for « Germanic Christianity » , it managed to do so without directly attacking the Catholic tradition that was so important in Southern German territories. Thus, while applauding Johannes Brahms' « German religiosity without confessional directions and conditions » , the paper simultaneously praised Anton Bruckner as having been « filled with genuine, naive piety which was rooted deeply in his religion : Catholicism » . For the « Völkischer Beobachter » , Bruckner was above all a naive genius who embodied « Volkstümlichkeit » more than any other composer. Assessing Bruckner's origins (« since they interest us more than ever before in the age of “ Family-and-Race-Research ” ») , musicologist Karl Grunsky emphasized that the composer had come from a modest farming background : the son of an Upper-Austrian teacher, who had Lower-Austrian farmers as ancestors, and who could be proud that one of them ascended to such heights and achieved world significance. Emphasizing his « kind, wonderfully deep blue eyes » , musicologist Josef Stolzing considered Bruckner to be « next to Franz Liszt, the greatest German Symphonist after Beethoven » . This strong 3rd place ranking was founded largely on Bruckner's simple, « völkisch » characteristics. According to Stolzing, « being of farming origins, the composer remained a simple man who never posed » . In his music, as in his character, Grunsky asserted, « genuinely “ volkstümlich ” features were indisputable » . Most intensively, the « Völkischer Beobachter » contributors applauded Bruckner's « relatively limited education, his indifference to the society and culture of the rest of the world, and the natural, farmer-like, primitive nature of his background » . In the realm of tones, Bruckner was « a ruler graced by God » but, otherwise, he was a man of « touching naivety, clumsiness, and timidity » . As a result, this « heaven bound, unworldly (“ Weltfremd ”) artist was no formalist » . His works were not the product of « isolated artistic conception, æsthetic taste, momentary mood, or agitated feeling » , but rather the « language of his soul, the confession of his world-view, and the self-expression of his innermost being » .

Contributors provided a number of anecdotes to fill-out the picture of Bruckner as a naively « völkisch » genius, some of which involved descriptions of his drinking habits. According to Stolzing, the composer « definitely had one weakness : he loved to drink » . But the National-Socialist cultural critic did not seem to consider this much of a problem ; indeed, in one instance, he wrote without reservation about Bruckner vomiting after drinking excessively, complete with details about the nearby devotee, who kept as a memento of this brush with the « völkisch » genius a set of clothes which had been splattered by the composer. Stolzing also related an occasion when Bruckner asked Richard Wagner, while drinking beers with him, to select one of 2 Symphonies that would be dedicated to him. The « Master » made the choice, but Bruckner woke-up simply too hung-over to remember which one Wagner had chosen. Another sign of Bruckner's simple nature that impressed Stolzing was the low-fees he charged students :

« How refreshing that for such modest prices one could get music lessons from a genius before whose immortal works the whole Aryan world looks on in respect. »

The newspaper even compared Bruckner with the Romantic character of Kannitverstan, who learns important lessons in Holland though he cannot understand a word of Dutch :

« How remarkable it was when “ Master ” Anton (who, similar to the model created by Hebel, did not understand the outside world) climbed to the conductor's podium in order to take in the cheers of his listeners. »

At that moment, it seemed as if he were « still the former teaching assistant and part-time church organist standing there helplessly, done-up in a ridiculous suit that looked like it was thrown together by the village tailor, bowing awkwardly, holding-up his hands as if protecting himself from the public, and finally blowing a kiss to the house - like a big kid » .

Reinhold Freiherr von Lichtenberg, a professor at Berlin University who wrote about « The Homeland of the Aryans » (1913) and made contributions to the « Bayreuther Blätter » , reminded the « Völkischer Beobachter » readers about the best-known story of Bruckner's child-like enthusiasm. When Beethoven's remains were moved in 1888, Bruckner went into the church and actually picked-up the skull. Scolded for doing so, he said that he was the « only one who really understood him » . Absolutely loyal to his favourite predecessors, Bruckner paid a price for his association with Wagner « at the hands of the Jewish press » , according to Stolzing. In particular, the « music-critic at the Jewish “ Neue freie Presse ” » , Eduard Hanslick, « attacked Bruckner along with Wagner » , especially after Wagner had accused Hanslick of « hiding his Jewish origins » . In Stolzing's opinion, Hanslick's criticisms of Bruckner's 7th Symphony proved how « Jewish criticism has been striving since time immemorial to spoil the joy that the German “ Volk ” derives from the creations of its great German Masters » . When Bruckner and Hanslick met, however, the composer bowed and treated the critic with respect.

« We were utterly astounded. »

Erwin Bauer explained the Nazi attention to Bruckner's music in terms of its « Romantic naturalism » : in his Symphonies, « gigantic oaks rustle, powerful streams roar, and the rejoicing, but often also longing sound of the horn penetrates through everything » . Bruckner's 4th Symphony, particularly, was a « Nature Symphony » akin to Beethoven's 6th. Comparing them in concert, Bauer stated, was pleasurable and worthwhile : on the one hand, a « bright, magical confession about idyllic life in the country » ; on the other, a « trembling soul exuding incomparable praise for the expanse and beauty of the cosmos » . The 1st was a « complete collection of feelings » ; while the 2nd was marked by « wonderful melancholy and magnificent outbreaks of the soul » . But for Karl Grunsky, Bruckner's music was important mainly because it exhibited « völkisch » naivety : a German Master who stood on the shoulders of other greats, he did not « speak to us in gibberish and mishmash with Negroid grimaces, but in a language drawn from a natural source that reaches into the deepest interior of the unrefined German mind : the pure spirit of German child-likeness » .

As reported in the « Völkischer Beobachter » , Bruckner compositions were performed at numerous Nazi organized events, including the 1st concert and concert tour of the National-Socialist Symphony Orchestra, in SS concerts, at a Bruckner Festival in the composer's small Austrian home-town (« a rare pleasure in the troubled times » of 1932, as Max Morold-Millenkovich, who covered cultural affairs in Vienna for the paper, as early as 1920 and strongly advocated Bruckner's music, put it) and at the 1st Greater German Bruckner Festival in 1939. Significant Party officials attended the Festival last mentioned, including among them Arthur Seyß-Inquart (previously « Reichsstatthalter » of the « Ostmark » and « Reichsminister » without portfolio after May 1939) and August Eigruber (« Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria, who helped to establish the concentration camp at Mauthausen) . As the newspaper related it, the opening festivities of the « Brucknerfest » were a « great cultural achievement on the part of National-Socialism » . There, the regime announced that it would provide an annual grant toward the preparation of a complete edition of Bruckner's works and, thereby, « secure the life work of the “ Master ” for the German nation and the whole music world beyond » . This, along with a tribute to the « Master » during the Regensburg Music Festival on the occasion of his « solemn entrance into “ Walhalla ” as a national hero » , were touted as 2 « Official Acts of the German Head of State » that « clearly indicated how much cultural historical significance the “ Führer ” attributed to the works of his compatriot » .

Another Austrian compatriot of Adolf Hitler whose works were performed at SS concerts and received attention in the « Völkischer Beobachter » was Hugo Wolf (1860-1903) . The newspaper saw him as the « Wagner of Song » and as a victim of a Jewish conspiracy precisely because of his association with the « Master » . A circle of Wagnerians and a few individual patrons had enabled his ascent and, not disappointing, « he clearly upheld German style » . But difficulties triggered by his support of Wagner made him very unpopular in Vienna :

For instance, according to the paper, « their representatives » once forced a well-known singer who wanted to introduce Wolf's Lieder to demur under threat of a sustained boycott by the press. Such malicious maneuvering was just another indication that Vienna, « the city that should have been the capital of the German “ Ostmark ”, was really the center of an Eastern-oriented cosmopolitan world ! » . But « nothing held back Wolf's triumphant course : his Lieder will be remembered with German consciousness » .

One more composer whom the « Völkischer Beobachter » felt the re-newed German race should appreciate more keenly was Max Reger (1873-1916) . Like other favourites, the paper considered him the « spiritual son of the old world that the November Revolution and the subsequent Americanization of Weimar culture had eradicated » . The fact that he had done a year's military service, in 1897, was important to Hans Buchner, Reger's most vocal champion in the pages of the « Völkischer Beobachter » : though Reger was, perhaps, not an ideal soldier in the sense of infantry regulations, he « enjoyed and was proud of his service » . Moreover, before his death in 1916, he tried to enlist for the First World War, but was deemed unsuitable for active service, and Buchner was sure it « pained him deeply that he could only consecrate in art the patriotism he felt burning in his soul » .

Die völkische Bewegung umfasste deutschnationale und antisemitisch-rassistische Vereine, Parteien, Publikationen und weitere Gruppen und Individuen, die ab dem letzten Viertel des 19. Jahrhunderts großen Einfluss auf die Öffentlichkeit im Deutschen Reich und in Österreich-Ungarn gewannen.

Ihrem Charakter einer heterogenen nationalistisch-reformistischen Protestbewegung entsprach die synkretistische völkische Weltanschauung. Die überwiegend männliche und protestantische Klientel zeigt ein vornehmlich bürgerliches, vom alten wie neuen Mittelstand geprägtes Sozialprofil.

Die Bewegung strebte auf rassenideologischer Grundlage (antisemitisch, antislawisch, antiziganistisch, antiromanisch) nach einer antiegalitären, militaristischen, männerzentrierten, (berufs-)ständisch organisierten Gesellschaft, die in einer « germanisch-christlichen » oder neuheidnischen « arteiligen » Religion fundiert sein sollte. Sie hatte in vielen Fällen (basierend auf einem germanenideologischen Wertesystem) einen « Rassestaat » mitteleuropäischen oder einen Staatenbund pangermanischen Zuschnitts zum Ziel.

Zentral für die völkische Weltanschauung war die Forderung nach einer arteiligen, das heißt einer Rasse und Volk wesensgemäßen Religion. Entsprechend der heterogenen ideologischen und organisatorischen Struktur der Bewegung gab es aber keine gemeinsamen religiösen Überzeugungen, sondern sehr unterschiedliche religiöse Entwürfe. Sie reichen von einem arisierten und germanisierten Christentum bis zur entschiedenen Ablehnung des Christentums und dem Versuch der Wiederbelebung vermeintlich vorchristlicher germanischer Glaubensvorstellungen. Teilweise wurden auch Elemente der Esoterik aufgenommen.

Die völkisch-religiösen Gemeinschaften waren überwiegend von dem Wunsch nach einer autochthonen, nicht durch irgendwelche Fremdeinflüsse verformten nationalen Kultur getragen, weniger vom Willen zur Restauration der paganen germanischen Götterwelt. Diese Suche war verbunden mit der Suche nach den heimischen Götter- und Heldensagen und der germanischen Mythologie und damit einer Aufwertung der germanischen Zeugnisse wie Runen und der Edda.

Nur ein kleiner Teil der Völkischen wandte sich ganz vom Christentum ab. Die germanisch- und deutschgläubigen Gemeinschaften gehören zur Peripherie der völkischen Bewegung und waren sehr klein. So hatte die größte dieser Gemeinschaften, die Germanische Glaubens-Gemeinschaft Ludwig Fahrenkrogs, zu Beginn des Ersten Weltkriegs gerade 120 bis 150 Mitglieder. Der größere Teil der Völkischen hielt am (protestantischen) Christentum fest. Zahlenmäßig bedeutender war der Versuch, das Christentum zu germanisieren und zu « entjuden » .

In der Sichtweise des Deutschchristentums war Christus nicht Jude, sondern Arier. Die Wurzeln des Christentums wurden auf eine (indo-)germanische Urreligion zurückgeführt. Das Christentum sei ursprünglich eine arische Religion, die dem germanischen und deutschen Wesen entspreche und deren arischer Charakter zu bewahren und von fremden Einflüssen zu reinigen sei.

Zur völkischen Bewegung zählt die eklektische Lehre der Ariosophie des Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels, in die neben rassistischen Vorstellungen Elemente der Esoterik aufgenommen wurden. Von der Ariosophie war auch die Ideologie der von Rudolf von Sebottendorf am Ende des Ersten Weltkriegs 1917-1918 gegründeten Thule-Gesellschaft beeinflusst. Der britische Esoterik-Forscher Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke verwendet die Bezeichnung Ariosophie in einem erweiterten Sinn für esoterisch geprägte Strömungen der völkischen Bewegung.

Die NSDAP versuchte später, sich selbst als treibende Kraft der völkischen Bewegung zu stilisieren, um die vermeintliche Originalität der eigenen Weltanschauung hervorzuheben. So heißt es etwa in Mein Kampf : Wenn heute alle möglichen Verbände und Verbändchen, Gruppen und Grüppchen und meinetwegen auch « große Parteien » das Wort « völkisch » für sich in Anspruch nehmen, so ist dies selbst schon eine Folge des Wirkens der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung. (Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf) . Die Parteizeitung hieß vom Anfang bis zum Ende der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus « Völkischer Beobachter » .

In der Geschichtswissenschaft wird zum einen « völkisch » als Sammelbezeichnung für die sich seit den 1890er Jahren politisch und kulturell formierende nationalistisch-antisemitische Rechte in Deutschland verstanden. So findet es sich zum Beispiel im Handbuch zur völkischen Bewegung (1996) einer Autorengruppe um Uwe Puschner. Uwe Puschner erkennt das Spezifische der völkischen Bewegung in der Verbindung von Nationalismus und Rassismus mit religiösen Reformideen.

Daneben steht eine engere Begriffsdefinition, die die völkische Bewegung als Teilphänomen der radikalen Rechten begreift. Stefan Breuer erklärt die Entstehung der Völkischen Bewegung aus dem Antisemitismus der Kaiserzeit. Neben diesem seien Mittelstandsideologie, Rechtsnationalismus und partieller Antimodernismus (Ablehnung der « massendemokratischen » bei Bejahung der « bürgerlich-liberalen Moderne ») Kennzeichen der Völkischen gewesen. Rassismus und Antisemitismus seien aber keinesfalls nur bei Völkischen anzutreffen gewesen, sondern auch in anderen Bereichen der Politik. Ziel sei die Herstellung einer ethnisch geschlossenen Bevölkerung (« deutsches Volk ») in einem ethnisch definierten Nationalstaat gewesen. Dem hätten rassistische und antisemitische Positionen gedient.

Thomas Gräfe wiederum sieht in radikalnationalistischen Purifikationsphantasien und im Antisemitismus den gemeinsamen Nenner der konkurrierenden völkischen Gruppierungen und weltanschaulichen Entwürfe. Im ersten Teil seiner Studie geht er der Entstehung und Entwicklung der völkischen Bewegung im Kaiserreich nach, wobei er sich jedoch unter diesem Begriff mit genau jener Bewegung beschäftigt, die in der historischen Forschung als antisemitische bezeichnet wird.

Gemeinsam ist diesen Autoren, daß sie die völkische Bewegung als rassistisch und antisemitisch definieren.

Nach der Gründung erster völkischer Vereinigungen in den 1890er Jahren, wie dem 1894 gegründeten Deutschbund, formierte sich seit der Jahrhundertwende in engem Austausch mit dem organisierten Nationalismus, vor allem dem Alldeutschen Verband, die publizistisch und propagandistisch agile völkische Bewegung in Deutschland als eine lose Sammlungsbewegung. Neben engen Kontakten zu der ihr ideell, personell und institutionell eng verbundenen Alldeutschen Bewegung Österreichs bestanden rege Austauschprozesse mit den seit den 1880er Jahren entstandenen bürgerlichen Reformbewegungen und den antisemitischen Splitterparteien. In der völkischen Bewegung fanden sich sowohl in ihren politischen, gesellschaftlichen und kulturellen Zielen als auch ihrer Organisationsform und Mitgliederstärke erheblich voneinander abweichende Gruppierungen zusammen. Seit der Jahrhundertwende entstanden zahlreiche völkisch-religiöse Vereine, Bünde und Orden, die sich in eine deutschchristliche und eine neopagane Richtung aufspalteten. Wichtige Publikationsorgane der Völkischen waren die von Hans von Wolzogen herausgegebenen Bayreuther Blätter, Theodor Fritschs Zeitschrift Hammer und Wilhelm Schwaners Volkserzieher. Um diese Zeitschriften entstanden Lesegemeinden wie der Reichshammerbund. Die Gründung von Dachverbänden am Vorabend des Ersten Weltkriegs änderte nichts daran, daß die völkische Bewegung zersplittert und mitgliederschwach blieb. Allerdings entfaltete ihr Gedankengut über Multiplikatoren wie den Deutschnationalen Handlungsgehilfenverband, das studentische Vereins- und Verbindungswesen und die Jugendbewegung sowie über die auflagenstarken Werke Paul de Lagardes, Julius Langbehn und Houston Stewart Chamberlains schon vor 1914 eine erhebliche gesellschaftliche Breitenwirkung.

Der Beginn des Ersten Weltkriegs führte zu einem Bedeutungsverlust der völkischen Bewegung ; viele Publikationsorgane gerieten unter Präventivzensur und wurden auch immer wieder verboten, wie zum Beispiel der Hammer, die Deutschvölkischen Blätter und die Staatsbürger-Zeitung. Trotz des Krieges richtete sich ihre vorrangige Aufmerksamkeit auf den inneren Feind. Mit dem Krieg rückte in Deutschland die Außenpolitik in den Vordergrund des Interesses, wozu von Seiten der Völkischen wenig Eigenes hervorgebracht wurde. Soweit Ideen zur außenpolitischen Orientierung Deutschlands geäußert wurden, waren diese widersprüchlich und nicht konsensfähig. Die Völkischen suchten daher im Ersten Weltkrieg den Schulterchluss mit dem alten Nationalismus.

Die Völkischen lehnten alles ab, was in der Weimarer Republik als Fortschritt gepriesen wurde. Sie lehnten sowohl den Marxismus der linken Parteien wie auch die Demokratie ab. Obwohl die Völkischen offiziell politische Gewalt verurteilten, unterhielten sie Verbindungen zu rechtsradikalen Wehrverbänden, beteiligten sich am Kapp-Putsch und am Hitler-Putsch und waren in Attentate und Fememorde verstrickt. Zur Radikalisierung der Völkischen dürfte neben dem politischen Systemwechsel auch der Zustrom demobilisierter Soldaten in ihre Organisationen beigetragen haben.

Nachdem die Zahl völkischer Organisationen und Anhänger nach 1918 zunächst deutlich zugenommen hatte, mit dem Deutschvölkischen Schutz- und Trutzbund (1919-1923) kurzzeitig auch ein einflussreiches Kartell völkischer Vereinigungen bestand und Völkische in Länderparlamente und Reichstag einzogen, wurde die völkische Bewegung seit 1924-1925 aufgrund ihrer strukturellen Defizite vom ideologisch nahen Nationalsozialismus, dem neuen Sammelbecken der radikalen Rechten, allmählich ins politische Abseits gedrängt. In dieser Zeit, vor allem nach der Wiedegründung der NSDAP, wurden von beiden Seiten Gegensätze betont. Sie äußerten sich vielfach als Generationenkonflikt zwischen « alten » Völkischen und « jungen » Nationalsozialisten. Dennoch bestanden (vor allem ideologisch) enge Gemeinsamkeiten zwischen beiden Bewegungen. Die deutlichsten personellen Überschneidungen zwischen Völkischen und Nationalsozialisten bestanden bei der 1926 gegründeten Siedlungsbewegung der Artamanen.

Obgleich sich einzelne völkische Organisationen und Führungspersönlichkeiten dem Nationalsozialismus (unterschiedlich eng) anschlossen und die Machtübertragung an Hitler von völkischer Seite mehrheitlich begrüßt wurde, verloren die nach 1933 fortbestehenden völkischen Organisationen (und ihre Führung) rasch an Bedeutung : Einzelne gingen im nationalsozialistischen Organisationsgefüge auf, die Mehrzahl löste sich auf oder fristete bis zum Verbot durch die Siegermächte nach Kriegsende eine der Auflösung gleichkommende Schattenexistenz.

Vereinzelte Versuche eines organisatorischen Neuanfangs nach 1945 blieben mit Ausnahme bis in die Gegenwart bestehender neuheidnischer Kleinunternehmen der völkischreligiösen Teilbewegung wie der « Deutschgläubigen Gemeinschaft » oder der Artgemeinschaft - Germanische Glaubens-Gemeinschaft wesensgemäßer Lebensgestaltung erfolglos.

Versatzstücke völkischer Religion und Weltanschauungen finden sich auch über diese deutschen neugermanisch-heidnischen Gruppen hinaus ; sie sind Teil der internationalen neopaganen Bewegungen, gemischt mit Ideologien anderer Herkunft und in vielfach vermittelter Form und häufig nicht mehr unmittelbar als völkisch erkennbar. Diese Reste völkischen Denkens sind nicht auf kleine Subkulturen beschränkt, sondern finden durch ihre mediale Vermittlung, womit ihre Popularisierung einhergeht, Eingang in weitere gesellschaftliche Kreise und weite Verbreitung durch populäre Genres. Am Anfang dieser Popularisierung steht insbesondere die Fantasyliteratur, die sich nach dem Muster John Ronald Reuel Tolkiens Der Herr der Ringe gebildet hat. Zu dieser Fantasyliteratur gehört beispielsweise der Roman Rheingold des US-amerikanischen Autors Stephan Grundy, der ein internationaler Bestseller geworden ist.

Ideologische Elemente der Bewegung finden sich auch im internationalen Rechtsextremismus sowie bei Vereinigungen wie der Allgermanischen Heidnischen Front, teils auch in verschiedenen alternativen Bewegungen und Subkulturen, wie dem völkischen Zweig innerhalb des Asatru-Glaubens. Mehrere neuheidnische Asatru-Glaubensgemeinschaften lehnen Beziehungen zum Nationalsozialismus und der Neonazi-Szene kategorisch ab, was die Verbreitung von Elementen völkischer Herkunft nicht ausschließt.

Die esoterischen Traditionslinien einer völkischen « rechten Esoterik » werden aktuell von einigen rechtsextremen Gruppierungen zur Legitimation ihres Rassismus aufgegriffen. So beziehen sich beispielsweise in Mecklenburg-Vorpommern Rechtsextreme auf die historischen Artamanen. Auch innerhalb der Musikgenres Neofolk oder Pagan Metal werden häufig völkische Versatzstücke verwendet.

Le « Völkischer Beobachter »

Le « Völkischer Beobachter » (L'Observateur populaire) fut l'organe de presse officiel du Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands, de 1920 à 1945.

Paru à l'origine sous le titre : « Münchener Beobachter » (L'Observateur de Munich) , le journal devient, en 1919, le « Völkischer Beobachter » (L'Observateur populaire) . En grandes difficultés financières, l'hebdomadaire est racheté, en décembre 1920, par le NSDAP à travers l'acquisition du « Franz-Eher-Verlag » , une maison d'édition dont dépendait le journal et grâce à des fonds de l'armée fournis par l'officier Franz von Epp. Adolf Hitler en fait l'organe officiel du Parti : la gestion du journal est contrôlée, de 1921 à 1923, par Max Amann, intime d'Hitler et trésorier du Parti, qui dirigera plus tard la Chambre de la presse du « Reich » (« Reichspressekammer ») . Dietrich Eckart en dirige la rédaction jusqu'à son décès, en 1923. Lui succèdent Alfred Rosenberg (1923-1938) , puis Wilhelm Weiß (1938-1945) .

À partir du 8 février 1923, le journal devient un quotidien. Après le « “ Putsch ” de la Brasserie » , le 8 novembre 1923, il cesse de paraître jusqu'au 26 février 1925. Il disparaît définitivement à la fin avril 1945, quelques jours avant la capitulation allemande. Ainsi, son édition du Sud du « Reich » paraît pour la dernière fois, le 28 avril.

Jusque dans ses dernières éditions, à la fin du mois d'avril 1945, le journal exalte le rôle de Hitler dans le conflit et dans la défense de l'Allemagne : durant le mois d'avril 1945, des éditoriaux et des titres en Ire page rappellent le rôle de Hitler dans la défense du « Reich » et de sa capitale. En effet, ce dernier est perçu par le journal comme assumant complètement son rôle, « enflammant l'esprit combatif » régnant dans la ville, ce qui laisse pourtant sceptique les habitants restés sur place.

À la fin du 3e « Reich » , le journal publie de nombreuses séries d'articles pour dénoncer des aspects spécifiques du danger que les Juifs feraient peser sur le « Reich » . Cette menace est présentée dans les colonnes du journal de différentes manières : ordonnateurs du complot visant à dominer le monde et dont l'Allemagne serait la victime, les Juifs sont rendus responsables de l'ensemble des maux qui frappent le « Reich » .

Il publie ainsi des reportages antisémites, en nombre variable, par année de guerre : 2, en 1939 ; 17, en 1941 ; 4, en 1942 ; 50, en 1943 ; 10, en 1944 ; et 4, en 1945. La publication de ces reportages permet de définir 4 grandes campagnes antisémites dans ses colonnes : à l'été de 1941 ; au printemps puis à l'automne de 1943 ; et enfin, au printemps de 1944.

Ainsi, à l'automne de 1943, entre septembre et novembre, le journal dénonce à nouveau le rôle des Juifs dans la Guerre dans une série de 13 articles. Les vœux adressés par le Président américain à la communauté juive pour « Roch Hachana » , point de départ de la campagne de presse de l'automne de 1943, confirment selon le journal que Franklin Delano Roosevelt est un instrument dans les mains des Juifs pour la domination mondiale.

Le journal s'interroge également durant cette période sur la conférence de Moscou de 1943, à laquelle ont participé Anthony Eden, Cordell Hull et Viatcheslav Molotov, qui aboutirait, selon les articles publiés dans les colonnes du journal, à livrer l'Europe à Joseph Staline.

La campagne de presse du printemps de 1944, dans le contexte de la prise de contrôle de la Hongrie, et des défaites allemandes sur le front de l'Est est l'occasion de dénoncer un danger juif qui déferlerait sur l'Europe. Dans ce contexte, le « Völkischer Beobachter » suit à la lettre les consignes émises par les services de contrôle de la presse, lorsque, le 12 mai 1944, la une du journal rapproche les termes « antisémitisme » et « anti-bolchévisme », en informant son lectorat du soutien prétendument apporté par l'URSS à l'établissement de colons juifs en Palestine. La constitution de ce foyer de colonisation en Palestine serait, selon le journal, la preuve de la collusion entre les Juifs et le bolchévisme. Puis, 2 jours plus tard, un long article intitulé, « Staline et les Juifs », insiste sur le rôle supposé des Juifs dans la prise du pouvoir, puis dans sa conservation par Staline, celui-ci étant présenté comme au service exclusif des « Juifs moscovites » qui détiendraient le pouvoir depuis 1917.

Le 3e anniversaire de l'invasion de l'URSS fournit au journal une occasion supplémentaire de dénoncer un complot judéo-bolchévique qui menacerait le « Reich », dans le contexte de la bataille de Normandie et des attaques aériennes.

Mais ces campagnes ne doivent pas rejeter dans l'ombre certains thèmes antisémites utilisés à loisir, comme celui du soi-disant projet juif de domination du monde. En effet, la défaite de Stalingrad, en février 1943, fournit une occasion supplémentaire de mentionner une collusion entre les Juifs et le bolchévisme : le sacrifice consenti constituerait le gage de la résistance allemande à ce double danger : à plusieurs reprises dans le courant des mois de janvier et février 1943, le journal exploite les résultats de la conférence de Casablanca, destinée à préparer l'après-Guerre, et la présente comme un plan de partage de l'Europe au seul profit des Juifs.

Rapidement, la propagande nationale-socialiste met en avant une menace : le projet d'annihilation du « Reich » et de sa puissance. Entre 1939 et 1945, une douzaine d'articles, au milieu de très nombreux autres articles antisémites, sont explicitement consacrés au sort du « Reich », en cas de défaite. L'exploitation de l'incursion soviétique en Prusse orientale, durant l'automne de 1944, donne l'occasion au journal de dénoncer le danger « bolchevik » qui planerait sur le « Reich » : à la fin du mois d'octobre, des photos des massacres de civils et des récits de viols et de pillages perpétrés par les soldats de l'Armée Rouge, durant la percée soviétique, sont publiées dans le journal.

Les succès soviétiques de l'hiver de 1945, dans un 1er temps dissimulés, puis édulcorés, et leurs conséquences sur les populations allemandes habitant l'Est de l'Oder sont présentées avant tout comme des éléments destinés à confirmer le tableau dressé depuis des années : les troupes soviétiques sont ainsi présentées comme des barbares qui se déchaînent sur l'Est du « Reich » dans l'édition du 9 février.

L'éditorial du 22 mars 1945 en constitue un avatar tardif : la défaite du « Reich » serait non seulement une défaite militaire et politique, mais aussi un échec dans la lutte pour la survie du peuple allemand. La perspective de l'asservissement du peuple allemand doit justifier, aux yeux des rédacteurs du journal, une résistance acharnée.

À mesure que la situation militaire de l'Allemagne nazie se dégrade, le journal tente d'insuffler à la population du « Reich » une volonté fanatique de résistance, conforme au souhait de Hitler, notamment après le 20 juillet. La menace de l'extermination du « Volk » doit permettre de justifier une résistance fanatique contre les Alliés, tout en anticipant sur une des dernières directives du bureau de presse du « Reich » (4 avril 1945), ordonnant à la presse de renforcer dans la population le sentiment de résistance face aux envahisseurs, aussi bien ceux venus de l'Ouest que ceux venus de l'Est. Le 28 avril 1945, la dernière édition du journal, circulant dans le Sud du « Reich », est titrée : « La forteresse bavaroise » .

The « Völkischer Beobachter » (« “ Völkisch ” Observer ») was the newspaper of the National-Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP, or Nazi Party) from 1920. It first appeared weekly, then daily from 8 February 1923. For 25 years, it formed part of the official public face of the Nazi Party.

The « fighting paper of the National-Socialist movement of Greater Germany » (« Kampfblatt der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung Großdeutschlands ») had its origin in the « Münchener Beobachter » (« Munich Observer ») which, in 1918, was acquired by the Thule Society and, in August 1919, was renamed « Völkischer Beobachter » .

Major Ernst Röhm and Dietrich Eckart persuaded Röhm's commanding officer, Major General Franz Ritter von Epp to purchase the « Völkischer Beobachter » , in December 1920, for the NSDAP from the Thule Society for 60,000 « Reichsmarks » . The money came from wealthy friends and secret army funds.

After acquiring the paper, Dietrich Eckart along with Chase Bauduin, became the first editors.

In 1921, Adolf Hitler acquired all shares in the company, making him the sole owner of the publication.

The circulation of the paper was initially about 8,000 but increased to 25,000, in autumn 1923, due to strong demand during the Occupation of the Ruhr. In that year, Alfred Rosenberg became editor. With the prohibition of the NSDAP after the « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » of 9 November 1923, the paper also had to cease publication, which resumed however on the Party's re-foundation, on 26 February 1925. The circulation rose along with the success of the Nazi movement, reaching more than 120,000, in 1931 ; and 1.7 million, by 1944.

During the rise to power, it reported general news but also Party activities, presenting them as almost constant success. Guidelines for propagandists urged that all posters, insofar as the police allowed, contain propaganda for it, and all meetings should be announced in it, although reports should be sent to the Propaganda Department, which would then forward corrected versions to the paper. Posters did indeed urge reading it. When Hitler was banned from public speaking, it was the main vehicle to propagate his views.

Josef Goebbels published articles in it to attack the United States for criticizing anti-Jewish measures, and to describe Russia.

The final issues from April and May 1945 were not distributed.

« Völkischer Beobachter » (People's Observer) : daily newspaper published by the Nazi Party in Germany from the 1920's until the fall of the 3rd « Reich » , in 1945. The paper was originally founded in 1887 as a 4 page Munich weekly, the « Münchner Beobachter » . It had become a daily anti-Semitic gossip sheet with a circulation of about 7,000 when it was bought by Adolf Hitler, in 1923, to serve as the propaganda organ of his Nazi Party. In 1941, its circulation had passed 1.1 million.

Publication of the « Völkischer Beobachter » was suspended 3 times, in the early 1920's, by the pre-Hitler German government because of anti-Semitic articles and attacks on government policies and officials. After the 3rd suspension, it resumed publication as a weekly, in 1925, and became a daily again, 1 month later. Hitler had made Alfred Rosenberg its editor, and the latter continued the anti-Semitic thrust of the paper while making it a forum for Hitler and propaganda minister Josef Goebbels. The « Völkischer Beobachter » launched Berlin and South German editions, in 1930, and, in 1933, the paper opened a new editorial and printing headquarters in Berlin. A Vienna edition began to appear following Germany's annexation of Austria, in 1938. Foreign correspondents and diplomats from the rest of the world followed it for indications of Nazi policy shifts and propaganda objectives, making allowances for its usual exaggeration and hyperbole.

Die Zeitung Völkischer Beobachter war von Dezember 1920 bis zum 30. April 1945 das publizistische Parteiorgan der NSDAP. Die Zeitung erschien zunächst zweimal wöchentlich, ab dem 8. Februar 1923 täglich im Franz-Eher-Verlag. Sie wurde nach den Anfangsjahren reichsweit vertrieben.

Das « Kampfblatt der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung Großdeutschlands » ging aus dem 1887 mit einem Umfang von vier Seiten gegründeten Vorstadtblatt Münchner Beobachter hervor, das 1918 in den Besitz der Thule-Gesellschaft überging, nachdem am 22. Juni 1918 der bisherige Verleger Franz Eher gestorben war. Rudolf von Sebottendorf erwarb von dessen Witwe Käthe Bierbaumer für 5.000 Reichsmark die Herausgeberlizenz für die Zeitung. Ab Juli 1918 übernahm von Sebottendorf die Schriftleitung. Die Zeitung wurde zunächst mit demselben Titel herausgegeben, jedoch mit dem Untertitel Sportblatt. Im August 1919 wurde das Blatt in Völkischer Beobachter umbenannt. Der Kauf durch die NSDAP erfolgte dann 1920 auf Initiative von Dietrich Eckart. Erster von der NSDAP eingesetzter Chefredakteur der Zeitung war Hugo Machhaus (25. Dezember 1920 bis 15. Mai 1921) , dem kurzzeitig Hermann Esser folgte (15. Mai 1921 bis 12. August 1921) , bevor Eckart selbst zum 12. August 1921 die Leitung der Redaktion übernahm.

Die Auflage des Blattes lag zunächst bei circa 8.000 und steigerte sich, bedingt durch die starke Nachfrage während der Ruhrbesetzung, bis Herbst 1923 auf 25.000 Exemplare. Durch das Parteiverbot der NSDAP infolge des Hitlerputsches am 9. November 1923 mußte die Zeitung ihr Erscheinen einstellen, mit Neugründung der NSDAP am 26. Februar 1925 erschien sie wieder.

Der in München aufgelegte Völkische Beobachter erschien ab 1. Januar 1933 regelmäßig als Berliner Ausgabe. Ein erster Versuch, das Blatt in der Hauptstadt zu etablieren, war im März 1931 gescheitert. Des Weiteren gab es eine süddeutsche, eine norddeutsche und ab 1938 eine Wiener Ausgabe.

Die Auflage steigerte sich mit dem Erfolg der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung enorm, 1931 erreichte sie über 120.000 und steigerte sich bis zum Jahr 1944 auf 1,7 Millionen Exemplare.

Wenige Tage vor der deutschen Kapitulation stellte der Völkische Beobachter Ende April 1945 sein Erscheinen ein. Die letzte Ausgabe vom 30. April 1945 wurde nicht mehr ausgeliefert.

Geschäftsführer war seit April 1922 der Reichsleiter der NSDAP für die Presse, Max Amann.

Die Einnahmen aus dem Verkauf allein trugen das Blatt nicht. Es hielt sich durch den Verkauf unverzinslicher Schuldscheine an Parteimitglieder und erhielt Darlehen und Zuschüsse von wohlhabenden Gönnern wie Helene Bechstein. Finanzielles Rückgrat war später der von Amann erfolgreich ausgebaute Buchverlag. Auch der 1926 gegründete « Illustrierte Beobachter » war ein Erfolg. Daneben wurde die Anhängerschaft immer wieder an ihre Pflicht erinnert, Abonnent zu werden und solche zu werben.

Hauptschriftleiter :

Bis 25. Dezember 1920 : Hansjörg Maurer.

25. Dezember 1920 bis 15. Mai 1921 : Hugo Machhaus.

15. Mai 1921 bis 12. August 1921 : Hermann Esser.

12. August 1921 bis März 1923 : Dietrich Eckart.

März 1923 bis 1938 : Alfred Rosenberg.

1938 bis 1945 : Wilhelm Weiß.

Parteiorgan der NSDAP, erschienen im Franz Eher Nachf. Verlag. Die NSDAP erwarb die Zeitung am 17. Dezember 1920 von der Thule-Gesellschaft. Ihre Hauptaufgabe war die Verbreitung der NS-Ideologie und die Vermittlung von Informationen an die Parteimitglieder. Nach dem Hitlerputsch zunächst verboten, wurde die Zeitung ab 1925 zum politisch-propagandistischen Massenblatt. Geschäftsführer war seit April 1922 der Reichsleiter der NSDAP für die Presse, Max Amann. Hauptschriftleiter waren Dietrich Eckart (1921-1923) , Alfred Rosenberg (1923-1938) und Wilhelm Weiß (1938-1945) . Ab 1933 war der Völkische Beobachter quasi Regierungsorgan. Die letzte Ausgabe wurde am 30. April 1945 gedruckt, aber nicht mehr ausgeliefert.

Vorläufer war der « Münchener Beobachter », dessen überregionale Ausgabe seit 9. August 1919 « Völkischer Beobachter » hieß. Die Zeitung erschien im Franz Eher Nachf. Verlag. Der Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterverein (NSDAV) unter dem Vorsitz von Anton Drexler (1884-1942) kaufte Verlag und Zeitung am 20. Dezember 1920 für 120.000 Mark. Treibende Kraft beim Kauf des hochverschuldeten Verlags war der Schriftsteller Dietrich Eckart (1868-1923) ; Geldgeber waren einige wohlhabende Privatpersonen und vermutlich auch die Reichswehr in Bayern. Eckart war von August 1921 bis März 1923 redaktioneller Leiter ; auf ihn folgte Alfred Rosenberg (1893-1946) . Der Sitz der Redaktion befand sich in der Schellingstraße 39-41 in München. Der Untertitel des bis zum 8. Februar 1923 nur zweimal wöchentlich und erst dann als Tageszeitung erscheinenden Parteiorgans lautete jetzt « Kampfblatt der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung Großdeutschlands » .

Adolf Hitler (1889-1945) war seit 29. Juli 1921 Vorsitzender der Partei und verfügte damit auch über sämtliche Anteile der Verlagsholding. Verlagsleiter war seit April 1922 der spätere Präsident der Reichspressekammer, Max Amann (1891-1957) .

Gedruckt wurde der Völkische Beobachter beim « Münchner Buchgewerbehaus M. Müller & Sohn » in der Schellingstraße. Ab 29. August 1923 hatte er ein übergroßes Format, nachdem der Verlag eine gebrauchte amerikanische Rotationsmaschine erworben hatte. Dadurch sowie durch die in Rotdruck unterstrichene Hauptschlagzeile und die Kopfleiste in Antiqua-Lettern unterschied er sich auffällig von anderen Zeitungen. Die Auflage schwankte von 1920 bis 1922 zwischen 8.000 und 10.000 Stück, 1923 stieg sie auf 30.000. Die Einnahmen aus Anzeigen und Verkauf allein trugen das Blatt nicht ; es hielt sich durch den Verkauf unverzinslicher Schuldscheine an Parteimitglieder sowie Darlehen und Zuschüsse wohlhabender Gönner über Wasser.

Bis 1922 schrieb Hitler selbst viele Artikel. Grundzüge der Agitation des Blatts waren in vulgärem Ton und plakativem Stil vorgebrachter Antisemitismus und Antikommunismus, aber auch antikapitalistische Anklänge, übersteigter Nationalismus und Antiparlamentarismus, verbunden mit hemmungslosen Angriffen auf demokratische Politiker. Sie brachten ihm mehrfach Verbote ein, darunter eines, das im Oktober 1923 zu einer schweren Krise zwischen Reichs- und bayerischer Staatsregierung führte, da diese den Vollzug des vom Reich verhängten Verbots verweigerte und so die Atmosphäre aufheizte, die sich im folgenden Putschversuch Hitlers gewaltsam entlud.

Das nach dem Scheitern des Hitlerputsches am 9. November 1923 verbotene Blatt erschien erstmals wieder am 26. Februar 1925 nach Hitlers Entlassung aus der Festungshaft. Durch seine Nähe zu Hitler und der Parteizentrale hatte der Völkische Beobachter im Vergleich zu den übrigen parteioffiziellen oder parteinahen « Kampfblättern » eine Leitfunktion.

Hitler war bis zum 30. April 1933 Herausgeber des Völkischen Beobachters, schrieb allerdings nur noch wenige Artikel selbst. Die redaktionelle Leitung hatte wiederum Rosenberg, dessen Stellvertreter, der ehemalige Hauptmann Wilhelm Weiß (1892-1950) , für die praktische Arbeit zuständig war. Rosenbergs Position wurde immer wieder erschüttert, besonders auch, da sich Amann als Verlagsleiter aus geschäftlichen Gründen auch in redaktionelle Angelegenheiten einmischte.

Wegen seiner Angriffe auf Politiker der demokratischen Parteien und Institutionen der Republik wurde der Völkische Beobachter erneut mehrfach verboten und in Prozesse verwickelt. Im Feuilleton kam nun als weiterer wichtiger Grundzug der Kampf gegen die als « Kulturbolschewismus » verteilte moderne Kunst aller Art zum Tragen.

Bis 1929 lag die Auflage unter 20.000, 1930 knapp unter 40.000 ; nach den Reichstagswahlen vom 14. September 1930 überschritt sie die Grenze von 100.000. Damit reihte sich der Völkische Beobachter zwar nicht der Qualität, aber der Auflagenhöhe nach unter die bedeutendsten Zeitungen im Reich ein. Nach wie vor diente das Blatt in erster Linie der Kommunikation mit den Mitgliedern. Finanzielles Rückgrat war der von Amann erfolgreich ausgebaut Buchverlag. Auch der 1926 gegründete « Illustrierte Beobachter » war ein Erfolg. Daneben wurde die Anhängerschaft immer wieder an ihre Pflicht erinnert, Abonnenten zu werben.

Seit 1. Februar 1927 erschien der Völkische Beobachter in einer Reichs- und in einer Bayernausgabe. Ende 1932 errichtete die Druckerei eine Zweigstelle in Berlin, so daß ab 1. Januar 1933 sowohl eine Berliner als auch eine Norddeutsche Ausgabe existierten. Daneben gab es eine Münchner und eine Süddeutsche Ausgabe.

Während der nationalsozialistischen Herrschaft fand der « Völkische Beobachter » ideale Bedingungen zur weiteren Ausbreitung. Die parteipolitische Konkurrenz wurde verboten oder durch wirtschaftlichen Druck zum Aufgeben beziehungsweise zum Verkauf an den Parteiverlag gezwungen. Werber in SA-Uniform gingen von Haus zu Haus und nötigten Leute zum Abonnement.

Der propagandistische Kampfcharakter blieb auch nach 1933 bestehen, verbunden mit ständiger Glorifizierung der nationalsozialistischen Herrschaft. Weiß stellte aber jetzt auch qualifiziertere Journalisten ein und hob das Niveau des Blatts und seiner neuen Beilagen. Mit seinen Versuchen, auch einen gut ausgebauten Auslandsdienst zu schaffen, scheiterte er allerdings an der Knausrigkeit Amanns. Nach dem Einmarsch in Österreich 1938 kam auch eine eigene Wiener Ausgabe heraus. Der Anteil der Bilder im Blatt vergrößerte sich erheblich ; ab Februar 1941 druckte man die ganze Zeitung in Antiqua statt in Fraktur. Dank seiner führenden Stellung hatte der Völkische Beobachter jetzt auch einen üppigen Anzeigenteil. Die Druckauflage stieg von 127.500 im Jahr 1933 auf über 313.000 im folgenden Jahr und nahm jedes Jahr um rund 100.000 zu. Keine andere Zeitung im Reich konnte damit nur annähernd mithalten. 1941 wurde die Millionengrenze überschritten.

Die Redakteure des Blatts versuchten gegenüber Propagandaministerium und Pressekonferenz eine gewisse Unabhängigkeit zu bewahren. Sie konnten aber bei unerwünschten Formulierungen durchaus in das Visier der Gestapo geraten. Der Völkische Beobachter wurde des öfteren auf den Pressekonferenzen gerügt und unterlag auch der Überwachung durch Reichspressechef Doktor Otto Dietrich (1897-1952) . Im Kulturteil kamen bisweilen sogar konservative Regimegegner mit verhüllter Kritik am Nationalsozialismus zu Wort.

Wegen Materialknappheit mußte der Völkische Beobachter wie alle Zeitungen im Krieg seinen Umfang erheblich verringern. Die letzte Nummer erschien in der Süddeutschen Ausgabe am 30. April 1945, wurde jedoch wegen des Vormarsches amerikanischer Truppen nicht mehr ausgeliefert.

Karl Grunsky

Le critique musical et écrivain sur la musique Karl (Carl) Grunsky est né le 5 mars 1871 à Schornbach, et est mort le 2 août 1943 à Vaihingen an der Enz. Il fut un fervent partisan de Richard Wagner et d'Anton Bruckner.

Grunsky a écrit des transcriptions pour 2 pianos (4 mains) des Symphonies du « Maître de Saint-Florian » .

Déjà auteur d'un ouvrage intitulé : « Wagner et les Juifs » (« Richard Wagner und die Juden ») , écrit en 1920, Karl Grunsky devint un professionnel de la dénonciation, frappant jusqu'aux chefs d'orchestre Wilhelm Furtwängler et Felix Weingartner pour avoir accompagné des solistes juifs. Il dénonça les compositeurs allemands comme Wolfgang Fortner, coupables d'avoir utilisé des textes juifs, et les musicologues pour avoir écrit trop longuement sur Felix Mendelssohn et pas assez sur Anton Bruckner. Grunsky collabora en 1940 au « Lexikon der Juden in Musik » , véritable catalogue préparatoire à la déportation.

Leading music-critic, writer on music and æsthetician Karl (Carl) Grunsky was born on 5 March 1871 in Schornbach, and died on 2 August 1943 in Vaihingen an der Enz. He was a strong supporter of Richard Wagner and Anton Bruckner.

Grunsky wrote transcriptions for 2 pianos (4 hands) of the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner.

Grunsky announced in 1907 :

« Music, an expression of mental life, is today admitted, defended, demanded from nearly all sides, since we barely pay attention to Eduard Hanslick any longer. »

Grunsky joined the NSDAP sometime between July 1930 (when his son Hans Alfred joined) and November 1923 (when Alfred Lorenz joined) .

Grunsky published his influential « Musikästhetik » in 1907, which went through many editions, also « Musikgeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts » (published by Georg Joachim Göschen in Leipzig, in : 1902 ; February 1908 ; and April 1923) , and « Musikgeschichte des 17. Jahrhunderts » (published by Georg Joachim Göschen in Leipzig, in : 1905 ; and March 1925) , and a number of articles on the music-dramas of Richard Wagner, in 1906-1908 (e.g. : « Die Rhythmik im Parsifal » ; « Richard Wagner-Jahrbuch » , 1908, pages 276-370) . See also his contributions to Anton Bruckner's « Symphonien erläutert mit Notenbeispielen » (published by Schlesinger in Berlin) . Helmut Federhofer speaks of « a dispute between Schenker and Grunsky » , in 1908, regarding August Halm and Anton Bruckner (in : « Nach Tagebüchern und Briefen » ; page 134) .

Studies by Karl Grunsky, a Stuttgart journalist who wrote extensively on musical matters, are ubiquitous in the publications of the Bayreuth circle. A regular contributor to both the « Bayreuther Festspielführer » and the « Bayreuther Blätter », Grunsky was one of Alfred Lorenz's earliest and most enthusiastic proponents. In addition to arrangements of Bruckner's Symphonies for 2 pianos, he wrote 3 books about the composer. The 1st, from 1908, sees Bruckner in typically Romantic terms as an unworldly genius, full of naive faith. Bruckner, to his credit, learned from Richard Wagner, but had a sufficiently original nature to be able to keep these Wagnerian impressions in check : the line separating Wagner from Bruckner is, in fact, a cleft - not to be bridged even by friendship.

Grunsky's 1922 study begins a shift in perception. The 2 composers are closer together. Now, Grunsky observes that, in Bruckner's works, the tools are often Wagnerian, but the end result is not. In a discussion of why Bruckner's music is not formless, he argues that one ought to value formal innovation in Bruckner Symphonies just as one values formal innovation in Wagnerian music-drama. More important, in the wake of Germany's defeat in the First World War, Bruckner is presented in nationalistic terms. His is a soul rooted directly in God and in the « Volk » ; the God invoked in a Brucknerian « Adagio » is that of the medieval German mystics, not necessarily that of the church. Grunsky also compares Bruckner's Symphonies with Gothic cathedrals, arguing that the Gothic style reached its peak in Germany as in no other land. Nationalism turns vaguely threatening when resistance to Bruckner is made into a manifestation of decadence : « in the manner of struggle against Bruckner, we see a sign of decay in the air long before the War » .

The alleged devaluation of Bruckner as a symptom of Germany's decline is more explicit in Grunsky's « Kampf um deutsche Musik ! » (1933) . Here, Beethoven, Wagner, and Bruckner, unproblematically linked together, are regarded as the culmination of German music, which, in Schopenhauerian terms, provides the listener direct access to the will. Grunsky traces the deterioration of German music in both the rise of modern music (derided as spiritual masturbation and depicted in sexually threatening terms) and in the waning reputation of Wagner. Throughout the book, « modern » and « Jewish » are linked in opposition to « German » , and Grunsky argues that these « non-Germans » are incapable of understanding Bruckner :

« These others face the immense waves of intensification (" Steigerungswogen ") of Bruckner's music with puzzlement because their souls do not vibrate continually along with them, whereas for us the reverberation is so great that it continually sets new representations into motion. »

By 1936, political ideology has replaced musical nuance in Grunsky's work. Gone completely is his earlier concern to differentiate between Bruckner and Wagner. To see Bruckner as influenced only by Wagner's orchestral magic (and, thus, to devalue the music-dramas as mere theater music) is impossible :

« Bruckner's life is inseparably connected with Wagner. Through music, Bruckner felt himself to be internally bound with Wagner. »

According to Grunsky, Bruckner heard Wagner's works as absolute music ; he was concerned with their pure form, not just their unfolding action or « Klang » . In other words, he heard them just like Alfred Lorenz, but « avant la lettre » :

« Now, if Bruckner recognized the characteristic value of Wagnerian music from the beginning, this is proof that even at that time he heard almost in a Lorenzian manner (“ lorenzisch ”) , and that he had an equal understanding of the secret of Wagner’s musical form. »

Grunsky suggests that Bruckner instinctively grasped Wagnerian form and was completely convinced of the worth, value, and logical consistency of the music-dramas. For Grunsky, the Wagnerian « Klang » did not obscure but rather revealed form and logic ; the same was true in Bruckner’s Symphonies. Anti-Wagnerian opinion in the new Bruckner movement contradicted the facts : should Bruckner be ashamed to have followed in the steps of the Bayreuth Master ? On the contrary, according to Grunsky, Bruckner was truest to himself when he held with Wagner.

Grunsky, like Lorenz, allowed his National-Socialist sentiments to infiltrate his scholarly work and was not averse to using his Party connections for personal gain. In a letter to the « Reichsschrifttumskammer » (RSK) , dated 10 May 1943, he requested permission to publish a new monograph on Bruckner outside of Germany, as his usual printer was at the front. According to the letter, the new work connected Bruckner with present-day concerns, undoubtedly political. Grunsky regarded it as his best work, containing the « experience of a lifetime » . His death, 3 months later, must have prevented the book’s appearance.

The work of Grunsky’s son, Hans Alfred, provides an even more interesting example of the juxtaposition of Wagner, Lorenzian analysis, Bruckner, and National-Socialism. A philosopher, not a musicologist, he was professor at Munich University from 1935 to 1944 (Ordinarius from 1937) , and concurrently held a research position with the « Reichsinstitut für Geschichte des neuen Deutschlands » . He was also associated with Alfred Rosenberg’s ideological bureau, the « NS-Kulturgemeinde » . The younger Grunsky’s major preoccupation, during the 1930’s and 1940’s, was with National-Socialist philosophy : its history, clarification, and (not incidentally) its promulgation.

During the 1920’s Hans Alfred Grunsky was a student of Alfred Lorenz’s and, like his father, an enthusiastic proponent of the latter’s work. Virtually, all of his articles about music refer to Lorenz’s type of dynamic formal analysis. Many of the parallels with National-Socialism, latent in Lorenz’s writings, are more evident ; in fact, Grunsky is the only contemporary of Lorenz who makes the connection between Nazism and Lorenzian analysis explicit. In an article entitled « Form und Erlebnis » , Grunsky writes :

« The most wonderful thing about this new science of form is that it corresponds completely to the ideal that the most recent academic works demand : it is not lifeless, but is intimately entwined with art, with life, and with the “ Volk ” : Lorenz’s work finds its true niche in the “ Volk ”, for it leads from the recognition of form (“ Formerkennen ”) to the experience of form (“ Formerleben ”) . »

In 1934, Karl Grunsky published a similar Lorenzian primer under the title of « Neues zur Formenlehre » , proposing the addition of 4 « Mischformen » . These are derived from combinations of Bars and « Bogen » (as shown below) , and are Grunsky's Germanized permutations of binary form :

Hans Alfred Grunsky's Mischformen

Bar + Bogen = Reprisesbar (m-m-n-m) .

Bogen + Gegenbar = Echobogen (m-n-m-m) .

Bar + Gegenbar = Echobar (m-m-n-n) .

Gegenbar + Bar = Doppelbar (m-n-n-m or m-n-n-o) .

Bogen + Bogen = 4-teilige Bogenreihe (m-n-n-m) .

Lorenzian analysis and National-Socialist concerns continued to intersect in Grunsky's life. In a letter of 5 May 1933 to the « Kultusministerium », he attempted to exploit his Nazi ties to obtain a position at Munich University, proposing the foundation of a chair in National-Socialist philosophy. Although the letter deals primarily with philosophical issues, Grunsky not only proposes a series of lectures on « Richard Wagner's works as the source of a Germanic world-view » , but also links Anton Bruckner and National-Socialist ideology in a quite direct manner :

« National-Socialism as the source and subject of philosophical consciousness : that may appear bizarre to Liberal dabblers in philosophy (" liberalistischen Bücherphilosophen ") . All further thoughts can only be a necessary consequence of that sentence : that true philosophy is always, and always will be created out of life. However, not only the destiny of peoples or individuals, but also " myths ", " fairy-tales ", " poems ", and " art-works " of all types can become the subject of philosophical contemplation and interpretation ; often deeper metaphysical content lurks in these last ... In this sense, over many years, with the support of the " Notgemeinschaft der deutschen Wissenschaft ", I have developed an entirely new æsthetic theory of form and rhythm and applied it to Anton Bruckner's Symphonic works at the same time. »

Grunsky saw an obvious connection between Lorenzian formal analysis and National-Socialism and regarded his work on Bruckner as appropriate for the times.

A final illustration of the interpenetration of art and politics in Grunsky's work is found in a lecture delivered in Munich, in 1938, on « Jacob Böhme as the Creator of a Teutonic Philosophy of the Will » . He claims to find in Böhme the « formal world and intellectual structure » of a Bruckner Symphony. While Grunsky's comment is surely intended only as an illustrative analogy- albeit one « of deepest significance to our race » , it is striking that Grunsky should light on Bruckner. As an adherent of the expressive æsthetic, Grunsky regarded all music as the direct expression of the will of the composer ; music is will. There is an important slippage in meaning inherent in the evocation of « will » by the National-Socialists, however, whereby the central concept of Schopenhauerian philosophy is coarsened and celebrated as an instinctive and brutal will to power.

The case of Hans Alfred Grunsky is particularly clear. Considered in conjunction with the writings of his father, Karl, and his teacher, Alfred Lorenz, his work on Bruckner offers a compelling example of the difficulty of separating the aesthetic from the political during the 1920's and 1930's. Recent developments in literary theory have suggested that works of interpretation or criticism are no less subjective or « artistic » than the objects of interpretation themselves. Often unconscious subjectivity surfaces as ideology in the sense described by Louis Althusser. There is a connection between musical aesthetics and political myth-making, whether in terms of a focus on Germanizing musical terminology (deriving all form from the Bar form, for example) , or through emphasis on the power of will. The intersection of National-Socialist ideology, Lorenzian formal analysis, and Bruckner, while perhaps only coincidental, is all the more significant because it is not unique. While Bruckner played an important role in National-Socialist « Kulturpolitik » , the figure of Richard Wagner is ever present. It is with Wagner and his Bayreuth followers that we must begin if we are to take-up the challenge of trying to separate the intertwining threads of aesthetics, philosophy, and politics in fascist Germany.

The notion that purely instrumental music could be expressive was really never in question. As Karl Grunsky argued in his « Musikästhetik » of 1907, the differences between absolute, program, and vocal music were ultimately minimal : all music is expressive. Grunsky's treatise captures the paradoxical fact that, by the beginning of the 20th Century, Eduard Hanslick's thought, dismissed as old-fashioned, was so deeply engrained in discourse that the ideas he had promoted were no longer necessarily associated with him. Grunsky notes that « it is conceded, maintained, and expected that music is the expression of the soul's life » , because « hardly anyone pays attention to Hanslick anymore » . The account of musical expression that follows, however, is deeply indebted to « Vom Musikalisch-Schönen » . Grunsky encourages his readers to think about musical expression in terms of its dynamic, not in terms of representation or emotion :

« Music provides only the moving tones, not the motivational foundations behind them. »

Yet, Grunsky never cites Hanslick by name. In a similar fashion, Eugen Schmitz began his « Musikästhetik » of 1915 by outlining the history of the opposition between the aesthetics of form (as represented by Hanslick) and the aesthetics of content (as represented by Wagner) , accused both of parties of one-sidedness and, then, described their fusion in the aesthetic thought of more recent times.

Hans Alfred Grunsky (geboren 31. Juli 1902 in Stuttgart ; gestorben 20. Mai 1988 in Sibichhausen) war ein nationalsozialistischer deutscher Philosoph, der und andere über Jakob Böhme arbeitete.

Hans Grunsky war der Sohn des Stuttgarter Historikers und Musikschriftstellers Karl Grunsky, der über Martin Luther, Richard Wagner und Anton Bruckner gearbeitet hat. Der Vater trat 1930 der nationalsozialistischen Bewegung bei und agitierte ebenfalls dezidiert in deren Sinne.

Hans Alfred Grunsky besuchte das Karls-Gymnasium in Stuttgart, mußte infolge einer spinalen Kinderlähmung 1917 den Schulbesuch aufgeben. Er war von da an Rollstuhlfahrer. Der NSDAP trat er am 1. Juni 1930 bei (Mitglieds-Nummer 264.685) . Er war ein fanatischer Nationalsozialist und lehrte eine antisemitische, rassistische und antikatholische Philosophie. Sein Ziel war es, eine Philosophie im nationalsozialistischen Sinne zu etablieren. So hielt er eine Vorlesung über « Blutwelt und Freiheit » und ein « Seminar der philosophierenden Mannschaft » . Daneben war er Autor und Herausgeber der NS-Schulungsbrieft.

Walter Frank holte Grunsky 1935 an sein Reichsinstitut für Geschichte des neuen Deutschland. Von 1937 bis 1940 war Grunsky Hauptlektor für Philosophie im Amt Rosenberg, seit 1938 « Hauptreferent für konfessionelle Fragen und Fragen des politischen Katholizismus » im Reichsinstitut für Geschichte des Neuen Deutschlands.

Im September 1935 erhielt er die Lehrstuhlvertretung für Alexander Pfänder an der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität München und wurde am 26. Mai 1937 auf diesem Lehrstuhl für Philosophie und Psychologie ordiniert. Die philosophische Fakultät der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität hatte sich geweigert, ihn als Hochschullehrer zu berufen, da Grunsky ihr fachlich ungeeignet erschien. Doch Adolf Hitler persönlich berief ihn zum Ordinarius für Philosophie, ein in der deutschen Universitätsgeschichte auch damals unerhörter Vorgang.

Grunskys erste Aktion war (« in einer Manier, die selbst im 3. Reich ihresgleichen sucht ») ein Gutachten über seine Fachkollegen. Darin teilte er dem Kultusminister Bernhard Rust mit, welche Kollegen Juden waren. Diese wurden umgehend aus dem Hochschuldienst entlassen :

« Um die Berufung von Herbert Cysarz zu verhindern, schickte Grunsky ein Sitzungsprotokoll der philosophischen Fakultät an Winifred Wagner und fügte hinzu, Cysarz habe sich in seinen Schriften herablassend über Wagner geäußert. »

Zu Grunskys Stil gehörte die Charakterisierung jüdischer Philosophie als « Talmudisierung » von Philosophie und von Baruch Spinoza als « Talmudjuden » , dies ist auch Thema seines Vortrags zur Berliner Ausstellung Der ewige Jude : Baruch Spinoza. Sein Leben und Werk im Lichte der Judenfrage.

Ein Doktorand von Grunsky war der später an den vertraulichen « Teegesprächen » von Konrad Adenauer teilnehmende Journalist Max Nitzsche.

Am 15. November 1941 wurde er wegen übler Nachrede und Verletzung des Dienstgeheimnisses vom Dienst enthoben. Die Beurlaubung wurde aber nach einem Verweis am 10. Mai 1943 wieder aufgehoben.

Das Gutachten des Reichsministeriums für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung nannte ihn einen « vollständigen Versager in menschlicher und wissenschaftlicher Hinsicht » . Am 12. Juli 1945 wurde er auf Weisung der US-Militärregierung entlassen. Im Entnazifizierungsverfahren wurde er zunächst als « Minderbelasteter » , dann als « Mitläufer » eingestuft.

Nach 1945 lebte Grunsky als Privatgelehrter in Sibichhausen am Starnberger See. Er setzte seine Arbeit innerhalb der Freien Akademie fort, die er zusammen mit Jakob Wilhelm Hauer gründete. Die Tagungen der Akademie fanden seit 1952 auf Burg Ludwigstein bei Kassel statt.

Der Einbruch des Judentums in die Philosophie

(Hans Alfred Grunsky)

Im Jahre 1907 schrieb der Marburger Ordinarius für Philosophie, Hermann Cohen, an einen Rassegenossen, einen Rabbiner :

Dieser Mann war im damaligen Deutschland (und weit darüber hinaus) die fast unumschränkt herrschende Autorität auf dem Gebiet der Philosophie. Als Führer und Begründer der sogenannten neukantianischen Schule erhob er den Anspruch, Erneuerer und Weiterbildner des kantischen Denkens zu sein. Gleichzeitig war er Lehrer an der Jüdischen Hochschule in Berlin. Er selbst bezeichnet sich als Baal teschuwa seit 1880, in welchem Jahr der damals 38jährige zuerst ein literarisches Bekenntnis zum Judentum abgelegt hatte. Baal teschuwa - das heißt Büber, dessen Verdienst noch größer ist als das des Gerechten. Seit dem Beginn der 90er Jahre (ich zitiere die Darstellung des jüdischen Philosophie-Historikers Guttman) hat Cohen weiterhin « in einer Fülle von Vorträgen und Abhandlungen den sittlichen Gehalt des Judentums zur Darstellung gebracht ; nicht in objektiver Kühle, sondern in der glühenden Begeisterung des Bekenntners » . Er ist dann, wie ebenfalls eine jüdische Quelle bezeugt, mit zunehmendem Alter immer jüdischer geworden. 1910 ist dieser Vorgang so weit gediehen, daß er sogar seinem großen Rassegenossen Spinoza aus tiefster Seele gram geworden ist, weil dieser, wie er in einer Veröffentlichung schreibt, « die Juden verlassen habe, und zwar bevor diese ihn verließen » .

Solches Bekenntnis zur eigenen Art wird an sich niemand lächerlich oder schlecht finden. Merkwürdig freilich, daß es sich um jemand handelt, der damals allgemein als repräsentativer Vertreter gerade der deutschen Philosophie galt. Aber etwas anderes ist noch viel merkwürdiger. Gehen wir von dem letzten Bekenntnis Cohens fünf Jahre weiter. Das deutsche Volk ringt im furchtbarsten aller Kriege um Sein oder Nichtsein. Wachgerüttelt durch dieses elementare Erleben schreibt ein deutschblütiger Philosophieprofessor, der in der Leitung der Kant-Gesellschaft, der damals maßgebenden philosophischen Vereinigung, tätig ist, einen Aufsatz über den Begriff der Nation. Er kommt darin unter anderem zu dem Ergebnis, daß dieser Begriff auch etwas mit Abstammungsgemeinschaft zu tun habe. « Ohne daß ich selber » , schreibt er, « auch nur ein Wort zu reden brauche, bieten mir im Auslande die Zeitungsausträger deutsche Zeitungen an, und wenn es anders wäre, so käme ich mir wahrhaft kümmerlich und von Mutter Natur stiefmütterlich behandelt vor » . An zwei Stellen dieses Aufsatzes ist nun auch kurz vom Judentum die Rede. An der einen Stelle weist er auf die nationale, im Zionismus zum Ausdruck kommende « Sehnsucht des Judentums » hin, die « nicht bloß Beachtung, sondern auch Achtung » verdiene. An der anderen sagt er, daß es aus der Liebe zur Scholle heraus « psychologisch und historisch durchaus verständlich sei, wenn Angehörigen des jüdischen Volkes der Erwerb deutschen Bodens von unseren Stammesvätern versagt ward » . Zur selben Zeit erschien von demselben deutschblütigen Professor eine andere Veröffentlichung, in der er es wagte, unterscheidend vom deutschen Denker Kant und vom jüdischen Denker Cohen zu sprechen, wobei er sich beeilt, dieses Wagnis aus seiner durchaus liberalen Haltung heraus (er selbst stand mit einem jüdischen Kollegen auf gutem Fuß) dadurch abzuschwächen, daß er Cohen als « eine der ehrwürdigsten Gestalten des modernen Judentums » bezeichnet.

Allein, er hatte zuviel gewagt. Ich muß dabei ausdrücklich bemerken, daß ich die Verbrechen des deutschblütigen Professors vollständig aufgezählt habe und daß er sich vordem auch niemals etwas hat zuschulden kommen lassen. Aber trotzdem : sie mußten gesühnt werden. Ein Sturm der Entrüstung, der Empörung und der Erbitterung ging durch die Kant-Gesellschaft, die zu einem hohen Prozentsatz aus Juden bestand und an deren Spitze Arthur Liebert, natürlich ebenfalls ein Jude, amtierte. « Hermann Cohen in unerhörter Weise beleidigt ! » - so hagelte es Protestschreiben und Austrittserklärungen. Liebert, der Vorsitzende, fährt eigens zu dem Sünder, um ihn zur Vernunft zu bringen. Dieser erklärt sich bereit, eine Entgegnung in die von ihm geleitete Zeitschrift unter der Voraussetzung aufzunehmen, daß sie in sachlichem Ton gehalten sei. Der Neukantianer Cassirer (bis 1933 philosophischer Ordinarius in Hamburg, jetzt in Oxford Emigrantenprofessor) wird mit dieser Aufgabe betraut. Seine Entgegnung fällt indessen derart gehässig und unsachlich aus, daß der deutschblütige Professor, der diesen Sturm heraufbeschworen hatte, sich weigert, sie aufzunehmen. Jetzt eröffnet ihm die in Aufruhr geratene Judenschaft drei Möglichkeiten : entweder er gibt eine öffentliche Ehrenerklärung für Cohen ab oder er nimmt wegen einer schon weit zurückliegenden Operation ein Jahr Urlaub oder er tritt stillschweigend zurück und verschwindet damit aus der Leitung der Kant-Gesellschaft. « Eine öffentliche Ehrenerklärung für Cohen » , meint der harmlose Deutsche, der ebenso verständniswie fassungslos vor den Folgen seiner Untat steht, « könnte ich darum nicht abgeben, weil ich nicht einmal in meinen geheimsten Gedanken eine Ehrenkränkung Cohens begangen habe » . Auch den zweiten Vorschlag mit der Operation lehnt er aus Gründen der Wahrheit ab. So tritt er denn einfach von seinem Amt in der Kant-Gesellschaft zurück.

Das also war jene Freiheit der Wissenschaft, die im Jahre 1933 ihr Ende gefunden hat, die Freiheit nämlich, Kriterien wissenschaftlicher Wahrheit willkürlich festzusetzen je nach dem Maß, ob sich dadurch ein Jude gekränkt fühlt oder nicht. Das Eigentümlichste ist aber, was hier als Beleidigung aufgefaßt wird. Machen wir uns doch das Ungeheuerliche einmal klar : In der Notzeit nationalen Ringens, wo gerade erst recht die Waffen des Geistes sich mit den Waffen der Armee zu einheitlicher Wirkung hätten vereinigen müßen, war es einem deutschen Philosophieprofessor nicht gestattet, von einem jüdischen Philosophen zu sagen, daß er ein « ehrwürdiger Vertreter des Judentums » sei, obwohl dieser Jude selbst seit Jahrzehnten immer und immer wieder flammende Bekenntnisse zum Judentum abgelegt hatte. Was bedeutet dieses Phänomen ? Nach unserem Empfinden hatte der deutschblütige liberale Professor seinen jüdischen Kollegen ja nicht beleidigen wollen, im Gegenteil war er ihm mit Achtung und Ehrerbietung gegenübergetreten. Aber was nützt den Juden eine solche Achtung, wenn sie (das ist nämlich hier des Pudels Kern) nicht gleichzeitig das Zugeständnis einschließt, daß auch Kant im Grunde ein jüdischer Denker, gewissermaßen ein kleiner Cohen gewesen sei.

jene höchsten sittlichen Menschheitsziele mit der Idee der jüdischen Religion identisch seien. Dies ist der Angelpunkt der Cohenschen Ethik. Was wohl unser großer deutscher Denker zu dieser Interpretation seiner Philosophie gesagt hätte ? Jedenfalls hat Kant Respektlosigkeiten begangen, die ihm als Zeitgenossen Cohens einen noch ganz anderen und kräftigeren Hinausschmiß aus der Kant-Gesellschaft eingetragen hätten, als sie jenem deutschen Philosophieprofessor zuteil wurde, der schüchtern von Nation zu sprechen wagte, von einem deutschen Denken und dem « ehrwürdigsten Vertreter des Judentums » . Aber da Kant eben kein Zeitgenosse Cohens war, sondern ein höchstes Ansehen in der Philosophie genießt, so wird ihm verziehen, daß er den nach Cohen « ungeheuerlichen Satz » aufstellte, das Judentum sei eigentlich gar keine Religion, sondern der Inbegriff bloß statuarischer Gesetze. Das waren freilich Entgleisungen Kants. Sie stören den eigentlichen Gehalt seiner Philosophie nicht, der nach Cohens Meinung in einer Ethik der reinen Menschheitsgesinnung bestehen soll ; wobei Kant allerdings noch nicht merkte, daß sich die Verwirklichung der « der Menschheit auferlegten sittlichen Forderung » mit der jüdischen Messiasidee deckt.

Da die Tugend der Bescheidenheit nach Cohen der Tapferkeit vorangeht, verfährt er bei der Schilderung des Verhältnisses, das zwischen Menschheit, Sittlichkeit und Messianismus waltet, mit echt jüdischer Bescheidenheit. « Alle diejenigen » , sagt er, « welche in der Politik für ihr Volk und die Menschheit kämpfen und leiden, sind die Jünger der jüdischen Propheten » . Diese sind die eigentlichen « Heroen » . Wobei heroische Tapferkeit natürlich keineswegs mit soldatischen Eigenschaften verwechselt werden darf. « Wirkliche Helden des Geistes » , witzelt der Jude, « sind keineswegs immer Gardefiguren » . « Das wahre Schlachtfeld der Tapferkeit ist vielmehr die - Kultur. » « Der Fleiß der Arbeit für die Kultur ist der eigentlichste Sinn und Wert der Tapferkeit. » Und da geben « die Propheten das ewige Vorbild ab. Ihr Patriotismus war der edelste, der erhabenste, aber die Menschheit ging ihnen über ihr Volk. Ihre Politik war nichts anderes, als was wir heutzutage Sozialismus nennen. »

Hier schließt sich der Ring, und ich glaube, es ist fast überflüssig, hinzuzufügen, daß Cohen Marxist und Freimaurer war. Jedenfalls danken wir ihm das eine, daß er den Zusammenhang zwischen Marxismus und jüdischem Messianismus mit einer Deutlichkeit hervorgehoben hat, die nichts zu wünschen übrig läßt. Seine Lehre ist gewissermaßen Schlüssel und Kommentar zu dem Wort, das der jüdische Historiker Heinrich Grætz vor 90 Jahren niederschrieb :

Freilich, Cohen wurde etwas allzu deutlich. Man rückt ein wenig von ihm ab. Man nennt ihn mit größter Ehrerbietung, aber gibt doch zu verstehen, daß er auf dem falschen Wege war. « In der Nacht der Gegenwart » (nämlich im Jahre 1935) äußert sich ein Jude elegisch über Cohen (der 1917 starb) : « sein Messias war falsch, sein Messianismus war echt » . Das deutsche Volk, soll das heißen, hat es Cohen übel gelohnt, daß dieser ihm die Ehre antat, Kant zum jüdischen Messias oder wenigstens zu dessen Vorläufer zu erheben. Der Versuch, durch eine Umbiegung und Umfälschung eines großen deutschen Philosophen die jüdischen Pläne ihrer Verwirklichung näherzubringen, ist gründlich mißglückt.

Aber wie kommt Kant dazu, als Wegbahner des jüdischen Messianismus proklamiert zu werden ? Nun, wir werden sehen, daß diese Ehre jedem großen Geist der Menschheit zuteil geworden ist. Und wir werden die Arten, Methoden und den Zweck solcher Umfälschungen noch näher zu betrachten haben.

Viel wäre, um auf Kant zurückzukommen, für das Judentum schon gewonnen, wenn wir aus Ekel vor der jüdischen Mißdeutung eine Abneigung gegen den deutschen Denker Kant als solchen fassen würden. Gewiß, es waren immer die schwächsten Stellen, an denen solche Mißdeutungen einhaken. So auch bei Kant. Der schwache Punkt seiner Ethik liegt darin, daß sie sich noch nicht aus gewissen Traditionen, die wie Meltau über der Entwicklung des germanischen Denkens liegen, freimachen kann. Da wäre und andere die Abhängigkeit zu nennen, in der Kants Sittlichkeitsbegriff vom Stoizismus steht. Diese Abhängigkeit ist nicht eine Sonderschwäche Kants, sondern eine viel allgemeinere Einwirkung, die sich von der Renaissance bis zur ihrem Gipfel in der Aufklärung wie ein roter Faden durch die Jahrhunderte zieht. Der Stoizismus hat in der Antike zum erstenmal in größerem Umfang eine Sittenlehre aufgestellt, die die Menschheit oder, was dasselbe ist, das aus allen völkischen und rassischen Bindungen losgelöste Individuum in den Mittelpunkt ihrer Betrachtung stellt. Es war jene Zeit der zerfallenden Blutsbindungen, des beginnenden Völkerchaos, als der stoische Weise die Idee einer reinen Menschheitsittlichkeit auf seine Fahne schrieb. Das Lehrreichste daran ist, daß diese Bewegung, rassisch gesehen, in vielem schon außerhalb des Griechentums steht und typisch orientalischsemitische Züge in sich aufnimmt, die sich dann eigentümlich mit einer nordischen Willenhaftigkeit vermischen, die sich verzweifelt aus dem zerfallenden politischen Leben in sich zurückgezogen hat und sich nun gleichsam als gegenstandsloses Pflichtgefühl um sich selber dreht. Gleich der Begründer der stoischen Schule, Zenon, hat semitisches Blut und die Griechen empfanden das Artfremde dieses Pœnulus, dieses kleinen Phöniziers, wie sie ihn nannten, sehr wohl. So ist es also nicht zu kühn, wenn wir sagen, daß die Fernwirkung dieses Phöniziers auf Kant es möglich machte, daß ein Jahrhundert nach Kant sich der Jude Cohen über diesen deutschen Denker hermachen konnte (wie dasselbe übrigens schon eine ganze Anzahl von Juden vorher getan hatte ; zu Kants Lebzeiten bereits Salomon Maimon, Marcus Herz und Lazarus Bendavid und später im 19. Jahrhundert zum Beispiel Otto Liebmann) .

Andererseits ist in diesem Zusammenhang nicht außer acht zu lassen, daß der negative Einfluß des Stoizismus auf Kant ja durch die deutsche Umbildung des stoischen Standpunkts, die man die preußischfriderizianische nennen könnte, ganz wesentlich abgeschwächt wird. Und selbst wenn wir den ursprünglichen Stoizismus betrachten, so hat auch der mit jüdischem Messianismus jedenfalls nichts zu tun. Wenn die stoische Menschheitsidee auch von dem jüdischen Ideal des Weisen durchschnitten wird, so ist das doch weit harmloser, als die Umbildung, die der Gedanke der Gleichheit und Brüderlichkeit erleidet, wenn er sich, wie beispielsweise gegenwärtig in Rußland, mit dem messianischen Willen zur jüdischen Vorherrschaft vereinigt. Die Linie Zenon-Cohen schneidet also die Riesengestalt Kants nur an einer einzigen und in bezug auf das, was Kant uns Deutschen zu sagen hat, nicht einmal wesentlichen Stelle. Cohen aber versetzt diese Linie durch das Zauberspiel seiner Sophistik in rotierenden Schwung, so daß sie nun wie ein Strahlenkegel, dessen Ausgangspunkt Cohen selbst ist, um die Gestalt des großen deutschen Denkers flimmert und ihn uns am Schluß unter dem Zerrbild eines alten Juden an die Wand wirft.

Nur ein Beispiel dafür : Ein Kardinalpunkt von Kants Lehre ist seine Einsicht, daß Anschauung und Begriff unzertrennlich zusammengehören und nichts ohne einander sind. « Gedanken ohne Inhalt sind leer, Anschauungen ohne Begriffe sind blind » : diese berühmte Formulierung bringt eine jener zentralen Erkenntnisse zum Ausdruck, die uns über alles Zeitbedingte seines Systems voranleuchten wird. Sie entspringt dem germanischdeutschen Streben nach spannungsgeladener Einheit. Der Jude hat nichts Eiligeres zu tun, als diese Einheit auseinanderzuschlagen. Cohen streicht aus der notwendigen Zusammenspannung von Denken und Anschauung den Faktor der Anschauung weg und stellt damit die Erkenntnistheorie Kants auf den Kopf. Und ebensowenig hat er etwas von dem Metaphysiker Kant begriffen.

Nicht besser als Kant ergeht es dem größten griechischen Denker Platon. Auch ihn verzerren Cohen und die Neukantianer in jüdischer Richtung. So will uns zum Beispiel (um eine Einzelheit zu nennen, die an vorhin Erwähntes anknüpft) Cohen weismachen, Platon habe den Begriff der Tapferkeit in seinem (Cohens) Sinne verstanden. Er, Platon, schreibt Cohen, scheut nicht « die Anlehnung an die Volksmoral, welche in der Tapferkeit von jeher die vornehmste Tugend erkannte. Aber er schlägt sie jetzt mit ihren eigenen Waffen, indem er sie aufnimmt und umdeutet. » - « Schlägt sie mit eigenen Waffen, indem er sie aufnimmt und umdeutet » : das ist wie ein unbewußtes Geständnis der eigenen Methode, nicht bloß der Methode Cohens, nein, der jüdischen Methode überhaupt, der Methode dessen, was sich jüdische Philosophie nennt und nannte.

Man muß nämlich wissen, daß der Eintritt des Judentums in die Philosophie glorreich damit begann, daß etwas vor der Wende unserer Zeitrechnung der Jude Aristobulos griechische Texte bewußt und systematisch fälschte, um ihre Übereinstimmung mit dem Alten Testament nachzuweisen. Der alexandrinische Jude Philo, der erste jüdische Philosoph, hat dann bescheiden erklärt, daß Platon seine Philosophie aus Moses geschöpft habe. Wir sehen, wie Kant seinen Cohen, so hat Platon seinen Philo gehabt. Nun könnte man ja sagen, jene Zeit des Hellenismus ist ganz allgemein dadurch gekennzeichnet, daß alle möglichen Systeme und Religionen durcheinander gerührt und in unschöpferischer Weise miteinander vermischt werden. So kam auch der alexandrinische Jude Philo dazu, Platonismus und Judentum miteinander zu vermengen. Allein die Tatsache, daß Philo Platon zum Schüler des Moses macht, deutet doch auf etwas Besonderes hin. Unser Zeitgenosse, der Jude Adler, würde uns den Fall vielleicht so erklären können, daß der arme Jude Philo in Alexandria angesichts der Überlegenheit der griechischen Wissenschaft von Minderwertigkeitskomplexen befallen wurde und sich deshalb nach dem Gesetz der Überkompensation die größtenwahnsinnige Geschichte mit Moses zurechtlegte. Mag dem nun sein, wie ihm wolle, wir gedenken hier nicht psychoanalytische Untersuchungen anzustellen, sondern müßen nach wirklich wesentlichen Zusammenhängen suchen.

Zunächst muß es uns auffallen, daß sowohl Philo wie Cohen, die in ganz verschiedenen Zeiten lebten, beide darin übereinstimmen, daß sie große arische Denker mit dem jüdischen Prophetentum in Verbindung bringen, und unser Erstaunen wächst, wenn wir auch den bedeutendsten jüdischen Philosophen des Mittelalters, den im 12. Jahrhundert lebenden spanischen Juden Maimonides, dieselben Wege gehen sehen. In der Tat ist das Problem des Verhältnisses von Platon und Prophetentum zwar nicht für uns, wohl aber für die Erkenntnis der jüdischen Philosophie und ihrer Fälschmünzereien von entscheidender Wichtigkeit.

Der zum Führen und Herrschen Berufene, der nach Platon Philosoph und Staatsmann in einem sein muß, steigt in das Reich der ewigen Wirklichkeit, in das Ideenreich auf und holt sich von dort die Voraussetzungen für sein Vorhaben, nun in irdischem Gebiet einen vollkommenen Staat aufzubauen. Der jüdische Prophet tritt vor seinen Gott und überbringt dessen Botschaft den Menschen. Über dieser formalen Gleichheit des Emporsteigens zum Göttlichen als Vorbedingung einer darauf folgenden politischen Tätigkeit dürfen wir indessen nicht übersehen, daß beide Fälle ganz verschieden liegen, ja unvereinbar miteinander sind. Ein grundlegender Unterschied besteht darin, daß dem Propheten befohlen wird und er Befehle empfängt, wogegen die platonische Hinwendung zu den Ideen eine freie innere Tat des menschlichen Geistes ist. Aber hinter diesem Gegensatz von Befehl und Freiheit steckt noch ein viel tieferer. Wir brauchen bloß Platons Ausführungen über das Wesen des Staatsmannes in seinem gleichnamigen Dialog nachzulesen, um zu erkennen, wie nahe Platon hier den Vorstellungen vom Politischen kommt, die uns heute im Nationalsozialismus gegenwärtig sind. Nicht durch starre Gesetze und Vorschriften, sondern aus der lebendigen schöpferischen Kraft des genialen Staatsmannes wird ein Staat richtig aufgebaut. Natürlich sind Gesetze nötig, meint Platon, aber der Herrscher darf sich nicht zu ihrem Sklaven machen, auch nicht zum Sklaven seiner eigenen Gesetze. Wie ein Arzt, führt Platon aus, die Vorschriften, die er etwa vor einer Reise seinem Patienten schriftlich zurückgelassen hat, nicht weiter beachten wird, wenn er nach seiner Rückkehr dessen Zustand verändert findet, so wird auch der Gesetzgeber die Vorschriften, mögen sie von ihm oder von einem Vorgänger stammen, ohne weiteres preisgeben, wenn sie seinen Zwecken nicht mehr entsprechen. Schon diese Stelle allein beweist, was durch ein genaueres Erfassen der Ideenlehre nach allen Seiten bestätigt wird : daß Platons philosophischer Staatsmann sich aus dem ewigen Ideenreich nicht etwa ein fertiges Gesetz holt. Vielmehr ist dieser Aufstieg und Abstieg ein schöpferischer Denkprozeß, aus dem nach Platon dann die freie Tätigkeit des Staatsmannes hervorquillt. Dies widerspricht nicht dem ruhenden Charakter der ewig seienden Urbilder, als die sich Platons Ideen darstellen. Gerade weil dieses ewige Sein ruht, kann sich der Mensch frei schöpferisch betätigen, während ein aufs äußerste gesteigerter Aktivismus eines vom Menschen getrennten Gottes den Menschen zu unfruchtbarer Passivität verurteilt.

Gewiß auch Platons Ideenlehre hat ihre schwache Stelle, und so nach dieser große Denker in vielem gerade unserer deutschen Gegenwart ist, so wenig werden wir ihm im ganzen folgen können. Ich glaube sogar, daß eine völkische Philosophie die wichtige Aufgabe hat, über Platons Ideenlehre hinauszukommen. Allein, das steht auf einem anderen Blatt.

Hier kam es mir lediglich darauf an, Ihnen den unüberwindlichen Gegensatz anzudeuten, der zwischen Platons Lehre und dem jüdischen Prophetismus herrscht. Sie verstehen jetzt, wie groß die Umfälschung ist, wenn es die jüdische Philosophie zu einem ihrer Lieblingsthemen macht, Platon im Sinne des jüdischen Prophetismus mißzudeuten, oder wie man sagt, zu ergänzen. Platon stellt die Gleichung zwischen Staatsmann und Philosophen auf. Er hat dabei den jüdischen Propheten einzubeziehen vergessen. So denkt Cohen, so denkt Maimonides, so macht Philo den Platon zum Schüler des Moses, so erklärt es uns der Jude Leo Strauß in seinem 1935 erschienenen MaimonidesBuch « Philosophie und Gesetz » folgendermaßen :

Bündiger läßt sich die Umfälschung Platons wohl nicht mehr formulieren. Dabei ist sich Strauß sehr wohl bewußt, daß der Begriff des Propheten kein platonischer ist, eben weil er die Platon gänzlich fremde Vorstellung der Offenbarung voraussetzt. Um so dreister die Behauptung, Platon habe das gefordert, also gewissermaßen vorbereitet, was sich dann im jüdischen Gesetz erfüllt hat.

Diese Art, nichtjüdisches Geistesgut, das einem den Juden gänzlich fremden und gegensätzlichen Wirklichkeitszusammenhang angehört, in die jüdische Gesetzesvorstellung hineinzuziehen und ihr unterzuordnen, ist eine für die jüdische Philosophie und für das Judentum überhaupt grundlegende Methode. Sie ist dieselbe, ob sie um die

Wende unserer Zeitrechnung der Alexandriner Philo oder im Mittelalter Maimonides oder im 20. Jahrhundert Cohen anwendet.

Sie ganz durchschauen, heißt den Schlüssel zur jüdischen Philosophie und darüber hinaus zur Judenfrage im ganzen in der Hand haben.

Wir müssen zu diesem Zweck einen Augenblick näher auf den Begriff der jüdischen Gesetzesvorstellung eingehen. Das Gesetz ist als Thora in Form des biblischen Textes von Gott gegeben und muß bis ins letzte erfüllt werden. Die Thora ist Wort für Wort und Buchstabe für Buchstabe präexistent, das heißt also vor Erschaffung der Welt vorhanden. Es kann daraus kein Tütelchen weggenommen, keines hinzugefügt werden, ohne daß der Wille Gottes dadurch mißachtet würde. Gott selbst sitzt im Himmel und studiert die Thora. Wer das Gesetz übertritt, macht sich vor Gott schuldig. Folglich muß das gesamte soziale Leben so geregelt werden, daß Gesetzesübertretungen nach Möglichkeit nicht vorkommen können.

Das ist besonders schwierig für die in der Diaspora lebenden Juden, die ja unter fremden Lebensbedingungen stehen. Die Diaspora wird übrigens schon in der Antike zu einem wesentlichen Merkmal des Judentums und man muß wissen, daß nur die babylonische Diaspora zunächst eine gewaltsame war, nicht aber die ägyptische (in Alexandria) und die kleinasiatisch-syrische, wobei auch bei der babylonischen Gefangenschaft das Erstaunliche das ist, daß später nur ein winziger Bruchteil der Juden von der Erlaubnis, in die Heimat zurückzukehren, Gebrauch machte.

Um nun zu wissen, was eine Gesetzesübertretung ist, braucht man den Schriftgelehrten, den Rabbi, der einem sagt, wie die Thora in jedem einzelnen Fall zu interpretieren ist. Diese Interpretationen der Thora werden zunächst mündlich gepflegt und dann in den ersten 5 Jahrhunderten nach Beginn unserer Zeitrechnung im sog. Talmud endgültig fixiert. Der Talmud ist also die bindende Interpretation der Thora, die die Schriftgelehrten geben.

Da besteht zum Beispiel das Gesetz, daß sich der Jude am Sabbat nicht mehr als 2.000 Ellen vom Wohnsitz entfernen darf, eine Bestimmung, die in vielen Fällen einzuhalten ganz unmöglich ist, und dennoch muß sie eingehalten werden. Das läßt sich auf folgende Weise bewerkstelligen : Wohnsitz, das ist soviel wie der Ort, wo man etwas zu essen zu sich nimmt. Wenn man nun am Tage vor dem Sabbat in der Richtung, in der man an diesem zu gehen wünscht, alle 2.000 Ellen etwas zu essen niederlegt, so schlägt man an solchen Punkten einen neuen Wohnsitz auf und kann dann so weit gehen, wie es einem beliebt. Eine etwas umständliche Methode, die sich der Ostjude dadurch vereinfacht, daß er einen großen Topf voll Essen mit in die Eisenbahn nimmt und unter die Bank stellt, auf welche Weise er seinen Wohnsitz im Abteil aufgeschlagen hat und nun viele Kilometer weit fahren kann, ohne das Gesetz verletzt zu haben.

Oder es war am Sabbat das Hinaustragen eines Gegenstandes aus einem Privatbereich, zum Beispiel einem Wohnhaus, in einen öffentlichen Bezirk, zum Beispiel auf eine Straße, als Arbeit streng untersagt. Hierzu heißt es nun im Talmud :

« Wer etwas hinaus trägt, sei es in seiner rechten, sei es in seiner linken Hand, in seinem Busen oder auf seiner Schulter, der ist schuldig. Trägt er es aber hinaus auf der Rückseite (oberen Seite) seiner Hand, mit seinem Fuß, mit seinem Mund oder mit seinem Ellbogen, an seinem Ohr oder in seinem Haar oder in seinem Geldbeutel mit der

Öffnung nach unten, zwischen dem Geldbeutel und seinem Hemd oder am oder im Saum seines Hemdes, in seinem Schuh, an seiner Sandale, so ist er frei, weil er nicht hinausträgt, wie man hinauszutragen pflegt. »

Sie sehen, die Möglichkeit zur Übertretung des Gesetzes ist hier im Gesetz selbst schon vorgesehen. Die Neigung, Gesetze zu umgehen, findet sich wohl bei den asozialen Individuen aller Völker. Das Bestreben aber, ein Gesetz faktisch zu übertreten und dann mit allen Mitteln eines uns freilich nicht mehr verständlichen Scharfsinns den Beweis zu führen, daß das Gesetz eingehalten wurde, das ist das einzigartig Jüdische, eines der kennzeichnenden Merkmale der Welt des Talmud.

Und ein anderes Merkmal des Talmud ist die besondere Form des Denkens, durch die dieser Zweck erreicht wird. Betrachten Sie das zuletzt genannte Beispiel : Hier wird der Begriff der Arbeit in einem ganz bestimmten formalen Sinn genommen. Was außerhalb dieses formalen Sinnes liegt, fällt nicht mehr darunter, bietet also die Möglichkeit, das Gesetz zu umgehen und doch einzuhalten ; obwohl inhaltlich für unser Empfinden, wenn schon bestimmte Tätigkeiten als solche verboten sein sollen, kein Unterschied einzusehen ist, ob ich einen Topf auf dem Handrücken oder auf der Handfläche zur Türe hinaustrage. Dem Talmud aber kommt es darauf an, den Begriff der Arbeit (um einen Lieblingsausdruck der modernen jüdischen Physiker vom Schlage Einsteins und Reichenbachs zu gebrauchen) « geeignet zu definieren » .

Dieses « geeignete Definieren » ist aber nur ein kleiner Anfang und Ansatz der Methoden, auf denen das talmudische Denken beruht. Für unser Gefühl unfaßbar ist die Umkehrung dessen, was wir unter wissenschaftlichem Verfahren verstehen : Wir suchen mit Hilfe bestimmter Methoden eine zunächst offene Frage zu beantworten. So könnten wir etwa die Frage aufwerfen, ob Moses Platon irgendwie beeinflußt habe, um dann mit Hilfe der philologischen und historischen Methodik als Ergebnis festzustellen, daß ein solcher Zusammenhang nicht bestanden haben kann. Für das talmudische Denken dagegen steht das Ergebnis von vornherein fest und es handelt sich jetzt umgekehrt darum, geeignete Methoden ausfindig zu machen, mit deren Hilfe man zu diesem Ergebnis gelangen kann. So steht es für Aristobulos von vornherein fest, daß Platon der Schüler Moses' war. Als Methode, dies zu beweisen, bedient er sich, etwas plump, einfach der Textfälschung.

Der Talmud hat dafür raffiniertere Wege zur Verfügung. Zu einem bestimmten Zweck, das heißt um irgendeine Behauptung zu beweisen, ist es zum Beispiel nötig, zwei Thora-Stellen miteinander in Verbindung zu setzen, die sich innerlich gar nicht aufeinander beziehen lassen. Nun haben die hebräischen Konsonanten gleichzeitig die Bedeutung von Zahlen, so daß jedes Wort je nach den darin vorkommenden Buchstaben gewissermaßen eine bestimmte Quersumme besitzt. Um nun die gewünschte Verbindung zwischen jenen beiden Thora-Stellen zu stiften, genügt es unter Umständen durchaus, nachzuweisen, daß gewisse Wörter dieser Stellen, die an sich nicht das mindeste miteinander zu tun haben, den gleichen Zahlenwert besitzen.

Oder ein anderes Beispiel aus dem Talmud : Wenn sich in einem Raume eine Leiche befindet, so ist der Raum unrein, ein davon abgetrennter Nebenraum dagegen rein. Was für eine schwere Unreinheit, wie es eine Leiche darstellt, gilt, das gilt auch für eine leichte Unreinheit, zum Beispiel ein Kriechtier. Das ist der Schluß vom Leichten auf das Schwere, wie er an sich nach den Gesetzen der Logik verständlich ist. In diesem Sinne führt ihn in einer komplizierten theologischen

Auseinandersetzung auch ein Rabbi unter Hinweis auf jenen Sachverhalt mit dem Kriechtief und der Leiche an, um den Satz zu beweisen : « wenn Heiliges durch Heiliges entweiht wird, um wieviel mehr durch Profanes » . Nein, sagt der andere Rabbi, das ist nicht richtig, und weist dem ersteren nach, daß er im Irrtum ist, denn aus der ThoraStelle : « Sie sollen die heiligen Gaben der Kinder Israels nicht entweihen, was sie für den Herrn abheben » folgert er auf eine uns nicht mehr verständliche Weise den Satz :

Demnach hebt, heißt es dann, jener Schriftvers den Schluß vom Leichten auf das Schwere auf. Folglich ... Und die endlos ineinandergeschachtelten Diskussionen über die richtige Interpretation der Thora-Stellen gehen weiter.

Ein Grundprinzip dieser Interpretation ist nun aber auch folgendes : Jedes Wort der Thora hat seinen bestimmten Sinn. Gott kann nämlich nicht zweimal dasselbe gesagt haben. Folglich meint er, wenn zweimal verschiedene Sätze wörtlich oder doch mit scheinbar gleichem Sinn vorliegen, dennoch jedesmal etwas anderes. Was er damit gemeint hat herauszubringen, ist Sache der Rabbiner. Beispielsweise wird in der Thora eine Übung beschrieben, durch die sich besondere Heiligkeit erlangen läßt und bei der es und andere darauf ankommt, für längere Zeit die Haare nicht zu scheren. Das wird in einer etwas farbigen Weise von der Thora ausgemalt, wobei die Ausdrücke des Heiligseins und des Haarscherens in mehreren Sätzen mehrmals wiederholt werden, so daß also in verschiedenen Sätzen scheinbar das gleiche gesagt wird. Das ist bei Gott aber nicht möglich, denn es ist kein Wort der Thora überflüssig. Das eine Mal hat Gott, so interpretieren die Rabbis, den gewöhnlichen Verlauf der Prozedur gemeint. In der anderen Stelle hat Gott in seiner Weisheit auch gleich den Fall in Betracht gezogen, daß einer gar keine Haare hat. Soll er deshalb des Segens der Bußübung verlustig gehen ? Nein, daß auch ein solcher heilig sei, wollte Gott mit der Wiederholung jener Stelle sagen. Eine dritte Wiederholung soll sich dann auf den Fall beziehen, daß der seine Haare wachsen Lassende während der vorgeschriebenen Zeit in die Hände von Räubern fällt und diese ihm die Haare mit Gewalt scheren. Daß auch dieser durch solches Mißgeschick Betroffene die versprochene Heiligkeit erlangt, wollte Gott mit der dritten Wiederholung des ähnlichen Ausdrucks sagen. Und so geht es fort. Oder es können sich endlose Diskussionen darüber entspinnen, warum an einer Stelle das Wort « und » dasteht oder nicht dasteht, denn auch dies muß seinen Grund haben, da kein Wort der Thora überflüssig ist.

Wir sagen von einer organischen Gestalt oder auch von einem Kunstwerk oder von der Welt als Ganzem, wenn wir sie unter dem Bild eines Organismus oder eines Kunstwerks betrachten, diese Gebilde seien vollkommen, weil an ihnen nichts überflüssig sei, alles an der rechten Stelle stehe, und sprechen damit das Prinzip des durchgängigen Zusammenhangs aus, das nichts in der Vereinzelung läßt ; denn uns wäre eben das Vereinzelte überflüssig. Der talmudische Grundsatz der Einzigkeit der Thor-Worte hat eine genau entgegengesetzte Bedeutung. Hier handelt es sich gewissermaßen um ein Prinzip der absoluten Zusammenhanglosigkeit. Ein Prinzip, das die Möglichkeit eröffnet, jede einzelne Stelle, jedes Wort zu isolieren und ihm einen besonderen, das heißt willkürlichen Sinn zuzuweisen.

Trotzdem die wenigen Beispiele, die ich anführen konnte, manche von Ihnen verwundert haben werden, können sie doch nur einen ganz schwachen Begriff geben von der Absurdität des talmudischen Denkens, die in Wirklichkeit alles übersteigt, was auch beim besten Willen noch in einen arischen Kopf hineingeht. Wollen wir das Wesen dieses Denkens auf einen Begriff bringen, so können wir vielleicht sagen, es handelt sich um einen absolut widersinnigen Formalismus, der von jedem konkreten Sinn, von jeder gegebenen Wirklichkeit absieht. Das heißt : es handelt sich nicht etwa um bloße Abstraktionen, die vom Konkreten zu immer dünneren Begriffsgespinnsten aufsteigen - nein, hier werden Stricke formalistischer Betrachtungsweise ganz ohne Berührung mit der Wirklichkeit sozusagen nur unter Verwendung jenes Zaubermittels, das sich Thora nennt, hergestellt und zu Lassos verarbeitet, mit denen man rücklings und willkürlich ein Stück Wirklichkeit einfängt, es abwürgt und aus seinem lebendigen Zusammenhang herausreißt.

Natürlich müßen die wildesten Methoden, die der Talmud verwendet, einigermaßen gemildert und nichtjüdischen Denkgebräuchen angeglichen werden, wo die Juden in engere Berührung mit dem Kulturgut anderer Völker kommen. Trotzdem bleibt der Kern des talmudischen Denkens, der in jenem eigentümlichen Absehen von konkretem Sinn, von der Wirklichkeit besteht, auch dort der gleiche, wo der Jude gelernt hat, sich der logischen, der mathematischen, der wissenschaftlichen Methoden, wie sie von den Ariern ausgebildet wurden, virtuos zu bedienen.

Derjenige Jude, der die Erbschaft Cohens in Deutschland antrat und, als der Stern der Neukantianer zu sinken begann, eine neue Parole in die deutsche Philosophie hineinwarf, Edmund Husserl, der Schöpfer der Phänomenologie, kann uns hierfür als typisches Beispiel dienen. Die neue Parole heißt hier : zu den Sachen selbst ! Kein schlechter Gedanke, besonders wenn der philosophierfreudige Mensch von dem endlosen Geschwätz der neukantianischen Erkenntnistheorie Cohens herkommt. Wie aber stellt sich der Jude Husserl dieses Vordringen zu den Sachen selbst vor ? Man höre und staune : Er klammert zu diesem Zweck, wie er sagt, die Wirklichkeit ein, das heißt er sieht von der Wirklichkeit ab. Das ist ein ausgesprochen talmudischer Ansatz. Zur wahren Wesensschau gelangt man nach ihm, wenn man sich um die Wirklichkeit nicht kümmert.

Auch der ganze Husserl besteht übrigens in einer bezeichnenden Umfälschung Platons. Platon richtet wie jeder Philosoph, und das heißt gleichzeitig wie jeder arische Philosoph, sein ganzes Bemühen auf eine Erfassung der Wirklichkeit, die er nun in einem tieferen metaphysischen Sinn in dem zu entdecken glaubt, was er Ideen nennt. Mögen wir die Wirklichkeit der Ideen heute auch nicht mehr im platonischen Sinne anerkennen können, das hindert nicht, daß Platon gegen Husserl auch heute noch tausendmal recht hat. Husserl löst die platonische Ideenlehre in einem reinen Formalismus auf. Er macht sie, worauf er natürlich stolz ist, metaphysikfrei, « wissenschaftlich » im jüdischen Sinn des Wortes. Das Reich der Denkgegenstände, auf die sich nach Husserl das Denken richtet, gleichviel ob es sich um Wirkliches oder Abstraktes oder Mathematisches handelt, hat etwas Gespensterhaftes, gerade weil er von der Wirklichkeit absieht, gerade weil er unplatonisch die Unterscheidung zwischen realem und ideellem Sinn rein formal nimmt. Das Sein dieser Denkgegenstände in ihrer starren Gegebenheit, der sich das Denken einfach hinnehmend zu fügen hat, ohne daß es im platonischen Sinne von einer metaphysischen Sonne bestrahlt würde, dieses dem Empfinden unserer Rasse nicht greifbare Sein kann uns nur im Bild der präexistenten Thora deutbar werden. So setzt Husserl gleichsam die Thora an die Stelle der platonischen Ideenwelt, während Cohen, wie wir sahen, den philosophischen Staatsmann Platons in den jüdischen Propheten umzeichnet.

Mögen sich jüdische Neukantianer und jüdische Phänomenologen auch untereinander aufs heftigste bekämpfen - in ihrem jüdischen Charakter bilden sie eine Einheit. Beide fälschen Platons Lehre um. Beide stehen auch in einem ähnlichen Verhältnis zu Kant, sofern sie nämlich beide jene kantische Grunderkenntnis mißachten, von der ich vorhin sprach. Anschauung und aktiv formendes Denken gehören nach Kant unlösbar zusammen. Cohen streicht, wie wir sahen, den Faktor der Anschauung : was übrig bleibt, ist eine talmudische Form des Denkens. Husserl verfährt polar entgegengesetzt. Er beseitigt die Aktivität des Denkens und verzerrt dadurch das Schauen zum passiven Kenntnisnehmen einer thoraähnlichen starren Welt von Gegenständen.

Man könnte hier einwenden, die Theorie dieser starren Denkgegenstände sei ja wesentlich von dem katholischen Denker Bolzano und dessen Lehre von den sogenannten « Sätzen an sich » beeinflusst worden, zum mindesten eng damit verwandt : Bolzano aber sein kein Jude gewesen. Damit berühren wir einen wichtigen geistesgeschichtlichen Zusammenhang, der noch seiner restlosen Aufklärung harret. Eine überaus merkwürdige Tatsache, die zunächst unerklärlich scheint, liegt nämlich in der engen Verbindung der Husserlschen Phänomenologie mit gewissen Richtungen der katholischen Neuscholastik. Das Bindeglied bildet vor allem der Halbjude Max Scheler. Diese Beziehungen zwischen jüdischer und scholastischer Geisteshaltung gehen ohne Zweifel tiefer, als man auf den ersten Blick glauben möchte. Sie betreffen das Wesen der Scholastik selbst. Und zwar sind es weniger die jüdischen Einflüsse, die im Mittelalter zu jener Zeit mit einströmten, als die Araber der christlichen Scholastik neues Erbgut der Antike übermittelten ; weit eher müßte man gewisse talmudische Züge annehmen, die der Scholastik von Anfang an anhafteten. Und in der Tat - nur ein Befangener könnte sie übersehen ! Sie liegen in der Bindung der philosophischen Forschung an eine textlich gegebene Offenbarung. Sie liegen weiterhin in den Methoden, mit denen man philosophische Behauptungen durch Berufung auf Autoritäten und Interpretation von Schriftstellen zu unterstützen suchte. Und wirklich hat ja auch Philo, der Jude, nicht bloß einen großen Einfluß auf die Bildung der christlichen Dogmatik ausgeübt, er hat der christlichen Theologie auch die Methode der sog. allegorischen Bibelinterpretation geliefert, die für ihn ein Mittel war, das hellenistische Gedankengut in seine jüdische Welt einzugliedern.

Manche werden hier behaupten, man könne ebensogut sagen, der Hellenismus habe den Juden Philo beeinflusst und umgewandelt und eine Berührung zwischen zwei verschiedenen Kulturkreisen in diesem Sinne sei doch nichts so Auffälliges oder gar Schlimmes. Diese Betrachtung übersieht das Eigentümliche des jüdischen Wesens vollkommen, woraus dann weiter der Irrtum entsteht, als würde sich der bessere Teil des Judentums sozusagen aus den talmudischen Umstrickungen freimachen und zu einem Sein entwickeln, das mit dem Talmud, der hier gewissermaßen als eine Sackgasse der jüdischen Entwicklung erscheint, nichts mehr zu tun habe.

Bei solchen Streitfragen ist es immer das beste, die Juden selbst zu Rate zu ziehen. Hören Sie also, was der schon mehrfach erwähnte Historiker Heinrich Grætz, dessen « Konstruktion der jüdischen Geschichte » ein jüdischer Verlag eben neu herausgegeben hat, zu diesem Thema zu sagen weiß :

Wir haben hier eines der wertvollsten jüdischen Selbstzeugnisse vor uns. Das Allerweltsleben, das heißt also die Diaspora, mit ihrem grundsätzlichen Verzicht auf Staatenbildung, dieses Allerweltslebens einerseits und der Talmudismus andererseits als die beiden zusammengehörigen Grundprinzipien des Judentums : ein richtigerer Ansatz für die Erkenntnis jüdischen Wesens läßt sich schwer denken. Daß der Talmudismus das erhaltende Prinzip sei, ist auch vollkommen einleuchtend. Mit Recht sagt Grætz :

Daß Grætz allerdings das andere Prinzip, das Allerweltsleben, als das schaffende bezeichnet, ist eine überaus eigentümliche Ausdrucksweise. In nichtjüdischer Terminologie bezeichnet man im allgemeinen das Bestreben nach Angleichung an Fremdes nicht als etwas Schöpferisches. Aber vielleicht hat Grætz mit dem Schaffen die Ausbeutung des Fremden gemeint.

Wenn wir die Sache genau betrachten, so ist das einander bedingende Wechselspiel jener beiden Prinzipien, von denen Grætz spricht, im Keime bereits in der talmudischen Methode selbst, die wir kennen lernten, enthalten. Die faktischen Übertretungen sind ja einerseits schon Angleichungen an die fremde Sitte und andererseits (sagen wir es offen) Hebel zur Ausbeutung der Fremden und zum hemmungslosen Ausleben der Triebe. Dieser Ausweitung folgt aber sofort der Rückgang in jenes sogenannte erhaltende Prinzip, das die Übertretung durch den Beweis zunichte macht, daß ja das Gesetz formal eingehalten worden ist. (Wobei das Wort formal übrigens jeweils arische Zutat ist ; rein jüdisch müßte es heißen : das Gesetz ist schlechthin erfüllt, und damit fertig !)

Diese Gesetzestreue im ausgesprochen talmudischen Sinne ist für Grætz der freie sittliche Geist, der sich gegen die unsittliche Gebundenheit der Natürlichkeit wendet, wie wir hörten. Geist im Gegensatz zur unsittlichen Gebundenheit der Natürlichkeit ! Dieses jüdische Selbstzeugnis beweist, daß der Jude ewig unfähig sein wird, sowohl das tiefste Wesen des Geistes wie des Blutes zu erfassen. Geist und Blut gehören für uns untrennbar zusammen. Was daraus wird, wenn diese Verbundenheit sich löst, dafür ist uns eben das Judentum der fürchterlichste Anschauungsunterricht. Geist ohne Blut, das ist jener von Grætz gepriesene freie Geist, der von jeder Wirklichkeit ferne und in sich erstarrte Geist der Thora und des Talmuds. Und Blut ohne Geist umgekehrt ist jene schrankenlose, von keinem Gesetz gezügelte jüdische Triebhaftigkeit, die schließlich in Ausbeuterei und Verbrechertum mündet.

Nirgends sehen wir diese beiden Faktoren so kraß und deutlich beieinander wie im jüdischen Bolschewismus, im heutigen Rußland. Auf der einen Seite das Verbrechertum, auf der anderen Seite eine geistige Verfassung, die auf ein Haar der jüdischtalmudischen Rabulistik gleicht. In seinem Buch « Das rote Rußland » schreibt der gewiß unverdächtige Theodor Seibert, der jeden ursächlichen Zusammenhang zwischen Judentum und Bolschewismus leugnet, folgendes :

Freilich, wenn die lebendige Einheit von Geist und Blut, die uns der Nationalsozialismus wieder geschenkt hat, zerfällt, so hat das an sich noch nichts mit Judentum zu tun. Wir finden einen solchen Zerfall zum Beispiel schon in der Antike, bevor die Juden in jene Welt eintreten. Es laufen dann die beiden polar entgegengesetzten Zerfallsrichtungen Geist ohne Blut und Blut ohne Geist selbständig und zunächst unverbunden nebeneinander her. Das jüdische Wesen besteht nun darin, diese beiden Pole des Zerfalls miteinander in Beziehung zu setzen. Wenn der blutlose Geist die keiner geistig geformten Blutwelt mehr angehörenden Triebe sozusagen organisiert, dann haben wir das, was die Atmosphäre des Talmud ausmacht. Die nicht mehr durch den wahren Geist in einer Gemeinschaft des Blutes harmonisch geordneten Triebe können hier an sich tun, was sie wollen, aber sie sind gleichzeitig durch ein pseudogeistiges, rein formales Gesetz gebunden. Das führt zu der Doppellage, daß das Gesetz gleichzeitig jederzeit übertreten werden kann und doch gehalten wird. Wären die Triebe nicht durch dieses Gesetz des blutlosen Geistes in einer höchst eigentümlichen Weise formal gebunden, so würde dies zum Untergang führen. Wären sie andererseits nicht vorhanden, so würde die trostlose Starrheit des Gesetzes, also des blutlosen Geistes jedes Leben ersticken. Vielleicht meint Gesetz die Vitalität dieser Triebe, die sich vor allem im Verhältnis zu den Gastvölkern auswirkt, mit seinem schaffenden Prinzip, das in der Diaspora liege. Es ist also das Geheimnis des Judentums, daß es zwei Entartungen, die einzeln unweigerlich zum Untergang führen, zu einer Synthese vereinigt, deren Dauerhaftigkeit in der Geschichte einzig dasteht. Es ist zugleich das Geheimnis der talmudischen Seelenverfassung, das Geheimnis des schweifenden Ewigen Juden.

Auch der nordische Arier, auch der Germane wandert durch die Welt, es zieht ihn in die Ferne, er erschaut staunend fremde Welten und nun ist es für ihn eine Lebensfrage : bleibt er sich selber treu oder wird er seinem Wesen untreu ? Bleibt er sich treu, so gestaltet er das, was er aufgenommen hat, aus dem Mittelpunkt seines Wesens heraus zu einem Neuen um, er drückt den Stempel seiner Art der fremden Welt auf, er schafft Staaten und gründet gewaltige Reiche ; oft erliegt er der Übermacht. Ganz untergehen kann er aber nur, wenn er sich selber untreu wird. Darum gilt für ihn als oberstes Gesetz das Shakespearesche Wort :

So sind wir stark, wenn wir uns selbst treu bleiben.

So gehen wir unter, wenn wir uns untreu werden.

Der Jude aber wird sich untreu, indem er sich treu bleibt und bleibt sich treu, indem er sich untreu wird.

Er übertritt das Gesetz, indem er es erfüllt und er erfüllt das Gesetz, indem er es übertritt - wahrhaftig eine uns ewig unfaßbare Wesensart !

Jetzt erst begreifen wir, welch ungeheures Ausleseprinzip der Talmud darstellt. Wer auf ihn positiv reagiert, der ist Jude oder rettungslos verjudet. Und gleichzeitig wird uns nun auch das Verhältnis zwischen gläubigen und liberalen Juden mit einem Schlage klar. So wie der gläubige TalmudJude dem Gesetz fortwährend untreu wird und ihm doch treu bleibt, so kann der Jude auch dem ganzen Talmud untreu werden und doch ihm im Innersten treu bleiben. Diese Haltung des liberalen Juden ist im eigentlichen Sinne talmudisch. Um sie ihm auszutreiben, müßte man, mit Fichte zu reden, ihm den Kopf abschlagen und einen neuen nichtjüdischen aufsetzen. Denken Sie an den philosophisch so emanzipierten Juden Cohen zurück. Er ist liberaler Jude und Prophetengestalt in einem. Und gerade in dieser für uns paradoxen Verbindung erweist er sich als echter TalmudJude, denn auch der TalmudJude im engeren Sinn ist ja schon in dem Augenblick gewissermaßen ein liberaler, als er das Gesetz übertritt, etwa um sich den Sitten seines Gastvolkes nutzbringend anzupassen. Im selben Atem ist er aber gesetzestreu, denn er hat auf Grund der talmudischen Methoden das Gesetz trotzdem erfüllt. Wenn wir diese Urbeziehung zwischen Gesetzestreue und Liberalität durchschaut haben, so werden wir nicht mehr daran zweifeln, daß auch der liberalste Jude noch im vollen Umfange dieser Beziehung unterliegt, auch der, der dem Judentum abgeschworen hat, ja, ihm feindlich gegenübersteht.

Das welthistorische Beispiel hierfür auf dem Gebiet der Philosophie bietet der Jude Baruch de Spinoza. Er wurde von der jüdischen Gemeinde ausgeschlossen. Daraufhin wollte er (der, man vergesse das nie, Schüler eines berühmten Talmudlehrers gewesen war) nichts mehr vom Judentum wissen und hat es in harten Worten gezeißelt. Aber gerade darin erwies er sich als ein genialer Jude, daß er instinktiv erkannte, daß man im 17. Jahrhundert die jüdische Art nicht mehr mit dem lächerlichen Gebaren der Amsterdamer Rabbinerschaft durchsetzen könne, und so beglückte er das europäische Denken mit einem jüdischen Kuckucksei, das in der Tat in seiner historischen Entfaltung für die Wirtsvölker gefährlicher wurde, als es jene Rabbiner in ihren kühnsten messianischen Träumen sich hätten ausmalen können. Was jene noch nicht einsahen, was auch der eigensinnige Cohen nicht begreifen wollte - heute dankt es ihm die ganze Judenschaft.

Anfang 1933 kam in einem deutschen Verlag eine SpinozaFestschrift heraus, die jeder in die Hand nehmen sollte, der noch irgendwelchen Zweifel an dem jüdischen Charakter des Spinozismus hat. Unter 22 Verfassern, die Beiträge lieferten, befinden sich hoch gegriffen vier bis fünf Nichtjuden, darunter der EhrenBolschewist Romain Rolland.

Der berüchtigte Jude Jakob Klatzkin macht sich ganz offen darüber lustig, daß die dummen Christen in Spinozas Lebensführung ein Vorbild an Genügsamkeit und Askese sehen. Er belehrt uns demgegenüber, daß es lediglich in den Sitten und Bräuchen des Judentums, aus dem Spinoza herauswuchs, seine selbstverständliche Wurzel habe, wenn er zum Beispiel einmal einen ganzen Tag lang nur Milchsuppe mit Butter zu sich nahm und Ähnliches. Daß es also ganz fehl am Platze sei, wenn die Nichtjuden derartige Beispiele, die in Wirklichkeit nichts Besonderes auf sich hätten, zur Verherrlichung von Spinozas Lebensführung (im christlichen Sinn, wie er spottet) benützen.

Die größte Offenbarung, die uns das Buch zu bieten hat, ist aber ohne Zweifel der Aufsatz des Juden Josef Klausner über den jüdischen Charakter der Lehre Spinozas. Neben dem nachdrücklichen Hinweis darauf, daß Spinoza viel stärker als von Descartes und Giordano Bruno von den jüdischen Philosophen des Mittelalters beeinflußt worden sei, finden wir als Zentralgedanken folgende Argumentation :

Als Grundbestandteile von Spinozas Lehre werden folgende Faktoren angesetzt :

« Und die Seele des Menschen ist bloß die Idee seines Körpers. » Das sei « Materialismus » .

« Es gibt kein Gut und Böse », das sei « Utilitarismus » .

« Recht ist nichts als Kraft », das sei « Machiavellismus » .

Jetzt kommt für uns die kaum glaubliche Offenbarung der jüdischen Seele, von der ich eben sprach. Denn Klausner fährt nun, nachdem er solchermaßen die Bausteine von Spinozas Lehre bestimmt hat, ganz verzückt wörtlich fort :

« Und wie wunderbar ist es, daß all diese mangelhaften Elemente am Ende ihrer Entfaltung gerade das Gegenteil hervorbringen, eine ideale und positive Weltanschauung, die nicht ihresgleichen in der Welt hat. »

Ist es uns bei diesen Worten nicht, als sähen wir den kleinen Juden seinen Topf auf dem Handrücken zur Tür hinaustragen ? Er lacht uns spöttisch und vergnügt an. Wer nicht genau hinschaute, könnte ja meinen, daß er gesündigt hätte. Aber er hat den Topf glücklich herausgebracht und doch das Gesetz nicht übertreten. Spinoza ist Atheist, Materialist, Mechanist, Determinist, Utilitarist und Machiavellist und trotzdem hat er das Gesetz erfüllt, die erhabenste religiöse Weltanschauung und geschenkt, die es gibt.

Was der Kern dieser Weltanschauung ist, darüber werden wir in jener Festschrift dann noch von vielen Seiten eingehend belehrt. « Freiheit, Gleichheit und Brüderlichkeit bleiben unnahbare Ideale, solange nicht zu ihrer Verwirklichung im Sinne Spinozas geschritten wird », schreibt der jüdische Herausgeber, und Ignacy Myslicki aus Warschau, vormals der Ostjude Halpern, ergänzt dies durch die Feststellung, daß « die ganze Lehre Spinozas auf die Bildung der Idee des Menschen als des Musterbildes der menschlichen Natur gerichtet ist ». Die Idee des Menschen, das war ja auch das Ziel des Juden Cohen, und so enthüllt sich uns die Meinungsverschiedenheit zwischen diesem und Spinoza schließlich nur als der Streit zweier Rabbis von der Art, wie der ganze Talmud voll davon ist. Im Grunde sind sie sich doch alle einig. Hören wir Maimonides, den mittelalterlichen Judenphilosophen. « Jeder Mensch », sagt er, « kann ein Gerechter werden wie Mosche, unser Lehrer, oder ein Frevler wie Jerobam. Er kann werden weise oder beschränkt, barmherzig oder grausam, geizig oder vornehm. Und so ist es mit all den Eigenschaften. » Das ist wiederum die « Idee des Menschen », wir sagen dazu eine Idee desjenigen Menschen, der für den Talmud reif geworden ist. Die talmudisierte Menschheit, das ist die Form, in der die Juden ihre Gastvölker zu sehen wünschen. Die Form, die ihren messianischen Hoffnungen Wirklichkeit verleihen soll.

Bei Maimonides taucht denn auch zum erstenmal der Gedanke einer reinen Vernunftreligion auf. Wir wundern uns jetzt nicht mehr, daß ihn das in keiner Weise hindert, gleichzeitig glühender Anhänger der Thora zu sein. Das ThoraStudium ist für ihn überhaupt das Höchste, was es gibt. Zuerst zwar muß man den kleinen ThoraSchüler durch Nüsse und Feigen zum Lernen bewegen, dann durch das Versprechen, daß er schöne Schuhe bekomme, dann durch einen Denar « oder zwei », später durch die Vorstellung, daß er ein geehrter Rabbi werde, endlich aber gelangt er zum höchsten Lebensziel : nämlich die Thora um ihrer selbst willen zu studieren. Was das heißt, davon können Sie sich nun vielleicht eine kleine Vorstellung machen, wenn Sie sich an das über den Talmud Gesagte erinnern. Immerhin, es entsteht auf diese Art der jüdische Weise, den Maimonides feierlich also kennzeichnet :

« Wie der Weise an seiner Weisheit und an seinem Charakter zu erkennen ist und sich dadurch vom übrigen Volke unterscheidet, also muß er auch in seinen Handlungen zu erkennen sein, in seinem Essen und Trinken, in seinem Eheleben, in der Verrichtung seiner Notdurft, in Sprache, Gang und Kleidung. »

Doch wir wollen nicht kleinlich sein. Gibt es nicht auch noch wirklich erhabenerere Dinge in der jüdischen Philosophie ? Gibt es nicht eine jüdische Mystik ? Ist nicht Spinoza im Grunde ein solcher Mystiker ?

Diese Fragen eingehend zu erörtern, würde hier viel zu weit führen, ich will Sie nur noch auf eine Einzelheit aufmerksam machen, die sinnbildlich für das Ganze stehen möge. Für Spinoza ist die Freude der Übergang zu größerer Vollkommenheit, also Gottähnlichkeit. Betrübnis aber grundsätzlich das Gegenteil. Und wie sehr er das Gefühl intellektualisiert, das geht aus seiner Lehre hervor, man müsse eine Sache nur verstehen, um ihr gegenüber als etwas selbst Gebilligtem und selbst Gewolltem frei zu sein. Gerade hierin offenbart sich eine typisch jüdische Seelenhaltung. Eine Haltung, die das Leid mit Hilfe der Kühle eines vom Gemüt abgelösten Intellekts von sich schiebt.

Welch andere Welt leuchtet uns aus dem Spruch Meister Eckharts, eines wirklichen Mystikers, entgegen, daß das Leid das schnellste Roß sei, das zur Vollkommenheit führt. Wie anders klingen die Worte des Führers von seinen drei Freunden : Not, Leid und Sorge ! Es ist also ein anderes, ob wir auf solchem Hintergrund das Wort Freude emporsteigen sehen oder ob es Spinoza in den Mund nimmt.

Deshalb dürfen wir auch nicht gleich an das, was wir Freude nennen, denken, wenn wir hören, daß eine jüdische Nebenrichtung mystischer Natur, der so genannt Chassidismus, diesen Begriff, den Begriff der Freude, in den Mittelpunkt seiner Lehre stellt. Und wir sind damit um so vorsichtiger, wenn wir hören, daß Isaak Lurja und Baal Schem, welcher letzterer den Chassidismus im 17. Jahrhundert begründete, ihre tiefsten Geheimnisse dem Sohar verdanken wollen, dessen Lektüre im chassidischen Judentum Pflicht ist. Sohar, so heißt das Hauptbuch der sog. Kabbala, die eine vollkommen talmudisierte neuplatonische Mystik darstellt. Aus der Kabbala also wächst der Chassidismus heraus und dieser wiederum bildet nach jüdischem Zeugnis die innere Haltung, in der der französische Jude Bergson mit seiner Lebensphilosophie wurzelt.

Aber gleichviel,
ob mystizistische Kabbala, Chassidismus oder Talmud, ob thoragläubig oder liberal, ob Philo, Maimonides oder Spinoza, ob Cohen oder Husserl oder Bergson, ob Marx, Sigmund Freud oder Albert Einstein, es gibt nur eine einzige jüdische Philosophie.

Der große Tondichter Franz Liszt hat in seiner Faustsymphonie den genialen Gedanken gehabt, das Wesen Fausts durch eine Anzahl von plastischen Themen zu schildern, das Wesen des Mephistopheles aber dadurch auszudrücken, daß dieser, unfähig zu einem eigenen Thema, sich darin erschöpft, die Themen Fausts nach einer bestimmten Richtung hin zu Dissonanzen zu verzerren. So hat auch die jüdische Philosophie kein einziges Thema, aber sie hat alle Themen der großen arischen Philosophen talmudisiert und darin eben besteht das eigentümliche Wesen ihres substanzlosen Daseins.

Es ist nun die Zeit Moses Mendelsohns, von dem Grätz so schön sagt, er habe als Geschäftsführer einer Seidenhandlung die Philosophie « in die Wohnungen der Menschen eingeführt, sie beweglich und genußreich gemacht » - es ist die Zeit Moses Mendelsohns, da beginnen sich die Dissonanzen in der gewaltigen Symphonie deutschen Denkens zu mehren. Sie wachsen und wachsen, bis am Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts die Mißklänge alles überfluten und aus dem Faustsatz ein Mephistophelessatz geworden ist. Die Juden sind jetzt nicht nur zahlenmäßig in kaum glaublichen Mengen in die deutsche Philosophie eingebrochen (Sie werden mir hier die Aufzählung von mehr als 200 Namen, die ich Ihnen nennen könnte, ersparen) , nein, sie haben jetzt auch alle Themen, die es überhaupt gibt, endgültig in der Hand. Sie haben in jeder Richtung und in jedem Teilgebiet die Schlüsselstellungen besetzt. Und die Kakophonie wird nun so ohrenbetäubend, daß auch die meisten der Deutschblütigen mitzumusizieren beginnen.

Heute haben wir den Juden ihre Instrumente aus der Hand genommen. Aber ihre Dissonanzen schweben noch in der Luft, und es gibt noch immer Leute, die nach diesen Weisen weitermusizieren möchten. Ihnen gilt unsere unbarmherzige Kampfansage. Denn wir wollen wieder die ursprünglichen wohlgestalteten Themen, die enttalmudisierten Themen unserer Philosophie hören.

Aber wir wollen noch mehr, wir wollen die alten Themen in einem neuen Gipfel lassen, das so erhaben sein wird, daß Mephistopheles seine Hand davon lassen muß.

Wenn Platon seinen Philo gehabt hat,

Aristoteles seinen Maimonides,

Descartes und Giordano Bruno ihren Spinoza,

Newton seinen Einstein,

Kant seinen Cohen,

Hegel seinen Marx,

Nietzsche seinen Sigmund Freud, so wird unsere nationalsozialistische Philosophie so klar und ungetrübt das Wesen unserer Rasse spiegeln, daß kein Jude mehr sich daran zu vergreifen vermag.

« Lexikon der Juden in der Musik »

The Encyclopædia of Jews in Music (« Lexikon der Juden in der Musik ») was a Nazi-sponsored encyclopedia. It was published in Germany in 1940, which listed individuals involved in the music industry who were defined under Nazi racial laws as « Jewish » or « half-Jewish ». It was edited by Herbert Gerigk and Theophil Stengel and published in Berlin in 1940 by Bernhard Hahnefeld, with official support from the Nazi Party's « Institute for Study of the Jewish Question » . The book's sub-title declared that it was produced « on behalf of the national leadership of the Nazi Party for official reasons, partly officially certified documents » .

The encyclopedia appeared in the context of Nazi policies which repressed Jewish individuals involved in music and forbade the performance of works by Jewish composers. A similar encyclopedia by Hans Brückner, entitled « Musical ABC of Jews » , had previously been published in 1935.

The encyclopedia's coverage was very broad, covering musicians, musicologists, librettists, conductors, music-publishers and other people linked to music who were considered « Jewish » or « Half-Jewish » , as well as listing forbidden « Jewish » works. It was kept-up to date via informers and the staff of the « Sonderstab Musik » of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) . According to the Eva Weissweiler's 1999 book, the encyclopedia appeared in 5 editions : the 1st had 380 pages ; the 3rd (1941) had 394 pages ; the 4th (1943) ; and the 5th edition (12,000 to 14,000 printed copies) had 404 pages of listings.

It was one of the proscribed books in the Soviet occupation zone.

Das « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » wurde erstmals 1940 von Herbert Gerigk und Theophil Stengel im Verlag Bernhard Hahnfeld herausgegeben. Das Buch, das als Band 2 der Reihe « Veröffentlichungen des Instituts der NSDAP zur Erforschung der Judenfrage » erschien, wurde laut Untertitel « im Auftrag der Reichsleitung der NSDAP auf Grund behördlicher, parteiamtlich geprüfter Unterlagen » zusammengestellt.

Musiker, Musikwissenschaftler, Librettisten, Regisseure, Musikverleger und andere Personen, die mit Musik zu tun hatten und die nach der antisemitischen, nationalsozialistischen Definition der Nürnberger Gesetze als « jüdisch » oder « halbjüdisch » galten, sind darin verzeichnet. Darüber hinaus enthält es ein Titelverzeichnis mit « jüdischen » Werken, die nicht aufgeführt werden durften.

Durch die Mitarbeiter von Gerigks « Sonderstab Musik » des Einsatzstabs Reichsleiter Rosenberg und durch Denunzianten wurde das Lexikon ständig aktualisiert. Es erschien in fünf Auflagen ; die erste umfasste 380, die dritte (1941) enthielt bereits 394 und die letzte (1943) 404 Seiten.

Das Lexikon wurde in der Sowjetischen Besatzungszone auf die Liste der auszusondernden Literatur gesetzt.

Ein von der Germanistin Elisabeth Frenzel für das Institut zur Erforschung der Judenfrage geplantes entsprechendes Lexikon jüdischer Schriftsteller, das ebenso der Ausgrenzung der aufgenommenen Künstler dienen sollte, kam über die Planungsphase nicht hinaus.

Contrôle de la radio par Josef Goebbels

Après l'arrivée au pouvoir du Parti nazi, en 1933, Adolf Hitler fonda un Ministère à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande du « Reich » dirigé par Josef Gœbbels. Ce Ministère avait pour mission de véhiculer la doctrine nazie par l'intermédiaire des arts, de la musique, du théâtre, des films, des livres, de la radio, des documents pédagogiques et de la presse. Gœbbels fait preuve d'invention dès sa nomination et n'hésite pas à recourir à des techniques modernes pour appuyer ses idées. La voix d'Hitler ne passant pas bien à la radio (débit haché et fade), il a l'idée de la faire modifier par un ingénieur du son pour qu'elle porte mieux. L'opération est un succès et le procédé sera ré-employé par la suite.

Gœbbels s'inspire des théoriciens de la propagande qui l'ont précédé, notamment Gustave Le Bon et son ouvrage « Psychologie des foules » qui expose des moyens d'influencer les masses à leur insu. Il connaît également les recherches menées par les différents acteurs de la Première Guerre mondiale, conflit riche en expériences diverses en la matière. Pour lui, la propagande est un art, qui nécessite pour faire passer son message, d'envelopper intelligemment les propos pour qu'on ne les perçoive plus consciemment, au risque de pervertir la vérité :

Propagande militaire

L'effort de propagande de la « Wehrmacht » a été très important et du ressort du « Abteilung Wehrmacht Propaganda » regroupant les « Propaganda Kompanien » sous la houlette du Ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande de Josef Gœbbels, à partir de l'été 1939. En 1942, au plus fort de ses effectifs, la « Abteilung Wehrmacht Propaganda » comptera 15,000 personnes. Parmi eux, 285 cameramen, 1,329 photographes ainsi que des journalistes et des radio-reporters. Elle a été diffusée notamment par le magazine « Signal », dont les illustrations, particulièrement celles en couleur, sont d'une grande qualité et qui publie, durant l'occupation de la France, une version en français.

La propagande au crépuscule du « Reich »

À compter de juin 1944, les médias du « Reich » mettent l'accent sur l'usage des « Vergeltungswaffen » (armes de représailles) que sont la bombe volante V1 puis la fusée balistique V2, destinées à écraser Londres. La population des villes allemandes, qui subit les bombardements stratégiques alliés de plus en plus intenses, a besoin d'être galvanisée, au moment où les unités de la « Luftwaffe » affectées à la défense du « Reich » périssent.

Peu avant la chute du régime, la propagande cinématographique grossissait par des effets de « travelling » les unités de l'industrie de l'armement pour donner l'impression d'effectifs pléthoriques : par exemple, la projection en décembre 1944 du « Deutsche Wochenschau » des 50 Tigre II royaux du bataillon de chars lourds s.H.Pz.Abteilung 503, regroupa 10 % de la production totale du « Reich » pour ce modèle.

Jusqu'aux derniers jours précédant la chute de Berlin, Josef Gœbbels continua par les ondes, même s'il n'avait plus d'images, à effectuer une manipulation de masse sur la population, en exaltant à la radio les « Wunderwaffen » (armes miracle) sorties des laboratoires scientifiques militaires, qui auraient inversé le cours de la guerre au dernier moment .

Radio broadcasts were announced with the trumpet theme that opens Bruckner's 3rd Symphony.

Le « thème à la trompette » qui commence la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner (dédiée au « Maître des maîtres » , Richard Wagner) servait d'indicatif d'ouverture aux transmissions radiophoniques du régime.

La production industrielle de postes de radio baptisés « Volksempfänger » (récepteurs du peuple) , dont 25 % de foyers sont équipés en 1933 et 65 % en 1941, permet une couverture efficace des messages politiques jusqu'à la fin du régime.

La radio diffuse la fanfare « Die Wacht am Rhein » lors de la capitulation française.

La radio diffuse le poème symphonique « les Préludes » de Franz Liszt lors de l'entrée de la « Wehrmacht » en URSS.

AB 107 : Nazi Propaganda

Propaganda was used by the Nazi Party in the years leading-up to and during Adolf Hitler's leadership of Germany (1933-1945) . National-Socialist propaganda provided a crucial instrument for acquiring and maintaining power, and for the implementation of their policies, including the pursuit of « Total War » and the extermination of millions of people in the « Holocaust » .

The pervasive use of propaganda by the Nazis is largely responsible for the word « propaganda » itself acquiring its present negative connotations.

In opposition (1919-1933)

Nazi leader Adolf Hitler devoted 3 Chapters of his 1925-1926 book, « Mein Kampf » , itself a propaganda tool, to the study and practice of propaganda. He claimed to have learnt the value of propaganda as a World War I infantryman exposed to very effective British and ineffectual German propaganda. The argument that Germany lost the War largely because of British propaganda efforts, expounded at length in « Mein Kampf » , reflected then-common German nationalist claims. Although untrue (German propaganda during World War I was mostly more advanced than that of the British) , it became the official truth of Nazi Germany thanks to its reception by Hitler.

« Mein Kampf » contains the blueprint of later Nazi propaganda efforts. Assessing his audience, Hitler writes in Chapter VI :

« Propaganda must always address itself to the broad masses of the people. All propaganda must be presented in a popular form and must fix its intellectual level so as not to be above the heads of the least intellectual of those to whom it is directed. The art of propaganda consists precisely in being able to awaken the imagination of the public through an appeal to their feelings, in finding the appropriate psychological form that will arrest the attention and appeal to the hearts of the national masses. The broad masses of the people are not made-up of diplomats or professors of public jurisprudence nor simply of persons who are able to form reasoned judgment in given cases, but a vacillating crowd of human children who are constantly wavering between one idea and another. The great majority of a nation is so feminine in its character and outlook that its thought and conduct are ruled by sentiment rather than by sober reasoning. This sentiment, however, is not complex, but simple and consistent. It is not highly-differentiated, but has only the negative and positive notions of love and hatred, right and wrong, truth and falsehood. »

As to the methods to be employed, he explains :

« Propaganda must not investigate the truth objectively and, in so far as it is favourable to the other side, present it according to the theoretical rules of justice ; yet, it must present only that aspect of the truth which is favourable to its own side. The receptive powers of the masses are very restricted, and their understanding is feeble. On the other hand, they quickly forget. Such being the case, all effective propaganda must be confined to a few bare essentials and those must be expressed as far as possible in stereotyped formulas. These slogans should be persistently repeated until the very last individual has come to grasp the idea that has been put forward. Every change that is made in the subject of a propagandist message must always emphasize the same conclusion. The leading slogan must of course be illustrated in many ways and from several angles, but in the end one must always return to the assertion of the same formula. »

Hitler put these ideas into practice with the re-establishment of the « Völkischer Beobachter » , a daily newspaper published by the Nazi Party (NSDAP) , from February 1925 on, whose circulation reached 26,175 in 1929. It was joined, in 1926, by Josef Gœbbels's « Der Angriff » , another unabashedly and crudely propagandistic paper.

During most of the Nazis' time in opposition, their means of propaganda remained limited. With little access to mass-media, the Party continued to rely heavily on Hitler and a few others speaking at public meetings until 1929. In April 1930, Hitler appointed Gœbbels head of Party propaganda. Gœbbels, a former journalist and Nazi Party officer in Berlin, soon proved his skills. Among his 1st successes was the organization of riotous demonstrations that succeeded in having the American anti-war film « All Quiet on the Western Front » , banned in Germany.

In power (1933-1939)

On 13 March 1933, the 3rd « Reich » established a Ministry of Propaganda, appointing Josef Goebbels as its Minister. Goals were to establish external enemies (countries that allegedly inflicted the Treaty of Versailles on Germany - by territorial claims and ethnocentrism) and internal enemies, such as Jews, Romani, homosexuals, Bolsheviks and topics like Degenerate Art (« Entartete Kunst ») .

A major political and ideological cornerstone of Nazi policy was the unification of all ethnic Germans living outside of the « Reich » 's borders under one Greater Germany (e.g. : Austria and Czechoslovakia) . In « Mein Kampf » , Hitler made a direct remark to those outside of Germany. He stated that pain and misery were being forced upon ethnic Germans outside of Germany, and that they dream of common fatherland. He finished by stating they needed to fight for one's nationality. Throughout « Mein Kampf » , he pushed Germans world-wide to make the struggle for political power and independence their main focus. Nazi propaganda used the « Heim ins Reich » policy for this, which began in 1938.

For months prior to the beginning of World War II, in 1939, German newspapers and leaders had carried-out a national and international propaganda campaign accusing Polish authorities of organizing or tolerating violent ethnic cleansing of ethnic Germans living in Poland. On 22 August, Adolf Hitler told his generals :

« I will provide a propagandistic casus belli. Its credibility doesn't matter. The victor will not be asked whether he told the truth. »

The main part of this propaganda campaign was the false flag project, « Operation Himmler » , which was designed to create the appearance of Polish aggression against Germany, which was subsequently used to justify the invasion of Poland.

At War (1939-1945)

Until the conclusion of the Battle of Stalingrad, on 4 February 1943, German propaganda emphasized the prowess of German arms and the humanity German soldiers had shown to the peoples of occupied territories. Pilots of the Allied bombing fleets were depicted as cowardly murderers, and Americans, in particular, as gangsters in the style of Al Capone. At the same time, German propaganda sought to alienate Americans and British from each other, and both these Western nations from the Soviets. One of the primary sources for propaganda was the « Wehrmachtbericht » , a daily radio broadcast that described the military situation on all fronts. Nazi victories lent themselves easily to propaganda broadcasts and were at this point difficult to mishandle. Satires on the defeated, accounts of attacks, and praise for the fallen all were useful for Nazis. Still, failures were not easily handled even at this stage ; when the « Ark Royal » proved to have survived an attack that German propaganda had hyped, considerable embarrassment resulted.

After Stalingrad, the main theme changed to Germany as the sole defender of what they called « Western European culture » against the « Bolshevik hordes » . The introduction of the V-1 and V-2 « vengeance weapons » was emphasized to convince Britons of the hopelessness of defeating Germany.

Problems in propaganda arose easily in this stage ; expectations of success were raised too high and too quickly, which required explanation if they were not fulfilled, and blunted the effects of success, and the hushing of blunders and failures caused mistrust. The increasing hardship of the war for the German people also called forth more propaganda that the war had been forced on the German people by the refusal of foreign powers to accept their strength and independence. Goebbels called for propaganda to toughen-up the German people and not make victory look easy.

On 23 June 1944, the Nazis permitted the Red Cross to visit the concentration camp of Theresienstadt to dispel rumors about the « Final Solution » , which was intended to kill every Jew. In reality, Theresienstadt was a transit camp for Jews « en route » to extermination camps, but in a sophisticated propaganda effort, fake shops and cafés were erected to imply that the Jews lived in relative comfort. The guests enjoyed the performance of a children's Opera, « Brundibar » , written by inmate Hans Krása. The hoax was so successful for the Nazis that they went on to make a propaganda film (« Theresienstadt ») , at Theresienstadt. Shooting of the film began on 26 February 1944. Directed by Kurt Gerron, it was meant to show how well the Jews lived under the « benevolent » protection of the 3rd « Reich » . After the shooting, most of the cast, and even the film maker himself, were deported to the concentration camp of Auschwitz where they were murdered. Hans Fritzsche, who had been head of the Radio Chamber, was tried and acquitted by the Nuremberg war crimes tribunal.

Mass cult and rituals

The Nazis crafted a mass cult, through large orchestrated political military « rallies » , or highly-organized events with banners and marching bands. The goal was to appeal to the patriotism of the German people.

Music and mass publicity in Weimar and Nazi Germany

Music, the Masses, and Modern Subjectivity

This is an extremely ambitious book. Brian Currid, a scholar of German music and media studies, in Berlin, uses an examination of Weimar and Nazi era « acoustics » to address a range of theoretical concerns that scholars have been grappling with for decades : the history of ideology ; the nature of totalitarianism ; the public / private divide ; resistance and racism under Nazism ; the workings of capitalist hegemony ; and the meanings of mass culture. The reader who is not steeped in cultural studies might be overwhelmed by the breadth of Currid's project. But with some patience, readers will garner fascinating insights into the commercial and ideological functions of music in Germany during the Weimar Republic and the 3rd « Reich » .

Currid's diffuse argument runs along the following lines : Scholars of Weimar and National-Socialist Germany have tended to see the « masses » as easily manipulated objects of State propaganda or commercial culture. They have presented the public as without agency, either suffering from a false consciousness through the allures of commodity culture or taking refuge in popular culture, such as music, as a form of escapism or even resistance to State oppression. Currid rejects such readings of mass culture in Weimar and Nazi Germany by locating moments of individual subjectivity through the formation of a self-conscious listening public. Currid is not interested in the production or form of musical works. Rather, his concern is with consumption. How did people hear music in their homes or at movie theatres, and what does this say about the nature of publics and « publicity » during this period ?

To answer these questions, Currid presents four cases studies that focus on the emergence of radio and the formation of radio audiences, the consumption and criticism of Schlager or « hit songs » , narratives about « Opus music » or « serious » (Classical) music, and the popularity of « Gypsy » music, in Nazi Germany. Using product advertisements and the sound-tracks and screenplays of big production films like « Heimat » (1938) ; « Wunschkonzert » (1940) ; and « Traummusik » (1940) , Currid reveals the close relationship between visual and aural experiences. Radio advertisements presented images of listeners alone with their headphones but, also, as part of an emerging collectivity of radio consumers. Movie plots revolved around a struggle between Classical music and cabaret. And Germans hummed hit songs from revue films, thus contributing to an ever-shifting understanding of what was « popular » . In other words, emerging forms of mass-media mobilized music in ways that allowed Germans, at once, to discover a modern subjectivity and to feel a part of the nation or, as the Nazis would have it, the « Volksgemeinschaft » .

In making this point, Currid draws upon Benedict Anderson's well-known notion of « imagined communities » , according to which individuals across the space of the nation engage simultaneously in public and private rituals - whether singing the national anthem or reading the newspaper. Currid, however, wants to make a broader political point about music's potential as a source of opposition. The emergence of self-conscious listening publics did not represent a « resistance » to Nazism, as Detlev Peukert argued with respect to German youth who listened to forbidden music or changed the lyrics of Nazi songs. But, Currid argues, it did allow for the possibility of resistance (page 118) and, thus, for challenging fascist, and capitalist, hegemony. The daily interaction with music was part of an individual's self-understanding as an active subject within a « mass » society. In making this abstract claim, Currid leaves it up to the reader to determine how, in fact, this might have political ramifications. He is interested in neither formal challenges to Nazi power nor a street-level youth culture that mocked the Nazis. This begs the question :

« What kind of political subjectivity did participation in a mass musical culture enable ? »

Currid moves to firmer ground in his most interesting chapter on « Gypsy » music in Nazi Germany. On the one hand, the National-Socialist government denounced « Sinti and Roma » as a rootless, wandering peoples, condemning them to death through a brutal genocidal policy. On the other, so-called « Gypsy » music was celebrated in films and concerts as authentic, thus, appealing to the thirst for the exotic and to Germans' « wanderlust ». Here, Currid exposes the contradictions in the musical culture of the Nazi years with horrifying clarity.

Scholars of mass culture and music will find tantalizing material in this book, especially in Currid's sophisticated readings of popular films and their sound-tracks. His nuanced explanations of how musical audiences are formed are also worth noting. Drawing on the works of Walter Benjamin, Siegfried Kracauer, Theodor W. Adorno, Jürgen Habermas, Louis Althusser, and Slavoj Žižek, Currid utilizes a rich body of cultural criticism. He does so, however, to the detriment of some of his historio-graphical claims. Currid seems to be creating a straw man in his dismissal of prior approaches to inter-War and War-time culture as simply reducing the public to a passive, unformed mass. While he is right to challenge the « mass culture-as-manipulation » model, he does not sufficiently acknowledge that a scholarly consensus behind such a top-heavy view has never existed. Moreover, Currid's collapsing of the Weimar and Nazi years into 1 period is unsettling. While historians are effectively challenging the boundary of 1933 and discovering multiple continuities, Currid would have lent more weight to his observations by forthrightly explaining his broad periodization, rather than uncritically juxtaposing Weimar critiques of mass culture with World War II era films. In his desire to ground mass culture in its historical setting, Currid actually removes Germans from their political and ideological surroundings. His disinclination to see 1933 as a « caesura » is potentially exciting, but without exploring the mechanics of coercion and consent in the 3rd « Reich », we are left wondering how this book's rich analyses broaden our understanding of culture and politics before and during a violent dictatorship. While Currid's research is sound and his individual revelations about musical mass culture compelling, we may still question whether « national acoustics » is a viable vehicle for understanding German culture during a time of political upheaval, War, and genocide.

« Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur »

The Militant League for German Culture (« Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur », or KfdK), was a nationalistic anti-Semitic political Society during the Weimar Republic and the Nazi era. It was founded in 1928 as the « Nationalsozialistische Gesellschaft für deutsche Kultur » (NGDK) (National-Socialist Society for German Culture) by Nazi ideologue Alfred Rosenberg and remained under his leadership until it was re-organized and renamed, in 1934, to (« Nationalsozialistische Kulturgemeinde » (National-Socialist Culture Community). The aim of the Association was to make a significant imprint on cultural life in Germany based on the aims and objectives of the inner-circles of the Nazi Party. Upon its re-organization, the Club was merged with the German Stage Association (« Deutsche Bühne »). This was connected with the establishment of the official body for cultural surveillance, the « Dienststelle Rosenberg » (Drbg), later known as the « Amt Rosenberg ».

The number of members, who were organized in local chapters, rose from approximately 300 in 25 chapters, in April 1929, to about 38,000 in 450 chapters, by October 1933.

The members and supporters included representatives of the extreme-right wing of the National-Socialist movement. These included : anti-Semitic literary historians Adolf Bartels, Ludwig Polland, Gustaf Kossinna ; physicist and Albert Einstein opponent, Philipp Lenard ; publishers Hugo Bruckmann and Julius Friedrich Lehmann ; the leaders of the Bayreuth Society Winifred Wagner, Daniela Thode, Hans « Freiherr » von Wolzogen, the widow of racial ideologist Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Eva Chamberlain, the composer Paul Græner ; the philosophers Otto Friedrich Bollnow, and Eugen Herrigel ; the poet and later president of the « Reichsschrifttumskammer » Hanns Johst ; the architect Paul Schulze-Naumburg, who edited the periodical « Kunst und Rasse » (Art and Breed) , and who spoke at many events ; Gustav Havemann, a violinist and later leader of the « Reichsmusikkammer » (who founded and lead a « Kampfbund » Orchestra) ; the theater director Karl von Schirach ; Fritz Kloppe who led the « Werwolf » , a para-military organization ; and the theologian and nationalist musicologist Fritz Stein ; Othmar Spann, Austrian political philosopher and a teacher of Friedrich Hayek. After an ad on April 20, 1933, Edwin Werner, Ph.D. , founded his own Association in Passau.

Corporate and organizational members included : the Association of German Fraternities (« Deutsche Burschenschaften ») ; the German Homeland Association (« Deutsche Landsmannschaft ») ; the Association of German Parochial Colleges (« Turnerschaften an deutschen Hochschulen ») ; the Association of German Guilds (« Deutsche Gildenschaften ») ; the Association of German Glee Clubs (« Deutsche Sängerschaft ») ; the German College Music Society (« Sondershäuser Verband ») ; and German College Art Society (« Deutscher Hochschulring ») .

The Society published the periodical « Mitteilung des Kampfbundes für deutsche Kultur » (Proceeds of the KfdK) , from 1929 to 1931. Under the heading « Signs of the Times » , they listed their enemies : Erich Kästner, Kurt Tucholsky, Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht, Walter Mehring, and the Berlin Institute for Sexual Research. Later, the most frequently mentioned were : Paul Klee, Vassily Kandinsky, Kurt Schwitters, the « Bauhaus » Movement, Emil Nolde, Karl Hofer, Max Beckmann, and Georg Grosz. Books by Ernst Toller, Arnold Zweig, Jakob Wassermann, Lion Feuchtwanger, Arnolt Bronnen, Leonhard Frank, Emil Ludwig, and Alfred Neumann were dismissed as not properly German. In 1930, the Society directed a campaign against Ernst Barlach and the so-called « Hetzkunst » (Hate Art) of Käthe Kollwitz.

In October 1932, the Society published « German Culture Watch : Journal of the KfdK » reprinted in 1933, under the editorship of Hans Hinkel.

Their activities had a nation-wide impact. In 1930, Wilhelm Frick, the Nazi Interior and Cultural minister of Thuringia and « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » regional leader, named Hans Severus Ziegler of the Schultze-Naumburg firm as director of the Weimar Architecture Institute. He immediately dismissed all practitioners of the « Bauhaus » style. Frick ordered artworks by « degenerate artists » (« Künstler der Entarteten Kunst ») to be removed from the « Schloßmuseum » in Weimar. These included works by Otto Dix, Lyonel Feininger, Vassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee, Ernst Barlach, Oskar Kokoschka, Franz Marc, and Emil Nolde, although the latter was himself a Nazi. Works by modernist composers Igor Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith were struck from State-subsidized concert programs, and books by Erich Maria Remarque, and films by Sergei Eisenstein, Vsevolod Pudovkin, and Georg Wilhelm Pabst were banned outright.

The « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » , under Wilhelm Frick's auspices, arranged its 1st major youth conference on Pentecost, in 1930. It presented Nazi leaders Baldur von Schirach, Josef Gœbbels, Hermann Göring, and Richard Walther Darré. Referencing Weimar's « spiritual heroes » a resolution called for « strengthening German military will » and, in reference to the arts, « resistance against all populist harmful influences in the area of theatre, literature and fine-arts, and against alien architecture » . The following Pentecost, in 1931, saw a youth and cultural meeting in Potsdam, where Alfred Rosenberg gave a lectures on « Blood and Honour » , and « Race and Personality » , and Göring on the theme « Readiness to fight to protect our culture » .

The « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (KfdK, or Fighting League for German Culture) was founded in 1929 by Alfred Rosenberg, with the aim of promoting German culture while fighting the cultural threat of Liberalism. Ironically, this organisation (best known for disrupting concerts and music classes, insulting and threatening artists, and distributing inflammatory and anti-Semitic pamphlets) was originally aimed at the nation's elite. Adolf Hitler and other early Nazi leaders were searching for a way beyond mob-style violence, and decided to create a cultural organization as a way to court the intelligentsia.

During the 1st years of its existence, the relatively small and regionally-organized « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » attracted many intellectuals and, increasingly, musicians. With its conservative agenda of fighting « degenerative Jewish and Negro » influences, it spent much energy promoting the « cleansing » of museums, University faculties, and concert programmes of unwanted artists. In general, the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » appealed to radical nationalists and anti-Semites, to those who felt betrayed by defeat in World War I and by the Treaty of Versailles, and to those who felt outraged by the Leftist, modernizing and « cosmopolitan » tendencies of the Weimar Republic.

The « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » was initially not very aggressive, relying instead on lectures, intimidation and propaganda. After Hitler's rise to power, in 1933, it became increasingly violent, with the support of the « Stormabteilung » (SA, Storm Troopers, or brown shirts) changing both its techniques and its membership pool. The « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » had its own Orchestra, which was selected to perform a special concert for Hitler's birthday. It also acquired control over the important music journal, « Die Musik » , which gave it an official outlet for racist and nationalist opinions on music.

Alfred Rosenberg, the leading figure behind the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » , expected to be rewarded for his success. However, Josef Goebbels persuaded Hitler to give him control over the new « Reichskulturkammer » (RKK, or « Reich » Cultural Chamber) , which was a serious threat to the « Kampfbund » 's function as cultural arbiter of the « Reich » . Rosenberg was gradually marginalized, given the smaller job of running the official cultural organization of the Nazi Party, and the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » was ultimately absorbed into the « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF, Strength through Joy) movement. In this phase of its existence, the « Kampfbund » acted primarily as a music and theatre lobby, fighting for the rights of « Aryan » artists and for the exclusion of non-Aryans. Even this small gesture of independence was short-lived and, by 1937, the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » was entirely dissolved, assimilated into the many cultural organizations of the NSDAP.

Der Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur (KfdK) , der in seiner Gründungsphase zunächst den Namen Nationalsozialistische

Gesellschaft für deutsche Kultur (NGDK) erhielt, war ein völkisch gesinnter, antisemitisch ausgerichteter und politisch tätiger Verein während der Weimarer Republik und des nationalsozialistischen Regimes. Der Verein wurde 1928 von dem NS-Chefideologen Alfred Rosenberg gegründet und stand bis zu seiner Auflösung 1934 unter dessen Führung. Ziel des Vereins war eine maßgebliche Prägung des Kulturlebens in Deutschland, nicht zuletzt innerhalb der NSDAP. 1934 wurde der Verein aufgelöst und mit dem Reichsverband « Deutsche Bühne » zur Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde (« NS-Kulturgemeinde ») zusammengefasst. Verbunden war der Auflösungsprozess mit der Errichtung der « Dienststelle Rosenberg » (Drbg), dem späteren « Amt Rosenberg » (ARo).

Die Gründungsphase des Kampfbunds stand im engsten Zusammenhang mit dem Nürnberger Reichsparteitag der NSDAP im August 1927. Nach Abschluß des Parteitags teilte der Völkische Beobachter den Beschluß zur Gründung einer Kulturorganisation mit, die « durch Veranstaltung von Vortragsabenden im gesellschaftlichen Rahmen » den « nationalsozialistischen Gedanken in Kreise ... tragen » solle, « die durch Massenveranstaltungen im allgemeinen nicht gefasst werden können ».

Aus einem nachfolgenden Rundschreiben von Alfred Rosenberg, Hauptschriftleiter des Völkischen Beobachters, an alle führenden Partei-Funktionäre der Ortsgruppen der NSDAP sowie an renommierte Vertreter der völkisch-nationalen Kulturszene im Oktober 1927 geht hervor, daß Hitler ihn mit der Gründung beauftragt hatte.

In dem Schreiben wies Rosenberg auf seine Bemühungen hin, « 20-30 bester deutscher Namen dafür zu gewinnen, sich als Förderer dieser Sache öffentlich nennen zu lassen ». Seine Parteigenossen auf kommunaler Ebene bat er um Unterstützung bei der Suche nach sämtlichen « irgendwie als national bekannten Persönlichkeiten Ihrer Stadt », die für eine materielle Unterstützung und für Verträge der Gesellschaft in Frage kämen.

Die offizielle Gründung des Vereins als « Nationalsozialistische Gesellschaft für deutsche Kultur » (NGDK) geschah am 4. Januar 1928. Gründer waren neben Rosenberg der Reichsorganisationsleiter der NSDAP Gregor Straßer, der Reichsgeschäftsführer Philipp Bouhler, der Reichspropagandaleiter Heinrich Himmler, der Reichsschatzmeister Franz Xaver Schwarz und der Unternehmer Wilhelm Weiß.

Am 19. Dezember 1928 wurde die NGDK in « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur eingetragener Verein » (KfdK) umbenannt und erhielt eine Vereinssatzung.

Die Stadt Karlsruhe wurde durch die Hans-Thoma-Schule zu einem Zentrum deutschtümeler Strömungen. Es handelte sich um völkisch gesinnte Kreise, die zu ihrer antisemitischen Tradition nach 1918 auch eine antikapitalistische Ausrichtung angenommen hatten und sich für die Heimatkunst interessierten. Rainer Maria Rilke, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Max Liebermann galten ihnen aufgrund vorgegeblicher « internationalistischer » Denkweisen als Feindbilder; Vorbilder war der wiederentdeckte Romantiker Caspar David Friedrich. Die ersten nationalsozialistischen Bilderstürme sollten von der Kampfbund-Gruppe in Karlsruhe unter der Führung des Thoma-Nachfolgers Hans Adolf Bühler und von

Der Kampfbund beschrieb sich als einen Zusammenschluss aller Kräfte, die bereit seien, den « Wiederaufbau der deutschen Kultur » gegenüber der Weimarer « Novemberkultur » zu betreiben. Das war ein Kampfbegriff : das gegenwärtige Theater wurde als « abgrundtief lasterhaft » empfunden, die Musik als « entartet » , als eine « jazzende Verniggerung » . Man wandte sich generell gegen « Entartung » , « Kulturverfall » , « Kulturbolschewismus » , « Amerikanismus » , « Schmutz und Schund » . Die kulturpessimistische, kulturkämpferische Abwehr der Moderne hatte ferner eine « deutlich antisemitische Note » .

Pangermanische Tendenzen vertraten die in und um den Alldeutschen Verband konzentrierten Anhänger eines großdeutschen Kulturimperialismus, die eine stark ausgeprägte antisemitische Tradition hatten. Die nordischen Völker besäßen einen Führungsauftrag, ihr Volkstum sollte die kulturellen Kolonisationsfaktoren liefern. Die Expansionsbestrebungen richteten sich vor allem nach Osteuropa. Paul de Lagarde, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Othmar Spann waren die Autoren dieser Kreise, deren Chauvinismus im gebildeten Bürgertum weit verbreitet war.

Ein im Mai 1928 veröffentlichter Gründungsaufruf des Kampfbunds mit starken antisemitischen und rassistischen Akzenten erklärte, man stehe vor einem « von volksfeindlichen Kräften geförderten politischen Niedergang » , der einen « planmäßigen Kampf gegen sämtliche deutschen Kulturwerte » beinhalte. « Rassefremdes Literatentum » habe sich « mit den Abfällen der Großstädte » verbündet. Man wolle nun im Kampf gegen « Verbastardisierung und Vernegerung unseres Daseins » willensstarke und opferbereite deutsche Männer und Frauen an sich binden, um « artbewußte » Zeitungen und Zeitschriften, bisher « unterdrückte » Gelehrte und Künstler zu fördern, Ausstellungen zu veranstalten und auf die Theaterspielpläne Einfluß zu nehmen. Eine Liste von wohlbekannten Namen, die sich bereit erklärten, die Gründung öffentlich zu unterstützen, zeigt die bildungsbürgerliche Ausrichtung : Acht der achtzehn Förderer waren Hochschullehrer, die übrigen, meist aus dem Richard-Wagner-Kreis, waren Verleger, Theaterintendant, Schriftsteller, Pfarrer.

Der Kampfbund bemühte sich lange nach außen um eine formale Distanz zu der ihn führenden Partei. So war er keine der Gliederungen der NSDAP, wiewohl ihn das Hauptarchiv der NSDAP als « Organisation innerhalb der NSDAP » führte und ihn eine « rein nationalsozialistische Gründung » nannte. Er beschrieb sich als kulturpolitische Einrichtung « völkisch Kulturschaffender » , die « alle Abwehrkräfte gegen die heute herrschenden Mächte der Zersetzung auf kulturellem Gebiet in Deutschland » sammeln und « Boden für die Idee Adolf Hitlers auf kulturellem Felde gewinnen » sollte. Erst seit dem Herbst 1932 scheint er sich offen als nationalsozialistisch ausgewiesen zu haben, « obwohl sein parteipolitischer Standpunkt ... schon lange kein Geheimnis mehr war » .

An der ersten öffentlichen Veranstaltung des Kampfbundes in der Universität München am 23. Februar 1929, bei der Othmar Spann über Die Kulturkrise der Gegenwart einen Vortrag hielt, nahm Hitler mit zahlreichen Anhängern teil.

Die Zahl der Mitglieder, die in so genannten Stützpunkten (Ortsgruppen) organisiert waren, stieg vom April 1929 von circa 300 in 25 Ortsgruppen auf circa 38.000 in 450 Ortsgruppen im Oktober 1933.

Unter den Mitgliedern und Förderern des Kampfbundes war alles vertreten, was im extremen Flügel der völkischen Bewegung Rang und Namen hatte, so der antisemitische Literaturhistoriker Adolf Bartels, Ludwig Polland, Gustaf Kossinna und der Physiker und Einstein-Gegner Philipp Lenard, die Verleger Hugo Bruckmann und Julius Friedrich Lehmann, die führenden Persönlichkeiten der Bayreuther Gesellschaft Winifred Wagner, Daniela Thode, Hans von Wolzogen und die Witwe Eva Chamberlain des Rasseideologen Houston Stewart Chamberlain, der Komponist Paul Gräner, der Schriftsteller und spätere Präsident der Reichsschrifttumskammer Hanns Johst, der Architekt Paul Schultze-Naumburg, der die Schrift Kunst und Rasse herausgab und besonders häufig auf Veranstaltungen sprach, Gustav Havemann (Gründer und Leiter des Kampfbund-Orchesters), der Generalintendant an Doktor Karl von Schirach, der Bundesführer des paramilitärischen Wehrwolf. Bund deutscher Männer und Frontkrieger Fritz Kloppe und der Theologe und Musikwissenschaftler Fritz Stein. Landesleiter für Hessen und Hessen-Nassau war Friedrich Krebs.

Zu den korporativ beigetretenen akademischen Mitgliedern gehörten die Deutsche Burschenschaft, die Deutsche Landsmannschaft, der Vertreter-Convent der Turnerschaften an deutschen Hochschulen, die Deutsche Gildenschaft, die Deutsche Sängerschaft, der Sondershäuser Verband, der Hochschulring deutscher Art.

Von 1929 bis 1931 gab der Kampfbund die Zeitschrift Mitteilungen des Kampfbundes für deutsche Kultur heraus. In der Rubrik « Zeichen der Zeit » wurden Feinde zitiert : Erich Kästner, Kurt Tucholsky, Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht, Walter Mehring, das Berliner Institut für Sexualwissenschaft, weiterhin Paul Klee, Wassily Kandinsky, Kurt Schwitters, das Bauhaus, Emil Nolde, Karl Hofer, Max Beckmann, George Grosz zählen zu den meistgenannten. Die Bücher von Ernst Toller, Arnold Zweig, Jakob Wassermann, Lion Feuchtwanger, Arnolt Bronnen, Leonhard Frank, Emil Ludwig, Alfred Neumann sollten die Bezeichnung « deutsch » nicht führen dürfen. Eine Kampagne richtete sich 1930 gegen Ernst Barlach und die sogenannte « Hetzkunst » von Käthe Kollwitz. Zum einen sammelten sich hier Künstler und Schriftsteller, die mit den künstlerischen und literarischen Entwicklungen in der Weimarer Republik nicht Schritt halten konnten, zum zweiten « finden sich in unzähligen Pamphleten und Pressemitteilungen » bereits früh die Kategorien « deutscher » und « undeutscher » Literatur vor, wie sie in demonstrativer Symbolik mit den Bücherverbrennungen im Mai 1933 umgesetzt wurden.

Im Oktober 1932 wurde unter der Schriftleitung von Hans Hinkel die « Deutsche Kultur-Wacht. Blätter des Kampfbundes für deutsche Kultur » publiziert, die jedoch schon 1933 wieder eingestellt wurde.

Verschiedene Aktivitäten hatten ein großes überregionales Echo : 1930 setzte der von dem nationalsozialistischen Thüringer Innen- und Kulturminister Wilhelm Frick zum « Kultur-, Kunst- und Theaterreferenten » ernannte Landesleiter des KfdK, Hans Severus Ziegler, den völkischen Architekten Schultze-Naumburg als Direktor der Weimarer Bauhochschule ein und entließ zugleich alle Dozenten des « Bauhaus » -Stils. Er ordnete die Entfernung der Werke von Otto Dix, Lyonel Feininger, Wassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee, Ernst Barlach, Oskar Kokoschka, Franz Marc, Emil Nolde und anderen als « entartet » geltenden Künstlern aus den Ausstellungsräumen des Weimarer Schloßmuseums an. Aus staatlich subventionierten Konzertprogrammen strich er die Werke von Paul Hindemith und Igor Strawinsky. Verboten wurden die Werke von Erich Maria Remarque und die Filme von Sergej Eisenstein, Wsewolod Illarionowitsch Pudowkin und Georg Wilhelm Pabst.

Pfingsten 1930 veranstaltete der Kampfbund in Weimar seine erste große Jugendtagung, die unter der Schirmherrschaft von Frick stand. Erstmals wurden hier mit dem Hinweis auf Weimars « unsterbliche Geistesheroen » nationalsozialistische Führungsfiguren vorgestellt : Baldur von Schirach, Josef Gœbbels, Hermann Göring, Richard Walther Darré. Eine gemeinsame EntschlieÙung forderte « vor allem die Stärkung des deutschen Wehrwillens » , und für die Künste hieß es :

Unter dem Motto « Es ist nicht nötig, daß ich lebe, wohl aber, daß ich meine Pflicht tue ! » veranstaltete der Kampfbund Pfingsten 1931 eine Jugend- und Kulturtagung in Potsdam, auf der Rosenberg einen Vortrag über « Blut und Ehre » , « Rasse und Persönlichkeit » hielt, und Göring, Fliegerhauptmann, zum Thema « Wehrwille sichert die Kultur » sprach.

Nach der Machtübernahme durch die Nationalsozialisten und ihre deutschnationalen Bündnispartner 1933 beteiligten sich lokale Gruppen des KfdK zunächst an der im Mai 1933 unter der Federführung der Deutschen Studentenschaft stattfindenden « Aktion wider den undeutschen Geist » , in deren Verlauf « undeutsche » Literatur aus Bibliotheken entfernt und in öffentlichen rituellen Bücherverbrennungen vernichtet wurde.

Organisatorisch erzwang der Kfdk den Zusammenschluss des Verbands der freien Volksbühnen und des Bühnenvolksbunds zu einer Nebenorganisation, dem Reichsverband Deutsche Bühne eingetragener Verein. In der weiteren Folge übernahm er weitere Berufszusammenschlüsse.

In der Einflußkonkurrenz zwischen Alfred Rosenberg, Josef Gœbbels und Robert Ley als dem Leiter der Deutsche Arbeitfront und deren Freizeiteinrichtung « Kraft durch Freude » kam es schließlich am 6. Juni 1934 zu einer Verschmelzung von KfdK und Reichsverband Deutsche Bühne zur Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde (NSKG) , die unmittelbar nach der Gründung « körperschaftlich in die Organisation “ Kraft durch Freude ” » eintrat. Einerseits sollte die NS-Kulturgemeinde fortan die Führung bei der Prägung des Kulturlebens in der politischen NS-Gemeinschaft « Kraft durch Freude » übernehmen ; andererseits verband Rosenberg mit dieser Zusammenfassung das Ziel, die Programmgestaltung für das von ihr getragene Kunst- und Kulturleben auch im Rahmen der gesamten NSDAP zu übernehmen, insbesondere hinsichtlich der Jugendorganisationen.

Auf dem Gebiet des Films gehörte zum Bereich des Kampfbundes die Dekafilm in Berlin, die Abkürzung bedeutet aufgelöst Deutsche Kampffilm.

Nationalsozialistische Organisation, gegründet am 4. Januar 1928 mit Sitz in München. Vorsitzender war Alfred Rosenberg (1893-1946) . Der Bund, dem eine Reihe prominenter Mitglieder angehörte, wandte sich heftig gegen die künstlerische Moderne. Er wurde 1934 in die NS-Kulturgemeinde überführt.

Der dritte Reichsparteitag der NSDAP verabschiedete im August 1927 « kulturelle Richtlinien zur Gewinnung der geistig Schaffenden ». Alfred Rosenberg (1893-1946), der sich bereits 1919 Adolf Hitler (1889-1945) und seiner Partei angeschlossen hatte, Herausgeber des « Völkischen Beobachters » und vieler anderer Parteizeitschriften war und die Rolle des Chefideologen der NSDAP innehatte, erhielt den Auftrag, eine neue Organisation aufzubauen. Am 4. Januar 1928 wurde zunächst die « Nationalsozialistische Gesellschaft für deutsche Kultur » gegründet. Vorsitzender war Alfred Rosenberg, Schatzmeister Franz Xaver Schwarz (1875-1947), Schriftführer Philipp Bouhler (1899-1945). Weitere Gründungsmitglieder waren Heinrich Himmler (1900-1945) und Gregor Straßer (1892-1934). Ab dem 19. Dezember 1928 firmierte die Gesellschaft als « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur ». Sie hatte ihren Sitz in München in der Schellingstraße 50, schräg gegenüber der Redaktion des « Völkischen Beobachters », die Rosenberg ebenfalls leitete.

Der Kampfbund war der organisatorische Ausdruck einer Kunstabwehrgesinnung. Er wandte sich heftig, zum Teil auch mit gewaltsamen Mitteln, gegen die künstlerische Moderne. Er sprach das konservative und reaktionäre Bürgertum an und versuchte dabei auch, als überparteiliche Organisation aufzutreten. Zugleich war er eine politische Sozialisationsagentur für die NSDAP. Den Reihen des Kampfbundes entstammten zum Beispiel der spätere Reichsminister für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung Bernhard Rust (1893-1945) und der Staatskommissar für die thüringischen Landestheater Hans Severus Ziegler (1893-1978). Von 1929 bis 1933 wuchs die Mitgliederzahl des Kampfbundes nur von 300 auf etwa 6.000, versechsfachte sich dann allerdings im Jahr der « Machtergreifung ».

Seinen Schwerpunkt hatte der KfdK in München, wo auch sieben der elf Vorstandsmitglieder ansässig waren, darunter die Verleger Hugo Bruckmann (1863-1941) und Friedrich Julius Lehmann (1864-1935), die auch frühe Förderer von Adolf Hitler waren. Einen weiteren geographischen Schwerpunkt bildete Bayreuth, das und andere durch Winifred Wagner (1897-1980) sowie weitere Mitglieder der Familie Wagner präsent war.

In München hielt der Kampfbund zwischen Februar 1929 und Februar 1932 insgesamt 21 Veranstaltungen ab. Die erste fand im Auditorium Maximum der Universität statt, wo der austro-faschistische Philosoph Othmar Spann (1878-1950) über « Die Kulturkrise der Gegenwart » sprach. Ein Höhepunkt in der öffentlichen Wahrnehmung wurde mit Paul Schultze-Naumburgs (1869-1949) Vortrag « Der Kampf um die Kunst » erreicht, der am 30. Januar 1931 im Auditorium der TH München stattfand. Die Veranstaltung war so überfüllt, daß sie einen Monat später im Theatersaal des Hotel Union wiederholt wurde.

Der Architekt und Theoretiker Schultze-Naumburg, Polemiker gegen das « jüdisch-bolschewistische Flachdach » und Proponent des Heimatschutzstils, war der Starredner des Kampfbundes. Er trat mit seinem Vortrag, der zentral auf die Auseinandersetzung um die künstlerische Moderne zielte, anschließend im ganzen Deutschen Reich auf. Kurz nach Schultze-Naumburg sprach Walter Stang (1895-1945) über den « Kampf um das deutsche Theater » in dem populären Steinecke-Saal in der Amalienstraße. Stang war Dramaturg bei der Münchner Theatergemeinde und Theaterreferent des Kampfbundes. Nach 1933 wurde er Amtsleiter in der Dienststelle des Überwachungsbeauftragten Rosenberg.

Alfred Rosenberg

L'homme politique, architecte et essayiste allemand Alfred Rosenberg est né le 12 janvier 1893 à Reval (Empire russe) et est mort le 16 octobre 1946 à Nuremberg. Il devient membre du Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands et théoricien du Nazisme. Durant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, il occupe le poste de ministre du « Reich » aux Territoires occupés de l'Est. Condamné à mort lors du procès de Nuremberg, il est exécuté par pendaison.

Rosenberg est issu d'une famille germano-balte. Un temps protégé du mystique russe Dimitri Merejkovski, il entreprend des études d'ingénieur-architecte à l'École Impériale technique de Moscou, aujourd'hui l'Université Bauman. Il fuit la révolution bolchévique et s'établit à Munich en 1918, où il fréquente l'Ordre de Thulé se ralliant alors aux doctrines raciales de Dietrich Eckart (1868-1923) qui le présente à Adolf Hitler.

Le NSDAP exerce alors une forte attraction sur les Allemands de l'étranger, ces derniers, en retour, jouaient un rôle essentiel dans son développement.

Ayant fréquenté la société de Thulé, il devient un des plus fervents partisans du National-Socialisme. Dès 1920, alors qu'il a reçu une formation en architecture, il est ainsi rédacteur en chef du « Völkischer Beobachter », organe du Parti nazi. Il publie, en 1922, « Peste en Russie ! le bolchévisme, ses dirigeants, ses exécutants et ses victimes », ouvrage qui, en identifiant bolchévisme et Juifs, marque Hitler. Il participe au « Putsch » manqué de la brasserie à Munich, en 1923.

Il contribue à attirer au sein du NSDAP ceux qui, à droite, développent un sentiment de pessimisme culturel et racial.

Hitler, emprisonné, le désigne pour le remplacer à la tête du Parti. Il rend visite à Hitler en prison et aurait influencé certaines parties de « Mein Kampf ». Devenu idéologue du Parti national-socialiste, il diffuse l'antisémitisme par le biais des « Protocoles des Sages de Sion ». Durant cette période, il exerce les fonctions qu'Hitler ne peut prendre en charge en raison de sa condamnation et joue un rôle important dans la marginalisation de l'aile gauche du Parti, regroupée autour de Gottfried Feder : il ne discute pas les points formulés par ce dernier et ses proches, autour notamment de la participation des employés aux bénéfices et de la place des sociétés anonymes dans le programme du NSDAP.

À partir de 1929, date de sa création, il anime le « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » .

Après la prise de pouvoir en 1933, il subit l'inimitié personnelle de la part de Hermann Göring, de Heinrich Himmler et de Josef Goebbels, qui l'écartent de tous les postes ministériels, et il doit alors se contenter d'un rôle secondaire aux Affaires étrangères du Parti.

Nommé en 1934 à la tête de la recherche au sein du NSDAP, il développe la recherche nazie vers l'archéologie et l'ethnographie. Avec l'appui de Hans Reinerth, il développe au sein de son bureau, l'« Amt Rosenberg », une fédération de la Préhistoire allemande du « Reich » (« Reichsbund für deutsche Vorgechichte ») , confiée à Hans Reinerth. Jusqu'en 1937, cette fédération connaît, sous la houlette de Rosenberg, des succès indéniables, cependant, Rosenberg et son protégé doivent, à partir de ce moment, compter avec l'influence grandissante de l' « Ahnenerbe » de la SS, et doit, surtout après 1940, céder le pas devant cette institution.

Responsable du « Kampfband für deutsche Kultur » , il développe également ce qu'il estime être le programme nazi en matière de politique culturelle éducative, mais il doit composer avec les tenants d'un « christianisme positif du National-Socialiste » , comme il doit s'entendre avec Goebbels. En 1939, il tente à nouveau de prendre pied dans ce domaine, à la faveur d'une disgrâce passagère de Goebbels.

Cependant, malgré cet échec, il met en place, au cours des années qui suivent, l'institut pour l'étude de la question juive, qui démarre ses activités en 1938, présidées par un ancien proche de Hans Frank, brouillé avec ce dernier pour tenter de prendre le contrôle de la propagande antisémite dans le Parti.

Souhaitant prendre le contrôle des affaires étrangères allemandes, il tente de prendre pied par le biais d'un bureau, l' « Aussenpolitisches Amt » , créé le 1er avril 1933, mais rapidement écarté en raison de l'échec d'une mission à Londres, en mai 1933.

Il tente de mettre à profit les contacts dont il dispose auprès de Partis étrangers, il tente de mener une sorte de diplomatie parallèle. Cependant, sa 1re mission, à Londres, en mai 1933, mélange de diplomatie parallèle et de rapprochements personnels, tourne au fiasco. L' « Aussenpolitisches Amt » continue cependant d'exister, mais son chef ne parvient pas à imprimer sa marque dans le domaine des affaires étrangères.

Parallèlement à ce bureau, il organise, pour contrer la montée en puissance de Joachim von Ribbentrop, une école, à destination des membres du NSDAP, destinée à devenir une pépinière de futurs diplomates. Globalement, cette école se révèle, comme toutes les écoles mise en place par le NSDAP, un échec, par manque de débouchés. Parmi les anciens élèves de cette école a cependant été recruté un certain nombre de diplomates affectés en Europe de l'Est.

Il tente encore, en dépit de ses échecs, de s'immiscer dans le domaine des affaires étrangères, notamment en prenant régulièrement la parole au nom du « Reich » , en 1936, par exemple, en félicitant un prélat autrichien, Alois Hudal, pour ses prises de positions hostiles à l'Union Soviétique.

En 1938, la nomination de Joachim von Ribbentrop au ministère des Affaires étrangères, puis, en 1939, la signature du pacte germano-soviétique, sonnent le glas de ces ambitions.

Membre historique du NSDAP, il participe à la confiscation du pouvoir par le Parti, dès les années 1930.

Il est chargé, à partir de 1940, de la confiscation des œuvres d'art et des bibliothèques volées aux Juifs à travers l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) , dirigé, à Vilnius, par le Docteur Müller. Il reçoit également, dans ce cadre, la responsabilité du mobilier confisqué aux Juifs déportés : celui-ci doit être acheminé dans le « Reich » puis vendu ou donné aux Allemands du « Reich » .

En France, 15 jours après l'armistice, Wilhelm Keitel communique au général Volland-Beckenberg commandant la place de Paris, « une note ordonnant de recenser et de mettre en sûreté les objets d'art et documents historiques appartenant à l'État français ou à des particuliers, notamment à des Juifs » , précisant que « cette mesure ne doit pas constituer une appropriation » . Quelques jours après, Hitler charge Rosenberg de récupérer et d'acheminer vers l'Allemagne toutes les œuvres d'art « sans propriétaires » . La première collection visée, d'une valeur estimée à plus de 2 milliards, est celle des Rothschild, cachée dans les domaines de Château Lafite et de Château Mouton Rothschild, dénoncée par un nommé Jurschewitz qui reçoit une prime de 65,000 francs. En mars 1941, un convoi de 28 wagons, contenant près de 4,000 œuvres d'art saisies en France, arrive à Neuschwanstein.

En 1941, après la campagne de Grèce, le « Sonderkommando Griechenland » (commando spécial, Grèce) , placé sous la responsabilité de l' « Einsatzstab » , se livre au pillage des biens juifs et entreprend certaines fouilles, hors de tout accord avec les institutions archéologiques universitaires et dans un contexte de concurrence directe avec les équipes de recherche commandées par Himmler. Contesté par la SS, il doit aussi défendre les actions de son institut face aux menées hostiles des universités du « Reich » , dès les années 1930.

Le 16 avril 1943, Alfred Rosenberg transmet servilement à Adolf Hitler un rapport synthétisant l'ensemble des 20,000 œuvres d'art saisis à l'Ouest par ses subordonnés.

Par un décret de Hitler, il est nommé ministre des territoires occupés à l'Est, le 16 juillet 1941. Mais, rapidement, les compétences dont il dispose sont rognées par l'action de certains de ses concurrents, Himmler et Göring notamment, tandis que ses représentants en Ukraine et dans l' « Ostland » ne tiennent pas compte de ses directives. De ce fait, il joue un rôle important dans la politique génocidaire mise en place de façon systématique à partir de l'invasion de l'Union Soviétique.

Dans les mois qui suivent la campagne de France, il multiplie les déclarations annonçant le déclenchement du conflit contre l'Union Soviétique. Au cours du mois de mars 1941, il apparaît clairement aux principaux responsables du « Reich » que Rosenberg semble sur le point de connaître un accroissement sans précédent des pouvoirs dont il dispose.

Nommé en mars 1941 conseiller spécial pour les territoires occupés à l'Est, il est nommé le 20 avril 1941 « Bevollmächtigter für die zentrale Bearbeitung der Fragen des osteuropäischen Raumes » , malgré de fortes réserves de Himmler notamment.

De ce fait, il joue un rôle certain dans la préparation idéologique et pratique de l'invasion de l'URSS, ce qui n'échappe pas aux services de renseignements soviétiques dans les semaines qui précèdent immédiatement l'intervention allemande. Ainsi, il soutient, même s'il ne participe pas à la réunion du 2 mai 1941 relative à la préparation économique de l'invasion et de l'occupation des territoires conquis, à la fois les projets d'exploitation économiques préparés par les services de Herbert Backe, mais aussi les projets de réduction de la population soviétique par la famine et la déportation en Sibérie. Dans les jours qui suivent, il présente, dans les instructions destinées à ses futurs subordonnés, sa formulation des conclusions de la réunion du 2 mai.

Ainsi, durant cette période précédant immédiatement l'invasion, il expose dans un certain nombre de mémoires destinés à Hitler sa vision de ce que doit être l'Union soviétique occupée par le « Reich » ; dans son 1er mémoire, daté du 2 avril 1941, il présente comme nécessaire la destruction de l'État soviétique, par l'extermination de ses représentants, et le déplacement de populations entières. Dans son mémoire du 29 avril, il préconise une politique de ghéttoïsation des Juifs d'Ukraine, puis, dans son mémoire du 8 mai, une politique de colonisation des pays baltes.

Le 16 juillet 1941, lors d'une conférence réunissant Adolf Hitler, Hans Lammers, Hermann Göring, Martin Bormann et lui-même, il est nommé sur décret d'Hitler « ministre du « Reich » pour les territoires occupés de l'Est » (« Minister für die besetzten Ostgebiete ») , et supervise l'administration civile à travers les « Reichskommissariat » .

Néanmoins, Rosenberg apparaît comme un ministre privé de son domaine de compétence, ses compétences ministérielles étant réduites à peau de chagrin : passant pour un illuminé, mais entouré d'une administration compétente, composée pour une part non négligeable de Germano-Baltes, il doit composer avec les services de Göring qui détient la charge de l'économie et qui cherche à l'évincer dès sa prise de poste ; de Himmler, dont les compétences policières sont définies clairement le 17 juillet ; ainsi qu'avec les hauts-commandements militaires (OKW et OKH) .

Ainsi, dès sa nomination, il trouve face à lui des commissaires qu'il n'a pas choisis et dont l'indépendance est garantie par Göring et Hitler en personne, ce dernier lui ayant signifié lors de sa nomination le peu d'importance qu'il accordait aux décrets que son nouveau ministre pouvait prendre pour les territoires sur lesquels celui-ci était compétent ; Göring, à cette même occasion, lui a rappelé l'indépendance de fait des « Reichskommissaren » dans leur circonscription. Parallèlement à cette faiblesse politique, le nouveau ministre doit constamment affronter les empiètements de Himmler sur ses propres prérogative.

Ainsi, il tente par exemple de lutter contre la corruption des fonctionnaires allemands en poste dans ces commissariats, sans grand succès, Erich Koch et Hinrich Lohse, chacun dans leur circonscription, vivant dans le luxe.

Dès sa nomination, Rosenberg tente de mener une politique autonome dans les territoires à l'intérieur desquels son administration est compétente.

Son administration prend le relais de la gestion de la « Wehrmacht » à partir du 1er septembre 1941, et fournit un vernis de légalité aux réglementations en cours de mise en place dans les territoires dont il a la charge, devant, selon le mot même de Hitler, gouverner de vastes zones avec « une poignée de gens » .

Ainsi, le 16 juillet, il propose la mise en place d'une politique favorable aux intérêts des Ukrainiens, supposés favorables au « Reich » , mais se heurte à l'indifférence de Göring et à l'opposition de Koch, commissaire nouvellement nommé.

De même, il tente d'exclure le clergé catholique des territoires qu'il contrôle, en limitant l'accès des régions placées sous sa juridiction aux seuls clercs originaires de ces régions.

Dans le même temps, il tente de coordonner l'action des différents acteurs de la politique allemande à l'Est, encourageant des actions génocidaires coordonnées.

De par ses compétences, Alfred Rosenberg révèle rapidement l'un des principaux acteurs du génocide juif dans les territoires de l'Est sur lesquels il exerce son autorité.

Lors des préparatifs de la guerre à l'Est, les territoires qu'il est censé administrer quelques semaines après le déclenchement des opérations militaires sont ainsi prévus pour accueillir les Juifs du « Reich » et des régions limitrophes.

Ainsi, en octobre 1941, il est interpellé par Hans Frank, le gouverneur général de Pologne, au sujet de la déportation des Juifs du Gouvernement général dans les territoires placés sous sa responsabilité, mais à ce moment, il se montre réticent à cette déportation systématique, impossible à réaliser, selon lui. De même, peu de temps après, le 15 novembre, Rosenberg rencontre Himmler afin de savoir si la politique génocidaire est du ressort de la police, placée ainsi dans le domaine de compétence du « Reichsführer SS », ou peut être assimilée à un « élément de la politique générale », donc sous sa propre compétence.

Ainsi, durant l'hiver 1941-1942, il tente de prendre le contrôle de la gestion des Juifs vivant dans les territoires conquis sur l'URSS ; ou encore, en juillet 1942, face à Himmler, lorsqu'il propose une définition du Juif dans les territoires dont il a la responsabilité.

De plus, l'absence d'accès direct à Hitler, dont les visiteurs sont sévèrement contrôlés par Lammers et la présence de Bormann, le prive dans les faits d'une partie de ses prérogatives : entre avril 1941 et le 17 octobre 1943, date de la dernière visite attestée, Rosenberg rencontre Hitler 16 fois ; de plus, à partir de mars 1943, il n'a plus de représentant personnel auprès de Hitler pour faire valoir le point de vue de l'administration qu'il dirige.

Cette relégation est également le fruit de l'hostilité de Hans Lammers et Martin Bormann, un de ses plus farouches opposants parmi les proches de Hitler, et de l'inimitié profonde que lui porte Himmler.

Soutenu cependant par les cadres territoriaux mis en place dans les districts et par des officiers en poste, Rosenberg voit ses vues politiques clairement désavouées par Hitler, à de nombreuses reprises, en mai puis en juillet 1941, lors de la conférence du 16 juillet, puis, pour la dernière fois, le 19 mai 1943.

Rosenberg démissionne le 12 octobre 1944, mais tout porte à croire qu'il n'a reçu aucune réponse, ce qui témoigne une nouvelle fois de l'inexistence de son influence politique.

Rosenberg est, dans les années 1930, un familier de Hitler, l'un de ses lers « compagnons de route », auquel il confie durant ces années, à de nombreuses reprises, ses objectifs pour le conflit qui se déclenche en 1939 ou ses considérations raciales et antisémites, en 1939 ou en 1941.

Cependant, à l'image de l'autre idéologue du NSDAP, Gottfried Feder, il est peu à peu évincé de toute responsabilité importante. Ainsi, sa relative proximité avec Hitler n'empêche pas les nombreux déboires et déconvenues qui jalonnent sa carrière au sein du 3^e « Reich » .

Ainsi, dès 1934, il est écarté des responsabilités les plus importantes dans le domaine des Affaires étrangères, suite à son échec londonien de l'année précédente, et surtout en raison de la montée en puissance de Joachim von Ribbentrop.

En effet, colérique, piètre administrateur, il est peu apprécié au sein des principaux responsables nazis, comme l'atteste la coalition, montée contre lui durant l'automne 1939, regroupant l'ensemble des acteurs du NSDAP et de l'État compétents dans le domaine idéologique.

De plus, ses écrits sont peu lus par les membres du NSDAP, Hitler lui-même ayant confessé à Albert Speer ne jamais l'avoir lu dans son intégralité, tout comme les « Gauleiter », mais lui attirent l'inimitié profonde des membres chrétiens du NSDAP.

L'historien Joachim Fest écrit :

Au procès de Nuremberg, le 1er octobre 1946, Rosenberg est condamné à mort après avoir été reconnu responsable des massacres organisés dans les pays à l'Est de l'Allemagne, pour plan concerté ou complot, crimes contre la paix, crimes de guerre et crimes contre l'humanité. Il est pendu le 16 octobre suivant. Quand il lui est demandé s'il a quelque chose à déclarer avant son exécution, il répond d'un simple « Non ».

Après son exécution, les principaux acteurs de la mise en œuvre de la politique de ré-organisation de l'Est du continent européen utilisent sa position pour se disculper eux-mêmes.

Rapidement, Rosenberg s'affirme comme l'un des principaux acteurs de la mise en place du corpus théorique du National-Socialisme. En effet, il se considère comme le « gardien du temple du National-Socialisme », notamment de son idéologie ; à ce titre, il fait l'objet, tout au long de sa carrière, de railleries de la part des autres dignitaires du régime, pour son « intellectualisation » de la doctrine du Parti, qui, en définitive, comme le note Joachim Fest, « résidait dans l'exercice du pouvoir », et non dans une « façade idéologique » .

Rosenberg est connu pour son rejet du christianisme, et pour avoir joué un rôle important dans le développement du paganisme qu'il percevait comme une transition vers une nouvelle foi nazie ainsi que pour son anti-maçonnisme.

En effet, idéologue du NSDAP dans les années 1920, en concurrence dans un 1er temps avec Gottfried Feder, puis avec Josef Gœbbels dans ce domaine, il développe au sein du mouvement une approche intellectuelle du National-Socialisme qui suscite l'incompréhension, voire l'amusement, de nombreux membres du Parti.

Pour un mouvement comme le NSDAP, le contrôle de l'idéologie, entre autres par le contrôle de l'Histoire, est déterminant pour asseoir le pouvoir de Rosenberg sur l'idéologie du Parti, et au-delà, sur les domaines dans lesquels son bureau exerce une compétence, sans cesse remise en question par d'autres membres de la « nébuleuse » nationale-socialiste.

S'il essuie des échecs dans sa lutte pour le contrôle de l'agitation antisémite, il parvient cependant à imposer la ligne idéologique la plus radicale sur les questions raciales et culturelles, jusqu'à faire modifier un certain nombre de textes religieux mis en musique par Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart ou Georg Friedrich Händel. Cependant, cette influence sur l'idéologie du NSDAP ne doit pas masquer sa relégation, en dépit des publications régulières de ces textes, marqué par la relative mise à l'écart à partir de 1933, notamment à la suite de ses démêlés avec la hiérarchie catholique ; cette mise à l'écart est renforcé au fil des années 1930 par l'arrivée, dans les rangs du NSDAP et de ses organismes de recherche, de jeunes gens dotés d'un bagage universitaire plus important que le sien.

Fortement marquée par le darwinisme social, dont l'introduction dans le « Reich » est contemporaine de ses études, il est fortement influencé par le « pessimisme racial », emprunté à Joseph Arthur de Gobineau.

À ses yeux, le combat des races constitue la raison d'être de l'Histoire humaine. En cela, il fait totalement siennes les conceptions historicistes de Hitler : une lutte gigantesque, qui prend la forme d'une gigantomachie, oppose la race aryenne à la race sémitique depuis une longue éternité, les Indogermains ne faisant que se défendre contre un danger oriental. Il est cependant peu suivi dans les milieux académiques allemands et doit compter avec la réserve des milieux universitaires.

Ainsi, il développe une conception déterministe de l'Histoire selon 2 principes : tout d'abord, l'existence d'une loi de l'Histoire, la lutte des races pour leur survie, qui serait intangible ; ensuite, cet affrontement racial met aux prises 2 mêmes races, malgré les oripeaux extérieurs, pouvant connaître des modifications de forme.

Sa conception est développée dans son ouvrage le plus important, « le Mythe du XXe siècle », texte indigeste de plus de 700 pages, et repose sur un fort pessimisme : la pureté raciale originelle et le génie qui en découle, est constamment menacée par les Juifs, ennemis millénaires et protéiformes des populations nordiques.

Ainsi, il emprunte à Herman Wirth le thème de l'origine nordique de la race aryenne, et va jusqu'à adhérer à l'hypothèse d'une race partie à la fois en direction de l'Amérique du Nord et de l'Europe, depuis une île au milieu de l'océan Atlantique, qu'il situe plus au Nord que l'Atlantide, dans l'archipel d'Heligoland ou dans la Thulé des Hyperboréens décrits par Pythéas.

À côté de la lutte des races, Rosenberg développe aussi l'idée de l'opposition des sexes constitue un puissant facteur explicatif de l'Histoire humaine ; en effet, selon lui, la société étrusque est organisée sur des bases matriarcales, opposées en cela à la société nordiques, appuyée sur des bases patriarcales.

Parallèlement à cette discussion sur le mythe des origines de la race nordique, Rosenberg expose dans ses divers écrits sa propre conception de l'histoire grecque et romaine, l'analysant comme un processus de décadence-régénération. Ainsi, il développe une conception de l'histoire antique très personnelle. À ses yeux, tout peuple qui a renoncé à une pureté raciale a été balayé par un peuple dans lesquels les éléments indogermaniques n'ont pas encore perdu l'essentiel de leur force.

Pour l'auteur du « Mythe du XXe Siècle », Alexandre le Grand ne veut pas réaliser la monarchie universelle, mais souhaite réaliser la fusion de 2 aristocraties, 2 élites, la grecque et la perse, « racialement » parentes : aux yeux de Rosenberg, Alexandre jouit du supposé de la bonne foi raciale, en écartant de manière systématique les Sémites, les Babyloniens et les Syriens de la direction de l'Empire qu'il édifie. Cependant, le bilan de son règne reste négatif car, selon Rosenberg, Alexandre n'a pas été en mesure de léguer un héritage durable, les races asiatiques qui avaient plié sous le joug indo-germanique perso-macédonien ayant rapidement repris le dessus.

Ainsi, c'est seulement après la défaite raciale et politique des Grecs que Rome participe de façon importante à la lutte des races, dans un 1er temps en s'opposant à la sémitique Carthage : pour Rosenberg, cette série de guerres représente aussi un choc entre 2 races antagonistes et son issue a sauvé l'Occident de l'essor dans ses contrées de la civilisation phénicienne et de ses « miasmes ». Ainsi, il donne au discours de Caton une signification raciale : il lui confère le sens d'un appel à la destruction de la race punique ; il regrette malgré tout que Rome n'ait pas poussé son avantage jusqu'au bout et entrepris une campagne dans l'est du bassin méditerranéen pour éradiquer de façon définitive les foyers de peuplement sémitiques.

De même il regrette que les guerres menées par Vespasien et Titus, en Judée, ne se soient pas soldées par l'extermination du peuple juif ; cependant, conscient que cette mesure n'était pas nécessaire du point de vue stratégique, il développe l'idée qu'elle est néanmoins nécessaire d'un point de vue racial car, à la suite de la diaspora, la figure du Juif fait alors son entrée dans la guerre des races, qu'il ne mène ouvertement qu'en de très rares occasions, notamment pendant la révolte juive : en effet, aux yeux de Rosenberg, le peuple juif mène la guerre raciale de façon insidieuse : l'ayant perdue du point de vue militaire et politique, il va la gagner, en s'appuyant sur le christianisme en général, et plus spécifiquement, sur la lecture de Saint-Paul.

Sémites selon lui suscitent son ire. En effet, présenté dans les années 1930 comme un contre-modèle, ce peuple installé en Italie centrale constitue, selon l'auteur du « Mythe du XXe siècle », l'archétype des populations proche-orientales, que les Nordiques doivent combattre ; en effet, il présente la société étrusque comme une société matriarcale, contrôlée par des prêtres-magiciens, dépravée, tant chez les femmes, toujours à la recherche du plaisir sexuel, que chez les hommes volontiers accusés de pédérastie, d'homosexualité et d'onanisme.

Il partage avec Himmler un engouement pour le duc de Saxe Henri le Lion, opposant germanique à la politique méditerranéenne de Frédéric Barberousse.

Dans son principal ouvrage, « le Mythe du XXe siècle », édité en 1930, Rosenberg se montre très fortement hostile au christianisme.

Comme Hitler, Rosenberg ne développe de rhétorique anti-chrétienne que parce que, à ses yeux, la religion mise en place à partir de Saint-Paul a contaminé le christianisme naissant et lui a donné une dimension de réaction contre la domination indo-germanique des Romains. Cependant, la publication de cet ouvrage suscite, de la part de Hitler, d'importantes réserves, essentiellement pour des raisons tactiques, celui-ci souhaitant mettre en place les conditions d'un rapprochement entre le NSDAP et les Partis catholiques.

Ainsi, Rome s'est écroulée sous les coups d'un assaut venu du Sud et de l'Est ; de la sorte, Rosenberg reprend les thèses d'une abondante littérature antisémite, prônant l'idée d'une défense de la romanité, et de sa forme politique, l'Empire romain, rendue possible par l'apport des populations germaniques à partir du IIIe siècle, mais tenue en échec par les influences méridionales. De plus, les idées véhiculées par le christianisme, constituent, selon Rosenberg, la preuve que le peuple romain avait perdu sa vitalité raciale : pour ce dernier, la honte du péché, notamment celui de la chair, entraîne la honte vis-à-vis de la conscience raciale, qui a pour conséquence la perte de la confiance en soi et l'irrésolution dans l'action.

De plus, non contente de développer des thèses anti-chrétiennes, Rosenberg rend public ses réflexions sur les religions antiques. Ainsi, il expose son hostilité à la religion étrusque. En effet, il présente la religion étrusque comme une agglomération de rites destinés à satisfaire les Enfers : ces rites, organisés par des prêtres, qui seraient également magiciens, seraient émaillés de sacrifices humains, dont les Étrusques se seraient rendus spécialistes. De plus, basée sur des rites initiatiques, la religion étrusque se caractériserait, selon Rosenberg, par son caractère indécent et amoral.

Cette hostilité envers le christianisme l'incite à encourager, d'accord avec Himmler, un culte spécifiquement germanique : en effet, il souhaite la renaissance du culte d'Odin, afin de favoriser, pour les Allemands, le retour aux valeurs nordiques. Ainsi, il préconise la mise en place d'un culte spécifiquement national-socialiste : ces célébrations, encouragées auprès des membres du Parti nazi, ces « Lebenfeiern », sont mises en avant par Rosenberg comme un nouveau calendrier, destiné à se substituer au calendrier chrétien : le soin apporté à l'organisation de ces fêtes publiques et privées témoigne de la politisation de la vie privée, mais l'agencement bureaucratique de Rosenberg, pour tenter d'encadrer certains excès, fait craindre à ce dernier, ainsi qu'à Himmler, autre ordonnateur du culte néo-païen national-socialiste, la mise en place d'un nouveau clergé ; pour éviter cet écueil, il préconise de donner à ces célébrations un caractère privé. La mise en place de nouveau culte à visée très clairement politique rencontre peu de succès, en dehors des cercles nationaux-socialistes. Cette tentative ne rencontre pas le succès escompté chez les principaux dirigeants du « Reich » qui souhaitent ne pas heurter de front les églises établies ou qui voient leur attention absorbée par la guerre, mais inspire fortement Himmler dans ses efforts pour mettre en place une religiosité spécifique dans la SS.

À partir du début de l'année 1934, ses positions anti-chrétiennes lui valent l'hostilité du Vatican, son ouvrage étant mis à l'Index.

Dans « le Mythe du XXe Siècle », l'auteur prophétise la plongée du monde dans le chaos en cas de défaite de la race aryenne dans la lutte l'opposant au monde asiatique, qui a pris la forme du bolchévisme juif. La lutte, il l'annonce dès 1935 dans un discours devant une société savante, la « Nordische Gesellschaft », et en définit les principaux caractères : elle sera décisive, terrible et sans pitié, elle aura les traits d'une guerre raciale et idéologique et se soldera par la victoire ou la défaite totale de l'un des protagonistes. En cas de défaite des Aryens, le sort serait terrible : le métissage et la submersion du sang aryen, réputé pur, dans le sang impur des races inférieures.

Lors du procès de Rosenberg, le Tribunal Militaire International avait décidé, le 19 août 1945, de donner à la défense accès au journal que l'inculpé avait tenu avant et pendant la guerre, mais Alfred Thoma, avocat de Rosenberg, nota :

« Kempner ne nous le remet pas. »

Selon Thoma, l'accusation lui déclara que le journal était introuvable. En fait, le substitut Robert Kempner détourna frauduleusement de nombreuses pièces du procès, parmi lesquelles le journal, et, quand sa mission à Nuremberg fut terminée, emporta ces pièces avec lui aux États-Unis. Le journal fut récupéré par des agents de la « U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement », en juin 2013, auprès de l'ancienne secrétaire de Kempner, et, tout en restant propriété du gouvernement américain, fut déposé le 17 décembre 2013 au « United States Holocaust Memorial Museum » .

Selon le « United States Holocaust Memorial Museum », le bureau du procureur avait donné à Kempner l'autorisation d'emporter les pièces, mais selon la « U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement », la soustraction des documents par Kempner était contraire à la loi et à une procédure correcte.

D'après Jurgen Matthaus, directeur de recherches au « Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies » du « United States Holocaust Memorial Museum », Rosenberg était obsédé par les Juifs, mais cela n'apparaît guère dans son journal. Il aborde parfois le sujet, par exemple le 28 mars 1941, pour dire que cette race doit être séparée de toute l'Europe (« diese Rasse aus ganz Europa auszusondern »), mais le journal ne contient rien sur l'extermination des Juifs. Jurgen Matthaus conjecture que le motif de ce silence est que Rosenberg n'avait pas de raison d'entrer dans des détails sur les buts fondamentaux du Nazisme parce que, pour lui, ils allaient de soi.

Le journal de Rosenberg est consultable sur le site du « United States Holocaust Memorial Museum ». Il est publié en France, en 2015, chez l'éditeur Flammarion.

The Baltic German theorist and influential ideologue of the Nazi Party Alfred Ernst Rosenberg was born on 12 January 1893 in Reval in the Russian Empire (today known as Tallinn, the capital of modern Estonia) ; and died on 16 October 1946. He was 1st introduced to Adolf Hitler by Dietrich Eckart ; he later held several important posts in the Nazi government. He is considered one of the main authors of key National-Socialist ideological creeds, including its racial theory, persecution of the Jews, « Lebensraum » , abrogation of the Treaty of Versailles, and opposition to degenerate modern art. He is known for his rejection of and hatred for Christianity, having played an important role in the development of German Nationalist Positive Christianity. At Nuremberg, he was sentenced to death and executed by hanging as a War criminal and for crimes against humanity.

Rosenberg came from a family of Baltic Germans : his father, Waldemar Wilhelm Rosenberg, was a wealthy merchant from Latvia, his mother, Elfriede (« née » Siré) , was from Estonia. (Tallinn archivist J. Rajandi claimed in the 1930's that Rosenberg's family had Estonian origins.) According to the newest research, based on birth and death records from Estonian and Latvian parishes, Rosenberg's father Wilhelm was half-Estonian and half-Latvian in origin, and his mother Elfriede was German with an initially French background.

The young Rosenberg graduated from the « Petri-Realschule » (currently, « Tallinna Reaalkool ») in Reval and went on to study architecture at the Riga Polytechnical Institute and engineering at Moscow's Highest Technical School completing his Ph.D. studies in 1917. During his stays at home, in Reval, he attended the art-studio of the famed painter Ants Laikmaa, but even though he showed promise, there are no records that he ever exhibited. During the Russian Revolution of 1917, Rosenberg supported the counter-revolutionaries ; following their failure, he emigrated to Germany, in 1918, along with Max Scheubner-Richter who served as something of a mentor to Rosenberg and to his ideology. Arriving in Munich, he contributed to Dietrich Eckart's publication, the « Völkischer Beobachter » (Ethnic-Nationalist Observer) . By this time, he was both an antisemite (influenced by Houston Stewart Chamberlain's book « The Foundations of the 19th Century » : one of the key proto-Nazi books of racial theory) and an anti-bolshevik. Rosenberg became one of the earliest members of the German Workers' Party (later, the National-Socialist German Workers' Party, better known as the Nazi Party) , joining in January 1919 ; Adolf Hitler did not join until September 1919. Rosenberg had also been a member of the Thule Society, with Eckart. After the « Völkischer Beobachter » became the Nazi Party newspaper, on December 1920, Rosenberg became its editor in 1923. Rosenberg was a leading member of the « Aufbau Vereinigung » (Reconstruction Organization) a conspiratorial organization of White Russian « émigrés » which had a critical influence on early Nazi policy.

In 1923, after the failed Munich « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » , Hitler, who had been imprisoned for treason, appointed Rosenberg as a leader of the National-Socialist movement, a position he held until Hitler's release. Hitler remarked privately, in later years, that his choice of Rosenberg, whom he regarded as weak and lazy, was strategic ; Hitler did not want the temporary leader of the Nazis to become too popular or hungry for power, because a person with either of those 2 qualities might not want to cede the Party leadership after Hitler's release. However, at the time of the appointment, Hitler had no reason to believe that he would soon be released, and Rosenberg had not appeared weak, so this may have been Hitler reading-back into history his dissatisfaction with Rosenberg for the job he did.

In 1929, Rosenberg founded the Militant League for German Culture (« Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur ») . He later formed the « Institute for the « Study of the Jewish Question » , dedicated to identifying and attacking Jewish influence in German culture and to recording the history of Judaism from a radical nationalist perspective. He became a « Reichstag » Deputy in 1930 and published his book on racial theory, « The Myth of the 20th Century » (« Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts ») which deals with key-issues in the National-Socialist ideology, such as the « Jewish Question » . Rosenberg intended his book as a sequel to Houston Stewart Chamberlain's above-cited book. Despite selling more than a million copies, by 1945, its influence within Nazism remains doubtful. It is often said to have been a book that was officially venerated within Nazism, but one that few had actually read beyond the 1st chapter or even found comprehensible. Hitler called it « stuff nobody can understand » and disapproved of its pseudo-religious tone.

Rosenberg convinced Hitler that communism was an international threat due to the fragility of the Soviet Union's internal political structure. « Jewish-Bolshevism » was accepted as a target for Nazism during the early 1920's.

In Rome, during November 1932, Rosenberg participated in the Volta Conference. British historian Sir Charles Petrie met him there and regarded him with great distaste, Petrie was a Catholic and strongly objected to Rosenberg's anti-Jewish and anti-Catholic sentiments.

The following year, once Hitler had become Chancellor, Rosenberg was named leader of the Nazi Party's foreign political office, but he played little practical part in the role. Another event of 1933 was Rosenberg's visit to Britain, intended to give the impression that the Nazis would not be a threat and to encourage links between the new regime and the British Empire. It was a notable failure. When Rosenberg laid a wreath bearing a swastika at the Cenotaph, a Labour Party candidate slashed it and later threw it in the Thames and was fined 40 shillings for willful damage at Bow Street magistrate's Court. In January 1934, Hitler granted Rosenberg responsibility for the spiritual and philosophical education of the Party and all related organizations.

As the Nazi Party's chief racial theorist, Rosenberg oversaw the construction of a human racial « ladder » that justified Hitler's racial and ethnic policies. Rosenberg built on the works of Arthur de Gobineau, Houston Stewart Chamberlain and Madison Grant, as well as on the beliefs of Hitler. He placed Blacks and Jews at the very bottom of the ladder, while at the very top stood the white « Aryan » race. Rosenberg promoted the Nordic theory which regarded Nordics as the « Master race » , superior to all others, including to other Aryans (Indo-Europeans) .

Rosenberg re-shaped Nazi racial policy over the years, but it always consisted of Aryan supremacy, extreme German nationalism and rabid anti-Semitism. Rosenberg also outspokenly opposed homosexuality (notably in his 1927 pamphlet, « Der Sumpf » : The Swamp) , he viewed homosexuality (particularly, lesbianism) as a hindrance to the expansion of the Nordic population.

Rosenberg's attitude towards Slavs was flexible and depended on the particular nation involved. As a result of the ideology of « Drang nach Osten », Rosenberg saw his mission as the conquest and colonization of the Slavic East. In « Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts », Rosenberg describes Russian Slavs as being overwhelmed by bolshevism. Regarding Ukrainians, he favoured setting-up a buffer State to ease pressure on the German eastern frontier, while agreeing with the notion of the exploitation of Russia for the benefit of Germany.

Rosenberg argued for a new « religion of the blood », based on the supposed innate promptings of the Nordic soul to defend its noble character against racial and cultural degeneration. He believed that this had been embodied in early Indo-European religions, notably ancient European (Celtic, Germanic, Greek, Roman) paganism, Zoroastrianism, and Vedic Hinduism.

He rejected Christianity for its universality, for its doctrine of original sin (at least, for Germans whom he declared on one occasion were born noble), and for its teachings on the immortality of the soul. Indeed, absorbing Christianity enfeebled a people. Publicly, Rosenberg affected to deplore Christianity's degeneration owing to Jewish influence. Following Chamberlain's ideas, he condemned what he called « negative Christianity » (the orthodox beliefs of Protestant and Catholic churches), arguing instead for a so-called « positive » Christianity based on Chamberlain's claim that Jesus was a member of an Indo-European, Nordic enclave resident in ancient Galilee who struggled against Judaism. Significantly, in his work explicating the Nazi intellectual belief system, « The Myth of the 20th Century », Rosenberg cryptically alludes to and lauds the anti-Judaic arch-heretic Marcion and the Manichæan-inspired, « Aryo-Iranian » Cathari, as being the more authentic interpreters of Christianity versus historically dominant Judæo-Christianity; moreover, these ancient, externally Christian metaphysical forms were more « organically compatible with the Nordic sense of the spiritual and the Nordic “ blood-soul ” ». For Rosenberg, the anti-intellectual intellectual, religious doctrine was inseparable, from serving the interests of the Nordic race, connecting the individual to his racial nature.

Rosenberg stated that :

« The general ideas of the Roman and of the Protestant churches are negative Christianity and do not, therefore, accord with our (German) soul. »

His support for Martin Luther as a great German figure was always ambivalent.

In January 1934, Hitler had appointed Rosenberg as the cultural and educational leader of the « Reich ». The « Sanctum Officium », in Rome, recommended that Rosenberg's « Myth of the 20th Century » be put on the « Index Librorum Prohibitorum » (list of books forbidden by the Catholic Church) for scorning and rejecting « all dogmas of the Catholic Church, indeed, the very fundamentals of the Christian religion ». During World War II, Rosenberg outlined the future envisioned by the Hitler government for religion in Germany, with a 30 point program for the future of the German churches. Among its articles :

The National « Reich » Church of Germany would claim exclusive control over all churches publication of the Bible would cease crucifixes, Bibles and saints were to be removed from altars.

« Mein Kampf » would be placed on altars as « to the German nation and, therefore, to God the most sacred book »

The Christian Cross would be removed from all churches and replaced with the swastika.

In 1940, Rosenberg was made head of the « Hohe Schule » (literally : « High School » , but the German phrase refers to a College) , the Centre of National-Socialist Ideological and Educational Research, out of which the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) developed for the purpose of looting art and cultural goods. The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » were especially active in Paris in looting art stolen from famous Jewish families such as the Rothschilds and that of Paul Rosenberg. Hermann Göring used the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » to collect art for his own personal gratification. He created a « Special Task Force for Music » (« Sonderstab Musik ») to collect the best musical instruments and scores for use in a University to be built in Hitler's hometown of Linz, Austria. The orders given the « Sonderstab Musik » were to loot all forms of Jewish property in Germany and of those found in any country taken-over by the German army and any musical instruments or scores were to be immediately shipped to Berlin.

Following the invasion of the USSR, Rosenberg was appointed head of the « Reich » Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories (« Reichsministerium für die besetzten Ostgebiete ») . Alfred Meyer served as his deputy and represented him at the Wannsee Conference. Another official of the Ministry, Georg Leibbrandt, also attended the conference, at Rosenberg's request.

Rosenberg had presented Hitler with his plan for the organization of the conquered Eastern territories, suggesting the establishment of new administrative districts, to replace the previously Soviet-controlled territories with new « Reichskommissariats » .

These would be :

« Ostland » (Baltic countries and Belarus) .

Ukraine (Ukraine and nearest territories) .

« Kaukasus » (Caucasus area) .

« Moskau » (Moscow metropolitan area and the rest of nearest Russian European areas) .

Although Rosenberg regarded all the Soviet peoples as sub-humans for their communistic beliefs, such suggestions were intended to encourage certain non-Russian nationalism and to promote German interests for the benefit of future Aryan generations, in accord with geo-political « Lebensraum im Osten » plans. They would provide a buffer against Soviet expansion in preparation for the total eradication of Communism and Bolshevism by decisive pre-emptive military action.

Following these plans, when the « Wehrmacht » forces invaded Soviet-controlled territory, they immediately implemented the 1st of the proposed « Reichskommissariats » of « Ostland » and Ukraine, under the leadership of Hinrich Lohse and Erich Koch, respectively. The organization of these administrative territories led to conflict between Rosenberg and the SS over the treatment of Slavs under German occupation. As Nazi Germany's chief racial theorist, Rosenberg considered Slavs, though lesser than Germans, to be Aryan. Rosenberg often complained to Hitler and Himmler about the treatment of non-Jewish occupied peoples. He proposed creation of buffer satellite States made-out of Greater Finland, Baltica, Ukraine, Caucasus.

In a 1941 conference speaking about the Jewish Question, he said :

« Some 6 million Jews still live in the East, and this question can only be solved by a biological extermination of the whole of Jewry in Europe. The “ Jewish Question ” will only be solved for Germany when the last Jew has left German territory, and for Europe when not a single Jew stands on the European continent as far as the Urals. And to this end, it is necessary to force them beyond the Urals or, otherwise, bring about their eradication. »

He made no complaints about the murders of Jews. At the Nuremberg Trials, he claimed to be ignorant of the Holocaust, despite the fact that Georg Leibbrandt and Alfred Meyer were present at the Wannsee Conference.

Since the invasion of the Soviet Union intended to impose the « New Order » , it was essentially a War of conquest. German propaganda efforts designed to win-over Russian opinion were, at best, patchy and inconsistent. Alfred Rosenberg was one of the few in the Nazi hierarchy who advocated a policy designed to encourage anti-Communist opinion among the population of the occupied territories. His interest, here, was mainly in the non-Russian areas such as the Ukraine and the Baltic States ; however, supporters of the Russian Liberation Army were somewhat able to win him over.

Amongst other things, Rosenberg issued a series of posters announcing the end of the Soviet collective farms (« Kolkhoz ») . He also issued an Agrarian Law, in February 1942, annulling all Soviet legislation on farming, restoring family farms for those willing to collaborate with the occupiers. But de-collectivisation conflicted with the wider demands of War-time food production, and Hermann Göring demanded that the collective farms be retained, save for a change of name. Hitler, himself, denounced the re-distribution of land as « stupid » .

There were numerous German armed forces (« Wehrmacht ») posters asking for assistance in the « Bandenkrieg » , the War against the Soviet partisans, though, once again, German policy had the effect of adding to their problems. Posters for « volunteer » labour, with inscriptions like « Come work with us to shorten the War » , hid the appalling realities faced by Russian workers in Germany. Many people joined the partisans rather than risk being sent to an unknown fate in the West.

Another of Rosenberg's initiatives, the « Free Caucasus » campaign, was rather more successful, attracting various nationalities into the so-called Eastern Legion (« Ostlegionen ») , though, in the end, this made little difference in the outcome of the War on the Eastern Front.

Rosenberg was captured by Allied troops, at the end of the War, in Flensburg-Mürwik. He was tried at Nuremberg and found guilty of all 4 counts : conspiracy to commit crimes against peace ; planning, initiating and waging wars of aggression ; War crimes ; and crimes against humanity. The final judgment against him named him one of the principal planners of the invasions of Norway and the Soviet Union. It also held him directly responsible for the systematic plunder of the occupied countries of Europe, as well as the brutal conditions in Eastern Europe. During his trial, he wrote his memoirs, which were published posthumously and with analytical commentary by Serge Lang and Ernst von Schenk.

He was sentenced to death and executed with other condemned co-defendants at Nuremberg, on the morning of 16 October 1946. His body, as those of the other 9 executed men and the corpse of Hermann Göring, was cremated at the « Ostfriedhof » , in Munich, and the ashes were scattered in the river Isar.

Throughout the trial, it was agreed that Rosenberg had a decisive role in shaping Nazi philosophy and ideology. Examples include : his book, « Myth of the 20th Century » , which was published in 1930, where he incited hatred against « Liberal Imperialism » and « Bolshevik Marxism » ; furthering the influence of the « Lebensraum » idea in Germany during the War ; facilitating the persecution of Christian churches and the Jews, in particular ; and opposition to the Versailles Treaty.

According to Joseph Kingsbury-Smith, who covered the executions for the International News Service, Rosenberg was the only condemned man who, when asked at the gallows if he had any last statement to make, replied with only one word : « No » .

Adolf Hitler was a leader oriented towards practical politics, whereas, for Rosenberg, religion and philosophy were key and culturally he was the most influential within the Party. Several accounts of the time, before the Nazi ascension to power, indeed, speak of Hitler as being a mouthpiece for Rosenberg's views, and he clearly exerted a great deal of intellectual influence.

Rosenberg's influence in the Nazi Party is controversial. He was perceived as lacking the charisma and political skills of the other Nazi leaders, and was somewhat isolated. In some of his speeches, Hitler appeared to be close to Rosenberg's views : rejecting traditional Christianity as a religion based on Jewish culture, preferring an ethnically and culturally pure « Race » whose destiny was supposed to be assigned to the German people by « Providence » . In others, he adhered to the Nazi Party line, which advocated a « positive Christianity » .

After Hitler's assumption of power, he moved to re-assure the Protestant and Catholic churches that the Party was not intending to re-institute Germanic paganism. He placed himself in the position of being the man to save « positive Christianity » from utter-destruction at the hands of the atheistic antitheist Communists of the Soviet Union. This was especially true immediately before and after the elections of 1932 ; Hitler wanted to appear non-threatening to major Christian faiths and consolidate his power. Further, Hitler felt that Catholic-Protestant in-fighting had been a major factor in weakening the German State and allowing its dominance by foreign powers.

Some Nazi leaders, such as Martin Bormann, were anti-Christian and sympathetic to Rosenberg. Once in power, Hitler and most Nazi leaders sought to unify the Christian denominations in favour of « positive Christianity ». Hitler privately condemned mystical and pseudo-religious interests as « nonsense ». However, he and Goebbels agreed that, after the « Endsieg » (Final Victory) , the « Reich » Church should be pressed into evolving into a German social evolutionist organization proclaiming the cult of race, blood and battle, instead of Redemption and the 10 Commandments of Moses, which they deemed outdated and Jewish.

Heinrich Himmler's views were among the closest to Rosenberg's, and their estrangement was, perhaps, created by Himmler's abilities to put into action what Rosenberg had only written. Also, while Rosenberg thought Christianity should be allowed to die-out, Himmler actively set-out to create countering pagan rituals.

Lieutenant Colonel William Harold Dunn (1898-1955) wrote a medical and psychiatric report on him in prison to evaluate him as a suicide risk :

« He gave the impression of clinging to his own theories in a fanatical and unyielding fashion and to have been little influenced by the unfolding during the trial of the cruelty and crimes of the Party. »

Summarizing the unresolved conflict between the personal views of Rosenberg and the pragmatism of the Nazi elite :

« The ruthless pursuit of Nazi aims turned-out to mean not, as Rosenberg had hoped, the permeation of German life with the new ideology ; it meant concentration of the combined resources of Party and State on “ Total War ”. »

Rosenberg was married twice : in 1915 to Hilda Leesmann, an ethnic Estonian (divorced in 1923) ; and, in 1925, to Hedwig Kramer with whom he was married until his execution. He and Kramer had 2 children : a son who died in infancy and a daughter, Irene, who was born in 1930. His daughter has refused contact with anyone seeking information about her father.

Nazism was not an intellectual movement : it courted the masses rather than the intelligentsia, film was its favourite form of propaganda, and it relied on dramatic spectacles and performances rather than appeals to rationality. Famed for book-burning rather than book-writing, the Nazi Party did, however, rely on a few texts to consolidate and spread its vision. Some examples are Adolf Hitler's « Mein Kampf » (My Struggle) , written while he was in prison, in 1925, and Houston Stewart Chamberlain's « Die Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The Foundations of the 19th Century, in 1899) . Another was Alfred Rosenberg's « Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts » (The Myth of the 20th Century, in 1934) , which argued for the supremacy of the « Aryan » race and the threat posed by the Jew. During his involvement with the Party, Rosenberg was embroiled in countless official intrigues and back-stabbing, and his struggle for power with Josef Gœbbels remains one of the most carefully analyzed conflicts between upper-level Nazi officials. As the head of the « Reich » Ministry for the Occupied Eastern Territories, he was involved in the formulation of Nazi policy in the East. Perhaps less well-known is his central role in Nazi Germany's musical history.

The child of Baltic Germans, Alfred Rosenberg was born on 12 January 1893 in Estonia. As an ethnic German who later returned « home » to Germany, Rosenberg fashioned himself as a representative of the « völkisch » (folk) movement, which focused on blood and race as defining attributes of identity. Like many Germans, he blamed the Jews for Germany's defeat in World War I, as well as for the Russian Revolution, and perceived them as being a major threat to the strength of the « Aryan » race.

Seeking involvement in various radical Right and anti-Semitic organizations, Rosenberg was an editor of the newspaper « Völkische Beobachter », one of the Nazi Party's most important mouthpieces. He came into contact with Adolf Hitler as early as 1919, recognizing in him a leader who would strengthen Germany. Hitler, in turn, saw in Rosenberg a passionate and loyal follower, who had neither the charisma nor the vision to threaten his leadership.

In 1929, Rosenberg founded the « Kampfbund für Deutsche Kultur » (Combat League for German Culture, or KfdK) , one of the most active early Nazi organizations. With the goal of strengthening « suppressed » Aryan artists and eliminating « degenerate » ones, the « Kampfbund für Deutsche Kultur » published inflammatory brochures and reviews of Jewish and modernist musicians, funded like-minded artists, and pursued practices of disrupting concerts, threatening undesirable performers and intimidating audiences.

Following his success with the « Kampfbund », Rosenberg worked on « Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts ». The book cast the history of the world as an eternal struggle between « Aryans » and Jews, Africans and other « inferior » peoples. Although criticized by some for being overly theoretical and abstract, it was a best-seller. Given the success of his book and the substantial impact of the « Kampfbund », Rosenberg expected to take control of cultural affairs when Hitler came to power. He was sorely disappointed, however, when Gœbbels was appointed « Reich » Minister of Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda. Rosenberg also saw competition in Hermann Göring, who controlled the Theatre scene ; Bernhard Rust, a music fan and the Minister of Education ; and Robert Ley, leader of the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront », which controlled the « Deutsche Musikerverband », the largest professional musicians' union in Germany.

Rosenberg's conflict with Gœbbels continued for years, strategically nurtured by Hitler, who frequently exploited such rivalries to his own benefit. The struggle extended into competition between overlapping offices and assignments. At Gœbbels' request, Hitler created a « Reichskulturkammer » (« Reich » Cultural Chamber, or RKK) , in September 1933, which included a branch responsible for music (« Reichsmusikkammer », or RMK). Around the same time, Robert Ley created the « Kraft durch Freude » (Strength through Joy, or KdF) movement, which was largely a cultural organization. Rosenberg perceived these new organizations as a direct attack on his authority and, indeed, his « Kampfbund » was soon absorbed into Ley's organization.

He was later declared Commissioner for the Entire Intellectual and Ideological Training and Education of the Party, but this lengthy title did not bring with it a substantial amount of power. His office had its impact mostly on the German music world. Rosenberg's organization actively encouraged the involvement of German musicologists in Nazi activities and the expansion of the « Reich ». His office was an important source of funding for musicological research on the subject of race. He also created a special « task force » for music (« Sonderstab Musik ») that was responsible for plundering the musical treasures of deported and murdered Jewish communities, as well as those of occupied lands.

After the invasion of the Soviet Union, in 1941, Rosenberg acquired the new position of « Reich » Minister of the Occupied Eastern Territories. It was his War-time activities that were central to his judgment at the Nuremberg Trials, where he was found guilty of crimes against humanity and executed alongside other high-ranking Nazi officials.

« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg »

L'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » a effectué, à partir de 1940, d'importantes confiscations de biens appartenant à des Juifs et des Franc-maçons dans les territoires occupés par la « Wehrmacht ».

Par un ordre du « Führer » du 5 juillet 1940, Adolf Hitler autorise l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » à confisquer :

Les bibliothèques d'État et les archives des manuscrits précieux pour l'Allemagne.

Les greffes des autorités ecclésiastiques et des loges maçonniques.

Tous les autres biens culturels de valeur appartenant à des Juifs.

En juillet 1940, l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » a été mis en place à Paris. L'administration centrale a toutefois été transférée à Berlin, le 1er mars 1941. D'avril 1941 à juillet 1944, 29 convois ont transporté des biens saisis de Paris jusqu'au château de Neuschwanstein, en Allemagne, où l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » avait constitué son principal lieu d'entreposage. Jusqu'au 17 octobre 1944, selon l'estimation de l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » elle-même, 1,418,000 wagons de chemin de fer contenant des livres et des œuvres d'art (ainsi que 427,000 tonnes par bateau) ont ainsi transité vers l'Allemagne.

Instauré à Paris, en juillet 1940, il est dirigé par le baron Kurt von Behr (1890-1945) assisté de Bruno Lohse (1911-2007). Des objets d'art ont été confisqués dans plus de 50 lieux différents et exposés lors de 7 expositions au « Jeu de Paume », surtout dans le but de montrer à Alfred Rosenberg et Hermann Göring, avec lequel l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » collabore étroitement à Paris, une vue d'ensemble des objets précieux confisqués. Les bibliothèques ayant fait l'objet de saisies, dont la « Bibliothèque polonaise », la « Bibliothèque Turgenjev » et les bibliothèques de nombreuses loges parisiennes devaient alimenter la bibliothèque centre de l'École supérieure. Mi-1941, le travail de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » en France était pratiquement achevé. Selon le rapport de travail, 203 collectes avaient concerné 21,903 objets. Rose Valland, attachée de conservation au « Jeu de Paume », a fait l'inventaire détaillé des œuvres transférées, et de leur déplacement de 1940 à 1944.

L' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » a créé de nombreuses antennes en Europe de l'Est. Elle était en concurrence avec d'autres institutions nazies, notamment le « Sonderkommando » Künsberg et la Communauté de recherche et d'enseignement « Ahnenerbe » sous la tutelle de Heinrich Himmler. Les 3 organisations s'occupaient en collaboration avec la « Wehrmacht » et la SS de détecter, de classer et d'évacuer (ou de détruire) des œuvres d'art et des archives.

Berlin

Le Bureau central de Berlin, sous la direction de Georg Ebert (jusqu'en 1941) et, plus tard, de Gerhard Utikal, se divisait en 3 sections :

Département III : Missions spéciales.

Département IIIa : Organisation de la mise en sécurité des biens juifs

Département IIIb : Gestion commerciale pour l'équipe des arts figuratifs.

Équipes spécialisées de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » en France

Sous la direction de Gerhard Utikal, des docteurs Gerhard Wunder et Karl Brethauer, de Franz Seiboth et de l'inspecteur Hans Hagemeyer, 5 équipes spéciales coordonnaient l'activité de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » à Paris :

Équipe musique (Docteur Herbert Gerigk) .

Équipe arts figuratifs (Kurt von Behr, Robert Scholz) .

Équipe bibliothèques des grandes écoles (Docteur Walter Grothe) .

Équipe préhistoire (Professeur Hans Reinerth) .

Équipe églises (Anton Deinert) .

L' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » avait des représentations à Amsterdam, Bruxelles, Belgrade, Riga, Reval, Vilnius, Dorpat, Minsk, Horki, Smolensk, Kiev, Kharkov, Dniepropetrovsk, Simferopol et Hohenschwangau.

The « Reichsleiter » Rosenberg Task-force (« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , or ERR) was a Nazi Party organization dedicated to appropriating cultural property during the Second World War. It was led by the chief-ideologue of the Nazi Party, Alfred Rosenberg, from within the NSDAP Office of Foreign Affairs (« Außenpolitischen Amt der NSDAP » , or APA) . Between 1940 and 1945, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » operated in France, the Benelux countries, Poland, the Baltic States, Greece, Italy and on the territory of the Soviet Union in the « Reichskommissariat Ostland » and « Reichskommissariat Ukraine » . Much of the looted material was recovered by the Allies after the War, and returned to rightful owners, but there remains a substantial part which either has been lost or remains with the Allied powers.

The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » was initially a project of the « Hohe Schule der NSDAP » , a Nazi-oriented elite university, which was subordinate to Alfred Rosenberg. Rosenberg wanted it to be a research institute filled with cultural material on the opponents of the Nazi ideology. These included Jewish, Masonic, Communist and Democratic organizations from throughout Germany and from the occupied countries. Plans to build monumental buildings for the University on the shores of Lake Chiemsee failed to materialize after the outbreak of World War II.

Shortly after the occupation of France, the staff of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » joined the SS in the search for books, archival material, and huge stocks of artifacts that were in the possession of people of Jewish descent. Soon after, the German Embassy in Paris and « SS-Einsatzgruppen » also began to steal the most valuable paintings from prominent national museums, galleries, and non-Jewish private collections. Rosenberg and his organization wanted to be involved in these art-raids. He was able to get full authority from Hitler to be the only official art procurement organization acting in the occupied countries. For this reason, in a « Führer » Directive of 5 July 1940, Adolf Hitler authorized the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » to confiscate :

Precious manuscripts and books from national libraries and archives.

Important artifacts of ecclesiastical authorities and Masonic lodges.

All valuable cultural property belonging to Jews.

The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » was officially established in « Office West » in Paris and was divided into different functional departments. The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » central administration was transferred to Berlin, on 1 March 1941, where it became formal subdivision of the German Foreign Office.

The Nazis were so eager to acquire valuable Masterpieces that art theft became the most important field of work of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » . In addition to art, many libraries were looted for the Institute for the Study of the « Jewish Question » , in Frankfurt, but especially for the library of the « Hohe Schule » . The operations staff had 8 main regional task-forces and 5 technical task-forces (music, visual arts, history, libraries, churches) . Raids connected with the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » also plundered the belongings of people deported to Nazi concentration camps. Between April 1941 to July 1944, 29 convoys transported goods seized from Paris to Neuschwanstein Castle, in Germany, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » 's principal place of storage. Until 17 October 1944, as estimated by the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » itself, 1,418,000 railway wagons containing books and works of art (as well as 427,000 tonnes by ship) were transitioned to Germany.

Belarus

« More than 200 libraries of Belarus, especially the State (now, National) library, suffered irreparable damage during the occupation. An associate of the national library, T. Roshchina, calculated that 83 % of the library's collection was plundered and destroyed. After the War, some 600,000 volumes from the library were found in Germany, Poland and Czechoslovakia, and were subsequently returned. About 1 million books, however, including rare and old printed volumes, have still not been located. »

« Day-by-day, for 26 months, the Hitlerites systematically destroyed one of the most ancient Russian cities, Smolensk. The Soviet Prosecution has presented to the Tribunal a document as Document Number USSR-56, containing the report of the Extraordinary State Commission of the Soviet Union. I shall not quote this document ; but I shall only refer to it and endeavor, in my own words, to emphasize the fundamental points of this document, dealing with the reported theme now. In Smolensk, the German Fascist invaders plundered and destroyed the most valuable collections in the museums. They desecrated and burned-down ancient monuments ; they destroyed schools and institutes, libraries, and sanatoriums. The report also mentions the fact that, in April 1943, the Germans needed rubble to pave the roads. For this purpose, they blew-up the intermediate school. The Germans burned-down all the libraries of the city and 22 schools ; 646,000 volumes perished in the library fires. »

Belgium

By the middle of 1941, most of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » work in Belgium concentrated on small collections in Jewish homes. Larger operations involved the Jesuit convent, in Enghien, involved removing 200 crates of books and archives, and looting the « École des Hautes-Études » , in Ghent, which involved transporting 56 crates of books.

« Both institutions were considered outposts of French culture on Flemish soil and unfriendly to Nazism. »

The Jesuit collection was considered a treasure trove of information on the politics of Catholicism in Belgium, and of Catholic procedures to thwart the Germans. The Jesuit College in Leuven and the regional office in Brussels, for example, acted as a refuge for library materials.

« Libraries and archives seen as enemy and international were confiscated outright by the “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ”, as indicated by the following 3 examples. The contents of the Communist book-shop OBLA, Brussels, were sent to Racibórz, Poland. The records of the International Federation for Housing and Town Planning were confiscated and brought to Germany. A similar fate overtook the archives and library of the international Jesuit College at Enghien, which was called a “ Zentrale der anti-Deutschland speziell anti-National-Sozialistischen Information ” (Center for anti-German and anti-National Socialist Information) . »

Czechoslovakia

« The 700,000 volumes of the Charles University Library, in Prague, were stolen as a unit. »

A library was created in the Theresienstadt ghetto, about 40 miles from Prague. Books were brought in by many of the people deported to this camp as part of their personal possessions, but also books from the collections of the Rabbinical Seminary Libraries of Berlin and Breslau, and the Jewish communities of Berlin and Vienna were also shipped there as well. Part of the German effort also included having the prisoners translate and catalog many Hebrew books, to be added to the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » « Museum of the Extinct Race » envisioned by Alfred Rosenberg. Almost 30,000 Hebrew and Judaica volumes had catalog cards created by the ghetto inmates.

In 1935, there were 17,148 public, school and university libraries in Czechoslovakia, having a book stock of 8,528,744 volumes. Many of these items were confiscated by the Germans, especially any Czech books dealing with geography, biography or history. Works by any Czech writers were taken away, many burned, most others taken directly to the paper pulp mills. Special libraries were devastated, and suffered a loss of about 2,000,000 volumes.

France

Georg Ebert, who was a member of Rosenberg's « Aussenpolitisches Amt » (NSDAP Bureau for Foreign Affairs, also referred to as the APA) , discovered that a Masonic lodge, the Grand Orient, had been abandoned in Paris. This was one of the most important Masonic lodges in Europe. Ebert personally guarded the building, with its library collection and archives, until he could turn it over to the army. This was one point in the origin of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , which eventually developed into a central headquarters in Berlin, with subsidiary offices (« Hauptarbeitsgruppen » : Main Work Groups) in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels, Belgrade, Riga and other cities.

« In January 1940, Hitler gave Rosenberg his task : to loot Jewish and Masonic cultural treasures, including synagogues, libraries, and archives in western Europe. By fall 1940, Hitler ordered Rosenberg to confiscate all Jewish art-collections since these materials were now deemed “ ownerless ” by Nazi decree. Jews in France, as in most of Europe, were now labeled “ Stateless ” and no longer had property rights. With France part of the German-occupied territories, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » and Alfred Rosenberg now fell under Hermann Göring's authority and control, with the « Gestapo » seeking-out Jewish houses, apartments, and shops in the hopes of finding valuable pieces. »

« Alfred Rosenberg reported to Dolf Hitler that his “ Einsatzstab ” had commenced confiscations in Paris, by October 1940, with the assistance of the “ Service de la Sûreté ” (SD) and the “ Police Secrète Militaire ” (“ Geheime Feldpolizei ”) . »

The « Sonderstab Bildende Kunst » (Special Arts Staff) , a section of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , confiscated numerous Jewish art-collections, often of international renown (for instance, the Rothschild collection) . In the Netherlands, this « Sonderstab » did not seize much more than about 1,000 works of art. The « Sonderstab Musik, Kirchen, Osten, Bibliothekenaufbau der Hohen Schule und Rassenpolititische Fragen » (Special Staffs for Music, Churches, the East, the High-School Library and Race-political Questions) each fought for its own corner. By 1942, no fewer than 3,500 collections, libraries and archives had been « secured » by the « Hauptarbeitsgruppe Frankreich » (Main Working Group, France) of the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » - France having been divided into 5 Districts. The libraries of the « Alliance Israélite Universelle » (AIU) and the French Rabbinical Seminary (SIF) were high on the list of German locations to loot. The « Alliance Israélite Universelle » had built a new library in 1937, including an 8 story high tower and reading-room, and boasting of 50,000 books. By March 1940, 647 crates of books had been removed from the « Alliance Israélite Universelle », and 243 crates of books from the French Rabbinical Seminary. A list by the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg », dated March 1941, indicated that 81 libraries had been looted in Paris alone, and a later supplemental list included another 30 libraries of Jewish, Masonic, Socialist and « émigré » collections had been seized.

« These albums were created by the staff of the 3d “ Reich ” ’s “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ” (ERR) . This special unit was organized in the summer of 1940 under “ Reich ” Leader Alfred Rosenberg, initially to collect political material in occupied countries for exploitation in the “ struggle against Jewry and Freemasonry ”. »

The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » established its base of operations in Paris, in July 1940, and, on November 5, Hermann Göring assigned the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » the responsibility for the confiscation of « ownerless » Jewish art-collections. On November 18 of that year, Adolf Hitler ordered that all confiscated works of art be brought to Germany and placed at his personal disposal.

Pre-War Paris was the world's largest and most important art-market. This was where well-off French, European and American collectors bought and sold their best pieces. From the beginning of the 20th Century, Jewish « marchands d'art » had established themselves as the best art-dealers and experts, resultantly shaping and influencing global taste. Dealers included : the Wildensteins, where Georges Wildenstein dealt in Old Masters ; the Bernheim-Jeunes who specialized in Impressionists and post-Impressionists painters (in 1901, it had opened the 1st Van Gogh show) ; and Paul Rosenberg, the contracted dealer of Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque.

During the next several years, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » would be engaged in an extensive and elaborate art-looting operation in France that was part of Hitler's much larger premeditated scheme to steal art-treasures from conquered nations. Soon after the German occupation of France, in 1940, the German military and, subsequently, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg », focused their art-confiscations on the world-renowned Jewish-owned art-collections from families such as the Rothschilds, and the Veil-Picards, Alphonse Kann, and Jewish dealers such as the Seligmanns. According to the German « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » documents from 1944, the art-seizures in France totaled 21,903 objects from 203 collections. There were 5,009 items confiscated from the Rothschild family collections ; 2,687 items from the David-Weill collection ; and 1,202 from Alphonse Kann's collection. French officials, at the end of the War, estimated that 1/3 of all art in French private hands had been confiscated.

All looted and confiscated artworks were initially shipped by truck to the « Galerie nationale du Jeu de Paume », where Nazi art-historians, experts, photographers, maintenance and administrative personnel appraised, filed, photographed and packed the now decreed « ownerless cultural goods » for transport to Germany. The 1st shipment artworks sent to Germany from Paris required 30 rail-cars and consisted primarily of Rothschild paintings intended for the « Führermuseum » (European Museum of Art) in Linz, Austria. Among the 1st 53 paintings shipped to Adolf Hitler was Vermeer's « Astronome » from the Édouard de Rothschild collection, today in the « Musée du Louvre » in Paris. As the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » staff looted and catalogued the French collections, they created photograph albums specifically intended for the « Reichskanzlei » (« Reich » Chancellery) and Hitler in an effort to keep them apprised of their work in France, and more importantly, to provide a catalogue of items from which Hitler and his curators could choose art treasures for « Führermuseum » . A group of these photograph albums were presented to Hitler on the occasion of his birthday, on April 20, 1943, by Alfred Rosenberg to « send a ray of beauty and joy into his revered life » . « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » staff stated that nearly 100 such volumes were created during the years of their art-looting operation.

« The latest advices from authentic neutral sources said that the “ Gestapo ” had seized the libraries of all the Masonic organizations in France. The “ Bibliothèque Nationale ” (the French National Library) there upon put in a claim for these books, but the latest word was that the Germans declined to hand over them over, saying the material would be sent to Germany for purposes of study. The library of the “ Alliance Israélite ” in Paris, worth several million Francs, also was said to have been seized and sent to Germany. From the “ Bibliothèque Nationale ” (one of the world’s leading libraries) , the Germans were reported to have received an inventory of manuscripts, rare books and similar material that had been stored elsewhere in France for security during the War. German officials, according to the information received here, have been exercising close supervision over the French publishing industry. They have also taken-over the “ Maison du Livre Français ”, the most important French book exporting agency. »

So-called « degenerate art » was legally banned by the Nazis from entering Germany, and so, once designated, was held in what was called the « Martyr's Room » at the « Jeu de Paume » . Much of Paul Rosenberg's professional dealership and personal collection were so subsequently designated by the Nazis. Following Josef Goebbels earlier private decree to sell these « degenerate » works for foreign currency to fund the building of the « Führermuseum » and the wider War effort, Hermann Göring personally appointed a series of « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » approved dealers to liquidate these assets and, then, pass the funds to swell his personal art-collection, including Hildebrand Gurlitt. With the looted « degenerate art » sold onwards via Switzerland, Rosenberg's collection was scattered across Europe. Today, some 70 of his paintings are missing, including : the large Picasso watercolour « Naked Woman on the Beach » , painted in Provence in 1923 ; 7 works by Henri Matisse ; and the « Portrait of Gabrielle Diot » by Edgar Degas.

After the War, many of the books hidden by the Germans were collected by the Monuments, Fine-Arts and Archives section of the American military government, and collected at the Offenbach Depot. There, many of the larger collections were identified and eventually returned to their owners.

By the end of 1948 :

« The French regained the archives of the Paris bank of “ Rothschild Frères ” ; the Libschutz “ Librairie de Paris ” ; the library of the “ Alliance Israélite Universelle de Paris ” ; the library of the “ École Rabbiniqque de Paris ” ; and the “ Bibliothèque de Chinon ”. »

Greece

Greece was also visited by the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » after the country's fall, in April 1941. A special unit headed by Doctor Johannes Pohl, chief of the Hebraica collection at the Frankfurt Institute's library, appeared in Salonica, where he had the Alfred Rosenberg agents seal the yeshiva collections, in which the city abounded. However, members of the community were able to hide or disguise many of the collections from the Germans. A later visit, in September 1942, by a scholar named Mærtsch, likewise resulted in no new additions to the Frankfurt library. However, a 1943 report does show that 10,000 volumes had been received from Greece.

Before the War, Greece was rich in libraries. The National Library, which included the Public and University libraries in Athens, contained more than 400,000 volumes.

« Reports reaching American authorities, in Cairo, have told of the pillaging of libraries, laboratories and work-shops of the Universities of Athens and Salonika. A large part of the University of Athens library is reported to be lost. The libraries of 3 American Colleges were reported to have been used as fuel in the central heating system used by the Germans. »

Italy

« The “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ” were also active in the West. After the German occupations of Rome, in 1943, “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ” officers inspected the contents of the Roman Synagogue's 2 great libraries, which contained extraordinary collections gathered over the 2,000 year history of Jewish life, in Rome. They demanded the libraries' catalogs ; just days before the 1st deportation of Roman Jews to Auschwitz, 2 specially ordered rail-cars destined for Alfred Rosenberg's institute in Frankfurt were loaded with 10,000 books from these libraries. »

« 2 archaeological libraries, the Hertziana Library of History and Art, and the German Archaeological Institute's library of the history, topography, art and customs of ancient Rome, were removed from Rome and taken to Germany by the Nazis. At the end of the War, the 2 library collections were discovered in 2 Austrian salt mines, packed away in 1,985 wooden cases. The German Library's collection was unharmed, but some of the Hertziana collection and the card catalog were damaged by water when part of the mine flooded. They were returned to Rome, where they became part of the Gallery of Modern Art, where both collections will be in the care of the new International Union for the study of Archaeology, Art and History in Rome. »

After the War, many of the major collections looted from Italy were identified by the Monuments, Fine-Arts and Archives service of the American military government and returned to their owners. The « Collegio Rabbinico Italiano » , the « Kunsthistorische Institut Florenz » , and the « Deutsche Historische Bibliothek Rom » were all returned, although not all were intact, to their owners in Italy.

« These last 2 collections were seized by Hitler with the idea of re-establishing them in Germany. »

Lithuania

In Vilna (Vilnius, Vilno, Wilno) , the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » set-up a collecting point for Lithuania. Doctor

Gotthard of the Berlin headquarters arrived in August 1941, and began looting the Strashun library. He conscripted the labor of 2 « Gestapo » prisoners, including A.Y. Goldschmidt, librarian of the Hispanic-Ethnographic Society. Eventually, he committed suicide rather than assist the looting of the libraries. Doctor Johannes Pohl appeared in January 1942, and ordered that the city be made a collecting point for the region, and concentrated at the « Yidisher Visenshaftlikker Institut » (Institute for Jewish Research) . Materials were brought-in from the private collections from Kovno, Shavle, Mariapol, Volozhn and other towns, and included books from over 300 synagogues and personal libraries. Some of the Jewish workers were able to smuggle-out and hide some of the most valuable books in the ghetto, which was stopped when the ghetto was liquidated in July 1943. The accumulated collection of over 100,000 volumes were separated into piles by Century of publication, and about 20,000 were selected for shipment to Germany. The remaining materials were pulped to avoid storage and transportation costs, and to make a small profit. One incident involved an assistant of Doctor Pohl dumping-out 5 cases of rare books, in order to make room for an illegal shipment of hogs.

The Netherlands

« The “ Einsatzstab Reichleiter Rosenberg ” (ERR) , established by Alfred Rosenberg, in 1939, was represented in the Netherlands by an Amsterdam office. In 1940, the “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ” confiscated all property belonging to the Freemasons, among which was the famous “ Biblioteca Klossiana ”. This library had been bought by Prince Hendrik (1876-1934) (Duke Henry of Mecklenburg-Schwerin) , husband of Queen Wilhemina (Wilhelmina of the Netherlands) , and had been presented by him to the order of Freemasons. It contained important “ incunabula ” and books on the occult, which were not available anywhere else in the Netherlands. Other parts of the library and the order’s archive were of importance as well. The library of the International Institute for Social History, in Amsterdam, was closed, and the “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ” took-over the building for its offices. In July 1940, the Institute’s very important collection of newspapers and the library of approximately 160,000 volumes were confiscated. German arguments over their final destination kept the materials in Amsterdam until the winter of 1944, when they were transported to Germany in 11 ships. The International Archives of the Women’s Movement, established in Amsterdam, in 1935, lost its whole collection after the institute was closed by the “ Sicherheitspolizei ” (Security Police) , in June 1940. In August 1942, 499 crates containing books and archives taken from, among others, Jewish antiquarian book-dealers and theosophical Societies were transported to Berlin. »

Most of the looted Jewish property, especially books, was sent to Rosenberg’s « Institut zur Erforschung der Judenfrage » , in Frankfurt. Established in March 1941, the Institute served as the core research library for the planned « Hohe Schule » . Some of the other « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » research institutes that received looted books included the « Institut für Biologie und Rassenlehre » , in Stuttgart, the « Institut für Religionswissenschaft » , and the « Institut für Deutsche Volkskunde » . In the Netherlands, where Seeligmann’s library was looted, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » enjoyed a monopoly on cultural property confiscation, between 1940 and 1944. A particularly large number of books were seized, with an estimated value of 30 to 40 million « Reichsmarks » . However, not all of those books were sent to the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » ’s research institutes. Certain collections, including Seeligmann’s, were sent to other Nazi agencies, such as the « Reich » Security Main-Office (« Reichssicherheitshauptamt » , or RSHA) in Berlin. The « Reichssicherheitshauptamt » was interested specifically in information about those they perceived to be the prime enemies of the « Reich » . Accordingly, the « Reichssicherheitshauptamt » in Berlin received looted library and archival materials relating to « enemies » such as the Jews. The « Reichssicherheitshauptamt » Office 7 (« Amt VII ») , which specialized in ideological research, established a center for the evaluation of looted documents. By August 1943, it contained more than 500,000 catalogued volumes. Most of the Jewish materials collected by « Amt VII » related to Zionist groups, rescue agencies, communities, and cultural organizations. Materials pertaining to Jewish political, economic, cultural, and intellectual leaders were also collected. Seeligmann, who founded the « Genootschap voor Joodsche Wetenschap in Nederland » (Society for the Science of Judaism in the Netherlands) and served as president of the Dutch Zionist Organization, likely would have been of great interest to the « Reichssicherheitshauptamt » . By August 1943, his library became part of the « Amt VII » library and archive center.

Norway

In Norway, there were 150 school libraries and 50 public libraries that were destroyed by the Germans. Most of these libraries were in the province of Finnmark, where there was wide-spread destruction during the evacuation of the German armies. Interestingly enough, the Norwegians did not burn the German propaganda works that had filled their shelves when the original Norwegian books were removed. They will be kept for the study by future generations who will want to study the period of the German occupation.

Poland

« From the very beginning of the establishment of the “ Staatsbibliothek Krakau ”, special importance was given to materials related to the natural sciences, mathematics, geography and medicine. In the fiscal year 1940-1941, the amount of money spent on book purchases was surprisingly high. »

The Germans recognized the value of the scientific collection and, from 1941 through 1944, 35,599 books were borrowed by 2,621 patrons, mostly German civil servants and military personnel. Polish civilians were not allowed access to the library during the occupation. Gustav Abb, the German overseer of libraries, decided to send much of the reference collection to Germany, in 1944.

« Abb decided to send the major part of the reference collection, as well as most of the books bought by the “ Staatsbibliothek ” to Germany (altogether, about 25,000 volumes) . Polish librarians, charged with the task of filling boxes with books, tried to sabotage Abb’s orders. They hid a large number of books and stuffed boxes with old newspapers. Despite those heroic efforts to save the collection, the Germans were still able to send a great number of books to Adelsdorf (Adelin) , in Silesia. Fortunately, after the War, the library was able to recover most of the books that Abb had evacuated from the library. »

Later in the War, the main reading-room was used as sleeping quarters for German soldiers, and other parts of the library were used as a hospital for Germans.

From the « Frankfurter Zeitung » , Wochen-Ausgabe, 28 March 1941 :

« For us, it is a matter of special pride to destroy the Talmudic Academy which has been known as the greatest in Poland. We threw-out of the building the great Talmudic Library and carted it to market. There, we set fire to the books. The fire lasted for 20 hours. The Jews of Lublin were assembled around and cried bitterly. The cries almost silenced us. Then, we summoned a military band, and the joyful shouts of the soldiers silenced the sounds of Jewish cries. »

Soviet Union

Alfred Rosenberg commanded the « Einsatzstab Reichleiter Rosenberg für die Besetzten Gebiete » (ERR) that was responsible for collecting art, books and cultural objects from invaded countries, also returned their captured library collection back to Berlin during the retreat from Soviet Union. The « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » stands for « Einsatzstab Reichleiter Rosenberg für die Besetzten Gebiete » which means the « Reich » Leader Rosenberg Task-Force for Occupied Territories. « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » dispatches note they had to abandon their offices before the removal of the materials on hand could be completed « due to lack of loading spaces » and the fact that German artillery, located in the center of the city (Kiev) , was firing continually over their heads. Still, they managed to send on both their paintings and prehistoric materials, which had come from Kharkov, their own library and office furniture, and the materials collected by the Department of Seizures, amounting to some 10,000 books and nearly a 100 cases of Bolshevik paintings, documents and archives.

In the note of Vyacheslav M. Molotov, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, dated 27 April 1942, presented before the International Military Tribunal, it was recorded that the Germans burned the library of 40,000 volumes belonging to one of the oldest agricultural libraries in the USSR, the Shatilov selection station in the Orel district. Also submitted to the International Military Tribunal was the statement following :

« There was no limit to the desecration of the Hitlerite vandals of the monuments and homes representing Ukrainian history, culture and art. Suffice to mention, as an example of the constant attempts to humiliate the national dignity of the Ukrainian people that, after plundering the Korolenko Library in Kharkov, the occupiers used the books as paving stones for the muddy street in order to facilitate the passage of motor vehicles. »

1941-1944, Soviet Union : As a result of the German invasion, heavy damage was done to Russian libraries. It has been estimated that more than 100 million books have been destroyed, mainly from public libraries.

« At Pskov, 1,026 church books were removed from the “ Kremlin ” (fortress) , including 16th to 18th Century manuscripts and 17th Century printed books. Nearly 35,000 volumes were removed from the Pskov pedagogical institute, including 25,000 works of Russian scholars. At Novgorod, the library of the historical museum which was “ displaced ”, contained rare periodicals such as “ Russkaia rech' ” of 1880 and “ Bibliograf ” of 1860. Books removed included editions of Voltaire, of 1785 ; and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, of 1796. All in all, 35,000 volumes were removed. Unique editions of archaeology, including 51 books on the history of ancient Russia, were removed from the Novgorod library for the German professor Engel. Publications on ethnology were removed for Professor Thiele. The above-mentioned “ Sonderkommando Künsberg ” was active in removing the Czars' libraries from the suburbs of Leningrad ; and the contents of museums and libraries from Rostov and Taganrog. In addition to the “ Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ”, Künsberg's clients were : the main-branch of the “ Reich ” Security Agency ; RSHA (“

Reichssicherheitshauptamt ") ; the geographic service of the ministry of Foreign Affairs ; the State Library ; the Slavic Studies seminar ; and the Hermann Göring economic library. »

Heinrich Himmler sent a secret message to the SS and SD troops in order to ensure their cooperation with the main troops in the total destruction and devastation of the parts of the Ukraine to be evacuated :

« The aim to be achieved is that when the areas in the Ukraine are evacuated, not a human being, not a single head of cattle, not a hundredweight of cereals, and not a railway line remains behind ; that not a house remains standing, not a mine exists that is not ruined for years to come, that there is no well left un-poisoned. The enemy must really find a land completely burnt and destroyed. »

« Sonderstab Musik »

Herbert Gerigk ne se contenta pas de dénoncer les 3 % de Juifs qui corrompaient la vie musicale allemande : muni de sa liste de noms et d'adresses, il devint le grand responsable de la spoliation de leurs biens dans les pays occupés. Dès l'invasion et l'occupation de la France, Alfred Rosenberg avait, en effet, créé une unité appelée ERR (« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg ») en vue de s'emparer des documents et biens ayant appartenu à des ennemis idéologiques de l'Allemagne, notamment les Juifs et les Francs-maçons. Ceci s'étendit très vite aux œuvres d'art, livres, archives, manuscrits. À ces fins, 7 groupes opérationnels appelés « Sandersth » (Équipe spéciale) furent mis sur pied, spécialisés respectivement dans es œuvres d'art, les églises, les bibliothèques, la musique, les pays de l'Est, la préhistoire, les questions racistes. Dans le domaine de la musique, le docteur en musicologie Herbert Gerigk et ses collaborateurs bardés de diplômes du « Sonderstab Musik » devinrent, dès 1940, les pilleurs et receleurs de tous les biens musicaux qui leur tombaient sous la main tant en France qu'en Belgique ou aux Pays-Bas et dans les Pays Baltes, l'Ukraine et la Biélorussie l'année suivante.

Le 1er critère utilisé était apparemment culturel, celui de « bien allemand devant retourner en Allemagne » , permettant par ce biais de s'emparer de manuscrits ou de lettres de musiciens allemands en arguant que ces témoignages de la culture allemande n'auraient jamais dû quitter leur pays d'origine. Les recherches s'appliquaient également aux Conservatoires, maisons d'Opéras, bibliothèques et archives des pays occupés afin d'en dresser dans une 1re phase l'inventaire et d'en réaliser des copies photographiques. Dès le 30 septembre 1940, Gerigk remettait un rapport sur « Les trésors musicaux d'origine allemande en France » dans lequel il mentionnait, entre autres, l'existence de lettres de Richard Wagner à l'éditeur juif Schlesinger et de travaux humiliants (sans doute des transcriptions) imposés à Wagner en 1841-1842 par celui-ci. Aussi recommanda-t-il « d'envoyer aussitôt ces pièces pour éviter tout usage futur qu'on pourrait en faire contre nous » . Entre-temps, le pillage des biens des Juifs battait son plein. En février 1941, le bilan s'élevait déjà à 150 caisses d'instruments et de documents, 30,000 disques, 50,000 livres. Des listes accompagnant ces envois ont été retrouvées par l'historien néerlandais Willem De Vries dans les archives allemandes concernant les biens de musiciens juifs qui avaient quitté la France. La nationalité française ne les protégeait plus à la suite d'une loi du régime de Vichy datant de juillet 1940, qui l'ôtait à toute personne ayant quitté la France, entre le 10 mai et le 30 juin 1940, et confisquait ses biens si elle n'était pas de retour dans les 6 mois. Ceci concernait, de toute évidence, les Juifs dont Vichy voulait soustraire les biens au pillage des Allemands qui n'en tinrent aucun compte. C'est ainsi que, le 20 septembre, Gerigk en personne, avec 15 déménageurs, vida la maison de Wanda Landowska à Saint-Leu-la-Forêt. Au total, 54 caisses furent remplies. On n'oublia rien, ni les savons ni le vin, mais l'essentiel était constitué d'une vingtaine d'instruments dont plusieurs clavecins des XVIIe et XVIIIe siècle, d'un piano que Frédéric Chopin avait acheté à Palma, en vue de son séjour à Valdemosa, et d'une bibliothèque de 10,000 volumes dont des éditions et manuscrits précieux. Alerté par la secrétaire de Wanda Landowska, le gouvernement français protesta, demandant le retour des biens enlevés. Renvoyé d'un service à l'autre, d'une réponse évasive à une autre arrogante, il échoua complètement. Le Docteur Wolfgang Boetticher, musicologue des services d'Alfred Rosenberg, écrivit le 13 janvier 1941 aux autorités françaises que Wanda Landowska était juive et polonaise (parmi les documents saisis se trouvait son ancien passeport polonais mais elle avait acquis la nationalité française) et que les objets avaient été confisqués comme propriété juive abandonnée, conformément aux ordres du « Führer », Adolf Hitler. Pour ces raisons, la démarche française était inacceptable. Dans un autre cas, Boetticher utilisa l'argument que, les Juifs étant des ennemis de l'Allemagne, leurs biens étaient saisis comme biens ennemis, conformément aux règles internationales. Finalement, les caisses envoyées à Berlin furent, par la suite, dispersées entre Leipzig, des châteaux isolés et des monastères comme celui de Raitenhaslach, près de Munich. Une dizaine de caisses seulement et le piano de Chopin purent être récupérés après la Guerre.

Parmi les autres victimes des actions du « Sandersth Musik », il y eut encore Darius Milhaud (6 caisses) ; Gregor Piatigorsky (23 caisses) ; Arthur Rubinstein (toute sa bibliothèque) ; et même Ida Rubinstein qui n'était pas juive.

En 1944, d'autres biens de Darius Milhaud furent saisis à Aix-en-Provence, la ville de son enfance, en particulier, des manuscrits. Le « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » de Herbert Gerigk contenait une description particulièrement haineuse de sa musique « inadéquate et anti-allemande, beaucoup trop jouée en Allemagne avant 1933 », allusion à l'Opéra « Christophe Colomb » qui avait été monté à l'Opéra de Berlin, en 1930, « pour la somme exorbitante de 130,000 “ Deutschmarks ” aux dépens des œuvres des compositeurs allemands ». Jusqu'en 1992, on ne retrouva aucune trace des biens enlevés. Grâce à la reconstitution, en 1988, par le Docteur Albrecht Dümling de l'exposition « “ Entartete Musik ” de Düsseldorf de 1938 », et sa présentation à Nuremberg l'année suivante, un couple de cette ville prêta un manuscrit de Milhaud qu'elle possédait. Sur la base de cette information, Willem De Vries mena une enquête à Nuremberg, en 1992, et obtint finalement que 3 manuscrits soient rendus à Madeleine Milhaud, la veuve du compositeur. Par la même occasion, il découvrit au « Germanisches Nationalmuseum » 2 lettres de Manuel de Falla à Wanda Landowska qui furent rendues, après de longues négociations, au « Landowska Center » de Lakeville, au Connecticut. Ce ne sont là que quelques gouttes d'un océan car l'opération « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » avait été étendue en 1942 à ce que l'on appela pudiquement la « M-Aktion ». « M » voulant dire « Möbel », c'est-à-dire tous les biens mobiliers.

En juin 1944, un total de 68,441 immeubles et appartements juifs avaient été vidés, nécessitant 669 convois et le chargement de 26,769 wagons. Des milliers de pianos furent saisis et l'on créa, à Paris, un grand atelier pour leur vérification et leur remise en état à raison de quelque 200 pianos par mois. Une liste de l'un des convois mentionne 67 caisses de harpes ! Ce qui devait initialement « mettre à l'abri » les biens culturels des Juifs ou d'origine allemande se termina par un complet désastre. Jusqu'à la fin de 1944, toute l'équipe des professeurs-docteurs continua son travail comme si la victoire allemande restait certaine et permettrait de réaliser les 2 projets mégalomaniacs du gigantesque Musée des Arts de Linz, ville natale du « Führer », et de l'immense « Hohe Schule » (Collège), conçue en 1938, comme « institution suprême de la recherche nationale-socialiste » et « centre d'éducation spirituelle et d'inspiration pour tout le peuple allemand ». Si le siège de cette « Hohe Schule » ne dépassa pas la maquette d'un projet babylonien, une Ire section fut cependant inaugurée le 26 mars 1941, à Francfort, l'« Institut zur Erforschung der Judenfrage » (Institut de recherche sur le problème juif). C'est là que devaient aboutir les collections Rothschild, Lipschutz, David Weill et Calmann-Lévy ainsi que celles de l'alliance israélite et de l'école rabbinique confisquées à Paris (plus de 200,000 livres). Les instruments de musique anciens devaient aller à Linz, les lettres et manuscrits dans de grandes bibliothèques existantes ou à créer. En attendant, tout fut d'abord envoyé à Berlin ; le flux se révéla tellement important que l'on dut multiplier les entrepôts de passage à Paris, Amsterdam et Bruxelles ainsi que les locaux de stockage et Berlin. Lorsque les bombardements de Berlin s'intensifièrent, endommageant plusieurs entrepôts, les déménagements se succédèrent et, finalement, l'évacuation en direction de l'Est fut décidée durant l'été 1943, notamment à Ratibor et Pless, en Silésie, comme si l'on ignorait que, depuis 6 mois, l'armée allemande battait en retraite vers l'Ouest, talonnée par l'Armée Rouge. Une pagaille générale s'installa : les caisses furent dispersées, les documents perdus, sans parler des destructions causées par les bombardements. Au début de 1945, on décida d'évacuer la Silésie et les caisses repartirent vers l'Ouest dans un désordre accru. Beaucoup furent rattrapées par l'Armée Rouge et disparurent vers l'Est où l'on commence seulement aujourd'hui à en retrouver des bribes et morceaux. Ainsi s'achevaient les méfaits de ce bataillon de musicologues dont le zèle fanatique dépassa tout ce que l'on peut imaginer : à la fin de juillet 1944, à quelques semaines de la libération de Paris, 46 pianos et 280 caisses étaient encore prêts à l'envoi.

La Guerre terminée, quelques années de silence et une dénazification laxiste, rapide et bâclée, permirent à la plupart des noms de refaire rapidement surface. Il fallut, en revanche, de nombreuses décennies pour que la mémoire reprenne ses droits sur l'oubli, la vérité sur la duplicité, la justice sur la spoliation.

Wanda Landowska (1879-1959) pianiste et claveciniste d'origine polonaise et juive arriva à Paris, en 1900, et s'installa dans les environs à Saint-Leu-la-Forêt, en 1925. Au-delà de ses interprétations célèbres de la musique des 17e et 18e siècles, Wanda est surtout renommée pour son rôle dans la remise au goût du jour des compositions pour clavecin sans oublier la création avec la firme Pleyel d'instruments rénovés. « L'École de Musique Ancienne » qu'elle fonda à Saint-Leu-la-Forêt fut rapidement réputée dans le monde entier. Elle rassembla une large collection d'instruments anciens ainsi qu'une bibliothèque de plus de 10,000 ouvrages ; la grande majorité d'entre eux traitant de musique.

Le 10 juin 1940, face à l'avance de troupes nazies, elle fuit vers la zone-sud accompagnée par son assistante Denise Restout. Elle abandonne alors la quasi-totalité de ses biens (lettre à Denise Restout, du 24 octobre 1992). Après une étape à Banyuls-sur-mer (chez Maillol), elles embarquent toutes les 2 vers les États Unis. Elles s'installent d'abord à New-York puis à Lakeville dans l'État du Connecticut.

Enregistrée comme musicienne juive dans le « Lexikon der Juden in Musik », il est alors évident que Herbert Gerigk, conseiller musical de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) à Berlin, ne pouvait ignorer l'existence de sa collection d'instruments. Ceux-ci étaient parfaits pour enrichir la future collection de la « Hohe Schule » (Collège) .

La propriété de Wanda Landowska était probablement l'une des cibles visées par le « Sonderstab Musik » . Vers le 20 septembre 1940 (3 jours seulement après l'ordre du « Führer » , du 17 septembre, s'appuyant sur une loi du régime de Vichy intimant de prendre possession de toute propriété artistique française appartenant à une personne juive afin de les répertorier) , Gerigk arrive avec une équipe d'une quinzaine de manutentionnaires expérimentés appartenant à la société de transport TAM (AMT) afin de vider la maison du 88 de la rue du Pontoise, à Saint-Leu-la-Forêt. Le processus de démontage et d'emballage ne demanda pas plus de 2 semaines.

Le 29 septembre, la plupart des 54 caisses préparées étaient déjà en attente de départ. Avec l'accord de l'administration militaire allemande en France (« Militärverwaltung des Militärbefehlshaben in Frankreich » , ou MVF) , elles furent transférées en attente de décision dans une aile du Musée du Louvre. Le jour de son départ pour Berlin, Gerigk donna des instructions impératives à sa secrétaire Kuhn et à son assistant Busse de ne remettre le matériel à personne. Cependant, le « SS-Sturmbahnführer » Heil appartenant à l' « Organization Todt » (Fritz Todt) prit l'initiative de faire transporter les caisses à Berlin, par camion, le 7 octobre. À son retour le 10 octobre, Gerigk ne cacha pas son mécontentement lorsqu'il apprit cet événement et s'étonna vivement dans un mémo daté du 15 octobre qu'un autre service ait pu prendre une telle décision de manière unilatérale.

Heil avait visiblement outrepassé ses pouvoirs et violé le délicat « modus vivendi » établi entre l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » et le « Militärverwaltung des Militärbefehlshaben in Frankreich » (le MVF prétendant toujours s'opposer à la conception maladroite de son rôle que l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » appliquait lors de ses interventions) .

Le 19 octobre, le « Stabsführer » Gerhard Utikal est mis en cause dans l'affaire Heil :

« Toujours l'affaire Heil. Il est devenu complètement fou et va se mettre dans une situation impossible s'il reste plus longtemps. Si les faits sont révélés, le scandale va être terrible. »

À ce stade des confiscations, les responsabilités demeurent à déterminer. Visiblement, les institutions nazies étaient en concurrence dans la recherche des objets d'art les plus remarquables afin d'enrichir leurs collections.

La liste des objets saisis chez Wanda Landowska est disponible (Centre de Documentation juive contemporaine) .

Bien que le mémo correspondant soit daté du 19 février 1941, il s'agit bien de l'inventaire du contenu des caisses (cette date correspond à une période-clef des inventaires globaux réalisés par l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » pour l'ensemble de ses saisies) .

Nous ne savons cependant pas si les caisses marquées « œuvres littéraires » contenaient la totalité de la bibliothèque musicale de Wanda Landowska. La liste ne mentionne pas non plus de nombreux objets personnels tels que peintures et mobilier. Le reste de ce que contenait la maison disparut lors d'interventions ultérieures exécutées par le « Sicherheitsdienst » .

Par cette action majeure de pillage à l'égard d'un citoyen français, Herbert Gerigk contraria le gouvernement français même s'il pouvait se prévaloir des 2 « Führerbefehle » pour justifier son intervention dans la propriété de Wanda Landowska. Il n'empêche que les protestations officielles contre le transfert de ces biens culturels nationaux ne furent pas émises immédiatement.

Le 5 décembre 1940, la Délégation générale du Gouvernement en zone occupée, sous la plume du général Alain De Boissieu, soumit une lettre de protestation au Colonel Otzen du « Militärverwaltung des Militärbefehlshaben in Frankreich » au sujet de la saisie des instruments et autres biens de Wanda Landowska. Ce document est le premier connu, adressé en réaction à une confiscation chez une personne privée. De Boissieu écrivit cette lettre à la suite d'une plainte déposée par Denise Restout (sa lettre datée du 20 octobre 1940) . Le 4 octobre, faisant preuve d'un extraordinaire courage, Denise revint de Banyuls-sur-mer à Saint-Leu-la-Forêt. après qu'elle eut été informée de la saisie. Elle trouva la propriété sous scellés et fut mise au courant du détail des événements par la gardienne. Dans sa lettre officielle, De Boissieu écrivit au sujet des collections de Wanda Landowska :

Ses informateurs lui avaient indiqué la présence des instruments au Louvre. Il demanda leur retour, écrivant :

« Plusieurs raisons morales et artistiques justifient le retour des instruments et musiques de Madame Landowska. »

Le « Militärverwaltung des Militärbefehlshaben in Frankreich » et l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » furent amenés à échanger plusieurs courriers et mémos à la suite de cette réclamation. Le 10 janvier 1941, la « Feldkommandantur » locale, n° 758, envoya au « Militärverwaltung des Militärbefehlshaben in Frankreich » un rapport détaillé sur les circonstances de la confiscation, telles qu'elles lui furent décrites par le maire (préfet ?) dans sa lettre du 19 décembre 1940.

Le général de la Laurencie, représentant du gouvernement français dans les territoires occupés, informait le maire (préfet ?) que des allemands en civil (membres du « Sonderstab Musik » qui opéraient en civil pour détourner l'attention (le port de l'uniforme deviendra obligatoire après cette opération) avaient emporté 15 instruments de valeur. Ils avaient également pillé le mobilier et des livres anciens comprenant notamment des partitions et œuvres musicales.

La « Kommandantur » rattachée à la circonscription d'Enghien-les-Bains entama une enquête et convoqua Mademoiselle Mathot, assistante de Wanda demeurée à Saint-Leu, le 16 décembre. Un procès-verbal de son témoignage décrit ainsi les faits :

trouvant dans la propriété. Ils apposèrent le scellé officiel des autorités militaires, n° 03265. Ils emportèrent les pianos droits ci-dessus mentionnés, les partitions, les livres mais aussi le savon, les machines à écrire, le vin et chargèrent le tout dans des camions. La gardienne, une vieille femme, protesta vainement. Elle demanda un reçu officiel qui lui fut refusé, se voyant opposée la réponse suivante : “ Nous ne délivrons pas ce genre de chose.” »

Il fallait que la saisie et l'enlèvement des objets demeurent secrets.

La « Feldkommandantur » rapporta aussi que le scellé apposé sur la maison de Wanda Landowska, portant le n° 03265, correspondait au code normalement utilisé par la « Geheime Feldpolizei » (GFP) du groupe 610.

La « Feldkommandantur » s'offusqua des insinuations des témoins au sujet de la prétendue disparition du savon, des machines à écrire, du vin et autres objets personnels, allant jusqu'à menacer la gardienne et Mademoiselle Mathot de diffamer une division de l'armée allemande.

Avant de poursuivre plus avant, un rapport fut demandé au groupement 610. Le 8 janvier 1941, la « Geheime Feldpolizei » , groupement 610, justifia l'opération menée par Gerigk en s'appuyant à nouveau sur les « Führerbefehle » des 5 juillet et 17 septembre 1940. Il s'agissait bien, en l'occurrence, de possessions abandonnées par une citoyenne polonaise et juive. Et, ce qui rendait l'affaire encore plus critique, c'est qu'elle était une juive germanophobe. Ainsi en attestait le concert qu'elle avait organisé avec le violoniste polonais Bronisław Huberman, à l'Opéra de Paris, au profit des aviateurs français et polonais. De toute façon, les instruments, livres, manuscrits, tableaux et disques microsillons n'avaient pas quitté la France.

Le rapport rejetait le témoignage de Mademoiselle Mathot. Il n'y avait pas eu dissimulation de la saisie. Bien plus, Mademoiselle Mathot n'était pas présente lors de cette opération. En plus des proches du Docteur Gergk, 15 professionnels français mirent à peu près 2 semaines pour emballer les marchandises et n'utilisèrent le savon que pour se laver les mains. De même, le vin ne fut utilisé que comme « ration » . La « Geheime Feldpolizei » citait ainsi une lettre du 13 janvier 1941 de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » , adressée au Gouverneur militaire du District de Paris. Cette lettre (sans doute post-datée ?) révèle que la « Geheime Feldpolizei » reçut des instructions précises de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » concernant la position politique à adopter en cas de protestations des autorités françaises.

Par l'intermédiaire de Wolfgang Boetticher, du « Sonderstab Musik » à Berlin, l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » fut mise en cause dans cette controverse. Dans sa lettre du 13 janvier, Boetticher reprend les mêmes arguments et utilise les mêmes formulations que la « Geheime Feldpolizei » :

Landowska n'est pas française, mais juive. Elle possède un passeport polonais saisi par Gerigk. Il était expiré et c'est pourquoi elle le laisse à Saint-Leu (lettre de Denise Restout datant du 1er décembre 1995) . Ses biens ont donc été confisqués à juste titre et ils ne peuvent, en aucun cas, être considérés comme biens culturels français.

Même si l'affaire Landowska continue d'être examinée jusqu'à la fin de l'année 1941, elle ne manque pas d'être très tôt considérée comme en voie d'être classée sans suite.

Les 54 caisses contenant les biens de Wanda Landowska arrivèrent à Berlin dans les entrepôts du transporteur Edmund Franz Kowak. Le 15 août 1941, elles sont transférées au 79 de la « Oranienburgstraße », siège de l'« AMT Musik » où il fut procédé à un inventaire. Les instruments et la plupart des livres furent ensuite transportés à Leipzig dans les locaux de la « Hohe Schule Sachgebiet Musik » avant de gagner, en septembre 1943, les bâtiments de l'ancienne École Supérieure Israélite où l'« AMT Musik » se replia après l'évacuation de Berlin (lettre de Max Unger datée du 27 juin 1946) .

Après les Iers bombardements sur Leipzig, en décembre 1943, les collections furent évacuées vers Ratibor, Pless et Langenau, en Haute-Silésie, ou, à chaque fois que c'était techniquement possible, cachées dans des lieux pré-déterminés de la campagne. En janvier 1945, Walter Bargatzky, Directeur de la Division juridique du « Militärverwaltung des Militärbefehlshaben in Frankreich », à Paris, rassembla les mémoires secrets dans lesquels il avait répertorié ce qu'il connaissait des archives du Groupe de Conservation Artistique qui avaient disparu. On y trouve de nombreux détails sur le sort réservé aux biens de Wanda Landowska, un ensemble d'éléments repris dans un mémo non daté du Service de Protection des Œuvres d'Art à Paris (et que l'on retrouve dans les archives de Denise Restout) . Il y est notamment indiqué 2 destinations finales des biens de Landowska : le château de Langenau, à Hirschberg, pour les partitions et œuvres musicales (c'est là que s'installèrent Herbert Gerigk et l'« AMT München » , de fin 1943 au printemps 1945) ; et le monastère de Raitenhaslach, près de Munich, pour les instruments.

Après la Guerre, Max Unger, expert spécialiste de Beethoven, qui avait appartenu à l'« AMT Musik » , en septembre 1943, déclarera que la bibliothèque musicale de Wanda Landowska avait quitté Leipzig pour Langenau, en février 1944. Unger avait lui-même référencé les ouvrages en question. Il attesta que les Iers bombardements sur Leipzig atteignirent les bâtiments de la « Hohe Schule » , en décembre 1943. La section qui contenait les instruments fut en grande partie détruite. À sa connaissance, « seuls quelques-uns d'entre eux en sortirent intacts » . Selon Unger, arrivèrent à Langenau les livres et partitions en grande quantité, regroupés avec d'autres provenant de Russie ou de Belgique, les instruments demeurés intacts et, notamment, un grand nombre de grands pianos et de « piano-forte » .

Après la Guerre, les Alliés rassemblèrent les objets retrouvés aux différents points de collecte en vue d'en assurer le retour. Rose Valland et Doda Conrad s'efforcèrent que les biens français retrouvés soient amenés rapidement au point de collecte de Munich ou aux dépôts spécialisés de la Division militaire des États Unis dans les domaines des monuments, des Beaux-Arts et des Archives. Ils trouvèrent une petite partie des instruments de Wanda Landowska entreposés dans le dépôt de l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » du monastère de Raitenharlach.

volés aux autorités allemandes. En échange, je lui fis parvenir les documents extraits des archives de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » évoquant la confiscation afin qu'elle puisse en tenir compte dans son projet de biographie sur Wanda Landowska. »

Elle me répondit :

« En ce qui concerne la restitution des biens volés, seuls quelques-uns des instruments anciens furent retracés et retournés à Saint-Leu. Tous, à l'exception du piano de Chopin, étaient dans un état lamentable (je vis certains d'entre eux sur place lors de mon voyage en France, en 1954) . Pour ce qui concerne les clavecins Pleyel, un seul d'entre eux fut retrouvé après la Guerre dans une maison privée d'un village, près de Munich. Ultérieurement, le fonds Bach de la bibliothèque considérable de Wanda fut retourné à Paris. »

En ligne avec les informations fournies par Denise, seules les caisses suivantes numérotées, et déclarées contenir dans l'inventaire du 19 février 1941, furent retournées à Saint-Leu (lettre de Denise datant du 28 septembre 1992) :

P30 (Clavecin 30463/192665/51) .

P39 (Clavecin du 17e siècle) .

P40 (Clavecin du facteur Rùckers de 1642) .

P42 (Piano-forte du facteur Carl Magnus Nordqvist, de Stockholm) .

P43 (Clavecin avec peinture intérieure de Andrea del Verrocchio) .

P49 (Piano-forte du facteur Olof Granfeldt, de Stockholm) .

P55 (Orgue de salon de 1757) .

P56 (Piano du facteur Joan Bauzà Palma) .

P57 (Clavicorde) .

P58 (Support) .

Dans les archives fédérales de Koblenz, on trouve un dossier de documents qui contient un catalogue détaillé des restitutions (« Restitutionkartei ») . Ce catalogue énumère les pièces enregistrées au point de collecte de Munich sous la forme de « property-cards » relatives aux objets d'art rassemblés par les troupes d'occupation américaines dans leur zone d'occupation. Ces cartes décrivent le bien et indiquent les conditions de retour aux propriétaires. 29 cartes au nom de Wanda Landowska détaillent précisément les instruments provenant du monastère de Raitenhaslach (qu'ils soient intacts ou en plusieurs morceaux) . Les instruments arrivèrent au point de collecte de Munich, le 13 septembre 1945. En plus des instruments retrouvés dont Denise a donné, ci-dessus, la liste des caisses selon la numérotation de l'inventaire de 1941, ce catalogue permet de confirmer la présence de 2 autres références : P46 et P47. Le piano de Frédéric Chopin (P56) fut expédié vers Paris, le 9 janvier 1946. Les autres instruments suivirent le 31 juillet 1947.

Plusieurs cartes de propriété décrivent 5 caisses arrivées à Munich en provenance de Raitenhaslach et contenant des biens ayant appartenu à Wanda Landowska, Halfen et Kalman (ainsi que le décrivent leurs étiquettes) .

Leur contenu comprenait des compositions musicales de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart et de Jean Sébastien Bach, des partitions de musique du 18^e siècle, des correspondances et pièces diverses, un volume de musique de Christoph Willibald Gluck, 12 volumes de musique de Mozart, 16 volumes de littérature, 14 volumes de lettres et pièces de musique, un grand nombre de partitions d'Opéra de Bach et de Heinrich Schütz, des livres de musiques diverses. Enfin, une caisse authentique des biens de Wanda Landowska, restée en l'état d'origine, retrouvée à Raitenhaslach et décrite comme suit :

Selon l'information fournie par Denise (lettre datant du 25 juillet 1994) , tous les instruments retournés à Saint-Leu devinrent la propriété d'Elsa Schunicke, ancienne secrétaire de Wanda Landowska et son héritière pour partie. Il est probable que plusieurs furent vendus aux enchères ou furent l'objet de ventes privées à des collectionneurs ou musées en Belgique, au Canada et en Australie.

Une indication complémentaire permet de mieux suivre le trajet sinueux des 2 grands clavecins Pleyel commandés par Wanda Landowska (dont l'un fut retrouvé à Munich) . Dans un mémo datant du 27 mars 1942 (actuellement aux archives de Koblenz) , il est indiqué que Heinz Tietjen, directeur-général du Théâtre national de Prusse, a formulé la demande d'acquérir les 2 Pleyel. Apparemment, Herbert Gerigk les avait déjà achetés pour la « Hohe Schule » , au prix de 60,000 Francs chacun. Herman Göring voulait aussi donner l'un des 2 à l'Opéra de Budapest. Il est possible que cette somme ait servi à indemniser la firme Pleyel qui les avait prêtés à Wanda Landowska. Dans un mémo datant du 19 octobre 1942, Gerigk indique aussi l'achat d'un autre clavecin Pleyel à Paris destiné à l'Opéra National de Prusse.

Les matériels déplacés de l' « AMT München » vers la campagne allemande ont eu aussi une autre destination : le château de Banz. En 1992, j'ai (l'auteur) trouvé au Musée National de Nuremberg 2 lettres de Manuel de Falla à Wanda Landowska, propriété de cette dernière, et qui avaient appartenu à la même famille allemande.

Cette découverte amène à établir une hypothèse concernant le sort des biens volés à Wanda Landowska. Il est probable que la bibliothèque musicale (d'environ 10,000 volumes) ait été saisie par l'armée russe et transportée dans le château de Langenau près d'Hirschberg, un territoire situé dans la zone d'occupation soviétique. Les témoignages du Docteur Karl Brethauer et du Docteur Gerhard Wunder, en charge pendant la Guerre de la gestion des collections pour le compte de l' « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » à Paris et à Berlin (puis à Ratibor) , semblent le confirmer :

« Le retour du fonds Bach est probablement lié à la mention sur les étiquettes, au moment de la saisie, d'une seconde adresse de destination. »

Certains instruments de Wanda Landowska ont probablement été détruits lors des bombardements de Leipzig. Quelques autres qui étaient stockés au château de Langenau ont probablement été transférés ailleurs en Allemagne (comme ce fut le cas de ceux déplacés vers le monastère de Raitenhaslach, en Bavière) afin d'échapper à l'avance des troupes russes. C'est à la suite du même processus que fut retrouvé le clavecin Pleyel, à Munich.

Il se peut aussi que l'influence des officiels de l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » appartenant au « Sonderstab Musik » ou à l'« AMT München » leur ait permis une nouvelle attribution de certains instruments mais, cette fois, pour leur usage personnel. D'autre part, Brethauer et Wunder mentionnent aussi que certains objets « devant être transférés des Instituts locaux de la " Hohe Schule " vers la Silésie (c'est-à-dire vers Langenau) auraient pu finalement être laissés sur place » .

La plus évidente des hypothèses permet de suggérer que certains biens de Wanda Landowska (et de beaucoup d'autres propriétaires moins célèbres) sont demeurés en Allemagne entre les mains de personnes privées. Le Centre de Documentation Juive Contemporaine, à Paris, conserve copie d'une circulaire adressée à Herbert Gerigk, le 20 janvier 1944. Dans ce document, Gerhard Utikal, « Stabsführer » de l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg », autorise Kurt von Behr à permettre aux membres de la direction de l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » à prendre part au processus de « M-Aktion » qui concerne mobilier et autres objets. C'est ouvrir la voie pour les employés des différentes instances du « Sonderstab Musik » et autres services de l'« Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (« AMT Musik » et « Sonderstab Musik » inclus) au lancement d'opérations de pillage à titre personnel.

Denise m'a fourni quelques détails supplémentaires sur la confiscation de septembre 1940, notamment des extraits de sa lettre datant du 20 octobre 1940 adressée à la Délégation générale du Gouvernement français dans les Territoires occupés :

« Vers le 20 septembre, des officiers allemands en civil se sont présentés et ont ordonné au personnel de les laisser pénétrer dans la propriété. Ils dressèrent l'inventaire de tous les biens de Madame Landowska tels qu'ils étaient détenus depuis le sous-sol jusqu'aux combles. Ils examinèrent ses disques, ses archives, sa correspondance et apposèrent des scellés après avoir emporté les 2 postes de TSF. 4 jours plus tard, une douzaine de civils allemands (dont une femme) revinrent avec une équipe de déménageurs afin d'emballer tous les instruments anciens et modernes, la totalité de la bibliothèque musicale, la plus grande partie de la bibliothèque littéraire, la collection complète de disques, peintures et autres objets similaires. Ils emportèrent le tout. Comme ces individus remirent des scellés après leur passage, je ne suis pas en mesure de dresser la liste détaillée des objets qu'ils emportèrent. »

Après la Guerre (plus précisément le 10 septembre 1945) , Denise établit un état fournissant plus de détails afin de faciliter la tâche des autorités françaises en charge de la recherche et de la restitution. C'est alors seulement qu'elle révéla la disparition de ses propres biens personnels (livres, partitions, etc.) .

Les officiers allemands (vraisemblablement membres de la « Gestapo ») avaient mis la maison sens dessus dessous en consacrant plusieurs jours à l'emballage et au transport de l'ensemble de ce que contenait la propriété.

Sur ce point, il semble que Pleyel a reçu compensation pour ses instruments.

Lorsqu'elle revint à Saint-Leu, Denise ne put pénétrer dans la maison qu'après plusieurs jours d'attente (le 4 octobre 1940) . Après leur dernier passage, les Allemands avaient retiré les scellés et rendu les clés à la gardienne. C'est à ce moment qu'il fut clairement établi le pillage de l'ensemble des biens de Wanda Landowska :

Cependant, la confiscation n'était pas terminée. La présence de Denise à Saint-Leu (qu'elle quitta définitivement le 14 mars 1941) n'empêcha pas les Nazis d'achever leur besogne.

Les lettres échangées entre Manuel de Falla et Wanda Landowska, retrouvées à Nuremberg en 1991 (2 lettres de De Falla, de 1924 et de 1925, au sujet du concert de clavecin organisé par Wanda ; et une lettre complémentaire de 1926) ont été remises au Centre Musical Landowska de Lakeville (Connecticut) , début-avril 1993, soit plus d'un demi-siècle après leur confiscation à Saint-Leu (une des lettres était encore dans son enveloppe d'origine) . Une copie fut également transmise aux Archives de Falla à Madrid.

« Sonderstab Musik » : Music Confiscation the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) under the Nazi Occupation of Western Europe.

Author : Willem De Vries.

Translation : Lee K. Mitzman.

Publisher : Amsterdam University Press (1996) .

Distributor : University of Michigan Press (271 pages) .

This title, the work of the Dutch scholar Willem De Vries, represents a significant tributary to the streams of investigation now identified as Holocaust Studies, Music in Exile, and Antiphilosemitism, amongst others. Hitherto, research in these fields has tended to emphasize such features as the means and motives of poetical and cultural oppression and their instruments of implementation. The personal and institutional impact of such policies included the varying degrees of emigration - whether external into other regions or continents, internal (« innere Emigration » ; i.e. , total withdrawal into oneself and the refusal to accept sustenance from the ruling totalitarian regime) , pragmatic « neutrality » , voluntary or involuntary collaboration, and various intermediate accents between several of these categories. It is worth recalling the interdisciplinary impetus to generate these regions of investigation, in which musicological initiatives have lagged approximately a decade behind those in social history, art history and theory, and comparative literature.

During the Second World War, the « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) was set-up, an organization which aimed for the elimination of Jewish cultural life in the rest of Europe. A « Sonderstab Musik » was also established, staffed by distinguished German musicologists whose task was to locate musical manuscripts, books and instruments. Its initial target was the possessions of Jewish musicians and composers who had fled the Nazi regime but, in the end, it boiled-down to a general confiscation and removal of Jewish possessions, including those connected with music-making. This book describes the activities of the « Sonderstab Musik » in France, Belgium and the Netherlands.

In 1996, revelations about gold seized from Jews by the Nazi government have filled headlines. Not only do these discoveries pose serious questions about the roles of allegedly neutral countries during World War II, but they also remind us of the vast amount of property illegally seized from Jews and other « enemies of the “ Reich ” » under German occupation that still remains unaccounted for. In the same year, the art-world has been stirred by disturbing discoveries about confiscated artwork and its re-sale : the tabloid coverage of the Wildenstein divorce indirectly drew attention to the family's possible involvement in purchasing rare artworks that the Nazis had seized from Jewish-owned collections in Paris. Here, again, the mysteries of ownership remain an unsettling problem.

The complex mechanism of Nazi art-policy, including the confiscation and re-sale of valuable artworks, has been exhaustively investigated and analyzed in the excellent work of Jonathan Petropoulos (Art as Politics in the 3rd « Reich ») and amplified by the case studies published by Hector Feliciano (The Lost Museum) . These new studies are useful not only for historical interest but also for clues that may assist in clarifying the legal issues raised by recent inquiries into the rightful ownership of seized property. « Sonderstab Musik » by Willem De Vries performs a similar function in the area of music.

It may surprise some readers to learn that music held such a prominent position in the Nazis' program of plundering. Cultural historians investigating the Nazi period have ignored music for a long time, focusing their attention on architecture, painting, literature, and film, but shying away from the art-form Josef Gœbbels had dubbed « the most German of the Arts » . This gap could be explained, in part, by the uninterrupted success of prominent musical figures, before and after 1945, and their efforts to suppress investigations into their rules under Adolf Hitler. It was also due to the reluctance of music historians to confront the complexity of the inter-connections between music and politics in the 3rd « Reich ». The lacuna has begun to be filled only in the last 15 years, starting with the detailed spadework of Fred K. Prieberg (« Musik im NS-Staat ») and enriched most recently by the excellent comprehensive study by Michael H. Kater (The Twisted Muse) . We are now learning just how central music was not only to the Nazi cultural policy but to Germany's artistic contributions to Western civilization. De Vries's study helps to fill-out this picture by revealing how the Nazis plundered not only art but also musical treasures from the countries under occupation, enriching Germany's musical arsenal with stolen instruments, recordings, and rare musical scores.

In the 1st months of the regime, Josef Goebbels, Alfred Rosenberg, and other parties struggled over cultural jurisdiction. After Adolf Hitler entrusted Goebbels with the new Propaganda Ministry ...

In Göttingen wird ein Wissenschaftler mit seiner Vergangenheit im NS-Amt Rosenberg konfrontiert.

Die jüdische Cembalistin Wanda Landowska floh aus Paris, als die Nazis einmarschierten. Nach dem Krieg war ihre Sammlung kostbarer historischer Instrumente verschwunden, ebenso die Musikbibliothek mit 10.000 Bänden und MusikerInnenautographen. Die Plünderung war das Werk einer eigens für solche Aktionen gegründeten Institution des NS-Staats : Des « Amtes Musik » beim Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg der NSDAP, kurz auch « Sonderstab Musik » genannt.

In seinem jüngst erschienenen Buch « Sonderstab Musik - die organisierte Plünderung jüdischen Eigentums in der NS-Zeit » beleuchtet der niederländische Musikwissenschaftler Willem De Vries die Aktivitäten dieses Sonderstabs. Gegründet wurde er 1940 vom NS-Chefideologen Alfred Rosenberg. Zu seinen Aufgaben gehörten Konfiszierungen in den besetzten Ländern Belgien, Frankreich und Niederlande, vor allem von jüdischem Eigentum.

Zur Beute aus den Plünderungen gehörten wie bei Wanda Landowska vor allem Musikinstrumente und Kompositionen, die bei Tausenden jüdischer KomponistInnen, MusikerInnen, Verlage und Musikbibliotheken beschlagnahmt wurden. Neben der physischen Vernichtung der Jüdinnen und Juden Europas sollte die Plünderung von Musikalien, bildender Kunst und Malerei jegliche Form jüdischer Identität vernichten. Die Musikalien wurden « arisiert » , also sogenannten arischen Deutschen zur Verwendung überlassen. Bis heute wurde nichts davon den eigentlichen EigentümerInnen zurückgegeben. Als De Vries sein Buch Ende November in der Universitätsstadt Göttingen vorstellte, verursachte er einen Eklat. Denn bei seinen Recherchen war er immer wieder auf den Namen eines Göttinger Musikwissenschaftlers gestoßen : Professor Doktor Wolfgang Boetticher. Bis 1944 war der SS-Mann Boetticher maßgeblicher Mitarbeiter im Sonderstab Musik gewesen. Unter anderem wirkte er an dem 1940 herausgegebenen « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » mit, das sämtliche im Musikbereich tätigen Juden und Jüdinnen erfaßte und ab 1940 systematische und gezielte Plünderungen bei ihnen ermöglichte.

Nach 1945 habilitierte sich Boetticher an der Universität Göttingen, er wurde Dozent am Musikwissenschaftlichen Institut. In den siebziger Jahren war er Dekan der Philosophischen Fakultät, wo der 84-jährige bis heute Lehrveranstaltungen hält. Boetticher wurde zu einer Göttinger Persönlichkeit; auch die Volkshochschule feierte jüngst sein hundertstes Veranstaltungsangebot.

Dabei war Boettichers Geschichte auch der Universitätsleitung kein Geheimnis : Nach Aussagen eines Mitarbeiters des Musikwissenschaftlichen Seminars war die NS-Vergangenheit des Professors bereits seit den fünfziger Jahren allgemein bekannt - sowohl an der Universität wie im Göttinger Bildungsbürgertum.

Mit den Vorwürfen aus De Vries' Buch konfrontiert, rechtfertigte sich Boetticher in einem Memorandum und erklärte, er habe dem Sonderstab nie angehört. Er sei diesem nur « als Wehrmachtangehöriger und dienstpflichtiger Soldat mit unterem Mannschaftsgrad zugeteilt » gewesen, « um als Zivilist Quellenstudien zur älteren Musikgeschichte auch in den besetzten Gebieten betreiben zu dürfen » . Ob Boetticher nun « Gast » des Sonderstabs war, wie er selbst behauptet, oder Leiter : Die Verbrechen des Amtes Musik erwähnt er in seinem Memorandum noch nicht einmal - geschweige denn, daß er sie bedauern würde.

Die Universitätsleitung beruft sich heute darauf, die Vorwürfe gegen Boetticher seien neu und ihr bisher nicht bekannt gewesen. Doch bereits 1982 sind in der « New York Times » und der Frankfurter Rundschau Artikel erschienen, die Boettichers Vergangenheit beleuchteten. Seitdem konnte Boetticher sich auf keinem internationalen Symposium mehr blicken lassen. Nur in der BRD blieben die Konsequenzen bis heute aus. Die deutsche Musikwissenschaft hat noch nicht einmal angefangen, ihre Rolle im Nationalsozialismus aufzuarbeiten ; die Monographie des Niederländers De Vries wurde im deutschsprachigen Raum sofort zum Standardwerk.

Doch auch nach dem Erscheinen des Buches hält sich die Universitätsleitung bedeckt : Zwar wurde Boetticher nahegelegt, seine Veranstaltungen bis zur Klärung der Lage einzustellen. In einer offiziellen Stellungnahme beruft sich die Uni-Leitung aber darauf, « daß eine Mitwirkung Boettichers an Verbrechen der bezeichneten Art sowohl straf- als auch disziplinarrechtlich verjährt » sei. Außerdem seien « die Indizien, die auf eine Schuld Boettichers im Zusammenhang mit Kunstraubzügen des Amtes Rosenberg hinweisen, aufgrund der historischen Distanz nicht mehr verifizierbar » . Anrufe beim Bundesarchiv in Koblenz oder beim jüdischen Dokumentationszentrum in Paris (« Centre de documentation juive contemporaine ») hätten freilich genügt, um rund ein Dutzend Dokumente anzufordern, die Boettichers Beteiligung am Sonderstab Musik bestätigen.

Die Universitätsleitung scheut das Thema Nationalsozialismus aus gutem Grunde ; fehlt es doch auch in vielen anderen Fachbereichen an Aufarbeitung. Boetticher ist kein schwarzes Schaf, sondern ein Wissenschaftler unter vielen, die ihre Karriere, trotz ihrer NS-Vergangenheit, nach 1945 fortsetzen konnten - bis heute. Der Jura-Professor Ludwig Schreiber, der sich, kurz bevor er sein Amt als Universitätspräsident aufgab, mit dem Fall Boetticher beschäftigte, kam zu dem Schluß :

Gustav Havemann

Gustav Havemann was born in Güstrow, Germany, on March 15, 1882. He studied the violin with his father, and played in the Court Orchestra in Schwerin, before enrolling in the « Berlin Hochschule für Musik », Still a young man, he was the Concert-Master in several cities, including Hamburg.

In 1911, he was invited to join the faculty of the Leipzig Consortium and, between 1915 and 1920, became the Concert-Master at the Dresden State Opera. From 1920 to 1945, he was a professor at his « alma matter », the « Berlin Hochschule » .

In the early-1920's Gustav Havemann founded the Havemann String Quartet. Gustav was the 1st violin, with Georg Kühnau as the 2nd violin. Hans Mahlke played the viola, while Adolf Steiner accompanied on the violoncello.

Over time, the Quartet earned a reputation as a prestigious group, playing in such locales as Berlin's « Volksbühne » and even in Czechoslovakia. They performed both Classical and modern music, some of it considered « avant-garde » at that time, including pieces by Alban Berg and Alois Hába (considered « the most distinctive figure in 20th Century modern Czech music ») .

The Quartet performed Alban Berg's String Quartet, Opus 3, at the Chamber Music Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, on August 2, 1923.

Berg wrote to his wife :

« I reveled in the sound and the solemn sweetness of my own music. You cannot imagine it from what you have heard of the piece. The so-called wildest and riskiest passages were pure euphony in the Classic sense. »

Gustav himself composed a Violin Concerto in 1938. He authored « Was ein Geiger Wissen Muß » (What a Violinist Needs to Know) in 1921, as well as « Die Violintechnik bis zur Vollendung » (Mastering Violin Techniques) in 1928.

Apparently, by 1931, Georg Kühnau was no longer with the group ; the Havemann Trio performed in Coburg, on June 7 of that year, rendering Adolf Brunner's String Trio for violin, viola and violoncello.

The era of the Nazis left its mark on Gustav Havemann. An undated tobacco card states that Havemann was « Professor, member of the Presidium (?) of the « Reich » Music Chamber, leader of the National-Socialist musicians » . It appears that, while he toed the Party's anti-Semitic line in the early 1930's (as head of the « Kampfbund » Orchestra) , he finally rebelled.

According to « The New York Times » of July 18, 1935, Professor Havemann was removed as the leader of the « Reich » 's Musicians Club because of his intervention in behalf of Jewish composer :

« A further development in the anti-Semitic campaign, disclosed today, was the ousting of Professor Gustav Havemann as leader of the “ Reich ” Musicians' Club. He incurred Minister of Propaganda Josef Gœbbels's displeasure when he intervened in behalf of Paul Hindemith, composer under the Nazi ban.

Professor Havemann sided with Wilhelm Furtwängler, who resigned last December as leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and conductor of the Municipal Opera, in opposing the Nazi boycott of Mister Hindemith's works for his alleged Jewish affiliations. »

Gustav Havemann died in Schöneiche on January 2, 1960.

The story of Gustav Havemann is one of the more remarkable, if little-known, narratives of 20th Century German music history. A man plagued by self-doubt and eager to curry favour with whoever was in power at the time, this talented violinist and conductor followed the remarkable shifts in German political and cultural life, moving smoothly from modernist musician and friend of radical Jewish composers in the Weimar era, to being a committed Nazi music ideologue. Perhaps, most remarkably, after the War, he built a successful career in socialist East Germany with a reputation for being a « committed anti-Fascist » .

Before his conversion to Nazism, Havemann was well-known as a Leftist. Born in Güstrow, Germany, on 15 March 1882, to a musical family, he studied violin from an early age. He was appointed to the position of Concert Master in Lübeck while still a teenager, then, moved on to positions in Hamburg, Leipzig, and Dresden before accepting a teaching post at the Berlin Academy of Music (a position he held until the end of the War) . During the Liberal inter-War years, Havemann was also the founder and leader of one of the most important String Quartets in the musically blossoming Weimar Germany, the Havemann String Quartet. The ensemble, which quickly earned a reputation as one of the most important promoters of modern and avant-garde music, helped to popularize the works of composers like Paul Hindemith and Arnold Schönberg.

Havemann's conversion to Nazism is, perhaps, not as surprising as it must have seemed at the time. Joining Alfred Rosenberg's « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (Combat League for German Culture, or KfdK) , Havemann became the leading musician in its central Berlin branch, founding its Orchestra, in 1932, and serving as conductor. When a 1932 Hamburg celebration of the birthday of Johannes Brahms included some Jewish performers, Havemann agreed to participate only if they were removed from the programme. It is important to remember that this ideological shifting was taking place before the Nazis had actually seized power ; that racial cleansing was still unofficial ; and that the violinist and conductor was not acting in accordance with official policy. A contemporary of Havemann's commented that :

« He is performing in absolutely empty halls ; it is a laughable event artificially propped-up by yawning Brownshirts (Nazis) . »

The 1933 Nazi seizure of power strengthened Havemann's commitment to removing Jews from German musical life. He was one of the foremost members of the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » and the official « Reichsmusikkammer » , and also worked with the Party and the « Kampfbund » to restructure and reorganize the Berlin Academy of Music.

Although successfully forcing composer Franz Schreker and Georg Schunemann from their positions as director and vice-director of the Academy, he never achieved his ultimate goal of himself becoming director. However, he did retain considerable influence in appointing others to positions, especially those positions vacated by Jews and foreigners. There was also an official change in the purpose of the school.

As one director stated in his appointment speech :

« We are interested not in cultivating artistes, but in training German artists who consider their profession as a holy and “ volkhaft ” (populist) task grounded both spiritually and in terms of a world-view. »

Celebrating his success at purifying and centralizing the musical world of Nazi Germany, and paying tribute to the successes of Adolf Hitler, Havemann declared that :

« The German musician enjoys a privileged position in comparison to musicians in other countries because he is constituted as a member of a public and legal corporation in the “ Reichsmusikkammer ”. »

Despite these successes, however, Havemann's career under the Nazis was also marked by scandal and failure. In the early 1930's, Havemann had initiated the dismissal of countless German musicians, both Jewish and not, and forced the closure of many Jewish and « Jewish-influenced » institutions. Nonetheless, his commitment to anti-Semitism did not allow him to overcome the burden of his earlier leftist credentials ; he was continuously accused of being a « Jew-lover » , particularly due to an infamous affair with a Jewish woman. His controversial reputation came to a head during the famous « Hindemith Affair » . Despite Paul Hindemith's modernist sound, Havemann's support had allowed the composer to keep his position at the Berlin Academy - but the scandal over his Opera, « Mathis der Maler » (Mathis, the Painter) , was to have major ramifications for Havemann, as well as Furtwängler and Hindemith himself. Havemann, probably not realizing the political significance of the conflict, sided with composer Richard Strauß and conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, defending the modernist composer against charges of being « un-German » . Josef Goebbels turned on Havemann, leading to the un-official black-listing of Hindemith, and the dismissal of Havemann from his leading position in the « Reichsmusikkammer » , in late-1934.

Havemann's dismissal following the Hindemith scandal worked to preserve his reputation after the War. He successfully inflated the incident to a commitment to defending « Jewish-associated » musicians (Hindemith, himself, was not Jewish) . Havemann managed to gloss-over his role in the « Reichsmusikkammer » and the long list of Jews and non-Jews he had personally had fired. After the War, he represented himself as a « consistent anti-Fascist » , who had actively resisted the Nazi regime. This ideological chameleon was to die in the small town of Schöneiche, on 2 January 1960.

Gustav Havemann, deutscher Violinist und Leiter der Reichsmusikkammer : geboren 15. März 1882 in Güstrow ; gestorben 2. Januar 1960 in Schöneiche.

Er lernte zuerst Geigespielen bei seinem Vater, dem Militärmusiker Johann Havemann. Bereits bevor er die Schule besuchte, trat er in einem Konzert auf. Nach dem Tode des Vaters wurde er durch den Mann seiner Schwester Frieda, Musikdirektor Ernst Parlow, dem Sohn von Albert Parlow, sowie Bruno Ahner weiter ausgebildet, und spielte am Hoforchester in Schwerin, bevor er 1898 an die Berliner Hochschule für Musik ging, wo einer seiner bedeutenden Lehrer Joseph Joachim war. Ab 1900 war er Konzertmeister in Lübeck, 1905 Hofkonzertmeister in Darmstadt und Hamburg, 1911 wurde er Lehrer am Leipziger Konservatorium und war von 1915 bis 1921 Konzertmeister an der Dresdner Hofoper. 1914 wurde sein Sohn Wolfgang Havemann geboren, der später in der antifaschistischen Widerstandsorganisation Rote Kapelle aktiv war. 1916 wurde er mit dem Orden für Kunst und Wissenschaft von Mecklenburg-Strelitz ausgezeichnet. Von 1921 bis 1945 hatte er eine Professur an der Berliner Hochschule inne, 1951-1959 lehrte er an der Deutschen Hochschule für Musik in Berlin (DDR) .

In den frühen 1920er Jahren gründete er mit Georg Kühnau, Hans Mahlke und Adolf Steiner das Havemann-Streichquartett und konzertierte international. Das Repertoire war klassisch bis modern, etwa Stücke von Alban Berg (Streichquartett, Opus 3 am 2. August 1923 - Uraufführung ?) oder Alois Hába. Nachdem Georg Kühnau 1931 das Quartett verließ, spielte das nun sogenannte Havemann-Trio am 7. Juni desselben Jahres in Coburg Adolf Brunners Streichtrio. 1925 war Havemann Mitglied der Künstlervereinigung Novembergruppe.

1931 heiratete Havemann die von dem Künstler Johannes Ilmari Auerbach frisch geschiedene, 22 Jahre jüngere Ingeborg Harnack, die Schwester der späteren Widerstandskämpfer Arvid und Falk Harnack. Havemann war Mitglied im völkisch gesinnten, antisemitischen Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur. 1932 trat er der NSDAP bei (Mitglieds-Nummer I.179.504) . Mit seinem Schwager Arvid Harnack kam es häufig zu Auseinandersetzungen wegen Havemanns « Überzeugung von der Mission Hitlers » . 1932-1935 leitete Havemann das von ihm gegründete Berliner Kampfbund-Orchester, das 1934 in Landesorchester des Gaues Berlin umbenannt wurde.

Nach der « Machtergreifung » der Nationalsozialisten schrieb er am 2. April 1933 an den Deutschen Konzertgeberbund :

Daneben arbeitete er intensiv an der Gleichschaltung des deutschen Musiklebens, insbesondere, seit er im November 1933 Mitglied des Präsidialrats der Reichsmusikkammer geworden war. Nach dem Tod des Reichspräsidenten Paul von Hindenburg gehörte er im August 1934 zu den Unterzeichnern des Aufrufs der Kulturschaffenden zur « Volksabstimmung » über die Zusammenlegung des Reichspräsidenten- und Reichskanzleramts. Zudem war er in Das Deutsche Führerlexikon 1934-1935 gelistet, dem offiziellen Handbuch der NS-Prominenz.

Nach einer Tagebucheintragung von Josef Gœbbels vom 5. Juli 1935 erfolgte an diesem Tag jedoch Havemanns Absetzung :

« Havemann abgesetzt wegen Stellungnahme für Hindemith. »

Anschließend wurde Havemann in die Liste der Musikbolschewisten der NS-Kulturgemeinde aufgenommen.

Eine andere Darstellung der Vorfälle besagt, daß Havemann keineswegs vom Reichspropagandaministerium abgesetzt wurde. Nachdem sich Havemann nicht nur für Hindemith eingesetzt hatte, sondern auch für Musiker jüdischer Herkunft, die sehr zu seinem Verdruß aus seinem Orchester entfernt und durch parteikonforme, zweitklassige Musiker ersetzt worden waren, soll er 1935 wutentbrannt Josef Gæbbels sein « Amt » vor die Füße geschmissen haben. Da dies nicht publik werden durfte, ließ der Propaganda-Minister am Tage darauf in den Zeitungen die Version veröffentlichen, daß Professor Havemann wegen Unfähigkeit (ähnlicher Wortlaut) seines Amtes enthoben wurde.

Nach noch einer anderen Version schied Gustav Havemann im Februar 1936 aus der Reichsmusikkammer mit der offiziellen Begründung, daß dies « in keiner Weise ehrenrührig, sondern rein sachlicher Art » sei. Der Kommentar sei notwendig geworden, da Havemann Alkoholismus zum Vorwurf gemacht worden war. Vor allem war seine Entlassung aber durch sein Engagement für Hindemith begründet, was zuvor auch Wilhelm Furtwängler zum Verhängnis geworden war.

Ab 1942 schrieb Havemann verschiedene Beiträge für die von Gæbbels kontrollierte NS-Zeitschrift Das Reich.

Seit 1950 lehrte Havemann an der Musikfachschule Cottbus, seit 1951 an der Musikhochschule Ostberlin. Er starb am 2. Januar 1960 in Schöneiche bei Berlin.

Werke

Havemann schrieb ein Violinkonzert, Opus 3 (1939) und gab mehrere violindidaktische Werke heraus :

« Was ein Geiger wissen muß » (1921) .

« Die Violintechnik bis zur Vollendung » (1928) .

Heinz Drewes

The German conductor Heinz Drewes was born on 24 October 1903 in Gelsenkirchen and died on 16 June 1980 in Nuremberg. From 1937 to 1944, he was head of the « Division X » (Music) of the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » at the time when the « Reichsmusikkammer » was led by Peter Raabe, from 1935 onwards. He was one of the most influential people in German music-world, at that time. Drewes was head of « Division X » (Music) subordinated divisions : the « Reich » Music Examination Office, consisting of the « Reichsstelle für Musikbearbeitungen » , « Auslandsstelle für Musik » , and « Amt für Konzertwesen » .

Drewes and Raabe struggled on « the leadership in music » , and this made Josef Gæbbels happy, as he could use their words as a threat to one or the other.

Heinz Drewes worked at the « Deutsches Nationaltheater und Staatskapelle Weimar » as a « répétiteur » and conductor. In 1930, he went to the « Landestheater » in Altenburg (« Theater und Philharmonie Thüringen ») as a conductor. He started, there, a local Chapter for the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » (KfdK) and, the same year, he joined the NSDAP and wrote articles in the « NS-Zeitung and Völkischer Beobachter ». The « Deutscher Musiker-Kalender » tells that, in 1943, he was « Generalintendant » and « Generalmusikdirektor » .

Denazified, Drewes worked after the War at the Nuremberg Conservatory. Later, a story emerged that Drewes used pseudonyms as he conducted when working in the Propaganda Ministry. He conducted only with the Radio Orchestras. It was he who hired and fired the conductors. He may have used the name « Hermann DeBer » when he conducted Felix Dræseke's « Symphonia Tragica » (Symphony No. 3, Opus 40) with the Berlin Symphony Orchestra (published in 1955 by « Urania Records ») . Alan Krueck says there is no such conductor as « Hermann DeBer » , and the music was typical for the 3rd « Reich » . On the other hand, the quality of the recording was consistent with that achievable at the time. Later, Christoph Schlüren also identifies Drewes.

Heinz Drewes appreciated the composer Jean Sibelius and was the president of the German Sibelius Society (« Deutsche Sibelius Gesellschaft ») . He wrote a preface to Ernst Tanzberger's dissertation, « Die symphonischen Dichtungen, von Jean Sibelius, eine inhalts- und formanalytische Studie » (published by Konrad Tritsch Verlag, in 1943) . Tommi Mäkelä writes in his Sibelius biography that it was explicitly meant to be a greeting « to our Finnish friends and comrades-in-arm » .

Drewes, himself, writes about the Symphonic sagas of Sibelius :

« While the Finnish “ volk ” could be counted racially among the Finno-Ugric tribe, it turned happily, over the Centuries, towards the German world. »

Heinz Drewes was a close friend of Richard Strauß. Strauß asked Drewes to extend protection for his libretist Joseph Gregor. In 1939, Strauß asked again protection for his non-Aryan daughter-in-law and grandchildren.

The Concert-Master of the « Philharmonischen Orchester Landestheater » , Coburg Ralph Braun, says the significance of Heinz Drewes was unknown until today.

Bernhard Rust

Bernhard Rust est né le 30 septembre 1883 à Hanovre et est mort le 8 mai 1945 à Berend / Nübel, Kreis Schleswig. Il a été, de 1934 à 1945, pendant le 3e Reich, ministre (« Reichsminister ») de la Science et de l'Éducation.

Professeur dans un lycée de Hanovre, il entra au Parti national-socialiste en 1922 ; parallèlement à son activité d'enseignement, il fut « Gauleiter » pour le Parti nazi, de 1925 à 1930, dans la région de Hanovre. Il fut élu au « Reichstag » en 1930. Nommé en février 1933 (après l'arrivée au pouvoir d'Adolf Hitler) commissaire à l'éducation pour la Prusse, il accéda le 1er juin 1934 à l'importante fonction de ministre de la Science et de l'Éducation et à la Formation du peuple (« Reichsminister für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung ») .

Il avait défini sa politique d'éducation par la phrase suivante :

« Nous avons besoin d'une nouvelle race aryenne dans nos universités car, sinon, nous perdrons la bataille du futur. La tâche principale de l'éducation est de former des Nationaux-Socialistes. »

Un des quelques dignitaires nazis à être resté au pouvoir pendant toute la durée du régime, il y a joué un rôle important, notamment pour l'application des lois raciales de 1933 à l'Université. Toutefois, il n'était pas prisé par les plus hauts-dignitaires du régime, comme Josef Gœbbels, Heinrich Himmler ou Alfred Rosenberg, qui interféraient fréquemment dans son domaine de responsabilité et le considéraient comme quantité négligeable. Il fut constamment sous la pression et la direction de Gœbbels.

En 1945, il fit un plan pour essayer de simplifier l'orthographe allemande.

Apprenant la capitulation allemande, le 8 mai 1945, il se suicida.

...

Bernhard Rust was born on 30 September 1883 in Hanover and died on 8 May 1945 in Berend / Nübel, Kreis Schleswig. He was Minister of Science, Education and National Culture (« Reichserziehungsminister ») in Nazi Germany. A combination of school administrator and zealous Nazi, he issued decrees, often bizarre, at every level of the German educational system to immerse German youth in the National-Socialist philosophy.

Rust obtained in Hanover a doctorate in German philology and philosophy. After passing the State teaching examination, in 1908, with the grade « gut », he became a high-school teacher at Hanover's « Ratsgymnasium », then served in the army during World War I. He reached the rank of lieutenant and was awarded the Iron Cross for bravery.

Rust joined the NSDAP in 1922, and eventually became the « Gauleiter » for the « Gau » of Süd-Hannover-Braunschweig. In 1930, he was elected to the « Reichstag ». When Adolf Hitler became Chancellor, in 1933, Rust was appointed as the Prussian Minister for Cultural Affairs. On 1 June 1934, he was selected as Minister of Science, Education and National Culture (« Reichsminister für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung »), and set about to reshape the German educational system to conform to his ideals of National-Socialism. Considered by many to be mentally unstable, Rust would spuriously create new regulations and, then, repeal them just as quickly. One noted example was in 1935, when he changed the traditional 6 day school week to 5 days, with Saturday to be « “ Reich ” 's Youth Day » when children in the Hitler Youth and the League of German Girls would be out of school for study and testing. He, then, ordered the creation of a « rolling week », with 6 days for study, followed by the « youth day » and a rest-day, in 8 day periods. Thus, a rolling week starting on Monday would end with rest on the following Monday ; the next rolling week would start on Tuesday and end 8 days later, on the next Tuesday. When the 8 day week proved unworkable, Rust went back to the former system.

It was Rust who, in 1933, issued a rule that students and teachers should greet each other with the Nazi salute « as a symbol of the new Germany ». He added his opinion that it was « expected of every German » regardless of membership in the Party. Rust was instrumental in purging German universities of Jews and others regarded as enemies of the State, most notably at the University of Göttingen. Nazi Germany's future leaders received their instruction elsewhere, in an NPEA or «Napola » (Nationalpolitische erziehungsanstalten), of which there were 30 in the nation, where they would receive training to become administrators of conquered provinces.

He bluntly informed teachers that their aim was to educate ethnically aware Germans. Rust also believed that non-Aryan science (such as Albert Einstein's « Jewish physics ») was flawed, and had what he felt to be a rational explanation for this view.

In an address to scientists, he said :

« The problems of science do not present themselves in the same way to all men. The Negro or the Jew will view the same world in a different light from the German investigator. »

Erika Mann, the daughter of Thomas Mann, wrote an « exposé » of the Rust system, in 1938, entitled : « School for Barbarians » ; followed, in 1941, by Gregor Ziemer's « Education for Death » .

Rust reportedly committed suicide on 8 May 1945 when Germany surrendered to Allied forces.

Rust prepared a reform of German orthography, and his fairly extensive version corresponded to the ideas of the spelling reformers of the 1970's (lower-case common nouns, elimination of lengthening-symbols) . This attempt met internal resistance of the « Reich » 's Ministry. The German orthography reform of 1944 also failed.

Before these failures, the rules of the reform were printed in millions of copies intended for classroom use and published in numerous newspapers. The 1944 reform was postponed on the orders of Hitler because it was « not important for the War effort » . Some of Rust's innovations had, however, found their way into the 1942 « Duden » , such as the spelling of the word « Kautsch » for Couch, which persisted into the 1980's.

Many of the proposed changes were finally implemented with the German orthography reform of 1996.

Bernhard Rust (geboren 30. September 1883 in Hannover ; gestorben 8. Mai 1945 in der Gemeinde Berend/Nübel, Kreis Schleswig) war ein deutscher Politiker (NSDAP) , MdL und MdR. 1933-1934 leitete er das preußische Kultusministerium und von 1934 bis 1945 das Reichsministerium für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung. Rust war ein Hauptvertreter der nationalsozialistischen Erziehung.

Rust wurde als einziges Kind katholischer Eltern geboren. Franz Rust, sein Vater, von Haus aus Zimmermann kam durch Spekulationen mit Mietshäusern in Hannover zu einigem Wohlstand. Nach dem Besuch des Lyzeums II in Hannover studierte Rust von 1904 bis 1908 Germanistik, Klassische Philologie, Kunstgeschichte, Philosophie und Musik und arbeitete von 1911 bis 1930 als Studienrat am Ratsgymnasium in Hannover. Rust war zweimal verheiratet. Seine erste Frau, mit der Rust von 1910 bis 1919 verheiratet war, verstarb 1919. 1920 heiratete Rust Anna-Sofie Dietlein. Rust hatte einen Sohn aus erster Ehe und drei Töchter in der zweiten Ehe.

Während des Ersten Weltkrieges erlitt er als Infanterieleutnant eine schwere Kopfverletzung und wurde zweimal verschüttet. Im Dezember 1918 verließ Rust im Rang eines Oberstleutnant in Reserve und hoch dekoriert das Militär. Ob die Verwundungen dauerhafte Beeinträchtigungen hinterließen ist unklar. Im Schuldienst fiel er immer wieder gesundheitsbedingt aus ; 1933 wurde eine Trigeminusneuralgie diagnostiziert. Rust trank daraufhin regelmäßig Alkohol und wurde von Außenstehenden als alkoholsüchtig eingestuft.

Nach dem Krieg wandte sich Rust der völkischen Bewegung zu. Politisch prägend waren vor allem Paul de Lagarde, Arthur Møller van den Bruck, Houston Stewart Chamberlain und Oswald Spengler. Rust trat dem rechtsradikalen Deutschvölkischen Schutz- und Trutzbund bei. Nach dem Verbot der NSDAP in Preußen gründete Rust 1922 zusammen mit seinem Schwiegervater und weiteren Gleichgesinnten in Hannover eine Ortsgruppe der Deutschvölkischen Freiheitspartei. Zudem war Rust Mitglied im Bund ehemaliger Frontkämpfer und im Stahlhelm. 1924 wurde Rust für die Deutschvölkische Freiheitspartei in das hannoversche Stadtparlament gewählt. Im Mai 1925 trat Rust der NSDAP und der SA bei.

Vom 22. März 1925 bis 30. September 1928 war er Gauleiter von Lüneburg-Stade (später Ost-Hannover/Hannover-Ost) . Nach der Neugliederung der Gaugrenzen wurde er am 1. Oktober 1928 zum Gauleiter des neu gegründeten Gau Südhanover-Braunschweig ernannt. Ebenso wurde er Gauleiter der völkisch gesinnten, antisemitischen Nationalsozialistischen Gesellschaft für Deutsche Kultur. 1929 wurde Ruste in den preußischen Provinziallandtag gewählt, 1930, am 14. September gewann Rust im Wahlkreis Hannover-Süd ein Reichstagsmandat für die NSDAP.

Am 2. Februar 1933 wurde er kommissarischer preußischer Kultusminister und 1934 mit Bildung des Reichsministeriums für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung in Personalunion Reichsminister. Auf Grund des Gesetzes zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums verloren unter Rusts Leitung etwa tausend Hochschullehrer, vor allem Juden, Sozialdemokraten und Liberale, Stellung und Beruf. Dieses hatte für die deutsche bislang sehr starke Stellung im Bereich Naturwissenschaften gravierende Folgen. Ungezählte hochrangige Wissenschaftler emigrierten aus Deutschland meist nach Amerika, unter ihnen etwa ein Dutzend Nobelpreisträger.

Rust selber äußerte sich zu diesem Prozess :

« Wir brauchen eine neue arische Rasse an den Universitäten, oder wir werden die Zukunft verlieren. Die Hauptaufgabe der Erziehung ist es, Nationalsozialisten zu bilden. »

Zu seinen frühen Aktionen gehört auch die Entlassung des Berliner Reformpädagogen Fritz Karsen am 21. Februar 1933 und die beginnende Gleichschaltung der von Karsen geleiteten Karl-Marx-Schule (Berlin-Neukölln) .

Die neue Verfassung für die deutschen Universitäten und Hochschulen vom April 1935 zielte auf die Zentralisierung und vor allem Beschränkung der akademischen Selbstverwaltung. Die Rektoren waren fortan « Führer der Hochschule » und direkt Rust unterstellt. Auf die Frage, warum die Ausbildung der Lehrer nur an eigens geschaffenen Lehrerbildungsanstalten (zum Beispiel Bernhard-Rust-Hochschule in Braunschweig) und nicht an Universitäten stattfinden solle, antwortete Rust, er könne nicht dulden, « daß die künftigen Erzieher des Volkes ihre Ausbildung an diesen liberalistischen Irrgärten erhielten » .

Rust setzte die Ideologisierung des Fachunterrichts (zum Beispiel im Erlaß Vererbungslehre und Rassenkunde im Unterricht vom 15. Januar 1935) durch und erwirkte unter Bruch des Reichskonkordats das Verbot der katholischen Schulen mit dem Schuljahr 1939-1940. In allen Schulen wurden Elternbeiräte und Schülermitverwaltung abgeschafft.

Daneben war Rust am 1. Juli 1935 Gründer des rassenideologischen Reichsinstituts für Geschichte des Neuen Deutschlands, das am 19. Oktober 1935 eröffnet wurde. Seit 1940 war er SA-Gruppenführer.

In der Nacht vom 7. zum 8. Mai 1945, dem Tag der bedingungslosen Kapitulation, erschoss sich Rust in der Nähe des Dorfes Nübel in Schleswig-Holstein selbst. Er wurde in Nübel bestattet.

Rust bereitete eine Reform der deutschen Rechtschreibung vor. Eine recht weitgehende Version, die in manchem den Vorstellungen der Rechtschreibreformer der 1970er entsprach (gemäßigte Kleinschreibung, Weglassung der Dehnungszeichen) scheiterte bereits intern am Widerstand des Reichsinnenministeriums. Ein weiterer Versuch 1944 scheiterte ebenfalls. Die Regeln der Reform der deutschen Rechtschreibung lagen bereits in einer Million Exemplaren für den Schulgebrauch gedruckt vor, in verschiedenen Zeitungen erschienen Einführungsartikel. Die Reform wurde jedoch nicht offiziell eingeführt, weil sie nicht kriegswichtig sei. Einige der von Rust geplanten Schreibungen fanden allerdings Eingang in den Duden. Die Schreibung Kautsch für Couch beispielsweise stand dort bis in die 1980er Jahre verzeichnet. Ein guter Teil der geplanten Änderungen wurde in der Reform der deutschen Rechtschreibung von 1996 wieder aufgegriffen.

Rust hatte im Ämterchaos des nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Reiches geringen Einfluß und mußte immer mehr Zuständigkeiten an konkurrierende Organisationen abtreten, etwa an die SS, die Hitlerjugend oder die Deutsche Arbeitsfront. Sein Vorhaben, das deutsche Schulsystem im nationalsozialistischen Geiste grundlegend umzugestalten, scheiterte nicht zuletzt an den kriegsbedingten Unterrichtsbeeinträchtigungen wie Kinderlandverschickung, Lehrkräfte- und Raummangel.

Rusts geringer Einfluß war auch eine Folge des schlechten Ansehens, in dem er bei konkurrierenden nationalsozialistischen Amtsträgern stand. Er wurde von manchen verachtet. Alfred Rosenberg bezeichnete ihn als « haltlos, alt und krank », Josef Goebbels, der sich durch Hitler bei der Vergabe des Kultusministeriums hintergangen fühlte - « Nun bekommt der Rust den Kultus. Ich schau in den Mond. Das ist so demütigend. », nannte seinen Ministerkollegen einen « absoluten Hohlkopf », der « nicht ganz zurechnungsfähig » sei.

Robert Ley

L'homme politique allemand, membre du NSDAP, Robert Ley est né le 15 février 1890 à Niederbreidenbach et est mort à 55 ans, le 25 octobre 1945, à Nuremberg. Il est un Directeur du Front allemand du travail et Organisateur du Parti nazi (« Reichsorganisationsleiter »), il s'est suicidé avant d'être jugé pour crimes de guerre.

Issu d'une famille d'agriculteurs ruinés, fils de Friedrich et Émilie Ley (née Wald), Robert Ley est le 7e d'une fratrie de 12 enfants. Marqué par la condamnation pour dettes de son père, il étudie la chimie aux Universités d'Iéna et de Bonn en travaillant durant les vacances universitaires.

Lorsque la Première Guerre mondiale éclate, Ley s'engage comme volontaire dans l'armée allemande. Il est affecté durant 2 années dans un régiment d'artillerie, avant de suivre une formation d'aviateur. En juillet 1917, son avion est abattu au-dessus de la France. Lors de l'écrasement, Ley est victime d'un traumatisme crânien et de multiples contusions aux jambes, nécessitant 6 opérations chirurgicales. Il en garde à vie un léger bégaiement et une certaine propension à la nervosité. Il est fait prisonnier par les Français et interné dans un camp pendant 2 ans. Il n'est libéré qu'en 1920.

Ley reprend ses cours à l'Université et obtient un doctorat de chimie alimentaire. Il est embauché dans une filiale alimentaire du géant industriel IG Farben, à Leverkusen dans la Ruhr. En 1924, opposé à l'occupation française de la Ruhr, et présentant des positions ultra-nationalistes après avoir lu des extraits de la défense présentée par Adolf Hitler à son procès du « “ Putsch ” de la Brasserie », il rejoint le NSDAP.

Dès son adhésion, Ley a un rôle important non seulement dans l'implantation du NSDAP en Rhénanie, mais aussi dans la reprise en main du Parti par Hitler après sa libération. Orateur, démagogue, il jouit à ces titres de la protection de Hitler contre ses subordonnés et ses concurrents au sein du Parti. En 1925, Ley devient « Gauleiter » en Rhénanie et éditeur d'un journal, le « Westdeutsche Beobachter », dont les attaques antisémites lui valent de multiples condamnations. En 1925, lors du débat, interne au NSDAP, sur l'opportunité d'exproprier les familles princières du « Reich », il s'oppose aux choix politiques des frères Gregor et Otto Straßer, partisans de l'expropriation. Il se retrouve isolé parmi les « Gauleiter » du Nord du « Reich » et doit affronter leur hostilité, mais cette position fait de lui l'un des principaux soutiens à Hitler au Nord du Main.

En 1931, invité par Hitler, il commence à fréquenter le groupe de Munich, groupe d'intimes de Hitler, qui forme le vrai centre du pouvoir au NSDAP. En décembre 1932, Gregor Straßer est démis de ses fonctions à la suite d'un différend avec Hitler, Ley lui succède alors en tant que « Reichsorganisationsleiter » (responsable de l'organisation du Parti) .

L'expérience de Ley acquise alors qu'il était à la tête de la région ouvrière de la Ruhr (« Gauleiter ») le rend populaire dans l'aile socialiste du Parti nazi, même s'il définit le socialisme du NSDAP comme étant opposé à la pitié, ou proche du lien qui existe entre les soldats des tranchées.

Quand Hitler devient chancelier du « Reich », en janvier 1933, Ley le suit à Berlin : il participe à la restructuration des organisations ouvrières allemandes au printemps 1933. Après la promulgation de la loi du 19 mai 1933, les syndicats sont dissous pour être remplacés par le Front allemand du travail (« Deutsche Arbeitsfront », ou DAF) et Ley est nommé « Führer » de cette nouvelle organisation. Cette loi est précisée le 20 janvier 1934. Proche de Hitler, il est associé aux campagnes de propagande dès 1934, notamment celle liée à la construction des autoroutes en mars 1934.

Ley transforme le « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » en organisation totalement inféodée au Parti, ce même avant la purge de 1934.

Sous sa tutelle, le Front du Travail devient non seulement l'administration la plus corrompue du « Reich », mais aussi développe un discours révolutionnaire. Prévaricateur, Ley détourne à son profit des sommes très importantes issues à la fois des syndicats interdits, de la vente d'ouvrages dont il est l'auteur, du journal du Front du travail et s'octroie des salaires excessivement élevés. Il mène grand train, vit dans le luxe, est amateur de jolies femmes, habite de fastueuses demeures. Son mode de vie contamine celui de ses subordonnés, qui s'empressent de s'enrichir également par tous les biais possibles. Ils « s'achètent une immunité » en finançant l'embellissement des propriétés de la SS ou de proches de Hitler.

À la tête d'une organisation regroupant des centaines de milliers de membres et collectant de gigantesques masses d'argent par le biais de cotisations obligatoires, Ley jouit d'une autonomie et d'une impunité de fait. Il tente de prendre le contrôle de la production de la Volkswagen, dont le financement, organisé par son administration, constitue une manière de gruger les souscripteurs.

Ley devient progressivement dépendant à l'alcool : en 1933, sa dépendance est déjà de notoriété publique et, en 1943, sous l'emprise de l'alcool, il se montre favorable à la mise en application de tous les moyens disponibles pour accroître la production de charbon.

Il encourage, parfois contre d'autres organes du Parti, la création de centres de formation spécifiques, non seulement pour les futurs cadres de son organisation, mais aussi pour les Allemands membres du « Jungvolk », organisation proposant l'encadrement des jeunes gens préalable à leur admission dans la Jeunesse hitlérienne. Ainsi, à partir de 1935, il organise les « Ordenburgen », des centres de formation destinés à des jeunes gens âgés de plus de 25 ans, ayant suivi l'intégralité du cursus national-socialiste : jeunesses hitlériennes, armée, « Deutsche Arbeitsfront ». Conçus comme des « Universités du Parti », ces centres sont destinés à être la pépinière des futurs dirigeants du « Reich ». Néanmoins, le succès de ces écoles est mitigé car les critères de sélection sont jugés trop draconiens, et les élèves sont souvent recrutés parmi les fils des permanents du « Deutsche Arbeitsfront ».

Chef du Front allemand du travail, il joue un rôle important : notamment, il prend le contrôle de la construction de logements dès le début des hostilités, puis, tente, à partir de l'automne 1940, de prendre le contrôle de la production de charbon dans le « Reich », en plaçant l'un de ses proches ou en proposant une réforme des rémunérations des mineurs, tout en affirmant la nécessité de traiter durement les travailleurs étrangers travaillant dans le « Reich », dont il partage la gestion avec Fritz Sauckel.

En juillet 1944, il participe au déferlement de haine des membres du Parti contre les responsables de la tentative d'attentat contre Hitler et, par extension, contre les aristocrates et les militaires de haut-rang.

À partir d'août 1944, il se montre favorable à la directive de Hitler qui ordonne d'ériger des fortifications le long des frontières du « Reich », destinées à contenir l'invasion alliée. En effet, il a l'ambition de parvenir à contrôler l'ensemble des travaux de construction projetés.

À l'automne 1944, lorsque de nombreuses régions du « Reich » sont directement menacées, il suggère la mise en place d'une milice populaire, mais il est discrédité par Heinrich Himmler, Martin Bormann et d'autres chefs nazis.

En mars 1945, en accord avec Josef Goebbels et certains « Gauleiter » des régions occidentales envahies, il propose la mise en place d'organisations de partisans, la « Werwolf », puis celle de brigades de jeunes gens, armés de « Panzerfaust », se déplaçant à bicyclette : l'objectif illusoire recherché est d'arrêter les divisions blindées alliées qui se dirigent vers le centre du « Reich ».

À la fin de la Guerre, Robert Ley change d'identité et prend le pseudonyme d'Ernst Dostelmaier. Il est cependant arrêté et confronté à des témoins qui le reconnaissent : il est incarcéré à Nuremberg. Le 25 octobre 1945, il est retrouvé pendu à la tuyauterie des toilettes de sa cellule au moyen d'une corde de fortune faite de lambeaux de serviette assemblés. Le psychiatre américain Douglas Kelley, de Nuremberg, est persuadé que Ley souffrait de démence : il fait alors envoyer son cerveau pour analyse dans un laboratoire du Professeur Webb Haymaker qui confirme son hypothèse, mais celle-ci est, par la suite, infirmée par un autre laboratoire de San Francisco.

Ce suicide incite les autorités alliées à renforcer leur surveillance des accusés, ce qui pourtant n'empêchera pas le suicide de Hermann Göring, le 15 octobre 1946, par ingestion d'une capsule d'acide cyanhydrique.

The Nazi politician Robert Ley was born 15 February 1890 in Niederbreidenbach (now, a part of Nümbrecht) , in the Rhine Province ; and died on 25 October 1945. He became head of the German Labour Front, from 1933 to 1945. He committed suicide while awaiting trial at Nuremberg for War crimes.

Ley was the 7th of 11 children of a heavily indebted farmer, Friedrich Ley, and his wife Emilie (« née » Wald) . He studied chemistry at the Universities of Jena, Bonn, and Münster. He volunteered for the army on the outbreak of World War I, in 1914, and spent 2 years in the artillery before training as an aerial artillery spotter with Field Artillery Detachment 202. In July 1917, his aircraft was shot-down over France and he was taken prisoner. It has been suggested that he suffered a brain injury in the crash ; for the rest of his life, he spoke with a stammer and suffered bouts of erratic behaviour, aggravated by heavy drinking.

After the War, Ley returned to University, gaining a doctorate in 1920. He was employed as a food chemist by a branch of the giant IG Farben company, based in Leverkusen in the Ruhr. Enraged by the French occupation of the Ruhr, in 1924, Ley became an ultra-nationalist and joined the Nazi Party soon after reading Adolf Hitler's speech at his trial following the « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » , in Munich. By 1925, he was « Gauleiter » of the Southern Rhineland district and editor of a virulently anti-Semitic Nazi newspaper, the « Westdeutsche Beobachter » . Ley proved unswervingly loyal to Hitler, which led the Party leader to ignore complaints about his arrogance, incompetence and drunkenness.

In 1931, Ley was brought to the Nazi Party's Munich headquarters to take-over as head of the Party organization (« Reichsorganisationsleiter ») following Hitler's dismissal of Gregor Straßer in an internal dispute. Ley's impoverished upbringing and his experience as head of the largely working-class Ruhr Party region meant that he was sympathetic to those elements in the Party who were open to socialism, which Hitler opposed, but he always sided with Hitler in inner Party disputes. This helped him survive the hostility of other Party officials such as the Party treasurer, Franz Xaver Schwarz, who regarded him as a drunken incompetent. When Hitler became Chancellor, in January 1933, Ley accompanied him to Berlin. In April, when the trade-union movement was taken-over by the State, Hitler appointed him head of the German Labour Front (« Deutsche Arbeitsfront » , or DAF) .

The « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » took-over the existing Nazi trade-union formation, the National-Socialist Factory Cell Organisation (« Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation » , or NSBO) as well as the main trade-union federation. But Ley's lack of administrative ability meant that the « Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation » leader, Reinhold Muchow, a member of the socialist wing of the Nazi Party, soon became the dominant figure in the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » , overshadowing Ley. Muchow began a purge of the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » administration, rooting-out ex- Social-Democrats and ex- Communists and placing his own militants in their place. The « Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation » cells continued to agitate in the factories on issues of wages and conditions, annoying the employers, who soon complained to Hitler and other Nazi leaders that the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » was as bad as the Communists had been.

Hitler had no sympathy with the syndicalist tendencies of the « Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation » and, in January 1934, a new Law for the Ordering of National Labour effectively suppressed independent working-class factory organizations, even Nazi ones, and put questions of wages and conditions in the hands of the Trustees of Labour (« Treuhänder der Arbeit »), dominated by the employers. At the same time Muchow was purged and Ley's control over the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » re-established. The « Nationalsozialistische Betriebszellenorganisation » was completely suppressed and the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » became little more than an arm of the State for the more efficient deployment and disciplining of labour to serve the needs of the regime, particularly its massive expansion of the arms industry.

Once his power was established, Ley began to abuse it in a way that was conspicuous even by the standards of the Nazi regime. On top of his generous salaries as « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » head, « Reichsorganisationsleiter », and « Reichstag » Deputy, he pocketed the large profits of the « Westdeutsche Beobachter », and freely embezzled « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » funds for his personal use. By 1938, he owned a luxurious estate near Cologne, a string of villas in other cities, a fleet of cars, a private railway carriage and a large art-collection. He increasingly devoted his time to « womanizing and heavy drinking, both of which often led to embarrassing scenes in public ». On 29 December 1942, his 2nd wife Inge (1916-1942) shot herself after a drunken brawl. Ley's subordinates took their lead from him, and the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » became a notorious centre of corruption, all paid for with the compulsory dues paid by German workers.

One historian says :

« The “ Deutsche Arbeitsfront ” quickly began to gain a reputation as, perhaps, the most corrupt of all the major institutions of the 3rd “ Reich ”. For this, Ley himself had to shoulder a large part of the blame. »

Hitler and Ley were aware that the suppression of the trade-unions and the prevention of wage increases by the Trustees of Labour system, when coupled with their relentless demands for increased productivity to hasten German re-armament, created a real risk of working-class discontent. In November 1933, as a means of preventing labour disaffection, the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » established « Strength through Joy » (« Kraft durch Freude », KdF), to provide a range of benefits and amenities to the German working-class and their families. These included subsidized holidays both at resorts across Germany and in « safe » countries abroad (particularly, Italy). Some of the world's 1st purpose built cruise-liners, the Wilhelm Gustloff and the Robert Ley, were built to take « Kraft durch Freude » members on Mediterranean cruises.

Other « Kraft durch Freude » programs included concerts, Opera and other forms of entertainment in factories and other work-places, free physical education and gymnastics training and coaching in sports such as football, tennis and sailing. All this was paid for by the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront », at a cost of 29 million « Reichsmarks » a year, by 1937, and ultimately by the workers themselves through their dues, although the employers also contributed. « Kraft durch Freude » was one of the Nazi regime's most popular programs, and played a large part in reconciling the working-class to the regime, at least before 1939.

The « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » and « Kraft durch Freude » 's most ambitious program was the « people's car » , the Volkswagen, originally a project undertaken at Hitler's request by the car-maker Ferdinand Porsche. When the German car industry was unable to meet Hitler's demand that the Volkswagen be sold at 1,000 « Reichsmarks » or less, the project was taken-over by the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » . This brought Ley's old socialist tendencies back into prominence. The Party, he said, had taken-over where private industry had failed, because of the « short-sightedness, malevolence, profiteering and stupidity » of the business class. Now working for the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » , Porsche built a new Volkswagen factory at Fallersleben, at a huge cost which was partly met by raiding the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » 's accumulated assets and misappropriating the dues paid by « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » members. The Volkswagen was sold to German workers on an installment plan, and the 1st models appeared in February 1939. The outbreak of War, however, meant that none of the 340,000 workers who paid for a car ever received one. The entire project was financially unsound, and only the corruption and lack of accountability of the Nazi regime made it possible.

Ley said in a speech, in 1939 :

« We, National-Socialists, have monopolized all resources and all our energies during the past 7 years so as to be able to be equipped for the supreme effort of battle. »

With the outbreak of World War II, in September 1939, Ley's importance declined. The militarization of the work-force and the diversion of resources to the War greatly reduced the role of the « Deutsche Arbeitsfront » , and the « Kraft durch Freude » was largely curtailed. Ley's drunkenness and erratic behaviour were less tolerated in War-time, and he was supplanted by Armaments Minister Fritz Todt and his successor Albert Speer as the czar of the German work-force (the head of the « Organization Todt » , or OT) . As German workers were increasingly conscripted, foreign workers, 1st « guest-workers » from France and, later, slave labourers from Poland, Ukraine and other Eastern countries, were brought in to replace them. Ley played some role in this program, but was overshadowed by Fritz Sauckel, General Plenipotentiary for the Distribution of Labour (« Generalbevollmächtigter für den Arbeitseinsatz ») , in 1942.

Nevertheless, Ley was deeply implicated in the mistreatment of foreign slave workers. In October 1942, he attended a meeting in Essen with Paul Plieger (head of the giant « Hermann Göring Works » industrial combine) and leaders of the German coal industry. A verbatim account of the meeting was kept by one of the managers.

A recent historian writes :

« The key-item on the agenda was the question of “ how to treat the Russians ”. Robert Ley, as usual, was drunk. And when Ley got drunk he was prone to speak his mind. With so much at stake, there was no room for compassion or civility. No degree of coercion was too much, and Ley expected the mine managers to back-up their foremen in meting, out the necessary discipline. As Ley put it : “ When a Russian pig has to be beaten, it would be the ordinary

German worker who would have to do it. ” »

Despite his failings, Ley retained Hitler's favour ; until the last months of the War, he was part of Hitler's inner-circle along with Martin Bormann and Josef Gœbbels. In November 1941, he was given a new role, as « Reich » Commissioner for Social House-Building (« Reichskommissar für den sozialen Wohnungsbau ») , later shortened to « Reich » Housing Commissioner (« Reichswohnungskommissar ») . Here, his job was to prepare for the effects on German housing of the expected Allied air-attacks on German cities, which began to increase in intensity from 1941 onwards. In this role, he became a key-ally of Armaments Minister Albert Speer, who recognized that German workers must be adequately housed if productivity was to be maintained. As the air-war against Germany increased from 1943, « dehousing » German workers became an objective of the Allied area bombing campaign, and Ley's organization was increasingly unable to cope with the resulting housing crisis.

He was aware, in general terms, of the Nazi regime's programme of extermination of the Jews of Europe. Ley encouraged it through the virulent anti-Semitism of his publications and speeches. In February 1941, he was present at a meeting along with Speer, Bormann and Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel at which Hitler had set-out his views on the « Jewish Question » at some length, making it clear that he intended the « disappearance » of the Jews, one way or another.

As the 3rd « Reich » collapsed, in early 1945, Ley was among the government figures who remained fanatically loyal to Hitler. He last saw Hitler, on 20 April 1945, Hitler's birthday, in the « Führerbunker » , in central Berlin. The next day, he left for southern Bavaria, in the expectation that Hitler would make his last stand in the « National Redoubt » , in the alpine areas. When Hitler refused to leave Berlin, this idea was abandoned which then left Ley effectively unemployed. On 16 May, he was captured by American para-troopers of the 101st Airborne Division in a shoe-maker's house in the village of Schleching. Ley told them he was « Doctor Ernst Distelmeyer » , but he was identified by Franz Xaver Schwarz, the treasurer of the Nazi Party and a long-time enemy.

At the Nuremberg Trials, Ley was indicted under Count 1 (« The Common Plan or Conspiracy to wage an aggressive war in violation of international law or treaties ») ; Count 3 (War Crimes, including among other things « mistreatment of prisoners of war or civilian populations ») ; and Count 4 (« Crimes Against Humanity : murder, extermination, enslavement of civilian populations ; persecution on the basis of racial, religions or political grounds ») .

Ley was apparently indignant at being regarded as a war criminal, telling the American psychiatrist Douglas Kelley and psychologist Gustave Gilbert who had seen and tested him in prison :

« Stand us against a wall and shoot us, well and good, you are victors. But why should I be brought before a Tribunal like a c-c-c- ... I can't even get the word out ! »

On 24 October, 3 days after receiving the indictment, Ley strangled himself in his prison cell using a noose made by tearing a towel into strips, fastened to the toilet pipe in his cell.

Baldur von Schirach

Le chef des Jeunesses hitlériennes et « Gauleiter » de Vienne Baldur von Schirach est né le 9 mai 1907 à Berlin et est mort le 8 août 1974 à Kröv-an-der-Mosel. Il fut condamné à 20 ans de prison à la suite du procès de Nuremberg et emprisonné à la prison de Spandau.

Schirach est issu d'une riche famille noble d'officiers et le dernier de 4 frères. Son père, l'officier Carl von Schirach épouse Emma, la fille d'un avocat américain. En 1908, Carl démissionne de l'armée pour devenir directeur du théâtre de la Cour grand-ducale de Weimar. Baldur connaît une enfance privilégiée, marquée par la musique, le théâtre et la littérature, il sera l'un des rares dirigeants nazis à parler couramment l'anglais. Très tôt, il fait preuve d'un talent de poète et aime particulièrement Goethe. Malheureusement, la Première Guerre mondiale met vite fin à cette vie sans souci. À 10 ans, le jeune Schirach devient membre de la « Ligue des Jeunes Allemands », une organisation nationaliste et raciste.

Au lendemain de la défaite allemande de 1918, son père est révoqué et reste quelque temps sans emploi. Les désordres qui agitent alors l'Allemagne traumatisent durablement la famille Schirach. Le fils-aîné ne supportant pas le déshonneur de sa patrie met fin à ses jours. Désenchanté, Carl von Schirach se tourne vers l'extrême-droite et devient l'un des partisans du Parti national-socialiste.

Durant son adolescence, Baldur est marqué par la haine de son père envers la République de Weimar. Au cours d'un voyage qu'il effectue avec sa mère aux États-Unis, sa famille américaine lui propose de s'y installer pour entamer une carrière. Mais Baldur choisit de retourner en Allemagne. Le 29 août 1925, lors d'un dîner organisé dans la maison familiale, il fait la connaissance d'Adolf Hitler. L'adolescent profondément impressionné par cette rencontre adhère peu après au NSDAP. Il compose un poème sur Hitler qui est publié dans un recueil en 1929 ; pour le féliciter, ce dernier lui envoie une photographie signée. En 1927, Baldur entre à la SA et s'installe à Munich, où il s'inscrit à l'université pour y suivre des cours d'histoire de l'art, d'anglais et de littérature allemande.

En dépit de son jeune âge, Schirach fait très rapidement partie du cercle intime des dirigeants du NSDAP. Ainsi, le 20 juillet 1928, il est nommé à la tête de l'Union des étudiants hitlériens. En 1929, son engagement politique le pousse à abandonner ses études. Propagandiste et organisateur remarquable du mouvement étudiant, il inspire chez ses compagnons les idéaux de la camaraderie, du sacrifice, de la discipline, du courage et de l'honneur. Il gagne ainsi à la cause nazie des centaines de milliers de jeunes.

L'efficacité de son action auprès de la jeunesse et la dévotion aveugle qu'il exprime dans ses poèmes lui valent l'estime d'Adolf Hitler. Le 30 octobre 1931, celui-ci le nomme chef des Jeunesses hitlériennes, poste qu'Hitler crée spécialement pour lui. Baldur, qui n'a que 24 ans, devient ainsi colonel SA. À peine nommé au rang de chef des Jeunesses hitlériennes, il exclut les révolutionnaires de cette organisation et rédige des éléments de programme en matière de politique universitaire : l'introduction d'un quota d'étudiants juifs, la création de nouvelles disciplines comme les études raciales, les sciences militaires, dans le cadre d'une université définie par sa place dans la communauté nationale. Dans le même temps, il présente des listes aux élections de représentants étudiants, ces listes obtiennent des résultats si importants que la Fédération nationale des comités étudiants vote en 1932 l'abolition des élections, et l'adoption du « Führerprinzip » .

En mars 1932, il épouse Henriette Hoffmann, la fille du photographe personnel de Hitler, Heinrich Hoffmann. Hitler est témoin du mariage et leur offre un chien. Le couple aura 4 enfants, 3 garçons et 1 fille. Le 31 juillet, Schirach devient député au « Reichstag » . Quelques mois plus tard, début octobre 1932, il organise une monumentale marche de la jeunesse nazie. Des dizaines de milliers de jeunes, venus à pied de toute l'Allemagne, rendent ainsi hommage à Hitler au cours d'un défilé qui dure près de 7 heures. Hitler est lui-même très impressionné.

À partir de janvier 1933, Schirach travaille d'arrache-pied pour atteindre son objectif : inculquer à la jeunesse allemande les idéaux nazis. Il prend ainsi possession, par la force, des bureaux du comité des associations de jeunesse du « Reich » , puis de l'organisation des auberges de jeunesse. Le 17 juin 1933, lors d'une cérémonie en présence de Hitler, Schirach devient chef des Jeunesses du « Reich » allemand. La « Hitlerjugend » est ainsi libérée de la tutelle SA et devient autonome vis-à-vis du Parti.

Entre janvier 1933 et 1934, les Jeunesses hitlériennes passent de 1 million à 3,5 millions de membres. À la suite du décret du 1er décembre 1936 qui en fait une organisation d'État, les adhérents sont de plus en plus nombreux. Schirach devient alors secrétaire d'État à la jeunesse. Désormais, il ne dépend plus que de Hitler et est « entièrement responsable de l'éducation physique, idéologique et morale de la jeunesse allemande » .

En janvier 1937, avec l'aide du docteur Robert Ley, il ouvre les « écoles Adolf Hitler » pour former l'élite du IIIe « Reich » . Son organisation travaille en étroite collaboration avec le ministère de la Propagande, dirigé par Josef Goebbels. Présenté comme une sorte de héros, adulé par les jeunes Nazis comme un dieu, les photographies du chef des jeunesses hitlériennes sont diffusées en nombre dans l'ensemble du « Reich » .

En 1938, Schirach déclare :

Le 25 mars 1939, l'adhésion aux Jeunesses hitlériennes devient obligatoire pour les jeunes voulant pratiquer des activités sportives ou encore aller à l'école. Elles regroupent alors 12 millions de jeunes. Schirach transforme ainsi la jeunesse allemande en « objet de propagande vivante » , permettant ainsi l'embrigadement des parents par leurs enfants.

C'est à cette époque que Schirach prononce la célèbre phrase dans un meeting, joignant le geste à la parole :

« Quand j'entends le mot “ culture ”, je sors mon revolver ! »

Cette phrase est en fait due à l'écrivain nazi Hanns Johst qui l'a placée comme réplique d'un personnage de l'une de ses pièces de théâtre intitulée « Schlageter » (1933) (la phrase exacte de la pièce originale de Hanns Johst est « Wenn ich Kultur höre ... entsichere ich meinen Browning ! » ; « Quand j'entends parler de culture ... je relâche la sécurité de mon Browning ! » ; Acte I, Scène I) . Attribuée à tort indifféremment à Hermann Göring, Josef Gœbbels ou Schirach lui-même, c'est l'une des plus célèbres citations apocryphes du XXe siècle.

Terrain d'entraînement des futurs officiers, les Jeunesses hitlériennes deviennent également, à partir du 26 août 1938, le vivier de la SS : à la suite d'un 1er accord conclu entre Schirach et Heinrich Himmler, les meilleures recrues sont orientées vers « l'Ordre noir » après avoir suivi un entraînement particulier. Un bureau de liaison entre la SS et la « Hitlerjugend » est mis en place le 1er octobre, et un nouvel accord renforçant cette collaboration est signé le 17 décembre 1938. Quant à la coopération avec l'armée, elle est renforcée à compter du 11 août 1939 : Schirach signe, en effet, une nouvelle convention avec Wilhelm Keitel, commandant en chef de la « Wehrmacht » , suivant laquelle la « Hitlerjugend » effectuera un entraînement pré-militaire suivant les règles fixées par l'armée, cette dernière, en contre-partie, s'engageant à former chaque année 30,000 instructeurs destinés aux Jeunesses hitlériennes.

Cependant, le « Jugendführer » n'a pas que des amis au sein du NSDAP. L'un de ses principaux ennemis, Martin Bormann, fait en sorte de nuire à sa réputation par des plaisanteries sur son comportement. Il est vrai que Schirach n'apprécie guère la vie spartiate qu'il fait régner dans les camps de la « Hitlerjugend » , et il se montre distant envers ses troupes lors de ses déplacements. Quelque temps après le déclenchement de la Guerre, en décembre 1939, sans doute pour couper court aux insinuations de ses opposants, Schirach rejoint volontairement l'armée. Après avoir subi un entraînement adéquat, il sert sur le front de l'Ouest, à partir d'avril 1940, et participe à la campagne de France. En juin 1940, promu lieutenant, il reçoit la Croix de fer de seconde classe, avant d'être rappelé à Berlin par Hitler.

Son opposition à la Guerre et des litiges internes le conduisent à être remplacé à la tête des Jeunesses hitlériennes ; il reste néanmoins « Reichsleiter » , chargé de l'éducation de la jeunesse allemande.

Déçu par son protégé, Hitler l'écarte en le nommant en 1940 gouverneur de la région de Vienne et commissaire du « Reich » à la défense civile. À partir de septembre 1940, il est également chargé de l'évacuation des enfants des villes pour les protéger des bombardements britanniques. Dans la métropole viennoise, Schirach donne de somptueuses fêtes. Sur place, ses responsabilités couvrent l'économie de guerre, l'administration de Vienne et celle du « Gau » sous la supervision du ministre de l'Intérieur. Il y est ainsi responsable du programme de travail forcé.

Surtout, dès sa prise de fonction, Schirach précipite la déportation des Juifs de la région de Vienne. Le 2 octobre 1940, alors qu'il participe à une réunion dans le bureau de Hitler, il demande au chef du Gouvernement Général de se charger des Juifs qui sont encore présents à Vienne. Le 3 décembre, à la suite de ses rapports, il reçoit une lettre lui annonçant que Hitler a décidé de déporter les 60,000 Juifs restants à Vienne vers le Gouvernement Général. Au total, il participe directement à l'envoi à l'Est de 185,000 Juifs, expulsions qu'il juge, dans l'un de ses discours, comme étant « une contribution active à la culture européenne » .

Schirach n'a désormais plus de réelle influence au sein du « Reich ». Ses rapports avec son « Führer » iront en se dégradant jusqu'à la fin du conflit. Bormann fait d'ailleurs en sorte d'envenimer leurs relations. Après le 17 novembre 1942, une nouvelle répartition administrative le décharge de la responsabilité du Danube inférieur et du Danube supérieur.

En 1943, il s'attire les foudres de Hitler pour avoir organisé à Vienne une exposition sur « l'art décadent ». La même année, le 24 juin, lors d'une soirée au Berghof, peu après le départ d'Eva Braun, une dispute entre son épouse Henriette et Hitler précipite la rupture. Selon les 2 époux, Henriette aurait reproché à Hitler le traitement des femmes juives en Hollande, et indirectement le génocide des Juifs : Hitler qui ne parlait jamais de ce sujet en public, aurait déclaré, en formant symboliquement avec ses mains la représentation de 2 coupes, que le sang de 10,000 Allemands coulait chaque jour et qu'il fallait rétablir un « équilibre » ; il aurait ajouté qu'elle devait « apprendre à haïr », comme lui l'avait fait. Henriette aurait répliqué, citant l'« Iphigénie » de Goethe :

L'historien François Delpla pense que les époux Schirach ont attendu la sortie de prison de Baldur pour révéler cette anecdote ; en effet, elle aurait sinon contribué à établir que ce dernier était au courant du génocide, ce qu'il a contesté lors de son procès.

Au moment de la prise de Vienne par l'Armée rouge, le 13 avril 1945, Schirach tente dans un 1er temps d'échapper à la capture. Sous le nom de Falk, il parvient ainsi à travailler comme interprète pour l'armée américaine, à Schwaz dans le Tyrol. Cependant, quelques jours avant la capitulation allemande, le 5 mai, il dévoile son identité par une lettre remise aux Américains et se constitue prisonnier. Le 20 novembre, il est mis en accusation par le tribunal de Nuremberg pour « plan concerté ou complot » et « crimes contre l'humanité ». Le principal acte d'accusation repose sur sa participation aux déportations des Juifs d'Autriche.

Au cours du procès de Nuremberg, Schirach est le seul, avec Albert Speer et Hans Frank, à reconnaître la culpabilité du régime nazi et à faire preuve de quelque repentance.

Il déclare :

« Devant Dieu, devant la nation allemande, devant le peuple allemand, je porte seul la culpabilité d'avoir entraîné la jeunesse à soutenir un homme qui durant de longues années a été considéré comme étant irréprochable et qui a assassiné des millions de gens. »

Il apporte la preuve qu'il avait protesté auprès de Martin Bormann contre le traitement inhumain infligé aux Juifs et, déclarant que les crimes commis resteront pour des siècles une tache dans l'histoire allemande, il assure ne pas avoir eu connaissance de l'existence des camps d'extermination. Cette affirmation est fort douteuse puisque ses fonctions lui valaient de recevoir les rapports du SD sur l'application de la « Solution finale ». Il se défend en affirmant que ses « principales activités à Vienne étaient sociales et culturelles » .

Le 1er octobre 1946, disculpé du 1er chef d'accusation, Schirach est reconnu coupable de crime contre l'humanité et condamné à 20 ans de prison. Au cours de ses années d'incarcération, il commence à écrire secrètement ses mémoires. En 1950, les époux Schirach divorcent. La même année, ses enfants demandent sa grâce, en vain.

C'est un homme malade et prématurément vieilli qui sort de la prison de Spandau, le 30 septembre 1966. Jusqu'à son décès, il vit retiré dans le Sud-Ouest de la République fédérale d'Allemagne. En 1967, il publie « Ich glaubte an Hitler » (J'ai cru en Hitler) , tentant d'expliquer la fascination que le « Führer » avait exercée sur lui et la jeunesse allemande.

Il meurt dans son sommeil dans un petit hôtel de Kröv-an-der-Mosel, âgé de 67 ans.

Baldur Benedikt von Schirach (born on 9 May 1907 ; died on 8 August 1974) was a Nazi youth leader later convicted of crimes against humanity. He was the head of the « Hitler-Jugend » (HJ : the Hitler Youth) and, later, « Gauleiter » and « Reichsstatthalter » (« Reich » Governor) of Vienna.

Schirach was born in Berlin, the youngest of 4 children of theatre director « Rittmeister » Carl Baily Norris von Schirach (1873-1948) and his American wife Emma Middleton Lynah Tillou (1872-1944) . A member of the noble Schirach family, of Wendish West Slavic origins, 3 of his 4 grandparents were from the United States, chiefly from Pennsylvania. Through his mother, Schirach was a descendant of Thomas Heyward, Junior, and an indirect descendant of Arthur Middleton, 2 signatories of the United States Declaration of Independence. English was the 1st language he learned at home and he did not learn to speak German until the age of 5. He had 2 sisters, Viktoria and Rosalind von Schirach, and a brother, Karl Benedict von Schirach. His brother committed suicide in 1919, at the age of 19.

On 31 March 1932, Schirach married the 19 year old Henriette Hoffmann, the daughter of Heinrich Hoffmann, Adolf Hitler's personal photographer and close friend. Schirach's family was vehemently opposed to this marriage, but Hitler insisted. Gregor Straßer dismissively described Schirach as « a young effeminate aristocrat » upon whom Hitler bestowed both Henriette and the Hitler Youth position. Through this relationship, Schirach became part of Hitler's inner-circle. The young couple were welcome guests at Hitler's « Berghof » . Henriette von Schirach gave birth to 4 children : Angelika Benedikta von Schirach (born on 1933) ; Klaus von Schirach (born on 1935) ; Robert von Schirach (born on 1938) ; and Richard von Schirach (born on 1942) . The lawyer and best-selling German crime writer Ferdinand von Schirach is the couple's grandson.

Schirach was a published author, contributing to literature journals, and an influential patron of the arts.

Schirach joined a « Wehrjugendgruppe » (military cadet group) at the age of 10, and became a member of the Nazi Party (NSDAP) in 1925. He was soon transferred to Munich and, in 1929, became leader of the National-Socialist German Students' League (« Nationalsozialistischer Deutscher Studentenbund » , or NSDStB) . In 1931, he was named as « Reichsjugendführer » (Youth Leader) of the Nazi Party and, in 1933, was made head of the Hitler Youth (« Hitlerjugend ») and given an SA rank of « Gruppenführer ». He was made a State secretary in 1936.

Schirach appeared frequently at rallies, such as the Nuremberg rally of 1934, when he appeared with Hitler in rousing the « Hitlerjugend » audience. The event was filmed for « Triumph of the Will » the propaganda film made by Leni Riefenstahl for the Nazi Party. Schirach set the militaristic tone of the youth organization, which participated in military style exercises, as well as practising use of military equipment, such as rifles. When older, the members would become « Wehrmacht » soldiers but, in the final years of the Second World War, they were recruited as young as 12 to fight in depleted army units. An entire division, the 12th « SS Panzer Division Hitlerjugend », was recruited almost entirely from the « Hitlerjugend », fought in Normandy in 1944, and committed several War crimes.

In July 1939, Schirach paid Passau a formal visit. In July 1940, when a new play by Hans Baumann was staged there, Schirach insisted that 2,000 local Hitler Youth members be part of that performance.

In 1940, Schirach organized the evacuation of 5 million children from cities threatened by Allied bombing. Later that year, he joined the army and volunteered for service in France, where he was awarded the Iron Cross before being recalled. He served with the 4th (Machine Gun) Company of Infantry Regiment « Großdeutschland » in the rank of « Gefreiter ». During the French Campaign, he was promoted to « Leutnant » and decorated for bravery. Schirach lost control of the Hitler Youth to Artur Axmann, and was appointed Governor (« Gauleiter » or « Reichsstatthalter ») of the « Reichsgau » Vienna, a post in which he remained until the end of the War.

An anti-Semite and an anti-Christian, Schirach was responsible over the next few years for sending Jews from Vienna to German death camps. During his tenure, 65,000 Jews were deported. In a speech on 15 September 1942, he said that their deportation was a « contribution to European culture ». Later during the War, Schirach pleaded for a moderate treatment of the eastern European peoples and criticized the conditions in which Jews were being deported. He fell into disfavour with Hitler, in 1943, but remained at his post in Vienna.

Schirach was notoriously anxious about air-raids. He had the cellars of the Hofburg Palace in the Vienna city centre refurbished and adapted as a bomb shelter, and the lower-level of the extensive subterranean Vienna air-defence coordination centre in the forests to the west of Vienna held personal facilities for him, as well. The Viennese promptly dubbed this C&C centre the « Schirach-Bunker » .

Schirach surrendered in 1945 and was one of the officials put on trial at Nuremberg. At the trial, Schirach was one of only 2 men to denounce Hitler (the other was Albert Speer) . He said that he did not know about the extermination camps. He provided evidence that he had protested to Martin Bormann about the inhumane treatment of the Jews. Schirach claimed at the trials that the roots of his anti-Semitism could be found in the readings of Henry Ford's « The International Jew » . He was originally indicted for crimes against peace for his role in building-up the Hitler Youth, but was acquitted on that charge. However, he was found guilty on 1 October 1946 of crimes against humanity for his role in the deportation of the Viennese Jews to certain death in German Nazi concentration camps located in Poland. He was sentenced and served 20 years as a prisoner in Spandau Prison, Berlin.

On 20 July 1949, his wife Henriette von Schirach (3 February 1913 - 27 January 1992) divorced him while he was in prison.

He was released on 30 September 1966 after carrying-out his full-sentence, and retired quietly to southern Germany. He published his memoirs in 1967, « Ich glaubte an Hitler » (I believed in Hitler) , and died on 8 August 1974 in Kröv.

Baldur von Schirach, the eldest of 4 children, was born in Berlin on 9 March 1907. His father, Carl Bailer-Norris von Schirach, was an army officer who resigned in 1908 to become a theatre director in Weimar and, then, in Vienna. His mother, Emma Tillou, had been born in the United States and had 2 signers of the Declaration of Independence among her ancestors. His great-grandfather was a Union Army officer who lost his leg at Bull Run.

According to Ian Kershaw, the author of « Hitler 1889-1936 » (1998) :

« Baldur von Schirach came from a highly-cultured bourgeois family, based in Weimar (Germany's literary capital) where his father had been a highly-regarded director of the Court Theatre. He spoke excellent English ; his American mother, with imperfect command of the language of her adopted country, had spoken only English to him in his childhood, so that, at the age of 6, he spoke, so he later said, not a word of German. »

After the First World War, his father lost his job and his brother committed suicide, despairing at the block on his officer's career as a consequence of the Versailles Treaty.

His biographer, Louis L. Snyder, has commented :

« Baldur von Schirach grew-up in a milieu of music, theater, and literature and early showed talent for poetry. A Romantic and sentimental lad, somewhat plump in physique, he longed for adventure. He joined the Young German League at the age of 10 and took much joy in its hikes, camp life, and singing sessions. »

Von Schirach later admitted that he developed anti-Semite views at 17 after reading a book called « The International Jew » by Henry Ford.

He later recalled :

« We saw in Henry Ford the representative of success, also the exponent of a progressive social policy. In the poverty-stricken and wretched Germany of the time, youth looked toward America, and apart from the great benefactor, Herbert Hoover, it was Henry Ford who to us represented America. »

Von Schirach was also inspired by « The Foundations of the 19th Century » by Houston Stewart Chamberlain. He was especially impressed by the following passage :

« Certain anthropologists would fain teach us that all races are equally gifted ; we point to history and answer : that is a lie ! The races of mankind are markedly different in the nature and also in the extent of their gifts, and the Germanic races belong to the most highly-gifted group, the group usually termed Aryan. Physically and mentally, the Aryans are pre-eminent among all peoples ; for that reason, they are by right the lords of the world. »

In 1924, von Schirach went to Munich where he studied art history and Germanic folklore. He heard Adolf Hitler speak in March 1925. He purchased « Mein Kampf » which he claimed he read in a single evening. In May, aged 18, he joined the National-Socialist German Workers Party (NSDAP) and served in the « Sturm Abteilung » (SA) unit. He became known as the Party's poet laureate. In one poem, he described Hitler as « Germany's greatest son » and « a genius grazing the stars » . In another, he claimed « in him rest the roots of our world » .

Hitler appreciated von Schirach's poetry and referred to him as « a true follower and a dependable lad » and advised him to move to Munich. In 1929, Hitler appointed von Schirach as head of the National-Socialist Students' Union and gave him the task of bringing the entire university system under Nazi control. Satisfied with his work, Hitler promoted him to the post of « Reich » youth leader of the Nazi Party, a post in which he proved himself to be a Master organizer. The following year, he directed a massive youth demonstration in Potsdam, at which more than 100,000 youngsters marched past the « Führer » for 7 hours.

Von Schirach married the 19 years old Henriette (« Henny ») Hoffmann, the daughter of Heinrich Hoffmann, Hitler's personal and official photographer, in Munich, on 31st March 1932. Hitler and SA leader Ernst Röhm both acted as best men. Over the next 10 years, Henriette gave birth to 4 children ; 3 sons and 1 daughter - Klaus, Robert, Richard and Angelika Benedikta.

On 1st June 1933, Baldur von Schirach was made leader of the Hitler Youth. His main objective was to re-educate German youth in the spirit of National-Socialism. As Louis L. Snyder has pointed-out :

« Von Schirach would permit no opposition to his plans. As early as February 1933, he had led a surprise raid of 50 boys on the office of the rival Central Committee of Youth Organizations and confiscated its records. »

Von Schirach wrote prayers that praised Hitler and had to be read by members of the various Nazi youth organizations before they had their meals.

Cate Haste, the author of « Nazi Women » (2001) has argued :

« The leadership immediately set about organizing youth into a coherent body of loyal supporters. Under Baldur von Schirach, himself only 25 at the time, the organization was to net all young people from ages 10 to 18 to be schooled in Nazi ideology and trained to be the future valuable members of the “ Reich ”. From the start, the Nazis pitched their appeal as the Party of youth, building a New Germany. Hitler intended to inspire youth with a mission, appealing to their idealism and hope. »

At the 1934 Nuremberg Rally, described as the Rally of Youth, Adolf Hitler told Germany's young people :

« Regardless of what we create and do, we shall pass away but, in Germany, you will live on. And I know it cannot be otherwise for you are the flesh of our flesh, blood of our blood, and your young minds are filled with the same will that dominates us. And when the great columns of our movement march through Germany today, I know that you will join these columns. And we know that Germany is before us, within us and behind us. »

Herman Rauschning claimed Hitler told him :

« In my great educative work, I am beginning with the young. We older ones are used-up. Yes, we are old already. We are rotten to the marrow. We have no unrestrained instincts left. We are cowardly and sentimental. We are bearing the burden of a humiliating past, and have in our blood the dull recollection of serfdom and servility. But my magnificent youngsters ! Are there finer ones anywhere in the world ? Look at these young men and boys ! What material ! With them, I can make a new world. My teaching is hard. Weakness has to be knocked-out of them. In my “ Ordensburg », a youth will grow-up before which the world will shrink back. A violently active dominating, intrepid, brutal youth - that is what I am after. Youth must be all those things. It must be indifferent to pain. There must be no weakness or tenderness in it. I want to see, once more, in its eyes the gleam of pride and independence of the beast of prey. Strong and handsome must my young men be. I will have them fully-trained in all physical exercises. I intend to have an athletic youth - that is the 1st and the chief thing. In this way, I shall eradicate the thousands of years of human domestication. Then, I shall have in front of me the pure and noble natural material. With that I can create the new order. »

In 1936, Hitler banned all youth organizations other than the Hitler Youth and decreed all German boys aged 15 and 18. He called on Baldur von Schirach « to project National-Socialism through German youth into eternity » . Von Schirach carried-out a massive drive to recruit all 10 year olds. For boys aged between 10 and 14 years, von Schirach set-up the « Jungvolk » . The boys had to learn semaphore, arms drill, and take part in 2 day cross-country hikes. They also had to learn Nazi dogma and, once they passed the necessary tests, they were given a special dagger marked « Blood and Honour » . The main objective of the organization was to provide Adolf Hitler with loyal supporters. Reluctant parents could be imprisoned ; before then, they might be threatened with losing their jobs.

By 1938, there were 8,000 full-time leaders of the Hitler Youth. There were also 720,000 part-time leaders, often school teachers, who had been trained in National-Socialist principles.

One teacher, who was hostile to Hitler, wrote to a friend :

« In the schools, it is not the teacher, but the pupils, who exercise authority. Party functionaries train their children to be spies and agent provocateurs. The youth organizations, particularly the Hitler Youth, have been accorded powers of control which enable every boy and girl to exercise authority backed-up by threats. Children have been deliberately taken away from parents who refused to acknowledge their belief in National-Socialism. The refusal of parents to “ allow their children to join the youth organization ” is regarded as an adequate reason for taking the children away.

»

Pictures of Baldur von Schirach were second only to Hitler's in displays throughout Germany and were used more widely than those of either Hermann Göring or Rudolf Heß. However, this gave him powerful enemies and they started a campaign of vilification against him.

According to his biographer :

« Jokes about his effeminate behaviour, especially concerning his preference for a “ girlish ” bedroom in white, became a national pastime. He was ridiculed as a transplanted Berliner in Bavarian leather breeches. »

Bernhard Rust, the Education Minister, complained :

« There is, indeed, twofold evidence to show that something was wrong with education. In the 1st place, the high-level of popular enlightenment had failed to protect the German people against the poisonous effects of Marxist teaching and other false doctrines. The attainment of high intellectual standards will certainly continue to be urged upon the young people ; but they will be taught at the same time that their achievements must be of benefit to the national community to which they belong. As a consequence of the demand, thus, clearly formulated by the Nuremberg Laws, Jewish teachers and Jewish pupils have had to quit German schools, and schools of their own have been provided by and for them as far as possible. In this way, the natural race instincts of German boys and girls are preserved ; and the young people are made aware of their duty to maintain their racial purity and to bequeath it to succeeding generations. »

Baldur von Schirach responded to this by producing his book, « Revolution in Education » (1938) .

In 1940, von Schirach joined the German Army and won the Iron Cross in France. In July 1941, Hitler appointed him as the « Gauleiter » of Vienna. Over the next few years, von Schirach was responsible for moving Jews to Poland. On 25th July 1942, von Schirach made a speech defending the deportation of thousands of Jews to the ghettos of the East as « a contribution to European culture » .

Schirach was captured by Allied troops at the end of the Second World War. At the Nuremberg War Crimes Trial, he underwent a change of heart, recognizing that he had misled German youth and contributed to poisoning a whole generation.

He stated :

« I put my morals to the side when, out of misplaced faith in the “ Führer ”, I took part in this action. I did it. I cannot undo it. »

He said that he did not know about the extermination camps, providing evidence that he had protested to Martin Bormann about the inhumane treatment of the Jews.

He now considered it his duty to destroy any belief in the rebirth of Nazism and blamed himself before history for not having done more to prevent the concentration camps.

Along with Albert Speer, von Schirach denounced Adolf Hitler before the tribunal.

With regard to Auschwitz :

« It was the most all-encompassing and diabolical genocide ever committed by man. Adolf Hitler gave the order. Hitler and Himmler, together, started this crime against humanity which will remain a blot on our history for Centuries. »

SCHIRACH'S NSDAP MEMBERSHIP, NSDAP POSITIONS, AND GOVERNMENT POSITIONS

Schirach was also a member of the « Reichstag » , from 1932 to 1945.

INTIMATE AND SLAVISH FOLLOWER OF ADOLF HITLER SINCE 1925

As early as 1925, Baldur von Schirach, then 18 years old, joined the Nazi conspirators. Upon special request of Adolf Hitler, he went to Munich in order to study Party affairs. After having joined the NSDAP, in 1925, he became active in converting students to National-Socialism (3302-PS) . This was the start of Schirach's conspiratorial activities, which he continued for 2 decades in the spirit of unbending loyalty to Hitler and to the principles of National-Socialism.

Schirach shows his slavish loyalty to Hitler in his principal book, « The Hitler Youth » , published in 1934 :

« We were not yet able to account for our conception in detail, we simply believed. And when Hitler's book, “ Mein Kampf ”, was published it was our bible which we almost learned by heart in order to answer the questions of the doubters and superior critics. Almost everyone today who is leading youth in a responsible position joined us in those years. »

« In my apartment on “ Königin-Straße ”, I was lucky enough to be able to express my apprehensions about Straßer to the “ Führer ”, otherwise, I never discussed these things with anybody with the exception of Julius Streicher. »

SCHIRACH WAS THE LEADING NAZI CONSPIRATOR IN DESTROYING INDEPENDENT YOUTH ORGANIZATIONS AND IN BUILDING THE NAZI YOUTH MOVEMENT

(Reference is made at this point to section 8 of Chapter VII on « Reshaping of Education and Training of Youth » . See also 3054-PS.)

It was Schirach's task to perpetuate the Nazi regime through generations by poisoning the mind of youth and, thereby, the mind of the German people, and to prepare the German nation for aggressive wars.

The basic law concerning the Hitler Youth, which under Schirach's tutelage became an instrument of the Nazi State, declares :

« The future of the German Nation depends on its youth, and the German youth shall have to be prepared for its future duties. »

« All German youth in the “ Reich ” is organized within the Hitler Youth. »

« The German youth besides being reared within the family and school, shall be educated physically, intellectually, and morally in the spirit of National-Socialism to serve the people and the community, through the Hitler Youth. »

« The task of educating the German Youth through the Hitler Youth is being entrusted to the “ Reich ” Leader of German Youth in the NSDAP. » (1392-PS)

For the 5 years preceding the promulgation of this law, Schirach had been leader of the Hitler Youth and « Reich » Youth Leader of the NSDAP. He continued in these positions until the Nazis launched their aggressive wars. As late as 4 December 1945, Schirach declared his own feeling of responsibility for Nazi policies concerning youth :

« I feel myself responsible for the policy of the youth movement in the Party and later within the “ Reich ”. » (3302-PS)

(1) Schirach actively promoted the NSDAP and its affiliated youth organizations before the Nazis seized power. In 1929, Hitler appointed Schirach leader of the National-Socialist German Students League and, in 1931, leader of the « Hitler Jugend ». After 1931, Schirach devoted his full-time to Party work (3302-PS) . Before 1933, Schirach moved throughout Germany, leading demonstrations and summoning German youth to the Hitler Youth. When this organization and the wearing of its uniform were forbidden by law, Schirach continued by illegal means. Of this period he writes :

« Whoever came to us during this illegal time, boy or girl, risked everything. With pistols in our belts, we drove through the Ruhr district while stones came flying after us. » (1458-PS)

Schirach admits that Alfred Rosenberg and he were not successful before 1933 in efforts to reach « an understanding » with other youth organizations. Schirach states that he thereupon arrived at a conclusion which later was to spell the doom of independent youth groups :

« I realized, at that time, that an understanding with the leaders of the League would never be possible and devoted myself to the principle of the totality (“ Totalitlät ”) of the Hitler Youth which, in the year 1933, cost all those leagues their independent existence. » (1458-PS)

(2) Schirach, on behalf of the Nazi conspirators, destroyed all independent youth organizations or caused them to be absorbed within the Hitler Youth (« Hitler Jugend ») . After the Nazi conspirators seized political control of Germany, Schirach was aggressive in bringing the entire German youth within the Nazi orbit of control and domination. Referring to the period immediately following 30 January 1933, Schirach declared :

« Now the problem was to apply the victory of the movement to the entire youth. Our cabinet ministers were overburdened with their new tasks and were working day and night. We could not wait until they could find time to solve the youth question by their own initiative. Therefore, we had to act ourselves. My co-workers met in my Munich apartment and advised me to occupy the “ Reich ” Committee (“ Reichsausschuß ”) of the German Youth Leagues (“ Jugendverbände ”) . I commissioned General (“ Obergebietsführer ”) Nabsberg with 50 members of the Berlin “ Hitler Jugend ” to make a surprise raid on the “ Reich ” Committee on the “ Alsenstraße ” early the next morning. This was done and, at noon, the press had the report that the Hitler Youth had taken-over the leadership of the “ Reich ” Committee. »

By a 2nd surprise raid, Schirach took-over the Youth Hostels. Of this, Schirach writes in the same book :

« In the meantime, I gained control over the “ Reich ” League for German Youth Hostels (“ Reichsverband für deutsche Jugendherbergen ”) in similar manner to the one employed with the “ Reich ” Committee. » (1458-PS)

By using the records of the seized « Reich » Committee, Schirach states that he obtained knowledge of the strength and influential personalities of all the German youth groups.

« From this point, I recognized the necessity of coming to grips with the Greater German Union (“ Großdeutscher Bund ”) . » (1458-PS)

In June 1933, Schirach was appointed Youth Leader of the German « Reich » (« Jugendführer des Deutschen Reiches ») in a solemn ceremony before Hitler. Concerning the period immediately following, Schirach writes in the same book :

« The 1st thing I did was to dissolve the Greater German Union (“ Großdeutscher Bund ”) . Since I headed all German youth organizations and I had the right to decide on their leadership, I did not hesitate for a moment to take this step, which was for the Hitler Youth the elimination of an unbearable state of affairs. » (1458-PS)

The dissolution of this and other youth organizations was accomplished by orders issued by Schirach as Youth Leader of the German « Reich » . (2229-PS)

In this position, Schirach also appointed Deputies to the various German States (« Landesbeauftragte ») « to carry-out my instructions, and I appointed District leaders (“ Gebietsführer ”) to these positions in all of the States in execution of my right » (1458-PS) . In this book, Schirach also admits directing the further assimilation or destruction of other youth organizations :

« I prohibited the Marxist youth as well as all political youth organizations after the occupation of the “ Reich ” Committee. The 1 million members of the “ Hitler Jugend ” which we had, on 30 January 1933, had grown to a round 3,000,000. Only the 2 large professional groups, the Protestant and Catholic youth, were opposed to us. » (1458-PS)

Schirach proceeded to hold discussions with the Hitler-appointed « Reich » Bishop Ludwig Müller :

« And, in December 1933, the “ Reich ” Bishop and myself were able to inform the “ Führer ” that incorporation of the Protestant youth into the “ Hitler Jugend ” had become a reality. » (1458-PS)

When this book was written, Schirach had not yet accomplished the complete coordination of Catholic youth into the Hitler Youth, though he argued that :

« No reasonable man in Germany can give a reason for the necessity of the existence of Catholic youth organizations in their present form. » (1458-PS)

Schirach's objective of forcing all German youth into the Hitler Youth was finally accomplished by a decree in December 1936. (1392-PS)

(3) Schirach was mainly responsible for the indoctrination and training of German youth outside home and school. The law making compulsory the organization of all German Youth within the Hitler Youth declared that :

« The task of educating the German Youth through the Hitler Youth is being entrusted to the “ Reich ” Youth Leader in the NSDAP. »

To make Schirach's sole competence even clearer, the 1st executive order concerning the basic youth law stated :

« The youth leader of the German “ Reich ” is solely competent for all missions of the physical, ideological, and moral education of the entire German youth outside of the house of the parents and the school. » (1462-PS)

(4) Schirach was the principal Nazi conspirator in applying the Leadership principle to German youth. As a « Reich » Leader (« Reichsleiter ») in the NSDAP, Schirach was responsible only to Hitler or his Deputy (« Stellvertreter ») , Rudolf Heß. In youth affairs, he was at the top of the Nazi leadership pyramid, and under him German youth was directed by and completely subjected to the Leadership Principle. The Leadership Principle, one of the principal control-techniques of the Nazis was explained and glorified by Schirach as it applied to German youth :

« A single will leads the “ Hitler Jugend ”. The power of authority of the “ Hitler Jugend ” leaders, that of the smallest as well as of the largest unit, is absolute, i.e. , he has the unlimited right to give orders because he bears the unlimited responsibility. He knows that the responsibility of the higher one comes before that of the lower ones. Therefore, he submits silently to the instructions of his leaders even if they are directed against him personally. To him, as well as to all young Germany, the history of the “ Hitler Jugend ” is proof of the fact that a youth community also can only be successful if it unconditionally recognizes the authority of leadership. The success of National-Socialism is a success of discipline. The structure of National-Socialist Youth is built on the foundation of discipline and obedience. The teachings of the time of persecution apply even more to the period of victory and power. » (1458-PS)

(5) Schirach indoctrinated youth with the Nazi ideology. Schirach states that :

« It was my task to educate the youth in the aims, ideology and directives of the NSDAP and, beyond this, to direct and to shape them. » (3302-PS)

For this purpose, the Hitler Youth had an elaborate propaganda apparatus which published numerous periodicals, ranging from a daily press service to monthly magazines. Through liaison agents the Hitler Youth Propaganda Office had permanent contact with Doctor Goebbels' Propaganda Office of the NSDAP and with the Ministry of People's Enlightenment and Propaganda. (3349-PS)

Schirach, together with Doctor Robert Ley, established the Adolf Hitler Schools in January 1937. These schools, according to the joint statement of « Reich » Leaders (« Reichsleiter ») Schirach and Ley, were open to outstanding and proven members of the Youth Folk (« Jungvolk »), the junior section of the Hitler Youth organization. The Adolf Hitler Schools were destined to train youth free of charge for responsible positions in National-Socialist Germany. These schools were units of and under the jurisdiction of the Hitler Youth. Schirach shared with « Reich » Organization Leader (« Reichsorganisationsleiter ») Ley the general supervision of the contents of the teaching, the curriculum, and the staff of the Adolf Hitler Schools (2653-PS). Schirach encouraged a close relation between members of the Hitler Youth and the German League for Germanism abroad (« Verein für das Deutschtum im Ausland »), or VDA). An agreement between Schirach and the leaders of the VDA in 1933 states :

« 1) With a complete respect for the important racial-political task, the Hitler Youth recommends to its members membership in collaboration with the “ Verein für das Deutschtum im Ausland ”. »

« 3) The school groups of the “ Verein für das Deutschtum im Ausland ” (racial-German work cells) assist the Hitler Youth in their work. » (L-360- H)

Schirach, thus, subscribed to the « racial-political task » of the NSDAP and extended his jurisdiction even beyond the border of the German « Reich ». His encouragement and approval of anti-Jewish terror by youth is discussed below.

(6) Through the Hitler Youth, Schirach assisted the Nazi conspirators in developing leaders and members of the NSDAP and its affiliated organizations, including the SA and the SS. Sometime before the launching of aggressive wars, the Hitler Youth had become the principal source of zealous members for the NSDAP and its affiliated organizations. Orders of the Party Chancellery concerned with « successor problems » of the Party emphasize constant attention to Hitler Youth members as future Nazi leaders, thus, attempting the perpetuation of the Nazi regime and Nazi ideology for the immediate future and even into future generations. Only Hitler Youth members who distinguished themselves were to be admitted to the Party. Nazi leaders were instructed to use « properly qualified full-time Hitler Youth leaders for the continuation of their political work in the Party service » , so that a necessary succession of full-time leaders in the Leader Corps (« Führerkorps ») of the Party would be secured.

The Party manual also discusses the Hitler Youth as a recruitment agency for future Nazi leaders and members of affiliated organizations of the NSDAP :

« To secure for the Party valuable and trained recruits for leadership, suitable “ Hitler Jugend ” boys of over 17 can be assigned for education and training to leaders from local unit leaders on upwards. »

« Besides the above mentioned conditions for selections in general, a process of elimination results from the fact that from youth on the German is cared for, guided, and educated by the Party. Ist, they are assembled in the Young Folk (“ Jungvolk ”) from which the young people are transferred into the “ Hitler Jugend ”. The boy of the “ Hitler Jugend ” enters the SA, the SS, the NSKK or the NSFK, or participates in the work of the affiliated organizations of the Party. After labour and army service, he returns for service to the Party and its affiliates, respectively. »

Special arrangements existed between Heinrich Himmler's SS and Schirach's Hitler Youth concerning the recruiting of members of the « Hitler Jugend » for later service in the SS. Within the Hitler Youth was a special group called the « Streifendienst » (Patrol Service) . Concerning this special group, an official hand-book on youth laws states :

1) Since the Streifendienst in the “ Hitler Jugend ” has to perform tasks similar to those of the SS for the whole movement, it is organized as a special unit for the purpose of securing recruits for the general SS ; however, as much as possible, recruits for the SS special troops, for the SS Death Head Troops, and for the officer candidate schools should also be taken from these formations. »

4a) The selection of “ Streifendienst ” members is made according to the principles of racial selection of the “ Schutzstaffel ” (SS) ; the competent officials of the SS, primarily unit leaders, race authorities, and SS physicians, will be consulted for the admission test.

5) To insure from the beginning a good understanding between “ Reich ” youth leadership and “ Reich ” SS leadership, a liaison office will be ordered from the “ Reich ” youth leadership to the SS main office, starting 1 October 1938. The appointment of other leaders to the SS sections is a subject for a future agreement.

6) After the organization is completed, the SS takes its replacement primarily from these “ Streifendienst ” members. Admission of youths of German blood who are not members of the “ Hitler Jugend ” is, then, possible only after information and advice of the competent “ Bann ” leader. » (2396-PS)

Shortly afterwards, on 17 December 1938, Schirach and Himmler entered into and signed another agreement for recruiting SS members from the ranks of the Hitler Youth :

« To secure full success for the common effort of the SS and the Hitler Youth by strict cooperation, to stem the flight from the land, to build a new peasant class, to bring the best part of the people into contact with the earth of the homeland, the following arrangement has been made in connection with the agreement of 26 August 1938.

1) The farm service of the Hitler Youth is according to education and aim, particularly well-suited as a recruiting organization for the “ Schutzstaffel ” (general SS and the armed sections of the SS ; SS special troops and SS death head battalions) .

2) Boys who suit the special demands of the SS according to physical conditions and moral attitude are preferably admitted into the farm service of the Hitler Youth.

5) All farm service members who pass the general admission test of the SS will be taken-over into the general SS after leaving the farm service. » (2567-PS)

Thus, by the end of 1938, the Hitler Youth had become the main source for future SS members. (For the criminal activities the SS formations for which Hitler Youth members were recruited, see Section 5 of Chapter XV of the « Schutzstaffel » .)

(7) Schirach actively engaged in militarizing the Hitler Youth. In June 1933, under an agreement between Hitler and Franz Seldte, which was negotiated in the presence of the « Reich » Minister of War, the « Steel Helmet League of Front Line Soldiers » (« Stahlhelm, Bund der Frontsoldaten ») was incorporated into the Nazi movement. The « Scharnhorst » , the youth organization of the « Stahlhelm » , was integrated into the Hitler Youth. (2260-PS)

The Hitler Youth was generally set-up along military lines with uniforms, ranks, and titles. It contained divisions called Naval Hitler Youth, Motorized Hitler Youth, Hitler Youth Flyers, and Signal Hitler Youth. According to an official document published by the « Reich » Youth Leadership under Schirach, the object of these divisions within the Hitler Youth was to prepare boys, respectively, for the German merchant marine and Navy, the National-Socialist Motorized Corps (NSKK) , for civil and military aviation, and for service with signal troops. (2654-PS)

On or around 11 August 1939, just before the invasion of Poland, an agreement was entered into between Schirach and Wilhelm Keitel, then, Chief of the High-Command of the « Wehrmacht » , which was declared by « Das Archiv » to represent « the result of close cooperation » between these 2 conspirators. The agreement itself stated :

« While it is exclusively the task of the Hitler Youth to attend to the training of their units in this direction, it is suitable in the sense of a uniform training corresponding to the demands of the “ Wehrmacht ” to support the leadership of the Hitler Youth for their responsible task as trainers and educators in all fields of training for defence by special courses. A great number of courses are in progress. » (2398-PS)

The agreement stated that it « gives the possibility of roughly re-doubling the same 30,000 leaders in the Hitler Youth schools for directing shooting practice and field training. Under the agreement, specific arrangements were made for messing and billeting the Hitler Youth leaders at “ Wehrmacht ” installations. » Former Hitler Youth leaders in the « Wehrmacht » , who were specially selected volunteers, were to be assigned as liaison officers and deputies for carrying out this military training. (2398-PS)

Hitler, in a speech in February 1938, represented that thousands of German boys had received specialized training in naval, aviation, and motorized groups within the Hitler Youth, and that over 1 million Hitler Youth members had received instructions in rifle shooting from 7,000 instructors. (2454-PS)

SCHIRACH PROMOTED THE ACCESSION TO POWER OF THE NAZI CONSPIRATORS

This allegation of the Indictment is born-out by Schirach's activities in converting students to National-Socialism and by his Leadership of the Hitler Youth before the Nazis' seizure of political power. These activities are described above.

SCHIRACH PROMOTED THE CONSOLIDATION OF POWER OF THE NAZI CONSPIRATORS

Schirach's acts in accomplishing the Nazis' complete control over German youth are described above. These acts were of notable assistance to the Nazi conspirators in acquiring complete control of Germany during the pre-War years. Schirach's own words in 1938 leave no doubt as to his own feeling of personal responsibility in this connection :

« The struggle for the unification of the German youth is finished. I consider it as my duty to conduct it in a hard and uncompromising manner. Many might not have realized why we went through so much trouble for the sake of the youth. And yet : The National-Socialist German Workers' Party, whose trustee I felt I always was and always will be, this Party considered the struggle for the youth as the decisive element for the future of the German nation.

And I promise the German public that the youth of the German “ Reich ”, the youth of Adolf Hitler, will accomplish its duty in the spirit of the man to whom alone their lives belong. » (2306-PS)

SCHIRACH PROMOTED THE PSYCHOLOGICAL AND EDUCATIONAL PREPARATIONS FOR AGGRESSIVE WAR AND THE MILITARIZATION OF NAZI-DOMINATED ORGANIZATIONS

A general outline of Schirach's acts bearing on this allegation of the Indictment appears above. By his own admission, Schirach was the principal Nazi responsible for driving the entire Nazi ideology into the minds of German youths, many of whom grew-up to be fanatical Nazis like Schirach himself. From Hitler, in 1938, came boastings of the accomplishments of the Hitler Youth in military training. Through the vast propaganda work of the « Reich » Youth Leadership, through the Adolf Hitler Schools, through the minute regimentation of youth and its subjection to the Leadership Principle, and through the military training of German youth, Schirach fulfilled the edict of the basic law concerning the Hitler Youth :

« The future of the German nation depends on its youth, and the German youth shall have to be prepared for its future duties. »

It has been demonstrated that the future duties of the youth entrusted to Schirach were participation in aggressive wars.

SCHIRACH'S GENERAL FUNCTIONS AND RESPONSIBILITIES AS PARTY AND GOVERNMENT LEADER IN THE REICHSGAU VIENNA

(1) « Gau » Leader (« Gauleiter ») Schirach was « Gau » Leader of the NSDAP for the « Reichsgau Wien » , from July 1940 to 1945. In common with all other « Gau » Leaders, Schirach was the highest-representative of Hitler, the supreme Party Leader, in his « Gau » , he was the bearer of sovereignty (« Hoheitsträger ») of the Party for this regional division of the Party. As such, he possessed « sovereign political rights » he represented the Party with « Gau » ; and he was « responsible for the entire political situation within » this « Gau » . (1893-PS)

The Party manual makes it mandatory-that each « Gau » Leader meet, at least once a month, with leaders of the affiliated organizations of the NSDAP, including the SA and the SS, « for the purpose of mutual orientation » and authorizes the « Gau » Leader to call upon SA leaders and SS leaders as « needed for the execution of a political mission » . As a « Gau » Leader, Schirach was appointed by Hitler and was « directly subordinate » to him. He was responsible for coordinating activities of the NSDAP with various State authorities, including the police and the « Gestapo » . (1893-PS)

(2) « Reich » Governor (« Reichsstatthalter ») Schirach was « Reich » Governor of the « Reichsgau Wien » , from July 1940 to 1945. After the « Anschluß » , the Nazi conspirators abolished the State of Austria as a sovereign State and divided Austria into 7 « Reich Gaus » , the most important of which was the « Reichsgau Wien » . Schirach, in his capacity as « Reich » Governor, was the lieutenant of the head of the German State, Hitler, in his « Gau » . As « Reich » Governor, he was authorized to make decrees and issue orders within the limitations set by the supreme « Reich » authorities (« Oberste Reichsbehörden ») . He was especially under the administrative supervision of Wilhelm Frick, « Reich » Minister of Interior. The « Reich » Governor was also 1st mayor (« Erster Bürgermeister ») of Vienna. (3301-PS)

Schirach was also « Reich » Defence Commissar of Vienna, from 1940 to 1945. These government positions, along with his leadership of the Party in Vienna, made Schirach the most important representative of the Nazi conspirators in the « Reichsgau Wien » . Schirach himself states that as « Reich » Governor his « field was the direction of the general administration » in Vienna. (3302-PS)

As the highest Party and State leader in the « Reichsgau Wien » , Schirach was responsible for all the crimes of the Nazi conspirators in the « Reichsgau Wien » on the ground that he either initiated, approved, executed, or abetted them. Specific examples, described below, demonstrate that, in fact, he was actively and personally engaged in Nazi crimes.

SCHIRACH PARTICIPATED IN THE CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, PARTICULARLY ANTI-SEMITIC MEASURES

Schirach bears responsibility for providing many, if not most, of the Death Head (« Totenkopf ») members of the SS, who, in the main, administered the concentration camps. As particularized above, the SS, by agreement between Himmler and Schirach, took « its replacement primarily » from « Streifendienst » members of the Hitler Youth and, only upon special permission, could a non Hitler Youth become an SS man. Nor can Schirach escape responsibility for his assistance in implanting in youth the Nazi ideology, with its tenets of a Master race, « sub-human » peoples, and world domination. For such notions were the psychological prerequisites for the instigation and toleration of the atrocities which zealous Nazis committed throughout Germany and the occupied countries.

(I) Schirach directed and participated in the Nazi conspirators' slave labour program.

Vienna was one of the principal cities and an independent « Reichsgau » of Greater Germany. Schirach, as « Gau » Leader and « Reich » Governor, was delegated far-reaching responsibilities concerning the slave labour program and, hence, shares responsibility for crimes of slave labour. (3552-PS)

This document proves that the « Gau » Leaders were required to be the supreme integrating and coordinating agents of the Nazi conspirators in executing the entire man-power program. A circular of the Party Chancellery of 22 March 1942 states that Hermann Göring, upon the suggestion of Fritz Sauckel, had agreed that the « Gau » Leaders were to become active as Sauckel's special Plenipotentiaries (« Bevollmaechtigte ») in order that ...

« By the leadership of the Party in full appreciation of the competence of the corresponding « Reich » authorities, the highest-efficiency in the field of man-power shall be guaranteed. » (3352-PS)

Göring gave Sauckel authority to issue orders to « the agencies of the Party, its member organizations and affiliated organizations » as well as to governmental authorities. By an order of 6 April 1942, Sauckel appointed the « Gau » Leaders as his « plenipotentiaries for man-power within their respective Gaus », and charged them with the ...

« establishment of a harmonious cooperation of all agencies of the State, of the Party, of the Armed Forces, and of the Economy, charged with problems of man-power and, thus, to create agreement between the different conceptions and requirements to obtain the highest-efficiency in the field of man-power. » (3352- PS)

To insure that the « Gau » Leaders could efficiently perform their man-power tasks, the entire staff of the Provincial Labour Offices were ...

« directed to be at the disposal of the “ Gau ” Leaders for information and advice and to fulfill the suggestions and demands of the “ Gau ” Leader for the purpose of improvements or man-power. »

In this same order, Sauckel said :

« By the above mentioned commission of the “ Gau ” Leaders of the NSDAP, I intend to lead man-power utilization to the greatest success. »

Thus, Sauckel, himself an experienced « Gau » Leader, bears witness to the involvement after 1942 of the « Gau » Leaders, including Schirach, in the man-power utilization program of the Nazi conspirators.

Furthermore, a circular from the Party Chancellery of 4 August 1942, shows that « Bearers of Sovereignty » (« Hoheitsträger ») of the NSDAP (which included the « Gau » Leaders and, hence, Schirach) were to familiarize themselves with the execution of man-power directives on Eastern workers. One of the purposes of this directive was to prevent « inept Factory heads » from giving « too much consideration for the care of the Eastern Workers and, thereby, causing justified annoyance among the German workers » (3352-PS) .

(2) Schirach participated in the conspiracy to persecute the Churches. The activity of Schirach in persecuting churches by dissolving religious youth organizations or by incorporating them in the Hitler Youth has been set forth above.

Official letters of Martin Bormann and Hans Lammers, in March 1941, show that church properties in Austria had been confiscated for various pretexts after Schirach had become « Gau » Leader and « Reich » Governor of the « Reichsgau Wien » . Upon a visit of Hitler to Vienna, Schirach and 2 other officials raised with him a complaint that the confiscations should be made in favour of « Gaus » rather than of the « Reich » . Thereafter, all « Gauleiters » were notified that the decision had been made in favour of the position Schirach had taken before Hitler, namely in favor of the « Gaus » . (R-146)

(3) Schirach participated in the Conspiracy to persecute the Jews. Even before assuming his Governmental functions in the « Reichsgau Wien » , Schirach was responsible for encouraging anti-Jewish terror. Before 1939, at a meeting of Heidelberg students of the National-Socialist German Students « Bund » (NSDStB) , Schirach was chief-speaker. After praising the students for devoting so much of their time to the affairs of the Party, ...

« he declared that the most important phase of German University life in the 3rd “ Reich ” was the program of the NSDStB. He extolled various activities of the “ Bund ”. He reminded the boys of the service they had rendered during the Jewish purge. Dramatically, he pointed across the river to the old University town of Heidelberg where several burnt-out synagogues were mute witnesses of the efficiency of Heidelberg students. Those skeleton buildings would remain there for Centuries, as inspiration for future students, as warning to enemies of the State. » (2441-PS)

Immediately after becoming « Gau » Leader and « Reich » Governor of the « Reichsgau Wien » , Schirach's anti-Jewish measures assumed more formidable proportions. As early as 7 November 1940, one Doctor Fischer, « by order » of the « Reich » Governor Schirach stated that ...

« Investigations are being made at present by the “ Gestapo ”, to find-out how many able-bodied Jews are still available in order to make plans for the contemplated mass-projects. It is assumed that there are not many more Jews available. If some still should be available, however, the “ Gestapo ” has no scruples to use the Jews even for the removal of the destroyed synagogues. SS Colonel Huber will report personally to the “ Regierungspräsident ” in this matter. » (1948-PS)

The « Regierungspräsident » was « Reich » Governor Schirach's personal representative « within the governmental administration » (« in der staatlichen Verwaltung ») of the « Reichsgau » . (3301-PS)

The above letter indicates that Schirach and his immediate subordinates not only knew of the atrocities which had been committed against the Jews by the Nazi conspirators in the « Reichsgau » , but also that they endorsed further forced labour of Jews and worked intimately with the « Gestapo » and the SS in their measures of persecution. Within 6 months after Schirach became « Gau » Leader and « Reich » Governor of Vienna, Doctor Hans Lammers informed Schirach that ...

« The “ Führer ” has decided after receipt of one of the reports made by you, that the 60,000 Jews still residing in the “ Reichsgau Wien ”, will be deported most rapidly, that is still during the War, to the General Government because of the housing shortage prevalent in Vienna. » (1950-PS)

Lammers' letter, dated 3 December 1940, informed Schirach that the Governor General of Poland, Hans Frank, and the « Reichsführer SS » , Heinrich Himmler, had been informed of the « Führer » 's decision. (1950-PS)

Schirach's guilt in this connection, by his own admission, however, runs even deeper. In a statement to the so called European Youth League in Vienna, in 1942, Schirach stated :

« Every Jew who exerts influence in Europe is a danger to European culture. If anyone reproaches me with having driven from this city, which was once the European metropolis of Jewry, tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of Jews into the ghetto of the East, I feel myself compelled to reply : I see in this an action contributing to European culture. » (3048-PS)

(4) Conclusion. Schirach bears responsibility for rendering significant aid to the Nazi conspirators in each major phase of the conspiracy ; winning Nazi supporters before the seizure of power ; consolidating the Nazis' control of Germany after the seizure of power ; preparing for aggressive wars ; and conducting aggressive wars. From the beginning, he held important policy-making and administrative positions. From 1931 to the Nazis' downfall, he was one of the small group of « Reich » Leaders (« Reichsleiter ») of the NSDAP who consorted together, directly subordinate only to Adolf Hitler himself, and who provided the inner-most leaven of the Leadership Corps of the Party. For nearly a decade, he was fully in charge of perpetrating the Nazi regime by poisoning the minds of the young generation. Although his principal assistance to the conspiracy was given by his commission of German youth to the conspirators' objectives, still he also conspired to wage crimes against humanity as a Party and governmental administrator of high-standing after the conspiracy had reached its inevitable involvement in war of aggression.

Baldur von Schirach was the leader of the Hitler Youth and, later, the « Gauleiter » of Vienna. He was charged with « Crimes Against Peace », but was correctly found « Not Guilty ». He was convicted of « Crimes Against Humanity » for his actions in Vienna concerning the Jewish population. The evidence that he had actual knowledge of the ultimate fate awaiting the Jews he allowed to be herded-out of Vienna was mostly circumstantial, but more compelling than that against Julius Streicher.

Any objective observer hearing just the evidence presented would be forced to conclude that von Schirach's degree of guilt was greater than Streicher's. Then, why was von Schirach sentenced to 20 years imprisonment while Streicher was executed ? This disparity can be entirely explained by a lack of blind justice resulting from the courts consideration of mitigating factors and cosmetic intangibles.

There were 3 big differences between von Schirach and Streicher :

Streicher was a publisher and private citizen. Von Schirach had an official position and, thus, was in the loop, receiving official reports and signing orders.

Streicher's anti-Semitism was virulent and prolific, while von Schirach's was rare and relatively moderate.

Streicher was defiant, repulsive, and completely un-repentant, while von Schirach was cooperative, personable, and repentant.

The following piece of testimony from Baldur von Schirach is an example of the sort of statements the Nuremberg Court accepted. Because it suited the narrative desired to do so, and the Prosecution failed to present very much evidence to dispute it.

From Schirach's International Military Tribunal testimony :

« I did not make any inflammatory anti-Semitic speeches, since I attempted, both as “ Reich ” Youth Leader and youth educator, not to add fuel to the fire ; for neither in my books nor in my speeches (with the exception of one speech in Vienna, to which I shall refer later on and which was not made at the time when I was “ Reich ” Youth Leader) have I made any inflammatory statements of an anti-Semitic nature. I will not make myself ridiculous by stating here that I was not an anti-Semite ; I was - although I never addressed myself to the youth in that sense. »

Next, an excerpt from the same speech von Schirach and, in fact, is the most damaging piece of documentation against him ...

From a speech by Schirach before the European Youth Congress in Vienna (15 September 1942) :

« Every Jew who exerts influence in Europe is a danger to European culture. If anyone reproaches me with having driven from this city, which was once the European metropolis of Jewry, tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of Jews into the ghetto of the East, I feel myself compelled to reply, " I see in this an action contributing to European culture ". »

Julius Streicher said worse before breakfast. He would have laughed had he been confronted with a similar quote attributed to himself, and would no doubt have opined that he had only been speaking the truth. In contrast, here is how Schirach responded when confronted with this quote ...

From Schirach's International Military Tribunal testimony :

« Ist, I want to say that I did make that speech. The quotation is correct. I said that. I must stand by what I have said. Although the plan of the deportation of the Jews was Hitler's plan and I was not charged with its execution, I did utter those words, which I now sincerely regret ; but I must say that I identified myself morally with that action only out of a feeling of misplaced loyalty to the " Führer ". That I have done, and that cannot be undone. If I am to explain how I came to do this, I can only reply that, at that time, I was already " between the Devil and the deep sea ".

I believe it will also become clear from my later statements that, from a certain moment on, I had Hitler against me, the Party Chancellery against me, and very many members of the Party itself against me. Constantly, I heard from officials of the Party Chancellery who expressed that to the " Gauleiter " of Vienna, and from statements made in Hitler's entourage, that one was under the impression (and that this could be clearly recognized from my attitude and my actions) that I was no longer expressing myself publicly in the usual anti-Semitic manner or in other ways, either ; and I just have no excuse. But it may perhaps serve as an explanation, that I was trying to extricate myself from this painful situation by speaking in a manner which today I can no longer justify to myself. »

This is a far cry from Streicher's usual manner of spitting in the courts eye during testimony. But is it proper that a court should weigh questions of style ? Most would say yes, it is. The court considered von Schirach's expressions of regret and remorse, combined with his frank admission of guilt, mitigating factors, and this sort of consideration is traditional and expected.

Another circumstance the court seemed to feel was obviously mitigating was the relationship of the accused with Hitler. Such occurrences as Hjalmar Schacht's incarceration in a concentration camp, Albert Speer's supposed plot to kill Hitler, and Erich Ræder's dismissal, carried much weight with the judges ; too much, in my view. Below is some documentation of an incident the court found nearly as fascinating as Speer's tales of assassination plots foiled ...

24 June 1943 : During a visit to the Berghof by von Schirach and his wife, von Schirach falls-out with Hitler. He will spend the final days of Hitler's « Reich » in fear of arrest, or worse.

From Schirach's International Military Tribunal testimony :

« The difference between Hitler and myself arose primarily over an art exhibition, and the breach between Hitler and myself, in 1943, was in the beginning the result of differences of opinion over the cultural policy. In 1943, I was ordered to the Berghof where Hitler, in the presence of Bormann, criticized me violently on account of my cultural work and literally said that I was leading the cultural opposition against him in Germany. And further, in the course of the conversation, he said that I was mobilizing the spiritual forces of Vienna and Austria and the spiritual forces of the young people against him in cultural spheres. He said he knew it very well indeed. He had read some of my speeches, primarily the Düsseldorf speech ; he had discovered that I had authorized in Weimar and in Vienna art exhibitions of a decadent nature ; and he offered me the alternative, either to end this kind of opposition work immediately (then, for the time being, everything could remain as in the past) or he would stop all Government subsidies for Vienna.

This scene made a frightful impression on me, for it represented to me a breach of Hitler's promised word, since he had granted me absolute freedom of action when he appointed me to the Vienna mission. I, then, recognized that he nourished an icy hatred toward me, and that behind these statements on cultural policies something else was concealed. Whether he was dissatisfied in every detail with the way I conducted my office in Vienna at the time, I do not know. He rarely expressed himself directly about such matters. From his entourage, I learned only of occasional happenings.

I then (and that led to the complete and final break between Hitler and myself a few weeks after I had received this order, if I may call it so) received a strange invitation for myself and my wife to spend some time on the Berghof. At that time, I innocently believed that Hitler wished to bridge the gap between us and to let me know, in one way or another, that he had gone too far. In any case, at the end of a 3 days' visit (I cut my stay short) , I discovered that this was a fundamental error on my part. Here, I will limit myself to a few points only. I had intended (and I also carried-out my intention) to mention at least 3 points during my visit. One was the policy toward Russia, the 2nd was the " Jewish Question ", and the 3rd was Hitler's attitude toward Vienna.

I must state, to begin with, that Bormann had issued a decree addressed to me, and probably to all the other " Gauleiter " 's, prohibiting any intervention on our part in the " Jewish Question ". That is to say, we could not intervene with Hitler in favour of any Jew or half-Jew. That too was stated in the decree. I have to mention this, since it makes matters clearer.

On the 1st evening of my stay at the Berghof, on what appeared to me a propitious occasion, I told Hitler that I was of the opinion that a free and autonomous Ukraine would serve the " Reich " better than a Ukraine ruled by the violence of " Herr " Koch. That was all I said, nothing more, nothing less. Knowing Hitler as I did, it was extremely difficult even to hazard such a remark. Hitler answered comparatively quietly but with pronounced sharpness. On the same evening, or possibly the next one, the " Jewish Question " was broached according to a plan I made with my wife. Since I was forbidden to mention these things even in conversation, my wife gave the " Führer " a description of an experience she had had in Holland. She had witnessed one night, from the bedroom of her hotel, the deportation of Jewish women by the " Gestapo ". We were both of the opinion that this experience during her journey and the description of it might possibly result in a change of Hitler's attitude toward the entire " Jewish Question " and in the treatment of the Jews. My wife gave a very drastic description, a description such as we can now read in the papers.

Hitler was silent. All the other witnesses to this conversation, including my own father-in-law, Professor Hoffmann, were also silent. The silence was icy, and after a short time Hitler merely said, " This is pure sentimentality. " That was all. No further conversation took place that evening. Hitler retired earlier than usual. I was under the impression that a perfectly untenable situation had now arisen. Then, the men of Hitler's entourage told my father-in-law that, from now on, I would have to fear for my safety. I endeavoured to get away from the Berghof as quickly as possible without letting matters come to an open break, but I did not succeed.

Then Goebbels arrived on the next evening and there, in my presence and without my starting it, the subject of Vienna was broached. I was naturally compelled to protest against the statements that Goebbels at 1st made about the Viennese. Then, the " Führer " began with, I might say, incredible and unlimited hatred to speak against the people of Vienna. I have to admit, here and now, that even if the people of Vienna are cursing me today, I have always felt very friendly toward them. I have felt closely attached to those people. I will not say more than that Joseph Weinheber was one of my closest friends. During that discussion, I, in accordance with my duty and my feelings, spoke in favour of the people under my authority in Vienna.

At 4 o'clock in the morning, among other things, Hitler suddenly said something that I should now like to repeat for historical reasons. He said, " Vienna should never have been admitted into the Union of Greater Germany. " Hitler never loved Vienna. He hated its people. I believe that he had a liking for the city because he appreciated the architectural design of the buildings on the " Ring ". But everybody who knows Vienna knows that the true Vienna is architecturally Gothic, and that the buildings on the " Ring " are not really representative.

I only want to say that so total a break resulted from that discussion (or, rather explosion) of Hitler's that on that, very night at about 4:30, I took my leave and left the Berghof a few hours later. Since then, I had no further conversations with Hitler. »

Nicolaus von Below, Hitler's long-time adjutant, wrote of the split from Hitler's perspective. Hitler had told Below that, while the above disputes with Schirach were annoying, what really set him off was that Schirach had insisted that the War was lost and that a way should be found to put an end to it.

From Below's memoirs :

« How does Schirach imagine that ending the War can be done ?

Hitler indignantly told me : " He knows just as well as I that there is no way out anymore, other of course than my shooting myself. " Hitler was very put-out over this conversation with Schirach, and made very plain that he wanted nothing more to do with him. And, indeed, it was their last encounter. »

The court considered such insider gossip compelling, and took what can only be considered undue notice of such tales.

In von Schirach's case, other Defendants were more than willing to contribute to the narrative ...

Summer 1943 : Schirach writes one last letter to Hitler.

From Hermann Göring's International Military Tribunal testimony :

« At that time, the “ Führer ” had not been kindly disposed to von Schirach for several months and had repeatedly considered withdrawing him from office. He said on this occasion - and that is how I came into possession of this letter, for he handed it to me : “ Schirach seems to plan for his future protection. I have a certain suspicion. ” Then, in the presence of Bormann, I told the “ Führer ” very clearly and definitely that this was entirely unfounded ; that I could not understand his attitude toward Schirach, and that Schirach had done the only possible and decent thing when, before dismissing any of his collaborators or subordinates for such reasons, he demanded the clarification of his own position, since his connections were known ; and that, in my opinion, this letter had no other purpose. I know that Bormann and Himmler were opposed to Schirach. Whether they wanted to give this letter an entirely different interpretation in order to induce the “ Führer ” to recall Schirach and eliminate him, and how far Himmler's suggestion went, whether protective custody was considered, I do not know. But I heard about these things from other sources later on. »

From Schirach's International Military Tribunal testimony :

« I must now refer to something else in this connection. “ Reich ” Marshal Göring, in the witness box, mentioned a letter of mine which Hitler had shown him, and “ Herr ” von Ribbentrop has stated here that he was present at a conversation during which Himmler suggested to Hitler that I be indicted before the People's Court, which meant in reality that I should be hanged. I must add one thing more : What Göring said about this letter is mainly true. I wrote in quite a proper manner about family relations in that letter. I also wrote one sentence to the effect that I considered War with America a disaster.

The letter was correct. It was written by hand, and no secretary read it. It went by courier to the head of the State. It is also possible that it was addressed in care of Bormann. I cannot remember exactly. It went by courier, and that letter contained nothing else but the clarification required for replying to questions put to me in a circular which Göring mentioned in his statement here. That letter caused Hitler to have an absolute loathing for me ; and, at about the same time, a file was started against me in the “ Reich ” Security Main Office. That was due to the fact that I had described in a small circle of political leaders (of high-ranking political leaders) the foreign political situation such as I saw it, as I was accustomed to do from the days of my youth. One of these leaders was an SS intelligence officer and reported what I said, and then the file was started. The material was compiled in order to eventually bring me to trial. That I was never brought to trial I owe solely and exclusively to the circumstance that both, in the Army and at home, my comrades from the Youth Leadership stood solidly behind me, and any proceedings against me would have led to trouble. After 20 July 1944, my situation became very precarious. My friends in the Army, therefore, placed a company of hand-picked men at my disposal. They were under the orders of the former adjutant of “ Generaloberst ” Fromm. The company was directly subordinate to me. It took-over the protection of my person and remained with me to the end. »

Even more than tales of gossip and intrigue in Hitler's inner-circle, the Tribunal appreciated any testimony that confirmed the legitimacy of the court. One of the main behind-the-scenes undercurrents of the trial was the battle for the hearts and minds of the defeated German populace. The Trial was broadcast live throughout Germany, and the Judges and Prosecutors were mindful of the propaganda aspect of the proceedings and its impact on occupied Germany. Statements such as von Schirach's one item below were comparatively rare, and each and every one was a godsend to Allied occupation authorities.

From The Nuremberg Trial by Ann and John Tusa :

« Gilbert had gone on to say that Schirach's early rise to power had gone “ to his Romantic head ” and that he was now “ disillusioned at what he feels to be the betrayal of German youth by the elder leaders ”. Gilbert had actively nurtured this disillusionment in recent months. It is hard to believe that Gilbert was acting purely on his own initiative. Others beside must have seen an advantage in persuading the former leader of those young people to reject the training they had received and set them on a less dangerous path for the future. Should German youth come to share Schirach's disillusion, Germany would be easier to settle and incorporate into the European community. But there is no evidence to show that Gilbert discussed his strategy with others. Nor is there a hint anywhere that a bargain was considered. On the contrary, the prosecution records suggest that every effort was made to secure the maximum sentence. Gilbert's diary shows Schirach struggling with his conscience, until deciding in early May that he had one last mission to the young people of Germany - to denounce Hitler before he died. He got his courage to the sticking point in the witness box around mid-morning on 24 May. He was noticeably ashen-faced. »

The testimony that probably saved von Schirach's life ...

From Schirach's International Military Tribunal testimony :

« It [Auschwitz] is the greatest, the most devilish mass-murder known to history. But that murder was not committed by Höß ; Höß was merely the executioner. The murder was ordered by Adolf Hitler, as is obvious from his last will and testament. The will is genuine. I have held the photostat copy of that will in my hands. He and Himmler jointly committed that crime which, for all time, will be a stain in the annals of our history. It is a crime which fills every German with shame.

The youth of Germany is guiltless. Our youth was anti-Semitic ally inclined, but it did not call for the extermination of Jewry. It neither realized nor imagined that Hitler had carried-out this extermination by the daily murder of thousands of innocent people. The youth of Germany who, today, stand perplexed among the ruins of their native land, knew nothing of these crimes, nor did they desire them. They are innocent of all that Hitler has done to the Jewish and to the German people.

I should like to say the following in connection with Höß' case. I have educated this generation in faith and loyalty to Hitler. The Youth Organization which I built-up bore his name. I believed that I was serving a leader who would make our people and the youth of our country great and happy and free. Millions of young people believed this, together with me, and saw their ultimate ideal in National-Socialism. Many died for it. Before God, before the German nation, and before my German people, I alone bear the guilt of having trained our young people for a man whom I, for many long years, had considered unimpeachable, both as a leader and as the head of the State, of creating for him a generation who saw him as I did. The guilt is mine in that I educated the youth of Germany for a man who murdered by the millions. I believed in this man, that is all I can say for my excuse and for the characterization of my attitude. This is my own - my own personal guilt.

I was responsible for the youth of the country. I was placed in authority over the young people, and the guilt is mine alone. The younger generation is guiltless. It grew-up in an anti-Semitic State, ruled by anti-Semitic laws. Our youth was bound by these laws and saw nothing criminal in racial politics. But if anti-Semitism and racial laws could lead to an Auschwitz, then, Auschwitz must mark the end of racial politics and the death of anti-Semitism. Hitler is dead. I never betrayed him ; I never tried to overthrow him ; I remained true to my oath as an officer, a youth leader, and an official. I was no blind collaborator of his ; neither was I an opportunist. I was a convinced National-Socialist from my earliest days - as such, I was also an anti-Semite. Hitler's racial policy was a crime which led to disaster for 5,000,000 Jews and for all the Germans. The younger generation bears no guilt. But he who, after Auschwitz, still clings to racial politics has rendered himself guilty. That is what I consider my duty to State in connection with the Höß case. »

From The Nuremberg Trial by Ann and John Tusa :

« During the statement Gilbert had noticed the tension in the dock : Frank, Funk and Ræder dabbing their eyes, Streicher sneering. When Schirach went down to lunch he was congratulated by Fritzsche, Funk and Speer, and in their own room Papen, Neurath and Schacht agreed he was perfectly right in his judgement of Hitler. Göring had not been in court ; he was excused on grounds of indisposition. Gilbert suspected that Göring was unwilling to sit through the embarrassment of hearing what Schirach was going to say. That evening Göring complained in equal measure of “ treachery ” and “ sciata ” - evidently, suffering from all kinds of stabs in the back.

During the weekend, Schirach mulled-over what he had said. He talked now of Hitler's ingratitude, the way he himself had been rejected from 1943 and put in constant fear of arrest. He hinted that Hitler had never been at ease among women. He was pleased that Gilbert had taken the notes for his statement to 2 former Hitler Youth leaders who were being held in the witness wing of the jail and that they had been impressed, and promised to circulate it among former members. Speer was delighted by what had happened. He suggested that he and Schirach should now call each other by the intimate “ du ”. This invitation held-out the prospect of an additional pleasure : “ Göring will have a stroke. ” “ The Times ” considered that Schirach's statement had been expressed in “ the bitterest terms the court has heard yet ”.

Conclusion : If one accepts that von Schirach was guiltier than Streicher, then, the only logical reason that the youth leader managed to salvage his existence was that the court considered his admission of guilt, and his expressions of remorse, the ultimate in mitigating testimony. It confirmed aspects of the Prosecutions case and validated the Tribunal's mission. It was in this manner that he avoided the noose. Whether or not Justice was served in the process is debatable, but the Judges no doubt felt that the sentence of 20 years was a fair one under the circumstances. »

The official judgment pronounced by Major-General Iona Timofeevich Nikitchenko

Von Schirach is indicted under Counts 1 and 4. He joined the Nazi Party and the SA in 1925. In 1929, he became the Leader of the National-Socialist Students Union. In 1931, he was made « Reich » Youth Leader of the Nazi Party with control over all Nazi youth organizations including the « Hitler Jugend ». In 1933, after the Nazis had obtained control of the Government, von Schirach was made Leader of Youth in the German « Reich », originally a position within the Ministry of the Interior, but, after 1st December, 1936, an office in the « Reich » Cabinet. In 1940, von Schirach resigned as head of the « Hitler Jugend » and Leader of Youth in the German « Reich », but retained his position as « Reichsleiter » with control over Youth Education. In 1940, he was appointed « Gauleiter » of Vienna, « Reich » Governor of Vienna, and « Reich » Defence Commissioner for that territory.

Crimes against Peace

After the Nazis had come to power von Schirach, utilising both physical violence and official pressure, either drove-out of existence or took-over all youth groups which competed with the « Hitler Jugend ». A Hitler decree of 1st December, 1936, incorporated all German youth within the « Hitler Jugend ». By the time formal conscription was introduced in 1940. 97 % of those eligible were already members.

Von Schirach used the « Hitler Jugend » to educate German Youth « in the spirit of National-Socialism » and subjected them to an intensive programme of Nazi propaganda. He established the « Hitler Jugend » as a source of replacements for the Nazi Party formations. In October 1938, he entered into an agreement with Himmler under which members of the « Hitler Jugend » who met SS standards would be considered as the primary source of replacements for the SS.

Von Schirach also used the « Hitler Jugend » for pre-military training. Special units were set-up whose primary purpose was training specialists for the various branches of the service. On 11th August 1939, he entered into an agreement with Keitel under which the « Hitler Jugend » agreed to carry-out its pre-military activities under standards laid down by the « Wehrmacht » and the « Wehrmacht » agreed to train 30,000 « Hitler Jugend » instructors each year. The « Hitler Jugend » placed particular emphasis on the military spirit and its training programme stressed the importance of return of the colonies, the necessity for « Lebensraum » and the noble destiny of German youth to die for Hitler.

Despite the War-like nature of the activities of the « Hitler Jugend », however, it does not appear that von Schirach was involved in the development of Hitler's plan for territorial expansion by means of aggressive War, or that he participated in the planning or preparation of any of the Wars of aggression.

In July 1940, von Schirach was appointed « Gauleiter » of Vienna. At the same time, he was appointed « Reich » Governor for Vienna and « Reich » Defence Commissioner originally for Military District 17, including the « Gaus » of Vienna, Upper-Danube and Lower-Danube and, after 17th November 1942, for the « Gau » of Vienna alone. As « Reich » Defence Commissioner, he had control of the civilian war economy. As « Reich » Governor he was head of the municipal administration of the city of Vienna, and, under the supervision of the Minister of the Interior in charge of the governmental administration of the « Reich » in Vienna.

Von Schirach is not charged with the commission of War crimes in Vienna, only with the commission of crimes against humanity. As has already been seen, Austria was occupied pursuant to a common plan of aggression. Its occupation is, therefore, a « crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal », as that term is used in Article 6 (c) of the Charter. As a result, « murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhumane acts » and « persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds » in connection with this occupation constitute a crime against humanity under that Article.

As « Gauleiter » of Vienna, von Schirach came under the Sauckel decree dated 6th April, 1942, making the « Gauleiters » Sauckel's plenipotentiaries for man-power with authority to supervise the utilization and treatment of man-power within their « Gaus ». Sauckel's directives provided that the forced labourers were to be fed, sheltered and treated so as to exploit them to the highest possible degree at the lowest possible expense.

When von Schirach became « Gauleiter » of Vienna the deportation of the Jews had already been begun, and Only 60,000 out of Vienna's original 190,000 Jews remained. On 2nd October 1940, he attended a conference at Hitler's office and told Frank that he had 50,000 Jews in Vienna which the General Government would have to take-over from him. On 3rd December 1940, von Schirach received a letter from Lammers stating that after the receipt of the reports made by von Schirach, Hitler had decided to deport the 60,000 Jews still remaining in Vienna to the General Government because of the housing shortage in Vienna. The deportation of the Jews from Vienna was, then, begun and continued until the early fall of 1942. On 15th September 1942, von Schirach made a speech in which he defended his action in having driven « tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of Jews into the Ghetto of the East » as « contributing to European culture » .

While the Jews were being deported from Vienna reports, addressed to him in his official capacity, were received in von Schirach's office from the office of the Chief of the Security Police and SD which contained a description of the activities of « Einsatzgruppen » in exterminating Jews. Many of these reports were initialled by one of von Schirach's principal deputies. On 30th June 1944, von Schirach's office also received a letter from Kaltenbrunner informing him that a shipment of 12,000 Jews was on its way to Vienna for essential War work and that all those who were incapable of work would have to be kept in readiness for « special action » .

The Tribunal finds that von Schirach, while he did not originate the policy of deporting Jews from Vienna, participated in this deportation after he had become « Gauleiter » of Vienna. He knew that the best the Jews could hope for was a miserable existence in the Ghettos of the East. Bulletins describing the Jewish extermination were in his office.

While « Gauleiter » of Vienna, von Schirach continued to function as « Reichsleiter » for Youth Education and, in this capacity, he was informed of the « Hitler Jugend » 's participation in the plan put into effect in the fall of 1944 under which 50,000 young people between the ages of 10 and 20 were evacuated into Germany from areas recaptured by the Soviet forces and used as apprentices in German industry and as auxiliaries in units of the German armed forces. In the summer of 1942, von Schirach telegraphed Bormann urging that a bombing attack on an English cultural town be carried-out in retaliation for the assassination of Heydrich which, he claimed, had been Planned by the British.

Conclusion

The Tribunal finds that von Schirach is not guilty on Count 1. He is guilty under Count 4.

So, Baldur von Schirach was found guilty of War crimes against humanity and was sentenced to 20 years of imprisonment in which he served-out in Spandau, Berlin, in the company of Rudolf Heß and Albert Speer.

On 20 July 1949, whilst von Schirach was imprisoned, Henriette von Schirach filed for divorce because of another man, but still tried to get Baldur free from prison, without result. Asserted is that von Schirach was bisexual.

The divorce was granted a year later, in July 1950. She continued to campaign for his release but he remained in prison until September 1966.

Schirach was released from prison on 1 October 1966, after precisely 20 years of imprisonment. The former leader of the Hitler Youth was destined to spend the rest of his secluded life (for less than 10 years) in Kröv-an-der-Mösel, in south-west Germany.

In his memoirs, « Ich Glaubte an Hitler » (I Believed in Hitler) (1967) , published 1 year after his release from prison, von Schirach tried to explain the fatal fascination which Hitler had exerted on him and on the younger generation, and also denied all charges of his knowledge of the murder and tortures in the concentration and extermination camps.

Schirach died lonely in his sleep, on 8 August 1974 (aged 66) , in a small hotel of Kröv, owned by a former leader of the « Bund Deutscher Mäde » (BDM) . He was, then, almost totally blind as a result of an eye disease.

The hotel was pulled-down after his death. Baldur von Schirach is buried in all stillness close-by on the local cemetery of Kröv.

On his stone the inscription :

« Ich war Einer von Euch. » (I was one of you.)

Peter Quiess reported on 25 May 2015 that the gravestone of Schirach is removed.

A grandson named Ferdinand von Schirach (born in 1964, in Munich) looks like his grandfather. He is a German lawyer and writer.

Baldur von Schirach was born in Berlin on the 9 March 1907, the son of an aristocratic German father and an American mother whose ancestors included 2 signatories of the Declaration of Independence. On his father's side descended from an officers' family with artistic tendencies and a cosmopolitan background, Baldur grew-up in a pampered, well-to-do environment.

One of the earliest members of the Nazi Party, he entered the Party in 1924 while attending the University of Munich, where he briefly studied German folklore and art history, he was soon a member of its inner-most circle, despite his youth.

Von Schirach became a convinced anti-Semite after reading Henry Ford's « The International Jew » and writings by Houston S. Chamberlain and Adolf Bartels. The aristocratic von Schirach was also a militant opponent of Christianity and of his own caste.

Throwing himself body and soul into organizing high-school and university students for the Nazi Party, von Schirach proved himself an outstanding organizer and propagandist of National-Socialism.

With his infectious enthusiasm and power to inspire youth with the ideals of comradeship, sacrifice, courage and honour, von Schirach was highly-regarded by Adolf Hitler who also appreciated his blind devotion as expressed in hero-worshipping verses and sycophantic sayings.

In 1929, von Schirach was put in charge of the National-Socialist German Students League and, 2 years later, he was appointed « Reich » Youth Leader of the NSDAP, a post he held until 1940.

In 1933, he organized the gigantic youth march in Potsdam, in which wave upon wave of youngsters greeted Hitler. Already before the Nazi seizure of power, von Schirach ceaseless propaganda, his idealism and organizational flair for mobilizing youth had succeeded in winning over hundreds of thousands of young Germans to Hitler's cause.

In May 1933, he was made Leader of the Youth of the German « Reich » at the age of 26 and, in the next few years, his cult seemed 2nd only to that of Hitler himself. He married Henriette Hoffmann, daughter of Hitler's official photographer. Placed in control of the Hitler Youth, which by 1936 already comprised of 6 million members, von Schirach used a powerful mixture of pagan Romanticism, militarism and naïve patriotism to build-up recruits for Hitler's War machine.

Young Germans were to be drilled into acceptance of Nazi concepts of character, discipline, obedience and leadership as set-out in von Schirach's book, « Die Hitler-Jugend », published in 1934, they were to be moulded into a new race of « Supermen » .

Von Schirach who fancied himself as a writer and poet, published 2 books which were best-sellers in 1932 : « Hitler wie ihn Keiner Kennt » , with photographs by his father-in-law, Heinrich Hoffmann (Hitler's official photographer) ; and « Triumph des Willens » .

The following year, his collection of poems, « Die Fahne der Verfolgten » and the short-biographies of Nazi leaders, « Die Pioniere des Dritten Reiches » , were published. Von Schirach taught German youth that their blood was better than that of any nation and devoted his lyricism to hollow worship of the « Führer » 's genius.

Towards the outbreak of the Second World War, his position was being undermined by the intrigues of Martin Bormann and other enemies. Jokes about his effeminate behaviour and his allegedly white bedroom furnished in a girlish manner, were legion and he was never quite able to live-up to his own ideal type of the hard, tough quick Hitler youth.

At the beginning of 1940, von Schirach enlisted as a volunteer in the German army, serving in France for a few months as an infantry officer and receiving the Iron Cross - 2nd Class. In 1940, he organized the evacuation of 5 million children from cities threatened by Allied bombing.

Later that year, he joined the army and volunteered for service in France, where he was awarded the Iron Cross before being recalled. Schirach lost control of the Hitler Youth to Artur Axmann, and was appointed « Gauleiter » of the « Reichsgau Wien » , a post in which he remained until the end of the War.

His unorthodox cultural policies in Austria soon aroused Hitler's distrust, with promptings from Bormann, and after a visit to the Berghof in 1943, where he pleaded for a more moderate treatment of the Eastern European peoples and criticized the conditions in which Jews were being deported, he lost all real influence.

Nevertheless, he was on record in a speech on the 15 September 1942 as saying that the « removal » of Jews to the East would « contribute » to European culture. The deportation of 65,000 Jews from Vienna to Poland, during his tenure as Governor, was a major indictment against von Schirach at the Nuremberg Trials.

The War crimes tribunal conceded that he did not originate the policy but had participated in the deportations from Vienna, though he knew that the best the Jews could hope for was a miserable existence in the ghetto's in the East.

During his trial, von Schirach admitted that he had approved the « resettlement » but denied all knowledge of genocide, denouncing Hitler from the dock as a « million-fold murderer » , and calling Auschwitz « the most devilish mass-murder in history » .

Baldur von Schirach was arguably the most successful organizers of youth group's in history. In the space of a few years, he had shaped German youth into young men willing to prosecute the most destructive War in history as well as to engage or acquiesce in the most brutal atrocities in modern European history. The boys he helped trained remained loyal to the end, in many cases joining in the hopeless often suicidal defence of their towns and villages even though the War was lost. Baldur von Schirach was born in Berlin on 9 March 1907, the son of an aristocratic German father and an American mother, whose ancestors included 2 signatories of the Declaration of Independence. On his father's side descended from an officers' family with artistic tendencies and a cosmopolitan background (Carl von Schirach had resigned from the army in 1908 to become a theater director in Weimar) , Baldur grew-up in a pampered, well-to-do environment. One of the earliest members of the NSDAP (he entered the Party in 1924 while attending the University of Munich where he briefly studied Germanic folklore and art history) , von Schirach was soon a member of its inner-most circle, in spite of his youth. A convinced anti-Semite, after reading Henry Ford's « The International Jew » and writings by Houston S. Chamberlain and Adolf Bartels, the aristocratic von Schirach was also a militant opponent of Christianity and of his own caste. Throwing himself body and soul into organizing high-school and university students for the NSDAP, von Schirach proved himself an outstanding organizer and propagandist of National-Socialism. With his infectious enthusiasm and power to inspire youth with the ideals of comradeship, sacrifice, courage and honour, von Schirach was highly-regarded by Hitler who also appreciated his blind devotion as expressed in hero-worshipping verses and such sycophantic sayings as « loyalty in everything and everything is the love of Adolf Hitler » . In 1929, von Schirach was put in charge of the National-Socialist German Students' League and, 2 years later, he was appointed « Reich » Youth Leader of the NSDAP, a post which he held until 1940.

Parents

Baldur was actually more American than German. He was the son of an an officer in the Imperial German Army and an American citizen and, in fact, 3/4 American.

On his father's side descended from an officers' family with artistic tendencies and a cosmopolitan background. His parental grand-father had emigrated from Germany, served in the Union Army and been selected as one of President Lincoln's pallbearers. He married into a wealthy Philadelphia family. His father, Carl von Schirach had resigned from the army in 1908 to become the director of the Imperial Theater in Weimar. He lost his post when the « Kaiser » abdicated and Weimar Republic officials replaced him. He became a supporter of Right-wing politics and hated the Weimar Republic. He was an early supporter of Hitler.

His American ancestors included 2 signatories of the Declaration of Independence and a Union Civil War officer. His mother was an American, daughter of a New York lawyer. He was killed during a World War II bombing raid.

Childhood

Baldur von Schirach was born in Berlin on March 9, 1907. He grew-up in a pampered, well-to-do environment. His 1st language was English because of his mother. He traveled to America with his mother and could have stayed with relatives to pursue a career. He chose to return to Germany. As his father had resigned from the Army to direct the Court theater in Weimar, Baldur grew-up in an artistic, even Romantic environment.

The family was traumatized not by World War I, but the disorders in Germany surrounding the fall of the monarchy. Baldur's father was fired from the Court theater and, for a while, unemployed. He was eventually rehired, but not before Baldur's older brother Karl committed suicide.

Baldur was introduced to Hitler as a teenager. His father had invited Hitler to his home. Hitler, at the time, was pursuing contacts with respectable families to offset the Nazi image of SA street thugs. Baldur was deeply impressed and wrote a poem dedicated to Hitler after he left. One source suggests he entered the Party at age 18. Another source suggests he joined even earlier.

We have little information on how Baldur was dressed as a boy. Coming from an affluent family, he presumably was well-dressed. One photograph shows him wearing a well-tailored suit as a younger teenager.

Education

Baldur claims that his anti-Semitism stemmed from his reading Henry Ford's venomous « The International Jew » . The writings of Houston S. Chamberlain and Adolf Bartels also influenced him. About 1927 (another source says 1924) , Hitler suggest that Baldur enter Munich University to organize a Nazi Student « Bund » . He briefly studied Germanic folklore and art history.

Von Schirach and the Nazis did not exist in a vacuum. Germany was, perhaps, the preeminent industrial nation of Europe. Yet, the country's intellectual avant-garde seemed to reject the achievements of the country's industry and science. Many Germans instead devoted themselves passionately to reviving folk-culture and an anachronistic national heritage. Groups like Wandervogel sang « Landsknecht » songs around camp fires. Many ex-spoused ideological concepts to return to what was seen as pure pre-Christian Germany. Books ex-spousing non-sensical cosmologies associated with Atlantis and a racially superior Master race were enormously popular. Liberalism, Christianity, and democracy had little appeal to many Germans.

Von Schirach was one of the earliest members of the NSDAP. His more cultured background, in comparison to the average Nazi, was an asset as was his success in organizing student groups. The seemingly aristocratic von Schirach was also a militant opponent of Christianity and of his own caste. Von Schirach was soon a member of its inner-most circle, in spite of his youth.

He threw himself into the task of organizing high-school and university students for the Nazis and proved himself to be an outstanding organizer and propagandist of National-Socialism.

Noted by Hitler

With his infectious enthusiasm and power to inspire youth with the ideals of comradeship, sacrifice, courage and honour, von Schirach was highly-regarded by Hitler who also appreciated his blind devotion as expressed in hero-worshipping verses and such sycophantic sayings as « loyalty in everything and everything is the love of Adolf Hitler ».

Student League

Adolf Hitler, in 1929, put von Schirach in charge of the National-Socialist German Students' League.

Von Schirach married in 1931. His wife was the daughter of Hitler's personal photographer, Heinrich Hoffmann. I do not know yet if they had any children. We do note one dramatic scene during the War at the Berghof. At an evening gathering, « Frau » von Schirach had seen a train load of Jews at a Vienna train station being transported and Vienna asked Hitler if he knew about or allowed people to be so mistreated. Hitler was furious, he barked back that people should not talk about things which they know nothing about. He stormed-out of the room, ending the evening gathering.

Von Schirach from the beginning viewed the Nazi Party as « the Party of youth ». Hitler, in 1931, appointed von Schirach Nazi Youth Leader Hitler with a SA rank of « Gruppenführer ». He held this post until 1940 and, when Hitler seized power in 1933, used it to organize the most effective State-controlled youth organization in history. Von Schirach, in 1932, organized a gigantic youth gathering in Potsdam. Boys from all over the « Reich » converged on foot to Potsdam marching through German villages and towns. The waves of these boys passing by must have affected many boys and some parents. Schirach delivered about 70,000 saluting boys to greet Hitler and cheer his speech. Hitler was impressed. Already before the Nazi seizure, von Schirach's ceaseless propaganda, his idealism and organizational flair for mobilizing youth, had succeeded in winning-over hundreds of thousands of young Germans to Hitler's cause.

Hitler upon seizing power, in May 1933, he was made Youth Leader of the German « Reich » at the age of only 26 years. Given control of the Hitler Youth movement which, by 1936, already comprised 6 million members. No other group of Germans were so totally under Nazi control than children one they reached 10 years of age. Von Schirach used a powerful mixture of pagan Romanticism, militarism and naive patriotism to build-up recruits for Hitler's War machine. Young Germans were to be drilled into acceptance of Nazi concepts of character, discipline, obedience and leadership as set-out in von Schirach's book, « Die Hitler-Jugend » (1934) . A whole generation was moulded into a new race of « Supermen ». The success of the Hitler Youth in imbuing German youth with Nazi principles and ideology was an important element in preparing Germany for War. Von Schirach taught German youth that their blood was better than that of any nation and devoted his lyricism to hollow worship of the « Führer » 's genius.

Of all the « Reich » youth groups, it was the Hitler Youth that was of greatest importance. Von Schirach was involved in every aspect of the Hitler Youth. He chosen a military-type organization. He was a very effective organizer. Given his theatrical background, he was very skilled in staging impressive events. He wrote a great deal of material used by the movement such as slogans used at camp. Von Schirach signed an agreement with the military to funnel Hitler Youth boys into the armed forces. There was no secret about this, the poster shown here exalts in the fact that the « Hilter-Jugend » was the training ground for future officers. More ominous was the fact that particularly outstanding boys were funneled into the SS and boys offered the opportunity considered it a great honour. Von Schirach was not liked by many top Nazis. SS Leader Himmler was the major exception, presumably because von Schirach helped create such an effective recruiting system and provided boys ready to accept the terrible tasks assigned the SS.

At the Nuremberg Trials, part of von Schirach's defence was based on the fact that he, unlike other top Nazis, continued to practice his Christian religion and that he pursued correct ties with Christian church groups in Germany and later, in Austria, after he was appointed « Gauleiter » (the German term for a kind of governor) . We know the devotion to Christianity is correct as regards his wife, who actually raised the treatment of the Jews personally with Hitler. We are less sure about von Schirach himself. And, in fact, the Hitler Youth adopted policies designed to discourage church attendance. We are unsure, at this time, how to evaluate these claims. Many of the claims sound like efforts to save his skin by re-writing history, but we are just beginning to acquire information on this.

Image

Interestingly, von Schirach himself was a far cry from the image of the youths that he sought to create for Hitler. The « Führer » said that the German youth he was creating were to be « Slim and straight, fast as a greyhound, and tough as Krupp steel » . Von Schirach could not have been more different. He had been pampered as a boy. He came from an artistic family where culture had been more important than athleticism. He was fond of quoting Gøethe. He was pudgy and no fan of camping-out and roughing it. He much preferred luxury hotels. He probably would not done well at all as a boy in the Hitler Youth himself. One former Hitler Youth boy looking back reports, « Von Schirach was not an athletic leader. He was good with words. He kept his distance when visiting our camps. »

Von Schirach, who fancied himself as a writer and poet, published 2 books which were best-sellers in 1932, « Hitler, wie ihn Keiner Kennt » (with photographs by his father-in-law) and « Triumph des Willens » . The following year, his collection of poems, « Die Fahne der Verfolgten » , and the short biographies of Nazi leaders, « Die Pionere des Dritten Reiches » , were published.

Von Schirach was, from the beginning, considered to be an outsider by most leading Nazis. Towards the outbreak of World War II, von Schirach's position, was being undermined by the intrigues of Martin Bormann and other enemies. Jokes about his effeminate behaviour and his allegedly white bedroom furnished in a girlish manner, were legion, and he was never quite able to live-up to his own ideal type of the hard, tough, quick Hitler youth. Von Schirach, in fact, felt much more at home in a luxury hotel than a Hitler Youth tent.

With the outbreak of World War II, many « Hilter-Jugend » officials volunteered for military service. After doing so much to prepare boys for battle, von Schirach could hardly avoid military service himself - especially given the jokes an innuendo about him. At the beginning of 1940, von Schirach enlisted as a volunteer in the German army, serving in France for a few months as an infantry officer and receiving the Iron Cross (2nd Class) . It was hardly front-line duty, he reported with a substantial staff - hardly routine for a low-ranking officer.

« Gauleiter » and Governor of Vienna

Hitler decided to recall von Schirach from France. He had been relieved of his post as Leader of the Hitler Youth, but Hitler appointed him Nazi « Gauleiter » (Governor) of Vienna, in August 1940. A particularly brutal Nazi « Gauleiter » there had caused some dissatisfaction in Vienna. Von Schirach tried to be a cultural gloss on Nazism. He reportedly said, « Vienna cannot be conquered with bayonets, only with music. » At the same time, the transports of Jews steadily rolled to the death camps in Poland. As Vienna « Gauleiter » , supported cultural event as much as practical during the War. While he was in Vienna, he was noted for noxious statements like, « Every boy who dies at the front, dies for Mozart. » . Of course, while making these statements, he was safe in Vienna. When the Russians approached Vienna, he took-off his uniform and quietly left. Von Schirach's unorthodox cultural policies in Austria soon aroused Hitler's distrust. This was encouraged by Bormann who especially disliked von Schirach.

Reports vary as to von Schirach's knowledge or role in the Holocaust. One report indicated that after a visit to the Berghof, in 1943, where he pleaded for a moderate treatment of the Eastern European peoples and criticized the conditions in which Jews were being deported. We do know that he did nothing to limit the deportations from Vienna and bragged about presenting a Jew-free Vienna to Hitler. Von Schirach claims that he never knew of the death camps. Nevertheless, he was on record as saying that the « removal » of Jews to the East would « contribute to European culture » . (Speech of 15 September 1942.) Von Schirach (and Albert Speer) were probably saved at the Nuremberg Trials because the prosecution did not present evidence that they attended the 1943 Posen meeting where Himmler explicitly explained the « Final Solution » to « Reich » leaders. Most of whom were well-aware of what was being done. Anyone attending that meeting, however, could not claim that they did not know. As this was not known by the judges, many were impressed with his impassioned plea, « Before God, before the German nation, before my German people, I alone bear the guilt of having trained our young people for a man whom I for many long years had considered unimpeachable, for a man who murdered by the millions. » The prosecution pointed-out that he was on the distribution for « Einsatzgruppen » reports. Von Schirach claimed that a subordinate had never passed them on to him.

While in Portugal, Henriette von Schirach came across a copy of « Life » magazine with of German reports of atrocities on the Eastern Front. On the way home, she stopped in Amsterdam and witnessed a brutal round-up Jewish women and children. The Netherlands was, in fact, one of the most deadly places in Europe for the Jews during the Holocaust. Afterwards, an SS officer showed her some of the booty seized from Dutch Jews and offered diamonds at a cheap price. The von Schirach's were, on many occasions, invited to Hitler's intimate social gatherings at Berchtesgaden. At one of these occasions, « Frau » von Schirach attempt to report these observations to Hitler. (We are not sure if she confronted with her husband in advance.) Hitler was enraged. She and her husband were never invited back to the Berghof.

For whatever reason, he did lose any real influence with Hitler - a factor here was his wife. Even so, he remained in office as Vienna « Gauleiter ». After the War, he criticized Hitler for using children to defend Berlin. « I don't see how the young can be sent to War. », he said. He himself, however, did the same albeit on a smaller scale in Vienna.

Unlike many top Nazis, he had no intention of fighting to the end or in killing himself and family. He tried to hide as mystery writer after the War. Finally, fearing Austrian anti-Nazis and French occupation troops, he quietly entered the American occupation zone and surrendered.

Von Schirach's attorney, in his closing speech at the Nuremberg War Crime Trials, claimed that his client did not have blood on hands. Von Schirach, at Nuremberg, did not deny the military role of the « Hitler-Jugend », but he claimed, « The idea of attacking other nations never entered my mind. » The deportation of 185,000 Jews from Vienna to Poland during his tenure as Governor was a major item in the indictment against von Schirach at the Nuremberg Trials. The War crimes tribunal conceded that he did not originate the policy, but had « participated in this deportation, though he knew that the best they [the Jews] could hope for was a miserable existence in the ghettos of the East ». Von Schirach admitted that he had approved the « resettlement » but denied all knowledge of genocide, denouncing Hitler from the dock as « a million fold murderer » and calling Auschwitz « the most devilish mass-murder in history ». He claimed at Nuremberg that « My primary activities in Vienna were social work and cultural work. » .

While « Gauleiter », he said :

« If anyone reproaches me with having driven from this city, which was once the European metropolis of Jewry, tens of thousands upon tens of thousands into the ghettos of the East, I feel compelled to reply : I see in this an action contributing to European culture. »

The Court sentenced von Schirach, on 1 October 1946, to 20 years imprisonment for crimes against humanity which he served out at Spandau prison, in Berlin, in the company of Rudolf Heß and Albert Speer. Von Schirach continued his purported change of heart, admitting that he had misled German youth and contributed to poisoning a whole generation which had idolized him. In his memoirs, « Ich Glaubte an Hitler » (1967) , published 1 year after his release from Spandau. Von Schirach tried to explain the fatal fascination which Hitler had exerted on him and on the younger generation. He now considered it his duty to destroy any belief in the rebirth of Nazism and blamed himself before history for not having done more to prevent the concentration camps.

Von Schirach et la culture

Sur la vie culturelle en Autriche même, et tout particulièrement à Vienne, l'ancienne capitale ravalée au rang de « Gaustadt », nous disposons de plusieurs documentations et chroniques dont nous citerons les passages qui nous semblent caractéristiques à la fois des efforts du régime et de son incapacité à assimiler, en profondeur, les traditions culturelles spécifiquement viennoises qui restaient, malgré tout, fort vivaces parmi les supports de la vie intellectuelle et artistique de Vienne.

Baldur von Schirach, le dernier « Gauleiter » de Vienne qui se donnait des airs de protecteur des arts et des artistes, dut faire l'expérience de l'imperméabilité des Viennois à ses tentatives de séduction qui, tout compte fait, furent désapprouvées par Adolf Hitler comme par Josef Gœbbels, le grand Maître de la propagande nazie.

Dans la « Chronique » de F.M. Rebhann (sorte de chronique culturelle et mondaine de l'époque de l'occupation nazie à Vienne, dont le titre équivoque reflète bien les propos non moins équivoques de l'auteur qui entremêle assez adroitement dans son récit, les épisodes des « fastes » avec des remarques sur la répression et le déclin irrémédiable du régime au cours de la Guerre), on trouve un mélange singulier de noms célèbres et inconnus ; il cite, avec une certaine malignité, l'écrivain Bruno Brehm qui, dans le périodique « Wehrmacht », fustigea l'incompréhension et le manque de perspicacité de « l'étranger » qui croyait « que le “ Land Österreich ” posait toujours problème », alors qu'un journaliste aujourd'hui oublié, un certain Leo Schödl, tonna dans le « Völkischer Beobachter » contre une tournée du « Wiener Stadttheater » qui tenta de gagner la faveur du public allemand d'une manière traditionnelle et typiquement autrichienne, alors que selon ce même Schödl celle-ci n'avait jamais existé.

En général, Rebhann poursuit sa chronique à la manière d'un récit plutôt mondain, bien que certaines remarques décrivent assez véridiquement la situation de Guerre, par exemple lorsqu'il note que pendant l'hiver 1939-1940 de nombreux manteaux de cuir polonais apparurent dans les rues de Vienne que suivirent, quelques mois plus tard, des renards norvégiens, alors qu'aucun magasin ne présentait de cuir polonais ou de fourrure norvégienne.

De la chronique mentionnée, il ressort que les Nazis menèrent une politique culturelle essentiellement « völkisch » dont faisaient partie aussi bien les « danseuses nues » que les orchestres à cuivres, et même les bordels. Toutes les écoles de musique furent rapidement mises au pas, les associations d'artistes rassemblées sous la houlette d'un artiste connu, le professeur Eisenmenger, auquel cette dignité ne porta pas préjudice après la débâcle nazie. Opéra et « Opéra populaire » devaient donner une place aux productions médiocres mais « idéologiquement pures » de compositeurs et d'auteurs de livrets sans talent ; même à l'école, l'enseignement du solfège fut désormais soumis aux normes « völkisch ». On se mit à la recherche de « jeunes compositeurs inconnus » mais aryens, car Vienne devait devenir « le cœur sonore du “ Reich ” ». Des célébrités vinrent bien de temps en temps à Vienne (Wilhelm Furtwängler, Hans Knappertsbusch et même Richard Strauß) mais, de plus en plus, la vie culturelle fut empreinte d'un esprit provincial auquel il était tout au plus permis de rayonner vers le Sud-Est balkanique, en souvenir des anciens missionnaires du « Deutschtum » que la monarchie déjà avait délégués dans ces mêmes pays.

The longtime head of the « Hitler-Jugend » and, as of 1940, the « Gauleiter » and « Reichsstatthalter » in Vienna also had aristocratic pretensions and a penchant for high-living. Yet, Baldur von Schirach is particularly interesting because he represents a common type within the Nazi government : the quasi-autonomous chieftain of a particular territory. Replacing the dual leadership of Arthur Seyß-Inquart and Josef Bürckel in Vienna, Schirach treated the Austrian capital and its outlying areas as his own, from 1940 to 1945. This provides another element to the feudal metaphor. Not only were there reciprocal ties binding the sub-leaders to Adolf Hitler (and, to a lesser extent, each other) , but certain sub-leaders, such as Schirach, were charged with ruling specific geographic areas. That the 35 « Gauleiters » usually abused their relative autonomy is no revelation. Schirach, however, offers a striking case of a sub-leader obtaining authority from Hitler and, then, exploiting this position for personal gain.

Schirach was, in many ways, comparable to his brutal associates, such as « Gauleiter-Reichskommissar » Erich Koch of East-Prussia and the Ukraine, « Gauleiter-Reichskommissar » Josef Bürckel of the « Westmark » (the territory encompassing the Saar, Palatinate, and Lorraine) , and « Gauleiter » Albert Forster of Danzig, in that he viewed himself as the prince of his territory (he was, however, less brutal and less anti-Semitic) . Upon moving to Vienna, he inhabited a lavish villa in the « Hohe Warte » neighbourhood, a residence previously used by Bürckel. He immediately enhanced its furnishings by « borrowing » rugs and tapestries from the Schwarzenberg palace, a sequestered property located in the center of the city. Schirach had become accustomed to living in style. Upon his appointment as « Reichsjugendführer » in 1933, he had moved into a luxurious lake-side abode on the « Kleine Wannsee » in Berlin, and, the following year, he and his wife acquired a retreat in the Bavarian mountains. Schirach's residential arrangements in Vienna are telling. They convey a sense of his own self-importance and a willingness to break laws for personal benefit. His concern for style and interior design also reflects the emphasis on culture that marked his rule in Vienna. He was transferred to Vienna with explicit orders to organize and rehabilitate the city's flagging cultural life, although not to the point where it would rival that in Berlin. Hitler created a special arrangement whereby Schirach, not Josef Gœbbels, would be responsible for the arts in that region (the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » , however, continued to provide funding) . Schirach not only controlled the budget of the city's cultural institutions but was given funds (including sizable « Dotationen ») with which to patronize and entertain. Artists were frequently guests at his dinner table and at diplomatic functions.

Schirach projected himself as an artist from the outset of his career with the Nazis.

Howard Becker, in describing Schirach's early years, wrote :

« In Munich, he was studying art-history and Germanic lore in 1924. By 1925, Hitler was referring to him as a “ true follower ” and a “ dependable lad ”, and a close friendship seems to have been formed, partly on the basis of their common interest in art. His poems met with Hitler's approval, and, before long, Schirach was the poet laureate, so to speak, of the Nazi movement. »

Furthermore, Schirach came from a privileged and cultured background. His father had been the head of the Weimar « Hoftheater » (Royal Theater) and held the titles « Rittmeister » , « Gardekürassier » , « Kammerherr » , and « Generalintendant » . Young Baldur had not only grown-up in the Royal « Schloß » but, interestingly enough, had been exposed to a fairly progressive brand of theater. Productions staged by his father included Henrik Ibsen's « The Wild Duck » . Hitler, therefore, chose Schirach for the Vienna post in ...

Schirach had not only appointed the organizer of the show, Wilhelm Rüdiger, and helped publicize it but had also purchased 6 paintings totaling 26,500 « Reichsmarks ». Toward the end of the 3rd « Reich », Schirach clearly suffered from Hitler's lack of support (and the increasing enmity of Martin Bormann and Josef Goebbels) . Both contemporary observers and historians have linked the « Junge Kunst » « débâcle » with Schirach's post-1943 decline :

« He remained in Vienna until 1945, although after a stormy meeting at the “ Berghof ”, on Easter 1943, he had forfeited Hitler's trust and friendship on account of his “ un-German ” cultural policies and “ Liberal ” attitudes toward Jews. »

Baldur von Schirach's personal collecting of modernistic artworks caused him fewer problems. Other leaders treated the acquisition of such artworks as a private matter - at least as his prerogative as the ruler of Vienna. Thus, whether it concerned the landscape painting by Auguste Renoir that he bought from the Wels Gallery in Salzburg, the 2 Auguste Rodin sculptures that he kept in his bedroom, or the Vincent van Gogh picture, « Poppies in the Field », that he purchased in Holland with the help of the « Dienststelle Mühlmann » and the director of the Kröner-Müller Museum, Doctor van Deventer, Schirach incurred little discernible criticism. The problem-free act of privately acquiring the Van Gogh can be compared with a public gesture : a speech delivered on the 250th anniversary of the « Wiener Akademie der bildenden Künste », in the autumn of 1942, where Schirach dared to mention Van Gogh in the same breath with Rembrandt and Beethoven. He categorized the products of all 3 men as among the « greatest achievements in art » and, in doing so, precipitated wide-spread criticism (Robert Scholz in the DBFU, again, was particularly upset) . Similarly, Scholz complained when Schirach arranged for the « Wiener Galerie », a public institution, to buy a piece by Vienna's own Gustav Klimt as well as a portrait by Lovis Corinth. Scholz noted that the Corinth picture had been removed from the Berlin « Kronprinzenpalais » during the « entartete Kunst » « cleansing » and that, furthermore, both works had been purchased from the « halb-jüdischer » Berlin art-dealer, Hildebrand Gurlitt. Schirach's penchant for moderately abstract works (he had no interest in Wassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee, or the radically modern artists) caused problems for him only when his activities entered the public realm. Indeed, in private conversations with Adolf Hitler prior to the falling-out in 1943, Schirach felt sufficiently secure in his views to defend the work of Franz Marc.

While Schirach espoused more enlightened views toward art, he was nonetheless an agent of Nazi oppression and corruption. In the realm of art-collecting, this manifested in his sponsorship of the « Gestapo's » « Vugesta » agency in Vienna, which liquidated artworks confiscated from Jews. While the « Vugesta » dates back to the immediate post- « Anschluß » period, and, hence, prior to Schirach's presence in Vienna, he not only allowed the agency to continue to operate but turned to it to purchase a number of works for his own collection. After the War, OSS agents approached Schirach with incriminating documents, showing, for example, that he bought a picture by Lucas Cranach, « Madonna with Child » (once possessed by the Gomperz family) , from the « Vugesta » . Another document reveals that Schirach spent 42,092 « Reichsmarks » for other unidentified works from the « Vugesta » , between December 1942 and June 1943. Schirach also acquired Pieter Breughel's « Wolf Overtaking Deer » , which had been confiscated from the Austrian Jew, Ernst Pollock, after he received approval from Hitler and Hans Poße. Schirach's ingenuous response after the War to the accusations was to claim, « I possess a great collection of paintings and I am convinced that none are from Jewish property. » The transparency of Schirach's lies becomes increasingly clear upon scrutiny of the surviving documents.

A June 1943 letter from the « Gestapo » chief in Vienna, Doctor Karl Ebner to Doctor Siebert, a government official from Bohemia, noted :

« Schirach has been informed of the confiscation of the picture collection and has personally inspected it ; he has ordered that personnel from the “ Kunsthistorisches Museum ” in Vienna take photographs. »

Ebner went on to report of Schirach's consultation with Hitler about the allocation of the artworks. The agents from Linz took their pick, and the remaining artworks were set for distribution among Austrian Museums.

Schirach engaged in a number of other unsavoury activities in his efforts to amass an art-collection. He bought regularly from the « Dienststelle Mühlmann » in the Netherlands, having earlier befriended Kajetan Mühlmann.

Henrietta von Schirach tells in her memoirs of an improbable occurrence in 1943 :

« As the Schirachs were leaving The Hague, a man identified as “ M ” (presumably either Mühlmann or the art-dealer Alois Miedl, with whom they were also acquainted) handed the couple 2 wrapped packages. After boarding the train and opening the parcels, they found that they had been given an early Italian Renaissance painting featuring “ Tobias with an Angel ”, which they placed in their Vienna residence. »

Schirach's father-in-law, Heinrich Hoffmann, also procured pictures for the couple (as well as Hitler and other leaders) , frequently obtaining the works while in the Netherlands. He had good business connections there and could benefit more generally from the Germans' occupation of the country. Hoffmann helped Schirach obtain works from the « Goudstikker » collection, which was acquired by Miedl at a highly-favourable price and, then, sold at great profit. In the final days of the War, Schirach allegedly ordered valuable works removed from the mines at « Alt Aussee » , arranging for the removal of a Rembrandt self-portrait and an unidentified Peter Paul Rubens. Schirach hoped to make use of these valuables during his escape. He was captured in the South Tyrol, in June 1945, and his suitcase containing paintings as well as rare 1st edition books was found in a nearby farm house. This incident also reveals that the « Reichsstatthalter » of Vienna had some authority over the nearby storage facilities.

Although Schirach ruled in a relatively independent and cavalier manner in Vienna, his power stemmed from Hitler and his place at the « Führer's » court. To this end, he made sure to keep the political constellation in his favour - at least, until 1943. For starters, Schirach helped Hitler procure art. His efforts included assisting in the negotiations with the Czernin family for Johannes Vermeer's « Artist in His Studio » , obtaining for Linz a Rubens picture entitled « Ganymede » by way of a forced exchange for the Bloch-Bauer porcelain collection, and working with Hoffmann to acquire works for the « Führermuseum » in Linz, from the Netherlands and Italy, including a valuable Rubens, « Venus and Cupid » . Schirach's exertions on behalf of Hitler earned him goodwill and helped consolidate his position in Vienna. The added benefits, such as the right to the Gomperz, Cranach mentioned above after the Linz agents had selected works by Breughel, Carl Spitzweg, and others, were nice extras. In other instances of Schirach cultivating useful alliances by helping peers acquire art, he gave a painting by Rudolf Eisenmenger to Party treasurer Franz Xaver Schwarz, in 1943, and arranged for Hermann Göring to acquire the missing pieces of a multi-paneled Gothic altarpiece. Most of the panels were housed in Carinhall, but two remained in the « Wiener Akademie der bildenden Künste » . Schirach helped the « Reichsmarschall » by engineering a trade. As the exchange also constituted the city's birthday present to the « Reichsmarschall » , who was celebrating his 50th birthday, in January 1943, the generosity of the deal cannot be in doubt.

Baldur von Schirach exercised tremendous power in his post atop the Nazi administration of Vienna. To take the case noted above as an example, it is instructive that Göring had long tried to purchase the 2 panels from the « Wiener Akademie der bildenden Künste » , but without success. Only the intervention of Schirach, the local authority, enabled the transfer. Schirach was both energetic and territorial in his management of the city's cultural life.

He boasted to American interrogators after the War :

« From the time I took-over, there was no art property being lent out from Vienna. »

Schirach's cultural « attaché » , Walter Thomas, commented about Vienna's museums in his memoirs :

« After the long years of stagnation and inactive conservation and protection, there occurred a not altogether healthy, but nonetheless hectic and hasty flurry of purchases, whereby next to some valuable works, also some of the 2nd rank came into the public State collections for a great deal of money. »

Egon Schiele had, by far, the hardest climb to international renown. Though it is generally known that he was Austrian, he has never been mistaken for the easy-going stereotype of his country. Though largely misunderstood, he is often seen as an essentially tragic, flawed product of Austrian society. His genius is linked to a perception of Vienna that fostered eroticism, even pornography. Even in his own country, his work had a much harder time securing acceptance and support. In 1922, 4 years after his death, Schiele's mother was unable to persuade the Austrian State Gallery to buy one of his paintings. The only way to have his work put on display was for her to donate a painting. But one of his fervent admirers, Otto Nirenstein, the art-dealer who later changed his name to Otto Kallir, who was so convinced of Schiele's lasting significance that he chose an exhibition of Schiele's works for the opening of his New Gallery in Vienna, in 1923. A handful of Austrian collectors and museum directors recognized their importance, and bought drawings as well as paintings. Yet, in 1937, Schiele was still so utterly unknown that the Nazis forgot to class him among the group of banned « degenerate » artists.

After the « Anschluß » , Schiele's work was not treated as harshly as that of other Expressionism. A dozen of his drawings from Vienna's Albertina collection were included in a 1943 exhibition under the patronage of Baldur von Schirach, Adolf Hitler's « Gauleiter » in Vienna during the War. That same year, commemorative articles were authorized in the « Ostmark » media to mark the 25th anniversary of Schiele's death.

Between 1945 and 1955, Schiele's work was included in several exhibitions in Austria. The most important among them was an exhibition in Linz, in 1949, which included over 200 Schiele works, and which was later seen in Salzburg and in 3 German cities. Rudolf Leopold, a young Austrian ophthalmologist who eventually amassed the largest collection of Schieles, was beginning to scour all available sources of his drawings and paintings.

The last exhibition to do Gustav Klimt « justice » was held in Vienna, in 1943, under the auspices of Baldur von Schirach, the Hitler-appointed « Gauleiter » (overseer) of the city. Though nominally a celebration of what would have been the artist's 80th year, the event was more accurately a display of looted art. Although not specifically deemed « degenerate » , Klimt was certainly an artist whom the leaders in Berlin considered decadent. Nonetheless, von Schirach, with the confidence of a Nazi favourite (he had headed the Hitler Youth movement, and his wife was the daughter of Hitler's official photographer) was not averse to stepping-out of line when it came to culture.

And so, on February 7, 1943, he unveiled an exhibition featuring 66 Klimt paintings and 34 Klimt drawings at the Exhibition Hall on « Friedrichstraße » . During the month that the show was open, 24,000 Viennese flocked to see it. Included in the exhibition were the trailblazing works expropriated from a leading Jewish family.

Serena and August Lederer had been far more than devoted patrons of the artist. Their holdings included the intellectual capstone of Klimt's career, the monumental images of the faculties of « Philosophy » , « Medicine » and « Jurisprudence » intended for the auditorium of the University of Vienna. Far from being embraced as Masterpieces, the paintings, when unveiled in 1905, were deemed « pornographic » . To help the artist weather the storm, August financed the placement of the paintings in his collection and in others. A decade later, Klimt's 1902 « Beethoven Frieze » , the nearly 35 meter long homage to the power of the composer's art, also came into Lederer's hands, along with the preparatory drawings. And, in 1928, 10 years after the artist's death, the Lederers acquired the much acclaimed early paintings « Music » and « Schubert at the Piano » . A critic had deemed the latter « the finest painting ever made by an Austrian » .

When the Nazis took-over Austria, in 1938, August had been dead for 2 years. 1 year later, Serena, after trying in vain to save the collection, fled to Budapest, where she died in 1943. The Klimts were taken-over by the State with the usual rationale that they constituted partial payments for debts owed by the Lederer industries. Several Vienna museums competed for the magnificent quarry but, up to the time of the 1943 exhibition, no decision had been reached as to the collection's destination.

Von Schirach's Klimt retrospective ended-up being the last hurrah of his ambitious Austrian cultural program. The War's turning point had come just a few days before the exhibition opened with the surrender of the Germans at Stalingrad.

By March 1943, the entire 3rd « Reich » had been mobilized for « Total War », and, as the threat posed by air-raids became increasingly real, it was determined that the Klimts would be better off in storage. Soon after the exhibition closed, more than 10 paintings from the Lederer collection, including the 3 faculty pictures (along with a number of other Klimt canvases) were hidden in a castle in Immendorf, a hamlet in Lower-Austria not far from the Czech border. (The « Beethoven Frieze » was stored elsewhere.) In May 1945, as the Russians came-over that border, the German unit that had been garrisoned in the castle retreated, but not before laying explosives. Between May 8 and May 11, the building and its contents burned to the ground.

Among the paintings on view in the 1943 retrospective were 3 Lederer family portraits : Klimt had painted not only Serena herself, but also her mother and her daughter. Since these were pictures of Jewish women (and, hence, not given names in the exhibition catalogue) , they were not considered important enough to be hidden. The portrait of Serena's mother never surfaced after the War, but the other 2 re-emerged at auctions and were returned to the Lederers' son, Eric, who died in Geneva in 1985. The 2 remaining portraits are now in New York : the image of Serena is at the Metropolitan Museum of Art ; the painting of her daughter, though not in the current exhibition, belongs to Ronald Lauder.

Gustav Klimt's « Beethoven Frieze » in the Secession, Morowitz wrote, is an example of why Nazi cultural officials tolerated, even acclaimed his work.

She explained :

« Klimt's " Frieze " hails the triumph of idealism over materialism, an idea often found in Nazi æsthetics. The rescuing knight around whom the " Frieze " revolves can easily be read as a proto-« Führer » figure, leading his people to a higher-realm. »

Yet, Klimt's extremely sensual subject matter made his work at least suspect to many, even in pre-Nazi Vienna.

Cultural journalist Monica Strauß wrote of the 1943 Klimt retrospective in an article for « The Forward » :

« Although not specifically deemed " degenerate ", Klimt was certainly an artist whom the leaders in Berlin considered decadent. Nevertheless, von Schirach, with the confidence of a Nazi favourite (he had headed the Hitler Youth movement, and his wife was the daughter of Hitler's official photographer) was not averse to stepping-out of line when it came to culture. »

Von Schirach took a risk, promoting the Klimt retrospective as an example of the glories of Germanic art, Morowitz said - and populating it with numerous works that had been confiscated from the families of Klimt's Jewish patrons while also being careful to conceal their connection to the Jewish community. For example, Klimt's 2 portraits of Adele Bloch-Bauer, a Jew, were re-titled « A Lady with a Gold Background » and « Lady Standing » .

Von Schirach opened the Klimt retrospective on 7 February 1943, just 5 days after the German defeat in the Battle of Stalingrad, widely considered to be one of the decisive turning points in World War II. 2 years later, von Schirach surrendered to the Allies and was tried for deporting 65,000 Austrian Jews to the Nazi death camps. He was one of only 2 high German officials who renounced their allegiance to Hitler during the Nuremberg War crimes trials. He served 20 years in Spandau prison, Berlin.

During the War, in a nationally broadcast speech announcing a « Day of Music in the German Home », Baldur von Schirach remarked before a performance of Franz Schubert's « Trout » Quintet :

« Not only do we play music at home during the War, but we play music at home because there is a War ; the man who holds the sword of the “ Wehrmacht ” in his strong hands, leads in the name of our poetry and song ! »

A sophisticated spy network like the « Gestapo » was hardly necessary to monitor Wilhelm Furtwängler's open challenges to the regime. Heinrich Himmler, who headed the « Gestapo », had long been nursing a grudge against Furtwängler. Now, he saw his chance for revenge approaching.

In the meantime, Richard Strauß asked Furtwängler to intervene with the Nazis on 2 matters. Ist, his villa in Garmisch-Partenkirchen had been billeted to house refugees who had lost their homes in the bombings. He complained that he could not get to his piano. The « Gauleiter » of the area reported him for disloyalty. Adolf Hitler, still remembering Strauß' indiscreet letter to Stefan Zweig in which he demeaned top-ranking Nazis, personally ordered that the composer's 80th birthday, on 11 June 1944, should not be officially celebrated.

Strauß, of course, had asked his close friends Clemens Krauß and Baldur von Schirach to help, for they were on good terms with Berlin, but they declined. Furtwängler did not hesitate. He was already the « friend of criminals », so what was there to lose in helping an infamous composer-felon ?

He wrote to Josef Gæbbels :

« We, Germans, will make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the rest of the world if we neglect to honour the birthday of our greatest living composer. »

To the end of his dealings with the Nazis, Furtwängler appealed to the sense of national image in foreign relations, no matter how absurd the approach may have become at this point in the War :

« We, Germans, will make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the rest of the world if we neglect to honour the birthday of our greatest living composer. »

Göebbels and Hitler agreed with Furtwängler and permission was soon issued for the premiere of the Opera « Die Liebe der Danaë ». The acceleration in saturation bombing, however, was reaching its zenith in the summer of 1944, and Göebbels ordered all theaters closed before the work could be presented.

From the mid-1930's onward, foreign students of free-dance began leaving Austria. The National-Socialists put a stop to classes at Hellerau-Laxenburg, in 1939. They had always regarded free-dance as fundamentally suspect, either too abstract to be subject to their ideological control or too intellectual and outspoken where it represented recognizable dramatic plots. The National-Socialist « Reichstheaterkammer » (« Reich » Theater Chamber) issued decrees stipulating how dance and the other arts were to be performed. Almost all the private dance studios were forced to close-down following the « Anschluß » since most were run by Jewish artists. Some of the traditions of free-dance in Vienna were continued at the Conservatoire of the City of Vienna and at the dance-class at the Vienna Academy for Music and the Performing Arts.

Although the National-Socialists closed-down the more radical modern dance establishments in Vienna following their annexation of Austria in 1938, the city's reputation as a center for dance culture nevertheless prompted the regime to make a little-known decision in 1941. Baldur von Schirach, the « Gauleiter » of Vienna, entrusted Kreutzberg with founding a dance academy in Vienna :

« Durch diese Berufung machen wir die Tanzakademie in Wien zur zentralen Ausbildungsstätte des Tanzes für ganz Deutschland und darüber hinaus für ganz Europa. »

(This appointment makes the dance academy in Vienna the main dance training center in the whole of Germany and, moreover, in the whole of Europe.)

The plan was never carried-out, although teaching rooms had been found in the « Reisnerstraße » in the 3rd District, and pupils had already registered for courses, as the uncatalogued application forms in the archives of the Vienna Academy for Music and the Performing Arts show. Schirach was, no doubt, hoping to fill to the gap left by the failure of a National-Socialist dance institution in Berlin. The « Deutsche Tanzbühne » (German Dance Theater) , which included Rosalia Chladek and Harald Kreutzberg among its members, was closed in 1941.

The history of the New Year's Day concert is rather recent. It was a Nazi invention.

The 1st ever performance took place on New Year's Eve of 1939, raising money for the « Winterhilfswerk » , an annual fund raising drive masterminded by the National-Socialist Party to buy fuel for the needy in the coldest months of the year.

When the Straußes were alive, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra was a little sniffy about their music. Why would such an advanced and adventurous Orchestra want to play popular tunes ?

They started taking it more seriously in the late-1920's - but the idea of a seasonal Strauß gala really gained traction when the Nazi Party's cultural commissars hit upon the idea of a unifying event that could be broadcast live across the 3rd « Reich » . The concert moved to New Year's Day in 1941.

As it became obvious the War was not going to be over quickly, « The Blue Danube » Waltz and « Die Fledermaus » Overture were seen as a helpful way of shoring-up flagging morale.

When it emerged that Strauß had some Jewish ancestry, the Nazi propaganda minister Josef Goebbels himself ensured the news was hushed-up.

When the War ended, not a beat was missed - the concerts simply continued, their awkward history quietly forgotten.

As recently as the 1960's, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra saluted a War-time supporter - Baldur von Schirach, the Nazi « Gauleiter » (Governor) of Vienna who deported tens of thousands of Jews.

There had been a tradition of concerts on New Years day in Vienna, since 1838, but not with music of the Strauß family. From 1928 to 1933, there were 5 New Years' concerts in the « Musikverein » , conducted by Johann Strauß II. These concerts were broadcast by the Austrian radio broadcaster RAVAG. According to Norman Lebrecht, writing for the « United Kingdom Spectator Journal » , the concert had ominous origins. It was created by conductor Clemens Krauß, with the blessing of Vienna « Gauleiter » , Baldur von Schirach to improve the moral at the front lines. After World War II, the concert survived, as the Nazi origins have been largely forgotten.

The concert was 1st performed in 1939, and conducted by Clemens Krauß. For the 1st and only time, the concert was not given on New Year's Day, but instead on December 31st of that year. It was called then a special, or extraordinary concert (« Außerordentliches Konzert ») . Johann Strauß II was the only composer performed. The program of that 1st concert follows :

« Morgenblätter » , Opus 279, Waltz.

« Annen-Polka » , Opus 117, dedicated to Maria Anna of Savoy.

« Csárdás » from the Opera « Ritter Pázmán » .

« Kaiser-Walzer » , Opus 437.

« Leichtes Blut » , fast Polka, Opus 319.

« Ägyptischer Marsch » , Opus 335.

« G'schichten aus dem Wienerwald » , Waltz, Opus 325.

« Pizzicato-Polka » .

« Perpetuum mobile » , a musical Scherzo, Opus 257.

Overture to the Operetta « Die Fledermaus » .

There were no encores in 1939, and sources indicate they did not begin until 1945. Clemens Krauß almost always included the « Perpetuum mobile » either on the concert or as an encore. Surprisingly, « The Blue Danube » Waltz was not performed until 1945, and then as an encore. The « Radetzky March » was first performed in 1946, as an encore. Until 1958, these last 2 pieces were often but not always given as encores. Since that year, their position as twin encores has been inviolable tradition, with 2 exceptions : in 1967, Willi Boskovsky made « The Blue Danube » part of his concert program ; and, in 2005, Lorin Maazel concluded the program with « The Blue Danube » , omitting the « Radetzky March » as a mark of respect to the victims of the 2004 Indian Ocean earthquake and tsunami.

As the War came to an end, parties at the Croatian embassy became still more bitter and decadent ; the imminence of defeat produced an even more serious breakdown of codes of conduct.

Hans-Georg von Studnitz felt immense relief when he left the stony atmosphere in Berlin for Vienna, in the summer of 1943 :

« Living in the protectorate is like being in heaven. »

The bombardments were ignored in conversations in Vienna, which had thus far been spared. Von Studnitz envied people like the « Gauleiter » Baldur von Schirach, who enjoyed this idyllic city where culture still reigned. However, for artists, Vienna was far from being a paradise.

« Aryanization » had been carried-out, but Josef Gœbbels continued to try to reform the Viennese art-scene to make it conform to National-Socialist imperatives. In particular, he reproached the director of the Opera for continuing to allow performances of a decadent musical style : atonality. He set traps and had clandestine recordings made in order to confound the impudent director, who still dared to produce a work by Rudolf Wagner-Régeny, « Johanna Balk » , with accents worthy of Kuet Weill's « Threepenny Opera » . The composer's work was forbidden in Germany but could still be produced in Vienna. There more than elsewhere, high-society had rallied to the support of those who were carrying-out the unification of Germany. Young musicians like Werner Egk, the author of « Joan von Zarissa » , annoyed Richard Strauß, who left during the interval at its premiere, taking Gerhart Hauptmann with him to discuss the editing of his trilogy on « Iphigeneia » . Some Austrian writers were well-regarded by Germanic cultural institutions, such as Heinrich Ritter von Srbik, who won a seat in the new Nazi « Reichstag » (the old « Kroll-Oper ») in 1938, and obtained prestigious literary prizes through his political activity. A little cultural court emerged around Baldur von Schirach, who organized numerous receptions and used Vienna's traditional institutions to curry favour with Adolf Hitler. His position was made easier by his family relations and his marriage with Henriette Hoffmann. The latter's father, Heinrich Hoffmann, the NSDAP's official photographer, took advantage of this windfall to open a branch in Austria. Schirach organized evenings at the Opera, supported the 2 Philharmonic Orchestras, and tried to limit the influence of the Czechs, of whom there were many in the region. He also toyed with a certain kind of Liberalism, allowing 2 exhibits of works by Käthe Kollwitz and Egon Schiele, very decadent artists. One of Schirach's fiercest critics was the former superintendent of the Vienna Opera, who published his memoirs under a pseudonym after the War. In these memoirs, he describes the meticulous princely entourage of servants that surrounded Schirach, who was extremely demanding concerning the details of his everyday life, which seems to have been empty and indolent. The author concludes that it was basically a harmful way of life, marked by a kind of dangerous deceitfulness. No doubt this view was influenced by the author's friendship with Richard Strauß, whose disgrace and prudent return at the beginning of the War he had witnessed. Although he was not a native of Vienna, he was also aware of the « Aryanization » of Viennese society. There, as elsewhere, the police monitored the activities of enemies of the State.

The city was caught-up in the War. Soon, it was hit by aerial bombardments. The diary of Marie Wassiltschikow, a former propaganda ministry employee who had followed her physician husband to Vienna, where she worked as a nurse in a « Luftwaffe » hospital, from January to March 1945, throws light on this new period. Her description shows that Viennese high-society suffered during this last phase of the War. The Jockey Club building was destroyed. The Opera was hit by bombs and burned for several days. Many theatres were no more than crumbling facades. The great establishments, such as the Bristol Hotel, were also hit : not a single window remained unbroken. Socialites met for elegant dinners in the private saloons of the Sacher Hotel, but entertainments were now lacking. Only the Vienna Philharmonic pursued its programme ; in mid-February, it was still offering a concert every day despite the bombing, which also came every day. Moreover, it was following the example of the great German Orchestras, which also continued to work right to the end, and whose concerts were broadcast over the radio and recorded. German technology gave them a magnificent stereophonic sound whose quality explains why some of these performances are still regarded as Classics. The conductor who stood-out at this time was Herbert von Karajan, whose energy was inexhaustible. The affection and admiration, in which he later basked, probably had their origin in his work at a time when music was the only remaining distraction that allowed people to forget their troubles and communicate without having to take into account some people's errors and other people's foolishness. Although Karajan was an Austrian, he reflected the Germany that had embraced Nazism out of an inclination to conform. As a young orchestra conductor, he joined the NSDAP in April 1933, and was involved in the intrigues that sought to supplant Wilhelm Furtwängler in Berlin.

In Germany, people still went to shows and concerts, despite the mourning and the bombardments. The SD's reports for Berlin express surprise at attendance figures that did not flag all through the conflict, though free shows experienced occasional off-days and people's eagerness to return to the theatre immediately after an attack waned as the War advanced. The police interpreted this passion for distractions as a way of keeping-up morale and not focusing on death.

Day by day, Berlin was pounded by Allied bombs and pummeled into rubble, ash and smoke. Wilhelm Furtwängler knew, as most Germans knew by now, that the War was lost. He was happy that it was all coming to an end, but the sight of Berlin, its history, its culture disappearing before his eyes enraged him, and he became increasingly outspoken and open in his criticism of the Nazis, despite the warnings of his new wife and close friends. He openly taunted Baldur von Schirach, the « Gauleiter » of Vienna who was in charge of the Vienna Philharmonic.

What happens to the Jews who are transported ?

What is going on in the concentration camps ?

What really happened at the Battle of Stalingrad ?

Baldur von Schirach was a Nazi, but he was also cultivated and educated. Furtwängler liked him because of the latter qualities, but he also expected him to know these answers. Furtwängler reasoned that if you, Schirach, had sided with the Nazis despite the qualifications that would have enabled him to know better, he must know what the government was doing to justify his choice. The truth, of course, was that Schirach mostly likely knew exactly what was happening in the East and what was becoming of the Jews. But like most Germans, he also didn't care to contemplate their fate. He had enough problems worrying about his own survival, especially with an albatross like Furtwängler around his neck. According to Elisabeth Furtwängler, they were as aware as most Germans that thousands were being sent to camps in the East, « but we did not, and I swear this to you, we did not know about the gas chambers ! »

A sophisticated spy network like the « Gestapo » was hardly necessary to monitor Furtwängler's open challenges to the regime. Heinrich Himmler, who headed the « Gestapo » , had long been nursing a grudge against Furtwängler. Now, he saw his chance for revenge approaching.

In the meantime, Richard Strauß asked Furtwängler to intervene with the Nazis on 2 matters. Les Jeunesses hitlériennes La « Hitlerjugend » (HJ) , la Jeunesse hitlérienne ou les Jeunesses hitlériennes, était une organisation para-militaire du Parti nazi qui fut active entre 1926 et 1945.

La Ire organisation des jeunes du Parti nazi est fondée le 13 mai 1922 à Munich sous le nom de « Jungsturm Adolf Hitler » (Compagnie de jeunes « Adolf Hitler ») . Elle est alors rattachée aux SA. Dirigée par Gustav-Adolf Lenk, la compagnie est interdite dès 1923 en même temps que le Parti nazi. La « Hitlerjugend » est fondée le 4 juillet 1926 lors du 2e Congrès du Parti nazi.

La raison d'être des Jeunesses hitlériennes est la formation de futurs surhommes « aryens » et de soldats prêts à servir loyalement le 3e « Reich » . Il s'agit de contourner les clauses très contraignantes du Traité de Versailles qui interdisent à l'Allemagne vaincue de posséder une armée digne de ce nom et de préparer une génération physiquement et mentalement apte à être, au plus tôt, lancée dans une guerre totale et foudroyante contre toutes les puissances naguère ennemies du « Reich » et du peuple allemands. Dans les Jeunesses hitlériennes, l'entraînement physique et militaire passait bien avant l'instruction scolaire et scientifique. L'apprentissage prodigué aux jeunes comprenait le maniement des armes, le développement de la force physique, la stratégie militaire et un endoctrinement antisémite. Après avoir dissous les organisations de scouts dans tous les « Länder » d'Allemagne, les Jeunesses hitlériennes s'approprièrent beaucoup de leurs activités, bien que les objectifs et le contenu ne soient pas les mêmes. Une certaine cruauté (limitée) des plus grands sur les plus jeunes était tolérée, et même encouragée, puisqu'on pensait que cela éliminerait les plus faibles et endurcirait les autres.

Les membres des Jeunesses hitlériennes portaient des uniformes para-militaires comparables à ceux du Parti nazi et utilisaient un système de grades nazis similaires aux grades et insignes des « Sturmabteilung ». Beaucoup des activités proposées aux garçons ressemblaient à un entraînement militaire : ramper sous des fils barbelés, apprendre à plonger en mer depuis des sautoirs et apprendre comment lancer des grenades factices. Ils avaient un poignard fabriqué par la firme Zwilling J.A. Henckels, sur le plat de la lame, figure l'inscription « Blut und Ehre ! » (Sang et Honneur) . Le manche était orné d'un insigne nazi.

Fixé par les directives de Von Schirach lui-même, les programmes à inculquer à la jeunesse sont précis, se veulent l'armature idéologique de la génération suivante, et comportent un certain nombre de thèmes centrés autour du NSDAP, de Hitler, de l'Allemagne et du peuple allemand, des directives pour les chants à entonner en quelle circonstance.

L'encadrement des Jeunesses hitlériennes était assuré par des adultes, souvent militants du Parti nazi au sein d'un corps d'armée. De plus, ces chefs d'escouades, à la pédagogie de sergent-instructeur exigeant, au « Führerprinzip » une obéissance totale. Le gros des membres comprenait des garçons âgés de 6 ans à 18 ans. Dès 1936, les Jeunesses hitlériennes devinrent officiellement une filière obligatoire pour tous les jeunes allemands. Le groupe servait aussi de base de recrutement pour des groupes para-militaires du Parti nazi : le groupe de la « Schutzstaffel » (SS) s'y intéressait particulièrement. Les membres des HJ étaient particulièrement fiers de se voir accorder le « Sieg Rune » (symbole de la victoire) , par les SS. Les SS utilisaient 2 « Sieg Runes » comme emblème, et cette récompense liait symboliquement les 2 groupes.

Elles étaient organisées dans les villes et villages en cellules locales. Ces groupes se réunissaient chaque semaine : un dirigeant adulte y enseignait la doctrine nazie. Au niveau régional, les responsables organisaient des rassemblements et des manœuvres auxquels plusieurs cellules participaient. Le groupe national se réunissait en général une fois par an à Nuremberg, pour le rassemblement traditionnel du Parti nazi.

Les Jeunesses hitlériennes avaient également créé des « académies » d'entraînement comparables aux lycées. De telles académies étaient considérées comme les bases de la relève du Parti : seuls les élèves les plus dévoués et les plus radicaux pouvaient prétendre devenir de futurs dirigeants nazis.

Quelques sections visaient à entraîner ceux de ses membres qui désiraient devenir officier de la « Wehrmacht » . De tels groupes s'appliquaient à former le jeune disciple dans la spécialité qu'il espérait exercer en tant qu'officier. Ainsi, les Jeunesses hitlériennes de la Marine était la section la plus nombreuse et servait d'auxiliaire à la « Kriegsmarine » pour le secours en mer.

Dès juillet 1933, Schirach organisa les Jeunesses hitlériennes au moyen d'un système de classes d'âges :

Les « Küken » , uniquement des fillettes de 6 à 10 ans, adhésion facultative.

Les « Deutsche Jungvolk » appelés aussi « Pimpfe » (nom familier signifiant cadets) , ou DJ (Jeunes allemands) , regroupaient les garçons de 10 à 14 ans.

Le « Jungmädelbund », ou JM (Association des jeunes filles), avait en charge l'encadrement des filles de 10 à 14 ans.

Le « véritable » « Hitlerjugend » s'occupait des jeunes gens de 14 à 18 ans.

Le « Bund Deutscher Mädel » (BDM) encadrait les jeunes filles de 14 à 18 ans ; plus tard, l'âge maximal des membres du BDM fut ramené à 17 ans.

Dès 1938, le BDM subit une modification de sa structure, et le « BDM-Werk » « Glaube und Schönheit » rassembla les jeunes filles de 17 à 21 ans.

Les 4 principales branches des HJ (« Deutsches Jungvolk », « Hitlerjugend », « Jungmädel », « Bund Deutscher Mädel »), quoique comportant quelques variations minimales, étaient structurées de manière similaire. La direction de la Jeunesse du « Reich » (« Reichsjugendführung ») avait organisé sur le territoire du « Reich » des directions régionales, représentant entre 20 et 42 « Gebiete » (pour les DJ ou les HJ), et autant d'« Obergau » pour les JM et le BDM. Ces structures étaient elles-mêmes re-découpées de manière plus fine, jusqu'à des groupes d'une dizaine de membres, par lieu de résidence, désignés sous les termes de « Jungenschaft » (DJ), « Kameradschaft » (HJ véritable), « Jungmädelschaft » (JM) ou « Mädelschaft+ » (BDM).

Pour les niveaux « Jungstamm / Stamm / ... » et inférieurs, chaque unité coordonnait les membres de 4 unités du niveau hiérarchique inférieur. Au niveau « Bann / Untergau », l'organisation se faisait de manière géographique, chacune de ces unités présidant à 4 ou 6 unités du niveau inférieur, tandis que chaque « Gebiet » ou « Obergau » regroupait environ 20 « Bannen » ou « Untergauen ». Une unité du niveau « Jungstamm / Stamm / ... » regroupait en moyenne environ 600 membres, un « Bann » ou un « Untergau » entre 2,400 et 3,600 membres.

En 1934, le « Reich » était ainsi organisé en 5 « Obergebiete » et 19 « Gebiete » ou « Obergau ». L'« Anschluß » de 1938 provoqua la création d'un 6^e « Obergebiet ». En 1942, le nombre de « Gebiete » et d'« Obergau » culmina à 42, dont 4 « Befehlsstellen » pour les pays occupés (Protectorat de Bohême-Moravie, Gouvernement général, Pays-Bas, ainsi que « Osten » pour l'Europe de l'Est et du Sud). Pour le territoire du « Reich », les limites entre « Gebiete » suivaient grosso modo celles des « Gauleitungen » du Parti nazi.

L'unité de base des Jeunesses hitlériennes était la « Bann », l'équivalent d'un régiment militaire. On comptait plus de 300 de ces « Banne », dispersées dans toute l'Allemagne, chacune d'entre elles comptant environ 6,000 jeunes. Chaque unité avait un drapeau avec un dessin pratiquement identique, mais chaque « Bann » était identifiée par son nom, inscrit en noir sur un ruban jaune, au-dessus de la tête de l'aigle. Ces drapeaux mesuraient 200 centimètres de long et 145 centimètres de haut. L'aigle au centre faisait référence à l'Empire allemand (aigle prussien). Il maintenait dans ses serres une épée blanche et un marteau noir. Ces symboles furent utilisés sur le 1^{er} drapeau officiel présenté aux Jeunesses hitlériennes, au Congrès national du NSDAP, en août 1929, à Nuremberg. L'épée était censée représenter le nationalisme alors que le marteau était le symbole du socialisme. Les mâts utilisés avec ces drapeaux étaient en bambou, surmontés d'une boule en fer blanc et d'une pointe.

Les drapeaux portés par les « Gefolgschaft » des HJ, l'équivalent d'une compagnie de 150 jeunes, montrait l'emblème utilisé par les groupes armés des HJ : 3 bandes horizontales (rouge-blanc-rouge) au centre desquelles un carré blanc tenant sur un sommet et contenant une croix gammée noire en son sein. Le drapeau des « Gefolgschaften » mesurait 180 centimètres de long par 120 centimètres de hauteur avec chaque bande de 40 centimètres. Pour distinguer chaque « Gefolgschaft » et la branche des Jeunesses hitlériennes à laquelle elle appartenait, chaque drapeau comportait un petit bandeau coloré, en haut à gauche. Le bandeau était d'une couleur précise, propre à chaque unité. Par exemple, un bandeau bleu clair avec un numéro d'unité en blanc et une couture blanche était réservé pour les Unités volantes de la HJ (« Flieger-HJ ») .

En 1923, l'organisation comptait un millier de membres. En 1925, le nombre de membres s'élevait à 5,000. 5 ans plus tard, les Jeunesses hitlériennes dépassait les 25,000 sympathisants, et à l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir en 1933, elles comptaient un effectif de 2,250,000 membres. Cette augmentation étant due en grande partie aux membres des autres organisations de jeunesse avec lesquelles les Jeunesses hitlériennes avaient fusionné (avec plus ou moins de consentement) , incluant l'importante « evangelische Jugend » (600,000 membres à l'époque) , l'organisation de jeunesse de l'Église évangélique.

En décembre 1936, l'effectif dépassa les 5 millions de membres. Le même mois, l'organisation devint la seule organisation de jeunesse autorisée dans laquelle toutes les autres devaient se fondre (« Gesetz über die Hitlerjugend ») . Elle devint officiellement obligatoire en 1939 avec le « Jugenddienstpflicht » . L'appartenance pouvait même être proclamée contre l'avis des parents. À partir de là, la plupart des adolescents allemands furent incorporés dans les Jeunesses hitlériennes : dès 1940, l'organisation avait atteint un effectif de 8 millions de membres. Plus tard, les statistiques de guerre sont difficiles à lire, dès le moment où l'on considère que la conscription obligatoire et l'appel à la lutte (chez des enfants à partir de 10 ans) signifie que pratiquement tous les jeunes allemands étaient, dans une certaine mesure, reliés aux Jeunesses hitlériennes.

Le gros de la « génération des Hitlerjugend » était né entre les années 1920 et 1930. Ils formèrent la génération adulte de l'après-guerre et des années 1970 et 1980. Il n'était donc pas rare pour les anciens dirigeants de la République démocratique allemande et de l'Allemagne de l'Ouest d'avoir eu un passé chez les Jeunesses hitlériennes. Du fait que l'organisation était devenue obligatoire dès 1936, il n'y eut pas de volonté de bannir les politiques qui avaient servi dans les Jeunesses hitlériennes, à partir du moment où l'on considérait qu'ils n'avaient pas eu le choix. L'exemple le plus patent fut celui de Manfred Rommel, fils d'Erwin Rommel, qui devint maire de Stuttgart en dépit du fait qu'il a fait partie des Jeunesses hitlériennes. Mais aussi, le ministre allemand des Affaires étrangères Hans-Dietrich Genscher, le philosophe Jürgen Habermas, et le Prince consort des Pays-Bas Claus von Amsberg. En outre, le 19 avril 2008, les médias annoncèrent que le pape de l'Église catholique romaine Benoît XVI (de son nom civil à la naissance Joseph Ratzinger) avait servi contre son gré dans les Jeunesses hitlériennes à l'âge de 14 ans. Cette information suscita une polémique selon laquelle une personne qui avait été liée d'une manière ou d'une autre au Nazisme ne devrait pas devenir pape. Cependant, les faits révélèrent que Joseph Ratzinger ne partageait pas l'idéologie des Nazis et qu'il s'en était dissocié rapidement.

Cependant, rapidement, le caractère subversif des Jeunesses hitlériennes disparaît, et cette organisation devient impopulaire au sein même des groupes qu'elle est censée encadrer. En effet, comme pour le KdF (« Kraft durch Freude » : la force par la joie) , les membres des Jeunesses hitlériennes utilisent les infrastructures pour la satisfaction de leurs besoins et désirs ; les activités d'embrigadement, les veillées, le camping, pratiqué de manière militaire, et la collecte de dons sont particulièrement impopulaires.

L'endoctrinement de la jeunesse, s'il se voulait totalitaire, rencontre des réserves au sein de la société allemande. Tout d'abord auprès du public que cette organisation est censée encadrer, puis au sein de la société dans son ensemble. Obligatoire à partir du décret « Gesetz über die Hitlerjugend » du 1er décembre 1936, l'organisation se transforme en structure bureaucratique, ce qui détourne beaucoup de jeunes de ses rangs. De plus, le caractère militaire de l'encadrement et des activités proposées jouent un rôle non négligeable dans la désaffection des jeunes à l'égard de l'organisation : dans le meilleur des cas, ils s'ennuient dans les veillées, ne participent pas aux défilés militaires. En outre, l'application du « Führerprinzip » finit par éloigner de l'organisation un nombre de plus en plus croissant de jeunes : obéissance inconditionnelle aux ordres, même lorsqu'ils semblent absurdes, et châtiments sans appel semblent la règle et incitent de nombreux jeunes à se tenir à l'écart.

Auprès de la population, les Jeunesses hitlériennes jettent le trouble au sein des familles : séparés de leur famille, les enfants sont souvent utilisés comme informateurs par le NSDAP. Au sein de la société, lorsqu'ils sont en groupes, les membres sont souvent grossiers et sans gêne à l'encontre des gens qu'ils peuvent croiser. De plus, indisciplinés et jouissant d'une quasi-impunité de fait, les jeunes militants de la « Hitlerjugend » mènent à l'école une sourde résistance contre l'institution scolaire, ce qui suscite de fortes réserves dans le corps enseignant.

En 1940, Artur Axmann prend la tête des Jeunesses hitlériennes pour transformer l'organisation en une force auxiliaire utile dans un contexte de guerre. Les Jeunesses hitlériennes assistent les pompiers et l'effort de reconstruction des villes lors des bombardements alliés. Elles accomplissent des missions dans le service postal, les chemins de fer, le service de radiodiffusion et servent dans les équipes de défense anti-aérienne.

Vers 1943, les chefs nazis transforment les Jeunesses hitlériennes en une réserve militaire où ils puisent des troupes suite aux pertes importantes et croissantes dues à la guerre. Ainsi la 12e « Panzerdivision SS Hitlerjugend » sous le commandement de Fritz Witt est entièrement composée de jeunes garçons entre 16 et 18 ans. Cette division est déployée pendant la bataille de Normandie contre les forces canadiennes et britanniques au nord de Caen. Pendant les mois qui suivent, la division obtient une réputation de férocité et de fanatisme. Quand Fritz Witt est tué par l'artillerie alliée, le « SS-Brigadeführer » Kurt Meyer en prend le commandement et devient le plus jeune commandant de division à l'âge de 33 ans.

Lors de l'invasion de l'Allemagne par les Alliés, la « Wehrmacht » recrute des membres des Jeunesses hitlériennes de plus en plus jeunes. En 1945, la « Volkssturm » engage dans des combats meurtriers et sans espoir des membres des Jeunesses hitlériennes à partir de 12 ans.

Pendant la bataille de Berlin, les Jeunesses hitlériennes constituent une part importante des forces allemandes et se battent avec fanatisme. Le commandant de la ville, le général Helmut Weidling ordonne à Artur Axmann de dissoudre les unités combattantes des Jeunesses hitlériennes, cet ordre n'est jamais appliqué à cause de la confusion de la bataille de Berlin.

À l'issue de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les Alliés ont dissous les Jeunesses hitlériennes comme partie intégrante du Parti nazi. Des membres des Jeunesses hitlériennes furent accusés de crime de guerre mais, dans la mesure où l'organisation était constituée de mineurs, les efforts pour faire aboutir les poursuites furent insignifiants.

Bien que les Jeunesses hitlériennes n'eussent jamais été déclarées « organisation criminelle », on considéra que l'encadrement adulte avait commis des crimes contre la paix en corrompant les jeunes esprits allemands. De nombreux cadres de haut-niveau furent jugés par les Alliés, à l'instar de Baldur von Schirach condamné à 20 ans de prison.

The Hitler Youth (« Hitlerjugend » , often abbreviated as HJ in German) was the youth organization of the Nazi Party in Germany. Its origins dated back to 1922. From 1933 until 1945, it was the sole official youth organization in Germany and was partially a para-military organization ; it was constituted of the « Hitlerjugend » proper for male youth aged 14 to 18, the « Deutsches Jungvolk » (German Youth) for younger boys, and the League of German Girls.

With the surrender of Nazi Germany in 1945, the organization de facto ceased to exist. On 10 October 1945, it was outlawed by the Allied Control Council along with other Nazi Party organisations. Under Section 86 of the German Criminal Code, the Hitler Youth is an « unconstitutional organization » and the distribution or public use of its symbols, except for educational or research purposes, are not permitted.

In 1922, the Munich-based Nazi Party established its official youth organization called « Jugendbund der NSDAP » . It was announced on 8 March 1922 in the « Völkischer Beobachter » , and its inaugural meeting took place on 13 May the same year. Another youth group was established in 1922 as the « Jungsturm Adolf Hitler » . Based in Munich, Bavaria, it served to train and recruit future members of the « Sturmabteilung » (Storm Regiment) , the adult para-military wing of the Nazi Party.

Following the abortive « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » (in November 1923) , the Nazi youth groups ostensibly disbanded, but many elements simply went underground, operating clandestinely in small units under assumed names. In April 1924, the « Jugendbund der NSDAP » was renamed « Großdeutsche Jugendbewegung » (Greater German Youth Movement) . On 4 July 1926, the « Großdeutsche Jugendbewegung » was officially renamed « Hitler Jugend Bund der deutschen Arbeiterjugend » (Hitler Youth League of German Worker Youth) . This event took place 1 year after the Nazi Party itself had been re-organized. The architect of the re-organization was Kurt Gruber, a law student from Plauen in Saxony.

After a short power-struggle with a rival organization (Gerhard Roßbach's « Schilljugend ») , Gruber prevailed and his « Greater German Youth Movement » became the Nazi Party's official youth organization. In July 1926, it was renamed « Hitler-Jugend, Bund deutscher Arbeiterjugend » (Hitler Youth, League of German Worker Youth) and, for the 1st time, officially became an integral part of the « Sturmabteilung » . The name « Hitler-Jugend » was taken-up on the suggestion of Hans Severus Ziegler.

By 1930, the « Hitler-Jugend » had enlisted over 25,000 boys aged 14 and upwards. It also set-up a junior branch, the « Deutsches Jungvolk » , for boys aged 10 to 14. Girls from 10 to 18 were given their own parallel organization, the « Bund Deutscher Mädel » (BDM) , League of German Girls.

In April 1932, Chancellor Heinrich Brüning banned the Hitler Youth movement in an attempt to stop wide-spread political violence. But, in June, Brüning's successor as Chancellor, Franz von Papen, lifted the ban as a way of appeasing Hitler, the rapidly ascending political star. A further significant expansion drive started in 1933, when Baldur von Schirach became the 1st « Reichsjugendführer » (« Reich » Youth Leader) , pouring much time and large amounts of money into the project.

The members of the Hitler Youth were viewed as future « Aryan supermen » and were indoctrinated into racism. One aim was to instill the motivation that would enable its members as soldiers, to fight faithfully for Nazi Germany. There was more emphasis on physical and military training than on academic study. The « Nationalsozialistischer Reichsbund für Leibesübungen » (NSRBL) , the umbrella organization promoting and coordinating sport activities in Germany during the Nazi era, had the responsibility of overseeing the physical fitness development programs provided to the German youth.

The Hitler Youth were used to break-up Church youth movements, and in anti-Church indoctrination, used to spy on religious classes and Bible studies, and interfere with church attendance.

After the boy scout movement was banned through German-controlled countries, the Hitler Youth appropriated many of its activities, though changed in content and intention. For example, many activities closely resembled military training, with weapons training, assault course circuits and basic tactics. Some cruelty by the older boys toward the younger ones was tolerated and even encouraged, since it was believed this would weed out the unfit and harden the rest.

Members wore uniforms very much like that of the SA, with similar ranks and insignia.

The Hitler Youth was organized into corps under adult leaders, and the general membership comprised boys aged 14 to 18. The organization was also seen as an important stepping stone to future membership of the elite « Schutzstaffel » (SS) . Members of the Hitler Youth were particularly proud to be bestowed with the single « Sig Rune » (Victory symbol) by the SS. The SS utilized 2 « Sig Runes » as their mark, and this gesture served to symbolically link the 2 groups.

The Hitler Youth was organized into local cells on a community level. Such cells had weekly meetings at which various Nazi doctrines were taught by adult leaders. Regional leaders typically organized rallies and field exercises in which several dozen Hitler Youth cells would participate. The largest gathering usually took place annually, at Nuremberg, where members from all over Germany would converge for the annual Nazi Party rally.

The Hitler Youth maintained training academies comparable to preparatory schools, which were designed to nurture future Nazi Party leaders, and only the most devoted members could expect to attend.

The Hitler Youth also maintained several corps designed to develop future officers for the « Wehrmacht » (Armed forces) . The corps offered specialist pre-training for each of the specific arms for which the member was ultimately destined. The Marine Hitler Youth (« Marine-HJ ») , for example, was the largest such corps and served as a water rescue auxiliary to the « Kriegsmarine » .

Another branch of the Hitler Youth was the « Deutsche Arbeiter Jugend » (German Worker Youth) . This organization within the Hitler Youth was a training ground for future labour leaders and technicians. Its symbol was a rising sun with a swastika.

The Hitler Youth regularly issued the « Wille und Macht » (Will and Power) monthly magazine. This publication was also its official organ and its editor was Baldur von Schirach. Other publications included « Die Kameradschaft » (Comradeship) , which had a girl's version for the BDM called « Mädelschaft » , and a year-book called « Jungen eure Welt » (Youth your World) .

Another program entitled « Landjahr Lager » (Country Service Camp) was designed to teach specifically chosen girls of the BDM high-moral character standards within a rural educational setting.

The basic unit of the Hitler Youth was the « Bann » (unit of the whole district, consisting of 2,400 to 3,600 members, with 4 « Stamm/Stämmen » each of 600 members or more) , the equivalent of a military regiment. Of these « Banne » , there were more than 300 spread throughout Germany, each of a strength of about 6,000 youths. Each unit carried a flag of almost identical design, but the individual « Bann » was identified by its number, displayed in black on a yellow scroll above the eagle's head. The flags measured 200 by 145 centimetres (79 inches x 57 inches) . The displayed eagle in the center was adopted from the former Imperial State of Prussia. In its talons, it grasped a white coloured sword and a black hammer. These symbols were used on the 1st official flags presented to the delegation of the Hitler Youth at a national rally of the NSDAP, in August 1929 in Nürnberg. The sword was said to represent nationalism, whereas the hammer was a symbol of socialism. The poles used with these flags were of bamboo topped by a white metal ball and spear point finial.

The flags carried by the Hitler Youth « Gefolgschaft » (Escort) , the equivalent of a company with a strength of 150 youths, displayed the emblem used on the Hitler Youth arm-band : a tribar of red over white over red, in the centre of which was a square of white standing on its point containing a black swastika. The « Gefolgschafts » flag measured 180 by 120 centimetres (71 inches x 47 inches) with the 3 horizontal bars each 40 centimetres (16 inches) deep. In order to distinguish both the individual « Gefolgschaft » and the branch of Hitler Youth service to which the unit belonged, each flag displayed a small coloured identification panel in the upper-left corner. The patch was in a specific colour according to the branch. For example, there was a light-blue patch, a white Unit number, and a white piping reserved for the « Flieger-HJ » , or Flying Hitler Youth. The flag-poles were of polished black wood and had a white metal bayonet finial.

The « Deutsches Jungvolk » was the junior branch of the Hitler Youth, for boys aged 10 to 14. Its flag (« Jungbann ») generally followed the same style as those of the Hitler Youth. The differences were its flag had an all-black field with a white eagle ; the scroll above the eagle's head was in white with the unit number in black ; and the sword, hammer, beak, talons, and left leg of the eagle were in silver-grey colour. The flags eventually measured 165 by 120 centimetres (65 inches x 47 inches) high. The flag-poles were of black polished wood topped with a white-metal spearhead-shaped finial. It displayed on both sides an eagle bearing on its breast the Hitler Youth diamond.

In contrast, the « DJ Fähnlein » flag, that of the name of the unit, equivalent to a troop or company, was of a very simple design. It displayed a single runic « S » in white on an all-black field. The « Fähnlein » number appeared on a white patch sewn to the cloth in the top left-hand corner. It was piped in silver and had black unit numbers. The size was 160 by 120 centimetres (63 inches x 47 inches) . The flag-poles were of polished black wood with a white metal unsheathed bayonet blade. A « Fähnlein » however, was not so much the flag, but the name of the DJ unit itself, a term which had been taken-over from ancient « Landsknecht » denominations.

In 1923, the youth organization of the Nazi Party had a little over 1,000 members and was limited to Munich. In 1925, when the Nazi Party had been re-founded, the membership grew to over 5,000. 5 years later, national membership stood at 25,000. By the end of 1932, it was at 107,956. When the Nazis came to power next year, 1933, and the membership of Hitler Youth organizations increased dramatically to 2,300,000 members by the end of that year. Much of these increases came from forcible take-overs of other youth organizations. (The sizable « Evangelische Jugend » , a Lutheran youth organization of 600,000 members, was integrated on 18 February 1934) . In 1934, a law declared the Hitler Youth to be the only legally permitted youth organization in Germany, and stated that « all of the German youth in the “ Reich ” is organized within the Hitler Youth » .

However, how active many members were remains open to speculation. For example, in the class of Hans J. Massaquoi, 100 % of the Aryan pupils in his class became « Pimpf » . However, many of his classmates joined because of their parents or teachers or to be like everybody else. After several months, many of the children became inactive and almost all left after 1 or 2 years.

By December 1936, Hitler Youth membership had reached over 5 million. That same month, membership became mandatory for Aryans, under the « Gesetz über die Hitlerjugend » law. By 1938, the Hitler Youth had over 7.7 million members. This legal obligation was re-affirmed in March 1939 with the « Jugenddienstpflicht » , which conscripted all German youths into the Hitler Youth - even if the parents objected. Those parents who refused to allow their children to join were told that the State would take their children away. Massaquoi claims, though, that the War did not allow the law to go very far. From then on, most of Germany's teenagers belonged to the Hitler Youth. By 1940, it had 8 million members. Later, War figures are difficult to calculate, since massive conscription efforts and a general call-up of boys as young as 10 years old meant that virtually every young male in Germany was, in some way, connected to the Hitler Youth. Only about 10 to 20 % avoided joining.

Long before 1939, though, German youths were under growing pressure to join the Hitler Youth. Students who did not join were frequently assigned essays with titles such as « Why am I not in the Hitler Youth ? ». They were also the subject of frequent taunts from teachers and fellow students, and could even be refused their school-leaving certificate - which made it impossible to be admitted to university. A number of employers refused to offer apprenticeships to anyone who wasn't a member of the Hitler Youth. By 1936, the Hitler Youth had a monopoly on all youth sports facilities in Germany, effectively locking-out non-members. As time went on, a number of boys chafed under the regimented nature of the organization ; some even dropped-out and only rejoined when they learned they couldn't get a job or enter university without being a member.

There were a few members of the Hitler Youth who privately disagreed with Nazi ideologies. For instance, Hans Scholl, the brother of Sophie Scholl and one of the leading figures of the anti-Nazi resistance movement « White Rose » (« Weiße Rose ») , was also a member of the Hitler Youth. This fact is emphasized in the film « The White Rose » which depicts how Scholl was able to resist Nazi Germany's ideology while being a member of the Nazi Party's youth movement. The 1993 Thomas Carter film « Swing Kids » also focuses on this topic.

In 1940, Artur Axmann replaced Schirach as « Reichsjugendführer » and took-over leadership of the Hitler Youth. Axmann began to reform the group into an auxiliary force which could perform War duties. The Hitler Youth became active in German fire brigades and assisted with recovery efforts to German cities affected from Allied bombing. The Hitler Youth also assisted in such organizations as the « Reich » Postal Service, the « Deutsche Reichsbahn » , the fire services, the « Reich » radio service, and served among anti-aircraft defense crews.

By 1943, Nazi leaders began turning the Hitler Youth into a military reserve to replace man-power which had been depleted due to tremendous military losses. In 1943, the 12th « SS-Panzer-Division Hitlerjugend » , under the command of « SS-Brigadeführer » Fritz Witt, was formed. The Division was a fully-equipped « Waffen-SS » Panzer division, with the majority of the enlisted cadre being drawn from Hitler Youth boys between the ages of 16 and 18. The division was deployed during the Battle of Normandy against the British and Canadian forces to the north of Caen. During the following months, the division earned itself a reputation for ferocity and fanaticism. When Witt was killed by allied naval gunfire, « SS-Brigadeführer » Kurt Meyer took-over command and became the youngest divisional commander at age 33.

As German casualties escalated with the combination of Operation Bagration and the Lvov-Sandomierz Operation in the east, and Operation Cobra in the west, members of the « Hitlerjugend » were recruited at ever younger ages. By 1945, the « Volkssturm » was commonly drafting 12 year old Hitler Youth members into its ranks. During the Battle of Berlin, Axmann's Hitler Youth formed a major part of the last line of German defence, and were reportedly among the fiercest fighters. Although the city commander, General Helmuth Weidling, ordered Axmann to disband the Hitler Youth combat formations, in the confusion this order was never carried-out. The remnants of the youth brigade took heavy casualties from the advancing Russian forces ; only 2 survived.

The Hitler Youth was disbanded by Allied authorities as part of the denazification process. Some Hitler Youth members were suspected of War crimes but, because they were children, no serious efforts were made to prosecute these claims. While the Hitler Youth was never declared a criminal organization, its adult leadership was considered tainted for corrupting the minds of young Germans. Many adult leaders of the Hitler Youth were put on trial by Allied authorities, and Baldur von Schirach was sentenced to 20 years in prison. However, he was convicted of crimes against humanity for his actions as « Gauleiter » of Vienna, not for his leadership of the Hitler Youth, because Artur Axmann had been serving as the functioning leader of the Hitler Youth from 1940 onward - Axmann only received a 39 month prison sentence in May 1949, but was not found guilty of War crimes.

German children born in the 1920's and 1930's became adults during the « Cold War » years. Since membership was compulsory after 1936, it was neither surprising nor uncommon that many senior leaders of both West and East Germany had been members of the Hitler Youth. Little effort was made to black-list political figures who had been members, since many had little choice in the matter.

Despite this, several notable figures have been « exposed » by the media as former members. These include Stuttgart mayor Manfred Rommel (son of the famous general Erwin Rommel) ; former foreign minister of Germany Hans-Dietrich Genscher ; Pope Benedict XVI ; philosopher Jürgen Habermas ; and the late Prince Consort of the Netherlands Claus von Amsberg.

Le jeune Hitlérien « Quex » (1933)

« HitlerJugend Quex » est un film de propagande très bien construit. Son côté esthétique est soigné et l'acteur qui incarne le héros n'a pas l'allure d'une brute. C'est un bel adolescent dans lequel tout jeune Allemand peut se reconnaître, animé d'une foi ardente et d'un idéal altruiste. Les affiches présentent cette production comme un film sur l'esprit de sacrifice de la jeunesse allemande. Le prospectus de propagande contient ces lignes enflammées :

« Les Jeunesses hitlériennes sont en marche. Des milliers de drapeaux lumineux flottent sur l'Allemagne, drapeaux rouges de sang. Des jeunes gens, par centaines de mille, marchent en colonnes infinies, leur visage a retrouvé son énergie, ils suivent ce drapeau qu'ils connaissent bien, et c'est cette idée qui les mène : se liguer au " Führer " qui les a enrôlés. Plus d'un demi-million de Jeunes Hitlériens vont de l'avant, fiers et conscients de façonner l'Allemagne d'aujourd'hui. Pour y parvenir, ils ont dû souffrir, avoir faim, se sacrifier. Ils sont conscients d'être, demain, l'Allemagne. »

Le film, destiné en 1er lieu aux moins de 20 ans, était patronné par le chef des « Hitler-Jugend » Baldur von Schirach et soutenu par tout l'appareil du Parti et du gouvernement. Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring et Rudolf Heß, en personne, vinrent assister à la « première » dans une loge de l'« Ufa-Phœbus-Palast » de Munich, le 11 septembre 1933. La 4e Symphonie en mi bémol majeur d'Anton Bruckner (dite « Romantique ») fut jouée en préambule de la projection par l'Orchestre symphonique du « Reich » (qui comprenait pour l'occasion 80 musiciens) .

Puis, Schirach prit la parole pour magnifier le sacrifice d'un jeune Hitlérien, Norbert Norkus, « tombé sous les coups des assassins marxistes » l'année précédente. Une banlieue grise de Berlin avec ses quartiers populaires tristes, ses cafés et ses fêtes foraines est bien décrite par l'image. Hans Steinhof a réalisé « une sorte de chef-d'œuvre du cinéma nazi », ne manquant pas d'affirmer les critiques de cinéma contemporains Francis Courtade et Pierre Cadarsä.

Et ils ajoutent :

« Le choix d'Heinrich George pour interpréter le rôle du vieux Communiste était parfaitement machiavélique. »

D'autant plus habile qu'un rapprochement est fait, par ailleurs, avec un jeune chrétien des catacombes. Tarcisus, portant sous son manteau le Saint-Sacrement, se serait fait tuer en martyr par de méchants païens sous l'Empire romain. Tarcisus s'est transformé en « Quex » (Vif-Argent) et symbolise cette nouvelle mystique, copiant l'image de Saint-Sébastien percé de flèches devenue l'« icône » équivoque associant, dans la peinture, la beauté, le sang et la mort en exerçant une véritable fascination morbide. L'affiche du film montre un très beau garçon qui pourrait figurer dans un magazine homo-érotique américain, des années '60 ou '70, par le style du dessin et l'impression du visage ou aux illustrations de Pierre Joubert pour la collection célèbre « Signe de Piste » exaltant la jeunesse scoute sous l'égide du prince Eric dès 1937. Y aurait-il une inspiration commune ? Dans les 2 cas, il s'agit de valoriser la jeunesse héroïque et prête au sacrifice, refusant de se souiller dans l'immoralité.

« Comment le jeune Heini, si pur, si blond, si germanique, pourrait-il se complaire dans cette vulgaire débauche, tout juste bonne à réjouir des apatrides vicieux ? Dans la nuit, fuyant ses camarades, il découvre avec fascination l'ordre et la santé : les Nazis se réunissent autour d'un feu de camp, se lèvent au petit matin pour aller se baigner dans les claires rivières, et communient dans un même sentiment patriotique, à l'instant du lever des couleurs. Là est la vérité. »

Après le dramatique suicide de sa mère, Heini, poursuivi comme une bête, est mortellement blessé en chantant les premiers mots de l'hymne des « Hitlerjugend » : « Unsere Fahne flattert uns voran » ; sur son lit d'hôpital, a été déposé l'uniforme de la « Hitler Jugend » : suprême cadeau.

Mediating the New Order

« Action does not mean “deciding in favour of”... for that presupposes that one knows in favour of what one is deciding ; rather, action means “setting-off in a direction”, “taking sides”, by virtue of a mandate of destiny, by virtue of “one's own right”. It is really secondary to decide in favour of something that I have come to know. »

(Alfred Bäumler)

« There in the bleak, grey twilight, yellowed, tortured eyes stare into the emptiness. His tender head has been trampled into a bloody pulp. Long, deep wounds extend down the slender body, and a deadly laceration tears through his lungs and heart. Yet, it is as if life stirs anew out of pale death. Look now, the slender, elegant body begins to move. Slowly, slowly, he rises as if conjured-up by magic, until he stands tall in all his youthful glory right before my trembling eyes. And without moving his lips, a frail child's voice is heard as if speaking from all eternity. "What is mortal in me will perish. But my spirit, which is immortal, will remain with you. And it will show you the way." »

(Josef Goebbels)

« Hitlerjunge Quex » (Hitler Youth Quex) , like « The Blue Light » , is a legend for modern times, a film with a fatal attraction. It sanctifies an adolescent's heroic deed, re-shaping a young boy's dead body into an icon. It demonstrates a cinema of clear lines and straightforward answers, a medium charged with a mission : it aims to « show » the way. The film illustrates a political process and intimates a master narrative wherein human subjects become State objects and living beings give way to abstract patterns. « Hitler Youth Quex » both heralds a new order and prefigures its subsequent self-destruction.

The 1st feature film substantially supported by the new government and produced under the protectorate of the youth leader of the German « Reich » , Baldur von Schirach, « Hitler Youth Quex » offers a stirring example of how the National-Socialists employed a modern medium for State purposes, occupying a vast technology to craft gripping narratives and promote popular legends. Goebbels well-recognized film's potential value as a political instrument when he became minister of popular enlightenment and propaganda in March 1933. Nonetheless, a comprehensive policy did not immediately manifest itself in the declarations of the self-avowed « passionate lover of filmic art » . Being in power did not mean controlling culture ; swift legislation could not ensure overnight legitimation ; any campaign of coordination (« Gleichschaltung ») would demand different strategies on different fronts.

The National-Socialists had become the Masters of public life. Whether they would also become the Masters of popular imagination remained to be seen. The minister entered the scene with a mixture of swagger and circumspection, proclaiming a desire to combat a spiritual crisis and « reform German film from the ground up » . In his early programmatic declarations, Goebbels blended natural and martial metaphors, speaking of film as a body and a territorial surface, declaring himself the physician whose surgery would purge an afflicted organism of harmful alien elements. He scorned wishy-washy entertainments without national character, clear contours, and a sense of the historical moment. A new cinema for a new Germany must rediscover the innate laws of the medium and realize its mission as a mover of masses.

He proclaimed :

« It takes imagination to grant life to the inner-most purpose and inner-most constitution of a new world. »

Repeatedly, Goebbels stressed that film should exercise a discernible effect, that it must act on hearts and minds. Its calling should be that of a popular art (« Volkskunst ») , an art that simultaneously served State purposes and fulfilled personal needs. The new film must free itself from « l'art pour l'art ! » dalliance, intellectual Liberalism, and wanton commercialism. However, makeshift and ambiguous his 1st proclamations might have seemed (they apparently made for some confusion) , Goebbels pointed the way to a popular, contemporary, and distinctly national cinema. Film, he proclaimed, should emanate from political life and find its way to the deepest recesses of German soul and soil. Such a reform would take time and would demand energy and sensitivity. It made no sense to enforce an authoritarian dogmatism, to « proselytize from morning till night ». Political ideas must assume æsthetic forms. That did not mean re-enacting parades and spectacles, photographing marching storm-troopers, and fetishizing flags and emblems. « Arousing the masses, that's something we know a thing or two about », Gœbbels boasted, and, in so doing, set aside a special place for film apart from mass rallies and overt agitation. Mere loyalty to the Party would not guarantee success. Authentic film-art must transcend the everyday and « intensify life » .

« Hitler Youth Quex » did precisely that, intensifying life to the point of devivification. It focused on a human subject and transformed him into a political property. The film remade and ultimately overcame a boy's mind and body, rendering the material spiritual, transmuting being into form. This process involved the occupation of a real-life destiny and its orchestrated functionalization by the mass-media. Herbert Norkus, a Hitler Youth in the Berlin working-class District of Beuselkietz, had died at the hands of Communist assailants while distributing leaflets during the election of January 1932. Quickly enlisted as a Nazi martyr, Norkus became the subject of impassioned editorials and inspirational public addresses. Memorial services for the boy occasioned elaborate marches and demonstrations throughout Germany. His death received annual consecration on 24 January, a date of ritual observance during the 3rd « Reich » for all fallen Hitler Youths.

These recognitions accompanied a wide-range of popular renderings : novels, plays, poems, and songs. Karl Aloys Schenzinger immortalized Norkus in « Der Hitlerjunge Quex », a novel written between May and September 1932 and pre-published in installments in the Nazi Party organ, the « Völkischer Beobachter », before the book's release in December. The volume would become obligatory reading for Germany's youth, undergoing innumerable editions, registering sales of more than half a million copies by 1945. Soon after Schenzinger's novel appeared, « Ufa » announced plans for a film version directed by Hans Steinhoff and produced by Karl Ritter, a project actively supported by the NSDAP leadership. The premiere took place in the Munich « Ufa-Phœbus-Palast » on 11 September 1933, a festive event attended by Party dignitaries (including Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring, and Rudolf Heß) and accompanied by a gala-performance of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony by the 80 members of the « Reich » Symphony Orchestra. The film received the rating « artistically especially worthwhile », prompting words of praise from Gœbbels, who wrote the prominent « Ufa » executive Ernst Hugo Correll :

« If “ Hitler Youth Quex ” represents the 1st large-scale attempt to depict the ideas and world of National-Socialism with the art of cinema, then, one must say that this attempt, given the possibilities of modern technology, is a full-fledged success. »

Germany's greatest film company, proclaimed the « Lichtbild-Bühne » on 12 September, had mobilized « its extraordinary technical, material, and artistic means » to create « a lasting document of human and social circumstances, of the spiritual and emotional impulses that brought about the turn in Germany's history ». The film, likewise, met with a degree of commercial success, even if it did not match that of the more popular contemporaneous « Ufa » productions directed by Gustav Ucicky, « Morgenrot » (Dawn) and « Flüchtlinge » (Fugitives) . Having cost a modest 320,000 « Reichsmarks » (an amount slightly above average for the time) , it ran for 15 days in the massive « Ufa-Palast am Zoo » , and, by the end of January 1934, had attracted over 1 million viewers.

Like the 2 other feature films screened in 1933 which portrayed Party martyrs, « SA-Mann Brand » and « Hans Westmar » , « Hitler Youth Quex » unfolds as a family drama against the political and economic crisis of the late-Weimar years. Heini Völker, a printer's apprentice, joins a Communist youth group at the prompting of his father, an unemployed worker and War veteran, a choleric drinker who torments his mournful wife. Heini quickly becomes disenchanted with the unruly comrades during a week-end outing and flees their alcoholic and sexual revelry. Retreating into the woods, he spies a group of Hitler Youths and looks on their nighttime ceremony with fascination, an interest undiminished even after the Nazis discover him and send him away. He returns to Berlin effusing about their discipline and order, singing their anthem to his mother and causing his father to scold and beat him. Despite this outburst and the encouragement of the Communist leader, Stoppel, Heini seeks-out the young Nazis Fritz and Ulla. He refuses to participate in a Communist raid on the new Hitler Youth dormitory, but cannot fully-convince the Nazis of his good faith until he warns them that Stoppel and his group plan to bomb the new hostel. Mother Völker, confronted by an enraged Stoppel after the Communist plot back-fires, fears for her son but does not know how to protect him. In desperation, she turns on the gas to put an end to both herself and the sleeping boy.

Given that the SA were playing an important role at this time, it was to be expected that they would require some representation within the cinema. The films produced helped to justify the current SA actions and to publicly develop an institutional mythology around them. Out of the 3 films which fall into this category, « Hans Westmar » is based upon a real character : Horst Wessel. He was, then, mythologized into the Nazi canon with the « Horst Wessel Lied » becoming a symbolic message through being turned into an anthem. « Hitler Youth Quex » is also based upon a true story ...

« Hitler Youth Quex » (« Hitlerjugend Quex ») is a 1932 Nazi propaganda novel based on the life of Herbert « Quex » Norkus. The 1933 film « Hitlerjunge Quex : Ein Film vom Opfergeist der deutschen Jugend » was based on it and was described by Josef Gœbbels as the « 1st large-scale » transmission of Nazi ideology using the medium of cinema. Both the book and the film, like « SA-Mann Brand » and « Hans Westmar » , both released the same year, fictionalized and glorified death in the service of the Nazi Party and Adolf Hitler.

Both the novel and film are based on the real story of Herbert Norkus' life. Norkus, a Hitler Youth member, had died from injuries suffered while being chased and confronted by Communist youths in the night of 23-24 January 1932 in the Beusselkietz neighbourhood of Moabit, Berlin. Already on the next morning, Josef Gœbbels began to use Norkus' death for propaganda purposes during a rally in Berlin's « Sportpalast » . The funeral on 29 January at Plötzensee, Berlin, was turned into a major ceremony of several Nazi Party organizations, under the ægis of Gœbbels. While the murder was condemned also by non-Nazi press, the Communists started a counter-propaganda offensive, describing the incident as an accidental result of Communist self-defence during a Nazi attack. In the subsequent trial, several people were sentenced by the « Landgericht I. » Court in Moabit, yet, the most prominent accomplices Willi Simon, Bernhard Klingbeil and Harry Tack had been able to escape to the Soviet Union.

After the Nazis assumed power, the grave of Norkus was turned into a Nazi shrine, visited annually on New Year's Day by Nazi youth leader Baldur von Schirach for a speech that was broadcast nation-wide. To the site of Norkus' death at No. 4 « Zwinglistraße » , a plaque was attached reading, « He Gave His Life For Germany's Freedom » , the 1st of several such memorial plaques subsequently placed throughout Germany. 24 January was made remembrance day for all killed Hitler Youths, and the flag of Norkus' unit became the Hitler Youth's « blood flag » . 2 weeks after the Enabling Act of 1933, a provocative Hitler Youth march to Norkus' grave took the route through Berlin's communist districts of Wedding and Moabit. Throughout Germany, the Nazis organized demonstrations and speeches commemorating their newly-created martyr. Novels, plays, poems and songs were written about him.

The novel « Der Hitlerjunge Quex » was written by Karl Aloys Schenzinger, between May and September 1932. It was 1st published in Nazi Party newspaper « Völkischer Beobachter » , and as a book in December 1932. A required reading for Hitler Youth members, more than 190,000 copies were sold within the 1st 2 years, and more than 500,000 copies until 1945.

In Schenzinger's novel, Herbert Norkus is named Heini Völker. With a « völkisch » undertone, the opening chapters describe the hardships of Norkus' youth in a working-class district of Berlin, characterized by the Great Depression, the unemployment of his father and the suicide of his mother. The contemporary communist youth (« Rote Jungfront » : Red Young Front) is portrayed as a disorderly gang devoted primarily to alcohol, tobacco and sex. In contrast, the Nazi youth (« Hitlerjugend » : Hitler Youth) is portrayed as an orderly organization, superior in morals Schenzinger lets Heini Völker's father force his son to attend a camping week-end organized by a communist youth group, North Star Moabit. Heini is disgusted and flees the camp, only to encounter a Hitler Youth group in the woods. Deeply impressed, and in an atmosphere of nationalistic pathos, Heini learns of the Nazi movement, « Führerprinzip » (leader principle) , comradeship and « Volksgemeinschaft » (the people's community) . On « the happiest day of his life » , Heini joins the Hitler Youth, and Schenzinger has the « Bannführer » (group leader) symbolize Nazi ideology when he handed-over Heini's uniform to him :

« The uniform is the clothing of the community, of comradeship, of our ideology, of our unified organization ! It makes us all equal, and gives the same to all and demands the same from all. He who wears such a uniform does not have desires of his own anymore, he has only to obey. »

The following chapters deal with Heini's life as a Hitler Youth. Obedience and equality as understood by the Nazis are portrayed in a very positive light. They turn-out to be beneficial not only for Heini, but also for his comrades, for example, his best friend Fritz Dörries, the son of a wealthy merchant. Emphasis is put on the vision of self-sacrifice, the abolition of social barriers, and racial purity, and Heini learns from Fritz that « with us, Hitler Youth, there are no classes. There are only those who get the job done and parasites, and those we'll throw-out. » The haven Heini found in the Hitler Youth is symbolized by his group's hang-out, « Castle Beusselkietz » - Norkus' group was Schar 2, « Hitlerjugend Beusselkietz-Hansa » . His comrades nicknamed him « Quex » because « he carried-out orders faster than quicksilver » (« Quecksilber ») .

The last part of the novel is devoted to the circumstances of Norkus' (or Heini Völker's) death. According to Jay W. Baird (1992), Schenzinger's version is a « thinly veiled parallel to Resurrection » :

When his comrades were gathered around his death bed and wonder whether he is still alive, there « suddenly is a scream. Heini is sitting-up in bed, his eyes wide open. He is singing. They don't recognize the words, but they know the melody. It's the song they sing every day, every evening together, on every march. Everyone knows what it means - death is singing here. »

The novel provided the basis for a subsequent film version, produced in the « Universum Film AG » (Ufa) studios. The plot was written by Bobby E. Lüthge and Karl Aloys Schenzinger, the author of the novel. Produced by Karl Ritter, the film was supported by the Nazi leadership and produced for 320,000 « Reichsmarks » (which was slightly above average for the time) under the ægis of Baldur von Schirach. The latter also wrote the lyrics for the Hitler Youth song « Unsere Fahne flattert uns voran », based on an existing melody by Hans-Otto Borgmann, who was also responsible for the music. The director was Hans Steinhoff. For the film, the novel's title was amended with the sub-title « Ein Film vom Opfergeist der deutschen Jugend » (A film about the sacrificial spirit of German youth) .

« Ufa » were keen to make the film if only to outdo their competition in Munich. The film has a length of 95 minutes (2,605 metres) and was world-premiered on 11 September 1933 at the Ufa-Phœbus Palace, in Munich, in front of Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß and many Nazi dignitaries. It was reviewed favourably having a successful run in Berlin (opening on 19 September) at the « Ufa-Palast am Zoo » . By the end of January 1934, it had gained over 1 million viewers.

« Hitlerjugend Quex » was one of 3 films about Nazi martyrs in 1933, the other 2 being « SA-Mann Brand » and « Hans Westmar » , and by January 1934 had been viewed by a million people.

The film's message is characterized by its final words :

« The flag means more than death. »

« Hitlerjunge Quex » (Hitler Youth Quex) was the 1st Nazi film of consequence. It was about the sacrificial spirit of the German youth. A German youth faces a conflict of ideals between his Communist father and his growing allegiance to the Hitler Youth movement which eventually leads to his own death. Directed by Karl Aloys Schenzinger. The Hitler Youth movement played an important role in generating the enthusiasm for Hitler and the Nazis that allowed them to seize power. They also played a role in the street disorders of the late-1920's and early-1930's. This film idealized a Hitler Youth boy that was killed in those disorders. The film provides a lot of interesting information about the Hitler Youth uniform in the early years of 3rd « Reich » and how it was worn.

The Nazis, from an early point, turned their fallen comrades into martyrs. This was raised to an art after the Nazis seized power and the Party could use the Government through the Ministry of Propaganda to seize or control the media. It was based on the life of Herbert Norkus, a Hitler Youth in the Berlin working-class district of Beusselkietz. Norkus was killed by Communist assailants while distributing leaflets during the election of January 1932. The Nazis quickly installed the boy as a Nazi martyr. He became the subject of impassioned editorials and inspirational public addresses. Memorial services for the boy occasioned elaborate marches and demonstrations throughout Germany. His death received annual consecration on January 24th, a date which then became a ritual observance during the 3rd « Reich » for all fallen Hitler Youths. (Jay W. Baird. To Die for Germany : Heroes in the Nazi Pantheon, Indiana University Press, Bloomington, 1990 ; page 119.) These recognitions accompanied a wide-range of popular renderings : novels, plays, poems, and songs. (« Film-Kurier » published and distributed the lyrics to the theme-song of « Hitler Youth Quex » , « Unsere Fahne flattert uns voran » , based on a text by Baldur von Schirach and a music by Hans-Otto Bergmann. The lyrics were available for 1.50 « Reichsmarks » .) Karl Aloys Schenzinger immortalized Norkus in « Der Hitlerjunge Quex » , a novel written between May and September 1932 and pre-published to considerable acclaim in installments in the Nazi Party organ, the « Völkischer Beobachter » , prior to the book's release in December. The volume would become obligatory reading for Germany's youth, undergoing innumerable editions and registering sales of more than 500,000 copies by 1945. (Gerd Albrecht, editor. « Hitlerjunge Quex : Ein Film vom Opfergeist der deutschen Jugend » , Deutsches Institut für Filmkunde, Frankfurt-am-Main, 1983 ; page 16.) Soon after Schenzinger's novel appeared, « Ufa » , the most important German film studio, announced plans for a film version directed by Hans Steinhoff and produced by Karl Ritter, a project actively supported by the Nazi leadership.

« Hitler Youth Quex » was, thus, the 1st feature-film significantly supported by the new government and produced under the protectorate of the Youth Leader of the German « Reich » , Baldur von Schirach. The film offers a striking example of how the Nazis planned to employ modern medium for State purposes. Once they seized power, they controlled one of Europe's most modern and sophisticated movie industries. They immediately mobilized this potent medium to craft gripping narratives and promote popular legends. Josef Gœbbels well-recognized the film's potential value as a political instrument when he was appointed Minister of Popular Enlightenment and Propaganda, in March 1933. It was directed by Karl Aloys Schenzinger.

The premiere took place in the Munich « Ufa-Phœbus-Palast » on 11 September 1933, a festive event attended by Party dignitaries (Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß, Robert Ley, Ernst Röhm, Franz von Papen, as well as Werner von Blomberg and other high-ranking generals) and accompanied by a gala-performance of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony by the 80 members of the « Reich » Symphony Orchestra. The film received the rating « artistically especially worthwhile » , prompting words of praise from Gœbbels, who wrote the prominent « Ufa » executive, Ernst Hugo Correll :

« If “ Hitler Youth Quex ” represents the 1st large-scale attempt to depict the ideas and world of National-Socialism with the art of cinema, then, one must say that this attempt, given the possibilities of modern technology, is a full-fledged success. »

« Hitler Youth Quex » was about the sacrificial spirit of the German youth. A German youth faces a conflict of ideals between his Communist father and his growing allegiance to the Hitler Youth movement which eventually leads to his own death. Like the 2 other German feature-films screened in 1933 which portrayed Party martyrs, « SA-Mann Brand » and « Hans Westmar », « Hitler Youth Quex » unfolds as a family drama, set against the chaotic political and economic crisis of the late Weimar years. Heini Völker, a printer's apprentice, joins a Communist youth group at the prompting of his father, an unemployed worker and War veteran, a choleric drinker who torments his mournful wife. During a weekend outing, Heini quickly grows disenchanted with his unruly Communist comrades and flees their alcoholic and sexual revelry. Retreating into the woods, he spies an idealized group of Hitler Youths and looks upon their night time ceremony with fascination, an interest undiminished even after the Nazis discover him and send him away. Heini returns to Berlin effusing about the order and discipline of the Hitler Youth, singing their anthem to his mother, and causing his father to scold and beat him. Despite this outburst and the promptings of the Communist leader, Stoppel, Heini seeks-out the young Nazis Fritz and Ulla. He refuses to participate in a Communist raid on the new Hitler Youth dormitory, but cannot fully convince the Nazis of his good faith until he warns them that Stoppel and his group plan to bomb the new hostel. Mother Völker, confronted by an enraged Stoppel after the Communist plot back-fires, fears for her son, but does not know how to protect him. In desperation, she turns on the gas to put an end to both herself and the sleeping boy. After awakening in a hospital, Heini finds himself surrounded by a group of Hitler Youths who express their gratitude and present him with a uniform and a mirror. As a result of his mother's death and his father's submission to the special plea of Hitler Youth Brigade Leader Cass, Heini moves into a Nazi dormitory. Active and energetic (so much so that his alacrity gains him the nickname « Quex », meaning quicksilver) , Heini works all night to print leaflets for the upcoming election and insists on distributing them in his old neighbourhood, Beuselkitz. Members of Stoppel's group, headed by the vicious Wilde, learn of Heini's presence and chase him through the streets, cornering him in a fairground where Wilde bludgeons him with the knife once coveted by Heini. When his Nazi cohorts reach him, it is too late. With his last breath, Heini gestures upward and utters the words, « Our flag flutters before us, it leads. » , as the image segues into a close-up of a Party banner over which marching figures parade in geometric configurations.

« Hitler Youth Quex » is a legend of modern film-making. The film sanctified an boy's heroic deed. The film was used to re-shape the idealistic young boy's dead body into an icon for German youth. It demonstrates how movies can effectively present issues as good or bad, leaving the viewer with clear lines and straightforward answers. The Nazis demonstrated with this film how they would charge a medium with a mission. The film showed the way for German Youth. The film illustrates the Nazi ideology that German youth was a State possession. It heralds the Nazi New Order. Many still do not understand how close Hitler and his cohorts came to achieving their goal. The film narrative makes an effort to present the facts of Heini's experiences dispassionately, a clever propaganda trick. Yet, the characters are drawn so starkly - the idealistic Hitler Youth and the depraved Communist youth that there is no way to avoid reaching the conclusion the Nazis wanted. In our media dominated modern world, we have become accustomed to questioning what is told us. « Hitler Youth Quex » will look simplistic and pretentious to us. But this is not how it was received by young Germans at the time.

(Figure 3) « Hitler Youth Quex » glorified the death of a Hitler Youth boy. It set the standard that Hitler Youth members should aim for. Many boys took it very seriously.

The « Reichminister » for Propaganda, Doctor Josef Gœbbels, took a special interest in film-making. « Hitler Youth Quex » was the 1st major film made under his supervision.

This is what he thought of the film :

« There in the bleak, gray twilight, yellowed, tortured eyes stare into the emptiness. His tender head has been trampled into a bloody pulp. Long, deep wounds extend down the slender body, and a deadly laceration tears through his lungs and heart. Yet, it is as if life stirs anew out of pale death. Look now, the slender, elegant body begins to move. Slowly, slowly, he rises as if conjured-up by magic, until he stands tall in all his youthful glory right before my trembling eyes. And without moving his lips, a frail child's voice is heard as if speaking from all eternity :

“ What is mortal in me will perish. But my spirit, which is immortal, will remain with you. And it will show you the way. ” »

(Josef Gœbbels, quoted in : Jay W. Baird. To Die For Germany : Heroes in the Nazi Pantheon, Indiana University Press, Bloomington, 1990 ; page 116.)

The Hitler Youth movement played an important role in generating the enthusiasm for Hitler and the Nazis that allowed them to seize power. They also played a role in the street disorders of the late-1920's and early-1930's. This film idealized a Hitler Youth boy that was killed in those disorders. After seizing power, the Nazis quickly brought order to the streets. All competing youth movements were either abolished or incorporated into the Hitler Youth.

The film transpires in the Völker's apartment, the Dörries' apartment, the forest, a Hitler Youth home, an amusement park, a hospital, the streets, and a bar.

The main characters are : Heine Völker, Father Völker, and Mother Völker. The Communists include : Stoppel, Gerda, and Wilde. The Hitler Youth include : Youth Leader Cass, Fritz Dörries, and Ula Dörries.

Important props include : knife, cigarettes, alcohol, flags, the Hitler Youth uniform, and leaflets. The Hitler Youth knife was an important part of the uniform. Receiving a knife was an important part of a boy's life in the 3rd « Reich » . The Hitler Youth were extensively used to pass-out leaflets on the street before the Nazis seized power. After they seized power, they were used to collect money for Party charities.

The 2 principal songs in the movie are : « Our Flag flutters before us » and the « Internationale » .

The film raises a variety of interesting issues : Order and Chaos, Social Classes, Work and Unemployment, Family Structure, Femininity versus Masculinity, Sacrifice, and the Hero's Death.

(Figure 4) The Nazis took film-making very seriously. « Hitler Youth Quex » was one of the 1st movies made after the Nazis seized power. Here, Heini is over-joyed to put-on his Hitler Youth uniform. Note the caps the boys wear. They were replaced by the more familiar campaign caps.

The film provides a lot of interesting information about both German boys' clothing and the the Hitler Youth uniform in the early years of 3rd « Reich » , and how it was worn. The Hitler Youth was originally organized as the youth auxiliary of the Storm Troopers (SA) . The SA were the Nazi Party thugs that terrorized the streets before the Party seized power and Nazi opponents in the 1st few years of Nazi rule. Most of the stills show the Hitler Youth uniforms, however, the film also showcases what German boys were wearing in the early-1930's. We see German boys in their regular clothes being recruited into the Hitler Youth. The Hitler Youth uniform was based on the SA uniform. Many of the SA thugs objected to this as they didn't like children being allowed to wear a uniform that they saw as a military uniform that they wore to remake Germany and terrorize their opponents with. Likewise, many German parents, at 1st, didn't want their children to wear a uniform that made them look like little SA men.

Actually, clothing plays a major role in this film. 1st, Communist dissolution and lack of discipline stand in direct opposition to Nazi containment and resolve. One way that this is expressed is through clothing. Bernhard K. , was 10 years old when he 1st saw « Hitler Youth Quex » in 1933, could vividly recall the film many decades later :

« Communist youths were shown. All of them dressed like ruffians. Unsavoury figures. Then, they set-up camp and even girls were with them. Everything was really disgusting. The Hitler Youth, on the other hand : all dressed the same, clean, nice, with leaders who had everything under control. I still remember today that, after the film, we all agreed : the Nazis made an altogether great impression, there was discipline, one wanted to join in. The Communists, on the other hand, no ; our parents would never have let us be part of a bunch like that. 2nd, quite a bit of attention is devoted to the Hitler Youth. Even in the hospital, he admires his new Hitler Youth cap with a mirror. Another scene is devoted to Heini finally being admitted to the Hitler Youth and receiving his uniform. He is delighted as he puts it on and appears before the others in it. »

(Quoted in : Karl Heinz-Huber. « Jugend unterm Hakenkreuz » , Ullstein, Frankfurt-am-Main, 1936 ; page 19.)

In the film « Quex » , I don't remember whether the Communist youth group (of which Heini was a member early in the film, before his rescue by the Nazis) wore uniforms or not. Maybe not. The neighbourhood Heini lived in (Beusselkietz) was as bleak as any Charles Dickens could have imagined. The boys probably could not have bought uniforms, and the Communists probably couldn't provide them freely. A lack of uniform might also symbolize solidarity of the proletarians and the « class struggle » . Besides, the film-makers were Nazis, and they could hardly let the Communists upstage them by wearing nicer clothes. In fact, the opposite is true. The Nazis were showing they could produce order out of the chaos which followed the end of the First World War (Berlin and Munich were 2 cities that witnessed open warfare between the Communists and « others ») . The Nazis were neater and cleaner than the Communists in this film, and they were much better behaved. Who wouldn't be impressed ! Why did Heini respond so significantly to his new uniform ? Early in the film, he visits Ulla and her family (who are Nazis) at their nice, comfortable home. What a contrast it is to his own. And Ulla and her family are attractive and kind to Heini. Probably, he's never been so well treated by anyone else, except by his mother. When Heini puts on the Hitler Youth uniform brought to him by Ulla and her brother, he is really shedding his identification with his old world and is joining the best thing he's ever had going for him.

I saw « Quex » about 12 years ago. It's a treasure of a film. The young main character really does seem physically and spiritually renewed by his « Hitler-Junge » uniform. He really is proud to belong to the « Hitler-Junge » , and the « Hitler-Junge » is everything he's never had and always wanted - a real sense of belongingness. The « Hitler-Junge » was a surrogate family to him. Also, Heini responds to music, especially the « Hitler-Junge » Lied (Song) . The words and music are stirring, especially the closing line - « Ja, die fahne ist mehr als der todt ! » (Yes, the flag will triumph over death !) . The closing scene as Heini dies from his wounds and the fade in to that « Hitler-Junge » procession in the heavens is nothing short of inspirational.

La première de « Quex » à Munich

The premiere of the film « Hitler Youth Quex » , on 11 September 1933, at the Ufa-Phœbus Palace, in Munich, took on all of the aspects of a Nazi Festival. Long columns of Hitler Youth formed a ceremonial guard outside the theater, blowing trumpet fanfares to the delight of the crowd gathered to catch a glimpse of the « Führer » . The guests in attendance included many of the elite of the 3rd « Reich » : Hermann Göring, Rudolf Heß, Robert Ley, Ernst Röhm, and Franz von Papen, as well as Werner von Blomberg and other high-ranking generals. Search-lights outside the theater added a dramatic touch, and the hall was aflame with the black, white, and red flags of Party and nation. Flowers were banked in the national colours before the stage, featuring a raised floral Swastika. A gala-performance of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony (« Romantic ») was given as a preamble by conductor Franz Adam and the 80 members of the « Reich » Symphony Orchestra. No touch had been overlooked for the celebration of the living dead.

Turning to Hitler and the guests of honour, Baldur von Schirach offered a brief testimonial :

« I want briefly to direct your thoughts to that young comrade who can't be with us anymore, because he has lain buried for a year and a half. It was in the time of the worst terror, when I stood before 2,000 Berlin Hitler Youth and spoke to them of sacrifice, of the “ Führer ”, and of heroism. An oppressive atmosphere lay over our meeting, and it was as if we expected something horrible to happen. I spoke of the bravery that everyone must show, and that there might be one of us out there whom I would never see again. And I said to him : Thank you that you take this fate on your shoulders, that you have the honour among the millions to bear the name of Hitler Youth, to become a leader in the community which you embody. On the next morning, the Hitler Youth Herbert Norkus was butchered by Marxist murder bandits. As I stood at his casket, Communists threw stones against the wall of the mortuary. Today, a youth movement of a million and a half fighters stands where that little Hitler Youth fell. Every single one of them is wedded to this spirit of sacrifice, this comradeship. We want to fight on in his unyielding spirit. “ Heil Hitler ! ” »

After the playing of the Hitler Youth March, the director of the Bavarian State Theater, Hans Schlenk, read the prologue from Kurt Klawitter's « Ours the Victory - Ours the Power » . The film itself was greeted with grand approval and boisterous shouts of « Heil ! » At its conclusion, Jürgen Ohlsen, who had played « Quex » , appeared on the stage in the company of Steinhoff and Ritter. Looking like the wandering Parzifal, he saluted Hitler who was standing with his entourage. Deeply moved, Hitler smiled approvingly, and, lost in memories of the « Kampfzeit » , he slowly returned the salute.

The reporter for « Kinematograph » , Germany's oldest film magazine, described the conclusion of the ceremonies :

« The shouts and “ Heils ” were heard throughout the neighbourhood, and they carried-out into the dark blue fall evening. Blood, tears, and victory (the story of our times) were relived that night in the presence of those who gained the final victory. “ Hitlerjunge Quex ”: is a fanfare of German youth and of the German future. »

There is no question that « Hitler Youth Quex » fulfilled the mission assigned to it. It was, at once, a propaganda and an æsthetic success, an ornament to Gœbbels' dream of using the best of modern technique in the service of the mythical National-Socialist ideal. « Hitler Youth Quex » lent currency to Gœbbels' affirmation that « film is one of the most modern and far-reaching means of influencing the masses » . It appealed to the propaganda Minister because it was produced in the heroic key of National-Socialism, because it was a felicitous union of political realism and art, and, most important, because it channeled idealism into action in support of the State. In a letter to Ernst H. Correll, director of production at « Ufa » , Gœbbels praised the film, noting that « “ Ufa ” as well as all those involved have contributed significantly not only to the development of the film-art but also to the æsthetic configuration of National-Socialist ideology » .

The film had a remarkable appeal for young people in Germany. It was shown on both Party and « Ufa » commercial channels, and its audience numbered well over 20 million. Curt Belling, a senior official in the Gœbbels film apparatus, referred to « Hitler Youth Quex » as « the film of National-Socialist youth » . As late as 1942, it was being shown in the Youth Film Hours of the Hitler Youth, an important propaganda activity of the organization.

There were many reasons for its success. Above all, « Hitler Youth Quex » was a film of youth, by youth, and for youth. As such, it both fascinated and inspired the young and met the requirements of the Party elite. It set a standard for the other major propaganda films that followed : « Ich für dich - Du für mich » (Carl Frœlich, 1934) ; « Kopf hoch, Johannes ! » (Viktor de Kowa, 1941) ; « Jakko » (Fritz Peter Buch, 1941) ; « Himmelhunde » (Roger von Norman, 1942) ; « Hiz'nde hock ! » (Alfred Weidenmann, 1942) ; and « Junge Adler » (Alfred Weidenmann, 1944) . From the point of view of the Party, « Hitler Youth Quex » had the great merit of laying the foundation for the central motif of Hitler Youth martyrology. Further, it schooled a generation to prepare for a sacrificial death for Germany.

Music Amongst the Hitler Youth

By 1945, the « Hitlerjugend » (Hitler Youth) included almost every German boy in the Reich ; hundreds of thousands of girls were incorporated into its sister organization, the « Bund Deutscher Mädel » (BDM, or League of German Girls) . The physical and mental training of German youth was one of the Nazi Party's greatest priorities, and much importance was placed on childhood activities and education. The primary organiser and leader of the « Hitlerjugend » , Baldur von Schirach, was considered to be one of the most important Nazi officials in the « Reich » . Within the system of military exercises, educational programmes, marches, camping and community service that made-up the « Hitlerjugend » 's activities, there was a prominent emphasis on music, in particular group singing. According to an internal « Hitlerjugend » memo, it was :

« ... precisely during celebrations and singing events that we have an excellent opportunity to have a political effect wide beyond the typical formation. Songs possess the strongest community-building power. Thus, we use them deliberately at those moments when we want to waken the consciousness of being part of a community, in order to deepen the power of such an experience. »

The « Hitlerjugend » was 1st created in the early 1920's, when the Nazi Party was still a fringe movement. With the Nazi rise to power in 1933, von Schirach took control of the « Hitlerjugend » and oversaw a large expansion of the group in terms of both membership and activities. In December 1936, the Hitler Youth law was declared, and membership in the « Hitlerjugend » became mandatory for all youth in Germany. (This was achieved in part by banning other youth groups and incorporating their membership into the « Hitlerjugend » .) The organization's aim was to instill discipline and a love for Germany, and to educate youth along Nazi lines :

Beyond the influence of parents and school, the entirety of German youth is to be exclusively educated, in body, mind and manners, in the spirit of National-Socialism, for the service of the people and the people's community.

Together with his music-chief Wolfgang Stumme, Baldur von Schirach emphasized the power of music and song in the context of the « Hitlerjugend » 's educational endeavour, and himself wrote several « Hitlerjugend » songs. Music featured prominently in the « Hitlerjugend » curriculum, and children were given regular classes in formal music training (vocal and instrumental) . Hundreds of « Hitlerjugend » music groups were established, which performed at birthday parties for high-ranking Nazi officials and at Nazi Festivals ; some even performed internationally. Group singing was considered particularly important as a means of building group cohesion and obedience, and numerous song-books were published for this purpose. Ironically, these activities integrated many musical practices common to banned communist and leftist youth groups - the emphasis on group music-making rather than solo performances ; the importance of folk-songs ; the use of music to build group solidarity - and often also used the very same songs, simply changing the lyrics to promote a Nazi world-view. The « Hitlerjugend » also incorporated a great deal of instrumental music, particularly brass bands.

One former « Hitlerjugend » member remembered :

« In the songs that we sang, in the poems that we recited, everything was bright, shiny and clear, the sun and earth were ours, and tomorrow so, too, would be the whole world. »

« Philharmoniker » - « Symphony and Love » (1944)

Un mauvais film que les mélomanes doivent à tout prix regarder

Film du réalisateur et acteur allemand Paul Verhoeven (né le 22 juin 1901 à Unna, Rhénanie-du-Nord-Westphalie ; décédé le 22 mars 1975 à Munich, en Bavière.

Synopsis : Hans Schonarth est violoniste à la Philharmonie de Berlin. Son frère Alexandre, violoniste également, a préféré faire carrière dans la musique légère, jusqu'au jour où il tombe amoureux de la fiancée de Hans et décide d'entrer lui aussi dans le légendaire Orchestre allemand pour se rapprocher de la belle Maria.

...

Tourné en 1944 sur un scénario avant tout destiné à faire oublier au public allemand les bombardements et l'approche inéluctable de la défaite totale, « Philharmoniker » (le Philharmonique, sous-entendu de Berlin) est une romance résolument indigente entre un bon aryen, violoniste de son état, et une jolie aryenne, dont l'histoire ne précise pas si elle est bonne.

Seulement voilà, comme il est question de musique et que l'Orchestre phare du 3e « Reich » a été sollicité pour les nombreuses scènes de concerts, le spectateur va avoir droit en prime à quelques extraits du grand répertoire symphonique allemand avec les plus grands chefs de l'époque. Et c'est là que « Philharmoniker » fait fort : des Symphonies de Beethoven et de Anton Bruckner, « Les Préludes » de Franz Liszt dirigés par des géants tels que Hans Knappertsbusch, Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm, sans oublier Richard Strauß lui-même qui dirige une de ses propres œuvres (le « Festliches Präludium », Opus 61) . On peut y admirer pendant quelques secondes sa fameuse battue minimaliste.

Manque à l'appel Wilhelm Furtwängler qui aurait absolument refusé d'apparaître dans ce film de propagande. Ce n'est pas dramatique dans la mesure où il existe quantité de témoignages filmés de son art et qu'il en existe justement très peu des chefs précédemment mentionnés.

Autre élément intéressant : de nombreuses scènes se déroulent dans l'ancienne salle de la « Philharmonie » (« Alte Philharmonie ») qui fut entièrement détruite lors d'un bombardement au phosphore des Britanniques, en 1944, peu après la fin du tournage !

(Le réalisateur allemand Paul Verhoeven, né en 1935, n'a aucun lien de parenté avec le réalisateur hollandais du même nom, né en 1935.

« Philharmoniker » : a love-story in the Philharmonic « milieu »

The Nazis scored a major « coup » in bringing Wilhelm Furtwängler within a goose-step of an official Party event, and Josef Goebbels and Hermann Göring immediately sought ways to present him more often at close proximity to such gatherings. But Furtwängler managed successfully to side-step them most of the time. After the War started, he performed 3 times in occupied countries. 2 of those occasions took place in Copenhagen, 1st on 5 February 1942 with the Berlin Philharmonic, and 2nd in May 1943 when he took the Vienna Philharmonic on tour through Scandinavia. Otto Straßer, the General Manager of the Philharmonic, informed him that the tour would ruin the Orchestra financially if it passed-up the receipts they expected in Copenhagen. The 3rd and 4th occasions both took place in Prague ; 1st in 1942, a small concert he presented before an invited audience in Prague while he was staying in the Czech capital on his way to Budapest ; and 2nd, a concert with the Berlin Philharmonic on 16 March 1944.

Perhaps, the blessing that truly cursed Furtwängler during the 3rd « Reich » was the relentless admiration Adolf Hitler heaped on him throughout the regime. In 1941, the « Führer » came-up with a grand scheme in which an entire ship would be given to Furtwängler so that he could sail around the world with or without his Orchestras to conduct concerts in the handful of countries with which Germany still had cordial relations. Goebbels also created on Hitler's orders a massive public relations campaign around Furtwängler, photographing him in every conceivable location, usually with the image of Hitler or a Swastika somewhere within the frame.

These blandishments, of course, concealed other dark motives. Even at this stage of the War, in 1941, Goebbels was preparing to mobilize every part of German life, especially cultural activities, for quasi-military purposes. Music was to play an integral part in Germany's eventual campaign of « Total War » , and Goebbels intended that Furtwängler take his place at the head of this massive military offensive. But if Winifred Wagner once despaired because Furtwängler seemed like a sponge that leaked water from all sides the moment he was seized, a conjunction of ill-luck and Furtwängler's maddening unreliability prevented Goebbels from being any more successful in containing him.

Furtwängler was an avid skier and highly-skilled for a man of his age. When the Ministry of Propaganda learned that he was in Sankt Anton, the « Berliner Illustrierte Zeitung » sent a photographer to take shots of Furtwängler on the slopes. The paper got their pictures and a message from the photographer :

« This might be Furtwängler's last adventure on skies.

Furtwängler had skidded down a dangerous slope, lost his balance and tumbled down the grade. He sustained a broken arm, a concussion, and 16 other injuries - mostly bruises, and was in critical condition for several days. The doctors also found nerve damage in his right arm and predicted that he would not be able to conduct if he survived.

All this did not stop him from leaving the hospital to hear a radio transmission of a recording he recently had made of Anton Bruckner's 7th Symphony. He had to go on foot to a tavern in a nearby village, which had the only radio powerful enough to receive the transmission. Usually, the radio played dance-music, but Furtwängler told the proprietor who he was and asked him to tune to his broadcast. Despite complaints from customers, the tavern resounded with Bruckner. While he listened, Furtwängler realized that he might never have another chance to perform this great work, and he wept. He reconciled himself to the only option he felt he had left : composing.

8 painful months later, he was back on the podium.

He told Curt Riess :

« I hoped to cancel a few concerts to be free for a few months, even a year. »

But that was impossible. If one is involved in the musical world, one is eaten-up by it. A drastic decision would be required to leave it.

Franz Liszt, for example, declared from one day to the next :

« From now on, I will not play the piano. »

Furtwängler already had made one binding decision : to stay in Germany to make German music in his own way. When he returned to his 1st rehearsal after the accident, his arms caused him so much pain that he had to stop after a few minutes. His doctors advised him to cancel the concert. He refused. They predicted he would have to stop in the middle of the concert, but he completed it. He was exhausted from the pain, but he knew now that he could still conduct. Within a year, the arm was back to normal. Nonetheless, his malady enabled him to evade engagements he did not want to accept and provided him, with a handy means of excusing himself from appearing at politically-oriented events.

But Goebbels was just as persistent in pursuing Furtwängler for propaganda purposes as Furtwängler was wily in avoiding him. Now that he was able again to make music, Goebbels was anxious to see to it that Furtwängler made more music in the service of the 3rd « Reich » . His new project for promoting the cultural glory of the Nazis was « Symphony and Love » (« Philharmoniker ») , a film directed by Paul Verhoeven, recounting the achievements of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He made numerous offers to Furtwängler to appear in the film and have a say in its production. Furtwängler hated the blatant Nazified bias in the script. It made no mention of any of the Jews who had been connected with the Orchestra (Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, etc) , barely acknowledged Arthur Nikisch's contribution to it, and interpolated a ridiculous love-story. Furtwängler firmly refused to have anything to do with it. Goebbels could easily have gone to dozens of other conductors who had worked with the Orchestra and could not have been more cooperative in this period. For example, Clemens Krauß, Karl Böhm, Hermann Abendroth, Robert Heger, Hans Knappertsbusch, and others took the Berlin Philharmonic on tours to occupied countries, appeared as guest-conductors in those States, and took part in domestic propaganda projects. But only the apostate Furtwängler could give the film the stamp of legitimacy it needed.

The film was a masterful example of Nazi public relations in its clever distortion of facts and wholesale untruths. According to the script, the Nazis alone had made the Berlin Philharmonic the great Orchestra it had become over the years. The concert agency of Wolff and Sachs, which was largely responsible for marketing the Orchestra everywhere, was left unmentioned. Louise Wolff and Bruno Walter never existed.

After, it looked as though Furtwängler's refusal to have anything to do with the film was final, Goebbels fingered his only remaining trump card. Richard Strauß was all too happy to make a brief appearance. He was seen conducting a few bars from his « Festival » Overture (« Festliches Präludium », Opus 61) before the cameras. A stand-in conducted the rest of the segment.

Goebbels had no idea how difficult « Symphony and Love » would be to make, and when it looked as though its completion was far into the future, he ordered a treatment for a film about Beethoven, to star the well-known German actor Gustav Fröhlich. He wanted Furtwängler to supervise the sound-track. Furtwängler was anxious to humour the Propaganda Minister at this point, in 1941, because he needed his help to get more money for the Philharmonic and enlist him in his battle against some virulent enemies who were threatening him at the Berlin Philharmonic, so, he did not decline immediately. Eventually, they talked seriously about the film, but Goebbels' arrogant manner collided with Furtwängler's propensity for long-windedness. An argument erupted.

Furtwängler stood-up and told the Minister :

« You are mistaken, “ Herr ” Minister, if you think you can exploit Beethoven in a film. » , and stormed-out.

Goebbels shelved his plans for immortalizing Beethoven on celluloid.

« Symphony and Love » , however, kept stewing on Propaganda Minister's back burner. When it was finally completed and released in 1944, it nauseated the critic Werner Fiedler, and he said as much in a review. Its director Paul Verhoeven was so angry that he demanded that Fiedler, who was already on Goebbels' black-list, be apprehended. Furtwängler, on the other hand, was so delighted with the review that he met with Fiedler in one of his rare encounters with critics for an amiable discussion on the nature of criticism. Goebbels had his hands so full with the Allies closing-in on Germany that he never got around to ordering Fiedler's arrest.

At the « Staatsoper » , Hermann Göring was also determined to put Furtwängler on a leash and make him conduct more frequently at his musical palace, but he too found himself frustrated. He tried persuasion rather than subterfuge. As far back as 1937, he had arranged for Furtwängler to conduct a spectacular production of « Tannhäuser » in Berlin, and he once again asked him to resume his position as Music Director at the « Staatsoper » . The position of Music Director at the « Staatsoper » was one of the appointments Furtwängler resigned in 1934, in the wake of the « Paul Hindemith Affair » .

(The premiere of « Tannhäuser » was given on 10 November 1937. Max Lorenz took the title-part in a production designed by Emil Preetorius and directed by Heinz Tietjen. Tiana Lemnitz and Heinrich Schlusnus sang Elisabeth and Wolfram, respectively. The fascinating switch in casting was Frida Leider, singing Venus for the 1st time. It was a turning-point in her career. She had been the reigning Elisabeth up until that time and still had several seasons of impassioned Isoldes and Brünnhildes left. But she clearly was moving toward the twilight of her singing career.)

But, at that time, Furtwängler was still smarting from Göring's most recent intrigues that had forced him into declining the invitation from the New York Philharmonic. He not only refused to take-up his post again at the « Staatsoper » but asked Göring to release him from his guest-conducting arrangement there. Predictably, Göring was furious and insisted that Furtwängler fulfill his guest-commitments at the « Staatsoper » to the absolute letter. But such threats had no teeth ; if Furtwängler did not wish to conduct, he was under no obligation because he was a free-lance and had no contract.

Furtwängler was Germany's finest conductor, but it galled both Gœbbels and Göring to know that Furtwängler could get away with his insubordinance simply because he had no real rivals anywhere in the « Reich » . They also realized that the racial policies of their own regime had backed them into a desolate corner : the pool of 1st class German talent was rapidly thinning-out. While Göring once boasted that he, alone, would decide who was Aryan and who was not at the « Staatsoper » , Jews were unable to perform there by 1938. It would be only a matter of months before the veteran Leo Blech would have to be dismissed. Blech was probably the only full-Jewish conductor still employed at a « Reich » institution. The other prominent conductors (Otto Klemperer, Fritz Busch, Erich Kleiber, Hermann Scherchen, Jascha Horenstein, Fritz Zweig, Fritz Stiedry, William Steinberg, Joseph Rosenstock) , all were gone now.

(Hermann Göring got special dispensation for Leo Blech, one of the finest Opera conductors Germany produced in the 20th Century, who remained unmolested and kept his title of « Generalmusikdirector » until the end of 1937. He emigrated to Sweden and led a successful career during the War, at the Royal Opera Stockholm, and was influential in developing the early careers of several singers who gained lasting fame in the post-War era. Most notable among them was Birgit Nilsson.)

A fictitious story in a real Orchestra : in this film, premiered in 1944, Paul Verhœven tells the love and life story of a violinist in the Berlin Philharmonic « milieu » . At the same time, without openly showing propaganda or symbols of the National-Socialist regime, the NS ideology becomes clear. Notwithstanding, the concert scenes showing the « Berliner Philharmoniker » conducted by Richard Strauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Eugen Jochum and Karl Böhm make the movie a musical document of its times.

The « Berliner Philharmoniker » were the driving force behind this film, which premiered in December 1944 and was filmed by Paul Verhœven. At the same time, without openly showing propaganda or symbols of the National-Socialist regime, the NS ideology becomes clear : sacrifices must be made during a crisis ; you may not be disloyal ; you stick with the collective unconditionally. The screen-play by Erich Ebermayer and Paul Verhœven, based on an idea by music-writer Friedrich Herzfeld, was personally approved by Josef Gœbbels, propaganda minister at the time.

Besides actors playing musicians, you can experience the « Berliner Philharmoniker » themselves in the film. Conducted by Richard Strauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm and others, they play music by Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, Richard Strauß and Johannes Brahms. Wilhelm Furtwängler, « de facto » the principal conductor, is missing, however ; he was already at logger-heads with the regime and refused to participate in the film.

The story is exciting and also touching : Alexander Schonath, 1st violinist, leaves the Philharmonic in an economic crisis. His younger, ailing brother Hans pursues a career in the Orchestra and gets engaged to Maria, the daughter of a member of the Orchestra board. Alexander returns and begins an intense love-affair with Maria, and tries to win back his place in the Orchestra from his brother. When he learns, however, how ill Hans is, Alexander leaves the Philharmonic again. Here again, « nationalistic » fate has different plans with the protagonist.

The film « Philharmoniker » (The Philharmonic) , directed by Paul Verhoeven, uses footage of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on tour in Spain and Portugal, during the year 1944. In 2010, Misha Aster has called the film « an artwork of artwork - a propaganda film made of propaganda » , which captures « the unique and terrifying semiotics of the moment » (page 214) . It is essentially a love-story and contains original music by Alois Melichar. The Berlin Philharmonic, under the direction of Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm and Hans Knappertsbusch, plays excerpts from Ludwig van Beethoven and Anton Bruckner Symphonies ; Franz Liszt's Symphonic-poem « Les Préludes » ; the « Festliches Präludium » by Richard Strauß ; and « The Blue Danube » waltz by Johann Strauß. The film takes a light-weight rather than serious approach to the difference between Symphonic music and Jazz - the former presented as « great art » and the latter « primitive music » .

In 1990, Paul Verhoeven's son, Michæl, won acclaim for his film « The Nasty Girl » , a story about a young girl in the Germany of the 1970's who explores the behaviour of the people in her hometown during the 3rd « Reich » . In a lengthy interview in « The New York Times » (8 October 1990) , the younger Verhoeven apparently gave no inkling of his own father's behaviour as it palpably was documented in the film « Symphony and Love » . The « Times » article also states that Paul Verhoeven spent the War as a film- and stage-director of « apolitical light-comedies » . So « apolitical » was « Symphony and Love » that Verhoeven demanded the arrest of Werner Fiedler, a critic who panned the film. Fiedler's arrest almost certainly would have led to his liquidation.

Comment :

« Philharmoniker » is a typical German Nazi propaganda movie about World War II. A story with love and music which will let the audience forget for a while the bombs over their cities. So far, I would not have screened the work until the end. What captivated me were these sequences where one see the great German conductors of that period leading the Berlin Philharmonic « Reich » Orchestra, as it was called during the War. One would regret not to see Wilhelm Furtwängler. Fortunately, plenty of visual documents exist where one can see and hear the « Devil's Master » . It was the 1st time I saw a younger Hans Knappertsbusch conducting Beethoven in a « Werke-konzert » . The same for Eugen Jochum who was already a great specialist of Anton Bruckner. At the end, Richard Strauß conducts one of his own works (the « Festival » Overture ; « Festliches Präludium » , Opus 61) with a minimalist gesture. Another interesting point is that one can see the « Old Philharmonie » concert-hall where the « Philharmoniker » played before it was hit by British phosphorus bombs on January 29th, 1944, and completely burned to the ground within a few hours. It happened shortly after the movie was released on the evening of December 4th, 1944, at the «

Berliner Taubentzen-Palast » .

Philharmoniker ist ein Musikfilm von Paul Verhoeven aus dem Jahr 1944.

Deutschland vor 1933 : Die finanzielle Lage der Berliner Philharmoniker hat sich verschlechtert, und obwohl die Musiker dem Orchester die Treue halten, ist es der gerade erst ins Orchester aufgenommene erste Geiger Alexander Schonath, der den Philharmonikern den Rücken kehrt. Er geht als Geiger zu einer Gruppe, die Unterhaltungsmusik spielt, und gilt von nun an unter den Philharmonikern als Verräter. Vor allem Alexanders Vater als eines der ältesten Mitglieder des Orchesters kann seinem Sohn nicht verzeihen.

In Wirklichkeit handelte Alexander jedoch aus guten Motiven. Ursprünglich war er als Sologeiger mit einer Tanzkapelle umhergezogen, was zu einem ersten Bruch mit dem Vater geführt hatte. Alexanders immer etwas kränklicher Bruder Hans, der ebenfalls Musiker ist, brachte es derweil zum Konzertmeister bei den Philharmonikern. Hans verlobte sich mit der Tochter des Orchestervorstands, Maria. Zu dem Zeitpunkt erschien unerwartet Alexander in Berlin und begann eine Affäre mit Maria. Ihr gelang es in der Folge, Alexander mit seinem Vater auszusöhnen. Zudem konnte sie ihren Vater, den Orchestervorstand, überzeugen, Alexander bei den Philharmonikern einzustellen. Die plötzliche Konkurrenz durch den Bruder sowohl im Privat- als auch im Berufsleben war zu viel für Hans, der während eines Konzerts ohnmächtig zusammenbrach. Als die Ärzte Alexander erklärten, daß jede Aufregung für Hans tödlich sein könnte, verließ Alexander die Philharmoniker, obwohl er nun als Verräter galt.

Im Jahr 1933 verbessert sich die finanzielle Lage der Philharmoniker deutlich. Hans stirbt während einer Auslandstournee und Maria trifft kurze Zeit später zufällig mit Alexander zusammen. Sie begegnet ihm zunächst ablehnend, erfährt jedoch von der Sängerin Heddy die wahren Hintergründe über Alexanders damaliges Verschwinden. Maria liebt Alexander immer noch und versöhnt ihn erneut mit seinem Vater. Der talentierte Geiger wird nun endgültig ein Mitglied der Philharmoniker und er und Maria werden ein Liebespaar.

Die Dreharbeiten für Philharmoniker fanden vom 26. November 1942 bis zum März 1943 unter anderem in der 1944 zerstörten alten Berliner Philharmonie und in Wien statt. Die Filmbauten übernahmen Otto Erdmann, Arthur Nortmann und Franz F. Fürst.

Die Filmprüfstelle stufte Philharmoniker im November 1944 als « Jugendfrei ab 14 Jahre » ein und verlieh diesem Film das Prädikat Künstlerisch besonders wertvoll.

Die Uraufführung des Films war am 4. Dezember 1944 im Berliner Tauentzien-Palast.

Im Film sind neben den Darstellern die Berliner Philharmoniker selbst zu hören und zu sehen. Unter den Dirigenten Richard Strauß, Hans Knappertsbusch, Eugen Jochum und Karl Böhm, die im Film auftreten, erklingen Werke von Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, Richard Strauß, und Johannes Brahms. Zu Beginn des Films erklingt Ludwig van Beethovens 5. Sinfonie. Die zeitgenössische Kritik hob im Hinblick auf die Dirigenten hervor, daß die « Meister ihres Fachs, die Namen von Welt, die hier Laienspieler vor der Kamera sind, die Meister der Maske [übertreffen] ! »

Die zeitgenössische Kritik lobte Philharmoniker als « musikalischen Ohrenschmaus und mimische Augenweide » . Er schaffe es, « Musik aus ihrer absoluten Selbstherrlichkeit zu lösen und mit den privaten Episoden menschlicher Schicksale zu verknüpfen » . Gleichzeitig gelänge es ihm, « die Majestät der Musik sichtbar zu machen » . Andere Kritiker betonten, daß im Film weniger die Handlung wichtig ist, als vielmehr « das Erlebnis der Musik, die wiederum die Entwicklung eines Orchesters vorwärtstreibt » . Paul Verhoeven hätte in Philharmoniker « atmosphärische Momente » und « Konzerte von eindringlicher Wirkung » eingefangen. Hervorgehoben wurden auch die Leistungen der Schauspieler, die « unbewußt auf dem Podium die höchste Natürlichkeit der Kunst erzielten » , so wäre « der Geiger des deutschen Films » Will Quadflieg hier « der Virtuose seines Lebens und seiner Kunst schlechthin » und Irene von Meyendorff zeige « mehr sprechende Wärme im Blick und Gefühl, als sie es sonst in ihrem wie zur Medaille geprägten Gesicht geben kann und darf » .

Das Lexikon des Internationalen Films bewertete Philharmoniker 1990 als « Musikfilm mit guter Kameraarbeit und ausgezeichneten schauspielerischen Leistungen » . Er biete « vollendetes Musizieren der Berliner Philharmoniker unter der Stabsführung von Richard Strauß, Eugen Jochum und Hans Knappertsbusch » .

...

Das Regime aber suchte die Lage zu « überspielen » . Da sämtliche Theater, Varietés, Kabarett und Schauspielschulen von Josef Gæbbels zum 1. September geschlossen wurden, kam dem Kino eine noch größere Unterhaltungsbedeutung zu, als es diese seit den 30er Jahren ohnehin schon in Deutschland hatte. Durchaus beachtenswerte Filme erhielten jetzt ihre Uraufführung : die « Feuerzangenbowle » (nach Heinrich Spörl und mit Heinz Rühmann, Erich Ponté, Paul Henckels und andere) am 28. Januar, die « Träumerei » über Robert und Clara Schumann (mit Hilde Krahl und Mathias Wieman) am 3. Mai, die « Zaubergeige » am 9. Mai oder der künstlerisch sehr wertvolle Musikfilm « Philharmoniker » am 4. Dezember. Die gesamte deutsche Schauspielerelite war hier beteiligt, von Will Quadflieg über Erich Ponté, O.E. Hasse bis zu Erika von Thellmann, Elisabeth Flickenschildt und andere. Die Generalmusikdirektor Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm und Hans Knappertsbusch dirigierten, auch der Komponist Richard Strauß, nicht aber Wilhelm Furtwängler und Herbert von Karajan. Gespielt wurden von den Berliner Philharmonikern die ersten beiden Sätze der 5. Sinfonie Beethovens, der 1. Satz der 7. Sinfonie Bruckners, die durch die früheren nationalsozialistischen Siegesmeldungen etwas in Misskredit geratenen, musikalisch aber hervorragenden « Les Préludes » von Franz Liszt sowie der Walzer « An der schönen blauen Donau » . Vorausblicken dürfte man auch auf den Widerstandsfilm « Kolberg » , der zwar erst am 30. Januar 1945 uraufgeführt wurde, aber mit großem Aufwand 1943 und 1944 gedreht werden war. Hier spielten Heinrich George und Kristina Söderbaum ihre letzten großen Rollen. Das alles war eine Welt, die Helmuth von Moltke vielleicht - nur über den VB in seine Zelle holen konnte.

Inhalt

Alexander Schonath ist ein überaus begabter Musiker, der in einem Philharmonischen Orchester die erste Geige spielt. Doch als das Orchester in finanzielle Schwierigkeiten gerät, ist Peter auch der erste, der die Truppe verläßt - die anderen Musiker, allen voran Peters Vater, sehen in ihm einen « Déserteur » ; vom Vater hat er ohnehin nie viel Anerkennung erfahren. Er spielt nun in einer Unterhaltungskapelle. In Alexanders Abwesenheit macht sein jüngerer, stets kränklicher Bruder Hans Karriere bei den Philharmonikern und verlobt sich mit Maria, der Tochter des Orchestervorstandes Herbert Hartwig. Da kehrt Peter plötzlich zurück und beginnt eine leidenschaftliche Affäre mit Maria. Hans ist am Boden zerstört, zumal Peter, der sich mit Marias Hilfe mit seinem Vater versöhnt hat, ihm seinen Platz im Orchester streitig zu machen droht. Zwischen den Brüdern entwickelt sich ein heftiger Konflikt, der bei Hans einen Herzanfall auslöst. Als Peter vom Arzt erfährt, daß man jede Aufregung von Hans fernhalten muß, um sein Leben nicht zu gefährden, beschließt Peter, abermals fortzugehen. So macht er sich auf den Weg, nennt niemandem seine Beweggründe und zieht sich erneut den Haß seiner Kollegen zu, die meinen, er lasse sie wieder im Stich. Und es wird lange dauern, bis tragische Umstände die Wahrheit ans Licht und Peter endgültig mit Maria zusammenbringen werden.

Paul Verhøeven (1901-1975)

Durch privaten Schauspielunterricht kommt Paul Verhoeven 1921 zum Theater in München, später auch Dresden, Frankfurt und Berlin. Neben kleineren und größeren Rollen versucht er sich als Regisseur und Schreiber. Sein erster Spielfilm ist 1937 die Operettenverfilmung « Die Fledermaus ». Im Folgenden dreht er Lustspiele, Komödien und Melodramen, wobei seine nächste Operettenverfilmung « Die Nacht in Venedig » (1942) von Josef Göbbels als « mustergültige Unterhaltung » gepriesen wird. 1943 wird er Intendant an zwei Berliner Theatern und dreht weiterhin Filme, wie den pompösen « Philharmoniker », welcher in seiner Schlußsequenz das Jahr 1933 als Überwindung der Krise glorifiziert. Der Prestigefilm wird mit den Prädikaten « künstlerisch besonders wertvoll », « staatspolitisch wertvoll » und « kulturell wertvoll » ausgezeichnet. 1944 wird Verhoeven zum Kriegsdienst einberufen, entzieht sich diesem aber. Von 1945 bis 1948 ist er Intendant am Staatsschauspiel München. Er erhält außerdem von der amerikanischen Besatzungsmacht die Lizenz zur Filmherstellung und gründet die Firma V-Film. Das erste Projekt « Du bist nicht allein » fällt 1949 mit seinem Nachkriegsstoff beim Publikum durch, was Verhoeven in finanzielle Schwierigkeiten bringt und bestimmte Filme unter Zwang drehen läßt. « Das kalte Herz » ist sein einziger DEFA-Film, auch wenn das Werk später zum großen Erfolg wird. In der BRD dreht er vorwiegend Liebesfilme, Komödien und Volksstücke. Ab 1955 ist Verhoeven als Schauspieler und Regisseur für das Fernsehen tätig, insbesondere für Bühnenstücke und Dokumentarspiele. Daneben bleibt er dem Theater treu, wird zum Beispiel 1963 zum Schauspieldirektor der Münchner Kammerspiele und gründet ein eigenes Tournée-Theaterunternehmen. Politisch macht Paul Verhoeven 1969 für die SPD und Willy Brandt Werbung.

Deutscher Film- und Fernsehregisseur, Schauspieler und Theaterdirektor (1901-1975) . Der Begründer der Schauspielerdynastie Verhoeven war als Regisseur von 60 Kino- und Fernsehfilmen, als Theaterdirektor und als Schauspieler, Produzent und Drehbuchautor einer der produktivsten deutschen Filmkünstler. Er inszenierte mit dem Defa-Märchenfilm « Das kalte Herz » (1950, nach Wilhelm Hauff) , der zum Klassiker wurde, seinen schönsten Film (und einen der ersten Farbfilme) . In den NS-Jahren war er Regisseur von Unterhaltungsfilmern (« Der große Schatten ») , die einen Bogen um Politik machten, in den 50er-Jahren inszenierte er Komödien und Dramen mit moralischem Anspruch (« Der Jugendrichter ») . Der Fernsehregisseur Verhoeven ist der Vater von Doku-Dramen, damals Dokumentarspiele genannt (« Der Hitler-Ludendorff Prozeß » , 1971) . Verhoeven starb in München während seiner Rede bei der Trauerfeier für Schauspielerin Therese Giehse.

Paul Verhoeven wurde im westfälischen Unna geboren, wuchs mit dreizehn Geschwistern in einfachen Verhältnissen auf. Er debütierte in den 20er-Jahren am Münchner Schauspielhaus und kam über Wien, Frankfurt-am-Main und Dresden nach Berlin, wo er 1933-1944 Intendant des Theater am Schiffbauerdamm wurde. 1937 inszenierte er die Operette « Die Fledermaus » fürs Kino und wurde Regisseur von Musikfilmen (« Das kleine Hofkonzert » , « Philharmoniker ») , an Screwball Comedies angelehnte Lustspiele (« Der Tag nach der Scheidung » , « Herr Sanders lebt gefährlich ») , Western (« Gold in New Frisco ») und historische Bilderbögen (« Salonwagen E 417 ») . Für das im Theatermilieu angesiedelte Drama « Der große Schatten » (mit Heinrich George) , erhielt er 1942 den Biennale-Preis von Venedig.

Nach dem Krieg wurde Verhøeven 1946-1949 Intendant des Staatsschauspiels München und von 1963 bis zu seinem Tod Schauspieldirektor der Münchner Kammerspiele. Nach dem in der DDR entstandenen « Das kalte Herz », kreisten die Filme der Adenauer-Zeit mit Stars wie Luise Ullrich (« Ich weiß, wofür ich lebe », « Eine Frau von heute »), Heinz Rühmann (« Das kann jedem passieren »), Ruth Leuwerik (« Die goldene Brücke »), Curd Jürgens (« Tingeltangel ») um Schuld, Sühne, Ärzte, Richter und Kriegerwitwen (« Du bist nicht allein »). In seinem letzten Kinofilm, « Ihr schönster Tag » (1961), spielte Inge Meysel die Hauptrolle.

Ende der 50er-Jahre nutzte Verhøeven die Möglichkeiten des Fernsehens und inszenierte für BR und SWF anspruchsvolle Adaptionen moderner Literatur (« Die große Wut des Philip Hotz », Max Frisch), Klassiker wie « Nachtsyl » (Maxim Gorki) und Jaroslav Haseks Schelmenroman « Die Abenteuer des braven Soldaten Schwejk » (1958). In den 60er- und 70er-Jahren folgten Doku-Dramen (« Der Fall Jeanne d'Arc », « Der Panamaskandal », « L.D. Trotzki - Tod im Exil »). In diesen Jahren war Verhøeven Schauspieler in Kinofilmen von Sohn Michæl (« Paarungen »), spielte einen Kardinal in « Oh Jonathan ! » (mit Rühmann) und in Fernsehkrimis (zwei « Tatort »-Folgen um Zollfahnder Kressin; Durbridge-Krimi « Ein Mann namens Harry Brent », Krimi-Dreiteiler « Babeck », mit Jürgens und Senta Berger).

Aus Verhoevens Ehe mit Schauspielerin Doris Kiesow stammen die Töchter Lisa, Monika und Sohn Michæl, Regisseur (und andere « Mutters Courage »), aus der Liaison mit Schauspielerin Edith Schulze-Westrum Sohn Thomas S-W, Tierfilmer. Er ist Schwiegervater von Senta Berger, die 1966 Michæl heiratete, und Mario Adorf, und Großvater der Schauspieler Stella Maria Adorf, Luca und Simon Verhøeven (Regisseur von « Männerherzen »). Er ist auf dem Waldfriedhof München begraben.

Paul (Paulus Josef) Verhøeven wurde am 23. Juni 1901 als Sohn eines Fuhrunternehmers im nordrhein-westfälischen Unna geboren, wuchs mit seinen dreizehn Geschwistern in ärmlichen Verhältnissen auf; die Vorfahren stammten aus den Niederlanden und waren Bauern gewesen. Den ursprünglichen Berufswunsch, Architekt zu werden, gab Verhøeven nach kurzer Zeit auf, da er sich schon früh für alles interessiert hatte, was mit dem Theater zusammenhing. Er schlug die künstlerische Laufbahn ein, nahm Schauspielunterricht bei Karl Wüstenhagen (1893-1950) in Dortmund und profilierte sich schon bald als Charakterdarsteller, vornehmlich aber als Regisseur. Diesen Weg konnte er vor allem in Berlin fortsetzen, wo er innerhalb weniger Jahre zu den bedeutendsten Schauspielern und Regisseuren zählte.

Sein Leinwanddebüt hatte Verhøeven 1936 mit der kleinen Rolle des Barmixers Billy in Luis Trenkers frühem Western « Der Kaiser von Kalifornien » gegeben, ein Jahr später trat Verhøeven als Regisseur mit der Operetten-Adaption « Die Fledermaus » in Erscheinung. In der Folgezeit übernahm er Rollen in Filmen anderer Regisseure wie beispielsweise als « Juwelen-Max » in Arthur Maria Rabenalts Abenteuer « Die Drei Codonas » (1940) oder in Robert A. Stemmlers Krimikomödie « Herr Sanders lebt gefährlich » (1944), wo er die Titelrolle des Kriminalromanautors Paul Sanders mimte. In vielen Filmen, für die er hinter der Kamera stand, glänzte er auch als Schauspieler, wie etwa in « Salonwagen E 417 » (1939), « Der Große Schatten » (1942), « Die Nacht in Venedig » (1942) oder « Philharmoniker » (1944); zu etlichen Filmen schrieb er selbst das Drehbuch.

Nach Ende des 2. Weltkrieges arbeitete Paul Verhøeven in München für das Theater, anfangs als Intendant des « Bayerischen Schauspielhauses », später als Gastregisseur und Gastschauspieler an den « Kammerspielen ». Wegen der völligen Zerstörung des « Residenztheaters » 1944 richtete Paul Verhøeven im ebenfalls weitgehend zerstörten Ballsaal der Münchner Residenz eine vielgerühmte Spielstätte ein, das « Theater am Brunnenhof ». Während der Bauzeit des Brunnenhoftheaters inszenierte Paul Verhøeven als erste Aufführung seiner Intendanz im Prinzregenttheater Shakespeares « Sommernachtstraum » mit der bis Kriegsende verbotenen Musik des jüdischen Komponisten Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (und andere mit Rudolf Vogel, Käthe Braun, Elfie Beyer). Verhøeven eröffnete das « Theater am Brunnenhof » mit Lessings « Nathan der Weise », einem Stück, das im Dritten Reich verpönt war und nun den Neubeginn geistiger freier Auseinandersetzung markierte. Unter der Regie von Arnulf Schröder spielten und andere Eva Vaitl, Curd Jürgens und Hellmuth Renar.

Beispielhafte Inszenierungen waren das höchst aktuelle Nachkriegsstück « Wir sind noch einmal davongekommen » von Thornton Wilder, das eine aufregende Begegnung mit amerikanischer Bühnendramaturgie bedeutete, « Ein Traumspiel » von August Strindberg und als Arbeit des Regiegastes Jürgen Fehling « Maria Magdalena » von Friedrich Hebbel (mit Joana Maria Gorvin und Otto Wernicke). Nach schwerer Krankheit und Querelen mit dem Kultusminister Alois Hundhammer legte Paul Verhøeven 1948 die Intendanz nieder. Als das « Residenztheater » wieder hergestellt war, inszenierte Paul Verhøeven unter der Intendanz seines Nachfolgers Alois Johannes Lippl 1952 Shakespeares « Wintermärchen ». Noch ein letztes Mal war er an diesem Haus tätig - als Darsteller. Und wieder mit einem Stück von William Shakespeare. Unter der Regie von Fritz Kortner spielte Verhøeven 1955 den « Julius Cæsar ».

Auch für den Film blieb der « Theatermann » Verhøeven unverzichtbar und so trat er auch hier weiterhin mit prägnanten Figuren auf der Leinwand in Erscheinung und setzte erfolgreich seine Arbeit als Regisseur fort. Meist war er mit Rollen in « seinen » Filmen präsent, wie 1951 in « Heidelberger Romanze » als Detektiv Schulze neben Liselotte Pulver und O.W. Fischer, oder in « Roman einer Siebzehnjährigen » (1955). Mit Luise Ullrich drehte er « Vergiss die Liebe nicht » (1953), mit Karlheinz Böhm und Gert Fröbe « Hochzeit auf Reisen » (1953), mit Gerhard Riedmann und Waltraut Haas « Jede Nacht in einem anderen Bett » (1957) oder mit Heinz Rühmann « Der Jugendrichter » (1960), mit dem er auch seinen letzten Theatertriumph in der Neil-Simon-Komödie « Sonny Boys » feierte. Ein schöner Erfolg wurde auch der Film « Ihr schönster Tag » (1962), inszeniert mit Inge Meysel und Rudolf Platte nach Curth Flatows Bühnenstück « Das Fenster zum Flur », für seine Regiearbeiten « Die Schuld des Doktor Homma » (1951) und « Vergiss die Liebe nicht » (1953) wurden mit dem « Bundesfilmpreis in Gold » ausgezeichnet.

Ab den 1960ern arbeitete Verhøeven auch vermehrt für das Fernsehen, unter seiner Regie entstanden erfolgreiche Fernsehspiele wie « Der Fehltritt » (1960), « Bedaure, falsch verbunden » (1962), « Mamselle Nitouche » (1963), « Der Fall Jeanne D'Arc » (1966), « Der Fall Mata Hari » (1966) (hier spielte er den Oberst Goubet), « Gottes zweite Garnitur » (1967) oder « Der Panamaskandal » (1967); zu einer seiner letzten Regiearbeiten zählt 1971 das Fernsehspiel « Der Hitler-Ludendorff Prozeß ».

Als herausragender Schauspieler bleibt Verhøeven auf dem Bildschirm in nachhaltiger Erinnerung, meist verkörperte der Mann mit den markanten Gesichtszügen hintergründige Charaktere. So sah man ihn mit der Rolle des Porphyri in Franz Peter Wirths « Raskolnikoff » (1959), in John Oldens « An der schönen blauen Donau » (1965) spielte er im gleichen Jahr den Legationsrat von Guben, für die Interpretation der Titelrolle in Peter Beauvais' « Bernhard Lichtenberg » (1965) erhielt Verhoeven die « Goldene Kamera ». Erneut unter der Regie von Peter Beauvais agierte er 1968 als Samuel Fielding in dem Francis-Durbridge-Mehrteiler « Ein Mann namens Harry Brent » und als Körner in dem von Wolfgang Becker inszenierten dreiteiligen Krimi « Babeck » oder stand ein Jahr später als Theaterdirektor Hassenreuter in Beauvais' Hauptmann-Adaption « Die Ratten » zusammen mit Inge Meysel (Frau John) vor der Fernsehkamera. 1971-1972 zeigte er sich zudem in zwei « Tatort » -Produktionen, spielte in « Kressin und der tote Mann im Fleet » (1971) den Professor Petersen, in « Kressin und der Mann mit dem gelben Koffer » (1972) den Waffenhändler Nobiling. Im Kino konnte man Verhoeven zuletzt in Franz Peter Wirths Verwechslungsschwank « Oh Jonathan - oh Jonathan ! » (1973) als Monsignore Berghammer neben Protagonist Heinz Rühmann bewundern.

Verhoeven war seit Ende der 1950er Jahre lange Zeit Präsident der « Deutschen Film-Union », dem Dachverband der deutschen Filmschaffenden. In den 1960er Jahren zählte er zu den Dozenten der ersten Stunde am « Deutschen Institut für Film und Fernsehen » (DIFF), dem Vorläufer der « Münchner Filmhochschule ».

Der Künstler war seit 1930 mit der Theaterschauspielerin Doris Kiesow (1902-1973) verheiratet, die ihre eigene Karriere für die Kinder zurückgestellt hatte; aus der Verbindung stammen die Kinder Lis, Monika und Michæl; die 1931 geborene Lis Verhoeven ist ebenfalls eine renommierte Schauspielerin geworden, Sohn Doktor Michæl Verhoeven (geboren 1938), der seit 1966 mit der Schauspielerin Senta Berger verheiratet ist, gehört zu den bedeutenden deutschen Regisseuren beziehungsweise Filmproduzenten und stand in seinen frühen Jahren in verschiedenen Filmen ebenfalls als erfolgreicher Schauspieler vor der Kamera. Aus der Beziehung mit der Schauspielerin Edith Schultze-Westrum stammt der Sohn Thomas Schultze-Westrum, der Zoologe und Tierfilmer ist. Auch Paul Verhoevens Enkel Luca Verhoeven (geboren 1979) und Simon Verhoeven (geboren 1972) haben sich inzwischen einen Namen als Schauspieler beziehungsweise Regisseur gemacht und führen somit erfolgreich die Tradition der Verhoeven-Dynastie fort. Paul Verhoeven war überdies der Schwiegervater von Mario Adorf, der 1963 Tochter Lis Verhoeven geheiratet hatte, inzwischen jedoch von ihr geschieden ist. Die gemeinsame Tochter Stella Adorf ist ebenfalls Schauspielerin, unter anderem war sie in Michæl Verhoevens Film « Das schreckliche Mädchen » (1990) zu sehen.

Aus der Beziehung Paul Verhoevens der Schauspielerin Edith Schultze-Westrum (1904-1981) stammt der Sohn Thomas Schultze-Westrum, der Zoologe und Tierfilmer ist.

Ende Oktober 2003 strahlte der Bayerische Rundfunk die Dokumentation « Die Verhoevens » aus, in dem der Regisseur und Autor Felix Möller drei Generationen Theater, Film und Fernsehen beziehungsweise eine außergewöhnliche Familie porträtierte. « In sehr persönlichen Gesprächen, raren Archivaufnahmen und Ausschnitten aus 70 Jahren deutscher Filmgeschichte entsteht ein liebevolles Panorama », so « Der Spiegel »; der Film ist inzwischen auch auf DVD erhältlich.

Im Oktober 2005 erschien dann von Michæl Verhoeven unter dem Titel « Paul, ich und wir » ein ebenso persönliches wie unterhaltsames Buch, in dem der Autor ein schillerndes Bild seiner berühmten Familie bis hin zu seiner Frau Senta Berger und seinen Söhnen nachzeichnet. Fast ein ganzes Jahrhundert wird in der Familiengeschichte gespiegelt und macht mit den Menschen das lebendig und nacherlebbar, was geschah.

Le cinéma sous le 3e « Reich »

La période du cinéma sous le 3e « Reich » est l'histoire du cinéma allemand entre 1933 et 1945. Ce cinéma est marqué d'abord par une « aryanisation » radicale, c'est-à-dire l'éloignement des artistes juifs, ainsi que par l'étatisation progressive des structures artistiques et par des orientations politiques marquées. Il fait suite à la période plus diversifiée artistiquement parlant du cinéma sous la République de Weimar, que d'aucuns ont qualifiée d' « âge d'or du cinéma allemand ». Néanmoins, contrairement à une idée répandue, les films de propagande ne représentent qu'une infime partie des métrages réalisés sous le régime nazi. Josef Goebbels, ministre de la Propagande et de l'Éducation du peuple, qui a sous sa tutelle l'industrie cinématographique allemande, la mène certes d'une main de fer, notamment en imposant ses choix dans divers scénarios ou pour un acteur ou une actrice en particulier. Mais il a compris, dès 1933, que le public se désintéresse des films marqués idéologiquement. Ainsi, les films réalisés sous le 3e « Reich » ne seront pas des odes au régime, mais la plupart du temps des divertissements ou des films historiques, parfois et discrètement marqués d'anglophobie et d'antisémitisme. Par ailleurs, la mise au pas du cinéma allemand a affaibli son potentiel de modernité « internationale ». Si l'histoire du cinéma n'a pas vraiment retenu les noms des réalisateurs des films tournés sous Goebbels en dehors de Leni Riefenstahl, ceux de Friedrich Wilhelm Murnau, Fritz Lang ou Georg Wilhelm Pabst restent aujourd'hui encore auréolés de prestige.

Les thèmes traités dans les films changent au gré de la situation géopolitique de l'Allemagne. Ainsi, « Le Juif Süß », réalisé par Veit Harlan en 1940 obtient un grand succès et est considéré comme emblématique de l'incursion nazie et antisémite dans le cinéma allemand. Réalisé en 1944, « Kolberg », en s'inspirant d'un événement historique des guerres napoléoniennes, vise à redonner espoir et combativité au peuple alors que la Seconde Guerre mondiale est quasiment perdue pour l'Allemagne. Entre 1933 et 1945, le cinéma allemand est le 2e cinéma du monde quant au nombre de films produits, qui sont diffusés progressivement dans toute l'Europe occupée. Il bénéficie de nombreuses avancées technologiques et artistiques, notamment par le travail de cadrage et d'ambiance de Leni Riefenstahl (usage du « travelling », de caméras sur rails et de caméras sous-marines) ou l'invention du cinéma en couleur avec Agfacolor, dont le film « Les femmes sont les meilleurs diplomates » est le 1er à utiliser la technique.

En 1933, dès l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis, le style de la production change rapidement. Plus d'un millier de personnes travaillant dans les métiers du cinéma choisissent l'émigration ou y sont contraintes. Le cinéma allemand, qui a tenu tête à l'industrie hollywoodienne jusqu'à l'avènement du cinéma parlant, se voit privé de grandes personnalités parties à l'étranger, dont les réalisateurs Fritz Lang, Robert Wiene, Henrik Galeen ou, plus tard, Detlef Sierck (le futur Douglas Sirk), le chef opérateur Eugen Schüfftan et les acteurs Fritz Kortner, Peter Lorre, Conrad Veidt ou, plus tard, les actrices Brigitte Helm et Elisabeth Bergner. En raison de la politique d' « aryanisation » du cinéma menée par le régime nazi, les Juifs ne peuvent plus exercer leur métier en Allemagne. La loi du 6 juin 1933 interdit aux Allemands qui ne sont pas de « pure souche », de travailler dans le cinéma et des valeurs montantes du cinéma allemand, comme Kurt Bernhardt, Robert Siodmak ou Max Ophüls, sont ainsi contraintes à l'exil. Certains artistes n'ayant pu fuir seront, comme Kurt Gerron, tués dans les camps de concentration.

Passionné de cinéma, Adolf Hitler regardait régulièrement des films (parfois, 3 dans la même soirée), imposait à ses invités après un dîner officiel le visionnage d'un film et pouvait même annuler des réunions pour cela. Il a vu au moins une vingtaine de fois le « Siegfried » de Fritz Lang, qu'il avait même envisagé de nommer à la direction de l'industrie cinématographique allemande, malgré ses origines partiellement juives. Bien que ces films étaient boycottés officiellement par l'Allemagne nazie à partir de 1935, il se plaisait à regarder des dessins animés américains comme « Blanche-Neige et les 7 Nains » ou des « Mickey Mouse » .

Josef Goebbels s'intéresse très tôt au potentiel du cinéma comme instrument de propagande. Adolf Hitler et lui-même sont par ailleurs des cinéphiles. Il propose à Fritz Lang, dont il admire certains films (« Les Nibelungen » , « Metropolis ») un poste dans la « Internationale Filmkammer » , ou IFK (Camera internazionale del film - Bureau international du cinéma) . Fritz Lang (dont la mère était d'origine juive) refuse et s'exile en France avant de rejoindre les États-Unis. Goebbels peut néanmoins compter sur la collaboration de quelques pionniers du cinéma allemand comme Carl Fröhlich, Carl Hoffmann, Peter Ostermayr, Paul Wegener ou Walter Ruttmann, mais aussi de techniciens importants de la période expressionniste comme Fritz Arno Wagner, Günther Rittau, Otto Hunte, Walter Röhrig ou Hermann Warm. De grands acteurs de l'époque du cinéma muet et des débuts du parlant, par conviction ou par opportunisme, travaillent aussi pour une industrie cinématographique allemande désormais contrôlée par le pouvoir nazi : Alfred Abel, Lil Dagover, Gustav Fröhlich, Gustaf Gründgens, Emil Jannings, Rudolf Klein-Rogge ou Werner Krauß. Certaines personnalités du cinéma allemand qui professaient des idées de gauche sous la République de Weimar se rallient au régime nazi comme les réalisateurs Werner Hochbaum et Phil Jutzi ou s'en accommodent à l'image de l'acteur Heinrich George ou du réalisateur Georg Wilhelm Pabst, après son retour en Allemagne en 1939.

La loi nationale-socialiste sur le cinéma est votée le 16 février 1934. Tous les scénarios sont contrôlés par un « Reichsfilm dramaturg » (censeur cinématographique du « Reich ») afin de vérifier leur conformité avec la doctrine nazie. Une fois le film terminé, il est soumis à un comité de censure issu du ministère de la Propagande. Cette procédure de contrôle s'applique également aux films étrangers et, à partir de l'ordonnance du 3 juillet 1935, pour les films réalisés avant 1933 (ceux-ci doivent être examinés jusqu'au 30 décembre 1935, courant le risque de perdre leur visa d'exploitation) . Les films censurés ne rentrent officiellement pas dans le cadre des 3 mentions (« Prädikat ») décernées par le ministère :

Groupe I : film d'intérêt national.

Groupe II : film reconnu.

Groupe III : film recommandé aux jeunes.

Aussi, les films contraires à la volonté du gouvernement, adaptés d'ouvrages d'auteurs placés sur une liste noire (« Z-Liste ») , ou bien réalisés et interprétés par des Juifs ou des acteurs ayant quitté l'Allemagne (à l'instar de Marlene Dietrich) sont interdits. Néanmoins, cette politique s'ancre dans une tradition plus ancienne : en 1929, une forme de censure existait déjà si les films ne rentraient pas dans les « Prädikat » suivants : « artistique » , « propre à la formation du peuple » ou « instructif » .

La Chambre de la culture du « Reich », ainsi que sa sub-division de la Chambre du film du « Reich » (« Reichsfilmkammer », la Ire chambre créée, dès 1933) est chargée de promouvoir l'art allemand selon les idéaux prônés par le NSDAP. En 1937, le président de cette Chambre est Oswald Lehnien.

Pendant la Guerre, la production cinématographique se partage entre des films de propagande comme « Le Juif Süß » (« Jud Süß ») de Veit Harlan (1940), des films de divertissement comme « Ce diable de garçon » (« Die Feuerzangenbowle ») de Helmut Weiß (1944) et des films à caractère historique se situant entre le divertissement et la propagande comme ceux consacrés à Frédéric le Grand (avec régulièrement Otto Gebühr dans le rôle principal). C'est au plus fort de la Guerre que les plus grosses productions allemandes sont tournées à l'exemple de « La Ville dorée » (1942) ou de « Kolberg » (1944) de Veit Harlan, ou encore le film en couleur « Les Aventures fantastiques du baron Münchhausen » de Josef von Báky. Les grandes fresques historiques ou les films de pure propagande comme « Le Juif éternel » (« Der ewige Jude », 1940) ou « Retour au foyer » (« Heimkehr », 1941) laissent parfois la place à des histoires d'amour, réalisées pour la Ire fois en couleur grâce à la technique allemande de l'Agfacolor (« Frauen sind doch bessere Diplomaten » de Georg Jacoby, 1941), ce qui permet au public d'échapper à la tristesse du quotidien et d'oublier l'horreur des bombardements.

Gœbbels déclare ainsi :

« La bonne humeur a son importance dans la bonne marche de la Guerre. »

Entre 1943 et 1944, au plus fort des bombardements alliés, le nombre de spectateurs dépasse pour la Ire fois le milliard, ce qui fait du cinéma allemand le 2e au monde, après le cinéma américain. Les plus grands succès du cinéma allemand pendant la Guerre appartiennent au genre de la romance :

« Die große Liebe de Rolf Hansen » (1942) : 8 millions de « Reichsmark » .

« Wunschkonzert » de Eduard von Borsody (1940) : 7,6 millions de « Reichsmark » .

« Wiener Blut » de Willi Forst (1942) : 7 millions de « Reichsmark » .

Nathalie de Voghelær déclare en ce sens :

« Jusque dans les dernières années de la Guerre, la “ Ufa ” continue de produire des films respirant la joie de vivre et l'ambiance de villégiature promptes à faire oublier les tristes réalités de la vie et à susciter le réveil du moral des Allemands. Cette orientation répond pleinement aux exigences de Gœbbels de participer à la “ Guerre totale ” et de croire à la victoire coûte que coûte. Cependant, les productions s'épuisent et, entre 1944 et 1945, de nombreux films restent inachevés avant l'effondrement du National-Socialisme. »

Pendant la Guerre, les acteurs, réalisateurs et le personnel technique sont exemptés du service militaire : ils sont classés « UK » . Néanmoins, leurs conditions vont de mal en pis : Fritz Schuch, qui réalise « Une journée fabuleuse » (« Ein toller Tag ») aux studios de Neubabelsberg déclare à propos de cette période :

« Presque chaque jour, il y avait des attaques aériennes. Le plus souvent, nous ne pouvions donc travailler qu'une ou 2 heures, le matin, avant que la sirène ne se mit à hurler. »

Un rapport de la « Ufa » établi en septembre 1944 que 87 des 249 salles de cinéma du « Deutsche Film Theater GmbH » sont détruites ou inutilisables et qu'une grande partie des autres doivent changer d'emplacement. Malgré l'antagonisme l'opposant à Hermann Göring, grand mécène de théâtre, Josef Goebbels met en place le difficile plan de reconversion de 270 théâtres et salles de spectacle en cinémas. Le public n'est néanmoins pas au rendez-vous, ne serait-ce que du fait de la place prise par la Guerre dans la vie quotidienne.

Le régime nazi développe, à l'instar du régime soviétique, un cinéma de propagande en y consacrant de grands moyens. Ce cinéma est vite dominé par la figure de Leni Riefenstahl. Dès 1934, elle filme le congrès de Nuremberg dans « Le Triomphe de la volonté » (« Triumph des Willens ») . Par la suite, elle magnifie les Jeux olympiques de 1936 à Berlin dans « Les Dieux du stade » (« Olympia ») , inventant par là même de nouvelles techniques de cadrage et de montage qui influenceront de nombreux réalisateurs par la suite. D'autres cinéastes allemands de l'époque s'exercent avec un certain talent au cinéma de propagande comme Hans Steinhoff, le réalisateur du célèbre « Jeune Hitlérien Quex » (« Hitlerjunge Quex » , 1933) , Veit Harlan, Karl Ritter ou Hans Bertram.

En dehors de quelques films phares, la production des films de propagande ne rencontre guère de succès auprès des spectateurs. Cherchant à distiller le message nazi dans des films grand public, le régime favorise la réalisation de films à caractère historique tels que « La Jeune fille Jeanne » (« Das Mädchen Johanna ») de Gustav Ucicky (1935) , qui donne à voir sous les traits d'une Jeanne d'Arc guidant un peuple désespéré une allégorie d'Hitler. De grandes figures de la culture ou de la science allemande sont célébrées à des fins de propagande comme dans « La Lutte héroïque » (« Robert Koch, der Bekämpfer des Todes ») de Hans Steinhoff (1939) . Le cinéma de propagande, notamment par le biais de documentaires, va jusqu'à instiller des contre-vérités historiques : par exemple, dans « Vestiges du passé allemand » (« Zeugen deutscher Vorzeit » , 1941) , on présente de réelles fouilles archéologiques comme la découverte de vestiges et de dessins proche de la svastika, « preuves tangibles du caractère ancestral de la civilisation germanique » . Des documentaires contribuent aussi à cette propagande, comme « L'élite SS Adolf Hitler en action » (« Leibstandarte SS Adolf Hitler im Einsatz » , 1941) qui présente l'avancée d'une troupe d'élite de Berlin à Athènes, ou « Sterilisation beim Manne durch Vasorektion » (1936) , qui présente « les opérations chirurgicales de stérilisation chez l'homme par vasectomie. Filmées dans un hôpital ultra-moderne, ces scènes visent à démontrer la rapidité de cette intervention, réalisée sous anesthésie locale, en seulement 5 à 10 minutes » .

En 1933, parmi les 3 premiers films « commandés » par le nouveau régime, on relève « SA-Mann Brand » , « Hans Westmar » et « Le Jeune Hitlérien Quex » . Si ce dernier film obtient un vrai succès populaire, et une empathie du public à propos de la mort du héros, l'adhésion du public à de tels métrages politiques est un échec. Par exemple, le film « SA-Mann Brandt » , s'il bénéficie d'un avis officiel élogieux (un communiqué officiel fait part d'un film « particulièrement recommandé pour sa valeur artistique »), des officiels reconnaissent officiellement qu'il s'agit d'un « navet de circonstance ». Goebbels, fasciné par le cinéma soviétique qu'il trouve néanmoins trop « moral », va s'en inspirer pour éviter dès lors les films de propagande explicites, mais plutôt la production de « films à grand budgets à l'esthétique recherchée et soignée ». On s'oriente dès lors vers des divertissements : comédies musicales, films « téléphones blancs », « Heimatfilm » ou films sur le passé prussien. Ainsi, sur les 1,350 longs-métrages produits entre 1933 et 1945, on compte 1,200 divertissements.

Concernant les documentaires produits par le régime, Christian Delage écrit en substance que « l'uniformisation est de mise. Ceci nécessite une organisation et une planification du management, afin d'engendrer des standards de production, tout en trouvant des nouveautés, en suscitant la surprise pour présenter un documentaire qui serait à la fois déjà connu tout en n'ayant jamais existé. »

Nathalie de Voghelær note :

En 1937, Josef Goebbels prononce un discours au 1er congrès annuel de la Chambre nationale du film : il édicte plusieurs directives, notamment sur les scénarios qui doivent toucher le public, opter pour une langue compréhensible de tous et, lorsqu'on adapte un livre, être dans un style « purement cinématographique ».

Comme le montre Siegfried Kracauer dans « De Caligari à Hitler », la rupture entre le cinéma sous la République de Weimar et le 3e « Reich » n'est pas totale ; même, certaines thématiques trouvent des résonances dans les 2 périodes. Parmi les films précédant le 3e « Reich », on remarque la présence de certains thèmes dont le futur régime se portera garant : le nationalisme (« Die letzte Kompanie » - « La dernière compagnie », 1930), la jeunesse (« Ein Burschenlied aus Heidelberg » - « Un champ de compagnon pour le salut », 1930) l'antisémitisme (« Liebling des Götter » - « Favori de Dieu », 1930), la mise en exergue d'un héros de l'histoire allemande (« Das Flötenkonzert von Sans-Souci » - « Le Concert de flûte de Sans-Souci », 1930), le Heimat-Film (« Der Rebell » - « L'Héroïque embuscade », 1932), et enfin, la notion de sacrifice (« Morgenrot » - « L'Aube », 1933).

Nathalie de Voghelær note 3 idées importantes dans le processus :

Le « renforcement de la cohésion nationale », le « respect de la tradition » et l'« extermination des sous-hommes », en précisant néanmoins que ces lignes évoluent au gré de la situation géopolitique internationale.

Également, elle relève 3 thématiques récurrentes dans l'art populaire prôné par le régime :

La « mythologie et la Grèce antique », le « néo-Classicisme » (notamment l'histoire de la Bavière et de l'Allemagne) ainsi que l' « idéologie nazie » (fusionnant la politique et l'art) .

Et des discours politiques en cohérence avec la politique du régime :

L'antibolchévisme et l'antisémitisme.

3 autres thèmes sont également récurrents dans les films documentaires :

« La cosmogonie qui inscrit le racisme et l'antisémitisme dans une exaltation de la nature originelle et du foyer germanique. »

« La recherche de la légitimité et d'une cohésion nationale dans l'instauration du 3e " Reich " » .

Nathalie de Voghelær note, également, selon les théories nazies exposées dans la presse de l'époque, que le cinéma « est défini comme un instrument destiné à populariser, chez les spectateurs de cinéma, les grands thèmes du nouveau régime en mettant en avant la spécificité allemande, le nationalisme, l'armée. Certains producteurs se conforment à cette idéologie nazie et la suivent dans les œuvres qu'ils promotionnent. Ce positionnement peut se comprendre car il est en relation directe avec le contexte de l'époque : la défaite subie lors de la Première Guerre mondiale et l'humiliation du Traité de Versailles. De plus, les pouvoirs économiques et culturels connaissent une très forte hausse. Les protagonistes qui adhèrent à ces nouvelles idées ont, dès lors, l'impression de participer à une certaine reconstruction de l'Allemagne, tout en favorisant l'avènement d'une société nouvelle. »

Les Iers films du régime sont en fait des documentaires (« Kulturfilm ») , réalisés dès 1932 par le NSDAP à sa propre gloire. Ces métrages sont néanmoins d'une qualité relative, le Parti n'ayant ni le temps, ni l'argent nécessaires pour créer « ex nihilo » une force cinématographique. Sa stratégie va donc être de mettre sous tutelle l'industrie du cinéma, florissante sous la République de Weimar, afin de profiter de son expérience et de son aura, puis de la concentrer en monopole. Le régime relance dès lors l'industrie cinématographique, moins productrice depuis la fin des années 1920. En 1935-1936, les studios sont alors utilisés à 95 % , le nombre de courts-métrages double et on compte 20 % de plus de longs-métrages ; les spectateurs suivent, puisque leur nombre est multiplié par 422. En outre, l'Allemagne est alors le plus gros producteur de films au niveau européen (80 films par an) et le 2e au niveau mondial derrière les États-Unis. Ces succès sont liés notamment à des innovations, comme les nouvelles pellicules ou la mise au point de nouveaux cadrages. Certes, pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, certains artistes doivent s'engager, mais, en 1943, pas moins de 83 longs-métrages sont produits.

Pour ce qui préfigurer le « Programme Aktion T4 » (la loi du 14 août 1934 autorise déjà leur stérilisation) , des films insistent sur la nécessité de l'euthanasie des handicapés : « L'Héritage » (« Das Erbe » , 1935) use de métaphores animales (chien contre hérisson ; chat contre perdrix) pour « illustrer la lutte permanente opposant les différents animaux entre eux et la sélection naturelle qui s'opère selon la loi du plus fort » . En 1934-1935, 2 films muets sont réalisés : « Toute la vie est lutte » (« Alles Leben ist Kampf ») et « Maladie héréditaire » (« Erbkrank ») ; le 1er use encore de la métaphore animale en montrant qu'une espèce différente intégrée dans un nouveau milieu est inutile, et expose de façon détournée des raisons « politique, financière et sociale » pour faire passer le lourd message de la nécessité de l'euthanasie ; le second énumère des reproches faits à ces handicapés (viol, alcoolisme, pyromanie) , leur coût supposé (1,2 milliards de « Reichsmark » , contre 713 millions à l'administration du « Reich ») et place « bien en évidence, dans le même cadre filmique, des êtres dont certains sont condamnés à rester dans un état quasi-végétatif et des infirmières dont la jeunesse et l'entrain semblent gâchés par une telle proximité » . La loi sur l'euthanasie sera autorisée en 1939.

Des films antisémites sont également réalisés. Néanmoins, comme le note Nathalie de Voghelær, « à l'instar des idées prônées par le Parti, il est importants, dans les documentaires, que la haine des Juifs n'apparaisse pas comme résultant d'une volonté pré-établie par les autorités nazies mais comme émanant de la réalité même des mœurs et du comportement de ceux qui constituent l'anti-race » . Le documentaire « Le Juif éternel » , réalisé par Fritz Hippler, se propose par exemple d'exposer de façon didactiques les « tares » des Juifs : physiques (« spécifiques aux hommes et aux femmes juives ») , sociétal (« on dénonce leur mode de vie dans les ghettos comme étant une réalité tout en insistant sur la barbarie de leurs coutumes religieuses ») et sociales (« on compare les Juifs à des parasites et plus précisément à des rats ») .

Un commentaire présent dans le film dit ainsi :

Néanmoins, le film va parfois à contre-courant puisque certaines scènes, comme « cette image d'une petite fille qui sourit timidement et qui est pleine d'émotion et de beauté » , émeuvent le public. Dans le documentaire « Theresienstadt » (« Der Führer schenkt den Juden eine Stadt » - « Le Führer offre une ville aux Juifs » , 1944-1945) , le régime va jusqu'à présenter le camp de concentration de Theresienstadt en Autriche comme un « camp modèle » , montrant les détenus faisant des activités ludiques et intellectuelles. Le réalisateur juif Kurt Gerron, alors emprisonné dans le camp où il tient un cabaret pour distraire les autres détenus, est forcé de le réaliser. Après la réalisation de ce film, Gerron est déporté dans le dernier convoi pour Auschwitz, où il est ensuite gazé dès son arrivée, avec son équipe technique.

Il convient de noter que la Chambre du film du « Reich » ne favorise que rarement les films politiques, et donc antisémites, ce qui explique leur petit nombre. Le 1er film de fiction antisémite est « Les Rothschilds » (1940) , d'Erich Waschneck, qui retrace l'ascension de la famille Rothschild après son enrichissement lors des guerres napoléoniennes et veut, par là, prouver que les Juifs sont les seuls responsables de la Guerre. « Le Juif Süß » , réalisé la même année, constitue l'une des rares incursions du cinéma nazi dans un vrai discours de propagande raciale ; le caractère antisémite et la volonté délibérée du réalisateur ont été longuement débattus, Veit Harlan se défendant en avançant que « tout refus d'obéir l'aurait entraîné devant un peloton d'exécution » .

Des films anglophobes sont également réalisés, comme « Le Président Krüger » de Hans Steinhoff : ce dernier long-métrage présente des massacres commis par les Britanniques durant la Guerre des Boers, l'établissement de camps de concentration et les discours « gâteux et hypocrites » de la reine Victoria. La critique n'est évidemment pas gratuite, et le parallèle historique est aisément devinable à la fin du film, lorsque le président boer Paul Kruger déclare :

« Voilà comment l'Angleterre a soumis notre petit peuple par les moyens les plus cruels. Pourtant, le jour de la revanche finira par arriver. Je ne sais pas quand, mais tant de sang ne peut avoir coulé en vain, tant de larmes ne seront pas versées pour rien. Nous n'étions qu'un petit peuple faible. Des peuples grands et puissants se lèveront contre la tyrannie britannique. Ils écraseront l'Angleterre. Dieu sera avec eux. Alors la route sera ouverte vers un monde meilleur. »

Parmi les autres films anti-britanniques, on peut citer « Carl Peters » , qui prend comme cadre le monde colonial d'avant la Première Guerre mondiale, ou bien « Ma vie pour l'Irlande » et « Le Renard de Glenarvon » , lesquels se basent sur la guerre d'indépendance irlandaise et ses prémices, afin de dépeindre les Britanniques comme des oppresseurs. Dans « Titanic » , le scénario prend des distances avec la réalité historique en affirmant que c'est l'avarice des Britanniques qui a causé le naufrage du célèbre paquebot.

Devant l'enlisement du conflit mondial, Josef Gæbbels infléchit dès 1941 sa politique cinématographique :

« Son objectif est à présent de dissiper dans l'esprit du peuple allemand l'idée d'une victoire proche et facile pour, au contraire, réveiller le civisme allemand en vue d'une " Guerre totale " . »

C'est par exemple pour cela que s'amoncellent les « Fredericus-Filme » , films biographiques des Rois de Prusse Frédéric-Guillaume Ier, Frédéric-Guillaume II, Frédéric-Guillaume III et Frédéric II, ce dernier étant le plus représenté, notamment par l'acteur Otto Gebühr, alors très populaire en Allemagne. Le choix de cette période est clivant, puisqu'elle est assez lointaine pour prendre des libertés sur les scénarios tout en conservant le prestige de ces monarques dans l'imaginaire collectif allemand ; d'autre part, ils sont vus comme des référents par Adolf Hitler, proposent une gamme de caractères adaptables à plusieurs postures idéologiques et enfin rejoignent l'ambition d'agrandir l'Allemagne (à l'époque la Prusse) .

Ces films concentrent plusieurs thèmes récurrents : le monarque qui agit tel un guide, une « figure bienveillante mais inflexible » , des Autrichiens insouciantes et efféminés, des Français courtisans et intrigants et une Prusse frugale, contrastant avec l'opulence insolente de ses ennemis. Parmi ces films, on peut citer « Les 2 Rois » (1935) de Hans Steinhoff sur un scénario de Thea von Harbou (ce film insistant sur le message de l'obéissance paternelle) ou « Le Grand Roi » (1942) de Veit Harlan. Dans ce second film, on peut relever des répliques laissant penser à une attitude à avoir par rapport à l'actualité de la Guerre : « douter de la victoire, c'est de la haute trahison » ou « il fuit devant le combat, il fuit devant la vie » ; pourtant, les directives des autorités compétentes vont contre cela ; elle déclarent :

De grands moyens sont mis à disposition pour le film, comme « l'aide de soldats et de la police de Berlin » et la réquisition de 5,000 chevaux. Néanmoins, c'est le film « Kolberg » qui fait prendre conscience du gigantisme des super-productions de l'époque : 8 millions et demi de « Reichsmark » sont dépensées et 180,000 soldats sont réquisitionnés pour certaines scènes.

Veit Harlan, le réalisateur, note même :

Le film, apologie du sacrifice, s'achève sur cette phrase : « Le meilleur naît toujours de la douleur. » Il sera parachuté aux soldats défendant la forteresse de La Rochelle « pour inciter ce bastion allemand à résister en attendant l'arrivée des renforts » .

Le cinéma de la période véhicule peu de figures féminines de 1er plan. Dans le film « Le Juif Süß » , la mort de Dorothée l'érige en martyre. On relève un certain nombre de documentaires instructifs réalisés pour les BDM. En effet, les jeunes (les filles mais surtout les garçons) , représentant l'espoir du régime, et une masse influençable par l'éducation et l'embrigadement, n'est pas négligée. On veut, en effet, les détacher du corps familial, pour lui substituer l'autorité des Jeunesses hitlériennes et, de fait, du « Führer » . On oppose ces 2 conceptions, en vantant par là même un univers champêtre mythifié : le film « Le Chemin vers nous » (« Der Weg zu uns » , 1939) qui met en face une ville industrielle fournie d'usines avec un camp de jeunesse organisé dans la nature ; aussi, le film « Rivage hostile » (« Feindliche Ufer » , 1938) raconte la confrontation entre des salariés d'usine et des salariés agricoles. On évite aussi de montrer des rôles d'universitaires à l'écran (susceptibles de développer un esprit critique chez les étudiants) et on propose, sous la forme de jeux, la préparation au combat par exemple dans les films « Soldats de demain » (« Soldaten von Morgen » , 1941) , « Les cadets apprennent à voler » (« Pimpfe lernen fliegen » , 1941) .

Cette opposition se poursuit dans les films destinés aux adultes, le monde agricole étant mis en avant, en dépit de la réalité industrielle de l'Allemagne. Des films traitent bien de la vie des ouvriers, mais c'est davantage pour insister sur l'idée de cohésion et d'uniformité (comme dans les chantiers de « Ils sont quatre cents à construire un pont » - « Vierhundert bauen eine Brücke » , 1937) : par exemple, « L'Allemagne au travail » rend compte de la dilution de l'individualité de ceux qui travaillent en usine, mais idéalise en même temps les soirées de l'ouvrier, le montrant en train de s'occuper du jardin et du potager de sa maison ; le documentaire « Vie quotidienne entre les tours des mines de charbon » (« Alltag zwischen Zechentürmen » , 1938) reprend le même principe, mais pour un mineur. Aussi, « Ouvriers allemands en vacances » (1936) , permet d'entrevoir pour cette classe sociale des perspectives inimaginables sous la République de Weimar, le documentaire présentant les congés d'une famille au Portugal et à Madère (choix de destination qui permettent aussi d'insister, en comparaison, sur le développement économique allemand) .

Les affaires courantes liées au cinéma allemand sous le 3e « Reich » dépendent du ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande, dirigé par Josef Goebbels. Le réalisateur Veit Harlan, dans son livre « Le cinéma allemand selon Goebbels » (1974) décrit de façon détaillée ses différents entretiens avec Goebbels, et la manière dont se préparait la réalisation d'un film (« du synopsis à l'exploitation ») : le réalisateur envoie ses projets de scénario au ministre, qui donne son aval sur le thème, la distribution et les scènes tournées, étant ainsi parfois à l'origine de profonds remaniements et révisions. Une fois le film tourné, il est projeté au ministre dans la salle de projection du ministère : souvent, Josef Goebbels procède à de nouveaux remaniements (retrait d'une scène, demande de changement de fin, etc.) .

Veit Harlan note ainsi :

« Je devais apporter sans cesse des modifications et celles-ci furent à leur tour modifiées. Par endroits, on pouvait voir, dans le scénario, le redoutable “ crayon vert ministériel ” dont se servait Goebbels. Il fallait insérer des passages entiers écrits par Goebbels lui-même. Le “ crayon vert ” avait force de loi. »

Le président de la Chambre du film, Oswald Lehnien, déclare en 1937 que le cinéma est « une synthèse d'éléments artistiques, politiques et économiques » et doit être un « facteur de civilisation obéissant à l'idéologie du régime » .

En 1941, Fritz Hippler, qui dirige le département cinématographique au ministère de la Propagande, déclare :

« Comparé aux autres arts, le cinéma par sa faculté d'agir directement sur le sens poétique et l'affectivité (et donc, sur tout ce qui n'est pas intellectuel) a, dans le domaine de la psychologie des masses et de la propagande, un effet pénétrant et durable. »

Néanmoins, Veit Harlan considère que l'intérêt du ministre pour le cinéma, sans doute esthétiquement véritable, n'enlève en rien au « mépris sans limite » qu'il nourrissait pour la corporation :

« En bon ministre de la Propagande, il exploitait la popularité des acteurs et des cinéastes et s'en servait cyniquement pour ses propres fins. »

Goebbels le disait lui-même :

« On ne se place pas soi-même, on y est placé. »

Il lui déclare par exemple :

« Vous, les acteurs, vous nous devez tout. C'est nous, les Nationaux-Socialistes qui avons fait de votre métier une profession respectable. Nous vous faisons gagner davantage que nos plus grands hommes de science. »

La critique cinématographique est censurée sous le 3e « Reich » . Il convient pourtant de reconnaître qu'elle était très peu développée sous la République de Weimar. En 1933, on les remplace par des « compte-rendus » et, par la loi du 22 septembre 1933 (qui s'applique pour tous les journalistes) , les critiques sont placés par la Chambre de la Culture du « Reich » (« Reichskulturkammer ») sous le contrôle du ministère de la Propagande (à partir du 4 octobre, cette loi vaut aussi pour les rédacteurs-en-chef) . Néanmoins, des journaux comme le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » ou le « Deutsche Zukunft » faisant preuve de trop de libertés voient, par une ordonnance du 26 novembre 1936, les critiques d'arts remplacés par des « chroniqueurs artistiques » , les plaçant donc sous une tutelle totale du ministère. Dès lors, les critiques s'apparentent davantage à des panégyriques des films étudiés ou bien à de simples synopsis.

Il a toujours existé dans le cinéma allemand ce que les Américains appellent des « stars » , mais jamais de « star-system » comparable à ce qui se passait à Hollywood. De nombreux dirigeants nazis ont ainsi dénoncé ce mode de fonctionnement, qu'ils assimilaient à une invention juive. Néanmoins, afin d'affirmer la puissance du cinéma allemand, Josef Goebbels a œuvré en faveur d'un tel système, notamment après le départ vers les États-Unis de personnalités comme Marlene Dietrich.

Le meilleur exemple de ce nouveau système est le recrutement, en 1937, de l'actrice suédoise Zarah Leander par la « Ufa » , qui devient en quelques années une des vedettes les plus importantes et les mieux payées du cinéma allemand. Les campagnes de presse en sa faveur sont alors lancées par le bureau de presse de la « Ufa » , cachant volontairement son passé d'actrice déjà célèbre en Suède pour se concentrer sur sa carrière de chanteuse. Ce bureau de presse va même jusqu'à donner des instructions détaillées aux journaux, sur la façon de la présenter et à Zarah Leander elle-même lors de ses apparitions publiques. Cette « starisation » est alors inédite en Allemagne. De hauts-dignitaires du régime, comme Adolf Hitler, Josef Goebbels ou Hermann Göring, apparaissent parfois en publics accompagnés d'acteurs ou d'actrices alors très populaires, notamment afin de donner une coloration « glamour » aux manifestations du NSDAP, la plupart du temps dominées par des hommes. Hitler apprécie ainsi particulièrement les dîners mondains avec les actrices Olga Tchekhova et Lil Dagover. En 1935, Göring épouse même une actrice, Emmy Sonnemann. Les relations de Goebbels avec plusieurs « stars » féminines de cinéma sont également connues ; une scène du film « Le Voyage à Tilsit » faisant référence de manière trop explicite de la relation de son mari avec l'actrice Lida Baarova, conduit Magda Goebbels à demander à Hitler qu'elle soit renvoyée dans son pays natal, la Tchécoslovaquie.

Le proximité personnelle des dirigeants politiques est devenue pour les acteurs un facteur déterminant pour la réussite professionnelle des acteurs de cinéma (les circonstances floues de la mort de l'actrice Renate Müller, peut-être assassinée par la « Gestapo » pour son refus de tourner dans des films nazis en est un contre-exemple) . Un système informel de listes a décidé à quelle fréquence un acteur pourrait tourner : des « stars » comme Zarah Leander, Lil

Dagover ou Heinz Rühmann en bénéficient par exemple. Ces vedettes, qui bénéficient de la renommée offerte par le régime se voient aussi offrir, dès 1938, des avantages fiscaux décidés par Hitler en personne : ils peuvent déduire 40 % de leurs revenus comme frais professionnels. Parmi les personnalités marquantes de cette période, on relève les réalisateurs Leni Riefenstahl, Eduard von Borsody, Willi Forst, Carl Frölich, Rolf Hansen, Veit Harlan et Georg Jacoby. Les artistes les plus en vues sont Zarah Leander, Kristina Söderbaum, Lida Baarová, Lil Dagover, Margot Hielscher, Marianne Hoppe, Brigitte Horney, Maria Landrock, Frida Richard et Annie Rosar. Quant aux acteurs, Horst Caspar, Otto Gebühr, Heinrich George, Joachim Gottschalk, Gustav Knuth, Ferdinand Marian, Hans Albers et Jakob Tiedtke partagent souvent les têtes d'affiches. D'autres personnalités marquent également la période, comme les producteurs Paul Grætz et Kurt Ulrich, ou le cadreur Walter Frentz. Les films sont tournés dans plusieurs studios, dont les studios de Babelsberg.

En 1944, Josef Goebbels dresse une liste des « artistes irremplaçables » a appelé la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste », comprenant des personnalités comme Arno Breker, Richard Strauß et Johannes Heesters, des acteurs de cinéma et de théâtre (Hans Albers, Heinz Rühmann, Elisabeth Flickenschildt, Friedrich Kayßler) . Pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les « stars » du cinéma allemand soutiennent l'effort de guerre, en se produisant devant les troupes ou en recueillant des fonds pour l'Organisation de secours de l'hiver allemand (« Winterhilfswerk ») . Bien que la plupart des « stars » masculines aient été exemptées du service militaire, certains ont mimé un engagement militaire pour les films d'actualités : ainsi, en 1941, le très populaire Heinz Rühmann, qui avait un brevet de pilote, en tant que courrier de la « Luftwaffe » .

Le cinéma allemand est l'un des participants de la Mostra de Venise, qui tend cependant à devenir une vitrine de l'Italie fasciste. En 1938, la Mostra subit ainsi les pesantes pressions politiques du gouvernement fasciste. Les vainqueurs sont imposés au jury international et les films primés sont le long métrage allemand « Les Dieux du stade » de Leni Riefenstahl et « Luciano Serra », pilote de Goffredo Alessandrini, 2 films ouvertement de propagande, même si le 1er est encore aujourd'hui reconnu comme l'un des chefs-d'œuvre du cinéma des années 1930. Depuis 1938 donc, les pressions politiques faussent les résultats et ruinent le Festival, avec l'avènement du conflit la situation dégénère à tel point que les éditions de 1940, 1941 et 1942, par la suite considérées comme « non avenues », se déroulent bien loin du Lido de Venise avec peu de pays participants et l'absolu monopole des œuvres et des réalisateurs appartenant à l'axe Rome-Berlin, dans un climat plus propagandistique qu'artistique, représentés également fortement par les « stars » italiennes comme Alida Valli, Assia Noris et Fosco Giachetti. La « Coupe Mussolini », après avoir récompensé Leni Riefenstahl en 1938, couronne « Le Maître de poste » de Gustav Ucicky en 1940 ; « Oncle Krüger » de Hans Steinhoff en 1941 ; et « Le Grand Roi » de Veit Harlan en 1942, comme « meilleur film étranger » .

Le cinéma allemand est marqué, durant cette période, par de nombreuses innovations, tant technologiques (pellicule « Agfacolor ») que techniques (cadrages et montages de Leni Riefenstahl) .

En 2011, le réalisateur franco-australien Philippe Mora exhume 2 films de propagandes réalisés (par un studio indépendant) en cinéma 3-D, en 1936, et qui feraient du cinéma allemand, sous le 3e « Reich », le précurseur du cinéma en relief.

Nazism created an elaborate system of propaganda, which made use of the new technologies of the 20th Century, including cinema. Nazism courted the masses by the means of slogans that were aimed directly at the instincts and emotions of the people. The Nazis valued film as a propaganda instrument of enormous power. The interest that Adolf Hitler and his propaganda minister Josef Gœbbels took in film was not only the result of a personal fascination. The use of film for propaganda had been planned by the National-Socialist German Workers Party as early as 1930, when the Party 1st established a film department.

The Nazis were early aware of the propagandistic effect of movies and already in 1920 the issues of the « Racial Observer » included film criticism. In 1923, Philipp Nickel produced a documentary of the « German Day in Nuremberg ». Hitler had written about the psychological effect of images in « Mein Kampf » :

« One must also remember that of itself the multitude is mentally inert, that it remains attached to its old habits and that it is not naturally prone to read something which does not conform with its own pre-established beliefs when such writing does not contain what the multitude hopes to find there.

The picture, in all its forms, including the film, has better prospects. In a much shorter time, at one stroke, I might say, people will understand a pictorial presentation of something which it would take them a long and laborious effort of reading to understand. »

Further short Nazi films about Party rallies were made in 1927 and 1929. The 1st NSDAP film office was established in 1931 and started producing « documentaries » in a larger-scale. Like, in 1932 :

« Hitlers Kampf um Deutschland » (Hitler's fight for Germany) ; « Blutendes Deutschland » (Germany is bleeding) ; « Das junge Deutschland marschiert » (The German Youth is on the March) .

The Nazi propagandist Hans Traub, who had earned his Ph.D. in 1925 with a dissertation on the press and the German revolutions of 1848-1849, wrote in 1932 in the essay, « The film as a political instrument » :

« Without any doubt, the film is a formidable means of propaganda. Achieving propagandistic influence has always demanded a “ language ” which forms a memorable and passionate plot with a simple narrative. In the vast area of such “ language ” that the recipients are directly confronted by in the course of technical and economical processes, the most effective is the moving picture. It demands permanent alertness ; it's full of surprises concerning the change of time, space, and action ; it has an unimaginable richness of rhythm for intensifying or dispelling emotions. »

Josef Gœbbels, who appointed himself « Patron of the German film » , assumed, accurately, that a national cinema which was entertaining and put glamour on the government would be a more effective propaganda instrument than a national cinema in which the NSDAP and their policy would have been ubiquitous. Gœbbels emphasized the will to end the « shamelessness and tastelessness » that he thought could be found in the former movie industry. The main-goal of the Nazi film policy was to promote escapism, which was designed to distract the population and to keep everybody in good spirits ; Gœbbels, indeed, blamed defeat in World War I on the failure to sustain the morale of the people. The open propaganda was reserved for films like « Der Sieg des Glaubens and Triumph des Willens » , records of the Nuremberg rallies, and newsreels. There are some examples of German feature films from the 3rd « Reich » that deal with the NSDAP or with Party organizations such as the « Sturmabteilung » , Hitler Youth or the National Labour Service, one notable example being « Hitlerjunge Quex » about the Hitler Youth. Another example is the anti-Semitic feature film « Jew Suss » . The propaganda films that refer directly to Nazi politics amounted to less than 1/6 of the whole national film production, which mainly consisted of light entertainment films, although it is those propaganda films that are much more well-known today, such as « Triumph of the Will » .

For conceiving a Nazi film theory, Gœbbels suggested as formative material the « Hamburg Dramaturgy and Laokoon » , or the « Limitations of Poetry » by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, and also demanded « realistic characters » pointing to William Shakespeare. Gœbbels emphasized Lessing's idea that « not only imagining per se but purposeful imagining would prove the creative mind » .

Emil Jannings wrote in 1942, in the « National-Socialist Monthly » , about the goal of showing men and women who can master their own fate as models for identification. The authorities and NSDAP departments in charge of film policy were the film department of the Ministry of Propaganda, the Chamber of Culture (« Reichskulturkammer ») , the Chamber of Film (« Reichsfilmkammer ») , and the film department of the Party Propaganda Department (« Reichspropagandaleitung ») .

A system of « award » was used to encourage self-censorship ; awarded for such things as « cultural value » or « value to the people » , they remitted part of the heavy taxes on films. Up to 1/3 of the films in the 3rd « Reich » received such awards.

To subdue film to the goals of propaganda (« Gleichschaltung ») , the Nazi Party subordinated the entire film industry and administration under Josef Gœbbels' Ministry of Propaganda, and gradually nationalized film production and distribution. A State-run professional school for politically reliable film-makers (« Deutsche Filmakademie Babelsberg ») was founded, and membership of an official professional organization (« Reichsfilmkammer ») was made mandatory for all actors, film-makers, distributors, etc. The censorship that had already been established during World War I and the Weimar Republic was increased, with a National Film Dramaturgist (« Reichsfilmdramaturg ») pre-censoring all manuscripts and screen-plays at the very 1st stages of production. Film-criticism was prohibited and a national film award established.

A film bank (« Filmkreditbank GmbH ») was established to provide low-interest loans for the production of politically welcome films, and such films also received tax-benefits.

In the mid-1930's, the German film industry suffered the most severe crisis it had ever faced. There were multiple reasons for this crisis. Firstly, many of the most capable actors and film-makers had left the country after the rise to power of the Nazi government ; others had been banned by the new « Reichsfilmkammer » . These people left a gap that the film industry could not easily fill. Secondly, the remaining actors and film-makers seized the opportunity to demand higher-salaries, which considerably increased production budgets. Consequently, it became more and more difficult to recover production costs. Thirdly, the export of German films dramatically dropped due to international boycotts. In 1933, exports had covered 44 % of film production costs ; by 1937, this figure had dropped to a mere 7 % .

More and more production companies went bankrupt. The number of companies dropped from 114 (1933-1935) to 79 (1936-1938) to 38 (1939-1941) . This did not necessarily lead to a decrease in the number of new films, as surviving production companies became more prolific, producing many more films.

Nazi companies went on to produce co-productions with companies of other countries : 8 co-productions with the Kingdom of Italy ; 6 co-productions with the French 3rd « République » ; 5 co-productions with the Kingdom of Hungary ; 5 co-productions with Czechoslovakia ; 3 co-productions with Switzerland ; 2 co-productions with the 2nd Polish Republic and the Empire of Japan (e.g. : « The Daughter of the Samurai ») ; and 1 each with Franco's Spain, the United States, the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, and Sweden.

The consolidation of the film industry was undoubtedly beneficial for the Nazi government. On the one hand, an ailing and unprofitable film industry would not have been of much use for the propaganda requirements. And, on the other hand, a small number of big film production companies were easier to control than a multitude of small ones. Goebbels went even further and directed a holding company (« Cautio Treuhand GmbH ») to buy-up the stock majorities of the remaining film production companies. In 1937, the « Cautio » acquired the largest German production company, « Ufa » , and, in 1942, merged this company with the remaining companies (« Terra Film » , « Tobis » , « Bavaria Film » , « Wien-Film » and « Berlin-Film ») into the so-called « Ufi-Group » . With one stroke, the entire German film industry had been practically nationalized, but unlike the situation in the USSR, German film-making preserved its character as a private industry. Although Goebbels founded the « Filmkreditbank GmbH » in order to fund the industry, the funds came from private investors. Thus, there were no government subsidies to the film industry in Nazi Germany. Because of this, the industry was forced to remain profitable - and to produce films that met the expectations of the audience.

A concentration also took place in the distribution field. In 1942, the « Ufa »-owned « Deutsche Filmvertriebs GmbH » (DFV) took the place of all companies so far remaining. For the export of films to foreign countries, special companies had been established such as the « Cinéma Film AG » .

Since the days of the Weimar Republic, there had also existed an extensive system of educational film hire services which was extended under the Nazi administration. In 1943, there were 37 regional services and 12,042 city services. In parallel, the Party Propaganda Department (« Reichspropagandaleitung ») ran its own network of educational film hire services which included 32 « Gaue » , 171 Districts, and 22,357 local services. All film-hire services had extensive film collections as well as rental 16 millimeter film projectors available that made it possible to show films in any class or lecture room and at any group meeting of the Hitler Youth.

Apart from the « Ufa »-owned cinema chain, the cinemas were not nationalized. The majority of the 5,506 cinemas that existed in 1939 within the so-called « Altreich » (« Old Reich » : i.e. , Germany without Austria and the Sudetenland) were small companies run by private owners. However, a large number of rules and regulations issued by the « Reichsfilmkammer » limited the entrepreneurial freedom of the cinemas considerably. For instance, it was mandatory to include a documentary and a news-reel in every film programme. By a law of 1933 (the « Gesetz über die Vorführung ausländischer Bildstreifen vom 23. Juni 1933 ») , the government was also entitled to prohibit the presentation of foreign films. An import quota for foreign films had been set during the Weimar Republic, and during World War II, the import of films from certain foreign countries was completely prohibited. For example, from 1941 onwards, the presentation of American films became illegal.

A quantitative comparison of the percentage of German movies screened versus foreign movies screened shows the following numbers : in the last year of the Weimar Republic the percentage of German movies was 62,2 % and, in 1939 in the 3rd « Reich » , it was 77,1 % , while the number of cinema visits increased by the factor 2.5 from 1933 to 1939 ; on the contrary, the percentage of for example American movies screened was reduced from 25,8 % in 1932 to 13,9 % in 1939 ; 1 U.S. movies were considered « artistically valuable » by the Nazi authorities.

In order to boost the propaganda effect, the Nazis supported film-shows in large cinemas with large audiences where the feeling of being part of the crowd was so overwhelming for the individual spectator that critical film perception had little chance. Film-shows also took place in military barracks and factories. The Hitler Youth arranged special film programmes (« Jugendfilmstunden ») where news-reels and propaganda films were shown. In order to supply even rural and remote areas with film shows, the Party Propaganda Department (« Reichspropagandaleitung ») operated 300 film-trucks and 2 film-trains that carried all the necessary equipment for showing films in, for example, village inns. The dislike that Goebbels and other film politicians had for individual, more private film viewing was probably one of the reasons why they did not make any effort to develop television (at that time, a technique that was ready to be applied) as a new mass-media.

Film propaganda had the highest-priority in Germany even under the severe conditions of the last years of World War II. While schools and playhouses stopped working in 1944, cinemas continued to operate until the very end of the War. In Berlin, for instance, anti-aircraft units were posted specially to protect the local cinemas in 1944.

Books

The Nazis and sympathizers published many books. Most of the beliefs that would become associated with the Nazis, such as German nationalism, eugenics and anti-Semitism had been in circulation since the 19th Century, and the Nazis seized on this body of existing work in their own publications.

The most notable is Adolf Hitler's « Mein Kampf » detailing his beliefs. The book outlines major ideas that would later culminate in World War II. It is heavily influenced by Gustave Le Bon's 1895 « The Crowd : A Study of the Popular Mind » , which theorized propaganda as a way to control the seemingly irrational behaviour of crowds. Particularly prominent is the violent anti-Semitism of Hitler and his associates, drawing, among other sources, on the fabricated «

Protocols of the Elders of Zion » (1897) , which implied that Jews secretly conspired to rule the world. This book was a key source of propaganda for the Nazis and helped fuel their common hatred against the Jews during World War II. For example, Hitler claimed that the international language Esperanto was part of a Jewish plot and makes arguments toward the old German nationalist ideas of « Drang nach Osten » and the necessity to gain « Lebensraum » (living space) east-wards (especially in Russia) . Other books such as « Rassenkunde des deutschen Volkes » (Ethnology of German People) by Hans Friedrich Karl Günther and « Rasse und Seele » (Race and Soul) by Doctor Ludwig Ferdinand Clauss attempt to identify and classify the differences between the German, Nordic, or Aryan type and other supposedly inferior peoples. These books were used as texts in German schools during the Nazi era.

The pre-existing and popular genre of « Schollen-roman » (novel of the soil) also known as blood and soil novels, was given a boost by the acceptability of its themes to the Nazis and developed a mysticism of unity.

The immensely popular « Red Indian » stories by Karl May were permitted despite the heroic treatment of the hero Winnetou and « colored » races ; instead, the argument was made that the stories demonstrated the fall of the Red Indians was caused by a lack of racial consciousness, to encourage it in the Germans. Other fictional works were also adapted ; Heidi was stripped of its Christian elements, and Robinson Crusoe's relationship to Friday was made a master-slave one.

Children's books also made their appearance. In 1938, Julius Streicher published « Der Giftpilz » (The Poisonous Mushroom) , a storybook that equated the Jewish people to poisonous mushrooms and aimed to educate children about the Jews. The book was an example of anti-Semitic propaganda and stated that :

« The following tales tell the truth about the Jewish poison mushroom. They show the many shapes the Jew assumes. They show the depravity and baseness of the Jewish race. They show the Jew for what he really is : " The Devil in human form. " »

Text-books

« Geo-political atlases » emphasized Nazi schemes, demonstrating the « encirclement » of Germany, depicting how the prolific Slav nations would cause the German people to be overrun, and (in contrast) showing the relative population density of Germany was much higher than that of the Eastern regions (where they would seek « Lebensraum ») . Geography text books stated how crowded Germany had become. Other charts would show the cost of disabled children as opposed to healthy ones, or show how 2 child families threatened the birthrate. Math books discussed military applications and used military word problems, physics and chemistry concentrated on military applications, and grammar classes were devoted to propaganda sentences. Other textbooks dealt with the history of the Nazi Party. Elementary school reading text included large amounts of propaganda. Children were taught through textbooks that they were the Aryan Master race (« Herrenvolk ») while the Jews were untrustworthy, parasitic and « Untermenschen » (inferior sub-humans) .

Maps showing the racial composition of Europe were banned from the classroom after many efforts that did not define the territory widely enough for Party officials.

Even fairy tales were put to use, with Cinderella being presented as a tale of how the prince's racial instincts lead him to reject the stepmother's alien blood (present in her daughters) for the racially pure maiden. Nordic sagas were likewise presented as the illustration of « Führerprinzip », which was developed with such heroes as Frederick the Great and Otto von Bismarck.

Literature was to be chosen within the « German spirit » rather than a fixed list of forbidden and required, which made the teachers all the more cautious although Jewish authors were impossible for classrooms. While only William Shakespeare's « MacBeth » and « The Merchant of Venice » were actually recommended, none of the plays were actually forbidden, even « Hamlet », denounced for « flabbiness of soul » .

Biology texts, however, were put to the most use in presenting eugenic principles and racial theories ; this included explanations of the Nuremberg Laws, which were claimed to allow the German and Jewish peoples to co-exist without the danger of mixing. Science was to be presented as the most natural area for introducing the « Jewish Question », once teachers took care to point-out that in nature, animals associated with those of their own species.

Teachers' guidelines on racial instruction presented both the handicapped and Jews as dangers. Despite their many photographs glamorizing the « Nordic » type, the texts also claimed that visual inspection was insufficient, and genealogical analysis was required to determine their types, and report any hereditary problems. However, the National-Socialist Teachers League (NSLB) stressed that at primary schools in particular they had to work on only the Nordic racial core of the German « Volk », again and again, and have to contrast this with the racial composition of foreign populations and the Jews.

Books for occupied countries

In occupied France, the German Institute encouraged translation of German works, although chiefly German nationalists, not ardent Nazis, and produced a massive increase in the sale of translated works. The only books from English to be sold were English Classics, and books with Jewish authors or Jewish subject matter (such as biographies) were banned, except for some scientific works. Control of the paper supply allowed Germans the easy ability to pressure publishers about books.

Comics

The Nazi-controlled government in German-occupied France produced the « Vica » comic book series during World War II as a propaganda tool against the Allied forces. The « Vica » series, authored by Vincent Krassousky, represented Nazi influence and perspective in French society, and included such titles as « Vica contre le service secret anglais », and « Vica défie l'Oncle Sam » .

Films

The Nazis produced many films to promote their views. The Department of Film was important for organizing film propaganda. It has been estimated that 45 million people attended film screenings put on by the NSDAP. « Reichsamtsleiter » Neumann declared that the goal of the Department of Film was not directly political in nature, but was rather to influence the culture, education, and entertainment of the general population.

A main medium was « Die Deutsche Wochenschau », a newsreel series produced for cinemas, from 1940. Newsreels were explicitly intended to portray German interests as successful. Themes often included the virtues of the Nordic or Aryan type, German military and industrial strength, and the evils of the Nazi enemies.

On 22 September 1933, a Department of Film was incorporated into the Chamber of Culture. The department controlled the licensing of every film prior to its production. Sometimes, the government would select the actors for a film, financing the production partially or totally, and would grant tax breaks to the producers. Awards for « valuable » films would decrease taxes, thus encouraging self-censorship among movie makers. Under Josef Gœbbels and Adolf Hitler, the German film industry became entirely nationalised. The National-Socialist Propaganda Directorate, which Gœbbels oversaw, had at its disposal nearly all film agencies in Germany by 1936. Occasionally, certain directors such as Wolfgang Liebeneiner were able to bypass Gœbbels by providing him with a different version of the film than would be released. Such films include those directed by Helmut Käutner : « Romanze in Moll » (Romance in a Minor Key, 1943) , « Große Freiheit Nr. 7 » (The Great Freedom, No. 7, 1944) , and « Unter den Brücken » (Under the Bridges, 1945) . Schools were also provided with motion pictures projectors because film was regarded as particularly appropriate for propagandizing children. Films specifically created for schools were termed « military education » .

« Triumph des Willens » (Triumph of the Will, 1935) by film-maker Leni Riefenstahl chronicles the Nazi Party Congress of 1934, in Nuremberg. It followed an earlier film of the 1933 Nuremberg Rally produced by Riefenstahl, « Der Sieg des Glaubens » . Triumph of the Will features footage of uniformed Party members (though relatively few German soldiers) , who are marching and drilling to militaristic tunes. The film contains excerpts from speeches given by various Nazi leaders at the Congress, including speeches by Adolf Hitler. Frank Capra used scenes from the film, which he described partially as « the ominous prelude of Hitler's holocaust of hate » in many parts of the U.S. Government's « Why We Fight anti-Axis » 7 film series, to demonstrate what the personnel of the American military would be facing in World War II, and why the Axis had to be defeated.

« Der ewige Jude » (The Eternal Jew, 1940) was directed by Fritz Hippler at the insistence of Josef Gœbbels, though the writing is credited to Eberhard Taubert. The movie is done in the style of a documentary, the central thesis being the immutable racial personality traits that characterize the Jew as a wandering cultural parasite. Throughout the film, these traits are contrasted to the Nazi state ideal : while Aryan men find satisfaction in physical labour and the creation of value, Jews only find pleasure in money and a hedonist lifestyle.

Nazism created an elaborate system of propaganda, which made use of the new technologies of the 20th Century, including cinema. Nazism courted the masses by the means of slogans that were aimed directly at the instincts and emotions of the people. The Nazis valued film as a propaganda instrument of enormous power. The interest that Adolf Hitler and his Propaganda minister Josef Goebbels took in film was not only the result of a personal fascination. The use of film for propaganda had been planned by the National-Socialist German Workers Party (NSDAP), as early as 1930, when the Party first established a film department.

Goebbels, who appointed himself « Patron of the German film », assumed, accurately, that a national cinema which was entertaining and put glamour on the government would be a more effective propaganda instrument than a national cinema in which the NSDAP and their policy would have been ubiquitous. The main goal of the Nazi film policy was to promote escapism, which was designed to distract the population and to keep everybody in good spirits; Goebbels indeed blamed defeat in World War I on the failure to sustain the morale of the people. The open propaganda was reserved for films like « Der Sieg des Glaubens » and « Triumph des Willens », records of the Nuremberg rallies, and newsreels. There are some examples of German feature films from the 3rd « Reich » that deal with the NSDAP or with Party organizations such as the « Sturmabteilung », « Hitler Youth » or the « National Labour Service », one notable example being « Hitlerjunge Quex » about the « Hitler Youth ». Another example is the anti-Semitic feature film « Jew Suss ». The propaganda films that refer directly to Nazi politics amounted to less than 1/6 of the whole national film production, which mainly consisted of light entertainment films, although it is those propaganda films that are much more well-known today, such as « Triumph of the Will ».

The authorities and NSDAP departments, in charge of film policy, were the film department of the Ministry of Propaganda, the Chamber of Culture (« Reichskulturkammer »); the Chamber of Film (« Reichsfilmkammer »); and the film department of the Party Propaganda Department (« Reichspropagandaleitung »).

A system of « award » was used to encourage self-censorship; awarded for such things as « cultural value » or « value to the people », they remitted part of the heavy taxes on films. Up to 1/3 of the films in the 3rd « Reich » received such awards.

To subdue film to the goals of propaganda (« Gleichschaltung »), the Nazi Party subordinated the entire film industry and administration under Josef Goebbels' Ministry of Propaganda and, gradually, nationalized film production and distribution. A State-run professional school for politically reliable film-makers (« Deutsche Filmakademie Babelsberg ») was founded, and membership of an official professional organization (« Reichsfilmkammer ») was made mandatory for all actors, film-makers, distributors. The censorship that had already been established during World War I and the Weimar Republic was increased, with a National Film Dramaturgist (« Reichsfilmdramaturg ») pre-censoring all manuscripts and screenplays at the very first stages of production. Film criticism was prohibited and a national film award established.

A film bank (« Filmkreditbank GmbH ») was established to provide low-interest loans for the production of politically welcome films, and such films also received tax benefits.

In the mid-1930's, the German film industry suffered the most severe crisis it had ever faced. There were multiple reasons for this crisis. Firstly, many of the most capable actors and film-makers had left the country after the rise to power of the Nazi government; others had been banned by the new « Reichsfilmkammer ». These people left a gap that the film industry could not easily fill. Secondly, the remaining actors and film-makers seized the opportunity to demand higher salaries, which considerably increased production budgets. Consequently, it became more and more difficult to recover production costs. Thirdly, the export of German films dramatically dropped due to international boycotts. In 1933, exports had covered 44 % of film production costs ; by 1937, this figure had dropped to a mere 7 % .

More and more production companies went bankrupt. The number of companies dropped from 114 (1933-1935) to 79 (1936-1938) to 38 (1939-1941) . This did not necessarily lead to a decrease in the number of new films, as surviving production companies became more prolific, producing many more films.

The consolidation of the film industry was undoubtedly beneficial for the Nazi government. On the one hand, an ailing and unprofitable film industry would not have been of much use for the propaganda requirements. And, on the other hand, a small number of big film production companies were easier to control than a multitude of small ones. Goebbels went even further and directed a holding company (« Cautio Treuhand GmbH ») to buy-up the stock majorities of the remaining film production companies. In 1937, the « Cautio » acquired the largest German production company, « Ufa » , and, in 1942, merged this company with the remaining companies (« Terra Film » , « Tobis » , « Bavaria Film » , « Wien-Film » and « Berlin-Film ») into the so-called « Ufi-Group » . With 1 stroke, the entire German film industry had been practically nationalized, but unlike the situation in the USSR, German film-making preserved its character as a private industry. Although Goebbels founded the « Filmkreditbank GmbH » , in order to fund the industry, the funds came from private investors. Thus, there were no government subsidies to the film industry in Nazi Germany. Because of this, the industry was forced to remain profitable - and to produce films that met the expectations of the audience.

A concentration also took place in the distribution field. In 1942, the « Ufa » -owned « Deutsche Filmvertriebs GmbH » (DFV) took the place of all companies so far remaining. For the export of films to foreign countries, special companies had been established such as the « Cinéma Film AG » .

Since the days of the Weimar Republic, there had also existed an extensive system of educational film hire services which was extended under the Nazi administration. In 1943, there were 37 regional services and 12,042 city services. In parallel, the Party Propaganda Department (« Reichspropagandaleitung ») ran its own network of educational film hire services which included 32 « Gaue » , 171 Districts , and 22,357 local services. All film hire services had extensive film collections, as well as rental 16 mm film projectors available, that made it possible to show films in any class or lecture room and at any group meeting of the « Hitler Youth » .

Apart from the « Ufa » -owned theatre chain, the cinemas were not nationalized. The majority of the 5,506 theatres that existed in 1939, within the so-called « Altreich » (the « Old “ Reich ” » , i.e. , Germany without Austria and the Sudetenland) were small companies run by private owners. However, a large number of rules and regulations issued by the « Reichsfilmkammer » limited the entrepreneurial freedom of the cinemas considerably. For instance, it was mandatory to include a documentary and a newsreel in every film programme. By a law of 1933 (the « Gesetz über die Vorführung ausländischer Bildstreifen vom 23. Juni 1933 »), the government was also entitled to prohibit the presentation of foreign films. An import quota for foreign films had been set during the Weimar Republic and, during World War II, the import of films from certain foreign countries was completely prohibited. For example, from 1941 onwards, the presentation of American films became illegal.

In order to boost the propaganda effect, the Nazis supported film shows in large cinemas with large audiences where the feeling of being part of the crowd was so overwhelming for the individual spectator that critical film perception had little chance. Film shows also took place in military barracks and factories. The « Hitler Youth » arranged special film programmes (« Jugendfilmstunden ») where newsreels and propaganda films were shown. In order to supply even rural and remote areas with film shows, the Party Propaganda Department (« Reichspropagandaleitung ») operated 300 film trucks and 2 film trains that carried all the necessary equipment for showing films in, for example, village inns. The dislike that Goebbels and other film politicians had for individual, more private film viewing was probably one of the reasons why they did not make any effort to develop television (at that time, a technique that was ready to be applied) as a new mass-media.

Film propaganda had the highest priority in Germany even under the severe conditions of the last years of World War II. While schools and playhouses stopped working, in 1944, cinemas continued to operate until the very end of the War. In Berlin, for instance, anti-aircraft units were posted specially to protect the local cinemas, in 1944.

There always had been film stars in Germany, but a star-system comparable to the star-system in Hollywood did not yet exist. Various Nazi leaders denounced the star-system as a Jewish invention. However, in order to improve the image of Nazi Germany, Goebbels made great efforts to form a star-system. After Marlene Dietrich and Greta Garbo had gone to Hollywood, and could not be persuaded to serve the National-Socialist film industry as figure-heads, new film stars were promoted.

The best-known example is the Swedish actress Zarah Leander who was hired, in 1937, by the « Ufa » and became the most prominent and highest-paid German film star in only a few years. The publicity campaign for Leander was run by the press office of the « Ufa », which concealed her past as a film actress, already well-known in Sweden, and put their money right away on her charisma, as a singer with an exceptionally deep voice. The « Ufa » press-office provided the newspapers with detailed instructions on how the new star would have to be presented, and even the actress herself had to follow detailed instructions whenever she appeared in public. This kind of star publicity had not existed in Germany before.

High-politicians such as Hitler, Goebbels, and Hermann Göring appeared in public, flanked by popular German film actors. The female stars, in particular, were supposed to lend some glamour to the dry and male-dominated NSDAP events. Hitler's preferred dinner partners were the actresses Olga Tschechowa and Lil Dagover and, from 1935, Hermann Göring was married to the popular actress Emmy Sonnemann. The relationships of Goebbels to several female film stars are also notorious. Magda Goebbels left a screening of the film « Die Reise nach Tilsit », because it seemed to her too close a telling of her husband's relationship with Lida Baarova, which had resulted in the actress being sent back to her native Czechoslovakia.

Personal proximity to the political leaders became a determining factor for the career success of film actors (The early death of Renate Müller apparently resulted from her lack of co-operation with the requirements of the regime) . An informal system of listings decided how frequently an actor would be cast. The 5 categories extended from « to cast at all costs even without a vacancy » (for instance, Zarah Leander, Lil Dagover, Heinz Rühmann) to « casting under no circumstances welcome » .

How crucial the film stars were for the image of the National-Socialist government is also evident from the tax benefits that Hitler decreed, in 1938, for prominent film actors and directors. From that time on, they could deduct 40 % of their income as professional expenses.

In 1944, Josef Goebbels made a now infamous list with « irreplaceable artists » called the « Gottbegnadeten » list with people such as Arno Breker, Richard Strauß and Johannes Heesters.

During World War II, German film stars supported the War effort by performing for the troops or by collecting money for the German Winter Relief Organization (« Winterhilfswerk ») . Although most of the male stars were exempted from military service, some (such as the popular Heinz Rühmann) participated in the War as soldiers, often accompanied by newsreel film crews.

Fine-Art

By Nazi standards, fine-art was not propaganda. Its purpose was to create ideals, for eternity. This produced a call for heroic and Romantic art, which reflected the ideal rather than the realistic. Explicitly political paintings were very rare. Still more rare were anti-Semitic paintings, because the art was supposed to be on a higher plane. Nevertheless, selected themes, common in propaganda, were the most common topics of art.

Sculpture was used as an expression of Nazi racial theories. The most common image was of the nude male, expressing the ideal of the Aryan race. Nudes were required to be physically perfect. At the Paris Exposition of 1937, Josef Thorak's « Comradeship » stood outside the German pavilion, depicting 2 enormous nude males, clasping hands and standing defiantly side by side, in a pose of defense and racial camaraderie.

Landscape painting featured mostly heavily in the Greater German Art exhibition, in accordance with themes of blood and soil. Peasants were also popular images, reflecting a simple life in harmony with nature, frequently with large families. With the advent of war, war art came to be a significant though still not predominating proportion.

The continuing of the German Art Exhibition throughout the war was put forth as a manifestation of German's culture.

Magazines

In and after 1939, the « Zeitschriften-Dienst » was sent to magazines to provide guidelines on what to write for appropriate topics.

Nazi publications also carried various forms of propaganda.

« Neues Volk » , was a monthly publication of the Office of Racial Policy, which answered questions about acceptable race relations. While it mainly was aimed at regarding race relations, it also included articles about the strength and character of the Aryan race compared to Jews and other « defectives » .

The « NS-Frauen-Warte » , aimed at women, included such topics as the role of women in the Nazi State. Despite its propaganda elements, it was predominately a woman's magazine. It defended anti-intellectualism, urged women to have children, even in War-time, put forth what the Nazis had done for women, discusses bridal schools, urged women to greater efforts in « Total War » .

« Der Pimpf » was aimed at boys and contained both adventure and propaganda.

« Das deutsche Mädel » , in contrast, recommended for girls hiking, tending the wounded, and preparing for care for children. It lay far more emphasis than « NS-Frauen-Warte » on the strong and active German woman.

« Signal »

« Signal » was a propaganda magazine published by the « Wehrmacht » during World War II. It was distributed throughout occupied Europe and neutral countries. « Signal » was published from April 1940 to March 1945, and had the highest sales of any magazine published in Europe during the period 1940 to 1945 - circulation peaked at 2.5 million, in 1943. At various times, it was published in at least 20 languages. There was an English edition distributed in the British Channel Islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark : these islands were occupied by the « Wehrmacht » during World War II.

The promoter of the magazine was the chief of the « Wehrmacht » propaganda office, Colonel Hasso von Wedel. Its annual budget was 10 million « Reichsmarks » , roughly $ 2.5 million at the pre-War exchange rate.

The image that « Signal » transmitted was that of Nazi Germany and its « New Order » as the great benefactor of European peoples and of Western civilization in general. The danger of a Soviet invasion of Europe was strongly pointed-out. The quality of the magazine itself was quite high, featuring complete reviews from the front lines rich in information and photos, even displaying a double center page full colour picture. In fact, many of the most famous Second World War photos that are to be seen today come from « Signal » . The magazine contained little of none anti-Semitic propaganda, as the contents were mainly military.

Newspapers

The « Völkischer Beobachter » (People's Observer) was the official daily newspaper of the NSDAP since December 1920. It disseminated Nazi ideology in the form of brief hyperboles directed against the weakness of parliamentarism, the evils of Jewry and Bolshevism, the national humiliation of the Versailles Treaty and other such topics. It was joined in 1926 by « Der Angriff » (The Attack) , a weekly and later daily paper founded by Josef Gœbbels. It was mainly dedicated to attacks against political opponents and Jews (one of its most striking features were vehemently anti-Semitic cartoons by Hans Schweitzer) but also engaged in the glorification of Nazi heroes such as Horst Wessel. The « Illustrierter Beobachter » was their weekly illustrated paper.

Other Nazi publications included « Das Reich » , a more moderate and highbrow publication aimed at intellectuals and foreigners ; « Der Stürmer » , the most virulently anti-Semitic of all ; and « Das Schwarze Korps » , an SS publication, aiming at a more intellectual tone.

After Adolf Hitler's rise to power, in 1933, all of the regular press came under complete Nazi editorial control through the policy of « Gleichschaltung » , and short-lived propaganda newspapers were also established in the conquered territories during World War II. Alfred Rosenberg was a key member of the Nazi Party who gained control of their newspaper which was openly praised by Hitler. However, Hitler was dissatisfied by Rosenberg's work and slandered Rosenberg behind his back, discrediting his work.

The Coda music to the 3rd « Reich » : Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 (« Romantic ») , the Classical piece which signaled the end of Adolf Hitler.

(From Albert Speer's « Inside the 3rd “ Reich ” » .)

When Adolf Hitler took power in 1933, the Nazis controlled less than 3 % of Germany's 4,700 papers.

The elimination of the German multi-Party political system not only brought about the demise of hundreds of newspapers produced by outlawed political Parties ; it also allowed the State to seize the printing plants and equipment of the Communist and Social-Democratic Parties, which were often turned-over directly to the Nazi Party. In the following months, the Nazis established control or exerted influence over independent press organs.

During the 1st weeks of 1933, the Nazi regime deployed the radio, press, and newsreels to stoke fears of a pending « Communist uprising » , then, channeled popular anxieties into political measures that eradicated civil liberties and democracy. SA (Storm Troopers) and members of the Nazi elite para-military formation, the SS, took to the streets to brutalize or arrest political opponents and incarcerate them in hastily established detention centers and concentration camps. Nazi thugs broke into opposing political Party offices, destroying printing presses and newspapers.

Sometimes using holding companies to disguise new ownership, executives of the Nazi Party-owned publishing-house, Franz Eher, established a huge empire that drove-out competition and purchased newspapers at below-market prices. Some independent newspapers, particularly conservative newspapers and non-political illustrated weeklies, accommodated to the regime through self-censorship or initiative in dealing with approved topics.

Through measures to « Aryanize » businesses, the regime also assumed control of Jewish-owned publishing companies, notably, Ullstein and Mosse.

Ullstein, which published the well-known Berlin daily the « Vossische Zeitung » , was the largest publishing-house company in Europe by 1933, employing 10,000 people. In 1933, German officials forced the Ullstein family to resign from the board of the company and, 1 year later, to sell the company assets.

Owners of a world-wide advertising agency, the Mosse family owned and published a number of major Liberal papers much hated by the Nazis, including the « Berlin Tageblatt » ; the Mosse family fled Germany the day after Hitler took power. Fearing imprisonment or death, reputable journalists also began to flee the country in large numbers. German non-Jewish newspaper owners replaced them, in part, with ill-trained and inexperienced amateurs loyal to the Nazi Party, as well as with skilled and veteran journalists prepared to collaborate with the regime in order to maintain and even enhance their careers.

The Propaganda Ministry, through its « Reich » Press Chamber, assumed control over the « Reich » Association of the German Press, the guild which regulated entry into the profession. Under the new Editors Law of October 4, 1933, the association kept registries of « racially pure » editors and journalists, and excluded Jews and those married to Jews from the profession. Propaganda Ministry officials expected editors and journalists, who had to register with the « Reich » Press Chamber to work in the field, to follow the mandates and instructions handed-down by the ministry. In paragraph 14 of the law, the regime required editors to omit anything « calculated to weaken the strength of the “ Reich ” abroad or at home » .

The Propaganda Ministry aimed further to control the content of news and editorial pages through directives distributed in daily conferences in Berlin and transmitted via the Party propaganda offices to regional or local papers. Detailed guide-lines stated what stories could or could not be reported and how to report the news. Journalists or editors who failed to follow these instructions could be fired or, if believed to be acting with intent to harm Germany, sent to a concentration camp. Rather than suppressing news, the Nazi propaganda apparatus instead sought to tightly control its flow and interpretation and to deny access to alternative sources of news.

By 1944, a shortage of newspaper and ink forced the Nazi government to limit all newspapers 1st to 8, then 4, and finally, 2 pages. Of the 4,700 newspapers published in Germany when the Nazis took power in 1933, no more that 1,100 remained. Approximately half were still in the hands of private or institutional owners, but these newspapers operated in strict compliance with government press laws and published material only in accordance with directives issued by the Ministry of Propaganda. While the circulation of these newspapers was approximately 4.4 million, the circulation of the 325 newspapers and their multiple regional editions owned by the Nazi Party was 21 million. Many of these newspapers continued to publish until the end of the War.

Upon occupying Germany, Allied authorities shut-down and confiscated presses owned by Nazi Party organs. The last surviving German radio station, located in Flensburg, near the Danish border, made its final broadcast in the name of the National-Socialist State on May 9th, 1945. After reporting the news of the un-conditional capitulation of German forces to the Allies, it went off the air.

In the post-War U.S. occupation zone of Germany, the military administration believed that the re-establishment of a free-press was vital to the denazification and re-education of Germans, and essential to the creation of democracy in Germany. Therefore, the 1st German newspaper approved for publication by the U.S. military high-command appeared on January 24th, 1945, in Aachen, 3 months after the U.S. forces captured the city.

Among those tried by the Allies as major war criminals at the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg were Hans Fritzsche, head of the Radio Division of the Propaganda Ministry, and Julius Streicher, editor of « Der Stürmer » .

Newspapers in occupied countries

In Ukraine, after Nazis cracked down on the papers, most papers printed only articles from German agencies, producing the odd effect of more anti-American and anti-British articles than anti-Communist ones. They also printed articles about antecedents of German rule over Ukraine, such as Catherine the Great and the Goths.

Photography

The Nazis also implemented a number of photographers to document events and promote ideology. Photographers include Heinrich Hoffmann and Hugo Jaeger.

Posters

Poster art was a mainstay of the Nazi propaganda effort, aimed both at Germany itself and occupied territories. It had several advantages. The visual effect, being striking, would reach the viewer easily. Posters were also, unlike other forms of propaganda, difficult to avoid.

Imagery frequently drew on heroic realism. Nazi youth and the SS were depicted monumentally, with lighting posed to produce « grandeur » .

Hans Schweitzer, under the pen name « Mjölnir » produced many Nazi posters.

Posters were also used in schools, depicting, for instance, an institution for the feeble-minded, on one hand, and houses, on the other, to inform the students that the annual cost of this institution would build 17 homes for healthy families.

Radio

Before Adolf Hitler came to power, he rarely used the radio as a form of connection with the public, and when he did so non-Party newspapers were allowed to publish his speeches. This changed soon after he came to power, in 1933. Hitler's speeches became famous all over Germany and were often major events for the Germans. Hitler's speeches were broadcast on the national radio, every newspaper (members of the Nazi Party or not) published his speeches, they were shown in the weekly newsreels, and reprinted in large editions in books and pamphlets all across Germany. The speeches made by Hitler became so significant to the Nazis that even restaurants and pubs were expected have their radios on whenever Hitler was delivering one of his speeches and in some cities public speakers were used so passersby could hear him deliver one of his speeches. The extent that Nazi propaganda emphasized and portrayed his speeches was done so that the main points of his speeches appeared in the weekly posters and were all over Germany by the hundreds of thousands.

The radio was an important tool in Nazi propaganda and was also used to promote genocide.

Internal broadcasts

Certainly, the Nazis recognized the importance of radio in disseminating their message and to that end Josef Goebbels approved a scheme whereby millions of cheap radio sets (the « Volksempfänger ») were subsidised by the government. Goebbels claimed the radio was the « 8th great power », and he, along with the Nazi Party, recognized the power of the radio in the propaganda machine of Nazi Germany. In the « Radio as the 8th Great Power » speech, Goebbels proclaimed :

« It would not have been possible for us to take power or to use it in the ways we have without the radio. It is no exaggeration to say that the German revolution, at least in the form it took, would have been impossible without the airplane and the radio. Radio reached the entire nation, regardless of class, standing, or religion. That was primarily the result of the tight centralization, the strong reporting, and the up-to-date nature of the German radio. Above all, it is necessary to clearly centralize all radio activities, to place spiritual tasks ahead of technical ones, to provide a clear worldview.

By the start of the Second World War, over 70 % of German households had one of these radios, which were deliberately limited in range in order to prevent loyal citizens from considering other viewpoints in foreign broadcasts. Radio broadcasts were also played over loudspeakers in public places and workplaces.

In private homes, however, people could easily turn-off the radio when bored and did so once the novelty of hearing the voice from a box wore-off ; this caused the Nazis to introduce many non-propaganda elements, such as music, advice and tips, serials and other entertainment. This was accelerated during the War to prevent people from tuning in enemy propaganda broadcasts ; though Goebbels claimed in his « Das Reich » article that it was to make the radio a good companion to the people, he admitted the truth in his diary.

External broadcasts

As well as domestic broadcasts, the Nazi regime also used radio to deliver its message to both occupied territories and enemy States. One of the main targets was the United Kingdom to which William Joyce broadcast regularly, gaining the nickname « Lord Haw-Haw » in the process. Joyce first appeared on German radio on 6 September 1939, reading the news in English but soon became noted for his often mischievous propaganda broadcasts. Joyce was executed in 1946 for treason. Although the most notorious, and most regularly heard, of the United Kingdom propagandists, Joyce was not the only broadcaster, with others such as Norman Baillie-Stewart, Jersey-born teacher Pearl Vardon, British Union of Fascists members Leonard Banning and Susan Hilton, Barry Payne Jones of the « Link » and Alexander Fraser Grant, whose show was aimed specifically at Scotland, also broadcasting through the « New British Broadcasting Service ».

Broadcasts were also made to the United States, notably through Robert Henry Best and « Axis Sally » Mildred Gillars. Best, a freelance journalist based in Vienna, was initially arrested following the German declaration of war on the United States but before long he became a feature on propaganda radio, attacking the influence of the Jews in America and the leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who succeeded Winston Churchill in Nazi propaganda as « World-Enemy Number 1 ». Best would later be sentenced to life imprisonment for treason. Gillars, a teacher in Germany, mostly broadcast on similar themes as well as peppering her speech with allegations of infidelity against the wives of servicemen. Her most notorious broadcast was the « Vision of Invasion » radio play, broadcast immediately prior to D-Day, from the perspective of an American mother who dreamed that her soldier son died violently in Normandy.

France also received broadcasts from Radio-Stuttgart, where Paul Ferdonnet, an anti-Semitic journalist, was the main voice during the « Phoney War ». Following the occupation, « Radio Paris » and « Radio Vichy » became the main organs of propaganda, with leading far right figures such as Jacques Doriot, Philippe Henriot and Jean Hérold-Paquis regularly speaking in support of the Nazis. Others who broadcast included Gerald Hewitt, a British citizen who lived most of his life in Paris and had been associated with the « Action Française ». The use of domestic broadcasters intended to galvanise support for occupation was also used in Belgium, where Ward Hermans regularly spoke in support of the Nazis from his base in Bremen, and the Italian Social Republic, to where Giovanni Preziosi broadcast a vehemently anti-Semitic show from his base in Munich. Pro-Nazi radio broadcasts in the Arabic language aired in North Africa, crafted with the help of Mohammad Amin al-Husayni and other Arab exiles in Berlin to highlight Arab nationalism. They recast Nazi racist ideology to target Jews alone, not all Semites. Downplaying Benito Mussolini's operations in Africa, they touted the anti-colonialism of the « Axis » powers.

Speakers

The Nazi Party relied heavily on speakers to make its propaganda presentations, most heavily before they came to power, but also afterwards. Adolf Hitler, in « Mein Kampf », recounted that he had realized that it was not written matter but the spoken word that brought about changes, as people would not read things that disagreed, but would linger to hear a speaker. Furthermore, speakers, having their audiences before them, could see their reactions and adjust accordingly, to persuade. His own oratory was a major factor in his rise, and he despised those who came to read pre-written speeches.

Such speakers were particularly important when it was not wanted that the information put across not reach foreigners, who could access the mass-media. Schools were instituted to substitute for the political conflict that had formed the old speakers. In 1939, Walter Tiessler, speaking of his own experience as an early speaker, urged that they continue.

« Sturmabteilung » speakers were used, though their reliance on instinct sometimes offended well-educated audiences, but their blunt and folksy manner often had their own appeal.

The ministry would provide such speakers with information, such as how to spin the problems on the eastern front, or how to discuss the cuts in food rations. The Party propaganda headquarters, sent the « Redner-Schnellinformation » (Speakers' Express Information) out with guidelines for immediate campaigns, such as anti-Semitic campaigns and what information to present.

Specific groups were targeted with such speakers. Speakers, for instance, were created specifically for « Hitler Youth » . These would, among other things, lecture « Hitler Youth » and the « BDM » on the need to produce more children.

Themes

Nazi propaganda promoted Nazi ideology by demonizing the enemies of the Nazi Party, especially Jews and communists, but also capitalists and intellectuals. It promoted the values asserted by the Nazis, including heroic death, « Führerprinzip » (leader principle) , « Volksgemeinschaft » (people's community) , « Blut und Boden » (blood and soil) and the youth were taught early to take pride in the Germanic « Herrenvolk » (Master race) . Propaganda was also used to maintain the cult of personality around Nazi leader Adolf Hitler, and to promote campaigns for eugenics and the annexation of German-speaking areas. After the outbreak of World War II, Nazi propaganda vilified Germany's enemies, notably the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and the United States, and exhorted the population to partake in « Total War » .

Historiography

Nazi propaganda is a relatively recent topic of close study. Historians of all persuasions, including Eastern Bloc writers, agree about its remarkable effectiveness. Their assessment of its significance, however (whether it shaped or merely directed and exploited public opinion) is influenced by their approach to wider questions raised by the study of Nazi Germany, such as the question whether the Nazi State was a fully totalitarian dictatorship, as argued by Hannah Arendt, or whether it also depended on a certain societal consensus.

In addition to media archives, an important primary source for the study of the Nazi propaganda effort are the reports on civilian morale and public opinion that the « Sicherheitsdienst » and, later, the « Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » compiled from 1939 on. Another are the « Deutschland-Berichte » , reports gathered by underground agents of the « Sopade » that particularly dealt with German popular opinion.

AB 108 : Le 3e « Reich » et l'art

« Entartete Kunst »

Art dégénéré (« Entartete Kunst ») était la plate-forme officielle adoptée par le régime nazi pour interdire l'art moderne en faveur d'un art officiel appelé l'« art héroïque ». La théorie était la suivante : l'art héroïque a symbolisé l'art racial pour, la libération de la déformation et de la corruption, alors que les modèles modernes déviaient de la norme prescrite de la beauté Classique. Les artistes de races pures ont produit l'art racial pur, et les artistes modernes d'une contrainte raciale inférieure ont produit les travaux qui étaient dégénérés. Ironiquement, la théorie a commencé avec Max Nordau, un intellectuel juif. Dans l'adaptation nazie, elle a été employée pour défendre les vues d'une théorie culturelle de déclin et de racisme.

D'abord appliqué aux arts plastiques, le terme d'art dégénéré est ensuite étendu à la musique (Schœnberg, Bartók, par exemple, mais aussi la musique « swing »), à la littérature ou encore au cinéma (Max Ophüls, Fritz Lang, Billy Wilder). Cette expression a été reprise, en 2007, par le cardinal Joachim Meisner à propos de l'art se coupant de la religion. Cette affirmation a fait objet d'une polémique en Allemagne.

De juin à novembre 1937, les Nazis organisent à Munich une unique grande exposition d'art dégénéré, qu'ils présentent comme étant produit par les bolchéviques et les juifs. Cette exposition présente 730 œuvres d'une centaine d'artistes, choisies parmi 20,000 œuvres saisies dans les musées allemands. Presque tous les grands artistes modernes allemands (tels que Nolde) et étrangers (tels que Picasso et Chagall) y figurent. Les visiteurs étaient invités à confronter les productions de malades mentaux (envers lesquels le régime nazi se montra, comme on le sait, sans pitié) et celles de représentants de l'avant-garde. Une confrontation destinée à mettre en évidence la parenté entre les 2 productions et stigmatiser la perversité des artistes.

Le succès public est immense, avec plus de 2 millions de visiteurs, bien que le local soit mal adapté et mal situé. La file des visiteurs s'étend jusque sur le trottoir et « la foule devint telle que le Docteur Gœbbels, courroucé et gêné, ne tarda pas à la faire fermer ». Aujourd'hui, l'exposition nous apparaît comme une impitoyable mise au pilori de créateurs livrés en pâture à l'opinion publique. Tout autre était le but poursuivi à l'époque :

« Il s'agit d'abord de présenter le peuple allemand, référent structurel et l'her du Nazisme, comme la victime d'une gigantesque manipulation destinée à l'escroquer. »

L'enjeu de l'opération consistait à faire passer des artistes persécutés et bâillonnés pour des terroristes. Ainsi, dans la 5e salle de l'exposition, l'« insondable saleté » de Karl Hofer, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Max Beckmann ou Oskar Kokoschka est-elle assimilée « aux plus bas instincts du gangstérisme ». Il s'agissait de faire croire que la condamnation de ces inventeurs rendait, in fine, justice aux Allemands.

Parmi les œuvres considérées comme dégénérées, 5,000 sont saisies par les Nazis pour être ensuite détruites, 125 sont vendues aux enchères à Lucerne en Suisse, d'autres sont récupérées par des collectionneurs nazis comme Josef Goebbels. Si des artistes tels que Kandinsky, Klee et Schwitters quittent l'Allemagne dès l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir, Max Beckmann s'enfuit le lendemain de l'ouverture de l'exposition. De nombreux artistes fuient aux États-Unis où ils contribuent à la diffusion de l'art moderne en Amérique. Ceux qui restent sont contraints à une sorte d'exil intérieur. Si Otto Dix et Erich Heckel assagissent leur production afin de ne pas être soupçonnés, d'autres continuent de peindre en secret, par exemple la nuit, tout en produisant des commandes officielles la journée.

Hans Baluschek, Ernst Barlach, Willi Baumeister, Max Beckmann, Hans Bellmer, Marc Chagall, Otto Dix, Max Ernst, Conrad Felixmüller, Otto Freundlich, Johnny Friedländer (exilé en Tchécoslovaquie puis en France) , Otto Griebel, George Grosz, Hans Grundig, Richard Haizmann, Erich Heckel, Katharina Heise, Eugen Hoffmann, Wassily Kandinsky, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Paul Klee, Paul Kleinschmidt, Oskar Kokoschka, Rolf Kurth, Julo Levin (qui mourut à Auschwitz) , Max Liebermann, Franz Marc, Ludwig Meidner, Albert Mentzel (exilé en France) , Hans Mettel, Jean Metzinger, Paula Modersohn-Becker, Marg Moll, Oskar Moll, Johannes Molzahn, Wilhelm Morgner, Otto Mueller, Gabriele Münter, Edvard Munch, Hanna Nagel, Emil Nolde, Felix Nussbaum, Max Pechstein, Franz Radziwill, Emy Roeder, Oskar Schlemmer, Karl Schmidt-Rottluff, Kurt Schwitters, Friedrich Skade, Christoph Voll, Lovis Corinth, Gerhard Marcks, Ernst Křenek.

L'expression « art dégénéré » doit sa fortune à l'exposition « Entartete Kunst » que les Nazis organisèrent en 1937, à Munich. La dégénérescence n'est pas la décadence. Cette dernière notion implique dans une visée Spenglerienne un affaiblissement des cultures, analogue au vieillissement auquel sont voués les corps, mais non une dénaturation. La dégénérescence, l'« Entartung », terme emprunté à la biologie, suppose qu'un objet a perdu certains de ses traits distinctifs au point qu'il cesse d'appartenir à son genre, à son espèce d'origine. Ainsi, selon l'idéologie nazie, du Juif qui n'appartient plus à l'espèce humaine. Ainsi de l'œuvre qui, faute de satisfaire à des critères de savoir-faire, de favoriser la cohésion de la communauté allemande et de répondre à une conception dogmatique de la mimésis, échappe à la sphère de l'art. On connaît le sort que le régime hitlérien réserva aux livres et aux hommes « impurs ». Le sort des œuvres d'art est plus mal connu ; on n'a pu établir avec certitude qu'un bûcher ait été allumé, en 1939, pour détruire des œuvres d'art. Mais il est notoire que, sans croire à la valeur intrinsèque de ces œuvres, les Nazis surent mettre à profit leur valeur marchande. Pour eux, parler d'art à propos de l'art moderne relevait d'une filiation usurpée, et d'ailleurs le mot « Kunst », grossièrement crayonné sur l'affiche de l'exposition, était placé entre guillemets.

Les fondements idéologiques de cette conception sont à chercher dans les théories raciales de Houston Stewart Chamberlain, de Joseph Arthur de Gobineau et d'Alfred Rosenberg qui affirmaient la supériorité de la race germanique. Dans des livres aux titres éloquentes, « Rembrandt als Erzieher » (Rembrandt comme éducateur) et « Dürer als Führer » (Dürer comme guide) , publiés en 1908 et 1928, Julius Langbehn donnait une inflexion raciale au « point de vue historique et national » introduit en histoire de l'art par Heinrich Wölfflin.

C'est sous l'appellation « Entartete Musik » que les Nazis, entre 1933 et 1945, désignaient toute production musicale qui ne rentrait pas dans les normes artistiques étroites édictées par le 3e « Reich » .

En 1938, le régime nazi, alors au pouvoir en Allemagne, présentait à Düsseldorf l'exposition « Reichsmusiktage » , soit un Festival de musique du « Reich » . Cette manifestation importante, organisée du 22 au 29 mai, était destinée à présenter des concerts et des conférences idéologiquement corrects et ethniquement purs pour l'édification des masses dans le cadre des actions de propagande dont le « Reich » était coutumier.

En marge du « Reichsmusiktage » , une autre exposition intitulée « Entartete Musik » , organisée par Adolf Ziegler, directeur du Théâtre National de Weimar, et inaugurée le 24 mai, avait pour but de stigmatiser pour la musique ce qu'une autre exposition de 1937, à Munich, avait fait pour certaines autres formes d'art en les qualifiant d' « Entartete Kunst » (d'Art dégénéré) . Dans son discours d'inauguration, Ziegler expliqua que la décadence de la musique était due à l'influence du judaïsme et du capitalisme, boucs émissaires des difficultés de l'Allemagne à cette époque.

Cette étiquette « Entartete » , appliquée à différentes formes d'art depuis le début des années 1930, s'inscrivait dans la théorie pseudo-scientifique dont les Nazis se faisaient les champions : celle d'une dégénérescence d'une partie de la race humaine, coupable d'une déviance de la norme officielle et justifiant les monstrueuses exterminations de triste mémoire.

Qu'il s'agisse d'arts graphiques et plastiques ou de la musique, le but était le même : discréditer, isoler, décourager, voire même interdire ces créations. En ce qui concerne la musique, aussi bien la composition que l'exécution, la critique, la musicologie et la publicité étaient visées par cette discrimination. Pour le gouvernement nazi, plusieurs types de musiques entraient dans cette catégorie pour des raisons bien différentes.

Comme on peut s'en douter, les œuvres de musiciens ou d'interprètes juifs ou d'origine partiellement juive étaient concernées. C'est ainsi que Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Arnold Schœnberg, Franz Schreker, Walter Braunfels, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Kurt Weill, Gustav Mahler, David Nowakowsky et Berthold Goldschmidt parmi d'autres furent mis à l'index. Mais cela ne s'arrêtait pas là car il suffisait que les œuvres mettent en scène ou utilisent des thèmes ou des personnages juifs ou africains, comme ceux d'Ernst Křenek, ou même aient pour auteurs des artistes d'inspiration marxiste, comme Hanns Eisler, ou tout simplement que les artistes aient montré de la sympathie pour des opposants au régime nazi. Tel fut le cas pour Anton von Webern, coupable d'avoir maintenu des liens avec Arnold Schœnberg qui s'était exilé.

Mais la musique moderne (nous dirions aujourd'hui contemporaine, comme pour qualifier les œuvres de Paul Hindemith, Alban Berg, Arnold Schœnberg ou Anton von Webern) tombait également sous ce qualificatif de dégénérée.

En fait, un coup d'arrêt à l'évolution de la musique avait été décidé afin de témoigner de la loyauté du régime envers les grands compositeurs allemands des XVIIIe et XIXe siècles qui portaient témoignage de la grandeur de l'esprit allemand. De plus, la modification de la forme et de la structure musicales vers lesquelles évoluait la musique en ce début du siècle, apparaissait comme une menace à la culture de la Loi, de l'Ordre et du contrôle de la société sur laquelle reposait le régime nazi.

Bien entendu, dans ce cadre, le jazz était tout autant, sinon plus, considéré comme dégénéré en raison de ses origines, de l'ethnie de la plupart de ses interprètes et, d'une manière générale, en raison de son association avec une culture afro-américaine honnie.

Cette politique de muselage de tout un riche et multiple courant de création mise en œuvre dès le début du régime nazi, principalement par le Ministère de la propagande du sinistre Josef Gœbbels, rendit pour ces artistes de plus en plus difficile, puis totalement impossible, de pouvoir s'exprimer, de faire jouer leurs œuvres ou même de se produire en public pour les interpréter. Nombreux furent ceux qui choisirent l'exil, quand ils le purent, tels Arnold Schönberg, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, Berthold Goldschmidt, ou se cachèrent comme Karl Amadeus Hartmann ou Boris Blacher quand ils ne furent pas exterminés dans des camps tels Viktor Ullmann ou Erwin Schulhoff.

Ironiquement, quelques œuvres, après avoir été qualifiées de « Entartete Musik » furent ensuite adoptées avec enthousiasme par le régime nazi pour les besoins de sa propagande.

« Degenerate Art » (« Entartete Kunst ») was a term adopted by the Nazi regime in Germany to describe virtually all modern art. Such art was banned on the grounds that it was un-German, Jewish, or Communist in nature, and those identified as degenerate artists were subjected to sanctions. These included being dismissed from teaching positions, being forbidden to exhibit or to sell their art, and in some cases being forbidden to produce art.

« Degenerate Art » also was the title of an exhibition, held by the Nazis in Munich, in 1937, consisting of modernist artworks chaotically hung and accompanied by text labels deriding the art. Designed to inflame public opinion against modernism, the exhibition subsequently traveled to several other cities in Germany and Austria.

While modern styles of art were prohibited, the Nazis promoted paintings and sculptures that were traditional in manner and that exalted the « blood and soil » values of racial purity, militarism, and obedience. Similar restrictions were placed upon music, which was expected to be tonal and free of any jazz influences ; disapproved music was termed « Degenerate Music » , likewise, films and plays also were censored.

The early 20th Century was a period of wrenching changes in the arts. In the visual arts, such innovations as Cubism, Dada and Surrealism (following Symbolism, Post-Impressionism and Fauvism) were not universally appreciated. The majority of people in Germany, as elsewhere, did not care for the new art which many resented as elitist, morally suspect, and too often incomprehensible.

Under the Weimar government of the 1920's, Germany emerged as a leading center of the « avant-garde » - the birthplace of Expressionism in painting and sculpture, of the atonal musical compositions of Arnold Schœnberg, and the jazz-influenced work of Paul Hindemith and Kurt Weill. Films such as Robert Wiene's « The Cabinet of Doctor Caligari » (1920) and Friedrich Wilhelm Murnau's « Nosferatu » (1922) brought Expressionism to cinema.

The Nazis viewed the culture of the Weimar period with disgust. Their response stemmed partly from a conservative æsthetic taste, and partly from their determination to use culture as a propaganda tool. On both counts, a painting such as Otto Dix's « War Cripples » (1920) was anathema to them. It unsparingly depicts 4 badly disfigured veterans of the First World War, then, a familiar sight on Berlin's streets, rendered in caricatured style. Featured in the « Degenerate Art » exhibition, it would hang next to a label accusing Dix (himself, a volunteer in World War I) of « an insult to the German heroes of the Great War » .

As dictator, Adolf Hitler gave his personal taste in art the force of law to a degree never before seen. Only in Joseph Stalin's Soviet Union, where Socialist Realism was the mandatory style, had a modern State shown such concern with regulation of the arts. In the case of Germany, the model was to be Classical Greek and Roman art, seen by Hitler as an art whose exterior form embodied an inner racial ideal.

The reason for this, as Henry Grosshans points-out, is that :

« Hitler saw Greek and Roman art as uncontaminated by Jewish influences. Modern art was seen as an act of æsthetic violence by the Jews against the German spirit. Such was true to Hitler even though only Max Liebermann, Ludwig Meidner, Otto Freundlich, and Marc Chagall, among those who made significant contributions to the German modernist movement, were Jewish. But Hitler took upon himself the responsibility of deciding who, in matters of culture, thought and acted like a Jew. »

The supposedly « Jewish » nature of all art that was indecipherable, distorted, or that represented « depraved » subject matter was explained through the concept of degeneracy, which held that distorted and corrupted art was a symptom of an inferior race. By propagating the theory of degeneracy, the Nazis combined their anti-Semitism with their drive to control the culture, thus consolidating public support for both campaigns.

The term « Entartung » (or « degeneracy ») had gained currency in Germany by the late- 19th Century when the critic and author Max Nordau devised the theory presented in his 1892 book, « Entartung » . Nordau drew upon the writings of the criminologist Cesare Lombroso, whose « The Criminal Man » , published in 1876, attempted to prove that there were « born criminals » whose atavistic personality traits could be detected by scientifically measuring abnormal physical characteristics. Nordau developed from this premise a critique of modern art, explained as the work of those so corrupted and enfeebled by modern life that they have lost the self-control needed to produce coherent works. He attacked Æstheticism in English literature and described the mysticism of the Symbolist movement in French literature as a product of mental pathology. Explaining the painterliness of Impressionism as the sign of a diseased visual cortex, he decried modern degeneracy while praising traditional German culture. Despite the fact that Nordau was Jewish and a key-figure in the Zionist movement (Lombroso was also Jewish) , his theory of artistic degeneracy would be seized upon by German National-Socialists during the Weimar Republic as a rallying point for their anti-Semitic and racist demand for « Aryan » purity in art.

Belief in a Germanic spirit (defined as mystical, rural, moral, bearing ancient wisdom, and noble in the face of a tragic destiny) existed long before the rise of the Nazis ; the composer Richard Wagner celebrated such ideas in his work. Beginning before World War I, the well-known German architect and painter Paul Schultze-Naumburg's influential writings, which invoked racial theories in condemning modern art and architecture, supplied much of the basis for Adolf Hitler's belief that Classical Greece and the Middle-Ages were the true sources of « Aryan » art. Schultze-

Naumburg subsequently wrote such books as « Die Kunst der Deutschen. Ihr Wesen und ihre Werke » (The art of the Germans. Its nature and its works) and « Kunst und Rasse » (Art and Race) , the latter published in 1928, in which he argued that only racially pure artists could produce a healthy art which upheld timeless ideals of Classical beauty, while racially mixed modern artists produced disordered artworks and monstrous depictions of the human form. By reproducing examples of modern art next to photographs of people with deformities and diseases, he graphically reinforced the idea of modernism as a sickness. Alfred Rosenberg developed this theory in « Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts » (Myth of the 20th Century) , published in 1933, which became a best-seller in Germany and made Rosenberg the Party's leading ideological spokesman.

Adolf Hitler's rise to power, on January 31, 1933, was quickly followed by actions intended to cleanse the culture of degeneracy : book burnings were organized, artists and musicians were dismissed from teaching positions, and curators who had shown a partiality to modern art were replaced by Party members. In September 1933, the « Reichskulturkammer » (« Reich » Culture Chamber) was established, with Josef Gœbbels, Hitler's « Reichminister für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda » (« Reich » Minister for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda) in charge. Sub-chambers within the Culture Chamber, representing the individual arts (music, film, literature, architecture, and the visual arts) were created ; these were membership groups consisting of « racially pure » artists supportive of the Party, or willing to be compliant. Gœbbels made it clear :

« In future, only those who are members of a Chamber are allowed to be productive in our cultural life. Membership is open only to those who fulfil the entrance condition. In this way, all unwanted and damaging elements have been excluded. »

By 1935, the « Reich » Culture Chamber had 100,000 members.

Nonetheless there was, during the period 1933-1934, some confusion within the Party on the question of Expressionism. Gœbbels and some others believed that the forceful works of such artists as Emil Nolde, Ernst Barlach and Erich Heckel exemplified the Nordic spirit ; as Gœbbels explained :

« We, National-Socialists, are not un-modern ; we are the carrier of a new modernity, not only in politics and in social matters, but also in art and intellectual matters. »

However, a faction led by Alfred Rosenberg despised the Expressionists, and the result was a bitter ideological dispute which was settled only in September 1934, when Adolf Hitler declared that there would be no place for modernist experimentation in the « Reich » . This edict left many artists initially uncertain as to their status. The work of the Expressionist painter Emil Nolde, a committed member of the Nazi Party, continued to be debated even after he was ordered to cease artistic activity, in 1936. For many modernist artists, such as Max Beckmann, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, and Oskar Schlemmer, it was not until June 1937 that they surrendered any hope that their work would be tolerated by the authorities.

Although books by Franz Kafka could no longer be bought by 1939, works by ideologically suspect authors such as Hermann Heße and Hans Fallada were widely read. Mass-culture was less stringently regulated than high-culture, possibly because the authorities feared the consequences of too heavy-handed interference in popular entertainment. Thus, until the outbreak of the War, most Hollywood films could be screened, including « It Happened One Night », « San Francisco », and « Gone with the Wind ». While performance of atonal music was banned, the prohibition of jazz was less strictly enforced. Benny Goodman and Django Reinhardt were popular, and leading British and American jazz bands continued to perform in major cities until the War ; thereafter, dance bands officially played « swing » rather than the banned jazz.

By 1937, the concept of degeneracy was firmly entrenched in Nazi policy. On June 30 of that year, Josef Goebbels put Adolf Ziegler, the head of the « Reichskammer der Bildenden Künste » (« Reich » Chamber of Visual Art) , in charge of a 6 man commission authorized to confiscate from museums and art collections throughout the « Reich » , any remaining art deemed modern, degenerate, or subversive. These works were, then, to be presented to the public in an exhibit intended to incite further revulsion against the « perverse Jewish spirit » penetrating German culture.

Over 5,000 works were seized, including 1,052 by Emil Nolde, 759 by Erich Heckel, 639 by Ernst Ludwig Kirchner and 508 by Max Beckmann, as well as smaller numbers of works by such artists as Alexander Archipenko, Marc Chagall, James Ensor, Albert Gleizes, Henri Matisse, Jean Metzinger, Pablo Picasso, and Vincent van Gogh. The « Entartete Kunst » exhibit, featuring over 650 paintings, sculptures, prints, and books from the collections of 32 German museums, premiered in Munich on July 19, 1937, and remained on view until November 30 before traveling to 11 other cities in Germany and Austria.

The exhibit was held on the 2nd floor of a building formerly occupied by the Institute of Archæology. Viewers had to reach the exhibit by means of a narrow staircase. The 1st sculpture was an oversized, theatrical portrait of Jesus, which purposely intimidated viewers as they literally bumped into it in order to enter. The rooms were made of temporary partitions and deliberately chaotic and overfilled. Pictures were crowded together, sometimes unframed, usually hung by cord.

The 1st 3 rooms were grouped thematically. The 1st room contained works considered demeaning of religion ; the 2nd featured works by Jewish artists in particular ; the 3rd contained works deemed insulting to the women, soldiers and farmers of Germany. The rest of the exhibit had no particular theme.

There were slogans painted on the walls. For example :

« Insolent mockery of the Divine under Centrist rule »

« Revelation of the Jewish racial soul »

« An insult to German womanhood »

« The ideal - cretin and whore »

« Deliberate sabotage of national defense »

« German farmers - a Yiddish view »

« The Jewish longing for the wilderness reveals itself - in Germany, the Negro becomes the racial ideal of a degenerate art »

« Madness becomes method »

« Nature as seen by sick minds »

Even museum big-wigs called this the « art of the German people » .

Speeches of Nazi Party leaders contrasted with artist manifestos from various art movements, such as Dada and Surrealism. Next to many paintings were labels indicating how much money a museum spent to acquire the artwork. In the case of paintings acquired during the post-War Weimar hyper-inflation of the early 1920's, when the cost of a kilo loaf of bread reached 233 billion RM (« Reichsmark ») , the prices of the paintings were, of course, greatly exaggerated. The exhibit was designed to promote the idea that modernism was a conspiracy by people who hated German decency, frequently identified as Jewish-Bolshevist, although only 6 of the 112 artists included in the exhibition were, in fact, Jewish.

The exhibition program contained photographs of modern artworks accompanied by defamatory text. The cover featured the exhibition title (with the word « Kunst » , meaning art, in scare quotes) superimposed on an image of Otto Freundlich's sculpture « Der Neue Mensch » .

A few weeks after the opening of the exhibition, Josef Gœbbels ordered a 2nd and more thorough scouring of German art collections ; inventory lists indicate that the artworks seized in this 2nd round, combined with those gathered prior to the exhibition, amounted to some 16,558 works.

Coinciding with the « Entartete Kunst » exhibition, the « Große deutsche Kunstausstellung » (Great German art exhibition) made its premiere amid much pageantry. This exhibition, held at the palatial « Haus der deutschen Kunst » (House of German Art) , displayed the work of officially approved artists such as Arno Breker and Adolf Wißel. At the end of 4 months, « Entartete Kunst » had attracted over 2 million visitors, nearly 3 and a half times the number that visited the nearby « Große deutsche Kunstausstellung » .

« Avant-garde » German artists were now branded both enemies of the State and a threat to German culture. Many went into exile. Max Beckmann fled to Amsterdam on the opening-day of the « Entartete Kunst » exhibit. Max Ernst emigrated to America with the assistance of Peggy Guggenheim. Ernst Ludwig Kirchner committed suicide in Switzerland, in 1938. Paul Klee spent his years in exile in Switzerland, yet, was unable to obtain Swiss citizenship because of his status as a « degenerate » artist. A leading German dealer, Alfred Flechtheim, died penniless in exile in London, in 1937.

Other artists remained in internal exile. Otto Dix retreated to the country-side to paint un-peopled landscapes in a meticulous style that would not provoke the authorities. The « Reichskulturkammer » forbade artists such as Edgar Ende and Emil Nolde from purchasing painting materials. Those who remained in Germany were forbidden to work at Universities and were subject to surprise raids by the « Gestapo » , in order to ensure that they were not violating the ban on producing artwork ; Nolde secretly carried-on painting, but using only watercolours (so as not to be betrayed by the telltale odour of oil paint) . Although officially no artists were put to death because of their work, those of Jewish descent who did not escape from Germany in time were sent to concentration camps. Others were murdered in the « Action T4 » .

After the exhibit, paintings were sorted-out for sale and sold in Switzerland at auction ; some pieces were acquired by museums, others by private collectors. Nazi officials took many for their private use : for example, Hermann Göring took 14 valuable pieces, including a Van Gogh and a Cézanne. In March 1939, the Berlin Fire Brigade burned about 4,000 paintings, drawings and prints which had apparently little value on the international market. This was an act of unprecedented vandalism, although the Nazis were well used to book burnings on a large scale.

A large amount of « degenerate art » by Pablo Picasso, Salvador Dalí, Max Ernst, Paul Klee, Marcel Léger and Joan Miró was destroyed in a bonfire on the night of July 27, 1942, in the gardens of the « Galerie nationale du Jeu de Paume » , in Paris. Whereas it was forbidden to export « degenerate art » to Germany, it was still possible to buy and sell artworks of « degenerate artists » in occupied France. The Nazis considered, indeed, that they should not be concerned by Frenchmen's mental health. As a consequence, many works made by these artists were sold at the main French auction house during the occupation.

After the collapse of Nazi Germany and the invasion of Berlin by the Red Army, some artwork from the exhibit was found buried underground. It is unclear how many of these, then, re-appeared in the Hermitage Museum in Saint-Petersburg where they still remain.

In 2010, as work began to extend an underground line from « Alexanderplatz » through the historic city centre to the Brandenburg Gate, a number of sculptures from the « degenerate art » exhibition were unearthed in the cellar of a private house close to the « Rote Rathaus » . These included, for example, the bronze cubist style statue of a female dancer by the artist Marg Moll, and are now on display at the « Neues Museum » .

The years 1927-1937 were critical for artists in Germany. In 1927, the National-Socialist Society for German Culture was formed. The aim of this organization was to halt the corruption of art and inform the people about the relationship between race and art. By 1933, the terms Jewish, Degenerate, and Bolshevik were in common use to describe almost all Modern art.

In 1937, Nazi officials purged German museums of works the Party considered to be « Degenerate ». From the thousands of works removed, 650 were chosen for a special exhibit of « Entartete Kunst ». The exhibit opened in Munich and then traveled to 11 other cities in Germany and Austria. In each installation, the works were poorly hung and surrounded by graffiti and hand-written labels mocking the artists and their creations. Over 3 million visitors attended making it the 1st blockbuster exhibition.

Many of the artists included in the « Entartete Kunst » exhibition are now considered Masters of the 20th Century. The Nazi Regime had a direct influence on the private and public life of many of those artist.

L'expressionnisme

L'expressionnisme est la projection d'une subjectivité qui tend à déformer la réalité pour inspirer au spectateur une réaction émotionnelle. Les représentations sont souvent fondées sur des visions angoissantes, déformant et stylisant la réalité pour atteindre la plus grande intensité expressive. Celles-ci sont le reflet de la vision pessimiste que les expressionnistes ont de leur époque, hantée par la menace de la Première Guerre mondiale. Les œuvres expressionnistes mettent souvent en scène des symboles, influencées par la psychanalyse naissante et les recherches du symbolisme.

Au début du XXe siècle, ce mouvement profondément ancré dans l'Europe du Nord (en particulier, l'Allemagne) est une réaction à l'impressionnisme français. Alors que l'impressionnisme est encore à décrire la réalité physique, l'expressionnisme allemand lui ne s'attache plus à cette réalité et la soumet aux états d'âme de l'artiste.

L'expressionnisme rompt aussi avec l'impressionnisme à travers une forme très agressive : des couleurs violentes, des lignes acérées. Il s'inscrit alors dans la continuité du fauvisme qui commence à s'épuiser et dont les principaux représentants s'éloignent plus ou moins brutalement : Matisse, Marquet, Van Dongen, Braque, Derain, Friesz et Vlaminck. Pour autant, l'expressionnisme n'est pas vraiment un mouvement ou une école mais davantage une réaction contre l'académisme et la société. Les artistes expressionnistes resteront souvent isolés. « Le Cri » du peintre Edvard Munch, ou « La Guerre » d'Otto Dix sont des tableaux représentatifs du genre expressionniste en peinture. En musique, les Symphonies de Dmitri Chostakovitch sont d'esprit expressionniste, à partir de la fin des années 1920.

On peut rattacher les peintres des XVe et XVIe siècles, Matthias Grünewald et Le Greco à la tendance expressionniste, mais, en pratique, le terme s'applique essentiellement aux œuvres du XXe siècle.

Les 1ers éléments annonciateurs de l'expressionnisme apparaissent à la fin du XIXe siècle, en particulier dans la toile d'Edvard Munch, « Le Cri », ainsi que dans l'évolution des travaux de Van Gogh. Le critique d'art Wilhelm Worringer, en 1908, est le 1er à parler d'expressionnisme.

L'expressionnisme éclot par ailleurs alors que la technique photographique se perfectionne et que le rapport de l'art à la réalité s'en trouve profondément modifié. L'art pictural perd sa fonction de moyen privilégié de reproduction de la réalité objective ce qui renforce sa composante subjective et lui permet progressivement de s'affranchir des normes.

Plusieurs groupes peuvent être rattachés à l'expressionnisme, tels que l'Association des Artistes munichoïses (NKVM) et la Nouvelle Sécession de Berlin dont sont issus par rupture, respectivement « Der Blaue Reiter » (Le Cavalier bleu) et « Die Brücke » (Le Pont) . En 1918, le Groupe de Novembre en cristallise la portée politique. Après 1933, le mouvement, dans sa dimension formelle, a influencé nombre d'autres artistes, comme les expressionnistes abstraits aux États-Unis.

« Die Brücke » est fondé en 1905 par Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Fritz Bleyl, Erich Heckel et Karl Schmidt-Rottluff, à Dresde. Max Pechstein et Emil Nolde, en 1906 ; Otto Müller, en 1910 ; et Cuno Amiet les rejoignent. Le fauviste Van Dongen se joignit aussi à eux et fut l'intermédiaire avec ses compagnons français. L'intention du groupe était d'attirer tout élément révolutionnaire qui voudrait s'unir à eux, c'est ainsi qu'ils l'exprimèrent dans une lettre adressée à Nolde. Leur plus grand intérêt était de détruire les vieilles conventions, à l'identique de ce qui se passait en France.

Selon Kirchner, ils ne pouvaient s'imposer de règles et l'inspiration devait couler libre et donner expression immédiate aux pressions émotionnelles de l'artiste ; ils se préoccupent moins des aspects formels, position qui les séparait du fauvisme de Matisse et Braque avec des scènes très brutales et sanglantes.

Pour les Allemands, le contenu est plus important que la forme. La charge de critique sociale qu'ils imprimèrent à l'œuvre leur valut la critique des conservateurs qui les accusaient d'être un danger pour la jeunesse allemande.

Kirchner fut considéré comme le plus authentique représentant de « Die Brücke » . Il fut un artiste hyper-sensible qui peignait les rues et la vie urbaine de Berlin de manière nouvelle et originale. Ses formes décharnées et pointues, aux couleurs acides, sont caractéristiques, dans des œuvres comme « L'École de danse » de 1914.

Emil Nolde, même s'il quitta le groupe à la fin de l'année 1907, a aussi été considéré comme un des plus importants représentants du groupe. Influencé par le belge Ensor et par Van Gogh, il se sentit fortement attiré par le primitivisme noir et par le mythe du sauvage. Sa recherche du paradis se centra plus sur la concrétion du primordial que sur les attitudes escapistes, façonnant son sentiment tragique de la nature et son inspiration de caractère psychologique et instinctif, éléments qui ont fait de lui le peintre expressionniste par excellence. Vers 1909, et après une grave maladie, il commença à peindre des tableaux à thème religieux, dans lesquels il exprima son inspiration mystique.

Edvard Munch, bien qu'il ne soit pas lié avec « Die Brücke » , est considéré comme le père de l'expressionnisme. Il était norvégien et, jusqu'en 1885, s'intéressa à l'impressionnisme et au symbolisme. À partir de 1892, son style est pleinement formé, courbes sinueuses, coloris arbitraires, obsession pour l'infirmité et la mort, êtres inquiétants qui fuient d'une masse de couleur, comme on l'observe dans son tableau le plus célèbre, « Le Cri » . Son séjour en Allemagne, jusqu'en 1908, explique son influence au sein de « Die Brücke » . En 1913, se produisit la dissolution du groupe, conséquence des différences évidentes entre les composants du groupe et l'établissement d'un marché qui pour eux compliquait les exigences d'un front commun.

En 1912, un autre groupe d'artistes dont Wassily Kandinsky, Franz Marc, August Macke, Alexei Jawlensky, Gabriele Münter et Marianne von Werefkin se rassemblent à Murnau, à côté de Munich sous la dénomination de « Der Blaue Reiter » (Le Cavalier bleu) . À la différence de « Die Brücke » , les artistes de « Der Blaue Reiter » ressentent le besoin de créer un langage plus contrôlé pour promouvoir leurs messages. Ils publièrent des livres et organisèrent des expositions. Ils développèrent un art spirituel dans lequel ils réduisirent le naturalisme au point d'arriver à l'abstraction. Ils partagèrent certaines idées avec les expressionnistes de « Die Brücke » mais ils possédaient une purification plus importante des instincts et ils voulaient également capter l'essence spirituelle de la réalité. Sur ce point, leurs idées étaient plus recherchées et spéculatives. Les plus grands représentants étaient Kandinsky et Franz Marc, accompagnés de Macke, Jawlensky et Klee.

Kandinsky, originaire de Moscou, arriva à Munich en 1896. En 1909, il est nommé président de la Nouvelle Association d'artistes de Munich et organisa les expositions de 1909 et 1910 pour présenter le travail des fauvistes et des Iers cubistes. Dans le catalogue réalisé lors de la seconde exposition, il commença à introduire sa théorie de l'art qui s'acheva, 2 ans plus tard, lors de la publication de son livre, « Du Spirituel dans l'Art » . En 1912, après avoir donné sa démission de l'association, il fonda avec Franz Marc, « Der Blaue Reiter » . Ce nom dérive de l'amour de Kandinsky pour les cavaliers et de celui de Franz Marc pour les chevaux. Le groupe se dispersa avec la guerre à laquelle Macke et Marc moururent. Les 2 Ires expositions de « Der Blaue Reiter » montraient des œuvres graphiques et des dessins. « La Fugue » de Kandinsky (1914) peut être considérée comme de tendance expressionniste abstraite.

En 1913, ils seront invités à participer à une exposition internationale à Berlin nommée « Le Salon d'automne berlinois » . Sa poétique se définissait comme un expressionnisme lyrique dans lequel l'échappatoire tendait non pas vers le monde sauvage mais vers la spiritualité de la nature et du monde intérieur. Pour Kandinsky, la peinture devait s'étendre de la pesante réalité matérielle jusqu'à l'abstraction de la vision pure, avec la couleur comme moyen, d'où le développement d'une théorie complexe de la couleur. Dans « La Peinture comme art pur » , livre de 1913, il soutient que la peinture est déjà une réalité séparée, un monde en soi, une nouvelle forme d'être, qui agit sur le spectateur à travers la vue et qui provoque en lui de profondes expériences spirituelles. Auparavant, en 1910, Kandinsky avait réalisé les Ires aquarelles abstraites.

Pour Klee, l'artiste devait se mêler aux forces de la nature et agir comme milieu afin que ses créations soient acceptées de la même manière que l'on accepte les phénomènes naturels. À la différence de Kandinsky, Klee était convaincu que l'art pouvait capter le sens créatif de la nature et c'est pour cela qu'il rejetait l'abstraction absolue. Concrètement, Klee se laissa influencer au début, comme Macke, par le simultanésisme des Delaunay. En même temps, il fut le 1er artiste à pénétrer dans les domaines de l'inconscient alors que Sigmund Freud et Carl Jung commençaient à les étudier.

Après la dissolution du groupe, en 1919, Walter Gropius fonde le « Bauhaus » , à Weimar ; école de dessin et d'architecture, dont les professeurs étaient les plus grands Maîtres de l'expressionnisme constructif, et qui réunit des hommes comme Feininger, Klee ou Kandinsky.

En Allemagne, après la Première Guerre mondiale, le réalisme expressionniste apparut, mouvement dans lequel les artistes se séparèrent de l'abstraction, réfléchissant sur l'art figuratif et rejetant toute activité qui ne s'occupait pas des problèmes de l'urgente réalité de l'après-guerre. Ce mouvement regroupa Otto Dix, George Grosz, Max Beckmann et le sculpteur Barlach.

Quelques musiciens se sont ralliés au mouvement expressionniste, notamment les compositeurs de l'École de Vienne : Arnold Schönberg (« Erwartung », « Die glückliche Hand ») ; Alban Berg (« Wozzeck », « Lulu ») ; Anton von Webern (Passacaille pour orchestre) . Les éléments musicaux qui se rattachent à cette esthétique se caractérisent par un emploi intense du chromatisme et d'agrégats d'une richesse parfois excessive, aboutissant à une exaspération des sentiments, une tension, une frénésie teintées de pessimisme, voire de morbidité.

« Der Blaue Reiter » publia, dans son 1er n°, l'œuvre de 3 compositeurs : Arnold Schönberg (qui s'exerça aussi à la peinture expressionniste) , Alban Berg et Anton von Webern, trio que formait la dénommée Seconde école de Vienne. Dans la trajectoire de ces musiciens, nous trouvons la présence pleinement expressionniste dans les Opéras « Lulu » et « Wozzeck » de Berg et dans les drames « Die Erwartung » et « Die glückliche Hand » de Schönberg.

La Première Guerre mondiale se termine par la défaite de l'Allemagne, en 1918. Le pays est alors en ruine, et connaît une crise économique très grave. Les rues sont pleines de mendiants, de soldats infirmes, et de miséreux qui tentent de survivre par tous les moyens. Les artistes sont alors très marqués par cette déprime générale. Certains ont connus les horreurs de la guerre, et veulent en témoigner à travers leurs œuvres. D'autres veulent exprimer le malaise de cette société. Pour la 1re fois dans l'histoire de l'art, des artistes vont choisir de représenter le monde dans ce qu'il a de laid, on appellera ce mouvement : expressionnisme. L'expressionnisme se caractérise par une représentation des hommes à la limite de la caricature. Ils sont souvent montrés comme des pantins désarticulés aux expressions exagérées, souvent tristes ou mélancoliques et parfois ridicules.

Les expressionnistes, grâce à leur regard critique sur la société allemande de l'entre-2-guerres, seront également les 1ers à comprendre la menace représentée par Adolf Hitler, et la montée du Nazisme. Les couleurs de leurs tableaux sont souvent violentes et contrastées, et le noir est très présent.

Dès son arrivée au pouvoir, en 1933, Hitler s'attaque aux artistes modernes, et plus particulièrement aux expressionnistes qui seront les 1ers à être inquiétés par le régime nazi. Leurs images inquiètent, horrifient les allemands, et déplaisent à Hitler parce qu'elles montrent la société telle qu'elle est (misère, intolérance, décadence) , et non telle qu'il voudrait qu'elle soit. En 1937, à Munich, Hitler inaugure l'exposition d'art dégénéré. Celle-ci regroupe plus de 600 œuvres d'artistes modernes (cubistes, expressionnistes, futuristes) , tous considérés comme dégénérés mentaux, et indignes de vivre. Le but est bien de les faire taire. En 1939, 5,000 œuvres sont brûlées par les Nazis. Durant la guerre, beaucoup d'artistes allemands fuiront leur pays afin d'échapper aux persécutions, et se réfugieront notamment aux États-Unis.

L'Allemagne se remet difficilement de la Première Guerre mondiale, et l'industrie cinématographique, pour des raisons économiques, a du mal à rivaliser avec les luxueuses productions américaines. Les réalisateurs des studios allemands compensent alors le manque de moyens en utilisant le symbolisme, et une mise-en-scène proche du théâtre. Ils sont également influencés par le regard des peintres expressionnistes sur la société. Les récits, dramatiques ou fantastiques, traitent souvent de sujets comme la folie ou d'autres troubles mentaux, la trahison ou le crime. Pour accentuer le sentiment d'angoisse et d'irréalisme, les décors aux formes simplifiées, privilégient les contrastes d'ombres et de lumières (souvent peintes directement sur les murs), les lignes obliques ainsi que les angles aigus. Les acteurs ont un jeu peu naturel, et leurs expressions sont très exagérées. De plus, un maquillage vient souvent accentuer les traits de leur visage et renforcer rides et ombres. Avec l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir et la Seconde Guerre mondiale, nombre de techniciens et cinéastes allemands fuirent vers les États-Unis et furent accueillis à bras ouverts par les studios. Beaucoup d'entre eux eurent une carrière florissante, et leur production influença le cinéma américain. 2 genres furent particulièrement concernés : le film policier et le film d'horreur durant les années '30 et '40. Même Walt Disney utilisera des ambiances expressionnistes dans ses dessins animés. Aujourd'hui encore, l'influence de l'expressionnisme est présente dans le cinéma.

Le terme « expressionnisme » se rattache à l'atmosphère de malaise et de révolte qui a précédé et suivi la Première Guerre mondiale et que les créateurs d'alors ont traduite par une esthétique violente et tourmentée.

Si, dans le domaine de la création plastique, on peut employer le mot « expressionnisme » pour désigner toute tendance à l'exagération expressive pouvant exister à toutes les époques et dans toutes les civilisations, au sens strict on l'emploie à propos d'un courant artistique qui s'est épanoui dans un champ chronologique plus restreint, et qui représente l'une des composantes majeures de l'art du XXe siècle.

Le mot « expressionniste » apparaît en 1911, lors de la XXIIe Exposition de la « Berliner Sezession », groupement d'artistes allemands d'avant-garde, pour qualifier un groupe de peintres français, composé d'anciens fauves et de Picasso. Il est ensuite repris pour désigner tout courant artistique novateur et moderne. En 1914 enfin, plusieurs peintres et sculpteurs allemands seront regroupés sous ce vocable : Erich Heckel, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Max Pechstein et Karl Schmidt-Rottluff, tous anciens membres du groupe « Die Brücke » (Le Pont) ; Vassili Kandinsky et Franz Marc, membres du « Blaue Reiter » (Le Cavalier bleu) ; et l'Autrichien Oskar Kokoschka.

Tous ces artistes pratiquent un art dans lequel se remarquent de nombreux traits communs : des empâtements marqués et des couleurs violentes, une vision de la réalité souvent déformée et exagérée, des sujets permettant la création d'une atmosphère pathétique et traduisant des sensations et des sentiments exacerbés.

De manière générale, l'expressionnisme, tel que le mot est employé dans l'entre-2-guerres, se définit plus par une attitude de l'artiste que par un style précis. Il s'agit pour celui-ci de chercher à communiquer au spectateur, par l'intermédiaire des couleurs et des lignes du tableau, la violence et la singularité d'une émotion. L'artiste expressionniste a le souci d'exprimer une conception du monde tourmentée et révoltée, et de partager avec le spectateur des sensations extrêmes et brutales.

La situation de la peinture en Allemagne, au début du XXe siècle, et une affinité particulière du génie germanique devaient faire de ce pays la terre d'élection de l'expressionnisme au tournant du siècle.

Max Liebermann (1847-1935) , Max Slevogt (1868-1932) , Lovis Corinth (1858-1925) empruntent encore alors à l'impressionnisme des effets, assez appuyés, de facture ; sous l'influence du courant d'idées symbolistes, la jeune génération rejette cet art souvent lourd et superficiel, et, malgré la caducité de ses formules, est davantage touchée par l'idéalisme postromantique de Hans von Marées (1837-1887) et d'Arnold Böcklin.

Le renouvellement de l'intérêt pour les traditions nationales, né avec le Romantisme, remet en faveur les peintres des XVe et XVIe siècle (Grünewald et, surtout, Dürer) comme les techniques anciennes de la gravure, en particulier sur bois, à laquelle Munch s'initie à Berlin, où il fait en 1892 une exposition retentissante.

Après celle de Munch, l'œuvre des novateurs français, Gauguin, Cézanne, Lautrec, et celle de Van Gogh, présentée à Berlin (1903) , à Munich (1904) , à Dresde (1905) , accélèrent l'évolution, au moment où le rêve édénique de Gauguin est l'aboutissement du vaste courant européen de retour à la nature (auquel le Romantisme allemand avait été fort sensible) et qu'illustrent notamment les artistes réunis à Worpswede (dans le nord de l'Allemagne, près de Brême) , à la fin du XIXe siècle.

C'est à Dresde que le groupe « Die Brücke » (1905-1913) , qui joint à la nostalgie de l'innocence primitive le goût de l'activité communautaire, fait la synthèse de ces éléments divers, où l'emportent nettement la tradition graphique médiévale ainsi que l'influence de la plastique africaine et océanienne, étudiée au musée ethnographique de Dresde.

Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Erich Heckel, Karl Schmidt-Rottluff, Max Pechstein, Otto Mueller pratiquent, les 3 lers surtout, un art d'où toute nuance est bannie au profit de stylisations abruptes, anguleuses, où les couleurs, disposées en aplats, s'accordent moins qu'elles ne se heurtent (Kirchner, « Femme au divan bleu » , 1910 ; Schmidt-Rottluff, « la Lecture » , 1911) .

Membre de « Die Brücke » , en 1906-1907, Emil Nolde apporte à l'expressionnisme, à partir de 1909, une dimension métaphysique (fort étrangère au paganisme érotique de « Die Brücke ») , où le sarcasme douloureux voisine avec la frénésie extatique, à l'aide d'un métier dru, d'une exécution tumultueuse (« Légende de Marie l'Égyptienne » , 1912) .

Transférée à Berlin en 1911, « Die Brücke » y rencontra un climat plus favorable qu'à Dresde et exposa dans la galerie ouverte par Herwarth Walden, directeur de la revue « Der Sturm » (fondée en 1910) . La notion d'expressionnisme s'élabore à ce moment, et « Der Sturm » en généralise l'emploi : le terme est appliqué à la présence du fauvisme français à la Sécession de Berlin et au « Sonderbund » de Düsseldorf dans un compte rendu de la revue « Die Kunst » .

En 1912 sont ainsi qualifiées d'expressionnistes 3 sélections, présentées par « Der Sturm » , d'œuvres très différentes : allemandes (« Der Blaue Reiter ») ; françaises (Braque, Derain, Friesz, Vlaminck) ; et belges (Ensor, Wouters) .

L'expressionnisme recouvre donc en Allemagne, à cette époque, les tendances nouvelles internationales.

L'équipe du « Blaue Reiter » (Kandinsky, Jawlensky, Marc, Macke, Campendonk) arrivant à notoriété à Berlin en même temps que « Die Brücke », et le goût personnel de Walden l'inclinant davantage vers l'intellectualisme poétique de Kandinsky et de ses amis, « Der Blaue Reiter » fut, pendant quelque temps, à la pointe du mouvement expressionniste. Mais il était sollicité par de tout autres formes que celles qui avaient donné à « Die Brücke » son impulsion : le cubisme français, le futurisme italien (exposé à « Der Sturm », en 1912), tandis que Kandinsky jetait, dès 1910-1911, les bases d'un art d'effusion pure, d'où la référence au visible était écartée.

C'est sur cette dernière voie que Marc, surtout, devait s'engager : son besoin de communion avec le monde le rapproche de « Die Brücke », mais il s'exprime désormais par l'intermédiaire de l'animal, non plus de l'être humain (« Chevreuils dans la forêt, II », 1913-1914).

Le visage humain est, au contraire, pour Jawlensky l'objet de multiples variations ; en quête d'une spiritualité toujours plus grande, il s'inspire de l'icône dans les tableaux antérieurs à 1914 (« Femme au chapeau bleu », 1912-1913).

À Vienne, le courant expressionniste part du symbolisme décoratif et graphique de Gustav Klimt, dont procèdent à leurs débuts Richard Gerstl (1883-1908), disparu trop tôt pour avoir pu donner sa mesure, Egon Schiele et Oskar Kokoschka.

Le Suisse Ferdinand Hodler, dont la Sécession viennoise montra un ensemble important en 1904, est également une des sources de l'expressionnisme autrichien, notamment de celui de Schiele, que caractérisent une exaspération graphique et une tension égocentrique et érotique rarement atteintes (« Figure féminine en noir », 1911). Collaborateur de « Der Sturm » dès 1910, Kokoschka fait preuve, en revanche, d'une réceptivité directe à autrui dans ses portraits psychologiques (1907-1914), où s'équilibrent les qualités du coloriste et du dessinateur (« Portrait d'Herwarth Walden », 1910).

La diffusion de l'expressionnisme sous les auspices de « Der Blaue Reiter », du cubisme et du futurisme, et favorisée par de grandes expositions (« Sonderbund » à Cologne, en 1912 ; le Salon d'automne allemand à Berlin, « Der Sturm », 1913), toucha des artistes d'une génération antérieure, comme Christian Rohlf (1849-1938), Corinth, ainsi que Wilhelm Morgner (1891-1917), Ludwig Meidner (1884-1966), fondateur à Berlin du groupe « Die Pathetiker », et Heinrich Nauen (1880-1940).

« Die Brücke » dut, en effet, autant à la conjoncture historique qu'à l'outrance de ses procédés de faire peu école, et ce sont plutôt ses artistes qui furent influencés par leurs contemporains. À cet égard, le fauvisme connut une situation analogue. Mais si l'emploi de la couleur pure, la simplification des formes, la référence fréquente à Van Gogh et le renouveau de la gravure sur bois en France comme en Allemagne justifient le rapprochement entre expressionnisme et fauvisme, ce dernier illustre le plus souvent un esprit beaucoup moins tourmenté, où le bonheur de peindre hérité de l'impressionnisme est encore fort sensible, quand les réussites de « Die Brücke », foncièrement hostile à l'impressionnisme, sont d'ordre graphique plus que pictural. Les fauves atteignent pourtant, par moments, à l'expressionnisme, en particulier Vlaminck (de très bonne heure : « Sur le zinc », 1900) et Van Dongen (« Danseuse borgne », 1905) ; de telles rencontres sont plus fortuites chez Matisse et Derain. Au début du XXe siècle, en marge du fauvisme, Rouault donne une version française originale de l'expressionnisme (un peu à la manière de Nolde, en Allemagne) avec des aquarelles d'une magistrale aisance, sur des thèmes religieux ou inspirées par le spectacle de la comédie et de la déchéance humaines (« Fille au miroir », 1906) .

La Première Guerre mondiale entraîna le déclin, puis la disparition de l'expressionnisme allemand tel qu'il s'était manifesté peu avant. Les réactions au conflit, désormais individuelles, engendrèrent de nouvelles cristallisations expressionnistes, chez Kirchner (« Autoportrait en soldat », 1915) ; chez Kokoschka (« Autoportrait », 1917) et ce recours à l'autoportrait trahit une prise de conscience douloureuse.

Mais d'autres artistes, qui devaient constituer après la guerre le courant de la « Neue Sachlichkeit » (Nouvelle Réalité ou Nouvelle Objectivité) , réalisent alors quelques œuvres où l'accent de revendication sociale et de révolte contre la guerre l'emporte nettement : « Hommage à Oscar Panizza » (1917-1918) de George Grosz, dans une esthétique très proche de celle du futurisme, mais où la ville et les masses qu'elle emprisonne se heurtent dans une atmosphère d'émeute et de rage impuissante ; « la Nuit » (1918-1919, Düsseldorf) où Max Beckmann, tout en empruntant aux retables des primitifs leur dessin dur, leur composition serrée et leur gesticulation véhémement, crée une œuvre d'un irréalisme fantastique sans précédent. C'est au contraire sur l'excès même de la description naturaliste que reposait l'effet de « la Tranchée » (1920-1923) , tableau disparu d'Otto Dix, atroce vision du carnage né du déferlement d'une haine aveugle et stupide. Après de telles prémisses, la « Neue Sachlichkeit » pouvait difficilement ne point se départir de l'objectivité qui était son ambition, et Beckmann, Grosz et Dix portèrent violemment témoignage contre la mentalité de l'après-guerre. En Allemagne, le post-expressionnisme restait fidèle à ses origines ; seul l'éclairage psychologique s'était modifié : à la réaction inquiète, spontanée de l'individu contre son destin se substituaient la satire des milieux, la protestation délibérée contre la coercition qu'ils exerçaient.

À partir de 1950 environ, l'inspiration issue des foyers traditionnels, désormais exsangue, va permettre à l'Amérique de prendre le relais par le biais de l'expressionnisme abstrait.

Celui-ci, selon Barbara Rose, est la conséquence de 2 catastrophes : la dépression économique des années 1930 et la Seconde Guerre mondiale. La Ire, qui toucha durement les artistes américains, vit, pour atténuer immédiatement ses effets, la création du « Federal Art Project » (1935-1943) , destiné à fournir du travail aux peintres en leur faisant décorer maints lieux publics (gares, écoles, aéroports) sous l'influence, au début du moins, des Mexicains (Rivera, Orozco) , qui avaient également travaillé aux États-Unis. Cette expérience donna aux Américains le goût des très grands formats, et cette notion d'échelle américaine (« American scale ») devint une référence essentielle de leur peinture. La Seconde Guerre mondiale contribua, d'autre part, à faire mieux connaître aux États-Unis, et particulièrement à New York, les tendances européennes contemporaines. Nombre d'artistes avaient cherché refuge à New York : Chagall, Léger, Grosz, Beckmann, Lyonel Feininger et le groupe surréaliste presque au complet (Breton, Dali, Ernst, Masson, Matta) .

La génération expressionniste américaine, menée par Jackson Pollock et Willem De Kooning, arrivés respectivement à New York en 1929 et en 1926, médita 2 leçons apparemment contraires : celle de Picasso, dont la verve lui paraissait mieux convenir à l'expression du sentiment moderne que l'abstraction géométrique de Mondrian, lui aussi réfugié à New York ; celle du surréalisme (auquel Picasso avait d'ailleurs apporté une éloquente contribution) pour son aspect expérimental et technique, sous le signe de la spontanéité « automatique » qui caractérisait les activités du groupe. Max Ernst, sans doute, révéla à New York le procédé du « dripping », dans lequel la couleur s'égoutte de boîtes de conserve perforées sur la toile. Enfin, l'espace ouvert des tableaux surréalistes (Miró, Matta, Tanguy) pouvait accueillir plus librement des expériences techniques nouvelles et réaliser la synthèse, toujours difficile, entre l'imagination et l'expression. Les derniers tableaux d'Arshile Gorky peuvent ainsi se situer à la charnière du surréalisme et de l'expressionnisme abstrait (« Le foie est la crête du coq », 1944) .

Soutenu par Peggy Guggenheim, Jackson Pollock allait incarner au plus haut degré l'expressionnisme américain. Il s'essaya dès 1941-1942 au « dripping », mit au point le procédé du « all-over » (toute la surface de la toile recouverte de peinture pour suggérer la continuité de la création) et travailla debout, ses immenses formats posés sur le sol. Une telle disposition exigeait une mobilité constante à laquelle tout le corps (et plus seulement le bras et la main comme naguère) participe : d'où le terme d'action painting, que l'on doit au critique d'art Harold Rosenberg. Les foisonnants lacs de couleur de Pollock restituent au niveau de la toile une émotion brute ; çà et là émergent parfois des repères figuratifs (têtes, membres) , auxquels l'artiste allait revenir de façon plus explicite dès 1951 (« Number 27 ») .

À l'exception de l'utilisation du terme par Herwarth Walden dans son magazine polémique « Der Sturm », en 1912, le terme expressionnisme est généralement lié à des peintures et des œuvres graphiques en Allemagne, au tournant du siècle, qui conteste les traditions académiques, notamment par les groupes « Die Brücke » et « Der Blaue Reiter » . Le philosophe Friedrich Nietzsche a joué un rôle important dans l'expressionnisme moderne originairement en clarifiant et en servant de conduit pour les courants jusqu'alors négligés dans l'art antique.

Dans « la Naissance de la tragédie », Nietzsche a présenté sa théorie du dualisme ancien entre 2 types d'expérience esthétique, à savoir l'apollinien et le dionysiaque ; un dualisme entre le plastique l'art de la sculpture, du rêve inspiration lyrique, de l'identité, ordre, de régularité, et le repos calme, et, d'autre part, la non-plastique art de la musique, de l'ivresse, l'oubli, le chaos et la dissolution extatique de l'identité dans le collectif. L'analogie avec le monde des dieux grecs caractérise la relation entre ces 2 extrêmes : 2 filleuls, incompatibles et pourtant inséparables. Selon Nietzsche, 2 éléments sont présents dans toute œuvre d'art.

Habituellement, le terme se réfère à l'art qui exprime une émotion intense. On peut dire que tous les artistes sont expressifs, mais il y a une longue ligne de production artistique dans laquelle l'accent est mis sur la communication par l'émotion. Un type d'art se produit souvent pendant le temps de bouleversements sociaux, et par la tradition de l'art graphique il y a un dossier fort et remuant du chaos en Europe du 15e siècle sur la Réforme protestante, de la Guerre des paysans allemands, de la Guerre de 8 ans, l'occupation espagnole aux Pays-Bas, le viol, le pillage et les catastrophes associées à des périodes innombrables du chaos et de l'oppression sont présentés dans les documents de l'imprimeur. Souvent, le travail est peu impressionnant esthétiquement, mais presque sans exception a la capacité de transporter le spectateur vers des émotions fortes en utilisant le drame et souvent l'horreur des scènes représentées.

Le terme a également été utilisé par l'historien d'art tchèque Antonín Matejcek, en 1910, comme le contraire de l'impressionnisme :

« Une volonté expressionniste, surtout, de s'exprimer ... (un rejet expressionniste) la perception immédiate et s'appuie sur des structures psychiques plus complexes ... Impressions et images mentales qui traversent l'âme mentale des peuples à travers un filtre qui les débarrasse de toute accumulation substantielle et sont assimilés et se condensent en des formes plus générales, dans les types, qu'il transcrit par de simples formules à la main et des symboles. »

Le groupe « Der Blaue Reiter » a été fondé par un certain nombre d'émigrés russes, y compris Wassily Kandinsky, Marianne von Werefkin, Alexej von Jawlensky, et d'autres artistes natifs allemands, comme Franz Marc, August Macke et Gabriele Münter. « Der Blaue Reiter » a été un mouvement artistique durable, de 1911 à 1914, fondamentale à l'expressionnisme, avec « Die Brücke » qui a été fondé la décennie précédente, en 1905.

Wassily Kandinsky, Franz Marc, Alexej von Jawlensky, Marianne von Werefkin, August Macke, Gabriele Münter, Lyonel Feininger, Albert Bloch et d'autres ont fondé le groupe en réponse au rejet de la peinture « Jugement Dernier » de Kandinsky à l'exposition. « Der Blaue Reiter » a manqué un manifeste artistique central, mais a été centré autour de Kandinsky et Marc. Paul Klee était également impliqué.

Le nom du mouvement est le titre d'un tableau que Kandinsky a créé, en 1903, mais on ne sait pas si il est à l'origine du nom du mouvement en tant que tel puisque le professeur Klaus Lankheit a découvert que le titre de la peinture avait été changé. Kandinsky a écrit, 20 années plus tard, que le nom est dérivé de l'attachement de Marc pour les chevaux et l'amour de Kandinsky pour les coureurs, combinés à leur amour commun de la couleur bleue. Pour Kandinsky, le bleu est la couleur de la spiritualité : le plus sombre est le bleu, le plus cela éveille le désir de l'homme pour l'éternité.

Ils croyaient à la promotion de l'art moderne, la connexion entre l'art visuel et la musique ; le spirituel et les associations symboliques de la couleur et une approche intuitive et spontanée de la peinture. Les membres sont intéressés par l'art européen médiéval et le primitivisme, ainsi que par la scène de l'art non figuratif et contemporain en France. À la suite de leurs rencontres avec les cubistes, fauves et des idées « Rayonist », les artistes du « Der Blaue Reiter » ont muté vers l'abstraction.

« Der Blaue Reiter » a organisé des expositions, en 1911 et 1912, partout en Allemagne. Les membres de « Der Blaue Reiter » ont également publié un almanach proposant de l'art contemporain, primitif et folk, dont des peintures d'enfants. En 1913, « Der Blaue Reiter » a exposé dans le 1er « Herbstsalon » allemand.

Le groupe « Der Blaue Reiter » a été perturbé par le déclenchement de la Première Guerre mondiale, en 1914. Franz Marc et August Macke ont été tués au combat. Wassily Kandinsky, Marianne von Werefkin et Alexej von Jawlensky ont été contraints de revenir vers la Russie, en raison de leur nationalité russe. Il y avait aussi des divergences d'opinion au sein du groupe. Conséquemment, « Der Blaue Reiter » a été de courte durée, d'une durée de 3 ans seulement, de 1911 à 1914.

Les membres fondateurs de « Die Brücke » étaient Fritz Bleyl, Erich Heckel, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner et Karl Schmidt-Rottluff. Plus tard, les membres ont été Emil Nolde, Max Pechstein et Otto Mueller. Le groupe d'artistes a eu un impact majeur sur l'évolution de l'art moderne au XXe siècle et sur la création de l'expressionnisme.

Les membres fondateurs du « Die Brücke », en 1905, étaient 4 étudiants en architecture du « Jugendstil » : Fritz Bleyl, Erich Heckel, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner et Karl Schmidt-Rottluff. Ils se sont rencontrés grâce à la « Hochschule Königliche Technische » de Dresde, où Kirchner et Bleyl ont commencé à étudier en 1901 et sont devenus des amis proches dès leur 1er mandat. Kirchner a poursuivi des études à Munich, en 1903-1904, et sera de retour à Dresde, en 1905, pour compléter ses études. L'institution a fourni un large éventail d'études en plus de l'architecture, tels que des dessins à main levée, des dessins en perspective et l'étude historique de l'art.

Ils ont répondu à la fois aux artistes du passé comme Albrecht Dürer, Matthias Grünewald et Lucas Cranach l'Ancien, ainsi qu'aux mouvements d'avant-garde contemporains internationaux.

Dans le cadre de l'affirmation de leur patrimoine national, ils ont redonné vie à des médias plus anciens, notamment les gravures sur bois. Le groupe « Die Brücke » a développé un style commun basé sur des couleurs vives, la tension émotionnelle, des images violentes et une influence du primitivisme. Après s'être d'abord concentré exclusivement sur la matière urbaine, le groupe s'aventure dans le sud de l'Allemagne en expéditions organisées par Mueller et produit plus des nus et des images arcadienne. Ils ont inventé la technique de gravure appelée linogravure, même si, dans un premier temps, « Die Brücke » a décrit ces gravures sur bois comme étant traditionnelles, ce qu'ils faisaient également.

Les membres du groupe se sont d'abord isolés dans un quartier ouvrier de Dresde, visant ainsi à rejeter leurs propres milieux bourgeois. Erich Heckel a pu obtenir une boucherie vide sur la « Berlinerstraße », à Friedrichstadt, pour que le groupe « Die Brücke » l'utilise comme studio. Bleyl décrit le studio comme étant : celui d'un bohème, pleine de peintures situées un peu partout, des dessins, des livres et du matériel d'artiste, beaucoup plus comme un logement romantique d'un artiste qu'une maison d'un étudiant bien organisé en architecture.

Kirchner est devenu un lieu qui a renversé les conventions sociales pour permettre des rencontres sans lendemain et de la nudité fréquente. Des sessions de dessins de groupes utilisant des modèles du cercle social, plutôt que des professionnels eurent lieu. Les peintres du « Die Brücke » choisissaient des poses d'un quart d'heure pour encourager la spontanéité. Bleyl décrit un modèle du genre, « Isabella », une fille de 15 ans du quartier, comme une personne très vive, au corps admirable, joyeuse, sans aucune déformation provoquée par la mode ridicule du corset et tout à fait adapté à nos exigences artistiques, en particulier dans son épanouissement des seins de jeune fille.

Le groupe « Die Brücke » a composé un manifeste (portant surtout sur le travail de Kirchner) , qui a été sculpté sur bois et présentait une nouvelle génération, qui veulent la liberté dans notre travail et dans nos vies, l'indépendance des anciennes forces en place.

Emil Nolde et Max Pechstein ont rejoint le groupe « Die Brücke » , en 1906. Bleyl, marié en 1907, avait comme souci de soutenir sa famille et a quitté le groupe « Die Brücke » . Otto Mueller a rejoint « Die Brücke » , en 1910.

En 1911, Kirchner a déménagé à Berlin, où il fonda une école d'art privée, « MIUM Institut » , en collaboration avec Max Pechstein dans le but de promulguer l'enseignement moderne de la peinture. Ce ne fut pas un succès et l'école a fermé l'année suivante.

En 1913, Kirchner a écrit « Chronik der Brücke » (chronique « Brücke ») , ce qui a conduit à la fin du groupe.

Expression est le contraire d'impression. L'expressionnisme est un mouvement inverse, de l'intérieur vers l'extérieur : c'est le sujet qu'imprime sa marque sur l'objet. L'expressionnisme, mouvement culturel et artistique de la fin du XIXe siècle à 1925, fortement individualiste, où les artistes expriment leur émotion et leur subjectivité. Cette tendance artistique n'est cependant pas nouvelle dans l'histoire de l'art. Elle fait référence à des artistes comme Grünewald du Gothique tardif allemand, le Greco, Goya et des précurseurs comme Van Gogh, Gauguin, Ensor, Munch. Précisément, l'œuvre « Le Cri » d'Edvard Munch, de 1895, dans ses différentes versions picturales et graphiques, on pourrait la considérer le symbole de tout expressionnisme. Ce mouvement a eu une intensité particulière en Allemagne (« Die Brücke ») et en France (Fauvisme) , dans lequel ils se sont adhérents différents artistes avec des orientations radicalement diverses et des personnalités isolées, qui n'ont pas, contrairement aux autres avant-gardes historiques, rédigé des manifestes ni des lignes de développement communes.

La violence de la guerre et l'ouverture de nouveaux chemins artistiques ont marqué le déclin de l'expressionnisme aux alentours de la Ire décennie du XXe siècle. La Première guerre mondiale a soulevé la nécessité impérieuse de conjuguer l'expérimentation dans l'art comme un engagement politique très marqué : l'expressionnisme prend les traits d'une violente dénonciation politique et décide de représenter les vices de la société contemporaine, dénonçant son échec. L'expressionnisme a été victime du Nazisme, avec l'exposition « Art dégénéré » (1937) dans un but dénigrant et de censure. Toutefois, les principes expressionnistes ont profondément influencé non seulement les arts visuels, mais aussi la danse, la musique (Schœnberg) , le théâtre (Brecht) , le cinéma (Lang) , l'architecture (Taut) , la sculpture (Barlach) et la littérature (Scheler) .

En 1905, Heckel, Schmidt-Rottluff et Kirchner fondent à Dresde le groupe « Die Brücke » (Le Pont) , rejoints ensuite par Nolde, Pechstein, Müller. Ils diffusèrent leur art dans la revue « Der Sturm », créée en 1910, en réaction contre la société urbaine dont ils dénoncèrent la corruption et la dureté dans leurs toiles ou leurs gravures (Kirchner, « Rue à Dresde »), ils peignirent également la nature, qui devient une mythologie, l'illustration d'un nouveau monde qui serait à créer (Schmidt-Rottluff, « Le soleil dans les pins », 1913). Leur touche est large, leur gamme chromatique se compose de couleurs outrées, les compositions sont simplifiées, l'angoisse s'exprime dans leurs gravures. Les tendances expressionnistes seront reprises par « Der Blaue Reiter », créé en 1911 à Munich, par Kandinsky et Marc.

Ernst Ludwig Kirchner (1880-1938) comme les autres fondateurs du « Die Brücke », était étudiant en architecture à Dresde. Il se passionne pour les arts figuratifs à travers son intérêt pour la peinture et la gravure du début du XVI^e siècle allemand (Lucas Cranach, Albrecht Dürer), les estampes japonaises, la sculpture africaine, et les peintres modernes comme Munch, Gauguin et Van Gogh ; il est frappé par l'immédiateté de leur expression, fondée sur la linéarité et l'accentuation anti naturaliste des couleurs, à teneur symbolique et psychologique. Kirchner est peut-être le représentant le plus explicite et cohérent de mouvement expressionniste allemand.

Malgré son intégration au groupe, Kirchner était principalement un solitaire. Il vécut sous une constante tension mentale, provoquée par la déception de ses espérances dans la Première Guerre mondiale, les années d'après-guerre et la terreur nazie, sombrant dans des profondes crises nerveuses. Pour finir, la maladie et la désespérance ont porté Kirchner au suicide, en 1938.

Oskar Kokoschka (1886-1980) est introduit dans les cercles culturels radicaux par son ami, l'architecte Adolf Loos. Son admiration pour Munch, pour les fauves et pour les peintres du « Die Brücke » situent son travail dans le cadre de l'expressionnisme. Bien que n'adhérant pas officiellement au programme du groupe « Die Brücke », les œuvres de Kokoschka expriment une force et une pénétration psychologique ; une violence chromatique réellement expressionniste. « La Fiancée du vent » (« Die Windsbraut »), terme allemand qui signifie tourbillon ou ouragan est un hommage à Alma Mahler, épouse du compositeur Gustav Mahler, dont leurs brèves et tourmentés amours lui ont inspiré cette œuvre : un homme et une femme dont le portrait est celui de la belle et intelligente Alma, gisent emportés par un tourbillon, témoignage aussi des catastrophes menaçantes de cette époque. Comme dans l'art Romantique, l'amour et la mort apparaissent ici comme des frères, mais le message caché n'est pas mort et transfiguration, sinon horreur et condamnation.

Dans les années 1920, la peinture de Kokoschka s'éloigne progressivement de l'expressionnisme pour privilégier le traitement pictural de grands espaces (paysages et vues de villes). Il se consacre parallèlement à la réalisation de décors et de costumes de théâtre.

Egon Schiele (1890-1918) peintre autrichien, il suscite l'admiration de Gustave Klimt, qui lui procure des nombreuses commandes. Attentif à la leçon des expressionnistes (Kubin, Gerstl, Kokoschka), Schiele se tourne très rapidement vers une peinture qui représente la réalité crue de l'homme saisi dans son conflit exacerbé entre la vie et la mort. Des tableaux tels « l'Autoportrait » aux doigts écartés tout en représentant la frontalité des peintures de Klimt réduisent l'espace à une sorte de vide tragique. Plus qu'à la couleur, Schiele confie l'expression de son angoisse à une ligne coupante, d'une netteté toute gothique, particulièrement efficace dans ses très nombreuses aquarelles et dans ses dessins d'une tension hallucinée. Il s'installe à la campagne et épouse, en 1915, Edith Harms : le mariage lui procure une sérénité inattendue, qui modifie son inspiration. Une force de composition émerge des peintures de cette nouvelle phase, notamment dans « Edith la femme de l'artiste ». En 1918, à la Sécession de Vienne, une grande rétrospective lui assure, à la veille de sa mort, un succès tardif.

Les dessins de Schiele expriment avec une grande intensité la désespérance, la passion, la solitude et l'érotisme ; la souffrance qu'implique la sexualité, les aspects obscurs des relations homme et femme, comme Sigmund Freud les décrit dans son œuvre. La nue sexualité de ses figures féminines l'a converti en un artiste controversé et nombre de ses dessins ont été confisqués ou brûlés ; en 1912, Schiele fut emprisonné pendant une longue période.

An award winning film about the most widely seen art exhibition ever assembled, « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) , commissioned by Adolf Hitler as an attack on modern art and artists. The documentary is based on the Los Angeles County Museum of Art exhibition (1990-1991) where the Nazi show was recreated. The film, incorporates footage of the original exhibition, reminiscences by visitors to « Entartete Kunst » , and commentary by critics and historians.

The film explores how the Nazis defamed and vilified avant-garde artists in Germany, during the 1930's, culminating in the infamous art show called « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) .

This is a documentary from 1993 written, produced, and directed by David Grubin about the art exhibit under the Nazi regime of what they considered to be the most corrupting and corrosive examples of what they called « Entartete Kunst » or Degenerate Art. The exhibit, which opened in July of 1937, was meant to be laughed at and despised. I ran across it, in a class on Modernism and Post-Modernism.

Degenerate Art opens with a view of the historic « Altes Museum » in Berlin that's as visually arresting as it is supremely ironic.

Between the columns of the grand neo-Classical facade, banners bearing the portraits of the most talented German artists of this Century hang majestically. These are the artists Adolf Hitler tried to destroy by renouncing as Degenerate.

Last summer, the persecuted artists were back in Berlin, in symbolic triumph, represented by some of the paintings and sculptures that Hitler banned, more than 55 years ago. The exhibition of their work finally closed the book on Hitler's determined campaign to destroy modern art and to remake German culture in his own image.

Before he became the charismatic « Führer », Hitler fancied himself an artist. He tried to enroll at the Academy of Visual Arts in Vienna, but his application was rejected.

The rejection must have wounded him deeply, because 35 years later, when he was the absolute ruler of Germany, Hitler got even. He ordered thousands of avant-garde artworks removed from German museums and closed the modern art wing of the national gallery in Berlin.

And then, he did something even more remarkable. He ordered that an exhibition of confiscated work, which he called Degenerate Art, be organized so that Germans could see for themselves how the people that Hitler hated (and wanted them to hate) had corrupted their glorious Nordic culture.

Degenerate Art turned-out to be the most popular art exhibition of all time. More than 3 million people saw it during a tour of 13 German and Austrian cities. Most of them agreed with Hitler that the art produced by Jews, Bolsheviks and anyone else who offended his pedestrian bourgeois taste was rubbish.

Well, history has proved that 3 million Teutons and one failed painter could be dead wrong. The art that Hitler trashed has survived, and the reputations of the vilified artists have flourished.

The story of Hitler's vigorous campaign to suppress modern art, music, literature and theatre was first told in 1991 through an exhibition organized by the Los Angeles County Museum of Art that traveled to Berlin. Now, Degenerate Art has become an hour long television program, produced by David Grubin Productions Inc. in cooperation with the museum and narrated by David McCullough.

Television handles this intriguing, multi faceted story very well, perhaps because it's less about aesthetic issues than about cultural history and the dynamics of authoritarianism. You don't need to know much art history to appreciate what the Nazis were trying to accomplish, or the irony of their ultimate failure.

Their goal was fundamental, to crush dissent of all kinds. They were trying to homogenize Germany by promulgating rosy cheeked Teutonic romanticism as a cultural ideal. Expressionist painters, who represented the darker, more violent side of human nature, were not welcome.

Today, we might wonder why the Nazis attacked modern art with such determination. The artists didn't wield any political authority, and it's evident from the public response to the original Degenerate Art show that the masses didn't understand what the artists were trying to say.

So, why did the Nazis not only reject modern art but try to defile it ? We can only assume that Hitler, whose abilities as a painter didn't rise above the picturesque, considered all forms of modern art a personal insult.

Degenerate Art recreates the war on culture through period movie footage intercut with comments by several Germans and one American who saw the original exhibition in Munich, in 1937, by cultural and art historians, and by relatives of several artists whose works were confiscated.

Art critic Robert Hughes periodically tosses a pungent observation into the pot. For instance, he observes at one point that the 1937 show of proscribed art was really a kind of show trial, at which the artists were not only to be found guilty of crimes against German culture but also humiliated and hounded into silence.

The tactic succeeded in several notable cases. Max Beckmann, perhaps the pre-eminent German artist of this Century, fled to exile in Holland, and eventually came to the United States. After his paintings were banned, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner committed suicide.

And then, there was poor Emil Nolde, who joined the Nazi Party years before Hitler came to power in the misguided belief that he would be spared from persecution. He wasn't. Eventually, the Nazis prohibited him from painting. But Nolde was so committed to art that he switched to working in watercolors so that the smell of oil paints and turpentine wouldn't betray him to the police.

Besides featuring the art that Hitler despised and snippets of the 1937 exhibition, Degenerate Art shows us the Nazi response : a new museum called the House of German Art, where the government mounted exhibitions of the Art Deco kitsch, as Hughes describes it, that typified Hitler's taste.

And, in a segment that might be called the art critic's nightmare, Karla Eckert, who was a reporter for a Nazi newspaper, describes the dilemma she faced in covering the 1937 exhibition.

« I loved the show » , she recalls, « but what could I do ? » She and a colleague agonized « for hours » , then decided that the only safe and honourable course would be to describe exactly what they had seen, without comment.

Wisely, Degenerate Art doesn't spend any time moralizing about Hitler's folly ; the lessons to be drawn from it are by now abundantly obvious. Nor does it seek to draw parallels with recent events involving the American government, individual artists and grants to arts organizations. To have done so would confuse both issues.

The program closes as it opened, with a slow pan across the portrait banners on the « Altes Museum » facade, where Beckmann's glowering visage stands as the perfect symbol of modern art's determined resistance to Hitler's aggressive philistinism.

Degenerate Art is about the most widely seen art exhibit ever assembled : « Entartete Kunst » (Degenerate Art) , was commissioned by Hitler as an attack on modern artists. The original exhibition was a sensation ; drawing more than 3 million visitors, between 1937 and 1941, and resulting in the banning and destruction of work by many important German artists. 650 paintings, sculptures, prints and drawings were confiscated from museum collections and brought together for ridicule and defamation. The film, shot on location in Berlin, Los Angeles and Washington, includes interviews with the sons of Otto Dix and the widow of Oskar Kokoschka, as well as critics and historians. The film features archival footage, some of it never seen before, of the original exhibition and of artists in their studios.

Los Angeles County Museum of Art curator Stephanie Barron served as executive producer of the special, together with 5 time Emmy winner David Grubin, who also wrote and directed. The program is based on Barron's widely acclaimed recreation and analysis of Hitler's notorious exhibition « Degenerate Art : The Fate of the Avant-Garde in Nazi Germany » , which was the highlight of LACMA's 1991 season.

The museum show, which had been in the works since the mid 1980's, galvanized attention. Its opening had coincided with furious debates over government censorship in the United States, as politically motivated battles raged about the National Endowment for the Arts.

Given the show's critical and popular success, 2 more venues were hastily added to its tour. After a planned stop in Chicago, it went on to sites in Washington and Berlin.

Among the program's most interesting features is a series of interviews with visitors to the original 1937 exhibition, who returned to the « Altes Museum » for the LACMA show. Their eyewitness accounts are often riveting, as much for the poignant shadow of the nearly incomprehensible magnitude of the crushing events through which they lived as for the specific anecdotes they have to tell.

Josephine Knapp, an American art historian, was on a Rockefeller Foundation fellowship in Europe, in 1937, and almost accidentally found herself in Munich. Titus Felixmuller is the son of artist Conrad Felixmuller, whose work was mocked and condemned along with paintings, sculptures and prints by Marc Chagall, Emil Nolde, Oskar Kokoschka, Max Beckmann, Ernst Kirchner and dozens more.

Karla Eckert had the odious task of promoting the exhibition in the official Nazi newspaper. German student Kurt Assis was sent to see the show when it traveled to Berlin.

Peter Günther, a German expatriate and professor emeritus of art history at the University of Houston, saw it in Munich, where he also walked across the park to see Hitler's concurrent exhibition of governmentally sanctioned German art. The stark disparity between the shows, one of reviled Modernists and the other of Hitler's fondness for an art of treacle and bombast, would form the polarities of American critic Clement Greenberg's enormously influential 1939 essay, « Avant-Garde and Kitsch » .

The 2nd highlight of the program is its reckoning with Hitler himself, with his taste and canny understanding of cultural manipulation. The Austrian born dictator had been a painter in his youth, which partially explains his subsequent vehemence with regard to the political uses of art and his appointment of Josef Goebbels as cultural propagandist. His own failure to be successful as an artist heightened his resentment against German Modernists, whose work had been heartily accepted into State-funded museum collections.

In the numerous examples of his work that are shown, Hitler's æsthetic sense turns-out to be revealing. His paintings are bright, cheerful, starkly idealized images of the people and the land of a cheerful peasant mother and her baby in a veiled masquerade as the « Madonna and Child » ; or, a triumphant landscape, meant as a pæan to the glories of the fatherland.

In 1991, curator Stephanie Barron organized L.A. County Museum of Art's Degenerate Art exhibit, which was a partial remounting of a 1937 Munich exhibition (blessed by Hitler) as an example what's wrong with modern art. Producer and director David Grubin has brought an extraordinary TV documentary out of the exhibit and from archival films of the original showing. The documentary itself is a work of TV art.

In the skillfully assembled filmed segments, viewers see both the newness and the ugliness of the original anti- avant-garde exhibit. It was haphazardly mounted as a sign of the scorn Nazis held for the controversial works.

That 1st exhibit toured Germany for several years to enthusiastic response ; modern art had been effectively blotted-out in Nazi Germany.

The documentary has witnesses who were there in 1937, art historians, art critic Robert Hughes, and relatives of banned artists, to help fill in the remarkable story.

The government, having pulled some 1,600 suspect works of art from German and Austrian museums, selected 650 of them to be shown as representatives of what the Nazis decided was dangerous art.

Grubin explains that non-representational art threatened the 3rd « Reich » politically, morally, socially and artistically.

The earlier book burnings signaled the closing down of literary freedom ; the exhibition (which opened in Munich the day after the new, coldly impressive House of German Art opened) was Hitler's way of notifying the art world that Berlin, a 1920's art leader, was now following orders.

Samples of Hitler's own paintings have a sentimental, postcard dullness to them and are reflected in the works of approved artists represented in the German art hall.

Fascinating clips from the opening day at the hall, with Hitler attending, display startlingly bland, stiff heroic works with most of the figures nude and expressionless. The artists' names, if known, aren't mentioned.

Not all of the pieces from the degenerate artists exhibit were in the 1991 show (Barron and her team managed to gather together about a quarter of the earlier show) and not all are Masterworks by a long shot.

But Kirchner, Kokoschka, Beckmann and Nolde (a Nazi himself) are represented by particularly powerful, evocative works, and several unidentified pieces remain fresh and intriguing.

Inevitably, the exhibits in 1937 and 1991 of expressionistic art warn about censorship, of State decisions about what's good for the people and what influences people for good or bad.

Thomas Mann is quoted at the end of the documentary about there being no good Germans, no bad Germans, only Germans.

The documentary is a strong statement.

« The history of Hitler's war against modern art is sandwiched between black and white footage of the original Degenerate Art exhibition, in 1937, and color footage of the 1991 reconstructed display in this concisely edited documentary. Clocking in at only 55 minutes, the film establishes the future dictator's failed attempt at a career in traditional painting and his contempt for the success of modern art. It tracks World War I's effect on both Germany's art community and its economy, paralleling « Der Führer » 's rise to power. Eyewitnesses and scholars describe the 1937 graffiti strewn side-show of a presentation meant to humiliate and thus destroy the artists. After the riveting stories of careers ruined, work destroyed in order to avoid concentration camps, and Hitler's seemingly contradictory fascination with nudes, viewers are left to mull on their own any connection with today's continued efforts to restrict art in the name of societal preservation. » (Kimberly Heinrichs)

« This is a riveting PBS documentary by David Grubin, acclaimed director of many “ American Experience ” films. This one is about the National-Socialist effort to stomp out modern art in Germany 1933-1945. Liberal use of archival film combined with close-up views of the paintings themselves as well as knowledgeable interviews add-up to a spellbinding primer on how modernism is a threat to totalitarianism. You think you may not like some of this art either, but the fascinating explanations and historical context will change your mind. As the critic Robert Hughes points-out in the film, the attempt by the Nazis to censor grotesque art (and regiment culture) could have resulted in the grotesque horrors displayed in the concentration camps at the end of the War. If you are at all interested in culture wars or the relationship between art and politics you must see this. »

« This is a superb presentation of one of the lesser-known aspects of the 3rd “ Reich ”. The blockbuster degenerate art show in Germany, in 1936, is detailed with actual footage from the original show along with excellent footage from the recent hanging of all the surviving work from that show back in Berlin. The documentary very effectively details the history of the German Expressionists and Hitler's collision course with their work and it puts the work into the perspective of Hitler's House of German Art, the invasion of Poland, and most importantly the liberation of the camps and the burial of the typhoid dead. Its presentation of book burning in Nazi Germany and the connection to the burning of people is profound. »

Berlin's Free University has an Internet database (in German only) documenting the fate of more than 21,000 artworks condemned as degenerate by the Nazis and seized from German museums, in 1937. The website, the result of 8 years of research by art historians at the university, includes works by Franz Marc, Emil Nolde, Otto Dix, Marc Chagall, Max Beckmann, Wassily Kandinsky and Ernst Ludwig Kirchner. It gives details of the museums they were seized from and their current location, in cases where it is known and where the work wasn't destroyed.

Hitler et le pouvoir de l'esthétique

Hitler and the Power of Æsthetics

Frederick Spotts. « Hitler and the Power of Æsthetics » , Overlook Press, Hutchison (2003) ; 456 pages.

Article by Morton P. Levitt . « Journal of Modern Literature » , Volume 26, Number 3/4, Temple University (Summer 2003) ; pages 175-178.

Frederick Spotts' surprising thesis is encapsulated in his title : « Hitler and the Power of Æsthetics » , not, as we might expect of his subject, the Æsthetics of Power. True, he does discuss early on (in a chapter entitled « The Artful Leader ») the stagecraft with which the Nazis attracted Depression-era Germans to their mass marches and assemblies. But his central concerns involve æsthetics for their own sake, both as a demonstration of the dictator's unlimited power and as its justification. Hitler, as Spotts presents him, had goals and employed means which even the most caustic observer can recognize as æsthetic. He may have been delusional, about art as about so much else, but about art, at least, he was neither hypocritical nor obviously insane (even if the results of his policies may in themselves appear mad) . The documentary record, as Spotts presents it, including many primary sources of letters and journals and a large body of often telling illustrations, is very clear on Hitler's seriousness, even dedication, to art as he understood it. Spotts's consistent theme that Hitler saw himself, at least that he claimed repeatedly over the years of his dictatorship that he saw himself principally as an artist, should convince the most skeptical of readers. Hitler and the Power of Æsthetics is filled with such surprises and ironies.

This is not to say that Hitler's taste was good ; it was conventional, old fashioned, utterly unoriginal. It was also consistent in painting, in music, especially in architecture, in all of which fields he regarded himself as an expert and to all of which he devoted inordinate resources of time, energy, and money, even when affairs of State would seem to indicate that he should neglect æsthetics for the moment and concentrate on power. Instead, as his Empire crumbled around him, Hitler turned increasingly to his art projects, not only for solace, it seems, but as if they were the true purpose of his Empire. To be sure, he similarly regarded himself as a military expert, but the occasional mad genius which may have characterized his career as a military strategist was absent entirely from his aesthetic obsessions. As pedestrian as these may have been in quality, however, in sheer volume (in the amount of money spent, objects purchased, and artists supported) they may well have made Hitler the greatest art patron in history. He had once maintained he could imagine nothing finer than to be a cultural philanthropist (page 257) .

There are other, equally stunning surprises here as well. This Hitler is often opposed to using art for propagandistic purposes : our obvious expectations aside, he was not directly involved in the infamous « Degenerate Art » exhibition merely a passive figure in its origin and development and not the evil genius behind it (page 163) ; and it was Richard Wagner's music that he loved and not the myth-making. As Spotts puts it :

« It has sometimes been assumed that Hitler was attracted to Wagner's works because of the plots, with their Classic conflict between the outsider and a rigid social order, their lonely heroes and dark villains, their Nordic myths and Germanic legends. However, there is no record of any comment on how he interpreted the works or whether he saw in them any ideological message much less whether he envisaged himself as Lohengrin, Siegmund, Siegfried, Wotan or any other Wagnerian character. It was the music that moved him. » (page 236.)

His financial and moral support for the Bayreuth Wagner Festival was so complete, often against the wishes of Nazi Party officials, as to make it « the only cultural institution in the 3rd “ Reich ” independent of Nazi control » (page 258) . A mediocre painter himself, as several photographs of his work make clear, Hitler saw himself as an artist above all, regarding and employing art much as Plato does in « The Republic » . His career proves the dangers of mixing art and politics : more accurately, the dangers of ...

In his 1938 essay, « Brüder Hitler » , Thomas Mann felt obliged to recognize that Hitler was, in some real sense, an artist and, in a well-known aphorism, Walter Benjamin said that Fascism aestheticizes politics. These 2 insights form a starting-point for Frederic Spotts's remarkable new book. You may qualify « artist » with « would-be » or « talentless » , or you may say, as Spotts does, that « Hitler's problem (in a way, his tragedy) was that he confused aesthetic drive with aesthetic talent » . But there's no escaping the central role that art played in his life, and in the political drama of National-Socialism.

It would scarcely be exaggerating to call the 3rd « Reich » one vast performance, epitomized by the awe-inspiring if spine-chilling Nuremberg rallies, those epic « son et lumière » shows with their immense choreography - what Josef Goebbels called : « a “ via triumphalis ” of living bodies » . They were more than the usual circuses that tyrannies provide for the masses. As Spotts says, their ultimate purpose « was to fill a void at the centre of National-Socialism ... unlike Marxism, it offered little that was concrete enough to get hold of. What Hitler provided was ritual in place of belief, or ritual as belief » . The form was the content ; the medium was the message.

Behind this ritual stood a failed artist who had been rejected twice by the Academy in Vienna, a rejection easily explained by the pictures Spotts reproduces (asked once how good Mao's poems were, the great Sinologist Arthur Waley replied : « Let's say they're better than Hitler's paintings but not as good as Winston Churchill's ») . But this only inflamed the overwhelming sense of grievance that ran through his life.

Failure and resentment informed his æsthetic outlook and his loathing of Modernism related also to his hatred of the Jews and of Communism, although the pet phrase « culture-Bolshevism » to damn experimental art was ironical in view of the startlingly brutal and retrograde cultural regime which Joseph Stalin was imposing in Russia.

Not that there was anything new in an enthusiasm for « healthy » and « positive » art, or the belief that :

« Art which merely portrays misery is a sin against the German people. » (Kaiser Wilhelm II's words, not Hitler's.)

But the Nazis took it much further. Spotts also dissects the internal politics of the ruling gang to find that the « degenerate » campaign was in part a manœuvre against the « closet Modernist » Gœbbels by his rivals.

Much of the « Reich » 's official art was mere « kitsch » , and its architecture was vulgarly and oppressively grandiose, endless monuments to the fallen and, in Hitler's morbid doodlings, still huger monuments to those who would one day die for the fatherland. The only admirable and even beautiful products of the regime shown in the fascinating and copious illustrations were purely functional, like « autobahn » bridges. And yet, National-Socialism was alarmingly art-conscious.

Hitler apart, many of his entourage had nurtured creative aspirations : Josef Gœbbels the published novelist ; Alfred Rosenberg the architecture student and would-be philosopher ; Baldur von Schirach who wrote poetry and patronized music ; Hans Frank an aspiring poet.

Creative aspirations did not, of course, mean creativity. Hitler banned art-criticism on the grounds (with which some artists might sympathize) that « the stupid must not criticize the clever » ; his reign was, in some ways, the revenge of the mediocre on the original.

He adored Richard Wagner, made Bayreuth into a shrine of the « New Order » , and spent his happiest times there with the Wagner family. Party officials compelled to sit through interminable evenings in the « Festspielhaus » may have deserved everything they got, but one may feel a flicker of pity for the factory workers rewarded, and the War-wounded rehabilitated, by being sent to « Tannhäuser » .

If the artistic yearnings of all those Nazi poets and painters « manqués » cast a bleak light on the redemptive power of art, or any idea that the sublime and the beautiful will make us better people, there is another bleak side to the story in the behaviour of the German « arts community » , especially musicians. Some went into exile, either involuntarily or because they would not serve the regime, but far more did not. There were musicians who divorced

Jewish spouses to keep their jobs, while great names like Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner and Wilhelm Furtwängler chose to endorse the regime.

It may be thought that the Germans had never properly understood what the « Ring » actually teaches about hubristic power-worship and the annihilation of love. As it was, « the final and most curious aspect of Hitler's Wagnermania » was that, after Stalingrad, he couldn't bear to listen to that music any more, and turned to Franz Lehár for consolation.

Meantime concerts of high-standard continued, until what Spotts calls the most grotesque episode in musical history. On April 13, 1945, the Berlin Philharmonic played Bruckner's 4th, as a recognized sign that the 3rd « Reich » was reaching its own last bars. At the exits, members of the « Hitler Youth » handed-out free cyanide capsules. Unimaginable wickedness and horror ended to the sound of sublime music.

Hitler's taste underwent several significant changes. During most of his life, Bruckner held little appeal. Heinrich Hoffmann did not so much as mention the composer's name when once identifying Hitler's favourites. Even after becoming Chancellor, Albert Speer noted, his interest « newer seemed very marked » .

The composer had, however, symbolic importance to him, both as a « home-town boy » and as a rival to Johannes Brahms, so beloved in Vienna. It was a fixed part of the Nuremberg rallies for the cultural session to open with a movement of one of his Symphonies. In June 1937, he was famously photographed paying his respects to the composer, standing in mute homage before a monument at « Walhalla hall of fame » , near Regensburg, as Siegmund von Hausegger and the Munich Philharmonic played the magnificent Adagio of the 7th Symphony.

Why Hitler staged that event is not known. Speculation has ranged from the theory that it was intended as a cultural precursor of the annexation of Austria (« Anschluß ») the following year, to the notion that it was out of nostalgia for his « beautiful time as a choir-boy » and Lambach Abbey - with its Bruckner associations. Undoubtedly, Hitler felt a personal kinship. Both had come from small Austrian towns, grew-up in modest circumstance, had fathers who died at an early age, were autodidacts, and made their way in life despite great obstacle. On a number of occasions, he contrasted the Austrian Catholic Bruckner, whom the Vienna shunned, to the north German Protestant Brahms, whom they idolized. Then, suddenly, in 1940, he developed a passion for Bruckner's Symphonies. He even began mentioning him in the same breath with Richard Wagner. « He told me » , Gœbbels noted in his diary, « that it was only now during the War, that he had learned to like him at all. The enthusiasm steadily grew. By 1942, he placed Bruckner on a level with Beethoven, and categorized the farmer's 7th Symphony as « one of the most splendid manifestations of German musical creativity, the equivalent of Beethoven's 9th » . His feelings about Bruckner, the man and the composer, are best conveyed by a remark he made after listening to a recording of the 1st movement of the 7th at his military headquarters, in January 1942 :

« Those are pure popular melodies from Upper-Austria, nothing taken-over literally but “ Ländler ” and so on that know from my youth. What the man made-out of this primitive material ! In this case, it was a priest who deserves well for having supported a great Master. The Bishop of Linz sat for hours, alone in the cathedral, when Bruckner, the greatest organist of his time, played the organ. One can imagine how difficult it was for a small peasant lad when he went to Vienna, that urbanized, debauched society. A remark by him about Brahms, which a newspaper recently carried, brought him closer to me : Brahms' music is quite lovely, but he preferred his own. That is the healthy self-confidence of a peasant who is modest but, when it came down to it, knew how to promote a cause when it was his own. That critic Hanslick made his life in Vienna hell. But when he could no longer be ignored, he was given honours and awards. But what could he do with those ? It was his creative activity that should have been made easier.

Brahms was praised in the heavens by Jewry, a creature of salons, a theatrical figure with his flowing beard and hair and his hands raised above the keyboard. Bruckner, on the other hand, a shrunken little man, would perhaps have been too shy even to play in such society. »

From then on, Hitler did everything possible to promote Bruckner and to enlist him in his vendetta against Vienna. Saint-Florian, where the composer's career had begun, was to be turned into a pilgrimage site in the manner of Bayreuth. « He wants to establish a new cultural centre here » , Gœbbels noted. « Simply as a counter-weight to Vienna, which must gradually be shoved aside. He intends to renovate Saint-Florian at his own expense. » Accordingly, Hitler financed a centre of Bruckner studies there, had the famous organ repaired and augmented the composer's library.

He even designed a monument in his honour to stand in Linz, and endowed a « Bruckner Orchestra » which he was determined to make one of the world's best. The publication of the Robert Haas edition of the composer's original score was subsidized from his own funds. And he dreamed of constructing a bell-tower in Linz with a carillon that would play a theme from the 4th Symphony.

(Frederick Spotts. « Hitler and the Power of Æsthetics »)

...

Adolf Hitler, qui a échoué à devenir un artiste, ne s'est pas pour autant détourné du monde de l'art. Grand amateur de peintures et essentiellement passionné d'architecture, il a encouragé un art dit nazi, au style néo-Classique et teinté de mégalomanie.

L'arrivée d'Adolf Hitler au pouvoir marque brutalement la fin de la diversité culturelle qu'avait apportée la République de Weimar pour l'Allemagne.

Hitler qui se prenait pour un artiste, avait fixé les principes qui devaient régir l'art national-socialiste.

Dans « Mein Kampf » , il écrit :

« Un artiste qui peint l'herbe en bleu est un menteur. »

Avec des visions de cet ordre, l'art ne risquait pas d'évoluer. Les canons de l'art étaient fixés une fois pour toutes, et ne devaient en aucun cas être changés.

De nombreux auto-dafés ont lieu. Les livres de Marx, Freud, Einstein, Brecht, Gide et autres auteurs célèbres qu'ils soient juifs, communistes ou différents de la pensée dominante, finissent brûlés en place publique. La culture est prise en main : la presse écrite est mise sous contrôle par le Parti nazi, qui choisit même les films qui passent au cinéma. La propagande passe par des moyens de communication qui ont pour seul but de mettre en avant l'idéologie hitlérienne. Les Jeux olympiques d'été de 1936 seront instrumentalisés pour conforter l'image de marque du régime hitlérien sur la scène internationale.

Les ouvrages scolaires vont être « assainis ». Pour ne pas céder à la disparition d'une certaine culture, on attribue aux écrits de bon nombre de romanciers ou poètes la mention « auteur inconnu de langue allemande » .

En 1933, Josef Goebbels crée la « Reichskulturkammer » (Chambre de la culture du « Reich ») , véritable cellule de censure médiatique, est une organisation corporatiste des métiers de la culture, pour promouvoir l'art « aryen » selon les idéaux du Parti national-socialiste. Pour publier une œuvre, quelle qu'elle soit, il fallait appartenir à la Chambre compétente. Le début de la non-liberté artistique est en marche.

L'art dégénéré (« Entartete kunst ») , était le genre qui permettait au régime nazi d'interdire l'art moderne pour mieux conserver l'art Classique. L'art Classique symbolisait la pureté de la race tandis que les peintres modernes contournaient la norme définie par le 3e « Reich » . Les artistes qui soutenaient les idées d'Hitler et du Nazisme produisaient de l'art racial pur, alors que les artistes modernes qui, pour eux, étaient une race inférieure, créaient des tableaux considérés comme dégénérés.

Fut qualifiée d'art dégénéré toute œuvre ne correspondant pas aux critères esthétiques, et idéologiques, des Nazis. En principe, tout art moderne était condamné par le « Reich » . De nombreuses rafles s'effectuèrent dans les différents musées allemands. On estime à près de 5,000 le nombre d'œuvres, peintures, sculpture ou dessin détruit sur ordre de Goebbels, à la veille de la guerre.

En 1935, le gouvernement organisa une exposition d'art dégénéré à Nuremberg. Cette même année, furent promulguées les Ires lois anti-juives. Coïncidence consternante pour un art aussi appelé « judéo-bolchévique » .

En 1937, fut organisée, à la Maison de l'art allemand de Munich, une nouvelle exposition d'art dégénéré.

Les Nazis firent exposer des œuvres d'handicapés mentaux ainsi que des dessins d'enfants au milieu d'œuvres d'artistes connus tels Otto Dix, Max Ernst ou encore Marc Chagall, dans le but de démontrer l'aspect malsain et impur de cet art moderne. À côté de chaque œuvre, des commentaires méprisants suscitaient l'opprobre du public : il s'agissait ou bien de citations d'artiste tronquées et isolées de leur contexte afin de les rendre choquantes ; ou bien de diatribes du « Führer » ou d'autres membres éminents du Parti. Ils conspuaient alors le « snobisme » des intellectuels de Weimar qui avaient mordu à l'appât de ce que les Nazis appelaient la « juiverie internationale et bolchévique » et qui avaient élevé au rang d'œuvres d'art les productions bâtarde de véritables « malades mentaux » - d'où l'appellation « arts dégénérés » .

Cette exposition eut un gros succès, il fallait que cette exposition ridiculise les peintres et sculpteurs d'avant-garde, et par la même occasion, permette au public de trouver des arguments contre l'Art Moderne. Cubisme, Dadaïsme, Expressionnisme, Futurisme, Impressionnisme, Abstrait, ... les nazis fermèrent les portes à tous ces courants, mais pas seulement pour des raisons esthétiques.

Néanmoins, il a existé un art interdit, un art rebel. L'existence de cet art prouve qu'il y eut une faille dans le système de contrôle artistique du régime.

Face à l'exposition des « Arts dégénérés » , le citoyen allemand était convié à apprécier, dans un autre pavillon, l'exposition des « Arts allemands » .

Le régime hitlérien a saturé d'idéologie les images les plus familières. Il a récupéré tous les styles consacrés antérieurement au modernisme pour les ré-actualiser pompeusement sur le mode du gigantisme, ce qui flattait les prétentions Impériales du régime.

La culture officielle se sclérosa sur des formes traditionnelles vidées de leur sens :

Sculptures néo-Grecques et néo-Romaines (où la femme est réduite aux attributs de la maternité avec une insistance particulière sur la largeur des hanches et la générosité des seins ; l'homme étant invariablement représenté en athlète de gymnase) .

Style néo-Baroque, en architecture avec une débauche « Kitsch » de moulures et dorures.

Style néo-Moyen-âgeux en lithographie où les gravures les plus célèbres d'Albrecht Dürer et Lucas Cranach servirent de faire-valoir au « Führer » .

Réactionnaire par essence, « la culture Nazie » se positionna en s'opposant à toute innovation. Cette épuration des arts provoqua l'exil des plus grands créateurs et ne rencontra pas de résistance dans la population.

L'art officiel, s'inspire du Classicisme, et reste à l'opposé de l'art dégénéré. Il rejette toute forme de modernité, et s'appuie sur l'Académisme passé.

Les sculpteurs officiels du « Reich » , produisent des œuvres de nus, souvent des sculptures à sujets mythologiques. Des guerriers et des athlètes, pour les hommes : fiers, droits, corps musclés brandissant des armes ; des déesses à corps parfait, des nymphes pour les femmes, aux chevilles étroites et allongées et aux seins ronds et bien mesurés. Ces sculpteurs n'innoveront pas, et imiteront les grands Maîtres du Classicisme, ils diront que la seule beauté artistique se trouve dans l'art passé.

Les peintres officiels, se bornent au réalisme et au néo-Classicisme, sans jamais rien d'un tant soit peu moderne dans leurs œuvres.

Cet art largement encouragé par le régime nazi, est désigné comme étant le modèle de l'art pur, de l'art aryen. Cet art officiel n'a pas que des raisons d'esthétiques ou de goûts artistiques : il est un art de propagande qui manifeste les différents aspects de l'idéologie nazie, de la pureté de la race aryenne, de la virilité des hommes ainsi que son soutien au régime.

« La famille de paysans de Kahlenberg », la toile d'Adolf Wissel, en est un exemple flagrant : on peut y trouver la future doctrine qu'adoptera le régime de Vichy de Pétain, « Travail, Famille, Patrie ». En effet, cette toile représente une famille allemande presque au complet avec la mère s'occupant de la plus petite fille, le petit garçon blond aux yeux jouant sagement avec un jouet de bois, la plus grande des filles, travaillant consciencieusement sur ses devoirs, la grand-mère brodant un vêtement pour l'un des enfants, et le père, digne et propre sur lui, supervisant le tout. L'absence du grand-père, sûrement mort lors de la Grande Guerre, pourrait servir, au besoin, à rappeler un épisode douloureux et à raviver la haine et l'esprit de vengeance des Allemands.

On voit ici clairement apparaître un intérêt tout autre que celui du souci de l'esthétisme.

La « Reichskulturkammer » dirigée par Josef Gœbbels encourage vivement les artistes à exalter les valeurs de la race allemande. Toute œuvre d'art dénonçant le bolchévisme, les Juifs, ou n'importe quelle opposition au régime, est la bienvenue pour Hitler et ses partisans.

Toutes les peintures et sculptures ont un message normatif, qui peut être résumé en : l'aryen pur doit être beau, grand, fort et surtout, patriotique.

On peut dire, que l'art officiel nazi, bien plus qu'un art de propagande et qu'un art esthétique, servait de modèle pour les partisans d'une Allemagne nazie. Il montrait la voie à suivre voulue par le régime, ainsi que les écarts à ne pas commettre. C'était, une espèce de manuel pour bien apprendre à rester dans les rangs du « Reich », et qui laisse entrevoir combien il dangereux d'en sortir.

Dans de telles conditions, de nombreux artistes quittèrent l'Allemagne nazie, non seulement parce qu'ils avaient des craintes pour leur vie, mais aussi en signe d'opposition au régime nazi.

Selon l'idéologie nazie, le peuple allemand était le « 1er peuple musicien de la terre », Richard Wagner son héros, et Anton Bruckner son prophète. Pour implanter leur théorie, les Nazis ont détourné la pensée musicale des compositeurs du passé, et ré-écrit l'histoire.

Les théoriciens de l'antisémitisme ont revisité le passé allemand, tentant d'en séparer le bon grain aryen de l'ivraie juive, et ce, dès Georg Friedrich Händel dont ils changent les paroles des Oratorios, parlant du peuple juif. Il faut ré-écrire l'histoire de la musique allemande et autrichienne, pour « laver les souillures » .

La 9e Symphonie de Beethoven devient la référence de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et de son directeur musical Wilhem Furtwängler, architecte empressé de ce nouvel ordre musical nazi.

Franz Liszt, devient allemand et non plus hongrois.

Richard Wagner avec l'aide de sa famille (notamment sa fille, devenue proche d'Hitler) est sur-exploité.

Felix Mendelssohn, de par son origine juive, fut une des victimes préférées des théoriciens de l'antisémitisme musical malgré sa conversion au christianisme. Sa statue à Leipzig fut détruite, la rue qui portait son nom fut re-baptisée du nom d'Anton Bruckner et, enfin, un grand concours fut organisé pour recomposer son « Songe d'une nuit d'été » dans une version aryenne.

Dès 1933, les programmes de musique classique à la radio sont contrôlés. Mendelssohn est pratiquement interdit de diffusion. Dans les défilés, les manifestations et célébrations officielles ou à la radio, c'est Wagner que l'on entend le plus.

La musique dégénérée (« Entartete musik ») était ainsi qualifiée par les Nazis, entre 1933 et 1945, pour toute musique qui ne correspondait pas aux normes de l'art officiel. « Une musique qui a perdu les qualités habituelles de son genre, de sa race » , loin de l'idéal aryen, de la race supérieure.

Ils appelaient « musique dégénérée » , la musique des années '30, qui allait de la musique atonale au jazz conçu comme une musique afro-américaine, toute la musique de musiciens aux origines juives, ou encore toute la musique prolétarienne qui emprunte au jazz nombre de ses procédés.

L'idée de décadence, de dégénérescence, d'empoisonnement de la pureté des origines prédomine l'esprit nazi. La musique dégénérée est présentée comme une catégorie haïe où le régime nazi range toute la musique qui lui semble éloignée de sa propre vision de la musique, ou de sa vision du monde.

La conception du monde national-socialiste se fonde sur l'idée du sang, de la race, du peuple, et sur l'idée d'un État totalitaire. Et comme l'avait écrit Hitler dans « Mein Kampf » :

« Les Juifs étaient incapables de manier la musique et le verbe. »

En 1938, se tient à Düsseldorf l' « Exposition Musique Dégénérée » .

C'est le pendant musical de l'Exposition de Munich : les musiciens de jazz, de musique atonale (donc de musique moderne) dont beaucoup sont juifs ou communistes vont être, à leur tour, assimilés à des « dégénérés » et leur musique sera interdite.

Le projet « Linz », est celui d'Hitler de construire un gigantesque musée d'art dans la ville de sa jeunesse.

On sait qu'Hitler était amateur d'art, qu'il voulait faire une carrière artistique, mais qu'il fut refusé à l'entrée de l'École des Beaux-arts de Vienne. On sait aussi qu'il doubla son intérêt pour la peinture par une passion pour l'architecture.

L'histoire du Musée de Linz commence vraiment avec l'« Anschluß ». La persécution des Juifs qui accompagna l'entrée des troupes allemandes et la main-mise nazie sur le pays conduisit au vol de nombreuses œuvres d'art appartenant à des collectionneurs juifs. Il fallait décider du devenir de ces œuvres, qui rejoignirent celles déjà confisquées en Allemagne après la « Nuit de Cristal » et entreposées dans le « Führerbau » de Munich. L'un des autres facteurs qui donna l'idée à Hitler de construire le musée fut sa visite du Musée des Offices de Florence, en mai 1938. Il fut étonné devant la richesse des collections de cette ville de province et demanda si l'équivalent existait en Allemagne. On le dirigea alors vers la « Gemäldegalerie » de Dresde (Musée d'art des Collections nationales), qu'il visita 1 mois plus tard. Jusqu'à sa fin, Hitler restera très attentif à l'évolution de son projet et s'investira personnellement à de nombreuses reprises. À Dresde, c'est Hans Posse, le directeur de la galerie des peintures depuis 1910, qui le conseillera et le guidera dans ce projet.

En fait, Hans Posse avait été le constructeur du Musée, celui qui avait fait de la galerie une institution d'envergure internationale. Or, à cette période précise, Posse, en désaccord avec la direction des musées de la ville, fut renvoyé de son poste. Hitler non seulement exigea sa ré-intégration immédiate, mais le nomma directeur du futur Musée de Linz. À partir de ce moment-là, Posse se consacra avec attention à la constitution des collections. Il le fit de façon cohérente en sélectionnant des œuvres d'importance dans le butin, de plus en plus conséquent, des pillages nazis à travers toute l'Europe. Il était, pour cela, en concurrence avec d'autres services nazis, ceux d'Alfred Rosenberg et ceux de Hermann Göring (mais aussi avec les dirigeants nazis viennois, inquiets de voir l'émergence d'un pôle culturel concurrent dans leur pays) et il lui fallut souvent se battre pour obtenir les œuvres qu'il voulait, malgré le droit de préemption que s'était accordé Hitler. Pendant ce temps, les juristes allemands trouvaient des habillages légaux à ce qui n'était qu'un pillage systématique des collections juives. Posse disposait aussi de fortes sommes d'argent, de diverses origines, pour acheter des œuvres qui passaient dans les galeries et salles des ventes allemandes ou étrangères (aux Pays-Bas, en particulier) mais ces œuvres se retrouvaient aussi souvent sur le marché parce que leurs propriétaires juifs s'étaient vus contraints de les vendre pour obtenir un peu d'argent face à la persécution économique.

Alfred Rosenberg était l'un des intellectuels les plus influents du Parti nazi. La guerre a grandement facilité ses activités, car elle a permis le pillage organisé des bibliothèques juives, collections d'art, et autres actifs dans les pays envahis par la « Wehrmacht ». Fondé en octobre 1940, son « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (Groupe de travail de la « Reichsleiter Rosenberg ») devient l'organisation nazie qui rencontre le plus de succès dans le pillage de l'art.

À la fin de la guerre, le Groupe de travail de la « Reichsleiter Rosenberg » avait expédié près de 1,5 million d'œuvres d'art et d'objets de toute l'Europe vers le « Reich » .

Entre 1939 et 1941, l'architecte Roderick Fick, sous la houlette d'Albert Speer, dessina les plans de l'immense Musée, dont l'achèvement était prévu pour 1950. Dès juin 1941, le « Führerbau » de Munich se révéla trop petit pour accueillir les tableaux sélectionnés. Hans Posse tomba malade et mourut le 8 décembre 1942. Goebbels fit son éloge lors de son enterrement à Dresde, auquel Hitler en personne assista. Il y avait, à ce moment-là déjà, 2,470 œuvres prêtes à être exposées.

Le successeur de Posse fut Hermann Voß, le directeur du Musée d'art de Wiesbaden. Voß n'était pas un Nazi mais il fut tout de même nommé, probablement parce que Göring pensait pouvoir le contrôler plus facilement. Il put s'entourer d'un plus grand nombre de collaborateurs, qui travaillaient à constituer les autres collections du musée, de monnaies et d'armes en particulier. À partir de l'été 1943, devant la menace des raids aériens alliés, les collections du futur Musée furent peu à peu envoyées en lieu sûr, dans des musées de province, des châteaux, puis des mines de sel, où elles rejoignirent celles des grands musées allemands. Les Soviétiques pillèrent systématiquement tous les dépôts qu'ils trouvaient dans leur avancée vers l'Ouest. Pour les Américains, ce fut moins clair : des consultations entre alliés occidentaux avaient conduit à des déclarations de principe de restitution des œuvres d'art. Il y eut cependant des pillages, par des soldats et des officiers américains et français, mais aussi par des Allemands. Ce fut notamment le cas dans le « Führerbau » .

La collection a rassemblé jusqu'à 4,712 œuvres.

Les modalités de constitution de la collection du Musée de Linz ont déterminé celles des restitutions. Comme l'origine nationale des œuvres était connue, celles qui ont été retrouvées ont été restituées aux États, et avant tout, 37 % à la République fédérale d'Allemagne. Par contre, les vendeurs, souvent des marchands, ne se sont pas toujours précipités pour réclamer les œuvres rapatriées, pour des raisons compréhensibles. En France, par exemple, les musées nationaux ont hérité de 294 œuvres provenant de la collection de Linz, dont les propriétaires ne se sont pas manifestés ou n'ont pas été identifiés. C'est 50 % de l'ensemble des œuvres restituées au titre de la collection de Linz, qui se trouvent d'ailleurs aujourd'hui toujours dans les musées français, sous l'appellation « MNR » (Musées nationaux de récupération)

AB 109 : Le 3e « Reich » et la musique

Introduction

À Munich, en 1937, et à Düsseldorf l'année suivante, des manifestations officielles (journées musicales du « Reich » , concert de l'Orchestre symphonique du « Reich » à l'usine « Schiess-de-Fries » , le 23 mai 1938, discours de politique musicale de Josef Goebbels à l' « Alten Tonhalle » , le 28 mai 1938 (Exposition « Entartete Musik ») , illustrent la conception manichéenne de l'art. Ces Expositions exaltent la fusion de l'être allemand dans la communauté nationale et populaire tout en fustigeant la modernité artistique du 1er tiers du XXe siècle. Les condamnations prononcées contre les formes d'art dites « dégénérées » donnent lieu à une édifiante théâtralisation. Ces « cabinets des horreurs » sont affublés de slogans diffamatoires désignant les « déraillements » des Modernes. Toute l'esthétique nazie est dès le départ, dans son « programme » même, « mise-au-pas ». Elle a pour objectif de mettre sous tutelle par l'image, la parole et le son toute forme d'expression qui doit uniquement servir les desseins du régime et appartenir au « corps ethnique » (« Volkskörper »), sans échappatoire possible et sans restriction aucune, à l'exclusion de toute forme non admise : « Dein Volk ist alles, du bist nichts. » (Ton ethnie est tout, toi tu n'es rien.) .

La scène champêtre des « Jeunes filles revenant des champs » est caractéristique du courant « Blut und Boden » (sang et sol) . La joie irradiant les visages exalte l'optimisme de rigueur dans un « Reich » ayant retrouvé sa pureté originelle.

L'affiche « l'Allemagne, pays de la musique » illustre le credo hitlérien associant la musique à l'Allemagne dans une communauté de destin. L'aigle symbolisant l'État allemand place l'orgue (l'instrument roi) sous son aile protectrice. Propos esthétique et projet politique ne font qu'un, l'art et la nation sont désormais indissociables. « Le 1er peuple musicien de la Terre » (Josef Gœbbels) est celui d'un « Reich » désormais millénaire.

La lithographie corrosive de George Grosz, « La bénédiction visible de Dieu est avec moi », épingle la bourgeoisie et les profiteurs de guerre. Cette scène de Noël souligne le contraste entre la prétendue harmonie familiale où l'on chante le traditionnel « Douce nuit, sainte nuit », et le quotidien douloureux de ces 1res années de la République de Weimar.

Le musicien représenté sur la couverture de la brochure signée Hans Severus Ziegler est inspiré de l'Opéra-jazz à succès « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Jonny mène la danse !) d'Ernst Křenek. Il illustre la « dégénérescence raciale » définie par les Nazis et l'idée selon laquelle « le Juif a du sang de nègre ». Quant au saxophone, il symbolise le jazz : musique « dégénérée » par excellence.

« Alte Tonhalle »

Im Jahre 1818 erfolgte das erste Niederrheinische Musikfest im Geisler'schen Lokal, das ab 1830 zum Zentrum der Musikliebhaber wurde. Es war eine Gaststätte mit großem Saal, die bereits vorher als Beckers Gartenlokal bekannt war. Im Geislerschen Saal lagen die Zuschauerzahlen im Jahre 1850 bei nahezu 1.000 Besuchern. Bekannte Komponisten wie Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Norbert Burgmüller und Robert Schumann musizierten dort. Im Jahre 1863 erwarb die Stadt das Lokal, das schon damals Tonhalle genannt wurde.

Die erste städtische Tonhalle wurde in zweijähriger Bauzeit erschaffen und im Jahre 1865 eröffnet. Sie befand sich am Flinger Steinweg, der heutigen Schadowstraße. Das Gebäude verfügte über einen großen Konzertsaal, den Kaisersaal, der 42,48 meter lang und 24,20 meter breit war. Mit zwei Galerien faßte dieser Raum 2.820 Personen. Der Saal, den eine gute Akustik auszeichnete, wurde nach Kaiser Wilhelm I. benannt, zu dessen Ehren von den Rheinischen Provinzialständen anlässlich seiner Visite am 18. September 1884 in der Tonhalle ein Festeßen gegeben wurde.

Im Jahre 1886 wurde ein Wettbewerb für einen Neubau ausgeschrieben, bei dem die Entwürfe der Architekten Hermann vom Endt und Bruno Schmitz im Stil der Neo-Renaissance ausgezeichnet wurden. Die Stadtbaumeister Eberhard Westhofen und Peiffhoven planten später auf der Grundlage dieser Neubaupläne eine Erweiterung, die von 1889 bis 1892 umgesetzt wurde. Der zentrale Eingangsbereich des Gebäudes wurde durch eine klassizistische Portikusanlage betont. Aus diesem Bausegment stammt eine Säule, die Helmut Hentrich als Erinnerung an den traditionsreichen Ort Düsseldorfer Musik und Festkultur im Malkastenpark aufstellen ließ. Der Kaisersaal und der Rittersaal blieben hierbei erhalten. 1901 wurden der Kaisersaal von dem Stadtbaurat Peiffhoven und dem Beigeordneten Johannes Radke mit neuer Stuckatur versehen. Den Rittersaal stattete in diesem Zuge die Firma Hemming & Witte mit Deckengemälden aus. Der Mittelteil der Hauptfassade zeigte vier Säulen, gekrönt von einem Dreiecksgiebel.

Der Gebäudekomplex war beim Ausbau bis an die Schadowstraße 91 vorgezogen worden. Der Bau umfaßte nun neben den übernommenen Konzertsälen auch neue Gesellschaftsräume, Ladenlokale und Restaurants. In dem Bau hielten die Düsseldorfer Karnevalsvereine ihre Sitzungen ab, der Künstlerverein Malkasten feierte hier seinen Maskenball. Neben den wöchentlichen Symphoniekonzerten, erfolgten dort auch Tagungen von Wirtschaftsverbänden, Vorträge, Wohltätigkeitsbasare und Karnevalsbälle. Auf einem « Kohlentag », den die Montanindustrie 1871 in der Tonhalle abhielt, rief William Thomas Mulvany den « Verein zur Wahrung der gemeinsamen wirtschaftlichen Interessen in Rheinland und Westfalen » ins Leben, womit ein Grundstein für die Entwicklung der wirtschaftlichen Interessenvertretung in Westdeutschland und für die Entwicklung Düsseldorfs zum « Schreibtisch des Ruhrgebiets » gelegt wurde.

Das Gebäude wurde 1942 durch Bomben beschädigt und später abgebrochen. An derselben Stelle befindet sich heute eine Niederlaßung der Warenhauskette Karstadt.

Mit dem Entstehen der bürgerlichen Musikkultur zu Beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts fanden sich in Düsseldorf musikbegeisterte Bürger zum Städtischen Musikverein zusammen und pflegten insbesondere die oratorische Musik. 1818 wurde die erste Tonhalle mit hervorragender Akustik an der Flinger Straße (heute Karstadt an der Ecke Schadowstraße / Tonhallenstraße) errichtet. 1863 entschloß sich die Stadt Düsseldorf die « Tonhalle » zu kaufen, um ihren Bürgern einen attraktiven und repräsentativen Konzertsaal zu geben. Ein Jahr später stellte die Stadt die bis dahin lose verpflichteten Musiker in ihren Dienst und gründete die Düsseldorfer Symphoniker. Damit war Düsseldorf nach Aachen die zweite deutsche Stadt, die ein festes Orchester hatte. Namen wie Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Gustav Mahler, Richard Wagner und Richard Strauß sind mit der Tonhalle und ihrem Orchester verbunden. Von 1880 bis 1892 wurde die Tonhalle unter dem gleichen Namen und am gleichen Ort neu errichtet ; der Kaisersaal bot 3.000 Sitzplätze und lieferte 1912 den Rahmen für die zweite Aufführung der 8. Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler.

Der Zweite Weltkrieg schien dieser Tradition ein Ende zu machen. 1942 wurde die alte Tonhalle durch Bomben zerstört. 1944 wurde das Orchester aufgelöst, die Musiker in kriegswichtige Betriebe geschickt. Nach dem Krieg wurde im Juli 1945 mit 45 Musikern der Konzertbetrieb wieder aufgenommen. Die Reihe der Generalmusikdirektoren, die seit 1945 den Symphonikern vorstanden, umfasst namhafte Dirigenten wie Eugen Szenkar, Jean Martinon, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos und mit der Spielzeit 2000-2001 Generalmusikdirektor John Fiore.

Die erste Tonhalle von 1818 bis zur Zerstörung zum Ende des zweiten Weltkrieges :

Jedem Düsseldorfer, der einen kulturellen und stadtgeschichtlichen Hintergrund hat, kommt bei Nennung des Gebäudenamens « Tonhalle Düsseldorf » Glanz in den Blick, Wehmut ins Herz und auch ein bisschen Stolz in die Brust.

Tonhalle Düsseldorf war für die Düsseldorfer über mehr als 150 Jahre Synonym für hochrangige Feste und große kulturelle Erlebnisse. Zu Beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts verließ man zu Fuß oder mit dem Pferdewagen durch das Flinger Tor die Stadt und kam nach Überwindung einiger Befestigungsanlagen über den Flinger Steinweg (die heutige Schadowstraße) in einen herrlichen Wald, in dem « Jansens Garten » lag, der für die Düsseldorfer eine hochbeliebte Vergnügungsstätte war.

Hier wurden die « Niederrheinischen Musikfeste » begründet, hier war die Wiege des Städtischen Musikvereins im Jahre 1818, hier wirkten Ferdinand Hiller, Julius Rietz, Ferdinand Ries, Robert Schumann und Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy hatten hier ihre künstlerische Heimstatt, Mendelssohns « Paulus » und Schumanns « Der Rose Pilgerfahrt », « Adventlied » und « Requiem für Mignon » wurden hier und andere uraufgeführt, Josef Joachim und Jenny Lind wirkten hier umjubelt an Konzerten mit. Franz Liszt, Johannes Brahms und viele große Künstler des 19. Jahrhunderts feierten hier große Erfolge.

1850 übernahm die Hofkonditorei Geisler die Säle und übergab sie 1863 in den Besitz der Stadt Düsseldorf. Von diesem Zeitpunkt an wurden die Säle vielfältig umgestaltet und dann nach langen Diskussionen im Stadtrat in den Jahren 1880 bis 1892 komplett neu errichtet. Die neuen Gebäude erhielten die alten Namen, es blieb bei « Tonhalle » Düsseldorf und bei den Namen für die Säle : Der Kaisersaal mit 3.000 Plätzen in Stuhlreihen und 1.000 Plätzen an Tischen, dem Rittersaal mit circa 1.000 Plätzen, dem Verbindungssaal und einer großen Vielzahl von repräsentativen Nebenräumen. Hier fand 1912 mit 1.000 Mitwirkenden kurz nach der Münchner Uraufführung in Deutschland die zweite Aufführung der 8. Symphonie von Gustav Mahler statt.

Orchestre symphonique de Düsseldorf

L'Orchestre symphonique de Düsseldorf a été fondé en 1818 à partir du « Städtischer Musikverein » . 2 grands compositeurs y ont occupé le poste de chef d'orchestre général : Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy et Robert Schumann. L'Orchestre symphonique joue au nouveau « Tonhalle » en tant qu'Orchestre de concert, et au « Deutsche Oper am Rhein » en tant qu'Orchestre de Théâtre. Mais il s'est également produit en Chine et au Japon.

...

The « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » is the Düsseldorf « Tonhalle » 's resident Orchestra. This means they form the core, driving force and artistic heart of one of Germany's leading concert halls. Their work in the « Tonhalle » and in the « Oper am Rhein » gives the « Symphoniker » an unusual profile which is all their own. On their regular concert tours (to Holland, Austria, the Czech Republic, Switzerland, Spain, China, and Japan) , the Orchestra carries Düsseldorf's reputation as a city of culture out into the world.

The « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » have a long tradition : right back in the 18th Century, internationally celebrated artists, among them Georg Friedrich Händel and Arcangelo Corelli, worked with the local Court Orchestra. When the Court ceased to exist, many of the musicians went to Mannheim, the seat of one of the leading Orchestras of the age. In fact, the « Mannheim School » formed the foundation of modern orchestral culture.

The year 1818 saw the formation in Düsseldorf of an association that still exists and was to become the cradle of the « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » : the « Städtische Musikverein zu Düsseldorf » is one of the world's oldest mixed concert choruses. With its unbroken tradition, it can look back on an impressive list of musical directors, of whom Mendelssohn and Schumann are today the best-known. It was in Düsseldorf that Robert Schumann had the only employment contract in his life. In 1864, the « Symphoniker » achieved autonomous status, becoming Germany's 2nd oldest Municipal Orchestra.

In the early 20th Century too, many great names in international music, including soloists Edwin Fischer, Elly Ney and Vladimir Horowitz, as well as conductors Richard Strauß and Jascha Horenstein, worked with the « Symphoniker » . During the Nazi period, they became one of the « “ Reich ” Orchestras » alongside the Berlin Philharmonic and the Linz « Bruckner » Orchestra. At the « Reich » Music Festivals, the « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » was responsible for premieres of compositions that followed the Party line - at a time when attempts were made to demonstrate not only the existence of « degenerate art » (« Entartete Kunst ») but also of « degenerate music » (« Entartete Musik ») . In 2014, to mark the Orchestra's sesquicentennial, the « Tonhalle » and the « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » will be approaching this topic, with the « music of totalitarianism » at the focus of concert planning.

Reconstruction post-1945 was in the hands of conductor Heinrich Hollreiser. He was succeeded as General Music Director by Eugen Szenkar, Jean Martinon, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, Henryk Czyz, Willem van Otterloo, Bernhard Klee, David Shallon, Salvador Mas Conde and John Fiore. Carlos Kleiber, Hans Wallat, Christian Thielemann and Fabio Luisi have conducted the Orchestra at Operatic performances. Since 2009, Andrey Boreyko, one of the leading conductors of his generation, has been « Generalmusikdirektor » of the « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » . The title « Schumann Guest of the “ Düsseldorf Symphoniker ” » is currently borne by the Swiss conductor Mario Venzago. To mark the Schumann bicentennial, in 2010, the composer's entire « œuvre » was performed in Düsseldorf by such artists as Christoph Eschenbach, Thomas Zehetmair, Daniel Barenboim, Paavo Järvi, Riccardo Chailly, Thomas Hampson, Rudolf Buchbinder, Midori, Helene Grimaud and Frank Peter Zimmermann. But the « Düsseldorf Symphoniker » were at the focus. For 2011, the Orchestra is taking on the vocal Symphonic works of Gustav Mahler. Performances with international big names such as Christiane Œlze, Thomas Quasthoff and Robert Dean Smith are covering the spectrum from the « Song of Lament » (« Das klagende Lied ») to the « Song of the Earth » (« Das Lied von der Erde ») .

Im Jahr 1912 hörte man im Kaisersaal mit 1.000 Mitwirkenden (kurz nach der Münchner Uraufführung) die zweite Aufführung der 8. Symphonie (« Symphonie der Tausend ») von Gustav Mahler.

In den Jahren 1938 und 1939 fanden hier die « Reichsmusiktage » statt. Ziel der damaligen Machthaber war es, Düsseldorf zur Reichsmusikhauptstadt zu küren. Aus diesem Anlass mußten die Tonhalle Düsseldorf und die Stadt auch die entwürdigende Ausstellung « Entartete Musik » ertragen.

Rückwärtige Seite der zerstörten Tonhalle Düsseldorf im zweiten Weltkrieg hatte die Pracht in einer Bombennacht des Jahres 1943 leider ein Ende, die Tonhalle wurde zerstört. In den Nachkriegsjahren stand die Kultur zunächst und auch verständlicherweise im Hintergrund. Der Kommerz erhielt die Oberhand bei den Stadtverordneten, was dazu führte, daß das Gelände der Tonhalle an einen Kaufhauskonzern verkauft wurde, der heute noch dort sein Filiale hat.

Figures du patrimoine

Le 1er volet de l'Exposition examine la question du patrimoine musical, de son assimilation par les représentants de l'avant-garde de Weimar, et le processus de récupération des grandes figures de l'histoire musicale dans le but de conforter la démarche idéologique du régime National-Socialiste.

Aux yeux de Josef Goebbels, Ministre de la Propagande, les grands Maîtres du passé incarnent la majesté du peuple allemand. La question de la place conférée à des compositeurs comme Bach, Beethoven, Wagner et Bruckner revêt, de ce point de vue, une importance cruciale.

Cette partie évoque l'ambiguïté d'un amour commun pour une même musique à laquelle Modernes et « officiels » attribuent une valeur différente. Ainsi, un monde sépare les sombres lithographies d'Oskar Kokoschka, hommage visuel à la cantate « O Ewigkeit, Du Donnerwort » de Bach, de l'hommage du peintre Edmund Steppes, « À Jean-Sébastien Bach », artiste reconnu et admiré par Adolf Hitler.

La photographie d'Hitler devant le buste de Bruckner au « Walhalla », réalisée le dimanche 6 juin 1937 montre le « Führer » saluant respectueusement le buste d'Anton Bruckner (réalisé par Adolf Rothenberger), icône du régime nazi. Le compositeur autrichien représente une figure récurrente dans les discours d'Hitler. Ce dernier se complaisait, en effet, dans une identification fondée sur une communauté du sol (« Boden ») d'autant plus fondamentale à ses yeux qu'il se sentait investi de la mission d'abolir la Monarchie Austro-Hongroise au profit d'un grand « Reich » unissant l'Allemagne et l'Autriche. Hitler célébrait également en lui l'humilité du petit paysan en proie à l'ingratitude de la société viennoise « corrompue ».

À partir de 1937, Arno Breker, nommé professeur à Berlin et fort de ses réalisations pour les jeux Olympiques de 1936, s'investit dans une mission de glorification de l'art allemand. Il termine son buste de Richard Wagner en 1939, après avoir conçu ses sculptures pour le « Zeppelinfeld » de Nuremberg et pour la cour de la Nouvelle Chancellerie à Berlin. Breker prête un profil titanesque et promothéen au compositeur, qui sera immortalisé par plusieurs sculptures, dont un marbre gigantesque installé dans le « Rosengarten » de Bayreuth. Hitler possédait lui-même un exemplaire du buste en bronze.

L'affiche-programme de la représentation de gala des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg », le 17 novembre 1935 à l'Opéra allemand de Berlin, célèbre la ré-ouverture solennelle du « Deutsches Opernhaus ». Cette nouvelle production est dominée par l'intendant Wilhelm Rode, à la fois interprète de Hans Sachs et metteur-en-scène. Benno von Arent, artiste choyé du régime, en signe les décors et les costumes.

La création contemporaine

À partir de l'étude d'un certain nombre de courants allemands ou étrangers antérieurs à l'avènement du Nazisme et rejetés par ce dernier (jazz, expressionnisme, musique atonale, musique légère) , il s'agit dans un second temps d'explicitier à travers l'idée de création moderne les présupposés théoriques et idéologiques ayant étayé leur condamnation en éclairant d'autres domaines artistiques, en particulier celui des arts plastiques. Les grandes figures fondatrices de la modernité (Arnold Schœnberg, Ferruccio Busoni, Hans Pfitzner, Franz Schreker, Ernst Křenek, Emil Nolde, Kurt Weill) sont évoquées, notamment en liaison avec l'évolution des différentes formes lyriques (monodrame, sketch, Opéra d'actualité, Opéra-jazz, Opéra-revue) .

La série d'auto-portraits d'Arnold Schœnberg est réalisée en 1910, seconde grande phase picturale après 1907 et contemporaine de la rédaction du Traité d'Harmonie. Ces œuvres de dimension réduite reflètent le monde intérieur d'un compositeur qui envisageait la peinture comme le prolongement de la composition, une possibilité d'exprimer ses émotions et ses idées, un autre moyen de « faire de la musique avec des couleurs et des formes » .

Bertolt Brecht et Kurt Weill, les 2 principaux artisans de l'avant-garde dramatique se rencontrent en 1927 et inaugurent leur collaboration par « Mahagonny-Songspiel » , un projet scénique destiné au Festival de Baden-Baden le 18 juillet 1927.

Ce projet des 2 artistes marque la volonté de rompre avec la tradition lyrique. Le propos expérimental (projections de Caspar Neher, caractère artisanal de la mise-en-scène, fusion des dimensions de la répétition et de la création) s'accompagne d'une déclaration anarchiste qui provoque un scandale parmi le public mondain du Festival.

« Les danseuses aux bougies » d'Emil Nolde se situe dans le prolongement de la période créatrice de l'artiste inaugurée en 1906 lorsqu'il rejoint le mouvement expressionniste « Die Brücke » (Le Pont) . Nolde décline le thème de la danse aussi bien en danse festive à travers des peintures de cabaret, qu'en danse sauvage, « seul résidu authentique de la nature originelle de l'homme » . Ici, les figures féminines semblent ployer et se tordre sous la douleur. L'usage de la gravure sur bois témoigne d'une inspiration puisée dans les arts d'Afrique et d'Océanie. Nolde, fasciné par l'art primitif, accompagne en 1913-1914 une mission ethnographique en Nouvelle-Guinée. Ce voyage renforce sa conception d'un art visant à retrouver ce qui caractérise la création de ces peuples : « l'expression intensive de la force et de la vie dans les formes les plus élémentaires » .

À ces propositions avant-gardistes condamnées par le régime nazi s'opposent les productions restauratrices de Richard Strauß, Werner Egek et Carl Orff, marquées par le primat de la mélodie, la dimension du populaire germanique et le rituel médiéval.

Ainsi, le projet de décor pour « le Violon enchanté » de Werner Egk cultive un réalisme populaire prisé dans les milieux nationalistes, et que les décors imaginés par Fritz Mahnke mettent particulièrement en valeur.

Musique et résistance

Cette 3e partie s'attache à retracer, au-delà d'un propos manichéen, l'ambiguïté de réactions individuelles ou collectives face au Nazisme : s'exiler et survivre, résister et mourir.

En 1933, de nombreux artistes fuient l'Allemagne nazie, d'autres créateurs restés sur le sol allemand sont frappés d'interdit. Ils s'opposent alors au régime en se réfugiant dans un exil intérieur. Ainsi, bien que membre de l'Académie prussienne des Arts, Emil Nolde est stigmatisé dans l'Exposition « Entartete Kunst » (art dégénéré) de 1937. Ses œuvres sont retirées des musées. C'est dans la clandestinité qu'il continue à peindre ces œuvres de petit format appartenant à une série d'aquarelles intitulées « Images non peintes », terme signifiant qu'elles servaient d'ébauche à de grandes peintures à l'huile censées être réalisées une fois libre. Le chant qui émane de l'aquarelle « Drei Sanger » (3 chanteurs) s'apparente à un cri d'angoisse, et renvoie au peintre du poète norvégien Edvard Munch. La bouche et les yeux des personnages ne sont plus que des cavités béantes et sombres composant des visages cadavériques. À mi-chemin entre la révolte et l'agonie, ce chant tragique s'érige en témoignage de la condition humaine sous la dictature.

À l'écart de la vie musicale officielle, le pouvoir s'attache à régler la question juive, focalisation d'Adolf Hitler dans « Mein Kampf ». De 1933 à 1941, le régime décide d'isoler les membres de la communauté juive au sein d'une Alliance culturelle qui développe une importante vie musicale censurée par l'État. Privés de toute légitimité professionnelle par les nouvelles lois raciales, ses membres doivent s'organiser de manière militante pour survivre. La politique du « ghetto » s'amplifie en 1941, quand la ville-forteresse de « Terezin » (« Theresienstadt ») est utilisée comme camp de concentration des juifs d'Europe centrale. Anti-chambre des camps d'extermination de l'Est, elle accueille des compositeurs et musiciens comme Viktor Ullmann, Gideon Klein et Pavel Haas qui périssent à « Auschwitz » .

Écrit par Wolfgang Langhoff et Rudi Goguel au camp de « Borgermoor » en 1933-1934, « le Chant des marais » (adaptation de « Die Moorsoldaten ») est l'une des Ires œuvres nées dans l'univers concentrationnaire. Le texte de Johann Esser et de Wolfgang Langhoff met en accusation le sort misérable du détenu, endiguant sa mélancolie pour lui insuffler du courage, lui apporter l'espoir et lui donner des forces.

Résister signifie ici s'affirmer pour contrer les tentatives de briser l'homme prisonnier, garder espoir et courage en dépit de la situation déprimante, vouloir vivre face à la mort omniprésente.

La mélodie de Rudi Goguel connaît une popularité plus grande après que Hanns Eisler a réalisé une adaptation pour le chanteur antifasciste Ernst Busch, en 1935. La version française, « le Chant des marais », fut notamment introduite au camp de « Dachau » .

À « Terezin », que les Nazis présentent comme un camp modèle à l'opinion internationale, la musique est pratiquée dans un cadre officiel mais aussi de manière spontanée. On y compte des représentations d'Opéras, de musique de chambre, un ensemble de jazz, des spectacles de cabaret et de revue ou encore un studio de musique nouvelle. À « Auschwitz », la musique fait aussi partie de la vie quotidienne. Plusieurs formations musicales y exercent. C'est en musique que les victimes sont accueillies avant d'être exterminées.

Le prisonnier Hans Bonarewitz mené à son exécution en est l'exemple. Hans Bonarewitz est interné à « Mauthausen » en juin 1942. Il tente de s'enfuir du camp en se dissimulant dans une caisse en bois transportée par un camion. Capturé 18 jours plus tard, il est exposé 7 jours durant sur la place d'appel dans sa caisse en bois avant d'être pendu, le 30 juillet 1942. L'orchestre, contraint de jouer lors de son exécution, donne un caractère autant sinistre que pervers à cette cérémonie macabre.

Mécanismes et outils de propagande

Du Festival de Bayreuth au camp de « Terezin », le régime nazi maîtrise parfaitement les outils aptes à emporter l'adhésion du peuple allemand et à ménager la communauté internationale.

L'Opéra « Totentanz » (danse macabre) de Josef Reiter fut présenté en avril 1938 au « Deutsches Opernhaus » de Berlin qui incombait aux services de Josef Goebbels. Le programme pour l'Opéra « Totentanz » montre à quel point l'effigie du « Führer » envahit le moindre objet, de l'assiette aux figurines en plâtre en passant par toutes sortes de brochures présentant des manifestations culturelles, désormais indissociables de l'action politique.

L'image véhiculée par les actualités et les films de propagande donne l'idée d'une communauté nationale unie et indissoluble. Le régime s'appuie sur une vie musicale très riche, dominée par la qualité des productions symphoniques et lyriques. L'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin rayonne à l'étranger malgré des campagnes de « boycott ».

La vie musicale est réglée par le poids des associations (Jeunesses hitlériennes ; La Force par la Joie - KdF). La pédagogie et les mouvements de masse font l'objet d'un accompagnement idéologique très présent. La direction de la Jeunesse du « Reich » (« Reichsjugendführung » - RJF) organise la musique au sein des Jeunesses Hitlériennes. Celle-ci prend en charge l'enseignement musical en dehors de l'école à travers la « Hitlerjugend » (HJ) pour les garçons et le « Bundeutscher Mädel » (BDM) pour les filles, seuls groupements de jeunesse autorisés à partir de 1936. À côté du professeur de musique du secteur privé ou du Conservatoire, un nouveau personnage apparaît, celui de « dirigeant musical pour la jeunesse ». Le principe fondamental régissant l'organisation de ce mouvement est la croyance en l'essence communautaire de la musique qui vise au retour d'une organisation sociale de type féodal.

L'éducation musicale a pour objectif de remplacer la « Gesellschaft », organisation individualiste, par la « Gemeinschaft », organisation sociale holistique. En découle une pédagogie entièrement orientée vers des pratiques collectives censées dessiner une nouvelle unité du peuple, fondée sur la participation active au groupe.

Les clichés pris par Liselotte Orgel-Köhne, « Camp musical » (1938), « Organisation de loisirs de jeunes filles » (1939-1942), tendent à véhiculer une image conviviale de ces camps dont l'ambition était d'« élever la jeunesse en êtres conscients de leur germanité » .

Média choyé par la propagande, la radio s'attache à intégrer le grand répertoire dans le projet politique. Sa production industrielle (25 % de foyers détenteurs, en 1933 ; 65 % , en 1941) permet une couverture efficace des messages politiques et programmes de divertissement soigneusement sélectionnés par la censure. Bridés sur les ondes moyennes, ces appareils ne permettaient guère de capter les radios étrangères.

L'huile sur toile « le “ Führer ” parle » de Paul Matthias Padua dépeint une famille de paysans, toutes générations confondues, du berceau au vieillard, rassemblés autour du « récepteur du peuple » et plongés dans un recueillement quasi-religieux. Une photographie accrochée au mur telle une image pieuse, et un journal ouvert à la page où figure son nom nous laissent supposer qu'ils sont en train d'écouter un discours de Hitler. Ainsi la figure du « Führer » est présentée comme objet d'un culte de la personnalité poussé à son paroxysme. L'œuvre est exposée à Munich dans le cadre de la Grande exposition d'art allemand.

La période de guerre est quant à elle propice à une campagne tendant à attiser l'enthousiasme des troupes. La musique militaire et la musique légère sont perçues comme un baume indispensable alors que s'annoncent les signes de la débâcle.

« L'Allemagne, pays de la musique » proclame une affiche touristique éditée en 1938 par la Société des chemins de fer du « Reich » à l'intention des pays européens : on y voit l'aigle figurant l'État allemand prendre sous son aile l'orgue (instrument par excellence symbolisant l'œuvre de Jean-Sébastien Bach) . Sous le 3e « Reich » , politique et musique sont indissociables : c'est le thème de l'exposition qui fut organisée par la Cité de la musique de Paris du 8 octobre 2004 au 9 janvier 2005 et du catalogue publié pour l'occasion : « Le 3e “ Reich ” et la musique » . Comment la dictature Nationale-Socialiste récupère-t-elle la musique et en fait-elle un instrument de propagande ? Comment la musique participe-t-elle à la fascination qu'a exercée le Nazisme sur les masses ? Quelles sont enfin les modalités de la création musicale dans l'exil, la « résistance intérieure » ou le système concentrationnaire ?

L'Exposition est structurée selon 2 pôles sans s'y réduire toutefois. Le 1er est consacré à l'instrumentalisation par le Nazisme des grandes figures du patrimoine musical allemand : Bach, Beethoven, Bruckner, et évidemment Wagner sont célébrés comme la quintessence du génie germanique et servent à définir une musique conforme à l'idéal nazi. La 9e Symphonie de Beethoven devient ainsi l'œuvre de référence de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et de son directeur musical, le très charismatique Wilhelm Furtwängler. Le répertoire Romantique fait l'objet d'une récupération systématique. C'est ainsi que le buste d'Anton Bruckner est installé solennellement par Adolf Hitler, le dimanche 6 juin 1937, au « Walhalla » (ce temple néo-Grec édifié près de Ratisbonne, au début du 19e siècle, et dédié aux grandes figures de l'histoire allemande) , le « Führer » saluant dans ce compositeur le petit paysan autrichien, victime comme lui d'une société viennoise corrompue. Mais l'icône musicale du régime reste bien sûr Richard Wagner, dont l'exposition présente un buste réalisé en 1939 par Arno Breker (un autre de ces bustes fit partie de la collection personnelle d'Hitler) .

L'Exposition s'attarde sur le Festival de Bayreuth, devenu à partir de 1924 le symbole de la réaction culturelle contre les expérimentations musicales de la République de Weimar. L'affiche réalisée en 1937 par Jupp Wiertz, l'un des créateurs d'affiches les plus fameux de l'entre-2-guerres, est emblématique : l'utilisation de faisceaux lumineux mettant en valeur le buste wagnérien donne un caractère quasi religieux à la manifestation. Le Festival de 1937 est dominé par l'Opéra « Parsifal ». Mais c'est l'Opéra « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » qui, en exaltant l'idéal d'une société médiévale et corporatiste, s'impose comme l'Opéra culte du 3e « Reich » (une des pièces les plus précieuses de l'Exposition est d'ailleurs la partition autographe de l'Opéra, conservée par le Musée national germanique de Nuremberg depuis 1902). Cet Opéra, joué en ouverture des congrès du NSDAP, est aussi choisi pour l'inauguration triomphale du « Deutsches Opernhaus » de Berlin, en novembre 1935.

Le second pôle de l'Exposition est consacré à la condamnation par les Nazis des œuvres musicales « décadentes » ou « dégénérées » : ces vocables désignent la musique juive, « nègre » et communiste. L'exclusion du compositeur d'origine juive Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy du patrimoine musical allemand est ainsi emblématique. Dans la nuit du 9 au 10 novembre 1936, sa statue est détruite devant le « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig. Plusieurs compositeurs sont sollicités pour élaborer une version « aryenne » du « Songe d'une nuit d'été ». Alors que Richard Strauß jugeant le projet absurde décline l'offre, Carl Orff (plus opportuniste) s'attelle à la tâche, en 1939, en profitant du succès des « Carmina Burana ». La justification musicologique vient de l'étude de Karl Blessinger « Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mahler. 3 chapitres du judaïsme dans la musique comme clé pour l'histoire de la musique du 19e siècle » (1939), dans laquelle l'auteur dénonce l'influence nocive du judaïsme dans la musique. Par ailleurs, l'Opéra jazz à succès « Jonny spielt auf ! » (« Jonny mène la danse ! ») d'Ernst Křenek, créé à Leipzig en 1927 et mettant en scène les amours d'un homme noir et d'une femme blanche, est symptomatique pour les Nazis d'une dégénérescence raciale. L'affiche de l'Opéra qui représente un saxophoniste noir est reprise pour la brochure de l'Exposition de 1938 sur l'« Entartete Musik » (musique dégénérée). Organisée à Düsseldorf en marge des journées musicales du « Reich », c'est l'équivalent musical de l'Exposition de Munich de 1937 sur la « dégénérescence » dans les arts plastiques. Les courants avant-gardistes (musique atonale d'Arnold Schönberg ou engagée de Kurt Weill) sont opposés aux productions restauratrices de Richard Strauß, Werner Egk et Carl Orff. Parmi les boucs émissaires de l'Exposition figure le chef d'orchestre juif Otto Klemperer, directeur musical du « Kroll Oper » de Berlin, de 1927 à 1931, accusé d'y avoir mené une guerre contre Richard Wagner. La production du « Vaisseau Fantôme », en 1929, est effectivement l'une des manifestations musicales les plus controversées des années '20, tant pour la direction musicale de Klemperer que pour les décors d'inspiration « Bauhaus » d'Ewald (Felix) Dülberg (marqués par l'abstraction formelle). Du reste, les wagnériens obtiennent, en 1931, la fermeture du « Kroll Oper ». L'Exposition de 1938 n'a pas le succès escompté. Elle se heurte à la popularité de la musique de cabaret que les Nazis ne parviennent pas à discréditer, en particulier « l'Opéra de quat' sous » créé par Bertolt Brecht et Kurt Weill, en août 1928, à Berlin (« Theater am Schiffbauerdamm »). La politique antisémite conduit à la dissolution de certains groupes de jazz, comme, en 1935, le sextuor humoristique « The Comedian Harmonists » fondé à Berlin, en 1927. Pour pallier ces interdictions, le ministère de la Propagande encourage des formations « aryennes » de musique légère, tel l'ensemble « Die Goldenen Sieben » (1934) qui peut être considéré comme un « ersatz » des « Weintraubs Syncopators » à la mode dans les années '20.

Mais le schéma manichéen qui oppose une « bonne » et une « mauvaise » musique est loin d'épuiser les ambiguïtés de la création musicale sous le 3^e « Reich ». Chefs d'orchestre et musiciens entretiennent des rapports plus complexes avec le régime. Il en va ainsi de la concurrence entre Wilhelm Fürtwängler, extrêmement favorisé par les Nazis en dépit de son absence de soutien au régime (il cumule les fonctions de chef d'orchestre à la « Staatsoper », directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, vice-président de la chambre de musique du « Reich » et membre du Sénat) et Hans Knappertsbusch, moins apprécié par Adolf Hitler malgré son antisémitisme. Si on met à part le cas des compositeurs ayant choisi l'exil, tel Arnold Schönberg qui dénonce le Nazisme depuis les États-Unis avec « l'Ode à Napoléon Bonaparte » (1942), ceux qui restent en Allemagne sont conduits à se compromettre, comme le montrent les trajectoires de Richard Strauß ou d'Anton von Webern. Ce dernier, bien que resté fidèle à son Maître Schönberg, approuve la politique pan-germaniste d'Hitler et pense convaincre le régime de la valeur de la musique dodécaphonique. Mais ses œuvres ne sont pas jouées dans le « Reich ».

La partie la plus originale de l'Exposition porte sur la création musicale dans les camps de concentration. En particulier, la musique du compositeur Viktor Ullmann (1898-1909) est redécouverte à l'occasion d'un cycle de concerts organisé à la Cité de la musique parallèlement à l'Exposition. Ce pianiste juif a été l'assistant de Alexander von Zemlinsky à Prague après la Première Guerre mondiale et a collaboré au « Schauspielhaus » de Zürich. Le 8 septembre 1942, il est déporté dans le camp de « Theresienstadt », avant d'être transféré et tué à « Auschwitz », le 16 octobre 1944. Le camp de « Terezin » (dans le protectorat de Bohême-Moravie) est le seul camp spécifiquement juif de l'univers concentrationnaire nazi. Camp modèle ou camp vitrine (en 1944, le Comité international de Croix-Rouge le visite et le film de propagande « Le " Führer " » fait don d'une ville aux juifs y est tourné), il se caractérise par une vie culturelle intense dans les domaines de la musique, du théâtre et des arts plastiques. Celle-ci masque en réalité l'entreprise d'extermination : tous les musiciens du camp seront gazés à « Auschwitz ». C'est dans ce cadre qu'Ullmann compose en 1943 l'Opéra « Der Kaiser von Atlantis oder der Todverweigerung » (l'Empereur d'Atlantide ou le refus de la mort), sur un livret de Peter Kien. Cette œuvre, interdite dans le camp (elle sera créée pour la 1^{re} fois en 1975) est emblématique de la composition musicale au cœur de l'anéantissement concentrationnaire. Dans le royaume d'Atlantide, le roi Overall (dont le nom renvoie au germanisme « Überall » évoquant l'hymne allemand « Deutschland über alles ») déclare la « Guerre Totale » et ordonne à la mort de conduire ses armées. Mais celle-ci, révoltée de voir son œuvre transformée en entreprise de massification, décide de ne plus laisser les hommes mourir. Le chaos s'ensuit, si bien qu'à la fin de l'Opéra, la mort accepte d'accomplir à nouveau sa mission à condition que le roi soit sa 1^{re} victime. La mort apparaît ainsi libératrice : « Elle est celle qui délivre de la peste et non la peste » (allusion évidente à la peste brune). Cet argument allégorique est empreint d'une ironie glaciale quand on pense aux conditions de sa réalisation. Mais toute la force de rébellion de l'artiste se dégage : l'Opéra est un acte de vie avant une mort certaine.

La dernière section de l'Exposition, consacrée aux outils et mécanismes de propagande, présente une série de documents audio-visuels matérialisant la politique nazie de manipulation des masses. On y voit la retransmission aux actualités cinématographiques de la cérémonie d'ouverture des jeux Olympiques de Berlin, en août 1936, pour laquelle Richard Strauß compose son hymne olympique. On mesure toute la force du chant dans les associations de masse nazies telles les SA (enregistrement du « Horst-Wessel-Lied » par un chœur de SA, le 10 avril 1933), les Jeunesses hitlériennes ou « la Force par la joie », KdF, (extrait d'un concert donné, en 1944, par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin pour les ouvriers des usines AEG de Berlin). La production industrielle de postes de radio baptisés

In addition to other ceremonies and rallies, « Reich » services for the dead included favoured music selections. Commemorative wreaths were placed on the monument to those who died in the November 9th, 1923, abortive « Putsch » , to bands playing such solemn, heroic works as « Raise the Banner » . This was also used in the funeral procession Josef Goebbels planned for Fritz Todt. He also selected the « Funeral March » from Richard Wagner's « Götterdämmerung » , the « Song of the Good Comrade » , and the national anthem, « Deutschland über Alles » .

In 1934, Goebbels, realizing the need for respite from military music, issued a decree which called for lighter music on the radio for several weeks, following intensely emotional experiences such as Party rallies. In order for the propagandistic value of radio broadcasts to be realized, Goebbels also accepted that the « Reich » had to provide programs which would encourage citizens to keep their radios turned-on. Between 1932 and 1937, therefore, the amount of air-time dedicated to music increased to 69 %, 7/8 of which was lighter music. These programs included Operas by the 19th Century Masters Carl Maria von Weber, Albert Lortzing, Peter Cornelius and Otto Nicolai ; Operettas by Johan Strauß, Franz Lehár, Paul Lincke ; and lesser composers like Eduard Künneke and Emil von Reznicek were heard repeatedly. Goebbels was aware that not everyone had a comprehension of music sufficient for appreciation of such works as Wagner's Operas. He found it necessary that simple forms of music should exist and that creators of those forms should be made to realize that they render a service to the « Reich » . Then too, Hitler doubtlessly approved of the inclusion of lighter music, for, he was especially fond of Operettas.

Many Symphonic programs by the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras were broadcast during the 3rd « Reich » . They were usually held to an hour's length, but special exceptions were made for such works as Anton Bruckner's lengthy 7th Symphony. Certain instrumental works became monograms for special events and announcements over the radio. The « Meistersinger » Overture was played for Goebbels' annual radio celebration of Hitler's birthday, and Beethoven's « Eroica » was played to introduce Hitler's speeches on Heroes' Remembrance Day. Robert Herzstein claimed that, in a special effort to keep Germans out of the churches, special attention was given to Sunday broadcasts of the finest Classical and church music and poetry readings.

Goebbels also banned the playing of Mozart's « Requiem » over the radio during the War, because it was « world-renouncing and depressing » . Beethoven's 5th Symphony was also rejected because it had become an allied victory signal. The War also brought confusion about playing, singing, and listening to music of the enemy. This resulted in a ban on the music of Maurice Ravel, Claude Debussy, Frederic Chopin, Georges Bizet, and Piotr Ilitch Tchaikovsky. Nevertheless, Alexander Borodin's « Prince Igor » was performed at Hamburg during the German campaign in Russia.

Musical compositions were often changed to suit the restrictions of the 3rd « Reich ». In Beethoven's « Fidelio », for example, Leonora's loyalty to Florestan was given emphasis in order to take attention away from the prison scenes, which were too relevant to concentration camps, while pianist Wilhelm Backhaus was praised for playing the Schumann Concerto with a new German image, which avoided the typical effeminate manner of playing Schumann.

A portion of the Nazi government, surely not comprised of musicologists, saw a serious problem in the respective value of major and minor-keys in music. Some argued greater gifts were required to compose in a major-key because the composer had to « take upon himself the contradiction and paradox of life ». More « inner-strength » was needed than in the case of a minor-key. Minor-keys, on the other hand, were associated with non-Aryan music. The realization that a great number of songs of the movement were not in a major-key but had « a marked affinity with an alien system of sound » was quite disturbing to some, such as Alfred Rosenberg. However, there was never a resolution of the dispute.

The Nazi leadership, however, did reach some agreement on the music areas each was to dominate. During the 3rd « Reich », for example, Josef Goebbels laid-down the guide-lines for radio and films while Hermann Göring and Baldur von Schirach provided direction to the Operas, at Berlin and Vienna. Hitler patronized the music communities in Munich, Weimar, Bayreuth and Linz. Hitler endowed Linz with a large-orchestra called the « Bruckner » Orchestra. In Munich, as has been seen, he was most concerned with the visual arts. He endowed Weimar with an annual allowance of 60,000 « Deutsche Mark », gave advice on staging and casting, and enjoyed contact with the artists. Hitler also contributed substantial sums to the support of Wagner's music in Bayreuth and granted the operation a complete tax exemption.

Bayreuth became Hitler's « Court Theater » and thrived under his patronage. As will be recalled, before Hitler's attempted Munich « coup », in 1923, which earned him a term in Landsberg Prison, he had visited Wagner's grave and declared to Winifred Wagner :

« Out of “ Parsifal ”, I will make a religion. »

The full-meaning of this remark was clarified by Hitler some 13 years later. In the spring of 1936, Hitler ordered German troops into the Rhineland, which had been de-militarized since 1918. Not long afterward, Hitler went on a triumphal train tour of the region. Although his trip was punctuated with dramatic speeches and church bells saluting his victory, Hitler realized the retaking of the Rhineland showed more bravura than military strength and was thankful for the pacificity of the Western powers.

He said :

« Am I glad ! Good Lord, am I glad it's gone so smoothly. Sure enough, the world belongs to the brave man. He's the one God helps. »

As his train continued the nocturnal journey through the Ruhr District, it passed glowing blast furnaces, slag heaps, and derricks, and Hitler asked that a record of Wagner's music be played. When the Prelude of « Parsifal » began to sound, he reiterated his intention to develop a religion out of it as, « One can serve God only in the garb of the hero » without any « pretense of humility ». Surprisingly, « Parsifal » was dropped from the 3rd « Reich » repertoire when the War started, « presumably because its Christian over-tones antagonized the neo-paganists surrounding Rosenberg ». The habit of dreary resentments did not permit Hitler to enjoy the success of his tour, for as the record continued with the Funeral March from « Götterdämmerung » .

Hitler recalled :

« I first heard it in Vienna. At the Opera. And I still remember as if it were today how madly excited I became on the way home over a few yammering “ Yids ” I had to pass. I cannot think of a more incompatible contrast. This glorious mystery of the dying hero and this Jewish crap. »

Joachim Fest believed that the Finale of « Götterdämmerung » was the extreme expression of Opera to Hitler. During his years of attending Opera at the Bayreuth Theater, when the stronghold of the gods collapsed in musical climax, he would usually take the hand of « Frau » Winifred Wagner and emotionally kiss her hand.

Hitler also carried his interest in stage-designs for Wagner's works into the years of his Chancellorship. Albert Speer witnessed Hitler's « amazing knowledge of stage-craft, his interest in the diameter of revolving stages, lift mechanisms, and, especially, different lighting techniques ». Speer heard Hitler discuss lighting and scenery for Wagner's music-dramas with Benno von Arent, whom Hitler had made « Reich » State-Designer and Supervisor of Opera and Operetta decor. He also provided Arent with « neatly executed stage-designs, coloured with crayons, for all Acts of « Tristan und Isolde » and sketches for all scenes of « Der Ring des Niebelungen », which he had poured-over, night after night, for 3 weeks. Later, when von Arent was commissioned to stage « Meistersinger » at the opening performance for the Party Rally, Hitler closely studied lighting for the moonlight scenes and « went into ecstasies over the brilliant colours he wanted for the final scene on the Mastersinger's meadow, and over the Romantic look of the little gabled houses opposite Hans Sach's cobbler's shop » .

Hitler's attitude toward Richard Wagner's works was decidedly conservative. Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt reported in « Modern Music », in 1933, that Heinz Tietzen and Emil Pretorius, « 2 representatives of modern ideas in the Theatre », gave the « Ring » and « Meistersinger » « novel scenic dress » in contrast to the Bayreuth tradition, and the « Keepers of the Grail » protested against the « cultural-bolshevistic » interpretation of Wagner, but the government was satisfied. Hitler's own conservatism resulted in his request that Arent replace Emil Pretorius, who had long done the sets for the Bayreuth Festival. Winifred Wagner avoided this change by pretending she did not know what Hitler was driving at in their conversations about the conductors. It is generally recognized, however, that during the 3rd « Reich », the performances came closer to approximating Wagner's original Bayreuth concept than they had immediately before the « Reich ». Indeed, it became increasingly a German event, for fewer and fewer foreigners were seen there.

It was not uncommon for Hitler to intervene in the appointment of musicians to important theatrical posts. Often, he did this to « preserve tradition and keep overbold innovators out of the positions of power ». For such reasons, Karl Elmendorff was given directorship of the Dresden City Opera, in 1942. He often showed very strong feelings about conductors in particular. He said Hans Knappertsbusch, for example, was « no better than a military-band leader », and he mistrusted Herbert von Karajan because he conducted without a score, and so, could not catch blunders on the part of the singers, « which was inconsiderate of the public as well as the singers ». Baldur von Schirach believed Hitler would have « interfered if Karajan had not been a “ protégé ” of Göring’s, just as Knappertsbusch enjoyed the protection of Eva Braun », who liked the conductor’s « manly good looks » .

Officiels et diffamés

Le temps agit non seulement sur l’interprétation que nous donnons d’un événement, mais également sur le sens que nous associons aux mots qui l’ont accompagné. L’histoire (celle de la musique notamment) est en cela une réflexion sur le langage. Ainsi l’expression « musique dégénérée », choisie sciemment pour ses connotations diffamantes par le commissaire de l’Exposition de mai 1938 à Düsseldorf, est-elle devenue 50 ans plus tard le titre d’une collection discographique, signe de ralliement autour d’un répertoire qu’il était jugé urgent de redécouvrir. Si la supposée dégénérescence de l’art des Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill et Arnold Schœnberg était déjà considérée à l’époque par une partie des intéressés (Schœnberg en tête) comme un « hommage en négatif » venant de la part d’idéologues fascistes, cette opinion ne constituait pas pour autant une acception culturelle « commune », encore moins une catégorie revendicable. Il y a fort à parier que si un éditeur discographique britannique s’était aventuré dans les années 1930 à proposer un recueil d’œuvres de ces compositeurs sous le terme de « musique dégénérée », il se serait heurté à l’incompréhension, pour ne pas dire à la stupeur des intéressés.

Cette réflexion est moins anecdotique qu’il n’y paraît car elle tend à démontrer la puissance paradoxale de l’art musical sur un pouvoir qui vise à le réduire au silence. Les rapports entre la musique et le totalitarisme, sans l’étude desquels aucune histoire de la musique du XXe siècle ne peut être écrite, tendent à montrer que le temps sert d’agent « inverseur » : plus le régime politique aura essayé d’asseoir son autorité sur la création, plus celle qu’il tente d’annihiler et qui lui résiste tend à devenir « précieuse » aux yeux des générations suivantes et à être valorisée dans les paradigmes modernes de l’histoire. Ce qui ne devait en aucun cas devenir patrimoine, au risque de « salir la culture nationale », devient le symbole d’un lieu et d’une époque : gageons que 1943, sera dans la culture « commune » transmise par les histoires de la musique germanique, l’année de l’incroyable composition du « Kaiser von Atlantis » de Viktor Ullmann dans un camp de prisonniers et non celle de la création du « Schloß Dürande » d’Ottmar Schœck à l’Opéra d’État de Berlin.

L’entreprise de « nettoyage » du « bolchévisme culturel », loin de laisser le champ ouvert à ceux qui ont montré patte blanche, retient au contraire dans son envol l’« ange de l’histoire », attiré par ce qui a pu provoquer pareil « règlement de compte » (l’Exposition de 1938 était sous-titrée : « Abrechnung ») : c’est ainsi que l’époque du Nazisme au pouvoir se révèle a posteriori comme particulièrement foisonnante et diversifiée. À l’exaspération de la tendance nationaliste historiciste du XIXe siècle fait pendant une activité non moins importante de création.

On peut distinguer à ce sujet sinon celle des compositeurs « officiels », dont l’histoire ne retient aucun nouveau nom, du moins la poursuite de l’activité créatrice de ceux déjà établis (à commencer par Richard Strauß, qui continuera à composer essentiellement des Opéras) ; à son opposé, celle des compositeurs exilés, proches pour la plupart d'Arnold Schœnberg (comme Hanns Eisler, Ernst Křenek et Stefan Wolpe, un élève d'Anton von Webern) , lui-même résidant à partir de 1934 en Californie via Paris, ou de Franz Schreker, qui était décédé peu après l'accession au pouvoir des Nazis ; enfin, celle des « sans dénomination » , ni officiels, ni diffamés, considérés comme inutiles par le pouvoir (qu'ils indiffèrent) et menacés de l'être par l'histoire (qui, sans la modernité de son formalisme, n'aurait pas retenu le nom d'Anton von Webern, et ne s'est souvenu que récemment de l'existence d'Hans Erich Apostel) . Parmi eux, certains méritent d'être qualifiés d' « exilés de l'intérieur » , comme Karl Amadeus Hartmann, qui s'est « auto-interdit » , ce qui n'a pas empêché ses biographes d'accorder à juste titre à cette « non-musique » une importance au moins aussi grande qu'aux musiques réellement écrites. Le silence fait décidément beaucoup de bruit : peut-être cette leçon de l'histoire a-t-elle été intuitivement ressentie par les créateurs de l'après-guerre, signataires de nombreuses œuvres « trouées de silence » .

Instrumentaliser Mozart à des fins politiques : Le cas de la « Mozart-Woche des Deutschen Reiches » (Vienne, 1941)

Du 28 novembre au 5 décembre 1941 s'est tenue à Vienne la Mozart-Woche des Deutschen Reiches, une semaine Mozart célébrant le 150e anniversaire du décès du compositeur. Ce festival d'une très grande envergure (plus d'une soixantaine de manifestations musicales réunissant les musiciens allemands les plus réputés) n'était pas simplement un événement culturel : ses principaux organisateurs, le Reichsstatthalter Baldur von Schirach et le Ministre de la propagande Josef Gœbbels, y voyaient d'abord et avant tout un vecteur de propagande politique. L'objectif de la Mozart-Woche était triple : rassurer le peuple allemand, fédérer le peuple autrichien (annexé par l'Allemagne en 1938) et séduire le reste de l'Europe pour mieux l'asservir.

Mais pour atteindre ce triple objectif, il fallait développer une rhétorique bien particulière visant à présenter Mozart comme l'archétype même du musicien allemand, aryen, nationaliste et assez proche du peuple pour susciter l'enthousiasme des foules. Dans cette communication, nous verrons comment les instigateurs de la Mozart-Woche ont instrumentalisé aussi bien l'œuvre que la personne de Mozart, sans hésiter à déformer les faits pour mieux les faire correspondre à leurs intentions politiques. Nous nous pencherons aussi bien sur le programme musical de la Mozart-Woche que sur le discours qui l'a entouré (articles de journaux, livres parus au moment du festival, publications officielles et discours prononcés par Baldur von Schirach, Josef Gœbbels et Heinz Drewes, chef de la section musique du Ministère de la propagande). Cette étude sera complétée par celle de la perception (ou non) de cette instrumentalisation de Mozart par les membres de la délégation française, la plus importante délégation étrangère invitée à Vienne pour la Mozart-Woche.

Among Arthur Honegger's War-time choices, his decision to accept the invitation to attend the 1941 German « Reich » Mozart Week, in Vienna, was the most controversial both during and after the War. The French contingent (the largest and most prominent of the foreign delegations) was provided with an all-expense-paid trip to attend an event that consisted of political rallies as well as brilliant musical performances. Among those the delegates heard perform were Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting the « Requiem » ; Clemens Krauß, the Mass in C minor ; Hans Knappertsbuch, « Don Giovanni » and « Die Zauberflöte » ; and Karl Böhm, « Le nozze di Figaro » and « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » . They met with Alfred Schlee, the head of Universal-Edition, and attended a reception at the villa of Richard Strauß. But they also heard Josef Gœbbels preside over a Nazi rally at the « Staatsoper » . Gœbbels's co-host, Baldur von Schirach, the « Reich » governor of Vienna, opened the Festival by invoking Mozart's relevance to the goals and visions of the German « Reich » :

« It is for the values that Mozart represents that we are fighting today, and Mozart fights alongside us with the influence of his genius. » (Baldur von Schirach)

German propaganda took full-advantage of the validation provided by the foreigners, and in particular the French, who traveled to Vienna to participate in the Festival. Several articles about the so-called « European » Music Festival appeared in various editions of the German daily newspaper, the « Völkische Beobachter » . The 1st to appear, on 29 November, drew attention to the fact that the « 800 out-of-town guests, among them several from foreign countries » , included « a delegation of French musicians » who were taking part « at the invitation of the “ Reich ” government » . The last, on 7 December, concluded that « the visitors would now return to their homes with the indelible impression of the German “ Reich ” superiority, in both cultural and military matters » . « This, it seems to us, was the greatest value of the German “ Reich ” Mozart Week » , asserted the official newspaper of the Nazi Party. « Victory in the current fight can only belong to the one who feels so secure and serene in military battle that he does not forget the care of the Muses amid the noise of weapons » . Although the articles did not name any of the individual « guests » , it was the collective willingness of a critical mass of them to join the venture that made their presence useful for German propaganda purposes at home and abroad.

Crimes against Culture or Business as Usual ?

Mozart and the Nazis is a well-researched, detailed account of perceptions about Mozart, his music, and his legacy in the 3rd « Reich » and beyond. Indeed, the title does not do full justice to the chronological scope of the work, which opens with the celebrations of Mozart's 175th birthday in 1931 and concludes with the post-War continuation of various projects and interpretations passed down from the Nazi era. The geographic scope also pushes beyond the borders of the 3rd « Reich » , following the fate of German exiles and assessing Mozart's reception among Germany's allies and in territories invaded and occupied by German troops. The author, Erik Levi, wrote one of the 1st English-language studies on music in Nazi Germany and applies his expertise to mine archival sources, contemporary publications, and secondary literature to offer a richly informed survey.

Levi's introduction briefly summarizes the book's goal of examining the Nazi campaign to co-opt Mozart despite the challenge of conforming the composer's character and outlook to their « weltanschauung » . Thereafter, the 1st chapter (« Prologue : 1931, a Mozart Year ») looks at the celebrations as well as the status of various editions of Mozart's music underway in Depression-era Germany. The following 2 chapters (« Der deutsche Mozart » and « Mozart and the Freemasons : A Nazi Problem ») examine the numerous attempts both before and during the 3rd « Reich » to emphasize Mozart's Germanness and to distance the composer from his known associations with Freemasonry, especially once the movement had become a target of Nazi suppression. The chapter titled « Aryanising [sic] Mozart » analyzes Mozart's direct and indirect associations with Jews, most notably his collaboration with librettist Lorenzo Da Ponte and the popular 19th Century German translations of Da Ponte's texts by another Jew, Hermann Levi.

In the next 2 chapters (« The Mozart Diaspora » and « “ True Humanitarian Music ” : Exiled Writers on Mozart ») , we learn about Mozart's significance for oppressed Jews living within the « Reich » and those driven out of Adolf Hitler's Germany. « Mozart Performance and Propaganda : From the Anschluß to the End of World War II » details the high-profile political exploitation of the Salzburg Mozart festival on the eve of the « Anschluß » , and chapter 8 (« Mozart Serves German Imperialism ») looks at Mozart reception under German occupation. The final chapter (« Epilogue : Nazi Legacies ») traces vestiges of the « nazified » Mozart beyond the 3rd « Reich » , including the completion of an edition of Mozart's works initiated under Hitler, the English dubbing and distribution of a Mozart bio-pic of 1942, and the resurrection of theories about Mozart's opposition to Freemasonry and his deep-seated nationalism, the rhetoric of which could be effortlessly superimposed on the more recent image of an « Austrian Mozart » .

Levi's comprehensive treatment is a valuable addition not only to the study of Mozart reception history but also to investigations of the ways artists and their works can be subjected to a wide variety of interpretations under differing historical conditions. At the same time, Levi's ample evidence of the continuity and ubiquity of Mozart's meaning for audiences in and beyond the 3rd « Reich » tends to undermine the work's main contention that « although many regimes have appropriated great historical and artistic figures of the past for their own political purposes, none has done so with such thoroughness as the Nazis » (page 1) . Levi, like so many others seeking to highlight the singularity of Nazi atrocities against not only European Jewry but also Western civilization, strives to reconstruct a campaign of cultural mayhem as ruthless and thorough as the Holocaust itself, only to struggle with evidence that complicates this agenda.

This becomes clear almost from the start, as Levi demonstrates an adherence to portraying Mozart as a German icon in the years leading up to the 3rd « Reich » , in which severe economic hardships offered Mozart's 175th birthday as « one small opportunity for Germans to be reminded of their great musical heritage » (page 5) , and showing how a leading scholar was already « echoing the Nazi line of attack » in a 1931 essay on « the German » Mozart (page 29) . Indeed, Levi traces this tendency from the time of Richard Wagner (page 16) to its climax reached in the years leading-up to the First World War in « a flurry of publications which sowed the seeds for the omnipresent and unchallenged interpretation of the composer that followed the advent of the 3rd “ Reich ” » (page 20) . Clearly such « abuse » of Mozart was not a Nazi innovation, nor could the Nazis be cited for being the most abusive. Levi even observes a weakening of the insistence on a purely « German Mozart » at the height of World War II, in the interest of currying favour with the Axis and drawing attention to Mozart's debt to Italy (pages 31-32) .

This is not the only instance in which earlier extremism is softened, even silenced, during the 3rd « Reich » . In the fascinating discussion of the troubling relationship between Mozart and Freemasonry, Levi diligently traces efforts to distance Mozart from the Masons all the way back to the 1790's, culminating in conspiracy theories in the late- 19th Century suggesting that Jews and Masons poisoned Mozart. Yet, a 1928 polemical « exposé » that was reprinted in the 3rd « Reich » prompted a denunciation by propaganda minister Josef Goebbels and a formal ban on further publication (pages 39-40) . Even more fascinating are the controversies over how to represent Masonic themes in contemporary productions of « The Magic Flute » , resulting in a formal pronouncement by Hitler against any attempts to pervert Mozart's original intentions and a position statement by the head of theater operations recommending that producers back away from overly zealous attempts to « cleanse » the work of its Masonic and Egyptian elements (pages 42-51) . With regard to Mozart's Jewish associations, we see a similar degree of ambivalence, with positive endorsements of Da Ponte's contributions appearing as late as 1938 (page 55) and, in the ensuing competition to furnish new German translations to replace those of Hermann Levi, instances of preference for Levi's version over more recent « Aryan » substitutes (page 72) . In fact, the criticisms of Hermann Levi's translation hardly ever cite his Jewishness, but rather contend that the newer, more modern versions should supersede the stilted and overly Romantic texts in use since the late-19th Century. In the end, we learn that the 3rd « Reich » was not the 1st official German entity to abuse Mozart as a cultural icon, and, perhaps, out of a keen interest in gauging public opinion even urged more moderation, not out of any sense of taste or decency but out of a pragmatic need to win over support rather than risk alienating countless Mozart devotees.

Mozart's significance particularly for Jewish performers and scholars provides, perhaps, the most compelling material for readers of this list, as the discussions yield some very poignant insights into this group's stubborn adherence to German cultural identity. As is well-known, the systematic exclusion of Jews from participation in German cultural life led 1st to a stop-gap measure concocted by the government and the Jewish community, known as the Jewish Culture League (« Kulturbund deutscher Juden ») , to provide cultural and educational programs exclusively for Jews by Jews. When it came to excluding German content from the league's programs, the deep connection German Jews held to German culture became all too evident. The ban on Mozart imposed upon the league in 1937 was a bitter pill to swallow, and Herbert Peyser, reporting for « The New York Times » , perceptively noted the German Jews' undying claim to « that same artistic, scientific, and philosophic fare to which, through the Centuries, they have felt a proprietary right to equal that of other Germans » (quoted on page 92) . Once beyond the reach of Nazi authority, German Jews and other exiles could continue to cultivate their connection to Mozart, and Levi provides details of their involvement in the Glyndebourne Festival, Salzburg, and other venues in the United States and Britain. Indeed, Jewish musicologists chose high-profile platforms such as « The New York Times » and Thomas Mann's journal « Mass und Wert » to emphasize Mozart's humanity and, in essence, to draw sharp lines of distinction between the long and venerable legacy of German culture and the Nazis' recent perversion of it.

The rich detail provided in Mozart and the Nazis gives readers a wealth of material for gaining a deeper understanding of how such an important musical figure can be mythologized and exploited to serve both universalist and exclusionary political philosophies. Yet, rather than read this « exposé » as a demonstration of the Nazis' singularity in « abusing » this particular cultural icon, one should be open to observing how, under National-Socialism, the Austro-German Mozart « industry » was allowed to prosper and mature, both within the 3rd « Reich » and beyond. Levi's extensive and very useful bibliography includes a recent article by Ulrich Konrad (under the sub-category « Further Reading ») that forcefully argues for no noticeable changes in Mozart reception before, during, or after the years of Nazi terror. Looking past the indisputable political exploitation of the Salzburg festival, one cannot help pondering that scholars, performers, and policy-makers of all stripes shared in a common mission to perpetuate the myths surrounding Mozart and his music and to exploit them toward fulfilling their own political and ideological agendas, and that this process continued long past 1945 in and beyond Germany's borders.

Mozart and the Nazis - How the 3rd « Reich » Abused a Cultural Icon

(Erik Levi, Yale University Press, New Haven, 2010)

The Nazis came to power in 1933. During the subsequent 3 months, German musical life saw tumultuous changes. Within weeks, many prominent German musicians who were considered by the regime to be politically or racially unacceptable had been forced-out of employment, or felt duty-bound to emigrate.

The Salzburg Festival was particularly troublesome. Bruno Walter, who had appeared at the Festival between 1933 and 1937, refused to have anything to do with those musicians who had sought favour with the Nazis. Despite the apparent incompatibility between Mozart's humanitarian and cosmopolitan outlook and the Nazi ideology, the 3rd « Reich » doggedly promoted the composer's music to further the goals of the regime.

For instance, in 1941, to mark the 150th anniversary year of Mozart's death, 4 special postage stamps were issued in honour of the composer. The set was issued by Bohemia and Moravia during the Nazi occupation of the northern part of Czechoslovakia. Issued on 26th October 1941, the stamps depict Prague's Theatre of the Estates, affiliated with the National Theatre. On the 4th of December, the anniversary address was given at the Vienna State Opera by Doctor Josef Gœbbels, Adolf Hitler's Propaganda Minister. Later, after 1948, the Prague Theatre was named the Tyl Theatre (after dramatist Josef Kajetán Tyl) , being the venue where « Don Giovanni » was 1st performed. Hence, the stamps depicted notation from the Opera.

Propaganda placed German politics before German art. In the climate that followed the Nazi take-over, to place examples of German patriotism at centre stage for any figure of cultural and historical significance was crucial. In Paris, a Mozart Week, « received very enthusiastically by Parisian audiences » , was organized in July 1941. Thus, Mozart was promoted as an honorary Nazi. Effects were long-lasting. Certain Mozart projects promoted during the Nazi era re-emerged after the War.

Erik Levi's « Mozart and the Nazis » represents a valuable addition to the literature on music during the 3rd « Reich » , in large part because of its focus on the reception of a single composer. For a long time, the music of this period suffered almost total neglect. Indeed, only 2 major studies were published before 1990 : « Musik im dritten Reich » by Joseph Wulf and « Musik im NS-Staat » by Fred K. Prieberg. (1) In the past 20 years, however, a number of valuable publications have appeared, including Erik Levi's « Music in the 3rd “ Reich ” » , Michael H. Kater's « The Twisted Muse » , Pamela Potter's « The Most German of the Arts » , and the essay collection « Music and Nazism » , edited by Kater and Albrecht Riethmüller. (2) All of them are highly-informative in exploring how political figures and institutions of the Nazi regime influenced Germany's musical life in the 1930's and 1940's. Yet, they remain general in scope, thereby, leaving both room and need for more focused discussions such as Levi's in this latest book. (3)

One could agree with Leon Botstein's claim, as indeed Levi does, that there was something « about the music of Mozart that rendered the Nazi attempt at appropriation truly ineffective » . (4) It is precisely the resistance of Mozart's music and biography to National-Socialist appropriation that makes his case a particularly interesting one. As Levi states, his study « sheds interesting light on the manner in which the Nazis dealt with the nation's musical heritage, but also illustrates the absurd and sometimes contradictory lengths to which those supportive of the regime were prepared to go in order to ensure Mozart's hallowed status as one of the most important representatives of Aryan cultural supremacy » . (2) Levi examines Nazi attempts at appropriating Mozart in 2 sections of the book : Chapters 2 to 4 focus on the years 1933 to 1938, while Chapters 7 and 8 cover the period from 1938 until the end of the War. In the 2 chapters in between, Levi's focus shifts from the Nazis to the Jews, surveying Mozart's reception in the 1930's among Jewish musicians and writers both in Germany and abroad. Levi frames his study with a Prologue and an Epilogue that offer the reader some historical context of Mozart's reception before and after the 3rd « Reich »

Levi's narrative begins in 1931, a Mozart year of some importance in that it marked the 175th anniversary of Mozart's birth and the 150th anniversary of the premiere of « Idomeneo » . He, then, addresses aspects of Mozart's Operas and biography that the Nazis co-opted for their ideology : Mozart's patriotism was promoted, while the connections to freemasonry were brushed under the rug. (5) Yet, had the adored canonic Operas based on librettos by Jewish-born Lorenzo da Ponte (namely, « Le nozze di Figaro » , « Don Giovanni » , and « Così fan tutte ») been removed from the repertory, it would have made the anti-Semitic laws seem ridiculous. Instead, the Nazis attempted to downgrade Da Ponte's contribution to the Operas, thus, making them more consistent with the ideology. A common strategy, discussed by Levi, was to omit Da Ponte's name from programmes and scores and to present the work in new German translations, thus, emphasizing the Operas' Germanness. This approach was complicated, however, by the fact that the most popular translations had been done by Hermann Levi, the Jewish-German conductor. Consequently, several new translations appeared in the 1930's, with Georg Schünemann's winning the government's endorsement in 1941.

As might be expected, the Nazis used Mozart's hometown of Salzburg to further their propaganda after the annexation of Austria : this was exemplified by changes in the Salzburg Festival's political policies. Prior to the « Anschluß » , the Festival had banned demonstrations of Nazi support and made great efforts to hire exiled German musicians. After 1938, however, it was turned into a vehicle for Nazi propaganda. The 1939 Festival is the focus of Levi's 7th chapter ; it was, he writes, « one of the last important musical events before the invasion of Poland » (page 151) . The reasons he cites are twofold. 1st, it « acted as a further signal to the outside world of the strengthening alliance between the Germans and the Italians » , through the inclusion of Verdi and Rossini on the programme and the performance of Mozart's Operas in the original Italian. 2nd, it attempted to create « an atmosphere of unbounded cheerfulness that served to deflect attention away from the increasingly fraught political situation in Europe » (pages 151-152) . Once the fighting escalated, the Festival became even more propagandistic : the Operas were performed in German and between 10,000 and 20,000 German soldiers were invited, as the Festival was designated as a « Kriegsfestspiel » (War Festival) .

The festivities for the 1941 Mozart year, the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death, are of particular interest to Levi. He focuses on the 2 key-note speeches made at the Viennese Festival by high-ranking Nazi attendees : the « Welcome Address at the Mozart Week of the German " Reich " in Vienna at the Inaugural Concert » , given by « Reichsleiter » Baldur von Schirach, on 28 November 1941, and « Address for the 150th Anniversary of the Death of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart at the Vienna State Opera » by Reich Minister Josef Goebbels, on 4 December 1941. These 2 speeches link Mozart's music with the current political situation and received much attention from the press, positive in Germany and negative in the United States - « 1st hand evidence of the exploitation of Mozart for propaganda purposes at a crucial moment during the War » . (3)

Among the institutions and figures included in Levi's discussion of the Jewish and exiled communities' engagement with Mozart are the Berlin « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League) , which was banned from performing Mozart in 1935 ; the English Glyndebourne Festival, founded in 1934 by exiled German conductor Fritz Busch and producer Carl Ebert, among others ; and the scholars Otto Erich Deutsch and Paul Nettl. The central figure in this discussion, however, is Alfred Einstein. Levi tells of the struggles Einstein faced while finishing the 3rd, expanded edition of the Köchel Catalog in the 1930's after moving to America. As he was banned from accessing German archives, he completed the project, which nearly doubled the size of the older edition, with materials and support from archives in Sweden, Italy, Russia, England, and the United States. Despite his Jewish ethnicity, the German firm Breitkopf & Härtel published his edition in 1937. German reviewers, who praised the edition, avoided the issue of Einstein's Jewishness by omitting mention of his name. Levi paints Einstein as the voice of reason, a scholar who, though he acknowledged Mozart's occasional patriotism, also emphasized his international travels and foreign-language Operas, while working to refute the claims in contemporary German scholarship about the composer's nationalism.

Levi also discusses popular books and films as examples of appropriation, both by the Nazis and by their opponents. This is particularly valuable, as the popular reception of Mozart and other great composers is often over-looked. Among his examples, Levi includes pacifist Annette Kolb's pseudo-biographical novel « Mozart » (1937) ; the biographical film about Mozart in Prague, « Eine kleine Nachtmusik » (1939) ; and « Wen die Götter lieben » (Whom the Gods Love) , a feature film commissioned by Goebbels (1942) . Surprisingly, the latter would circulate in the United States after the War, dubbed in English and with no mention of its Nazi origins. Perhaps, the most interesting case discussed by Levi is Hans Watzlik's 1935 novel « Die Krönungsoper » , a fictional retelling of Mozart's last visit to Prague. The book was promoted heavily in the late-1930's, as it strongly espoused the idea that the Czech lands were fundamentally German, creating a sort of artistic justification for the German invasion of Prague in 1939 (pages 196-197) .

One of the principal contributions that Levi's discussion makes to Mozart scholarship is regarding what he calls Germany's musical Imperialism. Whereas scholarship of music and totalitarianism usually focuses on a single country, Levi explores the relationship that other countries had with Mozart's music and how their ties to Germany influenced that relationship, including a total of 10 European countries in his concise account : the Republic of Czechoslovakia, Poland, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, Croatia, the Soviet Union, Hungary, Spain, and Italy. For example, even in a non-belligerent country such as Spain, it can be argued that musicology was influenced by the interpretations of Mozart furthered by Nazi propaganda, with the crucial difference that there Catholicism remained central to Mozart's music, as distinct from Germany, where Nazi musicology sought to remove the traces of religion from his works. According to Levi, however, Spain also recognized « Mozart, the German » , insofar as its musicologists were « prepared to celebrate the nationalist (German) trends undoubtedly shaped by the intensification of political alliances between Nazi Germany and Spain » . (page 230)

In France, there was some resistance to the Germans' use of Mozart and other music as Nazi propaganda, as exemplified by French writer Jean Bruller in his 1942 novel « Le silence de la mer » . In an attempt to warn his countrymen « not to succumb too easily to the efforts of the occupying forces to win them over » , Bruller's protagonist realizes « that the true intention of the German army is to exploit and ruin the country, rather than build bridges » (page 222) . The musical community in Paris seemed less wary. Levi describes the Parisian festivities in the 1941 Mozart year as a clear demonstration of camaraderie between France and Germany - surprising, even if organized for most part by Germans.

As Levi explains it :

« A generously funded propaganda machine swung into action, using Mozart both as a means of healing wounds and creating a sense of rapprochement through stressing shared values and common goals. » (page 191)

Although this international overview helps to contextualize the case of Germany, it represents something of an oversimplification, as the author acknowledges, at least with respect to the situation in France. To be sure, scholars of any of the individual countries may find the relevant section lacking in nuance. For example, when discussing Italy, Levi rightly focuses on the anti-Fascist critic Massimo Mila, who resisted Germany's attempts at appropriating Mozart. He reports that Mila based his opposition on the conviction that propaganda « annihilated (music's) aesthetic significance » . (page 235) While this is correct, it would have been just as important to acknowledge Mila's indebtedness to Crocean idealism, prevalent at the time, which emphasized art's spiritual and autonomous nature.

With this section, even in its brevity, Levi does an excellent job of telling a 2 sided story : how Mozart was called upon « to serve both the interest of the ruling German authorities and that of the oppressed population » . (page 190) On the one hand, he cites plenty of evidence to show how Mozart was used for propaganda purposes in Germany and in occupied lands. Patriotic appropriation was quite blatant in the 1941 concert in Hamburg in which soprano Erika Rokyta substituted the words of the German national anthem (« Deutschland, Deutschland über alles ! ») for the last line of « Alleluja » in Mozart's sacred Motet « Exsultate, jubilate » (KV 165) . Performances of Mozart in occupied lands, especially in the former Czechoslovak Republic, promoted German cultural hegemony, with the hope that « with the passage of time, (the Czech people) could be “ Germanised ” » . (page 190) Some countries even used their own performances of Mozart to show their allegiance to Germany. Croatia's « enthusiasm for honouring the composer » , Levi writes, « was emblematic of the desire among several Eastern European countries to re-inforce their cultural collaborative ties with Germany » . (page 228)

On the other hand, Levi emphasizes that occupied lands also used Mozart's music to counter German Imperialism. Even in the face of War and German propaganda, the people of Bohemia, like those of Moravia and Hungary, wanted to solidify their own relationship with Mozart by placing his achievement within their own national narrative. Especially in the case of Hungary, « although the musical establishment remained resolutely anti-German in outlook, Mozart could not be tarred with the same Teutonic brush as Wagner or Richard Strauß » . (page 229) As the War continued, however, there were fewer and fewer attempts by occupied lands to reject Nazi propaganda and appropriate Mozart to their own national identity. In Hungary, for example, there began an effort to reconcile local and German nationalistic claims. Speeches made by Hungarian politicians at the 1941 festivities were made to appeal to both their German and their Hungarian audiences.

Levi is quick to point-out, as some of these examples show, that attitudes towards Mozart and Germany were not static throughout the 12 years that the Nazis remained in power. This acknowledgement is one of the strengths of Levi's book. England, for example, initially a haven for German exiles, was no longer welcoming them in the 1940's. As bombings escalated, Germans, Jewish and otherwise, were interned in English camps because they were now classified as enemy aliens. Against this military strife, Levi explains the significance of Austrian musicologist Hans Ferdinand Redlich's performance of Mozart's unfinished Opera « L'oca del Cairo » , in 1940 :

« Given that many of the musicians' colleagues had already been interned, the final chorus of the Opera, acclaiming the fall of tyranny and affirming the capacity of true love to rise above adversity, must have sounded unbearably poignant. » (page 119)

The changes in attitude were most evident in occupied lands. Despite local nationalist identification in the 1930's, using Mozart to « Germanize » the population was effective, at least in the concert-halls. While the 150th anniversary of « Don Giovanni » had been celebrated in Prague with a performance in Czech, in 1937, by 1941, the performance was in German and the guests were high-ranking Nazi officials, sitting in « Swastika-bedecked boxes » . (page 203)

In addition, Levi draws attention to continuities between the pre- and post-War periods, the implications of which are not always flattering. While discussing Mozart's connection to freemasonry, Levi addresses the work of Mathilde Ludendorff in the 1930's, which revived the rumour that Mozart was poisoned by the masons (thought to be an agent of conspiracy for the Jews) . This theory did not die with the Nazis but continued to be researched in the post-War period, until it was finally refuted in William Stafford's « The Mozart Myths » , in 1991. (6)

Levi offers a provocative comment on the longevity of this myth :

« The sheer determination with which (these scholars) pursued their ideas appears unsettling, and raises the disturbing question of the extent to which a neo-Nazi strain still impinges upon post-War German Mozart scholarship. » (page 239)

This speculation may seem far-fetched, but it echoes other scholars' claims that there is an « occasional brown residue » in post-War German musicology. (7) Levi points also to the work of Gert Kerschbaumer and Oliver Rathkolb, who have shown that the Austrians' post-War appropriation of Mozart has disturbing parallels in terms of ideas and rhetoric with that of the Nazis. (page 244) Problematic as it is, connecting the Nazi period with the post-War period is one of the overall goals of Levi's scholarship, as he states outright in his 1st book :

« One of the central preoccupations is to establish a sense of continuity in 20th Century German music. » (8)

This continuity is important to expose, both for the historical story that it tells and for the implications it has for current views of German music and scholarship.

The prominent trend in Mozart scholarship of the post-War period was the attempt to restore Mozart as a universal cosmopolitan composer. Unlike other Germanic composers such as Richard Wagner, whose ideological baggage was far weightier, Mozart's new image was quickly accepted. Paradoxically, because of this swift rehabilitation the « brown residue » was allowed to remain :

« Many of the performers and musicologists most closely associated with Mozart, including those who had willingly served in politically compromised events such as the Nazified Salzburg Festivals emerged unscathed to reclaim their prominent positions in Austro-German musical life after 1945. » (pages 236-237)

For example, Levi points to the way in which the aforementioned retranslations of Da Ponte's librettos by Georg Schünemann were promoted again in the 1950's, with reprints by Peters in Leipzig and, again, in the 1970's and 1980's by the New-York-based publisher Dover, the only change being the deletion of the preface indicating the Nazi patronage.

Mozart and the Nazis represents a valuable addition to the scholarly literature on music under National-Socialism, not only because of its focus on a single composer but also because of the significant light it sheds on the contradictions and tensions of Nazi cultural policies. The book's value can be said to reside above all in the way that it explores the consequences of Nazi appropriation in the later 20th Century. It should appeal to a broad constituency of scholars and may well serve as a model for reception studies of other composers during the Nazi period.

The 1941 Salzburg Festival (2-24 August)

Although hostilities continued to mount and the German army invaded the Soviet Union, the Festival returned to its regular programme. The 150th anniversary of Mozart's death was honoured with productions of 3 of his Operas. Admittedly, little remained of the Festival's former glory and international stature : the audiences consisted mainly of soldiers, whether on leave or recovering from wounds, and workers from German and Italian munitions factories. The Festival functioned as a sort of psychological weapon of domestic warfare and manipulation : as catastrophe loomed ever larger on the horizon, the people's morale had to be shored-up and their worries dispelled. One important administrative appointment was made on 13 September as Clemens Krauß was named the Festival's artistic director.

Le « Requiem » de Mozart

À l'époque hitlérienne (1941) , l'enregistrement sur disque par Bruno Kittel, à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, du « Requiem » de Mozart, pour célébrer le 150e anniversaire de la mort du compositeur, est un exemple extrême de l'accaparement étatique de l'œuvre, tel que l'avait critiqué Kraus. Ici, tous les éléments révélant trop clairement les origines juives de la chrétienté ont été retirés du texte, par le régime. On trouve donc « Te decet hymnus, Deus in cœlis » au lieu de « Deus in Sion » (c'est-à-dire « Dieu dans les cieux » au lieu de « Dieu de Sion ») ; et « hic in terra » (« ici sur terre ») au lieu de « in Jerusalem » (« à Jérusalem ») ; « Quam olim Abrahæ promisisti » (« Que tu as promise jadis à Abraham ») devient « Quam olim homini promisisti » (« Que tu as promise jadis à l'homme ») .

...

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart : « Requiem » in D minor (KV 626) .

Date of Recording : 1941.

Length : 52 minutes, 16 seconds.

Conductor : Bruno Kittel.

Soloists : Tilla Briem, Soprano ; Gertrud Freimuth, alto ; Walther Ludwig, tenor ; Fred Drissen, bass.

The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the Bruno Kittel Choir.

This 1941 recording of the Mozart « Requiem » is the most interesting, in part because of the work's stature and length, but also owing to the perverse policies that existed in Nazi Germany at the time. The conductor, Bruno Kittel, was a Hitler favourite, and he readily acceded to bowdlerizations that excised Sion and Jerusalem from the sung text. One might argue, perhaps, that the performance should have been allowed to rot, but its resurrection provides a symbol (foul as it may be) of the noxious impact of Nazism in general and the potentially insidious image resulting from any political manipulation of the arts.

It was « Polydor » (originally, the German division of « The Gramophone Company » named « Deutsche Grammophon ») that had made a recording of Mozart's « Requiem » Mass (KV 626) , in 1941, with singers Tilla Briem, soprano ; Gertrude Freimuth, contralto ; Walter Ludwig, tenor ; and Fred Drissen, bass. Used was an alternate Nazi-text (according to « The Gramophone Shop Encyclopædia of Recorded Music ») .

« The New York Times » later wrote :

« All references to the Jewish roots of Christianity are purged. “ Quam olim Abrahæ promisisti ” (As was promised to Abraham) becomes “ Quam olim homini promisisti ” (As was promised to man) . “ Deus in Sion ” (God in Zion) becomes “ Deus in cælis ” (God in Heaven) . »

Josef Gœbbels banned the playing of Mozart's « Requiem » over the radio during the War, because it was « world-renouncing and depressing » .

Reviewing a new vocal score of Mozart's « Requiem » , in October 1940, Herbert Gerigk urged that future editions of the work should be divested of their original liturgical connections, with the Latin-text replaced by a German translation. Coincidentally, a few months later, Hermann Stephani, Professor of Music at the University of Marburg, had gone some way towards meeting Gerigk's suggestions by proposing to « cleanse » Mozart's « Requiem » of its Hebraic words. In a short article, whose publication in both « Zeitschrift für Musik » and « Die Musik » gave this idea a greater weight of authority, Stephani suggested that :

« Mozart's “ Requiem ”, the deepest and most moving of all those Masses dedicated to the memory of the beloved dead should not be suppressed because of a handful of passages in the text that are inappropriate to our age. The following revision is therefore suggested :

“ Te decet hymnus Deus in cœlis ” (instead of “ in Sion ”) , “ et tibi reddetur votum hic in terra ” (instead of “ in Jerusalem ”) , “ quam tu credentibus ” (instead of “ quam olim Abrahæ ”) , “ promisisti in sempiternum ” (instead of “ et semini eius ”) , “ Dominus Deus omnipotens ” (instead of “ Sabaoth ”) . »

It should be emphasised that Stephani's textual amendments were, by no means, universally adopted in all performances of the « Requiem » that took place from 1941 onwards. Wilhelm Furtwängler certainly had no truck with them, judging by the evidence of the program-book for his performance of the work which presents the words as set by Mozart at the final concerts of the 1941 « Mozartwoche des deutschen Reiches » , in Vienna. But, in Berlin, they were enthusiastically espoused by the choral conductor Bruno Kittel, who regularly directed such repertory with Furtwängler's Berlin Philharmonic. In the autumn of 1941, Kittel was contracted to make a recording of Mozart's « Requiem » for « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » with the Bruno Kittel Choir and the Berlin Philharmonic. The recording confirms that the text of the « Requiem » follows, word for word, the suggestions Ist outlined by Stephani.

The adaptation of Mozart's « Requiem » was almost certainly the last substantial work by the composer to have been subjected to ideological adaptation during the 3rd « Reich » . During the final years of the War, the emphasis shifted towards guarding Germany's cultural heritage as the nation engaged in a bitter struggle for its very survival. Herbert Gerigk, editor of the journal « Musik im Kriege » and co-author with Theo Stengel of the « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » , became the self-appointed custodian of this legacy. He invested a considerable amount of time and effort in master-minding the confiscation and enforced return to Germany of valuable manuscripts. These included many by Mozart that were formerly in the hands of Jews or had resided in libraries in the occupied territories. He also maintained a watchful eye over any further signs of unwarranted Jewish contamination of German music. In the spring of 1944, Gerigk alighted on a long-running musicological dispute concerning the authorship of Mozart's « Wiegenlied » « Schlafe mein Prinzchen, schlaf ein » . At the end of the 19th Century, Max Friedländer had published an article which cited evidence to suggest that Bernhard Flies, a Berlin-based doctor and music dilettante, rather than Mozart was the composer of the song. Friedländer's verdict was, in fact, upheld in 1937 by the Mozart scholar Alfred Einstein in the 3rd Edition of the complete Köchel catalogue (KV) . Yet, after consulting the 1873 « Musikalisches Konversations Lexikon » , Gerigk discovered that Flies was of Jewish descent. Suspecting a conspiracy on the part of the Jews to try and pass-off a popular work by Mozart as one of their own, Gerigk provided his own explanation as to how its authorship could have been wrested from Mozart :

« We must assume that a copy of the song fell into Jewish hands and that, an amateur musician eager for admiration (Flies) , simply had a few copies of the song printed in his name. Until now, repeated complaints from leading Aryans about Friedländer's view were strikingly ineffective because Jewish “ scholars ” tried with suspicious and unfounded zeal to ridicule the arguments submitted in Mozart's defence. For example, the Jew Alfred Einstein, the editor of the famous Köchel index of Mozart's music, definitively classified the lullaby as a misappropriation in 1937. Once again, the time has come to reverse the efforts of Judea and to give Mozart due credit. As this song has rightfully become one of the musician's most popular melodies, the people clearly have demonstrated their support for Mozart. »

Herbert Gerigk

The German musicologist Herbert Gerigk was born on 2 March 1905 in Mannheim and died on 20 June 1996 in Dortmund. He was notable for his co-authoring of the Nazi « Lexicon of Jews in Music » .

After graduation in 1928, Herbert Gerigk published in 1932 a thesis on Giuseppe Verdi. It was the 1st important musicological overall presentation of Verdi in Germany and appeared in the series « The Great Masters of Music » .

Gerigk joined the Nazi Party in 1932 and joined the SA (« Sturmabteilung ») , in 1933. From 1935, he worked in the National-Socialist German « Reich » as « head the music-section for the monitoring of the intellectual and ideological training and education of the Nazi Party In 1935, he joined the SS (« Schutzstaffel ») .

Gerigk took-over the planning of the music policy of Alfred Rosenberg and was responsible for its implementation in the Rosenberg's office. This policy was to suppress Jewish representation in musical life by removing Jews from their positions and stopping the spread of new music.

Gerigk's most famous work was the antisemitic concoction « Lexicon of Jews in Music » , which he edited in collaboration with Theophil Stengel , Speaker of the « Reich » Music Chamber. The aim of the work was to prevent « accidental » performances of works by Jewish and part-Jewish composers, to identify all Jewish music practitioners, but particularly to devalue composers fixed in the German musical tradition such as Felix Mendelssohn, Giacomo Meyerbeer and Gustav Mahler, through lies and deliberate falsification.

During the Second World War, Gerigk took a leading role in the persecution of Jews. He headed the Office of Music in « Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg » (ERR) , and was a driving force in all activities of the « Music Special Staff » in occupied countries. The activity included the plunder of cultural property in the occupied countries and its transport to Germany. In occupied France alone, Gerigk's investigators carried-out robberies over 2 years from 34,500 Jewish houses or apartments, including those of Emmerich Kálmán, Darius Milhaud, Fernand Halphen, Arno Poldes, Gregor Piatigorski and Wanda Landowska.

Of the machinery of destruction of the Holocaust, Gerigk wrote in 1942 :

« The question must be raised as to whether it is appropriate, given the liquidation of European Jewry, to permit Jewish half-breeds as cultural workers in any form. »

In 1943, he became chief-editor of the music magazine promoted by Rosenberg, « Music in War » ; in 1944, he was promoted to « SS-Hauptsturmführer » .

After the Second World War, Gerigk was never brought to justice for his complicity in the Holocaust. Although his Nazi past prevented an academic career, he worked as a music-critic was at the Dortmund « Ruhr-Nachrichten » . In 1954, he wrote a Dictionary of Music, which was issued by the same firm (« Bernhard Hahnefeld Verlag ») that had published him during the Nazi era.

One of the most notorious publications in the world of Nazi musicology, Herbert Gerigk's « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » (Lexicon of Jews in Music) was so popular that, by 1943, thousands of copies were circulating throughout the German « Reich ». The book, ostensibly offering a complete list of Jewish and part-Jewish musicians, also took the opportunity to defame famous musical Jews, such as Felix Mendelssohn, Giacomo Meyerbeer and Gustav Mahler. Gerigk was one of the most influential musicologists of his day, graced with the title : « Leiter der Hauptstelle Musik beim Beauftragten des Führers für die Überwachung der gesamten geistigen und weltanschaulichen Schulung und Erziehung der NSDAP » (Leader of the Music Branch by order of the « Führer » for the Supervision of the Entire Intellectual and Ideological Enlightenment of the Nazi Party) . His varied career under Hitler illustrates some of the many ways in which music was implicated in Nazi ideology. His comfortable life after the War is also typical of the treatment of musicologists during post-War denazification actions.

Gerigk was born on 2 March 1905 in the German town of Mannheim. Although opposed to jazz and atonal music, he did not make explicitly racist accusations, frequently writing about Jewish composers favourably and without bias. However, the early 1930's saw a steady change in his political opinions. The musicologist became increasingly concerned about the « oriental » trends in German music, and subscribed to the theory that Jews, as a race, were responsible for the national disillusionment of Germany following the defeat of World War I. Suddenly, anti-Semitism entered his writings, serving as the explanation for his previous lack of professional success. Hoping to eliminate the competition he felt was depriving « Aryans » like himself of promotion, he wrote and spoke publicly about the suffering that Jews were inflicting upon Germans in the musical world.

Gerigk established a name for himself as an important Nazi musicologist. Indeed, even within the framework of Nazi ideology Gerigk was known as being particularly conservative and critical. He was one of the few Nazis to condemn Werner Egk's otherwise popular Opera, « Die Zauberflöte » (The Magic Violin) , and, in 1936, it was his harsh review of Carl Orff's « Carmina Burana » at its premiere that was partially responsible for the delay before the work achieved success. Gerigk was a meticulous and enthusiastic worker, and his « Reichsmusikkammer » (Nazi Chamber of Music) was one of the most active divisions of Alfred Rosenberg's « Reichskulturkammer » (Nazi Chamber of Culture) . His workers attended every major concert in Berlin, read important music publications, and submitted thorough reviews to Gerigk. Gerigk's passion for collecting information about people led him to contact students at universities and music academies, in order to gather information on the politics of the professors. Over the years, his power and reputation grew steadily. He supervised the publication of serious musicology studies independent of the Rosenberg office, which itself controlled several publishing ventures. When Rosenberg took-over the long-time anti-Semitic journal, « Die Musik » , Gerigk finally had a regular outlet for his voice. In 1937, he was made editor of the magazine, to which he had already contributed many anti-Semitic articles.

By the late 1930's, the Party sensed the need for a comprehensive race-based guide to German music. Having previously experienced countless scandals due to inaccurate information or incomplete lexicons (« Aryan » artists had been accused of being Jewish, just as openly Jewish musicians had been allowed to continue working) , Party officials wanted a single reference work to which to turn. An extensive undertaking, Gerigk's « Lexikon » was published in the NSDAP series on « Research on the Jewish Question ». Although rife with inaccuracies and misrepresentations, it was substantially more detailed than any previously written work of this nature. The book opened with the proud assertion that :

« The purification of our culture and, thus also, our musical culture of all Jewish elements has been successful. Clear legal restrictions have ensured that in Germany the Jew is not publicly active in the cultural sphere, not as musician or composer, not as writer or publisher or businessman. »

Gerigk nonetheless went on to request further assistance from readers in tracking-down relevant names ; indeed, the « Lexikon » proved to be an ongoing work. In a later edition, Gerigk decided to extend the book's coverage from just « full » and « half-Jews » to black-listing all those who had « Jewish blood ». Unsurprisingly, his « Lexikon » sparked numerous battles over racial identity. Family members of deceased musicians, and occasionally still-living men, regularly filed complaints against the inclusion of their names in Gerigk's book.

In 1943, Gerigk reflected on the positive impact his « Lexikon » had wrought on the German cultural landscape. Remembering the pre-Nazi era, he warned his readership not to forget the times when ...

« The German was almost at the point of becoming homeless in his own Fatherland. Key-positions were occupied mostly by Jews. Besides that, free-masons and exponents of other political entities outside the State were also influential in music. It is very instructive to reflect upon the conditions of that time. »

He was convinced that his « Lexikon » was a key-part of solving this problem.

Gerigk's career received another boost when he was appointed to another « cultural position », this time as part of the « Reich » 's military program of expansion and conquest. In his new position, Gerigk was responsible for stealing or otherwise « re-claiming » objects of musical interest from lands annexed or invaded by Germany. He was primarily busy in occupied Paris, where he collected valuable musical booty, including autographs by Christoph Willibald Gluck and Richard Wagner. He also participated in journeys to Eastern Europe, repossessing objects belonging to Jewish musicians and collectors. Among his many acquisitions were folk-music archives from Minsk, Warsaw and Kraków.

Despite his well-documented support of the Nazi regime, and the role he played in ruining the careers of countless musicians, Gerigk managed to thrive in the post-War years as well. Admittedly, his Nazi past, well-documented by his numerous enemies, prohibited him from acquiring a full-time post as an academic at a German university. However, Gerigk managed to earn a comfortable living as a music-critic in Dortmund. He remained an active author for decades after the War, publishing a musical encyclopædia, as well as numerous other articles and books, well into the 1970's. Herbert Gerigk died on 20 June 1996 in Dortmund, at the age of 90.

Herbert Gerigk (geboren 2. März 1905 in Mannheim ; gestorben 20. Juni 1996 in Dortmund) war ein deutscher Musikwissenschaftler, der als einer der einflussreichsten Antisemiten in der Musikwissenschaft des 20. Jahrhunderts gilt. Dafür spricht sein gemeinsam mit Theophil Stengel herausgegebenes Lexikon der Juden in der Musik und seine Tätigkeit als hoher Offizier im Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg bei Raub und Plünderung von Musikalien vor allem aus dem Besitz von verfolgten Juden in den von Deutschland besetzten Ländern im Zweiten Weltkrieg.

Nach vorausgegangener Promotion 1928 habilitierte sich Herbert Gerigk 1932 mit einer Arbeit über Giuseppe Verdi. Es war die erste bedeutende musikwissenschaftliche Gesamtdarstellung Verdis in Deutschland und erschien in der Reihe « Die großen Meister der Musik » .

Gerigk trat 1932 in die NSDAP und 1933 in die SA ein. Anschließend war er Kreiskulturwart in Danzig. Seit 1935 arbeitete er im nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Reich als « Leiter der Hauptstelle Musik beim Beauftragten des Führers für die Überwachung der gesamten geistigen und weltanschaulichen Schulung und Erziehung der NSDAP » . 1935 trat er der SS bei.

Gerigk übernahm die Planung der Musikpolitik Alfred Rosenbergs und war auch für deren Durchführung im Amt Rosenberg zuständig. Diese hatte als Ziel, die jüdischen Vertreter des Musiklebens aus ihren Stellungen zu entfernen und die Ausbreitung der Neuen Musik zu unterdrücken. Seit 1937 war er Herausgeber der Zeitschrift Die Musik.

Gerigks bekanntestes Werk war das antisemitische Machwerk Lexikon der Juden in der Musik, das er in Zusammenarbeit mit Theophil Stengel, Referent der Reichsmusikkammer, herausgab. Das Nachschlagewerk sollte Veranstalter von der « versehentlichen » Aufführung von Werken « jüdischer » und « halb-jüdischer » Komponisten abhalten, alle jüdischen Musikausübenden erfassen, hauptsächlich aber fest in der deutschen Musiktradition stehende Komponisten wie etwa Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, Giacomo Meyerbeer und Gustav Mahler durch Lügen und bewusst falsche Quellenauslegung diffamieren und abwerten.

Auch während des Zweiten Weltkrieges nahm Gerigk eine führende Rolle in der Verfolgung der Juden ein. Er leitete das Amt Musik im Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg (ERR) und wurde zur treibenden Kraft bei allen Aktivitäten des Sonderstabes Musik in den besetzten Ländern. Die Tätigkeit war die Plünderung von Kulturgut in den besetzten Ländern und der Transport nach Deutschland. Allein im besetzten Frankreich raubten Gerigks Fahnder in zwei Jahren 34.500 jüdische Häuser oder Wohnungen aus, darunter die von Emmerich Kálmán, Darius Milhaud, Fernand Halphen, Arno Poldes, Gregor Piatigorski, Wanda Landowska. Angesichts der Vernichtungsmaschinerie des Holocaust schrieb er 1942 :

« Die Frage muß aufgeworfen werden, ob es im Zeichen der Liquidierung des Judentums in Europa angebracht ist, jüdische Mischlinge als Kulturschaffende in irgendeiner Form zuzulassen. »

1943 wurde er Hauptschriftleiter der von Rosenberg geleiteten Zeitschrift Musik im Kriege, 1944 wurde er zum SS-Hauptsturmführer im Sicherheitsdienst befördert.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg mußte sich Gerigk nie für seine Mittäterschaft beim Holocaust vor Gericht verantworten.

Zwar stand seine nationalsozialistische Vergangenheit einer akademischen Laufbahn entgegen ; er war jedoch bei den Dortmunder Ruhr-Nachrichten als Musikkritiker tätig. 1953 versuchte er, mithilfe der CDU und FDP Kulturdezernent in Bochum zu werden, scheiterte aber. 1954 veröffentlichte er das Fachwörterbuch der Musik im Verlag von Bernhard Hahnefeld, der schon das « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » herausgegeben hatte.

Gerigk wurde auf dem Dortmunder Ostfriedhof beigesetzt.

Le Nazisme et l'histoire de la musique : Wagner, Bruckner, Schumann

Les totalitarismes du XXe siècle n'ont pas eu comme unique prétention de dominer le présent, mais également de déterminer la relation à l'histoire ; il n'y a donc rien d'étonnant à ce que les Nazis aient cherché à marquer de leur empreinte la manière dont devait être abordé le patrimoine musical. Dès 1920, des critiques et musicologues proches des milieux politiques conservateurs multiplient les interprétations « polarisantes » de la tradition. Dans une revue comme la « Zeitschrift für Musik » (créée en 1834 par un certain Robert Schumann) , le critique Alfred Heuß n'aura de cesse d'opposer une tradition germanique « pure » à une « fausse » tradition, sous influence « étrangère » , considérée comme particulièrement néfaste lorsqu'elle est le fait de musiciens d'origine juive. Ce mouvement culminera avec la publication, en 1932, du livre raciste « Musik und Rasse » (Musique et race) de Richard Eichenauer : toute trace de critique ou de musicologie y disparaît sous un fatras de considérations dignes du pire Wagner lorsque ce dernier se faisait théoricien.

Avec la nomination, en janvier 1933, de Adolf Hitler à la Chancellerie, il n'est plus question que de propagande. La coercition sur la création s'appuie sur un panthéon de figures et d'œuvres tutélaires, au 1er rang desquelles se trouvent Richard Wagner et Anton Bruckner. On connaît les liens quasi familiaux qui liaient Bayreuth au sommet du pouvoir nazi ; c'est par exemple sur les deniers propres de la Chancellerie que le Festival retrouve alors une stabilité financière. La radio nationale allemande utilise à partir de 1934 la figure du compositeur pour mettre en avant une personnalité exemplaire par ses qualités « germaniques » , sa pensée politique et idéologique, dans un curieux mélange de retransmissions de grande tenue (en direct de Bayreuth) et de propagande. Bruckner sera, quant à lui un compositeur choyé par les Orchestres allemands. Le dimanche 6 juin 1937, Adolf Hitler inaugure son buste au « Walhalla » de Regensburg aux sons du mouvement lent de sa 8e Symphonie.

À cette Ire reconnaissance devait faire suite la transformation de Saint-Florian, la ville où Bruckner avait été organiste, en un second Bayreuth, et Linz, son lieu de résidence, en un centre culturel de la germanité. Il n'est pas jusqu'à Schumann, dont les derniers moments auraient pu ternir le souvenir auprès des hérauts de la « grande race allemande » , qui n'ait été instrumentalisé par les Nazis. Dans sa biographie de 1941, Wolfgang Boetticher défend la thèse d'un Schumann antisémite et prend pour cela à témoin certaines dissensions avec Mendelssohn et une franche hostilité envers Meyerbeer. Mais au-delà de leur rayonnement personnel, ce sont certaines œuvres de ces 3 compositeurs qui ont vu l'histoire de leur réception particulièrement influencée par le contexte particulier de cette époque. Ainsi les « Maîtres-chanteurs » de Nuremberg de Richard Wagner, devenu parangon de l'œuvre nationaliste et, à ce titre, représenté à haute dose sur les scènes allemandes entre 1933 et 1944. Il ne pouvait en être autrement s'agissant d'un Opéra qui se voulait une représentation du génie du « Volk » allemand, sans cesse capable de se renouveler face aux mesquineries du conservatisme.

Le prélude de l'Opéra plante le décor de cet antagonisme par un contraste thématique audible dans l'exposition de ce qui s'apparente, selon le musicologue Carl Dahlhaus, à une « forme lisztienne » (c'est-à-dire l'association en un mouvement unitaire de la forme sonate Classique et du déroulement d'une Symphonie) .

Throughout history toppling of public statues has almost always been indicative of a coming change in public life. Statues are set-up to commemorate certain personages, to endorse certain beliefs, and when there is no longer any place or tolerance for either, these have to be summarily removed. Usually, with a great ceremonial ruckus - and, in modern times, with the omnipresent press in attendance. The wreckers pose and strut before the thing they have destroyed with an obvious sense of achievement, egged on by a cheering, fickle crowd - this same crowd that was around to applaud when the statue went-up. Other by-standers, unwilling to join in and helpless to prevent, watch and wonder about the train of events that will soon follow the symbolic gesture.

Before a watching crowd, in Leipzig, the statue of music composer Felix Mendelssohn was pulled-off its pedestal and destroyed. Perhaps, one of the finest and best-loved to emerge from the long musical tradition of Germany - which was why he was accorded the honour of a statue in front of the « Gewandhaus », Leipzig's famous concert-hall.

However, his greatness paled in comparison to the new reality of being a Jew along with it. It was 14 November 1936 and « Herr » Hitler had been in power long enough to make his position on Jews blindingly clear. There was no place for them outside concert halls or, for that matter, inside concert halls.

The toppling of the Mendelssohn statue, which received only a small mention in « The New York Times », the following day, was a major turning point in the persecution of Jewish Musicians, Composers, Conductors, Singers, Actors, and other theatre personalities, not to mention Jewish professionals from every other walk of life, that had commenced since the moment the Nazis took center-stage, 3 years earlier. So far, they had been obliged to submit to the Racial Laws of 1933 and register their race and religion in the « Reichsmusikkammer » (« Reich » Music Chamber) , which automatically meant a cessation in possible employment, regardless of talent, for millions of young, upcoming musicians. The well-known, established ones had found themselves receiving cryptic notices and warnings « advising against » performing in public, having performances canceled altogether, or being targeted for uncouth threats from the local Nazi thugs who turned-up to disrupt the performances that did go on. They had watched, appalled, while Jewish shops and businesses were boycotted, defaced, and forced to close down. They had witnessed the outrageous book-burning of 10 May 1933 when, with wild crowd approval, books by writers like Thomas Mann, Karl Marx, Heinrich Heine, Sigmund Freud, Ernest Hemingway, Helen Keller, and others had been tossed into bonfires on the streets of Germany.

Many German intellectuals, Jewish and non-Jewish (Heinrich Mann, Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht, Marlene Dietrich, Albert Einstein, Bruno Bettelheim, Walter Gropius, Rudolf Serkin, Erich Leinsdorf, Lotte Lehmann, Berthold Goldschmidt, Otto Klemperer, Franz Werfel, and Bruno Walter, amongst them) grasped which way the wind was blowing and left the country while they still could. Others, since, often times, it is difficult for civilized beings to comprehend that the rest of the world isn't always of the same decent mold and can be eminently capable of unimaginable horrors, chose to remain and regard the growing excesses as « isolated incidences » that would soon pass - it was a new regime, still setting about its business after all the turmoil of earlier years, and in unsettled times, as one very modern American put it, things happen.

After 14 November, however, things happened on a far more urgent scale. The government issued a decree banning completely all Jewish performers and those tainted with even a drop of Jewish blood from any further association or participation in the cultural life of Nazi Germany. « Jewish » music, along with « Negro » music, and anything else that wasn't composed by racially superior beings, now became taboo - the Nazis wanted to liberate German culture from the « morbid excrescencies of insane and degenerate men » .

Accordingly, some of the most famous and innovative musical works of the past Centuries and many of current years (aside from Mendelssohn's compositions, works by people like Max Bruch, Jacques Offenbach, Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schoenberg, Ernst Křenek, Salomon Sulzer, Berthold Goldschmidt, Erik Wolfgang Korngold, Anton von Webern, to mention a few) were displayed as prime examples of the unwanted degeneracy at the « Entarte Musik » exhibit of 1938. They were also, of course, « dropped » from the repertoires of the Orchestras that continued to flourish in these years. The Music that could, henceforth, be heard in the 3rd « Reich » was mainly that detected as « Good German Music » by the discerning ears of Adolf Hitler and his Minister of Propaganda, Josef Gœbbels. Since this included the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, Richard Wagner, and Anton Bruckner, the German Public didn't grumble too much. Some of the other, more current Nazi musical favourites were Hans Hotter, Herbert von Karajan, Clemens Krauß, Elly Ney, Hans Pfitzner, Li Stadelmann, Richard Strauß, and Wilhelm Furtwängler. A few of these were rabidly anti-Semitic National-Socialists, a few helpless puppets, and a few, like Richard Strauß, outright opportunists who cared to only and not really unreasonably safeguard their musical and personal interests - the latter was briefly appointed the President of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , until the Nazis decided he was too opportunistic for even them and relieved him of the post.

Arnold Schoenberg, who had already left for the United States, in 1933, wrote :

« I have at last learned the lesson that has been forced upon me and I shall not ever forget it. It is that I am not a German, not a European, indeed perhaps scarcely a human being (at least, the Europeans prefer the worst of their race to me) but I am a Jew. »

In another letter, he wrote :

« To be sure, after that anything is a kingdom of heaven — however, little it looks like that. »

It is, after all, not an easy matter leaving behind the entire life you had built-up and beginning again from scratch in a completely new environment, a place where people, though for most part well-meaning, have no idea about you and your previous circumstances. Where, on being introduced, you don't find yourself being feted for your name like you once were, but instead being asked for its spelling. It took a long time for Schönberg and the other emigres to adjust to the change (or rather fall) in their social circumstances, but eventually many of them managed to find their feet and prosper once more and culturally enrich their new homeland.

For a few, like the poet Stefan Zweig, who had written librettos for the Operas of Richard Strauß, however, it was too difficult to attempt the transition ; the loss of homeland together with the treachery of former, respected colleagues, who had also once been close friends proved too much. He committed suicide on 22 February 1942, in Brazil, leaving behind an explanatory note :

« After one's 60th year, unusual powers would be needed in order to make another wholly new beginning. Those that I possess have been exhausted by long years of homeless wandering. I salute all my friends ! May it be granted them, yet, to see the dawn after the long night ! I, all too impatient, go on ahead. »

The Jewish musicians that had remained behind in « the long night » now faced not just a loss of livelihood, but an extinguishing of life itself. And death too was not to be easy. Incarcerated into concentration camps, undergoing unspeakable and unimaginable atrocities, many found themselves in the untenable positions of having to provide music (music that had once had a beautiful and liberating context) in the systematic murder of their own brethren. A great many committed suicide rather than continue. Fania Fenelon, who survived Auschwitz as a member of one of the 6 Orchestras that that camp boasted, has given an heartrending account of the experience in her book, « Playing for Time » . In the « Theresienstadt » concentration camp, where the Germans wanted to create an illusion of well-being for the Nazi propaganda film, « The " Führer " gives the Jews a City » and for hoodwinking the International Red Cross, the Jewish inmates were prodded into putting-up musical programs. 2 of the most famous of these that survived the War, though their creators didn't, are : « Brundibar, the Organ Grinder » , composed by Hans Krása ; and « The Emperor of Atlantis » , by Viktor Ullmann.

Viktor Ullmann, who was a student of Arnold Schönberg, was murdered in Auschwitz. Other promising lives that were cut short at this camp - the Czech avant-garde composer, Pavel Haas ; the conductor Martin Rosenberg ; the young violinist and niece of Gustav Mahler, Alma Maria Rosé ; the contralto Magda Spiegel ; the baritone and cantor Erhard E. Wechseltmann.

A great many others perished in the other Nazi camps. As many of the deaths went unrecorded, it will perhaps never be known how many exactly disappeared forever into the dark night of the Holocaust.

Anton von Webern et les Nazis

Après plusieurs tentatives infructueuses, Anton von Webern tiendra finalement 2 séries de conférences consacrées à la musique de 12 sons, en 1932-1933 (publiées après sa mort en 1960) , d'après les notes de son élève Willy Reich sous le titre de « Chemin vers la nouvelle musique » . Mis à part quelques articles surtout consacrés à la musique d'Arnold Schönberg, ces conférences constituent l'essentiel des écrits de Webern. L'activité de chef de chœur de Webern, à partir de 1921, puis de chef d'orchestre en 1927 (« Arbeiter-Symphonie Konzert ») lui apportent une certaine renommée, en particulier, dans le répertoire des Symphonies de Gustav Mahler dont il est l'un des grands interprètes. Il mène, en tant que chef-invité, une carrière qui le conduira notamment à Londres jusqu'en 1936. Après le départ de Schönberg, en 1933, et la mort d'Alban Berg, en 1935, Webern est de plus en plus isolé et vit dans des conditions précaires. Cette période voit néanmoins son engagement en faveur du National-Socialisme, alors que son nom figure sur la sinistre liste de « l'art dégénéré ». La guerre accentue sa solitude qu'il compense par sa relation avec la poétesse Hildegard Jone à qui il empruntera plusieurs textes pour ses lieder et ses cantates. Son fils Peter, mobilisé, est tué en 1945, et la mort brutale du compositeur, quelques mois après, met fin à une œuvre restée confidentielle pendant plus de 10 ans. Les différentes versions données de sa mort (le compositeur a été abattu accidentellement par un soldat américain) ont voulu faire croire à une « erreur tragique » et à de sombres histoires d'implication de ses gendres dans le marché noir. En réalité, ceux-ci, Nazis engagés et actifs, sont plus vraisemblablement à l'origine de cet événement, Webern ayant plus probablement protégé leur fuite en tentant de faire diversion.

Après avoir fini ses études (1908), Anton von Webern occupe de nombreux postes de chef d'orchestre à Bad Ischl, à Teplice (Teplitz), à Dantzig (Gdansk) ou à Szczecin ainsi qu'à Prague, après quoi il retourne à Vienne où il dirige le « Wiener Arbeiter-Sinfoniekonzerte » (l'Orchestre symphonique des travailleurs de Vienne), de 1922 à 1934. Mais la montée en puissance du régime nazi d'Adolf Hitler (et notamment l'« Anschluss », en 1938, qui verra l'Allemagne s'accaparer l'Autriche) déstabilise Webern puisque sa musique est qualifiée par les autorités de « dégénérée », de « bolchévisme culturel ». Il doit donc, pour gagner sa vie, travailler chez ses éditeurs, Universal-Edition.

Alors que, la Deuxième Guerre mondiale achevée, Webern se sentait plus en sécurité à Mittersill (près de Salzbourg) avec des parents. Cependant, c'est là qu'il fut tué accidentellement par un soldat américain, le 15 septembre 1945 : alors qu'une opération menée par l'armée américaine dans la maison familiale se préparait (un membre de la famille était soupçonné de marché noir), Webern sortit fumer un cigare après le couvre-feu et se heurta à un soldat qui fit feu.

Anton von Webern (qui, au passage, fut probablement influencé par Richard Wagner à ses débuts) laisse derrière lui 31 Opus et une vingtaine de pièces non numérotées, aussi bien pour voix seule que pour voix accompagnée, pour orchestre ou pour piano seul. Il appartient au 1er cercle de la « Seconde École de Vienne », explorant l'atonalité, le dodécaphonisme et la musique sérielle, et fut reconnu par la plupart des jeunes compositeurs des années 1950 comme le membre le plus marquant de ce cercle.

En février 1934, une série d'émeutes et d'affrontements entre des miliciens fascistes nazis et des militants communistes embrasent Vienne et Linz. Le chancelier Engelbert Dollfuß décrète le couvre-feu et instaure l'état d'urgence : tous les élus Socio-Démocrates voient leur mandat annulé, les syndicats et associations ouvrières dissous. Anton von Webern perd alors son poste de chef d'orchestre à la RAVAG (radio autrichienne), ce qui le privera d'une partie de ses modestes revenus. En 1935, Alban Berg meurt d'une septicémie. En 1936, Webern est pressenti pour diriger la création du « Concerto à la mémoire d'un ange » de Berg, à Barcelone, mais après quelques répétitions, Webern se sent incapable de continuer. De fait, cette œuvre sera créée par Hermann Scherchen. Cet événement mettra une fin définitive à la carrière de chef de Webern.

En 1938, les Nazis annexent l'Autriche. Webern voit une grande partie de ses amis, de ses élèves juifs s'exiler. Ne prenant pas lui-même le chemin de l'exil, il reste en Autriche et sera alors mis au banc de la scène culturelle par les Nazis. Il fait partie des musiciens considérés comme « dégénérés » par les Nazis. Il se réfugie dans un exil intérieur, poursuivant inlassablement son œuvre, malgré les bombardements (à partir de l'automne 1943), un enrôlement forcé (mais bref) dans la défense anti-aérienne. Il pourra néanmoins, à 2 reprises, quitter l'Autriche pour la Suisse : en 1940, pour assister à une reprise de sa « Passacaille » pour orchestre, Opus 1 ; puis, en 1943, pour la création de ses « Variations pour orchestre », Opus 30, à Winterthur. Très démuné financièrement, il est contraint de solliciter, à plusieurs reprises, la « Künstlerdank », une bourse de survie accordée aux musiciens nécessiteux par le ministère nazi de la Culture. En février 1945, son fils Peter, en service dans l'armée du « Reich », meurt dans un bombardement, près de Zagreb. C'est pour Webern un choc dont il ne se remettra jamais. Le 31 mars 1945, pour fuir l'armée soviétique, Webern et sa famille quittent leur maison de Maria Enzersdorf (près de Mödling, à 20 kilomètres au sud de Vienne) pour Mittersill, dans le Tyrol. C'est là que Webern passera les derniers mois de sa vie. Juste après la capitulation, il est pressenti pour occuper un poste d'enseignement au Conservatoire de Vienne, mais il n'en aura jamais écho.

Few composers suffered under the rule of the Nazis as severely as did Anton von Webern. Following the annexation of Austria into the 3rd « Reich », in 1938, Webern's music was declared « decadent » and effectively banned from performance throughout most of the German world. During World War II, at the age of 60, he was forced to enlist in a civilian brigade that did grueling and dangerous manual labor. His son, Peter, was a soldier in the German army and was killed near the end of the War. Webern and his wife experienced utter deprivation during the chaos at War's end. Finally, he was himself shot and killed by an American occupation soldier.

Anton von Webern had no sympathy for the Nazis' anti-Semitic ideology or for their brutish politics. But, in the early days of World War II, he expressed a naively idealistic enthusiasm for the 3rd « Reich » and even for its leader, Adolf Hitler. This was very common at the time among German people from all walks of life, for the epic tragedy to be inflicted by Hitler upon the world was still unsuspected. Motivated by a strong sense of patriotism, Webern believed that the German nation could lead the world in a positive direction.

Although an outstanding teacher, Anton von Webern never received an appointment at the University of Vienna or the Music Academy. He held a minor position at the Israelitic Institute for the Blind (1925-1931) and, from 1932 on, gave private lecture courses. Public recognition at home remained limited to the Vienna Music Prize, awarded to him twice (1924, 1932) under the Socialist regime.

Politically never active, Anton von Webern, yet, fell victim to the rising tide of Right-wing nationalism. Schönberg left Europe soon after Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933. The Nazis branded the music of the « New Vienna School » as « cultural Bolshevism » and « degenerate art » and banned performance of this type of music. Webern's artistic isolation grew complete with Alban Berg's death, in 1935, and his economic plight became desperate after the Nazi annexation of Austria, in 1938.

The political upheaval brought to a halt the publication of his works. With almost no private pupils left, Webern had to resort to accepting such tasks as piano arrangements of works by lesser composers. Always of a retiring disposition, he fell into total obscurity with the outbreak of World War II.

Webern's disillusionment with the Hitler regime was deepened by increasing bombing raids. In February 1945, his only son, Peter, was killed in a strafing attack on a military train on the eastern front. When the Russian Army neared Vienna, the composer and his wife fled to Mittersill, near Salzburg, where their 3 daughters and grandchildren had sought refuge.

As the 1st Austrian Republic's political instability led towards the embrace of Adolf Hitler and Nazism, Anton von Webern's inner musical vision remained undimmed, producing a sequence of Masterworks that includes the Opus 23 and Opus 25 Lieder (1933-1934) ; the choral Cantata, « Das Augenlicht » (premiered by the BBC Symphony Orchestra, in 1938) ; and the beautiful Cantata No. 1, Opus 29 (1938-1940) . Outwardly, his over-literal patriotism and love of his Germanic « Heimat » led him perversely to approve the 3rd « Reich » 's 1938 « Anschluß » of Austria. Stupefyingly, his support for Nazi rule persisted even when his own music was pronounced « degenerate » , and performances of it were banned. Meanwhile, he persisted in visiting Jewish friends who had gone into hiding, on the grounds that the political situation made no difference to their continuing association. Much sanctimonious ink has been spilled as to whether Webern's music is somehow posthumously contaminated by this near-transcendent capacity for political self-delusion. But it takes a seriously prejudiced ear to hear the precepts of the 3rd « Reich » as being articulated in any way in Webern's later works.

As the War began to be lost, Webern reverted to a belated wish for deliverance from the conflict. With the Red Army closing-in on Vienna, Webern and Wilhelmine made their way west to Mittersill, in the Salzburg Alps, ending-up in U.S. occupied territory.

After Adolf Hitler took-over the reign, in 1933, Anton von Webern's music was banned as a manifestation of cultural Bolshevism and degeneration of art. His position in Austria became all the more difficult as after the « Anschluß » (the occupation and annexation of Austria, in 1938) , his works could not be published. Though Webern has sharply criticized the Nazi cultural policies through private lectures given in 1933, their intended publication did not occur at that time which proved fortunate to some extent. If it had been published, there would have been even more serious consequences. Despite all this, Webern's works with the « Vienna Workers Chorus » ended and, 4 years later, his contract with the Austrian Radio was also terminated. He tried to survive in the country by taking private tuitions to certain pupils and making piano arrangements of musical scores.

He composed 3 important choral works during the period of 1938 to 1944. In 1940, he produced his orchestral composition called : « Variations » , Opus 30. It was because of the Swiss philanthropist Werner Reinhart that Webern was able to attend the festive premiere of the « Variations for Orchestra » , in Winterthur, Switzerland, in 1943. Reinhart used all his monetary and diplomatic means to facilitate the travelling of Webern to Switzerland. In return for the support rendered, he dedicated the songs to Reinhart.

In February 1945, Webern and his wife Wilhelmine had to flee from Vienna to Mittersil, near Salzburg, as their son Peter was killed in an air bombardment of a troop train on the eastern front. They stayed with their daughter where they thought it would be safe. However, his life ended in a tragic note when on the evening of September 15, 1945, he was shot and killed by an American soldier by mistake, when he stepped-out of his son-in-law's house. Austria was under the occupation of Allies and his son-in-law was arrested for black-market activities. Despite the curfew that was imposed, he stepped-out of his house to enjoy a cigar, when he was shot. The soldier who was responsible for the action, Raymond Norwood Bell, was overcome by regret and died of alcoholism in 1955.

The case of Anton von Webern is both bizarre and tragic because of his established place in the music-world. As late as 1990, one historian of music could still write that this outstanding pupil of Arnold Schönberg and proponent of serial music had been indifferent toward National-Socialism. Given Webern's background one would like to think so, yet, it is far from the truth. The Austrian Webern, who originally had Left-wing ties, was shocked at first by the Nazis, who had forced the departure of his beloved teacher Schönberg from the « Preußische Akademie der Künste » and from Berlin. But then, he slowly came to sympathize with what he saw as an interesting experiment engendered by National-Socialism. According to his chief-biographers, the composer « maintained for years that Hitler, after satisfying his followers with an initial display of raw power, would moderate his policies » . Webern associated Hitler with everything that was positive in Germany, for, as the American violinist Louis Krasner has observed :

« He was passionate about his belief in the superiority of German culture and its destined, historic role. »

Arnold Schönberg, in exile, remained in touch with Webern by mail, telling him from Paris, in August 1933, about his resolve to reconvert to Judaism.

Then, on New Year's Day 1934, Schönberg wrote him from America that he was worried about him and his friend Alban Berg, neither of whom had written lately.

He wrote :

« Since, after all, we, Jews, have experienced it a hundred times, in these days, that the unbelievable has happened, that people had suddenly become Nazis who, yesterday, were still friends, I could not at all explain to myself your silence other than that you, too, had fallen in line. »

Webern quickly allayed his teacher's worries and, for a while, Schönberg felt at ease.

Thereafter, Webern fell on hard economic times as, musically, he found less and less acceptance. And, as Schönberg had feared, his empathy with National-Socialism intensified, so much so that, one day, he exclaimed that someone should attempt « to convince the Hitler regime of the rightness of the 12 tone system ». Whether there was a connection between the 2 factors at the time (penury, on the one hand ; and pro-Nazi sentiment, on the other) must be doubted, for Webern was living in the Vienna suburb of Mödling and had no chance of finding employment or any kind of reward in the German « Reich ». So, his feelings must have been genuine rather than opportunistic. This is borne-out by a story his Jewish acquaintance Louis Krasner told. In April 1936, Webern, accompanied by Krasner on his way to the ISCM (International Society for Contemporary Music) Festival, in Barcelona, instead of traveling directly from Vienna through Switzerland, intentionally made a detour through Munich. There, he took Krasner to the railway station pub for a beer. Back in the train compartment, he asked him :

« Did anyone do anything to you ? Did any harm come to you ? »

He continued :

« This proves that what we've been hearing about all these excesses in Germany is not true. It's all propaganda ! »

Later, in June 1937, Schönberg, again, demanded to know whether there was substance to new rumors that Webern had become « a follower of or adherent to the Nazi Party », to which Webern quickly protested :

« No, no, no !! »

March 1938 brought the « Anschluß » of Austria, and Webern became a citizen of the « Reich ». Within a few weeks, Webern's daughter was in the « Hitler Youth » and quickly married to an Austrian Storm-Trooper (SS) . Webern was a legal witness to the ceremony, at which the groom wore his Party uniform. The composer's own son, Peter, and another son-in-law also were actively drawn to the Nazi movement. Soon, the Nazi fight against « degenerate » music was extended to the newly-annexed Austria, and Webern's music was so branded. When the Nazis organized their exhibition of « degenerate music », later that year in Düsseldorf, they included a picture of Webern, identifying him as a 12 tone composer even more extreme than Schönberg. Webern, himself, maintained personal relationships with Jewish friends, a dangerous thing to do, yet, they nevertheless suspected him of sympathy for the Nazis' cause.

Even though the Nazis had caused Webern to sink deeper into poverty by making performances of his work impossible and taking Jewish students away from him, he developed an almost psychotic sense of German patriotism that grew odder still after the outbreak of World War II. In 1940, he found reading Hitler's « Mein Kampf » exhilarating and observed every German victory on the western front with great enthusiasm.

Webern wrote to a friend, in May :

« Are things not going forward with giant steps ? This is Germany, today ! But the National-Socialist one, to be sure ! This is exactly the new State, for which the seed was already laid 20 years ago. Yes, a new State it is, one that has never existed before !! It is something new ! Created by this unique man !!! »

This, in the same year that a Nazi music-critic equated Webern's music with « the violation of all natural feeling » .

Webern's financial situation deteriorated further, leading to bouts of depression, and he may finally have made the tactical decision to cash-in on his documented affection for the Nazi regime. On 9 November 1940, a day of commemoration for Hitler's « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » and a Nazi holiday in the « Reich » , he wrote to a functionary of the « Reich » Music Chamber, of which he was a member in good standing, complaining that he found himself « in complete isolation » . He pointed to his success, as a composer and teacher of music, and noted how he had suffered under the Austro-Fascist regime of Engelbert Dollfuß and Kurt Schuschnigg, hoping for an improvement after the « Anschluß » . This, however, did not happen « despite all the willingness to cooperate » . Although he did not say so outright, he was obviously asking the Nazi rulers for a hand-out. He was immediately sent an application form for « Künstlerdank » , Josef Goebbels's Nazi charity for needy artists. In addition to indicating that he was « Aryan » and not a member of the Nazi Party, Webern also wrote that he was currently earning no more than 225 « Reichsmarks » a month, and that on only an irregular basis. The Nazi music administrators registered without emotion that his mode of composition was generically related to Schönberg's and was, therefore, the cause of his present problems. Since he, himself, was politically beyond suspicion, however, and his son was a (formerly illegal) Austrian Nazi Party member, a gift of money would be possible. Hence, it was proposed to allot Webern the sum of 250 « Reichsmarks » as a one-time contribution. As it turned-out, this would help Webern allay starvation for a little more than 4 weeks. Nonetheless, Schönberg's worst fears appear to have been realized.

Anton von Webern's music, along with that of Alban Berg, Ernst Křenek, Arnold Schönberg, and others, was denounced as « cultural Bolshevism » and « degenerate art » by the Nazi Party in Germany, and both publication and performances of it were banned soon after the « Anschluß » , in 1938, although neither did it fare well under the preceding years of Austrofascism. As early as 1933, an Austrian « Gauleiter » on the « Bayerischer Rundfunk » mistakenly and very likely maliciously characterized both Berg and Webern as Jewish composers. As a result of official disapproval throughout the 1930's, both found it harder to earn a living ; Webern lost a promising conducting career which might have, otherwise, been more noted and recorded and had to take on work as an editor and proof-reader for his music-publishers, Universal-Edition. His family's financial situation deteriorated until, by August 1940, his personal records reflected no monthly income. It was thanks to the Swiss philanthropist Werner Reinhart that Webern was able to attend the festive premiere of his « Variations for Orchestra » , Opus 30, in Winterthur, Switzerland, in 1943. Reinhart invested all the financial and diplomatic means at his disposal to enable Webern to travel to Switzerland. In return for this support, Webern dedicated the work to him.

There are different descriptions of Webern's attitude towards Nazism ; this is, perhaps, attributable either to its complexity, his internal ambivalence, his prosperity in the preceding years (1918-1934) of post-War « Red Vienna » , in the 1st Republic of Austria, the subsequently divided political factions of his homeland as represented in his friends and family (from Zionist Schœnberg to his Nazi son, Peter) , or the different contexts in which or audiences to whom his views were expressed. Further insight into Webern's attitudes comes with the realization that Nazism, itself, was deeply multi-faceted, marked « not by a coherent doctrine or body of systemically interrelated ideas, but rather by a vaguer world-view made-up of a number of prejudices with varied appeals to different audiences which could scarcely be dignified with the term :“ ideology ”. »

In broad terms, Webern's attitude seems to have first warmed to a degree of characteristic fervor and, perhaps, only much later, in conjunction with wide-spread German disillusionment, cooled to Adolf Hitler and the Nazis ; but he was no anti-Semite. On the one hand, Willi Reich notes that Webern attacked Nazi cultural policies in private lectures given in 1933, whose hypothetical publication « would have exposed Webern to serious consequences » later. On the other, some private correspondence attests to his Nazi sympathies, though he denied these to Schœnberg when asked (only once) , who heard rumours, never confirmed to him by Rudolf Kolisch and Eduard Steuermann, denied to him by Louis Krasner and, then, very strenuously denied to him by Webern. As such, Schœnberg's Violin Concerto of 1934(5)-1936 continued to bear a dedication to Webern. Webern's patriotism led him to endorse the Nazi regime, for example, in a series of letters to Joseph Hueber, who was serving in the army and himself held such views. Webern described Hitler on May 2, 1940, as « this unique man » who created « the new State » of Germany ; thus, Alex Ross characterizes him as « an unashamed Hitler enthusiast » .

Musicologist Richard Taruskin describes Webern accurately, if vaguely, as a pan-German nationalist but, then, goes much further in claiming specifically that Webern joyfully welcomed the Nazis with the 1938 « Anschluß » , at best extrapolating from the account of his cited source Krasner and, at worst, exaggerating or distorting it, as well as describing it sardonically as « heart-breaking » . Taruskin's authority on this delicate issue must be credited, if at all, then, only with the significant limitations that he has been polemical, in general, and hostile, in particular, to the « Second Viennese School » , of whom Webern is often considered the most extreme and difficult (i.e. , the least accessible) .

In contrast to Taruskin's methods and pronouncements, musicologist Pamela M. Potter advises that :

« It is important to consider all the scholarship on musical life in the 3rd “ Reich ” that, taken together, reveals the complexity of the day-to-day existence of musicians and composers, as it seems inevitable that debates about the political culpability of individuals will persist, especially if the stakes remain so high for composers, for whom an up or down vote can determine inclusion in the canon. »

In this vein, it might be noted in relation to Taruskin's claim that Webern wrote to friends (husband and wife Josef Humplik and Hildegard Jone) on the day of the « Anschluß » not to invite celebration or to observe developments but to be left alone :

« I am totally immersed in my work (composing) and cannot, cannot be disturbed. »

Louis Krasner's presence could have been a disturbance to Webern for this reason, and musicologist Kathryn Bailey speculates that this may indeed be why he was rushed-off by Webern.

There is, moreover, significant political complexity to be treated, more than enough to complicate any consideration of individual culpability : it is imperative to note that some Social-Democrats viewed the National-Socialists as an alternative to the Christian-Social Party and, later, to the « Vaterländische Front » in the context of reunification with Germany ; for example, Karl Renner, a Chancellor who served in both the 1st (1919-1933) and 2nd (post-1945) Austrian Republics, favoured a German « Anschluß » as an alternative to the, then, Austrofascist regime, under which Berg, Webern, and the Social-Democrats suffered. And Webern's professional circle in Vienna included, besides many Jews, many Social-Democrats ; for example, for David Josef Bach, a close friend of Schœnberg's as well, Webern conducted many workers' and amateur ensembles. Under the Nazis, some Social-Democrats expected, there might be more work and protections for workers and laborers, as well as other social reforms and political stability, if not democracy ; Webern may well have hoped to, again, be able to conduct and to be better able to secure a future for his family.

Krasner, himself, painted not a sentimental portrait but one imbued with a wealth of factual and personal detail for its publication in 1987, describing Webern as clearly naive and idealistic but not entirely without his wits, shame, or conscience ; Krasner carefully contextualizes Webern as a member of Austrian society at the time, one departed by Schœnberg and one in which the already pro-Nazi Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra had even refused to play the late-Berg's Violin Concerto. As Krasner vividly recalled, he and Webern were visiting at the latter's home in Maria Enzersdorf, Mödling, when the Nazis invaded Austria ; Webern, uncannily seeming to anticipate the timing-down to 4 o'clock in the afternoon, turned-on the radio to hear this news and immediately warned Krasner, urging him to flee immediately, whereupon he did (to Vienna) . Whether this was for Krasner's safety or to save Webern the embarrassment of Krasner's presence during a time of possible celebration in the pro-Nazi Webern family or, indeed, in most of pro-Nazi Mödling, by Krasner's description (as well as one even more vivid of Arnold Greißle-Schœnberg) , Krasner was ambivalent and uncertain, withholding judgment. Only later did Krasner realize how self-admittedly « foolhardy » he had been and in what danger he had placed himself, revealing an ignorance perhaps shared by Webern. Krasner had even revisited frequently, hoping to convince friends (e.g. , Schœnberg's daughter, Gertrude ; and her husband, Felix Greißle) to emigrate before time ran-out.

Moreover, Krasner retold from a story related to him in long discussion with Schœnberg's son, Görgi, a Jew who remained in Vienna during the War, that the Weberns, much to their risk and credit, had provided Görgi and his family with food and shelter toward the end of the War at the Weberns' home, in a Mödling apartment, belonging to their son-in-law. Görgi and his family were left behind for their safety when Webern fled on foot with his family to Mittersill, about 75 kilometres away, for safety of their own in light of the coming Russian invasion ; Amalie, one of Webern's daughters, wrote of « 17 persons pressed together in the smallest possible space » upon their arrival. Ironically, the Russians pronounced Görgi a « Nazi spy » when he was discovered due to the Nazi munitions and propaganda in the Weberns' basement store-room. Görgi is said to have saved himself from execution by protesting and drawing attention to his clothes, sewn as specified by the Nazis with the yellow « Star of David ». He continued to live in this apartment with this family until 1969.

Webern is also known to have aided Josef Polnauer, a Jewish friend who, as an albino, managed to largely escape the Nazis' attention and, later, edit a publication of Webern's correspondence from this time with Hildegard Jone, Webern's then lyricist and collaborator, and her husband, sculptor Josef Humplik.

Anton von Webern's 1944-1945 correspondence is strewn with references to bombings, deaths, destruction, privation, and the disintegration of local order ; but also noted are the births of several grandchildren. At the age of 60 (i.e. , in December 1943) , Webern writes that he is living in a barrack away from home and working from 6 am to 5 pm, compelled by the State, in a time of War, to serve as an air-raid protection police officer. On March 3, 1945, news was relayed to Webern that his only son, Peter, died on February 14th of wounds suffered in a strafing attack on a military train, 2 days earlier.

The bombs began falling with greater intensity in March 1945, as the War neared its end and the Soviet and Western Allied armies advanced upon Vienna. Though the Austrian composer Anton von Webern lived 15 miles away from the city center, on a « cul-de-sac » at the base of a forested hill, the exploding bombs, blaring sirens, and almost constant fire of anti-aircraft guns were ever-present there, as well. For a composer who thrived on silence, it was too much to bear. It wasn't just the noise, however, that prevented him from working, or even that he was destitute, unable to perform in public, his music banned by the Nazis on grounds of « degeneracy ». He was, above all, numbed with grief following the death of his son, Peter, a soldier in the German army. Webern, a nervous man during the best of times, was beaten-down, on the verge of collapse, a devout Christian now questioning the existence of God.

At the end of March, German officials began evacuating civilians from Vienna. Webern's wife, Wilhelmine, could have boarded one of the refugee buses designated for women and children, but she would not countenance being separated from her husband. Instead, the Weberns decided to take refuge in the Alpine village of Mittersill, 230 miles away. 2 of their 3 grown daughters, Christine and Maria, were already there with their own children, living in the home of Maria's in-laws. On Good Friday, March 30th, with Vienna in a state of chaos, Webern and his wife packed all they could into 2 rucksacks. In the darkness of the next morning, they began walking, hoping to hitch a ride somewhere along the way. They walked for 8 grueling hours (18 miles in total, burdened with the weight on their backs) to the town of Neulengbach, where they managed to get on a train continuing westward.

On Easter Monday, April 2nd, they disembarked at the picturesque town of Zell am See. There, while waiting on the station platform, they ran into their eldest daughter, Amalie. She and her 2 young sons had also fled Vienna, on a bus bound for Innsbruck and, then, southern Germany, but had decided, mid-journey, to head to Mittersill instead. Heartened by this fortuitous coincidence, 3 generations of Weberns now boarded the train to Mittersill. It was, no doubt, a joyous reunion once they arrived at the village and, later, the family's ranks would grow, yet, larger with the return of Christine's and Amalie's husbands from the front - 17 people crammed into one Tyrolean country-house. There, on a meadow overlooking the Salzach River, amid the serenity of evergreen forests and Alpine peaks, the extended family waited-out the War's end. On April 30th, Adolf Hitler committed suicide. Soon after, the Germans surrendered, and American soldiers occupied Mittersill, overseeing the transition to peace-time.

Webern suffered from malnutrition and a violent case of dysentery, but he soon recovered, even without the aid of medication. He began finding moments of solace in his new environment, taking long, meditative walks into the surrounding forests, delighting in the lichens, the mosses, the Alpine flowers. He read the poems of Rainer Maria Rilke, copying, line after line, into his diary. He began to feel re-generated. Sitting with his wife on a bench near the Mittersill church, one radiant summer day, while gazing-up at the mountains capped with early snow, Webern said :

« I would like to be buried here, someday. »

He was only 61, too young for premonitions, but a few months later, he was dead.

The death of Anton Friedrich Wilhelm von Webern (one of the most inventive artists of the 20th Century, whose experiments in sound greatly influenced the course of contemporary music) was, for many years, a matter of rumor and conjecture. Only a few facts were known. On the evening of September 15th, 1945, the Weberns dined at the home of Christine and their son-in-law Benno Mattel, who had set-up residence of their own in the village. After dinner, 2 American soldiers came to the house to see Mattel. At some point, Webern went outside to smoke a cigar, and as he lit-up, a confrontation with one of the Americans took place. 3 shots were fired. Webern stumbled inside and died. The 3 bullet holes can still be seen on the façade of the house at « Am Markt Nr. 101 » (Anton-Webern-Gasse Nr. 2) , just to the right of the front-door.

Anton von Webern spent the last months of his life in Mittersill. The Webern couple lived there with the daughter Christine Maria Halbich in the house marked « Burk Nr. 31 » .

In the evening of September 15th, 1945, the couple was staying with the other son-in-law, Benno Mattel, in the house « Markt Nr. 101 » . The American occupying power suspected Mattel of being a black-market operator and set a trap for him that evening. Sentries were posted around the house. When Webern left the house to smoke a cigarette, an American soldier shot him by mistake.

20 years after his death, a bronze commemorative plaque was fixed on the entrance door.

Was Webern murdered, or was his death accidental ? Who was the soldier who pulled the trigger, and had he acted in self-defense, after some provocation from Webern ? Shortly after visiting Mittersill, in 1959, a German-born American musicologist named Hans Moldenhauer became determined to answer these questions, and did so in a 1961 book, The Death of Anton von Webern: A Drama in Documents. Based largely on this book, a new one-act opera called « The Death of Webern », a moving and taut work by the composer Michaël Dellaira, with a libretto by the poet J. D. (« Sandy ») McClatchy, premiered with 3 performances in New York City by the « Pocket Opera Players » .

Writing an Opera about a composer (especially, one as pioneering and idiosyncratic as Anton von Webern) can be tricky. To what degree should the work's musical idiom reflect, mimic, or comment on the music of its subject ? Webern will forever be associated with Arnold Schönberg and Alban Berg, the 3 making-up the so-called « Second Viennese School » . Though Webern's earliest works emerged from the plush world of post-Romanticism, he soon began experimenting with tonality and form, reducing harmony, melody, and rhythm to their constituent elements - sound distilled, with beauty revealed in the inherent severity and compression of a work. Some of his pieces last barely 1 minute, with each note containing a world of expression - and each silence, too.

A wonderful Webern-like economy characterizes Dellaira's score, not just in the orchestration for chamber ensemble but also in its intensity. The music is concentrated and spare, with a wide-range of feeling communicated by the attenuated phrases that flit about the longer vocal lines. But Dellaira is not beholden to Webern ; he can (and does) make use of a variety of musical styles precisely because this work, though ostensibly about Webern, is really the story of Hans Moldenhauer.

At the outset of the Opera, Moldenhauer sits at his desk, wondering why the burden of investigating Webern's death has fallen to him. Against a brooding clarinet line and a roll of the snare drum suggesting gunfire, he laments that a « man who devoted his life to sound » has so easily been « swallowed by silence » . When Moldenhauer later recalls how much the composer's music has meant to him, Dellaira quotes from Webern's early « Passacaglia » - a lovely moment of homage. But because the « Passacaglia » marked a point of departure for Webern (very soon after, he would move beyond the tonal world of Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, and Richard Wagner) , the passage also invokes a deeper sense of nostalgia and loss.

Among the many felicities of McClatchy's libretto is how he treats the letters, statements, and affidavits that Moldenhauer assembled in his search, making poetry out of mundane official correspondence. Returning home from Austria, Moldenhauer sent letters of inquiry to the U.S. secretaries of State and Defense, in the hope that some record of Webern's death might be found - a most improbable gambit. Not surprisingly, the letters were shuffled-down bureaucratic channels to assorted government archivists and military officers. As the Opera shows, Moldenhauer encountered false starts and dead-ends, indifference and obstruction.

An archivist with the War Records Division sings :

« In a time of War, papers are misfiled. Facts, like lives, alas, are lost. »

After failing to make headway with both a State Department clerk and a military officer, Moldenhauer expresses a cynical frustration :

« If you keep looking away, maybe it will disappear. » , as the flute and clarinet spin-out an urgent, restive line against a driving, repeated figure played by the cello and piano.

Moldenhauer's breakthrough comes when he learns that units of the 42nd Infantry, the famed Rainbow Division, were present during the American occupation of Mittersill and that an American soldier named Martin Heiman went to the house where Webern had been shot on that very night. Not only had there been a subsequent investigation, but Heiman, a German-born American, had acted as translator. In a remarkable fulcrum-like scene in the Opera, Heiman reveals the name of the man who killed Webern - an army cook named Raymond Bell. There follows a beautiful canon (a musical form in which a phrase or melody uttered by one voice is repeated, after a short interval of time, by another voice or voices) in which Heiman names the other American soldier present at the Mattel house that night - a 1st sergeant named Andrew W. Murray. Dellaira's use of the canon is not coincidental, I think ; it was one of Webern's favourite forms.

In his 1979 biography, « Anton von Webern : A Chronicle of His Life and Work » , Moldenhauer, writing in collaboration with his wife, Rosaleen, describes how, upon arriving at Mittersill after the War, Webern's son-in-law Mattel tried to purchase black-market goods from the American soldiers stationed in the village. One day, he approached Raymond Bell, looking to buy sugar, coffee, and American dollars. Bell alerted Sergeant Murray, but when the 2 reported Mattel to higher-ups at the Counter-Intelligence Corps, headquartered in nearby Zell am See, they were told to entrap and arrest Mattel themselves.

A sting operation occurred at Mattel's house, on September 15th - coincidentally, the night Anton von Webern and his wife dined there. The Weberns arrived around 8 o'clock and subsequently enjoyed a meal with their daughter and son-in-law, as Wilhelmine Webern would later recount. Afterward, Mattel announced the imminent arrival of some Americans, so Webern, Wilhelmine, Christine, and the Mattels' 3 sleepy children retired to a room across the hall, where the children were put to bed. When Bell and Murray arrived soon after 9, Mattel served them drinks in the kitchen, and the 3 agreed upon a price for certain illicit goods. The Americans drew their pistols and arrested Mattel.

At precisely this time, Webern decided to indulge in a pleasure he had been anticipating all evening : a cigar that Mattel had procured for him. His wife did not want the smoke to disturb the 3 sleeping grandchildren, so Webern stepped outside into the darkness.

Bell, seemingly unaware that others were in the house, heard footsteps in the hallway. Curious, he, too, made his way outside, though what happened next can never be verified. Bell would later say that Webern (5 feet 3 inches tall, 110 pounds, and in frail health) had provoked him into firing the 3 shots. Whatever the motive, Bell ran-off for help, heading to a nearby inn, where a dance was being held for the Americans. Webern, meanwhile, struggled to get back inside the house.

He said :

« Ich wurde erschossen. » (I have been shot.)

Wilhelmine and Christine placed him on a mattress. He was bleeding severely from his stomach.

Webern said :

« Es ist aus. » (It is over.)

With those final words, as laconic and profound as the music he created, he began to slip-out of consciousness. Medical help finally arrived, but Anton von Webern was dead.

As the composer's body was taken away, Wilhelmine fell into a state of shock. It was left to Amalie Waller, awakened at 4 in the morning with the news of her father's death, to find-out just where he had been taken. On that Sunday morning, her search led her to the « Annakirche » , Mittersill's small Baroque chapel.

She would later tell Moldenhauer :

« And it was he. On a blanket, on the floor of the chapel, lay my father - dead. His eyes were open, dreadful terror stood in them. »

During the military investigation, Bell continued to assert that he had acted in self-defense. Heiman maintained, however, that :

« To the best of my knowledge, not the slightest proof existed that Webern attacked the cook apart from the testimony of the cook, who was about 2 heads taller than Mister Anton von Webern. I did not speak to a single officer familiar with the case who believed Mister von Webern was guilty of anything in this connection. Certainly, in my opinion, he was a completely innocent bystander. »

Bell, confined to quarters for a period of time after the shooting, returned to his home-town of Mount Olive, North Carolina, after the War and became a restaurant cook. He died an alcoholic, on September 3rd, 1955, a decade after the incident with Webern. When Moldenhauer wrote to Bell's widow, a school teacher named Helen, he received a poignant response :

« I know very little about the accident. When he came home from the War, he told me he killed a man in the line of duty. I know he worried greatly over it. Every time he became intoxicated, he would say, " I wish I hadn't killed that man." I truly think it helped to bring on his sickness. He was a very kind man who loved everyone. These are the results of War. So many suffer. »

The most expansive scenes in the Opera, full of pathos and heightened expressiveness, are the dialogues between Moldenhauer and Helen Bell and Moldenhauer and Amalie Waller. The scene with Amalie is, for me, the highlight of the entire work ; she recounts the desperation of the flight to Mittersill (the piccolo and violin playing in haunting unison, floating above the singers) and the traumatic experience of finding her father's body in the chapel.

Amalie sings plangently :

« You are the 1st man who has cared, Doctor. »

Moldenhauer replies :

« I only wanted to discover the truth. » , an understated response burning with the intensity of his endeavor.

Webern's adoption of his teacher Arnold Schönberg's 12 note system gave structure to the music he wrote after 1921, though his experiments with form and tonality were leading in that direction anyway. In 12 note music, the melodies and harmonies of a piece are determined by a specific arrangement of the 12 notes of the chromatic scale, the so-called tone row. The row occurs throughout the piece and can be manipulated in various ways : inverted, reversed, inverted and reversed. It might seem arbitrary but, in the hands of imaginative and inspired artists such as Schönberg, Webern, and Berg, the system gave rise to an enormous range of expressive music. There is nothing cold or mathematical, for example, about Berg's valedictory Violin Concerto, or Webern's moving and gorgeous late-Cantatas.

In one of the Opera's 2 flash-back scenes, we see Webern giving a private lecture at his house, discussing the music of the « Second Viennese School » . He bemoans the fact that most people cannot come to terms with the new music, incapable as they are of appreciating anything that does not render a specific image or mood, or adhere to traditional tonality. But Webern argues that 12 note music is derived from nothing less than natural law, that he and Schönberg and Berg have only developed and furthered a tradition inherited from Bach.

Webern sings :

« The Classical forms have remained. It was our task to extend and clarify them, to dislodge the key-note, and make way for the luminous harmony of the new laws. How 12 notes listen to each other, and in doing so show us the new worlds spinning inside the eternal universe. »

The scene is powerful, with passages marked by a Webern-like severity contrasting with a chorale that recalls the polyphony of Johann Sebastian Bach and Heinrich Schütz - new and old co-existing seamlessly.

Webern goes on to ask what will happen to serious artists in the new Germany, branded by the Nazis as degenerate :

« I cannot even think what and whom they will destroy. It is our duty to save what can be saved, for soon we may all be in prison for calling ourselves “ serious ”. »

Without question, Webern suffered greatly under the 3rd « Reich » . More problematic than his seemingly complex music was his close friendship with Schönberg, who was Jewish. In the Opera's 1st scene, Moldenhauer holds Webern up as :

« A man who defended his homeland and its history, a man who spoke-out against Hitler and the forces of evil. »

What an injustice that « that man is killed by those he looked on as his saviours. »

But this portrait of Webern is only partially true, and it omits a troubling side of the composer's character.

Perhaps, as a result of his belief in the superiority of pan-Germanic culture, Webern embraced the rise of the 3rd « Reich » , often vigorously. He admired Adolf Hitler and the National-Socialists, praised the Japanese entry into the War, and imagined a time when the entire world might be pacified by the new Germanic order. No evidence exists to suggest that Webern was an anti-Semite (though 3 of his children became Nazis as adults, Mattel was a Nazi Storm-Trooper, and a few of Webern's close friends were also Nazis) . He helped many Jewish friends during the difficult time preceding the annexation of Austria, in 1938, and he later offered Jews refuge in his house, risking arrest and a possible death sentence. Yet, how could a man whose closest friends and colleagues included so many Jews have failed to acknowledge the brutality of the Nazis ?

To suggest that this cultured and intelligent man was startlingly simple-minded when it came to politics is not to apologize for his delusions. There is an almost unbelievable story of a trip he took in 1936 to Barcelona, where he was supposed to conduct the premiere of the Berg Violin Concerto. The soloist on the occasion, Louis Krasner, accompanied Webern on the train journey from Vienna to Spain - yet, rather than go through Switzerland, as almost everyone else attending the Festival was doing, Webern insisted on traveling through Germany, for no other reason than to show his Jewish traveling companion that it was possible for him to survive in Germany unscathed. This « naïveté » revealed itself on another occasion when Webern decided to conduct a program of Felix Mendelssohn's music for the Austrian radio broadcaster « RAVAG » , at a time when the music of Mendelssohn, a Jew, was banned. This transgression (along with Webern's strong ties to cultural institutions supported by Austria's Social-Democrat Party) led to his immediate dismissal from « RAVAG » , for whom he had been conducting regular concerts.

In 1934, Arnold Schönberg, having emigrated to the United States, wanted to dedicate a composition to Webern, on the occasion of his former pupil's 50th birthday. But 1st, he needed Webern to answer a question : « Was he a Nazi ? » Webern wrote back, emphatically stating that he was not, and expressing « a sense of the most vehement aversion » toward anti-Semites. Schönberg was only temporarily put at ease. A few years later, he confronted Webern about the matter, again, as reported in Kathryn Bailey's « The Life of Webern » :

« I have heard repeatedly in the last few months a rumour which I have not believed and which has been described by various sources as untrue. Nevertheless, under the circumstances, it is necessary that I know the whole truth, and this I can get only through a direct answer to a direct question. Is it true that you have become a supporter, or even a member, of the Nazi Party ? There are few things that could give me greater joy than your answering no to the questions. »

How Webern responded, or if he did so at all, is not known : no response to Schönberg's letter has been found.

In times of War, of course, the choices a person makes in order to get by (and who is to say that Webern's choices were not entirely practical) are often fraught with ethical complication. That Webern was not morally guiltless during the most horrific period of the 20th Century does not diminish him as a seminal artist, the creator of hugely influential pieces that are challenging and thorny, but luminous and beautiful, too. Wherever his sympathies lay, « The Death of Webern » makes clear that some of the questions that Hans Moldenhauer set-out to answer will forever remain unknowable. At the end of Dellaira's affecting Opera, with so many of the puzzle pieces put together, Moldenhauer still registers a note of deep pessimism :

« Lies. Half-truths. No one knows. No one remembers. No one wants to remember. »

That a musical work about Anton von Webern, who helped explode the world of tonality, should end quietly in C major (that most traditional of key-signatures, the key of some of the greatest works of Haydn, Mozart, and Schubert, a key that conveys solidity, familiarity, and happiness) might be the most tantalizing irony of all.

Anton von Webern was killed on September 15th, 1945, in Mittersill, Austria. For a long time, no one knew the exact circumstances of the great composer's death and the musical-world more or less accepted the mystery. Then, musicologist Hans Moldenhauer carried-out an investigation that took in the U.S. Army's own account of events.

Webern was going outside to smoke a cigar while a sting operation was being carried-out to arrest his son-in-law Benno Mattel, a former SS-member and black-market operative. Raymond Norwood Bell, company cook from North Carolina, was one of the soldiers participating in the action. Hearing some noises outside the room they were holding Mattel in, Bell went to investigate and apparently bumped into the composer and fired 3 shots. Bell later stated that he had been attacked. 10 years after the incident, Bell died of acute alcoholism attributed to the guilt he felt over what had happened.

The wife of Raymond Norwood Bell stated that, whenever her late-husband got drunk, he regretted Webern's death. Considering he died of alcoholism this must have been often, and if he drank in company must have made him hard to take at times.

A former drinking buddy of Bell's might conceivably have said :

« Ray was a good sort and we all knew what he had gone through, but it got to the point where all he wanted to talk about was Webern. It was too much, as if the Second Viennese School consisted of him alone and there had never been a Schönberg or a Berg, not to mention composers like Stravinsky or Bartók, the poor guy » ,

Anton von Webern, hoping not to disturb his sleeping grandchildren, stepped outside his house in Mittersill, Austria in the evening of 15 September 1945. He barely managed to enjoy a couple of draws on his cigar before he was shot and killed by an American Army soldier. Details of this fatal encounter had been sketchy until the musicologist Hans Moldenhauer, taking the U.S. Army's internal report into consideration, published the results of his investigation.

By September 1945, World War II had ended and Austrian territory was placed under Allied occupation. Serious food shortages among the civilian population led to severe malnutrition, and a lack of cleaning and sanitation supplies led to massive outbreaks of acute communicable diseases. It is hardly surprising that a thriving black-market quickly developed. Benno Mattel, Anton von Webern's son-in-law, was not only a former member of the « Waffen-SS » (an armed wing of the Nazi Party) , he was also smuggling goods. On the evening of the shooting, a major sting operation was underway at the Webern house, and Benno was arrested. Raymond Norwood Bell, a company cook from North Carolina participated in that operation, and when he felt threatened by the frail 62 year old composer smoking his cigar, fired 3 shots.

Moldenhauer's account of the shooting has not been unanimously accepted. In fact, it has been severely criticized for portraying a sense of American callousness, with a Wild-West mentality invading peaceful Austria and « depriving the victimized country of one of its cultural treasures » . In defense of Bell, one might mention that although major hostilities had ceased, Austria was clearly not a happy nor safe place. Armed bandits roamed the country-side, and not everybody had accepted the loss of the War. In addition, Austria was not a victim of Germany's aggression, but had welcomed Adolf Hitler with open arms. Add to this that Raymond Bell was described as an overly nervous person and you have the perfect recipe for disaster.

But it would be equally absurd to suggest that American military personnel (as an extension of U.S. foreign policy) were and are primarily concerned with the well-being of humanity. Just ask the civilian population of Hiroshima and Nagasaki ! After all, the trigger-happy and intoxicated American yokel (self-righteously clinging to delusional notions of moral fortitude) has a definite place in the establishment of the American consciousness ; and it clearly still resonates in American life today. And let's not forget that Raymond Bell died of acute alcoholism, in 1955. For all we know, he might already have been blitzed beyond Nirvana on that day, in September 1945.

Upon hearing of Webern's death, Igor Stravinsky said the musical-world should mourn his passing and summed-up both the nature and extent of his accomplishments as well as the insurmountable obstacles he faced :

« Doomed to a total failure in a deaf world of ignorance and indifference, he inexorably kept on cutting-out his diamonds, his dazzling diamonds, the mines of which he had such a perfect knowledge. »

And Arnold Schönberg famously referred to Webern's Masterpiece of concision : the 6 Bagatelles for String Quartet, Opus 9, as « a whole novel in a single sigh » .

Romanian-Jewish musicologist and composer Filipp Herschkowitz had been a student of Anton von Webern's in Vienna and sought refuge from the Nazis in the East. He ended-up bringing Webern's music to a state of even greater incomprehension and indifference in his exile in The Soviet Union, a trying obscurity that would last until his death, in 1989. Composer Dmitri Smirnov studied with Herschkowitz and recounts the fate of a lone modernist looking to uphold the tradition of his teacher in a land of social realism :

« As time passed, the “ Second Viennese School ” went-out of fashion, without ever having come into fashion in the 1st place, and Herschkowitz was deserted by everyone : an eccentric that no one needed, who spoke in amusing paradoxes or dull truths. »

What Herschkowitz appears to emphasize is Webern's (and Schönberg's and Beethoven's) relationship with tradition :

« The great Masters make-up a strictly organic chain. They are always “ innovators ” and never “ avant-garde ”. Innovation is the only possibility of remaining on the rails of tradition. »

This is the inverse of Herschkowitz's contention that Webern's many post-War imitators such as Karlheinz Stockhausen and Pierre Boulez became entirely focused on appearing new and novel so as to distinguish themselves from their fellow composers and advance their careers.

...

The documentary evidence surrounding Anton von Webern's death reveals an uncomfortable, non-tragic side of what happened, though this seems clearly unintentional. In a letter to his daughter that Moldenhauer reproduces the composer asks her :

« And how do you get through these horrors ? »

It is 1945 and you would think he might be referring to genocide or something similarly evil, but no. He has just lamented the loss of some belongings from a hideaway under their garden-house in their abandoned Vienna home.

He writes :

« Just think !! All our “ silver ” !!! »

...

I wonder if in the decade between Anton von Webern's and Raymond Bell's death the latter ever thought of attending a concert of the Austrian composer's music. He was reportedly wracked by guilt and may very well have wanted some point of contact with the soul of the man he killed. Some people would have turned to spiritualism and « séances », but a composer actually provides an opportunity for anyone, his killer included, to commune with his spirit for an extended period of time (though, in Webern's case, this period of time could turn-out to be quite short) .

...

Anton von Webern was born December 3rd, 1883. Franz Kafka was born July 3rd, 1883. Here are 2 classmates from the Central European school of stripped-down expression, of creating art works on a diametrically opposite scale of a Richard Wagner or Victor Hugo, and of being highly-unsuited to the everyday world.

Arnold Schönberg famously referred to one of Webern's Masterpieces of concision, the 6 Bagatelles for string quartet, Opus 9, as « a whole novel in a single sigh » .

Aside from what I imagine to be the scarcity of Anton von Webern performances in the North Carolina area, I imagine the likelihood of Bell going to one to be very low. He was described as an overly nervous person to start with, so it's hard to imagine him at a concert of Webern's music at all. For one thing, the music is not what you would call soothing. Yes, you can reach a kind of meditative calm as you listen to it, no question, though even then it retains an edge. But some people just are not predisposed to put their nerves at the disposal of this particular Master of modern art, and Bell seemed to fit this category of people.

...

Not everyone accepts Moldenhauer's account of Webern's shooting as fact. One thing that grates has been the sense of American callousness, as if a shoot em' up mentality invaded peaceful Austria and deprived the victimized country of one of its cultural treasures. Webern's own Nazi sympathies, which co-existed with his continued admiration and friendship with his exiled teacher Arnold Schönberg and many other Jews, is a possible key to an alternative explanation of what happened that night.

While it has always been assumed that Bell was lying or exaggerating when he said that the frail 62 year old composer attacked him it has been suggested that he did so to provoke precisely what came about : his death. That following the collapse of the regime he supported, the death of his son in combat and, perhaps, most daunting of all, the idea that he would be confronted by returning colleagues and friends as the true extent of Nazi brutality began to become clear, the possibility exists that he found himself no longer able to face the idea of going on living.

Raymond Bell holds a singular and terrible place in the history of 20th Century art. We know all about the destruction Joseph Stalin and his secret-police henchmen wrought on Russian and Eastern European culture but we don't know who actually put the bullet into Isaak Babel's head and whether he later drank himself to death out of guilt or just drank himself to death in the normal course of things. The same goes for the Nazi who turned-on the gas that killed Czech composer Viktor Ullmann or the Spanish Fascists that were the probable murderers of Federico García Lorca. They escaped identification, and very possibly could have escaped guilt as well.

Long an opponent of the « Second Vienna School », Igor Stravinsky, upon hearing of Anton von Webern's death, said the musical-world should mourn his passing and summed-up both the nature and extent of his accomplishments as well as the insurmountable obstacles he faced :

« Doomed to a total failure in a deaf world of ignorance and indifference, he inexorably kept on cutting-out his diamonds, his dazzling diamonds, the mines of which he had such a perfect knowledge. »

Composer Anton von Webern was Double-Agent for the Nazis

(By Heinrich Kincaid, from the « Associated Press » .)

BERLIN, GERMANY (AP) - Recent admissions by an ex-Nazi official living in Argentina have confirmed what some musicologists have suspected for years : that early- 20th Century German composer Anton von Webern and his colleagues devised the so-called « serial » technique of music to encrypt messages to Nazi spies, living in the United States and Britain.

In what can surely be considered the most brazen instance of « Art Imitating Espionage » to date, « avant-garde » composers of the Hitler years working in conjunction with designers of the Nazi « Enigma » code were bamboozling unsuspecting audiences with their atonal thunderings while, at the same time, passing critical scientific data back and forth between nations.

« This calls into question the entire “ Second Viennese School ” of music » , announced minimalist composer John Adams, from his home in the Adirondack Mountains.

« Ever since I first encountered compositions by Arnold Schönberg, I wondered what the hell anyone ever heard in it. Now, I know. »

Gunned-down by an American soldier in Berlin (?), 62 year old Anton von Webern's death was until now considered a tragic loss to the musical-world. At the time the U.S. Army reported that the killing was « a mistake » and that, in stepping onto the street at night to smoke a cigarette, Webern was violating a strict curfew rule.

It is now known that Webern was using music to shuttle Werner Heisenberg's discoveries in atomic energy to German spy Klaus Fuchs working on the Manhattan atom bomb project in New Mexico. Due to the secret nature of the project, which was still underway after the invasion of Berlin, Army officials at the time were unable to describe the true reason for Webern's murder.

Hans Scherbius, a Nazi Party official who worked with Minister of Propaganda Josef Goebbels, admitted at age 87 that the Nazis secretly were behind the 12 tone technique of composition, which was officially reviled to give it the outlaw status it needed to remain outside of the larger public purview.

« These pieces were nothing more than cipher for encoding messages. » , he chuckled during an interview on his balcony in Buenos Aires.

« It was only because it was “ naughty ” and difficult that elite audiences accepted it, even championed it. »

Physicist Edward Teller, who kept a 9 foot « Steinway » piano in his apartment at the Los Alamos laboratory, was the unwitting deliverer of Heisenberg's data to Fuchs, who eagerly attended parties thrown by Teller, an enthusiastic booster of Webern's music.

Arnold Schoenberg, the older musician who 1st devised the serial technique at the request of the Weimar government of Germany, composed in America to deliver bomb data stolen by Fuchs back to the Nazis, who worked feverishly to design their own atomic weapons.

As an example, Scherbius showed « Associated Press » reporters the score of Webern's Opus 30 « Variations for Orchestra » overlaid with a cardboard template. The notes formed a mathematical grid that deciphered into German a comparison between the neutron release cross-sections of uranium isotopes 235 and 238.

Schoenberg responded with a collection of songs for soprano and woodwinds that encrypted the chemical make-up of the polonium-beryllium initiator at the core of the Trinity explosion.

And, in Japan, Toru Takemitsu took time-out from his own neo-Romanticism to transmit data via music of his nation's progress with the atom.

Composer Philip Glass in New York City says :

« The most curious thing about it is that musicians continued to write 12 tone music after the War, even though they had no idea why it was really invented. Indeed, there are guys who are churning-out serialism to this day. »

Unlike the diatonic music, which is based on scales that have been agreed upon by listeners throughout the world for all of history, 12 tone music treats each note of the chromatic scale with equal importance, and contains a built-in mathematical refusal to form chords that are pleasing by traditional standards. Known also as serialism, the style has never been accepted outside of an elite cadre of musicians, who believe it is the only fresh and valid direction for post-Wagnerian Classical music to go.

« Even if this is really true » , states conductor Pierre Boulez, a composer who continues to utilize serial techniques, « the music has been vindicated by music-critics for decades now. I see no reason to suddenly invalidate an art form just because of some funny business at its inception. »

It may look like a news story and even read vaguely like one, but it in reality appears to be a smartly outline hoax. The style is too casual and opinionated, the facts are mostly wrong, and the scenario described is implausible.

What we have, rather, is a clever bit of satire which harps on an all-too-familiar point about modern art - that it's too cerebral and inaccessible, and perhaps isn't even art at all.

« Avant-garde » composers like Webern and Schœnberg are easy targets for such criticism. Their more challenging works have long been considered unlistenable by some, and the question : « Is it really music ? » has frequently been posed. It's but a small comedic leap to the suggestion that their methods were invented for some nefarious, non-musical purpose - say, transmitting scientific data to Nazi spies.

In part because it was never really intended to fool anyone (it's not that kind of hoax) , it's not hard to prove the story a fake. What follows is a short list of factual errors and logical inconsistencies. It's not exhaustive, but more than sufficient to debunk the central claims. Additions to the list are welcome ...

Although Anton von Webern was killed in the tragic manner described, the incident happened in Mittersill, Austria, not Berlin.

Klaus Fuchs spied for Russia, not Germany.

The Webern work alluded to, « Variations for Orchestra, Opus 30 » , was composed in 1940 - 2 years before the « Manhattan Project » began.

Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu could not have been privy to his country's nuclear secrets during World War II. He was all of 14 years old when Japan surrendered.

We are told that Anton von Webern and his comrades encoded data in their scores with help from the designers of « the Nazi Enigma code » . More accurately, « Enigma » was a machine, the most sophisticated cryptological tool of its time. In any case, we are asked to believe that the brilliant designers of this machine helped Webern encrypt messages that required nothing more than a cardboard template to decode.

According to the story, Klaus Fuchs was spying for the Nazis. If so, what was the strategic point of Webern passing secrets from Heisenberg, in Germany, to Fuchs, at the « Manhattan Project » ? Isn't that backwards ?

Why would Arnold Schönberg, a Jew who fled Nazi oppression in Germany, in 1933, spy for the 3rd « Reich » ? It's nonsensical. Furthermore, it's true that Schönberg was in America during the War, but he was teaching at UCLA throughout. How was he supposedly gaining access to top-secret information from Los Alamos ?

Composer Chris Hertzog has provided its own comments on the story :

« Hello, I'm a composer, and like most of my colleagues, immediately recognized the Webern forwarded “ news article ” as a humorous fraud. As someone who gets pissed-off at all the misinformation on the Web, I appreciate your dissection of the story. A few more tip-offs that something was wrong :

1) John Adams is quoted in the story as not understanding Schönberg's music, and implies that he hates it, an obvious falsehood to anyone familiar with Adams' work. Adams has described his own “ Chamber Symphony ” as a cross between Schönberg and cartoon music (and if you listen carefully, you can hear him quoting Schönberg tongue in cheek !) . In the most recent issue of “ Perspectives of New Music ” (the granddaddy of American new music magazines) , John Adams describes how his own Violin Concerto was influenced by Schönberg's Violin Concerto, a famous 12 tone composition. Also, as far as I know, Adams lives in San Francisco, not New England.

2) Schönberg's famous article on “ The method of composing with 12 tones ” was published in in the mid- 1920's (1925, I believe, although I have no proof of it in front of me) , years before the 3rd “ Reich ” came to power. His 1st works using this technique were written between 1920-1923. Recent scholarship has uncovered that “ avant-garde ” Russian composers such as Nikolai Roslavets developed 12 tone technique independently a decade before Schönberg, and the American composer Charles Ives experimented with 12 tone rows even earlier than that. 12 tone composition was one of those historical ideas that was in the air, at the time.

3) By showcasing “ avant-garde ” art and music in their famous “ Degenerate Art ” exhibit in the 1930's, the Nazis brought far more public attention to 12 tone music than had they simply ignored it. (Kinda like most Americans had never even heard of Robert Mapplethorpe or Andre Serrano or Karen Finley until the big NEA hoopla a few years back suddenly made them, or their artwork, household names) .

Ironically, the one 20th Century Viennese composer who is notorious for putting secret-codes into his music was not mentioned in this “ news story ” : Alban Berg. However, Berg's secret-codes were not military, but rather an obsessive-compulsive reworking into music of his unrequited (and adulterous) love for Hannah Fuchs-Robettin. The best-known example of this is in Berg's “ Lyric Suite ”, where different motives represent Berg and Fuchs. (As a composition professor once pointed-out to me, “ When Berg makes this movement 69 measures long - he really means 69 !! ”) See noted Berg scholar George Perle's “ The Secret Programme of the Lyric Suite ” in volume cxviii of “ The Musical Times ” (1977) . In the early- 1980's, Berg expert Douglas Jarman also discovered a multitude of Hannah Fuchs references in Berg's Violin Concerto, a work which was dedicated to Alma Mahler-Gropius's recently deceased daughter, and subtitled “ In memory of an angel ”. Turns-out, according to Jarman, that the Violin Concerto has a hidden program chock full of musical sublimation of Berg's blue balls for Hannah Fuchs. Jarman's argument is extremely convincing.

And, finally, in the truth is stranger than fiction department, an American composer, George Antheil, actually did patent a device for encoding guidance instructions for torpedoes in World War II. Even stranger, Hedy Lamarr was the co-author of this patent. It used piano-roll-like devices to rapidly switch frequencies so they could not be intercepted by enemies. Although the military never used Antheil's and Lamarr's patent during WWII, it is now considered to be the spiritual fore-runner of the multiple-frequency transmission and reception used in current cellular phone technology. »

The accidental killing of Anton von Webern was a pivotal moment in modern culture. Abstruse, obscure and painfully incapable of emotional expression, Webern had stepped outside to light an after-dinner cigar procured by his ex-SS son-in-law, on September 15th, 1945, when an American soldier fired 3 times into the dark in the occupied Austrian village of Mittersill. « I have been shot. » , said the composer, stumbling back indoors. « It is over. »

News of the tragedy was slow to travel and newsprint hard to come by. Months lapsed before any eulogy of Webern appeared in the musical press and when his 1st Cantata was posthumously premiered at an international Festival in London the following summer it was received with, at best, respectful bafflement for nothing in the music was benign or ingratiating.

Webern wrote in tight little aphorisms, applying Arnold Schœnberg's 12 note method of composition with fanatical rigour to such random variables as rhythm, intervals and dynamic levels of loud and soft. Inspiration was anathema to Webern. All had to be strictly counted and numerically correct. If pleasure entered the process, it was the solitary satisfaction of making a line read the same forwards, backwards and upside-down. Inverted by nature, Webern wrote music that turned-in upon itself, rejecting every human value except absolute order.

To composers coming of age in post-War Europe, he was the perfect hero and patron saint : a composer who liquidated the cultural past with a clinical solution, his death an act of martyrdom. Pierre Boulez, in France, revered him above Schœnberg. Karlheinz Stockhausen, in Germany, claimed the discovery of Webern as his « greatest musical experience » . In the 2nd half of the 20th Century, Webern defined and dominated modernity in music as Pablo Picasso had done in painting and Joyce in English literature.

No composer has ever achieved so much influence with so little music. Every note he wrote, played end to end, lasts little more than 5 hours and BBC Radio 3 will tax the forbearance of many of its 2 million listeners when, on the anniversary of his death, it devotes a whole day to Webern and his music.

None of it is easy on the ear. It took Webern 4 years of study with Schœnberg in Vienna before he scratched-out his 1st Opus in 1908, a 12 minute « Passacaglia for Orchestra » . In a tediously discursive era, brevity was his distinguishing feature. His only Symphony is 10 minutes long, his String Quartet, 8. Concise as they are, his music requires unblinking concentration from the listener through a trail of disjointed plinks and energy spikes. The reward is neither instant nor necessarily sensual - which explains why Webern is the least loved of all great composers and the one held most to blame for alienating audiences from contemporary music.

His impact is unmistakable. When the Hollywood director William Friedkin went searching for the scariest music on earth for his 1973 movie « The Exorcist », it was Webern that chilled his marrow, choosing the « 5 Pieces for Orchestra » to stalk the realm between known and unknown after a tranquilising burst of Mike Oldfield's « Tubular Bells »).

Webern seemed to know no fear. The music he wrote was logical in the extreme, irrefutably superior to Romantic improvisation, as much science as it was art.

He was, by all accounts, an odd man, a scion of Austrian nobility who married his 1st cousin and shrank from close relationships. Prone to wild rages and long silences, he may have been clinically depressed for much of his life and suffered a public breakdown when, at a 1936 Festival in Barcelona, he refused to come-out of his dressing-room for the world-premiere of Alban Berg's Violin Concerto. Berg's widow had to go down on her knees and beg him to relinquish the score to another musician.

Although a capable conductor, he never settled in a proper job and, apart from a few BBC dates in London, gave most of his concerts with a « Workers Orchestra », in Vienna. When the Nazis took-over Austria, in 1938, Webern found himself on the list of the banned, demonised for « decadence » and prohibited from publication and performance. Despite official opprobrium, he embraced Nazism with naive enthusiasm, cheering Adolf Hitler's victories and justifying his racial purities while, in the same breath and at risk of arrest, decrying the enforced exile of his teacher, Schönberg, and the extirpation of modern art.

This bizarre dichotomy has led some interpreters to depict Webern as the mad-scientist of music, a boffin who, in the grim finality of the 3rd « Reich », found compositional uplift in the ethereal vocal canons of the medieval Court composer Heinrich Isaac. Weakened by conscripted labour and mourning his only son, who was killed at the front, Webern fled Vienna to his in-laws' mountain village, where he fell sick with dysentery. He weighed just 50 kilos when he was shot, aged 61, by a U.S. army cook who was so consumed with remorse that he died exactly a decade later, irredeemably alcoholic.

In the modernist trinity with Schönberg and Berg, Webern was the fundamentalist, the doctrinaire apostle who would never bend a rule or borrow a tune for the sake of beauty but who, in rigorous application of the law, achieved the clarity of morning air and mountain streams. To Igor Stravinsky, who switched from neo-Classicism to Webern's serialism in the early 1950's, his works were « dazzling diamonds » an organic resource perfected by human hands. To Pierre Boulez and Karlheinz Stockhausen, they amounted to an epiphanic revelation that structure in music arises from the order in which notes and intervals are used.

What strikes the innocent ear in Webern, after initial dismay and confusion, is the frozen moment of perfect sound. Listen on, and you enter a world like no other : obsessive, self-contained, episodically celestial.

Scan the entire canon, from the « Passacaglia » to the posthumously published piano pieces, and you will not find one weak work of Webern's, or one that fails immediately to proclaim its authorship. In the history of western music, that statement is true only of Beethoven and Wagner. It is time to recognize Webern by the same measure, as a maker of the modern world and a sanctuary from its pressures.

Controverses entourant Wagner

The German composer Richard Wagner was a controversial figure during his lifetime, and has continued to be so after his death. Even today, he is associated in the minds of many with Nazism and his Operas are often thought to extol the virtues of German nationalism. The writer and Wagner scholar Bryan Magee has written :

« I sometimes think there are 2 Wagners in our culture, almost unrecognizably different from one another : the Wagner possessed by those who know his work, and the Wagner imagined by those who know him only by name and reputation. »

Most of these perceptions arise from Wagner's published opinions on a number of topics. Wagner was a voluminous writer and published essays and pamphlets on a wide-range of subjects throughout his life. Wagner's writing style is verbose, unclear and turgid, which has greatly added to the confusion about his opinions. Several of his writings have achieved some notoriety, in particular his essay, « Das Judentum in der Musik » (Jewishness in Music) , a critical view on the influence of Jews in German culture and society at that time. The essays he wrote, in his final years, were also controversial, with many readers perceiving them to employ an endorsement of racist beliefs. Some commentators also believe that some of Richard Wagner's Operas contain adverse caricatures of Jews.

Wagner was promoted during the Nazi era as one of Adolf Hitler's favourite composers. Historical perception of Wagner has been tainted with this association ever since, and there is debate over how Wagner's writings and Operas might have influenced the creation of Nazi Germany.

Finally, there is controversy over Wagner's paternity. It is suggested that he was the son of Ludwig Geyer, rather than his legal father Carl Friedrich Wagner, and some of his biographers have proposed that Wagner himself believed that Geyer was Jewish.

Paternité

Richard Wagner was born on May 22, 1813, the 9th child of Carl Friedrich Wagner, a clerk in the Leipzig police service, and Johanna Rosine Wagner. Wagner's father died of typhus 6 months after Richard's birth, by which time Wagner's mother was living with the actor and playwright Ludwig Geyer, in the Brühl, at that time the Jewish quarter of Leipzig. Johanna and Geyer married in August 1814, and for the first 14 years of his life, Wagner was known as Wilhelm Richard Geyer. Wagner, in his later years, discovered letters from Geyer to his mother which led him to suspect that Geyer was, in fact, his biological father and, furthermore, speculated that Geyer was Jewish. According to Cosima's diaries (26 December 1868) Wagner "did not believe" that Ludwig Geyer was his real father. At the same time, Cosima noted a resemblance between Wagner's son Siegfried and Geyer. The philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche was one of Wagner's closest acolytes, and proof read Wagner's autobiography « Mein Leben ». It may have been this closeness that led Nietzsche to claim, in his 1888 book, « Der Fall Wagner » (The Case of Wagner), that Wagner's father was Geyer, and to make the pun that, « Ein Geyer ist beinahe schon ein Adler. » (A vulture is almost an eagle.) , Geyer also being the German word for a vulture and Adler being a very common Jewish surname. Despite these conjectures on the part of Wagner and Nietzsche, there is no evidence that Geyer was Jewish, and the question of Wagner's paternity is unlikely to be settled without DNA evidence.

Antisémitisme

Prior to 1850, there is no record of Wagner expressing any particular anti-Semitic sentiment. However, as he struggled to develop his career, he began to resent the success of Jewish composers such as Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Giacomo Meyerbeer and blamed them for his lack of success, particularly, after his stay in Paris, in 1840-1841, when he was impoverished and reduced to music copy editing. Ironically, at the same time, Wagner did have considerable contact with Meyerbeer, who loaned him money and used his influence to arrange for the premiere of the Opera « Rienzi », Wagner's first successful Opera in Dresden, in 1842 ; Meyerbeer later expressed hurt and bewilderment over Wagner's written abuse of him, his works, and his faith. Wagner's first and most controversial essay on the subject was « Das Judentum in der Musik » (Jewishness in Music), originally published under the pen name K. Freigedank (K. Freethought), in 1850, in the « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik ». In a previous issue, Theodor Uhlig had attacked the success in Paris of Meyerbeer's Opera « Le prophète », and Wagner's essay expanded this to an attack on supposed « Jewishness » in all German art. The essay purported to explain popular dislike of Jewish composers, in particular Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer, who is not mentioned by name but is clearly a target. Wagner wrote that the German people were repelled by Jews due to their « alien » appearance and behaviour :

« With all our speaking and writing in favour of the Jews emancipation, we always felt instinctively repelled by any actual, operative contact with them. »

He argued that Jewish musicians were only capable of producing music that was shallow and artificial, because they had no connection to the genuine spirit of the German people.

In the conclusion to the essay, he wrote of the Jews that, « only one thing can redeem you from the burden of your curse : the redemption of Ahasuerus going under ! ». Although, this has been taken by some commentators to mean actual physical annihilation, in the context of the essay it seems to refer only to the eradication of Jewish separateness and traditions. Wagner advises Jews to follow the example of Ludwig Börne by abandoning Judaism. In this way, Jews will take part in « this regenerative work of deliverance through self annulment ; then, are we one and undis severed ! ». Wagner was, therefore, calling for the assimilation of Jews into mainstream German culture and society ; although, there can be little doubt, from the words he uses in the essay, that this call was prompted at least as much by anti-semitism as by a desire for social amelioration. (In the very 1st publication, the word here translated as « self annulment » was represented by the phrase : « self annihilating, bloody struggle » .

The initial publication of the article attracted little attention, but Wagner wrote a self justifying letter about it to Franz Liszt, in 1851, claiming that his « long suppressed resentment against this Jewish business » was « as necessary to me as gall is to the blood » . Wagner republished the pamphlet under his own name, in 1869, with an extended introduction, leading to several public protests at the 1st performances of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » . Wagner repeated similar views in later articles, such as « What is German ? » (1878, but based on a draft written in the 1860's) , and Cosima Wagner's diaries often recorded his comments about « Jews » . Although, many have argued that his aim was to promote the integration of Jews into society by suppressing their Jewishness, others have interpreted the final words of the 1850 pamphlet (suggesting the solution of an « Untergang » for the Jews, an ambiguous word, literally « decline » or « downfall » but which can also mean « sinking » or « going to a doom ») as meaning that Wagner wished the Jewish people to be destroyed.

Some biographers, such as Theodor W. Adorno and Robert Gutman, have advanced the claim that Wagner's opposition to Jews was not limited to his articles, and that the Operas contained such messages. In particular, the characters of Mime in the « Ring » , Klingsor in « Parsifal » and Sixtus Beckmesser in « Die Meistersinger » are supposedly Jewish stereotypes, although none of them are identified as Jews in the libretto. Such claims are disputed. Wagner, over the course of his life, produced a huge amount of written material analyzing every aspect of himself, including his Operas and his views on Jews (as well as many other topics) ; these purportedly « Jewish » characterizations messages are never mentioned, nor are there any such references in Cosima Wagner's copious diaries.

Despite his published views on Jewishness, Wagner maintained Jewish friends and colleagues throughout his life. One of the most notable of these was conductor Hermann Levi, a practising Jew and son of a Rabbi, whose talent was freely acknowledged by Wagner. Levi's position as « Kapellmeister » in Munich meant that he was to conduct the premiere of « Parsifal » , Wagner's last Opera. Wagner initially objected to this and was quoted as saying that Levi should be baptized before conducting « Parsifal » . Levi, however, held Wagner in adulation, and was asked to be a pallbearer at the composer's funeral.

Racisme

Some biographers have asserted that Wagner, in his final years, came to believe in the Aryanist philosophy of Arthur de Gobineau. However, the influence of Gobineau on Wagner's thought is debated. Wagner was 1st introduced to Gobineau in person, in Rome, on November 1876. The 2 did not cross paths again until 1880, well after Wagner had completed the libretto for « Parsifal » , the Opera most often accused of containing racist ideology. Although, Gobineau's « An Essay on the Inequality of the Human Races » was written 25 years earlier, it seems that Wagner did not read it until October 1880. There is evidence to suggest that Wagner was very interested in Gobineau's idea that Western society was doomed because of miscegenation between « superior » and « inferior » races. However, he does not seem to have subscribed to any belief in the superiority of the supposed Germanic or « Nordic race » .

Richard Wagner's conversations with Gobineau during the philosopher's 5 week stay at Wahnfried, in 1881, were punctuated with frequent arguments. Cosima Wagner's diary entry for June 3 recounts one exchange in which Wagner « positively exploded in favour of Christianity as compared to racial theory ». Gobineau also believed that, in order to have musical ability, one must have black ancestry.

Wagner subsequently wrote 3 essays in response to Gobineau's ideas : « Introduction to a Work » of Count Gobineau, « Know Thyself », and « Heroism and Christianity » (all in 1881) . The « Introduction » is a short piece written for the « Bayreuther Blätter » in which Wagner praises the Count's book :

« We asked Count Gobineau, returned from weary, knowledge laden wanderings among far distant lands and peoples, what he thought of the present aspect of the world ; today, we give his answer to our readers. He, too, had peered into an Inner : he proved the blood in modern manhood's veins, and found it tainted past all healing. »

In « Know Thyself », Wagner deals with the German people, whom Gobineau believes are the « superior » Aryan race. Wagner, in fact, rejects the notion that the Germans are a race at all, and further proposes that we should look past the notion of race to focus on the human qualities (« das Reinmenschliche ») common to all of us. In « Heroism and Christianity », Wagner proposes that Christianity could function to provide a moral harmonization of all races, preferable to the physical unification of races by miscegenation :

« Incomparably fewer in individual numbers than the lower races, the ruin of the white races may be referred to their having been obliged to mix with them ; whereby, as remarked already, they suffered more from the loss of their purity than the others could gain by the ennobling of their blood. To us, Equality is only thinkable as based upon a universal moral concord, such as we can but deem true Christianity elect to bring about. »

Wagner's concerns over miscegenation occupied him until the very end of his life ; he was in the process of writing another essay, « On the Womanly in the Human Race » (1883) , at the time of his death, in which he discusses the role of marriage in the creation of races :

« It is certain that the noblest white race is monogamic at its 1st appearance in saga and history, but marches toward its downfall through polygamy with the races which it conquers. »

Wagner's son-in-law, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, expanded on Wagner and Gobineau's ideas in his 1899 book, « The Foundations of the 19th Century », a racist work extolling the Aryan ideal that later strongly influenced Adolf Hitler's ideas on race.

Appropriation nazie

About the time of Wagner's death, European nationalist movements were losing the Romantic, idealistic egalitarianism of 1848, and acquiring tints of militarism and aggression, due in no small part to Bismarck's take-over and unification of Germany, in 1871. After Wagner's death, in 1883, Bayreuth increasingly became a focus for German nationalists attracted by the mythos of the Operas, who have been referred to by latter commentators as « The Bayreuth Circle » . This group was endorsed by Cosima Wagner, whose anti-semitism was considerably less complex and more virulent than Richard's. One of the Circle was Houston Stewart Chamberlain, the author of a number of « philosophic » tracts which later became required Nazi reading. Chamberlain married Wagner's daughter, Eva. After the deaths of Cosima and Siegfried Wagner, in 1930, the operation of the Festival fell to Siegfried's widow, English born Winifred, who was a personal friend of Adolf Hitler. Hitler was a fanatical admirer of Wagner's music, and sought to incorporate it into his heroic mythology of the German nation. Hitler held many of Wagner's original scores in his Berlin bunker, at the end of World War II, despite the pleadings of Wieland Wagner to have these important documents put in his care ; the scores perished with Hitler, in the final days of the War.

Many scholars have argued that Wagner's views, particularly his anti-semitism and purported Aryan-Germanic racism, influenced the Nazis. These claims are disputed. Recent studies suggest that there is no evidence that Hitler even read any of Wagner's writings and further argue that Wagner's works do not inherently support Nazi notions of heroism. During the Nazi regime, « Parsifal » was denounced as being « ideologically unacceptable » and the Opera was not performed at Bayreuth, during the War years. It has been suggested that a « de facto » ban had been placed on « Parsifal » , by the Nazis. However, there were 23 performances at the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » , between 1939 and 1942, which suggests that no formal ban was in place.

The Nazi fascination with Wagner was largely inspired by Hitler, sometimes to the dismay of other high ranking Nazi officials, including Josef Goebbels. In 1933, for instance, Hitler ordered that each Nuremberg Rally open with a performance of the « Die Meistersinger » Overture, and he even issued 1,000 free tickets to Nazi functionaries. When Hitler entered the theater, however, he discovered that it was almost empty. The following year, those functionaries were ordered to attend, but they could be seen dozing off during the performance so that, in 1935, Hitler conceded and released the tickets to the public.

In general, while Wagner's music was often performed during the 3rd « Reich » , his popularity actually declined in Germany in favor of Italian composers such as Giuseppe Verdi and Giacomo Puccini. By the 1938-1939 season, Wagner had only 1 Opera in the list of 15 most popular Operas of the season, with the list headed by Italian composer Ruggero Leoncavallo's « Pagliacci » . Ironically, according to Albert Speer, the Berlin Philharmonic's last performance before their evacuation from Berlin at the end of World War II was of Brünnhilde's immolation scene at the end of « Götterdämmerung » .

As part of the regime's propaganda intentions of « Nazifying » German culture, specific attempts were made to appropriate Wagner's music as « Nazi » and pseudo academic articles appeared such as Paul Bulow's « Adolf Hitler and the Bayreuth Ideological Circle » (« Zeitschrift für Musik » , July 1933) . Such articles were Nazi attempts to rewrite history to demonstrate that Hitler was integral to German culture.

There is evidence that music of Wagner was used at the Dachau concentration camp, in 1933-1934, to « re-educate » political prisoners by exposure to « national music » . However, there seems to be no documentation to support claims sometimes made that his music was played at Nazi death camps.

La musique de Wagner en Israël

Wagner's Operas have never been staged in the modern State of Israel, and the few public instrumental performances that have occurred have provoked much controversy.

Despite Wagner's known writings against Jews, there was no opposition to his music in the early Zionist movement and its founders ; Theodor Herzl, the founder of Zionism, was an avid admirer of Wagner's music. The Palestine Orchestra, founded in 1936 by Bronisław Huberman in what is now the State of Israel (and which became the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra) , « during its 1st 2 years programmed several works by Richard Wagner who was recognized as one of the great Western composers despite the well-known fact that he had been a fanatical anti-Semite » . However, the Orchestra banished his works from its repertoire after « Kristallnacht » , in 1938 (to be followed, shortly after, by the exclusion of works of Richard Strauß) .

Because of Wagner's anti-Semitic ideas and the association of his works with Nazism, Wagner's music was not performed publicly in the modern State of Israel, until 2000. Although, his works are broadcast on Israeli government owned radio and television stations, attempts to stage public performances in Israel have raised protests in the past, including protests from Holocaust survivors. In 1981, conductor Zubin Mehta, as an encore at an orchestral concert on Tel-Aviv, proposed to play extracts from « Tristan und Isolde » , offering those who wished (including 2 members of the Orchestra who had asked to be excused) the opportunity to leave. Despite a few vocal protests, most of the audience stayed to the end of the piece. In 1992, conductor Daniel Barenboim programmed works by Wagner at a concert of the Israel Philharmonic, but this was cancelled after protests, although a rehearsal was opened to the public. The 1st documented public Israeli Wagner concerts were in 2000, when the Holocaust survivor Mendi Rodan conducted the « Siegfried Idyll » in Rishon LeZion, and, in August 2001, when a concert conducted by Daniel Barenboim in Tel Aviv included as an encore an extract from « Tristan und Isolde » , which divided the audience between applause and protest. A concert with works by Wagner was announced for 18 June 2012, in Tel Aviv ; however, these plans were abandoned after protests.

Wagner était-il juif ?

The music of Richard Wagner is constantly being heard, on recordings, on radio, and live in the theatre. International groupies travel the world in pursuit of live performances of his Opera cycle, « The Ring of the Nibelung » . This constant exposure is due to the intrinsic appeal of the music, the craft employed in its orchestration, the effectiveness of his Operas as music theatre, and its consequently usefulness to music organisations who can always rely on performances of Wagner's music to bring financial reward. Another consequence of this exposure, is that Wagner also remains a controversial figure, not because of his music, but because of its political associations with the Nazis before and during World War II, and also because of Wagner's own anti-Semitic writings in pamphlets published during his lifetime.

If your initial approach to Wagner is through his music, it then comes as a great shock to read his anti-Semitic rantings, mainly in his infamous tract « Judaism in Music », written in 1850, to which he wrote an appendix, in 1869. Although couched in the form of musical critique, there are passages in the text which overstep the bounds of artistic comment, and which can only be described as personal abuse. What is even more disturbing is that, in their emotive and irrational aspects, Wagner's prose reads like a prototype of later Nazi propaganda.

The ban on public performances of his music in Israel gives rise, from time to time, to articles and letters on the topic in mainstream papers here in Australia, no doubt as elsewhere, reviving the « Wagner controversy ». One correspondent, here in Sydney, Australia, pointed-out that the ban is informal, rather than mandatory, and is maintained out of respect to the survivors of the Holocaust who were subjected to Wagner's music heard constantly on radio, at public rallies, and also, most offensively, in concentration camps. This same correspondent also pointed-out that the ban does not extend to recordings of Wagner's music, which are available in record stores, as they are in all democratic countries.

As a composer, I find all of this troubling, since the music of Wagner as is inescapable as the music of other musical geniuses of the 19th Century, and to ignore it totally is to ignore not only the music itself, but the seminal changes which Wagner wrought in the nature of music, its composition and its performance.

To compound the irony, Wagner's influence is to be found in the work of many fine Jewish composers of the early 20th Century, including those who suffered persecution under the Nazis, and whose work is currently being re-discovered, performed and recorded, notably in the Decca Records « Entartete Musik » series. Wagner's influence is also to be heard in the work of the many accomplished Jewish composers who escaped from Europe, many of whom went to America to work in Hollywood, in the film industry. Wagner effectively « invented » many of the devices which found pertinent application in the creation of the great Symphonic film scores of the 1930's, and the decades following. The controversy is not going to die quietly, and, as part of my own process of coming to terms with Wagner, I wish to explore further aspects of the various issues which arise in considering the place of Wagner's music in world culture.

One aspect of Wagner's life keeps being mentioned, in passing, by writers and commentators, but it is always in passing, often literally in a footnote by biographers, and I have come to think that it deserves much more serious attention. The question arises : « Was Wagner Jewish ? ». Or, to be more accurate in terms of the facts, « Did Wagner think he might be Jewish ? ». Or, to be even more specific, « Did Wagner think he might be of Jewish descent ? ». From which arises the even more germane question, « Was Wagner afraid that he might be thought to be Jewish ? ». While the probable answer to the latter question is « Yes », a definite answer to questions relating to his parentage could only be provided by conducting a DNA testing, were this possible, on both Wagner himself, and his step-father, the successful actor and painter Ludwig Geyer (or on their descendants ?) .

Here again, the psychological issue is still not whether Wagner was of Jewish descent, but whether or not Wagner thought he might be, since writers differ on the question of whether or not Geyer himself was Jewish. British writer James Beswick Whitehead, with whom I have discussed the matter, writes :

« Wagner's possible Jewish ancestry would be a delicious irony. It certainly appears more than likely that Geyer was his father but was Geyer Jewish ? »

John Chancellor, in his 1978 biography of the composer, states bluntly that he was not :

« He could claim the same sturdy descent as the Wagners. His pedigree also went back to the middle of the 17th Century and his forefathers were also, for the most part, organists in small Thuringian towns and villages. »

Chancellor blames Friedrich Nietzsche for raising the question of Geyer's Judaism as an extra-seasoning to his charge of illegitimacy, when he had fallen-out with Wagner. But, in his book, « Wagner and Nietzsche » , Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau appears to accept that Geyer was Jewish. The famous singer draws on Robert Gutman to suggest that Richard and Cosima egged each other on in their anti-Semitism, because both had Jewish roots to deny. Cosima was the daughter of Liszt and the Comtesse d'Agoult whose maternal grandfather was a Jewish banker from Frankfurt.

(Cosima's 1st husband was the conductor Hans von Bülow, whom she married in 1857 and with whom she had 2 daughters, Daniela and Blandine. She left him for Richard Wagner in 1864, and bore Wagner 3 children, Isolde, Eva and Siegfried, before marrying him in 1870.)

There does seem to be agreement, however, that Wagner himself had doubts about his own parentage, and from this doubt 2 factors emerge which would have had a profound influence on Wagner's development. The 1st factor is the effect of his doubts about paternity. The 2nd factor is the nature of that paternity.

The 1st factor, doubt about paternity, has been explored in some depth in the case of George Bernard Shaw, whose situation was very similar to Wagner's. The man who became his step-father, and who was probably his biological father, Vandeleur Lee, was also, like Geyer, a man of the theatre, who married Shaw's mother very soon after the death of Shaw's putative and legally registered father, George Carr Shaw, an alcoholic who was unable to provide adequate material support for his family. For some years, Lee undertook this task himself. Shaw never resolved the issue in his own mind, because it was an issue which involved a moral question pertaining to his own mother, and it is thought that this unspoken mystery deeply influenced the pattern of Shaw's relationships with women throughout his life. The matter is fully explored in Michaël Holroyd's 1988 biography on George Bernard Shaw. But no biography has provided an equivalent exploration of the almost identical family drama which dominated in Wagner's early life, which must have been equally influential in forming his character.

Coincidentally, Shaw himself was an ardent supporter of Wagner, and wrote a pamphlet titled, « The Perfect Wagnerite » , in which he interpreted « The Ring of the Nibelung » as a critique of capitalism. He also analysed Wagner's debt to the philosopher Schopenhauer, who was, by profession, a merchant, described by some as a banker : which would explain his pessimistic view of life as summed-up by the aphorism :

« All life is a debt. We spend our lives paying interest. The capital is repaid on death. »

Those familiar with a persistent theme in Wagner's libretti, will recognise a Romanticised version of this philosophy in his metaphysical poetry exalting death as the ultimate fulfilment of love, a concept which reached its apogee in the libretto of « Tristan und Isolde » .

But Shaw also recognized the inconsistencies in Wagner's character and wrote :

« Wagner was not a Schopenhaurite every day of the week, nor even a Wagnerite. His mind changes as often as his mood. Wagner can be quoted against himself almost without limit, much as Beethoven's Adagios could be quoted against his Scherzos if a dispute arose between 2 fools as to whether he was a melancholy man or a merry one. »

Dating from 1908, this quip is a typical Shaw sally, making light of a serious issue to draw attention to it. To what extent does Wagner's unpredictable nature and its bewildering inconsistencies of behaviour apply to his anti-Semitism ? And how much of this can be attributed to the 2nd factor arising from his doubts about his own paternity, in relation to his having spent his childhood bearing the name Geyer ?

Let us look at both sides of the coin. It is true that Wagner's anti-Semitic rhetoric in his article « Judaism in Music » , written in 1850, is pernicious ; but it is also true that that its generalities were a mask to disguise its true specific purpose which was to attack Istly the Jewish composer Giacomo Meyerbeer, and later, in an appendix added in 1869, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. This was an ignoble way to return Meyerbeer's earlier attempts to assist Wagner's career in Paris, which correspondence of the time suggests were sincere ; but Wagner later felt that these attempts were only token gestures, since they did not bear fruit : and his failure to advance his career in Paris was a deeply felt humiliation. (Meyerbeer did, however, assist in arranging the premiere of Wagner's Opera « Rienzi » in Dresden, on 20 October 1842.)

In the 2nd diatribe, Wagner also delivered a slightly muted attack on Mendelssohn, calling him technically clever, and good at evoking « nature » , but lacking « depth » . I can recall this charge still being levelled against Mendelssohn until as late as the 1960's. Anyone who is sensitive to Mendelssohn's music knows that this is nonsense, and I only recently realized that the slur originated with Wagner, which is why we can discount it. Wagner's attack was tactical. He was trying to create a « place » for himself by attacking others - alas, a « normal » if odious tactic in the arts, still practised widely in Australia today, and which would be thought trivial in Wagner's case, were it not for the political context in which the attack was made.

The attacks were a preparation on Wagner's part, to carve-out a politically correct role for himself as a German nationalist, writing music to this agenda, as distinct from (what he described as being) the synthetic, non-nationalist kind of music favoured by Jewish composers. As pointed-out in the recent Thames & Hudson publication, « The Wagner Compendium » (2001, Edition Barry Millington) , there is some basis for Wagner's thesis, but the characteristic he condemned is not necessarily a bad one, and there is no question that Wagner was being mischievous by deriding what we describe today as an element of cultural « fusion » in music. Indeed, the ability to treat all ethnic musics with impartial interest, and to absorb their elements into original works of art music, and to create a new synthesis from disparate elements, as Mendelssohn did, is basic to the craft of composition ; and, because of their exceptional ability in this regard, Jewish composers have been at the forefront of most advances in music in the 20th Century. This is clearly so from the avant-garde of the New Viennese School which pioneered the use of atonality, to the adaptation of jazz to popular music, and its use in film music.

Ironically, Wagner's music, in its time, offered a paradigm for this kind of evolution in his chosen area of work, music theatre, and among Jewish composers of the 1930's successfully applying his techniques in Opera were Franz Schreker, Irwin Schulhoff and, before he settled in America, Erich Wolfgang Korngold. The Nazis condemned atonality and jazz as degenerate, but they could do nothing to prevent the flowering of Jewish musical talent in the area of music for film by a generation of Jewish composers, referred to above, who fled persecution in Europe to settle and find work in Hollywood. I personally consider their contribution to 20th Century music to have been as significant as any other development in the evolution of music and it is again ironic that many of the techniques they used for this new form of music theatre called cinema, were based on Wagnerian theory and practise.

Let us now look at the other side of the coin, for it is also true that Wagner's anti-Semitic rhetoric was not matched by his behaviour. The Nazis denied Jewish musicians employment, imprisoned and killed them, but Wagner employed them in high-positions of trust at Bayreuth. It is true that he made a nuisance of himself trying to convert them to Christianity, but it is also true that he inspired, in his colleagues, a degree of professional dedication unusual in the performing arts in any period. Conductor Hermann Levi, in letters to his father, a chief rabbi in the town of Giessen, writes of his time preparing for the 1st Bayreuth Festival :

« Wagner is the best and noblest of men. I thank God daily for the privilege to be close to such a man. It is the most beautiful experience of my life. » . (April 1882.)

« The Wagners are so good to me that I am quite touched. I arrived here on June 12th and, from that day until July 1st, I have lunched and dined every day at Wahnfried. Frequently, I called at 12 noon and left only at midnight. » (July 1882.)

« I refuse even to consider whether I deserve an order or any other kind of recognition for “ Parsifal ” . As for my “ prestige ” , I have plenty of that and I feel that I am far too well off as it is. Moreover, I have no idea what they could give me. The Order of merit is the appropriate award of the Bavarian Crown, but that might be rather awkward, considering my name is Levi. » (November 1882.)

As is widely acknowledged, anti-Semitism was ubiquitous in Europe at that, or any time, but it was not an attitude encouraged by the current wearer of the Bavarian Crown. Ludwig II wrote to Wagner :

« It is good, beloved friend, that you are not going to discriminate between Gentiles and Jews when it comes to performing your exalted, sacred work (“ Parsifal ”) . Nothing is more odious, more disagreeable than such antagonism. Whatever our religions may be, fundamentally, we are all human beings and as such we are brothers, are we not ? » (October 1881.)

It is true that some of Wagner's descendants consorted with the Nazis, and that one of the architects of racial theory, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, married into the Wagner family. But not all Wagners collaborated with racists, then or now. Wagner's son, Siegfried, also a composer, who died in 1930, refused a request to bar Jewish patrons and artists from Bayreuth. Writing in 1921, he reasoned thus :

« We have a great number of loyal, honest and unselfish Jewish friends. They have frequently given us proof of their devotion. You demand that we should turn all these people from our doors for no other reason than that they are Jews ? Is that human ? Is that Christian ? Is that German ? Oh, no ! If we were really to consider such action, we Germans would first of all have to turn into quite different people. It is a matter of complete indifference to us whether a human being is a Chinese, a Negro, an American, a Red Indian or a Jew. But we could well take lessons from the Jews in solidarity and in helping one another. If the Jews are willing to support us, they deserve our particular appreciation, for my father attacked and offended them in his writings. They are entitled to hate Bayreuth, and, yet, many of them revere my father's works with genuine enthusiasm, in spite of his attacks on them. »

As I mentioned earlier, the Wagner problem only arises for the period following the horrors of World War II, because his music has consistently made money for musicians and music institutions world-wide. If his work had sunk into obscurity because of disinterest, there would be no controversy. But because it is such a money spinner for the entire music industry, he had to be re-instated, and this was achieved, initially, by attempts to whitewash his character, and downplay his politics. These attempts are still being made, and they are regrettable because truth is always more edifying than evasion, and repression of fact obscures other issues which merit attention : issues besides the uncomfortable fact of Richard Wagner's persistent indulgence in anti-Semitic rhetoric during his lifetime.

In passing, it must be said that Wagner, generally, found stress relief in vociferous complaint, and few targets escaped attack, including Germany itself. In a letter to Franz Liszt, of September 1860, he wrote :

« It is with horror that I contemplate Germany and my plans for the future there. May God forgive me, but all I can see in Germany is small-mindedness, boorish behaviour, pretence and arrogance. Believe me, Franz, we have no Fatherland ! If I am a German, it is because Germany lives within me. »

And so we return to the question : « Was Wagner Jewish ? » . The most interesting and least explored aspect of Richard Wagner's character lies in his relationship to his stepfather, the painter and actor Ludwig Geyer, from whom he acquired his love of theatre. Various commentators have affirmed that Wagner himself had doubts about his own paternity, but, as I have pointed-out, none have explicitly explored the obvious inference, that he may have suspected that he was partly of Jewish descent, through Geyer, whose affair with Wagner's mother pre-dated the death of Wagner's presumed father, Friedrich Wagner, a Police Registrar, who was ill at the time young Richard was conceived, and who died 6 months after his birth. Soon after this, Wagner's mother, Johanna, married Ludwig Geyer. Richard Wagner himself, I have read, was known as Richard Geyer until, at the age of 14, he had his name legally changed to Wagner. He had apparently taken some abuse at school because of his name and it has always seemed to me that his later anti-Semitism may have been motivated, at least in part, by sensitivity to this abuse, and by a kind pre-emptive denial to prevent difficulties and suffering arising from prejudice.

Christian hostility to Jews throughout the Centuries was only modified when Jews consented to convert to Christianity, and the history of music abounds in cases where musicians have had to convert in order to be able to earn a living. Closer to our own time, Gustav Mahler had to convert in order to secure employment as a conductor at the Vienna Opera. The entire Mendelssohn family also converted and, before them, the entire family of Mozart's great librettist, Lorenzo da Ponte. Da Ponte was a picaresque individual, a notorious philanderer and adventurer, from Venice originally, where his Jewish father had converted to Christianity and been baptised together with his 3 sons. In a wonderful instance of pragmatism, they all took the surname of the Bishop who performed the ceremony.

In allowing performances of Mozart Operas, the Nazis conveniently overlooked the fact that most of Mozart's libretti were written by a Jew, though the facts of Da Ponte's heritage cannot have been unknown to them. In contrast, they were less lenient in their treatment of a living Jewish writer, Stefan Zweig, whom Richard Strauß initially chose as his 2nd Opera librettist following the death of the Austrian poet Hugo von Hoffmanstahl, with whom he had had a long and fruitful collaboration. Josef Gœbbels allowed only one performance the Opera Strauß wrote to Zweig's libretto « Die Schweigsame Frau » , and then blocked further partnership, forbidding Strauß to give employment to a Jew. A letter from Strauß to Zweig criticising Gœbbels' « interference » was intercepted by the authorities. Zweig escaped to Switzerland, and Strauß was obliged to work thereafter with the dull and unimaginative, but impeccably Aryan cultural historian Joseph Gregor. None of the Operas Strauß wrote during World War II have stayed in the repertoire except « Capriccio » , for which he ended-up writing the libretto himself, with conductor Clemens Krauß, because Gregor's work on the idea was too plodding ! The whole tangled story is well told in a biography of Strauß by Matthew Boyden (Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 1999) .

The Nazis overlooked Strauß's politically incorrect indiscretions because his international fame made him a useful cultural ambassador for the 3rd « Reich » . In passing, it must be said that their selective application of prejudice does give some support to the thesis that the Holocaust was, in essence, organized theft, to which racial hatred gave a rationale. When convenient, the rationale was forgotten, or at least, set aside. A bizarre offer made to the Jewish composer Emmerich Kalman provides a case in point. Adolf Hitler himself admired the Operettas of Kalman, and, in 1936, shortly after the « Anchluss » of Austria, conveyed an offer to the composer to make him an honorary Aryan. The offer was delivered by a general of the 3rd « Reich » who, in reply to Kalman's understandable concern about its genuineness replied : « I will guarantee it with my life. » . To which Kalman replied : « But who will guarantee your life ? » . Immediately following this incident, Kalman and his family hastily left Vienna for their native Hungary, where they were issued with Hungarian passports and travel visas. This enabled a trans-European exit, via Paris, to the United States. Shortly thereafter, the production of Kalman's works in the Greater « Reich » were forbidden, as had been the performance generally of works by Jewish composers since the advent to power of the Nazi Government, in 1933.

It does no credit to Wagner's character to suppose that he may have adopted anti-Semitism as a mask to conceal any hint of Jewish heritage in his background. But the possibility is worth exploring, in the context of his life, his talent, and his creative aims. He was not born into a Jewish heritage, nor was he Jewish by religion, so the hypothesis we are exploring is not a normal case of denial, such as, for example, a youthful rebellion against parental authority.

It is a case of pre-emptive denial of a possibility. We are not dealing with a certainty in Wagner's life, but with a question to which he could never be given a clear answer. In this context, he may have felt that being Jewish, or being thought to be Jewish, was not a burden that he wished to bear. The artistic aims he set for himself from an early age were enormously ambitious ; indeed, they were grandiose and, on the face of it, impossible to achieve. In the end, they were only achieved by a miracle, the timely support of an adolescent admirer, who ascended to the throne of Bavaria, and who became his patron, Ludwig II.

What were Wagner's aims ? As they finally evolved, they were to achieve a revolution in the art of Opera, or, as he defined it, music-drama. With Ludwig's help, he was largely successful in a number of respects which it is worth summarising. He pioneered the dissolution of the Classical system of harmony, and paved the way for many developments in music of the 20th Century, including new techniques for giving music a narrative role in drama. He embraced the use of new systems for instruments and new instruments, especially in the brass sections of the orchestra allowing him to write innovative chromatic harmonies, of which other composers, such as Johannes Brahms and Robert Schumann, strongly disapproved. Brahms refused to write for the new brass instruments.

Wagner also pioneered innovations in theatre design, which included hiding the Orchestra in a pit below the stage, and blacking-out the lights in the auditorium. He overcame enormous hostility and inertia to achieve these changes. It is possible to imagine that, in some private moments of reflection early in his life, he must have decided that such aims were difficult enough, without adding to them the burden of racial and cultural prejudice which came with being, or being thought to be, Jewish. Such fears could well have originated when he was an impressionable adolescent, if he had had early experience of prejudice, through being teased at school for being Jewish.

Such speculation is only interesting if there is to be found, in his creative work, any resonance of such an issue, any traces of cultural ambiguity. Music historians have been quick to point-out anti-Semitic elements in Wagner's libretti : the gold-loving Nibelung lord Alberich as a symbol of Jewish materialism ; the jealous rival songsmith Beckmesser, in the « Meistersingers of Nuremberg » , incapable of original work, who steals the work of others, a symbol of the kind of Jewish creativity Wagner attacked in his polemic writing. But is there reverse side to this coin ? Are there any symbols in his libretti, sympathetic to a Jewish heritage in European culture ? Surprisingly, there are, but they are of an esoteric nature, and they are not reflective of orthodox Judaism any more than were Wagner's Christian references reflective of Christian orthodoxy.

To find our sources, we must turn to what is often described as the « hidden stream » of Western culture, which is rich in the very lore on which Wagner drew for his libretti : lore which encompasses the fate of Jerusalem, the role of the Knights Templar, their connection to King Arthur and the Knights of the Holy Grail, and the related mythology of the Ring Lords of antiquity. These themes are being re-explored in a explosion of new writings which have emerged on the back of the discoveries by archeologists of ancient manuscripts pre-dating the establishment of Christian orthodoxy in the 4th to the 7th Centuries. But these ideas were very much in vogue in the latter decades of the 19th Century, where they infused much art of the time, from pre-Raphaelite painting to the work of Richard Wagner.

We start with an early Opera, « The Flying Dutchman » . This figure is synonymous with that of the « Wandering Jew » , in fact, the 2 are linked in meaning : later interpretations of the « Dutchman » legend attributed his curse to demonic punishment ; but behind the same curse of endless journeying is also a symbol of the Jewish Diaspora. Interestingly, when the Dutchman does come to shore in Wagner's libretti, it is the Gentile father of Senta, the beloved, who displays greed for material wealth, whereas the Dutchman's needs are spiritual.

Spanning the « Ring » cycle are Wagner's 2 Grail Operas, « Lohengrin » and « Parsifal » . The Grail Knights are, according to neo-Gnostic interpretations, custodians of the family tree of Jesus (Joshua) and Mary (Magdalene) , whose heirs were the Merovingian monarchs of Southern France, until deposed in the 7th Century by machinations and assassinations arranged by the Roman church. The politics of that period are quite fascinating, and are too complex to elaborate on here. Suffice to say that if the Merovingian blood line was Jewish, and of Royal descent, the heretical details were a threat to the newly established Carolingian dynasty of the Holy Roman Empire. The facts had to be suppressed, belief in them declared a heresy, and, to ensure suppression, such heresy had to be punishable by death.

The facts of a usurped Royal, Jewish line went underground, and re-surfaced in esoteric form, in the Grail legends, and in fairy stories of Princes and Princesses deprived of their inheritance, such as Cinderella and the Sleeping Beauty. Whether or not Wagner knew of these references, it is to these legends he turned for the content of his Operas.

In terms of his Opera « Lohengrin » , the Knight Lohengrin magically appears to restore Elsa to her rightful place on the throne, of which she has been deprived by trickery. The condition of his help is that she should never ask his name or from whence he came. To those who understood the riddle, there is here, the unspoken inference that Lohengrin himself is of the Jewish blood line, information which he cannot disclose, either in fact or in name, or else he will have to « return from whence he came » . Could there possibly be, in this and in the Dutchman story, an subjective echo of Wagner's own feared identity as a Jew ? If so, this would co-exist as a buried sub-text buried within the wider meanings.

Since Wagner read widely, and studied deeply in such matters, it is probable that he was acquainted with Gnostic interpretations of the Grail mythology, particularly as he is known to have visited the mysterious village of Rennes-le-Château, in the South of France, before writing « Parsifal » . This otherwise normal country town purports to be where the treasure of the Knights Templar was hidden by the Cathars after the 13th Century Albigensian Crusade against them instigated by the Catholic Church, and could be construed to be in the area of the actual location of the events of « Parsifal » , that is, the location of the castle of the Grail, Montsalvat, which the libretto describes as being « in the country in the character of the northern mountains of Gothic Spain » . The treasure was 2-fold, encompassing both the material treasure rescued from the Temple of Jerusalem, in 70 AD, but was also supposed to include the Grail itself, which is no doubt what drew Wagner to visit Rennes-le-Château.

Whatever else Wagner may have known about the Grail legend, he already had his own conception of what it meant to him before making this visit. « Parsifal » , his last Opera, was written in 1878, but in an essay written in 1849 (titled « Die Wibelungen ») , he saw it as a relic originating in India, the birthplace of the original Aryan civilisation, and one which embodied a transcendent and transforming power, pre-dating Christianity itself. There is no historical justification for such a supposition, except in the sense that the Grail has always embodied an idea in the form of a vessel, and many of the cultural values underlying Western thought do have their origins in the East (as brilliantly shown by English writer Stephen Oppenheimer in his exhaustive 500 page study « Eden In The East » , published by Phoenix, 1999) .

The symbolism in « Parsifal » is sufficiently elastic to allow a number of interpretations, including racist ones. What sin or condition, exactly, is being redeemed and healed in « Parsifal » ? Is it a moral one ? A cultural one ? A racial one ? It must be said that Wagner deliberately leaves that question open to interpretation, and there are no shortage of interpretations. However, the traditional version has the Grail Knights as proto-Teutonic Knights defending a pure Christian-Aryan heritage, and defending it against incursions by the alien, pagan threat of the magician Klingsor, who seeks to divert them from their quest through the wiles of his captive Flower Maidens, embodiments of sensual gratification. The ailing leader, Amfortas, has been compromised by temptation, and some commentators find, in the leader's « wound which will not heal » , a sexual malady. « Parsifal » is the « wise fool » who can retain his innocence, resist temptation and thus bring redemption to the community of the Grail.

The Nazis, of course, characterized Klingsor as a Jew, but a re-casting of the same story could produce an inversion of racial roles, and it is precisely such a re-casting which has been embraced by a direct descendant of Richard Wagner, the composer Adrian Wagner, who lives in the United Kingdom ; at least, that is the inference one must draw from his association with writer Laurence Gardner, author of « Bloodline of the Holy Grail » , « Genesis of the Grail Kings » and « Realm of the Ring Lords » , all published since 1996. Adrian Wagner has written companion musical suites to 2 of these volumes.

Laurence Gardner's thesis enlarges on themes brought to public notice in the 1982 best-seller by Bainton, Leigh & Lincoln, « The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail » , a work which draws on many sources including the apocryphal scriptures and Gnostic writings which have emerged from archeological discovers over the past 2 Centuries.

A summary below explains how this agenda discovers a « Jewish bloodline » context in the Grail legend, supplanting the orthodox Christian one, and, by inference, allows a similar context in the Wagnerian Grail Operas supplanting the traditional « Teutonic Knights » context with its overtones of German nationalism, and Aryan racial purity.

An entry in Cosima Wagner's diary of December 2, 1887, confirms the composer's ambivalence about the Opera's meaning for him, at the time of its composition, when he says to her :

« I shall still write “ Parsifal ” for my wife, but I wouldn't say it's a sign of faith in the German spirit any longer. »

It is quite likely that this remark reflects Wagner's disenchantment with the German public, which, by then, he had come to feel had given him insufficient support and backing in the creation of the Bayreuth Festival. The 1st « Festpielhaus » lost money, and 6 years elapsed before it could reopen, in 1882, by which time Wagner was exhausted and disenchanted by the response to his embrace of German nationalism. His anti-Semitism had been a calculated part of that posture, and, despite it, support from Jewish musicians in the Festival, and, from Berlin, Jews of the Festival were significant factors in its survival. Wagner lived to see « Parsifal » produced in the 1882 Festival, but died the next year.

The word « Grail » has other meanings beside the one Wagner attributed to it. Was he aware of them ? In the Gnostic tradition, the word has a double meaning : on the one hand, it is said to be a contraction of « San(g-Real) » - which means, in French, Royal Blood, and, in code, means, in turn, that the Grail is a document which provides proof of the line of descent of « Royal Blood » : the blood being that of David and Solomon, through Joshua, or Jesus, and his wife, Mariam, or Mary Magdalene, Joshua having been an heir to the throne of Jerusalem by direct descent, as was his brother, James. (To clarify, « Jesus » is the Greek version of the Hebrew name « Joshua » or « Yeshua » and came into circulation when the New Testament Gospels were translated into Greek from the original Aramaic) . In addition, the concept of the Grail as a vessel has the esoteric meaning of « the womb which carries the Holy Blood » , and is a reverential symbol of Mary Magdalene, who, to this day, is still the subject of cult worship in areas in the South of France, that is, in the former lands of the Merovingian monarchs.

The traditional meaning of the Grail as the cup which carried the blood of Jesus shed when on the Cross is a compatible, or at least an analogous meaning, and it is, of course, the meaning Wagner illustrated in « Parsifal » , composing music of extraordinary power to portray the wondrous, healing properties of the Grail. The belief that blood itself has magical properties is one of great antiquity. Wagner drew on it for the rites portrayed in the final scenes of « Parsifal » ; scenes which have as much affinity with the earlier religion of Mithras as they do with orthodox Christian worship ; and the rituals observed in « Parsifal » are also related to rites of Freemasonry, as might be expected considering the links between the Knights Templar and Masonry.

Whatever Wagner's acquaintance with such diverse aspects of Grail lore, he only took what he needed for « Parsifal » , a selective process he also used in deriving material from legend his other Operas. It's worth mentioning, at this point, that « Parsifal » also revisits a theme which Wagner dealt with in an earlier Opera, that of the conflict between flesh and spirit. That other Opera is « Tannhäuser » , another work in which Wagner, while paying lip service to orthodoxy, displays dissent. The dissent occurs during the scene where Tannhäuser. has returned from his futile trip to Rome to beg forgiveness for his sexual sins, committed during his sojourn in Venusberg. The Pope withholds forgiveness, and Tannhäuser bitterly refers to his rejection in a German phrase of ambivalent meaning, sometimes translated as, « I saw him who is God's messenger » , and sometimes as, « I saw him who claims to represent God » . Lost in the garment of piety with which Wagner otherwise clothed his libretto, this Gnostic barb was overlooked, and Wagner was accused of having written a pro-Catholic Opera by those to whom it mattered, whose sectarian interests he was thought to have betrayed.

Is it possible to sum-up the foregoing ? All one can say is that ironies abound. Despite Wagner's anti-Semitic rhetoric, there is consistent evidence of his interaction with Jewish artists throughout his life, both on a personal basis, and professionally, after the establishment of Bayreuth : and there was a persistent groundswell of support for his innovations from Jewish people in Berlin, in the early years of the Festival, which continued despite the hurtful re-publication of his earlier tracts. Much of the information used in this survey comes from a recent book by a Jewish writer Paul Lawrence Rose, « Wagner : Race and Revolution » published by Faber & Faber, in 1992, and other information and quotations from correspondence come from « A Documentary Study » by Herbert Barth, Dietrich Mack and Egon Voß, published by Thames & Hudson, in 1975, and « The Real Wagner » by Rudolph Sabor, published by Andre Deutsch, in 1987, and further quotations from books are included courtesy of James Whitehead.

Wagner's music is here to stay. But can he himself be forgiven ? I discussed these matters in recent e-mails with a long-time Jewish friend in London, a connection maintained since our days together at Cambridge University in England, in the 1950's. I suggested that the difference between Adolf Hitler and Richard Wagner was this : Hitler, who wished to be a painter, gave-up art for politics, and, in his impotent and vengeful frustration, refused Jews employment and then murdered millions ; Wagner never gave-up on art, and though he voiced complaints about Jewry, never refused a Jew employment, and never committed homicide. My friend was kind enough to say that, as an anti-Semite, Wagner was an amateur. The painter was a professional. That is probably about the best one can say for Richard Wagner, the man. The music speaks for itself.

But as for the question : was Wagner of Jewish heritage ? If that DNA testing I mentioned earlier could be done, and if it turned-out that this was true, then the question would arise - Could Richard Wagner be acclaimed in history as one of the great Jewish composers of the 19th Century ? Such a verdict would please as many people as it would annoy. But it would be a final, fitting irony, in the career of a man in whose life ironies abound.

In the aftermath of World War II, the main problem facing those in the music industry who wished to « reinstate » the music of Richard Wagner was its posthumous use for political purposes by the Nazis. A thesis needs to be written about music as polemic. Most of the hijacks have been completely inappropriate. The Labor Party in Australia have « adopted » the Jupiter theme from Gustav Holst' « The Planets » Suite for their theme song to assume nobility of purpose for themselves. This embrace is by a political Party formed largely by Irish revolutionary socialists who still despise the British ! The « British » national anthem is a German tune, which was still doing the round of German States at the time of the Jubilee of Queen Victoria. The « Jubel-Overture » by Swiss composer Joachim Raff (who taught Franz Liszt how to orchestrate) sounds as if it uses « God Save The King » as its main theme, but, in fact, the piece was written shortly after the aforementioned jubilee to celebrate the 25th year of the reign of Adolf, Duke of Nassau ! My essay « Variations on a racist theme » documents the embrace of the tune by the United States, to new words, and titled « America » . In that form, for a 100 years, it rivalled the « Star Spangled Banner » as America's official national anthem, despite its association with England, with whom the colonist had fought a War.

The German national anthem in use during the Nazi era is based on the theme from the slow movement of Haydn's « Emperor » String Quartet, but the ignominy to which the tune was subjected has not resulted in prohibition of performance of that work, nor has it deterred Protestants the world over from singing the hymn set to its melody « Glorious Things of Thee Are Spoken » .

It is the peculiar quality of music that it provides a simulacrum in sound for « events » creating by the human central nervous system, « events » called « emotions » and these « events » can be directed for political purposes. Thus, « pride » feels the same, whoever feels it, but the object of pride can change according to the social context which inspires it.

I have read one commentary on the Nazi use of Richard Wagner's music which points-out how stupid it was of the Nazi hierarchy to take on board the Nordic gods as their heroes, since the demise of the gods was specifically prophesied by Wagner in the « Ring » cycle. I realise this kind of commentary does not assuage the distress of people who were there in Germany, during the 1930's, hearing the « Rienzi » Overture played at the start of Nazis rallies, following by public speeches threatening and denouncing them because of their race and cultural heritage.

Perhaps, it is best to allow Wagner to speak for himself on these matters, quoting directly from his own writings. Prophetically, he wrote :

« Is the German already tottering to his fall ? Woe to us and to the world if the nation itself were saved and the German folk remained but the German spirit had taken flight for the sake of power. »

Did he anticipate Adolf Hitler ? :

« The German folk does not want demagogues. Do we ever see a conqueror, a forcible usurper, whether folk or individual, that does not seek to found his wilful annexation on religious, mythical or other trumped-up covenants ? »

The author of the cautionary tale about misuse of the « Ring » of world power also wrote :

« To conquer without ever considering how they are to be won over ! Never to ask oneself how Holland, Switzerland, and so forth are to be converted into friends ! Only for the army. It is not the Jews we have to complain about, for each organism tried to further its own interests. »

The development of scientific weapons of War alarmed him :

« It can but arouse our apprehension to see the progress of the art of War departing from the springs of moral force and turning more and more to the mechanical : here, the rawest forces of the lower nature powers are brought into artificial play. Already a grim and ghastly sight is offered by the armored Monitors, against which the stately sailing ship avails no more : dumb serving men, no longer with the looks of men, attend these monsters. Art invents torpedoes for the sea, and dynamite cartouches, or the like, for everywhere else. »

And again :

« It is thinkable that all this, with art and science, valour, point of honour, life and chattels should one day fly into the air through some incalculable accident. Then, it might really look " as if God had made the world that the devil might take it ". »

L'antisémitisme de Wagner et l'appropriation de sa musique par les Nazis

Cet aspect de la personnalité de Wagner a donné lieu à une abondante littérature polémique, largement alimentée tant par la récupération de sa musique par le régime National-Socialiste que par l'amitié de l'épouse de son fils Siegfried, Winnifred Chamberlain, avec Adolf Hitler.

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Siegfried Wagner est né à Tribschen, en Suisse, le 6 juin 1869 et est mort à Bayreuth, le 4 août 1930. Il est le fils de Richard Wagner et petit-fils de Franz Liszt.

3e enfant de Richard Wagner et Cosima von Bülow, il doit son nom à l'opéra Siegfried, auquel travaille son père au moment de sa naissance. Cette période de bonheur pour le couple Wagner inspire à Richard la pièce pour petit orchestre Siegfried-Idyll (1870), basée sur des motifs issus de l'opéra et dédiée à Cosima. Le titre originel, Tribschener Idyll mit Fidi-Vogelgesang und Orange-Sonnenaufgang (Idylle de Tribschen avec chant d'oiseau de Fidi et lever de soleil orange), fait référence au surnom de Siegfried, Fidi.

Lui-même compositeur d'Opéras, Siegfried Wagner vit longtemps dans l'ombre de son père. Après la mort de celui-ci en 1883 (il a alors 14 ans), il songe à devenir architecte, mais se tourne vers la musique et étudie la composition avec un disciple de son père, Engelbert Humperdinck.

Il était secrètement homosexuel et ne semble pas avoir tenu à se marier. En 1914, à 45 ans, une rencontre est arrangée avec Winnifred Williams Klindworth, jeune Anglaise âgée de 17 ans. Leur mariage a lieu le 22 septembre 1915. Le couple aura 4 enfants :

Siegfried eut également avec la fille d'un pasteur un enfant adultérin, Walter Aign, qui fut employé comme répétiteur au « Festspielhaus » (Palais des Festivals) du vivant de Siegfried, mais que Winnifred fit renvoyer après sa mort.

En 1908, sa mère Cosima lui délègue (en titre seulement) la direction du Festival de Bayreuth. Après la Première Guerre mondiale, la très mauvaise situation financière du Festival le pousse à entamer des tournées de concert pour récolter des fonds.

À partir de 1924, il s'attache à la modernisation des représentations du Festival, que Cosima tend à figer dans un conservatisme buté, et engage le décorateur Kurt Söhnlein.

Il ne prend véritablement la direction du Festival qu'à la mort de sa mère en 1930. L'un de ses projets les plus importants est la nouvelle production de Tannhäuser, pour laquelle il engage le chef Arturo Toscanini. Les difficultés du Maître à communiquer avec l'orchestre dans son allemand à couper au couteau, son intransigeance artistique, ainsi que la chaleur de cet été caniculaire, épuisent Siegfried qui fait un infarctus pendant une répétition, et meurt le 4 août 1930, sans avoir pu moderniser le Festival en profondeur comme il l'avait projeté. La direction passe à sa femme Winnifred.

L'antisémitisme de Richard Wagner n'a rien d'exceptionnel : ces discours, comme les préjugés raciaux en général, sont courants. Mais ces thèses sont déjà combattues : Nietzsche, par exemple, se brouille avec Wagner, en partie pour ses opinions antisémites. L'antisémitisme est un débat central à l'époque, y compris aux yeux mêmes de nombreux intellectuels juifs. Entre pogrom et assimilation, les discussions entre penseurs juifs font rage.

Tout au long de sa vie, dans ses conversations, dans ses écrits, Richard Wagner n'a cessé d'émettre des opinions « anti-judaïque » car elles ne se fondent pas sur des préjugés raciaux mais sur le reproche adressés aux Juifs de demeurer juifs et donc de n'être pas allemands. Cet anti-judaïsme est donc fort différent de l'antisémitisme qui repose sur des distinctions raciales. Wagner préconise l'assimilation des Juifs à la culture germanique. L'assimilation est aussi sujet de débat entre les intellectuels juifs.

Le 1er essai de Wagner, « Das Judenthum in der Musik », est publié en 1850 dans la revue Neue Zeitschrift für Musik sous le pseudonyme de « K. Freigedank » (« libre pensée »). Wagner s'est donné pour but d'expliquer la prétendue « aversion populaire » envers la musique des compositeurs juifs tels que Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy ou Giacomo Meyerbeer. Il écrit notamment que le peuple allemand est « repoussé » par les Juifs en raison « de leur aspect et de leur comportement d'étrangers » ; les Juifs « sont des anomalies de la nature » jasant « de leurs voix grinçantes, couinantes et bourdonnantes ». Wagner allègue que les musiciens juifs, n'étant pas en relation avec l'esprit authentique du peuple allemand, ne peuvent qu'écrire une musique artificielle, sans aucune profondeur, et rabâcher la vraie musique à la manière des perroquets.

L'article attire peu l'attention. Cependant, après que Wagner l'ait publié de nouveau en 1869 sous la forme d'un pamphlet signé de son véritable nom, de vives protestations s'élevèrent dans le public lors d'une représentation des Maîtres-chanteurs.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy

Après sa mort, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy fut l'objet de la propagande anti-juive. Cela commença avec « Das Judenthum in der Musik » un pamphlet de Richard Wagner qui avait pourtant été fortement influencé par les compositions de Mendelssohn. L'ouvrage parut sous un pseudonyme, en 1850, 3 ans après la mort de Mendelssohn mais, en 1869, parut une édition augmentée sous le vrai nom de l'auteur. À la date de la 2e publication, Wagner était déjà un compositeur influent si bien que son point de vue contribua à faire mépriser l'œuvre de Mendelssohn dans la seconde moitié du 19e Siècle. En 1933, après la prise du pouvoir par le régime nazi, Josef Goebbels interdit (en sa qualité de président de la « Chambre de la culture du “ Reich ” ») les représentations des œuvres de Mendelssohn. Il y en eut néanmoins quelques-unes, par exemple « le Songe d'une nuit d'été » dirigé par Wilhelm Fürtwängler en février 1934 (à l'occasion du 125e anniversaire de Mendelssohn). Des compositeurs allemands, parmi lesquels on compte le prestigieux Carl Orff furent invités à écrire des alternatives musicales à la musique de Mendelssohn pour « le Songe d'une nuit d'été ». Bustes et plaques commémoratives de Mendelssohn furent retirés (par exemple, en novembre 1936, le monument de Mendelssohn devant le Gewandhaus de Leipzig ; ce qui entraîna la protestation publique de Fürtwängler). Le maire Carl Gørdeler démissionna de son poste en raison de la suppression en son absence du monument de Mendelssohn et il fut, par la suite, un des personnages importants de la Résistance allemande.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and « The Jewish Question »

His dual name reflects a multi-faceted religious identity, but Adolf Hitler's 3rd « Reich » homed in on his Jewishness and banned Felix Mendelssohn's music.

On the paternal side, Mendelssohn was the grandson of the 18th Century Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786) , but was not raised in the Jewish faith.

On March 21, 1816 (as it happened, the birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach) , he was baptized, along with his 3 siblings, as a Lutheran. His parents, Abraham and Lea Mendelssohn, were baptized a few years later.

To acknowledge their new spiritual identity, the family adopted a 2nd surname, so that Felix Mendelssohn became Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Abraham intended that, eventually, his family would omit the Mendelssohn name altogether. His son never did so, however, and continued to sign his letters and publish his music under his dual name.

The issues of religious identity and intra-faith tolerance are critical to our understanding of the composer's life and work. Of Moses Mendelssohn's 6 children who survived into adulthood, 2 preserved their Jewish faith, while 2 converted to Lutheranism, and 2 to Catholicism.

Given this family history, it is telling that Mendelssohn set sacred texts for a variety of faiths, not just Lutheran, but Anglican and Catholic texts (« Tu es Petrus, Lauda Sion ») .

He wrote a short hymn setting for the Huguenot church and, towards the end of his life, was in correspondence with the « Neues Tempel » of Hamburg, which commissioned him to compose several Cantata-like Psalm settings, ultimately unfulfilled.

Though Christian by virtue of his baptism and practising faith, Mendelssohn remained, in the eyes of many, a Jew. His family's wealth partially insulated him from anti-Semitic sentiments of the time ; but, after his death, Richard Wagner attacked the composer's memory in a racist essay published anonymously in 1850.

Wagner maintained that, as a Jew, Mendelssohn could only imitate the profundities of Bach and Beethoven ; his music was derivative and ultimately superficial.

The rise of the 3rd « Reich » at the beginning of the 20th Century did further, seemingly irreparable damage to Mendelssohn's reputation. The Nazis tore down his statue that had stood before the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » . The Nazis banned Mendelssohn's music but left his grave unscathed in the Trinity Cemetery of Berlin, liquidated the family banking house and banned his music.

But they were unable to expunge Mendelssohn completely from German culture. When Richard Strauß was asked to write new music for « A Midsummer Night's Dream » , he replied that he could not improve on Mendelssohn's music.

A rival's envy and the Nazis combined to turn Felix Mendelssohn from a hot 19th Century composer to a pariah and left hundreds of his scores unpublished. Real rescue operations began only a dozen years ago.

Thanks largely to the « Mendelssohn Project », which has been working since 1996 to redress decades of neglect, the composer's works are being recovered and performed. For the bicentenary of his birth, the Museum of Jewish Heritage, in New York, will present 13 world-premieres, on January 28, in a program entitled :

« Mendelssohn : Lost Treasures and the Wagner Suppression. »

Dubbed « the Mozart of the 19th Century » by Robert Schumann, Mendelssohn (1809-1847) composed lyrical Masterpieces such as the Violin Concerto and the Overture to « A Midsummer Night's Dream ». He was widely performed in German-speaking countries and England. Yet, 3 years after his death at 38, Richard Wagner launched a campaign to denigrate the Jewish-born, Protestant-raised composer in a scabrous tract titled : « Judaism in Music » .

Mendelssohn's popularity quickly plummeted, and any chance for a serious revival was scotched when his music was banned in Adolf Hitler's Germany. Sympathizers smuggled hundreds of his music manuscripts, letters and artworks (he was a brilliant watercolorist) out of the Berlin State Library to Warsaw and Kraków, in the winter of 1936-1937.

« A couple of years later, when those cities were no longer safe, the materials were smuggled-out again » and scattered all over the globe », said Stephen Somary, conductor and founder of the « Mendelssohn Project » .

Through the project, which is based in New York and Stuttgart, Germany, Somary has been gathering these lost works since 1996. He discovered a trove of musical works through allusions in the composer's 9,000 letters. He says 270 of a total of 770 scores remain unpublished. They've had no life in concert halls and aren't even mentioned in biographies.

Somary said :

« There were references to Symphonies and 2 Operas I hadn't seen listed anywhere else. There's a children's Symphony, Lieder, Concerti, a few Piano Trios, and a C minor Trio for piano, violin and viola. »

Even the works we think we know aren't the only versions that exist or the ones Mendelssohn preferred.

Somary continued :

« The " Italian " Symphony was not published by Mendelssohn, who didn't care for it, so he re-wrote the 2nd, 3rd and 4th movements. He thought the 1st movement was such a disaster it would have to be scrapped completely. In fact, all of the known 5 Symphonies have substantial alternate versions. »

Mendelssohn : Lost Treasures and the Wagner Suppression

(Historical background by Stephen Somary.)

« Judaism is the evil conscience of our modern civilization. »

With these words, Richard Wagner (1813-1883) , the celebrated composer of German nationalistic Opera, concluded Part One of his 1850 treatise : « Judaism in Music » . He had just completed an argumentative circle petitioning for the cognitive dismissal of all Jewish influence in the Germanic arts.

Felix Mendelssohn (1809-1847) , who died a mere 3 years earlier, had seemingly secured a place among the greatest composers who ever lived. From a period which began in 1835, with Mendelssohn's appointment as the General Music Director of the « Gewandhaus » in Leipzig, until the public distribution of Wagner's treatise, the world had never witnessed a figure in the arts so equally beloved, influential, and revered. Then came the « assassination » (albeit posthumously, and in prose) that was followed by decades of work by Wagner, and his many fellow German nationalists, to re-teach the world who Felix Mendelssohn was and what the value, or lack thereof, of his artistic output had truly been. Normally, generations follow a natural course in determining the popularity of an artist. Mendelssohn never received this chance, because decades of work by Wagner and his supporters were dedicated to extreme revisionist history.

As a result, publication and natural dissemination of Mendelssohn's full « œuvre » was suppressed as anti-Semitic sentiments increased exponentially over the ensuing decades. There remained, however, people dedicated to the cause of keeping Mendelssohn's name alive, but they were greatly out-numbered. The fact that Mendelssohn was not completely forgotten prompted Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime to add the Jewish-born composer's name (an assimilation-conversion to Christianity was undertaken by Mendelssohn's family when he was a child) in the mid-1930's to a series of lists of forbidden artists. At this point, a majority of Mendelssohn's manuscripts (both published and unpublished) were housed in the basement of the Berlin State Library. They were smuggled-out by Mendelssohn supporters to Warsaw and Kraków, during the winter of 1936-1937. By 1939, when these cities fell under Nazi control, they were smuggled-out again - but, this time, by any means possible and to any locations away from Hitler's influence. This secured the safety of these documents, but created a massive practical problem of tracking them down.

The suppression by Richard Wagner, the plague of anti-Semitism, and the subsequent banning of his name, comprised the principle reason that hundreds of manuscripts and artworks by Felix Mendelssohn, and thousands of personal letters, either to or from the composer, fell into obscurity. There were other factors as well which led to Wagner's work to be so successful. Felix Mendelssohn, born into a wealthy family, could afford' himself the luxury of deciding that he did not like to publish. In fact, only the first 72 of Mendelssohn's Opus numbers were actually published in the composer's lifetime. A great majority of the remainder of published works were done so in the few intervening years between his passing and Wagner's influential rise in popularity. Mendelssohn also did not plan for what to do with the hundreds of unpublished manuscripts in the couple of months when it seemed more and more likely that the he (at the age of only 38) was mortally ill.

Felix Mendelssohn also set a particularly difficult standard for himself when it came to deciding what was fit for publication and what was not. For example, his « Italian » Symphony, one of the most beloved works in the entire Orchestra literature, did not meet his standards. So much so, that he re-wrote the last 3 movements before putting it away. This was a fact unknown to the composer's widow, Cécile Jeanrenaud Mendelssohn, when a publishing-house came calling, shortly after Mendelssohn's death, asking to publish this work : she gave them the wrong version !

The fact that Felix Mendelssohn did not like to publish, combined with his early death, and the subsequent suppression by Wagner and, then, later by the Nazis, led to apathy and disinformation as the world started defining what this 19th Century giant of a composer and man was really about, and how many works he actually wrote. In recent decades, there has been much painstaking research undertaken in the quest to bring the understanding of Mendelssohn's output to light, but many mysteries still abound. The « Mendelssohn Project » believes itself to be in the forefront of the work to uncover the full Mendelssohn story, and found a natural partner in the « Museum of Jewish Heritage » . The Museum was willing to delve into this topic, and work to assist in sharing the true Mendelssohn story with the world.

The concert is a particularly historic event in that it is presenting 13 Masterpieces by Felix Mendelssohn in the context of what led them to be unpublished in the 1st place. As has been evidenced over the recent years, not many institutions have had the courage to « take on » the seemingly untouchable Wagner. By confronting Wagner's suppression of Mendelssohn's lost treasures, neither the « Museum of Jewish Heritage » , nor « The Mendelssohn Project » , is leveling criticism of the true greatness of Wagner's musical gifts. But the fact remains that he was one of the most prominent anti-Semites in history, and the evil he wrought should not go unnoticed.

It is hoped that this concert will serve as one more small step in the large task of presenting to the world, for the 1st time ever, the scope of the life and music of Felix Mendelssohn, as well as to nudge our society ever so slightly forward to understanding the damage done to him by a suppression caused by overt anti-Semitism. The true picture of Felix Mendelssohn, gifted and passionate, but also at times tragic and tortured, has been swept under the table and ignored for more than one and a half Centuries. There is more to the story about this fascinating and complex man which will still take years to unravel.

Richard Wagner a également attaqué les Juifs dans d'autres essais. Dans « Qu'est-ce qui est allemand ? » (1879) , il écrit par exemple :

« Les Juifs tiennent le travail intellectuel allemand entre leurs mains. Nous pouvons ainsi constater un odieux travestissement de l'esprit allemand, présenté aujourd'hui à ce peuple comme étant sa prétendue ressemblance. Il est à craindre qu'avant longtemps la nation prenne ce simulacre pour le reflet de son image. Alors, quelques-unes des plus belles dispositions de la race humaine s'éteindraient, peut-être à tout jamais. »

En dépit de ses écrits antisémites, Wagner a plusieurs amis juifs. Le plus représentatif d'entre eux est sans doute le chef d'orchestre Hermann Levi, un Juif « pratiquant » que Wagner désigne pour diriger la 1^{re} représentation de « Parsifal ». Le compositeur souhaite d'abord que Levi se fasse baptiser (sans doute en raison du contenu religieux de cet Opéra), mais renonce finalement à cette exigence. Cependant, lorsqu'il analyse le détail des péripéties de cette valse-hésitation telles que les rapporte Carl Glasenapp, Theodor W. Adorno, dans son « Essai sur Wagner », résume en ces termes ce que cet épisode relève, selon lui, du côté « démoniaque » de Wagner :

« Une envie sadique d'humilier Levi, une humeur conciliante et sentimentale et surtout la volonté de s'attacher affectivement le maltraité se réunissent dans la casuistique du comportement de Wagner. »

Levi maintint toutefois des relations amicales avec Wagner et fut sollicité, à ses funérailles, pour porter son cercueil. Un autre de ces amis fut Joseph Rubinstein.

Notons enfin que l'antisémitisme de Wagner n'est quasiment pas évoqué, dans ses abondants écrits, par son plus fervent admirateur, le viennois Arnold Schönberg (1874-1951), fils de commerçants juifs convertis. Schönberg réembrassa la foi juïdaique dans les années 1930.

Après la mort de Wagner à Venise, en 1883, Bayreuth devient le lieu de rassemblement d'un groupe anti-Sémite soutenu par sa femme Cosima et formé d'admirateurs zélés du compositeur, notamment du théoricien racialisiste Houston Stewart Chamberlain. À la mort de Cosima et de son fils Siegfried en 1930, la responsabilité du Festival échoit à la veuve de ce dernier, Winnifred, amie personnelle d'Adolf Hitler. Hitler est lui-même un zélé de Wagner, donnant une lecture National-Socialiste à un anti-Sémitisme retiré de son contexte, et aux thèmes germaniques qui jalonnent l'œuvre, censée inscrire le Maître de Bayreuth dans l'idéologie nazie. Les Nazis font un usage courant de sa musique et la jouent lors de leurs grands rassemblements. Il n'est pas le seul compositeur apprécié des nazis : Beethoven et Bruckner sont aussi récupérés par le régime.

Eu égard à cette ambiguïté, les œuvres de Wagner ne sont pas représentées en public en Israël (largement fondée à l'origine par des Juifs d'Europe centrale imprégnés de civilisation germanique), où, par ailleurs, la musique de Wagner est couramment diffusée par des stations de radio ou des chaînes de télévision d'État, sans susciter plus de scandale qu'à New York, Paris ou Berlin. Jusqu'à présent, toutes les tentatives de représentation publique (notamment par le pianiste et chef d'orchestre Daniel Barenboim qui a dirigé le prélude de Tristan und Isolde à Tel Aviv, en 2001) ont déclenché les plus vives protestations, certains auditeurs ayant même quitté la salle au cours du XX^e siècle. Ce n'est qu'au cours des dernières années que de nombreux Israéliens ont soutenu qu'il est possible d'apprécier son talent musical, sans que cela n'implique l'acceptation de ces idées politiques ou sociales. En 2010, un avocat israélien mélomane, Jonathan Livny, fonde une « Société wagnérienne israélienne » afin de mettre fin au boycottage des œuvres du compositeur dans son pays.

Gottfried Wagner, le frère d'Eva et le demi-frère de Katharina, est le vilain petit canard des Wagner : dès 6 ans, il avait barbouillé de rouge le buste de la statue de son arrière grand-père signée Arno Breker, le sculpteur préféré de Adolf Hitler. Il a été puni en étant envoyé en pension. Le buste est toujours en face du théâtre, à Bayreuth.

Musicologue, Gottfried a écrit sa thèse sur la musique dite « dégénérée » et interdite par les Nazis, soit que les compositeurs eussent été juifs, soit qu'ils se soient opposés au régime.

Pour lui, la musique de Wagner ne peut être étrangère aux théories raciales de son auteur exposées dans « Le Judaïsme dans la musique », publié d'abord sous un pseudonyme en 1850 puis révisé et publié sous son nom en 1869. Dans son entretien à l'AFP, il affirmait :

« Wagner a développé ses propres théories raciales. Un racisme obscène. Avec ce qu'on sait aujourd'hui, on ne peut pas l'ignorer et dire seulement " c'est de la belle musique ". »

Quelque temps après cet entretien, le chef d'orchestre Daniel Barenboim, de nationalité israélienne, a livré au New York Review of Books un long article intitulé « Wagner et les juifs », dans lequel il s'oppose, sans le citer, au point de vue de Gottfried Wagner :

« Wagner a été pour Hitler une sorte de précurseur et sans doute le modèle personnel et idéologique le plus important qu'il ait eu. Néanmoins, aussi révoltant qu'ait pu être l'antisémitisme de Wagner, personne ne peut le tenir pour responsable de l'usage et de l'abus qu'Hitler a fait de sa musique et de sa vision du monde.

Le compositeur juif Ernest Bloch, par exemple, refusait d'accepter la prise de possession de Wagner par les Nazis.

Ce genre d'argument importe peu à Gottfried. Il demande que soit rendue publique la correspondance qui va de 1923 à 1945 entre Hitler et certains membres de sa famille, dont Winnifred, la belle-fille de Wagner, qui dirigea le Festival de 1930 à la fin de la guerre.

27 rouleaux de pellicule existent aussi, montrant, en privé, le Chancelier du 3e « Reich » chez les Wagner. Hitler était un habitué du Festival, et un ami de la famille que les enfants appelaient « oncle Wolf » .

L'éditeur exclusif de Wagner est la maison Schott à Mayence.

Friedrich Nietzsche, décriant tout ce qu'il pressent de nauséabond non tant chez Wagner en soi que chez les admirateurs de Wagner, écrit cependant : « J'aime Wagner. » (Ecce homo, « Pourquoi j'écris de si bons livres, Le Cas Wagner, I ») .

Le terme Wagner est entré dans la langue courante, comme adjectif depuis 1861 (wagnérien) , comme substantif depuis 1873 sous la plume d'Alphonse Daudet dans son recueil « Contes du lundi » .

« La musique commence là où s'arrête le pouvoir des mots. » (Richard Wagner)

« Vous, mes frères souffrants de toutes les classes de la société humaine qui sentez une sourde colère couver en vous, quand vous aspirez à vous délivrer de l'esclavage de l'argent pour devenir des hommes libres, comprenez bien notre tâche, et aidez-nous à élever l'Art à sa dignité, afin que nous puissions vous montrer comment vous élèverez le métier à la hauteur de l'Art, le serf de l'industrie au rang de l'homme beau, conscient de lui-même, qui, avec le sourire de l'initié, peut dire à la nature, au soleil et aux étoiles, à la mort et à l'éternité : vous aussi vous êtes miens ; et je suis votre Maître. » (Richard Wagner, l'Art et la Révolution.)

Compositeur et dramaturge allemand (Leipzig, 1813 - Venise, 1883) .

Musicien mais aussi dramaturge, philosophe et metteur-en-scène, Richard Wagner fut sans rival dans l'Allemagne de son temps. Sous sa plume et sous sa direction, l'opéra devint une « œuvre d'art totale » censée élever son auteur au rang des dieux. Bayreuth fut (et demeure) le lieu de son apothéose.

Dernier de 7 enfants, Richard Wagner naît dans une famille ayant le goût des activités artistiques : son père, Friedrich Wagner (1770-1813) , au demeurant greffier de police, et sa mère, Johanna (1778-1848) , font du théâtre, tout comme ses sœurs Rosalie (1803-1837) et Louise (1805-1871) , tandis que son frère aîné, Albert (1799-1874) , est chanteur et sa sœur Clara (1807-1875) , la femme d'un chanteur. Un autre frère, Julius (1804-1862) , est orfèvre et la 4e fille, Ottilie (1811-1883) , épouse le philologue Hermann Brockhaus (1806-1877) , dont Friedrich Nietzsche sera le disciple.

Orphelin de père à l'âge de 6 mois, le jeune garçon est élevé par sa mère, aux côtés d'un beau-père (son vrai père ?) , Ludwig Geyer (1778-1821) , acteur mais aussi peintre et poète, et de son oncle Adolf Wagner (1774-1835) , homme lettré qui exerce une forte influence sur sa formation intellectuelle. Ses études, cependant, sont décevantes. Passionné de poésie (Homère, Shakespeare) , il se sent bientôt la vocation de musicien. En 1831, il trouve en Theodor Weinlig (1780-1842) , Maître de chapelle à Leipzig, le mentor selon ses vœux. Avec lui, il travaille l'harmonie et le contrepoint. Dès 1832, il compose sa Symphonie en ut majeur et, en 1833, son 1er opéra, « les Fées » .

Chef d'orchestre à Magdebourg (1834-1836) , Richard Wagner y épouse une jeune cantatrice, Minna Planer (1809-1866) , avec laquelle il partage ses rêves de célébrité mais aussi ses difficultés financières, dues à l'échec de son 2e opéra, « la Défense d'aimer » (1836, d'après « Mesure pour mesure » de Shakespeare) . Le couple déménage pour Königsberg (1836) , puis pour Riga (1836-1839) , avant d'échouer à Paris, où est terminé « Rienzi » (1840) et composé « le Vaisseau fantôme » (1841) .

En 1842, Wagner rentre à Dresde, où l'on monte « Rienzi » . Le succès qu'il obtient lui permet d'occuper le poste de Maître de chapelle de la Cour royale de Saxe (1843) . Mais l'accueil mitigé fait au « Vaisseau fantôme » (1843) et l'insuccès de « Tannhäuser » (1845) , nullement compensés par l'enthousiasme qu'il soulève en dirigeant l'exécution des Symphonies de Beethoven, le plongent dans la frustration.

C'est alors que Wagner affiche ses sympathies pour les révolutionnaires qui provoquent le soulèvement de Dresde en 1849. Contraint de fuir la répression, il trouve refuge en Suisse grâce à l'amitié indéfectible de Franz Liszt. C'est ce dernier également qui dirigera, à Weimar, la création de « Lohengrin » (1850) .

Établi à Zürich, Wagner se consacre à la fois à des essais théoriques (dont « l'Art et la Révolution » , 1849 ; « l'Œuvre d'art de l'avenir » , id. ; « Opéra et drame » , 1851) et à la mise au point du projet qui donnera naissance à la Tétralogie (« Der Ring des Nibelungen » - l'Anneau du Nibelung) ; il passe l'année 1852 à en écrire les poèmes. Il entreprend mais interrompt la partition musicale de l'œuvre pour s'occuper de « Tristan und Isolde » (achevé en 1859) , transposition de la passion nouvelle que lui inspire Mathilde Wesendonck (1828-1902) , poétesse et épouse du riche industriel qui est aussi son mécène.

En lisant Schopenhauer, Wagner a trouvé à sa propre pensée des racines et des prolongements qu'il ne soupçonnait pas. Il envisage désormais la possibilité de bâtir un système. C'est à Paris qu'il revient, en 1859, pour tenter d'imposer son œuvre. Il réussit à faire jouer « Tannhäuser » à l'Opéra, en mars 1861, mais les représentations, trop houleuses, sont arrêtées au bout de 3 jours. Ulcéré par la cabale du Paris de Napoléon III, et criblé de dettes, Wagner parcourt l'Europe et va jusqu'en Russie, multipliant les concerts pour faire connaître son répertoire, qui s'est enrichi des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » (1861) . Il se trouve à Stuttgart le 3 mai 1864, lorsqu'un envoyé du jeune roi Louis II de Bavière (monté sur le trône le 10 mars) l'invite à Munich pour y être comblé de faveurs.

À peine installé, Wagner fait venir Cosima (1837-1930) , l'épouse du chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow (1830-1894) qui est la fille de Liszt, dont il s'est épris. De leur liaison naît une fille prénommée Isolde (1865-1919) . Tandis que « Tristan und Isolde » triomphe sur scène (1865) , la Cour de Bavière se déchaîne contre le compositeur, qu'elle rend responsable des égarements du roi. Reprenant le chemin de l'exil en Suisse, Wagner s'établit à Tribschen, près de Lucerne. Veuf depuis 1866, il y est rejoint par Cosima, qui demande le divorce afin de se remarier avec lui (1870) , après lui avoir donné 2 autres enfants, Eva (1867-1942) et Siegfried (1869-1930) . Pièce orchestrale, « l'Idylle de Siegfried » (1870) portera témoignage de leur félicité.

Entre-temps sont créés à Munich « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » (1868) , puis, sur ordre du roi mais contre la volonté de l'auteur, « l'Or du Rhin » (1869) et « la Walkyrie » (1870) .

En 1871, Wagner choisit la petite ville de Bayreuth pour faire construire le théâtre dont il rêve et fonder un Festival. Il pose la Ire pierre du « Festspielhaus » (Théâtre du Festival) le 22 mai 1872, jour de son 59e anniversaire, et l'inaugure le 13 août 1876 en présence de l'Empereur Guillaume Ier, mais non de Louis II de Bavière, qui n'a assisté qu'aux répétitions de la Tétralogie. Il y crée en 1876 le cycle complet de la Tétralogie (achevé depuis 1874) , puis en 1882 « Parsifal » .

Dans ce théâtre, la scène a été conçue pour être l'endroit magique où se produirait l'alchimie de tous les arts (poésie, musique, théâtre, danse) , ainsi que des décors, costumes et jeux de lumières. Le spectacle doit éveiller des énergies psychiques qui sommeillent en chacun et susciter la communication effective de tous. Tel est l'idéal de l' « œuvre d'art totale » à laquelle Wagner aspire dans ses écrits théoriques.

Homme usé, Wagner meurt lors d'un séjour à Venise. Ramenées à Bayreuth, ses cendres reposent dans le jardin de sa villa (Wahnfried, « Paix des illusions ») , où celles de Cosima seront aussi déposées en 1930.

Obsédé toute sa vie par la fondation d'une école, Wagner s'élève au-dessus des conventions qui faisaient de l'opéra un simple divertissement. Il considère le théâtre lyrique comme le lieu d'une initiation sacrée, et la tragédie, comme un « jeu scénique solennel » par lequel l'artiste s'érige en guide spirituel de son peuple. C'est ce rôle qu'il s'attribue en composant des drames musicaux où le texte devient musique, la musique action et l'action théâtre. C'est pourquoi il est, de tous les auteurs d'Opéras, le 1er qui écrive lui-même ses livrets, et le 1er qui caractérise ses personnages par l'emploi de certaines sonorités verbales.

Wagner fait de l'harmonie l'élément central autour duquel se construit le drame, et du leitmotiv (« motif conducteur ») , le thème qui en épouse les fluctuations, variant en fonction de son évolution. À l'orchestre, où les cuivres sont renforcés, il donne une ampleur sans précédent : pour la Tétralogie, 134 instruments, qui, dans la fosse de Bayreuth, sont superposés et non juxtaposés. Son influence s'étendra de Anton Bruckner et Gustav Mahler à Claude Debussy et Arnold Schœnberg.

Retrait du monument dédié à Felix Mendelssohn

Après sa mort, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy fut l'objet de la propagande anti-juive. Cela commença avec « Das Judentum in der Musik » , un pamphlet de Richard Wagner qui avait pourtant été fortement influencé par les compositions de Mendelssohn. L'ouvrage parut sous un pseudonyme, en 1850, 3 ans après la mort de Mendelssohn mais, en 1869, parut une édition augmentée sous le vrai nom de l'auteur. À la date de la 2e publication, Wagner était déjà un compositeur influent si bien que son point de vue contribua à faire mépriser l'œuvre de Mendelssohn dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle.

En 1933, après la prise du pouvoir par le régime nazi, Josef Goebbels interdit (en sa qualité de président de la « Chambre de la culture du " Reich " ») les représentations des œuvres de Mendelssohn. Il y en eut néanmoins quelques-unes, par exemple, « le Songe d'une nuit d'été » dirigé par Wilhelm Furtwängler, en février 1934 (à l'occasion du 125e anniversaire de Mendelssohn) . Des compositeurs allemands, parmi lesquels on compte les compositeurs Richard Strauß et Carl Orff, furent invités à écrire des alternatives musicales à la musique de Mendelssohn pour « le Songe d'une nuit d'été » .

Mendelssohn was the much-loved music-director in Düsseldorf from 1833 to 1835, his 1st paid position. He launched his tenure there, and also the revival of the music of Händel, with a performance of the Oratorio « Israel in Egypt » .

(Händel had been almost entirely forgotten in Germany at the time, except by scholars.)

Mendelssohn left Düsseldorf when he took-over the music directorship of Leipzig - a post he held until his early death in 1847, at age 38. Leipzig's musical culture was so completely transformed by Mendelssohn that the city still bears his imprint, even after all of these years and in spite of Nazi efforts to efface his memory. It was largely due to Mendelssohn that the works of his then-forgotten Leipzig predecessor, Johann Sebastian Bach, were revived and his remaining manuscripts preserved.

Criticism of Mendelssohn for his very ability (which could be characterized negatively as facility) was taken to further lengths by Richard Wagner. Mendelssohn's success, his popularity and his Jewish origins irked Wagner sufficiently to damn Mendelssohn with faint praise, 3 years after his death, in an anti-Jewish pamphlet, « Das Judentum in der Musik » :

« Mendelssohn has shown us that a Jew may have the amplest store of specific talents, may own the finest and most varied culture, the highest and tenderest sense of honour - yet, without all these pre-eminences helping him, were it but one single time, to call forth in us that deep, that heart-searching effect which we await from art. The washiness and the whimsicality of our present musical style has been pushed to its utmost pitch by Mendelssohn's endeavour to speak-out a vague, an almost nugatory Content as interestingly and spiritedly as possible. »

This was the start of a movement to downgrade Mendelssohn's status as a composer which lasted almost a Century, the echoes of which still survive today in critiques of Mendelssohn's supposed mediocrity.

The philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche expressed consistent admiration for Mendelssohn's music, in contrast to his general scorn for « Teutonic » Romanticism :

At any rate, the whole music of Romanticism (e.g. , Schumann and Wagner) was 2nd rate music from the very start, and real musicians took little notice of it. Things were different with Felix Mendelssohn, that halcyon Master who, thanks to his easier, purer, happier soul, was quickly honoured and just as quickly forgotten, as a lovely incident in German music.

Some readers, however, have interpreted Nietzsche's characterization of Mendelssohn as a « lovely incident » as condescending.

In the 20th Century, the Nazi regime and its « Reichsmusikkammer » cited Mendelssohn's Jewish origin in banning performance and publication of his works, even asking Nazi-approved composers to re-write incidental music for « A Midsummer Night's Dream » . Carl Orff obliged. Under the Nazis, « Mendelssohn was presented as a dangerous “ accident ” of music history, who played a decisive role in rendering German music in the 19th Century “ degenerate ” . » revived until 1963.

The German Mendelssohn Scholarship for students at the Leipzig Conservatory was discontinued in 1934 - and not

...

Mendelssohn Bartholdy wurde nach seinem Tod Objekt antijüdischer Propaganda. Den Beginn machte Richard Wagner, der von den Kompositionen Mendelssohns stark beeinflusst wurde, mit seinem Pamphlet Das Judentum in der Musik, das 1850, drei Jahre nach dem Tode Mendelssohn Bartholdys, unter einem Pseudonym und dann erweitert 1869 unter seinem Namen erschien. Wagner war zum Zeitpunkt der zweiten Veröffentlichung bereits ein einflussreicher Komponist, und er « schädigte Mendelssohns Ruf nachhaltig » : Seine Auffassung trug zur Geringachtung des Werkes von Mendelssohn Bartholdy in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts bei.

1933, nach der Machtübernahme des NS-Regimes, verbot Josef Gœbbels (in seiner Eigenschaft als Präsident der « Reichskulturkammer ») Aufführungen der Werke Mendelssohn Bartholdys. Gleichwohl gab es einige Aufführungen zum Beispiel des Sommernachtstraums ; so führte zum Beispiel Wilhelm Furtwängler im Februar 1934 anlässlich Mendelssohns 125. Geburtstag den Sommernachtstraum auf.

Deutsche Komponisten, darunter so berühmte wie Carl Orff, wurden aufgefordert, musikalische Alternativen zu Mendelssohn Bartholdys Musik zu Ein Sommernachtstraum zu schreiben. Büsten und Gedenktafeln von Mendelssohn Bartholdy wurden entfernt (zum Beispiel im November 1936 das Mendelssohn-Denkmal vor dem Leipziger Gewandhaus - wogegen Furtwängler öffentlich protestierte) . Der Oberbürgermeister Carl Gærdeler trat wegen der Entfernung des Mendelssohn-Denkmal in seiner Abwesenheit von seinem Amt zurück und wurde in Folge eine der zentralen Figuren des deutschen Widerstands.

1936 : Les Nazis interdisent l'exécution des œuvres de Felix Mendelssohn qu'ils qualifient de « grave accident dans l'histoire de la musique » . Même sa célèbre « Marche Nuptiale » , utilisée jusqu'alors par des milliers de couples allemands à l'église, est dorénavant bannie. Bustes et plaques commémoratives du compositeur sont aussi retirés. Sa tombe située au cimetière berlinois de la Trinité est cependant épargnée.

Mendelssohn, Wagner and the Nazis come together in an amusing story from the roof-top of the Prague concert-hall. The German high-command had ordered that a statue of Mendelssohn be removed. The SS officer in charge, one Julius Schlesinger, didn't know which of the many statues Mendelssohn's was. After unsuccessfully seeking advice from Doctor Rabinovich, a learned Jew, Schlesinger resorted to selecting the statue with the biggest nose ! Surely, he thought, this must be the one. Just as the statue started to topple-over, he realized to his horror that instead of Mendelssohn, his team had unwittingly selected the musical hero of the Nazis ! It was none other than the statue of Richard Wagner !

8 octobre 1936 : (Leipzig) Local Nazi newspapers joined in demanding removal of the Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue from the Municipal Hall. It was suggested the statue of the famous composer be presented to the Jewish Culture League of Leipzig.

For the excited report about the possibility of receiving the Mendelssohn statue, see the article « Um ein Mendelssohn-Bartholdy-Denkmal », « Jüdische Rundschau », 7 October 1936.

The name on the statue is the full name by which Mendelssohn was baptised. It ends with his mother's surname « Bartholdy ». This surname had been adopted by his mother's Jewish family, from a property they owned, in an effort to break away from their Jewish roots.

Then, in 1847, at the age of just 38, in his adopted home city of Leipzig, Felix Mendelssohn died. Some years later, in 1892, a large bronze statue of the composer was erected in the city. But this is not it. The story of Mendelssohn's statue reveals some of the absurdities and complexities around Nazi policies on race, in the years just before those same policies led to the programmes of mass murder. Although Mendelssohn had been baptised into the Lutheran Church, and had lived as a practising Christian, he was born a Jew. Under Nazi policies, baptism could not change his race.

Ironically, for all the anti-Semitic persecution that Mendelssohn's music and his descendants had received, Mendelssohn had in his own lifetime made a clear statement about his conversion from Judaism to the Lutheran faith by championing the previously forgotten Christian music of Johann Sebastian Bach. He wrote :

« To think that a Jew should give back to the people the greatest Christian music in the world ! »

The Nazi Deputy Mayor, Hans Rudolf Haake, pressed Karl Gærdeler to remove the statue, especially so in the spring of 1936.

Gærdeler said no.

Juillet 1936 : After more pressure, Gærdeler agreed that moving the statue to another distinguished public location might be discussed, but he postponed the discussion to some undetermined time after the summer.

L'affrontement politique se poursuit entre l' « Oberbürgermeister » (maire) de Leipzig, le docteur Karl Gærdeler, et le « Gauleiter » (député-maire : le responsable administratif régional) , Hans Rudolf Haake, au sujet du sort à réserver à la statue du compositeur Felix Mendelssohn. Finalement, après d'intenses négociations, Gærdeler accepte le principe que la statue puisse quitter son emplacement original devant l'édifice de la salle de concert du « Gewandhaus » pour aller vers un site moins attrayant, soit le côté-est de l'édifice. Mais les discussions demeurent en suspens.

Automne 1936 : Le 1er magistrat doit s'absenter du 8 au 13 novembre pour un voyage d'affaires en Finlande, sur l'invitation de la Chambre de commerce allemande. Il participera, entre autres, à une importante conférence sur l'économie, les prix et la monnaie qui se tiendra à Helsinki, le 10 novembre.

Mais avant son départ, il rencontre Adolf Hitler et le ministre de la Propagande, Josef Gœbbels. Ces derniers lui promettent que rien n'arrivera à la statue durant son absence. Il était important pour le régime de donner une image de tolérance face au monde entier qui se déplacera dans le cadre des Jeux Olympiques de Berlin.

Gørdeler informe le député-maire Haake de cette rencontre, avant son départ.

Le gigantesque monument de bronze, une œuvre du sculpteur Clemens Buscher (1855-1916) réalisé d'après des esquisses de Werner Stein, fut inauguré le 26 mai 1892 devant le (second) « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig. Le compositeur avait été nommé directeur musical de cet Orchestre (le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester ») pendant plusieurs années.

Hans Rudolf Haake est le 1er « Gauleiter » national-socialiste de Westphalie. Il est également gouverneur de la province du Rhin ; un membre de la mouvance « völkisch » du « Landtag » .

8 novembre 1936 : Les Nazis ont vent que le chef anglais Thomas Beecham accompagné par une délégation de musiciens de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Londres (actuellement en tournée au pays) veulent déposer une gerbe au pied du monument de Mendelssohn (« compositeur au sang totalement juif ») , situé devant l'édifice du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig.

Nuit du 9 au 10 novembre 1936 : Sur ordre du député-maire national-socialiste Hans Haake (avec l'appui des conseillers municipaux, également des Nazis) , le monument dédié à Mendelssohn est retiré de son espace, en plein milieu de la nuit (pour ne pas attirer l'attention du public) .

Karl Gørdeler avait déjà osé défier le régime en permettant l'exécution de la musique chorale de Mendelssohn (geste toujours impunis en septembre 1936) ; en s'opposant au démantèlement de sa statue ; en plus de refuser de hisser le drapeau à croix gammée devant son Hôtel-de-ville.

La statue, de même que sa base, sont amenées à la hâte, dans un soubassement à proximité. Le bloc de granite sera réduit en mille morceaux alors que le métal, lui, sera recyclé.

De plus, il est décidé que la rue « Mendelssohn-Bartholdy-Straße » porterait dorénavant le nom du compositeur Anton Bruckner : « Anton-Bruckner-Straße » .

Le maire apprend la choquante nouvelle sur le chemin du retour, après avoir quitté Stockholm ; il accuse Hans Haake de trahison. Pour sa part, le chef d'orchestre Wilhelm Furtwängler protestera publiquement.

Gørdeler demande à Haake des explications.

Haake mentionne que l'histoire de la statue n'était « qu'anecdotique comparé au fond du problème » . Il déclare à ce sujet :

« La position du docteur Gørdeler face à la “ question juive ” s'est révélée particulièrement évidente à travers

l'histoire de la statue de Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. »

Et, de poursuivre le « Gauleiter » :

« Mendelssohn ne peut faire l'objet de promotion dans aucune ville musicale allemande. »

Gærdeler va tenir une séance du Conseil municipal pour examiner le projet de reconstruction sous l'angle juridique. Le trésorier de la ville, Kohler, propose plutôt de remplacer le monument par le portrait d'un autre grand compositeur allemand. Mis en échec, le maire menace de prendre sa retraite dès le 25 novembre (1936) . On le « force » alors à prendre congé. Le député-maire Hans Rudolf Haake prend sa place par intérim. Les élections municipales approchent à grand pas. Le 22 mars 1937, le maire « élu » de Leipzig demeure fermement sur ses positions. Puisqu'il était impossible pour Gærdeler de congédier Haake, il va remettre officiellement sa démission, le 31 mars 1937.

The removal of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue was the incident Gærdeler chose for his resignation, and the Nazi Deputy Mayor accepted it as a gesture on precisely this point.

Some dispute this and argue that Gærdeler had objected only to Haake's insubordination, and that Haake's accusations against Gærdeler were a cover for Haake's own disobedience. But Gærdeler's further actions, on behalf of the Jews, make that a highly-implausible explanation, and, contrary to the critics' intent, they conclusively prove his commitment to helping the Jews. In 1938, Gærdeler sought the aid of a foreign power for the purpose of saving the Jews from persecution and, thereby, committed treason (« Landesverrat ») under existing German statute law.

One of the Councillors, Otto Wolf, wrote on 7 December 1936 to Party authorities that Gærdeler had, in 1934, severely criticised Hitler's actions « in the Röhm affair » and said that the Courts of law should have been employed, and that it was impossible for him to wear the Party badge if he received one ; that Gærdeler had resisted every renaming of a street named after a Jew ; that Mrs Gærdeler had, herself, driven in the mayor's official automobile to Jewish stores to do her shopping ; that, in May 1936, faced with the « Führer » 's and the government's confidence in Gærdeler, the Council renewed Gærdeler's appointment as mayor but, since then, he had ever more displayed his economic pessimism, particularly in connection with the new 4 Year Plan ; and that we are scandalised now, in the matter of the Mendelssohn monument, that, we, the councillors asked Mayor Haake to remove it in Doctor Gærdeler's absence, that Doctor Gærdeler, a non-National-Socialist, now invokes discipline toward him from National-Socialists in a fundamentally National-Socialist matter, while he has not enough discipline to support the measures of the « Reich » government.

When the Party's regional leader (« Gauleiter ») Martin Mutschmann installed Gærdeler's successor, the Leipzig National-Socialist county leader (« Kreisleiter ») Walter Donicke, he said that Leipzig as a world-rank city had to have a National-Socialist mayor. Gærdeler wrote to Mutschmann from New York, on 23 November 1937, to explain the reasons for his resignation, listing 1st the removal of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue and the refusal of the Saxon Ministry of the Interior to take the action against Haake that Gærdeler had to demand to preserve his authority. In consequence, Gærdeler concluded, he was forced to resign his office. He had not the power to simply have the statue brought back, and so, he had lost both, a point of principle and his authority. The issue of his authority forced him to resign, although, of course, it was not the primary cause of the conflict. When Haake proposed that the City Council approve Gærdeler's request to be relieved of his office with pension, not one of the 30 Councillors who were present rose to say a word of thanks, or in Gærdeler's defence. After his resignation as mayor of Leipzig, in the autumn of 1936, effective in April 1937, Gærdeler worked in Berlin as a consultant and agent for the Robert Bosch Company of Stuttgart.

Plus Gærdeler, il écrivit de sa cellule de la prison de Plötzensee, à Berlin :

« À cette époque, j'avais refusé d'endosser la position culturelle de la ville. »

Karl Gærdeler avait été élu maire de Leipzig, en 1930. Il s'est publiquement opposé au ré-armement du pays, aux lois de Nuremberg et à l'antisémitisme des Nazis. Il devint un des personnages importants de la Résistance allemande. Il sera pendu, le 2 février 1945, après avoir subi son procès à Berlin devant le « Tribunal du peuple », accusé de complot contre le « Führer » .

Le « Tribunal du peuple »

Le « Volksgerichtshof » (Tribunal du peuple) était une Cour spéciale, plus précisément un tribunal politique visant la condamnation pour haute-trahison et atteinte à la sûreté de l'État contre le régime nazi ; il a été mis en place par Adolf Hitler après l'incendie du « Reichstag », en 1933.

Au 1er janvier 1943, le « Tribunal du peuple » comprenait 47 juges professionnels et 95 juges « bénévoles », dont 30 officiers, 4 officiers de police et 48 « SA », « SS », « NSKK » et chefs des « Jeunesses hitlériennes ». En 1944, le nombre des assesseurs était monté à 173 et le nombre de procureurs du « Reich » à 179. De 1934 à 1945, le tribunal prononça plus de 10,980 condamnations à une peine de prison et 5,179 condamnations à mort pour haute-trahison.

Le tribunal siégeait alors dans les locaux du « Neues Kammergericht » (nouvelle Cour d'appel), construit de 1909 à 1913, dans le quartier de Schöneberg, à Berlin. Après la guerre, celui-ci abrita le Conseil de contrôle allié et, plus particulièrement à partir du blocus de 1948, l'organisme chargé du contrôle des couloirs aériens menant à Berlin. Depuis 1990, le Neues Kammergericht a repris sa destination initiale, puisqu'il accueille désormais la Cour constitutionnelle de Berlin.

The « People's Court » (« Volksgerichtshof ») was a « Sondergericht », a special court, established in 1934 by German Chancellor Adolf Hitler, who had been dissatisfied with the outcome of the « Reichstag » fire Trial (all but one of the accused were acquitted). The « People's Court » was set-up outside the operations of the constitutional frame of law. The court had jurisdiction over a rather broad array of « political offenses », which included crimes like black marketeering, work slow-downs, defeatism and treason against the 3rd « Reich ». These crimes were viewed by the court as « Wehrkraftzersetzung » (disintegration of defensive capability) and were, accordingly, punished severely. The death penalty was meted-out in numerous cases in this court.

The Court handed down an enormous number of death sentences under Judge-President Roland Freisler, including those that followed the 20th « July Plot » to kill Hitler. Many of those found guilty by the Court died in the Plötzensee prison. The proceedings of the court were often even less than show trials in that some cases, such as that of Sophie Scholl and her brother Hans Scholl and fellow « White Rose » activists concluded in less than an hour, without evidence being presented or arguments made by either side. The president of the court often acted as prosecutor, denouncing defendants, then pronouncing his verdict and sentence without objection from defense counsel, who usually remained silent throughout. Unsurprisingly, it did not follow the laws and procedures of regular German trials, being easily characterized as a « kangaroo court » . It almost always sided with the prosecution, to the point that being hauled before it was tantamount to a death sentence.

With almost no exceptions, cases in the People's Court had pre-determined guilty verdicts. There was no presumption of innocence nor could the defendants adequately represent themselves or consult an attorney. A proceeding at the « People's Court » would follow an initial indictment in which a State or city prosecutor would forward the names of the accused to the « Volksgerichtshof » for charges of a political nature. Defendants were hardly ever allowed to speak to their attorneys beforehand and, when they did, the defense lawyer would usually simply answer questions about how the trial would proceed and refrain from any legal advice. In at least one documented case (the trial of the « White Rose » conspirators) , the defense lawyer assigned to Sophie Scholl chastised her the day before the trial, stating that she would pay for her crimes.

The « People's Court » proceedings began when the accused were led to a prisoner's dock under armed police escort. The presiding judge would read the charges and then call the accused forward for « examination » . Although the court had a prosecutor, it was usually the judge who asked the questions. Defendants were often berated during the examination and never allowed to respond with any sort of lengthy reply. After a barrage of insults and condemnation, the accused would be ordered back to the dock with the order « examination concluded » .

After examination, the defense attorney would be asked if they had any statements or questions. Defense lawyers were present simply as a formality and hardly any ever rose to speak. The judge would then ask the defendants for a statement during which time more insults and berating comments would be shouted at the accused. The verdict, always « guilty » , would then be announced and the sentence handed down at the same time. In all, an appearance before the « People's Court » could take as little as 15 minutes.

The best-known trials in the « People's Court » began on 7 August 1944, in the aftermath of the 20th « July Plot » that year. The 1st 8 men accused were Erwin von Witzleben, Erich Hoepner, Paul von Hase, Peter Yorck von Wartenburg, Helmuth Stieff, Robert Bernardis, Friedrich Klausning, and Albrecht von Hagen. The trials were held in the imposing Great Hall of the Berlin Chamber Court, on « Elßholzstraße » , which was bedecked with swastikas for the occasion and there were around 300 spectators including Ernst Kaltenbrunner and selected civil servants, Party functionaries, military officers and journalists. A film camera ran behind the red-robed Roland Freisler so that Hitler could view the proceedings, and to provide footage for newsreels and a documentary entitled « Traitors before the People's Court » . The last documentary of « Die Deutsche Wochenschau » , it was not shown at the time.

The accused were forced to wear shabby clothes, denied neck ties and belts or suspenders for their pants, and were marched into the court-room hand-cuffed to policemen. The proceedings began with Freisler announcing he would rule on « the most horrific charges ever brought in the history of the German people » . Freisler was an admirer of Andrey Vyshinsky, the chief prosecutor of the Soviet purge trials, and copied Vyshinsky's practice of heaping loud and violent abuse on defendants.

The 62 year old Field Marshal von Witzleben was the 1st to stand before Freisler and he was immediately bawled at for giving a brief Nazi salute. He faced further humiliating insults while holding onto his trouser waist-band. Next, former Colonel-General Erich Hoepner, dressed in a cardigan, faced Freisler, who addressed him as « Schweinehund » . When he said that he was not a « Schweinehund » , Freisler asked him what zoological category he thought he fitted into.

The accused were unable to consult their lawyers, who were not seated near them. None of them were allowed to address the court at length, and Freisler interrupted any attempts to do so. However, Major General Helmuth Stieff attempted to raise the issue of his motives before being shouted down, and Witzleben managed to call-out :

« You can hand us over to the hangman. In 3 months, the enraged and tormented people will drag you alive through the muck of the streets. »

All were condemned to death by hanging, and the sentences were carried-out shortly afterwards, in Plötzensee prison. His prediction proved slightly incorrect, as Freisler died in a bombing raid, in February 1945, approximately half a year later.

Another trial of plotters was held on 10 August. On that occasion the accused were Erich Fellgiebel, Alfred Kranzfelder, Fritz-Dietlof von der Schulenburg, Georg Hansen and Berthold Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg.

On 15 August, Wolf-Heinrich Graf von Helldorf, Egbert Hayessen, Hans Bernd von Haeften, and Adam von Trott zu Solz were condemned to death by Freisler.

On 21 August, the accused were Fritz Thiele, Friedrich Gustav Jaeger and Ulrich Wilhelm Graf Schwerin von Schwanefeld who was able to mention the « many murders committed at home and abroad » , as a motivation for his actions.

On 30 August, Colonel-General Carl-Heinrich von Stülpnagel, who had blinded himself in a suicide attempt, was led into the court and condemned to death along with Cæsar von Hofacker, Hans Otfried von Linstow, and Eberhard Finckh.

Notable people sentenced to death by the « Volksgerichtshof » :

1942 : Helmuth Hübener - At the age of 17, he was the youngest opponent of the 3rd « Reich » executed as a result of a trial by the « Volksgerichtshof » .

1942 : Maria Restituta Kafka - A Catholic nun and surgical nurse who was found guilty of distributing regime-critical pamphlets.

1943 : Otto and Elise Hampel - The couple carried-out civil disobedience in Berlin, were caught, tried, sentenced to death by Freisler, and executed. Their story formed the basis for the 1947 Hans Fallada novel, « Every Man Dies Alone » .

1943 : Members of the « White Rose » Resistance movement - Sophie Scholl, Hans Scholl, Alex Schmorell, Willi Graf, Christoph Probst, and Kurt Huber.

1943 : Julius Fučík - A Czechoslovakian journalist, Communist Party of Czechoslovakia leader, and a leader in the forefront of the anti-Nazi Resistance. On 25 August 1943, in Berlin, he was accused of high-treason in connection with his political activities. He was found guilty and beheaded 2 weeks later, on 8 September 1943.

1943 : Karlrobert Kreiten - A German pianist. Nazi Ellen Ott-Monecke notified the « Gestapo » of Kreiten's negative remarks about Adolf Hitler and the War effort. Kreiten was indicted at the « Volksgerichtshof » , with Freisler presiding, and condemned to death. Friends and family frantically tried to save his life to no avail. The family was never notified officially about the judgment. They only accidentally learned that Kreiten had been executed with 185 other inmates in Plötzensee Prison.

1943 : Max Sievers - A Communist and former chairman of the German Freethinkers League. He fled to Belgium after the Nazis came to power, but they caught-up with him after invading that country. He was convicted of « conspiracy to commit high-treason along with favouring the enemy » , sentenced to death, and beheaded by guillotine, on 17 February 1944.

1944 : Max Josef Metzger - A German Catholic priest. Metzger was the founder, in 1938, of the « Una Sancta Brotherhood » , an ecumenical movement for bringing Catholics and Protestants to unity. During the trial, Freisler said that people like Metzger (meaning clergy) should be « eradicated » .

1944 : Erwin von Witzleben - A German Field-Marshal (« Generalfeldmarschall ») . Witzleben was a German Army (« Wehrmacht ») conspirator in the 20 July Bomb Plot to kill Hitler. Witzleben, who would have been Commander-in-Chief of the « Wehrmacht » in the planned post- « coup » government, arrived at Army Headquarters (OKH-HQ) in Berlin, on 20 July, to assume command of the « coup » forces. He was arrested the next day and tried by the « People's Court » , on 8 August. Witzleben was sentenced to death and hanged, the same day, in Plötzensee Prison.

1944 : Otto Kiep - Chief of the « Reich » Press Office (« Reichspresseamts ») , which became involved in the Resistance.

1944 : Elisabeth von Thadden, as well as other members of anti-Nazi « Solf Circle » .

1944 : Johannes Popitz - Prussian finance minister and a member of the German Resistance against Nazi Germany.

1945 : Helmuth James Graf von Moltke - German jurist, a member of the opposition against Adolf Hitler in Nazi Germany, and a founding member of the « Kreisau Circle » dissident group.

1945 : Klaus Bonhoeffer and Rüdiger Schleicher - German Resistance fighters.

1945 : Erwin Planck - Politician, businessman, Resistance fighter and son of physicist Max Planck. Planck was an alleged conspirator in the 20th « July Plot » .

1945 : Artur Nebe - An SS-General (« Gruppenführer ») . Nebe was a conspirator in the 20 July Bomb Plot to kill Hitler. He was the head of the « Kriminalpolizei » (or « Kripo ») , and the commander of « Einsatzgruppe B » . Nebe oversaw massacres on the Russian Front and at other locations, as he was commanded to do by his superiors in the SS. After the failure to assassinate Hitler, Nebe hid on an island in the Wannsee until he was betrayed by one of his mistresses. On 21 March 1945, Nebe was hanged, allegedly with piano wire (Hitler wanted members of the plot « hanged like cattle ») , at Plötzensee Prison.

Judge-Presidents of the « People's Court » :

Fritz Rehn (13 July - 18 September 1934) .

Otto Georg Thierack (1936 - August 1942) .

Roland Freisler (20 August 1942 - 3 February 1945) .

Harry Haffner (12 March - 24 April 1945) .

L'opération nocturne de démantèlement de la statue de Mendelssohn illustre bien la haine vouée au compositeur juif par les autorités nazies. En s'en prenant à l'une des figures emblématiques du Romantisme allemand, 2 ans presque jour pour jour avant les pogroms de la « Nuit de Cristal » , le pouvoir veut alors faire passer un double message : d'une part, la poursuite de la politique de mise-au-pas et de purification de la vie musicale allemande entreprise dès la prise de pouvoir ; d'autre part, l'annonce que cette politique n'épargnera aucun des compositeurs juifs, fussent-ils de confession protestante, et aussi assimilés à la tradition musicale allemande que Mendelssohn.

On 26 May 1892, 24 years after the Committee in charge of the monument in honour of the composer Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy had been founded and 45 years after his early death, the monument could be inaugurated. The bronze monument was situated on the east-side of the old « Gewandhaus » music hall, in Leipzig, and had been created after drafts by Werner Stein.

At the end of the 19th Century, the skillful monument was living proof of a high historico-cultural value and an appreciation of the musical genius of Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and of his merits to the world of music.

During the Nazi period, the Mendelssohn monument was torn down on 9 November 1936, as Mendelssohn was considered a Jew and, therefore (according to Mayor Hans Rudolf Haake) , a National-Socialist, could « not be displayed as an exponent for a German city of music » . It is not known what happened to the monument.

...

It was the dead of night. A large marble statue of the Jewish composer Felix Mendelssohn was quietly dismantled to avoid attention. It was hurriedly moved into a nearby cellar and completely smashed to pieces !

Who was responsible for such an act ? And why such extreme hatred ?

It all started just 3 years after Mendelssohn's death. In 1850, an article entitled « Judaism in Music » appeared in a music paper. The author's identity was concealed but he later re-published his article, in 1869, this time boldly revealing his identity. It was Richard Wagner ! In the article, Wagner fiercely attacked Mendelssohn's music and the music of other Jewish German composers whom he had previously praised :

« The life and works of Mendelssohn clearly demonstrates that no Jew, however gifted and cultural and honourable, was capable of creating art that moved the heart and soul. »

In 1881, Wagner truly revealed the extent of his anti-Semitic feelings in article in the « Bayreuther Blätter » entitled : « Know Thyself ! » . In it he praises the massacres of Jews in Russia as « an example worthy of imitation » . He concludes with these impassioned words about the Jews :

« Drive them out, German people - but not like the Egyptians, those Hamitic fools, who even gave them golden vessels for the journey. For they must go away empty-handed. Whither I know not, but I wish them all the same fate. May they find no shelter, no homeland ; unhappier than Cain, may they seek and not find ; may they descend into the Red Sea, but may they never, never emerge from it. German people, know thyself ! »

Why did Wagner, himself rumored to have been of Jewish extract, launch such a tirade of abuse on his fellow German ? After his death, Mendelssohn was viewed as the most important figure in German musical culture. His music was extremely popular across Europe. He raised the profile of the conductor to an art-form in his lifetime and he also considered a most accomplished pianist. For Wagner, a composer trying to forge his own musical career, Mendelssohn was a hard act to follow. Instead of relying completely on his own music to do all the « talking » , Wagner couldn't resist the urge to publicly slander Mendelssohn and his musical legacy. Sadly, many listened.

50 years later, Adolf Hitler a keen admirer of Wagner and his music, frequently used his music during Nazi rallies to whip-up the emotions of his audience to court his anti-Semitic policies. The policy of « Gleichschaltung » (Coordination) required music to satisfy the National-Socialist's model for a new German culture. There was no toleration of any Jewish art, music, film or architecture. Even jazz music was banned because it was considered « degenerate » because of its association with Black Americans. In 1936, the Nazis banned Mendelssohn's music calling it a « dangerous accident of music history » . Even his famous « Wedding » March which had been used by thousands of German couples to accompany them down the aisle was outlawed.

Returning to the opening story, 45 years after Mendelssohn's death, a statue in Leipzig was established in 1892, in front of the « Gewandhaus » , home of the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » that he had directed for many years. The monument paid tribute to Mendelssohn's contribution to German musical culture.

In 2003, the then mayor of Leipzig, Wolfgang Tiefensee, and the honorary conductor of the « Gewandhaus Orchester » , Professor Kurt Masur, agreed to rebuild the Mendelssohn monument. With the help of a generous donation by Doctor Wolfgang Jentzsch, the reconstruction of the monument started.

The reconstructed Mendelssohn monument is located in the heart of the city, on « Dittrichring » , just across from Saint-Thomas Church. The Monument was inaugurated on 18 October 2008.

On a plinth which is 4 metre high and made of granite, there is a bronze statue of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, about 3 metre of height. On the steps of the monument sits the muse of music, with 2 cherubs making music and singing on each side. On the plinth, you can read the inscription « Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy » , on the front, and « Edles nur künde die Sprache der Töne » (May the language of music only tell of noble things) , on the back. On the sides, 2 medallions symbolise church music and secular music.

Conductor Kurt Masur worked tirelessly to rehabilitate Mendelssohn to his rightful place of honour in Leipzig, and also to replace Leipzig's bronze and stone monument.

On 27 September 2008, the city of Leipzig replaced the bronze statue of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy that the Nazis tore down on 9 November 1936 and later used for scrap metal. The recreated statue is installed, at the entrance to the garden courtyard, on the left of the Opera House. The re-installation ceremony, on 18 October 2008, was celebrated with speeches and an all-Mendelssohn concert, including his « Lord, Hear My Prayer » for soprano, chorus and orchestra, as well as his Violin Concerto and « Italian » Symphony No. 4.

In 2009, a stamp was issued in Germany to celebrate the 200th anniversary of Mendelssohn's birth. Despite extreme persecution, his legacy has enjoyed a renaissance and his wonderful gift of melody is being enjoyed by a new generation of music-lovers.

10 novembre 1936 : Sir Thomas Beecham, the famous English conductor is touring Germany with the London Philharmonic Orchestra. On morning, he plans to lay a wreath at the base of the Mendelssohn memorial with a delegation of musicians. Arrived at the location, expecting to see the statue, they are surprised by its absence - it seems it has vanished into thin air ! They search around a bit but to no avail.

14 novembre 1936 : The destruction of the Mendelssohn memorial statue, in Leipzig, is reported by the « Morning Post » . Wiener Library Archives, Leo Baeck Institute, New York. See also : Larry Todd. « Mendelssohn : A Life in Music » , xx-xxi.

Hiver 1936-1937 : Loyal Mendelssohn supporters managed to smuggle hundreds of his documents including music scores, letters and drawings out of the Prussian State Library in Berlin, to Poland. When the Nazis invaded Poland, they hurriedly moved his materials out of the country and they became scattered across the world. About 270 of these scores remain unpublished and, subsequently, unheard by the public to this day ! Thanks to the efforts of the Mendelssohn project, established in 1996, large numbers of these documents have been traced and brought back together again.

Karl Gærdeler

Karl Gørdeler, ancien maire de Leipzig, sera la figure principale de l'opposition au Nazisme dans les années 1940-1941, alors que les officiers ont l'attention détournée par les succès militaires.

Son groupe comptait :

Le diplomate Ulrich von Hassell.

Le ministre des Finances de Prusse, Johannes Popitz.

Le chef du « Cercle de Kreisau » , Helmuth James Graf von Moltke.

Gørdeler était également en contact avec le « SPD » clandestin de Julius Leber avec les oppositions catholiques et protestantes.

La Ligue d'urgence des pasteurs (« Pfarrernotbund ») du pasteur Martin Niemöller, créée en 1933, est l'organisation de résistance protestante la plus importante. Localement, il s'agira de « conseils de frères » (« Bruderräte ») , rassemblées en un Conseil de frères du « Reich » (« Reichsbruderrat ») , qui s'unit aux synodes libres.

Lors du 2e synode libre national (1934) , les opposants créent une Église confessante (« Bekennende Kirche ») . Ses personnalités sont Friedrich Weißler (juriste, mort déporté en 1937) , le pasteur Paul Schneider (mort déporté en 1939) . Theophil Wurm (évêque du Wurtemberg) prend la succession de Niemöller, à la tête de l'Église confessante. Il entre en contact avec Friedrich Bonhoeffer, avec le groupe de Karl Gørdeler et avec le « Cercle de Kreisau » .

Avec la remontée du risque de guerre mi-1939, Oster, toujours en contact avec Halder, Witzleben (qui n'est plus à Berlin, ce qui complique les choses) , Gørdeler, tente de relancer le projet de « Putsch » . Mais il apparaît que les officiers sont beaucoup moins prêts à suivre. En particulier, les officiers prussiens sont séduits par le projet d'Hitler de reprendre Dantzig et la Haute-Silésie à la Pologne.

Le « Cercle de Kreisau » est l'un des mouvements de la résistance allemande les plus connus. Il n'était pas composé que de membres conservateurs, mais ses membres venaient essentiellement de cette mouvance (officiers et hauts-fonctionnaires de l'aristocratie) . De 1938 à l'attentat du 20 juillet 1944, il comptait 20 membres actifs et environ 20 sympathisants. Le domaine de Kreisau (en Silésie) , appartenant à la famille von Moltke, a abrité, de 1940 à 1943, des rencontres de fonctionnaires et d'officiers, d'ecclésiastiques catholiques et protestants, d'hommes politiques conservateurs mais aussi Sociaux-Démocrates. Leurs réflexions devaient préparer une Allemagne post-nazie, démocratique, humaniste, sociale et européenne. Le Cercle a été créé par un avocat, le comte Helmuth James von Moltke. D'éducation partiellement britannique (par sa mère) , il aurait été surnommé le « Comte rouge » en raison de ses prises de position sociales découlant de l'éthique chrétienne. Von Moltke fut arrêté début 1944 par les Nazis et tué le 23 janvier 1945. En 1940, le « Cercle de Kreisau » est rejoint par le haut-fonctionnaire, le comte Peter Yorck von Wartenburg qui avait fondé un autre groupe de résistance en 1938. Arrêté le 21 juillet 1944, il fut exécuté le 8 août 1944. Le «

Cercle de Kreisau » était en liaison avec d'autres groupes de résistance, tels :

Le groupe de Franz Sperr, au sud de l'Allemagne (en contact avec de hauts-officiers) .

Un groupe de dirigeants travaillistes catholiques de Cologne.

Le « Cercle de Fribourg » .

Des communistes modérés non stalinien.

À partir de 1943, certains membres du « Cercle de Kreisau » décidèrent de passer à l'action contre le régime et prirent contact avec Ludwig Beck, Karl Friedrich Gerdeler, Ulrich von Hassel et Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg. La plupart des membres du « Cercle de Kreisau » furent inculpés de haute-trahison après le « Putsch » du 20 juillet 1944 et furent condamnés à mort.

Les principaux membres du « Cercle de Kreisau » sont :

Le comte Helmuth James von Moltke (avocat) .

Le comte Peter Yorck von Wartenburg (haut-fonctionnaire) .

Adam von Trott zu Solz (juriste ouvert sur l'international, fonctionnaire au ministère des Affaires étrangères) . Exécuté le 26 août 1944.

Hans-Bernd von Haefen (juriste, très haut-fonctionnaire au ministère des Affaires étrangères) . Exécuté le 15 août 1944.

Julius Leber (ancien député Social-Démocrate) . Exécuté le 5 janvier 1945.

Theodor Haubach (philosophe socialiste ?) . Exécuté le 23 janvier 1945.

Carlo Mierendorff (ancien député Social-Démocrate du SPD) . Mort en décembre 1943, lors d'un bombardement allié à Leipzig.

Adolf Reichwein (professeur d'histoire Social-Démocrate) . Exécuté le 20 octobre 1944.

Otto Heinrich von der Gablentz. Proche du socialisme religieux. En contact avec la résistance norvégienne. La « Gestapo » ignore sa participation au « Putsch » du 20 juillet 1944. Il a survécu à la guerre.

Carl Dietrich von Trotha (haut-fonctionnaire au ministère de l'Économie) . Il a échappé à la « Gestapo » et survécu au régime nazi.

Horst von Einsiedel (membre du SPD) . Destin terrible : s'il échappa à la « Gestapo » , il sera arrêté en 1945 par les Soviétiques et mourra en 1948 dans l'ex-camp de concentration nazi de Sachsenhausen, alors utilisé par les Soviétiques.

Theodor Steltzer (haut-fonctionnaire de la république de Weimar) . En 1940, ayant un haut-poste militaire dans la Norvège occupée, où entra en contact avec la résistance norvégienne. Il survécut à la guerre.

Harald Poelchau (aumônier de prison influencé par le socialisme religieux) . Il ne fut pas démasqué par la « Gestapo » après le 20 juillet 1944.

Hans Peters (professeur de droit et politique à Berlin) . Son appartenance au « Cercle de Kreisau » ne fut pas découverte par la « Gestapo » et il survécut.

Alfred Delp (jésuite, prêtre à Munich, fut rédacteur de la revue catholique « Stimmen der Zeit » jusqu'à son interdiction en 1941) . Arrêté en juillet 1944 et exécuté le 2 février 1945.

Lothar König (jésuite) . Après le 20 juillet 1944, se cacha dans la cave-à-charbon du Collège de jésuites Berchman jusqu'à la fin de la guerre.

Augustin Rösch (provincial des jésuites responsable du sud de l'Allemagne) . Arrêté par les Nazis le 11 janvier 1945, mais pas tué.

Paulus van Husen (juriste et important homme politique du Parti centriste en Silésie) . Arrêté en août 1944, mais libéré par les troupes soviétiques.

Hans Lukaschek (important politicien centriste de Silésie, était le membre le plus âgé du « Cercle de Kreisau ») . Arrêté le 20 juillet 1944, il est libéré peu avant la fin de la guerre.

Eugen Gerstenmaier (membre du bureau des relations ecclésiastiques internationales) . Arrêté par les Nazis en 1944 mais libéré par les troupes américaines.

Le comte Gottfried von Bismarck-Schönhausen, pourtant membre du Parti nazi au « Reichstag » et officier SS.

Dans sa biographie de Gørdeler, Gerhard Ritter établit une distinction entre ceux des Allemands qui travaillaient pour une défaite de l'Allemagne et ceux qui travaillaient à renverser le régime nazi, tout en restant loyaux envers l'Allemagne. Donc, pour Ritter, Gørdeler était un patriote tandis que ceux qui étaient impliqués dans l'Orchestre Rouge étaient des traîtres qui méritaient le peloton d'exécution. Les historiens ouest-allemands des années 1950 en vinrent à réduire la résistance aux seuls Nationaux-Conservateurs impliqués dans le complot contre Hitler du 20 juillet 1944. Il se produisit une héroïsation et une sacralisation de la résistance, et ceux qui en étaient furent crédités des plus hauts mobiles éthiques et moraux. Dans les années 1950, la résistance étaient décrite comme issue des classes moyennes et du Christianisme avec une insistance sur l'héroïsme des individus se rebellant seuls contre la tyrannie.

L'historien canadien Peter Hoffmann écrivit un essai en 2004, « la Résistance allemande et l'Holocauste » (The German Resistance and the Holocaust) . Il y soutenait que la majorité des conjurés du 20 juillet 1944 était surtout motivée par le rejet de l'Holocauste. En particulier, Peter Hoffmann utilisait les exemples de l'indignation de Claus von Stauffenberg devant le massacre des juifs russes, en 1942, du conseil donné par Karl Friedrich Gørdeler en 1938-1939 à son contact des services de renseignement britanniques, l'industriel A. P. Young, suggérant que le gouvernement britannique prenne une position dure contre la politique antisémite du gouvernement allemand.

L'historien israélien Danny Orbach, dans un livre paru en 2010, prit également la défense des résistants allemands, notant en particulier le fait que Gørdeler était particulièrement favorable au sionisme, l'importance du rejet de l'Holocauste dans la motivation de la résistance nationaliste-conservatrice et les nombreuses tentatives des résistants pour protéger des juifs persécutés. Dans un article récent, Orbach fit également état du fait que les accusations de Christof Dipper étaient basées sur une mauvaise interprétation, voire une distorsion des sources primaires, tout particulièrement les mémorandums de Gørdeler sur la question juive.

Karl Friedrich Gørdeler, the son of a Prussian district judge, was born on 31 July 1884 in Schneidemühl, in the Prussian Province of Posen (now, Piła, Wielkopolskie, in Poland) . He was a monarchist conservative German politician, executive, economist, civil servant, and opponent of the Nazi regime. Had the 20th « July Plot » of 1944 succeeded, Gørdeler would have served as the Chancellor of the new government. He was hang, on 2 February 1945, in Plötzensee Prison, Berlin.

After studying law, Gørdeler became a local civil servant. After World War I, he joined the conservative German National People's Party (DNVP) .

In 1930, Gørdeler became mayor of Leipzig. He also became price commissioner in the government of Heinrich Brüning and remained in office when Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933.

Gørdeler opposed the racial ideology of the National-Socialist. When DNVP began to cooperate with the NSDAP Party, in 1931, he left the Party. He was one of very few politicians in opposition to the ruling NSDAP after 1933. He resigned, in 1934.

Gørdeler publically opposed German re-armament and the Nuremberg Laws. As mayor of Leipzig, he refused to pull down the statue of the Jewish composer Felix Mendelssohn or to fly the Swastika flag over the city hall.

Gørdeler resigned as mayor of Leipzig, in 1937, and spent the next 2 years travelling around Europe as overseas representative of the Bosche company. In 1938, he met Winston Churchill and other important political figures, in Britain and France. Gørdeler provided information about Nazi Germany and encouraged governments not to make too many concessions to Hitler. He was appalled by the Munich Agreement which he saw as « out-and-out capitulation » and claimed that it would lead to a War in Europe.

During the Second World War, Gørdeler advocated a negotiated peace with the Allies. However, he was deeply disappointed when his political contacts in Britain told him that the War would only come to an end if Germany unconditionally surrendered.

By 1940, Gørdeler had become convinced that only the German armed forces could overthrow Hitler. He made contact with Ludwig Beck but they were unable to find enough senior military leaders to take part in a « coup » .

In 1944, Gørdeler became involved in the « July Plot » and he agreed to become Chancellor after Hitler's assassination. On 18th July, 1944, Gørdeler was warned that the « Gestapo » had discovered that he was involved in a conspiracy to kill Adolf Hitler. He went into hiding but was arrested the following month, on 12th August. Karl Gørdeler was interrogated and tortured for 5 months before being executed on 2nd February, 1945.

Karl Friedrich Gørdeler was born to a family of Prussian civil servants. His parents were supporters of the Free Conservative Party, and Gørdeler's father served in the Prussian « Landtag » as a member of that Party after 1899. Gørdeler's upbringing was described by his biographer and friend Gerhard Ritter as a part of a large, loving middle-class family that was cultured, devoutly Lutheran, nationalist, and conservative. As a young man, the deeply religious Gørdeler chose as his motto to live by, « omnia restaurare in Christo » (restoring everything in Christ) . Gørdeler studied economics and law at the University of Tübingen, between 1902 and 1905. Starting in 1911, Gørdeler worked as a civil servant for the municipal government of Solingen. That same year, Gørdeler married Anneliese Ulrich, by whom he had 5 children. Gørdeler was described as :

Gørdeler's own career had been both impressive and idiosyncratic. He came of conservative Prussian stock with a strong sense of duty and service to the State ; his father had been a district judge. His upbringing had been happy, but sternly intellectual and moral ; his legal training had pointed to a career in local administration and economics. He was a born organiser, an able, voluble speaker and writer, tough and highly-individual ; in politics, he became a Right-wing Liberal. Although, at heart a very humane man, Gørdeler's frigid, spartan belief in hard work and his austere, puritanical morality - he would not tolerate a divorced man or woman in his house-lacked warmth and comradeship. He was, in fact, an autocrat by nature and his commanding personality, combined with his utter belief in the rightness of his point of view, enabled him to persuade weak or uncertain men over-easily to accept his own particular point of view while he was with them.

During World War I, Gørdeler served as a junior officer on the Eastern Front, rising to the rank of Captain. From February 1918, Captain Gørdeler worked as part of the German military government in Minsk. After the end of War, in November 1918, Gørdeler served on the headquarters of the XVII Army Corps based in Danzig (now, Gdańsk, in Poland) . In June 1919, Gørdeler submitted a memorandum to his superior, General Otto von Below, calling for the destruction of Poland as the only way of preventing territorial losses on Germany's eastern borders. After his discharge from the German Army, Gørdeler joined the ultra-conservative German National People's Party (DNVP) . Like most of the political class of Germany, at that time, Gørdeler strongly rejected the Versailles Treaty, which stipulated that Germany cede territories to the restored Polish State. In 1919, before the exact boundaries of the Polish-German border were determined, he suggested restoring West Prussia to Germany. Despite his strongly held hostile feelings towards Poland, Gørdeler played a key role in breaking a strike by the Danzig dockers, who wished to shut-down the Polish economy by closing Poland's principal port during the Polish - Soviet War of 1920, on the grounds that however undesirable Poland was as a neighbour, Soviet Russia would be even worse.

In 1922, Gørdeler was elected as the mayor (« Bürgermeister ») of Königsberg (now, Kaliningrad, Russia) , in East Prussia, before being elected mayor of Leipzig on May 22, 1930. During the Weimar Republic, Gørdeler was widely considered to be a hard-working and outstanding municipal politician. On December 8, 1931, Chancellor Heinrich Brüning, a personal friend of Gørdeler, appointed him as « Reich » Price Commissioner, and entrusted him with the task of overseeing his deflationary policies. The sternness with which Gørdeler administered his task as Price Commissioner made him a well-known figure in Germany. Accepting the post of Price Commissioner forced Gørdeler to resign from the DNVP because Alfred Hugenberg was a committed foe of the Brüning government. In the early 1930's, Gørdeler was a leading advocate of the viewpoint that the Weimar Republic had failed as proven by the Great Depression, and what was needed was a Right-wing revolution to replace democracy.

After the downfall of the Brüning government, in 1932, Gørdeler was considered to be a potential Chancellor and was sounded-out by General Kurt von Schleicher, who ultimately chose Franz von Papen instead. Following the fall of his government, on May 30, 1932, Brüning himself recommended to President Paul von Hindenburg that Gørdeler succeed him. Hindenburg vetoed Gørdeler because of his former membership in the German National People's Party (DNVP) . Starting in 1928, under the leadership of Alfred Hugenberg, the DNVP had waged a vituperative campaign against Hindenburg, claiming that he was one of the « November Criminals » who were alleged to have « stabbed Germany in the back » , in 1918, which led Hindenburg to loathe and hate the DNVP. As a result, by 1932, no member of the DNVP or even a former member was acceptable to Hindenburg as Chancellor. The fall of Brüning led to Gørdeler resigning as Price Commissioner. Later, in 1932, Gørdeler was offered a position in Papen's cabinet, which he refused.

As late as 1935, Gørdeler considered Adolf Hitler an « enlightened dictator » , who, provided he received the proper advice, would be a force for good. Gørdeler was later to call the period in which he supported the Nazis the only chapter of his life that he found embarrassing. On 1 April 1933, the day of the national boycott declared against all Jewish businesses in the « Reich » , Gørdeler appeared in full uniform of the « Oberbürgermeister » of Leipzig to order the SA to cease and desist in their efforts to enforce the boycott, and ordered the Leipzig police to free several Jews taken hostage by the SA. Several times, he attempted to help Leipzig Jewish businessmen threatened with the « Aryanization » economic policies of the Nazi regime. A few days after the boycott, Gørdeler found himself as mayor of Leipzig enforcing the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, which unlike the Nuremberg Laws of 1935 did not give him cause for complaint.

As part of his efforts to influence the Nazi regime, Gørdeler had sent Hitler long memoranda containing his advice on economic policy and, in the 2nd half of 1935, wrote-up a new draft law on the powers and responsibilities of municipal governments. Despite his early sympathy for the regime and considerable pressure from the National-Socialists, Gørdeler always refused to join the NSDAP. By the mid-1930's, Gørdeler grew increasingly disillusioned with the Nazis as it became more and more apparent that Hitler had no interest in reading any of Gørdeler's memoranda, but instead was carrying-out economic and financial policies that Gørdeler regarded as highly-irresponsible. In addition, the fact that the Nazis in the Leipzig municipal government massively increased the debts owed the city was a major source of worry for Gørdeler. By 1934, he clashed with Hitler over his foreign policy, as Nazi Germany signed a non-aggression treaty with Poland, to which Gørdeler was opposed, demanding annexation of Polish territories. He wrote to Hitler that continued Polish possession of territories in Gdansk Pomerania and Greater Poland was « thorn in country's economic flesh and honour » , and that « the German people must fight for security of their existence » .

In 1933, a « Reich » law forbade doctors who were members of the KPD or who were « non-Aryans » from participating in public health insurance, exempting only those who were World War I veterans, or children or parents of veterans. A 2nd decree of 1934 banned all physicians from participating in public health insurance who had one or more Jewish grandparents regardless of their religion, or if they were married to a « non-Aryan » . However, these laws did not affect those physicians who received their approbation under the Weimar Republic. On April 9, 1935, the Deputy Mayor of Leipzig, the National-Socialist Hans Rudolf Haake, in defiance of the existing laws, banned all Jewish doctors from participating in public health insurance, and advised all municipal employees not to consult Jewish doctors. In response, the « Landesverband Mitteldeutschland des Centralvereins deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens eingetragener Verein » (Middle German Regional Association of the Central Association of German Citizens of Jewish Faith) complained to Gørdeler about Haake's actions, and asked him to enforce the existing anti-Semitic laws which, at least, allowed some Jewish doctors to practice. On 11 April 1935, Gørdeler ordered the end of Haake's boycott, and provided a list of « non-Aryan » physicians permitted to operate under the existing laws, and those who were excluded. Critics of Gørdeler such as the American political scientist Daniel Goldhagen have asserted that, because Gørdeler published a list of « non-Aryan » physicians to be excluded from practicing under public insurance, Gørdeler was an anti-Semite ; by contrast, Gørdeler's defenders like the Canadian historian Peter Hoffmann have argued that Gørdeler's insistence on enforcing the laws served to protect those Jewish physicians entitled to practice.

In November 1934, Gørdeler was again appointed « Reich » Price Commissioner, and ordered to combat inflation caused by re-armament. « Gestapo » reports, from 1934 record, that the German public greeted the news of Gørdeler's re-appointment as Price Commissioner as a positive development. The appointment of Gørdeler was Hitler's response to the increasing problem of inflation. Despite the great fanfare which greeted Gørdeler's appointment, he was given little real power. In 1934, Gørdeler was strongly opposed to the idea of devaluing the « Reichsmark » , and had supported Hitler and Doctor Schacht against the advocates of devaluation. During his 2nd term as Price Commissioner, in 1934-1935, Gørdeler often came into conflict with the Economics Minister and « Reichsbank » president Doctor Hjalmar Schacht over his inflationary policies. In Gørdeler's opinion, these posed a grave danger to the German economy, and finally prompted his resignation in 1935 as Price Commissioner. As Price Commissioner, Gørdeler became increasingly troubled by Nazi economic policies, as well as being disgusted by rampant corruption within the Nazi Party. In September 1935, as Mayor of Leipzig, Gørdeler found himself enforcing the Nuremberg Laws, laws that he found deeply distasteful.

In October 1935, Gørdeler sent Hitler a memorandum in which he urged that the priorities for the use of German foreign exchange should be shifted from buying raw materials that Germany lacked for re-armament and, instead, be used to buy food that Germany was short of like fats. In his report, Gørdeler wrote that the foremost goal of German economic policy should be : « the satisfactory provisioning of the population with fats, even in relation to armaments, as having political priority » . In the same report, Gørdeler argued that the root of German economic problems was re-armament, and advocated as the solution reducing military spending, increasing German exports, and returning to a free-market economy. Gørdeler warned that, to continue the present course of increasing statism in the economy and the current levels of high military spending, would result in the total collapse of the economy with an extremely drastic drop in living standards. After Hitler ignored Gørdeler's report, Gørdeler asked Hitler to dissolve the « Reich » Commissariat for Price Surveillance since there was nothing for that office to do. In the spring of 1936, Gørdeler came into increasing conflict with Haake over the question of demolition of a monument to the German-Jewish composer Felix Mendelssohn.

In the summer of 1936, Gørdeler was heavily involved in trying to influence the decision-making regarding the great economic crisis which gripped Germany that year. Despite his earlier differences with Doctor Schacht, Gørdeler together with Schacht headed the « free-market » faction in the German government who during the economic crisis of 1936 urged Hitler to reduce military spending, turn away from autarkic and protectionist policies, and reduce statism in the economy. Supporting the « free-market » faction were some of Germany's leading business executives, most notably Hermann Duecher of AEG, Robert Bosch of Robert Bosch GmbH and Albert Voegeler of « Vereinigte Stahlwerke AG » . Gørdeler and Schacht were opposed by another faction centred around Hermann Göring calling for the opposite. Despite his disagreements with Göring over the best economic course to follow, on 6 August 1936, Göring commissioned a report from Gørdeler as a leading economic expert about whether Germany should devalue the « Reichsmark » or not. Gørdeler began his report by rejecting the policies of Doctor Schacht's New Plan of 1934 as untenable. Making a U-turn from his stance of 1934, Gørdeler now embraced devaluation of the « Reichsmark » as the best solution to the economic crisis. Gørdeler argued that the tolerance of other Western nations, especially the United States for German State's subsidizing the dumping of exports was wearing thin, and would soon result in harsh new tariffs being applied against German goods. Gørdeler argued that the only way out of the economic crisis which gripped the German economy, in 1936, was the devaluation of the « Reichsmark » , and abandoning all of the restrictions governing foreign exchange in Germany. Gørdeler argued that for devaluation of the « Reichsmark » to be successful would require co-ordination with other nations, especially the United States, the United Kingdom and France, who otherwise might be tempted to engage in competitive devaluations of the Dollar ($) , the Pound (£) and the Franc (Fr) , respectively. To secure their co-operation, Gørdeler argued for rapprochement with the Western powers. In his memorandum for Göring, Gørdeler wrote of the « grandiose possibility » that a German re-engagement with the world economy, and the end of protectionism and autarchism would lead to a new age of economic co-operation among the world's largest economies. To this end, Gørdeler argued in exchange for Anglo-French-American economic co-operation and support, Germany should at a minimum cease its unilateral economic policies, and sharply cut military spending. In addition, Gørdeler felt that the price of Western economic support would be a moderation of the Nazi regime's policies, in regards to the « Jewish question, freemasonry question, question of the rule of law, Church question » . Gørdeler wrote that :

« I can well imagine that we will have to bring certain issues into a greater degree of alignment with the imponderable attitudes of other peoples, not in substance, but in the manner of dealing with them. »

The British historian Adam Tooze has argued that Gørdeler was following his own agenda in seeking to moderate the regime's domestic policies in his memorandum, and that it is highly-unlikely that outside powers would have required the concessions on anti-Semitic and other domestic policies that Gørdeler advocated as the price of Western economic support (through Tooze does feel that Gørdeler was correct in arguing that the West would have made cutbacks in military spending a precondition of economic support) . Gørdeler argued his policies of economic liberalisation and devaluation would in the short run cause 2 to 2.5 million unemployed in Germany, but argued that in the long-run, the increase in exports would make the German economy stronger. In public, Göring called Gørdeler's memorandum « completely unusable » . Göring's copy of Gørdeler's memorandum is covered with hand-written personal comments by Göring on the side such as « What cheek ! » , « Nonsense ! » , and « Oho ! » . When Göring forwarded a copy of Gørdeler's memorandum to Hitler, his covering letter stated :

« This may be quite important, my “ Führer ”, for your memorandum, since it reveals the complete confusion and incomprehension of our bourgeois businessmen, limitation of armaments, defeatism, incomprehension of the foreign policy situation alternate. His (Gørdeler's) recommendations are adequate for a mayor, but not for the State leadership. »

Gørdeler's advice was rejected by Hitler in his « 4 Year Plan Memorandum » of August 1936 and, instead, in the autumn of 1936, the Nazi regime launched the « 4 Year Plan » as the way-out of the 1936 economic crisis. Hitler himself found Gørdeler's report objectionable, and Hitler's « 4 Year Plan Memorandum » may have been written, in part, as a reply to Gørdeler's memorandum (Gerhard Ritter favoured this theory whereas Gerhard Weinberg rejects it) . On 4 September 1936, speaking before the German Cabinet, Göring cited Gørdeler's memorandum as an example of flawed economic thinking, and announced that Germany would pursue heavy military spending, protectionism and autarky regardless of the economic consequences.

In the fall of 1936, Gørdeler's on-going dispute with Haake, over the Mendelssohn's statue, came to a head. After much argument, Gørdeler agreed to have the statue moved from its location in front of the « Gewandhaus » concert-hall to a less high-profile position. In the autumn of 1936, Gørdeler left for a trip to Finland promoted by the German Chamber of Commerce. Before leaving, Gørdeler met with Adolf Hitler and the Propaganda Minister Josef Gøebbels, and received their promise that nothing would happen to the statue during his trip. During his trip, the statue was demolished on Haake's orders. Upon his return, Haake stated that the matter of the statue was « only the outward occasion of the conflict » and declared that :

« Doctor Gørdeler's attitude in the “ Jewish Question ” had been revealed particularly clearly in the matter of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue. »

Gørdeler tried to have the statue rebuilt. After failing that, he declined to accept his re-election as mayor of Leipzig and resigned from office on March 31, 1937.

After his resignation as « Oberbürgermeister » of Leipzig, Gørdeler was offered the position of heading the finance department at the firm of « Krupp AG », which was, at the time, Germany's largest corporation. However, Hitler forbade Gørdeler to take-up this appointment, and ordered Krupp to withdraw the offer. Gørdeler, instead, became the director of the overseas sales department at the firm of « Robert Bosch GmbH ». Shortly after his resignation, Gørdeler became involved in anti-Nazi plots. Bosch, who was a friend of Gørdeler's, agreed to turn a blind eye to his anti-Nazi work. As a conservative and self-proclaimed follower of the Bismarckian tradition, Gørdeler was opposed to what he considered the extreme radicalism of the Nazis, and was fearful of what the results of Hitler's foreign policy might be. Starting in 1936, Gørdeler worked to build an opposition faction out of his circle, comprising mostly civil servants and businessmen. Despite his anti-Nazi plotting, Gørdeler continued to submit memoranda to Hitler and the other Nazi leaders out of the hope that he might somehow convince them to change course. The case of Gørdeler has been used by the historian Hans Mommsen to support his view of « resistance as a process », with Gørdeler going from an ally of the regime to increasing disillusionment by Nazi economic policies in the mid-1930s, and finally becoming committed to the regime's overthrow by 1937. By early 1938, Gørdeler was convinced that « something must be done » about the Nazi regime. Describing Gørdeler during this period, the American journalist William L. Shirer wrote that Gørdeler was :

« A conservative and a monarchist at heart, a devout Protestant, able, energetic and intelligent, but also indiscreet and headstrong “ who ” went to work with heart and soul, in opposition to Hitler. »

Using the « cover » of his job as chief of overseas sales at Bosch, between 1937 and 1938, Gørdeler often travelled abroad, mostly to France, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Balkans, the Middle-East and Canada, to warn anyone who would listen about what he considered to be the aggressive and dangerous foreign policy of Nazi Germany. Though opposed to what he considered to be a reckless foreign policy, Gørdeler often demanded, in his meetings with his foreign friends, that the « Great Powers » back the cession of the Sudetenland, the Polish Corridor, the Memelland (modern Klaipėda, in Lithuania) , and the Free City of Danzig, together with the return of the former German colonies in Africa, to Germany. At the same time, Gørdeler became a member of General Ludwig Beck's private intelligence network. Gørdeler's reports were received not only by General Beck, but by General Werner von Fritsch. The German historian Klaus-Jürgen Müller observed that Gørdeler, in his contacts abroad, tended to falsely portray himself as representing a more organized movement than was in fact the case, and presented himself to his foreign contacts as the secret spokesman of a well-organized « German Opposition ». Besides trying to influence foreign governments, Gørdeler attempted to use his reports to the Army leadership to try to influence the Army into considering an anti-Nazi « Putsch ». During one of his visits to London, in June 1937, Gørdeler told Sir Robert Vansittart that he would like to see the Nazi regime replaced by a Right-wing military dictatorship that would seek British friendship, in exchange for which Gørdeler wanted British support for annexing parts of Poland and Czechoslovakia. In October 1937, during a visit to the United States, Gørdeler stayed with the British historian Sir John Wheeler-Bennett at the latter's Estate in Virginia, and informed him of his desire to restore the monarchy in Germany. During the same trip, Gørdeler drafted his « Political Testament » attacking Nazi economic policies, and criticized the regime for its anti-Christian policies, widespread corruption, and lawlessness. In this period, Gørdeler met several times with Winston Churchill and Vansittart.

During the Blomberg-Fritsch Affair and the attendant crisis caused by the court-martial of General Werner von Fritsch, Gørdeler became closely associated with several loose groupings of German Rightists in the Civil Service and the military who, for various reasons, were unhappy with aspects of the 3rd « Reich ». Gørdeler attempted to use the Fritsch crisis to try to turn the Army leadership against the Nazi regime, but his efforts were in vain. In April 1938, Gørdeler visited London, where he advised the British government both to resist the Nazi claim to the Sudetenland area of Czechoslovakia while, at the same time, declaring that he wanted to see the area transferred to Germany as soon as possible. As Gerhard Weinberg observed, Gørdeler's contradictory statements left the British somewhat confused. In the spring of 1938, Gørdeler, in association with Hans von Dohnanyi, Colonel Hans Oster, and Johannes Popitz, became involved in planning a « Putsch » against the Nazi regime should the regime launch « Fall Grün », the code-name for the invasion of Czechoslovakia. In June 1938, General Beck often consulted with Gørdeler over the question of whether or not he should resign as Chief of the General Staff as a way of stopping « Fall Grün ».

Vansittart introduced Gørdeler to one of his spies, the British industrialist A.P. Young, who was a close business partner to several German corporations, and as such often visited Germany. Because Young did frequent business with Bosch and because of Gørdeler's position there, the 2 could meet often without raising suspicion. Starting in August 1938, Gørdeler started to leak information to London, informing the British that Hitler intended to launch « Fall Grün » in September 1938. In August 1938, Gørdeler met with Young in the village of Rauschen Dune, in East-Prussia. During his meeting with Young, Gørdeler asked that Young convey a message to the British government, to the effect that London should apply diplomatic and economic pressure on Germany to cease the persecution of the Jews. In order to have more frequent meetings with his British contacts, Gørdeler stayed in Switzerland, in August-October 1938. Though those British politicians and civil servants who met with Gørdeler were impressed with his candor and earnestness, it was judged too risky by the Chamberlain government, in 1938, to stake all upon the Gørdeler's projected « Putsch », especially given that the chances for success were uncertain at best, and the discovery of British backing for an unsuccessful « Putsch » was likely to cause the war the Chamberlain government was seeking to avert, in 1938. Moreover, as one British civil servant wrote on August 22, 1938 :

« We have had similar visits from other emissaries of the Reichsheer, such as Doctor Gørdeler, but those for whom these emissaries claim to speak have never given us any reasons to suppose that they would be able or willing to take action such as would lead to the overthrow of the regime. The events of June 1934 (the “ Night of the Long Knives ”) and February 1938 (the “ Blomberg-Fritsch Affair ”) do not lead one to attach much hope to energetic action by the Army against the regime. »

Ulrich von Hassell wrote in his diary that Gørdeler was « imprudent » but, at least, « he wants to act rather than grumble », which was a marked difference to the generals who indicated that perhaps they would or perhaps they would not act against the Nazi regime should Czechoslovakia be attacked. In the tense atmosphere of September 1938, with the crisis in Central Europe looking likely to explode into War at any moment, Gørdeler was waiting anxiously for the « Putsch » to overthrow the Nazi regime, and his taking over the reins of the German State as the new Chancellor. During his planning for the « coup », Gørdeler was in contact with Chinese intelligence, using General Alexander von Falkenhausen as intermediary. Like most German conservatives, Gørdeler favoured Germany's traditional informal alliance with China, and was strongly opposed to the volte-face in Germany's Far-Eastern policies, effected in early 1938, by the Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop, who abandoned the alliance with China for an alignment with Japan. In a September 1938 meeting with Young, the latter reported that « X » (as Gørdeler was code-named by the British) had stated about the domestic situation in Germany :

« The working classes are nervous, distrustful of the Leader. Their allegiance is doubtful. »

In another meeting, on September 11, 1938, in Zürich, Young recorded Gørdeler as saying :

« The feeling among the people against the War is welling-up at an alarming rate. His (Gørdeler's) recent talks with leading industrialists had satisfied him that the workers' feelings have been bitterly roused to the point where, if they were in possession of arms, they would physically revolt against the regime. »

On September 29, 1938, Gørdeler informed the British, through one of Vansittart's contacts, Colonel Graham Christie, that the mobilization of the Royal Navy was turning German public opinion against the regime. The British historian Sir John Wheeler-Bennett, who knew Gørdeler well, noted that Gørdeler failed to realize that Hitler was not bluffing with « Fall Grün » and had every intention of attacking Czechoslovakia on October 1, 1938, and that he regarded Munich as a personal set-back. In 1938, Gørdeler was deeply disappointed with the « Munich Agreement » which, in his view, though it turned-over the Sudetenland to Germany, was undesirable in that it removed what Gørdeler considered to be best chance of a « Putsch » against the Nazi regime. After the « Munich Agreement », Gørdeler wrote to one of his American friends :

« The German people did not want War ; the Army would have done anything to avoid it ; the world had been warned and informed in good time. If the warning had been heeded and acted upon Germany would, by now, be free of its dictator and turning against Mussolini. Within a few weeks, we could have begun to build lasting world peace on the basis of justice, reason and decency. A purified Germany with a government of decent people would have been ready to solve the Spanish problem without delay, in company with Britain and France, to remove Mussolini and, with the United States, to create peace in the Far-East. The way would have been open for sound co-operation in economic and social fields, for the creation of peaceful relations between Capital, Labour and the State, for the raising of ethical concepts and for a fresh attempt to raise the general standard of living. »

In the same letter, Gørdeler wrote :

« You can hardly conceive the despair that both people and the Army feel about the brutal, insane and terroristic dictator and his henchmen. »

Wheeler-Bennett commented that Gørdeler was vastly exaggerating the extent of anti-Nazi feelings, both in the German Army and among the German public. After Munich, Gørdeler told Young that :

« It is vitally important to realise that Hitler is deeply and definitely convinced that, after his unexpected victory at Munich, anything is possible to him. He says that he (Hitler) is now convinced that England is degenerate, weak, timid and never will have the guts to resist any of his plans. No War will ever be needed against either England or France. »

In November 1938, when Sir Neville Henderson, the British Ambassador to Germany went on sick leave, the acting heads of the Embassy in Berlin sent a series of reports to the Foreign Secretary Lord Halifax intended to effect a change in British policy towards Germany. Gørdeler emerged as one of the Embassy's leading informants.

In November 1938, Gørdeler met with Young, in Switzerland, and asked if were possible for the British government to intercede on the behalf of 10,000 Polish Jews the Germans had expelled from Germany, and whom the Poles refused to accept. Gørdeler declared that the treatment of the Polish Jews, stranded on the German-Polish border, was « barbaric ». In December 1938 - January 1939, Gørdeler had a further series of meetings with Young, in Switzerland, where he informed Young that the « Kristallnacht » pogrom of November 1938 had been ordered by Hitler personally, and was not a « spontaneous » demonstration as the Nazis had claimed. Gørdeler recommended that Young inform London that as soon as « the new persecution of the Jews is started, it is absolutely essential to break diplomatic relations ». Gørdeler also informed Young of his belief that Hitler was seeking world conquest, and that the « Führer » had « decided to destroy the Jews-Christianity-Capitalism ». Speaking to Young about the economic situation in Germany, Gørdeler stated :

« Economic and financial situation gravely critical. Inner situation desperate. Economic conditions getting worse. »

In another meeting with Young, Gørdeler claimed :

« The working classes are nervous, distrustful of the leader. Their allegiance is doubtful. »

Gørdeler maintained to Young that :

« The feeling among the people against War is welling-up at an alarming rate. His (Gørdeler's) recent talks with leading industrialists had satisfied X that the workers' feeling have been bitterly roused to the point where, if they were in possession of arms, they would physically revolt against the present regime. »

Gørdeler's reports to Young were later published by the latter in 1974, as « The " X " Documents » .

In December 1938, Gørdeler again visited Britain, where he alienated those British civil servants he met by his extreme German nationalist language, together with demands that the British support the return of Danzig, the Polish Corridor, and the former German colonies in Africa, plus making a huge loan to a post-Nazi government. Gørdeler asked Frank Ashton-Gwatkin of the Foreign Office to ensure that Britain gave a post-Nazi government an interest-free loan of £ 500 million in exchange for which Gørdeler would end protectionism, end the efforts to place the Balkans into the German sphere of influence, and support Britain in the Mediterranean against Italy, and in the Far-East against Japan. In addition, the fact that Gørdeler was exaggerating the extent of anti-Nazi feeling in Germany, and his inability to organize a « Putsch », were becoming increasingly clear to the British. Sir Alexander Cadogan wrote about Gørdeler's offer :

« We are to deliver the goods and Germany gives I.O.U.s. »

Chamberlain was more hostile, writing : « These people must do their own job. »

In the same month, Gørdeler wrote his « World Peace Programme » calling an international conference of all the world's leading powers to consider disarmament, a « moral code » for relations between the States, and the stabilization of the various currencies. The end of Gørdeler's « World Peace Programme » read :

« Whoever abstains from co-operating wants War and is a breaker of the Peace. »

Despite what Gørdeler perceived as a major set-back after Munich, he continued with his efforts to bring about the downfall of the Nazi regime. Gørdeler was an unyielding optimist ; he believed that if only he could convince enough people, he could overthrow the Nazi regime. Gørdeler believed that through sheer force of will and the goodness of his cause that he could bring down the Nazi regime. Gørdeler spent much of the winter of 1938-1939 holding discussions with General Beck, the diplomat Ulrich von Hassell, and Erwin Planck about how best to overthrow the Nazi regime. At the same time, Hitler grew increasingly annoyed with Gørdeler's memoranda urging him to exercise caution. Gørdeler, together with Doctor Schacht, General Beck, Hassell, and the economist Rudolf Brinkmann, were described by Hitler as « the overbred intellectual circles » who were trying to block him from fulfilling his mission by their appeals to caution, and but for the fact that he needed their skills « otherwise, perhaps, we could someday exterminate them or do something of this kind to them » . During the winter of 1938-1939, Gørdeler sent reports to the British stating that Hitler was pressuring Italy into attacking France, was planning to launch a surprise air offensive against Britain, intended to achieve a « knock-out blow » by razing British cities to the ground sometime in the 2nd half of February 1939, and was considering an invasion of Switzerland and the Low-Countries as a prelude to attacking France and Britain. Unknown to Gørdeler, he was transmitting false information provided by the « Abwehr » chief Admiral Wilhelm Canaris and General Hans Oster who was hoping that these reports might lead to a change in British foreign policy. In this, Canaris and Oster achieved their purpose as Gørdeler's misinformation resulted in the « Dutch War Scare » which gripped the British government in late- January 1939 which, in turn, led to the public declarations by the British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, in February, that any German attack upon France, Switzerland, and the Low-Countries would be automatically considered the « casus belli » for an Anglo-German War, leading to the British « continental commitment » to defend France with a large ground force.

On March 16, 1939, Gørdeler suggested to Young that Britain call an international conference to discuss « legitimate » German demands for changes in the international order. Gørdeler claimed that Hitler would refuse to attend the conference and this would so discredit him as to bring about his downfall » . Young passed on Gørdeler's conference idea to Cordell Hull, who was so impressed with it that he offered to bring about the proposed conference to be chaired by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. This was the origin of Roosevelt's famous appeal to Hitler and Mussolini, on April 15, 1939, that the 2 leaders publicly promise never to disturb the peace for the next 10 years, in exchange for which Roosevelt promised a new economic international order.

In the 2nd half of March 1939, Gørdeler together with Doctor Schacht and Hans Bernd Gisevius visited Ouchy, Switzerland to meet with a senior French intelligence agent representing the Premier Édouard Daladier. Gørdeler told the « 2e Bureau » agent that the strain of massive military spending had left the German economy on the verge of collapse, that Hitler was determined to use the Danzig issue as an excuse to invade Poland which, in itself, was only a prelude for a German seizure of all of Eastern Europe, that a forceful Anglo-French diplomatic stand could deter Hitler, and that, if Hitler were deterred long enough, then, the economic collapse of Germany would cause the downfall of his regime. In April 1939, during a secret meeting with the British diplomat Sir Gladwyn Jebb, Gørdeler stated that, if the British continued with their « containment » policy, adopted in March 1939, then, they might see the « Hitler adventure liquidated before the end of June (1939) ». There is considerable debate as to the accuracy of this information, with some historians such as Richard Overy arguing that Gørdeler and other German conservatives had exaggerated German economic problems to the British and the French. Overy charged that what Gørdeler wanted was a very firm Anglo-French stand in favour of Poland, hoping that, if confronted with such a situation, the German Army would overthrow Hitler rather than risk a World War and, as such, Gørdeler exaggerated the economic problems of the « Reich » to encourage such a stand. The « X documents », and how to interpret them, played a key role in the debate in the late- 1980's between Overy and the Marxist Timothy Mason about whether the German attack on Poland was a « flight into War » forced on Hitler by an economic crisis. Other historians have contended that Gørdeler's information about German economic problems was correct, and have pointed to the fact that only massive Soviet economic support, combined with plundering occupied lands, saved the German economy from collapse, in the winter of 1939-1940. Even with Soviet economic support (especially, oil) and the exploitation of Poland and the « Reich » Protectorate of Bohemia-Moravia, under the impact of the British blockade, there occurred a 75 % decline in value and tonnage of German imports during the « Phoney War » .

On 6 May 1939, Gørdeler leaked information to the British Foreign Office stating that the German and Soviet governments were secretly beginning a rapprochement with the aim of dividing Eastern Europe between them. In May 1939, Gørdeler visited London to repeat the same message to the British government. During his London trip, Gørdeler told the British that the state of the German economy was so deplorable that, even if War occurred, then, it could only have the effect of accelerating the German economic collapse, and that Germany simply lacked the economic staying power for an extended War. During the same visit to London, in May 1939, Gørdeler claimed that the German Army leadership was willing to overthrow the regime, that he himself favored launching a « Putsch » immediately, but that « the leaders of the whole movement still considered it too early ». The German historian Klaus-Jürgen Müller commented that Gørdeler, in making these claims, was either lying to the British, or else, was seriously self-deluded. Gørdeler's assessment of the German diplomatic-military-economic situation had considerable influence on decision-makers in the British and French governments, in 1939, who, based on Gørdeler's reports, believed that a firm Anglo-French diplomatic stand for Poland might bring about the fall of Hitler without a War, or failing that, at least, ensure that the Allies faced War on relatively auspicious economic terms.

Besides trying to influence opinion abroad, Gørdeler urged the German military to overthrow Hitler, and frequently found himself frustrated by the unwillingness of the generals to consider a « Putsch ». In a memo written at the end of July 1939, during a visit to Turkey, Gørdeler took the view that Hitler was bluffing in his demands against Poland, and, if he could be forced to stand down by a firm Anglo-French stand, that would be such a blow as to topple the Nazi regime. Later, as the summer of 1939 went on, Gørdeler changed his views about Hitler's intentions towards Poland. In August 1939, Gørdeler contacted General Walter von Brauchitsch, and advised him if Germany attacked Poland, the result would not be the limited War that Hitler expected, but rather a World War pitting Germany against Britain and France. Gørdeler advised Brauchitsch that the only way to save Germany from such a War would be a « Putsch » to depose Hitler. Brauchitsch was not interested in Gørdeler's opinions, and told him that he shared Hitler's belief that Germany could destroy Poland without causing a World War, in 1939. On August 25, 1939, on discovering that the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact had not led as intended to an Anglo-French abandonment of Poland, Hitler ordered the temporary postponement of « Fall Weiß », which had been due to begin the next day. Gørdeler was convinced that the postponement was a fatal blow to Hitler's prestige. On August 26, he went on a trip to Sweden that he had been considering canceling because of the international situation. On August 27, 1939, Gørdeler told the British diplomat Gladwyn Jebb to continue to make a firm diplomatic stand for Poland, as the best way of bringing down the Nazi regime. At the same time, Gørdeler's insistence on restoring Germany to 1914 borders and his intense German nationalism left many British diplomats to distrust Gørdeler as they regarded him as not much different from Hitler. At the beginning of September 1939, Gørdeler returned to Germany a dejected man. Gørdeler was most disappointed and unpleasantly surprised when Germany attacked Poland on September 1, which was followed-up by Anglo-French declarations of War on September 3, which was followed-up by the German Army doing nothing to overthrow Hitler. This marked the beginning of a recurring pattern where Gørdeler would invest great hopes in his beloved German Army rising-up against Hitler, only to discover, time after time, that Army officers much preferred to fight for the « Führer » as opposed to fighting against him.

In 1939-1940, Gørdeler assembled conservative politicians, diplomats and generals, most notably Ulrich von Hassell, General Ludwig Beck, and Johannes Popitz, in opposition to Adolf Hitler. On 11 October 1939, speaking to Hassell of German War crimes in Poland, Gørdeler commented that both General Halder and Admiral Canaris were afflicted with nervous complaints as a result of « our brutal conduct of the War », in Poland. In October 1939, Gørdeler drafted peace terms that a post-Nazi government would seek with Great Britain and France. Under Gørdeler's terms, Germany would retain all the areas of Poland that had been part of Germany, prior to 1918, Austria, and the Sudetenland with independence being restored to Poland and Czechoslovakia with general disarmament, the restoration of global free trade and the ending of protectionism as the other major goals for the new regime. On 3 November 1939, Gørdeler paid another visit to Sweden, where he met with Marcus Wallenberg, Gustav Cassell, and Doctor Sven Hedin. Hedin wrote in his diary that :

« He (Gørdeler) believed in Göring and thought that a speedy peace was the only thing to save Germany, but that peace was unthinkable so long as Hitler remained at the head of affairs. »

At the same time, Gørdeler was deeply involved in the planning of an abortive « Putsch » intended to be launched, on 5 November 1939, and, as such, was in very high spirits prior to that day. Hassell wrote in his diary that with worry that :

« He (Gœrdeler) often reminds me of Kapp. »

(Wolfgang Kapp, the nominal leader of the « Kapp “ Putsch ” » was notorious for his irresponsibility.)

The proposed « Putsch » became still-born when Field Marshal Walter von Brauchitsch and General Franz Halder, the leaders of the planned « Putsch » got cold feet, and dropped their support. Brauchitsch and Halder had decided to overthrow Hitler after the latter had fixed « X-day » for the invasion of France, for November 12, 1939 ; an invasion that both officers believed to be doomed to fail. During a meeting with Hitler, on November 5, Brauchitsch had attempted to talk Hitler into putting-off « X-day » by saying that morale in the German Army was worse than what it was in 1918, a statement that enraged Hitler who harshly berated Brauchitsch for incompetence. After that meeting, both Halder and Brauchitsch told Gœrdeler that overthrowing Hitler was simply something that they could not do, and he should find other officers if he that was what he really wanted to do. Equally important, on November 7, 1939, following heavy snowstorms, Hitler put-off « X-Day » until further notice, which removed the reason that had most motivated Brauchitsch and Halder to consider overthrowing Hitler. On November 23, 1939, Gœrdeler met with Halder to ask him to re-consider his attitude. Halder gave Gœrdeler the following reasons why he wanted nothing to do with any plot to overthrow Hitler :

That General Erich Ludendorff had launched the « Kaiserschlacht » , in March 1918, which led directly to Germany's defeat in November 1918, yet, most people in Germany still considered Ludendorff one of Germany's greatest heroes. By contrast, the men who staged the « November Revolution » and signed the armistice that took Germany out of a losing War were hated all over the « Reich » as the « November Criminals » . Even if Hitler were to launch an invasion of France that signally failed, most people would still support Hitler, just as the failure of the « Kaiserschlacht » had failed to hurt Ludendorff's reputation as it should have, so the Army could do nothing to overthrow Hitler until the unlikely event that his prestige was badly damaged. Until Hitler was discredited, anyone who acted against him to end the war would be a « new November Criminal » .

That Hitler was a great leader, and there was nobody to replace him.

Most of the younger officers in the Army were extreme National-Socialists who would not join a « Putsch » .

Hitler deserved « a last chance to deliver the German people from the slavery of English capitalism » .

Finally, « one does not rebel when face to face with the enemy » .

Despite all of Gœrdeler's best efforts, Halder would not change his mind.

In January-February 1940, Gœrdeler together with Popitz, Beck and Hassell spent of their time working on the sort of constitutional, economic, social and educational system that a post-Nazi government would carry-out. The basis of all their planning was the restoration of the monarchy. Gerdeler believed that the main reason why the Army would not overthrow Hitler was the lack of a positive goal to inspire them with the hope of a better tomorrow and, if he and his colleagues could work out plans for a better future, then, the Army leaders would change their minds. During their discussions for a post-Hitler future, it was agreed that various Nazi leaders like Hermann Göring and Heinrich Himmler, provided that they were willing to break with Hitler could have a leading role in a post-Nazi government. The only Nazi leader besides Hitler whom Gerdeler and his circle were adamant could play no role in a post-Nazi government was the Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop who Gerdeler personally hated as an obnoxious bully, and whose foreign policy Gerdeler viewed as criminally inept. In early April 1940, Gerdeler met secretly with General Franz Halder, the Chief of the General Staff, and asked him to consider a « Putsch » while the « Phoney War » was still on, while the British and French were still open to a negotiated peace. Halder refused Gerdeler's request. Gerdeler told Halder that too many people had already died in the War, and this refusal to remove Hitler, at this point, would ensure that the blood of millions would be on his hands. Halder told Gerdeler that his oath to Hitler and his belief in Germany's inevitable victory in the War precluded his acting against the Nazi regime. Halder told Gerdeler that :

« The military situation of Germany, particularly on account of the pact of non-aggression with Russia, is such that a breach of my oath to the “ Führer ” could not possibly be justified. » (Halder was referring to the Hitler oath.)

Only if Germany was faced with total defeat would he consider breaking his oath, and that Gerdeler was a fool to believe that World War II could be ended with a compromise peace. Halder ended his meeting with Gerdeler on April 6, 1940, with the remark :

« England and France had declared War on us, and one had to see it through. A peace of compromise was senseless. Only in the greatest emergency could one take the action desired by Gerdeler. »

In June 1940, much to Gerdeler's intense disappointment, following the German victory over France, the German Army lost all interest in anti-Nazi plots. Not until December 1941, following the 1st German defeats in the Soviet Union, were Army officers again to show interest in becoming involved in Gerdeler's anti-Nazi plots. In June 1941, Gerdeler experienced a brief surge of hope that he learned that Hitler had issued a set of orders to the Army for the upcoming « Operation Barbarossa » that violated international law and made it clear that he wanted the War against the Soviet Union to be waged in the most inhumane, brutal way possible. Gerdeler argued that the Army would now overthrow Hitler because no self-respecting German officer would wage War in such an inhumane fashion and become a war criminal. The sequel was recorded in Hassell's diary, on 16 June 1941 :

« Brauchitsch and Halder have already agreed to Hitler's tactics (in Russia) . Thus, the Army must assume the onus of the murders and burnings which, up to now, have been confided to the SS. »

A series of conferences with Popitz, Gerdeler, Beck and Oster to consider whether certain orders which Army commanders have received (but which they have not yet issued) might suffice to open the eyes of the military leaders to the nature of the regime for which they are fighting. These orders concern brutal measures the troops are to take against the Bolsheviks when Russia is invaded :

« We came to the conclusion that nothing was to be hoped for now. They (the generals) delude themselves. Hopeless sergeant majors ! »

During the winter of 1940-1941, Gerdeler spent much of his time discussing with Popitz, Beck and Hassell which of the « Hohenzollerns » would occupy the throne of Germany after the overthrow of the Nazis. Gerdeler supported the claim of Prince Oskar of Prussia. The idea of restoring the former Emperor Wilhelm II to his throne was rejected by Gerdeler under the grounds that the personality of the former « Kaiser » and the way he had behaved during his 30 year reign made him a completely unsuitable candidate. The Crown Prince Wilhelm was rejected by Gerdeler partly because his well-deserved reputation as a womaniser, a heavy drinker and an irresponsible playboy made him offensive to the austere, God-fearing Lutheran Gerdeler and partly because of his outspoken support for the Nazi regime. Popitz, by contrast, while agreeing with Gerdeler that the unstable former « Kaiser » was unsuitable, insisted on dynastic grounds that the Crown Prince Wilhelm be the next Emperor, and was to spend much time arguing with Gerdeler over which of the sons of the former Emperor was to sit on the throne. They developed a future constitution for Germany and even a list of potential ministers. Popitz favored a return to the pre-1918 authoritarian political system. But Gerdeler argued, with his fellow conspirators, in favor of a British-style constitutional monarchy with an Emperor who was « not meant to govern, but to watch over the Constitution and to represent the State » .

Gerdeler's proposed constitution called for a strong executive, a high-degree of decentralisation, a « Reichstag » elected partially by the people on a British-style « first-past-the-post » basis (instead of by Party lists) and partially by members of local councils, and a « Reichsrat » composed of representatives nominated by Christian churches, trade-unions, Universities, and business groups. To assist with the drafting of the future constitution, Gerdeler enlisted the help, through his friend Dietrich Bonhoeffer, of the so-called « Freiburger Kreis » (« Freiburg Circle ») , an anti-Nazi discussion group of professors at Freiburg University, founded in 1938, and which included Adolf Lampe, Erich Wolf, Walter Eucken, Constantin von Dietze, and Gerhard Ritter. Had the « July 20 Plot » succeeded, Gerdeler would have served as Chancellor in the new government that would have been formed after Hitler's assassination and the overthrow of the Nazi regime. In August 1941, Gerdeler was most disappointed with the Atlantic Charter. He felt that the demands contained in Clause 8, calling for the disarmament of Germany, would make both the task of recruiting the German Army to overthrowing the regime more difficult, and were unacceptable since Gerdeler believed in maintaining a strong military. Starting in 1941, Gerdeler expanded his network of anti-Nazi contacts to include Social-Democrats like Wilhelm Leuschner and Hermann Maas.

In late 1941, under the impact of the news of the deportations of German Jews to be shot in Eastern Europe, Gerdeler submitted a memo to the German government calling for all Jews who had been German citizens or were descended from Jews who had been German citizens, before 1871, to be classified as Germans, and those Jews who were descended from Jews who had not lived within the borders of Germany, prior to 1871, to be considered citizens of Jewish State whose creation would occur later. In the memo entitled « Das Ziel » (The Goal) , Gerdeler wrote that a Jewish State should be created somewhere in South America or Canada, to which almost the entire Jewish population of Europe would be deported ; only German-Jewish veterans of World War I or those German Jews descended from Jews who were German citizens, in 1871, would be allowed to stay. Meanwhile, pending the deportation of the Jews to the Americas, Gørdeler called in « The Goal » for the Nuremberg Laws to stay in force while demanding the repeal of the post- « Kristallnacht » anti-Semitic laws. Some controversy has been attracted by this memo. Gørdeler's critics are offended by his suggestion that German Jews whose ancestors had not lived within the borders of the German Empire before July 1, 1871, should not be considered German citizens, whereas Gørdeler's defenders, such as the Canadian historian Peter Hoffmann, have argued that Gørdeler was trying to present the Nazi regime with an alternative to genocide. The German historian Hans Mommsen wrote that Gørdeler's anti-Semitism was typical of the German Right, where Jews were widely considered to be part of an alien body living in Germany. Mommsen went on to comment that, given Gørdeler's background in the fiercely anti-Semitic German National People's Party, what is surprising was not his anti-Jewish prejudices, but rather that he was able to make any sort of moral objection to Nazi anti-Semitism. In January 1942, Gørdeler submitted another memo to the German government protesting at the deportation of Leipzig Jews. In April 1942, during another visit to Sweden, Gørdeler contracted the Wallenberg family, asking them to contact Winston Churchill about the peace terms that the British would conclude with Germany once the Nazi regime was overthrown. In May 1942, Gørdeler was much saddened when his son Christian was killed in action while serving on the Eastern Front.

In November 1942, Gørdeler made a secret and illegal visit to Smolensk, using forged papers provided by Colonel Hans Oster, to meet Field Marshal Günther von Kluge and Henning von Tresckow to gain their support for overthrowing Hitler. Both Kluge and Tresckow promised to arrest Hitler when he visited the Eastern Front. Tresckow, in particular, was very favourably impressed with Gørdeler, whom he saw as a kindred spirit. Gørdeler returned to Berlin feeling assured about the future, and was most disappointed when he received a message from Kluge via General Beck stating he changed his mind about acting against the Nazi regime, and to include him out of any « Putsch » . Kluge's change of mind about attempting to overthrow Hitler was related to the « gifts » he had received from Hitler, in the fall of 1942. On October 30, 1942, Kluge was the beneficiary of an enormous bribe from Hitler who mailed a letter of good wishes together with a huge cheque totaling 250,000 « Reichsmarks » made-out to him from the German treasury and a promise that whatever improving his Estate might cost could be billed-out to the German treasury. Hitler was unaware of Gørdeler's plotting, but had heard rumours that Kluge was unhappy with his leadership. After receiving another « gift » of 250,000 « Reichsmarks » from Hitler, later in November, that was intended to buy his loyalty, it had the desired effect with Kluge's message to Gørdeler not to involve him in anti-Nazi plots.

The corruption of the German officer corps by the Nazi regime, via generous bribes, was a source of considerable disgust and exasperation to Gørdeler. One of Gørdeler's contacts with the Army, a Captain Hermann Kaiser, informed Gørdeler that all of the senior officers were taking huge bribes from Hitler, in exchange for their loyalty. By May 1943, Gørdeler was well-aware that Field Marshal Günther von Kluge, General Heinz Guderian and Field Marshal Gerd von Rundstedt had accepted 250,000 « Reichsmarks » cheques as birthday presents from Hitler that were intended to bribe them into loyalty and that, in addition, Guderian had received an Estate in Poland. Since these were all men that Gørdeler had hopes of recruiting, their refusal to join the conspiracy because of their greed for more bribes enraged Gørdeler. Gørdeler wrote with disgust, in May 1943, that the senior officers « think only of helping themselves » .

In December 1942, the « Freiburg Circle » who were continuing their work helping Gørdeler develop a constitution submitted the « Great Memorandum » to Gørdeler for the proposed post-Nazi German government, which also included « Proposals for a Solution of the “ Jewish Question ” in Germany ». The « Proposals » rejected Nazi racial theories, but stated that, after the overthrow of the Nazis, German Jews would not have their German citizenship restored, would be restricted to living in ghettos, and would be allowed only minimal contact with « German Christians », and called for continuing the Nazi ban on marriage and sex between Jews and « German Christians ». The Israeli historian Saul Friedländer used the « Proposals » to argue that Gørdeler was anti-Semitic, and that his differences with the Nazis on the « Jewish Question » were ones of degree, not kind.

After the Battle of Stalingrad, the pace of Gørdeler's conspiratorial activities gathered speed. Between November 1942 and November 1943, Gørdeler was in regular contact with his friends, the Wallenberg family of Sweden whom he used as middle-men in his efforts to make contact with the British and American governments. On January 22, 1943, at the home of Peter Yorck von Wartenburg, Gørdeler met with the « Kreisau Circle », during which he argued and debated forcefully about the social and economic policies to be pursued by a post-Nazi government. Only with some difficulty were Ulrich von Hassell and Fritz-Dietlof von der Schulenburg able to patch-up a measure of agreement between the « Kreisau Circle » and Gørdeler. Those present at the meeting of January 22 were : Gørdeler, Hassell, General Beck, Johannes Popitz and Jens Jessens for the conservative faction ; and : von der Schulenburg, Yorck von Wartenburg, Eugen Gerstenmaier, Adam von Trott zu Solz and Helmuth James Graf von Moltke, for the Left-leaning « Kreisau Circle ». In March 1943, Gørdeler wrote a letter addressed to several German Army officers appealing to them to overthrow the Nazis and demanding that just one line divide Germans « hat between decent and non-decent ». Gørdeler went on to write :

« How is it possible that so basically decent a people as the Germans can put-up for so long with such an intolerable system ? Only because all offences against law and decency are carried-out under the protection of secrecy and under the pressures of terror. »

Gørdeler argued that if only a situation were created « in which, if only for 24 hours, it (were) possible for the truth to be spoken again », then, the Nazi regime would collapse like a house of cards. In May 1943, Gørdeler submitted a memo to the Wallenbergs, which he asked them to pass on to the Anglo-Americans outlining his thoughts on the German-Polish border. In the same memo, Gørdeler called for a « European community » comprising a German-dominated confederation which, in turn, was to be sub-divided into an Eastern European confederation consisting of Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, a confederation of the Scandinavian States, a South European confederation, and a Balkan confederation. The « European confederation » was to be 1 economic unit with 1 military ruled over by a Council consisting of 2 representatives from every State, who would elect a European President for a 4 year term. Helping the Council and the President was to be a Federal Assembly to which each of the various confederations would send 5 to 10 members based on their populations. Finally, the European confederation was to serve as the nucleus of a « World Confederation of Nations » that would banish war everywhere, and promote peace and prosperity.

During the spring of 1943, Gørdeler grew increasingly impatient with the military end of the conspiracy, complaining that those officers involved in the plot were better at finding excuses for inaction than reasons for action. In a letter to General Friedrich Olbricht of May 17, 1943, Gørdeler wrote :

« MY DEAR GENERAL .

I have, again and again, considered the view that we must wait for the psychologically right moment.

If, by this, we mean the moment at which events cause us to take action, then it will coincide with the beginnings of the collapse ; action would then be too late to be exploited politically. In the meantime, irreplaceable cultural monuments and the most important industrial centers would be heaps of ruins and the responsibility for precious lives would fall on the military leaders. Therefore, we must not wait for the “ psychologically right ” moment to come, we must bring it about (emphasis in the original) . For we are certainly agreed that leadership without far-sighted correct action is impossible.

For the sake of the future of our fatherland, I would not like to see the intelligentsia which has grown-up throughout the Centuries excluded from this leadership ; for the same reason, the experienced leaders among our soldiers should not be excluded either.

Stalingrad and Tunis are defeats unparalleled in German history since Jena and Auerstädt. In both cases, the German people were told that, for decisive reasons, armies had to be sacrificed. We know how false this is ; for soldiers and politicians can only describe such sacrifices as necessary when they are justified by successes in other fields which outweigh the sacrifice. The truth is that our leadership is incapable and unscrupulous ; if it had been true leadership, both tragic sacrifices would have been avoided and a favourable military and political situation would have been established.

The number of civilians, men, women and children of all nations and of Russian prisoners of War ordered to be put to death, before and during this War, exceeds 1 million. The manner of their deaths is monstrous and is far removed from chivalry, humanity, and even from the most primitive ideas of decency among savage tribes. But the German people are falsely led to believe that it is Russian Bolsheviks who are constantly committing monstrous crimes against innocent victims.

The list of such things can be extended at will. I chose these 2 examples, because they are obvious examples of the poisoning of people's minds, and taken in conjunction with a corruption never before known in German history and the suppression of law, they offer every opportunity of creating (emphasis in the original) the 'psychologically right' moment. The vast majority of the German people, almost the whole working-class, knows to-day that this War cannot be brought to a successful conclusion.

In face of this, the patience of the people is inexplicable. But this perversity is based only on the fact that terror fosters secrecy, lies, and crime. It will disappear as soon as the people realize that terror is being attacked, corruption removed and that sincerity and truth are taking the place of secrecy and falsehood. At that time, every German will pull himself together again, both the decent and corrupt, each will reject and condemn the action which he tolerated yesterday or to which he took no exception, because it was secret, because the decent German will again see decency and the others will be faced with responsibility.

If we can find no other way, I am ready to do everything to talk personally to Hitler. I would tell him what he must be told, namely that, in the vital interests of the people, his resignation is essential. If such a personal talk can be brought about, there is no reason why it should end badly. Surprises are possible, not probable, but the risk must be taken. Only it is not unreasonable, on my part, to demand that action must be taken immediately.

The political conditions for this exist.

I urgently entreat you, my dear General, to consider again whether the difficulties standing in the way of the technical measures cannot also be overcome. I also ask you to think over the method I have suggested and to give an opportunity on my return to discuss the situation and the possibilities calmly.

With my best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

GÆRDELER »

Gærdeler had great faith in his idea that, if only he could meet with Hitler and explain to him that his leadership was grossly inadequate on military and economic grounds, then, Hitler could be persuaded to resign in his favor, thereby, ending Nazi Germany through non-violent means. It took considerable effort on the part of Gærdeler's friends to talk him out of this plan. After a visit to western Germany, where Gærdeler was horrified by the damage caused by Anglo-American bombing, in July 1943, Gærdeler wrote a letter to Field Marshal Günther von Kluge that read as :

« The idea fostered by the High-Military authorities that the devastation in the West was not so bad and that, after a few days, during which they “ gathered-up their chattels from among the ruins ”, the workers return to work, induced me to look at the devastation for myself. You would be as shocked as I was. The work of 1,000 years is nothing, but rubble. There is no point in describing my feelings when I looked down from the “ Trolleturm ” on the ruins of the town of Barmen and on Elberfeld, half of which is destroyed. In Essen, it is almost impossible to find one's way through the streets because all of the familiar landmarks are lost in the rubble. 60 % of Krupps is destroyed and it is only working to 30 % of capacity. It is untrue to say that the contrary is the case. The damaged sections have not even been rebuilt in other parts of Germany ; the process of shifting the industry is only in its initial stages. Whoever has the courage to think must realize even without special technical knowledge that buildings must be found, then adapted, then machinery must be procured, most of it new, and then coal and labour must be obtained. In Elberfeld, even undamaged factories in the “ Vohwinkel ” area are only working to 30 % capacity, because the workers have left. In Essen and Wupertal, about 2/3's of the population have disappeared and, in Colognen about 4/5's. That is how it is with the people who, in 3 days, gather-up their chattels from the rubble. The coal output of the Ruhr has now dropped from 420,000 to 300,000 tons a day and is decreasing daily. In June, the output of the South German armaments industry declined sharply for the 1st time, because the drop in supplies from the Ruhr is making itself felt. Furthermore, nothing can be done with these ruins. They are heaps of debris, concrete, and iron. Reconstruction will take generations. The debris cannot be disposed of on German soil, it would ruin too much land. It must, therefore, be dumped into the sea. The removal of debris from Essen alone will take 3 years, using 100 wagons a day.

100 milliard " Marks " would not be too high a estimate for the damage sustained so far. At present, our national debt is 250 milliards ; in 3 months, our debts will be as high as our total assets.

You, Field-Marshal, know that all theories which maintain that this means nothing and that a pernicious economy based on debt can go on unpunished are sheer nonsense. No, the German people is faced with the decision either to declare itself bankrupt ; then, we have all lost everything and industry has no capital. As this is an impossible situation because it would mean revolution on the largest scale, those whose money is invested in real estate must part with some of this, in order to finance the firms which must be kept going in order to maintain economy and avert revolution. Thus everyone will be poor. Or, the German people can again disguise the truth and start on the road to inflation by incurring further debts and by letting things go on as they are doing now. In the end, this would come to the same as the other. For the chances of 1923 will not occur a 2nd time.

Even now, the difficulties of maintaining life of the German people for War and Peace are tremendous. For the whole of Europe has been thoroughly ruined by Hitler's madness. In 1918, Norway, Denmark and Holland, at least, were intact. To-day, every European country is to a great extent laid waste, robbed of its supplies and its gold and currency ruined. One can be seized with holy rage when one hears how frivolously even well-educated people talk of reconstruction after the War. It fills one with horror that cultured people are simply living from day to day at the expense of a universe which is collapsing and content themselves with the thought that we have not yet collapsed, fondly imagining that this can go on.

The transition to peace-time conditions when millions of soldiers have lost the habit of work and are looking for homes and jobs and finding only ruins can only come about if we have as the basis of our action a moral, idealist conception which will seize men's minds and lift them above the material difficulties and if we can win the people over to this.

To-day, the bonds of morality have been torn away ; what is left is merely convention. Anyone who travels, as I do, almost constantly see what is going on, for example, in the big hotels. He can see officers who have nothing in common with our good officer class ; he can see young louts with a Party badge who talk victory but never think of doing their duty as soldiers. Even in the " Wehrmacht ", the bases of morality must be shattered, because the religious background has been forsaken and comrade can denounce comrade behind his back without himself being treated as a scoundrel. The introduction of the special Court into the military tribunal, the penetration of the Army with secret agents, speak volumes. A week ago, I heard a report by a SS soldier, aged 18½ , who had previously been a decent lad, but who now said calmly that " it wouldn't be exactly a very pleasant thing to machine gun trenches filled with thousands of Jews and, then, to throw earth over their quivering bodies ". What has become of the proud army of the Wars of Liberation and of the Emperor Wilhelm the 1st ? But the people know and feel this with a certainty which is admirable and instinctive, and which, thank God, still exists. For God's sake, Field-Marshal, do not be deceived when you are told the people believe the lies which are forced down their throats. The people despise these lies and hate those who spread them abroad. That is the truth. It will break forth with all the greater force the longer people try to surpass it. But it will go hard with all those with responsibility.

Hitler has made his 5th military blunder in the South. He is pouring German soldiers and valuable arms into Sicily, whereas reason must tell him that Italy can no longer be saved. The squandering of German strength, the useless sacrifice of German soldiers is a crime ; for even the time gained by defending Sicily means nothing. The secret hints of powerful new weapons are, according to my enquiries, mere irresponsible chatter, for even if these new weapons are really ready one day, they will not alter the decision which has been reached already in men's minds-quite apart from the fact that the enemy has just as effective weapons. Thus, from the military angle, the same mistake is being made as in 1918 - only more senselessly ; one has not the courage to face the inevitable facts in time. But, in 1943, that is a great deal more fateful than 1918, for then our leaders were mentally and morally sound, whereas to-day they are insane and morally corrupt.

If there is still anyone who wants proof of this insanity, he will no longer require it when he hears that Hitler has told his entourage that his aim is the partition of Italy ! In the end, Mussolini would be forced to ask him for help, he says, then, he would perhaps appoint him Governor of Northern Italy, and make the Apennines the German frontier ! Hitler is also prepared to accord Russia (provided she makes peace) frontiers which a decent German government would not have to grant even today ; he is dreaming of another victory nearer home. In view of this national disaster which is now becoming obvious and into which we have been led by an insane and godless leadership, which disregards human rights, I take the liberty of making a last appeal to you, Field-Marshal. You may be sure that it will be the last. The hour has now come at which we must take the final decision on our personal fate. On the one hand, there is the way clearly indicated by conscience ; on the other, a different easier way. The former may have its dangers, but it is the honourable way ; the latter will lead to a disastrous end and to terrible remorse. In face of the terrible and increasing destruction of German cities, do you my dear Field-Marshal, know of yet another way to achieve victory which will (1) make it possible to hold Russia off from Europe for good, (2) force the U.S.A. and the British Empire to give-up these attacks and finally make peace ? That, from the political and military point of view, is the question with which we faced. If such a victory exists, then, the chances of it must be made clear to the German people not with lies, but with the truth, which by then must be a reality. But if there is no such victory, then, it is a sheer crime to continue the War, because there is never a heroic ending for the people, but simply the necessity to go on living.

I have again ascertained, and I accept the responsibility for this, that there is still the possibility to conclude a favourable peace, if we Germans again make ourselves capable of taking action. It is self-evident that no statesmen in the world can negotiate with criminals and fools because he cannot lightly place the fate of his people in the hands of fools. Our own conscience too tells us that. Naturally, the possibilities are less easy to realize a year ago. They can only be exploited if the politician still has a certain time for freedom of action, that is, if he is not, as in 1918, faced overnight by the military " Diktat : we can do no more ! ". If this 2nd condition, which depends on the military authorities, is fulfilled that we can calmly and by reasonable action slow down the tempo of the War, at once, in the case of the War in the air and, gradually, in the land fighting. Anyone who to-day can tell the German people that the War in the air is over have the people behind him, and no one will dare a word or lift a finger against him. That and none other is the state of affairs.

I am at your service, no matter what the risk, for any such action which simply calls things by their proper name and deals with criminals. For this purpose, I could become an officer again if only I knew that it would ensure quick organized action. I can tell you, to-day, that I can win over to you, Field-Marshal, and to any other General resolved to take the necessary action the overwhelming majority of the German working-class, the German civil service and the German business world. I also, if you so desire, make “ Herr ” Gœbbels or “ Herr ” Himmler your ally ; for even these 2 men have long realized that, with Hitler, they are doomed.

(Gœrdeler was over-selling the extent of opposition to Hitler to Kluge here ; there is no evidence that Himmler or Gœbbels were a part of Gœrdeler's anti-Nazi circles.)

Therefore, all this is required is really a decision, bold thinking and right action. What is most dangerous and, in the end, unbearable is to shut one's ears, day after day, to the voice of conscience. In this, I am sure that you, my dear Field-Marshal, will agree with me.

You must, however, know my opportunities for action are limited in time. For many years, I have been looked upon as a militarist, an admirer of the military, as a promoter of militarism and as the friend of many Generals. I have had many an unpleasant moment in my life because of that, both after the 1st War and in recent years ; for many in Germany expected nothing of the Generals for the start. But I always took their part, saying that one could rely on their character, and their sense of responsibility. Now, it has come to this that I myself feel ridiculed and in South Germany, where I have many excellent friends, I am told that Prussian militarism is to blame for everything. They are not fools, the men who say this ; they are men who love Germany, and the German soldier, but who despair because with our eyes open, our minds working and our hearts feeling we are letting the Fatherland be led into the abyss by criminals and fools and are letting German youth and German manhood be driven unresisting to death and mutilation.

We must put an end to this state of affairs in which we allow fools to force their delusions and lies on the German people. We must make the War of conquest, started from a spirit of domination, into a War of necessary defence. We have absolutely no cause to fear Bolshevism or the Anglo-Saxons.

(Gœrdeler was playing down his anti-Communism, in order to entice Kluge into joining the conspiracy by trying to counter Nazi claims that Hitler was the world's only “ bulwark ” against the Soviet Union.)

People in those countries are the same as we are and we have much to throw into the balance. But German interests must, once again, be represented with force and reason by decent Germans.

I will not trespass any further on your time, my dear Field-Marshal ; I only ask one more answer from you, and I know what it means if you do not give me this answer. One thing I ask you ; not to refuse to answer because you are afraid. I have learned to be silent and I shall not forget the lesson. I know what I owe to the men whom I trust. Unless at least 3 or 4 men in Germany have more confidence in each other, then we go out of business.

With best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

Gørdeler. »

Kluge refused to answer Gørdeler's letter, despite the fact that Gørdeler was all but calling the Field-Marshal a coward for his refusal to join the conspiracy.

In August 1943, Gørdeler and his friend, the « Oberbürgermeister » of Stuttgart, the disillusioned « SA-Brigadeführer » Karl Strölin sent a joint memo to the « Reich » Interior Minister, the « Reichsführer SS » Heinrich Himmler complaining about the anti-Semitic and anti-Christian policies of the Nazi regime, asking for the end of the « emergency » laws that had suspended civil rights in Germany, since 1933, and called for the end of the NSDAP influence on the judiciary. Predictably enough, the memo drew the attention of the « Gestapo » , who visited both men at their homes to deliver a « final warning » telling them if they continued with « trouble-making » , they would be sent to a concentration camp. In September 1943, Gørdeler appealed to his friend Jacob Wallenberg to ask that the British suspend bombing attacks against Berlin, Stuttgart and Leipzig until the middle of October because « the oppositional movement has its centres there and the interruption of communications would make the « Putsch » more difficult » . In a memo, Gørdeler sent to the British and American governments, in the autumn of 1943, he called for a negotiated peace between the Allies and Germany, once the Nazis were overthrown. In the same memo, Gørdeler called for the « 1914 frontier » to serve as the basis of Germany's borders both in Western and Eastern Europe, called for Austria and the Sudetenland remaining part of the « Reich » , and for the annexation of the south Tyrol region of Italy. In the discussions within the German Opposition between the « Easterners » who favoured reaching an understanding with the Soviet Union after the overthrow of Hitler, and the « Westerners » who favoured reaching an understanding with Britain and the United States, Gørdeler belonged to the « Westerners » , considering Communism to be no different from National-Socialism, and regarding the « Easterners » as being dangerously naive about the Soviets.

In the summer of 1943, Gørdeler confidently told Jacob Wallenberg that the « Putsch » to depose Hitler would happen for certain « in September » , even through Gørdeler had, yet, to win-over any active-duty senior officers. After 5 years of trying, the only senior officers Gørdeler had recruited were Field Marshal Erwin von Witzleben, whom Hitler had forced into retirement in early 1942, and General Ludwig Beck, who had resigned in 1938. In September 1943, Gørdeler attended a meeting at the home of Olbricht where, together with his host Olbricht, General Beck and von Tresckow, he finally won-over the vacillating Field Marshal Kluge into joining the conspiracy. However, no sooner than Kluge was finally persuaded to join the plot than he was badly injured in a car accident that removed him from active command. As Gørdeler gloomily noted, Kluge's successor, Field Marshal Ernst Busch, was a convinced National-Socialist who was clearly not « verschwörungsfähig » (plot-worthy) .

In the autumn of 1943, Gørdeler met Colonel Count Claus von Stauffenberg. The 2 men took an immediate dislike to each other. Gørdeler wrote that Stauffenberg « revealed himself as a cranky, obstinate fellow who wanted to play politics. I had many a row with him, but greatly esteemed him. He wanted to steer a dubious political course with the Left-leaning Socialists and Communists, and gave me a bad time with his overwhelming egoism. » Gørdeler, who had been the unofficial leader of the German opposition since 1937, resented the efforts of Stauffenberg, who he regarded as a dangerous « Romantic socialist » , to take-over the conspiracy. Stauffenberg, for his part, saw Gørdeler as the leader of « the revolution of the greybeards » . Stauffenberg saw Gørdeler as an out-of-touch reactionary, a man living in the past, whose plans to restore the monarchy were simply not relevant to the modern world. Moreover, Stauffenberg was an « Easterner » who favoured making contacts with the underground KPD, and wished for a post-Nazi Germany to ally herself with the Soviet Union ; Gørdeler, by contrast, was a « Westerner » and, thus, a resolute anti-Communist and wanted a post-Nazi Germany to align herself with the Western powers. Despite his differences with Stauffenberg, Gørdeler did appreciate Stauffenberg for solving a problem that had bedevilled him since 1938. Gørdeler had always assumed that, to stage a « Putsch » , required recruiting a senior military figure who could order large bodies of troops into action against the Nazi regime, and it had been the unwillingness of senior military officers to be recruited, like Kluge, who could never quite make-up his mind, or Halder who had severed relations with Gørdeler, in 1940, once he became convinced that Hitler would win the War that had prevented him from staging a « Putsch » . Stauffenberg solved that problem by devising « Operation Walkyrie » , a plan that ostensibly was meant to crush a slave labour uprising but, in reality, was the cover for a « Putsch » that could be activated by officers of less than senior rank. Gørdeler was pleased that, at long last, the means for a « Putsch » without the senior officers who were plainly not willing to break with the regime had been devised by Stauffenberg, but his uneasy relations with Stauffenberg were described by the German historian Hans Mommsen as one of mutual « misunderstandings » .

Unlike the « Kreisau Circle » , Gørdeler was a strong champion of « laissez-faire » capitalism, and was very much opposed to what he saw as the socialism of the « Kreisau Circle » . In Gørdeler's vision, this economic system was to serve as the basis of the « democracy of the 10 Commandments » . However, Gørdeler was heavily criticised by other members of the German resistance (for example, by some members the « Kreisau Circle ») for objecting to killing Hitler (whom Gørdeler wanted to see tried ; Gørdeler had no objection to Hitler being executed after his conviction) , for his sympathy for re-introducing monarchy, and for his extremely anti-communist ideology. In late February 1944, Gørdeler sent Strölin to meet Field Marshal Erwin Rommel to see if he would like to join the anti-Nazi conspiracy, and was delighted when Strölin gave him a positive report about Rommel's attitude towards the conspiracy. Gørdeler decided that Rommel would be the ideal person to play a leading role in a post-Hitler government and asked Strölin to find-out if Rommel would be willing to play that role. As Rommel was fully engaged in preparations to resist the expected Allied landing in France all through the spring of 1944, it proved difficult for Strölin to make contact again. After meeting Gørdeler, in March 1944, Strölin described him in a high-strung state, constantly afraid that he could be arrested at any moment, and anxious to recruit Rommel while attempting to juggle Rommel's demand that he be « Wehrmacht » Commander-in-Chief with his prior promise that position would go to Erwin von Witzleben if Hitler were overthrown. Not until May could a meeting be arranged to sort-out where Rommel stood, in regards to the conspiracy.

On May 27, 1944, Gørdeler attended a secret meeting with Strölin, the former Foreign Minister Baron Konstantin von Neurath and General Hans Speidel (who was representing Rommel) at Speidel's flat, in Freudenstadt. At the meeting, Speidel speaking on behalf of Rommel made clear that his chief wanted nothing to do with any attempt to assassinate Hitler, but was prepared to serve in a government headed by Gørdeler. Later, in 1944, Gørdeler told Kunrath von Hammerstein that : « In those days, your father stood at the helm of world history. » , by which Gørdeler meant that, if General Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord had carried-out a « Putsch » in 1933, then the present state of world troubles, in 1944, might have been avoided.

A latter-day controversy about Gørdeler concerns his attitude towards anti-Semitism. Some historians, such as Christof Dipper and Martin Broszat, have argued that Gørdeler agreed with the anti-Semitic policy of the regime until 1938, though, afterwards, he did resist the Holocaust and other forms of mass murder. The German historian Christof Dipper in his 1983 essay, « Der Deutsche Widerstand und die Juden » (translated into English as, « The German Resistance and the Jews ») argued that the majority of the anti-Nazi national-conservatives such as Gørdeler were anti-Semitic. Dipper wrote that, for Gørdeler and his social circle, « the bureaucratic, pseudo-legal deprivation of the Jews, practised until 1938, was still considered acceptable » . Through Dipper noted, no-one in the « Widerstand » movement supported the Holocaust, he also claimed that the national-conservatives like Gørdeler did not intend to restore civil rights to the Jews after the overthrow of Hitler. By contrast, the Canadian historian Peter Hoffmann, in his 2004 essay, « The German Resistance and the Holocaust » , has contended that Gørdeler was opposed to anti-Semitism in all forms, and that this opposition played a major role in motivating his efforts to overthrow the Nazi regime. Most recently in his 2011 book, « Carl Gørdeler and the “ Jewish Question ”, 1933-1942 » and in his 2013 book, « Karl Gørdeler gegen die Verfolgung der Juden Hoffmann » , has defended Gørdeler against the charge that he was an anti-Semite. Hoffmann quotes memoranda for Hitler, from the years 1934-1939, in which Gørdeler urged the government to change its « Jewish policy » as a matter of justice and national interests ; Gørdeler argued that Germany could enjoy good relations with Britain, France and the United States only if the policies concerning « the “ Jewish Question ”, the “ Free-Masons' Question ”, legal security, the “ Church Question ” » were changed. He beleaguered the British government, before the War, to pressure Hitler to alleviate his « Jewish policy » . In 1941, he proposed that the League of Nations found a Jewish State that would extend Jewish citizenship to all Jews in the world. Since Germans, according to the German citizenship law of 1913, lost their German citizenship by acquiring another citizenship, Gørdeler declared that, for German Jews, there must be 4 categories of « exceptions » to this rule. Analysis of population, emigration, immigration and naturalization statistics shows that Gørdeler's proposal guaranteed German citizenship to at least 94 % of German Jews, while sustaining the legal fiction of « exceptions » . Gørdeler, thus, intended to protect, if possible, all German Jews against the loss of their German citizenship ; the few who did not fall into one of Gørdeler's categories of « exceptions » could have applied, under the 1913 German citizenship law, for re-instatement. As a leading civilian anti-Hitler conspiracy leader, Gørdeler worked tirelessly to bring about the pre-condition for his proposals' implementation : the overthrow of the Nazi government. The Israeli historian Danny Orbach in his 2010 book, « Walkyrie : Hahitnagdut Hagermanit Lehitler » (Walkyrie : Germans Against Hitler) defended Gørdeler against the charge that he was an anti-Semite by noting Gørdeler's strong support for Zionism and his work with Chaim Weizmann, in encouraging German Jews to move to the British Mandate for Palestine. In a recent article, Orbach also argued that Dipper's accusations of anti-Semitism are based on a misreading, if not distortion, of Gørdeler's memoranda, thus ignoring Gørdeler's plan to restore emancipation to the German Jews and securing a national homeland for their Polish brethren. The Israeli historian Tom Segev has dismissed Orbach's claims that Gørdeler was a philo-Semitic, stating that Gørdeler was an anti-Semitic who supported Zionism only because he disliked the idea of German Jews living in Germany, and much preferred if they all move to Palestine. The Israeli historian David Bankier wrote, in 2002, that Gørdeler was appalled by the Holocaust and was sincerely against the Nazis, but for him, Jews were not and never could be Germans and, instead, were an alien, foreign element who would just had be relocated from Germany whatever they liked it or not. Bankier wrote that Gørdeler felt that the « Final Solution to the Jewish Question » was going too far and would have to be stopped, but « for Gørdeler, the solution of the Jewish question after the War was the establishment of a Jewish State, in parts of Canada or South America, and granting German citizenship only to a small, elitist minority of Jews willing to assimilate completely » .

In May 1944, Gørdeler revived his idea of 1943 of talking Hitler into resigning as a way of achieving a peaceful end to Nazi Germany. Again, Gørdeler proposed to meet with Hitler, explain to him why his leadership was defective, and hope that Hitler would resign and appoint Gørdeler his successor. Again, it took considerable effort on the part of Gørdeler's friends to talk him out of this plan, which they considered to be as bizarre as it was impractical. The British historian Ian Kershaw commented Gørdeler's plans to talk Hitler into resigning reflected a certain lack of realism on his part. In June 1944, Gørdeler finished his final Cabinet list. Had the « Putsch » of 20 July 1944 succeeded, the Cabinet that would have taken power included the following :

President of Germany (« Regent-Reichsverweser ») : Colonel General Ludwig Beck.

State Secretary to the Regent : Ulrich Wilhelm Graf Schwerin von Schwanenfeld.

Chancellor : Karl Gørdeler (DNVP) .

State Secretary to the Chancellor : Count Peter Yorck von Wartenburg.

Vice-Chancellor : Wilhelm Leuschner (SPD) .

Deputy Vice-Chancellor : Jakob Kaiser (Christian Trade Union leader) .

Minister of War : General Friedrich Olbricht.

State Secretary to the Minister of War : Colonel Count Claus von Stauffenberg.

Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces : Field Marshal Erwin von Witzleben.

Commander in Chief of the Army : Colonel General Erich Hoepner.

Minister of the Interior : Julius Leber (SPD) .

Minister of Economics : Doctor Paul Lejeune-Jung (lawyer and economist) .

Minister of Finance : Ewald Loeser (DNVP) .

Minister of Justice : Joseph Wirmer (« Zentrum ») .

Minister of Education : Eugen Bolz (« Zentrum ») .

Minister of Agriculture : Andreas Hermes (« Zentrum ») .

Minister of Reconstruction : Bernhard Letterhaus (Christian Trade Union leader) .

Minister of Information : Theodor Haubach (SPD) .

The position of Minister of Foreign Affairs would have gone to either Ulrich von Hassell (former ambassador to Italy) or Count Friedrich Werner von der Schulenburg (former ambassador to the Soviet Union) depending upon whether the Western powers or the Soviet Union signed an armistice with the new German government. In the radio address, Gørdeler planned to deliver, once the « Putsch » had triumphed, was included the statement :

« The persecution of the Jews, which has been carried-out in the most inhuman, deeply shaming and quite irreparable ways, is to cease. »

On 16 July 1944, Gørdeler saw his wife and children for the last time, in Leipzig, and then departed for Berlin to prepare for the « Putsch » planned for later that month. In the days preceding the « Putsch » attempt of 20 July 1944, Gørdeler stayed at the home of General Beck, in the Berlin suburb of « Lichterfelde » . Unlike Beck, Gørdeler was very confident of the success of the planned « Putsch » , and in a most optimistic mood. On 17 July 1944, a warrant for Gørdeler's arrest was issued, causing him to go into hiding. Gørdeler spent the day of the « Putsch » hiding-out at the Estate of his friend, Baron Palombrini, in an anxious and agitated state, listening obsessively to the radio for news of success. Following the failure of the 20 July « Putsch » , the « Gestapo » searched the room in which Gørdeler had been hiding-out in the « Anhalter Bahnhof » hotel, in which they discovered a vast collection of documents relating to the « Putsch » such as the text of Gørdeler's planned radio address to the German people as Chancellor. Much to Gørdeler's deep disappointment, it was Army troops led by Major Otto Ernst Remer rather than the SS who crushed the « Putsch » of 20 July, marking the final time Gørdeler's hopes in the Army were to be dashed.

Gørdeler managed to escape from Berlin, but he was apprehended on 12 August 1944 after being denounced by an inn-keeper named Lisbeth Schwaerzel, in Marienwerder (modern Kwidzyn, Poland) , while visiting the grave of his parent. After his arrest, 8 members of Gørdeler's family were sent to the concentration camps under the « Sippenhaft » law. His brother Fritz was also sentenced to death and executed on 1 March 1945. Under « Gestapo » interrogation, Gørdeler claimed that the Holocaust was the major reason for his seeking to overthrow the Nazi regime. On 9

September 1944, after a trial at the People's Court, he was sentenced to death. Gørdeler was not physically tortured by the « Gestapo », and freely co-operated with the « Gestapo » in naming names, which made him the object of a considerable hatred from the other prisoners, who saw him as a « spineless rat ». Gørdeler's friend, the historian Gerhard Ritter who shared the same prison with him, reported that Gørdeler was never tortured, but was instead subjected to « the overheating of cells, painfully tight shackling especially at night, bright light shining on one's face while one tried to sleep, completely insufficient food ». One prisoner recalled that Gørdeler was often « groaning aloud from hunger ». Gørdeler's hope in confessing all was to overload the « Gestapo » with information and, thereby, buy time to save his life and the others imprisoned ; in the process, he caused hundreds involved in the plot to be arrested. During his time in prison, Gørdeler was asked by the SS to assist with writing the constitution of a future SS-ruled Germany. Gørdeler agreed, and often met with Otto Ohlendorf and Doctor Mäding of the SD to provide his advice. Whether Gørdeler was sincere in wishing to help the SS or just trying to buy time to save his life remains unclear. When confronted with the loneliness of his imprisonment and the utter defeat of his cause, Gørdeler, who had always been a highly-devout Lutheran, became increasingly preoccupied with spiritual matters. Gørdeler was overwhelmed with despair over what he considered to be the triumph of evil and the destruction of all that he loved. Gørdeler's friend, the historian Gerhard Ritter, saw Gørdeler in prison, in January 1945, and reported :

« I was astonished at his undiminished intellectual power but, at the same time, I was shocked by his outward appearance. It was a man grown old who stood before me, shackled hand and foot, in the same light summer clothes as had on when captured, shabby and collarless, face thin and drawn, strangely different. But it was his eyes that shocked me the most. They were once bright grey eyes and had flashed beneath the heavy eyebrows ; that had always been the most impressive thing about him. Now, there was no light in them ; they were like the eyes of a blind man, yet, like nothing I had seen before. His intellectual power was as it had always been ; his spiritual strength was not. His natural cheerfulness had gone ; his look seemed turned inward. What I beheld was a man with the weariness of death in his soul. »

While Gørdeler was on death row, he wrote a letter which called the Holocaust the very worst of Nazi crimes. But, at the same time, Gørdeler remained anti-Semitic. In his « Thoughts of a Man condemned to Death », written towards the end of 1944 in prison, Gørdeler wrote :

« We should not attempt to minimize what has been happening, but we should also emphasize the great guilt of the Jews, who had invaded our public life in ways that lacked customary restraint. »

He was finally executed by hanging, on 2 February 1945, at Plötzensee Prison, in Berlin. While awaiting his death sentence, Gørdeler wrote a farewell letter, which ended with :

« I ask the world to accept our martyrdom as penance for the German people. »

...

The 2nd principal Resistance leader, Karl Gørdeler, was the Mayor of Leipzig, from 1930 to 1936, a candidate for «

Reich » Chancellor, in 1932, and « Reich » Prices Commissioner, during the years 1931 to 1932 and 1934 to 1935. He opposed the National-Socialists from the beginning. By 1939, he was the acknowledged civilian leader of the Resistance. He was hanged on 2 February 1945. Some say that Gørdeler had little or no objection to Hitler's anti-Jewish policies. An examination of the documents reveals that the opposite is true. While Gørdeler was waiting for his execution in prison, in 1944, he wrote in retrospective notes that he had initially worked loyally with the National-Socialist government. He believed even then that, given the opportunity, he could persuade Hitler to see reason and to end the War. He based this belief upon an interview he had had with Hitler, in 1935, during which he had won Hitler over to his own view on some point of economic policy.

But, in matters concerning Jews, Gørdeler had never worked loyally with the National-Socialist government. In fact, he had intervened, in April 1933, against the national boycott. In full formal dress, he had confronted the Storm-Troopers (SA) when they harassed and attacked Jews and businesses belonging to Jews. He had used the Leipzig police to liberate Jews who had been detained and beaten by the SA. Gørdeler's critics do not mention these actions. They say, instead, that Gørdeler had signed a list of names of physicians who were excluded from practice because they were Jews, and, that this demonstrated his anti-Jewish attitude. The facts are a little complicated, but they are quite different.

A government decree of 1933 excluded from practice under public health-insurance plans Communist physicians, and « non-Aryan » physicians, unless they were World War veterans or sons or fathers of World War veterans. A decree of 1934 excluded physicians from approbation if they were descended from one or more Jewish grandparents, or if they were married to « non-Aryans » . But physicians who had been previously admitted to practice under medical insurance plans did not lose their approbation. On 9 April 1935, in contravention of these regulations, Gørdeler's Deputy Mayor, Rudolf Haake, a National-Socialist, warned civil servants in the municipal administration against consulting any Jewish physicians. Now, the « Landesverbandes Mitteldeutschland des Centralvereins Deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens eingetragener Verein » (Saxon Association of the Central Association of German Citizens of Jewish Faith) complained against the Nazi Deputy Mayor and asked Gørdeler to stop the unlawful boycott. On 11 April, Gørdeler signed an internal memorandum which listed « non-Aryan » physicians who were permitted by law to treat patients under the public health-insurance regime, and those who were legally not permitted to practice. The facts are then : the Association invoked the legal position, and Gørdeler confirmed the legal position. The National-Socialists attempted to exclude all Jews from practice. Gørdeler protected those who were not excluded by law.

Then, there was the matter of the Mendelssohn statue. It had been placed in front of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » concert-hall, in 1892, in honour of its former director, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy was a Christian, but considered a Jew by the National-Socialists because of his descent. The Nazi Deputy Mayor Haake pressed Gørdeler to remove the statue, especially so in the spring of 1936. Gørdeler said no. After more pressure, he agreed, in July 1936, that moving the statue to another distinguished public location might be discussed, but he postponed the discussion to some undetermined time after the summer. In the autumn of 1936, Gørdeler followed an invitation of the German Chamber of Commerce to travel to Finland. Before he left, he secured high-level support from Propaganda Minister Josef Gøebbels and from Hitler for his decision to leave the monument in place, and he instructed Deputy Mayor Haake accordingly. But while Gørdeler was out of town, Haake had the statue removed. When Gørdeler had returned and demanded an explanation, Haake accused him of not sharing the National-Socialist Party's view on the Jews. Haake declared that the matter of the statue was « only the outward occasion of the conflict » , and that « Doctor Gørdeler's attitude in the Jewish Question had been revealed particularly clearly in the matter of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue » . Since Gørdeler could not dismiss Haake, he could only himself resign in protest. The removal of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue was the incident Gørdeler chose for his resignation, and the Nazi Deputy Mayor accepted it as a gesture on precisely this point.

Some dispute this and argue that Gørdeler had objected only to Haake's insubordination, and that Haake's accusations against Gørdeler were a cover for Haake's own disobedience. But Gørdeler's further actions, on behalf of the Jews, make that a highly-implausible explanation, and, contrary to the critics' intent, they conclusively prove his commitment to helping the Jews. In 1938, Gørdeler sought the aid of a foreign power for the purpose of saving the Jews from persecution and, thereby, committed treason (« Landesverrat ») under existing German statute law.

At the request of the British government's Chief Diplomatic Advisor, Sir Robert Vansittart, the British industrialist A. P. Young, who had business and personal links with the Robert Bosch electrical-technology company in Stuttgart, met with Gørdeler, in August 1938, in Rauschen Dune, a village on the Baltic Sea, north of Königsberg. Speaking with Young, Gørdeler urged the British government to refuse to discuss the vital issues that Germany was interested in resolving if the practices against the Jews continued. In early November 1938, German authorities drove 10,000 Polish Jews across the German frontier with Poland, Poland refused to admit them, and they were marooned in no-man's-land for days. On 6 and 7 November, 2 days before the Pogrom in Germany, Gørdeler met with Young for the 2nd time, in Switzerland. He declared his concern at the lack of any strong reaction in the democracies against the barbaric persecution of 10,000 Polish Jews in Germany. In December 1938 and in January 1939, Gørdeler again met with Young, again in Switzerland. Gørdeler said the Pogrom of November 1938 had been ordered by Hitler. He urged the British government that as soon as « the new persecution of the Jews is started, it is absolutely essential to break diplomatic relations » with Germany. He warned that Hitler was determined to conquer the world, and that Hitler had « decided to destroy the Jews-Christianity-Capitalism » .

Later, in 1941, the deportation of Jews from Germany and mass killings in camps began. Gørdeler now drafted proposals to treat Jews who had been German citizens, or whose ancestors had been German citizens before 1871, as Germans, and to consider Jews who themselves or whose ancestors had not lived within the borders of the German Empire before 1 July 1871, as nationals of a yet to-be-founded Jewish State. It seems outrageous to suggest depriving Jews who were naturalized Germans of their citizenship. But Gørdeler obviously tried to offer an alternative to deportation and murder. His proposal would have restored German citizenship to German Jews with German descent of long standing, and it would have removed lately naturalized German Jews from German jurisdiction and thus protected them. Gørdeler tried desperately to persuade the murderers to accept a relatively less harmful alternative to murder. In view of Gørdeler's actions, on behalf of both German and Polish Jews, it is impossible to suggest that he ever intended any injury to Jewish rights. In January 1942, Gørdeler wrote a memorandum to brand the cruelties of the deportation of the Jews of Leipzig.

Karl Gørdeler found himself in a « dynamic situation » . In April 1933, when SA thugs were maltreating Jews in Leipzig, Gørdeler, as mayor of Leipzig, went in formal dress to a Jewish quarter of his city to protect Jews and their businesses, and he used the city police to free Jews who had been detained and beaten by SA stormtroopers.

In the same month, the government issued anti-Jewish laws and a cluster of anti-Jewish decrees, such as the civil-service law that barred Jews from government and administrative positions, at every level and of every kind, from teaching positions in all educational and scientific establishments, from primary schools to Universities and academies, and barred converted former Jews from the Catholic and Lutheran clergy. A decree excluded « non-Aryan » physicians who (or whose fathers and sons) were not World War veterans and Communist physicians from practice under the public health system. In May 1934, the government excluded from approbation physicians who had one or more Jewish grandparents, and also non-Jewish physicians who were married to a « non-Aryan » ; physicians previously admitted to practice under public health-insurance plans did not lose their approbation. In July 1934, when a national law required the establishment of a « race authority » within the municipal health commissions, Gørdeler resisted official and unofficial pressures for several months, but was finally forced, in January 1935, to accept this since it was the law. On 9 April 1935, Gørdeler received a complaint from the Central-German Association of the Central Association of German Citizens of Jewish Faith (« Landesverband Mitteldeutschland des Centralvereins deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens eingetragener Verein ») against the Leipzig deputy mayor, Hans Rudolf Haake, a National-Socialist, who had advised all municipal administrators and employees against consulting Jewish physicians.

Here, Gørdeler immediately acted against this unlawful boycott attempt. On 11 April 1935, he signed a list of « non-Aryan » physicians who were not excluded by law from practice under public health-insurance plans and of those who were legally excluded, and he circulated the list in the Leipzig municipal administration. Gørdeler could not break the law, regardless of whether he considered it just, but he could and did confirm the legal position and the protection it provided for those whom the law had not excluded from practice or approbation.

In 1936, the matter of access for Jews to municipal public baths became an issue. There had been restrictions on access to public baths imposed on Jews as early as 1933 in Tübingen, Plauen, Nuremberg, Erlangen, and Munich. The central government in Berlin and the NSDAP leadership, at the time, opposed the general expansion of measures separating Jews from non-Jews out of internal and foreign-political considerations. The NSDAP leadership ordered the repeal of these restrictions, to little effect, but they tolerated local initiatives restricting access to public baths, sports facilities, libraries, and hospitals. The « Deutsche Gemeindetag » ignored the lack of a positive government directive and told inquiring municipalities that they could make any rules they wished. When the « Völkischer Beobachter » of 19 July 1936 reported that the mayor (« Oberbürgermeister ») of Breslau, Doctor Hans Fridrich, had forbidden German Jews the use of municipal baths, numerous municipalities followed the example. The files in the Leipzig City Archives reveal that Haake sought to give force to that unofficial practice in Leipzig. The ultimate responsibility, here, rested with Gørdeler. From a post-Auschwitz point of view, one may wish that Gørdeler had taken a more principled position in this matter, but we do not know his considerations, only that the restriction had been issued without his approval. He may have decided not to resign yet, or not over this issue rather than one of potentially greater public appeal ; he certainly still hoped to influence government policy, at a higher-level and in larger issues. The records reveal no further personal involvement by Gørdeler other than his answer on 19 September 1936 to an inquiry from the Saxon section of the National Conference of Municipalities. He wrote, using the passive voice in the 3rd person that, from the end of July 1935, Jews had been prohibited from using the Leipzig municipal summer baths, indoor pools, and other communal baths. The date of Gørdeler's reply may help to explain its mild form ; it was 4 days after he had received the complaint, and 2 days after he had submitted his long memorandum on the economy to Hermann Gøring. Gørdeler was a prominent figure on the national political stage. From 1934 to 1935, he held « high national office » in the economic-policy field. He ultimately renounced the possibility of regaining his office as « Reich » Prices Commissioner when Hitler did not meet his demands for expanded authority.

In the summer of 1934, he wrote a memorandum on internal policy in which he demanded the consolidation of German racial policies. He addressed it to the « Reich » chancellor, as Gørdeler's biographer Gerhard Popitz, who lost his life for his part in the 20 July 1944 plot, was a jurist, from 1919, in the « Reich » Ministry of Finance ; from 1925 to 1929, as State secretary ; in 1932-1933, as « Reich » minister without portfolio ; and, from April 1933 to 20 July 1944, Prussian minister of finance. He is not on record as having questioned the government's right to define its citizens, but chaotic and unlawful arbitrariness was abhorrent to him. In 1933, 1934, and 1935, Popitz was concerned with the rule of law and orderly procedures, and with ending the extra-legal and unpredictable hooliganism of SA troopers and individual Party functionaries. An uncompromising protest against these persecutions could have led only to retirement and inactivity ; the chance of achieving anything lay in attempting to work within the existing system.

In March 1933, Popitz sent a draft for the « Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service » to vice-Chancellor Franz von Papen (a different version became law, on 7 April 1933) . Apparently, Popitz agreed that the government should have the ability, if it wished to do so, to remove Communists and Jews from the civil service. A meeting of ministers, on 5 May 1933, including Popitz and chaired by the Prussian minister president Hermann Gøring discussed details of the law's implementation, and the protocol declared unanimous agreement with the proposals, in particular with Popitz' suggestion that civil servants could be retired with full pension rights but without being given reasons, so that neither political nor « racial » reasons would be given, thereby, avoiding any defamation.

In discussions preceding and during the preparations for the Nuremberg Race Laws, on 20 August 1935, Popitz said he wished « that the government set a clear limit (it did not matter where) for the treatment of the Jews but, then, firmly see to it that the limit be respected » . In stark contrast with this seemingly conformist position, Popitz wrote his deep convictions into constitutional drafts and laws prepared about 1940, for the time after Hitler's fall, toward which he conspired with others ; here, Popitz stipulated the complete removal of the measures discriminating against Jews.

After his arrest for having participated in the conspiracy to overthrow the regime, the « Gestapo » quoted Popitz as having agreed that the Jews should be removed from positions in the State and in the economy, but that he had recommended a more gradual method, especially because of foreign-policy considerations. Whether Popitz had personally agreed with and approved restrictions upon Jews does not, on close scrutiny, emerge from this summary interrogation report. It contains Popitz' acknowledgment of the position he had taken, in 1935. The vulgar language of the German « Gestapo » report shows, however, that it contains the formulations of the interrogator ; only under torture could Popitz have signed or agreed to them. His alleged expression of his « approval of the National-Socialist State in every way » is blatantly incorrect ; Popitz himself contradicted it in his testimony at his trial in the « People's Court » , on 3 October 1944, saying that « the manner and speed of the solution of the “ Jewish Question ” » had caused his « inner detachment from National-Socialism » . He disagreed with the manner of the « solution of the Jewish Question » , namely, discrimination, humiliation, robbery, forced emigration, mistreatment, and mass murder. He disagreed with the method and, therefore, with the « solution » . Popitz was hanged, on 2 February 1945, on the same day as Karl Gørdeler.

Gørdeler demanded, in his 1934 memorandum on German internal policy, adherence to Bismarck's maxim that all internal policy actions must be examined for their foreign-policy consequences. He demanded a « consolidation » of German racial policies and insisted that decisions about internal actions and their desirability from the foreign-policy point of view must be the domain of the Foreign Ministry, not, for example, of the Propaganda Ministry, and he concluded :

« What the law has put in place will be understood as self-protection and barely questioned abroad if, in this framework, everything now transacts itself with iron discipline and avoiding excesses and pedantism. »

In view of international law and the positions taken by the Western Powers in this matter, Gørdeler's assumption that, « What the law has put in place will be understood as self-protection and barely questioned abroad » was no doubt realistic. At the same time, he made clear his general rejection of racial policies by laughing at them :

« If, in the field of art, for example, we dislike Mendelssohn's composition “ The Creation ”, we should not perform it, but we should not announce that, for reasons of racial policy, it must be replaced by another. We might badly embarrass ourselves here, for it is rather possible that no living German composer could produce a better composition. »

On the whole, however, in the interest of gaining acceptance for his moderate and rational ideas, Gørdeler attempted to strike a sympathetic note in his memorandum, as when he welcomed Hitler's expressed wish to avoid conflict with the Catholic Church. Confident of his access to the highest levels of power, that is, to Hitler, particularly during his 2nd term as « Reich » Prices Commissioner, from 5 November 1934 to 1 July 1935, Gørdeler nevertheless expressed his criticisms clearly.

On 7 August 1936, General Hermann Göring, minister-president of Prussia, asked Gørdeler for his views on the foreign-currency and raw-materials situation. Gørdeler submitted a preliminary memorandum, on 31 August, and a longer, more elaborate version, on 17 September. In both, he advised austerity, slowing re-armament, and fiscal responsibility. Now, he fell-out of favour.

In his memoranda of 31 August - 17 September 1936, Gørdeler also said that he saw a « grand opportunity » to end the international currency turmoil and to win a great moral victory by reaching agreement with the « Western Powers » , particularly, England and France. He declared himself convinced that England and France would make available to Germany, at low interest rates, the necessary gold to stabilise the German currency, but that they would not come to an agreement with Germany, unless certain other issues were also resolved. He made this point in the preliminary version of his memorandum, explicitly citing, in the following order, the « Jewish Question », the « Free-Masons Question », legal security, the « Church Question » (« die Judenfrage », die « Logenfrage », die « Rechtssicherheit », die « Kirchenfrage ») and, even more explicitly and strongly in the long version :

« One must reckon with “ very decided wishes ”, on the part of England and France.

I do not doubt that England and France have certain wishes in another area. I could imagine that we must bring into a certain greater agreement with imponderable views of other nations some questions such as the “ Jewish Question ”, the “ Free-Masons’ Question ”, legal security, the “ Church Question ”. But I assert that these sacrifices are nothing “ vis-a-vis ” the course of events that begins if we do not now come to the only decision for which an alternative decision of any kind does not at all exist. »

German fiscal soundness and an orderly budgetary and debt management were indispensable. It will be necessary temporarily to reduce the tempo of re-armament.

But, he declared in the longer version, the wishes of England and France will go farther.

« It is a fact that there are, in place, governments with other views there, and there are issues in which great discord has emerged. Well-known are the concerns about the treatment of the “ Jewish Question ”, the “ Free-Masons’ Question ”, the “ Church Question ”. But since, in the experience of world history, it has commonly always been less a question of fundamentals than of method and since the honour, liberty and existence of the German people are priorities since, moreover apparently, there now exists the possibility to bring-up for negotiation with good prospects of success our colonial demands and since, in any case, we need time for quiet re-armament, so certain sacrifices in forms seem to me nothing considering the course of events which will occur with certainty if we do not now reach the decision which is now required. Having reviewed my preliminary report, I cannot see that there could be any alternative decision which was apt to lead us out of our situation. It is the same in economic and political life as in the military. Certain situations demand one decision and none other. If the one is not taken, success will not be achieved. More, however, is at issue here ; it is not the question of achieving or not achieving a success, but the issue is that every wrong decision must bring us into ever more untenable positions. Almost daily now, I am receiving emergency messages from businesses of the free economy and from my administration which point to the consequences of the increasing scarcity of raw materials. »

Gørdeler knew that Göring was in charge of the 4 Year Plan, and that this plan included some form of autarky policy. He knew also that the plan aimed at achieving the utmost speed in War preparations. He agreed that military intervention against Poland would be necessary to regain formerly German territory, and he conceded that armaments were necessary. He tried to show, however, that they could not be accomplished without changing the treatment of the Jews and other groups who had incurred the hatred of the Nazis. He put the Jews 1st, in his list. The boycott against German business and industry had an effect, of course, but Gørdeler did not cite this, as he very well could have done. He chose to cite « very decided wishes », on the part of England and France, that went beyond any insistence on German fiscal soundness and an orderly budgetary and debt management.

« It is a fact that there are, in place, governments with other views (in England and France) , and question Gørdeler out of his inner-self would never understand him and his fellow Party members. »

In the matter of the Mendelssohn monument :

« It was not material but ideologic principles that were decisive. »

He asserted that the Leipzig Party officials and City Council were unanimous on his, Haake's, side and that they and the public were incensed about Gørdeler's resistance and considered his resistance « weakness » . Haake stressed that « the real cause lay in Doctor Gørdeler's world-view which was the opposite of National-Socialism » , that Gørdeler had criticised and opposed most National-Socialist policies, since 1933 - and that the issue of the Statue was « only the outward occasion of the conflict » .

It might be argued that Haake used these accusations to justify his own insubordination, and that Haake only construed a link between Gørdeler's attitude in the « Jewish Question » and the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue. Gørdeler, however, had used the example of Mendelssohn earlier, in 1934, in the context of his rejection of racial policies. Even more important is the fact that Gørdeler had taken his position on the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue before it had become an issue of his authority over that of his deputy through Haake's insubordination. And, in the same time frame, in September 1936, Gørdeler had demanded a change of policy in the « Jewish Question » at the highest-level of government. This fact, that the larger context of Gørdeler's actions aimed at protecting Jews, makes the argument that it was a matter of injured authority untenable.

Haake, for his part, wrote from conviction. On 4 December 1936, he wrote to the Saxon governor (« Reichsstatthalter ») and the Party's regional leader (« Gauleiter ») Martin Mutschmann that, from the beginning of his association with Mayor Gørdeler, he noted :

« Again and again, that the latter made an effort to work within the thought system of National-Socialism, but that he never quite succeeded. »

And that Gørdeler lacked « the great faith » that National-Socialists own in all decisive questions ; just as Gørdeler, in 1933, doubted that the National-Socialist government would last long, so he also doubted the appropriateness of the various measures - whether it was re-armament, the remilitarisation of the Rhineland, or economic decisions, Doctor Gørdeler was invariably pessimistic. From the middle of the year, Doctor Gørdeler had been increasingly pessimistic. He had criticised the national financial policies most severely, predicting a catastrophe, and considered the foreign-currency and raw-materials situation as particularly dire. Haake, he continued, had read Gørdeler's memorandum for Göring, and it reflected the same pessimistic mentality. For any measure to be taken, Gørdeler wanted, at least, a 51 % chance of success. National-Socialists cannot work with such a man in view of the great tasks that must be accomplished in future. Gørdeler showed no understanding for the National-Socialist position in the « Churches' Question » .

« Doctor Gørdeler's attitude in the " Jewish Question " had been revealed extraordinarily clearly in the matter of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue. As I wrote, he has made extraordinary difficulties not only in the matter of the Mendelssohn monument, but in all cases of re-naming streets named after a Jew. If he now took the occasion of the matter of the Mendelssohn monument to ask to be pensioned, I am firmly convinced that the causes lie much deeper. »

Haake also surmised that Gørdeler's frustrated ambition to again be named « Reich » Prices Commissioner was involved, and that Gørdeler may have felt, in the face of the successes of National-Socialism, that his own very different views were no longer sustainable.

When Mutschmann installed Gørdeler's successor, the Leipzig National-Socialist county leader (« Kreisleiter ») Walter Donicke, he said that Leipzig as a world-rank city had to have a National-Socialist mayor. Gørdeler wrote to Mutschmann from New York, on 23 November 1937, to explain the reasons for his resignation, listing 1st the removal of the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy statue and the refusal of the Saxon Ministry of the Interior to take the action against Haake that Gørdeler had to demand to preserve his authority. In consequence, Gørdeler concluded, he was forced to resign his office. He had not the power to simply have the statue brought back, and so, he had lost both, a point of principle and his authority. The issue of his authority forced him to resign, although, of course, it was not the primary cause of the conflict. When Haake proposed that the City Council approve Gørdeler's request to be relieved of his office with pension, not one of the 30 Councillors who were present rose to say a word of thanks, or in Gørdeler's defence. After his resignation as mayor of Leipzig, in the autumn of 1936, effective in April 1937, Gørdeler worked in Berlin as a consultant and agent for the Robert Bosch Company of Stuttgart.

Robert Bosch and his company executives, particularly Hans Walz and Albrecht Fischer, gave support and assistance to Jews in the 1930's, in many forms through community organisations and the like. In December 1936, Karl Adler, the Jewish head of the Conservatory for Music in Stuttgart, wrote in an appeal to Hans Walz that Robert Bosch's help in critical times was « today support and assistance for thousands of the despairing German Jews » . In the case of a Frankfurt jewellery store whose Jewish co-owners wished to sell their shares and emigrate, Bosch paid a generous price and facilitated the transfer of the proceeds of the sale via Switzerland to the United States. When Karl Adler was arrested, in connection with the 9 November 1938 pogrom, Robert Bosch caused Hans Walz to intervene, and Adler was released on condition that he increase the speed of Jewish emigration as manager of the Stuttgart bureau of the Agency for Adult Education (« Mittelstelle für Erwachsenenbildung ») that Martin Buber had founded in 1934. Adler's task was enormously complicated, particularly by the fact that most assets of Jews had been confiscated, and also because the « Gestapo » had set-up an office of their own, in the agency. Robert Bosch supported Adler's work with « substantial sums » , from 1938 to 1940. This had to be done in secret, in sealed envelopes containing between 500 and 3,000 « Reichsmarks » . Many Jews had to be smuggled across the border, at a cost of about 1,000 « Reichsmarks » per person. In one spectacular case, the police and SS extorted an exorbitant sum for allowing a group of Jews to cross the Rhine into France.

In August 1937, Gørdeler travelled to Canada and the United States. Gørdeler wrote for Hitler 2 reports about his visit to Canada, and 1 lengthy one about his travels in America. He called his 1st report on Canada, dated 27 September 1937, a « Special Report ». In it, he stressed Canadian views on German policies toward the Jews and the churches, devoting one and a half pages of the not quite 4 pages of the report to Canadians' conspicuously large interest in Germany's treatment of the « Jewish Question » :

« Strikingly, the treatment of the “ Jewish Question ” meets with greater interest in Canada than in Western Europe. This astonished me all the more, since I did see negroes in Canada but no Jews. If, nevertheless, a conspicuously high-interest is focused in Canada upon the treatment of the Jews in Germany, it is because this young country displays an uncommonly high-respect for the values of humanity. »

Gørdeler, thus, characterized German policy toward the Jews as inhuman. He concluded that, if German policy-makers hoped to influence the Canadian government, they must know these facts and must accommodate the critical views of Canadians in the « Jewish Question », the « Church Question », and the « Rule-of-Law Question » .

In a report on America, dated 2 January 1938 (for Robert Bosch, Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, Hermann Göring, Hitler's adjutant Fritz Wiedemann, and Generals Werner Freiherr von Fritsch, Ludwig Beck, Franz Halder, and Georg Thomas) Gørdeler wrote that the Americans were generally understanding and friendly toward Germany. The boycott movement (initiated by the American Jewish Congress) was less noticeable the farther removed one was from its centre in New York.

While Klaus-Jürgen Müller and Ulrich von Hassell had been pursuing their various negotiations, others closely associated with Hassell were using their influence to the same ends, through other channels. These were 2 of the most famous and distinguished men of the resistance, General Ludwig Beck, a former Chief of the General Staff, and Karl Gørdeler, the former Mayor of Leipzig and a minister in Adolf Hitler's so-called Cabinet, until differences with Hermann Göring had led to his retirement, in 1937.

General Beck had openly turned against Hitler's aggressive policy, as early as 1938, at the time of Munich, and had Britain and France showed fight he might, at that moment, have led a « coup d'État » with the help of other senior officers who had begun to share his views. Messages to that effect had been given with extreme frankness to Lord Halifax, in London, but Neville Chamberlain's decision to fly to Germany and negotiate with Hitler frustrated their plans. Meanwhile, Beck had retired, though he kept in close touch with military circles. He was a man of exceptional intelligence and determination, a Liberal in outlook and an outstanding thinker and writer on military affairs. But he was a widower in poor health, suffering from insomnia and pain in his teeth which his doctors found incurable. He had linked himself with Gørdeler, the man whom nobody could quite fathom but whose personality was so strong that, when a shadow Cabinet was to be discussed by the conspirators during the following years, he inevitably emerged as the future Chancellor of Germany. Beck has been described by a man who knew him well as like « a sage or a philosopher ; a great gentleman, one who combined graciousness with an innate authority. Every word, every gesture, revealed the even poise of his mind and temperament. His whole personality radiated a noble candour. » He was regarded as « the heart of the movement » along with Gørdeler, and its « recognized head » ; in this capacity, he was the natural mediator when disputes arose, as they were so frequently to do.

Hassell's association with Gørdeler had begun before the War, but even as early as 1939, Hassell noted down that Gørdeler was considered « imprudent » . What appealed to Hassell, then, about this austere and difficult man was that he « wants to act rather than grumble » , a marked contrast to the generals and militarists - apart, that was, from Beck, who was a fellow-member with Hassell of a closed group of intellectuals called the « Wednesday Society » , a 19th Century intellectual club limited to 16 persons who met regularly to discuss cultural and scientific matters round the dinner-table. Hassell, Gørdeler and Beck frequently met to exchange opinions and information ; differing on certain points in the successive plans they had to « massage » the generals into active resistance against Hitler but, at least, in fundamental agreement, that it was necessary, somehow or other, to get Hitler removed from power. To Hassell, Gørdeler always appeared fearless, alert, active and optimistic too optimistic, in fact, in his anticipation of the collapse of the Nazis during the early stages of the War and in his belief that, in the end, the reluctant generals would take action against Hitler.

Gørdeler's own career had been both impressive and idiosyncratic. He came of conservative Prussian stock with a strong sense of duty and service to the State ; his father had been a District judge. His upbringing had been happy, but sternly intellectual and moral ; his legal training had pointed to a career in local administration and economics. He had held the important office of Mayor of Leipzig, a professional position in Germany of much greater power than that of mayor in a comparable British or American industrial city. He was a born organiser, an able, voluble speaker and writer, tough and highly-individual ; in politics, he became a Right-wing Liberal. Although, at heart, a very humane man, Gørdeler's frigid, spartan belief in hard work and his austere, puritanical morality (he would not tolerate a divorced man or woman in his house) lacked warmth and comradeship. He was, in fact, an autocrat by nature, and his commanding personality, combined with his utter belief in the rightness of his point of view, enabled him to persuade weak or uncertain men over-easily to accept his own particular point of view while he was with them.

In addition to holding office as Mayor of Leipzig, he had accepted a government economic post as Price Commissioner for a brief period before Hitler came to power, and then again, between 1934-1935, under Hitler himself, whom he tried to persuade to introduce certain major reforms in local administration. But his association with the Nazis did not last long, though it always remained a period he had to live down when he became active in the Resistance. He had resigned as Mayor of Leipzig, in 1937, when, against his firmly expressed wish, the statue of Mendelssohn opposite the « Gewandhaus » concert-hall was removed by the National-Socialist councillors, in November 1936, while he was abroad, on the ground that the composer was a pure Jew.

Gørdeler had written endless memoranda to Göring, to the Pope, to the German generals, to his contacts at home and abroad, all of them designed to prevent the drift into War. In May 1939, he had been able personally to report to Winston Churchill, in Britain, on the opposition movement. Once War had been declared, he too tried to promote peace negotiations before the hostilities in the West developed on a scale which might make the discussion of an armistice on favourable terms impossible. He knew that Field-Marshal Walter von Brauchitsch, Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, and General Franz Halder, Beck's successor, were, at all events, approachable on the subject of a military « coup d'État » which, at this stage, was for many members of the Resistance, as far as they were prepared to go in support of action against Hitler. That Hitler should be arrested and brought to trial was considered preferable to assassination, which might have made the « Führer » seem a martyr instead of a criminal whose evil deeds should be made public in a Court of law. So, plan and counter-plan were worked-out and abandoned during the period of stalemate preceding the War in the West ; debate and counter-debate turned on the relative merits and demerits, moral and political, of the « coup d'État » and the assassination, on the reliability or, otherwise, of the new Army with its large number of Hitler enthusiasts among the younger men should Hitler be known to remain alive in custody. Many commanders, in key positions, were hostile to any act of sudden violence, or « coup de main » , involving Hitler ; among these, in addition to Brauchitsch, was General Friedrich Fromm, Commander of the Reserve (or Home) Army. Beck and Gerdeler, however, certainly won the goodwill of many senior officers during this and subsequent periods of the War.

But the « coup d'État » was constantly postponed. During the early months of 1940, Gerdeler continued his efforts to encourage peace-feelers, in Sweden and Switzerland. It became increasingly clear that London would not stir either way until the « coup d'État » about which all these agents were hinting had taken place. The British were expecting immediate action from the Resistance, in Germany ; they had been given several indications, from as near official sources as were possible in an underground movement, that this would be the case. The only thing that did not happen was the « coup d'État » itself.

Meanwhile, it was also clear that Hitler was preparing to invade in the West. Not only were numerous warnings given, but the celebrated incident, in January 1940 (when a staff officer carrying plans for the invasion of the West made a forced landing in Belgium) , gave absolute proof of Hitler's intentions. But still no action was taken in Germany. Oster, driven desperate by the situation, had, since the previous November, been issuing secret warnings to the countries faced with invasion, giving them dates when hostilities might be anticipated ; from the German point of view, such action still seems the highest form of treason and has to be defended, even in terms of the resistance itself, as the work of a man moved by « deeply-felt hate of Hitler » and « genuine moral indignation at the bare-faced crime of aggression against friendly neighbours » . Nevertheless, the absence of any sign of the « coup d'État » was leading to a suspicion in Britain that some trick was being played by the agents of Hitler and that there was, in fact, no effective resistance in Germany, after all.

On 15 April, the tenuous relationship between Britain and the agents of the Resistance was dissolved by Hitler's invasion of Denmark and Norway. Chamberlain's Government, in any case, was on the verge of collapse. A month later, on 10 May, Hitler entered Holland and Belgium, and Winston Churchill became Prime Minister. A new, tough policy of « unconditional surrender » became, from that day, the answer the agents of the conspirators had to face. The good faith of the German Resistance movement had to be proved before the world by removing Hitler from the new heights of power and popularity that he had achieved through the success of his ruthless strategy of « blitzkrieg » .

Winston Churchill was not without knowledge of the Resistance movement. He had heard of it from Ewald von Kleist, an opponent of Hitler, in August 1938, and from Gørdeler himself, in May 1939 ; on both occasions, he had shown keen interest. He also received Fabian von Schlabrendorff, one of the men who was later actually to share in an attempt on Hitler's life and a man whom he knew personally ; they had met at Chartwell, in July 1939. Schlabrendorff began by saying :

« I am not a Nazi, but a good patriot. »

Churchill had grinned and replied :

« So am I. »

He had even sent a letter of encouragement to the members of the Resistance through Kleist, which Oster, Beck and Halder, among others, had all read ; a copy of this letter found by the « Gestapo » among Kleist's papers was one of the direct causes of his execution, in 1945. But, for Churchill and for the rest of the Allies, the vague appeals of the Resistance for direct signs of encouragement proved fruitless once Hitler's naked aggression had been unleashed. Only their unaided removal of the tyrant could, in the view of Britain's new Premier, prove that they were as good as their word.

Even as early as 1940, Gørdeler had begun to despair of moving the generals in the direction of any absolute plan for a « coup d'État » . As Hassell himself put it :

« These generals seem to want the Hitler Government itself to order them to overthrow it. »

Hassell, Gørdeler and Beck lived in a world in which they had constantly to distinguish between hard news and rumour, between the genuine leakage from secret discussions revealing Nazi policy and mere wishful thinking.

The rapid conquests of 1940-1941 had made all discussions with the generals abortive, for they never knew whether they were to be rewarded by Hitler with large sums of money and made field-marshal or dismissed as too incompetent to fulfil the blindly instinctive, though sometimes astute, strategies of their Master. Hassell, more sensitive by now to the tide of opinion than Gørdeler, had begun to find his friend handicapped by quite outmoded conceptions and by « his facile prophecies of an early breakdown of the regime » . In November 1941, he claimed to have made favourable contacts with Churchill ; Hassell believed this was entirely fantasy. Gørdeler, he felt by now, was all « will-power and no tact » . The months now passed in time-consuming debate about who should be leader in Gørdeler's shadow Cabinet. Hitler lived on, unthreatened by discussions as to whether the monarchy should or should not be brought back to Germany. Action, when it came eventually, originated with the younger generation.

Gørdeler occupied the next 3 years, 1941-1943, which were years of stalemate and frustration for the Resistance, in writing endless memoranda, planning a constitution and setting-up a shadow Cabinet for the new Germany, once Hitler had been spirited away. He made approaches to other leaders of disaffection, more particularly, those who had formerly been organisers of the labour unions, men such as the Socialists, Wilhelm Leuschner, Julius Leber, Theodor

Haubach, Carlo Mierendorff and Adolf Reichwein. They too wanted to see a successful « coup d'État » but, as in the case of the other sections of the Resistance movement, they lacked effective co-ordination. During the years of the Nazi regime, thousands of brave men and women, in their ranks, were gaoled, tortured and, in many cases, killed.

Gørdeler's militant Liberalism, in its way as autocratic as the man himself, now moved partially to the left in order to accommodate his new colleagues ; nevertheless, he also considered it right to debate the restoration of the monarchy. Gørdeler's growing circle in the Resistance passed their time in constant discussions and dissensions about the shape of the new Germany they were fashioning under the feet of Hitler. According to Hans Bernd Gisevius, their ceaseless activity was, in itself, a sign of their helplessness. Meetings were held everywhere in private houses at the home of Claus Bonhøffer, for instance ; the circle of debate included Hassell, Beck, Leuschner and even Prince Louis Ferdinand, 2nd son of the Crown Prince. But, beneath all these discussions, lurked the fear that the Allies' demand for unconditional surrender from any German Government, with or without Hitler, would make any such plans purely academic. Gørdeler was not alone in his endless attempts to obtain from the Allies some form of positive re-assurance of the kind, he and all the resistance leaders, wanted - that they, at least, would no longer be regarded with suspicion once a « coup d'État » was successfully achieved and that honourable negotiations would then be possible in place of defeat.

It was in this spirit that Bonhøffer had gone to Stockholm, but the results were negative. Gørdeler had hoped that the British art of compromise would assert itself, but he was mistaken. In July 1941, Britain and Russia had agreed they would not sign a separate peace with Germany and, in January 1943, America, too, joined in the general stipulation that the surrender of Germany must be unconditional. As for the members of the Resistance, the situation was to remain, as Eden put it, to Bishop George Bell, in August 1943 :

« If any section of the German people really wished to see a return to a German State based on respect for law and the rights of the individual, they must understand that no one would believe them until they had taken active steps to rid themselves of their present regime. »

Extrait de « OPUS » , un « thriller » policier (publié en 2001) par Edward Alexander :

(« OPUS » is a political thriller about the joint search by American and Soviet Cultural Officers for a Beethoven Cello Concerto in Hungary, leading to the involvement of 3 Intelligence agencies, World War II intrigue, and culminating at KGB Headquarters.)

Wilhelm Canaris' antipathy to Adolf Hitler had grown immeasurably. Meanwhile, the resistance cell of the « Abwehr » had become what might be termed « the fulcrum of the opposition » . Philipp Scheidemann recited a dizzying list of names, beginning with Colonel Hans Oster, and continuing with Ernst von Dohnanyi and many others of whom Phil had never heard. He smiled gently at Scheidemann's display of the famous German « thoroughness » in his recounting of the anti-Hitler resistance movement.

Scheidemann stopped for a moment to explain, with visible amusement, that the official view of the German Democratic Republic towards the Resistance was that it was nothing less than an attempt « to save the foundations of the capitalistic hegemony of the monopolies » , he said, underlining the quote with a change of emphasis.

« Let me now return to Karl Gørdeler. He was, I suppose, what you would call a conservative German. In the beginning, he didn't entertain any ideas of resistance. But he did things which irritated the Nazis. As early as 1933, for instance, he refused to raise the Swastika flag over the Leipzig Town Hall. »

« But his antipathy towards them deepened when they began waging their anti-Semitic campaigns. For him, the last straw occurred in 1936, when the Nazis ordered the removal of Felix Mendelssohn's statue from the front of the Leipzig " Gewandhaus " building. »

« I assume you know what I am talking about. »

« Absolutely. Mendelssohn was a Jew and the " Gewandhaus ", where he had conducted its great Orchestra, was the most famous concert-hall in all of Germany. »

« Excellent ! I see you are well-informed » , the old man exclaimed, rubbing his bony hands together.

« Now, we come to the nucleus of our story. During his tenure as Lord Mayor, Gørdeler was very friendly with my old chief, " Herr " Doktor von Hase, whom he visited often. I remember so well when the Mendelssohn statue was removed because von Hase, who was the President of the " Gewandhaus ", was up in arms. My God, none of us could believe it. Mendelssohn, one of our greatest men of music. »

« Beyond all that, however, Gørdeler had a far more personal reason to hate the Nazis. He had lost 2 sons on the Russian front and was a deeply embittered man. His hatred of Hitler became an obsession, but even so, and this is curious, he never favored assassination, only overthrow. »

« He was saying something about the safety of our firm and employees, and that he could not get involved. »

« Gørdeler replied that he would not get him involved, but that my chief could help in a very indirect way. Now comes the most important part of what I heard that day. Gørdeler said that he had just learned something which was absolutely astonishing, and that his source was unimpeachable. He then lowered his voice, and I remember his words so distinctly : " My source is one of us - Canaris. ". Do you remember when, a few moments ago, I told you of the 4 major groups in the Resistance ? Canaris was the head of one of them, the " Abwehr ". »

« Gørdeler had lowered his voice and I had to listen hard but I heard most of it. Canaris, he said, had sent him a private message to the effect that an officer on his, Canaris' staff, someone whom he trusted and who bore a name which evoked our deepest military traditions, might be an agent working for the Nazis. This could only mean, Gørdeler maintained, that the " Gestapo " had penetrated the ranks of the Resistance and was using this officer to build dossiers on everyone. »

Carl Friedrich Gørdeler (geboren 31. Juli 1884 in Schneidemühl, Provinz Posen ; gestorben 2. Februar 1945 in Berlin-Plötzensee) war ein deutscher Jurist, Politiker (DNVP) und Widerstandskämpfer gegen den Nationalsozialismus. Er gehörte zu den führenden zivilen Köpfen der Widerstandsbewegung und sollte nach dem Attentat vom 20. Juli 1944, an dessen Planung er maßgeblich beteiligt war, das Amt des Reichskanzlers übernehmen.

Gørdeler entstammte einer preußischen Beamtenfamilie. Er war seit 1911 als Kommunalpolitiker tätig und von 1930 bis 1937 Oberbürgermeister von Leipzig. Geistig orientierte Gørdeler sich an der preußischen Tradition und einem wirtschaftsliberalen Wertkonservatismus. Der Verwaltungsfachmann war in den 1920er Jahren mehrfach als Reichskanzler im Gespräch, bevor er 1931-1932 und 1934-1935 das Amt des Reichskommissars für Preisüberwachung innehatte.

Die Machtübertragung an die NSDAP bewertete Gørdeler zunächst positiv. Aus seiner konservativen Weltanschauung heraus weigerte er sich jedoch von Anfang an, Mitglied der Partei zu werden, und entwickelte sich bis 1936 zu einem entschiedenen Gegner des Regimes. Als in Leipzig im November 1936 das Denkmal des jüdischen Komponisten Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy abgerissen wurde, trat Gørdeler demonstrativ vom Amt des Oberbürgermeisters zurück. In den folgenden Jahren reiste er durch die Staaten der Westmächte, um vor dem Nationalsozialismus zu warnen und die alliierten Regierungen zu beraten.

Mit Beginn des Zweiten Weltkrieges bildete sich um Gørdeler ein konservativer Kreis des zivilen Widerstands heraus, der das Ende der NS-Herrschaft herbeiführen wollte. Dieser sogenannte « Gørdeler-Kreis » war ein geistiges Zentrum der Opposition gegen Hitler und verfügte über zahlreiche Kontakte zu anderen Widerstandsgruppen, insbesondere zum militärischen Widerstand um Ludwig Beck. Nach dem Scheitern des Attentats vom 20. Juli wurde Gørdeler im August 1944 denunziert, vom « Volksgerichtshof » zum Tode verurteilt und am 2. Februar 1945 in Berlin-Plötzensee hingerichtet.

Carl Friedrich Gørdeler wurde als dritter Sohn von Julius Gørdeler und seiner Frau Adelheid, geborener Roloff, in Schneidemühl, Kreis Kolmar in Posen, geboren. Seine Familie gehörte väterlicher- und mütterlicherseits zur preußischen Beamtenelite. Bereits sein ursprünglich aus Lüchow stammender Urgroßvater Christian Gørdeler war als Oberrevisionsrat zur Zeit Friedrich Wilhelms III. in Berlin tätig gewesen. Sein Großvater, Dietrich Wilhelm Gørdeler, arbeitete am Oberlandesgericht Hamm in der Provinz Westfalen. Seit seiner Versetzung 1852 an das Appellationsgericht Marienwerder in der Provinz Westpreußen war die Familie eng mit dem ländlichen Ostelbien verbunden. Der noch in Hamm geborene Vater Julius Gørdeler wuchs in Marienwerder auf und heiratete die Tochter des dortigen Appellationsgerichtsrats Carl Roloff, nachdem er als Offizier der Reserve aus dem Deutsch-Französischen Krieg 1870-1871 zurückgekehrt war. Aus dieser Ehe gingen vier Söhne (Gustav, Franz, Carl und Fritz) sowie eine Tochter (Else) hervor. Über die Jugendzeit Gørdelers liegen aufgrund seiner erhaltenen Jugenderinnerungen, die er kurz vor seiner Verhaftung 1944 verfasste, detaillierte Quellen vor.

Nach der Geburt des dritten Sohnes Carl Friedrich gab Julius Gørdeler seine Tätigkeit als Rechtsanwalt in Schneidemühl auf und ergriff die Chance, als Amtsrichter und gleichzeitig als Geschäftsführer der Landwirtschaftsbank « Neue Westpreußische Landschaft » zu arbeiten. Bis zu seinem sechsten Lebensjahr wuchs Carl Friedrich Gørdeler in der kleinen Landstadt Schneidemühl auf, bevor sein Vater 1890 ins nahe Marienwerder versetzt wurde und die Familie dorthin umzog. Am Umfeld der Familie änderte sich jedoch wenig : Ihre Lebensführung war bürgerlich und von provinzieller Einfachheit und Naturverbundenheit geprägt. Sein Vater führte die Familie patriarchalisch-autoritär, kompensiert durch die « liebevolle Würde » und Lebhaftigkeit der Mutter. Der große Familienzusammenhalt und insbesondere auch die geschlechterspezifische Rollenverteilung bestimmten Gørdelers spätere Auffassungen über die Familie als wichtigste Stütze der Gesellschaft (er selbst nannte dies das « Grunderlebnis » seiner Kinder) und Jugendzeit. Hinzu kam der « Geist altpreußisch-konservativen Beamtentums » : Gørdeler erfuhr eine Erziehung zu preußischen Tugenden und königstreue-konservativer Grundeinstellung. Auch politische Diskussionen fanden im Hause der Familie häufig statt, besonders, seitdem der Vater 1899 für die Freikonservative Partei in den preußischen Landtag eingezogen war.

Seit 1891 besuchte Gørdeler das humanistische Gymnasium Marienwerder, wo schon sein Vater das Abitur gemacht hatte. Auch wenn er nicht zu den besten Schülern gehörte, so beurteilte er im Rückblick seine Schulzeit doch als « vorzüglich » . Am humanistischen Gymnasium erwarb er eine bürgerlich ästhetisch-geschichtlich ausgerichtete Bildung. Besonders die Kultur des antiken Griechenlands und die friederizianisch-protestantische Tradition standen im Vordergrund. Am 22. März 1902 legte Carl Friedrich Gørdeler dort die Reifeprüfung erfolgreich ab. Anschließend meldete er sich, der Mode der Jahrhundertwende folgend, zur Offiziersausbildung bei der kaiserlichen Marine. Er verbrachte aber nur wenige Monate als Schüler der Marineakademie in Kiel, da ihn « furchtbares Heimweh » packte. Nach dem kurzen Zwischenspiel als Marinesoldat entschloss sich Gørdeler schließlich, die Familientradition fortzusetzen und Jurist zu werden.

Neue Aula der Eberhard Karls Universität Tübingen, in der eine Gedenktafel an die ehemaligen Tübinger Studenten erinnert, die am 20. Juli beteiligt waren.

Am 13. November 1902 nahm Gørdeler an der Eberhard Karls Universität Tübingen das Jura-Studium auf. Dort hatten bereits seine beiden älteren Brüder studiert, und wie sie wechselte auch Carl Friedrich nach drei Semestern die Universität : 1905 ging er an die Albertina nach Königsberg. Die juristischen Fakultäten dieser beiden Hochschulen galten als besonders konservativ und elitär. Neben Vorlesungen der Rechtswissenschaft besuchte Gørdeler auch historische, da er sich sehr für die Geschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts, insbesondere für die Preußischen Reformen, interessierte. Dieses historische Interesse prägte später auch seine politischen Ansichten.

In Tübingen trat er der « Akademischen Turnerschaft Eberhardina » (heute : Alte Turnerschaft Eberhardina-Markomania) bei. Im Kaiserreich bildeten die Verbindungen die zentralen Institutionen des studentischen Lebens. Die « Eberhardina » , der auch Gørdelers Brüder angehörten, war eine 1884 gegründete, freie, farbentragende und pflichtschlagende Turnerverbindung. Zu seinen Kommilitonen gehörte Eugen Bolz, der als Zentrums Politiker 1928 bis 1933 württembergischer Staatspräsident war und später im Widerstandskreis des 20. Juli mitwirkte. Nach Gørdelers Wechsel nach Königsberg legte er am 31. Oktober 1905 sein erstes Staatsexamen mit dem Prädikat « befriedigend » ab, was damals im zweiten juristischen Staatsexamen eine anerkanntswerte Note war. Wenige Tage später erfolgte seine Ernennung zum Referendar. In Königsberg lernte er die Arztochter Anneliese Ulrich kennen, mit der er sich 1903 verlobte. Er war Mitglied der Verbindung Rossitten, aus der 1926 die Fliegerei Preußen hervorging.

Vom 1. November 1905 bis zum 30. September 1906 stand Carl Friedrich Gørdeler als Einjährig-Freiwilliger beim 1. Ostpreußischen Feldartillerie-Regiment Nummer 16. Nach Beendigung der militärischen Dienstpflicht begann er mit einer praktischen Ausbildung als Referendar. Er absolvierte seinen Vorbereitungsdienst an verschiedenen Stationen, so in Fischhausen, Braunsberg, Königsberg und Marienwerder. Neben seinem Referendariat hat Gørdeler die Zeit gefunden, zum Thema Das Bewusstsein der Pflichtwidrigkeit im Schuldinhalte und Behandlung in der Literatur und den wichtigsten deutschen Gesetzbüchern des 19. Jahrhunderts zu promovieren. 1907 reichte er die Dissertation bei Professor Robert von Hippel an der Universität Göttingen ein. Insgesamt erhielt er hierfür aber nur die Note « rite » .

Drei Jahre später beendete er seine Referendariatszeit und legte am 31. März 1911 in Berlin das zweite Staatsexamen ab. Wenig später wurde er zum Gerichtsassessor ernannt. Dies bedeutete jedoch nur, daß er nunmehr die formalen Voraussetzungen für das Amt des « Gerichtsrats » (zum Beispiel Amtsrichter oder ähnlich) besaß ; keineswegs aber bedeutete es die Übernahme in den dauerhaften Beamtenstatus ; vielmehr verdiente die Mehrheit der Juristen in der Kaiserzeit erst ab Mitte vierzig ihr erstes Gehalt. So war Gørdeler (wie andere auch) veranlasst, anderswo einen Arbeitsplatz zu finden. Aufgrund seines politischen Interesses entschied er sich, wie später auch sein Bruder Fritz, für eine kommunalpolitische Laufbahn. Um hierauf besonders gut vorbereitet zu sein, entschloss sich Carl Friedrich Gørdeler auf Anraten des mit seinen Eltern befreundeten Königsberger Oberbürgermeisters Siegfried Körte dafür, zunächst Praktika im Bankwesen zu absolvieren. Zu diesem Zweck ließ er sich am 21. April 1911 für ein Jahr aus dem Justizdienst beurlauben.

Vom 24. April bis zum 14. September arbeitete Gørdeler bei der Bank der « Ostpreußischen Landschaft » und anschließend bis zum 10. Oktober in der Königlichen Seehandlung, der preußischen Staatsbank, am Gendarmenmarkt in Berlin. Das Praktikum im Bankwesen verschaffte ihm Einblicke in ökonomische Zusammenhänge, die ihm später in der Kommunalverwaltung von Nutzen waren. Nach Abschluß der Praktika und des Referendariats strebte Gørdeler, nunmehr Jurist, einer ersten festen Anstellung entgegen. Zudem hatte er während seiner Praktikumszeit seine Verlobte Anneliese Ulrich (1888-1961) geheiratet, die er in Königsberg kennengelernt hatte. Aus der Ehe gingen fünf Kinder hervor, die Söhne Ulrich (1913-2000) , Christian (1914-1942) und Reinhard (1922-1996) sowie Marianne (1919-2011) , die Mutter von Frieder Meyer-Krahmer, und Benigna.

Am 15. Oktober 1911 trat Gørdeler als Gerichtsassessor in den Dienst der Stadtverwaltung von Solingen ein, der Oberbürgermeister August Dicke vorstand. Er fand zunächst neben der reinen Verwaltungstätigkeit durch die Teilnahme an den Stadtverordnetenversammlungen einen Einblick in die kommunalpolitische Praxis, bevor er seit dem 17. Oktober auch das Recht hatte, den Kommissionssitzungen beizuwohnen. Am 10. Juni 1912 erfolgte seine dauerhafte Anstellung als besoldeter juristischer Hilfsarbeiter. Die Position eines juristischen Hilfsarbeiters war für die Vorbereitung auf höhere Beamtenposten geschaffen worden, weshalb Oberbürgermeister Dicke Gørdeler auch von Anfang an mit der Leitung kleinerer Dezernate betraute. Die Stadt Solingen stellte in vielerlei Hinsicht einen Gegensatz zu den Orten seiner Jugend dar : Sie war eine moderne Industriestadt, politisch eine Hochburg der Sozialdemokratie. So entwickelte der konservative Preuße eine stärkere Offenheit gegenüber anderen politischen Strömungen, ohne in irgendeiner Weise von seinen nationalkonservativen Überzeugungen abzurücken.

Am 17. Dezember 1912 wählte ihn die Stadtverordnetenversammlung für zwölf Jahre in das Amt des Beigeordneten. Gørdeler hatte zuvor erwogen, als Stadtrat nach Halberstadt zu wechseln. Wegen seiner besonderen fachlichen Befähigung war die Stadtverordnetenversammlung schließlich bereit, ihn ungewöhnlich schnell zu befördern, um ihn auf diese Weise in Solingen zu halten. Für die Familie war sein beruflicher Aufstieg « ein schöner Erfolg », wie seine Frau Anneliese später schrieb, insbesondere deshalb, weil wenige Tage nach Gørdelers Amtseinführung das erste Kind, Sohn Ulrich, zur Welt kam. Zu den Aufgaben als Beigeordneter gehörte die Leitung des Schul-, Sozial-, Finanz-, Steuer- und Versicherungswesens sowie die Vertretung des Bürgermeisters, womit er auch tatsächlich während einer Abwesenheit Dickes betraut wurde. Bereits in Solingen bildete sich heraus, was Gørdeler in späteren Schriften häufig betonte : Im Vergleich der beiden Kommunalverfassungen, der Bürgermeister- und der Magistratsverfassung, bevorzugte er eindeutig die Bürgermeisterverfassung, weil diese die seines Erachtens effektivste Verwaltungsstruktur habe. Aus der geregelten Tätigkeit als Beigeordneter wurde Gørdeler schließlich durch den Beginn des Ersten Weltkriegs herausgerissen.

Carl Friedrich Gørdeler war derjenige, der am 31. Juli 1914 in Solingen von der Rathauptreppe die allgemeine Mobilmachung verkündete. Als Reserveoffizier mußte er sich sofort nach der Mobilmachung beim Feldartillerie-Regiment Nummer 71 melden. Seit dem 4. August 1914 stand er bei diesem Regiment in Ostpreußen. Gørdeler fand Verwendung als Adjutant des Kommandeurs der Ersatzabteilung, mit der er an der für die Deutschen siegreichen Schlacht bei Tannenberg teilnahm. Es folgten die Schlacht von Wilna und der Stellungskampf um Smorgon. Im Oktober 1915 erfolgte die Auflösung des Regiments ; die Truppen wurden dem Feldartillerie-Regiment Nummer 93 überstellt. Dort stieg Gørdeler, mittlerweile im Rang eines Oberleutnants, zum Führer der 6. Batterie, wobei es sich um leichte Feldhaubitzen handelte, auf. Danach war er als Ordonnanzoffizier bei verschiedenen Stäben an der Ostfront tätig, zuletzt als Hauptmann der Reserve beim Oberkommando der 10. Armee, die General Erich von Falkenhayn unterstellt war. Dort gehörte die Finanzverwaltung der besetzten Gebiete Weißrusslands und Litauens zu seinen Aufgaben. Gørdeler nahm bis zum 31. Januar 1919 an der Ostfront am Ersten Weltkrieg teil. Für seine Verdienste wurde er mit dem Eisernen Kreuz I. und II. Klasse ausgezeichnet.

Seit Beginn des Krieges kämpfte er « mit größtem Optimismus bis zum letzten Tag ». Sein patriotischer Enthusiasmus entsprang einer unbedingten Übereinstimmung mit den Kriegszielen des Kaiserreichs. Diese Haltung behielt er bis zum Kriegsende, trotz der grauenhaften Kriegserfahrungen, darunter auch dem Tod seines Bruders Franz 1918 bei Saint-Quentin an der Westfront. Allerdings teilte Gørdeler nicht die Erfahrungen des Grabenkrieges im Westen, die seine Generation prägen sollten.

Zu der schweren Enttäuschung durch die Kriegsniederlage kam bei Gørdeler das Entsetzen über die politischen Umbrüche im Zuge der Novemberrevolution. Nach seiner Rückkehr kämpfte er am 3. und 4. März 1919 in Straßenkämpfen in Berlin als Freikorps-Mitglied gegen den Spartakusbund. Später sah er dies kritisch: Angesichts der politischen Entwicklung 1918 sei der Versuch einer Revolution rückblickend « eine natürliche Selbstverständlichkeit » gewesen. Die veränderte Situation führte bei Gærdeler 1918-1919 zu seiner Sinnkrise. So bezweifelte er, daß es überhaupt sinnvoll sei, unter diesen Bedingungen wieder in den Verwaltungsdienst einzutreten. Letztendlich nahm er seine Tätigkeit als Beigeordneter in Solingen aber wieder auf. Der jungen Weimarer Republik stand Carl Friedrich Gærdeler vom ersten Moment an ablehnend gegenüber und setzte sich in den folgenden Jahren auch für die Wiedererrichtung der Hohenzollern-Monarchie ein.

Im Februar 1919 trat Gærdeler in die junge Deutschnationale Volkspartei ein. Die DNVP stand rechts im politischen Spektrum der Weimarer Republik und verstand sich als Erbin der konservativen Parteien aus der Kaiserzeit. Zudem meldete sich Gærdeler freiwillig zum vom Alldeutschen Verband ausgerufenen « Volkskampf » gegen Polen. Für Carl Friedrich Gærdeler stellte das « Diktat von Versailles » einen Verlust der Heimat und eine Erniedrigung Deutschlands dar. Nachdem die Nationalversammlung für den Versailler Vertrag gestimmt hatte, waren die Pläne eines militärischen Konflikts mit Polen zur Rückgewinnung der abgetrennten Gebiete endgültig gescheitert. Gærdeler zog aus seiner intensiven Beschäftigung mit dem Thema des polnischen Korridors die Konsequenz, sich in revanchistischen und nationalistischen Organisationen zu betätigen. Hierzu zählt unter anderem seine Mitgliedschaft im « Deutschen Ostbund », der seine Aufgabe in der Herstellung einer « Einheitsfront des ostmärkischen Deutschtums » gegen « slawische Überflutung » sah. So trug Gærdelers verstärktes politisches Engagement seit 1919 lange Zeit nicht nur reaktionär-revanchistische, sondern auch deutlich völkische Züge. Er hatte sich weltanschaulich verstärkt von einem traditionellen Wertkonservatismus altpreußischer Prägung hin zu einem aggressiv-völkischen Nationalismus bewegt ; eine Geisteshaltung, gegen die Gærdeler später kämpfte und deren Opfer er selbst wurde. Gærdeler war zu diesem Zeitpunkt auch von der Dolchstoßlegende überzeugt, die er später als « Gift » bezeichnete.

Da sich die Familie Gærdeler nach dem Ende des Ersten Weltkrieges nicht mehr in Solingen heimisch fühlte und sie in Gedanken bei ihrer ostdeutschen Heimat war, entschloss sich Gærdeler, für das Amt des Zweiten Bürgermeisters von Königsberg zu kandidieren. Am 14. Januar 1920 setzte er sich in der Wahl nur knapp gegen den sozialdemokratischen Gegenkandidaten durch. Am 11. Februar 1920 fand in der Königsberger Stadtverordnetenversammlung seine Amtseinführung statt, während der die SPD- und USPD-Fraktionen unter Protest den Saal verließen : Da der liberale Oberbürgermeister Lohmeyer mit ihren Stimmen gewählt worden war, beanspruchten sie Gærdelers Posten für einen Linken. Obwohl Gærdeler in seiner Amtseinführungsrede seine Verpflichtung für das Allgemeinwohl, nicht für Parteiinteressen, bekräftigte, beherrschte vor allem heftiger Parteienstreit seine Zeit als Zweiter Bürgermeister. So gelang es etwa seit 1927 nicht mehr, den Haushalt in der Stadtverordnetenversammlung durchzubringen.

Gærdeler sah die Selbstverwaltung der Städte, die auf den von ihm bewunderten Freiherrn vom Stein zurückging, als wichtigsten kommunalpolitischen Grundsatz an. Da die Verwaltungsstrukturen nach den Umbrüchen der Revolution noch ungeordnet waren, gelang es Gærdeler, den Verwaltungsapparat durch Neuordnung zu straffen und ihm gleichzeitig mehr Gewicht gegenüber der Stadtverordnetenversammlung zu geben. Auf dem Deutschen Städtetag engagierte er sich für eine einheitliche deutsche Gemeindeordnung, die eine starke Stellung des Bürgermeisters garantieren und gleichzeitig die Parteipolitik « aus dem Rathaus heraushalten » sollte. Nach Gærdelers Konzeption führe dies schließlich zu besseren Ergebnissen für alle Seiten, obwohl das tatsächliche demokratische Mitspracherecht geschwächt werde. Ähnliche Verfassungspläne entwickelte er später auch für die Reichsebene, wo er mehr Macht für einen überparteilichen Reichspräsidenten (oder Monarchen) forderte. Da Gærdeler über seine Tätigkeit beim Deutschen Städtetag in Politikerkreisen überregionale Bekanntheit erlangt hatte und für seine kommunalpolitischen Vorstellungen und seinen Pragmatismus auch Zuspruch aus der Zentrumspartei und der DVP erhielt, war er in den 1920er Jahren mehrfach als Reichskanzler im Gespräch.

Als er 1930 nach Leipzig wechselte, lobten auch SPD-Vertreter seine Verdienste um die Königsberger Stadtverwaltung; die linken Parteien nahmen geschlossen an seiner feierlichen Verabschiedung teil: Aus pragmatischen Gründen hatte sich Gærdeler in seiner Königsberger Zeit an die Weimarer Republik angenähert und insbesondere positive Erfahrungen in der Zusammenarbeit mit den Sozialdemokraten gemacht.

Am 23. Mai 1930 « geschah das Unerwartete » : Der konservative Ostpreuße Gærdeler wurde mit den Stimmen des « Vereinigten Bürgerblocks » (DNVP, Zentrum und Vertreter von konservativen Kleinparteien) sowie einzelnen Stimmen sowohl aus der SPD- als auch aus der NSDAP-Ratsfraktion zum Oberbürgermeister der sächsischen Metropole Leipzig gewählt. Leipzig hatte nicht nur als Messestadt mit 700.000 Einwohnern und einem pulsierenden Geschäftsleben überregionale Bedeutung, sondern auch als Sitz des Reichsgerichts, der Deutschen Bücherei und hochstehender kultureller Institutionen wie des Gewandhaus-Orchesters. So bedeutete dies für Gærdeler einen enormen Karrieresprung. Die Familie zog aus ihrer mittelgroßen Königsberger Etagenwohnung in eine repräsentative Bürgervilla im Leipziger Stadtteil Leutzsch. Unmittelbar nach seiner Amtseinführung begann Gærdeler mit der Umstrukturierung der Leipziger Stadtverwaltung hin zu einer schlanken, klar hierarchischen Struktur nach Königsberger Vorbild. So begann er, gleichartige Verwaltungsstellen zu großen Dezernaten zusammenzulegen und auch den Einfluss der Parteien über die Verringerung (!) der Ratsmitgliederzahl zu beschränken. Zudem gehörte er seit seiner Wahl zum Oberbürgermeister dem Vorstand des Deutschen Städtetages an, wodurch seine kommunalpolitischen Vorstellungen deutschlandweit an Gewicht gewannen.

Kurz bevor Gærdeler sein Amt übernommen hatte, hatte die Weltwirtschaftskrise eingesetzt. Die daraus folgende schwierige Finanzsituation belastete seine Amtszeit schwer. Zudem hatten sich die Arbeitslosenzahlen erheblich erhöht und mit ihnen die Wahlergebnisse für die extremen Parteien, insbesondere die NSDAP. Gleichzeitig gab es in Leipzig Probleme mit der zunehmenden Verstädterung : Weite Teile der Stadt waren nicht kanalisiert, hinzu kam Wohnraummangel. Es gelang Gærdeler dennoch, diese Probleme weitgehend zu lösen und dabei das Haushaltsdefizit durch eiserne Sparpolitik zu beseitigen. Der Wohnungsnot begegnete er durch eine Intensivierung der Vorstadtbebauung. Gærdeler erarbeitete sich zudem den Ruf eines Experten für öffentliche Finanzen, was ihn in Verbindung zu Reichskanzler Heinrich Brüning brachte, der auf Reichsebene eine ähnliche Politik verfolgte. Brüning leitete ein Präsidialkabinett, das mit Notverordnungen eine rigide Deflationspolitik betrieb. Als die ersten Einsparungen kaum Wirkung zeigten und die politische Radikalisierung zunahm, suchte Brüning nach einem geeigneten Preiskommissar, der staatlich verordnete Preissenkungen von 10 Prozent gegen den Widerstand der Wirtschaft durchsetzen sollte. Für diese Aufgabe wählte er 1931 Gærdeler aus. Dieser zögerte zunächst, da derartige staatliche Eingriffe seinen wirtschaftsliberalen Überzeugungen vom « freien Spiel der Kräfte » entgegenstanden. Schließlich entschloss er sich nach einem Gespräch mit Reichspräsident Paul von Hindenburg, die Aufgabe parallel zum Oberbürgermeisteramt anzunehmen.

Dies war eine bewusste Entscheidung für Brünnings Deflationspolitik und gegen die Deutschnationalen, insbesondere gegen ihren Vorsitzenden Alfred Hugenberg, der Fundamentalopposition gegen das verhasste « schwarz-rote System » betrieb. Diese grundsätzliche Differenz führte schließlich zum Austritt Gærdelers aus der DNVP 1931.

Für Brüning, dem durch Andeutungen Hindenburgs seit Ende 1931 klar war, daß er quasi als « Reichskanzler auf Abruf » fungierte, war Gærdeler der Wunschnachfolger im Amt. Nach seiner schlussendlichen Demission schlug er diesen Hindenburg in seiner letzten Aussprache am 30. Mai 1932 direkt als möglichen Nachfolger vor. Da Hindenburg jedoch mit der Wirtschaftspolitik im Stile Brünings brechen und einen Rechtsruck der Regierung herbeiführen wollte, kam Gærdeler für ihn als neuer Reichskanzler nicht in Frage. Gærdeler erkannte, daß die drängende Frage der Umgang der Deutschnationalen und des Zentrums mit der NSDAP war. Er schrieb : « Schon nach dem Sturz Brünings mußte sofort die NSDAP vor die Entscheidung gestellt werden, nunmehr die Verantwortung mit zu übernehmen oder nicht mehr zu einer neuen Wahl zu kommen. » Hierbei handelte es sich nicht um eine Unterstützung der nationalsozialistischen Ideologie, sondern Gærdeler sah lediglich zwei Möglichkeiten, den Aufstieg der NSDAP aufzuhalten : Entweder, sie an Regierungsverantwortung zu beteiligen, sie zu « zähmen » oder sie zu verbieten und « Hitler und seine gesamte entourage endgültig hinter Schloß und Riegel » zu bringen. Die Kanzlerschaft Franz von Papens unterstützte er nicht. Als dieser ihm anbot, als Innen- oder Finanzminister in sein Kabinett einzutreten, lehnte Gærdeler ab. In der Folgezeit verlor er rasch an Einfluss und wurde nicht länger als Preiskommissar zu Kabinettsitzungen herangezogen. Später machte er sich wegen dieses Entschlusses schwere Vorwürfe, daß er die Chance verpasst hätte, den weiteren Aufstieg Hitlers zumindest etwas abzubremsen.

Seine Forderung, die NSDAP mit in die Regierungsverantwortung zu nehmen, wird von einzelnen Historikern als Unterstützung für den Nationalsozialismus gewertet. Hierbei werden belegte Äußerungen Gærdelers über ein Verbot der NSDAP aus den Jahren 1932 und 1933 nicht beachtet. Andererseits kann von einer konsequenten Ablehnung des Nationalsozialismus von Beginn an ebenso wenig die Rede sein wie von einer begeisterten Unterstützung. In den politischen Auffassungen Gærdelers gab es durchaus einen Konsensbereich mit der NSDAP, der zu einer gespaltenen Haltung Gærdelers und einer anfänglichen Kooperation zwischen ihm und den neuen Machthabern führte.

Gærdelers Haltung zur Machtübernahme der NSDAP ist ambivalent : Einerseits erschienen seiner bürgerlichen Natur das lärmende Auftreten der Nationalsozialisten, ihre wirtschaftlichen Vorstellungen und ihre Gewalttätigkeit als bedenklich. Neben dieser Distanz gab es allerdings auch Schnittmengen zwischen seinen politischen Vorstellungen und dem Programm der NSDAP : Insbesondere die Beseitigung des « Diktats von Versailles » und die Stärkung der Reichsexekutive führten dazu, daß Gærdeler der Machtergreifung 1933 auch positive Seiten als « nationale Revolution » abgewinnen konnte. Zu einer Stellungnahme gegen die politischen Umwälzungen konnte er sich zu diesem Zeitpunkt nicht durchringen, obgleich er sie kritisch sah. Trotz seiner Hoffnungen auf eine baldige Beseitigung des Versailler Vertrags und einer innenpolitischen Umformung weg vom reinen « Parteienstaat » kann von einer euphorischen Unterstützung der Machtergreifung nicht gesprochen werden. Daß Deutschland sich aber gerade durch den stetigen Machtausbau der NSDAP in den von Gærdeler abgelehnten Parteienstaat verwandelte und seine Ideale von Recht, die auf einem tiefen Vertrauen in die preußische Rechtsstaatlichkeit beruhten, in ihren Grundfesten erschüttert werden sollten, erkannte er nicht. So unterschätzte er insgesamt (trotz gegenteiliger Äußerungen aus der Weimarer Zeit) die aufsteigende Gefahr.

Am Abend des 30. Januar 1933 blieb Gørdeler bis spät in die Nacht im Rathaus, um persönlich die Besetzung der Behörde durch die SA zu verhindern. Anders als in vielen Städten gelang dieses Vorhaben. In Sachsen war Gørdeler der einzige Oberbürgermeister, der auch nach der Machtergreifung im Amt blieb - auf Reichsebene waren es nur vier Oberbürgermeister, die Großstädten weiterhin vorstanden. Sein Bruder, Fritz Gørdeler, der bis 1933 das Amt des Oberbürgermeisters seiner Heimatstadt Marienwerder innehatte, wurde aus dem Amt gedrängt, da er sich weigerte, in die NSDAP einzutreten. Da Carl Friedrich Gørdeler in der Metropole Leipzig nach wie vor über großen Rückhalt in der Bevölkerung verfügte, konnten die Nationalsozialisten ihn nicht einfach aus dem Rathaus zwingen. Durch den Vorfall mit seinem Bruder hatte sich seine Skepsis den neuen Machthabern gegenüber noch verstärkt. Er beschloß, im Amt zu bleiben, um die gemäßigten Kräfte zu stärken und die nationalsozialistische Regierung zu beraten, um dem Allgemeinwohl weiterhin dienlich zu sein. Dies als aktive Unterstützung Hitlers zu interpretieren, erscheint verkürzt.

Besonders deutlich zeigte sich seine Skepsis im sogenannten « Flaggenkonflikt » : Gørdeler war nicht bereit, am Leipziger Rathaus und dem Reichsgericht die Hakenkreuzflagge zu hissen, die zu diesem Zeitpunkt noch nicht die Nationalflagge war. Stattdessen flaggte Gørdeler, wie es zu diesem Zeitpunkt das Gesetz vorschrieb, am Rathaus mit der sächsischen Landesflagge sowie der Stadtflagge Leipzigs und am Reichsgericht mit Schwarz-Weiß-Rot. SA und SS forderten eine unbedingte Verwendung der Hakenkreuz-Flagge und drohten, dies mit Terroraktionen zu untermauern. Die Flaggenkrise wurde schließlich durch einen Erlass Hindenburgs entschärft, wonach Hakenkreuzflagge und schwarz-weiß-rote Fahne gemeinsam zu hissen seien. Als am Tag von Potsdam die Nationalsozialisten ihr vermeintliches Anknüpfen an die Traditionen Preußens inszenierten, war Gørdeler nicht, wie die meisten Konservativen, begeistert von diesem Wiederaufleben des « preußischen Geistes » . Er schrieb : « Der Geist von Potsdam will nicht nur angerufen sein, er muß auch lebendig werden. » Hiermit verknüpfte Gørdeler, der der NS-Propaganda mit mäßig beeindruckter Distanz begegnete, zahlreiche Kritikpunkte an die nationalsozialistische Regierung, welche er im Sommer 1934 in einer Denkschrift an Adolf Hitler formulierte : Er setzte die Wirtschaftspolitik der Nationalsozialisten, die durch Neuverschuldung und Geldschöpfung die Arbeitslosenzahlen senkten, in Gegensatz zur Sparsamkeit des Großen Kurfürsten. Für Gørdeler galt : « Wirtschaftspolitik ist Friedenspolitik. » Die nationalsozialistischen Wirtschaftsvorstellungen, die letztlich zur Autarkie, der Loslösung vom Weltmarkt führen würden, hielt er für gefährlich und lehnte sie aus wirtschaftsliberaler Überzeugung ab, jedoch auch, weil er bereits 1934 militärische Auseinandersetzungen in Form von Wirtschaftskriegen fürchtete.

Ein wichtiger Bezugspunkt der zunehmenden Gegnerschaft Gørdelers zum Nationalsozialismus war die Verfolgung von politischen Gegnern und der jüdischen Minderheit. Der NS-Schutzhaftpraxis fielen allein bis März 1933 über 1.000 Sozialdemokraten, Sozialisten und Kommunisten zum Opfer, die seit Ende April in die Konzentrationslager Colditz, Hainichen und Sachsenburg überstellt wurden. Gørdeler nannte diese Vorgänge ein « gesetzloses Treiben » , dem ein « Ende zu machen » sei. Die nationalsozialistische « Judenpolitik » kritisierte er ebenfalls seit Beginn der NS-Herrschaft. Aus humanistischer und rechtsstaatlicher Überzeugung setzte er sich für betroffene jüdische Bürger ein. Zunächst betraf dies vor allem die Reaktionen Gørdelers auf die Verdrängung von Juden aus dem kulturellen Leben Leipzigs : Er bemühte sich, wenn auch vergeblich, um den Verbleib des Kapellmeisters am Leipziger Gewandhaus, Bruno Walter, und des Direktors des Alten Theatres, Detlef Sierck, der wegen seiner jüdischen Ehefrau aus dem Amt gedrängt wurde. Im Falle des Leipziger Jura-Professors Ludwig Ebermayer war Gørdelers Einsatz sogar vorerst erfolgreich. Daneben äußerte Carl Friedrich Gørdeler seinen Widerspruch gegenüber der antisemitischen Praxis durch demonstratives Grüßen von renommierten jüdischen Intellektuellen in Anwesenheit einflussreicher Nationalsozialisten.

Als am 1. April 1933 während des sogenannten Judenboykotts in ganz Deutschland jüdische Geschäfte boykottiert wurden, ging Gørdeler auf den Brühl, das damalige Zentrum des Pelzhandels in Leipzig, wo sich viele jüdische Geschäfte befanden. Dort besuchte er trotz der Wachposten der SA, die vor den Warenhäusern stationiert waren, die jüdischen Geschäfte. Dieser ungewöhnliche Vorgang, daß sich ein amtierender Oberbürgermeister in dieser Form gegen die Politik des NS-Regimes stellte, sorgte auch überregional für gewisses Aufsehen ; so berichtete die Frankfurter Zeitung darüber. In der Diskussion, die sich in der Folgezeit zwischen führenden Leipziger Nationalsozialisten und Gørdeler ergab, führte dieser vor allem den außenpolitischen Schaden an, insbesondere in Bezug auf Leipzig als Messestadt, zu dem solche Aktionen führten.

Die Verabschiedung des Gesetzes zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums bedeutete den Übergang von willkürlichen antisemitischen Maßnahmen hin zu einer gesetzlich geregelten expliziten Diskriminierung von Juden. Das Gesetz vom 7. April 1933 bestimmte in seinem sogenannten Arierparagrafen, daß « Beamte nicht-arischer Abstammung in den Ruhestand zu versetzen » seien. Davon ausgenommen waren jüdische Beamte, die bereits vor dem 1. August 1914 Beamte gewesen waren oder am Ersten Weltkrieg auf deutscher Seite teilgenommen hatten beziehungsweise einen gefallenen Vater oder Sohn hatten.

Gørdeler äußerte sich nicht ausdrücklich gegen dieses Gesetz, da ein Protest wegen des offiziellen Charakters des Arierparagrafen nicht ohne einen vollständigen Bruch mit dem NS-Regime möglich gewesen wäre. Diesen wollte er jedoch nach wie vor vermeiden.

Hitler und Gørdeler während der Grundsteinlegung des von Emil Hipp gestalteten Richard-Wagner-Hains, 6. März 1934
Am 30. Januar 1935 wurde die Deutsche Gemeindeordnung (DGO) erlassen, eine grundlegende Reform des Kommunalverfassungsrechts. Die Nationalsozialisten griffen hierbei in Teilen auf Vorschläge Gørdelers zurück, die er im Deutschen Städtetag geäußert hatte. Gleichzeitig bedeutete die DGO das Ende der kommunalen Selbstverwaltung, die für Gørdeler eines der bedeutendsten Elemente der deutschen Bürokratie überhaupt war. Das neue Gesetz beseitigte die unmittelbare oder mittelbare Mitwirkung der Bevölkerung an innergemeindlicher Willensbildung und übertrug weite Teile der städtischen Aufgaben an den Staat oder an die Partei. Die verbliebenen Aufgaben der Gemeinde gingen nach dem « Führerprinzip » auf die Person des Bürgermeisters über. Obwohl Gørdeler einen ähnlichen Machtausbau immer gefordert hatte, lehnte er das Gesetz als Ganzes ab. Auf die Beteiligung der Bevölkerung wollte er nicht verzichten, ebenso beklagte er das Ende der Selbstverwaltung : « Die Zeit wird lehren, ob man auf die Dauer damit auskommt, auf jeden Befragungsakt der urteilsfähigen Bürger einer Gemeinde zu verzichten. » Er selbst suche nach dem Mittelweg zwischen « überspitzten demokratischen Gedankengängen » und den « uns wesensfremden faschistischen ». Die DGO bedeutete für ihn aber die « Tötung der Idee der Selbstverwaltung ». Diese grundsätzliche Argumentation im Spannungsfeld zwischen Bejahung autoritärer Strukturen preußischer Prägung und der Ablehnung nationalsozialistischer Politik weist bereits den Weg, der Gørdeler in den Widerstand führte.

Am 5. November 1934 erfolgte die Berufung Carl Friedrich Gørdelers auf das Amt des Reichskommissars für Preisüberwachung. Für dieses Amt hatten ihn seine praktischen Erfahrungen als Preiskommissar unter Brüning sowie die

Beratung der Regierung durch die Denkschrift vom August 1934 empfohlen. Der Historiker Gerhard Ritter vermutet, daß Hitler ihn in Unkenntnis seiner tatsächlichen Ansichten, die aus einer vermeintlichen Nicht-Beachtung der Denkschrift von 1934 resultierten, lediglich wegen seiner Erfahrung zum Preiskommissar berufen habe. Diese Geste Hitlers bewertete Gærdeler als einen « Lichtblick » ; er hatte die Illusion, die Nationalsozialisten würden in der Wirtschaftspolitik einen anderen Kurs einschlagen, noch nicht aufgegeben. Trotzdem zögerte er, unter diesen politischen Bedingungen das Amt anzunehmen. Für seine Entscheidung spielte der Wunsch, mäßigend auf die Regierung einwirken zu können, eine große Rolle. Seine Befürchtung, als Preiskommissar die Konfrontation mit der NS-Politik nicht vermeiden zu können, bestätigte sich. An Gærdelers zweitem Tag als Preiskommissar erschien Robert Ley, der Leiter der Deutschen Arbeitsfront, forderte Vollmachten für die NSDAP und schlug vor, « einige Wucherer und Hamsterer aufzuhängen » , um den Preiserhöhungen ein Ende zu machen. Gærdeler war entsetzt und stattete stattdessen die Landesbehörden beziehungsweise in Preußen die Regierungspräsidenten mit den Vollmachten zur Preissenkung aus. Dieser Schritt führte zu Differenzen mit Hitler, der damit Kompetenzen aus dem Bereich der NS-Regierung verloren hatte.

Im März 1935 führte das NS-Regime die allgemeine Wehrpflicht ein und proklamierte den Aufbau einer deutschen Luftwaffe. Die Kosten für die Aufrüstung der Wehrmacht machten eine geordnete Haushaltspolitik für die Zukunft unmöglich. Die von Reichsbankpräsident Hjalmar Schacht ins Spiel gebrachte Finanzierung durch die sogenannten Mefo-Wechsel lehnte Gærdeler strikt ab. Im Juni 1935, kurz vor Ablauf von Gærdelers regulärer Amtszeit als Preiskommissar, fand eine Aussprache zwischen Gærdeler, Schacht und Hitler statt, in der der Preiskommissar erweiterte Vollmachten verlangte. Als diese ihm nicht zugestanden wurden, stellte er sein Amt zur Verfügung, obwohl Hitler eine Verlängerung der Amtszeit gern gesehen hätte. Auch nach weiteren Anfragen, ob er für ein anderes hohes Reichsamt, etwa in Zusammenhang mit den von Hermann Göring Anfang 1936 übernommenen Aufgaben im Bereich der Devisen- und Rohstoffwirtschaft, zur Verfügung stünde, beharrte Gærdeler auf seinem Standpunkt.

Eine letzte wirtschaftspolitische Kooperation zwischen ihm und dem NS-Regime stellte eine von Göring im August 1936 angeforderte Denkschrift dar, in der er den nationalsozialistischen Wirtschaftspolitikern seinen Standpunkt unzweideutig darlegte und ihnen ein letztes Mal seine Unterstützung anbot, solange sie umdachten : Er war zu der Erkenntnis gelangt, daß es sich bei der von ihm beklagten Politik nicht um negative Begleiterscheinungen handelte, sondern, daß eine vollständige Neuorientierung notwendig war. Göring bewertete die Denkschrift Hitler gegenüber als « vollständig unbrauchbar » , zumal sie völlig mit Hitlers eigener in dieser Zeit entstandenen programmatischen Denkschrift über den Vierjahresplan kollidierte. Seine Erfahrungen als Preiskommissar und seine Einblicke in wirtschafts- und rüstungspolitische Angelegenheiten des NS-Regimes hatten zu einer direkten Konfrontation mit Führungsgrößen der NSDAP geführt und seine in der Kommunalpolitik angesammelten Zweifel zum Kulminieren gebracht : Seine kritische Begleitung der nationalsozialistischen Politik schlug in Opposition um. Er war nicht nur bei der Führung in Ungnade gefallen, sondern wollte von sich aus « nur noch mit Anstand aus der Sache herauskommen » . Der Rücktritt vom Oberbürgermeisterposten zeichnete sich ab.

Die Richtlinien der DGO verschlechterten die Situation der Kommunalverwaltung immer weiter. Gærdeler kritisierte die « öde Mechanisierung und Gleichmacherei » , die sich als ein « Unglück für unser Vaterland » erweisen werde. Seine Tätigkeit als Oberbürgermeister empfand er nicht länger als interessant und seine Position als einflussreich, sondern sämtliche Prozesse nur noch als abtumpfend. Daher erwog er im Frühjahr 1936, in die Privatwirtschaft zu wechseln.

Am 5. Mai 1936 erklärte er sich bereit, in den Dienst des Krupp-Konzerns einzutreten. Bereits seit Oktober 1935 stand Gørdeler in Kontakt mit Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach. Seit seinem Besuch auf der Villa Hügel am 4. Dezember 1935 arbeitete Gørdeler auf seinen Eintritt in das Krupp-Direktorium hin. Dennoch wollte er seine anstehende Wiederwahl abwarten, um eine Machtprobe mit dem Reichsinnenminister Wilhelm Frick zu provozieren. Am 22. Mai 1936 erfolgte schließlich die Wiederwahl Gørdelers durch den von den Nationalsozialisten instrumentalisierten Rat der Stadt Leipzig. Ausschlaggebend für die Wiederwahl des parteilosen NS-Kritikers Gørdeler durch die Nationalsozialisten war, daß er « trotz seiner politischen Unzulänglichkeit das Vertrauen unseres Führers besaß ». Die Differenzen zwischen Gørdeler und der NS-Führung vom Sommer 1935 blieben den nationalsozialistischen Ratsherren wohl verborgen. Der wiedergewählte Gørdeler selbst wartete nun lediglich auf einen Anlass für seinen Rücktritt.

Noch vor Gørdelers Wiederwahl wandte sich der Leiter des Amtes für Handwerk und Händel der NSDAP-Kreisleitung Leipzig, Eckert, an den Oberbürgermeister : Er forderte den Abriss des « vor dem Gewandhaus aufgestellten Denkmals des Vollblutjuden » Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Zu diesem Zeitpunkt bestand im gesamten Deutschen Reich bereits ein Aufführverbot « nicht-arischer Kompositionen », zu denen die Nationalsozialisten auch die Werke Mendelssohns zählten. Gørdeler hatte sich stets für deren Aufführung eingesetzt, und so konnte beispielsweise der Thomanerchor noch im September 1936 ungeahndet Lieder Mendelssohns singen. Nach der Abrissforderung prüfte der Kulturstadtrat Hauptmann zunächst die Rechtslage im Fall des Denkmals. Der Stadtrat übte unterdessen immensen Druck auf Gørdeler aus, den « Juden in Erz » zu beseitigen. Schließlich machte der Stadtkämmerer Köhler den Vorschlag, das Denkmal durch ein Bildnis eines anderen bedeutenden deutschen Musikers zu ersetzen. Carl Friedrich Gørdeler nannte diese Alternative « prüfbar », unter der Voraussetzung, daß das Denkmal unangetastet bleibe, bis er seine Entscheidung getroffen habe. Dadurch gewann er Zeit, um in Regierungskreisen Unterstützung für seine ablehnende Haltung zu suchen. Ausgerechnet das Reichspropagandaministerium ließ verlauten, daß « solche Bildstürmerei » nicht gewünscht sei. Diese Stellungnahme beruhte allerdings nicht auf tatsächlicher Unterstützung der Position Gørdelers, sondern wurde nur mit Blick auf die Olympischen Spiele in Berlin abgegeben. Josef Gøebbels befürchtete in dieser Frage ein negatives Echo im Ausland.

Als Carl Friedrich Gørdeler vom 8. bis 13. November nach Skandinavien reiste, um und andere am 10. November in Helsinki einen Vortrag über Wirtschaft, Preise und Währung zu halten, ergriffen die Nationalsozialisten die Initiative und entfernten in der Nacht vom 9. auf den 10. November eigenmächtig das Mendelssohn-Denkmal. Die Nachricht vom Abriss erhielt Gørdeler auf seiner Rückreise in Stockholm. Nach seiner Rückkehr warf er seinem NS-Stellvertreter Hans Rudolf Haake Illoyalität vor ; als er bemerkte, daß der Stadtrat und auch die Reichsregierung gegen ihn standen und eine Wiedererrichtung des Denkmals auf keinen Fall unterstützen würden, reichte er am 25. November 1936 sein Pensionierungsgesuch ein. Er wurde sofort beurlaubt. Später, als er im Gefängnis über seinen Rücktritt berichtete, schrieb er : « Damals führte ich den klaren Entschluss aus, nicht die Verantwortung für eine Kulturschandtat zu übernehmen. » Am 22. März 1937 erfolgte Gørdelers Verabschiedung aus dem Dienst der Stadt Leipzig.

« Ein beruhigtes Europa, in organischer Entwicklung zu immer größer werdender wirtschaftlicher Einheit fortschreitend, bedeutet die Sicherung des Friedens und der Wohlfahrt der Welt. »

Gørdeler organisierte vielerorts in Europa und den USA Treffen mit Politikern und Industriellen, die als Ansprechpartner für ihn in Frage kamen, um sich, entgegen einer praktizierten Appeasement-Politik, für eine härteres Vorgehen gegenüber Hitler einzusetzen. Nach dem offenen Konflikt mit der NSDAP wagte Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach nicht mehr die Berufung Gørdelers in den Krupp-Vorstand ohne Rücksprache mit Hitler. Noch im März 1937 teilte er Gørdeler mit, daß Hitler einen Mann mit den wirtschaftspolitischen Ansichten Gørdelers nicht in der Schwerindustrie sehen möchte. Stattdessen kam dieser über Theodor Bäuerle in Kontakt mit dem Kreis oppositioneller Demokraten in Stuttgart, der sich um den Industriellen Robert Bosch gebildet hatte. Bosch verfolgte das Ziel, die westeuropäischen Staatsmänner vor der Gefährlichkeit des Nationalsozialismus zu warnen. Aus diesem Grund schloß er 1937 mit Gørdeler einen Beschäftigungsvertrag ab, der nun als Berater der Firma Bosch in Finanzfragen angestellt war. Dieses Vertragsverhältnis gab seiner bevorstehenden ausgedehnten Reisetätigkeit ein legales Aussehen - sogar Hermann Göring, bei dem er wegen einer Visa-Angelegenheit vorsprach, unterstützte das Vorhaben in Unkenntnis des tatsächlichen Zwecks. Gleiches gilt für Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, der Gørdelers Reisen finanziell unterstützte. Bis zum Beginn des Zweiten Weltkrieges bereiste Gørdeler mehr als zehn europäische Länder, den Nahen Osten und Nordafrika sowie Kanada und die Vereinigten Staaten. Ausführliche Berichte über seine Reiseeindrücke sandte er an Krupp, Bosch, Göring, Schacht, daneben an die Generäle Werner von Fritsch, Georg Thomas, Franz Halder und Ludwig Beck. Diesen kannte er vermutlich bereits seit seiner Zeit als Preiskommissar 1935. Die Auslandsreisen Gørdelers legten den Grundstein für die Zusammenarbeit mit Beck, die später den Kern des konservativen Widerstandes bildete.

Seine erste Reise führte ihn nach Brüssel (4. bis 16. Juni 1937) und England (bis 15. Juli) . In Belgien knüpfte er nicht nur Kontakte zu einflussreichen Wirtschaftsführern, sondern wurde auch von König Leopold III. und Premierminister Paul van Zeeland empfangen. Die Weise, auf die Gørdeler aufgenommen wurde, obwohl er ohne Auftrag irgendeiner Behörde oder Partei reiste, zeigt, daß er im Ausland durchaus als politische Persönlichkeit hohen Ranges und in gewisser Weise auch als Vertreter eines « anderen Deutschlands » angesehen wurde.

Sein Aufenthalt in London bot ihm gleichermaßen Anlass zur Kritik wie zur Bewunderung : Mit Sorge betrachtete er die unsichere Sozialpolitik und das Nachlassen der wirtschaftlichen Kraft. Dagegen machten vor allem der englische Lebensstil und die politischen Traditionen des Vereinigten Königreichs, wie etwa das britische « self-government » , großen Eindruck auf ihn. Überrascht zeigte er sich von der Verhandlungsbereitschaft Großbritanniens (« Appeasement ») , obgleich die Juden- und Kirchenpolitik der Nationalsozialisten das Verhältnis schwer getrübt hatten. Besonders intensive Gespräche ergaben sich mit Außenminister Anthony Eden. Später, als der Widerstand seine außenpolitischen Ansichten formulierte, blieb Gørdeler der Anglophile, während Ludwig Beck vor allem auf eine Verständigung mit der « Grande Nation » Frankreich setzte.

Ende Juli plante Gørdeler eine ausgedehnte Südamerika-Reise, zog es dann aber vor, zunächst nach Paris zu fahren. In seinem Bericht aus Frankreich schilderte er die große Verständigungsbereitschaft, aber auch die Empfindlichkeit wegen der Beteiligung deutscher Truppen im Spanischen Bürgerkrieg. Es gelang ihm, dauerhafte Kontakte zum französischen Politiker Paul Reynaud zu knüpfen. Von Boulogne aus setzte er im September 1937 nach Kanada über. In Ottawa sprach er von großen Möglichkeiten einer deutsch-kanadischen Kooperation, da Deutschland als Industrie- und Forschungsnation für eine Partnerschaft mit dem rohstoffreichen Kanada besonders geeignet sei. Über diese Idee sprach er auch mit Premierminister Mackenzie King.

Ab dem 2. Januar 1938 hielt sich Gørdeler in den Vereinigten Staaten auf, wo der emigrierte Anwalt Gotthilf Bronisch in New York als sein wichtigster Vertrauter agierte. Während seiner Amerikareise hatte Gørdeler sein politisches Testament verfasst, welches er Bronisch mit der Maßgabe übergab, es im Falle seines Todes zu veröffentlichen. Ausführlich kritisierte er die New-Deal-Politik Roosevelts, wobei er gleichzeitig von beachtenswerten Chancen für eine Achse Washington-London-Berlin berichtete. Würde Deutschland die europäischen Probleme durch eine friedliche Verständigung mit seinen Nachbarstaaten und Großbritannien lösen können, erhoffte er sich dadurch auch eine transatlantische Zusammenarbeit. Falls das Deutsche Reich aber den kriegerischen Konflikt heraufbeschwören sollte, so stünde Amerika als einer seiner stärksten Gegner fest. Auch in Amerika kam er mit einflussreichen Männern des öffentlichen Lebens zusammen, und andere mit Außenminister Cordell Hull, dem ehemaligen Präsidenten Herbert C. Hoover, Finanzminister Henry Morgenthau sowie dem Industriellen Owen D. Young.

Nach seiner Rückkehr im Januar 1938 erfuhr er in einem langen Gespräch mit den Generälen Beck und Fritsch von Hitlers Kriegsplänen, die seinen Hoffnungen auf eine politische Verständigung die Grundlage entzogen. Gørdeler versuchte, die Militärs zu einem Putsch zu bewegen, was jedoch auch dadurch scheiterte, daß General Fritsch zwei Wochen darauf im Zuge der Blomberg-Fritsch-Krise abgesetzt wurde. Mitte März, unmittelbar nach dem Anschluß Österreichs, brach Gørdeler zu seiner zweiten Reise nach Frankreich und England auf. In der britischen Hauptstadt hielt er vor der renommierten London School of Economics and Political Science (LSE) einen Vortrag zum Thema « Wirtschaft und öffentliche Verwaltung », der äußerer Vorwand der Reise war. Zudem begleiteten ihn seine Frau und seine Tochter, um dem London-Aufenthalt einen « familiären Anstrich » zu verleihen. In seinem Vortrag vor der LSE unterstrich Gørdeler seine wirtschaftsliberalen Ansichten und warnte vor Lohnregulierung und dem bevormundenden Wohlfahrtsstaat. Gleichzeitig polemisierte er gegen den damals überaus populären John Maynard Keynes und dessen Vorstellungen von staatlich beeinflussten Wirtschaftsprozessen. Ein von Heinrich Brüning arrangiertes Zusammentreffen mit Winston Churchill kam auf dieser Reise nicht zustande. Neben dem Anschluß Österreichs, den er sorgenvoll beobachtete, stand die Frage des Sudetenlandes in den Gesprächen mit dem Diplomaten Robert Vansittart, I. Baron Vansittart, auf der Agenda. Gørdeler betonte, daß er vor allem einen klaren Kurs gegenüber NS-Deutschland für notwendig halte, zweitrangig, wie die Entscheidung Großbritanniens in dieser Frage ausfallen würde.

« Es ist eine phantastische Illusion, einen dauerhaften Frieden auf einen Pakt mit dem Teufel zu gründen. »

(Carl Friedrich Gørdeler über das Münchner Abkommen, 1. Oktober 1938.)

1938 reiste Gørdeler fünf weitere Male nach Großbritannien, um den Manager Arthur Primrose Young zu teilweise mehrtägigen Gesprächen zu treffen. Der Kontakt war über Robert Vansittart zustande gekommen. Die Gesprächsprotokolle ergaben die sogenannten « X-Dokumente », die das Foreign and Commonwealth Office sowie über Owen D. Young US-Präsident Franklin D. Roosevelt erreichten. So war das Weiße Haus en détail über Gørdelers Vorstellungen informiert. Im Wesentlichen forderte dieser, der in den Gesprächsprotokollen nur « X » genannt wurde, ein entschiedenes Auftreten zumindest Frankreichs und der USA. Großbritannien betreffend kritisierte er Premierminister Neville Chamberlain, den er als « Hemmschuh » für ein aktives Auftreten gegen den Nationalsozialismus bezeichnete. Die schwache Appeasement-Politik lehnte er als unmoralisch und in höchstem Maße gefährlich ab. Die « X-Dokumente » wurden nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges von A. P. Young veröffentlicht ; sie zeichnen ein differenziertes Bild von Gørdelers Ansichten im Jahr 1938. Statt einer Kursänderung seitens der britischen Regierung zeichnete sich ein Abkommen mit dem Deutschen Reich über die Sudetenfrage ab. Noch am 11. September richtete Gørdeler eindringliche Briefe nach London, in denen er berichtete, daß Hitler fest zum Krieg entschlossen sei.

Als am 30. September das Münchner Abkommen zwischen England und Frankreich einerseits und dem Deutschen Reich und Italien andererseits geschlossen wurde, sprach Gørdeler vom « Verrat von München » . Tief besorgt sprach er von einem Erstarken der « bösen Kräfte » in Deutschland, das dieses Zugeständnis an Hitler bringen würde. Aus Sorge vor polizeilicher Verfolgung reiste er Mitte Oktober 1938 in die Schweiz.

In den letzten zwölf Monaten vor Kriegsbeginn blieb Gørdeler weiterhin einer Doppelstrategie verpflichtet, die darauf abzielte, die NS-Regierung durch inneren und äußeren Druck von ihrem politischen und wirtschaftlichen « Vabanque » - Kurs abzubringen. Im Frühjahr 1939 unternahm Gørdeler eine weitere Reise nach Frankreich. Im Sommer führte ihn sein Weg noch einmal nach Großbritannien, in die Schweiz und in die Türkei. Von der Türkei aus besuchte Gørdeler auch die britischen, französischen und italienischen Besitzungen im Nahen Osten und in Nordafrika. Über diese Reisen fertigte er wie in den Vorjahren umfangreiche Berichte an, die er Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, Robert Bosch, Hermann Göring, Hjalmar Schacht, Ludwig Beck, Werner von Fritsch, Franz Halder, Georg Thomas sowie dem Auswärtigen Amt und der Reichskanzlei zur Verfügung stellte. In diesen Ausarbeitungen plädierte Gørdeler für eine auf « Ausgleich » und « Verständigung » mit den Westmächten gestützte Revision des Versailler Vertrages. Nach der Annexion der Sudetengebiete hielt er eine Reihe von « deutschen Lebensforderungen » für erfolgreich verhandelbar : « Beseitigung des Korridors, Einräumung von Kolonialbesitz, billige Hergabe von Gold, um die deutsche Währung wieder weltfähig zu machen. » Als Gegenleistung solle Deutschland den Westmächten verbindliche Rüstungsbegrenzungen und eine damit einhergehende Wiederannäherung an die Weltwirtschaft zusichern. Gørdeler versuchte mit diesen Vorschlägen, bei verschiedenen Einflussgruppen und bei offiziellen Stellen einen alternativen politischen Ansatz ins Gespräch zu bringen, der « das Risiko eines großen Krieges verringerte, ohne von der seit 1933-1934 von ihm mitverfochtenen Expansionsstrategie die geringsten Abstriche zu machen » . In dem Bericht über die Gespräche, die er während seiner letzten Auslandsreise vor dem Krieg geführt hatte, schrieb Gørdeler Anfang August 1939 : « Die Grenzen von 1914 im Osten, Kolonien, Gold, Zutritt zu Rohstoffen, dürften zu haben sein. » Unabdingbare Voraussetzung dafür sei aber ein Verzicht Deutschlands auf einseitige Schritte gegenüber Polen, da Großbritannien und Frankreich einen weiteren Prestige- und Einflussverlust nicht mehr hinnehmen könnten und unter diesen Umständen den Kampf aufnehmen müssten. Diesen « Großkrieg » aber werde Deutschland verlieren, da es auf eine solche Auseinandersetzung wirtschaftlich nicht vorbereitet und Italien als Bundesgenosse wertlos sei.

Als Gørdeler sich darüber klar wurde, daß diese Vorstöße nicht mehr bis in das Machtzentrum durchdrangen, begann seine endgültige, auch innenpolitische Abkehr vom NS-Regime. Die neuere Forschung hat herausgearbeitet, daß es sich noch bei Gørdelers verfassungspolitischen Reformvorschlägen vom Herbst 1938 « nicht um eine strikte Ablehnung des nationalsozialistischen Regimes handelte, sondern um Vorschläge zu dessen Verbesserung » . Der grundlegende Distanzierungsprozess setzte Ende 1938 ein, als Gørdeler seine Bemühungen um ein Regierungsamt einstellte. Er war im Sommer 1940 abgeschlossen.

« Das deutsche Volk muß und wird sich selbst von einem System befreien, das unter dem Schutz des Terrors ungeheuerliche Verbrechen begeht und Recht, Ehre und Freiheit des deutschen Volkes zerstört hat. »

(Carl Friedrich Gørdeler, Mai 1943.)

Im Zusammenwirken mit dem früheren Generalstabschef des Heeres Ludwig Beck entwickelte Gørdeler (ausgehend von der bereits seit 1863 in Berlin bestehenden Mittwochsgesellschaft, einem Kreis nationaler und konservativer Politiker) in den folgenden Jahren den Kern einer Widerstandsgruppe gegen die NS-Regierung. Zu diesem Kreis stießen zwischen 1941 und 1943 auch Sozialdemokraten wie Wilhelm Leuschner und ehemalige Funktionäre der christlichen Gewerkschaften wie Jakob Kaiser und Bernhard Letterhaus. Leuschner, Kaiser und Letterhaus hatten bereits 1933 im sogenannten Führerkreis der Gewerkschaften zusammengearbeitet. In Leipzig wurden der Bankier Wilhelm Schomburgk und der Unternehmer Walter Cramer zu Gørdelers engsten Vertrauten. Regelmäßige Gesprächspartner Gørdelers in Berlin waren vor allem Ulrich von Hassell, Paul Lejeune-Jung, Erwin Planck, Johannes Popitz, Josef Wirmer, Max Habermann, Albrecht Haushofer, Carl Langbehn und Jens Jessen.

Obwohl dieser Oppositionszirkel « hauptstadtbekannt » war, wurde er bis 1944 von der Gestapo nicht behelligt. Der Historiker Karl Heinz Roth führt diese « großbürgerlich-aristokratische Immunität » unter anderem darauf zurück, daß sich die politische Konzeption der Gørdeler-Gruppe bis 1943 weiterhin im Rahmen des « Bündnisses zwischen den traditionellen Eliten und der NS-Bewegung » bewegte. Noch im Juli-August 1943 autorisierte Gørdeler den Versuch von Johannes Popitz, Heinrich Himmler für die Anliegen der Gruppe zu gewinnen. Mit Claus von Stauffenberg, der die zum Staatsstreich entschlossenen jüngeren Stabsoffiziere repräsentierte, nahm Gørdeler erst im September 1943 Verbindung auf.

Ziel des Widerstands war für den Kreis um Gørdeler der Sturz Adolf Hitlers, um den Krieg zu beenden. Dabei lehnte Gørdeler persönlich die Tötung Hitlers ab und plädierte für dessen Verhaftung und einen anschließenden rechtsstaatlichen Prozess. Die Gruppe sah für die Zeit nach dem Umsturz Gørdeler als Reichskanzler vor. In dieser Eigenschaft erarbeitete er umfangreiche Pläne zu einer Verfassung und Ministerlisten, die vielen Mitverschwörern später zum Verhängnis geworden sind.

Die außen- und innenpolitische Konzeption Gørdelers war nicht frei von Widersprüchen. Obwohl er seit Anfang 1943 davon ausging, daß « die deutschen Kräfte auf allen Gebieten sich dem Zustand des Verbrauchtseins » näherten, der « Kräfteinsatz der Gegner aber noch einer erheblichen Steigerung fähig » sei, lehnte er eine Rückkehr zur politischen Vorkriegsgeographie und die umstandslose Aufgabe der seit 1938 erzielten deutschen Gebietsgewinne ab. Deutschland sollte in den Grenzen von 1914 (also nicht nur unter Einschluss der nach 1918 verlorenen preußischen Ostgebiete, sondern auch Elsass-Lothringens und Nordschleswigs) aus dem Krieg hervorgehen, zudem sollten Österreich und das Sudetenland beim Reich, dem Gørdeler auch für die Zeit nach Hitler eine Hegemonialstellung auf dem Kontinent zusprach, verbleiben. Der polnische Staat sollte allerdings restauriert werden und durch eine « Staatsunion mit Litauen » einen Zugang zur Ostsee erhalten. Zentrales Nahziel Gørdelers war es, zu einer Verständigung mit den USA und insbesondere mit Großbritannien zu gelangen, um so « alle Kriegskräfte des deutschen Volkes auf den Osten zu konzentrieren » ; einen Friedensschluss mit der UdSSR zog er nicht in Erwägung, sondern bot Briten und Amerikanern wiederholt an, die bewaffnete « Sicherung gegen Russland » zu übernehmen. Im Februar und Mai 1943 beriet er sich mit dem schwedischen Bankier Raoul Wallenberg und ließ durch dessen Brüder ein in diesem Sinne gehaltenes Schreiben an Churchill überbringen. Ähnliche Vorstöße unternahm er im Frühjahr 1944 über Allen Dulles in der Schweiz, George Earle in der Türkei und einmal mehr Wallenberg. Innenpolitisch kreiste Gørdelers Denken um Mittel und Wege, einen befürchteten, mit der Novemberrevolution vergleichbaren Umbruch « von unten », von dem er annahm, daß « er sehr viel schlimmere Formen annehmen (würde) als 1918 », unter allen Umständen zu verhindern. Eine wenigstens informelle Einbeziehung der KPD in die Umsturzvorbereitungen und die Gestaltung der Nachkriegsordnung lehnte er (anders als etwa Stauffenberg unter dem Einfluss Julius Lebers und Adolf Reichweins) strikt ab ; diese « reaktionäre » Haltung untergrub in den letzten Monaten vor dem Umsturzversuch die Position Gørdelers auch bei Stauffenberg, der zuletzt eher den Sozialdemokraten Leuschner als künftigen Reichskanzler favorisierte.

Gørdelers Verfassungspläne, deren Grundlagen er zuerst 1941 in der Programmschrift Das Ziel erarbeitete, können als konservativ, wirtschaftsliberal und antikommunistisch bezeichnet werden. Von den jüngeren Angehörigen des Kreisauer Kreises und dem sozialistischen Widerstand wurden sie deshalb abgelehnt. Für den ultrakonservativen Flügel der Opposition um Johannes Popitz, Ulrich von Hassell und Jens Jessen, der an der Perspektive « eines “ totalen ” Obrigkeitsstaates » festhielt, enthielt Gørdelers Ansatz umgekehrt bereits zu weitgehende Zugeständnisse an den Gedanken einer Repräsentativverfassung.

Eine uneingeschränkt direkte Wahl von Abgeordneten sahen Gørdelers Verfassungspläne allerdings nur für die Ebene der Gemeinden vor. Die repräsentativen Körperschaften auf Kreis-, Gau- und Reichsebene sollten vollständig oder zum Teil indirekt gewählt werden, ihre Beschlüsse waren für die Exekutive (von den Bürgermeistern an aufwärts) in zentralen Fragen nicht bindend. Gørdeler sah ein Zweikammerparlament mit einem Reichstag und einem Reichsständehaus vor. Die Reichstagsabgeordneten sollten zur Hälfte direkt, zur anderen Hälfte indirekt (durch die Abgeordneten der Gaulandtage) gewählt werden. Das Reichsständehaus konzipierte Gørdeler als Plenum des Besitz- und Bildungsbürgertums : Es sollte aus dem « Präsidenten und den Gruppenführern der Reichswirtschaftskammer (bestehen), aus den Präsidenten aller übrigen Reichskammern (Ärzte, Anwälte, Künstler und so weiter), der gleichen Zahl von Rektoren von Hochschulen, den Landeshauptleuten und bis zu 30 Personen, die der Staatsführer auf Grund ihrer Leistungen für das deutsche Volk auf Lebenszeit berufen muß ; diese letzteren müßen 50 Jahre alt sein » . Gesetzentwürfe sollten zwingend beide Kammern passieren ; Entwürfe « mit finanziellen Auswirkungen dürfen von einem oder beiden Häusern jedoch nur eingebracht werden, wenn der Reichskanzler vorher zugestimmt hat » . An die Spitze des Staates wollte Gørdeler einen mit umfangreichen Vollmachten ausgestatteten « Reichsführer » stellen : « In Betracht kommen : Erbkaiser, Wahlkaiser, auf Zeit gewählter Führer. » Persönlich favorisierte er die Erbmonarchie. Auch die kurzfristige Planung Gørdelers für die Zeit nach dem Umsturz wurde von den liberaldemokratisch orientierten Stimmen in seinem weiteren Umfeld nicht uneingeschränkt unterstützt. Gørdeler lehnte es beispielsweise ab, die Konzentrationslager nach einem erfolgreichen Umsturz sofort aufzulösen. Sie sollten der Wehrmacht übergeben und die Insassen richterlich überprüft werden. Der Reichsinnenminister sollte das Recht erhalten, die « weitere Verwahrung » auch nicht straffälliger (also politischer) Häftlinge anzuordnen, « soweit diese während des Krieges zur Sicherheit des Reiches unerlässlich ist » . Die Deutsche Arbeitsfront sollte in eine vergleichbare Organisation, für die weiterhin Zwangsmitgliedschaft galt, umgewandelt werden ; ihr Vorsitzender und dessen Stellvertreter konnten nach Gørdelers Vorstellungen zwar nunmehr von den Mitgliedern gewählt werden, waren aber vom Staat zu bestätigen. Dieser halbstaatlichen « Deutschen Gewerkschaft » sollte auch die Verantwortung für die Arbeitslosenversicherung und die Arbeitsämter übertragen werden. Die aus dem sogenannten Führerkreis hervorgegangenen Gewerkschafter in Gørdelers Umfeld wie Leuschner und Kaiser unterstützten diesen Plan ausdrücklich. Jene Gesetze und Regelungen, die die NSDAP privilegiert oder mit dem Staatsapparat verschmolzen hatten, sollten nach der Absetzung der Hitler-Regierung annulliert, die Partei aber nicht aufgelöst oder verboten werden. Die Hitlerjugend wollte Gørdeler in eine « Staatsjugend » unter Führung eines « in Erziehungsfragen bewährten Generals » umwandeln.

Nach Saul Friedländer gehörte Gørdeler in die Reihe der « konservativen Feinde des (nationalsozialistischen) Regimes » . Einer ihrer gemeinsamen Pläne war, daß in einem « künftigen Deutschland das Bürgerrecht nur Juden gewährt werden würde, die sich auf eine lange Vorfahrenreihe im Land berufen konnten ; die später Hinzugekommenen würden das Land verlassen müßen » . In diesem Zusammenhang propagierte Gørdeler den so genannten Judenstaat in Kanada als « Dauerlösung » für die europäischen Juden nach einem Friedensschluss mit den Alliierten. Auch wenn Gørdeler die zutage tretende Vernichtungspolitik der Nationalsozialisten in Osteuropa vehement ablehnte, änderte sich « an Gørdelers Antisemitismus bis zu seinem Lebensende nichts » . Andere Forschungen lehnen dagegen eine einseitig antisemitische Auslegung ab und sehen in den Schutzrechten, die auch ein jüdischer Staat über seine Bürger ausbreitet, den eigentlichen Kern von Gørdelers Konzept. Er habe darin « den Schutz der Juden einem jüdischen Staat anvertraut » und somit « in ihre eigenen Hände » legen wollen.

Am 14. Juli 1944, also noch vor dem Attentat vom 20. Juli 1944, wurde gegen Gørdeler Haftbefehl erlassen. Davon durch Freunde in Kenntnis gesetzt, floh er in seine westpreußische Heimat. Dort wurde er in einem Wirtshaus von der Buchhalterin Helene Schwärzel erkannt, verraten und am 12. August 1944 verhaftet. Der « Volksgerichtshof » verurteilte ihn wegen Verrats am Volke am 8. September 1944 zum Tode. In der Hoffnung, von ihm die Namen weiterer Verschwörer erforschen zu können, wurde seine Hinrichtung immer wieder verschoben. Zermürbt durch die Haftbedingungen wurde er zu einer « Ergebniserklärung » gebracht, in der er ausführte :

« So haben wir den 20. Juli als ein endgültiges Gottesurteil zu achten. Der Führer ist vor fast sicherem Tod bewahrt. Gott hat nicht gewollt, daß Deutschlands Bestand, um dessen Willen ich mich beteiligen wollte und beteiligt habe, mit einer Bluttat erkaufte wird; er hat auch dem Führer diese Aufgabe neu anvertraut. »

Offenbar im Bestreben, den Widerstand gegen das Regime zu rechtfertigen, gab er in Verhören und schriftlichen Berichten ausführlich Auskunft über Organisation, Ziele und Beteiligte des Widerstands aus Gewerkschaften, Unternehmen und Kirche.

Am 2. Februar 1945 wurde Gørdeler in Plötzensee durch Erhängen hingerichtet. Seinen Bruder Fritz ereilte das gleiche Schicksal ebenfalls in Plötzensee knapp einen Monat später.

Sein Sohn Reinhard Gørdeler war viele Jahre Vorstandsvorsitzender der Deutschen Treuhand-Gesellschaft und der KPMG. Sein ältester Sohn Ulrich war über vier Wahlperioden Landtagsabgeordneter in Niedersachsen.

Seit dem Jahr 1999 wird der Carl Gørdeler Preis für Kommunalwissenschaft, kurz Carl-Gørdeler-Preis, verliehen. Die

Prämie wird jährlich in Verbindung mit der Carl und Anneliese Gørdeler-Stiftung vergeben.

Im Film Operation Walküre - Das Stauffenberg Attentat wird er von Kevin R. McNally gespielt.

Hans Rudolf Haake

Rudolf Haake, son of a Leipzig businessman, was born on October 17, 1903. He completed studies in trade and worked until the end of 1924 as a warehouse clerk. In 1928-1929, he attended courses at Leipzig's « Handelshochschule » (College of Business) . In 1922, Haake became a member of the NSDAP. He played a large part in the development of the Hitler Youth organization in Leipzig. In 1926, Haake moved to Kelbra/Kyffhäuser, where he worked in his father's company. He founded a local branch of the NSDAP in Kelbra and was leader of the Kyffhäuser district office. In 1928, he returned to Leipzig. In 1930, by then a local Party Business Manager for the NSDAP in Leipzig, he moved into City Hall as a City Councilor. He became the regional director for municipal policy. From June 1931 until March 1932, Haake was editor of « Der Freiheitskampf » (The Battle for Freedom) , the publicity organ of the Saxon NSDAP.

He represented the Party with speeches at numerous events in and around Saxony and published several brochures. On January 1, 1933, Haake became director of Leipzig's municipal National-Socialist faction. In mid-March, 1933, Walter Dönicke, the State Commissioner for Special Service for the Leipzig administrative region, assigned Haake to the Leipzig municipal government in order « to protect the interests of the NSDAP » . In May 1933, the now like-minded City Council elected him honorary Mayor. In 1934, he rose to the paid position of full-time mayor and deputy to the Lord Mayor, Doctor Carl Gørdeler. During Gørdeler's administration, Haake was responsible for nearly all of the anti-Jewish measures enacted within the municipal government. After the resignations of Gørdeler in 1936, and his successor, Walter Dönicke, in 1938, Haake took-over the management of City Hall until the appointment of Alfred Freyberg in 1939. At the end of 1941, he began to come into conflict with Lord Mayor Freyberg. In November 1942, Haake was suspended from service. After a forced retirement in April 1943, Haake moved with his wife and 7 children to Kelbra. In 1944, he became Director of the Training and Education Department for the NSDAP eastern division's Lithuanian regional administration. When American soldiers arrived in Kelbra on April 12, 1945, Haake had barricaded himself in the City Hall. After a brief exchange of gunfire, he died of a bullet wound.

The institutional « Gleichschaltung » of the « Naturschutz » movement also faltered due to infighting among Nazi leaders. Despite Schultze-Naumburg's prominence in Rosenberg's Fighting League for German Culture, the DBH and the RVDH affiliated initially with Haverbeck's RVH, but they left this organization in 1934 because of the organization's chaotic structure and the perceived threat to regional autonomy. The Rhenish provincial governor Heinz (Heinrich) Haake, who had become president of the DBH in 1933, announced that the DBH would become a stand-alone organization with a loose affiliation to the German Gemeindetag, an agreement that specified that the Provincial Association in each Prussian province would steer regional Heimatschutz organizations. Haake rationalized the DBH's structure by designating one regional organization in each state, free city, or Prussian province as that area's representative Heimatschutz organization and calling on local Heimat organizations to become corporate members of the DBH's regional affiliates.⁸⁷ While the RNG had envisioned a centralization of landscape preservation tasks at the national level, continuing conflicts over jurisdiction ultimately allowed Haake and other provincial and state officials to chart an independent regionalist course in environmental affairs.

Synchronizing the Provinces : Heinz Haake and the Nazification of Rhenish Landscape Preservation

With Haake at the helm, Rhenish landscape preservation entered a new phase of activity in which older conceptions of provincial landscape preservation coexisted uneasily with the Nazi regime's racializing tendencies. Haake, who held power from April 1933 until the regime's collapse in 1945, was one of the 3rd « Reich »'s most important defenders of regional self-administration. The lack of cultural-political direction from Berlin led Haake to re-emphasize traditional discourses of regional autonomy as the best solution to executing administrative tasks and building national character. A member of the NSDAP since 1921, Haake belonged to the small band of Party leaders known as the « Old Fighters » and had served as one of only 7 NSDAP Deputies in the Prussian Assembly, between 1925 and 1929. His loyalty to Hitler and a strong and unified « Reich » were, therefore, unquestioned. Yet, he insisted on the need for regional autonomy within the organic State. He proclaimed that « every German has a duty to his more familiar "Heimat", where he first really experienced things and where he grew-up, on a par with his membership in the greater German "Volksgemeinschaft" ». The German landscape and the German person are not uniform in their appearance, but rather German life is embodied in a diversity of forms that in their totality represent « Germandom ».

As president of the Prussian Gemeindetag, an organization representing the interests of provincial governors, Haake defended Wilhelm Heinrich Riehl's belief in the diversity of « land and people » as the basis of German national character.

Echoing the aesthetic perspective of the region's cultural elites, Haake's promise to build-up regional cultural affairs evoked a rhetorical and institutional continuity with previous « Heimat » traditions, thus facilitating the middle-class organization's incorporation into the regime. Haake's emphasis on the organic region as the basis for state building and cultural promotion led to growing provincial support for « Naturschutz » and « Heimatschutz » activities. Between 1933 and 1937, Haake more than doubled the province's funding for cultural affairs, from 500,000 « Reichsmarks », in 1933, to 1,250,000 « Reichsmarks », in 1937, with a sizable increase for « Naturschutz » affairs. In 1934, for example, « Naturschutz » offices reported receiving approximately 6,800 « Reichsmarks », with 4,000 coming from the provincial administration and 1,800 from the Rhenish « Oberpräsident ». In 1937, in contrast, the provincial administration reported granting approximately 26,500 « Reichsmarks » for « Naturschutz ». This included funds for a new limnology research center in Krefeld, 4,500 « Reichsmarks » for the Rhineland-Westphalia Natural History Association, and 2,000 « Reichsmarks » for a new provincial journal, « Rhenish Friend of Nature », which showcased the province's achievements in nature protection and nature study. Provincial funding not only helped state nature protection offices but also provided continuous support for organizations such as the VVS and the « Eifelverein », and this bolstered their nature protection engagement. Haake named Hubert Iven, the noted naturalist and former district nature protection officer in Cologne, to become the head of the Rhine Province's nature protection office. Although the Rhineland's nature protection offices remained honorary posts rather than true civil-service positions, the province took steps to enhance the status of nature protection officers. The province published administrative guidelines for district « Naturschutz » officers, outlining their responsibilities and providing directions for executing the RNG's provisions, and created a series of courses that provided professional training in landscape planning. Under the provisions of the new law, Rhenish nature protection officials were to ensure the protected status of several existing nature protection regions, including the Siebengebirge, the Rodderberg, the Wahner Heath, and the Urfelder Heath, as well as new ones, such as Bislicher Island, by registering them in the so-called « “ Reich ” Nature Protection Book » .

To integrate « Heimatschutz » into regional planning, Haake established the Rhenish Society for Regional Planning, the regional affiliate of the « Reich » Office for Spatial Planning (« Reichstelle für Raumordnung ») , in 1936. Under Haake's direction, the Rhenish Society for Regional Planning (« Rheinische Landesplanungsgemeinschaft ») implemented the Nazi drive toward functionally efficient spatial planning by promoting economic growth, improving the province's infrastructure, rationally distributing the Rhineland's natural resources, and expanding the province's stock of public housing. Such measures included many projects that were detrimental to nature protection, including agricultural land reclamation, street building, dam construction, and suburban expansion. Yet, Haake viewed careful regional planning as an extension of the regime's commitment to preserving Germany's landscape. Spatial planning, he remarked, « is concerned with a social demand, that is creatively based and precisely therefore (reflects) the harmony with Nature » . Calling on the RVDH to work closely with the Rhenish Society for Regional Planning, Haake charged the RVDH with helping to create a comprehensive regional plan for the Rhine Province. Whereas earlier provincial planning efforts had centered on « defending against damages left behind by the Liberal period » , noted a 1936 issue of « Die Rheinprovinz » , the Nazi regime demanded a « creative new ordering of the entire space » . The new organic landscape would be both functional and beautiful, attuned to æsthetic needs and the health of the population.

Hans Rudolf Haake (geboren 17. Oktober 1903 in Leipzig ; gestorben 12. April 1945 in Kelbra) war ein deutscher Kommunalpolitiker der NSDAP und übte 1937 sowie 1938-1939 das Amt des Oberbürgermeisters der Stadt Leipzig kommissarisch aus.

Der gelernte Handlungsgehilfe war ab 1924 als einer der ersten Nationalsozialisten Leipzigs mit dem Aufbau der Leipziger Hitlerjugend befasst. 1925 trat er in die NSDAP ein und besuchte eine Rednerschule dieser Partei. In der Folgezeit wurde Haake häufig als Redner bei Versammlungen eingesetzt. Bei den Kommunalwahlen von 1929 und 1932 wurde Haake als Stadtverordneter gewählt. Ab 1933 war er Vizevorsteher der Stadtverordneten. Im gleichen Jahr wurde er zum ehrenamtlichen Bürgermeister gewählt. 1935 erfolgte die Wahl zum berufsmäßigen Bürgermeister und damit gleichzeitig zum Stellvertreter des Oberbürgermeisters Carl Friedrich Gørdeler. Haake war Dezernent für das Statistische Amt, das Gewerbeamt, das Amt für Wehrmichtsangelegenheiten, das Schul- und Bildungsamt, das Markthallenamt, das Vermietungs- und Stadtverkehrsamt, das Stadtgesundheitsamt und die Beschäftigungsstelle.

Nach dem Machtantritt der Nationalsozialisten im Deutschen Reich verkörperte Haake wie kein Zweiter die Gleichschaltungspolitik in der Leipziger Stadtverwaltung. Nach der Ernennung des Oberbürgermeisters Carl Friedrich Gærdeler zum Reichskommissar für die Preisbildung im Jahre 1934 nutzte er die häufige Abwesenheit Gærdelers dazu aus, dessen zur NSDAP distanzierenden kommunalpolitischen Kurs zu unterlaufen und zum Teil offen zu sabotieren. Im November 1936 wurde während einer Auslandsreise Gærdelers auf seine Veranlassung hin das Denkmal für den jüdischen Komponisten Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy abgerissen. Da Gærdeler die Wiedererrichtung nicht durchsetzen konnte, nahm er seine Wiederwahl zum Leipziger Oberbürgermeister nicht an. Deshalb führte Haake ab dem 1. Januar 1937 kommissarisch das Amt des Leipziger Oberbürgermeisters bis zum Amtsantritt Walter Dönickes am 12. Oktober 1937. Nach der Absetzung Dönickes am 11. Oktober 1938 wurde Haake erneut kommissarischer Oberbürgermeister. In diesem Amt blieb er bis zum 20. August 1939. Sein Nachfolger wurde Alfred Freyberg.

In die Amtszeiten Haakes fallen die Bildung der Leipziger Stadtwerke (1937) , die 125-Jahr-Feier der Völkerschlacht (1938) , die Abschiebung von 1.598 Leipziger Juden nach Polen sowie die Novemberpogrome 1938, bei der sechs Leipziger Synagogen zerstört wurden, darunter die Große Gemeindesynagoge.

1943 wurden von dem amtierenden Oberbürgermeister Freyberg Korruptionsvorwürfe gegen ihn erhoben, woraufhin er aus der Stadtverwaltung entlassen wurde. Im Anschluß war Haake zeitweise Hauptarbeitsgebietsleiter der NSDAP in Litauen.

Haake schoss am 12. April 1945 aus einem Fenster des Rathauses in Kelbra auf amerikanische Soldaten, von denen er auch zwei verletzte. Danach erschoss er sich selbst. Seine Leiche zeigte nur wenige Blutstropfen am Kopf.

Der NSDAP-Politiker Hans Rudolf Haake amtierte als Bürgermeister sowie zweimal kommissarisch als Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Leipzig. An der Öffentlichen Höheren Handelslehranstalt in Leipzig bestand Haake Ostern 1921 die Reifeprüfung und arbeitete bis Ostern 1923 als kaufmännischer Lehrling bei der Lebensmittelgroßhandlung Theodor Bader und dann ein weiteres halbes Jahr als Kontorist. Anschließend war er bis August 1924 bei der Lebensmittelgroßhandlung Günther Stöckert als Lagerist beschäftigt. Danach arbeitete er im Unternehmen seines Vaters, bis 1926 in Leipzig und bis 1928 in Kelbra. 1928-1929 studierte Haake zwei Semester an der Handelshochschule in Leipzig, brach das Studium aber aufgrund seiner politischen Tätigkeiten ab. Bereits 1922 war er der NSDAP und nach Aufhebung des Parteiverbots erneut am 01.04.1925 mit der Mitgliedsnummer 1181 beigetreten. In Kelbra gründete er die Ortsgruppe der NSDAP und leitete den Bezirk Kyffhäuser. Nach dem Besuch einer NS-Rednerschule trat er ab 1927 als Versammlungsredner in Sachsen, Thüringen und Halle-Merseburg auf. Innerhalb der Partei machte Haake schnell Karriere und übernahm zahlreiche Ämter. So amtierte er ab Ende 1928 in Borna als Ortsgruppenleiter und von Oktober 1930 bis 1931 als Bezirksleiter im Kreis Borna. Hinzu kam von Juni 1931 bis Ende März 1932 seine Tätigkeit als Schriftleiter der NS-Tageszeitung « Der Freiheitskampf », 1932 bis 1933 als Kreisschulungsleiter im Kreis Leipzig und 1931 bis 1938 als Kreisamtsleiter für Gemeindepolitik. Im Herbst 1929 erfolgte Haakes Wahl in die Leipziger Stadtverordnetenversammlung, wo er im Januar 1930 in die inneren Ausschüsse Aufnahmeanusschuss und Schulausschuss sowie in den gemischten Ausschuss zur Beratung über die Eingemeindung von Vororten gewählt wurde. Auch übte er ab dieser Zeit das Amt des Geschäftsführers der NSDAP in Leipzig aus. Bei den Gemeindewahlen 1932 wurde er als Stadtverordneter wiedergewählt. Die Wahl Haakes zum ehrenamtlichen Bürgermeister von Leipzig erfolgte am 11.05.1933 ; ab dem 01.01.1935 war er als Bürgermeister der Stadt tätig und somit fester Vertreter Carl Friedrich Gørdelers. Außerdem fungierte er als Dezernent des Wirtschaftsamts, des Verkehrsamts, des Statistischen Amtes und des Vermietungsamts. Des Weiteren war er im Aufsichtsrat der Leipziger Außenbahn AG, des Gemeindeverbands für das Elektrizitätswerk Leipzig-Land, dem Hypothekenverein und dem Zweckverband für die Stadt- und Girobank und im Beirat der Leipziger Dichterstiftung. In Abwesenheit Gørdelers ließ Haake 1936 das Mendelssohn-Denkmal abreißen, was zu Streitigkeiten mit dem Oberbürgermeister führte. Nach Gørdelers Beurlaubung und anschließendem Ruhestand übernahm Haake am 01.01.1937 kommissarisch dessen Amt und wurde am 11.10.1937 durch Kurt Walter Dönicke abgelöst, der jedoch bereits ein Jahr später ebenfalls von seinem Posten entbunden wurde. So amtierte Haake ab dem 11.10.1938 erneut als kommissarischer Oberbürgermeister. Er übernahm die Geschäftsführung mit den Schwerpunkten Messe, Hafen- und Kanalbau, Gutenberg-Ausstellung und Wohnungsbauprogramm. Am 20.08.1939 erfolgte die Einführung Alfred Freybergs in das Amt des Oberbürgermeisters. Wegen einer Augenerkrankung mußte sich Haake im Februar 1942 einer Operation unterziehen, die jedoch nicht die gewünschten Verbesserungen brachte ; er blieb auf einem Auge blind. 1943 schied er wegen Korruptionsvorwürfen aus der Stadtverwaltung aus und siedelte nach Kelbra über. Später war er noch als Hauptarbeitsgebietsleiter und Redner der NSDAP in Litauen tätig und leitete dort bei der NSDAP-Bezirksleitung Litauen des Arbeitsbereichs Osten ab dem 17.01.1944 den Bereich Schulung und Erziehung. Aus Litauen kehrte er fast erblindet nach Kelbra zurück. Als amerikanische Truppen am 12.04.1945 in die Stadt einrückten, eröffnete er vom Rathaus aus das Feuer und verwundete den Kommandanten eines Panzers. Bei der Erstürmung des Gebäudes fand Haake den Tod.

Alfred Roller

Le peintre, graphiste et scénographe autrichien Alfred Roller est né le 2 octobre 1864 à Brünn, en Moravie, et est mort le 21 juin 1935 à Vienne.

Roller étudie d'abord à l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Vienne auprès de Christian Griepenkerl et de Eduard von Peithner Lichtenfels mais, finalement, il est désabusé par le traditionalisme de l'Académie. En 1897, il co-fonde la Sécession viennoise avec Koloman Moser, Joseph Maria Olbrich, Josef Hoffmann, Gustav Klimt et d'autres artistes qui rejettent le style dominant de l'art académique. En 1899, il devient professeur de dessin à l'Université des Arts appliqués de Vienne (« Kunstgewerbeschule ») puis est nommé président de la Sécession, en 1902. En début de carrière, il est très actif en tant que graphiste et dessinateur. Il conçoit de nombreuses couvertures et des vignettes pour les pages du périodique sécessionniste « Ver Sacrum » ainsi que les affiches pour les 4e, 14e et 16e expositions du mouvement. Il est également l'auteur de la mise-en-scène de ces mêmes expositions. En 1902, Roller est présenté par Carl Moll au compositeur et chef d'orchestre Gustav Mahler. Il exprime un intérêt dans la scénographie et montre à Mahler plusieurs croquis qu'il a exécutés pour l'Opéra « Tristan und Isolde » de Richard Wagner. Impressionné, Mahler l'embauche afin de concevoir les décors d'une nouvelle production de l'œuvre. La première, en février 1903, se veut un grand succès critique. Roller va mettre-en-scène d'autres productions de Mahler. Roller quitte la Sécession de même que son poste de professeur à la « Kunstgewerbeschule » pour devenir chef-décorateur à l'Opéra d'État de Vienne, poste qu'il va conserver jusqu'en 1909.

...

Gustav Mahler, éloigné du monde des arts plastiques, découvre le groupe d'artistes de la Sécession qui compte parmi ses membres Klimt, Moser, Hoffmann, Moll, Orlik et le scénographe Alfred Roller. La rencontre avec ce dernier, en 1902, est décisive. Confronté à la rigide tradition de l'Opéra de Vienne, il saisit cette occasion pour se libérer des mises-en-scène Classiques comme les proposait le pourtant très talentueux Heinrich Leffler, entre 1900 et 1903. Avec Roller, Mahler s'implique totalement dans un travail sans précédent sur tous les paramètres de la mise-en-scène. L'exigence par rapport aux musiciens est source de conflit :

« Je ne me suis pas ménagé et pouvais donc tout exiger des autres. » , dit-il dans son mot d'adieu à l'Opéra de Vienne. Le 15 octobre 1907, sa dernière représentation viennoise, « Fidelio » de Beethoven, est un triomphe.

Lorsque Gustav Mahler put enfin accéder, grâce à l'appui sans faille du Comte et Obersthofmeister Lichtenstein, en avril 1897, à la direction de l'Opéra de Vienne, tout d'abord en tant que « Kapellmeister » (le titre de directeur ne lui sera officiellement accordé qu'en septembre, pour le début de la nouvelle saison) , la vénérable scène lyrique des Habsbourg souffrait depuis quelques saisons de tous les symptômes de la routine. Mahler avait plusieurs fois pointé les effets pervers de cette fausse tradition qu'il qualifiait sans aménité et avec son habituelle (et dangereuse, surtout pour lui) absence de diplomatie de « Schlamperei » (littéralement : pagaille, mais à entendre plutôt dans le sens de travail bâclé) . Plus encore que l'indolent train-train propre à l'ère de Wilhelm Jahn, le directeur enfin sortant de l'institution Impériale qu'il menait tranquillement depuis 1881, c'était aux yeux de Mahler l'absence d'un directeur musical d'envergure qui pesait sur le rayonnement du théâtre : Hans Richter, le seul des 3 chefs d'orchestre alors en exercice dans la fosse qui eut une stature internationale, était de plus en plus souvent absent. Il allait d'ailleurs s'exiler définitivement en Angleterre, en 1900, prenant, entre autre la direction de l'Orchestre Hallé de Manchester.

La Ire apparition de Mahler dans la fosse du « Hofoper » prit d'emblée le caractère d'un manifeste. S'octroyant la direction de « Lohengrin » , il marchait clairement sur les terres d'Hans Richter, wagnérien de la Ire heure, et se rangeait sans ambiguïté du côté des partisans de l'auteur de « Tristan und Isolde » . Mahler avait donc choisi clairement le camp de la musique de l'avenir. Pourtant, il contrebalança immédiatement cette Ire apparition wagnérienne en dirigeant 19 jours plus tard une « Zauberflöte » de Mozart dont il avait repris de fond en comble le matériel d'orchestre. Tout au long de son « magister » , il reviendra régulièrement aux Opéras de Mozart, y conduisant une véritable ré-évaluation du style comme des moyens mis-en-œuvre et accompagnant lui-même les récitatifs du piano. Une santé chancelante l'empêcha de mener à bien ses autres projets, et l'été fut entièrement consacré à un repos nécessaire ainsi qu'à l'élaboration d'une nouvelle production intégrale du « Ring » , ouvrage absent depuis un certain temps de la scène viennoise. Avec ce nouveau cycle de l'« Anneau » , Mahler imposait un style dépouillé qui surprit la critique, lui valant des contradicteurs farouches mais aussi des thuriféraires ardents. Parmi eux, Hugo Wolf lui-même, qui transporté par l'art du chef, dut faire violence à sa timidité naturelle pour lui confier son « Corregidor » . L'affaire fera long feu, mais Mahler tiendra parole, créant l'œuvre en 1904, une année après la mort du compositeur.

Le soin que Mahler apporta à la direction musicale du « Ring » rompait sensiblement avec la tradition viennoise, qui, si elle consentait à produire les Opéras de Wagner, les avait jusque-là défigurés par de nombreuses coupures, pratique à laquelle même le gardien du temple wagnérien qu'était Hans Richter, héros du Festival de Bayreuth, avait dû se plier. C'est grâce à Mahler qu'une tradition philologique de l'interprétation wagnérienne s'enracina à Vienne.

La renommée de Mahler en temps que compositeur se trouva considérablement accrue par la publication de ses 1^{re} et 3^e Symphonies, ainsi que des parties séparées de la 2^e qui avait remporté un triomphe lors de sa création et que nombre d'orchestre souhaitaient mettre à leur répertoire. Toutes ces publications, généreusement supportées par un don de Guido Adler, affermirent encore le prestige du nouveau directeur du « Hofoper » .

En 1898, Hans Richter renonça aux Concerts de la Philharmonie, désignant intrinsèquement Mahler comme successeur. Si Mahler fut très souvent admiré à Vienne en tant que chef lyrique, il ne convainquit jamais complètement la critique dans son emploi de chef symphonique, alors même que le public, fasciné par son engagement, sa gestique nerveuse et ses programmations sortant des sentiers battus, lui vouait un culte que l'on peut vérifier par l'augmentation importante du nombre de spectateurs et d'abonnés. Lors de la tournée de l'Orchestre à Paris, en 1900, les louanges furent unanimes et la critique viennoise dût convenir un peu tard des grandes qualités, sinon du génie, de Mahler chef symphonique. Mais à mesure que les années passaient, Mahler fut de plus en plus perçu par les musiciens de la Philharmonie comme un autocrate absolu, au point que le compositeur décida, après sa maladie de 1901, de démissionner : un désamour partagé entre le chef et l'orchestre était consommé depuis longtemps alors même que le public continuait d'aduler Mahler.

Si l'on veut comprendre comment s'amalgama autour du compositeur un cercle de jeunes gens comprenant Arnold Schönberg, Alban Berg, Alexander von Zemlinsky, ou Anton von Webern, il faut prendre la mesure de l'impact des concerts symphoniques dirigés par Mahler. C'est au travers de cette part trop méconnue de son activité viennoise, plus encore que par sa présence à l'Opéra, qu'il devint un des éléments fédérateurs de la future Seconde École de Vienne. Des liens d'amitiés et d'admiration réciproques se tissèrent, qui aboutirent en 1904 à l'engagement actif de Mahler au sein du « Vereinigung schaffender Tonkünstler » en faveur notamment de Zemlinsky et de Schönberg.

Mais la défense de la musique contemporaine fut également une des préoccupations majeures du « magister » de Mahler à la « Hofoper » . Il y présenta pas moins de 30 créations : la « Manon » et le « Werther » (en première mondiale) de Massenet, « la Fiancée vendue » et « Dalibor » de Smetana, « la Bohème » , « Madama Butterfly » , « Louise » , « Samson et Dalila » , « Eugène Onegin » , « Djamilah » , « Feuersnot » , Vienne était bien devenue une des places majeures de la création lyrique.

Pourtant, Mahler considéra son travail comme imparfait tant qu'il ne put réaliser le rêve du spectacle total, qui est au cœur même du principe de l'Opéra, mais que la philosophie wagnérienne revivifia considérablement.

Sa rencontre, en avril 1902, avec Alfred Roller, allait définitivement métamorphoser le paysage de la scène lyrique viennoise.

Alfred Roller était depuis le début des années 1890 un membre actif des nouveaux courants artistiques qui bousculaient la Vienne Impériale. En 1897, il fonda avec ses amis peintres et poètes la Sécession viennoise, en devint le président en 1902 et fut l'éditeur de la fameuse revue « Ver Sacrum ». Sa véritable passion, et de fait son métier, était la mise-en-scène, lumières et décors compris. Mahler lui proposa de collaborer à une nouvelle production de « Tristan und Isolde ». Lorsque, le 21 février 1903, le rideau se leva sur le spectacle tant attendu, le public se trouva confronté à une esthétique radicale. Loin d'en être choqué, il en fut au contraire comme transporté. Alfred Roller s'exprimait en couleurs crues et en architectures épurées. Il accordait la 1^{re} place à la lumière, la chargeant souvent de significations symboliques. Ses maquettes et les décors qu'il en déduisait frappent aujourd'hui encore, tout comme les projets wagnérien d'Edmond Appia, par leur modernisme dont l'esthétique semble avoir plusieurs décennies d'avance.

Mais l'apparence du spectacle n'était qu'une part de sa magie. Roller, tout comme Mahler, était un admirateur de Sigmund Freud, et la relecture qu'il proposait de l'univers wagnérien ouvrait grand les portes de la psyché. Une direction d'acteur percutante ajoutait encore à cette vaste entreprise de ré-évaluation qui permit aux ouvrages de Wagner d'acquérir une nouvelle dimension. Wagner était devenu définitivement un musicien de l'avenir, et son théâtre était bien l'objet utopique du spectacle total, maintenant que la scène rejoignait enfin la musique.

On peut assurer que les expériences de Roller et de Mahler fondèrent une nouvelle esthétique du théâtre musical dont nos scènes contemporaines sont aujourd'hui encore les héritières. Leur collaboration fit flores et les spectacles devenus légendaires s'enchaînèrent : « Fidelio » (1904), un « Don Giovanni » qui stupéfia public et critique (1905), « l'Enlèvement au Sérail », « les Noces de Figaro » et « la Flûte enchantée » la même saison (1906), une complexe « Iphigénie en Aulide » que Mahler regardera comme son chef-d'œuvre du temps de Vienne, sont restés mythiques.

Après la mort de Mahler, Roller continuera à signer pour Vienne quelques productions majeures, notamment celles de l'« Elektra » et du « Rosenkavalier » straussien, cependant ce fut à Berlin, au théâtre et pour Max Reinhardt, qu'il produisit la part majeure de son œuvre.

Mais Mahler ne se souciait pas que de la scène et de l'orchestre. Il constitua à Vienne une équipe de chanteurs de la force, plutôt un ensemble idéal qu'une troupe : Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Selma Kurtz, Marie Gutheil-Schoder, Leo Slezak, Erik Schmedes, Richard Mayr figurent encore au panthéon des vrais connaisseurs lyriques.

Parallèlement, il engagea 2 jeunes chefs d'orchestre pour le seconder, Fanz Schalk et Bruno Walter ; ce dernier devint son disciple et l'un des fervents thuriféraires de son œuvre. Mahler vécut à la tête du « Hofoper » des années harassantes, faisant fi des intrigues de cours ou des continuelles cabales, n'avouant qu'une seule frustration, celle de ne pas avoir pu créer la « Salomé » de Strauß, interdite par la censure. Cette activité débordante, si elle freina durant les 1^{res} années son énergie créatrice sembla par la suite la libérer. L'été 1899 verra naître la 4^e Symphonie, l'année 1900 tout un ensemble de lieder (« Rückert », « Kindertotenlieder »), puis chaque été suivant une grande Symphonie orchestrale (5e, 6e, 7e), journal intime d'un homme dont l'œuvre devient le miroir.

En mars 1902, Mahler avait épousé Alma Schindler, ouvrant une étrange boîte de pandore. On sait que leur relation tumultueuse fut essentiellement basée sur l'idéalisation et la frustration et avec le recul du temps, et la publication des écrits intimes d'Alma, on perçoit mieux ce personnage que Frank Wedekind aurait pu inclure dans son théâtre. En forçant Mahler à l'introspection, Alma l'a reconduit à son œuvre. Celle-ci allait à nouveau prendre le 1er pas.

Des campagnes de presse nettement antisémites, croissant à mesure que Mahler privilégiait justement la divulgation de son œuvre, eurent raison et de sa santé et de sa patience. Le décès de sa fille aînée Maria, durant l'été, acheva de le déstabiliser. En décembre 1907, tout était consommé et les parties se séparaient d'un commun accord. Felix Weingartner, lui-même compositeur de talent autant que chef renommé, succédait à Mahler et Mahler, libéré, pouvait accepter l'offre qu'Heinrich Conrad lui avait faite en juin : directeur musical du Metropolitan Opera de New York. Le temps du Nouveau Monde était venu.

« Concernant l'embauche des artistes, Adolf Hitler n'exprima qu'une seule fois un " désir " : à l'occasion d'une nouvelle mise-en-scène de " Parsifal ", il proposa comme metteur-en-scène le célèbre artiste Alfred Roller, de l'Opéra National de Vienne. Malheureusement, à cette époque, Roller était déjà très malade et son travail ne nous donna pas entière satisfaction, de sorte que nous dûmes nous passer de sa collaboration, et que nous confiâmes le soin de réaliser de nouvelles esquisses à mon fils Wieland. Hitler se soumit sans protester à notre décision. » (Winnifred Wagner)

« Le Chevalier à la rose », dont Hugo Hofmannsthal écrit le livret en 1909 et 1910 en étroite collaboration avec Richard Strauß (leur correspondance montre que le compositeur avait des vues très précises sur le livret et savait les faire prévaloir), et dont la première eut lieu à Dresde, le 26 janvier 1911, fut un triomphe. Max Reinhardt était l'auteur de la mise-en-scène et Alfred Roller celui des décors et des costumes.

On entend souvent dire que le monde d'aujourd'hui change à une vitesse folle. Il y a moins d'un siècle, Richard Strauß a probablement déjà senti cette accélération et a décidé de vivre avec son temps. Après avoir connu un succès retentissant, tant commercial que critique, l'Opéra « Der Rosenkavalier » (1911) est adapté 15 ans après la première au médium le plus moderne de l'époque : le cinéma muet !

The Austrian painter, graphic designer, and set designer Alfred Roller was born on 2 October 1864 in Brünn, Mähren, and died on 21 June 1935 in Vienna.

Alfred Roller, at 1st, studied painting at the Academy of Fine-Arts in Vienna under Christian Griepenkerl and Eduard Peithner von Lichtenfels but, eventually, became disenchanted with the Academy's traditionalism. In 1897, he co-founded the Viennese Secession with Koloman Moser, Joseph Maria Olbrich, Josef Hoffmann, Gustav Klimt, and other artists who rejected the prevalent academic style of art. In 1899, he became a professor of drawing at the University of Applied Arts in Vienna (« Kunstgewerbeschule ») and president of the Secession, in 1902.

In his early career, Roller was very active as a graphic designer and draughtsman. He designed numerous covers and vignettes for the pages the Secessionist periodical « Ver Sacrum », as well as the posters for the 4th, 14th, and 16th Secession exhibitions. He also designed the layout of the exhibitions themselves.

In 1902, Roller was introduced to the composer Gustav Mahler by Carl Moll. Roller expressed an interest in stage design and showed Mahler several sketches he had made for Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde ». Mahler was impressed and decided to employ Roller to design the sets for a new production of the piece. The production, which premiered in February 1903, was a great critical success. Roller continued to design sets for Mahler's productions. Eventually, Roller left the Secession and his teaching post at the « Kunstgewerbeschule » to be appointed chief stage-designer to the Vienna State Opera, a position he held until 1909.

Alfred Roller studied architecture and painting at the Academy of Fine Arts in Vienna. In 1897, he was a co-founder of the Secession in Vienna and, in 1902, he became its president. In 1905, he left the Secession. He was brought to the Opera by Gustav Mahler and he designed sets and costumes, until he became the director of the School of Arts and Crafts in 1909. In 1908, he had met the young Adolf Hitler, who wanted to be an architect at the time.

He worked for several other theatres before he returned to the Opera in 1918. In 1920, he was among the founders of the « Festspiele » in Salzburg. In 1929, he became a teacher at the Max Reinhardt Seminar in Vienna. In 1934, Adolf Hitler, now « Reichskanzler » of Germany, brought him to the Wagner « Festspiele » in Bayreuth to design a new set for « Parsifal ». But the result was something that looked like the original set of 1882 and was a disappointment. At that time, Roller was already seriously ill and he died in 1935.

Adolf Hitler took a liking to his son, but the young man was sent to the front after his name was taken off a list of artists kept by Winnifred Wagner. There, he died soon afterwards.

The artist and designer Alfred Roller made his greatest impact as a stage-designer. With Gustav Klimt and others, he was one of the founder's of the Vienna Secession (1897), the multi-disciplinary group of artists that broke away from what they saw as the conservative Vienna Academy and its historicist style, to create new, modern art. Like his artist-colleagues, Roller also taught at Vienna's « Kunstgewerbeschule » (School of Applied Arts).

For the Secession, the « Gesamtkunstwerk » or Total Artwork (a unification of artists and craftsmen of different disciplines : painting, sculpture, architecture, design ; in the creation of an overarching concept) was the new ideal. Roller was the founding editor of the Secession's, « Ver Sacrum », an artistically designed and illustrated publication that included text, music, and poetry. He participated in the planning and design of the Secession's exhibitions, and his new, modern style of exhibition design was exemplified in the 1901 Secession exhibition, which featured paintings by Giovanni Segantini and sculpture by Auguste Rodin. The Secession's Beethoven exhibition (1902) was, perhaps, the group's greatest expression of the « Gesamtkunstwerk ». For the exhibition, the Secession building was devoted entirely to Beethoven, with his music playing (in an arrangement by Gustav Mahler), the display of art and design created especially for the occasion (notably, Klimt's « Beethovenfries ») and, at the exhibition's center, Max Klinger's monument to Beethoven.

Roller also applied the ideal of the « Gesamtkunstwerk » to his set designs. From 1903 to 1907, he was set designer to Gustav Mahler during the time the composer was music director of the Vienna « Hofoper » (Court Opera), where they did ground-breaking work together. Collaborating closely with Mahler, Roller realized and completed the musician's vision through staging. Roller's innovative stage design placed a new focus on light, color and space, with simplified staging. Roller went on to become head designer at the Vienna Opera and at the « Burgtheater ». He also designed the original productions of Richard Strauß' « Der Rosenkavalier » and « Die Frau ohne Schatten ».

Gustav Mahler, Alfred Roller, and the Wagnerian Gesamtkunstwerk : « Tristan » and Affinities between the Arts at the Vienna Court Opera

Stephen Carlton Thursby, Ph.D., Doctor of Philosophy, Florida State University.

Gustav Mahler's music has been extensively studied and discussed in both scholarly and popular circles, especially since the middle of the past Century. His conducting and directorial activity, however, deserves greater attention. The 1903 Vienna Court Opera production of Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » was a landmark in Opera history because of Mahler's Masterful conducting and Secession artist Alfred Roller's vibrant costumes, sets, and lighting design. Roller helped to move the Court Opera away from overly naturalistic and museum-like stage sets and costumes towards greater stylization and abstraction. The dissertation situates this collaborative project within « fin-de-siècle » debates about the nature of the Wagnerian « Gesamtkunstwerk », which today is generally misinterpreted as a multimedia spectacle in which all production elements are conceived organically.

Previous studies of this production explored the technical achievements of Mahler and Roller and surveyed the critical response in Vienna. More work remains to be done in examining the deeper cultural significance of the Mahler-Roller « Tristan » and differing contemporary views on the proper balance of aural and visual stimuli in the « Gesamtkunstwerk ». This study demonstrates the degree to which Mahler participated in a long tradition of addressing the proper sphere of the arts in the theatrical spectacle through his work with Roller in Vienna. Their partnership also anticipated the spirit of cooperation and mutual encouragement that characterized the work of influential troupes such as the « Ballets Russes » and « Ballets Suédois », both of which represented the « modern » in the 20 years after Mahler's death. The spirit of the Mahler-Roller production of « Tristan und Isolde » can also be detected in Wieland Wagner's bold post-War productions at Bayreuth. Through his work with Roller, Mahler served as a link between naturalistic Romantic stage practice, epitomized by many 19th Century Wagner productions, and the more symbolic style of 20th Century directors such as Wieland Wagner.

Seeing Mahler : Music and the Language of Antisemitism in « Fin-de-Siècle » Vienna

Klára Moricz. From : Notes, Volume 68, Number 2, December 2011 (pages 359-361) .

On 29 March 1935, Arnold Schönberg gave a speech in Los Angeles about his experience of growing-up as an « Austrian-Jewish artist » . Among the challenges faced by Jewish artists, he singled-out the lack of self-confidence, caused by Jews' acceptance of Richard Wagner's philosophy :

« You were not a true Wagnerian if you did not believe in " Deutschtum " , in Teutonism ; and you could not be a true Wagnerian without being a follower of his anti-Semitic essay, " Das Judentum in der Musik ", (" Judaism in Music ") . »

(« Style and Idea : Selected Writings of Arnold Schönberg » , edited by Leonard Stein, University of California Press, Berkeley 1984, page 503.)

In her book, « Seeing Mahler : Music and the Language of Antisemitism in " Fin-de-Siècle " Vienna » , Kay M. Knittel sets-out to show the pervasiveness of anti-Semitism in Viennese music criticism of Mahler's time. She is not the 1st to notice the anti-Semitic « clichés » frequently used by critics to condemn Mahler's work. Her project is not to point-out the most blatantly anti-Semitic attacks on Mahler, but to show that even seemingly objective critics were culturally conditioned to judge Mahler not primarily as a musician but as a Jew. She consciously excludes from her discussion the most virulently anti-Semitic papers, focusing her attention on Vienna's leading critics : Julius Korngold, Robert Hirschfeld, Max Kalbeck, Hans Liebstöckl, Max Graf, and Theodor Helm. She is little concerned with these critics' backgrounds, ideologies, or æsthetic convictions (we learn only, on page 131, that Hirschfeld himself was Jewish) , only with their use of language, more precisely with parallels she finds between their writings and that of Wagner in his infamous « Judaism in Music » . She aims to demonstrate that the same language still permeates scholarship on Mahler today and suggests that we can free ourselves of its anti-Semitic implications only by acknowledging its presence and its origin.

In the 6 chapters of her book, Knittel attempts to systematically deconstruct the language of Mahler's critics, devoting separate chapters to Alfred Roller's and Alma Mahler's descriptions of Mahler's body (« Die Bildnisse von Gustav Mahler ») , to Wagner's poisonous essay and its resonances with old and new anti-Semitic tropes (« Das Judentum in der Musik ») , to Viennese reviews of Mahler's Symphonies (« Die Wiener Kritiker ») and of Richard Strauß' Symphonic poems (« Das Problem Richard Strauß ») , concluding with the evaluation of Mahler scholarship in the present (« Eine musikalische Physiognomik ») . Knittel reads descriptions of Mahler's body against Oskar Panizza's viciously anti-Semitic short story, « Der operirte Jud » (1893) , in which a Jewish character, Itzig Fittel Stern, tries to erase his Jewishness by undergoing surgery. As expected, the counterfeit fails and at the end of the story Stern's real features become visible to the horror of his gentile bride. (One wonders why Knittel, while meticulously avoiding openly anti-Semitic attacks on Mahler, chose such a blatantly anti-Semitic text as a model against which she measures the much more subtle anti-Semitic language of Mahler's critics.) Knittel argues that in the introduction to his picture book « Die

Bildnisse von Gustav Mahler » (edited by E. P. Tal & Co. Verlag, Leipzig, 1922) , Roller, a visual artist with keen eyes, acknowledges Jewish stereotypes by actively going against them as he depicts Mahler's naked body as perfect and beautiful. In Roller's avoidance of describing Mahler's genitals (and hence addressing « the obvious issue of circumcision » , page 32) , Knittel sees inadvertent emphasis on « its association with castration » . One wonders what Roller could have written about the topic to escape suspicion. Much more convincing is Knittel's discussion of Alma Schindler's ambiguous relationship to Mahler's Jewish background. As her diaries attest, Schindler had to overcome her strong anti-Semitism in order to marry Vienna's most celebrated musician. Her attraction to fame and glamour trumped her bias - yet, it seems that she could never quite overcome her repulsion and kept trying to rid Mahler of his Jewish traits.

Instead of the anti-Semitic reviews of Mahler's time, Knittel uses Wagner's 1850 attack on Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn to create an inventory of supposedly Jewish trademarks : « banality, triviality, incomprehensibility, eclecticism, overwhelming » .

The young Gustav Mahler made several attempts to write his own Opera, but only succeeded in completing one left unfinished by Carl Maria von Weber, « Die drei Pintos » . The latter had languished as a series of unperformed sketches since Weber's death, in 1826, and only taken-up by the 26 year old Mahler in the midst of an attempt to seduce Weber's grandson's wife. The completed work was panned by venerable contemporary critics such as Hans von Bülow and Eduard Hanslick, and is rarely performed today.

But the fascination persists, projecting an alternative history in which the composer often seen as Richard Wagner's successor writes a stage work to compete with his idol.

In the highly anti-Semitic climate of « fin-de-siècle » Vienna, Mahler was a deeply divisive figure and the object of a rash of newspaper caricatures. He raised eyebrows as much for his supposedly dogmatic and tyrannical style of direction as for his radical approach to the repertoire. In the course of his tenure, some 33 new Operas were introduced to the « Hofoper » 's repertoire (including new works by Camille Saint-Saëns, Alexander Zemlinsky and Richard Strauß) , and 55 more were radically reworked. His partner in crime in these Operatic reforms was the artist and designer he met in 1902 and appointed chief stage-designer 1 year later : Alfred Roller.

Roller was the co-founder of the so-called Vienna Secession, a group of Austrian artists determined to « save culture from its elders » . Against the bourgeois picturesque historicism of Hans Makart and the then dominant « Genossenschaft der bildenden Künstler Österreichs » , Roller and his associates (including Gustav Klimt, Kolomen Moser, Joseph Hoffmann, and Carl Moll) declared war against the established order, heralding an æsthetic of curves, gaps and blurred edges, with affinities to the « Jugendstil » and « Art Nouveau » .

At the « Hofoper » , Roller's changes were sweeping : excessive ornamentation was banished, form was to follow function, and every element of the staging had to serve a specific purpose, with proto-expressionistic lighting playing a pivotal role. Mahler and Roller's Wagner productions, in particular, represented the 1st significant break with, and advance upon, the standard set by the composer himself at Bayreuth. The impact of these reforms was tremendous, and can be felt in the post-War New Bayreuth of Wieland Wagner, the theatre of Max Reinhardt and the cinema of Friedrich Wilhelm Murnau, Fritz Lang - even Orson Welles.

The dream of a Mahlerian « gesamtkunstwerk » inevitably finds focus in the composer's Symphonies, with more than one person suggesting the 8th, in particular, with its solos, choruses and Faustian narrative, could work as a staged performance.

Through Gustav Mahler's tireless and persistent efforts, by the beginning of the 20th Century, the Vienna Court Opera had become the center of Operatic production in Europe. Intendants, stage directors, and designers all flocked to Vienna to study the new staging styles and methods of production. However, the progressive æsthetics of the Court Opera did not achieve its full effectiveness until the final years of Mahler's directorship. 3 productions stood-out as precursors of new scenic styles that would greatly influence future Operatic staging. These were « Tristan und Isolde » (1903) , « Fidelio » (1904) , and, most important, the production of « Don Giovanni » (1905) . Each of these productions was staged by Mahler and his colleague Alfred Roller, a founder of the great art movement, the Secession.

When Mahler took charge of the Vienna Court Opera, in 1897, the state of the scenic arts and stage direction was stagnant and staunchly bound to pictorial realism. Adherence to the past traditions reigned supreme. Franz Gaul, longtime costume designer and director of production (« Chef der Ausstattungswesens ») , attempted to slow Mahler's reforms and was forced into retirement in 1900. Shortly thereafter, Heinrich Lefler, a founding member of « Hagenbund » , another and lesser-known Viennese art movement, was named to the post. Anton Brioschi, the 3rd generation in the dynasty of artists and designers at the Court Opera, remained in his position as scenic designer and painter. Mahler himself would stage some of the new productions. He had great expectations, hoping to push the visual styles of the Court Opera into new, different, and directions. But Mahler continued to be frustrated. Although Lefler initiated some scenic reforms and innovations including a large turntable for the stage, he seemed unable to translate Mahler's unique æsthetic ideas of staging into practice. Indeed, Hugo von Hofmannsthal noted in a letter to Alexander von Zemlinsky, in 1901 :

« I fear that what Mahler is lacking, is the imagination of the eye. He has a poor understanding of the visual genre. »

It was not until 1 year later that Mahler met an artist who understood and shared his views of Operatic production. That artist was Alfred Roller, then President of the Secession and a highly-respected Professor at the School for the Applied Arts (« Kunstgewerbeschule ») , where he taught the techniques of graphic arts.

How did the Secession affect the scenic arts ? Before 1897, the æsthetic values of the Viennese bourgeoisie relating to the visual arts were dominated by the tastes and styles of the Austrian painter Hans Makart and his circle. His paintings espoused historical scenes with the lavish decorative elements, rich and lush colors, muted lighting, and emphasis placed on the sensual. In this, Makart achieved a superficial form of « Gesamtkunstwerk » . No intellectual stimulus was provided or desired. No literary grounding or any kind of theme was present in Makart's works, « for the viewer need not fathom any further than what actually is present in the image » . The Viennese were content with these values and rigidly opposed change of any kind. These values carried over in the theater, particularly the « Burgtheater » and the Court Opera.

At that time, many younger artists were members of the Society of Austrian Visual Artists (« Genossenschaft der bildenden Künstler Österreichs ») , which owned the only publicly available exhibition space, the « Künstlerhaus » . But many of these artists were restless, for the teaching (chiefly, at the « Akademie der Bildende Künste ») and exhibition authorities were insular, conservative, and locked in the past, and they frowned on change. Nor were they interested in new ideas and movements from other great artistic locales such as Paris, beginning with the Impressionists and continuing with « Art Nouveau » , in Germany with « Jugendstil » , and Scotland with the efforts of Rennie Mackintosh.

At about the same time, Mahler made his debut at the Court Opera, in early 1897, a group of artists including Gustav Klimt, Koloman Moser, Joseph Hoffmann, Carl Moll and Alfred Roller formed an association called the Union of Austrian Visual Artists (« Vereinigung bildender Künstler Österreichs ») . After this group broke away from the « Genossenschaft » , they were known popularly as the Secession. This term was never an official name of the body, but its use was never discouraged, and it served as the name of their exhibition space. As noted in their journal « Ver Sacrum » for which Roller served as editor, the purpose of the Secession was « to assert its break with the fathers. The Secession defined itself as a new Roman " secessio plebis ", in which the plebs, defiantly rejecting the misrule of the patricians (the current authorities) , were withdrawing from the republic (the current visual styles) . »

In that same journal, 4 points of the Secession were elucidated :

To « declare war » on the passive, « same old ruts » , rigid sycophants (i.e. , authority opposing any kind of change) , poor taste, and a break with the past. The break acted as a challenge to the established order, authority, and tradition. The members of the movement were to pledge « themselves to save culture from their elders » .

To appeal for the vigorous support of those who grasp the idea of art as a high mission of culture and as the educational duty of a civilized nation.

To declare that the Secession is not a destructive trend. Neither does it preach for a radical change nor does it dissolve form and color. Works of the old Masters are to be studied and cherished, for art does not preach ; it creates.

To promote not only forms of current Austrian art, but also those from abroad. New forms should be brought to Vienna and made available for examination through regular exhibitions. Through these new works of art, the artistic sensibilities should « awaken the dozing instincts » , that lie within every person, instincts toward beauty and freedom of thoughts and feelings.

Further emphasis was given to the ideal of the unity of art. All forms of art should come together to provide an organic whole, or, broadly put, a « Gesamtkunstwerk » (although this word itself was never used) . One of the primary intentions of the works of the Secession was to create a condition known in German as « Stimmung » , or « atmosphere » , or perhaps even better, « ambience » .

The Secession consequently possessed neither a common artistic aesthetic nor a visual or creative « style » . It was, rather, an agglomeration of ideas and philosophies. Although there were similarities in the expression of the visual form, such as the « curving styles » comparable to « Jugendstil » or « Art Nouveau » , all artists within the Secession had their own concepts, perceptions, and distinct aesthetic identity. They encouraged, nudged, sometimes forced, and often provoked the viewers to think for themselves and « to fill in their own gaps » instead of having everything provided for them.

These ideals were in complete contrast to those governing the scenic arts at the Vienna Court Opera. At that time, the state of the scenic arts was one of stagnation. A series of scenic images provided a locale (sometimes simple, at other times elaborate) for singers who, for the most part, were content to sing from static positions within the settings on the stage. These settings complemented the effect of the « peep show » created by perspective art amid the confines of painted wings, leg drops, borders, and backdrops. In short, a series of « pretty scenes » were presented, none of which required much intellectual thought on the part of the viewer. Instead, only the senses involving the eyes and ears were engaged, and little was left to the imagination. The idea of a true « Gesamtkunstwerk » in performance at the Vienna Court Opera had not yet arrived.

Before Mahler's arrival, the chief scenic designer and painter at the Court Opera was Anton Brioschi who, in 1884, had succeeded his father, Carlo. Although the optical illusion of painted perspective and « trompe-l'œil » was maintained, the productions rarely reflected the dramatic spirit inherent in the action and the music of Opera. Plastic demerits such as steps, palatial stairs, and lamps were occasionally used, as in the grandiose 2nd Act in the 1875 production of Karl Goldmark's « Königin von Saba » . Properties and set decorations were usually painted directly onto the drops and wings. Scenic decoration continued to be just that ; decoration for the stage, a background for the singers.

In this environment, Mahler began to implement his idea of a « Gesamtkunstwerk » into the production of Opera. He firmly believed in the organic unity of the arts in the service of the music. Each aspect of Operatic production (directing, lighting, acting, costuming, singing, or the playing of the orchestra) had its rightful place within the confines of a performance. Mahler sought to focus the attention of the audience on the overall performance of the Opera unfolding on the stage. Merely to view the « pretty settings and costumes » or to hear only the singing of favourite stars was, according to Mahler's intentions, not acceptable.

Early 1902 found Mahler wrestling with proposals for a new production of « Tristan und Isolde » . Sometime before June of that year, Roller drew several sketches and presented them to Mahler at a social encounter. Mahler's reaction was enthusiastic, and he asked Roller to proceed further with more formal designs and stage models. During the summer, Mahler decided to use these designs over those presented by Lefler and Brioschi, which did not break with the more standard practices of the time. The previous settings had been designed and painted by Carlo Brioschi, in 1883. They were modeled after the original production for the 1st performances of the Opera, in 1865, at the Munich Court Theater by Angelo Qualigo. A number of painted sails and hangings created the illusion of a canopy. Another set of decorated curtains upstage served to mask the prow of the ship and to establish a separate space for the great love scene between « Tristan und Isolde ». Roller's designs, depicting 2 scenes in Act I, emphasized an « acting space », as opposed to the past practice in which scenery functioned merely to decorate the stage. While Brioschi's production of « Tristan und Isolde » created the illusion of the scenic space and its contents through the standard practice of painted scenery (drops and flats) , Roller's production never intended a realistic recreation of the deck of a Celtic ship complete with sails, lines, rails. Instead, Roller produced a simple, strong linear that suggested the sailing ship. For the 1st time in the history of staging and scenic practices of the Court Opera, elements of the setting (chiefly colors) were used to create an « atmosphere » (« Stimmung ») that was greatly intensified by stage lighting, which complemented the clearly delineated and plastic settings with massive sails, a sloping deck, and the upstage quarterdeck.

In Act I, for example, intense « daylight » was cast upon the massive red-orange sails. A bright, blue horizon could be seen through the gaps of the curtains. At the stipulated moment in the Act, the sails and curtains were opened, the hidden parts of the ship and the bright sky were revealed. The new production of « Tristan und Isolde » was one of the 1st attempts to incorporate stage lighting as a vital part of the stage picture ; that is, to use lighting to create a dramatic mood, rather than merely to illuminate the settings.

In most of the reviews, the production itself was given great emphasis while the singers and the conducting received only passing mention. A number of reviews centered largely on a discussion of the æsthetic effects generated by Roller's work and the influences of the Secession. In a perceptive, detailed review for the « Hamburger Abendblatt » , Max Graf wrote :

« This new production was designed by Professor Roller, one of the leaders of the Secession. Every brushstroke, every combination of colors calls out the motto of the Secession from the viewer in the " Parkett " to the age its art, to art its freedom. In the history of the modern scenic art, Roller's endeavors deserve a new chapter, for he actually treads a new path. »

Another critic, Max Kalbeck, stated that « each of the Acts appeared to fit the music, was pictorially right, and the decoration carefully shaded, all of which raised the music-drama to a " Gesamtkunstwerk " , such as Wagner must have had in mind. »

Kalbeck further declared that « one could see the music with his eyes » .

In May 1903, Mahler engaged Roller as Director of Production at the Vienna Court Opera, and the process of scenic renewal accelerated. Mahler was greatly pleased with the results and with Roller's speed in implementing changes and reforms in the scenic and directorial arts. Many of the critics, although at first encouraging, were suspicious of change and of the influences of the Secession. In an interview with the Viennese newspaper, « Illustriertes Wiener Extrablatt » in September 1903, Mahler, seeking to allay the fears of the critics, discussed his opinions regarding the visual æsthetics of operatic production :

« I deliberately avoid the use of the words " lighting effects " . We do not need garish effects, but rather lighting, with all its intensities, nuances, and strengths, should be of service to theater. Going only for the crude effect has no artistic value. But lighting alone does not serve its purposes. All modern art must serve the theater, and I say not just the Secession. What matters is the collaborative effort of all arts. It cannot continue with these cliches, for modern art must also extend itself to the costumes, to properties, to everything that can revitalize a work of art. »

In 1904, a new production of « Fidelio » replaced the earlier settings created by Carlo Brioschi, in 1876. In Act I, Brioschi's Prison Courtyard (naturalistic to the extreme) was placed within a castle with a bright city skyline in the background. Roller's production was a complete contrast. He emphasized the use of gray and dark colors, which, together with effective stage lighting, created a dramatic « Stimmung » inherent in the music. The setting was described by Julius Stern in the « Fremdenblatt » :

« Here it is a great surprise, completely different from the previous scene of Rocco's " Stube " and, in any event, far more clever than before. Standing in the background is an immense blue - black wall. At the end of the wall is a low gate and, next to it, an even lower basement window. Above the gate, a mighty stone arch rises-up and below, parallel to the wall, the gateway for the stairs that leads the condemned prisoners of the state to their horrific fate below. »

Writing in the « New Freie Presse » , Julius Korngold referred to Appia's seminal work « Die Musik und die Inszenierung » and noted how important stage lighting had become at the Court Opera :

« For Appia, the artistic power of light stands at the very top of the hierarchy of scenic elements ; therefore, he rightfully preferred the plastic and architectural arrangement of the stage before a painted surface, the decoration. Similar tendencies cannot fail to be recognized in the thoughtful endeavors of Professor Roller. Stage design has been brought forward as an independent artistic participant and appears completely to enter in certain symbolic relationships through the atmospheric elements expressed in the libretto and the music. It was seen in " Tristan " ; those scenes were painted through the music. Now, one wishes to see similarly painted Beethoven music in the new " Fidelio ". »

Roller's next important production was his controversial staging of « Don Giovanni » . This production was the culmination of the Secession's effect upon the scenic arts at the Vienna Court Opera, and represented the 1st true break in the scenic traditions. While « Tristan und Isolde » and « Fidelio » still used aspects of naturalism (albeit stylized) as the basis for Roller's designs, in « Don Giovanni » , they were not used. Instead of being visually specified, they were suggested through spatial arrangements and colors.

The basic configurations of the stage setting for « Don Giovanni » consisted of 4 towers (2 on each side of the stage) and a checkerboard patterned groundcloth which covered the stage floor. Roller dispensed with the traditional principle of wings and borders to create scenic illusion. The towers served as part of a frame, and the borders, with their neutral color, functioned to frame the stage space. The 2 sets of towers were movable only to and from center stage ; none moved-up, or downstage. Doorways in the towers could be opened or closed. Windows in the upper-part of the towers could serve as balconies. Changes of scenery were rapid. Drops could be flown in or out between the towers. For most scene changes, less than a minute was required behind the drop, so interruptions to the flow of the Opera remained at a minimum. Consequently, the attention of the viewer was uninterrupted and remained completely focused on the unfolding action in the space between the towers. Thus was developed the basic stage setting in the form of a neutral unit set, the 1st ever at the Court Opera and the 1st intended to be used for other Operas as a cost-saving measure.

If we now turn to the graveyard scene in the 2nd Act of « Don Giovanni », Roller's design stands in sharp contrast to the naturalistic scene of a church cemetery as designed by Carlo Brioschi in 1869 for the opening of the newly built Court Opera (and renewed by Anton Brioschi in 1887) . Roller's dramatic design centered on the « Commendatore » on horseback amid the gravestones mounted on the stage floor and on the towers, with great emphasis placed on lighting to provide dramatic intensity ». Bright moonlight streamed into the scene between the towers from the left.

Max Graf described the scene :

« The Commendatore : that is in the cemetery, in which walls and gravestones light-up in the white moonlight, during which the huge cypresses wave to and fro in the background. There stands on a pedestal the mighty statue of a man in armor holding-up a field marshal's baton, and seated on the back of an Andalusian horse. »

« Don Giovanni » became the most famous and best-known of all of Roller's works during his collaboration with Mahler, for the controversy it sparked had ramifications that continue even today.

To describe this production as controversial is an understatement. It was either praised or damned. Maximilian Muntz gave his 1st impressions after the premiere in the morning edition of the « Deutsche Zeitung ». It was a terse notice of a distinctly unhappy timbre, calling the production « preposterous », a « sacrilege », and noting that the performance was a « resounding flop » (« eklatanten Durchfall ») . 2 days later, Muntz expanded his opinions in the feuilleton of the « Deutsche Zeitung ». He called the towers « gray smokestacks », tasteless, and having absolutely nothing to do with Mozart's music. The colors in the lighting were too much :

« One minute violet, another orange-yellow light, gray or half-darkness, but never, ever, in natural daylight. »

He further complained that Mahler had made the musical performance of the Opera subservient to the designer.

The most emotional and biased review against Roller's work was filed by Hans Liebstockl in a sneering tone for the « Illustriertes Wiener Extrablatt ». He denounced the settings in all their forms : the towers, colors, drops, and the lighting :

« Scenery ! Scenery ! Bring forth the high towers with holes ! Milkyways ! Glaring red trees ! Mystifying courtyards !

Dark chambers ! Yellow castles ! Lines, comers, contrasts, clashes of colors ! Out with the discordant ingeniousness ! »

Liebstockl railed on that one could never be rid of the towers and that, « Don Juan would, without a doubt, find them in Hell. » . He Further declared that, « These towers have a number of objectives. 1st, they insult the eyes. 2ndly, they are unacoustical, and 3rdly, no one can explain what they mean. » The colors and even the painted groundcloth came under attack :

« Everything is extravagant, all thought out as a surprise. A hateful, clumsy, crude, and horrible thing lies within Roller's glory. »

At the opposite end came the positive review from that great chronicler of the Secession, Ludwig Hevesi. He devoted an entire essay of an astounding one and one-half pages in the « Fremdenblatt » to the production alone. Hevesi wrote that the new production was « of greatest interest for the critical observer of the theatrical art, for conventional realism has been overcome, as every work presses for its own style, its own ambience (« Stimmung ») instead of the purely mediocre waxworks of the past » .

And so, the true break in the scenic traditions was the production of « Don Giovanni » with its use of a unit setting complemented by different backdrops to suggest locales. The audience was compelled to think and view the stage picture from a new and different perspective. The principles of the towers were utilized for productions in the « Burgtheater » of « Hamlet » (1920) and « Macbeth » (1921) .

Gustav Mahler plunges into an oblivion of work. Over lunch at his Vienna apartment, on « Auenbruggergasse » , he appoints Alfred Roller head of stage design, starting with « Tristan und Isolde » . Roller sweeps the stage of clutter and presents every scene in a different light, attuning it to time of day and musical « color » . Each Roller setting advances the plot in a way that is at once real and surreal, from an orange-yellow dawn to an empurpled night. Overriding Wagner's directions, he sets Tristan's ship on the diagonal, the better to contrast the captain on deck with Isolde below. The split screen effect accentuates character development.

Up in the lighting turrets, Roller experiments with colored discs and optical aids, graduating the mood shifts. « When King Marke returned to find Isolde in Tristan's arms, it was not the usual idiotic stage dawn that filled the sky but an excruciating greyness that made you shiver » , notes the Graz critic Ernst Décsey. Many of the effects, Mahler tells Décsey, are conceived « over cups of black coffee » . In rehearsal, Anna von Mildenburg resists the innovations. Mahler asks Roller to explain things to her at home ; Mildenburg takes the taciturn professor to bed and proclaims him a genius.

At 7 in the evening on Saturday, February 21st, 1903, with nationalists warning of an anti-Wagner « outrage » , Opera production enters the modern age.

« The mysterious delicacy, the lashing impetuosity of the strings, contrasting storm and calm, are controlled by Mahler as perhaps never before. »

Tristan is sung by tall Erik Schmedes, Isolde by Mildenburg in a Klimt-like costume. Richard Mayr is King Marke ; Hennine Kittel sings Brangane, Isolde's maid.

« Breathless stillness draws the eye to the stage. The curtain divides. The music becomes almost visible, grows plastic in its indescribable perfection, as if transported into another world. »

After the 2nd Act, Mahler collapses with a migraine. « If only someone else could take over » , he moans. His sister Justi, in a misplaced attempt at Jewish humor, tells Alma, « I had him young, you've got him old. » . Mahler returns to a sustained ovation, a roar that does not abate until he breaks his rule and takes a personal bow. The Opera ends just before midnight. In the morning, the Wagnerite Gustav Schönaich from the « Wiener Allgemeine » leads a chorus of praise, endorsing Roller as « a man with a true vocation » . The Brahmsian Max Kalbeck praises the « great graphic harmony » , and Julius Korngold the « painted Tristan music » . Mahler's aim, says Hermann Bahr, is « to remedy the insufficiencies of a single art, which no longer satisfies our increased dramatic demands, with resources from the other arts » . In a Century of motorcars and manned flight, of socialism and psychology, the public will no longer accept static, monolithic stagings. Mahler and Roller have achieved Wagner's alliance of the arts.

Mahler writes after the premiere :

« My dear Herr Roller. How you put me to shame ! For days, I have been wondering how to thank you. And I've come to the conclusion that, instead of trying to put anything into words, I should simply remain silent. I know we are similar in one respect : in our completely unselfish devotion to art, even if we approach it by different roads. And I was also fully aware that you would not think me unappreciative or undiscerning if I did not try to express what you have achieved and what you have come to mean to me. Could you not dine with us on Friday ? »

They go on to reconfigure « Fidelio » , « Falstaff » , « The Flying Dutchman » , « Lohengrin » and the « Ring » , 5 Mozart Operas, and Cluck's « Iphigénie en Aulide » . In 5 years at the Vienna Opera, Mahler establishes a bench-mark of consistency. In the next 5 years, with Roller, he creates an æsthetic that places Vienna in the vanguard of modernism. Where Paris embraces abstract art, Vienna drives fusion and fission across all the arts. Klimt, Moll, and Roller quit the Secession as a thing of the past. Hoffmann and Moser found the « Wiener Werkstätte » . Arnold Schönberg breaks through to atonality. Hugo von Hofmannsthal versifies « Elektra » 's taboo love ; Arthur Schnitzler's text for « Reigm » (« la Ronde ») is banned ; Theodor Herzl's early death triggers a Schnitzler novel, « Der Weg ins Freie » , about a composer facing Viennese anti-Semitism. All these sparks and more fly-out of and around the Mahler-Roller collaboration.

Roller provides some of the clearest glimpses of Mahler, at work and at play. He tells the designer after a rehearsal tantrum :

« Please don't think I was really angry, being fierce is the only weapon I have for keeping order. »

Roller visits Mahler at the lakeside and observes him in the nude, he writes :

« In the course of my profession, I have seen a great many naked bodies of all types and I can testify that, at the age of 40 (44) , Mahler had the perfect male torso, strong, slim, beautifully made. His lips were classically shaped and their immediate area had that multiplicity of detail which is produced by the habit of very carefully articulated speech. They were thin and, when he was wearing his customary sober expression, usually closed. It was only when he was listening intently that they stayed slightly open. But if Mahler was disgruntled, angry or out of sorts, he would pull his mouth out of shape, taking half his lower lip between his teeth, wrinkling his brow and tightening the folds of his nose. Pulled about like this, his face took on such a distorted grimace that he really did become " the nasty Mahler ". »

He defines Mahler as « a combination of robust goodwill and triumph over adversity » , and he detects « Christ-like » qualities in this infinitely modest » Jew. They are as close to each other as 2 partners in art can be, sharing the same ideals and, at different times, the same lover. But art is short and life is long, and when the wind changes, Roller swears fealty to another leader.

On May 8, 1906, a teenager from Linz cadges a ticket and squeezes into the standing section to see Mahler conduct « Tristan und Isolde » . He returns a year later, hoping to study with Roller, but he is too timid to knock at his door with a letter of introduction. In February 1934, Adolf Hitler summons Roller to his Chancellery to regret his callow shyness and reminisce about that revelatory « Tristan und Isolde » , recalling every last detail :

Neither man mentions Mahler, who is being written-out of the record. Roller accepts a commission to stage « Parsifal » at Hitler's Bayreuth.

Casting of the carapace : Mahler and Roller

Although Bayreuth's idea of authenticity was occasionally questioned in the 2 decades following the composer's death, it was not until 1903 that a new philosophy of Wagner performance was given a practical trial in a major theatre. Its instigator was no stern critic of Bayreuth but a composer generally reckoned to have been the supreme Wagner conductor of his generation. That man was Gustav Mahler. His production at the Vienna Court Opera of « Tristan und Isolde » with designs by Alfred Roller marks the moment of liberation from the stranglehold of 19th Century orthodoxy. It opened-up a new era in which it was seen that new solutions to old performance problems could reveal previously unsuspected layers of meaning. Thus was born the idea that there could be such a thing in an Opera House as the valid, creative interpretation of a Masterwork. What lent particular authority to this development was that it was driven not by a professional stage director but by a man who, like Wagner, was a great composer and conductor. The radical departure came not from scenic considerations but from concern that the production should spring from the score. There was, in truth, nothing in this notion that could not have been sanctioned by Wagner's own ideas and hopes for his works. The seeds had been planted by the composer but their germination had to be tended by his inheritors.

Gustav Mahler had first visited Bayreuth as a 23 year old student, in 1883. In the years that followed, he often returned, becoming well-known to Cosima and his son Siegfried, who were fully aware of his formidable reputation as a Wagner conductor, in Budapest as director of the Royal Hungarian Opera, 1888-1891, and as music director at Hamburg, 1891-1897. In Budapest, he gave the first performances in Hungarian of « Das Rheingold » and « Die Walküre » , while in his first season at Hamburg, there were more Wagner performances (64) than in any other house (Berlin, 50 ; Dresden, 49 ; Leipzig, 38) . But anti-Semitic prejudice deterred the Wagners from ever inviting him to conduct in the « Festspielhaus » . Cosima, supporting Felix Mottl's candidature, also opposed the confirmation of his appointment as director of the Vienna Opera, in October 1897. Not that this prevented her from soliciting the composer to perform her son's Operas there. Siegfried's first Opera, « Der Bärenhäuter » , was duly given in Vienna, in 1899, by Mahler, who, while insisting on cuts to improve the work, appears to have generally thought well of it. But despite Cosima's tireless advocacy, Mahler did not perform any of Siegfried's other Operas.

Bayreuth's rejection of Mahler was, in the end, no loss but its own, nor could Mahler's own fierce integrity and independence ever have been at home in such an authoritarian atmosphere. New thought about the performance of Wagner's works had perforce to come to be realized elsewhere. Yet, the irony is that Mahler was a stage reformer in Wagner's own mould. He subscribed to every tenet of his theatrical reforms and his ideas about the theatre and the performance of Opera - the coordination of words, music and every element in the scenic presentation. But where Wagner had concentrated on the production of his works, leaving their conducting to associates, Mahler's first avocation was to conduct them. His supervision of all aspects of the singers' performances became necessary for him when, like Wagner, he saw that the dramatist's intentions would otherwise be betrayed.

At the Budapest Opera, Mahler's domination of every part of a production was remarked by Count Albert Apponyi :

« He governs with sovereign authority the stage, the action, the movements of the soloists and the chorus ; so that a performance rehearsed and produced by him is in every way artistically complete. His eye extends over the entire production, the scenery, the machinery, the lights. »

Cosima Wagner herself had nothing but praise for Mahler's exceptional ability as a « répétiteur » . While he was still at Hamburg, she asked him to coach the tenor Willy Birrenkoven (a member of the Hamburg company) in the role of « Parsifal » , for which Bayreuth had engaged him, in 1894.

Mahler wrote to his distinguished physicist friend Arnold Berliner :

« Birrenkoven is causing a stir in Bayreuth : Cosima and the others having no need to rehearse him further. By the way, he is singing in the opening performance, not Van Dyck ! »

Cosima was no less pleased with Mahler's coaching of Anna von Mildenburg for the role of Kundry at Bayreuth, in 1897. While Mahler's direction of their expression and movement was valued by most of his leading singers, his concern for every detail of stage business was not always welcome backstage. During Mahler's time at Hamburg, his efforts were resisted all along the line by the chief stage director, Franz Bittong.

Mahler always sought to emulate Wagner's programme for the reform of theatre management and practice - major decisions made by artists rather than State functionaries, adequate rehearsal time, and so on. This was uphill work, especially at a prominent house like the Vienna Court Opera with its political pressures and repertory system (in Mahler's 1st season, he conducted 111 performances of 23 Operas) . Mahler quickly moved to bar latecomers from taking their seats once the music had started and darkened the auditorium. In the pit, he changed the seating so that the conductor was no longer in the middle of the band but at the very front, with the audience behind him and all the players in front of him. He had, for some time, wanted to lower the Orchestra pit for Wagner performances, intending that its level would henceforth be adjustable. Emboldened by the success of « Tristan », in 1903, he proceeded, against considerable opposition, to carry-out his plan.

His intention had been to lower the pit by 1.5 metres, but when that was thwarted by technical difficulties, he settled for 50 centimetres and, at the same time, enlarged its area from 47 to 59 square metres His defence of his actions in an interview, published on 6 September 1903, shows how well he understood the rationale behind the sunken pit at Bayreuth :

« The plans were designed so that the floor of the pit could be lowered or raised hydraulically, according to the needs of the work performed. Thus, I would put the Orchestra at the lowest possible level for certain of Wagner's works, but would keep the small Mozart Orchestra at a normal height, and so on, as suits the work in question and is suggested by constant observation. There are strong arguments for the practice of placing the Wagner Orchestra as low as possible : in some of his works, the Orchestra is meant to sound as from a nebulous distance ; in this way, too, the singers' voices can stand-out effectively. To be sure, some passages of Wagner I can imagine better with a completely open Orchestra - for instance, the Prelude to the 3rd Act of " Lohengrin ". But all in all, the public should gladly welcome the lowering of the pit for the Wagner Orchestra. For, I think, it cannot be very pleasant during an orchestral storm for the people in the stalls to hear the cymbals above anything else, until they feel like stopping up their ears. All this will be changed once the music comes-up from a great depth. »

In a 2nd interview, 3 days later, he declared his belief that the Orchestra was « no longer a unit which functions independently and need pay no attention to what is going on in the rest of the theatre. The Orchestra must serve the theatre in the same way as the other factors, such as the lighting, the full effect of which, on the stage, we still do not know ? » Mahler went on to argue that the light-spill from the musicians' stands in the pit was an undesirable distraction and spoilt the artistic effect of the stage lighting. He did not win his battle in a single round, but the eventual installation of hydraulic machinery, in 1904-1905 (Mahler had wanted this all along) , made it on 7 November 1901 that Mahler 1st met the 22 year old Alma and, within months, they were married (9 March 1902) . The director of the Imperial Opera was plunged into the very centre of the new movement in art. Its leading practitioners, most particularly Carl Moll, Gustav Klimt, Alfred Roller and Kolo Moser, « vied with one another to be his teacher » . For his part, Mahler had much to offer the Secessionists, not least in that their programme sought to dissolve boundaries between the arts. A central part of the Secessionist aesthetic was that its exhibitions were not just pictures hung on walls but « total works of art » (« Gesamtkunstwerke ») in which the boldly geometric « Kunsttempel » (designed by Josef Olbrich after a sketch by Klimt and completed in 1898) , the exhibits displayed within it, music and on occasion other events all had their part to play. The 14th Secession Exhibition (April - June 1902) was focused on Max Klinger's monumental new Beethoven sculpture, which was set in a shrine-like enclosure by Alfred Roller with an allegorical frieze about the composer by Klimt as a supporting commentary. Mahler was invited to collaborate and at the opening of the exhibition conducted his own arrangement for 6 trombones of a passage from the choral movement of the 9th Symphony.

What the Secession had to offer Mahler was exactly what he had been searching for - a wholly new approach to the scenic dimension of Opera production. While wishing to dispense with the pictorial literalism of the late- 19th Century, Mahler had so far lacked a collaborator who could help him effect on the deeply conservative Operatic stage a comparable revolution to that already under way in the conventional theatre. He had achieved something in this direction from 1900, when he had appointed Heinrich Lefler (a painter trained at the Academy) as head of scenic design at the Opera. Lefler quickly made a name for himself by attempting to eliminate painted flats and non-functional props, earning himself the appellation « Raumschöpfer » , or space creator. But it was not until Mahler met Roller (probably, early in 1902) that he encountered a vision of how to use that space which he could fully share.

By extraordinary coincidence, Roller, who had, for some time, interested himself in scenic design, had only recently discovered « Tristan » in traditional style performances under Mahler's baton at the Opera. He had hated the settings and been fired to make sketches of his own which he quickly showed to Mahler. So impressed was the conductor that, recognizing the « true visual expression' of the Wagnerian drama, and despite Roller's total lack of stage experience, he swiftly commissioned him to design new sets for « Tristan » . For Roller, this proved to be as decisive a turning point as it was for Mahler and, indeed, for the future course of Opera production, generally.

The artists of the Secession had highly-distinctive talents and Roller was no exception. They were united in turning their backs on the old academies in the cause of internationalism, of eliminating barriers between pure and applied art and of proclaiming the freedom of the artist to realize his own vision independently of that of « society » and the wealthy patron. Thus, the Secession invited artists from all over Europe to contribute to its exhibitions. These artists included, from France, Puvis de Chavannes, Degas, Pissarro, Renoir, Rodin, Seurat, Signac and Vallotton ; from Germany, Max Klinger, Hans Thoma and members of the Munich Secession ; from Switzerland, Ferdinand Hodler ; from Norway, Edvard Munch ; from Belgium, Henri van de Velde ; and from Italy, Giovanni Segantini. Also shown were Japanese and Russian artists and the Scottish artists Charles Rennie Mackintosh, Margaret Macdonald and Herbert and Frances MacNair (the « Glasgow 4 ») , to whom a whole « Scottish Room » was devoted at the 8th Exhibition in November - December 1900. The uncluttered, elegant spatial layout of this room influenced Roller's designs for the next exhibition and doubtless his approach to stage design.

Born in Moravia, in 1864, Alfred Roller studied painting at the Vienna Academy with Eduard Lichtenfels and Christian Griepenkerl, drawing much inspiration from visits to Venice and Ravenna. A founder-member of the Secession, he became a co-editor of its journal, « Ver Sacrum » , in 1898, taught at the « Kunstgewerbschule » (School for Applied Arts) , from 1900, and replaced Carl Moll as president of the Secession, in 1902. Roller's graphic skills were much in evidence in the pages of « Ver Sacrum » and in posters for the Secession. With hindsight, one can see his huge mural painting « Sinkende Nacht » (Nightfall) for the Klinger exhibition, in April - May 1902, as very possibly inspired by the « O sink hernieder, Nacht der Liebe » love duet in the 2nd Act of « Tristan » and, thus, an anticipation of the stage designs he was shortly to prepare for Mahler. This mural was on the wall behind and above the huge enthroned Beethoven. On the opposite wall was a complementary depiction of « Der werdende Tag » (Day-break) by Adolf Böhm.

Roller found his liberation from the dictates of academy painting in the sinuous fantasy of line, colour and tone (the style being more important than the « faithful » depiction of a subject) and, in an interest in spatial arrangement which quickly showed itself in the exhibition settings, he designed for the Secession (that for the 9th Exhibition, in 1901, being particularly striking in its dramatic use of space and light to display paintings by Segantini, sculptures by Rodin and other works) . It was to be but a short step from here to his discovery of a new medium in the 3 dimensional arena of the stage. The persistence of 19th Century pictorial realism on the Operatic stage was indeed an urgent case for the liberation æsthetics of a Secessionist. We have seen how avant-garde theatre had been using artists as agents of scenic reform for more than a decade. Roller was the 1st artist of independent standing to succeed in doing the same for the Operatic stage. Just as Paul von Joukowsky had, with « Parsifal » , pointed Wagner in a new scenic direction, so Roller, working with a conductor who was also a composer of genius, provided a spring-board for escape from the tired visual æsthetic that was still prevalent.

Roller and Mahler's common point of departure was the elimination of anything visual that did not relate to their understanding of the music as the core of the drama. Mahler, Roller later recalled, « had the utmost contempt for mere outward show on the stage, for any purely decorative detail, however brilliant and dazzling, that did not arise inevitably from the total conception » . Himself a Master of « decorative detail » , Roller discovered an almost moral vocation in subjugating his decorative prowess to serve their joint ambition of a wholly unified stage production. This did not mean the rejection of pictorial imagery but rather its re-creation in spatial terms. The stage, said Roller, dealt not with « pictures » but with « space » . In his pursuit of this, he would have found inspiration and support in the work of the architects most closely associated with the Secession, especially Otto Wagner and his pupil Josef Olbrich. Kurt Blaukopf even ventures the view that Roller translated Otto Wagner's « architecture into scenic principles » .

The Romantic realism of the Vienna Opera's scenic style created by Carlo Brioschi up to 1886 and, thereafter, by his son Anton was to be superseded by simpler images. All the scenic essentials specified by Wagner would still be there, but in stylized form. Roller later recalled that Mahler had welcomed « a stage on which everything is only intimated » . The aim would no longer be the creation of a peep-show illusion but of a functional stage space inhabited by the performers.

Many of these ideas had long been advocated by Adolphe Appia (including the notion that the 19th Century « stage of illusion » , or « Illusionsbühne » , had to be replaced by a new « Andeutungsbühne » , meaning a stage on which things should be suggested rather than shown) and were published by him in German, in 1899, as « Die Musik und die Inszenierung » . This would almost certainly have been known to Mahler and to Roller. 3 substantial extracts from the book were published in the « Wiener Rundschau » (15 December 1900) under the title, « Das Licht und die Inszenierung, von Adolphe Appia, Rom » . Henry-Louis de La Grange argues that Roller's own articles testify that he was acquainted with Appia's writings. He also cites an unpublished letter of Mahler's (10 July 1899) which he believes may have been written to Appia and whose contents suggest that, « Mahler also knew his writings and put some of his ideas into use in his own theatrical work » .

Both Roller and Mahler were set on using the latest technology in order to paint the stage with light rather than pigment. The Opera's lighting installation, dating from 1887, was therefore improved during the « Tristan » rehearsals. Light became a principal agent in the search for a visual stylization and for symbols which, in activating the audience's imagination, would deepen the musicality of its response. The dominant colour of a scene or of an entire Act could determine its character, mood and atmosphere and its significance within the dramatic structure of the whole. The key to everything was Wagner's music, not his visual taste. Mahler's 1st principle was constant : « It's all in the score. » (« Steht alles in der Partitur. ») But however much he was indebted to the libertarian thrust of the Secessionists, Mahler was wary of the least whiff of theatrical theory or of anything doctrinaire. He did not want to hear his productions described as « Secessionist » but simply as serving their composers faithfully. Thus, in September 1903, he is quoted as saying :

« We want to make the light serve the theatre in all its grades, nuances and degrees of strength. But the matter does not end with the lighting ; the whole of modern art has a part to play on the stage. Modern art, I say, not the Secession. What matters is the conjunction of all the arts. There is no future in the old standard clichés ; modern art must extend to costumes, props, everything that can revitalise a work of art. »

This was very much what Siegfried Wagner professed for Bayreuth, in 1907, the difference being that Mahler put it into practice in Vienna, in 1903-1907, whereas Siegfried's lip-service did not begin to be translated tentatively into action at Bayreuth until the « Tristan » of 1927.

The 1st fruit of the Mahler-Roller partnership was the « Tristan und Isolde » which opened on 21 February 1903. Such was its success that Mahler appointed Roller his « Leiter des Ausstattungswesens » (head of stage design) in place of Heinrich Lefler (who went to the « Burgtheater ») . Together, they went on to give new or redesigned productions of « Fidelio » (1904) , « Rheingold » (1905) , « Così fan tutte » (1905) , « Don Giovanni » (1905) , « Die Entführung » (1906) , « Lohengrin » (1906) , « Figaro » (1906) , « Die Zauberflöte » (1906) , « Die Walküre » (1907) and « Iphigénie en Aulide » (1907) . The partnership was curtailed only by Mahler's resignation, in response to intolerable pressures at the Opera, and his departure for America, in December 1907. Roller himself continued to work with Mahler's successor, Felix Weingartner, completing the « Ring » , in 1909, but he felt the loss of the wholehearted support he had had from Mahler and resigned that same year. Not all the Mahler-Roller productions were equally successful but, together, they amounted to a revolution in the staging of Opera - and this in merely 4 years !

« Tristan und Isolde » , Vienna 1903 : « Wie hör' ich das Licht ! »

From the surviving pictures, it is not immediately apparent why Mahler's « Tristan » production struck its contemporaries as so extraordinary. Roller's settings provided every pictorial image specified by Wagner, creating credible locations on board ship, in the garden of a palace at night and at Tristan's castle, in Kareol. What surprised audiences was that these settings made no attempt to be a simulacrum of the composer's 1865 production, or even of Cosima's later Bayreuth staging of 1886. It was the 1st time that a stage of international renown, rather than copying the authorized version, had gone back to Wagner's score and created its own new images from it. Just as Mahler had made his own interpretation of the score, so Roller made his of the stage directions.

He slewed the deck of the ship round at a slight angle. This became fully apparent only when the great sails curtaining off Isolde's quarters were pulled aside to reveal that these quarters were a kind of rear stowage underneath the upper stern deck on which Tristan was stationed at the helm. The stem itself and starboard side of the vessel were screened from view by a huge hanging sail and by the left side of the proscenium. The sea and horizon were visible only above the gunwhale on the right. And it was at this side that steps led up to the higher deck. This brilliantly simple device was as symbolically apt (the upper, light deck for Tristan, the lower, claustrophobic, dark quarters for Isolde) as it was dramatically effective. Tristan and Kurwenal could without any artifice be visible to the audience while totally out of sight of Isolde and Brangäne. Similarly, the scandal of the lovers' embrace was intensified by its being observed by the sailors, themselves unseen at the rail of the upper-deck.

At the end of the Act, sails and awnings were hoisted-up and away to herald Marke's arrival, the king's red banner flapping against a bright blue sky while a brilliant carpet for his welcome snaked-out as an intrusive gash across the fore-stage at the feet of Tristan and Isolde. In the 2nd and 3rd Acts, the significant innovations were the « built » solidity of the masonry (stone terraces, tower and steps for the castle at Kareol) and a drastic pruning of the customary foliage. The overall effect was, at least from a modern viewpoint, to make the settings more rather than less realistically credible ! There was the merest hint of Secession style in the black-and-white chequered paving of the terrace in Act 2.

But what everyone was talking about was not the scenery but the way it was lit. It was Roller's new-found skill in painting with light that was the major breakthrough. For him, this was a natural development of an interest in the effects of changing light that had already been demonstrated in a series of paintings of a single landscape view in different seasons and at different times of day that he had shown at the Secession exhibition in 1900. There could scarcely have been a better 1st stage subject for Roller than an Opera ruled so pervasively by the symbolism of Day and Night. For at least one member of the audience, « the way the stage looked said literally what the work was about » .

Quite how Roller, totally unschooled in stage technology, learnt how to manipulate the lights we do not yet know, but the results were sensational.

Emil Lucka said :

« Untiringly, he carried-out his tests, moving from the stage to the stalls, from the stalls to the gallery, experimenting with screens, coloured discs, light-intensities, altering, improving, dealing in nuances. »

Roller was among the very 1st practitioners of « Lichtregie », the use of the lighting console as a principal agent in the staging of Opera. Among his many discoveries was the dynamic use of light in every grade of intensity, including crescendos and decrescendos between dark and light. This was the more effective because light could be thrown not onto the usual pictorial painted backdrop, hangings and flats but onto a plain cyclorama, this being among its earliest recorded uses on the stage of the Vienna Opera.

Egon Wellesz wrote :

« The gradual brightening of the stage (at the beginning of Acts in the later " Ring " production) produced the most impressive effect. »

The low levels of intensity to which, when dramatically appropriate, Roller was prepared to reduce the lighting (as in Act 2 of « Tristan ») were much complained about, the general custom being a relatively high and constant level of illumination.

Others, like Wellesz, were enthusiastic :

« Everything that was done had reason and meaning, always serving only to heighten the dramatic effect. »

What was particularly striking was Roller's use of colour symbolism - an almost garish orange-yellow tonality for the hateful realm of Day in Act 1 (thus prefiguring the same idea in Siegfried Wagner's production of 1927) , a deep violet velvety darkness for Act 2 and, for the long reckoning of Act 3, a dull autumnal grey. In the 2nd Act, the sky was alive with a thousand stars.

« Out of the Prelude, the blue night rose mysterious and this night was not the hitherto invariable, obvious, static picture, but breathed and trembled like the orchestra, the garden came alive around the lovers, getting darker or lighter with straying moonbeams and drifting shadows. »

Towards the end of the Act, when Marke breaks in on the lovers, « it was not the usual idiotic stage dawn that filled the sky but an excruciating greyness that made you shiver at the very sight of it » .

(Photos) What most surprised the audience about the production of « Tristan » at the Vienna Opera by conductor-director Gustav Mahler, in 1903, was that, quite exceptionally, it made no attempt to copy either Wagner's or Cosima's stagings of the work. Mahler and the artist Alfred Roller re-imagined Act 1 with the brilliantly practical and symbolic layout of a light upper-deck for Tristan and claustrophobic quarters for Isolde immediately beneath it. This photo of the 1944 wartime revival in Vienna shows that it was uncannily faithful to Roller's original design.

Mahler worked as intensively with his singers as Wagner did. Erik Schmedes, the remarkably youthful looking Tristan, in 1903, is at the helm in Act I with the bearded Friedrich Weidemann as Kurwenal. Contemporary paintings of Anna von Mildenburg as Isolde show her in a richly gilded Klimt-like costume. This may have been rejected for the distinctly less flattering dress worn by her in this uncomfortable photograph, also from 1903.

For Julius Korngold (father of Erich Wolfgang Korngold and Eduard Hanslick's successor as critic for the « Neue Freie Presse ») , Roller's designs for the 3rd Act were « painted Tristan music » , the colours suggesting « weariness, illness, ruin, and imminent death » . At the end of the Act, Tristan and Isolde's « final metamorphosis and apotheosis were suggested by light effects which transformed even the neutral colours of the costumes » .

Those costumes were also Roller's work. (Roller was, at Mahler's express instruction, the 1st head of stage design to be entrusted with scenery, costumes and lighting, responsibilities formerly divided between 3 people.) While his costumes were for the most part of sober practicality, a Klimt-like passion for kaleidoscopic geometric patterning broke-out in the decoration of Isolde's dress in Act I, injecting a note of fashionable modernity. The Secession's love-affair with abstract patterning and ornamentation was also on display in the design of Isolde's travelling chests, couch and other furniture. Mahler's direction of the action was dictated solely by the music and the psychology of the situation - that is, by the intuition that, as Thomas Mann put it, Wagner was a pioneer practitioner of depth-psychology through music. Tristan did not offer his sword to Isolde for her to kill him but held its point at his chest ready for her to plunge it in.

The interrelationship between the music and the « mise-en-scène » (which had of course always been Mahler and Roller's goal) won high praise, as from Egon Wellesz :

« I am thinking of the warm rusty brown colour of the sail, like those used even nowadays by the fishermen of Chioggia, which stretched over the entire stage ; the sombrely glowing colour of the sail seemed to reflect so perfectly the mood of the music. It is hard to begin to describe how enraptured we were. Then, in the 2nd Act, came the blue, starlit night, changing at the end into a deathly pale morning and, in the 3rd Act, the huge linden tree under which the wounded Tristan lay. A barren, desolate landscape just as in the music. Behind the low rampart, one imagined the sea. Never had a scene made such a profound impression on me. »

The « Tristan » was a huge and immediate success. Dissenting voices were in the minority. Roller was variously reproached for imperfect sightlines, for failing to integrate the singers into the settings, for creating too much visual beauty and for « his orgies of darkness » . The critic Robert Hirschfeld complained that the « subtle pantomime » of Anna von Mildenburg as Isolde went for nothing because of what he considered to be the prevalent gloom. Siegfried Wagner, attending the premiere on 21 February, also moaned about the lighting, later giving Ernst Décsey the predictable Bayreuth line :

« My father mounted the production of " Tristan " himself in Munich, so I'm afraid that's it and that's how it will have to stay. »

The singers were mostly well received and the praise for Mahler's conducting was universal.

The wider significance of the production as a « total work of art » was recognized by the more perceptive critics. With characteristically broad sweep, Hermann Bahr wrote that :

« Reinhardt's aim, the same that Richard Wagner and later Appia, the young Fortuny, Olbrich and Kolo Moser cherished, has now been fulfilled, for the 1st time, by Mahler and Roller in " Tristan " and " Fidelio ". That aim is to remedy the insufficiencies of a single art, which no longer satisfies our increased dramatic demands, with resources from the other arts. »

Max Graf, doubtless tuning in somewhat overhastily to the impact of the 16th Secessionist Exhibition (17 January to 28 February 1903, and thus concurrent with the « Tristan » premiere) , which had been devoted to introducing the French Impressionists to the Viennese public, also drew attention to modern art's contribution to the « Gesamtkunstwerk » :

« The nervous colour-Romanticism of the modems now prevails in the new Tristan sets by Alfred Roller. Light and air are called upon to make music along with the Wagner Orchestra. For the 1st time, Impressionist arts appear on the Operatic stage. The composer extends his hand to the painter. What would the Master himself have said of the art of light and colour displayed in this Impressionistic " Tristan " ? »

Graf's conclusion was that Wagner might have been astonished that his vision had inspired such an imaginative response from the world of art but also shocked that the artist appeared to be wishing to prevail in his own right. While entirely mistaken as to Roller's ambition, Graf's review does point-up just how iconoclastic Roller's scenic work was generally considered to be. The idea that a stage-designer could make an original contribution to the performance of an Opera was revolutionary, and was immediately recognized as such.

Having discovered his scenic collaborator, Mahler went on to apply the Wagnerian principle of a totally unified production with the music as the ruling element to everything he performed. There was, however, one highly-important variation, in that Mahler sought always to find optimum conditions for each and every Opera on its own terms. In Roller's words :

« Each work of art carries within itself the key to its own production. »

Thus, for Mozart, who, together with Wagner, was the principal focus of Mahler's attention, he was, in Egon Wellesz's recollection :

« The 1st to rediscover the sound of the Mozart Orchestra at a time when the full sonority of the Wagner Orchestra was regarded as the ideal. He performed Mozart's Operas with a small body of strings, accompanying the recitatives on a harpsichord attached to the conductor's desk. »

Roller described how Mahler agreed to his designs for « Don Giovanni » (21 December 1905) only « after long reflection had convinced him of their relevance to the work's musical shape ». The novelty was the square towers at either side of the stage, towards the front, which remained throughout the Opera and « between which the various changes of scenery took place ». (The idea of using 2 permanent towers just behind the proscenium frame was mooted in Georg Fuchs's writings and was also put into practice at the Munich « Künstlertheater » from 1908.) They framed the action and had adjustable elements, so they could serve as parts of Donna Anna's house, a street scene, Don Giovanni's palace, a cemetery, a banqueting room, and so on. The towers were Roller's solution to the perennial problem in « Don Giovanni » of effecting a large number of scene changes fast enough to avoid undesirable breaks in the music. It was doubtless this above all else which sold the idea to Mahler. Thus, the Operatic debut of a set with permanent (though also changeable) features. It was the bold, functional stylization which made the greatest impression on contemporaries, the presence on the stage of items which were not part of a complete pictorial depiction but were, as on the Shakespearean stage, whatever the particular scene required them to be. This invention of the idea of a unifying, multi-purpose, non-naturalistic scenic artefact capable of symbolizing the drama as a whole was to have a huge influence on Mahler and Roller's successors in 20th Century stage production.

Ist steps to a new « Ring » , Vienna (1905-1907)

When they turned from « Tristan » to the « Ring » , Mahler and Roller encountered a rather different set of problems. Their solutions show how difficult it was to hold the centre ground between stage realism and stylization in pursuit of the psychological development of the drama. Ever since his Prague and Budapest days, Mahler had dreamt of creating his own « Ring » production - in Vienna he had inherited the Opera's original staging which had remained virtually unchanged since its creation, in 1877-1879. Sketches in the Theatre Collection of the Austrian National Library show that Roller went on almost immediately after « Tristan » to plan for a new « Ring » . He imagined the 2nd scene of « Rheingold » as a verdant open space, rocky outcrops at right, under a huge greeny skyscape with soft mauve-pink clouds. Further studies from 1904 show a Rhinedaughter with a mermaid's tail and Nibelheim with waves of bluey light and flames flaring in the background. Roller's 1st sketches for a project were soft-focus, almost Romantic, experimenting with colour, light and atmosphere. As his ideas developed the designs became more severe and architectural.

The working sketches and their realization in the finished productions of « Das Rheingold » (23 January 1905) and « Die Walküre » (4 February 1907) show, on the one hand, Roller the painter wanting to re-create nature in the theatre and, on the other, Roller the stage-designer seeking simplification and visual drama. Like Wagner, Roller was a man of the mountains. On his holiday climbs in the Dolomites, he had discovered the milieu juste for the « Ring » 's untamed landscapes. He put it on stage quite specifically for the 2nd Act of « Walküre » (the model almost certainly being the precipitous Val de Mezdi, in the heart of the Sella massif) . The profile of the Valkyrie rock in the 3rd Act may well have been taken from the same locale and bears a resemblance, if reversed from left to right, to a design by Adolphe Appia which had been published in 1899 in « Die Musik und die Inszenierung » .

For « Rheingold » , Roller's vision was of nature before the Fall. He sought to evoke this by dressing the Rhinedaughters as mermaids, their tails covered with greenish scales, and putting garlands in Erda's floor-length tresses. The mountain-top space, also Dolomite inspired, rose in levels punctuated by banks of Alpine flowers and framed between pines and giant boulders. Nibelheim was a pitch-black cavern, filled with suppurating vapours. Roller was on less certain ground in his response to the scenic transformations so powerfully depicted in the music and to the troublesome magical effects. His attempts at such scenes as those of the swimming Rhinedaughters (awkwardly suspended in basketwork cages) and the riding Valkyries (juvenile doubles on « papier-mâché » horses, the Valkyries themselves entering on foot from the wings, though this was cleverly managed so that they seemed to be materializing from a stormy cloudscape) did not begin to measure-up to Bayreuth's solutions. Despite the installation of a huge double revolve (2 discs, each 11 metres in diameter, placed side-by-side) , the scene changes to and from Nibelheim could only be managed behind curtains.

One of Roller's criteria was to eliminate anything likely to come across as puerile or risible. Hence Alberich's transformations into giant snake and then toad were masked in a gloom of vapour and black velvet drapes, while the previous wooden « rainbow bridge » was abandoned altogether (as the curtain fell, the gods were moving slowly towards the landfall of an optical rainbow projection) . Like Wagner's movement director Richard Fricke, Roller believed that it was always better to appeal to the imagination rather than risk offence to the intellect. Roller's strongest suit, however, was once again as an artist painting with light.

Julius Korngold wrote :

« The lights swathe the gods in brilliance and serenity ; they leave them wallowing in murky mists. The movement on the stage is frozen, as it were, into a series of pictures which are then, however, inverted with a truly inner movement by the magical changes of lighting. The final communion between stage and music is established by Mahler's art. It is he who gives light to the Orchestra. The element of tone painting, which in " Rheingold " predominates over emotional expression, is completely fused with the paintings on the stage. »

Inevitably, there were complaints about the « orgies of darkness » as also about inappropriate « Symphonies of colour » . But it is clear that although very low levels of illumination played their part in obscuring events better left to the mind's eye, Roller's intentions were always naturalistic and dramatic. In Nibelheim, the only palpable illumination was the glow from Mime's forges, in Hunding's hut from the hearth and from a single torch on the left-hand wall. Roller re-sited the door (just as Siegfried Wagner was to do at Bayreuth, in 1928) so that the moonlight streamed in diagonally, and it was only at that moment that there was sufficient light for the facial similarity of the twins to be apparent. In the 2nd Act of « Walküre » , the light falling on Wotan, seemingly pinioned to the rocks like Prometheus, became progressively greyer through the course of the great doomsday monologue. At the end of the Act, the combatants became visible only at their emergence as silhouettes high up at the back of the stage.

Otto Klemperer said :

« It was indescribable, Mahler, who was his own producer, ruled over everything. I had never seen the close of the 2nd Act presented so lucidly on the stage. »

In the 3rd Act, the soaring flames struck by Loge from the rocks around the sleeping Brünnhilde died down into a glow around the horizon, revealing a star-spangled sky of deepest blue above.

Much of the criticism of the low levels of lighting was on the grounds that the singers' expressions and gestures went for nothing, and it was supported not unreasonably by the argument that Wagner himself had always insisted on clarity of communication between performers and audience. This was the only point of disagreement between Roller and Anna von Mildenburg (Brünnhilde) who, otherwise, responded gallantly (if not fearlessly !) to the obstacle course presented by the solidly built sets, especially the rocky ravine of the 2nd Act of « Walküre » , where there was scarcely a level place and where footholds were few and far between. Mildenburg describes herself leaping from rock to rock like a true flying Brünnhilde (the costume had the benefit of being equipped with a pair of white wings) . But there was no question that some of Roller's sets gave unprecedented restriction to the singers' movement, particularly as scenery did not yet generally make athletic demands on them. There were press complaints about « tableaux vivants » with the singers as figurines. Cometh the veritable rocky gorge, cometh the need for the veritable mountain goat ! If most accounts praised Roller's conciliation of realism and stylization, this was tempered with reservation that the human element had to some extent been subordinated to the decorative. For all the efforts, Mahler must have made, and for all the power and artistry of the vocal performances, characterization and acting came across less strongly than the sheerly visual drama. The problem of the actor's integration into the setting remained imperfectly solved.

The debut of the art of the director

The most far-reaching legacy of Roller and Mahler's work together was their demonstration that fidelity to the protean, evanescent spirit of a dramatist's work is more artistically fruitful than fidelity to the letter of his intentions. The right to interrogate a work of genius and come-up with answers undreamt of by its creator was established once and for all. It marks the birth, for the Opera stage, of the shocking idea that production is not just the literal reading of the composer's blueprint but can be creative in its own right. As already suggested, the special authority of Mahler and Roller as iconoclasts who were themselves creators of genius undoubtedly played a major part in winning acceptance (though this has never been universal) for what was a revolutionary idea in Opera production. It is perhaps remarkable that the proving ground should have been the works of Wagner, the only composer whose « after-life » came to be so zealously protected by his heirs. The Vienna productions were the 1st effective challenge to their hegemony.

Of course, Mahler and Roller made their decisive 1st moves without stepping wholly off the carpet - nor could that ever have been possible in a theatre with the political and social constraints of the Vienna Court Opera. And the decorative elements in Roller's æsthetic never sat entirely comfortably with Mahler's more ascetic preference in scenic matters (and vice-versa !) . Mahler himself believed that the disciplined simplicity of their last collaboration, Gluck's « Iphigénie en Aulide » (18 March 1907) , was their greatest achievement, a view shared by Bruno Walter and Lilli Lehmann. Mahler was never an uncritical admirer of the Secessionists ; his visual sense was closer to the philosophy of the architect Adolf Loos that « lack of ornament is a sign of spiritual strength ! » . And indeed Loos, a scourge of the Secessionists, was openly scornful of what he considered to be the decorative indulgence of Roller's settings :

« There are too many coffers around. Nicely arranged. The carpet is " Rudniker " (Prague) . I've used them too. For the entrance hall. All those cushions look nice. »

Roller's subsequent readiness to deploy his illustrative gifts to satisfy the theatre public's perennial appetite for the pictorial (one thinks of Franco Zeffirelli, in our own day) would have been seen by Adolphe Appia as a betrayal of the moral stance he demanded of the « metteur-en-scène » . There is certainly no question that Mahler brought-out the radical best in Roller, and that, after the brief golden years of their partnership, the artist became to some extent, so far as his theatre work was concerned, a victim of his own versatility.

Roller stayed on to complete the new « Ring » with Mahler's successor, Felix Weingartner, but the magic had fled. An almost unbelievable trust in literal depiction is evident in Roller's complaint to Mahler (by then conducting at the Met) about Weingartner's bold and prescient idea of staging the « Royal Hunt and Storm » in Berlioz's « les Troyens » (1909) « as a dumb-show or masquerade got up by Dido in the forest for the entertainment of her guest » . The down-to-earth Roller considered this imaginative idea of Weingartner's to be quite absurd. Roller, feeling himself undervalued by Weingartner, resigned his Opera post in May 1909 and took over the directorship of the School for Applied Arts. He went on to do important theatre work with, inter alia, the « Burgtheater » in Vienna and Max Reinhardt in Berlin, and returning to the Vienna Opera (1918-1934) designed important productions of Richard Strauß's Operas. In 1920, he was a co-founder with Reinhardt, Strauß and Hofmannsthal of the Salzburg Festival and, in 1934, made a belated Bayreuth debut in designing sets and costumes for Heinz Tietjen's production of « Parsifal » . Roller often reverted to a pictorial, decorative style - as in his famous designs for the premiere of « Der Rosenkavalier » in Dresden in 1911 - but the fastidious, elegant efficiency of his designs, the economy, visual honesty and truth to the musical drama that he had so momentarily developed with Mahler, never deserted him. His radical modernism mellowed in the service of entrepreneurs and impresarios whose theatrical objectives were considerably less idealistic than those of Gustav Mahler.

« Der Rosenkavalier » is a 1926 Austrian silent film of the Opera of the same name by Richard Strauß (music) and Hugo von Hofmannsthal (libretto) . Directed by Robert Wiene, it premiered on 10 January 1926 at the Dresden « Semperoper » , which had also hosted the actual Opera's premiere, 15 years earlier. Hofmannsthal considerably changed the storyline for the film version (which included a final scene in the formal gardens behind the Field Marshal's residence) and Strauß ; score included music not only from the Opera but also sections of his François Couperin Suite and a March for the Field Marshal, who appears in this version.

The music during the film's performances was provided by an Orchestra. At the premiere, this was conducted by Richard Strauß himself. The film's projection speed had to be adjusted by the projector in order to fit the speed of the Orchestra. This task fell to the film's cameraman, Hans Androschin, because only he knew the exact length of each scene and cut. In later performances, a special recording, also conducted by Strauß, provided the music. A planned tour of the United States, in 1927, by Strauß and his orchestra failed to go ahead because of the emergence of sound films.

Strauß conducted the Vienna and London premieres (and recorded excerpts from the film score on the Victrola label at that time) . The American premiere took place at Yale University's Woolsey Hall with the Yale Symphony conducted by John Mauceri (who received special permission from Strauß' son) on March 29, 1974. A copy of the film was found in the Czech National Archive and Mister Mauceri translated the titles with Glenn Most into English. The final sequence was missing from the print and was performed with orchestral music and titles alone. The score and parts were held by the Library of Congress. The audience at Yale included the famed Strauß soprano Maria Jeritza, who was living in New Jersey at the time.

Director : Robert Wiene, Music : Original music by Richard Strauß, Musical arrangement : Bernd Thewes, Adaption : Frank Strobel.

Film versions of Operas were already popular in the silent film era ; however, few other Opera films of the time were as spectacular and of such a high musical quality as the « Rosenkavalier » which was created in 1925. The film stars a number of brilliant performers, among them Michaël Bohnen, who was considered to be the incarnation of Ochs von Lerchenau « par excellence » . The film is based on the music of the « Rosenkavalier » Opera by Richard Strauß. It was arranged in an instrumental form to suit the film medium and was played by a « répétiteur » on set. Taking the Opera's story line as its central theme, the result was a film comedy enlivened with attractive locations, including Schönbrunn castle and its extensive grounds. The « people's film Opera » , as Richard Strauß liked to call it, was staged in an opulent scenography produced by Alfred Roller who had furnished the setting for the Opera's premiere. The director was Robert Wiene, who had made a name for himself with THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI (1920) . In « Rosenkavalier » , he proved that he not only had impeccable taste when it came to creating the Rococo ambience of the original but was also perceptively tuned into the ironic element which distinguishes « Rosenkavalier » as one of the major 20th Century Operas.

The film and its brilliant music, which was written for a large orchestra, was originally 2 hours long. Since the last (8th) reel is missing, it had not been performed for a long time. However, the complete film music, in the form of the original orchestral parts annotated with numerous synchronic indications, has survived. In conjunction with on-set photos as well as programme texts, these directions made it possible for the Finale to be reconstructed. On the occasion of the 80th anniversary of the film premiere (10 January 1926 in « Semperoper Dresden ») , ZDF/ARTE commissioned a comprehensive restoration from « Filmarchiv Austria » which also included a reconstruction of the Finale. It is now possible, once again, for both film and music to be performed, thereby introducing the audience to Richard Strauß' previously little-known talents as a film music composer.

Many people accuse Richard Strauß's music of sounding like a film soundtrack. Not everyone realises that he did actually write one - albeit after a considerable amount of arm-twisting.

Largely based on his Opera « Der Rosenkavalier » , it was created for live performance by Orchestra (no singers) alongside the 1925 silent movie of the same name, which fleshes-out the story line of the Opera but still manages to come in at half the length.

The Opera's librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal also wrote the film's script. But despite pleading he could whip up little enthusiasm in Strauß. There was much at stake for Strauß. If the film failed, he failed. But if, on the other hand, the film were successful, it might undermine the reputation of the Opera in comparison, a risk to which Strauß was acutely sensitive. The politicking between film-makers, financiers, publishers and the numerous other parties engaged in the making of a movie was another aspect of the process Strauß found distasteful. His doubts were salved by liberal applications of cash, and he took the job, but it wasn't a whole-hearted effort.

Much of the routine rearrangement was turned over to assistants. Where new music was required for new scenes, Strauß preferred to recycle old tunes. The limited amount of truly new material, principally a battle march, lacks inspiration. Once complete, Strauß tried his best to turn his back on it - Hofmannsthal had another battle persuading him to conduct the 1926 Dresden premiere. But eventually the score was delivered, the premiere conducted.

The film's director was Robert Wiene, a hot property after his influential (and financially successful) 1920 film « Das Kabinett des Doktor Caligari » . That cost $ 20,000 to make. 10 times as much was raised for « Rosenkavalier » , enabling Wiene to stage a massive battle and an extravagant outdoor masked ball Finale. Both are centred around the Marschallin's husband, who is of course unseen in the Opera. In the film, he's cipher-like and I suspect created merely for the purpose of these very scenes. Servants, guests, soldiers, peasants (some interesting « real » faces) crowd the screen. More cash was splashed on opulent costumes and lavish sets from the designer of the Opera's 1911 premiere, Alfred Roller.

In spite of all the money thrown at it, the film has little of Caligari's extraordinary originality. Perhaps, it was all those interfering financiers or perhaps Wiene was simply running-out of ideas. There is just one truly memorable image - the screen fills with what looks like a huge white fleece, which parts like a set of jigsaw pieces, revealing itself as the massed heads of a group of elderly periwigged gossips. But the pace is unflagging, and (within the confines of silent movie high-style) Wiene draws excellent performances from all his actors, right down to the extras.

Sadly and despite initial acclaim, the original film did not survive intact. The version shown at the Châtelet was pieced together from what remains, using a selection of stills and brief clips to make-up 10 minutes missing from the end.

Silent movie specialist Frank Strobel has been conducting this version around Europe, since 2006 - he visited Liverpool last year, but not, as yet, London. He was fortunate to have for this performance the services of the young and energetic Orchestre National d'Île de France, who make something of a specialism of work outside the mainstream Classical repertoire. They played the technically challenging music tirelessly for nearly 2 hours, filling the lofty tiers of the Châtelet with great attention to detail and dynamics.

The score isn't Strauß's greatest, the movie isn't that special, but with the Orchestra in the pit and the film projected on the Châtelet's enormous screen above them, somehow they compensated for each other's deficiencies. The many comic moments charmed, the Marschallin's sad surrender of Octavian drew a tear or two, the whole drama came alive. A packed and hugely varied audience (several small children included) gave Orchestra and conductor a massive ovation.

Alfred Roller, heard of him ?

The answer to this question, happening somewhere out there in the sunlit realm where no grief was felt, and where people could go on talking about today and tomorrow without howling, the answer was an astonishing « no » . The young Adolf Hitler had not, at that date, heard of Alfred Roller. And this man in Linz who owned a bit of real estate and happened to be their landlord was a friend, or acquaintance, of Alfred Roller, the greatest designer of Opera sets in Vienna.

That 1st, fantastic « Tristan » , which he had seen during his few weeks in Vienna when the bastards at the Academy of Arts had turned him down. Could anything have been more magical than that « Tristan » ? Gustav Mahler was on the podium, conducting, and when the brooding, everlastingly unsettling opening prelude was completed, the curtain went up and there was Roller's ship, at a right angle to the stage, with wind flickering the sails and Tristan in the prow.

Never to be forgotten Roller ! But, when asked through the fog of grief « Heard of him ? » , Hitler had only shaken his head sadly, unaware of what « Herr » Klaus Peter Treibel was suggesting, namely the impossible : that there might exist a link, in real life and not in fantasy, between the desolate kitchen in a flat in « Urfahr » , where happiness itself died to the light of Christmas candles on a tree, and a man who invented the magical scenery of the Court Opera in Vienna.

Triebel had scribbled-out a note of introduction and recommendation for Hitler :

« Go to Roller. Go and say old Treibel recommended you. He's a good man, Roller, he'll help you - who knows, maybe get you doing set designs for the Operas ? Now, Offenbach, there's one to get your feet tapping. »

So back to Vienna, he had come. He had spent some money on clothes before he arrived, a dark hat, a gentleman's overcoat, none of your rubbish, a walking cane. The letter remained propped on the chimney piece of the small room he shared with August Kubizek. Every day, Kubizek went-out to the Academy of Music and studied - in reality. Every day, he, in turn, would walk the streets pretending to be at the Academy of Arts, and he would come back to the room and stare at the envelope addressed to Professor Roller. Eventually, he developed enough courage to take the envelope down. He had, by now, filled a portfolio with drawings. There were some proposed sets for « Lohengrin » and « Tannhäuser » . There were all the architectural drawings for the complete rebuilding of Linz, of course. He was beginning to wonder whether it might not be advantageous to demolish Vienna and rebuild from scratch ; but that would come later. And he had set-out for the Court Opera House, with the portfolio and the letter of introduction.

But what would he say when he was stopped at the door ? :

« Excuse me, I have come to see Professor Roller. »

« I'm sure you have, " Sunny Jim ", and I'm just off to see the Emperor, good day to you. »

What if he met with mockery ? His grief was still at the raw stage when any set-back, however slight, was capable of provoking either the most abject misery, actual sobs, or a return of his old rages. In a café, the other day, he had ordered a particular type of cake with a pot of coffee. The waiter had brought the wrong cake. When he saw the waiter coming, with a nut-and-walnut concoction instead of the cherry-and-cream one upon which he had set his heart, he felt the universe collapsing. Looking at the callous waiter, who couldn't give a damn whether he brought a cherry « gâteau » or a plate of raw human flesh, he had made one very firm decision : he was not going to burst into tears just to satisfy this young sadist. Quite the opposite. But although the decision had been made to stand firm, he had not quite reckoned on what happened next, since the wave of pure vitriolic rage that shook his whole being at the very moment of the waiter's arrival had in fact taken him completely by surprise. The cake had been hurled, the plate had been smashed, but much more dangerous had been the coffee pot flying through the air, raining its contents on the shoulders of others in the café. Naturally, he had found himself being escorted from the premises and set-down on the pavement, with pompous comments about his good fortune not to have been handed over to the police.

Fearing a revisitation of such an outburst, he had come to the door of the Opera House. In fact, the commissionaire, in his splendid uniform with frogging and epaulettes, had been friendly, asking « Sunny Jim » whether he could help. When he had shyly, almost inaudibly, mumbled the name of Alfred Roller, he had been told to go to a particular office on the 1st floor. But then, courage had failed him and he had muttered something about not needing the Professor today ; another day. He merely wanted to know where the Professor's office was, should he ever need it.

His cowardice nagged at him, all through a concert that evening which August Kubizek took him to - the everlastingly wonderful 7th Symphony of Bruckner ! This would not do, this fear. The next day, he would go and confront Roller. But the next day, and the next, though he managed to make himself go to the Opera House, he could not bring himself to beard the great man in his den. And, coming away from the Opera House that 3rd time, he had been visited by an outburst of despair that made him dance with anger, and he had taken « Herr Treibel » 's letter and torn it into confetti, hurling it into the air about him in the street.

For weeks, afterwards, he thought of writing to Treibel to get another letter of introduction to Roller, but it was no use. He did not have the nerve. Worse than this, he could not summon-up enough energy to do it. For days on end, he did nothing, simply did not know how the time passed. At other times, he could do some work and he felt the quality of his draughtsmanship, especially of his architectural draughtsmanship, improving. Months, years passed. At some point, he had applied to the Academy again and, once again, the bastards had turned him down, even though he seriously believed that some of the drawings in his portfolio stood comparison with Michelangelo. The money began to run-out. What money there was, he spent on going to the Opera, and he saw all the Mahler-Roller productions, some of them many times over. Legends in the history of Wagner production and he was there ! One letter, one measly letter might have allowed him to cross the bridge and enter the legend, become part of that world.

Alfred Roller (geboren 2. Oktober 1864, in Brünn Mähren ; gestorben 21. Juni 1935, in Wien) war ein österreichischer Bühnenbildner, Maler und Grafiker.

Roller war 1897 Mitbegründer und 1902 Präsident der Wiener Secession, von der er sich aber 1905 trennte. 1903 wurde er als Nachfolger von Heinrich Lefler von Gustav Mahler an die Wiener Hofoper geholt und reformierte in kongenialer Zusammenarbeit mit Mahler die szenische Kunst im Sinne der Idee des Gesamtkunstwerks (Zusammenwirken von Raum, Farbe und Licht mit Musik, Wort und Gestik) . Nach 1909 war er auch Bühnenbildner unter anderem für das Burgtheater. Roller machte die Ausstattungen für sämtliche Wiener Richard Strauß-Erstaufführungen. Später kam es zu einer engen Zusammenarbeit mit Max Reinhardt, bei dem er ab 1929 auch Lehrer am Wiener Reinhardt-Seminar war.

Der wohl bekannteste Bewunderer von Rollers Arbeit war Adolf Hitler, der ursprünglich 1908 nach seinem Umzug von Linz nach Wien, bei Roller in die Lehre gehen wollte. Zu diesem Zwecke verfasste eine Linzer Bekannte ein Empfehlungsschreiben an Roller. Werner Maser schrieb in seiner Hitler-Biografie, Roller habe daraufhin Hitler zu einem Gespräch empfangen und an einen Bildhauer namens Panholzer vermittelt. Laut neueren Forschungen von Brigitte Hamann (Hitlers Wien, 1998) ließ Hitler jedoch diese Chance ungenutzt : Nachdem er bereits in der Hofoper vorstellig geworden war, verließ er diese wieder, so daß eine Begegnung mit dem von ihm verehrten Roller nicht zustande kam. Roller lernte er fünfundzwanzig Jahre später kennen, nachdem er bereits Reichskanzler geworden war.

Néanmoins, les 2 hommes renoueront durant la guerre puis, de nouveau, après la guerre.

La Ire réalisation de Preetorius à Bayreuth sera, en 1933, « l'Anneau du Nibelung » , en collaboration avec Heinz Tietjen et, au pupitre, le chef Karl Elmendorff.

Heinz Tietjen

Le chef d'orchestre et metteur-en-scène allemand Heinz Tietjen est né le 24 juin 1881 à Tanger, au Maroc, et est décédé le 30 novembre 1967 à Baden-Baden. De 1904 à 1907, il est en poste au Théâtre de Trèves dont il devient l'intendant, en 1919. Durant toute sa carrière, il cumule les fonctions de directeur de théâtre, de chef d'orchestre et de dramaturge. De 1919 à 1922, il est à l'Opéra de Sarrebruck puis, de 1922 à 1924, à Breslau (aujourd'hui, Wrocław en Pologne) . De 1925 à 1945, il travaille au « Staatsoper » de Berlin. De 1931 à 1944, il succède à Siegfried Wagner comme directeur artistique du Festival de Bayreuth. En 1944, Richard Strauß lui dédie « l'Amour de Danaé » . Après la guerre, il poursuit sa carrière jusqu'en 1959, à Berlin et à Hambourg.

...

The German conductor and music producer Heinz Tietjen was born on June 24, 1881, in Tangier (Morocco) , and died on November 30, 1967, in Baden-Baden.

At age 23, he held the position of producer at the Opera House in Trier and was appointed its director in 1907, holding the dual roles until 1922. Simultaneously, he was the director at Saarbrücken and Breslau (now Wrocław, in Poland) , from 1919 to 1922.

Hans Tietjen was the director of the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » , between 1925 and 1927, then director of the Prussian State Theatre. From 1931 to 1944, he served as artistic director at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » for Winnifred Wagner with whom he had a Romantic liaison.

In 1948, he returned to direct the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » , serving until 1955 when he was appointed manager and artistic director of the new Hamburg State Opera, a job he held until 1959.

Heinz Tietjen was also a Nazi. His family is forbidding access to this archives in Berlin so that his total involvement with Adolf Hitler is kept as much as possible sealed.

Heinz Tietjen was a pupil of Arthur Nikisch. When he was 23, he became producer at the Opera House in Trier and, in 1907, he became it's director (until 1922) . From 1919 until 1922, he was also director of the Opera's of Saarbrücken and Breslau.

In 1925, he became the director of the Berlin Symphony Orchestra (until 1927) and, subsequently, of the Prussian State Theatre. Although the Nazi's initially didn't trust him, Hermann Göring asked him, as early as 1932, if he would be willing to keep his position in Berlin.

From 1931 to 1944, he was also artistic director at Bayreuth, where he was romantically involved with Winnifred Wagner (Siegfried Wagner had died in 1930) . After the War, he scolded the Wagners but, in later years, he was again in contact with Winnifred. He had to undergo a denazification trial, but it was decided that he was innocent and he was allowed to continue his career.

From 1948 to 1954, he was the director of the « Städtischen Oper Berlin » and, from 1956 until 1959, he directed the « Staatsoper » in Hamburg where his production of Wagner's « Ring » was very succesful. In 1959, he retired.

Heinz Tietjen (geboren 24. Juni 1881 in Tanger, Marokko ; gestorben 30. November 1967 in Baden-Baden) war ein deutscher Regisseur, Dirigent und Intendant.

Tietjen absolvierte zunächst eine Kaufmannsausbildung in Bremen und arbeitete im « Anschluß » für die Bremer Westafrika-Gesellschaft im Ausland, ehe er begann, sich der Musik zuzuwenden und unter anderem bei dem ungarischen Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch zu lernen.

Tietjen erhielt 1904 sein erstes Engagement als Kapellmeister und Regisseur am Theater Trier, avancierte dort 1907 zum Direktor und war von 1919 bis 1922 schließlich Intendant des Hauses. Er wurde im « Anschluß » zum Intendanten des Breslauer Theaters berufen, was er mitunter wohl seinen Förderern, dem späteren preußischen Kultusminister Carl Heinrich Becker und den Fachreferenten seines Ministeriums, Ludwig Seelig und Leo Kestenberg, zu verdanken hatte. Eine weitere Stelle als Intendant führte Tietjen an das Saarländische Staatstheater Saarbrücken.

Seit 1925 war Tietjen Leiter der Deutschen Oper Berlin und übernahm ab 1926 zudem die Leitung der staatlichen Opernhäuser Unter den Linden und Krolloper. 1927 wurde er Generalintendant aller Preußischen Staatstheater, die das königliche Schauspielhaus am Gendarmenmarkt, das Schillertheater sowie die Theater Wiesbaden und Kassel umfassten, und behielt diesen Posten bis 1944 bei. Seine spätere Vertraute Winnifred Wagner berief Tietjen 1931 zum künstlerischen Leiter der Bayreuther Festspiele, die er von 1934 bis 1944 in Zusammenarbeit mit ihr leitete. Nach Deutung von Hannes Heer war Tietjen 1931 zum « mächtigsten Theaterleiter in der Endphase der Weimarer Republik » geworden, der seine Karriere « seinem Doppeltalent als wirtschaftlich wie künstlerisch gleich effektiver Theatermanager und als ebenso gerissener wie verschwiegener Kulturpolitiker » verdankte. Tietjen befürwortete die Schließung der Krolloper, die 1931 von der nationalsozialistischen Presse als « rötlich-jüdisches Kulturinstitut » angegriffen wurde.

Heinz Tietjen war der erste Regisseur neben den Mitgliedern der Familie Wagner, der in Bayreuth mehrere Opern inszenierte. Außer den Familienmitgliedern war vor Tietjen überhaupt nur ein Regisseur, August Harlacher (1888 : Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg) , tätig. Heinz Tietjen inszenierte sechs der sieben in Bayreuth aufgeführten Opernwerke (Ausnahme : Tannhäuser) . Diese Breite erreichten außer ihm nur die beiden Wagner-Enkel Wieland und Wolfgang Wagner. Er ist außerdem neben Wieland Wagner der einzige Regisseur, der in einem Festspieljahrgang zwei Opern inszenierte (1933 : Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, Der Ring des Nibelungen) .

Von 1933 bis 1941 und nochmals 1959 war er auch Dirigent in Bayreuth :

1933-1934 : Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.

1934, 1936, 1938, 1939, 1941 : Der Ring des Nibelungen.

1936, 1937, 1959 : Lohengrin.

Nach Machtübernahme der Nationalsozialisten wurde Tietjen von Hermann Göring am 11. September 1936 zum Leiter der Berliner Staatsoper und im Dezember desselben Jahres, gemeinsam mit Gustaf Gründgens, zum Preußischen Staatsrat ernannt. Als Generalintendant der preußischen Staatstheater war Heinz Tietjen, Vertrauter von Adolf Hitler und Göring sowie Freund der Hitler-Verehrerin Winnifred Wagner, eine wichtige Stütze der nationalsozialistischen Kulturpolitik. Am 1. Juni 1933 entließ Tietjen 27 Angestellte von Staatsoper und Schauspielhaus. Im Schauspielhaus kündigte er dem Kommunisten Hans Otto. An der Absprache Tietjens mit Göring war auch Wilhelm Furtwängler, Operndirektor der Staatsoper, beteiligt.

Für Hannes Heer besteht kein Zweifel an Tietjens Rolle als Steigbügelhalter der Nazis. Belege dafür lieferten Personalakten, die er im Preußischen Staatsarchiv Dahlem und von Entnazifizierungsakten, die er im Berliner Landesarchiv fand. Danach drang Tietjen nicht bei Hans Hinkel darauf, zumindest die in Mischehe lebenden Ensemblemitglieder weiter zu beschäftigen.

Nach Kriegsende wurde gegen Tietjen ein Entnazifizierungsverfahren eingeleitet, das im April 1947 mit seiner vollständigen Entlastung geschlossen wurde. Die Kommission bescheinigte ihm zwar eine « opportunistische Haltung » , sah aber aufgrund zweier beigebrachter Zeugenaussagen eine « aktive Beteiligung » am Widerstand gegen den Nationalsozialismus als gegeben an. Hannes Heer hält die Selbstinszenierung Tietjens als Schutzpatron des Ensembles, als Judenretter oder gar als Widerstandskämpfer für geschönt.

Im August 1948 wurde Tietjen vom Berliner Magistrat erneut die Intendanz der Deutschen Oper übertragen, die er diesmal bis 1954 ausführte und wo unter seiner Leitung 1951 erstmals die Berliner Festwochen veranstaltet wurden. 1954 ging Tietjen an die Hamburgische Staatsoper. Von 1957 an war Tietjen dort als Intendant tätig, ehe er sich 1959 zur Ruhe setzte.

Tietjen wurde 1953 mit dem Großen Verdienstkreuz der Bundesrepublik Deutschland ausgezeichnet. Anlässlich seines 50. Bühnenjubiläums erhielt er am 26. September 1954 vom Berliner Senat die Ernst-Reuter-Plakette. 1956 wurde er mit dem Silbernen Blatt der Dramatiker Union und 1958 mit dem Ehrensiegel der Stadt Trier ausgezeichnet.

Im Berliner Bezirk Tempelhof-Schöneberg wurde die Tietjenstraße nach ihm benannt.

In der Trierer Innenstadt (am Theater) wurde der Heinz-Tietjen-Weg nach ihm benannt.

Tietjen wurde 1955 zum Mitglied der Berliner Akademie der Künste gewählt.

...

Heinz Tietjen war ein Schüler des bekannten Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch (1855-1922) und ein Regietalent. Zunächst Opernintendant und Regisseur in Trier, Saarbrücken und Breslau, übernahm er 1925 die Intendanz der Städtischen Oper, später die der Staatsoper in Berlin. Als Generalintendant der preußischen Staatstheater von 1930 bis 1945 beeinflusste er spürbar das kulturelle Leben in Deutschland. Seit 1930 war er auch künstlerischer Leiter der Bayreuther Festspiele und setzte neue Maßstäbe mit seinen Wagner- Inszenierungen. Von 1948 bis 1954 wieder Intendant der Städtischen Oper Berlin, erneuerte er die Zusammensetzung des Ensembles und aktualisierte den Spielplan. Als Intendant der Hamburger Staatsoper von 1956 bis 1959 wurde er besonders für seine « Ring » -

Inszenierung gefeiert.

Hans Schemm

Hans Schemm was born on 6 October 1891 in Bayreuth and died on 5 March 1935 in Bayreuth. He was a « Gauleiter » in Nazi Germany.

Schemm, whose parents ran a shoe-maker's shop, 1st went to a « Volksschule » for 5 years and, then, as of 1905, to a teachers' college. In 1915, he got married ; in 1917, a son was born. He taught school beginning in 1910, 1st in Wülfersreuth, then, as of 1911, in Neufang ; and, from 1920, at the « Altstadtschule » (Old Town School) , which was later named the « Hans-Schemm-Schule » , in Bayreuth. During the First World War, he worked at a military epidemic hospital in Bayreuth where he became infected with tuberculosis.

In 1919, he belonged to the « Freikorps Bayreuth » , which took part in the street-fighting that was common at the time among opposing political groups in Munich.

On the basis of his background in bio-chemistry, Schemm became head of a bacteriological-chemical laboratory in Thale (« Hubertusbad ») . After it closed in 1921, for financial reasons, Schemm returned to the classroom until 1928.

Schemm's interactions with Nazi groups had begun by 1923. On September 30 of that year, he 1st met Adolf Hitler. With Hitler's quick confidence, Schemm became an assessor in the « Bayreuth Völkischer Bund » in 1924 ; and, in the following year, he organized the « Bayreuth Nazi Ortsgruppe » (Local Group) and the Nazi « Gau » of Upper-Franconia (« Oberfranken ») .

Schemm built the organization up with determination. His political positions were clearly anti-democratic, anti-Semitic and anti-Communist, as can be seen in some of his quotations :

« We are revolutionary, we want to overthrow the present State. On our enemies, we shall take revenge, and indeed, bloody revenge. »

« We are not objective - we are German ! »

« ... that a Jew should dangle from every lamppost. »

In 1927, Schemm founded the National-Socialist Teachers' Federation. In 1928, he became a member of the Bavarian parliament.

As Party leader for Bavaria, Schemm was responsible for preparing the Party members and candidates for the election campaigns. In 1929, under Schemm's management, the Munich Nazis won 9 seats, and Schemm became the faction leader. The presence of the Nazi representatives in the parliament was controversial.

Schemm also took on the role of publicist in the late-1920's : for a brief period, he took-over the leadership of several Nazi newspapers (« Streiter », « Weckruf » and « Nationale Zeitung ») . In April 1929, Schemm founded his own newspaper ; and, in August of the same year, appeared in the « Nationalsozialistische Lehrerzeitung » (National-Socialist Teachers' Newspaper) , the National-Socialist Teachers League's (NSLB) journalistic organ. On 1 October 1930, came the 1st edition of the weekly newspaper « Kampf für deutsche Freiheit und Kultur » (Struggle for German Freedom and Culture) , which was published by Schemm, and whose circulation rose from 3,000 in the beginning to 20,000 by 1932.

In 1931, Schemm founded the Bayreuth National-Socialist Cultural Publishing House (« Nationalsozialistischer Kulturverlag Bayreuth ») which, beginning on 1 October 1932, published the daily newspaper « Das Fränkische Volk » (circulation : 10,000) .

In 1930, Schemm became a member of the German national parliament, the « Reichstag » .

In 1933, the « Gau » of Upper-Franconia, led by Schlemm, was united with the « Gau » of Upper-Palatinate and Lower-Bavaria (« Oberpfalz-Niederbayern ») to form the « Gau Bayerische Ostmark » . Schemm kept his job as « Gauleiter » . Furthermore, he became an « SA-Gruppenführer » . On 16 March 1933, the « Reich » Governor (« Reichsstatthalter ») Franz Ritter von Epp appointed Schemm to be the provisional Culture Minister. Hitler, then, appointed him on 13 April 1933, the « Leader of Cultural and Educational Affairs of Bavaria » .

In 1933, Schemm became an honorary citizen of Bayreuth.

In April 1933, when Schemm arrived in Passau to attend the laying of the corner-stone for the Hall of the Nibelungs, he also addressed the masses. Passau honoured Schemm by dedicating a street and a school to him.

In March 1935, Schemm was seriously injured in an aircraft crash. Although Hitler personally ordered Berlin Professor Ferdinand Sauerbruch to fly to Bayreuth, Schemm, however, succumbed to his injuries on March 5 before the professor's arrival. His successor as « Gauleiter » was Fritz Wächtler.

The Nazis posthumously honoured Schemm as a publicist and educator by naming multiple schools, streets, and halls after him.

NSDAP-Gauleiter der Bayerischen Ostmark, Reichswalter des Nationalsozialistischen Lehrerbunds (NSLB) und Bayerischer Kultusminister.

Hans Schemm wurde als zweiter von drei Söhnen des Konrad Schemm und der Babette Meyer geboren. Seine Eltern betrieben eine Schusterei. Aufgrund der Beanspruchung der Eltern als Lieferant des örtlichen Militärs wuchs er überwiegend bei seiner Großmutter auf. Sie weckte bei ihm das Interesse für Geschichte und Mythen. Er besuchte zunächst die Volksschule und von 1905 bis 1910 (drei Jahre Präparandenschule und zwei Jahre Seminarkurse) das Lehrerseminar an der Königlich-Bayerischen Lehrerbildungsanstalt Bayreuth. 1915 heiratete er die vier Jahre ältere (aus vermögendem Hause stammende) Baumeisterstochter Babetta Lorenzia Zeitler. 1917 wurde der Sohn Rudolf geboren. Ab 1910 unterrichtete er als Lehrer zunächst in Wülfersreuth, ab 1911 dann in Neufang und ab 1920 an der Altstadtschule, der späteren Hans-Schemm-Schule in Bayreuth. Während seiner Zeit als Lehrer experimentierte er mit Chemikalien und arbeitete mit seinem Mikroskop. Er wurde 1911 vom Wehrdienst zurückgestellt und der Ersatzreserve zugeteilt. Am sechsten Mobilmachungstag (6. August 1914) wurde er « auf dringende Vorstellungen zuständiger Militärärzte » als Krankenwärter beim Reservelazarett in Bayreuth eingesetzt. Im Winter 1915-1916 infizierte er sich mit Tuberkulose, was wieder zeitweise zur Freistellung vom Wehrdienst führte.

Vom 18. April bis 6. Mai 1919 gehörte er dem Freikorps Bayreuth an. An der gewaltsamen Niederschlagung der Münchner Räterepublik am 2. Mai 1919 nahm er nicht mehr aktiv teil, weil er erst danach in München eintraf.

Schemm wurde im September 1920 Laborant eines bakteriologisch-chemischen Labors der Chemischen Werke Werchow in Thale (ehemals Sanatorium Hubertusbad), das jedoch bereits 1921 aus finanziellen Gründen schloß. Schemm, der sich zuvor wissenschaftlich mit chemisch-biologischen Fragen befaßt hatte, kehrte wieder in den Schuldienst zurück. Nebenberuflich lehrte er zwischen 1921 und 1928 an der Volkshochschule.

Ab 1923 hatte Schemm Kontakt mit nationalsozialistischen Gruppierungen, trat der NSDAP bei und lernte am 30. September 1923 Adolf Hitler kennen. 1924 wurde er Beisitzer im Völkischen Bund Bayreuth. Am 27. Februar 1925 gründete Schemm die NSDAP-Ortsgruppe Bayreuth und im gleichen Jahr den Gau Oberfranken der NSDAP.

Schemm baute die Organisation zielstrebig auf. Seine politischen Positionen waren klar antidemokratisch, antisemitisch und antikommunistisch, was und andere folgende Zitate belegen :

« Wir sind revolutionär, wir wollen den gegenwärtigen Staat stürzen. An unseren Feinden werden wir Rache nehmen und zwar blutige Rache. »

« Wir sind nicht objektiv - wir sind deutsch ! »

« ... daß an jedem Laternenpfahl ein Jude baumeln solle. »

1928 wurde Schemm Mitglied des Bayerischen Landtags und daneben Leiter des Bezirks Franken der nationalsozialistischen Gesellschaft für deutsche Kultur. 1932 schied er aus dem Landtag aus.

Systematisch bereitete Schemm die örtliche NSDAP auf die Wahlkämpfe vor, zunächst für die Stadtratswahlen 1929. Die NSDAP erreichte neun Mandate, Schemm wurde Fraktionsvorsitzender. Der Einzug der NSDAP-Fraktion führte zu häufigen Tumulten und einer Prügelei, die durch das aggressive Verhalten der NSDAP-Mitglieder und insbesondere Schemms veranlasst waren.

1930 wurde Schemm Mitglied des Reichstags und blieb es bis zu seinem Tod.

1929 gründete Schemm den Nationalsozialistischen Lehrerbund (NSLB), dem er als Reichswalter vorstand. Auf seine Initiative hin entstand im Rahmen des NSLB eine Arbeitsgemeinschaft von Geistlichen beider Konfessionen. Dies führte zur Bildung einer Arbeitsgemeinschaft nationalsozialistischer evangelischer Geistlicher, die sich ab Mitte 1931 Nationalsozialistischer Evangelischer Pfarrerbund (NSEP) nannte.

1928 und 1929 hatte Schemm die Leitung mehrerer nationalsozialistischer Zeitungen (Streiter, Weckruf und Nationale Zeitung) aufgrund seiner parlamentarischen Immunität übernommen, die er jedoch kurze Zeit später bereits wieder abgab, da es zu viele aufreibende Prozesse gab und sich die Redaktionen nicht immer an seine Anweisungen hielten. Im April 1929 gründete Schemm eine eigene Zeitung, ab August des gleichen Jahres erschien dann die Nationalsozialistische Lehrerzeitung, später benannt Der deutsche Erzieher. Reichszeitung, das Verbandsorgan des NS-Lehrerbundes. Am 1. Oktober 1930 erschien die von Schemm herausgegebene Wochenzeitung Kampf für deutsche Freiheit und Kultur, welche die Auflage von zunächst 3.000 Stück auf 20.000 Stück (1932) steigerte.

1931 gründete Schemm den Nationalsozialistischen Kulturverlag Bayreuth, der ab dem 1. Oktober 1932 die Tageszeitung Das Fränkische Volk (Auflage 10.000 Stück) herausgab.

Schemm konnte 1933 die Gründung eines NS-Gaus Bayerische Ostmark durchsetzen, « Mark » im mittelalterlichen Sinn als Kriegsgebiet und Barriere gegen die « Slawen » verstanden. Gauhauptstadt wurde Bayreuth, das gleichzeitig auch Sitz des NSLB war. Schemm und die Gauleitung waren danach aktiv, um ein « Ostmark-Bewusstsein » zu fördern (zum Beispiel durch Ostmarklied, Ostmarkstraße, Ostmarkverlag). 1942 wurde der Gau, der infolge der NS-Eroberung von Teilen der Tschechoslowakei nunmehr nicht im Grenzgebiet lag, in « Gau Bayreuth » umbenannt. Schemm gründete einen « Gauverlag Bayerische Ostmark » mit Sitz in Bayreuth, durch den etliche regionale Blätter gleichgeschaltet und zentral gesteuert wurden. Bis 1942 trugen die Bezeichnung « Bayerische Ostmark » neben dem « Fränkischen Volk » die Deggendorfer Zeitung, die « Rottaler Zeitung », das « Hofer Tagblatt », die « Frankenwald-Zeitung », die « Kulmbacher Rundschau », die « Dingolfing-Landauer Zeitung », die Donau-Zeitung, der « Regensburger Kurier », die Coburger Nationalzeitung und andere Tageszeitungen. Nur wenige davon konnten noch eine kurze Zeit eine gewisse Eigenständigkeit bewahren, bis sie wegen der Papierrationierung im Weltkrieg ihr Erscheinen ganz einstellten.

Der Gauverlag Bayerische Ostmark, ab 1942 « Gauverlag Bayreuth », produzierte bis kurz vor Kriegsende eine große Anzahl Bücher, insbesondere auch Feldpostausgaben von Kleinschriften. Es erschienen nicht nur offensichtliche Propaganda-Schriften, sondern auch Bildbände über Städte der « Bayerischen Ostmark », sowie welche zu Bulgarien, und den eroberten Städten Prag und Krakau. 1939 zeigte der Verlag eine besondere Nähe zu Alfred Rosenbergs Kulturpolitik; zum Beispiel erschien im März ein Auswahlband, der aus 9 Essays von 1938 in einer Literatur-Zeitschrift Bücherkunde, einem Organ des Rosenbergschen « Amts Schrifttumspflege » bestand, sowie 3 weiteren. Beide Publikationen hatten den gleichen Herausgeber beziehungsweise Hauptschriftleiter, Günther Stöve.

Ab 1928 war Hans Schemm Gauleiter des NSDAP-Gaus Oberfranken, der 1933 mit dem Gau Oberpfalz-Niederbayern zum Gau Bayerische Ostmark vereinigt wurde. Schemm blieb Gauleiter und etablierte in den folgenden Jahren in diesem Gau eine Nebenausgabe des « Fränkischen Volkes », die « Bayerische Ostwacht », welche später in « Bayerische Ostmark » umbenannt wurde. Schemm wurde außerdem SA-Gruppenführer. Am 16. März 1933 ernannte Reichsstatthalter Franz Ritter von Epp Schemm zum kommissarischen Kultusminister Bayerns (Kabinett von Epp). Hitler berief ihn dann am 13. April 1933 zum « Leiter der kulturellen und erzieherischen Angelegenheiten Bayerns ». Aufgrund dessen hatte auch der NSLB und der Reichstenographenbund seinen Sitz in Bayreuth. Auch unter der Regierung von Ludwig Siebert (Kabinett Siebert) blieb Schemm bis zu seinem Tode bayerischer Kultusminister. 1933 publizierte er das Buch Gott, Rasse und Kultur.

Auf der Tagung Die Erziehung im nationalsozialistischen Staat, die vom 1. bis 5. August 1933 in München stattfand, rechtfertigte er in einem Referat die nationalsozialistische Gleichschaltung :

« Der Nationalsozialismus kam zum Siege durch sein begeistertes Bekenntnis zur Totalität. Und wir werden deswegen nicht nachgeben, bis auch die Letzten gleichgeschaltet und die, welche nicht wollen, aus irgendwelchen Gründen weggestorben sind. »

Schemm wurde 1933 Ehrenbürger von Bayreuth und später in Eggenfelden und Hof.

1934 wirkte Schemm mit Hans Frank bei der Organisation der Schachweltmeisterschaft 1934 mit und ließ Schach in Bayern zu einem Schulfach machen.

Am 5. März 1935 starb Schemm aufgrund von Verletzungen, die er sich bei einem Flugzeugabsturz zugezogen hatte. Das Flugzeug war während des Starts am Flugplatz Bayreuth aufgrund eines Pilotenfehlers abgestürzt. Es gab auch Gerüchte, daß der Absturz alkoholbedingt war oder er selbst das Flugzeug gesteuert hatte. Hitler persönlich beorderte den Berliner Professor Ferdinand Sauerbruch per Flugzeug nach Bayreuth, Schemm erlag jedoch vor dessen Eintreffen seinen Verletzungen. Sein Nachfolger als Gauleiter und Reichswalter des NSLB wurde Fritz Wächtler.

Schemms Leben wurde von den Nationalsozialisten, zum Teil aber auch noch in der nachfolgenden demokratischen Zeit, verklärt. Infolge seines frühen Todes wurde er oft als « guter Nazi » bezeichnet. In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus wurden Schulen, Straßen und Hallen nach ihm benannt. Unter anderem trugen das Theodolinden-Gymnasium und die Rotbuchenschule in München seinen Namen. Eine dieser Benennungen überdauerte bis April 1986 :

Die « Hans-Schemm-Kaserne » der US-Streitkräfte in Bayreuth, deren Hauptgebäude heute und andere das Sozialgericht Bayreuth beherbergt. Ein Gedächtnisraum wurde im Haus der Deutschen Erziehung eingerichtet.

Fritz Wächtler

L'homme politique allemand Fritz Wächtler est né le 17 janvier 1891 à Triebes et a été exécuté le 19 avril 1945 à Waldmünchen. Il a été « Gauleiter » du « Gau » de Bavière-Ostmark du 5 décembre 1935 au 19 avril 1945, date de son exécution par son successeur, le « Kreisleiter » de Bayreuth Ludwig Ruckdeschel.

Entré au NSDAP en 1926, il gravit rapidement les échelons de la SA. Élu député au Élections législatives allemandes de novembre, il est nommé « Gauleiter » à la suite du décès accidentel de son prédécesseur, en novembre 1935.

À la fin du conflit, alors que lui et son administration battent en retraite devant l'avancée des troupes américaines, il est exécuté sur ordre personnel de Adolf Hitler, sur les conseils de Martin Bormann, par son rival et successeur Ludwig Ruckdeschel.

The Nazi German politician Fritz Wächtler was born on 17 January 1891 in Triebes, in the Principality of Reuss-Greiz (present-day Thuringia) . He was the « Gauleiter » of the eastern Bavarian administrative region of « Gau Bayreuth » . Trained as a primary school teacher, he also became head of the National-Socialist Teachers League (NSLB) in 1935. During World War II, he held the honorary rank of « SS-Obergruppenführer » and « Reich » Defense Commissar of Bayreuth. Prone to alcoholic outbursts and unpopular with the local residents, he eventually ran afoul of Martin Bormann in a political intrigue. Wächtler was shot on the orders from the « Führerbunker » near the end of the War in April of 1945.

Wächtler was the son of a watch-maker. Between 1905 and 1911, he attended the « Weimar Lehrerseminar » , a special training academy for primary school teachers. After 2 years of teaching activity and military service, he became in 1914 a « 1 year volunteer » (« Einjährigfreiwilliger ») on the front during World War I. By 1915, he had been promoted to lieutenant. During the War, he received many awards. After the War, Wächtler worked again as a teacher in Thuringia.

Wächtler joined the Nazi Party in April 1926 (Member No. 35,313) and became its founding Local Group Leader (« Ortsgruppenleiter ») as well as « Sturmabteilung » leader in his hometown of Triebes. He also became district manager of the Party for Weimar-North. In 1929, Wächtler was elected as a member of the « Landtag » of Bavaria and appointed Deputy « Gauleiter » for the district of Thuringia. From August 1932, Wächtler served as Education Minister in the cabinet of the Minister President of Thuringia, Fritz Sauckel.

Following the Nazi Seizure of Power in 1933 until December 1935, Wächtler held the post of Interior Minister of Thuringia. He also became a member of the « Reichstag » in Berlin, in November 1933, a post he held until his death. In November 1934, Wächtler joined the « Schutzstaffel » (SS-Nr. 209 058) as an SS-Colonel. By the end of January 1936, he was promoted to the rank of « SS-Brigadeführer » and, in April 1937, to « SS-Gruppenführer » .

On 5 March 1935, the 1st « Gauleiter » of the Bayreuth, Hans Schemm, died in an airplane crash. Wächtler was appointed his successor and also took-over management of the National-Socialist Teachers League (NSLB) . From January 1936, he also acted as a « person responsible for primary school questions » on the staff of Rudolf Heß. He was also awarded the title of the Prussian State Council and, until 1938, served as the acting mayor of the city of Bayreuth.

Unlike Schemm, Wächtler enjoyed no popularity among the residents of his district nor among the « Reich » leadership. He was brutal with subordinates and prone to uncontrolled alcoholic outbursts in public. Even Winifred Wagner, daughter-in-law of Richard Wagner, complained repeatedly about his misconduct to her close friend Hitler.

However, she also frequently tried to intervene with the « Führer » on behalf of Jewish friends for clemency. This is probably why, while little appreciated by Hitler, Wächtler remained untouched until 1945.

Wächtler was involved in organizing the anti-Jewish « Kristallnacht » riots of 9-10 November 1938, in his district. The next day, the « Reich » leadership in Berlin ordered cessation of further property destruction because they feared the riots they had instigated would lead to more radical actions not under their control. Wächtler himself tried to use the opportunity to force public school teachers to sign a personal oath that they would no longer teach any religious subjects. Highly-unpopular, Rudolf Heß had to order the directive rescinded. From 1938, Wächtler's district also became home to the Floßenbürg concentration camp and its many sub-camps.

In February 1939, the « Donau-Zeitung » reported about Wächtler's visit in Hauzenberg, where the « Gauleiter » had dedicated a Party district house. After seeing the condition of the school in Wegscheid, a new building was decided. In March 1939, when Wächtler spoke at the « Passau Nibelungenhalle », the « Donau-Zeitung » reported an audience of 12,000. In April 1939, Wächtler purchased the « Passau Haus », where Adolf Hitler had lived for 2 years. 1 year later, he donated it to the city of Passau.

On 16 November 1942, Wächtler was appointed « Reich » Defense Commissar (« Reichsverteidigungskommissar ») for his district and, by August 1944, given the rank of « SS-Obergruppenführer ». It was in these positions that he came to realize the War would be lost. This attitude also became apparent to his superiors when he prevented the seizure of the historic « Bayreuth Festspielhaus » for use in defense of the city. By 1945, his additional failure to send daily situation reports to « Führer » Headquarters brought him to the attention and suspicion of Martin Bormann, Hitler's private secretary. Bormann had previously ordered the closing of the National-Socialist Teachers League (NSLB), on 17 February 1943, together with all its « Gau » offices across Germany. Wächtler, fearing the loss of influence, complained that the NSLB was essential for the War effort in long rambling memos to Bormann, to no avail.

In 1945, Hitler declared Bayreuth to be a fortress, which led to the destruction of over 1/3 of the city by air-raids. On 1 April 1945, Bormann issued a further order that all « Gauleiters », « Kreisleiters », and other NSDAP political leaders were to fight to the death in their districts. With the city in ruins and only 200 irregular defenders left, Wächtler left Bayreuth with his staff as American tanks approached on 13 April. He set-up offices at a hotel in Waldmünchen in the southern part of the « Gau » near the Czech border. It is unclear whether communications difficulties prevented Wächtler from informing « Führer » Headquarters of his location, however, his deputy and political rival Ludwig Ruckdeschel used the opportunity to contact Bormann and accuse Wächtler of desertion. On orders from « Führer » Headquarters, Ruckdeschel appeared at the hotel with 35 SS troops and summarily executed Wächtler, on 19 April.

Fritz Wächtler (geboren 7. Januar 1891 in Triebes ; gestorben 19. April 1945 in Waldmünchen) war ein deutscher Politiker (NSDAP), NSDAP-Gauleiter der Bayerischen Ostmark und SS-Obergruppenführer (1944).

Wächtler, Sohn eines Uhrmachers, wurde zwischen 1905 und 1911 auf dem Weimarer Lehrerseminar zum Volksschullehrer ausgebildet. Nach zweijähriger Lehrtätigkeit und dem Wehrdienst als Einjährigfreiwilliger diente er 1914 an der Front des Ersten Weltkrieges und wurde 1915 zum Leutnant befördert. Durch seine Verdienste erhielt er zahlreiche verschiedene Auszeichnungen.

Nach Kriegsende arbeitete Wächtler zunächst erneut als Lehrer in Thüringen, bis er im April 1926 der NSDAP beitrug (Mitglied-Nummer 35.313). In seiner neuen Funktion war Wächtler Gründer und Leiter der ansässigen Ortsgruppe von Triebes und Führer der SA seines Heimatorts. Gleichzeitig wurde er Bezirksleiter der Partei für Weimar-Nord.

1929 wurde Wächtler zum Mitglied des Landtages gewählt und zum Gauorganisationsleiter und stellvertretenden Gauleiter für den Gau Thüringen ernannt. Ab August 1932 fungierte Wächtler als Volksbildungsminister im Kabinett von Fritz Sauckel und später unter Willy Marschler (bis 1945). Von Mai 1933 bis Dezember 1935 hatte er zusätzlich das Amt des Innenministers inne.

Im November 1933 zog er für die NSDAP als Mitglied des Reichstages nach Berlin.

Im November 1934 trat Wächtler in die Schutzstaffel (SS-Nummer 209.058) als SS-Oberführer ein.

Als Nachfolger des am 5. März 1935 verstorbenen, bei einem Flugzeugabsturz in Bayreuth tödlich verletzten Gauleiters Hans Schemm wurde Wächtler am 5. Dezember 1935 zum Gauleiter der Bayerischen Ostmark ernannt. Gleichzeitig wurde er zum Leiter des « NSDAP-Hauptamtes für Erziehung » und ferner zum kommissarischen Leiter des « NS-Lehrerbundes » ernannt. Ab Januar 1936 agierte er auch als « Sachbearbeiter für Volksschulfragen » im Stab von Rudolf Heß.

Ende Januar 1936 wurde Wächtler zum SS-Brigadeführer und im April 1937 zum SS-Gruppenführer befördert. Er erhielt den Titel eines preußischen Staatsrates. Bis 1938 war er zugleich kommissarischer Oberbürgermeister der Stadt Bayreuth.

Als Alkoholiker neigte Wächtler zu unbeherrschten Ausbrüchen und Bloßstellungen auch gegenüber Untergebenen. Winifred Wagner beklagte sich mehrfach bei Hitler über Wächtler. Wohl auch darum wurde er auch von Hitler wenig geschätzt, blieb jedoch bis 1945 unangetastet. Es wird vermutet, daß Hitler in den letzten Kriegsjahren keine Unruhe wollte.

Am 16. November 1942 erhielt Wächtler das Amt des Reichsverteidigungskommissars in seinem Gau und erhielt im August 1944 den Rang « SS-Obergruppenführer ». Nach dem Vorstoß amerikanischer Truppen auf die Gauhauptstadt Bayreuth wurde Wächtler wegen vorzeitigen Verlassens seiner Befehlsstelle in Bayreuth von einem SS-Kommando in der Gauleitungs-Ausweichstelle bei Waldmünchen erschossen. Angeblich erfolgte die Exekution auf persönlichen Befehl Adolf Hitlers, vermutlich jedoch ging dem Befehl eine Intrige seines Stellvertreters Ludwig Ruckdeschel mit Martin Bormann voraus.

Ruckdeschel, ein fanatischer Nationalsozialist, galt als langjähriger Rivale Fritz Wächtlers. Im April 1945 bezichtigte er ihn der Fahnenflucht und denunzierte ihn offensichtlich beim Führerhauptquartier. Am Morgen des 19. April (1945) fuhren Ruckdeschel und eine Abteilung von 35 SS-Männern vor Wächtlers Hotel, dem Grenzhotel in Herzogau, vor. Wächtler wurde abgeführt, an den nächsten Baum gestellt und erschossen. Ruckdeschel wurde sein Nachfolger und gab bekannt, Wächtler sei aus der NSDAP ausgestoßen und wegen Feigheit im Angesicht des Feindes hingerichtet worden. « Jedem Schuft und Verräter, der sich ebenso verhält, droht das gleiche Schicksal. » 1948 wurde er zu acht Jahren Haft verurteilt, allerdings nicht wegen der Erschießung Wächtlers, sondern unter anderem der Ermordung von Domprediger Johann Maier, der sich an einer Kundgebung zur kampfflosen Übergabe der Stadt Regensburg beteiligt hatte.

Ludwig Ruckdeschel

Ludwig Ruckdeschel est né le 15 mars 1907 à Bayreuth et est mort le 8 novembre 1968 à Wolfsbourg. Il fut le dernier « Gauleiter » en poste à Bayreuth, du 19 avril 1945 à l'occupation totale de son « Gau » par les armées alliées dans les jours qui ont suivi.

Ayant appartenu à divers groupes « Völkisch » , il adhère à la SA en 1923, puis au NSDAP en 1925. Il connaît une ascension régulière au sein du NSDAP, qui lui permet d'accéder au poste de « Kreisleiter » de Bayreuth.

En 1934, il adhère à la SS. En tant que « Brigadeführer » , il est affecté en novembre 1944 au sein de la division « SS Hitlerjugend » .

Nazi fanatique, il dénonce son supérieur le « Gauleiter » Fritz Wächtler, informant Adolf Hitler de la retraite de ce dernier devant l'avancée des troupes américaines en avril 1945. Aussitôt nommé à la place de Wächtler, il reçoit l'ordre de l'exécuter. Nommé « Gauleiter » , il applique avec sévérité les directives émanant de Martin Bormann dans les derniers mois du conflit.

Jugé en 1948 par un tribunal, condamné à 8 années de prison, il est libéré en 1953 et a travaillé ensuite à l'usine Volkswagen de Wolfsbourg.

Ludwig Ruckdeschel was born on 15 March 1907 in Bayreuth, than part of the Kingdom of Bavaria within the German Empire ; and died on 8 November 1986 in Wolfsburg. After finishing his education he became a Merchant.

Ruckdeschel was the Nazi « Gauleiter » of Bayreuth during final month of the « Gau's » existence before the collapse of Nazi Germany, in 1945. Before this, from 1933 to 1941, he served as the deputy of « Gauleiter » Fritz Wächtler, whom he had executed on orders by Martin Bormann. From 1933 to 1945, he was also a member of the German Parliament, the « Reichstag » .

During the Second World War, Ruckdeschel served in the « Waffen-SS » , rising to the rank of a « Sturmbannführer » , a rank equivalent to a major. After the War, he was arrested in 1947 and eventually sentenced to 13 years in prison but released in 1952.

Ruckdeschel joined a nationalist youth organization in 1921, and the SA in 1923. He was a founding member of the local branch of the Nazi Party in Bayreuth, in early 1925, and became closely associated with « Gauleiter » Hans Schemm. From 1928 onward, he became a permanent employee of the « Gau » administration of the Nazi Party. In this role, he was responsible for the publication of Right-wing books and newspapers.

With the Nazis rise to power in 1933, he became deputy « Gauleiter » of the « Gau Bayerische Ostmark » which was renamed « Gau Bayreuth » in June 1942. He also became a member of the « Reichstag » in November 1933, and held this office until 1945.

In September 1934, Ruckdeschel moved from the SA to the SS, joining as a « Sturmhauptführer » but receiving frequent promotions after this. With the death of Schemm, in 1935, Ruckdeschel temporarily acted as « Gauleiter » for 9 month until Fritz Wächtler was appointed to the position in December 1935.

Ruckdeschel was called-up for service in the « SS Division Totenkopf » , in April 1940. He was drafted into the « Wehrmacht » in July 1941, serving in a propaganda unit, but released again in October. From December 1941 onward, he served in a War correspondent role in the « Waffen-SS » . He was transferred to the « SS Division Leibstandarte Adolf Hitler » in May 1942, and became a company commander in the « SS Division Hitlerjugend » in May 1943. He was promoted to « Hauptsturmführer » on 21 June 1944 and, severely wounded 6 days later, losing his right arm. After recovery from his injuries, Ruckdeschel spend time in a SS training unit before serving as an inspector of the « Volkssturm » , from January 1945 onward.

Ruckdeschel, according to the historian Ian Kershaw a fanatical Nazi, commanded the execution of « Gauleiter » Wächtler, on 19 April 1945, on orders from Martin Bormann, after Ruckdeschel had denounced his long-term rival as a coward and deserter. He, then, served as the « Gauleiter » of Bayreuth in the final weeks of the War.

In post-War Germany, Ruckdeschel was arrested in 1947 and sentenced to 8 years in jail, the following year, for attempted manslaughter and negligence for the execution of 2 citizens of Regensburg, one of them the preacher Johann Maier, who had advocated the peaceful surrender of the city. The sentence was expanded to 13 years in 1949. Released in 1952, he worked for Volkswagen until 1968.

Ludwig Ruckdeschel (geboren 15. März 1907 in Bayreuth ; gestorben 8. November 1968 in Wolfsburg) war ein deutscher Politiker (NSDAP) und SS-Brigadeführer.

Ruckdeschel besuchte von 1913 bis 1921 die Volksschule in seiner Heimatstadt. Danach absolvierte er eine kaufmännische Lehre und besuchte währenddessen die Handelsschule. Von 1924 bis 1928 verdiente er seinen Lebensunterhalt als kaufmännischer Angestellter und Geschäftsführer.

Nachdem er bereits von 1921 bis 1922 in der völkischen Jugendbewegung aktiv gewesen war, gehörte er seit 1923 der Sturmabteilung (SA) , der Kampfformation der Nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Arbeiterpartei (NSDAP) an. Während des Parteiverbotes war er im Völkischen Bund Bayreuth aktiv und war ab 1925 Führer im örtlichen Frontbann. Ab 1924 war er Vertrauter von Hans Schemm. Nach der Neugründung der NSDAP im Frühjahr 1925 trat Ruckdeschel nicht nur erneut in die SA, sondern auch in die Partei selbst ein (Mitgliedsnummer 29.308) .

Von Januar 1926 bis zum September 1928 amtierte Ruckdeschel als Geschäftsführer der Ortsgruppe und Bezirksleitung in Bayreuth der NSDAP. Im Oktober 1928 wurde Ruckdeschel Gaugeschäftsführer und Gaupropagandaleiter des Gaus Oberfranken. Unmittelbar nach der nationalsozialistischen « Machtergreifung » im Frühjahr 1933 wurde Ruckdeschel am 1. Februar 1933 zum Gaugeschäftsführer und Stellvertreter des Gauleiters im Gau Bayerische Ostmark (Oberfranken-Oberpfalz-Niederbayern) berufen. Im November 1933 wurde er Mitglied des Reichstages, dem er bis 1945 angehörte.

In seiner Heimatstadt begründete er 1930 die Deutsche Buchhandlung und war ab Anfang Januar 1931 Herausgeber der Wochenzeitung Kampf (für deutsche Freiheit und Kultur) , die ab Anfang Mai 1933 als Braune Sonntagszeitung firmierte.

Ruckdeschel war Gesellschafter und anfangs Geschäftsführer der 1934 gegründeten Ostmark-Selbsthilfe GmbH und deren 1935 gegründeten Tochtergesellschaft Allgemeine Förderungsgesellschaft GmbH. Die Unternehmen des Gaus Bayerische Ostmark, deren Vermögen größtenteils aus geraubtem Vermögen der Sozialdemokratie bestand, waren im nationalsozialistischen Sinn gemeinnützig. Die Ostmark-Selbsthilfe errichtete unter anderem die Gartenstadt in Bayreuth.

Vom 19. April 1945 bis zur deutschen Kapitulation amtierte Ruckdeschel als Nachfolger von Fritz Wächtler als letzter Gauleiter des Gaus Bayreuth. In dieser Funktion forderte er in einer Rundfunkansprache vom 22. April angesichts des unaufhaltsamen Vormarsches der amerikanischen Truppen die Verteidigung der Stadt Regensburg bis zum letzten Stein. Kurze Zeit später floh er ; die Stadt blieb dank einer kampflosen Übergabe am 27. April weitgehend unzerstört.

Ruckdeschel trat am 20. Oktober 1934 der SS bei und erhielt die Mitgliedsnummer 234.190 zugewiesen, wo er am 9. November 1941 bis zum SS-Brigadeführer der Allgemeinen SS aufstieg. Während des Zweiten Weltkrieges wurde er Anfang April 1940 zur SS-Totenkopf-Division eingezogen, wo er einer Kriegsberichter-Abteilung zugeteilt war. Im Mai 1942 wurde er zur Panzer-Abteilung der Leibstandarte-SS Adolf Hitler versetzt. Anfang Mai 1943 wurde er zum Führer der 6. Kompanie/SS-Panzer Regiment 12 in der 12. SS-Panzer-Division « Hitlerjugend » ernannt. Im Juni 1944 verlor er durch Kriegsverletzungen seinen rechten Arm. Ende September 1944 wurde er nach einem Lazarettaufenthalt zum SS-Panzer-Ausbildungs- und Ersatz-Regiment versetzt und Ende Januar 1945 zum SS-Sturmbannführer der Rang der Waffen-SS befördert, dem höchsten Rang den er in dieser Organisation erreichte.

Vom Januar bis zum 16. April 1945 wurde er als Inspekteur des Volkssturms im Stab des Oberbefehlshabers West eingesetzt.

Ruckdeschel kann nach Auswertung einer Untersuchung des renommierten Historikers Ian Kershaw ohne weiteres als fanatischer Nationalsozialist bezeichnet werden. Er galt als langjähriger Rivale des Gauleiters der Bayerischen Ostmark Fritz Wächtler und bezichtigte ihn der Fahnenflucht. Ruckdeschel denunzierte ihn offensichtlich beim Führerhauptquartier.

« Früh am Morgen des 19. April (1945) fuhren Ruckdeschel und eine Abteilung von 35 SS-Männern vor Wächtlers Hotel vor Wächtler wurde abgeführt, an den nächsten Baum gestellt und schließlich von einem Erschießungskommando hingerichtet. Ruckdeschel gab bekannt, Wächtler sei aus der NSDAP ausgestoßen und wegen Feigheit im Angesicht des Feindes hingerichtet worden. »

Kershaw gibt eine Aussage Ruckdeschels wieder :

« Jedem Schuft und Verräter, der sich ebenso verhalte, drohe das gleiche Schicksal. »

Im August 1947 in Untersuchungshaft genommen wurde Ruckdeschel am 2. November 1948 vom Oberlandesgericht Nürnberg zu acht Jahren Haft verurteilt. Gegenstand des Verfahrens war die Hinrichtung zweier Regensburger Bürger, darunter der Domprediger Johann Maier, nach einem Standgerichtsverfahren am 23. April 1945. Die Hingerichteten hatten sich an einer Kundgebung zur kampfblosen Übergabe der Stadt beteiligt. Nach der vorzeitigen Haftentlassung 1952 fand Ruckdeschel eine Beschäftigung als Gästeführer für prominente Gäste bei Volkswagen in Wolfsburg.

Bayreuth sous le 3e « Reich »

Pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, le Festival est mis à la disposition du Parti Nazi et les représentations réservées à partir de 1940 à des soldats blessés au front, « invités du Führer ». « Les Maîtres-chanteurs », facilement détournable dans le sens d'une propagande ultra-nationaliste, est la seule œuvre à l'affiche en 1943 et 1944.

En 1945, il est hautement incertain que le Festival de Bayreuth puisse jamais rouvrir. La participation du Festival à la politique culturelle du National-Socialisme, l'intimité de la famille Wagner avec Hitler, l'utilisation de Wagner par la propagande du régime, les difficultés de l'Allemagne d'après-guerre et notamment la destruction des 2 tiers de la ville de Bayreuth, concourent à l'associer avec le Nazisme sur le rejet duquel se construit la jeune République fédérale. Pendant plusieurs années, le Palais des Festivals est utilisé comme Théâtre par l'armée américaine. Un tribunal condamne Winnifred Wagner pour son soutien aux Nazis, et lui interdit de diriger le Festival, dont elle transfère la direction à ses 2 fils Wieland et Wolfgang.

Afin de rompre avec ce passé encombrant, Wieland, secondé par Wolfgang, décide de donner au Festival de Bayreuth une orientation esthétique radicalement nouvelle, connue sous le nom de « nouveau Bayreuth ». Le 29 juillet 1951, le 1er Festival d'après-guerre est inauguré par une 9e Symphonie de Beethoven dirigée par Wilhelm Fürtwängler, dont l'enregistrement par Walter Legge, publié en 1954 par His Master's Voice, est considéré depuis par toute la critique musicale, d'André Tubeuf à John Ardoin, comme un sommet du genre. Mais si « les Maîtres-chanteurs » de Rudolf Hartmann sont montés dans la veine traditionnelle, « Parsifal » et « l'Anneau du Nibelung » constituent un choc pour les habitués. Les décors naturalistes et réalistes font place à un espace scénique minimaliste et elliptique qui permet de viser le sens profond de l'œuvre dégagée de tout contexte ou de toute récupération politique. Jusqu'à sa mort en 1966, Wieland soumet à ce traitement tous les Opéras de son grand-père, remettant ses productions sur le métier face aux critiques qui l'accusent de sacrifier la tradition.

Wolfgang Wagner signe également quelques mises-en-scène, mais la critique leur reproche leur manque d'inspiration et leur faiblesse par rapport à celles de Wieland. Il se concentre donc sur le travail administratif.

On January 13, 1933, the newly-elected National-Socialist Party celebrated the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death by staging a grandiose memorial ceremony in Leipzig, the composer's birthplace. Adolf Hitler invited Siegfried Wagner's widow, the English-born Winifred, and her son Wieland to be guests of honour at this event. This tribute by the Nazis was the beginning of a deep friendship between the « Führer » and the Wagner family, forging a link between the new Germany and the country's revered composer. Within weeks of becoming Chancellor of Germany, Hitler had appropriated Wagner and made him the « Reich » 's great beacon. Each summer, from 1933 to 1939, Hitler attended the Bayreuth Festival, and he made the Wagner Estate, Wahnfried, his 2nd home. Because she had been one of his earliest supporters, Hitler had great affection for Winifred. Hitler repaid the Wagner family gratitude by pledging his undying friendship and his deepest devotion to Richard Wagner and Bayreuth. With the assistance of Doctor Josef Goebbels, Hitler's untiring propaganda minister, Richard Wagner became the legendary and ideological voice of the new Party, and the musical standard by which all Classical composers would, from now on, be judged. This is how Richard Wagner and Bayreuth fell under the weight of the swastika during the years before the beginning of World War II.

« At the age of 12, I saw the 1st Opera of my life, " Lohengrin ". In one instant, I was addicted. My youthful enthusiasm for the Bayreuth Master knew no bounds. »

(Adolf Hitler. « Mein Kampf » , Volume I.)

Around the time that the Nazis came to power, the Bayreuth holy of holies still existed : the original Paul von Joukowsky sets used at the premiere of « Parsifal » . They were still in use at the « Festspielhaus » even though they were falling apart and were dangerous to the singers. Realistically, the time had come to replace the production, and the logical person to design the sets would be Emil Preetorius. A petition began circulating against this decision. After all, this was the scenery « on which the eyes of the Master had reposed » , and the conservative faction at Bayreuth believed that the scenery needed to be kept and revered like a holy icon. Over a 1,000 signatures were collected, including those of conductor Arturo Toscanini and composer Richard Strauß. Winifred Wagner sent the petition to Hitler along with a pamphlet accusing Preetorius of being « un-German » and « under Jewish influence » . Hitler, on the other hand, favored a new Bayreuth production of « Parsifal » , and selected Alfred Roller to design it. The « Führer » was a great admirer of Roller's work in Vienna, and the 2 had met when Hitler was an aspiring artist.

At the start of World War II, the Nazis prohibited all performances of « Parsifal » throughout Germany. Bayreuth also had to comply with this order that had originated from the Ministry of Propaganda. Following the controversy over replacing the original sets, and the disappointment over the 1937 production, the ban on « Parsifal » proved puzzling. At 1st, this decision was hard to fathom, and no official reason was given for banishing the work from Germany's stages. Before the War, « Parsifal » , like no other of Richard Wagner's work, had fueled Hitler's imagination, and had provided the Nazis with the kind of mythic Germanic Christian ideological background that was easy for the people to understand. However, as the dead and wounded were being shipped back from the front, presenting an Opera where one of the main characters lay suffering from a mortal wound was obviously not very good public relation for the War cause.

Wagner authority Robert R. Gibson has offered further possible reasons why the Nazis banned « Parsifal » . He argues that the Opera's main character learns pacifism throughout his long journeys and, ultimately, becomes a compassionate human being. These traits were considered feminine attributes, and not worthy of the idealized Nazi conception of the Aryan male. The author also mentions that the ban occurred at the time when the Nazis were trying to suppress homosexuality. Propaganda Minister Josef Gœbbels denounced priestly and monastic celibate life in a speech, in 1937. « Parsifal » , with its representation of a community of quasi-religious brothers who embrace (the SS were forbidden to touch one another) must have been anathema to the 3rd « Reich » .

Following all the controversy. Alfred Roller's production premiered in 1934, and it was a disappointment. There was really very little that the great designer did that was different from the sacrosanct sets that so many did not want to replace. The temple cupola in the 2nd scene of Act I disappeared, and this made many conservatives very disappointed. Winifred, once again, appealed to Hitler that there should be yet another new production of « Parsifal » to replace this fiasco. Hitler agreed and suggested that Wieland Wagner design the new sets. Hitler had always revered Siegfried's son because he was a direct descendant of the Master. Once the War began, Hitler gave orders that Wieland should be permanently exempt from military service. Wieland's 1937 « Parsifal » was such an old fashioned approach to the Opera that it was deemed even less successful than the Roller production. It would not be until 1951 and the re-opening of the Bayreuth Festival that Wieland would achieve artistic success with this work.

L'antisémitisme de Wagner : Prélude au 3rd « Reich »

In his widely-purchased but seldom read tome « Mein Kampf » , Adolf Hitler paid tribute to those individuals in German history who had achieved what he considered to be the pinnacle of success. Though misunderstood during their lifetimes, these great German « warriors » nevertheless persevered in carrying « the fight for their ideas and ideals to their end » . This short list includes but 3 names : Frederick the Great, Martin Luther, and Richard Wagner. Hitler apparently believed that his name would be added to this list, at some future time. The inclusion of Richard Wagner, in such select company, merits examination. What did Hitler see as Wagner's great accomplishment that elevated him above the likes of Bismarck or Beethoven ?

Undoubtedly, Richard Wagner's numerous music-dramas had significant impact on Germany and on Hitler. In 1890, an astounding 900 performances of Wagner's Operas were staged in 67 German cities and towns. The Wagner Society, founded 7 years previously on the composer's death, had grown to 300 chapters with a membership of 8,000. The Society existed not merely to propagate the music but Wagner's ideology as well. The voluminous essays penned by Wagner over a span of nearly 50 years exerted considerable influence. Although Hitler has never been described as a scholar or even a great reader, evidence exists that he did delve deeply into racist compositions. Between 1919 and 1921, Hitler borrowed numerous works from the « Nationalsozialistisches Institut », a Party lending library near Munich. Among the titles were the prose works of Wagner and his son-in-law, Houston Stewart Chamberlain.

Chamberlain, an expatriate Englishman, quickly became enamored with Wagner, his music, and his ideology. As a member of Wagner's inner circle and his son-in-law, Chamberlain assumed a leading role in propagating the « Völkish » and racial philosophy of the Meister. More than any other person, « it was Chamberlain who constructed an ideological bridge between Wagnerism and the broader tradition of nationalist and racist thought ». Indeed, Hitler acknowledged his agreement with Chamberlain's views. After meeting Hitler, in September 1923, Chamberlain publicly declared his support for the « Führer » .

Having seen the influence of Wagner's ideology, it is appropriate to examine the sources of his ideas which later developed into a philosophy of regenerative anti-Semitism. Central to Wagner's thinking is the concept of « Volk », the abstract, truly human, essential Germanic spirit. According to Wagner :

« The “ Volk ” has always been the essence of all the individuals who constituted a commonality. In the beginning, it was the family and the races ; then, the races united through linguistic equality as a nation. »

« Volk » were further defined by their physiological differences from others, and they shared a commonality of language and purpose. The Jews thus stood apart from the « Volk », purportedly in their physiology and mother tongue (although German Jews studiously avoided Yiddish for this very reason) . The primary cultural metaphor for Jew as Other was the construct of the Wandering Jew, deeply rooted in European history.

Friedrich Goethe inspired the various interpretations in German ideology of the Wandering Jew (Ahasverus) , a manifestation of the Jewish race as a parasitic, ghost race that had outlived its usefulness and could neither die nor be assimilated into the youthful German nation. In his 1838 Plan of a New Ahasverus, Karl Gutzkow (a leader of the Young Germany movement which superseded the Burschenschaften as the main fomenter of revolution in the 1830's) used the character of Ahasverus to illustrate the problem facing Jewish redemption : the Wandering Jew was « nothing but a ghost, a wandering fossilized mummy of a people that had rejected the fruitful dynamic of history, shunning admixture and assimilation with the other peoples of Europe, refusing to abandon their isolated exclusivity ». Gutzkow transformed the sin of despising Christ into a state of lovelessness and egoism that must be transformed by love and « the emancipation of the flesh » .

Ludwig Börne, whose ideas influenced the Young Germany revolutionary outlook, described the Wandering Jew as a « manifestation of the money demon, this raised fury of greed, this beautiful devil of gold ». In the 1830's, Börne identified the bourgeois capitalist money society with Judaism. In the late- 1840's, Wagner identified Börne with the

Wagner's mythological interpretation of the Wandering Jew saw many transformations, developing as the « perfect plastic expression of both his racist and his revolutionary sensibilities ». Characters, such as the Flying Dutchman (his " Ahasverus of the Ocean ") , were able to achieve redemption because they were not Jewish. This stressed the incapacity of the Jewish Ahasverus to be redeemed. Wagner's hero wanderers learn compassion through suffering, earning their redemption. From « Judaism in Music » (1850) , arguably the seminal text of Wagner's anti-Semitism, Wagner defined the only redemption for the Jews was « the redemption of Ahasverus ; Destruction ! » .

Between 1834-1840, Richard Wagner found an affinity for revolutionary ideals through Heinrich Laube who (along with Karl Gutzkow) was leader of Young Germany. Laube, in « Young Europe » , had given birth to the notion of the revolutionary organization. Wagner shared Laube's vision of a new, free Germany, engineered by new art and literature. They believed that bourgeois restrictions, such as marriage, were the « destroyer of all vital feelings » , and that the artist must disdain these restrictions and transcend them in his life. In his early works, notably his 1st successful opera, Rienzi, love was the agent of personal emancipation. Rienzi also featured ideas that would come to fruition in the 3rd « Reich » : mass political movements, extensive use of propaganda, and the Führer principle. For these reasons, Rienzi has been labelled a fascist Opera. Hitler cited a performance of Rienzi as the source of his calling to redeemer of the German people. It was played at his rallies. The autographed score was one of his prize possessions.

In the 1870's - 1880's, Wagner's revolutionary anti-Semitism was influenced by 2 contemporary lines of thought. Darwinism brought an optimistic biological insight into his philosophy ; as with animals, humans' sexual matings brought about improvements in German society that would allow the development of the redeemer. Joseph Arthur Gobineau, in « Essay on the Inequality of Human Races » , introduced Wagner to the degenerative tendencies produced by interracial marriage. His work emphasized the inferiority of the black and yellow races with whom the Germans had little experience and thus substituted the Jews. Wagner, however, enthusiastically adopted the term « Aryan » from Gobineau's work.

Wagner's extreme anti-Semitism has often been ascribed to the belief, widespread during his lifetime, that he was not a pure Aryan. Many, including Richard Eichenauer, 3rd « Reich » music historian, believed that Wagner's real father was the actor Ludwig Geyer who was suspected of being of Jewish descent. Such speculation is historically moot, yet may indeed have troubled Wagner. Similar speculations concerning Hitler are equally fruitless but, nevertheless, have received extensive coverage (e.g. Ralph Waite, « The Psychopathic God ») .

Many of Wagner's defenders in the post- World War II era have pointed to a contradiction between theory and practice. While his written anti-Semitism is undeniable, Wagner associated with many Jews in the course of his work. Among them, were many Jewish musicians, the conductor Hermann Levi, singers Heinrich Porges and Lilli Lehman, and the impresario Angelo Neumann. Neumann was responsible for securing the 1st performance of the Ring cycle outside Bayreuth. One Jew, the pianist Josef Rubinstein, was a member of Wagner's inner circle living at Wahnfried. Wagner's defenders conclude that, while he held racist beliefs, in his personal relations he could rise above his racism. Others conclude that his anti-Semitism was more than « an excusable aberration of genius » , and that Wagner had no moral scruples about using an individual to further his own ends. Berthold Auerbach, who was attacked publicly by Wagner, came to recognize that his former friend was a spiritual source of the new anti-Semitism in 1880's Germany after receiving much professional support from Jews such as himself, Neumann, Karl Tausig, and Bayreuth patron Alfred Pringsheim.

As John Stuart Mill said : « Of all vulgar modes of escaping from the consideration of the effect of social and moral influences on the human mind, the most vulgar is that of attributing the diversities of conduct and character to inherent natural differences. » . In his brilliantly written essay, « Race : Fact or Fiction ? » , the eminent philosopher and historian Jacques Barzun examines the entire concept of race. Assuming that one were to explain the concept of race to an alien, he demolishes all the typical racist responses. In particular, he satirically destroys the « infallible oracle » of racial distinction espoused so fervently from Wagner's era to the Nazi era : Blood. Modern medicine disavows blood as an indication of race ; but racists use the term metaphorically rather than literally. Another popular conception of race, common descent or lineage, leads to the inevitable conclusion in the Judeo-Christian West that there is but one race, and it is human.

Why Jews Stood-Up for Richard Wagner

Anti-Semitic Composer Inspired Both Hitler and Herzl

« Austria or Bust » : The exhibit shows how Jewish Wagnerism existed in Vienna until the 3rd « Reich » .

In Israel, musicians uphold a boycott on performances of Richard Wagner's music despite some recent attempts to break it. While it is well-known that there are many Jewish Wagnerians (including 2 of today's leading Wagner interpreters, James Levine and Daniel Barenboim) , one might not be aware of just how far back the Jewish fascination with Wagner's music and, at times, even his ideology, goes. The role played by Jews in the establishment and furthering of the Wagner cult, in late- 19th and early 20th Century, Vienna is the topic of a « Euphoria and Unease : Jewish Vienna and Richard Wagner » at the Vienna Jewish Museum.

As curated by Andrea Winklbler, the exhibit deals with many of Wagner's well-known Jewish enthusiasts, including Gustav Mahler and Theodor Herzl (both avid Wagnerians) as well as figures less remembered today, like Victor Adler, founder of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party. While Wagner was being harnessed by Right-wing ideologues, Adler read socialist messages into Wagner's Operas, in which he found an outpouring of sympathy for the proletariat.

As one of the most musically important German-speaking cities in Europe, Vienna quickly became one of the foremost centers of Wagner adulation. The Wagner Societies that sprung-up in the city, as early as 1871 (in other words, during the composer's own lifetime) , had numerous Jewish members and patrons.

Figures like composer Karl Goldmark, poet Siegfried Lipiner, and industrialist Friedrich Eckstein would meet at a vegetarian restaurant (in deference to the composer's dietary preferences) to discuss the « Master » . Eckstein even made a pilgrimage « on foot » to Bayreuth for the 1882 premiere of « Parsifal » , Wagner's final and arguably most ideologically suspect Opera.

« I wanted people to discover how many Jewish Wagnerians there were in Vienna and the types of contradictions this entailed for being a Jewish Wagnerian. Everyone was aware (even back then) of the fact that Wagner was a nasty anti-Semite. And, despite this, I find it astounding when you look at so many composers and artists who built their own work on his foundation. » , Winkelbauer said.

Mahler's appointment as director of the Vienna Court Opera, in 1897, ushered in a new age of Wagner productions. For the 1st time, Wagner's Operas were performed there, uncut. He also brought the Secessionist artist Alfred Roller on-board to furnish startlingly modern designs.

The museum displays the composer-conductor's heavily marked full-score of « Tristan und Isolde » , one of the most impressive objects on display. (In a particularly satisfying irony, Adolf Hitler, an avid Wagnerian who credited the city with making him a confirmed anti-Semite, saw his 1st « Tristan » , in the legendary Roller production, conducted by Mahler.)

Herzl had his eureka moment during a performance of « Tannhäuser » and dashed home afterwards to start writing « Der Judenstaat » . What exactly the link was in Herzl's excitable mind between the medieval minnesinger and the necessity of a Jewish home in Palestine is anyone's guess. For whatever reason, the portrait of a closed community of artist-statesmen in this early, less nationalistic Wagner Opera, fired Herzl's vision.

A more disturbing case was the self-loathing Otto Weininger, whose twisted gender theories as outlined in the tome « Sex and Character » were fashionable throughout « fin de siècle » Europe. Arguing that the Jews were inherently weak and effeminate people, he famously wrote :

« The most manly Jew is more feminine than the least manly Aryan. »

Himself Jewish, he committed suicide in 1903, an act that seems, at least in part, to have been inspired by seeing « Parsifal » at Bayreuth.

By placing Herzl and Weininger side-by-side, the exhibit argues that very different Jews in Vienna drew from Wagner's « Operas, writing and status as a political artist, both inspiration and justification for their actions » , to quote from an exhibition sign.

Wisely, the exhibit does not attempt to divine the origins of Wagner's vociferous anti-Semitism. That said, the composers Giacomo Meyerbeer and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy do get a well-merited mention as the 2 main targets of Wagner's racist tract, « Judaism in Music » . There is also information about the innovations in synagogue music instigated by cantors Salomon Sulzer, in Vienna, and Louis Lewandowski, in Berlin, well-known figures who Wagner would have had in mind when writing the essay. Additionally, ample space is given to 2 Viennese journalists who inspired Wagner's ire. The 1st, and better-known of these is the music-critic, Eduard Hanslick, who objected to Wagner's «

Gesamtkunstwerk » aspiration, which he considered fundamentally opposed to music's pure form. Wagner returned the favor by using the Jewish critic as his model for the buffoonish character of Sixtus Beckmesser in « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , his only comedy. The 2nd was Daniel Spitzer, a satirist and feature writer who humiliated the composer by publishing letters to his seamstress that contained absurdly precise instructions about luxurious fabrics, colors and textures. The letters were so popular that Spitzer continued running them even after Wagner was forced to flee Vienna (incidentally, disguised as a woman) because of his mounting debts.

The exhibit shows how Jewish Wagnerism existed in Vienna up until the 3rd « Reich » . We learn about many of the Jewish singers and conductors active in the 1920's and 1930's. The best-known of these are Bruno Walter and bass-baritone Friedrich Schorr, the Wotan of choice at Bayreuth, between 1925 and 1931. Also featured are Wagner enthusiasts like the theatre director Emil Geyer (who was shot, in 1942, at Mauthausen) , modern architect Josef Frank and the musicologist Guido Adler. Stella Junker-Weissenberg's flapper-era sketches for Wagner costumes are the most fascinating artifacts of this era. And there is a telling postcard by avant-garde photographer Dora Horovitz, writing to Vienna, in 1940, to lament how she misses Bayreuth from her exile in San Jose.

In the final section of the exhibit, video monitors play excerpts from Opera productions, movies and TV shows, and documentaries, including Stephen Fry's « Wagner and Me » and Hilan Warshaw's recent « Wagner's Jews » . Adorning the walls are well-chosen quotes from various figures weighing in on the debate. Alongside the famous Woody Allen quip, « I can't listen to that much Wagner. I start getting the urge to conquer Poland » , there is a serious reflection by Max Brod, who refused to read Wagner's racist tracts so as not to « tarnish my pure impression of an exemplary artistic revelation » .

Ultimately, the exhibitionj « Euphoria and Unease » establishes that the discussion of how to deal with Wagner's anti-Semitism (and its consequences) is, by no means, over. Alongside recent critical scholarship and unorthodox methods of staging Wagner's Operas, « Euphoria and Unease » furthers this iconoclastic approach to Wagner, by examining those Jews who put their belief in a great artist and sworn enemy, and by revealing the contractions and, at times, self-denial that this entailed. There is as little to be gained by turning Wagner into a bogeyman as by holding him up as the « be all and end all » of high-culture :

« We didn't want to make a tribute to Wagner. If the exhibit is, at all, a tribute then it's a tribute to all those who used Wagner to help create their own culture. » , said Winklbauer.

Richard Wagner et la politique

L'œuvre et le rayonnement de Richard Wagner ont toujours eu une dimension politique. Lorsque éclate la Première Guerre mondiale, le Festival de Bayreuth est suspendu, et les décors de « Parsifal » sont « gelés végétant comme des fantômes pendant 10 ans sur la scène désertée.

Le « Cercle de Bayreuth » et l'atmosphère politique en Allemagne sont représentatifs du destin de Wagner sous la République de Weimar. Bien qu'il eût existé des tentatives de mises-en-scène modernes et révolutionnaires (« le Vaisseau fantôme » de Jürgen Fehling et Otto Klemperer au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin, en 1929), Wagner et Bayreuth devinrent, après la ré-ouverture du Festival, en 1924, le ramassis de la réaction Impériale, puis nationale-socialiste. L'essayiste libéral Bernhard Diebold publia, en 1928, un texte qui fut un véritable appel dans le désert : rapportant sa visite à Bayreuth, il put observer que « les hommes de droite » avaient enrôlé le révolutionnaire de 1848 et réussi à « jeter Wagner avec l'eau du bain de Chamberlain ». Diebold se demande où sont passés « les esprits Libéraux pour l'œuvre d'art Libérale », et souligne ce faisant l'échec, lourd de conséquences, de la gauche à revendiquer pour elle-même le Wagner révolutionnaire, laissant au lieu de cela, sans résistance, le champ entièrement libre à la droite nationale.

Il n'y avait plus qu'un pas à franchir, vers 1933, et la prise de pouvoir (à Bayreuth aussi) des Nazis. Ironie de l'histoire, c'est seulement avec Adolf Hitler que le Festival de Bayreuth se trouva, pour la Ire fois, placé sous la protection directe et financière de l'État. Cette protection et, en outre, les liens personnels du « Führer » avec la famille Wagner, compromise, sont responsables du grand malentendu qui trace une ligne directe de Wagner à Hitler, causant à l'image du compositeur des dommages qui n'ont pas été, jusqu'à nos jours, entièrement réparés. Cette fatalité de l'histoire est d'autant plus dramatique qu'entériner aujourd'hui cette continuité fabriquée de toutes pièces revient à reconduire la propagande wagnérienne du Nazisme et, par là, à la renforcer à titre posthume.

L'antisémitisme de Wagner et sa pensée de la régénération étaient aisés à incorporer sélectivement à l'idéologie nazie, mais ce fut au prix du déni ou du détournement radical de son utopisme révolutionnaire et de la parabole que donnait à lire le « Ring », celle d'un monde désagrégé par l'excès de pouvoir. Parmi les dirigeants nazis proches de Hitler, seule une poignée avait quelque affinité avec la musique de Wagner (Josef Goebbels, Albert Speer) ; le reste vécut les pèlerinages obligatoires à Bayreuth (de 1933 à 1940, après quoi Hitler lui-même ne s'est plus rendu) comme une véritable torture. Pendant ce temps (autre ironie de l'histoire), le Festival vivait, sous la direction artistique de Heinz Tietjen, une toute Ire modernisation scénique qui anticipait, sous certains aspects, la révolution esthétique menée par Wieland Wagner, à partir de 1951. Simultanément, Winifred Wagner, directrice du Festival (1930-1944) profitait de sa proximité avec Hitler pour maintenir à Bayreuth la présence de Juifs « indispensables », plus longtemps et en plus grand nombre que dans aucun autre théâtre allemand. Malgré une histoire ambiguë et qui gagne à être nuancée, l'implication personnelle de Hitler dans les affaires de la famille Wagner et son instrumentalisation du compositeur et du Festival ont lourdement hypothéqué l'héritage wagnérien, véritable chape de plomb qui pèse aujourd'hui encore sur lui.

Il paraît évident, avec le recul, que le Festival ait pu rouvrir en 1951, et que, prenant un second envol, l'interprétation des œuvres de Wagner ait atteint, sous Wieland Wagner, dans le Bayreuth des années 1950 et 1960, un niveau légendaire, qui n'avait pas été trouvé jusque-là et ne le sera plus par la suite. En réalité, comme au moment de la renaissance de Bayreuth, en 1924, rien n'allait de soi. Même s'il s'agit d'autres circonstances, l'histoire de Bayreuth aurait pu aussi se terminer en 1914 et serait, aujourd'hui, un objet d'étude spécialisé pour historiens de la musique. Mais ce qui s'est produit à Bayreuth dans les mises-en-scène révolutionnaires de Wieland Wagner, pour rayonner ensuite dans le monde entier, est l'exact reflet de la situation politique de la République fédérale allemande (RFA) à ses débuts : libérer la scène du fatras de décors naturalistes opulents, se concentrer sur le mythe et l'« épurer » du ballast national-socialiste, tout cela correspondait parfaitement à la sobriété du nouveau départ auquel aspirait la jeune République fédérale. À la même époque, une nouvelle phalange d'écrivains de cour bayreuthiens œuvrait, autour d'Ernst Bloch, Theodor Adorno et Hans Mayer, à une nouvelle interprétation de l'univers du compositeur : on revendiquait enfin un « Wagner de gauche » et on remettait en lumière la base révolutionnaire de son art, par quoi le culte wagnérien pouvait légitimement se poursuivre sous d'autres augures.

Bayreuth demeura le sismographe de la situation allemande. Après les révoltes étudiantes de 1968, le « Wagner de gauche » monta aussi sur la scène du « Festspielhaus » (le « Tannhäuser » de Götz Friedrich, en 1972 ; le « Ring » de Patrice Chéreau, en 1976) , tandis que s'ouvrait l'ère politisée du « Regietheater » , d'un « théâtre de metteur-en-scène » qui domine aujourd'hui encore, même s'il est désormais totalement fossilisé. La République démocratique allemande (RDA) , elle aussi, s'est approprié pour son compte, dans les années 1950, un Wagner social et révolutionnaire : la mise-en-scène du « Ring » par Joachim Herz à Leipzig, en 1973-1976, présentait la Ire Tétralogie dans l'esprit politique du XIXe siècle, préfigurant celle de Chéreau. Les ondes de choc de la période nazie ébranlèrent encore par à-coups la réception wagnérienne (comme elles ébranlèrent l'histoire de la RFA) : on pense au scandale que suscita, en 1975, l'entrevue accordée par Winifred Wagner à Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, dans laquelle elle proclama une loyauté indéfectible à Hitler ; ou aux procès intentés par Gottfried Wagner à son père, Wolfgang, très proche de Hitler dans sa jeunesse ; ou enfin au renvoi fébrile et hâtif du chanteur Evgeny Nikitin du Festival de Bayreuth, en 2012, pour avoir arboré d'ans sa jeunesse une croix gammée tatouée sur la poitrine. Malgré tous ces fardeaux hérités du passé, la discussion autour de l'art de Wagner est parvenue aujourd'hui, en Allemagne, à un état d'équilibre apaisé et relationnel, capable de mettre en juste balance ses compromissions funestes avec l'histoire allemande aussi bien que sa dimension progressiste et cosmopolite et, enfin, susceptible de l'estimer à sa juste valeur.

How should we think about Wagner ? Those who are troubled by that question, as I am, presumably think that as an artist he is worth being troubled about : that his works, or some of them, are demanding, inviting, seductive, powerful. Not everyone who cares about music need share that opinion. The relation of Wagner to the history of Western music and to the formation of a taste is not the same as that of, say, Bach or Mozart : he is not in the same way necessary. His works are, indeed, necessary to explaining its more recent history, very obviously so, but they are not in the same way a necessary part of a taste for Western music. Indeed, it is possible for a serious music lover to hate them - but that is not really the main point, since hatred can be a reaction to their power, in particular because of the peculiarities I shall be discussing. So Thomas Mann referred to Nietzsche's « immortal critique of Wagner, which I have always taken to be a panegyric in reverse, another form of eulogy » . (I)

You can have a well-formed, deep relation to Western music while passing Wagner's works by, finding them boring or not to your taste. But it is clear, equally, that a passionate engagement with these works is not a mistake or a misunderstanding. They are amazing, and there is much to engage with. It is no accident not only that Wagner is voluminously discussed but that immense efforts, expenditure, and imagination are still devoted to producing these pieces.

As well as the troubled and the bored and the revealingly hostile, there has notoriously been a further Party, of the utterly devoted and, perhaps, there still is. Being devoted does not necessarily mean being uncritical, but if the members of this Party are critical, it is on the very local basis that the Master did not always live-up to his own standards. This Party has a question to answer. No one can deny that some of Wagner's own attitudes are ethically and politically disturbing, some of them very deeply so. I mean that they are disturbing to us ; and, by that, I mean that they are rightly found disturbing by people who have seen the crimes and catastrophes of the 20th Century. We do certainly have to understand his attitudes in the context of his time, taking into account the options and ideological contrasts that were available then. We need to understand what his attitudes meant. But, equally, we have to take into account what they have come to mean.

When it is said that « we have » to take such things into account, one thing this means is that we have no alternative if we are not to be misunderstood. In Shakespeare's « Much Ado about Nothing » (V.iv.38) , Claudio says :

« I'll hold my mind (i.e. , stick to my intention to marry her) , were she an Ethiopie. »

In the Norton Shakespeare, the editor, Stephen Greenblatt, gives an explanation :

« In other words, black and, therefore, according to the Elizabethan racist stereotype, ugly. » (2)

A review in the London Sunday Times criticized him for this on grounds of excessive political correctness. But as Greenblatt reasonably said, in an interview, would they have actually preferred it if he had said « black and, therefore, ugly » ? In Wagner's case, « we have no alternative » does mean this, but it means something else as well : that we have no alternative to taking into account his attitudes and what they have come to mean if we are to experience and reflect on these works at the depth they demand - more precisely, if we are to understand them at the level needed for them to become a significant part of our experience. (Indeed, so far as staging is concerned, we have to take these things into account if we are to put these works on at all, and this is a point I shall come back to.)

If we try to understand as a genuine historical question what range of opinions and attitudes were available in Wagner's world (« where he was » on various matters) , we find that in some cases, he was already in a pretty bad place. Above all, and most notoriously, there is his anti-Semitism. His articles « Das Judentum in der Musik » , attacking Giacomo Meyerbeer and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and, generally, the artistic impotence of Jews, did not make a big stir when they were 1st published under a pseudonym, in 1850. The document had considerably more effect when he re-issued it under his own name, in 1869, with additions in an even sharper tone and with more directly racist implications (« so far from getting rid of his errors » , Franz Liszt said, « he has made it worse ») . The racist emphasis, influenced by Gobineau, was prominent in other publications of his last years. It has reasonably been claimed that Wagner, by his own writings, contributed to the resurgence of anti-Semitism in Germany, in the 1880's, in particular by helping to make it culturally respectable. (3)

Moreover, it was not only during the Nazi time, through the friendship of Wagner's daughter-in-law, Winifred, with Hitler, that the Bayreuth Festival, which Wagner founded in 1876, became associated with the most repellent ideas. The house Journal, the « Bayreuther Blätter » , was founded in 1878, when Wagner was still alive, by an acolyte, Hans von

Wolzogen, who, as a historian of the Festival has put it, used the Journal as an ideological instrument to propagate a racist, anti-Semitic, chauvinistic, xenophobic and anti-democratic ideology. It would be difficult to find anywhere in the Western world in the late- 19th Century, even in the darkest corner of the French Right, a publication so poisonous, so hate-filled, so spiritually demented. (4)

In some other cases, the attitudes that Wagner held were capable of taking more benign forms, but Wagner's versions were not among them. This seems to be true of the particularly chauvinist form that he gave to the idea that there should be a German art. (5) Thomas Mann considered this in his famous essay (from which I have already quoted) « The Sorrows and Grandeur of Richard Wagner » , which, given as a lecture in 1933, led directly to his exile from Germany, and which is, along with some of Nietzsche's thoughts, still the most helpful reflection that I know on these questions. (6) Mann pointed-out, using a distinction made by a Swedish writer, that Wagner's aspiration was for a German art in the sense of nationale « Kunst » rather than « Volkskunst » - that is to say, the nationalism was a matter of the destiny and political significance of German art, not of its materials.

This, in itself, may seem an entirely intelligible, even innocent or laudable 19th Century ambition. But then, we have to recall that the problem of a distinctively German art, and its relation to a self-conscious artist working in a broader European tradition, had been a preoccupation of German thought since, at least, the late- 18th Century. Above all, it had been a recurrent concern to Goethe, with regard to the German language, its traditions of writing, the public for that writing, the self-conscious cultivation or rejection of differences from the rest of Europe, the relation of German art to various possible political regimes in the German-speaking States, and so on. Indeed, in his writings on these subjects Wagner, unsurprisingly, praises Goethe and Schiller.

Now, the German world in the 1860's was certainly a very different place from what it had been in 1800. Yet, it is still relevant to point-out that, in Goethe's case, the question of how to achieve a distinctively German art was a problem for him, a problem to which he responded in ways that honoured its complexity ; whereas for Wagner, it was, of course, a problem to which, at any given stage of his career, he knew the answer, as against the traitors and enemies who took a different view. This absence of the Goethean spirit, not just in a form anachronistic by the 1860's, but in any form at all, is something I shall come back to when we confront the impression, not lightly to be dismissed, that for all their wonders and power there is an all-consuming assertiveness in Wagner's works which can be disgusting. (7)

I have moved directly from talking about Wagner's personal attitudes, as expressed in his writings, to talking about the character of his work. That is not an oversight ; the problem is that the 2 cannot entirely be separated. It is possible that artists with politically disturbing views could produce works that are not politically disturbing. There are, without doubt, several things wrong with Hans Pfitzner's remarkable Opera « Palestrina » (1st produced in 1917) , such as its heavy-handed attempt to present the Council of Trent in the style of « Die Meistersinger » ; but they do not express what was wrong with Pfitzner himself, whose conservative and nationalist views were congenial enough to the Nazis that (to his great resentment) he was required to undergo denazification after World War II. Wagner's relation to his works was not like this. That is obvious now and has been obvious since they were created, but we shall have to ask what it is about the works that makes this so.

What is troubling is that the problems raised by his repellent attitudes, on the one hand, and the disturbing power of his work on the other, cannot be solved by a distinction between « the work » and « the man ». Or rather, we cannot immediately call on that distinction to solve them. The problems that matter, of course, concern the work : it is only the fact that we want to take the work seriously that forces us to confront Wagner at all. But it does indeed force us to confront him, because Wagner's is a case in which, if we are to deal adequately with the work and its power, we have to take into account the attitudes of the man and what they have come to mean. I do not mean that his views, even his views of his own works, necessarily determine our interpretation of them. His works are independent, in varying degrees, from the outlook expressed in what he wrote around and about them, but we have to ask, in every case, how far they are independent of it, and in what ways. We need to understand, in particular, how far what moves us in the work may be connected with what frightens and repels us in his attitudes.

Some contemporary approaches to the work, though they are very vocal about Wagner's attitudes, fail to grasp that this is the question, and fall short of what we need in order to think about it. A lot of writing about Wagner in the last 30 years conceives the problem as that of revealing a hidden scandal ; they try to trace the ways in which the attitudes have marked the works. (8) These writers spend a lot of effort, for instance, in trying to find signs of anti-Semitism in the Operas themselves, claiming that the representations of Mime, Klingsor, Beckmesser, and other characters introduce Jewish stereotypes. I am not concerned with the question, still much disputed, of whether the attempts at decipherment of these characters are correct. Even if a 19th Century audience did not need as much help in recognizing such stereotypes as, seemingly, we do ; even if Wagner consciously intended them (for which there is no direct evidence) , the point is that these supposed signs are too trivial to help with the only question that can reasonably concern us. The only reason for worrying about Wagner's works is that they are powerful and interesting. But, if that is so, what difference would these signatures, these local coded messages, make ?

In effect, these writers reduce the problem of Wagner's anti-Semitism (so far, as the works are concerned) to these supposed traces, to the idea that, in one instance or another, Wagner is knowingly signaling it. This cannot help to deal with any deep anxieties caused by Wagner's works. In fact, it serves to reconcile these writers' admiration for them with their bad conscience about his attitudes, but at a painless and superficial level. They have externalized the problem, moving it from where it truly belongs.

We can take an analogy from a quite different work of Thomas Mann's, « Death in Venice » : these critics treat the threat, the dangerousness, of Wagner, as if it were the outbreak of cholera, which with luck you can signal and confine by whitewashing and disinfecting the walls. But our, and their, real problem with Wagner is not like this at all - rather, it is like Aschenbach's problem with Tadzio. These critics do not accept at the right level the way in which Wagner is related to his works. They are saying, in effect, that there had better be something wrong with the works, and they have come-up with a circumscribed and relatively painless way of identifying what this is.

In a well-known book Robert W. Gutman has written :

Unhappily, a proto-Nazism, expressed mainly through an unextinguishable loathing of the Jews, was one of Wagner's principal leitmotifs, the venomous tendrils of anti-Semitism twining through his life and work. In his final years, his hatred reached-out further to embrace those with black and yellow skins. This attitude cannot be shrugged-off as an unfortunate whim or a minor flaw in a musical hero.

This underlines the point that the presence of some anti-Semitic signatures is not in itself enough : they are not going to show that anti-Semitism is « one of the principal leitmotifs » of Wagner's work. The works will have to be more thoroughly polluted than that, and in his book Robert W. Gutman gives interpretations to suggest that they are (though he does less to show that these interpretations are inescapable) . But, then, he is thrown back to the question of why these thoroughly polluted works are supposed to be interesting or important to us. To this, his answer appeals simply to the music :

« Yet, Wagner survives and, primarily, because he was a great musician. His ripe late-Romantic style retains much of its allure. A music of almost unparalleled eloquence and intimacy keeps his works on the stage. (9)

This is not an answer at all. Having refused to separate the man and the work, Robert W. Gutman tries to separate the work and its music, an aim which can be seen to be failing already in the use of words such as « eloquence » and « intimacy » , and which is anyway peculiarly hopeless in the case of Wagner, who took unprecedented steps to unify musical and dramatic expression. If we end-up with such an evasion, it is clear that we must start again.

Some modern productions of Wagner's works have another way of trying to « externalize » the problems. It is a significant fact that we have seen in the Opera House, in recent years, the coexistence of 2 kinds of radicalism. In cases to which it is appropriate, there is an increasing « authenticity » of orchestral and vocal performance, based on historical research ; and, at the same time, there are productions and sets which display all degrees of re-thinking and creativity up to the now notorious extremes of directorial whimsy - which, themselves, are more or less what has come to be expected.

These 2 developments might seem to go in opposite directions. It is true, of course, that they can conflict, as when the production makes it impossible for the singers to express what the music requires or invites them to express. (It is important that this should not be described as a conflict between music and drama ; it is a conflict between the dramatic contribution of the music and the dramatic contribution of the staging.) But this is a matter of particular failures, not of what is intrinsic to the 2 kinds of radicalism. Even quite extreme versions of them, if they are put together in the right way, can produce a triumphant success (this was true of Peter Sellars' recent production at Glyndebourne of Händel's « Theodora ») . They can combine to the same end. The musical performance tries to offer a closer approximation to the composer's means of expression ; the production offers a version of what this drama, these emotional relations, can mean in terms that make sense to us now - it tries to find visual and dramatic equivalences, which work for us, to the expressive content both of the words and of the music as that music is now presented to us. No theatrical presentation of the drama that was simply determined by historical research could possibly do that.

In fact, the idea of a theatrical production of an Opera which is « authentic » in the sense in which musical performances can aim to be « authentic » (and that itself, of course, raises large questions which are not the concern here) seems to be virtually non-sensical. Critics who attack what they see as the extreme innovations of recent directors and call for « traditional » productions of the « Ring » cannot mean that we should be given what Wagner, in 1876 in Bayreuth, actually had - for one thing, we know what Wagner thought of what he got in 1876. (10) But quite apart from that, since the question is one for us, of what we should do, even the most devoted intentionalist will have to ask not what Wagner wanted granted the resources he had, but what he would have wanted if he had had our resources ; and that means, of course, also, resources to present his works to audiences who have seen what we have seen (and not only on the stage) . We are back, unsurprisingly, where we started, with the problems of staging Wagner's works for us now. In pursuit of a truthful production, there is absolutely no alternative to re-creation.

The objection to some recent productions of Wagner is not that they are in a new idiom, but rather that they do not use that idiom to re-create. What some of them offer is mere comment. Unlike the decipherment of the supposed anti-Semitic signatures, which I have just considered, the ideologically critical treatment of the works in these productions is not minor or episodic. Their comments may be continuous, as when Wotan is throughout represented as a tycoon in the current Bayreuth production of the « Ring » . The problem arises if they are no more than comments, external to any response to the content of the works ; in that case, they are like the supposed decipherment of anti-Semitic messages. (11) Just as being given a decoding of Beckmesser's vocal style as Jewish, even if it were correct, would do very little to help one understand or shape one's reactions to « Die Meistersinger » , so a continuous sub-joined ethical health warning added to the « Ring » (the mechanical injection into it of modern hate-figures, for instance) does not help one to face what the « Ring » , both for good and for bad, requires one to face.

We have to address the works and the problems they present on a larger scale. We have to ask : What general features of Wagner's style contribute to the problems ? I should like to suggest 3, all of them characteristics that were mentioned by Thomas Mann.

Wagner shared with other 19th Century artists, notably Ibsen, the aim of uniting the mythic and the psychological. One might even suggest (this is my suggestion, not Mann's) that in a certain sense Wagner is Ibsen inside out. Ibsen succeeded in some of his works in taking realistic bourgeois domestic drama and giving it the weight, the sense of necessity, that one can find in Sophocles ; Wagner took myths and medieval epics and installed in them a psychology which is often that of bourgeois domestic drama. There is a basic problem with this enterprise, implicit in Walter Benjamin's observation that the heroes of ancient tragedy or epic lack an inner life in a modern sense : many, if not all, of those ancient works gravely express a necessity that transcends biographical particularity. To reconcile this fact with a drama for which intensity almost unavoidably means intense subjectivity is a hard undertaking, as many 19th and 20th Centuries artists have found.

In fact, there are 3 levels involved. Besides the mythical or medieval materials, and the explicit motivations and situations of bourgeois drama, Wagner engages in depth psychological explorations which are expressed in words and music that go far beyond naturalistic drama. Wagner is most successful in reconciling the mythical and the psychological, so it seems to me, when it is this last element that prevails : when the subjective intensity is so extreme, solitary, and unrelated to citizenly or domestic life that in its own way it takes on an authority which is, perhaps, analogous to that of ancient tragedy. This is notably so in « Parsifal » and in Act 3 of « Tristan und Isolde ». Elsewhere, he succeeds because he can sustain an analogy with domestic drama which does not need to apologize for itself : an obvious example is Act I of « Die Walküre » .

Sometimes, the analogies are imperfectly negotiated, and even the « arts of transition » of which Wagner was justly proud cannot hold the levels together. I personally think that this is true, at all 3 levels, of King Mark's recriminations in Act 2 of « Tristan » . There is the problem that the view of the lovers, from an everyday social perspective, is less interesting at this point than what we have just experienced inside the world of night that they have entered ; and, in addition, for all the references to heroes and courtly honour, it is hard to dissociate Mark's complaints from a bourgeois embarrassment, doubtless familiar to Wagner himself. In such cases, there are problems for production but, with skill and luck, they can be dealt with. However, there is one central case, the character of Siegfried, in which there is a real vacuum, a collapse at the heart of the work, and the very questionable conception of heroism which is associated with him has, I am going to suggest, a political significance.

Another, and very manifest, feature of the style is that Wagner really did break down in some ways, the conventional distinction between the musical and the non-musical. As Mann put it, while the old criticism that Wagner's music is not really musical was absurd, nevertheless, it was not entirely unintelligible : Wagner's work does, in a way, fuse the musical and the literary. Mann says about the E-flat chord that starts « Das Rheingold » :

« It was an acoustic thought : the thought of the beginning of all things. Music has been here pressed into service in an imperiously dilettante fashion in order to represent a mythical concept. » (12)

This implies that the « deeds of music made manifest » which, as he was finishing the « Ring » , Wagner said were offered in his work, (13) and the psychological / ethical /political significance of the text (or rather, one should say, the action) , can only be understood in terms of each other. It is no peculiarity of Wagner that what the work means is not given merely or primarily by the action : it is true of all Opera or, at least, of all great Opera. But Wagner's style does make the dramatic relations between music and action, at once, more pervasive and, emotionally, more immediate. We have already seen one consequence of this, that one cannot adequately explain the power of Wagner by simply appealing to the music. There is another consequence, in (so to speak) the opposite direction : that if someone feels that there is something ethically or politically suspect about, in particular, the « Ring » , that feeling, whether it is correct or incorrect, is not going to be met simply by appealing to the action or, more narrowly, to the text.

It is a paradox that some defenders of Wagner, having elsewhere extolled the unity of music and text in his works, think it is enough to meet these ideological criticisms to point-out that, according to the plot, oath-breaking and theft do not pay-off. Whatever the hopes may be for recovering an overall sense of the end of the « Ring » , you are not going to find it in its closing words, and it is a significant point, a point which comes back again to the figure of Siegfried, that one of the most overwhelming and also, I am going to suggest, unnerving episodes of « Götterdämmerung » , the funeral music, has no words.

Wagner is, more than any other, a « totalizing » artist ; in any given work, all the elements relate to one underlying conception or tone. Mann, once more, puts this very well, in terms which, from a technical point of view, are no doubt exaggerated, but which express something entirely recognizable :

« It is this infinite power of characterization that separates the works from each other, and develops each of them from a basic sound which distinguishes it from all the others ; so, that inside the totality of the œuvre, which itself constitutes a personal world, each individual work again forms a self-contained unity, like a star. »

Nietzsche said that, in any given work of Wagner's, it is as though it were all presented by one impersonator with a very distinctive voice ; and, since the biographical presence is also strong, this impersonator may easily be taken for the composer. (14) All doubt, duality, or under-determination is either internalized into the action (the characters are represented as undecided or in conflict) , or it is externalized, existing outside the work altogether (the work stands against the rest of the world) ; doubt and duality do not exist at the level at which the work offers itself. The work itself voices or implies total unity and certainty. Because the voice of the work is so distinctive in Wagner's case, and, once again, the historical presence of the composer is close (for instance, in suggesting what the whole enterprise stands against) , the sense is not of a world assumed, but of an outlook asserted.

The extreme modernism of Wagner's later style implies that he is not taking for granted the ethical or social assurances which give structure to many other confident dramatic works of the 19th Century, such as those of Giuseppe Verdi. But, at the same time, though he represents ambivalent characters and actions that have ambiguous or perverse consequences, he was not disposed in the least to the typically modernist development by which ambivalence and indeterminacy become part of the fabric of the presentation itself, so that it is essential to the work that it does not finally tell its audience what to make of it. There are few Operas, in fact, that have achieved this effect, but they include 2 of the greatest among 20th Century Operatic works, « Pelléas et Mélisande » and « Lulu » .

I come back to the absence of the Goethean spirit, that I mentioned earlier, in connection with « Die Meistersinger » and the project of founding a German art. Part of the suspect quality of Wagner lies in the fact that, although he portrays conflicts and contradictions, such as Wotan's indecisions, his recognition that he cannot directly achieve what he wants, the tensions between power and love, and so on, Wagner's tone in presenting these things seems to have at each point an indomitable assurance. He is telling us what it all adds-up to. This aspect of Wagner's style can produce fear and resentment ; one can have the sense of being locked inside Wagner's head ; and it can also give a sense of fraudulent manipulation. Moreover, as soon as Wagner's assurance (the feeling that he thinks he has a hold on what is unconditionally significant) encounters the political, particularly in his trying to transcend it, it can become deeply alarming.

These features and the reactions they arouse may mean that some of his devices simply do not work. But, sometimes, Wagner's inventions work when it seems that they should not and, then, our resistance (and, hence, our conflicts) can be especially strong. More than one consideration that has already come-up leads us to particular and very central examples of this, the funeral music in « Götterdämmerung » , the orchestral interlude between the scene of Siegfried's death and the final scene of the whole « Ring » . The funeral music is almost entirely retrospective in its effect, and it is essential to our experience of the « Ring » that this should be so. No one, I think, could describe it as regretful, or melancholy, or resigned. It is manifestly triumphant. It is offered as the celebration of the life, just ended, of a great hero. Yet, as many critics have noticed, the subject of this shattering musical memorial scarcely exists as a person.

Siegfried is the least self-aware, in every sense of the word the least knowing, of Wagner's heroes. He does not know much about anything, least of all about himself, and a lot of what he does know he forgets for most of « Götterdämmerung », under the influence of Hagen's drug. Although, in his dying moments, the memories of his love for Brünnhilde are restored to him, they do not bring with them any greater understanding, but only a return to a blissful past. In this, and in his relation to these magic drinks, he is quite unlike Tristan, who in his great monologue in the 3rd Act comes to see how everything that happened flowed from himself - that, he himself, as he says, brewed the love potion. To Siegfried, on the other hand, the machinery of spells remains external, and represents nothing in his motivations or his wishes. If he had any character at all, it would be only a limitless (one might almost say clinical) guilelessness.

His encounter with Brünnhilde did teach him something, fear. This gave him, we are told, a new experience, but it is notable that we are not given much more than the telling of it. There is a good deal of psychological material in the last scene of « Siegfried » after Siegfried awakens Brünnhilde and it is, of course, expressed in the music, but it almost entirely concerns Brünnhilde's transition from warrior to lover. Siegfried as lover gets new music, but very little of a new psychology. What he carries forward from the encounter is nothing but a blissful memory ; and when he reasserts his individuality as a hero and returns to the world of action, there is no project for him except action itself. « Zu neuen Taten ! » (« New deeds ! ») is the 1st thing that Brünnhilde says to him in « Götterdämmerung », and, if we take it for granted that he is to resume the only life he is able to live, there is nothing else for her to say. What matters is the absence of an inner life, not in itself the absence of intelligence. Parsifal is defined by a holy lack of intelligence but, in the course of the action, he gains an inner life ; the confrontation with memory and sexuality that is enacted in such extraordinary terms, in the 2nd Act, changes him completely, whereas to Siegfried nothing significant happens at all.

It is not impossible for a great hero to lack an inner life : as Walter Benjamin pointed-out, the heroes of epic and ancient tragedy are often presented with a notably reticent indication of their subjectivity. But it is much harder to present as a great hero one who is simply naive and unimaginative, and whose great deeds, the slaying of the dragon and the journey to Brünnhilde, are not so much emblems of courage as the products of an infantile fearlessness. This is no Achilles. He appears, moreover, in a drama in which subjectivity, self-consciousness, reflection, personal ambivalence, and so on are pervasive, expressed in the artistic means themselves, and, above all, central to the existence of another character, Wotan, who has a better claim to be the hero.

Because the celebration represented by the funeral music is of the seemingly uncelebratable, there is a crisis of theatrical production at this point. Recently, we have often been given an empty stage or Siegfried's body lying undisturbed. On the occasions, I have seen them, these came-out as lame or desperate devices ; but it is not surprising that there is desperation. Critics complain of a willful, contemptuous rejection of the heroic. But it is not the directors' fault that there is a failure of the heroic. They are reacting, if inadequately, to a feature of the work which, if it is allowed to emerge, is bound now to seem empty or potentially alarming.

Since there is this dramatic failure, it is a real question why the funeral music can indeed be effective, in fact overpowering ; and it is not enough to say that it is an astonishing piece of music, since it is a piece of dramatic music in the deepest Wagnerian sense. I think that there is an answer to the question of how it can move us so much, and I shall come back to this. But the problem that comes first, one that is signaled by the directors' difficulties, is that of heading-off a different kind of message (an implicitly political message) which can readily fill the gap left by Siegfried's absence as hero. I said that the funeral music, granted that absence, can be alarming. The reason for this lies in its relation to the political, or rather, unpolitical aspects of the « Ring » .

The serene and reconciling motif that appears in the last moments of « Götterdämmerung » used to be called « Redemption through Love » . None of these labels for the leitmotifs has any authority, but this was worse than most. For what, even in Wagner's overgenerous use of such words, has been redeemed ? Brünnhilde, of course, sacrifices herself by riding into Siegfried's funeral pyre, but if this is to count as redemption, rather than suttee on horseback, it has to have some further result. She says :

« This fire, burning my frame, cleanses the curse from the ring. »

Indeed, the gold is now purified, because it has been returned to the Rhine - the only place, as the Rhinemaidens sang in the last words of « Rheingold » , for what is close and true :

Traulich und treu
ist's nur in der Tiefe. (15)

The gold has been redeemed, if one insists on the word. But there is no suggestion that the gold's return, or the deaths of Siegfried and Brünnhilde, have also redeemed the world, at least if that means that the world has become a better or freer place. The future of the world, at the end of « Götterdämmerung » , is plainly not a concern, while the gods have no future at all. This is an embarrassment to the familiar political interpretations of the « Ring » . They all begin with a great impetus from « Rheingold » , with its manifest images of expropriation, self-improvement, and slavery, but even the most resourceful of them tend to peter-out as the cycle proceeds, finding material at its end only for some vapid aspiration to a politics of innocence.

The problem with this is not that the « Ring » , as it proceeds, avoids politics. It is rather that the hope for a politics of innocence is one thing that it seems to reject. If one wants transportable lessons from the « Ring » , a conclusion to be drawn from the story of Wotan will be that there is no politics of innocence, because nothing worth achieving can be achieved in innocence. Only in the depths, where nothing has been imposed on nature or wrested from it, is the tender and true. But the nobility and « grandeur » of the funeral music stand against this. Not because of what it says (it says nothing) but, all the more, because of what it does, it can carry the suggestion that perhaps there could be a world in which a politics of pure heroic action might succeed, uncluttered by Wotan's ruses or the need to make bargains with giants, where Nibelungs could be dealt with forever : a redemptive, transforming politics which transcended the political.

Such ideas had in Germany a long, complex, and ultimately catastrophic history. Politics or, at least, « ordinary » politics, the politics of Parties, power, bargaining, and so on, was seen as something divisive, low, materialistic, and superficial, in contrast to something else which was deep, spiritual, and capable of bringing people together into a higher unity : something, moreover, which instead of peddling satisfactions, demanded renunciation and suffering. There were 2 main candidates for this higher thing, art and the nation, or, indeed, the 2 together.

Such ideals informed the influential conception of the « Sonderweg », the idea of a special path that German development might follow, distinct from (in particular) Britain and France ; and one expression of the difference lay in a supposed contrast between « Kultur », which was German and deep, and « Zivilisation », which was shallow and French. (Thomas Mann himself had supported such ideas during the First World War, and still in part sought to justify them in the diffuse work which he published in 1918, significantly called « Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen » : « Reflections of a Non-Political Man ») . (16) All the elements of this tradition were to be exploited in a desultory but ruthlessly opportunistic way by Adolf Hitler. (17) Hitler was far from unpolitical, but he pretended to be, and perhaps himself believed that in him the nation had transcended politics : that the politics which brought him to power and which, together with terror, kept him in it, was indeed a politics of transcendence.

Wagner was certainly deeply committed to the nationalist ideals of the « Sonderweg », but it is rare in his works (as opposed to his writings) that the will to transcend politics points in a distinctively political direction. « Die Meistersinger » certainly has political implications ; as Nietzsche rightly said, it is against « Zivilisation », German against French. Moreover, it invites questions, which it notably fails to answer, about the politics of art. Hans Sachs believes in the judgment of the « Volk » and, in the last scene, the young knight Walter gets their enthusiastic approval, with a composition which, we are told, reconciles inspiration with tradition. Wagner, no doubt, thought that the same could truly be said of his act as a whole. But, in fact, nothing in this bland formula or, in the way it is worked-out in « Die Meistersinger », is going to close the gap between Wagner's intensely radical avant-garde experiments and music that could be straightforwardly popular as, for instance, Verdi's was.

The politics of art (the relations of Wagner, his music, and the German people) remains, at the end of the Opera, an unsolved question. But the relation of all this to politics in a narrower sense, the politics of government, is not even a question in « Die Meistersinger ». Although, in the last moments of the work (in a notably obtrusive passage, which Wagner seems to have put in at Cosima's insistence) , Wagner gets Sachs to declare the ideals of artistic nationalism, he is careful not to commit himself to what its political implications might be. Sachs's last words on the subject are :

Even if the Holy Roman Empire dissolved in mist, yet there would remain
holy German art !

And this, in its context, can fairly be taken to say that the ideals of German art can survive, even if politics change radically or go badly wrong. This might be called the avoidance of politics.

With « Parsifal » , the one work that Wagner wrote after he had completed « The Ring » , the situation is different again. Nietzsche was clearly wrong when he said that Wagner had ended-up by prostrating himself in front of the Christian cross. Wagner did nothing of the sort : roughly speaking, he took some colored snapshots of the Eucharist and used them to illustrate his journey into the psychology of sex, guilt, memory, and pain. (He thought that Nietzsche lacked a sense of humor, because he presented him with a copy of the « Parsifal » poem inscribed from « Richard Wagner, Oberkirchenrat » (as it were, « The Right Reverend Wagner ») and Nietzsche did not find it funny.) But the work does undoubtedly steal some of its resonance from Christian ritual and its associations and, in particular, Wagner's recurrent theme of a redeemer sustains, in this case, much of its familiar religious meaning. Indeed, in the magnificent climax to Act 3, Gurnemanz, crowning Parsifal as king, uses language so dense with references to redemption and salvation that it has even been suggested that he is addressing not Parsifal but the Redeemer Himself.

Although Parsifal becomes a king, he is not a king over any subjects. Nor does the Opera suggest that mankind is reclaiming its identity from religion, as in the more Feuerbachian moments of the « Ring » . Here, we can speak of a genuine absence of politics. What we have is the exploitation of religious remnants in the interests of a drama that operates almost entirely at the level of depth psychology. This involves a kind of trick because, in places, the work has to pretend that the whole of human life is transcended and justified by something higher (as it is represented in the final scene, indeed, literally higher) , the Holy Spirit. But the psychological material is so powerful, the symbols of the wound and the spear are strong enough, and, above all, the musical invention is so compelling that Wagner's « Allmacht » , his capacities as a magical manipulator, enable him just about to get away with it. The director is left with some nasty problems, but we need not be, and certainly not any that have to do with politics.

It is not an objection to « Parsifal » that, at the time of writing it, Wagner wrote increasingly crazy articles tying its story together with themes of racial purity. It might be, for some people, an objection to going to see « Parsifal » : they might feel that they did not wish to be associated in any way with a work written by a man with such an outlook. That is, as people say, their privilege. But it has nothing at all to do with interpreting or responding to « Parsifal » , because whatever theories Wagner may have had, they do not structure the work, or surface in it, or demand our attention in experiencing it.

When Robert W. Gutman, for instance, says, « Parsifal's sudden insight in the magic garden was the realization that by yielding to Kundry he would dilute his purebred strain » , he is not reporting the plot, the text, or any implication of the music's associations. He is simply saying how it might look to someone who thought about little but Wagner's racist writings. My point here is not to re-instate the distinction between the work and the man, which I have already said is not a helpful device in Wagner's case. The point is just that one cannot decide in advance, either positively or negatively, what facts about the man, his views, and their history may be relevant to responding to a given work. In particular, if we acknowledge its power, it is a question of what it is in us that does so and, in the case of « Parsifal » , we have a good enough idea of what that is to know that it has nothing essentially to do with Wagner's racist ravings.

In « Die Meistersinger » , politics is avoided and, from « Parsifal » , it is merely absent but, with the « Ring » , neither of these is true. The cycle emphatically addresses issues of power and if, at its end, it suggests that the world in which they arise is overcome, it is hard not to be left with the feeling that the questions of power and its uses have not so much been banished as raised to a level at which they demand some « higher » kind of answer.

I said earlier that there is an explanation of why the funeral music can move us so much even when we recognize that the supposed object of its triumph does not exist. I suggest that it makes sense because we hear it as the celebration not of a man but of a process, of all that has gone before in the « Ring » . The « Ring » , as it moves toward its end, elicits a cumulative sense of its own complexity and power, and it is this that the funeral music celebrates. The music itself helps to bring this out, as motifs associated with earlier parts of the story come to the surface. In celebrating its own fulfillment, the work can make us feel that the whole disaster-laden history has been worthwhile.

What this expresses is not (and it is very important that it is not) the idea that life is redeemed by art, the idea that real life, and real suffering, cruelty, and humiliation, are justified because they can issue in great works of art. It is doubtful that Wagner believed this even about his own works. It is not that the splendors of the « Ring » can justify real life. Rather, the « Ring » 's celebration of what it has presented can symbolize for us ways in which life even in its disasters can seem to have been worthwhile. In these terms, the « Ring » emerges as what it should be, an affirmative drama, and not in a way that invokes a hypothetical and deeply suspect politics of heroism and sacrifice.

The problem still remains, however, whether the part that Siegfried plays in the story can, on any adequate reading, bear the weight that it is required to bear. Some of the strains in the work come, without doubt, from the complex changes of mind that Wagner underwent as he wrote it. But the problem is not just that the work is imperfect. What really matters is a product of history, that the strains pull us toward a sense of the work in which the transcendence of politics tends to suggest not the absence of politics, but a higher, transcendental, politics, of a peculiarly threatening kind.

This is signaled by problems of theatrical production, and those problems remain even if we come to hear the funeral music as a tragic affirmation rather than the celebration of an embarrassingly non-existent hero. The questions that emerge concretely as problems for the theatrical director are, in any case, questions for all of us, if we do not allow Wagner's extraordinary ingenuity to deflect us from them. Particularly, with regard to the « Ring » , but not only there, it may be impossible, even in our imagination, to re-create Wagner's works altogether adequately. It may be that the total unity of psychology, myth, and morally redemptive significance to which Wagner aspired is an illusion, not just in the sense that it is unattainable (that is true of Beethoven's ideals of freedom) but because, as Nietzsche said, it is based, in some part, on a pretense that a set of theatrical, often grandiose, gestures can reveal the nature of the world. If that is so, then to that extent no honest treatment of it can make it work as a whole. We can do it justice - but, then, it comes-out guilty of that pretense, and justly associated, for indelible historical reasons, with a politics that has since Wagner wrote moved into the gap left by that pretense. Or it can come out less guilty - but, then, theatrical re-creation will have negotiated this as an accommodation between historical memory, what Wagner tried to bring about, and what we can now, decently and (as we say) in all honesty, accept.

If, at least for some of Wagner's works, a production which « did them justice » would find them guilty, this will constitute the historical vengeance of the ethical on an artist who uniquely raised the stakes high enough for such a vengeance to be even possible.

Nietzsche's attacks on Wagner certainly represent an ongoing deep fascination with him, but some of his remarks may also strike a chord with those who are less involved :

« My objections to Wagner's music are physiological objections. What's the point of dressing them up in æsthetic formulae ? »

I come back later to the question whether « Meistersinger » is itself expressly political.

(6) There is one significant qualification to be made : that neither in this essay, nor (yet more remarkably) in pieces written during and after the Second World War, did Thomas Mann, so far as I know, mention Wagner's anti-Semitism.

(7) It was a « nameless presumptuousness » in wanting to have something to say about everything that Mann particularly had in mind when he said in a letter to Emil Preetorius of 1949 that, « there is a lot of Hitler in Wagner » .

(11) It is, perhaps, worth saying that I do not think that this criticism applies to Patrice Chéreau's 1976 Bayreuth production of the « Ring » , which is widely known on video (issued by Philips) . Some of its inventions are gratuitous but, for the most part, it embodies extremely sensitive responses to the drama.

(12) As Adorno pointed-out (« In Search of Wagner » , page 28) , the idea that Wagner was a « dilettante » goes back to Nietzsche's essay, « Richard Wagner in Bayreuth » , written at the time of the 1st Festival, in 1876.

Richard Wagner et Adolf Hitler

Without Wagner would there have been a 3rd « Reich » and what would Richard have thought about his greatest « fan » , Adolf Hitler ?

Undoubtedly, much of Hitler's « weltanschauung » (world view or world philosophy) was dictated by the music, librettos and writings of his favourite composer.

Wilhelm Richard Wagner (22 May 1813 - 13 February 1883) was a German composer, theatre director, polemicist, and conductor who is primarily known for his Operas (or, as some of his later works were later known, « music-dramas ») . Unlike most Opera composers, Wagner wrote both the libretto and the music for each of his stage works. Initially establishing his reputation as a composer of works in the Romantic vein of Carl Maria von Weber and Giacomo Meyerbeer, Wagner revolutionised Opera through his concept of the « Gesamtkunstwerk » (Total Work of Art) , by which he sought to synthesise the poetic, visual, musical and dramatic arts, with music subsidiary to drama, and which was announced in a series of essays between 1849 and 1852.

Wagner realized these ideas most fully in the 1st half of the 4 Opera cycle « Der Ring des Nibelungen » (The Ring of the Nibelung) . His compositions, particularly those of his later period, are notable for their complex textures, rich harmonies and orchestration, and the elaborate use of leitmotifs - musical phrases associated with individual characters, places, ideas or plot elements. His advances in musical language, such as extreme chromaticism and quickly shifting tonal centres, greatly influenced the development of Classical music.

In addition, there was a personal element to Hitler's connection with Wagner.

Of course, Wagner died in 1883, and Hitler was born in 1889 (so, there could be no direct, personal connection) however Wagner had a son, Siegfried, and Siegfried, despite his homosexuality, had sons : Wolfgang and Wieland. After the death of Siegfried Wagner, in 1930, Winifred Wagner, Siegfried's wife, took-over the Bayreuth Festival, running it until the end of World War II.

In 1923, Winifred met Adolf Hitler who, as we know, greatly admired Wagner's music.

When Hitler was jailed for his part in the Munich « Beer-Hall " Putsch " » , Winifred sent him food parcels and stationery on which Hitler's autobiography « Mein Kampf » was written.

In the late- 1930's, she served as Hitler's personal translator during treaty negotiations with England.

Winifred's relationship with Hitler grew so close that, by 1933, there were rumors of impending marriage.

« Haus Wahnfried » , the Wagner home in Bayreuth, became Hitler's favourite retreat, and he had his own separate accommodation in the grounds of Wahnfried, known as the « Führerbau » .

The name of the villa Wahnfried, is interesting.

« Wahn » means endless striving of an artist for the fulfilment of his aspirations and the triumph of his art. So « Wahnfried » (Wahn free) was the name chosen and, even today, we can see Wagner's motto on the front : « Here where my delusions have found peace, let this place be named Wahnfried. » .

Above the door to the villa is a giant mural, depicting Wotan, King of the Gods and the philandering wanderer, being welcomed by Classical women.

We should also note that Wotan was the name of Wagner's beloved Saint-Bernard dog.

The whole house was a place where Wagner could compose, raise his family and entertain guests.

The Grand Hall is the largest room in the villa, and is a 2 storey space with a gallery around the 2nd floor and a skylight in the ceiling. Furnishings include 2 of Wagner's pianos and numerous busts. The specially designed Bechstein piano was the piano Wagner used when he was composing « Die Meistersinger » , part of « Siegfried » and « Parsifal » . It was a present from the endlessly patient, endlessly generous King Ludwig II for Wagner's birthday, in 1864.

In a shady grove beyond the garden, surrounded with ivy, is the tomb of Richard and Cosima Wagner. The stone is unmarked, because as Wagner insisted, as long as it remained, everyone would know who was buried there.

But to begin at (almost) the beginning :

The most momentous non-event of the Century occurred in February of 1908. And it occurred in Vienna to Alfred Roller. Today, Roller is not so much underestimated as unknown, at least outside a small circle of Opera devotees. Yet, in 1908, he was one of the most important figures on the Viennese artistic scene. He was a painter who, along with Gustav Klimt, organized the Vienna Secession.

He was also professor of Fine-Arts and, soon, to be appointed director of the School of Applied-Arts. But above all, he was a stage-designer of great distinction.

In that 1st week of February, Roller received a letter from a friend declaring that a young man of her acquaintance was a great admirer of his.

The lad was an aspiring painter and loved Opera ; he would give anything, she wrote, to meet Roller to discuss his professional prospects, either in painting or in stage design.

Despite his heavy commitments, Roller generously agreed to meet him, take a look at some of his work and advise him on a career.

The young man was overjoyed and, a short time later, with Roller's reply and a portfolio of his works in hand, went to the Opera house.

On reaching the entrance, so he later said, he got cold feet and left.

A short time later, he summoned-up his courage, returned and, this time, made it as far as the grand staircase, when he again took flight.

On a 3rd occasion, he was well on his way to Roller's office when an Opera House attendant asked his business. At that, he turned on his heels and fled for good.

Now, young Adolf (Hitler) was not a naturally timid young man so what was it that prevented him from meeting Roller ? Was there some force, that prevented him from taking the critical that would have decisively changed world history ?

But he never forgot the gesture, and when he finally met Roller, in 1934, he told him the story. The young man was now Chancellor of Germany.

If only, history sighs, Roller and Hitler had met in 1908 and Hitler had been taken on as an assistant at the Opera, or enrolled at the School of Applied-Arts.

As Hitler himself remarked to his personal staff, in 1942 :

« Without a recommendation, it was impossible to get anywhere in Austria. When I came to Vienna, I had a recommendation to Roller. But I never made use of it. If I had gone to him with it, he would have taken me right off. But I do not know whether that would have been better for me. Certainly, everything would have been much easier. And much different. »

In any event, Adolf Hitler never lost his admiration of Alfred Roller.

When Winifred Wagner decided, in 1933, to stage a new production of Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » at Bayreuth, the Ist since the original of 1882, Hitler, not unnaturally, proposed Roller to do it, although he had other, more obscure reasons for making that request and she agreed.

So how did it all start ? Hitler's love-affair with Wagnerian Opera had begun in Linz in 1901 when, at the age of 12, he attended his Ist Opera.

The performance was of « Lohengrin » and, as he later wrote in « Mein Kampf » :

« I was captivated at once. My youthful enthusiasm for the Master of Bayreuth knew no bounds. Again and again I was drawn to his works. » .

From that moment, the lad found himself addicted, literally so, to Wagner's Operas.

The composer's musical and intellectual influence in Central Europe was then at its zenith, and Hitler embraced the cult as devoutly as anyone.

During the years following the ecstasy of that Ist « Lohengrin » performance, Hitler returned to the Linz Opera House, night after night.

It was there that he eventually met another Opera enthusiast, August Kubizek :

August (« Gustl ») Kubizek (3 August 1888, Linz - 23 October 1956, Eferding) was a close friend of Adolf Hitler when both were in their late teens. He later wrote about their friendship.

The slightly older August, although training to follow in the footsteps of his father as an upholsterer, was a serious amateur musician, able to play several stringed and brass instruments.

In a short time, he became the sole friend of Hitler's youth.

It was not simply the mutual interest in Opera that drew them together but the compliant Kubizek's willingness (an absolute requisite for everyone else later as well) to listen in tacit agreement or, at least, silence as the domineering « Adi » expatiated on whatever caught his fancy.

According to Hitler's comments to Albert Speer, the 2 young men spent hours wandering through the streets of Linz as he rambled on about music, architecture and the importance of the Arts.

Berthold Konrad Hermann Albert Speer (March 19, 1905 - September 1, 1981) was a German architect who was, for a part of World War II, Minister of Armaments and War Production for the 3rd « Reich » . Speer was Adolf Hitler's chief architect before assuming ministerial office. Speer joined the Nazi Party, in 1931, launching him on a political and governmental career which lasted 14 years. His architectural skills made him increasingly prominent within the Party and he became a member of Hitler's inner circle. Hitler instructed him to design and construct a number of structures, including the « Reich » Chancellery and the « Zeppelinfeld » Stadium, in Nuremberg, where Party rallies were held. Speer also made plans to reconstruct Berlin on a grand scale, with huge buildings, wide boulevards, and a reorganized transportation system.

On visiting Vienna for the 1st time, in 1906, it was to Kubizek that Hitler wrote :

« Tomorrow, I am going to the Opera, ' Tristan ', and the day after ' Flying Dutchman '. » , he reported soon after arriving.

Later, the same day, he dispatched a 2nd postcard of the Opera House on which he had written grandiloquently :

« The interior of the edifice is not exciting. If the exterior is mighty majesty, lending the building the seriousness of an artistic monument, one feels in the interior admiration rather than dignity. Only when the mighty sound waves flow through the auditorium and when the whisperings of the wind give way to the terrible roaring of the sound waves does one feel the grandeur and forget the surfeit of gold and velvet covering the interior. »

On settling in Vienna, the following year, he persuaded Kubizek, who had been admitted to the Music Conservatory, to join him there.

The 2 lived together until 1908 when Hitler, following the humiliation of his 2nd rejection by the Academy of Fine-Arts, suddenly vanished from his companion's life.

Beyond his « Wagnermania » , little is known for certain about Hitler's youthful activities. He sang in a church choir at Lambach Abbey (« Stift Lambach ») , a Benedictine monastery in Lambach, Austria.

« Stift Lambach » :

A monastery was founded in about 1040 by Count Arnold II of Lambach-Wels. His son, Bishop Adalbero of Würzburg (later canonised) , changed the monastery into a Benedictine abbey, 10 year later. Since 1056, it has been a Benedictine abbey. During the 17th and 18th Centuries, a great deal of work in the Baroque style was carried-out, much of it by the Carlone family. Lambach escaped the dissolution of the monasteries of Emperor Joseph II, in the 1780's. In 1897-1898, Adolf Hitler had lived in the town of Lambach (with his parents) . He went to the secular « Volksschule » at which Benedictine teachers were employed.

Hitler had seen several swastikas each day as a boy in Lambach, when he attended the Benedictine monastery school, which was decorated with carved stones and woodwork that included the symbol.

On leaving school, the young Adolf joined a music club, and took piano lessons, from October 1906 until the end of the following January, from a man named Josef Prawratsky.

He soon quit because of lack of money as a result of the expense of his mother's cancer treatments, however, his sister Paula recalled him « sitting for hours at the beautiful Heitzmann grand piano my mother had given him » .

...

Klara Hitler, née Pölzl (12 August 1860 - 21 December 1907) was an Austrian woman, and the mother of Nazi dictator Adolf Hitler.

Paula Hitler - Paula Wolf (21 January 1896 in Hafeld, Austria - 1 June 1960 in Berchtesgaden) was the younger sister of Adolf Hitler and the last child of Alois Hitler and his 3rd wife, Klara Pölzl. Paula was the only full sibling of Adolf Hitler to survive into adulthood.

...

In later years, Hitler occasionally played (according to Winifred Wagner, fairly well) but what he played remains a mystery. Kubizek's 1954 book, « Young Hitler » indicates that Hitler had a fairly solid musical background.

Adolf Hitler was devoted to the works of Franz-Joseph Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Ludwig van Beethoven as well as Anton Bruckner, Carl Maria von Weber, Franz Schubert, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Robert Schumann and Edvard Grieg. He was especially fond of Mozart and of Beethoven's Violin and Piano Concertos, and, above all, Schumann's Piano Concerto (Hitler did not like the music of Johannes Brahms) .

The assertion that Adolf Hitler read Richard Wagner's prose writings and everything else he could get his hands on, by or about Wagner, is contradicted by Franz Jetzinger, librarian at the Linz archive, that Hitler did no serious reading at all, at the time. However, this story, along with many of Jetzinger's assertions about Hitler, has been strongly disputed.

Franz Jetzinger (3 December 1882 in Ranshofen, Upper-Austria - 19 March 1965 in Ottensheim, Upper-Austria) was an Austrian clergyman, academic, politician, civil servant, editor and author. He remains especially famous as author of the book « Hitler's Youth » .

Jetzinger gained fame, in 1958, through the English version of his book, « Hitler's Youth » , in which he could refute many of Hitler's statements about his early years. Moreover, Jetzinger attracted attention by attacking an earlier published book, « The Young Hitler I Knew » by August Kubizek, whom Jetzinger accused of spreading falsehoods. While earlier Hitler biographers, like Joachim Fest or Werner Maser, adopted Jetzinger's criticism as their own, Jetzinger's crushing judgment of Kubizek's credibility is now challenged by Brigitte Hamann, author of « Hitlers Wien ». Hamann asserts personal motives for Jetzinger's tendency to illustrate nearly every statement in Kubizek's book as an ex-post modification of facts, claiming Jetzinger was economically motivated, because the previous release of Kubizek's book supposedly undermined the sale of his own work. Many of Jetzinger's statements have now been discredited.

The young Hitler was undoubtedly enthralled by Wagner's music and he was « transported into that extraordinary state which Wagner's music produced in him, that trance, that escape into a mystical dream-world ; a changed man, his violence left him, he became quiet, yielding and tractable, intoxicated and bewitched, willing to let himself be carried away into a mystical universe ; from the stale, musty prison of his backroom, transported into the blissful regions of Germanic antiquity » , according to Kubizek.

According to some reliable sources, Adolf Hitler wrote an Opera, based on a prose sketch which Richard Wagner had developed, but abandoned, entitled « Wieland der Schmied » (Wieland, the Blacksmith) .

An entire chapter is devoted to the story and tells how the young Hitler worked-out leitmotifs, a cast of characters, a plot, a dramatic structure and a rough score.

Even after the passage of 45 years, Kubizek was able to recall the specific names, all old-Teutonic, of the characters. Within 3 days of conceiving the idea of the Opera, Hitler had already composed an Overture (in Wagnerian style) which he played for his friend on the piano in their completely darkened room :

« Eventually, there was produced a very serious sketch for a music-drama with Adolf Hitler as its composer. »

In Germanic and Norse mythology, Wayland the Smith (Old English : Weland ; Old Norse : Völundr, Velentr ; Old High German : Wiolant ; Proto-Germanic : geboren Welandaz, from geboren Wéla-nandaz, literally : battle-brave) is a legendary Master blacksmith. In Old Norse sources, « Völundr » appears in « Völundarkviða » , a poem in the Poetic Edda, and in « Þiðrekssaga » , and his legend is also depicted on the Ardre image stone VIII. In Old English sources, he appears in « Deor » , « Waldere » and in « Beowulf » and the legend is depicted on the Franks Casket. He is mentioned in the German poems about Dietrich von Bern as the Father of Witige.

August Kubizek also explains how Hitler dreamed-up the idea of a « Mobile “ Reichs ” Orchestra » or « Reich Symphony Orchestra » which was to tour German provinces and perform without charge.

In 1928, an Orchestra dedicated to promoting National-Socialist ideals was organized and, in 1931, it became, with Hitler's approval, a travelling National-Socialist Symphony Orchestra.

By far, the best-known of Kubizek's reminiscences relates to the Opera « Rienzi » :

« Following a performance at the Linz Opera of Wagner's ' Rienzi ', Hitler ascended to a high place (the Freinberg Hill overlooking the city) where he experienced an ideological epiphany. »

« Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen » (Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes) is an early Opera by Richard Wagner in 5 acts, with the libretto written by the composer after Bulwer-Lytton's novel of the same name (1835) .Written between July 1838 and November 1840, it was 1st performed at the « Hofoper Dresden » , on 20 October 1842, and was the composer's 1st success.

The Opera is set in Rome and is based on the life of Cola di Rienzi (1313-1354) , a late medieval Italian populist figure who succeeds in outwitting and then defeating the nobles and their followers and in raising the power of the people.

Inspired by the hero of the Opera, a simple man driven by a sense of mission to restore greatness to Rome, Hitler fell into a state of « complete ecstasy and rapture » and declared that he too was destined to lead his people to greatness.

Kubizek went on to say that he mentioned the episode to Hitler when they met in Bayreuth, in 1939, and found that he recalled it : « In that hour, it began. » , the « Führer » commented.

And it is a story that is anchored in fact.

One fact is that the Opera was actually performed at the local Opera House, beginning in January 1905.

Another is that this is another case where the book and the « Reminiscences » are consistent.

When a sceptical Jetzinger read that passage and challenged it (why ?) , Kubizek responded in evident dudgeon : « The experience after ' Rienzi ' really happened. » .

But most telling is Hitler's own testimony to Albert Speer, in 1938, a full year before Kubizek raised the topic at Bayreuth.

Explaining why the Party rallies opened with the Overture to the Opera, he said it was not simply because of the impressiveness of the music but also because it had great personal significance :

« Listening to this blessed music as a young man in the Opera at Linz, I had the vision that I too must some day succeed in uniting the German Empire and making it great once more. »

Upon the annexation of Austria, Adolf Hitler publicly expressed identical sentiments, without the personal reference to « Rienzi » , telling an audience in Vienna :

« I believe it was God's will to send a youth from here into the " Reich " , to let him grow-up, to raise him to be the leader of the nation so as to enable him to lead his homeland back into the “ Reich ”. »

The « Anschluß » (German for : connection or union) , also known as the « Anschluß Österreichs » , was the reunion of Austria with the 3rd « Reich » , in 1938.

With the « Anschluß » , the German-speaking Republic of Austria ceased to exist as a fully independent State.

In some sense, then, the « Rienzi » experience marked the primal scene of his political career.

Wilhelm Furtwängler : « Hitler’s love of music was intense, fanatical even. But, as in painting, his taste was limited to a specific type. » .

Wilhelm Furtwängler learned this to his shock at a long meeting with the « Führer » , in August 1933.

Wilhelm Furtwängler (January 25, 1886 - November 30, 1954) was a German conductor and composer. He is widely considered to have been one of the greatest Symphonic and Operatic conductors of the 20th Century.

During the 1920's and 1930's, Furtwängler became one of the leading conductors in Europe, as principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic from 1922, as principal conductor of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra from 1922 to 1926, and as a major guest-conductor of other leading Orchestras such as the Vienna Philharmonic. He was the leading conductor who remained in Germany during the Second World War.

Adolf Hitler left him in no doubt, meant Opera, and Opera meant Wagner and Puccini.

Giacomo Antonio Domenico Michele Secondo Maria Puccini (22 December 1858 - 29 November 1924) , generally known as Giacomo Puccini, was an Italian composer whose Operas are among the most frequently performed in the standard repertoire.

Puccini has been called « the greatest composer of Italian Opera after Verdi » . While his early work was rooted in traditional late- 19th Century Romantic Italian Opera, he successfully developed his work in the « realistic » Verismo style, of which he became one of the leading exponents.

Symphonies, initially, held little interest to Hitler ; and chamber music, none at all.

There is no record of his ever having attended a chamber concert or a lieder recital.

His attendance at Symphony concerts was increasingly rare as time passed and, when he became Chancellor, he seldom appeared, except on ceremonial occasions.

Adolf Hitler wanted music to be readily available. However, and after 1933, he built-up a large collection of phonograph recordings at the Chancellery in Berlin, at the Berghof, on his train and, later on, at his military headquarters on the Eastern front.

According to all accounts, these were outstanding in quality and quantity, and the playing equipment was excellent. In the evenings, he enjoyed hearing short excerpts and dramatic highlights of favourite pieces.

« He would then sit back » , according to Christa Schröder, and listen with his eyes closed.

Adolf Hitler had a fascination with Anton Bruckner's music and Hitler saw many parallels with Bruckner's artistic struggles. Both were born in Upper-Austria (near Linz) and both had difficulties achieving artistic acceptance in the musical capital of Vienna.

It is not surprising that Hitler would have the music of Bruckner at one of his many military headquarters. The « Bruckner Archive » (John F. Berky ; abruckner.com) holds 2 discs from the « Telefunken » shellac-set of the Adagio of the Symphony No. 7 performed by Wilhelm Furtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. These are both single-sided discs and have the small « Führer-hauptquartier » stamp affixed to the label.
